RUBRICS (Latin rubrica, from ruber, "red," because they were originally written in red ink) are in the ecclesiastical sense the directions in service-books which show how the various parts of the Liturgy should be performed. It is no longer customary to print or write them in red ink, but such directions are distinguished by a different type from the body of the text. The word was borrowed by the church from the law, in which it was applied to the titles or headings of chapters in certain law-books.

RUCHAT, Abraham, b. at Grandcourt in the canton of Vaud, Sept. 15, 1678; d. at Lausanne, Sept. 29, 1750. He studied at Bern, Berlin, and Leyden, and was appointed professor of belles-lettres in 1721, and of theology in 1733, at Lausanne. His fame rests upon his excellent Abrégé de l'histoire ecclesiastique du Pays-de-Vaud (1707) and Histoire de la réforme de la Suisse (1727-28, 6 vols.). The seventh volume was not printed until a hundred years later, in the edition by Vulliemin, 1835, which contains Ruchat's biography and a complete list of his writings.

RUCKERT, Leopold Immanuel, b. at Herrnheinersdorf, near Herrnhut, in Upper Lusatia, 1797; d. at Jena, April 9, 1871. He was, like Schleiermacher, educated by the Moravians in the school of Niesko, and studied theology and philology at Leipzig. In 1825 he was appointed teacher at the gymnasium of Zittau, and in 1844 professor of theology at Jena. From early youth the great goal of his life was to become a uni-university teacher; and his first book, Der akademiische Lehrer (Leipzig, 1824), followed in 1829 by his Offene Mittheilungen an Studirende, is a representation of his ideas of university-teaching.
But he had to fight hard, and to achieve a considerable literary fame, before he reached his goal.
In 1825 he published his ChristianPhilosophie.
In 1831, his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 2d ed., 1830, in 2 vols.; and then his commentaries on Galatians (1833), Ephesians (1834), and Corinthians (1836, 1837, 2 vols.), all characterized by a certain naive boldness, but distinguished by scholarship and piety. As a professor at Jena, he published his second great systematic work, Theologie (Leipzig, 1851, 2 vols.), a peculiar combination of dogmatics and ethics, also Das Abendmahl (Leipzig, 1856), Der Rationalismus (1859), and several minor treatises and devotional tracts.

RUDELBACH, Andreas Gottlob, b. in Copenhagen, Sept. 29, 1792; d. at Slagelse, in the Danish Island of Sealand, March 8, 1862. He studied theology at the university of his native city, and was in 1829 appointed superintendent at Gießen in Hesse-Saxony, which he resigned in 1845. From 1846 to 1848 he lectured in the university of Copenhagen, and in 1848 he was appointed pastor at Slagelse. His literary activity was chiefly in German. Besides several collectsions of sermons and devotional tracts, he published Hieronymus Savonarola, Hamburg, 1885; Reformation, Lutherum, und Union (his principal work), Leipzig, 1839; Einleistung in die Augus-tinische Lehre, Leipzig, 1841; Über die Bedeutung des apostolischen Symbolums, Leipzig, 1844.
Together with Guericke he founded in 1839 the Zeitschrift für lutherische Theologie und Kirche, which he continued to edit till his death. He was one of the most prominent champions of strict Lutheranism against the Prussian union of the two confessions. He also left an unfinished autobiography.

RÜDINGER (RUDIGER), Esrom, b. at Bamberg, May 19, 1828; d. at Nuremberg, Dec. 2, 1851.
He studied at Leipzig, and was appointed rector of the gymnasia of Zwickau in 1849, and professor at Wittenberg in 1857. But in 1874 he was compelled to leave Wittenberg; it having become estranged. The latter part of his life Rufinus spent in his native city. He died in Sicily in 410, flying before the hordes of Alaric.

His principal importance Rufinus has as an interpreter of Greek theology. He translated many of Origen's exegetical works, and we owe to him
our knowledge of the important work, De principis. He also translated the church history of Eusebius (leaving out the tenth book) and adding two books of his own, the latter being an ative down to the death of Theodosius the Great;
the Recognitiones Clementis, the Instituta Monachorum of Basil, the Sententiae of Sixtus, an unknown Pagan philosopher, whom he mistook for the Roman bishop and martyr, Sixtus (Xystus).
Whether he wrote the famous Hist. Monachorum sive de vita patrum, or whether he simply translated it from a Greek original, is doubtful; the latter, however, seems the more probable. Finally, he wrote an Expositio Symboli Apostolici, of historical editions of his works have been given out by De la Barre (Paris, 1850), Vallarsi (Verona, 1775);
and Migne: Patr. Lat., xxii.

RUINART, Thierry, b. at Rheims, June 10, 1657;
d. in the monastery of Hautvillers, in the vicini-y of his native city, Sept. 27, 1706. In 1674 he entered the Congregation of St. Maur, and in 1682 he settled at St. Germain-des-Prés as the pupil, and soon as the friend and co-worker, of Mabillon.
His first great work was the Acta primorum Maryrums, Paris, 1689 (2d ed., Amsterdam, 1713; 3d, with his biography, Verona, 1731); then followed his Historia persecutionis Vandalica (Paris, 1894, of great importance for the history of the African Church); and his excellent edition of the works of Gregory of Tours. Together with Mabillon, he edited the eighth and ninth volumes of the Act.
RULE OF FAITH.

SCHULTZ, Ord. S. Bened. Among his other writings are Ecclesia Parisiensis vindicata, 1706, in defence of Mabillon's De re diplomatica; Abreng de la vie de D. Jean Mabillon, 1709; and several treatises in the Oeuvres posthumes de Mabillon et Rainart, 1723, 4 vols. folio. RULMAN MERSWIN, b. at Strassburg, 1307; d. in the Island Der gruene Wort, July 13, 1382. He was a wealthy merchant and banker, when in 1347 he gave up business, joined the Friends of God, and led a life of severe asceticism, under the guidance of Tauler. In 1366 he acquired the Island of Der gruene Wort, in the Ill, near Strassburg and retired thither. His principal writings are Das Bannerbuechlein, edited by Jundt, 1879, and Von den 9 Felsen, edited by Schmidt, 1859, See C. SCHMIDT: Rulman Merswin, in Revue d'Al- lace, 1856; and JUNDT: Les amis de Dieu, Paris, 1879.

RULMAN MERSWIN,

RUPERT, St., the apostle of Bavaria: was a descendant of the Merovingian house, and bishop of Worms, when by Duke Theodo II. he was invited to Bavaria, which at that time was only nominally a Christian country. He came, and worked with great success, building many churches, and founding many ecclesiastical institutions, among which was Salzburg, where he died in 696. His life is described in Gesta S. Hrobereti, ed. by F. M. Mayer, in Archiv für österreich. Geschichte, vol. 8. See also Acta Sanctorum Boll. (March 3, p. 709), and FRIEDRICH: Das wahrze Zeitalter des hl. R., 1866.

RUPERT OF DEUTZ, one of the most prolific theological writers of the twelfth century; a contemporary of St. Bernhard, and, like him, a mystic. The date and place of his birth are unknown; but he was educated in the monastery of St. Laurentius at Liége, and ordained a priest there in 1101 or 1102. In 1113 he removed to the monastery of Siegburg; in the diocese of Cologne; and in 1120 he was elected abbot of Deutz, where he died, March 4, 1135. His first writings — De divinis officiis, and a commentary on Job, merely an extract from the Moralia in Jobum by Gregory the Great — did not find much favor. The doctors et magistri felt indignant that a mere monk, who had not sat at the feet of any great teacher, should undertake to write books. It came to an actual conflict between Rupert and the pupils of William of Tauler. In 1136 he was protected both by his abbots and by Archbishop Friedrich of Cologne. His chief work, however, was the dedicatory treatise from the Gospels, — Tractatus in Evangelium Johannis, Com- mentarius de operibus sanctae Trinitatis (his principal work, in forty-two books), Commentaries on the Revelation, Canticles, the minor prophetae, etc. In Deutz he wrote De regula Sancti Benedicti, An- nulsus, with a view to the conversion of the Jews; Liber aureus de incedentia Tuitionis, a description of a frightful configuration which destroyed the larger part of Deutz, Sept. 1, 1128, etc. The first collected edition of his works is that by Cochlaeus, Cologne, 1828-29, 2 vols. folio: the last appeared in Venice, 1751, 4 vols. folio.

RUPERT OF DEUTZ,

RUSSIA. The vast empire of Russia is about equal in territorial extent to the British Empire, and twice as large as any other country in the world. In 1798 it had an estimated area of 8,500,- 000 square miles, and a population of 87,000,000 souls. The territory and population in Asia are constantly increasing. Its government is an autocracy, there being no constitutional limits to the power of the Czar.

The prevailing religion of the Russian Empire is the Orthodox Oriental, or Greek Church. More than three-fourths of the entire population belong to it, and it is established by law in the following terms: "The ruling faith in the Russian Empire is the Christian Orthodox Eastern Catholic declaration of belief. Religious liberty is not only assured to Christians of other denominations, but also to Jews, Mohammedans, and Pagan; so that all people living in Russia may worship God according to the laws and faith of their ancestors." This religious liberty, however, is qualified by the following conditions. No Christian can change his religion for any other than the Russian Church, nor can a non-Christian embrace any other form of Christianity; and any apostasy from the State Church is punished by severe penalties, such as banishment from the empire.

Next to the Christian inhabitants of Russia, the Mohammedans are the most numerous, and their numbers are constantly increasing by ter- ritorial extension in Central Asia. They number at present not less than 7,500,000, of whom 2,364,000 are in European Russia, 3,000,000 in Central Asia, 2,000,000 in the Caucasus, 61,000 in Siberia, and 426 in Poland. Their clergy consists of about 20,000 muftis, mollahs, and teachers.

The number of Russian Jews in 1878 was stated to be 1,944,378; in Poland, 815,438; in Caucasus, 3,926; in Siberia, 11,641; in Central Asia, 3,306; but it has since been greatly decreased by emigration to America. The number of pagans in European Russia is 258,125; in Siberia, 296,018; in Central Asia, 14,470; in Cau- casia, 4,988; and in Poland, 345.

Second in point of numbers to the Established Church of the empire, which includes within its pale between 60,000,000 and 70,000,000 souls, is the Eastern or Russian Church. Prior to the partition of Poland, this church had no settled organization in the Russian Empire; but since 1818 there has been an ecclesiastical organization, confirmed by a papal bull.
RUSSIA.

Out of a total population of 5,210,000 in Russian Poland, so less than 4,997,000 are Roman Catholics, while only 34,195 are Orthodox Russians. Outside of Poland, Russia in Europe had (in 1878) a Roman-Catholic population of 2,688,000; in Caucasus, 25,916; in Siberia, 24,316; in Central Asia, 1,816. The Polish provinces had formerly a large population belonging to the United Greek Church, but nearly all of these have now been reconciled to the Russian Church. The United Greek numbers about 90,000.

As the acquisition of Poland added a large Roman-Catholic population to Russia, so the annexation of the Baltic provinces and Finland gave many Lutherans to the empire of the Czar. They enjoy entire liberty of ecclesiastical government, and worship under the superintendence of the minister of the interior, but are not allowed to interfere in any way with the national church. The total number of Lutherans is 2,400,000 in Russia proper, 300,000 in Poland, and 12,000 in Asia.

The Reformed Churches number about 200,000, one-half of whom reside in Lithuania. The Moravians have about 250 chapels, and a member of the Russian Church is divided into fifty-eight dioceses, or dioceses, each of which is under a bishop. The bishops are of three classes. Those of the first class are called metropolitanans, of whom there are but three in Russia, viz., Kiev, Moscow, and Petersburg. The second class are called archbishops, and the third are simply bishops. Besides these, there are some vicars, or suffragan bishops, who are assistants. The inferior clergy are divided into the white or secular priests, and into the black clergy, or monks. The number of the secular clergy, including all grades, is estimated at 60,000. In 1878 the number of monks was 10,512, and of nuns, 14,574 in 147 nunneries.

The creed of the Russian Church is that of the ecumenical Council of Nicaea (325), with the additions made to it by the First Council of Constantinople (381). In common with all branches of the Greek Church, the Russians reject the Filioque, and teach that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father alone, and not from the Father and the Son. They also receive as binding on the consciences all the decrees of seven ecumenical councils (from 325 to 787). This erects a barrier of separation between the Russian Church on the one side, and Protestants on the other.

The Russian Church acknowledges seven sacraments (or mysteries, as they term them); viz., baptism, chrism, the eucharist, confession, orders, matrimony, and the anointing of the sick. As soon as a child is born, the clergyman is sent for to say a prayer over the mother, and give a name to the child; which is usually (but not always) the name of the saint for the day of its birth or baptism. The sacrament of chrism (or confirmation, as it is called in the West) is administered by priests, with fragrant oils consecrated by the bishops. It is usually administered soon after the baptism, sometimes immediately after. The priest anoints the child or adult convert with the oil above referred to, saying at the same time the words of the appointed service for chrism.

The Holy Eucharist is called in the Oriental Church the Divine Liturgy. Leavened bread is used, and wine mingled with water; and communion is given in both kinds. The priest receives each element separately; but the communicants receive the consecrated bread dipped in the wine, administered with a golden spoon. The adult communicants receive the sacraments standing, but even young children and infants are communicated. It is customary in Russia to receive the communion once a year,—in the season of Lent, immediately before Easter.

Auricular confession and absolution are administered, as in the Roman-Catholic Church; but the confessions are somewhat more publicly made in the church,—in the sight, but not the hearing, of others; and the penitents are questioned more generally on the Ten Commandments.

The Russian Church recognizes three orders in the clergy as of divine appointment, viz., bishops, priests, and deacons; but it has other ecclesiastical grades above and below these, as metropolitanans, archbishops, proto-presbyters, archimandrities, proto-deacons, sub-deacons, psalmists, singers, and sextons. Ordinations are administered by bishops only.

Matriomony is attended by great festivity, and some curious and interesting ceremonies, the most important of which is the coronation of the newly-wedded pair. During the service, two crowns, which are often made of silver or of gold, are held over the heads of the bridegroom and the bride, by friends appointed for that purpose. The crown being a symbol of triumph and joy, this custom is intended to signify the triumph of Christian virtue, and joy at the entrance of a new life. Bishops and monks are forbidden to marry; and marriage is allowed to the secular priests and deacons before their ordination. The laity are allowed, when deprived by death of their partners, to marry thrice; but fourth marriages are strictly forbidden. It must be added that divorces are not infrequent in Russia.

The anointing of the sick differs from the extreme unction of the Roman Catholics in that it is not administered to a person at the point of death, but to a sick person, with prayers for his recovery. It is a very long service, and in its full form is administered by seven priests; but it can be administered by a single one.

The services connected with the celebration of the Easter festival, and with the burial of the dead, are quite interesting and peculiar.

Peter the Great was the first to establish schools in the capitals of the eparchies, where boys, and especially the sons of priests, could be educated for the priesthood. These schools for more than a century have been supported and controlled by the Holy Governing Synod. The country is divided into four school-districts,—Petersburg, Kiev, Moscow, and Kazan. At the head of each district is a church academy, and each academy has a faculty consisting of a rector, archimandrite (abbot), one hieromonach (monk-priest), two secular priests, and several professors. The metropolitan superintends all, acting under the decrees of the synod. The Petersburg academy is the centre of all, since the decrees of the synod pass through it to all the other academies. Under these chief academies are the eparchial seminaries, with many circuit and parish schools. Pupils first enter the parish school, and remain there two years; then they attend the circuit school, the eparchial seminary, and the academy, remaining at each about three or four years.

The Russian Church derives her theology from the Sacred Scriptures (the reading of which is allowed to the laity), the writings of the Church Fathers before the division between east and west, and of the Oriental Fathers subsequent to that, of which the greatest is St. Cyril of Alexandria.

The most celebrated theologians of the Russian Church proper are Peter Mogila, who published the Orthodox Confession in 1643; Adam Zoernikav, who published an important treatise, On the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father only, in 1682; Theophanes Procopovich in 1715, who draws largely from Zoernikav; Demetrius of Rostoff (1709), and Stephen Javorsky (about the same date), both of whom are somewhat inclined to Roman-Catholic views; and Tichon of Zadonsk, who is not unfavorable to Protestantism.

The historical and doctrinal works of Mouravieff, the metropolitanans Platon and Philaret, the Abbe Guettée, and the arch-priest Basaroff, are also worthy of an attentive perusal.

NICHOLAS BJERRING.
RUSSIAN SECTS.

The Raskolniks are divided into two classes; namely, Popovtzi, or those who have priests (popes), and Bezpopovtzi (without popes), who have no regular and constant priests. Popovtzi as yet hold those views characteristic of the Old Belief. However, a large number of them have realized that there is no dogmatic difference between them and the New Believers: therefore they treat both the State and the Church of Russia in a friendly spirit. These are known under the name of Edinoverzhi (those of one belief). However, in their religious meetings they appoint some one from among themselves, one more learned in Holy Scriptures, to act as a spiritual teacher; but such a person has no special authority, and does not need to be ordained. They believe that we are living in the reign of Antichrist: but they explain that under “Antichrist” must be understood the impious spirit of our time; under “wife,” the present society; and under “birth,” digression from the Christian truth. They do not believe that the authorities of to-day are the Antichrist’s servants, and therefore they consider it a great sin to pray for them. They affirm that the churches are unnecessary to Christians; for St. Paul said, “Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?” (1 Cor. iii. 10.) They have abolished almost the entire ritual of the Greek-Eastern Church, partly by command of the Bible (as they understand it), and partly in accordance with their own idea of the Antichrist’s reign.

Among the Bezpopovtzi, there are sects holding very radical views. Thus some (E. Blokhin) do not recognize the authority of the Bible, but yet believe they are guided simply by “inspiration from above”: they do not adore the holy images, nor keep any religious meetings. Others (M. Herasimoff) say that they do not believe in that Bible which is printed with ink, but in that one which is laid down in their heart and conscience. Among the Bezpopovtzi the following sects are particularly known:

The Philippines (the proselytes of Philipp Putostaviat) observe only two sacraments, — baptism and the Lord’s Supper: they refuse to take the oath of allegiance to the Czar, do not pray for the Czar, and decline to enter the military service.

The Nemoliaki (“those not praying”) are an extreme type of the Bezpopovtzi. Their creed is reduced to these three points,—the study of the New Testament, spiritual prayer, and a pure life. Cossak Zimin was the founder of this sect. He taught that there are “four ages.” From the creation of the world to Moses was spring, or the age of ancestors; from Moses to Christ’s birth was summer, or the age of fathers; from Christ’s birth to 1666 (when a council of Russian bishops anathematized the Raskolniks) was autumn, or the age of sons; from 1666 down to our time is winter, or the age of the Holy Ghost. “No external rites are needed in our time,” they say.

The Vozdykhantzi (“the Sighers”) hold that, in the time of the Old Testament, there was the reign of God the Father; in that of the New Testament, the reign of God the Son; with the completion of the seventh thousandth year from the creation of the world began the reign of the Holy Ghost. Now the true believers must serve the Holy Ghost by spiritual prayers and by sighing.

Both the Nemoliaki and the Vozdykhantzi adopt their Bible to their views by explaining it allegorically. Some of them go so far as to affirm that there is no need even of spiritual prayer, for “God knows what we need without our prayers.” Evidently these come to pure deism.

The Stranniki (“the Travellers”) or Begoo-ni (“the Runners”) do not stay in one place more than a few days. They do not reverse the cross, but call it simply a piece of wood. They affirm that all God’s promises concerning the church are already fulfilled; that now we are living in “the future age” and in the “new heaven;” that the resurrection of the dead has already taken place, or rather that it takes place each time that one leaves the sinful life, and begins to walk in the ways of truth and piety.

There are many Bezpopovtzi who object to being called the “Old Believers.” Only Hebrews are old believers,” they say; “and we are the Spiritual christians.” To this group belong the Dookhobori, the Molokaneh, the Obschie, the Stundists, the Khili, and the Skoptsi.

The Dookhobori are those denying the existence of spirit, or rather spiritual beings and spiritual life. They hold that there is no personal God, that he is inseparable from the society of pious men. “God is the good man.” Therefore they do not believe in a life after death; therefore they deny the existence both of paradise and hell. They do not recognize the authority of the Bible, but believe they are guided by a “living book,” which is traditions of their own. However, those traditions are nothing else but different Bible-passages which sustain their own views. They consider Christ to be only equal to any good man of our day. They often quote, and explain in their own way, this verse: “God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and truth” (John iv. 24). “Spirit is in us,” they say; “therefore we are gods, and therefore we have to adore living good men.”
RUSSIAN SECTS.

They reverently bow before each other, be it man, woman, or child. They discard all the rites of the Greek Church. They deny the authority of the Czar on the ground that, being God's people, they do not belong to this world, and therefore they are not subject to the rule of worldly authorities. They oppose war, evade military service, and do not pray for the Czar.

The Molokaneh ("Milk-eaters") call themselves "the truly spiritual Christians." They believe only in the New Testament, but explain it in their own way. They affirm that baptism with water is invalid; purification from sins by pure life and good deeds, is a true baptism. They object to all external rites, crossing, prayers, temples, etc. They consider themselves free from all state laws, on the ground, that, "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (2 Cor. iii.17).

The sect of Stundists is of recent origin: it became known only in 1860. The Stundists strive to get rid of the authority both of the State and the Church. They hold that everybody is free to understand the Bible in his or her way. So far they have come to these conclusions,—the priestly hierarchy is invalid; there is no sense in adoration of the cross and holy images; of the seven sacraments, only baptism and communion are to be retained.

Of all the sects of the Raskolniks, only Khlisti and Skoptzi are despised by Russian people at large. The Khlisti ("Self-lashers"), though they do not recognize the church-rites, practise many rites of their own kind. They are ascetics, and the married life is regarded by them as the greatest sin. They wage a constant war against human nature; and for that reason they continually lash themselves, both in private and in religious meetings. They believe that among them sometimes appears the Lord Sabaoth in the person of one of their brothers, and that Christ and the Virgin have appeared among them many times. They blindly obey their prophets and prophetesses, who are guided by their own inspiration. For whole nights they believe they see Christ or the Holy Ghost. The Skoptzi ("Self-mutilators") are an extreme branch of the Khlisti. They act literally according to the words, "If thy right hand causeth thee to stumble," etc. (Matt. v. 30).

The number of the Raskolniks is constantly increasing in spite of all efforts both of the State and the Church to thwart their propaganda. There are about fifteen millions of them all told, or over six per cent of the whole population of Russia. The Bezpopovtzi count nine millions; the Popovtzi, three millions; the Spiritual Christians, two millions; the Khlisti and the Skoptzi, sixty-five thousand; the rest belong to undetermined sects. The Bezpopovtzi increase on account of the Popovtzi, and the Spiritual Christians embrace the most advanced of the Bezpopovtzi.

The Raskolniks in general have been always regarded by the State and the Church authorities as a dangerous element, and were treated with utmost severity. The death-penalty, mutilations, tortures, chains, exile to Siberia, and other punishments, have been freely resorted to against them. In the last twenty years the Raskolniks used to hide themselves in the forests of Siberia; and on being discovered by the officials, they often preferred to burn themselves alive rather than to submit to various penalties at the hands of the Antichrist, as they styled the Czar. According to the Russian law now in force, the Popovtzi are tolerated, and the Bezpopovtzi are deprived of many civil rights; the Khlisti and the Skoptzi are treated as criminals; they are transported either to Siberia or to the Caucasus. Propagation of the views of the Raskolniks is punished by imprisonment for from one to six years (Art. 207, vol. xiv.). The Dookhoborzi, Molokaneh, Khlisti, Skoptzi, and others who do not pray for the Czar, are regarded as very dangerous (Art. 82); and even in Siberia and the Caucasus they are forbidden to live among Orthodox people.

The sect of the Bezpopovtzi, who are the Raskolniks, are granted some civil rights and a certain freedom of religious service. The minister of the interior is empowered, in agreement with the Chief Procurator of the Holy Synod, to give permission to the Raskolniks to open, or to repair, or to renew, or even to build, new chapels or houses of prayer. In giving his permission, the minister shall be guided by local circumstances, and particularly by the character of the different sects. The Raskolniks are allowed to perform the religious service according to their own rites in their chapels, and also in private houses. It is forbidden to open their convents, and all religious processions in public are also forbidden. The chapels of the Raskolniks must not have the shape of the Orthodox churches, and must not have bells or icons. The propagation of the Raskolnik teaching among the Orthodox is strictly forbidden. The Raskolnik religious teachers have no special rights which are granted to the Orthodox clergymen.

The literature on the Raskolniks is very voluminous. The best works on the subject are as follows: Schapoff: Russian Raskol of the Old Belief; Kostomaroff: series of the articles in The Vestnik for whole nine months. For before they lash themselves, and turn around a sacred basin of water, and in their state of excitement they believe they see Christ or the Holy Ghost. The Skoptzi ("Self-mutilators") are an extreme branch of the Khlisti. They act literally according to the words, "If thy right hand causeth thee to stumble," etc. (Matt. v. 30).

According to the Russian law now in force, the Popovtzi are tolerated, and the Bezpopovtzi are deprived of many civil rights; the Khlisti and the Skoptzi are treated as criminals; they are transported either to Siberia or to the Caucasus. Propagation of the views of the Raskolniks is punished by imprisonment for from one to six years (Art. 207, vol. xiv.). The Dookhoborzi, Molokaneh, Khlisti, Skoptzi, and others who do not pray for the Czar, are regarded as very dangerous (Art. 82); and even in Siberia and the Caucasus they are forbidden to live among Orthodox people.

The sect of the Bezpopovtzi, who are the Raskolniks, are granted some civil rights and a certain freedom of religious service. The minister of the interior is empowered, in agreement with the Chief Procurator of the Holy Synod, to give permission to the Raskolniks to open, or to repair, or to renew, or even to build, new chapels or houses of prayer. In giving his permission, the minister shall be guided by local circumstances, and particularly by the character of the different sects. The Raskolniks are allowed to perform the religious service according to their own rites in their chapels, and also in private houses. It is forbidden to open their convents, and all religious processions in public are also forbidden. The chapels of the Raskolniks must not have the shape of the Orthodox churches, and must not have bells or icons. The propagation of the Raskolnik teaching among the Orthodox is strictly forbidden. The Raskolnik religious teachers have no special rights which are granted to the Orthodox clergymen.

The literature on the Raskolniks is very voluminous. The best works on the subject are as follows: Schapoff: Russian Raskol of the Old Belief; Kostomaroff: series of the articles in The Vestnik for whole nine months. For before they lash themselves, and turn around a sacred basin of water, and in their state of excitement they believe they see Christ or the Holy Ghost. The Skoptzi ("Self-mutilators") are an extreme branch of the Khlisti. They act literally according to the words, "If thy right hand causeth thee to stumble," etc. (Matt. v. 30).

The number of the Raskolniks is constantly increasing in spite of all efforts both of the State and the Church to thwart their propaganda. There are about fifteen millions of them all told, or over six per cent of the whole population of Russia. The Bezpopovtzi count nine millions; the Popovtzi, three millions; the Spiritual Christians, two millions; the Khlisti and the Skoptzi, sixty-five thousand; the rest belong to undetermined sects. The Bezpopovtzi increase on account of the Popovtzi, and the Spiritual Christians embrace the most advanced of the Bezpopovtzi.

The Raskolniks in general have been always regarded by the State and the Church authorities as a dangerous element, and were treated with

RUTH. This book relates an episode among the Israelites in the days of the Judges.—the story of the marriage of Ruth the Moabitese to her kinsman, Boaz, and how another heathen ancestor was introduced into the pedigree of David and of Jesus Christ. The grace and beauty of the story are universally praised. By it we get a glimpse into the domestic life of the period. The very simplicity of the book, which constitutes its charm, is also the best proof of its truthfulness. What forger would invent such a tale, in which, to the royal house of David, a foreign and idolatrous ancestor was attributed? Numerous attempts have been made to rob the book of its historical character. It has been considered as written in advocacy of Levirate marriage, so that the shift between Israel and the Gentiles might be bridged (Bertholdi and Benary): but Boaz was not Mahlon’s brother, but only his kinsman; hence his action was purely voluntary. Reuss considers it as invented by a North-Palestinian, after the fall of Eiphraim under Assyrus, as a political romance, prophesying the re-union of Ephraim to Judah, because Naomi, the Ephraimite, recognized the child of Ruth, the progenitor of Judah’s royal line, as her heir. But there is really no reason for considering it as other than an old, true, but long-time unwritten, traditional history of the Davidic family. At what time in the Judges period the incidents occurred cannot be definitely determined, but at least a hundred years before David (Ruth iv. 18). The book itself, as its Aramaisms and late grammatical forms show, was written many years afterwards, probably not until after the exile. The late date is therefore the reason why the book appears in the Jewish Hagiographa. It is true the LXX. put it with Judges; and Josephus testifies to the Jewish custom of considering it the third book of the Old Testament (Contra Apion, i. 8). But the supposition that Ruth was originally a part of Judges, and, as some say, constituted its third appendix (Bertheau, Auberlen), lacks evidence, and is rendered improbable by the independence of the story. It is complete in itself.

Rutherfurd, Samuel, a distinguished Scotch divine and Covenanter; was b. about 1600, at Nisbet, Roxburghshire; d. at St. Andrews, March 20, 1661. In 1617 we find him studying at Edinburgh, where he received the degree of M.A. in 1621, and was soon after appointed to the professorship of humanity. He demitted this office in 1625, and after studying theology was settled at Anworth in 1627. He was regarded as an able and impressive preacher. In 1634 he attended the death-bed of Lord Kenmure, and gave an account of the death-bed scene, fifteen years later, in the work, The Last Heavenly Speeches and Glorious Departure of John, Viscount Kenmure. In 1638 he issued Exercitationes de Gratia, a work in defence of the doctrines of grace against the Armenians. It established his reputation on the Continent, and brought him a call to the chair of theology at Utrecht, and one to Hardewyck. On July 27, 1636, he was cited before the High Commission Court to answer for his nonconformity to the Acta of Episcopacy, and his work against the Armenians. Deprived of his living at Anworth, he was banished to Aberdeen. When the Covenant was again triumphant, in 1639, he returned to Anworth, and in 1639 was made professor at St. Andrews. In 1643 he was chosen one of the Scotch commissioners to the Westminster Assembly; and during his four years of service in that capacity wrote The Due Right of Presbytery, Lex Rex, and The Trial and Triumph of Ruth. The Lex Rex was burned under the author’s windows at St. Andrews in 1680. He was soon after deprived of his offices, and cited to appear before the next Parliament on the charge of high treason, but death prevented him from going. He replied to the citation, referring to his condition, “I am summoned before a higher Judge and judicatory: that first summons I behave to answer; and ere a few days arrive, I shall be in that place where few kings and great folks come.” Among his other works are Covenant of Life (1655), Civil Policy (1657), Life of Grace (1659). Stanley calls him “the true saint of the covenant.” Rutherfurd’s letters are particularly interesting and edifying. See A. A. Bonar: Letters of Rev. Samuel Rutherford, with a Sketch of his Life, Y., 1884, new edition carefully revised, Lond., 1881; Mansu Crumbs... being Excerpts from the Letters of Samuel Rutherford, gathered by Rev. W. P. RUYSBROECK, doctor ecstasis, the most prominent of the Dutch mystics; b. in the village of Ruysbroeck, between Brussels and Hall, in 1293; was educated in Brussels, but never learned so much Latin that he could write it, though he seems to have been acquainted with the writings of the Areopagite, as also with the earlier German mystics. He was for a long time vicar of the Church of St. Gudula in Brussels, but retired in 1328 to the Augustine monastery Gröndal, in the forest of Soigny, near Brussels, and died there in 1381. His four principal works are Die Zierde der geistlichen Hochzeit, Der Spiegel der Seligkeit, Von dem funkelnden Stein, and Samuel: his other writings are only more or less interesting repetitions of these themes in Dutch, but soon translated into Latin (Riusbrocki Opera, Cologne, 1552 and oftener), German (by G. Arnold, Offenbach, 1701), and French. There is a collected edition of Ruysbroeck’s works, Ghent, 1687-99, 5 vols.; and one of the above-mentioned four books, Hanover, 1848. In opposition to Hugo of St. Victor, who held in agreement with the German mystics, the mystical speculation of Ruysbroeck describes a movement from God to man, and then back to God, not always clearing the banks of pantheism. The details are often very acute, subtle, and charming by their beauty and freshness, but often also very obscure and overloaded. Ullmann: [Reformers before the Reformation]; Böhringer: Die deutschen Mystiker, pp. 462 sqq.

RYERSON, Adolphus Egerton, D.D., LL.D., Methodist; b. in Charlotteville, Norfolk County, Canada, March 24, 1808; d. in Toronto, Feb. 19, 1882. His father was a native of New Jersey. His parents were in easy circumstances, yet Egerton spent his early years in healthful labor on the farm. He was endowed with a healthy, vigorous constitution, and great intellectual power. His thirst for knowledge was most intense, and his reading was extensive and varied. In early life he connected himself with the Methodist Church; and on Easter Sunday, 1826, he began his work as a preacher in that body. He soon became famous as one of the most eloquent, effective, and promising preachers in the connection. He early began to write for the periodicals of the day; and some of his articles having attracted attention, and provoked discussion, he was chosen editor of the Christian Guardian by the Conference in 1829,— an office which he filled with eminent ability and fearlessness during a period of great interest in Canadian history. In 1833 he was sent by the Conference as a delegate to the Wesleyan body in England, where his rare gifts and persuasive eloquence were at once recognized. He was repeatedly intrusted with similar missions; and so ably and skilfully did he conduct the matters committed to him, that he secured the confidence and approval of the leading men on both sides of the Atlantic. In 1841 he was elected the first president of Victoria University; where for three years, both as principal and professor, he won the confidence and affection of the students, and did much to establish the rising institution. In 1844 he was appointed by the governor-general, Sir Charles Metcalfe, chief superintendent of education for Upper Canada. Into this new arena he entered with a resolute determination to succeed; and he spared no pains, effort, or sacrifice to fit himself thoroughly for the onerous duties to which he had been appointed.

He steadfastly prosecuted his work with a firm, inflexible will, unrelaxing tenacity of purpose, an amazing fertility of expedient, an exhaustless amount of information, a most wonderful skill in adaptation, a matchless ability in unfolding and vindicating his plans, a rare adroitness in meeting and removing difficulties, great moderation in success, and indomitable perseverance under discouragement, calm patience when misapprehended, unflinching courage when opposed, until he achieved the consummation of his wishes,— the establishment of a system of education second to none in its efficiency, and adaptation to the circumstances of the people. He proved to be just the man for the place, and the work he accomplished is his enduring monument.

He was frequently elected secretary of the conference, and in 1874 was its president. His brethren conferred on him every honor at their disposal. In 1841 he received the degree of D.D., and in 1861 that of LL.D. He wrote extensively on all subjects connected with public affairs, specially on questions relating to civil and religious liberty and education. He was an able, vigorous, and successful controversialist. He issued numerous pamphlets, wrote many elaborate reports, and published several works,— a treatise on moral science, Epochs of Canadian Methodism, 1882; in 1880 The History of the United Empire Loyalists, in two large volumes. RYLAND, John, D.D., a distinguished Baptist minister; was b. at Warwick, Jan. 29, 1753; d. at Bristol, May 25, 1825; pastor at Northampton, 1781; pastor at Bristol, and president of the Baptist college there, from 1794 to his death. He published some sermons, and one or two other books. His Hymns and Verses, numbering nearly a hundred, were collected by D. Sedgwick, 1862. Some of them have been extensively used, and at least two retain a place in most of the collections. A Memoir by Dr. Hobly is prefixed to Sedgwick’s edition. F. M. BIRD.
SABA'OTH [rritOX,oapaud, "hosts:" the translation of God as "Jehovah Sabaoth" is not found in all the Old Testament. It is lacking in the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges; is used first in First and Second Samuel (1 Sam. i. 8, 11; iv. 4, xv. 2, xxviii. 45; 2 Sam. v. 10, vi. 2, 18, vii. 8, 26, 27), then in Kings, but very seldom, and only by Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings xviii. 15, xix. 10, 14; 2 Kings iii. 14). In the prophetical books of Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, it frequently occurs; represents the others seldom, and in Ezekiel and Daniel not at all. It is missing in Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, generally in the Psalms, entirely in the post-exilian books, except in 1 Chronicles, in direct relation to David (xi. 9, xvii. 7, 24). The original meaning of the appellation "Jehovah Sabaoth" does not imply, as many maintain, that Jehovah was a god of war; for it is precisely in that period when he was fighting in a wondrous way for his people that the appellation is unknown. In 1 Sam. xvii. 45 its juxtaposition with "God of the armies of Israel" shows that it did not mean the same as the latter. So also Ps. xxiv. 8 (cf. with 10) proves that "the Lord mighty in battle" was a different and lower conception to "the Lord of hosts." Nor are the "hosts" to be understood of the creation generally. The appellation comes from the "heavenly hosts," including both the stars and the angels, and calls attention to the position of Jehovah above both classes: hence the folly of star-worship, so common in the countries surrounding Israel. The stars are mere lights (Gen. i. 14), created for a definite purpose (Ps. civ. 19), although in their way eloquent of Jehovah's praise (Ps. viii. 5, xix. 1). Above them far is Jehovah, who made them, and rules them. Similar is the case respecting angels. They constitute the upper congregation of worshippers (Ps. cxlviii. 2, cl. 1), who praise God for his wonders of providence and grace (Ps. xxxix. 9, lxxxix. 6 sqq.). They also are the messengers of God and the witnesses of his mighty acts. When God is styled "Jehovah Sabaoth," his superiority to angels is set forth: hence the epithet rebukes star-worship, and other forms of idolatry; represents him as the absolute ruler of the world, and at the same time as ready to put down every opposition to the people of his choice.

SABAS, St., b. at Mutalasca, or Mutala, a village in Cappadocia, 439; d. near Jerusalem, about 581. When he was only eight years old, he gave up all his wealth, and retired into a monastery, whence he ten years afterwards went to Palestine, and settled as a hermit, and pupil of Euthymius, in the desert near Jerusalem. As his fame for sanctity increased, many Christians joined him, and a laura was formed under the rule of St. Basil. In 484 Bishop Sallustius of Jerusalem ordained him a priest, and made him abbot of an order of monks he had founded, and which was called, after him, the Sabaits. He introduced a very severe discipline, was a zealous defender of the synod of Chalcedon, founded several monasteries, and enjoyed the confidence and
The people by observing experienced the commandment concerning the seventh day, which God rested from all his work. Moses introduced the sabbath first in connection with the manna (Exod. xvi.5,22-30), in such a manner as indicated that the sabbath was as yet unknown to the people which he had sanctified unto himself, and which acknowledged the Creator and his dominion. The people, by observing the sabbath, having experienced its blessing, received then the commandment concerning that day on Sinai. The expression in Exod. xx. 8, "Remember the sabbath day," is not intended to remind of the sabbath as an ancient institution, but it rather means that the people should always remember the now existing order of the sabbath. Therefore, also, the work of men is not to be of a negative nature, but it was to finish itself in a blessed observance of the sabbath, had been pronounced upon the earth, and man had been destined by his Creator for his food, the desire after the rest of God becomes a craving after redemption (Gen. v. 29). Israel, also, whilst in Egyptian bondage without any refreshing interruption, has to sigh for relief. When God, at the deliverance from bondage, gave him the seasons of rest returning regularly, this order became a thankful feast in commemoration of the deliverance which he had experienced. Therefore it is read (Deut. v. 15), "And remember the sabbath day to be a holy day."

The sabbath has only its significance as the seventh day, which is preceded by six work-days. The first part of the commandment concerning the sabbath, which is a commandment itself (Exod. xx. 9), reads, "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work: but the seventh day shalt thou rest; in it thou shalt do no work.

The sabbath is a divine gift sanctifying the people. The sabbath becomes "a corrective for the injuries inflicted on men living under the curse of sin, by the heavy and oppressing work, and at the same time distracting from God." We need not dwell here on the humane character of the Mosaic law, which in its enactments provided also for the rest of the servant and stranger as well as for the cattle (Exod. xx. 19, xxiii. 12). From what has been said, we see that the sabbath is a divine institution, a divine gift sanctifying the people (Ezek. xx. 12). The day was celebrated by rest from labor (Exod. xxxiv. 21; Num. xv. 32), and by a special burnt offering presented in the temple in addition to the usual daily offering, which was doubled on this day (Num. xxviii. 9). In the holy place of the temple the show-bread was renewed (Lev. xxiv. 8). Deliberate profanation of this day was punished with death (Exod. xxxi. 14 sq., xxxii. 2), which was inflicted by stoning (Num. xv. 32 sq.). The Israelites had to bake and cook their food for the sabbath on the preceding day (Exod. xvi. 29), to which unloadedly rest the change of labor and rest, corresponding to the rhythm of the divine life. (2) In blessed rest the divine work is finished: because the creating God rests satisfied in the contemplation of his works, his creation itself is finished. In short, "the seventh day is not the negation of hexaemeron, but the blessing and sanctification of the same." Therefore, also, the work of men is not to be of a negative nature, but it was to finish itself in a blessed harmony of existence. In the same manner, also, the whole history of men was to complete itself in an harmonious order of God, as is already guaranteed in the sabbath of the creation, and figured in the sabbath seasons. The rest of God on the seventh day of creation, which is without an evening, moves over the whole course of the world to receive it at last in itself. The whole fourth chapter in the Epistle to the Hebrews bears upon this; viz., that the rest in God is to become also a rest for men.

But we get the full object of the sabbath idea by combining it with the dominion of sin and death which have entered into the development of the human society. After the divine curse had been pronounced upon the earth, and man had been destined by his Creator for his food, the desire after the rest of God becomes a craving after redemption (Gen. v. 29). Israel, also, whilst in Egyptian bondage without any refreshing interruption, has to sigh for relief. When God, at the deliverance from bondage, gave him the seasons of rest returning regularly, this order became a thankful feast in commemoration of the deliverance which he had experienced. Therefore it is read (Deut. v. 15), "And remember the sabbath day to be a holy day."

SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY. 2089  SABBATICAL YEAR.

20. This principle prevailed afterwards (Joh., Anti. XIV. 4, 2), but not always (Joh., War. II. 19, 2). The inventive spirit of later times laid down the minutest and strictest sabbath regulations, which are contained in the Talmud, and a whole Talmud is devoted to the sabbath. That this micrology had already been developed in the time of Christ, we know from such passages as Matt. xii. 2, John v. 10 sq. In spite of these minute injunctions which were hedged about the sabbath, this day was to be regarded as a day of joy. The meals for the sabbath were prescribed, every one was to eat three meals; and the Talmud Shabbath (fol. 118, col. 1) says, "Whoever observes the three meals on the sabbath will be saved from the birth-pains of Messiah, the judgment of hell, and the war of Gog and Magog." For the strict sabbath observance of the Essenians, cf. the art. Essenians. Cf. Schoenheit: Satzungen u. SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY (Acts i. 12). From the injunction in Exod. xvi. 29 the scribes laid down the rule that an Israelite must not go two thousand yards beyond the limits of his abode. The permitted distance seems to have been grounded on the space to be kept between the ark and the people (Josh. iii. 4) in the wilderness, which tradition said was that between the ark and the tents. Whilst the rabbis on one hand regulated the walking on the sabbath days by allowing only a certain space, yet on the other hand they also contrived certain means whereby the sabbath-day's walk could be exceeded, without transgressing the law, by the so-called mixtio terminorum, or connection of distances. The first enactment (which is comprised in Exod. xxiii. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 2-5) enjoins that the soil, the vineyards and the oliveyards, are to have perfect rest: there is to be no tillage or cultivation of any sort. The second enactment (which is contained in Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 5-7) enjoins that the spontaneous growth of the fields or of trees is to be for the free use of the poor, hirelings, strangers, servants, and cattle. The third enactment (which is contained in Deut. xv. 1-3) enjoins the remission of debts in the sabbatical year. It has been questioned whether the release was perpetual or merely temporary. The houses of the Levites and of the Levitical stores were treated like landed property, and in the forty-eight cities given to them (Num. xxxv. 1-8) were exempt from this general law of age, pregnant with the true Messiah, the "Second Shiloh," whom she would bear Oct. 19, 1814. She surrounded herself with prophets, and in order to prepare the way for the new dispensation ordered the strictest observance of the Jewish law and sabbath. Joanna Southcott, who had become known as the "Sabbath," was a supposititious child was declared to be be. But the fraud was detected, and those who participated in it were led around with the picture of Southcott in the public street. Joanna died in her self-delusion, Dec. 27, 1814; but her followers, who at one time numbered a hundred thousand, continued till 1831 to observe the Jewish sabbath and the ceremonies of the law in order to receive the hoped-for Messiah in a worthy manner. Her writings number sixty separate publications, of which the best known is the Book of Wonders, London, 1813-14, 5 parts. Comp. Blunt: Dictionary of Sects, s.v. "Southcottians;" Matthias: J. SABBATICAL YEAR AND YEAR OF JUBILEE. (I.) The Sabbatical Year.—The laws respecting the sabbatical year embrace three main enactments,—rest for the soil, care for the poor and for animals, and remission of debts. The first enactment (which is comprised in Exod. xxiii. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 2-5) enjoins that the soil, the vineyards and the oliveyards, are to have perfect rest: there is to be no tillage or cultivation of any sort. The second enactment (which is contained in Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 5-7) enjoins that the spontaneous growth of the fields or of trees is to be for the free use of the poor, hirelings, strangers, servants, and cattle. The third enactment (which is contained in Deut. xv. 1-3) enjoins the remission of debts in the sabbatical year. It has been questioned whether the release was final, or merely lasted through the year. The former is in general the Jewish view (cf. Mishnah Shabbith, x. 1), and was also Luther's view. Seven such sabbatical years closed with (II.) The Year of Jubilee (Lev. xxv. 8-11), which is to follow immediately upon the sabbatical year. It was to be proclaimed by the blast of a trumpet on the tenth day of the seventh month. Like the sabbatical year, it was to be celebrated by (1) giving rest to the soil (Lev. xxv. 11, 12). While the law enjoins, that, as on the sabbatical year, the land should be fallow, and that there be no tillage nor harvest during the jubilee year, yet the Israelites were permitted to gather the spontaneous produce of the field for their immediate wants, but not to lay it up in their storehouses. Another law connected with this festival was (2) manumission of those who had become slaves (Lev. xxv. 30-54), and (3) reversion of landed property (Lev. xxv. 13-34, xxvii. 10-24). Houses which were not surrounded by walls were treated like landed property, and were subject to the law of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 31), whilst such as were built in walled cities, in case they had not been redeemed within a year after the sale, became the absolute property of the purchaser (Lev. xxv. 29, 30), and the jubilee year had no influence upon it. The houses of the Levites in the forty-eight cities given to them (Num. xxxv. 1-8) were exempt from this general law of house-property. The only exceptions to the general rule were the houses and the fields consecrated to the Lord. If these were not redeemed before the ensuing jubilees, instead of reverting to their original proprietors, they at the jubilees became forever the property of the priests (Lev. xxv. 20, 21).

As to the design of the sabbatical and jubilee year, we may say that the spirit of this law is the same as that of the weekly sabbath. Both have a beneficent tendency, limiting the rights, and checking the claims of property, the one putting God's claims on time; the other, on the land. The land shall "keep a sabbath unto the Lord" (Lev. xxv. 2). This is the main idea. Man, by withdrawing his hand from the cultivation of the soil, and putting it at the disposal of Jehovah's blessing, hereby actually acknowledges the exclusively divine right of possession. At the same time, the land pays a debt to Jehovah (cf. Lev. xxv. 23; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21), and thus returns, in a certain sense, to that condition which it had before the words of Gen. iii. 17 were pronounced: yea, more, the sabbatical year points typically to that time when the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption (Rom. viii. 21). The jubilee year, in which the sabbatical cycle completes itself, takes up in itself the idea of the redemption, and of bringing back the theocracy to the original divine possession, where all are free as servants of God, and where every one enjoys the fruits of his inalienable possession. God, who once redeemed his people from the bondage of corruption, to bring about such a year of redemption, of jubilee was proclaimed on the day of atonement (Deut. xv. 4). To bring about such a year of grace, sins had to be forgiven: therefore the year of jubilee was proclaimed on the day of atonement. As the year in which the restitution of all things will take place, the year of jubilee in the prophecy of Isa. lxi. 1-3 (fulfilled in Christ, Luke iv. 21) is taken as a type for the messianic time, when the kingdom of God have been victoriously fought, and thus returns, in the same time commenced to aspire to the episcopal dignity, and to form a party in Constantinople. Meanwhile the Novatian bishops of Constantinople, Nice, Nicomedia, etc., convened a synod at Sausarum in Bithynia, by which the difference as to the celebration of Easter was declared an adiaphoron; but Sabbatius was by oaths compelled to renounce his aspirations of episcopal consecration. He, nevertheless, continued his intrigues, and was actually consecrated by some country bishops, but was then banished to Rhodes, where he died. His bones were afterwards brought to Constantinople; and by his followers, the Sabbatians (see Novatians), he was honored as a martyr.

SABBATIUS, a converted convert, who was ordained priest and the renovating bishop of Constantinople, Marcian, but afterwards, in the last years of the fourth century, caused a schism in the Novatian sect. By the synod of Paz in Phrygia, it was decreed that Easter should be celebrated at the same time as the Jewish passover; and this decree was accepted by Sabbatius, who at the same time commenced to aspire to the episcopal dignity, and to form a party in Constantinople. Meanwhile the Novatian bishops of Constantinople, Nice, Nicomedia, etc., convened a synod at Sausarum in Bithynia, by which the difference as to the celebration of Easter was declared an adiaphoron; but Sabbatius was by oaths compelled to renounce his aspirations of episcopal consecration. He, nevertheless, continued his intrigues, and was actually consecrated by some country bishops, but was then banished to Rhodes, where he died. His bones were afterwards brought to Constantinople; and by his followers, the Sabbatians (see Novatians), he was honored as a martyr.

SABELLIUS is the most pronounced and most influential representative of the Jewish monothelism within the pale of the Christian Church.

Of the writings of Sabellius, only a few fragments have come down to us in Hippolytus (Philos., IX., 11), Epiphanius (Her., 92), and Athana-SAVIANS. [Contro Arian oratio], [collected in Routh: Reliquiae Sacrae]. Of his life also very little is known. He was a presbyter, and seems to have been a Libyan by birth, from the Pentapolis. He spent some time in Rome in the beginning of the third century. His doctrine found adherents both in Rome and in his native country, and in 260 or 261 he was excommunicated by Bishop Dionysius of Alexandria. But his influence, or rather the influence of the view he represented, reaches down to Schleiermacher [and Bushnell. See the art. Anti-Trinitarianism, and Schaff: History of the Christian Church, rev. ed. (1888), vol. ii. pp. 580 sqq.].

SAVIANS. The name occurs for the first time in the Koran (Sur. 2, 59; 5, 73; 22, 17). Its place in the enumeration—Moslems, Jews, Sabians, Christians, Magians, and Polytheists—shows that it there denotes a monothetic people: it, no doubt, refers to the Mendesians; which article see. How it afterwards came to be applied to a Christian. The caliph el-Mamfin (813-833) passed through that region on one of his expeditions against the Byzantine emperor, and all the hair and peculiar dress the people of Harran at the question was dropped. But the name was continued.

The name Sabinas, as a Pagan peoplesettled in Northern Mesopotamia, more especially in Harran, has been told us by an Arabic writer from the ninth century,—en-Nedim, a Christian. The caliph el-Mamfin (813-833) passed through that region on one of his expeditions against the Byzantine emperor, and all the peoples gathered to salute him. By their long hair and peculiar dress the people of Harran attracted his attention; and he asked them whether they were Jews, or Christians, or Magians. As they could give no satisfactory answer, he allowed them to consider the matter until his return, when they would have to conform to one of the religions recognized by the Koran. They were thrown into great consternation by this decision. Some of them adopted Islam, others Judaism, others, again, Christianity; but most of them clung to their old Paganism, concealing the fact by assuming the name of the Sabians. The caliph, however, never returned, and the question was dropped. But the name was continued.

Those Sabians of Harran were Syrians by descent: but, since the time of Alexander the Great, numerous Greek colonists had lived among them; and, through its close contact with Greek mythology and philosophy, their Syrian Paganism had gradually assumed a Greek coloring. Greek names were used in their mythology, not as representing the true Greek gods, but simply as applied to the Syrian deities; and in the same manner they had also introduced various biblical names, no doubt in order to propitiate the Mohammedans. Some of them called Hermes, others Buddha, and others again, Abraham, the founder of their religion. It was essentially a star-worship. To the sun, the moon, and the five planets—Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, and Saturn—terrific of angels, and also of human beings) were offered. To each of these heavenly bodies a peculiar metal was ascribed,—gold to the sun, silver to the moon, etc.,—and the days of the week were called after them. But, besides those angular star-temples, round-shaped temples were built for the worship of certain deities representing abstract ideas,—the first cause, necessity, the soul, etc.,—and finally, also, genius and deities were worshipped. See Cawood.
while he sustained a numerous family with the proceeds of his professional labor, he developed a literary activity which soon made him the "prince and patriarch of the master-singers." Nuremberg was at that time a free imperial city, and at the height of its prosperity. Charles V. often visited it; Luther praised it highly; among its citizens were Albrecht Dürer (1479-1528), Peter Vischer (d. 1530), Andreas Osiander (1522-49), Peter Henlein (d. 1540), Lazarus Spengler (d. 1594), and others. Among these men, known all over Germany, some of them all over the world, Hans Sachs took rank. He became the representative poet of his age, and by the outspoken tendency of his poetry he occupied a place in the history of the German Reformation. It was the first rule of the Nuremberger master-singers, that nothing should be written against Luther's Bible; and, when the competing poems were tested, one of the judges had the office of comparing their ideas and their language with that book.

Hans Sachs was an exceedingly prolific author, and in this respect surpassed only by the Spanish poet, Lope de Vega. His works consist of thirty-four large volumes in folio, written with his own hand and containing 6,636 pieces, of which several hundreds are dramas, the rest epics and lyrics. The poetical tone of these pieces is very various, — tragical and comical, humorous and sentimental, sarcastic and enthusiastic; but the esthetic character is always the same, always didactic: the ideal contents is some moral proposition, and the tendency of this proposition points directly towards the Reformation. Among his poems, which generally were printed on fly-leaves, and in that form scattered throughout all Germany, some of the most celebrated are his transcriptions of Luther's translation of the Psalms; Die Wittenbergische Nachtwacht, in seven hundred verses, and giving an explanation of the difference between "divine truth and human lies;" Eyn wunderliche weyssagung, in thirty strophes, and with a preface by Ossiander, giving thirty pictures of the Pope in glory and in distress. It was forbidden, and the poet was rebuked by the magistrates; but immediately after, appeared Inhal zwoierlei Predigt: Hoc dicit Dominus Deus — Sic dicit papa, etc. His dramas comprise tragedies, comedies, farces, fables, and dialogues (Scheidtsche and Fassnachtsspiele) and were represented by himself and his brother-mechanics in the guild-hall or in private residences on festal occasions.

Among his tragedies is one on the expulsion of Adam and Eve from paradise, in three acts and with eleven dramatis personæ, 1553; another, on the last judgment, in seven acts and with thirty-four dramatis personæ, 1553, etc. Of his comedies, the most celebrated is Die ungleichen Kinder Eve, which recast three times. The idea he took from Philip Melancthon, who took hers two sons on his knees, and examines them in Luther's Catechism. Abel answers every question correctly, Cain always goes wrong. (See Corpus Reform., iii. 655; and K. Hase: Das geistliche Schauspiel, Leipzig, 1838, pp. 217-239.) Also his Hecules is interesting in various respects. (See K. Goedecke: Every-man, Homulus und Heaxis, Hanover, 1863.) His dramas are often dialogues between virtues and vices; and in several he relates Scheidtsche and Fassnachtsspiele, — such as The devil marrying an old woman, The pious nobility which alone has the right of robbery, The man who hears his wife confessing, etc., — although they certainly have not only the intention, but also the power, of "dispelling melancholy," are, nevertheless, constructed on a strictly moral plan and for a decidedly moral purpose.

King Louis I. of Bavaria put a bust of Sachs in the Ruhmeshalle at Munich; Kaubach put him in the foreground of his great picture, The Reformation; and in 1874 a bronze statue of the famous shoemaker was erected in the Spitalplatz at Nuremberg. [The earliest collective edition of his works appeared in Augsburg, 1570-79, 5 vols. folio, reprinted at Kempen, 1812-17, 4to; selections from his poems for vols. iv., v., vi., of Goedecke and Tittmann's Deutsche Dichter des 16. Jahrhunderts, Leipzig, 1870-72, 3 vols., new ed., 1874. A new edition of his poems by Adalbert v. Keller is in the Bibliothek des literarischen Vereins zu Stuttgart, 1870 sq. (13th vol., 1883). His Fassnachtsspiele have been edited by E. Goetze for the series Neudrucke deutscher Literaturwerke d. XVI. u. XVII. Jahrh., Halle, Nos. 26, 27 (1880), 38, 39 (1881), 80, 81 (1882), and in the same series, for the first time, Die drei Koenigsteuerfied (a tragedy in seven acts), No. 29 (1880). The majority of his works have not yet been printed.] The most comprehensive biography of Sachs is by Salomon Ranisch, Altenburg, 1765; there is another by J. L. Hoffmann, Nuremberg, 1847. [See F. Schultheiss: Hans Sachs in seinem Verhältnisse zu Reformation, Leipzig, 1879, 46 pp.] SACK, August Friedrich Wilhelm, b. Feb. 4, 1708, at Harzgerode, in the principality of Anhalt-Bernburg; and d. in Berlin, April 28, 1786; was educated at Bernburg; studied theology at the university of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder; visited, as tutor to a young nobleman, the universities of Leyden and Groeningen; spent three years (1728-31) at Homburg as tutor to the young prince of Hesse-Homburg; and in 1731 was called a third preacher to the General Reformed congregation in Magdeburg. In 1740 he was made court-preacher in Berlin; and in this position he opposed with great energy, but also with perfect tact, the French scepticism and English deism which through many channels found their way to the court of Friedrich II. In 1745 he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin, and in 1750 he was made a member of the consistory. In 1748 he published his chief work, Vertheidigte Glauben der Christen, of which a second edition appeared in 1778; and from 1736 to 1764 he published six volumes of sermons, several of which were translated into Dutch, French, and English. His biography (Berlin, 1789, 2 vols.) was written by his son, Friedrich Samuel Gottfried Sack (b. in Magdeburg, Sept. 4, 1758; d. in Berlin, Oct. 2, 1817), who himself was a court-preacher and in the consistory, with the title of bishop.

SACK, Karl Heinrich, b. in Berlin, Oct. 17, 1790; d. at Poppelsdorf, Oct. 16, 1875. He was docent in the university of Berlin (1817), extraordinary professor in Bonn (1818), and ordinary professor (1832). In 1847 he was called to Magdeburg as Consistorialrat, and later made Oberconsistorialrat. He was a representative of the so-called "right" of the Schleiermacher school.
SACK, Brethren of the (Saccati, Saccacor, or Saccopapi), often, like the monks of Grammont, the Minims, the Cathari, and Waldenses, styled boni homines, formed an ecclesiastical order somewhat similar to that of the Augustines. It was founded in France about 1200, and confirmed by the Pope in 1219. It received its name from the sack which its members used as a garment, and spread rapidly, not only in France, but also in England. In 1275, however, it was dissolved by the Council of Leyden; and in 1293 the remaining members were incorporated with other orders. In his Enthurfe einer vollständigen Historie der Kirchen, i. p. 457, Walch places the Brethren of the Sack among the Encratites. They abstained from flesh and wine, held no property, went about barelegged with wooden sandals on their feet, etc.; but it was, no doubt, heretical views which caused the early dissolution of the order. Besides these fraters sacchi, there was also an order of sack-clad nuns, founded in 1291 by King Louis IX. of France, on the suggestion of his mother, Blanche. They called themselves “Penitent Daughters of Jesus,” or, with reference to their garment, Saccharis, and lived in nunneries near St. Andrew’s in Paris. But also this order was soon abolished, even while its founder was still living; though there was in London, as late as 1307, a nunnery whose inmates wore sacks of hemp, and walked barefooted.

SACRAMENT (from sacramentum, which in classical usage means an oath, especially a military oath, and also a gauge in money laid down in court by two contending parties) is not, strictly speaking, a scriptural term, but occurs repeatedly in the Latin Vulgate as a translation of the Greek word σαρκαμένον (sakramenon), used by the evangelists in the Acts (chap. xi. 19, 20) and in revelation (vii. 17). It was first loosely employed for all sacred oaths and ceremonies, like the Greek σωρρυπνον, and then more particularly for baptism and the sacrifice, and a few other solemn rites connected with Christian worship. In the Greek Church they are called “mysteries.” St. Augustine defines sacrament in the narrower sense to be the visible sign of an invisible grace (signum visibile atque invisibile). To this was afterward added the testimony of the Church as a third mark, that it must be instituted not only by the church, but by Christ himself, and enjoined upon his followers in the New Testament. Sacraments are also called signs, seals, and means of grace and of public profession. The Reformed churches emphasize the sealing character of these ordinances; the Roman Catholic Church makes them the channels of all grace. The number of the sacraments is by Protestants confined to two, viz. baptism and the Lord’s supper (corresponding to circumcision and the passover in the Old Testament); because these alone are instituted by Christ, and commanded to be observed to the end of time. The Roman Catholic and the Greek churches add to them five others, viz., confirmation, penance, extreme unction, ordination, and matrimony. The number was so fixed by the schoolmen of the middle ages, who defended it by various illustrations, that it has been a point of dispute whether certain ceremonies taken from the sacredness of seven,—the seven days of creation, the seven parts of the human body, the seven liberal arts, etc.—should be considered as sacraments. The Council of Trent anathematizes those who teach that there are more or less than seven sacraments (esse pluraa vel pauciora quam septem sacramenta).

As to the efficacy of the sacraments, the confessions of the Reformed churches require faith as a subjective condition; while the Roman-Catholic Church teaches that the sacraments work ex opere operato, i.e., by the inherent power of the institution, or by the performance of the act, independently of the moral character of the priest and the state of the recipient. Two of the sacraments, baptism and ordination, are supposed to confer an indelible character, and cannot be repeated: once baptized, always baptized; once a priest, always a priest. This does not exclude, however, the danger of losing the benefit, and consequent excommunication and deposition.

There has been much controversy about the sacraments (especially the Lord’s Supper, which is sometimes emphatically called the sacrament) between Protestants and Roman Catholics, and also between Luther, Zwingli, and their followers. Calvin occupied a mediate position between the two on the sacramental question, and his views passed into the Reformed Confessions. The Quakers reject the sacraments as external ceremonies, and hold only to internal baptism or regeneration by the Spirit, and internal communion with Christ. See Stritz, in Herzog xiii. 264–296, and arts. on the several sacraments, especially Baptism and Lord’s Supper.

SACRED HEART, Society of the. See Jesus, Society of the Sacred Heart of.

SACRIFICATI, in ecclesiastical antiquities, denote a subdivision of lapsi; those, namely, who sacrificed to the Pagan gods in order to escape persecution. In the time of Trajan the mere profession of Christianity was considered a crime against the State; but those Christians were forgiven who declared themselves willing to recant, and offer up incense before the statues of the em-per or the gods (sacrificati et thurificati). Many Christians who shrank from actually sacrificing escaped, through the avarice of the Roman officials, by buying certificates that they had complied with the law (idoli facere). But even this was severely rebuked by the Church; and, at least as long as the persecutions lasted and the Church had to guard against apostasy, rigid measures were enforced against the sacrificati. See LAMPI.

SACRIFICES. See Offerings.

SACRILEGE (sacri legium) corresponds to blasphemy, as acts to words, and denotes a crime against God. Canon law, or, more especially, the Roman casuists, distinguish between sacri legium immediatum (a crime committed against that which by itself is holy, such as unworthy participation in the Lord's Supper, robbery of a monstrance containing the consecrated wafer, etc.), and sacri legium mediatum (a crime committed against that which is sacred because it is devoted to God, such as church-robery, molesting or hindering a clergyman in the performance of his office, etc.). Sacrilegium mediatum is further subdivided into personale, reale, and locale, but none of these distinctions have any significance in modern legislation.

Between the Mosaic law and the Roman, there is a striking difference with respect to their conceptions of sacrilege. According to the Mosaic law, sacrilege could be committed by a Jew only; and the punishment which he incurred comprised complete restitution or compensation, a fine of one-fifth of his income, and an expiatory sacrifice (Lev. v. 15, 16, xxii. 14, 16). When the crime was committed by a non-Jew, the Lord himself was expected to avenge the deed (see 1 Sam. v. 6; the Philistines having taken the ark of the Lord, and brought it to Ashdod; Jer. 1.28, li.11, and elsewhere). With the Romans the crime of sacrilege became so much the more aggravated by having been committed by a foreigner, and death was always the punishment. In the older Roman law sacri legium comprised not only the appropriation of res sacra to secular uses, but also the appropriation of objects not sacra, deposited in a sacred place, or of res non-sacra, deposed in a sacred place, and in which the ecclesiastics who are kept, and in which the ecclesiastics who are sometimes a separate building belonging to a church or convent, sometimes only an apartment in the main structure, in which the sacred vessels are kept, and in which the ecclesiastics who are always the punishment. In the older Roman law sacri legium comprised not only the appropriation of res sacra to secular uses, but also the appropriation of objects not sacra which had been deposited in the temple, or in other ways placed under the guardianship of the gods. (See CICERO, De legibus, i. 16.) Afterwards, by decrees of Severus and Antoninus, a distinction was made between the stealing of res sacra in a sacred place and the stealing either of res sacra in a profane place or of objects not sacred in a sacred place: only the first case was defined as sacrilegium; the two last, as simple theft (furtum). In the Christian Church the crime appeared very early; and complaints occur that clergy and laymen took away from the churches wax, oil etc. The decrees of the Mosaic law were applied, and excommunication was added (Can. Apost., c. 72, comp. c. 73). But the crime spread, and is much more frequently mentioned in the decrees of the synods, the writings of the Fathers, the penitentials, etc., though at the same time the penalties became heavier and heavier (REGINO: De synodalibus causis, lib. ii. c. 276 sq.). By degrees, as the Germanic element became prominent in the legislation of the nations of Central and Western Europe, the Germanic conception of sacrilege as violation of the sacredness of the church prevailed, and the Roman distinction between res sacra and non sacra was abolished (Lex Riburiae, tit. ix. cap. 8; Lex Alamannorum, tit. v., viii.; Lex Bajuvariorum, tit. i. cap. 8, 6; Capitulare Paderbrunnense, a. 756, c. 3, in PENTZ: Monument. German. i. 16t.); yet even now we can find an old law concerning the sacredness of the Pagan temples applied directly to the Christian churches. Of great interest is the legislation of Charles V. on this point (1552). Here is a return to the distinctions of the Roman law, though in such a way that the appropriation of res sacra or of res non-sacra, deposited in a sacred place, never becomes a simple theft; and this aggravation of the crime, when it becomes sacrilegious, is adopted by all modern legislations.

SACRISTY and SACRISTAN. The sacristy is sometimes a separate building belonging to a church or convent, sometimes only an apartment in the main structure, in which the sacred vessels are kept, and in which the ecclesiastics who are expected to take part in the service assemble. The person who has charge of that room or building is the sacristan.

SACY, Louis Isaac Le Maître de, b. in Paris, March 29, 1613; d. Jan. 4, 1684; studied at Beauvais together with Antoine Arnauld; was ordained priest in 1648, and became in 1650 confesssor and spiritual director of the recluses of Port-Royal. During the persecution of the Jansenists he lived concealed in the suburb of St. Antoine; but, as he continued to correspond with the nuns, his residence was discovered, and May 13, 1668, he was imprisoned in the Bastille. Oct. 31, 1668, he was released, and returned to Port-Royal: but in 1679 he was once more compelled to leave the monastery; and the last days of his life he spent in the house of his cousin, the Marquis of Pomponne. He is principally known by his translations of the Bible. In 1687 appeared his Le Nouveau Testament, traduit en Francais, generally called Nouveau Testament de Mons, though it was printed in Amsterdam by the Elzevirs. It was vehemently attacked by several bishops, condemned by Pope Clement IX. (April 20, 1668), defended by Arnauld and Nicole, and caused a controversy which lasted twenty years. La Sainte Bible, containing the Vulgate, a translation into French, and notes (Paris, 1672, 92 vols.), was soon republished, and is still widely used in France. Les Psauters de David, also with notes, appeared in 1679. See SAINTE-BEUVE: Port-Royal, vol. ii.

SADDAUCEES. All sources agree in putting Sadduceism in opposition to Pharisaism. It is not the name of a sect, but of a party which refused to adopt the exaggerations of ritualistic and ascetic formalism of Pharisaism. In a certain sense the Pharisees were the innovators. Their peculiar teachings were additions to the law, which the Sadducees regarded as sole authority; and thus only can we understand the reluctance of the latter against the traditional system, and its religious and ascetical requirements, as well as the rejection of the doctrine of the resurrection. Being forced by the natural course of things to make an opposition in the field of public and social life, the Sadducees were finally entangled in political difficulties, till they thus became the opponents of the Pharisees in matters of which they had not thought at the beginning. Less favored by the people, they easily accommodated...
See. But the moving power and vitality of it as something dangerous, because exaggerated, in something which they could utilize for their if not demagogical.

The fact, however, seems to be this: the preaching of Jesus which concerned the inner life and this we explain best by bearing in mind that, whereas the Pharisees believed in both spirits, whereas the Pharisees believed in both; the Sadducees believed neither in angels nor immortality. But this did not necessarily belong to the party, and was also not the cause why later Jews called them Epicureans: for the latter name in rabbinic writings denotes all kinds of heresy; and we can easily perceive how, with the increasing narrowness of the ecclesiastical horizon, such imputations could be made, and it is also very characteristic that Christian writers should have taken this up, and made the rabbinic-Pharisaic mode of intuition their own. To this source belongs the myth concerning the origin of the Sadducees. Of a renowned teacher of the third century before Christ, Antigonus of Socho, we are told in the Mishna (Pirke Aboth, 1, 9), that he recommended to his disciples the exercise of virtue without any view of reward. In the Gemara, and later by other authorities, we are told Antigonus had two disciples, Zadok and Baithos, who, be it advertently or inadvertently, drew the inference from their teacher's maxim that there is no reward and no future life. This is the origin of Sadduceism. Whether and how the Sadducees and Baithoseans were the same or not, no one could rightly understand any more. Yet there are still some scholars who believe in the existence of Zadok and Baithos; whereas the highest antiquity is silent concerning them, and refers the etymological explanation of the name "Sadducees" [i.e., from Heb. for "just"]. Often the Sadducees have been identified with the Karaites, but the only relation between the two consists in the rejection of the Pharisaic-rabbinic system of tradition.

He entered the Jesuit college at Landsberg, and after the dissolution of the order, in 1773, he studied theology and philosophy at the university of Ingolstadt. In 1777 he was ordained priest, and appointed repetitor publicus in theology and philosophy. In 1780 he was made professor of dogmatics, and in 1784 he moved to Dillingen as professor of pastoral theology. But on Nov. 4, 1784, he was suddenly dismissed, accused of participation in secret political intrigues, and of connection with the Illuminati; and for many years he lived in retirement in Munich or at Ebersberg, developing, however, a great literary activity. His orthodoxy had long been suspected by the Ultramontanists, but the suspicion was entirely without ground. However much he at times was harassed by doubts (see his book, Der Friede, 1821), he never swerved from that which forms the essential and vital points of the Roman-Catholic faith; and his opposition to the rationalism and indifference of the age was energetic and successful. Meanwhile his works—Briefe aus allen Jahrhunderten, Grundlichen der Religion, Glückseligkeitslehre (afterward entitled Moralphilosophie), Über Erziehung für Erzieher, Die Weisheit auf der Gasse, etc.—gathered a considerable number of followers, and employed him frequently in diplomatical negotiations with Francis I and Charles V. He was very active, and very successful as an administrator and diplomatist, but continued to cultivate his literary and philosophical tastes. His Phaenomena de philosophia appeared in 1399. The best collection of his works, including his letters and his biography by Ficobello, was published in Verona, 1737–38, 4 vols. See Francæ, in Francæ, in Francæ, in Francæ, in Francæ. SAINT-SIMON DE ROUVROY. 2097

SAINTS, Worship of the. The apostolic designation of Christians as "saints" (Rom. i.7; 1 Cor. i.2) was used down to the days of Irenaeus and Tertullian. The inclination early developed itself to apply the term in a peculiar sense to such Christians as had lived exemplary lives, and had witnessed a steadfast confession in life and death, often a martyr's death. As early as the second part of the second century, congregations were celebrating the memory of martyrs. The day of their martyrdom was called the day of their birth (nativitas nativitatis), and set apart for special services; and the place where the remains of a martyr were interred was regarded as consecrated. There the story of his sufferings and death was related once a year, and the Lord's Supper celebrated in token of the communion of saints. Eusebius (IV. 15) states that the Church of Smyrna honored the bones of Polycarp above silver and gold.

In the fourth century a yearly festival of all saints and martyrs was appointed by the Eastern Church. One of Chrysostom's homilies (De martyribus totius orbis) was delivered on this festival. The Western Church did not appoint an all saints' day till the seventh century.

The respect for the memory of the saints gradually degenerated into a worship of saints and their relics. The monkish system, which began in the third century, was the occasion of exaggerated accounts of the piety and power of men who claimed their lives in atonement of their sins. It was taught that they not only interceded for the pardon of sins, but for the relief of physical infirmities (Ambrose: De Vida dis 9). Chapels and churches were erected over their bones, and relics were carried as amulets. Their aid was sought at the inception of journeys, for ships at sea, etc. Special saints were associated with different cities, lands, and occupations. Peter and Paul are the patrons of Rome; James, of Jerusalem; Gregory of Tours, of France; Luke, of painters; John and Augustine, of theologians; Ivo, of jurists; Crispin, of shoemakers, etc.

Vigilantius of Barcelona protested vigorously in the fifth century against such worship as idolatry, but Jerome defended the practice with vigor.

The worship of saints was fixed in the Oriental...
Church by the Second Nicene Council (787), John of Damascus having before argued for the practice. The theologians of the West took up the subject, and advanced arguments in favor of the custom. Peter Lombard, Alexander of Hales, and Thomas Aquinas display much skill in this direction, but did not distinguish between the worship (adoratio) due to God, and the worship (dulia, incassatio) due to saints. Thomas demanded for Mary an honor lower than that due God, and yet higher than that due the saints (huperdulia). The increasing host of the saints was divided into six classes; and the Roman Breviary ordains that they shall be addressed ("Apostles, martyrs, etc., pray for us") at all other times than the high festivals. The art of the middle ages was likewise devoted to bring out the emblems and peculiarities of the saints. Peter was pictured with the keys, John with a lamb upon his arm, Paul with a sword, Bartholomew with a knife, etc. On account of the smuggling-in of martyrs, the Pope was called upon to declare who were saints; and in 993 John XV. canonized the first saint in the person of Bishop Urban of Augsburg.

In the eleventh century Guibert, abbott of Nogent, raised his voice against the abuses of saint-worship in his work, De pignoribus Sanctorum. Wiclif ridiculed those who sought the intercession of any other than Jesus Christ. Nicolaus of Cleemanges, in his De novis celebratibus non instituendis, advocated a return to the practice of the early ages, when the worship of the saints did not prevail to the exclusion of the worship of God. The Reformers lifted up their voices in sternest protest against the practice of the church, and the confessions deny all scriptural warrant for it. The Council of Trent (XXV.) established it, the confessions deny all scriptural warrant for it. The Council of Trent (XXV.) established it, condemning all who denied the efficacy of the intercession of the saints. Modern Roman-Catholic divines endeavor in vain to find a scriptural warrant for it in Rom. vi. 8, xii. 6; and, if they appeal to the Disciplina Arcana of the first centuries, Protestants reply by giving a different explanation of that secret discipline.

The legends of the saints form a large literature, which is full of fancies and falsehoods. Calendar and Martyrology dating back to the eighth century are in existence. The collection most highly prized in the East is that of Simon Metaphrastes of the twelfth century. The Legenda Aurea of Jacob de Voragine is highly prized in the West. The most important of the later works is the Acta Sanctorum, edited by the Bollandists, [Antwerp, 1643 sqq., Paris, 1675; Mrs. Jamieson: Sacred and Legendary Art, London, 1848, 2 vols.; Legends of the Monastic Orders, 1850; Baring-Gould: Lives of the Saints, London, 1873-77, 15 vols.]. The salt thus used was obtained principally from the valley of salt (2 Sam. viii. 13), south of the Dead Sea, where the soil is entirely covered with salt, left there every year on the recession of the waters; from Jebel Usdum, two or three miles south of the Dead Sea, substantially a similar deposit; from other salt-seas, from a mile and a half to three miles wide, and several hundred feet high, and by evaporating Dead Sea water. According to Josephus, only "Sodomish" salt could be used in the temple [cf. Carpzov: Appar., p. 718]. The reasons of this regulation were, (1) that this salt was a witness to the terrible consequences of God's wrath, and a constant exhortation to repentance, and (2) it was a product of the Holy Land itself. But since Oriental salt contains many mineral impurities, by exposure to rain or dampness it may lose its savor: hence our Lord's expression (Matt. v. 13; Mark ix. 50; Luke xiv. 34). Christians lose their savor by undue exposure to the sinfulness of this world. By "salt-pits" (Zeph. ii. 9) are meant such pits as the Arabs still dig on the shore of the Dead Sea in order that they may be filled when the spring freshets cause the sea to overflow. Then, when the water has evaporated, the sides of the pits are found to be incrusted with salt an inch thick.

SALT SEA. (Deut. iii. 17; Josh. iii. 16, xii. 3), commonly, although never in the Bible, called the Dead Sea. The Bible writers also call it the "sea of the plain" (Deut. iv. 49), the "east sea" (Joel ii. 20; Ezek. xxxviii. 18; Zeph. xiv. 8), and "vale of Siddim" (Gen. xiv. 3). The designation "Dead Sea" was given by early Greek writers: so the Arabs call it, more commonly, however, Bath Lût ("Lake of Lot"). It is sixteen miles east from Jerusalem, is forty-six miles long, and ten and a third wide at the widest part, and covers nearly three hundred square miles. In shape it is oblong; on each side are mountains. The Jordan empties into it, as also several minor streams; but the lake has no outlet: hence the water is impregnated with mineral substances, containing, on an average, twenty-five per cent of solid substances, half of which is common salt, and has extraordinary buoying qualities, and a specific gravity of from 1.021 to 1.258. From the presence of chloride of magnesium the water gets its bitter taste; from chloride of calcium, its smooth and oily touch. The lake is surrounded by "unmixed desolation." But it is not true that birds flying over it drop dead, for there are numerous varieties of birds on its shores; but no fish can live in it. The bottom of the lake is gradually sinking. See Lieut. W. archbishop, exile was made to mean confiscation of property, and renunciation of family. As such Catholicism was introduced. Only with great difficulty would he have the heretics out of the country, even though all the fields should be covered with thorns and thistles. The Jesuits were let loose on the population, and chicaneries very rapidly turned into actual persecutions. The old conditions were revived, — recantation, or exile; and, in order to suit the purposes of the archbishop, exile was made to mean confiscation of property, and renunciation of family. As such measures were utterly at variance with the stipulations of the peace of Westphalia, they were made both to the emperor in Vienna, and to the diet at Ratisbon; and Prussia, Denmark, Holland, and England interfered. The archbishop charged a committee with investigating the whole matter, and placing it on a legal footing. The committee travelled from county to county to register the names of the Protestants, and hear their complaints; and as it gave golden promises of religious freedom, and justice in every respect, the Protestants were not slow in coming forward. But, when the archiepiscopal government discovered that no less than 20,978 persons wished to separate from the Roman-Catholic Church, it immediately changed its policy. Ausrian troops were sent for, and quartered upon the Protestant households; and a kind of dragonades was introduced. Only with great difficulty could the Protestants obtain permission to leave the country, and their children and property were restrained. In this great emergency the king of Prussia came to the aid of his co-religionists.
He threatened to adopt a similar policy towards his Roman-Catholic subjects, and formally invited

the Salzburg Protestants to come and settle under his sceptre. The archbishop was compelled to yield, and a regular emigration was arranged. KÖSTER.

SAMARIA AND THE SAMARITANS. Samar- aia, is the name of a city of the province. 1. City. It was, according to 1 Kings xvi. 23, 24, built by Omri, the sixth king of Israel, who, after the burning-down of his palace at Tirsah, bought a hill from a certain Sheemer, on which he built a city which he called Shomron, after the former possessor. Samaritans continued to be the metropolis of Israel for the remaining two centuries of that kingdom’s existence; was twice besieged by the Syrians (1 Kings xx. 1; 2 Kings vi. 24-vii. 20), but without effect, till at last it was taken by Shalmaneser (2 Kings viii. 9, 10), and the kingdom of the ten tribes was done to death. After this capture, Samaritans appears to have continued, for a time at least, the chief city of the foreigners brought to occupy the places of the departed natives. At the time of the Maccabees, Samaria was again a fortified city; for Josephus describes it as a very strong city (Ant., XIII. 10, 2). John Hyrcanus took it after a year’s siege, and razed it (Josephus, Wars, I. 2, 7, Ant., XIII. 10, 2). By directions of Gabinius, Samaritans and other demolished cities were rebuilt (Ibid., XIV. 5, 3); but its more effectual rebuilding was undertaken by Herod the Great, who called it Sebaste, in honor of the Emperor Augustus. It was colonized by six thousand veterans and others, for whose support a district surrounding the city was appropriated. Sebaste is to-day a poor village.

2. Province. As such, Samaria is first mentioned in Luke xvi. 11, and in the New Testament (Luke xvii. 11; John iv. 4 sq.; Acts i. 8, ii. 5, ix. 31, xv. 8), and by Josephus (Wars, III. 3, 4). Two hours from Gabanios, Samaria and other demolished cities were rebuilt (Ibid., XIV. 5, 3); but its more effectual rebuilding was undertaken by Herod the Great, who called it Sebaste, in honor of the Emperor Augustus. It was colonized by six thousand veterans and others, for whose support a district surrounding the city was appropriated. Sebaste is to-day a poor village.

Under Vespasian, a revolt was quelled with the loss of 11,600 persons, and the Jews received a gar- rison and the name Flavia Neapolis. The latter even forbade them to erect new syna- gogues. The hatred with which they had formerly regarded their Jewish rivals began to concentrate itself upon the Christians, now that the new faith had become that of the empire. In the year 484, while under the rule of Zeno, they attacked the church at Nablus, maimed the bishop, and murdered many of the worshippers, committing the like atrocities at Cæsarea also. Under Anastasius and Justinian, fresh troubles broke out. In 529, a general revolt of the Samaritans took place against the Christians. The severity with which this was put down by Justinian, followed by the enactment of severe laws against them, completely crushed the Samaritan people. Many fled to Persia; many became Christians. In 636 they fell under Moslem rule. During the time of the crusades they came, in 1069, into the power of the crusaders; and, with the exception of some temporary occupations by the Saracens, remained under the Christians till 1244, when they again became subject to Moslem rule. Since 1517 they have been under Turkish rule. Brief notices of the Samaritans and their country appear in the works of Benjamin of Tudela (twelfth century). But little was known of them till the close of the six-teenth century, when communications with them, addressing a letter to the congregations at Nablus and Cairo. Answers arrived in 1589, but not till after Scaliger’s death. In 1671 Robert Huntington, bishop of Raphoe, chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, paid a visit to Nablus, procured from them a Pentateuch, and in conjunction with Thomas Marshall, rector of Lincoln’s College, Oxford, carried on a corre- spondence with the Samaritans, which lasted, with
The Samaritans have two more days of assembly, though they do not count them as holidays, termed Summoth, on which the number of the congregation is taken; and, in return, every male over twenty years of age presents the priest with half a shekel, in accordance with Exod. xxx. 12-14, receiving from him a calendar for the coming six months, prepared from a table in his possession. From these, till the day of judgment, he traces his living. He may consecrate any of his family that he pleases to the priesthood, provided the candidate be twenty-five years of age, and never have suffered his hair to be cut. Like other Orientals, he never removes his turban, and thus is not easily to be distinguished from the rest of the congregation; but, in accordance with Lev. x. 6, he does not "rend his clothes" by wearing a slit on his sleeve, as other Samaritans; and, when the roll of the law is taken from the ark, he, like his assistants, places a cloth, which they call talith, around his head. They wear white turbans; ordinarily they are compelled, by way of distinction from Mohammedans, to wear them of a pale-red color. They may cut their hair, or not, as they please, but not their beards, this being forbidden. When a boy is born, great rejoicing is held: his circumcision always takes place on the eighth day after birth, even though it be a sabbath. Boys marry as early as fifteen or sixteen, girls at twelve. The Samaritans may marry Christian or Jewish girls, provided they become Samaritans. When a man has a childless wife, he may take a second, but, if she also be barren, not a third. Divorces, though permitted, are uncommon. The dead are prepared for burial by their own friends: the whole body is washed, but especially the hands and feet. The burial takes place, if possible, before sunset the same day, accompanied with the recitation of the law and hymns. [The following is a part of a litany for the dead:—

"Lord Jehovah, Elohim, for thy mercy and for thine own sake, and for thy name, and for thy glory, and for the sake of our lords Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and our lords Moses and Aaron and Eleazar and Ithamar and Phinehas and Joshua and Caleb, and the holy angels, and the seventy elders, and the holy mountain of Gerizim, Beth El. If thou acceptest this prayer, may there go forth from before thy holy countenance a gift sent to protect the spirit of thy servant N., the son of N., of the sons of N., . . . daughter . . . from the sons of N. . . . O Lord Jehovah, in thy mercy have compassion on him (or her), and rest his (her) soul in the garden of Eden, and forgive him (or her) and all the congregations of Israel who flock to Mount Gerizim, Beth El. Amen. Amen. Amen."

These readings are continued every day to the next sabbath, the women of the family watching near the grave. On the sabbath it is visited by the whole congregation, except the near relations, who eat there together, reciting part of the law, and singing hymns, finishing the recitation later in the day with the relations of the deceased.

Of the Old Testament they only have

passages from the present Hebrew text, often agreeing with the Septuagint. It is reprinted in the London Polyglot. [The whole Pentateuch is divided into nine hundred and sixty-four paragraphs, or Ouzzin, and is halved in Lev. vii. 15 (Authorized Version and Hebrew text, viii. 9).

As to its critical character, there has always been a difference of opinion and rivalry between the two. For a hundred years one of the most extraordinary controversies on record was kept up. The leader in this controversy was J. Morin, who placed the Samaritan Pentateuch far above the received text; and in this opinion he was followed by men like Capellus and others. Others, as De Dieu, Hottinger, Buxtorf, took the opposite view; and while they maintained the superiority of the Hebrew text, yet in doubtful cases, when the Samaritan text had an "unquestionably clearer" reading, they would adopt it. Here the matter rested until 1815, when Gesenius abolished the remnant of the authority of the Samaritan Pentateuch by publishing his De Pent. Sam. Origine, Indole et Auctoritate. The subject was taken up again by Kirchheim, and of late by Kohn. As to their pronunciation of the Hebrew, it differs somewhat from the usual. [According to Petermann's transcription, the first verse in Genesis would read thus: "Barašet bara eluwcni it assaimem wit."

Besides the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch, the Samaritans have also versions of the same. The most important is the Samaritan Version [published by A. Brüll, in Hebrew characters, in 1875].

The Samaritan, in Greek (ἐκαβοναρασιν), probably the same which is mentioned in the Lexicon of Origen.

The Arabic version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, made by Abu Said in Egypt, on the basis of the Arabic translation of Saadia. An edition of this version was commended by Kuenen at Leyden. Genesis was published in 1851; Exodus and Leviticus, in 1854.

The other literature of the Samaritans is very unimportant. They have ten prayer-books for the sabbaths and feasts, besides two collections of hymns, which they call Durrān ("string of pearls") and Defter ("book"). Of their chronicles, we mention the Samaritan Chronicle, or Book of Joshua (sent to Scaliger by the Samaritans of Cairo in 1884: it was edited by Juyonnell, Leyden, 1848), the Chronicle of Abūl-Fath, full of fables, and containing little useful matter, published recently by Vilmar, with the title Abūl-Fath Annales Samaritani, etc., Gotta, 1885.

Sects. — Concerning the sects, Abūl-Fath's statement is as follows: A sect appeared calling themselves "Dostân," or "The Friends," which varied in many respects from the traditions of their fathers respecting many religious matters. Thus they held for impure a fountain into which a dead insect had fallen, altered the time for reckoning the purification of women and commencement of feasts, forbade the eating of eggs which had been laid, allowing those only to be eaten which were found inside a slain bird, considered dead snakes and cemeteries as unclean, and held any one whose shadow fell upon a grave as impure for seven days. They rejected the words "Blessed be our God forever," and substituted Elohim for Jehovah; denied that Gerizim had been the first sanctuary of God; upset the Samaritan reckoning for the feasts, giving thirty days to each month, rejecting the feasts and order of fasts, and the portions due to the Levites. They counted the fifty days to Pentecost from the sabbath, the day after the first day of the passover, like the Jews, not from the Sunday like the other Samaritans. Their priests, who were also the scribes, were not to incur impurity, could enter a house suspected of infection as long as they did not speak. When a pure and a doubtful house stood side by side, the condition of the latter was decided by watching whether a clean or unclean bird first settled upon it. On the sabbath they might only eat and drink from earthen vessels, which, if defiled, could not be purified; they might give no food or water to their cattle; this was done on the day of the passover. Their high priest was a certain Zara, who had been turned out of his own community for immorality.

At a later period lived Dusis. Being condemned to death for adultery, he wasespoused on the promise of sowing dissension among the Samaritans by founding a new sect. He went to Askér (near Nabûla), and formed a friendship with a Samaritan distinguished for his learning and piety. Compelled by a false accusation which he had brought against his friend, he took shelter at Shuëike with a widow-woman named Amentiu, in whose house he composed many writings; but, finding that a hot pursuit after him was still maintained, he retired to a cave, where he perished of hunger, and his body was eaten by dogs. Before his departure, however, he left his books with his hostess, enjoining her to let no one read them unless he first bathed in the tank hard by. Accordingly, when Levi, the high priest's nephew, arrived with seven others in search of him, they all bathed, one after the other, in the tank; and each, as he emerged from the water, exclaimed, "I believe in thee, Jehovah, and in Dusis thy servant, and his sons and daughters!" Levi adding, when his turn came, "Wo to us if we deny Dusis, the prophet of God!" They then took the writings of Dusis, and found that he had made many alterations in the law, more even than Ezra. They concealed them, and on their return to Nabûla reported that Dusis had disappeared before they arrived, they knew not whither. At the next passover, Levi had to read out Exod. xii. 22 in the synagogue; but for "byssop" he substituted "thyme." Corroded by the congregation, he still persevered, crying, "This is right, as God hath said by his prophet Dusis, on whom be peace! Ye are all worthy of death for denying the prophetic office of his servant Dusis, altering the feasts, falsifying the great name of Jehovah, and persecuting the second prophet of God, whom he hath revealed from Sinai. Woe unto you that you have rejected and do not follow him!" Levi was stoned. His friends dipped a palm-leaf in his blood, and ordained that whoever would read Dusis' writings, and see the leaf, must first fast seven days and nights. They cut off their hair, shaved their beards, and at their funerals performed many strange ceremonies. On the sabbath they would not move from their place, and kept their feasts only on this day, during which they would not remove their hands from their sleeves. When one of their friends died, they would gird him with a girdle, put a stick in his hand, and shoes on his feet, saying, "If we rise, he will at once get up;" believing that the dead man, as soon as he was laid in the grave, would rise and go to paradise. As to the age in which Dysis lived, it must have been long before Origen; for this Father, in his Commentary on John viii. 57 (ed. Longm. ed. 49), tells us that he "was the Messiah." His followers are called Dositheans, who have his books, and tell wonderful stories of him, as if he had not died, and is still alive somewhere. This agrees with the statement of Abūl-Fath concerning Dysis. According to Origen, Dositheus must have lived long before him, probably in the first, or at least in the second century of the Christian era. That he was the teacher or pupil of Simon Magus, as some have asserted, is an untenable conjecture.

SAMSON (i.e., the destroyer) was an Israelite of the tribe of Dan (Judg. xiii. 2). His birth was announced to his mother, who had long been barren. He was to be a Nazarite from his birth. The mother was directed, accordingly, to conform her own regime to the tenor of the Nazaritish law, and strictly abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquor, and from every species of impure food. He was born, as he was afterwards to be a Nazarite from his birth, as he was afterwards to be a Nazarite from his birth, his mother was called to the latter station, and devoted herself in bonds, provided they would not themselves fall upon him and kill him. preternatural potency suddenly put itself forth, and snapping the cords with force, and snapping the jawbone of an ass, he dealt so effectually about him, that a thousand men were slain on the spot. Wearied with his exertions, Samson became faint from thirst. God heard his prayer, and caused a stream to gush from a hollow rock hard by; and Samson gave it the name of En-hakkore (i.e., the well of him that heareth).

4. The Gates of Gaza at Hebron (Judg. xvi. 1-3).—Samson suffered himself weakly to be drawn into the company of a woman of loose character at Gaza. The inhabitants attempt to detain him at Gaza by closing the gates of the city, and making them fast; but Samson, apprised of it, rose at midnight, and breaking away bolts, bars, and hinges, departed, carrying the gates to a hilltop near Hebron.

5. The Attempted Outwitting in the Valley of Sorek (Judg. xvi. 4-15).—Here he lived with Delilah. Tempted by the bribe of the Philistines, she employs all her arts to worm out the secret of his strength. Three times she deceived him, abasing at the same time the Philistines lying in wait.

6. Samson's Self-treachery and Death (Judg. xvi. 15-31).—At last, in a moment of weakness, Samson disclosed to Delilah the fact that his strength was in his hair; not that it really lay in his hair, but in the fact that it arose from his relation to God as a Nazarite. The Philistines, having deprived him of sight, at first immured him in a prison, and made him grind at a mill like a slave. Thus the Samson saga, Leip., 1860. L. DIEDEL.

SAMSON. Bernhardin, a Franciscan monk noted for his traffic in indulgences in Switzerland. He was a native of Milan, but the dates of his birth and death are not known. He entered Switzerland as the agent of Cardinal Forli, who had charge of the sale in that region; but his behavior caused much scandal, and after some disastrous encounters with Zwingli and Bullinger, he was returned to Italy. He lived a long time longer, but died an untimely death. He was the first who gained such a decisive victory over the Philistines, that all the days of Samuel they never again attacked the Israelites (vii. 13); and the Ebenezer stone was the sign of victory which Samuel put up. As to the manner in which Samuel exercised his judicial office, we know that he annually visited, in discharge of his judicial activity, not only the outgrowth of the prophetic office, but was also constantly guided by it. We must not only suppose that he dispensed judgment with prophetic wisdom, that he also pleaded the cause of the people as a man who had the spirit of God. Although Samuel had never drawn the sword, except in one case (1 Sam. xv. 33), yet he was a hero. He was the first who gained such a decisive victory over the Philistines, that all the days of Samuel they never again attacked the Israelites (vii. 13); and the Ebenezer stone was the sign of victory which Samuel put up. He was the first who gained such a decisive victory over the Philistines, that all the days of Samuel they never again attacked the Israelites (vii. 13); and the Ebenezer stone was the sign of victory which Samuel put up. As to the manner in which Samuel exercised his judicial office, we know that he annually visited, in discharge of his duties as ruler, the three chief sanctuaries,—Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpeh (vii. 10). At other times he lived at Ramah, and exercised his functions there (vii. 17). When he became old, he appointed his sons Joel and Abiah as judges, not to take his place, but to relieve him (vii. 19). God called others to take his place, but these sons possessed not their father's integrity of spirit, but "turned aside after lucre, took bribes, and perverted judgment." (viii. 3); so the elders of the people came to him and said, "Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king." (viii. 5). Although the Lord fulfilled the desire of the people, yet the people sinned in preferring the splendor of an outward, visible kingdom to the glory of the invisible kingdom of Jehovah (viii. 7, x. 19, xii. 10 sq.). At the command of God, Samuel anointed and made Saul king, and then retired from public office (xii. 2). Saul proved himself incapable of leading the people. Samuel's help was often needed. When after the rejection of Saul, and David's anointing to the throne, Samuel felt assured that David was chosen of God to rule over the kingdom of Israel, he retired entirely from public life. Only once again he came forward before his death to defend the anointed of the Lord against the rejected by the Lord (xix. 18-24). It may be that in his retirement Samuel put in writing what is called (1 Chron. xxix. 29) the "Book of Samuel."

Samuel's Priesthood.—In this direction Samuel only filled a gap out of necessity. Eli was dead, and his two sons also. The ark was taken, Shiloh was desolated. In this time of need Samuel restored the orphaned priesthood by building an altar at Ramah (1 Sam. vii. 17). Here, as well as at Mizpeh (vii. 5), Gilgal (xi. 15), and Bethel (xiv. 2 sq.), he offered sacrifices. His priestly function, however, consisted not merely in sacrificing, but more especially in praying for the people (vii. 5, 8, viii. 6, xii. 16-23); and the efficacy of the power of his prayer is often mentioned (Ps. xcix. 6; Jer. xv. 1).

In reviewing the whole career of Samuel, we notice that he forms a transition period. He is the last judge, and mediates the reconstruction of the theocracy by founding the royal and prophetical offices, which again were of the greatest influence for the formation of the greatly developed office. Some regard Samuel as a type of John the Baptist. It cannot be denied that there are many striking parallels between both, but the Baptist's activity was not as comprehensive as Samuel's. John was nothing but a voice of one crying in the wilderness, whilst Samuel had to reform and to guide the whole religious and political life of the nation. Saul was not as comprehensive as Samuel's, but more especially in praying for the people (vii. 5, 8, viii. 6, xii. 16-23); and the efficacy of the power of his prayer is often mentioned.

The Book of Samuel links itself directly to Judges, which presents the confusion of that period by showing how the monarchy arose, and reached its height. It divides itself into three principal parts: (A) The history of Samuel, the last judge and the prophetic founder of the monarchy (1 Sam. i.—xii.); (B) The history of Saul, the first king of Israel (xii.—xxviii.); (C) The history of David (2 Sam. i.—xxiv.). The death of David is given in 1 Kings. The book is a unit, but flows not from one source, but from several, which the author combines, without, however, being able always to disguise the fact. But the modern critics overdo the matter when they find everywhere contradictions. And they do not agree in tracing the sources. M. Duncker, Seitz, and Reuss try to make out that the history of Saul's elevation to the monarchy rests upon three different and mutually exclusive accounts: (1) xi., which they say is the original historical account; (2) ix. 1—x. 16; (3) viii., x. 17-27. Dillmann and Wellhausen trace it to two sources: (1) ix. 1-10, x. 16, x. 27—xi. 11; (2) viii. 10, 17-27; xi. 12-14. Wellhausen considers the second account as unhistorical, and of ephial post-exilian origin. Dillmann maintains that one or the other must be false. But since the editor of the book, if he did really make up his history out of two different sources, evidently considered them of equal value, and mutually supplementary, the first question to be answered is, Was he not right? Of course, if there is no living God who regulates the future in its smallest details, and can therefore control and direct what both accounts are equally unhistorical. But, if there be such a God, then there is no difficulty in accepting both accounts as true, and fitting together.

It is true that in First Samuel there are told several similar stories,—Saul's inspiration (x. 10-12 and xix. 22-24), his rejection as king (xii. 8-14 and xv. 12 sqq.), his madness (xviii. 10 sq. and xix. 9 sqq.), David's sparing of Saul (xxiv. 1-12 and xvi.), David's flight to the Philistines (xxi. 10-15 and xxvii. 1 sqq.); but the second story is not an exact repetition of the first. The circumstances were similar: hence the same general result followed, yet they were not identical in the two. It is also true that there are genuine repetitions and breaks, formal incongruities and contradictions, transpositions, etc. Cf. vii. 12, 13 with ix. 10, x. 5, xii. 8 which possess not their father's integrity of spirit, but "turned aside after lucre, took bribes, and perverted judgment." (viii. 3). All Israel lamented him. He was old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king. (viii. 5). Although the Lord fulfilled the desire of the people, yet the people sinned in preferring the splendor of an outward, visible kingdom to the glory of the invisible kingdom of Jehovah (viii. 7, x. 19, xii. 10 sq.). At the command of God, Samuel anointed and made Saul king, and then retired from public office (xii. 2). Saul proved himself incapable of leading the people. Samuel's help was often needed. When after the rejection of Saul, and David's anointing to the throne, Samuel felt assured that David was chosen of God to rule over the kingdom of Israel, he retired entirely from public life. Only once again he came forward before his death to defend the anointed of the Lord against the rejected by the Lord (xix. 18-24). be supplied from 1 Chron. xx. 5. But the attempts (Thenius and Wellhausen) to make up deficiencies by the aid of the LXX. are conjectural, and more or less arbitrary.

While the author of Kings regularly names his sources, the author of Samuel does this only once (2 Sam. i. 18). But it is probable that the author had recourse to the official records spoken of in 1 Chron. xxix. 29. The book contains Ps. xviii. and the "last words of David" (2 Sam. xxiii. 1–7). The time of composition was after David's death (2 Sam. v. 5), after the separation of the kingdom, but before the downfall of Judah (1 Sam. xxvii. 6). Many rabbis make Jeremiah to be the author. But in truth, neither author nor definite date can be assigned to it. The author is, however, no mere compiler, but one, who, in the true prophetic spirit, made thorough use of the sources.

The book takes high rank in literary and historical respects. The style is classic and graphic. The honest and impartial character of the prophetic author comes out in his statement of many things which were in plain contradiction to the Mishnaic law, and in his faithful and unvarnished account of David's failings, notwithstanding his prejudice in his favor.

SANBALLAT (Heb., סנבלט, or סנבלט, so Baer and Delitzsch; LXX., Σανβαλλάτ; a name, probably, of Assyroy-Babylonian origin, i.e., Sin-ulalit, "Sin [moon-god] bestowed life ") is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible, all in the Book of Nehemiah: Neh. ii. 10, 19, iv. 1 sq. (Heb. iii. 33 sq.), iv. 7 sq., cf. 15 (Heb. iv. 1 sq., cf. 9), vi. 1–5 sq., 12–14, xiii. 28. He headed the opposition which Nehemiah encountered in carrying out the plan of rebuilding Jerusalem, and re-establishing there a Hebrew national life. See Nehemiah.

We are told that Sanballat, and Tobiah "the servant of the Ammonites," were greatly displeased at the news of Nehemiah's coming, because of his interest in "the welfare of the children of Israel" (Neh. ii. 10). On learning of the determination formed by the Hebrews to build the walls of the city, these two, with "Geshem the Arabian," laughed scornfully, and contemptuously accused them of a rebellious purpose against the king. At length they conspired against Nehemiah (cf. xiii. 7 sq.). When, in spite of this, Sanballat found the work actually in progress, although still contemptuous, he grew very angry, and roused the hostility of "his brethren and the army of Samaria" (iv. 1 sq. = Heb. iii. 33 sq.). At length he conspired with Tobiah "and the Arabsians and the Ammonites and the Ashdodites"—hostile peoples on various sides of Jerusalem—to go up and hinder the work by force (iv. 7 sq. = Heb. iv. 9 sq.). The plot, however, became known to Nehemiah, and was abandoned (iv. 15 = Heb. iv. 9). After the wall was finished, Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem endeavored to secure the person of Nehemiah by inviting him to a conference. Four messengers in succession, followed by a letter, in which Sanballat mentioned rumors that charged Nehemiah with treason, failed to entice the latter (vi. 1–5 sqq.)—and even the expedient of bribing a man to prophesy danger, and so to induce Nehemiah to shut himself up in the temple, was fruitless (vi. 12–14). After this we hear nothing more of Sanballat, except that a son of "Josiahs the son of Elaiah the high priest," was his son-in-law. This alliance seems to have taken place during an absence of Nehemiah from Jerusalem (cf. xiii. 6), and probably betokens a scheme of Sanballat to gain influence among the Hebrews, since he could not successfully oppose them by force (cf. xiii. 4, 7, 8).

It remains to inquire who Sanballat was. He is called "the Horonite" (Heb., הָרֹון; LXX., δ' Ῥωνές καὶ τοῦ Χαρυαντοῦ) (Neh. ii. 10, 19, xiii. 28). We cannot be sure whether this appellation is derived from Horonaim, a city of Moab (Isa. xv. 6, etc., and Moab-stone), or Beth-horon, in Ephraim (Josh. iii. 5, etc.). In favor of Horonaim is the association of Sanballat with Tobiah the Ammonite and Geshem the Arabian, and more particularly the fact that his daughter's marriage with the high priest's grandson is classed with the marrying of "wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab" (Neh. xiii. 28, cf. 28, 29). Against Horonaim is the lack of the term "Moabite" in connection with Sanballat, although this may be due to the fact (see below) that he did not properly belong to that people. In favor of Beth-horon is Sanballat's apparent residence in the territory of Samaria, and particularly his endeavor to have a meeting with Nehemiah at Ono in Benjamin (see vi. 2 and xvi. 31, 35), which cannot have been very far from Beth-horon. In any case his name points to Assyria or Babylonia as the original home of his family. They may have been among the colonists transported to the "western country" by Sargon or Esarhaddon (see those arts.). There is no evidence that Sanballat held any official position in Samaria under the Persian king. It seems to be distinct from "the governors beyond the river" (ii. 7, 9); and a Persian official would hardly have ventured to oppose so persistently one who, like Nehemiah, brought a commission from the king. We know nothing definite about "his brethren and the army of Samaria" (iv. 2 = Heb. iii. 34); but it seems to have been personal influence, and not official authority, which he exercised over them. The Sanballat (Σανβαλλαττής) whom Josephus (Ant., XI. 7, 2 sq.) names as satrap of Samaria was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. It is interesting to notice, however, that Josephus calls him a Cuthite (cf. Cuthah, Cuth, a Babylonian city, 2 Kings xviii. 24, 30), and says he gave his daughter in marriage to Manasses, brother of Jotham, the high priest, that he might conciliate the favor of the Jewish nation. There may be here some confusion with the earlier biblical Sanballat.

SANCTIFICATION is, according to the Scriptures, the fundamental principle of religious morality. Its roots strike down into the holiness of God, which is the main element in the Old Testament conception of God. Jehovah is the Holy One (Isa. vi.), who not only is free from all sin and impurity, but institutes a holy people, and develops it through the Holy Spirit. Christ addressed God as the Holy Father (John xvii. 11); and it is because God is holy that we are urged to sanctify ourselves, or become holy (Lev. xi. 44, 46; 1 Pet. i. 16). This vocation to become holy is symbolized in the arrangements and furniture of the temple, which was altogether holy, and consecrated to the Lord. Sanctification consists in withdrawal from the world, and presentation to God. Christ, who was holy from his birth, also sanctified himself for the world (John xvii. 19), completing the work by his self-sacrifice on the cross. Christians are designated "saints" (holy persons, Acts ix. 31; Rom. xi. 14) because they are called to become holy, but because they receive with their faith in Christ his holiness or righteousness as their own. Christ is made unto believers sanctification (1 Cor. i. 30). Sanctification is treated of, now as an act of God, or Christ, or the Holy Spirit, now as an act of man. God sanctifies (John xvii. 17), and man enters into the redeeming, justifying, sanctifying economy of God (Eph. i. 4; 1 Pet. i. 15).

The Roman-Catholic Church confounds sanctification with justification. The Council of Trent (VI. 7) says that justification is not only forgiveness of sin, but the sanctification and renewal of the inner man. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, on the other hand, defines justification to be a forensic act, a declaration that a person is righteous. But inasmuch as this forensic act is an actual forgiveness of sin and reception into the new life, it is also a creative act. What the Protestant confessions insist on is the clear distinction between the instantaneous act of justification on the part of God and the continued and gradual process of sanctification. By the act of God's justification the believer is made a creature of God: in sanctification he carries on what God has begun, and realizes the Christ in his own life. Justification is the germ of our new life, a single act: sanctification is a gradual process, the development of this new life.

J. P. LANGE.

SANCTION, Pragmatic (Pragmatica sanction, or simply pragmatica), was in the later Roman imperial times a rescript of the emperor, couched in formal language, particularly one respecting the public law, issued on request of a city, province, or church (Cod. Justinian., IX. 12, § 1; Euseb., H.E. viii. 21). It was called "pragmatic" because it was issued after consultation and treaty concerning the matter (πράγμα). The term through the middle age, and down to modern times, has been especially used of laws respecting weighty matters. Of pragmatic sanctions affecting the church, the chief are,—

1. That of Louis IX. of France (1268), which was the first ordinance of the thirteenth century designed as a check to the undue extension of Papal power and to the misuses of the curia, particularly to the excessive demands for tithes, and to the enlargement of Papal reservations respecting benefices. It consists of six articles. It allows all prelates, patrons, and ordinary collators of benefices, the fullest exercise and unhindered preservation of their jurisdiction, and forbids simony. This sanction was the first important law on the side of "Gallican liberty." The opponents of Gallicanism have, therefore, always endeavored to show that it is a forgery (comp. R. ROSEN: Die pragmatische Sanction, welche unter dem Namen Ludwigs IX., etc., München, 1855); but, after SOLAND's exhaustive essay (Zeitschr...

2. That of Charles VII. of France (La pragmatique de Bourges), issued July 7, 1439, in consequence of a national council which indorsed the reform edicts of the Council of Basel, but offered certain modifications respecting the French Church. The edict consists of twenty-three articles, and enforces the decrees of the council. It asserts the superiority of ecclesiastical councils to the Pope, and confirms the adored usages, observances, and statutes of the French Church. It forbids Papal encroachments. It was, however, an invasion of the ecclesiastical by the civil power. No account was taken of the Pope in the issuing of the edict. Accordingly, Fius II. (1586-94) declared it to be an infringement of the Papal prerogatives, and demanded of the French bishops to bring about its repeal. Charles VII replied by an appeal to a general council. It was, indeed, repealed by Louis XI. in 1461, to get the Papal assistance in making good his claims upon Naples; but the Parliament of Paris refused to assent to the king's action; and, as he did not get the desired help, he let the matter drop. In 1499 Louis XI. renewed the sanction, and it has been since really withdrawn. See the text in De Vilerault: Ordonnances, 18, 287 sq.; and comp. Hierfle: Concilien geschichte, vii. 792; P. Hinschius: Kirchenrecht, 3, 409 sqq.

3. The so-called German Pragmatic Sanction of the diet of Frankfort in 1439. The designation is misleading. It is not a law; since it was not approved by the king in person, and never proclaimed as a law of the empire: it is rather a provisional act of union between some German princes who took exception to the findings of the Council of Basel respecting certain alterations in the affairs of the German nation and its component parts. Comp. Puckert: Die kurfürstliche Neutralität während des Baseler Concils, Leipzig, 1858.

SANDEMAN and the SANDEMANIANS. Robert Sandeman—b. at Perth, Scotland, 1718; d. at Danbury, Conn., America, 1771—was a son-in-law of John Glass (see art.), and an elder of the Glassite Church in Edinburgh, but removed in 1760 to London, where he formed a congregation, and in 1764 to America, where he continued active for the propagation of his ideas. The sect, however, called "Glassites" in Scotland, and "Sandemanians" in England and America, never attained any high degree of prosperity, and at present it hardly numbers more than two thousand members. Doctrinally they distinguish themselves by defending faith as a mere assent to the teachings and workings of Christ. With respect to liturgy, ritual, and discipline, their differences are more pronounced. They celebrate the Lord's Supper once a week; hold love feasts, which consist in a common dinner, every Sunday between morning and evening service: abstain from blood and every thing strangled; and practise a kind of communism, so far as the members hold their property subject to the call of the church. Their ideas are best learned from the writings of Sandeman: Letters on Theron and Aspasio (Edinburgh, 1757), Thoughts on Christianity, Sign of the Prophet Jonah, Honor of Marriage, etc. See also Fuller: Letters on Sandemanianism. John Glass's Treatise on the Lord's Supper (Edinburgh, 1743) was reprinted, London, 1883.

SANDWICH (or HAWAIIAN) ISLANDS, The, a group of eight inhabited and four uninhabited islands in the Northern Pacific Ocean, were first discovered by the Spanish navigator Gaetano, 1542, and visited by Capt. Cook, 1778, and Vancouver, 1792-94. The largest island is Hawaii, one hundred and ninety miles, with two active volcanoes, Kilauea and Mauna Loa; the last eruption being in 1868. Mauna Kea, the highest mountain, rises 13,805 feet above the sea. The capital, Honolulu, situated on the Island of Oahu, is 2,100 miles from San Francisco, and has a population of about 15,000. The city has a good harbor and waterworks, is well laid out, and has a number of churches and public buildings. The Hawaiians belong to the Polynesian race, and are allied to the New- Zealanders, Tongans, etc. The population was estimated by Capt. Cook at 400,000, and in 1823 at 142,000. The census of 1836 gave 108,579; of 1860, 69,700; of 1872, 66,897; of 1878, 44,088. The religion of the Hawaiians, before the arrival of the missionaries, was indistinct, but superstitious, permitting human sacrifices, the worship of idols, etc. Polygamy was universal. No word was found in the language for chastity. Infanticide was very prevalent, and Dibble calculated that two-thirds of the children were killed by their parents. The tabu system, by which things and days were set apart as sacred, and individuals were refused contact with each other, was a prominent feature of the life on the islands, and a source of great power to the reigning family and priesthood. The reigning king, Kalakaua, was elected by ballot in 1874.

The first missionaries arrived in the Sandwich Islands March 30, 1820. They were Hiram Bingham and Asa Thurston, both graduates of Andover Seminary, at whose ordination, at Goshen, Conn., Sept. 28, 1819, Rev. Heman Humphrey preached from Josh. xiii. 1, "There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed." The Sandwich Islands had been before the eyes of the Christian public before this. A native, Obookiah by name (b. 1795), was brought to New Haven in 1808. He there met Samuel Mills, and became one of the first pupils at the Missionary Institute at Cornwall, to whose opening his presence had contributed. Obookiah died a Christian in 1818. Nine Hawaiians were educated in the school before its discontinuance in 1826, and some of them returned to their native land as teachers. Much to their surprise, Bingham and Thurston found that the idols had been destroyed, the priesthood abolished, and human sacrifices discontinued. They had ready access to the people, and by 1822 had reduced the language to writing. That year a printing-press was set up. Mr. Ellis, the first Protestant missionary and teacher, visited the islands, and rendered the American missionaries valuable assistance in acquiring the native tongue. In 1823 the missionaries Bishop, Stewart, Richards, Ely, and Goodrich arrived from the United States. The queen-dowager, Keop-nolani, was baptized in 1823. The king and queen died, of measles, on a visit to England in 1824. The first Roman-Catholic missionaries arrived in 1827, were banished at a later time, but reinstated.
in 1839 by the French guns. By 1830 twenty books had been printed in the Hawaiian language. In 1834 there were 50,000 learners in the schools. The translation of the Bible was completed on Feb. 25, 1839. Revivals have swept through the island at various times. In 1853 the natives sent missions to the Sandwich Islands. The Hawaiian Evangelical Association was formed; the churches being declared independent, so far as government was concerned, of the American Board. The entire expense of the mission up to 1889, when the aid of the American churches was declared no longer necessary, was $1,220,000. The total number admitted to communion up to 1870 was 55,300. At the present time the entire population is Christian. The Roman Catholic Church have made some headway. The Church of England has a bishop of Honolulu and a handful of converts. The Congregational Church is still dominant. On June 15, 1870, a jubilee celebration was held in the large stone church of Honolulu; three thousand crowding into the building, and as many more unable to get admission. The eldest vestryman was L. K,us, who preached in Hawaiian, the king being present. Leprosy prevails upon the island. The Island of Molokai has been set apart for them, and has a population of 800 lepers.

SANDBY, Edwin, archbishop of York; b. near Hawkshead, Lancashire, 1519; d. at York, July 10, 1555. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; was converted to Protestantism; was elected master of Catherine Hall (1547); was imprisoned in the Tower for espousing the cause of Lady Jane Grey, and then went into voluntary exile until Elizabeth's accession; was bishop of Worcester (1559), of London (1570), and archbishop of York (1570). He took part in the preparation of the Bishops' Bible, and in the revision of the Liturgy. See T. D. Whitaker: Life of Edwin Sandys, prefaced to an edition of the Archbishop's Sermons, London, 1812; also the Sketch by John Atkins, in his edition of the Sermons for the Parker Society, Cambridge, 1841.

SANDBYS, George, son of an archbishop of York; b. at the palace there in 1577; d. at Bexley Abbey, Kent, March, 1644; was educated at Oxford; travelled in the East, 1610-12; was in Virginia, 1621-24, as colonial treasurer, building there "the first water-mill, the first iron-works, and the first ship;" and was for some years an attendant of Charles I., and died in college retirement. He published a much-valued Relation of his Oriental journey, 1615; translated Ovid's Metamorphoses, partly at Jamestown, Va., and Grotius' Christ's Passion, 1640; and paraphrased the Psalms (1639), Job, Ecclesiastes, etc. (1638), and the Song of Solomon (1641). These were nearly inaccessible till H. J. Todd issued in 1839 a Selection from them, with prefatory Life; a complete edition was published 1872 by R. Hooper. In James Montgomery's opinion "his psalms are incomparably the most poetical in the English language, and yet they are scarcely known." Charles I., when a prisoner in Carisbrooke Castle, "vastly delighted to read them. Fragments of some of them may be found in some of the hymn-books. Dryden called Sandys "the best versifier of the former age," and Pope thought English poetry much indebted to his translations.

SANHEDRIN (Matt. v. 22, xxvi. 59; Mark iv. 55, xv. 1; Luke xxii. 60; John xi. 47; Acts iv. 21, 27, 34, vi. 12, 15, xxii. 30, xxiii. 1, 6, 15, 20, 28, xxiv. 20) was the supreme council of the Jewish nation, in Jerusalem. On the right hand of the president sat the abed beth din (i.e., the father of the house of judgment, probably the vice-president); on the left, the akeham, the sage [referee]. Without the assent of the vice-president, the president could not ordain. The other members of the Sanhedrin were removed from the Hall of Squares to the provincial Synedria, viz., the supreme or metropolitan Sanhedrin, called the Great Sanhedrin, and provincial councils called the Small Sanhedrin, of which we shall speak farther on.

1. Number of Members, and their Classification in the Sanhedrin. — It consisted of seventy-one members: hence it is also called the Sanhedrin of seventy-one. The Sanhedrin of the present time is the product of the Sanhedrin, which consisted of twenty-three. The members were in part priests (Matt. xxvii. 1; John vii. 32, xi. 47, xii. 10), in part laymen, the elders of the people, and in part scribes (Matt. xxvi. 3, 57, xxvii. 41; Mark viii. 31, xi. 27, xv. 48, 53, xv. 1; Luke ix. 22, xx. 1, xxii. 66; Acts v. 21, vi. 12, xxii. 30, xv. 15). The members belonged either to the Pharisees or Sadducees: the scribes probably belonged to the latter (Acts v. 17, 34, xxiii. 6). Included in the seventy-one was the president, the Nasi, but not the notaries. The king was not to be president; but the high priest could be, as may be seen from Acts v. 21, 27, xxiii. 2, not, however, because of his dignity as priest. On the right hand of the president sat the abed beth din (i.e., the father of the house of judgment, probably the vice-president); on the left, the akeham, the sage [referee]. Without the assent of the vice-president, the president could not ordain. The other members of the Sanhedrin sat to the right and to the left, in a semicircle; while the two notaries stood before them, one to the right, and the other to the left. Before them sat three rows of disciples, in places appropriate to their respective attainments. The president assembled the council through his messengers; and, when he entered with his assistants he was received with special ceremony. Qualifications for membership were, that the applicant had already been a member of the smaller council, and that he was morally and physically blameless. He had to be a father of children, good-looking, and learned.

2. Time of Sessions. — The Sanhedrin sat every day, from the termination of the daily morning sacrifice till the daily evening sacrifice, with the exception of the sabbath and festivals.

3. Place of Session. — They generally met in the Hall of Squares, which was built by Simon ben-Shetach. It was a basilica twenty-two-ells long and eleven ells wide. Forty years before the destruction of the temple, the sessions of the Sanhedrin were removed from the Hall of Squares to the Halls of Purchase (Aboda Sarar, fol. 8, col. 2). After the destruction, the Sanhedrin was removed...

to Jamnia or Jabneh: it was thence transferred to Usha [under the presidency of Gamaliel II., ben-Simon II., A.D. 80-116], conveyed back to Jabne, and again to Usha, to Shafram [under the presidency of Simon III., ben-Gamaliel II., A.D. 140-169], to Beth-sheanrim and Sepphoris, under the presidency of Jehudah I., the Holy [A.D. 163-182], and finally to Tiberius, under the presidency of Gamaliel III., ben-Jehudah I. [A.D. 183-229], where it became more of a consistory, [but still retaining, under the presidency of Jehudah II., ben-Simon III. (A.D. 220-270), the power of excommunication]; while under the presidency of Gamaliel IV., ben-Jehudah II., it dropped the appellation Sanhedrin, and the authoritative decisions were issued under the name of Beth Ham-Midrash. Gamaliel V. [A.D. 400-423] was the last president. With the death of this patriarch, who was executed by Theodosius II., for erecting new synagogues contrary to the imperial inhibitions, the title Nasi, the last remains of the ancient synagoge, became wholly extinct in the year 425.

4. Mode of Conducting Trials, Punishments, etc.

—Occasional intimations in the Gospels (Matt. xxvii. 14 sq.; Mark xvi. 15 sq.; John xvii. 31 sq.; Acts iv. 7 sq., v. 27 sq.) and the canonical treatise Sanhedrin, chaps. iii.-v., give us an idea of the mode of procedure of the Sanhedrin. In capital offences, it required a majority of at least two to condemn the accused, and the verdict of guilty had to be reserved for the following day. The verdict of acquittal could be given on the same day.

5. Jurisdiction of the Great Sanhedrin. — This body had, (1) charge over all matters pertaining to religion and the different religious institutions, and (2) to give decisions in matters concerning a whole tribe [when it was accused of having departed from the living God], a high priest, a disobedient Sanhedrist, false prophets and seducers of the people, blasphemers, etc. It determined whether a war with any nation contemplated by the king was to be waged, and gave the sovereign power to judge such capital offences as came not within the jurisdiction of the supreme court. They sat every Monday and Thursday, being market-days, in a room adjoining the synagoge. Before the exile, these courts of justice were held in the market-place. There was no appeal to the Great Sanhedrin against the decision of this lesser Sanhedrin. Only when the opinion of the judges was divided did they themselves consult with the supreme court. The stripes to which offenders were sentenced were given in the synagoge by the sexton (cf. Mark xiii. 9 with Matt. x. 17, xxiii. 34). Besides these two courts, there was also one consisting of three judges. There were in Jerusalem alone three hundred and ninety such Sanhedrins. Within the jurisdiction of this court came suits for debts, cases of small injuries, compensation for damages, thefts which involved a twofold, fourfold, or fivefold value to the proprietor.

SARCERIUS, Erasmus, b. at Annaberg, 1501; d. at Magdeburg, Nov. 28, 1559, studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg; was very active in introducing the Reformation in Nassau (1538-48); and was appointed pastor at Leipzig in 1549, and at Magdeburg in 1553. He was a very prolific writer. His principal works are, Conciones uniuers., 4 vols. (1541), Loci communes Theologiae, Von einer Dis- ciplina (1555), Pastoralte (1559), etc.

SARDIS, the magnificent capital of Lydia, stood in the rich and fertile plain watered by the Pactolos, with its acropolis built on an almost inaccessible rock, a spur of the Tmolos, and was, in the Lydian and Persian period, one of the principal cities of Western Asia in military, commercial, and industrial respects. After the conquest of its Pharaoh paid him tribute. The Arabian inscriptions dating from Sargon's reign mention only once in the Bible (Isa. xx. 1). Sargon dwells in the fall of the city, to which Isaiah refers in the passage cited above (xx. 1). Sargon dwells.

SARGON (Heb., סַרְגוֹן, Arab. Sargun, a Persian god) established the king ("a powerful Assyrian king, successor of Shalmaneser IV., and father of Sennachibi, who reigned B.C. 722-705, is mentioned only once in the Bible (Isa. xx. 1): "In the year of [the Tartar's] coming to Ashdod, when Sargon, king of Assyria, sent him, and he fought against Ashdod and took it," etc. In contrast with this solitary and incidental notice, the Assyrian inscriptions during Sargon's reign are numerous, and our knowledge of his achievements fairly complete.

From the facts that he never calls his predecessor his father, and yet that he, his son Sennacherib, and his grandson Esarhaddon, all speak of royal ancestors, it is probable, that, while not in the direct line of descent, he belonged to a branch of the royal family. An ancient Babylonian king bore the same name, so that the Assyrian Sargon is often called Sargon II. He succeeded Shalmaneser IV. during the siege of Samaria, and it was in the first year of his reign (B.C. 722) that the city fell. (See 2 Kings xvii. 6, where nothing indicates that "the king of Assyria" is different from the one mentioned in v. 7. See Shalmaneser.) His inscriptions mention this conquest repeatedly, and in one event there seems to be reference to the establishment of foreign colonies in the territory of Samaria, in place of the Israelites who were carried away captive (cf. 2 Kings xvii. 24). A confirmation of this appears in the Annals of Sargon, according to which, in B.C. 721 he transported inhabitants of Babylonia to the land of Hatti (properly Hitites, but under Sargon of wider application). Another inscription speaks of his sending colonies from other places to "the land of the House of Omri" (Samaria); and the Annals are authority for the further statement that still other colonies were transported to "the city of Samaria" in B.C. 715. It was in the year 721 that Sargon conquered for the first time Mero- dash-baladan of Babylon (see the art.). 720 was a famous year for Sargon. He conquered Ashdod, which was very active in introducing the Reformation in Nassau (1538-48); and was appointed pastor at Leipzig in 1549, and at Magdeburg in 1553. He was a very prolific writer. His principal works are, Conciones uniuers., 4 vols. (1541), Loci communes Theologiae, Von einer Dis- ciplina (1555), Pastoralte (1559), etc.

the Tartan, or general, who commanded the army before Ashdod, and narrates this conquest in the first person. But at all events his record gives us a welcome light on the relation of the fall of Ashdod to the prophecy contained in Isa. xx. 2-6. It intimates a close connection between the Philistines and Egypt at the time of the revolt of the former. It was doubtful in dependence upon help from Egypt that the revolt had been undertaken. It is probable that Ashdod had attempted to draw Jerusalem into the conspiracy, and either as a result of a permission or a command of the Ptolemy also gives the first year of "Arimas," king of Babylon, as 709; and we thus have one point in the Assyrian chronology fixed with absolute definiteness. Sargon's name continued to inspire terror far and wide; and we have special record of a Cypriote embassy which waited upon him this year in Babylon, and a prophetic act and word were communicated to the present of an inscribed block of stone, which has been discovered in the Island of Cyprus.

In B.C. 708 a campaign against Kummuch (Comagene) took place, and this was followed by military expeditions of less consequence. The Babylonian tablets are in existence bearing a double date,—"13th (14th, 15th, or 16th) year of Sargon, king of Assyria, and 3rd (2d, 3d, or 4th) year (as) king of the Babylonians." This gives the first year of Sargon's reign, beginning early as 712, were largely occupied with the building of a great city, Dirr-Sarrukin ("Fortress of Sargon"), modern Khorsabad, about fifteen miles north-east from Mosul. The chief building in this city was his own magnificent palace, where most of the records of his deeds were preserved. By this year he raised a monument to the enduring memory of the conqueror of Babylon. After a reign of seventeen years he died—perhaps by violence, but we do not certainly know—about 705, and was succeeded by his son Senacherib.

Sarpi, generally known as Fra Paolo, b. at Venice, Aug. 14, 1553; there Jan. 15, 1623. He entered the order of Servites in 1560, and was ordained a priest 1574, and in 1579 elected provincial of his order. In the controversy between Venice and pope Paul V. he took a prominent part. He excited the ire of the curia by his views of the secular government as divinely instituted, of ecclesiastical exemption as merely a privilege granted by the king, of papal excommunication as depending for its validity upon its justice, etc., which he developed in his Considerazioni sopra le censure di P. Paolo V. (Venice, 1606), Storia particolare delle cose passate fra Paolo V. e la repubblica di Venezia (Lyons, 1824), De interdicti Veneti historia (Eng. trans. by Bedell, 1828). He was summoned before the Inquisition of Rome, but refused to come. He was excommunicated, but freed from the ban by the peace between the Pope and the Republic in 1607. He was, nevertheless, persecuted as long as he lived, and attacked by assassins even in his own monastery. His most celebrated work, however, is his History of the Council of Trent, which first appeared at Geneva, 1619, and was translated into English (1676), French, and German. It is written with pronounced opposition to the Roman system, and, if not Protestant, is at least reformatory in its fundamental principles. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice, 1677 and often, Geneva, 1687, Naples, 1790. His life was written by B. Ancheri Giovanni Pianto sopra la vita de S. Paolo Sarpi (Florence, 1859), A. Campbell (Florence, 1875), and Cattano Capasso, in Rivista Europea, 1879-80. Besides the works mentioned above, there is an English translation of his History of the quarrels of Pope Pius V. with the state of Venice (London, 1826), History of the Inquisition (1855), and of his History of ecclesiastical benefices and revenues (Westminster, 1727).

Sartorius, Ernst Wilhelm Christian, an able and learned theologian of the Lutheran Church; b. at Darmstadt, May 10, 1797; d. at Königsberg, June 13, 1859. He studied theology at Göttingen, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1821, and at Dorpat in 1824, and superintendent-general of the province of Livonia in 1834. His works are Beiträge zur evangeliichen Rechtsprechung (1830), Soli deo gloria, posthumously published in 1860. He was also a steady contributor to Hengstenberg's Evangelische Kirchenzeitung.

Sarum Use, the liturgy put forth (A.D. 1087) by Osmund, bishop of Sarum, based on the Anglo-Saxon and Norman liturgies, which was gradually incorporated into the ritual books of various parts of England, more particularly in the south;" was used a good deal in France, and until quite lately in Portugal." It is supposed that the bloody opposition of the monks to the style of chanting invented by William of Fescamp, when Thurstan, abbot of Glastonbury attempted (1083), to introduce it, called Osmund's attention to the varieties of use, and led him to revise the ritual upon the occasion of opening his new cathedral. SAUL, the first king of Israel, was a son of Kish the Benjamite (cf. 1 Sam. ix. 1), of Gibeah. Saul, i.e., the "desired," is described as "a choice young man, and a goodly: and there was not higher than any of the people" (ix. 2). he was completely in his power, must have destroyed all color of right in Saul's conduct in the minds of the people, as it also did in his own conscience (xxiv. 3-7, xxvi.). At last the monarchy itself which he had raised up broke down under the weakness of its head. The Philistines re-entered the country. Saul, forsaken of God, who gave him no oracles, had recourse to necromancy and divination, although he had formerly executed the penalty of the law on all those who practised these things (xxviii. 3). He consults a woman living at Endor, who conjures up the spirit of Samuel. From Samuel he hears that his doom is sealed. In the battle which took place on Gilboa, Saul, after his three sons had been killed, perished by his own sword (xxx. 4). The body, on being found by the Philistines, was stripped on, the national synods of Alencon (1637) and Charenton (1638), suppressed by a royal edict of Jan. 8, 1685. The academy, which developed the first fertile school of volunteers in the coalition against Louis XIV. the department of Maine-et-Loire, now famous for its manufactures of rosaries; was the seat of the celebrated Protestant academy founded in Florence, May 23, 1498; the originator and the the national synod of Charenton condemned those propositions; but several provincial synods held that the national synod had acted a little hastily, and refused to carry out its decree. Of still greater importance were the researches of Louis Cappel concerning the integrity of the various documents of the Old Testament. The strict Calvinists were fully aware, that, if the results of those researches were to be accepted, the doctrine of the literal inspiration of Scripture had to be given up, and a hot contest ensued. After the death of Amyraut, Placeeus, and Cappel, it was apparent that the fame of the academy of Saumur had passed its zenith: still men like Etienne Gasssen, Claude Pajon (the father of Fajonism), and Etienne de Biais, continued to throw lustre over the academy, and attract great numbers of students. Saurin, Jacques, the greatest orator of the French-Reformed Church; b. at Nimes, Jan. 6, 1677; d. at The Hague, Dec. 30, 1730. He was educated at Geneva, served four years in a regiment of volunteers in the coalition against Louis XIV. (1694-97), studied theology at Geneva, and was appointed pastor to the French-Reformed Congregation in London (1700) and at The Hague (1705), where he gathered immense audiences by the earnestness, energy, and eloquence with which he preached the gospel. Besides his Discours (Amsterdam, 1729), whose second volume (Amsterdam, 1729) gave occasion to some disagreeable misunderstandings, he published six volumes of Sermons (1707-25), and after his death seven more volumes were published by his son. Collected editions were several times issued. The best is that of The Hague, 1749; the latest, that of Paris, 1829-35. One volume of an English translation of his Discours appeared in London, 1728. The best English translation of his sermons is edited by Burdon, London, 1829, 6 vols., New York, 1860, 2 vols. Savonarola, Hieronymus, often called Fra Cirolamo, b. at Ferrara, Sept. 21, 1452; d. at Florence, May 23, 1498: the originator and the victim of an ecclesiastico-political reform movement, sometimes wrongly represented as an inspired prophet, and wonder-working saint, but sometimes, also, as an ambitious demagogue and deluded fanatic. He was by his parents destined to study medicine; but a steadily deepening impression of the corruption of the world in general, and the church especially, concentrated the whole force of his character on the one point, the salvation of his soul; and in 1475, in the twenty-third year of his age, he left the parental home, and sought refuge in a Dominican monastery at Bologna. The conversion was in strict harmony with the medival ideas of monasticism, and involved no reformatory impulse at all. He simply wanted to become a lay-brother, and do the mean work of the house; but his superiors determined that he should study theology, and in course of time he became thoroughly conversant with the Bible,—which he knew almost entirely by heart, and of which especially the Old Testament and the Revelation inspired him with passionate sympathy,— and also with the writings of Thomas Aquinas the great Dominican doctor, of St. Augustine, and others. He also began to preach, but at first without any success. Suddenly, however, at Brescia, his powerful eloquence broke forth in all its wealth; and in 1489 he was sent as lecturer to the Dominican monastery of San Marco in Florence.

He taught first in his cell, then in the garden of the cloister, finally in the cathedral; and immense audiences thronged to hear him expound the Revelation. "Your sins make me a prophet," he said to them; and from the depths of that stirring, brilliant, half-pagan life which the Medici had called for in Florence, he harangued up a stinging sense of its emptiness and desolation. The reformer began to work. A radical, doctrinal reform, however, as was achieved by Luther and Calvin, Savonarola never dreamed of; in all essential points he agreed with the traditional system of the Church of Rome. What he wanted was simply a moral regeneration of the church, hand in hand with a political regeneration of Italy, more especially of Florence. In 1491 he was elected prior of San Marco, and Lorenzo the Magnificent soon became aware of the strong fascination the prior exercised upon the people. But Lorenzo died, April 8, 1492; and his son Pietro had neither his sagacity nor his self-control. When in August, 1494, Charles VIII. of France crossed the Apennines at the head of a powerful army, Savonarola believed that the moment for a political action had come. The Medici were expelled from the city, and the re-organization of the state afterwards was intrusted to him. He seemed to succeed. With the new constitution a new spirit awakened. Love to Christ seemed to have become the predominant impulse. Deadly foes fell upon each other's bosoms. Property illegally held was given up. All profane amusements ceased. The monasteries filled up. The churches were thronged. "Indeed," says a contemporary writer, "the people of Florence seem to have become fools from mere love of Christ."

It was the idea of Savonarola, with Florence as a basis, to push the reform farther through all Italy, and he consequently soon began to direct his attacks against the chief seat of the corruption, Rome. In 1492 the monster Alexander VI. had ascended the Papal throne. He was afraid of the preacher, and offered him the archbishopric of Florence and a cardinal's hat, if he would keep silent; but the offer was declined. Then he changed tone, and summoned the reformer to Rome to defend himself; but the summons was not obeyed. Finally, in the fall of 1496, he issued a brief, forbidding, under penalty of excommunication, the prior of San Marco to stay in Florence; but the Medici had undertaken to release the preacher without any authorization from the church. But Savonarola entered the pulpit with the Papal brief in his hand, and demonstrated, by a singular train of reasoning, that it cause not, from the Pope, but from the Devil. Meanwhile, political affairs began to give trouble. The campaign of Charles VIII. proved a failure. Famine and the plague visited Florence. In 1497, in the jealousy of the Franciscans broke out into open opposition. The intrigues of the banished Medici became more and more active, and a reaction set in against the popular enthusiasm for the reformer. Alexander VI. was not slow in utilizing these difficulties. In May, 1497, he formally excommunicated Savonarola; in October of the same year he forbade all Christians to hold any kind of conversation with him; and in 1498 to the end of the year he threatened to lay the interdict on the city, unless the people delivered up the seducer.

In this critical moment Savonarola challenged an ordeal. Standing on the balcony of the cathedral, with the host between his hands, he asked God to destroy him by fire, if he had preached or prophesied lies. A Franciscan monk accepted the challenge. Savonarola hesitated, but was pressed onwards by the enthusiasm of his party. On April 7, 1498, the ordeal was destined to take place. Two pyres were formed in the marketplace. They were even lighted, when a quarrel between the Franciscans and Dominicans, whether the combatsants should carry the cross or the host through the fire, caused some delay. A rain-storm, in the mean time, put out the fires; and the whole disappointment of the frenzied multitude of spectators fell upon Savonarola. From that moment he completely lost his power over the people, and even became an object of pity and contempt. Arrested by his enemies, and put to the torture, he confessed whatever he was demanded to confess; and, though he afterwards retracted, he was by the Papal commissioners condemned as a heretic, and surrendered to the civil authorities for punishment. He was then led, in the form of a cross,—together with two of his most zealous adherents. The Dominican order, however, has since taken great pains to have him canonized. He left several works in Latin and Italian. The treatise on Ps. li., which he wrote during his imprisonment, was republished by Luther in 1523. Of special interest for his own life is his Oration Pro Rege, written in 1495. His principal theological work is his Triunfo della Croce, a defense of Christianity against the sceptical tendencies of the Medicean epoch, written in 1497 (English Translation, Triumph of the Cross, London, 1898). In 1498 a bust of Savonarola was placed in the Hall of the Five Hundred at Florence.

SCALIGER, Joseph Justus, b. at Agen, on the Garonne, Aug. 4, 1540; d. at Leyden, Jan. 21, 1609. He studied in Paris, and was in 1592 appointed professor at Leyden. He was the most learned man of his age, understood thirteen languages, and was well versed not only in philology and history, but also in philosophy, theology, jurisprudence, mathematics, etc. Most of his writings are philological; but his Theesaurus temporum (Amsterdam, 1638), the first system of chronology ever formed, and his Expositio numismatia Constantini (Leyden, 1604), have considerable interest to the historian.

SCAPEGOAT. See Atonement, Day of.

SCAPULARY (from the Latin scapula, the "shoulder-blade") means a narrow shoulder-band, of various colors, and adorned with a picture of the Virgin, or a cross, which is worn by several monastic orders and religious fraternities of the Roman-Catholic Church. As a piece of dress it has no particular purpose, but it is believed to be a preservative against death by water or fire. According to the bull Sabbatina the Virgin has personally promised Pope John XXII, that any one who wears a scapulary with her image shall be delivered from purgatory on the first Saturday after death.

SCHADE, Georg, b. at Apenrade in Sleswick, May 8, 1711; d. at Kiel in Holstein, April 10, 1778. He was an artist and Bishop in Aken, Holstein, when in 1760 he published in Berlin and Leipzig Die unerziehbare und ewige Religion, in which he gave strict mathematical evidence that metaphysics was the only true theoretical, and morals the only true practical, religion. Immediately after appeared a refutation of that book by Rosenstaud Goisce, professor at the university of Copenhagen; but the refutation was evidently a mere trick by which to draw attention to the book. Frederik V. of Denmark, to whose dominion Holstein at that time belonged, did not reissue the joke, however, but put the author in Christiansøe, the Danish Bastille, from which he was not released until 1775, under Christian VII., when he was allowed to settle as an advocate at Kiel. See J. A. Bolen: Historische Kirchen-Nachrichten von der Stadt Altona, which also contains a full list of Schade's writings.

SCHADE, Johann Caspar, b. at Kühndorf in 1806; d. in Berlin, July 25, 1898. He studied at Leipzig, where he became an intimate friend of Franks; and was in 1890 appointed preacher at the Church of St. Nicholas, in Berlin, where Spener was provost. In 1897 he published Praeze des Beichtstuhls und Abendmahls, which occasioned a rescript from the government, according to which, private confession ceased to be obligatory in the Prussian Church.

SCHAUFFER, Charles Frederick, D.D., b. Sept. 3, 1807; d. Nov. 23, 1880; an eminent theologian of the Lutheran Church, son of Frederick David Schaeffer, D.D., pastor in Philadelphia; was a graduate of Pennsylvania University; pursued his theological studies under his father and the Rev. Dr. Deiume; served, 1832 to 1855, congregations at Carlisle, Hagerstown, Red Hook (N.Y.), Easton (Penn.). From 1840 to 1845 he had charge of a professorship in the theological seminary, Columbus, O.; was in 1855 called to the German professorship in Pennsylvania College, and in the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Penn., and in 1864 to the chair of dogmatic theology in the newly established theological Lutheran seminary at Philadelphia, where he conscientiously performed his duties until 1870. He was a representative of the strictly conservative tendency, adhering to the symbols of the Lutheran Church according to their original meaning. Of his solid scholarship his publications bear witness,—historical, homiletical, and doctrinal articles in the Gettysburg Evangelical Review; translation of Leck's Commentary on the Acts, in Schaff's edition of Lange's Bible-work; translations of John Arnd's True Christianity, and of H. Kirtz's Sacred History.

SCHALL, Johann Adam, b. at Cologne, 1591; d. in China, Aug. 15, 1666. He was educated in the Collegium Germanum in Rome; entered the order of the Jesuits, and was in 1628 sent as a missionary to China, where he remained to his death. He acquired the confidence of the Chinese Government (which proved of great advantage to the mission), and translated into Chinese many mathematical treatises, interlarded with religious and Christian discussions. He also wrote Historia missionis Societatis Jesu apud Chinenses, Vienna, 1865, and Ratisbon, 1872.

SCHAUFLER, William Gottlieb, D.D., LL.D., missionary and Bible-translation officer at Stuttgart, Wurtemburg, Germany, Aug. 22, 1798; d. in New York City, Friday, Jan. 26, 1883. In 1804 his father removed to Odessa, South Russia. At fifteen he was confirmed in the Lutheran Church; at twenty-two, converted. He then determined to be a missionary. But his educational advantages had been small, though diligently improved, and the way seemed hedged up. But in 1826 he met the famous missionary, Joseph Wolff, who took him to Constantinople, there to be fitted for missionary labors; and from there he went to Smyrna, where Jonas King induced him to go to America. For five years he studied at Andover, became an American citizen, and then, under the care of the American Board, went to Constantinople (1831), where, with the exception of a few years spent elsewhere, he resided and laboried. He was particularly interested in the conversion of the Jews, for his benefactors intended the publication of the Old Testament, in Hebrew-Spanish, at Vienna, 1839-42. But his great work was the translation of the whole Bible into Osmanli-Turkish, the language of the educated Turks. This occupied him eighteen years. In 1867 Halle gave him the degree of D.D., in express acknowledgment of this work. In 1861 his peace-making between two high dignitaries at Constantinople was acknowledged by a decoration sent him by King William of Prussia. In 1877 he was made a doctor of laws by Princeton College. He was a remarkable linguist, being familiar with some nineteen languages, and able to preach extemporaneously in six (German, Italian, French, English, Spanish, and Turkish). He published Meditations on the Last Days of Christ (Boston, 1837, several editions). His principal writings are, Idea of a Philosophy of Nature, 1797; Of the World-Soul, etc., 1798; System of Transcendental Idealism, 1800; Lectures on the Method of Academical Study, 1808; Philosophical Inquiries concerning the Nature of Human Freedom, 1809; Lectures on Mythology and Revelation, in his complete Works, published after his death.

II. Schelling's Doctrine in its Gradual Development. 1. Schelling as a Follower of Fichte. — Schelling, in whose philosophy two great periods may be distinguished, cannot be fully understood without a precise knowledge of the preceding philosophers; and, because his first philosophical endeavors are based entirely on the ground of Kant-Fichte's idealism, it is necessary to sketch this in a few lines. Kant, who calls his own philosophy "criticism," had by a thorough scrutiny of our faculty of knowledge come to the conclusion that our knowledge of the world exterior to us is merely subjective, that we never know the "things in themselves," but only through the forms of space and time which we add to them as the only medium of our perception. But, while our faculty of knowledge is thus very limited in regard to objects of experience, we enjoy a realm of freedom as moral beings. Pure practical reason has therefore the primacy over the speculative reason. On our moral consciousness only, our conception of freedom, of immortality, and of the existence of God rests. Ancient theism was thus the result of Kant's doctrine.

This idealism was carried to its utmost consequences by Fichte. He accepts the critical result of Kant, that the Ego is theoretically limited in regard to the object as the Non-Ego. But this Non-Ego has no reality without us: it is, as well as the forms (space and time) by which we perceive it, the result of the activity of the Ego, the activity of an unconscious intuition. This creative Ego is not the individual, but the absolute Ego. The Non-Ego is therefore the same with the Ego, which is thus not limited by an outward reality, but by itself. Yet every limit is a contradiction to the infinite nature of the Ego, its independent, free activity; and so an infinite striving at every hindrance is revealed to us. This striving is the natural and human nature, consists; and the antithesis of both — the limited theoretical and the infinite practical reason — constitutes the empirical Ego, the individual. This, however, could not be understood if the true nature of the Ego was not absolute activity. Under the ground of all actions of the individual lies the activity of the absolute Ego, in which both subject and object are yet one. This pure, absolute Ego may only be comprehended by an intellelectual intuition. It is, according to Fichte, the highest principle of philosophy, the moral order of the world, without personality and self-consciousness. — God. And this, the absolute, he made his point of departure in his later speculations.

With the enthusiasm of youth, Schelling accepted this ethical Pantheism in the earliest period of his thinking; but very soon we see him taking his own ways.

2. Schelling’s “Philosophy of Nature” and “Transcendental Idealism,” 1796–1800. — It is in this period that Schelling creates a new epoch in German philosophy, a new form of dogmatism with a creative knowledge, instead of the critical one of Kant-Fichte. To Schelling’s rich mind, open to the impressions of nature, it could not remain concealed that nature took only a subordinate position in Fichte’s system, — the position of an ethical medium of the individual. The great new thought which Schelling introduced now was this, that nature is a form of the revelation of the absolute Ego as well as intelligence. Nature is visible mind, and mind is invisible nature. The highest end of Nature (i.e., to reflect herself) is manifested through all nature, that is reached only in man, where she becomes wholly objective to herself. Philosophical reasoning can therefore not be resolved with nature: it is driven to the other pole of the absolute, — to Ego, the intelligence. In his System of Transcendental Idealism, Schelling tries to give a history of the Ego, or the development of self-consciousness. Similar to that process of nature, to come to self-consciousness, there are different stages of development in the life of the Ego, the highest of which is art.

Here the harmony of the conscious and unconscious is reached, and the Ego comes to the highest intuition.

The absolute identity of subject and object, which Schelling found embodied in the works of art, begins now to be the starting-point of his thinking.

3. The Period of the System of Identity. — At the head of this system he places the notion of the absolute, and defines it as absolute reason, the total indifference of subject and object. The highest law of its existence is absolute identity (A = A). Everything that exists is this absolute itself; nothing exists outside of it; and so it is the universe itself, not the cause of it. As both subject and object are contained in the absolute, and the absolute must posit itself as subject and object, there may be a preponderance of either the subject or of the object, although the absolute will always be contained in both of them. In this way he obtains mind on one side, nature on the other: the different stadia of mind and nature are potencies of the subject-object.

It is in this period, and especially in his Lectures on Transcendental Philosophy (1800) without the possibility of being (actus purus), and absolute free being, which is neither of the two, but their unity, i.e., subject-object. Yet these three forms of being are not being (Sein) itself: they are only attributes of the general being, which is one, or the absolute Spirit.

This absolute Spirit, which has the freedom of existing outside of himself, reveals himself, according to his three potencies, in the world, as causa materialis, causa efficit, and causa finalis of nature, which found its bloom in Greek religion and poetry; the period of fate, at the end of the ancient world; and the period of providence, which entered with Christianity. God became objective for the first time in Christ. This incarnation is not a temporal, but an eternal act. Christ sacrifices in his person the finite to enable by this the coming of the Spirit as the light of a new world. By speculative knowledge alone, Schelling expects a regeneration of esoteric Christianity and the proclamation of the absolute gospel.

Thoughts similar to these are expressed in the essay on Philosophy and Religion (1804). This and his Philosophical Inquiries concerning Human Freedom show us,

4. Schelling in the Transition to his Later Doctrine, which is characterized by his inclination to theosophic speculation and the influence of Christian mysticism, especially of Jacob Böhme.

Kant-Fichte’s idealism had, according to Schelling, not given a sufficient notion of freedom, because it lacked the basis of realism. Such a realism is contained in his philosophy; because he distinguishes in God a basis, the nature in God, in which all beings, and therefore man also, have their cause. This nature in God, a dark, blind will, is an eternal yearning to produce itself, and rests also at the ground of our existence. But God produces in himself a perception of himself, which is understanding, the expression of that yearning. Both together, eternal yearning and understanding, are then in God that loving, almighty will which creates all things. In man we find both principles united, — the principle of nature, and the principle of light and understanding. As a part of that dark will, he has a will of his own: as gifted with understanding, he is an organ of the universal will. The separation of both principles is the possibility of good and evil, which presupposes human freedom. The predominance of man’s particular will is the evil. The decision of man for the evil is an act, but an eternal act, because it was done before time. Only through God can the particular and the universal will be united again. And it is done by revelation, or by God’s adopting of man’s nature.

The philosophy of religion, which Schelling has given here in broad outlines, is finally completed in —

5. Schelling’s Later Doctrine. — Schelling begins with a distinction of negative and positive philosophy. As negative philosophy he describes the philosophy of Hegel, which is unable to give us a full knowledge of reality.

Because it is the desire of human reason, as well as the object of true philosophy, to find the absolute Being, and because Schelling wants to obtain the notion of an absolute Spirit, he distinguishes three potencies in the divine essence, — the possibility of being (Sein-Können), pure being (reiner Sein), and absolute free being, which is neither of the two, but their unity, i.e., subject-object. Yet these three forms of being are not being (Sein) itself: they are only attributes of the general being, which is one, or the absolute Spirit.
the world. Only through creation, which is an act of his will, not of his nature, God comes to a full knowledge of himself.

Schelling believes that his notion of God is also the original notion of monothelism; and, based upon his theory of the three potencies in God, he develops also the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The three persons of the Trinity, who proceed from the potencies by a theocratic process, are, the Father as the creator, who gives matter to the creatures; the Son, begotten of the Father, who contributes the forms; and the Spirit, who is the completion of creation. But only at the end of creation Son and Spirit become perfect personalities, yet both are in God, so that we have only one God in three personalities.

In man, as the image of God, we have the same three potencies and a similar freedom, which may separate the harmony of the potencies. The separation of the potencies has become actual in the fall of man. In order to restore the harmony, and to bring the fallen world and man back to the church of the future.

It is impossible to follow Schelling here into his elaborate construction of mythology, which is rich in deep and grand thoughts. Revelation finally broke through mythology, as it appears even in the Old Testament, by Christ's incarnation. The person of Christ is the centre of Christianity. Here the second potency divests itself of the "form of God," which it had in the mythologic consciousness (Phil. ii. 6-8), and becomes man, suffers and dies, not only to bring freedom to men, but to become by obedience one with the Father (1 Cor. xvi. 28).

Schelling closes his philosophy with a glance at the history of the church. He distinguishes three great periods, and names them after the characters and names of the three apostles,— The Pauline Period, or Catholicism; The Trinitarian Period, or Protestantism; and The Johannine Period, or the church of the future.

[While Schelling stands, on one side, in the most intimate connection with the great poetic and philosophical movements of the last century; while especially his earlier philosophy is but a philosophic expression of that yearning to comprehend the absolute as it appears all in Goethe's Faust, and while his system is the highest glorification of genius as celebrated by the romantic school,—we have on the other side, in Schelling's later philosophy, the greatest endeavor of modern philosophy to construct the system of Christian doctrine. His thoughts have had great influence upon modern German theology (and upon Coleridge), especially his idea of the three ages of church history. His philosophy is an illustration of his own saying, "The German nation arrives with her white nature after religion, but, according to her peculiarity, after a religion which is connected with knowledge, and based upon science."]

SCHELING, Samuel, b. at Pansh Lissa, March 8, 1847; d. at Dantzig, Aug. 17, 1861. After a course of theological study at Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Dantzig in 1875. In the great Pietist controversy he sided with the orthodox Lutherans, and published a great number of violent polemical tracts, in which he actually treated Spener as a heretic. The most important are Catechismus-Rei nigung (Danzig, 1694), Synopsis controversiarum (Danzig, 1701), De Novatianismo (1702), Manducius ad August. Confess (1711), and Mon. ad Form. Concord. (1712).

SCHEM, Alexander Jacob, b. in Wiedenbrück, Westphalia, March 16, 1826; d. at West Hoboken, N.J., May 21, 1881. He studied philosophy and theology at Bonn and Tübingen, 1843-46; was a priest of the Roman Church, but became a Protestant and emigrated to America, 1851; did literary work, and taught ancient and modern languages; was professor of the same at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn., 1854-60; was regular contributor to Appleton's New American Cyclopaedia from 1859 to 1863; to the Annual Cyclopaedia, in the foreign and religious departments, from its first number (1861) to 1872; and to McClintock and Strong's Cyclopaedia, 1867-81; foreign editor of the Tribune (newspaper), 1884-85; editor of the Deutsch-amerikanisches Conversations-Lexicon, 1869-74, 12 vols.; assistant superintendent of public schools, New-York City, 1874 till his death; with Henry Kidde edited a Cyclopaedia of Education, 1877, and the supplements, Year-Book of Education, 1878 and 1879. He also published the American Ecclesiastical Year-Book, 1860, and an Ecclesiastical Almanac, 1868 and 1869.

SCHINNER, Matthäus, b. at Mullbach, in the canton of Vaud in Switzerland, in 1470; d. in Rome, Oct. 2, 1522. He was educated at Zurich and Como, and became bishop of Sitten in 1509. Employed by Pope Leo X. in Swiss politics, he was very successful in bringing about an alliance between the Pope and the Union against France, and received as a reward the cardinal's hat, in 1511. In 1514 he went as legatus a latere to England to stir up a war between Henry VIII. and Francis I., and the latter acknowledged that Schinner had been one of his worst enemies, not only in the diplomatic, but also on the battle field. Zwingli's works give several striking descriptions of the great impression the cardinal... made on the soldiers. When the Reformation broke out in Switzerland, he seemed to be in perfect harmony with the movement. He offered Luther a place of refuge and support in 1519, and continued for a long time to befriend Zwingli. But his close connection with the Church of Rome, and worldly regards, at last got the better of him, and placed him in the hands of the Reformation. When Faber met him in Rome in 1521, he agreed with him that the Reformation should be put down by force. CARL PESTALOZZI.

SCHISM, from the Greek oixia, has, according to canon law, a double sense: one, more general, simply denoting a deviation from the orthodox church, with respect to organization or discipline, such as the schisms caused by Felicissimus, Novatian, Meletius, and others; and one more special, denoting a split in the highest authority of the church, such as the great Papal schism, 1378-1417. See Urban VI., Boniface IX., Benedict XIII., etc., and the Council of Constance.

SCHLATTER, Michael, missionary, and founder of the synod of the German-Reformed Church in the United States; was b. of a respectable family in St. Gall, Switzerland, June 14, 1716; arrived in Philadelphia, October, 1790. He studied in the gymnasium of his native town, and probably also at Helmstadt; was for some time a teacher in Holland, where he was ordained to the ministry; and in 1745 was assistant minister at Wigoldingen, in his native country. In 1748 he was commissioned by the deputies of the synod of North and South Holland a missionary to the destitute German churches of Pennsylvania, with special directions to visit the scattered settlements, to organize pastoral charges, and, if possible, to form a coetus, or synod.

Schlatter arrived in America on the lst of August, 1746. Before the end of the year he was called to the pastorate of the Reformed Church of Philadelphia. Though he accepted the call, he continued to prosecute his special mission with energy, and he turned against the Reformation. From the beginning of 1751 he travelled, as he informs us in his Journal, a distance of not less than eight thousand miles,—not reckoning his passage across the ocean,—and preached six hundred and thirty-five times. According to his own estimate, there were at this time thirty thousand German Reformed people in Pennsylvania, with fifty-three small churches, and only four settled pastors. Schlatter formed the churches into pastoral charges; and on the 20th of September, 1747, the pastors and delegates elders met, at his instance, in Philadelphia, and organized the German-Reformed coetus, or synod.

In 1751 Schlatter went to Europe, at the request of the coetus, to solicit aid for the destitute German-Reformed churches of America. He was very successful in Switzerland, and, where a full coetus was established from which the churches received much assistance. In 1752 he returned to America, accompanied by six young ministers. He brought with him seven hundred large Bibles for distribution to churches and families.

While Schlatter was in Europe, he published, in Dutch, a Journal of his missionary labors, containing a tender appeal in behalf of the Germans in America. It was translated into German, and published in Fresenii Pastoral Nachrichten, and also separately. Rev. David Thomson, English minister in Amsterdam, translated the book into English, and became the chief promoter in England of a movement for the establishment of schools among the Germans in America. A large sum of money (Muhlenberg says twenty thousand pounds sterling) was collected for this purpose, and placed in the hands of a Society for the Promotion of the Knowledge of God among the Germans. Unfortunately, in the effort to enlist sympathy, the picture of German destitution was greatly overstated, and the Germans were represented in a manner that could not fail to be painful to a high-spirited people. In 1755 Schlatter was induced to resign his church in Philadelphia, and to become superintendent of the proposed "charity schools." This was a mistake; for by this time the movement had to some extent become political. An attempt was made to use the "charity" as a means of breaking the tacit alliance which had hitherto subsisted between the Quakers and the Germans, and of inducing the latter to support the favorite measures of the government party. Christopher Sauer, the celebrated German printer, exerted himself in an appeal to the "charity schools," which, he claimed, were intended to prepare the way for an established church. The Lutheran and Reformed ministers for a while supported Schlatter in his work; but at last the popular feeling of opposition became irresistible, and the undertaking proved an utter failure. The manner in which the charity was offered had caused it to be regarded as an insert. Seidensticker says, "Schlatter's failure was due to his connection with the cause after it had assumed this unfortunate complexion. If the affair had remained on the basis on which he had with honest zeal and decided success originally placed it, the history of these schools would have been very different."

On the failure of the school-movement, Schlatter, in 1757, accompanied an expedition to Nova Scotia against the French, as chaplain of the Royal American regiment, and was present at the taking of Louisburg. He subsequently lived in retirement at Chestnut Hill, near Philadelphia. During the American Revolution he was an earnest patriot, and was for some time imprisoned for refusing to resume his position of chaplain in the British army.

SCHLEIERMACHER, Friedrich Daniel Ernst, b. in Breslau, Nov. 21, 1768; d. in Berlin, Feb. 12, 1834.

I. Life.—Schleiermacher's father was chaplain of a Prussian regiment in Silesia, and belonged to the Reformed communion. To his mother, a very intelligent and pious woman (as her few letters embodied in Schleiermacher's correspondence abundantly prove), he confesses himself mainly indebted for his early training, his father being frequently absent on professional journeys. Subsequently the family removed to the country, where he lived from his tenth to his fourteenth year, mostly under the instruction of his parents.
and of a teacher who first inspired him with enthusiasm for classical literature. At that time he had already commenced the struggle against a "strange scepticism," which he calls a "peculiar thorn in the flesh," and which made him doubt the genuineness of all the ancient writings. In 1785 his parents sent him, his brother, and sister, to an excellent Moravian school at Niesky in Upper Lusatia. Two years afterward he entered the Moravian college at Barby. The childlike piety, the wise mixture of instruction and amusement, and the rural quietness of these institutions, made a deep and lasting impression on his mind. He ever remembered that time with gratitude, and kept up a familiar intercourse with the society through his sister Charlotte (who had become one of its regular members), and through his intimate friend and classmate, Von Albertini, of the Grisons, subsequently bishop of the fraternity, and a distinguished hymn-writer. The type of Moravian Christianity can be clearly traced in his enthusiastic personal devotion to the Saviour, and in the strongly christological character of his dogmatic system. In his Wendscher Feier, 1801 (an imitation of the Platonic Symposium), Christ appears as the living centre of all faith and true religion. But his constitutional scepticism seriously tormented him, and led to a temporary rupture with his teachers, and even with his father. The correspondence between them is highly honorable to both. With all his filial reverence and affection, the son refused to yield to mere authority, and insisted on his right of private judgment and personal investigation. The father learned to respect the manly independence and earnest mental struggles of the son. Both were at last fully reconciled. With the consent of his father, he left Barby, and entered the university of Halle in 1787. His studies were rather fragmentary. He attended the lectures of Semler, the father of German theology, and of Wolff, the celebrated German scholar, studied modern languages and mathematics, and read the philosophical works of Spinoza, Kant, Fichte, and Jacobi. His mind was very impressionable, yet too independent to follow any one teacher or system. The age was thoroughly rationalistic, and German theology was then undergoing a revolution as radical as the political revolution of France. He left the university, after a two-years' course, without a fixed system of religious opinions, yet with the hope of "attaining, by earnest research, and patient examination of all the witnesses, to a reasonable degree of certainty, and to a knowledge of the boundaries of human science and learning." In 1790 he passed the examination for licensure, and accepted a situation as private tutor in the family of Count Dohna, where he spent three years. In 1794 he was ordained to the ministry, and became assistant to his uncle, a superannuated clergyman at Landsberg on the Warta. In 1796 he was appointed chaplain at the Charité (hospital) in Berlin, and continued in this position till 1802. During these six years he moved mostly in literary circles, and identified himself temporarily with the so-called romantic school of poetry as represented by Friedrich and Wilhelm Schlegel, Tieck, and Novalis. In 1799 he published his first important work, the Dis-
He was free from all sectarian bigotry. "Christ," he said, "is the quickening centre of the church. From him comes all; to him all returns. We should, therefore, not call ourselves Lutherans, or Reformed, or Catholic, but Christians, what we really are, after his name and his holy gospel." He favored the introduction of the Presbyterian form of government. He was one of the compilers of the new Berlin hymn-book (1829), which, with all its defects, opened the way for a hymnological reform. Notwithstanding this extraordinary activity, he mingled freely in society, and was the centre of a large number of friends at his fireside. Many of his witty sayings and charades, in verse and prose, were transmitted by oral tradition in Berlin, and are still remembered.

In the beginning of February, 1834, he was seized by a severe cold, which fell on his lungs, and in a few days terminated in death. In his last hours he summoned his family around his bed, and with clear consciousness and calm serenity confessed his implicit faith in Christ his Saviour, and in the atoning efficacy of his death. It was a worthy close of his religious career, which began in the close of his religious career, which began in the

The funeral-orations of Steffens (a Christian philosopher), Strauss (his colleague and court-chaplain), and Marbeineke (a speculative theologian of the Hegelian school, and his antagonist), gave public expression to the universal esteem and regret. His literary remains were intrusted to his friend and pupil, Dr. Jonas. He lost his only son, Nathanael, in his early youth; and the funeral-address which he himself delivered at the grave is one of his most remarkable and touching compositions. He bases there his hope of immortality solely on Christ as the resurrection and the life.

Schleiermacher was small of stature, and slightly deformed by a humpback; but his face was noble, earnest, sharply defined, and expressive of intelligence and kindly sympathy; his eye keen, piercing, and full of fire; his movements quick and animated. In his later years his white hair and freshness to the close. He had perfect composure. His philosophy and theology were seriously reasoned out from the Calvinistic election theory, by an expanding process from the particular to the general. His errors are as numerous as those of Origen white was bold and unerring in his criticism. He dissected historic documents with the sharpest knife, and sacrificed almost all the miracles of the Gospel history as unessential in its fullness, and from whom saving influences emanate from generation to generation, and from race to race. In this central idea lies Schleiermacher's chief merit in theology, and his salutary influence. He modestly declined the honor of being the founder of a school; and his best pupils, as Neander, Tweeten, Nitzsch, Lücke, Bleek, Ullmann, Julius Müller, went far beyond him in the direction of a positive evangelical creed. He was willing to decrease, that Christ might increase.

The works of Schleiermacher, including his posthumous publications, cover nearly all the departments of philosophy and theology,—ethics, dialectics, psychology, politics, aesthetics, pedagogy, dogmatics, Christian ethics, hermeneutics, bibiical criticism, life of Jesus (posthumous lectures, exceedingly unsatisfactory), church history (likewise posthumous, and almost worthless), and a large number of critical essays, and sermons. But the books which he published himself are by far the most finished and important, especially his masterly outline sketch of the course of theological study as an organic whole (1811), and his Christian Dogmatics (1821, 3d ed., 1835), which stands next to Calvin's Institutes as a masterpiece of theological genius. It is an original reconstruction of the evangelical system of faith on the basis of practical experience and the consciousness of absolute dependence on God: it is in matter independent of all philosophy, yet profoundly philosophical in dialectical method and conclusive reasoning. But more of this in the next section. We only add, that it is Protestant to the backbone, yet remarkably conciliatory in spirit and tone towards diverging types of Christianity. It reduces the differences between Catholicism and Protestantism to this formula: "Catholicism makes the relation of the believer to Christ to depend on his relation to the church; Protestantism makes the relation of the believer to the church to depend on his relation to Christ."

PHILIP SCHAFF.

III. Theology.—Schleiermacher's Reden über die Religion was a strong word spoken to his time, and it suited the moment. At every point except one the German spirit was rallying from that debility and barrenness into which it had sunk; in every direction except one the German mind was stirring with new issues: only religion seemed to have been entirely abandoned by the educated portion of the nation as a kind of self-contradiction. But the contradiction, the book said to its readers, between piety and culture, is a lie fabricated by people who know neither the one nor the other. That which they reverence as education is not education, but simply school-pedantry; and that which they despise as religion is not religion, but its shadow, its caricature. They consider religion as a means of maintaining social order, an instrument for the inoculation of good morals, an expression of a trite and vulgar view of human life and history. But religion is nothing. Religion is that feeling of the universe in which man discovers his own destination, that feeling of the infinite in which man discovers his own immortality, that feeling of the presence of a supreme power in which man discovers the existence of God, though he may still shrink from ascribing the forms of the human personality to that being. Religion is a part of human nature. Every organism has religion whether it knows it or not; and every one is compelled to recognize the truth of his religion, whether he will or not. So far the book is admirable. By its exposition of the true nature of religion it forces the reader out of his religious indifference. But then it undertakes an exposition of religion considered as an historical fact; for, although it admits that not every one may feel called upon to join one of the historically developed religions, development towards a positive form is, nevertheless, an inherent demand in the religious feeling. And here the question arises: Does this book really point in the direction of Christianity and the Christian church? It does, though not in the common sense of those words, nor in that in which the author later on came to use them, but when compared with the stand-point of the readers whom it addressed. When Schleiermacher wrote the preface to the third edition of the book, in 1821, he observed that there was at that moment more reason for addressing the bigoted than the indifferent.

To the Reden correspond the Monologen as their ethical complement. They are written in a more lyrical style, giving freer scope to a merely subjective path; and they have a somewhat lighter character, in spite of the profound researches they contain concerning human freedom.

From Schleiermacher's philosophy of religion, as developed in his Reden and Monologen, to his systematic representation of the positive doctrines of Christianity, a transition is formed by his crico-exegetical writings, and more especially by his famous little book, Kurze Darstellung des christlichen Glaubens, which he published himself are by far the most finished and important, especially his masterly outline essay concerning the religious feeling. 1531, by nine princes and eleven imperial cities of Germany, under the leadership of the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse, for the purpose of defending Protestantism. It was soon after joined by five other princes and ten imperial cities, and comprised, indeed, the whole of Northern Germany and a large part of Central and Southern Germany. The immediate effect of the formation of the league was the religious peace of Nuremberg in 1532; but it was evident to all that the emperor, Charles V., yielded, only because he was too occupied at that moment with France and the Turks to carry through his own views. The league acted in the beginning with considerable vigor. At a meeting on Dec. 24, 1535, it was determined to raise and maintain a standing army of ten thousand foot and two thousand cavalry; and at another meeting, on Feb. 15, 1537, a common confession, the so-called Articles of Schmalkald, was signed by all the members of the league. It was occasioned by the bull of Paul III., convoking a general council at Mantua, and is a vehement protest against the primacy of the Pope. It was drawn up by Luther, and became after SCMOLCK, Benjamin (more accurately SCMOLKE), one of the sweetest and most productive of the German hymn-writers; was b. in Brauchitschdorf, Liegnitz, Dec. 21, 1672; d. at Schweidnitz, Feb. 12, 1737. In 1696 he entered the university of Leipzig; four years later became his father's assistant as pastor; and in 1702 became co-pastor at Schweidnitz, and pastor primarius in 1714. The parish was a large one, and Schmolke's position was rendered difficult by the machinations of the Jesuits. His earnestness and sweetness of disposition, however, not only won the hearts of his parishioners, but disarmed the Jesuits. In 1733 he was oblige to collybolic infinities, induced by paralytic strokes, to forego active labor. Schmolke's hymns were published in small collections during his lifetime, and soon found a permanent place in German hym-books. They are pervaded by Christian piety and fervor, and are written in a simple and dignified style. They breathe a warm, personal love to Christ, and were written without effort. [The one best known in English is Mein Jesu, was du wilt, translated by Miss Jane Borthwick, "My Jesus, as thou wilt." She has also translated his fine lyric, "My God, I know that I must die." His Was Jesus thut das ist wohlgethan has been rendered by Sir H. W. Baker (1861), "What our Father does is well."

Schmolke's works appeared at Tübingen, 1740-44, in 2 vols. A selection from his hymns and prayers has been published by Crote (2d ed., Leipzig, 1869), to which is prefixed a good memoir.

DRIANDER.

SCMUCKER, Samuel Simon, D.D., an American Lutheran divine, son of Rev. J. G. Schmucker, D.D.; b. at Hagerstown, Md., Feb. 28, 1799; d. at Gettysburg, Penn., July 26, 1873. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1817, and at the Princeton theological seminary, and was admitted into the ministry by the Lutheran ministerium of Pennsylvania in 1820. He was pastor at New Market, Va., 1820-26. He took a leading part in the organization of the General Synod and of the theological seminary at Gettysburg, in 1828. He was chosen its first professor, and continued to be chairman of its faculty till 1864, when he retired from official activity. The degree of D.D. was given him in 1830, simultaneously by Rutgers College, New Jersey, and the University of Pennsylvania. In 1840 he visited Germany, in company with Drs. B. Kurtz and J. G. Morris, with the double purpose of establishing, if possible, some communication between the church there and the Lutherans in the United States, and of obtaining books for the library of the seminary.

His doctrinal teaching was marked by indifference to the differences of Lutheran, which he held to be non-fundamental, and by laying stress on the common doctrines and principles of Protestantism, which he called fundamental. He accepted substantially the Augsburg Confession, but disliked the Formula of Concord. His mind was strongly impressed with the importance of mutual recognition and cooperative union among the various Protestant denominations. By his Fraternal Appeal to the American churches, first published in 1838, and circulated in England as well as here, he aided in preparing the way for the organization of the Evangelical Alliance, and attended its first meeting in London, 1840.
Scholastic Theology is often identified with medieval theology, and placed over against patristic theology as the theology of the primitive church. It is undeniable, that, with the close of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century, Christian theology changed character; and it is perfectly correct to designate the period from that time, and down to the Reformation, as the theological middle ages. But it is, nevertheless, inadmissible to use the terms "scholasticism" and "medieval theology" as synonymous; for there is a most important difference between Isidore of Seville, Beda, Alcuin, Rhabanus Maurus, Paschasius Radbertus, and Scotus Erigena on the one side, and Anselm, Abelard, Peter the Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus on the other. Scholasticism forms only one period of the theology of the middle ages,—from the close of the eleventh century to the Reformation.

The teachers of the primitive church are justly called the Fathers (patres). They produced the dogmas. Through their manifold doctrinal controversies and discussions they unfolded and developed the whole contents of the Christian faith, and by the decisions of their great ecumenical councils they formulated and fixed the dogmas. But with the close of the sixth century the theological productivity ceased. The work was done. All the materials for the formation of a doctrinal system of Christianity were present.

No essential element of Christian faith was left undefined. Then there came a time,—the attempt at building up new state organizations on the ruin of the Roman Empire, the exertions of the Germanic Barbarians to adopt and assimilate the Romano-Christian civilization,—a time of confusion and chaos,—national, social, political,—during which it was the task of the theologian to gather together the doctrinal materials acquired, to sift them, to preserve the true, and to ignore the false. The scholastics of that time, the first period of medieval theology, from the seventh to the eleventh century,—a Cassiodorus, an Isidore of Seville, a Beda, an Alcuin,—are not men of creative genius, but of encyclopedic knowledge, compilers, though compilers of enormous industry and deep conscientiousness. But of course the materials could not be gathered and kept together in a merely mechanical way, without any trace of individual treatment; and towards the close of the period complaints are heard, that people put more faith in Boethius—that is, in dialectics, in philosophy—than in Holy Writ. Indeed, Scotus Erigena is often mentioned as the father of scholasticism; though he was a philosopher rather than a theologian, and though he lacks one of the essential characteristics of scholasticism,—recognition of the tradition of the church as absolute authority.

In reality scholasticism begins with the controversy between Berengar of Tours and Lanfranc; and Anselm is the first who fully represents its principles.

Scholastic theology is something more than a mere preservation, or arrangement, or application of the dogmas: it is an actual treatment. But the treatment is merely formal. New dogmas were not added. Even those which received a farther development under the hands of the schoolmen — such as the doctrine of the offices of Christ, or the doctrine of the sacraments — had been fully defined by the preceding ages, at least with respect to their fundamental outlines. Nor were the dogmas altered with respect to their essential contents. The problem which the schoolmen undertook to solve was simply to give each dogma a rational substructure sufficient to elevate it from a mere matter of faith to a matter of science, and to form the whole mass of dogmas into a consistent and harmonious totality, a system. They were not pa'tres: they were only doctores et magistri. The very name "scholasticism" shows the character of the movement. The dogma was transferred from the church to the school: the university became the hearth of scholasticism. A truly speculative conception of Christianity was not produced, however. "It may be that the schoolmen really hoped to create the Philosophy of Christianity; to demonstrate Christianity as rational, and the rational as Christian; to fuse faith and science, theology and philosophy perfectly together. But if so, they failed. The principles of their theology prevented them from succeeding, no less than the principles of their philosophy. Theologically, the schoolmen proceeded from the supposition that the whole contents of the Christian faith, that is, each single dogma, is absolute, divine truth; and the warrant for this supposition is sought for, not in the very essence of Christianity or in the inner nature of man, but in the authority of the Church and her tradition. The fault is here not the application of the principle of authority, but the external and superficial character of the authority appealed to. Of course, an attempt is made to demonstrate and prove the absolute and divine authority of the Church. tions arose,— of the true relation between reason and revelation, philosophy and theology, were acquainted with this Arabian philosophy through the Spanish Jews. At first the Aristotelian writings were looked upon with some suspicion. The heretical eccentricities of an Amalric of Bena or a David of Dinanto were referred back to them as their true source, and the Pope repeatedly forbade the study of them (1209, 1215, 1231). But the inner affinity between scholasticism and Aristotle conquered all opposition; and the influence of the renewed study of his works soon became visible on scholastic theology. The old questions of the true relation between reason and revelation, science and faith, philosophy and theology, were deeper put, and better answered; and new questions arose,— of the true nature of Christianity in comparison with other religions; of the true character of theology,— whether a science or not, whether a theoretical or a practical science, etc: Not only ethics, but also physics, was incorporated with the doctrinal system, so that the materials gradually swelled into immensity. The form was generally that of a commentary on the Sententiae, though sometimes, also, that of an independent summa, but in both cases the dialectical method was carried out in the minutest details, with its thesis et thesis, its pro et contra, its resolutio et conclusion, etc.

The first great representative of this the second departure of scholastic theology was Alexander of Hales (d. 1245); but he was completely eclipsed by Albert the Great (1193-1280), in whose works all the principal characteristics of the age are palpably present. By his enormous erudition, encompassing all sciences, he impressed people in general as a kind of magician; on account of his close imitation of Aristotle, he was by scholars often called simia Aristotelis ("the ape of Aristotle"). But, though he certainly lacked critical power, he was by no means without speculative ideas; and his definition of theology as a practical science, the science of God and his works, elaborated, not for the sake of knowledge, but for the sake of salvation, exercised a lasting influence.

The great controversy between Thomists and Scotists died out. With Duns Scotus (1260-1308) the great controversy between Thomists and Scotists broke out. Thomas Aquinas belonged to the Dominican order, Duns Scotus, to the Franciscan; and more than once the whole controversy between their adherents has been described as caused by mere jealousy and rivalry between their orders. It is true that it contributed nothing to the further development of scholastical theology; but the scientific discussion between Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus is, nevertheless, fundamental and decisive. Duns Scotus dissolved that unity between faith and science, between theology and philosophy, which was the pride of scholasticism; and in its stead he placed a positivism which has only to take one step in order to reach scepticism, — a step which Duns Scotus himself can justly be said to have taken by his peculiar quodlibet method, placing the pro and the contra over against each other without any mediation, and leaving the reader to make the decision for himself.

After Duns Scotus the decay of scholasticism begins, soon to end in complete dissolution. One of the reasons was the adoption of nominalism. Even Duns Scotus gave up the reigning realism, turning it into the so-called formalism. Durandus de Sancto Porciaco (d. 1334) abandoned it altogether, and adopted nominalism; and with Occam (1280-1347) the effects of this change of principle become visible. Realism,— the doctrine that the general ideas are really present in the individual things, universalia in re, — was indeed the bond between theology and philosophy. As soon as nominalism,— the doctrine that the universalia are merely the products of the human reason, nothing but forms of reasoning, voces, nominata,— became prevalent, and was actually carried through in the system, the band snapped, and theology and philosophy separated. From that time theology reigned alone, but it ceased to be a science: it became a mere commandment. The change is partly apparent in the writings of Occam. When he undermines the Christian dogmas from end to end by his logic, and then ostentatiously retires to the faith of the church; when from the doctrines of the church he draws logical inferences which directly run out into absurdity, or indirectly lead into self-contradictions; when he connects the most sublime ideas with scurrilous problems or ludicrous problems, — what is that all but friezvity? The invention of a double truth, or the axiom that something can be true in philosophy though it is false in religion, and vice versa, cannot be fastened on Occam, nor on any of the schoolmen in particular. Nevertheless, when Roman-Catholic historians and critics ascribe it to the anti-scholastic philosophers of the fifteenth century, and quote its condemnation by the Fifth Council of the Lateran (1513) as an argument, they are certainly mistaken: it was openly avowed and violently attacked already in the fourteenth century. At all events, it became the stumbling-block of scholasticism: for, however firmly and decidedly repudiated, it is a simple and natural consequence of nominalism; and, after Occam, nominalism reigned uninterruptedly in scholastic theology. It was the principle of Gabriel Biel (d. 1495), generally styled the last of the schoolmen, to DERER.

It may be defined as a string of notes made for the use of the school, and it occurs in that sense in the works of Cicero. He was wont to unfold his views to a small circle of friends: and the attempt to suppress their meetings as insidiously as they were openly avowed and violently attacked already in the fourteenth century. 1808. In 1751 he entered the university of Göttingen, where he came under the moulding influence of Mosheim and Michaelis. After spending several years in literary labors in connection with his uncle, Professor Karl Andreas Bell, at Leipzig, and in lecturing as docent until he was appointed professor in 1701, he left Leipzig to accept a call to the professorship of poetry at Wittenberg, from which he was transferred in 1711 to the chair of church history in 1715. He gave three lectures a day in his department, and to these labors added a rare diligence of authorship. He died in consequence of a fall from a step-ladder while he was reaching up for some books in his library. His great work, a monument of immense industry (Leipzig, 1703-15), was his Ausführliche Gesch. d. christl. Kirche (Complete History of the Christian Church), in 45 vols. The last two volumes of the ten upon the period since the Reformation were completed by Tzschirner. They cover the history of eighteen centuries. Other church historians have written in a better style, and have understood certain periods and movements more fully; but up to this time we have no other work covering such a long period, combining so many excellences. A handbook of church history (Historia eccles. et eccles. Christi adumbrata in usum lectorum) appeared in Berlin, 1777, passed through five editions (fifth, 1808) during the author's lifetime, and was issued by Marheinecke for the seventh time, 1828. He also prepared the Allgemeine Biograph, 1767-91, 8 vols. See K. L. Nitzsch : Ueber J. M. Schröck's Studienweise u. Maximen, Weimar, 1809; Tzschirner: Ueber Johann M. SCHULTENS, Albert, the father of modern Hebrew grammar; was b. at Gröningen, in 1686, and early destined to a theological career. He studied the original languages of the Bible, Hebrew and Greek, with which he afterwards combined the study of Chaldee, Syriac, and Rabbinic. The first-fruits of these studies was a period during which he labored without compensation, when only eighteen years of age, and in which he maintained that the Arabic is indispensably necessary to a knowledge of Hebrew. After completing his studies, he visited Leyden and Utrecht, and became acquainted with Reland, who edited his Animadversiones Philologicae in Jobum, Utrecht, 1708. In the year 1709 he was promoted as doc tor of theology, and in 1711 he took charge of the pastorate at Wassenae, which, however, he soon exchanged for the chair of Oriental languages at the academy in Franeker. In 1729 he was called to the theological seminary at Leyden, and died there Jan. 26, 1750.

The services which Schultens rendered to philology are of great value. He was the first to overturn the notion that Hebrew is the original language given to man by God, and showed that the Hebrew was nothing but a branch of the Semitic stem, and that Arabic was an indispensable means for the understanding of the Hebrew. Thus he opened a new path in Hebrew grammar and biblical exegesis, advancing at the same time the study of Oriental languages. Of his works which pertain to Hebrew grammar and biblical literature, we mention, Origines Hebraicae, etc., Franeker, 1724-28, 2 vols., and a preliminary work, De Defectibus Hodierne Linguæ Hebraæ, Franeker 1731 (new edition of both works, Ley den, 1761); Institutiones ad fundamenta linguæ Hebraico, etc., Leyden, 1737, 1756; Vetus et regia via Hebraizandi, etc., Leyden, 1738 (a rejoinder to his opponents, which he carries further in Excur sus ad capitum primam veteris et regii, Hebraizandi, etc., Leyden, 1750); Liber Jobicum nova versione, Leyden, 1738, 2 vols. Origines et adiutaries Canonicæ, etc., Leyden, 1748, an abridgment of which was published by G. J. L. Vogel, Halle, 1780. Ten separately printed dissertations and addresses were collected and published by his son, in Opera minora, etc., Halle, 1769. In manuscript he left commentaries on different books of the Old Testament, a Hebrew lexicon, and an Aramean grammar. Comp. SCHWARTZ, Christian Friedrich, b. at Sonnenburg, Prussia, Oct. 26, 1726; d. at Tanjore, Feb. 13, 1798; one of the most energetic and successful missionaries of the eighteenth century. While he studied theology at Halle and Marburg, having made himself master of the Tamil language, he was sent as missionary to Tranquebar in 1750 by the Danish Missionary Society in Copenhagen. Having entered the service of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in London, in 1777, his station was in 1779 removed to Tanjore, where he remained to his death. He founded many congregations among the natives, exercised a most beneficial influence during the war of Hyder Ali, and contributed much to make the name and character of Europe respected and trusted in India. See Pearson: Memoirs of C. F. Schwartz, 1834; J. F. Fenn: Geschichte der trankebar. Mission, Gramm, 1845. H. GUNDERT.

SCHWARTZ, Friedrich Heinrich Christian, b. at Giessen, May 30, 1700; d. at Heidelberg, April 3, 1807. He studied theology in his native city, and held several pastoral offices at Frankfort, and in 1804 appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg. He took a great interest in pedagogy, founded prosperous educational institutions, and published in 1833 his Lehrbuch der Erziehungs- und Unterrichts-lehre (3 vols.), which, containing an elaborate history of pedagogy, still is a standard work on the subject.

SCHWEBEL, Johann, b. at Pförtschheim in Baden, 1490; d. at Zweibrücken, May 10, 1540. He was educated in the school of his native city, a celebrated institution; entered the order of the Holy Spirit, and was ordained a priest in 1514, but embraced the Reformation, left the order in 1519, began to preach evangelical truths, and was in 1522 compelled to flee, and seek refuge with Franz von Sickingen. In the following year he settled at Zweibrücken in the Palatinate, and remained for the rest of his life, active in introducing the Reformation. His Latin writings appeared at Zweibrücken, in two volumes, 1505-97; his German, also in two volumes, in 1508.

SCHWEBEL, Albert, the most distinguished representative of the Tubingen school next to Baur; was b. at Michelbach, Würtemberg, Feb. 10, 1819; d. at Tübingen, Jan. 5, 1877; studied at the seminaries of Schönthal and Tübingen; devoted himself especially to the study of church history; was for nearly a year pastor at Bebenhausen; became docent in philosophy at Tubingen 1843, professor of Roman literature and antiquities in 1848, and shortly before his death professor of ancient history. He distinguished himself greatly at the university, and studied with zeal the Hegelian philosophy. In 1841 appeared his Monarchism and the Christian Church in the Second Century (Der Montanismus u. d. christliche Kirche d. 2. Jahrhund.). Through Strauss' Leben Jesu and other studies he found himself at variance with the teachings of the church, and in 1846 published (at Tubingen) his Post-Apostolic Age (D. nachapost. Zeitalter). It was written in six months, and exaggerates the Baur hypothesis of the early church, and dislocates the origin of the writings of the New Testament. The work asserts that early Christianity was pure Ebionism, and builds up the history of the early church on this foundation. The author had already declared himself for this theory in his work on Montanism. In 1847 Schwägerl edited The Clementine Homilies, and in 1852 Eusebius, and published a translation and exposition of Aristotle's Metaphysics (Ubersetzung und Erläuterung der aristot. Metaphysik), 1847; A History of Philosophy, 1848, [11th ed., 1892, Eng. trans. by J. H. Seeley, New York, and Stirling, London, 1872, etc.;] and a History of Rome, 3 vols., 1853–58.

SCHYN, Hermannus, b. in Amsterdam, 1662; d. there 1727. He studied medicine at Leyden and Utrecht, and began to practise at Rotterdam, but was drawn to the study of theology, and became in 1690 preacher to the Mennonites in Rotterdam, and in 1690 to the Doopsgezenden in Amsterdam. He published sermons and other edificatory writings; but his principal work is his Historia Mononitarum (Amst., 1723, 2 vols.), not a complete or pragmatic history of the movement, yet rich in valuable information. SCOTCH CONFessions. The Confession was re-adopted, and the Reformed Kirk of Scotland formally acknowledged by the civil government till the revolution of 1568; but it was practically superseded by the Westminster Confession, which is more logical and complete, and was adopted by the Covenanters and the General Assembly during the Commonwealth. The Scotch Confession is printed in the Acts of the Scotch Parliament for 1650; in Knox: History of the Scotch Reformation (ed. Laing, vol. 1); in Cameron: History of the Kirk of Scotland; in Dunlop: Collection of Scotch Confessions (vol. ii.); in Niemeyer: Collec. Confes. Reform. (Latin only); and in Schaff: Hist. of the Creeds of Christendom, vol. iii. 437–486 (English and Latin); comp. vol. i. 680–866.

SCOTCH PARAPHRASES. In May, 1742, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland appointed a committee, consisting of William Robertson (father of the historian; minister of London Wall, Borthwick, and Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh; d. about 1743), Robert Blair (b. in Edinburgh, 1699; d. Feb. 4, 1746; minister of Athelstaneford, East Lothian, 1731; author of The Grave, 1743), and others, to make or collect translations in verse of select passages of Scripture. Their work was sanctioned by the Assembly, 1751, and appeared as Scripture Songs, forty-five in number, and now rare. In 1773 another committee undertook the revision of these, adding twenty-two paraphrases and five hymns. The complete result was approved and printed, 1781.

Among the revisers were Hugh Blair (author of the well-known Rhetoric, 1783, and Sermons, 1777–1800; b. in Edinburgh, April 7, 1718; d. Dec. 27, 1800; minister of the High Church, 1758; professor in the university of Edinburgh, 1762), John Logan (b. near Edinburgh, 1748; d. in London, Dec. 28, 1788; minister at Leith, 1773; author of two volumes of Sermons, etc.), John Morrison, D.D. (b. County of Aberdeen, 1719; minister of Canisbay, Caithness, 1780; d. there June 12, 1798; translated book ii. of the Æneid, 1787), and William Cameron (b. 1751; studied at Aberdeen; minister of Kirknewton in Haddington, 1787; translated Hume's Histoire de France, etc., into Scotch poems, etc.). Each of these is believed to have written one or more of the Paraphrases, but the precise authorship cannot be determined in every case. Some twenty were altered or rewritten from Watts, and three from Doddridge; one each was contributed by Dr. Blacklock, Dr. J. Ogilvie, and W. Randall. Three are by W. Robertson (1742–51), and several by Morrison. Cameron's name appears chiefly as an imitator of other men's verses. The most important share, both for quantity and quality, was taken from the manuscripts of Michael Bruce (1740–67; see Appendix), intrusted, after the author's death, to Logan, and by him barely used, and published as his own. The Paraphrases are marked by a dry neatness and precision of style, which excludes the mawkish and whatever could offend the most modest, and leaves little room for lyrical or devotional fire. Their eminent respectability and long service have made them household words in Scotland, and they have been constantly and largely drawn upon by English and American hymnals. F. M. BIRD.

SCOTT. 2133 SCOTTISH PHILOSOPHY.

Eng., probably in 1708; and d. at Wethersfield, Conn., June 13, 1776. She refused the hand, but retained the friendship, of Dr. Doddridge, who introduced her to a young Episcopal clergyman, Col. Elisha Williams (1694-1755), once (1728-39) rector of Yale College. Having married him in 1751, she migrated to Connecticut. In 1761 she married Hon. William Smith of New York. After his death, in 1769, she lived with relatives of her first husband at Wethersfield, Conn. Her hymns were begun at her father's suggestion, and most of them were written probably before his death in 1740; but they did not see the light till much later. A few of them appeared in Dr. Dodd's Christian Magazine (1763-64), twenty-one in Ash and Evans's Collection (1769), and eight of them, with twelve more, in Dobell's New Selection (1800). Her entire poetical manuscript is in the library of Yale College. F. M. BIRD.

SCOTT, Levi, D.D., senior bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Delaware County, Del., Oct. 11, 1802; d. the same day, July 12, 1882. He was licensed, 1825, and received into the Philadelphia Conference, 1826. From 1840 to 1843 he was principal of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn.; was a member of every General Conference from 1837 to 1882; in the latter year he was elected bishop, and served the church with great ability and faithfulness. His most important work, and that for which he is especially known, is his hymns, of which a very large number were written after his ordination. His hymns are characterized by a high degree of poetic skill, that without early educational advantages, or the social assistance of friends, he was able to acquire considerable learning, and to present it in so popular a way. See Allibone, s. v., for bibliographical and critical remarks respecting this Commentary. Scott's Essays on the Most Important Subjects in Religion and Science, 1829, was reprinted in 1834. His Works, edited by his son, appeared in 1829, 10 vols. See his Life, London, 1822, New York, 1856.

SCOTTISH PHILOSOPHY has several very marked features, determined by the nature rather than by the flesh. First, It professes to proceed by the method of induction, that is, by the observation of facts. In this respect it is like the physical sciences, and differs entirely from the ancient and medieval systems, which sought to discover truth by analysis and deduction, from the joint dogmatic and deductive method of Descartes and his school, from the critical method of Kant, and the dialectic of Hegel. Second, It observes its facts, not by the external senses, but by self-consciousness. In this respect it differs from physical science and from the materialist and physiological schools of our day, which study the brain and nerves (Reid and Brown, and, in our day, Calderwood, looked at these), but it is merely to aid it in investigating purely mental phenomena falling under the eye of consciousness. Third, By the observations of consciousness it discovers principles working in the mind prior to and independent of our observation of them or of our experience; these it calls reason in the first degree as distinguished from reasoning, intuition, common sense (Reid), fundamental laws of thought (Stewart). This is its important characteristic, distinguishing it from Locke, and from empiricists who discover nothing higher than the generalization of a gathered experience; whereas the Scottish school discovers principles above experience, and regulating experience. Mental philosophy is in a sense inductive, as it is by induction we discover fundamental laws and their mode of operation; but these laws exist prior to induction, and guide to and guarantee primitive truth.

The influential philosophy, when the Scottish school arose, was that of Locke, whose Essay on Human Understanding was published in 1690. The early Scottish metaphysicians express their great obligations to Locke, and never differ from him without expressing a regret that they are obliged to do so. But, in order to keep his experiential philosophy from drifting into scepticism, they call in certain primitive principles.

Francis Hutcheson (1694-1746), an Irishman of Scottish descent, and professor of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow, is entitled to be regarded as the founder of the school. In his Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue (1725), and in An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions and Affections, with Illustrations of the Moral Sense (1728), he calls in a moral sense, after the manner of Shaftesbury, to oppose the defective ethical theory of Locke.

David Hume appeared in the mean time (1711-76). As Berkeley had denied the existence of matter as a substance, so Hume denies the existence of mind as a substance, and reduces every thing to sensation and ideas, with relations discovered between them; that of cause and effect being merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence. (See his Treatise of Human Nature, 1739.) In An Inquiry concerning the Principles of Thomas Reid (1710–90) may be regarded as the fittest representative of the school. He was a professor, first in Aberdeen, and then in Glasgow. He published An Inquiry into the Human Mind on the Principles of Common Sense, in 1784, followed by Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, in 1788, and Essays on the Active Powers, in 1788. In these works he opposes vigorously Locke's views as to idea, which had culminated in the idealism of Berkeley, and shows that there is in the mind a reason in the first degree, or a common sense, which gives us a foundation of truth and morality. A number of other writers appeared in Scotland about the same time, such as James Beattie (1735–1803), author of Essay on Man's responsibility and immortality, and, from the authority of Reid and Stewart, who were charged by him with introducing too many first principles of the mind, and defending the truth on much the same principles as Reid.

Dugald Stewart (1753–1828) was the most illustrious disciple of Reid, and sought to establish what he called the "fundamental laws of human belief." By his clear exposition and his elegant style he recommended the Scottish metaphysics to the English people. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, the philosophy of Reid and Stewart had a powerful influence in France, where it was used to check the sensationalism of Condillac, and in the United States of America, where it was taught in nearly every college, and was employed to defend the great truths of natural, and so to supply evidences in favor of revealed, religion.

Thomas Brown (1778–1820) rebelled against the authority of Reid and Stewart, who were charged by him with introducing too many first principles. He was influenced to some extent by Destutt de Tracy, and the idealists of France. He allowed to Hume that the relation of cause and effect was merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence, but argued, in opposition to Hume, that the relation was discovered intuitively. He thus kept up his relationship to the genuine Scottish school, and defended the great truths of natural religion. In his lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind, published posthumously, he discoursed brilliantly on suggestion and on the emotions.

Thomas Chalmers was a devoted adherent of the philosophy of his country. He expounded with great eloquence the views of Butler as to the nature and supremacy of conscience. None of the Scottish metaphysicians opposed religion — Hume did not belong to the school; but Chalmers was the first who brought the philosophy of Scotland into harmony with the evangelical faith of the nation. He argued from the moral power in man, the existence of God and of man's responsibility and accountability, that the moral law, the corruption of man's nature and the need of an atonement.

Sir William Hamilton is, always with Reid, the most noted philosopher of the Scottish school. As Reid was distinguished for his observation and shrewd sense, Hamilton was for his erudition and his logical power. While he belongs to the Scottish school, he sought to combine with it some of the principles of the philosophy of Kant. In Note A, a dissertation appended to Reid's Collected Works, he shows that common sense, by which he means our primary beliefs, has been held by all the most profound thinkers of ancient and modern times. In his Logic he sought to restore the old system, but sought, after the manner of Kant, to improve it, especially by insisting on the universal quantification of the predicate.

In his Metaphysics of the Infinite he has a good claim to the title of the faculties of the mind. Some members of the school do not approve of his doctrine of the relativity of knowledge and the negative doctrines of causation and infinity expounded in his Discussions.

The Scottish school has several excellent qualities in its relation to religion. All its members seek to unfold with care the properties and effects of the moral sense, which gives us a foundation of truth, such as the necessary principle of cause and effect, implying the existence of God, and the moral power implying an indelible distinction between right and wrong. While thus furnishing an introduction to religion, and aiding it, it does not seek to absorb it, as do the idealism of Schelling and the dialectic of Hegel. The Scottish metaphysicians have always been somewhat suspicious of the higher speculations of certain German philosophers. Hamilton, in his Discussions, cuts down the idea of the absolute as defended by Schelling and Cousin, by showing that it involves contradictions. (For accounts and criticisms, see Dissertations on the Progress of Metaphysical and Ethical Philosophy by Dugald Stewart, École Écossaise by Cousin, and especially The Scottish Philosophy Biographical, Expository, Critical, from Hutcheson to Hamilton, by James McCosh.)

SCOTUS ERIGENA, John. The date and place of his birth cannot be made out with certainty, but it is probable that he was born in Ireland, between 800 and 815. He came to the court of Charles the Bald as a man of mature age; and he made there the acquaintance of Prudentius, who left the court in 817. He came from Ireland, in one of whose flourishing cloistered schools he had been educated; and his surname, Scotus or Scotigena, applied to him by his contemporaries, — Pope Nicholas I., in his letter to Charles the Bald; Prudentius, in his De Pradesatione; the synod of Langres (820) etc. — yields no argument against his being a native of that country, as its original Latin name was Scotia Major. His other surname, first occurring in the oldest manuscripts of his translation of Dionysius Areopagita, points directly to Ireland in both of its derivations. — Ierugena, from the Greek Ἰερούγηνα ("born in the island of the saints"), and Erigena, from "Eirin," the old native name of the island. Similar unlikeness, and from the nature of the moral law, the corruption of man's nature and the need of an atonement.

Ingulf, in his Historia Albaniæ Croylandensis, Simeon of Durham, in his De Regibus Anglorum et Danorum, William of Malmesbury, and others, tell us that he was invited to England by Alfred the Great, probably shortly after the death of Charles the Bald, about 893; that he was appointed teacher at the school of Oxford, and afterwards abbot of Malmesbury; and that he finally, probably about 891, was killed by his own pupils, and in the church. Mabillon, in Act. Sanct. Ord. S. Bened., Natalis Alexander, in his Hist. Eccl. Socce., ix., the Histoire Litt. de la France, v., and others, reject this story as fabricated, to the extent that it seems impossible to them that a man who had been condemned by a pope and a synod for holding heretical opinions should afterwards be made an abbot: but the argument is not of any great weight.

At the court of Charles the Bald he was received with great honor. He enjoyed the particular favor of the king, was made director of the palatinal school, and became intimately acquainted with all the scholars of the court,—a Hincmar, a Lupus, an Usuard, a Ratramnus, and others. He appears to have held no ecclesiastical office in France; nor is it probable that he belonged to any of the monastic orders, though he may have received priestly ordination. In France he wrote most, perhaps all, of his works. The translation of the first and second synods of Valence, the bridge which Neo-Platonism penetrated into Western Europe, he undertook on the express request of the king. It gave him a great fame for learning among people in general, but it also made him suspected in the eyes of the Pope. His principal work is his De Divisione Nature, a kind of natural philosophy or speculative theology, which, starting from the supposition of the unity of philosophy and theology, ends as a system of idealistic pantheism; philosophy having, in the course of the development, entirely absorbed theology.

It cannot be made out with certainty what part Erigena took in the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper which had broken out between Paschasius Radbertus, Rabanus Maurus, Ratramnus, and others, before his arrival in France. It is certain that the book De Eschervisia, which for a long time was ascribed to him, belongs to Ratramnus; but it is as certain that he stood entirely on the side of the latter. From some newly discovered fragments of his commentary on the Gospel of John, and from some notices in Hincmar’s De Praelectione (c. 31), it is evident that he considered the bread and wine in the Lord’s Supper as mere symbols of the presence of Christ in the sacrament,—a view which in perfect harmony with his whole system, in which the Lord’s Supper is left almost unnoticed. The only thing doubtful is, whether he has written an independent treatise on the subject, or whether he has merely touched it incidentally in his other writings.

Clearer and more important is his participation in the controversy of Gottschalk concerning predestination. Erigena, with his father-in-law, Remigius Lupus, Remigius, and others, took the side of Gottschalk, at least partially. Hincmar summoned Erigena, the celebrated dialectician, to his aid; and Erigena obeyed the summons so much more willingly, as it gave him an opportunity of developing one of the fundamental ideas of his system,—his idea of evil. In 851, or between the first and the second synod of Chilier (849 and 853), he wrote his book De Praelectione, in which he teaches that there is only one predestination, namely, that to eternal bliss. With respect to evil and its punishment, he says there is no predestination, even not a prescience: for evil is a nihil, and has no real existence; it is only a lack, a fault in the realization of good. Of course Hincmar was rather frightened by an auxiliary of this character. Soon remonstrances and refutations began to pour in; because, in addition to his opposition to developing one of the fundamental ideas of the system,—his idea of evil. SCIBES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The name “scribe,” which already occurs in Jer. viii. 6, 11, is met with very often in the New Testament, either in a good, ideal sense (Matt. xiii. 32, xxxii. 34), or, what is more frequently the case, in a bad sense (Matt. ii. 4, v. 20, vii. 29, xii. 38, etc.), and designates those scribes who at the time of Christ, having themselves lost the true knowledge of the law and the prophets, became blind leaders of the people (Luke xi. 52; Matt. xv. 14). The scribes (sopherin, or soapharet) were originally merely writers or copyists of the law; but eventually they became the doctors of the law, and interpreters of the scriptures. According to the Talmud, these teachers were called “sohe- rim,” because they counted every letter, and classified every precept of the law.

The period of the scribes begins with the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. Though there were prophets, such as Ezekiel, during the Babylonian captivity, as is evident from Ez. vii. 6, 16, yet the altered state after the return required new enactments, and demanded that an authoritative body of teachers should so regulate the religious life as to adapt it to present circumstances. Hence Ezra, who re-organized the new state, also organized such a body of interpreters, of which he was the chief. It is for this reason, that besides the appellation “the priest” he is also called “the scribe” (Ez. vii. 6, 11, 12). The skilled in the law, both from among the tribe of Aaron and the laity, who with Ezra and after his death thus interpreted and fixed the law, were denominated "soferim," or "scribes." In synagogues, which probably at this time were built here and there, they expounded the law, either on festival and sabbath days, or on Monday and Thursday, the market-days. The most famous teachers were not only members of the Sanhedrin, but formed also a kind of spiritual college, the so-called "Great Synagogue," the last member of which was Simeon the Just. It is characteristic of the scribes of the earlier period, that, with the exception of Ezra and Zadok (Neh. xiii. 13), and of Simeon, we have no record of their names; and Jost is probably correct in ascribing this silence to the fact that the one aim of these early scribes was to promote reverence for the law, to make it the groundwork of the people's life. They would write nothing of their own, lest less worthy words should be raised to a level with those of the oracles of God (Judæothum und s. Sekten, i. 42). They devoted themselves to the exposition and careful study of the law; and, when interpretation was needed, they decided it orally only. As the decisions, or halachoth, could not be traced to any certain author, they were called the precepts of the scribes, also of the elders, or sages (παραλόγους τῶν προεκτέρων, Matt. xii. 5, xv. 8 sq.; Mark vii. 2 sq.; also πατριακα παραλόγους, Gal. i. 14). The scribes of this period probably fixed the canon of the Old Testament and the textus receptus. Thus they became the bearers of the theocratic tradition, as were the prophets in the pre-exile period, but with this difference, that the former, perhaps with the excception of Ezra and those who were with him, represented the letter, which killeth; while the latter were organs of the spirit, which maketh alive. The recorded principle of the men of the Great Synagogue is given in the treatise Aboth,
i.1: "Be cautious in judging, train many disci-
bles in the Cabala, developed themselves. Side by side with this esoteric, gnostic, dogmatic tendency of the Hagadah, we also find an ethical, popular one, as is best represented in Eucheneica.
The later scribes, better known as the Tanaim, or "teachers of the law," fixed and formalized the views and extrapolations of their predecessors, and as they accumulated they had to be compiled and classified. A new code grew out of them, a second corpus juris, the Mishna (διδαχισμός, Epiph., Hier., 13, 1; 15, 2). In this time, when the successive ascendancy of the Persians, Egyptians, Syrians, and Romans over Palestine, greatly influenced the habits and conduct of the Jewish people, different views, which finally branched out into different parties, were advanced as to how the law could and should be kept most carefully, and how every thing foreign which was in opposition to it could be eliminated. In the Books of the Maccae-bees frequent allusions are made to this tendency, which was especially represented in the Chasidim (Aboth, 1 Mac. i., 62, ii. 20, 42, vii. 12 sq.;
2 Mac. xiv. 6). To the Chasidim belonged two scribes,—Jose ben-Joeezer of Zereda and Jose ben-Jochanan,—both disciples of Antigonus of Soho (about 190 B.C.), himself a disciple of Simeon the Just (Pirke Aboth, i. 1). These two are the first of the five pairs of teachers of the law, who, as propagators of the orthodox tradition, distinguished themselves in the last centuries before Christ. Their decisions, or halachoth, were organs of the spirit, which maketh alive. The recorded principle of the men of the Great Synagogue is given in the treatise Aboth,

gave the people a new spiritual country, a kingdom of heaven, which was not limited by space. But to give them a kingdom of heaven in which Moses and the prophets were fulfilled was beyond their powers; and, because they did not enter therein themselves, they prevented the people also from entering therein (Matt. xxiii. 10). The influence of the scribes was very far-reaching. They were found in the court-room, in the colleges, but more especially in the synagogues. In the latter places they occupied the uppermost seats (Matt. xxiii. 8), read and explained the law. They were also not wanting in the feasts (Ibid.): in short, they were everywhere; and it was a very important thing to influence by their own opposition the people against Jesus. For a long time they tried in vain to get hold of him (Matt. ix. 3, xii. 38, xxiii. 35; Luke v. 30, vi. 7, xii. 54, xv. 2, xx. 19 sq.); but they accomplished at last his condemnation and crucifixion (Matt. xxvi. 57, xxvii. 41). The essence and character of rabbinism were such that it necessarily came in conflict with Jesus. The scribes could not bear to hear the truth out of his mouth, and thus was fulfilled what is written in Isa. xxix. 10-14. That there were exceptional cases among the scribes, we see in "Zenas the lawyer" (Tit. iii. 13).

Dr. Schudder was one of the heroes of foreign missions. He was tall, strong, and well-proportioned; slender in youth, he became portly in later years; originally of sound health, he ruined it by unsparing labor. He was a vigorous thinker, decided in his views, though without bigotry. Endowed with great perseverance, he carried through his project at whatever cost. Convinced that he was doing Christ's work, he cared nothing for the opposition of men. He endured hardship, and even severe pain, without complaint. His piety was carefully cultivated. Every Friday till noon he spent in fasting and prayer. The Bible constituted well-nigh his sole reading. He went about doing good to body and soul, like his Master. He preached in almost every large town in south-eastern Hindostan. It was his ambition "to be one of the inner circle around Jesus in heaven."

The subjugation of Greece by Alexander the Great signalized the first profession of art from the noble ends of patriotism and religious faith to those of ostentation and personal egotism. The degrading of its inspirations seems to have gone hand in hand with its technical decline; and when Greece, which in the Periclean age was the mistress of the world in art and all other cultures, came under the Roman yoke, the spirit of creative genius had perished, and the great masterpieces, which in their extant relics have taught the world through all subsequent centuries, became almost forgotten monuments of the past.

In considering, then, the almost puerile achievements of art in the departments both of sculpture and painting in the early Christian age, its long antecedent decline must not be left out of the account. Irrespective of other causes, presently to be specified, Christian art in Rome, where it had its cradle-life (we can scarcely say its birthplace), was constantly and models fitted to cultivate it on a high plane.

Two other causes combined to render the Christian Church in the primitive age, not only indifferent, but absolutely antagonistic, to art-culture.

The first of these, and the most important, was the proscription of the art of ancient Paganism to idolatry. The Mosaic institutes and traditions, however modified by the early church with respect to many of the elements of a debased ceremonialism, were literally interpreted in their relation to art, especially, it may be added, with respect to sculpture. Graven images contemplating religious ends had ever been the abhorrence of the Jewish, and were scarcely less so of the earliest Christian Church. The substitution, then, of materialism for the spiritual worship of the God whom the Jewish, and were scarcely less so of the earliest Christian Church. The substitution, then, of materialism for the spiritual worship of the God whom the Jewish, and were scarcely less so of the earliest Christian Church. But a careful comparison of the Pagan and the Christian conception scarcely justifies this conclusion. To mention no other considerations, it is to be remarked that the Pagan statue, so far as we are acquainted with it, was always undraped, a characteristic quite unknown in any extant Christian sculpture representing the Pastor Bonus. If some suggestion as regards form might have been derived from Pagan statues even which the early Christians were familiar, there can be no doubt that the statues of the Good Shepherd, a large number of which doubtless existed in the primitive church, were original and deliberate endeavors to give a visible paraphrase of the Twenty-third Psalm, the parable of the lost sheep, and the tenth chapter of John's Gospel.

Of the sepulchral relics of early Christian art which have been conserved to the present time, the most important is the famous sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (prefect of Rome, d. A.D. 359), now in the crypt of St. Peter's Church in Rome. It was probably executed in the fourth century, and contains five subjects from the Old and New Testaments. Other examples of kindred character are found in the Christian Museum of the Vatican, in the Campo Santo at Pisa, and in the crypt of the Cathedral of Ancona. Many ancient altar-tablets are found in the churches of Italy, especially at Ravenna (Cathedral, S. Apollinari in Classe, S. Vitale, S. Francesco, etc.).

A remarkable sarcophagus, though of much ruder workmanship than that of Junius Bassus, is in the Church of St. Ambrose in Milan; its principal relief representing Christ teaching, surrounded by his disciples.

In the representation of the scenes of biblical history by means of sepulchral reliefs, the Roman Catacombs furnished the most numerous examples. Most of these have been removed to the Lateran Museum. Both the Old and the New Testaments contributed the materials for these subterranean galleries of early Christian art; and many of the sculptures, for example, those harking for their subjects the histories of Noah and Jonah, are so puerile as to border on the grotesque.

Only second to these in importance are the sepulchral reliefs found in the Catacombs of Naples and Syracusae.

The sculptural ornamentation of ecclesiastical furniture, sacramental shrines, crucifixes, episcopal chairs (a fine example is the chair of Archbishop Maximinian in the cathedral at Ravenna), goblets, diptychs, and ivory carvings for movable altars, and the covers of prayer-books and the Sacred Scriptures, constitutes an extensive though subordinate feature in the later art of this first period of Christian sculpture, which we may extend in general limitation over ten centuries.

Some of the most precious of these treasures, containing in the aggregate great wealth in the precious metals, fell a prey to the barbarian invasions of Italy, and are lost beyond recovery. Prominent examples of this vandalism, which robbed the world of some of the most costly relics of early Christian sculpture, were the plundering of the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome by the Saracens (A.D. 846) and of the churches of Constantinople in the conquest of that city by the Latins (A.D. 1204).

What is called the Romanesque period of Christian sculpture may be said to begin with the eleventh century; and we remark in this period the most striking contrast between its magnificent architectural creations and its limited fruitage in the departments both of sculpture and painting. The beginning of this period produced neither masters nor masterpieces of great importance. In subordinate departments of sculpture we may cite the famous relics in Hildesheim,—the bronze door of its cathedral with its sixteen reliefs, and the pillars standing before them, containing scenes from the life of Christ. These works, and others of kindred character (e.g., the magnificent bronze candlesticks in the Magdalene Church at Hildesheim), are ascribed conjecturally to Bishop Bernward (d. 1023).

The magnificent portal of the cathedral at Freiburg in Saxony ("the golden door," so called), with its fine reliefs, taken from a former edifice on the same site, is one of the most important works of this early period. Of similar works in France, the sculptured portals of the cathedrals of Arles, Bourges, and Chartres, must be mentioned.

Italy, however, gave to the church in the thirteenth century a great sculptor, who in technical excellence caught something of the lost spirit of the antique. This was Nicola Piscano, who between 1260 and 1278 executed a series of works which may justly be regarded as foretokens of the Renaissance age. Foremost of these are the famous reliefs on the pulpit of the baptistery at Pisa, representing the Birth of Christ, the Adoration of the Three Kings, the Presentation in the Temple, the Crucifixion, and the Last Judgment.

It need scarcely be said, that in the Gothic period, next following the Romanesque, architecture was the one interest in art which overshadowed all others, and that almost all the sculpture of this age was simply an accessory of architecture. In Northern Europe the earnest spirit of the Romanesque period still prevailed, though the names of no great masters have come down to us through their works.

The noble reliefs in the Strassburg Cathedral, representing the death and coronation of the Virgin, with the allegorical figures of the Christian Church, are worthy of especial mention as being ascribed to Sabina von Steinbach, the reputed daughter of the architect of this magnificent Gothic temple. In Italy the spirit of Nicola Pisano, the great master of the Romanesque age, was conserved in his son Giovanni (circa 1240-1321) and his pupil Andrea Pisano (1274-1349).

The names of Giotto and Orcagna, among the sculptors of this period, must not be omitted, albeit painting was the art in which both excelled, and in connection with which their fame has been perpetuated. The high-altar at Arezzo, and the facade of the cathedral at Orvieto, may be cited as the chief works of Giovanni Pisano. Of the southern door of the famous portal of Florence there is a series of panels representing the life of John the Baptist, which show Andrea Pisano to have been a worthy scholar of the great Nicola. The figure of Apelles, on the bell-tower of the Florence Cathedral, is a curiosity, from the fact of its having originated with Giotto, the father of painting in the Gothic age.

It is customary with historians to divide the golden age of art, which in general terms may be said to include the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, into the Early and the High Renaissance. For the purposes of the present article, however, we may include both of these—the quattrocento and the cinquecento—in the third great period of Christian sculpture. As applied both to literature and art, the term "renaissance" signifies the revival of the antique; and Italy was the grand theatre of its development. At the beginning of the fifteenth century but few of the sculptures of antiquity had been unearthed in Rome: but the good work, which was carried to full activity under Julius the Second and Leo the Tenth, and which has exercised such a mighty moulding influence on all subsequent art, even down to the present day, had already commenced; and there is manifest, even in the early masters of this wonderful age, a loyalty to nature and truth, as distinguished from tradition and conventionalism, which sets them utterly apart from the sculptors of the middle ages.

The great master of what may be called the Early Renaissance was Lorenzo Ghiberti of Florence (1378-1455), who between the years 1403 and 1427 was employed on the north bronze doors of the Florence Baptistery, whose reliefs plainly evidence some of the mediæval spirit yet lingering in art. The eastern doors of the same edifice, which he completed in 1502, whose panels contain representations of biblical history, form one of the greatest masterpieces of sculpture which any age has produced. It has been, perhaps, justly criticised as intruding too much upon the province of painting in attempting perspective effects.

Other eminent masters in this period were Donatello of Florence (1386-1466), his pupil, Andrea Verrocchio (1432-88), and Luca della Robbia (1400-82), whose terra-cotta reliefs, representing biblical

Besides the two figures of the Captives, now in the museum of the Louvre in Paris, the colossal Moses, in the Church of S. Pietro in Vincoli in Rome, is the one great feature of this famous sepulchre, and is, without doubt, the grandest creation of modern sculpture. The Medici monuments in Florence are among the noblest works of memorial sculpture in the world. His statue of Christ, in the Church of S. Maria sopra Minerva, executed about 1527, is perhaps the least successful of all the sculptural works of this great artist. The sculptors contemporary with Michel Angelo, of whom Giovanni da Bologna (1522-1009) and Benvenuto Cellini (1500-70) were the most eminent, occupied themselves more with mythological than with Christian themes. Italian sculpture in Germany during the sixteenth century bears a close resemblance to that of Italy, chiefly through the name and works of Peter Vischer (1529). The great work which has immortalized him is the noble group of bronze statues and reliefs on the monument of St. Sebald in Nuremberg. Adam Krafft, famous for his reliefs in Nuremberg, representing the sufferings of Christ, and Veit Stoss, the father of wood-carving in the Renaissance age, deserve mention, albeit no work of sculpture by the latter has been preserved.

Among the sculptors of Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century, the names of Sansovino (Baptism of Christ, in the Florence Baptistery), Lombardi, and Leonardo da Vinci, deserve mention, although no work of sculpture by the latter has been preserved.

It need scarcely be said that the one name which glorifies the history of Christian sculpture in the sixteenth century is Michel Angelo Buonarroti, who was born on the 6th of March, 1475, in the vicinity of Arezzo, and died in Rome on the 17th of February, 1564. His earliest important sculptural work was the well-known Pieta, now in St. Peter's Church in Rome, which he executed at the age of twenty-four. Temporarily he then followed the colossal statue of David, and lastly the statues which were designed for the magnificent mausoleum of Pope Julius the Second, a project of vast dimensions, which occupied the great master during a period of forty years, with occasional interruptions, but which was never fully carried out.

The nineteenth century has witnessed, both in Italy and Northern Europe, a revival of Christian sculpture with somewhat of the spirit of its golden age; and the names of Antonio Canova (1757-1822), Bertel Thorwaldsen (1770-1844), and Christian Rauch (1777-1857), representing both extremes of the European Continent, are the glory of modern sculpture, both secular and Christian. With these illustrious trio the names of Ernst Rietzschel, the designer of the great Luther Monument at Worms, deserves to be associated, as well as that of his most gifted pupil, Professor Adolf Donndorf of Stuttgart, still living, who, after the death of his master, followed the colossal statue of David, and lastly the statues which were designed for the magnificent mausoleum of Pope Julius the Second, a project of vast dimensions, which occupied the great master during a period of forty years, with occasional interruptions, which was never fully carried out.

SEABURY, Samuel, b. in Groton, Conn., Nov. 30, 1729; d. at New London, Feb. 25, 1796. He was ordained deacon by Bishop
Thomas of Lincoln, ministering on behalf of the aged Sherlock of London, to whose jurisdiction the colonial missions pertained; and two days afterwards the Bishop of Carlisle (Osbaldiston) advanced him to the priesthood (Dec. 23, 1753). He was appointed missionary to New Brunswick, N.J., and arrived there May 25, 1754. In 1757 he removed to Jamaica, L.I., influenced partly by a desire to be near his father, who was rector of St. George's, at Hempstead. But shortly after this he received a call to the episcopate, but could not proceed to the consecration without an act dispensing with the oath of allegiance; and this gave a civil aspect to the matter, with which the ministry was not prepared to be concerned.

In this dilemma, recourse was had to the bishops in Scotland not yet relieved of their restraint by the death of the Pretender, but tolerated in view of that approaching event and in consideration of their long and patient sufferings. It was on Sunday, the 14th of November, 1764, in the chapel of Bishop Skinner's residence in Aberdeen, that Seabury received the episcopate at the hands of three "non-juring" prelates, by which he agreed to promote, so far as in him lay, those restorations of the (Eucharistic) Liturgy, which have accordingly become the characteristic features of the American Prayer-Book as compared with that of the Church of England.

It has been necessary to give with some detail so much of Seabury's history as is essential to an explanation of his position and influence in the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church; but, referring our readers to the lately published memoir (by Dr. Beardsley, 1881) for a full account of his life and labors, it is sufficient to add a brief outline of his episcopate. After a voyage of three months he reached his diocese June 27, 1765, and on the 2d of August following, at Midletown, was received by his clergy with due solemnity. He held his first ordination on the following day. The subsequent consecration of three bishops in England, and the formation of a constitution for the church thus rendered independent and autonomous, occasioned much negotiation and correspondence, before the diocese of Connecticut became duly incorporated under this constitution, with the dioceses south of New England; and in all these agitating preliminaries the "learning, piety, and to moderation" of Seabury impressed a deep respect for his character upon all his brethren, with the exception of a few whose political prejudices had survived the conflicts of the war. The Johannean qualities of Bishop White were precisely such as were requisite as a complement to the Petrine spirit of Seabury, and to their sincere mutual regard and wise co-operation was largely due the good understanding that soon followed. The episcopate of Bishop Seabury was cordially recognized, and he united with his three brother-bishops of the Anglican line in consecrating the first bishop of Maryland (Dr. Claggett); and consequently no bishop has ever been consecrated in this church without deriving his commission in part through the Scottish line of ecclesiastical ancestry. The bishop's life and labors in Connecticut have left a deep mark on the religious history of the State, and not less deeply has his influence been felt in the entire communion, in which he was so conspicuous as an organizer and doctor. Two volumes of his sermons have been collected and published, and others have appeared in a fragmentary shape; but valuable manuscripts remain as yet unedited. They evince a vigorous mind, and intrepid devotion to the doctrinal standards of ancient Catholicity.

The writer of this brief notice was active in promoting the final deposit of Bishop Seabury's remains, in 1849, under the new and substantial church in New London, where they now rest; and on that occasion he had the solemn office, in connection with Bishop William, now the successor of Seabury, of laying his venerable relics in the place of their ultimate reposi. A physician who attended to identify these relics when disinfected remarked on the massive proportions of the skull; and the well-worn mitre preserved in Trinity College, Hartford, corresponds with these proportions so remarkably as to furnish in itself a striking evidence of the fidelity of the half-length portrait of the bishop, from the pencil of Duché, which adorns the library of that college, and from which many popular engravings have been derived.

SEAGRAVE, Robert, an earnest evangelical minister and co-worker with Whitefield; was b. Nov. 22, 1693, at Twyford in Leicestershire, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. Having vainly endeavored to bring the Church of England to his position, he left her, or at least worked outside her pale. Besides sundry sermons and pamphlets, he published in 1742 fifty hymns, which were reprinted by D. Sedgwick, 1860. The best of them is, "Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings." He was living as late as 1750.

SEAMAN, Lazarus, D.D., a learned English divine; b. at Leicester; d. in 1675. He was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge. In the civil war he took the Parliamentary side, and in reward of his services was appointed master of Peter House, Cambridge, a member of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and rector of Allhallows, London, from which he was ejected in 1662. He was noted for his knowledge of church polity and controversial divinity. Besides sermons, he published A vindication of the judgment of the Reformed Churches and Protestant Dissenters, in 1676. His was the first, or one of the first, libraries disposed of in England by auction (1670), and brought seven hundred pounds. Portions of the catalogue are reprinted in Dibdin's Bibliomaniac, ed. 1842, 304-306. See Neal: Hist. of the Puritans, Cooper: Biographical Dictionary; Allibone: Dictionary of Authors.

SEAMEN, Missions to. Rev. John Flavel (England, 1627-91) and English contemporaries (Ryther, Jaueway, et al.), as also a few clergyman of the established and dissenting churches in England in the eighteenth century, preached occasional sermons, special and serial, some of which were printed, on behalf of seamen; but the second half of the eighteenth century witnessed the first united efforts for their evangelization. An association, styled at first The Bible Society, was organized in London in 1780, to supply English troops in Hyde Park with the Holy Scriptures, whose field of labor was speedily enlarged to embrace seamen in the British navy. The first ship furnished with Bibles by this society was "The Royal George," sunk off Spithead, Eng., Aug. 29, 1782. The society's name was soon changed, becoming The Naval and Military Bible Society. It is still in operation, confines itself to its original specific object, the diffusion of the word of God, and has been of immense service to the army and navy of Great Britain. This society had its influence in originating the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the work of the latter led eventually to the formation of the American Bible Society. (Cf. art. "Bible Societies," Encyc. Brit., ed. iii. p. 649.)

The need for Christian exertion among sailors was urgent. Destitute, as a class, of any access to the Bible, to preaching, or to any service, instruction, or consolations of the church, their lives passed, for the most part, without access to the gospel of Christ. It would be difficult," says a well-informed writer, "to conceive of a deeper moral night than that which for centuries had settled upon the sea."

Early efforts made in England to furnish sailors with the gospel, however, met with serious opposition from Christian people, as well as from unchristians in the royal navy. So late as 1828 the king was petitioned to abrogate an order, then recently issued by the lord high admiral, prohibiting the free circulation of tracts in the navy. But in 1814 the pioneers of the movement for this end, Rev. George Charles Smith, a dissenting clergyman, once a sailor, and Zebulon Rogers, a shoemaker of the Methodist persuasion, established prayer-meetings for seamen, on the Thames, at London; the first being held on the brig "Friendship," June 22 of that year, by Mr. Rogers. These were multiplied and sustained upon the shipping in the river. March 23, 1817, the first Bethel flag was unfurled on the "Zephyr," Capt. Hindulph of South Shields, Eng. The Port of London Society was organized March 18, 1818, to provide for the continuous preaching of the gospel to seamen in London, upon a floating chapel (ship) of three hundred tons' burden, and Rev. Mr. Smith ministered upon it with success during the ensuing year. Nov. 12, 1810, The Bethel Union Society was formed at London, which, in addition to the above movements, held established correspondence on the Thames, established correspondence with local societies that had been started by Mr. Smith's exertions in various parts of the kingdom. These two societies were subsequently united to form what is now known as The British and Foreign Sailors' Society.

The Sailor's Magazine (London) merged, after publication for seven years by Rev. Mr. Smith, into The New Sailor's Magazine, also issued by him, was established in 1826. The monthly magazine now issued by The British and Foreign Sailors' Society is Chart and Compass (pp. 32), established in January, 1879. It has presented the facts, and discussed questions connected with the evangelization of seamen, with fervency and force. Up to April, 1888, Chart and Compass had circulated 128,990 copies.

In 1825 The London Mariner's Church and Rivermen's Bethel Union was organized to provide a church for seamen on shore, Rev. Mr. Smith ministering upon it with success during the ensuing year. In 1825 The London Mariner's Church and Rivermen's Bethel Union was organized to provide a church for seamen on shore, Rev. Mr. Smith becoming pastor. This church was for years the centre of an extensive system of labor, including a Sabbath school, Bethel prayer-meetings, tract and book distribution, magazine publishing, and open-air preaching to seamen on the wharves.

Rev. Mr. Smith died at Penzance, Cornwall, Eng., in January, 1863.

Existing seamen's missionary societies in the empire of Great Britain, distinct from local organizations which limit the prosecution of work to their own ports, are, (1) The British and Foreign Sailors' Society (at Sailor's Institute, Shadwell, London, E.E., and in New York, Chatham, State, N.Y., from April 1, 1882, of £10,123 18s. 8d., and expenditures for the same period of £9,510 3s. 7d.), which in its sixty-fifth annual report (1882-83) names the ports of Rotterdam, Hamburg, Antwerp, Genoa, Naples, and Malta, outside England, and London, Millford-Haven, Falmouth, and Barrow-in-Furness (English), as occupied more or less effectively by persons having entire or partial support from its treasury, and devoting themselves to the spiritual and temporal welfare of seamen.

No organizations exist in North or South America, outside the United States, for the sole purpose of prosecuting religious labor among seamen. At Boston, Mass., the first society for this object was formed in May, 1812, but soon suspended operations. The first religious meeting on behalf of sailors in New-York City (N.Y.) is believed to have been held in the summer of 1816, at the corner of Front Street and Old Slip. The Marine Bible Society of New-York City was organized March 14, 1817, to furnish sailors with the Holy Scriptures. The Society for promoting the Gospel among Seamen in the Port of New York, commonly known as The New-York Port Society, a local organization, was formed June 5, 1818. This society laid the foundations of the first mariner's church ever erected, in Roosevelt Street, near the East River, which was dedicated June 4, 1820, Rev. WARD STAFFORD preacher and pastor. In 1823 The New-York Port Society set at work in that city the first missionary to seamen, Rev. HENRY CHASE. This society now sustains a church at Madison and Catharine Streets in New York, and a reading-room for sailors in the same edifice, employing in the year ending Dec. 31, 1882, nineteen missionaries. Receipts for 1882 were $11,067.04; expenditures, $10,682.07. The New-York Bethel Union, for the establishment and maintenance of religious meetings on vessels in the port (organized June 3, 1821), had but a brief existence.

The movements noted — that at Boston, Mass., issuing in the formation of the earliest society of its kind in the world — led to similar action for the performance of local work for seamen in Flinders, S.C. (1819), Philadelphia, Penn. (1810), Portland, Me., and New Orleans, La. (1823), at New Bedford, Mass. (1828), and elsewhere. In the latter year there were in the United States seventy bethel unions, thirty-three marine Bible societies, fifteen churches and floating chapels for seamen. There had been many conversions to Christ among sailors, and their evangelization was recognized as among the most prominent and important of Christian enterprises.
Accordingly, after its formal establishment in the city of New York (Jan. 11, 1829), succeeded by a new organization in its board of trustees (May 5, 1828, from which time its birth is dated), The American Seamen’s Friend Society (80 Wall Street, New York, N.Y.), unquestionably the most widely operative and efficient of existing missionary societies for seamen, came into being. Its first President was Hon. SMITH THOMPSON, then secretary of the United-States navy; Rev. C. P. McILVAINE, afterwards Protestant-Episcopal bishop of Ohio, was its Corresponding Secretary; and Rev. JOSHUA LEAVITT its General Agent. Article II. of its constitution provides: —

“The object of this society shall be to improve the social and moral condition of seamen by uniting the efforts of the wise and good in their behalf, by promoting in every port boarding-houses of good character, savings-banks, register-offices, libraries, museums, reading-rooms, and schools, and also the ministration of the gospel, and other religious blessings.”

Its first foreign chaplain was Rev. DAVID ABEL, who reached his field of labor at Whampoa, the anchorage for ships trading at Canton, China, Feb. 18, 1830. In its fortieth year (1867-68) its laborers (chaplains and sailormissionaries) were stationed at twenty foreign, and thirteen domestic, seaports, as follows: at Caribou Island on the Labrador coast, N.A.; at St. John, N.B.; in Norway, at Christiansand, Kragero, and Porsselv; in Sweden, at Gottenberg, Warberg and Wedige, Wernersberg, and Stockholm; in Belgium, at Antwerp; in France, at Havre and Marseilles; in the Hawaiian Islands, at Honolulu and Hilo; at the Chinchas Islands in Peru, at Valparaiso and at Buenos Ayres, S.A.; and in the United States, at the following seaports: San Francisco, Cal., Norfolk and Richmond, Va., Charleston, S.C., Mobile, Ala., Boston and Gloucester, Mass., and at New York, N.Y. Its missionary work was prosecuted in 1862–65 on the Labrador coast of North America, in the countries of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, at Hamburg in Germany, at Antwerp in Belgium, in France at Marseilles and Havre, at Genoa and Naples in Italy, at Yokahama in Japan, in the Sandwich and Madeira Islands, at Valparaiso, S.A., and in the United States, at Portland, Ore., and on the waters of Puget Sound; also in the ports of Galveston, Tex., New Orleans, La., Pensacola, Fla., Savannah, Ga., Charleston, S.C., Wilmington, N.C., Norfolk, Va., and at Boston, Mass.; in the cities and vicinities of New York, Jersey City (N.J.), and Brooklyn (N.Y.), including the United-States Navy-Yard, numbering forty-two laborers at thirty-one seaports (eighteen foreign and thirteen domestic) supported in whole or in part by the society.

Its receipts in the first decade of its existence, were, in round numbers, $91,000; in the second decade, $165,000; in the third, $229,000; in the fourth, $375,000; in the fifth, $655,000. Receipts for the year ending March 31, 1883, with small balance from previous year, $80,762.60; expenditures for same, $79,455.55 inclusive of an investment of a legacy for permanent fund.

The Church Missionary Society for Seamen in the City of New York (Protestant-Episcopal), in its Thirty-Ninth Annual Report (1882–83), states that the society sustains, as heretofore, two chapels, three mission-houses, with reading and lecture rooms, oversight in the hands of three clergymen, with the assistance of a colportor at each station. Its total services for the year were 628; visits to reading-rooms, 5,622; seamen supplied with Bibles, 204, with Testaments, 613, with the Book of Common Prayer, 621. The bishop of the diocese is its president.

Besides the employment of chaplains, residents at seaports, and serving as Christian ministers, of Bible and tract distributors, Scripture-readers, colportors, and helpers, whose titles declare their functions, the missionary societies for seamen have usually sought for their welfare by establishing, and in part sustaining (temporarily), Sailors’ Homes in various ports. In them are resident missionaries, who, besides their services in religious meetings, devote portions of their time to spiritual and charitable visitation among sailors on shipboard and shore, at sailor boarding-houses, and in hospitals, and, in some cases, to such service for the families of seamen. The Wells Street Sailors’ Home at London (Eng.) Docks was established by Mr. George Greene in 1830, was opened in 1835. In one year it admitted 5,444 boarders, who, besides a home, had evening instruction, the use of a savings-bank, etc. The Liverpool (Eng.) Sailors’ Homes were opened in 1844. The Sailors’ Home at 190 Cherry Street, New York, is the property and is under the direction of the American Seamen’s Friend Society. It was opened in 1842, reconstructed, refurnished, and re-opened in 1880, and is now unsurpassed by any sailors’ home in the world. During the year 1882–83 it accommodated 2,003 boarders. The whole number of boarders since the Home was established is 102,713, and the amount saved by it to seamen and their relatives during the forty-one years since its establishment has been more than $1,500,000.

The systematic supply of carefully selected libraries, to be loaned to vessels for use at sea, by their officers and crews, is now largely carried on by these organizations, especially by the American Seamen’s Friend Society. Its shipments of such libraries from 1858–59 to March 31, 1883, were 7,764, and the re-shipments of the same, 8,110; the total shipments aggregating 15,884. The number of volumes was 418,420, accessible by original shipment to 301,425 seamen. Of the whole number sent out, 283 libraries with 33,948 volumes were placed upon United States naval vessels and in naval hospitals, and have been accessible to 107,995 men: 106 libraries were in 106 stations of the United States Life-saving Service, containing 3,816 volumes, accessible to 742 keepers and surfmen.

The Sailors’ Magazine (32 pp., monthly), organ of the American Seamen’s Friend Society, is now the oldest of the periodicals issued on behalf of seamen. It was established in September, 1828, in its fifty-fifth volume; and of its issues for 1882–83, 81,000 copies were printed and distributed. In the same twelvemonth 18,000 copies of The Seamen’s Friend (4 pp., annually), established in 1855, were issued by this society, for sailors; and 145,000 copies of the Life-Boat (4 pp., monthly) for the use of sabbath schools.
Varied help is habitually extended to shipwrecked and destitute sailors by all these organizations. The establishment of savings-banks for seamen has ordinarily been due to their influence. The Seamen's Savings-Bank in New-York City (78 Wall Street) went into operation May 11, 1829. Sailors' asylums, orphanages, and "Resta" (houses of entertainment conducted upon temperance principles) are open in many seaports as the fruit of their existence. Miss Agnes Weston, from her "Rest" at Devonport, Eng., was distributing, gratis, by voluntary contribution, in 1832, 15,000 monthly Blue Books (8 pp. temperance and religious tracts) in the English tongue; and these were regularly translated into Dutch and German for the navies of Holland and Germany.

It is impracticable to present detailed statistics as to results of Christian labor for seamen; the best general estimate fixes the number of Christian seamen at not far from thirty thousand. But to say that during the last half-century these men have been gathered into the church of Christ by thousands, that as a class sailors are now manifestly being lifted out of the ignorance and degradation in which they lived at the opening of the nineteenth century, and to attribute these changes, realized and still progressing, to the exertions of these societies, is to speak with truth and moderation. The corporate and individual efforts of persons connected with them have often originated and made effective beneficent public legislation, in the interest of sailors, in Great Britain and in the United States. It is in place to add, that, with few exceptions, all seamen's missionary societies are administered upon a non-denominational basis.

SEARS, Barnas, distinguished as an educator; b. at Sandisfield, Berkshire Comity, Mass., 1810; d. at Weston, Mass., Jan. 14, 1876; graduated at Union College, 1834, and at Cambridge Divinity School, 1837; was pastor at Wayland, Mass., 1838–40 and 1847–65, at Lancaster, Mass., 1840–47, and at Weston, 1865–76. Though connected with the Unitarian body, he held Swedenborgian opinions, and often professed his belief in the absolute divinity of our Lord. His "Calm on the listening ear of truth," and "It came upon the midnight clear" (1834 and 1849 or 1850), are universally known. F. M. Bird.

SEBALDUS, a Roman-Catholic saint; d., according to some, in 801, to others, in 901 or even later. The son of a Danish king or a peasant, he began his studies in Paris at fifteen. He married the daughter of King Dagobert, but the day after the ceremony was released from his marriage-vows; spent ten years in the desert, and was commissioned by Gregory II. as a preacher of the gospel in Germany. He is said to have founded many churches in Bavaria, and at last to have settled down at Nürnberg, where the St. Sebalus Church still preserves his memory. The city has chosen him as its patron, and celebrates his memory Aug. 19. On account of the miracles performed by him alive and by his relics, he was canonized by Martin V., 1425. NEUDECKER.

SEBASTIAN, a Catholic saint, and protecting patron against the plague; was born at Milan, Educated to render help to the persecuted Christians under Diocletian, he entered the ranks of the army as a secret Christian, and was appointed by Diocletian to a high position. When it became known that he was a Christian, he was condemned to death, and pierced with many arrows. Left for dead, a Christian, Irene, who was about to bury him, found him alive. He got well, but was again condemned, and flogged to death. A church was built to his memory at Rome, and was followed by the discontinuance of the plague. His day in the Roman calendar is Jan. 20; in the Greek, Dec. 18. Baronius, Tillemont, and others lay particular emphasis on the Acta S. Sebastiani. NEUDECKER.

SECKENDORF, Veit Ludwig von, b. Dec. 20, 1626, at Herzogenaurach, near Erlangen; d. at Halle, Dec. 18, 1692. He was educated at the court of Gotha; studied law and philosophy at Strassburg, and held high positions in the service, first, of Duke Ernst of Gotha, then of Maurice of Saxony, and finally of the elector of Brandenburg. His Compendium historiae ecclesiasticae (Gotha, 1680-84, 2 vols.) was translated into German, and often reprinted. His principal work, however, is his De Lutheranismo (Leipzig, 1688), written against Maimbourg’s Histoire de Lutheranism. His life was written by Schreber, Leipzig, 1737. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SECKER, Thomas, Church of England; b. at Stibbathope, Nottinghamshire, 1692; d. in London, Aug. 3, 1768. He was graduated M.D. at Leyden, 1721, but then entered Exeter College, Oxford; was ordained priest, 1723, rector of Houghton-le-Spring, 1724, of St. James’s, London, 1733; appointed chaplain to the king, 1732; consecrated bishop of Bristol, Jan. 19, 1736; transferred to Oxford, May, 1737, to which see was added the deanery of St. Paul’s, 1750; and finally he was enthroned archbishop of Canterbury, April 21, 1751. He was a popular preacher and a faithful bishop. See Bishop Porteus’ Review of his life, prefixed to his edition of his Works, London, 1770, 12 vols.

SECULAR CLERGY. See Clergy, p. 499.

SECULARIZATION means the conversion of an ecclesiastical institution and its property into a secular institution with a secular purpose, or the transformation of a State organization with an ecclesiastical head into a State organization with a secular head, or the legal absolution from ecclesiastical vows. Secularizations of the first kind have occurred from time to time,—in the last days of the reign of the Merovingian dynasty in France, under Henry II. in Germany, during the Reformation in various countries, etc.,—though always under the protest of the Church. The first instance of a secularization of the second kind was probably the transference of the Duchy of Prussia from the possession of the Knights of the Teutonic Order to the dominion of the Elector of the German Empire (1355). But on a still greater scale secularization of this kind was carried on during the Napoleonic wars, especially by the Peace of Campo Formio (1797) and that of Lunen- ville (1801). The word was first used by the French delegates during the negotiations preceding the Peace of Westphalia (1648). Secularization of the third kind is a Papal prerogative.

SECONDUS, a gnostic of the school of Valentinus; differed (by teaching, besides the thirty sons, a double tetrad,—one to the right, and one to the left; one of light, and one of darkness) so materially from his master, that he formed a school of his own,—the Secondians. But the notices of him which have come down to us through Ireneus (Herm., i. 11, 2), Hippolytus (Ref., vi. 38), Tertullian (Praerupt., 40), Epiphanius (Her., 92), and others, do not enable us to form any complete idea of his system. W. MÖLLER.

SEDES VACANS, a term of canon law,—properly speaking applicable only to the papal or to an episcopal see, because sedes (άπορος) originally was used only in connection with the predicate apostolica, though its use has gradually been extended to abbeyes and other high dignities of church,—denotes the interval between the decease or depo-

dition on translation or resignation of the occup-

tant to the full legal instalment of his successor. During such an interval the administration of an episcopal diocese was originally confided to the presbytery, afterwards to an intercessor, intervenor, or visitor, and finally to the cathedral chapter. If the vacancy is not absolute, but only partial, as, for instance, on account of the sickness of the occupant, the term sedes impedita (hindered) is applied, and a coadjutor is appointed. H. F. JACOBSON.

SEDGWICK, Daniel, the father of English hymnology; b. in London, 1815; d. there March 10, 1879; was originally a shoemaker, of humble birth and limited education. Being fond of hymns, he bought the old books containing them one by one, and about 1840 began the systematic collection and study of editions. He gradually acquired a unique library, and a knowledge of the subject long unrivalled. The popularity of Sir R. Palmer’s (now Lord Selborne) Book of Praise, 1865, and the care Mr. Sedgwick had bestowed in making it a model of accuracy in texts, dates, and ascriptions of authorship, established his reputation; and thenceforth the compilers of nearly every prominent English hymnal, of whatever creed or connection, required his help. His shop in Sun Street, Bishopsgate, was the chief source of hymnological information for England and America. He published from 1859 to 1865, and usually at pecuniary loss, the only collection of Ryland’s hymns, and the only rely-able one of Toplady’s, besides reprints of Mason and Shepherd’s, Steele, W. Williams, Seagrave, Grigg, and several more. His six catalogues, and Comprehensive Index of names and authors, 1863, are valuable for reference. F. M. BIRD.

SEDGWICK, Obadiah, English Presbyterian;
b. in parish of St. Peter, Marlborough, Wiltshire, 1600; d. at Marlborough, January, 1657. He was graduated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford; entered holy orders; was chaplain to Sir Horatio Vere, baron of Tilbury; returned to Oxford, where in 1629 he became "reader of the sentences." Soon after, he began to preach at St. Mildred's, Bread-street, London, and until 1655, with the exception of two years (1639-41) when he was at Coggeshall, Essex, h: preached in London,— in Breadstreet until 1646, and afterwards at St. Paul's, Covent Garden. His ministry was popular and fruitful. He zealously defended the Presbyterian cause. He was one of the licensers of the press, and a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. In 1633 he was appointed by Parliament one of the "tryers" (examiners of the qualifications of ministers), and in 1634 assistant to the commissioners of London for the ejection of "scandalous and ignorant" ministers and schoolmasters. He was succeeded in his parish by his son-in-law, a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines.

SEDULIUS, Caius Caecilius, or Cassilius, a Christian poet and priest of the fifth century; lived during the reign of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. Of his life nothing is known with certainty; but his Carmen paschale, written in hexameters, was printed in 1473, and again in 1773, and Arevalo, 1794.

SEDULIUS SCOTUS, or SEDULIUS JUNIOR, was a Christian author of the eighth century, who wrote Collectanea in omnes epistolas S. Pauli, forest, London, 1061; A short catechism. See Wood: Alh. Oxon., ed. Bliss, iii. 441-444.

SEENING GOD. It belongs to the deepest endeavors of all religions to make sure of the nearness of the Deity: hence those places are especially sacred where he is said to reveal himself, and those persons are holy who are found worthy of that nearness, or have that higher faculty to bring others in a near relationship to the Deity. The highest degree of that desire is to see the Deity in essential reality. In the Bible also we find such a desire expressed, which is one of the most deeply rooted instincts of the religious man. This instinct is satisfied (even the sensual part of man may partake of it), but the mode of seeing changes as the degree and manner in which God appears. In this respect we find, especially in the Old Testament, the prevalence of popular views. Thus the main idea is this, that the common man (i.e., one whom no special holiness protects) must die when he sees God in the form peculiar to him. This form shows itself at first in the fiery appearances in heaven. Lot's wife dies, because she curiously sees the fiery judgment of Jehovah (Gen. xix. 26). Gideon and Manoah expect death, because they have seen the angel of the Lord in the fire (Judg. vi. 23, xiii. 22). For the same reason the people removed from Mount Sinai when they saw God in the cloud, smoke, and lightning (Exod. xx. 18, 19; Deut. xvii. 18). The explanation of that incapacity which makes it impossible for man to behold God when he shows himself in his power, lies in the fact of man's frail strength: he is flesh (Deut. v. 26). But the deeper knowledge of the divine will overcomes this hinderance. God will give blessing and grace. His appearances become by degrees the sign of this heavenly grace. The transition is made in the examples of Gideon, Manoah, and Hagar; since that God who promises blessing and salvation cannot let the guiltless die. Yes, it is one of the strongest proofs of the grace of God in the theocratic covenant, that Jehovah himself leads his people in the pillar of fire and smoke: it is a clear proof of Israel's religious superiority above all other nations, that it saw God in his peculiar glory, without dying (Deut. iv. 38, v. 24), or, as it is so emphatically expressed by Moses, "The Lord talked with you face to face." (Deut. v. 4). But the behavior of the people caused a limitation in God's appearance. The stranger, or unclean, who approached the holy place, must die, as well as the Israelite who entered the sanctuary. Only God's elected, like those seventy elders who saw God (Exod. xxiv. 9, 10), may see God. But the circle becomes smaller still: only the patriarch Israel has seen God face to face (Gen. xxxii. 30); only Moses, the mediator and man of God, speaks with Jehovah as a man speaketh unto his friend (Exod. xxxiiii. 11). And, because none else has experienced such fulness of grace, Moses is also the highest prophet. Whereas others see God in visions and dreams, he sees God from face to face, and sees the similitude of the Lord (Num. xii. 8). For God must have some kind of similitude, otherwise he could not be seen with the eye,—a similitude different from the manner in which he appears in the storm and fire. This representation is popular (1 Kings xxxii. 19 sq.); but it excludes every corporeity, and in its unreflected form it is rather the concrete expression, in part of the reality, in part of the personality, of God, and forms the necessary basis for the possibility of that seeing. But already in the history of Moses we meet with a peculiar narrative (Exod. xxx. 12-xxxiv. 7) which opposes that view which has thus far been advanced. In the first instance we are told that no man shall live who sees God (Exod. xxx. 20): in the second instance we are told that God's face cannot be seen at all (Exod. xxxiiii. 20, 23). Instead of this, Moses hears an explanation concerning his goodness and his name, his volition full of mercy and grace. With this, the visible seeing of God is made impossible, and thus we find it in the psalms and prophets; and the seeing of God is nothing else than the experience of his helpful presence, which takes the habitation of Jehovah, the temple, for its starting-point (Ps. xiii. 3). Hence, also, the hope of Job (xiv. 20), "I shall see God," i.e., I will experience his helpful grace visibly, not in the other life, but in this life; thus, also, Hezekiah (lsa. xxxviii. 11). The highest fulfillment of all religious wishes involves Ps. xi. 7: "His countenance doth behold the upright." Especially interesting and much disputed is the passage Ps. xvii. 13: "I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." Here, as in Num. xii. 8, the similitude of God appears as the object of the seeing of God, but only in so far as the strict carrying-out of the idea that God is seen in the Father is possible: it is used to express prophetic vision. In Ps. xviii. the theophany is the mediation for the singer's salvation; but in Isa. vi., Ezek. i. 20, Dan. vii. 9, it connects itself with the illumination of the prophet and his call. The image of the sovereign occupies the foreground; but in Isaiah and Ezekiel it is surrounded by the original appearances of the theophany in cloud, smoke, fire, etc. In Isaiah we also perceive the old fear of death because of the presence of Jehovah: he acknowledges he is a man of unclean lips, and dwelling in the midst of a people of unclean lips. "Human unworthiness is here reduced, not to the fact that man is flesh, but to the idea of uncleanness, which, however, by that addition, receives another signification. The lips mediate the word which comes out of the heart: hence it refers to the sins of the heart and to sins committed by word; they make the presence of Jehovah sitting on his throne, so long intolerable to men, until holy fire has purged him.

By combining this idea with Ps. xi. 7 we approach the word of Christ, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (Matt. v. 8); with this the hope of the fulfilment of the highest religious desire, the deepest knowledge of God with the richest enjoyment of grace and blessedness, is given to them, only these goods receive a fulness and perfection, because of the presence of God, "him, and who fairly worshipped him, lieth was like Savonarola. He has been styled the "restorer of Italian eloquence." His sermons were modelled upon Chrysostom's, but without servility. They are, however, frequently marred by trivial remarks and stories. When the Jesuits at Rome perceived that Quietism was slowly destroying the uniting force of determining Romanism, and particularly Jesuitism, they sent him "a bundle of Quietistic books with directions to prepare an antidote to them." So in 1800 he published at Florence a small volume with the title, Concordia fra le fatica e le Quiete ("harmony between effort and Quiet") in which, without naming Molinos, or depreciating the contemplative life, he endeavored to show that the successful prosecution of Quietism was possible only to a few. "He insists that the state of contemplation can never be a fixed or permanent state, and objects therefore to closing the middle way;" i.e., now meditation, now contemplation. His book raised, however, a storm of opposition from the then powerful Quietists, and was put into the Index. He prudently remained away from Rome. In 1622 Pope Innocent XI., in the person of M. Molinos, was the preacher-in-ordinary, and theologian of the penitentiary.

SEIR, or LAND OF SEIR (Gen. xxxiii. 3), also MOUNT SEIR (Gen. xxxvi. 8), is the name of the mountain ridge extending along the west side of the valley of the Arabah, from the Dead Sea to the Elatonic Gulf. The southern part of this range now bears the appellation esh-Sherah. The height of the ridge is from between three thousand and four thousand feet, and the length from the north towards the south about twenty miles, and the breadth from three to four miles. One of the highest points of the eastern range is Hor, with Aaron's tomb (Num. xxxiii. 38). Wadys break frequently through those mountains, and water fertile valleys, especially in the north-eastern part. The western part, bordering on the Arabah, is rather a desert. Mount Seir was originally inhabited by the Horites, or Trogloites, who were dispossessed, and apparently annihilated, by the posterity of Esau, who dwelt in their stead (Deut. ii. 12). Though the country was afterwards inhabited by the inhabitants of Moab and Moabites, the desert nature of the rock, tilling a valley three-quarters of a mile and a half long, called the Sik ("cleft") of the rock, made the route through into the valley beyond (Num. xx. 8). The rock of red sandstone towers to a height of from one hundred to three hundred feet above the traveller's head as he rides along upon his camel, and in places the way is so narrow that he can almost touch the sides on either hand. Once the way was paved, and bits of the pavement can be seen. Abruptly the traveller comes upon the so-called Khaznet Fir'aun ("treasury of Pharaoh"), and a triumphal arch. But upon the city rests the curse forever, so also Aquila; while in the Septuagint the word used is láwbáyá, - itself ambiguous. The rabbins followed the Targum, and explained "Selah" by "forever." Modern scholars are much divided. Gesenius interprets it as denoting a pause in the song while the music of the Levites went on. Hengstenberg also renders it "pause," but refers it to the contents of the psalm, - pause to reflect upon what has been sung. Ewald, and, after him, Perowne, render it "pause, but in this direction to the music," - to strike up in a louder strain. Others, again, refer the elevation, not to the music, but to the voice. Alexander thinks it is a pious ejaculation to express the writer's feelings, and to warn the readers to reflect. (See Wright's art. in Smith's Dict. of the Bible.)

SELDEN, John, an erudite writer on law and Hebrew antiquities; was b. at Salvington, Sussex, Dec. 16, 1684; d. at White Friars, Nov. 30, 1654. At the age of fourteen he entered Hart College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1602 and entered Clifford's Inn, and in 1604 the Inner Temple, for the study of law. He attained singular learning in this department, and published several scholarly works upon legal subjects, as England's Epinomis and Jani Anglorum factiones altera (both 1610). Another fruit of his earlier studies was the Analec AnglorumBritannicam, relating to the history of England before the Norman Conquest, which was finished in 1606, but not published till nine years later. In 1617 he published his great work, De Dis Syris, which established his reputation on the Continent, and was republished at Leyden (with additions by Le Dieu and Heinaius), 1627, and Leipzig, 1662, 1680. In 1818 appeared the History of Titles, which denied the divine right of the system, and called forth the wrath of the king, so that the author was obliged to revoke his positions. Selden sustained an intimate relation with the political movements for thirty years. In 1621 he was called by the House of Commons to give his opinion concerning the dispute between it and the Crown, and strongly advised the Commons to insist upon its proper rights. In consequence of this advice he was imprisoned by the king. In 1624 he represented Lancaster in Parliament; 1625, Great Bedwin; and, after that, Lancaster in several Parliaments. He was active in the popular cause, signed the remonstrance for the removal of the Duke of Buckingham, and was a prominent supporter of the Petition of Right. In 1629 he represented the university of Oxford in the Long Parliament. In 1640 he represented Lancaster in Parliament; 1641 he was committed to the Tower, from which he was released in 1631 on bail, and in 1631 without support of the Petition of Right. In 1621 he was chosen one of the members of the Westminster Assembly, and the following year subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant, and was made master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. His funeral sermon was at "his request preached by his old friend, Archbishop Ussher.

Selden was a man of immense learning and a prolific author. A tablet at Oxford calls him the coryphæus in antiquarian studies (antiquariorum coryphæus). Two of his greatest works were written during the years of his imprisonment (1609-34), — De jure naturali et Gentium juxta disciplinam Hebraorum, in seven books, and De successione in Pontificatum Hebraorum. His last work was De synodis et prefecturis iuridicis veterum Hebraorum, in three books. Among Selden's other works were the Dulleo, or Single Combat (1610), Titles of Honor (1614), an elaborate account of the Solemn League and Covenant, and was made master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. While curate at Windsor in 1841, he brought youths from Melanesia to New Zealand, who, after receiving instruction, returned to enlighten their countrymen. In 1855 this branch of work was intrusted to Bishop Patteson. In 1857 he obtained the division of his diocese, and ten years later became bishop of Lichfield. His administration of this new and trying sphere, comprised the so-called "Black Country," for this purpose. SEMI-ARIANS. This name occurs for the first time in the name of a party in the period when the decided Arianism of Acacius and Flavios was assailed itself, and such men as Ursacius, Valens, and Eudoxius of Antioch, who were influential with Constantius, favored a modified form of Arianism. At this time men like Basil of An条ya, Eustathius of Sebaste, and Macedonius of Constantinople, arose, opposing Arianism by declaring the generation of the Son to be a distinct conception from creation, and affirming that the Son resembled the Father in his essence (ἰδιωτικὸς ἐστι). In essential particulars this was the view which Eusebius of Cesarea had represented at Nicea. The Logos is God of god, and Light of light, but at the same time only the brightness of the first light, the image of the first substance, and different from it. The Son was not absolutely eternal (σαρκοῦχος, ἡμιοίωνος), the definition that the Son is like the Father, and the statement that the manner of his conception is inexplicable — to put a stop to the controversy. Eudoxius at a synod in Antioch explained this decree, in an Arian sense, but all the parties. The statement of the synods of Sirmium (331), condemn, on the one hand, the Nicene definition as leading to Sabellianism, and, on the other hand, the Arian doctrine of the creation of the Son as unscriptural. According to the synod of Antioch, God the Father alone has absolute being, and the Son, though begotten before all time, was begotten by the free will of the Father, and not by virtue of necessity, and is subordinate to him. At the second synod of Sirmium, Ursacius and Valens sought — by the supposition of the subordination view of Origen. After the Council of Nicea this mediate view prevailed in the East, which refused to accept either Arianism or the Nicene definition. Attempts were made by this party to formulate the doctrine of the sonship of Christ in such a way as to unite all the parties. The statement of the synods of Antioch (343). Philippos, the first synod of Sirmium (331), condemned, on the one hand, the Nicene definition as leading to Sabellianism, and, on the other hand, the Arian doctrine of the creation of the Son as unscriptural. According to the synod of Antioch, God the Father alone has absolute being, and the Son, though begotten before all time, was begotten by the free will of the Father, and not by virtue of necessity, and is subordinate to him. At the second synod of Sirmium, Ursacius and Valens sought — by the supposition of the words in dispute (πατρὶ, ὄνομα, ὄνομαως), the definition that the Son is like the Father, and the statement that the manner of his conception is inexplicable — to put a stop to the controversy... Eudoxius at a synod in Antioch explained this decree in an Arian sense, but all the more positively did the Semi-Arian synod of Anacrya (353) oppose Eudoxius. Constantius wished to settle the dispute by summoning a general council. Dissuaded from this plan, the two synods of Ariminum in Italy, and Seleucia in Isauria, were held, in which the Orientalists and Occidentals were kept apart. It was hoped both synods would agree to the so-called third Sirmian formula, which had been agreed to in 358 by Ursacius and Valens on the one hand, and Basil of Anacrya, and Georgius of Laodicea on the other, at the court at Sirmium. Both councils were ready to declare in favor of the Nicene formula, the Seleucian synod, however, excepting the word ὄνομαως (of the same substance). But they finally gave way to the court party, and accepted the Sirmian formula. The court influence understood how to render the Semi-Arians harmless, and Eudoxius was raised to the see of Constantinople. The Semi-Arians gradually approached the advocates of the Nicene doctrine; and Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Gregory of Nyssa, contributed very much towards the currency of the Nicene views. At the Second Council of Constantinople (381), the Nicene theology was adopted, and Semi-Arian as well as Arian views were condemned.

SEMINARIES, Theological, Continental, are divided into four classes: (1) The Roman-Catholic, according to the plan of the Council of Trent, in which boys of twelve years are received, trained in theological and secular studies apart from all worldly influences, and remain until they are ordained priests; (2) The evangelical seminaries in the kingdom of Württemberg, which receive boys of fourteen years, train them until they are eighteen, then send them to the university of Tubingen for further theological study, whence they issue as assistant pastors; (3) Institutions which receive the candidates for the ministry after they have finished their theological studies at the universities, and train them in practical ministerial duties; (4) Institutions which give training in homiletics and catechetical work. Before the Council of Trent, the institutions of the first class were called "schools," or "colleges." The discipline was monastic. The principal was an abbot, or, in the case of schools directly under episcopal control, a "scholasticus," who was always a clergyman. The rise of the universities destroyed these schools; but the Jesuits restored them, and after Trent they were called "seminaries." Instruction is given in grammar, singing, the ecclesiastical calendar, the Scriptures, service-books, the homilies of the saints, the ceremonies of the sacraments, and other matters relating to the services. Mass must be daily heard, and confession and communion be monthly. Every bishop must have such a school attached to his cathedral or metropolitan church.

II. The first seminary in the Protestant sense was the "canonicum," which became a "seminary" in Württemberg, to honor the Luther city, which had been deprived of its university. The Reformed seminary at Herborn replaced the old "Orange and Nassau high-school." In 1837 the seminary at Friedberg was founded. The Moravians have seminaries in Guadenfeld and Nazareth (Pennsylvania, U.S.A.).

III. In Greece the future priests are instructed in the service of the church, they generally become monks. The schools for the education of priests' sons are of three grades,—schools, seminaries, academies. In the lowest, the scholars enter at seven, and remain until twelve years old. In the latter years of their stay they are taught Latin and Greek; so that, even if they do not go to a seminary, they can serve as reader or chorister in village churches. There may be several such schools in a parish, but there can be only one seminary. The latter is under immediate episcopal direction. The principal is a monk, archimandrite, or aspirant to a bishopric. The professors are partly monks, and partly laity. Their number is great, for there are sometimes as many as twenty in one seminary. Some have a Latin school, and also a Greek school. The bishop presides, and every priest has the right to send his sons thither; and, as there are not enough churches for the priests thus educated, many of the scholars go into other callings.

SEMI-PELAGIANISM, a term invented by the schoolmen, denotes a view which was developed within the time of the Fathers, and which tries to follow a middle course between Augustine and Pelagius. In the West the powerful personality of Augustine, the vigorous proceedings of the African Church, the assent of the see of Rome, and the effective aid of imperial rescript, procured the victory for the views of Augustine; but in the East the Greek Church continued its course, unconcerned by what took place in the West, even after the condemnation of the Nestorians, and implicitly also of the Pelagians, by the synod of Ephesus. Soon, however, it became apparent, that, even in the West, there were many people who took offence at the rigorism of Augustine, and still more who believed that they were following him, though they had really no idea of the consequences which his doctrine involved.

The discrepancy became patent before Augustine died. His two pupils and friends, Prosper of Aquitaine, and Iliary, informed him by letters (Aug. Ep. 255 and 266) that the monks of Massilia accused him of having, in his controversy with Pelagius, set forth propositions which contradicted the doctrine of the Fathers and the church in general. In the synod of Orange, the monks are described as holding, that by faith and baptism any one can be saved, if he only will; that the will to be saved is implanted in human nature by the Creator himself; that predestination either must presuppose a difference of human nature, or lead into fatalism, etc. It is evident that those monks simply wanted to find a middle way between the Augustinian doctrine of predestination and the Pelagian doctrine of the free will of man. At their head stood John Cassianus, a pupil of Chrysostom, and for some time an inmate of an Egyptian desert monastery, whose writings, glowing with monkish fervor, show marks of influence from the Greek theology. The report of Prosper and Iliary called forth the two treatises of Augustine, De praedestinatione sanctorum and De dono perseverantiae; but they did not succeed in convincing the Massilian monks. Shortly after (430), Augustine died, and Prosper found himself the chief opponent of the Semi-Pelagian movement. He repaired to Rome, and induced Pope Celestine to address a letter to the bishops of Gaul (Mansi: Coll. Conc., iv. p. 451). The letter is unconditional in its defence of Augustine, and full of reproaches against those bishops of Gaul who introduced novelties, and put forward inarticulate and useless questions. But it is strikingly silent about the real point at issue. Nor did Sixtus, the successor of Celestine, find it suitable to be more explicit on the matter. Meanwhile Prosper wrote his various books against the Semi-Pelagians (see the respective articles), and others came to his aid. The De vocione genitum, generally supposed to have been written by Augustine, was ascribed to Leo the Great, and found among his works, is an attempt at reconciliation. The expressions are very much mitigated; but, as nothing of the principle has been given up, it exercised no influence. On the contrary, the Augustinian doctrine of predestination now began to be attacked, even with great harshness, by people who did not belong to the Semi-Pelagian camp; and its adherents, though never condemned by the church as a sect, were marked out by the Semi-Pelagians as prædestinati. Interesting in this respect is the Prae-

SEMITIC LANGUAGES. I. NAME. — Up to the latter part of the last century, before Sanskrit was known to Europe, or attention had been directed to the Central and Eastern Asiatic tongues, or those of Africa (except Coptic), the title of Oriental languages signified only Hebrew and its sister dialects: these alone, with the exception of Coptic, had been the object of scientific study. Up to this time, all study of non-classical languages was connected with the Bible; and it is to biblical students that we owe what was done in Hebrew, Arabic, Ethiopic, and the related tongues, for the preceding three hundred years. But when the linguistic circle began to widen, and attempts were made at classification, the need of special names for the different linguistic groups was felt; and, for the more general divisions, recourse was naturally had to the genealogies in the table of nations in Gen. x. The credit, if such it be, of having originated the name "Semitic" (from Noah's son Sem, or Shem) for the Hebrew group, is to be given either to Schlozer or to Eichhorn, — to the former of the two is doubtless due the use of the term in Schlozer's article on the Chaldeans, in Eichhorn's Repertorium, 8, 181 (1781), and he seems to claim the honor of its invention; but a similar claim is made by Eichhorn himself, without mention of Schlozer, in his Allgemeine Bibliothek, 6, 772 (1791). Eichhorn, however, appears to have been accepted as the author of the name: he is so said to be by Adelung (Methoritites, I. 300; 1800), from whose manner of speaking of it we may infer that it had not then come into general use. In a short while, however, it was everywhere adopted, and is now the recognized name of this group of languages. In Germany and France, and to some extent at least in England (so Coleridge, Table-Talk, 1837), the form "Semitic" was employed (after Latin Semiticus, and in the English text, "Sem" instead of Hebrew "Shem"); while some English and American writers prefer the form "Shemitic," after the more accurate transliteration of the Hebrew. Between the two there is little to choose. The shorter form, now the more common one, is preferable to the other, because it is shorter, and in so far as it is farther removed from genealogical misconception. The once popular but unscientific threefold division of all the languages of the world into Japhetic, Semitic, and Hamitic, is now abandoned by scholars. "Semitic" is misleading, in so far as it appears to restrict itself to the languages spoken by the peoples mentioned in the table of nations as descendants of Shem; while it in fact includes dialects, as the Phoenician and Philistine, which are assigned in the table to Ham. The form "Semitic" (in English, but not in German and French), as farther removed than "Shemitic" from "Shem," may, perhaps, be more easily treated as in itself meaningless, and made to accept such meaning as science may give it. On the other hand, as meaningless, it is felt by some to be objectionable; and other names, expressing a geographical, or ethnic, or linguistic differentiation of the languages in question, have been sought, e.g., Western Asiatic, Arabian, Syro-Arabian; but none proposed have been definite and euphonic enough to gain general approbation, and it is likely that "Semitic" will retain its place for the present. If a new name is to be adopted, some such term as "Triliteral" would be the most appropriate; since triliterality of stems is the most striking characteristic of this family of languages, and is found in no other family.

II. TERRITORY. — In ancient times (c. B.C. 1000) the Semites occupied as their proper territory the south-western corner of Asia; their boundaries, generally stated, being, — on the east, the mountain range (modern Kurdish) running about forty miles east of the Tigris River, and the Persian Gulf; on the south, the Indian Ocean; on the west, the Red Sea, Egypt, the Mediterranean, and Cilicia; and, on the north, the Taurus or the Macus Mountains. The north and east lines are uncertain, from the absence of full data in the early Assyrian records. Not long before the beginning of our era, Semitic emigrants from Southern Arabia crossed the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, and occupied the part of Africa lying just south of Egypt, their territory being about that of the modern Abyssinia: these were known as the Geez ("the first," or lying just south of Egypt), while a branch of another high Semitic dialect, the Geez ("emigrants," "freemen"), or Semitic Ethiopians. The main Semitic region thus lay between the tenth and thirty-eighth degrees of north latitude and the forty-fourth and sixtieth degrees of east longitude, with an area of over a million square miles. Semitic colonies established themselves early in Egypt (Phoenicians in the Delta, and perhaps the Hyksos), and on the north coast of Africa (Carthage and other cities) and the south coast of France (Marseilles) and Spain, but probably not in Asia Minor or in Greece. In modern times, Syrian Semites are found in Kurdistan, as far east as the western shore of Lake Urmi (lat. 37° 30' N.; long. 45° 30' E.); but it is doubtful whether this region was Semitic before the beginning of our era. A large part of the Semitic territory was desert. Only those portions which skirted the banks of rivers and the shores of seas were occupied by settled populations; the desert was traversed by tribes of nomads, whose life was largely predatory. Semitic speech is interesting, not from the size of the territory and population it represents, but from the controlling influence it has exerted on human history through its religious ideas.

The original seat of the Semites is unknown. There must have been a primitive Semitic race and a primitive Semitic language, which existed before the historical Semitic peoples and dialects had taken shape; but of this primitive race we can say no more than that it goes back to a remote antiquity; since of one of its daughters, the Babylonian people, there are traces in the fourth millennium B.C. It has been attempted to determine the habitat of the Semites, before they broke up into separate nations, from their traditions, and from the vocabulary of the primitive tongue made out by a comparison of the existing dialects; but no trustworthy result has been reached. The oldest accounts say nothing definite. In Gen. xi. 2, for example, we have the statement that the whole body of the descendants of Noah journeyed "eastward" (so סֵפָר is to be rendered), that is, toward the Tigris-Euphrates region; but we are not told from what point they came, nor is there here any thing of a separate Semitic people. Again: in the same chapter, the assembled human race is said to have been scattered from the city Babel, without, however, any indication of the points to which the descendants of Noah's three sons severally went. At most, we may see here a dim feeling that the Semites had once lived together in the Tigris-Euphrates valley; but this might be referred to the fact that the Hebrews knew that they themselves had come from that region to Canaan. No other Semitic people has, so far as we know, any ancient tradition on this point. The evidence from the primitive Semitic vocabulary is equally vague. Its terms for land, mountains, rivers, seas, metals, grains, fruits, and animals, do not allow us to fix on any particular spot in Western Asia as the locality where such terms must have originated. We are obliged, therefore, to reject the hypotheses which make the mountains of Armenia, or the lower Tigris-Euphrates valley, or the Arabian Desert, the cradle of the Semitic race, and to leave the question unsolved.

The Semitic territory was enclosed by that of great rival peoples, Indo-Europeans (Persians and Greeks) on the east and the west, and Egypt on the south. In ancient times, however, the language was very little affected by foreign influence, except at one point. According to the view now held by most Assyriologists, the Babylonian-Assyrians, conquering the non-Semitic Accadian-Sumerians, who preceded them as occupants of the Tigris-Euphrates valley, in adopting the civilization of the conquered, adopted a number of their words, some of which are found in Hebrew also, and in others of the dialects. Hebrew made a few loans in early times from the Egyptian, and at a later period, possibly from the Indian, and then from the Persian, Greek, and Latin; and the ecclesiastical Aramaic was naturally greatly affected by Greek and Latin. The loan-words are easily recognized, except those which come from the Accadian-Sumerian.

All the Semitic nationalities, except the Arabian and the Geez (Ethiopia), died out before the second century of our era. The Babylonian-Assyrian disappeared from history in the sixth century B.C., and their language survived only a few centuries. The Phoenicians lingered in Asia till the time of the Antonines, and their language in Africa (Carthage) till toward the fifth century of our era (mentioned by Augustine and Jerome). The Syrian Aramaeans lost their independence in the eighth century B.C., but continued to exist, and their dialect revived in the second century A.D. as a Christian language; and the Jewish Aramaic continued for some centuries (up to the eleventh century A.D.) to be the spoken and literary tongue of the Palestinian and Babylonian Jews. The Jewish people, broken up by the Romans in the first century A.D., and scattered over the world, have carried Hebrew with them as a learned, artificial tongue. The Arabs did not appear as a nation till the sixth century. Geez proper died out about the sixth century. Its syntax appears to have been somewhat Semitized; the Indian Hindustani, which, developed under Moslem influence, also contains a large number of Arabic words; and the Turki-h.

Of these the following are now spoken: (1) Aramaic, by the Nestorian and Jacobite Christians in Upper Mesopotamia, near Mosul, thence eastward to the western shore of Lake Urmii, and northward in the Armenian (Noldeke, Newgr. Gram. Einleitung); and by the remnant of the Mandaeans in Lower Mesopotamia (Noldeke, Mand. Gram. Einleitung). (2) Arabic is the only Semitic dialect that has now any real life. It is spoken in various sub-dialects, by the Bedawin of the Arabian Desert; in Egypt, and, as ecclesiastical language, in Turkey; in the Magreb (north coast of Africa); in Syria; in Malta, where the vernacular is a strange mixture, with Arabic as its basis, but many Italian and other words; on the coast of Malabar (the Malvili jargon). The Mosarabic, a Spanish-Arabic jargon formerly spoken in the south of Spain, became extinct in the last century. (3) Geez: the four dialects, Tigré, Tigrinya, Amharic, Harari, are still spoken in Abyssinia. (4) Hebrew is studied by the Jews as a sacred language, and by a few of them, chiefly the older orthodox bodies in Germany and Austria, as to some extent written and spoken. This spoken language contains a large admixture of modern European terms. The literary Hebrew of to-day occupies almost the same position among the Jews as Latin among us.

Of languages which have been strongly affected by Semitic tongues may be mentioned the Iranian Huzmaren, or Pahlavi (the language of the Zoroastrians), which is greatly Aramaized; the Persian, whose vocabulary is largely Arabic, and even its syntax appears to have been somewhat Semitized; the Indian Hindustani, which, developed under Moslem influence, also contains a large number of Arabic words; and the Turki-h. especially the literary and learned language of Constantinople, which in manner, and for the same reason, has a large infusion of Arabic.

IV. CHARACTERISTICS. — These may be divided into formal (grammar), material (vocabulary), and stylistic (rhetoric and thought). (1) Grammar. The Semitic phonetic system has a marked individuality. It is probable that the original Semitic alphabet was nearly identical with that of the classical Arabic, containing six gutturals (Aleph, Ha, Ha, Ila, Ayin, Gayin), five uvulars (Kaf, Ta, Za, Sad, Dad), two palatals (Kaf, Gam), two linguo-dentals (Ta, Dal), two labials (Pa, Ba), six liquids (Ra, Ya, Lam, Waw, and the nasals Min, Nun), three bilabials (Sin, Sin, Zayin), and perhaps six spirants (Kaf, Gam, Ta, Dal, Pa, Ba). No existing dialect has all these letters, but there are traces of most of them in all. Thus, comparison of Assyrian and Arabic makes it probable that the former contained all these h-sounds (ha, ha, ha), though only one of them (ha) is now found in it. Hebrew (Septuagint transliteration) seems to have possessed Gayin, as well as Ayin; the South Semitic group shows all the uvulars, and the Hebrew all the spirants. It may be, however, that the parent Semitic speech had fewer uvulars and spirants, and that the Southern group developed the former, and the Northern the latter. It is doubtful whether Hebrew Samek and Sin represent two different sounds. It is likely also that not all the sounds above mentioned are original, i.e., some of them may be merely modifications of earlier and simpler sounds; but we are concerned here only with the consonantal material possessed by the primitive Semitic tongue, and not with the material out of which its alphabet may have been formed. The Semitic alphabet is thus seen to be characterized by fulness of guttural, uvular, and spirant consonants. In the several dialects, the movement has been towards a diminution of the number of gutturals and uvulars; namely, by changing these into similar letters pronounced farther forward in the mouth. Assyrian, Galilean Jewish Arabic, and Mandean threw off the most of the gutturals; modern Arabic has diminished the number of its uvulars; and Goez, of its uvulars and gutturals. This is a tendency, observable in all languages, to bring forward the consonants, and thus facilitate their pronunciation. — The vowel material of the primitive Semitic was simple, consisting, probably, of the three vowels, a, i, u, with the corresponding long á, í, ú. These have been variously modified in the different dialects. Assyrian has é; Aramaic, é, ê; Hebrew, a, i, u, é, ê; modern Arabic, é, ê, aw, ë, ew; Goez, é, ê. — Morphologically, the Semitic languages belong to the class called inflecting, standing in this respect alongside of the Indo-European. Their most marked peculiarity is their triliterrialism: most stems consist of three consonants, which, by prefixes, affixes, and internal vowel-changes, all derived forms are made. The noun has gender (masculine and feminine), number, case. The verb has gender, number, person, but properly no distinction of tense (in the sense of time), instead of which there are two forms which denote respectively completedness and ingressiveness of action. The notions of reflection, intensity, causation, are expressed by derived verbal stems made by prefixes and infixes. — The Semitic syntax is marked by great simplicity of articulation. The different clauses of the sentence are, for the most part, connected by the most general word and; there is little or no inversion and transposition for rhetorical effect; there are no elaborate periods. The structure is commonly and properly described as monumental or lapidary. The most striking peculiarity of the syntax is the phonetic abridgment of the noun (status constructus) to show that it is defined by the following word or clause. The absence of compounds (except in proper names) is another marked feature, — an illustration of the isolating character of the thought. The whole conception of the sentence is detached, isolated, and picturesque. Of these general Semitic characteristics, the Hebrew and Assyrian, which first produced literatures, show the most, and the Aramaic and Arabic, whose literary life began late, the least. (2) Vocabulary. The Semitic word-material contains the development of the periods and the circumstances of the various peoples. The pre-Christian literary remains are very scanty. From the Israelites we have only a few prophetic discourses, historical books, and sacred hymns, and ethical works, together with several law-books, — no secular productions (unless the Song of Songs be so regarded); from the Assyrians, somewhat more, — royal and commercial inscriptions, artistic, calendrical, grammatical, and religious works, and fragments of epic and other poems; from the Phoenicians, a few short inscriptions; and from the others, nothing. The Hebrew literature is full in terms relating to religious feelings and acts, scanty in philosophical and artistic terms and in names of things pertaining to common life: the Assyrian has more of the last, but is equally deficient in the first. In later times, however, the Aramaic (classical and Jewish), and the Arabic under Greek influence, created larger vocabularies, and developed some power of philosophical expression. From the nature of the national culture, these languages, though their vocabularies are sometimes (the Arabic especially) very large, do not satisfy the needs of western life. They multiply words for objects and acts which we do not care to particularize, and are deficient in terms for those which we wish to express with precision. (3) The above description of the vocabulary and syntax will serve to characterize the style and thought of the Semitic tongues. The highest artistic shape they have not, either in prose or in poetry. They do not readily lend themselves to philosophy proper or to art. But in the simple expression of emotion, and the condensation of practical wisdom into household words, they are not surpassed by the most highly developed Indo-European languages: in these respects the Bible has an acknowledged pre-eminence.

V. LITERARY PRODUCTS. — It will be sufficient here to mention briefly the general characteristics of the literature of the Semitic languages: for more particular accounts see the articles on the different languages. Of the different forms of poetry, the Semites have produced only the lyric; such as the Old-Testament Psalms, the Syrian hymns, and the Arabian Kasidas. What has sometimes been described as Semitic epos and drama is either not Semitic (as the Assyrian Ishtar epics, which were borrowed from Semitic people); and the drama of the Jewish poet Ezekiel, which is an isolated imitation of the Greek), or not epos or drama (as the Book of Job, which is not a drama, but a religious argument carried on in the form of alternate speeches; and the Arabian romance of Antar, which is a string of loosely connected stories). The subjective character of the poetic thought is obvious: no action or phenomenon in outward nature or in human life is described for its own sake, but always as a part of the feeling of the writer. As poetry it takes high rank. The Hebrew lyrics are sonorous and rhythmical, the Arabian are ingenious and lively; the Syrian, however, are tame. The historical writing of the Semites has never attained a scientific or artistic form. It is either baldly anastatic (as parts of the Old Testament), or the declamation of the Koran. In other departments, as fiction and philosophy, the Semites have never been original, but always imitators (Thousand and One Nights, the Arabian philosophy. The Persian Arabic is, of course, not to be considered here.)
Semitic Languages.

VI. Relations to other Families of Languages. — So far as our present knowledge goes, it is doubtful whether the Semitic family is genetically connected with any other in the world. Various attempts have been made to show a relationship between it and its neighbors, especially the Indo-European and the Egyptian. In respect to the former, the attempt may be said to be wholly unsuccessful. The case is somewhat different with the Egyptian, between whose personal pronouns and the Semitic there is a remarkable resemblance; though this point of contact, considering the very great differences between the two families in other respects, gives an insecure basis for comparison. There is a similar resemblance between the structure of the Semitic verb and that of the Cushite group of languages (the Galla, Saho, and others, near Abe sina), but nothing definite. At most, we may conjecture an original Semitic-Hamitic family, out of which these two have grown; but in that case their separation took place so long ago, and their paths since that time have been so different, and the traces of kinship have been so far obliterated, that it is hard to see how any valuable results can be drawn from a comparison between them. One main obstacle in the comparison of Semitic words with others is the triliteralism of stems of the former; and it has therefore been attempted to reduce these to biliterals, but hitherto with indifferent success. It need not be denied that this problem may hereafter be solved, and comparisons instituted between Semitic and other families, that may be of service to all.

SEMLER, Johann Salomo, the founder of historical criticism of the Bible; was b. at Saalfeld, Dec. 18, 1725; and d. at Halle, March 4, 1791. Brought up in a pietistic circle, he entered the university of Halle, 1749, and was much influenced by the lectures of Baumgarten. He devoured a large mass of books, and mentions only one original idea of that period. " Already at that time I had some intimations of the difference between theology and religion." In 1750 he became editor of the local newspaper of Saalfeld, 1751, professor... of history at Altdorf, and six months later professor of theology at Halle, becoming Baumgarten's successor in 1787. He asserted the right to freedom of thought and investigation, and drew down upon himself the keenest criticism from orthodox circles. The Novæ bibliotheca ecclesiastica called him an "impious man, and worse than the Jews" (homo impius et Judonis pejor). He was the principal professor at Halle, and his reputation among the students increased in proportion to the attacks from outside. This feeling changed, however, to some extent, in 1778, when his Beantwortung der Fragmente eines Ungenannten exposed him to the charge of being double-tongued. During the last ten years of his life he spent much time in the laboratory, and became an advocate of alchemy. His interest in the mysterious had increased; and the miraculous cures of Gassner, and the miraculous faith of Lavater were the occasion for him to appear in the Berlin Monatschrift (1787) as an advocate of the possibility of miracles. Semler imagined he discovered a book which had prevailed up to that time was, the books of the Bible constituted one "homogeneous whole," all parts of which are equally inspired. To refute this opinion is the purpose of the Abhandlung vom freien Gebrauch d. Kanons, 1771-73, 4 vols. He tried to prove that the books of the canon were brought together by accidental considerations, and not according to any fixed and well-defined plan. He also maintained that the text had many variations. The Scriptures were not even designed to be a norm of faith for all men. Was not the Old Testament written for the Jews? Did not Matthew write for Jews outside of Palestine? etc. Paul alone taught that Christianity was the universal religion, and the catholic epistles were intended to harmonize the Jewish and Pauline types of Christianity. Here was the germ of the fruitful principle of the later Tubingen critics. Semler is never done stating the thought that Christ and the apostles accommodated themselves in their language to the popular notions of their day and the ideas of the Old Testament. In his commentaries on Romans, John's Gospel, the Epistles to the Corinthians, etc., he attempts to found his exposition upon the Jewish notions of that day. Of course, those things in which the New-Testament writers accommodated themselves to the opinions of their day are not to be believed by us. Nevertheless, Semler, with all his faults, is the author of the present method, in explaining a biblical author, of taking into consideration his purpose in writing and the historical environment. He reduced the difference between Christianity and natural religion to a minimum, but his Christian consciousness always insisted upon this difference. He sang Christian hymns, prayed with his wife, and they pledged one another to follow God only, and his commandments. "No one knows," he said, "what I feel when I think of God's goodness to me." In the department of church history Semler did not do as much as in that of biblical criticism. But he became the father of the history of Christian doctrine by his restless scepticism, which led to the minute investigation and clearing-up of many points. On the history of the first Christian centuries he published Selecta capita hist. eccles. Commentarii hist. de antiquo christianorum statu, etc. He issued in all a hundred and seventy-one publications, only two of which reached a second edition. Baur, after acknowledging the value of Semler's investigations, complains that he had no power of grouping or elaborating his theories. His work consisted only in a variety of disconnected results and truths. But, as Reuss says, it belonged to Semler to speak the magic word which emancipated theology from the fetters of tradition. Though piously inclined, he gave the traditional views a deadly wound. But he was neither the head of a school nor the prophet of the future. See SEMLER: Autobiography, 1781; EICHORN: Leben Semler's, in his Bibliothek, v.; H. SCHMID: D. Theologie Semlers, 1868; THOLUCK: Vermischte Schriften, ii. 39. THOLUCK.

SENECA, Lucius Annaeus, a distinguished philosopher and author of the first century of our era; [the son of a rhetorician; was b. in Corduba, Spain, about 8 B.C.; d. by suicide 66 A.D. Young Seneca was trained in his father's art, but subsequently abandoned the career of the orator. While travelling in Greece, he began to practise as an orator at Rome, and achieved forensic success. On a charge of adulterous connection with Julia, daughter of Germanicus, he was banished to Corsica, where he lived for eight years, composing the De consolatione ad Helviam liber and De consolatione ad Polybiurn liber. On the marriage of Agrippina to Claudius, he was recalled, and made tutor of the future emperor, Nero. During his incumbency he amassed great wealth, which became the occasion of his ruin. Looked upon with suspicion by Nero, he retired from the court; and, being accused with having had a share in the conspiracy of Piso, he received an order from the emperor to commit suicide. He at once obeyed the order by opening his veins, and bleeding to death in a hot bath.

Seneca's relation to Christianity has excited much interest, and awakened much discussion. Jerome (De script. eccl., 12) speaks of letters which passed between Paul and Seneca, and says they were read by many (leguntur a pluribus). Augustine (Ep. ad Macerd.) also refers to this correspondence. These are the only allusions to it during the first eight centuries, except the mention made by Honorius of Autun, Peter of Cluny, John of Salisbury, etc. These writers unanimously express the opinion that Seneca was a Christian, and that his correspondence with Paul is genuine. The critical spirit of the period of the Reformation called these judgments into question, especially Erasmus; and the correspondence was declared apocryphal. It would be difficult to find any one now who would deny this conclusion. Many collections have been made of the passages in Seneca's writings which seem to be Christian in tone. Among the latest and most elaborate is that of Amédée Fleury, in his monograph, S. Paul et Sénèque, recherches sur les rapports du philosophe avec l'apôtre et sur l'infiltration du christianisme naissant à travers le paganisme, 1853, 2 vols. Seneca's relation to Christianity has been exhaustively treated by Aubertin (Etude crit. sur les rapports supposés entre Sénèque et St. Paul, Paris, 1857), and F. C. Baur, in Hilgenfeld's Zeitchrift, 1858. The latter considers, in his usually profound way, the fundamental ideas of both men. The correspondence between Paul and Seneca consists of eight letters of the latter and six of the former, and bears upon its surface the stamp of an unscientific fabrication. Christ is not the topic, but the great ideas of religion and philosophy. But how did it come that Jerome and Augustine were both deceived? One explanation has been, that there was a genuine correspondence, of which this is the spurious imitation; and Seneca's promise in the ninth letter, to send to Paul his work, De copia verborum, is appealed to in confirmation of this theory. The more rational explanation is, that it was a forgery, and as such the outgrowth of the opinion that friendly relations subsisted between the apostle and the philosopher. This opinion was based upon those passages of the New Testament which speak of Paul's residence at Rome (Acts xxviii. 30; Phil. i. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 17), which would have afforded them opportunity to meet, and his acquaintance with Seneca's brother Gallio (Acts xviii. 12 sqq.). These passages are, however, so indefinite, that no one would have hit upon the idea of an acquaintance between Paul and Seneca but for other considerations which seemed to indicate that he had approached Christianity. The reason for such approach was derived from his own writings; and, if we pass by the exaggerated attempts to extract distinctively Christian ideas, we cannot overlook the peculiar coloring which Stoicism gets in them. We mention here two of Seneca's characteristics,—his practical tone and the tinge of mysticism with which his thinking is colored. Nor can we forget his frequent confession of universal error and estrangement, his references to a future life, etc. Such ideas as these do not, however, necessarily indicate that Seneca had come under the influence of Christianity. His thought always had a religious value; and while he appears first before Sidon, whose king, Elu-declare that he did. But Sennacherib demanded more than this from the Judean king. He had taken up his position at Lachish with the expectation of a battle against a most formidable enemy, namely, Egypt, which had joined the league against Assyria, and whose army, although too late to protect most of its allies, was on the way to meet Sennacherib. It was most important, therefore, to the Assyrian king that he should be secure in the rear. And Tartan (Assyr., turita, "general-in-chief"), was accordingly despatched against Jerusalem; and the Rab-shakeh (Assyr., rab-šak, "chief captain"), acting, no doubt, under orders from his superior, used every means of persuasion and threat, by word of mouth and by letter, to gain possession of the city (2 Kings xviii. 17–33 = Isa. xxxvi. 2–20; 2 Kings xix. 9–13 = Isa. xxxvii. 9–13; cf. 2 Chron. xxvii. 9–19). This despatch, so formidably backed, produced a great effect upon people and king (cf. 2 Kings xviii. 26, 37–xix. 4 = Isa. xxxvi. 11, 22–xxxvii. 4; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 18); but faith in Jehovah, stimulated by the exhortations of Isaiah, who had been a sturdy opponent of the Egyptian alliance (see, e.g., Isa. xxx., xxxi.), and yet believed in the certainty of a deliverance from the enemy at their doors, sustained the hearts of those within the city, and they did not yield (2 Kings xix. 5–7, 14–34 = Isa. xxxvii. 5–7, 14–35; cf. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 20 and 2–8). With rebellious Ekron on one flank, and obstinate Jerusalem on the other, Sennacherib felt that he was too far south to fight the Egyptians with safety; and he withdrew to the neighborhood of Eltekeh, where the expected battle took place. The Assyrian inscriptions claim the victory for Sennacherib; but the success was, at all events, not decisive enough to encourage him to follow it up. He contented himself with taking possession of the neighboring cities of Ekron, Timnath, and visiting the unfortunate Ekronites with condign punishment. He put to death the leaders of the revolt against Padi, and took many of the citizens to swell his train of prisoners. Padi himself he reinstated as vassal-prince upon the throne of Ekron.

Sennacherib's return to Assyria was immediately brought about, according to the biblical account, by the suiting of his host in a night at the hands of the angel of Jehovah (2 Kings xix. 33, 36 = Isa. xxxvii. 36, 37; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 31). The probable interpretation of this is, that a pestilence broke out in the Assyrian camp, and led to the abandonment of further operations in the West. The Egyptians told Herodotus (Ierod., ii. 141) a story, improbable enough, according to which the god Hephaestus (Ptah) sent field-mice into Sennacherib's camp; and these devoured the quivers and the bows and the shield-handles of his warriors, so that the next morning they fled without weapons. This shows, at all events, that the Assyrians employed vast numbers of camel drivers. Under his successors Sennacherib's host departed suddenly, and in consequence of a great misfortune in their camp, and to this extent confirms the biblical account.

One or two apparent discrepancies between the biblical narrative and Sennacherib's own account of his Palestinian expedition admit of explanation. The Bible speaks of Hezekiah's tribute as consisting of three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold (2 Kings xviii. 14). The inscriptions, which likewise give thirty talents of gold, say eight hundred talents of silver. This is probably due to a difference in the standard used, the Babylonian talent being to the Palestinian as three to eight. Further: the inscriptions represent the tribute of Hezekiah as sent after the battle at Eltekeh, with the obvious design of obscuring the partial lack of success which had attended the Assyrians both in that battle and before Jerusalem, and of closing their account with the mention of material tokens of victory. That the inscriptions say nothing of any failure to reduce Jerusalem, and nothing of the destructive providence which caused the return to Assyria, is in keeping with the boastful tone which characterizes the records of Assyrian kings.

After this campaign we have no mention of Sennacherib's presence in the West (cf. "and dwelt at Nineveh," 2 Kings xix. 36; Isa. xxxvii. 37). He reigned twenty years longer, and was engaged in important campaigns and great public works. The fourth, sixth, and eighth campaigns were against Babylonia, where a new pretender, Suzub, divided his attention with Merodach-baladan, whose frequent failure did not daunt him. As a result of the fourth campaign, Sennacherib established his son Assurnadin-sum (the 'Anapavodes, whom Ptolemy assigns to B.C. 699) as vice-roy of Babylonia. In the sixth campaign Suzub was again defeated, and brought captive to Nineveh; and in the eighth, which was evidently the fiercest struggle of all, Suzub again appeared in freedom, and in league with Nebosumisun, son of Merodach-baladan, made a renewed attempt to throw off the Assyrian yoke, but finally succumbed. Other expiditions of Sennacherib took him to the eastward; and one of these was a not very successful campaign against Elam, whose king repeatedly appears as an ally of Merodach-baladan and Suzub.

But Sennacherib distinguished himself by his building as much as by his fighting. Early in his reign he pulled down the royal palace on the northern mound of Nineveh, and replaced it by a magnificent structure, even in its ruins the largest of the Assyrian palaces yet discovered. It is now known as the South-west Palace of Kuyunjik. He erected a second palace on the southern mound of Nineveh (modern Nebi Yunus). He made a broad and splendid street through the city, and erected a bridge over the waters which protected the eastern gate,—the chief gate of the city,—through which the Assyrian kings and their armies often passed. He supplied the city with water by cutting at immense cost a canal from the high land near the city Kisiri, north-east from Nineveh, through which the waters of the Khoser were conducted to his capital, and provided for a constant supply by a system of feeders. In all these enterprises he employed vast numbers of captives as laborers. The quarries of the neighboring mountains furnished the stone that was needed, and timber and all costly things for the adornment of the palaces were brought from various conquered lands.

But Sennacherib was not permitted to end his days in peace. The prediction which Isaiah had uttered concerning him while he was still in Philiastia (cf. 2 Kings ix. 7 with Isa. xxxvii. 7) came true after twenty years. He was murdered by two of his sons, whose names the Bible has preserved to us as Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Kings xix. 37 = Isa. xxxvii. 28; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 21). Abdenus (Euseb.: Chron., I. 9) and Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb.: Chron., I. 5) also mention the murder of Sennacherib, but no account of it has yet been found in the Assyrian inscriptions. He was succeeded by his son, Esarhaddon.

SEPARATES, an American Calvinistic Methodist sect, composed of Whitefield's followers, which sprang up in 1750 under the name of "New Light." They were, however, subsequently organized into separate societies by Rev. Shubal Stearns, and then they took the name "Separate." Stearn became a Baptist in 1751, and many of the Separates followed him into that church; and the sect died out. "The distinctive doctrine of the sect was, that believers are guided by the immediate teachings of the Holy Spirit, such supernatural indications of the divine will being regarded by them as partaking of the nature of inspiration, and above, though not contrary to, reason." See Blunt: Dictionary of Sects, s.v.; Gardner: Faiths of the World, s.v.

SEPARATISM, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, means the spirit of separation in matters of faith: therefore Separatists are those who separate themselves from the State Church in order to seek in conventicles and prayer-meetings the edification they do not derive from the public religious services. They are very numerous in Russia and Württemberg. See Inspired Pietism, Russian Sects.

SEPHARVAIM (Heb., סֶפֶרָבָיִם; LXX, Σεφαρβαιμία; Assyr., Sippara, Sipara; Akkad., Zimbar, meaning unknown), a city of Northern Babylonia, is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible: 2 Kings xvii. 24, 31, xviii. 34 (Isa. xxxvi. 19), xix. 13 (Isa. xxxvii. 13). The last four passages name Sepharvaim among the cities conquered by the king (see 'Iwov iruTac, Euseb., Prep. Evang., 9, 12, and Chron. I. 7). It appears to have been a double city, with two separate parts: this follows not only from the dual form of the Hebrew Sepharvaim, but also from the distinction which the inscriptions make between "Sippara of the Sun" and "Sippara of the Goddess" Amunet. One of these twin parts was perhaps identical with the old city Agade (Akkad (?), so George Smith), which was undoubtedly in the immediate neighborhood.

Sippara was connected with Babylonian mythology; for, according to Berossus (see Euseb., loc. cit.), Xisuthros, the Babylonian Noah, was directed by a god, before the flood, to deposit in Sippara the records of antiquity, and after the flood his companions were ordered by a heavenly voice to dig up the tablets deposited by Xisuthros at Sippara, which they accordingly did. The temple of the sun-god discovered by Rassam is of unknown antiquity. It was already venerable when it was restored by Sargisli-Buria, a king who is believed to have lived about B.C. 1060. Tradition carried its origin many centuries farther back; and, indeed, an inscription of Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king, who reigned B.C. 555-538, makes the surprising statement, that, in exploring its walls and foundations, he came upon "the cylinder of Naram-Sin, son of Sargon, which for thirty-two hundred years no king going before me had seen." (See T. G. Pinches: Proceedings Soc. Bib Arch., Nov. 7, 1882.) If this statement is accurate, then we have a Semitic civilization (Naram-Sin is a Semitic name) in Northern Babylonia nearly four thousand years before Christ. There is no reason to doubt that Nabonidus gave these figures in good faith, but there are several grounds for questioning their correctness. (1) It cannot be proved, and is not probable, that the chronological records, which in later times, it is true, were preserved with minuteness and care (cf. the Assyrian Eponym Canon), extended back to so remote an antiquity. (2) "Thirty-two hundred" looks like an approximate, not an exact statement. (3) This statement throws back Sargon I. and Naram-Sin (from both of whom we have inscriptions) so far as to leave an immense gap between them and the later Babylonian kings, — a gap which no materials at our disposal enable us to fill. (4) Berossus, although he assigns many thousands of years to the prehistoric kings, does not trace the chain of kings by historical records back to B.C. 2500. It seems, then, probable that Sippara, though a very ancient city, has at present no claim to such an age as Nabonidus assigns to its temple. (See further, F. Hommel: Semit. Volker u. Sprachen, i. pp. 487-489.)

In 2 Kings xvii. 31 we are told that the Sepharvites (Heb., סֶפֶרָבָיִם; LXX, Σεφαρβαιμία) burnt their sons with fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, "gods of Sepharvaim." (The K'thib gives sing the Gospel. The Alleluia of the "Gradual," which was sung meanwhile, was consequently too short to cover his transit; and the last syllable

(at) was therefore protracted into "thirty, forty, fifty, or even a hundred notes." This was known as a "run," "cadence," or "neuma of Sentiments in this shape for about three hundred years. In 851 the abbey of Jumieges in Normandy was sacked by the barbarian Normans; and the monks fled, carrying their service-books with them. One arrived at the abbey of St. Gall, where was a celebrated school for church music, and brought thither a Gregorian antiphony in which words had been set to these otherwise meaningless notes of the neuma. The improvement was adopted at St. Gall. This is Dr. Pearson's version. But Dr. Neale maintains that Notker (Notkerus Vetus-tor, to distinguish him from a younger person of the same name) was the true author. This man (called Balbulus, "the little stutterer") had once been at Jumieges, and had there debated with this very refugee monk the question whether words ought not to be given to these notes. It is said that the sound of a mill-wheel furnished him with the idea. Further, that, on the arrival of the refugee, the twenty-year-old debate had been resumed. In consequence, Notker (for whose personal characteristics see Maitland: The Dark Ages) composed a sequence, or "prose" (prosa);
that is to say, an unmetered but rhythmical series of sentences. This he offered to Yso, the precentor. Upon emendation, it was adopted. There is no doubt that Notker deserves some credit;
but the Te Deum laudamus and the Gloria in excelsis Deo, to name no other ancient hymns, are of this form. The famous sentence, "in the midst of life we are in death," etc. (Media vita in morte sumus, etc.), and which is found in the Episcopal Prayer-Book, is his composition. It was inspired by the Martinsbruck bridge-builders swinging down over the torrent. Dr. Pearson admits Not-ker's invention of these rhythmical proeses; and the Laudes Deo concinat orbis universus, his first production, has been recently published. His sequency of the Holy Spirit (Sancti Spiritus adsit nobis gratia) was in use throughout Europe. In these sequences the choir "acts like the chorus of a Greek play," maintaining the attention in default of the principal act from the realizations of the principal parts. In the seventeenth century the rood-lofts became organ-lofts to such an extent that sequences, not being required, were disused. In later days the word "sequence" was (incorrectly) applied as synonymous with "hymn." Thus Adam of St. Victor (d. 1192) is called a writer of "sequences," and the Dies Irae is sometimes similarly entitled. Unless this term be employed with reference to the music, it is confusing; for that sense "sequence" differs from the "hymn" in being rhythmical without regular metre, and in possessing no rhymes at all. For the high ritualistic significance of its construction,

SERGIUS PAULUS. See Paul.
SERGIUS is the name of several saints and martyrs of the Roman-Catholic Church. One of them, a native of Rome, was martyred at Rosaph in Syria, 290; and in his honor the Emperor Jus-tian I. built the city of Rosaph Sergiopolis.
In his honor the Emperor Justinian I. built the city of Trullan Council, though his delegates had signed them. The emperor, Justinian II., proposed to compel obedience, and had already ordered the Pope to be transported to Constantinople, when he was himself deposed. Thus the Papal rejection of the Trullan Council remains unshaken, and became the starting-point of that contest between the Greek and the Latin churches which ended with their complete separation.—Sergius III. (844-847) was the first pope who had the courage to ask for no confirmation of his election and consecration by the emperor; and he succeeded in vindicating himself, though the Emperor Lothair, through his son Lewis and Bishop Drago, presented a formal protest in Rome. — Sergius III. (904-911), one of the basest characters ever placed on the Papal throne. He lived in open adultery to ask for no confirmation of his election and consecration by the emperor; and he succeeded in vindicating himself, though the Emperor Lothair, through his son Lewis and Bishop Drago, presented a formal protest in Rome. — Sergius III.

In the New Testament the brazen serpent is mentioned (John iii. 14, 15), where Jesus shows into Nicodemus that the events for seeing the kingdom of God, — first the subjective condition, the new birth (3-18); then the objective condition, through which the faith in the Son of man, as effected by the new birth, can bring life eternal (14 sq.). This latter condition consists in that the Son of man is lifted up like the serpent in the wilderness. Like the brazen serpent, he becomes an image of those punishments which man has incurred, and from which he asks to be delivered. Jesus had therefore to suffer the death of the cursed, which we had incurred, in order to relieve us from the curse. By looking toward him in faith, we are cured and saved, but not without being reminded at the same time of our own sins, for which he was crucified, and of the punishment which we have deserved. This is only true, and nothing is more, than that work by which Jesus has effected our redemption.

SERVETUS, Michael (Miguel Serveto), b. at [Tudela in Spain, Sept. 29], 1511; burnt at the stake in Geneva, Oct. 27, 1553. He studied jurisprudence at Toulouse; entered the service of Father Quintana, the confessor of Charles the Fifth, and accompanied him in 1529 to Italy and Germany. The minute circumstances, however, of his earlier life cannot be made out with certainty, as the explanations he gave before the court of Vienne often contradict those he gave before the court of Geneva. In 1530 he was at all events in Basel, and in the following year he published his De Trinitatis erroribus. While in Toulouse he began to study the Bible, and received a deep impression from it; but he was and always remained a self-taught man in the field of theology, without any true scientific training. He had, however, some talent for abstract speculation, and threw himself with ardent zeal on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, sure that the development which the doctrine had found in the church was utterly wrong, and eager to turn the course of the Reformation in the direction of his own speculation. He addressed himself to (Ecolampadius; and (Ecolampadius was unable to convince him that his speculations, directed against the eternal divinity of Christ, and leaving the Holy Spirit almost entirely out of consideration, were obscure, contradictory to the Bible, and blasphemous. When the book appeared, it made a great sensation; but all the Reformers denounced it, and Butzer even declared from the pulpit that the author ought to be punished with death. On his return to Basel, Servetus was cast into prison. His book was seized and burnt, and he was released only on condition of retracting; and indeed his next book (Dialogorum de Triniof the proceedings are a little difficult to form a definite opinion of. On Oct. 26, the court as his formal accuser. The issue of absolutely refused to recant, and on the following day at the instance of Calvin, who appeared before the city he was recognized (Aug. 13), and imprisoned. But he tarried for nearly a month difficult to live. But he tarried for nearly a month well provided with money.

His plan was to go to Naples, where, as a Spaniard and a good physician, he would not find it difficult to live. But he tarried for nearly a month in Geneva; and just as he was about to leave the city he was recognized (Aug. 13), and imprisoned at the instance of Calvin, who appeared before the court as his formal accuser. The issue of absolutely refused to recant, and on the following day he was publicly burnt. The impression which the affair made at the time was very varied. Melanchthon, Bullinger, and all the most prominent theologians of the Protestant Church, took the side of Calvin unconditionally. The Antitrinitarians, and all who in any way inclined towards the ideas of Servetus, were deeply provoked. The Roman Catholics exulted. Generally, however, the public disapproved of the proceedings of Calvin; and such a hail-storm of pamphlets, verse and prose, representing his character and conduct in the most odious light, came pouring down upon him, that he found it necessary to publicly defend himself. His Declaration appeared in the beginning of 1554 in French, and shortly afterwards in Latin: Refutatio. It was very severely criticised by one Vaticanus (Contra libellum Calvinii), who, however, was no adherent of Servetus. A remarkable book on the question is the De catholicis, an anti-papistic essay (sermon 1554), probably by Castellino. It is a collection of all the most noteworthy opinions pronounced upon the question.

vian history, so its suppression marks the lowest. In 1810, when Kara George freed his country from the Turks, the archbishopric of Carlovitz, in Hungary, which represents the patriarchate of Ipek, was acknowledged as the head of the Serb vian Church. The Turks reconquered the country; and when Milosh Obrenovic by his efforts, from 1815 onward, in 1830 secured a Hadi-sheikh from the Porte, which erected Servia into an autonomous principality, paying tribute to the Porte, the Church was also allowed to elect her own bishops and metropolitan, paying tribute to the Patriarch at Constantinople. In 1838, when the seat of government was removed to Belgrade, the metropolitan of that city was acknowledged as the head of the Servian Church, although the Archbishop of Carlovitz urged his claims. The treaty of Berlin, in 1878, made the principality of Servia wholly independent, and the connection of the church with that of Constantinople ceased. The Liturgy of the Servian Church is in ancient Slavonic, which is said not to differ more from modern Servian than does the English of Chaucer from that of the present day. Servia has a good public system of education. The parish priests of Belgrade and the more populous parts of the country are men of education and intelligence; but the standard in the mountainous regions of the interior, in this respect, is not as high as it should be. Freedom of worship is allowed, although proselytizing from the Established Church is forbidden. The metropolitan of Belgrade has five suffragans, each of whom presides over a diocesan consistory. The entire Protestant, Roman-Catholic, and Jewish populations together numbered in 1874 less than seven thousand. The districts annexed in 1878 contained a Mohammadan population of seventy-five thousand.

SETON (Mother), Elizabeth Ann (née Bayley), foundress of the Sisters of Charity in the United States; b. in New-York City, Aug. 28, 1774; d. at Emmittsburg, Md., Jan. 4, 1821. She married William Seton in her twentieth year. After his death (1803) she entered the Roman-Catholic Church, March 14, 1805. In order to support herself she taught school at Baltimore, 1806-08; but with her sisters-in-law, Harriet and Cecilia Seton, on the inheritance of eight thousand dollars from the Rev. Seton and Clous, part of the country, they had established the Sisters of Charity — they having taken the veil Jan. 1, 1809—at Emmittsburg, July 30, 1809. In 1812 the order had increased to twenty members, with Mother Seton as superior-general. At her death it numbered fifty. In 1814 the order took charge of an orphan asylum in Philadelphia, and in 1817 was incorporated by the Legislature of Maryland. See her biography by Winter, New York, 1858, and by Robert Seton, New York, 1869, 2 vols.

SEVEN, The Sacred Number. Among ancient nations, especially in the East, in India, China, Chaldea, Egypt, Greece, we find that a symbolical significance is attached to the number seven as a pre-eminently sacred number. According to the Indian doctrines, “man is the representative of the great seven developed essences; he is a symbol of cosmic harmony,” the “macro-cosmic heptachord” (v. Bohlen: Das alte Indien, ii. 247). The Chinese distinguished seven material souls in man, together with three spiritual souls (Ritter: Asien, i. 199). The Egyptians worshipped the seven planets (Diodor. Sic., ii. 30); and Herodotus tells of their seven castes (ii. 64; cf. Uhlmann: Aegyptologie, ii. 59, 103). There were the seven sacred “Hemips” of Greece and Rome; and hence the significance attached to Rome’s seven hills, to the seven reeds in the pipe of Pan, the seven strings of the lyre of Helios. With the heathen, the number seven — which also includes the seven planets, the seven colors in the rainbow, the seven tones in music — had almost exclusive reference to natural relations, to the seven sacred divisions of time, which all nations seem to have recognized; and Ilder (Chronologia, i. 178, ii. 473) traces the universal division of time into periods of seven days to the phases of the moon, or the duration of each of the four divisions of the lunar month of twenty-eight days. In place of all such material relations, the ethical and religious significance of seven was alone recognized by the Hebrews. The Bible begins, in the Book of Genesis, with a seven, and ends, in the Apocalypse, with a series of sevens. The symbolical value of this number is not to be sought for, with Winer (Real-wörterbuch, ii. 715), in the ideas attached by the ancients to the seven planets, but in the seven days during which creation arose from chaos [and was pronounced to be "very good"], when God "rested on the seventh day from all the work which he had made," when he blessed it and sanctified it as a day of rest for the creation also. With reference to this starting-point or sacred number—seven, or seven multiplied by seven—all the legal festivals were ordered. Thus the great festivals lasted seven days,—the passover [Exod. xii. 15], the feast of weeks [Exod. xxxiv. 22], the feast of tabernacles [Deut. xvi. 13]. Pentecost was seven weeks after the passover [Lev. xxiii. 16]; each seventh year was "a sabbath of rest unto the land" [Lev. xxv. 31-37]; the length of each curtain of the tabernacle court, which was seven by four by two, was "seven times ten cubits" [2 Chron. xv. 11, xvii. 11, xxix. 21]; the seven sons of Jesse, the seven sons of Japheth, the seven sons of Soceva, the seven disciples in John xxi. 2, and the seven times ten of the beast (Rev. x. 3, [xiv. 14, 29]; 2 Chron. xiv. 8, 2 Kings vi. 38, concerning Solomon's arrangements of the tabernacle, in the seven arms of the candlestick, in the seven vessels, adjuncts, measurements, and arrangements of the tabernacle, in the seven arms of the candlestick [and its seven lamps (Exod. xxv. 31-37); the length of each curtain of the tabernacle, which was seven by four cubits (Exod. xxvi. 2)]; the number of the pillars of the tabernacle court, which was seven by four by two [Exod. xxvii. 15]; the seven cornets in the seven altars of incense (Exod. xxv. 4), or of the water of purification (Lev. xv. 1, 3) or to forgiveness of them (Matt. xviii. 21). There are also the Heptads of the Apocalypse, such as are silently indicated, as in Rev. xii. 16, xvi. 12, xix. 18, xxii. 8, as well as such as are expressly indicated,—the seven churches (iii. 1 sq.), seven stars (v. 1 sq.), seven heads and seven angels (vii. 2 sq.), seven stars (vii. 16 sq.). There are also the Heptads of the Apocalypse, such as are silently indicated, as in Rev. i. 4, ii. 1, iv. 5, v. 6, and which again have for their basis the sevenfold designation of the Spirit of God coming down on the Messiah (Isa. xi. 2), we are entitled to regard the seven as the signature of the Holy Spirit, or of that triune God who historically and judicially reveals himself in the Spirit. The significance of the seven in the last book of the Bible evidently looks backwards to that given to it in the first book. On the application of the number seven in mediaeval art, science, liturgies, and mysticism, see Otto: Handbuch der kirchlichen Kunstarcheologie des Mittelalters, p. 283; De Wette: Geschichte der christlichen Sittenlehre, i. and ii. passim; Piper: Evangelisches Jahrbuch für 1886, pp. 76 sq.; Dürsch: Symbolik der christlichen Religion, ii. pp. 536 sq.

SEVEN SLEEPERS OF EPHESUS. See Ephesus, Seven Sleepers of.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS. I. Name. — In their early history in England this sect was known as the "Sababarian Baptists;" but, for the sake of greater definiteness, the General Conference in the United States changed it to its present form in 1818.

Origin. — The Seventh-Day Baptists as an ecclesiastical organization appear in England in the latter part of the sixteenth century. The lack of conformity to apostolic doctrine and church order on the part of the Established Church was the ground they alleged as the sufficient reason for separate organization. In formulating their doctrine and polity they undertook to follow the model of the Apostolic Church as nearly as circumstances would allow.

History. — Since the institution of the sabbath at the close of creation, and its formal pronouncement as a part of the Sinaitic code, it is believed that there has been an unbroken line of God-loving men who have kept the seventh day of the week as a sabbath, according to its original institution and enjoyment. None question that it was observed by Christ and his apostles, and by Chris-
SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

It had no rival day in the Church until about the middle of the second century, when Sunday began to be observed as a festival day in honor of the resurrection, along with Wednesday, Friday, and numerous other festal days of the Latin Church, then beginning to drift upon the first great wave of its apostasy. This church made the sabbath day a fast-day, not without sinister motives looking to its suppression in favor of the festival Sunday; while the Greek or Eastern Church steadfastly observed it as a day of holy delight in the Lord.

Controversy upon this subject began about the middle of the second century, and was kept up with a zeal amounting to bitterness for several centuries. In the Western Church the seventh day continued to be observed quite generally till the fifth century, and traces of it were noticeable in some parts of Europe much later. In Scotland and Ireland, as well as in England, the seventh day was regarded and observed as the sabbath in the eleventh century and later. In Skene's Celtic Scotland, p. 350, vol. 2, there is this statement: "There was no want of the veneration of Sunday, though they held that Saturday was properly the sabbath day, as was sustained from without. In the Oriental or Greek branch of the church the seventh day continues to be observed to this day.

There is not wanting evidence that an unbroken chain of observers of the seventh day was preserved, in the face of detraction and persecution, all through the dark ages, and that they appeared in the dawn of the Protestant Reformation, and were represented in that movement by a number of its prominent actors.

In the Abyssinian, Armenian, and Nestorian churches the seventh day has not yet been supplanted by the first day of the week. Consult Geddes: History of the Church of Ethiopia, London, 1834; Gobat: Three Years in Abyssinia, London, 2d ed., 1817; Stanley: History of the Eastern Church, 1911.

As these sabbath-keepers were pressed by persecutions, they were compelled to move to various parts of the world. In the terms of its constitution and in the real spirit of the Seventh-Day Baptist Church in America, in Newport, R.I., formed in 1704 by Rev. Abel Noble, a minister of large ability, from England. Five churches were formed at this time, drawing largely for adherents from the Keithian Baptists. From these, other churches were formed in South Carolina, Georgia, and in the western part of Pennsylvania, and still further west. A third centre was established at Piscataway, N. J., in 1705 where there is now a flourishing church. From these three radial points the churches have spread westward with the general tide of emigration, until there are now flourishing churches in all the states, with an aggregate membership of about nine thousand.

Church Polity. — This is strictly congregational. The annual conference has simply the power of an advisory council, and is composed of two delegates from each church, with an additional delegate for every twenty-five members. There are five associations, which sustain the same relation to the churches composing them as the conference does to all the churches. The associations may be represented by delegates in the conference, but with no power to vote as association in that body.

Doctrines. — The Seventh-Day Baptists believe in the general doctrines of salvation held by the evangelical churches, and differ from the tenets of the Baptists generally only in regard to the sabbath.

They believe, and conscientiously regulate their practice accordingly, that the seventh day of the week is the sabbath of the Lord, and that this, at its institution in Eden, and promulgation as part of the Sinaitic code, was made binding upon all men in all times; that, in the nature of its relation to God and to man, it is irreplicable.

In the terms of its constitution and in the reasons for its enactment it is inseparably connected with the seventh or last day of the week, and that any attempt to connect the sabbath law and Sabbath obligation with any one of the other days of the week is illogical, and in its tendency destructive of the whole Sabbath institution.

That the change of the day of the sabbath to Sunday has no warrant in the Scriptures, is only a human device brought about by such questionable and unjustifiable means as to give it no claim either to the respect or acceptance of Christendom. That the only stay to the wave of no-sabbathism now sweeping from Europe to America is the impregnable bulwark of the true sabbath of the Fourth Commandment.

Education and Publication. — The Seventh-Day Baptists have two flourishing institutions of college grade, one at Milton, Wis., the other at Alfred Centre, N. Y. This latter has a university charter, and is vigorously carrying on business, mechanical, and theological departments, in addition to its academic and collegiate courses. Both sexes are admitted on equal terms to these colleges, and over seven hundred students were in attendance in them the last year.

The publishing-house of the denomination is also at Alfred Centre, from which, besides a large number of tracts and books, it issues its weekly organ, the Sabbath Recorder, an eight-page paper of good size, ably edited, and executed in the best style of the art. A monthly, The Outlook, has an issue of over fifty thousand copies; and a finely illustrated Sabbath-school paper, Our Sabbath Visitor, is issued weekly.

missions. — For many years the denomination has had a mission in Shanghai, China, where it has accumulated considerable property, which it is now enlarging; and the mission force is to be enlarged at once by the addition of a female medical missionary.

General Reform. — Upon the questions of reform which have agitated the public mind, such as antislavery, temperance, religious liberty, Sabbath-observance, etc., these people have always maintained a consistent and radical position, favorable to the reforms sought.

The Rhetor, wrote in 386, on occasion of a fearful garrisons were built, agriculture was improved, and commerce flourished. Through their commercial and military connections with Italy and Rome the inhabitants of Noricum early became acquainted with Christianity, and after the law of Theodosius the Great, which in 392 prohibited all Pagan idolatry within the boundaries of the empire, Christianity was in fact the recognized religion of the country. Thus it can hardly be considered so very heavy a task which St. Severinus undertook when he settled at Faviana. His life by EUGIPPUS, in WELSER, Op. Hist. et phil., Nurmb., 1672, in Act. Sacra., Jan. 8, [ed. by H. Sauppe, Berlin, 1829, 38 pp.; [See A. A. SEMBERA: Wien d. Wohnsitz u. Sterbeort d. heil. Severin, Wien, 1882.] G. H. KLIPPEL.

SEVERINUS (Pope, 638-640), the successor of Honorius I. The Monothelite controversy was just raging, and caused him many difficulties. He condemned the Block of the Emperor Heraclius, and thereby the whole Monothelite doctrine.

SEVERUS, the name of three persons. (1) The Rheto, wrote in 386, on occasion of a fearful epidemic among the cattle, a carmen boculicum, generally called De moribus bonum ("On the death of the oxen"), or De virtute signi crucis domini ("On the virtue of the sign of the cross"), in which he tells us that the animals were saved from the plague by making a cross on their forehead. (2) Bishop of Mahon in the Island of Minorca, mentioned in 418, by an inscription found in the whole of Christendom that four hundred and fifty Jews had been converted and baptized on the intercession of Stephen, the first martyr, whose relics were deposited in the church of Mahon. The letter is found in BARONIUS: Ann. ad a. 418. (3) A Jacobite bishop of Egypt, who wrote in Arabic a history of the patriarchs of Alexandria, about 978.
SEVERUS, Alexander, b. at Arce, Oct. 1, 205; made Roman emperor March 11, 222; murdered at Mayence, March 19, 235. During his reign the Christians dared worship openly. He was a pantheistic hero-worshipper, and had busts of Abraham and Christian in his private chapel, with those of Orpheus and others.

SEVERUS, Septimius, b. at Leptis in Africa, April 11, 140; d. at York, Feb. 4, 211; became Roman emperor after the assassination of Pertinax in 193. He was a just but somewhat sombre character, not desistate of true religious feeling, but a mystic easily captivated by the fantastic practices of the Pagan religions. He had Christian servants in his household, defended the Christian senators against the fury of the Pagan mob, and allowed his eldest son to converse freely with the boys of Christian families. But during his campaigns in the East a great change took place in his feelings towards the Christians. The reason is not known; but he issued laws, which, by very severe penalties, prohibited conversions to the Christians, and Christians dared worship openly. He was a pantheistic believer, and had busts of Abraham and Christian in his private chapel, with those of Orpheus and others.

SEVERUS, Sulpicius, b. 363 in Gaul; d. at Marseille in 410; was a distinguished rhetorician, and successful as a lawyer, but adopted a monastic life after the death of his wife, in 392, and settled with a few companions in some secluded place in Aquitaine. He was a great admirer of St. Martin of Tours, whom he visited several times, and whose life he wrote. He also wrote a Historia ecclesiastica, three dialogues on the monastic life, and some letters, which, however, are of no interest. His collected works were edited by Hieronymus de Prato, Verona, 1741, and reprinted in Gallandi: Bibl. Patr., viii.

SEWALL, Samuel, jurist, b. at Bishopstoke, Eng., March 28, 1632; d. in Boston, Mass., Jan. 1, 1729. He was graduated at Harvard, 1671; studied divinity, and preached for a while until by his marriage (Feb. 26, 1676) with Hannah Hull he got great wealth. He then turned his attention to law, was made judge (1692), and eventually (1718), chief justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. He at first shared in the popular delusion concerning witchcraft (1692), and concurred in the condemnations; but on Jan. 14, 1697, his minister, Rev. Samuel Willard, read a "bill" before the congregation of the Old South Church, in which he acknowledged his own guilt, asked the pardon both of God and man, and deprecated the divine judgments for his sin. He contributed liberally to the spread of the gospel among the Indians, and in 1699 was chosen one of the commissioners of the Society in England for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England, and, soon after, their secretary and treasurer. His sympathy for African slaves prompted him, in 1700 to publish a tract entitled The Selling of Joseph, in which he advocated their rights; it being his opinion that there would be no progress in gospelling until slavery was abolished. His benevolence and charity were great, and his house was a seat of hospitality. He wrote Phenomena, etc., a description of the New Heaven, Boston, 1697, 2d ed., 1727; and Friends Tinkering the Old Plunder, Boston, 1713. His Diary (1674-1739) was published by the Massachusetts Historical Society, 1878, 2 vols. See Drake: Dictionary of American Biography.

SEWELL, William, Friend; b. at Amsterdam, 1630; d. about 1725. His father was a surgeon; and he served his time as a weaver, yet acquired Greek, Latin, English, French, and High Dutch. He is known as the author of Hist. rau de Opkomst, Aanwees, en Voortgang der Christenen, bekend by den naam van Quakers, ondermenigd met de voor-namaate Staatsgeschiedenis van dien tyd in England voorgevalten, en met authentieke Stukken voorzien ("The history of the rise, increase, and progress, of the Christian people called Quakers"), Amsterdam, 1717, and then translated itself into English, London, 1722, folio; 3d ed., 1795, 2 vols.; Philadelphia, 1869, 4 vols. By very severe penalties, prohibited conversions to the Christians, and Christians dared worship openly. He was a pantheistic believer, and had busts of Abraham and Christian in his private chapel, with those of Orpheus and others.

SEXAGESIMA, "the sixtieth," means the second Sunday before Lent, the next to Shrove Tuesday, as being about sixty days before Easter.

SEXTON, a contraction of "sacristan," a subordinate officer of the church, taking care of its vessels and vestment, attending the officiating clergy, etc.

SFONDRADE is the name of an Italian family of which several members have been intimately connected with the Church. — Francis Sfondrati, b. at Cremona, 1493; d. there July 31, 1550. He taught law in the universities of Padua, Pavia, Bologna, Rome, and Turin, and was much used in diplomatic negotiations by Duke Francis Sforza and Charles V. After the death of his wife he entered the service of the Church, and was by Paul III. made Bishop of Cremona, and a cardinal. He acted as mediator between the Pope and the emperor at the occasion of the Augsburg Interim. — Nicholas Sfondrati, son of the preceding, became Pope under the name of Gregory XIV.; which art. see. — Celestine Sfondrati, b. in Milan, 1649; d. in Rome, Sept. 4, 1736. He was educated in the abbey of St. Gall; taught theology, philosophy, and canon law in various places; and was elected prince-abbot of St. Gall in 1689, and made a cardinal in 1695. In the controversy between the papal seat and the Gallican Church he wrote, in defence of the absolute supremacy of the Pope, Regale Sacerdotium (1684), etc. His Nodus praecipuus, published in Rome, 1697, made a great sensation, as in many points it stood in open contradiction to the official system of doctrine recognized by the Church. The French bishops tried to have the book put on the Index, but did not succeed.

to the sins and elements of a wicked, worldly life. Perhaps the title is not inappropriate; as this people believe themselves to be the followers of Christ, the great shaker prophesied by Haggai
(II. 6, 7): "Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shoul don the earth, and all nations shall come." The embryotic origin of this sect is found in the Revivalists of Dauphiné and Vi drasia, France, about 1689. Some of these went to England about 1706. Offshoots from them formed a little society in England about 1747. For a time they were led by one James and Jane Wardley.

Ann Lee, the primary leader of the Shaker Church, was the daughter of John Lee of Man chester, Eng., and b. Feb. 28, 1736. In early childhood she was the subject of deep religious convictions of the great depravity of human na ture, but eventually was married to Abraham Stanley, by whom she had four children, who all died in infancy. In 1758 she joined the society of James Wardley, and thenceforth lived a reli gious life. She now became the renewed subject of remarkable revelations of God, causing her intense suffering of body and soul, resulting in purification of spirit, by which she found that protection from sin she had so much prayed for in her childhood. She and others of this house of faith were severely persecuted in England; and Ann, in 1770, was imprisoned in a manner to take her life by starvation. While in prison she received, as believed by her followers, a re evelation of God relative to the cause of the sinful state of humanity and the means of redemption.
She was thenceforth accepted by the society as their leader and, by the character of her gifts, as the manifestation of the second appearing of Christ in his glory; not of Jesus, but of the bap state, was signed by the members in 1795.

Worship-Meetings are generally held three or each sex is grouped by itself; the same order in its vis viva; Christ, the Lord from heaven, is the quickening Spirit in both male and female, its origin and media; and, so far as now revealed, this may remain for all time. 12th, Redeem the man and woman, by baptism of and in obedience to the Christ-spirit, constitute the subjects of the new creation, the heavenly kingdom of God. 13th, Reject vice and vicious atonement. "My reward is with me, to give to every man according as (his own) work shall be." (Rev. xxii. 12). 14th, Reject carnal resurrection. The Christ is the resurrection of the soul, from death to sin, to a life of righteousness. 15th, The day of judgment comes to any soul, when such soul, by confession of sin, comes to the Christ-apostle, or, having an offer, refuses the Christ-life. "Of myself [as Jesus] I judge no man." "As I [Jesus Christ] hear, I judge; and my judgment is just." (John v. 30). 16th, Election to salvation is of man's free will, when offered. "Whosoever will, let him come and partake of the waters of life freely" (Rev. xxi. 17). 17th, Election, choice of instruments for some specific part of the work in God's vineyard, because of constituted fitness, is preferred by superiors in the order of Heaven's anointing and choosing. Thus Jesus says, "I have chosen you." 17th, Prohibition extends to the spirit-world. Thus only can God be just. 18th, Physical death is not the gate to heaven nor hell; heaven is opened by good deeds; hell, by deeds evil and heresy and heathenism. 19th, The rewards of conduct and the awards of judgment by the Christ tribunal. 20th, The end of the world has come to soul who is born of the Christ-spirit. 21st, Old and New Testament scriptures, inspiration, revelation, eternal life of soul, the gospel-crown prize, and Christian experiences—all teach spiritualism: therefore the Shakers are Spiritualists. 22nd, All carnal warfare is of the world, and has no part nor place in Christ's church and kingdom.

Position to the State. — Opposed to war; neither aid nor abet it; unless by compulsion, and under protest; will not fight with carnal weapons, though death be the price of refusal. Loyal to all the demands of peaceful civil government. Pay all taxes promptly, the State being responsible for use and appropriation thereof. Have no part in politics. Accept no governmental offices but postmaster, road-commissioner, and school officers.

Polity of the Community. — A true Christian community, in conformity to the Christ-spirit, is the order of the kingdom of heaven, the answer to Jesus' prayer, "Thy kingdom come . . . on earth," etc. It is therefore a theocracy, of which the Christ-spirit is the leading authority, and is virtually the appointing power of the leaders of its society. By the perception, and in the wisdom and exercise of this spirit, not by a majority of votes, an order of ministry is appointed, consisting of two of each sex; these constitute the primary leading authority of the church. These nominate elders to lead the families in spiritual and social matters, and deacons to direct temporal business, generally two of each sex; they are confirmed as appointed by the general union and approval of the loyal covenant members, duly and publicly manifest. Two or more of each sex also are appointed as a board of trustees, to hold in trust the legal tenure of real estate, and keep and manage the personal property of the community. Other business-agents sometimes employed. The consecrators hold the property in usufruct; the consecrate is God.

By-Laws of the Community are instituted for direction and protection of members. These are originated by the ministry and elders, and apply to the conduct of the community temporally, socially, and spiritually. They permit the mingling of the sexes in companies of several persons, when needed, in temporal employment, social converse, and worshipful devotion, but exclude all carnal associations, all private correspondence, verbal or written. No two individuals of opposite sex allowed to work together alone, ride out, or walk out together and converse, or engage in conversations together alone. Short and necessary errands permitted. The opposite sexes, in all cases, room separately, both members of the commune, and visitors sojourning among them. All persons, both old and young, have single beds. Correspondence of Members, by letters, books, or papers, except business-letters by trustees and business-agents, is required to be open to the knowledge of the elders, and subject to their approbation. This is to prevent the intrusion of malfeasance, and the institution of cliques or private societies working against the community. Due regard is made to the feelings of novitiates. While in the communion of the saints all choose to dwell in the light, as God is light; and these compose that glorious galaxy of souls the revelation of the glory of God in Christ Jesus. Nevertheless, espionage is rigorously discouraged; and a liberal freedom of orderly and protective union and correspondence, both verbal and written, is encouraged and promoted. All good, moral, miscellaneous, religious, scientific, philosophic, historical, biographical, narrative, and literary books and periodicals are freely admitted.

GILES B. AVERY

(Shaker of Mt. Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y.).

SHALMANESER (Heb., שָלָמָן; LXX., Σαλμάνους; Assy., Salmaansu, "Shalman, be gracious") was the name of several Assyrian kings, of whom only two are important for biblical his-

Shalmaneser II. (reigned B.C. 860-825) is not mentioned in the Bible, but was a contemporary of Ahab and Jehu of Israel, and Ben-hadad II. and Hazael of Syria, all of whom are named in one or another of his numerous inscriptions. From these we learn that Shalmaneser defeated Ben-hadad II. (whom he calls Dath-di-ri; i.e., Hadadezer) and about a dozen allied princes at Arkar, between Halman (Haleb-Aleppo) and Hamath, B.C. 854. Among these princes was "Ahab the Israelite;" and in the danger from Assyria which was here realized we have one explanation of the "covenant" which Ahab made with Ben-hadad after he had conquered him (1 Kings xx. 31-34). Shalmaneser records again, that, during the western campaign of his eighteenth regnal year (B.C. 842), he received tribute from "Jehu, son of Omri." This designation of the king of Israel, who had destroyed the house of Omri, is one of the most striking tokens of the might which Omri and his real son, Ahab, had exercised.

Dad'-idri, i.e., Ben-hadad, was defeated by Shalmaneser four distinct times,—B.C. 854 (see above), 860, 849, and 840. Hazael is mentioned as suffering defeat B.C. 846 and 839. Shalmaneser appears, however, at no time to have reached Samaria, nor did he succeed in capturing Damascus.

The dates above given are secured by the statements of the Annals of Shalmaneser compared with the Eponym Canon, or list of Assyrian officials who gave names to the years. This canon is absolutely fixed by the eclipses of the sun, which it mentions June 15, B.C. 763; and by the coin of 'Apxiav of (i.e., Saigon; see the art.), king of India, B.C. 735.

From these we learn that Shalmaneser defeated Zobach, king of Syria, as a punishment for which Shalmaneser bound him, and put him in prison: some interval doubtless occurred between the acts of verse 3 and those of verse 4. Finally, we are told that Shalmaneser came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years. This took place, according to 2 Kings xviii. 9, in the seventh year of Hoshea's reign. Just before the fall of Samaria, Shalmaneser died, as we learn from the inscriptions of Sargon, his successor, who brought the siege to an end. (See SARGON.) Whether his death was natural or violent, we do not know. The only inscriptions concerned with his reign bear an inserted weight, and two Eponym lists, which give us hardly more than the dates of his reign. With the expedition against Samaria was, perhaps, connected that against Tyre, which Josephus (Antiq., IX. 14, 2) mentions on the authority of Menander. The hostilities against Tyre lasted five years, and cannot have been concluded before Shalmaneser's death.

Shahma, a Jewish rabbi of the first century B.C., who founded a school directly antithetical to that of Hillel; so that it became a proverb, "Hillel loses what Shammai binds." Nothing is known of him personally. See art. Scribes.

Shap, Cranville, English philanthropist, b. in Durham, 1734; d. in London, July 6, 1818. Disapproving of the government action relating to the American Colonies, he resigned (April, 1777) a position in the ordinance office, and devoted himself to study. Before this his course in befriending and successfully defending the negro slave Somerset from his master, who tried to regain him (but the Court of King's Bench declared that a slave could not be held in, or transported from, England) brought him an incredible notice, and determined his career. He thenceforth devoted himself to the overthrow of slavery and the slave-trade. He presided at the meeting which organized the Association for the Abolition of Negro Slavery (May 22, 1787). He was a good linguist and a pious man. See his biography by Prince Hoare (London, 1810), and bibliography in Allibone.
applied to the authoritative books of the Hindus without violation." This, of course, was understood in the Presbyterian sense; but in 1681 the Scottish Parliament annulled all the Parliaments held since 1633, with all their proceedings, and thus totally abolished all the laws made in favor of the Presbyterian Church. The "Church of Scotland" thus became the old Episcopal Church; and Sharp, in Dec. 12, 1681, was in London consecrated Archbishop of St. Andrews. With the zeal of a convert he persecuted his former allies. For his perfidy and cruelty Sharp was thoroughly detested; yet the assassins who despatched him were really on the lookout for one of his underlings, Carmichael, and had no intention at first of killing him. See Hetherington, History of the Church of Scotland, pp. 203 sq., 250 sq.

SHARPE, Samuel, Unitarian layman; b. in London, March 8, 1799; d. there (Highbury) July 28, 1881. The last twenty years of his life were passed in retirement from business and assiduous biblical study. Although he had not the advantage of a university education, but was from early life a London banker, he yet acquired much solid information upon recondite subjects. He early became interested in Egyptology, and published Egyptian Inscriptions (London, 1836-41, 7 parts, 2d series, 1856, 4 parts), History of Egypt from the Earliest Times till A.D. 325 (1851, 6th ed., 1870, 2 vols.). To biblical literature he contributed a translation of the New Testament from Griesbach's text with notes (1840, 5th ed., 1882), a revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Testament (1865, 3 vols.), and History of the Hebrew Nation and Literature (1889, 4th ed., 1882). These works, and others of less importance, abundantly attest the industry and learning of their author. See his biography by P. W. Clyde, London, 1883.

SHE'CHEM (shoulder), a town nineteen hundred and fifty feet above sea-level, thirty-four miles north of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. xvii. 7), later in Samaria. It lies in the narrow valley between Mounts Ebal on the north, and Gerizim on the south; called also Sichem (Gen. xii. 6), Sychem (Acts vii. 10), and Sychar (John iv. 5). It was destroyed in the Jewish war, but rebuilt, and, in honor of the Emperor Vespasian, called Flavia Neapolis (new city). Hence in early Christian times it was called Neapolis only, as in the Talmud. From this name comes its present one, Nablus or Nablus. Shechem, under its various designations, is mentioned forty-eight times in the Bible, first in connection with Abraham, who halted there (Gen. xii. 6). There occurred the massacre of all its males by Simeon and Levi, in revenge for Sichem's insult to their sister Dinah (Gen. xxxiv.). There the Israelites solemnly dedicated themselves to God, and there Joseph was buried (Josh. xxiv.). Abimelech set up an independent kingdom there, but after three years was expelled, and the city was destroyed, and sown with salt (Judg. ix.). Jeroboam made the rebuilt city the capital of the northern kingdom (1 Kings xii. 1-19, 25). After the captivity, Shechem became the centre of the Samaritan worship. There Jesus first definitely announced himself the Messiah (John iv. 5, 26). Aeneopolis became the seat of a bishopric; the martyr Martyr was born. It was captured by the crusaders, and Baldwin II. held a great diet there (1129). It has repeatedly suffered from earthquakes, particularly in 1202 and 1387. It was destroyed by Ibrahim Pacha in 1834; but its natural advantages, being in the midst of a most fertile country, have always caused its speedy resurrection. The present town numbers thirteen hundred inhabitants, among whom are a hundred and thirty Samaritans, six hundred Greek Christians, and a few Jews, Latins, and Protestants. It is abundantly supplied with water, there being no less than eighty springs and fountains in its immediate neighborhood, and presents a picture of great beauty. Its principal buildings are the great mosque Jamiel-Keltar, which is the Church of St. John, built by the crusaders (1167), and the little Samaritan synagogue (Kenset es-Samireh) in which is the famous Samaritan Codex of the Pentateuch. Cf. art. "Shechem," in Smith's Dict. Bib.; Schaff's Bib. Dict.; "Sichem," Riehm's Hind. d. bib. Alt., Badeker (Socin), 2d ed., p. 225.

SHE'CHI'NAH (residence, i.e., of God, his visible presence). The, is post-biblical Chaldean, but adopted into Christian common use from the later Jews. The idea is, however, found in the Bible expression "the glory of the Lord." This "glory," the Jews say, was wanting in the second temple.

SHEKEL. See Weights.

SHEM HAMMEPHORASH (Heb., peculiar name, i.e., Jehovah), a cabalistic word among the rabbinical Jews; the representation of the wonderful combination of twelve, forty-two, or seventy-two letters, whose pronunciation has astonishing results. Absurd stories are told by the rabbins respecting it,—how Moses spent forty days on Mount Sinai in learning it from the angel Saxael; how its right utterance would enable the speaker to create a world; how Jesus wrought his miracles by its use; how two letters of it inscribed on a tablet, and cast into the sea, raised the storm which destroyed the fleet of Charles V. (1542). See Baring-Gould: Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, p. 291.

SHE'OL, the Hebrew word (the equivalent of the Greek Hades) for the under-world, the place of the shades. It comes from a word meaning "to penetrate," "to go down deep:" hence Sheol is literally what is sunk deep, bent in. The Hebrews thought that the dead went down into deep fissions. See Hades, and Hebrew lexicon under Nekh.

SHEPARD, Thomas, Puritan, b. at Towcester, near Northampton, Eng., Nov. 5, 1605; d. at Cambridge, Mass., Aug 25, 1649. He was graduated M.A. at Emmanuel College, Oxford, 1627; "lecturer" at Earl's Cola three years and a half; became a preacher; was silenced for nonconformity by Laud, Dec. 16, 1630; employed as chaplain to Sir Richard Darly, Buttercrambe, Yorkshire, for a year; pastor at Heddon, Northumberland, another year; sailed for America, December, 1634, but was compelled by a storm to put back, had to hide himself lest he should be taken, but finally got off, July, 1635, and landed on Oct. 3 at Boston, and became minister to the church at Cambridge in February, 1636. He played a prominent part in the synod at Cambridge which ended the Antinomian controversy. He was characterized by great humility, spirituality, soundness in the faith, and decision. In learning, piety, and spiritual insight he takes a first rank among Puritan divines; especially is he held in perpetual remembrance by that "rich fund of experimental and practical divinity," his treatise, The parable of the ten virgins opened and applied, first published by Jonathan Mitchell, from the author's notes, Boston, 1659, 2d ed., 1660; reprinted in London, 1695, in Aberdeen, 1838, and again, 1834, with biblical preface by James Foote. In all he is said to have written 38 books and pamphlets. His Anti-Trinitarian sentiments were mentioned New England's lamentation for Old England's present errors and divisions, Boston, 1644, 2d ed., 1645; Certain select cases resolved, 1648; The clear sunshine of the Gospel breaking forth upon the Indians in New England, 1648; reprinted, New York, 1695; Theses sobiatice, 1649, 2d ed., 1655. A collective edition of his works, with memoir, was published, Boston, 1839, 3 vols. His Autobiography was published in Alexander Young's Chronicles of the First Planters of Massachusetts Bay, Bost., 1846. See Cotton Mather: Magnalia (ed. Hartford, 1855, vol. i. pp. 380 sqq.); Sprague: Annals, i. pp. 59-68; Allibone: Dictionary of Authors, s.v., Dexter: Congregationalism, Appendix.

SHERARD, Thomas, b. 1605; d. at Bocking in Essex, Jan. 29, 1739; a seceder from the Church of England; published sundry sermons, and thirty Penitential Cries (1692), which were usually bound with John Mason's Songs of Praise, and with them reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1859. F. M. BIRD.

SHEPHERD OF HERMAS. See HERMAS.

SHERLOCK. There are four literary divines of this name, who require different degrees of notice.—I. Richard Sherlock, b. at Oxton in Cheshire, 1613, and educated at Oxford and Dublin; became rector of Winwick; and d. in 1690. He fell into controversy with the Friends, and wrote an Answer to the Quakers objections to Ministers (1659), and the same year, Quakers wild objections answered. The practical Christian (1673), by the same author, was valued by Wilson, bishop of Sodor and Man, so enlarged and corrected as to be republished in it 1713. —II. William Sherlock, b. in London, about 1614; d. at Hampstead, June 10, 1707; educated at Cambridge University, where he went in 1637; and was successively rector of St. George's, Bololph Lane, London, prebendary of St. Paul's, and rector of Therfield, Hertfordshire. He became master of the Temple in 1684. Refusing to take the new oath at the time of the Revolution, he was suspended for a while, but afterwards complied with the requirement of the law. This led to an immense amount of personal controversy; and Mrs. Sherlock's influence over her husband sharpened the wits, and elicited the ridicule, of his opponents. He had before this been reproved by James II., through the lord-treasurer, and deprived of a part of his income, for preaching against Popery; but the most important incidents of his life were the publication of a work entitled The case of resistance to the supreme powers, stated and resolved according to the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures (1684), and the subsequent publication of a work on the Doctrine of the Trinity and of the Incarnation of the Son of God (1690). These involved him in much trouble; the first, relating to a constitutional question, exposed him to political attacks; and the second, touching a theological question, was much discussed, brought him into conflict with certain divines, especially the witty and violent Dr. South. Sherlock's idea was, that in the three persons of the Trinity there is what may be called a mutual self-consciousness, a consciousness common to the three, and that therefore the three are essentially and numerically one. This brought down on the writer the merciless ridicule of South. The former was accused by the latter of being a Tritheist, and the latter laid himself open to the charge of Sabellianism. Sherlock, who is often called Dean Sherlock, from his attaining to the deanship of St. Paul's in 1691, was indefatigably industrious; his publications amounting to sixty all together, chiefly controversial, but including some on practical subjects. Amongst them the most important are, A Discourse concerning Death (1689). A Discourse concerning a Future Judgment (1692). A Discourse concerning the Divine Providence (1694), and other discourses on religious assemblies, the state of the good and the bad hereafter, and the immortality of the soul. —III. Thomas, known as Bishop Sherlock, son of the dean; was b. in London, 1678; was graduated M.A. at Cambridge, 1701; became master of the Temple, 1704; prebendary of St. Paul's, 1713; master of Catherine Hall (where he had been fellow), 1714; dean of Chichester, 1715; prebendary of Norwich, 1719; and bishop of Bangor, 1727, whence he was translated to Salisbury, and finally to London, 1748. He declined the archbishopric of Canterbury, and died in London, July 18, 1761. These rapid promotions could not but make a mark on his name, but his authorship is that which is most noticed by posterity. His principal work was, Discourses in the Temple Church, Discourses on Prophecy, and the Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus. This last, published in 1729, is the best known, and for a long time held a distinguished place in the literature of Christian evidence. —IV. Martin Sherlock, an Irish divine of no great reputation, wrote Counsel to a Young Poet (1779), in Italian. Horace Walpole said that his Italian was ten times worse than his French, in which language he published, the same year, Letters of an English Traveller. J. SToughton.

SHIRNAR (Heb., ניאר; LXX., Σηδραίως; almost certainly, Assyro-Babylonian Sumér, of Akkad-Shumerian origin, with another probable form, Sungér), the name of a country or district, is found in the following passages of the Bible: Gen. x. 10, xi. 2, xiv. 1; Is. xi. 11; Dan. i. 2; Zec. vi. 11. In Gen. x. 10 it seems to be a general name for Babylonia; for it includes, besides
The significance of these divisions dates from a time when both Shumer and Akkad were inhabited by a highly cultivated, non-Shemitic people, to whom the Semitic Babylonians and Assyrians were indebted for the larger part of their civilization, and whose influence has been by no means confined to the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris. It was this people who invented the system of cuneiform characters: they had literature, art, and science. (Cf. Cuneiform Inscriptions.) It is quite likely that their earliest settlements were in Shumer: and Ur, Eridu, and the city whose remains have been found at Tell Loh, must have been centres of political and religious influence at a very ancient time; no dates, however, can be now given with confidence. It is certain that the later Babylonian tradition attributed a high antiquity (about B.C. 4000) to the Semitic civilization of Akkad, and the non-Semitic culture must have been much earlier than the Semitic; but it is not wise to repose full confidence in this tradition. See Sepharvaim.

The distinction between Akkad and Shumer appears to have been not merely geographical, but also linguistic: the language used in one had certain dialectic peculiarities, as compared with that of the other. These peculiarities are few, and of limited application: they are such as the appearance of m or d in the dialect, for g in the normal language, and of e in the former, for 4 in the latter. The number of texts composed in the dialect is, as far as is now known, comparatively small. It is still disputed, whether the name "Akkadian" belongs to the normal language, and "Shumerian" to the dialect, or the reverse; i.e., which of the two was the language of Northern Babylonia, and which of Southern Babylonia. In favor of the view that the normal language was that of Akkad, and the dialect peculiar to Shumer, it is claimed, that, while the dialect is sometimes called "emé-sal" ("women's language"); the reason for this name is in doubt), it is also called "emé ku" ("language of the master"); and, since "Land emé ku" is a name for Shumer, the desired inference is plain. Akkad is called, on the other hand, "Land émé luğ" ("land of slaves' language"). It is further claimed that the name Shumer itself, and the name Kingê, another designation of the same district, show characteristics of the dialect; that Tinlir and Kadingirra, on the other hand, names of Babylon, which was in Northern Babylonia, belong by their form to the normal language; that one inscription which contains dialectic peculiarities begins with the "emé-sal" Tablet of Shumer; another argument is drawn from the fact that many loan-words in the Semitic language are borrowed from the normal language, it being held that Semitic contact with the pre-Semitic civilization must have been chiefly in Akkad, etc. To these arguments it is replied, that the émé-sal is identical, not with the émé ku, but with the émé luğ, that the dialect belongs therefore to Akkad; that Skumér was a North Babylonian form of the normal Skumér, this latter lying at the foundation of the Hebrew ḫéem, Shinar, and that Kingê is not a dialectic form at all; that Kudümirra may have been pronounced Kudümirra (dialectic form); and that Tinlir, although the normal form, may simply indicate that people from Shumer founded the city, and is therefore consistent with the view that the normal language belonged to Shumer; that in the inscription with the colophon "Tablet of Shumer," the dialectic peculiarities occur only in citations, the body of the text being neither Akkadian nor Shumerian, but pure Semitic; and that many loan-words in the Semitic language, and those such as belong to the common speech of everyday life, are derived from the dialect, and not from the normal language. It is further urged, on this side, that the names of places mentioned in the texts of the dialect denote cities in Northern Babylonia, or Akkad, and that the converse, though the instances are fewer, is also true; i.e., that Shumerian cities are mentioned in texts of the normal language; that the sea (Persian Gulf) is mentioned frequently, and as something familiar, in the texts of the normal language; that texts of the old Shumerian king Gudea, discovered at Tell Luh, show characteristic of the dialect peculiarities; that the Hebrews coming from Ur (in Southern Babylonia) carried the name ḫéem with them; this name corresponding to the normal, not the dialectic, form of the word (see above), etc. The problem cannot yet be regarded as fully solved: but the weight of evidence seems at present to be in favor of this latter view; namely, that the normal language is entitled to the name Shumer, and that Tinlir is the name Akkadian. The comparative age of the normal language and the dialect is also in dispute, with arguments too technical to be given here. Fur-their discovery and discussion are needed to put these matters beyond controversy.

Shin-shiu, or "reformed" Buddhism, is claimed by its followers to have been founded A.D. 381 in China, by Hwui-uyen, who established the worship of Buddha Amitayus ("the Eternal"), or Amítábha ("the Bud of Infinite Light"), the fourth of the five Dhyani Buddhas. It was then called the "White Lotus School." Pupils were sent to India, who collected Sanscrit texts, and translated them into Chinese. Three translations of the smaller, and twelve of the larger, Sukhāvativyuha ("the Description of the Land of Bliss") were made, of which two of the former, and five of the latter, are in existence. Recently the original Sanscrit text of the sutra on which the religion of Amitabha is founded, and which was taken from India to China in the second century of our era, has been found in Japan. The cardinal doctrines of the sect are salvation by faith in the boundless Buddha, or Amida, and the hope of attaining bliss in the western paradise. The Chinese translations of Sukhāvativyuha were known in Japan from 640 A.D.; but the Jodo-shinshu ("True Sect of the Pure Land") was not founded until 1173, at Kioto, by the priest Ho-nen, whose pupil Shin-ran still further developed the protestant features of the system. Shin-ran married, and thus set the example of revolt against priestly celibacy, made worship more attractive and sensuous, while translating the sacred books into the vernacular, making missionary journeys, and preaching the cardinal tenet of the new faith, justification by faith, not in works, long prayers, masses, liturgy, fasting, and penance, but in Amida Buddha, the boundless, merciful, and thus secures the craving of humanity, says, "It was to satisfy this want that the fiction of the 'Peaceful Land in the West' was framed. A Buddha was imagined distinct from the Buddha of history, Gautama, or Shakyamuni. He was called Amitabha, 'boundless age.'"

Shinto (Shintoism) is the cult of the primitive Japanese. Japan is now classified among Buddhist countries; since the vast majority of her thirty-three millions of people worship according to the doctrines, greatly modified, of Shakya Muni. (See Shin-shiu.) Since 552 A.D., when the first images and sutras were imported from Corea by missionaries of the India faith, Buddhism has been steadily propagated in Japan. Conquest was not made in a day or century, but it required fully a thousand years to convert the Japanese from their indigenous faith. Nor was the victory secured by overthrow or extirpation of the primitive belief, but rather by absorption of it. This will account partly for the fact that Japanese Buddhism, so different from that of Siam or China, is distinct by itself. By its corrupting or overlapping Shinô, several sects or systems now repudiated by pure Shintôists were formed, such as Rôbu ("twofold," i.e., of Shintô and Buddhism mixed), Yuitu (Buddhism with a Shintô basis), Déguchi (Shintô explained by the Chinese Book of Changes), and Suiga, a combination of Déguchi and the tenets of the Chinese rationalist Chiu-hi, whose system of thought has, since the seventeenth century, prevailed among the educated classes in the Mikado's empire. Passing by these later developments, we shall outline the characteristics of pure Shintô, which is interesting as "a natural religion in a very early stage of development, which perhaps originated quite independently of any natural religion known to us;" that is, "neither by revelation, nor by introduction from without." The native term Kami no michi ("way or doctrine of the gods") is rendered by two Chinese characters, Shin ("god") and ô ("way"), equivalent to ôkû-ôkû. Its scriptures are the Kôjiki ("Record of Antiquities"), a collection of oral traditions reduced to writing A.D. 712, in pure Japanese, uncolored by any but native ideas; the Nihongi ("Chronicles of Japan"), composed 720 A.D., containing, in the main, similar narratives to those in the Kôjiki, but cast in the mould of Chinese thought and expression; and the Engishiki ("Book of Ceremonial Law"), promulgated in A.D. 927, in which are found many odes and prayers that are, on good grounds, believed to antedate the introduction of letters in the third or fourth century.

According to the sacred books, the universe comes into existence prior to the gods who afterward populated it. “Of old, when heaven and earth were not yet separated, chaos, enveloping all things like a fowl’s egg, contained within it a germ. The clear and ethereal substance, expanding, became heaven: the heavy and thick, precipitating, became earth.” Subsequently deity was born. The first kami sprouted upward like a rush. After successive evolution of several pairs of gods in imperfection, sex or differentiation was reached by the perfect manifestation of the creative principle in Izanagi and Izanami, who proceeded to make and furnish the earth. Standing in the floating region of heaven, Izanagi plunged his jewelled spear into the plain of the green sea beneath, and, stirring it round, withdrew the point, from which the drops, trickling, consolidated, and formed an island, to which the creator and creatrix descended to make other islands, and populate and furnish them with kami (gods), rocks, trees, soil, vegetation, and animals. Gradually the earth and sun separated; though, before they did so, the brilliant daughter of the first pair ascended to reign over the luminary of day, while a less fortunate son became ruler of the earth. The Japanese use the adventures of Izanagi and Izanami, not only on earth, but in the nether world. With the reign of Amaterasu, the sun-goddess in heaven, a new epoch begins. This heaven-illuminator, dissatisfied with the anarchy that reigned among the earthly kami, or gods, sent her agents to earth to restore order, and abolish feuds. Not alone was able to do this work, until she despatched her grandson, Ninigi no Mikoto, who descended to the earth; and, after a series of violent struggles between the heavenly and the earthly powers, the grandson of Ninigi no Mikoto established his throne near Kioto, and became the first emperor of Japan. The mikado is thus the personal centre of Shinto, and the vicar of the heavenly gods on earth, — the pope, who claims both spiritual and temporal power over his subjects. In the primitive government of Japan the Jin-gi Kuan, or Council of the Gods of Heaven and Earth, was the highest legislative power next to the mikado. In Shinto scriptures the earth is Japan, and the mikado’s palace the most sacred of all places. The nobility claim their descent from inferior deities; the mikado, directly from the sun-goddess. The common people are the progeny of the earthly kami, though all claim Izanagi and Izanami as their creators.

In its essence, Shinto is ancestor-worship. In the earlier mythology the kami seem to be but the deified forces of nature, but the later traditions and the liturgy show that the gods addressed are hero-ancestors. After the division of the country by its first conquerors into feudal divisions, the chief clan and his kin selections one of the “heavenly gods,” made him, as their ancestor, their tutelary deity, and erected a shrine to his honor. A remarkable fact in Shinto is that the miyaz, or temples, are austere simply, containing no idols, images, or statues of heroes, no paint, gilding, symbols, or any thing sensuous, except the temporary offerings, or their permanent substitute, the gohei, which are strips of notched paper suspended from unpainted wands; nor can this absence of effigies of the gods worshipped be explained by the rudimentary condition of art in early Japan, since figures, in terra cotta or carved wood, of men, horses, and birds, were known and employed in the interment of the dead, — a merciful substitute for the human beings anciently buried alive with their departed master. Living animals were dedicated to the gods, but were not slaughtered. In front of the shrine was the bird-rest (torii), on which the cocks were placed to give notice of dawn and the time for morning-prayers. This “sacred gateway,” now so called, is still a striking feature in the landscape of Japan. Prayers were offered for protection, health, freedom from evil, for offspring, and for harvests: and thanksgivings were especially profuse at festival time, when offerings of silk, cloth, rice, weapons, horses, and equipments, were made. The root-idea of sin was pollution, and, of righteousness, purity. Actions were good or bad according as they were concerned with purification or defilement. Lustrations were frequent; and twice a year the festival of general purification took place, both at the imperial palace and at each one of the chief local shrines. Polluted persons were washed in the waters of running streams, and their clothes given to the poor. The figures representing the people, and an iron image of the mikado, dressed so as to do vicarious duty for his clothes, were cast into the river, which was supposed to deposit the offences in the nether world beneath the sea. “And when they have thus been got rid of, there shall from this day onwards be no offence that is called offence with regard to the nexus of the officers who serve in the court of the Sovran, nor in the four quarters of the region under heaven.” All offences were divided into “earthly” and “heavenly,” — a division which is based either on mythical incident, according to which the wicked brother of the sun-goddess committed a series of destructive and defiling tricks upon his sister and her companions, house, looms, and rice-fields, or, as a writer (Ernest Satow) in the Westminster Review suggests, upon the division of the early inhabitants of Japan into agriculturists (the invaders or conquerors) and hunters and fishermen (the aborigines). Between these two classes there would at first be continual trouble. “The so-called heavenly offences are chiefly such as would be possible only in an agricultural community, or to agriculturists living in a population of hunters and fishermen.” It is nearly certain that the invaders of primitive Japan were warriors from Corea or the Asian mainland, who, after coming across the sea, gave out that their ancestors had come down from heaven. They were thus the descendants of the heavenly gods, while the aborigines whom they conquered were but the progeny of the earthly kami, or gods. It was by this combination of superior theology with superior weapons, that the over sea invaders finally secured supremacy. In the first rude ages, when government was partly patriarchal and partly feudal, private property was scarcely known; and hence trespass and defilement, revenge and sacrilege, were offences more common than the sins usually catalogued in codes of more complex or modern society. Left by itself, however, Shinto might have hushed the passions even of criminal and civil law, had not the more perfect materialistic ethics of Confucius, and the more sensuous ritual of Buddhism, by their overwhelming superiority, paralyzed all further growth of the original cultus: still there might have been a re-action, and the old faith have re-assorted its power, had not an Euhemerus appeared, who resolved Japanese mythology into Buddhist history. A learned priest named Kukai (A.D. 774-835), canonized as the great teacher Kobō, professing to have received a revelation from the gods at the Mecca of Shintōism at Ise promulgated a scheme of reconciliation, according to which the chief deities of Shintō were avatars, or manifestations of Buddha to Japan prior to his perfect incarnation in India. All the legends, dogmas, cosmogony, and traditions of the primitive cult were explained according to Buddhist ideas; and the old native gods, baptized with Buddhist names, were henceforth worshipped according to the new and more sensuous ritual. Under this new teaching, Shintō was not sunk out of popular sight, and its remembrance was cherished only by scholars. Yet after the long wars of the middle ages, and the establishment of profound peace by Iyeyasu and the Tokugawa rulers, a school of writers arose in the eighteenth century whose enthusiasm led them to recover, decipher, and edit the scriptures of Shintō, and to enrich the native literature by a very creditable body of antiquarian and polemical writings, which helped greatly to prepare the way for the revolutions of 1868 and later, which have so surprised the world. Yet after the restoration of monarchy in Tōkiō, and the temporary revival of Shintō as manifested in propaganda, and purging of some old temples, the Jin-gi kuan, instead of being restored to ancient power, was degraded to a department, and finally abolished. The shrines and priests (of the latter, in 1880, 14,215) are now maintained partly by government appropriations, and partly by popular subscriptions. Shintō is still a living power among millions of the people, who oppose Christianity with patriotic enthusiasm. It is also the source of occasional polemical literature. Japanese Christians, in whom the sense of passion of the Kojiki a rationalizing way, explaining them on the theory of the solar myth, phonetic decay, or according to similar reasoning. Mr. Takahashi Gorō, a Christian writer, in his Shinō Dōsoku Aji (translated Rituals in the words "from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant:" they are a sign whereby they continually prove their connection with the Lord. The loaves are a symbol and type of the spiritual bread, which the people of God presents as a visible, practical proof before the Lord, the Lord, and the permanent bread, the Lord, and the permanent bread of burnt offering before the bread was given to the priests in the sanctuary, would indicate, Be diligent in good works, and you shall live in the house of God as a priestly people, and shall receive from his communion salvation and blessing. The frankincense which was burned on the altar of burnt offering before the bread was eaten was an offering made unto the Lord, whereby Israel was symbolically reminded, and at the same time confessed, that every fruit with which it appears before the face of God it owes to the Lord, and for which it is to praise him. LEYRER.

SHOWBREAD, Table of the. According to the description given in Exod. xxv. 23-30 this table was two cubits in length, a cubit in breadth, and a cubit and a half in height, made of shittimwood, overlaid with pure gold, and having a golden crown to the border thereof round about. This table, which is called “the table of the face” (Num. iv. 7) and “the pure table” (Lev. xxiv. 8; 2 Chron. xiii. 11), stood on the north side of the sanctuary, and was adorned with dishes, spoons, bowls, etc., which were of pure gold (Exod. xxv. 29). When it was transported, it was covered, with everything that was thereon, with a cloth of blue (Num. iv. 7). In 2 Chron. iv. 10 we have mention of “the tables whereon the showbread was set,” and at verse 8 we read of Solomon making ten tables. This is probably explained by the statement of Josephus (Ant., VIII. 3, 7), that the king made a number of tables, and one great golden one on which they placed the showbread. The table of the second temple was carried away by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. i. 22), and a new one made (1 Macc. iv. 49). Since the table was made only for the showbread, its symbolic significance cannot be a peculiar one; and whatever it may mean, it can only be explained in connection with the showbread.

SHRINE (Lat., scriinium, a case for keeping books, etc.), a repository for relics, whether fixed, such as a tomb, or movable. The term is also sometimes applied to the tomb of an uncanonized person. Shrines were often made of the most splendid and costly materials, and enriched with jewels. The movable shrines were carried in religious processions, were kept behind and above the altar; and before and around them lamps were burning.

SHRIVE, to confess sin: hence Shrove-tide, the time immediately before Lent, when it was customary to confess as a preparation for the forty days fast; and Shrove-Tuesday, the day before Ash-Wednesday, which was spent merry-making, and so, in England, came to be called “Pancake Tuesday,” from the fritters and pancakes eaten on that day.

SHRUBSOLE, William, b. at Sheerness, Kent, Nov. 21, 1759; d. at Highbury, Aug. 28, 1829; a devout and active layman; was an officer of the Bank of England, of the London Missionary Society, and of the Religious Tract Society. He wrote two volumes of miscellaneous essays (1785) and that beginning “When streaming from the eastern skies” (1813), often attributed to Sir Robert Grant.

SHUCKFORD, Samuel, D.D., Church of England; d. in London, July 14, 1754. He was graduated M.A. at Caius College, Cambridge (1720); was successively curate of Shelton, Norfolk, prebendary of Canterbury (1789), and rector of All-hallows, Lombard Street, London. He is the author of the famous Connection, intended to supplement Prideaux’s work, but only finished to the death of Joshua. The full title is, The sacred and profane history of the world connected from the creation of the world to the dissolution of the Assyrian Empire at the death of Sardanapalus, and to the destruction of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel under the reigns of Ahaz and Pekah, London, 1727, 4 vols., 8vo ed., 1749; revised by J. Talboys Wheeler, 1858, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1865.

SHU’SHAN (Heb., שׁוֹשָׁן; LXX., Σοῦσα, accus., Σοῦσα, gen. and dat., Σοῦσαν, Σοῦσαν; Elamit., Σοῦσαν; Assy., Σοῦδαν, etymology unknown), generally known as Susa, the capital of Elam or Susiana, is mentioned in the Bible as follows: Neh. i. 1; Esth. i. 2, 5, ii. 3, 5, 8, iii. 16 (L.), iv. 16, vii. 14, 15, ix. 6, 11-15, 18; Dan. viii. 2; cf. “Shushanclitizes,” i.e., “men of Shushan” (Ez. iv. 9). It was situated on the river Eulaeus (so Dan. vii. 2, and Assyrian inscriptions and sculptures), which formerly emptied into the Persian Gulf, and must, at all events in its lower part, have been identical with the Pasitigris and the modern river Karun. The ruins of the city are buried in the mounds of Shush, lat. about 32° 10’ N.; long. about 48° 50’ E. from Greenwich; but these mounds lie forty miles distant from the present course of the Karun at its nearest point, and this might at first sight seem to favor the statement of some classical writers, that Susa was on (or near) the Chosapes (modern Kerkhah), which flows to the west of Shush. Loftus, however, who visited the spot, was told that the Kerkhah was once connected with the Karun, and found the ancient river-bed, through which the water must have flowed, about two miles east of Shush. It is, then, quite possible that this was regarded as the Eulaeus, which in its lower part was certainly the same with the Karun, and which, it is thus natural to suppose, may sometimes in its upper part have passed under the name of the Chosapes.

Elam was repeatedly invaded by the Assyrians in their campaigns, but Susa is not mentioned until the time of Assurbanipal, the last great Assyrian king (B.C. 688-629), who captured it about B.C. 655. After the fall of Assyrria and Babylon, and the accession of the Achemenid kings, Susa became the winter and spring residence of these monarchs, and was greatly improved and adorned by them. According to the Book of Esther, there were great numbers of Jews in it. Alexander found great wealth there, and even after his time it preserved a reputation for riches. Under the Parthian Arsacides (B.C. 250-A.D. 226) it continued to be a chief city, but thereafter declined; and after its capture by the Mohammedans, A.D. 640, it is heard of only from time to time, e.g., in the eighth and twelfth centuries. Its site has been even yet but very imperfectly explored, owing to the extreme difficulties which attend excavations, arising in large part from the bigotry and fierceness of the present inhabitants of the region.

SIBYLLINE BOOKS.

1895. He was successively student and fellow of St. John’s College, and lecturer of Trinity Church, Cambridge; preacher of Gray’s Inn, London, 1618-25; master of Catharine Hall, Cambridge. His best-known works are The bruised reed (to which Baxter attributed his conversion) and The soul’s conflict (1685). He wrote, also, The return- ing backslider, or a commentary upon Hosea xiv. (1689), and A learned commentary, or exposition upon several prophecies of the Bible (1679). See his Complete Works, with memoir by A. B. Grosart, Edinb. 1862, 7 vols.

SIBEL, Caspar, b. near Elberfeld, June 9, 1590; d. at Deventer, Jan. 1, 1658. He was educated at Herborn; studied theology at Leyden; and was appointed pastor at Randerath in 1609, at Juliers in 1611, and at Deventer in 1617. He was a very prolific writer, and left a number of sermons, homilies, catechetical and devotional works, besides an autobiography (unfinished). Of his Opera Theologica, a collected edition appeared at Deventer in 1644, in 5 vols. folio.

SIBYLLINE BOOKS. The sibyl is “the half-divine prophetess of the arrangements and decisions of the gods in reference to the fate of cities and countries” (Lücker : Versuch einer vollständ Einheit in die Offnb. Joh., 1852, pp. 66 sqq.). Etymologically it is probably the same as κυβίς, the Ελληνικ form for סבילון, Hieronymus (Adv. Jov. i. 14) derives it from סבילון. Earlier classical writers recognize but one sibyl, who was first localized at Erythrae, or Cumae: later many sibyls are spoken of. (Cf. Suidas’ Lexicon, s. v., and the classical dictionaries, especially Lübker, 6th ed., p. 527.) The idea thus originated among the heathens. When, after the conquests of Alexander, the period of religious syncretism was introduced, and the Jews of the dispersion became acquainted with the pseudo-prophetess of the Gentiles, they made use of her influence to make their peculiarities of religion and life palatable to the Greeks. Still more did the early Christians endeavor to make propagandas of their views in this manner; so that there were Gentile, Jewish, and Christian versions of the fifth, which in the latter they enjoyed a high authority in the church, being quoted as evidences of the truth of Christianity by such apologists as Athenagoras, Justinus, Theophilus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and especially Lactantius. (Cf. Béraudon : De l’emploi que les Pères de l’église ont fait des oracles sibyllins, Paris, 1853.) These different oracles, as many as have been preserved, originating at different places, in different times, and under various tendencies, are now united in twelve books and some fragments, written in Homeric hexameters and language. In former times but eight books were known, which were published first by Xystus Betuljeus, Basel, 1845. Angelo Mai in 1817 discovered the twelfth book, and in 1828 the ninth to twelfth books. C. Alexandre (1841-56) published the first complete edition (in 4 vols. folio, 1853-57). See his Complete Works, and his Opera Theologica, a collected edition appeared at Deventer in 1644, in 5 vols. folio.

The contents are most varied. After two fragments of a general character, book i. (400 lines) describes the creation of the world, the five generations to Noah, the Deluge, and prophecies concerning future nations; book ii. (348 lines) exhorts to an upright life, and prophecies the destruction of all the wicked; book iii. (828 lines) contains three sections of prophecies concerning the good and the evil; book iv. (190 lines), prophecies of various kinds and the tenth generation; book v. (531 lines), the fate of various nations and the better future for the Jews; book vi. (28 lines), Christian prophecy concerning the Messiah; book vii. (162 lines), the Messiah and his times, with surrounding circumstances; book viii. (30 lines), the destruction of Rome and its lands at the final consummation, together with messianic predictions; book ix. (324 lines), address to all the nations, and predictions; book x. (298 lines), the Latin race and its fate; book xi. (173 lines), the fate of different nations in the east and west; book xii. (360 lines), admonitions and prophecies, closing with the glory of Israel. In a collection of this sort, naturally no attempt is made to author, date, country, object, etc., of the various parts, can be expected among the investigators; and in reality but a small portion has been thoroughly examined. The most searching work in this respect was done by Bleek in his articles Ueber die Entstehung und Zusammensetzung der uns in 8 Büchern erhaltenen Sammlung Sibyllinischer Orakel (Theol. Zeitschrift, herausg. von Schleiermacher, der Wette, u. Lücke, vol. i., 1819, pp. 120-246, vol. ii., 1820, pp. 172-239), and his conclusions have found general acceptance among scholars. The prophecies which we have here collected into one volume extend over a period of from five to six centuries. The majority of the books are of little or no importance historically. Religiously, however, as the index to a certain train of thought and spirit in certain times and places, they are not only interesting, but also instructive. The following results can be regarded as safe: book iii. (97-807) is the production of an Alexandrian Jew in the Maccabean period (170-160 B.C.), combined with two older poems of heathen origin (97-161, 433-488) and later Christian interpolations (38-92), and dates from the second triumvirate (40-30 B.C.). All the other books, with the exception of book i., which is pre-Christian and of Jewish origin. The third book is in every way the most important, and in it three sections can be traced (97-294, 295-488, 489-807). The first section, after an historical survey from Kronos to the Romans, begins with 161 to prophesy, that, after the seventh king of Hellenistic origin shall have ruled over Egypt, then the people of God will again come into power, and the evil nations of the earth will be destroyed. The second section pronounces a judgment on all nations who directly or indirectly have stood in opposition to the Israelites. The third section predicts the final judgment, and finishes with the promise of a messianic kingdom and glory. The statement about the seventh king, as well as the epithet πολιοφανης (“republican”) applied in 176 to Rome, points to the time of Augustus, and the meeting of the earth in the final writing. This is thus pre-Christian, as are also lines 30-92. (Cf. Drummond : The Jewish Messiah, 1877, pp. 14 sqq.) Since the prophecies concerning the Messiah and his rule in the other books are vatimina post eventum, those of the third, being, as was seen, pre-Christian and of Jewish origin, are really the only ones of special value in the whole collection. As the prophecy of 288 refers to Cyrus, and the vòb òéox of 775 should be wb òéox (cf. SCHÜRER: N. T. Zügengesch., p. 507), these two passages are not messianic. But the whole section (652-795) is messianic. God will send a king from the rising of the sun (άν όλων), who will put an end to all war on earth. The Gentile rulers will rise up against him and the temple, but they will be destroyed around Jerusalem. God will then establish an eternal kingdom, under whose sceptre all nations. Peace will reign over the whole earth, and the laws of God will be recognized and obeyed everywhere. The main stress lies on the establishment of this everlasting kingdom, the person of the Messiah as the medium of its establishment being of minor importance. The later and younger section (lines 96-72) finds its historical background in the career of Anthony and Cleopatra in Egypt. Vv. 46-50 read: "But when Rome will rule also over Egypt, then the greatest of kingdoms, that of the immortal king, will appear among men, and there will come a holy king (γιγάντων), who will rule all the lands of the earth for all times as long as time continues." This king is naturally God or the Messiah. Cf., in addition to the works mentioned, HILGENFELD: Die jüd. Apokalypse in ihrer schriftl. Entwicklung, 1857, pp. 51-90; Z'lschrifl. wiss. SICARIII (assassins), a set of Jewish fanatics who did much to hasten the war which terminated so disastrously, and on the downfall of Masada went to Egypt, where they continued to resist the Roman power (Josephus: Antiq., XX. 8, 5, 6; War, II. 13, 8, VII. 10, 1). See JUDAS OF GALILEE, ZEALOT.

SICKENING, Franz von, b. in the castle of Ebernburg, near Kreuznach, May 1, 1481; d. in the castle of Landsthal, near Zweibrücken, May 7, 1523; one of the heroes of feudalism, always at war with the powerful and arrogant, always defending the suppressed and meek, but specially famous for the great service he rendered to the Reformation. He enjoyed the confidence of Maximilian, and, in the beginning, also of Charles V.; but in 1522, when he attacked the Archbishop of Treves, he openly declared in favor of the Lutherans. The undertaking proved too great for his means; and he was, in his turn, besieged in his own castle by the archbishop, and consequently agreed in before his death with Reuchlin, Ulrich von Hutten, Butzer, Cölemanderius, and numerous others, found at various times a refuge at Ebernburg; and his castles were justly called the "Asylums of Righteousness." His life was written by F. MÜCH, Stuttgart, 1827, 2 vols. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SIDNEY, Sir Philip, b. at Penshurst in Kent, Nov. 9, 1554; d. at Arnheim in the Netherlands, Oct. 7, 1586; was educated at Shrewsbury, Oxford, and Cambridge; went abroad in 1572, and narrowly escaped the Massacre of St. Bartholomew; became a courtier and diplomatist; was married and knighted, 1688; wished to join Drake's second expedition in 1586, but was forbidden by Elizabeth, who feared to "lose the jewel of her dominions;" was made governor of Flushing, and general of horse; and was mortally wounded at Zutphen, 29 Nov., 1586, marking the event by an illustrious act of humane magnanimity. This model gentleman did not omit religion from the list of his accomplishments, as may be seen by his noble sonnet, "Leave me, O love which reachest but to dust," and by the version of Psalms made in conjunction with his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. His poetical talent, if not lofty, was more than respectable. His Works appeared in 3 vols., 1725, 1739, etc. His Poems were edited by Mr. Grosart in 1873. His Arcadia and Defence of Poesie, once popular, are still famous. F. M. BIRD.

SIDONIUS, Michael, b. at Esslingen in Baden, c. 1605; d. in Vienna, Sept. 30, 1561. He studied theology at Tubingen, entered the service of the Archbishops of Mayence, and was by Paul III., though bishop of Sidon, not permitted to use his surname Sidonius, whence his surname Sidonius: his family name was Heding. He represented for some time the Archbishop of Mayence at the Council of Trent, and the emperor in the negotiations of Ulm. By the latter he was made bishop of Merseburg in 1550, and in the cloquoy of Worms (1537) he took a prominent part. He was very active, though without exercising any influence, and the mediating position he tried to occupy between Romanism and the Reformation he had not strength enough to vindicate. He wrote the Catechismus Moguntinus. NEUDECKER.

SIENA, Council of. The Council of Constance ended in a general confession of incompetence to deal with the question of the reformation of the church. It strove to keep the matter open, by providing for the reception, discussion, and fixed Pavia for the meeting-place of the next, in five years' time. Accordingly, in 1423, Martin V. summoned a council at Siena; but scarcely had it met, when the outbreak of a plague gave the Pope a pretext for transferring it to Siena, where it would be nearer Rome, and more under the Pope's influence. On July 2, 1423, the council assembled at Siena. It was scantily attended; for European politics were disturbed, and few hoped that any thing would be done by a council held in Italy. The council began by a contest with Martin V. about the wording of his safe conduct, and negotiated with the citizens for greater security. Martin V. complained of this conduct as seditious, and the Papal party used personal pressure to intimidate the Reformers. The council finally agreed in condemning the heresies of Wiclif and Hus, and approving of negotiations for union with the Greek Church. The French then pressed for a consideration of the reforms projected at Constance. The Papal party took advantage of the small numbers present to throw the machinery of the council, which was organized by nations, into confusion. They contrived to have a disputed election to the office of president in the French nation, and urged the appointment of deputies to fix the meeting-place of the next council. This question awakened national animosities, as the French wished to secure the choice of some place in France. Finally, on Feb. 10, 1424, Basel was chosen as the meeting-place of the next council, to be held in seven years. After this, the dissolution of the council was felt to be imminent. The citizens of Siena vainly offered their aid to any who would stay, and brave the Pope. The council slowly dwindled, till on March 7 the Papal legates, taking advantage of the solitude produced by the festivities of the Carnival, posted on the door of the cathedral a decree of its dissolution, and rode away from Siena. A few zealous Reformers still wished to stay; but on March 8 they agreed, that to avoid scandal to the church, and danger to themselves, it was better to disperse quietly. The council came to an end without any results. Really, it followed too soon on the Council of Constance. The position of affairs had not changed since then; the Pope had not recovered his possessions in Italy; those who had been at Constance were not prepared to renew their labors when there was no hope of success. The only achievement of the Council of Siena was that it fixed the meeting-place of the Council of Basel.

SIEVEKING, Amalie, a distinguished philanthropist of noble birth; was b. in Hamburg, July 25, 1794; d. in Hamburg, April 1, 1859. Left an orphan at an early age, she took up her home with an elderly relative, and began at a tender age works of charity, by instructing a girl living in the house. From this beginning there grew a school, which enjoyed an enviable reputation in Hamburg. Her mind was deeply interested in the organization of a Protestant sisterhood, but was diverted from the realization of her plans, for a time, by the aversion of her relative. At the outbreak of the cholera in 1831 she offered her services to the hospital at Hamburg, and remained in attendance upon the sick for eight weeks, when the plague had abated, winning for herself general esteem by her courage and devotion. The year following, 1832, she realized her design, and formed the female society for the care of the sick and the poor. The society grew rapidly, and became the mother-institution of similar organizations in other parts of Germany. A careful record was kept of each case: those with whom poverty was a chronic disease were not aided. Money was never distributed; orders on the butcher, grocer, etc., were given instead. While the primary object of the society was to alleviate physical ills, it did not overlook the needs of the soul. See Denkwürdigkeiten aus d. Leben von A. SIGBERT OF GEMBLOURS, a distinguished ecclesiastical writer; was b. in Belgium about 1030; was educated at the convent of Gemblours; became monk; in 1048 went to Metz as master of the school at St. Vincent's Convent; returned to Gemblours, 1070, and, after laboring there as teacher for forty years, died Oct. 5, 1112. He was a man of simple piety and integrity, as well as of distinguished scholarship. Produced by the festivities of the Carnival, posted on the door of the cathedral a decree of its dissolution, and rode away from Siena. A few zealous Reformers still wished to stay; but on March 8 they agreed, that to avoid scandal to the church, and danger to themselves, it was better to disperse quietly. first book, Moral Pieces in Prose and Verse. Her Poems, Religious and Elegiac, a selection from for-

fine volumes, largely poetical, and chiefly on sa-

some of them from Nettleton's Village Hymns

SI'HOR, i.e., "the dark," is a name common to three rivers. (1) The Nile (Isa. xxiii. 3; Jer. ii.
18), called by Greeks and Romans, "the black," from the black mud which it carries along during the time of the inundation. (2) The river of Egypt (Num. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xv. 4, 47; 1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. vii. 8; Isa.
xxvii. 12), the "Sihor which is before Egypt." (J.
osh. xiii. 3), "Shihor of Egypt." (1 Chron. xiii.
5), "the river to the great sea" (Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28), which, formed through the confluence of many wadys, falls into the Mediterranean at the Wady el-Arish, between Pelusium and Gaza.
During the summer it is almost dried up. Genesiuus (Thesaurus, iii. 1393) thinks that this also was sent to Rome in order to obtain from Anto-ninus Pius a greater freedom, both of teaching and worship, for his co-religionists. He was a man more feared than loved, learned but obscure, strict but harsh: but he had acquired a great fame, even among the Pagans, for secret knowledge; and his mission was successful. After his return, however, he denounced Roman religion and institutions with such a vehemence that he was impeached, and sentenced to death. He fled, and lived for several years as a hermit in a cave, until, after the death of Antoninus, he was allowed to settle as a teacher at Thekoa, whence he after-though several parts of that book cannot belong to him, because mentioning teachers who were that other parts were actually written by him.

II. THE NAMES OF SIMEON IN THE MACCABEAN PERIOD. — 1. Simeon, the grandfather of Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 1).

2. Simeon. The Benjamite, a governor of the temple, who informed the Syrians, in the time of Seleucus Philopator (186 B.C.) and Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C., 2 Macc. iii.), concerning the treasures of the temple. Having arrived with the high priest, Onias III., he went to the Syrian Apollonius, informed him of the treasures of the temple, and caused the sending of Heliodor to rob the temple.

3. Simeon, surnamed “Thassi,” second son of Mattathias, and last survivor of the Maccabean brothers. He deserved well of his people, which acknowledged his merits by appointing him prince and high priest. The document which mentions this fact throws a remarkable, though a little heeded, light upon the messianic hope of the people during the entire post-prophetic period, when it reads: “And it hath pleased well the Jews and the priests that Simon should be their prince and high priest forever, until there arise a trustworthy prophet” (1 Macc. xiv. 41). In the reserve at the end of the clause the theocratic conscience of the people and priests has evidently reserved the right of the Messiah, but with a disheartened expression; for so to say that the advent of the Messiah was near at hand meant at that time to do away with the Maccabean dynasty. In accordance with this supposition of an exclusive opposition between the advent of the Messiah and the political dynasty, the Idumean Herod had all the children, killed at Bethsaida, John the Baptist, however, preached the advent of the messianic kingdom mostly under the protection of the Roman Government.

III. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE GOSPEL HISTORY. — (1) Simon Zelotes, see below; (2) Simon Peter (q.v.); (3) Simon, father of Judas Iscariot (John vi. 11, xii. 4, xiii. 2, 26); (4) Simon the Pharisee, in whose house the penitent woman anointed the head and feet of Jesus (Luke vii. 36); (5) Simon the leper of Bethany, in whose house Mary of Bethany anointed Jesus (Matt. xxi. 26; John xii. 6); (6) Simon of Cyrene (Mark xiv. 14; Luke xx. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxii. 26). Mark describes him as the father of Alexander and Rufus. Besides these names, other Simeons are mentioned: (1) Simeon in the genealogy of Jesus (Luke iii. 31); (2) Old Simeon, who took the child Jesus upon his arms (Luke ii. 25); (3) Simeon usually designated Simon Peter; and (4) a Simeon the father of Gamaliel.

IV. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE APOSTOLIC HISTORY. (1) Simon Nigrit (Acts xii. 1); (2) Simon Magus (q.v.), the counterpart of Simon Peter; (3) Simon, the tanner of Joppa, in whose house Peter tarried many days (Acts ix. 49). The counterpart of Simon, the tiler and brother of the Lord, is Simon of Gerasa, who plays a remarkable part in the Jewish war (Josephus: “Jewish War,” II. 5, 4). It is worthy of notice that the blind Jewish people at Jerusalem rather followed a certain Simon and John in order to be destroyed, than the apostles John and Simon, who offered them the salvation in Christ, and who had to leave the city with the Christians.

V. SIMON ZELOTES (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13), otherwise called “the Canaanite” (Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 18). The term “zeleotes,” which is peculiar to Luke, is the Greek equivalent for the Hebrew term kenen, preserved by Matthew and Mark. As the surnames of the apostles express their characteristics, we see that this Simon already had the right name as Simon, inasmuch as the same reminded them of the messianic spirit of zealotry of olden times. It is characteristic of the zealot Simon that he is the brother of Judas Lebbaeus or Thaddaeus; and, if we may take into consideration the contrasts which we find so often among brothers, we may suppose, that, in the occurrence in Mark iii. 31 sq., James, and perhaps also Joses, who not even belonged to the apostolic circle, took a prominent part; whilst in the narrative telling us of the interview on the side of Jesus’ brethren, Simon and Judas took the lead. According to Eusebius (iii. 11) and Nichæorus (iii. 10), this Simon, after the death of James the Just, was made bishop of Jerusalem by the apostles. As this must have taken place soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, we may suppose that Simon already before that time led the Christians to Pella (Euseb., iii. 6). And since the apostles was crucified at the time the census of the people was taken, twenty (about 107 A.D., Hegesippus by Euseb., iii. 32, 1, Cotel. ed. Const. apost. 7, 46), we may surmise with certainty that as bishop he directed the affairs of the Jewish-Christian Church at Pella-Jerusalem in the spirit of union with the Gentile Christians, whilst Bishop John directed the Gentile-Christian Church of Asia Minor in the spirit of union with the Jewish Christians. That Simon should be the preacher in Egypt, Cyrene, Mauritania, Lybia, and in the British Isles, where he is said to have been crucified, is mere fiction.

SIMON MACCABEUS. See Maccabees.

SIMON MAGUS heads, in the early church, the list of heretics. From Irenæus (i. 30) on, he is known as the heresiarch, and is called by Ignatius (“Ad Trau.”) the first-born of Satan. In the middle age his name gave the designation to that lowest practice of the church, the sale of spiritual offices, simony. The biblical account of Simon is found in Acts viii. The sacred writer connects his name with dark and magical arts, and represents him as endeavoring, by means of them, to secure a large following. The impression he made upon the people is vouched for by the title they gave him, τασσαντας τυφλους (“the Power of God, which is called Great”), by which was meant that the highest divine potency was revealed in him. Under the influence of Philip’s preaching and miracles he offered himself for baptism. But his request of Peter, to purchase the miraculous power of the apostles with money, abundantly proves that he wished to perpetuate his authority over the people. Condemned by Peter for his audacious and ungodly request, he craved the apostle’s intercession; but, as most of the commentators hold, his last word breathes dread of the supernatural power which he did not possess, and not repentance. Turning to the ecclesiastical tradition, which represents Simon as the father of all those heresies with which men endeavored to corrupt the church, we must believe, that, in his subsequent history, he opposed Peter, sought to fan the opposition of the Samaritans to the Jews, and perhaps gave himself out as the Messiah. We shall now give a survey of the accounts current amongst the Fathers concerning his personal fortunes and his system.

SIMON MAGUS.

1. Simon's Personal Fortunes. — The first post-biblical author to mention Simon is Hegesippus (Euseb.: H. E., lv. 22), who states that he belonged to the Jewish sects with which the heretical corruptions of the church originated, the Samaritans being counted among such sects. Justin Martyr, himself born in Samaria, has more to say about him; and his account, with that of the Acts, forms the firm foundation of all subsequent accounts. According to him, Simon was born at Gitton, Samaria, and was revered by the majority of the Samaritans as the most high God; and his attendant, Helena, whom he had found in a brothel at Tyre, was his iwea. He visited Rome under Claudius, and created such an impression by his magical arts, that the Senate and people worshipped him as a god, and erected to him a statue bearing the inscription to the "Holy God Simon" (Simon Deo Sancto). Hilgenfeld and others have supposed that Justin confounded a Samaritan village with Kithium in Cyprus, but without sufficient reason. The strange statue was explained by a discovery, in 1584, of a marble pedestal bearing the inscription, "Sanco sano Deo filio sacrum Sex. Pompei; . . . donum dedit. Justin, without doubt, was misled by this inscription. The Clementine Homilies speak of Simon's parents, and his education in Greek and magic at Alexandria, and represent him as originally one of the thirty disciples of John the Baptist. He travelled about with Helena, giving himself out as the highest power, superior to the Creator of the world, and representing Helena as having descended from the highest heaven, and being the mother of all and of wisdom. Many magical tricks are attributed to him. He commanded statues to walk, walked without injury in the fire, transformed himself into a serpent or goat, opened locked doors, etc. The relations between him and Helena were probably of an amorous nature, and they both died, the latter to confess his own collusion with Satan, and the apostle's right to the claim of a true apostle being counted among such sects. Thither the magicians brought their evil arts, that the Senate and people might be convinced of the divinity of Simon. Cornelius Nepos, however, speaks of the gradual disappearance, and Theodoret, of its extinction. The Simonian teachings gradually take on the form of an elaborate gnostic system.

Simon is the highest power, the father over all. Helena is the prolific mother from whom he gets the idea of creating angels and archangels. She brings them forth; and they, in turn, create the world. These angels, which do not know their father, out of jealousy detain their mother in captivity. Condemned for centuries, she passes from one female body to another, until she at last is found in a brothel at Tyre. Simon descended from heaven, and freed his lost sheep, and emancipated those who believed in him from the world and the service of the angels who created it. This is in general the view of Tertullian (De an., 34), Hippolytus (v. 10 sqq.), Eulogius, and, in part, Theodoret. Hippolytus (v. 7 sq.), however, speaks of another and quite different Simonian system, and mentions a writing by Simon, the "great Genetrix" (The Great Genetrix), as the great power above all, is called the Great Deity, a designation which the Clementines and Clemens Alexandrinus also mention. Jerome (Com. in Matt., xxxiv.) preserves Simon's words to this effect: "I am the Life, I am the Light, the paraclete, the all of God."

The following may be said concerning the growth and development of the Simonian sect. Simon was originally the false Messiah. A sect of Samaritans sprung up who worshipped him as the most high God. Around his person was formed a gnostic system composed of mythological and Christian elements. Baur (Manich. Syst., 468 sqq.) was the first to elucidate the Simonian system, that the entire early church connected Peter with Rome, which he visited to oppose Simon, is not true of the first two centuries. Tertullian follows closely Justin and Ireneaus, who do not connect Peter with Simon's sojourn there. The case is different in the third century, when Hippolytus speaks of Simon's controversy at Rome with Peter, and the Clementine description is associated with the Clementine descriptions. Thither the magician fled, pursued by the apostle. His death is differently related. According to some, he promised to fly to heaven, and in fact did succeed in flying, until, stopped by the prayer of Peter, he fell dead to the earth. According to others, overcome with shame and chagrin, he threw himself from a rock (Const. Ap., vi. 8 sqq.; Arnob.: Adv. gentes, i. 12; Cyrill.: Hieros., vi. 15, etc.).

2. Simon's System. — The Fathers agree in representing Simon as the coryphaeus of the heretics, from whom came the devilish poison of heresy. From Justin on, a communion or sect is spoken of who recognized him as leader, or worshipped him as God. Justin expressly speaks of the "Simonian system" (Apol., ii. 14). Ireneaus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian (De an., 57), Origen, and even Celsus, speak of the sect of the Simonians (P.) was the name Celsus gave to Simonianism; and Moller: Gesck. d. Kosmologie, 1875, pp. 301-321; Schaff: Church History, rev. ed., 1856, ii. 401 sqq.; Hilgenfeld: Kriegergesch., 1884, 183 sqq.].

W. MÜLLER.
Simon, Richard, the founder of biblical isagogy; b. at Dieppe, May 13, 1638; d. there April 11, 1712. He early became a novice of the Oratorians; but, as the prescribed ascetical practices embarrassed his studies, he left the order, and studied with private support in Paris. His connection, however, with the Oratorians, was not altogether dissolved. In 1662 he again entered the order as novice, having obtained permission to continue his studies; but he never felt at home in the order. The Oratorians were at that time rather successful competitors of the Jesuits in the field of education, and this circumstance drew them nearer towards the Jansenists. But Simon, so to speak, a rationalist by nature, felt averse to the Jansenists; and these conflicting tendencies made his position in the order somewhat difficult. He was first sent to Jully to teach philosophy, but afterwards appointed at the library of the order in Paris to catalogue its Oriental manuscripts,—a task which was fully congenial to him, and of great advantage in his biblical studies. After the publication, however, of his great work on isagogy, he was again compelled to leave the order; and the latter part of his life he spent mostly in his native city, in literary retirement.

The earlier works of Simon have no special interest,—Fides ecclesiae orientalis (1671), a translation from the Italian of Gaudini's "Travels among the Maronites" (1765), Comparaison des cérémonies des juifs avec la discipline de l'Eglise (1831), Histoire de l'origine des recensus ecclésiastiques (1894), etc. But in 1685 appeared his Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, and it was followed by his Histoire critique du texte du N.T. (1689), Histoire critique des versions du N.T. (1690), and Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du N.T. (1693). The first part of the work was done in 1678. It was passed by the censor, and printed; but its publication was retarded on account of the dedication to the king. Meanwhile, some stray copies began to circulate, and attracted attention; and Bossuet, on this occasion acting in unison with the Jansenists, succeeded in having the work suppressed. The whole edition was destroyed; and only a few copies, in the possession of private persons, were saved. From one of these copies the Amsterdam bookseller, Elzevir, made a very incorrect edition in 1679; and from that edition Noël Aubert de Versé made his Latin translation, 1681. Finally, the author himself, who in the mean time had left the order of the Oratorians, published an authentic edition at Rotterdam, 1685. It was anonymous, but the other parts of the work bear the name of the author.

The work in its totality is the first scientific attempt at writing the history of the Bible considered as a literary product; and, in view of the immense amount of research which since that time has been bestowed on the subject, the idea of such an undertaking commands respect, both on account of its originality and on account of the courage it presupposes. The execution bears, of course, the marks of its time, of the scantiness of the materials and the insufficiency of the tools at the disposal of the author; but it cannot be denied that it also bears the marks of his narrowness and peculiarities, his hobbies, and his antipathies. The amount of criticism which the work called forth was enormous; and as Simon was a somewhat ticklish person, of a not altogether lovely temper, he could overlook nothing. The first attacks, by Weil, a converted Jew from Metz, and Spanheim, Prussian ambassador in London, with the responses of Simon, are added as an appendix to the Rotterdam edition of the first part. These and more profound and noteworthy controversies ensued, with Isaak Yoss, Jean le Clerc (Clericus), and others. Generally speaking, the literary history of the work is very interesting, as most of the questions brought forward in the controversies were new; but it is also difficult, as Simon published most of his answers pseudonymously.

Having criticised so many other translations of the Bible, Simon at last undertook to make one himself. The works appeared in 1702, in four volumes, printed at Trévoux, without the name of the author. It was soon discovered, however; and Bossuet took pains to gather from the translation a sufficient number of heresies, especially of a Socinian color. The book was forbidden, first by episcopal authority in some single dioceses, then by royal authority in the whole kingdom. Simon died before the part was published; but he was embittered, and not in vain. Among his later works are Lettres choisies de M. Simon (1700-05, 3 vols.), and Bibliothèque critique (1708, 3 vols.), both of which contained striking evidences of the immense learning of the author, and valuable contributions to the literary history of the time. His papers and his excellent library he bequeathed to the cathedral of Rouen, but during the Revolution most of them disappeared. See the elaborate and reliable biography of Richard Simon by K. H. Graf, in Strassburger theolog. Beiträge, 1847, pp. 188-242; [also G. Masson: Richard Simon, London, 1887; and A. Simon of Tournay lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century as teacher of philosophy and theology in the university of Paris. He was the first who applied the Aristotelian philosophy to theology, which circumstance filled his lecture-room to overflowing, but also seems to have made him crazy from vanity. Matthew Paris tells us that one day he exclaimed, "O Jesus! what have I not done for the consolidation of thy doctrine, though I could have done so very much more for its destruction!" after which he lost the powers of speech and memory, and had to learn his letters over again; but he never reached farther than spelling the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. Thomas Cantipratensis ascribes the famous saying about the three impostors—Moses, Christ, and Mohammed—to him. But Henry of Ghent, who was a canon of Tournay, and doctor of the Sorbonne in 1290, and who, consequently, ought to know, says nothing of those stories in speaking of Simon. None of his works have been printed, but they are said to be in perfect harmony with the doctrinal system of the church.

Simony is, according to canon law, the heaviest of all ecclesiastical crimes (delicta merae ecclesiasticae), and has found its most pregnant description in c. 21, § 1; c. 1, qu. 1. The name is derived from Simon Magus (Acts viii. 18); and by degrees, as the view developed of ordination by the laying-on of hands by the bishop as a communication of the Holy Spirit, and the power of forgiving sin, the buying and selling of ordination naturally became a crime against the Holy Spirit. The idea gradually extended to the buying or selling of any ecclesiastical office, and, in the controversy between the Pope and the emperor concerning investiture, it formed the principal weapon in the hands of the Pope. Later on, the idea extended still farther: it became simony to obtain admission to a monastic order by money, or to buy or sell the right of ecclesiastical patronage.

SIMPPLICIUS, Pope 468-483, was a friend of Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, and took part in the Monophysite controversy by condemning Timotheus Alilurus, Petrus Mongus, John of Apamea, Paul of Ephesus, and Peter the fuller. He is commemorated by the church on March 2.

SIN. Though Scripture gives no definition of the idea of sin, it leaves no elements of the doctrine of sin unnoticed, but gives a full account of how sin penetrated into human nature by the fall of man, how it develops into special acts through the self-determination of man, and how its power is finally broken by the atoning sacrifice of God. This account is the basis of the whole historical development of the Christian dogma of sin: the impulses which pushed on the development it derived from the steadily increasing clearness and depth with which the ideas of freedom and necessity, and their reciprocal relation, were conceived.

The older Fathers, the apologists, Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus of Antioch, as well as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Athanasius, the two Gregories, Chrysostom, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Methodius, defined sin as opposition to the holy will of God, and affirmed that such an iniquity involved death as its necessary consequence. But, though they were well aware that sin had spread throughout the whole human race without leaving one single human being as an exception, they did not put that universal state of iniquity in any necessary connection with the fall of Adam. Every single sin, they taught, is an act of free will, and, in its relation to the sin of Adam, only a repetition; and consequently an infant is as incapable of committing a sin as unable to do any thing good. Even Tertullian, though he taught that the sinfulness of human nature, with death as its consequence, is propagated by generation (corpus tradux animae), asserted that man in his natural state had still the power to do good, that the natural state of man was not one of sin and guilt. It was first during the controversy between Pelagius and Augustine that people became conscious of the contradiction between sin as an act of individual freedom and sin as the result of organic necessity. Pelagius and his adherents, Celestius, Julian of Eclanum, and others, held that the propagation of sin by generation is unthinkable; that good and evil are not born with us, but done by us; that man has now the same nature as Adam had when he was created; that sin is an act of free will, etc. Thus the concupiscence, or that sensual movement from which, when not governed by man, sin originates, is not an effect of the sin of Adam, but, like death, inherent in man himself, an element in the very nature of man; and seems to be preserved in the Arabic Et-Tineh ("sineh" signifying mud). Pelusium is famous for the many battles fought there. Here Sethon drove back the army of Sennacherib, and here Cambyses defeated Psammenitus (Herod., II. 141, 111. 10 sq.). The Persians defeated here also Nectanebos (Diod., 16, 42 sq.).

consists in reason and a free will, has not been lost. The later Greek theologians, Theodorus, Studita, Theophylact, Euthymius Zigabenus, and others, followed in the same track. In the West the subject received a very peculiar treatment by John Scotus Erigena. In his system of Platonizing philosophy, he ascribed to sin, not as Augustine did, a relative but an absolute necessity; and thereby he really destroyed the sin idea. Sin, he said, is an element of human nature, just as evil is an element of the universe; and consequently sin is just as necessary for the perfect development of human nature, as evil for the perfect development of the universe. But by itself evil is only something negative, the mere negation of good, and has no positive existence, as little as sin. Erigena, however, exercised very little influence on this point; and, generally speaking, medieval theology may be said to have left the subject nearly in the same state in which it received it. Of the schoolmen, Anselm of Canterbury, Peter the Lombard, and Thomas Aquinas expounded the dogma on the basis of the category of necessity; Abelard, Duns Scotus, and the Scotists generally, on the basis of the category of freedom. According to the former, sin is dispatched to God, caused by pride, and the sinfulness of the race is the effect of the fall of Adam. In Adam, the person corrupted nature (peccatum originele originatum); in his offspring, nature corrupts the person (peccatum originale originatum). Consequently, although the senses are by themselves not of the character of sin, and only enter as an element into the sinning, actual sin, hereditary sin is, nevertheless, truly sin, and the unbaptized infant is justly damned. In this sense of the word, neither Abelard nor Duns Scotus recognized the existence of hereditary sin. That which was lost by the fall of Adam was, according to Duns Scotus, the justitia originalis; and the Scotists in general laid great emphasis on the free activity of man, a circumstance which aided them considerably in the whole process of development as above described, each onward step presenting as a necessary transition through evil, completeness of the body in all its qualities, so that the capacity for salvation is reduced to a mere possibility; as a reatus (guilt) which brings man, on account of the evil which is propagated in him, under the wrath and judgment of God. Calvin, although, on account of his supralapsarian views, he experienced some difficulties in refuting the charge that he made necessity; and, nevertheless, that hereditary sin is connected with guilt; and the later Reformed theologians, Polanus, Alsted, van Til, and others, defined the fall as a breach of the faultus natura, and sin as a defectus nature. A transition to a stronger emphasizing and a more minute elaboration of the second element of the doctrine, the freedom of the will, became visible in Calvin (who rejected the idea of hereditary sin as a guilt) and the syncretists in general; and during the period of rationalism and supernaturalism the movement was completed. The rationalists, who generally liked better to speak of the dignity of man than of his sin, argued that a transference of the guilt of Adam to his offspring contradicted the goodness, wisdom, and justice of God; and instead of hereditary sin, which they hated, they spoke of a certain weakness of the will, caused by a certain instinct towards the sensuous side of existence, a certain inclination towards the sensuous side of existence, a certain instinct for pleasure, etc., which was propagated by example, or perhaps by generation, but which formed part and parcel of human nature as created by God, and presented no insuperable obstacle to the absolute exercise of the freedom of the will. The principal representatives of these views were Henke, Reinhard, Eberhard, Wegscheider, and De Wette. The supernaturalists, on the other hand, very far from going this length. Nevertheless, Reusch explained the transference of guilt from Adam to his offspring by an imputatio metaphysica; God knowing that in Adam's place any and every man would have sinned like him. Reinhard explained the fall as a kind of poisoning, and hereditary sin as the inheritance of a poisoned constitution. In concept, in essence, the Scotchmen, such as Michaelis, G. F. Seiler, Bretschneider, and others, taught that no man is declared guilty, and surrendered to punishment, on account of the sin of Adam and the sinfulness he has inherited from Adam, but only on account of those actual sins in which, with free self-determination, he allows his sinful disposition to realize itself. It is apparent, that, in the whole process of development as above described, each onward step has been accomplished by a more or less one-sided emphasis on one of the two elements of the dogma, — the organic necessity, or the individual freedom. It is the characteristic of the theology of our age, that a perfect mediation between the two opposites is now demanded. Daub's attempt, in his Judas Ischarioth, at explaining the origin of evil as having taken place before the creation of man, found no favor; but, under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy, Marheineke, in his Grundlinien der theolog. Moral, defined sin as a contradiction between the finite and the infinite spirit, necessarily arising from the abstract, unconscious unity of God and man, and as necessarily resulting in a concrete and conscious unity; and this idea did not prove altogether sterile. By Vatke, Romany, and others, sin was represented as a necessary transition through evil, without which man can neither fully know nor fully do that which is good; and generally the Hegelian school of theology taught the absolute necessity of sin as a condition of the development of the human spirit. Schleiermacher, however, abandoned this track. He sought to establish unity by explaining sin as a double fact, — a free deed of the subject on the one side, and a necessary result of the objective development on the other, — and the sinful state of man as a disturbance of his nature, not necessary to it; so that we become conscious of our sins, partly as something we have done, and partly as something which has its cause outside of our being. Later theologians generally show an influence either from Hegel or from Schleiermacher, and their treatment of the doctrine of sin is generally shaped after one of those two models. But hardly any of them can be said to have established a perfect balance between freedom and necessity in their solutions of the problem. Nitzsch, Mar枠 partation of the work of Christ upon the atonement as the objective fact. The doctrine is found in the Old Testament (Num. iv. 14, xviii. 19; Ps. ciii. 14; Ps. civ. 10, 15, 16, cxv. 4; Isa. liii.; Mic. vii. 18, 19, etc.), whereas it rests upon sacrifices (see Offerings); but in the New Testament it is frequently represented as the immediate result of Christ's death (Matt. xxvi. 28; Rom. iv. 25; 2 Cor. v. 19, 21; Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 18; Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. i. 18, 19), and again as the result of the acceptance of the atonement on the part of the individual (Matt. xii. 42; Luke vii. 47; Acts ii. 38; Rom. iii. 25; Col. ii. 13). Man, renouncing all works and all merits, is forgiven out of God's grace, for the sake of Christ's merits, through faith (Matt. ix. 2; Rom. iii. 25, iv. 4, 5). Righteousness is, however, reckoned as the condition of faith (Acts xiii. 39; Gal. ii. 16). Forgiveness, which removes guilt and its attendant punishment (Rom. v. 19), and sin itself (Rom. viii. 2 sqq.) is granted to all believers (cf. Rom. iii. 25). See SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT.

In the historical development of the doctrine, there was at first no clear understanding of the relations of God and man in the act of forgiveness; and so the apostolic Fathers represented it simply as the result of the atonement, and conditioned it upon a better life. Clement of Rome conditions it upon "faith," i.e., in the conception of the time, upon apprehension of the truths of Christianity, and obedience to the divine commands; the Shepherd of Hermas, upon " faith" and repentance, only once possible; Justin Martyr, upon "faith," baptism, and a righteous life; Clement of Alexandria, upon " faith" and good works; Origen, in his commentary upon Romans, upon " faith," but in other places adds good works, which he enumerates, — baptism, martyrdom, repentance, virtue, alms, forgiveness of sins against us, conversion of a sinner, brotherly love. The Latin Fathers — Ireneus, Tertullian, and Cyprian — attribute forgiving efficacy to baptism and to good works, as alms, and lay great stress upon penance. So the Greek Fathers — Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, Theodoret, Chrysostom — condition forgiveness upon faith, new life in the spirit, repentance (good works, alms, etc.). Augustine made an advance in the development of the doctrine, in that he represented forgiveness as a declarative act of God. He maintained that the works which justify follow, not precede, justification. But Pelagian teaching, that forgiveness was only a work of the general divine grace, and Catholic teaching respecting works of supererogation, prevented any immediate use thus never forgiven. The sinner continues obstinate and malignant till his death. It is therefore equivalent to final impenitence. Cf. Lange on Matthew (Am. ed., p. 227); Philip Schaff: Die Sünde wider den heiligen Geist, Halle, 1841; A. Von Ottengren: De peccato in spiritum sanctum, Dorpat, 1856; Immer: Die Sünde wider d. heiligen Geist, Breslau, 1839; and art. by Hermann Weiss, in Herzog 1, vol. xxii. 182-190.

SIN-OFFERINGS. See Offerings.

SINS, The Forgiveness of, is the negative effect of justification, in which conception precedes the positive, adoption, and rests as the subjective im favor of the doctrine of purgatory, that, although guilt could be forgiven, punishment followed sin up to the very time of the purgatorial fire. They emphasized auricular confession as the equivalent for penance, and thus perverted the doctrine of forgiveness. The mystics of the middle ages emphasized the inward connection between God and the heart. The Roman-Catholic doctrine, since the Council of Trent, is that forgiveness is received by man along with faith, hope, and love through Christ, in whom he is justified, and hence of forgiveness. The mystics eliminated yet more decidedly from their systems the doctrine of forgiveness as removal of guilt.

The Lutheran theologians first lay the emphasis upon God's side, in that they teach that sin is atoned for by the vicarious death of Jesus Christ. The removal of guilt is the first effect of Christ's death and forgiveness, but weakened their doctrine respecting the latter by representing that its principal effect was removal of punishment.

The speculative theologians have endeavored to find how correctly to unite the human and divine factors in the work of forgiveness. Schleiermacher finds the unity thus: forgiveness (1) is an effect of justification, (2) exists whenever man in repentance and faith enters into fellowship with Christ, and (3) is no result of a divine decree; but every necessity of deliverance from guilt, and desert of punishment, is only a declaration of the general decree to justify for Christ's sake. Martensen and Rothe defend this hypothesis. According to Exod. xix. 2 sq., the Israelites, after their departure from Rephidim, came to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire. And the Lord came down upon Mount Sinai, on the top of the mount; and the Lord called Moses up to the top of the mount, and Moses went up.

The Gulf of Suez and Akabah. On the north it is bounded by the upland plain of El-Râhab, and on the south by the Um-Sliuinian mount. A distinction has been made between Sinai and Horeb; and Hengstenberg (Authentique des Pentateuch, ii. pp. 396 sq.), with whom Robinson (Researches in Palestine) agrees, explains the change in the name, in that he makes Horeb the mountain ridge, and Sinai the individual summit from which the Ten Commandments were given. Gesenius suggested that Sinai might be the more general name, and Horeb the particular peak; and in this conjecture he was followed by Rosenmüller. Ewald sees not a local, but a temporal, difference in the use of both names (Geschichte, ii. 89, note).

According to Ewald, Sinai is the older name, therefore it occurs in the ancient song of Deborah (Judg. v. 5); whereas Horeb is not discoverable before the time of the fourth narrator, in whose time, however, it had become quite prevalent. But there really seems to be no local difference between Horeb and Sinai; but it rather belongs to the peculiarity of the author using the name. Josephus and the New Testament (Acts vii. 30, 38; Gal. iv. 24 sq.) only speak of Sinai; and modern Arabs call the whole mountain range in the peninsula Jebel-et-Tur, sometimes with the addition of Sina, though Robinson says extremely rarely.

As to the locality, it is very difficult to designate a certain spot. Some, as Burckhardt and Lepsius, have claimed that the mountain on which the law was given was the Jebel Serbâl. But the nature of the country around Serbâl is against this hypothesis (comp. Dieterici: Reisebilder, li. 54 sq.). A second hypothesis is the one which claims the Ras es-Sulšâfêh to be the Sinai of the Bible. This hypothesis was advocated by no less an authority than Robinson, who was followed by all writers and travellers till Léon de Laborde (in his Commentaire sur l'Ezode Append., pp. 1, 41 sq.), who advocated the old tradition in favor of Jebel Mûsa, and was followed by Krafft, Strauss, Graul, Ritter, and in part, also, by Tischendorf. Above all things, it is necessary to pay attention to the notices of the Bible. According to Exod. iii. 20, 22, 23, after their departure from Rephidim, came into the wilderness of Sinai, and encamped before the mount. God sends his message by Moses unto the people out of the mount, to tell them how he will receive them as his covenant people. Barriers are put up, to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. On the third day there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud, so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire. . . . And the Lord came down upon Mount Sinai, on the top of the mount; and the Lord called Moses up to the top of the mount, and Moses went up. And in Exod. xx. 18 sq. we read, "And all the people saw the thunders, and the lightnings, and the voice of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they removed, and stood afar off. . . . And Moses said unto the people, Fear not; for God is gone up from you, and the anger is withdrawn from your faces; fear not. And the people stood afar off, and Moses drew near unto the thick darkness, where God was. And in Exod. xxiv. 1 sq. Moses is called up into the mountain with Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel. Moses alone was to come near to the Lord: the rest were to worship afar off. Moses does according to God's commandment, and then continues alone on the mountain forty days and forty nights. In the mean time Aaron makes the golden calf. On going down from the mountain Moses hears the rejoicing of the people; and as he came nigh unto the camp, and saw the calf and the dancing, his anger waxed hot, and he cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount. From this description we must infer that immediately at the base of the mountain there was a large plain, where the camp of the Israelites was, and from which the mount ascended immediately, because barriers were put up to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. Robinson and those who follow him find this plain in the plain Er-Rahah, from which the granite wall of Sinai rises with the three-toothed peak Ras es-Sufafeh, asserting at the same time that no such plain is found on the south side. Others, who are in favor of the Jebel Musa, claim the Wady Sebalyeh to be that plain, which has been overlooked by Robinson, and from which, also, the cone of Sinai immediately rises like a gigantic altar of God. The plain Er-Rahah they claim as that spot of the camp from which Moses brought forth the people to meet with God, through the Wady Sebalyeh, and through which the people fled back into the camp.

It is remarkable that Sinai never became a place of Jewish pilgrimage. Elijah went there to escape the vengeance of Jezebel (1 Kings xix. 3-8). It is only a religious house from the earliest times, under the domination of a priory or of a hospital, was dissolved under Henry VIII., but again organized. It now exists under charter of 1651, and is both a clergy house and a hospital for ten poor men and ten poor women. See Dict. of the Church.

SINTRAH, monk, afterwards deacon, and finally presbyter, in the monastery of St. Gall; lived in the tenth century, and was so celebrated as a copyist, that every place of note was eager to have a manuscript by him. The so-called Evangelium longum, bound between the tablets of Charlemagne, is his work. He was, however, not a simple copyist, but a real artist, and combined in his art the vigorous but somewhat rough and awkward Lombard style with the refined and elegant style of the Irish monks. E. They imposed upon the English people the doctrines of transubstantiation, the usefulness of private masses, auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the communion in one kind. They were popularly called the "Bloody Articles" and the "Whip with six strings." See Articles of Religion.

SIX-PRINCIPLE BAPTISTS, so called from their six doctrines, contained in Heb. iv. 1, 2; viz., (1) repentance from dead works, (2) the laying-on of hands, (3) the doctrine of baptisms, (4) the laying-on of hands, (5) the resurrection of the dead, (6) eternal judgment. Their "laying-on of hands" is similar to episcopal confirmation. They refuse to fellowship with those who do not practise it. Their general type of theology is Arminian. They claim to date, as an organization, from 1830, and have always been, for the most part, confined to Rhode Island. In 1700 they had not more than a dozen (very weak) churches in New England, all but two in Rhode Island. They have no periodical organ, and no institutions or societies. He introduced the celebration of Easter at Rome, and was the author of the law prohibiting women touching the vessels on the altar.—Sixtus II. The Florentine clergy appealed to a general council; the corporation sent a vigorous letter to the Pope (July 21, 1478); and Bishop Gentilis of Arezzo declared him to have been in collusion with the conspirators. Louis XI. of France sent a deputation to Rome, accusing the Pope of stirring up strife, and calling upon him to summon a general council. The Pope refused to call a council, but the demand was again made by a synod of French prelates at Lyons (1479). Other princes expressed themselves in positive language; and, threatened with an invasion of the Turks, Sixtus concluded an alliance with Venice against Ferrara. When King Ferdinand, who was an ally of Ferrara, made a treaty with Rimino, Sixtus endeavored to induce Venice to relinquish its conquests. Failing in this, he laid the interdict upon the city (May 23, 1488). The wars which Sixtus began in the hope of promoting the interests of his family and favorites led him to exact tithes from the prelates, to sell ecclesiastical positions, etc. He built the chapel named after him, founded churches, built magnificent structures, but it the bridge over the Tiber; but the damage he did the church by his ambition overbalanced the good that accrued from these works. In a bull of 1477 he recommended the celebration of the feast of the Immaculate Conception, confirmed the Franciscans and Dominicans in their privileges in two bulls (1474), which these orders call the mare magnum (great sea), etc. —Sixtus V. (1585-90) combined with unusual energy and vigor great and statesmanlike versatility and foresight, revived the glory of the Roman chair, built splendid buildings, and filled the Papal treasury, but subordinated religious to political interests. He, without doubt, is one of the most distinguished of the bishops of Rome. He was a descendant of a family of Scelles which had emigrated to Italy, and settled at Montalto. Sixtus laid hold of power with a firm hand, suppressed the banditti bands, insisted upon the execution of the laws, promoted commerce, the manufacture of silk and wool, sought to drain the Pontine marshes, etc. By the bull Immensa (1587) he appointed fifteen congregations, made up of cardinals, for the more expeditious transaction of business, fixed the number of cardinals at seventy, ordered that all bishops should appear at Rome once in three years, etc. His administration was frugal, and left a well filled treasury to his successor. He did much for the adornment of Rome,— built the dome of St. Peter's, placed the obelisk in its present position, built the Lateran Palace, removed the Vatican Library to new and splendid quarters, and ordered an edition of the Septuagint (1587) and the received edition of the Vulgate. SLATER FUND FOR THE EDUCATION OF FREEDMEN. In the spring of 1882 a fund of one million dollars was given to trustees by John F. Slater of Norwich, Conn., for the purposes of educating and uplifting the freedmen of the United States, and preparing them for the duties of citizenship. The trustees were incorporated by the State of New York, and were organized with ex-President Hayes as their chairman, and Chief Justice Waite as their vice-president. It is expected that the income only of the fund will be distributed, and that schools which combine industrial training with mental and moral instruction will receive particular encouragement. The donor of the fund is a descendant of William Slater, to whom is largely due the establishment of cotton manufactures in this country; and he acquired a fortune by business-pursuits in Connecticut and Rhode Island.

SLAVERY AMONG THE HEBREWS. According to the Old Testament, which ascribes to man the inalienable trait of his nature, because of his being created in the image of God, which presents the brotherhood of mankind, because originating from one blood, slavery as it appears among Gentile nations is inadmissible from the very beginning. That one tribe, however, at the very beginning of the history of men, is dedicated to slavery (Gen. ix. 27), is only because of a curse effected through a special depravity. Yet the Old Testament presupposes slavery, according to which servants, like other possessions, formed a part of property (Gen. xxiv. 35, xxvi. 14; Job i. 3); and also the sale of slaves, as something which was customary in the patriarchal age. The servants of the patriarchs were of two kinds, those "born in the house" (Gen. xiv. 14), and those "bought with money" (Gen. xvii. 13). Abraham appears to have had a large number of servants. At one time he armed three hundred and eighteen young men "born in his house." The servants born in the house were, perhaps, entitled to greater privileges than the others, and were honored with the most intimate confidence. Of the masters, as may be seen in the case of Eliezer (Gen. xxiv. 1 sq.), who would have been Abraham's heir, should the latter have died without issue (Gen. xv. 2 sq.). The servants of Abraham were admitted to the same religious privileges with their master, and received the seal of the covenant (Gen. xvii. 8, 14, 24, 27). Slavery, as far as it was allowed by the Mosaic law, was regulated by laws, which, on account of their humane character, form a contrast to that degradation of human nature which was so prominent in heathenism. The laws regulating slavery may be divided into two classes,— such as relate to the Hebrew slaves, and such as relate to non-Hebrew slaves.

1. Hebrew Slaves.— The circumstances under which a Hebrew might be reduced to servitude were, (a) poverty (Lev. xxv. 39, 47), (b) the commission of theft (Exod. xxii. 3), in that case the thief could not be sold to a foreigner, Jos.: Antt., XV. 8, 27), and (c) the exercise of paternal authority (Exod. xxxi. 7 — and in that case the authority was only limited to the sale of a daughter). The servitude of a Hebrew might be terminated in three ways, (a) by the satisfaction or the remission of all claims against him, (b) by...

the recurrence of the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 40), which might arrive at any period of his servitude, and, (c) failing either of these, by expiration of six years from the time that his servitude commenced (Exod. xxi. 2; Deut. xv. 12). There can be no doubt that this last regulation applied equally to the cases of poverty and theft. The period of seven years has reference to the sabbatical principle in general, but not to the sabbatical year. We have a single instance, indeed, of the sabbatical year being celebrated by a general manumission of Hebrew slaves (Jer. xxxiv. 14). If a servant did not desire to avail himself of the opportunity of leaving his service, he was to signify his intention in a formal manner before the judge; and then the master was to take him to the door-post, and to bore his ear through with an awl, thus establishing a connection between the servant and the house in which he was to serve. A servant who had submitted to this operation remained a servant “forever” (Exod. xxi. 6). The condition of a Hebrew servant was by no means intolerable. His master was admonished to treat him, not “as a bond-servant, but as a hired servant and as a sojourner;” and again, “not to rule over him with rigor” (Lev. xix. 36, 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to “let him go away empty,” but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming the servant of a “stranger” (i.e., a non-Hebrew), the servitude could be terminated only by the arrival of the year of jubilee, or by repayment to the master of the purchase-money paid for the servant, after deducting a sum for the value of his services proportioned to the length of his servitude (Lev. xxv. 47-55). The servant might be redeemed either by himself or by one of his relations. A Hebrew woman might enter into voluntary servitude on the score of poverty; and in this case she was entitled to her freedom after six years’ service, together with the usual gratuity at leaving, just as in the case of a man (Deut. xvi. 12 sq.). Different is the case with a slave daughter whom a father sold to a Hebrew with a view either of the latter’s marrying her himself, or of his giving her to his son. Should the master be willing to fulfill the object for which he had purchased her, she remained with her master forever; if not, she was subject to the following regulations: (1) Should he not wish to marry her, he should call upon her friends to procure her release by the repayment of the purchase-money; (2) If he betrothed her to his son, he was bound to keep her as one of his own daughters; (3) If either he or his son, having married her, took a second wife, it should not be to the prejudice of the first. If neither of the three above-specified alternatives took place, the maid was entitled to immediate and gratuitous liberty (Exod. xxi. 7-11).

II. NON-HEBREW SLAVES. — The majority of non-Hebrews, whether Canaanites or Egyptians, were captured in war, and, being present in the land after the entrance of the Israelites thereunder Joshua, or such as were conquered from the other surrounding nations (Num. xxxi. 26 sq.). Besides these, many were obtained by purchase from foreign slave-dealers. That the law in general did not favor the increase of foreign slaves may be seen from the enactment in Deut. xxi. 16 sq.; and after the return from Babylon the Jews had only 7,337 slaves, or about one to six of the free population (Ex. ii. 65).

The position of the slave in regard to religious privileges was favorable. He was to be circumcised, and hence was entitled to partake of the paschal sacrifice (Exod. xii. 44), as well as of the other religious festivals (Deut. xii. 12, 18, xvi. 11, 14). He was to rest on the sabbath (Deut. v. 14); and, in case the master had no male issue, he could give him his daughter in marriage (1 Chron. ii. 35). As to the treatment of female slaves, see Deut. xxi. 10 sq. The master had no power over the life of a slave (Exod. xxi. 20). Wilful murder of a slave entailed the same punishment as in the case of a freeman (Lev. xvii. 22); but no punishment at all was imposed if the slave survived the punishment for a day or two (Exod. xxi. 20), because he is master’s “money” (Exod. xxi. 21). A minor personal injury, such as the loss of an eye or a tooth, was to be recompensed by giving the servant his liberty (Exod. xxi. 26, 27). The general treatment of slaves appears to have been gentle, occasionally too gentle, as we infer from Solomon’s advice (Prov. xxix. 19, 21). The slave was considered as entitled to justice (Job xxxi. 13-15). The Essenians entirely abolished slavery. Cf. Philo: Quod omnis produs (Mangey’s ed.), ii. 457.

The New Covenant declares all mankind equal sharers in salvation (Tit. ii. 11; 1 Tim. ii. 4); and this principle was in itself sufficient to determine the view concerning slavery (Gal. iii. 28; Col. iii. 11), that it is to be done away with as inconsistent with the New Covenant, which postulated the law of liberty, and made freedom the privilege of believers (John viii. 32; Jas. i. 25, ii. 12; Rom. viii. 23), thereby accomplishing the predictions of the Old Testament (Ps. cxxii. 3; Is. lxi. 1 sq.) and, through the proclamation of liberty by the apostles, which were obtained by purchase from foreign slave-dealers. SLAVERY IN NEW TESTAMENT. 2194 SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY.

With regard to slavery, the passage in 1 Cor. vii. 21 is of especial importance; and, whatever explanation may be given, certain it is that Paul did not intend to subvert by force the then existing condition, however adverse to the spirit of Christianity, but that first the inner freedom was to be implanted in the human heart, from which, in the course of time, the outer freedom was to proceed. It is evident from Rom. xiii. 1 sq., that a man who refused to return his runaway slave, existed, to some extent, in apostolic times, and, from the case of Onesimus, that bondmen sometimes broke away from their masters' rule. In the latter instance Paul succeeded in effecting the voluntary return of the fugitive Christian slave by imparting to him a deeper and more correct knowledge of the nature and aims of Christianity (Phil. 10-18).

Similar tendencies we find among the slaves at Corinth, where many had no doubt become converts to Christianity (1 Cor. i. 20, 26-28). The apostle, therefore, laid it down as a rule, that converts to Christianity were to continue in the station and condition of life to which the providence of God had assigned them (1 Cor. vii. 17, 20). The argument by which that rule is enforced is, that the present is a time of distress, in which it becomes prudent for the unmarried to retain their virgin state, and the slave to remain contentedly in his bondage — indicates its primary reference to the Corinthian Christians of that day; but the further considerations adduced — that the time is near — have universal force, and adapt the rule to the conditions of all Christians. It is, however, evident that the apostle does not strike at the right to liberty and personal independence in these instructions. 1 Cor. vii. 23 asserts that right most forcibly, and shows that the saving grace of the Lord involves a setting-aside of all human bondage. A denial of that right would bring him into conflict with his own claim to freedom (1 Cor. ix. 1) and with his fundamental statement, that Christian slavery must become an end (2 Cor. v. 17). The principles of Christian liberty were already then exhibited in such a manner that Christian masters, even if they were not to give freedom to their slaves, as Philemon to Onesimus, were exhorted to treat their slaves kindly and as brothers (Eph. vi. 6; Col. iv. 1; Phil. 16).

[Bishop Lightfoot says, "The gospel never directly attacks slavery as an institution; the apostles never command the liberation of slaves as an absolute duty. It is a remarkable fact that St. Paul in this Epistle (Philemon) stops short of any positive injunction. He tells him (Philemon) to do very much more than emancipate his slave, but this one thing he does not directly enjoin" (p. 389).] J. G. VAIHINGER.

SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY. Christianity and slavery seem to the present generation, with its settled opinions concerning natural rights and the teachings of the New Testament, to form the opposite poles of the moral sphere; and yet it is certain that society in antiquity was based on slavery, and that at no period of history was the slave system more completely organized than in the Roman Empire during the life of Christ in this world. It must be remembered also, that the Master never commanded that slavery as it then existed should be abolished, like other evils,— idolatry, for instance,—by the direct act of his followers; and further, that, for three hundred years after his advent, no writer among either the defenders or the enemies of Christianity ever spoke of the abolition of slavery as a consequence of the new doctrine (Bick, 126). It seems, however, equally clear that the total change which has since taken place in the opinion of the civilized world in regard to slavery has been mainly due to the gradual outgrowth of Christian doctrine, morals, and example. This inconsistency can only be explained by a view of the history of the opinion of the church on this subject.

1. Relations of Christianity towards Slavery in the Reign of Constantine. In the course of time, the outer freedom was to be implanted in the human heart, from which, in the case of Onesimus, that bondman sometimes broke away from their masters' rule. In the latter instance Paul succeeded in effecting the voluntary return of the fugitive Christian slave by imparting to him a deeper and more correct knowledge of the nature and aims of Christianity (Phil. 10-18).
might be as subjects of the Roman emperor: nevertheless, he maintained the duty of obedience on the part of the slave, and the claim of authority, and by the same means, but commanded, but obeyed, by the new doctrine. The apostle, and his followers during the first three centuries, accepted slavery as a fact, a settled condition of Roman society which they were as powerless to change, had they so desired, as to change the imperial government itself. The object, the only object which was then practicable, was to remedy moral evils under existing institutions. The apostles and fathers addressed their exhortations to the heart rather than to the intellect of the down-trodden classes. They taught meekness and humility, and consecrated for the first time in history the servile virtues. They seem to have regarded the service of God by slaves as conferring upon them, in an important sense, perfect freedom, and as placing them on a footing of equality with their masters in the new "empire." By the same law; their religion taught them that they were all brethren, sharing in the offices of the church and the administration of its charities, members of the same collegium in the old Roman sense, with equal rights as such, and, above all, with the same hope of a common reward in the life to come.

Doubtless there were many evils in Roman society, established by law or usage, which shocked the moral sense of the early Christians quite as much as slavery ought, we think, to have done; but all these evils the Christians met with submission and resignation and by their own example of good works and virtues. When the Roman law came in conflict with their Christian duties, they made no futile attempts at change by revolutionary force and violence. An illustration of their position is found in the history of the Quakers, who gained all their early strength by protesting by voice and example against the inequalities of society in the reign of Charles II.; and yet they remained loyal subjects of the king.

2. Opinions of the Christian Fathers in regard to Slavery. It cannot be doubted that the opinions of many of the Fathers on this subject were derived from the moral philosophy of the stoics of the empire. "Liberty," says Epictetus, "does not consist in the enjoyment of the things we desire, but in our having no desires." Marcus Aurelius made the question of true liberty dependent upon the mind and the will of the individual. The Fathers taught, after the example of St. Paul, that the true slavery was the slavery of sin. St. Jerome insists that there is no true freedom except in the knowledge of the truth. St. Ambrose sees above all conception of liberty a more noble servitude, in which freemen and slaves may unite, and where both may work together for the good of others. According to St. Augustine, the inferior position of woman relatively to man, as well as slavery, was introduced into the world at the same time and by the same means, — the sin of Adam. So Chrysostom thinks that the apostle did not recommend the suppression of slavery, lest men should lose an opportunity of seeing how nobly liberty of soul could be preserved in the body of the slave. And yet, with these opinions of the advantages of the existing system, the Fathers speak of the original equality of mankind, of the fraternal love which should bind all men together, of that the only true slavery, which made man a slave of sin, and not nature, had made two races of the dignity of man created in the image of God, and, above all, of the noble destiny of man, who, while he became a slave through the sin of Adam, becomes a freeman through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. (See Wallon: Histoire de l'Esclavage dans l'Antiquite, vol. iii., for full details on this point.) While Christianity did not attack what may be called the prismatic curvature in the Roman Empire, it did not content itself with preaching merely moderation to the masters, and resignation to the slaves: it favored the manumission of slaves (Const. apost., iv. q. t. I. p. 297), and strove to suppress or mitigate those features of slavery which made men forget that they were all children of the same Father, and heirs of the same promises (see Wallon, ii. 834 sq.); it sought to narrow the area of and place as much as possible the sources of supply; it redeemed captives taken in war; it purchased the freedom of debtors about to be sold into slavery; and it strove by its charity to succor those families who had been reduced to the condition of slaves by the misfortunes of their fathers (Ambrose: *De Officis Ministr.; Greg. Magnus: Dial., iii.); above all, it brought into the Roman world a principle which had been unknown there for ages — the dignity of human labor. There is no more striking difference between Roman and modern society than that caused by the different ideas prevailing at the two periods in regard to the social status of the workman. In Rome, as soon as she began to conquer the world, all labor became servile, and laborers were despised outcasts, because they were slaves. Christianity changed all this. It dignified and ennobled labor. The obligation to labor was inseparable from the law of love. The early Christians followed the example of the Master and his apostles in this respect, working and doing good at the same time and from the same motive. Work was regarded as quite as indispensable to the perfection of Christian character as prayer itself (Laborare est orare).

Under the Christian emperors, Constantine and his successors, the principle of slavery was still maintained, and no slave-code ever existed which defined more sharply the line separating freemen from slaves than that of Justinian (A.D. 529). The Christian Fathers, at the Council of Nicaea and afterwards, procured some legislation which forbade the employment of slaves as gladiators, and of women as actresses; but in practice these prohibitions were of no avail, such was the passion of the populace for theatrical spectacles. By the same influences, Constantine was moved to direct that manumissions should be thenceforth made in the church, in the presence of the bishop, rather than in that of the praeator, in order to give greater sacredness to the act. This custom was transmitted to the medieval church.

So Constantine gave the right to the parents of new-born children to sell them into slavery; and this law, which was in direct opposition to the provisions of the old Roman code, was, it is said, rendered necessary by the increasing misery of the times, and was adopted as an alternative against permitting the children to perish from neglect and starvation.

From the time of Constantine to that of Alexis Commenus (1095), there was, it is now apparent, in the Eastern Empire, a secret conflict of opinion between the Christian authorities and the imperial government concerning slavery. A strong illustration of the nature of this conflict is found in the general opinion that the marriage of a slave in the church made him ipso facto a freeman. Up to the time of Basil the Macedonian, such marriage was permitted to take place; the union of male and female slaves being still regarded as contubernium, not having the sanction of the consubrium, essential to the valid, legal marriage of the Romans. Basil (867-886) directed that the priestly benediction should hallow the marriage of slaves. This enactment met with violent opposition from the deeply rooted prejudices of centuries, and was acts inspired "by the love of God" for the benefit of the soul of the master. Still, the noble declaration of Pope Gregory the Great, towards the close of the sixteenth century, "that slaves should be freed because Christ became man in order to redeem us," does not seem to have been the guide if the church's policy during the middle age.

Larrouque (L'Esclavage chez les Nations Chrétiennes, 65-118), indeed, gives a list of fifteen councils of the church, whose decrees, he claims, were unfavorable to the freedom of the slave.

Personal slavery having disappeared in Europe in the fourteenth century, it was revived upon a gigantic scale on this continent shortly after the discovery of America. The scarcity of labor in the New World, and the necessity for it, seem to have overcome all objections to the system, whether founded upon motives of Christian duty, or upon the economic considerations, Catholic and Protestant, who had colonies in America, engaged in transporting slaves from the coast of Africa to this continent. The result was, that, according to the calculation of Sir Arthur Helps, there were carried between the years 1579 and 1807 more than five millions of human beings from Africa to America, where they and their descendants became slaves. For more than two centuries negro slavery was often evaded. Alexis Commenus renewed this enactment met with violent opposition from the church or out of it, was publicly heard against the slave-trade and its consequences. About the middle of the eighteenth century, however, two distinct movements become apparent. They are distinct; because one was based on philosophical, and the other on Christian, grounds, and because one was confined to France, and the other to England. Upon one or the other of them, modern opinion and legislation in regard to negro slavery have been based. The philosophical basis is found in that portion of the celebrated work of Rousseau, Emile, called Profession de foi d'un Vicaire Savoyard. The views there laid down made a profound impression upon all writers on theories of government during the remainder of the century, and formed the element of strength in the French Revolution. As to negro slavery, one is a being by nature good, loving justice and order. In an ideal state of society each member would be free, and the equal of every other, equal, because no person, or family, or class, would seek for any rights or privileges of which any other was deprived; and free, because each one would have his share in determining the rule common to all.

These doctrines, and the vast system which grew out of them, were, for various reasons, embraced in the utmost enthusiasm in France. People looked for the millennium as a consequence of their adoption to an age, when, according to Condorcet, "the sun shall shine only on freemen, when tyrants and slaves and priests shall survive only in history and on the stage." It is curious that the first public official document in which these opinions are clearly set forth should be our own Declaration of Independence; for it is there proclaimed that all men are "equal," and that "they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." So in France, the first article of "The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen," adopted in 1789 at the beginning of the Revolution, asserts, "Man is a being by nature good, loving justice and order. In an ideal state of society each member would be free, and the equal of every other, equal, because no person, or family, or class, would seek for any rights or privileges of which any other was deprived; and free, because each one would have his share in determining the rule common to all.

Two things are worthy of

mark concerning this decree: (1) That it was an first act by which any nation in Europe de- reed the abolition of slavery; and, (2) That the men and the nation adopting it were so far from eing Christians, that they had, only three months for a declaration of their conscience and expressed it to the goddess of reason in the Cathedral of Notre dame at Paris.

By the side of these attacks of the French philoso- phers on slavery as a violation of natural lights, there began a movement about the same me, chiefly in England and in this country, hav- ing the same object in view, but founded wholly on convictions of Christian duty. Conscience as here substituted for mere sentiment, as the impulse to action; and the result was that earnest, resolute, and personal work which is prompted by deep, conscientious conviction of duty. The Christian slave-trade was made at first the main want of attack by the abolitionists. In 1772 ravelin Sharp urged its suppression on religious princi- ples. Just before the Revolutions, Virginia ordi- nated that no more African slaves should be brought into the Colony; a few years later, Clarkson, man of deeply religious nature, gave up his life to efforts to convince his countrymen that they should prohibit the slave-trade by law, violating every principle of Christian humanity. The only religious denomination which as a body took an active part in the work was the Quakers, who presented to the House of Com- mons a petition for the abolition of the slave-trade in 1784. By incessant work, and constant inau- guration of the subject in the press and at public meetings, the little band of abolitionists gained a support of many prominent public men in Eng- land, Wilberforce, Pitt, Fox, and Burke among the rest. Such was the feeling roused by the dis- sension of the subject, and especially the general no- tion that the violation of Christian duty in retaining the traffic, that, forced at last by the pressure of the public conscience, Parliament abol- ished the slave-trade in 1807. This movement in England may be considered as directed wholly by the popular sentiment.

In the United States the foreign slave-trade was prohibited in 1808 by virtue of a power conferred by Congress on the Constitution. Shortly after- wards, all the maritime nations of Europe followed an example of England and of this country; and work was fittingly crowned by the declara- tion of the European Congress of Vienna in 1815, pating all the powers to discourage the traffic, one reprobated by the law of religion and of covenants, thus recognizing the two forces, religion and philosophy, which had combined to bring about the result.

In this country the testimony of the Quakers, as religious body, against slavery has been uniform from the beginning. In 1688 the German Friend- ship to the abolitionists, now a part of Philadel- phia, disowned any nation by 1787 and 1836; viz., in 1787; in 1798, reaffirming its action in 1787; in 1795, by expressing "the deepest con- cern that any vestiges of slavery remained in the country;" in 1815, and again in 1818, denouncing slavery "as utterly inconsistent with the law of God." In 1845 and in 1849 the General Assembly (Old School) in its action, without avowing any change of opinion as to the sinfulness of slavery, dwelt more particularly upon the formidable ob- stacles to the practical work of emancipation. In 1854, during the Rebellion, that body being no longer hampered by complications of this kind, proclaimed openly "the evil and guilt of slavery," and its earnest desire for its extirpation.

The Methodist-Episcopal Church has been opposed to slavery from the beginning. At the organization of the General Conference in 1784, a general rule of its discipline was adopted, declaring slavery contrary to the golden law of God and the inalienable rights of mankind, and direc- ting that preachers holding slaves should be expelled. Still, the rule was often evaded, and not executed, out of regard for the position of the Southern members of the denomination. After 1808 slaveholding among the private members of the society was not made a subject of discipline, notwithstanding that the old rule affirming slavery to be a great evil, and that slaveholding should be a bar to office in the church, was still unre- pealed.

The aggressive antislavery sentiment at the North was always very powerful among the Method- oists; and in the General Conference of 1844 it was strong enough to effect the passage of a resolu- tion by which Bishop Andrew, who had come into the possession of certain slaves in right of his wife, was required to submit to the action of all episcopal functions until the slaves were freed. This led to the disruption of the confer- ence, and the formation of two Methodist-Episco- pal churches in this country,—one at the North, and the other at the South.

It must be remembered that there were, before the war, in the Northern States, vast multitudes of Christians of thoroughly antislavery sentiments who took no active part in the abolition move- ment, because they were restrained by conscien- tious convictions as to their duties as citizens; but when slavery was made the pretext of rebellion, and war against the government, and an attempt was made to found an empire on the corner-stone of which was slavery, and especially when the Na- tional Government had decreed the emancipation of the slaves, every motive for its further tolera- tion was removed.

SMELIAN (originally PHILIPPSOHN), Johannes, b. at Sleidan, near Aix-la-Chapelle, 1506; d. at Strassburg, Oct. 31, 1556. He studied ancient languages and literatures at Liege and Cologne, and afterwards jurisprudence and history in Paris; embraced the Reformation; settled at Strassburg, and was much used by the Protestant princes of Germany in diplomatic missions to England, the Council of Trent, etc. His celebrated work on the history of the Reformation in Germany (De statu religionis et reipublicae Carolo Quinto Carolo, Strassburg, 1553-56) he wrote at the instance of the leaders of the Schmalcaldian League. It was translated into German, Dutch, Italian, English (with his life, London, 1899), and Swedish, and appeared in eight editions before 1780. His De quatuor summis imperiis libri tres (1557) was very much read. On the Roman-Catholic side, Fontaine, Gennep, Surius, and Maumburg wrote against him. SMALLEY, John, D.D., b. in Columbia, Conn., June 4, 1734; d. in New Britain, Conn., June 1, 1820, within three days of being eighty-six years old. He was prepared for Yale College by his pastor, Eleazer Wheelock, afterward president of Dartmouth; was befriended while at Yale by Ezra Stiles, afterward president of the college; was graduated in 1756. He was thought by Dr. Wheelock to have been converted in early childhood. At the age of six years he had been deeply affected by the preaching of Whitefield. In college, however, he began to doubt the genuineness of his conversion, became painfully despondent, and at length accepted his actual, and sometimes his second, conversion, to the reading of Edwards on the Will. This was one of the facts which led him through life to oppose all religious excitements which did not spring from the influence of religious doctrine. It led him to become a leader in the contest against the fanaticism of the Separatists, against the Half-way Covenant,—a leader in defence of the New-England theology.

Having pursued his theological studies with Dr. Joseph Bellamy, he was ordained April 19, 1758, over the Congregational Church in New Britain, Conn. He remained in this pastorate more than fifty-five years—without a colleague, more than fifty-one years. In the pulpit he fixed his eyes on his manuscript, read it with a harsh and length aset of Dr. Smalley, and was accustomed to read in the pulpit a printed sermon of Smalley, and to read it with such impressive elocution that the reports of its influence are well-nigh fabulous. Two of Smalley's pupils were Nathanael Emmons of Franklin, and Ebenezer Porter, who, as a professor at Andover, exerted a formative influence on the seminar. Two other theological pupils of Smalley turned their attention afterward from the ministerial to the legal profession. One of these was Oliver Ellsworth, who became chief justice of the United States: the other was Jeremiah Mason, to whom Daniel Webster ascribed much of his own success at the bar. The pupils of Smalley were charged with his wit, but often awed by the severity of his criticisms. He studied fourteen hours a day, yet made no parade of learning. He was confident in his opinions, and impatient of contradiction, but was venerated for his profound and simple-hearted piety.

Four of his sermons had an epochal influence. Two of the four were on Natural and Moral Inability, published in 1769, republished in England. Two were entitled Justification through Christ an Act of Free Grace, and None but Believers saved through the All-Sufficient Satisfaction of Christ, 1786, 1787, repeatedly republished. In addition to other sermons in separate pamphlets, Dr. Smalley published in 1803 a volume of Discourses, and in 1814, when he was eighty years old, a second volume. EDWARDS A. PARK.

SMARACDUS, abbot of the monastery of St. Michael, situated on the Meuse, in the diocese of Verdun, was one of the most learned theologians of the Carolingian age, and held in great esteem both by Charlemagne and Lewis the Pious. His writings, however, consisting of commentaries on the New Testament, on the rules of St. Benedict, etc., are mere compilations, altogether without originality. They are found in Migne: Patro. Lat., vol. 102. — Another Smaragdus, whose true name was Ardo, was a friend of Benedict of Aniane, and wrote his life. See Act. Sanct., and MONE: Patr. Lat., vol. 103. ZUCKLER.

SMART, sometimes or Dr. Samuel Smart, 1722; d. in the King's Bench prison, 1771, fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge, 1745; followed literature in London, and led a disorderly and dissipated life, which did not quench his religious feeling. Among his works are The Parables of Christ done into Verse, 1765; On the Divine Attributes; and A Translation of the Psalms of David attempted in the Spirit of Christianity, with Hymns for the Fasts and Festivals, 4to, 1766. These are piously intended, and curious, but met with no success. More memorable is his Song to David, written on the wall of a madhouse, or, according to the old tradition, indented with a key on the wainscot, he being debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper. F. SMECTYMNUUS, a word made up of the initials of S(tephen) I(hamy), T(homas) Y(oung), M(athew) N(evcomen), and W(illiam) S(parow), who composed in common a treatise in reply to Bishop Joseph Hall's Humble remonstrance to the high court of Parliament, London, 1040, under the title, An answer to a booke entitled "An humble remonstrance, in which the original of liturgy and episcopacy is discussed, 1641 (104 pp. 4to); and later in the same year, A vindication of the answer to the Humbe remonstrance from the unjust imputations of friolousness and falsehood: wherein the cause of liturgy and episcopacy is further debated. The debate was upon these two heads: (1) of the antiquity of liturgies, or forms of prayer; (2) of the apostolical institution of diocesan episcopacy. See Ux: Hist. Puritans, vol. SMITH, Eli, a distinguished American missionary, and translator of the Bible into Arabic; was b. at Northford, Conn., Sept. 15, 1801; d. at Beyrout, Syria, Jan. 11, 1857. He graduated at Yale College, 1821, and at Andover Seminary in 1823; and in May of the same year embarked as a missionary of the American Board to Malta. In 1827 he went to Beyrout, and in March, 1830, undertook with Mr. Dwight, under directions from the American Board, a journey through Persia, to get information concerning the Nestorian Christians. The expedition, which lasted a year, and during which the travellers visited the grave of Henry Martyn at Tocat, resulted in the establishment of a mission among that people. Smith published an account of the journey, in Missionary Researches, of the Rev. Eli Smith and H. G. Dwight, etc. (Boston, 1833, 2 vols., London, 1834). In 1839 Dr. Smith accompanied Dr. Edward Robinson on a journey from Suez through the Sinaitic peninsula and up the Jordan. He accompanied the same scholar on his journey in 1852, and contributed materially to the accuracy and discoveries of Robinson's Researches. In 1840 he began his translation of the Bible into Arabic, having the assistance of Butrus el-Biastany and Nasif el-Yasijee. By August, 1853, he had completed the translation of the four Gospels. Before his death he succeeded in translating the entire New Testament, and the Pentateuch, historical books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other portions of the Old Testament. His labors have been supplemented by the scholarship of Dr. Van Dyke. Dr. Smith possessed eminent attainments in Arabic, and will always have a distinguished place in the annals of the American mission at Beyrout. For a good account of his life, see Missionary Herald, 1857, pp. 224-229.

SMITH, George, b. in England about 1825; d. at Aleppo, Aug. 19, 1876. He began life as bank-note, copper and steel plate engraver; taught himself the Oriental languages, and first came into prominence in 1866 by a contribution to The London Athenæum, upon the Tribune of Jehu, which revealed his studies, assiduously carried on at leisure moments, of the Ninevite sculptures in the British Museum. In 1867 he was appointed a senior assistant of the Lower Section in the department of Egyptian and Oriental Antiquities in the British Museum, and from thence on stood in the first rank of Assyrian scholars. He returned home in the summer of 1840, and was at once licensed to preach the gospel. But his health again gave way, delaying his settlement until the close of 1842, when he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church at West Amesbury, Mass. Here he labored four years with zeal and success, supplying also during two winters the chair of Hebrew at Andover. In 1847 he became professor of mental and moral philosophy in Amherst College. In 1850 he accepted a call to the chair of church history in the Union Theological Seminary of New-York City. Three years later he was transferred to the chair of systematic theology. In both departments he wrought with the hand of a master, and, alike by his teaching and his writings, won a commanding position as one of the foremost scholars and divines of the country. His influence was soon felt throughout the Presbyterian Church, and was especially powerful in shaping opinion in the New School branch of it to which he belonged. He wrote a good deal for the editorial columns of The New-York Evangelist, on religious and ecclesiastical topics of the day; while in The American Theological Review, in The American Presbyterian and Theological Review, and, later, in The Presbyterian Quarterly and Princeton Review, he discussed the leading philosophical and theological questions of the age. Of the first-named review he was the sole editor, and of the other two he was joint editor. He contributed articles on Schelling, Hegel, Calvin, Pantheism, the Reformed Churches, and other subjects, to Appleton's Cyclopædia. In 1859 he published Tables of Church History, a work embodying the results of vast labor. In 1863 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly at Philadelphia, and the next year, at Dayton, preached a sermon before that body. He contributed to Union and Ecclesiastical Review, which he much to bring together again the two severed branches of the Presbyterian Church. He took a leading part in the memorable Union Convention at Philadelphia in 1887. During the war he wrote very ably in support of the national cause. In 1880 he revisited Europe, also in 1886, and again in 1889. The latter visit, which was caused by overwork and the breaking-down of his system, lasted a year and a half, and included a journey...

to the East. After his return he resumed his labors in the seminary, but with health so greatly enfeebled, that early in 1874 he resigned his chair, and was made professor emeritus. After long struggles with disease, and severe suffering, he entered into rest.

Whether regarded as a theologian, as a philosophical thinker, or as a general scholar and critic, Dr. Smith was one of the most gifted and accomplished men of his time. Such was the opinion of him often expressed by those best qualified to judge, both at home and abroad. Unfortunately, with the exception of his invaluable History of the Church of Christ, in Chronological Tables, his writings consist chiefly of occasional discourses, essays, and reviews. But, although occasional, they discuss many of the most important and vital questions of the age; and they do it with such exhaustive power, that in several instances the discourse or essay might readily be enlarged into a book, with no other change than that of greater fulness of statement and illustration. His address at Andover in 1849, on The Relations of Faith and Philosophy, may serve as an example. The strong points are so vividly presented, the principles involved are set forth with such distinctness, the discussion is so luminous and complete, that a whole treatise on the subject could hardly add to the force of the argument. This address was greatly admired, and at once attracted to its author general attention. It was reprinted in Edinburgh, and elicited the highest praise from such men as Sir William Hamilton and Rev. Dr. John Brown. Referring to this address, and to the inaugural discourse on Church History, Mr. Bancroft, the eminent historian, wrote to Dr. Smith, "I know no one in the country but yourself who could have written them." It is not too much to say that the United States has produced no theologian who combined in a higher degree than Dr. Smith great learning, the best literary and philosophical culture, wise, discriminating and absolute devotion to Christ and his kingdom. It is deeply to be regretted that he was not spared to give to the public his theologi

"Christianity is not only an historic revelation and an internal experience, but also an organic, diffusive, plastic, and triumphant force in human history; and in this history, as in the revelation and as in the experience, the centre around which all revolves is the person of Jesus Christ." Professor Smith was specially gifted as a theological teacher, arousing enthusiasm in his students, inspiring them with reverence for the Holy Scriptures, fostering in them a devout, earnest, catholic spirit, dealing gently and wisely with their doubts; and impressing upon them continually, alike by example and instruction, the sovereign claims of their Redeemer, the glory of his kingdom, and the blessedness of a life consecrated to him. His services to the Union Theological Seminary were varied and inestimable. The Presbyterian Church in the United States also owes him a lasting debt of gratitude. He has been called "the hero of re-union," and certainly no man better merited the praise. His influence as a teacher of divine truth was equally wide and strong, and, wherever felt, it was an ennobling and irenic influence, tending to exalt the faith once delivered to the saints, and to draw closer together all sincere disciples of Jesus. Nor did his influence cease with his death. His name continues to be spoken with love and reverence; his opinions are still full of vital force; and all schools of Christian thought appeal to him as to a master in Israel. A very full and admirable account of him will be found in Henry Boynton Smith; his Life and Work, edited by his wife, New York, 1881. See also Faith and Philosophy, Discourses and Essays by Henry B. Smith, edited by Dr. Prentiss, New York, 1877; Apologetics, a Course of Lectures, 1882; Introduction to Christian Systematic Theology, 1883; Special Introduction, (II.) SMITH, John, the Cambridge Platonist; b. at Achurch, near Oundle, in Northamptonshire, 1618; entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, April, 1638; chosen fellow of Queen's, 1644; d. there Aug. 7, 1652. His fame rests upon his posthumous Select Discourses (London, 1650, 4th ed., Cambridge, 1859), which "show an uncommon reach of understanding, and penetration, as well as an immense treasure of learning in their author." See his biography in the Discourses; John Tulloch: Rational Theology, vol. ii.; art. PLATONISTS (CAMBRIDGE).

SMITH, John Cotton, D.D., Protestant-Episcopal; b. at Andover, Mass. Aug. 4, 1826; d. at New-York City, May 18, 1882. He was a descendant of John Cotton and Cotton Mather, and a grandson of Dr. Leonard Woods; graduated at Bowdoin College in 1847; was from 1850 to 1852 rector of St. John's Church, Bangor, Me.; from 1852 to 1859, assistant minister in Trinity Church, Boston; and from 1860 till his death, rector of the Church of the Ascension, New-York City. He was an able scholar, an eloquent preacher, a most influential leader of thought in his church, and one of the originators of the "Church Congress;" while in his public relations he was a large-hearted philanthropist, ready to do all in his power for the general good; prominently connected with the Bible Society, the Evangelical Alliance, the Board of Missions, and particularly interested in tenement-house reform. He edited Church and State, and also various leading periodicals of the press, and published Miscellanea, Old and New (New York, 1876), and Brier Hill Lectures on Present Aspects of the Church, New York, 1881. By his writings, sermons, and addresses, and by the attractive influence of his personal character, he did more, perhaps, than any one person of his time to develop a generous spirit of toleration between various schools of thought, and that state of harmony which now prevails in the Episcopal Church.

SMITH, John Pye, D.D., LL.D., b. at Sheffield, May 26, 1774; d. at Guildford, Surrey (London), Feb. 5, 1851; an English Congregational divine and author; studied theology at Rotherham College, under Rev. Dr. Edward Williams; was professor of theology at Homerton College from 1805 to 1850. A man of unusual learning, and of most admirable Christian spirit. He was one of the earliest among dissenters to recognize the value of the contributions to theology made by German scholars, and to essay a reconciliation between modern science and divine revelation, bringing on himself thereby no small suspicion on the part of less enlightened brethren. His Scripture Testimony to the Messiah (London, 1818-21, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1868) is an elaborate exegetical study of all the passages of Scripture referring to Christ. In Four Discourses on the Sacrifice and Priesthood of Jesus Christ (London, 1828, 5th ed., Edinb., 1868) he defends the Evangelical against the Socinian doctrine. Scripture and Geology (London, 1839, 5th ed., 1854) was the Congregational Lecture for 1839. His First Lines of Christian Theology was published after his death (1854, 2d ed., 1860), and contains his lectures to his classes, in syllabus form. See J. SMITH, Samuel Stanhope, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian; b. at Pequea, Penn., March 16, 1750; d. at Princeton, N.J., Aug. 21, 1819. He was graduated from Princeton College, 1767; tutor there, 1770-73; first president of Hampden Sidney College, 1775; professor of moral philosophy, 1779; and president, 1784-1812. In 1758 he was a member of the committee which drew up the Form of Government of the Presbyterian Church. He had a high reputation as a pulpit orator and a college president. He published Sermons, New-ark, N.J., 1799; Evidences of Christian Religion, Phila., 1809; Moral and Political Philosophy, Trenton, N.J., 1812; Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, New Brunswick, N.J., 1815 (posthumous) Sermons, with Memoirs, Philadelphia, 1821, 2 vols. SMITH, William Andrew, D.D., a leading minister of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. at Fredericksburg, Va., Nov. 29, 1802; d. at Richmond, Va., March 1, 1870. His parents dying when he was quite young, he was kindly cared for and brought up in the family of Mr. Hill, a worthy merchant of Petersburgh, Va. He professed religion at seventeen years of age, prepared for the ministry, and was admitted into the Virginia Conference in 1825. He rose rapidly to eminence in the conference. In 1838 he was appointed agent for Randolph-Macon College, then in its infancy. In September of that year, by a painful accident, he was made a cripple for life. He continued to fill many of the most important stations in his conference until 1846, when he was called to the presidency of Randolph-Macon College, and while here he raised, largely by his own personal efforts, an endowment of one hundred thousand dollars. This position, as well as that of professor of mental and moral philosophy, he filled with great acceptability and efficiency until 1868, when he moved to St. Louis, Mo. After serving here as pastor of Centenary Church for two years, he became president of Central College, located at Fayette in that State, and raised for the institution at once, by his personal exertion, about a hundred thousand dollars. About this time he became the victim of a fatal malady, which two years later, while on a visit to Richmond, Va., terminated in his death. He was a member of every general conference from 1832 till his death. At the eventful general conference of 1844 he took a specially prominent part; and in the celebrated appeal of Rev. Francis A. Harding, and in the extra-judicial trial of Bishop James O. Andrew, he won a national reputation for deliberate and forensic eloquence and for rare powers of argument and debate. From that time he became one of the foremost men in Southern Methodism. He was a hard student and an earnest thinker. His sermons were clear, forcible, and instructive, being able discussions of the cardinal doctrines of the gospel. He was more of a logician than of an orator, yet his logic was not cold and dry, but steeped in emotion, and aglow with zeal. His ministry was blessed with powerful revivals. He was always bold to avow and defend his sentiments, regardless of consequences. The vigor and clearness of his intellect, his calmness, discernment, energy, and unquestioned ability, caused him to stand in the front rank of the leading minds in the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. (See biographical sketch by Bishop J. C. Granbery, in the General Minutes for 1870.) His Philosophy and Practice of Slavery (Nashville, 1857) attracted wide attention, and was universally recognized as one of the ablest presentations of the Southern side of the slavery question ever published. SMYR'NA, situated on the Hermann Gulf on the coast of Lydia, became very prosperous after the time of Alexander the Great, and was, during the first two centuries of the Christian era, one of the principal commercial centres of the world, and the richest and most beautiful city of Asia Minor. It contained a Jewish and a Christian congregation, and the latter had occasion to prove its faith under persecutions instituted by the former (Rev. i. 11, ii. 8). Its venerable bishop, Polycarp, suffered martyrdom under Marcus Aurelius in 169. The city was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake in 178. It has now a mixed population of about 180,000.

SMYTH, John, founder of the General Baptists; date of birth unknown; d. in Holland in 1612. Like many of the separatists he was a churches of the General-Baptist type are found in the counties of England, and had grown so extensive by the time of John Smyth (q.v.), Thomas Helwys, and some of his comrades, as they were one of the most numerous, as they were one of the eighteenth century one of feeble convictions and stagnant vitality, and not metropolitan. (4) But chiefly they fell to the Quakers. (2) Men of culture and ability were rare in the ministry. An educated pastorate was not fixed to any one building, but as occasion required; (2) "messengers," or pastors of churches; (4) "deacons," or helps in government. The churches were not fixed to any one building, but consisted of members scattered over wide areas, meeting in several buildings, and sometimes having two or three "elders." They were closely akin to the early Friends, or Quakers.

III. Their organization embraced, (1) "assemblies," for the transaction of business common to the welfare of all the churches, not annual at first, but as occasion required; (2) "messengers," or "apostles," who visited the churches to "stir them up," and were also sent out to preach, not only in different parts of England, but also to Ireland, and even to Virginia and South Carolina (MSS. Proceedings of General Baptist Assembly, vol. ii. 32); (3) "elders," or pastors of churches; (4) "deacons," or helps in government. The churches were not fixed to any one building, but consisted of members scattered over wide areas, meeting in several buildings, and sometimes having two or three "elders." The discipline was most rigid, and extended to speech and dress. In this and other matters they were closely akin to the early Friends, or Quakers.

IV. Growth.—The General Baptists spread rapidly in the first quarter of a century of their existence. In 1645 there were forty churches in London. During the Commonwealth they were planted in most of the midland and southern counties of England, and had grown so extensive that Thomas Grantham (1634-92), author of Christianityus Primitivus (published 1678, London), describes a petition presented to Charles II. in 1662, as representing 20,000 General Baptists. Increased to 30,000 in 1692, they must have been one of the most numerous, as they were one of the most vigorous, of the English religious bodies.

V. Decay.—Several causes contributed to the rapid decline which followed. The new church was a man of incorruptible sincerity, beauty, humility, glowing charity, a fair scholar, and a good preacher. Smyth wrote Principles and Inferences concerning the Visible Church (Amsterdam, 1607), Parallelces, Censures, Observations (1609), Character of the Beast (1609), Differences of the Churches of the Separation, Amsterdam.

that difference of opinion concerning the Trinity and the person of Christ should be allowed.

VI. The New Connection.—For the next forty years Ariusianism was quietly gaining sway, when in 1770 the New Connection of General Baptists was formed in Whitechapel, London, out of (1) ten churches, containing 659 members, belonging to the assembly, and located in the south; (2) five churches, embracing 870 members, in Leicestershire, Derbyshire, and Warwickshire, that had formed themselves on the General Baptist type solely by the study of the Scriptures; and (3) a community of 69 members, which arose in a similar fashion in Yorkshire under the Methodist Dan Taylor (q.v.), who forthwith became the leader of the New Connection. The object of this new federation was "to revive experimental religion or primitive Christianity in faith and practice;" and the basis of agreement added to the principles above named (§ II.) the declaration that "our Lord Jesus is God and man united in one person, or possessed of divine perfection united to human nature in a way which we pretend not to explain, but think ourselves bound by the word of God firmly to believe." The 1,600 members were 3,176 in 1795, 7,673 in 1820, 17,913 in 1845, 21,066 in 1870, and 26,621 in 1883. A college (now at Nottingham, Rev. Thomas Goady, B.A., principal) was started in 1797 by Dan Taylor. It has two scholarships (value, £30 each), a large library, thirteen students, an income of £800 per annum, and is affiliated for classical and scientific tuition with the Nottingham University. Home-mission work was started in 1811, and last year received over £2,000. Missions to Orissa, India, sprang in 1819 from the impact of the earnest spirit of the Rev. J. G. Piko (1794-1854), author of "Persuasions to Early Piety, etc.," and were greatly promoted by Francis Sutton, D.D. (1802-54), author of the hymn "Hail, sweetest, dearest tie that binds," and originator of the missions of the Freewill Baptists of America to Northern Oriissa, and of the Baptist mission to the Telugus. The society also works in Rome, Italy. Income, £8,000 per annum. The Building Fund, established in 1865, has a capital of £8,000. Four thousand members are in sympathy with it of the Baptist mission to the Telugus. The magazine, started in 1798, has a circulation (Rev. John Cliffor.d, M.A., D.D., editor). There are 181 churches in England, with 25,431 members, and 148 ministers; in Oriissa, 9 churches, 16 mission-stations, 16 missionaries, 22 native ministers, 5 ministerial students, 1,175 church-members, and a native Christian community of 3,064; in Rome there is one church of 18 members, two mission-rooms, a missionary, and an evangelist.

VII. In the original body an unaggressive Ariusianism has gradually gained the ascendant; and for more than a century there has been a steady decline in numbers, interest, and power. Some of the churches have joined the new body; others have united with the Piedobaptists; but more have become defunct. In 1801 they were reduced to thirty-five churches and 1,900 members: in 1859 there was not a single church containing 400 members; and the only two churches that are thriving have pastors from the New Connection, who have been accepted without any surrender of belief.

VIII. Present Numbers.—In England, 25,431; Oriissa, 1,175; Rome, 18; in America, Free-will (date from 1770), 78,000; Church of God (1830), 30,000; Free Christian Baptists of New Brunswick, and Free Baptists of Nova Scotia, 11,000; General Baptists (1824), 10,000; Separate, 7,000; the Original Freewill or General Baptists of North Carolina, 10,000; Cumberland Free Baptists, 1,000; the Goldsborough Baptists, 4,000. Total, over 183,000.

SNETHEN, Nicholas, Methodist-Protestant; born, at Fresh Pond (Glen Cove), Long Island, N.Y., Nov. 15, 1769; d. at Princeton, Ind., May 30, 1845. From 1794 until 1800 he was a minister of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; but in 1830 he joined in the organization of the Methodist-Protestant Church, and took thenceforth a prominent position in it. He preached in all parts of the country, and was much admired for his eloquence. He published "Reply to O'Kelly's Apology," 1800; "Lectures on preaching the Gospel," 1822; "Sermons" (posthumous edition, W. G. SNETHEN), 1846. See ALLBONE, S. V., Drake, S. V.

SOCIALISM. This word, of modern origin, does not explain itself fully. By its connection with social, socialize, it ought to denote a doctrine or system which aims to make men social, or, more exactly, to bring about the ends involved in the social nature of man; or, if we give prominence to the supposed abuses of society, the system of equity and equality by which the abuses which are found in society, especially in old, established societies, may be removed. Giving to it some such definition, we find it to be a broader term than communism, which, by rules freely adopted, or by public force, aims at a common life on principles of equality, as far as their application is possible amid the natural differences of human beings. But communist experiments, although numerous if we glean them carefully out of the history of mankind, are all on the small scale, and, for the most part, are tried for particular purposes, such as for the pursuit of a religious life; or they are merely philosophical speculations, which seldom are put into practice. They are temporary, like the early Christian community at Jerusalem, where the exceptional poverty of many believers led to an equality of goods; or they are sanctioned by political communities, owing to a pervading opinion of their religious character, or for some other use, like monastic brotherhoods; or, whatever be the principle of their unions, they need the consent of the government and society to their existence, and thus depend on the general will of the great community around them, as well as on the permanent will of a succession of members, to keep up the same forms of common life. Thus, unless the society which surrounds them, although constructed on wholly different principles, defends and protects them, they will dwindle away, or will die and be replaced. Where they have been tolerably successful, their success seems to be partly due to an abridgment of the rights of the families of which they are composed, and to a mode of life, which, if adopted by all, would be far from promoting the ends of human brotherhood.

Communism, then, is no cure, on any theory, for the evils or corruptions of society. If it had a cure within itself, it could be of little avail, as much as it withdraws its healing influences from society, and yet depends on society for protection. All separate communities, therefore, contain an anti-social principle. They are in spirit unlike families, and to a certain extent there is an opposition between their feeling and that of families. The family is so small a society, that it is obliged to look for the supply of every necessity to the outside world, and feels the protection of society in all things and continually. "The union of family life and communal life," as we have elsewhere remarked, "is not fitted to make the community system flourish. The two are different, and, to an extent, hostile principles. The family must draw off the interests of its members from the larger or communist body which encloses it, and concentrate them on itself." "The family implies a sort of privacy and seclusion from the world, without separation: the community implies separation from the world, and a new unity, inconsistent with, or controlling, the family union." Plato, in his republic, would not let the citizens of the warrior class know who their own children were, because they would thus have separate and personal interests. The communististic spirit, as distinguished from the socialistic, is indifferent to the good of the family, or hostile to it, and makes use of the power of society for its own protection, without doing any thing for society in return. If a whole nation were divided up into communities, the national strength and the family tie both would be weakened. A state so constituted would resemble, in important respects, one consisting of small brotherhoods, or gentes, or septs, but with much less of the family tie than is found in the latter when general society is as yet undeveloped.

We now come to consider the essence and genius of socialism: and here at the outset we labor under a serious difficulty; it has never been tried, and remains as yet a theory. Communist systems have been tried, and one system learns from the failures and follies of an earlier system, without doing any great harm to society and the state; or it may remain untried, a beautiful vision, serving to show the distance of society at present from the perfect idea of a commonwealth. But a socialist theory cannot be put to the test without becoming part of the public law, or, rather, without having a power given to a government, by which the state exercises control over labor and capital, and over every thing into which they enter. And, in order to do this, the existing capital must be prevented from doing what it does now: hence as capital, through the rights of testament and inheritance, now presents a firm front to sweeping changes of laws, and has continued to do this for ages, there must be a sudden or a gradual crippling of these rights, and a destruction of capital on a scale such as the world has never seen. No conquest of civilized lands by barbarians ever did so much for society. The coal industry, its landowners, its manufacturers, its capital in general, to such an extent as such a system of reform. A revolution in industry, in property, in ownership, more thorough than has ever been known, must be the preface of this new social system; and the principles on which the revolution would be begun would prevent the system of free competition, free remuneration and choice of work, free use of capital, from appearing again, except by a similar revolution long afterwards, begun on the ruins of a vast social experiment. It is evident, that, in order to bring about such a revolution in the relations of capital to labor, the government itself must be invested with new power, such as no constitutional government has ever had, and no people has ever favored. The necessity of absolutism in the spirit of the revolution is acknowledged by socialists to be indispensable, as a means of overthrowing the existing relations of capital to labor. And, indeed, the necessity is too apparent to be doubted. If the state itself is to take the office of being sole capitalist, all other proprietors must be sooner or later "expatriated." If it is to be the sole producer, through its capital invested in machinery and land, it can have, of course, no competitor. If, for instance, it decides what kinds of stuffs for wear shall be made, of course no others from abroad can be imported and sold in the land. It must determine the quality and quantity of things made. It must own the manufactories, it must put an end to all money-lending by private persons. Its power is shown to be tremendous by the single consideration that it must be authorized to remove laborers en masse from place to place, and to decide practically what objects shall be made in all the employments of life. The experiment of modern times which comes nearest to socialism is that initiated by Louis Blanc, who has recently died, after winning distinction by his historical writings, and who was so prominent in his party at the downfall of Louis Philippe, in 1848, as to be chosen a member of the Provisional Government in France. He had, however, but a brief opportunity to put his plan of organizing labor into practice. Being compromised in the disturbances of May, 1848, he fled to England, where he lived many years. His social starting-point is not a new one.

"It is not the man who is responsible for his wrong-doings, but society; and hence a society which is strong, and settled in a good manner, will make the individual good. The evils of slavery flow from inequality, and that from property. Property, then (i.e., personal or family property), is the root sacre of society: it is the veritable public crime. "Government should be the supreme regulator of production, and be invested with power enough to accomplish its task. It should be appropriated without payment of interest, for the creation of social workshops (ateliers) in the most important branches of national industry. In these workshops there should be the same wages for all. They should form a solidarity among themselves, and thus, when united with agricultural labor, would consolidate in one the whole industry of the country necessary for this organization of labor could be in part derived from lapsed collateral inheritances. The effect of thus aiding the ateliers would obviously be to render it impossible for small undertakers to compete with the national workshops. Thus concurrence would cease, and private work would yield to the public, or socialistic system. On the system of Louis Blanc it was so far put to the test that public ateliers were opened; and in Paris a hundred and fifty thousand workmen were employed in them at a daily expense of fifty thousand dollars. Nor was it near, if the system should continue. The workmen proved to be a dangerous element in the population. The emeute of May and that of June, in which many of the workmen in these national ateliers took part, furnished a pretext for putting an end to the experiment."—See COMMUNISM AND SOCIALISM, pp. 123, 124, by the writer of this article.

The importance of what Louis Blanc projected lay, not in the novelty of his suggestions, but in his bringing the minds of men to a practical point, where the transformation of society could begin without any preparatory overturning. It was also instructive in showing what could be easily foretold,—that the difficulties of a transition from a condition of individual property and free acquisition to the abolition of individual property is no easy one. In fact, a change like this could not be accomplished without a struggle of classes and interests such as has seldom, if ever, been known in the world; and, if it should succeed in a single country, every contiguous country, every civilized country, would feel the necessity of resisting it to preserve its own prosperity, its commerce, its safety against the strife of classes, its good hopes for the future. Yet the danger in a number of European states from socialistic doctrines was soon shown to be serious. A class of society, which was now called the proletariat, or the laboring-class, began to take an attitude of hostility to the bourgeoisie, or class of employers, in many parts of Europe, and a division of society began to arise which had been unknown in such a scale and in such favorable circumstances before. One peculiarity of the new movement was that the modern science of political economy had come to be propagated among the operatives of the towns; another was the free movement of opinions from one country to another; a third, the increasing decay of religious faith and the spread of free thinking; another still, the immunity with which demagogues could spread revolutionary opinions through the lower strata of society, and, again, the greater ease of co-operation, not only among the laborers of the same crafts in the same centres of industry, but also among workingmen of all civilized lands. These causes, appearing not suddenly, but by slow degrees, together with the increased communication between different lands, with the growth of individual liberty, and, above all, with the progress of education, seemed to be leading society into new breakers on a great scale, and to be bringing on an antagonism between governments and large masses of their subjects.

Before the February revolution in 1848, there had been workingmen's associations in several countries of Europe, and some very able leaders began their career before that period, such as, among the Germans, Marx (recently dead), Engels, and Liebknecht; but the International Workingmen's Association was not formed until 1864. Long before this, Marx aided in a manifesto of the Communist party, which called on the proletariat of all lands to unite. "It demanded the abolition of private property in the soil, the centralization of credit in a state bank, union of the means of transport and circulation in the hands of the state, national workshops, fertilizing and tilling the land on a common prescribed plan, and gratuitous instruction." The plan of the General Association contemplated an annual congress of deputies, consisting of one from each branch association, section, or group, or of two when the members of the primaries amounted to more than five hundred. A general council of fifty was to meet at London, and every subordinate union, also, was to have a committees or council. The union spread through nearly all the countries of Europe, except in the German lands and in Austria, where the Workingmen's Union, founded by Lassalle, had preoccupied the field.

Our limits forbid us to speak of the proceedings of this union at any length. At the congress of Basel, in 1869, it was decided that "modern production on a great scale renders co-operative industry a necessity," and "that the state ought to be made the holder of the means of transport and circulation in order to annihilate the powerful monopoly of great companies." At the congresses of 1868 and 1869 a report on property revealed a difference of opinion, proving that the extreme theorists had not yet got complete ascendancy. In 1868 it was decided that the ways of communication, and forests, soil, mines, coal-pits, and railroads ought to be common property. Dupont, general secretary of the International, used at this congress the following language: "We want no governments any longer, for governments oppress us by taxes; we want no armies any more, for armies butcher and murder us; we want no religion any longer, for religion stifles the understanding." At the congress of Lausanne, in 1867, it was maintained that "modern production on a great scale renders co-operative industry a necessity," and "that society may abolish individual property, putting collective property in its place in the soil. On the same occasion a motion that the right of inheritance ought to be completely and "radically" abolished did not meet with entire acceptance.

In consequence of the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, no congress of this union was held in 1870; and the horrors during the siege of Paris in 1871, which were, without due cause, ascribed to the members of the International as originators, put the International under the ban of Europe. Socialism could not stand under the crimes of those with whom it sympathized.

The Workingmen's Union was founded a little after the International, by a brilliant and accomplished man, Ferdinand Lassalle, whose early death was followed by the Universal suffrage adopted by the North German Confederation weakened it again by satisfying the more moderate of the German socialists. In 1869 Liebknecht, an old socialist, founded the Social Democratic Workingmen's Party; and this was succeeded by the Socialistic Workingmen's Party, at Gotha, in 1875. The extreme principles of the International prevailed in this new organization, as they have done in Germany ever since, over the more moderate form of socialism that was in vogue before.

Meanwhile, in 1871, the new empire was established; and, in the Reichstag, socialist representatives, few, yet in increasing numbers, have had an opportunity to propagate their opinions. Outside of the political arena, several professors of political economy have some leaning toward socialist doctrines, although disagreeing among themselves. Such are Brentano, Schmoller, Schaeffle, F. A. Lange. The socialist party is also extremely active in propagating its opinions through the press. Its strength at the polls has been estimated as being in 1877 from six to eight hundred thousand.

We close our sketch of socialism with considering some of the results to society from the system, if it should ever become predominant.

1. At present the instruments of work belong to the class of the capitalists. The dependence of the working-class, due to this fact, is held to be a cause of misery and servitude in all its forms. To liberate work, the means of production must be converted into the common property of society. Thus all land and instruments must cease to belong to private persons. All capitalists must be stripped of their possessions, however small in extent. The incomes of the present owners may be converted into term annuities, if states are able to take on them such a burden.

2. The reward of work, or wages, is, according to the doctrine of Marx, to be measured by the time spent in work. Whether this principle would not ruin the whole plan is doubtful; for a sense of injustice on the part of the faithful would be roused against the idle, and thus some other measure of comparative wages would be demanded.

3. Tickets of work are to be given to each workman, which will entitle him to the value of his day's work, estimated in the productions which he needs. As all produce their needs, outside of the working-class, due to this fact, is held to be a cause of misery and servitude in all its forms. To liberate work, the means of production must be converted into the common property of society. Thus all land and instruments must cease to belong to private persons. All capitalists must be stripped of their possessions, however small in extent. The incomes of the present owners may be converted into term annuities, if states are able to take on them such a burden.

4. By this process all money is superseded, except so far as dealings with foreign lands, where barter cannot be made use of, are concerned. Drafts must be issued by the government, and be payable in so many tickets of work.

5. The government, being the only employer, is free from all competition. But what is to prevent over-production, which is checked at present by want of sale? What is to prevent comparative over-production of articles in great use; for instance if too little food were produced to meet the amount of things manufactured?

6. The government, being the only transporter and distributor, will be liable to an infinity of mistakes, which are at present reduced to their minimum by individual caution. Wants of one thing, or in one place, cannot be supplied in another place, or of another thing, by competition; for competition is excluded by the system. Every change must be provided for by the government, and new wants be met by new supplies, according to its judgment. The present rapid movements of industry would be retarded by the clogs and breaks necessary in the action of central power. Could so vast a city as London, or even as New York, be sure of not being exposed to famines on the plan of destroying private capital?

7. International exchanges would add to the difficulties of a socialistic state. It must own vessels, collect things produced elsewhere, and pay for them by barter of productions not needed at the hour or by paying gold and silver. Here, again, the stimulus of competition being necessarily absent, the agents of a government would be brought into straits which might be of most serious injury.

8. It must not be supposed that all the final results of labor will accrue to the laborer. The certificates of work will amount to an immense sum; but the deductions from them must be immense also. The expenses of governments, the support of all transporters, of education, of the poor, the sick, the disabled, the police, of legislation, official salaries,— which in such a state would include the payment to all who buy, sell, or carry,— the prevention, trial, and punishment of crime, the care of roads, protection of every sort, would still continue, and would of course involve an amount of certificates of work, which must be deducted from the reward of work to an extent which no one can foresee. Lawyers, it is true, would, for the most part, cease. Inheritance would, or might, cease also,— at least the savings from labor invested in certificates of work would be, no doubt, small; and the absence of private means of acquisition would take away a principal stimulus to work beyond the supply of pressing wants. A general equality just above the subsistence-point would, it is probable, prevail, and take away another most important stimulus.

But perhaps we have indulged in a useless method of looking at socialism on the industrial side, when there is so much uncertainty in the action of causes under new conditions. We turn to another side of the subject,— to its relation to the family, to individual character and the progress of society. Here, if we hold on by the system, and take, we can form opinions only which may prove to be wide of the mark. And first as to the family: if we judged from the free thoughts of many socialists in regard to marriage, divorce, free-love, and the like, we should not feel very hopeful that socialism would long retain in its purity the Christian idea of the family tie; nor should we be ready to think that a system which cut off the middle class of society altogether from existence would preserve the best models for a wholly new system. Yet there is at least no light or especial hope drawn from the prospect which socialism holds out. I can believe, that, in some places, every thing would be hopeful, while elsewhere the phalansteries of Fourierism would be realized with the fewest redeeming features.

The state, as we have seen it be invested, in socialism, with all power over industry; which thus may be called practically unfree. It must be a state of serfs with a democratic government over them. Is it harsh or unjust to say that the slaves on a Southern plantation, under a slave-driver, were in some respects better off; for the master himself, over against the driver, might represent clemency and kindness?

Religion will not stand very high in the regard of socialists. Schaeffle says, in his Quintessence.

of Socialism, that it is "through and through religious, and hostile to the church." But perhaps this may be owing to the fact that the religious institutions of society have hitherto been bulwarks against capitalism, and the only capitalistic feeling that religious feeling involves a spirit of subordination to existing order, except when such order strikes at the roots of religion itself. In the social state it would be wholly uncertain whether a nation of laborers could or would restore religious brotherhood on the foundation of the New Testament, when once state churches should be overthrown.

And again: how would socialism affect individual character? Here we notice, first, that mere equality, with no power to rise above the condition of birth,—a form of life where competition, and all that human nature is at present carried forward. To shieldeach other from ruin. In such a case, there would be no middle ground between the point aimed at by socialism; for otherwise, so far, every one who has property, would resist the faith of Protestants, and in every way advance the Protestant cause. SOCIÉTÉ ÉVANGÉLIQUE DE GENÈVE (the Evangelical Society of Geneva), the oldest of the Continental evangelical societies, was founded in 1881 for the spread of sound apostolic doctrine throughout Switzerland and France. It has a theological school at Geneva, supports numerous missionaries, pastors, and supporters, and is entirely dependent upon the funds yearly collected, not only in Switzerland, but in different parts of Europe, and from the United States of America. It is undependable, having as its profession of faith substantially the creed of the Evangelical Alliance. It is the product of the revival of gospel truth which attended the labors of Robert Haldane (see art.). In the society's theological school, Gaussen, Malan, Pronier, and Merle D'Aubigné have taught. In the year from March, 1881 to March, 1882, the receipts were, from gifts and sales, 254,187 francs. SOCINUS (Faustus) AND THE SOCINIANS. Faustus Socinus, or Fausto Sozzini, was b. at Siena, 1539; d. at Luclawice in Poland, 1604. Left an orphan at a tender age, his early education was neglected. Following the example of his ancestors, he at first devoted himself to the study of law, but corresponded with his uncle Lelio Sozzini about religious questions. In 1550 the misfortunes of his family forced him to leave Italy; and he went to Lyons, and then to Zürich, where he spent three years examining the manuscripts of his uncle. It was from there, as he himself says, that Socinus got the suggestion of some of the characteristic features of his later system. His literary activity was inaugurated with an exposition of the first part of the first chapter of John (1562), which is his only work anonymously. From 1562 to 1574 he was again in Italy, and at the court of Francesco de Medici in Florence, who heaped honors and offices upon him. The most of the time between 1574 and 1578 he spent... in Basel, occupied with the elaboration of his system and disputations. The latter were the occasion of two of his principal writings, — De Jesu Christo servatore, against the Protestant preacher Covet, and De statu primi hominis ante lapsum, against the Florentine Pucci. In 1579 he went to Poland, where the name of his uncle was still held in honor, and remained there till his death. At Cracow, Socinus applied for admission to the society of Unitarians, but was refused, except on condition of his being rebaptized, the Unitarians being at that time in league with Anabaptists. Socinus, not accepting admission on these grounds, employed his powers and influence to have the law changed in this regard. He was active with his pen and at synods, and he lived to see his view accepted at the synod of Rakow in 1608. In 1593 he married into a Polish family of noble birth. He was not free from abuses and persecutions, and in 1608, while ill, was taken out of his bed by students who had been incited by Roman-Catholic priests, dragged half naked through the city, and scourged, but was rescued by a university professor, Martin Vadovita. On this occasion, all of his books, papers, and manuscripts were burned in the market-place.

In 1605, immediately after Socinus’ death, the so-called Rakow or Socinian Catechism appeared in the Polish language, for which he had made preparations. It was completed, upon the basis of these and his writings, by Statorius, Schmalz, Moscorovius, and Vökel. A German translation was made in 1608, and a Latin one in 1609, of which a second, third, and fourth edition appeared at Amsterdam in 1665, 1680, 1684. This catechism is a very good compendium of the Socinian theology. At Socinus’ death there were a number of Unitarian congregations in Poland, made up largely of noblemen. Good schools were connected with them. The city of Rakow was the chief citadel of Unitarianism, and the excellent institution of learning was attended at one time by nearly a thousand students, three hundred fifty of whom were of noble birth. The general synod of the Socinians met there every year. Many of their theologians and preachers were celebrated. The Amsterdams were Schmalz (d. 1629), who wrote fifty-two works in defence of Socinianism; Vökel (d. 1618), a student of Wittenberg, and for a time amanuensis of Socinus, whose work, De vera religione, is a systematic presentation of the Socinian theology; Ostordt (d. 1611), who advocated the specific Anabaptist principles of refusing to do military duty, serve in public offices, etc.; and Moscorovius (d. 1630), who, among other things, wrote the Defence of the Socinians, which he sent to the king. Among the more distinguished men of the succeeding generation were Crell (d. 1631), a very prolific author, whose biblical commentaries, two books De uno Deo patre (the keenest Socinian attack upon the doctrine of the Trinity), and other works, fill vols. iii. and iv. of the Bibl. fratrum Polonorum; Schwabe (d. 1681), the author of a confession of faith (1642), De trinitate, de moralibus V. et N. T. itemque de eucharistia et baptismo ritibus (1637), etc.; Ludwig von Wolzogen (d. 1691), a distinguished exegete, and author of Compendium rel. christ.; Wiszowaty (d. 1678), author of sixty-two works, editor of the Bibl. frat. Polon., etc.; and Morskowski, author of Politia ecclesiastica (1648). In the reign of Sigismund III., and his son Wladislaw IV., who were completely under the sway of the Jesuits, the Socinian congregations were persecuted and legally abolished. By a decree of 1638 the school at Rakow was suppressed, and the church taken away from “the Arians;” the immediate occasion of these harsh measures being the blasphemy of some of the students in stoning a wooden crucifix outside of the precincts of the city. Rakow, forsaken of the Socinians, is now a poverty-stricken village. John Cas. Socinus, who dared to show their faces at the approach of the king of Sweden as traitors; and at the diet of Warsaw (1658) it was decreed that the confession and promotion of Socinianism should be punished with death. Two years were allowed to intervene before the execution of the edict, and during that time many Socinians migrated. A fresh edict in 1661 confirmed the preceding one. In Germany, Socinian doctrines were first taught by Ernst Soner, professor of medicine and physics at Altdorf. He taught clandestinely, but with success, till his death, in 1612. His principal writing is a treatise upon the eternal duration of future punishment. Altdorf became the heart-stone of Socinianism, but the Council of Nürnberg forbade the publication of Socinian views there. Socinian synods were held in Kreuzburg in 1681 and 1683. Some of the Polish exiles were permitted to remain for a while at Mannheim. In Germany the movement was always very weak and insignificant. In Holland it was more successful; and, in spite of persecutions, the Socinians increased. In 1635 the States-General demanded a pledge of the University of Leyden that it would not tolerate Socinian teaching. Some of the Polish exiles found their way to Holland. Among them three especially deserve mention: Felbinger (b. 1616), Sand (d. at Amsterdam, 1650), who wrote the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (1684), a full literary history of his sect, and Zwicker (d. at Amsterdam, 1678), whose work, Irenicum Irenicorum, produced a great excitement. The Socinians finally were identified with the Anabaptists and Remonstrants. For the history of the movement in England and the United States, see art. Unitarians.

The doctrines of Socinianism are not to be regarded as identical with the doctrines of modern Unitarianism, and are laid down in the writings of Socinus, the Rakow Catechism, and the works of the principal Socinian writers down to the middle of the seventeenth century. The genuine Socinians held firmly to the authority of the Scriptures and to a very positive supranaturalism. The Rakow Catechism begins with the question, “What is the Christian religion?” Answer. “The Christian religion is the way revealed by God for securing eternal life.” Christianity is a special revelation. It is made known in the Scriptures, which, clothed with divine authority, is the only source of religious knowledge. The authority of the Old Testament, which only has an historical value, rests upon the testimony of the New Testament. Both the Testaments are inspired documents. The sacred writers wrote under the impulse and dictation of the Divine Spirit (divino Spiritu impulsi etque dictante). The Socinians, however, taught that only the essential parts, those pertaining to doctrine, were of immediate divine inspiration. The views concerning the relation of reason to revelation differ somewhat from those of orthodox Protestants. Reason is man's spiritual eye; and, in all controverted matters, it is judge, and not the Pope or the believing Christian. The truths of revelation are above reason, but never contrary to it. Miracles are above reason, and credible. The doctrines of the trinity and divinity of Christ are contrary to reason, and therefore incredible. Wiszowaty, in his Religio rationalis, went so far as to teach the agreement of reason and philosophy and religion. Thus, the latent rationalism in genuine Socinianism became more and more prominent.

In the department of theology proper the usual attributes are attributed to God. His omniscience is defined in such a way that it does not conflict with the contingency of events and the freedom of man. The thrice-repeated "holy" (Isa. 6:3) is properly explained to be used for the sake of emphasis. In the case of the three men who appeared to Abraham (Gen. xviii.), it is shown that only one of them was called "Lord." To the argument from passages in the New Testament in which the Son and Holy Spirit are placed next to God, whose name believers are baptized is not necessarily God, as appears from the case of Moses (Cor. x. 2), etc. In regard to the apostolical predication (2 Cor. xiii. 14), it is asserted that the Son and Holy Ghost are distinguished from the Father. The genuineness of the passage of the three witnesses in 1 John is denied. The rational argument against the Trinity is specially emphasized, as would naturally be expected.

Man was created in God's image. That image consists essentially in the dominion which was given him over all creatures. Mind and reason included under this head, as they are the essential attribute, but subject to man's volition and contrary activity. The reason was not absolute stress of the sensual nature. Sin is an act of the free will, and as such it was not even known in advance by God. The sin of Adam did not entail upon his posterity the loss of freedom; that is, the ability to choose between the right and the wrong. So far as the doctrine of original sin is in opposition to this view, the Socinians most positively denied it. The θεω of Rom. v. 12 is explained to mean quoniam, quatenus. The doctrine of original sin is opposed to the Scripture which calls upon men to repent and be converted. The mere inclination to sin, Socinus held, might exist in all, but did not necessarily so exist. But this inclination is not a consequence of the sin of Adam; and, if there were the case, it was expressed to be sin, for sin exists only where there is guilt. Hence no corruption came upon the human family by Adam's sin.

In the Socinian system, Christ is not divine. He was more than a mere man. His attributes were extra-human, but he was not of divine nature. He had to be a man in order to redeem. Immortality, the goal of the Christian religion, was mediated by the resurrection of Christ. If, on the other hand, his superiority to men had consisted in his divinity, he could not have died. The argument from Scripture and reason is pressed. The divinity of Christ cannot be derived from the affirmation that he was God's Son. All men are called the sons of God (Rom. ix. 26); and, when Christ is called the only-begotten Son, it is simply meant that he was the chief and highest of the sons of God, as Isaac and Solomon are also known by this designation. The expression "I and my Father are one" (John x. 30) refers to unity of will and power, as in John xvi. 22. The passages referring to Christ's patience (2 Cor. i. 9; Gal. iii. 20) were extra-human, but he was not of divine nature. The divinity of God, as appears from the case of Moses (Cor. x. 2), etc. In regard to the apostolical predication (2 Cor. xiii. 14), it is asserted that the Son and Holy Ghost are distinguished from the Father. at complete variance with a free gift (Eph. ii. 8, etc.). It is the resurrection upon which the stress is laid; and Socinus expressly declares, that it is the head and ground of all our faith and salvation in the person of Christ (caput et tandem fundamentum totius fidei et salutis nostrae in Christi persona). The obedience Christ rendered to the law was due from him, for God had commanded him to obey. But the guilt and punishment of one cannot be borne by another. Christ had to obey for himself, and could not obey or suffer for others. The word "redemption" in the New Testament does not contain the notion of satisfaction, but simply means emancipation. The reconciliation accomplished by Christ consists simply in this, that to us who were enemies of God he showed the way to become converted, and return to God. The meaning of the atonement is, that God in Christ has shown himself to be above measure gracious (propitius). Christ's high-priestly office consists in the help he gives us. He delivers us from the punishments of sin by reason of the absolute power which he received from the Father, and which protects us. He delivers us from the bondage of sin by keeping us from all manner of sins. This he does by presenting to our thought his own person, which remained sinless in temptation. Predestination is nothing more than the divine decree to give eternal life to as many as believe on Christ. Faith consists of assent to the theory of an apprehension of his righteousness is a human fiction. Predestination is nothing more than the method of question and answer, was so characteristic of Socrates, and at the same time so full of life and power, that it was adopted more or less by all his disciples, and has ever since been known as the Socratic method. It is seen in its perfection in the Dialogues of Plato, which are the idealized conversations of the idealized Socrates. The subject-matter of the Socratic philosophy is ethics in contradistinction to physics; its aim is practical to the exclusion of barren speculation; and conscious ignorance, modesty, moderation, pure and high morality, humble inquiry at the oracles of God about humble "human things," in a word, that childlike spirit, which, as Lord Bacon says, is the key both to "the kingdom of science and the kingdom of heaven," is among its most marked characteristics. The chief good, our being's end and aim, according to the Socratic ethics, is happiness: not, however, that which most men call happiness; not εὐγενία, but εὐεργεσία and εὐθυμοσία; not the pleasure which springs from the possession of riches, honor, power, and the gifts of fortune, but that well being which results from well doing in obedience to the law of God and with the blessing of Heaven. The true, the beautiful, and the good are all essentially identical with each other, since they all consist in the useful and the fitting; and that which is good for nothing is neither good nor beautiful nor true. Xenophon and Plato agree in making Socrates teach that he who knows justice is just, and the man who understands virtue is virtuous: in other words, he resolves all virtue into knowledge. But it is plain from both these writers that he used knowledge in a high and comprehensive sense unusual in ethical treatises, but strikingly analogous to that in which it is used in the Scriptures. He makes knowledge identical with wisdom, and ignorance with folly and sin, just as in the Bible piety is wisdom, and sin is folly: the wicked have no knowledge, while the righteous know all things. He who is truly master of the science or profession of virtue will be truly virtuous. In this high sense, knowledge is virtue, since really to know is certainly to do, and to do is the only way truly to know. Socrates believed in the existence of one supreme Divinity, the Creator and Disposer of the universe, the Maker and Father of mankind, the Ruler and Governor among the nations, invisible, all-powerful, omniscient, and omnipresent, perfectly wise and just and good. His method of demonstrating the existence of such a being was strictly Baconian, the same argument which Paley uses in his Natural Theology: indeed, we almost seem to be reading Paley when we read the chapters in which Xenophon records his master's arguments in proof of the divine existence and benevolence. It was when he read the Greek author, of those unwritten laws in the soul of man which execute themselves, and make it impossible for any man to be unjust, or impure, or licentious, without paying the penalty (which proves a greater and better than any human lawgiver), we seem to be sitting at the feet of Bishop Butler himself.

The same argument of Socrates touching the inferior deities, whose existence he admits, and whose agency he recognizes, particularly in the providential care of human affairs, probably did not differ essentially from the Christian doctrine of the angels; though it marks the greater elevation of the Christian revelation and the Christian consciousness, that what the most enlightened heathen called gods, and worshipped, Christians consider as only ministers of God, whom to worship were idolatry.

We have not space to enlarge upon the teachings of Socrates respecting providence and prayer. He believed himself to be under the constant guidance of a divine voice, which always warned him when he was in danger of going or doing wrong, and thus, indirectly, always led him in the right way; and he taught that every man might have the same divine guidance; and he could not but wonder at the folly and madness of men who preferred a blind and ignorant guide to one who was unerring, and perfectly acquainted with the way in which they should go. Hence his one only and constant prayer was, that God would guide him, and give him, not riches, pleasure, honor, power, which were as likely to prove a bane as a blessing, but what was best for him; since God only knew what was for his true and highest good.

Socrates held the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the future life as strenuously as Plato did, but without those dreams and chimeras of its pre-existence and successive transmigrations by which the creed of the latter was disfigured; and, with these exceptions, he doubtless relied on the argument in proof of the doctrine which have been stated in the article on Plato and Christianity: and — what has been usually wanting in heathen philosophies, and too often in the lives of Christians also — it was the beauty and glory of Socrates' character, that his doctrine of providence and prayer and a future state was the controlling principle of his life. And so he died a martyr's death — these are the main secret of his power, and these exhibit him in his true relation to Christianity. It would not be difficult, on the one hand, to point out defects in his teaching, and imperfections in his life, nor, on the other, to magnify the points of resemblance between him and the Christian religion. Such comparisons have been elaborately made by Priestley, for example, in his tract, Socrates and Jesus Compared, and by Baur, in his Sokrates und Christus, the second of those three treatises (Drei Abhandlungen), which were re-edited by Zeller in 1876. But the disparity is so great as to forbid comparison. The intimations of Rousseau, sceptic as he was, taught him this: "What prejudice," he says (Emile, bk. iv.), "what blindness, must it be to compare the son of Sophroniscus to the son of Mary! . . . If the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus are those of a God." Socrates himself would have aspired to no higher honor than that of being a forerunner of Christ among the Greeks. That honor justly belongs to him; and his prophetic influence can easily be traced, like that of Plato, and largely through him and his followers, in the history and philosophy of the Greeks and Romans before and after Christ, while the power of his teaching and his life is still felt in the literature, the philosophy, and the religion of all Christian nations.

SOCRATES, the Greek church historian, was born in Constantinople about 380, and lived there as scholasticus. His work is a continuation of that of Eusebius, and encompasses the period from 306 to 439. It is a simple and natural report of facts, supported by rich extracts from the sources, and marred by comparatively few mistakes; but it is not distinguished by an artistic form, nor is the author an artist in the strict sense of a critical sift ing of miraculous stories. It has been edited (Greek and Latin) by Valeius, Paris, 1659, together with the histories of Eusebius and Sozomen; by R. Hussey, Oxford, 1853, 3 vols., Greek text separately, with Introduction by W. Bright. Oxford, 1878. See Dufin, in his Novelle Bibliothèque, iv.; Hölzlhauser: De fontibus quibus S. et . . . wn sund, Göttingen, 1825; and *Baur,:
SODOM. the most important of four cities (Gomorrahs, Admah, Zeboim, and Sodom) in the vale of Siddim, which were destroyed by "brimstone and fire" out of heaven, on account of the great wickedness of their inhabitants (Gen. xix. 24). Lot lived there (Gen. xiii. 12, xix. 2), and there his daughters married (Gen. xix. 14). Chedorlaomer and his allies plundered the cities, but the captives and spoils were recovered by Abraham (Gen. xiv.). The fate of Sodom and the other cities of the plain is held up in the Bible as a warning (Deut. xxi. 23; Isa. i. 9, 10; Amos iv. 11; Matt. x. 15; 2 Pet. ii. 6-8; Rev. xi. 8), and so deeply impressed itself upon the neighboring peoples, that Strabo, in his description of the Dead Sea (16, 2), which he erroneously calls the Sirbonian Sea, and Tacitus (Hist. 5, 7), relate, that, according to tradition, there once were cities and fruitful plains where then there was death. The question, whether these cities of the plain were on the southern or northern end of the Dead Sea,—for the old opinion, that the sea covered the site of the cities, is given up as contradicted by geology,—is one of the most vexed in biblical geography. For the southern end the arguments are: (1) Tradition from the time of Josephus (Antiq., I, 11, 4; War, IV., 8, 4), Eusebius (Onomast., s. v.), and Jerome (Ep. civ. 11; Comm. in Esa., xv. 5); (2) The mountain of salt at that end is called Jebel Usdum, apparently an echo of Sodom; (3) Pillars of salt detached from the great salt cliffs at that end have been called "Lot's Wife;" (4) Abraham, standing near Hebron, saw the smoke of their burning (Gen. xix. 27, 28); (5) Numerous slime-pits, i.e., bitumen (Gen. xiv. 10) are found at that end; (6) The portion of the sea south of the Lisan Peninsula is very shallow, as if it were beyond its original limits. If the sea now covered the site of the cities, this would be the case. This view has been advocated by Robinson, Lynch, Porter, Baedeker, Schaff, and many others. For the northern end, the arguments are: (1) Lot chose the Plain of Jordan (Gen. xiii. 11), which must have been at the northern end, for in that case only could Abraham and Lot have seen it from Bethel; (2) Since the hill near Hebron was midway between the two ends of the sea, Abraham could just as well have seen the burning if it was at the southern end as if it was at the southern; (3) The presence of numerous slime-pits in the vale of Siddim, at the northern end; (4) The account of Chedorlaomer's attack fits best with the northern site for Sodom. Prominent advocates for the northern site are Grove, Tristram, and Merrill. The destruction of the cities of the plain was probably the result of natural causes under divine control. The explosion of gas would easily account for it all. The soil, soaked with bitumen, would easily convey the fire until all the cities were destroyed.

SODOR AND MAN, an English bishopric (Sodor comes from Surtreygar, Southern Isles, corresponding to Nordreygar, Northern Isles), is the name applied to the western islands of Scotland, especially to those contiguous to the Isle of Man; and hence the name of the bishopric. The income of the bishop is £2,000.

SOHN, Georg, b. at Rossbach, Dec. 31, 1551; d. at Heidelberg, April 23, 1589. He studied theology at Marburg and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1574, and at Heidelberg in 1584. He was a pupil of the Melanchthon school, and considered himself a member and teacher of the Reformed Church. His works,—the principal of which are Synopsis corporis doctrinae Phil. Melanchthonici, De verbo Dei, Methodus theologica, etc.—appeared in a collected edition at Herborn, in 4 vols., 1591. HEPPE.

SOISSONS, a town of France in the department of Aisne, was the seat of a number of important synods.—I. The synod of 742 was convened by Pepin the Short, and presided over by Boniface, Archbishop of Rheims. Besides a number of secular lords, twenty-three bishops were present; and the canons issued by Carloman in 742 were confirmed, forbidding the clergy to hunt, to marry, etc., prohibiting unknown persons from performing ecclesiastical duties, enjoining the counts to suppress Paganism, etc.—II. The synod of 852 numbered twenty-six bishops, and Charles the Bald was present. The Archbishop of Rheims, given up as condemned by geology,—is one of the most vexed in biblical geography. SOLIDARIUS, Philip, a Greek monk who lived in the latter part of the eleventh century in Constantinople, wrote a work in verse and in the form of a dialogue, under the title Δοςιραμα, "the mirror:" it is a representation of the ascetic views of the Greek mysticism of the time. It found much favor, was commented by Michael Paellus, and translated into Latin prose by the Jesuit, Jacob Pontanus, Ingolstadt, 1804; but the translation, which is also found in the Bibl. Max. patr. Lugd., vol. xxii., is very incorrect. Of the Greek text, only a few fragments have been printed by Oudin, Lambecius, and Coulerieus. Gass. Solomon, second son of David by Bathsheba, his successor upon the throne, and third king over Israel, who reigned forty years (1015-975 B.C.; according to Ewald, 1025-986). Compare 1 Kings i.-xi.; 2 Chron. i.-ix.; Joseph., Antt., VIII. 1-7. His early education was intrusted to the prophet Nathan, who called him Jedidiah, i.e., the beloved of Jehovah (2 Sam. xii. 24, 25). Through the influence of his mother, Nathan, and Zadok the priest, Solomon, at the age of twenty, was made king while his father was yet alive. Riding on the mule, attended by Nathan and Zadok, and by the king's special company of the thirty mighty men, and the body-guard under the command of Benaiah, he went down to Gihon, and was proclaimed and anointed king. His first acts, showing moderation, prudence, and energy, were well adapted to gain him the esteem and confidence of his people. The death of Joab, who had insidiously killed Abner and Amasa, and who had openly sided with Adonijah, combined justice with prudence, fulfilling at the same time David's dying counsels. Shimei also is killed at David's wish; Adonijah is put to death; Abiathar is deposed and exiled, sent to the south, north, and east, where he constructed and regulated the worship of God; and the people, is certain. A special wisdom, whose most prominent representative Solomon himself was, was cultivated. The Queen of Sheba, attracted by his wisdom, came to his court to hear him. He also cultivated poetry (he himself is said to have composed a thousand and five hymns, besides three thousand proverbs); and historiography, no doubt, found in him a great patron. Many structures which Solomon had erected made his name very famous in the east and in the west. Like his father, he secured builders from Hiram, king of Tyre. For the lower menial work he used at first the "strangers," the remnant of the Canaanish races; afterwards his own people, too, had to help in the work. The first great building was the magnificent temple, built after the pattern of the tabernacle, but executed in accordance with the plans which David had received from the hand of the Lord (1 Chron. xxviii. 11, 19). After seven years and a half the work on the temple was completed. About the time of the feast of tabernacles, the temple was dedicated with great solemnities; the king himself addressed the assembly (1 Kings vii.). As the temple, like the Holy of holies, was intended to be the habitation of God, the "cloud," "the glory of the Lord," filled the house of the Lord. With the building of the temple a new organization of the order of the priests and Levites, which was made by David, undoubtedly took place. He appointed twenty-four orders for the service at the temple, and the same number for the choir of the temple-music. The second great building was his palace, which was built south of the temple (Neh. iii. 25). It consisted of many divisions, which served partly as magazines, partly as rooms for the king and his queens. The main building was a hundred cubits long, fifty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high. In the porch stood a great throne of ivory, and overlaid with the best gold. Its steps, twelve lions stood on each side, while two lions stood beside the stays (1 Kings x. 18-20; 2 Chron. ix. 17-19). The palace was connected with the temple by steps. A special seat was reserved for the king. That he also erected many other buildings, etc., we infer from 1 Kings ix. 1, 19; Eccles. ii. 4-6; Song of Songs viii. 11. He also fortified the capital, and many fortresses were built. In the organization of his army he imitated the Egyptians. He had a thousand and four hundred chariots and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, or put them in small cities. The inner administration of the kingdom was also regulated. The highest officer was the chancellor; next to him was the "scribe," who also regulated the finances. Besides he had a captain over his body-guard. The king's enormous honor is expressed in the title, a prince of peace, under whose sceptre the people and the country prospered. But at the beginning and towards the end of his reign, in the south, north, and west some princes rose. Hadad the Edomite, who had fled into Egypt, when he had heard that David and Joab were dead, returned into his country, of which he had possession (1 Kings xi. 21, 22, 25). Rezon also, gathered some men unto him, and appointed him king over Damascus; but he had not enough to yield to Solomon. The little kingdom of Gazer, or Gezer, between Israel and Philistia, rose also, but fell into the hands of the king of Egypt, who gave it to Solomon when he married his daughter. Solomon's success against the usurpers was sufficient to secure his authority, even beyond the confines of his own country; and for a long time peace reigned throughout his kingdom. In the beginning of his reign he married the daughter of King Puchsennes of Egypt. Thus Solomon's reign marks the entrance of Israel on a nearer intercourse with the Asiatic peoples. That such an intercourse was not without an influence upon the intellect of the Jewish people, is certain. A special wisdom, whose most prominent representative Solomon himself was, was cultivated. The Queen of Sheba, attracted by his wisdom, came to his court to hear him. He also cultivated poetry (he himself is said to have composed a thousand and five hymns, besides three thousand proverbs); and historiography, no doubt, found in him a great patron. In spite of his greatnesses, Solomon had his blemishes. Nathan his teacher was dead, without leaving another person in his stead to protect and guide the king. Outwardly Solomon appeared to have fulfilled the duties of the theocratic ruler, without exactly needing such a support as David had in Nathau and Gad. By and by the consciousness that such royal glory was incompatible with the advancement of the true theology. awake and asleep; the prophets Ahijah of Shilo, Shemaja, and Iddo were not favorably disposed toward the king; the first sees the coming of the ruin. The people was dissatisfied on account of the many oppressive contributions which were laid upon it. The greatest stumbling-block, by which he wounded the religious feeling of the people, was his hareem; for, whatever might have been the number of his hareem with its opposition to the spirit of true Jehovah-religion, and the more so as most of these women were foreigners, "who turned away his heart after other gods." It was not Solomon's intention to change or abandon the religion of Jehovah, but "his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God" (1 Kings xi. 4). Beside the worship of Jehovah, he allowed the worship of strange gods, and built altars for them taken, Now at the coming of Thus Solomon came more and more in opposition with the true patriotic spirit of the people; and the pious Jew connects, therefore, his highest hopes, not with his name, but with that of his father David, whilst among heathen and Mohammedans Suleiman is still highly celebrated.

See Vallarsiis, in his edition of the works of Jerome, vol. ii. part 2, p. 818. — Another Sophronius, a monk from Damascus, is known from the Monothelite controversies as a violent adversary of the mediating attempts of the Emperor Heraclius. For a time he yielded to the avowals of Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople; but when, in 634, he was elected patriarch of Jerusalem, he issued an Epistola encyclica (see Harduin: Acta Conc., iii.), in which he rejected all concessions to the Monophysites, and caused thereby the emperor to promulgate the κατακρα. Other writings by him exist in manuscript. GASS.

SORBONNE, The, was originally simply a college for poor students, connected with an elementary school for the philosophical and philosophical education of ecclesiastics, but succeeded so well, developed so great an energy, and exercised so decisive an influence, that in course of time it came to be quite generally identified, not only with the theological faculty, but even with the university itself.

The origin of the university of Paris may be dated back to the time of Charlemagne; but a more precise "Universitas," or college, is not met with until a hundred years later. In 1100, the city of Paris was founded by Robert de Dreux, a son of Louis the Fat, under the name of S. Thomas of the Domus, the archiepiscopal palace, though William of Champeaux lectured in St. Victor, and Abelard in Ste. Genevieve. The oldest college in Paris was founded by Robert de Dreux, a son of Louis the Fat, under the name of S. Thomas du Louvre. But as a course of theology comprised from seven to nine years, and the custom soon arose that the older students in a college instructed the younger, and as doctores issuing from a certain college often continued to reside there for a long time, and a library generally was formed in connection with the institution, the college naturally became a kind of minor university. Such was that which must underlie all true theology, a perfect mediation between faith and knowledge, religion and science, theology and philosophy; but, in pursuing that tendency, the Sorbonne always kept its doctrines pure, that is, in harmony with the teachings of the church, though without submitting in a slavish manner to ecclesiastical authority or sacerdotal eccentrics. It was the Sorbonne which drove the scandalous Feast of the Fools out of the church; and it was also the Sorbonne which successfully opposed the introduction of the Peter's-pence and of the Inquisition into France. Among its other merits may also be mentioned, that it established the first printing-press in Paris, 1470; and, as an indication of the high rank it held in the world's estimation, it may be added that it represented the university of Paris at the councils.

The decadence of the Sorbonne began when it fell into the hands of the Guises, and became the handmaid of Ultramontanism; and the public soon discovered the antiquated and re-actionary tendencies of its activity. In 1624 it obtained an edict of the Parliament forbidding, under penalty of corporal punishment, and even death, to teach any thing against the accepted authorities. The edict was directed against Descartes; and the Sorbonne was so far from learning any thing from Malebranche, Fénelon, or Leibnitz, that it wanted to have the edict renewed in 1671. The president of the Parliament, Lamoignon, found it difficult to refuse, until, one day, he found on his table Boileau's burlesque, Arrêt donné en la Grande Chambre du Parlement contre la Sorbonne. The college, however, continued to be the most influential in France. In 1751 appeared Voltaire's Le tombeau de la Sorbonne; and no voice was raised in its defence, when, in 1790, the state seized all its property, as belonging to the nation, and disposed of it for other purposes.

SOTER (pope 168–175 or 177), a native of Campania, is said to have written a work against the Montanists, which was refuted by Tertullian; but the work is lost, as is also his Epistle to the Corinthians, which was not uncommonly read in the congregations at Sunday service. The decretales bearing his name are spurious.

SOTERIOLOGY (σωτηρολογία) is that branch of Christian theology which treats of the gregatio pauperum magistrorum studentium in theologiae facultate, which congregation was confirmed by Clement IV. in 1268.

After the example of the Franciscan and Dominican orders, a teacher of theology was also appointed at the Sorbonne; and the happy choice of the first teachers—William of Saint-Amour, Eudes of Douai, and Lambert l'Aigle—contributed much to increase the reputation of the establishment. Afterwards a considerable number of great doctors took up their abode in the college: and, when the regular lectures of the faculty were removed from the archiepiscopal palace to the Sorbonne, it was quite natural that people in general should identify the college with the faculty; so much the more natural as its theology really determined the character of the theology of the faculty. The general tendency of that theology was that which must underlie all true theology, a perfect mediation between faith and knowledge, religion and science, theology and philosophy; but, in pursuing that tendency, the Sorbonne always kept its doctrines pure, that is, in harmony with the teachings of the church, though without submitting in a slavish manner to ecclesiastical authority or sacerdotal eccentrics. It was the Sorbonne which drove the scandalous Feast of the Fools out of the church; and it was also the Sorbonne which successfully opposed the introduction of the Peter's-pence and of the Inquisition into France. work of the Saviour,— the doctrine of salvation, so far as such salvation has been wrought out by the second person in the Holy Trinity. It is to be carefully distinguished from soterology, or christology (v. Christology), which treats solely of the person of the Redeemer,— his incarnation, his divinity, and his humanity, and the combination of these two elements in his single and perfect personality. Yet it must always be remembered that any adequate conception of his soteriological work must be based on right views, antecedently obtained and established, respecting the Christ as he is in himself,— the appointed and qualified Saviour of men.

Soteriology does not include the concurrent work of the Son of God in other spheres, such as creation or providence, or moral administration. Nor does it include those aspects of salvation which involve, on the one side, the elective purpose and love of the Father, or, on the other, the interior ministry of the Spirit in the application of saving grace. While the Son is concerned with the Father in the original plan of redemption and in the selection of those in whom that plan becomes effectual (v. Predestination), his specific mission is to interpose, in the temper of foreknowledge, between God and the sinner, and in securing the reconciliation, between man as a sinner, and the Deity against whom man has offended, as a mediator, the Son of God, who was also the Son of man, was amply qualified, both by inherent endowment and through official appointment; and in his work of mediation he is actually successful in removing alienation, in restoring the lost harmony between God and the sinner, and in securing to man a complete and blessed and eternal security in his relation to his Heavenly Father. The mediatorial work of mediation is generally described by Calvinistic theologians under the three specific forms indicated in the terms prophet, priest, and king (v. Jesus Christ, Three Offices of). It has been questioned whether this distribution is in all respects desirable; whether, by the division of the one work into these three parts or offices, our concept of the essential unity of that work is not impaired; and whether the underlying idea of mediation is not weakened by such multiplicity of particular functions and relations. (Van Oosterzee: Christian Dogmatics, see c.viii.) Is this central idea adequately expressed in these three forms? Do they contain neither more nor less than the underlying conception? And, where the distribution is made, are these three offices always kept in their proportionate place, and severally invested with their proper dignity and value in the one mediatorial work? Whatever answer may be given to these questions on exegetical or speculative grounds, there is no adequate reason for rejecting an analytic presentation which has gained such definite expression in current evangelical creeds (Heidelberg Catechism, Ans. 31; Westminster Confession, chap. viii.), and which has been so extensively adopted as a regulative guide in modern theology.

Studying soteriology in this triple aspect, we may first note the prophetic function of the Saviour, as including that entire revelation of saving truth which he, as the divine Logos, came among men to make (v. Prophet, Prophecy). All religious, and especially all inspired, teachers who were prior to him as revealers of sacred doctrine or duty, were only messengers to prepare the way for him, and to prepare men for the reception of what he taught. Christ was the one perfect Logos, in virtue both of his eternal relationship within the Trinity (v. Trinity) and of his specific appointment as the Word of the Godhead to man. In him resided all the qualifications requisite to the complete fulfilment of this prophetic work, and from him came in highest form, and with most commanding power, all the truth which man needs to know in order to his salvation. This prophetic function may be subdivided into direct and indirect,—direct teaching through the formal enunciation of saving truths, and indirect teaching through the superadded power of example and personality. Christ, as teacher and prophet, becomes an enduring pattern also. In himself, as well as in his message, was light and the light was the life of men. It may be queried, whether, in consequence of the strong inclination of evangelical Protestantism to exalt the priestly work of our Lord as central, this prophetic mission has not been relatively too much ignored, and, more specifically, whether the biblical view of him as the true norm and example of our humanity has not been surrendered too much to the uses of those who altogether reject his priestly character and mission.

Concerning this priestly function, it is needless to repeat what has been said elsewhere (v. Atonement, Justification, Jesus Christ (Three Offices of), Priests, Priesthood, Offerings in the Old Testament, etc.). The essential fact in the case is the voluntary and vicarious surrender of himself by our Lord as a sacrifice before God for sinners, on account of their sin, and in order to expiate sin, and to render possible the reconciliation and restoration of man as sinful. As a sacrifice, Christ was inherently and judicially perfect, a lamb without blemish and without spot: as a priest, he was in every way qualified for the sacrificial work in which he was thus engaged; and his administration of the priestly office was voluntary, official, and acceptable. In him both the Aaronic priesthood and the peculiar priesthood of Melchisedec were singularly blended. He was, in his own person, the absolute culmination of the priestly as well as the prophetic order and idea. As priest and as sacrifice he was perfect.

That this vicarious intervention and offering of himself in behalf of sinners and for sin was an essential part of the mediatorial work of our Saviour, is too clearly revealed in Scripture to be questioned by any who receive its testimony in the case as conclusive. It was not a merely arbitrary scheme, resting on no recognizable necessity: it was rather a scheme imperatively demanded by the ethical nature of both God and man as sinful needed. The exigencies of that dispensation, exhibited specifically in the priestly work of the Deity, were specifically on the ground of what he has suffered as well as done in our behalf as our great high priest and sacrifice, so to be an essential part of the mediatorial work of our Lord, as well as done in our behalf as our great high priest and sacrifice, to be an act unworthy of God. To accept the sinner as if he were righteous, and to adopt him (v. Adoption) into the family of God, and make him an heir of spiritual privileges and blessings, without requiring from him repentance, and return to loyalty, as conditions, and with no provision for his deliverance from the legal penalties incurred by his sin, would be a transaction still more unworthy. And the only adequate warrant for such pardon, acceptance, and adoption, must be found, not in any worthiness inherent in the nature of man or any merit seen in his life, nor even in his faith and repentance viewed as concomitants or consequences, but simply in the mediatorial, and especially in the sacrifice, of Christ only. Our justification is in him, and in him alone.

The kingly office of the Saviour is a necessary element in his broad work of mediation. He is king because he has been prophet and priest; he is also king inherently, as divine. His kingdom commences in the believing heart, and is essentially spiritual: it is an authority exercised in love, and for the purpose of salvation. His church, as composed of those who have thus submitted to him personally, is his gracious empire; and over that empire he is the supreme head, everywhere and always. Within that church there can be no authority to supersede, or even, in the papal sense, to represent his: all its laws, officers, administration, activities, are subject entirely to him. This kingdom was founded by him before the advent; it has been extended through many lands and centuries by his grace and power; it will continue to increase, through the agency of the forces now incorporated in it, until it has filled the earth. The notion, that, as a kingdom of love, it will ere long be supplanted by a kingdom of power, in which Christ will visibly appear as an earthly monarch, subduing his enemies by irresistible strength, and exalting his saints with him to a species of temporal domination (v. Millenarism), is at variance with the view here presented. Beyond this earthly empire of our Lord as already defined, we discern his princely exaltation even now, at the right hand of the Father, to be advocate and intercessor for his people. This advocacy and intercession are to continue until all who are his are finally brought together with him into what is literally the kingdom of God.

Returning from this survey of the specific functions or offices of Christ to the underlying idea of mediation, we are able to comprehend in one view the full doctrine of salvation as wrought out by him on our behalf. There is indeed a subjective soteriology, which includes especially the work wrought within the soul of man by our Saviour through his spirit, which is expressed in the terms regeneration and sanctification. But objective soteriology, such as we are considering, is summed up rather in the triple phrase of Aquinas,—Christus Legislator, Sacerdos, Rex. To the objectives soteriology, such as we are considering, to the specific references already made in this operation and sanctification, shows us wherein the term justification, which, equally with regeneration and sanctification, shows us wherein the divine salvation consists.

For the literature of the subject, in addition to the specific references already made in this article, see the treatises on systematic divinity mentioned under Dogmatics. E. D. MORRIS.

SOTO, Dominicus de, b. at Segovia in 1494; d. at Salamanca, Nov. 15, 1560. He studied at Alcala and in Paris; began in 1520 to teach philosophy at Alcala, where he re-established realism in its old rights as the true principle of philosophy, and published Commentarii in Aristotelis Dialecticam (Salamanca, 1544), Categories (Venice, 1588), Libri vii. physicorum (Salamanca, 1545), etc. In 1524 he entered the Dominican order, on which occasion he changed his baptismal name Francisius for that of Dominicus; and in 1532 he was appointed the newly founded philosophical faculty of Salamanca. By Charles V. he was sent as a deputy to the Council of Trent in 1545; and there, too, he appeared as a stanch champion of realism, publishing De natura et gratia (Venice, 1547), Apologia (Venice, 1547), etc.; but, after the transference in 1547 of the council to Bologna, he returned to the court, where he was appointed confessor to the emperor. In 1550 he resigned that position, and retired to Salamanca, where he spent the rest of his life, partly as teacher in the university, and partly as prior in a monastery. Among his works from this last part of his life, are commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans (against the Protestants) and on the Gospel of St. Matthew (unprinted), and De justitia et jure, Salamanca, 1556. etc. NEUDECKER.

SOTO, Petrus de, a passionate adversary of the Reformation; b. at Cordova; d. at Trent, April 20, 1503. He entered the Dominican order in 1519, and accompanied Charles V. as confessor to Germany, where he was appointed teacher of theology at Dillingen. Afterwards he went with Philip to England, and taught theology at Oxford; but after the death of Mary, in 1558, he returned to Dillingen, whence he was called in 1561 to the re-opened Council of Trent, Pius IV. He wrote Institutiones Christianae, Augsburg, 1548; Methodus confessionis, Dillingen, 1553; Compendium doctrinae catholicae, Antwerp, 1556; Tractatus de institutione sacerdotum, Dillingen, 1558. etc. NEUDECKER.

SOUL-SLEEP, or PSYCHOPANNYCHISM (from soul-all-night), denotes a peculiar view of the state of the soul between the death and the resurrection of the body, according to which the soul is asleep. It somewhat resembles the still grosser error of soul-death, or thnetopsychism, which was defended by Petrus Pomponatus (d. 1525), and according to which the soul is actually dead from the death of the body to the day of the last judgment. The idea of soul-sleep originated among the Arabian and Armenian sects, but found also some favor in the west; traces of it occur in the writings of the Fathers. It was condemned by the councils of Lyons (1274), Ferrara (1438), Florence (1439), and Trent (1545-63); though Pope John XXII. (d. 1304) accepted it and openly advocated it. In the period of the Reformation it was revived by the Socinians and Armenians, and fully developed by the Anabaptists. Calvin wrote against it in his De psychopannychia, 1531, and in his Tract. van. v. Aard g. and N. See C. F. GÖSCHL. SOULE, Joshua, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. at Bristol, Hancock County, Me., Aug. 1, 1781; d. at Nashville, Tenn., March 6, 1867. He was converted in June, 1797, was licensed to preach the following year, and in 1798 was admitted into the New-England Conference. In 1804 he was appointed presiding elder, and served as such, with one year's exception, until 1816, when he was appointed Book Agent in New-York City. He was the author of the plan for a delegated general conference of the church, which was accepted at Baltimore in 1808. He was editor of the Methodist Magazine from 1816 to 1519. In 1812 he was elected to the episcopacy, but declined to accept the office on the ground that the office of presiding elder had been made, by the General Conference of that year, elective, rather than subject to the appointment of the presiding bishop. In 1820-22 he preached in New-York City, and in 1822-24 in Baltimore. In 1824 he was again elected bishop, and accepted, as the office of presiding elder had now been made again subject to episcopal appointment. After his election to the episcopacy, he resided for some time at Lebanon, Q. In 1842 he went as a fraternal delegate to the British Wesleyan Conference. At the division of the church in 1844, he adhered to the Methodist-Episcopal Church South, and thereupon moved to Nashville, Tenn. He continued active in the discharge of his episcopal duties until about ten years before his death, which occurred in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was a presiding officer of great executive ability. In the graver and more important councils of the church he had no superior for discreet judgment, and prudence in counsel. He was eminently fitted in mind and character for controlling wisely and successfully measures and men. As a preacher he was slow and deliberate, but always sound in doctrine, strong in argument, and vigorous in style. His discourses evinced both breadth and depth, and are said to have been at times overwhelmingly impressive. He was a man of remarkable strength, both of character and of intellect. W. F. TILLETT.

SOUTH, Robert, b. at Hackney, a suburb of London, in 1863; d. in London, July 3, 1738. His father was a wealthy London merchant, who educated his son every advantage for a thorough education. His preparatory studies were pursued in the Westminster School, where he became a king's scholar, under the famous master, Dr. Busby. South is said to have read the Latin prayers in the school on the day of the execution of Charles I., and prayed for him by name; thus early showing that attachment to the established government and religion which ever afterwards distinguished him. In 1651 he was admitted as a student of Christ Church, Oxford, at the same time with John Locke. In 1658 he took the degree of bachelor of arts. During this year he composed a Latin poem congratulating Oliver Cromwell on the peace which he had concluded between England and Holland. As this was a prescribed university exercise, it is not necessary to infer that South was ever a Cromwellian at heart. Indeed, he appears to have been unpopular even then. In 1657, he obtained the degree of master of arts, John Owen, then dean of Christ Church, opposed his application. South was ordained in 1658 by one of the bishops who had been deprived of his bishopric during the Protectorate. In 1660, the year of the restoration of the monarchy, South was elected orator to the university of Oxford, and preached before the royal commission a sermon entitled the \textit{Scribe instructed}, which immediately placed him in the front rank of English preachers. He delivered the university oration when Clarendon was installed Chancellor of Oxford, — a discourse which so impressed Clarendon, that he appointed him his domestic chaplain. This led to his installation, in 1668, as the Prebendary of St. Peter's, Westminster. In the same year he took the degree of doctor in divinity, and in 1670 he made a canon of Christ Church, Oxford. In 1677 South accompanied the son of the Earl of Clarendon, Lawrence Hyde, on an embassy to congratulate John Sobieski upon his election to the crown of Poland. He gave an interesting account of what he saw abroad in a letter to Pococke, the professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and a fellow-canon. Soon after his return to England, in 1678, he was presented to the rectory of Islip in Oxfordshire, which immediately placed him in the frontrank of English preachers. He delivered the activeduties of his calling. His lifewas coloured with sickness and debility which laid him aside from the active duties of his calling. His life was prolonged; and Dean Swift, it is said, waited impatiently, with other aspirants, for his decease, that he might get his prebendary and rectory. South died at the age of eighty-three, and was buried beside his old master, Dr. Busby, in Westminster Abbey.

South's distinction is that of a preacher, and he is second to none in any language. No one has combined and blended logic and rhetoric in more perfect proportions. Every sermon is founded upon a clear and clean plan that can be analyzed, and presented in its parts; and yet every sermon moves forward, from beginning to end, like a flowing stream, without break. He argues closely and rigorously; but the argument never interferes with the fluency and impetuosity of the discourse. The fire of his intellect kindles into a flame all his materials, however heavy and unwieldy. Even such subjects as predestination and the trinity are made popular and interesting by his powerful grasp and handling. And all this is heightened by his remarkable style. His mastery of English is almost unrivalled. The closeness and intimacy of the connection between the thought and the word is hardly excelled even by Shakespeare himself.

South was a Calvinist at a time when the drift of the High-Church Episcopacy, which he favored, set strongly towards Arminianism. Though anti-Puritan, and bitterly so, in regard to polity, both civil and ecclesiastical, he was a Puritan in theology. John Owen was not a higher predestinarian than he, and Richard Baxter was a lower one. It must have been from an intense conviction of the truth of this type of doctrine, that South, in the face of all his prejudices and of his ecclesiastical and courtly connections, defended it with might and main. For this reason, the great anti-Puritan has had, and always will have, warm admirers among Puritans and Nonconformists.

South's Sermons have been often reprinted; e.g., Oxford (1823, 7 vols.), Boston (1867-71, 5 vols.), London (1878, 2 vols.); and in these editions memoirs will be found. A volume of selections, with a memoir entitled \textit{The Wisdom of the Fathers}, appeared in London, 1867. W. G. T. SHEDD.

\textbf{SOUTHWELL.} Robert, poet and martyr; was b. at Horsham, S. F. Church, Norfolk, about 1562; and hanged at Tyburn, Feb. 22, 1595. He was educated at Paris, Douay, Tournay, and Rome; received into the Society of Jesus, Oct. 17, 1578, when not yet seventeen; ordained, 1584, and made prefect of the English college at Rome; sent as a missionary to England, 1586; chaplain to the Countess of Arundel; betrayed to the government, 1692, imprisoned for three years in the Tower, found guilty of "constructive treason," and executed. According to Cecil, he, though "thirteen times most cruelly tortured, cannot be induced to confess any thing, not even the color of the horse whereon, on a certain day, he rode, lest" thereby his friends might fall into the same trouble. His poems were published shortly after his death, and a complete edition appeared 1856, edited by W. B. Turnbull. Some of them, since then widely copied, are of a very high order, and no less philosophic than Christian.

SOZOMENOS, Salamanca Hermias, a contemporary of Socrates; lived, like him, as a scholasticus in Constantinople, and wrote, like him, a history of the church from 325 to 438, edited by Valerius (1695), together with the Eusebius and Socrates, and found in Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque. He seems to have known and used the work by Socrates. What he adds of his own, concerning hermits and monks, is of no great interest. But his style is better than Socrates'.

SPAIN. Christianity penetrated into Spain from North Africa. It is uncertain whether St. Paul carried out his intention to visit Spain. The first Christians were found in Andalusia. The story of the martyrdom of the apostle James at Jerusalem was narrated by the historian of the sixteenth century, and the dean, just as a minister could be deposed only by a synod, and the synods were presided over by the oldest bishop, afterwards by the metropolitan, of the province. Communications with Rome began during the Priscillianist controversy, and became more frequent and intimate after the conquest of Spain by the Visigoths, in 456. The Goths were Arians, and the Orthodox Church naturally sought for support from without. Nevertheless, when the Goths adopted the Catholic faith, at the Third Council of Toledo, 589, the Spanish Church naturally demanded not to speak disparagingly of the Koran and the Prophet, not to marry a Mohammedan woman, not to try to convert a Moallem to Christianity, not to make alliances with the enemies of Islam, etc. They were requested not to wear the same dress as the Mohammedans, not to build their houses higher than the Moallem, not to let their bells be heard, nor their crosses be seen in the street, not to drink wine or eat pork in public, etc. In the north-eastern part of the country, which, since the days of Charlemagne, stood under Christian rule, a peculiar liturgy, the so-called Mozarabic, was in use, until the Roman Liturgy was introduced in Aragonia in 1071, and in Castile in 1086. Between the twelfth and the sixteenth centuries, monasticism spread widely in the country. The Franciscans, who came to Spain from the very first many adherents among the Spaniards, especially among the higher classes; conserved, in the west every department of life; and by their wealth and commercial talent they exercised great influence, even in the Christian states of the country, though they generally ex- cited the hatred of the people by their avarice. As soon, however, as the Christians gained the ascendancy, persecutions were instituted; and in 1492, the year of the conquest of Granada, all Jews were expelled from Spain. Many were converted to Christianity, and remanded in the country; but their conversion was generally nothing but a mask; and, whenever the Inquisition detected the fraud, it was cruelly punished.

Under Arabian rule (711-1492) the Christians were allowed to retain their faith; though very heavy taxes were levied on them,—one-tenth of their revenue on those who submitted without resistance, and one-fifth on those who were subjugated by armed force. They were commanded not to speak disparagingly of the Koran and the Prophet, not to marry a Mohammedan woman, not to try to convert a Moallem to Christianity, not to make alliances with the enemies of Islam, etc. They were requested not to wear the same dress as the Mohammedans, not to build their houses higher than the Moallem, not to let their bells be heard, nor their crosses be seen in the street, not to drink wine or eat pork in public, etc. In the north-eastern part of the country, which, since the days of Charlemagne, stood under Christian rule, a peculiar liturgy, the so-called Mozarabic, was in use, until the Roman Liturgy was introduced in Aragonia in 1071, and in Castile in 1086. teenth and the first part of the nineteenth century, various moves were made in a more liberal direc tion. In 17SU the Inquisition performed the last auto-da-fe, and its office was reduced to the mere censorship of books. In 1835 the Jesuits were expelled, and all monasteries numbering less than twelve monks were closed. But with the concor dat of 1851 a heavy re-action set in. The Virgin was appointed generalissimo of the Spanish army in 1854 ; and in 1861 a number of persons en gaged in the Protestant propaganda, which had its seat in Gibraltar, were seized, and condemned to the galleys. It proved impossible, however, for Queen Isabella to carry out the concordat : it final ly cost her the throne. [The new constitution of 1876 grants toleration, and makes all civil and political rights independent of denomination.
The number of Protestants is hardly 60,000, of a population of nearly 17,000,000.]

HAGENBACH.
SPANGENBERG, Augustus Gottlieb, b. July 15, 1704, at Klettenberg, Prussia; d. Sept. 18, 1792, in the eighty-ninth year of his age, at Berthelsdorf, Saxony; was a bishop of the Mo ravian Church, and, next to Count Zinzendorf (q.v.), its most illustrious leader. He attended the grammar-school at Ilefeld, and the university of Jena, where an exegetical lecture of Buddeus, at which he happened to be present, induced him to give up the study of law, and devote himself to theology. He graduated in 1726 as master of arts, and soon after began to lecture in the uni versity, and occasionally to preach. The free schools in the suburbs of Jena, established by a circle of pious students to which he belonged, en listed his ardent support ; and he was particularly active in training teachers for this work. In 1727 he met Zinzendorf, who made a deep im pression upon him. Their acquaintance soon ripened into a warm friendship ; and, on the occa sion of a visit to Herrnhut (1730), Spangenberg formed a very close fellowship with the Brethren.
His labors at Jena continued to be crowned with great success.
After having declined various advantageous offers, he was induced, in 1732, to accept the position of adjunct of the theological faculty of the university of Halle, and superin tendent of the schools connected with Francke's Orphan-House. But it soon became evident that he was not in sympathy with his colleagues.
They took offence at some of his doctrinal views, at his association with separatists, and especially at the intimate connection which he persisted in keeping up with the Brethren. Complaints were lodged against him, and in 1733 he was dismissed from the university by a royal mandate. He immediately went to Herrnhut, and entered the service of the Moravian Church, laboring in various parts of Germany, in America, in the West Indies, and in England, where be organized (1741) the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen; which association still exists. His work in America was particu larly distinguished. After having been conse crated a bishop in 1744, he stood at the head of the Moravian Church in this country, with occa sional interruptions, until 1762.
He showed himself to be a wise ruler, a faithful pastor, an ardent evangelist.
So prudent was the fore
thought with which he cared for his brethren, both in temporal and spiritual things, that they gave him the name of "Joseph," which he adopted, often signing official documents in this way. Nor was his work confined to his own church. The settlers in various Colonies, and especially tiie Indians, learned to know and revere him as a faithful messenger of the gospel. In 1762 he returned to Europe, took an active part in framing the new constitution of the Brethren's Church, and became the most prominent member of its governing board. The enthusiasm of Zinzendorf, which sometimes led him beyond bounds, was supplemented by the prudence and wisdom of Spangenberg. Among his numerous writings the most important are Idea Fidei Fration, oder Kurzer Begriff der christl. Lehre in den evangel. Brüdergemeinen, Barby, 1782, translated into English by La Trole, and entitled Exposition of Christian Doctrine, London, 1784; and Leben des Grafen von Zinzendorf, 1775, in 8 vols., abridged English translation by Jackson, London, 1838. Spangenberg composed many hymns, some of which are known and used wherever the German tongue is spoken; for instance, Die Kirche Christi wird erweckt (Eng. trans., Moravian Hymnal, No. 612, "The Church of Christ, that he hath hallowed here").


In the controversy with Amyraut, Disputatio de gratia universali, 1646; Epistola ad Matthiam Cottierium, 1647; Exercitationes de gratia universalis, 1644; Exercitatio de gratia universalis, 1646; Epistola ad Matthaeum Cottierium, 1648; Vindicatio exercitationum, 1649. — Friedrich Spahemelt, b. at Amberg in the Upper Palatinate, Jan. 1, 1600; d. at Leyden, April 30, 1648. He studied at Heidelberg and Geneva, visited Paris and England, and was in 1631 appointed professor of theology at Leyden and Neuchâtel, 1835, and Ledderhose's Leben Spangengehens, Heidelberg, 1846, Eng. trans., London, 1855.

SPANHEIM is the name of a family which has produced several noticeable theologians. — Friedrich Spahenmelt, b. at Amberg in the Upper Palatinate, Jan. 1, 1600; d. at Leyden, April 30, 1648. He studied at Heidelberg and Geneva, visited Paris, and was in 1631 appointed professor of theology at Geneva, and in 1641 at Leyden. He was a very prolific writer, and wrote in the controversy with Amyraut, Disputatio de gratia universalis, 1644; Exercitatio de gratia universalis, 1646; Epistola ad Matthaeum Cottierium, 1648; Vindicatio exercitationum, 1649. — Friedrich Spahemelt, son of the preceding; b. at Geneva, May 1, 1632; d. at Leyden, May 18, 1701. He studied theology and philosophy at Leyden, and was appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg in 1655 and at Leyden in 1670. He wrote in defence of Calvin against Descartes and Cocceius. His collected works appeared at Leyden, 1701-03, 3 vols.

SPARROW, William, an eminent theologian of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, United States; descended from a highly respected Irish family; b. in Massachusetts, March 12, 1801. His parents returning to Ireland in 1805, he attended boarding-school in the Vale of Avoca. Returned to America, 1817. In his seventeenth year was appointed principal of Utica Academy; student at Columbia College, New York, 1819-21; professor of Latin and Greek at Miami University, 1824-25; ordained in 1826; colaborer with Bishop Chase in founding Kenyon College; eleven years Missionary at Gambier; professor of systematic divinity and Christian evidences in the Theological Seminary of Virginia, 1840-74; for thirty years delegate to General Convention from Virginia, and chairman of standing committee. Died at Alexandria, Va., Jan. 17, 1874.

During the civil war (1861-64) he carried on the work of the seminary in the interior of Virginia. At its close, some relations to both sections enabled him to exert important influence in restoring the church in Virginia to its former ecclesiastical relations. As he had by the fame of his powers raised the Virginia seminary to an important position, so now his hand was chiefly concerned in its restoration.

Dr. Sparrow was recognized as the ablest theologian and the most original thinker of the evangelical school, a great leader in the church. His acute and powerful intellect, enriched by accurate learning, and strengthened by patient thought, moved with freedom among the profoundest questions of metaphysics and of theology. He bowed with unquestioning faith to the supremacy of Scripture, yet he welcomed modern criticism as an ally; and all his thinking proceeded on the conviction of the ultimate harmony of revelation and science. As a great teacher, and many of the best minds in the church have acknowledged their indebtedness to his suggestive and stimulating instruction. He was an earnest Episcopalian, but he put doctrine before order: hence he felt himself at one with Protestant Christendom, and rejoiced in the Evangelical Alliance as an expression of Protestant unity. He earnestly maintained the scriptural character of the Prayer-Book, but desired a revision, to remove ambiguities, and to relieve weak consciences. Accordingly, though he sympathized with the difficulties of Bishop Cummins, he deprecated his secession, and remained firm in his adherence to the church. Perhaps no man of his time in America did more to check the spread of the tractarian theology.

He was also an earnest antagonist of the dogma of a tactual apostolical succession, holding it to be essentially unscriptural and anti-Protestant. To his great intellectual powers he added the influence of exalted piety, a character of great modesty and humility, and a life of simplicity and self-denial. He sealed his deep interest in Christian missions by the cheerful surrender to the Chinese mission of a daughter of remarkable talents. His lifelong feebleness of health, combined with an almost morbid aversion to appearing in print, unhappily prevented his entering the field of authorship; but a number of his occasional sermons and addresses saw the light, and a posthumous volume of Sermons appeared in 1876, New York (T. Whittaker). The spirit of his teaching and of his life is well

He entered the Society of Jesus in 1610; taught grammar, philosophy, and morals in the Jesuit college in Cologne; was for several years engaged in the persecution of witches, and led more than two hundred of them to the stake; and worked during the last years of his life as a missionary among the Protestants of Northern Germany. He published a book, Cautio criminalis, against the common method of trying witches, but is chiefly known as a religious poet.—Trutz-Nachtigal, Cologne, 1649 (edited by Godecke and Tittmann, 1879); and Guldene Tugendbuch, probably published in the same year (last ed., Coblenz, 1850). Selections from these two collections of poems have been made by W. Smets and Karl Förster. See Diehl: Spee, Esquisse biographique et litteraire, 1873. PALMER.

SPENER, John, D.D., Church of England; b. at Bucton-under-Blean, Kent, 1630; d. at Cambridge, May 27, 1695. He was graduated M.A. at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, 1652, and elected fellow 1655. Ten years later he became D.D.; on Aug. 3, 1667, master of his college, and in the same year archdeacon of Sudbury. In 1672 he was made prebendary of Ely, and dean of Ely 1677. His fame rests upon his De legibus Hebraeorum ritualibus et eorum rationibus, Cambridge, 1685, 2 vols. fol.; reprinted, The Hague (1705), Cambridge (1727), edited by L. Chappelow; reprinted, Tübingen, 1732, ed. C. M. Pfaff. In the two editions last-mentioned the fourth book, left in manuscript by the author, for the first time appears. The object of this very learned book is to show that Jewish law and ritual are in origin independent of those of surrounding nations, and expressly designed to fix a gulf between the Jews and their neighbors. Yet Spencer has been accused by Witsius, in his Egyptiaca, and by Archbishop Magee, in his Atomeum, of maintaining the hypothesis of the Egyptian origin of the Jewish ritual. His most famous work, Spencer wrote A discourse concerning prodigies, London, 1663, 2d ed. with Discourse concerning vulgar prodigies, London, 1665; Dissertatio de Urin et Thummin, Cambridge, 1689 (a comprehensive work upon several obscure Bible matters, e.g., Hebrew usages and purifications, circumcision, music, dancing, and burials).

SPENER, Philipp Jakob. Among the theologians of the seventeenth century, Spener was the purest and most spotless in character, and the most successful in his work. He was born Jan. 13, 1635, in Rappoltstein, in Upper Alsace, and d. at Berlin, Feb. 5, 1705. But as both father and mother came from Strassburg, and he himself was chiefly educated in that city, Spener usually called himself a Strassburger. With justice, he is counted among those who retained their baptismal grace, and in harmony continued to develop their Christian life. This natural piety was nourished by congenial family associations, by his relations to the noble widow of the Count of Rappoltstein, and by his study of the ascetic productions of Arndt, as also of Sonthom, Baile, Dykes, Baxter, and other English writers at that time much read along the Rhine. His principal instructor, and the spiritual forerunner of the D.D., was the famous preacher at Rappoltstein, Joachim Stoll, who in 1645 became his brother-in-law. "I owe to him among men the first sparks of Christianity," says Spener. On Stoll, cf. Rührich: Mittheilungen aus der evang. Kirche des Elsasses, 1855, iii. p. 321.

After being thus privately prepared, the pious youth in 1651 entered the university of Strassburg. According to his own statements, he lived a retired life, devoting himself entirely to his books. His theological leaders were Dorsche, Dannhaner, Johann Schmid, Sebastian Schmid. The first-named, a strict Lutheran theologian, Spener called his "preceptor:" the last-named was the most famous exegete of his day; and in Johann Schmid Spener saw his "father in Christ." In accordance with the custom of the day, a peregrinatio academica completed his course of studies. He first went to Basel to sit at the feet of the younger Buxtorf, at that time the most celebrated teacher of Hebrew. Then he spent a year in Geneva, which long stay tended to widen the mental horizon of the young Lutheran theologian; and he found much to praise in the organization of the Reformed Church as there represented. Labadie's fiery eloquence so influenced him, that he translated his Manuel de prêtre into German.

In 1661, in company with his pupil, the young Count of Rappoltstein, he paid a visit to Würtemberg, and remained there five months. His qualities of mind and heart gained him many friendships in Stuttgart and Tübingen; and his permanent employment in Württemberg was only frustrated by a call to become pastor in Strassburg in 1668. He secured a situation which gave him leisure as a magistrate to deliver various courses of lectures at the university on history and philosophy.

In 1666 he received a call to become pastor and senior in Frankfurt-am-Main; and, after consultation with his political and ecclesiastical superiors, he accepted this vocation, so honorable for a man but thirty-one years of age. He endeavored to awaken a consistent and live Christianity in the Frankfort churches, but was prevented to a great extent by the senate and city government. Cf. Bedenken, iii. pp. 105, 215, iv. 68. He first attempted to revive a thorough system of catechetical instructions, which had so fallen into decay. Mechanical memorizing was the first object of his attack; and, to effect his reformation in this regard, he published his Einfällige Erklärung der christl. Lehre, 1677, and of studiis eorum, 1678, in 108 tablets, in 1083. In his sermons his chief object was to inculcate purity of doctrine; but he no longer considered himself bound to confine himself to the pericopes; his endeavors being to make his congregation acquainted with the contents of the whole Scriptures. Then he brought about a more thorough preparation for the first reception of the Lord's Supper in connection with confirmation. He was successful, however, only in the country congregations. Cf. Bedenken, iii. 395. For a reformation of church discipline he could do little or nothing. His sermons, always mild, exerted a vast power. Although chiefly of a didactic character, yet they were marked by experience, and a deep knowledge of Scriptures; and his influence began to extend far beyond the boundaries of Frankfurt. Even his polemics against mechanical Christianity were not aggressive or challenging. Yet in 1669 a sermon on the false righteousness of the Pharisees caused a division between the earnest and the careless members of his flock, and in 1670 the former effected a closer union among themselves. The result was an organization, at first only of a few, for practical religious purposes. It met at first in Spener's study, and read different ascetic works, considered the last sermon, and the like. Soon assemblies were held in other houses also. In 1682 Spener succeeded in receiving permission to hold these meetings in the church, which somewhat changed their character.

Spener's days in Frankfurt were pleasant. He says, "In the honorable ministerium of Frankfurt, during the twenty years I was its senior, the God of peace kept us in brotherly harmony." His own character and nature contributed most to bring about this state of affairs. He continued to take his strict theology of Scripture, and thus did not as yet give any offence. In 1675 he published his famous Pia Desideria. In them he lamented the corruption of the Evangelical Church, and recommends six different remedies. His Desideria were an earnest word to his church, and found an echo in many hearts in Germany. Only in Strassburg did they meet with a cool reception. More injurious to Spener's reputation were his later writings, the Pia Desideria of 1677, which reared anew the old controversy looking toward a separation from the church, and thus "Pietists" gradually was regarded as the name of a sect. Among others, Spener's former friend, Mentzer, the court-preacher in Darmstadt, now became his enemy. Dilfeld, in Nordhausen, in 1679, published his Theosophia Horatio-Speneriana, in which he maintained that regeneration was not necessary for true theology. Spener answers in his Gottesgelahrlich, etc., and they did not as yet give any offence. In 1675 he published his famous Pia Desideria. Dilfeld, in Nordhausen, in 1679, published his Theosophia Horatio-Speneriana, in which he maintained that regeneration was not necessary for true theology. Spener answers in his Gottesgelahrlich, etc., and this controversy ended. Spener himself strongly opposed the separatist tendency among his followers, especially in his Die Klagen über das verdorblene Christentum, Missbrauch und rechter Gebrauch, 1684.

Spener had thus labored with great success in Frankfurt for twenty years, when in 1686 a call to become court-preacher, and member of the consistory at Dresden, usually regarded at that time as the highest ecclesiastical position in Germany, was extended to him. This was done at the special request of the elector, George III., who had seen and heard Spener, and learned his upright character through personal experience. The latter modestly put a low estimate on his Frankfurt work, and had no great plans for his labors at the Saxon court. His departure from Frankfurt on the 10th of July, 1686, was a day of sorrow for the whole city.

The new position indeed offered the possibility of greater influence and power than he exerted in Frankfurt, but this was measured by the personal influence over the elector. To gain this over the warlike George III. was not an easy task, as Spener soon discovered (Bedenken, ii. 762). The first opposition to Spener came from Leipzig. The theologians at this university—such as Olearius, Carpzov, and Alberti—were indeed no longer representatives of the iron-clad orthodoxy in vogue at the beginning of the century, and even were anxious for practical piety; but many reasons aroused them against Spener. He was a stranger, and had obtained a situation which was the object of high ambition; and he had induced the consistory to censure the theological faculty for neglecting exegetical studies. When, then, the collegium philobiblicum, commenced in Leipzig for the purpose of studying the Scriptures in the original tongues, through Francke, Anton, Schade, and others, developed into German collegia biblica, in which laymen also took part, and which entered into closer relationship with Spener, Carpzov began to preach against the "Pietists." He was seconded by Alberti, formerly Spener's good friend; and when, in 1688, Spener's relative, Thomasius, published satires on the clergy,—and especially on Carpzov, Alberti, and Pfeifer,—Spener was accused of being responsible for these. In Dresden itself, Spener's zeal and conscientious firmness as confessor of the wild elector caused him trouble, and finally brought about his removal to Berlin. He attempted to re-introduce catechetical instructions extensively, instructed the children himself, and for this reaped ridicule and abuse. The elector soon lost his interest in his court-preacher, seldom listened to his sermons, and avoided confession. When Spener, in his concern for his prince's spiritual welfare, wrote a letter to him, the displeasure of the sovereign fell upon him. The prince declared that "he could not longer endure the sight of Spener, and would have to change his residence on his account." The sudden death of George III. indeed showed no interest in his work; and, chiefly through his influence, Breitaupt, Francke, and Anton, the later leaders of the pietistic movement, were made members of the theological faculty at Halle. In all church troubles, not only at Berlin, but also elsewhere, his voice was ever in favor of peace. His colleague Schade, through his inability to distinguish between use and abuse, had in blind zeal... condemned private confessions in toto, and it was with great difficulty that Spener could allay the storm. Later he complains that his greatest sorrows had been caused, not by his enemies, but by his inconsiderate friends. And from abroad now came the accusations that Spener was the source of the many fanatical sects springing up everywhere. For a while he had to go into hiding, but with the thorough theological discussions of previous decades, was entirely of a personal and rancorous character: no means were too low for the purpose. The masterpiece among these libels is the Christolutherische Vorstellung . . . etc., published by the entire Wittenberg faculty in 1695. No less than two hundred and eighty-three heretics, he himself entered into his final rest, in that direction.

In an indirect way he was drawn into another controversy of the church. The movement inaugurated by Calixtus had assumed a Romeward tendency; and several prominent teachers in Königsberg, and others, were strongly inclining in that direction. The elector authorized Spener, in conjunction with two other prominent theologians, to defend the Evangelical Church against the accusations of this new movement. This he did in a thorough manner in his Der evangel. Kirche Reitett vor falsetten Beschuldigungen, 1695; which work produced a marked effect. Two years later, however, Spener experienced the grief of seeing his former pupil, Frederick August of Saxony, join the Roman Church.

Spener did not live to see the victory in Berlin of the movement he represented. This took place when the king of Prussia in 1708 took as his third wife Sophia Louisa von Mecklenburg. Under the leadership of the court-preacher, Porst, prayer-meetings were held even in the royal castle, in which the king at times would participate. Just after having finished his work on dogmatics, entitled Von der ewigen Gotttheit Christi, the noble teacher, who had been the guide for so many unto righteousness, himself entered into his final rest, Feb. 5, 1705. His death-bed scene and end are described by the eye-witness v. Canstein. Blankenburg, his former assistant, was appointed his successor. Spener's wife, a lady from Strassburg, was one with him in mind and soul. Of his eleven children, eight survived him; but not all of these caused him joy.

In theological culture Spener was equal to any of his contemporaries. His sermons and polemical works show that he was a thorough exegete. In systematic theology he rived the best of his day, but did not depart from the formalistic and logical method of treating the dogmas so common at that time. Of the defects in his style and rhetoric, he himself was conscious. It was his principle to submit to the confessions of the church. Calovius himself acknowledged that he had found nothing heterodox in Spener; and, in fact, such is the case: he is in perfect harmony with the great Lutheran theologians, Gerhard, Meissner, Meyfart, V. Andrea, etc., whom he constantly cites. Only the abuses in the church, such as confidence in the opus operatum, the misuse of the confessional, the one-sided doctrine of faith and justification, in contrast with his attack. He came to the conviction that purity of doctrine and pureness of life did not always go together, although he did not deny that departure from the truth would bring with it a departure from a proper Christian life.

He saw in the Reformed Church errors, "in theory rather than in practice" (Bedenken, iv. 490), and hence was charitable in his judgment of it. Further, it was Spener's endeavor to bring the so-called third estate, the laity, into active co-operation in the service and government of the church. This was, indeed, the theory of the Reformation, but had not been practised. Personally, Spener cannot but excite admiration. Mildness, humility, and love may be regarded as the chief features of his character; but with these he joined manliness and courage. He never over against his bitterest enemies, which fact Spener attributes to the influence of a kind Providence. This himself was conscious. It was his love and Beaulie (1596), in which "may be found the germ of Paradise Lost, including the epitome Speratus.

Spices among the Hebrews. By spice, especially aromatics are meant, which the Israelites used in common life. The common word for these aromatics is besamim: another term seems to be neshek (1 Kings x. 25). The terms rokah, rikuchar, merkachah, mirkachath, signify longing here have already been treated, as Balm for the preparation of incense and salves, were more especially salves prepared from aromatics; it seems to be neshek (1 Kings x. 25). The terms koshet, the costus-root. Another ingredient was the calamus (kanch bosem, also kanach ha-tob, Exod. xxx. 23; Jer. vi. 20; Isa. xliii. 24) and karkom, or saffron, only mentioned in Cant. iv. 14. To the reservoirs and balmy spices already mentioned we may perhaps add the nekoh (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11), some kind of gum; the ilnach, or poplar (Gen. xxx. 57), by some regarded as the storax-trees: another name, alom, grows at the foot of the Himalayan Mountains. The Phenicians imported this perfume to the West, and thus it came also to Palestine. Less precious than the Indian was the Syrian, especially well prepared at Tarassus, which was composed of oils, most of which also belonged to aromatic plants of the valeriana family. It was said in small boxes (Mat. iv. 3), and was carried in smelling-bottles. It was used only as salve, but also for seasoning the wine. With such precious nard, Mary of Bethany anointed the Saviour six days before the passover (John xii. 1). This oil was also used for the purpose of preserving the dead. The name “nard” is of Sanscrit origin, and points to the home of the plant: it denotes “giving an odor.” Besides these different species, the Bible mentions the following spices. Aloes (Num. xxv. 6; Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14; Ps. xlv. 8; John xix. 39), a fragrant wood (hence aloeh-wood) growing in India, where it is called agill. The Europeans call it lignum aquile [i.e., eagle-wood]. The wood is resinous, of a dark color, heavy. The Indians regard the aloes-trees as holy. Another aromatic wood is the algam from Ophir (1 Kings x. 11 sq.); it seems to be the scrub named neshak, which the rabbis explain, but probably sandal-wood. Besides the wood we must also mention the bark of different trees growing in India, and which the Hebrews at a very early period counted among the spices; thus especially the cinnamon (Exod. xxx. 23, where it is enumerated as one of the ingredients employed for the preparation of the holy anointing oil). It also occurs Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14; Rev. xvii. 13. The home of the cinnamon is Ceylon. According to Nees von Esenbeck (Disp. de cinnamono, Bonn, 1823), the cassia was not a distinct species, but only a wild or original form of the Cinnamomum Ceylonicum. There are two Hebrew words rendered “cassia,” — kidah and keisah,— which were among the ingredients of the holy incense, according to the rabbis. To these aromatics belongs also the koshet, the costus-root. Another ingredient was the calamus (kanach bosem, also kanak ha-tob, Exod. xxx. 23; Jer. vi. 20; Isa. xliii. 24) and karkom, or saffron, only mentioned in Cant. iv. 14. To the resinous and balmy spices already mentioned we may perhaps add the nekoh (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11), some kind of gum; the ilnach, or poplar (Gen. xxx. 57), by some regarded as the storax-trees: another name, alom, grows in Greece, Asia Minor, and Palestine, — the Pistacia lenticus. It is extensively used in the East in the preparation of spirits, as a sweetmeat, as a masticatory for preserving the gums and teeth, as an anti-spasmodic in medicine. To the spices we may also add the cypresse-branch (kopher, A. V., camphire, but in the margin cypress, Cant. i. 14, iv. 15), carried by the Mourners, not “water.” The powdered leaves, which are mixed with the juice of citrons, are used to stain therewith the hair and nails. The sirapad, in Isa. vi. 13, translated “brier,” is, according to some (Eichhorn, Ewald), the white mustard. Finally, we mention the gourd (kikayon, Jon. iv. 6-10), whose growth was miraculous: it is the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant. In the Talmud the castor-oil is mentioned, prepared from the seed of the ricinus.
SPIERA, Francesco, the unfortunate man, who, for worldly considerations, denied his Protestant profession, and in consequence died in a condition of maddened despair and remorse; was b. at Citadella, near Padua, Italy, about 1498; d. there December, 1548. A lawyer and public official in his native city, greatly honored, rich, and ardently devoted to the pursuit of wealth, he accepted the message of the Reformation; and experiencing peace, comfort, and joy in a remarkable degree, according to his own account, he preached everywhere, on the streets and in private, to his fellow-townsmen. He studied the Scriptures carefully. His change of life produced a great excitement. He was accused by the priest of the town at Rome. When Spiera learned that he was about to be summoned to appear before the papal authorities, he lost courage, and went of his own free will, but only after a terrible struggle with his conscience, to Venice, to confess repentance to the papal legate, della Casa. He subscribed a confidential document which the legate drew up, and read a similar document, recanting the doctrines of the Reformation, in the church of Citadella, before two thousand people. No sooner, however, had he arrived at his own home than he was overcome by the most terrible fears of the judgment and eternal condemnation. He could not leave his bed, lost his appetite, attempted several times to take his own life, was carried to Padua, but brought back to Citadella, and died a few days afterwards in despair. These experiences, and the manner of Spiera's death, produced an intense excitement. Spiera believed he had committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and refused all the consolations drawn from the consideration of the divine mercy. He held he belonged to the school of Beelzebub; and, in his terrible consciousness of a fly buzzed about his head, which was sent by Satan to awaken Italy. He regarded Spiera as one of those who deceive themselves with the message of the Reformation; and experiencing peace, comfort, and joy in a remarkable degree, according to his own account, he preached everywhere, on the streets and in private, to his fellow-townsmen. He studied the Scriptures carefully. His change of life produced a great excitement. He was accused by the priest of the town at Rome. When Spiera learned that he was about to be summoned to appear before the papal authorities, he lost courage, and went of his own free will, but only after a terrible struggle with his conscience, to Venice, to confess repentance to the papal legate, della Casa. He subscribed a confidential document which the legate drew up, and read a similar document, recanting the doctrines of the Reformation, in the church of Citadella, before two thousand people. No sooner, however, had he arrived at his own home than he was overcome by the most terrible fears of the judgment and eternal condemnation. He could not leave his bed, lost his appetite, attempted several times to take his own life, was carried to Padua, but brought back to Citadella, and died a few days afterwards in despair. These experiences, and the manner of Spiera's death, produced an intense excitement. Spiera believed he had committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and refused all the consolations drawn from the consideration of the divine mercy. He held he belonged to the number of those who were lost, and lost eternally. "Oh, if I were only greater than God! for I know he will not have mercy upon me," he exclaimed. In his assurance that God had forsaken him, he had the most painful visions. Devils surrounded him, stuck needles into his pillow; and, in his terrible consciousness of sin, he often roared like a lion, causing those about him to tremble.

Criticising the history of Spiera, we come to the conclusion, that in spite of his preaching the gospel, and laying claim to the finest Christian profession, aud consequent development, he was never truly penitent for his sins. He proceeded to accept the doctrine of justification by faith, but did not accompany his profession by a forsaking of sin. Calvin and the other Reformers took a deep interest in the case; and Calvin, who wrote a preface (December, 1549) to the account of Henricus Scotus, regarded his sufferings and remorse as a terrible judgment of God, sent to awaken Italy. He regarded Spiera as one of those who were not destitute of punishment, but he was consoled with the belief that they are of the predestinate, when they are not. There have been other cases similar to that of Spiera, as Henry IV. of France. Other cases are mentioned in Coquerel: Hist. des Eglises du Desert. Spiera is to be looked upon as one of the negative evidences for the truth of Protestantism. We have no instance of any pervert from the Roman-Catholic Church to Protestantism having a similar experience. There are several accounts of Spiera's life and death. Those of Vérgerius, Grolladus (professor of law at Padua), Henricus Scottus, and Gklois (professor of philosophy at Padua), are contained in the work Francisci Spieræ historia, a quatuor summis viris summa jude composita, cum clariss. vironum praefationibus, Celis S. C. et Jo. Calcini, et Petri Pauli Vergerii Apologia, accessit quoque Martini Borrhæ de usu, quem Spiera tux esemplum, tum doctrinae affecta judicium. SPIFAME, Jacques Paul, Sieur de Passy, b. in Paris, 1592; beheaded at Geneva, March 23, 1566. He studied law in his native city, and was in the course of a brilliant career as councillor to the Parliament, when he suddenly broke off, and entered the service of the Church. In this field, too, he made a brilliant career; became vicar-general to the Cardinal of Lorraine, whom he accompanied to the Council of Trent; and in 1548 made bishop of Nevers. But in 1553 he resigned his see in favor of his nephew, and went to Geneva, where he embraced the Reformation movement of the reasons for his move, to Catherine de Gasperne, a married woman whom he had seduced, and who lived with him after the death of her husband. At Geneva they were married, and Spifame was ordained a minister of the Reformed Church, and appointed pastor of Issoudun. In 1562 he went to Francfort as the ambassador of the Prince of Condé; and in 1564 he went to Pau as an agent of the Queen of Navarre, Jeanne d'Albret. But he made the queen his irreconcilable enemy by saying that her son, Henry IV., was not the son of Anton of Bourbon, but of Merlin; and on his return to Geneva he was arrested. During the investigation, some forgery with respect to his own marriage was proved against him; and he was sentenced to death, and beheaded.

Spinola, Cristoval Rojas de, a Roman Catholic unionist; d. March 12, 1695; a native of Spain, and general of the Franciscan order in Madrid; came to Vienna as confessor to the wife of Leopold I., a Spanish princess, and was made bishop of Wienerich-Neustadt in 1685. A peaceable union between the Protestant churches and the Church of Rome was the great idea of his life; and the religious indifference of the Protestant courts in Germany, the disgust of the higher classes at confessional controversies, the mild character of the school of Helmstedt, etc., made, for a time his exertions look successful. A conference took place in 1683. Spinola presented his Regula circa Christianorum omnium ecclesiasticam reunionem, and the Helmstedt theologians, their Methodus reducendi uniones, etc. But, though the Emperor and the Pope were in favor of the scheme, serious Roman Catholics considered Spinola a fool, and serious Protestants were scandalized at Molanus. The negotiations, however, continued after the death of Spinola. See LEHNNITZ and MOLANUS.

SPINOZA, Baruch de, b. at Amsterdam, Nov. 24, 1632; d. at The Hague, Feb. 21, 1677. His parents were Jews who had been driven from Portugal by religious persecution. His teacher in Hebrew was the celebrated rabbi, Saul Levi Marteira, who introduced him to the study of the Bible and the Talmud; besides, he studied Latin under the celebrated physician, Franz van der Ende. Differences between his views and the Jewish doctrine were soon noticed, and so he was expelled from the Jewish communion on account of "frightful heresies." He left Amsterdam, and lived in the vicinity from 1650 to 1690, then at Rhynsberg and Voorburg, near The Hague. Finally he settled at The Hague; residing there to the end of his life, and supporting himself by grinding lenses. In 1673 he refused to take a call as professor of philosophy to Heidelberg, saying that he might be hindered there in his liberty of philosophy.

Clearness and calmness are the main features of his character. He was never seen laughing, nor very sad, but kind and gentle to all. Free from hypocrisy, a man of few wants, he was the image of a true sage.

His writings are, Renati Descartes Principiorum philosophiae, pars i. et ii., etc, Amstelodami apud Joh. Rieuwertz, 1663; Tractatus theologico-politicus, Hamburgi apud Henricum Künraht, 1670; Baruch de Spinoza's Opera posthuma, Amsterdam, apud Joh. Rieuwertz, 1677, containing Ethica ordine geometrico demonstrata, etc., Tractatus politicus, Tractatus de intellectus emendatione, Epistolae; Baruch de Spinoza traci. de Deo et homine ejusque felicitate (recently discovered); The unfinished Essays of Spinoza, ed. Hugo Ginsberg, Heidelberg, 1882. We shall only consider here the Ethics and the Tractatus theologico-politicus as the most important works for philosophy and theology.

Spinoza, the second great philosopher in the course of the purely rationalistic development of modern philosophy, stands in very close connection to his great predecessor, Descartes. The fundamental notion of Spinoza's system is the notion of substance, which is thus defined: "By substance I understand that which is in itself, and which is conceived by itself; i.e., the conception of which does not need the conception of another thing in order to be formed. There is but one substance, which is identical with God. We cannot predicate anything of it, as omnis determinatio est negatio, and the infinite cannot contain any negation, because it is the absolute affirmation of existence." All predicates used by Spinoza are attributes of substance. Substance cannot be comprehended by its mere existence, but only by attributes, which are what reason perceives as constituting the essence of substance. The attributes, therefore, belong only to our mind, not to substance itself, which cannot admit any determination, i.e., negation. Our mind may therefore ascribe a number of attributes to substance. Spinoza, however, considers substance only under the attributes of thought and extension. The cause of these two attributes is not in God, but in the human mind, which finds both thought and extension in itself. The attributes are independent of each other, and must be conceived per se, not by substance; as the notion of attributes is not dependent on the notion of substance, which excludes every determination. Res cogitans and res extensa are the same thing, i.e., considered from different stand-points; but it is indifferent to substance how it is considered.

The notion of substance, being but one, seems to imply that substance = every thing existing, i.e., the world. But how can the finite proceed from the infinite? This question is senseless according to Spinoza, because the finite, as the finite, does not exist; for all determination is non esse, and the finite is determination. The finite things have real being only as far as they are in God, in whom omnia sunt simul natura. This produces the third important notion,—the notion of "modes or affections." Modes are nothing in themselves: they are, like the waves of the ocean. There is nothing existing outside of God, and it would be absurd to say that God was composed of modes. It is false, therefore, to say of Spinoza that he taught God and the world were identical, because we can conceive of the world only as being composed of single objects. Single objects do, therefore, not exist as such, but only as modifications and accidents of substance.

There is a threefold mode of considering things. The first kind of cognition, which he calls opinio or imaginatio, is cognition through unregulated experience or signs, by which we connect certain ideas. The second kind of cognition, ratio, is cognition through the peculiarities of things, and notiones communes. The third kind of cognition is the intuitive knowledge of the mind, or true knowledge. Looking at the world through imagination, it appears to us as being composed of real things; and so we have the idea of a natura naturata, i.e., of a world. But it is the nature of our mind to know things as necessary or external; and substance considered in this way, i.e., the true way, produces the idea of a natura naturans.

There is no relation between both, not even the relation of causality. Spinoza, speaking, however, of causality, means an immanency of causality. God is therefore only the substance, or the substratum of objects.

As will is but a mode, it is self-evident that God cannot act with free will; everything follows from his necessity, i.e., from the absolute power. It is foolish to assume that God acts according to aims, for this means to subject him to something else. The basis of his being is the basis of his acting. The law of causality rules, however, in the natura naturata.

In like manner as substance is conceived under the modes of thought and extension, single objects must be conceived, because they are modes of thought and extension; for the world is either a material world, or a world of ideas. Being modes of the same substance, they must stand in accordance, so that the order and connection of ideas is identical with the order and connection of things. A thing is, however, caused only by a thing, and not by an ideal idea; though by an idea, or an idea by a thing. This is true of all single modes, which are things or ideas according to the way they are considered. All things are therefore animated, but they differ in the grade of animation. Body and soul are, according to this, identical, considered under different modes. Ideas of the same kind are derived from the body, and the body cannot act upon the mind. But, as there is an idea of the human body, there is also an idea of the soul, or the idea of the idea.

The individual man is therefore nothing but a mode of the divine substance. The human mind may thus be called a part of the divine reason, and we can say that all intellects together form the infinite intellect. Man, being a case, the mode of substance, stands in an endless series of causes. His will as a modification of the body is therefore also determined. Men think to be free because they are not conscious of the determining causes. Will is the faculty to affirm or deny; this is again determined by the idea of that to which the spirit is to be affirmed. Ideas of the body and intellect are therefore identical. We are active when any thing happens of which we are the adequate cause; passive, however, if any thing happens of which we are not, or only partly, the cause. The mind is therefore active only when having adequate ideas; passive, when having inadequate ideas. The mind and the spirit are therefore considered in the imagination. The endeavor to become free from this, and to reach a state of perfection, is called will, or, speaking of the body, appetite.

The transition of the mind to greater perfection is joy: the opposite is sadness. Joy accompanied by the idea of its external cause is love; sadness accompanied by its external cause is hatred. All other passions are derived from these. The sovereignty of man consists in his inability to control his passions. The common conceptions of good and evil are wrong. These terms denote nothing positive which exists in themselves, but are conceptions and notions which result from our conceiving of things. The evil, or sin, is nothing but the passion of our mind which is not known as an eternal being. God, being superior to all passions, can, strictly taken, neither love nor hate; and whosoever wishes to be loved by God wishes that God should cease to be God. But, as our ideas are really thoughts of God, we may say that our love to God is a part of God's infinite love to himself. Our blessedness and freedom consist in this eternal love of God, and in this sense we may say that man is eternal (immortal).

The idea of eternity has nothing to do with time or duration. Knowing things under the third form of cognition, man will be free of his passions, and will not fear death, because his spirit is eternal. This eternal part of his body is the soul, or the immaterial part of his spirit. This is the soul that is contained in our imagination. Even if we knew nothing of our eternity, virtue and piety would be our aim, for blessedness is not the reward of virtue, but virtue in itself is blessedness.

These are the outlines of Spinoza's philosophy as contained in his Ethics, the principal work of his mind under God in his life.

The Tractatus theologico-politicus, one of his earlier essays, was probably caused by his personal experience, and is very important as a defence of liberty of thought.

The difference of men is nowhere more distinctly shown than in their opinions, especially their religious opinions. It must be left, therefore, to the judgment of every individual to believe whatever he wants, as long as his belief produces good works; for the State has not to care for the opinions of men, but for their actions. Faith, religion, and theology have no theoretical importance or truth: their object is an entirely practical one, i.e., to bring those men who are not ruled by reason to obedience, virtue, and blessedness. It is the object of philosophy to give truth. Philosophy and theology have nothing in common. The reason for their difference is the following: God as the object of religion is a human being, i.e., he is represented in his relation to man; while God as the object of philosophy is not a human being, i.e., he is considered in relation to himself. Holy Scripture does not give a definition of God: it only reveals to us the attributes of justice and love. This is a clear proof that philosophical knowledge of God cannot serve as a model for human life. God is represented in Scripture to the imagination as a ruler, as just, gracious, etc. Philosophy, which deals with clear notions, cannot make use of these attributes. Theology has, therefore, no right to rule over philosophy, as the result of such a domination will be fanaticism without peace. That will, of course, undermine the foundations of the State, and the State should not allow the encroachments of theology.

His Biblical criticisms and views on the person... of Christ, contained in this essay, are also of great interest.

The logical fallacies and other defects in the system of Spinoza have been frequently pointed out. The principal objections to be made are the following. The idea of substance is motionless, and insufficient for an explanation of growth and life: the modes stand, therefore, in hardly any connection with substance, and thus do not fulfil what they are intended for. The practical philosophy, although grandly drawn, does not cover the substance of the social, artistic, and ethical life of man: nevertheless, the system, and especially the sublime idea of substance, has had the greatest influence upon modern philosophy. Fichte, Schelling, Schleiermacher, Hegel, and many others, owe very much to Spinoza. And many of the thoughts expressed in the Tractatus theologico-politicus, for which he was persecuted by the theologians of his time, are to-day accepted as true by theology. The old reproach of atheism, contained in this essay, are also of great interest.

The theological minority entered a formal protest, whence their name, Protestants.—III. The third diet was opened Feb. 9, 1542; and the emperor confirmed the peace of Ratisbon (1541) in order to get the necessary subsidies against the Turks. — IV. The fourth diet was opened by the emperor in person, Feb. 20, 1544; and again the Turkish affairs compelled the emperor to concede toleration in religious matters. SPIRIT, THE HUMAN, IN THE BIBLICAL SENSE. The biblical terms for “soul” are נפש, נдачи; and for “spirit,” נח, נ drvma. We owe the conception of the human spirit, as, indeed, of spirit in general, to the Sacred Scriptures, to the religion of revelation. It is peculiar to these to speak of נ drvma in the psychological sense as the cause of the human existence, particularly of his personal life. Where the Scriptures speak of the spirit of man in its widest acceptance, that is, of life (as in Job x. 12, xvii. 1; Ezek. xxxvii. 8; Zech. xii. 1), and ascribe to men and animals the same spirit (as in Eccles. iii. 19 sqq.; II. Pet. ii. 10 sqq.), the term נ drvma has been abolished, that a rigid censorship of books should be established, and that every preacher who did not recognize the real presence in the sacrament should be excluded from the pulpit. Against these decrees the evangelical minority entered a formal protest, whence their name, Protestants.—III. The third diet was opened March 15, 1528, under very different circumstances. Francis I. was suing for peace, and the Turkish hordes had retired. The Roman-Catholic prelates consequently urged the emperor to conciliate the Protestants; and, while the scholars at the diet were open to receive the North German and English representatives, the emperor was anxious to have the fathers of the Reformation. — I. The first diet was opened June 26, 1526. The situation was very trying to the emperor. Francis I. had just broken the peace of Madrid with the consent of the Pope, and the Turks were threatening in the East. Under those circumstances the emperor dropped the religious question altogether, and left to the states to manage it as they could best defend before God, until a council, ecumenical or national, should finally settle it. — II. SPIRIT.
it is never said that the spirit dies, but that the soul dies (Num. xxxi. 19; Judg. xvi. 30; Matt. x. 28; Mark iii. 15). Only the soul is the subject of will and desire, inclination, pleasure and disgust (cf. Deut. xii. 20, xiv. 26; 1 Sam. ii. 16; Job xxxii. 18; Ps. xlii. 2, lxiii. 1; Prov. xxi. 10; Isa. xxvi. 8; Mic. vii. 1, etc.). But soul and spirit are alike the subject of perception, self-consciousness. It must not, however, be overlooked, that consciousness, perception, willing, are looked upon as belonging to which these functions and phenomena belong, and because some weight would be laid upon it.

Again: the dead are spoken of as spirits (Luke xix. 37, 39; Acts xxii. 8 sq.; Heb. xii. 23; 1 Pet. iii. 19), but the living as souls, for the soul as such outlasts death. Finally, and this is the most important difference in the Bible use of these words, whereas soul is applied to the individual, the spirit, the spirit of life, spirit is never so used. Spirit as an independent subject is always something different from the human spirit.

This latter distinction rests upon the original difference of the terms: נפשׁ, נטума, "spirit," is the condition, while רוח', כור, "soul," is the manifestation, of life. But for the explanation of this and the other peculiarities of usage, it is, of course, not sufficient always to call to mind the different points of view from which the inner being of man is described, now as spirit, and now as soul. One must go a step beyond the original relation of the two descriptions. Granted that soul and spirit are related as vital principle and life, it is still impossible to distinguish them, not only in conception, but in fact; because the spirit, the principle of the soul, is the divine vital principle, immanent in, but not identical with, the individual life. Soul and spirit cannot be separated as soul and body, but they can be distinguished. Spirit is the principle of the soul; and it cannot be said of the spirit, which proceeds from God, and always bears the divine vital principle, that it sins or dies.

It is the knowledge of God and of the fall which leads us to make the distinction between the present actuality of life and its divine original creation. Spirit is wherever life is; and this is the spirit of God, but in a peculiar manner. This spirit belongs to man. Not by the mere fact of creation does the holy spirit come to man, but the spirit is something different from the human spirit. The holy spirit is the cause of the soul, not identical with it. Sin has broken the connection between the human spirit and the spirit of God. So death came in as the result of this separation, and filled eternal life, which was man's before the fall. Man now has a consciousness of guilt. He feels the pressure of law, and his inability to obey it. Through the impartation of the spirit, man is, however, renewed. He has life in its true sense. And this renewal affects his whole being in all its relations (Rom. viii. 11; 2 Cor. v. 5; Eph. iv. 23, 30; 1 Thess. v. 23).

SPIRITUALISM is a term, which, in its wider sense, is often applied to various forms of mysticism and quietism, as represented by Jacob Boehme, De Molinos, Meine Guyon, and others; while in its narrower, but now more common, sense, it simply denotes a belief in a natural communication between this and the other world. A leading Spiritualist paper, Spiritual Magazine, established in London in 1846, defines Spiritualism as "based on the cardinal fact of spirit communion and influx;" as an "effort to discover all truth relating to man's spiritual nature, capacities, relations, duties, welfare, and destiny;" as aiming, "through a careful, reverent study of facts, at a knowledge of the laws and principles which govern the occult forces of the universe, of the relations of spirit to matter, and of man to God and the spiritual world." In this sense of the term the phenomenon has attracted more physiological than theological interest; though its devotees pronounce it an indispensable weapon in the contest with the religious indifference, materialism, and atheism of our age.

Spiritualism, or, as it is sometimes called, Spiritism, dates back only to 1848. In that year it was discovered that certain rappings which were heard in the house of John D. Fox in Springville; Wayne County, N.Y., and which could not be accounted for in any ordinary way, conveyed intelligent communications. In 1850 the two girls Margaret and Kate Fox came to New York; and soon "spirit-rapping," the moving of heavy bodies without any mechanical agency, involuntary writing, etc., were phenomena which everybody had witnessed, or heard discussed by witnesses. Still more powerful mediums — that is, persons of such sensitive organization that the spirits can act upon them or through them — appeared. One of the most remarkable of these was Daniel Douglas Home, a lad of seventeen years, who came to Paris, and Alexander II. in St. Petersburg. Greater things were now accomplished, — speaking in foreign languages; lighting of a phosphorescent light in the dark; producing of drawings, pictures, and photographs; and, finally, the complete embodiment of a departed spirit, at least so far as to make him recognizable to friends and relatives. Numerous books were written for and against, and a multitude of proselytes were made; but a sect or party, properly so speaking, was not formed.

The Spiritualists generally reject the doctrine of the Trinity, considering Christ simply as one of the great teachers of mankind, not in any essential point different from the founders of the other great historical religions. They also generally reject the doctrine of a personal devil, though they believe in evil spirits, ascribing to them a power over man which may amount to possession. But they all believe in a future life, and in a natural, not miraculous, communication between that life and life on earth. The idea of miracles they have completely discarded, and the miracles of Scripture they accept as natural though unexplained facts. Life on earth they consider as a preparation for the life to come; but, when the transition from the one phase of life to the other takes place through death, no very great change occurs. The new life is only a continuation of the old, going to states at Haman almost wholly determined by the character of that. Communications between these two spheres of life have always been possible, though under certain conditions of which we as yet have only very slight knowledge; but the motives which bring the spirits to reveal themselves to us are simply love and mercy, a desire to convince man of the existence of a future life.

SPITTA, Karl Johann Philipp, a distinguished German hymn-writer, was born in Hanover, Aug. 8, 1801; died in Burgdorf, Sept. 28, 1859. His mother, a converted Jewess, was left a widow in 1805. Sent to school, Spitta's studies were interrupted for four years by a dangerous sickness. At the close of this period he was apprenticed to a clockmaker; and after having gone to Paris, he studied law, its critics, and the old and new schools of philosophy. In 1821 passed to the university of Göttingen, where he studied theology. His faith wavered for a time, and he associated with the circle to which Heinrich Heine belonged. It was re-assured by the perusal of the works of Tholuck and De Wette.

From 1824 to 1826 he acted as private tutor at Lüne, near Lüneburg, then became co-pastor at Eytholm, and later pastorates at Haman (1830) and Wechholz (1837), and he made a significant contribution to the study of Latin and Greek in private, he again entered school in 1818, and in 1821 passed to the university of Göttingen, where he studied theology. His faith wavered for a time, and he associated with the circle to which Heinrich Heine belonged. It was re-assured by the perusal of the works of Tholuck and De Wette.

SPORTS, Book of, a royal proclamation drawn up by Bishop Morton for James I., issued by that king in 1618; reprinted by Charles I., under the direction of Laud, in the ninth year of his reign. Its object was to encourage those people who had attended divine service to spend the remainder of Sunday after evening prayers in such "lawful recreation" as dancing, archery, leaping, vaulting, May games, Morris dances, setting of May-poles, etc. The proclamation was aimed at the Puritans, and Charles required it to be read in every parish church. The majority of the Puritan ministers refused to obey, and some were in consequence suspended. See EADIE: Eccles. Cyclop., s.v., where the full text is given.

about a year in the family of Major Lewis (whose wife was the adopted daughter of Washington), at Woodlawn, near Mount Vernon; entered the Princeton Theological Seminary in the fall of 1816; was graduated in 1819, and immediately settled over the Congregational Church in West Springfield, Mass., as colleague with the Rev. Dr. Joseph Lathrop, who was then eighty-eight years of age, and had spent his whole professional life of sixty-three years in that parish. Dr. Lathrop died in the following year, and Mr. Sprague was left sole pastor. In 1829 he accepted the call of the Second Presbyterian Church of Albany to become its pastor; and here he passed the succeeding forty years of his life, and closed the period of active labor by resignation of his charge in 1869. He then removed his residence from Albany to Flushing, L.I., where he died in the eighty-first year of his age. In 1828 Columbia College conferred upon him the degree of D.D.; he received the same honor from Harvard in 1848, and the degree of LL.D. from Princeton in 1869.

Among the preachers and public speakers of the country, Dr. Sprague sat in a very high eminence. In 1848 he delivered the annual address before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvard, in 1860 the annual address to the Yale alumni, and in 1862 the discourse to the alumni of the Princeton Seminary upon the semi-centennial anniversary of that institution. More than one hundred and fifty of his sermons and occasional discourses were published by request. He was a voluminous author, and published more than a dozen separate works, among which may be mentioned Letters from Europe (1828), Lectures on Revivals (1832), Life of Rev. Dr. E. D. Griffin (1838), Aids to Early Religion (1847), Words to a Young Man's Conscience (1848), Visits to European Celebrities (1855), Memoirs of the Rev. Drs. John and William A. McDowell (1864), Life of Rev. Dr. Jedidiah Morse (1874).

The great literary work of his life, however, which earned for him the title of "biographer of the church," was the Annals of the American Pulpit, begun in 1852, when he was fifty-seven years of age, of which nine large octavo volumes were published, and the manuscript of the tenth and concluding volume completed for publication, before his death. Vols. i. and ii. are devoted to the Trinitarian Congregationalists; vols. iii. and iv., to the Presbyterian; vol. v., to the Episcopalians; vol. vi., to the Baptists; vol. vii., to the Methodists; vol. viii., to the Unitarians; vol. ix., to the Lutheran, Reformed, Associate, Associate Reformed, and Reformed Presbyterian; and the unpublished volume includes Quakers, German Reformed, Moravian, Cumberland Presbyterian, Freewill Baptist, Swedenborgian, and Universalist. The work contains about fifteen hundred of these sketches; and to each sketch are appended, as far as practicable, letters of personal recollections contributed by writers who had intimately known the clergymen commemorated. In the preparation of this work Dr. Sprague received cordial assistance from the eminent clergymen and laymen of each denomination, and probably had a more extended acquaintance throughout the churches of this country than any other man of his time. His successor at Albany, Rev. Dr. A. J. Upson, in his commemorative discourse, referred to the Annals as follows:—

"This book of our venerable friend is successful. It may have yielded no adequate pecuniary compensation; it may not be drawn from the circulating libraries, nor sold at the book-stalls: but it is so peculiar, it fills its own sphere so completely, it can never be supplanted. It is a treasury of Christian examples. It is the testimony of a cloud of witnesses. It is a chronicle of the everlasting church. Its author has identified himself with God as his agent in fulfilling his promise, that 'the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.'"

Dr. Sprague was thus described by an old and intimate friend, Rev. Dr. Ray Palmer, in the Congregationalist of May 24, 1876:—

"In his personal appearance Dr. Sprague was a very notable man. More than six feet in stature, erect, large-framed, and well-proportioned, with a broad head and dark-brown hair (which was unchanged to the day of his death, in his eighty-second year), he was sure to be observed in almost any assembly. His bearing was natural, as of one entirely self-possessed, and the expression of his countenance pleasing; so that, while he impressed by his dignity, he yet attracted by a certain kindliness and simplicity of manner which at once set even a stranger entirely at ease with him. In conversation one was sure to find him animated, cheerful, rich in material derived from reading, travel, and intercourse with men, yet as ready to listen as to talk, and chiefly intent on imparting the utmost possible pleasure to his friend or visitor. He had come into personal contact with many distinguished men, both at home and abroad; and he liked to describe them, to relate anecdotes of their peculiarities, and to repeat what they had finely said, or eloquent passages from their writings. He did this with great felicity. No one could spend an hour with him, and not be conscious of having enjoyed a rare pleasure. Of all that makes a Christian gentleman he was certainly a rare example."

EDWARD E. SPRAGUE.

SPRENG, Jakob (generally called Probst, from his being propositus in an Augustine convent in Antwerp), d. at Bremen, June 30, 1562. He was one of Luther's first adherents in the Netherlands; preached his views in Antwerp, and founded a Lutheran congregation there, but was arrested, and compelled to recant; went to Spern, his native city, and continued to preach the Reformation; was arrested a second time, but escaped to Wittenberg; and was in 1524 appointed preacher at Bremen, where the Reformation was established in 1525. He left some minor treatises. See J. G. Neumann's preface to Spreng's edition: M. Lutheri Commentarius in Joannis epistolam, etc., Leipzig, 1708; and especially the rare book of SEELEN: De vita J. Prapasitis, Lubeck, 1747.

KLOESE.

SPRING, Gardiner, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian, b. at Newburyport, Mass., Dec. 24, 1785; d. in New-York City, Aug. 18, 1873. He was graduated from Yale College, 1805; taught in Bermuda until 1807; admitted to the bar, 1808; abandoned law for theology, and studied at Andover Theological Seminary, 1809-10; ordained pastor of the Brick (Presbyterian) Church, Aug. 8, 1810, and held the position till his death. The first four years of his ministry were years of steady, quiet growth; but from 1814 to 1834 there were frequent revivals, the result of God's blessing upon his faithful preaching, and utterly independent of machinery. During this period he took part in the formation of the American Bible Society (1816), American Tract Society (1825), and American Home Missionary Society (1826). From 1834 to the close of his ministry, there were no revivals; but there was steady growth, and in himself great increase in his power as a preacher. It was then that he used the press to extend his usefulness, and published a number of volumes of connected discourses. His congregation first met in Beeckman Street, but in 1836 removed to their present church, on Nassau Street. To Dr. Spring fell. At Nassau Hall he had become in interest was deepened as he became more intimate with Burr during the disastrous expedition to Canada. After 1861 he had a colleague. His ministry, both for length and power, is remarkable. His principal publications are Essays on the Distinguishing Traits of Christian Character, New York, 1813; Fragments from the Study of a Pastor, 1838; Obligations of the World to the Bible, 1839; The Attraction of the Cross, 1846; The Bible not of Man, 1847; The Poem of the Pulpit, 1849; The Mercy-Seat, 1851; True Things, 1851; The Glory of Christ, 1852, 2 vols.; The Contrast between Good and Bad Men, 1855, 2 vols.; Pulpit Ministration, 1864, 2 vols.; and Personal Reminiscences of the Life and Times of Gardiner Spring, 1866, 2 vols. (his autobiography). See the Memorial Discourse by Rev. Dr. J. O. Murray, New York, [1873].

SPRING, Samuel, D.D., b. in Northbridge, Mass., Feb. 27, 1746; d. in Newburyport, Mass., March 4, 1819, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. A graduate of Princeton College in 1771; a classmate and room-mate there with President James Madison. The friendship between these two men remained uninterrupted through life; although Spring was an ardent Federalist, and a determined opposer of Madison's administration.

He began the study of theology with his particular friend, Dr. John Witherspoon, president of Nassau Hall. He continued the study with Dr. Joseph Bellamy, Dr. Samuel Hopkins, and Dr. Stephen West. With the three divines last named he became very intimate, as likewise with Dr. Jonathan Edwards, who had been Spring's tutor at Nassau Hall. He coincided, however, in his theological opinions, with his brother-in-law, Nathanael Emmons, more nearly than with any other man.

In 1775 he connected himself, as a chaplain of the Continental army, with a volunteer corps of eleven hundred men under the command of Benedict Arnold. With this corps he marched through the wilderness to Quebec. He stood with Col. Burr on the Plains of Abram when Gen. Montgomery fell. At Nassau Hall he had become interested in his college-mate, Aaron Burr. This interest was deepened as he became more intimate with Burr during the disastrous expedition to Canada. After the death of Hamilton, in 1804, Dr. Spring, although a distant relative of Burr, published a terrific sermon against duelling, and did not spare either the murderer or the murdered.

Dr. Spring was pastor of the Second Congregational Church in Newburyport, Mass., forty-one years and seven months. He was ordained Aug. 6, 1777; was a distinguished patriot during the war of the Revolution and that of 1812. He was eminently a doctrinal preacher, vigorous, dignified, commanding, subduing. He deserves the gratitude of the churches for the impulse which he gave to the cause of theological education between the years 1777 and 1819. To him, as much as to any one man, may be traced the origin of at least four important institutions of learning. To him and Eliphalet Pearson may be ascribed the founding of Andover Theological Seminary. To him, more than to any one man, is due the formation of the Massachusetts Missionary Society,—a society which trained the principal men by whom the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was first conducted. To Dr. Spring, or both united, is due the honor of having first suggested the idea of forming the American Board.

Twenty-six of Dr. Spring's published sermons are, some doctrinal, some political, some addressed to charitable societies, some to children. His most memorable theological treatises are his Dialogue on the Nature of Duty, 1784; his Moral Disquisitions and Strictures on the Rev. [Professor] Jared Tappan’s Letters [in reply to the Dialogues], 2d ed., 1815. He also published The Youth's Assistant, or a Series of Theological Questions and Answers, 1818, and a large number of essays in The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, of which he was an editor.

STABAT MATER are the first words of the famous hymn of Jacopone da Todi (d. 1306), and mean "The mother was standing." It is the most pathetic hymn of the middle ages, and, in spite of its adoration of the Virgin, is one of the sweetest, softest, and sweetest lyrics in Christian literature. Suggested by the scene depicted in John xix. 25, it describes with tender feeling the piercing agony of Mary at the cross. It has furnished a theme for musical composition to Nanini (about 1620), Palestrina (whose music is the best, and is sung at Rome on Palm-Sunday), Astorga (about 1700), Pergolesi (about 1736), Haydn, and Rossini (whose composition, according to Palmer, may be compared to a mater dolorosa painted standing under the cross, and clad in a Parisian court-dress). The original is in ten stanzas (Wackernagel, i. 186, 182; Monc, ii. 147—154; Daniel, ii. 133). Lisio (Stabat Mater, Berlin, 1849) gives fifty-three German and several Dutch translations. It has been translated by Lord Lindsay, Caswall, Mant, Coles, Benedict, etc. One of the best translations, "At the cross her station keeping," is found in Schaff's Christ in Song, p. 109. Dr. Coles's translation, beginning "Stood the afflicted mother weeping," is also very excellent. See Jacopone da Todi and the literature there given.

Another Stabat Mater celebrates the joy of the Virgin Mary at the birth of Christ, as the former celebrates her grief at the cross, and may be called the "Mater speciosa" as distinct from the "Mater dolorosa." It was published in the edition of the Italian poems of Jacopone at Brescia, 1495, but attracted no attention till Ozanam published a French translation in his work on the Franciscan poets (Paris, 1862), and John Mason Neale, an English translation shortly before his death (1866). It is not equal to the Mater dolorosa, and seems to be an imitation by another hand. It was discussed by P. Schaff in Hours at Home (a monthly magazine), New York, May, 1867, and translated again by Erastus C. Benedict, Hymn of Hildebert, etc., New York, 1869, p. 20.
he went so far in his opposition to the union of the two Protestant churches as to declare that solutions as equally good: on the contrary, he maintained that those two extremes he despised as destitute of a sphere of ethical action. What lay between one giving the absolute power to the mass of the people, the majority, and one organizing the government of the church, and took a very active part in Prussian politics. His brilliant parliamentary talent soon made him one of the most prominent leaders of the conservative party, both in political and ecclesiastical affairs. Democracy and free-thinking he understood, and was not afraid of; but he hated liberalism and rational-ism. The former is revolution, he said; but the latter is dissolution. His ideas are clearly defined in his Die Philosophie des Rechts, 1830, thoroughly revised in 1847, vol. i., under the title, Geschichte der Rechtstheologie, vol. ii., Rechts- und Staats-lehre. Of the fundamental problems of human life, he considered two solutions as possible, both philosophically and juridically,— one on the basis of pantheism, and one on the basis of faith in a personal God who has revealed himself to man; one giving the absolute power to the mass of the people, the majority, and one organizing the State after the idea of the highest personality, as a sphere of ethical action. What lay between those two extremes he despised as destitute of character. But he did not consider the two possible solutions as equally good; on the contrary, from the depths of his conviction he cried out, "No majority, but authority!" Nowhere, perhaps, has he set forth his ideas more forcibly and more pointedly than in the two Sendeschreiben he published in the Hengstenberg controversy in 1845. In 1840 appeared his Die Kirchenverfassung nach Lehre und Recht der Protestanten, in which he subjects the three systems prevailing in the Lutheran Church — the episcopal, the territorial, and the collegial system — to a searching examination, recommending the first. The constitution of the Reformed Church has not found an equal treatment. He was an able advocate of high Lutheran orthodoxy, and an intimate friend of Hengstenberg. In his Die lutherische Kirche und die Union (1860) he went so far in his opposition to the union of the two Protestant churches as to declare that Luther at Marburg, refusing to join hands with Zwingli, was as great as Luther at Worms. Among his other works are Der christliche Staat und sein Verhältniss zu Deismus und Judentum, 1847; Der Protestantismus als politisches Prinzip, 1856, etc.

His fourteenth year he went to Vienna; had a vision of two angels and the Virgin Mary, who was admitted Oct. 28, 1567. He predicted the day of his death, and on account of his severe ascetic practices was befit by Clement VIII. in 1604. NEUDECKER.

At that time rector of Alderley, in Cheshire; d. in London, July 18, 1881. In the village made memorable from being his birthplace, he spent his childhood under the fostering care of his father and mother, whose admirable characters he has embodied in a volume of family memoirs. Their influence on him for good was very great, and to this is to be added the effect of intercourse with the Leycesters, amiable and interesting relatives on the mother's side. The scenery of Alderley Edge, its pine-trees and beacon-tower, also the rectory-garden, with bird-cages hung among the roses, no doubt served to stimulate the child's active imagination. When eight years old he was remarkable for retentiveness of memory, — a faculty which was singularly powerful in after-life. But this was associated with an incapacity for mathematical studies, and even a sum in arithmetic puzzled him to the end of his days. In January, 1829, he was entered as a schoolboy at Rugby; and there he exhibited the amiability and decision so well described in "Tom Brown," and came under the formative power of Dr. Thomas Arnold, prince of schoolmasters, to whom he owed much of the mental and moral strength which distinguished him in the whole of his subsequent career. He early showed a fondness for history, and, as he records, "got through all Mitford and all Gibbon, and several smaller authors." Rugby became to Stanley a second home, and he was admitted the last of five prizes, his master said to him, "Thank you, Stanley: we have nothing more to give."

He was elected a scholar of Balliol at Oxford in 1833, and signalized his undergraduatehip by a prize-poem entitled The Gipuses. His father was made Bishop of Norwich in 1837; and there, of course, he was wont to spend his vacations: in no other way did he become connected with the old East-Anglican city. He undertook a tour in Greece in 1840-41, and there, as was his wont, studied nature on its poetical side and in its historical relations, and returned to the university full of knowledge and inspiration derived from the acquaintance he formed with the classic scenery amidst which he wandered. He soon commenced as college-tutor, and the attachment he instilled in his pupils was to be the result of his social intercourse in after-years. His lectures on history and divinity awakened much attention, and gave promise of what he subsequently accomplished as a popular lecturer and author. Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, in which he broke up new ground by dwelling on the individual peculiarities of the apostles, were published in 1846; but before that, in 1844, he made a mark on historical literature by his Life of Arnold, a book said at the time to set everybody talking about the hero, rather than the author,— a sign of the wonderful success he had achieved. He was appointed secretary to the first Oxford Commission, which resulted in considerable improvements of university education; and, watching the progress of theological controversy, he wrote in 1850 an article on the Gorhama Judgment, the harbinger of several successive criticisms on ecclesiastical questions, which he afterwards published.

In 1851 he became a canon of Canterbury, and then entered on the second stage of his public life. There he wrote his Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians and his Memorials of Canterbury; and, having already travelled in the East, he added to these his Sinai and Palestine. A tour in Russia was taken by him whilst he was a Canterbury canon, and this awakened in him a deep interest respecting the Eastern Church. Of this he availed himself in lectures on its history, after he entered upon the Regius professorship of ecclesiastical history at Oxford, in 1858. These lectures were published in 1861. It should further be recorded of his work at Canterbury, that there his influence was deeply felt by both clergy and laity; for he succeeded in breaking down walls of partition surrounding the intercourse of cathedral dignitaries, and brought together persons who had before stood aloof from each other.

In 1862 he accompanied the Prince of Wales during his tour in the East, and, after his return to England, published a volume of sermons preached to the royal party, from time to time, as they travelled over never-to-be-forgotten Bible lands. The death of Stanley's mother, to whom he was tenderly attached, occurred while he was absent from England. In 1863, soon after his return, he was appointed Dean of Westminster. That appointment was speedily followed by his marriage with Lady Augusta Bruce, who was "the light of his dwelling" to the day of her death. The fascination of her society, and the perfect sympathy she manifested in all his literary, religious, and social enterprises, contributed to the popularity of those gatherings in the deanery which will ever live in the recollection of those who were privileged to enjoy them; and she also strengthened his husband to perform those illustrious labors which rendered him most distinguished among all the Westminster deans of ancient or modern times. This brings us to the third and last stage of Stanley's public life.

His residence in Westminster, which opened up to him a new and wide sphere of exertion, he employed for the purpose of improving and popularizing the abbey, of promoting objects connected with the welfare of the neighborhood, and of advancing the interests of literature, charity, and religion in general. He really loved that ancient edifice, so grand foresight of which was to be the result of his social intercourse in after-years. His lectures on history and divinity awakened much attention, and gave promise of what he subsequently accomplished as a popular lecturer and author. Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, in which he broke up new ground by dwelling on the individual peculiarities of the a warm supporter; whilst his garden-parties, in connection with the encouragement of floral culvastion amongst the humbler classes, were attractive, not only to the gentry and nobility around, but to many living at a distance. As a lecturer, he advocate at public meetings, and especially as an abbey-preacher, he commanded large audiences, and delighted those who listened to his original remarks. A Broad-Churchman, and too often throwing into the background truths which evangelical Christians love to hear, he interested all believers in England, and, making no secret of his strong attachment to the principle of an Establishment, he nevertheless conciliated Nonconformists, and his abstinence from all factious com-delighted to cultivate amongst them some intimate friendships. He was busy with his pen throughout the whole period of his residence in the dean-ey. His Lectures on the Jewish Church appeared in three successive volumes under the dates of 1863, 1805, and 1879. Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey was published in 1868; Essays on Church and State followed in 1870. The His-in Edinburgh, issued from the press in 1872. A

Accused of being a Crypto-Catholic, he defended himself in a work, Ueber Kryptokatholizismus, etc. (Frankfort and Leipzig, 1787), and was protected and honored by the court. His anonymous book, Theoduls Grußmal, 1809 (7th ed., 1828), was the occasion for renewed attacks, which the discovery, after his death, of a room in his house arranged for the celebration of the mass, and his order to be buried in cowl and in the Catholic churchyard, proved to be justified.

STAUPITZ, Johann von, the noble friend of Luther; d. at Salzburg, Dec. 28, 1524. The time and place of his birth are unknown. Entering the Augustinian order, he studied at several universities, last at Tübingen, where in 1500, as prior of the Augustinian convent, he was made doctor of theology. Rejecting the scholastic theology, he had recourse to the Scriptures and the mystics, and was indeed a theologian not only of the scholastics, but of the heart. His culture, practical ability, and courtesy and manly bearing, won for him the favor of the Elector of Saxony, by whom he was invited to take part in the foundation of the new university at Wittenberg. In its interests he went to Rome to secure the Papal permission, and in 1502 was settled in Wittenberg as professor and dean of the theological faculty. In 1503 he went chosen by Luther as the successor of the Augustinians in Germany. In 1512 he institted in the convents under his supervision the Scriptures for Augustine's writings, to be read during meals. The same year he acted as the substitute of the Archbishop of Salzburg at the Lateran Council. That which gives Staupitz a place in history is his relation to Luther. He became acquainted with the young monk at Erfurt in 1505, secured a higher position for him in the convent, and sought to turn his attention from ascetic thoughts and metaphysical speculations to the cross and the atoning love of God. Your thoughts are not Christ," said he to Luther on one occasion, as the latter looked with a shudder at the elements which Staupitz was carrying in a funeral-procession; "for Christ does not terrify, but console." In 1508, at his recommendation, Luther was elected to the See of Würzburg; and at his advice Luther entered the pulpit. In 1516, while absent on a mission in the Netherlands, Staupitz showed his confidence in Luther by making him temporary inspector of forty convents in Saxony and Thuringia. As late as October, 1518, he sympathized with his young friend, and was at his side in the discussion with Cajetan in Augsburg. On that occasion he said, "Remember, my brother, that thou hast begun this work in the name of Christ." He soon afterwards drew back from the Reformation; but he did not oppose it, like Erasmus. He was "a pious Christian mystic," who deplored the abuses of the church, but had not the heroism to be a Reformer.

In 1519 he went to Salzburg (not because he had fallen into disfavor with the Elector of Saxony, as D'Aubigne supposes), became court-preacher in 1522, abbot of the Benedictine convent of St. Peter at Salzburg, having changed his order previously, and, later, vicar of the archbishop. In 1519 he wrote to Luther, offering him a refuge at Salzburg. But Luther was displeased with the course of his old friend, and wrote, Feb. 9, 1521 (De Wette, i. 559), "Your submission has saddened me very much, and shown me another friendship, of which I have not been able to exercise a deep cross." In another letter, of Sept. 17, 1523 (De Wette, ii. 407), he writes to him as the one "through whom the light of the gospel was first made to shine from the darkness in our hearts" (per quern primum coepit Evangelii lux de tenerei spindens cer cordibus nostris). Some of Luther's writings which he took with him to Salzburg, and gave to the monks to read, were burned by one of his successors. Staupitz exerted a deep influence upon Luther; so that the latter, in his dedication of the first collection of his writings to Staupitz, in 1518, could call himself his disciple. In his letter of May 30, 1518, to accompany his Theos to Leo X., he says he heard from Staupitz, as "a voice from heaven," an explanation that true penance starts from love, and ends in righteousness. This truth, he said, acted like a sharp arrow in his heart until the word "repenceance" became to him the sweetest word in the Bible.

Besides ten letters which Grimm edited, only one of which is to Luther, he left behind him some tracts. Von d. Nachfolge d. willigen Sibemm Christs (1619), Von der heiligen Liebe Gottes STEELE, Anne, author of many popular and useful hymns; was the daughter of a Baptist minister at Broughton in Hampshire, where she was b. 1716, and d. November, 1778. She was always an invalid; and her fiancé was drowned or just before the wedding-day. Her Poems on Subjects chiefly Devotional, by Theologia, appeared in two volumes in 1760, and were reprinted, 1780, with a third volume of Miscellaneous Pieces in Verse and Prose; the profits in each case being devoted to benevolent uses. The whole were re-issued at Boston in two volumes, 1808, and most of them in one volume by D. Sedgwick, 1885. Her hymns, to the number of sixty-five, were included in Ash and Evans's Collection, 1789, and were found to be accordant with the best taste of that period, and remarkably adapted to public worship. Dr. Rippon (1787) used fifty-six of them, and Dobell (1806), forty-five. To probably a majority of the hymn-books published in England and America she is the largest contributor after Watts, Doddridge, and C. Wesley, often preceding the latter, and sometimes standing next to Watts, though occasionally outnumbered by Newton. This implies an amount of influence in leading devotion, in moulding thought and character, and in assuaging sorrow, which any one might be proud to gain, and which can be attained by very few.

On the other hand, James Montgomery, a discerning critic, relegated her to the tenth rank in his Christian Psalmist (1825), and said nothing about her in the Introductory Essay. She certainly had more power lasted longer, and was less adapted to stand the test of time than her masculine rivals. Her hymns are a transcript of a deeply sensitive, humane, and pious mind, with little intellectual variety or strength; but they have a free and graceful lyrical flow, and no positive faults beyond a tendency to repetition and too many endearing epithets. A fragment of one of them, "Father, what'er of earthly bliss," may last as long as any thing of Watts or Doddridge.

STIEFENHOFER, Maximilian Friedrich Christoph, b. at Owen in Wurtemberg, Jan. 16, 1706; d. at Weinsberg, Feb. 11, 1761. He studied theology at Tubingen; entered into connection with the congregation of Herrnhut; became court-preacher at Ebersdorf early in 1734; joined the Moravian Brethren in 1746, but returned in 1749 to Wurtemberg, and held various minor pastoral charges, finally that of Weinsberg. He wrote a number of sermons and devotional books,—Tägliche Nahrung des Glaubens, 1743 (last edition, Ludwigsburg, 1859, with his autobiography); a commentary on 1 John; a collection of sermons on the life of Jesus, Francfort, 1764.

STEITZ, Georg Eduard, D.D., b. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, July 25, 1810; was pastor and d. there Jan. 10, 1879. He wrote Die Privatbeichte u. Privatabsolution d. luther. Kirche aus den Quellen des 16ten Jahrhunderts, Frankfurt, 1854; Das römische Bussacrament, 1854; and forty-one articles for the first edition of Herzog, most of which have been re-issued in the second edition, besides numerous contributions to the Studien u. Kräften and elsewhere. He was a man of rare intellectual abilities and sound judgment. His articles in Herzog are very elaborate and valuable.

STENNETT, Joseph, an English hymn-writer; was b. at Abingdon, Berks, 1863; d. at Knaphill, Bucks, July 11, 1718. In 1690 he was ordained pastor of a Baptist church in Devonshire Square, London, which he served till his death. He was the author of a reply to Russen's Fundamentals without a Foundation, or TruePicture the Anabaptists. His Hymns for the Lord's Supper appeared in 1687, and were increased from thirty-seven to fifty in the third edition, 1708. He also published a Creation of the World Song, with the Seventeenth Psalm, 1700 (2d ed., 1709), and twelve hymns on the Believers' Baptism, 1712. A complete edition of his hymns, poems, sermons, and letters, was published, with a memoir, in 4 vols., 1732. Stennett is the author of the familiar hymn, "Another six days' work is done," which in the original had fourteen stanzas.

STENNETT, Samuel, an English hymnist, and great adherent of the Evangelical or Pietist movement, was b. 1727, in Dresden, where his father was pastor of the Baptist Church; d. in London, Aug. 24, 1795. He assisted his father as pastor of the Baptist Church in Little Wild Street, London, and in 1758 became his successor, remaining with the church till his death. He was a fine scholar, and was made D.D. by Aberdeen University, 1793. He was a man of influence among the dissenters, enjoyed the confidence of many, and was a frequent hearer. Writing from Smyrna under date of Aug. 11, 1768, the great pine-reformer speaks of the pleasure he experienced in reviewing his notes of Stennett's sermons. Stennett's works (On Personal Religion, 1769, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1801, being the most extensive) were published with a memoir in 1824, 3 vols. Thirty-four of his hymns are given at the end. Five others have been found in Rippon's Selection. His best hymns are "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand," "Majesty, sweetness sits enthroned," "'Tis finished! so at the temple and the other forms of the law. Notwithstanding, however, the accusations from these being suborned to testify against him. The people finally exercised Lynch's law upon the accused. Stephen preached, as the apostles up to that time had not preached. He was accused of speaking against the Jewish religion, fathers, and temple. He had entered most deeply into the meaning of many of Christ's sayings about the difference between the law and the gospel, and especially the saying recorded in John ii. 19. Christ there be no doubt that he had become convinced that the Mosaic institutions could not be combined with the spiritual contents of the gospel as a basis for the church and the kingdom of God? This is made certain, not only by the form of the accusation, but by the address of Stephen. At first sight the latter seems to be disconnected and irrelevant. Closer inspection, however, reveals that this is not the case. The speaker proves that God had revealed himself independently of the forms of the law, and that the history of revelation was progressive, and closes by showing the temporary nature of the temple, and the other forms of the law. Notiing of the kind had ever been brought out by the apostles before. Stephen was not merely the protomartyr of the church. He was the first Christian preacher who fully understood the distinction which Christ taught between Judaism and Christianity, a forerunner of Paul; yes, perhaps, in the deepest sense the one who prepared the way for Paul's conversion. At any rate the extension of the gospel beyond the limits of the synagogue was, according to the statement of the Acts, the immediate consequence of the death and not the planned work of the elder apostles. [Augustine said, "If Stephen had not prayed, the church would not have had Paul"] (Sti Steph. non orasset, ecclesia Paulum non haberet). Archdeacon Farrar calls him the "undeveloped St. Paul."] Tradition did not forget Stephen. The Fathers put him among the seventy disciples. The Apocalypse of Stephen will be found in Fabricius: Cod. Apost. Ed. Russ.

STEPHEN, the name of ten popes. — Stephen I. (252–257), a Roman by birth, is of importance on account of his relation to the controversy concerning heretical baptism. The majority of the churches in Asia Minor and Africa had declared in favor of the view that heretics baptized by heretics should be rebaptized on their entrance into the orthodox church. The Roman practice, however, had been to admit them without the repetition of the rite, and with a simple exhortation to repentance. The Eastern Church, and especially Cyprian, strongly opposed this practice; and the councils of Carthage (255, 256) again sanctioned the opposite view. A synodal letter informed Stephen of this action, and a heated epistolary controversy was opened between him and Cyprian. He finally broke off communion with the African Church. Tradition relates that Stephen suffered a martyr's death for refusing to sacrifice to the heathen gods. His day is Aug. 2.

— Stephen II. ascended the Papal chair March 27, 752, but died a few days later; for which reason he is usually omitted from the list of popes. — Stephen III. (II.) was Pope from 752 to 757. Pushed by Aistulf, king of the Longobards, he called in the aid of Pepin the Little, who defeated the enemy in two campaigns (754, 755), and raised Stephen anointed as Bishop of Tournay, in 1203; sought to secure the prefaceremains. Two addresses and a number of letters are preserved. Best edition by Molinet, Paris, 1674.

STEPHEN OF VELLAVILLA, Dominican at Lyons; d. 1261. His greatest work, De septem donis Spiritus Sancti, of which manuscripts are found in France, England, and Spain, has been printed only so far as it relates to the Cathari and Waldenses. (See Quétif and Echard: Scriptores ordinis predicatorum, i. pp. 190 sq.) In his youth he preached against the Cathari at Valence, and later became inquisitor. His account is one of the most reliable authorities on the heretics mentioned. C. Schmidt.

STEPHEN OF HUNGARY. See Hungary. STEPHEN OF TOURNAY, b. 1185, at Orleans; d. as Bishop of Tournay, in 1203; sought to secure a decree from Rome requiring greater uniformity of doctrinal teaching. His principal work is said to have been the Summa de decretis, of which only the preface remains. Two addresses and a number of letters are preserved. Best edition by Molinet, Paris, 1674.

STEPHENS (French, Estienne; Lat., Stephanus) is the name of a distinguished Parisian family of printers, which did most brilliant service in the interest of literature, and by their publications promoted the cause of the Reformation. They have a place here on account of their distinguished efforts in publishing theological works. — I. Henry, the first printer of this name, had an establishment of his own in Paris from 1503 to 1520. He was on friendly terms with some of the most learned men of the day. — Bude, Binquetingh, Fèvre d'Etaples, etc., and had among his proof-readers Beatus Rhenanus. Among his publications were Le Fèvre's editions of Aristotle, the Psalterium quindecimplex, and his Commentary on the Pauline Epistles. Henry left behind him three sons, — François, Robert, and Charles. François published a number of works between 1537 and 1548, which had no bearing upon theology. The Charles family had been long interested in natural history; in 1551 assumed control of the Paris printing-establishment, on Robert's departure to Geneva, and printed a number of works till 1561, using the title "royal typographer" (typographer regius). He published a number of smaller editions of Hebrew texts and targums, which were edited by J. Mercier.
II. Robert, the second son of Henry, and the founder of the splendid reputation which the name of Stephens still enjoys, was born, according to the usual opinion, in 1503; died in Geneva, Sept. 7, 1559. He early became acquainted with the ancient languages, and entered the printing-establishment of Estienne de Coligny, who married his mother upon his father’s death. He corrected the edition of the Latin New Testament of 1523. This was the first occasion of the endless charges and criminations of the clerical party, especially the theological faculty of the Sorbonne, against him. In 1520 he began to print on his own account. In 1550 he emigrated to Geneva to escape the ceaseless opposition of the clergy. In 1539 he assumed the title of “royal typographer,” and adopted as his devices an olive-branch around which a serpent was twined, and a man standing underneath an olive-tree, with grafts from which wild branches are falling to the ground, with the words of Rom. xi. 20, Noli altum sapere (“Be not high-minded”). The latter was called the Oliva Stephanorum (“the olive of the Stephens family”). The Paris establishment was made famous by his edition of the Latin New Testament. The Paris presses, and other school-books (among them many of Melanchthon’s), and old authors, as Dio Cassius, Eusebius, Cicero, Sallust, Caesar, Justin, etc. Many of these, especially the Greek editions, were famous for their typographical elegance. Twice he published the Hebrew Bible entire,—in 1539 in four volumes, and 1544 sqq. in seventeen parts. Both of these editions are rare. Of more importance are his four editions of the Greek New Testament (1546, 1549, 1550, and 1551), the last in Geneva. The first two are among the nearest Greek texts known, and are called O minificam: the third is a splendid masterpiece of typographical skill, and is known as the editio regia. The edition of 1551 contains the Latin translation of Erasmus and the Vulgate, is not nearly as fine as the other three, and is exceedingly rare. It was in this edition that the versicular division of the New Testament was for the first time introduced. Stephens is said to have made it on horseback, on his journey to Geneva. [See facsimile specimens of the last two editions, in Schaff’s Companion to the Greek Testament, pp. 538-539.] A number of editions of the Vulgate also appeared from his presses, of which the principal are those of 1528, 1532, 1540 (one of the ornaments of this press), 1546. The text of the Vulgate was in a wretched condition, and Stephens’s editions, especially that of 1545, containing a new translation at the side of the Vulgate, was the subject of sharp and acrimonious criticism from the clergy. On his arrival at Geneva, he published a defence against the attacks of the Sorbonne. He issued the French Bible in 1550, and many of Calvin’s writings, in the finest edition of the Institutio being that of 1553. His fine edition of the Latin Bible with glosses (1556) contained the translation of the Old Testament by Santes Pagninus, and the first edition of Beza’s translation of the New Testament.

Three of Henry’s sons—Henry, Robert, and François—became celebrated as printers. François (b. in 1540) printed on his own account in Geneva from 1562 to 1567, issuing a number of editions of the Bible in Latin and French. French writers identify him with a printer by the name of Estienne in Normandy, whither he is supposed to have emigrated in 1592. Robert (b. in 1530; d. in 1571) began to print in Paris on his own account in 1556, and in 1561 received the title of Imprimeur du Roy; and his presses were busily employed in issuing civil documents. His edition of the New Testament (1565-66-67, with both dates being in existence) was a reprint of his father’s first edition, is equal to it in elegance of execution, and is now exceedingly rare.

III. Henry, the eldest son of the great Robert, and without doubt the most distinguished member of the family, was b. in Paris, 1528; d. at Lyons, March, 1598. He displayed in his youth a genuine enthusiasm for the study of Greek, which he learned before he was in his nineteenth year he undertook a protracted journey to Italy, England, and Flanders. In 1554 he published at Paris his first independent work, the Analecta. Then he went again to Italy, helping the Aldens at Venice, discovered a copy of Diodorus Siculus at Rome, and returned to Geneva in 1555. In 1567 he seems to have had a printing-establishment of his own, and, in the spirit of our own day, advertised his own editions of the “Institutio” (typographus parisiensis). The following year he assumed the title, illustris viri Huldrici Fuggeri typographus, from his patron, Fugger of Augsburg. In 1559 Henry assumed charge of his father’s presses, and distinguished himself as the publisher, and also as the editor and collator, of manuscripts. Many of his editions were the first. Athenagora, Maximus Tyrius, Zosimus, appeared in 1557; Diodorus Siculus, 1559; Xenophon, 1561, 1581; Plutarch, 1564, 1588; Sophocles, 1568; Herodotus, 1570, 1592, etc. He improved old translations, or made new Latin translations, of many Greek authors. According to the writer of the article “Estienne,” in La France Protestantte, Henry took a personal part in editing fifty-four publications. His most celebrated work, the Theaurus linguae grecce, which has served in our own century as the basis of Greek lexicography, appeared in 1572. 5 vols. Of the Greek editions of the New Testament that went forth from his presses, there deserve mention those of Beza, with his commentary, 1585, 1582, 1589, and the smaller editions of 1583, 1567, 1580. A tritoglot containing the Pesito appeared in 1589, of which some copies are in existence, bearing the date “Lyons, 1571.” In 1563 a large French Bible, and Henry’s own editions of the Greek New Testament of 1576 and 1587 deserve mention; the former containing the first scientific treatise of the language of the apostolic writers; the latter, a discussion of the ancient divisions of the text. In 1584 he published a concordance of the New Testament, the preparatory studies of which his father had made. Much earlier, he translated Calvin’s Confession into Greek. It was printed in 1564 in his father’s printing-room.

Henry was married three times, and had fourteen children, of whom three survived him. His son Paul (b. 1567), of whose life little is known, assumed control of the presses, which in 1626 were sold to the Chouet brothers. Two of Paul’s sons were printers,—Joseph at La Rochelle, and Antoine (d. 1674), who became Imprimeur du Roy, in Paris in 1813. Fronton Le Duc’s Chrysostomos, and Jean Morin’s Greek Bible (1628, 3 vols.) were issued from his presses. At his death the history of the family stops.

STERCORANISTS (from the Latin stercora, "excrementa"), a term first used in 1654, by Cardinal Humbert against Nicetas Petoratus, and referring to a grossly sensualistic conception of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to which the body of our Lord is eaten, digested, and evacuated, like any other food. The conception has been falsely ascribed to Origen, and also to (æ): it was a genuine, but it no longer found in the time of the latter.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, b. probably atHay-field, near Blakeney, Gloucestershire (or, according to another account, in Hampshire), about 1500;
d. August, 1549; was groom of the chambers to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He is said to have versified fifty-one psalms, of which nineteen appeared 1548, and thirty-seven the next year; immediately after his death. The work was continued by John Hopkins of the Woodend, Aure, Gloucestershire (B. A., Oxford, 1544; said to have held a living in Suffolk). The Whole Book of Psalms Collected into English Metre appeared 1562, and was bound up with innumerable numbers of the Prayer-Book; making for two centuries or more the only or chief metrical provision of the Church of England. Since 1700 or so, it has been called the "Old Version," in distinction from its rival, Tate and Brady. Of its contents about forty-one psalms bear the initials of Sterndhold (the only notable sample of his skill being a few stanzas of Ps. xviii.), and sixty-four, those of Hopkins.
The rest are by Thomas Norton, a lawyer who translated Calvin's Institutes, etc., and d. about 1600; William Whittingham, b. at Chester, 1524;
d. 1563, and afterwards rector or vicar of Oxon;
and William Kethe, who was an exile with Knox at Geneva 1555, chaplain to the English forces at Havre 1563, and afterwards rector or vicar of Okeford in Dorsetshire. Some mention also Wisdom, archdeacon of Ely. Kethe is memorable as the author of the only rendering now much used of the Psalms, with the initials of Sternhold (the only rendering for periodicals). He was an independent man, and thoroughly evangelical. "I will serve no other master than Christ," he said, "and I wish to belong to him more and more exclusively and fully." His style was involved and heavy, and obscured the matter.

STEUDEL, Johann Christian Friedrich, professor of theology at Tubingen, and the last representative of the elder Tubingen school of theology;
was b. at Esslingen in Württemberg, Oct. 25, 1779;
d. in Tubingen, Oct. 24, 1857. He studied at the Tubingen seminary; became vicar of Obereslingen; in 1806 went to Paris, where he studied the language and literature of Persian; returning to Germany, was pastor in Canstatt and Tubingen, and became professor of theology at Tubingen in 1815. His department was the Old Testament till 1826, when he began to lecture upon systematic theology and apologetics. His Lectures on the Theology of the Old Testament were edited by Oehler after his death (Berlin, 1840). He wrote a number of articles for periodicals. He was a writer of sermons, a man of course, unsuited to modern use. Fuller (1862) said that its authors "piety was better than their poetry, and they had drunk more of Jordan than of Helicon;" and Campbell, that they, "with the best intentions and the worst taste, degraded the spirit of Hebrew psalmody by fiat and homely phraseology, and, mistaking vulgarity for simplicity, turned into bathos what they found sublime." But Keble and others have valued their work for its fidelity to the original, and it continued to be used in very many English parishes far into the present century. F. M. Bird.

STERRY, Peter, B.D., Puritan; b. in Surrey;
d. Nov. 18, 1672. In 1668 he was chosen fellow of Emmanuel's College, Cambridge, where he had been educated. He was one of Cromwell's chaplains, one of the fourteen divines proposed by the Lords in May, 1642, and sat as an Independent in the Westminster Assembly almost from the first.
His works are of great rarity. He was called in his day a "high-flown mystical divine," and suffered abuse; but Dr. Stoughton finds his mysticism "pertaining more to his imaginative forms of conception and modes of expression than to any thing else. His doctrines of conversion and of religious life, of Christian experience, duty, and hope, are of the usual evangelical type; but his ideas are ever dressed in mystical phraseology.
He quotes texts of Scripture in abundance, and then commonly runs out into some strain of alle-gerical interpretation." Among his works may be mentioned The clouds in which Christ comes, 1665; The work of the Holy Ghost's conviction of sin (Past-Day sermon), 1645; The coming forth of Christ in the power of his death (delivered Thursday, Nov. 1, 1649), 1650, The Way of God with his people in these nations (Thursday, Nov. 5, 1655), 1657, — England's deliverance from the Northern Presbytery, compared with its deliverance from the Roman Papacy; or a Thanksgiving sermon on Jer. xvi. 14, 5, 1632; Discourse on the freedom of the will, 1675; The rise, race, and tro-perity of the kingdom of God in the soul of man (psalm), together with an account of the state of a saint's soul and body in death, 1683; The appearance of God to man in the gospel and the gospel change (sermons), to which is added an explication of the Trinity, and a short catechism, 1710. See J.

STEWARD, church-officer among the Methodists, whose duties are similar to those of deacons in the Presbyterian and Reformed churches, relating, generally speaking, to the care of the sick and of the moneys of the church. See the appropriate sections in The Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the art. "Steward," in McClary's cyclopaedia.

STEWART, Dugald, Professor of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh; was b. in Edinburgh, Nov. 22, 1733. He was the son of the professor of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh. The boy spent his winters in Edinburgh, his summers in Catrine, Ayrshire, where his father had a house. Dugald Stewart was educated at the high school of Edinburgh and at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow. From 1765 to 1769 he was a student in Edinburgh University, and was greatly influenced by Adam Ferguson, professor of moral philosophy, whose successor he became. He was a student in Glasgow University in 1771-72, and there came under the influence of Thomas Reid, professor of moral philosophy, whose teaching completely swayed the philosophic edge of this fact about his after-career. When Dugald Stewart returned to Edinburgh, he began immediately his course as a public teacher in the university, on account of his father requiring his assistance with the duties of the chair of mathematics. He continued assistant from 1772, and was elected professor, in succession to his father, in 1775. In 1778 he lectured for Adam Ferguson while the latter was acting as secretary to the commission sent to America to negotiate as to pending disputes. The chair of moral philosophy was the one for which Dugald Stewart was eminently qualified; and to that chair he was elected on the resignation of Ferguson, in 1785, holding it till 1820, though during the last ten years of this period the duties of the chair were performed by Thomas Brown, who had been appointed his colleague in 1810, and who died before Stewart. After Brown's death, Stewart resigned the chair, and John Wilson ("Christopher North") was elected. Dugald Stewart was the strenuous supporter, and elegant exponent, of Reid's philosophy, known as the "Scotch philosophy" and "the philosophy of common sense;" being a defence of the certainty of human knowledge and belief against the scepticism of Hume. For an exposition of the philosophy of common sense, see article on Thomas Reid. Stewart's contributions to philosophic literature are numerous. His collected works, edited by Hamilton, were published in Edinburgh and Boston, in eleven octavo volumes. His Outlines of Moral Philosophy, first published in 1793, containing a sketch of psychology and ethics, was long in circulation as a handbook for beginners in ethical science. An edition of it was prepared by Dr. McCosh of Princeton. Besides this, his works are the following: Dissertation on the Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Philosophy (first published in Encyclopaedia Britannica); Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind, of which an edition was published in Boston; Philosophical Essays; Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers; and Lectures on Political Economy. As a professor he was very highly esteemed by his students. Lord Cockburn, who writes enthusiastically of him as a teacher, describes his lecturing as "gentlemanlike, calm, and expository." On account of his careful treatment of political science, along with moral philosophy, he attracted from England many who were destined for political life, including Lord Brougham, Lord Palmerton, and Earl Russell. Many who afterwards rose to eminence in public life acknowledged special indebtedness to him. The shrewd, sagacious, but somewhat cumbersome argumentation of Reid was thrown into a pleasing and attractive form by Stewart, through whose clearness of logic, literary taste, and power of eloquence, it secured a greatly extended influence. These two were the representatives of a philosophy which has largely governed the philosophic thought of Scotland since, and for a time exercised considerable influence in France through the teaching of Cousin and Jouffroy. Stewart, like Reid, was hesitating and unsatisfactory in his mode of stating the evidence for personal existence, making it matter of belief, rather than of direct knowledge. Thus he says, "We cannot properly be said to be conscious of our own existence; our knowledge of our own existence is not anterior to the order of time, to the consciousness of those sensations by which it is suggested." In this way, he spoke of the knowledge of self rather as an acquired notion than as a fact of present consciousness. Stewart treated, with special fulness, of "conception" as a power of mind by which we are able to represent past sensations and perceptions. In his treatment of this subject his analysis was so clear as to recognize dependence on physical organism for this mental representation, in strict harmony with more recent physiological teaching. As the follower and exponent of Reid, Stewart was the resolute opponent of the theory that all knowledge comes from experience; maintaining, on the contrary, that intelligence itself is the source of all that is fundamental to intelligent procedure in dealing with the confused mass of our sensations and perceptions. Like Reid, he devoted special attention to the doctrine of external perception; making it his special aim to ascertain the amount of direct and certain knowledge we have of existence external to self. On account of growing infirmity, and in the midst of general regret, Dugald Stewart withdrew from active professional duty in 1810, and thereafter lived in comparative retirement at Kinneill House, Linlithgowshire, a residence placed at his command by the Duke of Hamilton. He died in Edinburgh, when visiting a friend, on the 11th of June, 1829. His body lies in a covered lower portion of the Canongate Burying-ground, Edinburgh, the same cemetery in which is the grave of Adam Smith, professor of moral philosophy in Glasgow, and author of the Wealth of Nations. So profound and widespread was the admiration of Dugald Stewart, that, shortly after his death, a meeting was held in Edinburgh at which it was resolved to erect a monument to his memory. The result was the classic monument now standing on the Calton Hill in the Scotch metropolis.

STICHOMETRY. The data of stichometry consist chiefly of subscriptions at the close of manuscripts, expressing the number of lines which are contained in the book that has been copied; of marginal annotations from point to point, expressing the extent of the previous text; or of quotations and allusions which are found in various writers, which indicate either the locality of some passage in a quoted work, or the compass of the whole or part of the works of a given author. For example, at the close of Isocrates, Busiris, in Codex Urbanus, we have in the Archiach character the number 390; while on the margin of the same work, in the more recent character, we have on fol. 22, 10 (§ 25), before τοιῶν ἅντων, the number 2 (B); and on 25, 12 (§ 39), before γεγονότος ἡ τοῦ, the number 3 (F); and these numbers represent the second and third hundreds of lines measured on some exemplar, either actual or ideal; Diogenes Laërtius quotes a passage from Chrysippus, κατά τοὺς ψάλλοντας στίχους; and Galen estimates the extent of a certain portion of the works of Hippocrates at two hundred and forty verses; τοῖς τοῦ βιβλίου τὸ μέν κατὰ τὸ ἐν γράμμα μέρος τὸ πρῶτον εἰς αὐτῆς στίχους εἴτε (Galen, in Hippocrate de nat. hom., xx. p. 9).

Full collections of such data may be found in Ritschl: Opusc. Philol., vol. i. pp. 74 seq.; and Birt: Das Antike Buchwesen, c. 4.

Every thing in these data suggests that the numeration has reference to standard lines or copies; and since the actual number of lines in the manuscripts never tallies with the stichometric record, and we are unable to point to any copies which do furnish an agreement, it is evident that there is somewhere a common unit of measurement upon which these subscriptions and quotations are based: in other words, the στίχος must have an element of fixity in it, even if it be not absolutely fixed.

It is important, therefore, to determine in what direction the meaning of the στίχος deflects from its normal indefinite sense of line, row, and verse.

The term στίχος is of itself extremely vague. It may be nothing more than row or line; as, e.g., the LXX. use it for the rows of stones in the high priest's breastplate; or, in a military sense, it may represent the number of men in a rank or file of soldiers, especially the latter; and so in other cases. But in literature it is easy to demonstrate that the στίχος is deflected in meaning in the direction of a hexameter line. In the first place, such a unit is convenient for the comparison of prose-works with poetry; in the next place, we have actual instances of prose-passages reduced to their equivalent verse-lengths: in the third place, we may actually find the term στίχος used of hexameter poetry, in distinction from other; and, finally, we may actually divide any given work into hexameter rhythms, and compare our results with the transmitted numerical data. If we take these points in order, we may say that the prose-unit is more likely to be taken from poetry than the unit of the hexameter. For poetry is likely to be adopted from prose; for the line of poetry is already measured in a sensibly constant unit, and no reason exists for a change of that unit. The only question that would arise here is whether we ought not to expect a variety of units of measurement: as, for instance, an iambic unit in distinction from a hexameter unit. It is sufficient to observe at this point, that such varieties of measurement, if they exist, are extremely rare.

In regard to the actual reduction of a prose-passage to its equivalent verse-length, we have an important case in Galen (v. 655, ed. Kühn), where, having quoted a sentence from Hippocrates, he continues:—

εἰς μὲν ύπὸς ὁ λόγος ἐνέται καὶ τρία οὐκαὶ συλλαβές ὑποτβεν ὑπετα δοῦν καὶ ημῖν οὐκ ἐπέκαθην κτλ.

If Galen then reckons thirty-nine syllables as being equivalent to two hexameters and a half, or, as he continues, eighty-two syllables to five hexameters, the hexameter can hardly be different from a sixteen-syllabled rhythm. We are invited, therefore, to the assumption that stichometric measurement is made by preference in syllables of which sixteen go to the hexameter, or unit-verse. The number 16 invites attention as being the number of syllables in the first line of the Iliad, and as being a square number, a peculiarity which always had a certain attractiveness for early calculators.

That the term στίχος deflected in the direction of hexameter verse as against any other line of poetry which might have been chosen for a proper unit of measurement, will appear from Montfaucon (Bibl. Coislin, p. 597), where there is quoted from a tenth-century manuscript the following catalogue of poets:—

περὶ ποιητῶν δοσι χαί στίχων καὶ λάμβαν τυφρασσάν.

Ομοίος στίχος, Απόλλωνος στίχος, Θεότητα ἡμών, Ἀρτατο ἡμών, Νικανόρ ἡμών, Μεγανόρ ἡμών κτλ.

This broad division of poets into writers by στίχος and writers of iambics can only have resulted from a specialization of the meaning of the term στίχος by constant use in a particular sense.

In the demonstration of the same point by actual measurement, the most important researches are those published by the late Ch. Graux, in the Revue de Philologie, April, 1878, in which he demonstrated, by an actual estimation of the number of letters in certain works, that the στίχος represented not a clause, nor a number of words, but a fixed quantity of writing. The average number of letters to the verse he found to vary between narrow limits, generally thirty-four to thirty-eight letters; and an enumeration of the letters in fifty lines of the Iliad opened at random supplied him with an average of 37.7 letters to the verse. This very important identification of the στίχος with the hexameter is the starting-point for a great many new critical investigations as to the integrity of transmitted texts, their early form, etc. Whether the unit of measurement is a certain number of syllables, or a certain number of letters, is not easy to decide. We may be tolerably certain that the measured line is, as above stated, a space-line, and not a sense-line; but to discriminate between a letter-line and a syllable-line is a more delicate matter. If we adopt the former, we must probably fix the unit at thirty-six letters, because this is the nearest symmetrical number to the average hexameter. We have very few instances, however, in which the actual letters of a line are found to be numbered; while we can readily trace the custom of limiting a line by the division of the syllables, in the earliest manuscripts. Moreover, we have the actual measurement in the passage quoted from Galen; and Pliny seems to allude to the custom of syllable-counting, when, in one of his epistles, he demands an equally long reply from his correspondent, and threatens to count, not only the pages, but the verses on the page, and the syllables of each verse ("Ego non paginas tantum, sed vers. et versetiam syllabasique, mutuo numerabo."

The preference must, therefore, be given to the syllable-line, though, perhaps, not entirely to the exclusion of the other. It is comparatively easy to count the compass of a book in sixteen-syllable rhythms, but a toilsome enough process to estimate with equal accuracy the number of thirty-six-letter lines.

It is interesting to compare the relative sizes of the two line-units. M. Graux deduces 37.7 as the average hexameter in letters, and Diels (Hermes, xvii. Bd.) makes the average of the first fifty lines in Homer to be 15.6 syllables. A verse of sixteen syllables is then equivalent to about 1.074 verses of thirty-six letters each.

In precisely the same way as M. Graux determined the average number of letters to the verse from the total stichometry, in the manuscripts of Homer and his others, Euthalius, Nazianzus, etc., we may proceed to examine the partial stichometry. This has been done for Isocrate's (Rhein. Mus., Bd. 37, p. 468); for the Plato manuscripts, by Schanz (Hermes, xvi. p. 309); and for the Demosthenes manuscripts, by W. v. Christ, in a very able discussion entitled Die Atticausausgabe des Demosthenes, München, 1882.

The partial stichometry is of the highest value for the study of texts; and in every case the data which it supplies are found to accord very closely with our fundamental statements as to the paleographical meaning of the word στίχος.

Some degree of confusion is introduced by the existence, apparently, in early times, of an alternative iambic verse of twelve syllables, as well as by the introduction of writing by Cola and Commata. The latter of these points has been an especial ground of combat, in consequence of the countenance which the custom seemed to lend to the theory of sense-lines in opposition to space-lines. The explanation of the matter seems to be as follows: when the earlier uncial form of writing was deserted for one more convenient for purposes of reading and recitation, the text was broken up into short sentences, named, according to their lengths, Cola and Commata; and in some instances an attempt was made, not only to number these Cola, so as to form a colometry similar to stichometry, and sharing the advantages which it offered for reference and book-measuring, but even to accommodate the arrangement of these Cola so as to reproduce the original number of verses. Thus we find the rhetorician Castor (Wolz. Rhet. Gr., iii. 721) discussing the pseudo-oration of Demosthenes against Philip as follows: τοῖς τοῦ λόγου στίχοις κατὰ κώλα καταγράφεις εἰς τὴν ποιότητα τῶν κώλων κατὰ τὰς κρίσιν τῆς εὐκατάλληλης καὶ τῆς ἐτυγχανόντι καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἀρχαίοις μικροῖς, συνεπειράοντος τὸν χρόνον λόγον. It seems also that this change of form took place first for those books which were publicly recited, or which had a semi-poetical structure; so that the oldest Bible manuscripts desert the continuous uncial writing in the Psalms, in Job, the Proverbs, Canticles, etc.; and St. Jerome proposed to imitate this peculiarly divided text in the prophet: Sed quoque in Deo-commata, qui utique prosa et non versibus conscripsit... nos quoque uti legentium providentes, interpretationem novam novum scribendi generi diuinurn" (preface to Isaiah).

We shall now pass to the stichometry of the New Testament, and in particular to the Epistles: here we shall show that the theory already advanced is completely confirmed, and that we have a very powerful critical implement for the restoration of early New Testament texts in the traditional data. As before, we have both total and partial stichometry. There is, however, a good deal of variation between the transmitted data, arising from various causes, such as variation in the text, variation in the unit employed in the measurement, difference in versions measured, and difference in the abbreviations employed.

The greatest authority, however, for New Testament stichometry, is found in the work of Euthalius, edited by Zacagni, Collect. Mon. Antiq. Eccles. Græc., Rome, 1698; Migne, Patrol., Græc., tom. 66. Euthalius was a deacon of the Church of Alexandria, and, afterwards, bishop of Cesarea. It has frequently but erroneously been credited with the introduction of stichometry to the New Testament, and these verses which he measured have been by many persons identified with the colon-writing previously described. There is very little ground for any such ideas; and we shall find that the στίχος mentioned by Euthalius are hexameters of sixteen syllables, a very slight allowance being made for certain common abbreviations.

The work of Euthalius consisted in editing the Acts and Catholic Epistles, with a complete system of prologues, prefaces, and quotations: every book was divided into lessons, and to every lesson, as well as to the greater part of the prefaces, was appended its numerical extent. The verses were also marked on the margin from fifty to fifty. We have thus a mine of stichometric information sufficient to test any theory in the closest manner.

Moreover, the work has this importance, that Euthalius professes to have measured his verses accurately, and to have employed the best manuscripts: viz., those preserved in the Pamphilian Library at Cesarea. It thus appears that we have the right to set a high value on the measurements made, on the ground of authority as well as of accuracy.

We shall now test these results given by Euthalius for the lections of the Acts of the Apostles; and, taking no account of the abbreviations which might have been found in the text, we shall divide the text of the Acts in Westcott and Hort's New Testament into sixteen-syllabled rhythms. If we had allowed for abbreviation, the results would have been somewhat less, as we might subtract a syllable at every occurrence of the words θεός and χριστός, and two syllables for each occurrence of Ἰησοῦς and κυρίος, with perhaps a few other rarely recurring words, as παράδειγμα. Our data for Euthalius are taken from Cod. Escorial, ψ. iii. 6, as there are some errors in Zacagni's figures.

Allowing for one or two obvious corruptions, such as the dropping of the figure 2 in section 6, the agreement is very complete.

The lines of the following table are nearly hexameters, so that the table affords a picture of the arrangement of an early bicolunnar Codex:
STICHOMETRY. 2247 STIEKNA.

1 1.1 40 40 2 1.1 50 50 3 2.1 100 111 4 3.1 136 143 5 4.32 100 121 6 6.1 88 190 7 8.1 (eye)VfTo 92 94 8 9.1 75 77 9.2 216 210 10 11.27 283 272 11 15.1 193 201 12 17.1 164 164 13 19.1 238 242 14 21.15 288 307 15 24.27 168 160 16 27.1 198 192

Still more remarkable is the harmony between the measured text of Westcott and Hort and the Italian figures, when we allow for the abbreviations previously mentioned. We give the results for the Epistles in a form suitable for comparison. The first column represents the choricometric number supplied by Euthalius and the best manuscripts; these second gives the actual subdivision of the text of Westcott and Hort into sixteen-syllabled verses; and the third expresses the same result with the proper reckoning made for four leading abbreviations.

The agreement between the first and third columns is very complete and decisive as a test of the hypothesis proposed with regard to the nature of the Euthalian orcs. the Gospels the data may be handled in a far manner; but the difficulties arising from the other causes mentioned are great: moreover, many manuscripts transmit not only the number of ψύχα but also another number corresponding to ψύχα of the separate books. We have from the group of cursive manuscripts the following figures for the four Gospels:

From this it appears that the number of ψύχα is sometimes in excess, and sometimes in defect, of the number of verses. What these ψύχα are is a hard question. Some persons have identified them with the ψυχος—a supposition that will scarcely bear scrutiny. It is doubtful, moreover, whether the verses of the Gospels are measured by the same unit as we found employed in the Acts and Epistles. A fifteen-syllabled hexameter seems to agree best with the traditional figure. The Gospel of John, in the text of Westcott and Hort, is 2,023 abbreviated fifteen-syllabled hexameters, an almost absolute agreement with the result given above (2,024). For the other Gospels the matter must be left for more extended investigation.

STIEFEL (STIFEL), Michael, a distinguished arithmetician of the Reformation; was b. at Esslingen, April 19, 1486; entered the Augustinian convent there, left it for Wittenberg in 1520; stood on friendly terms with Luther; after holding several pastorates, was appointed in 1558 professor of mathematics at Jena, with a salary of forty florins (afterwards increased to sixty florins); d. in Jena, April 19, 1567. In 1532 he published Ein Rechenbuchlein vom End Christi, in which, upon the basis of the figures in Daniel, he set the day of judgment at eight o'clock in the morning of Oct. 19, 1533. His arithmetical studies and works (Rechenbuch von d. westlichen und deutschen Prackt, 1546, etc.) did much to promote the study of mathematics in Germany. Luther called Stiefel a "pious, learned, moral, and industrious man." C. Schwanz.

STIEKNA (or DE STEKEN), Conrad, also called Conradus ab Austria, one of the forerunners of John Hus; d. at Prague, 1369. Balbinus speaks of him as preacher in the Tein church, Prague. He zealously condemned the hypocrisy, simony, and licentiousness of the priests which he described in dark colors. In his larger work, Accusationes M mendicantium, he attacked with great heat the orders of begging friars, and did not spare the bishops. STIER, Rudolf Ewald, a distinguished German exegete; was b. at Fraustadt, March 17, 1800; d. at Eisleben, Dec. 16, 1869. Set apart for the study of law, he entered the university of Jena in 1815, but the year following enrolled himself among the students of theology. His ideals at that time were Jahn and Jean Paul, with the latter of whom he carried on a correspondence. In 1818 he went to Halle, where he was chosen president of the Halle Bursenschaf. It was not till 1819 that he truly gave himself up to Christ, and began the study of theology from the proper motive. The occasion of this change was the death of a young lady whom he loved. He then went to Berlin, and after completing his studies, successively held the position of teacher at Wittenberg, Karalene, and in the missionary institute of Basel. In 1829 he became pastor at Frankleben. The writer of this, at an inn, got the following answer to a question about Stier: "He is a Christian cabalist;" to which he replied, "You are quite right, but he has had to learn the "theology of the cross.""

Stier's principal works are in the department of biblical exegesis. He was interested in the German translation of the Bible; wrote Altes u. Neues in deutscher Bibel, Basel, 1828, and Darf Luther's Bibel unberichtigt bleiben?, Halle, 1836; was associated with Von Meyer in the last edition of his translation, 1842, and prepared an edition of his own in 1860 (Bielefeld), in which many changes were introduced. His principal work was the Words of the Lord Jesus (Reden d. Herrn, 1st ed., 1843, 7 vols.; 2d ed., 1865-74, 7 vols.; Eng. trans. by Pope, Edinb., 9 vols.; revised by Drs. Strong and H. B. Smith, N. Y., 1869, 3 vols.). It is a storehouse of information on the subject of the relations of the mind to the body. He was married to the sister of the distinguished theologian Nitzsch.

STILLING, Edward, b. at Cranborne in Dorsetshire, April 17, 1655; d. at Westminster, March 27, 1699. He was educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1673. Just after the Restoration, he published his Irenicum, a weapon salve for the Churches wounds (1661), a moderate and healing treatise, very appropriate in that age of fierce ecclesiastical strife, and reflecting honor on the courage and catholicity of the author at that particular crisis. The following year appeared his Origines Sacrae, or Rational Account of the Christian Faith as to the Truth and Divine Authority of the hieroglyphic books of the ancient Egyptians, of the Latin, Greek, and even Hebrew. A Roman-Catholic priest confided to him a secret means by which to cure certain eye-diseases, and this circumstance changed his destiny. An audacious but successful cure made him acquainted with a well-to-do gentleman, whose daughter he afterwards married; and in 1771 he went to Strassburg to study medicine. He there obtained something of a scientific training, and became doctor medicina; but it was of still greater consequence to him, that he there became acquainted with Goethe and Herder, and elevated above the level of a somewhat narrow and barren Pietism. He settled first at Elberfeld as an eye-physician; and there he published, by the aid of Goethe, his H. Stilling's Jugend, which by its wonderful blending of poesy and fact, of fiction and truth, at once established him as a writer of rank. But he had a genius for getting into debt; and for many years his time and labor were divided between managing creditors, curing poor people's eyes, and writing devotional books which were the consolation and admiration of the German people. In 1778 he was made professor of political economy in the academy of Kaiserslautern, whence he removed, in the same quality, to Heidelberg in 1782, and to Marburg in 1787. But it was not until 1805 that he, by being appointed privy-councillor to the grand duke of Baden, was liberated from drudgery and pecuniary troubles, and allowed to follow his genius as an eye-physician and a devotional writer. He was three times married, and every time happily. When he grew older, his house, through ever so singularly managed, became a centre towards which every thing grand, or noble, or suffering, tended, while every thing base or hard crept skulking away. The most successful of his writings were his mystical tales, a kind of romances at which both Lavater and Jacobi tried their powers, and which had a peculiar charm for that time: Geschichte des Herrn von Morgenthau (The Life of Sir Morningdew), Theodore von den Linden, Florentin von Fahldorn, etc. The greatest literary value have his autobiographical writings: Jugend, Jünglingsjahre, Wandschaft, and Lehrjahre. His chief theological works are, Siegesgeschichte, an exposition of the Revelation, and Geisterkunde, partially based on Swedenborg. See Heinroth: Geschichte des Mysticismus, Leip., 1830; Rudelet: Christliche Biographien; Aus dem Papieren einer Tochter Johann Stilling's, Bar men, 1840; Nessler: Etude theologique sur Johann Stilling, Strassburg, 1860. by Stillingfleet, was published in 1697. He was a metaphysician, as well as a divine, and criticised Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding the same year, following that up soon afterwards by a rejoinder to Locke's reply. He wrote also on other subjects, and, according to says Bishop Nicholson, "of the present state of our tithes." A collected edition of this author's works, with his life and character, was published after his death in 1699.

As bishop of Worcester, which he became in 1689, he took part in the commission for revising the Prayer-Book; and in his episcopal capacity he procured a stall in Worcester Cathedral for Bentley, the great classical scholar, who was the prelate's chaplain.

JOHN STOUTGTON.

STOCKER, John, of Honiton, Devonshire, published in the Gospel Magazine (1776-77) nine hymns, which were reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1861. Two of them, "Gracious Spirit, Dove divine," and "Thy, mercy, my God," have been widely used.

F. M. BIRD.

STOCKTON, Thomas Hewlings, D.D., Methodist-Protestant; b. at Mount Holly, N. J., June 4, 1808; d. in Philadelphia, Oct. 9, 1868. Converted in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, he joined the Methodist-Protestant Church on its organization, and in 1829 was placed upon a circuit. He was stationed in Baltimore, 1830; chaplain to the House of Representatives, 1833-35, 1839-41, and of the Senate, 1842. He preached in Philadelphia, 1835-47, in Cincinnati until 1850, in Baltimore until 1856, in Philadelphia, over an independent church, until his death. He was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. He compiled a hymn-book for his denomination (1857), and published some original poetry, and several volumes in prose. See his biography by A. Clark, New York, 1869, and by J. G. Wilson, Philadelphia, 1869.

STODDARD, David Tappan, Congregational missionary; b. at Northampton, Mass., Dec. 2, 1818; d. at Tabriz, Persia, Jan. 22, 1857. He was graduated at Yale, 1838, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1841; sailed as missionary to the Nestorians, 1843, among whom he labored successfully for the rest of his days. From 1848 to 1851 he was in America on a visit. He was particularly interested in the Nestorian youths whom he gathered in the seminary established in 1844 at Orumiah. He was a model missionary. His Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language was published in the journal of the American Oriental Society, New Haven, Conn., 1853. See J. P. Thompson: Memoir of D. T. Stoddard, New York, 1858.

STODDARD, Solomon, Congregationalist: b. in Boston, Mass., 1843; d. at Northampton, Mass., Feb. 11, 1729. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1692; was chaplain in the Barbadoes for two years; preached at Northampton from 1699 until his death, when he was succeeded by his grandson, and colleague from 1727, Jonathan Edwards. From 1667 to 1674 he was first librarian to Cambridge. He is remembered for his theory that "the Lord's Supper is instituted to be a means of regeneration," and that persons may and ought to come to it, though they know themselves to be in a "natural condition." He wrote The safety of appearing at the day of Judgement in the righteousness of Christ, Boston, 1687 (2d ed., 1729; republished, Edinburgh, 1792, with Preface by Dr. John Erskine); The doctrine of instituted churches explained and proved from the Word of God, Boston, 1700, 94 pp., 4to; a reply to Increase Mather's The best account of the churches practised by the churches of Christ in New England, justified, etc., Boston and London, 1700; An Appeal to the learned, being a vindication of the right of visible saints to the Lord's Supper, though they be destitute of a saving work of God's Spirit in their hearts, 1709; A guide to Christ, or the way of directing souls that are under the work of conversion, 1714; An answer to some cases of conscience, 1722 ("among other things, it discusses whether men have the right to live at an inconvenient distance from church; when the Lord's Day begins; whether the Indians were wronged in the purchase of their land"). See art. Congregationalism, p. 588; and DEXTER: Congregationalism as seen in its Literature.

STOICISM, the noblest system of morals developed within the pale of Greek philosophy, received its name from the place in Athens in which its founder, Zeno of Citium (about 308 B.C.) assembled his pupils, the Stoa, or colonnade. The metaphysical foundation of the system involves a final identification of God and nature, submerging both those ideas in that of an inevitable destiny. In its more austere forms, stoicism defines moral perfection as complete indifference to destiny. Man shall do that which is good, independently of surrounding influences and conditions; and, having done that which is good, he shall feel happy, independently of the sufferings and misery which may result from his acts. In its later and somewhat mitigated forms, stoicism defined that which is good, virtue, as conformity to the all-controlling laws of nature, or even as agreement between the human and the divine will. Always, however, it placed action above contemplation or enjoyment; and, by so doing, it exercised a great influence on the Roman mind. In Rome it found its most eloquent expounder, Seneca, and its noblest representatives, Marcus Aurelius the emperor, and Epictetus the slave; and by inciting the duty of absolute obedience to the commandments of duty, of absolute self-sacrifice for the sake of virtue, it actually prepared the way for Christianity. The best representation of the whole subject is found in Zeller: Philosophie d. Griechen, iii., Eng. trans., The Stoics, Epicureans, and Skeptics, London, 1869. See also Ravaission: Essais sur le Stoicisme, Paris, 1856; Dourif: Du Stoicisme et du Christianisme, Paris, 1863; H. A. Winckler: Der Stoizismus eine Wurzel des Christenthums, Leipzig, 1856; W. W. STOLBERG, Friedrich Leopold, Count von, b. at Bramstedt in Holstein, Nov. 7, 1760; d. at Sondermuhlen in Hanover, Dec. 5, 1819. He was educated in Copenhagen, but, under the influence of Cramer and Klostock, studied at Halle and Göttingen, where he became one of the most prominent members of the Hainbund, and traveled (1775-78) through Germany and Switzerland with Goethe and Lavater. In 1777 he went to Copenhagen as the representative of the prince-STOBBE, Bishop of Lübeck to the Danish court, in 1780 he went to Berlin as Danish ambassador, and in 1793 he settled as president of the government of the principality of Eutin. But the literary and political enthusiasm of his youth, the fruits of which were lyrical poems, translations of Homer, Eschylus, and Ossian, dramas, etc., gradually became of less influence by the influence of the Princess Galitzin he was converted to Romanism in 1800. He resigned his position at Eutin, retired into private life, and occupied himself mostly with religious authorship. His principal work is Geschichle der Religion Jesu Christi, Hamburg, 1806-18, 14 vols. Among his other works are Betrachtungen und Beherzigungen (1819-21), 2 vols.; a life of Vincent of Paula, Münster, 1818; Büchlein von der Liebe, 1820, etc. His collected works appeared in Hamburg, 1825, 20 vols. His life was written by A. Nicolovius, Mayence, 1846.

STONING AMONG THE HEBREWS. This capital punishment was ordained by the Mosaic law for the following classes of criminals: (1) All who trespassed upon the honor of Jehovah, i.e., idolaters (Lev. xx.; Deut. xvii. 2); adulterers to idolatry (Deut. xii. 28 sq.), all blasphemers (Lev. xxiv. 10 sq.; comp. 1 Kings xxii. 10 sq.; Acts vi. 13, vii. 56 sq.), sabbath-breakers (Num. xv. 32 sq.), fortune-tellers and soothsayers (Lev. xx. 27), also false prophets (Deut. xiii. 11); (2) in fine, those who had shared in any accursed thing (Josh. vii. 25); (2) Notoriously and incorrigibly disobedient sons (Deut. xvi. 18 sq.); (3) Bridges whose tokens of virginity were wanting (Deut. xxii. 20 sq.), and so an afflicted woman who had complied with a seducer, together with the seducer himself (ver. 23 sq.). According to Jewish criminal procedure, the same penalty was incurred by those who cursed their parents, or had sexual connection with their mother, stepmother, daughter-in-law, or with a beast. Adulterers were punished with stoning (Ezek. xvi. 37 sq.), and the witnesses threw the first stone upon the culprit, we see from Deut. xvii. 7; Acts vii. 57, 58). It was resorted to, not only by the Jews, but also by Syrians (2 Mace. i. 16), by the Greeks (Herod., ix. 5; Thucyd., v. 60; Paus., viii. 5, 8; Ptol., viii. 19; Curtius, vii. 21), and other nations.

STOWELL, Hugh, an eminent evangelical clergyman; rector of Christ Church, Salford; canon of Chester, etc.; was b. at Douglas, Isle of Man, Dec. 3, 1799, and d. at Salford, Oct. 8, 1865. A memoir by Rev. J. B. Marsden appeared 1868. He wrote The Pleasures of Religion, with other Poems (1832), Tractarianism tested (1845, 2 vols.), and A Model for Men of Business; and edited A Selection of Psalms and Hymns (1831), containing the very popular "From every stormy wind that blows." His forty-six hymns were published by his son and successor, 1868.

STRABO, Walsafred (Wolafridus Strabus, "the squinter"), d. July 17, 849; was, according to some writers, a Suabian by birth, according to others an Anglo-Saxon; studied at Blaubeuren, and finally at Fulda, under Rabanus Maurus, and was in 842 made abbot of Reichenau. He was a very prolific writer. His principal work is the so-called Glossa ordinaria, a huge exegetical compilation, the oldest printed edition,— without date or place, comprising four volumes in folio,— which for several centuries formed the principal source and the highest authority of biblical science in the Latin Church, and was in use down to the seventeenth century. Another work of his, De exortis et incrementis rerum ecclesiasticarum, printed in Hittorp's Scriptores officii divini, Cologne, 1598, is also of interest. It is a kind of handbook in ecclesiastical archaeology, treating in thirty-one chapters various ceremonies, altars, bells, images, etc. He also wrote poems and historical works.

STRAUB, Eduard, b. at Dillingen a. d. Donau, 1825, d. at Munich, 1890. He was the son of a Lutheran clergyman, who became later a Roman Catholic, and himself a Catholic priest. He was educated in the Catholic seminary at Langenargen, and then at Munich, where he became acquainted with Goldschmidt and Schelling, and then with those of the mystic philosophy of Meister Eckhart. He also lectured upon Hegel's philosophy in the university. His lectures were a brilliantsuccess; but he soon found his position too uncomfortable, owing to his opinions. He had planned a life of Jesus upon critical principles, and attacked with such ardor his great task, that in a year he wrote the book which has made him immortal,— Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet, STRAUSS, David Friedrich, b. at Ludwigsburg near Stuttgart, in the kingdom of Württemberg, Jan. 27, 1808; d. there Feb. 8, 1874. He studied theology (1825-30) at the university of Tübingen, where he came under the influence of Baur, who had formerly been his teacher in the seminary at Blaubeuren. He took up first with the ideas of Schelling, and then with those of the mystic Jacob Boehme. He became profoundly interested in natural magic in its different forms. But the study of Schleiermacher dissipated his mysticism. Theology had, however, less attractions for him than Hegel's philosophy, which, indeed, combined the two. He passed his final examinations with distinction, and became assistant minister in a little village near Ludwigsburg. His simple discourses were enjoyed by his parishioners, and his pastoral duties were well performed; but after nine months he resigned (1831), since he found himself too much distracted by religious doubts to stay, and was for six months temporary professor in the seminary at Maulbronn, a tricentennial city, and then with Baur to Berlin to hear Schleiermacher and Hegel. The latter died of cholera shortly after his arrival. In 1832 he was called to Tübingen as repetent in the seminary. He also lectured upon Hegel's philosophy in the university. His lectures were a brilliant success; but he soon found his position uncomfortable, owing to his opinions. He had planned a life of Jesus upon critical principles, and attacked with such ardor his great task, that in a year he wrote the book which has made him immortal,— Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet, for his book raised a storm of opposition. He was removed from his position at Tubingen in 1838 he retired to private life. The action of the authorities was wise, for his book raised a storm of opposition. He applied the mythical theory which had made such havoc with Greek and Roman history, and which De Wette had applied to the Old Testament, to the Gospels, with the result that all miracles were turned into myths (see Mythical Theory): all.

There was no God-man as a person. The Incarnate God is the human race. Humanity is the child of a visible mother, but invisible father. It is the race which works miracles by its use of natural forces. It dies, and lives again, and mounts to heaven, because, raised above personal existence, it is united with the heavenly and eternal spirit. In this work Strauss ignored critical study of the text. He considered the four Gospels as the altered oral tradition. He accepted, however, the synoptical discourses. His theory was confronted by the dilemma so masterfully put by Ullmann in his Historisch oder Mythisch? (Hamburg, 1858) that either the Christian was the invention of the apostolic church, or the apostolic church was founded by Christ. Neander, Tholuck, Lücke, Lange, and others successfully refuted his theory; and his book is of value only for its purely negative criticism.

In the second and third editions, and in his Streitschriften (Tubingen, 1887–88, 3 vols.), he endeavored to reply to the attacks made upon him, and conceded spiritual authority to the Founder of Christianity. It was his desire to make his peace with the theologians, which led him in 1838 to write the Zwei friedliche Blittrter, Altona, 1839. In 1839 the radical party at Zürich nominated him professor of theology in the university there; but a popular outbreak prevented his acceptance, although for the rest of his life he continued to draw a thousand francs yearly (half the salary). In 1839 he published at Leipzig Charakteristiken u. Kritiken, 2d ed., 1844, embracing essays upon Schleiermacher, Daub, Kerner, animal magnetism, and modern possessions, etc.

In the fourth edition of his Leben Jesu (1840), the first one printed in German characters, Strauss withdrew all the concessions of the second and third, and boldly threw down the glove to the theologians. His second chief work was Die christliche Glaubenslehre in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung, or the new form of Christianity which had made such havoc with Greek and Roman history, and which Strauss supplied the grave defect of his first Lebens-und Charakter-Bild aus der Gegenwart, Mannheim, 1851; Leben und Schriften Nikodemus Frischnicks, Frankfurt, 1855; Ulick von Huten, Leipzig, 1857, 4th ed., 1876 (English condensed French trans., by Littre, Paris, 1839, 2 vols.; Kng. Leipzig,1865, 11th ed., Bonn, 1881 (Eng. trans. by Mathilde Blind, London and New York, 1873), with appendix, 1874. In the first of these four books, Strauss supplied the grave defect of his first Lebens- und Charakter-Bild aus der Gegenwart, Mannheim, 1851; Leben und Schriften Nikodemus Frischnicks, Frankfurt, 1855; Ulick von Huten, Leipzig, 1857, 4th ed., 1876 (English condensed French trans., by Littre, Paris, 1839, 2 vols.; Kng. Leipzig, 1865, 11th ed., Bonn, 1881 (Eng. trans. by Mathilde Blind, London and New York, 1873), with appendix, 1874. In the first of these four books, Strauss supplied the grave defect of his first Leben Jesu by prefacing the history with a critical study of the Gospels, particularly Mathew, to whose discourses he assigned historical importance. He granted that Jesus "stands foremost among those who have given a higher ideal to humanity," and that it was impossible to refrain from admiring and loving him. He also says we cannot do without Christianity, and it cannot be lost. In the second work, Strauss ridiculed Schenkel's liberalism as contrasted with Hengstenberg's whole-souled orthodoxy. In the third, he reviews Schleiermacher's life of Christ, then first published. In his fourth work he sets himself to answer four questions: Are we yet Christians? Have we still a religion? How do we look at the universe? How shall we regulate our life? The first question he answers negatively. He repudiates his former veneration for Christianity, and calls Christ's resurrection "a world-historical humbug." To the second query he replies, that we can only believe in an absolute being cannot be conscious or personal. To the third, he says, the universe is "only a development from a blind force or law, without any foreseen end." The fourth question is answered by saying, that we must live for the good we find here, for science and art. He has no hereafter.

Strauss died of cancer of the stomach, after great sufferings borne with stoical patience. The deaconess who nursed him in his last illness relates (according to good authority), that during his agony he repeatedly called out, "Lord, have mercy upon me!" But he was buried, by his own request, without religious rites of any kind.

Lit. — STRAUSS's Gesammelte Schriften, with an Introduction by Eduard Zeller, appeared at Bonn, 1876-78, 12 vols. In this edition the first Leben Jesu, Die Christliche Glaubenslehre, and Characteristiken u. Kritiken, are not reprinted, but Denkwürdigkeiten aus meinem Leben, zum Andenken an meine Mutter, and Poetisches Gedenkblüch, appear for the first time. For the biography of Strauss see E. ZELLER: D. F. Strauss, in seinen Leben u. in seiner Musik, 1874, Eng. trans., London, 1874; and A. HAUSMANN: Der F. Strauss u. die Theologie seiner Zeit, Heidelberg, 1876-78, 2 vols.; also SCHLOTTMANN: David Strauss als Romantiker des Heidenthums, Halle, 1875. Among the many replies to Strauss's Old Faith and the New may be mentioned ULRICI's, translated and annotated by KRAUTH, Philadelphia, 1874; and Dr. H. B. SMITH's brilliant review in Faith and Philosophy, New York, 1877. Cf. the art. on Strauss by A. FREYDINGER, in Lichtenberger's Encyclopädie, xi. 714-729, and by Professor H. B. STRIGEL, Victorinus, a pupil of Melanchthon, and an advocate of synergism; was b. at Kaufbeuren, Dec. 26, 1514; d. at Heidelberg, June 26, 1599. He studied at Wittenberg, under Melanchthon; was professor at Erfurt, and in 1548 became the first professor and rector of the new school at Jena. Here he came into conflict with Flacius, whom he recommended for a professorship in 1557. It was a conflict between the Melanchthonian theology and strict Lutheranism. A public controversy, lasting fifteen days, between these two men, was held in 1560 at the castle of Weimar. The only point discussed was the relation of the human will to divine grace in the work of conversion. In 1563 Strigel became professor at Leipzig; but in 1567 the lecture-room was closed to him on account of his moderate Lutheranism, and he became professor at Heidelberg. His principal work was Hypommemata in omnes libros N. T., etc., Leipzig, 1556. See ERMANN: De Strigeliamino, Jena, 1658; HANOWER, 1675; MERZ: Hist. vae et controvers. V. Strigelii, Tübingen, 1732; OTTO: Die Str. etv. Biberiors mentis in eccles. luth. vindice, Jena, 1654.

STRONG, Nathan, D.D., b. in Coventry, Conn., Oct. 16, 1748; d. in Hartford, Conn., Dec. 25, 1816, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. Having been graduated at Yale College in 1769, he pursued the study of law for a time; was a tutor in Yale College in 1772, 1778; and, after a brief course of theological reading, was ordained pastor of the First Congregational Church in Hartford, Conn., Jan. 5, 1774. He found the church weak: he left it the strongest in the State. Some of the ablest men in the country belonged to it. He remained in this pastorate nearly forty-two years. During the first part of it, amid our colonial troubles with Great Britain, he published many political papers which exerted a wide and deep influence. He was the only faculty which gave him great power in political discussions. His wit was woven "into the very texture of his mind." "Notwithstanding all his struggles against it," he could not entirely repress it; and he often let it fly like a javelin against the opponents of the Revolution. He never yielded to it in the pulpit: there he was uniformly and eminently solemn and impressive. In his controversies, however, with the infidels of his day, he did not restrain his instinctive tendency to sarcasm. Their safety lay in letting him alone. Like many other pastors, he suffered in his finances from the influence of the Revolutionary war. His salary became insufficient and uncertain. In order to relieve his failing exchequer, he invested a part of his patrimonial estate in a mercantile establishment, which afterward, the oldest of the several circumstances connected with this loss, followed as they were by two severe bereavements, had a decisive influence on his ministerial character. During the last twenty years of his pastorate he became eminent as a "revival preacher." In the best sense of the term he was a pulpit orator. His person was attractive and imposing, his eloquence was earnest and emphatic, his thoughts were clear, his sympathies ardent, his religious feelings profound. He had a wonderful memory, and a command of appropriate language. He was sometimes thought to be preaching extempore when in fact he was reading his manuscript, and sometimes he was thought to be reading his manuscript when in fact he was preaching extempore. His knowledge of human nature was remarkable. This gave him an exceptional degree of authority among the churches, and a rare degree of skill in conducting religious revivals. He was an indefatigable student; but his learning was developed in his intellectual character, and not in his references to books. His talents were versatile: his attainments were multifarious, and not concentrated on a few points. His method of writing was rapid: he did not stop to perfect his style; and accordingly, among the many works which he performed, he left nothing which will endure as a visible monument of his real greatness. He published two volumes of sermons, — one in 1798, and one in 1800. Both of them were designed and adapted to guard the purity of religious revivals. He was a pioneer in the cause of Christian missions. He has been considered the father of the Connecticut Missionary Society, the principal editor of it for fifteen years, and the sole editor of it for five of these years. His numerous contributions to it had a memorable influence on the religious welfare of what were then our "new settlements." He was also the projector of the Hartford Selection of Hymns. Several of these he composed himself, and was the chief editor of the volume published in 1799. The most elaborate of his productions is entitled The Doctrine of Eternal Misery reconcileable with the Infinite Benevolence of God (1798). The history of this volume is remarkable. In addition to these writings he published fourteen sermons in pamphlet form, the first in 1777, the last in 1818.

EDWARD A. PARK.

STRYPE, John, a distinguished historiographer of the English Reformation, b. at St. Canep, Nov. 1, 1643; d. at Hackney, Dec. 11, 1737. After passing through St. Paul's school, he entered Jesus College, Cambridge (1662), from which he was transferred to Catherine Hall, where he took his degree. He was made curate of Theydon-Boys, Essex, in 1669, and of Low Leyton, Essex, the same year. Archbishop Tenison afterwards conferred upon him the sinecure of Tarring, Sussex, which he resigned in 1724. His principal writings are an edition of Lightfoot's Works, London, 1684, 2 vols.; Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, 1694, new ed., Oxford, 1848, 3 vols.; Life of Sir Thomas Smith, 1689; Life of Dr. John Aylmer, Bishop of London, 1701; Life of Sir John Cheke, 1705; Annals of the Reformation, 1709-31, 4 vols.; Life and Actions of Archbishop Grindal, 1710; Life and Letters of Dr. John Parker, 1717; Life of Archibishop Whigfield, 1718; Ecclesiastical Memoirs, 1721, 3 vols. The most important of these works, which have been a storehouse for modern historians of the Elizabethan period, is the Annals of the Reformation, which, as the author says in his dedication to the king, "commences at the happy accession of Queen Elizabeth to the throne, when the great and divine work was taken in hand of removing the gross superstitions and errors of Rome which had been restored by Queen Mary." Strype was a diligent collector of materials, faithful and minute, but lacked skill of arrangement. The complete works of Strype were issued at Oxford, 1820-40, in 27 vols.

STUART, Moses, b. in Wilton, Conn., March 26, 1780; d. in Andover, Mass., Jan. 4, 1852, aged seventy-one years, nine months, and nine days. When a lad of but twelve years, he became absorbed in the perusal of Edwards on the Will. In his fifteenth year, entering an academy in Norwalk, Conn., he learned the whole Latin grammar in three days, and then joined a class who had devoted several months to Latin studies. In May, 1797, having been under the careful tuition of Roger Minot Sherman, he was admitted as a sophomore to Yale College. Here he derived the salutary oration, at that time the highest appointment awarded to the class. One year after leaving Yale he taught an academy in North Fairfield, Conn., and in the following year was principal of a high school at Danbury, Conn. Having pursued the study of the law, he was admitted to the bar in 1802, at Danbury. His fertile and versatile mind, his enthusiasm and prodigious memory, gave promise of eminent success in the legal profession. From his legal study at this time he derived signal advantages through life. Several of the following books and essays have been republished in Europe, and several have been republished in this country since his decease: Grammar of the Hebrew Language, without Points, 1813; Letters to Rev. William E. Channing, D.D., on the Divinity of Christ, 1819 (reprinted in five successive editions); Grammar of the Hebrew Language, with points, 1821 (6th ed. in 1838); Letters to Rev. Samuel Miller, D.D., on the Eternal Generation of the Son of God, 1822; Winer's Greek Grammar of the New Testament, translated by professors Stuart and Robinson, 1825; Practical Rules for Greek Accents, 1829; Elementary Principles of Interpretation, from the Latin of Ernesti, 4th ed. in 1842; Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1827-28, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1836, in 1 vol.); Hebrew Chrestomathy, 1829 (2d ed., 1832); Grammar of the New-Testament Dialect, 2d ed., improved, 1834; Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 1832, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1835, in 1 vol.); Notes to Hug's Introduction to the New Testament, 1836; Hints on the Prophecies, 2d ed., 1842; Commentary on the Apocalypse, 1845; Critical History and Defence of the Old-Testament Canon, 1845; Translation of Roediger's Gesenius, 1846; Commentary on Daniel, 1850; Conscience and the Constitution, 1850; Commentary on Ecclesiastes, 1851; Commentary on the Book of Proverbs, 1832.

In addition to the preceding works, he published fourteen pamphlets; thirty-four articles, containing fifteen hundred pages, in the American Biblical Repository; fourteen articles, containing four hundred and ninety pages, in the Bibliotheca Sacra; thirty-three important articles for other periodicals,—in all more than three thousand printed octavo pages. STUDITES, Simeon, is mentioned as a monk in the famous monastery of Studium in Constantinople, and as author of a number of notable religious hymns. See MÜLLER (Studium coen. Const., Leipzig, 1721) and Leo Allatius (De Symeonum scriptis, Paris, 1694), where another Simeon Studites, a theologian, and writer of homilies and hymns, is also mentioned.

STUDITES, Theodore, b. in Constantinople in 738; d. in the Island of Chalcis, Nov. 11, 826. He became a monk in the monastery of Studium in 741, and in 758 he was called as abbot of the same house; he married his former guardian, and then founded a monastery for nuns, and under his rule the institution became very prosperous. But after the death of Boniface, in 755, conflicts arose between his successor, Lullus, and the abbot of Fulda, first concerning the possession of the revenues of St. Boniface, and then concerning the administration of the property of the institution. As internal troubles were added, Sturm was summoned before King Pepin, and banished to the monastery of Juomedica; but the sympathy for the abbots was strong throughout the whole Frankish Empire, that Pepin not only restored the revenues, but also gave the abbot of Fulda a concession of the houses of the monks. See Simeon Studites, a theologian, and writer of religious hymns. See Jacob Sirmond: Opera varia, Venice, 1728, especially part V. NEUDECKER.

STURM, the first abbot of Fulda; b. in Bavaria in 710; d. at Fulda, Dec. 17, 779. He descended from a rich and distinguished family; joined Boniface on his second missionary tour through central Germany; studied in the cloister school of Fritzlar, and was ordained a priest there in 733. As he took a prominent part in the foundation of the monastery of Fulda, he was by Boniface made its first abbot, and under his rule the institution became very prosperous. But after the death of Boniface, in 755, conflicts arose between his successor, Lullus, and the abbot of Fulda, first concerning the possession of the remains of St. Boniface, and then concerning the administration of the property of the institution. As internal troubles were added, Sturm was summoned before King Pepin, and banished to the monastery of Juomedica; but the sympathy for the abbots was strong throughout the whole Frankish Empire, that Pepin not only restored the revenues, but also gave the abbot of Fulda a concession of the houses of the monks. See Simeon Studites, a theologian, and writer of religious hymns. See Jacob Sirmond: Opera varia, Venice, 1728, especially part V. NEUDECKER.

STURM, Johann, b. at Sleida, in 1507; d. at Strassburg, in 1559. He was educated at Liège, and studied at Louvain. He then visited Paris, where he lectured on St. Augustine, after the method of Rudolph Agricola, and was in 1537 called to Strassburg, where he founded the celebrated gymnasium on humanist principles, completely discarding the scholastic methods. In Paris he had adopted the Reformation; and, as he was a man of tact and eloquence, he was often employed in the negotiations between Protestants and Romanists, and maintained to the end of his life a hope of their final reconciliation. Personally he corresponded with Calvin and the French Reformers, he inclined towards the Reformed conception of the Lord's Supper; and after the death of Jakob Sturm, in 1555, he was vehemently attacked by the Lutherans in Strassburg. After ten years' controversy, a consensus was brought about in 1563; but the disagreement broke forth again, and in 1581 Sturm was deposed from his office as rector of the gymnasium. See C. Schmidt: La vie et les travaux de Jean Sturm, Strassburg, 1855.

C. SCHMIDT.

STYLITES (from στύλος, "a pillar"), or PILAR-Saints, denote one of the most extreme forms of Christian asceticism; a class of anchorites who spent their life on the top of a pillar, never descending, always standing (protected from falling only by a frail railing), exposed to the open air day and night, summer and winter. The inventor of this monstrosity was Simeon, generally called the "Syrian," or the "Older," to distinguish him from other Simeons, also Stylites; b. at Sesam, in Northern Syria, in 390 or 391; d. at Telennesa, near Antioch, in 459. His parents were Christians, and he grew up as a shepherd; but when, in his thirteenth year, he for the first time attended service in a church, he was so overwhelmed, that he decided to leave his herds, and become a monk. He entered first a monastery in the vicinity of his home, where he spent two years, and then the monastery of St. Eusebionas, near Telaida, where he spent ten years. But the asceticism of the monastery was not severe enough for him. He settled as anchorite at Telennesa, and one of the feet to which he trained himself was fasting for forty days in a hut; but the crowds of admirers which thronged around him disturbed him; and, in order to escape them, he ascended a column seventy-two feet high and four feet in diameter. On the top of that column he spent thirty years. From sunup to sunset he meditated, generally bending forwards and backwards, in regular alternation, without intermission; from sunrise to sunset he preached to the people assembled at the foot of the pillar, advised them, and gave them what spiritual aid he could. He wrote sharp letters to Theodosius II., Leo I., and the Empress Eudoxia, and his admonitions were... followed; and when he died he was buried with all possible ecclesiastical and military pomp at Antioch. There was, indeed, something in his life, which, though it seems almost monstrous to the eyes of our time, impressed his own time as truly great, and he found many imitators. Stylites followed; and when he died he was buried with all possible ecclesiastical and military pomp at the eyes of our time, impressed his own time as no doubt, invigorated and purged by the example others, the religious life of the congregations was, to maintain a stylite on a magnificent pillar: at time it was almost a fashion among rich people are mentioned as far down as the twelfth century. Simeon Fulminatus, who was hurled from his pillar by a thunderbolt, lived from 1143 to 1180. There was, indeed, something in his who spent seventy years on his pillars. At one time it was almost a fashion among rich people to maintain a stylite on a magnificent pillar: at others, the religious life of the congregations was, no doubt, invigorated and purged by the example of the pillar-saint.

Suarez, Francis, a learned and authoritative teacher of the order of the Jesuits; was b. at Grenada, Spain, Jan. 5, 1548; d. in Lisbon, Sept. 26, 1617. Following the death of his parents, he began the study of law. Deeply impressed in his seventeenth year by a sermon of the Jesuit John Ramirez, he determined to enter the order of the Jesuits, and began the study of philosophy and theology at Salamanca. At the close of his studies he discoursed upon Aristotle at Segovia, taught theology at Valladolid, and acted as professor for eight years in Rome. Obliged by sickness to return to Spain, he taught for eight years at Alcala, and one year at Salamanca, when Philip II. appointed him principal professor of theology at Coimbra. His lectures must have produced an immense sensation, if the half of the reports is to be believed. Some attributed his wisdom to divine inspiration, and called him "the second Augustine," "the prodigy and oracle of the age," etc. He was on a visit to Lisbon to compose a difficulty between the Papal legate and the royal councilors, when he died. His epitaph ran, "The teacher of Europe, as also of the whole world, an Aristotle in the natural sciences, an angelic Thomas in divinity, a Jerome in style, an Augustine in poetry, an Athanasius in the explication of the faith, a Bernard in mellifluous piety, a Gregory in the exposition of the Scriptures, and, in a word, the eye of the Christian world, but in his own judgment, nothing (ac verbo oculus populi Christiani sed suo solius judicio, nihil)."

The literary activity of Suarez was for the most part concerned with the treatment of the Aristotelian philosophy and the scholastic theology. His works appeared in twenty-three volumes, at Lyons and Mainz, 1630; a reprint of this edition, in twenty-four volumes, Venice, 1740. The Jesuit Noël made an excerpt from his works in two volumes, Geneva, 1730. The rich invention and casuistry with which Suarez spins out the discussion of scholastic questions suited the taste of his time and his order. Especially famous was his Defence of the Catholic and Apostolic Faith against the Errors of the Anglican Sect (Defensa fidei Cath. et Apost. adversus Angl. Sectae errores), Coimbra, 1618. He wrote the work against James I. of England, and at the suggestion of Paul V. Its main burden is, that the Pope has the right to depose and set up kings in virtue of his authority received from Peter. Applauded by Paul V. in a letter to his sacred author, he was by him, in 1613, it was burnt by the public hangman in front of St. Paul's, London; and by a decree of Parliament it received a like treatment in Paris, June 26, 1614. See Deschamps' Latin Life of Suarez, Perpignan, 1671; Alegambre: Bibl. Script. S. J., Antw., 1643; Werner: Suarez u. d. Scholastik d. letzten Jahrhunderte, Regensb., 1861. Stritz.

Subdeacon. The primitive church knew only two classes of officers,—leaders (proctorum, nuntios, secretarii, praefectus or, praepositus) and servants (servantia); the former for the functions of worship, the latter for the administration of charities. But as the episcopate on one side developed from the presbyterate, so, on the other, the subdeaconate from the deaconate. The Roman-Catholic Church, however, while vindicating for the episcopal order the ancient and immediate title to the character, himself, has never hesitated to concede that the subdeaconate is a merely human institution (utilitas causa). Its existence in the middle of the third century in the churches of Italy and Africa is proved by the letter of Pope Cornelius to Bishop Fabius of Antioch (Eusebius: Hist. Eccel., vii. 43 and by the letters of Cyprian (2, 3, 9, 90, etc.). In Spain it is first mentioned by the synod of Elvira 305 (can. 30); in the Orient, by the synod of Lasodiosa, 361 (can. 21-23). From Amalarius (De divin. offic. 1, 11) it appears, however, that in the middle of the ninth century it was not yet universally established. With respect to dignity it was reckoned among ordinis majores; though all its offices were of a subordinate character,—guarding the tombs of the martyrs, watching doors during the celebration of the Eucharist, the Lord's Supper, etc. It became more elevated, however, when Gregory the Great extended the law of celibacy to its members, and when Urban II., in 1091, admitted them to competition for the episcopal chair. See Morinus: De sacris ordinationibus, iii. 12. E. Friedberg.

Subintroducte is a term of canon law applied to women living in the houses of clerical persons for purposes of unchastity. When the remarried state became identified with chastity, relations to subintroducte very soon sprang up, and gradually developed into actual concubinage. They were noticed by the councils of Eliberis (805), Ancona (814), Nicza (825), etc., down to the Council of Trent (Sess. 25, cap. 14).

Sublapsarianism, a theory held by moderate Calvinists, according to which the fall of man was not decreed, though it was foreseen, by God; the purpose of that distinction being to avoid ascribing the origin of sin to God. See Infralapsarianism and Supralapsarianism.

Subordinationism. See Trinity.

Succession, Apostolical, means an unbroken series of ordination from the days of the apostles to our time. It is claimed, in the most absolute sense of the words, by the Roman-Catholic...
which the daughters or the servants of Mylitta was later pronounced as one, and was used to mean the booths, in the connection and according to the explanation of the word given by Alcuin in his letter to Charlemagne, any ecclesiastical person whose worship the Babylonian settlers in Samaria are said to have set up on their arrival in that country. Opinions vary as to its meaning. (1) According to the connection and according to the ancient versions (Septuagint, Vulgate, Arabic, Syriac, Targum), it is the name of an idol. According to the rabbinas it was a goddess under the form of a hen and chickens: others regard it as an astronomical emblem of the Babylonians. A third opinion is this, that it denotes the Mylitta. Hengstenberg's view is, that it means "the daughters of Bel and Mylitta, whose images were contained in small tabernacles, where they were worshipped with others." With this view he apprises the reader of a general one, that it denotes "the booths in which the daughters of the Babylonians prostituted themselves in honor of their idol (i.e., Mylitta). Thenius, who mediates between these two main views, says that the original meaning of Succoth-Benoth was booths, in which the daughters or the servants of Mylitta prostituted themselves in honor of their idol; but the word was later pronounced as one and was used to denote the name of the deity which was worshipped in the booths. Thus, according to the connection, and according to the Septuagint, some special idol was meant.

SUDAILI, Stephanus Bar, a monophysite monk, who lived about 500, first at Edessa, and afterwards at Jerusalem; was, according to the Cano de Sanctorum, the author of a book, which, on the basis of a poetic interpretation of 1 Cor. xiv. 28, taught that the punishment in hell was not eternal; which book afterwards circulated under the name of Hierotheus, the famous predecessor of Pseudo-Dionysius. As there is some resemblance between the theology of Bar Sudaili and Hierotheus, it is by no means improbable that the former may have borrowed the celebrated name of the latter for the purpose of introducing his own views into the church. See ASCEMANI, Bibli. Orient., ii. 291.

SUFFRAGAN (suffraganeus) was, according to the explanation of the word given by Alcuin in a letter to Charlemagne, any ecclesiastical person whose duty it was to assist (suffragari) his superior. But the term was more especially applied to bishops, and that in a double sense, both to bishops in paribus infidelium, who assisted as vicars some regular diocesan bishop, and to the latter when they were not exempt in their relation to the metropolitan.

SUGER, Abbot of St. Denis; b. probably in 1081, and in the neighborhood of St. Omer; d. at St. Denis, Jan. 12, 1151; the contemporary of St. Bernard and Abelard, and one of the greatest statesmen France produced during the middle ages. He was educated in the monastery of St. Denis, together with Louis VI.; and when the latter ascended the throne, in 1108, he immediately called the monk to his court, and made him his principal councillor. In 1122 Suger was elected abbot of St. Denis; but he remained at the court, and continued to live as a man of the world, until, in 1127, he suddenly was seized by the reformatory movement of his time. He at first completely discarded all worldly possessions, and assumed the habits and practices of severe asceticism. But he continued to be a politician rather than an ecclesiastic. After the death of Louis VI., in 1137, he was appointed regent during the minority of Louis VII., and again when the latter, in 1149, made a crusade to the Holy Land; and during his lifetime hardly any thing of consequence took place in French politics without his immediate intervention. His leading idea was the consolidation of the monarchy as a divinely established institution; and he strove to realize that idea, not only in spite of the resistance of the feudal lords, but sometimes, also, in spite of the opposition of the hierarchy. His life was written by HENETMENT (1842), HUGUENIN (1857), COMBER (1858), and by a contemporary monk, in GUIZOT, Coll. des mémoires, vol. viii. He was the least orthodox of French ecclesiastics; and the conservative Hengstenberg, who mingled in his time with the majority of the church, and by various Protestant churches, and by the heterodox views into the church. See ASSEMANI: Histoire, vol. viii. 1718. A. SCHWEIZER.

SUIDBERT, an Anglo-Saxon monk who in 690 accompanied Willibrord to Friesland as a missionary, and was ordained bishop of the Frisian congregation when Willibrord went to Rome. On the return of the latter, however, Suidbert went into the land of the Brucieters, between the Iems and the Lower Rhine; and, when the congregation which he formed there was disturbed by the invasion of the Saxons, he founded a monastery and missionary school at the present Kaierswerth, under the protection of Pepin. See BEDA: Hist. Eccl., v. 19. The Vita in Act. Sanct. Bollandi, March 2, is a later and fully unreliable fabrication.

SULZER, Simon, b. at Interlaken, Jan. 29, 1508; d. at Basel, June 22, 1585. He grew up under very humble circumstances, but was enabled by the support of the government of Bern to study at Basel and Strassburg. After he finished his studies, he spent ten years in reconstructing the schools in the canton of Bern, and was in 1549 appointed preacher at Basel, and professor of theology. In the controversy between the Swiss and the German Reformers concerning the Lord's Supper, he occupied a peculiar position, as he held the views of Luther, and openly labored for their introduction in Switzerland. See HUNDES...
SUMMERFIELD, John, Methodist-Episcopal; b. in Preston, Eng., Jan. 31, 1798; d. in New York City, June 18, 1825. He was the son of a Wesleyan local preacher, but educated at the Moravian Academy at Fairfield, near Manchester; was sent into business at Liverpool; removed to Dublin, 1813; was converted in 1817, and next year became a local Wesleyan minister. In 1819 he was received on trial in the Methodist Conference of Ireland, and in March, 1821, having emigrated to America, in the New-York Conference. He leaped into astonishing popularity by reason of his eloquence. In 1822 he preached in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, everywhere listened to by great crowds; but in June of that year his health gave way. He spent the winter of 1822-23 in France; returned to New York, April 19, 1824, but was not able again to do full work. He was a founder of the American Tract Society. He published only one sermon; but in 1842, at New York, many of his Sermons and Sketches for Youth were published. His life was written by John Holland, New York, 1829, 2d ed., 1830, and William M. Liltitt, Philadelphia, 1857.

SUMMERS, Thomas Osmond, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Methodist minister, professor of systematic theology in Vanderbilt University, and general book editor of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; b. near Corfe Castle, Isle of Purbeck, Dorsetshire, Eng., Oct. 11, 1812; d. at Nashville, Tenn., May 5, 1882. His parents, James and Sarah Summers, died when he was quite young, leaving him to the foster care of a grand-aunt. While yet a youth he came to America, and settled in Baltimore. His parents being independents, his early religious training and reading were Calvinistic. Not being satisfied with the teaching of that system, and knowing no other, he was fast drifting, as he writes, into scepticism and infidelity, when some one to whom he communicated his state of mind gave him a copy of Adam Clarke's Commentary on Romans. This he read with eagerness and intense interest, and became from that time strongly Arminian in his religious belief. Visiting about this time, out of curiosity, a Methodist camp-meeting near the city of Baltimore, he was happily and soundly converted to God, experiencing most sensibly a change of heart. Ever after that, he was a strong believer in and advocate for experimental religion. He began at once to prepare for the ministry, and was "admitted on trial" into the Baltimore Conference in March, 1855; was ordained deacon by Bishop Hedding in 1837, and entered the ministry, and was "admitted on trial" into the Methodist Episcopal Church South. In 1846 he was appointed by the General Conference to assist the late Bishop (then Dr.) Wightman as editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, published at Charleston, S.C. While here, he started, and edited for four years, the Sunday-School Visitor. At the organization of the Southern Church he was elected general book editor, which office he continued to fill with eminent ability and with great acceptability till his death. In this capacity he edited over three hundred volumes. In 1855 he moved to Nashville, Tenn., where the publishing-house was located, and where he continued to reside until he died. He was chairman of the committee that compiled the hymn-book, which he edited. He was considered an authority in hymnology, having devoted much time to its study. He was for many years editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, and of the Quarterly Review of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. At the organization of Vanderbilt University he was elected professor of systematic theology, which position he retained until he died, being also dean of the theological faculty. He died, after only two days' illness, during the quadrennial session, in Nashville, of the General Conference, where for the fourteenth consecutive time he had been elected and was acting as secretary. Surrounded by his brethren and colleagues, he died, as he had wished, at the post of duty, in the midst of his labors, ceasing at once to work and live. Possessed of encyclopedic knowledge, always abreast of the times, thoroughly Wesleyan and Arminian in his creed, but in hearty sympathy with all evangelical denominations of Christians, simple as a child in faith, consecrated, earnest, unassuming, an uncompromising enemy of sin and error in whatever form, he was an ornament to Christianity and an honor to the church of his choice.

Dr. Summers is the author of the following works: Commentary on the Gospels, Acts, and Romans, in 6 vols.; Commentary on the Ritual of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; Christian Holiness; Baptism; Gospels, Genus. The Sunday-School Teacher, or the Catechetical Office of the Church. Seasons, Months, and Days; Talks Pleasant and Profitable; Refutation of the Theological Works of Paine; Way of Salvation; and some twenty other books and pamphlets on various doctrinal and practical subjects. SUN. Name of sun is shemesh; but in poetry chammâh and clere are used. In Gen. 1, 16 the sun is called the greater light, and is to serve, in conjunction... with the moon, "to rule the day" (Gen. i. 14; Ps. cxxvi. 8; Jer. xxxi. 35) and the year; i.e., the solar year. This name has not only been given to the sun as created by God (Ps. lxxiv. 16; Gen. i.), but is always under his command. In the end of the earth he hath set a tabernacle for the sun (Ps. xix. 4; Hab. iii. 11); from whence he appoints his way (Ps. civ. 19), or "commandeth, and it riseth not" (Job ix. 7), and at his command the sun stands still (Josh. x. 12; 2 Kings xx. 11). He, and not the sun was the God of the ancient Egyptians worshiped. The glory is not more lighted (Isa. ix. 19; Job xxv. 5). This is especially the case before the judgment of God (Joel ii. 10, 31, iii. 15; Isa. xii. 10, xxiv. 23). As the sun was called into existence, there will also be one a time when it shall shine no more (Matt. xxiv. 29; Luke xxiii. 45; Rev. vi. 12, viii. 12, ix. 2, xxi. 22, xxii. 5). But the same God will make the light of the sun sevenfold (Isa. xxv. 5), or when the sun comes out of his chamber like a bridegroom, "and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race" (Ps. xix. 5). But there will be a time when the sun shall be "ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously" (Isa. xxiv. 23).

Worship of the Sun among the Israelites.— To worship the sun was expressly prohibited by the law of God (Deut. xxi. 7). This worship, which commenced during the Assyrian period, was abolished by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 5, 11; 2 Chron. xxxv. 4). It consisted in burning incense on the house-tops, in lamentations for Tammuz (Ezek. viii. 14), in dedications of chariots and horses to the sun (2 Kings xxiii. 11). But the sun has not only been worshiped as a symbol of the king, but also as a father of the gods (Herod., i. 156; Xenoph. Cyrop. 8, 8, 6.); to Christ (Dupuis : Orig. de cultes, v. 244, vi. 267). In later times the sun was worshiped among the Persians under the form of Mithras, which finally became the Sol Invictus throughout the West, especially through the Romans.

The Sun in the Christian Church and Art.— The Mithras-worship even exercised its influence upon the fixing of the Christian Christmas-festival in December. As the new birth of the sun-god was celebrated at the end of December (Deut. xxviii. 7), or when the sun comes out of his chamber like a bridegroom, "and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race" (Ps. xix. 5). But there will be a time when the sun shall be "ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously" (Isa. xxiv. 23).

SUNDAY (Dies solis, of the Roman calendar, "day of the sun," because dedicated to the sun), the first day of the week, was adopted by the early Christians as a day of worship. The "sun" of Latin adoration they interpreted as the "Sun of righteousness." Sunday was emphatically the weekly feast of the resurrection of Christ, as the Jewish sabbath was the feast of the creation. It was called the "Lord's Day" and upon the primitive church assembled to break bread (Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2). No regulations for its observance are laid down in the New Testament, nor, indeed, is its observance even enjoined; yet Christian feeling led to the universal adoption of the day, in imitation of apostolic precedent. In the second century its observance was univer-

SUNDAY LEGISLATION.

The institution of a weekly religious rest-day has existed, and its observance has been the subject of legislation, from very early times. Traces of such laws are found among the remains of Chaldaean antiquity. The Assyrians had laws for the observance of their sabbath similar to those by which the sabbath was maintained among the Jews. Civil legislation in behalf of the observance of Sunday, as distinguished from ecclesiastical or purely religious ordinances, commenced with the famous capitula of Constantine (321) : " On the venerable day of the sun let all magistrates and people residing in the cities rest, and let all workshops be closed. Experience abundantly demonstrates the wisdom of such weekly rest, and the blessedness of such a day of worship.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION.

In England, Sunday laws have existed from a very early date. Ina, king of the West Saxons (about 693), forbade servile work on Sunday. Alfred (876) prohibited work, traffic, and legal proceedings. His example was followed in subsequent reigns. Edgar (958) prohibited "heathenish songs and diabolical spoils," and markets and county courts, to begin at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, and to last "till Monday morning light." The laws of Caunate (1035) strongly insisted on the observance of the Lord's Day; prohibiting marketing, hunting, and the holding of the local courts, except in case of great necessity. After the Conquest, the tendency to greater strictness in the Sunday laws continued. The statute of 28 Edward III. (1354) forbade the showing of wools at the market-town. The 12 Richard II. (1388) forbade servants and laborers to play at tennis and other games, yet ordered them to have bows and arrows, and use the same on Sundays. The statute of 4 Edward IV. (1464) forbade cordwainers and cobblers to sell shoes on Sunday. Under Henry VI. the holding of fairs and markets on Sunday was prohibited. The law of 5 and 6 Edward VI. prohibits "lawful bodily labor" on Sundays, allowed husbandmen, fishermen, and others to work in harvest, or at any other times when necessity required. This act was repealed under Queen Mary, but was formally revived under James I. Subsequently (1614) James I. issued The Book of Sports, allowing after divine service on Sundays certain games... and recreations, but expressly refusing this liberty to “Papists and Puritans.” The issuing of The Book of Sports created intense dissatisfaction, and it soon became a dead letter. Parliament, in the first year of Charles I., passed an act “for the strict observance of Sunday”; and another law of Parliament in 1627 (8 Car. 1.) enacted that no carriers, or wagon-men, or drovers should travel on Sunday. In 1638 Charles I., under the supposed influence of Laud, re-issued his father’s Book of Sports.

The statute of 29 Charles II. (1676) is the most important of the English laws on this subject, as that which, with some modifications, is still the law of the land, and which, as being in force at the time of the American Revolution, gave more or less color to the laws of the American Colonies and States. It prohibits on Sunday all worldly labor or business except works of necessity or charity, the public sale of goods, the travelling of drovers, wagoners, etc., the service of any legal process except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace; but it permits the dressing of meats in families, and its sale in inns and eating-shops, the crying of milk before nine a.m., and after four P.M.

The early American colonists brought with them the observance of Sunday both as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforced this observance by law. The early laws of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Georgia, South Carolina, and Virginia, required attendance at church. The Massachusetts law (1782) provided that such attendance was not required where there was no place of worship which the person could conscientiously attend. But, as the separation between Church and State became better understood, the Sunday laws were modified in conformity with this principle. The legislatures and courts have carefully distinguished between Sunday observance as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforce only the latter. The laws of the several States differ in minor details, but are alike in their main features. They forbid on Sunday common labor and traffic, except in cases of necessity and mercy, public and noisy amusements, and whatever is likely to disturb the quiet and good order of the day. They make Sunday a non-labor or business day, when legal processes may not be served, nor the courts and legislatures sit. In many of the States some exception is made in favor of those who observe the seventh day of the week. In Louisiana—which before its admission was under the Code Napoleon, and where alone, of all the States, the common law is not in force—Sunday is merely recognized by law as a public holiday. In many of the States there are also laws, with special penalties, against the selling of intoxicating drinks on Sundays and election-days.

The Federal Constitution provides that Sunday shall not be reckoned in the ten days within which the President may return a bill; and the Federal laws relieve the cadets of the military and naval academies from their studies on Sunday; and in the excise statutes distilling on Sunday is prohibited under a fine of one thousand dollars.

The constitutionality of the Sunday laws has been frequently affirmed by the highest courts of the several States, upon such grounds as the following: the right of all classes, so far as practicable, to rest one day in seven; the right to undisturbed worship, on the day set apart for this purpose, by the great majority of the people; the decent respect which should be paid to the religious institutions of the State itself of the Sunday observance, as a means of that public intelligence and morality on which free institutions are conditioned.

The spirit of modern Sunday laws is protection, not coercion. The need of civil intervention, especially to secure to the working-classes the seventh-day rest, becomes more and more imperative with the growth of industries and of the desire for rapid wealth. In evidence of this may be mentioned the petition, hitherto ineffectual, of the Social-labor party of Germany, at their meeting at Gotha in 1875, announced as one of their demands in the present exigencies of society the prohibition of Sunday work.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS. A Sunday school is an assembly of persons on the Lord’s Day for the study of the Bible, moral and religious instruction, and the worship of the true God. It is a method of training the young and the ignorant in the duties we owe to God and to our neighbor. As the family and the church are institutions of divine appointment, so the Sunday school has been approved by divine blessings.

1. BIBLICAL AUTHORITY AND FORM. — Godly instruction of the young and the ignorant has been in harmony with the divine government from the earliest history of the race. Although the word “school” does not occur in the Bible previous to the Babylonian captivity, instruction after the school methods was clearly known and practised from very early times; and not long after the captivity, no less than eleven different expressions for “school” were current in the Hebrew speech. Glimpses of the essential features of the school method appear in the early eras of biblical history. In patriarchal times the school, like the church, was in the family: the father was the teacher and the priest. Omitting a notice of the faithful religious instruction of the young by Abraham, Job, Jacob, Moses, and other patriarchs, and passing over the public training of children indicated by the passover service, by the reading of the law from Gerizim and Ebal in Joshua’s time, and by the so-called schools of the prophets in the days of Samuel to Elijah, as well as the royal commission sent out by Jehoshaphat to re-establish religious instruction, and a similar movement in the time of Josiah, it will be sufficient here to notice simply the Bible school into which Ezra gathered the people with the children, requiring the priests as teachers to explain the meaning of the law of God, not unlike the instruction in the modern Sunday school (Neh. viii. 7, 8). See Education Among the Hebrews.

In the New Testament period, religious schools connected with the synagogue were found in every city and considerable village in the land. These schools were one branch of an extended system of religious instruction. Lightfoot finds four kinds of schools and teaching among the Jews: (1) The elementary school; (2) The teaching of the synagogue; (3) The higher schools, as of Hillel and Shammai; and (4) The Sanhedrin. The problem for a modern scholar to define the important features of the present system not to be found in these primitive Bible schools. See Catechetics.

3. Sunday Schools of the Reformation Period. — Luther founded regular catechetical instruction on Sundays as early as 1528, and this custom spread wherever the Reformation gained a foothold. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, had a system of schools 1560–84, almost identical in form to the present Sunday school. Children were gathered in two grand divisions, — boys and girls, subdivided into smaller groups or classes, with a minister for each class, aided by a layman for boys and a matron for girls. These schools were introduced into all the churches of his diocese, and are continued on much the same plan now, but without the Bible. The labors of Spener, Francke, Zinzendorf, and the English Reformers further prepared the way for the modern Sunday-school system. Legions of persons and places claim to have had Sunday schools previous to those in Gloucester. Among the many worthy of recognition, only the few following can be noted. Sunday schools were founded in Scotland about 1560, by John Knox; in Bath, Eng., 1650–68, by Joseph Alleine, author of “Allene’s Alarm”; in Bath, Mass., 1674; Plymouth, Mass., 1680; in England, by Bishop Frampton, about 1693; in Glasgow, Scotland, about 1707; in Bethlehem, Conn., 1740, by Dr. Joseph Bellamy; in Ephrata, Penn., 1739–40, by Ludwig Hacker, a school continuing for thirty years with gratuitous instruction, children’s meetings, and having many revivals; at Brechin, Scot., 1769, by Mr. Blair; at Catterick, 1768, by Miss Harrison; at Waldbach, 1767, by Oberlin; at High Wycombe, 1769, by Hannah Ball; at Bright Parish, County Down, Ireland, 1770–78, by Dr. Kennedy; in Bohemia, 1773, by Kindermann; at Bolton, Eng., 1775, by James Hayes; at Macclesfield, Eng., by Rev. David Simpson, 1778.

4. Modern Sunday Schools. — Sunday schools like those just noted were sporadic; there was need for a popular and general movement, bringing them into affiliation with each other, if not into an organized system. Of this great movement, Robert Raikes is justly regarded as the founder. He was a citizen of Gloucester, Eng., and proprietor of the Gloucester Journal. Business calling him into the suburbs of that city in 1780, where many youth were employed in the pin and other factories, his heart was touched by the groups of ragged, wretched, and cursing children. He engaged four female teachers to receive and instruct in reading and in the Catechism such children as should be sent to them on Sunday. The children were required to come with clean hands and faces, sacred poems, and dialogues. The Sixth General Council at Constantinople (A.D. 680) required presbyters in country towns and villages to hold schools to teach all such children as were sent to them, taking no reward nor any thing therefor, except the parents made them a voluntary present. The Second Council at Chalons likewise required bishops to set up schools giving instruction in the Scriptures. In view of the missionary aim, and the graded and comprehensive instruction of these schools, it might be an interesting problem for a modern scholar to define the important features of the present system not to be found in these primitive Bible schools. See Catechetics.

and hair combed, and with such clothing as they had. They were to stay from ten to twelve, then to go home; to return at one, and after a lesson to be conducted to church; after church to repeat portions of the Catechism; to go home at five, quietly, without playing in the streets. Diligent scholars received rewards of Bibles, Testaments, and portions of the Catechism; to go home at five to be conducted to church; after church to repeat portions of the Catechism, rapidly extending throughout England, i.11,1791, to give religious instruction to poor chidren on Sunday. Likethe Britishsociety, it spent about four thousand dollars in support of schools between 1791 and 1800. As early as 1791 it urged the Legislature of Pennsylvania to establish free schools.

The schoolsof Raikes, and those of the British Society and the First-Day School of Philadelphia, employed paid teachers. Their chief aim was to reach, not the children of church-members, but of the poor and of those who neglected the Sabbath. The schools they established were purely religious schools. But paid teachers made the system expensive, and necessarily limited its usefulness.

Next to founding these schools, the most important step was the securing of instructions by unpaid teachers. Sir Charles Reed says Oldham, Eng., claims to have had the first day-school teacher who declined to receive pay, and began the gratuitous instruction. John Wesley in 1787 speaks of Sunday schools at Bolton, Eng., "having eighty masters who received no pay but what they received from the great Master." In the famous Stockport Sunday school in 1784, only six of its thirty teachers were paid. In 1790 the Methodist Conference at Charleston, S.C., directed preachers to form Sunday schools, for whites and blacks, with voluntary teachers. A Sunday school for Indian children was opened in Stockbridge, N.Y., in 1792, by a sister of Occum, the noted Indian preacher. The children working in a cotton-factory in Passaic County, N.J., were given gratuitous instruction in a Sunday school in 1794; and Samuel Slater had a similar one for his factory-operatives in Pawtucket, R.I., 1797. W. B. Gurney introduced gratuitous instruction into several Sunday schools in London, Eng., about 1796. He also used questions on Scripture-texts, and teachers' meetings, and, with the co-operation of Rev. Rowland Hill and others, formed the London Sunday-schol Society, July 13, 1791, with 200 Sunday schools having unpaid teachers. A similar meeting at the same place in 1796 had founded the Religious Trust Society of London, which early provided literature for Sunday schools. Gratui- tuous instruction speedily became a popular feature in the scheme, and in a short time was generally substituted for the earlier plan of paid teachers. Though the great object of the scheme has been remark- able before, so that, within five years after the beginning by Raikes, it was estimated that 250,000 scholars were enrolled in the schools then established, yet this new feature of voluntary teachers gave it a fresh impetus by adapting it to the needs of the poorest community in city or country. In America the movement was pro- moted by the visit of Mrs. Graham and Mrs. Bethune to England, who founded schools in New York on their return in 1803, and by the visit to Philadelphia of the Rev. Robert May, a missionary from London, in 1811, who had speci- mens of reward-tickets, and urged improved methods in a letter to the Evangelical Society of Philadelphia.

that 28.4 per cent of its population were in Sunday school, which would give a membership for Wales of about 295,000; and W. H. Watson of London claimed that there were nearly 300,000 teachers and 3,000,000 scholars in the Sunday schools "of the country." The report of the International Convention in 1881 gave in the United States 84,730 Sunday schools, 982,288 teachers, 6,820,835 scholars, and, including the British and American Provinces, 90,570 schools, 975,195 teachers, and 7,177,165 scholars. The number reported at the Raikes centenary in 1850 for England and Wales was 422,222 teachers and 3,800,000 scholars, and, for the world, 1,559,829 teachers and 13,063,593 scholars. These statistics were gathered by voluntary organizations, and, though not giving satisfaction as to accuracy and completeness, are the best issued. (See statistics at end of this article.) A government census of Sunday schools was commenced in the United States in 1880, but was not completed. A tentative compilation of its reports showed upwards of 91,000 Sunday schools in the country.

Nor do numbers alone indicate the immense growth of Sunday schools. The great improvement in the modes of instruction, which will be treated in another paragraph; the beautiful and costly buildings, the ample, airy rooms with glass partitions, carpeted floors, fountains, flowers, and cushioned seats, for the accommodation of these schools in America, as compared with the dark and dingy apartments first provided; the wide enlistment of the ablest talent in the country in teaching, and also in providing lesson-helps and literature; the suitable grading of instruction; the substantial settlement of the right principles of religious education; the clear definition of the place of the Sunday school, not as a thing separate and apart from the church, but as all Christians at work teaching or learning the Lord's message to his church; the remarkable and constant influence this widespread instruction has had in lessening vice and crime, in diffusing a zeal for biblical study, in imparting greater familiarity to its one great text-book, the Bible,—each and all of these are forcible illustrations of the wonderful growth of this Christian institution in modern times.

Sabbath Schools. It is impossible, in this brief space to notice the many Sunday-school societies and organizations which have been formed to promote this cause. A brief description of some of the earlier and more important societies will illustrate the work conducted by all. The London Sunday-School Union — which was formed in 1803, for the improvement of teachers, the extension of Sunday schools, and to supply them with suitable literature at reduced prices — is sustained by members of different evangelical denominations, and conducted by a general committee of fifty-four, divided into various sub-committees. The members of the committee render their services gratuitously. It did not in its early history employ missionaries, but aimed to accomplish its object through the formation of local unions in Great Britain, more particularly in England, and also through affiliated schools. Influenced by the example of the American Sunday-school Union, it employed a missionary in the north of England for some years, but at his death, in 1887, discontinued the effort in England. For the last fifteen or twenty years it has aided in supporting missionaries on the Continent for the establishment of Sunday schools in the various countries of Europe, and has expended this Continental Mission nearly a thousand pounds annually for the past few years. Its chief work for eighty years has been the improvement of schools, the publication and distribution of juvenile religious literature, and the collection of Sunday-school statistics. It has on its catalogue a large number of books and publications, which it furnishes to schools connected with the society, in special cases, at from one-half to one-third regular prices. The amount of its grants for 1883 was £2,074 : its affiliated schools numbered 5,286, having 123,599 teachers and 1,182,199 scholars. Over 16,000 scholars from its schools united with churches in 1883. In London 88 per cent, and in the country 81 per cent, of teachers were church-members; and 88 per cent of the teachers were former scholars in the schools. It maintains a circulating library, a reading-room, Hebrew and Greek classes, teachers' meetings, normal classes, and competitive examinations for teachers and scholars.

A sabbath-school society was formed in Edinburgh in 1797, and one for the support of Gaelic schools to teach the Scriptures, in 1811. These employed paid teachers; later, voluntary teachers were introduced. The labors of Stowe and James Gall brought important improvements in the modes of instruction. The formation of various local sabbath-school unions at Edinburgh and Glasgow, the adoption of schools in the churches, holding conventions, employing missionaries, and the adoption of juvenile services, mark the progress of the work in Scotland. The Sunday-school Society for Ireland was formed in 1800. Among its publications, Hints on Conducting Sunday Schools had a wide sale, and was reprinted in America. The Church of England Sunday-school Institute began training classes and institutes for Sunday-school teachers in 1844: and still sustains one of the best Sunday-school magazines issued. In 1881 it had returns from 6,466 parishes, representing 10,401 Sunday schools, 113,412 teachers, and 1,298,373 scholars. Estimating the same average membership for the 6,064 parishes not reporting, it computed the total number of scholars in England and Wales connected with the Church of England as about 2,220,000, and of teachers about 195,500. The Wesleyans of Great Britain formed a Sunday-school Union in 1874. The total number of Wesleyan Methodist Sunday schools in Great Britain and Ireland, according to their report for 1882, was 2,489; teachers and officers, 122,999; scholars, 829,868; library books, 781,176. The various Ragged School societies are efficient in promoting the cause in their respective fields. On the Continent, the Dutch, French, German, Swiss, and Italian Sunday-school societies are growing in importance and usefulness. In those countries the organization of schools on the American or class system of instruction, due to the efforts of Albert Woodruff of New York, about 1864, and, later, of the several missionaries of the London Union.

school Society of Philadelphia, formed in 1791, has been noticed. As early as 1808 the Evangelical Society was formed for promoting sabbath-evening schools in Philadelphia with voluntary teachers. The New York Female Sunday-school Union and the New York Male Sunday-school Union were formed in 1813, at the suggestion of Eleazar Lord, who had observed the working of the Sunday-school system in Philadelphia. The Sunday and Adult School Union in Philadelphia was formed in 1817, to unite all the Sunday and adult associations in that city and vicinity. In 1821 it employed a missionary, who organized upward of sixty schools. It also issued a large number of Scripture tickets, cards, tracts, and small reward-books. After seven years of marked efficiency and usefulness, it, with other similar unions, was merged in a national society, — the American Sunday-school Union, in 1824. The Adult Union was at that time the largest society of the kind in the country, having auxiliaries in all the States, with over 700 schools and 50,000 scholars. The object of the American Sunday-school Union stated at its formation, publicized the efforts of sabbath-school societies in different sections of our country, to strengthen the hands of friends of pious instruction on the Lord's Day, to disseminate useful information, to circulate moral and religious publications in every part of the land, and to endeavor to plant a Sunday school wherever there is a population. Twenty-one years later, when its charter was obtained, it stated the object: "to establish and maintain Sunday schools, and to publish and circulate moral and religious publications." It is an undenominational society, conducted by representative laymen from different evangelical denominations; employs missionaries, lay and ministerial; and clergymen likewise co-operate in its work as editors, secretaries, and literary contributors. The first year, ending March 1, 1821, it reported 382 auxiliaries, 1,390 affiliated schools, 11,295 teachers, 82,697 scholars; and it estimated the number of Sunday-school scholars in the world at over 1,000,000. Among the more important measures which have been inaugurated or promoted by this Union are the employment of missionaries to form Sunday schools; a world's convention, to disseminate useful information, to circulate moral and religious publications. It has been very efficient in publishing and distributing literature the preachers attached to its denomination. It does not employ Sunday-school missionaries. The Presbyterian and Baptist boards of publication have Sunday-school departments; they employ colporteurs, who promote the extension of Sunday schools in connection with their churches, and distribute denominational literature. The (Dutch) Reformed Sunday-school Union soon after 1850 was merged in that of its publishing society. The Protestant Episcopal Sunday-school Union, and the Evangelical Knowledge Society, provide a denominational juvenile literature for schools in that church. The Foreign Sunday-school Association of New York, formerly auxiliary to the American Sunday-school Union, was incorporated in 1878, and labors to promote Sunday schools in foreign lands, chiefly on the continent of Europe.

Conventions. — Early in this century local Sunday-school conventions were held, especially from 1829 to 1830, in many of the Eastern and Middle States. In 1832, at the suggestion of the American Sunday-school Union, a national convention was held in New York, comprising two hundred and twenty delegates from fourteen States and Territories out of the twenty-four States and Territories then comprising the United States. A second delegated national convention was held in Philadelphia in 1833, at which full reports and papers were presented as arranged for by the previous convention in New York. The chief work accomplished by these early national meetings was to discover and agree on the principles of a system of religious education. That of 1833 also adopted the recommendation of the American Sunday-school Union, that a systematic and simultaneous canvass of the entire country be made, to obtain parents, and to enlist parents in this work, on the 4th of July following. It also approved of a Uniform Series of lessons already introduced. A third national convention was held in Philadelphia in 1836, "marking a revival of interest in Bible study, and in religious training of the young." A world's convention was held in London, Eng., in 1862, at which papers ably discussing the methods and progress of the cause were presented. A fourth national convention in America was held at Newark, N.J., in 1869, attended by five hundred and twenty-six delegates representing twenty-eight States and seven countries; the fifth, at Indianapolis in 1872, marked by the adoption of the present International Series of Uniform Lessons, and the appointment of a general statistical secretary; the first international (sixth national) convention, at Baltimore in 1875; the second, at Atlanta in 1878; the third, at Toronto in 1881; and the fourth, at Louisville in 1884. Besides these, there have been State and local conventions in every part of the United States and the Dominion of Canada, which have given added impetus to the movement, and disseminated useful knowledge in regard to the methods of conducting, and teaching in Sunday schools, and imparted more of unity to the cause. Upon the local conventions, which were very prevalent from 1860 to 1870, the "institute" has been widely ingrafted,—a modification of the convention, aiming to give instruction specially to teachers, rather than simply to create enthusiasm. The wide influence of conventions on the cause may be inferred from the statement told two years later of the American Sunday-school Union, that in 1883, 14,000 were held in the United States in the year 1883. The "institute," exhibiting advanced methods of teaching and conducting Sunday schools, has also been popular since 1865. This form of meeting had likewise been adopted in England for many years previous to that date. Out of these institutes and conventions have come the "summer assemblies," among the most noted of which is that of Chautauqua, conducted by the Rev. Mr. Vincent, D.D., which has normal courses of study, lectures on teaching, a "literary and scientific circle" of about sixty thousand members, and classes in Hebrew, Greek, and other languages.

Organization.—The modern Sunday school commonly has three departments, corresponding to three grades of instruction,—the primary or infant, the intermediate, and the advanced. In the intermediate grade the scholars are arranged in classes of from six to ten, with a teacher for each class: in the advanced grade the classes are somewhat larger. In the infant department, until recent years, it was usual to have only one or two teachers for the entire department, even when it consisted of from one hundred to two hundred pupils. This class system is being more widely introduced in the infant, or primary, grades of Sunday schools, and imparted more of unity to the cause. Upon the local conventions, which agreed upon a tentative scheme of uniform lessons for 1872. At the Indianapolis convention in that year, a lesson committee was appointed to arrange a course of lessons for seven years, covering the whole Bible, and which was recommended for the use of Sunday schools throughout the country. This committee was reappointed and enlarged in 1878, to select a second seven-years' course, and again in 1884 to make a third seven-years' course of Bible-lessons. In 1875 the lessons were reported to be in use in the United States of America, Great Britain, most of the countries of Europe, in Syria, Hindostan, India, and China, in Mexico, Australia, and the Sandwich Islands; and in 1883 it was claimed that this system of study had "created a literature of its own, ... and has quickened thorough and intelligent Bible-study in the whole English-speaking world." Comments on the text of these lessons have multiplied like the leaves of the forest, publishers issuing notes, questions, and lesson-leaves, and even secular papers give regular weekly comments upon the Sunday-school lesson. The most learned pastors, professors in colleges and seminaries, have contributed the results of their ripest study and scholarship in exposition of these lessons; and Christian publishers vie with each other in producing the best and cheapest helps thereon. In England other series of lessons are used concurrently with the International Series; while schools of the Established Church, and of the Episcopal and some other churches in America, adopt different series of lessons.

When the modern Sunday-school movement began, a juvenile religious literature did not exist. The Pilgrim's Progress, Watt's Divine and Moral Songs, a few catechisms and similar books, comprised the religious works specially prepared for children at that day. The earliest Catechism in the English language was issued in 1420; one by Cranmer, in 1549; and a Short Catechism in Latin and English, in 1553; the Westminster Catechism, in 1647; and Watts's First and Second Catechisms, in 1729-30. Luther also issued his Catechism, in 1547; and Watts's First and Second Catechism in the English language was issued in 1708. The early books of instruction in Sunday schools in England and Ireland were chiefly spelling-books and reading-books having portions of Scripture. Later, texts of Scripture on small cards, called "red and blue tickets," were given out as rewards to scholars, and also small books. Sometimes, as a reward, the teacher or superintendent would loan books to a scholar to read. Gradually a juvenile religious literature was developed by the desire of Sunday scholars for reading, and the circulating library in connection with each school was introduced, owing largely to the earlier work and issues of the American Sunday-school Union. It is impossible to state the number of books, lesson-helps, and periodicals, now issued. Dr. John S. Hart in 1870 estimated the number of publishing-houses and religious societies engaged in issuing Sunday-school library books at not less than thirty-six, or more, with a capital of $5,000,000; the whole number of current Sunday-school library books at 7,000, and that the rate of issue for several years had exceeded one a day, reaching 434 in 1868. The representative journals specially devoted to Sunday schools, the foremost are The Sunday-school Times, in America, edited by H. Clay Trumbull, D.D.; The Sunday-school Chronicle, issued by the London Union; and the British Sunday-school Times, which are weekly journals. The Sunday-school Journal (Methodist), the Baptist Teacher, the Westminster Teacher, the Sunday-school World (Union), the Church Sunday-school Magazine of London, the Wesleyan Sunday-school Magazine, and the Sabbath-school magazine of Glasgow, Scotland, are among the prominent monthly teachers' periodicals now issued.

(Editor of the American Sunday-school Union).

SUPEREROGATION.

The doctrine of works of supererogation (opera supererogatoria) is based on the distinction between præcepsa and consilia evangelica. The former it is the duty of every man to obey, but the fulfilment of the latter establishes a merit. The doctrine has never been an article of faith in the Roman-Catholic Church: the Council of Trent is silent upon the matter. But in the practice of the church it has played a most disastrous part as the true foundation of the doctrine of indulgences, which art. see.

SUPERSTITION.

The derivation of the Latin term superstitionis is doubtful. Cicero can hardly be right when he says (De nat.dear.,ii.28), Qui totos dies praebatur et immodulant, ut sui silibere superstes est, superstitios esset appellatos. Lactantius is also wrong when he says (Inst. div., iv.28) those are called superstitious who revere superstitiosus, suus esse appellatos. Lac-

This table does not include Sunday and parish schools of the Roman-Catholic or the Greek Church outside the United States and British-American Provinces, for Fourth International Convention, Louisville, 1884, further corrected for the United States, Germany, Holland, Switzerland, etc., to January, 1886.
Superstition. Fetichism is crass superstition. This point of view all non-Christian religions are only in the latter sense in the New Testament the side of God. This idea is found almost every day. The breaking of a glass, the falling of the bridal ring, the appearance of a comet, etc., are often happened that men have combined great wondrous cures of Lourdes, the efficacy of the performance is rather weak: he accuses the Reformer of having borrowed their doctrines from Mohammed. His best work is his Vita Sanctorum ab Aloysio Lipomanno olim conscripta; Cologne, 1570-75, 6 vols. fol. [often reprinted; e.g., Turin, 1875 sqq., 12 vols. “He was the first who used a sound criticism in narrating the lives of the saints.” — Darling.]

Surplus (Latin, superpellicaeum, “overgarment”) is a loose white linen garment, a modification of the alb, dating back to the end of the twelfth century. It is worn by clergymen of the Church of England during celebration of service, as also by clergymen of the Danish, Norwegian, and Swedish churches, but by them only during celebration of the Lord’s Supper.

Supralapsarianism. a theory held by the strictest Calvinists, according to which God not only foresaw but actually decreed the fall of man, and overruled it for his redemption; it being supposed that nothing could happen independently of the divine will. It is logically the most consistent type of Calvinism, but borders on fatalism and pantheism, and hence was excluded from the Reformed Confessions, all of which deny emphatically that God is the author of sin. See Infernal Supralapsarianism and Sublapsarianism.

Supranaturalism. See Rationalism, Religion, and Revelation.

Suras, Laurentius. b. at Liibeck in 1522; d. at Cologne, May 23, 1578. He was educated in the Protestant faith, and studied at Frankfort-on-the-Oder and Cologne; but in the latter place he became acquainted with Canisius, embraced Romanism, and entered the Carthusian order in 1540. He was a prolific writer. In opposition to Seldan’s celebrated work on the Reformation, he wrote a Commentarius brevis, etc., 1566; but the performance is rather weak: he accuses the Reformers of having borrowed their doctrines from Mohammed. His best work is his Vita Sanctorum ab Aloysio Lipomanno olim conscripta, Cologne, 1570-75, 6 vols. fol. [often reprinted; e.g., Turin, 1875 sqq., 12 vols. “He was the first who used a sound criticism in narrating the lives of the saints.” — Darling.]

Susanna. See Apocrypha.

Susso, Heinrich. b. at Uberlingen, March 21, 1295: d at Ulm, Jan. 25, 1365. He was educated in a Dominican monastery in his native city, studied theology at Cologne, and became an enthusiastic disciple of Eckart; but, having more imagination and sentiment than true speculative talent, he gave his mysticism quite a different form, and became the representative of the poetical mysticism of the middle ages. The idea never satisfied him until it assumed the form of personality, and became clothed with all loveliness and perfection. Thus arose before his eyes from the Solomonic writings the Eternal Wisdom, sometimes identified with the Christ, and sometimes with the Virgin. In order to become the true servant of his ideal, he retired to the Dominican monastery where he was educated, devoted himself to a life of severe asceticism, and wrote his book, Von der eigene Weihheit, 1338. In 1340 he began to preach, stopped for several years in the monastery of Winterthur, and, later on, in a monastery in Ulm; formed connections with Tauler, Heinrich from Nordlingen, the Friends of God; founded brotherhoods, for which he wrote rules; and called many individual converts back from the world. His collected works, which give no consistent system, most of the materials having been derived from other mystics, consist of three parts,—on the eternal wisdom, on the eternal truth, and a narrative of his own inner history. They appeared at Augsburg in 1482; last ed. by Diepenbrock, Ratisbon, 1829 (2d ed., 1838). The book, Von den neun Felsen, often ascribed to Suso, is by Rulman Merswin. C. SCHMIDT.

SUTTEE. See Brahmanism.

SUTTON, Christopher, b. in Hampshire, Eng., 1565; entered Hart Hall, Oxford, 1582; soon transferred to Lincoln, of which he proceeded M.A., 1589; held several livings, and was prebendary of Westminster, 1605, and of Lincoln, 1618; d. 1629. He was pious, eloquent, and admired. He wrote Discemori (Learn to die), Lond., 1600, frequently reprinted (modern edition, with memoir, 1839, Oxford, 1850); Discive rievre (Learn to live), Lond., 1608 (modern edition, 1838); Godly meditations upon the most holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, 1622, 18th ed., 1677 (modern edition, with preface by John Henry Newman, Oxford, 1844, again 1866). See sketch in Wood: Athen. Oxon., Ep. ed. ii. pp. 332, 333.

SWAIN, Joseph, a hymn-writer of marked talent; was b. at Birmingham, 1761; and d. in London, April 14, 1796. He was originally apprenticed to an engraver. Removing to London, he was baptized by Dr. Rippon, 1783, and from June, 1791, was a successful Baptist minister. His Walworth Hymns, 1792, while abrupt and unequal, are strong, fervid, spontaneous, and marked by frequent bursts of a really poetic imagination. They have been most extensively used by extreme Calvinists, but some of them may be found in almost every collection.

F. M. BIRD.

SWEDEN. Christianity was first preached in Sweden by Ansgar. No doubt the Swedes, like the Danes and the Norwegians, had long before that time become acquainted with Christianity on their commercial and piratical expeditions, but the younger nation, as we have seen, Ansgar made two voyages to the country, in 880 and 857. On his first visit he made Hergeir, one of the most distinguished men in the country, a zealous Christian; and by his aid a congregation was formed, and a chapel was built, at Birka. In 834 Gautbert was consecrated Bishop of Sweden, and went thither with his nephew Nithard. But even Hergeir's authority was not sufficient to keep the irritated heathens within bounds. They broke into Gautbert's house, and murdered Nithard. The chapel was destroyed, the bishop fled, and, when Hergeir soon after died, the cause of Christianity seemed lost in Sweden. On his second visit Ansgar came with letters of recommendation from the emperor, with great pomp and costly presents; and, having won the favor of the king, he succeeded, by a way of means, which we can not approve, in obtaining toleration for the Christian religion. Ansgafrid, a Christian Dane, was settled at Birka, the chapel rebuilt, and the congregation formed anew. In Sweden, however, as in Denmark, the real introduction and actual establishment of Christianity was effected from England. It was the Anglo-Saxon Siegfried, and the English and Danish monks in his company, who, in the reign of Olat Skotkonung (d. 1024), began the work of converting the Swedish people. It was completed during the reign of Eric the Saint (1150-80), when the first monasteries—Alwastra, Nydala, and Warhem—were founded. Originally Sweden belonged to the archiepiscopal see of Hamburg-Bremen; but in 1163 it obtained its own metropolitan (settled at Upsala), with the suffragan sees of Skara, Linköping, Strängnäs, Västerås, Uppsala, and Abo.

In Sweden the Roman-Catholic Church struck deeper roots than in either of the other two Scandinavian countries, perhaps because the Swedes are a more imaginative and impulsive people, with ready enthusiasm for anything grand and magnificent. Nevertheless, after the great political revolution in 1523, the Reformation worked its way among the people, without meeting any considerable opposition. Gustavus Vasa found the church in a miserable condition, and addressed himself to Pope Adrian VI. with complaints, and proposals of reform; but he received no answer. He then undertook to reform the church himself; and in the two brothers Olaus and Laurentius Petri, and their friend Lars Anderson, he found the fit instruments by which to work. The Swedish translation of the Bible appeared in 1526. At an assembly at Oeresbro in 1529, all the reforms which had been introduced by the government on the advice of Luther were sanctioned by the Swedish clergy. Laurentius Petri was consecrated the first evangelical bishop of Sweden. Under Eric XIV. (1560-68) the country was opened as an asylum for all persecuted Protestants. Very soon, however, controversies broke out between the Lutherans and the Reformed; and the Roman Catholics were not slow in availing themselves of the opportunities of the situation. Johan III. (1568-92) actually leaned towards Romanism. He restored the monasteries, and re-introduced images, prayers for the dead, and other Roman ceremonies. The Jesuit Antonio Possevino arrived in Sweden under the guise of an imperial ambassador, but in reality as a papal legate; and the way was prepared for the formally embraced Romanism. After his death the assembly of Upsala (1583) took the necessary precautions for the preservation of the Evangelical Church; but how long a Roman-Catholic party continued lingering in Sweden may be seen from the fact that Queen Christina, the daughter of Gustavus Adolphus, became a convert to Romanism, 1556.

The protracted though never violent contest with Romanism had a double influence on the Swedish Church: on the one side it retained more of the hierarchical organization of the Church of Rome than either the Danish or the Norwegian Church, and on the other it also became more exclusive and intolerant. By the introduction of the Reformation the clergy did not lose their political power: they continued to be the freemen of the people, in obtaining toleration for the Christian religion. Ansfried, a Christian Dane, was settled at Birka, the chapel rebuilt, and the congregation formed anew. In Sweden, however, as in Denmark, the real introduction and actual establishment of Christianity was effected from England. It was the Anglo-Saxon Siegfried, and the English and Danish monks in his introduced until 1877. The consequences are, that, of the 4,578,901 inhabitants of Sweden (in 1879), only an insignificant percentage belongs to other denominations, while the internal state of the Lutheran Church in Sweden by no means can be pronounced healthy. In the present century widespread religious movements (the Readers, the followers of Eric Jansen, etc.) have occurred among the lower classes; showing not the least trace of sectarianism, but giving ample evidence that the spiritual wants of the masses are not duly administered to. They wanted no other theology than that developed by Lutheran orthodoxy, but they wanted more practical religion than that offered by the Swedish Church; and it can hardly be doubted that the emigration, which of late has assumed such dimensions as to frighten the government, is caused as much by the barrenness of the Swedish church by the poverty of the Swedish soil. It is also a significant fact, that during the last ten years the number of theological students has decreased so much, that it has not always been possible to provide every parish with a pastor. SWEDENBORG, Emanuel, was b. in Stockholm, Sweden, on the 29th of January, 1688, and d. in London on the twenty-ninth day of March, 1772. His father's name was Jesper Swedberg; his mother's, Sarah Behm. He was well born. He descended from families of successful and opulent miners, and combined in his nature the energy, insight into the qualities of material substances, and the practical good sense, which such an employment, followed from generation to generation, would tend to produce. But little is known of his father. His father was a clergyman, who gradually rose to be chaplain of the court, professor in the university of Upsal, and dean of its cathedral, Bishop of Skara, and superintendent of the Swedish churches in America, London, and Portugal. In 1719 the family of Bishop Swedberg was ennobled by Queen Ulrica Eleonora with the name of Swedenborg, which entitled the family to seats in the diet,—a privilege which Swedenborg in due time enjoyed. Bishop Swedberg was simple in his habits, direct in his action, and courageous to attack evil and error wherever he found it,—in king or subject. He was a zealous reformer, a prolific writer, and constantly on the alert to correct abuses, and provide improved methods of instruction. He was a sturdy, devout, wise, practical man. Such was the parentage which had its influential part in determining his mental and spiritual qualities of Swedenborg.

He was well educated. But little is known of his early life. The following account, written by himself, gives us a glimpse of the qualities and natural bent of his mind. "From my fourth to my tenth year," he says, "I was constantly occupied in thought upon God, salvation, and the spiritual experiences of men; and sometimes I revealed things at which my father and mother wondered, saying that angels must be speaking through me. From my sixth to my twelfth year I used to delight in conversing with clergymen about faith; saying that the life of faith is love, and that the love which imparts life is love to the neighbor, also that God gives faith to every one, but only those receive it who practise that love." Nurtured by such a love, and penetrated by the influence of a pure home and a cultivated society, by which his native endowment became imbued with pure and true principles of life, he spent his early years. These influences and principles formed the groundwork and best part of his education.

In 1708, at the age of twenty-one years, he graduated from the university of Upsal with the degree of doctor of philosophy. In the following year he set out on his travels, at that time an essential part of a young man's education. His mind had now taken a strong bent towards mathematics and the natural sciences, specially in their application to practical use. He sought access to every man in his power from whom he hoped to gain any knowledge upon his favorite studies. He declares that he has an "immoderate desire" for these studies. He has been a "reformer," and the "death" of the subject has been given. Also A. Nichelson: Apostolische Secessio in the Church of Sweden, London, 1880; J. Widing: Schoedische Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation, Gotha, 1882; C. M. Butler: The Reformation in Sweden, New York, 1883.

In 1716, a year after his return from his travels, he was appointed by Charles XII., king of Sweden, assessor extraordinary in the College of Mines. This office gave him "a seat and a voice in the college, whenever he was present, and especially whenever any business was brought forward pertaining to mechanics;" though he was particularly directed in the royal commission "to attend Polheimer, the councillor of commerce, and to be of assistance to him in his engineering works and in carrying out his designs." This appointment brought him for a time into personal relations. with the king, who was fond of mathematics, and to whom Swedenborg rendered great service by constructing machines by means of which two galleys, five large boats, and a sloop were conveyed overland a distance of fourteen miles.

Swedenborg now devoted himself entirely to the duties of his office. These duties did not require him to be always at the presence of the king, but allowed him to spend considerable time in the study of science. He was a great lover of science, and of the true worshiping of God, the spiritual sense of the Word, and many other important matters conducive to salvation and wisdom."

From this time until his death, a period of nearly thirty years, he devoted himself entirely to the new work committed to him. He resigned his office as assessor, discontinued his scientific studies, and turned his attention to those subjects which were necessary to the performance of his work. He learned Hebrew, and read the Word attentively and critically in its original languages, and showed the same systematic diligence, and sincere devotion to truth, that he had exhibited in his scientific works. Though claiming special illumination and direction by the Lord, his writings conclusively show that his illumination was gradual, and subject to immutable spiritual laws. His theological works, devoted to an exposition of the spiritual meaning of the Word, and of the doctrines of spiritual truth derived from the Word so interpreted, and to what he claims to have seen and heard during his intromission into the spiritual world, comprise about thirty octavo volumes, and give the most ample means for testing the truth of his claims. To this test they must finally come. They cannot be established or destroyed by assertion or personal authority. They must stand or fall by the only infallible test,—their accordance with the immutable laws of the divine order.

What ever may be the result of this weighing in the balances of divine truth, with regard to his seership and his claim to be divinely commissioned to reveal new truth to men, the unprejudiced mind can hardly fail to conclude that the Swedenborg was kind of knowledge which he thought it beneath him to master, or which he neglected an opportunity of mastering.

Having attained the highest rank among the scientists and philosophers of his time, and being in favor with the king and royal family and his countrymen, he laid aside his philosophical and scientific studies, and turned his attention wholly to questions of a spiritual and religious nature. The end he was seeking led directly to this result, though he reached it in a manner most unexpected to himself. He had been for some years in search of the soul, and had written four large octavo volumes, the first two of which were called the Economy of the Animal Kingdom, and the others, the Animal Formations, in which he described the methods and their results. Before the last work came from the press, he had an experience which changed the direction and character of his studies for the rest of his life. After giving an account of his studies and works up to the present time, he says, "But all that I have thus far related I consider of little importance; for it is far transcended by the circumstance that I have been called to a holy office by the Lord himself, who most mercifully appeared before me, his servant, in the year 1743, when he opened my sight into the spiritual world, and enabled me to converse with spirits and angels; in which state I have continued up to the present day. From that time I began to print and publish the various arcana that were seen by me, or revealed to me, concerning heaven and hell, the state of man after death, the true worshipings of God, the spiritual sense of the Word, and many other important matters conducive to salvation and wisdom."

From this time until his death, a period of nearly thirty years, he devoted himself entirely to the new work committed to him. He resigned his office as assessor, discontinued his scientific studies, and turned his attention to those subjects which were necessary to the performance of his work. He learned Hebrew, and read the Word attentively and critically in its original languages, and showed the same systematic diligence, and sincere devotion to truth, that he had exhibited in his scientific works. Though claiming special illumination and direction by the Lord, his writings conclusively show that his illumination was gradual, and subject to immutable spiritual laws. His theological works, devoted to an exposition of the spiritual meaning of the Word, and of the doctrines of spiritual truth derived from the Word so interpreted, and to what he claims to have seen and heard during his intromission into the spiritual world, comprise about thirty octavo volumes, and give the most ample means for testing the truth of his claims. To this test they must finally come. They cannot be established or destroyed by assertion or personal authority. They must stand or fall by the only infallible test,—their accordance with the immutable laws of the divine order.
devout acknowledgments of his dependence upon him for every faculty and every blessing of life. His nature was large, round, full, and complete. It is a significant fact, that at the present time, more than a century since his decease, his life and works, both scientific and religious, are receiving more attention than ever before. A brief statement of the things done and said in the article on the New Jerusalem Church.

Chauncey Giles (New Church Minister).

Swift, Elisha Pope, D.D., b. at Williams-town, Mass., April 12, 1792; d. at Allegheny, Penn., 1865; grandson of Hon. Ileman Swift, Revolutionary colonel, by fifth remove descended from John Eliot, "Apostle to the Indians;" converted at twenty; graduated from Williams College with honor in 1813; studied theology at Ffalders, Dissentis, and the University of London; ordained as foreign missionary, Sept. 3, 1817; preached and lectured for missions; no foreign field opening, settled as pastor at Dover, October, 1818, then at Pittsburgh, in Second Church, in 1819; during this pastorate served gratuitously in 1827-28 as professor in Western Theological Seminary; resigned in 1831 to become corresponding secretary of the Western Foreign Missionary Society. From 1831 till his death he was pastor of First Church in Allegheny City.

Dr. Swift was in character consecrated, impressively devotional, humble, transparently sincere, careless of man's applause, and sedulous to please God; in mind, powerful, comprehensive, original; in preaching, massive and effective, a "Webster" in the pulpit; in public spirit, eminent; forward in educational zeal. A friend and a founder of the Western University and of the Western Theological Seminary; as a presbyter, always a leader.

But foreign missions stirred him most deeply, and therein he accomplished his most remarkable work. He had the foresight to see the necessity of distinctive church-organization in giving the gospel to the world, the courage to plead for it in the face of opposition and misunderstanding, the organizing power to give it actual existence, and the mingled gentleness and force to secure the adoption and success of the principle with the least possible friction. The Western Missionary Society of 1831, an undertaking, under the circumstances, of moral sublimity, became,"as was intended at its very outset" [Dr. Swift], "the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church." Dr. Swift was the originator of the first, and in deservedly considered the father of the second. His comprehension of missionary principles has never been surpassed; and his writings are standards still for fervor, intelligence, insight, and the glowing confidence of faith. Sylvester P. Scovel.

Swithin, St. (SWITHUN, SWITHUM), Bishop and patron of Winchester; d. July 2, 862. He was of noble birth, educated in the Old Monastery, Winchester, when after his ordination (830) he was made provost, or dean. Egbert, king of the West Saxons, committed his son and successor, or Ethelwolf, to his care, and availed himself of his counsels. Ethelwolf, on his accession, made him his minister, especially in ecclesiastical affairs, and in 852 procured his election to the see of Westminster. St. Swithin's Day is July 15; because on that day, in 844, his relics were moved from the churchyard where he had been buried at his request, that his grave might be trodden on by passers by, to the Cathedral of Winchester. There is a saying, demonstrably erroneous, "If it rain on St. Swithin's Day, there will be rain, more or less, for forty succeeding days." See Butler: Lives of the Saints, July 15.

Switzerland. 1. Introduction of Christianity, and Outline of Ecclesiastical Affairs to the Beginning of the 16th Century. In the middle of the third century Christianity was established in Geneva by Bishops Parakodus and Dionysius of Vienne. From Geneva the new religion spread to Wallis, and then to other parts of the land, the way for it, very likely, prepared by Roman Christian soldiers; but its history is enveloped in great darkness. By the sixth century this wave of Christianity, coming from France, had reached and exhausted presbytery in Switzerland, which however had been established, — Geneva, Sitten, Lausanne, Chur, and Constance. Then came Columban and the monks of St. Gall, and evangelization was given a fresh start. Christianity at length was everywhere embraced. It was, as elsewhere, Oriental in type. Monasticism was its highest development. Monasteries kept on multiplying; yet they were, with the exception of St. Gall, so far from being centers of learning, that, in the fourteenth century, no member of the one in Zurich knew how to write. But in 1460 the first Swiss university (basel) was founded, and at once a change for the better set in. A printing-press was set up, first at Beromünster (1470), and then at Basel and Geneva; and an abbot of Einsiedeln, Albert von Bonstetten, wrote a history of the Burgundian War, and described the Confederacy. The number of parishes and the might of the bishops had increased, likewise, very greatly, since the eighth century. In 1228 the see of Lausanne embraced 801 parishes, and yielded the bishop 60,000 ducats annually. The see of Constance, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, embraced 350 cloisters, 1,780 parishes, and 17,000 priests. The six Swiss bishops were princes of the Holy Roman Empire; the abbots of St. Gallen, Einsiedeln, Pfäffers, Dissentia, and Muri were princes. The church was rich and splendid: but it was luxurious and lax, and not entirely able to carry out its plans; on the contrary, everywhere was opposition to its politics and its doctrines. In the fight between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. Western Switzerland sided with the emperor. The clergy were forced to pay their taxes, like other people. Whole districts purchased their independence of the church. No attention was paid to interdicts, episcopal or papal. The Baselers in 1332 threw into the Rhine the Papal legate who would publish the ban among them. The sermons of Heinrich and Arnold of Brascia, full of intimation of religious changes, were listened to attentively. The Zürichers in 1274, and again in 1331, set before their priests the alternative, either to lay down their ecclesiastical functions, or to leave the city.
At the end of the fifteenth century there were increasing symptoms of the imminence of relief from the intolerable burden of ecclesiastical criminality. Nevertheless, the church everywhere exercised its wonted power over the majority of the people. The Waldensians had shown themselves in the cantons of Bern and Basel since 1519, but had quickly been suppressed. The councils of Constance (1414-18) and Basel (1431-43) had only shaken the pillars of the Papacy, not broken them. The Swiss cities of Bern and Zürich received long indulgences in recognition of their fidelity to the Pope. No serious attempts were made by the clergy to stem the tide of wickedness. The pulpit was dumb. But the light of the rising sun of the new and better day was meanwhile gilding the snow-clad peaks of Switzerland.

II. The Period of the Reformation from 1519 till 1556. — In Switzerland as in Germany, the Reformation was carried through in consequence of the capacity of its leaders, the readiness of the people, and the favorable political situation. The Pope, for his own ends, had loosened the Swiss Confederacy; and this state of things wrought the Swiss cities of Bern and Zurich received long indulgences in recognition of their fidelity to the Pope. No serious attempts were made by the clergy to stem the tide of wickedness. The pulpit was dumb. But the light of the rising sun of the new and better day was meanwhile gilding the snow-clad peaks of Switzerland.

The great men on the Protestant side who in this period carried on the Reformation, were such as Bullinger, Peter Martyr Vermigli, Heidegger, the two Hottingers, the Buxtorfs, Wolfgang Musculus, Diodati, Spanheim, and Turretin. The Helvetic Consensus Formula of 1675, with its Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, and its Buxtorfian doctrine of the inspiration of vowel-points, is the symbolical performance of this period; but after 1729 it ceased to have any authority.

The nineteenth century brought an awakening of religious activity. Fresh troubles, however, broke out. In 1839 the call of David Friedrich Strauss to the university of Zürich led to a revolution. In 1845 the Vaud canton experienced a similar fate because the Bishop of Geneva, having abolished the Papal power. In 1536 appeared John Calvin, whose energy made Geneva the metropolis of the Reformed Church: by his side were Viret and Beza. The first authoritative symbol of the Reformed Church of Switzerland was the Second Helvetic Confession (1538), the work of Bullinger; and with its promulgation closes the period of the Swiss Reformation. See Bünting, Calvin, Farel, Reformation (pp. 2007, 2008), Zwingli, etc.

III. The Period from 1556 to the Present. — The conflict between Protestants and Roman Catholics, which in Germany lasted until 1648 (the Peace of Westphalia), was terminated only in 1712 (the second battle of Villermege). The Catholic re-action in the second half of the sixteenth century found its leader in Carlo Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, who introduced into Switzerland the Capuchins and Jesuits, founded the Swiss college in Milan, established a nunciature in Switzerland, and in 1583 entered into a plan to overthrow the Reformation there altogether. At length the two Confessions met in a decisive battle at Villermege, the result of which was a permanent peace.

The great men on the Protestant side who in this period carried on the Reformation, were such as Bullinger, Peter Martyr Vermigli, Heidegger, the two Hottingers, the Buxtorfs, Wolfgang Musculus, Diodati, Spanheim, and Turretin. The Helvetic Consensus Formula of 1675, with its Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, and its Buxtorfian doctrine of the inspiration of vowel-points, is the symbolical performance of this period; but after 1729 it ceased to have any authority.

The nineteenth century brought a awakening of religious activity. Fresh troubles, however, broke out. In 1839 the call of David Friedrich Strauss to the university of Zürich led to a revolution. In 1845 the Vaud canton experienced a similar fate because the Bishop of Geneva, having abolished the Papal power. It was really, however, a protest of the ungodly against the progress of evangelical truth. In November, 1845, the Vaudois clergy left the Established Church, and formed the Free Church of the Vaudois; in February, 1846, a Church was established by the Old-Catholic bishop of Germany (Dr. Reinkens) in 1876. Their number in 1877 was 30,838 of minor Christian sects, and 7,373 were Jews. Three cantons (Zurich, Vaud, Schaffhausen) and a half canton (Appenzell Nordw.) are Protestant; six cantons (Zug, Luzern, Schwyz, Uri, Ticino, Valais) and three half-cantons (Appenzell Sudw., Unterwalden-Obwalden, Unterwalden-Nidwalden) are Roman-Catholic; and ten cantons (Neuchâtel, Bern, Glarus, Thurgau, Grisons, Aargau, Geneva, St. Gallen, Freiburg, Solothurn) and two half-cantons (Bâle-ville, Bâlecamp) are mixed. The Protestants belong almost entirely to the National Reformed Church of their canton. There are, however, Free Churches in Geneva, Vaud, and Neuchâtel. The Lutheran Church has only a single congregation, at Geneva. Uri is the only canton in which there is no Protestant congregation. In German Switzerland are ten sections. The first condemns pantheism, natural and Christian ethics; the second, Unitarianism, and absolute rationalism; the third, indifferentism and latitudinarianism; the fourth, socialism, communism, and secret societies; the fifth, errors concerning the temporal power of the Pope; the sixth, errors concerning civil society; the seventh, errors of natural and Christian ethics; the eighth, errors concerning civil society; the ninth, errors concerning Christian marriage; the tenth, errors concerning the creation of religious confessions, or to repress any ecclesiastical infringement upon the rights of citizens. All disputes relative to the creation of religious congregations, and to schisms in existing congregations, are decided by the federal authorities. No new bishopric shall be established without the approval of the Confederation. The Jesuits and the affiliated orders, whether exercising ecclesiastical or educational functions, are absolutely forbidden to enter any canton, or to repress any ecclesiastical infringement upon the rights of citizens. The founding of new convents and religious orders is forbidden.

SYLLABUS: The Papal, An index, or catalogue, of eighty heresies condemned by Pope Pius IX., Dec. 8, 1864, on the basis of several encyclical letters issued by the same pontiff during his long reign. Its full title is, A Syllabus containing the Principal Errors of Our Times, which are noted in the Consistorial Allocutions, in the Encyclicals, and in other Apostatical Letters of Our Most Holy Lord, Pope Pius IX. The number of heresies included was probably 187, against the eighty heresies of the first three centuries, which are mostly of a Gnostic character. The Papal document is purely negative, but indirectly it teaches and enjoins the very opposite of what it condemns as error. It is divided into ten sections. The first condemns pantheism, naturalism, and absolute rationalism; the second, moderate rationalism; the third, indifferentism, and latitudinarianism; the fourth, communism, secret societies, Bible societies, and other "pests of this description;" the fifth, errors concerning the Church and her rights; the sixth, errors concerning civil society; the seventh, errors of natural and Christian ethics; the eighth, errors concerning Christian marriage; the ninth, errors concerning the temporal power of the Pope; the tenth, errors of modern liberalism. All the errors condemned are the principles of civil and religious liberty, and the separation of Church and State. The Syllabus indirectly asserts the infallibility of the Pope, the exclusive right of Romanism to recognition by the civil government, the unlawfulness of all non-Catholic religions.
the complete independence of the Papal hierarchy, the power of the Roman Church to coerce and enforce, and its supreme control over public education, science, and literature.

It will be seen that the Syllabus condemns many errors which are likewise rejected by all good Protestants. At the same time it condemns, as it had condemned, as it still condemns, all important truths. It re-asserts all the extravagances of the medieval Papacy, and is a declaration of war against modern civilization and progress. It is a glaring anachronism.

What authority attaches to this document? Cardinal Newman, in his defence of the Syllabus against Gladstone's attack, virtually denied its dogmatic force, saying (Letter to the Duke of Norfolk, p. 108), "We can no more accept the Syllabus as a document, than any other index or table of contents." But the Syllabus is more than a mere index, and contains as many definitions and judgments as titles. Moreover, the Papal infallibility decree of 1870 makes all ex-cathedra or official utterances of the Pope on matters of faith and discipline infallible. It acts backwards as well as forwards: otherwise it would be null and void (Sive falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus). The Syllabus is certainly an official document, addressed to all the bishops of the Catholic world, and sent to them with a Papal encyclical. And herein lies its importance and danger. As a personal manifesto of the Pope, it would be comparatively harmless and unheeded outside of the Roman communion; but clothed with infallible authority, and followed by the decrees of the Vatican Council, it provoked and stimulated the so-called "Kulturkampf" in Germany, a pamphlet war in England about its bearing on civil and political allegiance, and led to serious conflicts between Church and State in Italy, Austria, Prussia, France, Belgium, and Brazil. Where Church and State are united, there must be collision when both claim sovereignty, and the one claims infallible authority in addition. Even in the United States, where the government has nothing to do with the Church, the influence of the Syllabus is felt in the legislation on marriage and in public education, both of which have a secular as well as a religious aspect. The State claims and exercises the right and duty of educating the people for intelligent and useful citizenship; while the Syllabus condemns all public education which is not controlled by the teaching of the Roman Church, and stimulates the efforts of the priesthood to Romanize or to break up the public schools, or, where neither can be done from want of power, to neutralize them by parochial schools in which the doctrines and principles of Trent and the Vatican are inculcated upon the rising generation. Time must show what will be the ultimate issue of this irrepressible conflict.

Sylvester is the name of three Popes. — Sylvester I. (314-335), of whom it is said that he baptized Constantine the Great, and received the famous donation from him, is a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, and commemorated on Dec. 31. — Sylvester II. (999-1003), whose true name was Gerbert, descended from humble parents in Auvergne, but distinguished himself by his immense learning and brilliant accomplishments, and attracted general attention by his liberal views of the relation between the synods, the bishops, and the Pope. Otto II. chose him as tutor for his son, and made him abbot of Bobbio. Afterwards he taught in the school of Rheims, and was, on account of his knowledge of chemistry and physics, believed* by simple people to have sold his soul to the Devil. He defended the decrees of the synod of Rheims (891) against Pope John Xv., but was afterwards reconciled with the Pope, and made archbishop of Ravenna. When he ascended the Papal throne, he completely changed his views of the Papal power, and treated all cases occurring with supreme authority. His literary remains, of which his letters are of special interest, have been edited by Masson, Duchesne, and others, last by Pertz. His life was written by Hock, Vienna, 1857; and Max Büdinger, Cassel, 1851. — Sylvester III. was for three months the Antipope of Benedict IX., and Gregory VI., and was deposed by the synod of Sutri (1046).

Sylvester, Joshua, b. 1563; d. at Middleburg in Holland, Sept. 28, 1618; was a member of the Company of Merchant Adventurers, and eminent as a linguist. His poems, mostly on sacred subjects, and translated from the French, occupy in the edition of 1620 some twelve hundred folio pages, and won him the epithet of "silver-tongued." Chief among them is Du Bar- ios, his Divine Weekes and Workes. According to Campbell, this "was among the most popular of our early translations," and has "beauties strangely intermixed with bathos and flatness." Charles Dunster, rector of Petworth, Sussex, published in 1800 Considerations on Milton's Early Reading, and the Prima Stima of his Paradise Lost, maintaining that it was much indebted to Sylvester.

Sylvestrists, a monastic order founded by Sylvester Gozzoloni (b. at Osimo in the States of the Church, 1170; in 1231 he founded a monastery on Monte Fano, and adopted the Benedictine rules, with some modifications, for the inmates). The order was confirmed by Innocent IV. in 1247. In 1682 it was united with that of the Vallombrosa, but was again separated from it in 1681, and confirmed anew by Alexander VIII. in 1690.

SYMBOL. 2276  SYNAGOGUES.

SYMBOL (συμβόλον, symbolon, literally, that which is thrown together) is properly a mark, badge, watchword, or test. It was first used in a theological sense by Cyprian, in his Epistle Ad Magnum (Ep. 76 or 69), in the year 230, but since the fourth century very generally. Originally it had reference to the Apostles' Creed as the baptismal profession, by which Christians were distinguished from all non-Christians, since they were regarded as soldiers of Christ. Luther and Melancthon first applied the word to Protestant creeds. Symbolical books are the symbols themselves. For a discussion of the nature of creeds and their distribution, see art. CREED.

SYMBOLICS treats of the origin, history, and contents of the various creeds of Christendom. It is comparative dogmatics. It was formerly known under the name of "Polemics," and "Controversial Theology," but is now treated in a more historical and irreligious spirit. In this modern form it may be said to have begun with Fabricius, Hamburg, 1721. Neudecker. Marheineke, who in 1810 published his Symbolik, had reference to the Apostles" Creed as the baptismal profession, as a military watchword, distinguishing Christians from all non-Christians. Since his day much study has been given to the origin of different creeds, particularly to those of prime importance, e.g., the Apostles', the Nicene, the Athanasian, and much light has been thrown upon the subject. The teachings of the Roman-Catholic Möhler, in his Symbolik (1833), upon the contrasts between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, were met by Baur, Nitzsch, and other Protestants. Among the most eminent scholars in this department may be mentioned Swainson, Lumby, Caspari, and Schaff. See the Literature in the Creeds (N.Y., 1878, 3 vols.) by the last-named. Recent works in this department of study are G. F. Oehler: Lehrbuch d. Symbolik, Tubingen, 1870; K. H. G. Scheele: Theologik Symbolik, Upsala, 1870 sqq.; German translation, Goth. 1880-81, 3 vols.; B. Weydt: Symbolik der römisc-katholischen Kirche, Goth., 1889.

SYMBOLUM APOSTOLICUM. See Apostles' Creed.

SYMMACHIAN was the name of a sect which lived in Rome, and taught that the human body was created, not by God, but by the Devil, and was consequently to be mistreated in every way possible. The origin of the sect is doubtful, - whether founded by that Symmachus who translated the Old Testament into Greek, or by some other Symmachus. In the time of Augustine it was rapidly disappearing. See Contra Crescensium, i. 31; see also Philastrius: De Haresibus, ed. Fabricius, Hamburg, 1721. Neudecker.

SYMMACHUS, Pope, 495-514. After the death of Anastasius II., a double election took place; the popular party in Rome electing the deacon Symmachus, the imperial the archpriest Laurentius. Theodoric, the king of the Ostrogoths, was called in as umpire, and decided in favor of Symmachus; but it was several years before Laurentius finally yield. At the synod of Rome (in 502, 503, and 504), Symmachus introduced various measures, limiting the participation of the laity in the Papal election and in the administration of the property of the Papal see; so, on the whole, his government tended towards the consolidation of the Papal power. Neudecker.

SYMPHORIANUS, a Gallic martyr from the reign of Aurelian; d. probably in 180. He was a native of Autun (Augustodunum), and is described as a youth of distinguished appearance and excellent education. Having refused to do homage to the statue of Berecynthia (Cybele), he was carried before the prefect Herachius; and having said, "I am a Christian," and absolutely refused to make any concessions to the demands of the reigning Paganism, he was decapitated. He is commemorated on Aug. 22. See Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 22, and Ruinart: Acta primorum martyrum. Gass.

SYMPHOROA, a Christian widow, whose husband, a tribune, had suffered martyrdom. She was summoned before the Emperor Hadrian, and commanded to sacrifice, and partake in the Pagan solemnities at the consecration of the new imperial palace at Tibur. As she refused, she and her seven sons were cruelly tortured and killed. They are commemorated on July 18. See Acta Sanctorum, July 18, and Ruinart: Acta primorum martyrum, who accepts the story as true, though it does not harmonize with what is else known of Hadrian.

SYNAGOGUE, the Great, according to Jewish tradition, denotes the council first appointed, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, to re-organize the religious life, institutions, and literature of the people. Ezra, if he was not the originator of that council, certainly was its president. [Comp., against this view, Graetz, in Frankel's Monatschrift, Leipzig, 1857, etc., pp. 61 sq. 61 sq.] This council consisted of a hundred and twenty men, who were not contemporaneous, but who are to be regarded as transmitters of tradition from Moses and Joshua down to the time of Simon the Just (q.v.), who, according to Pirke Aboth (i. 1), was the last surviving member. As to the work of the Great Synagogue, see the arts. CANON and Bible-TEXT (of the Old Testament), and Schmeel. The existence of the Great Synagogue [was first questioned by Richard Simon: Hist. Crit. du Vieux Test., lib. i. cap. viii.]; then by Jacob Alting, who was followed by Rau: Diatribe de Synag. Magna [Traj. ad Rhen., 1726], pp. 42 sq.; Aurivillius: De Synag. vulgo dicta Magna [ed. J. D. Michaelis, Gottingen, 1790]. De Wette, and others, who rejected it as one of the inventions of tradition, because it is not mentioned by Josephus, Philo, or the Seder Olam, and because the earliest record of it is in the tract of the Mishna entitled Pirke Aboth, which belongs to the second century of our era. On the other hand, scholars like Eichhorn (Einleitung, i. § 5), Bertholdt (Einleitung, i. pp. 68 sq.), Ewald (Gesch. Israel's, ii. 192), Jost (Geschichte der Israeliten, iii. pp. 43 sq.), Luzz (Gottesdienstl. Vorträge, p. 93), maintain that there is much historical truth underlying the tradition of a body of men, who, between the time when prophecy was about to die out and the Greek period, were leaders among the Jewish people, transmitted tradition, and made such provision for the spiritual welfare of the people, that the law of God again permeated their life. But the name "Great Synagogue" was probably first adopted some centuries later. Whether there were really a hundred and twenty men or not is difficult to say. We must not, however, identify the Great Synagogue with...

the Great Sanhedrin (q.v.), or take it as its original form, as does Schickard (De jure reg. Hebr., i. part 2), Witasius (Misc. diss. de synedr., § 28), J. Braun (Sel. Sacr., Amst., 1700, p. 505), Sachs, Herzfeld, Heidenheim.

1. Name, Origin, and Development of the Synagogue. — Synagogue (Greek, synagogue) is the name of those religious assemblies, which, during the post-exile period, existed first side by side with the sacrificial service in the temple, and which, after its existence, were substituted for it. Most synagogues, synagogues, which were called into existence, which afterwards became the only sanctuary, the Jews were anxious to preserve the unity in faith, doctrine, and life. To achieve this, regular assemblies were inaugurated on certain days, in the different places of Palestine where Jews lived, and where men of learning expounded the law. Thus, in all places where a certain number of Jews lived, and where damaged rolls were preserved. There were, moreover, a perpetual light, and lamps were lighted at the beginning of the sabbath, i.e., on Friday evening. To the furniture also belonged alms-boxes at or near the door, also notice-boards, on which were written the names of offenders who had been put out of the synagogue. In some synagogues there was also a second chest for the rolls of the prophets, and where damaged rolls were preserved. There were, moreover, a perpetual light, and lamps were lighted at the beginning of the sabbath, i.e., on Friday evening. To the furniture also belonged alms-boxes at or near the door, also notice-boards, on which were written the names of offenders who had been put out of the synagogue.

2. Furniture. — In oldest times the people probably stood in the synagogue (Neh. vii. 5, 7), or sat upon the floor. But there were also armchairs, or seats of honor, for the officiants of the synagogue, the doctors of the law, etc. (Matt. xxiii. 2, 6; Mark xii. 39; Luke xi. 43; Jas. ii. 2, 3). They were placed in front of the ark containing the law, or at the Jerusalem end; and there distinguished persons sat with their faces to the people, while the congregation stood facing both these honorable ones and the ark. Besides the rostrum or platform, capable of containing several persons (Neh. vii. 4, 6), there was a reading-desk, on which the sacred scrolls were laid. These scrolls were wrapped in linen or silk wrappers, often adorned with letters or other ornaments of gold and silver, and were kept in the wooden chest, or ark, or sanctuary. In some synagogues there was also a second chest for the rolls of the prophets, and where damaged rolls were preserved. There were, moreover, a perpetual light, and lamps were lighted at the beginning of the sabbath, i.e., on Friday evening. To the furniture also belonged alms-boxes at or near the door, also notice-boards, on which were written the names of offenders who had been put out of the synagogue.

3. Times of Worship. — Besides on sabbaths and festivals, the people also met on Monday and Thursday, which were the two market-days in the week.

4. Liturgy, or Order of Service. — (1) The prayers which took the place of the daily sacrifices were offered up also at those hours when the daily sacrifices were made. As on sabbaths and festivals additional sacrifices were offered besides the usual, so, likewise, additional prayers were added to the regular ones. The main part of the daily service was the Shema and the eighteen benedicitions. The prayer was followed on the sabbath and festivals by (2) the reading of the section of the law, which was originally divided in a hundred and fifty-four sections, or parashiyoth. After the section of the law (§), a section from the prophets, or Haphtarah, was read; then came (4) the homily, exposition, or derasha. The service closed (5) with the benediction, or the congregation responded by saying "Amen.""

gogus, who had the care of the furniture, to open the doors, to clean the synagogue, to light the lamps, etc. Other officers were the almoners, corresponding to the seven deacons (Acts vi. 1 sq.); and they had to be "men of honesty, wisdom, justice, and have the confidence of the people." We must also mention the Ten Bailiffs [or "Men of Leisure"], who were independent of business, because they had private means, or were stipendiaries of the congregation. They had to be present at all services, so that there might be no delay in beginning the service at the proper hours.

SYNCELLUS (one who shares his cell with another) denotes, generally, the visitor of one of the higher ecclesiastical officers. The Patriarch of Constantinople had several synceli, of whom the first (protosynccellus) at one time even ranked before the metropolitans. Synceli were also known in the West.

SYNCRETISM is a word of Greek origin, though of rare occurrence in ancient literature, referring to a saying about the Cretians,— that they were very ready to make shift, and to be content with such comforts as they got by making it a point to agree with each other, but immediately made peace, and joined hands, when attacked by foreigners. It was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see mention of Erasmus by Calvin, in his "Institutio"

the principle of moderation, expansion, development, in opposition to the principle of a still and stationary orthodoxy.

Throughout the whole period of the Reformation two opposite tendencies are discernible: one starting from the axiom that all truth is one, and consequently condemning toleration of different opinions as laxity; and the other moving along the conviction that it is true religion to love, and consequently striving after reconciliation and harmony. In the middle of the seventeenth century these two tendencies clashed against each other; and the result was a sharp and bitter literary contest, known as the "Syncretistic Controversy." The situation is very vividly characterized by the decrees of the synod of Charenton (1631) and the criticism which those decrees called forth. Some French-Reformed congregations asked the synod whether Lutherans living among them could be baptized, married, admitted to the Lord's Supper, etc., in their churches, without first abjuring their specifically Lutheran tenets; and the synod answered in the affirmative. Then the Roman Catholics raised a huge cry, stigmatizing such indifference to religious divergences as mere atheism. (See Francis Veron: Methodes de traiter des controverses de religion, 1638.) The controversy proper, however, began a little later, and was carried on in another field. It broke out at the Colloquy of Thorn (1645), and raged till the death of Calixtus (1655). Renewed by the Colloquies of Cassel and Berlin (1801), it went on till the secular governments commanded silence (in 1809); and once more it finally burst forth during the last years of Calovius' life (1775-86).

Considering the reciprocal hatred between the Lutherans and the Reformed among his subjects as a national calamity, King Ladislaus IV. of Poland arranged a religious dispute between the two parties at Thorn in 1645. As delegates from the evangelical churches of Germany were also invited, intrigues immediately began. The Saxon theologians, representatives of the strictest orthodoxy, were eager to prevent any theologian of the Helmstädter school, whose tendency was syncretistic, from being sent as a delegate to the colloquy; and they succeeded. So, though Calixtus, the head of the school, was elected for Dantzig, they managed to have the election cancelled. He was present, however, at Thorn; and he was seen to converse freely with the Reformed theologians, even to walk along with them in the streets, and to visit them in their lodgings. Such a scandal could not, of course, be tolerated. The colloquy over, and no result arrived at, the Saxon theologians issued a memoir (Dec. 29, 1646), in which they accused the Helmstädter theologians of undermining the Lutheran Church by their novelties. Calixtus answered (Feb. 28, 1647), characterizing the accusation as an infamous calumny. The Saxon theologians now directed their animadversions against the most insignificant, deviation of Calixtus from the traditional Lutheran system, and made the most possible out of it, shrewdly calculating, that, if they could prove him to be unsound, the inference would be irresistible that his moderation towards the Reformed was pernicious. They sent a hail-storm of attacks down upon him, little tracts, and heavy quartos of sixteen hundred apologetica problematis Calixtini, etc., 1649, Judicium de Calixtino desiderio, etc., 1650, Calixtinische Gewissenscure, 1654; CALOVII: Consideratio nova theologica: Heim, etc., 1648, Syncretismus Calixtins, 1655, But Calixtino ad pacem, 1669. But Calixtino quod est obedientia, 1669 (De questionibus, etc., 1649; Appendix, 1650; Verantwortungen, 1651). Political passions and interests were brought to bear upon the controversy. Jealous of Brandenburg and the Palatinate, the supporters of the Reformed Church in Germany and of syncretism in German theology, the elector of Saxony attempted to deal with the Reformed Church in Germany a deadly blow by preventing the Peace of Westphalia from placing it on an equal footing with the Lutheran Church. He failed. As head of the Corpus Evangelicorum, he then sent an admontory letter to the three princes who maintained the university of Helmstadt, but received a very sharp answer. Finally the Saxen theologians summed up their complaints against Calixtus in ninety-eight heretical propositions, culled from his writings, and a new shower of polemics burst over him. In one year (1655) Calovius published Harmonia Calixtino-koriatrica (twelve hundred pages in quarto), Systema locorum (two heavy volumes in octavo), and Fides veterum. The death of Calixtus, however, brought about a kind of armistice.

In order to establish a more satisfactory modus vivendi between the Lutheran and Reformed subjects, the landgrave of Hesse invited two professors from the Reformed faculty of Marburg, and two from the Lutheran faculty of Rinteln, to a colloquy at Cassel, July 1-9, 1661. The colloquy proved a success. The Brevis relatio which was issued at its close, though it nowhere concealed the actually existing differences between the Lutherans and the Reformed faith, everywhere emphasized their fundamental harmony; and for that very reason it was received with great favor throughout the Reformed Church. Quite otherwise in the Lutheran Church. The faculty of Rinteln was filled with pupils of Calixtus; and their moderation at the colloquy of Cassel was by the strictly orthodox party considered a treasonous surrender of the very principles of Lutheranism. The faculty of Wittenberg, composed of Calovius, Quenstedt, Deutschmann, etc., sent a violent harangue to Rinteln (Epistola ad colloquio Cassellano), March 12, 1662, and received an answer of the same character (Epistola apologogica), Dec. 18, 1662, and Calovius again descended into the arena with a German book (Gründlicher Beweis) of a thousand pages, and a Latin book (Anaforologia) of seven hundred pages; and once more the Synergetic Controversy was raging. Meanwhile, the elector of Brandenburg encouraged by the success of the landgrave, determined to try the same experiment, and arranged a colloquy in Berlin. But the Lutherans were unwilling and suspicious; and the colloquy dragged on from September, 1662, to May, 1663, without any result. On Sept. 16, 1664, the elector issued a decree forbidding all discussion of the points in question from the pulpit, besides taking other measures for the establishment of peace and order. All ministers were demanded to sign the edict; and those who refused—as, for instance, Paul Gerhardt—were dismissed. In the same year the faculty of Wittenberg published the Consilia theologica Württembergia, containing the famous Consensus repetitus fidei vere Lutheranae, which aimed directly at the pupils of Calixtus. It was, no doubt, the idea of Calovius to represent the theology of the school of Helmstadt not only as a deviation from true Lutheranism, but as a new religion, not protected by the Peace of Westphalia. The situation became critical. The syncretists found an able defender in Fr. U. Calixtus, a son of their late leader, who in 1667 published his Demonstratio liquidissima against the Consensus. But he was attacked by Aegidius Strauch with such an asperity and coarseness, that he had to go to the civil courts for protection. A libel-suit was instituted, and the procedure caused great and widespread scandal. At that moment the elector interfered (1669), and commanded both parties to keep silent.

During the period of quiet which followed, from 1669 to 1673, Duke Ernst the Pious, of Saxe-Altenburg, made great exertions in order to effect a reconciliation between the syncretists and the orthodox party, between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches. The memoir of Spener, dated May 31, 1670, made a deep impression; and his practical suggestions pointed in the same direction as the duke's schemes. But all hopes of peace were finally wrecked on the stubbornness of Calovius. Immediately after the death of Duke Ernst, he began the controversy again. Attacks and counter-attacks followed in rapid succession, in Latin and German, in verse and prose. The satirical comedy, Triumphus concordiae, which was acted in Wittenberg by the students at some university-festival, became very famous. The author was imprisoned, the printer was fined, and the elector saw fit to revive the laws forbidding the publication of controversial writings. But Calovius continued: he wrote anonymously or pseudonymously. His principal work from this period is his Historia syncretistica, which appeared in 1682, without name, or place, or date. It was not confiscated; but its sale was prohibited, and that measure seems to have made a very deep impression on him. As the counterpart of the Historia syncretistica, and closing the whole controversy, may be considered Fr. U. Calixtus' Tract ad pacem, H. Schmid: Geschicht d. synkretistischen Streitigkeiten, Erlangen, 1846; Tholuck: Akad. Leben d. 17. Jahrhund., 1854, 2 vols., Lebenszeugen d. luth. Kirche, Berlin, 1859, Kirch. Leben d. 17. HENKE.

SYNERGISM is a sublimated type of Semipelagianism, and had for its representatives the Elector of Brandenburg, and specially Melanchthon and his school. Protestant theology in its first stage was the strictest Augustinianism. Luther taught that for salvation is concerned, man is like a pillar of salt, like Lot's wife, yea, like a clod and stone, a dead picture, using neither mouth nor eyes, mind nor heart." Conversion is solely the act of divine grace. Melanchthon held to this view at first. In his LocL of 1621 he speaks of the will as des-SYNERGISM.

The doctrine of synergism is a theological perspective that emphasizes the free cooperation of human will with the divine will. It emerged as a response to the strict Lutheranism advocated by Melanchthon, who believed in predestination and the absolute sovereignty of God. Melanchthon's view was that everything was predetermined by God's will, leaving no room for human choice or action.

In contrast, synergists like Flacius and Wigand believed in a more moderate form of Lutheranism, where human will and divine will could co-operate. They argued that while God's will was supreme, humans also had a role to play in the process of salvation.

Wigand, a proponent of synergism, was known for his writings on the topic, and his influence was significant in shaping the theological landscape of the time. He emphasized the importance of human volition in the salvation process, which was seen as a deviation from strict Lutheranism.

Flacius, another prominent writer, engaged in a series of controversies with Wigand and others, defending his view of human participation in salvation. These debates were significant in the history of Lutheran theology and helped to shape the development of the doctrine of synergism.

In summary, synergism represents a theological viewpoint that seeks to reconcile the sovereignty of God with the free will of humanity, offering a middle ground between the extremes of predestination and free will.

SYNESIUS.

Synesius was a Christian bishop and philosopher active in the late 4th century. He was born in Cyrene in 375 and lived during the period of the Byzantine Empire. Synesius was known for his philosophical and theological writings, as well as his position within the Christian church.

His collected works were published posthumously, and they include moral, theological, and philosophical essays. Synesius is particularly remembered for his correspondence and philosophical treatises. He was a disciple of Hypatia during her time in Alexandria, and his writings showed a blend of Christian and Neoplatonic thought.

Synesius' works were influential in shaping the theological and philosophical debates of his time, and his ideas continue to be studied and discussed by scholars today. His writings on the nature of the will and the role of grace in human salvation provide valuable insights into the theological debates of the late antiquity.

SYRIA, AND MISSIONS TO SYRIA. I. HISTORICAL SKETCH.—Syria is called Bur-ez Sham by the Arabs, who include in the title Palestine (Filistin). The name Syria is derived from Taur, or Sur (Sour). The Greeks early became acquainted with that city, and gave its name to the country. At a remote era the Arameans had founded political communities in Syria; and the kingdoms of Aram, Damascus (Damascus), and Aram-Zobah (the Bakass), are mentioned in the Bible.

The Phoenicians, or Canaanites, were the most remarkable of all the ancient inhabitants of the country. With the Damascus long held the northern part of Syria. Phoenicia attained its greatest power about B.C. 1050, and continued in almost uninterrupted prosperity five hundred years. During the period of the judges, Syria was more or less under the suzerainty of the Pharaohs; and David extended his dominions over Damascus and Hamath.

From the time of Cyrus (536 B.C.) until the rise of the Persian power, Syria and Palestine were governed by a Persian satrap, resident in Damascus.

After the battle of Issus (334 B.C.), Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine yielded to Alexander the Great, excepting Tyre and Ascalon.

After the death of Alexander, Syria continued under the reign of the Ptolemies for sixty years, and then was conquered by the Seleucids, who held it until 143, the era of the Maccabees.

In B.C. 34 Syria passed under the Roman yoke, Herod the Great being made king of the Jews. After the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), Judea was attached to the province of Syria; and, soon after, Syria and Palestine were placed under the direct dominion of a Roman prefect, Antioch being the seat of government.

In this state the country continued under the Roman and Byzantine Empire until the Muslim conquest in A.D. 634.

Christianity was established under Constantine; and the "extent, wealth, and architectural taste of the Christians" in the subsequent period may be inferred from the splendid ruins of their churches in every part of Syria. The finest mosques are in Damascus, Beirut, and Tripoli, the Aksa in Jerusalem, and the Agia Sophia in Constantinople, were Christian churches.

In A.D. 649 Damascus was made capital of the Mohammedan Empire. Syria was full of splendid cities, such as Antioch, Palmyra, Damascus, Heliopolis, Apamea, Gerasa, Bostra, Ascalon, and Cesarœa; but under the blight of Islam these all fell into decay, and Damascus alone remains prosperous.

In 750, under the Abbasides, the Caliphate removed to Cufa, and then to Bagdad; Syria becoming a mere province of the Mohammedan Empire.

In the middle of the tenth century it was taken by the Fatimite dynasty of Egypt; and toward the close of the eleventh century, Syria was invaded by the Selukian Turks, and annexed to their empire.

The period of the Crusades continued from A.D. 1099 until A.D. 1291, when Acre was taken by the Mameluke Sultan of Egypt.

For more than two centuries after this period Syria suffered from the fierce wars of the "Shepherd hordes of Tartary," and their brethren the Tartar Slav sovereigns of Egypt. In 1401 Timur the Tartar (Tamerlane) invaded the country, burnt Antioch, Emessa, Baalbek, and Damascus, and either massacred their inhabitants, or sold them into slavery.

In 1517 Syria and Palestine were conquered by the Ottoman Sultan, Selim I., and have continued under Turkish rule to this day, declining in wealth and prosperity until the people of the interior provinces sunk to the lowest point of intellectual and moral degradation.

In 1832 Ibrahim Pacha conquered Syria for his father, Mohammed Ali, but was expelled by the English in 1841, and Syria restored to the Porte.

II. THE LAND.—Syria and Palestine lie along the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, extending from Egypt and the Sinai desert on the south to the confines of Asia Minor on the north, and reaching from 31° to 36° 30' north latitude. The length of the country is 380 miles, and its breadth from 60 to 100 miles; its area being about 28,000 square miles.

A mountain chain, under different names, runs through the land from north to south, being intersected at different points, thus forming distinct ranges. From the wilderness north of Beersheba, the foot-hills rise to mountains about Hebron; and the broken, undulating range extends north-west to the headland of Carmel. North of the Carmel range lies the plain of Edræalon, which extends through to the Jordan. Over this plain a railway route has just been surveyed.

North of Edræalon the range continues broad and broken, to the deep ravine of the Litany, which empties into the sea near Tyre. Beyond the Litany rises the noble range of Lebanon, which runs a hundred miles to the north, varying in height from four thousand to eleven thousand feet, and breaking down north-east of Tripoli into a broad plain, which sweeps from the sea eastward to the Orontes at Hums and Hamath, forming the "entrance of Hamath," mentioned by Moses as the northern border of the land of Israel (Num. xxxiv. 8). North of this plain rises the Jebel el Haun, the southern spur of the Nusairiyeh range, anciently Barquel Mons, which extends north, and terminates in the beautiful conical peak of Mount Casius at the mouth of the Orontes.

North of the Orontes the range is known as Gawar Dagh, the Amanus of the Ptolemy, which extends north fifty miles to Mount Taurus.

The chain of Anti-Lebanon rises in the plain of Hamath, about twenty miles east of the northern end of Lebanon, and runs parallel to the latter, culminating in Mount Hermon, which has an elevation of about ten thousand feet. From Hermon the ridge breaks down into an irregular and lower range, which runs due south along the eastern bank of the Jordan and the Dead Sea to the mountains of Edom.

The political geography of Syria has changed with every change of dynasty for centuries. At present Syria and Palestine constitute one Welaiet, or pachalic, extending from Antioch to Gaza, which is styled the Pachalic of Damascus.

The province of Mount Lebanon was erected into a distinct pachalic after the massacre of 1860, the pacha being always a Latin Christian, appointed by the Porte, with the approval of the great powers of Europe. David Pacha was the first pacha of Lebanon; Franco Pacha, the second; and the next mutserrif was Rustem Pacha, an Italian by birth, a man of enlightened views and liberal education. The present pacha is Wassa Pacha, a Catholic Albanian. Under this régime, Lebanon has become, in proportion to its size, the most prosperous part of the Turkish Empire. Schools are encouraged, roads built, new land cultivated, and everywhere is security to life and property.

III. The Native Oriental Churches are

The Greeks are supposed to number about two hundred and thirty-five thousand; having come from the vicinity of Antioch and Aleppo, which, though nominally independent, are really under the control of the Primate of Constantinople.

The Patriarch of Antioch governs the bishoprics of Beirut, Tripoli, Akka, Latakiah, Hamah, Hums, Saidnaya, and Tyr. The Patriarchate of Jerusalem includes Palestine and Perea, and has under it the bishoprics of Nazareth, Akka, Lydda, Gaza, Sebaste, Nabolus, Philadelphia, and Petra. Among these the Bishop of Akka is the only one who resides in his diocese; all the others live in the convent at Jerusalem.

The Greek Church allows the reading of the Scriptures by the people, and hence they have become more enlightened than any other of the Syrian sects.

The Syrians, or Jacobites, separated from the Oriental Church on account of the monophysite heresy. The Syriac language is used in the church services, although it is not understood by the people. Their head is the Patriarch of Mar-din. Their number is small, chiefly in Sudud, Kuryetein, Hums, Nebk, Damascus, and Aleppo. They are poor and industrious, and receive the Scriptures without opposition.

The Maronites originated as monothelites in the seventh century, although Bishop Dibbs of Beirut has written laboriously and vainly to disprove their heretical origin. Their name was derived from a monk, John Maron, who died in 701. In 1180 they renounced monothelitism, and submitted to the Pope. They are devout Romanists, and call their part of Lebanon the Holy Mountain.

Although adhering to the Pope, they still retain many of their former peculiarities. Their ecclesiastical language is Syriac. Their patron saint, Maron, is not found in the Roman calendar. They have their own church establishment, and the people regard their Patriarch as not inferior to the Pope. Their secular clergy marry.

Their convents, numbering nearly 100, own the best estates in Lebanon, and support about 2,000 monks and nuns, with a revenue of not less than $350,000.

The people are independent, hardy, and industrious, but are left in gross ignorance, illiteracy, and superstition. Their clergy are educated at Ain Werka; and those trained in Rome are men of fair learning, but the mass of the priests are lamentably ignorant.

The Papal schismatic churches—the Papal Greek, Papal Syrian, and Papal Armenian—have sprung from the missionary efforts of Ronish priests and Jesuits during the past two centuries. The Papal Greeks retain the marriage of the clergy, their Arabic services, Oriental calendar, and communion in both kinds.

The Armenian population is confined to the vicinity of Antioch and Aleppo, speaking the Turkish and Armenian languages.

The Jews of Palestine are foreigners, numbering about fifteen thousand; having come from every country on earth, and living chiefly in Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberius, and Safed. But... the Jews of Damascus, Aleppo, and Beirut, are natives, speaking the Arabic, and many of them possessed of great wealth.

Jerusalem and Beirut continued for years the two centres of American missionary labor, until 1843, when the American mission was withdrawn from Jerusalem, and confined to Syria Proper, leaving Palestine to the Church Missionary Society.

In 1871 the Syria mission of the American Board was transferred to the Presbyterian Board of several cities of the United States, owing to the then recent re-union of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church.

The whole number of American missionaries laboring in Syria under these two boards from 1823 to 1883, is as follows: male missionaries, 55; female missionaries, 63; printers, 4; total, 122.

The missionaries were at first directed to attempt the reform of the Oriental churches, leaving the converts within the Oriental communions; but it soon became necessary to organize a distinct Oriental Evangelical Church.

The great work undertaken by the American Syria Mission, however, was not merely for the two millions in Syria, but, through the medium of the Arabic Scriptures and Christian Arabic literature, for the hundred and seventy-five millions of the Mohammedan world. The work of translating the Bible from the original tongues into Arabic was begun in 1848 by Dr. Eli Smith, who labored assiduously until his death, Jan. 11, 1857.

Only Genesis, Exodus, and the first sixteen chapters of Matthew had received his final revision; but he had revised and nearly prepared for the press the whole of the New Testament, and all except Jeremiah, Lamentations, and the last fourteen chapters of Isaiah, of the Old Testament.

On his death, Rev. Dr. C. V. A. Van Dyck continued the work of translation. In 1860 the New Testament was completed, and issued from the press; and in 1865 the entire Bible was finished, and sent forth to the world. Dr. Smith had prepared in 1837, with the aid of Mr. Homan Hallock, the punches of a new font of Arabic type, made from the best specimens of Arabic calligraphy. The type were cast by Tauchnitz, in Leipzig. This type, which at first was anathematized by the religious heads of the Oriental sects, has now been adopted by the Turkish Government journals, the Dominican press at Mosul, the Greek and other native presses, and the Leipzig Arabic press.

Several missions of the Arabic Bible have been electrotyped in Beirut at the expense of the American Bible Society.

The Arabic Bible, during the past eighteen years, has been distributed throughout Syria and Palestine, Mesopotamia and Egypt, and in Asia Minor, Tunis, Algiers, Tripoli, and Morocco, Sierra Leone and Liberia, Zanzibar, Aden, Bagdad, India, and China.

In addition to this, nearly two hundred different books have been printed at the Beirut press; comprising works on medicine, surgery, anatomy and physiology, chemistry, natural philosophy, botany, astronomy, the higher mathematics, geography with atlases, grammar, arithmetic, history, theology, homiletics, church history, evidences of Christianity, mental philosophy, hermeneutics, etc., together with religious books and tracts, and illustrated books for the young, and weekly and monthly journals.

Mr. Butrus Bistany, a learned convert from the Maronite faith, who aided Dr. Eli Smith in the Bible translation, has published a fine dictionary of the Arabic language, in two volumes octavo, 1,200 pages, and is now publishing an Arabic encyclopedia in twelve octavo volumes, 800 pages each, of which the sixth is already completed.

During the years 1882, 1883, &c., 100,000 pages in Arabic were printed at the Beirut press, making 243,000,000 from the foundation of the press. The demand for the Beirut publications is greater in Egypt than in any other country. The Beirut press has an Arabic type foundery and electrotype apparatus.

Education is a prominent branch of the mission-work in Syria. The first missionaries found the people in a deplorable state of intellectual and moral ignorance. The only schools were the Muslim medrisches, attached to the mosques, and the clerical training-school of the Maronites in Ain Wurka, Mount Lebanon. Books were to be made for readers, and readers for books.

Drs. Thomson and Van Dyck founded a seminary for boys in Abeib in 1846, which was placed under the care of Mr. C. V. A. Van Dyck in 1849, and continued in his care until 1876. It was the highest literary institution in Syria for years, until the founding of the Syrian Protestant College in Beirut.

This institution was incorporated by the Legislature of New York in 1863, and is under the control of a board of trustees residing there. The college began with a preparatory class in 1865, and the college proper opened in the fall of 1866. A medical class was formed in 1867. In the autumn of 1873 the present permanent buildings at Ras Beirut were occupied. The departments of the college are three, — preparatory, collegiate, and medical, including pharmaceutical. The language of the preparatory and collegiate departments is English; and, in the future, medical instruction will also be in English. The whole number of students in the college in the year 1882–83 was 168. The total number of graduates in pharmacy to the year 1882 was 9; medical, 70; collegiate, 74; total, 153.

Progress has been made in founding a library and scientific museums.

The mission has also three female seminaries, — in Beirut, Sidon, and Tripoli, — with about 100 boarders and 300 day pupils, and 113 common schools, with about 5,000 pupils.

A theological seminary building adjoins the college, in which several members of the mission give instruction to candidates for the Christian ministry.
Fourteen native evangelical churches have been organized, of which four have native ordained pastors; and twenty-seven licensed preachers aid in the work of evangelization. The number of communicants is about 1,000, of whom 400 are women. Eighty-four Sunday schools contain about 4,000 scholars. The number of Protestant adherents is about 191, with 581 native teachers and catechists, 26 churches, 140 preaching-stations, 1,700 communicants, 6,311 Protestant adherents, 302 schools with 10,142 pupils.

Medical mission-work has received especial attention, both in hospital services and in medical practice among the poor in the interior towns and villages. The American Bible Society and the American and London Religious Tract societies have given substantial aid in the printing and publishing work of the mission.

(b) The Irish Presbyterian Mission in Damascus was founded in 1843. The United Presbyterian Church of the United States soon entered upon the work, and continued to co-operate with it until a few years since, when the latter church concentrated its work upon Egypt. Rev. Messrs. Crawford and Phillips, with a corps of lady-teachers, now carry on the work, with 14 catechists, 110 communicants, 500 pupils in their schools. Their work embraces Damascus and vicinity, and the eastern and southern parts of Anti-Lebanon.

(c) The Church of England Missions in Palestine have their centre at Jerusalem, and embrace (1) the London Jews Society, with 8 foreign laborers, 8 native teachers, 80 communicants, and 2 schools with 104 pupils; (2) the Church Mission Society, with 20 European laborers, 4 ordained natives, 37 catechists, 24 female teachers, 23 preaching-stations, 214 communicants, 45 schools with 1,142 pupils.

The Protestant bishopric of Jerusalem, founded by Frederick William IV. of Prussia, is supported half by Prussia and half by England. The first bishop was Dr. Michael S. Alexander; the second, Dr. Samuel Gobat; and the third, Dr. Barclay, who died in 1881. At present there is no incumbent. See Jerusalem, Episcopal See of St. James in.

The Church Missionary Society labor in Palestine proper as far north as Acre, and east of the Jordan.

(d) The German Evangelical Missions embrace (1) the German Deaconesses of Kaiserwerth, whose work comprises orphan-training, higher education, and hospital-nursing (they began labor in Sidon in 1860 after the massacres, then transferred their work to Beirut, where they have spacious premises, and are engaged in a work which is of the greatest value to the people of Syria. They have in Beirut 16 deaconesses, 6 native female assistants, and 240 pupils. They have also the care of nursing the indoor patients to the number of 500 in the Johanniter Hospital in Beirut. In Jerusalem four of the deaconesses act as nurses in the hospital, with about 700 indoor patients annually; (2) German chaplains in Beirut and Jerusalem, who preach to the German and French speaking Protestants; (3) The Jerusalem Verein of Berlin, which supports Dr. Reinieke at Jerusalem, and Mr. Müller at Bethlehem, whose work embraces 185 communicants, 8 schools with 296 pupils.

(e) The British Syrian Schools, founded by the late Mrs. J. Bowen Thompson, and now conducted by her sister, Mrs. A. Mentor Mott, are doing a great work for female education in Syria. They have schools in Beirut, Damascus, Baalbek, Tyre, Hasbeiah, Bukfiya, Mukhtara, Zahlah, and Ain Zehaiteh. This society has 17 foreign laborers, 22 catechists, 75 female teachers, 24 Bible-class rooms for women, and 30 schools with 2,975 girls and 452 boys; total, 3,430 pupils.

(f) The Free Church of Scotland has a mission in the Metn district of Lebanon, in connection with the Lebanon schools' committee. This mission has 23 catechists, 7 female teachers, 35 communicants, 21 schools, and 832 pupils. Rev. W. Carslaw, M.D., labors in harmony and close connection with the American mission.

(g) The Society of Friends in England and America have a mission in Lebanon at Brummana, and also schools at Ramullah and vicinity in Palestine. Mr. Theophilus Waldemeier of the mission at Brummana was one of the captives in Abyssinia under King Theodore, and has labored industriously in founding the Boys' Industrial School, the Girls' Boarding-school, and the Hospital and Dispensary, together with various village schools. The society have 10 schools with 300 pupils.

Other societies besides those mentioned above are laboring in Syria and Palestine, the chief of which are the Church of Scotland Mission to the Jews, Miss Taylor's Muslim Girls' School, the Society for promoting Female Education in the East, the Reformed Presbyterian Mission in Latakiah, the Missionsary Society for promoting Female Education in the East, the Free Church of Scotland has a mission

VI. The Roman-Catholic Missions in Syria and Palestine may be said to date back to the Crusades, when the Latin priests made an attempt to convert the Oriental churches to Rome. But within the past two centuries their efforts, as stated above, have resulted in the founding of various affiliated churches, known as Greek Catholic, Syrian-Catholic, Armenian-Catholic, etc. More recently the Jesuits, Franciscans, and Lazarists have set themselves to the work of caring for these native Catholic sects, proselytizing the Oriental sects, and counteracting the influence of Protestant missions.

The Jesuits have a college in Beirut with 250 pupils, and other schools with 1,000 pupils. They have also a large printing-house, and have made, under Dr. Von Hamm, an Arabic translation of...
SYRIA.

The French institution of the Sœurs de Charité de St. Vincent de Paul embraces an orphanage of about 600 pupils, and a day-school and boarding-school.

The Dames de Nazareth have also erected a stately building east of the Damascus Road, and have about 130 pupils.

The most important of the native Catholic institutions are the Maronite Bishop Dibbs's college with 250 pupils, and the College Patriarcal Grec Catholique with nearly 300 boys.

The city of Beirût takes the lead in education, and has become a city of schools, as the following official statistics for 1881 will show:—

The Protestant schools are 30 in number, with 128 teachers, 4,893 male pupils, 3,492 female pupils, a total of 8,385 pupils. Adding to these the 3,004 Protestant pupils, we have 11,389 pupils in the schools of Beirût.

The most remarkable proof of a popular awakening on the subject of education is the opening of boys' and girls' schools by the Mohammedans in Beirût, Damascus, Tripoli, Sidon, Hums, and other places.

They have erected new school- edifices, fitted with seats and desks (the girls' schools with American sewing-machines); and in Beirût they now have 1,150 boys and 420 girls under instruction.

One of the great obstacles to the evangelization of the Mohammedans is the political-religious alliance between Islam and the State. This has increased the fanaticism of the Muslim masses. But contact with European influence, the growth of education, the reading of the Bible, the newspaper press, and the spread of a pure Christianity, are gradually leavening the minds of the Mohammedans. In 1860 the Muslims everywhere sympathized with the massacre of Christians. In 1882 the Muslims of Beirût formed a relief committee to aid the ten thousand Christian refugees who fled from the Muslim fanatical outbreak in Lebanon.

Diplomacy can never regenerate the East. The patient work of education, the preaching of the gospel, the distribution of God's word among the masses, and the diffusion of Christian literature, will gradually disarm prejudice, awaken inquiry, promote social harmony, destroy polygamy, reform the Oriental churches, and bring the followers of Islam to the religion of Jesus Christ. Thus will the press, the church, and the school co-operate in hastening the true regeneration of that most interesting, and, until recently, so degraded land.

SYRIAC LITERATURE.

The literature of the Syriac tongue is mostly biblical and ecclesiastical; the rest being historical, poetical, legendary, folk-lore, and translations (chiefly) from the Greek classics and Fathers. The extant Syriac literature (proper) begins with the second century A.D., and ends shortly after the Crusades; though later works exist, relating to the earlier, like the Latin of the middle ages to that of the classic period. The modern Syriac, easily acquired by a reader of ancient Syriac or of Arabic, has a literature of its own, both native, and fostered by the American and the Jesuit missionaries, and current from Mosul to Urml (Oroonoiom). For an account of this language and literature, see Dr. Justin Perkins's Eight Years in Persia, Andover, 1849; also a partial bibliography in the Introductory Remarks of Rev. T. T. Stoddard's Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language (in Journal of the American Oriental Society, also separately, New Haven, 1855); also Socin's Die Neu-Aramäischen Dialekte von Urmia bis Mosul (autolithographic text, with German translation, Tübingen, Laupp, 1882); and Nöldeke's notice of the same in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 36, pp. 600 ff. The words of this dialect are incorporated into R. Payne Smith's Thesaurus Syriacus, vol. i. Oxon., 1879.

Another dialect, called Tūrāni, is spoken in the Mesopotamian region of Tūr 'Abdtn, a portion of which has been reduced to writing, and published by Eugen Prym and Albert Socin. For an account of this dialect, see Prym's Die Neu-Aramäische Dialekt von Tūr 'Abdtn (Göttingen, Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 1881, 2 vols.), and art. by Socin, in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 36, pp. 238 ff. Neither the modern Syriac nor the Tūrāni has yet superseded the ancient Syriac in the church service-books, except among the Protestants.

The ancient Syriac literature might be treated under various divisions, but the most Latin is that of age. There are three well-marked periods: I. From the second century to the Mohammedan conquest, A.D., 636; II.
Mohammedan conquest to the decay of Syriac as a spoken language, A.D. 636-1318; III. From 1318 onward, when Arabic was established as the common vernacular, and writers wrote in either tongue, and some in Greek also. Throughout, the Syriac maintained itself as a beautiful and flexible language; easily receiving accessions from other tongues, abounding always in Grecisms and Greek language; easily receiving accessions from other common vernacular, and writers wrote in either words, till it even naturalized French and English a spoken language, A.D. 636-1318; III. From words in the times of the Crusades, and later.

Period I., Second Century to A.D. 636.—Chiefly worthy of note are the Bible versions. First, doubtless, the Curetonian, dating, probably, from the second century, extant only in fragments of sixth-century manuscripts (found at the convent of Sta. Maria Deipara, in the Nitrian Desert), named from the discoverer, and published by him (London, 1858); other fragments privately printed by W. Wright [London, 1872]. Second, the Peshitto, a recension of the Curetonian, perhaps, which probably assumed its present shape in the fourth century; a noble version, and the best monument of the ancient language. The New Testament lacks the Epistles, Second Peter, Second and Third John, and Jude, with the Apocalypse. Third, the Philoxenian, made by the archbishop Polycarp, A.D. 508, for Philoxenus, Bishop of Hierapolis (or Mabüg). This was based on the Peshitto. It is probably extant in those Epistles which are lacking in the Peshitto, but printed in the common editions of the Syriac New Testament; and in the Gospels it is probably most nearly represented by a manuscript belonging to the Syrian-Protestant College at Beirut, and brought to light by the present writer. (See Notes on the Beirut Syriac Codex, in Jour. Soc. Bibl. Lit. and Exegesis, 1882, pp. 2 ff.) Fourth, the Harkleanian, a recension of the Philoxenian, made by Thomas of Harkel, A.D. 616. The Gospels are extant in several manuscripts. The rest of the New Testament, except the Apocalypse, is extant in one manuscript. Fifth, contemporaneous with the Philoxenian, and almost a part of the same stock, is the Hesychian, a revision of some portions of the Old Testament, made by Paul of Tella, A.D. 616. Sixth, the Palestinian or Jerusalem version, extant only in portions of an Evangelistarium in the Vatican Library (published at Verona, 1861, by Count F. Miniscalchi Erizzo), and a few fragments published by Land in his Anecdoti (tom. iv., Lugd. Bat., 1875). A few other versions of portions (at least) of the Bible are extant only in scraps and quotations.

In this connection is to be mentioned the Diatessaron of Tatian the Assyrian, which was either originally composed in Syriac, or had its chief circulation in a Syriac version. The work itself is now lost; but a commentary thereon by Ephrem Syrus (fourth century) is extant in an Armenian translation (published with a Latin version at Venice, 1503) and in an English version by Swift (1786). Tatian's work dates about A.D. 155-170, and is the most important early witness to the general recognition of the four Gospels.

Other works of this early period were translations of the Epistles of Clement of Rome, of the Festal Letters of Athanasius (extant in one of the earliest known Syriac manuscripts, discovered by Cureton, and published by him at London, 1848), of portions of Basæbius, of Josephus, etc. The commentaries, and especially the hymns and homilies of Ephrem Syrus (fourth century, deacon of Edessa) have been hitherto as noted as any non-biblical Syriac remains. (The homily, in Syriac, is usually a sermon in verse, heptasyllabic, octosyllabic, or dodecasyllabic.) Ephrem was inspired to sing by the earlier poetry of Bar Desanes the Gnostic. Ephrem is the greatest name in early Syriac literature and sainthood, and many works of others have wrongly been attributed to him. His hymns and homilies are beautiful and poetic, but very didactic and dogmatic.

A throng of writers — homilists, chroniclers, and translators — belong to this period, many of whose works are lost, and many others extant only in manuscript, for a catalogue of whom reference is best had to Aug. Friedrich Pfeiffer's condensation of J. S. Assemani's Biblioth. Oriental., Erlangen, 1776. Of especial note are Joshua the Stylite, whose Chronicle (A.D. 507) was best published by W. Wright (Cambridge, 1882): Jacob, or James, of Sarug, of whose works one of the most curious is the Homily on the Baptism of Constantine, published at Rome, 1882, with Italian translation and notes, by Arthur L. Frothingham, Boston. Of very great importance is the anonymous Chronicle of Edessa (circa A.D. 550), containing a great wealth of church and secular history. Edessa was the literary home of the Syriac tongue, as Antioch of the Syrian Church.

The Syriac hymnology and liturgical literature of this period deserve a volume for their treatment, if for no other purpose than to show their influence on the Western hymnology and liturgy. The publication of many important works of this period has been accomplished in great part by the enterprise of scholars of the present generation.

Period II., A.D. 636-1318. — During this period chroniclers and poets were more in fashion, and they have preserved many important matters of history that otherwise would have been lost. Latin chroniclers and saints, the Hesychian and many other writers, scientific authors, collectors of proverbs and riddles, likewise abounded in this period; although almost every writer was an ecclesiastic of some grade, or a monk.

Prominent is Dionysius of Tell Mahre, a Jacobite bishop and patriarch (for. A.D. 750-845), established in power by the Caliph Abdallah. His Chronicle was written before he became bishop, or before A.D. 775; and in it he treated of historical subjects from the beginning of the world to about A.D. 755. His Chronicle incorporated, and preserved as well, the Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite above mentioned. A long list of chroniclers followed, until we reach the important name of Dionysius Bar Salibi, bishop of Amid (for. circa A.D. 1146-71), whose commentaries, theoretical works, and liturgies are of great value for critical purposes. Then, after another swarm of writers, appears Gregory Bar-Hebræus, called also Abu-Farag (Abulpharagius) (b. A.D. 1226). His Chronicle and commentaries are crowded with invaluable material of every sort. He wrote Arabic, as well as Syriac. His works are quite voluminous, and among Syriac authors he ranks among the very first for utility and value, although of so late a date.
A long list of writers on other topics might be named as belonging in this period, but we can stop to mention but one for his importance,—Jeshua (Jesus) Bar-Bahliul (circa A.D. 963), who published a lexicon of his tongue that is still extant. Several grammars of the period are extant, both in manuscript and in print.

To this period belong also the Nestorian (a word which ought to be replaced by "Chaldean") writer, Ebed-Jesu, metropolitan of Soba and Armenia (d. 1318). His most noted and noteworthy book is his catalogue of the Sacred Scriptures and of patristic writings or writers, including many, if not most, of the known Greek and Syrian Fathers. This work, like that of Gregory Bar Hebraeus, is among those indispensable to the biblical critic.

This period was one of great literary activity, as well as of life, throughout the Syriac-speaking peoples. Missions were extended eastward to the Pacific. It was in A.D. 781 that the famous Chinese-Syriac monogram was set up, which records the planting of Christianity in China by the Syrian missionaries. Copies of this tablet, in facsimile, are in several of our libraries; and notices and translations appear in a long series of books in many languages, from Kircher (1631) to Doolittle and Williams. (See, e.g., Pfeiffer, ubi supra, pp. 493 ff.)

Period III., from A.D. 1318 onward.—The death of Ebed-Jesu marks the close of the classic period. After him there follows a very long and numerous series of writers of less note, among whom few, if any, could require particular mention here. Their works are chiefly valuable to the linguist, or in special limited investigations. As in earlier times, most of them were ecclesiastics.

Concerning the development of the language, the contrast between the Peshitto and the Harklensian versions appears very strong to one who reads only those specimens of the literature. Such a reader is apt to suppose that the Peshitto represents the pure Syriac, and the Harklensian a strong period belout; but a more extended reading shows that the Harklensian bears also a later Syriac character, and that the Peshitto was already rather solemn and antiquated before the Philoxenian was made. The idiom of the Harklensian has much in common with the style of the secular writings, both those of earlier and those of later date than itself. As time went on, the Grecisms became more frequent. The secular language, also, is more flexible, and indulges more in complex syntactical structures.

Of the editions of the Bible in ancient Syriac, a critical edition of the Peshitto is still a desideratum. For the New Testament, the best editions are (for text) the ed. princeps of WIDMANNSTADT (Vienna, 1555, now very rare) and the American editions (Urml, 1846, New York, 1874) of the Old Testament, the Urml edition of 1832. The Ambrosian Codex of the Old Testament, edited by A. M. Ceriani (Milan, 1876, etc.), is the oldest Old-Testament manuscript, and all important. For other editions, and editions of the Apocrypha, see Nestle (ubi supra). A very useful work is the Psalter, the "first labor" of the American press at Urml (1841), printed for the use of the Nestorian (Chaldean) ecclesiastics. It contains parallel Scripture references and the prayers and rubrics used in public service. Much of this accessory matter has found its way into other editions of the Psalter. The older editions of the New Testament give the Nestorian (Chaldean) church-lessons. For further information respecting the Syrian writers mentioned in this article, see respective arts. SYRIAC VERSIONS. See Bible Versions.

SYROPULOS, Sylvester, a Greek ecclesiastic of the fifteenth century, author of a valuable history of the Council of Ferrara-Florence (see art.). He was δομοφόρος ("law-officer") and chief sacristan in Constantinople, one of the five dignitaries immediately about the patriarch. He was passionately devoted to his church, and opposed to the Latin. Nevertheless, he was a delegate to the Council of Ferrara-Florence, especially designed to effect a union between the Greek and Latin churches, took part in its deliberations, and by command of his sovereign signed the decrees. This act of weakness he deeply lamented; and by his efforts to defeat the practical effect of the decrees he encountered such opposition, that he was forced to retire to private life. The only edition of his work is the copy of the Paris Codex, which unhappily lacks the first book, issued by Robert Creyghton, Vera hist. unionis,. . . sive Concilii Florentini exactissima narratio. The Hague, 1660. See Schröcker: Kirchengesch., etc., xxxiv, pp. 411 sqq.
the movable sanctuary of the Hebrews prior to the time of Solomon. Other terms are mikdash (Exod. xxv. 8; Lev. xii. 4), mishkān (Exod. xxv. 9), bayit, i.e., house (Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 28; Josh. vi. 24, ix. 23; Judg. xviii. 31), ohel, i.e., the tent, also hekdel, i.e., temple (1 Sam. i. 9, iii. 3), and maasān, i.e., dwelling (1 Sam. ii. 30, 32).

Preparation of the Building. — As Jehovah went before the people in the pillar of cloud and of fire, as it was his intention to show and to reveal his presence unto the people, whether they were on the way or in their tents, therefore he promised unto the people, "In all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will reveal my name unto thee..." (Exod. xx. 24). To make this place of blessed meeting a visible reality, not only does God show unto Moses the model pattern of the tabernacle and of all the instruments (Exod. xxv. 9, 40, xxvi. 30, xxvii. 8), but the people are also directed to bring free will offerings, or rather the material, which is to be used under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab. The sin of the golden calf apparently delays the execution. On the intercession of their leader, a tent is pitched (probably that of Moses himself, which had hitherto been the headquarters of consultation) outside of the camp, to be provisionally the tabernacle of meeting. This provisional tent is accepted of God, and dedicated by his divine presence (Exod. xxxiii. 9). After God has become reconciled again to his people, the work is resumed. The people offer the necessary materials in excess of what was wanted (xxxvi. 5, 6). Other workmen (xxxvi. 2) and workwomen (xxxv. 25) place themselves under the direction of Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, and Aholiab of the tribe of Dan.

Structure of the Tabernacle and the Court (Exod. xxv.-xxvii., xxxv.-xxxviii.). —

1. The Tabernacle formed a rectangle of thirty cubits long, ten wide, and ten high. It was composed of a frame of four sides of distinct pillars, with curtains hung upon them. The sixty wooden pillars were five cubits in height. At the bottom they were protected or shod by sockets of brass. At the top these pillars had a capital, which was overlaid with silver. Connected with the head of the pillar were hooks and rods, joining one pillar to another. These rods were laid upon the hooks, and served to attach the hangings to, and suspend from them. The hooks and rods were silver. The hangings of the court were of twisted shesh. that is, a fabric woven out of twisted yarn of the material called shekh (A.V., fine linen).

The Furniture of the Tabernacle. — The only piece of furniture within the inner or most holy place was the ark of the covenant (q.v.). The furniture of the outer room, or holy place, consisted of the altar of incense, the table of shewbread, and the "golden candlestick" (q. v.). In the court was the altar of burnt offering and the laver (q. v.).

3. Provisions for the Transport (Num. iv. 4-33). The Levitical family of Kohath, to which Aaron's family also belonged, had to carry all the vessels of the Holy of Holies (Num. iv. 15). Then came the family of Gershon with the tabernacle and its lighter furniture, while the Merarites had charge of its heavier appurtenances. The sons of Aaron prepared for the removal by covering every thing in the Holy of Holies with a purple cloth. The Kohathites had to carry every thing on their shoulders: the Merarites had four waggons for their transport.

Significance of the Tabernacle. — As the name indicates, it was to be the dwelling of Jehovah in the midst of his people. As king of his people he dwells in his palace. His throne is over the kophereth ("the mercy-seat"), between another. This was done by means of fifty "loops" and as many taches of "gold." The connecting line run over the curtain of the Holy of holies. This curtain was of byssus, with figures of cherubim stitched upon it, apparently with the art of the embroiderer. The second set of curtains, or tent-roof, of goat's hair, called also ohel, consisted of eleven pieces of stuff, each thirty cubits long and four cubits wide. They were sewed into two large cloths, and suspended on fifty knobs, or taches, of brass by means of sixty loops. A coat of "rams' skins dyed red, and tachash (A. V. badger's) skins," was furnished as an additional covering (xxvi. 14, milmalah, i.e., from upward). The entrance to the tabernacle was towards the east, of the Holy of Holies, and embroidered, suspended upon five copper-sOCKETED and gilded pillars of acacia-wood by means of golden hooks. A "veil" divided the interior into two apartments, called respectively the "holy place" and the "most holy." This partition-cloth was suspended upon four pillars precisely like those of the door "hanging," except that their sockets were of silver.

The Court was a large rectangular enclosure a hundred cubits long and fifty broad. It was composed of a frame of four sides of distinct pillars, with curtains hung upon them. The sixty wooden pillars were five cubits in height. At the bottom they were protected or shod by sockets of brass. At the top these pillars had a capital, which was overlaid with silver. Connected with the head of the pillar were hooks and rods, joining one pillar to another. These rods were laid upon the hooks, and served to attach the hangings to, and suspend from them. The hooks and rods were silver. The hangings of the court were of twisted shesh. that is, a fabric woven out of twisted yarn of the material called shekh (A.V., fine linen).
the cherubim, which, however, must not be taken in an anthropopathic manner. If there was to be a mutual relation between the holy and living God and his people, which he selected from among the nations of the earth to be the bearer of his name, revelation, and word, it was necessary to have some means of approaching God. This access is mediated in a gradual manner. In the court, as the lowest grade, the people meet, partly to bring their offerings to Jehovah, partly to hear the revelation of his divine will, and to receive his mercy and blessing. Being sinful, the people do not dare yet to enter the sanctuary: they need human mediators, the priests, who in their stead present themselves to God. But the priests themselves can only approach Jehovah in an immediate manner in their high priest, who only once in the year can enter the Holy of holies, where the throne of Jehovah’s glory is. This leads us to the New-Testament idea of the Tabernacle (cf. Heb. viii. 2, 5, ix. 1-14, 23 sq., x. 1, 19 sq.; cf. Col. ii. 17; Eph. ii. 14-22; Rev. xxi. 3), — that the entire structure of the tabernacle was nothing but a typical prophecy of the New-Testament economy, according to which, after the death of the high priest, who once only entered the Holy of holies with his own blood, all curtains are removed, and that all who have become Abraham’s children by faith have a daily access to the mercy-seat, and that they shall once also enter the Holy of holies of the heaven (Heb. xii. 24 sq., xiii. 23 sq.). As to the symbolic signification of the tabernacle, there can be no doubt that the structure of the same was obviously determined by a complex and profound symbolism; but its meaning remains one of the things which will always be guess-work. Jewish rabbis as well as Christian theologians have exercised their ingenuity, with more or less success. Thus the material, not less than the forms, in the Holy of holies, was significant. The metals, colors, and numbers had their signification. Thus three is the numerical “signature” of the Divine Being and the form of the covenant in any real relation to God (Num. vi. 24-26; Isa. vi. 3). The number three being the “signature” of God, of the Creator, four is the signature of nature, of the created things of the world; not of the world as “without form, and void,” but as a cosmos, as the revelation of God so far as nature can reveal him. Ten is the symbol of completeness and perfection, while six represents one-half of the “signature” of perfection. Seven (i.e., 3+4) is the note of union between God and the world, the number of religion, the signature of salvation, blessing, peace, perfection. Twelve denotes by multiplication the combination of the signature of God and the signature of the world (3×4).

HISTORY OF THE TABERNACLE. — After the sanctuary was completed, under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab, it was placed, according to Numbers vii. 48, in the court of the tabernacle on the first day of the second year from the exodus, and the ritual appointed for it begun (Exod. xl. 2). After the entrance into Canaan, the tabernacle was in the camp of Israel, at Gilgal (Josh. iv. 19, v. 10, vi. 24, ix. 6, x. 8, xiv. 6), and, after the taking and division of the country, at Shiloh (xviii. 1, 10, xix. 51). At Shiloh it continued during the whole period of the judges; but, when the ark of God was taken, the sanctuary lost its glory. It probably became once again a movable sanctuary; less honored, as no longer possessing the symbol of the divine presence, yet cherished by the priesthood, and some portions, at least, of its ritual kept up. For a time it seems, under Saul, to have been settled at Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 1-6), which thus became a priestly city. The massacre of the priests probably caused its removal from Nob to Gibeah, where it remained. It united with the worship of the high places (1 Kings iii. 4), while the ark remained at Kirjath-jearim. The capture of Jerusalem, and the erection there of a new tabernacle, with the ark, of which the old had been deprived (2 Sam. vi. 17; 1 Chron. xv. 1), left it little more than a traditional, historical sanctuary. The provisional tabernacle erected by David was to make room for the temple which he intended to build. His purpose was fulfilled by Solomon, who had the tabernacle, and the ark, and all the holy vessels, brought to Jerusalem, and put in some place within the temple, to remain there as holy relics (1 Kings viii. 4; 2 Chron. v. 5).

TABERNACLE is a term originally applied to an ambyr above the altar, for the preservation of the Eucharist, contained in the pyx, which had the shape of a tower, more often that of a dove. This ambry stood either on the altar, or was suspended. From the fourteenth century on, the pyx containing the Eucharist was preserved in a stationary place called tabernacles, built either in the form of a tower, and standing near the wall or a pillar, or made like coffers, which were more or less decorated. In both forms they were on the right side of the altar. They form an indispensable piece of furniture in the Church of Rome. In the Evangelical Church, which refuses the ultra-sacramental on the ground that the body and blood of Christ have no liturgical value; yet as works of art there still exist some very fine tabernacles in some evangelical churches, as in Nuremberg and Ulm. Since the sixteenth century, the tabernacles have been connected with the altar in order to be more conspicuous. The tabernacle, as well as the pyx, is also termed  libros, which must not be connected with the Latin  cibus (i.e., food), but with the Greek  kiborion, meaning the canopy on the altar, supported by columns. The term ciborium was also applied to the pyx, the monstrance, and to the tabernacle itself, because it formed as it were a protecting cover. The monstrance may be regarded as a portable tabernacle.

TABERNACLES.

The Feast of (πέντε ἡμέραι νήστας in the LXX., acaravaolia in John viii. 2 and Josephus, οἰκονομία in Plutarch, Symp., iv. 6, 2), also called the feast of ingathering (Exod. xxiii. 16), is the last of the three yearly festivals which the Mosaic law ordained to be celebrated at the tabernacle. The account of its institution is given in Exod. xxiii. 34 sqq.; Lev. xxiii. 34 sqq.; Deut. xvi. 13 sqq. The descriptions of the Old Testament absolutely exclude the hypotheses of some recent writers, who identify the festival with the harvest festivals of heathen peoples. The feast of tabernacles was designed to be a reminder of the time when the Israelites dwelt in booths in the wilderness (Lev. xxiii. 43), and lasted seven days (Lev. xxiii. 39),—from the 15th to the 21st of Tisri. The people were to dwell in booths (Lev. xxiii. 42), and to take "branches of palm-trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook." This festival was emphatically a festival of rejoicing; [and a proverb in Succoth says, "He who has never seen the rejoicing at the pouring out of the water of Siloam has never seen rejoicing in his life."]. Burnt, meat, drink, and other offerings were to be made. Deuteronomy alone designates the place of celebrating the feast,—"the place which the Lord shall choose" (xvi. 15). Zechariah (xiv. 17) says the feast had not been celebrated since the days of Joshua as it was in his day. This notice cannot exclude, however, all celebration of the festival during the interval (1 Kings viii. 2; 2 Chron. vii. 8-10).

The booths were erected in the streets, outside the walls of Jerusalem, and on the roofs. Joy and mirth prevailed in them. The main features of the public celebration were the sacrifices by day and the illumination at night. Four hundred and twenty-four priests were in attendance, to serve those who brought sacrifices. Once every day the entire congregation encompassed the altar of burnt offerings, waving palm-branches. On the seventh day this was repeated seven times, in memory of Jericho. The branches mentioned in Lev. xxiii. 40 were tied into a bunch, and called lulab. During the sacrifices the great Hallel (Ps. cxiii.-cxviii.) was sung, and at the twenty-fourth verse of Ps. cxviii. every one shook his palm-branch a number of times. After the sacrifices the priestly blessing was conferred. Wine, and water from the brook of Siloam, were used for the drink-offering, both morning and evening. Water through the water-gate of the temple, when another priest took it, with the words, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation" (Isa. xii. 3). The priests and people took up the shout; and the priest, going to the altar, mixed it with wine, and poured it out into a duct which led to the Kidron. The origin of this custom is unknown; but it is very generally agreed that our Lord had reference to it when he said, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink." (John vii. 37). The words of John viii. 12 ("I am the light of the world") seem to contain an allusion to the great illumination which took place on the evenings of the feast of tabernacles; four golden lamps, or candelabra, in the court of the women, being illuminated. Upon the lighting of these lights, there followed dancing and processions.

The eighth day of the feast, a sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 39), had a special name, yom azareth, and marked the dismantling of the booths. The seventh day marked the culmination of the feast, and was undoubtedly "the great day of the feast," referred to in John vii. 37.

It presents to the eye, as seen from a distance, a beautiful appearance; being so symmetrical in its proportions, and rounded off like a hemisphere, yet varying somewhat as viewed from different directions, being this festival the day marked the dismantling of the booths. TADMOR, mentioned only in 2 Chron. viii. 4, is undoubtedly the name of that ancient city which to the Greeks, Romans, and to modern Europe, is known by the name of Palmyra. In the Chronicles the city is mentioned as having been built by Solomon and his conquest of Hamath-zobah, and is named in contemporization with "all the store cities which he built in Hamath." It was probably built with the view of securing an interest in, and command over, the great caravan traffic from the East, similar to that which he had established in respect to the trade between Syria and Egypt. We do not again read of Tadmor in Scripture, nor is it likely that the Hebrews retained possession of it long after the death of Solomon. No other source acquaints us with the subsequent history of the place, till it re-appears in the account of Pliny (Hist. Nat., v. 24) as a considerable town, which, along with its territory, formed an independent state between the Roman and Parthian Empires. In the second century it seems to have been beautified by the Emperor Hadrian, as may be inferred from a statement of Stephanus of Byzantium, as to the name of the city having been changed to Hadrianopolis ("city of Hadrian"). Under Septimius Severus it became a Roman colony, and received the jus Italicum; but it had a government of its own, and was ruled by its own laws. The most interesting period in the history of Tadmor is the time of Odenathus and Zenobia. The Emperor Valerian being captured by the Persians, Odenathus, one of the citizens of Palmyra, revenged the wrongs of the fallen emperor, and vindicated the majesty of Rome. He marched against the Persians, took the province of Mesopotamia, and defied Sapor beneath the walls of Ctesiphon (A.D. 260). The services thus rendered to Rome were so great, that Odenathus was associated in the sovereignty with Gallienus (A.D. 261). He enjoyed his dignity but a short time, being murdered only three years afterwards. Zenobia, his widow, succeeded Odenathus as Queen of the East, and ruled the country during a period of five years. In A.D. 271 the Emperor Aurelian turned his arms against her; and having defeated her in a pitched battle near Antioch, and in another at Emesa, he drove her back upon her desert home. He then marched his veterans across the parched plains, and invested Palmyra. Zenobia attempted to escape, but was captured, and brought back to the presence of the conqueror. She was taken to Rome, and there she was led along in front of the triumphant Aurelian. Palmyra, which was taken in A.D. 272, never recovered its former opulence. Twenty years later, under the reign of Diocletian, the walls of the city were rebuilt. It eventually became the seat of a bishop, but never recovered any importance. When the successors of Mohammed extended their conquests beyond the confines of Arabia, Palmyra became subject to the caliphs. From this period Palmyra seems to have gradually fallen into decay. Not once is it mentioned in the history of the crusades. In 1173 it was visited by Benjamin of Tudela, who found there a large Jewish population, besides Mohammedans and Christians. It was again visited in 1751 by Wood and Dawkins. In our century many travellers have visited the place, and their descriptions are very valuable. A complete list of all travels till the year 1854 is given by Ritter, Erdkunde von Kleinasien, vol. viii. 2d division, 3d section, pp. 1432 sq.

TAI-PING (great peace), a Chinese religious sect established by Hung-Siu-Tsuen, b. in a little village thirty miles from Canton, 1813; d. at Nanking, July 19, 1862. While on a visit to Canton to attend the official examinations, he received from I. J. Roberts, an American missionary, a package of tracts in Chinese. Five years afterwards he fell sick, and had visions, in which an old man with a golden beard commanded him to destroy the demons (i.e., the idol-gods) of his own countrymen. He then left the tracts; and associating the man in his visions with Christ, and catching up several Christian ideas, he abandoned the Chinese religion, and started forth valiantly to preach his new faith. He retired to the mountains, and gathered by 1840 many converts, whom he styled "God-worshippers." He carried out his supposed commission, and destroyed some Buddhist idols. This brought him in conflict with the government, so that he again retired to the mountains. In 1850 he started upon a new enterprise. The time was ripe for rebellion; and he shrewdly proclaimed himself as sent by Heaven to drive out the Tartars, and set up a native Chinese dynasty. His standard was pushed victoriously forward. Nanking was captured, Siu-Tsuen burned himself and wives in his palace.

Siu-Tsuen's religious views were a mixture of Christian and Chinese elements. He considered Christ the eldest of the sons of God, and himself...

The written law were at an early date current in Israel. Isaiah complains of these human ordinances (Isa. xxix. 13); and our Lord charged the Pharisees with making the word of God of none effect by their traditions. The oral law, instead of securing the observance of the written law, superseded it. Very significantly it is said in the Book Sohar, "The grave of Moses is the Mishna, and therefore no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." The Sadducees rejected the divine authority of the oral law; and so do the Karaites, who arose in the eighth century, and who, though few in number, still exist as a distinct sect. The Mishna was not sufficient to satisfy the Jewish doctors. On this basis they formed the Gemara, a word meaning complement, or doctrine; for it can bear both these significations. The Gemara exhibits the opinions and discussions of the wise men on the Mishna. There are two Gemaras, called the Jerusalemitic and the Babylonian, both expounding the same Mishnaic text. It was at Tiberias, near the close of the fourth century, that a body of young doctors, called the Talmudic, finished the Jerusalemitic Talmud. Hence its proper title should be, not the Talmud of Jerusalem, but the Palestinian or Western Talmud. Its compilation is often attributed to Rabbi Jochanan of Tiberias, who, however, only began the work, being the first of the Amoraim, or doctors of the Gemara.

The Babylonian Talmud had for its chief compiler Rabbi Asha, head, till 427 A.D., of the school of Sura in Babylon; but its completion was reserved for Rabbi Abina, who died in 498, and who is regarded as the last of the Gemaric doctors. The mass of traditions ascribed falsely to Moses went on increasing from age to age by the addition of the sayings of later doctors; and thus, like a snowball, the longer it rolled, the greater the bulk of the conglomeration.

It should be stated that only a portion of the treatises of the Mishna have their commentary in the Gemara. The Babylonian Talmud is much more highly esteemed by the Jews than the Jerusalemitic, and is about four times as large as the latter. It contains two thousand nine hundred and forty-seven leaves, or double the number of folio pages. Its paging in the various editions is kept uniform, to facilitate reference. The Mishna is written, for the most part, in Hebrew in its later form, with a mixture of foreign words (Aramaic, Greek, and Latin). It is composed with extreme conciseness; the aim in expression being to use the fewest words possible, so as not to overburden the memory, when it was unlawful to write down the oral law. The language of the Gemara is a corrupt Chaldee or Aramaic. The Talmud is without vowel-points, and abounds in abbreviations. Delitzsch specifies brachology as characteristic of its style. Lightfoot, in the preface to his Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae, thus depicts the unattractiveness of the Talmudic writings: "The almost unconquerable difficulty of the style, the frightful roughness of the language, and the amazing eminence and sophistry of the matters handled, do torture, vex, and tire him that reads them. . . . In no writers is greater or equal trifling." But he adds, "And yet in none is greater or so great benefit." And he maintains that Christians "may render them most usefully serviceable to their studies, and most eminently tending to the interpretation of the New Testament." He who goes from the Halakha to the written word of God. "Attend, my son, to the words of the scribes rather than to the law of Moses" (Tract. Gittin., fol. 75 a).

The Talmud treats of a vast variety of subjects. There are separate works on its civil and criminal law, its religious philosophy, its ethics, its psychology, its education, mathematics, medicine, magic, geography, zoology, botany, etc. Lightfoot, in the preface to his Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae, thus characterizes the work, being the first of the Amoraim, or doctors of the Gemara.

The Talmud commends the study of the oral law above that of the written word of God. "Attend, my son, to the words of the scribes rather than to the law of Moses." Deutsch's celebrated article, which appeared in The Quarterly Review, London, October, 1867, is the best known essay of this kind in the English language. But it is only one of a considerable number of writings having the same aim. Deutsch makes Christianity to have appropriated the teaching of the Jewish doctors of the Mishnaic period, and to have carried those golden germs, hidden in the schools and among the silent community of the learned, into the market of humanity." He would have us to regard even Paul's doctrine concerning faith as genuine Pharisaism! "The faith of the heart— the doctrine firmly grounded upon by Paul— was a thing that stood much higher with the Pharisees than the outward law. It was a thing, they said, not to be commanded by any ordinance, yet was greater than all. 'Every thing,' is one of their adages, 'is in the hands of Heaven, save the fear of Heaven.' How any one who had read Paul's writings could make faith in his system of doctrine identical with the simple fear of God may well excite astonishment. The adage which Deutsch quotes, and which is a rabbinical commonplace, is diametrically opposed to the great principle of salvation by grace, which Paul so strongly insisted on (comp. Eph. ii. 1-10), and contradicts the present day; viz. "Is life worth living?" For this point. But that treatise of the Mishna, the language of Vitringa, the church places the seat of corruption in the mind; the synagogue, or Oriental sources, they make the body the originating cause of the inclination to sin. To adopt the language of this subject does not differ from the orthodox doctrine of the church. But Vitringa (Obscr. Sac., L., iii., C., ix.) shows that the difference between them is real and important. According to the Jewish doctors, it is the connection of the soul with the body that produces the yetzer ra, the evil disposition. Borrowing from Platonism or Oriental sources, they make the body the originating cause of the inclination to sin. To adopt the language of Vitrings, the church places the seat of corruption in the mind; the synagogue, in the body.

Among the questions debated by the wise men in Israel was one which is freely discussed in the present day; viz., "Is life worth living?" For full two years and a half the schools of Shamai and Hillel contended on the point whether it was meritorious to have been created or not. When at last a vote was taken, a majority declared that it would have been better for man not to have been created. To this decision the addition was made, that, since man is in being, he is to be very careful in his actions (Eruvin, 2). We are utterly at a loss to understand how Graetz (Gesch., iv. 236), Deutsch, and others could assert that the Mishna, as distinguished from the Gemara, knows nothing of a hell. If this were true, then we might vindicate for the New Testament independence of Mishnaic teaching on the New Testament (comp. McCaul: Old Paths, chap. xxiii.).

"Life, children, and a livelihood depend not on merit, but on the influence of the stars. ... An eclipse of the sun is an evil sign to the nation of the world. An eclipse of the moon is an evil sign to Israel; for Israel reckons by the moon, the nations of the world, by the sun."

The virtue of amulets is recognized both in the Mishna and in the Gemara. The Mishna (Shabbath, fol. 61 a) teaches it is not lawful to go forth on the sabbath with an amulet that is not approved. An approved amulet, is one that has cured three cases (comp. Buxtorf: Lex. Talmud., p. 2037, under Qamia). The charm prescribed in the Talmud for the scratch and bite of a mad dog has been often quoted. It is an extraordinary specimen of profane folly. We give the briefer and less known statement of the way by which we may obtain a sight of the mischievous demons, invisible to ordinary eyes, who wear out the clothes of the rabbis by rubbing against them, cause bruised legs, and want of room at the sermon:—

"Whosoever wishes to see them, let him take the interior covering of a black cat, the daughter of a first-born black cat, which is also the daughter of a first-born, and let him burn it in the fire, and pulverize it, and let him then fill his eyes with it, and he will see them," etc. (Berakoth, fol. 6 a).

The little effect, it has been rightly observed, produced on the minds of the scribes and Pharisees by the display of divine power in the miracles wrought by our Lord and his disciples, was largely owing to their faith in charms and magical arts. They forgot the teaching of the law of Moses, for the observance of which they could profess such zeal (Deut. xviii. 10-12). It is idle to quote from the Talmud examples of teaching similar to what we read in the Gospels, and thence to argue the dependence of the latter on the former. The Gospels were, we know, extant in a permanent written form long before the Mishna was compiled, and centuries before it was reduced to writing. And what if authorities for Talmudic sayings analogous to words in the New Testament can be shown to have imbibed instruction from Christians? This can be done. The Mishnaic doctor Rabbi Eliezer, to whom a striking saying, very like one uttered by our Lord, is credited, confessed to Rabbi Akiba that he had intercourse with James, a disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, and that he was greatly pleased with instruction which James communicated to him as he had heard it from Jesus (Aboda Sarih, fol. 16, 17). So Jonathan ben Joseph, whose teachings (Tract. Jose, 83 b) strikingly resemble those of our Saviour concerning the sabbath, is said to have had much intercourse with Christians (comp. Biesenthal: Zur Geschichte derchristl. Kirche, elftes Kap). Biesenthal calls attention to the fact that there is yet no complete version of it in any language. In an age in which the sacred books of all nations are made accessible to those who can not study them in the original, those who speak of the inexhaustible mine of wisdom hidden in the Talmud ought not to suffer it to be concealed in a language which few can read. Geiger (Ji-dische Zeitschrift, 1869, p. 197) affirms that even Ewald, the celebrated Hebrew grammarian, could not accurately understand and translate a single sentence of the Talmud. The English reader will find the principal blasphemous passages reflecting on the origin and character of our Saviour in Lardner's Collection of Jewish and Heathen Testimonies (chap. v.). He will see there that the rabbis have exhibited the same malicious spirit of foul invention against the Roman general Titus, and he may form his own judgment of the trustworthiness of the Talmud on historical questions. Jost confesses (p. 404, note) that the Babylonian rabbis are in error beyond conception in regard to the time of Jesus, making him to have lived a hundred years too early, and that, in regard to the early Christians, the rabbis of the third or fourth century grope entirely in the dark and have recourse to unjustifiable fables. The unmentionable calumnies fabricated against the mother of Jesus (they call her Stada: see Buxtorf: Lex. Talm., pp. 1458 sq.) are perhaps without a parallel. The account of the trial of Christ's five disciples (given also by Lardner) is one of the strangest specimens of transparent fiction, and of silly trifling with the words of Scripture. It is not an original thought of his; unlike the "Golden Rule" enunciated by ist, it sets forth only the negativeside of our moral. It is not an original thought of his;

DUKLOP MOORE.

TAMMUZ, a sun-god, worshipped with peculiar rites by women among the Chaldeans, and even in Jerusalem (Ezek. viii. 14). In Babylon, and also in the Jewish sacred year, his month was from June 20 to July 20, the time when the days begin to shorten; in Jerusalem in the autumn, when the nights begin to be longer than the days. His annual festival, which celebrated his supposed death and resurrection, was a time of mourning, followed by one of joy. The old (Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome) and the majority of the new commentators connect Tammuz and Adonis, who might easily be, in view of the frequency with which D and T exchange places. Tammuz was originally not an organized religion, but a mass of indigenous Chinese superstitions, a belief in magic and kindred hallucinations. Its priests were necromancers, and its objects of worship were spirits. Under the rivalry of Buddhism, introduced from India A.D. 65, Täoism was developed into a religion with idols, temples, monasteries, and public services. The three great gods found in Täoist temples are called San Ch'ing ("The Three Holy Ones"); viz., "The Perfect Holy One," "The Highest Holy One" (Lao-tze), and "The Greatest Holy One." But, besides this triad, Täoism owns innumerable gods. Confucius unhappily ignored, rather than opposed, the base superstitions out of which Täoism sprang, and so did nothing to destroy their force. The latter now makes common cause with Buddhism; so that the shaven Buddhist and the "yellow-topped" Täoist "priests," (so called) are seen officiating side by side in the same service. Frequent attempts have been made to unite the sects, but the Täoists have always refused to adopt the celibacy of the Buddhists. One feature of Täoism is its eschatology. It teaches that each one has three souls, one of which remains with the corpse, one with the spirit-tablet, while the third is carried off to purgatory, which consists of ten courts of justice, situated at the bottom of a great ocean which lies down in the depths of the earth. The soul can pass through purgatory endless times, but can never escape from it. If it do not improve it, it is assigned to an endless hell. Some become "immortals" without passing through purgatory. The offerings of the living, and the services of the priests (either Buddhist or Täoist), deliver souls from purgatory. The two most important functions of a Täoist priest are, (1) to deliver unfortunate persions from the domination of evil spirits, and (2) to choose grave-sites. He does the first by writing charms, and preparing amulets. The head of the religion has unrivelled skill in this way.

“It is said, that about his residence on the Lung-hu mountain there are thousands of jars in rows, all tenanted by demons, but shut up in them.” The second function is very important; for, if a proper spot be not selected, “the spirit of the dead is made unhappy, and avenges itself by causing sickness and other calamities to the relatives who have not taken sufficient care for its repose.” The Taoist priest selects the site on geomantic principles.

TAPPAN, David, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Manchester, Mass., April 21, 1752; d. at Cambridge, Aug. 27, 1803. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1771, was pastor of a Church in Newbury, 1774, until, on Dec. 26, 1792, he became Hollis Professor of Divinity in Harvard University. He held the position at his death. After his death, two volumes of his writings appeared, — Sermons on Important Subjects, Boston, 1807; Lectures on Jewish Antiquities, 1807. See biographical sketch in the first-named volume; also Strange: Annals, ii. pp. 97-103.

TAPPAN, Henry Philip, D.D., LL.D.; b. at Rhinebeck, N.Y., April 23, 1805; d. at Vevey, Switzerland, November, 1881. He was graduated at Union College, 1825; studied theology at Princeton; was pastor of a Reformed Dutch church in Schenectady, N.Y., and subsequently of a Congregationalist church in Pittsfield, Mass. (1828-32). From 1832 to 1838 he was professor of moral philosophy in the University of the City of New York. After keeping a private school for some years, he was elected chancellor of the University of Michigan in 1852, and held the office until 1863, when he resigned. He spent the rest of his days in Europe. He was an eminent educational and philosophical writer. He was a corresponding member of the Institute of France, 1839. Among his works may be mentioned, A Review of Edwards’s On the Will, New York, 1839; Doctrine of the Will determined by an Appeal to Consciousness, 1840; Doctrine of the Will applied to Moral Agency and Responsibility, 1841 (the three volumes were issued in a revised form in Glasgow, 1857, 1 vol.); Elements of Logic, 1844, new ed., 1856.

TAPPAN, William Bingham, b. at Beverly, Mass., Oct. 29, 1794; d. at West Needham, Mass., June 18, 1849; began life as an apprentice in Boston, but removed to Philadelphia, 1815, and was there engaged in business and in teaching. From 1822 he was in the employ of the American Sunday-school Union, and in its service lived a while in Cincinnati, but chiefly in Boston. In 1841 he was licensed as a Congregational preacher. He published New-England and Other Poems, 1819; Poems, 1822; Lyrics, September, 1822; and, after a long interval, Poems and Lyrics, 1842; Poetry of the Heart, 1845; Sacred and Miscellane-ous Poems, 1846; Poetry of Life, 1847; The Sunday School, etc., 1848; Late and Early Poems, 1849. Some of these are reprints; but Griswold called him “the most industrious and voluminous of our religious poets.” Some of his hymns have been extensively used, especially the two beginning “There is an hour,” which appeared in his first volume, 1819.

TARASIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople; d. 806; was secretary of state during the reign of Constantine and Irene; and, when the empress discovered that he was an ardent worshipper of images, she raised him, in 784, to the patriarchal see of Constantinople, though he was a layman. By some adroit manoeuvres he procured the recognition even of Adrian. He was once more established in Constantinople in 785, but broken up by a sudden rebellion in the city, and then re-established at Nicaea in 787, the worship of images was once more established in the Greek Church.

TARGUM (i.e., translation) is the name given to a Chaldee version, or paraphrase, of the Old Testament. The origin of the Chaldee paraphrase may be traced back to the time of Ezra. After the exile the Chaldeans assembled at the synagogue first assembled in Constantinople in 785, but broken up by a sudden rebellion in the city, and then re-assembled at Nicaea in 787, the worship of images was once more established in the Greek Church.

The language of Onkelos greatly approaches the biblical Chaldee. His translation is, on the whole, very simple and exact. His elucidations of difficult and obscure passages and expressions, perhaps less satisfactory, are commonly those most accredited by internal evidence, and in particular he is worthy of a more careful regard and assent than have usually fallen to his lot. Larger additions, and deviations from the original text, are found mostly in the poetical parts of the Pentateuch (Gen. xlix.; Num. xxiv.; Deut. xxxii.). In passages relative to the Divine Being we perceive the effect of a doctrinal bias in certain deviations from the Hebrew text. Anthropomorphic and anthropopathic expressions are avoided, and Elohim and Jehovah are rendered by “the word of God.” It is obvious, from the character of the work, that the author was in possession of a rich exegetical tradition.

Editions. — The Targum of Onkelos was first published, with Rashi's commentary on the Pentateuch, Bologna, 1482. It was subsequently reprinted in the rabbinic and polyglot Bibles. [A new and critical edition according to that of Sabionetta (1557) is in course of preparation by Dr. A. Berliner of Berlin, the author of Die Masorah zum Targum Onkelos, Leipzig, 1877. This Targum has been translated into Latin by P. Pagius and by John Merceir, 1668. The translation of Dr. Pagius is the best. It was rendered into English by Etheridge, London, 1862-65.]

II. THE TARGUM ON THE PROPHETS. — [i.e., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets] is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, a pupil of Hillel, according to tradition (Baba Batr. 134 a; compare Succoth, 28 a, Megillath, 3). As to his paraphrase, it is simple, and tolerably literal in the historical books; but in the prophetic books the text is more freely handled. Another peculiarity of this Targum is its Haggadical character.

In many places we find a double Targum. The Targum of Onkelos is the basis of Jonathan's, and its own basis was that of Pseudo-Jonathan. The author of Jerusalem Targum, according to certain principles, and to insert in it a selection of Haggadahs current among the people. Pseudo-Jonathan afterwards resumed the same office, and completed what his predecessor had begun. The Jerusalem Targum formed the basis of Jonathan, and its own basis was that of Onkelos. Jonathan used both his predecessors' paraphrases; the author of Jerusalem Targum, that of Onkelos alone.

Editions. — The Pseudo-Jonathan Targum was first published in Venice, 1580; then at Hanau, 1618; Amsterdam, 1640; Prague, 1640; [Berlin, 1706; Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1859]. It is also in the London polyglot, vol. iv. [together with a Latin translation made by Antony Chevalier. It was translated into English by Etheridge, London, 1862-65]. The Jerusalem Targum was first printed by Bomberg, Venice, 1518, [and reprinted in the subsequent rabbinical Bibles issued by him], and in the London polyglot; [also at Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1859; Warsaw, 1875. Francis Taylor made a Latin version of this Targum (London, 1819); but the more correct one is that of Antony Chevalier, above noticed. There are also commentaries on these Targums.]

IV. TARGUMS ON THE Hagiographa. — These Targums are generally divided into three groups: viz., (a) Job, Psalms, Proverbs; (b) the five Megilloth; (c) Daniel, Chronicles, and Ezra. Traditionally ascribed to Rabbi Joseph the Blind the authorship of these Targums; but this is contradicted by writers, even of the thirteenth century.

(a) [The Targum on the Book of Job. — A feature of this Targum is its Haggadical character. In many places the language is intermixed with Latin and Greek words. It sometimes agrees with the Septuagint or with the Peshito. It was published by John Terentius, Franck., 1663. Later it was made by Mercier, Francfort, 1663, and Seidai, Rome, 1818. Compare on this Targum, Bacher, in Graetz: Monatschrift, 1871, pp. 208-223; and Constantinople, Mohammed's wives (Chadija and Fatima), and other things which betray the later date, — the second half of the seventh century. That Pseudo-Jonathan had Onkelos before him, a very slight comparison of both shows. Substantially in the same dialect is the Jerusalem or Jerushalmi Targum written. The similarity of both is striking, and yet there is so much divergence as to prove diversity of authorship. How can their resemblance be explained? Only if the fact this Targum was rendered into English by Etheridge, London, 1862-65.]

III. PSEUDO-JONATHAN AND JERUSALMI ON THE PENTATEUCH. — Besides the Onkelos Targum we have another Targum to the Pentateuch, — one on the whole Pentateuch; the other, on single verses and words. The former is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel; the latter goes under the name of Jerusalem. That Jonathan is not the same as the paraphrast on the prophets is acknowledged on all sides. That he wrote at a later period, we see from his mentioning of
The Targum on the Psalms.— Sometimes it follows the original with a tolerable degree of closeness, as in 1, ii., v., vi., etc. In more cases, however, it indulges in prolix digressions, absurd fables, and common-place remarks. Two or three different versions of the same text occasionally follow one another without remark, though the introductory notice \( \text{\textit{z}} \), i.e., another Targum, sometimes precedes. [Comp. Bacher: \textit{Das Targum zu den Psalmen}, in Graetz's \textit{Monatschrift}, 1872, pp. 408-416, 463-473. It was printed in Justiniani's polyglot Psalter (Genoa, 1510) and in the hexaglot edition of the Psalter published at Rostock, 1631. It is also printed in the latest rabbinical Bible, Warsaw, 1875. The Antwerp and following polyglots (1572, 1645, 1657) contain the Latin version of Arias Montanus. From the Codex Reuchlin it was published by Lagarde, in his \textit{Hagiographa Chaldaica} (Leips., 1873), and republished by Nestle, in his \textit{Psalterium Tetraglotton}, Tubingen, 1877-79.]

The Targum on Proverbs.— This Targum is noted for its glosses and perhaps belongs more closely to the original text. Its remarkable agreement with the Syriac version has been noticed,— an agreement which extends even to the choice and position of words; comp. i. 1-8, 8, 12, 13; ii. 9, 10, 13-15; iii. 2-9; iv. 1-3, 26; v. 1, 2, 4, 5; viii. 27; x. 3-5; xxvi. 1; xxvii. 5, 8; xxix. 6; xxx. 91. Comp. Dathe, \textit{De Rationale Consensus Versionis Chaldaicae et Syriaca; Proverbior. Solomonis} (Lips., 1764), who endeavors to prove that the Chaldean interpreter was dependent on the Syriac. (An opposite ground to that of Dathe is taken by Maybaum, \textit{Ueber die Sprache des Targum zu den Sprüchen u. dessen Verhältniss zum Syrer}, in Merv's \textit{Archiv für wissenschaftliche Erforschung des Alten Testamentes}, ii. 69 sq.; cf. also Pick's art. "Relation of the Syriac Version to the Septuagint and Chaldee," in McClintock and Strong's Cyclop., vol. x. pp. 121-124.)

The Targum on the Five Megillot [i.e., on Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, and the Lamentations] is written in an intermediate dialect between the West Aramaean of Job, Psalms, and Proverbs, and the East Aramaean of the Babylonian Talmud. The whole, which may perhaps belong to one author, bears the impress of a date considerably posterior to the Talmudic time, and is a Midrashic paraphrase, exceedingly loose and free in character, containing legends, fables, allusions to Jewish history, and many fanciful additions.

1. The Targum on Ruth was published separately, with a Latin translation and scholia by J. Mercier, Paris, 1594. The Targum on Ecclesiastes has been translated into English by Ginsburg, in his \textit{Commentary on Ecclesiastes}, London, 1861.

3. The Targum on Canticles is found in the rabbinical Bibles. It has been translated into Latin, and also into English by Gill, at the end of his \textit{Commentary on the Song of Solomon}, London, 1751, pp. 535 sq.]

The Targum, or rather Targuma, on Esther.— One translation of concise form, and adhering closely to the text, occurs in the Antwerp polyglot. It was issued enlarged, with glosses by Tailer, in \textit{Targum Prius et Posterior in Esther}, studii F. Taileri, London, 1655, and forms the \textit{Targum Prius}, which is contained in the London polyglot. Much more prolix, and amplifying still more the legends of this Targum, is the \textit{Targum Posterior}, in Tailer. \[Its final redaction probably belongs to the eleventh century. With a certain degree of probability, the second Targum is found in the Warsaw rabbinical Bible. A separate edition, with notes, etc., was published by Munk, \textit{Targum Scheni zu d. Buche Esther}, Berl., 1784. It has been translated into German by P. Cassel, in an appendix to his \textit{Das Buch Esther}, Berlin, 1784. It has been treated in essay by Reiss, \textit{Das Targum Scheni zu dem Buche Esther}, in Graetz's \textit{Monatschrift}, 1878, pp. 161 sq., 297 sq., 358 sq.]

5. The Targum on the Book of Chronicles was published from an Erfurt codex of the year 1343, by Beck (Augsburg, 1690-88, with learned notes and a Latin translation. Another edition was published by Wilkins (Amsterdam, 1715), from a codex belonging to the Cambridge University, with a Latin version. \[This latter was lately published by Rahmer (Thornt, 1886), with the deviations from Beck's edition. The origin of this Targum cannot be put earlier than the eighth century, or the beginning of the ninth. Comp. Frankel, \textit{Monatschrift}, 1867, pp. 349 sq.; Rosenberg, \textit{Das Targum zu dem Buche Esther}, in Geiger's \textit{Jüdische Zeitschrift}, 1870, pp. 72 sq., 136 sq., 263 sq. There is not any Targum, so far as is known, upon Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. An edition of the Chaldean Hagiographa was published by Lagarde, Leips., 1878.]*

\[VOLCK. (B. PICK.) TARCHISH. I. A geographical or ethnographical idea, to comprehend which it is necessary to examine the different passages in which this word occurs.

1. What is meant by Tarshish in the genealogical table, Gen. x. 4, 5, where it is placed among the sons of Javan,— Elishah and Kittim and Tarshish and Dodanim, (a) the Dorians (Zeller, Lionnelli); (b) the Tyrreni(ann) (or Etruscans, Tus- kans), so Knobel; (c) Tarsus in Cilicia, so Deh- nisach; (d) a famous port or region, so Movers. 2. As for the passages of the Bible, there is no doubt that Tarshish is to be fixed somewhere in or near Spain; so already Eusebius. For Spain we must also look on account of the metals (Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 12) which were brought from Spain. There can therefore be no doubt that Tarshish must have been near the mouth of the Guadaluver. In fixing more precisely the locality, Movers, with whom Knobel also seems to agree, has come to the conclusion that Tarshish-Tar- sus was not the name of a city, but that it was...\] the name of a people and country in the south-west of Spain, beyond the Columns of Hercules. With this view of Movers agree not only the biblical notices, but also the older Greek writers. This also will explain the fact, that nowhere the destruction of Tartessus is mentioned. While we read in 1 Kings x. 22, that Solomon had at sea a navy of Tarshish with a navy of Hiram, bringing once in three years gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks, which (with reference to 1 Kings ix. 20-28) leads to the supposition that a voyage to Ophir is meant, — Tarshish ships only meaning "large vessels," — we read in 2 Chron. ix. 21 of a trip to Tarshish. The same is the case with 1 Kings xxxii. 48 sq. and 2 Chron. xxx. 38. The difference in the two statements is only to be explained by assuming that the Tarshish ships were assigned for Ophir, and changed into ships going to Tarshish. Keil's efforts to save the correct statement of the chronicle-writer are unsatisfactory; and we can only assume, with Bleek (Einleitung, pp. 397 sq.), that the writer did not correctly understand the expression, hence his endeavor to fix it more precisely, which he did in an incorrect manner, — a view which is also adopted by Bertheau and Ewald; or, with Movers, that in the course of time the knowledge of the real Tarshish was lost among the Hebrews, and that it came to mean all distant countries in the west or in the south, or, as Movers says, a western and eastern Tarshish.

Lit. — The older literature is given by Winer: Realworterb., s. v.; Cless, in PAULY'S Reallexikon, vi. 2, pp. 1627 sq.; MOVERS: Phainoicier, ii. 2; KNOBEL: Volkerfahre der Genesis, Giessen, 1850.

II. A precious stone, which was probably found in Tarshish, whence it took its name (Exod. xxxviii. 20, xxxix. 13; Ezek. i. 16, x. 3; xxviii. 13; Cant. v. 14; Dan. x. 6). The Septuagint, followed by Josephus, makes it the "chrysolite" or topaz. Comp. BRAUN; De Vestitu Sacerdot., ii. 17.

III. Proper noun (Esth. i. 14; 1 Chron. vii. 10).

TAR'US, the chief town of Cilicia, was in Xenophon's time a city of some considerable consequence (Anab., i, 2, 23). In later times it was renowned as a place of education under the early Roman emperors; and Strabo compares it in this respect to Athens and Alexandria, giving, as regards the zeal for learning shown by the residents, the preference to Tarsus (xiv. 673). To this were enough to merit the name. Cattle are turned out in all seasons; and life in the open air may be enjoyed all the year round. The scenery is in harmony with the climate; and the island is a favorite resort for people from neighboring colonies, and travellers from a distance. It was discovered by the Dutch navigator Abel Tasman in 1642, who named it Van Diemen's Land, in honor of Anthony van Diemen, governor of Batavia, who had fitted out the expedition. The work of the first discoverer remained as he left it till the closing years of the eighteenth century, when Capt. Cook and others gradually

TASMANIA is a triangular-shaped island, a hundred and twenty miles south of the Australian Continent. It is situated between 40° and 44° south latitude, and between 144° and 149° east longitude. In extent, it is one hundred and seventy miles from north to south, and one hundred and sixty from east to west, with an area of over fifteen millions of acres. It is nearly the size of Scotland. The climate is proverbially one of the most healthy and delightful in the world. The annual rainfall averages twenty-four inches; being higher than on the Australian Continent, and lower than in Britain and America. The mean midwinter temperature is about 46° F.; and that of midsomer, 68° F. There are no extremes of heat or cold. The winter is scarcely severe enough to merit the name. Cattle are turned out in all seasons; and life in the open air may be enjoyed all the year round. The scenery is in harmony with the climate; and the island is a favorite resort for people from neighboring colonies, and travellers from a distance. It was discovered by the Dutch navigator Abel Tasman in 1642, who named it Van Diemen's Land, in honor of Anthony van Diemen, governor of Batavia, who had fitted out the expedition. The work of the first discoverer remained as he left it till the closing years of the eighteenth century, when Capt. Cook and others gradually opened up what had so long been as a sealed book. The settlement of the colony took place in 1803, when the convict establishment at Botany Bay, near Sydney, which had existed for about fourteen years, being over-crowded, a number of these most dangerous criminals were dispatched and were brought to Tasmania. Transportation ceased a quarter of a century ago; and in 1836 the event was signalized by changing the name from "Van Diemen's Land" to "Tasmania," in honor of the rightful discoverer. Practically there is now nothing to remind one that the land was once a convict settlement. The aborigines, who presented, probably, almost the lowest type of savage tribes, numbered somewhere from a thousand to ten thousand in the early part of the century. The last of them died in 1896. Tasmania, like other colonies, has a governor of her own, appointed by the British cabinet, who holds office for six years. The Parliament consists of two chambers,—the Legislative Council with sixteen members, and the House of Assembly with thirty-two members, both being elective. The system of education is compulsory, secular, and free. "By exhibitions from the schools, a certain number of pupils of both sexes are enabled annually, even in the absence of private resources, to proceed to the best private schools, and thus qualify themselves eventually for examination for the local degree of associate of arts. Two Tasmanian scholarships, of two hundred pounds a year each, tenable for four years at a British university, are awarded annually to associates of arts (male) who pass a prescribed examination." There is no lack of mechanics' institutes, public libraries, and scientific societies. New books, and all leading British and some American periodicals and journals, arrive regularly. The population is now only a hundred and twenty thousand, and composed of English, Irish, and Scotch, without almost any admixture of foreign nationalities. But there are signs of awakening activity and enterprise, giving hope of a successful future. Mineral and other resources are being vigorously developed; and by liberal land-laws such encouraging results of "free" land grants have been obtained. The outlay for education has been increased, and the public educational system is improving. The growth of art and local improvement is marked. The arts (male) who pass a prescribed examination are given to immigration as affords a reasonable prospect of a steady, though it may not be rapid, increase of population. The chief manufactures are woollen and worsted goods, clothing, calicoes, plane timber, paper, and paper manufactures. The chief exports are wool, tin, timber, gold, jam, fruit, and dairy produce. The chief imports are coal, rice, cloth, tea, coffee, tobacco, and immoral books. Hobart is the capital, with a population (in 1878) of 22,500. Launceston, the only other considerable town, has 13,000.

As in the rest of Australasia, the usual religious bodies flourish in Tasmania; although it may be noted that the Presbyterian Church has not been quite so prosperous as in the other colonies. There is an Anglican, an Irish National, a Roman-Catholic, and a Greek Church. The church-buildings throughout the country are suitable, and some of them handsome, especially St. David's Cathedral and St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Hobart, and St. Andrew's, Launceston. There is no state church. For about fifty years, however, after the settlement of the colony, the ministers of the churches of England, Scotland, and Rome, were in the position of colonial chaplains, paid by government, like other civil servants. But the State-aid Abolition Act put an end to this a quarter of a century ago; the churches receiving as compensation a certain sum in government debentures. Most of the Presbyterian ministers, and some of the Episcopalians, come from the Old Country or the neighboring colonies; but progress is being made in all the churches towards training a native ministry. According to a recent census, the nominal returns are as under:

At the time of the above census the ministers of all denominations numbered a hundred and twenty-nine. As is the case in Australasia generally, they are for the most part efficient pastors, and highly respected.

TATE, Nahum, b. in Dublin, 1835; d. Aug. 12, 1715, in the precincts of the Mint at Southwark, being a hiding-elective. He was somewhat advanced, and being, in turn, displaced of late by the greatly increased supply and diversity of "A Dry Saltzer." It was soon after (probably by 1698) revised, and in parts rewritten. Having been by the king "allowed and permitted to be used in all such churches, chapels, and congregations as shall think fit to receive the same" (Dec. 3, 1696), it was recommended by the Bishop of London. May 23, 1698. It made its way slowly but surely in popular acceptance, not entirely driving out Sternhold and Hopkins till the present century was somewhat advanced, and being, in turn, displaced of late by the greatly increased supply and use of hymns in the Church of England. In one section, at least, of this country, it was largely used in preference to the New-England version, or Little Psalm-Book; many editions appearing in Boston between 1750 and 1800. This extended and long-continued use may be pleaded against the unfavorable opinions of critics. James Montgomery speaks of its "neutral propitiosity," and found it "nearly as inanimate, though a little more refined," than the old version; and Bishop Wilberforce gave "Tate and Brady" as the definition of "a dry saltzer." From the standpoint of modern taste, no one has ever succeeded in verifying the entire Psalm. Any close rendering designed to be sung must necessarily make dull reading. Of all such attempts, that of Tate and Brady is probably the least incredible, and the most useful. It contains some fairer poetical portions, many that are still well adapted to public worship where metrical psalms are preferred, and a few that are able to hold their own simply as hymns. The Supplement to the New Version (1703) is supposed to be the work of Tate alone. It contains versions of the Lord's Prayer, Creed, Commandments, and other passages of Scripture or Prayer-Book. Some of these are well done, and have been largely used in the English Church; and one, “While sheepwaters watched,” is in nearly universal use.

TATIAN.

One of the most prominent Christian writers of the second century; was a native of Assyria, but thoroughly conversant with Greek-Roman civilization. His education was that of a common sophist, combining a rich and varied store of learned lore with a more or less superficial philosophical training; and his life, which, however, is very imperfectly known, seems to have been that of a common travelling teacher of rhetoric. Finally he came to Rome, heard Justin, received a very deep and decisive impression of Christianity, and wrote his Apologeticum. In accordance with its apologetic purpose, the book is a reductio ad absurdum of Paganism, rather than a positive representation of Christianity; but its views, though somewhat crude, and deficient in historical breadth, are strong and original. TAUSEN, Hans, b. at Birkinde in the Danish Island of Fünen, 1494; d. at Ribe, Jutland, Nov.
11, 1561. As a monk of Antvorskov in Seeland, he was by his abbot sent to foreign countries to study. He went to Wittenberg; and on his return, in 1524, he began to preach the Reformation.
The abbot shut him up in the convent dungeon; but he was released by order of the king, who made him his chaplain, and afterwards pastor of the Church of St. Nicholas in Copenhagen, 1529.
Taussen was the first who preached the Reformation in Denmark; and, together with Bugenhagen, he was the principal agent in its establishment in the country, after its adoption by the Diet of Copenhagen in 1536. In 1542 he was made bishop of Ribe. He translated the Psalms into Danish, wrote several hymns, and published a number of sermons and treatises bearing on the Reformation.

studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and Cardinal College, Oxford, where he graduated; studied law, became, at Cromwell's recommendations, clerk of the signet, 1537; was licensed to preach by Edward VI., 1542; appointed high sheriffof Oxfordshire, 1569; and d. July 14, 1575.

fruit was very early adopted; and in the time of Jerome (d. 420) and Augustinie (d. 430), tithes began to be introduced; and from the close of the seventh century they were quite generally established. The clergy, however, by degrees, as a distinction between clergy and laity developed, were entirely exempted from taxation; though, on the other hand, they were not at liberty to dispose, by will or otherwise, of the property accumulated from their ecclesiastical income. From the end of the fourth century such property was considered as belonging to the church.

The first traces of a real taxation of the clergy occur towards the close of the sixth century, and that at once under three different forms. First, an annual tax was paid by every diocesan church to the cathedral. It was called the episcopal cathedralicum, or, as it was paid during the episcopal visitations, synodalis censura, synodus, or synodaticum. It is first met with in Spain, where it was paid in money: Conc. Braccar., c. 1 (572).
In the Frankish Empire, where it was paid in kind, it is mentioned in a capitularium of Charles
The Bald (844); in Italy it became common under Innocent III. (d. 1216) and his successor; but a council of Rome (829), as well as the letters of Ivo of Chartres
(Ep. 133), complains of the magnitude of those gifts. The money, which, since the ninth century, the metropolitan paid in Rome for their pallium, was a tax of the same kind; and it became a very heavy one. Finally, it was the duty of the clergy to entertain the bishop on his tour of visitation.

III. (d. 1297), and became firmly established under Boniface VIII. (d. 1305) It means a right which the bishop has of appropriating the first year’s revenue at a new appointment to a benefice in his diocese. It occurs partly as a right established originally the Pope claimed the right for himself. The Pope claimed the right for himself alone, and he still retains it as far as the higher ecclesiastical benefits are concerned.

When the decay of the Church began, after the fourteenth century, great modifications of the ruling system of taxation became necessary. Old taxes were abolished, and new ones were invented. Among the latter were the absence-money and the so-called servitia. Absence-money consisted in a fee paid to the Pope for their non-residence by such ecclesiastics as held several benefices. See Jüger: Über Absent- und Tafel-gelder, Ingolstadt, 1825. The Servitia Camera Papae, or servitia communia, originated from the Pope assuming the exclusive right of ordaining bishops, on account of which all ordination-fees flowed into his treasury. With the establishment of the Reformation, all ecclesiastical property and privileges, so-called servitia, passed into the hands of the Protestant countries. In England the papal annats were originally transferred to the crown, but by Anne they were formed into a fund (“Queen Anne’s Bounty”) for the improvement of the smaller livings. No monograph on ecclesiastical taxation exists; but much material is found in Thomasin: Vetus et nova ecclesiae disciplina circa beneficia, Paris, 1688, 3 vols., especially in the third volume; and in the common handbooks of ecclesiastical law. TAYLOR, Dan, founder of New Connection of General Baptists (see p. 2208); b. at Northowram, Halifax, York, Eng., Dec. 21, 1758; d. in London, Dec. 2, 1816. Like Luther, a miner’s son, and at five years of age worked in the mine with his father. He was strong, fearless, and eager for learning, and gave promise of the prodigious industry of his manhood by carrying his books into the coal-mine, and converting it into a study. As with all superior lads, religion was his first thought. His sense of sin was acute; and his passionate yearning for pardon and light urged him to travel ten and even twenty miles to hear Wesley, Whitefield, and Grimshaw. But he did not rest till he understood and accepted the message of universal love in John iii. 16: that gave the trend to his character and career.

He joined the Wesleyans, and became a “local preacher;” but his essentially independent and growing spirit forced him out of the Methodist ranks, and he accepted the pastorate of a few like-minded folk at Nook, Birchcliffe. Further study of the Bible led him to the Baptist idea, and he came into contact with the General Baptists. Detecting their Unitarian drift, he confronted it, and sought to arrest it. Failing, he, together with the Barton Independent Baptists, formed, in June, 1770, the New Connection of General Baptists. Now he found his true sphere, discharging his duties as a pastor with conspicuous fidelity, first at Birchcliffe (1768-83), next at Halifax (1788-95), and finally at Church Street, Whitechapel, London (1783-1810). He meant while wrote copiously and ably on the theological questions of the day, and also shaped the course of the General Baptist denomination. He was its leading spirit for nearly half a century, founded its college in 1797, started and edited its magazine, 1798, presided at its annual gatherings, and impressed his study, enterprise, progressive, and liberal individuality on its institutions and churches. His chief literary works are, Fundamentals of Religion in Faith and Practice, Dissertations on Singing in Public Worship, Letters on Andrew Fuller’s Scheme.

TAYLOR, Isaac, English theological writer; b. at Lavenham, Suffolk, Aug. 17, 1757; d. at Stamford Rivers, Essex, June 28, 1806. His father was a line engraver, and later a dissenting minister, and author of popular children’s books; but he entered the Established Church. After following for a while the profession of engraver and artist, he turned his attention to literature and inventions. He invented two very ingenious engraving-machines; one for illustrations, and another for patterns upon rollers for calico-printing. As an author he was very prolific and original. Among his religious and theological writings may be mentioned History of Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times, 1827; Natural History of Enthusiasm, 1829 (very popular); Natural History of Fanaticism, 1833; Spiritual Despotism, 1835; Physical Theory of Another Life, 1836 (after this work he dropped his incoherence); Ancient Christian Hymns, 1837; Letters on the Doctrines of the Oxford Tracts for the Times, 1839-40, 8 parts, 4th ed., with supplement and indexes, 1844, 2 vols. (a reply to those who desired to restore “primitive” doctrine, and magnify the “Primitive” Church, by showing the seamy side of the early church; but it goes too far, and thus really conveys a false impression); Man Responsible for his Dispositions, Opinions, and Conduct, 1840; Loyola and Jesuitism, 1849; Wesley and Methodism, 1851; The Restoration of Belief, 1855; Logic in Theology, 1859; Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1861; Considerations on the Pentateuch, 1863 (a reply to Bishop Colenso). Almost all his books have been reprinted in New York, and to the reprint of the Spirit of Hebrew Poetry Dr. W. Adams contributed an introduction.

TAYLOR, Jane, was b. in London, Sept. 23, 1783; and at Ongar, Essex, April 12, 1824. She learned her father’s profession as an engraver, which was soon deserted for literature. Her life was spent mainly at Lavenham, Colchester, Ongar, and Marazion in Cornwall. Her memoir of her sister Isaac appeared 1825. She was among the best and most successful of writers for youth. Of her many publications (Annual and Monthly, Colenso, Contributions of Q. Q., etc.), not the least important were the Original Poems, 1805, and Hymns for Infant Minds, 1809 or 1810 (new ed., London, 1883), written conjointly with her sister Ann (1782-1868), afterwards Mrs. Gilbert. In these it is seldom possible to fix the authorship with certainty.

TAYLOR, Jeremy, — the Chrysogonum of English theology; but in brilliancy of imagination surpassing his Greek antitype, — was born at Cambridge, Aug. 15, 1613. There he entered Caius...
College, and, after seven years' study, took his degree of M.A. Archbishop Laud noticed and patronized the youth, and gave him a fellowship. The same influence, he obtained a royal chaplaincy and attachment to the Church-of-England Parliament, thus suffering a penalty for his royalism. He became rector of Uppingham, in the county of Rutland. Of that living he was deprived by Parliament, thus suffering a penalty for his royalism and attachment to the Church-of-England Parliament, thus suffering a penalty for his royalism.

In 1660, he returned to London and promoted the restoration of Charles II. by signing the Loyal Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry in the April of that year. In 1660 also, he published his elaborate Ductor Dubitantium, or the Rule of Conscience in all her General Measures, pronounced by Hallam to be "the most extensive and learned work on casuistry which has appeared in the English language. Bishop Rust, who succeeded him, caught his rhetorical mantle and exclaimed, in his funeral sermon for the illustrious divine, "This great prelate had the good-humor of a gentleman, the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the reason of an angel, and the piety of a saint. He had devotion enough for a cloister, learning enough for a university, and wit enough for a college of virtue; and, had his parts and endowments been parcelled out among his poor clergy that he left behind him, it would, perhaps, have made one of the best dioceses in the world."
Aspland's Selection, 1810. Some of them possess decided merit, and have been widely used in our churches.

TAYLOR, Nathaniel William, D.D., an eminent Congregationalist preacher, theological teacher, and author; b. at New Milford, Conn., June 23, 1789; d. at New Haven, March 10, 1858. He was graduated at Yale College in 1807; studied theology with President Dwight, and became pastor of the First Church in New Haven in 1811, which office he resigned in 1822, to take the chair of Dogmatic Theology in the theological department of Yale College, where he continued to teach until his death. As a preacher he was singularly impressive, combining solidity and clearness of thought with a remarkable eloquence. Unusual results followed upon his sermons, especially in connection with "revivals." From early youth deeply interested in the problems of theology, and endowed with metaphysical talents of a very high order, he worked out, on the basis of the previous New-England theology, an elaborate system, which gained numerous adherents, and powerfully affected theological thought and preaching in America beyond the circle of its professed advocates. It was popularly termed "The New-Haven Theology." Sometimes it was called "Taylorism." It was one of the most influential of the types of so-called "New-School Divinity." There were able coadjutors of Dr. Taylor, notably his colleagues,—Rev. Eleazar T. Fitch, D.D. (b. 1791; d. 1871), college preacher at Yale from 1817 to 1852, and professor of homiletics, a man of rare and versatile powers; and Rev. Chauncey A. Goodrich, D.D. (b. 1790; d. 1860), also an influential professor in the college and in the divinity school at Yale, and the principal editor of The Christian Spectator, the review in which many of the controversial essays of "the New-Haven Divines," were published. But the peculiarities of "New-Haven Divinity" as it existed in the generation among whom Dr. Taylor was a prominent leader, are mainly and justly associated with his name.

When Dr. Taylor began his investigations, New England theology asserted a precedent principle, or state of the will, a governing purpose, underlying all subordinate volitions and acts. Stated in theological language, it is the elective preference of the world to God, as the soul's chief good. It may be resolved into selfishness. It is certain that every man will sin from the moment when he is capable of moral action, and will continue to be sinful until he is regenerated; and this certainty, which is absolute,—though it is not necessity, and co-exists with power to the opposite action,—is somehow due to Adam's sin. In this sense, Adam was placed on trial for the whole human race that of liberty. The time solution of the problem, in Dr. Taylor's view, is in the union of the doctrine of the previous certainty of every act of the will—a certainty given by its antecedents collectively taken—with the power of a contrary choice. Freedom is exemption from something: it is exemption from the constraining operation of that law and cause the effect which brings events to pass in the material world. If the antecedents of choice produce the consequent according to that law, without qualification, there is no liberty. Yet Dr. Taylor did not hold to the liberty of indifference or of contingency which had been charged upon the Arminians, and had been denied by his New-England predecessors. He held to a connection between choice and its antecedents, of such a character as to give in every case a previous certainty that the former will be what it actually is. The ground or reason of this certainty lies in the constitution of the agent, and the motives under which he acts; that is to say, in the antecedents taken together. The infallible connection of these with the consequent, the Divine Mind perceives, though we may not dogmatize on the exact mode of his perception. The precise nature of the connection between the antecedents and consequent, Dr. Taylor did not profess to explain; but he held that the same antecedents will uniformly be followed by the same consequent. There are causes which do not necessitate their effect, but simply and solely give the certainty of it. Now, all admit that every event is previously certain. It is a true proposition, that what is to occur to-morrow will thus occur. No matter, then, what may be the ground of this certainty, as long as the events in question are not necessitated, there is no interference with moral liberty.

The leading principles of Dr. Taylor's system may now be stated:—

1. All sin is the voluntary action of the sinner, in disobedience to a known law.
2. Sin, however, is a permanent principle, or state of the will, a governing purpose, underlying all subordinate volitions and acts. Stated in theological language, it is the elective preference of the world to God, as the soul's chief good. It may be resolved into selfishness.
3. Though sin belongs to the individual, and consists in sinning, yet the fact that every man sins from the beginning of responsible agency is in consequence of the sin of Adam, which is certain that every man will sin from the moment when he is capable of moral action, and will continue to be sinful until he is regenerated; and this certainty, which is absolute,—though it is not necessity, and co-exists with power to the opposite action,—is somehow due to Adam's sin. In this sense, Adam was placed on trial for the whole human race that of liberty. The

There is in men, according to Dr. Taylor, a bias or tendency—sometimes called a propensity or disposition—to sin: but this is not itself sinful; it is the cause or occasion of sin. Nor is it to be conceived of as a separate desire of the soul, having respect to sin as an object. Such a propensity as this does not exist in human nature. It is proper to say that men are sinners by na-nature, since, in all the appropriate circumstances of their being, they sin from the first. The certainty of their sin as soon as they are capable of sinning is the consequence of two factors, — the constitution and condition of the soul (subjective), and the situation (objective). These together constitute nature in the statement, "We are sinners by nature."

4. High is the proximate efficient cause of all his voluntary states and actions. No man is necessitated to choose as he does. There is ever a power to the contrary. A sinner can cease to love the world supremely, and can choose God for his portion.

5. Inseparable from the foregoing assertion of a power to the contrary choice, however, is the doctrine of a moral inability on the part of the sinner to repent, and convert himself. He can, but it is certain he will not. "Certainty with power to the contrary" is a condensed statement of the truth on both sides. Thus the sinner is both responsible and dependent — perfectly responsible, yet absolutely dependent.

6. Natural ability being a real power and not an incapable faculty, there must be something in a sinner's mind to which right motives can appeal, some of his constitutional power to the contrary, which is the free act of the beings who commit it. It is not true, then, that sin is in any case better than holiness in its stead would be, or that sin, all things considered, is a good thing. But it may be true that the non-prevention of sin by the act of God is in certain cases better than its forcible prevention by his power.

Dr. Taylor took up the question in answering sceptical objections to the benevolence of the Creator. The ground that he took in reply was this, that it may be impossible for sin to be excluded by the act of God from the best possible system. The system would be better without sin, if this result were secured by the free action of the creatures comprising it, with no other alteration of its characteristics. It might not be so good if the same result were reached by divine intervention. We are too little acquainted with the relations of divine power to free agency to declare confidently to what extent the exertion of such power is beneficial when the universal system is taken into view. It is wiser and more modest to judge of what is best by what we actually see done.

8. Dr. Taylor's conception of election is conformed to his doctrine respecting the divine permission of sin. Regeneration is the act of God. He has determined to exert such a degree of influence upon a certain part of the race who are sinful by their own act, and justly condemned, as will result with infallible certainty in their conversion. He is not bound to give such influence in equal measure to all: rather does he establish a system of influence which his omniscient mind foresees to be most productive of holiness in his kingdom as a whole. It is not the act or merit of individuals that earns or procures this effectual influence, but that large expediency which has respect to the entire kingdom, and the holiness to be produced within it.

He organizes a plan, not in an arbitrary way, but in order to secure the best results that are attainable consistently with the wise and benevolent laws that underlie his whole administration.

TAYLOR, Thomas Rawson, b. at Ossett, near Wakefield. May 7, 1807; d. at Airedale, March 7, 1835; a Congregational minister at Sheffield, and tutor at Airedale College. He wrote only a few hymns, best known among them is "I'm but a stranger here." His Memoir and Remains appeared 1836.

TAYLOR, William, D.D., a prominent and venerable minister of the Presbyterian Church in Canada; b. in the parish of Dennie, Scotland.
March 18, 1803; d. in Montreal, Can., Sept. 4, 1876. His father was a farmer. After the usual preparation in school and college, he attended the Theological Hall of the Secession Church for five sessions, and was licensed to preach in 1827. In 1831 he was ordained the pastor of a congregation in Peebles. In 1833, along with two other ministers, Mr. Thomson and Murray, he was sent to Canada, where a mission had been commenced the preceding year. He arrived in Montreal immediately after the city had suffered severely from the scourge of cholera. He was immediately called as the pastor of a congregation just formed, and was installed July, 1833. He retained the same pastoral charge till the close of his life,—forty-three years. Dr. Taylor was a thorough scholar, an able theologian, an earnest preacher, and a wise counsellor in all ecclesiastical affairs. He was an acknowledged leader in the church courts, and held a high place in the esteem of his brethren in the ministry. He labored for years most indefatigably to secure the union of all the branches of the Presbyterian Church, and had the happiness to see its accomplishment in 1875. He was truly an apostle in the cause of temperance, and his untiring advocacy of every cause of social and moral reform. He was specially interested in the evangelization of the French Canadians. His manners were courteously yet affable, his devotion to his work zealous and unflagging, his ministry successful and greatly blessed, his influence great and widely extended, his life pure and eminently useful, his death calm and peaceful; and his memory is cherished, not only by the congregation whom he served so long and so faithfully, and by the city where his labors abounded, but by the whole denomination, which long regarded him as one of her pillars. He published many articles and several able discourses on the topics of the day. WILLIAM ORMISTON.

TELEOLOGY (from τέλος; "an end," and λόγος, "a discourse"). A technical term denoting a line of speculative researches concerning the final ends involved in and revealed by the phenomena of nature. The teleological or physico-theological argument on the existence of God is based on this line of evidence.

TELESPHORUS (Bishop of Rome, 128-139) was a native of Greece. Nothing is known of his reign. The reports of his regulations concerning the Easter fast and the introduction of the Gloria and the three masses at Christmas, depend upon an interpolated passage in the Chronicle of Eusebius, and a spurious sermon of the bishop himself. The edict of 1788 again brought him into difficulties; and on account of his vote in the trial of Schulze he was sentenced to suspension for three months, and a fine to the insane-asylum. Nevertheless, in 1792 he was able to publish his Die Religion der Volkstommenen, which represents the very perfection of rationalism. Christianity is there explained to have been, from the very day of its birth, in a steady process of development, which will not stop until it has made the Christian religion a religion of morals only. TELLIER, Michael le, b. at Vire, Normandy, Dec. 16, 1648; d. at La Fleche, Sept. 2, 1719. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1661; devoted himself for some time to the study of history, but threw himself finally into theological polemics. By his attacks on the Jansenists he acquired so great a notoriety that he was made a provincial of his order, and appointed confessor to Louis XIV. after the death of Pere La Chaise in 1709. He was fanatical, ambitious, unimpressible, a master of diplomatic trickery; and he had the old king completely in his power. The destruction of Port-Royal, the condemnation of Quesnel's writings, the enforcement of the bull Unigenitus, were among his principal exploits. After the death of Louis XIV. he was banished from the court.

TEMPERANCE. Our English word "temperance" is of Latin derivation. Its etymological meaning may perhaps be best understood by observing that the verb "temper." Plastic substances, mortar for example, are properly tempered when their ingredients are mixed in correct proportions, with the result of making the article exactly fit for the purposes for which it is designed. A steel tool is tempered to a standard degree of hardness. Temperance as a virtue is the virtue of being properly tempered for the purposes for which a human being is designed. One possesses this virtue in the proportion in which he possesses desirable elements of character desirably balanced.
This is, therefore, a good word by which to translate the Greek Ἐρυθισμός of the New Testament. The latter term properly denotes mastery over one's self. A self-controlled character is a well-tempered character, at least in some important respects.

But it is not without good reason that the word has come to be prevailingly restricted to a much narrower meaning. The use of intoxicating drinks is so conspicuously connected with the loss of self-mastery and of proper balance, that we very naturally connect the terms "temperance" and "intemperance" peculiarly and almost exclusively with the drinking-habit.

Intoxicants, in the form of wine and beer at least, have been known from the earliest historical times; and the vice of drunkenness has also been known. This is evident from the familiar biblical instances of Noah, Nabal, and others, from the figures on the early Egyptian monuments, from the Greek myths concerning Bacchus, and from many other sources. But the conditions of the problem of drunkenness have been very materially changed within the last three centuries by the extent to which the art of distillation has been developed. This art has long been known and practised; but it was not until a comparatively recent period that it came to be the powerful means it now is for increasing and cheapening the world's stock of intoxicating beverages.

According to an article by Professor Theodore W. Dwight, LL.D., published in the Independent of April 27, 1882, the earliest recognition of the existence of distilled liquors to be found in English legislation is in the year 1629; and it was not until much later in the seventeenth century, that these came to be recognized as in general use. As might have been expected, their introduction greatly increased the evils of intemperance. Says the Encyclopaedia Britannica, in its article on "Gin":

"In the early part of the eighteenth century, gin-shops multiplied with great rapidity in London; and the use of the beverage increased to an extent so demoralizing, that retailers actually exhibited placards in their windows, intimating that there people might get drunk for a penny, and that clean straw, in the portable cellars, would be provided for customers."

Contemporaneously with these changes in the facilities for the practice of drunkenness occurred certain other changes in men's habits of living, which also greatly affected the question of the use of alcoholic drinks. Coffee was known as early as 875 A.D., but it was first brought from Abyssinia into Arabia early in the fifteenth century. Coffee-houses were established in Constantinople about the middle of the sixteenth century, and in London in 1652; and, before the close of the seventeenth century, coffee was a customary beverage in Europe. Chocolate and tea came to be generally used as beverages within a few years of the same time.

In both these directions, throughout Europe and America, and parts of Asia and Africa, the generation of men who were of middle age about the year 1700 witnessed a radical revolution in the conditions of human life. In their childhood, fermented alcoholic drinks were the one resource of men, not only for purposes of intoxication, but for all the purposes for which tea, cocoa, and coffee are now employed. They lived to see the fermented beverages largely superseded, in the one use of them by distilled liquors, and in the other use of them by the hot drinks which have ever since been on our tables. In their childhood, however, plenty wine and ale may relatively be said to have been, they were yet scarce enough so that habitual drunkenness was beyond the reach of any except those who had access to the cellars of the rich. Before they died anybody could get drunk, at any time, for a penny. It should be added to this, that the use of tobacco became general during the seventeenth century. And as having a real, though less direct, connection with the temperance problem, we must count all the marvellous discoveries and inventions which have rendered human life in these later centuries so utterly different from what it ever was before.

These radical changes of condition naturally led to corresponding changes in the convictions of men in regard to the use of alcoholic drinks. To trace the development of these convictions is to sketch the centuries by the extent to which the art of distillation has been developed. This is, therefore, a good word by which to connect the terms "temperance," and censures these for the narrowness of their treatment of the subject. He insists on the difference between the drinking of "unmixed wine," which will produce intoxication, and that of lighter or diluted wines. He calls unmixed wine a poison and a medicine. He condemns the drinking contests which were common in his day. He exposes in emphatic pictures the vileness of drunken orgies and riots, and the deterioration of health and morals which results therefrom. He holds that "the wise man will never of his own accord think fit to enter upon a contest of hard drinking, unless there were great things at stake, such as the safety of his country, or the honor of his parents," etc. But he none the less indorses what he represents to be the current opinion; namely, that a wise man will occasionally get drunk. His helplessness when drunk no more disproves his wisdom than if it resulted from a bilious attack, or from sleep, or from death. Philo intimates that the opposite opinion is quite respectably defended, but proves, to his own complete satisfaction, that it is indefensible. His explanation of the doctrine of the serpent is, that "Moses looks upon an unmixed wine as a symbol, not of one thing only, but of many; namely, of trifling, and of playing the fool, and of all kinds of insensibility and of insatiable greediness, . . . and of a cheerfulness which comprehends many other objects," and the like. Philo's opinion does not seem to be at all that the Scriptures command drinking but condemn excess, but rather that they either commend or condemn, according to the aspect in which they look at the case; that is, they commend drinking, and even intoxication, when they associate these with cheerfulness and plenty, and condemn them when they look at them in connection with their bad results or accessories.

Philo's opinions concerning the drinking-habit are certainly those which have been commonly held until our own century. But, as far back as we can trace the matter, we also find a highly reputable line of opinion in favor of total abstinence from intoxicating beverages. Of this, in the eighteenth century, the distinguished Samuel Johnson is an instance. Somewhat earlier in the century, the author of Gil Blas sarcastically foretold that the patriotic forecast of the ancient politicians who established places of public resort, where water was dealt out gratis to all customers, and who confined wine to the shops of the apothecaries, that its use might be prohibited, but under the direction of physicians, and the wisdom of those who frequented these resorts, not for "swilling themselves with wine, but . . . for the decent and economical amusement of drinking warm water" (Adventures of Gil Blas, book ii., chap. 4). This sarcasm must have been aimed at opinions held by respectable contemporaries of Le Sage. In 1743 John Wesley, in his General Rules, mentions as sinful, "drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." It is said that in 1763 the trustees of the Colony of Georgia, who were living in London, enacted that "the drink of rum in Georgia be absolutely prohibited, and that all which shall be brought there be staved." In the Colonies and in Great Britain, during that century, there were several instances of similar legislation. Samuel Pepys, in his Diary, 1659–69, figures as an inconsistent total abstainer. Going back with a bound to the times of Philo, we find him asserting (Treatise on Drunkenness, ii.) that "great numbers of persons, who, because they never touch unmixed wine, look upon themselves as sober," yet display the same foolishness, senselessness, lack of self-control, and the like, which are displayed by a drunken person. Still earlier familiar instances are those of the Rechabites and the Nazarites, of Samuel and Samson.

Nearly up to our own times, therefore, the world has been aware of the dangers and evils attendant upon the use of inebriating beverages, has been in possession of the idea of total abstinence from them, and has been compelled to look upon total abstainers with high respect, but has, on the whole, approved the use of such beverages, not merely in what is now sometimes called moderation, but up to the line of occasional and discreet drunkenness. The revolution of opinion, at least as a great and controlling movement, began in America. A representative incident will indicate its nature. The incident is taken from the Collections of the Cayuga County Historical Society, 1882.

Joseph Tallcot was a member of the Society of Friends, living in a few miles south of the town of Auburn, N.Y. In all that vicinity, in 1810, the crops were so short that poor people found it difficult to procure breadstuffs for food. At the same time, Tallcot noticed, the distilleries kept in operation. He says,—

"The circumstances affected me not a little, and induced me to write an address to the sober and influential part of the community, inviting them to a serious consideration of the melancholy situation, and the evils and calamitous consequences of intemperance. I insisted that nothing short of the example of that part of society which gives habits to the world, of abstaining altogether from the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes, would correct this alarming evil."

It occurred to Joseph Tallcot to offer his views for the consideration of the members of the Presbyterian synod of Geneva at one of their meetings held in Geneva. In his narrative he says,—

"I found my way to the house of Henry Axtell, the Presbyterian clergyman of that place. His brethren from the surrounding country soon began to come into the village, and call on him, not where they might find entertainment among their friends. The master of the house appeared very hospitable, inviting them to partake of his brandy; which they did, with what was doubtless good disposition. He turned to me, and pleasantly said he supposed it would be useless to invite me to partake, considering my business. I as pleasantly replied, that we had been in the same habit, but, seeing the evil of it, we had abandoned it, and I hoped they would do the same."

Joseph Tallcot read his paper, first before a committee, and afterward before the synod, and went his way. The synod, after duly considering it, published it, with resolutions "fully approving it, and solemnly declaring, that from that time they would abandon the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes; that they would speak against its common use from the pulpit, . . . and use their influence to prevail with others to follow their example."

Similar incidents were transpiring in different parts of the country and among people of various religious persuasions. In 1790 two hundred farmers of Litchfield, Conn., had pledged themselves not for that season not to use distilled liquors in their farm-work. In 1794 Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia published his Medical Inquiry, in which he insisted that the use of distilled liquors as a beverage ought to be entirely abandoned. In 1812 the Presbyterian General Assembly made a deliverance "not only against actual intemperance, but against all those habits and indulgences which may have a tendency to produce it." In the same year the General Association of Connecticut recommended entire abstinence from ardent spirits; while the Consociation of Fairfield County adopted the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks whatever, especially for "those whose appetite for drink is strong and increasing." The Temperate Society, formed at Moreau, N.Y., 1808, and the Boston Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, 1813, were not total abstinence bodies. In 1818 the Presbyterian Assembly planted itself squarely on the principle that men ought to "abstain from 'even the common use' of ardent spirits." In 1823 President Nott of Union College published his...
Sermons on the Evils of Intemperance. In 1828 the American Temperance Society was organized, The National Philanthropist was started, and Dr. Lyman Beecher published his Six Sermons on Intemperance. In the same year Rev. Calvin Chapin, in The Connecticut Observer, advocated abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, and not from distilled spirits merely. From about 1836 this principle came to be generally accepted by the reformers.

The spread of the movement was very rapid in Great Britain, and marvellously rapid in the United States. Societies, local and general, were organized. Temperance books, pamphlets, and newspapers were published in great numbers. Public meetings were held. The pledge was circulated. Total abstainers came to be counted by millions. Lancashire, Eng., contributed the word "teetotal" to characterize the reform. In 1840 six hard drinkers in Baltimore suddenly signed the pledge, and started the "Washingtonian" movement. In a few months, about 1838, the Irish Roman-Catholic priest, Father Mathew, administered the pledge to near a hundred and fifty thousand persons in Cork alone. He was eminently successful in temperance-work in different parts of Great Britain, as well as in the United States, which he visited in 1849.

Fuller accounts of the movement in this country may be found in the article on Temperance Reform, in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia, and in the article by Professor J. W. Mears, in the Presbyterian Review for 1881, p. 500; while the temperance article in the Library of Universal Knowledge is pretty full in regard to the movement in Great Britain. To these sources the present article is indebted for a few of its facts and dates.

Many seem to suppose that the effort to secure the legal prohibition of the liquor-traffic is a later and more advanced stage of the temperance reform than the efforts for total abstinence; but this is only true in a modified sense. We have already seen, that there was prohibitory legislation for the Colony of Georgia as early as 1733. Most of the other earlier attempts to restrict the use of liquors were accompanied either by demands for the legal restriction of their sale, or else by actual legislation for that purpose. Dr. Beecher's Six Sermons emphatically declared the remedy for intemperance to be "the banishment of ardent spirits from the list of lawful articles of commerce," and invoked the interference of legislation to this end, as well as of public sentiment (edition of 1828, p. 64). As the numbers of the temperance men increased, they became more and more pressing in their demands for legislative remedies. During the decade beginning about 1848, they found it easy to carry the elections in most parts of the United States. Rigid prohibitory constitutional amendments were gradually inserted in the state constitutions, and local option laws in a few instances where general prohibition could not be obtained. It proved easier to enact laws, however, than to execute them. In most cases they have either been pronounced unconstitutional, or repealed, or allowed to become a dead letter.

The passage of these laws may, perhaps, be regarded as the culmination of one great movement of temperance reform. The subject has not since been so prominently before the public. This is doubtless to be accounted for, in part by the fact that it has ceased to be a novelty, in part by the fact that the advocates of temperance have unwisely allowed their attention to be too largely diverted from the great issues at stake to the minor points in which they differ among themselves, and in part to the presence of other public questions of absorbing interest, notably those connected with our civil war. Many imagine that the temperance movement is receding, but there is no sufficient evidence that such is the case. The larger part of the increase of our population for forty years past has been of immigrants and their descendants; that is, of classes of people who did not participate in the great reform movement. During the same time there has been a drifting into the large towns, which have always been centres of temptation. Though our population has trebled, those classes of it among whom the reform achieved its principal successes have not increased in any thing like that ratio. In these circumstances, if the proportion of our total abstainers to our whole population were now half as large as it was forty years ago, that would probably indicate that the reform had held its own. But doubtless the ratio is at least as large now as it was then, instead of being much smaller; and this indicates, on the whole, a decided and steady progress. Among the Irish members of the Roman Church, in particular, the gain is very marked and gratifying; and it seems to be even more so in Great Britain and the different parts of Europe.

In the temperance work of the past thirty years, the Sons of Temperance, the Good Templars, the Rechabites, and other so-called secret temperance organizations, have been quite prominent. The various red-ribbon and blue-ribbon movements are familiar to all. Organizations of women, as well as of men, have made their influence felt in what have been described as praying "crusades" in the places where liquors were sold, in working with voters for better laws, and doubtless yet more effectively in the establishing of friendly inns, coffee-houses, and the like, and in securing temperance sermons and addresses, circulating temperance literature, forming temperance schools, and introducing temperance instruction into Sunday schools. Possibly the work now done, though less public than formerly, is not less in amount, nor less effective.

For some years renewed attention has been paid to the legislative aspects of the subject. The laws recently enacted in Michigan, which attempt to restrict the traffic by a high special tax, without the form of a license, seem to many the best available kind of legislation; while prohibitory constitutional amendments such as have lately been approved by the popular vote of Kansas and Iowa are advocated by others. Experiments have been tried in what are known as civil damage laws, by which those who sell intoxicating drinks are held responsible for certain of the evils thereby produced. Such laws were passed in Wisconsin as early as 1849, and in some of the other States at a much later date. In regard to all these, temperance-workers need to keep in mind that they cannot afford to cheapen the sanctity of law by the passage of infeasible or carelessly framed laws, however just; nor to concede that even a license-law (and much less any other restrictive law) is at all of the nature of a sanction to the traffic; nor in the least to intermit their attempts to save the fallen, or to commit the young to temperance principles and habits, for the sake of giving effort to the securing of legislative changes.

The movement, from the beginning, has been, in the main, earnestly and reverently religious. Here and there, men who dislike the Bible and the churches have contrived to use the new temperance doctrines for venting their dislike; but such instances attract attention principally because they are exceptional. For a generation past, the habitual use of inebriating drinks has been so rare among the members of the distinctively Protestant churches, that the few who use them attract notice to themselves thereby; though this is less the case, perhaps, in the great cities than in the country.

In the earlier stages of the movement, as we have seen, there were several rapid advances, one after the other, in the doctrinal position of temperance men. At first the idea was to secure abstinence from excess in the use of alcoholic beverages, then abstinence from ardent spirits as distinguished from fermented liquors, and finally abstinence from all drinks that would intoxicate. This last stage defines historically the term "total abstinence." This term properly denotes, not abstinence from every thing which contains alcohol, but from every thing which so contains alcohol that it might possibly produce drunkenness; not abstinence from such liquids for all purposes, but abstinence from them as a beverage or common drink. The abstinence is total in that it is from all common drinking, and not merely from getting drunk; and in that it is from all sorts of inebriating drinks, and not from ardent spirits only. The historical total-abstinence position does not place the very light wines and beers on the same footing with those that will intoxicate; though it disapproves of them as a matter of prudence, on account of their relations to the stronger beverages. For similar reasons, it demands that alcohol shall not be recklessly or unnecessarily used for medicinal or other purposes; while it sharply distinguishes these from its use as a beverage.

This doctrine is almost universally held by temperance men in America, and is widely held elsewhere. There are some exceptions. A few men who are doing honorable and effectual service against drunkenness advocate the propriety of the so-called moderate drinking of alcoholic beverages, as opposed to teetotalism; but the general opinion is against them. There is almost an equal unanimity in basing the duty of total abstinence upon our obligation to deny ourselves for the benefit of others, as presented in 1 Cor. viii. 13 and elsewhere, and generally acknowledged by casuists of all schools. The advocates of total abstinence everywhere would probably agree in affirming the existence of this obligation, and in regarding it as absolutely sufficient to cover the whole case.

But, except in these two points, they differ so radically as greatly to hinder their work. They flatly contradict one another in their teachings as to the grounds of the duty of total abstinence, its limits, and some of the means by which it is to be urged. It is evident that some of them, at least, are seriously mistaken. The cause has now no more pressing need than that its advocates should carefully and candidly sift the arguments they are accustomed to use, throwing away the bad, and retaining only those that will endure testing.

In the physiological argument, for example, it is sometimes held, on the one side, that alcohol is properly a food, and a genuine stimulant, and, on the other hand, that it is merely an irritant poison. But with alcohol, as with other substances, this may depend on the quantity of the alcohol, the presence of other ingredients, and the condition of the body when the use is taken. Joseph Cook asserted, in his lectures in Boston, in 1882, that the tables of certain insurance-companies which insure total abstainers in one class, and moderate drinkers in another, show that there is a distinct and considerable difference of longevity in favor of the former. This and similar facts conclusively prove that alcohol habitually taken in an intoxicating beverage is deleterious, even when it does not lead to intorci- tiveness. Nevertheless, alcohol is commonly believed to have a genuine medicinal use, though it is a dangerous medicine. And while the experience of some generations of total abstainers proves that it is never necessary as a food, the most trustworthy experiments seem to show, that, in minute quantities, it is sometimes harmless, and even salutary. It would not be easy to determine the percentage of alcohol necessary to render a beverage intoxicating. But, from the considerations just mentioned, it seems clear that the using of dilutions in which alcohol is contained in quantities clearly less than that percentage is a very different thing from using intoxicating drinks. Our war, let us remember, is not against alcohol, but against intoxicating drinks. Doubtless the two are so related as to render it prudent to abstain from even the very light wines, beers, and ciders. But we ought to remember that this obligation, unlike that to refuse the stronger beverages, depends on local and temporary conditions. It would have very little weight, for example, in the state of things which existed in the world prior to about the year 1700. Again: it is argued, on the one hand, that literature, ancient and modern, recognizes two different meanings of the word "wine;" namely, fermented grape-juice, and unfermented. The common reply to this is a sweeping and contemptuous denial that the word is ever used to denote uninoctisrating juice of any kind. The facts proved are, that preparations of unfermented grape-juice have been well known among many peoples, that they have sometimes been used as beverages, and that the name "wine" has been frequently applied to them, though certainly not in such a way as to establish this as one of the current and natural meanings of the word.

As a rule, both the parties in this discussion sturdily ignore any distinction between the terms "fermented," or "alcoholic," and "intoxicating." But the existence of precisely this distinction is the one fact of real importance which the evidence adduced in the discussion abundantly proves. In the history of the grape a very important part is played by wines — sometimes of cheap and ordinary quality, and sometimes very choice — which contained alcohol in such quantities and combinations as to render the wine agreeable, but absolutely unintoxicating. It is these unfermenting wines, which, with some confusion of thought as to their relations to the grape-jellies, have been mistaken by many for wines without alcohol.

Men who are accustomed to recognize the Bible as an inspired rule of conduct have been compelled to try to reconcile its occasional approval of wine, in the example of Jesus at Cana, for example, with its repeated and sweeping denunciations of wine. Those who hold that the word "wine" may equally well mean either the fermented or the unfermented juice of the grape, think that, when the Bible approves of wine, it must be held to refer to that which is unfermented. Their opponents, denying the distinction, commonly assert that the Bible approves of the drinking of intoxicants, but disapproves of excess. The opinion thus denied is certainly erroneous; but, as certainly, that substituted for it does not follow from the premises. Philo, as we have seen, held the different theory, that the Scriptures approve wine-drinking in certain aspects of it, but not in others. It would be easy to construct other theories as plausible as either of these. The discussion of this question properly belongs, not to this article, but to that on Wine. It is sufficient here to say, that we must look for a better solution of it than has yet been offered. Meanwhile, whatever solution we may adopt, it will still be true that the specific precepts concerning wine, found in the Scriptures, may not apply in the changed conditions of our modern civilization; while the scriptural principles on which our obligation to total abstinence is based are at all times applicable.

stone foundation (1 Kings vi. 36), and contained Joachin and Boaz, which were twenty-three cubits high. The temple was also surrounded by a triple story of chambers, each of which stories was five cubits high. The lowest story of the chambers was five cubits, the middle six, and the third seven cubits wide. The difference of the width arose from the circumstance that the external walls of the temple were so thick that they were made to recede one cubit after an elevation of five feet; so that the scarcement in the wall of the temple gave a firm support to the beams which supported the story without being inserted into the wall of the sanctuary. The entrance to these stories was from without. The windows, which are mentioned in 1 Kings vi. 4, served chiefly for ventilation; since the light within the temple was obtained from the sacred candlesticks. In the Holy of holies were no windows, because "the Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness" (1 Kings viii. 12). The temple was wainscoted with cedar-wood, which was covered with gold. The boards within the temple were ornamented by beautiful carvings, representing cherubim, palms, and flowers. From 2 Chron. iii. 5, it appears that the greater house was also ceiled with fir. The doors of the oracle were composed of olive-tree; but the doors of the outer temple had posts of olive-tree, and leaves of fir (1 Kings vi. 31 sq.). Both doors, as well that which led into the temple as that which led from the holy to the Holy of holies, had folding leaves; the aperture being closed by a suspended curtain. The lintel and side-posts of the oracle seem to have circumscribed a space which contained one-fifth of the whole area of the partition; and the posts of the door of the temple, one-fourth of the area of the wall in which they were placed (1 Kings vi. 31 sq.).

Within the Holy of holies stood only the ark of the covenant between two cherubim; but within the holy were ten golden candlesticks, and the altar of incense, and a table for the shew-bread. The temple was surrounded by a court of priests (2 Chron. iv. 9). This, again, was surrounded by a wall consisting of cedar-beams placed on a stone foundation (1 Kings viii. 36), and contained the altar of burnt offering, the brazen sea, and ten brazen lavers. From the court of the priests, which is called (1 Kings vi. 36) the inner and (Jer. xxxvi. 10) the upper court, a few steps led into the lower court of the people, which is called (Ezek. xl. 17) the outward and (2 Chron. iv. 9) the great court. Both courts were paved. Doors overlaid with brass led into the outer court. On the east was (Ezek. xxvii. 13) the brazen gate. From 2 Kings xv. 35 and 2 Chron. xxvii. 3, Jotham built the "higher gate" of the house of the Lord. A "gate of foundation" is mentioned (2 Chron. xxiii. 5). Near the eastern gate, inside of the court of priests, probably stood the brazen scaffold which Solomon had built for the dedicatory prayer (2 Chron. vi. 13), and which afterwards probably served as the king's stand (2 Kings xi. 14, xxiii. 9). There was perhaps an acent by which the king ascended to his own house (1 Kings x. 5; 2 Chron. ix. 11). The court for the sabbath (2 Kings xvi. 18) probably served as a kind of protection against the sun and wind.

After the temple was finished, it was consecrated by the king. It remained the centre of public worship for all the Israelites, only till the death of Solomon, after which ten tribes forsaking this sanctuary. But even in the kingdom of Judah it was from time to time desecrated by altars erected to idols (comp. 2 Kings xxii. 4, 13). There was a treasury in the temple, in which much precious metal was collected for the maintenance of public worship. The gold and silver of the temple were, however, frequently applied to political purposes (1 Kings xv. 18 sq.; 2 Kings xii. 18, xvi. 5; it was inferior to the first). The temple was repeatedly plundered by foreign invaders; for instance, by Shishak (1 Kings xiv. 26), by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 Kings xiv. 14), by Nebuchadnezzar (xxviii. 18), and, lastly, again by Nebuchadnezzar, who, having removed the valuable contents, caused the temple to be burned down (xxv. 9 sq.) four hundred and sixteen years after its dedication.

The restoration of the temple was prophesied; and, fourteen years after the destruction of the Temple of Solomon, Ezekiel saw in a vision a new temple, which he describes in chaps. xli.-xliii.

II. The Second Temple. — In the year 536 B.C. Cyrus permitted the Jews to return to their country, and rebuild the temple, at the same time commanding that the sacred utensils which had been pillaged in the first temple should be restored, and that, for the restoration of the temple, assistance should be granted (Ez. i., vi. 2). The first colony which returned under Zerubbabel and Joshua, having collected the necessary means, and having also obtained the assistance of Phcenician workmen, commenced, in the second year after their return, the rebuilding of the temple. The Sidonians brought rafts of cedar-trees from Lebanon to Joppa, with the co-operation of the Samaritans, who, being thereby offended, induced the king, Smerdis, to prohibit the building. It was only in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (520 B.C.) that the building was resumed; and was completed 516 B.C. (Ez. iv.-vi.; Hag. i. 15). According to Ez. vi. 3, it was sixty cubits high and wide, thus larger than the Temple of Solomon; while, according to Hag. ii. 3, it was inferior to the first. The inferiority probably consisted in the absence of the ark and precious metals. Antiochus Epiphanes pillaged and desecrated it through idolatry (1 Macc. i. 21, iv. 38; 2 Macc. vi. 2). Judas Maccabeus repaired, furnished, and cleansed it, 165 B.C. (1 Macc. ix. 36; 2 Macc. i. 18, x. 3), whence the Jewish "feast of dedication" (John x. 22). He also fortified the temple mount (1 Macc. iv. 60, vi. 7). Alexander Jannaeus (about 106 B.C.) separated the court of the priests from the external court by a wooden railing (Joseph., Ant. XIII. 13, 5). In the year 83 B.C. Pompey attacked the temple from the north side, caused a great massacre in its courts, but abstained from plundering the treasury, although he even entered the Holy of holies (Ibid. XIV. 4, 2 sq.). Herod the Great, with the assistance of Roman troops, stormed the temple. 32 B.C., on which occasion some halls were destroyed (Ibid. XIV. 16, 2).

III. THE HERODIAN TEMPLE.—Herod, wishing to ingratiate himself with the Jews, undertook to raise a perfectly new temple. The work was commenced in the eighteenth year of his reign (20 or 21 B.C.). Priests and Levites finished the temple in one year and a half, while the courts required eight years. The out-buildings, however, were completed under Agrippa II. and under Albinus the procurator, in the year A.D. 64 (Joseph., Ant. XX. 9, 7). The structure of the temple is described by Josephus (Ant. XV. 11; Jewish War, V. 5), and in the Talmudic treatise Midrash. Already under Archelaus the courts of the temple became the scene of revolt and bloody massacres (Joseph., Ant. XVII. 9, 3; 10, 11). But the most dreadful scenes were during the last Jewish revolt (Joseph. War, IV. 5, 1; V. 1, 2, 3). In August of the year 70 the Romans rushed from the Tower of Antonia into the sacred precincts, the halls of which were set on fire by the Jews themselves. It was against the will of Titus that a Roman soldier threw a firebrand into the temple, which caused its conflagration. The Emperor Hadrian (A.D. 138) founded a Roman colony, under the name of Jerusalem, and dedicated a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus. Under the reign of Constantine the Great the Jews were severely punished for having attempted to restore the temple. In the year 383 the Emperor Julian undertook to rebuild the temple, but he was compelled to desist by flames which burst forth from the foundations. The temple ground, called by the Turks el Haram, is now occupied by a splendid mosque erected by Omar, es Sakara, south of which stands the mosque el Akra (formerly a Christian church).

TEMPORAL POWER. See CHURCH AND STATE; CHURCH, STATES OF THE.

TEMPUS CLAUSUM ("closed time," also feriavum or sacratum) is a canonical term denoting those days on which no noisy festivities are allowed to take place. Regulations of that kind naturally originated from the general conception of how a Christian festival ought to be celebrated; but already among the Israelites it was customary to prepare oneself for the solemn occasions by prayer and abstinence (Exod. xix. 5; 1 Sam. xxv. 4); and, as Paul indorsed the custom (1 Cor. vii. 5), the Church had thus a basis for further development given. The oldest laws relating to the subject date back to the middle of the fourth century. In its can. 51-52 the Council of Laodi- cea (351) forbade various festivities during the quadragesimal fast; and its ordinances were confirmed by the State. Later on, not only the quadragesima, but also advent and other feast cycles, were put down as tempus clausum: though the observance never became uniform during the middle ages. The Council of Trent (sess. xxiv., Nov. 11, 1563) introduced various mitigations of the rules. The evangelical churches generally adopted the ordinances of a tempus clausum, but the observance varied very much in the different countries. The conference of Eisenach (1857) gave much attention to the subject, and its protocols contain an exhaustive survey of the state of affairs in the different churches. In its general principle it recognized the Tempus clausum Quadragesima as a wholesome pedagogical institution, and recommended the careful maintenance of such remains of it as might still exist. TEN COMMANDMENTS. See DECALOGUE.

TENISON, Thomas, was born at Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, in 1638; and studied at Benet College, Cambridge University. In the year of his ordination (1662) he became a fellow, and in 1665 was appointed university preacher. The rectory of Holywell, Huntingdonshire, the living of St. Peter's Mancroft, Norwich, the vicarage of St. Martins-in-the-Fields, London, the archdeaconry of the metropolis, and the bishopric of Lincoln, successively fell to his lot; and in all these preferments he showed administrative power, for which he was more remarkable than for pulpit loquence. He was an active Churchman, and busy in matters connected with the Revolution of 1768. On the death of Tillotson, he was raised to the primacy, in which he made a considerable figure, both as to temporal and spiritual affairs. When William III. was absent from England in 1695, Tenison filled the post of a lord-justice, being first in the commission appointed by the sovereign for that purpose; but his actual power and political influence in that capacity must have been far below what accrued to some of the English archbishops in the middle ages. It was as president of the Upper House of Convocation that he had the most arduous duties to discharge, and the greatest trouble to endure. The Lower House was chiefly composed of High-Churchmen, unfriendly to the Revolution (which Tenison cordially approved), and advocating the independence of the Ecclesiastical Establishment in a way which he condemned. The Upper and Lower Houses of Convocation came into boisterous conflict; and scenes were enacted in the Jerusalem Chamber, the adjoining organ-room, the dean's yard, and Henry VII.'s Chapel, such as were disgraceful to the High-Church clergy, who figured as chief actors in the strife, and in which Tenison naturally resented these attacks, and, under what he deemed sufficient provocation, preached in 1740 his famous "Nottingham sermon," one of the most bitter and invective which was ever penned (Alexander), in which he lashed his ministerial brethren for their "hypocrisy." Tenison had a large following throughout the country, and able ministers were upon his side. The agitation lasted for many years. The presbytery of New Brunswick seceded from the synod of Philadelphia in 1741 (see art. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES, p. 1907). In May, 1743, Tennent was called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, then just started, made up of the admirers of Whitefield and the friends of the revival. But, although he remained their pastor till death, he did not repeat in his second charge the triumphs of his first. He was faithful and highly useful; but his preaching was quieter, and not so many souls came under his influence. His delivery was much less impassioned, due very probably to the use of a manuscript. In 1758 he raised in Great Britain some fifteen hundred pounds for the College of New Jersey,— a sum much beyond his expectations. Although he had contributed so largely to the disruption of the Presbyterian Church in 1741, he toiled to effect a reconciliation, and saw with great satisfaction the breach healed in 1758. Besides a memoir of his brother John (Boston, 1785), he published a volume of sermons (Philadelphia, 1743), and occasional sermons and pamphlets. See list in Log College, pp. 65 sq. — 3. William Tennent, brother of the preceding; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, June 3, 1705; d. at Freehold, Monmouth County, N.J., March 17, 1777. He studied under his father in Log College, and theology under his brother Gilbert in New Brunswick; was licensed by the presbytery of New Brunswick; ordained pastor of the church at Freehold, October, 1733, and held the position till death. He is the subject of several highly remarkable stories, of which the two most famous are, (1) that, while preparing for his examination for licensure, he fell sick, and had a trance which lasted three days, during which time he was, as he believed and declared, in heaven, and heard "utterable things." His friends thought he was dead, and were upon the point of burying him, notwithstanding the protestations of his physician, when he revived. He regained his health in a year, but had lost all his knowledge of reading and writing, much more, all his previous learning. After a time, however, he experienced "a severe shock in his head;" and his knowledge from that moment began rapidly to return, until all was regained. "For three years," he said, "the sense of divine things continued so great, and every thing else appeared so completely vain, when compared to heaven, that, could I have had the world for stooping down for it, I believe I should not have thought of doing it." No autobiographic record of his experiences during his trance is believed to be extant, although his intention to prepare one is known. See Log College, pp. 112-118, 147. (2) The second story is, that "one night, when Mr. Tennent was asleep in his own bed, he was waked up by a sharp pain in the region of the toes of one of his feet; and upon getting a light, and examining the foot, it was discovered that several of his toes had been cut entirely off, as if by some sharp instrument. But, though the wounded part was bleeding, nothing was seen of the excised members, nor any means by which such a dismemberment could have been effected" (Log College, p. 151). Mr. Tennent was a remarkable character, full of resources, indefatigable in Christian labors, wise in winning souls and to guide them to heaven. By his earnestness, eloquence, simplicity, and, above all, ardent piety, he made such an impression upon his neighborhood, that he is vividly remembered until this day. — 4. John Tennent, third son of William, sen.; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, Nov. 12, 1707; educated in Log College; licensed by the presbytery of Philadelphia, and settled at Freehold, N.J., Nov. 19, 1730, but d. April 23, 1732, leaving behind him a pleasant and godly memory. "His labors were attended with three notable qualities,— prudence, diligence, and success."

Two of his sermons, and memoir, were published by the Presbyterian Board, 1846; Sermons and Essays by the Tennents and their Contemporaries, Phila. (Presbyterian Board), 1848; Biographic Sketches of the Founder and Principal Alumni of the Log College, Phila. TER'APHIM (Gen. xxxi. 19, 34; 1 Sam. xix. 13, 16), a word found only in the plural form, derived, probably, from the Hebrew teraphim, "to be rich," designating a sort of household gods, or penates, in size and appearance approaching the human, which were regarded as dispensers of good-fortune, and shields against evil (Judg. xviii. 24). They were of the most prohibited sort, and used for oracles (Ezek. xxxi. 26; Zech. x. 2). The Israelites derived their use of them from the Arameans, and they existed in common private use, although forbidden in public worship, and always described by the prophets as idols, even after the Babylonish captivity (Gen. xxxv. 4; 2 Kings xxiii. 24; Zech. x. 2; Hos. iii. 4).

TERMINISM and THE TERMINISTIC CON- TROVERSY. Medieval theology, partially supported by Augustine, maintained that the terminus of grace coincided with the terminus of life; so that infants dying without baptism could not possibly escape hell. During the Reformation, this doctrine was modified in various ways. On the one side, the idea of the free, infinite grace of God expanded the terminus beyond life, and gave rise to the doctrine of apokatastasis: on the other side, the conviction that a certain interior, moral-religious state was an absolute condition of grace, narrowed the terminus down almost to a single moment of life, and gave rise to the doctrine of terminism. The Friends are the principal representatives of this doctrine, holding that every person has in his life a moment or period of visitation, but that no second opportunity is granted. The Pietists, with their suspicion against any late repentance, also insisted on a terministe doctrine; and in J. G. Böse, deacon of Sorau, it found a decided and eloquent spokesman. His Terminus peremtorius salutis humanae (Franfort, 1698) attracted much attention, and called forth a great number of refutations. The most remarkable among these were J. G. Neumann's Dissertatio de termino salutis humanae peremtorio (Wittenberg, 1700) and Dissertatio de tempore graciae divinae, etc. (Wittenberg, 1702). A. Böse died in 1700, A. Rechenberg, the son-in-law of Spener, took up the defence of his ideas, and a long and bitter controversy ensued with Ittig, professor at Leipzig; but the spreading rationalism finally bereft the question of all interest.

TERRITORIALISM denotes a theory of church government which originated with the Reformation, and according to which the ruler of a country has a natural right to rule also over the ecclesiastical affairs of his people. The theory found its principal supporter in Christian Thomasius, and its principal opponent in J. B. Carpzov. See the art. CHURCH AND STATE.

TERSTEEGEN, Gerard de, a Reformed Protestant in Rhenish Prussia, Nov. 25, 1687; d. at Mülheim in Westphalia, April 3, 1709; a famous mystic and hymnist of the Reformed Church. He was educated in the Latin school of his native city, and in 1713 apprenticed to a merchant in Mülheim, where he soon after made the acquaintance of Wilhelm Hoffmann, the leader of a pietistic revival movement in those regions. As he had found that mercantile business interfered with the development of his religious life, he left that profession in 1719, and learned the trade of a ribbon-maker. Settling in a lonesome little hut, he led a secluded and ascetic life, dividing his time between work and prayer, and distributing not only his earnings, but also the inheritance from his mother, among the poor. After 1724, his activity in the service of Christ assumed greater dimensions. He began to preach, and he engaged in literature. Travelling from one place to another, he visited many towns and cities in Holland and Westphalia, held conventicles, and formed minor communities. He translated numerous books of the French mystics, — Labadie, TERTIARIES.

TERTULLIAN (Quintus Septimius Florenz Tertullianus), b. at Carthage about 150 or 160; d. there between 220 and 240; the first great writer of Latin Christianity, and one of the grandest and most original characters of the ancient church. Of his life very little is known. His father held a high position (centurio, aide-de-camp) in the Roman garrison in Africa; but the Punic blood of his descent is visibly pulsating in his style, with its archaism or provincialisms, its glowing imagery, its passionate temper. He received an excellent education. He was a scholar. He wrote books in Greek, of which, however, none has come down to us. But his proportional skill and his method of reasoning shows striking marks of his judicial training. It is not known at what time he was converted to Christianity, nor how the conversion came about. But the event must have been sudden, decisive, transforming at once his whole personality; for afterwards he could not imagine a truly Christian life without such a conscious breach, a radical act of conversion: "funt, non nascentur Christiani."

In the Church of Carthage he was ordained a presbyter, though he was married,—a fact which is well established by his two books to his wife, though Roman-Catholic writers have tried to deny it. Rome he visited once or twice; and it may be that the laxity and corruption of morals which at that time (see Calixtus) he found prevailing in the Church of Rome contributed not a little to drive him into Montanism. Eight years after his conversion (about 202) he became the leader, the passionate and brilliant exponent, of that movement (see Montanism),—that is, he became a schismatic; and the story, that before his death he returned to the bosom of the Catholic Church, is very improbable, since his party, the Tertullianists, continued to exist. Nevertheless, in spite of his schism he continued to fight heresy, especially Gnosticism; and by these doctrinal works he is the teacher of Cyprian, the predecessor of Augustine, and the chief founder of Latin theology.

The writings of Tertullian are very numerous, though generally not very large. As they cover the whole theological field of the time,—apologetics against Paganism, polemics against heresies, and politics, discipline, morals, or the whole organization of human life on a Christian basis,—they give a picture of the religious life of the time which is of the greatest interest to the church historian. Their general character is stern and practical, but they are full of life and freshness. In his endeavors to make the Latin language a pliant vehicle for his somewhat tumultuous ideas, he now and then becomes strained, queer, and obscure; but as a general rule he is quick, precise, and pointed. And he is always powerful, commanding the attention of the reader, not begging it; always rich, lavish with wit and satire, sometimes, also, with sophism and lawyer's tricks; and always original. Though thoroughly conversant with Greek theology, he was entirely independent of it. Indeed, he forms a direct contrast to Origen, just as Montanism forms the opposite extreme of Gnostic doctrine. His idealism far in the direction of a Gnostic spiritualism, Tertullian carries his realism to the very verge of materialism. Rejecting the Platonic doctrine of pre-existence, and the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis, he adopts the traducianistic view of hereditary sin, teaches that soul and body originate at the same moment, and proves, metaphysically and from the Bible, that the soul has corporeality. Greek philosophy he despised; Gnosticism he considered a crime; and Neander has exactly hit the centre of his spiritual character by calling his monograph upon him, Antignosticus. But it is just this practical bearing of his ideas, even the most abstract ones, which places him at the head of the theology of the Western Church. The direction he thereby gave all theological speculation was never completely lost sight of, not even by the schoolmen.

The chronology of Tertullian's writings is very uncertain. The principal question, however,—Which of them belong to the Catholic period of his life, and which to the Montanist?—can in many cases be decided by internal criteria. To the Montanistic period belong Adversus Marcionem. De anima, De carne Christi, De resurrectione carnis, Adversus Praxeam, De corona militis, De fuga in persecutione, De monogumiti, De iucunditate, De pudicitia, etc.; certainly Catholic are his Apologeticus (A.D. 197), De penitentia, De oratione, De baptismo, Ad usurem, Ad martyrres, perhaps also, De praescriptione hereticoorum, etc.; while others, Ad Nationes, De testimonio animae, De palio, Adversus Hermogenem, etc., are of uncertain date. Among his apologetical writings, his Apologeticus, written during the reign of Septimius Severus, and addressed to the Roman magistrates, is the best defence of Christianity and the Christians ever written against the reproaches of the Pagans, and one of the most magnificent monuments of the ancient church, full of enthusiasm, courage, and vigor. It first clearly proclaims the principle of religious liberty as an inalienable right of man. Of his dogmatical works, the most important is his De praescriptione, developing as its fundamental idea, that in a dispute between the Church and a separating party, the whole burden of the evidence lies with the latter, as the Church, in possession of the unbroken tradition, is by its very existence a guaranty of its truth. His five books Adversus Murcianem, written in 207 or 208, are the most compendious and elaborate of his polemical works, and invaluable for the true understanding of Gnosticism. Of his moral and ascetic treatises, the De paenitentia and De spectaculis are among the most interesting; the De pudicitia and De virginibus velandis, among the most characteristic.

TEST ACT. The, an act passed by the English Parliament in 1683, which enacted that all persons holding public offices, civil or military, should receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the form of the Church of England, take the oaths of supremacy and uniformity, and declare their rejection of the doctrine of transubstantiation. It was entitled an "Act to prevent dangers from Popish Recusants," and was in the first instance leveled against the Catholics. The Toleration Act of William (1689), and especially the legislation of the present century (the Relief Act of May 8, 1828, and the Roman-Catholic Relief Bill of April 13, 1829), have abolished the hardships of the Test Act.

TESTAMENT, The Old and New, is the dominant name in the Occidental Church for the collection of Holy Scripture, and the translation of the Greek designation θείαν και καθιστήρ ψαλτήριον. The term arose in this way: ψαλτήριον means disposition; then the special form, a will; then, so far as the execution of this will depends upon certain conditions, an agreement bordering upon a covenant (συνθήκη), yet differing from it, since in a συνθήκη one of the parties takes the initiative, and lays down the terms. It was in obedience to a right instinct that the LXX translated νόμος by διάθεσις, instead of by συνθήκη; for thereby they expressed the correct idea, that in the "covenant" between God and man, God appears, not as one of the parties simply, but as the founder, who holds the other strictly to certain terms. Upon this idea that the argumentation in Gal. iii. 15 sqq. rests. The Itala translates "covenant" also by testamentum ("will"), where Jerome, in the Old Testament, uses σατανās. The Scriptures are τα βιβλία τῆς διαθήκης ("the books of the will"), which meant at first the Decalogue, then the whole law. For sake of brevity the phrase was replaced by the single word διάθεσις (so 2 Cor. iii. 14). In the Greek Church the expression was used of the whole canon (so Origen: εν αυτῷ, iv. 1). In old ecclesiastical Latin, besides testamentum, instrumentum was used (so Tertullian: Adv. Prax., c. 20). For the contents of the Old and New Testament, see CANON.

TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION (also called Suevia or Argitennsis), the Confession which the four cities of Strassburg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau, presented to the diet of Augsburg (July 11, 1530), and, properly speaking, the first Confession of the Reformed Church. Landgrave Philipp of Hesse in vain attempted to bring about a union between the two branches of the reformatory movement. But the Saxons princes and theologians obstinately excluded the representatives of the cities of Southern Germany suspected of Zwinglian heresy, from all their political and theological conferences. Under such circumstances, it became necessary for them to present a confession of their own. It was drawn up by Bucer and Capito, who arrived at Augsburg a few days after the presentation, by the Saxons theologians, of the Missio Augusatana, and consists of twenty-three articles. The formal principle of the Reformation — the absolute authority of Scripture in matters of faith, which, for irenic purposes, the Conf. Aug. passes by silently — is stated with great energy; and the whole instrument is distinguished, take the oaths of supremacy and uniformity, and declare their rejection of the doctrine of transubstantiation. It was entitled an "Act to prevent dangers from Popish Recusants," and was in the first instance leveled against the Catholics. TETRARCH (ruler of a fourth part of a kingdom, called a “tetrarchy”), according to the later Roman practice, the vassal-governor of portion of a province under the Roman sovereignty, but not necessarily of a fourth. The word “tetrarchy” first appears in connection with Philip of Macedon’s division of Thessaly into four parts (Demosthenes: Phil. iii. c. 36; Strabo, 9, p. 430). The term is applied to the ruler of each of the four Celtic tribes which lived in Galatia before the Roman conquest, B.C. 189 (Pliny, 5, 42). In the New Testament the term “tetrarch” is used as synonymous with king (Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; compare Matt. xiv. 9; Mark vi. 22). It is applied to three persons,—Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1), Herod Philip (Luke iii. 1), and Lysanias (Luke iii. 1).

TETZEL, Johann, b. at Leipzig between 1450 and 1460; d. there in July, 1519. He studied theology and philosophy at the university of his town. He was noted for eloquence, particularly in prayer and conversation. He was called “the silver-tongued” Thacher, and by Whitefield, “the young Elijah.” He belonged to many New-England literary and charitable institutions. On March 5, 1776, he distinguished himself at Watertown, Mass., by the annual oration which commemorated the massacre, when he spoke against standing armies. Of his numerous publications, mostly pamphlets, may be mentioned Observations upon the present state of the church and the theater, 1535, and was in 1543 appointed preacher at the Elizabeth Church in Marburg. He was an ardent Lutheran, but the experiences he made as a field-preacher gradually led him to the conviction that the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith was a most fertile cause of immorality. By his vehement attacks on that doctrine he caused much disturbance, and was finally deposed. He went to Italy, entered the Roman-Catholic Church in 1557, and died as professor in Freiburg, May 28, 1560. See NEWENHUSH: De Thameri vita et scriptis, Marburg, 1858.

THEATRINEN (Clerici regulares Theatini, or Cajetani, or Chistiuni), an order of regular clergy founded in Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century as a kind of counter-Reformation. The Pope and the higher clergy of the Roman-Catholic Church considered for a long time the Reformation a merely external incident, which could be made wholly ineffectual by re-organizing the clergy, and raising it in the estimation of the laity; and for this purpose the order of the Theatines was founded in 1524 by Cajetan of Thiene, Bishop Caraffa of Theater or Chieti (afterwards Paul IV.), and Boniface of Colle. It was confirmed by Paul III., 1540, and by Pius V., 1568. The members renounced all property. They lived neither by labor nor by begging, but simply by what Providence bestowed on them. They had convents in Rome, Naples, Venice, Milan, and other Italian cities. They also spread to Poland, Germany, and France; but their number was always small. They made some attempt at missionary labor in Tartary, Georgia, and Circassia, but without any result. Two female orders, founded in 1838 and 1810 by Ursula Benincasa, were by Urban VIII. and Clement IX. united with them. See HELVET.: Hist. des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols.

TETZEL, Johann, b. at Leipzig between 1450 and 1460; d. there in July, 1519. He studied theology and philosophy at the university of his town. He was noted for eloquence, particularly in prayer and conversation. He was called “the silver-tongued” Thacher, and by Whitefield, “the young Elijah.” He belonged to many New-England literary and charitable institutions. On March 5, 1776, he distinguished himself at Watertown, Mass., by the annual oration which commemorated the massacre, when he spoke against standing armies. Of his numerous publications, mostly pamphlets, may be mentioned Observations upon the present state of the church and the theater, 1535, and was in 1543 appointed preacher at the Elizabeth Church in Marburg. He was an ardent Lutheran, but the experiences he made as a field-preacher gradually led him to the conviction that the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith was a most fertile cause of immorality. By his vehement attacks on that doctrine he caused much disturbance, and was finally deposed. He went to Italy, entered the Roman-Catholic Church in 1557, and died as professor in Freiburg, May 28, 1560. See NEWENHUSH: De Thameri vita et scriptis, Marburg, 1858.

THEATRINES (Clerici regulares Theatini, or Cajetani, or Chistiuni), an order of regular clergy founded in Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century as a kind of counter-Reformation. The Pope and the higher clergy of the Roman-Catholic Church considered for a long time the Reformation a merely external incident, which could be made wholly ineffectual by re-organizing the clergy, and raising it in the estimation of the laity; and for this purpose the order of the Theatines was founded in 1524 by Cajetan of Thiene, Bishop Caraffa of Theater or Chieti (afterwards Paul IV.), and Boniface of Colle. It was confirmed by Paul III., 1540, and by Pius V., 1568. The members renounced all property. They lived neither by labor nor by begging, but simply by what Providence bestowed on them. They had convents in Rome, Naples, Venice, Milan, and other Italian cities. They also spread to Poland, Germany, and France; but their number was always small. They made some attempt at missionary labor in Tartary, Georgia, and Circassia, but without any result. Two female orders, founded in 1838 and 1810 by Ursula Benincasa, were by Urban VIII. and Clement IX. united with them. See HELVET.: Hist. des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols.

THEATRE, The, and the Church. Dramatic poetry is of heathen origin. Neither biblical authority nor biblical interdiction of the drama can be found. The Old Testament contains all other kinds of poetry—epic, lyric, didactic, and idyllic—except dramatic poetry, although in Job the power of the devil is shown in the form of a debate. The form of the tetralogy, or four-play, is of heathen origin. It was introduced from the Greeks among the Jews. Antiochus Epiphanes (176-164 B.C.) was the first to venture to erect a theatre at Jerusalem. Herod the Great followed his example by inviting Greek players to his court, and erecting a theatre at Cesarea. Both these attempts to domiciliate theatrical spectacles in Judaea were met with Spener made a distinction between good and bad plays. Pastor Reicher of Hamburg in 1681 issued his work against the theatre, Theatriomania oder Werke d. Finsterniss in den öffentlichen Schau-spielen ("theatre-mania, or works of darkness in the public plays"). At a later age Jean Jacques Rousseau threw himself, with the zeal of a Puritan or Pietist, into the ranks, in opposition to the theatre, and in a tract of 1758 sternly condemned it. In Germany, Lessing opened a new period for the drama, and sought to make it a moral power; but in 1777, in a letter to his brother, he complains that actors look to their support, and care little about their art as such. Schiller and Goethe lent their powerful influence to the stage, and clergymen who would have dared to speak out against it from the pulpit were warned and checked by the civil authorities. In the present century, such writers on ethics as De Wette, Nitzsch, and Rothe, have discussed the moral side of the theatre; and the deeper study of Shakespear and of Dante has also brought into prominence of dramatic representations. Without going into the question, we will content ourselves with quoting from Rothe's Ethics:

"Our theatre certainly stands in need of a reformation from the base upwards; but the way to reach it is certainly not for Christians to denounce the stage as unchristian, and then to withdraw from it all sympathy and support; for the, as Spener says, is the Christian's theatre, and the Christian's home of immorality beyond the reach of reclamation."

THEINER, Augustin, b. at Breslau, April 11, 1804; d. in Rome, Aug. 10, 1874. He studied theology, and afterwards canon law, at the university of his native city, and published, together... with his brother, Die Einführung der erzeugten Ekelnologia bei den christlichen Geislichen (Altenburg, 1828, 2 vols.), which was put on the Index. Afterwards, however, he made his peace with Rome, entered the Congregation of the Oratory, and was in 1855, by Pius IX., appointed conservator at the papal archives. But during the Council of the Vatican he was by the Jesuits accused of procuring documents from the archives for the bishops in opposition, and removed from his position. He was, a very instructive and, though not a very learned, very popular writer; published a new edition of the Annales of Baronius, with continuation, and Geschichte des Pontificats Clemens XIV., 1852; Vetera Monumenta Poloniae et Lituaniae, 1860-64, 3 vols.; Acta genuina Concilii Tridentini, 1874, 2 vols. See GISIger: Pater Theiner, und die Jesuiten, 1875.

THEISM. Theism in its etymological and widest acceptation is a generic term for all systems of belief in the existence of the Divine. Thus understood, it includes pantheism, polytheism, and monotheism, and excludes only atheism; but this acceptation of the term is rare. Common usage has determined that theism must be identified with monotheism, and consequently opposed to polytheism and pantheism, as well as to atheism.

In this sense, the one here adopted, it is the doctrine that the universe owes its existence, and continuance in existence, to the wisdom and will of a supreme, self-existent, omniscient, righteous, and benevolent Being, who is distinct from and independent of what he has created. The articles on Deism, God, and Infidelity, published in previous volumes of this encyclopaedia, treat more or less either of theism or of its history. To these the reader is referred, as the writer of this article wishes to avoid repeating what has already been said.

There has been much discussion as to the historical origin of theism. Herbert of Cherbury, Cudworth, Creuzer, Ebrard, and others have learnedly argued that monotheism was the primitive form of religion. Lubbock, Tylor, and the majority of recent anthropologists, maintain that monotheism can be proved to have been everywhere preceded by polytheism. Schelling and Max Müller have held that the starting-point of religion was henotheism, an imperfect kind of monotheism, in which God was thought of as one, only because others had not yet presented themselves to the mind,—a monotheism of which polytheism was not the contradiction, but the natural development. Pantheism, the belief that all things and beings are but transient phenomena of one divine substance, the only and absolute Reality, has also been frequently represented to be the earliest phase of religion. And, when all that has been adduced in favor of these opinions is examined, there may be seen, perhaps, to be ample room for yet another opinion; namely, that the present state of our knowledge is not sufficient to enable us to determine what the primitive religion was. Science and faith stand at certainty as to the primitive condition of men, and until it has done so cannot pronounce with certainty as to the primitive religion of men. The Book of Genesis distinctly informs us of direct manifestations of God to the primitive man, Adam, and therefore that Adam knew God; but it does not appear to inform us how much he knew of God, and whether, for example, his knowledge was monotheistic or henotheistic.

The question as to the psychological origin of theism is, perhaps, more important than that as to its historical origin; but the two questions are scarcely separable. Some trace theism to such external agencies and media as revelation, instruction, and tradition; and these have undoubtedly been the sources of much knowledge, and of most important knowledge, regarding God and divine things; but they have not imparted to man natural powers of knowing God, and a certain kind of affinity to divine things. A revelation in words or signs, relative to religious objects, made to a purely passive and entirely empty mind, would be meaningless. Instruction implies the exertion of powers which can understand and profit by it. Tradition can only carry what has already been originated, and will not carry far any thing to which the mind is constitutionally indifferent and uncongenial. Others refer theism to internal but entirely non-rational sources. Thus it has been traced to mere feelings,—to fear by Lucretius, to desire by Feuerbach, to the sense of dependence by Schleiermacher, etc. It is obvious, however, that all these feelings presuppose apprehensions and judgments, and are valid only in so far as they have the warrant of intelligence. Max Müller, in his Hibbert Lectures, traces the idea of God to a special faculty of religion,—"a subjective faculty for the apprehension of the infinite," "a mental faculty, which, independent of, nay, in spite of, sense and reason, enables man to apprehend the infinite under different names and under varying disguises." This view will not bear a close scrutiny. The infinite, as an implicit condition of thought, is not more involved in religious than in other thought. We cannot think any thing as finite without implying the infinite. Space cannot be thought of except as extensively, nor time except as protensively, infinite. As a condition of thought, the infinite is involved in religious knowledge, only so far as it is involved in all knowledge. On the other hand, as an explicit object of thought, it is not present in the lower forms of religion at all, which exist only because the thought of infinity is not associated in the religious consciousness with that of Deity, except where reflection is somewhat highly developed; and, even in the highest stages of religion, it is only apprehended as one aspect of Deity. Infinity is not God, but merely an attribute of the attributes of God, and not even an exclusively divine attribute. The hypothesis that the idea of God is gained by intuition or vision is proved to be erroneous by the fact that the idea of God, and the process by which it is reached, are capable of being analyzed, and therefore not simple; and, likewise, by the variety and discordance of the ideas of God which have been actually formed. The apprehension of God seems to be only possible through a process which involves an idea that is essential in the human constitution,—will, intelligence, conscience, reason,—and the ideas which they supply,—cause, design, goodness, infinity. These are so connected that they may all be embraced in a single act, and coalesce into one grand idea. The theistic inference, although a complex process, is a thoroughly natural one, similar in char-
In order to determine within what limits, no materialism can be apprehended either directly or indirectly, either in himself or through media; the theist must meet the agnostic, who always relies on some erroneous theory of knowledge. Further: elaboration of theism calls for the most careful consideration of how far the chief categories of nature and thought itself. Can the intellectual men attain to a knowledge of God? Is it so stipulated that such a being as God is supposed to be from the beginning, either directly or indirectly, either in himself or through media? Theist, as he must meet the agnostic, who always relies on some erroneous theory of knowledge. Further: elaboration of theism calls for the most careful consideration of how far the chief categories of nature and thought itself.

Fifthly, the relationship of theism to philosophy has to be determined. If there be no philosophy except a phenomenalism or positivism which rests on criticism and agnosticism, there can clearly be no theism, no theology of any kind. The materialism which proclaims itself a monism, and therefore a philosophy, not only transcends science as much as any theological doctrine, but contravenes the findings of science. A philosophy which rises above such materialism must necessarily be, to some extent, a religious philosophy. It will find that there are only two plausible ways of conceiving the first principle,—the monotheistic or the pantheistic. The theist has to show that the only satisfaction of philosophical reason is to be found in the personal God of his religious faith. The philosophical view and the religious view of the universe must harmonize, and even coalesce, in a comprehensive theism.

A history of theism embraces (1) A survey of heathen thought regarding God so far as it has approximated to the theistic idea. Hegel’s Philosophy of Religion, Bunsen’s God in History, Freeman Clarke’s Ten Great Religions, the St. Giles Lectures on the Faiths of the World, still more, the series of Sacred Books of the East, and others. (2) A view of the progress of the idea of God from the beginning to the end of the biblical record of revelation. To attain such a view is an entirely biblicotherological task, with which all treatises of biblical theology are more or less occupied. The second volume of Ewald’s Doctrine of the Bible concerning God is entirely devoted to the theme. (3) An account of the development of theistic thought in the Christian world. The best published account is that contained in the last three volumes of R. Bobba’s Storia della Filosofia rispetto alla Conoscenza di Dio da Tutele sino ai Giorni Nostri, Lecce, 1873. The literature has been so far indicated in the articles on THEISM, GOD, etc.; and it is so extensive that a more general view cannot usefully be attempted. [To it is to be added, Robert Flint: Theism, Edinburgh, 1877, 4th ed., 1883; Samuel Harris: The Philosophical Basis of Theism, N.Y., 1883; George F. Fisher: The Grounds of Theistic and Christian Thought, N.Y., 1883.] R. Flint.

THEOCRACY, the “rule of God,” in contradistinction to monarchy, democracy, aristocracy, etc., was first applied by Josephus to designate the peculiar state organization of the Jews. As the Mosaic law was at once the direct expression of the theistic principle, it is with every science. No positive science leads to results which seem ultimate to reason, but only to results beyond which the method of the science does not carry us. The view of the constitution of matter with which chemistry must be content to close its inquiries is no more self-explanatory than the one with which it began them. The laws of development reached by biology are as mysterious as were the facts which have been reduced under them. Is reason to affirm that the sciences lead to reason, or merely that the special methods of each science carry us only so far, that the conclusions of the sciences are data of philosophy, and also of natural theology?
the will of God and the civil law of the people, God was, indeed, the ruler of the Jewish state. The name may, however, justly be applied to any people occupying the same stage of political development; that one, namely, at which no distinction has as yet been reached between religious and civil legislation.

THEODORA is the name of two Byzantine empresses. The earlier exercised considerable influence on the history of the Greek Church. — I. Theodora, b. 508; d. June 12, 548; the wife of Justinian I., 527-505. She was a native of Cyprus, but came early in life to Constantinople with her parents. Her father was a bear-trainer. She herself became an actress, and that of the worst possible notoriety. She accompanied Hecelebus as his companion, when he was made prefect of the African Pentapolis; but she was soon after dismissed, and she returned to Constantinople in a state of destitution. She profited, however, by the experience, became studious of decent appearances, and having incidentally become acquainted with Justinian, the heir-apparent to the throne, she completely captivated him by her beauty, her many social charms, and her real mental superiority. After the death of the Empress Euphemia, he married her (525), and after his accession to the throne he made her co-regent. Justinian hated the Monophysites, and considered it one of the denunciations of Agapetus, Bishop of Rome, she was suspected, however, by her own son, and complete ignorance, a prey to his own unbridled passions and corrupt caprices; and a conspiracy between him and Bardas compelled her to lay down the crown after a reign of thirty-six years. She was suspected, however, by her own son, and shut up in a monastery, where she died shortly after, in 565. See the literature under Image-Worship.

THEODORE is the name of two popes. — Theodore I. (642-649) was a Greek by birth. As a decided adversary of the Monothelites, he excommunicated Paulus, the Patriarch of Constantinople in 645, and recognized Pyrrhus, who, deposed himself as a Monothelite, had recanted in Rome. When restored to his see, Pyrrhus returned to Monothelitism, and Theodore then also excommunicated him. In 649 he convened a synod in Rome, which condemned the Typus. He wrote an Epistola synodica ad Paulum, and an Exemplar propositionum . . . adversus Pyrrhus. See the art. Monotheliti8m, — Theodore II. (897) was a Roman by birth. He reigned only twenty days.

THEODORIC, St., was, according to Gregory of Nyssa (Oper., Paris, 1615, tom. ii. p. 1002) a Syrian or Armenian by birth, and served in the Roman army when the persecution of Maximin and Galerius began. Discovered, and brought before the pagan court, he refused to recant, was sentenced to death, and burnt. He is commemorated by the Greek Church on Feb. 17, by the Roman on Nov. 19.

THEODORUS, surnamed Gratius, b. in Jerusalem; educated in the monastery of St. Saba, and ordained a presbyter there; was in 818 sent to Constantinople by the Patriarch Thomas of Jerusalem, in order to defend the worship of images, and that he did, so regardless of circumstances, that he was thrice scourged and banished; the last time to Apaneas in Bithynia, where he died. A Nicephori Disputatio written by him, a THEODORE LECTOR.

2825 THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA.

Theodore of Mopsuestia, b. at Antioch about 355; d. at Mopsuestia, in Cilicia secundum 428 or 429; one of the chief leaders of the Alexian school of theology. As a preparation a juridical career, he studied philosophy and rhetoric under the famous Libanius, but at the time he made the acquaintance of Chrysostom; and the religious enthusiasm of the latter inflamed him, a continuation down to the time of Justin the Elder; but it has perished. Only fragments it have been preserved by John of Damascus, Ius, and Nicephorus Callisti: they have been blotted in Paris, 1544, and at Canterbury, by Reading, 1720.

THEODORE LECTOR, one of the last of the Greek Church historians; was lector in the church of Constantinople in 525. He wrote a Historia Tripartita,—extracts from Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret; but it has never been published. Much importance was attached to him, a continuation down to the time of Justin the Elder; but it has perished. Only fragments it have been preserved by John of Damascus, Ius, and Nicephorus Callisti: they have been blotted in Paris, 1544, and at Canterbury, by Reading, 1720.

The exegetical principle of Theodore, as well as the position he took in the Pelagian contro-verse, gives a preliminary idea of his christological views. While presbyter of Antioch, he wrote fifteen books on the incarnation, and a special work against Eunomius. Thirty years later on, as bishop of Mopsuestia, he wrote a work against Apollinaris. These books have perished, with the exception of a few fragments; but we know that he was the true representative of the speculative theology of the Alexandrian school, and that, in contradistinction to the Alexandrian school, he emphasized in his christology the completeness of the human nature of Christ, and its indelible difference from his divine nature. It was, however, not he, but Nestorius, who was destined to carry this view to its last consequences, and fight for it in the world. At the Council of Ephesus (431) no one dared to attack Theodore directly; and, though open attacks were made upon him shortly after by Marius Mercator and Rabulas of Edessa, it took more than a century before the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in weaning the Eastern Church from its great teacher, and branding his name with the stamp of heresy. See Nestorius and Three-Chapter Controversy.

Lit. The Greek fragments of Theodore's works were published by Bardenhewer, Berlin, 1875; Fritzsche, Halle, 1847; and, with the Latin remains, in Bude's Theod. Mops., 1836; Kleiner: Symbol. THEODORET, b. at Antioch towards the close of the fourth century; d. at Cyrus, or Cyrrhus, the capital of the Syriac province of Cynichestus, 457. He was educated in the monastery of St. Euprepius, near Antioch; ordained a deacon by Bishop Porphyrius; and elected bishop of Cyrus in 420 and 423. As a pupil of Diodorus of Tarsus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, he joined at the synod of Ephesus (431) the minority which deposed Cyril; but by the robber-synod of Ephesus (449) he was himself deposed, and banished to the monastery of Apamea. By the synod of Chalcedon, however (451), he was again restored to his see. He was a very prolific writer. Exegetical, historical, polemical, and dogmatical works, sermons, and letters by him, still exist. But his principal work is his Church History, comprising the period from 325 to 429, translated into French by Mathé (Poitiers, 1544). The first collected edition of his works was published by Sirmond (Paris, 1612, 4 vols. fol.), to which was added in 1656 by Jordanus containing the above things, his life by Garnier. There are also editions by Schulze (Halle, 1769-74, 4 vols.) and Migne (Paris, 1856-60, 5 vols.). See Roos: De Theodoretio Clementia et Eusebii compilatore, Halle, 1883, 69 pp.; A. THEODOSIUS (1) THE GREAT, Emperor of the East, Jan. 19, 370–Jan. 17, 395. He was a native of Spain, b. at Caesca in 346. He was educated in the camp; and it was his military exploits which induced Gratian to accept him as co-regent, and leave him the eastern part of the empire. Nevertheless, he exercised as great an influence on the religious as on the political affairs of the realm. He belonged to the orthodox party, and one year after his accession to the throne (Feb. 28, 380) he issued a decree which declared the Nicene confession of faith true and catholic; and threatened with severe punishments and depositions from it. Immediately after his entrance in Constantinople, he deposed the bishop, Demophilus, one of the leaders of the Arians, and banished him from the city; and, in spite of the riots of the Arian populace, he gave all the churches of the capital to the orthodox, and put a heavy penalty on the celebration, even in private, of Arian service. In spring, 381, he convened a synod in Constantinople,—the second ecumenical council, consisting of a hundred and fifty picked bishops. The thirty-six bishops belonging to the semi-Arian group, and forming the party of Macedonius, were at once brought to silence; and the council confirmed the Nicene Creed, adding the new clause of the procession of the Holy Spirit. The decrees of the council were followed by a number of imperial edicts depriving Christians of their property; and, though open attacks were made upon Theodore who relapsed into Paganism by the right of making a will, or inheriting a bequest, confiscating the property of the Manicheans unless they allowed their children to be educated in the Catholic faith, and forbidding the Eunomians and the Arians to build churches, and celebrate service. He also exercised considerable influence on the religious affairs of the West, especially after the overthrow of Maximus in 388, and the establishment of Valentinian II., and still more especially after the crushing of the rebellion of Arbogast in 392, and the establishment of Honorius. He was a friend of Ambrose, and accepted with meekness a very severe rebuke from him. In order to avenge the assassination of Botericus, his governor in Thessalonica, he allowed over twenty thousand a decent burial. He deposed the bishop Porphyrius; and elected bishop of Cyrus in 420 and 423. As a pupil of Diodorus of Tarsus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, he joined at the synod of Ephesus (431) the minority which deposed Cyril; but by the robber-synod of Ephesus (449) he was himself deposed, and banished to the monastery of Apamea. By the synod of Chalcedon, however (451), he was again restored to his see. He was a very prolific writer. THEODORIT. See Bible Versions, p. 281.

THEODULPH, surnamed Aurelianensis, one of those men whom Charlemagne invited from Italy to France for the advancement of science and art in the latter country. He was probably a Goth by descent. He came to Gaul at the latest in 781, and was made abbot of Fleury, and afterwards bishop of Orleans, where he died in 821. His literary character is not unlike that of Alcuin. He was a poet and a theologian. His theological works consist of minor treatises: De ordine baptismi, De spiritu sancto, etc., and capitularia for his priests, which show that he was very anxious for the establishment of schools. His THEOLOGIA GERMANICA is the name of a little book first discovered and published by thers. The first edition, of 1516, contains only one-fourth of the whole book; but the section, of 1518, is complete, and bears the title "Eyn Theologias," which has ever since been considered in use. Wherever the book went, it made new impressions, except in Rome, where it was put on the Index. No less than seventy editions of it have been required up to the present time. It has been translated into High and Low German, English, French, Walloon, and Latin. To this day, however, all editions were made in the same manner, which Luther used in his recent edition. In the middle of the present century another complete manuscript was discovered in the land, and published by F. Pfeiffer, Stuttgart, 1851, 3d ed., Gutersloh, 1853. [The best English translation is that by Susanna Winkler, London, 1834, new ed. 1834.] It is not known who is the author of this book; but it was originally written in the book itself that he was a priest, the author of the book corresponds closely with the works of Eckhart, Tauler, and Suso, for the sacrifice of one's own self, with all errors and vanities, in order to better fulfill the work of God. See Lisco: Die Lehre der Theologien, Stuttgart, 1837, and Pfeiffer "Deutsch." JULIUS HAMBERGER.

THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION. Among the ancient Hebrews, from the time of Samuel on, there were schools of the prophets, in which young men were trained for the office of public instruction. Education among the Hebrews.) The first instruction in the temple service was their subsequent duties. At a later date the congregations were the schools of the Jews. The first received their special training, first in the hool of John the Baptist, and then in that of Jesus. Paul alone had a rabbinical education. Necessity of special training was felt early in the school of God. See Lisco: Die Lehre der Theologien, Stuttgart, 1837, and Pfeiffer "Deutsch."

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES. Sketches of (arranged according to denominations, in alphabetical order, and chronologically under each). Each sketch is prepared by a professor or secretary of the institution. Some sketches are anticipated in earlier arts.

I. Baptist. (1) Hamilton Theological Seminary is situated in Hamilton, N.Y., a suburban village of rare beauty and healthfulness, distinguished as an educational centre among Baptists, where in one system of schools are trained one-tenth of all ministerial students of that denomination in the United States. The seminary was founded in 1819 by far-sighted pioneers, who were actuated by a profound conviction, then widely felt, of the necessity of higher education for the ministry. It is the oldest Baptist seminary in the country, has sent out the largest number of graduates, and largely through the same instrumentalities. The seminary owns a domain of a hundred and thirty acres, on which are several residences, two large four-story school-buildings, and a site for another finer structure, which is to be speedily erected. Its impress upon alumni is claimed to show the following characteristics,—a biblical theology, an educative pulpit, a missionary spirit, and remarkable adaptation to the varied phases of real life. The course of study embraces six departments under as many regular professors, with series of lectures by other eminent scholars, and covers a period of three years, with abundant provision for special students. The seminary owns a domain of a hundred and thirty acres, on which are several residences, two large four-story school-buildings, and a site for another finer structure, which is to be speedily erected. Its financial condition is excellent. Productive funds insure the payment of all salaries and current expenses. Numerous scholarships, and generous contributions from the churches, provide for the needs of indigent students. Carefully selected working libraries are accessible, to the extent of 20,000 volumes. The presidents have been, Rev. Drs. D. Hascall, N. Kendrick, J. S. Maginnis, G. W. Eaton, and E. Dodge, the present head. The chairs of instruction have been occupied by such eminent teachers as Dr. James O. True. Among them are pastors in Boston, New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, in the Southern States, and on the Pacific coast. Forty have been professors in colleges and theological seminaries, and about the same number have become foreign missionaries. Of the six hundred students connected with the English department, nearly four hundred have completed the full course, including the study of the Scriptures in Hebrew and Greek.

For several years the financial resources of the seminary were entirely inadequate, and altogether disproportionate to its usefulness. In 1888 the funds amounted to only $100,000, and there were no permanent buildings. In 1889 Mr. John B. Trevor was the largest donor of Trevor Hall, a spacious dormitory building, which cost $32,000. In 1879 Rockefeller Hall, containing convenient lecture-rooms, a chapel, a fire-proof room used as a library, and costing $38,000, was erected by Mr. John D. Rockefeller. Other prominent benefactors are Messrs. Jacob F. Wyckoff, Joseph B. Hoyt, John H. Deane, Charles Pratt, and James O. Pettengill. At present the invested funds amount about $50,000. The land and buildings are valued at $125,000.

The library, numbering nearly 20,000 volumes, is well arranged, and of exceptional value for theological study. It comprises the entire collection of Neander, the church historian; and during the last five years $25,000, the timely gift of Mr. William Rockefeller, has been expended in the purchase of carefully selected works.

Subscriptions or personal statements of doctrine is never required of either students or instructors. Persons of all evangelical denominations who give satisfactory evidence of personal religious experience, and of a call to the Christian ministry, are admitted to the privileges of the institution. BENJAMIN O. TRUE (Professor).

(2) Newton Theological Institution. See art. by Dr. Hovey, vol. ii. p. 1842.

(3) Rochester Theological Seminary.—This institution was established at Rochester, N.Y., in 1859. It is supported and controlled by Baptist churches, and is strictly a professional school for the higher education of candidates for the Christian ministry. The seminary has no organic connection with the University of Rochester, either in management or instruction, though both institutions were founded at about the same time, and largely through the same instrumentalities.

The influence and characteristics of the seminary during the first twenty years of its history are due, more than to any other one man, to Ezekiel G. Robinson, D.D., LL.D., for many years instructor in both homiletics and systematic theology. Among other past instructors, are included Drs. Thomas J. Count, Horatio B. Hackett, John H. Raymond, Asahel C. Kendrick, and George W. Northrup. There were at first only two professors. There are now, in the English department alone, six active professors; viz., Rev. Augustus H. White, D.D. (since 1872 president), Rev. Howard Osgood, D.D., William A. Stevens, D.D., LL.D., Rev. T. Harwood Pattison, D.D., Rev. Adelbert S. Coats, and Rev. Benjamin O. True.

The German department, altogether distinct from the regular English course, was founded in 1854. It is the only school in America expressly designed to train men for the ministry in German Baptist churches. Since 1858 Rev. Augustus Rauschenbusch, a pupil of Meander, has had charge of this department.

A peculiarity of the seminary has been the widely separated sections of country from which its students have come, and to which they have gone. During its entire history of thirty-two years, about eight hundred persons have entered the institution. They have come from sixty-five colleges, and from four-two states and countries. Among them are pastors in Boston, New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, in the Southern States, and on the Pacific coast. Forty have been professors in colleges and theological seminaries, and about the same number have become foreign missionaries. Of the six hundred students connected with the English department, nearly four hundred have completed the full course, including the study of the Scriptures in Hebrew and Greek.

For several years the financial resources of the seminary were entirely inadequate, and altogether disproportionate to its usefulness. In 1888 the funds amounted to only $100,000, and there were no permanent buildings. In 1889 Mr. John B. Trevor was the largest donor of Trevor Hall, a spacious dormitory building, which cost $32,000. In 1879 Rockefeller Hall, containing convenient lecture-rooms, a chapel, a fire-proof room used as a library, and costing $38,000, was erected by Mr. John D. Rockefeller. Other prominent benefactors are Messrs. Jacob F. Wyckoff, Joseph B. Hoyt, John H. Deane, Charles Pratt, and James O. Pettengill. At present the invested funds amount about $50,000. The land and buildings are valued at $125,000.

The library, numbering nearly 20,000 volumes, is well arranged, and of exceptional value for theological study. It comprises the entire collection of Neander, the church historian; and during the last five years $25,000, the timely gift of Mr. William Rockefeller, has been expended in the purchase of carefully selected works.

Subscriptions or personal statements of doctrine is never required of either students or instructors. Persons of all evangelical denominations who give satisfactory evidence of personal religious experience, and of a call to the Christian ministry, are admitted to the privileges of the institution. BENJAMIN O. TRUE (Professor).

(4) The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary was established in 1859 at Greenville, S.C., and removed in 1877 to Louisville, Ky. Its plan of instruction is quite peculiar, all the studies being elective. In 1856 Rev. James P. Boyce, D.D., in a published address entitled Three Changes in our Theological Institutions, urged that provision should be made in the same institution to give the most extensive and thorough...

Theological course to those desiring and prepared for it, and at the same time a good theological course to those who can study only the English Scriptures, and also opportunity for any student to select special studies at will. This was considered to meet the wants of the Baptist ministry, which includes men of all grades of general education.

In order to fulfill these conditions, the whole range of theological study was divided into eight independent schools, some of them having two separate departments; as Old-Testament English and Hebrew, New-Testament English and Greek, Systematic Theology English and Latin. Among these schools and departments, each student selects, under the guidance of the professors, according to his preparation, and the number of years he can give to theological studies. Some remain only one session (of eight months); others, two, three, four, or even five years. A separate diploma is given in each school to those who have pursued its studies, and have passed very thorough written examinations, intermediate and final. The students have rested in all the schools receive at least the diploma of "full graduate;" and those graduated in all except the departments of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Theology, receive the diploma of "English graduate." Some of the students thus pursue an unusually extensive course, such as would not be possible where there is the same curriculum for all. It is noticed that all alike elect to attend the "English" classes in the Bible and theology, the most scholarly finding these highly profitable along with their more erudite studies.

Beginning in 1859 with a good endowment (subscribed by Southern planters) and a large attendance, the seminary was suspended, 1862-65, by the war, and began again in 1865 with seven students and no endowment, the private bonds between them were put up as security for their exertions and sacrifices, with a steadily increasing attendance, till, in 1882-83, there were a hundred and twenty students from twenty different States. The invested endowment has reached over $200,000, besides $80,000 in real estate. Most of this has been contributed at the South, but several friends in New-York City and elsewhere have given very generous assistance.

(5) The Baptist Theological Union, located at Chicago, was organized in 1863, its object being to establish and sustain a theological seminary. In 1865 W. W. Cook of Whitehall, N.Y., pledged fifteen hundred dollars per year, for twenty years; this increased to $100,000. The effort to do this was successful. In 1883 J. D. Rockefeller of Cleveland subscribed $40,000, on similar conditions. The completion of this subscription gives the seminary a living endowment. T. W. GOODPEED (Sec'y).

(2) Bangor Theological Seminary was chartered by the Legislature of Massachusetts in February, 1814. It was designed to provide an evangelical ministry for the State, then the District, of Maine. It was originally located at Hampden on the Penobscot River, where it began its work in October, 1816. The founders of the seminary had especially in view the needs of sta-

dents desirous of entering the ministry without a previous college-training. Accordingly the original course of study occupied four years; the first two chiefly devoted to literary and classical studies, and the last two to the strictly theological branches. In 1849 the institution was removed to Bangor, at the head of navigation on the Penobscot, then a town of twelve hundred inhabitants. In 1850 the first class, numbering six students, was graduated. In the same year the District was separated from Massachusetts, and became the State of Maine. It was in territory larger than the rest of New England, and had a population of three hundred thousand, largely of Puritan descent. In 1827 the classical department was given up, the period of study reduced to three years, and the curriculum made similar to that of other theological institutions in this country.

During the sixty-seven years of its existence, the seminary has numbered among its instructors not a few men eminent for piety, scholarship, and influence. Not to speak of any still living, mention may be made of Jehudi Ashmun, afterwards distinguished by his labors in the service of the American Colonization Society; the scholarly and accomplished Leonard Woods, jun., afterwards president of Bowdoin College; George Shepard, so widely known and eminent as a pulpit-orator; and Enoch Pond, to whom, more than to any other man, the success of the institution was due, and who for fifty years was connected with it as professor and president.

The seminary has sent out more than six hundred graduates, and given a partial theological education to nearly two hundred more. These men have made a faithful and useful body of workers. The majority of them are still living, and are at their posts all over the land, or laboring in foreign countries, in pulpits of many denominations and every grade of eminence.

The seminary has been from the first connected with the Congregational denomination, its board of trustees and faculty being members of Congregational churches. Its aim, however, has always been practically Christian, rather than denominational. Its founders favored the type of theology known as "New-England theology," but Bangor has never been identified with any particular school or system. At present the seminary draws its students, not only from Maine and other parts of New England, but also from the Dominion of Canada, especially the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The faculty as now constituted numbers five professors. The number of students in attendance has varied from twenty to fifty.

(4) THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE OF CONNECTICUT (now usually known as HARTFORD THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY), the fourth in age, and second in number of students of denominational seminaries in the United States. Established in 1854 at East Windsor Hill, Conn.; the laying of the cornerstone of the building, and the inauguration of Dr. Tyler (see art. BENNET TYLER), taking place May 13. Removed to Hartford in 1865, where a commodious building was erected through the munificence of Mr. James B. Hosmer. The cornerstone of Hosmer Hall was laid in May, 1879, and the building occupied early in 1880. The appointments and arrangements of the edifice are admirably adapted for its purpose. The library-building is connected with the main hall; the chapel, recitation-rooms, dormitories, dining-hall, etc., are under the same roof; the well-equipped gymnasium is a detached building. For an account of the origin of the institute, see art. BENNET TYLER. The Pastoral Union of Connecticut chose ten trustees annually (since 1850 one-third retire each year); the former body elects its own members, who are required to subscribe to its creed, to which the professors give their assent annually. The three professors first chosen were Bennet Tyler, D.D., Jonathan Cogswell, D.D., and William Thompson, D.D. The last-named survives, and continued in active service until 1881, when he became professor emeritus. There are at present (1883) five active professors, an instructor in music and voice-building, and one in gymnastics. A course of lectures on the Carew foundation is given each year.

The number of students in all amounts to 496; at present there are 33 in attendance. Twenty-eight graduates have become foreign missionaries. The theological position of the seminary has from the beginning been Calvinistic, and the creed is in accordance with the accredited formularies of New-England Congregationalism. The present faculty recognize, more fully than did the founders of the institute, the exegetical and historical point of view; but the doctrinal result is substantially the same. The views on the doctrine of original sin are probably more Augustinian than those of Dr. Tyler; and the entire range of theological science is now regarded, in its higher unity, as centering in the person and work of Christ.

The methods of instruction are less formal than in many institutions,—fewer lectures and more constant drill, together with a greater demand for individual labor on the part of the students.

The chief benefactor of the seminary has been Mr. James B. Hosmer, who not only gave the present building, and endowed the chair of New Testament exegesis, but left a considerable sum to the general fund. In the early years of the institute, annual contributions of small sums were made by many persons who were in sympathy with its aims. Recently Mr. Newton Case of Hartford has given largely to increase the library, which now numbers over 35,000 volumes, many of them rare and valuable. It is particularly rich in editions of ancient codices, early printed New Testaments, patristic literature, and works of the sixteenth century. The collection of periodical literature, especially of missionary intelligence, is large and increasing. M. B. RIDDLER (Professor).

(6) THE CHICAGO THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY dates its existence from the fall of 1854. It was the first of the four denominational seminaries located at Chicago, or in its vicinity, and had its origin in a deep and widespread conviction that the time had come when the churches of the West should more largely provide and educate their own ministers. After several preliminary conferences, it was organized Sept. 26, 1854, by a Theological Seminaries.

The seminar has had a vigorous growth, and now furnishes to theological students ample privileges and instructions. With its able faculty, its central position, and the large and continually increasing number of churches under its supervision, the church in all parts of the United States, to provide a school for the education of its candidates for holy orders, whose plan and situation would meet the wants of the church in all sections of the country. Bishop Bowen of South Carolina, Bishop White of Pennsylvania, and Bishop Hobart of New York, were most active in its behalf. In accordance with a plan drawn up by the two latter bishops, foreshadowing the institution and its several professorships, as they exist to-day, it was opened in St. Paul's Chapel, May 1, 1819. The first professors were the Rev. Samuel H. Turner, D.D., and the Rev. Samuel F. Jarvis, D.D. But notwithstanding the munificent offer by Dr. Clement C. Moore, of the ground on which the buildings now stand, and the efforts of a large committee, subscriptions came in so slowly, that the General Convention, in 1820, removed it to New Haven, where it was thought it might be supported at less expense than in New York. That this was an error soon made itself apparent; and the death of Mr. Jacob Sherred of New York, who left a noble legacy of $60,000 to a seminary to be established in New York, gave the Convention an opportunity to bring it back in 1822, and thus correct a mistake which would have proved fatal to its continuing a general institution. It was re-opened in a building belonging to Trinity School, on the corner of Canal and Varick Streets, in February, 1822, with twenty-three students and six professors. The constitution laid the foundation of a widely extended system of theological instruction. It provided not only for the seminary in New York, but for branch schools under its control in different parts of the country. In its board of trustees, which is elected in part by the General Convention and in part by certain dioceses, the church in all parts of the United States is represented. The course of study is to be prescribed by the House of Bishops; and each bishop is not only ex officio a trustee, but a visitor of the institution, with all the powers that that involves. Thus the interest, as well as the rights, of every part of the Episcopal Church in its general seminary, is amply secured and protected.

The corner-stone of the first building, now known as the East Building, was laid July 28, 1825, by Bishop White, in the presence of a large assembly of clergy and citizens, on the ground given by Dr. Clement C. Moore. At that time the site was an apple-orchard on the banks of the Hudson River, which at that time flowed a little east of the present Tweed Courthouse.

In 1834, to accommodate the increasing number of students, a second building, now known as the West Building, was erected.

But it was still the day of small things for the Theological Seminaries.

Episcopal Church in this country, as well as for the city. The large fortune now so common were unknown; and, in common with all our other collegiate institutions, it had to struggle to do its work with a very small and insufficient endowment, but always with the unimpeachable record, that not a dollar of its trust-funds has ever been lost. More than once in its history, in consequence of the growth of the city, heavy assessments have been laid upon it, which have absorbed all its available income; and it had not the providential testaments to great personal sacrifice, and some of the leading clergy of the city, voluntarily offered their services to the institution without remuneration, its trustees would have been compelled to close its doors. Thus it has gone on steadily with its work, until its graduates, which number more than a thousand, are to be found among the leading clergy of every diocese of the Episcopal Church, and on the roll-call of its alumni. It has a plan of a complete series of buildings for the future needs of the institution. They are to be of brownstone and brick, and in design similar to the collegiate buildings of Oxford and Cambridge; so arranged, that separate portions may be erected as memorials; and will, when finished, be an ornament to the city. The corner-stone of construction is Episcopal; but it would not deny its privilege to a sincere student of any denomination who desired to listen to the teaching given, and to enjoy its opportunities for reading and meditation. For religious services, its chapel, which is open twice daily,—at nine a.m. and five p.m., and the prayer-book, of church history, of the literature and interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures, of the Christian evidences and homiletics, of the Hebrew tongue, and of eloquence, are open daily, from ten A.M. to five P.M., for the use of the students, and others who wish to consult its treasures.

The faculty is composed of a dean and six professors, as follows:

The Rev. Eugene A. Hoffmann, D.D., Dean.
The Rev. Samuel Buel, D.D., Professor of Systematic Divinity, etc.
The Rev. Andrew Oliver, D.D., Professor of Biblical Learning, etc.
The Rev. Francis T. Russell, Instructor in Elocution.

(3) The Berkeley Divinity School, at Middletown, Conn. — This school takes its name from Dr. George Berkeley, who came to this country in his forty-fourth year, in 1728, with the hope of founding an American college, and who resided some two years at Newport, R.I. It was originally a department of Trinity College, Hartford; but in 1854 it was proposed to erect it into an independent institution. An act of incorporation was obtained for it from the Legislature of Connecticut; and with its own board of trustees it was located at Middletown, where it has since remained. The first class which graduated from it dates from 1850, and the number of its alumni now exceeds two hundred and fifty. Its patrons have so far endowed it, that it now maintains five professors, and has a library amounting to 17,000 volumes. Of course its instruction is Episcopal; but it would not deny its privileges to a sincere student of any denomination, who desired to listen to the teaching given, and to enjoy its opportunities for reading and meditation. For religious services, its chapel, which is a very commodious and beautiful building, is open twice daily,—at nine a.m. and five p.m. On Sundays the Holy Communion is administered, and sermons are occasionally delivered by the professors. The parish church is hard by, and the prayer-book, of church history, of the literature and interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures, of the Christian evidences and homiletics, of the Hebrew tongue, and of eloquence, are open daily, from ten A.M. to five P.M., for the use of the students, and others who wish to consult its treasures. The students that have been matriculated number nearly fourteen hundred, of whom about a hundred are at present in the institution.

The library, which is particularly rich in some departments of theology, contains 17,500 volumes, and upwards of 10,000 pamphlets. It is open daily, from ten A.M. to five P.M., for the use of the students, and others who wish to consult its treasures.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES. 2337 THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

TANT—EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN PHILADELPHIA. — This school is situated on Woodland Avenue and Fifteenth Street, just on the south-west edge of the city, less than three miles from the City Hall and the dome of the Pennsylvania State Capitol, which are at Penn Square, in the centre of the city. It is conveniently reached either by the steam-cars, from the Pennsylvania depot, or by horse-cars, from Chestnut Street.

Its present buildings were erected in 1882. They are situated on an elevated plateau, commanding a view of the city and of the country. They occupy a lot of ground with an area of several acres, fronting on the avenue, and having a fine old oak-grove in the rear. They are of three stories, constructed of stone, consisting of a centre building and two wings. They are supplied with gas, and warmed by steam throughout, with grates also in most of the rooms. In one wing is the kitchen department with laundry attached, and a dining-room for the students, also a gymnasium and bowling-alleys. In the other wing there are accommodation rooms for the dean and his family. There are also a reception-room, a reading-room, five or six convenient lecture-rooms, and rooms for forty students. The chapel is not yet built; but funds are already provided for its erection, and in the mean time a large and commodious room is fitted up for a chapel in the present buildings.

An informal training-school for candidates for the ministry had existed for two or three years before 1860, under the direction of the late Bishop Alonzo Potter. Upon the breaking-out of the Rebellion, and the consequent closing of the Episcopal seminary at Alexandria, Va., it was thought desirable to establish in Philadelphia a fully equipped theological seminary or divinity school. Funds were procured, professors were appointed, and in 1882 the school was incorporated.

There are five professors of as many departments, including the instructor in Hebrew; viz., of biblical learning, Rev. Dr. Hare; of systematic divinity, Rev. Dr. Goodwin; of ecclesiastical history, Rev. D. Butler; of homiletics and pastoral care, Rev. Dr. Meier-Smith; and of the Hebrew language, Rev. Mr. Du Bois.

The school has had students from Canada, the West Indies, Liberia, and from almost all parts of the United States, though very few from the Southern States proper; which is quite natural, as of course none came from them during the war, and at its close the Alexandria seminary was reopened. Out of nearly three hundred students matriculated, its graduated alumni number not quite two hundred; of whom two are bishops, and two others have declined the episcopate. The number of its students, however, cannot be expected to be very large, owing to the multiplication of theological seminaries, in the Episcopal Church, in all quarters of the country; and, had the re-opening of the Alexandria seminary been anticipated, this school might, perhaps, never have been established.

The institution is well endowed. Three of its professorships have independent foundations, and it has already a very valuable library of some 8,000 volumes.

As to its ecclesiastical position, it is that of moderate Episcopacy and conservative Churchmanship. It is liberal and evangelical in its teaching, adhering to the standards of the church's doctrine, but committed to no particular school or party. DANIEL H. GOODWIN (Professor).

(6) THE EPISCOPAL THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL OF MASSACHUSETTS, in Cambridge. — This institution was founded in 1867 by the gift of $100,000, by the late B. T. Reed of Boston. It was the result of an often expressed feeling, that there ought to be a seminary of the Episcopal Church in Cambridge, both to exert an influence in behalf of the ministry upon the many young men there, and also to embrace the advantages there offered for study. The school was incorporated at once, with a liberal charter, empowering it to confer degrees, and also prescribing for its government a Board of Trustees and a Board of Clerical and Lay Visitors. A staff of four professors was secured, with the late Rev. J. S. Stone, D.D., as dean; and the institution entered upon a career which has exceeded the hopes of its friends. So far, there are seventy-five alumni, from all parts of the country, and now at work in equally varied places. Twenty of the latter, who were elected as fellows, have already completed their courses and are twenty-two years old, embraces the branches prescribed by the canons of the church, but it is sought to study them in a more advanced manner than has been usual, and to take advantage of all progress in scholarship. In accordance with this, admission is restricted to bachelors of arts, or those who submit to an equivalent examination; and superior scholarship is rewarded by the degree of bachelor of divinity.

There is no organic connection with Harvard University; but the nearness of that institution brings manifest advantages, and the chapel of the school is the usual place of worship of such Episcopalians as are in Cambridge on Sunday.

The success of the school has led to the reception of munificent gifts; as follows, St. John's Memorial Chapel, from the late R. M. Mason; Lawrence Hall (the dormitory, for forty students), from Amos A. Lawrence; Reed Hall (for library and class-rooms), from the founder; Burnham Hall (the refectory), from J. A. Burnham. Adding to these the original fund and a legacy of R. M. Mason, and also subscriptions for annual expenses, the total value of gifts, hitherto, exceeds $600,000.

Besides this, the school has a reversionary interest in the estate of the founder, which will render it one of the most amply endowed seminaries in the land. G. Zabriskie Gray (Professor).

IV. LUTHERAN. (1) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE GENERAL SYNOD OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES, GETTYSBURG, PA. — The foundings of theological seminaries engaged the attention of the General Synod at its first convention in 1820. The realization of this effort was, however, not attained till a few years later, when Rev. S. S. Schmucker of New Market, Va., urged upon the Synod of Maryland and Virginia the enlargement of his private theological school into a general institution for the church. At the meeting of this body in 1825, he and the Revs. Charles P. Krauth and Benjamin Kurtz were appointed a committee to draft a plan for the immediate establishment of such an institution; and the action of this committee was the same year adopted, with some modifications, by the General Synod com-

vened at Frederick, Md. The General Synod appointed the first board of directors, and elected the first professor, Rev. S. S. Schmucker. The right of electing professors was thenceforth vested exclusively in the board, of directors, who are chosen by each synod in connection with the General Synod, to patronize the seminary, and contribute to its support. An official connection with the General Synod is maintained, and this continues the only theological school sustaining such a relation.

The board at its first meeting selected Gettysburg, Penn., as the location; and Professor Schmucker was inaugurated, and active operations began, in September, 1826. Although designed for the entire Lutheran Church in the United States, the seminary encountered strong prejudices and open hostility from the Lutherans not connected with the General Synod. It had consequently to struggle for years with formidable difficulties; and, in view of prevailing divisions, it has never commanded the support of the entire Lutheran community. The doctrinal basis was exclusively in the Augsburg Confession and the Smaller Catechism of Luther as "a correct exhibition of the fundamental doctrines of the word of God." The spirit of the institution has always been in substantial accord with the general type of American Christianity. Over six hundred students are enrolled among its alumni.

The Rice Lecture, in foundation, the income of which is devoted to an annual lecture on one of the twenty-one doctrinal articles of the Augsburg Confession. The Rice Lecture is a foundation providing for an annual lecture on "Methods of Ministerial Work." Special provisions have always been made for indigent students, and scholarships covering the expenses of the entire course of three years are at the disposal of the faculty. A full history of this seminary, by Dr. J. G. Morris, is contained in vol. vi. of The Quarterly Review of the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

E. J. WOLF (Professor).

(2) Concordia Seminary of St. Louis, Mo., is one of the institutions of the German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, the largest Lutheran body in America, and adjacent States. The oldest of the school is a gymnasium (college), and are acquainted with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, are taught theology according to the Lutheran Confessions (Concordia of 1580). The school was founded toward the end of the year 1839 by a number of Lutheran theologians (among them Rev. C. F. W. Walther), in the midst of a settlement of German Lutherans that had emigrated the same year from Saxony in Germany. At first it comprised a gymnasium and a theological seminary, and in 1849 was removed to St. Louis. In the following year it was granted by the Lutheran congregations of Perry County and St. Louis, that had hitherto supported the same, to the aforesaid synod, which had been organized in 1847. In 1853 it was chartered by the Legislature of the State of Missouri. In 1861 the gymnasium was separated from the theological seminary, which was moved to Fort Wayne, Ind., where it still flourishes; and a so-called practical seminary, owned by the synod at Fort Wayne, was removed to St. Louis, and combined with the Concordia Seminary. In 1875, however, the Practical Seminary was removed to Springfield, Ill. Up to the present time, about four hundred Lutheran ministers have in this institution (Concordia Seminary) received a thorough theological education, not including those of the Practical Seminary. The old building, erected during the years between 1830 and 1837, was taken down in 1882, and a new, large, splendid edifice erected, the dedication of which took place Sept. 9 and 10, 1883, in the presence of fifteen thousand people. Addresses were made in German, English, and Latin. The faculty at present consists of five professors and one reader. Dr. C. F. W. Walther was first ecclesiastical professor since the removal of the institution to St. Louis, is still its venerable president. The languages used in the lectures are the Latin, German, and English. The regular course, requiring three years, embraces logic, metaphysics, encyclopaedia and methodology, isagogics, hermeneutics, exegetic and cursory reading of the original text, dogmatics (including ethics and polemics), symbolism, church history (including history of doctrines, patristics, and archeology), catechetics and homiletics with practical exercises, pastoral theology, reading of select works of the Fathers, of English classical and recent theological writers, debates in Latin and English. Tuition is free. The institution is entirely sustained by synod: the students also, if poor, are liberally supported by the congregations. The present number of students is 103. The library contains about 5,500 volumes, mostly theological works. M. GÜNTHER (Professor).

(3) The Theological Seminary of the Evangelical Lutheran Church at Philadelphia.—In consequence of resolutions passed by the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States, at its meeting in Pottstown, Penn., Aug. 25, 1864, and at a special meeting held at Allentown, Penn., July 26 and 27, 1864, this seminary, after the appointment of a board of directors, and the election of the faculty (Rev. Drs. C. F. Schaeffer, W. J. Mann, C. P. Krauth, C. W. Schaeffer, G. F. Krotel), began operations Oct. 5, 1864, which since that time have been regularly continued. In the government of the seminary, other Lutheran synods, including those of the Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States in the endowment and support of the institution, have a pro rata representation, a right of which the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of the State of New York now avails itself. The seminary has sent out up to this time more than two hundred graduates; whilst a considerable number of students of various denominations gratuitously received instruction without graduating. The character of this seminary is clearly indicated by the official declaration, "that this institution shall be devoted to the interests of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. of the United States, and that its doctrinal character shall be unreservedly and unalterably based on all the Confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Of like tenor is the affirmation delivered of the professors before entering upon their duties. Instruction is given in the medium of the English and German languages. The large field of labor providentially intrusted to the care of the Lutheran Church requiring at the present time both those languages in Pennsylvania and in distant parts. Those who apply for admission as students must have graduated at a college, or else have acquired in some literary institution an education of a similar character. The Rev. Dr. J. A. Seiss, pastor of the Church of the Holy Communion at Philadelphia, is president of the board of directors. The faculty consists at present of the Rev. Drs. C. W. Schaeffer (chairman), W. J. Mann, A. Spaeth, and H. E. Jacobs. Dr. Krauth died on Jan. 2, 1883. See the arts.

V. Methodist.

(1) Garrett Biblical Institute. — Its name is derived from the Rev. William J. Garret, D.D., the Rev. William X. Ninde, D.D., and the Rev. Henry Bannister, D.D. They were professors elected in 1856. In 1879 Professor William X. Ninde, D.D., was elected president. The course of study is strictly biblical and theological, and instruction is imparted through lectures, written and oral. Text-books are used as syllabuses in all departments, and every professor is held in worthy estimation as alumni of the institution. Not a few have attained prominence in the church as preachers and pastors, foreign missionaries, and presidents and professors of colleges and seminaries. The catalogue for 1883 shows an attendance of a hundred and three, with a graduating-class of twenty-eight. The institute holds a general relation of sympathy with the Methodist colleges of the West, two of which — the North-western University of Evanston, Ill., and Chaddock College of Quincy, Ill. — have formally adopted it as their theological department. W. X. NINDE (President).

VI. Presbyterian.

(1) Princeton. — Both Liberty Hall Academy in Lexington, Rockbridge, Va., and Hampden-Sidney College in Prince Edward, Va., were founded by the Presbyterians of that State, mainly for the purpose of rearing an educated ministry. The former still exists as Washington and Lee University; the latter as a well-endowed college. Its president was also teacher of the students of divinity. The seminary at Princeton having been founded in 1811, the synod of Virginia in 1812 reformed its theological school as a department of the college, with the Rev. Moses Hoge, the college president, as its professor. Between that date and 1820, when he died, about thirty lienciates went from it into the ministry. Hoge was followed, as president of the college, by a layman (Jonathan P. Cushing, Esq.). The wants of the churches were rapidly increasing; hence the old Hanover presbytery resolved, under the advice of the great John Holt Rice, D.D., to create a seminary distinct from the college. Without buildings or endowments, he commenced his instructions with three students, Jan. 1, 1824. Funds were rapidly raised for endowments; and in 1826 the General Assembly took the seminary under its care, and its trustees took charge of the funds. In the autumn of the same year the synods of Virginia and North Carolina, with the consent of the next assembly, took the place of the Hanover presbytery in governing the seminary; and to commemorate this copartnership its name was changed to Union Seminary. At the premature and regretted death of Dr. Rice, in 1831, it had acquired buildings, a library, three professors, and forty-eight students. Dr. Rice was succeeded as president by Dr. George A. Baxter, from 1832 to 1841. The death of the founder, and the "Old and New School controversy," together with the great industrial depression of the country under oppressive Federal laws, gave a serious check to its prosperity. In 1841 Dr. Samuel B. Wilson succeeded as president of the seminary, and professor of systematic theology. In 1854 the endowment of a fourth chair was completed, and the designed organization of the seminary realized. Since then there have been four professors — one of systematic, polemic, and pastoral theology; one of Hebrew and other Oriental languages and literature; one of ecclesiastical history and polity; one of biblical literature and New Testament interpretation. The scheme of the seminary is thoroughly biblical. The Bible is the chief textbook in all departments, and every professor in required to expound some parts of it from the original.

The seminary is now governed jointly by the synods of Virginia and North Carolina, through a board of twenty-four trustees, but under the superintendence of the General Assembly, to whom annual reports must be made, and which exercises a veto-power over the election of professors and over all changes in its constitution and plan. The property of the seminary consists of about forty acres of land, with good buildings for seventy-five students and four professors, a handsome chapel and a superior library-building, and endowments of $250,000 for the support of the institution and twenty-five scholarships. The library, which is unusually select, numbers 12,000 volumes.

The seminary has had, since its separation from Hampden-Sidney College, the following professors:-

In Ecclesiastical History.—Dr. Stephen Taylor, 1835-36; Dr. Samuel L. Graham, 1836-51; Dr. Robert L. Dabney, 1853-59; Dr. Thomas E. Peck, 1869.

The seminary was also served in this department by the following gentlemen as tutors: Elisha Ballantine, Benjamin M. Smith, Francis S. Sampson, Dabney C. Harrison, and Thomas Wharey. The largest number of students ever collected in the seminary in one session was seventy-four: the number this session (1882-83) is fifty-six. B. L. Dabney (Professor).

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES. 2341 THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Theology, and Rev. W. M. Scott, D.D., to the chair of biblical literature and exegesis. Opened September, 1859, it has continued with varying fortune, until now (1883) it has an invested endowment of about $210,000, and buildings (including dormitory, chapel, recitation-rooms, and three professors' houses) valued at $70,000. The land belonging to the institution, twenty-five acres, is situated on a portion of the city desirable for fine residences, and in the near future will greatly increase its income. Besides Mr. McCormick's donations, aggregating for all purposes $250,000, the seminary is indebted to many others for valuable services and liberal contributions. The institution received from New Albany a library of between 2,000 and 3,000 volumes, some of them old and rare. An invested library-fund, provided by the late Hanson K. Corning, Esq., of New York, secures an annual addition of valuable works. The library now contains over 10,000 volumes, including several large donations by bequests from deceased friends. There are at present, yielding income, thirteen scholarships wholly or partially endowed. While located at Hanover and New Albany, about a hundred and seventy-five students graduated from the institution; and, since the opening in Chicago, nearly two hundred have enjoyed its advantages. Twenty-seven were in attendance in 1882-83. Such ample pecuniary provision is made, that all the necessary expenses of needy students are fully met.

The professorships as now constituted are as follows:

Located in the heart of a territory unparalleled in fertility, with an ample equipment and liberal endowment, with a large and increasing constituency, with a vast field of labor open to its alumni, and with a learned, energetic, and devoted faculty, the Seminary of the North-west has before the seminary, the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Presbyterian form of church government. Every member of the faculty, it was also provided, should, on entering upon his professorship, on his election to office, solemnly promise to maintain while in office the plan and constitution of the seminary, the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Presbyterian form of church government.

At the same time provision was made irrevocably, by the constitution, that every director should, when elected, be a member of the denomination of Christians.

 measures have now been taken for the removal of the seminary to a more eligible site on the west side of Park Avenue, between Sixty-ninth and Seventieth Streets, including the whole front on the avenue, and extending back on each of the streets a hundred and fifty feet. The buildings are now in the process of erection. They will include a fire-proof library edifice, a commodious chapel, and a large structure for lecture-halls, with a dormitory of six stories extending across the rear from street to street. They are to be of brick, with brown-stone trimmings, in the University Gothic style. The cost of the ground and buildings will considerably exceed half a million of dollars. The site is one of the most eligible in the city.

Library. — The nucleus of this unique collection of books was gathered by the Benedictine monks of Paderborn, in Germany, and was the growth of centuries. Large and valuable additions were made to it by the learned Dr. Leander Van Ess, until it numbered more than 18,000 volumes, including rare old copies of folio Bibles, pamphlets, commentaries on the early periods of the Reformation, the Latin and Greek Fathers, church histories, decrees of councils and popes, with a most valuable collection of Incunabula and Reformation tracts, all of which were purchased in bulk by the seminary in 1838.

Large and useful additions of the best modern theological publications, many of them from the private collections of the late Drs. Robinson, Sprague, Field, Marsh, Gillett, H. B. Smith, Adams, and others, have been made, together with the unique McAlpin collection of rare and interesting books and pamphlets relating to the Puritan divines, and the deistic, Trinitarian, and ecclesiastical controversies of the eighteenth century. The library comprises not less than 42,000 volumes, 40,000 pamphlets, and 163 manuscripts.

Funds. — For several years the institution was conducted under great embarrassments. The original subscriptions were soon exhausted in providing buildings and the payment of salaries. The treasury at one time was overdrawn to the amount of not less than $16,000. In 1843, $25,000 were obtained for the endowment of the theological chair, the first permanent fund. A further sum of $30,000 was received some five or six years later, in the person of Mr. Roosevelt. In 1855 a further sum of $100,000 was obtained by a general subscription, a bequest of $20,000 by Mrs. Fasset of Philadelphia in 1854, and a subscription of $25,000 in 1855, to endow the professorship of ecclesiastical history. A further subscription of $100,000 was obtained in 1859, of $150,000 in 1863, and in 1871 of $300,000. In 1875, by the princely gift, of Mr. James Brown, of $300,000, the institution was put upon an ad

Students. — The seminary has, almost from the start, ranked with the first in the land as to the number under instruction. More than 2,000 students have availed themselves of its privileges, of whom 1,830 have graduated in due course. Not less than 1,750 of the whole number are still serving in the gospel ministry, and 127 are reported as missionaries to the heathen.

Ecclesiastical Control. — The General Assembly, since the re-union in 1870, has an optional veto over the appointment of the professors, and receives from the board an annual exhibit of its condition.

VII. Reformed (Dutch). — See New Brunswick, by Professor De Marest.

VIII. Reformed (German). — (1) Reformed Church Theological Seminary, at Lancaster, Penn. — Though the need of a theological seminary for the Reformed (German) Church had long been felt, it was not until the year 1817 that definite action to supply the need was taken by the synod, and not until seven years later, that, after several abortive efforts, the institution was actually founded. At that time Dickinson College, then under the care of the Presbyterian Church, had been resuscitated; and, as its friends deemed it advantageous to bring the contemplated seminary into some connection with the college, liberal offers of accommodation and assistance were made by its trustees to the synod of the Reformed Church in 1824. These were accepted; and the seminary was opened March 11, 1825, with Rev. Lewis Mayer as professor of theology, and five students in attendance. After an experience of four years and a half, Carlisle was felt to be an unsuitable place for the seminary; and in the fall of 1829 the institution was removed to York, Penn. In 1837 it found a new home in Mercersburg, Penn., the seat of Marshall College; which had grown out of the classical department organized at York in connection with the seminary. Subsequently Marshall College was united with Franklin College, and in the spring of 1868 transferred to Lancaster, Penn.; and in the fall of 1871, after a separation of eighteen years, the theological seminary followed. During the fifty-eight years of its existence the seminary has had in its service thirteen professors and tutors. The chair of systematic theology has had five incumbents,—Levin Mayer, D.D., in office thirteen years; John W. Nevin, D.D., eleven; Bernard C.

Wolff, D.D., ten; Henry Harbaugh, D.D., four; and E. V. Gerhart, D.D., fifteen. The chair of church history and exegesis, established 1829, has likewise had five incumbents,—Daniel Young, in office one year; Frederick A. Rauch, Ph.D., nine years; Philip Schaff, D.D., twenty-one, inclusive of two years not in actual service; E. E.
Higbee, D.D., seven, including two years under appointment by the board of visitors; and Thomas G. Apple, D.D., twelve. In 1867 a theological tutorship was established; and during the twelve years of its actual existence (1861-73), there were three tutors,—William M. Reily, Ph.D., in office three years; Jacob B. Kerschner, A.M., seven; and F. A. Gast, D.D., two. In 1873 the tutorship was abolished, and the chair of Hebrew and Old-Testament theology established, which Professor Gast has occupied since May, 1874. The seminary since 1867 has been under the care of three systemats, which is represented ad ably in a board of trustees, which holds and manages the property, and in a board of visitors, which supervises the instruction, and directs the internal affairs of the institution. The library numbers at the present time about 10,000 volumes, many of which, together with a large amount of money for the endowment-fund, were obtained in Germany in the early history of the institution by Rev. James Reily, who visited that country to solicit aid in behalf of the new seminary. For the external and internal history of the seminary, see the Mercersbury Review for January, 1876, Semi-Centennial Register, 1875, and ology of the seminary, see also ARTS.

Heidelberg Theological Seminary, a theological school of the Reformed Church in the United States (formerly the German Reformed Church) at Tiffin, O. This church (with 767 ministers and 166,586 communicants) has now four theological schools, founded in the following order: (1) Theological Seminary at Lancaster, Penn., organized in 1823; (2) Heidelberg Theological Seminary at Tiffin, O., organized in 1861;
(3) Theological Seminary at Franklin, Sheboygan County, Wis.; and (4) Theological Department of Ursinus College at Collegeville, Penn.
Heidelberg Theological Seminary belongs to the Ohio synod of the Reformed Church, a body of 140 ministers and 18,817 communicant members.
Various efforts had been made at an early date to found a theological school west of the Alleghenies to meet the urgent calls for ministers. Thus one was in operation for two years (1830) in Canton, O., under Dr. J. G.
Büttner, a learned German scholar. Another one was in operation for a short time (in 1848)
in Columbus, O., under Rev. A. P. Freeze. In 1850 the Ohio synod resolved to found Heidelberg College, at Tiffin, O., and in connection with it to establish a theological seminary. The first professor called was Rev. Dr. E. V. Gerhart (than of Cincinnati, O.), who formally opened the seminary in May, 1851, with two students.
The seminary has been in uninterrupted operation since that time. For ten years (1851-61) it had but one professor to attend to the full course of study; namely, Dr. E. V. Gerhart from 1851 to 1855, and Dr. Moses Kieffer from 1855 to 1861.
In 1861 a second professor was called, namely,
Dr. Hermann Rust, then of Cincinnati. Since 1861 it has been under the care of two professors.
The present incumbents are Prof. J. H. Good, president, and professor of dogmatical and practical theology (called in 1869), and Prof. Dr. Hermann Rust, professor of exegetical and historical theology (called in 1861). The plan of the institution includes four professorships. Its productive endowment at present is about $30,000. It has no buildings of its own. The recitations and lectures are held in a hall of the college-building.
Both the seminary and the college are named Heidelberg, out of respect to the celebrated Hei-idelberg Catechism, which is the only creed or confession of this branch of the church.
From 1855 to 1883 this institution has graduated 195 theological students, of whom 182 are still living, and laboring in the ministry. About one-half of these officers in the English and German language. They are somewhat widely distributed, as will be seen from the following:
in Ohio, 77; in Pennsylvania, 27; in Indiana, 16; in Illinois, 5; in Iowa, 7; in Wisconsin, 4;
in New Jersey, 1; in Michigan, 4; in New York, 1; in Kansas, 4; in Nebraska, 2; in Minnesota, 2;
in Colorado, 1; and 1 missionary in Japan.
The number of students in attendance each year varies from twelve to twenty. The field of the seminary is somewhat circumscribed. For fuller account of its history, see Sermon before Alumni Association in 1880, by Rev. I. H. Reiter, Dayton, O., 1860. J. H. GOOD (President).
(3) THE THEOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT OF URSIUS COLLEGE is an integral part of the institution. It was organized simultaneously with the founding and opening of the college in 1859-70, and is located in the same building (Fre-legeville P.O., Montgomery County, Penn.), thirty miles by railroad north-west from Philadelphia.
In its organization it corresponds with that of the theological department of Yale College and similar schools. Ecclesiastically and theologically it is based upon the principles, faith, and purity of the Reformed Church, as symbolically represented by the Heidelberg Catechism and Cognate Confessions: indeed, firm adherence to these in their historical sense, and progressive development in true harmony therewith, is a distinctive characteristic of the school. Although under no formal synodical control, it is as amenaable in all essential respects to the jurisdiction of the "Reformed Church in the United States" as any other institution of the church, and acknowledges such amenability.
In 1872 it was officially recognized by the General Synod of the church, convened in Cincinnati; and several years later the Eastern District Synod
at Easton gave it a vote of recommendation.
The department is under the immediate charge of three professors, and the course of study prescribed conforms to the requirements of the consitution of the church with which it stands connected.
Since the opening of the department, about sixty young men have pursued their studies in it, of whom forty-four took a full course, and forty-five are engaged in the work of the ministry. At the close of the first term (October 5, 1844), two resident professors and one instructor devote their entire time, and three non-resident professors a portion of their time, to teaching. The pupils vary in number from year to year, but there were twenty in attendance in 1882-83. The regular course of instruction occupies three years, but students may pursue a partial course of shorter duration. Between three and four hundred persons have received the benefits of the institution, and pupils in the principal cities and towns of the Union are supplied to settlers in the West. Its library numbers between 15,000 and 16,000 volumes and many hundreds of unbound pamphlets. The present Divinity Hall was erected in 1864, principally from the contributions of the Unitarian churches of New York and Brooklyn. There are four acres of land given by Professor Hudekoper, who, with his family, has contributed largely, in money and services, to the school during its whole existence. A separate building, fire-proof, is about to be erected for the library. The institution is open to persons of whatever color, sex, or nationality; and beneficary aid is extended to worthy students in need. Its curriculum of studies does not differ materially from that of other theological seminaries. Two resident professors and one instructor devote their entire time, and a special effort is being made to improve the financial condition of the college. It is under the control of a board of directors, of whom three-fourths must be members of the Reformed Church, and eight of whom are ministers of said church. J. H. A. Bomberger (President).

X. Unitarian. Tufts College Divinity School is a department of Tufts College. It was organized and opened for students in 1889. The late Silvanus Packard, the largest benefactor of Tufts College thus far, directed in his will that the trustees should establish a professorship of theology. The trustees immediately decided to associate with him one other professor, and open a divinity school. The Rev. Charles H. Leonard, D.D., was chosen as his associate. At first the number of students was small; but it rapidly increased, rendering another teacher necessary. William G. Tousey, A.M., was appointed as an assistant, and very soon promoted to a professorship. The course of study as originally laid out embraced three years. The work of the school was carried on by the three professors above named until 1875. At that time it was decided to make the course of study four years for all who are not college graduates. On account of the additional work involved in this change, an instructorship was created, and the Rev. George H. Knight was chosen to fill it. Recently the instructorship has been changed to a professorship; and the Rev. George M. Harmon has also been appointed an assistant professor, making now five permanent teachers in the school. The course pursued is substantially the same as in other divinity schools of like grade, except that some literary training is given to non-graduates. The degree of bachelor of divinity is given to all students who satisfactorily complete the course. There is no charge for either tuition or room-rent. Students who are in needy circumstances receive aid from the Universalist General Convention, by way of loans, amounting to $180 per year. There are now nearly sixty graduates from the school, nearly all of whom are actively engaged in the clerical profession, and some of them occupying prominent and influential positions in the Universalist Church. E. H. Cottam (President).

THEOLOGUS, or THEOLOGAL, an officer of the Roman-Catholic Church. In its Canon 18 the Third Council of the Lateran (1179) ordered that a proper person should be appointed at each metropolitical church to give free instruction in theology to the clergy. For his service he was to be paid by the revenue of some benefice; but he was not a canon himself, and could not be dismissed if he did not give satisfaction. The Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215) confirmed the decree, extended it to the cathedral churches, and gave in its Canons 10 and 11 some further regulations. See Sammlung von alien und neuen theolog. Sachen, Leipzig, 1721, p. 988.

THEOLOGY (from theo and logos). I. In the widest sense, the science of religion, or, more definitely, the science of the Christian religion as it is taught in the Bible, and carried on in the history of the church. It is usually divided into: (1) Exegetical theology, or biblical learning; (2) Historical theology, or church history; (3) Systematic or speculative theology; (4) Practical theology. See special arts. on those topics.

II. In the narrower sense, systematic theology, or, more particularly, dogmatics. This is usually divided into: (1) Theology proper ("the doctrine of God"), in which are treated theistic and antitheistic theories, the knowledge, nature, and attributes of God, the Trinity, the divine decrees, providence, and miracles; (2) Anthropology ("the different questions relating to man, his origin, nature, original condition, the fall, and especially the doctrines of sin and free agency; (8) Christology ("the doctrine of the person and work of Christ as the God-man"); (4) Pneumatology ("the doctrine of the Holy Spirit as the third person in the Trinity, and his work"); (5) Soteriology ("the doctrine of salvation"), under which head are treated the plan of salvation, and the way in which his salvation is brought to man, vocation, regeneration, faith, justification, sanctification — some include under this head also the doctrine of the person of Christ and of the atonement; (6) Ecclesiology ("the doctrine of the church, the sacraments, and the means of grace"); (7) Eschology ("the doctrine of the last things"), which includes the doctrines of the condition of the soul after death, the second coming of Christ, the resurrection, and the final judgment. See the separate arts. Dogmatics, Election, Eschatology, Justification, Christology, Soteriology, etc., etc.

THEOLOGY, Monumental. See Monumental Theology.

THEOLOGY, Speculative. See Speculative Theology.

Rationalism, however, is not always empirical; nor is mysticism always speculative. In the domain of mysticism, speculative theology has a problem of its own. As Christianity will not content itself by being one of the many religions existing, even not by being the most perfect one of them, but claims to be the absolute religion, the last and complete revelation of God, or as Christianity will not content itself with ruling the will of man, but also demands to rule his intelligence, to the exclusion of any foreign or hostile principle, it cannot help coming into conflict with science, which proceeds, and must proceed, on another principle than that of authority. The problem of speculative theology, then, becomes reconciled knowledge and faith, science and religion, natural civilization and Christianity; and it solves this problem by stripping the facts, scientific or religious, of its crudepositivity, uncovering and seizing upon its informing idea, and demonstrating the ideal harmony which results from the discrepancies of reality.

The school of Alexandria presents the first striking instance of a speculative theology. In Alexandria, Christianity met with the Greek philosophy, the ripe fruit of Greek science; and it was as impossible for the one as for the other to avoid conflict. But the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation, or, rather, an amalgamation. They taught that beside faith (πίστις), the simple confidence in the facts of revelation, there is a deeper insight in the mysteries of revelation (γνώσις), which unfolds the latent working of the λόγος in the history of mankind before the incarnation in Christ, and unites Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity into one grand scheme of Divine providence. None of those theologians of the East, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa — has given a complete speculative system; but speculative views of peculiar grandeur and depth are scattered all through their writings; and by concentrating the interest upon such doctrines as the origin of the world, the origin of evil, the Trinity, the personality of Christ, they gave the whole theology of the Eastern Church a decidedly speculative character. At first the Western Church proved hostile to this tendency. Irenæus and Tertullian considered the philosophers the true heresiarchs, and philosophy the fountain-head of all spiritual errors. Augustine, however, was a genius of rare speculative force. He combated the Manicheans with Platonic and Neo-Platonic ideas; Pelagianism, with profound expositions of the experimental doctrines of science and grace; and finally crushed Arianism by a speculative development of the doctrine of the Trinity. From him, and directly from the influence of the Greek Church, through the Areopagite and Scotus Erigena, a stream of speculation passed into the medieval theology of the Western Church, which, though sometimes feeble enough, never disappeared altogether. Having mastered the logic of Aristotle, scholasticism was almost wholly occupied with the logical demonstration of the doctrines of the church; and, as a general rule, it was rather averse to speculation. Only the powerful protection of Charles the Bald saved Scotus Erigena from actual persecution, and several of his views were formally condemned by the synods of Valence (858) and Langres (869). Nevertheless, some of the greatest and most orthodox schoolmen felt the need of speculation. In his Monologium, Prosologium, and Cur Deus Homo, Anselm goes behind the authority of the doctrines to establish them on an a priori deduction. And in the writings, not only of the direct pupils of Scotus Erigena, Amalric of Bena, David of Dinant, but also of the mystics, from the Victorines to Meister Eckart and Tauler, speculative ideas are met with as subtle as profound.

The Reformation had to be practical, or to fail; and consequently it had very little use for speculation. Nevertheless, Zwingli was a scholar and humanist before he became a Reformer: he had a philosophy before religion became his passion, and he felt the need of bringing these two sides of his spiritual character into perfect harmony. His De Providentia shows some traces of a genuine speculative power(see Sigwart: Ulrich Zwingli und Picus von Mirandula, 1856). Luther's combative nature also compelled him now and then to borrow from the schoolmen some speculative construction for his ideas. Thus the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity is based on the nominalism of Oecam (see Retberg: Oecam und Luther, in Studien und Kritiken, i., 1893; and Schulte: Luther's Ansicht, etc., in Btheologische Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, iv., 1880). Even Melanchthon, who in the beginning of his career was very hostile to scholasticism and philosophy in general, gave,
THEOPHANY. (See also_theophany.)

After the analogy of the Greeks, especially the Platonists, who understood by theoria the appearance of one or more gods, theologians apply the term to the revelations of God in the Old Testament, and to the incarnation of Christ as the revelation of God in the flesh, and especially at his birth, his baptism, and his second coming. The biblical conception of theophany may be thus stated. (1) By it is never to be understood an immediate revelation of the supermundane Deity himself (John i. 18; 1 Tim. iii. 16); for God reveals himself only in Christ (Matt. xi. 27), and therefore every theophany is really a christophany. (2) The theophany, as christophany, has three greater stages of development, (a) The form of Old-Testament manifestation, (b) The envisaged or announced appearance of Christ, (c) Christ's second coming, which will be the completion of the theophany, the revelation of his "glory" (Tit. ii. 13). (3) The theophany or the christophany of the Old-Testament Scriptures is the epiphany of the future Christ. It was made in the person of the angel of the Lord (Gen. xvi. 7, etc.), or of the presence (Exod. xxxiii. 14), or the covenant (Mal. iii. 1). The pillar of cloud and of fire was the symbol of his presence, the appearance of the "glory" of God, which in rabbinical terminology was called the Shechinah, was his attribute. (4) The manifestation of God in his christological theophany begins with the miracle of hearing, or the voice of God, which is identical with the voice from heaven, but to be distinguished from the Bush Kol, and ends in the miracle of seeing. (5) The theophany as the objective manifestation is always accompanied by a vision, and is thus distinguished from an ordinary historical event (2 Kings vi. 17; John xii. 12; Acts i. 9, cf. xxii. 9, xii. 11). On the other hand, no vision is without a theophanic element, and is thus distinguished from purely subjective hallucination.

THEOPHYLACT. a celebrated Greek exegete who flourished in the eleventh century, during the reign of Johannes Doues, — not to be confounded with Thophylactus Simocattii, an Egyptian who flourished about 629, and wrote the history of the Emperor Mauricius. The exegete was a native of Europolis, in the Island of Euboea; lived for some time in Constantinople as tutor to the imperial prince Constantinus Porphyrogennetaus; was appointed archbishop of Achrida in Bulgaria, 1078; and died after 1107. they were averse to all kinds of propaganda; for "it is unnecessary to make people Theophilanthropists, since they really are so by nature." But they took much care of the education of their children, and their instruction in good morals.

During the first and second years of their existence the Theophilanthropists formed associations also in the provinces. It was easy to predict, however, that a religion which had no roots in the history of the people, and could give no satisfaction to the deepest cravings of human nature, would not prosper for a long time; and indeed, by degrees, as the Christian feeling became reawakened in the French people, the Theophilanthropist movement died away. "What shall I do to restore my church?" exclaimed Reveillevre Lepeaux. "Well, just hang yourself, and rise again the third day," Talleyrand replied. There is a difference between a "religion of rhetoric" and a "religion of facts," which, to his own detriment, he had overlooked. In 1802 the First Consul, Bonaparte, took their churches from the Theophilanthropists, and restored them to the Roman Catholics.

LIT. — The literary monuments of Theophilanthropism have been printed in a collected edition at Basel. 1797-99. See Guéquere: Histoire des sectes religieuses, Paris, 1810, 2 vol. HAGENBACH.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Alexandria (385-412), is known from his participation in the Origenistic controversy. Three letters by him, condemnatory of Origen, are still extant in a Latin translation by Jerome. Galland: Bibl. Patr., vii.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Antioch (176-188), was educated in Paganism, but was converted to Christianity by the study of the Bible. He was a very able and prolific writer. His principal work, and the only one extant, is his Apology of Christianity, written in 180, addressed to the Emperor Hadrian, a Pagan friend, Autolycus. The best edition of it is that by Otto, Jena, 1861. His Commentary on the Gospels has probably been enlarged by a later hand. See Theodor Zahn: Der Evangelienkommentar des Theophilus von Antiochen, Erlangen, 1883 (in favor of the genuineness); and Ad. Harnack, in Texte und Untersuchungen, 1. Heft. 4, pp. 97-175 (against Zahn). See Schaff: History of the Christian Church, rev. ed., New York, 1883, vol. ii. pp. 732 sqq.

THEOPNEUSTY. See INSPIRATION.

THEOPNEUSTY. (from ὁ θεός, "God," and εὐφημία, "wisdom") is distinguished from mysticism, speculative theology, and other forms of philosophy and theology, to which it bears a certain resemblance, by its claims of direct divine inspiration, immediate divine revelation, and its want, more or less conspicuous, of dialectical exposition. It is found among all nations,—Hindus, Persians, Arabs, Greeks (the later Neo-Platonism), and Jews (Cabala),—and presents itself in itself variously under the form of magic (Agrippa of Nettesheim, Paracelsus), or vision (Swedenborg, Saint Martin), or rapt contemplation (Jacob Boehme, Oettinger).

THEOTOKOS (θεότοκος, "God-bearing"), a title denoting the expression that Christ was one person in two natures. It was adopted at the Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451) against Nestorianism. It declared that Mary was the mother of God in the sense that the human nature which she derived from her was most intimately united with deity, so that the person she bore was really divine. The word is now a favorite designation in the Greek Church for the Virgin Mary, p. 456.

THERAPEUTE (θεραπευτής, "worshipper"), the name of a sect of ascetics allied to the Essenes, the Buddhists, and early Christian monks described in πρὸς θεοῦ θεατηρίσθην ("On a Contemplative Life." See Yonge's translation of Philo, Bohn's edition, vol. iv. 1-20). The title was formerly attributed to Philo; but it is now adjudged to a Christian forgery of an ascetic origin, and the Therapeutae to be creatures of the imagination. The grounds for this decision are solid. (1) The style of the treatise is not that of Philo. (2) If the book is his, why was the sect not mentioned in Quod omnii probus liber ("On the Virtuous being also Free"), where the Essenes are described minutely. Its members were of both sexes; lived in separate cells, and only united in sabbath worship; had no support save what the charitable gave them; ate only one meal a day, and that exclusively bread. Unlike the Essenes, they revered the temple at Jerusalem and the priesthood. The location of the sect was near Alexandria, on the shores of the Maeotic Lake. See Luchi: Die Therateuten und ihre Stellung in der Geschichte der Ansek, Strassburg, 1870; and cf. art. "Therapeutae," by E. Stapfer, in Geitshenger's Encyclopädie, vol. xii. Pp. 118-120.

THEREMIN, Ludwig Friedrich Franz, b. at Gramzow in Brandenburg, March 19, 1780; d. in Berlin, Sept. 26, 1846. He descended from a French family which had sought refuge in Prussia after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; studied theology at Halle and Geneva; was elected pastor of the French-Reformed congregation of Berlin in 1810; and appointed preacher to the University in 1814, and professor of homiletics at the university in 1830. He has a place in the history of homiletics, though he formed no school, and published Die Bereitsamkeit eine Tugend, Berlin, 1814, 2d ed., 1837 (Eloquence a Virtue, translated by Professor W. G. T. Shedd, Andover, 1850, 3d ed., 1864), and Demostenes und Massillon, 1846. He was also much appreciated as a preacher, and published ten volumes of sermons, besides several other books of it was a town of important commerce from very early times. It was taken from the Macedonians, and occupied by Athenians, about 432; restored soon after; repopulated by Cassander, king of Macedonia, 316; became the great Macedonian naval station; surrendered to the Romans after the battle of Pydna, 168, and was made the capital of the second of the four divisions of Macedonia, or Macedonia Secunda, between the Strymon and the Axios; and when the four were reduced to one province, under the jurisdiction of a proconsul, it was the virtual metropolis, and there the proconsul lived, although not at first so called. There Cicero lived from April till November, 58, during his exile; and there the party of Pompey and the Senate had their headquarters during the first civil war, 49. It took the side of Octavian (Augustus) against Sextus Pompeius (42-36), and in reward was made a free city. At the opening of the Christian era it was the capital of the whole country between the Adriatic and the Black Sea, and "the chief station on the great Roman road, called the Via Egnatia, which con-Thessalonica, the capital of Greece, was founded by Alexander the Great in 315 BC. It was named after the mother of Alexander, Thessalos, and was located on the coast of the Aegean Sea. Before Constantinople was built, it was virtually the capital of Greece and the seat of the Eastern Empire. Thessalonica was connected Rome with the whole region to the north (see art.). From the fourth to the eighth century it was a Roman "colony," i.e., soldiers were permanently settled there in order to increase its strength as a bulwark against the Gothic hordes. In 390, in a sedition there, the prefect Botericus was murdered: in dreadful revenge, nearly seven thousand persons were massacred by Theodosius II; cf. Phil. iv. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 10). Paul wrote the Thessalonian Church two epistles from Corinth upon his second missionary journey, 51. He came with Silas and Timothy, preached for three Sundays in the synagogue there, and, as the result of the work, a church was gathered, principally composed, however, of Gentiles. Among the converts were Caius, Aristarchus, Secundus, and perhaps Jason (Acts xvii. 1–18, xx. 4, xxvii. 2; cf. Phil. iv. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 10). Paul wrote the Thessalonian Church two epistles from Corinth (close of year 52, or beginning of 58), which are the earliest of his preserved writings, "perhaps the earliest written records of Christianity" (Bishop Lightfoot). In striking proof of the minute accuracy of Luke, upon the arch of the Var- dăr gate, so called because it leads to the Várda, or Axios, there occurs the word πολεμαρχια (polarchia) as the designation of the seven magistrates of the city, a word unmentioned in ancient literature, yet the very word Luke employs to designate them (Acts xvii. 8, πολημαρχους).

From Thessalonica the gospel spread quickly all around (1 Thess. i. 5). During several centuries the church of Thessalonica was under its immediate jurisdiction, from the time of the Emperor Constantine. It was in 1205 appointed professor of theology there. The first volume, containing the apocryphal Gospels, appeared 1832, and was followed by Acta apostolorum Petri et Pauli in 1838, and Andrea et Matthaei in 1846. His Bibliotheca paetrum Graecorum dogmatica also remained incomplete. Only one volume, containing the dogmatical works of Athanasius, appeared 1833.

THIRLWALL, Connop, a scholarly English bishop; was b. at Stepney, Middlesex, Feb. 11, 1797; d. at Bath, July 27, 1875. He displayed such remarkable precocity, that in 1809 he published, under his father's direction, a volume of essays and poems entitled Primula.
Thirty Years' War, The (1618-48), one of the fiercest and most protracted of wars, was so far forth a religious war, as at that time religion formed one of the principal elements of politics. But of how mixed a character the whole affair was, may be seen from the circumstance, that though Roman Catholics on the one side (headed by Austria, Spain, and Bavaria), and Protestants on the other side, under various leaders (Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden), always formed the groundwork of the party position, Roman-Catholic powers, as, for instance, France, would at times ally themselves with the Protestants, and Protestant princes with the Roman Catholics, as, for instance, the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony.

The war began in Bohemia. In 1517 Ferdinand of Styria, a brother of the Emperor Matthias, a pupil of the Jesuits, and a fanatical enemy of Protestantism, was crowned king of Bohemia; and persecutions were immediately instituted against the Protestants. But the Protestants, under the leadership of Count Thurn, penetrated into the castle of Prague, threw the imperial commissioners out of the window (May 23, 1618), occupied the general council of the Holy League, entered into alliance with Bethlen Gabor, king of Transylvania, and the Evangelical Union in Germany; and as Matthias died on March 20, 1619, and Ferdinand shortly after succeeded him as emperor, they declared the Bohemian throne vacant, and offered it to the young James I. of England. He accepted the offer, but was assassinated at Egger, Feb. 25, 1634, the standard of the Swedish army rapidly sunk after the death of Gustavus Adolphus; and the Protestant army suffered a severe defeat at Nördlingen, Sept. 6, 1634, after which the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony deserted the Protestant cause, made peace with the emperor, and turned against the Swedes.

Nevertheless, the position of the emperor continued to be so favorable that his prospects of final success were very small. Richelieu, whose whole foreign policy turned upon the humiliation of the house of Austria as its true pivot, and who for that very reason had subsidized the Swedes from the very beginning, now took the army of Duke Bernhardt of Saxe-Weimar into French service; and the war against Austria and her allies was carried on with a fierceness and cruelty hitherto unexampled. In 1648 no less than a hundred villages were burnt down in Bavaria, and the inhabitants driven away. And at the same time the Swedish general Torstenson developed an activity which seemed to threaten the very existence of the Hapsburg dynasty. He defeated one Austrian army under Piccolomini at Breitenfeld, Nov. 2, 1642, and another, under Hatzfeld, at Jankow, March 6, 1645; and he actually approached Vienna in order to form a connection with Prince Rakocz of Transylvania, and lay siege to the city. The immediate danger drifted away by the somewhat peculiar proceedings of Rakocz. But Austria was completely exhausted; and the peace of Westphalia (which art. see). Oct. 24, 1648, was as necessary to her as it was welcome to Germany, which lay prostrate, and cruelly devastated from one end to the other. See the various works on the subject by Schiller (1802), Menzel (1835), Flathe (1840), Mebold (1840), Sülte (1840), Barthold (1842), Heilmann (1851), Kloppe (1861), Hauser (1862), Gindely (1869; Eng. trans., New York, 1884, 2 vols.), Ranke (1869), S. THOLUCK, Friedrich August, D.D., an eminent German divine andphilosopher; b. in Breslau, March 30, 1799; d. in Halle, June 10, 1877. Descended from very humble parentage, he first learned a trade, but by the assistance of friends attended the gymnasium of his native city, and the university of Berlin. When he left college, he delivered an address on The Superiority of the oriental World over the Christian, which was chiefly a eulogy on Mohammedanism. But during his university course he was converted from his pantheism and scepticism, under the influence of the lectures of Schleiermacher and Neander, and more especially by personal intercourse with Baron Ernst von Kotzebue, a member of the Moravian brotherhood, who combined high social standing and culture with a lovely type of piety. His character is finely described in the unnamed "patriarch" in Tholuck's Weise des Zweifels (See Jacob, Kritischen An. e. K., Halle, 1882). In 1821 he was graduated as licentiate of theology, and began to deliver lectures as privaat-docent. In 1824 he was appointed extraordinary professor of Oriental literature, in the place of Dr. DeWette. In 1825 he made a literary journey to Holland and England, and at the expense of the Prussian Government, and in 1826 was called to the university of Halle as ordinary professor of theology, in the place of Dr. Knapp, which he occupied to the time of his death, with the exception of a brief period (1827-28), which he spent in Rome as chaplain of the Prussian embassy on Capitol Hill, in intimate intercourse with Bunsen. In Halle he had at first to suffer a good deal of opposition and reproach from the prevailing rationalism of his colleagues (Gesenius and Wegscheider), but succeeded in effecting a radical change; and the whole theological faculty of Halle has since become decidedly evangelical. In Dec. 2, 1870, his friends prepared a surprise for him by the celebration of the semi-centennial jubilee of his professorship. The university and magistracy of Halle, delegates of several universities and of all schools of theology, took part in it; and his pupils in Europe and America founded a seminary adjoining his own home, for beneficiary students of theology, as a perpetual memorial of his devotion to students. He was always in delicate health, but by strict temperance and great regularity of habits he managed to do an unusual amount of work till within the last years of his life. He was incessant in his lectures, preached regularly as university chaplain, and found time to write many books.

His principal works are as follows: Sin and Redemption, or The True Consecration of the Sceptic (Berlin, 1825, many times reprinted; translated into English by Ryland, with an Introduction by John Pye Smith; republished in Boston, 1864, under the title, Guido and Julius, or Sin and the Propitiator, in opposition to DeWette's Theodorr, or the Consecration of the Sceptic, 1825. Blühen-sammlung aus der marxenförmigen Mystik, 1825 (a collection of translations from the mystic poets of the East); Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (4th ed., 1842; twice translated into English, last by R. Menzies, Edinburgh, 1848, 2 vols.), the first exegetical fruit of the new evangelical theology; Commentary on the Gospel of John, 1826 (7th ed., 1857, translated into English by Kaufmann, 1858, and by Dr. C. P. Krauth, Philadelphia, 1859), less thorough and permanent, but more popular, and better adapted for students, than his other commentaries; Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, 1833 (3d ed., 1844; translated into English by R. L. Brown, Edinburgh, 1860; new ed., 1869), his most learned, elaborate, and valuable exegetical production; Commentary on the Hebrews, 1836 (3d ed., 1850; translated by James Hamilton, Edinburgh, and on the Psalms, 1843 (translated by Dr. Mombert, Edinburgh and Philadelphia, 1859); The Credibility of the Gospel History, 1837 (2d ed., 1838), a vindication of the Gospels against the mythical theory of Strauss; and Hours of Christian Devotion, 1840, 2 vols. (well translated by Rob. Menzies, Edinburgh and New York, 1875), containing several original hymns. In this book he pours out his fervent evangelical piety with all the charm of fresh enthusiasm. He was one of the most eloquent German preachers in his day, and published a series of university sermons (collected in 5 vols., 3d ed., Gotha, 1863-64, one volume being translated, Light from the Cross, Sermons on the Passion of our Lord, Philadelphia, 1858). He issued also two very interesting volumes of Miscellaneous Essays, 1839. His last works were contributions to German church history since the Reformation, derived in part from manuscript sources; namely, Lutherische Theologen Wittenbergs im 17ten Jahrhr. (Hamburg, 1852), Das akademische Leben des 17ten Jahrh. (Hamburg, 1852, 1854, in 2 vols.), and Geschichte des Rationalismus (part i. Berlin, 1865, never finished). A complete edition of his works appeared 1868-72, in 11 vols. He also republished the Commentaries of Calvin on the Gospels and Epistles, and his Institutio Christianae Religionis, and made that great divine better known in Germany, although he himself was of Lutheran descent and predisposition. He conducted for several years a literary periodical, and contributed largely to the first edition of the Encyclopädie of Herzog, whom he recommended as editor to the publisher, having first himself declined the position.

Tholuck was one of the most fruitful and influential German theologians and authors during the second and third quarters of the nineteenth century, and better known in England and America than any other. He was original, fresh, brilliant, suggestive, eloquent, and full of poetry, wit, and humor. He cannot be classified with any school. He was influenced by Pietism, Moravianism, Schleiermacher, Neander, and even Hegel. His elastic mind was ever open to new light; but his heart was always right, and never shaken in faith and love to Christ. He had an extraordinary talent for languages, and could speak English, French, Italian, Greek, Arabic, and several other tongues, ancient and modern, almost like a native. In that line he was ably seconded by Cardinal Mezzofanti, whom he met in Rome. His learning was extensive rather than thorough and exhaustive. He gathered honey from the literature of all ages, from the old Orient down to Goethe, but made it tributary to faith. He is one of the regenerators of German theology, leading it from the barren heath of rationalism to the green pastures of the Scriptures and the literature of the Reformers. His Commentaries broke a new path. His personal influence was as great and good as that exerted by his works, and yields only to that of Neander among his contemporaries. He was gifted with personal magnetism, and brilliant powers of conversation. Having no children, he devoted all his paternal affections to his students, and was nobly assisted by his second wife (a most lovely and refined Christian lady). He loved, as he said, candidates more than ministers, and students more than candidates, because he was more interested in the process of growth than in the result of growth. His life was a life with the young, fruitful in blessings. He was in the habit of taking long walks with two or three students every day from eleven to twelve, and from four to five: he invited them freely to his house and table, tried experiments on their minds, proposed perplexing questions, set them disputing on high problems, inspired and stimulated them in the pursuit of knowledge, virtue, and piety. He had great regard for individuality, aimed to arouse in everyone the sense of his peculiar calling rather than to create a school. Like John the Baptist, he sent all away from him to a higher Master. His chief aim was to lead them to a humble faith in the Saviour, and to infuse into them that love which was the ruling passion of his heart. He adopted, as he says, Zinzendorf's motto, “I have but one passion, and that is He, and He alone.” His lecture-room was truly a school of Christ. And herein lies his chief significance and merit. Thousands of students from different lands owe to him their spiritual life. To Americans he was especially attached, and a most useful light in the labyrinth of German theology. He was very intimate with Dr. Edward Robinson, Dr. Charles Hodge (who studied at Halle in 1827, and was daily in his company), Dr. Henry B. Smith, Dr. Prentiss (who studied there in 1840), and Dr. Park of Andover. He called them “his American pets.” I once met him promenading with a pious Canadian Methodist, and an American sceptic who never went to church, but worshiped God, as he said, in his own temple, under the blue skies, and basking in the light of the sun. “But,” asked Tholuck smilingly, “what do you do when it rains?” He told me afterwards that this agnostic was seeking religion, and we must aid him. He often tried the wits of American students by curious questions; e.g., "Why did God make so many Chinese, and so few Yankees?" or, "How is Mr. Erbsenkorper" (Peabody, the philanthropist)? He was invited to the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in 1873, and promised to the writer to come (with the humorous remark, "I am afraid of your American mobs, your hot cakes for breakfast, and especially of your kindness"). But his feeble health prevented him; and he sent one of his favorite pupils as his representative, with a modest sketch of his labors and death by the writer in Germany. It is the last public document from his pen (except some letters), and gives a faithful idea of his love of youth for Christ's sake.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

THOMAS THE APOSTLE was also known by the Greek equivalent Didymus, meaning twin. In the Gospels he is associated with Matthew (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 16; Luke vii. 51; in the Acts, with Philip (Acts i. 13). He was probably a Galilean, as the mention of his name with the other Galilean fishermen among the apostles (John xxi. 2) seems to indicate. According to the oldest tradition, he was born in Syrian Antioch, preached the gospel to the Parthians, and was buried at Edessa (Euseb., III. 1; Socrat., I. 19, etc.). According to later statements, he preached to the Medes and Persians, baptized the three kings [the wise men from the East]; and Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 25) speaks of him as having preached to them. In India a later tradition makes him suffer a martyr's death by being pierced to death by lances at the king's command. The Thomas Christians show his grave at Meliapur, India. His relics, according to the tradition of the Catholic Church, were removed to Edessa, and thence to Ortona, Italy. The Greek Church commemorates his memory June 3; the Latin Church, Dec. 21. The name "Thomas Christians," by which the old Christians of India were known, seems to confirm the tradition that Thomas labored in India; but this conclusion is denied by Philip and others. [See Christians of St. Thomas, and Nestorians.]

Two apocryphal works are associated with the name of Thomas, The Gospel according to Thomas [Evang. sec. Thomam, edited by Tischendorf, who gives two Greek texts and a Latin translation; and by Dr. W. Wright in Syriac], and The Acts of Thomas (Acta Thomae), edited by Thilo, Leipzig, 1823. Our authority for a characterization of Thomas is three passages in John's Gospel (xii. 21, xiv. 5, xx. 24). They present him as one whom a deep earnestness of spirit inclined to melancholy, and a desire of knowledge made a doubter. He is the representative, among the apostles, of the first spirit. By the way of honest doubt and questioning, he arrived at an imperturbable and joyous conviction and faith. See Butler, Lives of the Saints, for the legendary additions to his life. For a translation of the Gospel of Thomas, see B. Harris Cowper: The Apcopraphal Gospels, London, 1867, pp. 118-170. At the appearance of Thilo's and Tischendorf's editions of the Greek Acts of Thomas, only five of the twelve divisions extant in Latin and Syriac versions existed in Greek. But in 1883 Max Bonneth published an edition of the twelve complete, from a Greek manuscript he discovered in the National Library in Paris (Acta Thoma, Leipzig). The most exhaustive treatise upon the subject is LIPSII: Die Apokryphen Apostelgeschichten u. Apostellegenden, Braunschweig, 1888, vol. 11 at Lyons.) Thomas of Aquino was declared a doctor of the Catholic seminaries and with Augustine, Jerome, and Ambrose, among the most authoritative teachers of the church. Leo XIII., in an encyclical dated Aug. 4, 1879, recommended his works to the Catholic seminaries and theological faculties throughout the world, as a proper foundation of their religious and philosophical teaching, and particularly emphasized his political doctrines as conservative for society. The special title of this great theologian is the "Angelic Doctor" (Doctor Angelicus.)

II. Theology. — In certain respects, Thomas of Aquino marks the culminating point of scholasticism. He sought to establish for the science of theology a position of superior dignity and importance over the science of philosophy, and, on the other hand, the harmony of the two sciences, by distinguishing in revelation the religious truths which can be excogitated by the use of reason from those which are only known by revelation. The doctrinal creed of the church, Thomas treats as absolute truth; but it is a remarkable fact, that he uses the arguments of the church-teachers only as of probable authority (Summa theol., i. qu. 1, art. 8). He refers more frequently to biblical texts than the other scholastics; but this practice does not purify his theology, but helps to confirm the church-doctor's principles were good; and he expressly commended the literal interpretation of the Scriptures, omnes sensus scripturæ fundantur super unum sensum literalem ex quo solo potest trahi argumentum, etc. (Summa, i. qu. 1, art. 10), but could not free himself from ecclesiastical authority. Thomas did not grant the ontological argument of Anselm for the existence of God. He gives several forms of the cosmological and teleological arguments, but says that, while reason can prove that God exists, it cannot discover what his nature is. His fundamental conception of God is that of spiritual and active being. God is intelligence and will (intellectus et voluntas), the first cause. Thinking and willing are inseparable from his being. He is consequently forever returning to the idea of the absolute identity and simplicity of God. He employs all his speculative talent to explain the doctrine of the Trinity; and yet he declares that it is beyond the sphere of reason to discover the distinction of persons in the Godhead, and affirms that he who tries to prove the doctrine of the Trinity by the unaided reason derogates from faith: qui pro- baret nihilum Trinitatem personarum naturali ratione, fidei derogat (Summa, i. qu. 32, art. 1). Although Thomas did not, like his teacher Albertus Magnus, regard the world as an emanation from God, he refers its origin to God's active will, which is nothing more than his active intelligence, which, in turn, is only the essence of God working as the first cause. He is again and again forced to regard the world as a necessary product of the Divine Being, and inclines to the thesis of its eternal existence; so that he contents himself with saying, "It is credible that the world had a beginning, but neither demonstrable nor knowable: mundum incepisse credibile est, sed non demonstrabile et scibile (Summa, i. qu. 46, art. 2). The doctrines of election and reprobation he considers in connection with the doctrine of providence. Every thing occurs under the Divine Providence, and serves a single and final end. Both reprobation and election are matters of divine decree. He departs in some details from the Anselmic doctrine of Christ's work, as when he denies the absolute necessity of the incarnation, and affirms that God might have redeemed man in some other way than by his Son. A human judge cannot release from punishment without expiation of guilt; but God, as the Supreme Being, can forgive without expiation, if he so chooses (Summa, iii. qu. 46, arts. 1, 2). The satisfaction of Christ removes all original guilt; and, by the application of his merit, the sinner secures freedom from and forgiveness of sin. Man's nature is corrupt, and grace alone enables him to reach eternal life. Thomas passes directly from the consideration of the work of Christ to the sacraments. The number of the sacraments had already been fixed at seven, but the treatment had a shaping influence upon the discussion of the subject in after-time. He proved the necessity of seven sacraments, and the immanence in them of a supernatural element of grace. His treatment of the Eucharist, penance, and ordination, is characteristic. He held to the change of the elements to the body and blood of Christ, justified the withholding of the cup from the laity with casuistical arguments, and spoke of the sacrifice of the mass, now as a "symbolical picture of the passion" (imago representativa passionis), now as a real sacrifice. It is noticeable, that, in his doctrine of the mass, he does not emphasize, as do his successors, the idea of sacrifice to the detriment of the sacramental idea. The subject of indulgences, Thomas handled at length; teaching that the efficacy of an indulgence does not depend upon the faith of the recipient, but upon the will and authority of the church, and extends to the dead as well as to the living (Summa, iii. qu. 71, art. 10). The discussion of eschatology follows the discussion of the sacraments. Thomas teaches the doctrines of purgatory and the intercession of saints. He treats the doctrines of the resurrection and future blessedness at length, and teaches that the body of the resurrection will in form be identical with the present body, even to the hair and the nails.

Thomas was not less great as a teacher of ethics than as a theologian. Neander has said, that, next to that of Aristotle, his is the most important name in the history of ethics (Wissensch. Abhandlungen, ed. Jacoby, p. 40). But both as a moralist and a theologian he was a true son of the church. His system is, as Baur says, only an echo of the doctrinal teaching of the church. In the spirit of the day he discussed many idle and useless questions with casuistical minuteness and far-fetched argumentation. But he was in this respect more moderate than his contemporaries.

On the other hand, he discussed many important subjects with a depth and clearness of insight which make his views permanently interesting and valuable. After the death of Aquinas, a conflict went on over his theology; Duns Scotus being the leader of the other school. The Dominicans were ranged on the side of Aquinas, whose followers were called Thomists; and the Franciscans on the side of Duns Scotus, whose followers were known as Scotists. The difference between the teachers was not in the doctrines they taught, but in their treatment of these doctrines. With Scotus, theology was a practical science; with Aquinas, a speculative science. The controversy lasted down to the eighteenth century; and the Franciscan De Rada mentions in his work, Controversiae inter Thomam et Scoto (Cologne, 1820), no less than eighty-six points of difference between the two schools. The most important points of controversy were the cognoscibility of God, the distinction between the immanence in them of a supernatural element of grace. His system is, as Baur says, only an echo of the doctrinal teaching of the church. THOMAS OF CELANO. THOMPSON.2355

He studied theology at Erlangen, Halle, and Berlin, and was appointed preacher at Nuremberg in 1829, and professor of systematic theology at Erlangen in 1842. His studies were principally occupied with the history of doctrines, and in that line he published Origenes, Nuremberg, 1837, and Die christliche Dogmengeschichte, 1874-76, 2 vols.

THOMASSIN, Louis, b. at Aix, Aug. 28, 1819; d. in Paris, Dec. 24, 1897. He entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1832, taught for some time philosophy at Lyons, afterwards theology at Saumur and in the seminary of St. Magloire in Paris, until he in 1868 retired in order to devote his whole time to study. His first work was his Dissertationes in concilia generalia et particularia, 1672; but his principal work is his Ancienne et nouvelle discipline de l’eglise touchant les benefices et les beneficiaires, 1678-79, 3 vols. fol., which he translated into Latin, and which is said to have made a very deep impression on Innocent XI.

THOMPSON, Joseph Parrish, D.D., LL.D., b. in Philadelphia, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, Aug. 7, 1819; was graduated at Yale, 1838; ordained October, 1840; pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church in New York from 1845 till 1871, when, on account of ill health, he resigned, and went to Germany, and d. in Berlin, Sept. 20, 1879.

During thirty-one years of pastoral work he recognized the paramount claims of the pulpit upon his best energies; and though he had unusual gifts as a platform speaker, and peculiar facility in adapting himself to his surroundings, he rarely ventured to appear in the pulpit without an elaborate written sermon. This conscientious fidelity in official work was rewarded with large success, and his congregation came to be among the largest and most intellectual in the metropolis. At the same time he bore a conspicuous part in the missionary work of his denomination and in its local councils, as well as in movements to promote general philanthropy and reform.

No sketch of this period of his life would be complete which did not hold up to view the immense influence which he exerted by pen and voice in the pulpit, on the platform, and in every appropriate way, in the discussions which preceded the overthrow of slavery. At a time when slavery found apologists in Northern pulpits, when antislavery sentiments were unpopular to the last degree, when criticism of the fugitive-slave law exposed one to obloquy, when an appeal to a higher law was denounced even by the religious press, he had the nerve to do what many shrank from doing, and the pluck to carry out his convictions in speech and act. In all this he was untrammeled by ecclesiastical or political ties; and it is believed that few men of this generation have exerted a larger influence over thoughtful minds in the elucidation of principles and the application of those principles to the life of the nation. During the whole period of the civil war he labored with assiduity for the maintenance of national unity on principles of universal freedom. Unfortunately, these arduous labors, in connection with personal exposure while on a visit to the Union army as an officer of the Sanitary Commission, resulted in such physical prostration, that in 1871 he was compelled to resign his pastoral office, and seek repose abroad.

A visit to Egypt as long ago as 1853 had led him to take a deep interest in Egyptology, and to writing an elaborate work on the Life and Times of Moses. It was his hope that a residence in Berlin would enable him to carry out this design. He did not readily abandon it: but his temperament was such that he could never be indifferent to the living questions of the hour; and finding in Germany a state of things which seemed to call for a defence of American institutions, and an exposition of American ideas, he took up that line of work, and became, as Professor Dorner fitly said, "a living link" between the United States and Germany. Though a private citizen, without emolument or rank, his residence in Berlin brought him into intimate relations with statesmen and scholars. Year after year he was called on to make the annual "Thanksgiving" address in the American chapel. In 1873, in the dead of winter, he went to Thorn, on the confines of Germany, to represent the American Geographical Society at the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of Copernicus. In Berlin he made addresses commemorating Agassiz, Bryant, and Bayard Taylor. He regularly attended the meetings of the Association for the reform and codification of the Law of Nations, and contributed papers which were held in high esteem by jurists. Three years in succession he spoke on the Papacy and Protestantism in Glasgow, where the papers styled him "that fiery American from Berlin." Many of his addresses and papers were designed to show that difficulties which threatened the peace of Europe were to be overcome by following the American plan of separating Church and State. During the "centennial" year he vindicated his native land against European prejudices by a course of six philosophical lectures on American political history, which he delivered in Berlin, Florence, Dresden, Paris, and London. His personal influence secured the insertion, in the Berlin Treaty of 1878, of a clause favoring religious liberty. Among his last works was the preparation, for the Evangelical Alliance at Basel (1878), of a memorial in behalf of religious liberty in Austria. The paper was adopted; and the Alliance appointed a deputation of prominent men, of whom he was one,—the sole representative from the United States,—to wait on the Emperor of Austria, and invoke redress. On hearing of this result, he said, looking at his helpless arm, "This old hand has struck one more blow for liberty." Before the deputation could fulfill its mission, he died in Berlin, and was buried in the cemetery of the Jerusalem Church. EDWARD W. GILMAN.

THOMSON, Andrew, D.D., Scotch Presbyterian; b. at Sanquhar, Dumfriesshire, July 11, 1779; d. in Edinburgh, Feb. 9, 1831. He was graduated at the university of Edinburgh, and at his death was pastor of St. George's Church, Edinburgh. He made a memorable attack upon the British and Foreign Bible Society for circulating the Apocrypha. He "opposed the abuses of lay-patronage in the Church of Scotland, effectively denounced British colonial slavery and other evils, and did much to promote education, morality, and evangelical religion in Scotland." (Allibone). He published several volumes of sermons and lectures: for list, see Allibone's Dictionary, s. v. The memorial volume of Sermons and Sacramental Exhortations (Edinburgh, 1831, Boston, 1832) for writing, for Bibliography see Dictionary of National Biography, vol. iv.

THOMSON, Edward, D.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Portsea, Eng., Oct. 12, 1810; d. at Wheeling, W. Va., March 22, 1870. He with his father came to America in 1818, and settled in Wooster, O., 1820. He was graduated in medicine at the university of Pennsylvania in 1829. Brought up a Baptist, he joined the Methodist Church, December, 1831, and was admitted to the Annual Conference in 1831. From 1838 to 1843 he had charge of the Norwalk Seminary, Ohio; from 1844 to 1846, he was editor of the Ladies' Repository; from 1846 to 1860, president of the Ohio Wesleyan University; and from 1860 to 1864, editor of the New-York Christian Advocate. In 1864 he was elected bishop, and in that capacity made an extensive tour through Europe and the East. Among his publications may be mentioned Educational Essays, new ed., Cincinnati, 1856; Moral and Religious Essays, 1856; Evidences of Revealed Religion; Our Oriental Missions,—India, China, and Bulyaria, 2 vols.

THOMSON, James, b. at Ednam, in Roxburghshire, Sept. 11, 1700; d. at Kew Lane, near Richmond, Aug. 27, 1748; studied at Edinburgh, and went to London 1724; held government posts, and was patronized by the Prince of Wales; wrote The Seasons, 1726-30; Liberty, 1735-36; The Castle of Indolence, 1748; several tragedies, etc. Memorable here for A Hymn on the Seasons and A Paraphrase on the Latter Part of the Sixth Chapter of St. Matthew.

THOR'AH (the law). 1. The Feast of the Law.

—On the evening of the eighth day, which concludes the feast of tabernacles, commences what is called the "Feast of the Rejoicing of the Law," —which fitly celebrates the termination of the year,—by reading of the law and the beginning of another cycle. Two of the richest men of the synagogue are chosen to perform the ceremonies connected with the festival. The first, called the "Bridegroom of the Law," after the singing of the cantor of a long Hebrew formula of address, reads Deut. xxxii. 27-xxxiv. 12, the closing verses of the Pentateuch: the other, called the "Bridegroom of Genesis," after a similar introduction, reads Gen. i.-ii. 3. The two "bridegrooms" distribute alms and presents. The festival is of Babylonish origin.
2. The Writing of the Law-scrolls, being an honorable and important work, can only be trusted to a grown-up and experienced man. The scrolls are made of parchment prepared expressly for the purpose by a Jew from the hide of a clean animal slaughtered by a Jew. It must be so porous or thin as to allow the writing to show through. The leaves should be joined by gut-string from a clean animal; but silk may, if necessary, be used. If a thread breaks, it can be rejoined: if it breaks again, it must be torn aside. The leaves thus fastened together are rolled upon a wooden rod with wooden or iron handles. Each leaf has an upper margin less than three fingers broad, and a lower not more than four, and a space between every two fingers broad. No column must be longer than three-four syllable words, or have space for more than thirty letters.

The leaf is lined before the writing begins. The leaf is made of lampblack, oil, or grease, and thoroughly dried. The ink is made of lampblack, oil, or grease, and thoroughly dried. The ink is prepared for use by being moistened with water colored by

The conference opened Aug. 16, 1645, under the presidency of Prince Georg Ossoliński, chancellor of the Polish crown, and closed Nov. 21, same year. No result was arrived at. The Lutherans showed the same unmitigated hatred to the Reformed as to the Roman Catholics. They began with foul intriguing among themselves, in order to exclude Calixtus, whom they knew to be in favor of a union, from any active participation in the debate. They went on disturbing the business of the assembly with ridiculous questions. THORNDIKE, Herbert, is supposed to have been born in 1598, but no satisfactory proof of this date can be found; nor is it known where he was first educated, it being certain, however, that he became a pensioner at Cambridge in 1613, and a Trinity-College scholar the following year. He was made canon of Lincoln in 1636; vicar of Claybrooke, Leicestershire, in 1639; rector of Barley in Hertfordshire, 1642; master of Sidney College in 1643. Being a stanch Churchman of the Anglo-Catholic type, he was ejected from his office of perpetual curate of Crackley by the Restoration. He, however, resigned them on being appointed a stall at Westminster Abbey in 1661. He published a Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic lexicon in 1635, assisted Walton in the preparation of his Polyglot during the Commonwealth, and designed an edition of Origen, which he did not execute. He also entered into plans for preserving and restoring ecclesiastical institutions in those unsettled times. He assisted at the Savoy Conference in 1661, and had a share in the revision of the Prayer-Book the same year, being then a member of convolution. He resumed his residence at Cambridge, in broken health, in 1662, and afterwards divided his time between the university and the abbey. The plague drove him from Cambridge in 1666; after which he vacated his fellowship, and died at Chiswick in 1672. He is best known by his writings, and must be regarded as the most learned, the most systematic, and the most powerful advocate of Anglo-Catholic theology and High-Church principles in the seventeenth century. His theological works, which include a number of treatises, have been collected in the Oxford edition of six volumes, 1844-57. This edition presents a model of editorship; being enriched with explanatory notes, which form a guide to the study of controversial theology in general, and not only as it appeared in Thorndike's day. The book which most succinctly unfolds his scheme is entitled An Epilogue to the Tragedy of the Church of England (1659), in which he treats of the principles of Christian truth, the covenant of grace, and the laws of the church. The covenant of grace is his central idea. He dwells upon the necessity of the covenant as arising out of original sin, the mediator of the covenant as the divine Christ, and the method of the covenant as an economy of grace. In the treatment of this branch, he brings out the Anglican doctrines of salvation as distinguished from those of Puritanism. His trains of thought are prolific and excursive, and his style is crabbed and unreadable. His works could never be popular, but they demand the attention of all who would be accomplished theological scholars [see STOUTHON: Religion in England, 1881, 6 vols. (Index)]. JOHN STOUTHON.
THORNWELL.

2359 THREE-CHAP. CONTROVERSY.

It was at the assembly held in Rochester, N.Y. [1880], that the great debate between himself and the Rev. Charles Hodge, D.D., took place, on the subject of church boards.

Dr. Thornwell took a leading part in the organization of the Southern General Assembly in 1861. On the 1st of August, 1862, he died in Charlotte, N.C., where he had gone to meet his wounded son, then a soldier in the Confederate army. He was taken away in the meridian of his fame and usefulness, not yet having completed his fiftieth year, his last words being those of wonder and praise.

The collected writings of Dr. Thornwell, edited by Rev. James B. Adger, D.D., Richmond, 1871-73, are contained in four volumes, the first of which is entitled Theological; the second, Theological and Ethical; the third, Theological and Controversial: and the fourth, Ecclesiastical. See his Life and Letters, by B. M. Palmer, Richmond, 1875.

THREE-CHAPTER CONTROVERSY, The, was intimately connected with the Monophysite Controversy. Theodorus Asciades, bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, a devoted Origenist, represented to the Emperor Justinian that many of the Monophysites might be won for the church if some action were taken against the chief representatives of the Antiochian (Nestorian) theology. The emperor issued an edict in 544 condemning the so-called "Three Chapters" which Theodore proposed, (1) the person and writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, (2) the writings of Theodoret in defence of Nestorius, and (3) the letter which Ibas was said to have written to the Persian Maria. Theodore had died at peace with the church, and Theodoret and Ibas had been expressly recognized as orthodox by the Council of Chalcedon (451). Thus the support of the "Three Chapters" implied a partial condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon. The Greek bishops yielded assent after a public resistance. Pope Vigilius wavered, but in 546 condemned the Three Chapters in the Judicalum, but at the same time insisted on the authority of the Council of Chalcedon. The Latin Church, however, tenaciously resisted the condemnation, and a synod of Carthage excluded Vigilius from church communion. Vigilius subsequently withdrew the Judicatum, refused to be present at the second Council of Constantinople (553), in which the Three-Chapter Controversy was considered, and in a decree of May 14, 553 (Constitutum de tris capitulis), expressly protested against the condemnation of the "Three Chapters." The Council of Constantinople, however, followed the wishes of the emperor. The Greek churches accepted the decision confirming the condemnation of the articles. The Roman Church fell in, and in 550 the North African Church gave its assent. But the recognition of the authority of this council by Vigilius and Pelagius was the occasion of the separation of the churches of Northern Italy, with Aquileja and Milan at their head, from the Roman Church. The schism continued till the pontificate of Gregory the Great. The Latin Church takes very little notice of the 5th Ecumenical Council (Second Council of Constantinople).

ATHENS (Hindi, Ti¢J, "to deceive"). At this time, a organized body of secret assassins and thieves, who for many years had been the terror of India. They were worshippers of the bloody goddess Kail, who presided over impure love and death.
Roaming about through the country, they usually strangled their victims by a skilful use of the handkerchief. They devoted one-third of their plunder to their tutelary divinity. The administration of Lord William Bentinck (1829-35) succceeded in putting an end to their dreaded deeds.

generally made of precious metal, in the form of a vase, with a pierced cover, and suspended in three chains for swinging. In this form, however, thethurible is not found until the twelfth century. The thuribles which Constantine presented to the churches of Rome, or Chosroes to the churches of Constantinople, must, by reason of their weight, have been stationary.

THYATIRA, a city of Asia Minor, on the northern border of Lydia, near the road from Pergamum to Sardis, which was about twenty-seven miles distant. The Lycus flows near it. Its early names were Pelopia, Semiramis, and Euphippia.
Lydia, the seller of purple stuffs, who received
Paul so kindly, came from Thyatira (Acts xvi. 14).
Dyeing was apparently an extensive industry there, and the scarlet cloth now produced there is very famous. Lydia very likely belonged to the dyers' guild. She was probably helpful in the establish-

The Bible makes the following statements t this king: (1) That he threatened the thorn kingdom (Israel) and that Menahem gave him a thousand talents of silver sure his favor and support (2 Kings xv. 10); That in the days of Pekah, a usurper, the d successor of Menahem, he took Ijon, Abel-

Chatti, west of the Euphrates, receiving from the kings of Karkemish, Tyre, etc. The first three volumes were published at Paris, 1690. He published three more volumes of this work during his life. Two posthumous volumes were added. His principal work was the Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclés. des six premiers siècles. The first three volumes were published at Paris, 1694. Thirteen others followed [till 1712] after the author's death, bringing the history down to 513. This was the first church history based upon scrupulous researches published in France up to that time. It consists for the most part of quotations from the Fathers, arranged in chronological order. The author's own remarks are included in brackets, or consigned to the foot of the page as notes. Tillemont's labors do not satisfy the present generation of scholarship, but they were valuable for their minuteness and care.

ons Puritan; studied at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where Puritan principles were inculcated, and where he shared the same room with Francis Holcroft, one of the subsequently ejected clergy. But Tillotson did not imitate Puritan doctrines; he rather leaned in what was called the "Latitudinarian" direction. The Cambridge school of divines, including Cudworth, More, Smith, Wilkins, and others, manifested a bias of that kind; and they probably exerted an influence over the future archbishop. Chillingworth, through his writings, is also said to have moulded Tillotson's opinions. Yet he appeared on the Presbyterian side at the famous Savoy Conference, but was too young to take any important part in that assembly. How, when, or where, he was ordained is a mystery; but he was a preacher in 1661, and was offered the church of St. Mary Aldermanbury in 1662, when Edmund Calamy was deprived of it. After submitting to the Act of Uniformity, he was appointed to the rectory of Keddington, Suffolk, and soon afterwards preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He began as an author in 1664, by publishing a sermon on The Wisdom of being Religious, and another in 1666, on The Rule of Faith. It was as a preacher, and the author of sermons, that he became most distinguished; his plain, almost colloquial style, free from learned quotations, artificial arrangement, and endless subdivisions, making him popular with the middle classes, whilst his good sense and cultured mind made him acceptable, also, with the learned. Dryden even was under literary obligations to Tillotson; and high praise has been bestowed on him by Taine, the French critic. He was a thorough Protestant, and at home in the Popish controversy, and appealed to reason as well as revelation in support of his opinions. He showed a strong Erastian tincture in a book entitled The Protestant Religion vindicated from the Charge of Singularity and Novelty, in which production he curiously said that "no man is at liberty to affront the established religion of a nation, though it be false." This brought him into trouble with many of his friends, and he retired to the country, where he continued to preach, and to write. He was a Whig in politics, opposed to the despotism of the Stuarts, and an advocate of ecclesiastical comprehension. He attended Lord William Russell on the scaffold, and hailed with joy the Revolution of 1688: after this he took part in the ecclesiastical commission for revising the Prayer-Book. Not without high preferment before, for he was dean successively of Canterbury and St. Paul's, he rose to the primacy of all England in 1691, where he endured many insults from the Nonjurors. Stricken with palsy, he died Nov. 22, 1694.

JOHN STOUTON.

TIMOTHY, the friend and co-laborer of Paul, was the son of a heathen father and a Jewish mother named Eunice (Acts xvi. 1; 2 Tim. i. 5). His home seems to have been at Lystra, where he enjoyed the pious instructions of his mother and grandmother Lois (2 Tim. i. 5), and was probably converted at Paul's visit on his first missionary journey. Paul frequently calls him his child (1 Cor. iv. 17; 1 Tim. i. 2, 18; 2 Tim. i. 2, etc.). At the time of his conversion he must have been very young; for Paul exhorts him, years afterwards, to let no man despise his youth (1 Tim. iv. 12), and to flee youthful lusts (2 Tim. ii. 22).

When the apostle visited Lystra on his second missionary journey, he heard the best reports of Timothy, and determined to take him with him as a companion. He was probably ordained at that time (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6), and circumcised (Acts xvi. 3). Timothy accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey to Macedonia, as it would seem from Acts xvi. 1-3, and as far as Berea (Acts xvii. 14, 19), where, with Silas, he remained a long time, while Paul went on to Athens. He afterwards met Paul at Athens, whence he was despatched on a mission to the church in Thessalonica (1 Thess. iii. 2). Having accomplished his mission, he met Paul again at Corinth (Acts xviii. 1, 6), and took part with him in the proclamation of the gospel there (2 Cor. i. 19). We meet Timothy again on Paul's third missionary journey to Ephesus (Acts xix.). He was despatched thence on an important mission to Corinth (1 Cor. iv. 17), and was in Corinth, or thought to be there, when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written (1 Cor. xvi. 10, 11). He was sent by the apostle, in company with Erastus, to Macedonia (Acts xix. 22), was with him when the Second Epistle to the Corinthians was written (2 Cor. i. 1), and accompanied him back to Asia from Corinth (Acts xx. 5).

We have no other notices of Timothy till Paul's first imprisonment, when we find him with the apostle at Rome (Col. i. 1; Phil. i. 1; Philem. 1). The remaining facts of his life are drawn from the pastoral epistles and Heb. xiii. 23. After Paul's first Roman imprisonment, Timothy seems to have moved from Philippi (Phil. ii. 19-23) to Ephesus. In his first letter to Timothy, Paul urges him to oppose false theological and ascetic tendencies in the Epaphian Church (1 Tim. i. 3 sqq.). Timothy himself seems to have given way to the false theology and asceticism (1 Tim. iv. 7, 8, v. 23, etc.). Paul expresses in this epistle the hope that he might visit Timothy at Ephesus. He seems not to have realized his expectations; and from his second imprisonment at Rome, and in the near prospect of death, he wrote the Second Epistle to Timothy, and from thence (2 Tim. i. 18, iv. 12, 13). The earnest admonitions of this document (2 Tim. i. 8, 13, ii. 3, iv. 1, 2, 5, etc.) seem to indicate that Timothy had departed somewhat from his early faith; but the cordial invitation for him to come to Rome attests Paul's unchanged affection. If Hebrews was written after Paul's death, and by Luke, which seems probable, then Timothy complied with the apostle's wish, and shared with him a part of the second Roman imprisonment (Heb. xiii. 22).

According to tradition (EUSEB. iii. 4; Const. Apost. vii. 46; NICEPHORUS: Hist. Eccl. iii. 11), Timothy was the first bishop of Ephesus, and suffered a martyr's death under Domitian. For his life, see the commentaries on 1 and 2 Timothy.

TIMOTHY, Epistles to. See Paul.

TINDAL, Matthew, a distinguished English deist; was b. at Beer Ferrers, Devonshire, about 1637; d. in London, Aug. 16, 1733. He studied at Lincoln and Exeter colleges, Oxford, took his degree in 1676, and was made fellow of All-Souls. Under James II. he joined the Roman-Catholic Church, but returned to the Church of England soon after. His principal work,—Christianity as Old as the Creation, or the Gospel a Reproduction of the Law of Nature,—which appeared in 1730, when the author was seventy years old, marks the culminating point of the deist controversy. The second edition, dedicated with this epistle to Bishop Gibson, to whom the author had intrusted the manuscript. "It has not the force of style or the weight of thought which could secure a permanent place in literature," says Leslie Stephen (History of English Thought, i. 135). It asserts that none of the real truths of Christianity required a revelation. The law of God is unalterable and perfect, and was communicated to the first members of the human family. He attacked the religion of the Old Testament, ridiculed the command of circumcision and sacrifices as implying a low and unworthy conception of God, and laid great stress upon the inconsistencies of the patriarchs, the wars of extermination, etc. Conybeare, James Foster, Leland, and others attacked Tindal's work; and it was to it, more than to any other, that Bishop Winer's Analogia Theologiae, meant to be a reply. Tindal's other works are, The Rights of the Christian Church Asserted, an attack upon High-Church assumptions (1706), and some pamphlets. See Lechler: Deismus: Farrar: Critical History of Free Thought, London and New York, 1893 (lect. iv.), Leslie Stephen: History of English Thought, 3d ed., New York, 1891, 2 vols. (i. pp. 134-163).

Tischendorf, Lobegott (Anotheus) Friedrich Constantin, b. Jan. 18, 1815, at Lengenfeld in Saxony; d. Dec. 7, 1874, at Leipzig. Tischendorf was the ninth child of his father, who, by birth a Thuringian, served as village physician and apothecary at Lengenfeld in the Saxon Vogtland. Leaving the village school in 1829, he entered the gymnasium at Plauen, and in 1834, at Easter, aged nineteen, he was matriculated at the university of Leipzig. At school he had been remarkable for his diligence and for his poetical gifts, and the evidences of both have been seen by the writer in the school-records. He was known among his fellow-pupils as somewhat reserved, and as by no means unconscious of his own merits. The influence of Gottfried Hermann and of Georg Benedict Winer inspired classical and sacred research at that time in the university of Leipzig, and Tischendorf a ready disciple. In the autumn of 1836 he took a prize medal for an essay upon the Doctrine of the Apostle Paul as to the Value of Christ's Death as a Satisfaction, and this essay was published in 1837. This, his first scientific publication, was followed at Christmas by a collection of poems which showed no little merit to be a reply. Tindal's other works are, The Rights of the Christian Church Asserted, an attack upon High-Church assumptions (1706), and some pamphlets. See Lechler: Deismus: Farrar: Critical History of Free Thought, London and New York, 1893 (lect. iv.), Leslie Stephen: History of English Thought, 3d ed., New York, 1891, 2 vols. (i. pp. 134-163).

The young German did what Paris failed to do. Lachmann, however, spoke most slightly of Tischendorf's first New Testament; and Tischendorf seems, only a short time before his death, to have recovered that impartial balance of mind necessary to do full justice to his great predecessor.

Reaching the opening of his academical career with his habilitation as privatenctions, in October, 1840, and issuing his first Greek New Testament with the date 1841, he left in the same month for Paris, where he remained until January, 1843, save a visit to Holland in the autumn of 1841, and to England at the close of the summer of 1842. At Paris, not to mention a Protestant and a Catholic edition of the Greek New Testament, or his collaborations of Philo and of the sixtieth book of the Basilicas, his chief work was the deciphering the above-mentioned Codex Ephraemi, a biblical manuscript which had been erased, and re-written with the works of Ephaem Syrus. Tischendorf did not spoil the manuscript with chemicals; that was done by the librarians while he was a schoolboy at Plauen. From Paris he sped to Rome, only delaying at Basel to collate $E$; and he remained in Italy about a year, working diligently at the uncial manuscripts of the Bible. But the best one, the Codex Vaticanus, was denied to him, because Mai had an edition under way; and it was only after the personal intervention of the Pope that he received permission to use it for three hours each, on two days, and to make a facsimile. He looked, however, with eagerness towards the East, and was so fortunate as to succeed in his plans for a journey thither.

On March 12, 1844, he sailed from Livorno for Alexandria, whence he proceeded to Cairo; and after examining the manuscripts in the Cairo monastery of Mount Sinai, and visiting the Coptic monasteries of the Libyan Desert, he started for Sinai on May 12, and reached it by the 24th, remaining until June 1. Here he discovered the forty-three leaves of the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, now at Leipzig, which are a part of the famous Codex Sinaiticus: the leaves of it that he was not allowed to bring with him were the incitement to his later Eastern journeys. With a glance at Palestine, Constantinople, and Patmos, he passed through Vienna and Munich, and reached Leipzig in January, 1845, well supplied with treasures. He married Miss Angelika Zahme on Sept. 18, 1845. During the next few years he published the Old-Testament part of the Codex Ephraemi, the facsimile of the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, the Monumenta Sacra Ineilia, with fragments of seven New-Testament manu-

His second Eastern journey, in 1853, failed in its chief intention, namely, the recovery of the rest of the leaves of the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, but supplied him with a number of manuscripts in various languages, which now adorn the shelves of the libraries at Oxford, London, St. Petersburg, and Leipzig. The holidays of 1854, 1855, and 1856, were used for collations at Wolfenbüttel and Hamburg, at London, Oxford, and Cambridge, and at Munich, St. Gallen, and Zürich. A new collection of his Monumenta Sacra Inedita appeared in 1855, and this ran into a second and a third edition.

A famous controversy took place in the following year, about the forgeries of a sharp Greek named Simonides, who tried to sell his productions as old manuscripts.

Simonides was arrested at Leipzig on Feb. 1. The large amount of material gathered together during these years was presented in a compact form, in his "seventh larger critical edition" of the Greek New Testament, which began to appear in 1856, and was completed at Christmas in 1858. Up to that date no edition had offered such a mass of valuable various readings.

After long effort, Tischendorf succeeded in gaining from the Russian Government the necessary pecuniary support, and the scarcely less valuable moral support, of the Russian emperor, for a new Eastern journey; and he left Leipzig on Jan. 5, 1859, reaching Sinai on the 31st. He was able moral support, of the Russian emperor, for his second Eastern journey, in 1853, failed in its chief intention, namely, the recovery of the rest of the leaves of the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, but supplied him with a number of manuscripts in various languages, which now adorn the shelves of the libraries at Oxford, London, St. Petersburg, and Leipzig. After long effort, Tischendorf succeeded in gaining from the Russian Government the necessary pecuniary support, and the scarcely less valuable moral support, of the Russian emperor, for a new Eastern journey; and he left Leipzig on Jan. 5, 1859, reaching Sinai on the 31st. He searched in vain for the desired leaves. But on the afternoon of Feb. 4 the steward of the monastery called his attention to a manuscript which he had laid away; and to Tischendorf's joy it proved not merely to contain the leaves left behind in 1814, but also a large number of other leaves, containing the New Testament, Barnabas, and part of Hermas. Tischendorf, almost beside himself with joy and thankfulness, spent much of the night in copying the then unique Barnabas, completing it and the fragment of Hermas before he left the monastery on Feb. 7. The prior had gone to Cairo, where Tischendorf found him on the 14th; and at his order a sheik brought the manuscript to Cairo by Feb. 23. Aided by two Germans, he copied it quite by quire, as it was loaned to him. After many delays incident to the election of a new archbishop, he received permission to carry the original to Europe to edit it, and, if the monastery so decided, to give it to the emperor. This year (1859) is the date of Tischendorf's ordinary or full professorship. The Codex Sinaiticus appeared in four large folio volumes in 1862; the New-Testament part, in a quarto volume, in 1863, and somewhat modified, in octavo, in 1865.

The following years were broken by journeys to England, to Italy, and to St. Petersburg. In 1865 appeared the first edition of his work upon the date of the Gospels: When were our Gospels written? and this was speedily replaced by new editions; while Danish, Dutch, English, French, Italian, Russian, Swedish, and Turkish translations scattered the book abroad. He published in 1867 an edition of the New-Testament part of the Codex Vaticanus, and an appendix to the Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, and Alexandrinus. During this time, however, beginning with 1864, he had been issuing the "eighth larger critical edition" of his Greek New Testament; and the last part of the text with the critical apparatus appeared in 1872. He was filled with plans for a new journey to the East, and he had prepared already for a voyage to America to attend the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York; but upon May 5, 1873, he was disabled by a stroke of apoplexy, and never recovered sufficient power to work again. He died on Dec. 7, 1874, and was buried in the new cemetery at Leipzig. Five of his eight children are daughters; the eldest son, Paul Andreas, is second dragoman in the German embassy at Constantinople; the second, Johannes, is a lawyer, at present attached to the Imperial Law Office at Berlin; the third, Immanuel, is a physician, at present assisting a professor at Kiel.

Tischendorf was a man of unusual mental ability and diligence. His services to biblical students cannot easily be over-estimated and will be more and more gratefully acknowledged as the increase of distance in time removes the observer from the influence of that prejudice against him due to his estimate of himself. His editions of the New Testament, culminating in the eighth, are very valuable for the text presented, and still more for the vast amount of material which they place at the disposal of the student of the text; and the comparative agreement of Tregelles and the New-Testament part, in a quarto volume, in 1863, and somewhat modified, in octavo, in 1865. The investigations, however, of Selden, Hugo Grotius, and others, proved that tithes (decimat) were also known to the Roman law, and had in many cases been introduced from it into the economical organization of the medieval state. to God (Gen. xiv. 20). Moses himself ordered (Nu. xviii. 21) that the Levites should be paid for their service in the sanctuary from the tithes which were paid by the other Israelites, and which, properly speaking, belonged to Jehovah (Lev. xxvii. 30-33), and that one-tenth of those tithes should be set apart for the Aaronic priests. After the exile, these prescriptions, as the Mosaic law in general, were enforced with the greatest strictness, and from the Synagogue the whole arrangement was transferred to the Church. When the epistles of the apostles were written, the tithing was transferred to the Church. Not to pay tithes was represented as a crime of the first magnitude. The introduction of tithes in accordance with the prescripts of the Second Council of Tours, 567 (Hardouin: Coll. Concil., iii. 368), and commanded, under penalty of excommunication, by the Second Council of Macon, 535 (Bruns: Concil. Mattiac., ii. 5). Not only the Hebrews, but other ancient peoples, devoted the tenth part of their produce, cattle, or booty, to sacred purposes. There are several kinds of tithes (decima secula, or ecclesiasticae); the former having been established partly under the influence of social circumstances, and partly on account of the different origin, and partly under the influence of political circumstances, there soon developed different kinds of tithes. There are secular and ecclesiastical tithes (decima seculares, or ecclesiasticae); the former having been established in the Old Testament, and not those that were bought, or received as present, were to be tithed, and that, unless ten animals were born, there should be no offering. According to the Talmud, the sheep were tithed as they passed out of an enclosure, the tenth being touched with a rod steeped in vermilion. The alleged contradiction of the rules in Deuteronomy to those of the Talmud was never recognized by the Church. Gregory VII. spoke of laymen's tithes as a crime, and late popes repeated the idea. There are finally personal and real tithes (decima personales, or reales); the former paid from the income of some profession or trade, the latter from the income of some kind of real estate. The latter are again divided into decima protornales, from grain, wine, fruit, and other products of the soil, and decima animalia, from the products of the flock and the poultry-yard: this division, however, is nearly identical with that into decima maiora and decima minora. With the Reformation the tithing-system was not immediately abolished: on the contrary, in most places it was retained for the support of the evangelical Church, as it had been established for the support of the Roman-Catholic Church. Luther spoke in favor of it (see Werke, edition Walch, x. 1006, and xvii. 40, 85). Even the peasants, during the peasant wars, were willing to pay tithes (see Oechsle: Geschichte des Bauernkrieges, Heilbronn, 1880). Nevertheless, in course of time there arose a strong opposition to the system, partly from reasons of political economy, and partly from antipathy to the Church; and in France it was never ratified by the National Assembly of 1789. In other countries, tithes were not absolutely abolished, but commuted into a fixed annual sum of money, — a form which in some cases has found favor with the Roman curia. See Taxation, Ecclesiastical.

TITHES AMONG HEBREWS (תֵּית, tēʿēth, "a tenth"). Not only the Hebrews, but other ancient peoples, devoted the tenth part of their produce, cattle, or booty, to sacred purposes. The Phenicians and Carthaginians sent to the Tyrian Hercules yearly a tithe (Diod. Sic., xx. 14); the Lydians offered a tithe of their booty (Herod., i. 89), as also the Greeks (especially to Apollo) and the Romans (to Hercules) applied a tenth to the gods. These, however, were voluntary rather than obligatory offerings. The Mosaic law of tithes was not an innovation, but a confirmation of a patriarchal practice. The earliest instances of tithes in the Old Testament are Abraham's offering of a tenth of the spoil to Melchisedec (Gen. xiv. 20), and Jacob's devotion of a tenth of his property (Gen. xxviii. 22). The tithed objects consisted of the fruits of the ground and cattle. The cattle were selected by the practice of having them pass under the rod (Lev. xxvii. 32); the tenth one being set apart, whether it were bad or good, blemished or unblemished. The Talmud ordains that only the cattle born during the year, and not those that were bought, or received as presents, were to be tithed, and that, unless ten animals were born, there should be no offering. According to the Talmud, the sheep were tithed as they passed out of an enclosure, the tenth being touched with a rod steeped in vermilion. The alleged contradiction of the rules in Deuteronomy to those of Leviticus and Numbers cannot be made out. If Deuteronomy only prescribes vegetable tithes, and enjoins that they shall be eaten at the altar by the offerer and the Levites in company, these injunctions are to be regarded as a development of the previous rules (Winer); or the omission of reference to the tithal feast in Leviticus and Numbers is to be looked upon as due to the fact that its existence was taken for granted by them (Michaelis, Hengstenberg, Keil, etc.).

The principal tithal rules are as follows. (1) The tenth part of the fruits of the earth and cattle were given to the Levites, who received it as a compensation for their want of an inheritance, and might eat it at their several places of abode (Num. xviii. 21). (2) The Levites must give one-tenth part of this tithe to the priest (Num. xviii. 29); this latter portion after the exile (Neh. x. 38), and perhaps before (2 Chron. xxxii. 12), had to be delivered at Jerusalem. (3) A second tenth was eaten at the tabernacle, at a joyous feast (Deut. xiv. 22 sq.); the offerers, if they were ceremonially clean, and the Levites, joining therein. In case the distance was so great as to make the transportation of the tenth part inconvenient, it might be converted into money, and the money used again in the purchase of the necessary vegetables and meat for the feast (Deut. xiv. 25, 26). (4) Every third year this tithal feast was celebrated by the people at their homes (Deut. xxvi. 13); the Levites, stranger, fatherless, and widows being invited thereto.

The tithes were considerably neglected after the exile (Neh. xiii. 10; Matt. iii. 8, 10); and, at the later period of Roman rule, high priests often laid violent hands on the priestly tithes (Joseph., Ant. XX. 8, 8; 9, 2). The Pharisees, on the other hand, insisted upon the tithal rules as conditions of righteousness, and entered upon a casuistical hand, insisted upon the tithal rules as conditions of righteousness, and entered upon a casuistical

His principal works were, Institutio symbolica ad sentimentum eccles. evang., 1811, Ueber Supranaturalismus, Rationalismus u. Atheismus, 1816, and an edition of the Symbolical Books, 1817.

TITULAR BISHOP, same as Bishop in partibus. See Emporius, P. TITUS, the "fellow-helper" of Paul; a Gentile (Gal. ii. 3) was probably one of Paul's converts (Tit. i. 4), but was never circumcised (Gal. iv. 3). He is not mentioned in the Acts, and first appears in connection with the apostle on his journey to Jerusalem (Gal. ii. i–3). We next find him at Ephesus during Paul's third missionary journey. Paul sent him thence, with a companion, on a mission to Corinth (Tit. i. 14, xii. 18). After meeting Paul in Macedonia (2 Cor. vii. 6), he was sent again to Corinth (2 Cor. viii. 10–24).

Our next information about Titus is found in Paul's Epistle to him. At the time the apostle wrote, Titus was in Crete (Tit. i. 5), where the apostle had left him after his release from the first Roman imprisonment. Titus was with Paul in the second Roman imprisonment, and left him to go to Dalmatia (2 Tim. iv. 10). According to tradition (Euseb., III. 4; Constitutio Apostolica, vii. 40; Hieronymus on Tit. ii. 7; Theodoret on 1 Tim. iii. i.), Titus died as Bishop of Crete.

Titus, Bishop of Bostara in Arabia; a distinguished opponent of Manichæism; d., according to Jerome, in the reign of Valens. Nothing further is known of his personal history than that he came into a personal conflict with Julian the Apostle, who in a letter to him accused him of exciting the Christians to acts of violence against the heathen. This letter, which falls in the year 362, was written from Antioch. The great reputation of Titus in the early church rests upon his work against the Manichæans. Jerome mentions it twice, and speaks of its author as one of the most important heathen writers of his time (Ep. 70, 4, ed. Villar). Sozomen (iii. 14) likewise speaks of him as one of the most distinguished men of his day.

In this work, Titus denies the conceivability of two beginnings, admits the distinction of good and evil only in the moral sphere, denies that death is an evil for the good, and starts from the general proposition of Plato concerning the beauty of the world. The three books which are preserved of this work were originally known only by the Latin translation of Turrianus, but have since been edited from a Greek manuscript at Hamburg, in the Thesaurus Canisii, and by Gallandi, in his Bibliotheca, v. 296 sqq. The Commentary on Luke and the Oratio in ramos, edited by Gallandi, and ascribed to him, are probably spurious. See Tillemont: Mémories pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique; Baur: D. TOBLER, Titus, b. at Stein in the canton of Appenzell, Switzerland, June 25, 1805; d. Jan. 21, 1871, in Munich. He studied medicine at Zurich and Vienna, and undertook for medical purposes a journey in Palestine (1835–36): Late- reise im Morgenland, Zurich, 1839. Having become interested in the geographical and topographical investigations of the Holy Land, he made three more journeys to Palestine, the first in 1845; and as the literary results of this journey appeared, Bethlehem, St. Gall, 1849; Plan of Jerus alæm, 1850; Golgotha, 1851; Die Siloahnuele und der Oelberg, 1852; Denkblätter aus Jerusalem, 1853 (2d ed., 1855); Topographie von Jerusalem und seinen Umgebungen, Berlin, 1853–54, 2 vols. After the second he published Planographie von Jerusalem, Gotha, 1858, and Dritte Wanderung nach Palestina, Gotha, 1859. In 1865 he undertook his last journey to Palestine, and published his Nazareth, Berlin, 1868. See also his Bibliographia Geographica Palæstina, Leipzig, 1867, Palæstina Descriptiones ex Sæculo iæ., r., et c., Leipzig, 1869, and ex Sæculo viæ., iæ., vi., et c., Leipzig, 1874.

His life was written by Heinrich, Zurich, 1879.

TODD, Henry John, Church of England; b. about 1763; d. at Stettington, Yorkshire, Dec. 24, 1845. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1786; rector in London; keeper of manuscripts at Lambeth Palace, 1803; rector of Stettington, 1820; prebendary of York, 1830; archdeacon of Cleveland, 1832; and queen's chaplain. He edited Milton (1806), Spenser (1805), Johnson's Dictionary (1814); wrote Some Accounts of the Deans of Canterbury, Canterbury, 1789; Vindication of our Authorized Translation and Translators of the Bible, London, 1819; Memoirs of Rt. Rev. Brian Walton, 1821, 2 vols.; Life of Archbishop Cramer, 1831, 2 vols.; Authentic Account of our Authorized Translation of the Bible, 1835.
TODD, James Henthorn, D.D., Irish Church; b. at Dublin, April 23, 1805; d. at Silveracre, Rathfarnham, near Dublin, June 28, 1869. He was graduated B.A. at Trinity College, Dublin, 1825; fellow, 1826; tutor, 1828 and 1841; revisor-professor of Hebrew, 1849; librarian to the University, 1852; precentor of St. Patrick's, Dublin, for five years. He wrote two courses of Donnellan lectures, viz., On the Prophecies relating to Antichrist in the Writings of Daniel and St. Paul, 1840, ditto, in the Apocalypse of St. John, 1846; Historical Memoirs of the Successors of St. Patrick and Archbishop of Armagh, 1861, 2 vols.; Memoir of St. Patrick's Life and Mission, 1863; edited some of Wiclif's writings (see literature under that art.), and greatly distinguished himself as an Irish antiquary.

TODD, John, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Rutland, Vt., Oct. 9, 1800; d. at Pittsfield, Mass., Aug. 24, 1873. He was graduated at Yale College, 1825; studied four years at Andover Theological Seminary; was pastor in Groton, Mass., Aug. 24, 1831 to 1872. He offered prayer at the driving of the last spike of the Central Pacific Railroad. He was a man of national reputation, and the author of many excellent and widely circulated books, among which may be mentioned Lectures to Children, Northampton, 1854 and 1858, 2 series (translated into French, German, Greek, etc., printed in raised letters for the blind, and used as a school-book for the liberated slaves in Sierra Leone); Student's Manual, 1835, new English edition, London, 1857; Index Rerum, 1835 (prepared for noting books read); Sabbath-school Teacher, 1836; Simple Sketches, Pittsfield, 1843, 2 vols.; Future Punishment, New York, 1863; Hints and Thoughts for Christians, 1867; Woman's Rights, 1867; The Sunset and the Great Pacific Slope, 1870. A collected edition of his books appeared in London, 1853, later edition, 1870. See John Todd, the Story of his Life told mainly by Himself, New York, 1876.

TOLAND, John, a distinguished English deist; was b. near Londonderry, Ireland, Nov. 30, 1669; d. at Putney, March 11, 1722. He was born of Roman-Catholic parentage (was charged with being the illegitimate son of a priest), changed his original name, Janus Junius, at school, and became a Protestant at the age of sixteen. He studied at the universities of Glasgow, Edinburgh (where he graduated M.A., 1690), and Leyden, where he studied theology with a view to becoming a dissenting minister. He spent several years at Oxford, and in 1696 published his principal work, Christianity not Mysterious (2d ed., Amsterdam, 1702), which made a great sensation. The conclusions of the book are not very distinct; but the author defines that to be "mysterious" which is "above," not "contrary to," reason, and declares that Christianity contains nothing "mysterious" (that is, not before revealed). He declares himself a good Christian and a good Churchman. The book was burnt by the hangman at Dublin on Sept. 11, 1707. "From this time on, he led a Bohemian life, fitting between London and the Continent; wrote some political pamphlets favoring the claims of the house of Brunswick; spent some time in the house of Commons, and died a pensioner of Lord Molesworth. He defended his Christianity not Mysterious, in an Apology for Mr. Toland, London, 1697, and Vindictus liberi, London, 1702. He published an edition of Milton's Works, Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous, with a Life, London, 1697, 1698, 3 vols.; Amyntor, or a Defence of Milton's Life, 1699 (construed into an attack upon the canon); Tetræodimus, 1720; Impartial History of Servetus, 1724, etc. An historical account of his life and writings appeared in 1722, and a Life by Huddleston, Montrose, 1814. His Posthumous Works were published, London, 1726, in 2 vols., with a Life by Des Maizeaux. See Leland: Deist. Writers; Leckler: Deismus; A. S. Farrar: Critical History of Free Thought (lect. iv.); Stephen: History of English Thought, etc. (i. 101 sqq.).

TOLEDO, Councils of. The old Spanish city of Toledo (Toletoem), on the Tagus, [forty-two miles south-west of Madrid, with a population to-day of eighteen thousand, and still the seat of an archbishop], early became the seat of an archbishopric, and was the scene of numerous church synods. The First Council was called by Bishop Patronus, or Petruinus, of Toledo, in 406. With eighteen other bishops, he passed twenty-two canons against the Priscillianists. A second council was probably held there in 447, in obedience to the demand of Pope Leo the Great, that the Spanish bishops should take further measures against the Priscillianists. The bishops of four provinces constructed a creed in Toledo, in which it is to be noticed that the phrase, "proceeding from the Father and the Son" (a patre filioque procedens), occurs. In the twelve anathemas that are appended to it are found the best materials for the knowledge of the doctrines of the Priscillianists. The Roman dominion in Spain was overthrown in the latter part of the fifth century by the West Goths, who ruled for fifty years from Toulouse as the seat of power. They were zealous Arians, but did not institute severe persecutions against the Catholics. The Second Council of Toledo (synod. Toletana II.) was held in 581 (or 527), and passed five unimportant canons. In 581 the king of the West Goths took up his residence in Toledo. This change gave to the city great importance as a civil and ecclesiastical centre. In 581 or 582 the Arian King Leuwigild held a synod of the Arian bishops in the city to take measures for the conversion of the Catholics. But the Goths, instead of converting the Catholics, were themselves converted; the Catholic bishops having full control of the people who were Catholics, and never ceasing to denounce the Gothic rulers as foreigners, barbarians, heretics, etc. King Reccared entered the Catholic Church in 589, and in the same year called the celebrated Third Council of Toledo. After three days of fasting and prayer, the assembly held its first sitting May 3, but did not meet in the city, and passed. In his address the phrase, proceedit a patre et a filio ("proceedeth from the Father and the Son"). He announced, as the reason for his having convened the city.
the synod, his desire to lay down a confession of his orthodoxy. He pronounced the anathema over Arius, and expressed his acceptance of the creeds of Nicea, Constantinople (with the addition of the statement, "proceeding from the Father and the Son"), and Chalcodon. The Goths who took part in the synod condemned Arianism in twenty-three articles. The synod also passed twenty-three articles bearing upon the administration of the church and social evils. These were signed by the king, sixty-four bishops, and seven episcopal substitutes. Leand of Seville closed the proceedings with an address.

The Fourth Council of Toledo (two local councils having been held in 587 and 610) was called by King Sisemund, and convened Dec. 5, 638. Sixty-four bishops were present, and Isidore of Seville acted as president. The king, who had dethroned his predecessor Suintila, threw himself prostrate before the bishops, and with tears begged their intercession with God for himself. The synod passed seventy-five articles confirming the rights of the king, pronouncing eternal excommunication upon all who engaged in rebellion against him. The Fifth Council of Toledo convened in 636, at the command of the King Chintila, who sought thereby to confirm his power. The Sixth Council of Toledo was summoned by the same king, in 638. Fifty-two bishops were present. All crimes against the king were declared punishable with eternal damnation. The Seventh Council of Toledo was held in 646, under Chindsawinth, who had risen to the throne by intrigue, called the Twelfth Council of Toledo, in order to have his claims to the throne by violence. In the collection of the acts of the councils, decrees about the offices of archdeacon, presbyter, sacristan, etc., are attributed to this council, which have no connection with it whatever. The Eighth Council of Toledo was opened by King Receswinth, on Dec. 16, 653. Fifty-two bishops, twelve abbots, sixteen knights, and ten episcopal vicars, were present. The council re-affirmed the the collection of the oath of fealty to the king, and took measures against the Jews and heretics. The Ninth Council of Toledo convened Nov. 2, 655, transacted no important business. The Tenth Council met in 556, and convened Nov. 9, 694; the occasion for it was a conspiracy against the king, in which the Jews were said to have had the principal part. It was ordered that the Jews should be deprived of their property, and with their wives and children put under the protection of Christians as slaves: Jewish maidens were to marry Christian men; and Jewish men, Christian maidens. The Eighteenth and last Council of Toledo was held probably in 701. Its decrees are lost. Soon after its adjournment the kingdom of the West Goths succumbed to the Mohammedans, and for several centuries the Spanish Church had no opportunity to hold synods.

Looking over the history of the councils of Toledo, we find that the right was conceded to the king of calling and opening the synods, and authorizing their decrees. Civil affairs were adjudicated as well as ecclesiastical matters, and the prime occasion of many of the synods was the settlement of some question concerning the crown. The synods had become parliaments. The metropolitan of Toledo secured great power, but was not regarded as the primate of the Spanish Church. See Crenn: De autore, eccles. Hispaniae; Heffe: Conciliiengeschichte; [Gams: Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, 1862 sqq.]

TOLEDO. TOLET.

TOLEDOTH JESHU ([i.e., history] of Jesus”), a Jewish apocryphal work of the middle age, made up of "fragmentary Talmudic legends" which pretend to be a life of Jesus, but is in reality a clumsy and stupid fiction. Its author is unknown. Luther shows up the book in his usual vigorous style in his Schen Hamphoras. There are two widely different reconstructions of it. Wagensiel published a Latin translation of one in his Tela Ignea Salutar, Abo, 1861; and Huldrich of the other, in his Historia Jesuchor Nazareni a Judaeis blaspheme corrupra, Leyden, 1705. According to the first, Jesus was born B.C. 106-79; according to the second, B.C. 70-4. TOLET, Francis, a learned Jesuit writer upon ethics and casuistry, and exegete; was b. in Cordova, Oct. 12, or Nov. 10, 1582; d. at Rome, Sept. 14, 1596. After studying at Salamanca, he became professor there of philosophy; and was transferred to Rome, where he acted in the same capacity. A succession of popes held him in the highest esteem, and transferred him to diplomatic offices. Clement VIII. made him cardinal, hoping the first Jesuit to receive this honor. Six-TOMBES, John, b. at Beaudley, Worcestershire, 1603; d. at Salisbury, May 22, 1676. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1824; entered holy orders; soon became famous for his preaching; especially among the Puritans, and was successively lecturer at St. Martin's, Oxford, preacher at Worcester, 1630, shortly afterwards at Leominster (Lemster), and 1641 at Bristol; master of the Temple, London, 1647; preacher at Beaudley, 1647. In Beaudley he had for his near neighbor Richard Baxter at Kidderminster. Each had his numerous admirers, many of whom made a long journey each week to hear his favorite. Between Tombes and Baxter there was incessant controversy, especially upon infant baptism and church polity. In 1658 Tombes was appointed one of the triers for the approbation of public ministers, and removed to London. In 1658 he married a rich widow, and retired from pastoral duties. He conformed at the Restoration, and lived out his days in quietness and prosperity. He was a vigorous, learned, and unwearyed opponent of infant baptism. He had public debates upon this topic with Baxter and others, and wrote numerous treatises upon it. For a list of his writings and further account of the man, see Wood: Athen. Oxon. (ed. Bliss), iii. 1062-1067. Of his writings may be mentioned, Two treatises and an appendix to them concerning Infant Baptism, London, 1845; Apology for two treatises, 1846; Anti-pedobaptism, 1852, 1854, 1857, 3 parts; Sephensheba, or the oath-book, 1862; Saints no smiters, shewing the doctrine of Fifth-Monarchy men to be antichristian, 1864; Emanuel, concerning the two natures in Christ, 1869; Animadversiones in librum G. Built, Harmonia apostolica, 1876.

TOMLINE, George, D.D., Church of England; b. at Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, Oct. 9, 1750; d. at Winchester, Nov. 14, 1827. Graduated at Cambridge, he was successively rector of Corwen (1782), prebend of St Peter's, Westminster (1784), rector of Sudbury-cum-Offord, Suffolk (1785), bishop of Lincoln, with the deanery of St. Paul's (January, 1787), and finally bishop of Winchester (July, 1820). His family name was Pretyman, but he changed his own name to Tomline in order to inherit a considerable fortune. He left two hundred thousand pounds. He is best known by his Elements of Christian Theology, London, 1799, 2 vols. (14th ed., 1843; vol. i. separately printed as Introduction to the Study of the Bible; new ed., 1876); Refutation of the Charge of Calvinism against the Church of England, 1811; Memoirs of Pitt, 1821.

TONGUES, Gift of, a phenomenon of the apostolic age, technically known as the "glossolalia." It first showed itself in Jerusalem, upon Pentecost (Acts ii. 4), but was repeated in other places (x. 46, xix. 6; 1 Cor. xii., xiv.). Paul, in the passages last cited, gives a full description of it. But it has been questioned whether the "glossolalia" of Pentecost was identical with that at Cesarea, Ephesus, and Corinth. The true view seems to be that it was; viz., "an "act of worship, and not of teaching. With only a slight difference in the medium of interpretation, it was at once internally interpreted and applied by the Holy Spirit himself to those hearers who believed and were converted, to each in his own vernacular dialect; while in Corinth the interpretation was made either by the speaker in tongues on the ground of being "endowed with the gift of interpretation." It was not a speaking in foreign languages; for, as a matter of fact, only Greek and Hebrew were requisite for the apostles' work, and these they already knew. It had nothing to do directly with the spread of the gospel. It was an act of self-devotion, emotional rather than intellectual, excited rather than calm. If one was not in a similar condition, the glossolalia was like the incoherent talk of a drunken man.

How long the phenomenon lasted, it is impossible to say, but probably not longer than the apostolic age. In later times analogies have been found for it in the "speaking in tongues" of the Camisards, Prophets of the Cevennes, early Quakers and Methodists, Mormons, "Lisaks" in Sweden (1841-43), converts in the Irish revival of 1839, and particularly in the Catholic Apostolic (Irvingite) Church.

Other explanations of the glossolalia are: (1) It was a mistake of the narrators there was no such phenomenon — this is the rationalistic explanation; (2) It was a mistake of the hearers, they only imagined it; (3) It was speaking in archaic and foreign forms of speech; (4) It was the language of heaven or of paradise; (5) It was a permanent miraculous endowment with a knowledge of those foreign tongues in which the apostles were to preach the gospel; (6) It was a temporary speaking in foreign languages, and ended with the Day of Pentecost.

TONSURE, The, denotes the practice of the Roman-Catholic and Greek churches, by which a portion of the skull of the priests is shaven. It precedes the consecration to clerical orders, and is a specific mark of distinction between the clergy and the laity (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 6). He who has once received the tonsure must always retain it. It may be conferred upon candidates in their seventh year, but in this case they may not exercise spiritual functions till they are fourteen years old (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 8). The tonsure is regarded as a symbol of Christ's crown of thorns, the regal dignity of the priesthood, and the renunciation of the world, and is sometimes based upon Acts xxi. 24, 26, 1 Cor. xi. 14, 15. It is held that Paul and Peter practised it. It is an historical fact, that, in the fourth century, neither monks nor priests imposed the tonsure (so also Wetzer and Welte). The cutting of the beard, and hair of the head, was forbidden by the Council of Carthage (388); and Jerome, in his Commentary on Ezek. xlv., says that the Christian priest was not to appear with shorn head, lest he be confounded with the priests of Isis and Serapis, and other heathen divinities. The custom of cutting the hair at first prevailed... among the penitent, and was taken up by the monks in the fifth century. They shaved the hair down to the skin; and this practice was considered symbolic of penitence. From the sixth century on, the priests followed the practice. Three principal styles of tonsure have prevailed. The Roman tonsure consists of the shaving of the entire skull, except a ring of hair extending all around the head. According to tradition, Peter's tonsure was of this kind. The synod of Toledo, in 633, decreed this style for Spain. The extent of the shaven part was gradually diminished; but the synod of Placentia (1388) ordered that it should be at least four fingers broad. The Greek tonsure, also called "the tonsure of Paul," consists in shaving the fore-part of the skull entirely bare. The Keltic or British tonsure, called also "the tonsure of James or Simon Magnus," consists in shaving the head bare in front of a line drawn across the skull from ear to ear. [The style of the tonsure formed a subject of most violent controversy in England after the arrival of Augustine and his monks, until the final victory of the Roman type of Christianity over the old Keltic Church in the eighth century.]

The tonsure is conferred by the bishops, cardinal priests, and abbots (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 10). The Pope may also vest the right in priests. [See Bede: Historia Ecclesiastica, iv. 1; Martene: De antiq. eccles. rit.; art. "Tonsur," in Wetzer u. Welte.

TOPLADY, Augustus Montague, was b. at Farnham in Surrey, Nov. 4, 1740; and d. in London, Aug. 11, 1778. He was "awakened" in a barn in Ireland, 1755, and "led into a full and clear view of the doctrines of grace," 1758. He was ordained 1762, and was vicar of Broad Hembury, Devonshire, from 1768 till his death. He published The Church of England vindicated, and was made cardinal in 1430. He wrote De conceptione deiparae Mariae, libri viii. (Rome, 1547, ed. with preface and notes, by Dr. E. B. Pusey, Lond., 1699, etc.), and died at Rome, Sept. 26, 1498. See Lederer: Der spanische Central-Journal von Torquemada, etc.; Leben u. seine Schriften, Freiburg-im-Breisgau, 1879.

II. Thomas de, the famous inquisitor, was b. at Valladolid, 1429; d. at Avila, Sept. 10, 1498. He belonged to the order of St. Dominic, and gave himself up wholly to the organization of the Spanish Inquisition, and overcame the scruples of Isabella. It was at the request of Ferdinand and herself that the "Holy Office" of the Inquisition was created by Sixtus IV., Nov. 1, 1478. When this Pope determined to appoint an inquisitor-general, the appointment fell on Torquemada (1492). The laws and methods of the Spanish Inquisition were his work. The laws appeared in Madrid, 1570, with the title Copiacion de las instrucciones del oficio de la santa inquisition, h echas por el muy reverendo senor Fray Thomas de Torquemada, etc. It was due largely to him that the large sum offered by the Jews was not accepted by Ferdinand, and that they were expelled from Spain in 1492. Torquemada's name has become synonymous with cold-blooded cruelty. Longfellow has a fine poem on the subject; and Prescott has given a picture of him in his Ferdinand and Isabella. See Inquisition.

TORREY, Joseph, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Rowley, Mass., Feb. 2, 1797; d. at Burlington, Vt., Nov. 26, 1867. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1816, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1819; pastor at Royalton, Vt., 1819-27; professor of Latin and Greek in the University of Vermont, 1827-42; and of intellectual and moral philosophy from 1842 till his death. He was president of the university from 1863 to 1865. He edited the Remains of President James Marsh, 1843, the Select Sermons of President Worthington Smith, 1861, prefacing each volume with a carefully prepared Memoir; wrote A Theory of Fine Art (lectures, New York, 1874); but his greatest service was his masterly translation of Neander's General History of the Christian Religion and Church. Boston, 12th ed., 1881, 5 vols., with model index volume.

TOSSANUS, Petrus (Pierre Toussaint), b. at Saint-Laurent, Lorraine, in 1499; d. at Mompel-
Edwards, a Baptist minister in Taunton, 1765; but, becoming a Unitarian, he was the author of several books, of which may be mentioned, Memoirs of Faustus Socinus, London, 1777; Review of Life of John Biddle, 1789; History of the Town of Taunton, Taunton, 1791; Biographical Tribute to Dr. Priestley, London, 1804; Memoirs of Samuel Bourne, 1809; Historical View of the Protestant Dissenters in England under King William, 1814; and edited, with Life, Neal's History of the Puritans, 1794-1809; Historical View of the Protestant Dissenters, 1815.

TOULMIN, Joshua, D.D., English Unitarian; b. in London, May 11, 1740; d. at Birmingham, July 28, 1815. He was a Baptist minister at Taunton, 1765; but, becoming a Unitarian, he was one of Dr. Priestley's successors at Birmingham. He was the author of several books, of which may be mentioned, Memoirs of Faustus Socinus, London, 1777; Review of Life of John Biddle, 1789; History of the Town of Taunton, Taunton, 1791; Biographical Tribute to Dr. Priestley, London, 1804; Memoirs of Samuel Bourne, 1809; Historical View of the Protestant Dissenters in England under King William, 1814; and edited, with Life, Neal's History of the Puritans, 1794-1809; Historical View of the Protestant Dissenters, 1815.

TOULOUSE, Synods of. Many ecclesiastical councils have been held in Toulouse, some of which are important. At the suggestion of Louis, a synod was convened in Toulouse, probably in 829. The decrees are lost. One was held in 883 to adjust the complaint which Jews had made to King Carlmann, of being abused by clergy and laity. One in 1056, summoned by Pope Victor II., consisted of eighteen bishops, and passed thirteen canons forbidding simony, insinuating upon the rule of celibacy, and placing the age of ordination to priests' orders at thirty, and to deacons' orders at twenty-five. The synod of 1118 was concerned with the inception of a crusade against the Moors in Spain. The synod which Pope Calixtus II. presided over in person reiterated the laws against simony, confirmed the right of the bishops to tithes, etc. The synod of 1161, at which the kings of France and England, and legates of Pope Alexander III. and his rival, Victor III., were present, declared Alexander pope, and pronounced excommunication upon Victor. The synod of 1219 forbade the conferment of offices upon heretics, and forbade all work upon church-festival days which are mentioned by name.

The synod of 1229, in the pontificate of Gregory IX., is important. It obligated archbishops and bishops, or priests, and two or three laymen, to bind themselves by oath to search out heretics, and bring them to punishment. A heretic's house was to be destroyed. Penitent heretics were to be obliged to wear a cross on their right and left side, and might not receive an office until the Pope or his legate should attest the purity of his faith. All men of fourteen years and over, and all women of twelve years and over, were to be required to deny all connection with heresy and heretics. This oath was to be repeated every two years. Laymen were also forbidden the possession of the Old and New Testament; and the suppression of vernacular translations was especially commanded. In 1590 a Council of Toulouse declared the Tridentine Decrees binding, and took up various subjects, such as relics, the consecration of churches, oratories, the administration of hospitals, etc. As late as 1850 a provincial synod was held at Toulouse, under the presidency of Archbishop d'Astros, which declared against the tendencies of modern thought, indiffer- entism, socialism, etc.; and for a sketch of Toulouse's religious history, Vincent: In the Shadow of the Pyrenees, New York, 1883, pp. 211-232. TOURNEMINE, René Joseph, b. at Rennes, April 26, 1861; d. in Paris, March 16, 1875. He was educated by the Jesuits; entered their order, taught theology and philosophy in several of their houses, and was in 1896 placed at the head of the Journal de Trévoux, which he conducted till 1712 with great moderation and tact. He also published in 1719 an excellent edition of the Brevis expositionis sensus literalis totius scripturae (Cologne, 1630, 2 vols.) of the Jesuit Menochius (b. at Padua, 1576; d. at Rome, Feb. 4, 1655); but his principal work, Traité sur le Deisme, remained unfinished. See Journal de Trévoux, September, 1736.

TOURS, Synods of. The first synod of Tours of which any account has been preserved convened in 461, passed thirteen canons re-affirming the decrees of former synods, forbidding priests to whom the privilege of marriage was accorded to marry widows, pronouncing excommunication upon priests who renounced their orders, etc. The synod of 567 met with the consent of King Charibert, and passed twenty-seven canons regulating matters of church-discipline. The synod of 593 was convened by the order of Charlemagne, and passed fifty-one canons defining the duties of bishops, putting the ordination of priests in their thirteenth year, regulating the relation of nuns and monks, forbidding markets on Sunday, etc. The canons close with a profession of absolute submission to Charlemagne. Another synod was held at the time the remains of St. Martin were conveyed from Auxerre to Tours, either in 912 or 887. The synod of 942 is barely mentioned, and that of 1065 was convened with reference to the views of Berengar concerning the Lord's Supper, which had been condemned as heretical. Berengar on that occasion renounced his views.

In 1090 the cardinal legate Stephen convened a synod at Tours, which concerned itself with the purchase and sale of church-offices, the licentiousness and concubinage of the clergy, etc. The council of 1096 was occupied with the release of King Philip of France from the ban of the church, and with the preparation for the first crusade. In 1163 Pope Alexander III. presided in person over a synod at Toulouse which excommunicated the antipope, Victor IV., and recognized his own claims. The synods of 1236 and 1282 were concerned with matters of church-discipline. The important synod of 1510 took up the violent conflict which was then raging between Louis XI. of France and the belligerent Pope, Julius II. The chancellor of Louis opened the council with complaints against the Pope, and in the king's name presented several questions to the assembled dignitaries bearing upon the relations of states to the papal see. The first of these was whether the Pope might carry on war against princes who with their lands acknowledged allegiance to the church. The synod answered that the Pope had no right to begin any such war. A second question con-
The series consisted of ninety tracts, of which Newman wrote twenty-four, and Keble also a goodly number. The movement was essentially a revival of medieval ecclesiasticism and scholasticism, in protest to evangelicalism, and to that political liberalism which abolished the Test Act in 1828, and ten of the Irish bishopries in 1833, whose occupants had voted against the Reform Bill of 1831. The way was prepared for the movement by John Keble's Christian Year, 1827. Its real founder was Hugh James Rose. Its start was given by A. P. Perceval's Christian Peace-Offering, 1828. The object of this book was to show that the Anglican and Roman churches were essentially agreed. Then came Froude, who argued that the existing Roman Church had departed from the primitive faith, and so, in a less degree, had the Anglican Church, but that the teachings of the latter admitted of construction in the sense of the primitive church. He therefore urged the claims of celibacy, fasting, relics, and monasticism. But, as the tendency of the political movements of their time was directly against such a return of the middle age, the little coterie at Oxford published The Churchman's Manual (1833), in which they made prominent the three points of the Tractarianism movement, the importance of the sacraments, and the significance of the priesthood. On July 14, 1833, Keble preached an assign sermon upon National Apostasy, from 1 Sam. xii. 23. This sermon Newman regarded as the actual start of the movement. Upon July 25–29, 1833, Rose, Froude, Keble, Newman, Palmer, and Perceval held a conference at Hadleigh, to revise the Manual, and devise a plan of action. It was then agreed that the two points to be aimed at were the maintenance of the doctrine of apostolic succession, and the preservation of the Prayer-Book from Socinian alteration. In September, Keble drew up the programme of the party; and on Sept. 9, 1833, the first Tract for the Times (designed to indoctrinate the laity in Catholic theology and polity) appeared, and the coterie, through the middle of 1834, received the name "Tractarians," as the writers or compilers of the tracts themselves, and as the indorsers of the sentiments advocated. The first tract was by Newman, entitled Thoughts on the Ministerial Commission. The Churchman's Manual had been sent to all the Scottish bishops, and approved by them, while the Archbishop of Canterbury did not object to its publication. And the first tract had the found a warm reception. They were looked upon as valuable allies in the defence of the Established Church against the insidious attacks of the Liberals. By November, 1835, seventy of them had appeared. The first sixty-six consist of extracts from the Fathers, Beveridge, Bull, Cosin, and Wilson, with a few original tracts. The succeeding twenty-four are longer, and more elaborate. They make altogether six volumes. But the movement was by no means a peaceful progress. In March, 1834, the Christian Observer, an Evangelical newspaper, decried it as Romanistic. Newman, in Tracts 38 and 41 (Via media), denied the charge. In 1836 the Tractarians vigorously opposed the appointment of Renn Dickson Hampden, D.D., principal of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, to the regius-professorship of divinity, on the ground of his latitudinarian principles.
great pamphlet war was thus opened; but the Tractarians were defeated. In 1837 the Rome-ward tendency of the party more plainly manifested itself, especially in Isaac Williams’s tract (No. 80), On Reserve in Communicating Religious Knowledge. It advocated a revival of the discipline arcani of the Anti-Nicene Church, i.e., the ideas that there were doctrines which should not be publicly taught; and that the Bible should not be promiscuously circulated. Keble’s tracts were in similar strain. The effect of such writing was twofold,—the public was disquieted, and certain members of the Tractarian party avowed their intention to become Romanists. In 1838 the Library of the Fathers (see Patristics) was started by the Tractarians, and in 1840 the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, which contained old High-Church writers of the Church of England who more or less sympathized with the views of the Tractarians. But so decided was the setting of the tide towards Rome, that Newman made a vigorous effort to turn it by his famous tract (No. 90), Remarks on Certain Passages in the Thirty-nine Articles, in which he endeavored to show how it was possible to interpret the Thirty-nine Articles in the interest of Catholicism. He maintained that “the sixth and twentieth articles, on Holy Scripture and the authority of the Church, were not inconsistent with the Anglo-Catholic idea; that the true rule of faith is not in Scripture alone, but in apostolic tradition; that Art. XI., on justification by faith only, did not exclude the doctrine of baptismal justification, and of justification by works as well; that Arts. XIX. and XXI., on the Catholic Church and the church with the apostolical succession, did not mean that the true church is not infallible, but that the idea of express supernatural privilege, that councils properly called were not err, lies beyond the scope of these articles, or at any rate beside their determination; that Art. XXII., on purgatory, pardons, images, relics, and invocation of saints, only condemned the Romish doctrine concerning them, not any other doctrine on these subjects, consequent not the Anglo-Catholic; that Art. XXV. did not deny that confirmation, penance, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, were sacraments, but only that they were not sacraments in the same sense as baptism and the Lord’s Supper; that councils properly called shall not err, lies beyond the scope of these articles, or at any rate beside their determination; that Art. XIX., on justification by faith only, did not exclude the doctrine of baptismal justification, and of justification by works as well; that Arts. XIX. and XXI., on the Catholic Church and the church with the apostolical succession, did not mean that the true church is not infallible, but that the idea of express supernatural privilege, that councils properly called shall not err, lies beyond the scope of these articles, or at any rate beside their determination; that Art. XXII., on purgatory, pardons, images, relics, and invocation of saints, only condemned the Romish doctrine concerning them, not any other doctrine on these subjects, consequent not the Anglo-Catholic; that Art. XXV. did not deny that confirmation, penance, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, were sacraments, but only that they were not sacraments in the same sense as baptism and the Lord’s Supper; that Art. XXXIII. only condemned gross views of transubstantiation, not the mysterious presence of the body of Christ. The articles on masses and clerical celibacy were in like manner explained away” (Stoughton). The tract appeared in March, 1841; Newman acknowledged on the 13th. The violent controversy while the tract occasioned led to the “discontinuance” of the series.

The tract, although nominally an attempt to dissociate from Rome, was denounced as in reality leading towards it. Then came a sitting of the party. Those who were content to stay in the Church of England drew all the closer together. They were such men as Pusey, Williams, Keble, and Perceval. But soon the movement swept away from this middle position such leading spirits as Newman and Faber in 1845, and Manning in 1851. Before 1853 not less than four hundred clergymen and laity had become Roman Catholics. They were “chiefly impressionable undergraduates, young ladies, and young ladies’ cu-architecture, in vestments, in music (vocal and instrumental), was insisted upon, with the result of striking improvement. Enormous sums have been spent in these directions. Cathedrals have been restored, religious houses have been erected, and the appointments of the sanctuary multiplied and refined.

And Tractarianism powerfully affected the religious life of thousands. The church was to be served by organizations for religious and philanthropic action, and these have sprung into existence. The influence of doctrine upon life was emphasized; daily duties were explained and enforced, and so the movement proved a good thing to the community. But it has also been a fruitful source of secession to Rome, and has produced an agnostic and rationalistic reaction and interest in the Church of England.

TRACT SOCIETIES, Religious. I. Great Britain.—The maintenance and diffusion of religious opinion by means of pamphlets or tractates is a habit older than the invention of printing; and perhaps John Wiclif was the greatest tract-writer that ever lived. But it has been reserved to modern times to make full use of the same method as a means of evangelization; and tract societies are now recognized by all churches as among their most effective instruments for good. Among the pioneers in this work, a foremost place must be given to Hannah More, whose Cheap Repository tracts, towards the close of the eighteenth century, circulated by hundreds of thousands, served greatly to counteract the influence of the irreligious, anti-social, cheap literature which at that time was diffused, chiefly by hawkers, throughout Great Britain. The Book Society for promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor had been formed as long back as 1750. But a new departure was taken in this direction in 1780 by the formation of the Religious Tract Society in London, chiefly through the influence of the Rev. George Burder of Coventry and his coadjutors; the Rev. Joseph Hughes of Battersea being the first secretary. The object set forth in the first minute was "to form a society for the purpose of printing and distributing religious tracts." The first meeting was held in Surrey Chapel, the Rev. Rowland Hill himself exerting much influence there by his eloquent address. The principles from the first were recognized: first, that there is a common Christian faith, in the expression and enforcement of which all evangelical believers may unite, irrespective of ecclesiastical or doctrinal distinctions; and, secondly, that this faith may be set forth in so brief a compass and so simple a way, that even the smallest tract may contain the essentials of saving truth. A third principle, no less important than these two, had to await full recognition until a later day,—that the great verities of religion may rightly be associated with every topic of human thought and interest; the Christianity of the Bible thus becoming the animating spirit of a various, instructive, and ennobling literature. At the outset, the production of tracts was the only aim; and the value of the method, as well as the appropriateness and interest of the publications issued, led to a speedy enlargement of the work beyond the anticipations of its early promoters. The tracts of the society were issued by thousands, and obtained that place in the esteem of Christian workers generally which they have ever since retained. Nor was the testimony given to the real unity of Christ's church less valuable. Very early in the history of the society it was adopted as a fundamental rule, that its managers should be taken in equal numbers from the Church of England and from the ranks of Non-conformity. The experience of more than eighty years has shown that it is not only possible, but easy, for all to labor together in this work, without any compromise of individual opinions, or any entanglement in doctrinal or ecclesiastical dispute; and that it is possible for the society, but such as exclude themselves, on the one hand by a rigid churchmanship, or on the other by a rationalism which seems to ignore important principles of evangelical truth. Nor has this comprehensiveness been evinced only in one special work. It was in the committee room of the Religious Tract Society, at the close of the year 1802, that the British and Foreign Bible Society was originated, and on Tuesday, Feb. 1, 1803, that its rules were finally adopted; the diffusion of the streams thus naturally leading to the fountain-head. From the first, the two societies have labored together in brotherly union for the evangelization of the world.

The Tracts of the society, in accordance with its name and first design, claim the chief place in our notice of its publications. These are of immense variety in style and form, adapted to every class of readers, old and young. Every tract, before adoption by the society, is submitted to the whole committee, and decided on by vote. It is held as essential that every tract should set forth the way of salvation, by the atonement of Christ, and through the work of the Holy Spirit in the heart. And, further, it is required that the narrative in these tracts should be literally true. Fiction, it is held, has its becoming place in literature; but a tract, to win the highest usefulness, should deal with real personages and actual experiences. Of the tracts produced under these conditions, there are now about 8,200 on the society's catalogue, from the single-page handbill to the important series of Present-day Tracts, in which some of the foremost scholars and thinkers of the day have employed their pens for the defence of the Christian faith. The tract circulation in the year 1882-83, in the English language alone, amounted to 38,249,800.

But, as has been already intimated, the work of the society now extends far beyond the production of tracts. The publication of Books was very gradually introduced, and the earliest attempts in this direction seem to have been to popularize the standard works of "Puritan" divinity. Through the indefatigable energy of Mr. George Stokes, a gentleman of fortune (founder, in 1840, of the well-known Parker Society), who...
The range of the society's publications has been gradually widened beyond that of exclusively religious teaching. Books "on common subjects written in a religious spirit," to adopt the phrase of Dr. Arnold, have been multiplied. Foremost among these in utility has been the Educational Series, including the well-known Handbooks of the English Language and of English Literature, by Dr. Angus; also Histories of England, Greece, and Rome, with a system of Universal Geography. For some years a sixpenny Monthly Volume treated, in a popular but thoroughly competent way, many great questions of philosophy, science, and history. These were truly "small books on great subjects," and have had an important share in the education of many. Biographies published by the society have been very numerous, both of the saints and heroes of the church, and of many in humble positions, whose example it seemed well to preserve. The lives of Tyndale and of Latimer, by the late Robert Densmore, rank among the highest in this class of literature; and it may be that almost as much real usefulness has been achieved by Legh Richmond's Annals of the Poor, or the unpretending memoir of Harian Page.

Books of a yet more popular class have been published by the society in great abundance. The Pilgrim's Progress has been issued in sixty-five languages, mainly by the society's aid. For many years the kindly humor of "Old Humphrey"—the "Christian Elia," as he was called by the late Dr. James Hamilton—irradiated many a little volume, both for younger and for elder readers. The name of this charming author was George Mogridge. He died in 1854, at the age of sixty-seven. A long array of juvenile publications, from Mrs. Sherwood's Little Henry and his Bearer, down to the last boys' story by Mr. G. E. Sargent, or pathetic tale by "Hesba Stretton," provides reading for every taste. Jessica's First Prayer, by the late Archdeacon S. Stillingfleet, has amounted to 375,500 copies, inclusive of a penny edition recently published. Christy's Old Organ, by Mrs. Walton, is also well known on both sides of the Atlantic, and has been remarkably useful to many readers. The illustrations of this class of books, and of others published by the society of late years, have been, in their finish and artistic merit, a striking contrast to those contained in its earlier volumes. The highest resources of the wood-engraver's art are now called into requisition; and, in a special series of Pen and Pencil Pictures from many lands, the descriptive and the artistic portions vie with each other in the care with which they have been elaborated. The Harvest of a Quiet Eye, and other works of poetic, meditative musing, by the same author, may also be mentioned, for the beauty and finish of their pictorial illustrations.

The Periodicals of the society have also become a very important part of its work. The first was The Child's Companion, begun in 1824, and still teaching its attractive lessons to generation after generation of little ones. The Weekly Visitor (commenced in 1828) for many years sought to combine useful information with Christian teaching; but in 1852 the same work was undertaken by The Leisure Hour, with a higher standard of literary merit. The Sunday at Home attempts for the Lord's Day what The Leisure Hour strives to do for the week. In 1875 The Boy's Own Paper was started as a weekly journal, followed by The Girl's Own Paper in 1880. Intended at the outset to convey healthful moral and religious teaching, with a due admixture of the attractive and amusing, so as to supersede as far as possible the frivolous and often debasing literature offered to our young people, the success of these publications has surpassed the highest expectations of their promoters, and English-speaking boys and girls throughout the whole world welcome them as their own magazines. The circulation of the two together now amounts to about 350,000 of each number. The Tract Magazine and The Cotter and Artisan are also published by the society.

There are now in all some 10,000 separate publications on the catalogue of the society; and taking into account the books, tracts, and periodicals, with illustrated cards, texts, and the like, the total issues of the year 1882-83 have amounted to a total of 79,379,350; being by far the largest number in any year of the society's existence.

The Religious Tract Society is also a great Missionary Institution. For the furtherance of its highest purposes, the committee make every week large grants of tracts to distributors at home and abroad, either altogether gratuitously, or at a considerable reduction in price. One circumstance that contributes no little to its usefulness is, that it has at its back, so to speak, a vast army of Christian men and women who are voluntarily engaged in circulating its publications, often accompanying the silent message with the living voice, and so in a twofold manner acting the part of evangelists. Part of the constant work of the committee is to second and assist their efforts. Tracts are supplied in unstinted numbers for missionary efforts of every kind, for hospital and workhouse visitation, for emigrant and other ships, for soldiers on service abroad, and for use in hospitals. As far as possible, all expenses are defrayed.

To a great extent, also, the circulation of the books published by the society is aided by the plans of the committee. Thus all pastors, and missionaries of all denominations, are permitted, in the first year of their ministry, to purchase these publications at a greatly reduced price. School and district libraries are furnished at a large reduction, and great facilities for purchase are allowed to Sunday-school teachers. In the efforts also to diffuse a Christian literature in foreign languages, the society is continually active, having representatives or correspondents in every country of Europe, and in all the chief missionary fields of the East and West. It publishes, or aids the publication of, tracts, books, and periodicals in as many as one hundred and sixty-six languages and dialects, and is, in fact, an auxiliary to every Protestant missionary society. The methods by which it acts are very various. Large money grants are made in aid of the publication-work of many missions. Gifts of printing-paper are voted for periodicals; electrotype illustrations are also freely given, or supplied at a low price; and grants of publications are made for gratuitous distribution. The societies and missions thus aided are naturally, for the most part, English; but those of the United States and of Germany to a large extent share also in the benefit. Important societies at Paris, Toulouse, Basle, Berlin, Hamburg, Gernbach (Black Forest), Stockholm, Kristiania, and other places, carry on their several plans of publication and distribution; the London Tract Society being in various ways the helper of all. To meet these varied claims, the society has to rely, first upon its benevolent income; the money it receives from subscriptions, donations, legacies, and collections, being applied, without any deduction whatever, to the missionary work of the society. But these furnish less than half what is actually expended, the remainder being supplied from trade profits after the payment of all expenses. The benevolent income for the year 1882-83 has amounted to £14,824 sterling, to which sum £25,574 have been added from the profits on sales, and £11,403 from the part payments of the individuals and societies receiving grants; making a grand total of £51,801 spent in the missionary work of the society.

These details respecting one institution, the largest of the kind in Great Britain, will illustrate the working of other societies that have a similar end in view, but work either in denominational channels, or in a more restricted way. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, founded in 1698, is wholly connected with the Church of England, and publishes yearly a vast amount of popular literature, reporting an issue, for the year 1881-82, of 5,525,091. The Wesleyans and the Baptists have also special organizations for tract work. Christian workers connected with Mildmay Park in London, and various sections of Plymouth Brethren, publish many tracts. The Monthly Tract Society (founded 1837), and the Weekly Tract Society (1847), publish and issue each a tract periodically, to subscribers and others, chiefly through the post. The Pure Literature Society (1854) prepares and circulates lists of books judged suitable for reading and purchase over the world; and in addition to all these, the private ventures of able tract-writers make no inconsiderable addition to this class of literature; the Rt. Rev. Dr. Ryle, Bishop of Liverpool, and the Rev. P. B. Power, being especially noteworthy. In Scotland, the Scottish Tract and Book Society devotes itself rather to distribution than to publication, employing a large number of colporteurs in the outlying districts of the kingdom. At first prepared and printed by the private enterprise of the late Mr. Peter Drummond, a wealthy seed-merchant in that town, but now conducted by a committee, and entitled "The Stirling Tract Enterprise," are circulated by millions. A Dublin Tract and Book Repository was, until lately, carried on with a special view to Ireland; but the work for that country is now chiefly in the hands of the London and Scottish societies. Many publishers in England and Scotland find it remunerative to publish "leaflets" — miniature tracts — or single hymns, chiefly for enclosure in letters. A vast circulation is thus secured in the correspondence of relatives and friends, and much good is accomplished in a quiet way, of which no statistics can be given. The power of the press, indeed, only begins to be understood as a means of counteracting error, of diffusing truth, and, in the largest sense of the phrase, of preaching Christ's gospel.

The Jubilee Memorial Volume of the Religious Tract Society, by Mr. William Jones (London, 8vo, 1850), contains in full detail the history of this institution for the first fifty years of its existence, and abounds in valuable information respecting the methods and results of tract-distribution in the earlier days of the enterprise. It is still the standard volume on the subject. The yearly reports of the various societies mentioned above must be studied to complete the details, and to bring them down to the present time.

There are also tract societies supported by all branches of the Protestant church in Paris, Lausanne, Toulouse, Brussels, Geneva, and other Continental cities.

G. GREEN, D.D.

(Founder Religious Tract Society, London).

II. United States.—The word "tract" was used by old English writers as nearly equivalent to "treatise," and was often applied to volumes, as well as to pamphlets of a few pages only, and on any subject,—scientific, political, reformatory, etc. The Scriptures themselves are a series of tracts. In our own time, though the word "tract" may still cover the same extent of meaning, in common parlance it is understood to denote a short religious appeal or pamphlet; and tract societies are voluntary associations of Christians to publish and circulate religious tracts, volumes included.

The importance of adding to the influence of spoken truth the permanent effectiveness of the printed page was early felt by Christians. What a good book can do, and how its influence may germinate and perpetuate itself, is well shown in the familiar history of Baxter's conversion, aided by reading Dr. Gibbes's book, The Bruised Reed; and the wise and systematic tract-distribution, by volun-

dary Christians making a monthly visit to each house, or canvassing the whole region, to leave a well-chosen volume by sale or gift in each family. For the vast population outside of church care it has employed numerous colportors, going from house to house, supplying some of its publications to all, if possible, by sale or grant, converting with the familiar "tract" and holding meetings for prayer, and organizing sabbath schools. This system of missionary colportage this Society originated for this country, sending godly and faithful men to the destitute wherever found,—on our vast and rapidly-advancing frontiers, to the freedmen and to the immigrants. The wisdom, necessity, and efficiency of the plan, are so evident, that the Christian public recognized it as an essential part of national civilization. It rapidly expanded, and has accomplished a vast work that could not have been done by any church organization. In its forty-two years it has performed the equivalent of some 5,500 years' labor for one man, has made 12,800,000 family visits, has sold or granted 14,500,000 volumes, and led to the organization of very many sabbath schools and churches.

For the direction of its operations, the Society has an executive committee composed of a publishing, distributing, and finance committee of six members each; and the undenominational character of its issues and all its work is assured by the election of men representing at least six different denominations, whose action in the publishing committee must be unanimous. There are three secretaries (each at the head of a distinct department), a treasurer, a business-agent, editors, and a depository. The Tract House is furnished with all facilities for composing, stereotyping, printing, binding, and issuing its books, tracts, and papers, including tens of thousands of stereotype-plates and engravings. The whole cost of the manufacture of its issues and of the administration of its business is defrayed by the sales. But for its benevolent work of grants and colportage, it is dependent on its friends; and to this work all gifts and legacies not donated for special purposes are devoted without abatement. These "benevolent" moneys are the voluntary annual gifts of its friends, in many cases coming regularly and unsolicited; in others it is found necessary to call upon them individually, or by public appeals in each church, and subsequent collections,—a service requiring the employment of several district secretaries, or collecting agents, who are also, in some of the fields, superintendents of colportage.

The foreign work of the Society is mainly carried on by the aid of missionarvies at seventy different stations in the nominally Christian, Mohammedan, and heathen world. At the principal mission-centres, committees are formed, each numbering representatives of the several nations there laboring, and these prepare and recommend the tracts proper for publication by this Society; and to these undenominational and soul-saving books the annual grants of the Society are devoted. These grants are everywhere highly prized. They have amounted in fifty-eight years (1859) to $646,000, besides many thousands in engravings, books, and other helps. Many valuable books also have been printed at the Tract House for the sole use of foreign missions,— in Armenian, Hawaiian, Zulu, Grebo, etc. The Society has printed more or less, at home and abroad, in 146 languages and dialects, and at foreign stations 4,940 different publications, including 694 volumes,— a work which has borne a very considerable part in conquering heathendom for Christ.

The American Tract Society, Boston, in 1858 resumed for some years its separate organization and work, chiefly for greater freedom of action respecting slavery, but since 1878 again co-operates with the National Society. The Western Tract and Book Society of Cincinnati also co-operates with the Society at New York.

TRADITION. It is a fact, that, for a long time, oral tradition was the only source from which the Christian faith drew its living waters. Congregations were founded in foreign countries, among foreign people; but paper and ink had nothing to do with the affair. Independent of the fragmentary notices from the hands of the apostles, which circulated among the congregations, but made no claims on completeness, either with respect to history or doctrine (John xxi. 25), the fulness of the faith lived on from mouth to mouth. It was oral tradition which linked an Ignatius, a Papias, a Polycarp, to the apostolic church; and yet their testimony was accepted without doubt as authoritative. There soon came a time, however, when the state of affairs began to change. When the voices of the apostles and of the disciples of the apostles grew silent, and the proofs of the genuineness of tradition demanded some power of discrimination, while at the same time an idea sprang up of the overwhelming grandeur of the part which Christianity was destined to play on earth, it was quite natural that tradition should retire to the background, and more prominence be given to the written documents from the apostolic age.

But just at that very moment circumstances gave to tradition a new significance. Christianity, not yet politically established, but fighting its way through the antagonists of Paganism, had to encourage internal and external antagonisms there laboring, and these prepare and recommend the tracts proper for publication by this Society; and to these undenominational and soul-saving books the annual grants of the Society are devoted. These grants are everywhere highly prized. They have amounted in fifty-eight years (1859) to $646,000, besides many thousands in engravings, books, and other helps. Many valuable books also have been printed at the Tract House for the sole use of foreign missions,— in Armenian, Hawaiian, Zulu, Grebo, etc. The Society has printed more or less, at home and abroad, in 146 languages and dialects, and at foreign stations 4,940 different publications, including 694 volumes,— a work which has borne a very considerable part in conquering heathendom for Christ.

When, about 200, the canon was fixed, it seemed probable, that, within a short time, the writings of the New Testament should become not only the best guaranteed, but even the sole legitimate, source of Christian knowledge.

The foreign work of the Society is mainly carried on by the aid of missionarvies at seventy different stations in the nominally Christian, Mohammedan, and heathen world. At the principal mission-centres, committees are formed, each numbering representatives of the several nations there laboring, and these prepare and recommend the tracts proper for publication by this Society; and to these undenominational and soul-saving books the annual grants of the Society are devoted. Thus, in the tradition of the sedes apostolica, people believed they had found an unconquerable weapon against all heresy, not yet surmising that in reality they had found a magical formula by which anything could be conjured up from the obscurity of the apostolic age, even though all scriptural testimony were lacking. It took some time, however, before the idea be—came clearly defined, and attained full practical power. Although, in the congregations of Asia Minor and Greece, there existed a living apostolical tradition, besides the written testimonies of Paul and John, it must not be understood that any one — even not Tertullian, though he recommend such a measure — ever sent messengers to Ephesus, Corinth, Philippi, and Thessalonica, to ask what the apostles had orally taught concerning subordinationism or modalism. On the contrary, Tertullian, in whose interest it certainly lay to argue from tradition, in his work De praescriptione, drew all his arguments, not from the general doctrine of his church, but from the books of the New Testament; and Ireneus, who actually addressed the faithful of his time for advice to Ephesus and Smyrna on the one side, and Rome on the other, made in the Easter controversy the humiliating experience, that the apostolical traditions of those congregations contradicted each other. A tradition with the true characteristic of antiquitas — that is, well-authenticated connection with the source — had become an impossibility. A new characteristic of what was true tradition had to be adopted, namely, that of universitas; that is, universal acceptance throughout the church. But even thus difficulties arose. Cyprian, who invented the theory of the collected episcopacy as the true representative of the church, could not agree with his brother bishop of Rome concerning the validity of heretical baptism, and fell back upon the dangerous proposition that tradition without truth was only an old error. For a long time the state was one of transition, fermentation, and confusion.

Under these circumstances the Arian controversy came to exercise a decided influence. Quite otherwise than during the previous contest with Gnosticism, the orthodox theology had now to encounter an adversary, who, like herself, stood from Scripture, and partly from a secret apostolic tradition. But the mask was soon thrown over. In the East this whole movement reached its consummation in John of Damascus. In the West it was still continued for several centuries on account of a somewhat different idea of inspiration, according to which, not only the Fathers and the ecumenical councils, not only a natural ally, but its necessary organ. After the Council of Nicæa (325), all duly convened synods were, in accordance with Acts xv. 28, considered as standing under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, as inspired: their decrees were infallible. But as the universitas, that is the general acceptance throughout the church, was the only guaranty of their infallibility, their decrees were infallible. But as the universitas, that is the general acceptance throughout the church, was the only guaranty of their infallibility, their decrees were infallible. But as the universitas, that is the general acceptance throughout the church, was the only guaranty of their infallibility, their decrees were infallible.

However apply the rules of the Commonitorium were formulated, they would, nevertheless, hardly have been able to take hold of the course of the development, if the idea whose practical organ they were had not happened to find another and most potent agency. But, such as the actual circumstances were, in the ecumenical councils, not only a natural ally, but its necessary organ. After the Council of Nicæa, all duly convened synods were, in accordance with Acts xv. 28, considered as standing under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, as inspired: their decrees were infallible. But as the universitas, that is the general acceptance throughout the church, was the only guaranty of their infallibility, their decrees were infallible.

The church, he argued, was not bound by the letter of the Bible; on the contrary, the Scripture text could and should be variously interpreted.
according to the various circumstances of its application. But who was to decide on such a question? The Pope. The universality of tradition, established by the complete representation of the church in the ecumenical councils, was superseded by its unity, enforced by the verdict of the Chair of Peter. This conception, however, did not appear fully developed until after the breach between the Roman-Catholic Church and the Reformation had taken place. Luther's opposition to tradition became one of principle as early as 1520, and in 1522 he declared that tradition could be tolerated only so far as it was in perfect harmony with Scripture. Over against this principle of Scripture being the highest, the absolute authority, which was carried out with still greater rigour by the Reformed Church, the Council of Trent placed the declaration (April 8, 1546), that there were two sources of Christian knowledge, Scripture and tradition, and that the interpretation of Scripture had to be regulated by tradition; which, however, simply meant the Pope. The arguments on both sides are fully set forth in Martin Chemnitz (Examen concilii Tridentini) and Bellarmine (De erro Dei, 1581). Within the Protestant camp, however, various movements have been made in favor of tradition, — by Lessing, Delbrück, and Daniel in Germany; by Pusey and the Tractarians in England; and by N. F. S. Grundtvig in Denmark.

Trajan (Marcus Ulypius Trajanus), emperor of Rome (98-117), was, no doubt, one of the best rulers of the Roman Empire, and a sincere, mild, benevolent character. Nevertheless, he was the emperor who issued a decree against the Christians, which made persecution of Christianity illegal. The occasion was the appointment of the younger Pliny as governor of Bithynia. In the East, Christianity numbered many more adherents than in the West. In the great cities, more than one-half of the inhabitants were Christians; and the Pagan temples began to be left empty and almost desolate. Pliny noticed it with alarm, and in lack of any thing better he determined to apply the laws against secret societies to the case. But the accusations were so numerous, and the results of the legal proceedings so unsatisfactory, that he felt obliged to address the emperor himself for instruction. Trajan's answer is very characteristic. It forbids to search after suspected persons, to pay any regard to anonymous accusations, etc., and it grants full forgiveness to those who repent and abjure; but it also authorizes the punishment of such as are convicted and will not retract. As a consequence of this rescript, the general position of the Christians became very insecure, not to say dangerous. Among those who actually suffered martyrdom were Simeon of Jerusalem, and Ignatius of Antioch. See the Epistles of Pliny, book x. (Bohn's ed., Lond., 1878), and his panegyric of Trajan.

TRANSCENDENTALISM. In NEW ENGLAND. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, a strong re-action took place against materialism. As philosophy, it began in Germany. Voltaire brought from London to Paris the ideas of Hume. From Paris they went with him to the court of Frederick, king of Prussia, and became ruling principles of thought. Kant subjected them to searching analysis in his famous work, the Critik of Pure Reason, published in 1771, and became the leader in a great philosophical reform. Materialism took no deep root in the German mind. The great names in German idealism are Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel; and the sequence of their doctrine, so far as it can be conveyed in very few words, is as follows: Kant sounded the depths of the human mind; Fichte imparted reality to the idea of the human person; Schelling combined the inward and outward by supposing an Absolute, which he called reason; and Hegel transformed what was to him the unsubstantial reason into a being, thus completing, as is claimed, the fundamental "categories" of Kant. The word "transcendentalism" is of Kantian origin. It means that which is valid beyond the experience of the senses, though present to the understanding combined with it. It describes a form of idealism. In the judgment of Dr. J. H. Stirling, "The transcendental philosophy is a philosophy of the merely speculative pure reason; for all moral practice, so far as it involves motive, refers to feeling, and feeling is always of empirical origin." Again: "I call all cognition transcendental which is occupied not so much with objects as with the process by which we come to know them, so far as that process has as an a priori element. A system of such elements would be a transcendental philosophy."

In France, materialism was represented by Condillac, Cabanis (author of the saying that "brain secretes thought, as the liver secretes bile"), and others: idealism, by Maine de Biran, Destutt de Tracy, Cousin, Joufroy, and others. In England, not to mention the poets, who are always living refectors of Schelling and Carlyle, Goethe and Richter. The Aids to Reflection and Friend, of Coleridge, were early reprinted in this country. The writings of Carlyle — articles, reviews, essays (produced from 1827 onward), Signs of the Times, Characteristics, later, Sartor Resartus — were eagerly read in American editions. So far as this goes, transcendentalism in this country was of foreign extraction, an invasion of the German inted the thought it had less roots and a character of its own, being derived from the same general impulse, but shaped by peculiar circumstances.

In New England, materialism was abroad, sometimes implicitly, sometimes by formal statement. Unitarianism, itself a protest, on the ground of common sense, against "Orthodoxy" and "Evangelicalism," was a reflection of Locke's metaphysics of John Locke. It was a system of rationalism, prosaic, unimaginative, critical, suspicious of ideal elements and manifestations. Its teaching was didactic, its worship was uninspiring, its interpretations of Scripture were literal in the extreme. It was, in the main, a negative system, its forms mechanical, its beliefs traditional, its associations conventional. It was despoit of genius. The elder men, like Channing and Lowell, retained the sentiments of piety which they had brought with them from the faith they had left; but the new society did not share the original enthusiasm. A spirit of individualism was in the air, running occasionally into deism and atheism. In 1832 Abner Kneeland founded The Investigator: in 1836 he was prosecuted for blasphemy. There was great interest in clairvoyance, mesmerism and kindred doctrines. As early as 1824 F. H. Hedge raised the banner of revolt (in the Christian Examiner for November) against the materialism implied in phrenology, which even then was getting possession of the public mind. There was a rage for the exposition of Gall. The popular lectures of Spurzheim were attended by crowds. Later, Combe's book on the Constitution of Man was hailed as a gospel.

The short lived Dial and the shorter lived Massachusetts Quarterly were results of the transcendental spirit. At the time when the transcendental movement was at its height, the atmosphere of New England was filled with projects of reform. Every kind of innovation on existing social arrangements had its advocate, its newspaper, its meetings, its convention. Temperance, non-resistance, woman's rights, anti-slavery, peace, claimed attention from those concerned for the progress of mankind. At the meetings in the Dial. He wrote:—

"The singularity and latitude of the summons drew together from all parts of New England and also from the Middle States, men of every shade of opinion, from the straitest orthodoxy to the wildest heresy, and many persons whose church was a church of one member only. A great variety of dialect and of costume was noticed. A great deal of confusion, eccentricity, and from appeared, as well of zeal and enthusiasm..." Madmen, madwomen, men with beards, Dunkers, Muggletonians, Come-outers, Aqueenians, Seventh-day Baptists, Abolitionists, Calvinists, Unitarians, and philosophers, all came successively to the top, and seized their moment, if not their hour, wherein to chide, or pray, or preach, or protest... If there was not par...
Emerson's lecture on Man the Reformer was an eloquent arraignment of society. "One day all men will be lovers, and every calamity will be dissolved in the universal life." In his lecture on The Times, delivered the same year (1841), he says,

> "These reformers are our contemporaries; they are ourselves, our own light and sight and conscience; they only name the relation which subsists between us and the vicious institutions which they go to rectify. ... The reforms have their high origin in an ideal justice; but they do not retain the purity of an idea. ... The reforming movement is sacred in its origin; ... its management and details, timid and profane. These benefactors hope to raise man by improving his circumstances: by combination of that which is dead, they hope to make something alive. By new infusions, alone, of the spirit by which he is made and directed, can he be remade and re-enforced."

But the general public took no notice of the distinction between regeneration and reform: the great body of transcendentalists did not, as the experiment of Brook Farm bore witness. The moral tendencies of transcendentalism were what might have been expected from individualism. But the theories were bolder than the experiment. Mr. Emerson, in his essay on Self-Reliance, said,—

> "I would write on the lintels of the doorpost, 'Walm. I hope it is somewhat better than when at last, but we cannot spend the day in explanation. ... The idlest reveries, the faintest native emotion, command my curiosity and respect.'"

Yet no loftier, purer man ever lived than Ralph Waldo Emerson. Certain theoretical implications may have, to vulgar eyes, looked towards "free love," but their authors were men of cleanest life. In religion the typical transcendentalist might be a sublimated theist: he was not, in any accepted sense, a Christian. He believed in no devil, in no hell, in no dualism of any kind, in no spiritual authority, in no Saviour, in no church. He was humanitarian and optimist. His faith had no backward look: its essence was aspiration, not contrition. His regard was fixed on the individual soul. Very remarkable was his confidence in nature, in natural powers and capabilities, in the results of obedience to natural law, in spontaneity, impulse, unfolding, growth. His love of childhood, flowers, landscape, was proverbial. Emerson called transcendentalism an "excess of faith." But the faith was in human nature as a possible realization of the divine.

At present there is a vehement re-action against transcendentalism, partly from the quarter of the materialists, and partly from the quarter of the supernaturalists. But, except for a few local and incidental extravagances, its influence was noble, and the idealism which was the essence of it is the foundation of all spiritual belief. As one form of the great intuitive school of philosophy, it has, perhaps, seen its best day, and will rest vital other faiths, which will endure when it is forgotten. [O. B. Frothingham: Transcendentalism in New England, a History, New York, 1876.]

TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. xvi. 1-13; Mark ix. 2-13; Luke ix. 28-38). The transfiguration is that extraordinary episode in Christ's earthly life which anticipated his future state of glory just before he entered the path of suffering, according to his own prediction (comp. Matt. xvi. 21-28; Mark viii. 31-38; Luke ix. 21-27). It marks the culminating point in his public ministry, and stands midway between the temptation in the wilderness and the agony in Gethsemane. It is recorded, with slight variations, by all the evangelists except John, who omits this, and many other events and miracles, as being already known from the popular gospel tradition. It is alluded to long afterwards by Peter, as an eyewitness of the transcendent majesty of the scene (2 Pet. i. 16-18).

1. The place mentioned by the synoptists is "an high mountain" (ὅς ἐν ἀκρώτητος). Peter calls it the "holy mountain" (ἐν τῷ ἑρέμῳ τῷ ἅγιῷ, 2 Pet. i. 18), from which we may infer that it was well known, and had acquired a halo of glory from the event. The Lord was wont to withdraw to a mountain for prayer (Matt. xiv. 23; Luke xxi. 37; John vi. 15); and several of the greatest events in the history of revelation, from the legislation on Mount Sinai to the ascension from Mount Olivet, took place on mountains. But the particular mountain of transfiguration is in dispute.

Three mountains have been named.

(a) Mount Tabor. This rests on the earliest tradition (in the Itiner. Burdig., A.D. 333), but is inconsistent with the context, as Christ was in Galilee before and after the event, and a journey to Judea in the intervening time could not have been left unnoticed. The mountain must be sought in the province of Galilee.

(b) Mount Tabor (the ἅρμαρος of the Septuagint, the Jebel et-Tür of the Arabs), an isolated, beautiful domed mounain, wholly of limestone, on the southern border of Galilee, on the plain of Esdraelon, about eighteen hundred feet above the sea. Owing to its isolation, it looks twice as large as it really is. It rises gracefully, like a truncated cone or hemisphere, from the plain. It is six or eight miles east of Nazareth, and can be easily ascended, on foot or on horseback, in an hour. It is often mentioned in the New Testament (Judg. iv. 6, 14, viii. 18; Ps lxix. 12; Jer. xvi. 18), though nowhere in the New Testament. The tradition that Tabor is the mount of transfiguration dates from Jerome, in the fourth century, and soon gained almost universal acceptance. It gave rise to the building of churches and monasteries on the summit of Tabor which should correspond to the three tents which Peter desired...
TRANSFIGURATION. 2383 TRANSFIGURATION.

While— one for his Lord, one for Moses, one for his Bosom-friend, the Son of Man, the only-begotten of the Father, the Son of Man who was translated alive from earth to heaven; the Son of Man who, on the Mount of Transfiguration, declared to the discipless to which belonged a secret revelation from on high, that he was the Son of God, with the power to consign into his hands once and for all, in the kiss of Jehovah, in sight of the Holy Land, and out of sight of the world. Elijah was translated alive from earth to heaven on a chariot of fire. Both had endured, like Moses, the forty-days' fast; both had been on the holy mountain in the visions of God; and now they appeared on earth with glorified bodies, solemnly to consign into his hands once and for all, in a symbolical and glorious representation, their delegated and expiring power (Alford).

Among the apostles, the three favorite disciples were the sole witnesses of the scene, as they were also of the raising of Jairus's daughter, and of the agony of Christ in Gethsemane. Peter alludes to the event in his Second Epistle. John, the bosom-friend of Jesus, probably had in view this, among other manifestations of his glory, when he testified, "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (John i.14). And his brother James, as the proponent of the apostles, was the first to follow him into that glory of which the transfiguration was a foretaste and a sure pledge.

1. The mountain of the transfiguration. The Mount of Transfiguration was, according to the traditional name, Mount Hermon, but the present Mountain Hermon is not the Mount of Transfiguration. This mountain, Hermon, being situated on the border between Palestine and Syria, was open to the gaze of the two enemies, Israel and Syria. The mountain of Transfiguration, as the Greek Church is wont to call it, was Mount Tabor, or the Peak of Tabor, an elevated plateau, the most lonely of the many mountains that rise around the Sea of Galilee. This mountain of transfiguration is, says Tristram, "behind the last recess of Palestine, where the scene of the transfiguration may have occurred, with the disciples 'apart by themselves.'" It is worthy of note that this event, as well as the confession of Peter, and Christ's great prophecy concerning his church, which the powers of Hades cannot overthrow, should be attached to the border-region between the Jews and the Gentiles, as indicating the point where the gospel left Palestine and entered the region of the whole world. The leading modern writers on Palestine have pronounced in favor of Hermon, and against Tabor. So Ritter: Comparative Geography of Palestine, ii. 312. Eng. trans.; Robinson: Biblical Researches, vol. ii. 330, 338 (Amer. ed.), and his Physical Geography of the Holy Land, p. 26; Stanley: Sinai and Palestine, p. 361, Eng. ed. of 1868; Trench: Studies in the Gospels, p. 192; Tristram: Topography of the Holy Land, p. 233; Keim: Gesch. Jesu, ii. 565.

2. The time of the transfiguration. It probably took place in the night; because it could be seen to better advantage than in daylight, and Jesus usually went to mountains to spend there the night in prayer (Matt. vi.5, 6; xxvi. 39, 44). The apostles were asleep, and are described as "heavy with sleep, yet having remained awake" during the act of transfiguration (σναι, with the sun, δοιαφοροντες αυτο, Luke ix. 32); and they did not descend till the next day (Luke ix. 37).

3. The actors and witnesses. Christ was the central figure, the subject of the transfiguration. Moses and Elijah appeared from the heavenly world as the representatives of the Old Testament,—the one of the Law, the other of Prophecy,—to do homage to Him who was the fulfilment of both. They were the fittest persons to witness this anticipation of the heavenly glory, both on account of their representational character and their mysterious departure from this world. Moses died on the mountain, as the rabbinical tradition has it, "of thekisses of Jehovah," in sight of the Holy Land, and out of sight of the world. Elijah was translated alive from earth to heaven on a chariot of fire. Both had endured, like Christ, a forty-days' fast; both had been on the holy mountain in the visions of God; and now they appeared on earth with glorified bodies, "solemnly to consign into his hands once and for all, in a symbolical and glorious representation, their delegated and expiring power." (Alford).

4. The event itself. The transfiguration, or transformation, consisted in a visible manifestation and effulgence of the inner glory of Christ's person, accompanied by an audible voice from heaven, declaring him to be the Son of God, with whom the Father is well pleased. The expression used by Matthew and Mark is that the Lord was metempsychoseth (μετεμψυχοσθέν). Luke, who wrote for Gentile readers, avoids this expression, and simply states "that the fashion of his countenance was altered." But it was not only his countenance which shone in supernatural splendor: even "his raiment was white and glistering." Or as Mark, borrowing the image from nature, and another from man's art, says, it "became shining, exceeding white as snow, such as no fuller on earth can whiten them." This is one of those incidental picturesque touches, not infrequent in Mark, which betray the report of an eye-witness, and may be traced to a communication from Peter (comp. 2 Pet. i. 18). We have analogies in Scripture which may be used as illustrations. When Moses returned from the presence of Jehovah on Mount Sinai, the skin of his face shone (Exod. xxxiv. 29-33), which circumstance Hilary calls a figure of the transfiguration. Stephen's face, in view of his martyrdom, shone like the face of an angel (Acts vi. 15). The human countenance is often lighted up by joy; and the peace and blessedness of the soul, in moments of festive elevation, shine through it as through a mirror.

The transfiguration of Christ, and the revelation and anticipation of his future state of glory, which was concealed under the veil of his humanity in the state of humiliation. The cloud which overshadowed him was bright, or light-like, luminous (οὐρανός), of the same kind as the cloud at the ascension, or the clouds of heaven at the second advent of Christ (Matt. xxiv. 1, xxxiv. 29 ff.; similarly Keim, who draws a minute parallel between the two events. (d) Ewald regards it as an actual occurrence, but with mythical embellishments.

The circumstantial agreement of the three evangelists who narrate the event, the definite chronological date, the connection with what follows, and the solemn reference to it by Peter, one of its witnesses (2 Pet. i. 16-18), as well as the many peculiar traits to which no parallel can be found in the transfiguration of Moses, refute the mythical hypothesis, and confirm the historical character of the scene. But it is useless to indulge in speculations concerning the precise form and mode of a supernatural event.

6. Significance.—The transfiguration was, as already remarked, a visible revelation of the hidden glory of the person of Christ in anticipation of his future state of exaltation, and at the same time a prophecy of the future glory of his people after the resurrection, when our mortal bodies shall be conformed to his glorious body (Phil. iii. 21). It served as a solemn inauguration of the history of the passion and final consummation of his work on earth; for, according to Luke's account, the ekthesis of Christ—i.e., especially his death, the great mystery of the atonement for the sins of the world, and the following resurrection, and return to the Father—was the topic of conversation between Jesus and the two visitors from the other world. The event bears a relation to the history of Christ and the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of glory. It is very significant, that at the end of the scene the disciples saw no man save "Jesus alone." Moses and Elijah, the law and the promise, types and shadows, pass away: the gospel, the fulfilment, the substance. Christ, remains, the only one who can relieve the misery of earth, and glorify our nature,—Christ all in all.

7. The transfiguration has given rise to one of the greatest works of art ever conceived by the genius of man. It is the best artistic comment on this supernatural event. The picture under that name was the last work of Raphael, and was carried after his coffin at his burial, in the Pantheon of Rome. He died of this masterpiece, soaring above the earth, in a halo of glory; Moses with the tables of the law on one hand, Elijah on the other; the three disciples, with their characteristic features, at their feet, gazing in a half-dreamy state at the dazzling light; and beneath

TRANSUBSTANTIATION

This scene of celestial peace the painter represents, in startling contrast, the suffering of the lunatic, whose healing follows in the Gospel narrative. So the Christian must ever descend from the heights of festive joy and the occasional foretaste of heaven to the hard work of daily life, before he can attain to final rest and glory.

1 Thomas Aquinas, the profoundest and acutest of schoolmen, expresses the dogma very clearly in his Eucharistic hymn:—

"Dogma datur Christianis, Quod in cornem transit panis,
Et sanguin in sanguinem.
Quod non corpora, quod non sidaes, Animos formarit xites
Prayer rerum ordinem.

Sub diversis speciebus, Signis tamen et non rebus,
Latent res existimae.
Caro carae, sanguis potus,
Mutilam legem Christiana hostis,
Sub utroque specie.
A somnente non consciens,
Non confectus, non discreta, Integra occupari.
Subitum vanus, summtum nullus,
Quantum illi, tamen ille,
Nec satis consummat.
Subsumt bonum, summtum malum,
Sorte tamen iniquat,
Vida vel interitus.
Mors est malle, vita bona:
Vite, purus sanctitatis Quam scit dispar exitus."

his people spiritually by faith, as truly as he fed the five thousand physically by the miracle of the five loaves. The error lies in the carnal, Caper- natic misunderstanding; and this is condemned by the Pope. It is the clause of that very discourse, which sets forth that great and comforting truth (John vi. 63). The flesh profits nothing, the spirit makes alive.

II. The Arguments which Papal divines produce in defence of this doctrine are:

1. Exegetical. — (a) A literal interpretation of the words of institution. — "This is my body;" "this" which, however, refers to the preceding "cup," not a repetition of the words of institution. — " This is my blood of the covenant" (Matt. xxi. 26, 27). The Lutheran symbols agree with this exegesis, but nevertheless reject transubstantiation. The Reformed symbols reject it for the following reasons: (1) the word "is" may indicate a figurative as well as a real relationship between the subject and the predicate, and often means "represents," or "sets forth," in the Septuagint and the Greek Testament (e.g., Gen. xli. 26, 27; Matt. xiii. 38, 39; Gal. iv. 24; Rev. i. 20); (2) the surrounding circumstances make alive.

2. Historical. — The Roman Church appeals to the following facts: (1) the words of our Lord (John vi. 63) and to St. Augustine, and the apostle Paul, in quoting the words of institution (1 Cor. xxi. 25, το εύρος το πιστικον, etc.; x. 16, "the cup of blessing," etc.), substitute the "cup" which contains the wine, for the wine itself; i.e., they use the figure of synecdoche continua pro contento: syruploche continens pro contento: and yet no Catholic assumes the transubstantiation of the vessel.

3. Symbolical. — (b) The mysterious discourse of our Lord in the synagogue of Capernaum, about eating his flesh, and drinking his blood (John vi. 52-59). To this may be objected, that this discourse is appealed to by theologians for different theories of the Lord's Supper; that many of the ablest exegetes deny the presence and fruition of Christ set in at a very early date, we may say with Ignatius, Justin Martyr, and Ireneus (although the last speaks of the consecrated bread and wine as "antitypes" of the body and blood of Christ); but it is equally true that different theories prevailed among the Fathers; that the African divines — Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine — teach a symbolical and spiritual, rather than corporeal, presence; and that the Alexandrian school of Clement and Origen put the whole design of the Eucharist in feeding the soul on the spiritual life and the divine word of Christ: hence the Fathers have been appealed to for the Lutheran, Calvinistic, and Zwinglian theory, as well as for the Roman-Catholic. (Compare on the patristic views the doctrine histories of Münscher, Hagenbach, Baur, Nitzsch, and the writer's Church History, II. 241 sqq.) Nor has the doctrine of the real presence taken place, which prove that transubstantiation was not yet fixed in the mind of the church. The first controversy occurred in the ninth century. Paschasius Radbertus, abbot of the monastery of Corbie, first expounded and defended transubstantiation in a tract, De Sacramento Corporis et Sanguinis Domini (381, 2d ed., 844), but expressly says that some taught only a spiritual communion of the soul with the Redeemer in the Eucharist. The tract provoked considerable opposition, and Ratramnus (Bertram), also a monk of Corbie, refuted it (without mentioning the name of his abbot) by a tract, De Corporis et Sanguinis Domini et Carolm Coeleum. 1 He appealed to the Scriptures (John vi. 63) and to St. Augustine, and taught that bread and wine remain unchanged after consecration, as the water in baptism, but become the significant symbols of a spiritual communion with Christ by faith; so that the body and blood of Christ were present, and partaken of only spiritualiter et secundum potentiam. John Scotus Erigena, Hugger, Rabanus Maurus, and, in part, Gerbert, likewise wrote against Radbert's view. (See Neander: Church History, Boston ed., iii. 494-502, and Schaff, Ch. History, IV.) The second eucharistic controversy took place in the eleventh century. Berengarius of Tours (between 1040 and 1050) attacked in a work, De Cena domini, the doctrine of transubstantiation as contrary to any thing to the Scriptures, and to the older church Fathers, especially St. Augustine. His former friend Lanfranc, prior of Bec in Normandy, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1069), was...

the principal champion of transubstantiation. He first drew the logical inference from the doctrine, namely, that unbelievers as well received the essence of the sacrament (but not its salubris centia). Hildebrand, then papal legate in France, ensured Berengar's safety as a logical consequence from the doctrine of the sacrament, and leading to gross superstition. Thomas Aquinas has given it poetic expression in his famous hymn, "Lauda Sion salutatorum," for the Corpus Christi Festival. Thomas à Kempis, in his inimitable book on The Imitation of Christ, best represents the devotional use made of it by pious Catholics.

III. OPPOSITION. — The forerunners of the Reformers began the opposition, especially Wiclif, Hus, and Wessel. The Reformers were unanimous in rejecting transubstantiation as a fundamental error, contrary to Scripture, to reason, to the testimony of the senses, to the very nature of the sacrament, and leading to gross superstition and the adoration of the host (first prescribed by Cardinal Guido in Cologne, 1203). The last was denounced as downright idolatry (though it follows as a logical consequence from the doctrine that the very body and blood of our Lord are literally present on the altar).

There was, however, a serious difference among the Reformers in the extent of opposition. Luther, from conscientious conviction, adhered to the literal interpretation of the words of institution, the doctrine of the corporeal presence, and the fruition of the true body and blood of Christ by all communicants (though with different effect), but substituted for transubstantiation the idea of co-existence of body and blood "in, with, and under" bread and wine during the sacramental transaction; while Zwingli and Calvin gave up the literal interpretation, and the latter substituted for the idea of a corporeal presence the idea of a spiritual real presence, and for manifestation by the mouth and the teeth a spiritual real fruition by faith alone. TRAPPISTS, The, are the members of an order in the Roman-Catholic Church which arose out of a Cistercian abbey founded by Count Rotrou of Perche, in 1146. This abbey, called "Notre Dame de la Maistre Dun," lies in a damp, unhealthy valley, reached by a narrow and stony passage: hence the name La Trappe ("the trap"). The monks distinguished themselves by austerity until the fourteenth or fifteenth century, when they became so notorious for revelling, licentiousness, and robbery, as to win the title of the "Bandits of La Trappe." This state of affairs continued till the middle of the seventeenth century, when the monastery passed into the hands of Dominique Armand Jean le Bouthillier de Rancé, then (1686) a boy of ten years. The young abbot was well endowed with mental gifts, but abandoned himself to a wild career of sensual indulgence. Overcome by feelings of repentance, he went to the opposite extreme of austerity, retired to La Trappe, and, in spite of opposition on the part of the monks, carried through a rigid discipline. In order to do this, he introduced some Benedictine monks to his abbey.

Rancé's rules obliged the inmates of La Trappe to rise at two o'clock, and retire at seven in winter, eight in summer. They slept on sacks of straw, spent eleven hours daily in spiritual exercises, the rest of the time in hard work. During the hours of work, as in all their relations to one another, the monks observed almost absolute silence, and in greeting one another used the formula, Memento mori ("Remember that we must die"). Their wishes were made known through signed. Their fare was simple, consisting of vegetables, bread, and water. After the evening meal, the monks spent a short time digging upon their future graves. Their garb was a long cloak with wide sleeves, of a gray color, and a black cap. Rancé was opposed to literary pursuits, and expressed his views in the Traité de la sainteté et des devoirs de la vie monastique, 1688. He was an-served by Mabillon, in his Traité des études monas-tiques, 1691. Rauce died Oct. 12, 1700. In 1692 Princess Louise of Condé founded a female branch of the order at Cloetet, France; and branches were also established near Florence and Dusseldorf. The Revolution closed the Trappist convents out of France.
They found refuge in Switzerland, where Augustin de Lestrage founded a cloister at Valsainte, canton of Freiburg. In 1798 it was destroyed by the French. Lestrage found a refuge in Warsaw and Cracow, Poland; but the Trappists were expelled from here in 1800, and, after various attempts to get a foothold in Germany and Italy, were put in possession of La Trappe after the restoration of the Bourbons in 1817. Lestrage was very active until his death (1827), and succceeded in establishing various branches of his order. In 1829 a royal order was issued, closing the Trappist houses; but nine remained, several of which, however, were closed in 1830. In 1844 the Trappists opened a house in Algiers, and in 1849 some of them emigrated to the United States.
A branch of the order took the name of the Trappist Preachers," in 1851. It does missionwork, and has its seat in the monastery of Pierre-qui-Vire, near Avallon. [Since 1870 the Trappists have ceased to have legal existence in Italy and Switzerland. In 1803 a colony, under the direction of Lestrage himself, settled near Conenago, Penn. On different occasions, it moved, in 1813, to Tracadie, N.S. In 1840, the Trappists from La Meillerage, in France, emigrated to Kentucky; and a second establishment has been founded near ecclesiastic of the Roman-Catholic Church; was

b. in Vienna, 1704 ; d. in Vienna, March 10, 1757.
In 1751 he was made archbishop of Vienna, and in 1756 honored with a cardinal's cap by Benedict XIV. He caused a great deal of excitement by his pastoral letter of Jan. 1, 1751, in which he exalts the work and intercession of Christ at the expense of the intercession of the saints, and urges the proclamation of the central truths of the gospel. The letter called forth a number of writings from Protestants and Catholics. Trauthson, however, had no thought of protestantizing the Church. He succeeded in introducing some reforms, as the diminution of the number of holy days in his diocese. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

TREGELLES, Samuel Prideaux, L.L.D., b. at Windsor Place, Falmouth, April 24, 1825. He was educated at the Falmouth classical school; he was appointed in the Neath Abbey Iron-works, Glamorganshire, 1828 to 1834; and in 1836 became private tutor at Falmouth. From early life he took an interest in New Testament textual studies, and in his twenty-fifth year formed the design, to which he gave his life, of preparing a critical edition of the Greek New Testament, with a text derived from the oldest manuscript versions prior to the seventh century, and citations from early ecclesiastical writers, including Eusebius. In 1858 he issued a first specimen of his plan, and in June, 1844, the first instalment,—The Book of Revelation. He made three visits to the Continent (1845–46, 1849–50, 1862) to collate the ancient manuscripts.
In 1849 he spent five months in Rome; but, although permitted to see he was not allowed to collate, the Codex Vaticanus. In 1848 he published his Prospectus for a Critical Edition of the Greek New Testament, now in Preparation, with an Historical Sketch of the Printed Text (Plymouth, 27 pp.);
but the first part of his great work, containing Matthew and Mark, did not appear until 1857
(London). By the side of the Greek he gives Jerome's Latin Version from personal collation of the Codex Amantinus. He was stricken with paralysis in 1851, just after Part Second had ap-appeared, and again in 1870, while at work upon Part Sixth (Revelation), which appeared in 1872.
Part Seventh, containing the Protevagena, and finishing the work, appeared in 1879, edited by Dr. Hort and A. W. Streane. Besides his Greek
New Testament, Tregelles edited the Codex Zacynthius (1861) and the Canon Muntzianus (Camdridge and London, 1868); revised the manuscript and superintended the publication of The English-man's Greek Concordance to the New Testament (London, 1839, 2d ed. 1844), Index to (1845), The Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance to the Old Testament (1843, 2 vols.); translated Ges-nius' Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon (1847); wrote the 4th vol. of the 10th ed. of Horne's Introduction (1856), and the original, independent volumes, Remarks on the Prophetic Visions of the Book of Daniel, 1847, 4th ed. enlarged by Notes and Defence of the Authenticity of the Book, 1852; On the Original Language of St. Matthew's Gospel, 1850; dence of the Authorship and Transmission of the Books of the New Testament, 1853; Heats of Hebrew Grammar, 1852; Account of the Printed Text of the Greek New Testament, with Remarks on its Revision on Critical Principles, 1854.

Tregelles was of Quaker parentage, but in early life joined the Plymouth Brethren, from whom, however, he later separated himself. He was active in charitable and philanthropic enterprises.
In 1850 he received the degree of L.L.D. from the University of St. Andrews; in 1858 he was put upon the civil pension-list for one hundred pounds per annum, and later for two hundred. In 1870 he was invited to join the New Testament Company of the English Revision Company; but ill health prevented him from attending. For a tament (1883), pp. 282 sqq.

TREMELLIUS, Emmanuel, b. of Jewish parent-age, at Ferrara, 1528; d. at Sedan, 1550. He was converted to Romanism by Cardinal Pole, and to Protestantism by Peter Martyr, with whom he went to Strassburg, and thence to England in 1547, where he enjoyed the friendship of Cran-er and Parker, and taught Hebrew at Cambridge. When Queen Mary came to the throne (1553) he went to Germany, and taught Hebrew at Hornbach, Heidelbach, some time at Metz, and finally was again put upon the papal prohibition at the university of Sedan. His fame rests upon his crafty Latin version of the Bible, which appeared in parts, between 1575 and 1579, at
In a doctrinal and disciplinary view, it is the most important council in history of the Roman Church, and fixed its order, and relation to the Protestant churches. It produced its highest standards of faith and practice, which have since been confirmed by the Vatican Council (1870).

The Trent (Tridentum), a city in the Tyrolian part of the Tyrol, where it held, with interruptions, from Dec. 13, 1545, to Apr. 28, 1563. It was convened as an exclusively Roman council, under Pope Paul III., at Trent (at that time a city of the Holy Roman Empire, under a bishop), on Dec. 13, 1545, transferred to Bologna in March, 1547, from fear of the plague; nitely prorogued, Sept. 17, 1549; re-opened May 1, 1551, by Pope Julius III.; broken by the sudden victory of Elector Maurice of Saxony over the emperor, Charles V., and his ally Tyrol, April 28, 1552; recalled by the policy of the papal court.

The following is a list, in chronological order, of the articles of faith which were settled by the council in favor of the views held ever since by the Roman-Catholic Church:

SESSION III. (Feb. 4, 1546).— Decree on the symbol of faith (the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed as a basis of the following decrees).

SESSION IV. (April 8, 1546).— Decree on the Scriptures (including the Apocrypha) and church tradition, which are declared to be the joint rule of faith. The Latin Vulgate is put on a par with the original text.

SESSION V. (June 17, 1546).— On original sin.

SESSION VI. (Jan. 13, 1547).— On (progressive) justification by faith and good works, in opposition to justification by faith alone.

SESSION VII. (March 3, 1547).— On the seven sacraments in general, and some canons on baptism and confirmation.

SESSION XIII. (Oct. 11, 1551).— On the sacrament of the Eucharist.

SESSION XIV. (Nov. 23, 1551).— On the sacraments of penance and extreme unction.

SESSION XXII. (Sept. 17, 1562).— Doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass.

SESSION XXIII. (July 15, 1563).— Sacrament of ordination.

SESSION XXIV. (Nov. 11, 1563).— Sacrament of marriage.

SESSION XXV. (Dec. 3 and 4, 1563).— Decrees applying the scholastic doctrines of purgatory, the invocation, veneration, and the relics of saints and sacred images, also on the selection of food, fasts, festive days, and providing for an index of prohibited books, institution, breviary, and missal, to be issued under the direction of the Pope.

The council was acknowledged in Italy, Portugal, Spain, France, the Low Countries, Poland, and the Roman-Catholic portion of the German Empire, but mostly with a reservation of the royal prerogatives. In France it was never published in form, and was only recognized in its doctrinal part. No attempt was made to introduce it into England. Fius IV. sent the decrees to Mary, Queen of Scots, with a letter, dated June 15, 1564, requesting her to publish them in Scotland; but she dared not do it in the face of John Knox and the Reformation.

TRESPASS OFFERING. See Offerings.

TREVES, Holy Coat of. This coat, preserved in the Cathedral of Treves, is said to be the seamless garment mentioned in John xix. 23. There are several traditions about it. In the thirteenth century the story went, that Mary spun the garment out of wool, and that Jesus wore it uninterruptedly till the day of his death. Herod gave it to a Jew, who threw it into the sea. It was thrown up on the shore, and picked up by a pilgrim, who cast it back again into the water. A whale swallowed it; but a fisherman recovered it, and sold it to King Orendel of Treves. This king put it on, and, as long as he wore it, was invincible. Among the other legends is the one that a maiden carried the garment into Treves: and, as she approached the city, all the bells began tolling at once. It is claimed that the mention of the garment occurs in the Gesta Trevirorum (467 or 327). But we have no mention of it till 1054. The notice seems to have been inserted in the Gesta Trevirorum, under the Abbot Thofrid of Echternach, between 1106 and 1124. The coat was first used at the consecration of Archbishop Bruno, Oct. 28, 1121. It was allowed to remain at rest till 1512. Then, and at a later time, it was presented for worship. Luther refers to the matter as a shameful and foolish trystery. It was again displayed for worship from Aug. 18 to Oct. 7, 1844. The bishops of Metz, Cologne, Limburg, and many others, attended the spectacle; and miracles, so it was pretended, were wrought upon some of the devout visitors. This superstitious scene became the occasion for the German Catholic movement of Ronge (see art.), and for a thorough investigation of the legend of the coat. It was discovered that twenty other seamless coats are competed for the honor of having been worn by Christ. See Gildmeister and V. Sybel: Die heil. Rock zu Trier und d zwanzig anderen heil. ungenähnten Röcke, Düsseldorf, 1844; Bintkrin: Zeugnisse für d. Aechtkeit d. heil. Rockes zu Trier, Düsseldorf, 1845, etc.

TRIALS. The name given to the examinations and literary exercises required, in the Presbyterian Church, for the ministry. These are examined in Greek and Hebrew, systematic theology, church history and polity, and required to present a sermon, a lecture, a Latin thesis, and an exegetical essay.
TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

The Israelitish people, the house of Jacob or Israel, was divided into twelve tribes (Heb. mattot or shebaim). The two Hebrew words are thus distinguished: the first denotes the tribes according to their genealogical relation as branches of a people; the second, as corporations and political powers. The tribes are enumerated according to their progenitors. As Joseph received a double portion in Ephraim and Manasseh, there were, strictly speaking, thirteen tribes: but, on account of the peculiar position of the tribe of Levi, the number twelve is preserved, as may already be seen from the order during the wandering in the wilderness (Num. ii. x. 13 sq.). In the midst, round the tabernacle, we find the priests and the three families of Levites, and then, towards the region of the sky, the internal relationship: (1) Judah, Issachar, Zebulon, and the Levites, who were also called the heads of the tribes (Num. xxxiv. 18 sq.). Then came the chief of the tribe and the Philistines. In this territory lay—Benjamin; (4) Dan, Asher, Naphtali. The number twelve is also regarded as the division of the country, since Levi received no portion. Where, however, in the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlii.), and of Moses (Deut. xxxiii.), Levi is mentioned with the other tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh are mentioned only as one tribe,—Joseph: thus Ezek. xlvii., where the future division of the country is spoken of (1-7, 23-28), Ephraim and Manasseh are numbered as two tribes. Where, however, the twelve gates of the new Jerusalem are to be named after the twelve tribes (30-35), Levi is also counted in, and Joseph is only mentioned as one tribe.

The tribes were again divided into families [mishpa'oth, &c.], these, again, into households [battim, &c.], then came "man by man" (Josh. vii. 14, 17 sq.). At the head of the tribes stood the princes (Exod. xxxiv. 31; Num. i. 16, 44, vii. 12 sq.), who were also called the heads of the tribes (Num. xxx. 1). Then came the chief of the house of the fathers (Num. iii. 24, 30). This tribal constitution, which developed itself during the stay of the people in Egypt, was not abolished by Moses, but rather received its final form and its normal continuance in the number twelve of its tribes: hence every thing was avoided where by a tribe could be destroyed out of Israel (Judg. xxi. 17). Each Israelite is a citizen of the theocracy, because he belongs to one of the families of the twelve tribes: hence the importance of the list of generations. The Mosaic law contains enactments which tend towards the preservation of the integrity of the generations and families, since each family was to remain in its heritage. The chiefs or elders of the house also were drawn into the service of theocracy, because out of the midst of them the judges were taken (Deut. i. 15); and the commission of the Seventy was formed, who was to assist Moses. Twelve of them are commissioned with the numbering of the people (Num. i. 4, 16); the same number was sent to search the Holy Land (Num. xiii. 2); and, for the division of the land, twelve chiefs of the tribes were also appointed (Num. xxxiv. 18 sq.).

When the Holy Land was taken, the division was made in such a manner that the boundary lines of each tribe were not only fixed, but that also within these lines each family received a certain portion of real estate. Upon such a basis the tribal constitution could endure all storms of the coming centuries; but it also favored, where there was lack in the government of theocratic order, particularistic at the expense of nationalism. This we see in the time of the judges (Judg. v. 15-17).

[With the exception of the tribe of Levi (for which see the art. Levites), the land of Canaan was divided among the other tribes as follows:

1. Asher (i.e., "happy "), the eighth son of Jacob, and his second by Zilpah (Gen. xxxv. 20). He had four sons and one daughter (Gen. xlv. 17). After the Exodus the number of adult males in that tribe was 41,500; but, before entering Canaan, the number was raised to 53,400 (Num. i. 40, xxxvi. 44). In the reign of David the tribe had become so insignificant, that its name is altogether omitted in the list of the Seveno. (1 Chron. xxvii. 16-22). The territory assigned to the Asherites comprised the fertile plain of Acre, and the coast of Phoenicia up to Sidon (Josh. xi. 24-31); but for a long time they were unable to gain possession of the territory actually assigned them, and "dwell among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land" (Judg. i. 32). In the struggle against Sisera, Asher forgot the peril of his fellows (Judg. v. 17, 18); he also furnished neither hero nor judge to the nation. One bright name is that of Anna, the daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Asher (Luke ii. 36).

2. Benjamin (i.e., "son of my right hand "), also called Benoni (i.e., "son of my pain "), youngest son of Jacob by Rachel (Gen. xxxv. 18); was born on the road between Bethel and Bethlehem, where his mother died. How he was sent into Egypt, and what policy Joseph used to retain him, we read in Gen. xlii., xlv. When the muster was held in the desert, the tribe of Benjamin counted 35,400 warriors (Num. i. 36, ii. 22), and at the entrance of Israel into Canaan even as many as 43,600 (Num. xxxvi. 38 sq.). The territory which was occupied by this tribe (Josh. xvii. 11 sq.) was a narrow strip bounded on the east by the Jordan; it was the theocratic order. The people of the covenant was to have its normal continuance in the number twelve of its tribes: hence every thing was avoided where by a tribe could be destroyed out of Israel (Judg. xxi. 17). Each Israelite is a citizen of the theocracy, because he belongs to one of the families of the twelve tribes: hence the importance of the list of generations. Each Israelite is a citizen of the theocracy, because he belongs to one of the families of the twelve tribes: hence the importance of the list of generations. The Mosaic law contains enactments which tend towards the preservation of the integrity of the generations and families, since each family was to remain in its heritage. The chiefs or elders of the house also were drawn into the service of theocracy, because out of the midst of them the judges were taken (Deut. i. 15); and the commission of the Seventy was formed, who was to assist Moses. Twelve of them are commissioned with the numbering of the people (Num. i. 4, 16); the same number was sent to search the Holy Land (Num. xiii. 2); and, for the division of the land, twelve chiefs of the tribes were also appointed (Num. xxxiv. 18 sq.).

When the Holy Land was taken, the division was made in such a manner that the boundary lines of each tribe were not only fixed, but that also within these lines each family received a certain portion of real estate. Upon such a basis the tribal constitution could endure all storms of the coming centuries; but it also favored, where there was lack in the government of theocratic order, particularistic at the expense of nationalism. This we see in the time of the judges (Judg. v. 15-17).] tribe of Judah, it constituted the flower of the new Jewish colony in Palestine (Ez. i. 5, iv. 1. x. 9). To the tribe of Benjamin also belonged Mordecai and Esther (Esth. ii. 5), more especially that "Saul who also is called Paul" (Rom. xi. 1; Phil. iii. 5).

3. Dan (i.e., "judge"), fifth son of Jacob, by Bilhah (Gen. xxv. 4). He was the last of the tribes to receive his portion; and that portion, strange as it appears in the face of the numbers, — 62,700 at the first mustering (Num. i. 39), and 64,400 at the second (Num. xxvi. 43), — was the smallest of the twelve. On the north and east it was completely embraced by Ephraim and Benjamin, while on the south-east and south it joined Judah. On the west it was bounded by the Mediterranean. The boldness of the tribe is characterized by the taking of Laish (Judg. xviii.). In the time of David, Dan still kept its place among the tribes (1 Chron. xii. 35). After this time the name of Dan as applied to the tribe vanishes. It is also omitted from the list of those who were sealed by the angel in the vision of John (Rev. vii. 5-7). A Danite was Sanam (q. v.).

4. Ephraim (i.e., "fruitful"), son of Joseph (Gen. xlii. 52), whom Jacob preferred to Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 14). By virtue of the blessing, Jacob adopted Ephraim and his brother Manasseh as his own sons, in the place of their father; the object being to give to Joseph, through his sons, a double portion. At the census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 40,500 (Num. i. 33), but subsequently, however, only 32,500 (Num. xxvi. 37). The territory allotted to Ephraim was bounded on the west by the Mediterranean Sea, and the River Jordan on the east; on the north it had the half-tribe of Manasseh; and on the south, Benjamin and Dan. This fine country included most of what was afterwards called Samaria, as distinguished from Judea on the one hand, and from Galilee on the other. Ephraim plays an important part in the history of the Jewish nation. It produced the successor of Moses (Joshua), chastised the Midianites (Judg. vii. 24), quarrelled with Gideon (Judg. viii. 1) and Jephthah (Judg. xii.), revolted from the house of David (1 Kings xii. 25; 2 Chron. x. 18), and formed the kingdom of Israel, or, as it is also called, the northern kingdom, in opposition to the kingdom of Judah, or the southern kingdom, to which the tribes of Judah and Benjamin belonged. At last Ephraim was carried into captivity (2 Kings xv. 28). Perhaps that Elijah the Tishbite, "who was of the inhabitants of Gilead," belonged to that tribe.

5. Gad (i.e., "fortune"), Jacob's seventh son, the first-born of Zilpah, and brother of Asher; is blessed by Jacob (Gen. xlix. 19) and by Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 20). His descendants (Gen. xlix. 10) are twice numbered (Num. i. 34, xxvi. 15). The territory allotted to Gad was the region between Heshbon and the River Jabbok, together with an additional strip along the east bank of the Jordan, extending up to the Sea of Chinnereth (Josh. xiii. 24-28). Gad is commended by Joshua (Josh. xxi. 1), but accused of idolatry (Josh. xxxi. 11 sq.). The character of the tribe was warlike (Gen. xlix. 18; 1 Chron. xii. 8). It was carried into captivity by Tidgath-pileser (1 Chron. v. 28). Perhaps that Elijah the Tishbite, "who was of the inhabitants of Gilead," belonged to that tribe.

6. Issachar (i.e., "reward"), the ninth son of Jacob, and the fifth of Leah (Gen. xxx. 18, xxxiv. 28). When the tribe was first numbered, it had 54,400 men (Num. i. 28); at the second mustering, 64,300 (Num. xxvi. 25). In David's time the tribe had 87,000 fighting men (1 Chron. vii. 5). His territory was the noble plain of Esraelon, a territory, however, whose fertility was more than overbalanced by its exposed situation (Josh. xix. 17-23). One among the judges of Israel was from Issachar, — Tola (Judg. i. 1). When Shalmanezer, king of Assyria, had invaded the north of Palestine, and had taken Samaria, Issachar, with the rest of Israel, was carried away to his distant dominions. Allusion is also made to this tribe in Rev. vii. 7.

7. Joseph (i.e., "increase"). See Ephraim and Manasseh.

8. Judah (i.e., "praise"), the fourth son of Jacob by Leah (Gen. xxvii. 35). For his character, life, etc., comp. Gen. xxxviii., xliii. 3, xlv. sq. The important position which Judah was to occupy in the future is indicated by his blessing, which was conveyed in lofty language, glancing far into futurity, and strongly indicative of the high destinies which awaited the tribe that was to descend from him (Gen. xlix. 8-12). Judah's sons were five. Of these, three, — Shelah, Pharez, and Zerah, — together with two sons of Pharez, went into Egypt. When the Israelites quitted that country, the tribe of Judah numbered 74,000 adult males (Num. i. 26, 27); at the second mustering, 76,500 (Num. xxxii. 22). Its representative amongst the spies, and also amongst those appointed to partition the land, was the great Caleb (Num. xiii. 6, xxxiv. 19). After Joshua's death this tribe is appointed to attack the Canaanites (Judg. i.). The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are narrated at great length, and with great minuteness, in the books of Joshua and Judges. The territory was from a very early date divided into four main regions: (1) The Mountain, the "hill-country of Judah," with thirty-eight (or, according to the Septuagint, with forty-eight) towns (Josh. xv. 48-60); (2) The Wilderness, the sunken district immediately adjoining the Dead Sea (Josh. xv. 61 sq.); (3) The West South (Josh. xv. 21 sq.), containing twenty-nine cities with their dependent villages (Josh. xv. 20-32), which, with Ether and Ashan in the mountains, were ceded to Simeon (Josh. xix. 1-9); (4) The Leueland (Josh. xv. 33 sq.), or the Shephelah, between the Mountain and the Mediterranean Sea, the garden and the granary of the tribe. But this very tract was, for the greater part, in the hands of the Philistines. To this tribe belonged Othniel (Judg. iii. 9) and Ibuz (Judg. xii. 8 sq.). It made David king (2 Sam. ii. 4), and adhered to his house (1 Kings xii.: 2 Chron. x. xiii.); and after the disruption of the kingdom, together with Benjamin, it formed the southern kingdom, in opposition to the northern or Ephraimitic kingdom, to which the ten tribes belonged. To Judah's tribe belonged prophets, like Amos, Isaiah, Micah, perhaps, also, Obadiah, Joel, Nahum, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, and others.
TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

2393 TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

The exile most of those who returned be- speeded to that tribe: in consequence, the name "Jew" attached itself to the entire from about the epoch of the Restoration.

We also find the name "Jews" in Jeremiah iv. 9. More frequently this name occurs in the New Testament; the highest honor which was bestowed upon that consists in the fact that it belonged to the "Son of God" (Heb. vii. 14; Rev. v. 5).

Manasseh (i.e., "causing forgetfulness"), the son of Joseph (Gen. xli. 5), and his blessing (Deut. xxxiii. 6); his descendants are numbered (Num. i. 32, xxvi. 29), and made them in a great measure its Jacob (Gen. xlix. 21); Moses' charge to them (Exod. xiv. 9); and receive their lot amid the picturesque hills and plains of Lower Galilee, having Tabor on the east and the great sea at the base of Carmel on the west (Judg. xx. 10–16). In the great campaign and victory of Barak it bore a prominent part (Judg. iv. 6, 10), and Deborah praises Zebulun and Naphtali as a people that jeoparded their lives unto the death (Judg. v. 18). This tribe also came to Hezekiah's passover (2 Chron. xxxi. 11, 15); and though it appears to have shared the fate of the other northern tribes at the invasion of the country by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvii. 18, 24 sq.), yet the land of Zebulun occupied a distinguished place in New Testament times (comp. Isa. ix. 1, 2; Matt. iv. 15, 16). In the visions of Ezekiel (xlviii. 28–33) and of John (Rev. vii. 9), this tribe finds its due mention.

For prophecy, the re-union of the twelve tribes under one head forms an important part of the future salvation (Heb. ii. 1; Ezek. xxxvii. 22); and, since the bringing-back of the tribes as such by a specially Exilarch (2 Chron. xxxiv. 19 sq.), the continuance is naturally presupposed. The same is also historically guaranteed for the following centuries (1 Chron. v. 26). The tribal constitution was continued in the gala [i.e., "dispersion"], for (Jer. xxxix. 1; Ezek. xiv. 1, xx. 1) the elders of the people are mentioned; and among those who returned from the exile we meet with the chief of the fathers (Ex. ii. 28, iv. 2), from whom went forth the princes and elders (Ex. v. 9, vi. 7, x. 8; Neh. x. 1). That those who returned regarded themselves as representatives of all the tribes, we see from Ez. vi. 17, where twelve hegasts are offered for a sin-offering for all Israel (cf. also Ez. viii. 33). That in the new commonwealth each had to show his pedigree is seen from Ez. ii. 50 sq.; and priests who could not prove their pedigree were suspended from priestly functions: but for the rest we are not told that those who "could not show their father's house and their seed, whether they were of Israel," were excluded from the congregation. According to Ez. vi. 21, Neh. x. 29, there were also proselytes, "who had separated unto them from the filthiness of the heathen of the land to seek the Lord God of Israel." That at all times a dis-
TRICHOTOMY. 2394 TRIDENTINE PROFESSION OF FAITH

TRICHOTOMY means the division of human nature into three parts,—body, soul, and spirit (σῶμα, ψυχή, and πνεῦμα),—in contradistinction to dichotomy, the division into two parts,—body and soul. The trichotomic view is found in the New Testament (I Thess. v. 23), and is advocated by Origen and many German divines; while Tertullian and Augustine, and many English divines, adopt the dichotomic theory, making, however, a distinction between the animal soul and the rational soul. See Delitzsch (Eng. trans., Edinb., 1867) and Beck (Eng. trans., Edinb., 1877), on biblical psychology, and J. B. Heard: The Tripartite Nature of Man, Edinb., 3d ed., 1870.

TRIDENTINE PROFESSION OF FAITH (Professio Fidei Tridentine), or the Creed of Pius IV. The original name was Forma professionis fidei catholicae, or orthodoxy fidei. It is the shortest, but practically the most important, creed-state ment of the Roman-Catholic Church. It must be subscribed or sworn to by all priests and public teachers of that church, and also by Protestant converts (hence called the "Profession of Converts"). It was suggested by the synod of Trent, and prepared, by order of Pope Pius IV. in 1564, by a college of cardinals. It is a very clear and precise summary of the specific doctrines of the Roman Church as settled by the Council of Trent, and put in the form of a binding oath of obedience to the Pope, as the successor of the Prince of the apostles, and the Vicar of Christ. It consists of the following twelve Articles, including the Nicene Creed, with the Western clause Fideque.

"1. I, in the name of Deum, Patrem omnipotentem, etc. [Sanctam Catholicae et Apostolicae Romanae Ecclesiam matrem et principalem, etc.]

Arian, a monastic order, founded in 518, and its origin from the characteristic difference between the Christian baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19). But it is not to be wondered at that the first attempts, such as we meet them in the writings of Justin, Tertullian, and Theophilus, or in those of Athanasius, Clement of Alexandria, and Ireneaus, should present a somewhat vague and apophatic character. They lack not only systematic completeness, but also dialectical sharpness. Nevertheless, when surveyed as a whole, they appear to point in two different directions, of which Tertullian represents the one, and Origen the other. Tertullian made the Logos the Son; but, in spite of his true conception of the Sonship, he reached only a trinity of succession, and it remained a question whether Athanasius or Sabellius should take up the thread of the development after him. Origen made the Sonship an eternal fact, above and outside of time, but his trinity is only one of subordination; and Arius might as well become his pupil as Athanasius.

The oecumenical Council of Nicaea (325) decided against both of these tendencies, directly rejecting Arianism, and indirectly, also, Sabellianism. The confession of truth, however, is not identical with the doctrine of the Trinity. Both hitherto represented the one, and Origen the other. Holy Trinity, the danger of tritheism begins; and, indeed, the trinitarian doctrine of Augustine, so conspicuous for its idea of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, called forth the tritheism of Philoponus. Nevertheless, though the acceptance by the whole Western Church of the Augustinian doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit, and the encyclical by Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople (867), denouncing that doctrine as heretical, called forth a very warm discussion, the only treatment of the subject which has any theological interest is, for the whole of the next part of the middle ages, that of Scotus Erigena. On the basis of the psychological triad of reason, understanding, and the senses, he builds up the divine triad of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. But, however well such an analogy may suit his Neo-Platonic idea of God, it is very far from the track which the Church has chosen to follow: indeed, he makes trinity a mere name. At the beginning of the latter part of the middle ages, the period of scholasticism proper, Anselm proved very successful in refuting the nominalistic tritheism of Roscellin; but the positive exposition of his own views is cold and abstract. Quite otherwise with Richard of St. Victor, who poured his whole wealth of half-poetical mysticism into the subject, and produced one of the greatest efforts of medieval theology. God is love, he says; but love is not the highest love, unless that which is loved has the highest worth. God can love only God. Thus the step is made from the one hypostasis to the other, from the Father to the Son. The next step, from the first two hypostases to the third,— from the Father and the Son to the Holy Spirit,— is not made with the same unwavering certainty. Love, he says, has always a longing after communicating itself to a third. The proposition is true, but has not the same inherent force as the first proposition. Before this radiant though mystical vision of Richard of St. Victor, the Sabellianism of Abelard waned away as insignificant.

The problem of the Reformers lay in another field than that of pure speculation; and whenever they undertook to remodel, or farther develop, a doctrine already attached to its anthropological or soteriological bearings. Nevertheless, Luther often and with great fondness reverted to the idea that the true Christian seeks and finds the traces of the Holy Trinity everywhere in the creation, from the most modest flower in the fields to the most gorgeous product of art; and he, as well as Calvin, felt the necessity of regenerating and remodelling the dogma. In that point, however, Protestantism has been very little, at least, for a long time. The doctrine was taught in accordance with the old symbols of the Church, and to the exclusion of all old and new errors; but a farther development was not attempted. Some Protestant theologians, as, for instance, Calovius, laid very little stress on the dogma; and others, such as Questedt, became entangled in its formal difficulties, and reached no farther than a preliminary sifting of the materials given.

The first really new departure in the development of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, since the days of Richard of St. Victor, was due to the Protestant philosophy, now set free from the fetters of the Church, more especially to Jacob Boehme. His idea of an immanent process by which the Deity evolves into a trinity is one of the most poetic and speculative thoughts which ever sprung from the dogmas, and has exercised a widespread, fertilizing influence both on theology and philosophy. That this immanent process, just on account of its immanence, involves no element of time, Boehme was aware of from the very first, and has expressed with great emphasis and felicity. But on other points his exposition is very obscure; and, in spite of its great wealth of striking hints, it has only been neglected, for a long time. Leibnitz, who in a very happy way ties up the idea of God with the idea of eternal truth, making the eternal truth the very nature of God, reaches, in his construction of the Trinity, not beyond a dyadic development; and the formula of the Woffian school, according to which the Deity became triune by virtue of three different acts of his will,— _voluntas primitiva, medius_, and _finalis_, and hence the question, It was Schelling, and after him Franz Baader, who first drew attention to the speculations of Jacob Boehme, though their complete incorporation with the theological treatment was still far off. Schleiermacher could be of no service in this respect: his own philosophy hindered him. Though he abandoned the _natura naturans_ of Spinoza, God was still to him "the spiritual power in nature," known to us only through its presence in our own heart and the things around us, but utterly incomprehensible when contemplated in separation from the world as the absolute unity. He acknowledged that it was "almost" necessary to accept the idea of a personal god; "but" the case had to him also another side. His exposition of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity is Sabellian.

But, while Schleiermacher thus treated the dogma with apparent indifference, hardly a decade elapsed after the publication of his _Der christliche Glaube_ (1821-22), before it once more came to the foreground, and again assumed, though under various forms, its old position as the true centre of the whole theological system. The old psychological analogy, first invented by Augustine, then elaborated in a somewhat eccentric way by Jacob Boehme, and then elaborated in a somewhat eccentric way by Jacob Boehme, and then elaborated in a somewhat eccentric way by Jacob Boehme, and then elaborated in a somewhat eccentric way by Jacob Boehme, but, in its latter form, has been renewed (K. Th. Fischer, Billroth, Martensen); and more especially the abstract form of self-consciousness—the subject making itself object, and through that process returning to itself as self-conscious—has furnished a fertile scheme for trinitarian speculation. The old attempt at developing the Holy Trinity by means of the idea of the world (well known to the ancient Church from the apologists, and in the middle ages from Anselm), has also been repeated with success (J. H. Fichte, Weisse, Twisten). It allures the interest of the philosopher by its undeniable connection with the profoundest efforts of the classical, especially the Alexandrian speculation, and at the same time it takes hold of the attention of the theologian, because Scripture undoubtedly places the Son, the Logos, in connection with the idea of the world. Hence, however, it has perhaps been the return to the fundamental idea of Richard of St. Victor, to represent the Holy Trinity as founded in the idea of God as love (Julius Müller, Nitzsch, Dorner).
TRINITY SUNDAY.

TRONCHIN.

TRITHEISM denotes a conception of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity which emphasizes the triad so strongly, that it forgets, or seems to forget, the unity. The Christian theologian never taught that there were three gods; but the expostulations of the trinitarian mystery have sometimes endangered the principle of monotheism, as, for instance, in the Eastern Church in the sixth century, and in the Western in the eleventh. In Alexandria a party arose which received the name of Tritheists, on account of their sharp distinction between the three divine persons. Among their leaders were Philoponus, Comnenus of Tarsus, Eugenius of Selucia, and others. Under the reign of Justin II. (565-578) they appeared in Constantinople; and a disputation was held between them and the orthodox Patriarch John, though without any result. The further vicissitudes of the sect are not known. See Leontius Byzantinus: De Sectis, v.; John Damascenus: De Har.; Nicephorus Callisti: Eccl. Hist., iv. 47-49. For the tritheistic doctrine in general see Augustin: De Trinitate. TRINITY SUNDAY, the first Sunday after Pentecost, was introduced into the calendar by Benedict XI. in 1302 and is now the solemnity of the Church Year in the West. In the Church of England the Sundays from Whitsuntide to Advent are counted as the first, second, etc., till twenty-sixth Sunday after Trinity. The universal use in the Western Church of this festival of Trinity Sunday dates from Pope John XXII. (1334).

TRISAGION, a liturgical formula, which, during the Monophysite controversy of the fifth century, secured dogmatic importance. It was originally nothing else than the ascription of praise in Isa. vi. 3. It was used at the beginning of divine service, and runa ο ὄους δ θέος, ο ὄους θυγατέρος, ο ὄους δόμαντος, οἴκος ἡμών. ("Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us!") The origin of this formula is involved in obscurity. The tradition that it was received during an earthquake at Constantinople, in the reign of Theodosius II., through a boy, who, being caught up into the sky, heard it from the angels, is unreliable. The earliest testimonies to the existence of the Trisagion date from the fifth century, or the latter part of the fourth. In Antioch the clause was added, δ σαράφωτες οίς, which ("who was crucified for us"), and probably originated with the Monophysite usurper of the patriarchal chair of Antioch, — Peter the Fuller. In the East the phrase, but changed its reference by prefixing the expression Χριστάνος χριστάνες ("Christ our King"). On his re-instatement, Peter cast out this limiting clause. The introduction of the additional clause under Anastasius, who was inclined to Monophysite views, is the beginning of the question, whether the Trisagion was introduced into the calendar by a natural sciences, scholasticism, etc., most of which were published after his death. Among them are Naturalium Questionum, libri xx.; Steganographia, sive de manibus Theologi, 1606; Sermones et exhortationes ad Monachos, 1516. He laid in Germany the foundation of church history by his works, Catalog. illustr. virorum Germaniam suis ingenii et lucubrationibus omnifarium exornantum et De scrib. eccles. A full list of his writings is given by Erdhardt: Geschichte d. Wiederaufbliihens wissenschaftlicher Bildung, etc., iii. 387 sqq., Magd., 1839, Klipe.

TROAS, or ALEXANDRIA TROAS, or AL-EXANDREIA, a town on the coast of Mysia, built by Antigonus; was during the Roman rule one of the principal towns of the province of Asia, and the centre of the traffic between Macedonia and the western part of Asia Minor. Paul visited the place four times (Acts xvi. 8 sq., ii. 12-13; 2 Tim. iv. 18.)

TRONCHIN, the name of two distinguished Genevan theologians. — I. Theodora was b. at Geneva, April 17, 1582; d. there Nov. 19, 1657. After studying theology at Geneva, Basel, Heidelberg, France, and Leyden, he became professor of Hebrew at Geneva in 1606, and of theology in.
TRUBER, Primus, b. at Rastschiza in Carniola, 1508; d. at Dredingen in Würtemberg, June 28, 1596. He was educated at Salzburg, studied theology in Vienna, was ordained priest in 1527, and appointed canon at the cathedral of Laibach in 1531, but embraced the Reformation, and was compelled to flee in 1547. In the following year he obtained a small benefice near Nuremberg, and later on he settled in Würtemberg. But he never broke off the connection with his native country, and the work he had begun there; publishing in the Slav dialect a catechism (1550), a translation of the Gospel of St. Matthew (1553), of the three other Gospels (1556), of the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Corinthians (1562), besides making frequent though perilous visits. His life was written by Silleui, Erlangen, 1861.

TRUCE OF GOD (treuga or treua Dei), an institution of the middle ages, designed to mitigate the cruelties of war by enforcing a cessation of hostilities on all the more important church festivals, and from Thursday evening to Sunday evening each week. The scheme was recommended by the councils of Chalons (1016) and Limoges (1031), and by the efforts of the Bishop of Aquitaine (1030) enforced. The second (1139) and third (1179) Lateran councils adopted it. The Truce was a praiseworthy attempt to check the passions and barbarities of warfare.

TRUBER. The councils, were held in a room of the imperial palace at Constantinople, which had a dome (Treppollos), whence the name. The First Trullan Council was called (868) by the Emperor Constantius Pogonatus, and held eighteen sittings. The legates of Pope Agatho were accorded the highest rank, then followed in order the Patriarch Georgius of Constantinople, the legate of the Patriarch of Alexandria, Macarius of Antioch, the legate of the Patriarch of Jerusalem, etc. The doctrine of Monophysitism was taken up and condemned, and Christ declared to have two natures and two wills. Macarius of Antioch was indicted for his allegiance to the false doctrine. Georgius of Constantinople went over in the eighth sitting to the Roman doctrine. In the sixteenth sitting, Pope Honorius I. was anathematized for his Monophysite views, and the anathema was repeated at the eighteenth sitting. Pope Agatho's confession of two wills in Christ, in his Epistola ad Imperatores, was declared the doctrine of the council, and all Monophysites were anathematized. The Patriarch Macarius was deposed at a later time.

The Second Trullan Council was called by Justinian in 692. It was designed to supplement the fifth and the sixth (the first Trullan) eucumenical councils, and passed 102 canons bearing upon matters of church-discipline. Six of these (II., XIII., XXXVI., LV., LVII., LXXXII.) met with determined opposition in Rome; and, although the legate of Pope Sergius I. subscribed to them, he himself firmly rejected them, and in spite of the Emperor Justinian's demand that he should accept them. The emperor was about to compel the Pope's acceptance, when he was deposed. Canon XIII. (upon the basis of Matt. xix. 6, 1 Cor. vii 27, Heb. xiii. 4) allowed the marriage of priests, but forbade their remarriage, and the continuance of bishops in the married state after their ordination. Canon XXXVI. gave to the Patriarch of Constantinople a rank after the Pope, but granted him equal privileges with the latter. The Second Trullan Council is regarded as spurious (synoisusenatica) in the West, but is accepted in the East; its canons being denominated "the canons of the sixth synod." From this time the Eastern and Western churches grew farther and farther apart. The Second Trullan Council was the entering wedge of the great division which followed. TUBINGEN SCHOOL. The name given to two schools of theology. The earlier initiates were connected with the university of Tubingen, either as professors or students, or both.

I. THE OLD TUBINGEN SCHOOL played an important part in the history of German theological thought in the latter part of the last century by being the champion of biblical supernaturalism. It had its first representative in Gottlob Christian Storr. He was b. in Stuttgart, Sept. 10, 1746; studied at Tubingen; was appointed professor of philosophy at Tubingen, 1775, and professor of theology in 1777; and in Stuttgart, Jan. 17, 1805, as court-preacher. His entrance upon his professional duties at Tubingen, as Baur has said, marked an epoch in the Tubingen theology. The activity of the great Bengel had not introduced any new period of theology, so much as it worked as savory salt, purifying the religious life of the church which had sprung up in the latter half of the eighteenth century saw in positive and orthodox Christianity an enemy of progress and humanity which it felt called upon to resist. This idea was the prevailing idea of the day; and against it Storr rose up, and sought to recover an impregnable position for the defence of what is true and unchangeable in Christianity.
He planted himself firmly and solely upon the authority of divine revelation as it is contained in the Scriptures, and sought by grammatical and historical exegesis to build up a system of theology. As a preliminary work, he sought to prove the integrity and credibility of the New Testament, and thence to deduce the authority of Christ as the sent of God, laying special emphasis upon the evidential value of the miracles. The foundation-stone of Storr's theology was the authority of Christ as the highest and divinely attested messenger of God. He held, that, while reason and experience are desirable allies in confirming the doctrines of Scripture, they are "not essential," and affirmed that we are acting rationally when we accept a doctrine on the authority of Scripture alone. Storr thus came into conflict with Kant, and sharply criticised his Religion within the Limits of Pure Reason. He also contended against the accommodation theory of Stauder, Telt and others. He held that systems of theology and morals are to be founded upon the results of exegesis, and not upon mere processes of rationalization. His own theological system is laid down in his last great work, Doctrina christ. pars theoretica e sacram litterae repetita, 1793 (German translation, 1803). Among his other writings are works upon the Revelation of John (1785), the Gospel of John (1789), the Epistle to the Hebrews (1789), etc.

The immediate followers of Storr, and representatives of the Old Tubingen school, were the brothers Johann Friedrich Flatt (b. Feb. 20, 1759, at Tubingen; d. Nov. 24, 1821, at Tubingen), Karl Christian Flatt (b. Aug. 18, 1772, in Stuttgart; d. Nov. 20, 1813), and Friedrich Gottlieb Suskind (b. Feb. 17, 1707, at Neustadt; d. at Stuttgart, 1829). All three were pupils of Storr, and became professors at Tubingen. The elder Flatt edited the Magazin fur Dogmatik und Moral from 1796 to 1803, when it was continued by Suskind. This periodical became the organ of the school, which contended against Kant, Fichte, and Schelling in the absolute and divine contents of Revelation, the miracles of Christ, etc.

Another representative of the early Tubingen school was Ernst Gottlob Bengel (b. 1769; d. March 26, 1830), a grandson of the great commentator Bengel, who, as professor of theology and church history at Tubingen, exerted a very extensive influence. He was somewhat more liberal than his predecessors. Steudel and Christian Friedrich Schmid also represented the same general tendency. It was the idea of supranaturalism, the idea that in Christianity something more than human powers and blessings is conferred, that these men fought for with zeal, and literary and exegetical skill. Theirs is the merit of having defended the inheritance of the fathers, and preserved it for a better period. Though they did not build up so well as they fought, yet there are times when a militant theology must fight with both hands. Such a time was theirs; and thus they fought, and in doing so conscientiously they did what they could to defend the truth (Mark xiv. 9). surpassed him in the lucidity and elegance of his style. More audacious was Schwengler, with his rare critical gifts. Köstlin and G. Planck were exceedingly industrious. The most distinguished co-operators outside of Württemberg were Hillenfeld, Holsten, and Ritschl.

The name of Paul was the one around which the critical study and ingenuity of the school marshalled their forces. Much appeared between 1836 and 1845; the Theologische Jahrbücher, edited by Zeller (1842 sqq.), being the organ of the movement. In the year 1845 Baur summed up the results of the investigations in his work on Paul (2d ed., 1860), in which he denied the Pauline authorship of all the Epistles attributed to Paul, except Galatians, First and Second Corinthians, and Romans. The genuineness of the last two chapters of Romans, however, was called in question. The historical picture which was left was this. The older apostles and the entire early church were Judaistic, and distinguished from the Jewish Church only by their faith in the crucified Christ as the Messiah. All the elements of a new religion which lie concealed in the teachings and life of Christ were undeveloped. Stephen in vain attempted to bring these out. The remarkable divination of his own, by a logical deduction from the fact of the crucifixion, made the discovery that the gospel meant freedom, and was designed for all mankind. These principles brought him into conflict with the older apostles and the church. He preached to the Gentiles; and the older apostles, for the sake of peace, suppressed their hostility. But one party in the church grew more and more bitter against him. It was the endeavor of a later age to harmonize these conflicting parties and principles. Hence, wherever an ironic tone is met with in the New Testament, it is to be regarded as an unmistakable sign of the late date of the writing; and that there was no attempt made in the apostolic age to reconcile the two parties was proved by the Apocalypse of John, which is a product of Jewdian Christianity and the church. He preached to the Gentiles; and one party in the church grew more and more bitter against him. It was the endeavor of a later age to harmonize these conflicting parties and principles. Hence, wherever an ironic tone is met with in the New Testament, it is to be regarded as an unmistakable sign of the late date of the writing; and that there was no attempt made in the apostolic age to reconcile the two parties was proved by the Apocalypse of John, which is a product of Judaistic and Pauline Christianity, and consequently belonged to the second century. Mark, by concealing these differences, also betrayed that it was not apostolic; and Luke's Gospel was only a revision of Marcion's Gospel. Schwengler's Montanismus, Ritschl's Gospel of Marcion and Gospel of Luke, and the first edition of his Origin of the Old Test. of Christ were (first ed. 1843, 4 vols., 1st ed., 1847, 4 vols.), Köstlin's John's Docir., System (Johannischer Lehrbegriff, [Zeller's Acts of the Apostles], and other works, were the allies of Baur. But the most important of all was Schwengler's Post-Apostolic Age (Nachapost. Zeitalter), which employed the writings that had been declared unauthentic to construct a history of the development of Judaistic and Pauline Christianity to the Old Catholic Church. This development was put in two centres—Rome and Asia Minor. At Rome the chronological sequence of the writings was the Shepherd of Hermas and Hegesippus, Justin Martyr, the Clementine Homilies, the Apostolic Constitutions, James, the Second Letter of Clement, Mark's Gospel, the Clementine Recognitions, Second Peter. From the Pauline side the conciliatory authorship began under Trajan, with First Peter, which was followed by Luke, Clement's first Letter, and then the Pastoral Epistles and the Ignatian Epistles. The Pauline type of Christianity did not get the victory till Victor's reign. In Asia Minor, the name of John, and not Peter, was the starting-point of the development; and the Apocalypse was the first, the Gospel of John the last, stage in the development. Such is the strange course of development we are called upon to believe. Our canonical writings differ very largely from the extra-canonical. And yet these remarkable works are put down in an age which lacked originality; and a few doctrinal terms are spied out, and forced to become sufficient evidences that the writings belong to a period when Gnostic systems were disseminating their philosophy. [Dr. Fisher says, "On this assumption we are brought to face this contradiction.

In the first part of Christianity we have only men; in the following age, only writings: in one period, men without writings (only the Apocalypse and four Epistles belonging there); in the other period, only writings of great power and influence, without known authors."—Supernatural Origin of Christianity, p. xxxvii.] It is further to be remarked, that the motive which Schwengler gives for the development of Christianity, viz., the reconciliation of two opposite principles, is wholly insufficient.

In the third period of the Tübingen school, beginning in 1848, Baur devoted himself to the study of church history, and brought out the very able work, Christianity and the Christian Church of the First Three Centuries, 1853, 3d ed., 1863; [Eng. trans. by Allen Menzies, London, 1875-76, 2 vols.]. It came to the conclusion that the true distinguished Christianity as the absolute religion from all other religions was the purely moral nature of its events, teachings, and demands. (And yet the very writings from which this characteristic is drawn were declared by the school to be Ebionitic!) In the Christianity of Christ, Baur gave no place to the death of Christ. The fundamental conception of Baur was, after all, not very different from that of Kant. The pure religion of reason came into the world with Christ, but was covered over in the succeeding periods. He refused to enter into an explanation of the "miracle" of the resurrection, regarding the faith of the apostles as the sufficient starting-point for the contemplation of the history of Christianity. He endeavored to account for the development of Christianity, but denied its miracles. His so-called Tendenzkritik, while it led him to unsound conclusions, prepared the way for the brilliant achievements in the departments of church history and doctrine of the present generation, and must ever be a starting-point for the construction of the history of early Christianity. In his last years Baur had a faithful disciple in Northern Germany, in Holsten. Otherwise he stood almost alone. Holtzmann, Hausrath, and O. Pfleiderer denied the miracles, and accepted the vision hypothesis.
TUCKERMAN, Joseph, D.D., American Unitarian philanthropist; b. in Boston, Jan. 18, 1778; d. at Havana, April 20, 1840. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1798; pastor at Chelsea, Mass., 1801-26; in 1812 founded at Boston first American society for the religious and moral improvement of seamen; in 1826 took charge of the "Ministry at Large," a city mission organized by the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches in Boston; visited Europe to promote similar organizations, and on his return, in 1838, published Principles and Results of the Ministry at Large.

TUCKNEY, Anthony, b. at Kirton, Lincolnshire, Eng., September, 1599; d. February, 1670. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and took his master's degree in 1622, his B.D. in 1627. He became domestic chaplain to the Earl of Lincoln, but, after he was chosen fellow of his college, returned, and was a very successful teacher. He then became assistant to John Cotton at Boston, and, after Cotton's departure to New England, his successor. In 1643 he was appointed member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines for the County of Lincoln, and was one of the most active and influential members. After the death of Herbert Palmer, he was made chairman of the committee on the catechisms. He had a chief hand in the questions relating to the divine law in the Larger Catechism, and in the construction of the entire Shorter Catechism.

While at London, he was minister of St. Michael le Querne until 1648. He was made master of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1645, vice-chancellor of the university in 1648, master of St. John's College in 1656, and regius-professor of divinity of the university.

He was one of the commissioners at Savoy, but failed to attend. He was silenced for nonconformity. His controversy with Benjamin Whichcote is important as showing the break of a new era in Whichcote, his pupil, out of the old era in Tuckney, the teacher. These eight letters discuss the use of reason in religion, as well as differences among Christians, in a calm, dignified, and charitable spirit. They are models of Christian controversy. Tuckney's Parliament Sermons and other occasional pieces were published during his lifetime; but his principal works are posthumous: Forty sermons upon several occasions (London, 1678); Prælectiones theologicae (Amsterdam, 1679).

TUDELA, Benjamin of. See Benjamin of Tudela.

TUNKERS, or DUNKERS, so called from the German tunken ("to dip"), a denomination of Christians originating in Germany at the beginning of the last century. The name originally adopted by themselves, and which is now generally used, is simply "the Brethren;" but they frequently use the term "German Baptists," even in their official documents.

In the year 1708 Alexander Mack of Schwartznau and a few of his neighbors agreed to meet together and study the word of God without reference to existing creeds, and to submit themselves wholly to its guidance, wherever it should lead them. Without being aware of the existence of any body of Christians holding similar views, they were led to adopt, (1) the Bible as their creed, without any catechism or other confession of faith; (2) the independent or congregational form of church government; (3) believers' baptism; and (4) immersion. To these general principles of the Baptist denomination they added in their Covenant of Conscience some views held, it would seem also without their knowledge, by the Friends; namely, an unpaid ministry, nonconformity to the world in dress, etc., and not to take oaths, or engage in war.

In addition to these views and the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith (the Trinity, atonement, etc.), they agreed not to go to law, or to invoke the aid of the civil authorities, even in self-defense; to refuse interest on money; to salute one another with the kiss of charity; to anoint the sick with oil for recovery; and to celebrate the Communion in connection with the Agape, or love-feast (in imitation of the Paschal Supper), feet-washing, the salutation or "holy kiss," and giving the right hand of fellowship.

They also adopted trine immersion (in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost); the candidate kneeling, and being plunged by a forward movement under the water, from which they were sometimes called "Tumblers."

The little company of eight persons, whose names are piously preserved by the society, soon increased in numbers; and colonies were formed at Marienborn with John Naas as minister, and at Epstein with Christian Levy as minister. Although leading harmless and peaceful lives, the Brethren were persecuted by the State, which allowed no dissent from the authorized churches (the Lutheran, the Reformed, and the Catholic); and many of them took refuge in Holland, Friesland, and the Dutchy of Cleves. Shortly after, church, and joined in with the 'Old Order,' or called the General Council of the German Baptist in the church may now be regarded as permanent.

The Brethren soon found their way into the interior counties of Pennsylvania and the Southern and Western States, having at the present time congregations even in California and Oregon. They are now so strong in the West, that their Annual Meeting in May (the week after Whitsuntide), which regulates all matters connected with the society, was held this year (1883) west of the Mississippi River, near Lawrence, Kan.

The Brethren do not officially publish their numbers, "inasmuch as the apostles never gave the exact number of believers" (Minutes of Annual Meeting, 1886, art. 10); but, in a recent publication (The Record of the Faithful, 1883) by one of the Brethren, the present membership is given as 57,790, of whom 3,000 are said to belong to the "Old Order" Brethren. Other estimates place the number above 100,000. The number of congregations is about 500. The ministers receive no salary; the Annual Meeting of 1882 (art. 9) having re-affirmed that the gratuitous ministry of the word of God is a fundamental principle in the order and practice of our Brotherhood. Education, marriage-fees are regarded with disfavor. The Annual Meeting of 1857 (art. 14) declares "the gospel does not allow ministers to take a fee." The Family Almanac for 1883, issued by the Brethren's Publishing-House, Huntingdon, Penn., prints a "ministerial list" comprising 1,773 names, of which 67 are marked as belonging to the "Old Order Brethren," and 22 to the "Progressives." These represent the opposite tendencies existing in the society for some years, and which have lately resulted in separate organizations. The first contend for a stricter application of the principles of the society, especially as to nonconformity to the world. They are opposed to Sunday schools, preaching, and other innovations, they assumed in their protest of Dec. 10, 1880, to be "grave departures from ancient principles, by what is called the General Council of the German Baptist Church." Their first yearly meeting was held at Brookville, O., May 27, 1882. The Progressives are in favor of greater liberty in what they regard as non-essentials, and seceded last year, protesting that "our annual conference is almost wholly taken up with legislation tending to abridge our liberties in the gospel, enforcing customs and usages, and elevating them to an equality with the gospel, and defending them with even more vigor than the commands of God." Their first convention was held at Ashland, O., June 29, 1883, and their Annual Meeting of the present year at Dayton, O. The main body, who are known "Conservatives," and who insist upon the decisions of the Annual Meeting as "mandatory," or obligatory upon all the members of the society, decided at their last meeting "that such as have left the church, and joined in with the 'Old Order,' or 'Progressive' churches, should not be received into the church without being rebaptized" (Annual Meeting, 1883, art. 8); so that these divisions in the church may now be regarded as permanent.

The society insists upon a regular group of Members are not allowed, "without being baptized by the church, to exhibit in public, general meetings" (Annual Meeting, 1859). The ministers are of three orders: (1) The lowest, called a minister of the first degree, is merely an assistant in preaching, and is subject to the authority of the superior in the ministry; (2) The minister of the second degree, who is always chosen from the first — he makes his own preaching points, baptizes, performs the marriage ceremony, etc.; (3) The highest official is the elder or bishop, sometimes the householder, is always taken from the ministers of the degree, usually the senior. He presides at the meetings of the society, visits the homes and churches, anoints the sick, consecrates the ordinances, etc.

The only other official in the church is the clerk, who is usually three or four years older than the elder, and is elected by the annual meeting, and takes his place after the bishop, if there is one.

The records of the early church at Germantown show that several of the sisters were deaconesses: but the sisters are not so pointed to any official position in the church. The Annual Meeting, 1859, decided that "we cannot teach or preach in the ordination or reception of any official position in the church." Electioneering, being strictly forbidden, the "church enjoinning on the believing teachers the duty of aiding, by their own example and chaste conversation, their homes the solemn duty laid upon them" (Annual Meeting, 1862, art. 36).

The ministers and deacons are chosen by the votes of all the members of the congregation being conducted by visiting it, i.e., ministers of neighboring churches have been summoned by the congregation for the purpose. After devotional exercises, the members retire to some convenient, quiet place, where each member comes singly, and expresses his preference; all canvassing of the congregation "electioneering," being strictly forbidden. The brother who has the highest number declared elected; and the names of those voted for, together with the number of votes for them, are kept secret.

All the affairs of the congregation are conducted at a meeting or council of the members, by the elder, and held as occasion may require; the sisters have equal voice with the brethren. Distinct and a general conference are held for churches conveniently located together; each church sending two delegates, of whom must be a minister. The congregation of each church, called the Annual Meeting, has lately been composed exclusively of ministers and elders to be their minister. By 1729 they had all reached the United States; and the society no longer exists in Europe, though they have had for the last five years a mission in Denmark.

The Brethren soon found their way into the interior counties of Pennsylvania and the Southen and Western States, having at the present time congregations even in California and Oregon. Every year there is a meeting of the churches, at the time congregations even in California and Oregon. Every year there is a meeting of the churches, at the time congregations even in California and Oregon. each district meeting. These councils, or "Big Meetings," put in order such matters as cannot be agreed upon in the congregations, or by the district meetings; matters in dispute being submitted to the meeting in the form of "queries." Formerly all the brethren and sisters present, often several thousand, took part in settling the questions brought before the council, as in some of the congregational meetings; but now the discussions and voting are confined to the delegates, two-thirds of the votes cast being required for a decision. The first of these Annual Meetings was held in 1742, but there are no minutes preserved prior to those of 1788. An examination of these minutes (by which alone the doctrines and usages of the Brethren can be really ascertained) shows that "queries" with reference to doctrines are rare, and proves that there has always been a general adherence to the fundamental and distinctive principles originally adopted by the society. But the application of these principles in special cases is the subject of frequent "queries" from the district meetings, referring to such minute questions of casuistry as the following: Is it right, according to the tenor of the gospel, for brethren to curl their hair in accordance with the example of Christ, but disregarding the "double mode" as the recognized mode of the general brotherhood. The minutes show that the Breth-views. In 1728, still living in solitary cottages or cells, they organized a distinct society, which soon assumed a monastic character; and several buildings were erected at Ephrata for the use of the order. There was at first a community of goods; but this was afterwards partially abandoned, before the donations to the society, and the labor of the inmates of the cloisters, being regarded as common stock. Celibacy was enjoined upon those living in the cloisters, and was recommended to all others, but not absolutely required. They adopted a garb similar to that of the Capuchins, and, upon entering the order, assumed monastic names. Beissel took the name of Friedchins, laid, upon entering the order, assumed the title of Spiritual Father. Israel Eckert (Onesiumus) was the first prior (Vorsteher). In 1740 the cloisters contained thirty-six single brethren and fifty-three sisters; and the members living in the neighborhood swelled the numbers of the Order of the Solitary to nearly three hundred. After the battle of Brandywine (1777), one of the buildings was used as a hospital for the wounded, and the press was employed in printing for the troops. The cloisters were used as a refuge in the Revolution. In 1740 the cloisters contained thirty-six single brethren, and many of them, during the next century, took refuge in Saxony. In 1756 a number of families emigrated to Pennsylvania, and settled in Montgomery and the neighboring counties. For a hundred and fifty years they have held, each year, a festival (Gedächtnistag) in grateful memory of their arrival. They have but five or six churches, all of them in Montgomery and the adjoining counties, and number about two hundred families. The doctrines, government, and discipline of the Schwenckfelders in many respects resemble those of the Friends, whom they also resemble in intelligent and pious zeal, leading sober, honest, peaceful, and industrious lives.

and were, in fact, officers of the Turkish Government quite as much as of the Church. They had civil as well as ecclesiastical authority over their flocks, and were sometimes the instruments of Turkish oppression, sometimes oppressors themselves, and sometimes the protectors of the Christians. This idea of the Turk was, that, by controlling the ecclesiastical organization, he could control the people more easily than if he dealt with them as individuals. This was true; but, on the other hand, in so doing he prepared the way for the destruction of his empire. This system has enabled the different nationalities of the empire to maintain a separate existence, to keep up national feeling, and to resist Mohammedan propaganda. The Turks have at last begun to appreciate this; and of late years the authority of the Christian ecclesiastics has been curtailed, and efforts have been made to do away with the special privileges accorded to the churches. The churches have vigorously resisted, and have been supported in this by the European powers. There are now in Constantinople, officially recognized by the Porte, Patriarchs of the Armenian, Catholic Armenian, Latin, and Orthodox churches, the Head of the Greek Church, the Vekil of the Protestants, and the Hakham-Bashi of the Jews. Except the Catholics and Protestants, these religious bodies have done nothing since the Turkish conquest to propagate their faith; but their hostility to each other has been almost as great as their hatred of the Turks.

Protestant Missions.— The Protestant Reformations in Europe was not without influence in Turkey, and some of the highest ecclesiastics of the Orthodox Church were more or less in sympathy with it. But the people were too ignorant and too isolated to be reached by any movement from without; and Protestantism was practically unknown to them until the establishment of Protestant missions in Turkey, early in the present century. These missions have been confined almost exclusively to the Greek and Roman Catholics. There are now (1888) twenty-five societies engaged in this work,— the Church Missionary Society, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the London Jews Society, the Established Church of Scotland, the Free Church of Scotland, the Irish Presbyterian Mission, the Palestine Church Missionary Society, the British Syrian School Society, the Lebanon Schools Committee, the Society for promoting Female Education in the East, the Whately Schools Society in Egypt. All of these are British organizations; and in addition to these, there are several independent enterprises, mostly schools, conducted by the English. The American societies are the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the Presbyterian Board of Missions, the Reformed Presbyterian Mission, the United Presbyterian Mission, the Methodist-Episcopal Mission, the Christian (Campbellite) Mission, the Society of Friends (American and English). There are also a number of publication societies, both English and American, which have agents in Turkey, or work through the missionaries. The most important are the British and Foreign Bible Society, the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, the London Religious Tract Society. The German missions are the Kaiserwrithe Deu-
The mission to the Jews in Turkey are conducted by the London Jews Society, which has 5 stations, 7 missionaries, 2 medical missionaries, 6 helpers, and 6 schools; the church of Scotland, which has 5 stations, 5 missionaries, 1 medical missionary, 6 helpers, and 6 schools; the Free Church of Scotland, which has 2 stations, 2 missionaries, 2 helpers, and 3 schools. In all there are four organized churches. It is supposed that the wives of the missionaries are not included in these statistics, as they are in those which precede them.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has eleven depots and depositories in Turkey, with a central agency at Constantinople. It now employs thirty-three colportors. It commenced work in Turkey about 1806. It has circulated the Bible in thirty-five languages, to the amount of 1,058,804 volumes. The American Bible Society has a central agency at Constantinople. Several branches are in part connected with the missions. Up to 1858 the missionaries acted as agents of the American Bible Society. Robert College at Constantinople, and the Syrian Protestant College at Beyrout, are independent, endowed institutions, not connected with any missionary society; but they are the fruit of missionary work. Robert College has 17 professors and instructors, and 238 students. Its course of instruction is similar to that of the best American colleges. It was founded in 1863. The Syrian Protestant College has a medical department in addition to its college course, and was founded in 1855. It has 10 professors and instructors, and 127 students. The students are both American institutions, and in both the language of instruction is English. Their students represent almost all the languages, religions, and nationalities of the East.

The real influence of Protestant missions in Turkey cannot be measured by any such statistics as those given above. It has been not only religious, but intellectual, social, and political. It has modified the character of the Oriental churches, and to some extent reformed them. It has carried Western ideas and Christian civilization into the darkest corners of the empire. Many English statesmen familiar with Turkish affairs have declared that American missionaries have accomplished more for the regeneration of the East than all other influences combined. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe and Lord Shaftesbury may be mentioned, among others, as having expressed this opinion.

Roman-Catholic Missions. — Neither the Roman-Catholic authorities nor the French embassy at Constantinople are ready to furnish the statistics.
Roman-Catholic missions in Turkey; although often was made to publish what they might wish, without note or comment. Without such istics, only general statements can be made.

Roman-Catholic missions in Turkey are social agencies of the French Government, and such receive pecuniary aid and diplomatic support, even from the present anti-clerical government of France. In return for this they are expected to support Catholic influence under various circumstances. So far as my observation goes, principal Catholic organizations represented at the Lazaress, Mecheckiares, Franciscans, Dominicans, Capuchins, Carmelites, Jesuits and various organizations of Sisters of Charity. Many years past they have made but little progress in winning converts from other Christian churches, and they have not attempted to convert Mohammedans.

A time the Bulgarians, after their conversion to Eastern Orthodoxy, included among the Greeks, and they were left to the care of the Eastern Church, and entirely without protection from either the Turkish or the Serbian Government, by the Jacobites, control the And a union with Rome. They have not essentially weakened these churches, nor have they made converts enough to enter into any rivalry with the Catholics.

Among the Greeks, no progress has been made in the province of Illyria, in the person of the Roman Patriarch, or in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Roman-Catholic missions have certainly been more successful than the Catholic in living on the country. They depend much less, in proportion to their numbers, upon foreign aid.

It is not easy for a Protestant to form an estimate of the success of Roman-Catholic missions. They have no doubt planted the church so firmly in this empire, that it can stand by itself without foreign aid; but they have done nothing towards converting the Mohammedans, and have made no progress in winning over the Oriental churches to a union with Rome. They have not essentially weakened these churches, nor have they made converts enough to enter into any rivalry with them. They will not advance farther, unless, as in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the country falls under the control of some Catholic power.

TURLEPIINS. The, a sect of the latter part of the fourteenth and the fifteenth centuries, which was quite numerous in Paris and in the province of Isle-de-France. It held private meetings, at which, in order to represent paradise, the members threw aside their garments. They had the appearance of holiness and earnestness. Gregory XI. in 1373 urged the king of France to support the Dominicans against the Turlupins; and, when they spread to Savoy, a similar appeal was likewise sent to Duke Amadeus. Gerson attributes to them the same doctrines that were advocated by the Brethren of the Free Spirit.

TURNER, Daniel, was b. at Blackwater Park, near St. Albans, March 1, 1710; and d. at Abingdon, Berkshire, Sept. 5, 1708; Baptist pastor at Reading, 1741, and from 1748 at Abingdon. He published Short Meditations, 1771; and other two prose works: Divine Songs, Hymns, etc., 1747; and Poems, Devotional and Moral, 1744. Four of his hymns appeared in Ash and Evans's Collection, 1769, and in Rippon's, 1757. Several of them have been widely popular, and are still in use.

TURRETINI, or TURRETTI, the name of several distinguished theologians of the Reformed Church, whose ancestor Francesco emigrated in 1579 from Luca to Geneva, for religious considerations. — I. Benedetto, was b. in Zürich, 1588; became successively pastor (1612) and professor of theology (1618) in Geneva; d. [March 4], 1631. He took a prominent part at the synod of Alais (1620), which introduced the decrees of the synod of Dort into France. He left behind him a number of sermons, and especially a Défence de la fidélité des traductions de la Bible faites à Genève. Geneva, 1618-20, 20 vols. — II. François, son of the preceding, a distinguished representative of the more moderate theology than his father's, an advocate of ecclesiastical union, and the most distinguished theologian of his name; was b. [Aug. 24], 1674, in Geneva, where his father's influence as a pastor, a theologian, and a man, was very great. His career was especially marked by the successful effort to modify the strict Calvinism which his father had taught, and an attempt to promote a union of the Reformed and Lutheran churches. It was mainly due to his efforts that the rule was abolished, in 1706, requiring in baptism the 7th Article of the Helvetic Confession, with the words, sic sentio, sic profiter, sic docedo et contrarium non docebo. In 1725 the Consensus was finally renounced. As regards ecclesiastical union, Turrettin was led to interest himself for the first time in the subject in 1707, when he heard that Frederick I. of Prussia, who was desirous of bringing the Lutheran and Reformed churches together, sought for the opinion of the Genevan clergy on the subject. They replied on April 22, in a document drawn up by Turrettin, which emphasized the points of agreement between the two communions, and expressed a hearty readiness to admit Lutherans to the Lord's Table in Reformed churches. Turrettin was thus led to consider the distinction between the fundamental and non-fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and to distinguish his views in a volume [English translation, A Discourse concerning the Fundamental Articles in Religion, London, 1720]. He defines the fundamental doctrines to be those doctrines "a knowledge and acceptance of which are necessary to secure the grace and salvation of God," and urged ecclesiastical union on the basis of them. The work was attacked by the Jesuit François dePierre (Lyons, 1729), who urged that the Reformed churches, like the Church of England, had no further reason for remaining outside the Catholic Church. This work of Turrettin formed a part of his Nubes testim pro moderate et pacifico de rebus theologici judiciu et instituenda inter Protestantem concordia, etc., 1729. His theology appeared in 2 vols., 1737, under the title, Cognitiones et dissertationes theolog., etc. After his death, there appeared Com. theoretico-practicum in Ep. ad Thessal. (Basel, 1739) and Protectiones ad Ep. Rom., cap. xi., Gen., 1741. [See E. de Bude: François et J. Alphonse Turrettini, Laussanne, 1880, 2 vols.]

TWESTEN, August Detlev Christian, b. at Glückstadt, Holstein, April 11, 1789; d. in Berlin, Jan. 8, 1876. He studied theology at Kiel and Berlin, and was appointed professor at Kiel in 1814, and in Berlin in 1834. He was a pupil of Schleiermacher; and his Vorlesungen über die Dogmatik der evangel.-luther. TWIN, or DWIN, Councils of. Twin, under Chorsoy II., became the capital of Armenia, and the religious centre of the realm. Eight councils were held there. The First Council, held in 452, declared Twin the seat of the Catholics. The Second Council was summoned by the Catholics, Nerses II., in 527, and passed thirty-eight canons, one of which ordered a fast of one week every month. The Third Council was held under Moses II. in 551, and decreed that the 11th of July, 558, should begin the Armenian era, and be the New-Year's Day of the first year. The Fourth Council (598) was important for bringing about a separation between the Armenians and Georgians: the latter, unable to agree upon a Catholicos, had requested Moses II. to appoint one. He chose Cyrian, who decreed the acceptance of the Council of Chalcedon. The Fourth Council took up this decree, and condemned Cyrian and his followers. This act was the occasion of much controversy among the Armenians. The Fifth Council was held under Nerses III. in 645; condemned all heresies, and especially those of the Donatist sect, though without giving up his connection with the Catholic Church, for which reason he was violently attacked by Parmenianus as a traitor. Of his writings, we have only one, Liber de septem regulis; but as the first attempt at forming a theory of Christian hermeneutics, and on account of the influence which its author exercised on Augustine, it is of great interest. It was first edited by Grymes, Basel, 1669, and best treated by Gallandi, in his Bibl. Vetus, i. p. 107-129.

TYCHONIUS, d. about 390; belonged to the Donatist sect, though without giving up his connection with the Catholic Church, for which reason he was violently attacked by Parmenianus as a traitor. Of his writings, we have only one, Liber de septem regulis; but as the first attempt at forming a theory of Christian hermeneutics, and on account of the influence which its author exercised on Augustine, it is of great interest. It was first edited by Grymes, Basel, 1669, and best treated by Gallandi, in his Bibl. Vetus, i. p. 107-129.

TYCHSEN, Oluf Gerhardt, b. at Tonder, Slesvig, Dec. 14, 1734; d. at Rostock, Dec. 30, 1815. He was educated at Altona; studied theology and Oriental languages at Halle; became in 1759 a member of the Kallenberg missionary institution for the conversion of Jews and Mohammedans, but proved very unsuccessful in his practical attempts; and was in 1760 appointed professor of Oriental languages at Bützow, whence in 1789 he was removed to Rostock. He was a man of great learning, but without judgment, as appears from his controversy with Kennicott (Tentamen de varia colicium Hebr. Vetera Test. MSS. generibus, Rostock, 1772), with Bayer (Die Unechtheit der jüdischen Münzen mit hebräischen und samaritanischen Buchstaben, Rostock, 1779), and with others. The best he has written is found in his Bützowischen Nebenstunden, 1769-90, and Introductio in rem nummarium Muhammadorum, Rostock, 1794; which latter has been highly praised by de Sacy. His life was written by Hartmann, Bremen, 1815-20, 4 vols.

TYLER, Bennet, D.D., Congregational theologian (first president of the Theological Institute of Connecticut; now located at ip Soph.), b. in Middlebury (then a part of Woodbury), Conn., July 10, 1783; d. at East Windsor, Conn., May 14, 1858. He was graduated at Yale College in 1804; spent a year as teacher in Weston, Conn.; studied theology with the Rev. Asahel Hooker at Goshen, Conn.; licensed in 1806; begun to preach in 1807 at South Britain, where he was ordained in 1808; became president of Dartmouth College in 1822; received the degree of D.D. from Middlebury College the same year; succeeded Dr. Payson as pastor of Second Congregational Church, Portland, Me., in 1828; elected president of the Theological Institute in 1838; inaugurated May 13, 1834, when the cornerstone of the new edifice was laid in East Windsor, Conn.; resigned this position July 16, 1837, and died suddenly at the house of his daughter, from a neuralgic affection in the head and lungs. In all these positions Dr. Tyler was successful; and though much of his public life was spent in theological controversy, his Christian character was recognized even by his opponents, while his friends testify to his genuine virtue, unreserved candor, genuine humility, and cheerful piety. As a teacher of theology he was clear in statement, apt in meeting objections, and, above all, successful in making his pupils feel that he believed, felt, and lived the truth he taught them.

Dr. Tyler's name has been conspicuous in connection with a theological controversy among the Congregationalists, Bellamy, Hopkins, and Dwight. His position on the doctrine of original sin was acknowledged even by his opponents, while his own orthodoxy was almost unanimously exonerated. His style is forcible and clear; and his matter always manifests the grand old Puritan faith in a personal God of holiness.

The germ of the controversy was the position, attributed to Dr. Taylor, "that no human being can be deceived but by his own act, and that the sinfulness of the race does not pertain to man's nature." In connection with this, regeneration was regarded as the act of man's own will or man's nature. In connection with this, regeneration was regarded as "effected, not by moral suasion, or by the efficiency of any means whatever, but by the direct agency of the Holy Spirit, changing the moral disposition, and imparting a new spiritual life to the soul." The controversy, as usual at that time, was carried on with speculative and dogmatic weapons; but the friends of Dr. Tyler claim that he was eminently scriptural in his arguments. The exegetical and historical methods of our present day have strengthened rather than weakened the defences of the system which Dr. Tyler represented, but the some of his subordinate positions and arguments cannot now be maintained. As yet nothing has occurred to impeach the wisdom of Dr. Tyler and his associates in founding the Theological Institute of Connecticut.

In later times Dr. Tyler became engaged in discussion with Dr. Bushnell (see below), and his own orthodoxy was called in question before the Pastoral Union in 1856. From this charge he was almost unanimously exonerated.

Dr. Tyler not only contributed largely to the theological controversy above named, but published many sermons and addresses, and contributed many articles to the religious periodicals of the day. — Christian Sentinel, Christian Spectator, National Preacher, Connecticut Magazine, New-England Recorder, English Panoply, etc. His style is forcible and clear; and his matter always manifests the grand old Puritan faith in a personal God of holiness.

TYNDALE, William, descended from an ancient Northumbrian family, b. 1484, most probably at North Nibley, Gloucestershire; went to school at Oxford, and afterwards to Magdalen Hall and Cambridge; and about 1520 became tutor in the family of Sir John Walsh, at Little Sodbury in Gloucestershire, and also pecuniarily aided by him and others in the accomplishment of his purpose to translate the Scriptures into the vernacular. Unable to do so in England, he set out for the Continent (about May, 1524), and appears to have visited Hamburg and Wittenberg; but where he translated the New Testament, although conjectured to have been Wittenberg, cannot be named with certainty. He was hospitably entertained at the house of Sir Humphrey Monmouth, and also pecuniarily aided by him and others in the accomplishment of his purpose to translate the Scriptures into the vernacular. Unable to do so in England, he set out for the Continent (about May, 1524), and appears to have visited Hamburg and Wittenberg; but where he translated the New Testament, although conjectured to have been Wittenberg, cannot be named with certainty. ...
TYPE. from the Greek τύπος, means a prefiguration in a lower sphere of a fact belonging to a higher. It is allied to prophecy, allegory, and symbol: but prophecy is a prefiguration in words; type, in fact: allegory a prefiguration through a fictitious image; type, in the form of full reality: symbol a prefiguration by a hint which leads farther on through the natural association of ideas; type, as a complete, self-sufficient representation.

Types, in this sense of the word, are of so frequent occurrence, both in nature and history, that no total view of any comprehensiveness can be formed without involving a typical element; and, on the other side, it comes so natural to the human mind to discover types, or rather, to recognize them, that no true method of interpretation, in any sphere, can afford to neglect that element. How prominent it was in scriptural interpretation at the time of Christ, the New Testament itself gives striking evidence. Christ represented the brazen serpent of the desert as a type of the crucifixion of the Son of man (John iii. 14), and Jonah as a type of the burial of the Son of man (Matt. xii. 40). Paul represents the first Adam as a type of the second Adam (Rom. v. 14), and the paschal lamb as a type of Christ (1 Cor. v. 7). It occurs in almost every book of the New Testament; and it was, indeed, one of the most prominent features of the general education and spiritual character of the age.

Led on by the spirit of the time, and partly, also, by the example of the New Testament, the Christian theologians plunged with all their heart into the "profound interpretation of Scripture," putting the whole apparatus of types, allegories, symbols, etc., in full operation. In the Eastern Church the arbitrariness of Justin and Origen provoked both Jews and Pagans (Tryphon and Celsus). In the Western Church the exuberance of Ambrose and Hilary was hardly checked by Augustine. Although Augustine never abandons the historical sense, he considered it slavish weakness to stick to the literal sense, as the Jews did. He distinguishes between four methods of interpretation, secundam historiam, etiologicam (which discovers the purpose of an event), analeticam (which discovers the harmony between the Old and the New Testament) and allegoriam. Under the last head he further distinguishes between allegoria historicia, facti, sermonis, and sacra menti, which divisions correspond to the four methods of interpretation prevailing during the middle ages, historica, allegorica (including the typical), tropologica (comprising the ethical and parenthetical application), and anagogica (explaining the bearing upon future life) the types being sought, not in the trivial details, but in the grand totalities of the old and new dispensations. The Spencian view of the Mosaic worship, as having been borrowed from the Egyptian and other Oriental religions, gradually destroyed the typical character of the Old Testament; and, towards the middle of the eighteenth century, Henke declared typology to be "a trick long ago played out." Semler, in his Versuch einer freieren theologischen Lehramt (1777), declares, that typology has nothing to do with true religion: and now, in happy tidings of interpretation was considered as completely destroyed by Rau's Freimüthige Untersuchung über die Typologie, 1784. It revived, however, with the general revival of religion in the beginning of the present century, and has since produced some of its finest fruits. See Hoffmann: Weissagung und Erfüllung, Nürnberg, 1841, 2 vols., and Ed. v. Mihm., on the New Testament, 1855, the chapter, Zur biblischen Typik. A. THOLUCK.

TYRE (the Greek Τύρος, the Hebrew "יו"), a city of Phoenicia, and one of the most celebrated commercial centres of antiquity, stood on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean, in latitude 33° 17' north. It consisted of two parts, one situated on the mainland, and called Old Tyre, for some reason not known; and the other, the city proper, situated on an island, and containing the principal sanctuary, the Temple of Melkarth (Hercules). It is first mentioned in Scripture in Josh. xix. 29, where it is spoken of as a fortified place. It was a monarchy, and not, like most of the great com-commercial cities of antiquity, a republic. Its king, Hiram, entertained very friendly relations with David (2 Sam. v. 11) and Solomon (1 Kings vii. 18-45), who from Tyre obtained not only materials, but also workmen, for buildings. Afterwards the friendly relations between Israel and Tyre were disturbed; because the Tyrians began to buy Hebrew captives, and sell them as slaves to the Greeks and Edomites (Joel iii. 4-8; Amos i. 9, 10). Meanwhile the power of the city was steadily increasing. It planted the celebrated colony, Carthage, on the coast of Northern Africa, and subjugated the island of Cyprus, where rich copper-mines were opened. In 721 B.C. it was besieged by Shalmaneser, and in 585 B.C. by Nebuchadnezzar, but both times in vain, though the latter siege lasted for thirteen years. When Alexander the Great, after the battle of Issus (331), entered Phoenicia, Sidon, though at that time it was both richer and more powerful than Tyre, was prudent enough to submit, while Tyre in its pride decided to resist. After a siege of seven months it was taken, and from that calamity it never rose again: its independence was lost forever. It afterwards belonged to the Seleucid kingdom of Syria (1 Macc. xi. 59; 2 Macc. iv. 18, 44), and came then under Roman rule. At the time of Christ, however, it was still a commercial place of some consequence, though not so important as Sidon. It is mentioned in Matt. xi. 21, xv. 21, Luke vi. 17, x. 13; and in the apostolic age it contained a Christian congregation, with which Paul staid for seven days (Acts xxii. 3-7). The present Sur stands on a peninsula, formed by the dam which Alexander constructed between the mainland and the island; but it is not much more than a village. TZSCHRNER, Heinrich Gottlieb, a distinguished German theologian; was b. at Mitweida, Saxony, Nov. 14, 1778; d. at Leipzig, Feb. 17, 1828. After studying at Wittenberg and Leipzig, he became successively pastor at Mitweida, professor at Wittenberg in 1803, and professor of theology at Leipzig. He was also made pastor of St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig, and subsequently held other positions in connection with his professorship. He was a rationalist, with a strong leaning towards the supranaturalist school. He excelled as a pulpit orator. His principal work was his continuation of Schröckh's Church History in 2 vols., Leipzig, 1810-12. He spent ten years upon a work edited by Niedner (Leipzig, 1829), Der Fall d. Heidentums. His Lectures on Theology were edited by Karl Hase, Leipzig, 1829. See H. G. Tzschirner: Skizze s. Lebens, etc., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1828.

(6) Crozer Theological Seminary is situated fourteen miles south of Philadelphia, on the border of the city of Chester, in the borough of Upland, Delaware County, Penn. It was founded under the auspices of the Baptist denomination, by act of the Legislature, in 1867, and owes its name to the liberality of the children of John P. Crozer, Esq., then recently deceased, whose wide public munificence his family were simply carrying forward. For the establishment and permanent support of the institution they have contributed at least four hundred thousand dollars.

The seminary entered upon its work of instruction in the fall of 1868 with twenty students; graduated its first class in 1869, some having entered advanced in studies; and has now near two hundred alumni engaged in the work of the Christian ministry at home or abroad.

Its course of instruction extends through three years, and its diploma presupposes a thorough training in all those lines of study generally recognized as necessary to the candidate for the ministry. A special provision is made, however, for the training of those, also, who from any circumstances cannot pursue the study of the Bible in its original languages. They, on completing their course, receive a corresponding diploma.

UBBONITES. [usual spelling; correctly, Ubbonites], a party of moderate Anabaptists founded in 1534 by Ubbo Philipps [Ubbe Philipsoen]. Born at Leuwarden, he was consecrated priest, and went with his brother, Dirk Philipps, over to the Anabaptists in 1533. He displayed great zeal for the establishment of a strict church-discipline, and ordained Dirk, David Joris, and Menno Simons preachers. The Ubbonites differed from the rest of the Anabaptists by denying that the kingdom of Christ was an earthly kingdom in which the pious were to exterminate the wicked. They rejected divorce. Ubbo died in 1568, but left the Anabaptists several years before his death, on account of their excesses, and went over to the Reformed Church. UBERTINUS, surnamed de Casali, from the place of his birth; d. about 1380; was one of the principal leaders of the strict party among the Franciscans, which insisted upon the rigid rule of poverty, and declared the church to be wholly corrupt. This party, led by Peter John Olivi (d. 1297), was condemned by Pope Alexander IV. (1255). Ubbertinus laid down his views in the work Arbor vita crucifixi (Venice, 1485), and a Defense of Olivi (in Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. v., Rome, 1738). Called upon to answer for his opinions by Clement V., he went, with the permission of John XXII., over to the Benedictines, and at a later period changed to the Carthusians. He also wrote Tractatus de septem statibus ecclesiae (a sort of commentary on the Apocalypse), Venice, 1516. NEUDECKER.

UBIQUITY is the designation of the doctrine stated by Luther, and held in the Lutheran Church, of the omnipresence of the humanity, and more especially of the body, of Christ. It was deduced from the doctrine of the hypostatic union of the two natures in Christ, and was designed to explain the real presence of the body in the Lord's Supper, upon which Luther insisted. The biblical passages for testing the doctrine are those which record the institution of the Lord's Supper, and refer to Christ's ascension, his session at the right hand of God (Eph. i. 20-23; Col. iii. 1; I Pet. iii. 22, etc.), and his presence with the church (Matt. xxviii. 20).

Origen and Gregory of Nyssa (Antirrheticus adv. Apollinarem, c. 59) were the only ones of the Fathers who represent the glorified body of Christ as ubiquitous. Augustine expressly denies that the hypostatic union of the two natures had for its result that the humanitarian is everywhere, as God is everywhere (non est consensu, ut quad in Deo sit, ita sit ubique, ut Deus). The God-man united with his church everywhere in his majesty and grace, etc., but not in his flesh, which the Logos assumed. He is everywhere by reason of being God; but he is in heaven by reason of his human nature (ubique per id, quod Deus est, in calo autem per id, quod homo). Thus he also said, in explanation of the word to the thief on the cross (Luke xix. 43), "Christ as man on that day, according to his flesh, would be in the grave; . . . but as God, that same Christ is always everywhere" (κομοσ Χριστος το διε σεκουνδον καρνα εις σεπυλυμα ).

Deus vero ipse idem Christus ubique semper est. Ep. 187). With Augustine, "the right hand of God," at which Christ sits, is a restricted locality. John of Damascus denied the local explanation of the expression, "right hand of God," but held that Christ's glorified body is localized, and distinguished from his earthly body by its immunity from pain and want (De Origo. Fide, iv. 1. 9). In the middle ages the Augustinian view prevailed. Hugo of St. Victor, in his work on the sacraments (i. 13), says, "Christ as to his humanity is in heaven, as to his divinity everywhere" (Christus secundum humanitatem in calo est, secundum divinitatem ubique). Peter Lombard (iii. 22), in the same tone, says that Christ as to his person is everywhere (totum ubique), but not as to his nature (sed non totum). The doctrine of the middle ages may be indicated by the three propositions: (1) Christ's divinity is ubiquitous; (2) His glorified body is confined to a certain celestial locality; (3) This same body is present by the miracle of transubstantiation wherever the Eucharist is celebrated.

It remained for Luther to formulate the doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's glorified body. He deduced it from the doctrine of the real presence in the Lord's Supper, and used it to explain the real presence. Although as early as 1520 he called the doctrine of transubstantiation the second prison in which the Roman Church had confined the consciences of men, he spoke of the Picards of Bohemia as "heretics, because they do not believe that Christ's flesh and blood are truly present in the sacrament." His doctrine of the real presence was expressed in the words: "The body and blood of Christ are "in, with, and under" the bread and the wine. He says, "The glorified body is in all the parts of the substance of bread," and illustrates it by the relation of fire and iron, "two distinct substances, and yet mingled in one glowing mass of iron, so that every part is iron and fire." There is an interpenetration of the body and bread, but no mixture. The clearest statement of Luther's views on this subject is found in his work on the Lord's Supper (1629), in the chapter headed De pradicatione identica. As in Christ, divinity and humanity were united in one person, and interpenetrated each other without any change, so, in the Lord's Supper, bread and body were united in a sacramental way, and interpenetrated each other without any change. In order to explain this process, Luther affirmed the ubiquity of the humanity—and body of Christ. "Not only as to his divinity, but also to his humanity, he is everywhere present," he expressly says. "Heaven and earth are a bag, and as grain fills the bag, so he fills heaven and earth; and as my voice reaches so many ears, how much more can Christ distribute himself totally and indivisibly in so many pieces!" "The right hand of God" is not a definite spot, but it is everywhere where God is. The three reasons he gives for the real presence are, that God is essentially and truly God and man in one person, that God's right hand is everywhere, and that God's word is not false.

Zwingli, Calvin, and Ecolampadius distinctly rejected the doctrine of ubiquity in rejecting Luther's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Melanchthon in his earlier period taught the doctrine of ubiquity, in 1530 edited a number of patristic testimonies to confirm the real presence, and expressly taught that Christ's body can only be in one place. At a later period he denounced these views, and distinctly stated (Responsio de controversia Stancarii) that "Christ is everywhere, but only according to his divine nature." In 1532 Joachim Westphal renewed the sacramental controversy, which seemed to have been ended, by denouncing Calvin as a Zwinglian; and at the synod of Stuttgart, Dec. 19, 1559, the Wurttemberg church reaffirmed Luther's doctrine of ubiquity, which was thus made for a protracted period the centre of all investigations in christology. Brenz, the most prominent theologian in Germany after Melanchthon's death, was the author of this document, and developed his views in the following works: Der personali uniones durum naturarum in Christo, 1561; De ibiello H. Bullingeri, 1561; De majestate Dom. nos. Jesu Christi et de vera presentia, 1562. He insisted upon the union of the two natures in one person and the communication to the humanity of the majesty of the divinity; so that Christ in the totality of his nature fills heaven and earth. "For if the Deity of Christ were anywhere without his humanity, there would be two persons, not one."

The Wittenberg school, which followed Melanchthon, held that Christ was not everywhere, and that this statement of the Wurttembergers. Between the two parties, Martin Chemnitz took up his position as a mediator. He held that Christ is present with his whole person (divinity and humanity) in the Lord's Supper: and yet the glorified body is not omnipresent, but multipresent or volupresent; that is, its presence was subject to the will of Christ, and not confined absolutely to one locality. Beza (essentially a dogmatist, as he never consented to the decision of Kirchheim, near Heidelberg, but a year later, under the influence especially of Neander, he adopted that evangelical type of theology of which he became one of the most genial and distinguished representatives. In 1819 Ullmann began to lecture at Heidelberg, and in 1821 was elected professor. In 1825 he published a work on Gregory Nazianzen, which deserves a place at the side of Neander's monographs. In 1828 he founded, in connection with Umbreit, the Theologische Studien u. Kritiken ("Theological Studies and Discussions"). It became the chief organ of the evangelical school of theology, represented by Neander, etc. The opening article, on the sinlessness of Jesus (Ueber die Unssiindlichkeit Jesu), was subsequently published in an enlarged form under the title Die Sinlosigkeit Jesu ("The Sinlessness of Jesus") (7th ed., 1863), and was one of the most valuable and influential writings of the modern evangelical school in Germany. In 1829 Ullmann followed a call to Halle, where he lectured on church history, symbols, and systematic theology. In 1833 an article appeared from his pen on John Wessel, which he afterwards incorporated in his principal historical work, Die Reformatoren vor d. Reformation, [2d ed., 1866, 2 vols., Eng. trans., "The Reformers before the Reformation," Edinburgh, 1841-42, 2 vols.]. It is characterized by thoroughness of treatment, and grace and fervor of style. In 1836 he returned to Heidelberg. He wrote a number of articles against Strauss's Life of Christ (1855) and the principles it involved, one of which, directed against Strauss's suggestion of a change in the nature of public worship, was published, with a dedication to Gustav Schwab, under the title Ueber den Cultus d. Genius ("The Worship of Genius, 1840"). It and Das Wesen d. Christenthums ("The Essence of Christianity," 1845, 5th ed., 1856), were translated, London, 1816.

ested in the practical government of the church, and, when the controversy about the union of the confessions began, wrote at length and repeatedly in the Studien upon subjects it suggested. Some of those articles were printed separately, as Ueber d. Verhältnis von Staat u. Kirche. In 1853 he was appointed prelat [an officer with functions somewhat similar to those of a bishop], and, unfortunately for himself, accepted the position. He threw himself with earnestness into the management of the ecclesiastical duties of the position, and in 1858 was appointed director of the supreme ecclesiastical council (Oberkirchenrat). In this position he found himself constantly at variance with the ministers of the cabinet; and his efforts to introduce a new liturgy, etc., aroused serious opposition, and called forth the criticism that he was seeking to introduce re-actionary, hierarchical, and high-church movements. Unwilling to be the mere subordinate of the ministry, and to face longer the opposition in the ranks of the clergy, he resigned his office in 1861. He was theneorthwith without any public office, and devoted his energies to the editing of the Studien. During the last years of his life he suffered from a complication of physical infirmities.

Ullmann was not one of the creative minds and prophetic men who cut new paths for the church and theology; but he was one of the noblest characters, and had one of the most highly gifted minds, which the German Church can boast of in our century. He was, in the best sense of the word, a Christian humanist, whose writings and example are still exercising a blessed influence. He died after hearing repeated, at his own request, the last two verses of Paul Gerhard's hymn, O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden. See W. Byschlag: D. Karl Ullmann, Gotha, 1866; [Schaff: Germany and its Universities, pp. 345 sqq.]

ULPHILAS. the Apostle of the Goths (313–383). According to the Arian church historian, Philostorgius (Hist. Eccl., 2, 5), whose statement is corroborated by other Greek church historians, he belonged to a Cappadocian family which was converted to the new faith from heathenism; but he was then a pagan and showed no desire to cast off his heathenism. He was the son of Ulphilas, chief Athanaric became frightened, and insti-tuted a violent persecution in 350. But Ulphilas himself was won for the new faith, which simply meant that the conversion of the whole Gothic nation was completed. They were Arians; and on Jan. 17, 385, a council was opened in Constantinople for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation between the Arian Goths and the Orthodox Greek Church. It is probable that Ulphias was present at that council. Its purpose, however, was not accomplished. See the art. GOThs.

In his missionary work, Ulphilas had use, not only for his natural gifts, but also for the accomplishments of his education. One of his most effective means of success was, no doubt, his translation of the Bible into the vernacular tongue of the Goths, for which he had to invent a new alphabet, a combination of Greek and Runic letters: it is the oldest existing monument of any Teutonic language. Whether he translated the whole Bible, or only portions, is doubtful: only fragments have come down to us. Seven codices have been discovered,—Codex Argenteus, written on purple vellum in gold and silver letters, dating from the sixth century, discovered in 1507 in the Benedictine abbey of Werden, now preserved in the library of Upsala, and published with diplomatic accuracy by Upström (1854); Codex Carolinus, discovered in the library of Wolfenbüttel in 1756, and published in 1762–63; finally, palimpsest fragments of five codices discovered in the Ambrosian library at Milan by Angelo Mai, and published 1810–38. The best collected editions of these fragments are those by Von der Gabelentz and Loebel, Leip., 1836–46, with Latin version, grammar, and lexicon; E. Bernhardt, Halle, 1875, with full critical notes; and Stamm, Paderborn, 1878 (7th ed. by M. Heyne), the most convenient manual edition. ULRICH, Bishop of Augsburg, the son of Hul-pald, Count of Dillingen, was b. at Augsburg in 880; d. there July 4, 973. Made bishop in 923, he administered his diocese with conspicuous vigor and ability, and proved himself one of the greatest ecclesiastics of his day. Twice during his episcopate the Magyars laid siege to Augsburg. The first time (923) he mingled his prayers with the cries of the babies who were laid prostrate on the earth before the altar; the second time (955) he displayed great courage and firmness, and held out against great odds, till relieved by the army of the king. Ulrich practised a princely liberality, and laid Augsburg under obligation to him by... the construction of chapels, churches, and houses. He was zealous in the observance of the hours of worship, and on many days celebrated three masses. He was strict towards the clergy, and at a synod in Augsburg (832) he insisted upon the practice of celibacy. In his regard for relics he made a journey to St. Mozats to secure some trophies of the Thaelic legion, and to Rome to get the head of St. Abundus. The latter years of his life he spent in a convent, as a Benedictine, and died on a floor sprinkled with ashes. His relics were regarded as possessing a miraculous virtue; and John XV., in 993, pronounced him a saint,—the first example of a special Papal decree demanding reverence for a saint. A work entitled Catalysus testium veritatis, first printed by Flacius in 1550, and protesting against the celibacy of the clergy, is wrongly attributed to Ulrich. ULTRAMONTANE, or ULTRAMONTANISTS (from the mountains," referring to the Alps), is a party-name within the Roman-Catholic Church, applied to those who wish to see all power in the church concentrated in the Pope, in opposition to those who desire a more independent development of the national churches.

UMBREIT, Friedrich Wilhelm Karl, distinguished as the co-editor (from 1828) of the Theolog. Studien und Kritiken ("Theological Studies and Discussions"), and an expositor of the Old Testament; was b. at Sonneborn, near Gotha, April 11, 1795; d. at Heidelberg, April 26, 1860. He studied at Göttingen, where Eichhorn inspired him with enthusiasm for Oriental studies, and became privadozent there in 1818. He accepted a call to Heidelberg as professor in 1820. Here he spent a quiet and happy life in the midst of an affectionate family and a large circle of friends. He profoundly recognized. It was his effort to find out the meaning of the Scriptures, and to secure for the Old Testament its proper place in Christian theology. Without being an Orientalist in the present sense of the term, he had an accurate knowledge of Hebrew, and a fine sense of appreciation for the characteristic traits of Oriental life; and without laying claim to being a keen critic, or a stern dogmatician, he entered into sympathy with the feelings of the men of God in the Old Testament. His first commentary was on Ecclesiastes (Gotha, 1818); it was followed by commentaries on the Song of Solomon (Lied d. Liebe, d. älteste u. schönste aus d. Morgenlande. Neu übersetzt u. ästhetisch erklärt, Göttingen, 1820, 2d ed., Heidelberg, 1838), Job (Heidelberg, 1824, 2d ed., 1832), the Proverbs (Philol.-krit. u. philosop. Comment. über d. Sprüche Salomos, nebst einer neuen Uebersetzung u. einer Einleitung in d. morgenländische Weisheit überhaupt u. in d. hebräisch-salamonische insbesondere, Heidelberg, 1826), the prophethical books, except Jonah and Daniel (Hamb., 1841-46, 4 vols., Isaiah appearing in a second edition in 1846), Romans (Gotha, 1856). Umbreit's commentaries are practical, and display a profound sympathy with the life of the Old Testament. Whatever may be the opinion about their literary merits, there can be no doubt that he opened the eyes and hearts of many to the beauties and religion of the Old Testament, and that his whole personality, adorned as it was "with a rare combination of divine gifts and virtues," was one of the most beneficent influences in the history of the Vermittlungsthéologie; [i.e., the conciliatory, unionistic school of modern German theology]. UNCIAL (from L. uncia, the "fifth part" of any thing) and CURSIVE (i.e., in running, sc., hand) MANUSCRIPTS. The former are written in capital letters (litterae unciales, or majuscola), usually, but not necessarily, of large size; the latter, in small letters (litterae minuscule), or in current hand. The uncial manuscripts are older. New-Testament manuscripts of this character vary in age from the fourth (Sinitic and Vatican) to the tenth century. The Sinitic is the only complete manuscript of the New Testament. The uncial are written upon costly and durable velum or parchment, on quarto or small folio pages of one, two, even, though very rarely, of three or four columns. The older ones have no division of words or sentences, except for paragraphs, no accents or ornamental letters, and but very few pause-marks. These manuscripts are designated by Roman capitals, Greek letters after Cod. Z. and the Hebrew Aleph for the Cod. Sinaiticus. The number of uncial New-Testament manuscripts was probably once large; but they perished during the middle age, and now only eighty-three distinct manuscripts (not including lectionaries) are extant. The cursive manuscripts are indicated by Arabic numerals, number over a thousand, date from the ninth to the middle of the fifteenth century, are written upon cotton paper (which came into use in the ninth or tenth century), or on linen paper (first introduced in the twelfth century). Their comparatively late date decreases their critical value; but "some twenty or thirty of them are very important for their agreement with the oldest authorities, or for some other peculiarity." See for lists of uncials and important cursives, and further information, SchiVExER: A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, Cambridge, 1861, 3d ed., 1883; Schaff: Companion to the Greek Testament, New York, 1888, chap. ii. pp. 82-141; also art. UNIFORMITY, Acts of, denote several parliamentary decrees which warranted the worship and ritual of the Church of England. The first, passed in 1549, set forth the penalties for the neglect to use the First Service-Book, which were, for the first offence, loss of the profits of one benefice for a year, and imprisonment for six months; for the second, loss of all benefices, and imprisonment for one year; for the third, imprisonment for life. The second Act was passed April 6, 1552, and established the revised Book of Common Prayer. The third and principal Act of Uniformity (after a strong opposition, passed April 28, 1638), established the new Prayer-Book under penal penalties. Similar to those of Edward VI., it subjected all who were absent from church, without excuse to a fine of one shilling, and gave to the sovereign liberty to "ordain and publish such further ceremonies and rites as may be most for the advancement of the church," etc. A fourth Act of Uniformity was passed May 19, 1662, and enforced the new revision of the Prayer-Book. It required all ministers to give their unigenitus assent and consent to every thing in the book before Aug. 24, and to swear "that it is not lawful, on any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the king." About two thousand clergy, some of them the most distinguished in England, unable to conform, were deprived of their livings. Neal, referring to the Elizabethan Act, says, "Upon this fatal rock of uniformity in things merely indifferent, in the opinion of the imposers, was the peace of the Church of England split" (History of Puritanism, i. p. 76, Harper's ed.). The Act of Uniformity was set aside by the Act of Toleration under William and Mary, May 21, 1689.

UNIGENITUS is the name of that famous bull which Clement XI. issued (Sept. 8, 1713), at the instance of the Jesuits, in condemnation of the annotated French translation of the New Testament by the Jansenist, Quesnel. Among the propositions condemned by the Pope are also those: "All ought to read the Bible" (80); "The Lord's Day ought to be kept holy by Christians by reading the Scriptures, and it is wicked to keep away any one from such reading" (82). Forty French bishops accepted the bull; but sixteen, supported by the Sorbonne, suspended it in their dioceses; after which, persecutions immediately began. See Jansenism.

UNION OF CHURCHES. The first difference which entered Christendom, and threatened to split the Christian congregation, was that between Jewish and Gentile Christians. It was hardly a difference either of doctrine or constitution, but simply one of social habits: nevertheless, it was important, even dangerous; and widely various views were held with respect to the solution of the problem it presented. Some thought that the Gentile Christians were not Christians in the full sense of the word, that they could never be considered as brethren, that baptism ought to be denied them, etc.: others, among whom was Paul, thought that it was not necessary to circumcise a Gentile in order to make him a Christian, that the Gentile Christians should not be bound by the Jewish law, etc. From the very first, however, there seems to have been a third party, a middle party; and at the synod of Jerusalem (Acts xv.) a reconciliation was easily brought about. Each party yielded something — the Jewish Christians, the obligation of the law; the Gentile Christians, the unlimited freedom of social habits; and thus the Christian congregation became able to present itself before the infidels as one social body, based on one common faith.

Much deeper, and consequently much more difficult to manage, was the difference which separated the Greek and Latin churches; it was not of social habits, but of nationality. In spite of her social and political superiority, the Latin Church lived for a long time in complete doctrinal submission to the Greek Church. But when, with one gigantic effort, Augustine developed the theology of the Latin Church, the internal difference between the two churches at once became manifest. The principal events which gave it practical shape were the Bull of Zeno (164), the decrees of the Concilium guinisextum (692), and the controversy in the ninth century between Nicholas I. and Photius. But it must not be overlooked, that, besides the national difference between East and West, the monarchical tendency of the Church of Rome —developed by Victor I., Stephen I., Leo the Great, Gregory the Great, and gradually established as the informing principle of her whole policy— exercised a powerful influence; and when the Council of Constantinople (867), instead of recognizing the supremacy of the Pope, excommunicated him, the separation was accomplished. From the fact, however, that the various attempts at union which were afterwards made were wrecked, not on the vanity and fickleness of the governing classes, but on the instinctive dislike and distrust of the mass of the peoples, it is evident that the split was not caused simply by a clash between sacerdotal ambitions, but had its roots deep in the nature of the people. A compact of union was subscribed by the Greek and Latin delegates at the Council of Lyons (1274), and accepted both by the emperor and the Pope; but it could not be carried out on account of the fanaticism of the Greek people. A similar compact, comprising the principal doctrinal divergences, and recognizing the supremacy of the Pope, was subscribed at the Council of Florence (1439), but proved to be of as little practical consequence.

A still more decisive difference was established by the Reformation between the Roman-Catholic Church and the Evangelical churches. It was not one of social habits or nationality, but one of principle. By the Protestant principle, the unity of form was given up for the truth of the contents; and evangelical freedom was substituted for the despotism of tradition. It must not be understood, however, that, in the historical process from which the separation resulted, all the advantages were on one side. The Protestant principle was not an invention of the Reformers. It has been present and at work in the Church from the day of her foundation, latent, unrecognized, suppressed. But on the one hand, the Roman-Catholic Church did not die by the separation, but continued to be the harbinger of much true religious life. These views were openly set forth by Hugo Grotius, in his On the Truth of the Christian Religion and other treatises; and in his annotated edition of Cassander's Constilutio (1641) he even went so far as to recommend, under certain conditions, the Papal primacy. They may also be found, at least implicit, at the basis of the theological system of Calixtus (see that article and Syncretism); and they actually prompted Leibnitz to undertake his attempts at uniting the Church of Rome and the Evangelical Church. If any man was fit for such an undertaking, he was. His philosophy gave him a position, religious as well as political, above the particular interests of the parties. He was intimately acquainted with many prominent and influential members of the Roman-Catholic Church, and he had the sympathy of the Protestant theologians of the school of Helmstädt: consequently, when he failed, as he did, it simply proves that the undertaking was as yet impossible. The details of the negotiations which ensued are given in the arts. LEIBNITZ, MOLANUS, and SPINOLA. The instrument of union which resulted from those negotiations, Regule circa Christianorum unionem, was drawn up in 1683, but was not published until 1691, as it was made the basis for the negotiations in Hungary and France. It proposes to begin, not with a doctrinal, but with a political, union, to admit the whole Protestant clergy into the hierarchical system of the Roman-Catholic Church, and then try to work out a doctrinal reconciliation. It was favorably received by the Pope, but did not attract much interest among Roman-Catholics, and was considered with distrust and aversion by the Lutherans.

In 1694 Bossuet suddenly broke off the correspondence which he had been carrying on with Leibnitz since 1691; and at the request of the latter at renewing it, in 1701, called forth from the former only a peremptory dismissal of the case. See HERING: Geschichte der kirchl. Unionsversuche seit der Reformation, Leipzig, 1836-38, 2 vols. FR. NITZSCHE.

More successful were the efforts for a union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches: they led, at least in Prussia and Baden, to some practical results. Great exertions were made to prevent the split between the two Protestant churches in Germany, and Luther's refusal to join hands with Zwingli at Marburg (1529) has always been regretted. The Thirty Years' War, however, called forth considerations so grave as to mitigate even the most irate temper. The colloquy of Leipzig (1631) had a good effect, though it could not prevent the strife from breaking out anew. The influence of Trowse (1645) failed; but the colloquy of Cassel (1661) led to the establishment, at least of a good and peaceful modus vivendi between the two churches. As the electoral house of Brandenburg belonged to the Reformed faith after 1614, it was quite natural that the success of the colloquy of Cassel should induce the elector, Friedrich Wilhelm, to arrange a similar colloquy at Berlin (Sept. 8, 1662-May 29, 1663). The attempt failed utterly; and the temper of the Lutheran members may be inferred from the fact, that they refused to give up the so-called elenchum nominale, that is, the mentioning by name and from the pulpit of such Reformed preachers as seemed to them to be dangerous heretics. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) brought a great number of French Reformed colonists to settle in Brandenburg; but under Friedrich I., King of Prussia (1700-18), the court-preacher Jablonski (which article see) was active in behalf of the union. A number of the so-called Simultankirchen were built; that is, churches in which service was celebrated alternately after the Lutheran and Reformed rite. The period of religious indiffercence which followed during the reign of Friedrich II., and the spreading of rationalism, was, perhaps, not without some good consequences for the cause of the union. At all events, when, in the beginning of the present century, the Prussian Government proposed various measures for the speedy establishment of a United Evangelical Church in Prussia, they met with no considerable opposition. The clergy of Berlin declared in favor of the union at the synod of Oct. 29, 1817; and the new Agenda (which article see) was generally accepted in 1822. After 1830, however, disturbances of a half-religious and half-political character took place, and the embarrassments of the government were considerably aggravated in 1848; but the union was maintained in all the countries where it was introduced. [The relation of Church and State in Prussia was fixed by the laws of 1873 and 1876. See art. Prussia.]

UNION EVANGELICAL CHURCH. See above. UNITARIANISM. The origin of this system of Unitarianism was in the rejection of the Trinity, or the doctrine of three persons — the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit — existing in the Godhead, and constituting one God. As monotheism was the antipode of polytheism, Unitarianism is the antipode of Trinitarianism. But associated with this fundamental doctrine are the denials, in general, of the fall of man in Adam as the federal head of the race, the total depravity of human nature, the vicarious atonement of Christ, and eternal punishment; and the affirmations of the mission of Christ to make a revelation of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; of the dignity of human nature, but its elementary and incomplete condition; of man's natural love to God and love to man; and of the destiny of all mankind to holiness and happiness by the grace of God, and man's moral discipline here and hereafter. The Unitarians regard the atonement as a moral agency designed to draw men to God, and reconcile, or make them at one, with God, as the term signifies, rather than as a legal or governmental expedient, or as a vicarious substitute in a literal sense to cancel human sins. Jesus, speaking of his cross, said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Christ is variously regarded as a being between God and man; or as a man superhumanly endowed, impeccable, and infallible; or as a mere man on the natural plane, but a natural religious genius of great power. The second view is the more common one among modern Unitarians. The Holy Spirit is identified with God himself, as the spirit of man constitutes man. The Holy Spirit indicates the holy influence which the mind of God exerts upon the mind of man. The prevailing views in regard to a future life are that of the inborn immortality of the soul, that of perpetual progress, and that of the hopeful, rather than the assertive, belief of the eventual restoration of all men to holiness and happiness,— conditions which Unitarians believe to be inseparably connected.

The methods of attaining these results, and the working principles of this body of believers, are,

(1) The Protestant canon of the right of private judgment;
(2) Reason, as the moral and religious nature of man, as the final arbiter where creeds clash, or the doctors disagree;
(3) The interpretation of the Scriptures after the spirit rather than the letter. This method of interpreting the Bible as an Oriental book, poetical, paradoxical, and often paradoxical, has justified many in regarding the Bible as an Oriental book, poetical, par bolical, and often paradoxical, has justified many

ing the Bible its an Oriental book, poetical, para

of the Unitarian as well as Protestant conclusions in general, in regard to theological doctrines. Thus the expression, "I and my Father are one," is taken not literally, as teaching identity of nature, and personality with the Father, but that union of will, love, and purpose with the Father, which is also predicated in the oneness of Christ and his apostles. "Labor not for the meat that perisheth," etc., is a Hebraism to exhort to seek spiritual ends in life more earnestly than material interests. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," is not a literal of the actual presence, but of the necessity of nourishing the soul with the teaching of the Lord. The expression, "I and my Father are one," is well understood by the Hebrew scholar as assimilated to the body. The delivery of the keys of the kingdom of heaven to Peter, and his apostles. "He who was manifest," instead of "God who was manifest," is manifest. These emendations remove some of the most decided proof-texts of the Trinity. The new revised translation in the first settlement of the country has been still in active use down to the present day, though those churches are now Unitarian.

The history of Unitarianism is claimed to date back to the time of Christ and his apostles as preachers of pure monotheism. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," is declared by the Master to be the first and great commandment. Early church Fathers and writers, under varying forms of language, held the essential unity of God. The term "trinity" as applied to the Godhead is not found in the Scriptures, nor was it employed by any writer till Tertullian, about A.D. 200. It is argued that the thing did not exist, because the name descriptive of the thing did not come into use till that time. Unitarians, accordingly, regard the term "trinity" as a body.

estants united to destroy the heresy. Among these confessors and martyrs were Ludwig Hetzer, Michael Servetus, and Gentilis in Switzerland; Palaeologus, Segna, Guirlanda, and hundreds of others in Italy; Flekwyk in Holland; George von Parris, Joan Bocher (called "the Maid of Kent"), Bartholomew Legate, Hammont, Lewes, Ket, Wright, Wightman, and many others in England; Thomas Allen and his doctors in Scotland; Catharine Vugier, at the age of eighty, in Poland; and Dolet in France. The Socini and others were banished from Italy: John Biddle died in prison in England, and Francis David in Transylvania.

In Poland the Unitarian faith was spread by refugees from less tolerant lands. In 1562 the Bible was translated, chiefly by Unitarian scholars and divines, into the Polish tongue. Faustus Socinus came hither from Italy. All ranks of society, nobles and commoners, felt the power of the faith, and awakened the bitter jealousy of Rome. In the city of Racow a catechism of the doctrines of the Unitarian Church was printed and widely circulated, and drew so much attention that it was publicly burned in London by order of Parliament. The king of Poland, Sigismund, was so moved by his own sincerity of the faith. Such was its flourishing condition for a century, till 1660, when Cardinal Casimir, a Jesuit, coming to the throne, burned the houses of its disciples and believers, and drove them to exile or death, thus by the same blow killing a church and a nation. The theological works of the Polish Brethren, in eight thick volumes folio, remain as the monument of their zeal and faith. Driven from Poland, many Unitarians took refuge in Transylvania. Faustus Socinus and Georgio Blandrata were prominent leaders. Transylvania tolerated four forms of faith,—the Roman Catholic, the Reformed Evangelical, the Lutheran, and the Unitarian. The bishop Francis David, however, under subsequent persecution, was cast into prison, where he died in 1579,—an event which received in 1879 its tercentenary celebration in England. After the weight of tyranny being partially removed, their ancient prosperity. They have an increasing population of sixty thousand, a hundred and twenty-six churches, a university at Kolozsvár with twelve professors and three hundred students, and two smaller colleges at Thorda and St. Kerezstur. Their present bishop is Joseph Ferencz. Their church government is a combination of Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Congregational. They are planting churches in Hungary, where the writings of Channing have been widely circulated.

The Unitarian faith was known in England before the Reformation; but at that period it received a new impulse and diffusion, so that in 1640 the synods of London and York issued a canon against Socinianism. In 1650 Dr. Owen writes: "The evil is at the door: there is not a city or town, scarce a village, in England, wherein this poison is not poured forth." Milton, Locke, and Newton wrote works in favor of Arian or kindred sentiments. Dr. Isaac Watts, the hymnist, has passages in his writings which are capable of a similar construction. Churches existed among the dissenting bodies of Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists, from an early period, which were in the meantime Unitarian. But one of the first churches nominally so called was established in Essex Street, London, in 1774, by Rev. Theophilus Lindsey. Dr. Joseph Priestley was the pastor of a church in Suffolk, and afterwards in Birmingham, from which place he was driven to America in 1792; his books, manuscripts, and philosophical and chemical apparatus being destroyed by a mob on account of the popular odium attached to his political and religious opinions. In 1813 the Unitarians were admitted by law to the privileges of other dissenting bodies. The Unitarian occupants of dissenters' chapels first had their claims admitted to the possession of these bequests and foundations by the Act of 1844. In England are about three hundred and fifty Unitarian churches, ten in Scotland, twenty in Ireland, and about thirty in Ireland, in the condition of a Christian spiritual philosophy against materialism and agnosticism.

In America, while the church of the Puritans was strictly Calvinistic and Trinitarian at the outset, the keynote of progress had been struck by John Robinson in his famous farewell to the Pilgrims of "The Mayflower," that "there was more light to break out from God's word." Dr. Gay of Hingham, ordained in 1717, was probably the earliest preacher of Unitarianism. Dr. Mayhew, of the West Church, Boston, advocated liberal sentiments. In 1783 Dr. James Freeman, of King's Chapel, Boston, the grandfather of Dr. James Freeman Clarke, removed from the Book of Common Prayer all references to the Deity, and worship of Christ; and his church from that time became distinctively Unitarian. In 1801 the Pilgrim Congregationalists, a Puritan faith in America, declared itself, by a large vote, Unitarian. Organized usually on the basis of covenants instead of creeds, the New England churches, without any violent change in their articles of union, gradually adopted the new faith. Dr. Henry Ware, a Unitarian, was chosen professor of divinity at Cambridge. Zealous controversies were waged between Dr. Woods and Dr. Ware, and Dr. Channing and Dr. Worcester.
UNITARIANS.

Dr. Channing, in 1819, in his Baltimore sermon at the ordination of Jared Sparks, gave the Unitarian Declaration of Independence. From that date he became the foremost leader of this faith, not only in America, but throughout the world.

His works have been translated into the languages of Europe, and are known and read throughout the East and West. Bunsen, in his work entitled God in History, says of Channing, "A great Christian saint and man of God, nay, also, a prophet of the Christian consciousness regarding the future." In April, 1880, the centenary of his birth was celebrated in America and many other countries; and an issue of a hundred thousand copies of a complete edition of his works was circulated in a cheap and popular form in England; and a Channing Memorial Church was dedicated at his birthplace, Newport, R.I. On May 24, 1825, the American Unitarian Association was formed, whose headquarters are in Boston, Mass., whose purpose is declared to be "to diffuse the knowledge, and promote the interests, of pure Christianity." Besides many home missions, Rev. C. H. Dall and associated laborers are employed in a foreign mission at Calcutta in India. On April 5, 1865, the National Unitarian Conference was organized in New York City, for the promotion of "the cause of Christian faith and work." The Western Conference was created in 1852. Thirty-nine state, local, auxiliary, ministerial, benevolent, or Sunday-school associations and conferences express the activity of the missionary, educational, and philanthropic work of the body. There are two theological schools,—one at Cambridge, Mass., and the other at Meadville, Penn. The periodicals are the Unitarian Review, the Christian Register, Unity, the Day-spring, and several local papers. The number of Unitarian churches in America, according to the Year-Book of 1883, is three hundred and sixty. The actual Unitarian faith of the country, so far as the doctrine of the Trinity is concerned, has been computed to number at least three thousand persons; and if we include the Universalists, the Christians (so called), the Hickite Quakers, the Progressive Friends, and some other minor bodies.

UNITARIANS. This title is given to those who believe that God exists in one person, and who deny the Trinity, or that bod exists in three persons, but one God,—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The term appears to have been used first in Poland and in Transylvania, and derived from Unitas Fratrum (Unitled Brethren), the name employed by the Moravians. There is also a political party in Buenos Ayres, South America, devoted to centralization in government, called Unitarians. A. A. Livermore.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. See Moravians for the denomination of evangelical Christians, Arminian in doctrine, founded by Philip William Otterbein in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Mr. Otterbein, a man of thorough learning and liberal culture, came to America, in the year 1752, as a missionary of the German Reformed Church. His first charge was at Lancaster, Penn.; afterward he served congregations at Tulpehocken in the same State, Frederick, Md., York, Penn., and Baltimore City,—the last from 1774 to the time of his death, in 1813. At Lancaster he experienced what he regarded as his first real change of heart, and his ministry henceforward assumed a deeply spiritual character. Impelled by a fervent desire to save men, he began early to hold frequent evangelistic services, a practice which he continued until late in life. He instituted, and special prayer and experience meetings, and encouraged believers to give expression to their faith and spiritual experience. In pursuing his evangelistic labors, he made numerous visits to surrounding places, near and remote, often conducted largely attended open-air meetings, and invited to a hearty co-operation all spiritually minded persons of whatever name or church. He found congenial association with such men as Asbury of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, Boehm of the Mennonite Church, and others of other names. His broader labors resulted in the organization of numerous societies of converts, who, because of their warmer and more earnest spiritual life, frequently found it difficult to remain in harmonious connection with their parent churches. To develop the Unitarian organization of the word, he appointed or approved for them teachers, who visited them at irregular intervals, expounded to them the gospel, and encouraged them to continue faithful in their religious life. As the work extended, it became necessary to devise a regular system of supply; and conferences of ministers, chiefly for this purpose, began to be held. Finally, in the year 1800, at one of these conferences, these scattered societies were organized into one body; and the name "United Brethren in Christ" was adopted as the official title of the denomination thus formed. Mr. Otterbein and Mr. Boehm were chosen bishops. The people thus organized spoke at that time almost exclusively the German language; at the present time that language is used by less than four per cent of the confessions of United Brethren.

The government of the church is vested primarily in a General Conference, holding quadrennial sessions. The delegates are ministers only, but are chosen by the church at large. There are also annual conferences, whose powers are chiefly executive, and of which laymen may be members; each pastoral charge being entitled to one lay-representative. The bishops are elected by the General Conference quadrennially, as are... also the editors, publishing-house manager and the several general boards with their executive officers. The churches are supplied with pastors on the itinerant plan, the ministers being appointed to their charges by a stationing committee. Presiding elders, elected by their respective conferences, have general supervision over districts, or divisions of the annual conferences. The denomination has 10 colleges, 5 seminaries and academies, and 1 theological seminary, 99 instructors, and 1,775 students, 43 of the students being in the theological seminary. The church owns, and through the General Conference controls, a publishing-house, located at Dayton, O., whose net capital on April 1, 1883, was $182,592.80. The house publishes 9 weekly, monthly, semi-monthly, and quarterly periodicals, with an aggregate average circulation of 232,224 copies for the year ending as above. The house is free of debt, and has a surplus fund in its treasury. A thoroughly organized missionary society for home, frontier, and foreign work, has been in existence since 1853. Its foreign missions are in West Africa and Germany. The money raised and expended by this society in the period of its existence amount to about $2,000,000. A woman’s missionary society, organized in 1877, also has missions in Africa and Germany. The operations of both these societies, especially in West Africa, have resulted in most marked success. A general Sunday-school board was organized by the General Conference in 1865, and a church-erection society and a general educational board in 1867.

The general statistics of the church for 1882 show a membership of 159,542; itinerant ministers, 1,237; local ministers, 963; scholars in Sunday schools, 165,743; teachers and officers in Sunday schools, 25,690. On questions of reform, such as temperance and slavery, the historical attitude of the church is that of strong radicalism; its position on the latter question prevented it from before the war, any considerable extension in the Southern States. The church also forbids its communicants from holding membership in secret societies. The territorial range of the denomination is chiefly from Pennsylvania, Maryland, Northern Virginia, and Western New York, in nearly parallel lines westward, and extending to the Pacific coast.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Religious History. I. Historical Review. — In the discovery, settlement by the English, and development of the country, scientific curiosity, bold enterprise, ambition, self-interest, as well as religious motives, have conspired. Columbus was a religious enthusiast, and intended his discoveries should spread the Christian religion among heathen peoples, in which plan he had the hearty co-operation of Queen Isabella of Sprin. Indeed, he designed the dedication of a portion of his expected gains to the fitting-out of a crusade to the Holy Land; so that the solution of the Occidental question should lead to the solution of the Oriental question in its greatest extent, and the ends of the earth should be brought under the banner of the cross. Still more decidedly did the religious factor enter into the beginnings of the North-American settlements, but this time in the interest of English Protestantism, and not of Romanism. The great discoveries of the fifteenth century plainly stand in providential connection with the Reformation of the sixteenth; since they opened a new and boundless field for the further development of the religious, social, and political principles of Protestantism. It is important also to notice, that the northern half of the New World was first discovered, under the auspices of England, by the two Cabots. This was in 1497, or a year before Columbus set the purest land and soul of South America. In this way that half was from the beginning brought into closest connection with the nation which a century later was to be the greatest naval power and chief bulwark of Protestantism.

The religious history of North America begins in 1607, with the settlement of Virginia, or more exactly with the landing of the Pilgrims in Massachusetts Bay (1620). From then on, America was, on an immensely larger scale, what Geneva was under Calvin,—a refuge for persecuted Protestants of all lands. Puritans, Presbyterians, Quakers, Baptists, Huguenots, Salzburg Lutherans, Moravians, Lutherans and Reformed refugees from the Palatinate, Mennonites, etc., emigrated thither in order to find there a quiet place to practise their religion, and showed in their new home, predominantly that religious earnestness, and at the same time tolerance, which sprang, not from indifference, but from bitter experience of unrighteous persecution. English Roman Catholics, also, who then were subjected to severe penalties in England, found in Maryland an asylum. These were joined by the Dutch Reformed in New York, and the English Episcopalians in Virginia, also, who then were subjected to severe penalties in England, found in Maryland an asylum. These were joined by the Dutch Reformed in New York, and the English Episcopalians in Virginia, also, who then were subjected to severe penalties in England, found in Maryland an asylum.
the year 1820 the number of emigrants from the United States has ever since, but particularly during the last fifty years, advanced in a way unparalleled in history. The number of inhabitants has grown since 1800, when it was 5,000,000, until, according to the official census of 1850, it was 31,686,006, distributed as follows: Whites, 28,424,426; blacks, 3,772,151; natives, 43,475,506; foreign-born, 6,677,300; males, 25,520,582; and females, 24,632,254. The number of States in the same period has increased (mostly through the purchase of Louisiana in 1803, Florida in 1820, California and New Mexico in 1848, and the organization of the North-western Territories) from thirteen to thirty-eight; and besides these there are nine Territories and the District of Columbia (the seat of the national government).

Of course, emigration, which is favored by the most liberal naturalization laws, is the explanation of this enormous growth. This began to be larger after the close of the Napoleonic wars, and now pours a steady stream into the country. In the year 1820 the number of emigrants from Europe, especially from Ireland and Germany, was 5,993; in 1830, 23,074; in 1840, 83,584; in 1850, 279,980; in 1853, 368,643; in 1854, 460,474; in 1855, 740,000, of which sixty per cent were Germans and Scandinavians. And yet the available land is by no means all taken up. From the Alleghanies to the Pacific Ocean, there are unnumbered acres ready for the settler's hand. Emigration keeps pace with immigration; and the dwellers in the older States are continuously reduced to order, how thoroughly the new dwellers in the newer, especially to Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota, Colorado, California, and Oregon.

Hand in hand with the increase in the number of States and inhabitants go industry, wealth, and general culture. The United States has not had to struggle, through two thousand years, out of barbarism to civilization, as the countries of the Old World have done. It fell heir to their progress, but with it have come the Old World's evils. And the New World has also its troubles, arising from haste after wealth, from reckless speculation, and those misunderstandings between capital and labor which issue sometimes in blood. It is almost incredible how quickly the chaotic confusion of so many different peoples thrown together under one general government is reduced to order, how thoroughly the new Americans are assimilated in the body politic. Thus it has come about that the type of American civilization is Anglo-Saxon, and the speech English,—the predestined world-tongue.

Only two races have resisted this assimilating process,—the Indians, who are driven gradually into smaller territory, and who are slowly civilized; and the Chinese, who do not come to stay, and whose coming national legislation is intended to check. The two will, in the providence of God, be brought under the influence of Christianity. As for the negroes, so long held down under slavery, they are already Christianized, and have attained to a measure of civilization. Those of them who emigrate to the West-African republic of Liberia, founded for them particularly by American friends of that race, will carry thither the blessings they have obtained in the United States, and thus lighten the "dark continent."

The enormous increase of population adds, of course, proportionally to the field of labor and to the membership of the different churches. America is the land of church-erection, congregation-forming, and of every conceivable ecclesiastical and religious experiment, in which there are not missing the elements of fanaticism, hypocrisy, and humbug. It is the seed-plot of almost all branches of the Christian Church, and there is no check put upon their fullest development.

The religious life in the United States is in general like that of other lands; but it presents some peculiar features, of which the chief are,—

II. The Separation of Church and State and the Universal Freedom of Belief and Worship

The Constitution, adopted under Washington in 1787, provides, "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States" (Art. vi. § 3). And even more emphatically speaks the First Amendment, made by the first Congress, 1789: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the rights of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." Cf. Gale's edition of Debates and Proceedings in the Congress of the United States, vol. i. pp. 729 sqq.

In this way there was secured, on the one hand, the separation of the Church from the government, and, on the other, the free, unhindered exercise of religion in every way which does not endanger the State or public morals. The above-quoted articles are not only a declaration of independent, free, and public morals; it is also a declaration of the independence of the Church from the civil power. They originated in no indifference respecting religion, on the contrary, in so great respect, that their framers would separate religion permanently from the defiling influence of politics, and guarantee to the whole people in a solemn manner religious along with civil liberty. The two institutions Church and State were not set opposite to each other as foes, but side by side, as the two different spheres of the social life, in the conviction that each had best restrict its jurisdiction to its own immediate concerns, because the attempt of one to rule the other was sure to issue disastrously. The power of the State is consequently, in the United States, reduced to narrower limits than in Europe, where it controls the Church also. The American status of the Church differs from the hierarchical patronage of the State by the Church, from the imperial and papal patronage of the Church by the State, and also from the pre-Constantinian separation and persecution of the Church by the heathen State: hence the United States presents a new phase in the history of the relation of the two.

This separation between Church and State is not to be understood as a separation of the nation from Christianity; for the State represents, in America, only the temporal interests of the people. The independent churches care for the religious and moral interests; and the people are religious and Christian as no other, and express their sentiments in different ways,—by the voluntary support of their very numerous churches and sects; by benevolent organizations of every kind; by attendance upon church, and respect for the ministry (who are second to none in dignity and influence); by a strict observance of Sunday, which is not equally elsewhere, except in Scotland; by constant zeal for home and foreign missions; by reverence for the Bible; by a steady stream of edifying books, tracts, and periodicals; and by voluntary support of their very numerous churches and sects; by benevolent organizations of every kind; by attendance upon church, and respect for the ministry (who are second to none in dignity and influence); by a strict observance of Sunday, which is not equally elsewhere, except in Scotland; by constant zeal for home and foreign missions; by reverence for the Bible; by a steady stream of edifying books, tracts, and periodicals; and by voluntary support of their very numerous churches and sects;

In the other New-England Colonies, except Pennsylvania, which William Penn acquired in 1681, from the English crown in payment of a debt, and which he made an asylum for his persecuted Quaker co-religionists and all other Christian brethren. Each of these three representatives of Christian toleration adopted it, not in consequence of vague philosophical theories, still less of religious indifference, but because of bitter experience of intolerance, and practical necessity. And this toleration was limited to the different confessions of the Christian faith, and did not apply to infidels or blasphemers, who were excluded from civil rights. In the other and older Colonies, Church and State were from the beginning closely connected. In Massachusetts and the other New-England Colonies, except Rhode Island, the Congregational form of Puritanism was the State religion; and the civil rights, in imitation of the Jewish theocratic State principles, were dependent upon a certain religious adherence. The Roman Church not only was excluded, but also, until the close of the seventeenth century, all Protestants who could not accept the Established creed were dealt with as strictly as the Pilgrim Fathers had themselves been by the bishops of Old England. Massachusetts banished the Baptist Roger Williams and other Baptists, and the followers of the Antinomian Anne Hutchinson; the Quakers were tried, and condemned to public scourging, ear-slitting, nose-boring, and even (by a vote of twelve to eleven in the Boston Legislature) to the gallows. It should be remarked, however, that the Quakers in New England between 1658 and 1660 had acted fanatically. They had publicly denounced, in the churches, the princes of civil and spiritual authorities. They thus provoked persecution and martyrdom by their impetuous zeal. Four such fanatics (one a woman), who had been already banished as Antinomians, obstinately rushed into martyrdom, and were hanged in 1661. But the people were opposed even then to such treatment; and the authorities were obliged to defend their action in a published statement, in which they uniformly cited the passages of the Old Testament:

only very gradually, did the New-England States, where Puritanism was deeply rooted in the mass of the people, adopt the new order of things. Now the principle of entire separation is universally operative. Only among the Mormons in Utah are Church and State combined. But the Mormons are powerless to prevent other sects coming among them; and, indeed, in Salt Lake City there are already four or five.

III. THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM OF CHURCH SUPPORT IS THE NATURAL CONSEQUENCE OF SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.—There is in the United States no obligatory baptism or confirmation. There are, on the contrary, thousands of grown persons who have not been baptized; but there are comparatively few who hold themselves aloof from all church attendance and from all contributions for religious purposes. And the churches independent of State control are more particular as to the conduct and beliefs of their members than State churches are; so that the churches of America are more orthodox, and more faithful to their avowed principles, than the mother-churches in Europe.

The different churches are, almost without exception, dependent entirely upon voluntary subscriptions and contributions. The most prominent exceptions are Trinity Church (Episcopal) and the Collegiate Church (Reformed Dutch), both in New-York City, which have inherited property from the colonial period. But, speaking generally, the churches look to their membership for the means to carry on their work, and support their ministers. The theological seminaries are the foundations of churches or individuals. The minister's salary is paid by the pew-rents or collections. Voluntary payments support the Bible, the track, and other societies, and send out colportors and missionaries in city and country. It is considered a general duty and privilege to support religion as a necessary and useful element of society. The average salary of ministers in the United States is about seven hundred dollars; of theological professors, a thousand dollars. A few ministers in some cities receive from five to fifteen thousand dollars.

The voluntary system has its drawbacks, especially in the new congregations formed of emigrants who are accustomed to the European system of State support. But, on the other hand, it promotes liberality and individual enterprise; and the result is a yearly increase in churches, ministers, and ecclesiastical organizations of all sorts, while the old are maintained with vigor. On the average, it is said, each minister serves a thousand souls; but of course there is great disproportion. The Irish and the Germans are most destitute of ministers, because emigration swells their numbers out of proportion to the supply. This free, self-regulated and self-supported Chris- tianity and church existence is one of the most characteristic features, and one of the greatest glories, of the United States, and constitutes a new leaf in church history; but it has its antecedents in the first three centuries and in the history of dissenters and free churches in Europe.

IV. THE LEADING DENOMINATIONS.—It is impossible here to go into the details of the various denominational histories: for these, reference must be made to the several articles of this enversalists, who teach as one of the three articles of their creed the ultimate restoration of all men to holiness and happiness; and the Swedenborgians, who believe in the divine mission of the great seer of Sweden, and accept his revelations of the spirit-world.

IV. THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION. — This differs with the different denominations, but on the whole has greatly and rapidly improved of late. It is carried on in theological seminaries, endowed by the universalists, who teach as one of the three articles of their creed the ultimate restoration of all men to holiness and happiness; and the Swedenborgians, who believe in the divine mission of the great seer of Sweden, and accept his revelations of the spirit-world.

New Theological Seminaries. — These are the Union Seminaries of the Presbyterian Church, and the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, Madison (N.J.), Rochester, Philadelphia (two, one Episcopal, one Lutheran), Gettysburg, Lancaster, Allegheny, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago (which has four, representing as many denominations), and San Francisco (which has two). The faculties number from two to seven regular professors; some have as many as a hundred students and over. The libraries comprise from a few hundred to fifty thousand volumes. The course of instruction lasts three years. Greater stress is laid upon practical gifts and moral and religious character than in the ministerial training-schools of State churches. Each lecture is preceded by a short prayer, and every day is closed by divine service, which all the students attend. The theological literature of the United States is growing very fast, both by translations of foreign works (especially German), and original productions.

VI. STATISTICS. — Since the official ecclesiastical statistics of the last census (1860) have not yet (December, 1883) appeared, no attempt at a complete statement is here made; but the following carefully compiled table is interesting as showing the denominational growth in the first century of the United States' independence:

LIIT. — A general church history of the United States, made from the sources, is a desideratum. So far, we have only sectional contributions or brief sketches.

1. General Works. — ROBERT BARR: Religion in America, Glasgow, 1842, New York, 1856 (which describes the recent condition, but gives no regular history); RUPP-WEBBEN: History of all the Religious Denominations in the United States, Harrisburg, Penn., 1844, 2d ed., 1848 (a diligent but dry and uncritical collection of historical and statistical materials); W. SPRAGUE: The Annals of the American Pulpit, or Comparative Notices of Distinguished American Clergymen of Various Denominations, with Historical Introductions, New York, 1857 sqq. (9 vols., and one yet unprinted; valuable for the history of American pulpit eloquence and for biography, but almost uniformly eulogistic, as the notices come from friends or admirers of the subjects); PHILIP SCHAF: America, New York, 1856 (the second part contains sketches of the lesser denominations); by the same: Christianity in the United States of America (report, to the Basel Conference, of the Evangelical Alliance, 1859, published in German, Basel, and in English in The Religious Condition of Christendom, London, 1880, pp. 70–117.

2. Particular Denominational Histories. — The monographs of Hodge and Gillett on the Presbyterian Church; Bangs and Stevens on the Methodist; Hall, Pincush, Babou, and Dexter, on the Congregational; Backus and Benedict on the Baptist; Wilberforce, Hawks, and Perry, on the Episcopal; Hazelius, Schmucker, and Mann, on the Lutheran; Corwin on the Reformed Dutch; Meyer, Harbaugh, and Heiser, on the German Reformed; Gunnison, Olshausen, R. J. Burton, and Stenhouse, on the Mormons. See literature under the different arts.

UNIVERSALISM is the form of faith which they hold who declare that all souls will finally be saved, that evil is temporary, that good is permanent, and will achieve a complete and perfect triumph in the divine economy.

1. Universalism begins in a peculiar conception of God. Agreeing with Christians generally in the attributes ascribed to him, it holds that love is not merely an attribute, but the very nature of the Deity, and that all his attributes and activities spring out of and are controlled by it. Thus the sovereignty of God is infinite and eternal: it is exerted everywhere and always, to secure, not a formal and arbitrary obedience, but one that is voluntary and filial, and it will work until the harmony of the moral universe is secured.

2. Christ belongs to the category of the supernatural; although his manifestation in time, and his work, are in perfect accord with nature and reason. Universalism holds, as to the nature of Christ, that it is identical with God's; as to his relationship, that it is that of a Son; as to his office, that it is mediatorial, i.e., that he is the connecting link between humanity and God, that he is the way by which humanity is brought into the presence and fellowship of God. His existence, as declared in the proem of John's Gospel, has been from the beginning. From the beginning also, as taught not only in the proem aforesaid, but in the Epistles, — notably in Heb. i. 2, also 1 Cor. viii. 6, — he is the instrument through whom God works. Having the same nature as God, and being actuated by the same spirit, he is literally God manifest in the flesh. "The brightening of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person." But not only is he the Son of God in the highest and most complete sense, he is the Son of man in a sense equally complete. He is the expression, the type, of perfected humanity. He entered fully into the human condition. He had not alone the form of manhood, but the attributes and motives. He was in all respects like one of ourselves, except in matter of sin. His freedom from sin, however, was due, not to any abridgment of his humanity, but to the perfect use of that moral choice which is the distinguishing characteristic of humanity. He is here, then, as the revealer of God and the healer of men, as the Teacher and Saviour, or, finally, as the living, immortal Word.

3. Concerning man, Universalism holds that he is made in the image of God, that he is the child of God. He has a moral sense. He instinctively distinguishes between right and wrong, between virtue and vice. The feeling of obligation is native to his mind. He knows that he is responsible for his conduct: at the same time he is free; he may choose whatever course he will. Here is the origin and essence of sin, — that a man knowing the difference between right and wrong, knowing the responsibility under which he acts, deliberately chooses the wrong, that he puts himself voluntarily in an attitude of disobedience to the moral law. There is no other definition to be given of it than the scriptural one, "Sin is the transgression of the law." It is conditioned, first upon the fact of man's freedom, and secondly upon the fact that he is under law. The moral law will be impenetrable. This is true of every man; and every man, whatever may be his theory of God, or providence, or of his own essential being, knows that it is true. But law without a sanction is no law. Penalty, therefore, is an indispensable instrument in that moral mechanism by which men are brought from every dereliction to the recognition and performance of duty. But penalty is not arbitrary, neither is it vindictive. It is not designed to soothe the offended majesty of Heaven. It is remedial. It reminds the offender that he is God's child, and that he has broken God's law. He is not on trial in this life, to be hauled over, if the verdict shall be against him in the end, to a punishment that is remediless and hopeless; but he is under discipline, and in a disciplinary state freedom remains. No condition can ever arise, so long as man has sinned, which will permanently interrupt the spontaneous activity of the will. Penalty will be repeated with every violation of law. "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished." So long as man sins, his chastisement will endure; but no form of punishment can destroy freedom. He may choose to sin as long as he is willing to take sin and penalty together; but, whenever he is moved to do right, the door of opportunity is open. This is the fundamental condition of moral activity; for, if it be impossible for a soul to turn from evil to good, no matter how this impossibility arises, — whether it be by the application of an arbitrary and extraneous force, or by the self-determining power of habit, — the moral attributes of that soul are extinguished. It no longer has control of its own actions, and therefore is not free. Man's freedom cannot interrupt the relation which exists between the human creature and the divine Creator. Whatever he does, whatever he suffers, man is still God's child. Nothing can permanently efface from the soul the image of the Father. The moral government of God, therefore, is not a temporal affair merely; it reaches forward into eternity. It was instituted for man's sake, that he might receive his moral development under it, and that, when he had sinned, he might be reconciled to God.

4. These views foreshadow the Universalist doctrine of destiny. Universalism holds that the sovereignty of God will be completely vindicated in the ultimate harmony of the moral universe. No power on earth or in heaven can defeat the purpose of God to bring all things into subjection to himself. The process by which this result is to be secured is neither violent nor mechanical, but it springs out of those natural relations which God has established between the different parts of his economy. It involves, to be sure, the happiness of souls; but happiness is reached only through voluntary obedience. Righteousness, in reality, is the end: happiness is only an incident.

That which God demands of every soul is rectitude, moral purity, spiritual submission. This is the end towards which he works, and there will be no pauses until the end is reached. Man's freedom cannot defeat the benevolent intentions of the Deity, for that would be a poor sort of freedom which practically dooms men to endless sin. Neither can the power of evil habit become so strong, that it will undermine the will, and more to make effectual choice of the right: for that would be to contradict every theory on which the recovery of souls is sought in this world; the uniform assumption being, that no case is so desperate as to be beyond the saving efficacy of infinite grace. Such a conclusion savors both of fatalism and atheism. It is fatalistic in so far as it fixes, beyond all hope of amendment, the condition of any soul. It is atheistic, in so far as it puts the final destiny of man entirely in his own keeping. Equally futile, according to Universalism, is the claim that death determines the moral condition of humanity. It is absurd to suppose that death will change either the nature of man, or the disposition and purpose of God. Death, to be sure, may be, and doubtless is, a very important factor in the discipline and development of the soul. It can scarcely fail to change inconceivably the whole environment of the soul. The conditions and circumstances which are earthly and sensual will disappear. Conditions and circumstances which are alone adapted to the new state in which the soul finds itself will come into being. New relations will undoubtedly appear, or the old relations will be revealed in an entirely new light. It may also be, that a complete set of motives, unknown to time and sense, will have active operation. The methods for teaching and moral influence may also be unspokenably enhanced. But the nature of man as a moral agent, and the nature of God as a moral governor, must remain the same after death as before; and there is no Scripture, with its rightfulness, which warrants a different doctrine. So long as man is man, he may forsake evil, and embrace righteousness. So long as God is God, he will certainly restore the penitent, and welcome the returning prodigal. Looking at the object which has been steadily pursued in the giving of the law and the promulgation of the gospel, the Universalist feels that the poet manifests a profoundly philosophic insight when he sings,—

"I can but trust that good shall fall At last,—far off—at last, to all, And every winter change to spring."

He sees the whole creation, in one vast, resistless movement, sweeping towards the grand finality of universal holiness and universal love.

History.—The Universalist denomination traces its origin directly to James Kelly, a London preacher in the middle and latter part of the eighteenth century, who wrote a book called The Union, and who had for his disciple John Murray. The latter came to this country in September, 1770, and immediately began preaching at various places along the Atlantic seaboard, from New Jersey to Massachusetts, establishing himself at Gloucester four years later. Through the efforts of Mr. Murray, and a few who entertained similar views, churches were established at important points in the New-England and Middle States. But the doctrine spread somewhat slowly. In the year 1800, there were scarcely more than twenty Universalist ministers in the country. At that time the Rev. Hosea Ballon, who is justly called the father of Universalism in its present form, was approaching the maturity of his powers. He already entertained views which differed widely from those of Mr. Murray and his fellow-laborers. He had ceased to base his convictions of the universal holiness on Calvinistic principles. He had wrought out a system of theology which was clear, consistent, rational, and biblical throughout; and he was proclaiming it with a vigor and an earnestness which have not been surpassed by any American preacher of the nineteenth century. Universalism, with the rise of Hosea Ballon (although it has undergone many modifications, and made important developments, since his time), entered upon a new epoch; and its growth was rapid, not only in numerical strength, but in organic life and power. The General Convention, at its session in Winchester, N.H., in 1808, adopted the following Profession of Belief:—

"Art. I. We believe that the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation of the character of God, and of the duty, interest, and final destination of mankind."

"Art. II. We believe that there is one God, whose nature is love, revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of grace; to finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness."

"Art. III. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected, and that believers ought to be careful to maintain order, and practise good works, for these things are good, and profitable unto men."

This brief creed has been regarded as embracing the essential features of Universalism, in a phraseology sufficiently elastic to cover the most divergent views; and it has been made the test of fellowship in churches and conventions. A large and respectable minority of Universalists to-day are not satisfied with the language of some of these articles; and a special committee of the General Convention is at present (1883) engaged in considering whether a modification of them may not be desirable and practicable.

The polity of the Universalist Church is republican in form, embracing both the clerical and lay elements. In each State of the Union, there is a convention made up of the ministers in fellowship residing within the State, and of lay-representatives from each parish. Each State Convention has jurisdiction within its own borders in matters of fellowship, and has charge of local missions. Over all is the General Convention of Universalists, which meets annually, and is composed of delegates, clerical and lay, in definite proportions, chosen by the State conventions. This body has a national charter and a permanent board of trustees, who hold sessions during the interim of the conventions, have charge of the funds, direct the general missionary operations of the church, and dispense scholarships to theological students. The permanent funds now belonging to the General Convention amount to $150,000. The resources are still further enhanced by annual contributions in all the churches. Many State conventions also have funds of considerable amounts.

The latest statistics (1883) of the denomination give 23 State conventions, 939 parishes, 36,558 families, 99,288 communicants, 653 Sunday schools with 51,783 members, 780 church buildings, a total valuation of parish property, above indebtedness, of $6,443,010, 713 clergymen, and 10 licensed lay-preachers. During the last forty years the denomination has made great progress in educational matters. There are now in New England and in the State of New York five academies, the most of which are well equipped and endowed. In the whole country, there are four colleges and three theological schools. Over one thousand pupils, during the year 1882, were enrolled in these different institutions. Together they represent a permanent investment of at least two and a quarter millions of dollars. Organized Universalism is confined chiefly to this continent; but the doctrine is widely diffused, not only in England and Scotland, but in Germany, Switzerland, and Sweden. Many of the leading scholars of Germany in recent times have strongly advocated it. Conspicuous teachers, both within and without the English Establishment, have championed it ardently. It has had some of its ablest defenders among the Scotch clergy. A mission-church of the denomination has been established in Glasgow by the Women’s Centenary Association of America, and for some years it has had regular pastoral care. There are organizations and churches at other points in Scotland.

UNIVERSITIES. 1. Greek.—The universities is a literary corporation, either of teachers or scholars. The first university was founded in Athens, under Hadrian, in which rhetoric, philosophy, and political eloquence were taught. That in Constantinople was founded in 425, with twenty-eight teachers of the Greek and Roman languages and literatures, one of philosophy, and two of law. Law schools existed in imperial times in Rome and Berytus.

2. Medieval.—Universities were founded in the twelfth century. The instructors were mainly pagygenous: hence they were called "divinity." Celibacy was generally demanded of the teachers. Paris, where the theological faculty dates from 1218, took the lead in theology and philosophy; Bologna, whose law-faculty dates from 1158, in canonical and civil law. The bulls of Innocent III. (of 1209 and 1213) first gave the Paris university independent corporate existence. A university comprised four "nations,"—French, Norman, Picard, and English,—according to the nationality of the scholars in democratic Bologna, according to that of the teachers in aristocratic Paris. Gradually the four faculties of theology, medicine, canonical law, and arts, acquired individual corporate rights, the theological latest (about 1300). The first three dominated the fourth, because it was considered preparatory to one of the three. Each nation and faculty formed a little corporation, with seal, banner, funds, and disciplinary institutions. The more general interests were decided by a general council. Every four years a university rector was chosen, every month a "national" procurator. The popes and kings gave the universities great privileges,—independent jurisdiction over the students, immunities, inviolability of their property, etc. One of the most important was the right to confer degrees.—Backward (in theory, at least) were the universities in Germany, Switzerland, and Sweden. Many of the leading scholars of the French and English universities exercised themselves to their respective masters; but the discipline was lax, and disturbances frequent. (For the famous Sorbonne, which excelled all other theological schools, and was almost identical with the Paris theological faculty, see art.)

The dates of the medieval German universities are, Prague, 1348; Vienna, 1365; Heidelberg, 1386; Cologne, 1388; Erfurt, 1389; Leipzig, 1409; Rostock, 1419; Greifswald, 1456; Freiburg to his Basel, 1460; Ingolstadt, 1472; Mayence and Tübingen, 1477; Wittenberg, 1502; Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, 1506. The instruction was broad rather than deep; novelties were shunned; tradition ruled: Paris gave laws to all the others. The humanities were not encouraged; so that, although in Paris there was, after 1514, a professor of Greek, he complained that least impulse to his department was given by the university. The universities conspicuously showed their hide-bound character. Prague opposed Wielisz and Hus; Paris thundered against Luther (1521) and against R. Stephen's edition of the Bible (1545), and drove him from the city.

[The great English universities are Oxford and Cambridge, founded in the thirteenth century; the Scotch universities—Edinburgh, founded 1582; Glasgow, 1450; St. Andrews, 1411; Aberdeen, 1494.]

3. The Protestant Universities since the Reformation.—Only in theology have these universities substantially altered, and down to the end of the seventeenth century the ecclesiastical interests were dominant. Promotions in all faculties were, until the reign of George II, held in the hands of the secular authorities. The head of the university is still called the "rector," invested with princely honors and the "sceptre" of judicial authority: by his side is the chancellor. The faculty of arts still takes the lowest position. The governing body is called the "senate." Holders of the most coveted degree of doctor of theology in the seventeenth century styled "your Excellency," and until the eighteen century the degree was never honorary, but always after "a most rigorous examination." It once cost two hundred thalers.

The distinction between ordinary and extraordinary professors dates from the rise of the Protestant universities. The pay of the teachers originally came from the Pope and bishops, but, in Protestant countries, from the confiscated convent property. The professors, in particular of medicine, only three hundred thalers. The salaries were, however, eked out by the patronage of princes in return for dedications of books. The professors, in particular of medicine, earned their living by revising and improving reports. The exclusive language of these exercises was Latin, until Thomasius, at Berlin University was founded (1810). The most radical departure from old methods and modes of life was made in this century when Berlin University was founded (1810).

4. The Theological Animus and Influence of the Different Lutheran Universities. — The Lutheran Church counts the following universities: Wit tenberg, Erfurt (since 1529), Rostock (since 1531), Tübingen (since 1535), Leipzig (since 1539), Greifswald (since 1542), Königsberg (1544), Jena (1558), Helmstedt (1564), Altdorf (1578), Daniel Rinteln (1621), Strassburg (1621), Kiel (1665), Halle (1694), Göttingen (1737), Erlangen (1743), Berlin (1810), Bonn (1817). The German Reformed Church counts the following: Heidelberg, (since 1555), Frankfort (1551), Marburg (1507), Duisberg (1656). The Prussian universities, however, are no longer exclusively Lutheran, but evangelical or united, since the introduction of the union of the two confessions in 1817. In the sixteenth century humanism, in connection with the practical and biblical character of the Reformation, effected great changes, not only in the subjects taught, but in their presentation. The so-called philosophical course in an improved form, either by reading Aristotle in Greek or in the better Latin translation of Argyropolus and others, and by the use of the excellent Melanchothonian text-book, laid the foundation of theological study. And, in this course, arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy, history, geography, and poetry were introduced. The study of Greek received a new impetus from Melanchothon's grammar; that of Hebrew, from Münster's. The usual time given to these studies was from three to five years. For the first century of Lutheran theology the Scriptures in the original languages were grammatically and practically expounded. The chief of the universities, in numbers and authority, was Wittenberg. The majority of German churches waited for it to speak the final word. The great theological question of this period related to the Form of Concord (1577). — Wittenberg had in this period as many as three thousand students at once, most of them in theology.

In the first half of the seventeenth century, after the christological controversy between Tübingen and Giessen was ended, no other theological question arose. The Concord theology became triumphant. At the end of the second half of the century, in theology, Wittenberg still maintained its position at the head of the orthodox Protestants. The pay of the teachers was often inadequately supported. Thus at Rostock the professor of theology formerly received eighty guldens, and the professor of medicine, only thirty. The salaries were, however, eked out by the patronage of princes in return for dedications of books. The professors, in particular of medicine, earned their living by revising and improving reports. The exclusive language of these exercises was Latin, until Thomasius, at Leipzig, set the example, quickly followed, however, of using German. Yet Leipzig was among the last to abandon the old custom. After the Reformation the professors married, and the students began to take rooms in the city generally. The most radical departure from old methods and modes of life was made in this century when Berlin University was founded (1810).

4. The Theological Animus and Influence of the Different Lutheran Universities. — The Lutheran Church counts the following universities: Wittenberg, Erfurt (since 1529), Rostock (since 1531), Tübingen (since 1535), Leipzig (since 1539), Greifswald (since 1542), Königsberg (1544), Jena (1558), Helmstedt (1564), Altdorf (1578), Daniel Rinteln (1621), Strassburg (1621), Kiel (1665), Halle (1694), Göttingen (1737), Erlangen (1743), Berlin (1810), Bonn (1817). The German Reformed Church counts the following: Heidelberg, (since 1555), Frankfort (1551), Marburg (1507), Duisberg (1656). The Prussian universities, however, are no longer exclusively Lutheran, but evangelical or united, since the introduction of the union of the two confessions in 1817. In the sixteenth century humanism, in connection with the practical and biblical character of the Reformation, effected great changes, not only in the subjects taught, but in their presentation. The so-called philosophical course in an improved form, either by reading Aristotle in Greek or in the better Latin translation of Argyropolus and others, and by the use of the excellent Melanchothonian text-book, laid the foundation of theological study. And, in this course, arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy, history, geography, and poetry were introduced. The study of Greek received a new impetus from Melanchothon's grammar; that of Hebrew, from Münster's. The usual time given to these studies was from three to five years. For the first century of Lutheran theology the Scriptures in the original languages were grammatically and practically expounded. The chief of the universities, in numbers and authority, was Wittenberg. The majority of German churches waited for it to speak the final word. The great theological question of this period related to the Form of Concord (1577). — Wittenberg had in this period as many as three thousand students at once, most of them in theology.

In the first half of the seventeenth century, after the christological controversy between Tübingen and Giessen was ended, no other theological question arose. The Concord theology became triumphant. At the end of the second half of the century, in theology, Wittenberg still maintained its position at the head of the orthodox Protestants. The pay of the teachers was often inadequately supported. Thus at Rostock the professor of theology formerly received eighty guldens, and the professor of medicine, only thirty. pass through pietism to rationalism, on the contrary, vigorously opposed the latter. Out of fear lest the Roman-Catholic universities would not sufficiently instil Trinitarian ideas into their students, the bishops organized theological seminaries. Indeed, their fears were well grounded; for in Vienna, Freiburg, and Landshut, Josephinism ruled; and in Bonn, Breslau, Freiburg, Tubingen, and Giessen, the Roman-Catholic faculties rivaled the Protestants in scientific theological training.

2488 UNIVERSITY IN AMERICA.

Educational terms are so much confused in the United States, that at one time we hear it said that there are "no American universities;" at another, that there are so many as to be ridiculous. The difference is due to the breadth of the term "university." By name, the printed lists record many score of institutions which call themselves universities: in fact, there is not one score which a jury of American scholars would acknowledge to be worthy of this designation, and a still smaller number which would be called universities according to the English or the German standard. The confusion is injurious to the progress of education in the United States.

A seminary which would be respectable under a modest name seems pretentious under a lofty title: worse than this, the proper object of a college is in danger of being forgotten, and the legitimate office of a university lost sight of. A study of European universities will show, that, with many differences in their formal or organizational structure, they have generally, for a long time past, adhered to certain fixed principles.

1. They have furnished liberal education in the most advanced branches of knowledge,—usually in law, medicine, and theology,—and also in the various studies which are called philosophy, including mathematics, the natural and physical sciences, and philosophy; and this instruction has been given to young men who have been fitted for it by long continued training in secondary schools, academies, and lycees.

2. They have encouraged scholars of exceptional power to devote a considerable part of their time, while engaged as teachers, to the advancement of human knowledge by researches in libraries and laboratories, and to the publication of their results for the benefit of mankind.

3. They have retained the right to bestow academic degrees, and have bestowed these honors with rigid restrictions; so that the public may have some assurance of the intellectual ability of young men engaging in intellectual pursuits, and so that young students may be encouraged in their most advanced intellectual work by the approbation of an incorporated society of scholars.

4. They have built up by their direct and indirect agencies, libraries, museums, observatories, laboratories, and other costly agencies for increasing and perpetuating knowledge.

Judged by these high standards, there are few, if any, institutions in the United States which can be called complete universities; but there are some strong, well-planned, and prosperous foundations, which are full of promise, and which are likely, within the next few years, to be developed into universities differing from the English, the German, the French, the Scotch, or the Italian type, but having distinctive American characteristics. Among their peculiarities will doubtless be a readiness to study the experiences of all other countries, and to apply the lessons thus learned to the peculiar civil, ecclesiastical, and social conditions of the United States. These American universities will differ from one another as the requirements and the history of different parts of the country differ. Generous pecuniary gifts have already been made for university purposes in distinction from collegiate, and other large endowments are known to be forthcoming. Before 1900, or, in other words, before the youth who are now in their cradles are ready to graduate, there will be several institutions worthy to be called universities, and to be compared with like founda-dations in the most enlightened countries.—probably one in or near each of the ten or twelve great cities of the country, and a few others developed in the older States from the present collegiate foundations, and, in the newer, established by legislative aid or private munificence.

The older colleges, originally organized on the type of English colleges, began early in this century to unfold into universities. Thus Harvard, in addition to its college, has now its schools of law, medicine, and theology, its museum of comparative zoology, its botanical garden, its astronomical observatory, its scientific school, its agricultural school, its dental school. Yale has, besides its college, its schools of science, law, medicine, theology, and of the fine arts, and its astronomical observatory. Columbia has its schools of law, medicine, and to its college. A like development, if not as wide, may be seen in several others of the older foundations.

Another promising group of universities includes those which have been organized under the auspices of State governments, largely maintained by public appropriations. The University of Virginia, initiated by Jefferson, was one of the earliest of this class, and has always borne the marks of freedom and individuality which he impressed upon it. The States of Georgia, North and South Carolina, and Louisiana followed, to some extent, the lead of Virginia.

Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, California, and other Western States, have likewise initiated strong foundations.

Within a few years a third variety of university foundations has sprung up, the result of private gifts,—as at Boston, Ithaca, Baltimore, and New Orleans,—free from historic traditions and from governmental superintendence. These three varieties of organization are not unlikely to present perpetually three types,—the collegiate university, the state university, and the independ-te university.

There is a fourth form of university organization—that of the State of New York, which has the distinctive function, that, without giving instruction from its own forces, it has a sort of advisory and even supervisory charge of the colleges and academies of the State.

The points to be aimed at by those who are endeavoring to organize universities should be these,—broad and comprehensive arrangements for the law, medicine, and theology, and for the education of superior minds; ample funds, as possible from petty restrictions; a careful adaptation to the conditions of American society, especially to the schools and colleges already established. If the universities could recover the exclusive right to confer degrees, it would be a great gain. *

of Cluny, and was by Gregory VII. called to Rome, and in 1084 sent as legate to the Emperor Henry IV. After the death of Victor III. he was elected Pope by the Gregorian party; and, at a council in Rome (1089), he excommunicated both Henry IV. and Clement III. Expelled from Rome in 1091 by the emperor and the antipope, he fled to Count Roger of Benevent; but the re-to return to Rome in 1093, and from that time till his death he vindicated the dignity and rights of his position with uninterrupted success. The greatest event in his life was the Council of Cler-became the actual starting-point of the first crus-

UR OF THE CHALDEES, the land of Abraham's ancestors (Gen. xi. 28, 31; xv. 7; Neh. ix. 7).
Schrader thus writes respecting it: "In the extrm south of Babylonian Chaldea, west of the Euphrates, from unknown times there existed a very famous seat of the worship of the moon-goddess Sin, called Uru upon the Babylonian cuneiform inscriptions, to-day represented by the ruins of Mugheir. It is certainly natural to identify this Uru with the Ur of Abraham's ancestry.
And this conjecture is supported by considering that (1) the name Abram in the pronunciation Abarum is Assyrian-Babylonian; (2) Ur, whence Abraham emigrated, and Haran, where he rested, were alike seats of the worship of Sin, the moon-goddess; (3) the West Semites and the Hebrews also had the same religious ideas and traditions as the Babylonians; (4) Hebrew poetry in its parallelism and methods resembles Babylonian poetry." Cf. Riehm: Handwörterbuch d. bib. Alt., him were foiled. See Gesta Trevisorum, ed. Wyttens-bach and Müller, Treves, 1856, vol. i.— Urban IV.

(1261-Oct. 2, 1264). He was a native of Troyes, studied in Paris, was made bishop of Liége, went as Papal legate to Germany, and was by Alexander IV. made patriarch of Jerusalem. The great aim of his policy was to overthrow Manfred of Sicily. He summoned him to Rome; and, when Manfred refused to appear, the Pope gave his land to Charles of Anjou. But Manfred expelled the Pope from Rome, and Urban died on the flight. His bulls and letters are found in Manisi: Conc. Coll., vol. 23. — Urban V. (Oct. 28, 1362–Nov. 13, 1370). He was born in the diocese of Mende; became abbot of Auxerre in 1353, and of St. Victor in 1358; taught canon law at Montpellier, Avignon, Toulouse, and Paris; and was sent as Papal legate to Naples and Sicily. He was the last pope who resided at Avignon. In 1367 he determined to return to Rome, and on Oct. 16 he entered the city; but he left it again in September, 1370, and died at Avignon. The confusion of Italian politics he could not master. Bernabo Visconte, who seized several cities belonging to the States of the Church, he excommunicated; but he was nevertheless compelled to pay him half a million of gold guldens in order to have the cities restored. His life has been written by Magnan (1862), Albanes (1872), and Charbonnel (1872). See also Manisi: Conc. Coll., vol. 26. — Urban VI. (April 8, 1378–Oct. 15, 1389). He was a native of Naples, and was archbishop of Bari, when, after the death of Gregory XI., he was elected pope. But his arrogance and arbitrariness very soon brought him into conflict with the cardinals, a party of whom repaired to Anagni, declared the election of Urban invalid, and chose Clement VII. pope: thus the great fusion of Italian politics he could not master.

After the death of Charles he tried to take possession of Sicily as a vacant fief; but his soldiers abandoned him in Perugia (1388), and he had to return to Rome, and handed him over to the Inquisition. He was treated, however, with great leniency, kept only a few days in captivity, and at last suffered to depart unharmed, after he had renounced his "heresy" June 22, 1383. Urban never signed the sentence of the Inquisition. See Grisar: Galitleistudien, Regensburg, 1882; Inquisition, p. 1100. A life of Urban (Gesta Urban) appeared at Antwerp, 1837. See Ranke: Die römischen Päpste, Berlin, 1836 (vol. iii.).

URBAN VIII. (Aug. 6, 1605–July 29, 1611). He was a native of Florence; entered the service of the curia, and was made archbishop of Nazareth in 1004, and sent as a papal nuncio to France against Austria and Spain, and was thus indirectly in alliance with the Protestants. The Emperor Ferdinand II. complained bitterly, and the cardinal was thought of conning a council against him. He canonized Ignatius Loyola, and Philip of Neri, and beatified Francis Borgia, Andrew Avellino, and others. His poems — paraphrases of hymns in metres of Horace, and hymns to the Virgin — appeared at Antwerp, 1634, and Paris, 1642. He is also the author of those epigrams which appeared in Rome in 1643, with commentaries by Dormalius. [Urban VIII., while Cardinal Maffeo Barberini, was a friend and admirer of Galileo; and, after his elevation to the pontifical throne, he continued to show the astronomer marked favor, who, in turn, dedicated to the new Pope (October, 1623) his Saggistica, a polemical treatise upon comets, directed against the Jesuit astronomer in Rome. In January, 1632, Galileo issued his Dialogo dei due Massimi Sistemi del mondo, repeating the "heresies" of the Copernican philosophy, which in 1616 he had promised not to do; and in October, 1632, Urban, in indignation at Galileo's supposed ingratitude and insubordination, summoned him peremptorily to Rome, and handed him over to the Inquisition. He was treated, however, with great leniency, kept only a few days in captivity, and at last suffered to depart unharmed, after he had renounced his "heresy" June 22, 1633. Urban never signed the sentence of the Inquisition. See Grisar: Galitleistudien, Regensburg, 1882; Inquisition, p. 1100. A life of Urban (Gesta Urban) appeared at Antwerp, 1837. URSINUS, Zacharias, was b. at Breslau, July 18, 1534; d. at Neustadt-on-the-Hardt, March 6, 1583. Descended from poor parents, he was forced to rely for his education upon friends and his own efforts. He matriculated at Wittenberg University in 1550, and remained there till 1557, being on terms of intimacy with Melancthon. At the latter's invitation he was present at the Diet of Worms, whence he went to Geneva (where he met Calvin), and to Paris, where he pursued the study of Hebrew under Jean Mercier. In 1558 he accepted a professorship in the Elizabeth school at Breslau. The sacramental controversy reaching that city, he published Theses de Sacramentis, de Baptismo et de Cena Domini ("Thesees on the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper"), in which he ranged himself on the side of Calvin and Melanchthon. The opposition these views aroused was the occasion of his leaving Breslau; and, as Melanchthon had died, he went to Zürich, where he found a friend and teacher in Peter Martyr. In 1561 he accepted a call to Heidelberg as professor in the Collegium Sapientiae. In September, 1562, he began his lectures on theology, which he continued till Feb. 10, 1568. In 1563 he was appointed to deliver the sermon on the Catechism on Sunday afternoons, and was called in to take part in the preparation of the church discipline of the Palatinate, of which the Heidelberg Catechism (see art.) forms a part. In connection with Olevianus, he made the preliminary draughts of the latter; and upon him principally devolved its defence. He was the author of the two works in defence of the Catechism which appeared in 1564,— Verantwortung wider die ungebunden auffragen und verkernenden Schriften des Ernstus Christianich lehre, zu Heidelberg im Jar MDLXIII. ausgegangen, von etlichen unhüchter weise beschneidet, and Antwort auf etlicher Theologen Censur über die am rand dess Heidelberg Catechism ausse heiliger Schrift angezogene Zeugnusse. The same year he issued two works on the Lord's Supper,— Antwort und Gegenfrag auf sechs fragen von ders Herrn Nachtmaul, and Gründlicher Bericht von heiligem Abendmahle, etc. He shared in the full confidence of the elector, Frederick III., and was constantly called in to defend him against theological opponents. But, like Melanchthon, he shunned controversy. Broken down in health, he was relieved of his theological professorship, and Zanchius made his successor (1568). URSULA, a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, who, according to a legend of the church of Cologne, contained in Siegbert von Gemblours Chron. ad an. 458, Hagen's Reimchronik (about 1275), the Cronica von der kühigen Stat von Coellen (about 1495), the Legenda aurea, or Lombardica historia (Strassburg, 1496), Ursula was the only daughter of the Christian king, Deonotus, or Diogenes, of Britain. Sought in marriage by the heathen prince Holofernes, she put off the marriage for three years, and in the mean time started on a pilgrimage, with ten close companions and eleven thousand other virgins. They crossed the sea to Tila, on the coast of Gaul, went up the Rhine to Cologne, thence to Basel, and from there to Rome. Returning, Pope Cyriacus accompanied the party, which, as it approached Cologne, was totally annihilated by the Huns, with King Ezzel at their head. Ursula, who, on account of the latter incident, was supposed to have been spared to become the wife of the king, resisted, and was killed with an arrow. The Huns were immediately compelled to fly by hosts of angels. The city of Cologne, thus delivered, buried the martyred virgins' bodies, and placed over each grave a stone bearing the name of the occupant. The palmer Clematius subsequently built the St. Ursula Church on the spot. The orthodox Church of the legend in this form was doubted in the middle ages by Jacobus a Voragine, in the Legenda aurea, and Gobelinus Persona, in his Cosmordromia (about 1418), on the ground that no Pope Cyriacus lived in the reign of Maximian Thrax (235-238) or Maximianus Herculeus (284-305), that the Huns had not appeared in Europe at that early date, etc. Baronius himself (Annal. ad an., 383, 384) felt compelled by these considerations to reject the legend in its German form, and to receive that of Geoffrey of Monmouth, in his Historia Briton. According to this, Deonotus, king of Cornwall, sent seven thousand virgins to Gaul, at the requisition of the usurper Maximus (388-388). Driven upon islands inhabited by barbarians, they were slain by Huns and Fics (1). The foundation of the Ursuline legend is to be decided from the martyrlogies written prior to the twelfth century. Ussher was a man of unusual gifts of mind and heart. Selden [whose funeral-sermon he peed] speaks of him as vir summa pietate et integritate judicii singulari usque ad miraculum doc-tus et literis serenissimis praebens natus. He as a declared Royalist, and ardent advocate of ssive obedience, but stood well with the Puri-ts, on account of his strict Calvinism, and his advocacy of a modified episcopacy. His life was blameless, his personality imposing. Impressive as a preacher, he was more learned as a scholar. He did excellent service in discovering and securing old manuscripts, as, for example, the Samaritan Pentateuch from Aleppo.

Ussher's writings, which were numerous, may be divided as follows. (1) Apologetic writings: Graevissima questiones de christianarum ecclesiarum in Occidenda praesertim partibus ab apostolorum temporibus ad nostrum autem, continua sucessionis et status, hist. ecclesiast., 1613 (in which the thousand years in which Satan was to be bound are declared to have ended with Gregory VII., when Satan was loosed in the Church of Rome). An answer to a challenge made by a Jesuit in Ireland wherein the judgement of antiquity in the points questioned is truly delivered and the novelty of the new Romish doctrine plainly discovered, 1625 (a master-work, in which the principal points of difference between the Catholic and the Protestant Church are discussed with great learning); Reduction of Episcopacy unto a form of a Synodical government received in the ancient church, and proposed in 1641 (ed. Bernard, 1657). (2) Historical writings. Ussher was a pioneer in the department of the early church of Britain, and hoped to prove that the early British Church was independent of the Roman Church and its unscriptural traditions. The principal works of this kind were, A discourse of the Religion anciently professed by the Irish and British, 1631; Britanniarum ecclesiarum Antiquitates quibus inserta est Pelagiana Heresoea historia, 1638 (a work of twenty years' labor, great research, and critical penetration); Gotchalcian et prædestinationæ contro. ab eo motæ hist., 1613 (in which he published for the first time Gottschalk's Confessions, which he had brought from Venice); Dissertatio de Ignatii solum et Polycarpi scriptis et etam de Apost. constitutibus et canones C. Romano attributis, 1644; Praefatio in Ignat.; Ignatii epistolæ genuine, etc., 1647; in which last works Ussher declared in favor of the shorter recension of the Ignatian Epistles, as against the larger, which is interpolated by the hand that corrupted the Apost. Constitutions, and surmised the existence of a Syriac recension which was found two centuries later. (3) Chronological writings. De Macedonum et Asianorum anno solari, dissert. cum Græcor. astrologia, vol. cxxiii., reprints Solomon's edition and additions. [In connection with S. Vogelin he issued an excellent selection of Zwingli's works, Zurich, 1819–20, 2 vols.]

USUARDUS, a Benedictine of the abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, near Paris; after his return with Hilduin from Spain, with a number of martyrs' relics, prepared, at the request of King Charles the Bald, a Martyrology. It was completed about 879, and was very popular. The work was first published in Rudimentum novitiorum, Lut., 1475; later editions, Antwerp, 1489; Venice, 1498; Padua, 1500; Cologne, 1515, 1521; Paris, 1536 (with notes by MOLANUS); Lyons, 1568, 1573; Antwerp, 1714 (critical edition by SOLMIE); Paris, 1718 (by BOYLIET). [Migne, in his Latin Pa trology, vol. xxxiii., reprints Sollier's edition and notes.]

USURY now means the taking of illegal interest, but originally it meant the taking of any interest at all, be it high or low, whether paid on a Hebrew to take interest from a Hebrew, but not from a foreigner (Deut. xxiii. 20). The New Testament does not forbid to take interest, though it recommends to lend money gratuitously (Luke vi. 34). The Fathers unanimously condemned the taking of interest, — Terrullian: Adversus Marci eum, 4, 17; Cyprian: De lapiis; Ambrose: De bono moris, 12; Augustine: Contra Faustum, 10, 25; Jerome: Ep. 134. An index of the track of the Fathers, and canon law forbade, first the clergy, afterwards every member of the church, to take interest. The penalty was, for the clergy, suspension; for the laity, excommunication. Interest paid could be reclaimed, not only from him who had received it, but also from his heirs. An oath never to claim back the interest paid was not binding. Of the Reformers, Luther condemned the taking of interest, Calvin admitted it, Melanchthon vacillated; but the universal practice of modern civilization has altogether abandoned the principles of canon law, and for good reasons. christoph von, bishop of Basel, and forerunner of the Reformation there; was born in Alsace about 1450; d. at Delsberg, near Basel, March 10, 1527. It is not known where he pursued his studies. About the year 1472 he was appointed to a position at the Church of St. Thomas in Strassburg, which he resigned in 1494, and in 1473 chosen rector of university of Basel. In 1500 he was chosen administrator of the diocese of Basel, and in 1502, upon the death of the bishop, his successor. He immediately devoted himself to the improvement of the financial condition of his see, and the morals of the clergy, which were notorious as being more corrupt than those of any of the other five bishoprics in Germany. In 1498, he convened a synod of his clergy at Basel, and, without forsaking the Catholic positions, urged upon them the obligations of a moral and exemplary life. In 1512 he called Capito to Basel, and, upon his sojourn therein the interest of his Greek translation of the Scriptures in utility, identical or commensurate with morality. The self-interest to which virtue is traced by Hobbes, Mandeville, and Paley, centres, according to the first of these writers, in the pleasures which spring from the sense of power; according to the second, in the satisfaction of the desire of fame; and according to the third, in the hope of everlasting happiness and the fear of everlasting pain. But in every form the theory is subject to insuperable objections. It makes interest and duty identical both in idea and fact; whereas consciousness declares that they are quite distinct in idea, and experience testifies that they may be separated and even opposed in fact. To act from a desire of personal advantage is felt by every one to be very different from acting from a sense of duty. The more self-love reigns, the less can conscience admit that virtue or merit is present. We approve of disinterestedness, and our approbation is itself disinterested. Duty may dictate, in direct antagonism to self-interest, the sacrifice of health, fortune, reputation, and life. Further: egoistic hedonism by implication the most evil of intentional wrong-doing, and so involves a reductio ad absurdum. It affirms that men always act from self-love, or with reference to their own good, and also that thus to act is right. The plain inference is, that, so far as purpose goes, men always act rightly, and that there is no intentional wrong-doing. Men always mean to do right, i.e., what is for their own advantage; and if sometimes they do what is contrary to their interest, it is only from error of judgment. Thus the hypothesis tends to obliterate the distinction which it professes to elucidate. It is, likewise, an hypothesis logically incompatible with a belief in God, providence, and eternal life, inasmuch as it proceeds on the assumption that sensation is the root and source of our entire mental being. Every proof of the Divine Existence involves participation of which sensation can give no account. The moral attributes of God specially transcend all powers of proof possessed by sensationism, and are specially irreconcilable with the system that self-interest is the motive-principle of all that is known as morality. According to this system, man possesses no truly moral attributes. But he can have no right to ascribe to God what he finds no trace of in the world, or history, or himself. And there being no proper principle of morality in man; there being no true moral judge over man; selfishness, not righteousness, being that which is deepest in the human heart — a tendency for immortality, which are far the most powerful ones, are overturned, and the hopes of a future life are rendered delusive. Those who have advocated the selfish theory have generally allowed that this was its legitimate conclusion. Historically it has rarely been found to exist apart from atheism and irreligion; logically it never can.

The utilitarian theory, in the special sense of the designation, is a decided advance on the selfish theory. It takes account of the social as well as of the personal consequences of actions. It has been the favorite theory of English ethical writers, and especially in recent times. Dr. Richard Cumberland, in his De Legibus Natura (1672), made a very elaborate and remarkable attempt to found the theory on a philosophical basis. Locke, Norris, and Hume were either almost or altogether utilitarians. Jeremy Bentham, James Mill, John Stuart Mill, and Alexander Bain may be mentioned as among the chief defenders, during the present century, of utilitarianism in its immediately pre-Darwinian stage. Jeremy Bentham's utilitarianism, as presented in his Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation (1789), may be summed up in the following propositions: (1) The desire of pleasure and the fear of pain are the only possible motives which can influence the human will; (2) The supreme interest of every individual is the attainment of his own greatest happiness; (3) The supreme interest of society is the attainment of the greatest happiness possible to all its component individuals; (4) The principle of utility or of the greatest happiness is the only test of morality; (5) All adverse principles may be reduced to two,— the principle of asceticism, according to which actions are approved of in proportion as they tend to diminish human happiness, and disapproved of as they tend to augment it; and the principle of sympathy, according to which actions are approved and disapproved of as a man feels himself disposed; (6) The moral character of an action is to be ascertained by a calculation of the pleasures and pains involved in the elements which constitute it; (7) Pleasure or pain may be greater or less according to (a) intensity, (b) duration, (c) certainty or uncertainty, (d) nearness or remoteness, (e) fecundity, (f) purity, and (g) extent, i.e., number of persons affected; (8) The sanctions or sources of pleasure and pain are physical, political, moral, and religious; and (9) The moral feelings are constituted by good-will and benevolence, the love of amity, the love of reputation, the dictates of religion, and prudence. James Mill maintains, in his Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind (1828), these four positions: (1) The standard of morals is utility, and all moral rules are based on an estimate, correct or incorrect, of utility; (2) Useful actions are of four kinds,— acts of prudence, fortitude, justice, and benevolence; prudence and fortitude including those acts which are useful to ourselves in the first instance, to others in the second instance; and justice and benevolence, those which are useful to others in the first instance, to ourselves in the second instance; (3) The moral feelings are a complex product or growth, of which the ultimate constituents are our pleasureable and painful sensations; and (4) Disputes between moralists are partly a matter of association by association from our own personal interest, and at length detached from its original root. John Austin, in his Province of Jurisprudence determined (1832), assailsthe view that moral distinctions are perceived by an innate sentiment, moral sense, or intuitive reason, etc.; opposes to it the theory of utility, which he connects with a belief in the Divine Benevolence designing the happiness of sentient beings, utility being the index of the Divine Will; and endeavors to refute the various objections which have been urged against the theory. John S. Mill, in his Utilitarianism (1863), assumes that the criterion of morality, the foundation of morality, and the chief good, are identical, and affirms, among other propositions, (1) That the steadiness and consistency of the moral beliefs of mankind are mainly due to the exact influence of utilitarianism; (2) that utilitarianism sets before men as chief aim the greatest happiness, not of the individual, but of the race; (3) That it rests on a distinction of pleasures into kinds,— high and low, noble and ignoble pleasures; (4) That it recognizes in human beings the power of sacrificing their own greatest good for the good of others; (5) That conscientious feeling invests utility with obligatory force; and (6) That justice is the animal desire to repel or retaliate hurt, widened so as to include all persons by the human capacity of enlarged sympathy and the human conception of intelligent self-interest. Dr. Alexander Bain, in his works on The Emotions and the Will and Mental and Moral Science, argues that utility or human happiness is the only test of morality; that moral rules are of two kinds, the first constituting morality proper, obligatory morality, duty, imposed by authority under a penalty for neglect or violation, and the second constituting optional morality, merit, virtue, or nobleness, having rewards for its own external support; that human beings are endowed with a prompting to relieve the pains, and add to the pleasures, of others, which is inexplicable by association, and because of self-regarding considerations; and that prudence, sympathy, and some co-operating emotions, along with the institution of government or authority, give rise to moral ideas, their peculiar attribute of rightness being stamped on them by authority.

Jeremy Bentham is, perhaps, the best representative of those who have expounded and defended utilitarianism. He takes into account only the quantitative attributes of pleasures and pains; and John S. Mill, of those who have held that their qualitative differences, their distinctions of kind and nature, are equally to be estimated. Neither form of the theory is consistent, and the latter form is extremely inconsistent. If regard be had merely to quantity of pleasure or pain, utilitarianism can never justify its separation from the selfish theory. Thus presented, it leaves out of account all the higher principles of human nature, and takes into account only what is measurable and calculable, which can only be what is animal and selfish. On the other hand, recognition of distinctions of kind or quality in pleasures and pains, when followed out, must lead, not to the confirmation, but to the destruction, of the theory. Quantity exclusive of quality must rule in a properly utilitarian system. Admit a qualitative gradation among pleasures, and you can no longer have a greatest happiness principle, but only a highest happiness principle. Now, what is highest happiness, if it be not a happiness which flows from a consciousness of doing what is right, if it be not a happiness which presupposes a right beyond itself? If, from devotion to what is right, a man sacrifice all other happiness in the world, this highest happiness will, it is true, still remain with him; but why? Is it because this happiness is set by him over against other happiness, and preferred? or is it because right is set over against happiness, and this particular kind of happiness springs necessarily from the very act of sacrificing happiness to right? It cannot be the former, which would transmute all martyrdom into selfishness. He who makes the pleasure which flows from virtue his end will never get it, for this plain reason, as Dr. Newman says, that he will never have the virtue. If the latter be the true supposition, utilitarianism is erroneous. It is in this case the rightness which explains the pleasure, and not the pleasure which explains the rightness.

Very serious objections may be urged against utilitarianism in every form. It mistakes what is, at the most, a criterion of rightness, for its foundation, the effect for the cause, a tendency or consequence for the constitutive essence. It is easy to prove that virtue is useful; but to prove that virtue is derived from utility, that utility is the essence of virtue, is what no utilitarian seems to have accomplished. Austin and Bain plainly abandon utilitarianism at the central and critical point,—where the one appeals to the will of God, and the other to the authority of law. John S. Mill does so not less when he refers "the obligatory force of utility" to "conscientious feeling." The foundation of virtue should have its obligatory force in itself. The theory fails, even when it calls associationism to its aid to explain the origination of the idea of right, either out of sensations of pleasure and pain, or out of generalizations as to happiness and misery. This is admitted by the latest school of utilitarians. Darwin, in his Descent of Man, Herbert Spencer, in his Data of Ethics, Leslie Stephen, in his Science of Ethics, etc., concede that moral perceptions cannot be produced in a very limited time within each individual mind, as Bentham, the Mills, and Bain have maintained. They hold, however, that what the associationist utilitarians erroneously suppose to take place in each individual during the early years of life can really be effected, although only in the course of ages. But those who deny the associationist form of utilitarianism are not likely to adopt the evolutionist form of it, if they vividly perceive utility and duty to be essentially distinct. They cannot in this case be expected to grant that the one can pass into the other by mere length of development, or that the one can be traced back to the other, merely by being pushed out of sight into dim and distant ages. Their demand for proof that the one ever has passed into the other can certainly not be met by a reference to the general evidence in favor of evolution, for evolution does not necessarily imply the transition in question. There may have been a continuous process of evolution in psychical capacity, from the lowest animal to the highest man; and, if so, it must have been only at some definite point in that evolution that moral distinctions could be recognized, and moral feelings entertained: but, if moral distinctions be in themselves quite different from distinctions of expediency and inexpediency, the apprehension of them cannot be said to have been derived out of experiences of expediency and inexpediency, merely because these experiences helped to develop intellect to a stage at which it was capable of grasping something higher than themselves. If there be a moral law and moral distinctions, which are quite original and peculiar, a long process of evolution may be required before mind can apprehend them; and yet their apprehension may be no product of the process of evolution, but a thoroughly original and peculiar act, the reflex of the objective reality. Further: general presumptions in favor of evolution do not prove it to be without limits. It may be generally true, and yet have many limits. The distinction between moral and expedient may be one of its limits.

UTRAQUISTS.

The Utraquists and Taborites, two religious parties amongst the Bohemians in the fifteenth century. A strong movement in favor of ecclesiastical reforms took place in Bohemia in the fourteenth century, and found a worthy exponent in Hus, whose religious and philosophical ideas were largely derived from the writings of Wiclif. The execution of Hus at Constance set Bohemia in antagonism to the Roman Church, and the outward expression of this antagonism was found in the demand for the reception of the Holy Communion by the laity under both kinds. This demand had been mentioned in the teaching of the Bohemian Reformers, but was put prominently forward by Jakubek of Mise, when Hus was in prison at Constance. The chalice became the Hussite symbol; and the name given to the Hussite party was that of "Utraquist," or "Calixtines." When the religious wars began in 1420, the Utraquists put forth their religious aspirations in the Four Articles of Prague. These articles demanded, (1) freedom of preaching, (2) communion under both kinds, (3) the reduction of the clergy to apostolic poverty, (4) severe punishment of all open sins. Their objects were practical, and they asserted the great principles of the Reformation. The first claimed for every man the right to search the Scriptures for himself, the second attacked sacerdotalism, the third cut at the root of ecclesiastical abuses, and the fourth claimed for Christianity the power to regulate society. But these articles were the result of a compromise, and were held in different senses. Parties sprang up amongst the Bohemians. The most moderate party — "The Praguers" as they were called, because they had their seat in the University of Prague — were content with these articles, and wished in all else to hold the orthodox practices. In opposition to this conservative party stood the radicals, who were called "Taborites," from their custom of meeting in the open air on hilltops, to which they gave biblical names, such as Tabor and Oreb. The most moderate of the Taborites were the followers of Zizka, who after his death were called "Orphans." They were more simple in their ritual than the Praguers, but joined the extreme Taborites, chiefly from political reasons. The Taborites proper set aside all ecclesiastical traditions, and stood only upon Scripture, which each man might interpret for himself. They denied transubstantiation, which the Praguers and Orphans held. Besides these were a group of extreme sectaries, Millenarians and Antinomians, who asserted that God existed only in the hearts of the believers. Most notorious of these were the Adamites, who lived a life of nature, which degenerated into shamelessness. They were exterminated by Zizka. The belief that it was a duty to punish sins led to intolerance of one party towards another, and also to great cruelty in war. The Hussite wars are amongst the most bloody which are recorded in history.

The religious zeal of the Bohemians formed the foundation of a military system which enabled them for ten years (1420–30) to defy the armies of the Pope. But the Utraquists, though victorious against the enemy, were divided amongst themselves; and peace abroad only brought discord and anarchy at home. Bohemia exhausted itself in warfare, and longed for peace. To the necessity of negotiating with the Utraquists, the Council of Basel owed its existence. In 1435 Bohemian representatives went to a conference with the council. In the discussion of the Four Articles of Prague, the council gradually succeeded in shaking the union of the Utraquists and Taborites. The moderate party favored an agreement with the church; and, when peace was possible, its advocates increased in number. After much negotiation, the Bohemians agreed to be reconciled to the church on the basis of the "Compacts," which defined the sense in which the council accepted the Four Articles of Prague.

1. They admitted freedom of preaching by priests duly commissioned; (2) If the Bohemians received on all other points the faith and ritual of the church, those who had the use of communicating under both kinds might continue to do so with the authority of the church; (3) The clergy and the church might possess temporalities, but were bound to administer them faithfully; (4) Open sins ought to be corrected, but by those who had jurisdiction in matters. It was clear, that, in such a compromise, the Utraquists abandoned their position. The Compacts were signed in 1436, and were regarded by both sides as a friendly arrangement. The Utraquists had nothing to lose, but the Taborites, who were to use them as the foundation of a church of their own, were offered, to be withdrawn as soon as possible. The Taborites were right in their hope of re-action in Bohemia. The extreme Taborites, who asserted that God existed only in the hearts of the believers, were exterminated by Zizka. The belief that it was a duty to punish sins led to intolerance of one party towards another, and also to great cruelty in war. UYTENBOGAERT, Jan, was one of the most influential and distinguished leaders of the Remonstrants; b. at Utrecht, Feb. 11, 57; d. at The Hague, Sept. 24, 1644. He studied Geneva, under Beza; in 1584 was appointed preacher at Utrecht; deprived of his position in 59, on account of his friendship for Arminius; pointed preacher at The Hague in 1590, and art-chaplain of Prince Moritz of Orange. He headed for a national synod, in which the Remonstrants should have an equal right of speech with the Calvinists, and, with Episcopius and others, the opponents at The Hague in 1611 to discuss propositions of peace. A decree banishing him and confiscating his goods, was passed. He fled to France in 1622, and returned in 1626 to Amsterdam, where he lay concealed for a time. In 1629 his goods were restored to him; and in 1632 he preached again at The Hague, but his miseries succeeded in having him silenced. Uyttenbogaert wrote a Church History, Rotterdam, 5; De auctoritatem magistratus in rebus eccles., Rotterdam, 1647, etc.; [Cattenburgh: Bibli. Script. ons., Amsterdam, 1728. UYTENBOGAERT (WYTEMBOGARD), Jan, was one of the most influential and distinguished leaders of the Remonstrants; b. at Utrecht, Feb. 11, 57; d. at The Hague, Sept. 24, 1644. He studied Geneva, under Beza; in 1584 was appointed preacher at Utrecht; deprived of his position in 59, on account of his friendship for Arminius; pointed preacher at The Hague in 1590, and art-chaplain of Prince Moritz of Orange. He headed for a national synod, in which the Remonstrants should have an equal right of speech with the Calvinists, and, with Episcopius and others, the opponents at The Hague in 1611 to discuss propositions of peace. A decree banishing him and confiscating his goods, was passed. He fled to France in 1622, and returned in 1626 to Amsterdam, where he lay concealed for a time. In 1629 his goods were restored to him; and in 1632 he preached again at The Hague, but his miseries succeeded in having him silenced. Uyttenbogaert wrote a Church History, Rotterdam, 5; De auctoritatem magistratus in rebus eccles., Rotterdam, 1647, etc.; [Cattenburgh: Bibli. Script. ons., Amsterdam, 1728. See Motley: Life of John of Barneveld].

NEUDECKER.

ZZIAH (might of Jehovah), the tenth king of Judah, son of Amaziah and Jecoliah (2 Chron. 25. 1, 3); called in 2 Kings (xiv. 21, xv. 1, and where), except in four places (xv. 13, 50, 32, 34), Azariah (whom Jehovah helps). It is likely that the latter name was given to him in view of his great victories, so evidently the result of divine help. He was sixteen years old, when, by choice of the people, he succeeded his father. He justified this selection. He was a more pious and devoted servant of Jehovah than his father had been. During his reign of fifty-two years the prophets Amos (i. 1), Hosea (i. 1), and Isaiah (i. 1, vi. 1), and possibly Joel flourished. His piety is attributed largely to Zechariah's influence (2 Chron. xxvi. 5). He was warlike and victorious. His army was large, well appointed, and well drilled. He was the first Judeite, apparently, to use stone and dart throwing machines (2 Chron. xxvi. 11-15). Under him Judah threw off all dependence upon Israel, the seaport Elath was captured, the Philistines and the Arabians conquered, the fenced cities rebuilt, Jerusalem fortified, towers erected, and wells dug. — the latter because “he had much cattle,” and “loved husbandry” (2 Chron. xxvi. 6-10). But, lifted up by his successes, he essayed to usurp the priest's office, and burn incense in the temple. Resisted valiantly by Azariah and eighty other priests, he was effectually stopped in full career by the appearance of leprosy upon his forehead; and he died as a leper in a separate house from the palace, and was buried in the “field of burial.” According to the usual chronology, he reigned from 810 to 758 B.C. E. Nagelbach.
VADIAN, the Reformer of St. Gall; properly Joachim von Watt; b. at St. Gall, Switzerland, Dec. 30, 1484; d. there April 6, 1551. He was educated first at home, and then at Vienna, where he met Zwingli; and there he changed his name, according to the pedantic fashion of the time, first to Vadius, and then to Vadianus. His studies took a very wide range, embracing all the learning of the time. His proficiency and versatility are shown by his appointment as professor of the Latin and Greek languages and literature in the university (1510–19), his receipt of the degree of doctor in medicine, and from the emperor the laureate's crown. But of more permanent consequence was his study of Luther's writings, in concert with his two Swiss friends, Zwingli and Loeper, in Zurich, 1535. See his Life by Pressel, in vol. ix of the series: Väter der reformirten Kirche, Eiberg, 1861.

VAQANTES (clerici vagantes, or vagi) denotes, in ancient canon law, clerks who had received an ordination without at the same time obtaining any office, and who consequently were roaming about in search of employment. Laws against the disgraceful behavior of such clerks were enacted as early as the fourth and fifth centuries; and the Council of Chalcedon (451) forbade, in its Canon 6, to confer an ordinatio absoluta sine vaga without any titulus ordinationis; that is, a general ordination without any corresponding office. Nevertheless, vagantes were soon again met with, especially in countries in which the establishment of churches had not yet been completed, or in the vicinity of such missionary fields. As it seldom was possible to appoint the missionary to a definite diocese, and as he was often thrown out of activity by Pagan persecutions or the mere fear of them, the safer neighborhood of the church might often appeal with such missionary bishops and priests, who recognized no jurisdiction of any settled authority, but hung loose on the Christian community. — clereci acephali (auspex, “without head”). Aggravating circumstances were often added. Not seldom the vagantes had obtained their ordination by simony, and used it as a business opportunity. They hired themselves out to other bishops or priests who were in possession of benefices, and undertook to do the work, according to their idea of it, for a recompense; they entered the service of some rich lord or nobleman as his private chaplain, connecting with that position much underhand business; and sometimes they even became mere mercenaries. In the Carlowingian period complaints of them were very numerous, and Charlemagne twice renewed the prohibition against ordinatio vaga. In the ninth century several councils enacted laws against the vagantes, such as the Concil. Mogunt., 817, and the Concil. Ticinense, 850 (Mansi, xiv pp. 906 and 938); and many bishops were zealous in denouncing them, such as Agobard of Lyons (De privilegio sine cura), and Zwingli (Sus Simoniacos). But an effective remedy was finally found. It was enacted that a bishop, if he ordained a person without giving him any office, should support him at his own table, that is, out of his own pocket, until an office could be preserved. This principle was retained by the Council of Trent (1545–63, Sess. 23, c. 23); and the result is, that the Roman-Catholic Church has almost entirely freed itself from a class of pauper clergy.

VALDES, Alonso and Juan de, twin-brothers, and strikingly alike both physically and intellectually; were b. at Cuenca, in Castile, about 1500, and educated at the Castilian court. In 1520 Alonso accompanied Charles V. to Germany, and was present at the coronation in Aix-la-Chapelle and at the diet of Worms. After witnessing the burning of Luther's writings, he wrote to Peter Martyr, his friend, “People think that now they are at the end of the tragedy, but I think they are only at the beginning.” Having returned to Spain in 1524, he was active as secretary under the chancellor, Arbório da Gattinara, a Piedmontese, who for a decade was the motive-power in the imperial policy, and made himself noticed by the zeal with which he defended Erasmus against the fury of the Spanish monks. In 1527 he wrote a dialogue between a courtier and an archdeacon, in which he defended the recent seizure of Rome and the Pope by the imperial army under the constable of Bourbon. Though not yet circulating, the manuscript of this dialogue fell into the hands of the papal nuncio, Count Castiglione, who denounced it in a most violent manner to the imperial government; but Alonso was protected by the chancellor. And, just as the embroilment reached its point of culmination, another dialogue appeared between Mercury and Charon. It was written by Juan de Valdés, and was chiefly political; though it also contained some very sharp criticisms on the Church and the papal policy. Both dialogues were first printed in 1529, anonymously; latest edition, 1850. In 1530 Alonso was present at the diet of Augsburg, where he translated the confession of the Lutherans to the emperor, and generally acted as mediator between the opposing parties. He gained the esteem and confidence, not only of Melanchthon, but of the Protestants in general; and, indeed, he showed so much sympathy for the Reformation, that he afterwards found it advisable not to return to Spain. In 1538 he was at the imperial court in Brussels, and in 1538 he was still in the service of the emperor; but of his life after that time nothing is known. Juan also found it prudent to keep out of the reach of the Spanish Inquisition. In 1538 he stayed in Rome, in intimate intercourse with Sepulveda, the imperial historiographer, and deeply interested in the study of natural science. In 1538 he settled in Naples, and published there in the same year his

Dialogo de la lengua (last edition, Madrid, 1860), concerning the origin, history, style, and literary monuments of the Spanish language. In Naples he conversed much with Ochino, Peter Vermigli, etc.; and gradually formed a circle, which, though it never openly attacked the Roman-Catholic Church, stood in decided opposition to the leading principles of its constitution and policy. Juan de Valdes was a theologian both by talent and by study, though he had not enjoyed professional training; and his views on justification, his Spiritual Milk; in 1882. His principal work translated into English, London, 1865. His early death, however (1540 or 1541), freed him from falling into the hands of the Italian Inquisition, which was established in 1541; but his influence was felt, for a long time after his decease, in Naples and its neighborhood. VALENS. Roman emperor from March 28, 364, to Aug. 9, 370; occupies a conspicuous place in the history of the Church, as the last champion of Arius among the rulers of the Eastern Empire. Having put down the insurrection of Procopius, a relative of Julian, he prepared for a campaign against the Goths; and one of the preparations he wanted to make was to receive baptism. But the patriarch of Constantinople, Eudoxius, was an Arian; and the Orthodox had, at that moment, not one single church left to them in the capital. Thus the rude and ignorant man, who had no knowledge of the difference between the Nicene Creed and Ariusism, and no sense for such a distinction, fell incidentally into the hands of the heretics. As soon as he returned from his victory over the Goths, persecutions began, not in a systematic way, for Valens was unable to form a general plan and carry it out with consistency, but spasmodically, sporadically, incidentally. In Egypt, which was Orthodox throughout, nothing could be done, as long as Athanasius lived, without running the risk of losing the province; but, when Athanasius died in 373, his successor, Lucius, was an Arian, and shortly after began the massacres in the Nitrian desert. The Arians knew very well that the Orthodox party had its staunchest supporters among the monks, and the monks happened to be specially odious to the taste of the emperor. He repealed the decree which exempted them from military service, and then sent a detachment of soldiers into the desert, where the most wanton cruelties were perpetrated. The impression which Basil the Great made upon the emperor freed Cappadocia from persecutions; but in Antioch, where for a long time he resided, and in other places of Asia Minor, the Orthodox bishops were banished, and many of their monks were put to death. In Constantinople, when Eudoxius died, an Orthodox patriarch, Euagrius, was elected, but was immediately expelled by the emperor, and superseded by an Arian, Demophilus. A deputation of eighty presbyters repaired to the emperor to protest; but he answered them by placing them on board a vessel, which, after reaching open sea, was set on fire. The sources to the reign of Valens are politically Ammianus Marcellinus and Zosimus, and ecclesiastically Theodoret, Socrates, Sozomen, and the three Cappadocian Fathers. — Basil and the two Gregorys. H. Schmidt.

VALENTINE, St., a Roman presbyter who befriended the martyrs in the persecution of Claudius II., and was in consequence arrested, beaten with clubs, and finally beheaded (Feb. 14, 270). Pope Julius built a church in his honor, near Pons Moler. Butler says, "To abolish the heathens' lewd, superstitious custom of boys drawing the names of girls in honor of their goddess, Februrata Juno, on the 15th of this month, several zealous pastors substituted the names of saints in billets given on this day" (Feb. 14). Lives of Saints, Feb. 14. There was, therefore, originally no connection between the saint and the custom of St. Valentine's Day: but the custom is far older, probably of pre-Christian origin.

VALENTINIAN III. (Roman emperor 425-455) issued in 445 an edict which recognized the Bishop of Rome as the primate of the whole Christian Church, holding the highest judicial and legislative power in all church matters. The edict concerned, of course, only the West. The idea of the emperor was, that a strongly monarchical church constitution might then be formed from the provinces of the Western Empire, now evidently falling asunder.

VALENTINUS, St. There are quite a number of saints of this name, — a presbyter of Rome, a bishop of Interamna, an African, and a Belgian martyr, etc. (See Act. Sanct., Feb. 18, March 16, April 14 and 29, etc.) But the most important is the apostle of Rhettia, the reputed bishop of Passau, and one of the first Christian missionaries active in south-eastern Germany. The first notice of him is found in the life of St. Severinus, in Pez (Script. Rer. Austriacar, i. p. 86), according to which he preached in Tyrol in the first half of the fifth century, and died Jan. 6. Venantius Fortunatus tells us that many churches in those regions were dedicated to him. Arib, in his Vita Corbinianii (730), states that he was buried at Matsch, in the Tyrolean Alps, whence his bones were brought to Trent. In 768 the Bavarian duke, Thassilo, brought them to Passau. His acte (Act. Sanct., Jan. 7) date from the eleventh century. ZÖCKLER.

VALENTINUS THE GNOSTIC. See Gnosticism.

VALERIAN (Roman emperor 253–259) showed himself quite friendly to the Christians in the beginning of his reign, but instituted in 257 a most violent persecution of them. Like the Decian persecution, it was principally directed against the bishops and the leaders generally of the church. The first edict simply forbade them to hold meetings and celebrate service; the second ordered all who disbelieved to be sent to work in the mines; and the third, of 258, enacted that all bishops, presbyters, and deacons should be put to death. Sixtus of Rome, and Cyprian of Carthage, fell as victims. But in 259 Valerian was defeated and taken prisoner by King Sapor. His son and successor, Gallienus, immediately put an end to the persecution. See Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., V. 10, p. 442; Exp. 28, 583, etc. ZÖCKLER.

VALENIUS, Henri de Valois, b. in Paris, Sept. 10, 1605; d. there May 7, 1676. He was educated in the Jesuit College at Verdun, and studied law at Bourges, but abandoned the juridical career, and devoted himself entirely to literary studies, enjoying, in the latter part of his life, a pension from Louis XIV. and the title of royal historiographer. He published critical editions of Ammianus Marcellinus (1830), Eusebius (1659), Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Evagrius, etc. His life was written by his brother, Paris, 1677. See also Valetius, Paris, 1864.

VALLA. See Laurentius Valla.

VALLA, The Order of, a branch of the Benedictines; was founded in 1039 by Johan nes Gualbertus in a valley of the Apennines, whence its name. The order, which never reached an important extension, was the first to introduce lay-brothers (converts, in distinction to patres) in order to make it possible for the monks to keep the vows of silence and poverty. The first vows were taken in 1039, and confirmed in 1049. The order was confirmed by the emperor Henry III. in 1059. They dwelt in peace and quiet, and for a long time unnotic ed in the present Latistia. They appear for the first time in history, as the companions of the Marcomanni and other Danubian tribes, fighting with Marcus Aurelius. Later on they re-appear on the frontiers of Dacia, as the companions of the Goths and Gepids, fighting with Frobus. Prob us, however, induced them to settle in Dacia; and there they lived for a long time, unnoticed and peaceful, learning various arts of civilization, and adopting Christianity in its Arian form. In 406 they again began to move, probably on the instigation of Stilicho. In company with the Alani and Suevi they fell upon Gaul, and spread confusion and devastation from the Rhine to the Pyrenees. In 409 they crossed the Pyrenees, and founded a kingdom in Aquitaine (Vandalia). In 428 Genseric became their king, and under his leadership the tribe becomes of interest to church history.

Boniface, the Roman governor of Africa, rebelled, and asked for aid from Genseric. Gense ric crossed over to Africa at the head of a motley crowd of fifty thousand Vandals, Alani, Goths, and Suevi, and conquered Mauritania and Numidia. Meanwhile Boniface had been reconciled with the government in Rome, through the mediation of St. Augustine; and he now wished to send back Genseric to Spain, but that proved impossible. In a very short time the whole Roman province of Africa was conquered, and the Vandal settlements there as masters. Hippo was taken in 430; Carthage, in 438. Ten years later on the Vandal fleets swept the whole western part of the Mediterranean, and was encountered in 455 at Carthage. Genseric entered Rome, and from June 11 to 29 the city was given up to plunder. The Vandals in Rome, however, were not worse than the Vandals at home. Africa was devastated with a recklessness and cruelty which probably have no parallels in history. As Arians, the Vandals hated the Catho lic Church, and the African Church, the most flourishing of the three, was so completely undermined by their violence and cruelty, that it never recovered. Genseric closed or destroyed the church buildings, and confiscated all church property. The bishops and priests were banished, sent to the mines, tortured, beheaded, burnt. Rich and distinguished laymen were seized, fined, bereft of all their property, tortured, sold as slaves. Not only Italy, but also the Eastern provinces of the empire, swarmed with refugees from Africa. After the occupation of Carthage, the bishop, Quodvultdeus, and most of the clergy of the city, were stripped naked, and placed on an old rickety raft, which was set adrift on the open sea: fortunately it landed on the coast of Campania.

Under Genseric's son, Huneric (477–486), the persecution abated for a short time, but then began again more violent than ever. He convened a council at Carthage in 484, under the presidency of Cyril, the Arian patriarch of the Vandals. The very arrangement showed the spirit of the undertaking. The Arian bishops were seated on elevated thrones, while the Catholic bishops were huddled together before a judgment-bar like criminals. Some ventured to re monstrate, but they were immediately brought to silence by one hundred lashes each. The result of the council was an edict which ordered all to conform to the Arian faith before June 1, same year. 80 bishops died under the torture, 46 were sent to work in the mines of Corsica, 302 fled into the desert. Again a period of peace intervened during the reign of Gundamund (486–496); but Trasamund (496–529) started the persecution anew: 120 bishops among whom was the celebrated Fulgentius from Ruspe, were banished to Sardinia. It was of no avail that Hilderic (523–531) allowed the Catholic bishops to return to their congregations, nor that Belisarius, the general of Justinian, reconquered Africa, and re-established the Catholic Church (534): the Vandal dominion had lasted long enough to annihilate almost every trace of Roman civilization, and to destroy almost completely the Christian Church.

VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, located at Nashville, Tenn., is under the control of the Methodis-Episcopal Church South, and owes its existence to the munificence of Cornelius Vanderbilt of New York, who on the 27th of March, 1873, made, through Bishop H. N. McTyeire (whom he named as president of the Board of Trust for life), a donation of five hundred thousand dollars; which amount he subsequently increased to one million.
It has also received from Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, son of the founder, one hundred and fifty cash and dental), with a chancellor and forty-two professors and instructors. It enrolled on its last catalogue (1885–86) 499 students. It is the largest and best endowed denominational institution of learning in the South.

VAN DOREN, William Howard, D.D., b. in Orange County, N.Y., March 2, 1810; d. at Indianapolis, Ind., Friday, Sept. 8, 1882. He was graduated at Columbia College, N.Y., and at the Louisville presbytery. For two years he was a missionary in Mississippi. In 1839 he entered the Louisville Seminary, and in the Second Presbyterian Church, St. Louis. In 1855 he removed to Chi-ago, and there began the preparation of his Suggestive Commentary on the New Testament, on an Original Plan, of which have appeared Luke (New York, 1859, 2 vols.), John (1878, 2 vols.), Romans (1870, 2 vols.). In 1878 he removed to Indianapolis.
His Commentary is homiletical, and has been widely used.

VANE, Sir Henry, often called “Sir Harry Vane,” was b. in 1612. His father was a statesman in the reign of James I and Charles I., but lost court-favor by his opposition to Lord Straf-ford. Young Henry imbibed republican princlles, probably strengthened by his Swiss travels, and in 1636 visited New England, when he was chosen governor of Massachusetts. The following year he returned home, and commenced a career which made him distinguished in the history of his country. He took part in all the important questions discussed by the new Parliament, and promoted the impeachment of Laud, and the adoption of the Solemn League and Covenant. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly, and on the commission to the treaties of Uxbridge and the Isle of Wight. But he had little sympathy with Oliver Cromwell, either in his military or political views, being a staunch republican, and thinking more of the power of the tongue and the pen than of the sword and the musket. Cromwell was thoroughly practical, but Vane was a determined theorist. Cromwell was both soldier and statesman; Vane, little more than dreamy philosopher. Vane, however, became one of the Council of State after the execution of Charles I. in 1649, and in that capacity, and as a member of Parliament, greatly displeased his colleague, who denounced him as “a juggling fellow,” and exclaimed, as he broke up the House of Commons in 1653, “The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!” His book entitled A Healing Question Proposed and Resolved, published in 1656, so incensed the lord-protector that he prisoned the author in Carisbrooke Castle, Isle of Wight. Cromwell then tried gentle means to win over his intellectual antagonist, but in vain.

The latter preferred, in his noble retreat at Raby, in the County of Durham, those speculative studies, which he always pursued with great mental earnestness, to any participation in public affairs during Oliver’s protectorate. Vane’s advocacy of republicanism afterwards was utterly in vain; and upon the restoration of Charles II. he was indicted for “compassing and imagining the death” of that monarch. He pleaded justly, that what he had done during the Commonwealth was no breach of the statute of treason, as that statute applied to a king regnant, not to him who could only claim to be one de jure. Charles wrote to the lord-chancellor, saying that “Vane is too dangerous a man to let live, if one can honestly put him out of the way.” He was put out of the way by being beheaded June 14, 1662. His be-behavior on the scaffold was very noble, and his character has been eulogized by his admiring biographer, John Forster, in his Statesmen of the Commonwealth of England. Vane’s Retired Man’s Meditations, and his England’s Remembrancer, contain many eloquent passages; but the tone of the latter is very violent.

VARIOUS READINGS are the differences in the text between the various manuscripts, translations, and patristic quotations of the Scriptures.
In the case of the Bible manuscripts they are mostly accidental, arising from the scribe’s not reading his copy correctly, or not hearing correctly when the passage was dictated to him, or, perhaps, from simple carelessness; such as copying the margin into the text, repeating a phrase or part of one. A few intentional variations have been claimed; but they are unimportant, and affect rather the form than the substance of the text. The various readings in the New-Testament manuscripts are in the aggregate very numerous. In Mill’s time they were estimated at thirty thousand, and subsedent comparison has increased the number to about one hundred and fifty thousand. The statement once occasioned great alarm; but now it is generally understood that the variations are slight in the vast majority of cases, — mere differences in spelling, in the order of words, reduplication, etc., and that no doctrine is affected. In regard to the Old Testament manuscripts the case is different. The source of the various readings is the same, but their number is very much less. The Hebrew manuscripts were copied by an official class, under strict regulations; and many deviations from the standard text occasioned rejection of the scribes' work. So the number of Hebrew variations is very small, being not more than 2,000. See Bible Text, pp. 265, 267, 270, 272.

48—111

VASSAR COLLEGE, located at Poughkeepsie, N.Y., was incorporated by the General Assembly in January, 1801. It was founded by Matthew Vassar (b. in East Dereham, Norfolk, Eng., April 29, 1792; d. at Poughkeepsie, June 23, 1808), who had acquired a fortune by his own exertions, and, being childless, resolved "to found and perpetuate an institution which should accomplish for young men". By gift and bequest he placed in the hands of its trustees funds amounting to about $778,000. The whole property of the college now (1883) amounts to $1,149,572.57; of which $128,748.57 is in productive funds, $125,000 of this last amount being in funds for scholarships, and but $80,000 in endowments for instruction.

Its faculty consists of a president, a lady principal in charge of the domestic life of the students, and seven professors in the different departments of collegiate instruction. The departments of art and music are also in charge of two professors. There are also twenty teachers distributed in the several departments.

The course of study is similar to that in colleges for men. It is prescribed to the middle of the sophomore year; after that, elective under the regulation of the faculty. Latin is required, and one other language, which may be Greek, German, or French. Each student may take simultaneously three studies. It was found necessary in the beginning to provide for a preparatory course; and, though it is still continued, it is regarded as provisional and temporary. The degree of A.B. is granted to students who complete the collegiate course of four years. The degree of A.M. is granted to graduates who pass examination in studies approved by the faculty as equivalent to a post-graduate course of two full years. Twenty-three graduates have received this degree. No honorary degrees have been conferred. A diploma is granted in the schools of art and music to students who complete the full course of three years.

The college opened to receive students in September, 1865, under the presidency of John H. Raymond, LL.D., who continued in office till his decease, in August, 1878. He was immediately succeeded by Samuel L. Caldwell, D.D., who is now in office. The whole number of students enrolled in its different departments for the first seventeen years has been over 6,000. It has a library of over 14,000 volumes; an astronomical observatory and a chemical laboratory, both amply equipped; cabinets of natural history valued at over $30,000; an art gallery of equal value; and a large and commodious building for the residence of students and instructors. The founder designed that the college should be entirely Christian, though unsectarian. S. L. Caledwell, the last president of France, in the department of Haute-Marne, on the Blaise; is famous in history as the place where the Duke of Guise, on his way to Paris, allowed his retinue to fall upon and massacre a Protestant congregation celebrating service in a large barn. This Massacre of Vassy (March 1, 1562) formed the occasion for the beginning of the religious wars in France.

VATABULUS, or VATABLUS, VATABLE, VASTE-BLED, QUASTEBLED, Francois, b. at Gamaches in Picardy, date unknown; d. as abbot of Bellezane, March 16, 1547; was by Francis I. appointed professor of Hebrew in the Collège de France in Paris, and attracted great audiences by his learning and his brilliant talent as a lecturer. He published nothing; but, in his edition of the Latin Bible of Leo Jude, Robert Stephens published in 1545 a number of notes which are not believed to have derived from the lectures of Vatabulus. As, however, the notes in many cases are identical with those of Calvin, Fagius, and other Protestant commentators, it is probable that Robert Stephens sometimes used the name of Vatabulus for the purpose of smuggling Protestant ideas into the Roman-Catholic studies. If so, he did not succeed. The Sorbonne condemned the notes; and not only he himself, but also Vatabulus, was exposed to persecution. ARNOLD.

VATER, Johann Severin, b. at Altenburg, May 27, 1771; d. at Halle, March 15, 1826. He studied theology and philology at Jena and Halle, and was appointed professor of theology in the latter place in 1799. In 1810 he removed to Königsberg, but in 1820 he again returned to Halle. His grammatical works have considerable merit, and were much used, especially his Hebrew grammar. Of his theological works the most noted are his Commentary on the Pentateuch, his Chronistische Tabellen der Kirchengeschichte, Halle, 1803, often reprinted, and his continuation of Henke's church history (1823). His stand-point was that of a moderate rationalism. ARNOLD.

VATICAN COUNCIL, the last oecumenical council of the Roman Catholic Church, was held in the Church of St. Peter, in Rome, from Dec. 8, 1869, to July 18 (or Oct. 20), 1870, but is not yet completed, and may be reconvened by the Pope, as the Council of Trent, which lasted, with interruptions, from 1543 to 1563. It is the twentieth in the Roman series of oecumenical councils, according to Bishop Hefele, who was himself a member of it. (See his Concilien geschichte, vol. i. pp. 58 sq.) Hefele, who made a second edition of his history, with additions, published in 1873.) Bellarmine (De conc., lib. i., c. 5) and the majority of Roman divines and canonists count the Council of Trent as the eighteenth, and this would make the Vatican the nineteenth. The difference arises from the disputed oecumenicity of the reformatory councils of Pisa (1409), Con stance (1414), and Basel (1438), which are rejected by many in whole or in part. Hefele excludes Pisa, but accepts several decrees of Con stance and Basel as oecumenical. The Old Catholics, under the lead of Döllinger, denied the oecumenical character of the Vatican Council; but they were excommunicated. It is as authoritative for the Roman Church as that of Trent. It marks the most important event in the doctrinal history of that church since the sixteenth century, and completes the system of papal absolutism. The Council of Trent was convened for the settlement of the questions raised by the Reformation, and ended with the condemnation of modern rationalism and liberalism within the Roman Church, and for the settlement of the question of final authority.

It was summoned by Pope Pius IX., in the twenty-third year of his pontificate, by an encyclical letter ("Aeterni Patris unigenitus Filius"), June 29, 1868, solemnly opened Dec. 8, 1869, and indefinitely postponed Oct. 20, 1870, in consequence of the Franco-German war, which broke out immediately after the passage of the Infallibility Decree (July 18), and ended in the destruction of the temporal power of the Papacy, and the establishment of the German Empire with a Protestant king—-the king of Prussia. The attendance was the largest known in the history of councils, and reached the number of 764 out of 1,037 dignitaries, who are entitled to a seat and vote in an oecumenical synod of the papal communion. But, after the outbreak of the war, it dwindled down to 200 or 180. The Italians had a vast majority of 276, of whom 143 belonged to the former Papal States alone. The French and German bishops were weak in number, but strongest in learning and the importance of the dioceses which they represented. The deliberations were conducted in strict secrecy, but four public sessions were held for the solemn proclamation of the results.

The subject-matter of the council was divided into four parts,—faith, discipline, religious orders, and rites (including missions); and each part was assigned to a special commission (congregatio, or deputation), consisting of twenty-six prelates, with a presiding cardinal appointed by the Pope. The decrees were prepared on the basis of schemata previously drawn up by learned divines and canonists, discussed, revised, adopted in secret sessions by the general congregations, and then solemnly proclaimed in public sessions in the presence and by the authority of the Pope. The management was entirely in the hands of the Pope and his cardinals and advisers (Jesuits). The proceedings were conducted in Latin, the official language of the Roman Church.

The doctrinal results of the council are embodied in two sets of decrees,—the first against infidelity, the second against Gallicanism.

(1) "The decrees on the dogmatic constitution of the Catholic faith" were unanimously adopted in the third public session, April 24, 1870. They are the strongest against modern rationalism, partisanship, materialism, and atheism, and set forth the orthodox doctrine of God, the creation, and the relation of faith to reason. The Roman Civilità Cattolica praised these decrees as "a reflex of the wisdom of God;" the Paris L'Univers, as "a masterpiece of clearness and force;" Cardinal Manning, as "the broadest and boldest affirmation of the supernatural and spiritual order ever yet made in the face of the world." But, during the discussion, a Swiss prelate declared the schema de fide a work of supererogation, and said, "What is the use of condemning errors which have been long condemned, and tempt no Catholic? The false beliefs of mankind are beyond the reach of your decrees. The best defence of Catholicism is religious science. Encourage sound learning, and prove by deeds as well as words that it is the mission of the Church to promote, among the nations, liberty, light, and true prosperity." Bishop Strossmayer from the Turkish frontier, the boldest and most liberal member of the council, attacked the preamble to the scheme which made Protestantism responsible for modern infidelity, and said, "Protestants abhor these errors as much as Catholics. The germ of rationalism existed in the Catholic Church before the Reformation, and bore its worst fruits in the midst of a Catholic nation at the time of Voltaire and the Encyclopédistes. Catholics produced no better refutation of the errors to be condemned than Leibnitz and Guizot."

(2) Far more important are the "decrees on the dogmatic constitution of the Church of Christ," or the decrees of papal absolutism and infallibility, which agitated the council for several months, and, after a vigorous opposition and the departure of the anti-infallibilist bishops, passed, with two dissenting votes, in the fourth public session, July 18, 1870. This is the crowning act of the council, on which its historical significance rests. The question of papal jurisdiction and authority in relation to the general episcopate and the authority of an oecumenical council, which had been left open by the Council of Trent, and was a subject of dispute for three hundred years between Gallicans and Ultramontanes, Jansenists and Jesuits, constitutional monarchists and absolute monarchists, until it was brought to final rest within that church. Ultramontanism and Jesuitism achieved a complete triumph over a powerful minority of liberal bishops, who at last gave up in despair, left Rome before the vote, and then submitted, one by one, to the decision of the council, and the Pope's, for the sake of unity and peace, which they esteemed higher than their personal conviction and the facts of history. Even Hefele, Keudrick, and Strossmayer submitted, and HEAL to do so, or deny the infallibility of an oecumenical council, and share the fate of the Old Catholics. The council decided that the Roman pontiff has an ordinary episcopal authority and immediate jurisdiction over all the Catholic churches and dioceses; that he is the bishop of bishops; and that all bishops are simply his vicars, as he himself is the vicar of Christ; moreover, that the Roman pontiff, whenever he speaks ex cathedra, i.e., in his official capacity, to the Catholic world on any question of faith or morals, is infallible, and that his decisions are irrefutable, that is, absolutely final and irreversible in and of themselves, even without the consent of an oecumenical council. See INFALLIBILITY.

VATICAN, Palace of the, the residence of the Pope. It is on the right bank of the Tiber, in that part of Rome called the “Leonine City,” and on the Vatican Hill. It is not one building, but a group of buildings, dating from different periods; but as such it is the largest palace in the world, 1,115 feet long by 707 wide, containing a number of rooms variously estimated at from 4,422 to 18,000. The name “Vatican” is from a prophet, because the district was believed to have been the site of Etruscan divination. The name was once given to the whole district between the foot of the Vatican Hill and the Tiber, near St. Angelo. It was considered an unhealthy locality. In it was the Circus of Caligula, decorated by the obelisk which now stands in front of St. Peter’s. It afterwards became the Circus of Nero; and in his gardens on the Vatican Hill he put to death many Christians (“an immense multitude.” says Tacitus) on the groundless charge of setting fire to Rome, and in awful mockery nailed them, clad in garments dipped in pitch, upon stakes, and set fire to them. The apostle Peter is said to have been crucified there.

The earliest residence of the popes at Rome was the Lateran. But Symmachus (408—514) built a palace on the Vatican, near old St. Peter’s; and in it Charlemagne is said to have resided when in Rome, during the pontificates of Adrian I. (772—795) and Leo III. (795—816). Innocent III. (1198—1216) rebuilt the palace, which had fallen into decay; and Nicholas III. (1277—81) greatly enlarged it, and it was used for state receptions, and by kings visiting Rome. When the papal schism was healed, and the popes returned from Avignon, the Vatican was chosen as the papal residence, because its nearness to St. Angelo made it safer than the Lateran, and it has ever so continued to be. The first conclave was held there in 1378. The present Vatican Palace is the work of several popes. John XXIII. (1410—17) joined it to St. Angelo by a covered passage. Nicholas V. (1447—55) began the work of its enlargement and adornment with the “Tor di Borgia,” which he called Alexander VI. (1492—1503) finished. Sixtus IV. (1471—84) in 1473 built the Sistine Chapel. Innocent VIII. (1494—92) in 1490 built the Belvedere as a garden house. Julius II. (1503—13) united it to the palace by a courtyard, which Sixtus V. (1585—90) divided in two by the library-building. This latter pope began the present papal residence proper, and it was finished by Clement VIII. (1592—1605). The apartments occupied by the Pope are very plain. Immediately above them are the rooms of the cardinal secretary of state.

Of all the parts of the Vatican, the Sistine Chapel, built by Baccio Pintelli in 1473, is probably the most famous, by reason of the ceiling and the altar-wall, frescoed by Michael Angelo (1475—1564), who did the former in 1508—9, and the latter in 1539—41. Upon the ceiling he put those wonderful pictures from the Old Testament, from the first day of creation to the intoxication of Noah, and the prophets Jonah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Joel, Daniel, Isaiah, and Zechariah, and the sibyls Persica, Erythraea, Libyca, Cumea, and Delphica. Upon the altar-wall is the famous fresco, The Last Judgment. The loggie and the stanza, different parts of the Vatican, are associated with the wonderful genius of Raphael, who painted them, and by whose projects the Vatican was enlarged.

The Vatican includes the greatest collection of antique statuary in the world; and, although its paintings are said to be only fifty in number, among them are Domenichino’s Communion of St. Jerome, Raphael’s Madonna di Foligno and Transfiguration, and Titian’s Madonna and Saints. The Vatican Library contains 23,580 Greek, Latin, and Oriental manuscripts, but under 50,000 printed volumes. The books and manuscripts are hidden from sight of the tourist, behind locked cases; but permission can be obtained, by the use of due influence, to examine the books. Most precious of the treasures of the library is the Codex Vaticananus designated B. It is written on seven hundred and fifty-nine leaves of very fine vellum (the New Testament covers a hundred and forty-two lines to a page, ten inches by ten inches and a half. It is more accurately written than the Codex Sinaiticus, and probably is a little older, but not so complete. It dates from the fourth century. It was apparently copied in Egypt by two or three skilful scribes. It contains the Septuagint version of the Old Testament (with a few gaps and the omission of Maccabees), and the New Testament as far as Heb. ix. 14. The manuscript was brought to Rome shortly after the establishment of the library (1448), and appears in the earliest catalogue (1475). It was carried to Paris by Napoleon I., but restored after his fall. For further information, see Bible Text, p. 270; Schaff: Companion to the Greek Testament, pp. 113 sqq.

The treasures of the Vatican Library are not only biblical, but also classical and literary. These have not been examined as they should be. On the general subject of the Vatican Palace, see particularly Hare’s Walks in Rome.

VATKE, Johann Karl Wilhelm, b. in Behndorf, near Magdeburg, March 14, 1806; d. at Berlin, April 19, 1882. He was distinguished in theology at Berlin from 1830 to 1837, and became extraordinary professor. He wrote Die Religion des Alten Testaments, Berlin, 1885,—the first part of a comprehensive work upon biblical theology, which was never finished. On account of the liberal views expressed and advocated in this book, he was debarred from becoming full professor. Vatke is one of the writers who first developed the present Wellhausen views of the Old Testament. His special contribution related to the Pentateuchal regulations respecting offerings, which he declared were post-exilic; for before that time sacrifices were not regulated by law, and did not differ essentially from the heathen sacrifices, except that they were offered to Jehovah, and not to Baal or Molech. See art. OFFERINGS. Besides the book mentioned, he wrote Die menschliche Freiheit in ihrem Verhältniss zur Sünde und zur göttlichen Gnade, Berlin, 1811. He was a Hegelian. Benecke wrote his life, 1888.

VAUD CANTON (Switzerland), Free Church of the. In consequence of the abrogation of the Helvetic Confession and the practical subjection of the Church to the State, determined upon (1839) by the supreme council of the Vaud Canton, a strong desire for freedom and independence was excited among the people of the canton. In 1845 the radicals held control, and forbade all ministers of the Established Church to take part in the services of the Moniers, who had been forbidden to meet (1824), but were at work in the canton. Forty-three ministers refused to read the proclamation from their pulpits. The offenders were punished; but the result of the high-handed measures was the formation of the Free Church (Léglise libre évangélique), Nov. 11, 12, 1845. This church now (1883) numbers about four thousand members, under the care of forty-six pastors. Its support is derived exclusively from voluntary contributions. VAUGHAN, Henry, self-styled "The Silurist;" b. at Newton St. Bridget, in South Wales, 1821; d. there April 23, 1895; studied with his twin-brother Thomas at Jesus College, Oxford; went to London; acquired a medical degree; was imprisoned as a royalist; returned to Newton, and practised as a physician. He wrote, in prose The Mount of Olives (1852) and Flores Solitudinis (1851); and in verse, Poems, with the Tenth Satire of Juvenal Englishtd (1848), Olor Iscanus (1850), Silex Scintillans (two parts, 1850–54), and Thalia Rediviva (1878). Parts of the last-named were reprinted with Silex Scintillans, and a biographical sketch by the poet H. F. Lyte, 1847, and again, 1869. He was a disciple of Wordsworth, but any resemblance of his poetry to that of the poet is accidental. His name was bestowed on him by the reserve in which the student and the poet lived. His reputation chiefly rests. He published A History of England under the House of Stuart, 1840, also Revolutions in History, 3 vols., 1859–63. His publications altogether were very numerous. See BRAHMANISM, vol. i. 316.

VEHMIC COURT (Vehmgericht, a word of uncertain etymology, but probably allied to the Dutch rēn, an "association," a "brotherhood") was the name of a peculiar judicial institution, which, according to tradition, was founded by Charlemagne and Leo III., and continued to exist, at least nominally, in western Europe down to the present century, when it was suppressed (in 1811) by Jerome Bonaparte. The tribunal was composed of five men of spotless character, but not necessarily belonging to any certain social rank or state: both the emperor and the peasant could necessarily belong to any certain social rank. The persons of rank and of superior culture. In a few years his attainments procured for him the chair of modern history in the newly founded university of London; and in 1843 he was invited to the principalship of Lancashire College,— a rising institution just removed from Blackburn. In his new sphere he made his presence felt, not only by his influence over the students, but by his occasional sermons, and especially by his speeches at Manchester, in the outskirt of which the college had been erected. He was decidedly a platform orator, and displayed more ability in that way than by his pulpit discourses, superior as they were generally acknowledged to be. He resigned his principalship in 1857, and retired to the town of Uxbridge, near London, undertaking the care of a small church in that place. He subsequently removed to St. John's Wood, and in 1867 went down to Torquay to preside over a newly formed congregation. There he died June 15, 1868. He was chairman of the Congregational Union in 1846, and visited America in 1863 as a delegate from that body. He is best known by his numerous works, especially his Life and Opinions of Wycliffe, two volumes, 1828, and his Monograph of the Reformer, 1853. He was editor of the British Quarterly from its commencement in 1845 down to the year 1866. He delivered in 1834 the congregational lecture entitled Causes of the Corruption of Christianity, and published A History of England under the House of Stuart, 1840, also Revolutions in History, 3 vols., 1859–63. His publications altogether were very numerous. See JOHN STOUGHTON.

tion of ecclesiastics, Jews, and women—to appear before it. Its sittings were partly public, held under open sky,—partly secret; and its verdicts were executed by its own members. In the early middle ages, when might was right, and the will of the strong the only law in power, the Vehm Court was an institution of great value; but, when the State became able to maintain its laws, the Vehmic Court became superfluous, and at the same time it degenerated into an outrageous tyranny. In the fifteenth century several emperors tried to circumscribe its authority, and alter its character; and in the sixteenth century it held its last open session. VEIL is the translation of the Authorized Version for words properly meaning mantles or shawls in Gen. xxiv. 05, xxxviii. 14; RUTH (i. 11), and by the pictures upon the monuments of the last two nations. Women in the Bible lands to-day are never seen in public without a veil, or an apology for one; but the practice dates from Mohammed.

But in 1520 he embraced the Reformation, was appointed preacher at St. Jacob's in his native city, and contributed much to the establishment of Protestantism there. He wrote Apostolica rerum christianarum (1529), Defensio pro baptismo (1527), etc.; but his principal work is his De virtute christiana (1529), the first attempt at a Protestant ethics.

VENICE, Henri Francois de, b. at Pareid about 1697; d. at Nancy Nov. 1, 1749. He studied mathematics, classical literature, and theology, and entered then the order of the Dominicans. But in 1520 he embraced the Reformation, was appointed preacher at St. Jacob's in his native city, and contributed much to the establishment of Protestantism there. He was a good Hebrew scholar; and a series of essays he wrote were incorporated with the edition of 1748-50 of the Bible of Calmet, 14 vols. in quarto, whence that edition is often called La Bible de Venise.

VENEMA, Hermann, Dutch divine; b. at Wiedervank, 1687; d. at Franeker, 1767, where he was professor of theology, and university preacher. He wrote voluminously. See list in Winer and in DARLING. His Institutes of Theology was translated by Rev. A. W. Brown, Edinburgh, 1850.

VENELON, Carlo, Italian theologian, b. at Sordevolo, Piedmont, Jan. 14, 1814; d. in Rome as president of the College of the Barnabites there, Jan. 19, 1869. He entered the order in 1829 at Turin. His fame rests upon his Varie lectiones Vulgatae latinae editionis bibliorum, Rome, VENA, a Christian virgin who came with the Thebaic legion of Mauritius from Upper Egypt to the West. In Milan, where she stopped for some time, she heard of the fate which had overtaken the legion; and shortly after she went to Switzerland, where she labored — first in the neighborhood of Solothurn, and afterwards in the region near the junction of the Rhine and the Aar — for the conversion of the pagan population. She died at Zazrach, near Constance, where she lies buried. See Martyrologium Notkeri, in Canisius: Lect. Antiq. ii., and Act. Sanct., Sept. 1.

VERGERIUS, Petrus Paulus, b. at Capo d’Istria in 1498; d. at Tübingen, Oct. 4, 1565. He studied law at Padua; entered the papal service, and was twice sent as nuncio to Germany by Clement VII. and Paul III., on which occasions he obtained also great satisfaction, but very soon aroused the suspicion of the Inquisition. His frequent intercourse with Francesco Spiera finally induced the authorities to take measures against him; but he escaped, and fled into Switzerland, 1542. After laboring for several years in the Grisons as minister of Vicosoprano, he removed in 1552 to Tübingen, where he spent the rest of his life, enjoying a pension from the Duke of Württemberg. Though holding no office, he was, nevertheless, very active, and contributed much to the furtherance of the Reformation in Poland and Bohemia. He was also a prolific writer, especially of polemics, and translated a number of the writings of the Reformers into Italian. Considered simply as a character, he is one of the most interesting and most significant persons of his age. See his biography by Sixt, Brunswiek, 1855.

VERONICA. According to the legend in its most common form (Act. Sanct., Feb. 4), St. Veronica was a pious woman of Jerusalem, who, when Christ passed by her on his way to Golgotha, took off her head-cloth, and handed it to him in order to wipe the sweat from his face; and, when he returned the cloth, his features had become impressed upon it. One modification of the legend identifies Veronica (or rather Beogvien, according to Johannes of Malala: Chronographia, p. 305) with the woman “diseased with an issue of blood” (Matt. ix. 20–22; comp. Euseb. Hist. Eccl., VII. 17). Another represents her as sprung from royal blood, a grand-daughter of Herod the Great, evidently confounding her with Berenice, the niece of Herodias. The manner in which the portrait was brought to Rome is generally represented as follows. The Emperor Tiberius was sick; and, having heard of the wonderful cures wrought by the portrait, he sent for Veronica. She obeyed the call, and went to Rome, and, as soon as the emperor had touched the cloth, he was cured. Veronica remained in Rome; and, when she died, he bequeathed the costly relic to Clement, the successor of Peter. In the beginning of the eighth century, Pope John VII. asserted that the Church of St. Maria Maggiore was actually in possession of the miraculous portrait; but it was shown only to kings and princes, and only on certain conditions. Both Milan, however, and Jaen in Spain, claim to have the genuine head-cloth of Veronica; and, in unridiculing this entanglement, it is worth noticing, that, in the thirteenth century (Gervasio of Tilsburg: Oita imperialia, 25; Matthew Paris: Ad an. 1216), it was not the possessor of the cloth, but the cloth itself which was called “Veronica,” that is, vera icon (titian, “the true picture”), a circumstance which speaks in favor of Grimm’s combination of the legend of Veronica with that of Abgarus.

VERY, Jones, b. at Salem, Mass., Aug. 28, 1813; and d. there May 8, 1880; graduated at Harvard, 1836, and was Greek tutor there, 1836–38; was licensed as a Unitarian preacher, 1843, but took no charge, and lived in retirement at Salem. His Essays and Poems (1838) show a delicate religious genius, and contain “some of the best sonnets in our language.” Seven of his lyrics appeared in Longfellow and Johnson’s Book of Hymns, 1846; and at least one of them, “Wilt thou not visit me?” has been widely circulated. A complete edition of his writings is to be desired. See the Century magazine for October, 1882, article by W. P. Andrews, on “An Inspired Life.” — His younger brother, Washington Very, (b. Nov. 12, 1815; d. April 28, 1853), also wrote poems.

VESPASIAN, Titus Flavius, Roman emperor, 69–79; was born in a Sabine village near Rente, 9 A.D., in humble circumstances, but made a rapid and brilliant career. In 66 he accompanied Nero to Greece, and was thence sent to Palestine to quell the insurrection which the Syrian governor, Cestius Gallus, had failed to suppress. Drawing together an army of sixty thousand men from Antioch and Ptolemais, he took Sepphoris, the principal fortress of Galilee, in July, 67, and afterwards Jotapata, defended by Josephus. In 68 he gradually reduced the whole country, and finally encamped before Jerusalem. But there he halted. He could afford to wait while the furious hatred of the various parties made its havoc in the city, and very soon his attention was drawn towards Rome. After the death of Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vetellius followed in rapid succession. In the spring of 69 the legions stationed at Aquileia proclaimed Vespasian emperor; July 1, the legions of Egypt followed the example; July 11, the army of Palestine; July 15, that of all Syria; and soon after Vespasian left Palestine, having placed his son Titus in command of the army. In September, 70, Jerusalem was taken; and in the spring of 71, father and son made their triumphal entrance in Rome,—the public exhibition of the destruction of the national independence of the Jews. But Vespasian, though he was very prompt in putting down the Jewish insurrections in Egypt and Cyrene, was under the necessity of showing no desire for persecution. If the Christians suffered any thing during his reign, it must have been the reason that they were still confounded with the Jews. But the oldest Christian writers know of no persecutions during the reign of Vespasian; and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., III. 17) expressly states that it was a period of peace. The principal sources are Tacitus: Hist., Suetonius: Vespasianus, and the Ambrosian hymn of praise with corresponding number was afterwards reduced to seven,— four for the vespers, and three for the completorium. Ambrosian hymn of praise with corresponding time it was celebrated with twelve hymns, which lumban, Isidorus, etc., in which the number of only the terce, the sext, and the nones, but it is cernarium) denotes the service celebrated in the Roman-Catholic Church at the hour of sunset or lamp-lighting, in imitation of the daily evening sacrifice in the worship of the Old Testament (Inidorus: De officiis eccles., I. 20), but with a mystical reference to the descent from the cross and the institution of the Lord's Supper (Titurel: Chrest. Rom. Ritus, III. 66-7), and was probably brought thither from India or Arabia. At all events, a connection with Rome cannot be established. The Abyssinian priest wears a white tunic, called kamis, with sleeves, and which is opened behind. Now, in Rome, under the emperors, it became the fashion to put on several tunics, one above the other; and the first was called camisia. Nevertheless, scholars are inclined to derive the Abyssinian kamis from an Arabic root. When officiating, the Abyssinian priest wears over the tunic a toga of silk or satin, and many colored,— the so-called coppa: but the derivation of this word is also uncertain, however much it reminds one of the Latin coppa, the travelling-mantle of the Romans. The kamis is held together by a sash twenty to thirty yards long, and wound around the waist; and below that are visible the ample white trousers, called sanajil. On great occasions the priest wears a crown of metal, which, like the coppa, is the property of the church. His every-day head dress is a turban made up of thirty to forty yards of white stuff. He is also provided with a fly-flap and crutch, as he often has to stand up, sing, and even the Abyssinian Church, developed. Christianity is said to have been introduced into Abyssinia in the time of Athanasius, about 330, and was probably brought thither from India or Arabia. Around the neck the Greek priest wears a kind of tice, from which hang down in front two stiff stripes. But the principal vestment of the Greek priest is the phelonion, the old toga, fitting closely around the chest, but falling in ample folds below and behind, and provided with a shoulder-piece, which stands up stiff behind the neck. The sticharion is always white; the phelonion, of various colors, is a line, referring to the black stripes. The sticharion, from oras, a line, referring to the black stripes. The sticharion, from oras, a square pouch, or satchel, richly embroidered, and fastened by a belt around the waist. As a personal distinction, he sometimes wears the epigastration, a square pouch, or satchel, richly embroidered, and fastened by a belt around the waist. It is the heavy, old Roman toga and under the toga the omophorion is visible,— a black scarf ornamented with crosses. But stripes on the tunic were very common among the scab; it was not uncommon for laymen to adorn their garments with crosses. The first official ecclesiastical costume, in the strict sense of the word, we meet with on a mosaic in the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, dating from the period between 558 and 573. The priest is there represented in plain white garments: only the broad omophorion, visible under the toga, shows different colors,—blue and red. The tunic has no orarion; and the toga is thrown in a free and easy manner around the shoulders.

From those two pieces of dress,— the tunic, or stola, tunica talaris, tunica alba, and the toga, or paenula, planeta, casula,— the liturgical costume of the Armenian, the Greek, the Roman-Catholic, and even the Abyssinian Church, developed. Around the neck the Greek priest wears a kind of mantle, which reminds one of the Turkish mollah, distinct, he sometimes wears the epigastration, a square pouch, or satchel, richly embroidered, and fastened by a belt around the waist. form as the sticharion, but shorter, of various colors, and richly embroidered with golden crosses. Originally the saccos was reserved for patriarchs and metropolitans; but, since the time of Peter the Great, it has been worn by all bishops. Over the saccos the mantilla is spread—a loose mantle fastened on the shoulder, blue or black, ornamented with stripes, signifying the streams of the living spirit, and provided in front with two small, stiff tablets, signifying the Old and the New Testament. When officiating before the altar, he wears the mitra, which is often of gold, and very costly; and in his hand he holds the patresia, or episcopal staff, ending in a crook and a small cross.

The farther east, the more gorgeous the liturgical apparel becomes. In this respect the Armenian Church stands foremost in all Christendom. The principal articles of vestment are also there the tunic (shabig) and the toga (pilon). The shabig is white, adorned with lace, except in the case of deacons and choir-boys, and held together around the waist with a broad sash, on which inscriptions were embroidered. The toga (sachacard), of the form of a crown, and made of pasteboard, covered with silk and gold; and the bishops and the catholics wear the tak,—a magnificent and very costly specimen of the mitre. The bishop's staff reaches a little above his head, and is made of ivory, gold, silver, or ebony: it ends in a serpent, referring to the serpent raised by Moses in the desert. During service the shoes are often taken off, and replaced by a peculiar kind of slippers. On Maundy-Thurday all ecclesiastical vestments are white; and during "the night of weeping and howling," "the night of darkness," the whole church is covered with black, and kept dark, one single lamp being lighted in front of the crucifix on the altar; also, the priests and the doctors of theology wear the saccos, or episcopal staff, ending in a crook and a small cross.

The Roman-Catholic priest wears over the alb the casula. The alb, old tunic, the Greek sticharion, is white, and made of linen: silk of various colors, embroideries, laces, and other ornaments, which were lavishly employed in the middle ages, have gone out of use. It is held together around with a belt (cingulum), which now generally has the form of a plain string; while in the middle ages it often appeared as a broad sash, on which inscriptions were embroidered. The casula corresponds to the Greek phelonion, and is, if possible, a still worse disfiguration of the old toga. Overloaded with heavy embroideries of gold, and ornaments of precious stones, the free and flowing folds of the toga gradually shrank into that box-like, or coffin-like shape which the casula now presents, and which already Rhabanus Maurus noticed, parod casen. Its color is different,—white for the festival

VICTOR.

VICTOR (vicarius), generally one qui alterius vices obtinet ("who plays another man's part"), more specially the substitute of an officeroccasional or ecclesiastical. The whole subject of vicars, vicarages, vicariates, etc., received a very elaborate development in the Roman-Catholic Church. The head of the church is Christ: but Christ appointed St. Peter his vicar, and through St. Peter the vicariate was forever conferred on the bishop of Rome, who calls himself vicarius S. Petri, vicarius Christi, and is the representative of Christ in this temporal world (vicarius in sancta sedis). He has, first, a general power, all patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops; then, in a more restricted sense, the Roman curia; and finally, in the narrowest but most proper sense, the papal legates, nuncios, and missionary superintendents. And as the Pope has his vicars, so have the archbishops and bishops, coadjutors (vicarii in pontificaibus), vicar-generals (vicarii in jurisdicctione), and officials (vicarii foranei), not to speak of the capellani, members of the chapters, of whom the grand vicar (summus vicarius domini, or summi altari vicarius) played a conspicuous part in the interval between the death of a bishop and the election of his successor. Finally, the priests or parsons themselves had their vicars (vicarii parochiales), and these were either vicarii perpetui, or vicarii temporales, according as the person was perpetually or temporarily disabled. See the various commentators on the Decretals, i., 28, De officio vicarii. H. F. JACOBSON.

VICELIN, the apostle of Holstein, b. at Quen-heim, a village on the Weser, in the latter part of the eleventh century; d. at Aldenburg, Dec. 12, 1154. Educated in the school of Paderborn, he was appointed teacher in the school of Bremen, and brought it into a flourishing condition, but left Paris, he began to prepare himself for mission also in Holstein, but not with permanent success. In 1134 the fortress Segeberg was built; and, under its protection, a church was erected, and a monastery built in the city. Meanwhile new aspects of successful missionary labor among the Obotrites of Mecklenburg were opened up, when Henry, the Lion of Saxony, began to interfere in the affairs of the country, and gained ascendency over the pagan Niclot. The bishopric of Aldenburg was re-established; and in 1140 Vicelin was consecrated bishop. His bishopric lasted him, however, and the last years of his life he spent in retirement. See the Chronicles by Helmold, Adam of Bremen, Saxo Grammaticus, and HEFFTER: Der Weltkampf der Deutschen und Slaven, Hamburg, 1847. G. H. KLIPPEL.

VICTOR is the name of three popes and two antipopes.— Victor I. (185-197 according to Pagi, Brevarium Paparum Rom., I., but, according to others, 187-200) occupied the papal chair between Eleutherus and Zephyrinus. He was an African by birth, and a rash and hot-headed man, as his interference in the Paschal controversy showed. In a letter addressed to Polycrates, the successor of Polycarp, he threatened with excommunication all those Oriental bishops who would not adopt the Roman computation of the Easter festival. The harshness of this measure, however, was condemned by many Western bishops who held the same views as Victor; among others by Ireneus, whose letter to Victor has been preserved by Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., V. 24. He was at last prevailed upon to recall the letter. Theodotus the tsamer, the famous Monarchian leader, he excommunicated; but his adherents formed a party, the Theodotians, which lived on for a long time in Rome. [The spurious decrees which have been ascribed to him are enumerated in Jaffé: Regesta, edited by Wattenbach, Berlin, 1882.] — Victor II. (1055-57) was bishop of Eichstadt by birth, and a relative and intimate friend of Henry III.: his true name was Gebhard. According to Leo of Ostia (Chron. Casinense, ii. 59) it was Hildebrand who carried through his election, and, if so, it must have been Hildebrand himself who produced the material camp, and gained over to the side of the reform party one of the most determined opponents of the measures of Leo IX. The experiment succeeded. In his short reign, Victor held one council in Italy (Florence), and three in France (Lyons, Lisieux, Toulouse), against the two great weak-nesses of the church, — simony and the marriage of the priests. The sources to his history are found in the Pagan rolls of Pontificia Romana. See also HOFLEER: Die deutsche Püpste, Leipzig, 1839. — Victor III. (1086-87) was abbot of Monte Carlo when the dying Gregory VII. designated him as the most worthy to succeed him. It was nearly a whole year, however, before Victor consented to accept the election by the cardinals, and his energetic reign, carried on completely in the spirit of his great predecessor, lasted only half a year. See the continuation, by Petrus Diaconus, of the Chron. Casinense, by Leo of Ostia. — Victor IV. was the name assumed by two antipopes in the twelfth century; first by Cardinal Gregory Conti (1138), who, however, was overturned by Innocent II., through the exertions of Bernard of Clairvaux, after the lapse of two months; and VICTOR, Claudius Marius, also called Victorinus, was a poet and rhetorician; lived at Marsiselles in the first half of the fifth century, and wrote, in hexameters, a Commentary on Genesis and an Epistolam ad Solomonem Abbatem de per-rersis et aliae suae moribus, found in Bibl. Max. Patr., Lyons, tome IV.), in which he defended the view that Christian, but was miraculously liberated, and became bishop of Rouen in 380 or 390. He undertook some missionary-work in Hainaut (Belgium) and went in 394 to England, on account of the troubles caused there by the Pelagians. But his own orthodoxy became suspected, and he had to go to Rome in order to vindicate himself before Innocent I. He wrote a work, De laute Sanctarum, edited by Leuben, Paris, 1739. He is commemorated on Aug. 7.

VIENNE, one of the oldest cities of France, and the cradle of the Church of Gaul; stands on the Gère, near its influx in the Rhone, in the department of Isère, and has been the seat of a number of councils,— the first in 474, the last in 1557,
—most of which, however, are only of slight interest. One of 1112 cancelled the agreement of 1111 between Pascal II. and Henry V., according to which the Pope conceded the right of investiture to the emperor. (See HARDUIN: Acta Concilior., T. VI. pars ii.; MANSI: Concil. Coll., T. XXI.)
Another, of 1199, executed the ban which Innocent III. had laid on Philippe Auguste for having repudiated his wife, Ingeborg. (See HARDUIN, I., and MANSI; T. XCIII.) The last, of 1159 by the Ghibelline party and Frederic Barbarossa, and maintained himself till his death at Lucca, in 1164, but never equalled his rival, Alexander III., either in actual power or in moral influence. See Reuter: Alexander III., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1860-64, 3 vols. ZÖCKLER.

VICTOR, Bishop of Antioch, was a contemporary of Chrysostom, and wrote a Commentary on the Gospel of Mark (Bib. Patr. Max., Lyons, tome IV.), in which he defended the view that middle of the fifth century, and wrote Adversus Arianos ad Gensericum, De poeutenliapublico, and versis alatissua; moribus, found in Bibl.Max. Pair., Lyons, tome VIII.

VICTOR, Bishop of Capua, d. about 544; is generally considered the first Latin catena writer.
He wrote De cyclo Paschali, of which only a few fragments are preserved by Bede (Schola veterum patrum), and a Latin translation of Ammonius Alexandrinus: Harmonia Evangeliorum, Cologne, 1532.

VICTOR, Bishop of Carthage, flourished in the middle of the fifth century, and wrote Adcerus Arianos ad Genericum, De pamentia publica, and other several works, most of which, however, are lost.

VICTOR, Bishop of Tunna, d. about 568; suf-ffered imprisonment and exile because he opposed the condemnation by Justinian of the so-called "Three Chapters." He wrote a Chronicle, of which the part treating the period between 444 and 465 has come down to us, edited by Scaliger, in Thesaurus Temporum Eusebii, Amsterdam, 1628, T. II., and by Basnage, in Thesaurus Monumentorum Eccles., Antwerp, 1735, T. 1.

VICTOR (Vitensis), Bishop of Vota, not, as it is often said, of Utica; wrote a Historia persecutionis Africana sub Generico et Hunnerico, edited by RuiNERT, in his Historia persecutionis Vandalicæ, Paris, 1634, Venice, 1739, and recently by M. PER-CHEN, Vienna, 1981.

VICTORINUS (Peltaxionensis), Bishop of Pet-tau, a city of Panonia, on the Drave, in the present Styria, and not, as stated by Baronius and others, Bishop of Poitiers; flourished about 290.
According to Cassiodorus and Jerome, he was a Greek by birth, understood Greek better than Latin, and taught rhetoric before he became a bishop. A fragment of his De fabrica mundi is still extant, and has been edited by Cave; but his other writings have perished. The Commentary on the Revelation ascribed to him, and found in Max. Bib. Patrum, Lyons, 1677, T. III., is by some considered spurious, because it rejectsthe chili-astic views of Cerinthus, which, according to Je rome, Victorinus held. Others, however, consider the passages in question to be interpolations. See DUPIN: Nouvelle Bibliothèque, Paris, 1693, T. 1.; and CAVE: Historia literaria, Geneva, 1693.

VICTRICIUS, St., was a soldier, and subjected to fearful tortures by his Pagan commander when he wanted to leave the army, and become a Christian, but was miraculously liberated, and became bishop of Rouen in 380 or 389. He undertook

VIGILIUS (Pope 540–555) was a Roman by birth, and deacon during the reign of Agapetus, whom in 533 he accompanied to Constantinople. Ambitious and grasping, but without talent, or courage to realize his aspirations, he fell a prey to the intrigues of the Byzantine court. When Agapetus died, in Constantinople, he was appointed his successor, but on the secret condition that he should support the emperor's scheme for the reconciliation of the Monophysites with the orthodox church. On his arrival at Rome, however, he found the see already occupied by one Silverius; but, in accordance with the bargain he had made with the emperor, Belisarius came to his aid, and Silverius was removed, partly by intrigues, partly by violence. Vigilius was not so prompt in fulfilling his part of the bargain. He wrote a letter to the three deposed Monophysite patriarchs of the East, — Theodosius of Alexandria, Anthimus of Constantinople, and Severus of Antioch, — in which he professed perfect agreement with their faith. But he demanded that the synod should be kept a secret, on the plea that he was able to do more for the Monophysites, in his own cause when he preserved the appearance of being in agreement with the synod of Chalcedon. Meanwhile the emperor had been persuaded that a condemnation of the three principal representatives of the Nestorian view — Theodorus of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrus, and Ibas — would silence all the objections of the Monophysites to the synod of Chalcedon; and he consequently issued an edict in that sense. But the edict met with resistance even in the East; and in the West it was generally condemned, the African church taking the lead of the opposition. The emperor demanded of Vigilius that he should subscribe the edict, and Vigilius dared not. For three years he succeeded in escaping the dilemma by prevalent ratiocination and subterfuges of all kinds. But in 547 he was peremptorily summoned to Constantinople. Synod after synod was convened, but the African bishops and the Western bishops in general continued to resist. Finally the Council of Constantinople, chiefly composed of Oriental bishops, provedpliant, and the imperial edict was formally accepted by the church. Vigilius first tried his old game — writing a judicatum in favor of the edict, but demanding that the document should be kept a secret. Pressed hard by the court, he fled from Constantinople; and from Chalcedon he issued a formal protest, the so-called constitutum, against the decrees of the synod of Constantinople. But he was unable to escape the frown of the emperor, and too anxious to return to his see, to hold out to the end. In 555 he publicly retracted, and accepted the Constantinopolitan decrees, in order to be allowed to return to Rome. He died at Syracuse, however, on the way home. The sources are (besides the Liber pontificum) by Anas- te, who gives the pertinent acts in Mansi: Concil. Coll., vol. ix.; the Breviariuin, by Liberatus, the Chronicle, by Victor of Tunnunum, and the Pro defensione trium capitolorum, by Facundus of Her- miane, all three found in Galland: Bibl., vols. xi. and xii. H. Schmidt.

VIGILIUS THE DEACON, a name: flourished, according to Gennadius, at first half of the fifth century, and in the synodal rule, which has been published in the Index Regul., I., and Minut. Periach. Vigilius, Bishop of Tapea in the African province of Byzacene, was several celebrated works against Eutychian and Arianism. Of his personal life no single fact is known to us; he was the synod convened at Carthage in the year 419, and the kindred of this, the constitution, De persecutione, Vindac., principal work, and the only one to use his name, is the Fifth Book against Eutychianism, which, however, when first printed (Tubing., 1528), was ascribed to Vigilius. From this work an inference may be drawn as to the authorship of the De periculis, the De synodis against Athanasius, Photinus, and Theodore, formerly ascribed to Athanasius; and again, an inference may be drawn as to the authorship of the Polémics against Theodore, and the Twelve Books on the Incarnation, which were published under the pseudonym of Vigilius, Dijon, 1864; they are also Bibl. Max. Patr., vol. iv. and viii. The value of these works is not great, because the author was certainly one of the most prominent writers of his age.

VIGILIUS, Bishop of Trent, is found chiefly by Gennadius (37) as author of an homily, and a letter on the great exploit of the emperor, and deaconduring the reign of Agapetus, to which in 536 he accompanied to Constantinople. See also Lindner: De Joviano et Vigilantio, Leipzig, 1840. H. Schmidt.

VINCENT OF LERINS. 2460

VINCEN'T DE PAUL, b. at Pouy in Gascogne, April 24, 1576; d. in Paris, Sept. 27, 1660; beatified, 1727; and canonized, 1737. He was educated by the Franciscans, and ordained a priest in 1600. On a tour from Toulouse to Narbonne, the court, and through his friend Berulle, who had just founded the order of the Peres de I'Oratoire in the fifth century; wrote his famous book, Commonitorium, according to a notice in its fortieth chapter, three years after the synod of Ephesus, that is, 434; and died, according to Gennadius (De vir. ill., 94), during the reign of Valentinian I.; according to the Martyrologium Romana num 293. Nothing is known of his personal life. In the history of doctrines the Commonitorium occupies a prominent place. At the time of its authorship, Southern Gaul was the seat of a wide-spread and decided Semipelagian opposition to Augustine; and though the book is written with great calmness, and without the least trace of direct polemics, its Semipelagian character and its silent reference to Augustine are unmistakable. (See Vossius: Hist. Pelagiana, p. 575; Nolius: Hist. Pelagiana, ii. 2, 3, 11; and the elaborate analysis by H. Schmidt, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie.) But a still greater interest the book acquires from the circumstance that it is the most complete representation of the Roman-Catholic doctrine of tradition. Feeling the necessity of having some external, irrefragable evidence of truth, Vincent passes from Scripture to tradition, as containing the true interpretation which alone can make Scripture infallible. But if Scripture needs the interpretation of tradition — quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus creditur est — is tradition exempted from misinterpretation? This last step, however, to make tradition dependent on the living church in its entirety, or on the infallible pope, Vincent refrained from taking. The book has been edited by Baluze, Coster, E. Klüpfel (Augsburg, 1843), etc. See Elpelt's monograph, Breslau, 1840.

VINCENT OF SARACOSSA, one of the most celebrated martyrs of the ancient church; descended from one of the most distinguished families in Arragonia; was archdeacon of the church of Saracossa, and suffered martyrdom at Valencia during the persecution of Diocletian, about 303. Though the Paioo S. Vincenti (Act. Sanctuar. vulgo Tournés, xii.) is overloaded with tortures and miracles, it must, nevertheless, be very old, as it was known, at least in all its most prominent features, to Augustine (Sermo, 4; 274; 275; 276), Prudentius (Peristephanon), Paulinus of Nola (Poenam, 27), Venantius Fortunatus (Carm., i. 8), and Gregory of Tours (De glor. mart., 90).

VINCENT, Samuel, b. at Nimes, Sept. 8, 1787; d. there July 10, 1837. He belonged to a family, which, through several generations, had been attached to the service of the Reformed Church of Nimes; and, after studying at Geneva, he settled in his native city as pastor; and afterwards not even the most tempting offers could induce him to leave it. In 1829 he was made president of its consistory. His spiritual character, however, developed under the influence of English and Scottish literature, especially the works of Bruckner and Schleiermacher) Protestantism, rather than under that of French and Swiss Protestantism. After the Revolution, the French-Reformed Church gradually sunk down into the desir of Rousseau, and its theology became mere conventionalism without any true vitality. Vincent felt the evil; and it is his great merit that he procured the remedy. His first original production was an attack on Lamanessi's Essai de l'intolérance (1820), and his Observations sur l'Unité religieuse (1829), 2 vols., and Méditations religieuses (most of which was published in French). His last work opened up new and rich opportunities to the preacher. His life was written by Antonin (1863) and Corbière (1878), besides a number of monographs by Fontanès, Prévost-Paradol, Coquerel fils, etc.

VINES, Richard, b. at Blazon, in Leicester County, Eng., about 1800; d. February, 1855 (6). He was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge; became teacher of a school at Hinckley in Warwickshire, after finishing his course at the university, and afterwards rector of Weddington. He was appointed a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines in 1643 from Warwickshire, and was very influential in matters of church government and the sacraments. He was chairman of the Committee of Accommodation with the Independents. He often preached before Parliament. During the session of the Westminster Assembly he was, in 1643, made minister of the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to

VINET, Alexandre Rodolphe, Swiss theologian; b. at Ouchy, near Lausanne, Switzerland, June 17, 1797; d. at Clarens, on the Lake of Geneva, May 4, 1847. He was educated at Lausanne. From 1817 to 1837 he was teacher of the French language and literature in the gymnasium and lycée at Basel, then extraordinary professor of the same faculty (1838), and finally professor. In 1810 he was ordained; but it was not until 1823 that he came under the influence of those deeply spiritual views inculcated by César Malan. It was, indeed, the persecution of the Monomachs (see art.) which aroused Vinet's attention to the subject of freedom of conscience, and led him to write for the Paris Société de la morale chrétienne his prize essay, Mémoire en faveur de la liberté des cultes, Paris, 1820. This book established his reputation as a thinker and writer. Not content with philosophizing, he took a prominent part in efforts to secure religious freedom in Switzerland, in consequence of which he was tried (1829), and condemned to pay a fine of eighty francs and be suspended from his ministerial functions for a year. But of course such persecution had no effect upon his efforts or influence, except to increase both. He received, meanwhile, flattering calls elsewhere; but these he steadily declined, greatly to the delight of the Baselers, who showed their appreciation of his ability and devotion as preacher, professor, and pamphleteer, by giving him the freedom of the city (1829), and in 1835 creating for him a chair of French language and literature in their university, thus giving him the position of ordinary professor. In 1837, however, he received a call which he could not resist, and went to Lausanne as professor of practical theology. As a parting tribute of respect and regard, Basel gave him that year the degree of doctor of theology. Out of modesty, Vinet made no public use of it; and therefore Berlin, in 1846, bestowed the same degree upon him. The second part of Vinet's career was destined to be shorter, but more important. Immediately on his coming to Lausanne, he was involved in the struggle against state interference in ecclesiastical affairs, incident to a reorganization of the church in the canton; and, being unable to accept the abject position of the church before the law as determined by the new order of things, he withdrew from the Vaudois canton association of clergy (1840), but not—and this had been laid against him as an inconsistency—from the National Church, because he was on principle opposed to separation from existent churches. He exercised great caution in his professorial teaching, and did not obtrude his peculiar views upon the students. Life was moving on quietly and beneficently when the Vaudois revolution of Feb. 14, 1845, broke out, an uprising of the masses against the superstition, a blind and brutal superstition, as the "dissenters," and those of the National Church who taught "evangelical views," and favored "evangelical practices," were called. Vinet endeavored, unsuccessfully, to utilize the occasion to induce the authorities to grant religious freedom; and, since this came not, he resigned his professorship, May, 1845. A few weeks later he became professor of French literature in the Lausanne Academy. In December, 1845, the Free Church of the canton of Vaud was organized; and, after some hesitancy, Vinet joined it. In November, 1846, the teachers in schools in the canton, of all grades, were required to submit to the new church law referred to above, and therefore Vinet was forced to withdraw. He welcomed the immmencid, full of plans consummated and projected works, he would remain for a couple of years into the country, but his plan could not be carried out. His students besought him to continue his lectures; and so, although they were in need of rest, he labored on. On Jan. 28, 1847, he gave his last lecture in theology. On April 19 he was carried to Claren, and there he died.

Vinet won fame in the two departments of theology and literary criticism. The latter does not properly come up here. His theology has to be determined from scattered statements in sermons, etc., for he wrote no formal theological treatise. He held the "evangelical" view respecting the necessity of repentance, and salvation by faith. Christ was the centre of his teaching. He made much out of individuality, and dwelt upon the fitness of the gospel to the deepest needs of the heart, as proof of its divine origin. This theology was the staple of his preaching. As his teachers, he acknowledged Pascal and Kant. In practical theology there are several posthumous works derived from his notes and reports of students: Théologie pastorale, ou théorie du ministère évangélique, Paris, 1850; Homélitches, ou théorie de la prédication, 1853; and Histoire de la prédication parmi les reformés de France au dix-septième siècle, 1890. In the first, Vinet shows his fitness to have the care of souls, but takes radical ground; for he teaches that the ministerial office sprang out of the needs of the congregation, and had no formal, divine introduction. The minister, therefore, has no special priestly character whereby he is separated from other believers: he is simply a Christian called to Nismes, and shortly after to Lyons. For the establishment of the Reformation in the French part of Switzerland, he worked for thirty years in Lausanne and Geneva. In 1561 he was called to Nimes, and shortly after to Lyons. Aug. 10, 1563, he presided over the fourth national synod of France. In 1563 he was compelled to leave Lyons; but in the following year he was appointed professor of the newly established academy of Orthez. He was a prolific writer. His principal work is his Instructon de la roy et de l'Evangile, Geneva, 1564, 3 vols. fol., written, like most of his works, in the form of dialogues, and containing a complete system of morals and ethics. His works, however, are literary rarities.

C. SCHMIDT.

VIRGILIUS, St., noticed in church history as the opponent of Boniface. He was an Irishman by birth; joined Pepin at Chieray in 743, and was by him recommended to Duke Odilo of Bavaria for the see of Salzburg, which he occupied from 744 or 745 to his death, Nov. 27, 784. Used to the freer forms of the church of his native country, he could not help coming into opposition to Boniface, who just at that time was active in establishing the strictest hierarchical forms in the German and Frankish churches. Twice Boniface complained of his conduct to the Pope; and the latter time he even accused him of heresy, as he held the view of the earth, that it was globular. But in both cases the Pope supported Virgilius, and in 1333 he was even canonized by Gregory IX. See the two letters from Pope Zacharias to Boniface in the Letters of Boniface (62 and 82), edited by Wurdwein.

VIRGINIA.

Protestant-Episcopal Theological Seminary. This school, for the training of ministers for the Episcopal Church, is in Fairfax County, Va., two miles and a half west of Alexandria, and seven miles, in a straight line, from Washington, D. C. It was founded in 1823 by a number of churchmen of Virginia and Maryland, foremost among whom was Bishop Meade of Virginia. It was not, however, incorporated till 1834, owing to prejudice in the State against the independent Bishop of Williamsburg. It opened in the city of Alexandria; and, for four years, instruction was given by the resident clergy and by the Rev. Dr. Keith. It was removed in 1827 to its present site, on a hill two hundred and fifty feet above the Potomac. The present buildings were erected by the munificence of Messrs. William H. and John L. Aspinwall of New York, John Bohlen of Philadelphia, and others. A beautiful chapel has been recently added by the contributions of the alumni and friends of the seminary. The first professor was the Rev. Reuel Keith, a graduate of Middlebury College, Vermont. He was a man of learning, and an earnest and impressive preacher. He translated Hengstenberg's Christology from the German. Dr. William Sparrow succeeded him as professor of systematic divinity in 1841, and was connected with the seminary till his death, in 1874. He was distinguished as a teacher and preacher. (See his Life and Correspondence, by C. Walker, D.D., Philadelphia, 1876; Selected Sermons.) Dr. James May succeeded Professor Lippitt in the chair of systematic divinity in 1841, and was connected with the seminary till his death, in 1874. He was distinguished as a teacher and preacher. (See his Life and Correspondence, by C. Walker, D.D., Philadelphia, 1876; Selected Sermons.) The number of students who have been connected with the seminary during its existence of sixty years is not far from seven hundred and fifty; of these about forty became foreign missionaries. The first missionary whom it sent out was the Rev. Dr. Hill, lately deceased, to Greece. Fifteen of its alumni have been connected with the China mission, among whom was Bishop Boone, a man eminently fitted for his work. Sixteen have been missionaries to Cape Palmas, West Africa, among whom was Bishop Payne, who bore the heat and burden of the climate for thirty-two years; and Colden Hoffman, of whom The London Christian Observer said, "The annals of missionary excellence do not furnish a brighter example than that of Colden Hoffman." The first missionary to Japan from any Protestant church, we believe, was from this seminary, as is also the present Bishop Williams.

There are now four professors in the seminary and an instructor in vocal culture. There is also a preparatory department, distinct from the seminary, for those who from any cause cannot go to a college, the course in which is two years. The number of volumes in the library is about twelve thousand. J. PACKARD.

VISITANTS, or NUNS OF THE VISITATION. A visitatio liminum ex voto, that is, a visit to the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome, in consequence of a vow, seems to have been a very frequent occurrence in the middle ages. Pilgrims "who go to Rome for God's sake" are often spoken of, and much was done for their protection both in coming and going. The Pope put the ban on any one who robbed them, or in other ways molested them. There is also a considerable canonical legislation concerning the right to grant dispensations from such a vow,—a right which at one time the Pope tried to reserve to himself, but which finally became vested in the bishops. Of much greater importance, however, are the visits ex lege, demanded by law. As early as the eighth century, in 745, a Roman synod demanded that all bishops subordinate to the bishop of Rome as their metropolitan should meet personally in Rome once a year to give due account of the state of their dioceses. By Gregory VII. this demand was extended to all metropolitans of the Western Church; and finally Sixtus V. (by the bull Romanus Pontifex, Dec. 20, 1584) ordered the bishops of Italy, Dalmatia, Greece, and the adjacent islands, to visit Rome once in three years; those of Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Bohemia, Hungary, England, Scotland, and Ireland, once in four years; those from the rest of Europe, once in five years; and those from the other continents, once in ten years. By a constitution of Nov. 28, 1740, Benedict XIV. extended the demand to all abbots, priors, provosts, etc., having territorial jurisdiction. H. F. JACOBSON.

VITALIAN. Pope (657–672), tried in vain to compel the bishop of Ravenna to recognize the authority of the see of Rome. He summoned Maurus to Roman Catholic Church; fled to Italy, and was there tortured to death, as he would not recant. His remains were afterwards brought to St. Denis, and thence to Corvey. He is commemorated on June 15.
VOLTAIRE, b. in Paris, Nov. 21, 1694; d. there May 30, 1778. His true name was François Marie Arouet, to which he added in 1718, but from reasons not known, de Voltaire, which occurs among his maternal ancestors.

Voltaire was educated by the Jesuits in Collège Louis-le-Grand in Paris, where he learnt "nothing but Latin and nonsense," and was destined to study law. But his natural talent, no less than the levity of his disposition, drew him with irresistible force into literary life,—the theatre, the pamphlet, the salons, etc., where the efforts were short, and the triumphs rapid. He had wit, taste, a wonderful talent for turning every thing into verse, and a still more wonderful talent for dropping innuendoes, malicious or lewd, according to circumstances. He wrote small poems, satirical or complimentary, and said smart things at the supper-tables of dukes and abbés. In 1715 he obtained a diplomatic position as secretary to the French ambassador to Holland. But in The Hague he was most ridiculously taken in by a lady of semi-standing,—a certain Madame du Noyer, whose daughter he fell in love with, and tried to allure into an elopement. He was discharged, and sent back to Paris; and Madame du Noyer repaid herself for her troubles by publishing his love-letters. In 1717 he tried to obtain a pension for the study of the classics, but failed to obtain it. In 1717 some vicious lampoons on the regent and the Duchess of Berri were generally ascribed to him, and brought him to the Bastille, where he spent eleven months. But, soon after his release, his first tragedy, Elyshe, was brought on the stage with great success; and the success was followed up with still greater energy. The Henriade, a large epic on Henry IV., which he had begun in the Bastille, he printed, though he had not succeeded in obtaining the approbation of the royal censor, and it at once made his fame and his fortune. But Voltaire's ambition was always a little ahead of his powers, his impertinence a little ahead of his wit. Arménise failed completely; Mariamne, partially; and one afternoon the Chevalier de Kohan, in order to avenge himself for some insolent repartee, had him beaten in the street by his footmen. Voltaire challenged him; but an hour after he was put in the Bastille, and released only on the condition that he immediately should leave for England.

From 1726 to 1729 he resided in London; and the acquaintance with English character and institutions, English literature and philosophy, exercised a great influence on him. It sobered down his temper a little; it gave him some respect for a solid argument; it developed his sense for practical results. He was much struck by the Newtonian construction of the universe. He studied Newton's works with great patience, for they lay, properly speaking, outside of his range; and by his Éléments de la philosophie de Newton (1738), and La métaphysique de Newton (1740), he contributed much to make the views of Newton acceptable, not only in France, but on the European continent in general. From Locke he derived his whole psychology; from the English Deists, the metaphysical substructure of his general system of philosophy; from English history and institutions, his social and political ideas. There is a direct and demonstrable connection between the revolution of 1789 and his Lettres sur les Anglais, one of the brightest and most characteristic of his polemical writings. On his return to France in 1729, he soon found out that Paris was still an unsafe place for him to live in,—his Lettres had been publicly burnt by order of the Parliament as subversive to the State, the Church, public morality, etc.; and from 1734 to 1749 he made his home chiefly at Cirey, in the house of Madame du Châtelet, a lady for whose mathematical and philosophical talent he felt great respect, and for whose person he seems to have nourished a real feeling of tenderness; at least, he could for her sake sacrifice a good deal of his comfort, and not a little of his vanity. During this period he wrote some of his best tragedies,—Zaïre, Alzire, Mémé, Mérope; two of his great historical works, Charles XII. and Siècle de Louis XIV., a score or more of polemical pamphlets, witty, malicious, indecent to an incredible degree; and an astonish ing number of letters to all the most prominent persons in Europe. At the middle of the eighteenth century he stood as the greatest literary celebrity which the European civilization ever had produced, far exceeding Erasmus both in fame and power. And when, in 1750, he set out for Berlin, on the invitation of Friedrich II., it was not a pensioner threading his way to the table of his patron, but the king of the sword inviting him to visit the king of the sword. Voltaire and Friedrich admired each other. But Voltaire admired in Friedrich only the general, and Friedrich wanted to be admired as a poet; while, in Voltaire, Friedrich admired only the poet, and Voltaire wanted to be admired as a statesman. Ludicrous conflicts arose, almost from the hour of their first meeting, and soon the conflicts grew into a continuous warfare. At last Voltaire took to flight, 1753; but Friedrich pursued him, and had him actually arrested at Frankfort. All Europe was ringing with laughter. The friendship, natural and necessary between those two men, served only to show to all the world what there was in them of weakness and vice, of frailty and fraud.

The last part of his life Voltaire spent at Ferney, an estate he bought in the canton of Gex, conveniently situated near the Swiss frontier; and during this period some of the best features of his personal character came to light. There were forty-six miserable peasants at Ferney when he bought the estate; when he died, there were twelve hundred well-to-do inhabitants engaged in watch-making, silk-weaving, etc., and it was he who built their houses, bought their tools, sold their goods, etc. His defence of Jean Calas shows a courage and perseverance which are most admirable, and contributed more than many volumes could have done to convince people that religious toleration is necessary, not only for the development of truth, but for the very existence of good morals. But his writings and among them are some of his most prominent works: Essai sur les Mœurs et l'Esprit des Nations, Dictionnaire Philosophique, etc.—show that his polemical passion had become intensified almost to the bursting-point.
that his whole mental energy had concentrated itself around the famous motto, Ecrasez l'infâme, with which he ended every letter he sent to his friends. L'infâme meant, originally, the Roman-Catholic Church, then any church which has the support of the State for the enforcement of its doctrines and discipline, and finally it came to mean all religion, so far as it claims a supernatural origin. On this point his hatred is insatiable. It pervades all his writing, from Candide and Le Diner du comte de Boullineuliers to La Pucelle and L'Orpheline de la Chine; and in his minor pamphlets, newspaper-articles, letters, etc., it drags him not only below his dignity, but beneath decency. His own time, however, did not think so. When he went up to Paris in 1778, he was received with such enthusiasm and such ovations as the world had hardly ever seen before. But the excitement thereby produced was too much for his strength: he fell ill, took too big a dose of opium, and died in delirium.

Voltaire made his mark in literature as a poet. His Zaave, Mahomet, and Mérope were considered the tragedies of tragedy. When the three well-known premises of Deism: God, the three well-known premises of Deism: God, the three well-known premises of Deism: God, and God there was no trace; and, what is still worse, he did not understand that such a relation could truly exist. Whenever he met it, he felt inclined to attack it, no matter under what form it presented itself,—Judaism, Romanism, Protestantism, etc.; and of his general conception of God he often spoke with an undercurrent of cold indifference, illuminated now and then with sparks of cynicism, which, to men of strongly marked religious disposition, have made his works an outrage, an abomination. The world, on the contrary, was a very serious affair to Voltaire, and a thing he understood. He was a critic of the very highest rank. His instinct of truth was wonderfully sharp and vivid. He smelt a sham mile away; and he could make enormous exertions and submit to exasperating annoyances, in order to hunt it down. With that instinct he combined at never ceasing to press on. Not that his wit is always enjoyable. In the service of the vanity, envy, and malice, and used to cover up deliberations falsehoods and lies, it is often shocking. But the directness, clearness, and precision of his statement of a fact or an idea has still more often made truth irresistible; and without entering into the details of his activity, his victories, and his defeats, it may be generally said that his criticism developed in modern literature a sense for which there is simple, natural, and clear. His best service was in the case of the Protestant Claims (see art). Outside of France, however, his works, his ideas, his influence, have ceased to act as a living spring. The waters have dried up. And, even within the bounds of French civilization, Voltaireism is an active power only as battling with Jacobinism; the one or the other giving its color to the events, according as anarchism or despotism has the upper hand.

Lit. — Collected editions of Voltaire's works, as well as separate editions of his tragedies, histories, letters, etc., are very numerous: the latest and most complete of the collected editions is that of Paris, 1834, in 7 vols. The chief facts of his life are easily accessible, though not always uncontroversial. Condorcet was his first biographer (1787); James Parton (Life of Voltaire, Boston, 1881. 2 vols.), the latest and the best. The more obscure facts of his life, his relation to Madame du Châtelet, to the Berlin Jew bank, etc., have been treated in a great number of special essays, but generally without any definite result. What might be called the anecdotes of his life, more or less authentic, but very instructive and impressive, are given in Bunge: Voltaire et son temps, Paris, 1851; and Janin: Le roi Voltaire, Paris, 1861, 3d ed. General surveys of his life, character, and influence, have been given by Pierson, Carlyle, Straus, and Morley.

VORAGINE. See Jacobus de Voragine.

VORSTIUS, Conrad, Arminian theologian, b. at Cologne, July 19, 1569; d. at Tomningen, in Sleewick, Sept. 29, 1622. His parents were Roman Catholics; but he was refused the degree in the college of St. Laurentius in his native city, be cause he would not subscribe to the Confession of Trent; and soon after he openly embraced the Reformation. He distinguished himself as a student and lecturer in Heidelberg, Basel, and Leyden; was first rector of the college of Dort, then of that of Leyden; and succeeded in having him expelled from Leyden. Vorstius settled at Tergow, but the controversy continued to rage. He was condemned by the synod of Dort as a heretic, and banished from the States, 1618. For a couple of years he kept himself concealed, but finally he found a refuge in Sleswick.

VOSSIUS, Gerard, Provost of Tongern, papal prothonotary; d. at Liège, March 25, 1609; acquired a great reputation by his Latin translation of the sermons of Chrysostom, 1580, and his ed. of the Gesta et monumenta (gregorii IX., 1586, of the works of Gregorius Thaumaturgus and Epiphanius Syrus, 1589, of St. Bernard's De consideratione (with commentary), 1594, etc. Of his personal life nothing further is known.

VOSSIUS, Gerard Jan, b. near Heidelberg, 1577; d. in Amsterdam, March 19, 1649. He studied at Dort and Leyden; was first rector of the college of Dort, then of that of Leyden; and was in 1618 appointed professor of rhetoric and chronology at Leyden, and in 1633 professor of history in Amsterdam. He was originally a pupil of Vorstius, but in the course of the controversy he gradually approached the other side. In 1618 he published his Historia de controversiis quas Pelagius ejusque religia moverunt, in which he showed that Arminianism was not identical with Semi-Pelagianism, and that the Calvinist doctrine of predestination was unknown to the ancient church. Persuaded of the errors of Vorstius, he left him, and continued; though his De historias latinas, 1627, contained a partial recantation.

VOTIVE-OFFERINGS consisted sometimes in objects of value, sometimes simply in tablets, which were placed in the temples as a thankful commemoration of some happy event or some great man. From the Greek-Roman Paganism, the custom was adopted by the Christians; and votive-tablets in the Christian churches are spoken of in the fifth century by Bishop Theodoret of Cyrus. As the worship of saints extended, the churches were crowded with votive-offerings, and in the Roman-Catholic Church the custom has not yet died out. Voltaire's brother placed a votive-tablet in the church in Paris in which Voltaire had been baptized, to expiate his infidelity.

VOWS. The conception of a personal God who has a will as well as the power, and the personal relation which necessarily springs up between God and man on the basis of this conception, naturally call forth the ideas of offers to God. The offer of himself at Heidelberg against the accusation of Socinianism. In 1610 he was appointed the successor of Arminius in the university of Leyden; but on account of his Tractatus de Deo, published in the same year, and containing many peculiar subtleties concerning the nature and attributes of God, his appointment was met with a violent protest by the Gomarists. James I. of England was drawn into the controversy, and made umpire among the contestants. He condemned Vorstius, and succeeded in having him expelled from Leyden. Vorstius settled at Tergow, but the controversy continued to rage. He was condemned by the synod of Dort as a heretic, and banished from the States, 1618. For a couple of years he kept himself concealed, but finally he found a refuge in Sleswick.

The New Testament gives no direct advice with respect to vows. The Gospels contain only the one sharp utterance from the lips of Jesus concerning gifts to the temple when accompanied with neglect of parents (Matt. xv. 4; Mark vii. 10). The apostolical Epistles are completely silent on the question; and from Acts xxii. 23 (see Nazaretes) and xviii. 13 no positive doctrine can be extracted. The latter passage is, however, very obscure: it seems to refer to Aquila, and not at all to Paul. Thus the question, What position ought to be given to vows in true Christian morality? cannot be answered from the letter of Scripture. The answer must be deduced from the general principles of morality such as they have been laid down in the New Testament, and developed in Christian conscience. But on this point a striking difference reveals itself between the evangelical churches and the Church of Rome.

The idea that the pious feels driven in his conscience to present offerings to his God has not only been recognized by Christianity, but in Christianity it has attained its most extensive bearing and its deepest meaning. For what is the offering which Christianity demands? Nothing less than the person himself, his whole life, all his will (comp. Rom. vi. 11, 13, vii. 4, xii 1; Gal. ii. 20; 2 Cor. v. 10). In this general, expanded sense, the promise made at baptism, and renewed at confirmation, is certainly a vow. But the vow in the narrower and more proper sense of the word, defining the offering as something special, and not due, the evangelical churches do not recognize. Luther, no less than Calvin, held that whatsoever degree of devotion to God a person was able to realize in his life, it was simply his duty, and implicitly contained in his baptismal promise. Quite otherwise in the Roman-Catholic Church. Beside the common morality to which all Christians are bound by the commandment of God, she establishes another and higher morality, which is not a divine commandment, and consequently not a moral duty, but which may become an object of a vow.

The Roman-Catholic view of a vow is closely connected with the Roman-Catholic doctrines of Consiliae evangeliæ, Opera supererogationis, and Bonum melius. From Petrus Lombardus, who, however, made a distinction between a votum singulare and the votum commune made at baptism, and down to our time, the Roman-Catholic Church had always defined a vow as a voluntary promise to God of a bonum melius. Classical in this respect is the exposition of Thomas Aquinas (Summa, ii. 2, qu. 88): a vow, strictly speaking, distinguished from the baptismal promise, which is necessary to salvation (fit le bono meliori, dicitur melius bonum quod ad supererogationem pertinet). The bonum melius here appears as synonymous with opus supererogatorium, and Thomas actually defines it as something beyond that which is necessary to salvation, though it is evident that the bonum melius refers exclusively to some special virtues,—poverty, obedience, chastity; while an opus supererogatorium may result also from doing more than is necessary in the ordinary line of morality.

VOWS AMONG THE HEBREWS. Vows (D'nr, "nedarim") are solemn promises to God, on condition of his granting some benefit, to make an offering in return. The passages in the Pentateuch giving information about them are Lev. xxvii. and Num. xxx. There is no sufficient reason for denying the high antiquity of this practice (Gen. xxviii. 20–22), and the historical books of the Old Testament, the Psalms, and the writings of the Salomonic period, show how prevalent it was in Israel. Vows included persons, animals, and other possessions. Persons, however, were always to be redeemed according to their estimated value. The redemption-price differed according to the age and sex of the person, except in the case of the poor, where it was estimated according to their property. The votive-offerings had the character of compulsory offerings, and differed in this regard from the freewill gifts. Amongst the votive-offerings were the acts of renunciation or abstinence; such as fasting and the obligations of the Nazarite. It is characteristic of the moral tone of the Mosaic legislation, that it excludes all unnatural mortification, such as self-nutrition and other injuries to the body, which were reasons for exclusion from the theocratic congregation (Deut. xxiii. 1; comp. Lev. xix. 18).

The practice of vows corresponds to the condition of minority under the law, but the Mosaic legislation lays no particular stress upon it. "If thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee" (Deut. xxiii. 22). Nowhere is the vow spoken of as meritorious, nor is there any indication that God was regarded as granting requests with reference to or because of the vows. The motive actuating them was insisted upon (Ps. lxvi. 13 sqq., lxxvi. 11 sqq.; Mal. i. 14), and the inviolability of the promise was insisted upon (Num. xxx. 2; Deut. xxiii. 21 sqq.). To the simple injunctions of the Old Testament, the Mishna, in the tract Nedarim, adds many rules, which it supports by casuistry, laying particular emphasis upon the language in which they are made. Korban ("it is devoted to God as an offering") was the usual votive-word; and our Lord, in speaking of it (Matt. xv. 5; Mark vii. 11), assumes that a son by its use might even rid himself of the obligation to support his parents. Such cases happened, as is evident from Nedarim, v. 6. De Wette goes too far, when, in commenting upon Matt. xv. 5, he says with reference to Nedarim, ix. 1, "Rabbi Elieser held the law of reverence for parents higher than all vows; but the rabbins declared vows against this law binding." The Mishna does not declare offerings and duties to God arbitrarily assumed, and militating against the law of love, unbinding and worthless. It is, however, true, that the traditional observances condemned by our Lord, the Mishna also disproves. Christianity was not without influence upon Judaism.

WACKENAGEL, Karl Eduard Philipp, D.D., German hymnologist; b. at Berlin, June 28, 1800; d. at Dresden, June 20, 1877. He was educated at Erlangen. His reputation rests upon his editions of the hymns of Martin Luther and Paul Gerhard, and his hymnological publications,—

WADDELL, James, D.D., eminent Presbyterian blind pulpit orator; b. at Newry, Ireland, July 1739; d. at Hopewell, Louisa County, Va., Sept. 17, 1805. His parents emigrated to Pennsylvania while he was an infant. He was educated in Dr. Finley's academy at Nottingham, Penn.; licensed by presbytery of Hanover, April 2, 1761; ordained, June 16, 1762; pastor in Lancaster and Northumberland, Va. He subsequently held other charges. His eloquence was renowned. But by his own request all his manuscripts were burned, so that his reputation rests upon testimony alone. He was blind for the last twenty years of his life. He was the father-in-law of Dr. Archibald Alexander. Wirt gives a picture of him in his British Spy. See Sprague's Annals, iii. 255 sqq.

WADDINGTON, George, D.D., b. in England, Sept. 7, 1793; d. at Durham, July 20, 1869. He was elected fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; then travelled extensively in the East; was installed dean of Durham, 1840, and in the following year became first warden of the university of Durham. Besides books of travel in Ethiopia, in connection with Barnard Hanbury (1822), and Greece, during the Greek Revolution (1825), he wrote History of the Church from the Earliest Ages to the Reformation (1833, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1835), and History of the Reformation on the Continent, 1841.

WAFFER, the small circular disk of unleavened bread, stamped either with the figure of Christ or with the initials I.U.S., and used in the celebrated Mass of the Roman-Catholic Church. In form it resembles the Jewish passover bread. The wafer eaten by the priest is larger than that given to the laity. It is supposed that the use of the wafer is not earlier than the eleventh century; previously, ordinary bread was generally used. See art. "Oblaten," in Wetzer u. Weite.

WAGENSEI1L, Johann Christoph, b. at Nuremberg, Nov. 26, 1833; d. at Altdorf, Oct. 9, 1875, where he had been professor since 1867,—first of history, next of Oriental languages (1874), and finally of ecclesiastical law (1875). He wrote the famous works, Sata a e. liber Mischnicus de uxore adulterii spectans, Altdorf, 1874 (a translation, with notes, of the Mishna tractate upon the treatment of a wife suspected of adultery), and extra ignes Salana, sive, arcant et horribiles Judentum urbem Christum Deum et Christianum religionem libri, Altdorf, 1861 (a translation and refutation, in Latin, of certain anti-Christian Jewish writings).

WAHABEES, the representatives of a reformatory movement which arose within Mohammedianism in the middle of the eighteenth century. The movement, which may be characterized as a Mohammedan rationalism, accepting the Koran as authoritative, but rejecting the worship of Mohammed as idolatry, originated in the tribe of Nedshi in Yemen, and was named, after its originator, Mohammed-ben-Abd-el-Wahab. At the beginning of the present century the Wahabees reached the culminating point of their power. In 1802 they occupied Mecca, and compelled the Turks to pay a yearly tribute in order to be allowed to enter it as pilgrims; and in 1805 they even threatened Cairo, and invaded Syria. But in 1812 Mehmet Ali invaded Arabia; and in 1818 his son, Ibrahim Pasha, sent Abdallah, the head of the Wahabees, to Constantinople to be executed. Politically their power is now nearly confined to their native tribe in Yemen.

archbishops, the Church of Lyons held the most prominent position in Gaul, exhibiting in its history many grand examples — Agobard, Amolo, etc., of the true type of ancient Catholicism; and in that point there were many who agreed with him. They gave away their property to the poor, and began to preach publicly in the city. They preached in the streets, in the houses, even in the churches, and they produced a deep impression. The church took fright, and the archbishop finally forbade them to preach. They protested, refused to obey, and were expelled from the city. Taking their wives and children with them, they set out on a preaching-mission, and scattered all over the southern part of France, where the soil had been well prepared for them, partly by the Cathari, and partly by the notorious insufficiency and immorality of the priests. Travelling two and two together, clad in woollen penitence-garments, with bare feet or wooden shoes (sahoi, or zabate, whence they were often called subatait, subatenses, etc.), they penetrated into Switzerland and Northern Italy, well received everywhere as the poor Waldenses from Lyons. There was, however, as yet, no breach with the church. The Waldenses were not conscious of any decisive difference between themselves and the church. When they were expelled from Lyons, they appealed to the third council of the Lateran (1179), and by Alexander III. they were treated with great leniency; but, as they would not stop preaching, they were put under the ban by Lucius III. (1184), and the measure was repeated by the fourth council of the Lateran, under Innocent III. (1215). Conflicts arose: and in some places, as, for instance, in Aragonia, under Alfonso II. (1184), very harsh proceedings were instituted against them; but in other places a spirit of reconciliation prevailed, not without prospects of good results. At the religious disputation of Pamiers (1207), between the bishop of Osma and a number of Waldenses, a certain Durandus of Huesca or Osca, a Waldensian, was induced to rejoin the church, together with his friends, on the condition that they should be allowed to retain the austere rule of life which they had adopted from the Waldenses. In 1209 Innocent III. gave his consent, and thus arose the so-called "Catholic Poor" (pauperes catholici). Similar movements occurred in other places; and, generally speaking, the Waldenses had an aversion to the Cathari and their heresies, which formed a bond of union between them and the church. But the state of affairs which at this time developed in Southern France — the crusades against the Albigenenses, instituted by the Pope himself, and executed by Louis IX., Friedrich II., Raymund VII., etc.; the foundation of the Inquisition by Gregory IX. in 1222; and the establishment of the Dominican order as perpetual papal inquisitors — finally exercised its influence also on them. The Council of Toulouse (1229) forbade laymen to read the Bible, whether in Latin or in the vernacular tongue; and the Council of Tarragona (1294) extended the prohibition to the clergy. Under such circumstances the Waldenses could not help becoming aware of the very sharp differences between themselves and the church, involved in their very first principles; and they were thus forced into a position of open antagonism with respect to the church. Excluded from the ruling church by the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215, they were by no means willing to continue to be excluded from the true church. Nor were they willing to represent themselves as the true church, and the Church of Rome as a mere fraud. But they claimed to be the true and sound kernel of the church general; and they protested that the perversion of the Church of Rome began with Pope Sylvester when he accepted riches and worldly power from Constantine the Great.

Doctrine and Discipline. — It was a great informing idea of the Waldensian Church, no less than its relation to the ruling church, made the formation of an order of preachers, and their complete education, an affair of paramount importance. The preachers, who were called perfecti, in contradistinction from the merely credentes ("faithful"), lived in poverty and celibacy. After due preparation and instruction, they were subjected to an examination concerning the fundamental articles of faith (such as contained in the Apostles' Creed), the principal points of difference with respect to the Cathari, the seven sacraments, etc. When possible, they referred to such distinctions. But, according to other accounts, the Waldenses held that every "good man" could, without any charge from any human hand, legitimately perform all the offices of a priest, even administer the Lord's Supper (conficiere corpus Christi). After the example of the seventy disciples, the preachers were sent out two and two. In order to escape the notice of the priests, they used various disguises, introducing themselves as tinkers, peddlers, etc. They carried books with them — parts of the Bible translated into Romant, devotional treatises consisting of extracts from the Fathers, misthomi, or poetical exhortations of moral import, etc. When possible, they gathered the faithful to service in secluded places: if not, they visited them in the families, preaching to them, hearing their confessions (which were made auricular, and in a kneeling position), and giving them absolution. Generally some penance (meliortamentum), consisting of prayers, fasts, and alms, was added to the absolution, but only in the form of advice. There were, however, congregations among the Waldenses which considered prayer to God as the only confession and penance necessary. The moral teaching was very austere; its object being to penetrate human life in all its details with the principles of Christianity, and make it holy. The whole system was based upon a radical and uncompromising distinction between good and evil: there are only two ways, — one leading to heaven, and the other to hell. The doctrines of purgation, of purgatory and all doctrines connected with it, — masses, alms, prayers for the dead, etc., — they rejected. Certain commandments of the Gospels they enforced literally for the dead, etc., — they rejected. Certain commandments of the Gospels they enforced literally and with the utmost rigor. All swearing was forbidden. In consequence of Matt. vii. 1, "Judge not, that ye be not judged," they denied the right of civil authorities to inflict capital punishment. And Catari priests were a deadly sin. Nevertheless, the right to punish those who deviated from the church; for it was in the character of the church to be persecuted, not to persecute. With respect to the saints, they taught to reverence them, and always keep them before the mind's eye as examples, but not to worship them or pray to them. With respect to the sacraments it is certain that the Waldenses had their children baptized by the Roman-Catholic priests, and that no kind of baptismal act was performed by the admission into the sect. It seems, however, from the answer of Bucer to G. Morel (1530), that their coming into contact with Anabaptists caused them some uneasiness on this point. The Lord's Supper the faithful took in the Roman-Catholic Church, with the permission of their preachers. After the excommunication, the preachers themselves administered the sacrament; but as the Waldenses believed that the transubstantiation took place, not in the hand of the priest, but in the mouth of the communicant, there was no reason why they should not receive the Eucharist from the Roman-Catholic priest. It must not be overlooked, however, that the consequences of the principles from which the Waldenses started reached much further than has been generally supposed, and that, consequently, their doctrinal system became differently developed in different places and under different circumstances. Thus it seems very improbable, in spite of their aversion to the Cathari, that they should in no wise have been influenced by them. Many features of organization and discipline, and many points of doctrinal and moral teaching, were common to both parties; and everywhere the Cathari practiced a deadly sin. Nevertheless, as expressly of the Waldenses, that, after their excommunication, they became much mixed up with other heretics. And he states, that in 1230 there were Waldenses in Lyons, who in many points agreed with the Brethren of the Free Spirit, — a remark which is so much the more noticeable as traces of such an amalgamation are met with among the Waldenses. The Waldenses also had houses in Florence. They arose against the inquisitor Albert; they killed the priest of Angrogne; and in 1376 they even killed an inquisitor. In 1403 the Waldenses in Lombardy, in Montferrat, and in the diocese of Turin, were visited by the celebrated preacher Vincentius Ferrerius. He found the inhabitants of the Valley of Angrogne, "the most neglecting of all laymen, the most impious of all clergy." For a period of thirty years they had been visited only twice a year by Waldensian preachers from Apulia. He succeeded in leading a number of them back into the Church of Rome, but most of them remained faithful. In 1475 new persecutions were instituted by Duchess Iolanthia of Savoy; and, a few years later on, Pope Innocent VIII. waged actual war upon them, sending an army of ten thousand men against them under his legate, Albert de Capitanes. Duke Philip VII. took them under his protection, and granted them some privileges; but in 1500 they were again persecuted. On the western slopes of the Cottian Alps, the Waldenses were generally confounded with the Cathari, and suffered immensely in consequence thereof. In 1335 Benedict XII. exorted the bishops of Valence and Vienne to eradicate the sect altogether. In 1360, however, a considerable number of Waldenses came from Piedmont into Provence, and settled at Cabrieres, Merindol, and other places in the neighborhood. As they were excellent agriculturists, they were well received and protected by the feudal lords of the land; and, as they externally belonged to the Church of Rome, Louis XII. granted them certain privileges by an edict of 1475. In 1492. Emigrants from the Cottian Alps settled, in the beginning of the fourteenth century, in Calabria, and founded the villages of St. Sixt. Argentina, La Rocca, Vaccarissino, and Guardia. In 1400 a new emigration took place, this time to Apulia, where the villages of Monilone, Montanlo, Fabio, La Cella, and La Motta, were founded by the Waldenses. Genoa, Venice. At various times they appear to have been very numerous in Berne, Strassburg, Passau, etc. In the last-mentioned place they attracted attention by refusing to pay tithes, and by rejecting monasticism, infant baptism, exorcism, and the sacrament of confirmation. When the reformatory movement began in Bohemia, they naturally were attracting by their doctrines, and their connection with the Bohemian Brethren became a turning-point in their history. In 1467 the Brethren entered into negotiations with a Waldensian congregation settled in Austria; but the Roman-Catholic clergy became aware of what was going on, and frustrated all attempts at a union. More successful were the Brethren in their ad... dress to the Waldenses settled in the Mark: a union was actually effected. In 1497 a connection was established between the Brethren and the Waldenses in Piedmont. In that year two Brethren—Lucas of Prague, author of the Bohemian Catechism, and Thomas of Landskron—were sent out, with letters of recommendation from King Wenceslaw and the Bohemian barons, to the kings and princes and authorities in Italy and France, for the purpose of investigating the state of all dissenting parties in those countries. They found Waldenses everywhere, even in Rome itself, and brought back two letters from them, one to the king and the barons, and one to the Utraquist ministers, drawn up by Thomas de fonte citulcis. Thus, at the opening of the period of the Reformation, there were numerous Waldensian settlements on the Cottian Alps, in Naples, and in Provence around Cabrières and Merindol, besides scattered congregations in Italy, Switzerland, France, and England; and they were members of the Roman-Catholic Church, and enjoyed peace; but, as appears from the confessions of G. Morel, their internal state, religious and moral, had at that time fallen below the original standard of the party.

First Period of Literature. — The Waldenses had a literature almost from their very origin. The manuscripts of this literature are chiefly found at Geneva, Cambridge, and Dublin; though single works may also be found at Grenoble, Zurich, and Paris. Of special interest is the collection at Cambridge. It was made by Morland, who in 1583 was sent to Piedmont by Cromwell. On his return he deposited the manuscripts in the university library of Cambridge; but, shortly after, they disappeared, and they were generally considered as lost, until in 1682 they were rediscovered by Mr. Bradshaw. (See H. Bradshaw: On the Recovery of the Long-lost Waldensian Manuscripts, in the memoirs of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, March 10, 1862, No. XVII.; and Groome: The Long-lost Waldensian Manuscripts, in the Christian Advocate and Review, January, 1883, No. 23.) The language in which this literature is written is the Romana, a peculiar idiom, existing in part on the one side from that of the Troubadours, on the other from that of the Consolamentum of the Cathari, and their translation of the New Testament. As no other monuments of the Romana idiom have come down to us, it seems to have been confined within rather narrow geographical boundaries, and every thing points to the western slopes of the Cottian Alps as its home. It is nearly identical with that employed by G. Morel, in his Miracles, and Morel was a native of Fraisimères in Dauphiné, and active as a preacher among the Waldenses of Merindol, Cabrières, and other places in Provence; but it differs considerably from that employed in the decree of the synod of Angrogne (1532), which approached very closely to the Italian. The oldest writings of the Waldenses are translations from Scripture and from the Fathers. The translation of the texts of the Old Testament is complete: but of the Old only the five libri septenitaes—Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Wisdom of Solomon, and Ecclesiasticus—have been translated. Of the manner in which they made extracts and translations from the Fathers, the Vergi de Consolacion, or "Garden of Comfort," is a good specimen, employing with considerable adroitness the words of the great fathers and teachers of the church for the defence of the peculiar Waldensian maxims. The remaining prose literature consists of sermons, treatises, and commentaries, of which especially that on the Canticles is of interest. Among the poetical productions the Nobla Leycto (from the Latin lectio, "a portion of Scripture," "an oration") occupies the most prominent place. It is an exhortation to repentance, virtue, good works, etc., carefully avoiding the false manner ofquieting conscience employed by the church, and powerfully inculcating the Waldensian principles on the various fields of morality. It dates from the fifteenth century. La paix eternal is a sublime hymn of praise to the Trinity: La barca, La novel confort, etc., are chiefly of moral character. In the beginning of the sixteenth century, however, that is, between the visit of the two missionaries from the Bohemian Brethren to Piedmont in 1497, and the first communication between the Waldenses of Provence and the Swiss and German Reformers, the Waldensian literature took a new departure under Bohemian auspices. The very answers which the Waldenses sent back to King Wenceslaw and the Utraquist ministers, and still more a little original treatise on Antichrist, dating from the same time, show the great commotion which the visit of the Bohemians had produced among them. The Waldensian Catechism (Las interrogaciones menores) was drawn up upon the model of the Bohemian, though containing many features of its own; and a number of treatises on the sacraments, the decalogue, purgatory, worship of the saints, fasts, etc., were translated, or adapted from the Bohemian. The influence of this whole movement was immense: the idea of a complete separation from the Roman-Catholic Church became more familiar to the Waldenses. The biblical principle, that the ordinance of Christ is sufficient to salvation without the ceremonies of the old dispensation, and without the right of modern but merely human institution, was more precisely defined. The doctrine of transubstantiation became hollow, and was dropped. All the doctrines assumed the aspect of being mere human invention, and was warmly contested. The worship of saints and the doctrine of purgatory were peremptorily rejected as opposed to Scripture, etc. Thus the acquaintance with the Bohemian Brethren, no less than the fundamental Waldensian principle, to study the Bible, and make it the rule of life, led the Waldenses directly to the Reformation.

Relation to the Reformation. — In 1530 the Waldenses settled on the French side of the Cottian Alps, sent George Morel and Pierre Masson (Bucer calls him Pierre Lathom) to the Swiss and German Reformers to lay before them an account of the moral and religious state of the congregations, and to ask explanation of certain doubled points of doctrine and discipline. The two emissaries first visited Neuenburg, Murten, and Bern, and then Basel, where Ecclampadius was teaching, and Strassburg, where Bucer and Capito lived. Fortunately, quite extensive documents concerning this mission have come down to us: the address of Morel to Ecclampadius, and the answer of the latter in Scultetus. Annates, pp.

295-315; two more letters from (Ecolampadius, in (Ec. et Zwinr/lii epistolarum libit I V., Basel, 153(5 ; Martini liuceri responsiones ad questtones, etc., in the university library of Strassburg; and the Memoirs of Morel, written in Komaunt, and preserved at Dublin. Morel presented a confes sion of faith, which, in harmony with the old Waldensian articles de la fe, professes belief in the twelve articles of the Apostle's Creed, the Trinity, and the divinity of Christ; rejects the worship of saints with their festivals and vigils, the doctrine of purgatory, holy water, fasts, and the mass ; defines the sacraments as holy symbols, visible tokens of an invisible grace ; and finally recommends auricular confession as something useful. To this confession were added no less than forty-seven questions : whether there were only two sacraments, or, as the Roman Catholics gay, seven; whether the suffering of Christ referred to hereditary sin only, as the Roman theologians said, or also to actual sin ; which were the canoni cal books of the Bible, and which not; whether the allegorical interpretation of Holy Writ — one of the main supports of the Church of Rome, and hitherto much used by the W'aldenses themselves — was of any use ; whether of the words, of Christ, some were only meant for advice (consilia), while others were direct commandments, etc. In speaking of the sacraments which the W'aldenses continued to take from the hands of the RomanCatholic priests, it is evident that Morel never thought of a complete separation from the Church of Rome ; and from several other passages it appears that the Waldenses had read the De libero arbitrio of Erasmus and the De servo arbilrio of Luther, but without arriving at any definite result.
Nor was their conviction settled with respect to the new doctrine of justification by faith. On all these points the Reformers gave the two emissa ries open and clear answers ; and (Ecolampadius specially emphasized the necessity of complete separation from the Church of Rome. On their return, Masson was seized at Dijon, and decapi tated; but Morel succeeded in reaching Merindol, and laid his Memoirs before the congregation.
The impression was very deep, and it was immedi ately decided to convene a synod, to which should be invited some of the most distinguished and most experienced preachers of Apulia and Calabria, and some of the most prominent of the Reformed theo logians. The synod assembled at Chanforans, a village in the Valley of Angrogne, Sept. 12, 1532.
Farel and Saunier were present. It lasted five days. The most important of its decrees are, a Christian may swear by the name of God ; no work is good but that which is commanded by God, and no work is bad but that which is forbid den by God, the rest being indifferent; auricular confession is not commanded by God; a Chris tian is not forbidden to refrain from working on .Sundays; the external word is not necessary in prayer, nor the bent knee, the bowed head, the fixed hour; laying on of hands is not necessary ;
the Christian is not bound to fast at fixed terms;
no one is forbidden to marry; to him who has not the gift of abstinence, marriage is a duty; it is not absolutely forbidden by God to take inter creation of the world; he who asserts the exist ence of freewill denies the predestination and grace of God, etc. The difference between these decrees and the original Waldensian faith is very striking. The instructions of (Ecolampadius-and Bucer are everywhere visible. The last proposi tions concerning predestination are, no doubt, due to Earel. Remarkable is the total absence of strictly dogmatical propositions; but already the Bohemian Brethren had noticed the aversion of the Waldenses to doctrinal expositions and formal creeds. Remarkable is also the complete silence concerning one of the most important points, at least from a practical point of view, — the sepa ration from the Church of Rome. Probably this omission was due to a cautious regard to a minority of the synod, which was frightened by the great innovations. Representatives of that "minority shortly after repaired to Bohemia, where the Reformation had produced a similar movement, and caused the formation of a corre sponding minority, the so-called Pseudo-Hussita.

Several letters were exchanged between Bohemia and Piedmont; but a new synod of St. Martin (1533) broke off the negotiations, and confirmed the decrees of the synod of Angrogne.
Separation from the Church of Home, and Per secutions. — The separation from the Church of Rome was most rapidly effected among the French Waldenses. In 1535 the congregations of Prov ence numbered several thousand members, and presented to Francis I., their king, a confession of faith wholly reformed. But in 1545 a horrible persecution broke out : twenty-two villages were burnt down, four thousand persons were massa cred, and the congregations were all but destroyed.
About four thousand persons sought refuge in flight, and returned afterwards to their old abodes, but lived on in a pitiable state. In Dauphinc the persecution began in 1500, but was only of short duration. On the eastern side of the Cottian Alps the Reformation was more slow in its prog ress, but more successful in vindicating itself.
The territory which by the peace of Crespy (1544) came under French dominion was returned Ui Piedmont by the peace of Chateau-Canibresis (1559); and in 1500 Emanuel Philibert issued an order that none but Roman-Catholic preachers should be heard in the valleys; but, when he attempted to carry out the older by force, the Waldenses made armed resistance. They were victorious in the encounter; and by the peace oi Cavour (1501) they obtained freedom of worship within certain confines, — the valleys of St. Mar tin, Perosa, and Luserna. The agreement was not kept by the government; and in 1571 the Waldenses formed the so-called " Union of Val leys," by which they bound themselves to cling to the Reformed faith, and defend their religious independence. The Reformation also reached the Waldensiarucongregations in Calabria; and two evangelical preachers, Xegrin and Pascal, went thither as missionaries. But the movement was stopped with the most inhuman cruellv.
Men, women, and children were slaughtered indis criminately ; and the remainders were carried on board the Spanish galleys, or sold as slaves. Pas cal was burnt at the stake in Rome. Thus the valleys of Piedmont were, in fact, the only place where the Waldensian Church succeeded in main taining itself ; and it kept itself alive there for congregations were settled in Wurtemberg, at exile. About 2,600 settled in Geneva. The great office, nor to own real estate in Roman-Catholic submitted to a mock conversion: others went into employment against them; and, after a most heroic defence, they were compelled to surrender. Some were formed in the Palatinate, in Hesse, and in Nassau. But home-sickness led many of these emigrants to return; and after his entrance at Turin, May 20, 1814, Victor Emanuel issued an edict abolishing the constitution of the Waldensian Church, and putting in force once more the old restrictions and prohibitions. On the instance, however, of England and Prussia, he issued a milder edict of Feb. 7, 1816, according to which the Waldenses were allowed to practise as lawyers, physicians, architects, surveyors, etc.; and the Waldensian ministers were paid by the State. But the chicaneries of the Roman-Catholic clergy continued; and when Charles Albert ascended the throne, in 1831, the Jesuits nearly succeeded in effecting a revocation of the edict of 1816. The energetic protests, however, of Holland and Prussia, prevented the fatal blow from being struck; and after that time the internal and external development of the Waldensian Church has gone on smoothly, and without interruptions. In Turin a Protestant chapel was opened in the house of the Prussian embassy, and a Waldensian pastor was appointed preacher. In the valleys the Waldensian schools were greatly improved, especially by the exertions of Dr. Gilles and Col. Beckwith. At the synod of St. Jean, in April, 1839, the church-constitution was revised on the basis of the decrees of the synod of Angrogne. The highest legislative authority is the synod. It consists of all pastors in office, two laymen from each congregation (who, however, have only one vote), and all candidates of theology: but the last-mentioned have only a right to make propositions, without the right of voting. It assembles every five years; the place varying between the valleys of St. Martin, Perosa, and Luserna. Besides its legislative power, it also has the power of confirming the pastors elected by the congregations. The highest administrative authority is the Table ("board"), consisting of a moderator, who presides over the synod, a vice-moderator, a secretary, and two lay-members. The Table is appointed by the synod, and its term of office is five years. Every congregation has its own consistory, consisting of the pastor and the elders.


In 1848 the prospects of the Waldensian Church became very promising. Immediately after the promulgation of the new constitution, Charles Albert issued a letters-patent, declaring the Waldenses entitled to enjoy exactly the same social and political rights as his other subjects,—to frequent the schools and universities of the State, to acquire academical honors, etc.; and at the great national festival in Turin, in honor of the new constitution, the Waldenses were hailed with enthusiasm whenever they showed themselves. Since that time the persecuted church has been able to carry on propaganda, and her aspirations are not low. She wishes to be to Italy in religion what Piedmont has been in politics; and, even though her prospects of fulfilment are not so very alluring, she has, at all events, given a powerful impulse to the religious reform-movements in Italy. She has established prosperous missionary stations, not only in Piedmont, but also in other parts of Italy; and she maintains a good theological school in Florence. Outside of the valleys there are 41 Waldensian congregations, 34 missionary stations, and 150 insulated places visited by the itinerant preachers.

Second Period of Literature.— As it became of consequence to the Waldenses to prove, that, by adopting the Reformation, their faith had undergone no essential change, a kind of mythical view of the origin and history of their church gradually developed among them. The government wanted to expel them from their native valleys, on the plea that they had become heretics by adopting the Reformation; and they wanted to justify their resistance by protesting that they had always held the same faith, and always lived in the same valleys. But in order to throw back into antiquity the origin of their church, make the valleys of Piedmont its true cradle, and bring its doctrines before and after the Reformation into perfect harmony, it was necessary to subject their litigious disputes to certain manipulations. This was accordingly done, both in the field of doctrine and in that of history. Before the Reformation very few traces are found of an attempt to go behind Waldus, and date the foundation of the Waldensian Church back to antiquity. When the Waldenses spoke of themselves as the descendants of the primitive church, as the small flock, which, through manifold persecutions, had kept the true faith alive since the days of the apostles, this must, no doubt, be understood spiritually. Nevertheless, the myth sprang up, that the sect was formed in the time of Pope Sylvester, when the Church of Rome lost itself in worldly riches and secular business. And when George Morel openly contradicts himself by dating the foundation of the Waldensian Church, now in the twelfth century, and then again far back into antiquity, it is evident that all this time he had issued an historical knowledge and a popular opinion in conflict with each other. The latter became victorious. Perrin (Histoire des Vaudois, Geneva, 1819) and Gilles (Histoire ecclésiastique des églises réformées recueillies en quelques vallées de Piémont, Geneva, 1843) still speak of Waldus as the founder of the Waldensian Church; but the latter adds that Waldus, when he came to the valleys of Piedmont, found there a population holding exactly the same faith as he. Leger (Histoire générale des églises comtéguelles des vallées de Piémont ou Vaudois, Leyden, 1869) connects the Waldensian Church immediately with that of the apostles; and Brez (Histoire des Vaudois, Paris, 1796) even makes the apostle Paul the founder. With respect to doctrine, it was quite natural that the Waldenses, when they became interested by the Reformation, should direct their attention on those points of their doctrinal system which were in harmony with the teachings of the Reformers, and overlook or forget those numerous accommodations which had made it possible for them to remain within the pale of the Roman-Catholic Church. Thus an unconscious transformation began, which finally ended in conscious falsification. An instance of the former occurs in the Union of Valleys of 1571, which shows the distinction between the canonical and the apocryphal books of the Bible, and fixes the number of sacraments to two, but, nevertheless, calls itself "the faith of our fathers." An instance of the latter may be found in the Memoirs of George Morel, in which the R. B. (Responsio Bucer) have been struck out, and the words of Bucer, that is, the doctrines of the Reformers, incorporated with the text of the doctrines of the Waldenses. Facsimiles of this kind were first accepted by Perrin. In his above-mentioned work of 1819 he gives the confession which Morel laid before Ecolampadius and Bucer, and in which some of their answers have been incorporated, as an old confession de foy des Vaudois. From the time of Perrin they went on increasing, until it was asserted by Leger, that the Reformers of the sixteenth century lit their lights at the old lamp of the Waldensian Church, and by Brez, that the Waldensian Church was the mother of the Reformed Church, the Reformers adding nothing but a few doctrinal subtleties; and those views were repeated by Protestant church historians down to the present century. The true view has been given above. It is now settled that the church started with Waldus in the twelfth century.

WALDHAUSEN, Conrad von, one of the precursors of Huss; was a native of Austria, a monk of the Augustinian order, and preached in Vienna from 1345 to 1360. In the latter year the emperor, Charles IV., appointed him pastor at Leitheim in the diocese of Eichstadt. He there lodged an accusation against him with the archbishop of Prague; but, when he was summoned to a friend, he afterwards removed to Prague, where he died in 1369. Both in Austria and in Bohemia he produced a powerful impression by his sermons; but he was a revivalist, rather than a reformer. The dogmas and the discipline of the Church of Rome he did not attack; though he attacked the mendicant orders, and mercilessly castigated their follies and frauds. They finally lodged an accusation against him with the archbishop of Prague; but, when he was summoned before the court, no one dared to step forward, and support the accusation. WALKER, James, D.D. Unitarian divine; b. in Burlington, Mass., Aug. 10, 1784; d. in Cambridge, Dec. 28, 1874. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1814; studied theology; was pastor in Charleston, 1818-39; Alford Professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in Harvard College, 1839-53; and president, 1853-60, distinguishing himself in each position. He issued Twenty-five Sermons, Boston, 1861; Memoir of Hon. Daniel Appleton White, 1863; Memoir of Josiah Quincy, 1867; and edited Stewart's Active and Mental Powers, 1849, and Religious Intellectual Powers, 1850. See the posthumous volume of his sermons,—Reason, Faith, and Duty, Sermons preached chiefly in the College Chapel, 1876.

WALL, William, D.D., English divine; b. 1646; d. at Shoreham, 1728, where he had been vicar since 1676. He is famous by reason of his History of Infant Baptism, London, 1705, 2 vols.; 3d ed., 1726. In 1711 John Gale, a learned Baptist minister, issued his Reflections on Mr. Wall's History: to it Wall replied in his Defence of the History, 1720. The three are now commonly printed together; best ed. by Henry Cotton, Oxford, 1886, 4 vols.; new ed., 1882, 2 vols.

WALLER, Edmund, b. at Coleshill, Hertfordshire, March 3, 1685; d. at Beaconsfield, Oct. 21, 1687; was educated at Eton and Cambridge; in Parliament much of the time from 1625 to his death; on both sides during the civil war, and banished for some years; wrote in honor of Cromwell, 1654, and of Charles II., 1660; published volumes, 1645, 1664, etc. His Works in Verse and Prose have been often reprinted, and much admired. His few Divine Poems have enough life, or semblance of life, to justify mention here. See Act. Sanct., Feb. 25. On Walpurgis Night, May 1; the witches met.

WALSH, Thomas, Methodist, b. at Ballylin, near Limerick, Ireland, 1730; d. in Dublin, April 8, 1759. Brought up in the Roman-Catholic faith, he renounced that creed, and joined the Established Church in his eighteenth year, and two years later commenced itinerating as a Methodist preacher. He met with great success, but also persecution from Roman Catholics and Protestants alike. In 1753 he came to London on Wesley's call, and there began to study Hebrew and Greek so diligently that he won the enthusiastic admiration of Wesley, who pronounced him the best Bible student he knew. But he succumbed to his incessant toils, and died at an early age. See his Life, by Morgan, London, 1792, New York, WALTER OF ST. VICTOR, prior of the monastery of St. Victor, a pupil of the celebrated Hugo of St. Victor; d. 1180. He left a work, of which large extracts have been printed in Bulleus: Historiae Pontificum, T. ii. pp. 219, 592, 593, and 597, and which is generally named, after the words with which it begins, Contra quatuor labynithos (Abelard, Petrus Lombardus, Petrus Pictavinus, and Gilbertus Porretanus). The work is a violent and often striking criticism of the prevailing scholasticism, based on the just observation, that dialectics can decide only about formal truth (the correct transition from premises to conclusion), but not about material truth, the correctness of the premises. The author, however, is far from the lofty mysticism of his teacher. When the question arises, how the correct premises are to be found, he at once sinks down into abject slavery to the reigning church. He is often mistaken for Walter of Mauritanian, who taught rhetoric in Paris, was appointed bishop of Lyon in 1135, d. in 1174, and wrote against Abelard's conception of the Holy Trinity. C. BCHMIDT.

WALTER VON DER VOGELWEIDE. Among the great German poets of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, who created the first classic period of German literature, Walther von der Vogelweide takes the highest rank as a lyric poet. Not only has he become immortal by his songs of love and spring, which have almost no equal in German literature, but by the power of his verses he has also a great political significance; and the strength of his language against Pope and Church makes him even a forerunner of the Reformation.

We do not know when and where he was born; although his birth falls not long before 1170, as his death can hardly have occurred long after 1230. The principal events of his life we must trace from his poems. At the end of the twelfth century we find him at the court of Austria, the scene of a bright, joyful life, and the home of poets and minstrels of all kinds; and it is probable that most of his beautiful "minnesongs" were produced at this time. But very soon, with the rise of political troubles in Germany, we find him passionately engaged in politics, taking the part of the different emperors who followed each other at short intervals. And now it is that he becomes the creator of that political poetry which had so great an influence upon the minds of his contemporaries. His clear eye detected the real source of the whole political misery of Germany in the destructive influence of Rome; and therefore he uses all the power of his art and satire against the Pope and his priests, "turning thousands from their duty to Rome" as a contemporary, Thomas, says in his Welsche Gast. The language of these verses may justly be compared to Luther's early writings. Here is one of these poems in prose, translated by Bayard Taylor:

"Ye bishops and ye noble priests, you are misled.

See how the Pope entangles you in the Devil's net! If you say to me that he has the keys of St. Peter, then I say to you that he hampers St. Peter's teaching from the Bible. By our baptism it is forbidden to us that God's sacraments should be bought or sold. But now let him read that in his black book, which the devil gave him, and take his tune from Hell's pipe! Ye cardinals, ye roof your choirs well; but onr old holy altar stands exposed to evil weather."

It is very probable that Walther joined the crusade of Frederick II. in 1228, and that he died shortly afterward in Würzburg.

Walter belonged to the poorer of German nobility, but he showed himself able both in church and in state, but he was one of the better class of minstrels, who went from castle to castle singing to the accompaniment of some musical instrument. He passed the greater part of his life in poverty, and it is touching to hear his joy when finally presented with an estate by Frederick II. It is the picture of a true and great poet which Walther has left to us in his songs. Love, nature, religion, and politics are his prime themes; and here he shows a purity, depth, and richness of feeling, which are equal only to his independent character. Although firm in his religious, political, and moral convictions, he belongs to the few men of real religious tolerance in the middle age. In this respect resembling the great Emperor Frederick II., he may be called a prophet of the modern spirit as well as a true representative of his age.

The best of the numerous editions of Walther's poems is that of K. LACHMANN, Berlin, 1827, and often since: a more popular one is that of PFELLEN in his German Classics of Middle Ages, translated into modern German by Sinroock. [W. Grimm's theory, that Walther is also the author of the didactic poem Friderik's Beschidenheit, adopted by W. Wackernagel, has been abandoned. Cf. WillF MANN: Leben Walthers v. d. WALTON, Brian, D.D., b. at Seymour, Yorkshire, 1600; d. in London, Nov. 29, 1661. He was graduated M.A. at Cambridge, 1623; was curate and also schoolmaster in Suffolk; in 1626 rector of St. Martin's Organ, London, to which he was joined in 1636 the rectorship of Sandon, Essex, at which time he was chaplain to the king, and prebend of St. Paul's; in 1639 he was made D.D. (his thesis was, the Pope not infallible judge in matters of faith); in 1641 he was dispossessed of both rectories; was persecuted for his loyalty, fled to Oxford, and there formed the design of the great Polyglot, by which he immortalized himself. After the surrender of Oxford (1646), he went to London with the materials he had collected, and in 1652 published his prospectus to the Polyglot. Subscriptions were placed at ten pounds a set: the six volumes appeared 1654-57. (For particulars, see POLYGLOT BIBLES.) As a help to the student of his Polyglot, he published, London, 1655, Introductio ad Lect. Orient., republished. Deventer, 1655 and 1838. Owen thought the Polyglot, especially the foregoing parts, contained things injurious to Christianity. To him he addressed himself in his Considator Considered, London, 1660. Walton's Polyglot is the first book in England published by subscription. Walton was at the Restoration made chaplain to the king, and on Dec. 2, 1660, was consecrated, in Westminister Abbey, bishop of Chester. See his Life by Todd, London, 1821, 2 vols. The second volume is a reprint of the Considator Considered. WALDENBERT, St., b. in 813; d. in 870. He entered early the monastery of Prüm, near Eich...
ternach, in the Eifel Mountains, and was afterwards made director of the clerical school, which he founded to do very flourishing. He also developed a great literary activity; but only two of his works have come down to us. — Vita et Miracula S. Goarits, first printed at Mayence, 1458, then by Sarius and Mabillon, in Act. Sanct., July 6; and MartYROLOGIUM, written in verse, on the basis of the martyrologies of Jerome, Beda, and Florus, and printed first among the works of Beda in 1588, then by D'Achery, in his *Spic. vet. WAR. Though war most certainly is an evil, it may be considered from various points of view. Looking solely at the suffering and loss it entails, the temptations it offers, the passions it awakens, and the habits it engenders, it is not unnatural that some Christian parties, such as the Quakers, the Mennonites, etc., should feel themselves justified in absolutely condemning it. The view is, nevertheless, one-sided; and the application of Jesus' words in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 39), as a biblical support of it, is false. It is all very well that in the kingdom of heaven there shall be no war, and that the development of the divine scheme of salvation points directly to the abolition of war; but the future cannot be anticipated, and the tribulations of the present a Christian has to bear with patience (Rom. xii. 12). In the Old Testament we meet with quite another view of war when Moses said that "the Lord is a man of war" (Exod. xv. 3); and David with full confidence recommends his war concerns to the Lord (Ps. ix., xviii., ix., etc.). Nor is there any reason why that view should be considered valid only under the old dispensation. The New Testament nowhere rejects war unconditionally. John the Baptist does not demand of the soldiers (Luke iii. 14), nor Jesus of the centurion of Capernaum (Matt. viii. 5), nor Peter of Cornelius (Acts x.), that they shall abandon their profession. Since God has given the sword to the powers to punish them, it is clear that he does evil (Rom. xiii. 1; 1 Pet. ii.), there is a right of war; for it is as much a duty to defend the State against external as against internal aggressors. And it is from this point of view that Luther, in his celebrated treatise Ob Kriegesleute auch in seligem Stande sein können, defines war for the sake of war as sin, but war for the sake of defence, as duty.

The first Christians abhorred war, partly on account of the interpretation of the words of Jesus to Peter, "For all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword" (Matt. xxvi. 52), partly because military service brought them in contact with many idolatrous rites, and the State in general seemed to them an expression of the godlessness of the world and its hostility to Christ. In this spirit Tertullian treated the subject (De idol., 10; De castis militibus, 11). Nevertheless, in spirit of the reigning aversion, many Christians, served in the Roman army, as may also be seen from the writings of Augustine (Apolog., 42; Ad Scap., 4); and when, under the reign of Constantine, the relation between State and Church became one of intimate friendship and alliance, the objections of the Christians to war gradually were silenced. Augustine, who maintained intimate personal and epistolary intercourse with many distinguished statesmen, such as Macer and Bonifacius, considered war a social benefit, and military service an employment of a talent agreeable to God (Ep. 207 ad Bonif., and Ep. 138 ad Marc.). In his book against Faustus (lib. 22, cap. 74) he exclaims, Quid culptatur in bello? (*"What is there bad in war?"") Later on, when it became the great task of the Church to convert the Germanic tribes, it was considered to take the very code of war in hand: and she did not shrink from using its horrors and cruelties by the "truce of God," the sanctity of sacred places, etc. Finally she became herself an instigator of war: from her issued that enthusiasm which sent the Crusaders to the Holy Land. Nor is the attitude which Luther assumed with respect to the Peasants' War and the war against the Turks, different in principle from that here. In modern times the question has been raised by the State, and has given occasion to some elaborate researches. See the "Ethics," of Harless, Rothe, Martensen, and others.

WARBURTON, William, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester; one of the most learned and prolific prelates of the Church of England; b. at Newark-upon-Trent, Nottinghamshire, Dec. 24, 1698; d. at Gloucester, June 7, 1779. His father was an attorney, and educated him for the law, which he practised from 1719 to 1729; but theology had always been his passion, and therefore he was ordained deacon, 1723, and priest, 1726. His first charge was at Gresyley, Nottinghamshire, 1726 to 1728, thence he passed to Brunt-Broughton, Lincolnshire, and there remained until 1746. In the retirement of country life he prosecuted his studies with great diligence, and wrote those works which have perpetuated his memory. The first of these was the Alliance between Church and State, or the necessity and equity of an established religion and a test law demonstrated, from the essence and end of civil society upon the fundamental principles of the laws of nature and nations, 1736, in which, while taking high ground, as the title indicates, he yet maintains that the State Church should tolerate those who differed from it in doctrine and worship. In quiet and unostentatious life, and one of the great works in English theology, — The Divine Legation of Moses, demonstrated on the principles of a religious deist, from the omission of the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments in the Jewish dispensation. Books i., ii., iii., appeared in one volume, 1737-38; books iv., v., vi., in one volume, 1741; books vii., viii., never appeared; book ix. was first published in his Ethics, 1758, 10th ed. of the entire work, ed. by James Nichols, 1846, 3 vols. The work raised a storm; and Warburton published a reply, Remarks on several occasional reflections, 1745. The Divine Legation cannot be understood without reference to the deistic controversy which produced it. (See DEISM, INFIDELITY.) The Deists turned their attacks particularly upon the Old Testament, and tried to make a case by alleging the absence of any express statement respecting immortality. Warburton turns the tables upon them by constructing, out of the very absence of such statements, a proof of the divinity of the Mosaic legislation. The first three books deal with the necessity of the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments to civil society from, (1) the nature of the thing; (2) the conduct of the ancient lawgivers under the orders of civil policy; and, (3) the opinions and conduct of the ancient sages and philosophers. The fourth book proves the high antiquity of the arts and empire of Egypt, and that such high antiquity illustrates and confirms the truth of the Mosaic history. The fifth book explains the nature of the Jewish theocracy, and proves that the doctrine of a future state is not in, nor makes part of, the Mosaic dispensation. In the sixth book Warburton examines all the texts brought from the Old and New Testaments to prove a future state of rewards and punishments did make part of the Mosaic dispensation. The ninth book treats of the true nature and genius of the Christian religion. The general argument is briefly this: the Deists said the Jewish religion could lay no claim to divinity, because its sacred books said nothing respecting a future state of rewards and punishments; but for that very reason, Warburton replied, must it be divine, since it did really accomplish the punishment of wrong-doers without such a doctrine, and no other legislation has been able to do so without it. In answer to the question, How could it do this? he replied, Because the foundation and support of the Mosaic legislation was the theocracy which was peculiar to the Jews, and which dealt out in this life righteous rewards and punishments upon individual and nation. An extraordinary providence conducted the affairs of this people, and consequently the sending of Moses was divinely ordered. The work is confessedly limited to one line of argument, is defective in exegesis, and does not do justice to the intimations of immortality among the later Jews; yet it is distinguished by freshness and vigor, masterly argumentation, and bold imagination. The excursus are particularly admirable; e.g., the hieroglyphs and picture-writing ["The great proof of the discernment of Warburton was his dim second-sight of the modern discoveries in hieroglyphics." — Dean Milman], the mysteries, the origin of the Book of Job (which he calls "an allegorical poem written after the return from Babylon").

Warburton was a man of upholding energy, wide information, clear insight, and lively fancy. He had a noble, open, guileless heart; yet he was capable of intolerance and unfairness. As a critic he was sharp, and often satirical, resembling Bent-}

(a proof of the numerous providential inferences which defeated Julian's attempt to rebuild the temple); The Doctrine of Grace, or the office and operations of the Holy Spirit vindicated from the insults of infidelity and the abuses of fanaticism, 1782, 2 vols. (a work directed against the Methodists, which did not advance his reputation). His Works were edited by Bishop Hurd, 1788, 7 vols. (the expense was borne by Warburton's widow), a new ed., 1811; a Supplement to the Tracts by Warburton and a WARBURTONIAN, 1759; Letters, Kidderminster, 1808, 2d ed., Lond., 1809; Selection from the Unpublished Papers of Warburton, Lond., 1841. Bishop Warburton's life was first written by Bishop Hurd, 1794, enlarged edition by F. Kilvert, 1800, but best by J. S. Watson, 1863. Compare the art. on Warburton, in Allibone's Dict of Authors, vol. iii. pp. 2569-2573; and Leslie Stephen's Hist. of Eng. Thought, chap. vii].

WARBURTONIAN LECTURE was founded by Bishop Warburton in 1768, by the gift of five hundred pounds, for the purpose of proving "the truth of revealed religion in general, and of the Christian in particular, from the completion of the prophecies of the Old and New Testaments, which relate to the Christian Church, and especially to the apostacy of Papal Rome." The lectures were to be given at Lincoln's Inn, London, upon three Sundays of each year. See lists in Dalburg's Cyclopedia Bibliographica, and Bohn's edition of Lowndes. Of recent lectures may be mentioned STANLEY LEATHER'S Old-Testament Prophecy, as witness as a record of divine foreknowledge, 1880, and Edwards's Witness of Hist. to Messiah, 1880.

WARDEN is the name sometimes given to the head of some English colleges, and also to the superior of the chapter in some conventual churches.

WARDLAW, Ralph, D.D., a prominent Scottish divine; b. at Dalkeith, Dec. 22, 1779; d. at Glasgow, Dec. 17, 1853. By birth and education a Presbyterian, he adopted Congregational views before ordination. Educated at Glasgow university. His only pastorate was that of the Albion-street Congregational Church (afterwards removed to George Street), which he held for over fifty years. Professor of theology in the Glasgow Theological Academy from 1811 for some forty years. A good scholar, polished gentleman, and devout Christian; an expository preacher, keen in logic, courteous to opponents, rather diffuse in style, an admirable eloquentian; gathered a large and influential congregation, and was for a long time a leader in the Congregational churches in Scotland. He published largely; his chief works being A Selection of Hymns, 1808, with supplement, 1817 (twelve of his own composition are included, these have since been extensively used); Discourses on the Principal Points of the Socinian Controversy, 1814; Unitarianism Incapable of Vindication, 1818; Expositions and an Essay on the Sabbath, 1821; Dissertation on Infant Baptism, 1825; Two Essays on the Assurance of Faith and on the Extent of the Atonement and Universal Pardon, 1830; The Sabbath, 1832; Civil Establishments of Christianity tried by the Word of God, 1832; Christian Ethics, 1838; Congregational Independency, 1843; Essay on the Miracles, 1852; and many occasional discourses. Dr. Wardlaw was a powerful speaker.
on the platform, and took part in many public movements, especially in the antislavery controversy and the formation of the Evangelical Alliance in 1846. His System of Theology, 1856-57, 3 vols., and Lectures upon Proverbs (1861, 3 vols.), Romans (1861, 3 vols.), Zechariah (1862), and James (1862), have been published since his death, and a Memoir by Rev. W. L. Alexander, D.D. (1860). W. M. BIRD.

WARE, Henry, D.D., b. at Sherburne, Mass., April 1, 1761; d. at Cambridge, July 12, 1845. He was graduated from Harvard College in 1785; and from Oct. 24, 1787, until 1805, was pastor of the First Church, Hingham, Mass.; was Hollis Professor of divinity in Harvard College, 1805-10, and then in the divinity school, which was that year organized, until, in 1840, loss of sight compelled his resignation. "His election to the Hollis Professorship was the occasion of a memorable controversy. Dr. Tappan, his predecessor, had always been regarded as a Trinitarian and a moderate Calvinist; but Mr. Ware was understood to be a decided Arminian and a Unitarian. Vigorous efforts were made to prevent the nomination, when submitted to the overseers, from being confirmed; but it was confirmed by a vote of thirty-three to twenty-three. The 'orthodox' clergy generally were greatly dissatisfied with the result; and Dr. [Eliphalet] Pearson, who had been both a professor and a fellow in the college, next year resigned both these offices, giving as a reason that the university was the subject of such radical and constitutional maladies as to exclude the hope of rendering any essential service to the interests of religion by continuing his relation to it. Dr. [Jedediah] Morse also published a pamphlet entitled True Reasons on which the Election of a Hollis Professor of Divinity was opposed at the Board of Overseers. This may be regarded as the commencement of the Unitarian controversy, which was prosecuted with great vigor for many years, until at length the lines between the two parties were distinctly drawn" (Sprague). Ware took part in this controversy until 1820, when he wrote Letters to Trinitarians and Calvinists, occasioned by Dr. Leonard Woods's Letters to Unitarians. This involved him in a controversy with Dr. Woods. Dr. Ware also published An Inquiry into the Foundation, Evidences, and Truths of Religion, Cambridge, 1842, 2 vols. See SPRAGUE: Annals of the American Pulpit, viii. 199 sqq.

WARE, Henry, jun., D.D., b. at Hingham, Mass., May 21, 1794; and graduated at Harvard, 1812; and at Framingham, Mass., Sept. 22, 1843. He was pastor of the Second Church in Boston, 1817-30; and Parkman Professor of pulpit eloquence in the divinity school at Cambridge, 1830-42. He edited the Christian Disciple, the first Unitarian organ, and published Hints on Extemporaneous Preaching (1824). On the Formation of the Christian Character (1851), and various memoirs, sermons, and other works. Four volumes of selections from his writings were issued by Dr. C. Robbins, 1846-47, and a memoir by his brother, 1845, 2 vols. His hymns, written at intervals from 1817 on, possess decided merit, and have been widely used. F. M. BIRD.

WARHAM, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. at Okeley, Hampshire, about 1450; d. at St. Stephen's, near Canterbury, Aug. 26, 1582. He was elected fellow of New College, Oxford, 1475; studied particularly canon and civil law; was made LL.D. 1488, but entered the church, and left the university; was collated by the bishop of Ely to some living in the church, but does not appear to have discharged its duties, for he became advocate in the Court of Arches, and moderator (principal) of the Civil Law School in St. Edmund's parish, Oxford. Having curated the notice of Henry VII, his ability at learning were of great service. He was sent, with Sir E. Poyntings, to the Duchesse of Burgundy to effect the delivery of the pretender, Perkin Warbeck (1493), and a few years after sat on the case as commissioner. He was successively Master of the Rolls (1494), Keeper of the Great Seal (Aug. 11, 1502), Lord-Chancellor (Jan. 1, 1503), bishop of London (1503), enthroned archbishop of Canterbury (March 9, 1504), chancellor of the university of Oxford (1508). With the accession of Henry VIII. (1509), he suffered no loss of position; but the growth of Wolsey in royal favor was bitter to him, and he finally resigned the Great Seal to Wolsey, Dec. 22, 1515. He was offered it again after Wolsey's fall, but declined, pleading his age and other reasons.

Warham was behind his age. He had learning, and skill in state-craft, dignity, and virtue. He was, for his age, singularly abstemious, and, although primate, lived in all simplicity. He was the friend of Erasmus and Colet. But he was deaf to the cries for reform, blind to the corruptions of the church. He headed the opponents to the Reformation. He considered it a capital offence to introduce the writings of the Reformers, and to translate the Bible into the vernacular;—at best a work of superfluity. He listened to the Holy Maid of Kent (Elizabeth Barton), but he persecuted the "heretics" without mercy. See the numerous works upon the English Reformation. C. SCHOLE.

WASHBURN, Edward Abel, D.D., b. in Boston, Mass., April 18, 1819; d. in New York, Feb. 2, 1881. Dr. Washburn was for nearly forty years a clergyman in the Episcopal Church, of which, in the latter years of his life, he was one of the prominent leaders. Grandson of Gen. Washburn of Massachusetts, and son of a well-known Boston merchant, he passed the early years of his life in the study of literature and philosophy, and, graduating from Harvard College in the year 1838, he entered the Congregational ministry after a year's study in each of the seminaries of Andover and New Haven. He soon found, however, that he could not be satisfied with this communion, and after a short pastorate he entered the Episcopal Church, being ordained to preach in Boston in 1845. From this time, until 1851, he was rector of St. Paul's, Newburyport; and here he laid the foundation of his wide scholarship and learning by constant study. For two years during this time he journeyed in the East, visiting Egypt, Palestine, India, and China, and on his return succeeded Dr. Coxe as rector of St. John's, Hartford. In the same year he was married to Miss Frances H. Lindsay, daughter of Dr. Lindsay of Washington. In 1860 he received the degree of doctor of divinity from Trinity College. Two years later he accepted the charge of St. Mark's, Philadelphia, whence, in 1865, he was called to Calvary.

Dr. Washburn was in many respects due partly to his great abilities as a scholar,— the vital problems into general use. At first they were frequent, of Church and State. E. W. HOPKINS.

WATSON, Richard, Bishop of Llandaff, both chemist and theologian; b. at Heversham, Westmoreland, August, 1737; d. at Calgarth Park. Retired from public life, in which he had prominently figured for many years, in 1789, and, retaining his bishopric, spent the rest of his life chiefly in agricultural pursuits. He was rather versatile than deep, yet deserves mention for his two apologetic writings in the form of letters, Apology for Christianity (1776), addressed to Edward Gibbon, and Apology for the Bible (1790), addressed to Thomas Paine; and for his very valuable Collection of Theological Tracts, 1754, 6 vols., 2d ed., 1791. WATSON, Richard, one of the most eminent Methodists; secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society; b. at Barton-upon-Humber, Lincolnshire, Feb. 22, 1781; d. in London, Jan. 8, 1833. He received no schooling after his fourteenth year; was educated at Cambridge, fellow of Magdalen College (1704), professor of chemistry, Nov. 19, 1704 (when, according to his own confession, he had never read a syllable on the subject, or seen a single experiment: he made his own new rules, and informed and excellent teacher); regius professor of divinity, Nov. 14, 1771 (in the seven days previous he took the degrees of bachelor and doctor of theology, and for a second time assumed to teach a subject he confessedly had never studied: his theology, he says, was purely biblical, he cared nothing about "systems"), and rector of Somersham, 1771; prebendary of Ely, 1774; archdeacon of Ely, and rector of Northwold in Norfolk, 1770; bishop of Llandaff, July 26, 1872. He maintained that the doctrine of the Trinity was necessarily, by its mysteriousness, beyond reason, and that the Scripture citations should be understood in their plain sense. He exposed the weakness of Clarke's famous a priori proof for the being of God, and defended the Athenian Creed in his Critical History of the creed, 1724. He wrote, also, A Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist as laid down in Scripture and Antiquity (1737), against Hoadly's Zwinglian, and Johnson's and Brett's Romanizing, views. Waterland always wrote without bitterness or heat, and therefore was a model controversialist. His Works appeared in a complete edition, Oxford, 1823–28, new ed., 1843, 8 vols., prefaced by a Life by Bishop Van Mildert. THEODOR CHRISTLIER.

WATTS.

Wesleyan Methodist Missions in the West Indies, 7 (a work which did much to reveal the misery and wrong in the West Indies, and to lead to a better treatment of the slaves). Conversations for the Young, 1830 (a good book for young people reading the Bible): Life of John Wesley, 1851 (written by request of confer- ence, a shorter and more popular than the voluminous biography by Moore); and Characterized by its simple treatment of the Established Church: Biblical and Theological Dictionary, 1832, 10th ed., reprinted, New York, 1853, Nashville, 1857, and enlarged by T. O. Summers (for the part, a compilation); and, Chiefly, Theological Queries, or a View of the Evidences, Doctrines, and Institutions of Christianity, 1823-24, 5th ed., 1830, 4 vols. (a popular rather than scientific presentation of theology and ethics, upon the Arminian interpretation of the Bible, particularly useful for students and g ministers, who, as Watson himself did, preparing themselves for their profession in the church though not the legal, has been the moral standard of Methodism")); Sermons on the Catechism, 1834, 3 vols., N.Y., 1845. Watson's Life was written by Thomas Jackson, in the first volume of the edition of his Works, 1834-37, 13 vols., London, 1876. [An Analysis of the Institutes prepared by Dr. McClintock in 1842, bound with the new edition of the work (N.Y., 1850, 2 vols.), used by James A. Bastow; published separately (London, 1876). TSON, Thomas, eminent nonconformist, d. in Essex about 1689. He was educated at the Grammar School in Colchester, and was rector of that town from 1665 to 1672. His works include: A Plain Account of the Right Use of Reason, although now superseded, written in the days of the universities of the Established Church. His Improvement of the Mind, Philosophical Essays (clear proof that metaphysical speculation was not his forte); First Principles of Geography and Astronomy; and his very characteristic Reliquiae, or Miscellaneous Thoughts in Prose and Verse, have been widely useful. In 1726 he published his Discourse on Instruction by Catechism, with two Catechisms, and the Assembly's Catechism explained. Watts was considered one of the best preachers of his time. He published three volumes of discourses, 1721, 1728, 1727. The charge of Arianism brought against him is apparently unfounded. He has a monument in the cemetery of Abney Park, where he lies buried, and also in Westminster Abbey (a statue at South-ampton (1861), and a memorial hall there (1875)). His Works were published in Lond., 1810, 8 vols., and 1812, 9 vols. Nine additional Sermons appeared in Oxford, 1512. His Life has been written by SAMUEL JOHNSON, REV. THOMAS MILNER, ROBERT SOUTH, REV. SAMUEL PALMER, and DR. GIBBONS. TEDOCHRISTIE.
| WAUGH, Beverly, D.D. | WAYLAND, Francis, b. in New York, March 11, 1789; d. at Providence, R.I., Sept. 30, 1853; was a tutor in Union College in 1813; studied medicine, and began practice; was converted, and joined the Baptist Church in 1816; studied at Andover Theological Seminary in 1816 and 1817; was tutor in Union College, 1817-21; pastor of First Baptist Church in Boston, 1821-26; made professor in Union College in 1826; president of Brown University, 1827-55; received degree of D.D. from Harvard University, 1827, and from Harvard College in 1829, and degree of LL.D. from Harvard College in 1832. He is most widely remembered as a college officer. With Arnold of Rugby, and with his own instructors,—Nott of Union, and Stuart of Andover,—he ranks as one of the great teachers of the century. And his influence as an educator went beyond his own lectures and classes. The text-books which he prepared for the use of his own classes soon came into general use. In the re-organization, brought about by him, of the courses of study in Brown University, he did much to reform the general system of college education. He was a leader in the organization of the system of public schools in the city of Providence, throughout the State of Rhode Island, and elsewhere. He was one of the founders and the first president of the American Institute of Instruction, for many years presiding over and taking an active part in its deliberations. He did much to secure the founding of free public libraries. Through many published reports and addresses, and by extended treatises, he aroused and directed the educational spirit in the country at large. Eminent as an educator, Dr. Wayland stands himself as a preacher. Some of his discourses, as, for example, his sermon on The Moral Dignity of the Missionary Enterprise, are prominent in the annals of the American pulpit. His Univerisity Sermons and other volumes of discourses have been widely read. His Bible-class in the university became widely known; and his teaching was not merely faithful official exhortation, it was the outburst of an earnest desire for the salvation of souls. It was his constant custom to talk individually with his students regarding their spiritual state, and to pray with them singly. In 1857-58, having retired from the college presidency, he acted for more than a year as pastor of the First Baptist Church in Providence, not only preaching each Sunday, but going, in pastoral visiting, from house to house to every four days, to spend an hour with his hearers. In person to become followers of Christ. He often preached to the inmates of prisons and other public institutions. In all his course of public service he never ceased to be an earnest and effective preacher of the gospel.

| Christian bodies, he was looked up to as an adviser and leader. As a citizen, also, he took a great interest in public affairs, and was continuously called on to serve the State in matters which combined civil and moral interests. He was the broadest sense a man, and all that pertained to human interests commanded his thoughts and energies.

| WAZO, Bishop of Liege; b. about 974; d. July 8, 1048. It was as a driver he first attracted the attention of Notger, bishop of Liege; and, as he showed aptness to learn, he was placed in the cathedral school. In due time he became teacher in the school, dean of the chapter, provost, and in 1041 he was elected bishop of Liege; and after some difficulties was confirmed by Henry III. He proved a worthy bishop in every respect; and though he is of no great importance, either in history or in theology, his Life, written a few years after his death, by Anselms, in his Gesta episcoporum Liechniensium, has a great interest to the student of the social state of affairs in those times. See Albrecht Vogel, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie.

| WEEK (שבוע, pl. שבועות and שבועות; Heb. septimana). The Greeks and Romans first became acquainted with the seven-day week through Christianity and the scattered Jews. [The Romans adopted it after the reign of Theodosius.] The expression יְבָאָשָׁא (Heb. יְבָאָשָׁא) is not found in the New Testament, but rather עָשָׁר (e.g., Luke xviii. 12) or עָשָׁר (e.g., Matt. xxviii. 1), used, however, in the sense of it, as, in the Old Testament, פְּנֵי is parallel with פְּנֵי (cf. Lev. xxiii. 15; Deut. xvi. 9). Butما، demot., etc., عَشَرَاء، the Arabic עָשָׁר לֵאמֶר, the Egyptian used by the Jews. The age of this hebdomadal division among the Jews depends upon the disputed date of the sabbath. (See SABBATH.) But, since the lunar month divides itself naturally into four periods of seven days each, this division must have been very old. It is found among all Semites. For the peculiar use of the word "week" in Daniel, see DANIEL. [See art. "Week" in Smith: Dict. of the Bible. E. NAGELBERG.
WEIGEL, Valentin, b. at Hayn in Misnia, 1533; studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg from 1554 to 1588. He appears to have been a precursor of Bohme, and, on a basis of mysticism, a decided adversary of the scholasticism in which the Reformation ended. Frightened by the terrorism of the reigning orthodoxy, he published nothing; and probably very few of his parishioners noticed his heterodoxies: but privately he elaborated his system; and, after his death his cantor, Weikert, began to promulgate his ideas in public. Weikert was deposited, and nothing further is known of him.

WEIGEL, Valentin, b. at Hayn in Misnia, 1533; d. at Halle, Jan. 27, 1849. He studied theology at Halle and Wittenberg, from 1796 to 1850 tutor in a merchant's family in Hamburg, where he published 'Ethics stoicorum recentorum fundamenta cum principiis ethicis A Kaino proposita comparata, 1797, and of the newest Philosophy geförderte Tendenz an der Deutschen, 1804. After settling at Göttingen as repetitor in the university, he published in 1806 his 'Einteilung in das Evangelium Johannis, and was in the same year appointed professor of theology at Rinteln in Hesse. But in 1810 the university of Rinteln was closed, and he was removed, as professor of theology, to Halle. There he published in 1815 his principal work ('Institutiones theologicae dogmaticae'), which, in the department of systematic theology, is the most representative of rationalism. Immediately after the fall of Napoleon, the university of Halle entered upon a career of great prosperity; and Wegscheider, as its most celebrated professor, often gathered more than three hundred students to his lectures. But early in 1830 he and his friend Gessenius were summoned before a committee of investigation, and even threatened with deposition, on account of the open rationalism of their teaching. The outbreak, however, of the revolution of 1830, made the king of Prussia unwilling according to a certain standard; and that such a control was necessary we see from Deut. xxi. 14 sq.; Amos viii. 5; Mic. vi. 11; Prov. xi. 1, xvi. 11, xx. 10, 28. Fractions of the cubit were, (a) zereth, or span (properly, a spreading of the fingers) ('Exod. xxviii. 16, xxxix. 8; 1 Sam. vii. 4; Isa. xii. 12); (b) etseba, or finger-breadth (Ps. xxxix. 5), also called topach ('Exod. xxv. 12; Ez. xl. 3, 5, xlii. 13); (c) tephach, or hand-breath (1 Kings vii. 26; 2 Chron. iv. 5; Ps. xxxix. 5), also called tephach ('Exod. xxv. 12, xxxvii. 12; Ez. xl. 5, 43, xlii. 13); (c) etseba, or finger-breath, only mentioned in Jer. lii. 21. The plurality of the cubit was the kaneh, or reed ('Ezek. v. 5, 8, xii. 10-19). Summing up the relation of each of these measures to one another, we get the following table:

II. Measures of Distance. — The smallest is (a) \( \text{taw} \), or pace (only 2 Sam. vi. 13). (b) \( \text{Khubh} \) ha-arets (rendered in the Authorized Version "a little way," or "a little piece of ground") ('Gen. xxxvi. 17, xlviii. 7; 2 Kings v. 19). The measure is uncertain: the Septuagint renders it "hippodrome," and in the Syriac it is rendered "parasang." If the latter be true, then it would be thirty stadia, or three-fourths to three-fifths of a geographical mile. (c) \( \text{Derek yom} \), or mehalak sam. a day's journey ('Gen. xxx. 36, xxxii. 23; Exod. iii. 18, v. 3; Num. x. 38, xi. 31, xxxiii. 8; Deut. i. 2; 1 Kings xix. 4; 2 Kings iii. 9; Jon. iii. 3; 1 Macc. v. 24, 28, vii. 45; Tob. vi. 1; Luke ii. 44). A specifically Jewish measure of distance was the sabbath-way, concerning which minute enactments are laid down in the Talmud (Treatise, Sabbath and Erubin).

III. Of Square Measure, only a small portion, perhaps, of the ancient measures, is preserved, or acre, is mentioned (1 Sam. xiv. 14; Isa. v. 10).

IV. Measures of Capacity. — At a very early period there existed measures for liquids, and dry measures. (A) Liquid Measures. (a) Bath, as measured by the cubit (1 Kings vii. 26, 38; 2 Chron. i. 10; Ex. vii. 22; Isa. v. 10). (b) \( \text{Hin} \) = \( \text{bath} \) ('Exod. xxx. 34; Ezk. xlv. 24, xlviii. 5, 7, 11). The scientific worth of the Institutiones is very small. It has no originality. Weights and Measures. 2486 tioned (Exod. xxix. 40; Lev. xxiiii. 13; Num. xv. 4, [5, 6, 7, 9, 10], xxvii. 5, [7, 14]; Ezek. iv. 11, [14]). (c) Log = τριάρχηδον, πυξίνον bath (Lev. xiv. 10, 12, 16, 21, 24), originally signifying a “basin.”

(B) Dry Measures. (a) Lethem = 1 homer, occurs only in Hos. iii. 2. (b) Ephah = ἕφα homer, of frequent occurrence in the Bible (Exod. xvi. 38; Lev. vi. 11, vii. 20; Num. x. 15, xxvii. 6; Judges vi. 19; Ruth ii. 17; 1 Sam. i. 24, xvii. 17; Ezek. xiv. 11, 13, 14, xlv. 5, 7, 11, 14): it is probably of Egyptian origin. (c) Seakh = 1 ephah, denoting “measure” (Gen. xviii. 6; 1 Sam. xv. 18; 2 Kings vii. 1, 16). The seah was otherwise termed šalkah, as being the third part of an ephah (Isa. xi. 12; Ps. lxxxi. 5). (d) Šaḏron, the tenth part of an ephah (Exod. xvi. 38; in the Authorized Version, “tenth deal”) (Lev. xiv. 10, xxiiii. 13; Num. xv. 4). The older name seems to have been ʿomer (Exod. xvi. 16–36). (e) Cab, i.e., hollow or concave, mentioned only 2 Kings vi. 25. Both the liquid and dry measures had one large measure in common, the ʿōmer (1 Kings iv. 22, v. 11; 2 Chron. ii. 10, xxvii. 5; Ez. xii. 22; Ezek. xiv. 14), also called homer, meaning “heap” (Lev. xxvii. 16; Num. xxii. 32; Isa. v. 10; Ezek. xiv. 13), and equal to 10 bath. The “hora” was used only as dry measure. For the liquid measures we thus get:

1 cor = 10 bath = 60 hin = 720 log

or

1 " = 6 " = 72 "

or

1 " = 12 "

For the dry measures:

1 homer = 10 ephah = 30 seah = 100 ʿomer = 180 cab

or

1 " = 3 " = 10 " = 18 "

or

1 " = 2 ½ = 6 "

or

1 " = 11 "

Weights. — At a very early period the Hebrews seem to have used scales for determining the weight of things, especially of precious metals. The weights generally consisted of stones. There were five standard of weights, — beka, gerah, shekel, maneh, and kikkar. The highest was (a) the kikkar, or talent, literally “a circle,” hence any round object, and thus a circular piece of money. It was of gold (1 Kings ix. 14) and of silver (2 Kings v. 22). (b) Maneh, the Greek mins, or mna, strictly a portion, i.e., a subdivision of the “talent” = 10 kikkar. (c) Shekel, properly a weight, the usual unit of estimation applied to coins and weights. It likewise was of two kinds, — the sacred (Lev. v. 15) and the royal (2 Sam. xiv. 26). (d) Bekah, strictly a cleft or fraction (Gen. xxvii. 22); and (e) gerah, properly a kernel or bean, like our “grain” (Ezek. xiv. 12; Exod. xxx. 13; Lev. xxvii. 26; Num. iii. 47). For the weights we thus get:

1 kikkar = 60 maneh = 5,000 shekel = 6,000 beka = 60,000 gerah

or

1 " = 50 " = 100 " = 1,000 "

or

1 " = 2 " = 20 "

or

He maintained that position assisted very materially to raise in Scotland the too long neglected study of the Hebrew language, as well as of the Old-Testament Scriptures, to its true place in theological science. A strict disciplinarian, he was, above all, a sympathetic and stimulating teacher. To quote the language of one of his colleagues in the funeral sermon delivered in the university after his death, "His familiarity with the Hebrew language in all its phases, his rational analysis and explanation even of its most peculiar and apparently abnorma! phenomena, his delicate perception of its niceties, his sympathetic appreciation of the spirit of Hebrew poetry and Hebrew prophecy, gave to his prelections an interest and charm which were enhanced by the transparent simplicity and earnestness of his character." Another colleague, who had been his friend from his earliest years, thus described in a local periodical his personal character: "The grave has seldom closed over one whose life was more pure and blameless, more uniform, more elevated, more benevolent, and more incapable of an unworthy or ignoble action. A somewhat reserved manner gave, perhaps, to strangers, in their intercourse with him, the impression of coldness and austerity; but those who were honored by his friendship know well . . . how their respect and admiration for the memory of the great scholar, the acute thinker, the sagacious counsellor, are blended with the deeper sorrow for the loss of the true and tender-hearted friend."
Dr. Weir died at a comparatively early age, and unhappily left behind him no adequate results, at least in a permanent form, of the great learning and ability by which, in the knowledge of those who knew him, he was so eminently distinguished. His chief literary works are occasional contributions to Kitto's Journal, already mentioned, to the Imperial Bible Dictionary, and to The Academy. Professor Cheyne, in the Introduction to his book on Isaiah, expresses his obligations to suggestions of Dr. Weir privately communicated to him. His non-productiveness in the way of authorship was partly due to the exacting nature of the duties of his chair, to which he devoted himself with scrupulous fidelity, and partly to the fact that he was looking forward, as he might reasonably do at his age, to a time of greater leisure, when the immense store of materials on Old-Testament criticism which he had accumulated, might be reduced to shape, and given to the public.

WILLIAM LEE.

WEISS, Charles, b. at Strassburg, Dec. 10, 1812; d. at Vanves, 1881. He was professor of history in the Lycée Bonaparte; and both his L'Espagne depuis le règne de Philippe IV. jusqu'à l'acquiescence des Bourbons (Paris, 1844, 2 vols.) and his Histoire des réfugiés protestants de France (Paris, 1853, 2 vols.) were crowned by the Academy. In 1864 he became insane, and spent the rest of his life in an asylum at Vanves, near Paris.

WEISS, Pantaleon, generally known under the name Candidus; b. at Ips, in Lower Austria, Oct. 7, 1510; d. at Zweibrucken, Feb. 3, 1568. He studied at Wittenberg from 1537 to 1544; and was in 1565 appointed rector of the Latin School of Zweibrucken, and, later on, pastor and superintendent of that city. Though he had studied at Wittenberg, and was honored with the friendship of Melanchthon, he was by the strict Lutherans suspected of inclining towards Calvinism; and he became, indeed, instrumental in the conversion of the principality of Zweibrucken from the Lutheran to the Reformed faith. At a theological dispute at Bergzabern, July, 1578, he for the first time divulged his Calvinist views of the personality of Christ, which he further developed in his Dialogus de unione personae duarum in Christo personarum, Geneva, 1588. He was immediately met by strong opposition: but the duke took his side; and in July, 1580, the court-preacher, Heilbrunner, one of the leaders of the Lutherans, was banished from the country. In 1588 Candidus published anonymously his Klärer Bericht von heiligen Abendmal, which, point for point, follows the Reformed doctrine of the Lord's Supper; and in 1588 the Reformed faith was officially established in the principality of Zweibrucken from the Lutherans to the Reformed; but no serious disturbances took place. Among the other writings of Candidus is a great number of poems in Latin (Elegiae precationum, Epigrammatorum sacrorum, libri xii., etc.), but none in German. See F. BUTTERS: Pantaleon Candidus, Zweibrucken, 1865.

J. SCHNEIDER.

WEISSE, Christian Hermann, b. at Leipzig, Aug. 10, 1801; d. there Sept. 18, 1866. He was professor of philosophy in the university of his native city, and wrote on mythology and esthetand Rowlands. These differences were not doctrinal in their nature; for the controversies which divided the English Methodists never affected their Welsh brethren, the latter being almost a man Calvinists. In 1762–63 a great revival welded the divided church to an inseparable union. The year 1785 was signalized by the accession of the Rev. Thomas Charles of Bala, whose great work was the organizing of the denominational Sabbath schools. These were in many respects similar to the circulating-schools established by Griffith Jones, and, like them, included the adults, as well as the children, of the congregations. The study of the Scriptures in these schools, by the whole church, led to two important results,—the one a demand for Welsh Bibles beyond the then means of supply, and as a consequence to the formation, in 1801, of the British and Foreign Bible Society; the other, a new impetus to the cause of Calvinistic Methodism. In fact, the formal act of separation from the Established Church was forced upon the denomination by its rapid growth. Communion in the few parish churches having "Methodistic" rectors became impossible to a body numbering its members by tens of thousands. A General Association was organized at Bala and at Llandilo Fawr in 1811, twenty-one persons were ordained to the office of the ministry. This step led to the withdrawal of the majority of the episcopally ordained ministers, but their defection did not check the progress of the Welsh Calvinists. In 1818 the Home Mission Society was organized, for work in the English districts bordering on Wales. In 1823 a Confession of Faith was adopted. In 1830 a theological seminary was established at Bala, and in 1842 another at Trevecca. The work of foreign missions was carried on, until 1840, in connection with the London Missionary Society; but since that date the church has maintained missions of its own in Khassia, India, in Brittany to the Breton kinsmen of the Welsh, and in London to the Jews. The last step in its organization was taken by the constitution of the General Assembly, at Swansea, in 1844.

The church is a member of the Presbyterian Alliance, and is in numbers, influence, and in Christian work, the foremost church of the Principality. Stevens, in his History of Methodism, graphically describes it as the source to Wales of that "extraordinary religious progress by which the thirty dissenting churches of 1715 have increased (1837) to 2,300; by which a chapel now dots nearly every three square miles of the country, and over a million people, nearly the whole Welsh population (seven-eighths), are found attending public worship some part of every sabbath."

Doctrine.—The doctrines of the Confession of Faith of this church are in substantial harmony with the doctrines of the Westminster Confession. The word "Methodist" in its name is, therefore, to be understood as defining, not a form of doctrine, but methods of Christian life and work. The Confession is published in both English and Welsh.

Polity.—The polity of this church was from its origin practically Presbyterian; the first "societies" being represented in the monthly meetings and the General Assembly by stewards, deacons, or elders, as well as by ministers and exhorters; and it is to be distinctly noted, that Howell Harris, a layman, was for many years the moderator of the General Association. The government consists at present (1883) of twenty-five monthly meetings or presbyteries, two synods, and a general assembly. The points wherein the polity differs from that of other Presbyterian churches are, (1) Members are received and disciplined by the particular church in congregational meeting; (2) Elders are nominated by the churches, but cannot be installed until approved by the presbytery; (3) Candidates for the ministry must be recommended to the presbytery by a three-fourths vote of the church with which they are connected; (4) Ministers are ordained by the synods, on recommendation of the presbytery, after five years' trial as probationers; (5) All the elders of a church are members of presbytery; (6) The church-buildings are the property of the denomination as a whole; (7) The General Assembly consists of two ministers and two elders from each presbytery, and, in addition, the moderators and clerks of the synods, the treasurers and secretaries of the Foreign Missionary Society, the previous moderators of the Assembly, and the conveners of committees.

Worship.—The church uses no Liturgy. Its services are simple, characterized by earnestness, and are conducted, as a rule, in the Welsh language.

United States. History, etc.—The first Calvinistic Methodist in America was the Rev. George Whitefield. Welsh emigrants of the Calvinistic faith began to enter the country about 1770; but being few in number, and unfamiliar with the English language, they worshipped, for many years after that date, with the Welsh Independents. Their first church was organized at Pen-y-caeru, Remsen, Oneida County, N.Y., in the year 1826. Within a year or two after, the first presbytery was formed. In 1838 a denominational magazine, Y Cwfail o'r Hen Wlad ("The Friend of the Old Country"), was established in New York City by the Rev. William Rowlands, D.D., and aided greatly in furthering the interests of the denomination. In 1845 fraternal relations were entered into with the Old School General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. The denomination is strongest in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, and Minnesota: and its spread is marked by the formation of societies in the States respectively. The presbyteries (1882) number eighteen. The General Assembly, established in 1870, meets triennially. In doctrine the Welsh Calvinists in the United States agree with their brethren in Britain. In polity they are, in some particulars, more nearly assimilated to the American Presbyterian churches.

Statistics. England and Wales (1882).—Churches (congregations), 1,179; English churches, 135; chapels and preaching-stations, 1,843; pastors, 610; preachers, 371; elders, 431; communicants, 119,355; children under care of the church, 56,452; Sabbath-school members, 177,983; hearers, 274,605; contributions, $581,875. United States (1882).—Churches, 171; ministers, 108; communicants, 11,000; children under care of the church, 6,700; Sabbath-school members, 13,000; hearers, 26,000.
WENDELIN, a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, whose festival falls on Oct. 29. He was a native of Scotland, and flourished in the seventh century. Educated for the church, he went to Germany as a missionary; settled near Treves, and labored with so great success that the monks of Tholey, a convent situated near the Saar, chose him their abbot. Nothing more is known of him with certainty, but he is still devotedly worshipped in many parts of Germany and Switzerland as the protector of the cattle. See Act. Sand., July 6, p. 171.

WENDEN, or WANDELIN, a saint of the northern part of Germany, along the Baltic Sea. Utica, N.Y., 1872 (in English). W. H. ROBERTS.

WERCKMEISTER. 2489

WERENFELS, Samuel, b. at Basel, March 1, 1657; d. there June 1, 1710. He studied at Zurich and Geneva; visited Holland and Northern Germany; and was appointed professor in his native city, first of rhetoric, afterwards of theology. His Opuscula, published at Basel in 1718, and again in 1782, are still of interest, especially his De logomachia eruditorum et De scopum quern scripturæ interpretes sibi proponere debet, the former of general rhetorical, the latter of special hermeneutical bearing. He was, indeed, the first to propound those principles of grammatical and historical exegesis which afterwards Ernesti brought to prevail, inculcating that not the possible, but only the actual, meaning of a passage is of any account.

WERKE, or WERKEN, the collective name of a number of Slavic tribes which in ancient time inhabited the northern part of Germany, along the Baltic Sea, between the Elbe and the Vistula, — Obodrites in Mecklenburg; Ranes, or Rugians, in the Island of Rugen; Pomeranians; Sorbians in Miana and Brandenburg, etc. The name was derived from the old German wasd ("water"), that is, those who live by the water; but they called themselves by the name of the tribe, which those who can speak and make themselves understood; while they called the Germans njem, njemetz (the "dumb," the "unintelligible"). Agriculture, cattle-raising, fishing, and piracy, were their general occupations. Their religion was a strongly marked dualism, in which the evil always seemed about to gain the ascendency. They worshipped their gods in temples and sacred groves, with many superstitions and cruel rites. Their morals were narrow, but not depraved. They were temperate, hospitable, independent, true to their friends, though it was considered fair to break a promise given to an enemy, and chaste, though their marriages were polygamous. In the eighth century the conflicts began between them and their Germanic neighbors to the south and the west; but all the advantages which Charlemagne gained over them, were counterbalanced by his weak successors. More permanent was the success of the energetic kings of the Saxon dynasty. Henry I. conquered Brennaburg (Brandenburg) and Gana (probably the present Jihana in Miana), two of the principal seats of the Wends; and after the battle of Lunkini, which lasted for four days, he formed the margraviate of Miana, built fortresses in the conquered land, planted Saxon colonies among the Wends, and sent forth Christian missionaries, 929. Under Otho I. the Christianization and Germanization of the Wends were carried on with still greater energy. He founded the bishoprics of Havelberg (946), Brandenburg (949), Merseburg, and Zeitz (988); and, in order to give more vigor to the Wendish mission, he determined to form all those bishoprics into an independent archbishopric at Magdeburg; which plan he also succeeded in accomplishing in spite of the protests of the bishop of Halberstadt and the archbishop of Mayence. Nevertheless, it cost great exertions before Christianity became fully established among the Wends. More than two centuries elapsed, filled with insurrections and bloody feuds. See the articles on GOTTLASCH and VIKELIN.

Lit. — The sources of the history of the Christianization of the Wends are the Chronicles of Widukind, Thietmar, Adam of Bremen, and Helmold. See also GEBHARD: Geschichte der Slenen und Wenden, Halle, 1790; and GIESCHE: Wendische Geschichte aus den Jahren, 786-1182, Berlin, 1843, 3 vols. G. H. KLIPPEL.

WENDELIN. WERKMEISTER.
His book in favor of divorce (Beweis, dass die bei den Protestanten üblichen Ehescheidungen auch nach katholischen Grundsätzen gültig sind, 1804, 2d ed., 1810) produced a great sensation. PALMER.

WERNSDORF. Gottlieb, b. at Schönewalde, Feb. 25, 1668; d. at Wittenberg, July 1, 1729; was appointed professor of theology in his native city in 1689, and provost of the cathedral church, and superintendent-general, in 1710. He was one of the last prominent representatives of the old, strict Lutheran orthodoxy. In his treatise, De auctoritate librorum symbolicorum, he vindicates a mediate inspiration for the symbolic books of the Lutheran Church. His Disputationes academicae, of which a collected edition appeared in 1738, and which touch all the vital questions of the time, are not without interest. THOLUCK.

WERTHEIM, The Bible of, is a German translation of the Pentateuch, the first instalment of the translation of the whole Bible which was published at Wertzheim in 1735 by J. L. Schmidt, at that time tutor in the house of the count of Löwenstein. The work is a paraphrase rather than a translation, and is executed, not without knowledge, but on the principles of the flattest rationalism. Not only are the spirit and true character of the original work entirely lost, but the meaning of single passages is often so curiously though unintentionally perverted, that the result becomes perfectly ridiculous. Nevertheless, the work found its patrons, and was on the way to a fair success, when it was most vehemently denounced by the theologians. An imperial edict of Jan. 15, 1737, ordered the work to be seized, and the author imprisoned. The end of the affair is not known, but Schmidt died in 1750 at tutor to the ducal pages of Wolfenbüttel. The book, though confiscated, is not difficult to get hold of in second-hand bookstores, and is of great historical interest. The various pamphlets which were issued in the controversy caused by the work have been collected by J. N. Simmhold, Erfurt, 1737, and by the author himself, 1738. ED. REUSS.

WESEL, Johann von, one of the most interesting characters among the Reformers before the Reformation; b. at Oberwesel in the beginning of the fifteenth century; d. at Mayence in 1481. Very little is known of his life before formal proceedings were instituted against him as a heretic in 1479, and at that time he was an old man. In the middle of the century he taught philosophy and theology at Erfurt. In philosophy he was a nominalist, one of the foremost leaders of that reaction against realism which was setting in just at that time. He taught with great effect: he mastered the formal principle of Protestantism — SubSTANTiation was unnecessary; concerning celi, he said, that there was no difference between a bishop and a presbyter. At every point he made as great concessions as he conscientiously could, and by a general recantation he succeeded in escaping the stake; but he was locked up for life in an Augustinian convent at Mayence. From the elaborate report of the trial which has come down to us, as well as from Wesley's writing, it is evident that he mastered the formal principle of Protestantism — Scripture the sole rule of faith — with a greater clearness and completeness than the Reformers themselves, at least in the beginning of the Reformation. But it is also evident that he never actually reached the material principle of Protestantism,— justification by faith; though he began his attack at the very same point as the Reformers, the doctrine of indulgences. He knew very well that ecclesiastical penance is very far from being identical with divine punishment, and that the Pope can dispense only from the former. He knew, furthermore, that a treasure of good works at the disposal of the Pope, and the transference by him of merit from one person to another, were empty pretensions. But to his eyes the sale of indulgences was simply an ecclesiastical abuse: that it was a danger to conscience he did not see.

LIT. — Wesel was quite a prolific writer, but of his works only the two above mentioned have come down to us. A report of his trial is found in D'ARGENT: Collectio judiciorum de noecis errabbus, Paris, 1728. It consists of three parts, — Paradoxa Joannis de Weselai (a collection of heretical propositions drawn from his various works), Examen magistri (a representation of the trial), and, finally, a survey by the author of the whole affair. Wellington. He was educated at Westminster school under his brother Samuel, 1716; at St. Peter's College, Westminster, 1721; and at Christ Church, Oxford, 1726, where, with his brother John and one or two others, he received the nickname of "Methodist." In 1735 he was ordained, and went with John Wesley to Georgia, returning 1736. May 21, 1738, he "experienced the witness of adoption," and at once joined his brother's evangelistic work, travelling much, and preaching with great zeal and success. He never held public offices in the Wesleyan Church in England, and bore his share of the persecutions which beset the early Methodists. April 8, 1749, he married Sarah Gwynne: by her he had eight children, two of whom became eminent musicians. John Wesley's expression, "his least praise was his talent for poetry," is unmeaning: whatever his other gifts and graces, it is as the "poet of Methodism" and the most gifted and prolific writer of English hymns of his day. The Poetical Works of John and Charles Wesley, as reprinted 1885-87, fill thirteen volumes, or near six thousand pages. Of the original publications, the earlier ones bore the names of both brothers, but most were the work of Charles alone. While in the books of joint authorship it is not always possible to distinguish with absolute certainty between the two, it is generally agreed that John wrote only the translations (almost wholly from the German, some forty in all) and a very few originals. Their style is the same, save for a little more severity and dignity on John's part. Their first volume (or perhaps John's alone, for it bears no name), possibly also the first English Collection of Psalms and Hymns, appeared at Charleston, S.C., 1737. A single copy was found in London, 1870, and reprinted 1882. It contains some pieces by John, but apparently none by Charles, who perhaps had not then begun to write. Another small Collection was published in London, 1738; and in 1739 began the long series of original works in verse. The more extensive of these were Hymns and Sacred Poems, 1739, 1740, 1742 (three separate books): the same, 1749, 1750; Hymns on God's Everlasting Love, 1741; On the Lord's Supper, 1745; For the Great Salvation and those that have Redemption, 1747; Funeral Hymns, 1746-59; Short Hymns on Select Passages of Holy Scripture, 2 vols. (2,548 pieces), 1762; Hymns for Children, 1763; For Families, 1767; On the Trinity, 1767. Besides these there are some twenty tracts, minor in size, but containing some of Charles Wesley's most effective lyrics, and a few vigorous and original hymns of public interest: his autobiographic and polemic works. The collection went on, though less vigorously in later years, till 1785, and that of composition till his death, at which he left in manuscript a quantity of verse, chiefly on Bible texts, equal to one-third of that printed in his lifetime. His huge fecundity hindered his fame: he had written less, he might be read more; but he had not the gift of condensing. His thoughts, or at least his feelings, flowed more readily in verse than in prose: he wrote on horseback, in a stage-coach, almost in "the article of death." His fifty-six Hymns for Christian Friends, some of them long and widely used, were dedicated to Miss Gwynne; and his last verse, taken down by her "when he could scarcely articulate," preserves something of the old fire. He wrote with equal grace In Going to Answer a Charge of Treason, and For a Child Cutting his Tooth. Nearly every occasion and condition of external life is provided for in the vast range of his productions, which have more "variety of matter and manner" than critics have commonly supposed; and, as to feelings and experiences, he has celebrated them with an affluence of diction and a splendor of coloring rarely surpassed — or, more accurately, never surpassed, and rarely equalled. Temperament and belief alike inclined him to subjective themes, and, guiding his unique lyrical talent, made him pre-eminently "the poet of Methodism." To the wonderful growth and success of that system his hymns were no less essential than his brother's government. They are the main element in most Wesleyan collections, both English and American: probably no school or system in any age or land has owned so mighty an implement in the way of sacred song. For the same reason non-Methodists long suspected and shunned this poetry, and still need to exercise unusual caution in adopting it. Its author was given not only to extravagances of expression (which were sometimes pared down by his brother's severer taste), but to unrestrained and often violent emotion. His ecstasies and agonies occur too frequently for sober readers, and many of his finest pieces are in this high key. Withal he is too fluent, too rhetorical: his mannerism at times involves a lack of simplicity; his "fateful facility of strong words" is a fault both literary and religious. Yet his intensely sincere and fervent piety, his intellectual strength and acuteness, his unmistakably high culture, and the matchless spontaneity of his eloquence, place him easily at the head of British sacred lyri- cists. No collection is complete — probably for a century none has been formed — without his hymns; and they are now perhaps more generally and widely used than of old. He is entitled to rank not merely as a hymn-writer, but among Christian poets. Many of his pieces which are not adapted to public worship, and very little known, possess much literary and human interest: his autobiographic and polemic verses, e.g., are gratefully well. He cannot be adequately judged by his fragments scattered in the hymnals, not even by John Wesley's Collection for the Use of the People called Methodist (1780; supplement 1830); though that presents a considerable fraction of his writings, with much less abridgment and alteration than any other, and has nearly all the qualities claimed by its editor in his vigorous and memorable preface. WESLEY, John, the father of the doctrinal and practical system of Methodism; b. at Epworth, Eng., June 28, 1703; d. in London, March 2, 1791. The Wesley family has been traced, by an indefatigable genealogist in late years, back to a period anterior to the Norman Conquest. In the days of Athelstan the Saxon, Guy Wesley, or Wells- ley, was created a thane, or member of Parliament; and it is claimed that the genealogy of the family may be followed in an unbroken line from Guy to Samuel Wesley, the father of the Reformer. Samuel Wesley was a graduate of Oxford, and a minister of the Church of England. He married in 1689 Susannah, the twenty-fifth child of Dr. Samuel Annesley, who became the mother of nine other children. In 1690 he was appointed rector of Epworth, where John, the fifteenth child, was born. He was christened John Benjamin, but he never used the second name. An incident of his childhood was his rescue, at the age of six, from the burning rectory. The manner of his escape made a deep impression on his mind; and he spoke of himself as a "brand plucked from the burning," and as a child of Providence. With a small income and a large family, the good rector, with the utmost economy, was most of the time in debt. The early education of all the children was given by Mrs. Wesley, a woman of remarkable intelligence and deep piety, apt in teaching, and wise and firm in governing. At the age of ten John was admitted to the Charterhouse School, London, where he lived the studious, methodical, and (for a while) religious life which he therein aimed at. He entered Christ Church College, Oxford, seven years later, was ordained in 1725, elected fellow of Lincoln College in the following year, and given his degree of M.A. in 1727. He served his father as curate two years, and then returned to Oxford to fulfill his functions as fellow.

The year of his return to Oxford (1729) marks the beginning of the rise of Methodism. The famous Holy Club was formed; and its members, including John and Charles Wesley, were derisively called "Methodists," because of their methodical habits. John had enjoyed during his early years a deep religious experience. He went, says his latest and best biographer, Tyerman, to Charterhouse a saint; but he became negligent of his religious duties, and left a sinner. In the year of his ordination he read Thomas à Kempis and Jeremy Taylor, and began to grope after those religious truths which underlay the great revival of the eighteenth century. The reading of Law's Christian Perfection and Serious Call gave him, he said, a sublimer view of the law of God; and he resolved to keep it, inwardly and outwardly, as sacredly as possible, believing that in this obedience he should find salvation. He pursued a rigidly methodical and abstemious life; studied the Scriptures, and performed his religious duties with great diligence; pinched himself that he might have aims to give; and gave his heart, mind, and soul to the effort to live a godly life. When a clergyman "inured to contempt of the ornaments and conveniences of life, to bodily austerities, and to serious thoughts," was wanted to go to Georgia, Wesley responded, and remained in the colony two years, returning to England in 1738, feeling that his mission, which was to convert the Indians, and deepen and regulate the religious life of the colonists, had been a failure. His High-Church notions, his strict enforcement of the regulations of the church, especially concerning the administration of the holy communion, were not agreeable to the colonists; and he left Georgia with several indictments pending against him (largely due to malice) for alleged violation of church law.

As Wesley's spiritual state is the key to his whole career, an account of his conversion in the year of his return from Georgia must not be omitted. For ten years he had fought against sin, striving to fulfill the law of the gospel, endeavored to manifest his righteousness; but he had not, he wrote, obtained freedom from sin, nor the approbation of the Spirit, because he sought it not by faith, but "by the works of the law." He had learned from the Moravians that true faith was inseparably connected with dominion over sin and constant peace proceeding from a sense of forgiveness, and that saving faith is given in a moment. This saving faith he obtained at a Moravian meeting in Aldersgate Street, London, while listening to the reading of Luther's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans, in which explanation of faith and the doctrine of justification by faith is given. "I felt," he wrote, "my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins." Two or three weeks later he preached a remarkable sermon, enforcing the doctrine of present personal salvation by faith, which was followed by another, in which he declared "free in all, and free for all." He never ceased in his whole subsequent career to preach this doctrine and that of the witness of the Spirit. He allied himself with the Moravian society in Fetter Lane, and went to the Moravian headquarters in Germany to learn more of a people to whom he felt deeply indebted. On his return to England he drew up rules for the bands into which the Fetter-Lane society was divided, and published a collection of hymns for them. He met frequently with this and other religious societies in London, but did not preach often in 1738, because most of the parish churches were closed to him. His friend Whitefield, the great evangelist, upon his return from America, was likewise excluded from the churches of Bristol; and, going to the neighboring village of Kingswood, he there preached in the open air, February, 1739, to a company of miners. This was a bold step, and Wesley hesitated to accept Whitefield's earnest request to follow him in this innovation. But he overcame his scruples, and in April preached his first sermon in the open air, near Bristol. He said he could hardly reconcile himself to field-preaching, and would have thought, "till very lately," such a method of saying souls as "almost a sin." These open-air services were very successful; and he never again hesitated to preach in any place where an assembly could be got together, more than once occupying his father's tombstone as a pulpit. He spent upwards of fifty years in field-preaching,—entering churches when he was invited, taking his stand in the fields, in halls, cottages, and chapels, where he was not received. Late in 1739 a rupture with the Moravians in London occurred. Wesley had helped them organize in May, 1738, the Fetter-Lane society; and the converts of the preaching of himself, his brother, and Whitefield, had become members of their bands. But finding, as he said, that they had fallen into heresies, especially Quietism, a separation took place; and so, at the close of 1739, Wesley led to form his followers into a separate society. "Thus," he wrote, "without any previous plan, began the Methodist society in England." Similar societies were soon after formed in Bristol and Kingswood, and wherever Wesley and his co-adjutors made converts.

From 1739 onward, Wesley and the Methodists were persecuted by clergymen and magistrates, attacked in sermon, tract, and book; caballed by the populace; often in controversy; always at work among the neglected and needy; and ever increasing. They were denounced as promulgators of strange doctrines, fomenters of religious disturbances; as blind fanatics, leading the people astray, claiming miraculous gifts, inveighing against the clergy of the Church of England, and endeavoring to re-establish Popery. Wesley was frequently mobbed, and great violence was done both to the persons and property of Methodists. Seeing, however, that the church failed in its duty to call sinners to repentance, that its clergy were worldly-minded, and that souls were perishing in their sins, he regarded himself as commissioned of God to warn men to flee from the wrath to come; and no opposition, or persecution, or obstacles were permitted by him to prevail against the divine urgency and authority of his commission.

The prejudices of his High-Church training, his strict notions of the methods and proprieties of public worship, his views of the apostolic succession and the prerogatives of the priest, even his most cherished convictions, were not allowed to stand in the way in which Providence seemed to lead. Unwilling that ungodly men should perish in their sins and because they could not be reached from the pulpit, he began field-preaching. Seeing that he and the few clergymen co-operating with him could not do the work that needed to be done, he was led, as early as 1739, to approve tacitly, soon after openly, of lay-preaching; and whether the one side, by some of his preachers and societies, and most strenuously opposed on the other by his brother Charles and others, was constantly before him, but was not settled. In 1745 he wrote that he and his co-adjutors would make any concession which their conscience would permit, in order to live in harmony with the clergy; but they could not give up the doctrine of an inward and present salvation by faith alone, nor cease to preach in private houses and the open air, nor dissolve the societies, nor suppress lay-preaching. Further than this, however, he refused then to go. "We dare not," he said, "administer baptism or the Lord's Supper without a commission from a bishop in the apostolic succession." But the next year he read Lord King on the Primitive Church, and was convinced by it that apostolic succession was a sigament, and that he [Wesley] was "a scriptural episcopas as much as any man in England." Some years later Stillingfleet's tremicon led him to renounce the opinion that Christ or his apostles prescribed any form of church government, and he believed ordination was validly performed by a presbyter. It was not until about forty years after this that he ordained by the imposttion of hands; but he considered his appointment (saya Watson) of his preachers as an act of ordination. The Conference of 1746 declared that the reason more solemnity in receiving new laborers was not employed was because it savored of state, their ordination by consecration, "We desire to follow Providence as it gradually opens." When, however, he deemed that Providence had opened the way, and the bishop of London had definitively declined to ordain a minister for the American Methodists who were without the ordinances, he ordained by imposition of hands preachers for Scotland and England and America, with power to administer the sacraments. He consecrated, also, by "laying on of hands," Dr. Coke, a presbyter of the Church of England, to be superintendent or bishop in America, and a preacher, Alexander Mather, to the same office in England. He designed that both Dr. Coke and Mr. Mather should ordain others. This act alarmed his brother Charles, who besought him to stop and consider before he had "quite broken down the bridge," and not imitate his [Charles's] last remonstrance on earth, nor "leave an indelible blot on our memory." Wesley declared, in reply, that he had not separated from the church, nor did he intend to, but he must and would save as many souls as he could while alive, "without being careful about what may possibly be when I die." Thus, though he rejoiced that the Methodists in America were freed from entanglements with both Church and State, he counselled his English followers to remain in the church; and he himself died in that communion.

Wesley was a strong controversialist. The most notable of his controversies was that on Calvinism. His father was of the Arminian school in the church; but John settled the question for himself while in college, and expressed himself strongly against the doctrines of election and reprobation. Whitefield inclined to Calvinism. In his first tour in America, he embraced the views of the New-England school of Calvinism; and when Wesley preached a sermon on Free Grace, attacking predestination as blasphemous, as representing "God as worse than the Devil," Whitefield besought him (1739) not to repeat or publish the discourse. He deprecated a dispute or discussion. "Let us," he said, "offer salvation freely to all, but be silent about election." Wesley's sermon was published, and among the many replies to it was one by Whitefield. Separation followed in 1741. Wesley wrote of it, that those who held universal redemption did not desire it, but "those who held particular redemption would not hear of any accommodation." Whitefield, Harris, Cennick, and others, became the founders of Calvinistic Methodism. Wesley, however, were soon again on very friendly terms, and their friendship remained thenceforth unbroken, though they travelled different paths. Occasional publications appeared on Calvinistic doctrines, by Wesley and others; but in 1770 the controversy broke out anew with violence and bitterness. Toplady, Berridge, Rowland and Richard Hill, and others were engaged on the one side, and Wesley and Fletcher chiefly on the other side. Toplady was editor of the Gospel Magazine, which was filled with the controversy. Wesley in 1778 began the publication of the Arminian Magazine.

He was taught to fear the rod, and, if he cried at all, to cry in softened tones. The children were limited to three meals a day. Eating and drinking between meals was strictly prohibited. All the children were washed and put to bed by eight o'clock, and on no account was a servant to sit up at night. They were on no account allowed to call each other by their proper name without the addition of brother or sister, as the case might be. Six hours a day were spent at school, the

He was a man of considerable learning, great talent, and high character. As an old-fashioned Churchman he had no sympathy with the "new faith" of his brothers. His Poems on Several Occasions, 1736 (reprinted, with additions and Life, 1862), have much merit, and include one or two of our best epigrams, besides hymn to the Trinity, for Sunday, Good Friday, and Easter, and on the death of a young lady. These are of a high order, and show much of Charles Wesley's splendor of diction: they have been largely used in church hymn-books.

parents being the teachers. They were not taught to read till five years old, and then only a single day was allowed wherein to learn the letters of the alphabet, great and small. Psalms were sung every morning, when school was opened, and also every night, when the duties of the day were ended. In addition to all this, at the commencement and close of every day, each of the elder children took one of the younger, and read the psalms appointed for the day, and a chapter in the Bible, after which they severally went to their private devotions " (Life of Wesley, vol. i. pp. 17, 18). WESLEYAN FEMALE COLLEGE, located at Macon, Ga., and founded in 1836, is believed to be the first exclusively female college in the world chartered with full powers to confer upon females the usual degrees which had been hitherto conferred only upon males. It is under the control of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. In 1882 it received from Mr. George I. Sney of New York a hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. It is well endowed, and has a patronage of two hundred and fifty pupils. It is one of the oldest, largest, and best female colleges in the South.

WESSEL, Johann, with the surname Cansfort or Canvasort, from an estate in Westphalia, the original seat of the family; b. at Groeningen about 1420; d. there Oct. 4, 1489; was in Germany the most prominent of the precursors of the Reformation. He was educated in the school of Zwoll, which at that time was under the control of the Brethren of the Common Life, and came very early in contact with Thomas a Kempis, who resided in the vicinity. From Zwoll he went to Cologne to finish his studies. But he seems not to have found there what he sought. Cologne was the seat of the German Inquisition, and the theological faculty of the university was completely domineered by the spirit of that institution. He learned Greek, however, from some Greek monks who had sought refuge in the city, and the ferocity with which the mendicant monks, after his death, hunted down his books, and destroyed them, shows that he had good reasons for keeping quiet. He had, however, after all, and strangely to those who preserved his works as relics, and afterwards sent them to Luther. In 1521 Luther published a collection of them under the title Farrago rerum theologica- rum uberrima, containing De providentia, De causis et effectibus incarnationis et passionis, De dignitate et potentia ecclesiastica, De sacramento penitentiae. Quae sit vera communio sanctorum, De purgatorio, and a number of letters. A treatise, De eucharis- tia, he left out for dogmatic reasons: it advocated Zwilling's views, rather than those of his own. It is found in the editions of Groeningen (1614) and Giessen (1617), which also contain four or five other treatises not included in the Farrago. Nearly a dozen works are mentioned as having perished. The literary character of these treatises is rather singular. They look like monasica, these followed by their arguments and evidences, aphorisms with or without any further explanation or application; the whole arranged in a rather mechanical manner. From the days of his youth he used to carry along with him a huge note-book (mare magnum), in which he put down any observation he happened to make, any idea which chanced to arise within him, etc. From this mare magnum the treatises seem to have been drawn by a very simple method. Quite otherwise is it with their spiritual character. Johann Wessel was too deeply religious ever to feel satisfied with mere philosophy, Platonism, or Humanism; yet he was too philosophically occupied ever to become a true Reformer, a Hus, or a Savonarola. He remains forever floating between the philosophical argument and the polemical application, without ever approaching reality so near as to signify and of life by it. Nevertheless, well might Luther explain, when he became acquainted with Wessel's works, that, if he had written nothing before he had read them, people might have thought that he had stolen all his ideas from them. It follows, from the peculiar aphiatical character of Wessel's works, that no single idea can be pointed out as the centre of the whole system. In their somber homogeneity, all his ideas have an equal right, and any one of them might be chosen for an introductory or preliminary characterisation of his theological standpoint. Viewed, however, as a Reformer before the Reformation, his idea of the church becomes of special interest; and he has given a very happy definition of it in his Ep. ad Jac. Hoek; iii. a. where he says, "I believe with the church, but I do not believe in her." The church is a community, the community of saints; not, as Wielandt has it, a communio pretendentiorum, but a communio sanctorum, involving an idea of human personality which the pure doctrine of predestination is incapable of assimilating. The benefits which the individual may derive from this community are great, are invaluable, but at no moment can he become dependent on it for his personal relation to God. An organization and a visible representation of the community are good, are even necessary; but an organization sub uno populo is wholly mistaken, and may be changed. The Pope is so far from being infallible, that the right of the church to criticise and correct him is indispensable to safety. And less infallible are the rest of the clergy and the councils too. But where, then, is the authority? In external affairs, and in them alone, the authority rests with the incidental organization, which may be changed. But, with respect to questions of faith, it rests solely with the Bible; and so far as Wessel thought it necessary or expedient to apply any supplementary support, he seems, like a true son of the Sorbonne, to prefer the professor of divinity to the priest. There is a ministerium, and its influence may reach into the innermost recesses of religious life; but always that influence depends solely upon the individual, spiritual gifts of the minister: the office has no inherent authority whatever. It is apparent that such an idea of the church must in a very high degree affect the idea of the sacraments. In the middle ages the church was not only the administrator, but also the dispenser, of the means of grace: nay, she was herself the sum total of all means of grace. Consequently, in medieval theology, the doctrine of the church formed the basis for the doctrine of the sacrament; and a radical change of the former necessarily produced a corresponding modification of the latter. To Wessel the sacraments are simply fidei instrumenta, tanta semper efficacia, quanto est fides necosiosa, as has already been hinted above with respect to the Lord's Supper. The idea of an opus operatum he rejects. The efficacy of the mass does not depend on the intention of either the administrant or the celebrant, but solely on the disposition of the latter; and this disposition consists in hunger and thirst for the means of grace: the idea of a sacrifice he leaves entirely out of consideration.

Wessenberg, Ignaz Heinrich, b. in Dresden, Nov. 4, 1774; d. at Constance, Aug. 6, 1860; one of the noblest representatives of liberal Catholicism in the beginning of the present century. He was educated at Dillingen, under Sailer, and then studied theology at Wurzburg (where he first became acquainted with Dalberg) and in Vienna. In 1800 Dalberg appointed him his vicar-general in the diocese of Constance; and when Dalberg died, in 1817, the chapter of Constance unanimously elected him bishop. The Roman curia, however, refused in a very harsh manner to confirm the election; and when the curia, on two later occasions, continued to refuse to admit him to office, he retired to private life. The reasons of the curia's aversion to him were, that he advocated the establishment of a national church of Germany (Die Deutsche Kirche, Constance, 1814), and the revival of the general councils (Die grossen Kirchengesammlungen des 15. und 16. Jahrhunderts, Constance, 1840, 4 vols.), and that, as vicar-general, he had introduced the German language into the Liturgy and choir-singing of the churches of his diocese, and sent his seminarists to Pestalozzi to learn the new method of instruction, — presumptions which could never be forgiven. See his life, by J. Beck, Freiburg, 1862. Palmer.

Two of his pamphlets awakened a notable opposition: they were entitled A Sermon on the Duty and Obligation of Christians to marry in the Lord (1779), A Vindication of the Church in Stockbridge (1782). Among its Members several besides publishing more than a dozen sermons, and numerous essays in the Theological Magazine and the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, he was engaged in an elaborate correspondence with the Rev. Dr. John Ryland of England, and many other theologians.

As he read Latin with great facility, was familiar with the Greek of the New Testament, and had a respectable acquaintance with the Hebrew language; as he was an acute metaphysician, and a profound student of the Bible; as he was instructive and often a highly eloquent preacher,—he attracted to himself many theological pupils. They resided in his house, and uniformly spoke of him in terms of the highest admiration. At least five of them became eminent as preachers shortly after. Two of them were Samuel Spring, D.D., New Hampshire, and John Thurtell, King's-land, D.D., I.L.D., president of Harvard College. Dr. West was not only a man of wonderful diligence in his study, but was also a man of affairs. He exerted a marked influence over jurists. On the sabbath he was regularly listened to by six judges of Massachusetts courts. Of these the most celebrated was Theodore Sedgwick, whose personal intercourse with his pastor was intimate and long-continued. In 1793, when Williams College was incorporated, Dr. West was named as one of the trustees, and at the first meeting of the board was elected vice-president of the institution. He was one of Dr. Samuel Spring's chief counsellors in forming the Creed and Associate Statutes of Andover Theological Seminary. He was also a pioneer in the work of missionary and various charitable institutions.

WESTEN, Thomas von. b. at Trondhjem in 1682; d. there April 9, 1727; occupies a prominent place in the history of Protestant missions, on account of his self-sacrificing but very successful labor among the Fins and Lapps of the northernmost part of the Scandinavian peninsula. He studied theology at the university of Copenhagen, and was in 1710 appointed pastor of Weden, in the diocese of Trondhjem. Meanwhile, the foul Paganism and moral depravity in which the Finnish and Lappish nomads of Northern Norway lived had begun to attract the attention of the government; and, the Collegium de promocioendo curam evangelii having been founded in 1714, a college for the training of missionaries to the Fins and Lapps was immediately established at Trondhjem, and Westen was appointed its director Feb. 28, 1716. In the same year he made his first missionary tour in Norland and Finmarken; in 1718—19 his second, during which, churches were built in Tana, Forsanger, and Alten, and some Finnish children were brought to Trondhjem to be educated as missionaries; and in 1722 his third, which already showed good results. He was completely master of the language; translated Luther's Catechism into Lappish; wrote a Grammatica Lapponica, a Specimen vocabularii Laponici, a Lappish spelling-book, etc.; and succeeded in educating a number of zealous and devoted disciples. WESTERN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, The. The need of a theological seminary for the West had been felt for several years previous to the action taken by the General Assembly (O.S.) in 1825, which action was as follows: "It is expedient forthwith to establish a theological seminary in the West, to be styled 'The Western Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church of the United States.'" In 1827 the location was fixed at Allegheny, Allegheny County, Penn.; and on Nov. 10, 1827, the seminary was opened, with Rev. Joseph Stockton and Rev. Elisha P. Swift, D.D., as instructors. At that time "Alleghenytown, opposite Pittsburgh," was, an unincorporated village, and a part of Ross Township. As one of the inducements to locating the seminary at this place, eighteen acres of "common" had been released for the use of the institution. This grant included what is now known as Monument Hill; and the summit of this hill the trustees raised and erected. This building was occupied from the spring of 1831 until its total destruction by fire on Jan. 23, 1834. The present seminary building, which was dedicated on Jan. 10, 1856, is delightfully situated on Ridge Avenue, with West Park in front, and Monument Hill in the rear. The buildings of the seminary consist of Seminary Hall, containing chapel, lecture-rooms, and dormitories; Memorial Hall, containing dormitories, studies, and gymnasium; Library Hall, fire proof; and five professors' houses.

The government of the seminary is vested in a board of directors and a board of trustees; the former consisting of forty members (twenty-eight ministers, and twelve ruling elders), one-fourth of whom are chosen annually, the Board having the power to fill vacancies, subject to the veto of the General Assembly. The Board of Directors have power to elect, suspend, and remove professors; such election and removal being subject to the veto of the General Assembly. They superintend the curriculum, inspect the fidelity of the professors, and watch over the conduct of the students. The Board of Trustees, incorporated by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania on March 31, 1844, consists of thirty members, "nine of whom shall at all times be laymen citizens of the State of Pennsylvania," and to them is committed the management and disbursement of the funds of the institution. The internal management of the seminary is devolved upon the professors as a faculty, with the senior professor as president. Each professor at his inauguration subscribes the following pledge: "In the presence of God and ex animo, adopt, receive, and subscribe the following confession of my faith, or as a summary of the confession of my faith, I do solemnly, and ex animo, adopt, receive, and subscribe the Confession of Faith and Catechisms of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America as the confession of my faith, or as a summary and just exhibition of that system of doctrine and religious belief which is contained in Holy Scripture, and therein revealed by God to man for his salvation. And I do solemnly promise and engage not to inculcate, teach, or insinuate any thing which shall appear to me to contradict or contravene, either directly or impliedly, any thing taught in the said Confession of Faith or Catechisms, nor to oppose any of the fundamental principles of Presbyterian church government, while I shall continue a professor in this seminary.

There are five professorships, all endowed and still filled. The endowment of a chair of elocution is just about completed (1883). The seminary is open to students from all denominations of Christians. In addition to the regular course, extending over three years, there is a post-graduate course, for those who, from this or any other seminary, wish to pursue advanced studies. Nursed in the lap of the old synod of Pittsburgh, which, as soon as it was conscious of organic life, constituted itself the Western Missionary Society, the seminary inherited the missionary spirit. Her sons are found in all lands, and on the roll of her worthies are found the names of martyrs. The whole number of alumni is 1,415. It will not be deemed invidious to place at the head of the numerous patrons of the seminary the late Rev. Charles C. Beatty, D.D., LL.D., and James Laughlin, Esq., recently deceased. The gifts of Dr. Beatty exceeded two hundred thousand dollars.

The spirit and policy of the seminary are admirably expressed in the fundamental principle which was incorporated by its founders in the "plan": "That learning without religion in ministers of the gospel will prove injurious to the church, and religion without learning will leave the ministry exposed to the impositions of designing men, and insufficient in a high degree for the great purposes of the gospel ministry." This is the principle on which the seminary has been conducted. The combination of learning and piety, of erudition and earnestness, of intellectual discipline and practical efficiency, is the standard which has been set up. The measure of success which has been achieved in this line the seminary claims as one of its distinctive character-

WESTMINSTER ABBEY. This famous pile, at once cathedral and wallihall, is upon the site of a Saxon church, within the so-called "Thorney Isle," built under King Sebert in the seventh century. Long before the Norman Conquest (eleventh century), it was connected with a Benedictine monastery called the "Western," in contradistinction to St. Paul's, which was east. Hence the name "Westminster" given to the church subsequently built upon this site by Edward the Confessor (1055-65), who, though a Saxon, employed the Norman style of architecture. All that is now left of Edward's buildings is a few traces about the choir and the substructure of the dormitory, and on the south end of the abbey the Fryx house or chapel of the Fryx, in which the sacred vessel containing the eucharistic elements was kept. Henry III. (1216-72) is the great name connected with the early building of the abbey. He rebuilt the abbey church in the Early-English style, and the present transepts and choir are his; but the greater part of the present building dates from the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Henry VII.'s Chapel, in Late Perpendicular, is one of the most admired portions of the abbey. The most frequented is the "Poets' Corner," where lie buried Chaucer and Spenser, and where are the monuments to Shakespeare and Milton. The abbey as it now stands is in the form of a Latin cross, 511 feet long by 203 feet wide across the transepts. The nave and aisles are 74 feet wide, the choir 38 feet, and Henry VII.'s Chapel 70 feet.

The abbey passed from the government of an abbot to that of a dean when the monasteries were dissolved. For a short time the Abbey was a bishopric of Westminster. Under Mary the abbacy was restored, but under Elizabeth the present government by dean and chapter was established. In the abbey many important religious events have taken place. There met the bishops under Elizabeth; there, on one occasion, the Houses of Parliament, under Charles I., to hear a speech from Laud. In the Jerusalem Chamber (see art.) met the Assembly of Divines during the Civil War and the Commonwealth.

The present objects of interest are mainly the tombs of royal families and the tombs and tablets of illustrious men in all walks of life; but, as was to have been expected, a memorial in the abbey has been accorded to many whose fame was interred with their bones. See Dean STAN- drige's brilliant "History of New Westminster Abbey, London, 1867; 5th ed., 1882.

WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY (1643-59), a synod of Calvinistic and Puritan divines, which produced the doctrinal and disciplinary standards of the British and American Presbyterian churches. It occupies the first place of all synods held in the Reformed churches, not excepting even that of Dort, although this was of more importance for the Continent. It grew out of that great movement in English church history which began with the rising of the Scotch nation against the semi-Popish tyranny of Charles I. and Archbishop Laud, rolled like an avalanche all over England, cemented both nations in the "Solemn League and Covenant" (1643), and resulted in the temporary overthrow of the Stuart dynasty and episcopacy and the short but brilliant reign of Puritanism under Cromwell. The assembly was called together by the Long Parliament (which lasted from 1640 to 1653), to form, on a Calvinistic and Puritan basis, a complete creed, and a system of church polity and worship for the three united kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. It consisted of a hundred and twenty-one English clergymen (nearly all of them in episcopal orders, but of puritanic tendencies), five Scotch commissioners, and thirty lay assessors, of whom ten were peers, and twenty commoners. The members were all appointed by Parliament. The most distinguished were Lightfoot (the great rabbini-
The Westminster Assembly was a significant event in English church history, held from July 1 to July 26, 1643, in Westminster Abbey. It was a meeting of church leaders, including the bishops, clergy, and laymen, to discuss and formulate a new confession of faith. The assembly was not a legislative body but rather a commission to examine and report on the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. The assembly was opened by the Principal Baillie on July 1, 1643.

The assembly was composed of a large number of members, including John Owen, John Milton, and other prominent figures of the time. It was divided into committees, and the assembly met daily from nine to two, except on Saturday. The meetings were presided over by a prolocutor, and the scribes, Mr. Byfield and Mr. Twisse, were responsible for recording the proceedings. The assembly was characterized by its learned and exact discussions, with members speaking long and very learnedly.

The Westminster Assembly was significant for its role in the development of the Church of England. It led to the publication of the Westminster Confession of Faith, which became a key document in English Reformed theology. The assembly also contributed to the development of Presbyterianism and influenced the shape of subsequent church constitutions in Scotland and elsewhere.

The estimates of the assembly differ widely according to the denominational stand-point of the writer, but all must agree as to its importance and influence. Milton at first praised it highly; but, when it condemned his unfortunate book on Divorce, he spoke of it and of the Long Parliament with vindictive scorn. Clarendon disparaged it in his History of the Rebellion, who, from his familiarity with the leading members, was more competent to judge than either, thought that the synod compared favorably with any since the days of the apostles, and called its members "men of eminent learning, godliness, ministerial abilities, and fidelity." Stoughton (an Independent) gives the Westminster divine credit for "learning — scriptural, patriotic, scholarly, and modern — enough and to spare, as solid, substantial, and ready for use." A German historian, Gen. Von Rudloff, judges that "a more zealous, intelligent, and learned body of divines seldom, if ever, met in Christendom." Dr. Briggs closes his article on the Westminster Assembly with this strong commendation: —

"Looking at the Westminster Assembly as a whole, it is safe to say that there never was a body of divines who labored more conscientiously, carefully, and with the face of the communion documents, or a richer theological literature, than that remarkably learned, able, and pious body, who sat for so many trying years in the Jerusalem Chamber of Westminster Abbey."
WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY. 2501 WESTMINSTER STANDARDS.

On the Continent it is little known; but, among all the Presbyterian churches of Great Britain and the United States, its history is a familiar household word. It attempted too much, and went on the assumption of one national church, that should embrace all Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen, and be subject to one creed and one polity. But this was the error of the age, in which Episcopalianism shared alike with the Puritans. Both were equally intolerant, and expelled all nonconformists from their livings. The Independents, Baptists, and Quakers were somewhat in advance; yet the Independents excluded from toleration the Prelatists, Roman Catholics, Quakers, and Unitarians. It was, therefore, after a long series of persecutions and failures, that the idea of religious freedom took firm root in English soil. But while the Westminster Assembly and the Long Parliament failed, as far as England and Ireland are concerned, and were succeeded by the restoration of the Stuart dynasty and episcopacy, the doctrinal and disciplinary standards of the assembly have retained their vitality in Scotland and North America to this day. (See Westminster Standards.)

PHILIP SCHAFF.

WESTMINSTER STANDARDS. The Westminster Assembly of Divines (see preceding article) produced a complete set of church books, relating to doctrine, discipline, and worship. They were subjected to the Long Parliament, which ratified them with certain changes. With the Restoration of the Stuarts they were set aside in England, but retained in Presbyterian Scotland, and in all the Anglo-American Presbyterian churches. The doctrinal standards were also acknowledged, with some modifications, by the Independents, or Congregationalists, in England and New England.

I. THE DOCTRINAL STANDARDS.

1. THE WESTMINSTER CONFESSION OF FAITH. — It was completed Dec. 4, 1646, provided with the Scripture passages (by order of Parliament, which had six hundred copies printed), approved in full by the Church of Scotland in 1647, and, with a few changes, by the Long Parliament in 1648, under the title of Articles of Religion, omitting chaps. xxi. and xxi. But in spite of Parliament the Confession continues to be printed in Great Britain in the form in which it left the Assembly, and was adopted by the Church of Scotland. Its original title is, The Humble Advice of the Assembly of Divines now, by Authority of Parliament, sitting at Westminster, concerning a Confession of Faith, with the Quotations from the Scriptures necessary to support it, lately to both Houses of Parliament. (See the facsimile in Schaff's Creeds, iii. 598.) It consists of thirty-three chapters beginning with the doctrine of the Bible as the only rule of faith and practice, and ending with the last judgment. It is the clearest, strongest, most logical, and most careful symbolic statement of the Calvinistic scheme of Christian doctrine. (See CALVINISM.) It is based upon a thorough study of the Scriptures, and the Reformed theology, the earlier English and Scotch Confessions, but more particularly (as Dr. Mitchell has shown) upon the Irish Articles, which were probably drawn up by Archbishop Ussher, 1613, and form the connecting link between the Thirty-nine Articles and the Westminster Confession. Several sections, especially on the Holy Scriptures, the Holy Trinity, the Divine Decrees, the Fall, the Perseverance of Saints, and the Civil Magistrate, are almost verbatim derived from these Articles, which had been set aside by Arch-bishop Laud. (See Mitchell: The Westminster Confession, 1687, and Introduction to the Minutes. Schaff: Creeds, i. 702 sqq., and iii. § 30 sqq., where the Irish Articles are given in full.)

The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland has recently adopted an explanatory supplement, or "Declaratory Act" (May, 1879) which "sets forth more fully and clearly" some doctrines of Holy Scripture, among which are the following important modifications of the Westminster statements:

1. "That in regard to the doctrine of redemption as taught in the Standards, and in consistency therewith, God is willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance, and that he has provided a salvation sufficient for all, adapted to all, and in all the grace of it, and also with the responsibility of every man for his dealing with the free and unrestricted offer of eternal life."

2. "That the doctrine of man's total depravity, and of all his inability to any spiritual good accompanying salvation, is not held as implying such a condition of man's nature as would affect his responsibility under the law of God and the gospel of Christ, or that he does not experience the stirrings and restraining influences of the Spirit of God, or that he cannot perform actions in any sense good; although actions which do not spring from a renewed heart are not spiritually good or holy,—such as accompany salvation."

3. "That while none are saved except through the mediation of Christ and by the grace of His Holy Spirit who worketh when and where and how it pleaseth him; while the duty of sending the gospel to the heathen, who are sunk in ignorance, sin, and misery, is clear and imperative; and while the outward and ordinary means of salvation for those capable of being called by the Word are the ordinances of the gospel,—in accepting the Standards, it is not required to be held that any who die in infancy are lost, or that God may not extend his grace to any who are without the pale of ordinary means, as it might appear not in his sight."

4. "That in regard to the doctrine of the Civil Magistrate, and his authority and duty in the sphere of religious distinction in the Standards, this church holds that the Lord Jesus Christ is the only King and Head of the church, and 'Head over all things to the church, which is his body,' disapproves of all actions or persecuting or intolerant proceedings in religion; and declares, as hitherto, that she does not require approval of any thing in her Standards that teaches, or may be supposed to teach, such principles."

The American Presbyterian churches adopted the Westminster Confession and Catechisms at first without alteration, but with a liberal construction, "as being, in all the essential and necessary articles, good forms of sound words and systems of Christian doctrine" (Synod of Philadelphia, Sept. 19, 1729). After the Revolutionary War, however, it became necessary to change the articles on church polity, and to adapt them to the condition of the separation of Church and State. Such changes were made in chaps. xx., xxiii. 3, xxxi, 1 and 2, and adopted in the Synod of Philadelphia, May 29, 1788. (See the changes in Schaff's Creeds, i. 806 sq.) The Protestant-Episcopal Church had to make similar alterations in the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England; for all the creeds of the sixteenth century imply the union of Church and State, and the duty of the civil magistrate to support religion, and to punish heresy.

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church in 1813 made some doctrinal changes by modifying the statement on predestination in chap. iii. (See Schaff's Creeds, iii. 771.) The same body has subjected its modified confession to another revision in 1880. The Cumberland Presbyterians reject unconditional election, but hold to the perseverance of the saints. (See Cumberland Presbyterian.)

2. The Westminster Catechisms.—These are two.

(a) "The Larger Catechism," for Westminster, containing the Westminster Standards and Expositions of certain sections of the Confession. It was adopted by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, May 29, 1648, and presented to Parliament for examination and approval in the autumn of 1647, printed under the title The Humble Advice of the Assembly of Divines now by authority of Parliament sitting at Westminster, concerning a Larger (Shorter) Catechism, etc. Parliament approved the books, with slight exceptions, Sept. 15, 1648; the Scotch Kirk adopted them July 20 and 28, 1648, and again (after a temporary reprieve under Charles II.) in 1672. They had the chief share in framing the Larger Catechism, and Wallis the mathematician, in giving the Shorter Catechism its severely logical finish. The story about Gillespie's prayer suggesting the definition of God is doubtful. Both Catechisms contain an exposition of the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer, and an independent statement of the Christian system of doctrine after the Calvinistic type. The Apostles' Creed is not, as in other Catechisms, made the basis of the doctrinal expositions, but appended "because it is a brief sum of the Christian faith, agreeable to the word of God, and anciently received in the churches of Christ."

The Shorter Catechism is, next to Luther's Small Catechism and the Heidelberg Catechism, the most extensively-used catechism in Protestant Christendom. It exceeds all other Catechisms by the terse brevity and precision of the questions and answers, and differs from most by the following peculiarities: (1) It embodies the question in the answer, so as to make this a complete proposition or statement; (2) It substitutes a new and logical order of topics for the old historic order of the Apostles' Creed; (3) It deals in dogmas rather than facts, and addresses the intellect rather than the heart; (4) It puts the questions in an impersonal form, instead of addressing the learner directly; (5) To this may be added the theological and logical character of the answers. It admirably suits the Scotch and Anglo-American mind. The first questions of the typical Catechisms are very characteristic. The Longer Catechism of the Orthodox Eastern Church begins, "What is an orthodox Catechism? What is election? What is the Anglican Catechism? What is your name?" Luther's Small Catechism, "What means the First Commandment?" the Heidelberg Catechism, "What is thy only comfort in life and in death?" the Westminster Shorter Catechism, "What is the chief end of man?"

On the doctrinal standards of the Westminster Assembly, see Expositions of the Confession by Dickson (Edinb., 1864), Shaw (Edinb., 1845), A. A. Hodge (Phil., 1869, etc.); Expositions of

II. The Directory of Public Worship.—This was prepared during 1644, sanctioned by the English Parliament Jan. 3, 1645, approved by the Scotch Assembly and Parliament in February, 1645, and published in the same year in London and Edinburgh. It was intended to be a substitute for the Anglican Book of Common Prayer; but, instead of prescribing liturgical forms, it gives minute directions and suggestions to the minister how to conduct public worship. III. The Directory for Church Government and Discipline.—This sets forth the principles of Presbyterian church polity, on which see the art. Presbyterianism and the literature there given. The debates of the Assembly on church government will probably be published soon by Professor Mitchell, from the Minutes in Dr. Williams’ library.

Philipp Schauff, Westphal, Joachim, b. in Hamburg in 1510 or 1511; d. there Jan. 16, 1574. He studied theology at Wittenberg, under Luther and Melanchthon; visited, also, the universities of Jena, Erfurt, Marburg, Heidelberg, Strassburg, and Basel; and was appointed preacher at the Church of St. Catherine, in his native city, in 1541, and superintendent in 1571. He began his polemical activity by partaking in the controversy occasioned by his edition of the Minutes, Edinburgh, 1874; and attacking Melanchthon, he wrote two pamphlets on the question of true and false adiaphora. — Historia vituli aurei Aenon, etc. (Magdeburg, 1519), and Explicatio generalis, etc. (Hamburg, 1550). But his great controversial exploit was the contest he raised between the Swiss and the German Reformers concerning the Lord’s Supper, and which produced much disputation and much misery in the Protestant Church. He opened the attack, when Peter Martyr’s Oxford Lectures on the Lord’s Supper were published in 1552, with his Farrago opinionum de Cena Domini (Magdeburg, 1552), in which he exhorited all true Lutheran theologians to come forward and give battle. But the Lutheran theologians were too much occupied at that moment with other things, and their own interests, and the Reformed theologians took no notice of the book. Once more Westphal made an attack (Recta fides de Cena Domini, etc., Magdeburg, 1553), but with no better success. Then an event of practical consequence came to his aid. John a Lasco and the Reformed Congregation of foreigners in London were expelled by the Bloody Mary; and the various Lutheran communities in which they sought refuge—Copenhagen, Lubeck, Breslau, Hamburg, etc. — refused to admit them. In this persecution Westphal took a prominent part; and when he made his third attack, Collectanea sententiarum Aurelii Augustini de Cena Domini (Ratisbon, 1555). Calvin came forward with his Defensor, etc. Calvin’s answer is proud, almost disdainful, and it produced a tremendous stir in the Lutheran camp. The battle was soon raging along the whole line. On the Reformed side were Calvin, Lasco, Bullinger, and Beza; on the Lutheran, Brenz, Andrea, Schnepp, Paul von Eitzen, etc. Westphal also wrote some more pamphlets, but distinguished himself still more by his practical activity. When the city of Franfort opened its gates to Lasco and the other Reformed refugees from London, Westphal wrote to the magistrates, and admonished them to take care that the church of Franfort should not be poisoned by those heretics. He also endeavored to form all the North-German churches into one compact union on the basis of the true Lutheran conception of the Lord’s Supper, and he partially succeeded. His last attack, however, Confutatio aliquotenormium mendaciorum J. Calrini (1558), elicited no answer. See J. Müller: Cimbria literata, Copenhagen, 1744, T. iii.; Bretschneider: Corpus Reformatorum, Halle, 1840, vols. vii-ix.; Minckemberger: Westphal u. Calvin, Hamburg, 1865. Neudecker.

WESTPHALIA, The Peace of, ending the Thirty-Years’ War, was signed Oct. 14, 1648. The preliminaries were agreed upon as early as December, 1641; but the treacherous equivocations of the emperor, the jealousies between Sweden and France (who had different and sometimes opposite interests to defend), and the almost incredible haggling between the powers concerning rank and ceremony, prevented the congress from actually beginning its work until April, 1645. One part of the congress, consisting of deputies of the emperor, Sweden, and princes of the empire, sat at Osnabruck, a city of Westphalia, and finished its work Aug. 8, 1648: the other part, consisting of deputies of the emperor, France, and other foreign states, sat at Munster, a neighboring city, and finished its work Sept. 17. The complete instrument of peace was finally signed at Munster.

Leaving entirely out of consideration the merely political elements of the negotiations, and confining ourselves to the purely religious and ecclesiastical questions, the two general points of agreement were the confirmation of the peace of Augsburg, settling the relations between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants within the boundaries of the German Empire, and the establishment of full equality between the two Protestant churches,—the Lutheran and the Reformed. Of the special points of the treaty, two are of particular interest,—one concerning the right of possession with respect to certain ecclesiastical estates and revenues, and the other concerning the right of the prince to reform the confession of faith within the boundaries of his territory. In order to arrive at an agreement, it was decided to fix Jan. 1, 1624, as a norm from which to proceed; so that all churches, schools, hospitals, monasteries, or other kinds of ecclesiastical estate and revenue which at that day were in the possession of the Protestants, should be ceded to them; while, on the other hand, any kind of ecclesiastical property which they had acquired after that date should be returned to the Roman Catholic Church, and vice versa. Of course, such a rule could not be carried out with any degree of strictness without harshness. It seems, however, that the general result of the negotiations gave satisfaction to both the parties concerned. More difficult was the second point. The maxim, cujus dominium, ejus religio, which forms the basis of the so-called "Territorial System," had in Germany given rise to many despotic acts, entailing much suffering and endless confusion. More than once a prince had, by one stroke of the pen, changed the confession of his country from Lutheranism to Calvinism, or from Calvinism to Lutheranism; and generally the stroke of the pen had to be followed up with exile, confiscation of property, imprisonment, and the stake. It was now decided that those who on the day mentioned held a certain right of worship should continue to hold it, irrespective of the prince's jus reformandi exercitium religiosum, while those who at that time had acquired no such right were still at the mercy of their prince.

It must be noticed that all these stipulations were valid only for the German Empire, but not for the hereditary Austrian possessions of the emperor. Some of the great feudal lords of Silesia, the dukes of Bries, Liegnitz, Münsterberg, Oels, and the city of Breslau, obtained certain privileges from the emperor; but with respect to his other subjects no security, not even a promise of toleration, was given. At the signing of the treaty at Munster, the papal legate, Fabius Chigi, formally protested; and the protest was followed up by the bull Zelo domus Dei, Nov. 26, 1648. But the protest had no influence whatever, nor was it expected to have any. The usual diplomatic formalities were rapidly gone through, and peace was actually restored.

Thus, too, was peace confirmed. Meanwhile he continued the preparatory work for his great edition of the Greek New Testament, of which the prolegomena appeared anonymously at Amsterdam, 1730, and the work itself in 1751-52, 2 vols. folio. Expediency compelled him to print the textus receptus, and to put his various readings in the form of notes. William Bowyer subsequently (London, 1763) printed a text which incorporated Wetstein's preferred readings. Besides the wealth of textual illustration, Wetstein's New Testament is pre-eminent for its parallel passages from the classics, the fathers, and the rabbins; so that it has been a quarry for commentators ever since.

He carried the collation of manuscripts farther than all his predecessors, having personally examined upwards of forty. He also introduced the present mode of designating uncial manuscripts by Roman capitals, and cursive by Arabic figures. See Bible Text, pp. 274, 275; and, for personal information, see L. MEISTER: Helvetische Scenen der neueren Schiwwerei und intoleranz, Zurich, 1785, pp. 167 sqq.; and the Prolegomena to his New Testament.

HAGENBACH.

WETSTEIN. Johann Jakob, b. in Basel, March 5, 1693; d. in Amsterdam, March 22, 1754. He early showed his inclination toward biblico-textual studies; and his first dissertation was upon the various readings of the New Testament. His acquaintance with New-Testament manuscripts was greatly increased by his travels in France and England; but in 1729 he returned to Basel to become assistant to his father, who was pastor of St. Leonard's Church. Although his duties were not congenial, they were faithfully performed. Meanwhile he continued the preparation of his great edition of the Greek New Testament, and gave private lectures upon exegetical and dogmatical. Bengal was preparing his edition, likewise, and employed two Basel professors to collate the codices in the Basel Library. Between these two and Wetstein a feud arose respecting the age and value of K (see Bible Text), which Wetstein did not put so high as they, resting on Mill's authority. The feud became personal; and then the vague rumors of heresy, which had for some time been circulating, assumed the form of charges. To many persons conclusive evidence of this aberration was Wetstein's rejection of the reading of the textus receptus for ὀντός in 1 Tim. iii. 16. The latter is probably the correct reading, but people said he wanted to take away a proof-text of the divinity of Christ. His assertion that he merely followed the Codex Alexandrinus because careful study had convinced him that it was correct, was declared a subterfuge. He was tried for holding Arius and Socinian views, found guilty, and deposed May 13, 1730. But just then a new career opened to him: he succeeded Clericus in the Remonstrants' College at Amsterdam, and thenceforth he lived there. He won for himself an imperishable fame by his edition of the Greek New Testament, of which the Prolegomena appeared anonymously at Amsterdam, 1730, and the work itself in 1751-52, 2 vols. folio. Expediency compelled him to print the textus receptus, and to put his various readings in the form of notes. William Bowyer subsequently (London, 1763) printed a text which incorporated Wetstein's preferred readings. Besides the wealth of textual illustration, Wetstein's New Testament is pre-eminent for its parallel passages from the classics, the fathers, and the rabbins; so that it has been a quarry for commentators ever since. He carried the collation of manuscripts farther than all his predecessors, having personally examined upwards of forty. He also introduced the present mode of designating uncial manuscripts by Roman capitals, and cursive by Arabic figures. See Bible Text, pp. 274, 275; and, for personal information, see L. MEISTER: Helvetische Scenen der neueren Schiwwerei und intoleranz, Zurich, 1785, pp. 167 sqq.; and the Prolegomena to his New Testament.

WETTE, DE, Wilhelm Martin Leberecht, b. at Ulla, near Weimar, Jan. 12, 1780; d. at Basel, June 10, 1849. His theological studies were made at Jena, where he was greatly influenced by the great textual critic Griesbach, and by Paulus. From the latter he derived his taste for a systematic and methodical study of the Scriptures. But his earliest publications, his critical dissertation upon Deuteronomy (Jena, 1805, republished in his Opi. Theo.., Berlin, 1833), and, in the same year, his Beitrag zur Einleitungen in das Neue Testament ("Contributions to New-Testament Introduction"), proved his originality and independence.

Unlike F. J. Mill, De Wette strove to show in the first-mentioned work that the Pentateuch was not from Moses, but was a collection of independent documents made by several persons and at different times. The earliest collection, he dates from the time of David, the last, Deuteronomy, from that of Josiah. These views he intended to present at length; but Vater anticipated him, and therefore he modestly made merely an abstract of them, and appended it to his Critical Examination of the Credibility of Chronicles (Jena, 1806) as an avowed supplement to Vater's book on the Pentateuch. De Wette charged intentional alterations and additions in a predominating levitical and hierarchical spirit upon the Chronicles. See his essay A. T., Jena, 1806, 1807, 2 vols. By his essay on Deuteronomy, De Wette won his degree of Ph.D., and became privatdozent at Jena, but in 1807 was called to Heidelberg as professor of theology. While there he made, at first in conjunction with Augusti, but later alone, a translation of the entire Bible (Heidelberg, 1809-14, 4th ed., 1839), and wrote his Commentary on the Psalms (1811, 3d ed., 1826), which is so exclusively critical that he himself endeavored to make amends by a special appendix, — On the Devotional Use of the Psalms, 1837. He denies the Davidic origin given to many psalms, their early dates, and also that the historical intention of an ideal future could be practically applied to nearer historicalevents, although at the same time he granted that they represented the death of Christ as an inevitable, yet to him quite unexpected, consequence of his moral nature: Christ died nobly as a sacrifice and expiation, his renowned Concise Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament,—a work marked by masterly brevity and precision and the most exact and accurate scholarship.

It remains to speak of De Wette's philosophical and theological opinions, early embraced and worked out, and mainly adhered to through life. These will be best read in his Ueber Religion u. Theologie, Erläuterungen zum Lehrbuch der Dogmatik (Berlin, 1815, new edition, 1821).
theism of the Kantian criticism forms the basis of De Wette's doctrinal system; but he leans visibly towards Jacobi's theory of religion as feeling. He makes a sharp distinction between knowledge and faith. The former refers to the intellect, and has to do only with finite things; while the infinite must be grasped by faith under the form of feeling.—devotion, enthusiasm, resignation, etc. The infinite is revealed by the finite in a symbolic manner. The whole historical revelation is a symbol in which the eternal and supersensuous ideas have found their expression. The miracle is a cross to the understanding, but as a symbol it shows its meaning. The dogma is inaccessible to the understanding, but opens itself to the intuition; for intuition is the only means of conceiving when the object is a symbol. All religious conception is consequently esthetical, and this esthetic elevation above the merely intelligible is to De Wette the only tenable form of supranaturalism. De Wette was pre-eminently an ethical theologian. He closely connected dogma with ethics, and made ethical considerations decisive in judging other systems. He held fast to the personal W. of Christ, and in the preface to his Commentary on Revelation made use of the following remarkable language: "I know that there is salvation in no other name but the name of Jesus Christ and him crucified; and that there is salvation in no other name but the name of De Wette production. De Wette was a layman, and married. See his biography in vol. xi. of the encyclopaedia with which his name and that of his co-editor, Benedict Welte, are indissolubly connected. The first volume was completed 1847. W. set apart his time, strength, and learning at the disposal of the work, and the result was eminently satisfactory. The encyclopedia of Wetzer and Welte is authoritative, fair-minded, and, for a Roman-Catholic work, impartial to a singular degree. (The first volume of a revised edition tendered by Kaulen appeared 1882.) Wetzer was a layman, and married. See his biography in vol. xii. of the encyclopedia; b. at Anzefahr, Hesse, March 19, 1801; d. in Freiburg, Nov. 3, 1853. His favorite study was Oriental philology; and this he prosecuted at Marburg, Tübingen, and Paris. In 1824 he received from Freiburg the degrees of doctor of theology and canon law, and became extraordi-able for their independence. Thus he advocated a revision of the Liturgy, a revision of the Authorized Version of the Bible, the abrogation of the prohibition to marry a deceased wife's sister, the emancipation of Indian boys, (See on Jewish Disabilities, 1833) and Roman Catholics.

Whately's theological stand-point was substantially that of rational supernaturalism. He was, however, no creative genius, but followed, in his usual independent way, the direction of Paley. He left no systematic treatise; yet his principal ideas are easily gathered from his numerous essays, sermons, charges, and speeches; and the living proof of his great influence upon English theology is the Broad Church party. The liquid clearness of his style, and his soberness and impartiality, demand a word of recognition. In his theological writings he ever quietly opposed Tractarianism. The following are the principal points of his distinctive teaching. 1. Relation between Reason and Revelation. — What reason can discover is not revealed. What it cannot discover, and its object is to enable it to find an article of faith by proof from particular passages of Scripture. What is contrary to reason can only be so made by the most indisputable evidence. While believing in the right and necessity of a revelation, he found a place for reason within revelation's limits, and a duty for it, — to find out the truth. Whately was a genuine disciple of the "evidential" school. Faith is to him the conclusion drawn from historical premises. 2. The Scriptures. — Revelation is to be distinguished from mere matters of history, etc. The former is infallible, inspired, if not verbally, at least substantially. The peculiarities of Scripture, its omissions, etc., are to be referred to the special guidance of the Holy Spirit. Its contents are practical truths expressed in popular language. The Bible is to be interpreted as the persons immediately addressed would understand it. There is no infallible interpretation; but the effort should be to get at this primitive understanding by a study of the circumstances and religious ideas and customs of the first Christians. (The merit of this view was its demand for a historically-grammatical exegesis.) 3. Doctrine of Election. — In the Old Testament, election is set forth as arbitrary; but it concerns not individuals, but whole nations. In the New Testament it is represented as embracing all those members of the Christian Church who use the preaching of the gospel and the means of grace to their salvation. 4. Christology. — The self-witness of Jesus to his divinity is the strongest proof in the New Testament for the doctrine, and the most important part of it is that borne before the Sanhedrin and Pilate. The incarnation is an extraordinary act of revelation, in order (1) to make divinity more intelligible to us, and (2) to give a pattern of human perfection. The death of Christ was sacrificial; but, as circumstances conspired to bring it about, it was not necessarily an unavoidable catastrophe. 5. Doctrine of Justification. — The death of Christ is the only ground of our salvation. There is no such thing as imputed righteousness. 6. Christianity. — (Cf. The Christian's Duty with respect to the Established Government and the Laws, 1821, and The Kingdom of Christ, 1841.) The Christian revelation is substantially a revelation of the truth in the words and example of Christ. Christianity is, on the other hand, a social religion. The kingdom of Christ is a society, whose members may at the same time belong to other societies. This problem of Church and State is solved. Christ has himself given the plan for the society's government, but the execution of this plan lies with the society. It has, like every other society, its officers, who have the right to draw up rules for the admission and expulsion of members. This is the so-called "power of the keys," — a power which does not reach to the forgiveness of sins, but only to ecclesiastical penances. The essentials of Christianity are of universal, the minor matters, only of relative, importance. The authority of ecumenical councils is not justified by the Bible, which rather recognizes independence among churches. There is no such thing as apostolic succession in the sense of its securing the transmission of the Holy Ghost and the efficacy of the sacraments. The true apostolic succession is maintenance of the apostolic principles. (Cf. Scripture Doctrine concerning the Sacraments, 1857.) Baptism, analogous to circumcision, is the initiatory rite; and infant baptism, with its obligations on the parents, was therefore to be expected, unless it had been expressly prohibited. It is the removal from a state of damnation to a state of grace. The Lord's Supper is symbolic, else the Lord had instructed his disciples otherwise; for they could not have supposed that he gave them his actual body. 8. Eschatology. — (Cf. View of the Scripture Revelations concerning a Future State, 1829.) No revelation of immortality in the Old Testament. Belief in it among the Jews first sprang up in the Maccabean period. The only sure ground of it is the express promise of it as a free gift of God through Christ. Resurrection is not to be understood of the atoms of the body. 9. The Sabbath. — If the Mosaic law has been abrogated, then the law of the sabbath is: if the Mosaic law of the sabbath is still binding, then there is no authority for the change of the day from Saturday to Sunday. Christ himself broke the sabbath, and gave his disciples no fixed command respecting it, but left it to the church to fix a day, precisely as in the case of other festivals.

WHEATELY, 2507. WHEELOCK.

WHEELock Eleazer, D.D., Congregational minister; b. at Windham, Conn., April 22, 1711; d. at Hanover, N.H., April 24, 1779. He was minister of the Second Church in Lebanon, Conn., 1735-70; established there a school for the Christian education of Indian boys, called, from Joshua Moor, who gave in 1734 a piece of land for its use, "Moor's Indian Charity School." Out of this school, transferred to Hanover, N.H., 1770, sprang Dartmouth College, of which Dr. Wheelock was the first president. Famous among WHICHCOTE, Benjamin, one of the most eminent of the "Cambridge Platonists," or, as they were sometimes called, "Latitudinarians," of the seventeenth century (a party which included such men as Cudworth, Wilkins, More, and Worthington):—

WHICH COTE. 2508

Dr. Wheelock's pupils are Sampson Occom (see art.), Joseph Brant the Indian chief, and his own son John. He wrote "The Character of the Indian Charity School at Lebanon," 1762, and several continuations to it, 1763-73. See his "Memoirs" by McClure and Parish, 1810.—John Wheelock, D.D., LL.D., Congregational minister; second president of Dartmouth College; b. in Lebanon, Conn., Jan. 28, 1754; d. at Hanover, April 4, 1817. He was graduated from Dartmouth in the first class, 1771; was tutor, 1772-76; served as major and captain in the Continental army. On the death of his father (1779) he was chosen successor, and held the position to his death, except from 1815 to 1817, when, in consequence of an ecclesiastical controversy, he was removed. He published "Sketches of Dartmouth College," 1816.

WHICH COTE, William, D.D., b. at Lancaster, Eng., May 24, 1794; d. at Cambridge, March 5, 1860. He was successively undergraduate, fellow, and master of his college, Cambridge, 1820, and of Christ's 1824, and in 1835 vice-chancellor of the university. He was elected F.R.S., 1820; was professor of mineralogy, 1828-32; professor of moral philosophy, 1833-55. His attainments took a very wide sweep: "Science was his chief forte, and omniscience his foible." Probably his most valuable book is his "History of the Inductive Science," 1837; his most widely read, "Essay on the Plurality of Worlds," 1853. Valuable also are his "Lectures on Systematic Morality," 1846; "Lectures on the History of Moral Philosophy," 1852, and "The Platonic Dialogues for English Readers" (1859-61, 3 vols.). See "Account of his Writings, with Selections from his Literary and Scientific Correspondence," edited by Isaac Todhunter, London, 1876, 2 vols.

WHICH COTE, Benjamin, one of the most eminent of the "Cambridge Platonists," or, as they were sometimes called, "La tidinarians," of the seventeenth century (a party which included such men as Cudworth, Wilkins, More, and Worthington);—b. March 11, 1609; and d. May, 1683. He was descended from an ancient family, and was the sixth son of Christopher Whichcote, Esq., of Whichcote Hall in the county of Salop, and parish of Stoke. His mother was the daughter of Edward Fox, Esq., of Greet, in the same county. Of his training in boyhood nothing is known. In 1626 he was sent to Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He took his degree of B.A. in 1629, and of M.A. in 1633. In the latter year he became fellow of his college, where he appears to have remained as tutor till 1643. In that year he was presented to the college living of North Cadbury in Somersetshire; but, before he had time to settle himself in his new charge, he was recalled (1644) to Cambridge, having been offered, and, after some hesitation, accepted, the preferment of the provostship of King's College, in room of Dr. Collins, who had been ejected by the Parliament. He had been brought up under Puritan influences, but can hardly be said to have belonged to that or any other ecclesiastical party; and when he returned to Cambridge to occupy a prominent position in the university, it was more, to use the words of Principal Tulk, as "a thoughtful and independent student in religious matters than either as a Puritan or an Anglo-Catholic," that he took his place, and became a power in the university.

The date of the event just referred to, namely, Whichcote's appointment to King's College, marks the rise of the philosophical and religious movement with which he is identified. Cambridge Latitudinarianism or Platonism, as a system, must be estimated by the works of its most eminent representatives. It may be enough here to indicate the Puritan view of the school in question as expressed in the letters of Whichcote's Puritan friend Tuckney, master of Emmanuel. "Tuckney does not like Whichcote's "mode of preaching," as if not with the prejudice of imputation righteousness, which hath sometimes very unseemly language given it; yet much said of the one, and very little or nothing of the other. This was not Paul's manner of preaching."

"Whilst you were fellow here [in Cambridge], you were cast into the company of very learned and ingenious men, who I fear, at least some of them, studied other authors more than the Scriptures, and Plato and his scholars above others... and hence in part hath run a vein of doctrine, which divers very able and worthy men,—whom from my heart I much honor,—are, I fear, too much influenced by the power of Nature is too much advanced. Reason hath too much given to it in the mysteries of faith,—a recta ratio much talked of, which I cannot tell where to find. Mind and understanding is all: heart and conscience little spoken of. The decrees of God are questioned and quarreled, because, according to our reason, we cannot comprehend how they can stand with his goodness. ... There our philosophers and other heathens are much fairer candidates for heaven than the Scriptures seem to allow of; and they in their virtues are preferred before Christians... and they have been discarded as if not with the prejudice of imputed righteousness, which hath sometimes very unseemly language given it; yet much said of the one, and very little or nothing of the other. This was not Paul's manner of preaching."

"He stood at the head of the Cambridge thought of his time. He moved the university youth with a force which Tuckney and others failed to imitate. He inspired the highest intellect which it was desiderata to produce for thirty years. Men like Smith and Cudworth and More and Tillotson looked back to him as their intellectual master."

He continued his university career till the Restoration, when, though clearly distinguished from them in many ways, he shared the fate of the Puritan leaders, and was removed from his provostship by the special order of the king. When the Act of Uniformity was passed, he adhered, however, to the church, and in 1662 he was appointed to the cure of St. Anne's, Blackfriars, London. This church was burned down in the great fire of 1666, when he returned to a former preferment at Milton in Cambridgeshire, and in 1668 was promoted to the vicarage of St. Lawrence Jewry, where he passed his last years.

Four volumes of Discourses, and a series of Moral and Religious Aphorisms collected from his manuscripts, and his Correspondence, comprise all his works.

According to the editor of his Correspondence, "he was married, but I cannot learn to whom." He left no children. Tillotson preached his funeral sermon. Baxter numbers him with "the best and ablest of the conformists." Burnett describes him as a man of a rare temper, very mild and obliging. He had, Burnett says, “credit with some that had credit in the late times, but made all the use of it he could to protect good men of all persuasions. He was much for liberty of conscience; and being disgusted with the dry, systematical way of those times, he studied to raise those who conversed with him to a nobler set of thoughts.”

William Lee, Whiston, William; as theologian, a leading defender of Arianism in England; as mathematician, a scholar of Sir Isaac Newton; a very prolific and eccentric writer; b. at Norton, in Leicestershire, Dec. 9, 1687; d. in London, Aug. 22, 1752. He was educated at Cambridge, entered holy orders, and was chaplain of the bishop of Norwich. During his period of service, he wrote A New Theory of the Earth, from its Original to the Consummation of all Things, 1709, 1716, 5 ed. 1755. He became vicar of Lowestoft, Suffolk, in 1708, and in 1703 Sir Isaac Newton's successor as professor of mathematics at Cambridge. In 1702 he published A Short View of the Chronology of the Old Testament and of the Harmony of the Four Evangelists, in 1706, An Essay on the Revelation of St. John. In 1706, The Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (cf. The Literal Accomplishment, etc., 1724); in 1700, Sermons and Essays; in 1710, Preflections physico-mathematicae, sive philosophia clarissimi Newtoni mathematica illustrata, quickly Englished, and which first popularized Newtonian ideas. But his stay at Cambridge was destined to be abruptly terminated. In 1708 he prepared an essay upon the Apostolical Constitutions of Clemens Romanus, in which he endeavored to prove that Arianism was the dominant faith in the first two centuries, and maintained that the Constitutions was the “most sacred of the canonical books of the New Testament.” This essay was not allowed by the chancellor to be printed; but Whiston’s ardent advocacy of his opinions rendered his heterodoxy incapable of concealment, and he was accordingly tried, and expelled the university in 1710. He passed the rest of his days in London. His next publication was A Primitive Christianity Revised (1711, 1712, 5 vols.), in which he printed the essay referred to, gave text and translation of the Constitutions, and translations of the Ignatian Epistles, the Second Book of Esdras, the Patristic references to the Trinity, and the Recognitions of Clement, prefacing these with an account of his treatment at Cambridge and his conviction and closing with observations on Dr. Samuel Clarke’s Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, and the proceedings of conviction in his own case. He showed his zeal for “Primitive Christianity” by organizing a society for its promotion; but as the more cautious Arians, noticeably Dr. Clarke himself, declined to join it, in a few years it died out. In 1712 Whiston accepted Baptist and Millenarian tenets (placing the millennium and the restoration of the Jews in 1776); yet he did not leave the Established Church until 1747, when he could no longer endure to hear the, to him, hateful Athanasian Creed. He then set up a “Primitive Christian” congregation in his own house, and prepared for its use the Book of Common Prayer, “reduced nearer the primitive standard” (2d ed., 1750). His enthusiastic spirit led him into many freaks, and his fancy overmastered his critical judgment. Still one must admire the manly openness and truthfulness of his character, the consistency of his life, and the straightforwardness of his conduct. He seems to have had little influence upon his time. Many were attracted to him; but his peculiar, not to say dangerous, views, and great self-assertiveness, soon drove them away. By one piece of work, out of the many which proceeded from his learned brain and busy of his monks, he has made himself familiar to thousands,—his translation of Josephus (1736), which has appeared in innumerable subsequent editions, and never been superseded. As a curiosity, may be mentioned his Primitice New Testament, 1745, translated from the Codex Bezae in Gospels and Acts, from the Clermont manuscript for the Pauline Epistles, and from the Codex Alexandrinus (ed. Mill) for the Catholic Epistles. See his Memoirs, Written by Himself, 1749–50, 3 vols., and the Biographia Britannica, s.v. Theodor Christlieb.

Whitaker, William, D.D., b. at Holme, Lincs., 1548; d. at Cambridge, Dec. 4, 1595. He was graduated at Cambridge, where he was successively fellow of Trinity College; Regius Professor of divinity, 1579; chancellor of St. Paul’s 1580; and master of St. John’s College, 1586. He was a man of great learning, very stanch in his Protestantism and Calvinism. Among his polemical works may be mentioned Disputatio de sacra scriptura, Cambridge, 1588 (Eng. trans., A Disputation on Holy Scripture against the Papists, especially Bellarmine and Stapleton, ed. for Parker Society, 1849); An Answere to the Ten Reasons of Edward Campbell, the Jesuit (Eng. trans. from Latin of 1681), London, 1682.

Whitby, The Council of, was convened in 664 by King Oswy for the purpose of settling the questions of the time of the celebration of Easter, the shape of the tonsure, etc., concerning which different opinions and customs prevailed among the Roman and the Iro-Scottish ecclesiastics. On the Roman side, Wilfrid spoke; on the Iro-Scottish, Colman. The former was victorious. The latter left the country with most of his monks. But from that day the English Church took up a new direction in its course of development,—a direction towards Rome,—and the doom of the Iro-Scottish Church was sealed.

Whitby, Daniel, D.D., b. at Rushden, Northamptonshire, 1638; fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, 1664; prebendary of Salisbury; 1669; rector of St. Edmundo’s, Salisbury, 1672; d. March 24, 1726. A man of great learning, he is best remembered for his striking theological changes. He began an ardent advocate of Protestantism in his book on The Absurdity and Idolatry of Host Worship (1679); and next appeared, as a champion of ecclesiastical union, The Protestant Reconciler humbly pleading for conciliation to Dissenting brethren in things indifferent (1680), in which he expressed very liberal opinions respecting “things indifferent,” contending that they should not be made legal barriers to union among Protestants. But the book raised a storm.
High-Church party were loud in protestations. The university of Oxford ordered the book to be publicly burnt by the university marshal; and, when bishop of Salisbury, whose chaplain he then was, obliged him to make humble confession of his two principal "heresies": (1) That it is not legal for the authorities to require in worship any thing to be said or used which the older custom did not; and (2) That the Christian duty not to offend the weaker brethren was inconsistent with the legal requirement of these "indifferent things." Accordingly, in the same year, Whithby issued a second part of his Protestant Reconciler, in which he commanded the nonconformists to re-enter the Church of England, and endeavored to refute their objections to such a proceeding. His next work of importance was A Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament, 1703, in two vols., which now forms part of the familiar Commentary of Patrick, Lowth, and Arnold, commonly called "Fitch, Lowth, and Whithby, Commentary." Whithby says his Commentary was the fruit of fifteen years' study. It belongs to the old orthodox school. But scarcely was it out of the press before its changeable author was upon a new line of thought. Influenced by deistic attacks upon the doctrine of original sin, he issued his Discourse (1710) on the "five points" of Calvinism; viz., (1) election, (2) extent of the atonement, (3) divine grace, (4) liberty of the will, (5) perseverance of the saints. In this he revealed his Arminianism. Four years later his treatise on the patristic interpretation of the Scriptures appeared (Dis- sertatio de S. Scripturarum interpretatione secundum patrum commentarios, in qua probatur, I. S. S. esse regulam fidei unicum II. Paires non esse idemos S. S. interpres, 1714), in which he maintained, not only that the Scriptures are the only infallible rule of faith, but that the Fathers are mostly very incompetent exegetes and unsafe guides in theological controversies. This book was intended to show that the controversy upon the Trinity could not be decided by appeal to the Fathers, the councils, nor ecclesiastical tradition. By it the public was prepared for his next theological change. From being an "orthodox" Arminian he became an open opponent of Waterland, and in his Last Thoughts, containing his Correction of Several Passages in his Commentary on the New Testament, issued after his death by Dr. Sykes, 1727, retracted his exposition of the trinitarian dogma, which he declared to be a tissue of absurdities.

The little thin man spent his whole life in his study, and was a child in all worldly matters. His character is very favorably described by Anthony Wood, in Athenae Oxonienses, II. See also Dr. Sykes's sketch of him in Last Thoughts, mentioned above.

WHITE, Henry, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at Durham, Greene County, N.Y., June 19, 1800; d. in New-York City, Aug. 23, 1850. He was graduated at Union College, New York, 1824; studied two years in Princeton Theological Seminary, New Jersey; was pastor of the Allen-street Church, New York, 1828-36, when he became professor of theology in the newly founded Union Theological Seminary, and held this position till his death. He was an excellent teacher and a sound theologian, but he never published any thing except a few sermons. See Sprague: Annals of the American Pulpit, iv., 681 sqq.

White, Joseph, D.D., Church-of-England divine, and Orientalist, b. at Stroud, Gloucestershire, 1746; d. at Oxford, May 22, 1814. He was educated at Oxford, where he was successively fellow of Wadham College, 1771; Latidian Professor of Arabic, 1775; Bamton Lecturer, 1784; Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1802; and canon of Christ Church. His works are of great value. Among them are an edition of the whole Hebrew psalter, 1778-1803, 4 vols (see Bible Versions, p. 287); A View of Christianity and Mahometanism (Bampton Lectures), 1784; Discersary (with Greek text), 1790, new ed., 1856 (see Drake, p. 634).

White, William, D.D. This person, so generally regarded as the "Father" of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, was the son of Col. Thomas White of London, Eng., and Esther Hewlings of Burlington, N.J., having been born in Philadelphia, March 23, 1747 (O. S.), where, also, he died July 17, 1830. He was educated in the schools and College of Philadelphia, graduating in 1765. At the age of sixteen he decided to become a clergyman; and in 1770 he sailed for England to receive orders, having pursued his theological studies under the direction of leading divines of the church in the city of his birth. Dec. 23, 1770, he was ordained deacon in the Royal Chapel, London, by Dr. Young, bishop of Norwich. Being under age with respect to further advancement, he delayed in England until June, 1772, when he was received as a priest by Dr. Temple, bishop of London. Sailing at once for Philadelphia, and arriving there Sept. 13, he entered upon his duties as assistant minister of Christ Church and St. Peter's. Upon the outbreak of the Revolution he promptly sided with the Colonies, and was chosen chaplain to the Continental Congress in September, 1777. April 19, 1778, he was elected rector of Wadham Church, Philadelphia. In the year 1782, before the acknowledgment of American independence, he published his celebrated but poorly understood pamphlet, The Case of the Episcopal Churches in the United States con- sidered, proposing a temporary administration by the presbyters of the church; there being no prospect, at the time, of obtaining the episcopate. Shortly after, however, independence was recog- nized, when he immediately abandoned the plan. The pamphlet referred to urged the introduction of the laity into the councils of the church, which, together with the adoption of Articles, was opposed subsequently by Seabury. The counsels of White prevailed when the church was organ- ized. Sept. 14, 1786, he was elected bishop of Pennsylvania, and, Nov. 2, sailed for England, in company with the Rev. Samuel Provoost, who had been elected bishop of New York, receiving consecration with the latter, at the hands of the archbishop of Canterbury, the archbishop of York, and other prelates, in Lambeth Palace, Feb. 17, 1787. He reached New York on Easter Sunday, April 7, 1787. Bishop Seabury had been consecrated for Connecticut by the Scotch non-jurors, Nov. 14, 1784; but the church was not altogether satisfied with that transaction, desiring a threefold succession, through the English line, which was completed by the consecration of the Rev. James Madison of Virginia, at Lambeth, 1789. Three years before, however, Bishop Seabury had passed away. Bishop White exercised the Episcopal Office until his death, having been in orders more than sixty-five years, and standing at the head of the American Church nearly half a century. About twenty-six bishops were consecrated by him. He married Miss Mary Harrison of Philadelphia, in 1773; and his descendants are honored members of the laity of the church of which, in such an eminent sense, he was the founder. He finally passed away, leaving the Episcopal Office, which, at the beginning of his administration was viewed with distrust, one of the most honored institutions in America. Throughout his entire life he bore an unblemished reputation, bearing his high office with that meekness which formed its great adornment. Bishop White was a man of large and comprehensive views, sound in his theology and churchmanship, temperate in opinion, and wise in his administration. He occupied a position in the Church similar to that held by Washington in the State. As a writer he evinced usefulness rather than popularity. Some account of his works may be found in Wilson's Memoir (p. 305), and Sprague's American Pulpit (v. 283). His principal works are: "A Vindication of the ways containing a prime necessity for students," his Memoirs of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, first published in 1829. A second edition appeared in 1836, and third in 1880, with an introduction and notes by the Rev. B. F. De Costa, D.D. See also, on Bishop White, the Account of the Meeting of the Descendants of Col. Thomas White of Maryland, Philadelphia, 1879. B. F. DE COSTA.

WHITEFIELD, George, a famous evangelist; b. in Gloucester, Eng., Dec. 27, 1714, in Bell Inn (of which his father was keeper); d. in Newburyport, Mass., Sept. 30, 1770. His grandfather and great-grandfather on the paternal side were clergymen of the Established Church. He was the youngest of a family of six sons and one daughter. When he was two years of age, his father repudiated his mother and married another woman. His own account of his early years, published in 1740, and severely criticized as imprudent, exaggerated his youthful follies and vices. He speaks of himself as given to various forms of wickedness, fond of cards, despising instruction, and, when larger, exhibiting a great love for plays. He says, however, that his mother was careful of his education, and it was she who urged him to go to Oxford. At twelve he was placed in a grammar-school in Gloucester, where he developed gifts as a speaker. Three years later he withdrew from school, and became a drawer in the inn, but returned the next year, with a new impulse, to prepare for college. The religious impressions which he had felt on different occasions were deepened while he was at school the second time. He became attentive to his church duties, and went to Oxford in 1728, desiring to live a holy life. At Oxford he fell in with the Wesleys, joined the famous "Holy Club," observed its rules rigorously, and was enabled, after great distress of mind over his spiritual condition, to testify that the "day-star" which he "had seen at a distance before" "rose in his heart," and to trust that the Spirit of God had sealed him "unto the day of redemption." This was in 1735, and Whitefield was the first of the "Oxford Methodists" to profess conversion. His health being impaired, he left Oxford for a year, returning in March, 1736. He was ordained in the following June. The youthful deacon preached his first sermon in Gloucester, with marked effect, and took his degree of B.A. from Oxford the same year. He spent much time among the prisoners in Oxford, preached in London and elsewhere, and at once rose to great prominence as a pulpit orator. Nine of the sermons preached the first year of his ordination were published. The Wesleys had requested him to come to them in Georgia; and he finally resolved to go, but did not sail until the beginning of 1738, just as John Wesley returned. Whitefield spent several months in Georgia, preaching with great acceptance. He sailed for England the same year, to be ordained priest. He found many of the London churches closed to him, because he was considered as erratic and fanatical. The Wesleys had obtained the peace of mind they had so long been seeking, and were preaching very earnestly the doctrine of justification by faith; and they impressed Whitefield, who had been emphasizing the doctrine of the "new birth," with its great importance. He began preaching in such churches as would receive him, and in visiting and working among the Moravians and religious societies in London. Early in 1739 he held a conference with the Wesleys and other Oxford Methodists, and in February went to Bristol. Being excluded from the churches, he preached to collierson Kingswood Hill, in the open air,—a step which he induced Wesley to take, thus establishing an innovation which gave opportunity to the Methodist movement. Whitefield had no lack of hearers. Thousands thronged about him. At Rose Green, a month after his first open-air sermon, twenty thousand persons formed his audience. At Kingswood he laid the foundations of the Kingswood School, which became so important to Methodism. He now began his career as an itinerant evangelist. He visited Wales, and gave an impulse to the revival movement already begun by Howell Harris. He visited Scotland, and great results followed. He travelled through England, attracting extraordinary attention everywhere. His arraignment of the clergy as "blind guides" roused many to oppose him; and in 1739 no less than forty-nine publications for and against him appeared. The hostile feeling to the Wesleys grew. On his second visit to the Colonies, some of the Episcopal churches refused him their pulpit; but other churches were open to him. He preached... in Philadelphia and New York, and on his way to Georgia, drawing delighted multitudes everywhere. Visiting New England, the revival which had begun in Northampton in 1738 broke out again, and youth and Boston never saw a greater awakener. He paid seven visits to America; and the results of his evangelistic tours were in Georgia, drawing delighted multitudes every and the Baptist churches, from Massachusetts to where. Visiting New England, the revival which stirring by his mighty eloquence the great audi in America deepened them. He complained to and there was a short, sharp controversy between their views, and his association with Calvinistic divines and the two great men, the evangelist and the organizer, were henceforth fast friends, though their paths were different. Whitefield was nominally the leader of the Calvinistic Methodists, but he left to others the work of organization. The result, however, of his embracing Calvinism, was the opening of "a wide field of usefulness, which, without it, neither he nor Wesley could have occupied." So says his impartial Methodist biographer. Tyerman, who also says that his services to Methodism were greater "than Methodists have ever yet acknowledged," and that it is "impossible to estimate the value of the work he and his "female prelate, the grand, stately, strong-minded, godly, and self-sacrificing Count ests of Huntingdon," performed for the Church of England. In a true cosmopolitan spirit he divided his time between Great Britain and America; with a catholicity as broad as the gos pel, he gave his wonderful labors to all denominations.

He married, in 1741, a widow, Mrs. Elizabeth James. A son born of this union lived only a short time. He saw little of home-life. His activities were incessant, all-absorbing. He never spared himself, preaching every day in the week, and often three or four times a day. His last sermon was preached in Exeter, Mass., the day before his death. He was ill, and a friend remarked that he was more fit to go to bed than to preach. "Yes," said he; then pausing, he added, "Lord Jesus, I am weary in thy work, but not of it." An immense audience gathered to hear him. At first he labored; but soon all his faculties responded for a last great effort, and he wrote, that Whitefield had gold, silver, and copper in his pocket, lie said, "I began to soften, and concluded to give the copper. Another stroke of his oratory determined me to give the silver; and he finished so admirably, that I emptied my pocket wholly into the collector's dish, — gold and all." Whitefield was once asked for a copy of a sermon to publish. "I have no objection," said he, "if you will print the lightening, thunder, and rainbow with it." The Franklin incident exhibits his great persuasive power. A scene described by Dr. James was the opening address of his pictures. Chesterfield was listening while the orator described the sinner as a blind beggar led by a dog. The dog leaving him, he was forced to grope his way, guided only by his staff. "Unconsciously he wanders to the edge of a precipice; his staff drops from his hand, down the abyss, too far to send back an echo; he reaches forward cautiously to recover it; for a moment he pokes on vacancy, and — Good God!" shouted Chesterfield, 'he is gone,' as he sprang from his seat to prevent the catastrophe.

Wesley's sermon on his departed friend contains a high but just estimate of him. He spoke of Whitefield's "unparalleled zeal," "indefatigable activity," "tender-heartedness," "charitableness toward the poor," his "deep gratitude," "tender friendship" (which he himself had tested), his "frankness and openness," "courage and intrepidity," "great plainness of speech," "steadiness," "integrity." "Have we," said Wesley, "read or heard of any person since the apostles who testified the gospel of the grace of God through so widely extended a space, through so large a part of the habitable world? Have we heard or read of any person who called so many thousands, so many myriads, of sinners to repentance?"

Whitefield's sermons and journals were published in instalments at different periods during his life. His collected works, comprising about seventy-five sermons, — his journals, and his letters, together with Memoirs of his Life, by Dr. Gillies, were published in London, in 7 vols. 8vo; 1771-72. Dr. Gillies was his first biographer. His latest, and perhaps best, is Tyerman: Life of George Whitefield, London, 1876, 2 vols. 8vo. Lives have also been written by Robert Philip (Lond., 1838, 8vo), J. R. Andrews (1864, 8vo), D. A. Harsha (Albany, N. Y., 1866, 8vo). See also Life and Times of the Countess of Huntingdon, Lond., 1840, 2 vols., 8vo; Stevens's History of the Religious Movement of the Eighteenth Century called Methodism, N. Y., 1850-52. See also Whitgift, John, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury; b. at Great Grimsby, Lincolnshire, in or about 1530; d. at Lambeth, Feb. 29, 1604. He was a fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge University.
1555; ordained priest, 1560; appointed Lady Margaret professor of divinity, 1563; master of Pembroke Hall, master of Trinity College, and then regius professor of divinity, all in the same year, 1567; prebendary of Ely, 1568; dean of Lincoln, 1568; bishop of Worcester, 1577; and in 1583 he was raised to the primacy. During Mary's reign he observed a discreet silence, which enabled him to keep his position; but on the succession of Elizabeth he appeared as the defender of the Church of England, and advocate of extreme opinions respecting her authority. He headed the prelatical party, and for years carried on a controversy with Thomas Cartwright, the great champion of Puritanism (see arts.). When raised to the primacy, Whitgift was in position to carry out repressive measures against the detested Puritan party. He obtained the decree (June 28, 1589) of the Star Chamber (to which he belonged) against liberty of printing, by which no one was allowed to print except in London, Oxford, and Cambridge: no new presses were to be set up, but by license of the primate and the bishop of London; and only matter authorized by the archbishop of Canterbury, or the bishop of London, or their chaplains, could be printed. Persons selling or binding an unauthorized book suffered three months' imprisonment. And this decree was a mere specimen of his proceedings. He determined to uphold Puritanism, and to this end drew up several articles which he well knew the Puritans could not and would not subscribe, particularly one declaring that the Book of Common Prayer contained nothing contrary to the word of God; and, because they would not sign, he summarily suspended them, and in their places appointed inferior, and in some cases, probably without his knowledge, even immoral men. He carried out his programme so imperiously that Lord Burleigh once and again remonstrated with him, but to no purpose. The amount of suffering he caused is incalculable. Hundreds of worthy ministers, for no other fault than conscientious scruples against alleged unscriptural and Romanizing practices and doctrines in the Church of England, were deprived of their charges, hurried off to prison, harried by deferred hopes, and, if they left prison at all, were, after their harsh and unjust treatment, ruined in health and property. The incoming of James I. (1603) did not affect his position nor manners. He was shrewd enough to give the king a higher idea of that church. It is in vain to defend the administration of the clergyman; b. at Boston, Jan. 1, 1800; d. at Cambridge, Mass., March 21, 1861. He was pastor in Cambridgeport, 1822 to 1831; editor and proprietor of the Trumpet, a Universalist religious newspaper, for nearly thirty years, from its commencement in 1828. He was prominent in political and railroad affairs, being president of the Vermont and Massachusetts Railroad, and repeatedly a member of the Massachusetts Legislature. He wrote The Modern History of Universalism, 1830, enlarged edition, 1860; Notes and Illustrations of the Parables of the New Testament, 1832; Plain Guide to Universalism, 1838; Commentary on Revelation (1838) and On Daniel: Life of Walter Balfour, 1853; Life of Hosea Ballou, 1853-55, 4 vols.; Autobiography, 1859.

WHITTINCHAM, William Rollinson, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., b. in New York City, Dec. 2, 1805; d. at West Orange, N.J., Oct. 15, 1879. He was professor of ecclesiastical history in the General Theological Seminary (where he had been graduated in 1825) from 1835 till 1840, when he was consecrated (Sept. 17) bishop of Maryland. He was one of the scholars of his church, and belonged to the High-Church party. See his Life by W. F. Brand, New York, 1858, 2 vols.

WHITTLESEY, William, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. probably at Whittlesey, near Cambridge; d. at Lambeth, June 6, 1374. He was educated at Cambridge. In 1340, became master of his college, Peterhouse; in 1361, bishop of Rochester; and on Oct. 11, 1368, primate of all England, and metropolitan. He was an unhappy choice, for the times required a vigorous prelate. Edward III. was chiefly interested in wealth, honors, and especially the clergy, in order to keep up the lavish extravagance of the court, and Whittlesey was weak physically, most of the time an invalid, and destitute of commanding mental gifts. He was, however, sadly conscious of his deficiencies, and conscientiously did his best. See Hook: Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, iv. 221 sqq.

WICELIUS, or WITZEL, Georg, b. at Vach, in Hesse, 1501; d. at Mayence, 1578. He studied theology at Erfurt, and went in 1520 to Wittenberg to hear Luther and Melanchthon; but was nevertheless ordained as priest by Bishop Adolph of Merseburg. Appointed vicar in his native town, he preached the doctrines of the Reformation, married, and was expelled in 1535. Driven away by the Peasants' War from Wittenberg, he went to Thuringia, where he had settled, he was, on the recommendation of Luther, appointed pastor of Niemeck, but relapsed into Romanism, began to write with great violence against Luther and Melanchthon, and was expelled in 1530. After some years of uncertain endeavors, he entered the service of Abbot John of Fulda in 1540.
published his principal book, Typus ecclesiae prioris, presented his Querela prioris to Charles V., at the diet of Spires (1544), and took part in the drawing-up of the Augsburg Interim. As the Reformation spread, he felt compelled to leave Fuld, and settled in 1554 at Mayence, where he spent the rest of his life in quiet retirement. See Neander: De Georgio Vicoio, Berlin, 1839; Kampuschulte: De G. W., Paderborn, 1856; Schmidt: Geschichte, Vienna, 1870; R. Baxmann: Wichern, Gottingen and Berlin, and reached the degree of "candidate," and afterwards received the honorary degree of doctor of divinity. On his return home, encouraged by his pious mother, he started a Sunday school for the poorest and wickedest children in the city, and ultimately had five hundred children under his care. It was this school which gave him the idea of the institution which he opened on Nov. 1, 1833, at Horn, a suburb of Hamburg. He called it the "Rough House" (Das Rauhe Haus). It has served as the pattern of many similar institutions in Germany, France, England, Holland, etc. It is a house for the correction of juvenile offenders. Here these evil-minded and often weak-minded children are received, portioned off into "families" of twelve, placed under the charge of a young workman, and taught a trade. In connection with the Haus there is a book printing, binding, and selling business carried on. The Haus celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in November, 1883. For the education of persons competent to take charge of similar institutions, or to serve in them, there was started in 1845 a "Brotherhood." In 1844 Wichern sent out his Fliegende Blatter ("Flying Leaves"), now the organ of the Inner Mission, in which he urged the duty of laying to heart the misery of our fellow-mortals, and at the same time told the story of his own institutions. His story was eagerly read, and incited many imitators. In 1848, at the Kirchentag (see art.) held at Wittenberg, he presented with such extraordinary eloquence the claims of the sick, the suffering, and the sinful who were their countrymen, that from that hour a new movement on their behalf was begun. This was the so-called "Inner Mission" (see art.), the very name of which is due to Wichern. Under Friedrich Wilhelm IV. (who came to the throne in 1840), Wichern found favor at the Court. In 1851 he was commissioned by the Prussian Government to visit the reformation, and also of the highest church council. In the same year he founded in Berlin the Evangelische Johannisstift, —a similar institution to the Rauhe Haus. Its twenty-fifth anniversary was celebrated in 1883. He interested himself particularly in prison-reform, and also organized the Prussian military diaconate. In 1872 he had a stroke of paralysis, from which he never recovered. It prevented him from visiting America as a delegate to the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York, 1878, for which he had engaged to prepare an essay. Wichern was of commanding person, full of faith and the Holy Ghost, and always made a powerful impression by his speeches at the Church Diet and in the Annual Congress for Inner Missions. He wrote Die innere Mission der deutschen evangelischen Kirche, Hamburg, 1849: Die Behandlung der Verbrecher u. auslasse Nichte, 1853; Der Dienst der Frauen in der Kirche, Oldenburg, 1868, 3d ed., 1880, written by F. Oldenburg, Hamburg, 1882, and by Dr. Hermann Krummacher, Gotha, 1882.

WICLIF, John,* the "Morning Star of the Reformation;" b. at Spreswell, one mile from Old Richmond, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, several years, perhaps even ten, earlier than the usual date, 1324; d. at Lutterworth, Dec. 31, 1384.

His Life.—He entered Oxford University about 1335; belonged probably to Balliol College; was graduated about 1345, or perhaps not until 1351; became a fellow of Balliol College, and in 1361 appears as its master. On May 16, 1361, he was nominated by his college, rector of Fillingham, ten miles north-north-west from Lincoln, but continued to reside in Oxford. In the same year he became incumbent of Abbot'sley, near Cambridge. From Dec., 1365, to March, 1367, he was warden of Canterbury Hall; took the degree of doctor of divinity between 1365 and 1374; and in 1368 exchanged his parish of Fillingham for that of Ludgershall, Buckinghamshire, which he held until his resignation in April, 1374, in order that he might conscientiously accept the rectorship of Lutterworth, Leicestershire, to which he had been nominated by Edward III. But in all these changes he never broke his connection with the university, for there he habitually resided, and there taught and debated. His life up to 1361 is largely conjectural and uncertain, but after that time can be traced by documents. Strangely enough, the first appearance of the learned doctor of theology as a leader was occasioned by politics and patriotism. He defended (1366) before the university of Oxford the action of Edward III. against the action of Edward III. and the entire Parliament, in refusing to pay the papal claim to feudatory tributemade by Urban V., —an action which was so emphatic, that the claim was never again made. Wiclif maintained on this occasion the political independence of the crown and the country from the Pope. It is very likely that he was a member of this Parliament for he certainly shows an intimate acquaintance with its proceedings. On July 26, 1374, Wiclif was appointed by Edward III. a royal commissary in Bruges to conclude such a treaty with the papal nuncios on the pending points (viz., the papal reservations in filling English church offices, 1

1 The Reformer's name is spelled in twenty-eight different ways, of which the commonest are Wiclif, Wycif, Wykif, Wickif. This article is based throughout upon Principal Lorimor's translation of Wyclif's Lorimor's translation of Wyclif and his English Precursors (London, 1878, 2 vols.), with the exception of the literature, which has been compiled from the article upon Wyclif in the latest edition of Herzog; but in his book he gives the results of later investigations, supplementing and correcting his previous work. He has disputed many current stories respecting Wyclif, as that he began his attack on the mendicant orders as early as 1360, and that he was cited to appear before the Pope in 1362, or that he was cited to appear before the Pope in 1360, or that he was cited to appear before the Pope in 1362.
encroachments upon the electoral rights of cathedral chapters, and the like) as should at once secure the honor of the church, and uphold the rights of the English crown and realm. But the meeting came to nothing material; for, although the Pope abandoned for the future his claim to the reservation of English church livings, it was only on condition that the king abstained in future from conferring church dignities in the way of simple royal command; hence there was no real ecclesiastical submission. But Wiclif was not to be blamed for this outcome. He had faithfully striven to advance the popular rights; and his efforts had won enthusiastic recognition from the people and the king, who had called him to successive Parliaments. His very position rendered him the object of hatred to the hierarchy, whose designs he had so persistently opposed. At length he stood in high favor to attack him publicly. He was summoned before convocation, and appeared on Thursday, Feb. 19, 1377, in St. Paul's. He was accompanied, for protection's sake, by the Duke of Lancaster, the grand marshal of England (Lord Henry Percy), and a band of armed men. But a violent dispute between William Courtenay (bishop of London) and the duke breaking out, the meeting abruptly terminated, and Wiclif retired without being called upon to say a word. Of course this fiasco did not put an end to the hierarchical opposition. The Anglican episcopate was the prime mover in the next step,— an appeal to the Pope, Gregory XI., to put Wiclif down as a heretic. The alleged nineteen heresies were carefully stated; and so well managed was their effort, that the Pope issued (May 22, 1377) no fewer than five bulls against Wiclif. Three of them were addressed to the primate and to the bishop of London, the fourth to the king, and the last to the chancellor, and the university of Oxford. The nineteen theses in which Wiclif's heresies are stated fall into three groups: I. 1–5, concerning rights of property and inheritance, which he maintained were dependent upon God's will and grace; II. 6, 7, 17–19, concerning church property, and its rightful secularization in certain circumstances; III. 8–16, concerning the power of church discipline, which he claimed belonged to grace; II. 6, 7, 17–19, containing church doctrines, and therefore gladly availed himself of a heretic. The university itself turned against him. The chancellor, William of Berton, acting under the advice of a learned commission which he had appointed, prohibited the promulgation of Wiclif's doctrine in the university, on pain of suspension from every function of teaching, of the greater excommunication, and of imprisonment. So, from that time forward, Wiclif abstained from giving oral instruction upon the subject, but used the freedom left him to give his views the widest currency by means of writings, and produced his Confession, in Latin, and his tract, The Wicke, in English, which was so popular that it was much read even in the sixteenth century. Indeed, ever afterwards did he in nearly all his writings introduce in some way a statement of his views upon transubstantiation. Beaten upon this field, the opponents of Wiclif turned themselves to the archbishop, William Courtenay, who in October, 1381, had succeeded Simon Sudbury, and had the peasant revolters, June 13, 1381. Courtenay had already, while bishop of London, shown his hatred of Wiclif's doctrines, and therefore gladly availed himself of the authority of his primate to wreck the hopes of the Wiclifites. He skilfully adopted a line of attack likely to attain his end. He first had the doctrines and principles of Wiclif and his adherents condemned by ecclesiastical authority, and then persecuted them. He continued to maintain the obnoxious doctrines. The first step was easy. He summoned an assembly of ten bishops, sixteen doctors of laws, thirty doctors of theology, and four bachelors of laws, in the hall of the Dominican Monastery, Blackfriars, London, May 17, 1382, and received the expected verdict. During their session a terrific earthquake shook the city.
hence the name, "The Earthquake Council," uniformly applied to it by Wiclif,—an illomen, in the judgment of Wiclif's party, but favorably interpreted by Courtenay as an emblem of the purification of the kingdom from false doctrine. On the ground of the finding of the council, expressed in twenty-four articles, either heretical or erroneous, of which ten relate to the Lord's Supper, that direct testimony to the interest awakened by Wiclif's attack on the doctrine of transubstantiation,—the archbishop issued mandates to his commissary at Oxford (May 26, 1382) and to the bishop of London (May 30), in which he forbade the public proclamation of the obnoxious doctrines, and even listening to them, on pain of the greater excommunication. But the second step could not be taken without State aid; and the Commons refused to agree with the Lords in giving it, and even compelled the withdrawal of a royal ordinance, which ordered, upon certification of the bishops, the imprisonment of the greater excommunication. But the second step could not be taken without State aid; and the Commons refused to agree with the Lords in giving it, and even compelled the withdrawal of a royal ordinance, which ordered, upon certification of the bishops, the imprisonment of the greater excommunication. Meanwhile Wiclif was untouched,—although deprived, in consequence of the mandate, of his offices at the university,—and pursued his quiet, busy, pastoral life at Lutterworth. It was, perhaps, Courtenay's plan, first to strip Wiclif of all his friends, and then to attack him personally. At length, on Nov. 15, 1382, he was commanded to appear before a provincial synod at Oxford; but again he was not asked to recant, nor was a sentence of condemnation passed upon him. The Parliament of that year met Nov. 19. To it Wiclif addressed a memorial upon the subject of monastic vows, the exemption of the clergy and church property, tithes and offerings, and on the Lord's Supper. The document was so cleverly drawn up, that it was sure to influence the members, and he lived prepared for martyrdom. But on Holy Innocents' Day (Dec. 28, 1384), as he was bearing mass in his parish church, at the moment of the elevation of the host, he was stricken for a second time with paralysis, and fell speechless on the spot. As his tongue was particularly affected, he never spoke again, though conscious of the presence of his friends, and breathed his last, three days afterwards. He was buried under the choir of his church, St. Mary's, Lutterworth.

On May 4, 1415, the Council of Constance declared him a heretic, anathematized forty-five articles drawn from his writings, and ordered that his books be burnt, his bones taken up, and thrown far out of consecrated ground. For thirteen years the command rested on paper; but in 1427 Pope Martin V. laid its execution upon Bishop Fleming of Lincoln, who in the year following (1428) carried it out. His bones were taken up, burnt, and the ashes thrown into the Swift, a branch of the Avon, which runs by the foot of the hill on which Lutterworth is built.

His Preaching.—His activity as a preacher was in two directions,—in the university, where his sermons were in Latin, and followed scholastic forms and ideas; and in his Lutterworth church, where he preached in English, and in simple, direct, and vigorous fashion. He occasionally preached in London, and with such effect that the citizens were stirred up to demand the reinstatement of some flagrant omissions of clerical duty. But the principles he not only advocated, but exemplified, remained always the same. He taught that the object of preaching was the edification of the church; the matter of preaching was the Bible itself in all its simplicity, and not, as the evil habit of the times was, stories, fables, and poems, which were pagan, and not biblical, in origin, and served only to amuse and interest. The Bible was Wiclif's standard and staple: his sermons are really saturated with it. He handles it, in truth, many subjects which are not by any means biblical (e.g., the mendicant orders); but he judges them according to the Bible. But one cardinal doctrine of modern evangelical Christendom is not found in his sermons: he has not a word to say about the transubstantiation of the bread and wine. The one thing about Wiclif's sermons which gives them now their great value as an indication of his inner life is their fulness of earnest godliness and Christian conscientiousness. They breathe a true zeal for God's glory, a pure love for Christ, and a sincere concern for the salvation of souls. The man who could preach as Wiclif preached could not fail to make a profound impression.

His Itinerants.—Besides being a preacher and pastor, he was organizer of an itinerancy which carried his doctrines over a wide territory. He began this latter work while in uninterrupted connection with Oxford (i.e., before 1382); and his first itinerants were university students and graduates: in short, he taught a theological seminary. These preaching were by no means intended as opponents to the parochial clergy, except as the latter grossly disregarded the Bible. The first itinerants were all priests; hence they were called "poor priests," and under no obligation to remain unsettled, although, as a matter of fact, they could not settle conscientiously, even if the way were open, for the three reasons given in the tract, Why Poor Priests have no Benefice,—

(1) Benefices were usually obtainable only by simony, whether collated by a spiritual or tenporal lord; (2) Beneficed priests were compelled to give up to their ecclesiastical superiors all that portion of their revenues in excess of their own necessities, and this was nothing less than a robbery of God’s poor; (3) Unbeneficed priests were free to preach the gospel anywhere, and, when opposed by the “clergy of Antichrist,” could flee without hindrance. But Wiclif also sent out lay-preachers, and this fact led him to use especially the expression “evangelical” or “apostolical” men in his latest sermons, when referring to his itinerants. They were now not all priests. Oxford was the first centre of this activity, and Leicester the second. Clad in commonest clothing, barefoot, and staff in hand, they wandered through the surrounding country, preaching as they had opportunity. They opened the Scriptures, and summoned their hearers to repent. They exalted the around the country, preaching as they had opportunity. They opened the Scriptures, and summoned their hearers to repent. They exalted the del; and the third, a ripe and erudite scholar, who decides the questions. The first book treats of the doctrine of God; the second, that of the universe, especially the ideas of matter, man, angels, evil spirits, etc.; the third book contains the Christian morals; and the fourth, which occupies about one-half of the whole work, gives the author’s views of the sacraments, the ecclesiastical institutions, eschatology, etc. Besides from the Triglogus, the Tractatus, and De Origine, a fair understanding of Wiclif's doctrinal stand-point may also be gleaned from his minor treatises and popular pamphlets, and from extracts now and then published from his unprinted manuscripts, etc.

The basis of all Wiclif's teaching is his doctrine of the absolute authority of Scripture. He places the Bible infinitely higher than any other book, not only those of the more recent teachers, but also those of the ancient Fathers: yea, he places the Bible infinitely higher than any ordinariness of the Roman-Catholic Church. The evidence of this absolute authority is the dignity of Christ as the God-man, and the reason why the Bible is not held in due esteem is owing to the lack of true faith in Christ; for, if we trusted fully in the Lord Christ, the Bible would not fail to bring forth in our heart a firm conviction of the authority of the Bible. All other writings, even those of Augustine, are trustworthy only so far as they are founded in Holy Writ: all other truth, except that which depends upon simple observation, can be accepted only so far as it is derived from the Bible. “Even though there were a hundred popes, and all the monks were transformed into cardinals, in matters of faith their opinions would be of no account, unless they were founded on Scripture” (Trial., iv. c. 7). From this maxim sprung the enthusiasm and the energy which produced the first English translation of the Bible.

But Wiclif's doctrine of God is a piece of scholasticism. Instead of planting himself on Scripture, or on the individual Christian self-consciousness, as most of his contemporaries did, he develops ideas, defines notions, etc. More closely characterized, his scholasticism is realism. The infinite is to him not an idea, but a reality. He recoils from the conceptions of God as a mere universale, or a mere individuale, both of which sprung from the principle of nominalism. To him, God is the absolute cause, the mysterious source of all. The doctrine of the Trinity he develops after Augustine and Aelred, without adding any thing of his own, and following closely the method of the scholastics. But already in his christology a curious contest arises between scholastic dialectics, in which he was trained, and an instinctive craving for a biblico-ethical construction of the idea of the God-man. On the one side he cannot free himself from the common questions, categories, definitions, etc., of the scholastic christology; on the other side he sees very well the hollowness and sterility of the whole proceeding. His great problem is to represent the incarnation from a moral point of view. He loves to set forth Christ as the centre of humanity, and he is inexhaustible in varying the expression of that truth by means of the most manifold ideas and figurative illustrations.

In his cosmology, Wiclif broke through the bounds of scholasticism, mixing up the metaphysical researches concerning the materia prima with various anatomical and psychological questions concerning the structure of the brain, the action of the senses, etc. Of greatest interest is his theological anthropology. Hereditary sin he considers as depending on some moral, and not on any physical condition. He denies that the notion of sinfulness is propagated from generation to generation through the seed; for the kernel of human nature is the spirit. To this aspect of anthropology corresponds his general view of evil. Who is the originator of evil? Does it come from God? No; for evil has by itself no positive existence: it is only a defectus, a non-ens, a negation of the divine. The single act of sin is certainly a reality, and as certainly an evil, but only so far as it refers to the person who committed it. So far as it enters into the web and woof of objective reality, it ceases to be an evil, and is by God turned into a mediate or secondary good: it becomes a means to an end, something willed by God. Sin, so far as it is a reality, is an act of the will; and evil results from the freedom of the will, which is man's most direct denial of God; in which latter point Wiclif differs from his older contemporary, Thomas of Bradwardine, who, in his rejection of the reality of evil, ended with rejecting the freedom of the human will (see G. Lechler: De Thoma Bradwardino, Leipzig, 1882).

In his doctrine of the church, Wiclif became almost wholly a Protestant. The prevalent ecclesiastical idea of the church as the communio of the clergy, to the exclusion of all non-clergy, he expressly rejected. The church he defines as the communion of the elect; and as he carries back conversion, salvation, and membership of the church, to the election of grace (that is, to the eternal and free counsel of God in Christ), he refutes the assumption, which up till that time was universal, that participation in salvation, and the hope of eternal life, were conditioned exclusively by a man's connection with the official church, and were dependent entirely on the mediation of the priesthood. His idea of the church, sharply distinguishing between the visible and the invisible church, involves the recognition of the free and immediate access of believers to the grace of God in Christ: in other words, of the general priesthood of believers. The true church is to him invisible, while the visible church is made up of elect and hypocrites. But he acknowledges that it is impossible to distinguish sharply between the true and the false members of the church; and he altogether denies that anybody felt longing for the reformation of the church, that he labored so abundantly and assiduously.

Of the whole doctrinal system, however, of medieval Romanism, there is no part which Wiclif has attacked with greater energy than the doctrine of the mass. Luther attacked the last point, Hus the second, and Wiclif the first; and he often repeated, that, of all the heresies which had ever crept into the church, none was at once so vicious, and so cunningly covered, as that of transubstantiation. He seems not to have paid any particular attention to this doctrine until about 1381; but from that time he was steadily occupied with it, in sermons, disputations, and written publications, in the form both of Latin treatises for the learned world, and English pamphlets for the common people. His criticism is sharp and penetrating, though it cannot be denied that his own positive view is somewhat vague— as far from Zwingli's conception of a merely symbolic presence of Christ in the elements as from Luther's conception of a real presence. In his Confessio he defines the presence of Christ in the bread and wine of the sacrament as simul rerum et figura. The definition is certainly somewhat vague. For the criticism, however, of the absurdities of the Roman-Catholic Church it proved amply sufficient.

His Character.—His contemporaries found his wonderful learning and intellectual ability most admirable. It was this which gave him such commanding influence in the university. His was a many-sided mind; and his sermons and theological treatises contain illustrations borrowed from all the sciences of his time. He was eminently gifted with the critical spirit, and so, although he accepted many fictions as truths, he yet subjected the doctrines, ordinances, and usages of the church to rigid scrutiny, and brought them to the test of the Bible. With him the critical genius was not merely an efflux of scientific power and independence, but also a fruit of moral sentiment and of Christian character. He cared very little in what form his ideas were expressed, so long as they were understood. Hence his style is inartistic, and often very bad. But by way of compensation, his genius was amply sufficient.

Curiously, he oftentimes burst out into indignant or horror-stricken denunciation while carrying on a dialectical discussion: an outburst of triumphal joy is found in the very middle of a disputation. He is always himself, conscious of his own perfect integrity, and fearless in the expression of his views. He used other weapons than sober reasoning: wit, humor, irony, and sarcasm are the edged-tools he handles, especially against the monks. But his object is always to defend the truth of Christ; and it was from glowing zeal for the cause of God, sincere love to the souls of men, and upright conscientiousness before God, that he felt longing for the reformation of the church, that he labored so abundantly and assiduously.

His Place in History.—He was the first evangelical Reformer. As such, a development can be distinctly marked in him. He began as an ecclesiastico-political worker, sat in Parliament, and earnestly advocated the independence of the English Church and State of the dictation of Rome. He felt longings for the reform of the church, and earnestly advocated the independence of the English Church and State of the dictation of Rome. It was from glowing zeal for the cause of God, sincere love to the souls of men, and upright conscientiousness before God, that he felt longing for the reformation of the church, that he labored so abundantly and assiduously.

WIDOWS, Hebrew. Besides the general law against their hard treatment (Exod. xxii. 22-24), there was special legislation for widows. Their rights should always be respected (Deut. x. 18, xxvii. 19); nor should their clothing or cattle be pledged (Deut. xxiv. 17), nor their children be sold for debt (2 Kings iv. 1; Job xxiv. 9). According to Maimonides (Synedr. 21, 6), their cases must be tried next after those of orphans. 2. They must be invited to the feasts accompanying sacrifices and tithes offerings (Deut. xii. 29, xvi. 11, 14, 19). Wyclif's writings (vol. ii. 337-339). The small number printed has long been considered a disgrace. But in 1883 the Wyclif Society, organized in 1882, began the publication of his Latin works, up to that time in manuscript. The following list probably embraces nearly all that have at any time appeared: Dialogorum libri iiijatuor, Basel, 1525; Reliquiae Wyclif, Nuremberg, 1546, Oxford, 1612, 1828; The true copy of a protocol written about two e.yes past by John Wyckliffe, London, 1550; Two short treatises against the orders of the Begging Friars (edited, with glossary, by Thomas James, D.D.), Oxford, 1608; Last Age of the Church, Dublin, 1840; Apology for Lollard Doctrine, London, 1842; and Three Treatises, Of the Church and her Members, Of the Apostasy of Reformers.

In 1880 the fifth centennial of Wyclif's translation of the Bible was celebrated by the Bible societies of English-speaking lands, especially by the American Bible Society in New-York City, Dec. 2, 1880; on which occasion Dr. Storrs delivered the brilliant oration mentioned below.

WIGAND, Johann, b. at Mansfeld in 1523; d. at Jena, Oct. 21, 1557. He studied theology at Wittemberg, and was appointed pastor of his native city in 1546, superintendent of Magdeburg in 1555, professor of theology at Jena in 1560 (from which position he was discharged the next year), superintendent of Wismar in 1562, and again professor at Jena in 1569. He was an Ultra-

Lutheran, an ardent champion of Flacius, and took part with great vehemence in all the controversies of the time, persecuting with blind fanaticism any one who differed from him in opinions. At last he fell out even with his own master, Flacius, with whom he at one time labored for the establishment of a Lutheran popedom. His autobiography in Sammlung von alten und neuen theol. Schriftstellern (Leipzig, 1799) gives a list of his very numerous writings, of which none, however, have any scientific value. See also Schlüsselburg: De vita J. W., Franc., 1591.

WIGBERT, St., the first abbot of Fritzlar; d. 747; was a native of England, and educated in the monasteries of Winburn and Glaston. In 734 he went to Germany on the invitation of Boniface, and settled at Fritzlar as abbot of the newly founded monastery, and director of the school, which he brought to a very flourishing condition. His life, written by Servatius Lupus, is found in Marillon: Act. Bened., iii. 1. See also Miracula S. Wigberti, in Przmont. Hist. Ger., vi.

WIGGLESWORTH, Michael, b. Oct. 28, 1631, probably in Yorkshire; d. at Malden, Mass., June 10, 1703; was brought to New England, 1648; graduated at Harvard, 1649; at a time many there a while, and minister or "teacher" at Malden from 1656. He published in 1661 or 1662 his remarkable Day of Doom, a poem which preserves, as in amber, the ideas of his time and school. It was very popular, reaching a sixth edition, 1715, and others since. That printed in New York, 1867, has amended, if not edited, modern readers. He also wrote Meat out of the Ear (1689). F. M. Bird.

WIGHTMAN, William May, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; was born in Charleston, S.C., Jan. 8, 1808; and died in the same city, Feb. 15, 1882. He professed religion at the age of sixteen, under the preaching of Rev. James O. Andrew, afterwards bishop. He graduated at Charleston College in 1827, and the following year joined the South-Capucnian Society. He gave early promise of future usefulness and eminence in the ministry; and, after filling many important stations in his conference, he was appointed in 1834 agent for Randolph-Macon College in Virginia; which office he held for three years. He then became professor of English literature in this institution. In 1839 he returned to South Carolina, and became presiding elder of the Cokesbury District. At the General Conference of 1840 he was elected editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, published at Charleston, and continued to serve the church in this capacity for fourteen years. He was a member of every general conference from 1840 till his elevation to the episcopacy. In 1854 he became president of Wofford College, Spartanburg, S.C.; where he remained until 1859, when he was called to what was then University at Greensborough, Ala. This position he filled with great efficiency and acceptability until 1866, when he was elected to the episcopacy. He then returned to Charleston, where he continued to reside until he died. He was through life a zealous advocate for the evangelization and elevation of the colored race. He was possessed at one time of considerable property, which he always used with judicious and conscientious liberality. He was a man of uncommon neatness in apparel, of polished and courteous manners, a fervid, eloquent, and ornate speaker, and an easy and fluent writer. Besides many contributions of a high character to the periodical press, and many public addresses and sermons, he published a Life of Bishop Capers (Nashville, 1858), which is a most worthy contribution to the religious biography of the day.

WILBERFORCE, Samuel, D.D., Bishop of Winchester, son of the eminent philanthropist William Wilberforce; b. at Clapham, near London, Sept. 7, 1805; killed by a fall from his horse, near Dorking, July 19, 1873. He was graduated at Oriel College, Oxford, 1826; curate of Checkendon, Berkshire, 1828-30; rector of Brightstone, Isle of Wight, 1830-39; of Alvestoke, Hampshire, 1839; archdeacon of Surrey, 1840; and canon of Winchester Cathedral. In 1844 he was appointed sub-almoner to the queen, and in 1845 dean of Westminster, and, later in same year, bishop of Oxford. In 1869 he was transferred to the see of Winchester. As bishop of Oxford he made his mark. He was a man of broad views, genial wit, and ready eloquence, in which latter respect he was the true successor of his father, who had led the Episcopal Church in this direction. He was converted (1785), and became a member of the Wesley of the upper circles of English society, his religious views received a coloring from his former teacher at Hull; and Milner's serious conversation upon religion, little as his conduct was regulated by it, turned Wilberforce to serious thought. His latent piety was aroused. The two read together Doddridge's Rise and Progress, and studied the New Testament in the original. The energies of Wilberforce's soul were set in a new direction. He became president of the University at Greensborough, Ala. This position he filled with great efficiency and acceptability until 1866, when he was elected to the episcopacy. He then returned to Charleston, where he continued to reside until he died. He was through life a zealous advocate for the evangelization and elevation of the colored race. efforts to secure the realization of his youthful dreams date from his twenty-eighth year. The slaveholders quickly perceived the ability and strength of their antagonist, who was determined to fight until the victory was gained. Year after year the struggle went on. At last, after twenty years of tireless exertion, the bill for the abolition of the slave-trade was introduced in the House of Lords by Lord Grenville passed Feb. 4, 1807; went to the House of Commons, and passed its first reading by a vote of 283 to 16, Feb. 23, and finally, March 23, 1807. It received the royal assent March 25; and after Jan. 1, 1808, slave-trading was illegal. In the carrying-out of this year the struggle went on. At last, after twenty efforts to secure the realization of his youthful organization of the Sierra Leone Company (1791), for the extension of lawful commerce in Africa, and the promotion of the useful arts among the negroes, lamentably failed. The abolition of the slave-trade legally accomplished, Wilberforce turned his attention to the enforcement of the law and the emancipation of the slave himself. For the rest of his life he keenly watched the interests of the negro race, and toiled for the abolition of slavery in every land. Three days before his death he had the satisfaction of learning that slavery itself was abolished.

Wilberforce was the leader of the abolitionists, and to him the major part of the credit is due. In the prosecution of his mission he met with repeated disappointments; and his scheme, along with other abolitionists, to demonstrate the fitness of the negro race for civilization by the organization of the Sierra Leone Company (1791), for the extension of lawful commerce in Africa, and the promotion of the useful arts among the negroes, lamentably failed. The decided religious convictions of this remarkable man find their expression in his book, A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians in the Higher and Middle Classes in this Country Contrasted with Real Christianity, London, 1797. Five editions (7,500 copies) were sold in its first half-year; and it has been translated into French, German, Italian, Spanish, and Dutch. It is impossible to overestimate its influence in awakening a warm, practical, determined religious life, and in stemming the tide of infidelity and individualism, especially in the upper classes of England. The book consists of seven chapters, treating two questions: first, whether morality without belief can be wholesome and sufficient; second, whether Christianity satisfactorily meets all the demands of life. While not only by this book did he proclaim his Christianity. In 1801, with a few friends, he established The Christian Observer, a religious newspaper, and in 1804 took a prominent part in the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He was ever a champion of the Church of England; but, far from being partisan, he contended with equal warmth for the rights of dissenters. Lord Lyndhurst (3) as great influence was due to his character, although his gifts were of a high order. He was one of the foremost public speakers, ever self-contained and dignified. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. One son, Samuel, became bishop of Oxford and Winchester successively; but three others entered the Roman-Catholic Church.

The chief source to the study of his life is his Life by his sons Robert Isaac and Samuel, Lond., 1838, 5 vols., and his Correspondence, edited by the same, 1840, 2 vols. [most accessible in the abridged Life of William Wilberforce, by Samuel Wilberforce, London, 1863, 1 vol.]. Jerusalem; but here is no wilderness at all. VI. "Wilderness of Beth-aven," a northerly part of the Wilderness of Jericho (Josh. xvii. 12). VII. "Wilderness of Gibeon" east of Gibeon. VIII. "Wilderness of Dothan" (Gen. xxxvii. 29). — ARNOLD.

WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING. The so-called forty-two journeys of the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan are enumerated in Num. xxxiii. 10. On leaving Egypt they bent their steps to Sinai (see EXODUS, SINAI). The general direction was south-east along the Gulf of Suez, until the Wady Feiran was struck, which was followed to Mount Sinai. The stations are not yet fully and unanimously identified. The first was probably Ayun Musa ("the wells of Moses"), seven to eight miles from the Gulf of Suez, where the triumphal song of Moses was sung. Thence the host went three days' journey though the Wilderness of Sin ("fort-wall"), derived, according to E. H. Palmer, from the long wall-like range which is the feature of this part of the wilderness, and came to Marah ("bitterness"), generally identified with Ain Huwarah ("fountain of destruction."). Palmer spells it Haowarah, and interprets it as the name of a rock with a hole (Exod. xv. 25). Thence they journeyed to Elim ("trees"), identified either with Wady Gharudal or Wady Useit. The next station was upon the shore of the Red Sea (Num. xxxiii. 10), probably in the beautiful Wady Taiyibeh; and thence they "encamped in the Wilderness of Sin," now the Plain of El-Markha. It extends twenty-five miles along the east-shore of the Red Sea, from Wady Taiyibeh to Wady Feiran. There the Israelites were first fed with manna and quails (Exod. xvi.). On leaving Egypt they bent their steps to Sinai (see EXODUS, SINAI). The general direction was south-east along the Gulf of Suez, until the Wady Feiran was struck, which was followed to Mount Sinai. It extends twenty-five miles along the east-shore of the Red Sea, from Wady Taiyibeh to Wady Feiran. There the Israelites were first fed with manna and quails (Exod. xvi.). Entering the Wady Feiran, they came, by way of Dophkah and Alush, to Rephidim, usually located in this wady, at the base of Serbal, although some would put it in Wady es-Sheikh. At Rephidim there was "no water for the people to drink." So Moses was instructed to get water by smiting a rock in Horeb (Exod. xviii.). From Rephidim they came to Sinai (see art.).

It was the original expectation of Moses to lead the Israelites directly out of Egypt into the Promised Land. But the enormous host, cumbered with flocks and herds, could not travel rapidly; and it was in the third month after leaving Egypt that they arrived at Sinai. By Sinai they meant the plain south-east along the Gulf of Suez, east of the granite region of Sinai, and the point of transition from the sandy desert on the north, and the valley of the Arabah on the east. There are abundant evidences that the country was formerly much more fertile than it is at present. The host probably lived a nomad life, like the present Bedouin, staying for a while in a place, and then going elsewhere, according as they could find pasture for their flocks. God's object was finally accomplished: the murmurers had all died, and their children were strong for battle. They gathered at Kadesh, whence they had separated so many years before. There Moses and Aaron offended, and were told that they should not enter the Promised Land (Num. xx. 12). The subsequent events may be thus summarized: application for passage through Edom was refused; Aaron died upon Mount Hor; the Israelites suffering from the plague of serpents were healed by the sight of the brazen serpent; Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan, were overcome; Balak, king of Moab, in vain used enchantments against Moses; but instead of deserting from Balaam the glorious future of that people; the census of Israel was taken on the plains of Moab; the Midianites were slaughtered and spoiled; the Reubenites and Gadites received their inheritance on the east side of Jordan; finally, the host made their last journey prior to the Conquest, and reached the east shore of the Jordan. Moses delivered his farewell address on the first day of the eleventh month of the year, and then ascended Mount Nebo, and died. Thus ended the Wandering. The Israelites were now on the borders of the Promised Land. See SMITH: Dictionary of the Bible, s.v. "Wilderness of the Wandering." E. H. WILFRID, Bishop of York, b. in Northumbria, 634; d. at York, Oct. 12, 709. He was educated in the monastery of Lindisfarne, but having found out that the way to virtue taught by the Scotch monks was not the perfect one, he set out for Rome, where he arrived in 651. After his return from Rome, he was, by King Aswy of Northumbria, appointed tutor to his son Alchfred, 664; and having, at the synod of Streufenham, persuaded the king and the clergy that the Roman computation of Easter, and the Roman shape of the tonsure, were the only right ones, he received the episcopal see of York as a reward (665), and held it for forty years. He was one of the most prominent champions of the Church of Rome in England. Several times he was deposed or expelled from his see by the kings; and each time he repaired to Rome, where he was sure to find support. On one of his journeys to Rome he suffered shipwreck on the Friesian coast, and began that missionary work among them which afterwards was so successfully continued by Wilbrod. See HEDDIUS: Vita Wilfridi; and BEDE: Hist. Ecc., i., iii.-v.

WILL, THE. A theme of endless debate, and one respecting which there is, apparently, an irreconcilable difference of opinion. It illustrates better than almost any other subject the close relation subsisting between philosophy and theology; for it belongs to both departments, though it would be better if the psychological and theological aspects of this question were more sharply distinguished than is sometimes done. Difficult as the problem of the will confessedly is, there can be no doubt that much of the confusion that exists regarding it arises from a want of precision in the use of terms. It is important that the nature of the problem should be understood, however impossible it may be to find a satisfactory solution of it.

I. Nature of the Will. — Psychologists of a former day usually distributed mental phenomena under two heads,—understanding and will. In this way the moral and active powers, the desires and affections, as well as the volitions, came under the latter designation. To say that the will was in bondage was only saying that a man's desires and affections are not determined by his volitions. So understood, few would deny the bondage of the will. For whatever power there may be to control appetite, or restrain desire, no one claims that a man may have or not have an appetite or desire at his pleasure. It is commonly now to distribute the phenomena of the mind under a triple division,—intellect, feeling, will. According to this classification, the emotions are treated separately, and are not embraced in discussions pertaining to the will. Yet even here there is a wider and a narrower sense of the word 'will'; for, as the third term of this triple division, it stands for both desire and volition. Locke's distinction between these two tendencies is a good one, and the attempt of Edwards to overthrow it was not successful. There is a clear difference between a desire to act that may be vague, spontaneous, and motiveless, and a volition or determination to act that is direct, definite, and deliberate. Indeed, the two may be opposed to each other, as when we so often see desire struggling in the strong grip of volition.

It should be understood, that, when the will is spoken of under the limitations of the freewill controversy, reference is made to volitions, and not to desires. It is not easy, however, to substitute 'volitions for 'will at all times; for it is convenient to speak of the will abstractly as the power of choice, in distinction from volitions as the concrete manifestations of choice. But, when the will is so used, there must be taken not to hypothesize the will,—not to conceive of it as something different from the man, or of the man as divided into three parts, of which the will is one. The will means the man willing, just as the intellect means the man knowing. It must be remembered, moreover, that no mental state belongs exclusively to any one of these three divisions just referred to. An act of will may be also very closely related to an emotion. So closely related, in fact, are the feelings and the will, that Bain's attempt to explain the genesis of the will is in some respects the most plausible defence of empiricism in print. At the other extreme, but still illustrating the close relation between intellect, feeling, and will, stand those who hold, with Schopenhauer, that the will is the prinzip of all mental phenomena. We cannot stop to inquire whether the will begat the emotions, or whether the emotions begat the will, or whether (though this is what we believe) intellect, feeling, and will are co-ordinate elements in man's nature, there being no right of priority in favor of either the first, second, or third. But it is evident that the problem of the will occupies to-day, and must continue to occupy, a large place in religious philosophy. It is not necessary to hold, on
And it is safe to say that the argument has not advanced much beyond the position it occupied when Clarke urged on the one hand the self-determining power of the will, and Hobbes, on the other hand, claimed that volitions, like all other events, come under the law of causality. Spinoza was a determinist, of course. Descartes argues against Hobbes, but admits all that a determinist could ask. So does Locke, whose discussion of this subject is admirably clear and discriminative.

Jonathan Edwards stands apart and above all others in the discussion of this problem. He is the first in a long succession of able men in America who have dealt with this and kindred anthropological questions according to a metaphysico-theological method, and who have contributed a most important chapter to the history of opinion. The treatise on The Will was intended as a polemic against Arminianism. It has been criticised. A library of literature has grown up around it in defence of, or in opposition to, its teaching. Its faults have been conceded even by those who, nevertheless, accept its main positions. But it has never been refuted. The libertarian doctrine is now taught by appealing to consciousness, by denying that causation reigns in the empire of the will, and by affirming, as Whedon does, that the Ego can "project volitions" without any reason whatever: but the "self-determining power of the will" has not come back from the trip up the infinite series whither Edwards sent it; and the "liberty of indifference," Calderwood tells us, has been "laid upon the shelf." Edwards holds, that the will is determined by the strongest motive, and the strongest motive is the greatest apparent good. His arguments are, for the most part, philosophical; but the doctrine advocated in his treatise follows also, in his judgment, from the divine foreknowledge. Here he is wrong; for while foreknowledge may insure the certain futurition of a volition, it does not determine the question how it shall be brought about. It would have been better had he followed Locke's example, and, refusing to consider "consequences," confined himself to the psychological study of the problem.

The EdwaVdean doctrine of the will, besides meeting with opposition at the hands of Tappan, Hazard, Upham, Bledsoe, and Whedon, who have all written specially upon the subject, has been strongly objected to by the Scottish philosophers, Reid, Stuart, and Sir William Hamilton. Empirical philosophers are naturally determinists, so are all those who deny the separate personal existence of the individual self. Determinism follows as naturally from the scheme of Hegel as from that of Comte. Kant postulated freedom under the practical reason, when he could not find it by means of the speculative reason. Sir William Hamilton, following the suggestions of Kant's antinomies, found freedom and necessity both incompatible; but believed in freedom, since, being contradictions, neither the other must be true. This is one form of his doctrine of the conditioned. And a great many who do not follow Kant or Hamilton are yet compelled to take an agnostic position regarding the whole matter, believing that there is no answer to the question, Why this rather than that volition? but believing, nevertheless, that they are free, and convinced beyond all peradventure that the reign of physical determinism would be the blight of humanity.

2. Points in the Freewill Controversy. — If it were asked what is meant by saying that a man is free, the reply would be, "He can do as he wills." Will being the norm of freedom, there seems to be something incongruous in the inquiry whether the will is free. How can we predicate freedom of the will when our only idea of freedom is through the will? How can will be measured and measured at the same time? It would not settle the freewill controversy to discontinue the use of the word 'free' in connection with the will, but it would make it capable of more intelligible statement. If, however, it must be used, let it be said that the man is free in willing. But then what does this mean? 'I will.' That is a simple psychological fact. I at pleasure determine a certain mental state which is attended with a certain expenditure of energy. The mental state is a volition: the muscular change is action. What is meant by calling this volition a free volition? Does it mean that nothing outside of me forced it upon me? that it is free, inasmuch as it is my act? Then we all believe in freewill. To this fact, that I am self-determined, that I am the cause of my volitions, consciousness bears witness; and in this sense the freedom of the will is irrespective altogether of the relation of the volitions to antecedent mental states. But it is commonly maintained, that, in order to believe in freewill, one must hold a particular view of the relation of a given volition to the past. This, however, must not be conceded. The difference among men regarding the will relates to the question how a given volition came to pass, and not to the question whether the will is free. That the problem may be understood, let us take the case of a single volition. When the question arises, What is the cause of a given mental state? there is no doubt that I am the cause; I am the agent, the efficient cause. But while the volition is accounted for by saying, I am the cause of it," the question, Why did I choose this rather than that? why did I walk east rather than west? It is true that the volition is an effect produced by me, but is it not also an effect produced in me? That I am an agent explains the coming about of a volition, but how does it happen to be such a volition? If this question could be answered, the problem of the will would be solved. There are two generic answers to this question, and it seems impossible that there should be a third. Some hold that each volition is unconditioned by antecedents, and in this sense, before it comes into existence, is contingent Others hold that each volition was antecedently determined, and therefore certain. Indeterminism and determinism are therefore the two rival theories of the will.

(c) Indeterminism. — Without entering into the discussions suggested by such familiar phrases as "power of contrary choice," "liberty of indifference," "self-determining power of the will," we may say that indeterminism is capable of being presented in two forms. It either means, that, in every free volition, 'I not only do as I choose, but choose as I choose,' or else it means that the whole philosophy of the will is expressed in the
The efficiency of the Ego. On this point there is emphasis at the present day. Indeed, it is not too much to say, that many who oppose determinism have done great violence to the tenets of indeterminism, simply because they are unscientific. But the advocacy of these great truths does not mean only to express their abhorrence of physical causation, but also to assert the right of the soul to be free. It is the man who has the power to shoot out the volitions does so, it is hard to see what is to be the subject of moral accountability:—not the volition, certainly; and not the man, for these volitions are not related to him in any other way than that he projected them. If character does not determine conduct, how can we know that it is not the bad man who exhibits good behavior, and the good man who is filling the world with all the bad volitions? (3) Why, then, do the volitions of the same man manifest a general similarity? Why are the mean man's volitions unlike the generous man's volitions? Indeterminism has no answer to this question. (4) We must choose, then, the theory that expresses our sentiments, and should be discussed on its proper grounds. The law of uniformity, indeed, cannot be true regarding mind, unless it be true regarding mind. The craving for unity accounts for the attempt to place mind and matter under one generalization.
that character determines volitions, or that the mental state in the indivisible moment prior to volition determines the volition. These expressions all mean practically the same thing; and those who hold the view embodied in these words are determinists of the second class above named, as distinguished from those who advocate the doctrine of physical determinism.

III. FREEWILL AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY.

— Without free agency there can be no moral accountability. A man forced to do a bad action is not blamed for it. A man who cannot do as he chooses, or who is forced to do contrary to his choice, is not free, and therefore not responsible. But it is wrong to say that power of contrary choice is essential to moral responsibility, or that volitions that are certain are not free. God cannot not will contrary to his holy nature. The volitions of Christ were certainly holy: so are the volitions of the redeemed in heaven. And, more than that, all Christians pray that the Holy Spirit will exert a controlling influence upon their minds, so that they may have wise and holy choices. No one feels that a Christian is less holy or less moral because his choices are influenced by the Holy Ghost. The certain connection between a man's nature and his volitions does not deprive the volitions of moral quality. It would be difficult to see how they could have moral quality without such certain connection. The question is not, how a man shall be held accountable whose will conforms to his character, but how a man with a bad character shall be held under obligation to holiness. Whatever difficulties there may be in answering this question, there is nothing in psychological determinism, that is to say, in the certain connection of character and volitions, which is inconsistent with moral responsibility. It is important that the distinction just made should be kept in mind; for in the judgment of some writers, as, for example, Sidgwick, the strongest objection to the deterministic theory of the will is the difficulty of reconciling it with the consciousness of moral responsibility. The difficulty would not be felt if our actions were all holy; it is only when we are told that we are responsible for acts of will which were nevertheless determined by an unholy nature, that the objection arises. And on any theory of individual probation it cannot be met. But on the theory of the oneness of Adam and his posterity, however that oneness may be represented, there is no difficulty in saying that a man is responsible for acting according to his nature, since he is also responsible for his nature. But this subject belongs properly to the next division.

IV. INABILITY. — The deterministic theory of the will that has just been considered rests upon purely psychological grounds. It must be carefully distinguished from the theological doctrine of inability, which rests upon the authority of revelation; although it is common to speak of both doctrines as illustrating alike the bondage of the will, and even to treat them as identical.

1. Difference between Determinism and Inability.

— The theory of determinism proposes a general philosophy of volition. We have no reason to believe that the relation of volition to antecedent mental states was different in the case of Adam from what it is in our own. If, therefore, determinism is true in regard to our volitions, it was probably true in regard to his. If he was free, we are free. If we are under bondage by reason of determinism, he was under bondage also. It is on this account that the Edwardian theory of the will has been held by some to be contrary to the Westminster Confession of Faith, for there the distinction between the will before and the will after the fall is made emphatic. If, however, the distinction between determinism and inability be kept in mind, it will be seen that there is no foundation for this criticism of the Edwardian theory. Determinism is simply a theory that affirms of all men, fallen or unfallen, that their volitions stand in necessary relation to antecedent states of mind. The Confession of Faith, on the other hand, teaches that holy choices are certain; there is a great difference between the will before and the will after the fall. Determinism is applicable to all volitions without exception; whereas it is only in respect to any thing spiritually good that the Confession of Faith and the Reformed theology predicate of men, since the fall, an inability of will. The word 'inability' itself expresses an important point of difference. The concept is stated to be that men are not free to do what they are not able; that they are beyond the power of a certain class of men. Determinism, on the other hand, affirms nothing regarding the ability or inability of men as to volitions. It is, of course, very natural for those who believe in inability to be determinists; for if all volitions are determined by antecedent mental states, then, assuming that the nature of man since the fall has been corrupt, there is no difficulty in supposing that the volitions correspond to the nature. Determinism will account for inability, but whether we are obliged to adopt determinism in order to account for inability is another question. Principal Cunningham thinks we are not. But, however this may be, determinism does not affect the question raised by the Confession of Faith in regard to the will before and after the fall. And it may be said, that what ever conflict may be supposed to exist between freewill and determinism exists likewise between freewill and inability. There is really no conflict in either case; for we are free in choosing whatever may be the underlying reason that determines choice; and we are self-determined in every volition, although a certain class of volitions may be out of the power of unregenerate men. But if, on the one hand, determinism be not contrary to the Westminster Confession of Faith, neither, on the other hand, does it necessarily involve the doctrine of a fourfold state of will, which is taught in that Confession; that doctrine belonging altogether to the theological side of the freewill debate.

2. Nature of Inability. — To the question, How did the sin of Adam affect his posterity? three generic answers have been given. The Pelagian says that mankind have been practically unaffected, and that men have plenary ability to do all that is required; the semi-Pelagian says that man's moral powers have been weakened, and that there is need of divine grace; the Augustinian says that man is dead in trespasses and sins, and that he is unable to do anything spiritually good before regeneration. Augustine taught, and it has been repeated by Peter Lombard and also by the Reformed theologians, that there is a fourfold state of the human will,— before the fall, when Adam had freedom to either good or evil; after the fall and before regeneration, when there is freedom in sin only, and an inability of will to any thing spiritually good; after regeneration, when there is ability to all spiritual good; and after glorification, when the will is unalterably determined to holy choices. If we are to include under the category of Augustinianism those who reject Pelagian and semi-Pelagian error, we must comprehend under this designation some who cannot be called Augustinians in the strictest sense of the term. That is to say, we must include some, who, while they reject Pelagianism and semi-Pelagianism, would not say that fallen man is “indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all good,” or would not accept the full Augustinian theology on other points of doctrine. The Augustinian (using the word in the broad sense just stated) doctrine of inability is represented in several forms. (a) The Roman-Catholic. The doctrine of the Church of Rome, as taught by representatives of theologians such as the Council of Trent, is substantially Augustinian in regard to original sin, though the full Augustinian doctrine of inability is denied in denying the passivity of the soul in regeneration. (b) The Arminian. Augustinian as to their views regarding total depravity and consequent inability, Arminians nevertheless deny the Augustinian forms of the doctrine of efficacious grace. This denial was one of the “five points” in the “Remonstrance.” Wesleyan Arminians hold that a “gracious ability” is given to all men, whereby they may co-operate with the Spirit of God. (c) Lutheran Doctrine of Inability. Lutheran theology is thoroughly Augustinian upon this point. (See Augs. Conf., art. xviii.; Form. Concord., art. ii.) (d) Modified Calvinism. The anthropological discussions among the New-England divines turned largely upon the distinction between natural and moral ability. Edwards held that men have natural ability to repent, and turn to God: they have all the qualifications for doing so, and there is nothing to hinder them if they will. "There are faculties of mind, and a capacity of nature, and every thing else sufficient, but a disposition: nothing is wanting but a will." Moral ability means, then, inability through unwillingness. Edwards will not allow us to ask whether a man can will; for he says that could only be answered by saying, that, if he wills, he can will, or, if he wills to will, he can will. In other words, we must take our choice between an identical proposition and the indefinite series. Dr. Taylor, however, pressed the question, Can a man choose God for his portion? and answered it by saying that he was able to do so, but it was certain and necessary consequence of the doctrine of original sin, and of the divine foreknowledge regarding future contingent events. The Westminster Confession affirms this doctrine in the following terms: "Man, by his fall into a state of sin hath wholly lost all ability of will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation; so as a natural man, being altogether averse from good, and dead in sin, is not able by his own strength to convert himself, or prepare himself therefor." Does this loss of "ability of will" imply impotence in regard to volitions or to prevailing inclinations? If the reference be to volitions, the criticism of Edwards would be pertinent; that is to say, it is absurd to ask, Can a man will? We could only say that it is certain that the volitions of the unregenerate will be unholy, whatever the ground of that certainty may be. If the ground of that certainty be in an unholy character, it will be for the advocates of indeterminism to say how they can hold determinism as to volitions considered as to a loss of ability, and indeterminism as to volitions otherwise considered. If, however, the inability of will here referred to applies not to volitions, but to desires, inclinations, and propensities, the question whether a man can will is altogether relevant; for it is not only true that a man cannot repent, and turn to God, because he will not, but it is also true that he cannot will to do so. Regarding the Confession's statement as to a loss of ability as having special reference to the will in the large sense, and not the specific sense of volitions, it is correct to say that true moral inability is not inability through unwillingness, but inability to be willing.

V. Relation of Freewill to God's Predestination and Purpose. — The doctrine of inability does not necessitate belief in determinism. Neither does the doctrine of predestination, though it has been supposed by some that the two stand or fall together. If determinism be true, it assures the certain futurition of volitions, and this may make it easier to believe that volitions have been fore-ordained. But it does not follow, that, being fore-ordained, they must come to pass in connection with any law respecting the relation of volitions to antecedent mental states. It is a mistake, as Principal Cunningham has shown, to suppose that Calvinists have any dogmatic interest in maintaining the Edwardian theory of the will. On the contrary, some of the most earnest and intelligent Calvinists have distinctly repudiated that theory, and have advocated the libertarian doctrine. To the objection, therefore, that the doctrine of predestination interferes with man's liberty, it is replied, that the Calvinist can hold any theory of the will that the Arminian can hold. The fore-ordination of all events makes all events, and therefore all volitions, certain, but not more certain than the doctrine of foreknowledge makes them. If certainty is inconsistent with freedom, the Arminian's freedom is put in jeopardy quite as much as the Calvinist's. And the only way for him to be consistent in criticizing the bearing of predestination upon freedom is to follow Dr. McCabe in giving up the divine foreknowledge regarding future contingent events.

peaux about 1070; d. at Châlons-sur-Marne, Feb. 15, 1122. He was a pupil of Anselm of Lau, a realist; and, having defeated the nominalist Ros-celini, he began a brilliant career as a teacher in Paris and became the seat of French mysticism. He was a pupil of Anselm of Lau, a realist; and, having defeated the nominalist Ros-

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, b. in Somersetshire, probably in 1096; d. at Malmsbury after 1142. He was the son of a Norman father and a Saxon mother; was educated in the monastery of Malmsbury, where he spent his whole life as a monk, librarian, and cantor, and gained a lasting reputation as one of the foremost of the early English historians. His principal works are,
De gestis regum, containing the history of En-land from the Anglo-Saxon Conquest to the end of the reign of Henry I., 1129; Historia nove-ella, a continuation of the preceding; and De gestis ponficicum Anglorum, containing the history of the Christian Church in England from the introduction of Christianity to 1125. These three works were edited by Thomas Baring in his Rerum Angli-orum Scriptores, London, 1596, but after a poor manuscript: the best edition is that of the English Historical Society, 1840, 2 vols. Among his other works are, De vita Althelmi and De antiquitate Glastoniensise ecclesia, both in Wharton's Angla Sacra, i., Vita E. Patricii, of which extacts are found in Leland's Collectanea, iii.; and several books, Itinerarium Joannis, De miraculis dice Maris, etc., which seem to have perished.
He was a cautious, careful, and accurate writer, using the materials which he drew from other chronicles with discrimination, and showing great impartiality and love of truth in the treatment of his own time. There is an English translation published by Gachard (Brussels, 1847-56, 5 vols.), he wrote an Apologie de Guillaume de Nassau, a most remarkable document, of which there is a recent edition, Brussels and Leipzig, 1858. See MOTLEY: The Rise of the Dutch Republic, New York, 1856, 3 vols.

WILLIAM OF ST. AMOUR, b. in the first decade of the thirteenth century, probably at St. Amour in Burgundy; d. in Paris, probably in 1272. He was professor at the Sorbonne, and became famous on account of his spirited opposition to the Mendicant orders. In 1226 the Dominicans succeeded in penetrating into the university of Paris, and obtaining possession of a chair of theology. And hardly had twenty years elapsed before they claimed to control the whole institution, refusing to obey the laws of the corporation.
Their most dangerous opponent was William.
He preached against people who taught that labor was a shame, and beggary a glory; that prayer sufficent to make the corn grow in the field, and consequently very dangerous. Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura wrote against it. The Pope condemned the book to be burnt, and the author was banished from Paris. He returned, however, in 1238, was received with enthusiasm by the students, and continued his activity till his death, unmolested by the Dominicans. See BULUS:

WILLIAM OF NASSAU, commonly called William the Silent, b. at Dillenburg, Nassau, April 16, 1583; d. at Delft, Holland, July 10, 1584.
As heir of the large possessions of the house of Nassau in the Netherlands, he was educated at the court of the queen-regent, Mary of Hungary, in Paris; but, as his accusers dared not confront him publicly, he was acquitted. In 1256 he published his De periculo novissimorum temporum, which, put into French verse, became very popular, and consequently very dangerous. Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura wrote against it. The Pope condemned the book to be burnt, and the author
was banished from Paris. He returned, however,
in 1238, was received with enthusiasm by the students, and continued his activity till his death,
unmolested by the Dominicans. See BULUS:

WILLIAM OF TYRE, b. in Syria in 1130; was educated in Antioch or Jerusalem, but went in 1160 to the Occident, and studied for several years in Italy and France. After his return to Jerusalem he gained the favor of King Amalric, who made him archdeacon of Tyre in 1167, sent him to Constantinople as ambassador in 1168, and in 1169 appointed him tutor to his son Baldwin, the heir-apparent. Baldwin ascended the throne in 1173, and in the following year he made his former tutor archbishop of Tyre. In this quality William was present at the third Lateran synod; but of the last years of his life
the accounts are very contradictory, and the date of his death is unknown. Of his two great historical works, Gesta principum orientalium and Belli sacri historia, the former has perished. The latter, containing the history of the Crusades from 1100 to 1184, is one of the finest specimens of mediaval historiography, full, accurate, and impartial. It was first printed at Basel, 1549, and then by Bongarsius, in his Gesta dei pas Frances, i., 1584, reprinted by Migne. The best editions are that in the Récueil des historiens der croisades, 1841-44, 2 vols., and that edited by F. Paris, Paris, 1879-80, 2 vols. There is an old French translation, Etudes de Eracles (1783), and a modern German, by Kauser, Stuttgart, 1844, 2d edition, 1848. G. H. KLIPPET.

WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM, English statesman and divine; b. at Wykeham, Hampshire, 1824; d. at South Waltham, Sept. 24, 1404. He was educated at Winchester; and in 1386 was surveyor of King Edward III.'s works at Windsor, and was rewarded for his merit by the gift of the rectories of Pulham, Norfolk, and in 1388 the prebendary's stall at Lichfield. At this time he was a layman, and did not become a clergyman until 1361. In 1364 he was made keeper of the privy seal; secretary of state, 1386; and bishop of Winchester the same year. He was lord-chancellor from 1367 to 1371, when he resigned. He founded New College at Oxford, 1373. In 1376 he was accused of malefeasance in office, and deprived of the temporalities of his see. But the rectitude of the bishop was subsequently established (for the charge was shown to have arisen from his having forgiven half of a fine of eighty pounds); and Richard II. restored him to his offices and dignities, 1379. He was again lord-chancellor from 1389 to 1391. He rebuilt Winchester Cathedral, 1395-1405. See CAMPBELL: Lives of the Lord-Chancellors.

WILLIAMS, Daniel, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at Wrexham in Denbighshire, in North Wales, about 1644; d. in London, Jan. 26, 1716. His education was defective; yet he began to preach about 1644; d. in London, Jan. 26, 1716. His publications are extensive and laborious duties as chancellor, statesman, and bishop, with diligence. He lost his chancellorship on the accession of Charles 1., and won the enmity of Laud, who instituted three prose accusations against him in the Star Chamber: (1) for revealing the king's secrets; (2) for tampering with the king's finances; (3) for directing scandalous libels against the king's privy councillors. He was sentenced to pay fines to the amount of eighteen thousand pounds, to be suspended from his bishopric, and to be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure. He was in prison from 1636 to 1640. The Long Parliament released him. The king raised him to the archbishopric of York, 1641, and had all records of his trial cancelled. He is said to have died of grief over the king's execution. Williams was a man of learning and ability, although perhaps not equal to the demands of those stormy times. He won the favor of the Puritans by his conduct toward them. In 1641 he was chairman of the parliamentary committee "for innovations," i.e., to examine all innovations of doctrine and dia-
WILLIAMS, John, "The Apostle of Polynesia," missionary; b. at Tottenham, June 29, 1796; murdered at Erromanga, New Hebrides, Nov. 20, 1839. By trade an ironmonger, he was led at the age of twenty to give himself to missionary labor, and was sent by the London Missionary Society to the Society Islands (November, 1818). He settled in the Island of Rarotonga. In 1823 he discovered the Island of Rarotonga. On both islands he did most useful and permanent work, not only for their religious, but also for their secular interests. In connection with the latter, especially, he will be remembered; for he reduced its language to writing, and in connection with Messrs. Pitman and Buzacot translated the New Testament into it. He visited England, while he was still a youth, his skill in reporting sermons and also speeches in the Star Chamber attracted the notice of Sir Edward Coke, who sent him to Sutton's Hospital (now Charterhouse) School; and Williams afterwards writes to Sir Edward's daughter, "Your dear father was often pleased to call me his son." His university course, said by some to have been pursued in Oxford, was probably taken at Pembroke College, Cambridge. Tradition has it that he was killed by the natives. He wrote A Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South-Sea Islands, London and New York, 1837, often since (a very valuable and interesting work). See his Memoirs by Prout, London, 1843.

WILLIAMS, Roger, b. about 1540, the exact date being uncertain; d. April, 1638, at Providence, R. I. His birthplace, whether Wales or Cornwall, is also in dispute. Pious parentage may be inferred from his remark, "From my childhood, the Father of lights and mercies touched my soul with a love to himself." In London, while he was still a youth, his skill in reporting sermons and also speeches in the Star Chamber attracted the notice of Sir Edward Coke, who sent him to Sutton's Hospital (now Charterhouse) School; and Williams afterwards writes to Sir Edward's daughter, "Your dear father was often pleased to call me his son." His university course, said by some to have been pursued in Oxford, was probably taken at Pembroke College, Cambridge. Tradition has it that he studied law; but it is certain that he soon gave his attention to theology, which was admitted to orders in the Established Church, and, as it has been said, held a benefice in Lincolnshire.

But his "conscience was persuaded against the national church and ceremonies and bishops." His statement, "Bishop Laud pursued me out of this land," may not refer to any direct persecution; but it is evident that so radical a Reform as he was could find safety and freedom only in exile. Accordingly, he sailed for America, arriving in Boston in February, 1631. Here he is spoken of by Winthrop as "a godly minister," and the church in Boston immediately asked for his services. But not even the men of Boston had taken sufficiently strong ground in renunciation of the errors of the national church. He says, "Being unanimously chosen teacher at Boston, I conscientiously refused, because I durst not officiate to an unseparated people, as, upon examination and conference, I found them to be." He went to Salem, where, in April, the church asked him to become their teacher.

But, as we learn from Winthrop, "at a court holden at Boston (upon information to the governor that they of Salem had called Mr. Williams to the office of teacher), a letter was written from the court to Mr. Endicott to this effect; that whereas Mr. Williams had refused to take the congregation at Boston, because they would not make a public declaration of their repentance for having communion with the churches of England while they lived there; and besides had declared his opinion that the magistrate might not punish a breach of the sabbath, nor any other offence, as it was a breach of the first table: therefore they marveled they would choose him without advising with the council, and most desiring that they would forbear to proceed till they had conferred about it." The issue of these interferences was, that, in the summer or early autumn, Williams withdrew to Plymouth.

Here he remained two years, being "well accepted as an assistant in the ministry." Gov. Bradford says he was "a man godly and zealous, having many points in English literature, 1834-38, and on his return made a tour of the group of Society Islands, in the course of which he was killed by the natives. He wrote A Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South-Sea Islands, London and New York, 1837, often since (a very valuable and interesting work). See his Memoirs by Prout, London, 1843.

Bradford's opinion regarding Williams has been echoed by many since his day. But is it true that Williams was peculiarly crotchety and contentious? He broached many ideas new and strange; but that was an age of reform,—a day of attack on many institutions and customs which had long stood unchallenged. It is by no means strange that some good men thought him extreme, and unreasonably destructive; for this was the period of the Separatists by the Puritans, of the Puritans by the Anglicans, and of the Anglicans by the most enlightened Romanists. Seldom will two Reformers agree as to the extent to which amendments shall be carried. In each of his ideas which will now be deemed untenable, he had the countenance of some of the very best of his contemporaries; and the verdict of the present day will be, that the best and wisest of Williams's antagonists held as many erroneous opinions as he, while his views, taken as a whole, were much nearer right than theirs.

Williams returned to Salem in the latter half of the year 1633, some of the Plymouth people having become so attached to him that they removed thither also. He became assistant to the pastor, and on the death of the latter, in 1635, it was himself made pastor of the church. During his whole ministry there, he held the very highest place in the love and honor of the people of Salem.

But certain of his opinions brought upon him the displeasure of the authorities of the Colony. He was repeatedly cited to appear before the General Court; and in October, 1635, it was "ordered that the said Mr. Williams shall depart out of this jurisdiction within six weeks now next ensuing." Permission was afterwards given him to remain at Salem until spring; but as it was soon reported, that, at gatherings in his own house, he had continued to utter the objectionable teachings, an officer was sent to Salem in January, 1636, to apprehend him, in order to put him on board ship, and send him back to England. On the officer’s arrival at Salem, it was found that Williams had departed three days before, whither could not be learned.

The most noted of the proscribed opinions of Williams, was the doctrine that the civil magistrate should not inflict punishment for purely religious error. It has been urged that it was not simply for his doctrine of religious liberty, but for other opinions also, that Williams was banished. This, however, will not exculpate the General Court; for we find them enacting a law, that “If any person or persons within this jurisdiction... shall deny... their [the magistrates'] lawful right or authority... to punish the outward breaches of the first table... every such person or persons shall be sentenced to banishment.” In other words, though it be admitted that Williams was banished for other utterances, together with the proclamation of the doctrine of religious freedom, the court deemed it proper to decree banishment for that teaching alone. Certain others of Williams’s opinions were condemned, e.g., those regarding the royal patent, the administration of certain oaths, etc.; and it is declared by some that these doctrines threatened the civil peace, and thus rendered him justly liable to exile. But in Rhode Island, where the teachings of Williams and of all others were freely permitted, life and property and civil order were as secure as in Massachusetts. In other words, the Rhode-Island experiment showed that Williams’s teachings were not dangerous to civil order, and that therefore his banishment from Massachusetts was unnecessary, and consequently unjust.

Departing from Salem, Williams, with four companions, made his way to Seekonk, where he began to build and plant. But in a few weeks, finding that this spot was within the jurisdiction of Plymouth, the doctrine that he taught and made a new settlement, to which he gave the name of “Providence.”

Three years after Williams’s settlement at Providence came a change in his ecclesiastical relations. It should be remarked that the doctrine of religious liberty was not first set forth by Williams, but had been preached for a long time by the Baptists. It is found in their Confession of Faith, put forth in Amsterdam in 1611, when Williams was but a lad; and he must have been familiar with the teachings of the Baptists on this point. Possibly a leaning, on his part, to Baptist views, is revealed in the fear of Brewster at Plymouth, that Williams might “run the course of rigid separation and anabaptism, which Mr. John Smith, the Se-Baptist at Amsterdam, had done.” At any rate, in 1639, Williams, with others, denounced his baptism in infancy, and was-baptized again. Ezekiel Holli-man baptizing Williams, and Williams in return baptizing Holliman and several others. This reciprocal baptism is generally given as the origin of the First Baptist Church of Providence. Williams, however, remained connected with the new society only some four months; for, becom-

WILLIAMS, Rowland, D.D., English divine; b. at Halkyn, Flintshire, Wales, Aug. 16, 1817; d. at Broad-chalke, near Salisbury, Wiltshire, Jan. 18, 1870. He was educated at King's College, Cambridge, and chosen fellow of his college, 1838; travelled from August, 1840, till the autumn of 1841, upon the Continent; B.A., 1841; ordained deacon in the Welsh theological college of St. David's, Lampeter, 1849; resigned his tutorship; began his new duties in the spring of 1850; B.D., 1851; appointed select preacher at the University of Cambridge, December, 1854; D.D., 1857; became vicar of Broad-chalke, 1858; resigned his professorship, and retired to his parish, Aug. 19, 1862. He wrote Bunsen's Biblical Researches in the famous volume, Essays and Reviews, London, 1860, of which 22,500 copies were sold by March, 1863. For his part in it he was tried by the Arches Court of Canterbury, condemned (Dec. 13, 1862) to suspension for one year, with payment of costs. He appealed to the Privy Council, which reversed the judgment (Feb. 8, 1864), and he was not further molested. By his writings he made himself a place in literature. Among them may be mentioned his prize essay on The Principles of Historical Evidence applied to Discriminate between the Authority of the Christian Scriptures and of the Religious Books of the Hindus, 1847, of which the expansion was the standard volume, Christianity and Hinduism, Cambridge, 1856, which Baron Bunsen and Dr. Muir praised in the highest terms; Rational Godliness after the Mind of Christ and the Written Voices of the Church, 1855; Broad-chalke Sermon-essays, On Nature, Mediation, Atonement, Absolution, 1867; The Hebrew Prophets, translated Afresh, and Illustrated for English Readers, 1868-71, 2 vols.; Ocen Gien- dover, a Dramatic Biography: and Other Poems, 1869 (issued shortly after his death); Psalms and Laments, 1870; Canisius: Lect. Ant., iii.; and Mabillon: Act. S. B., iii.

WILLIAMSON, Isaac Dowd, D.D., Universalist; b. at Pomfret, Vt., April 4, 1807; d. in Cincinnati, Nov. 26, 1876. He began preaching when twenty years old, and was pastor in different parts of the Union. He also edited several religious denominational papers, and published An Exposition and Defence of Universalism, New York, 1840; Examination of the Doctrine of Endless Punishment, Cincinnati, 1854; The Philosophy of Universalism, Cincinnati, 1866.

WILLIBALD, St., the first bishop of Eichstadt, Bavaria; was b. in England, 700; a relative of Boniface, and was educated by Abbot Egbold in the monastery of Monte Cassino. In 720 he made a pilgrimage to Rome, and thence to the Holy Land; and after his return to Italy he spent ten years in the monastery of Monte Casino, 729-739. In 740 he met Boniface in Rome, and accompanied him to Germany, where in 741 he was consecrated bishop of the newly founded see of Eichstadt. He built the monastery of Heidenheim, over which his brother Wunnebald presided till 783, and then his sister Walpurgis till 778. The year of his death is given as 781 and as 786 or 787, and the latter is the most probable. His life (Vita Willibaldi, also called Holoporicum) was written by a nun of Heidenheim, and is found in CANISIUS: Lect. Ant., iii.; and MAHILLON: Act. S. B., iii.

WILLIAM, James Renwick, D.D., Reformed Presbyterian; b. near Pittsburgh, Penn., April 9, 1780; d. in Cincinnati, O., Sept. 29, 1853. He was graduated at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, 1806; licensed to preach, 1807; principal of school at Bedford, Penn., 1806-15, of one in Philadelphia. 1815-17; pastor of churches of Newburgh and Coldenham, N.Y., 1817-29; pastor of the latter church alone, 1833-39; pastor in Albany, 1830-40; professor in the theological seminary of his denomination at Allegheny, Penn., 1840-45; sole professor in the same after its removal to Cincinnati, O., 1845-51; resigned in the latter year because of impaired health. He was a leader in his denomination, and an eloquent preacher. He was editor successively of The Evangelical Witness (1822-26), The Christian Statesman (two years), and The Churchman (1826-35). Other publications may be mentioned An Historical Sketch of Opinions on the Atonement, 1817. See Sprague's Annals, ix. p. 40 sqq.

WILMER, William Holland, D.D., Episcopalian; b. in Kent County, Md., Oct. 29, 1782; d. at Williamsburgh, Va., July 24, 1827. He was ordained; from 1808 until 1812 he was rector of Chester Parish, Md.; from 1812 until 1826 at Alexandria, Va.; from 1810 until 1826 an editor of the Washington Theological Repository; and from 1823 till 1826 he was professor of systematic theology, ecclesiastical history, and church polity in the theological seminary of Virginia, located at Alexandria; from 1826 till his death he was president of Williams and Mary College at Williamsburg. In 1820, 1821, 1823, and 1826 he was president of the house of clerical and lay deputies. See Sprague's Annals, v. 515 sqq.

WILSON, Bird, D.D., L.L.D., Episcopalian; b. at Carlisle, Penn., 1777; d. in New York, April 14, 1859. He was graduated at Pennsylvania College, 1792; studied law, rose to eminence, and in 1802 was president judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the Seventh Circuit of Pennsylvania. But he turned eventually to theology; was rector in Morristown, Penn., 1819-21; professor of systematic divinity in the general seminary, New-York City, 1821-50; and professor emeritus from 1850 till his death. He was secretary of the house of bishops 1829-41. He was the author of The Memoirs of the Life of the Right Rev. William White, Philadelphia, 1830. See his Memorial, by W. W. Bronson, Philadelphia, 1864.

WILSON, Daniel, D.D., Bishop of Calcutta; b. in Spitalfields, London, July 2, 1778; d. in Calcutta, Jan. 2, 1858. He was educated at Oxford; took holy orders; was tutor and vice-principal of St. Edmund's Hall, 1807-12; curate in London, 1812-24; vicar of Lillingston, 1824-32, when he was consecrated bishop of Calcutta, and metropolitan of India. In theology he was an evangelical. He was an indefatigable worker. As bishop, he was noted for fidelity and firmness. His publications were numerous; but they are only sermons, lectures, and charges. Two of such volumes attained a wide circulation, and have been repeatedly republished, e.g., New York, 1868; Parochialia, 2d ed.; revised and abridged, 1861, 1 vol., Boston, 1860, 1 vol.

WILSON, John, D.D., an eminent missionary to India; b. Dec. 11, 1804, near Lander in Scotland, where his father was a farmer; d. Dec. 1, 1875, in Bombay, India. At an early period he came under the power of divine truth, and resolved to give his life to the missionary cause. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh. From the first he showed a remarkable capacity for learning, and all through his life he united the perseverance of the scholar to the laborious diligence of the missionary. He went out to India in the service of the Scottish Missionary Society, a body of Christian friends that took up the cause of missions before the Church of Scotland; but, when that church became earnest in the cause, the society was merged, and Dr. Wilson became a missionary of his own church. He was the head of the mission college of Bombay, in which city he spent his whole public life. In 1843, along with all the other missionaries of the Church in Scotland, he adhered to the Free Church. At Bombay he occupied a kind of patriarchal position. Ultimately all missionaries looked on him as a father. He was greatly respected by the natives, and on many important questions of government his advice was eagerly sought by the highest of the British authorities. He was viceregent of the Bombay university, and president of the Bombay branch of the Royal Asiatic Society. His chief work was on caste, and on many important questions of the Indians, explaining themost Essential Doctrines of Christianity, London, 1818, 6th ed., 1827; and Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity, 1828-30, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1860. See his Life by Rev. Josiah Baiteman, 1860, 2 vols.; 2d ed., revised and abridged, 1861, 1 vol., Boston, 1860, 1 vol.

WILSON, Thomas, D.D., Bishop of Sodor and Man; b. at Burton, Cheshire, Sunday, Dec. 20, 1683; d. on the Isle of Man, March 7, 1755. He was graduated B.A. at Trinity College, Dublin, 1686; and was consecrated bishop of Newchurch, Kenyon, Eng., 1686, where he remained until August, 1692, when he was appointed chaplain to the Earl of Derby, who, on Nov. 27, 1697, appointed him bishop of Sodor and Man; the benefice being in his gift as Lord of the Isle of Man. Wilson was consecrated at the Savoy Church, London, Jan. 16, 1697, and thus entered upon fifty-eight years of faithful labor. He accomplished two great reforms in his diocese, — the first (1708) relating to the tenures of landed property, which had been very uncertain; and the second, to the rules and discipline of the church, as a father. He was greatly respected by the natives, and on many important questions of the Indians, explaining themost Essential Doctrines of Christianity, London, 1818, 6th ed., 1827; and Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity, 1828-30, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1860. As far as man can judge of man, few persons ever went out of this world more thoroughly prepared for the change than Bishop Wilson, not only in heart and conscience, but incomparatively trifling beforehand. His death occasioned a great outburst of sorrow. He was a model bishop; and, wherever he is now known by his writings, he receives the involuntary encomium, "Surely he was a saintly man." The best known of these writings, besides those already mentioned, are, Short and Plain Instructions for the Better Understanding of the Lord's Supper, London, 1706, 84th ed., 1767, repeatedly republished, e.g., New York, 1868; Parochialia, WIMPHELING, Jakob, b. at Schlettstadt, in Alsace, July 26, 1450; d. there Nov. 17, 1528. The school in which he was educated was controlled by the Brethren of Common Life,— a circumstance which seems to have exercised a decisive influence on his whole life. He studied at Freiburg (1464–71) and at Heidelberg, where he took his degree, and began to lecture. In 1493 he was ordained priest, and appointed preacher at the Cathedral of Spires; but in 1498 he was called to Heidelberg as professor in the fiscultas artium. That position, however, he gave up in 1500, and joined Geiler von Kaisersberg at Strassburg, where for some time he was occupied with the editing of Gerson's works. In 1515 he finally began to preach, and in 1516 he rejected the worship of the Virgin, and at once became a friend of Luther and other reformers. He was one of the strongest advocates in the South for the American Colonization Society. He took a prominent part in the organization of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. He joined the Western Conference in Pennsylvania in 1808, and two years later moved to Mississippi. Here he soon took high rank in his conference, and rose to great eminence in the connection. He was one of the strongest advocates in the South for the American Colonization Society. He took a prominent part in the organization of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South in 1844–46. Intellectually he was one of the strongest men the Southern Methodist Church has ever produced. A close student, a clear thinker and reasoner, a vigorous writer, a powerful preacher, a debater of decided ability and reputation, he is justly regarded as one of the leading minds and representative men of the Southern Church in his day. In addition to many public addresses, he published courses (8vo, Nashville, 1856) of a theological nature, which are remarkable for clearness of analysis and vigor of style, and evince, in a masterly treatment of the individual themes, a depth and compass of thought rarely, if ever, surpassed in sermonic literature.

WINCHESTER, the seat of an English bishopric since 692; is the capital of Hampshire, and is situated on the right bank of the Itchen. It was called by the ancient Britons Caer Gwent ("The White City"); by the Romans, Venta Bulgarum, and by the Anglo-Saxons, Wiltoncaster. The Romans are supposed to have built its walls. It has witnessed a number of important events in former times; such as the coronation of Egbert as Bretwalda, 827; its capture by the Danes, 870; the great assembly held by Cnut, between 1016 and 1020; the reconciliation of King John with Archbishop Langton and the prelates, 1213; the marriage of Queen Mary with Philip II., 1554. It was the capital of England from its capture by the Danes till after Henry II. Its cathedral was first built by Cenwalch, 643–648, but has been rebuilt and enlarged several times. The present structure is 545 feet long, with transepts 186 feet wide, and a tower 139 feet high above the roof. The stipend of the bishop is £6,500. See BENHAM: Winchester, Lond., 1884.

WINCHESTER, Elhanan, Universalist; b. in Brookline, Mass., Sept. 30, 1751; d. in Hartford, Conn., April 18, 1797. In 1789 he joined a Separate Church in his native town, and became a preacher; but the next year he went over to the Open-Communion Baptists in Canterbury, Conn.; later, became a close-communionist, and in consequence was excommunicated; but from 1771 to 1786 he preached in various parts of the country. In 1786 he was settled in Philadelphia, and there avowed his belief in Restorationism, and, followed by most of his congregation, established a Universalist Church. From 1787 to 1794 he preached Restorationism in England. His publications number upwards of forty volumes. See list (imperfect) in Allibone. His Life has been written by WILIAM VIDLER (London, 1797) and by E. M. STONE (Boston, 1836).

WINCKLER, Johann, b. at Gölzern in Saxony, July 13, 1842; d. at Hamburg, April 5, 1875. He... studied at Leipzig and Jena, and was appointed pastor of Hamburg in 1671, superintendent of Braubach in 1672, court-preacher in Darmstadt in 1676, pastor of Mannheim in 1678, superintendent of Wertheim in 1679, and pastor of St. Michael in Hamburg in 1684. In 1688 he made the acquaintance of Spener, and he soon became one of his most intimate friends and one of his most active co-workers. See his Beutenken über Kriemhild's Symphonien (1707), Teiert von Diffeld's, etc. (1691), Sendschreiben an Dr. Hanneke, etc. (1690), etc. But this relation involved him in violent controversies with his colleague in Hamburg, Mayer, first, concerning the theatre, (1687-88), then concerning the oath of orthodoxy, etc. See J. Geffcken: Johann Winckler, Hamburg, 1861.

WINDESHEIM, or WINDESSEN, a convent of regular canons, founded in 1386 by the Brethren of Common Life, and situated in the diocese of Utrecht. It was a very prosperous institution. In 1402 it had founded, or entered into connection with, six other convents; towards the end of the fifteenth century, with eighty. In 1435 it was by the Council of Basel charged with the reforming of all the convents of regular canons in Germany; and after the visit of Nicolaus Cusanus, in 1531, its reformatory activity was extended also to other orders. It was closed towards the end of the sixteenth century. See Busch: Chronicicon Winidense (Antwerp, 1621), and De Reformazione Monasteriorum quorundam Saxonie, in Leipzig: Scripiores Brunsvicenses.

WINE-MAKING AMONG THE HEBREWS.

The vine was brought from Armenia to Palestine before the time of Abraham; and it found there, more especially in the southern part of the country, a soil and a climate most congenial to it. It was from the Judean Valley of Eshcol that the spies sent out by Joshua cut down the gigantic cluster of grapes. About Beersheba, and east of the Judæan Valley, the Hebrews devoted as much care to their vineyard as to their cornfields. The regular vintage began in September, and lasted for two months (Lev. xxiv. 5; Amos ix. 13). Ripe clusters, however, could be found as early as June and July,—a difference, no doubt, due to the threefold growth of the vine, which puts forth fruit-bearing shoots in March, in April, and in May. The gathered grapes were thrown into the press, consisting of a shallow vat excavated in the rock, and, through holes at the bottom, communicating with a lower vat, also excavated in the rock (Joel iii. 13). The grapes were then crushed by treading; and the treaders sang and shouted (Isa. xvi. 10) while the red blood of the grapes flowed around them, and stained their skins and garments (Isa. lxix. 1-3; Jer. xxx. 30, xlviii. 33; Lam. i. 15; Rev. xix. 13-15). From the upper vat the juice of the crushed grapes trickled down into the lower vat.

Various kinds of wine were produced in Palestine, and some of them were remarkable both for their power and for their flavor; as, for instance, the wine of Lebanon, and that of Helbon near Damascus (Ezek. xxvii. 18; Hos. xiv. 7). The manner of preserving wine was the same among the Hebrews as among the Greeks; namely, in large earthen vessels or jars, which were buried up to their necks in the ground. When wine was to be transported, the Persians sometimes decanted it into flasks or bottles; but skins were used in ancient times, just as they are now.

But when skins were used to hold new wine, care had to be taken that the skin was also new, lest it should be burst asunder by the fermentation (Matt. ix. 17).

WINE, Bible. There are in the Old Testament distinct terms for grape-juice in all states in which it can pass. Among the Hebrews the juice of the grape was expressed by treading with the feet. Hence the word 'axis, which means literally 'trodden' (see the root, Mal. iii. 21, Heb.), is used to denote must, or the newly expressed juice of the grape. A more common term for must is tirosh. For grape-juice when it has undergone the vinous fermentation, the proper word is yayin. The acetoous fermentation converts it into ekometz, or vinegar. So in Latin, rinum ("wine") stands intermediate between mustum ("must") and nectar ("honey"). In the beginning, the Hebrews, as is now also the case, were not with tirosh. But corn is not eaten in its crude state: it must, care had to be taken that the skin was also new, lest it should be burst asunder by the fermentation (Matt. ix. 17).

The grape-juice flowed out of the press, and was conveyed to the lower vat, and thence to the upper vat, where the wine was preserved. skins were used instead of jars, and were buried underground, or in the rock. skins must have been used to hold new wine, and to prevent its fermenting. skins were used in ancient times, just as they are now.

The gathered grapes were thrown into the press, and the pressing was done with the feet. the wine was then decanted into skins or jars, which were buried up to their necks in the ground. When wine was to be transported, the Persians sometimes decanted it into flasks or bottles; but skins were used in ancient times, just as they are now.

When skins were used to hold new wine, care had to be taken that the skin was also new, lest it should be burst asunder by the fermentation. But when skins were used to hold new wine, care had to be taken that the skin was also new, lest it should be burst asunder by the fermentation. of the drunken Armenians and Nestorians of the present day: "The drinking is usually done up between the vintage and spring. The wine is exhausted at Easter. Till then drunkenness is too common to excite remark" (Missions and Science, p. 433). If tirosh were, as a few modern writers contend, "the fruit of the vineyard," it would not be "found in the cluster" (Isa. ix. 8), but would be the cluster. That it is a fluid clear from Joel ii. 24. Tirosh is described as trodden (Mic. vi. 15); but tayin, which all allow to be a fluid, is not tirosh but tayin. There is, then, no reason for altering the meaning with which tirosh has come down to us. "Yayin, when it first occurs (Gen. ix. 21), appears as the fermented juice of the grape; and in no place in the Old Testament are we required to give it another meaning. Like oil (shemen), it is said to be gathered (Jer. xi. 10), by a prolepsis; just as bread is represented as brought forth out of the earth (see Hebrew text, Ps. xcv. 14). Iron is "taken out of the earth" (Job xxviii. 2). Examples of this figure are frequent. Corresponding to the association of yayin with bread, and of tirosh with corn, is the fact, that, where yayin and tirosh are in juxtaposition, tirosh is the natural product, yayin the liquor proper for drinking. Thus, in Gen. xxvii. 25, Isaac drinks tirosh, but prays (ver. 28) that God may give Jacob tirosh along with corn. Compare Isa. xxiv. 7, 9, and Mic. vi. 13, where not tirosh, but yayin, appears as proper to be drunk. Indeed, Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxii. 18) roundly declares that every kind of must is hurtful to the stomach; and in this judgment Hebrew and Greek authors agree. Thus the nature of the drink prescribed to Timothy, who had an ailment in the stomach (1 Tim. v. 23), is determined. As to the ordinary wine of Ephesus, where Timothy was living, consult Eph. v. 25. Scripture never hints at a distinction between intoxicating and unintoxicating wines. That the same wine is interdicted to some, and allowed to others (Prov. xxxi. 4–7), so strict an observer of the law of Moses as Nehemiah had "all sorts" of wine on his table with a good conscience (Neh. v. 16). He certainly held that every kind of wine known in Palestine could be lawfully drunk. Some take the warning, "Look not thou upon the wine," etc. (Prov. xxxii. 31), as indicating that there was a particular kind of hurtful wine that was absolutely prohibited. But the wine there spoken of has the qualities of the best wine ascribed to it. It is a floating look that is forbidden. Similarly, in Cant. i. 6, the bride speaks, "Look not upon me, because I am black," etc., deprecating a look of contempt on account of her complexion. Yet the same bride can (chap. vi. 10) be regarded with admiration. "Wine is a mocker" (Prov. xx. 1). This declaration sets forth the danger connected with the use of wine in general, but does not specifically condemn any variety of it. No one interprets the statement, "knowledge puffeth up" (1 Cor. viii. 1), as the condemnation of a certain kind of knowledge; or the words, "the tongue is a fire," etc. (James iii. 6), as suggesting a distinction of tongues as to substance or structure. Ancient Jewish and Gentile authors attribute good and bad effects to wine according to its proper use or abuse (cf. Ecclus. xxxi. 25–30; Pliny, H. N., xiv. 7; and Price on 1 Tim. v. 23). No Christian or heathen moralist has ever, in condemning wine, and advocating temperance, alluded to a wine the use of which was free from peril. In fact, the theory of two kinds of wine— the one fermented and intoxicating and unlawful, and the other unfermented, unintoxicating, and lawful— is a modern hypothesis, devised during the present century, and has no foundation in the Bible, or in Hebrew or classical antiquity. Examples of unfermented wines are, indeed, adduced from Latin and Greek authors; but they do not bear examination. Those who take the pains to study the authorities appealed to must be amazed at the purpose for which they are brought forward. That must passes into wine by fermentation, see Varro, De Rustica, i. 65; Columella, De Re Rustica, xii. 25; Pliny, H. N., xiv. 11. These writers mention only one way of trying to hinder must from becoming wine; viz., by keeping the casks containing it in cold water. But no instance of this preserved must being drunk as a beverage alone, or simply mixed with water, has been put in evidence. To complete the evidence against the unfermented wine theory, no trace of such a wine can now be discovered in the lands of the Bible. Missionaries of the highest character and attainments, and long resident in Syria, such as Drs. W. M. Thomson, C. V. A. Van Dyck, H. H. Jessup, and W. Wright, have united with some of the most intelligent natives of Syria in testifying that they have never seen or heard of an unfermented wine in Syria or the Holy Land, nor have found, among Jews, Christians, or Mohammedans, any tradition of such a wine ever having existed in the country. We need not here inquire how certain travellers were led to make mistakes and misstatements on this subject. It is enough to refer to what is written in Drs. Laurie's work on Missions and Science, pp. 430–441. No one who duly weighs the evidence there presented can believe that such a thing as unfermented wine is known in the country in which our Saviour lived in the days of his flesh. Dido, which is sometimes referred to as a specimen of an unfermented wine, is simply honey of grapes, the Hebrew debash. It is not drunk diluted with water, but is used as molasses or jelly. The expression "the fruit of the vine" is employed by our Saviour in the synoptical Gospels to denote the element contained in the cup of the Holy Supper. The fruit of the vine is literally the grape. But the Jews from time immemorial have used this phrase to designate the wine partaken of on sacred occasions, as at the Passover and on the evening of the Sabbath. The Mishna (De Beker. cap. 6, par. 2) expressly states, that, in pronouncing blessings, "the fruit of the vine" is the consecrated expression for yayin. For further proof of this usage the Jewish Prayer-Book may be consulted. How naturally the phrase "the fruit of the vine" is put for wine is seen from Herodotus (book i. 219), where Tomyrus, the Queen of the Massagetea, is made to employ the three expressions, amepous karpos ("the fruit of the vine"), pharmakon ("a drug"), and oinos ("wine"), to denote the wine by which a part of her army was so intoxicated as to fall an easy prey to Cyrus. Wine is not whiskey, but compare the phrase "old rye" for the latter. The Christian Fathers, as well as the Jewish rabbis, have understood "the fruit of the vine" to mean wine in the proper sense. Our Lord, in instituting the Supper after the Passover, prevailed himself of the expression invariably employed by his countrymen in speaking of the wine of the Passover. On other occasions, when employing the language of common life, he calls wine by its ordinary name. We have seen, that, according to Old Testament usage, the product of the vine which accompanies bread is not tirosh, but proper wine. The New Testament corroboration of this usage is found in Luke vii. 36. 37, and John xxi. 22, where bread in the Communion, wine is its fitting scriptural accompaniment. What we read in 1 Cor. xi. 21, 27, testifies unmistakably to the nature of the wine of the Supper. Those in the Corinthian church who were "drunkened" at the Communion partook of "the cup of the Lord," though "unworthily." It is right to state, that, during the Passover, Jews will not taste or touch fermented drinks into which grain has entered (cf. Mishna, Pesacockh, part ii.). But the fermented juice of the grape prepared by Jews, and kept carefully free from leaven, is the proper Pesachal wine. The truth on this subject can be learned from any intelligent Jew. The wine of the Supper is not different from the wine made by our Lord at Cana. The character of the latter is clear from the remark of the governor of the feast recorded in John ii. 10. It is classed by him with the natural, shekhar was the artificial wine. It could be poured out to the Lord as a drink-offering (Num. xxviii. 7). As yayin was the remark of the governor of the feast recorded in John ii. 10. It is classed by him with the natural, shekhar was the artificial wine. It could be poured out to the Lord as a drink-offering (Num. xxviii. 7). As yayin was mentioned in connection with shekhar, the use of the approved wine of Scripture is maintained in Bacchus by R. B. Grindrod, and in Anti-Bacchus by Rev. B. Parsons; in the Temperance Bible Commentary, by Lees and Burns; Dr. Samson's Divine Law as to Wines, and a multitude of pamphlets and essays. Dr. John Maclean criticized Bacchus and Anti-Bacchus in the April and October issues of the Princeton Review for 1841. The Rev. A. M. Wilson wrote The Wines of the Bible (London, Hamilton Adams & Co.), principally against Dr. Lees. The subject is discussed by Dr. T. Laurie, in Bib. Sac. for January, 1868; by Dr. Atwater, in Princeton Review for Oct. 1871; by Professor Bumstead, in Bib. Soc. for Jan. 1881, and January, 1882. DUNLOP MOORE.

WINEBRENNERIANS, the popular designation of a Baptist denomination officially called "The Church of God." The founder, the Rev. John Winebrenner, was a minister of the German Reformed Church; b. March 23, 1797, in Frederick County, Md.; d. Sept. 12, 1860, in Harrisburg, Penn. He was settled in 1820, in Harrisburg, over four congregations of the German Reformed Church,—one in town, and three in the country. Soon after his settlement a revival began in his churches, on account of which, as he wrote, he encountered much opposition from members and ministers of the synod. "This state of things," according to his own account, "lasted for the space of five years, and then resulted in a separation from the German Reformed Church." This separation, which must have been in 1820, did not interrupt the revival. On the contrary, it spread, and there were "multitudes happily converted to God." These converts were organized into churches; and, as Mr. Winebrenner's views as to the nature of a scriptural ecclesiastic... al organization had meantime changed, these churches were formed as "spiritual, free, and independent churches." Ministers were raised up from among the converts; but until 1830 they co-operated with Mr. Winebrenner, without any definite practical system. The first congregation called "The Church of God" was organized in 1829; and in the following year the ministers met together, and agreed upon the principles upon which the new denomination should be based. Winebrenner was elected speaker (president) of the conference, and preached a sermon, in which he gave an outline of the faith and practice of New-Testament churches. Such churches should be formed, (1) of "believers only;" (2) "without sectarian or human name;" (3) "with no creed and discipline but the Bible;" (4) subject to no foreign jurisdiction; (5) "they should be governed by their own officers, chosen by a majority of the members of each individual church." Thus originated the Annual Eldership, or Conference. There are now, chiefly in Pennsylvania and the West, fifteen annual elderships, besides a General Eldership (triennial), which adopts general legislation for the church, and controls its denominational activities and benevolences. The ministers, of whom there are four hundred and fifty, are called elders, and occupy stations, or itinerate in given districts under the control of their respective elderships, or travel as missionaries at large. The number of members is estimated at about five thousand. The church was organized by Germans, and the German element enters largely into the membership. One eldership is wholly German. The church holds in biblical language to the general doctrines of evangelical Christianity, but emphasizes the ordinances of baptism, the Lord's Supper, and feet-washing. These are "positive ordinances of perpetual standing in the church." Without faith and immersion, baptism is not valid. Feet-washing is "obligatory upon all Christians." The Lord's Supper should be "administered to Christians only, in a sitting posture, and always in the evening." The Church of God claims, that, as distinguished from other Protestant churches, it has a "special, precious, and glorious plea: it is the restoration of primitive Christianity in letter and spirit, in faith and practice." At Harrisburg, the church has a publishing-house. The Church Advocate is the weekly organ of the body, which has no colleges. Its relations with the Free Baptists have been very cordial, and its students have patronized Free-Baptist institutions. It has an academy at Basheyville, Penn., and a college-building is in process of erection in Findlay, O.

There are few denominational publications. Elder Winebrenner wrote a sketch of the denominational history in Rupp's Religious Denominations, Phila-delphia, 1844; but no denominational history has been written. Elder Winebrenner's Doctrinal and Practical Sermons are published by the Board of Publication, in Harrisburg, in a volume of upwards of four hundred pages, together with his treatise on Regeneration, a Revival Hymn-Book, The Reference and Pronouncing Testament. He was several times speaker of the General Eldership, and was for some years editor of The Church Advocate. H. K. CARROLL.
unending arbitrariness of an exposition, which, through decades of use, had become a system, and claimed a scientific character. He brought this great victory about by proving the truly Greek usage in the New Testament, both in grammatical forms and in style. His work had apparently only a scientific end, but in reality Winer was influenced by moral and religious considerations. He had a great reverence for the Bible; and his labors accomplished their end, for they enabled the student to get at the truth. In consequence, it may be claimed for him, that he led the way to reform in biblical interpretation, making it less subjective and individual, and more in accordance with the real facts. It is greatly to be regretted, that Winer was not permitted to do for the lexicon of the New Testament a work corresponding to that he had done for the grammar. He did, it is true, prepare a Beitrag zur Verbesserung der neustamentlichen Lexikographie, 1823, and collect rich materials for such a lexicon; but he did not live to put his work in shape. In 1826 he issued a Specimen lexici hebraici, and in 1828 a revision of the Simon-Eichhorn Dictionary of the Hebrew and Chaldee languages. G. LECHLER.

WINES, Enoch Cobb, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian, b. at Hanover, N.J., Feb. 17, 1806; d. at Cambridge, Mass., Dec. 10, 1879. He was graduated at Middlebury College, 1827; from 1829 till 1831 was chaplain and teacher in the navy, and subsequently taught and preached in various places, until in 1854 he was appointed professor of ancient languages in Washington College, Pennsylvania, and in 1859 president of the City University, St. Louis. In 1882 he entered publicly upon the great work of prison-reform, with which his name is indissolubly connected. In that year he became corresponding secretary of the New-York Prison Association, and in 1870 the secretary of the National Prison Association, which was formed through his exertions. In 1871 he went to Europe, as a representative of the United-States Government, to make arrangements for an international convention of prisoners of war, which met at Brussels, July 4, 1872, and through his personal efforts embraced representatives of twenty-six governments. He was on this occasion chosen chairman of the permanent international commission, which met at Brussels, 1874, and at Bruchsal, 1875. He was also the leading spirit in the second congress, called by the commission at Stockholm, 1877. Besides his official reports, which contain much valuable information, and reveal his indefatigable energy and tireless enthusiasm, he was the author of Two Years and a Half in the Navy, Phila., 1832, 2 vols.; Commentaries on the Laws of the Ancient Hebrews, New York, 1832, 6th ed., Phila., 1869; Adam and Christ, or the Doctrine of Representation stated and explained, Phila., 1855; and The State of Prisons and Child-saving Institutions in Boston, New York, 1874 (he finished reading the proof only a few hours before his death). See In Memoriam, in 55th Annual Report of the Prison Association of New York.

WINSWOLD, Miron (often spelled Myron), D.D., LL.D., Congregational missionary; b. at Williamston, Vt., Dec. 11, 1789; d. at the Cape of Good Hope, on his way home, Oct. 22, 1844. He was graduated at Middlebury College, 1815, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1818. In June, 1819, he sailed as A. B. C. F. M. missionary to India, and for seventeen years labored at Jaffna and Oodoville in Ceylon, then, 1836, was transferred to Madras; which mission founded a mission, and in 1840 a college, of which he was president. He was the author of Sketch of the A. B. C. F. M. Missions, Andover, 1819; Hints on Mission Work in the Ceylon Mission, New York, 1835 (a very widely read memoir); Hints on Missions in India, New York, 1856; A Comprehensive Tamil and English Dictionary of High and Low Tamil, Madras, 1862 (based partly upon manuscript materials left by Rev. Joseph Knight; upon it he spent from three to four hours a day for thirty years. He was assisted by native scholars. It contains 67,000 Tamil words). Dr. Winslow also translated the Bible into Tamil (Madras, 1855). He was married five times.

WINSTHR, Johann, or Vitoduranus, b. at Winterthur, in the canton of Zürich, towards the close of the thirteenth century; entered the order of the Minorites about 1260, and lived in the various convents of the order, at Basel, Schaffhausen, Lindau, and Zurich. The date and place of his death are unknown. He is the author of a chronicle, reaching from the death of Friedrich II. to 1348, which is of great interest, especially for the history of Switzerland, but also for history in general. The book was first published in Eccard's Corpus hist. mediævi, 1723; the latest edition is that by Jaffé, in Monumenta Germaniae.

WISEMAN, Nicholas Patrick Stephen, S.T.D., Cardinal, and Archbishop of Westminster; b. in Seville, Spain, Aug. 2, 1802; d. in London, Feb. 15, 1865. He was educated in England, then in English College at Rome, where he graduated S.T.D. in 1824. He was ordained priest, 1826, and made professor of Oriental languages of the Roman University, and vice-rector of the English College, 1827; rector, 1828. In 1835 he returned to England, and won fame as a preacher; in 1840 he was made bishop of Melpatomus, and president of St. Mary's College, Oscott; in 1849, vicar-apostolic of the London district; and on the restoration of the Roman-Catholic hierarchy in England, Sept. 29, 1850, archbishop of Westminster, and cardinal. He was the author of Horæ Suriæ, Rome, 1828, vol. 1. (all pub.); Twelve Lectures on the Connection between Science and Revealed Religion, delivered in Rome, London, 1838, 2 vols., 5th ed., 1858, reprinted Andover, 1837, St. Louis, 1870 (a masterly work, although now behind the times); Letters on the Principle, Doctrines, and Practices of the Catholic Church, London, 1836, 6th Amer. ed., Baltimore, 1862; Fabiola, a Tale of the Catacombs, London, 1853, 3d ed., New York, 1854; Reflections on the Last Four Popes, and of Rome in their Times, London and Boston, 1858; Daily Meditation, Dublin, 1868. His Works have been published in 14 vols. (New York), including his dramas, one of which, The Hidden Gem, was produced at Liverpool in 1859, and well received.

to the date on a fine old portrait which is supposed to represent him, and purports to have been painted in 1543, when the subject is said to have been “stat. 30,” Wishart’s birth must have taken place in the year 1513. Calderwood describes him as “a gentleman of the house of the faith, disappeared at this supreme crisis. He have taken place in the year 1013. Calderwood to have been “aetat. 30,” Wishart’s birth must be hanged out at the same window, to “be seen in such state, from that high place, feedeth his self otherwise to his own share of the troubles of that county. It was here that Wishart was be of Knox, who defended him at great personal ment (the Greek language being at this period, as appears from James Melville’s Diary, and from other sources, practically unknown in Scotland, even in the universities), and to save his life was obliged to flee to England. In 1539 he was in Bristol, where he again got into trouble,—on this occasion for preaching against the worship and mediation of the Virgin Mary,—and whether was submitted to the humiliation of making a public recantation by burning his fagot in the Church of St. Nicholas in that city. He seems to have lived abroad, and chiefly in Germany and Switzerland, from 1539 to 1542. In 1543 he is again found in England. He spent that year in Cambridge as a member of Corpus Christi College.
The next year, or possibly not till the year 1545, he ventured back to his native country, and down to the period of his apprehension by the emissaries of Cardinal Beaton, followed by his martyrdom, occupied himself in preaching, in various parts of Scotland, what he regarded as the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. We find him thus engaged in Montrose, Dundee, Ayrshire, and elsewhere. East Lothian was the scene of his last labors as a preacher; and the crowning result of his evangelistic work was the conversion of John Knox, who (at the time, still a Roman priest, but already strongly prepossessed in favor of the new doctrines) was pedagogue or tutor to of his person and habits will be found in the account of him published in Fox’s Book of Martyrs, given in a letter from one of his Cambridge pupils, Emery Tytyn, written in 1543.

Tytyn writes, about the year of our Lord
1643:—

“There was in the Universitie of Cambridge, one Maister George Wyschart, commonly called Maister
George of Bennets College, who was a man of tall stature, polde headed, and on the same a rounds fustiand doublet, and plain black liosen, coarse new cuffs sat his hands. All the which apparell he gave him. He was a man modest, temperate, fearing God, hating ooveteousness. . . . His learning no lesser sufficient than his desire. . . . to do good.”

Mr. Tytyn (History of Scotland, v. 343) brings a charge against Wishart, of some concern with a scheme for the assassination of Cardinal Beaton, and appears to conclude that his execution was justifiable on this ground; but Mr. David Laing seems to conclude that his execution was imputation against his character which is at variance with all that we know of the martyr. See Laing’s edition of Knox, vol. i. p. 536.

WISHART, or WISEHEART, George, one of the best known of the Scottish bishops of the Restoration period; was b. in 1609, and d. in 1671. He belonged to the ancient family of the Wisharts of Logie in Forfarshire. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh for the Scottish Church, at that time in a state of transition, or rather of oscillation between presbyterianism and episcopacy, to which last party Wishart, as well from family connection as personal predilection, most inclined. He was a minister of St.
Andrew’s (not as Keith says, erroneously, of North Leith: see Sir James Balfour, Annals, iii. 261) down to the year 1639, when he was deposed for refusing to sign the covenant, and subjected himself otherwise to his own share of the troubles of the times. He tells us, that, for his attachment to Charles I. and episcopacy, he thrice suffered spoliation, imprisonment, and exile, before the year 1647. In 1645, having been sent to the Marquis of Montrose, then everywhere victorious, with other royalist prisoners, as a deputation from the terrified citizens of Edinburgh to plead for the royal elements, he appears to have joined the family of Montrose as his chaplain. He continued with him till the close of the campaign, and afterwards, in the same capacity, accompanied him abroad. After the fall of Montrose he became chaplain to Elizabeth, queen of Bohemia, and sister of King Charles I. At the Restoration he returned to England; and having been, in partial recognition of his loyalty to the royal family and of his strict adherence to episcopacy, appointed to the rectory of Newcastle-on-Tyne, he was in the year 1662 promoted to the bishopric of Edinburgh.

His character is very differently represented by the Presbyterians and the Episcopalians. Wodrow says of him, that he could not refrain from profane swearing, even upon the streets of Edinburgh; that he was a known drunkard; and that his poems, by their indelicacy, gave scandal to all the world. Keith mentions one incident very much in his favor. The time appears to have been that of the failure of the unfortunate rising at Pentland. On that occasion he is said to have interested himself to obtain mercy for the captive insurgents; and, "having been a prisoner himself," it is added, "he was always careful at each dinner to send away the first mess to the prisoners."

He was an elegant Latinist, and a man of general literary ability. He wrote in two parts a history of the great campaign in Scotland, and the other transactions of the life of his great patron, the Marquis of Montrose. The title of the first part is J. G. De Rebus auspiciis Serenissimae et Potentissimae Carolii, D. G., Mag. Brit. regis, etc., sub imperio illustrissimi Montisrosarum Marchionis, etc., Anno 1644, et duobus sequentibus, praecelare gestis, Commentarius, A.S.; and of the second, Pars Secunda, De Eiusdem Marchionis, ab Anno 1647 ad 1650. This work was frequently translated and reprinted.

WITCHCRAFT gives the evidences of its existence; the second, the rules for finding it out; and the third, the proceedings for punishing it. As the popes continued to confirm the bull of Innocent VIII., and Protestant princes showed up the old business of hunting up witches, a perfect mania of witchcraft broke out in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and continued through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, only slowly decreasing. In defence of the reigning view of the subject, wrote, among Roman Catholics, Jean Bodin (Muratorum Demonstratio, 1679), Peter Binsfeld (De Confessionibus Maleficarum et Sagarum, 1530), and Martin Delrio (Disquisitiones magicae, 1659); among Protestants, Thomas Erast (De lamiis seu stivitibus, Basel, 1678), James I. of England (Damonologia), and Benedict Carpzov (Practica noaca, 1635). The first who attacked it with any degree of effect were Balthasar Becken (Bezaerti Welt, 1691; Ger. trans., edited by Semler, Leipzig, 1791, 3 vols.), and Thomasius (Theses de crimine magico, 1701); for his office, as a Church of England man, was actually persecuted. [The great witch process of Salem, Mass., took place in 1692. Nineteen persons were hanged for witchcraft. But a re-action set in; so that, although in 1693 three condemnations took place, there was no execution. Mr. Parris, the chief prosecutor, was dismissed by his church in 1696, although he confessed that he had done wrong. (For history of this event see Lit. below.) The English laws against witchcraft were repealed in 1736. The last witch was officially tried and executed in Prussia, 1796. In 1881 a peasant community in the interior of Russia tried and burnt a witch.]

WITHER, George, b. at Brentworth, Hampshire, June 11, 1588; d. in London, May 2, 1667; studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, 1604-07, went to London, 1608, and read law at Lincoln's Inn; was imprisoned 1613 for his Abuses Sive Scripta, and Whipt; plunged into the controversies of the time; entered the military service of Charles I., 1639, and that of the Parliament, 1642; was made major-general for Surrey by Cromwell; was enriched under the Protectorate, but impoverished, and imprisoned for three years, at the Restoration. He wrote Shepherds Hunting and sundry other poems, but is now chiefly remembered and honored by his Hymns and Odes of the Church (1623), which bore the patent or privilege of James I., and Hallelujah, or Britain's Second Remembrancer (1641), a much larger and more interesting work. Neglected at the time, and depised by succeeding generations, these have been rescued from obscurity by comparatively recent compilers and editors, and shown to possess real power as well as interest. See Mr. Parker's reprint of them. London, 1836-57.

WITHERSPOON, John, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian divine, and signer of the Declaration of Independence; b. in the parish of Yester, Haddingtonshire, near Edinburgh, Scotland, Feb. 5, 1722; d. near Princeton, N. J., Nov. 15, 1794. He was graduated from the University of Edinburgh, licensed in the Church of Scotland, 1743, and settled at Smith (1744) and at Paoli (1747), whence he was called to the presidency of the College of New Jersey, 1768. In his new position he was eminently useful. He introduced a number of improvements, particularly the lecture-system, previously unknown in American colleges (lecturing himself upon rhetoric, moral philosophy, and divinity), the study of French and Hebrew, the latter of which he taught, philosophically in one, and religiously in the other, in order to establish the fact of a murder which no money of only one witness amounted to nothing: Jer. xxxii.10 sqq.). Bearing false witness is often mentioned with aversion in the Bible (1 Kings iv. 9 sqq.; 16; xxiv. 17). Witnesses were usually cited in civil cases, even when the matter was purely amicable (Ruth iv. 9 sqq.; Isa. viii. 2; Jer. xxxii. 10 sqq.). But amid the vast variety of witnesses which would bring the woman before the judges for trial by the waters of jealousy. In both these cases the otherwise inadmissible testimony of slaves, children, and women, was accepted. If any one, asked to testify in regard to a certain fact within his knowledge, denied under oath his knowledge of it, where his testimony would have possible weight, he was required to bring an offering according to his ability (Lev. xix. 15). Each witness must give his testimony by himself, in a language intelligible to the judge (for interpreters were forbidden), and limit himself to what he actually saw or heard. If, upon any considerable point, two witnesses contradict one another, the testimony of both is worthless. The witness must not have any bias, and therefore near relatives could not testify; nor must he belong to any of the criminal classes, such as robbers, thieves, and usurers; nor must he have any serious bodily defect, such as blindness or dumbness. In civil cases the testimony of otherwise incapable witnesses could be accepted if the party against whom the testimony was directed had no objection. The king, on account of his exalted rank, could not be cited as a witness; and the high priest was not bound to give evidence in any case, except one affecting the king. If, for any reason, a witness appeared suspicious to a judge, and yet he could not, on examination, find out any good grounds for his suspicion, he must give the case over to some other unprejudiced judge. Witnesses must testify without recompense: if paid, their testimony is inadmissible. Cf. SaaLSchütz: Mos. Rech., pp. 604 sqq.; O. Bähn: Das Gesetz über falsche Zeugen nach Bibel und Talmud, Berlin, 1882.

WITSIUS (WITS), Hermann, Dutch theologian of the Cocceian school; b. at Enkhuysen, Feb. 12, 1036; d. at Leyden, Oct. 22, 1708. He studied at the universities Groningen, Leyden, and Utrecht. In the latter university he applied himself to Hebrew, under Leusden's direction, so assiduously, that at the age of eighteen he delivered assiduously himself to Hebrew, under Leusden's direction, so assiduously, that at the age of eighteen he delivered a learned lecture in Hebrew upon Messianic Prophecy. From 1656 to 1661 he was pastor at Westboud; to 1660, at Wormeren; to 1668, at Goesen; to 1675, at Leeuwarden. In 1675 he was called to Franeker University, and in 1690 to Utrecht. In 1685 he visited England as chaplain of the Netherlands embassy. In 1698 he left Utrecht for Leyden, induced to leave his beloved city by the release from preaching which he would have in his new professorship; and there he died, after a retirement of eighteen months on account of sickness. Witsius' great work is De economia Faderum Dei cum hominibus, libri iv., Leeuwarden, 1685; 2d ed., Utrecht, 1093; later ed., Basel, 1739 (Eng. trans., The Economy of the Covenants between God and Man, London, 1783, 3 vols.; new trans., Edinburgh, 1771, 3 vols.; later ed., London, 1837, 3 vols.). It was an earnest effort to still the conflict between the orthodox and the federalists, but as usual pleased neither party, least of all the federalists (to whom he belonged), who accused him of having sinned against the Holy Ghost. As a matter of fact, the book is not strong.
WITTEMBERG. 2544  WODROW.

Witsius was a biblical theologian, and not equal to the role of scholastic: in consequence he did not really mediate between the parties, but simply presented the federal scheme, simplified and modified, to give less offence to the orthodox. His work contains many good ideas, but is marred by libellous, especially by sometimes trifling exegesis. It is also badly arranged. The doctrine of the person and work of Christ comes in the second book; that of election and the application of salvation in the third; while the fourth is occupied with a condensed account of the history of revelation and the doctrine of the sacraments. Throughout, the author reveals his profound piety. But on the whole the personality counts for more than the theology. [His other writings are of less interest than his Economy. His Miscellaneorum sacrorum libri appeared in Utrecht, 1692-1700, 2 vols.; new ed., Leyden, 1736, 2 vols. Three of these essays have been translated,—Concililatory Animadversions on the Controversies agitated in Britain under the Names of Antinomians and Neonomians, Glasgow, 1807; Sacred Dissertations on the Lord's Prayer, Edinburgh, 1823, 2 vols.; Sacred Dissertations on the Lord's Prayer, 1839. See Darling, s.v. For his life, see memoirs in the English translation of the Economy.] EBEEA. WITTEMBERG, The Concord of, signed May 29, 1536, denotes one of the most interesting, as also one of the most important, stages in that long series of negotiations which, during the first period of the Reformation, was carried on in order to bring about an agreement between the Swiss and the Saxon Reformers. Politically, landgrave Philip of Hesse was the motive power of those negotiations; theologically, Butzer, and the personal meeting which the former brought about in 1534 between the latter and Melanchthon at Cassel, formed the introduction to the larger assembly at Wittenberg one year and a half later. The hard words which Luther let drop in his letter to Albrecht of Brandenburg, immediately after the death of Zwingli, showed the aversion he nourished to him; and it was well known how anxiously he watched that no one who inclined to the Swiss doctrine of the Lord's Supper should be allowed to keep up community with the Saxon camp. With Melanchthon, however, a change had taken place. He learned from Alpsamadius that many of those passages from the Fathers which he had quoted in his Sententiae selectarum aliquot Scriptorum de Cena Domini, were mere interpolations; and, under the influence of Butzer's expositions, he gradually lost all interest in Luther's peculiar conception of the Lord's Supper, and became more and more anxious for the elimination of all elements of discord between the two evangelical churches. The Swiss had also become less resolute to hold to a concord. Butzer had succeeded in gaining over the side of reconciliation Myconius in Basel, Bullinger in Zurich, his colleague Capito, etc.; and in the summer of 1534 an attempt at practical union was made, and proved successful, in Wurttemberg. Under such circumstances, Butzer and Melanchthon met at Cassel, in December, 1534; and, in spite of the very stringent instructions which Luther had given Melanchthon, they succeeded in drawing up a formula of concord which satisfied Luther. He sent it to Urbanus Rhegius, Brenz, Amsdorff, Agricola, etc.; and in October, 1536, he wrote to Strassburg, Augsburg, Ulm, Esslingen, to Gerard Seiler, Huberinus, etc., inviting them to a general discussion of it. Eisenach was decided upon as the place of rendezvous. In April Butzer left Constance, accompanied by nine preachers. As they progressed, they were joined by Capito, Musculus, and many others. Meanwhile Luther had fallen sick, and requested the visitors to come as far as Grimma: they determined to go directly to Wittenberg. May 22, at seven o'clock in the morning, they met in Luther's study, but not under the best auspices, as it would seem. Luther was suffering, irritable, harsh: Butzer became confounded. The subject of the debate was the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Luther demanded that the Swiss should make a formal recantation of what they had hitherto believed and taught, and their refusal made him excited. The next day, however, every thing was changed. Butzer was clear and adroit: Luther was mild and kind. After some debate, the Saxon theologians, Edinger, Philip, 1529, 2 vols.; Sacred Dissertations on the Lord's Prayer, 1839. See Darling, s.v. one of the publications of the Maitland Club, — Wodrow's correspondence shows the high estimation in which he was held by many of the most distinguished men of his day. It likewise furnishes abundant proof of the extraordinary activity of his mind, of the interest which he took in every subject connected with general literature, and of the zeal and fidelity with which he devoted himself to the discharge of the more immediate duties of his sacred profession.

As a historian, he was, if not free from prejudice and credulity, trustworthy, upon the whole.

Charles James Fox, in his History of James II., refers to Wodrow as a writer "whose veracity is above suspicion;" and speaking especially of the troubles in Scotland, after the restoration of Charles II., and during the reign of James II., says that "no historical facts are better ascertained than the accounts . . . to be found in Wodrow." His writings, most of them unpublished, are very numerous, and have earned for him the name of "the indefatigable Wodrow."
The larger portion of his manuscripts are deposited in the library of the Faculty of Advocates in Edinburgh. The anonymous biographical, form part of the manuscript collections of the library of the University of Glasgow.
Wodrow's most important published works are his History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland, from the Restoration to the Revolution (4 vols., Glasgow, 1829), his Analecta (printed for the Maitland Club, 1843, in 4 vols.), and his Collection upon the Lives of the Reformers and most Eminent Ministers of the Church of Scotland (Glas-

WOLFF, Johann Christoph, eminent Lutheran bibliographer of Judaism; b. at Wernigerode, Germany, Feb. 21, 1083; d. at Hamburg, July 25, 1739. He was made doctor of theology at Wit-ttenberg, 1701; in 1712 professor of Oriental languages at the Hamburg gymnasium; in 1716 pastor of St. Catharine's. His great work is Bibliotheca hebraea (Hamburg: 1715-33, 4 vols.), second volume is the bibliography proper; the

WOLFENBÜTTEL FRAGMENTS is the name of a work written from the deistic point of view, to contest the truth of the gospel history, of which Lessing began to publish fragments in 1771. An early in 1771, during a visit to Berlin, he tried to find a publisher for the work, in spite of the advice of Nicolai and Mendelssohn to the contrary; but, as the royal censor (though he promised not to interfere with the publication) refused to authorize it, he gave up the plan for the time. In 1773, however, he began to issue a kind of periodical publication, Zur Geschichte und Literatur, aus den Schätzen der herzoglichen Bibliothek zu Wolfenbüttel, which was exempted from the control of the ducal censor; and in the third number of that publication appeared in 1774 the first instalment of the work, Von Dul dung der Deistten, Fragment eines Ungenannten, accompanied with a few cautious remarks by the editor, but very adroitly introduced by the preceding article. The fragment attracted no particular attention; but when, in 1777, the whole fourth number was occupied by "fragments," of which some, Durchgang der Israeliten durch das rothe Meer, Über die Auferstehungsgeschichte, etc., were of a rather pronounced character, quite a sensation was produced; and Lessing did not fail to deepen the impression by publishing in 1778, in the form of an independent book, a new fragment,—Von dem Zweecke Jesu und seiner Jünger.
He immediately lost his privilege of publishing any thing without the permit of the censor, and a violent controversy with the orthodox party began (see the article on GOEZ). After the death of Lessing, the seven fragments which he had published appeared in Berlin, 1784, in a collected ed-tion, which was several times reprinted, the last time in 1835. Some more fragments which Lessing had had in his possession, but not published, appeared in Berlin, 1787, edited by C. A. E.
Schmidt, a pseudo-nonym. The anonymous autorship was afterwards established beyond any doubt by the declaration of the son of Reimarus, published in the Leipzig Litteratur Zeitschrift, 1827, No. 55, and by numerous passages in the correspondence of Lessing and the son and daughter of Reimarus.

CARL BRITZKAU.

WOLFF, Bernard C., D.D., German Reformed theologian; b. at Martinsburg, Va., Dec. 11, 1794; d. at Lancaster, Penn., Nov. 1, 1870. He was graduated from the theological seminary at York, Penn., 1832; was associate (English) pastor in Easton, Penn., 1832-44; pastor in Baltimore, Md., 1844-54; professor of didactic and practical theology in the theological seminary at Mercersburg, 1854-64, when he resigned, and removed to Lancaster, Penn. He was a pure man, a model pastor, and a wise counselor. He played a prominent part in the development of the Mercersburg Theology (which art. see). "He was," says the late Dr. J. T. Berg, his friend and opponent in the Mercersburg controversy, "a man of rare tact, of winning manners, and great kindness of heart; and few men exerted a more marked influence on the policy of the German Reformed Church than himself, before years and growing infirmities had weakened his strength."

WOLFF, Christian, b. at Breslau, Jan. 26, 1754; d. at Halle, Aug. 9, 1754. He studied theology and mathematics at Jena, and was appointed professor at Halle, the chief seat of pietism, in 1708. He lectured on metaphysics, logic, and ethics; and his lectures attracted most extraordinary attention. Not only the audiences of the theological professors failed to grow thinner, but the students took the liberty to speak slightly of their unscientific method. In 1719 appeared Wolff's great theological work, Vernünftige Gedanken von Gott, der Welt, und der Seele. In 1720 his ethics, Vernünftige Gedanken von der Menschen Thun und Lassen, in 1721, his politics, Vernünftige Gedanken von dem gesellschaftlichen Leben der Menschen. The pietists now became thoroughly alarmed. The faculty at first thought the superficial was upon them. Franck prayed; Lange harangued; finally the faculty made a formal complaint of Wolff to the king, stating, that, among other vicious doctrines, he also taught a kind of modern fatalism under the name of pre-established harmony. "What does that mean?" asked the king in his tobacco-congress. "It means," explained the court-fool, Paul Gundling, "that, if you believe in God, and maintain, as he does, that all things which subsist, take their beings from God, then you might as well ascribe the running away of a piece of the pre-established harmony." By a cabinet deeree of Nov. 8, 1723, Wolff was ordered to leave the Prussian dominion within forty-eight hours, under penalty of the gibbet; by another, the Prussian people were forbidden to read his books, under a penalty of a hundred ducats for each transgression. In the same year, however, Wolff was appointed professor at Marburg, and his fame rose rapidly. Acquaintance with his philosophy became an indispensable element of intellectual culture: dictionaries were gotten up to familiarize the public with the technical terms of his system. His method and principles were applied, not only to philosophy and theology, but also to aesthetics, jurisprudence, grammar, etc. His style was introduced in the translation of the Bible, the so-called Wertheim Bible, 1735-37; and before 1739 no less than a hundred and seven German writers of more or less note had declared in his favor, and were working in the same line. Under such circumstances we cannot wonder that it was one of the first acts of Friedrich II., after his accession to the throne, to recall Wolff; and Dec. 8, 1740, he made his triumphal entry into the city, preceded by trumpet-blasts and a procession of students on horseback, received at the gates by the town-council, waited on by the whole body of professors, etc. The university elected him its perpetual rector, the king made him a baron, etc.

Though a philosopher rather than a theologian, it is Wolff who has given to the rationalistic school in theology its most essential principle and a number of its watch-words. The Cartesian dualism between the res cogitans and the res extensa was happily overcome by Spinoza; but the pantheism of Spinoza, in which the two substances of Cartesius were reduced into mere attributes of the one single substance, had no room for true individuality. Spinoza knew only accidental and transitory modifications of the substance; and it was Leibnitz, who, by splitting up the one compact substance of Spinoza into a harmonious world of monads, made possible a satisfactory explanation of the phenomenon of individuality. But Leibnitz was somewhat desultory and unsystematic, and the flights of his mind were too high for the general public. In Wolff, however, he found a perfect exponent of his ideas; for in him he is a systematizer only, not a creative genius. He drew his materia from Leibnitz, and his method he derived from mathematics. To make philosophical truth, by means of its peculiar exposition, as binding to reason as mathematical truth, was the great object of his life; and the toil he bestowed on that task — often ridiculous on account of its pedantry when applied to futile trivialities, often amazing on account of its erudition, its insights of things of great moment — was rewarded with complete success: even Kant considered him the greatest among dogmatic philosophers. Of course, he could not forbear to try his method also on theology; and though the attempt at first encountered much opposition, it finally came out victorious. To give a mathematical demonstration of the mysteries of Christianity — the miracles, the Holy Trinity, etc. — was the problem. But why should such a problem be considered unsolvable? A divine revelation could not possibly contain any thing which was against the principium contradictionis, or the principium rationis sufficientis, and how could a more effective barrier be raised against the influx of English deism and French atheism than by fortifying the Christian doctrines themselves, according to the latest and most approved logic? By many of Wolff's followers the application of his method to theology was, no doubt, considered an excellent safeguard against the irreligious agencies of the time; and the danger was wholly overlooked, that reason, when once admitted into the field, might some day undertake to clear it of any thing for which no "sufficient reason" could be found. People were to work with great enthusiasm and perfect confidence. None of the Christian doctrines caused any anxiety: one by one they were taken forth from the armory, treated with the new polish, and exhibited to admiring spectators on the new pedestals.

Natural theology was the department most zealously cultivated by Wolff's disciples. Tired of pondering the symbolic books, and hunting up heretical and dangerous tenets, the ministers threw themselves upon nature, and began to study the Creator in the creation. The pupil and the lecture-room resounded with devotional meditations on rain and storm, mountains and rocks, snails and mice; and a ichthyos-, testaco-, insecto-, a litho-, hydro-, pyro-theology arose. But as high as natural religion rose, as low sunk revealed religion. Some of the most prominent among Wolff's theological disciples were: Jacob Carpov (d. 1768), who recognized reason as the judge only of the falsitas mysteriorum, but not of their veritas; Joachim Georg Darjes (d. 1791), who demonstrated that the doctrine of the Holy Trinity contained no mystery, but only a psychological problem; Johann Peter Reusch (d. 1758), who proved that revealed religion was necessary to human happiness, and that, of all religions, that of Christianity was the only sufficient one; Israel Gottlieb Canz (d. 1758), who made the suggestive remark, that natural religion stood in the same relation to revealed religion as well-water dug up from the ground, cool and...

by means of philosophy, to rain-water fall warm down from the sky, and gathered dirty eiserns; Johann Gustav Reinebeck (1741), whose Betrachtungen über die in der rysischen Confession enthaltenen göttlichen witen, 9 vols., were bought, at the expense royal treasury, for every church in Prussia; and Samuel Reimarus, the author of the abübelt Fragmente, etc. All these men were and alarms. He has left recitals so meagre, marvelously elegant; Friedrich Stapfer (d. 1775), who gave dramatic demonstration of the doctrine of the 'vinity, and protested that there was no esdivergence between Lutheranism and Cal-Daniel Wyettenbach (d. 1779), who used thematical method, not only against script-but also against the doctrine of predesion. Jacob Christoph Beck (d. 1785), who really gave natural religion the precedence asked religion, etc.

which he married. His autobiography

Cambridge, 1681; entered into orders, and from 1681 to 1688 taught school. In the latter year he fell heir to a large estate, moved to London, and passed the rest of his days in learned leisure.
He was the author of a famous work, The Religion of Nature Demonstrated, London, privately printed 1722, anonymously published 1724, 4th ed. 1739. His fundamental principle was, that every action is good which expresses in act a true proposition. He maintained that truth is the supreme good, and the source of all pure morality. In the 6th ed. (1738), and subsequently, will be found a general account of his life and writings by Dean Clarke. In the 7th ed. (1750), for the first time is the author's name given.

WOLSEY, Thomas, English prelate and states-
b. in Ipswich, 1471; d. in Leicester, Nov.
29, 1530. He was graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, of which he was elected fellow, and where he met Erasmus; entered holy orders, and was successively rector of Lymington, Somersetshire, 1606; chaplain of Henry VII., 1505; rector of Redgrave, 1508; and rector of of Maximilian, 1507; dean of Lincoln, 1508; almoner of Henry VIII., 1509; rector of Torrinton, canon of Windsor, and registrar of the Garter, 1510; prebendary, 1511; and, 1512, dean of York, abbot of St. Albans, dean of Hereford, preceptor of St. Paul's, London; bishop of Tourmay, 1519; bishop of Lincoln, 1514; eight months afterwards archbishop of York, 1514; cardinal on the nomi-ration of Leo X., and lord-chancellor on the nomination of Henry VIII., 1515; legatus a la-tere, 1516; bishop of Bath, 1518; ambassador to Charles V., 1521; bishop of Durham, 1523; ambassador to Francis I., 1527; bishop of Winchester, 1526. In his day of glory he lived in great splendor, having as many as five hundred persons in his train, among them nine or ten lords, fifteen knights, and forty squires. [But in 1529 he was accused of having transgressed, while legate, the statute praemunire, which forbadethe introduction of papal influence into England. He pleaded guilty, resigned his chancellorship, and transferred all his property to the king. He tired to Esher, in the bishopric of Winchester.
The king allowed him to retain his archbishopric, gave him a general pardon, and an annuity of a thousand marks. On Nov. 4, 1530, he was arrested on a charge of high treason, and died in the monastery of Leicester while on his way to London in order to answer the charge. He is reported to have said during his fatal sickness. "If I had served God as diligently as I have done the king, he would not have given me over in my gray hairs. But this is the just reward that I must receive for my diligent pains and studies that I have had to do him service, not regarding my service to God, but only to satisfy his pleasure." Woltersdorff is one of the most unjudged characters in history. The key to his conduct is his unique position upon the border between the middle and the modern age. He was essentially a medievaclist: yet he felt the pulses of the new day, although he did not welcome it; indeed, he would fain have turned it back. He was very proud and ambitious, skilful in diplomacy, a friend and patron of learning, as is attested by his endowment of Christ College, Oxford. He was a theologian of the scholastic pattern, a student of Aquinas, and at the same time a jurist of ability. His idea of church reformation extended no farther than external matters of discipline; but even these he was in no condition to carry out, being, unhappily, guilty of too many breaches of the moral and statute law.

1. Pagan Nations. In the great ancient monarchies of the Orient the condition of woman was a debased one. She was the servant of man, not his equal. Polygamy prevailed, and divorce was easy. The penal code of Ashur brings out the inferiority of woman in its statement of the rule of divorce: "If a husband say unto his wife, 'Thou art not my wife,' he shall pay half a mina, and be free. But, if a woman repudiate her husband, she shall be drowned in the river." (George Smith: Assyrian Discoveries.) In Europe, among the Greeks and the Romans, woman was held in higher estimation. Homer called her a sacred woman. He was a theologian of the scholastic pattern, a student of Aquinas, and at the same time a jurist of ability. His idea of church reformation extended no farther than external matters of discipline; but even these he was in no condition to carry out, being, unhappily, guilty of too many breaches of the moral and statute law.

This article will give a brief statement of the status assigned to her among Pagan nations and Mohammedans, in the Old Testament and under the Christian system.

1. Pagan Nations. In the great ancient monarchies of the Orient the condition of woman was a debased one. She was the servant of man, not his equal. Polygamy prevailed, and divorce was easy. The penal code of Ashur brings out the inferiority of woman in its statement of the rule of divorce: "If a husband say unto his wife, 'Thou art not my wife,' he shall pay half a mina, and be free. But, if a woman repudiate her husband, she shall be drowned in the river." (George Smith: Assyrian Discoveries.) In Europe, among the Greeks and the Romans, woman was held in higher estimation. Homer called her a sacred woman.

Paganism is no better than Paganism in its treatment of woman, practises polygamy, treats woman as an inferior creature, and erects the harem. Mohammedanism is no better than Paganism in its treatment of woman, practises polygamy, treats woman as an inferior creature, and erects the harem.
They were among the early converts of the apostles' preaching (v. 14), received baptism (viii. 12), and were steadfast under persecution (viii. 3). Paul's first convert in Europe was a woman; and her name (Lydia) is given, while that of the jailer of Philippus is withheld (xvi.). She is a model of womanly reserve and hospitalty (xvi. 15, 40). Dorcas is a representative of woman's work of charity among the sick and poor (ix. 38–39); and Priscilla, who expounded the way of God more perfectly to Apollos (xvii. 26), is a representative of another kind of labor, recognized in the New Testament as proper to woman,—that of instruction, at least in private; for Paul seems to refuse to woman the right of speaking in the public meetings of the congregation (1 Cor. xiv. 34 sq.; 1 Tim. ii. 9 sqq.). Paul distinctly refers in Rom. xvi. to Phoebe, Persis, and other women as efficient fellow-helper in the spread of the gospel. The annals of the first several centuries include the names of women (Blandina, Perpetua, etc.) among the Christian martyrs, and depict their history and influence ( Monica, Paula, etc.).

Pagan society was startled at the freedom with which Christian women went about on errands of charity. "What heathen will suffer his wife to go about from one street to another, to the houses of strangers, to the meanest hovels in the neighborhood, to perform works of mercy among the sick and poor (ix. 36–40), and were steadfast under persecution (viii. 3). Our Lord, in his conversations ever recorded (John iv.), allowed mothers to bring their children to him, performed works of mercy upon them (Matt. xv. 21–28, etc.), and pronounced upon the act of one woman the fard for the rights of woman (Deut. xxi. 11–14).

In the New Testament it is granted to woman an equal right with man to its sacredness of the marriage-tie. The influence of the New Testament is back to the institution of monogamic marriage in the state of concubinage witness to the Hebrew regard for the rights of woman (Deut. xxi. 11–14). Divorce was regulated, and the only ground upon which it is granted is indicated in Deut. xxiv. 1. Marriage evidently came to be regarded as a sacred relation, as is evident from the fact that some of the prophets depict God as occupying the marriage-relation to the theocratic people, as well as from single passages (e.g. Mal. ii. 16). The esteem of the Hebrew people for women is further shown in the important part accorded to some of them in their history, and the prominence with which they are mentioned in the patriarchal and Mosaic periods. Sarah's history is not only given at some length, but at her death Abraham, so it is reported, "came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her" (Gen. xxiii. 2). The account of the marriage of Isaac and Rebekah still affords language suitable to the marriage-service. Miriam, Deborah, Hannah, Huldah, and others, are illustrations of the freedom which was accorded to women, and the esteem in which they were held. The picture which is given by the Bible of a faithful housewife was only possible where the ideal of womanhood was a high one. There seems to have been comparative freedom of intercourse between the sexes in the early periods of Jewish history (comp. the account of the women meeting Saul and David after victory, 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7, etc.); but in the later periods it was restricted (2 Mace. iii. 19; 3 Mace. i. 18 sqq.). The apocryphal Book of Ecclesiasticus implies a waning esteem for woman in such statements as "the badness of men is better than the goodness of women."

In the New Testament.—It has been under Christianity alone that woman has been able to occupy the position assigned to her at the creation, of social equality with man. Our Lord, in his great discourse on the sacredness of the marriage-tie, referred the petitioners to the institution of monogamic marriage in Genesis. The spirit of the New Testament is unfavorable to woman's degradation or inferiority, as it is to the cruelties of slavery. The gospel is impartial. To the marriage-service. The Lord found some of his intimate friends among women (Mary, Martha, etc.), gave them in their ministry the chain of the martyr (Tertullian.) Councils like that of Arles, 314 A.D., emphasized the sacredness of the marriage-tie.

The influence of Christianity in producing the conception of the dignity of womanhood in the human mind is attested at a later period by the Madonnas of art and the false honor put upon Mary in the Roman Catholic system. The Christian revival of the institution of polygamy is a return (under the cover of the practices of some Old-Testament characters) to Paganism.

WOODS, Leonard, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Princeton, Mass., June 19, 1774; d. at Andover, Aug. 24, 1854. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1790, and from 1798 to 1808 was pastor of the church in Newbury, Mass.; and on the formation of Andover Seminary he became professor of theology, and held this position until his retirement in 1840. After which he devoted himself to a history of Andover Seminary, which was published 1884, and to preparing his lectures for the press. He was one of the founders of the American Tract Society, the American Education Society, American Temperance Society, American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (of whose presidental committee he was a member for twenty-five years). He was a champion of the liberal Calvinism against which the assaults of D. Ware, Buckminster, and Channing. Dr. H. B. WORCESTER, Samuel, D.D., b. in Hollis, N.H., Nov. 1, 1770; d. at Brainerd, a mission station in East Tennessee, June 7, 1821, in the fifty-first year of his age. Several of his ancestors were eminent for their piety; two of them were clergymen. Three of his brothers also were clergymen; one of them was the celebrated Noah Worcester, D.D. Dr. Samuel was graduated at Dartmouth College in the year 1795. He pursued his theological studies mainly with his lifelong friend, Rev. Samuel Austin, D.D., a noted Hopkinsian divine, then pastor at Worcester. Mass., afterwards president of the Vermont University. He was ordained at Fitchburg, Mass., Sept. 27, 1797. Here his sermons bore the impress of high and lofty principles. They were pungent in their appeals to the conscience, were delivered with great solemnity, and at length excited an opposition of uncommon violence. He was dismissed Sept. 8, 1802, after a ministry of four years and eleven months. On the 20th of April, 1803, he was installed pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Salem, Mass. Here he was honored as a man of clear mind, positive convictions, firmness of will, steadfastness of Christian principle. In 1804 he received and declined an appointment to the professorship of theology at Dartmouth College. In 1810 he was elected the first corresponding secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The severe labors of this secretariaty combined with his pastorate shattered his health. In July, 1819, he received the aid of a colleague pastor. Rev. Elias Conklin. In January, 1821, the state of his health compelled him to seek a southern climate, and he made a visit to the missionary stations among the Cherokee and Choctaw Indians. In a mission family among the Choctaws he died. The eulogies written or spoken in regard to him by Jeremiah Evarts, Esq., Dr. Leonard Woods, and Dr. Elias Corneliae were admirable specimens of biography. In 1852 his Memoir was published in two duodecimo volumes, by his son, Rev. Samuel M. Worcester, D.D.

Dr. Worcester was distinguished by the vast amount of labor which he performed in connection with the foreign missionary enterprise. Either he or Dr. Samuel Spring, or both together, originated the idea of forming the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The detailed plan of the board was doubtless formed conjointly, and for writing in defense of it he called together Charles's claims to be the author of Eikon Basilike.

WORKS, GOOD. The sharp distinction which Paul made between law and gospel, between justification by faith and justification by good works, naturally lost its prominence in Christian teaching with the overthrow of Paganism. From her own experience, and that a dearly-paid-for experience, and that a dearly-paid-for experience ton, the ancient church had gained the conviction that nothing but faith is able to keep man in true communion with Christ, and that a faith which does so necessarily must produce a thorough regeneration of practical life. The relation, however, between faith and good works, and between them and salvation, had not yet been made the subject of critical reflection; and was theologically so loosely fixed, that the older Fathers could content themselves with placing the mechanical observance of the technical ordinances, rites, and penances, was mistaken for an action of mere ecclesiastical ordinances, rites, and penances, was mistaken for a true moral worth. At last faith itself became, in the form of obedience to the church, a meritorious and obligatory work. But a faith, which, according to the definition of the schoolmen, simply consisted in assent to the dogmas of the church (fides caritate formata) could not be vindicated as the sole sufficient power of salvation. On the contrary, it became necessary to define the faith which proves itself in works (fides caritate formata) as the true condition of salvation; and the distinction which was made between praecipit et consilium evangelicum finally brought forth the delusion of a surplus of good works, — opera supererogationis.

The doctrine of the Roman-Catholic Church, concerning the insufficiency of faith to salvation, and the necessity of good works, was the point at which the Reformers aimed their arrows; and they hit. The strength of the truth, the clear words of Scripture, and the irrefragable testimony of thousands of people, — to whom their faith was their sole hope, but also their sure confidence, — finally gained the victory; and the words of Paul, "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law," became the banner around which the evangelical churches rallied their forces. Afterwards Leibnitz and after him several recent theologians have characterized the controversy between the Roman-Catholic and the evangelical churches, concerning the relation between faith and works, as a mere play of words. But that is certainly a mistake. It is true that both parties agree in the necessity of good works; and the meaningless exaggeration of the principle of the Reformation which appeared in the Majoristic controversy, that good works are detrimental to salvation, found its due rebuke in the Formula Concordiae. But they differ widely in their conceptions of justification and good works. As above mentioned, the Roman-Catholic theology transforms the practical realization of inner, ethical ideal into a mere submission to the ordinances of the church; and it is led to do so by confounding justification and sanctification, between which Protestant theology makes a definite distinction. In Protestant theology, justification means the forgiveness of sin by the grace of God for the sake of Christ; but in Roman-Catholic theology it means something more, — a justitia in Deo et in Christo et per Christi sacris sacramentis et praestitutis.
human activity, the idea which man forms of it exercises a powerful influence on all his fundamental religious ideas,—those of God and man, of revelation and salvation, etc. We give below a few remarks illustrative of this idea as it occurs in the Bible.

The Old Testament has no particular word corresponding to our universe. When the Hebrews wanted to express that idea, they used the phrase "heaven and earth." Then again they considered from a double point of view,—as connected with the earth, and forming part of a grand totality, and as the abode of God in contradiction to the earth as the abode of man. Considered from the first point of view, heaven appears to be very closely connected with the earth. It is, indeed, a geogony, and not a cosmogony, which is given in the first chapter of Genesis; and every thing which is said of the firmament serves simply to image forth and explain its immediate appari tion. It must be firmly secured on pillars in order not to fall down (Job xxvi. 11; 2 Sam. xx. 8); gates lead into it (Gen. xxvii. 17); the stars are fixed (Isa. lxvii. 18); man with uplifted hands and lightning break through it (Job xxxviii. 24 sqq.). From this view of heaven to that as the abode of God, the transition is made through the observation that the great stars rule the earth (Gen. i. 16). The recognition of fixed seasons, of an established order, etc., shows that the Hebrews had a feeling of the existence of natural laws; but neither they nor any other Semites ever firmly grasped that idea. Natural laws are to them the "ordinances of heaven" (Job xxxviii. 33; Ps. civ. 19); and the ordinances of heaven shall forever be a secret to man, because the exact knowledge of them is a privilege of the Divine Wisdom. Between the action of the forces of nature and the highest Cause the Hebrews established a direct connection, in which the heavenly bodies played only a subordinate part as mediators, and this connection prevented them from developing a natural science, in the strict sense of the word. They never reached the Greek idea of a κόσμος,—a world with an inherent, informing order, which man can learn to know, though only gradually and approximately. On the other hand, they escaped the idea of a fate which might prove a barrier even to the will of God; and they were never entangled in that dread intellectual conflict between the order of nature and Divine Providence, which, from the ancient philosophy, crept into modern thought, and found expression in the desir of the last and the pantheism of the present century.

In accordance with its immediate appearance, the Hebrews generally describe the earth as a circle (Isa. xi. 22; Job xxii. 14) resting on the mighty floods of the ocean (Ps. xxiv. 2, lxv. 3). Often, however, they also speak of the four corners, or ends, or wings, of the earth, taking the image from a square mantle (Isa. xi. 13; Job xxxviii. 13). In determining the four sides of the earth, they, like the Greeks, and, indeed, like most other people, began by facing east, and placing north to the left, south to the right. Towards the north was the sombre region: the highest mountains are there, especially the holy mountain, the mount of the congregations (Isa. xiv. 13); the cherub, indicating the divine presence, stood there (Ezek. xxviii. 14). As a rule Jehovah came from the north (Ps. xlviii. 3; Ezek. i. 4); and there were the beginnings of the human race, the first time at Eden, the second time at Ararat. Below the earth was Sheol, the abode of the dead (see art. HADES). This must not be understood, however, as if in the above passages, and in others of similar import, the sacred writers ever proposed to give irrefragable evidence that this whole group of ideas were never treated as articles of faith. They can even not be considered as fixed popular opinions. They were simply poetical objects, with which the imagination was at liberty to play, in order to produce a more striking and impressive representation of the grandeur, wisdom, and goodness of God. To the Hebrew, man was only being on earth of absolute interest: the dead and dumb sphere lay far below him, and was simply his domination (Gen. i. 26). To the Hebrew, the human world was the real world; and the unity of that world, that is, the unity of the human race and of its relation to God, the Creator and the Judge, was an idea which arose with the religion of Jehovah, culminating in the great prophet, and never died completely out, though it was reduced into a mere caricature of itself by the particularism and pride of the Pharisees. See, concerning the Old Testament view of the world in general, C. von Weizsäcker: Kenau, 1824; H. König: Die Theologie der Psalmen, 1857.

In the New Testament the idea of the world as the human world received a powerful development by being placed in opposition to the idea of a divine world,—the kingdom of heaven. It then came to mean the history of the human race, so far as that history lies outside of the influence of Christ, and grows as the mere product of the forces and spirit of nature. Darkness, that is, blindness, is the chief characteristic of the world in this sense of the word; for by its own strength the world is utterly unable to grasp the truth, and see God (John iii. 27, 31; xvii. 25). But by itself the darkness is not sin or guilt; for it is simply the inherent nature of the world, and not an effect of the fall of the human race and of original sin. It becomes sin, however, and leads to guilt, when it rises into a denial of the light; and, just as the mere love of light develops the faculty of acquiring it, so the hatred of light destroys that very faculty, etc. A comparison between the various ideas of the world which have been developed in the course of Christian civilization, and the typical idea as it is contained in the New Testament, would be a most instructive task, but is beyond the compass of this article. One of the principal points of such an investigation would be the idea of Augustine. It exercised great influence on the Reformers, more especially on those of the Calvinist type; and the preponderance of this influence explains why, during the whole course of its history, Calvinism has preferred to form congregations in the midst of the world, instead of attempting com of their baptism and the purity of their doctrine made out of the world something vague to the eyes of the Lutherans,—something entirely outside of the pale of their own church. It was Spener and the Pietists who first, by applying regeneration and sanctification as the true tests of any realization of Christianity in individual life, made the idea of the world of practical importance also in the Lutheran Church. WORMS, one of the oldest towns of Germany, situated on the Rhine, with about fifteen thousand inhabitants; played on four different occasions a very prominent part in the history of the Reformation, as once previously in the religious history of Germany.

1. The first of these occasions was on Sept. 23, 1122, when the terms of the Concordat were read before a vast multitude assembled in a meadow near the city. This Concordat ended the contest between emperor and pope, which had been going on for fifty years. According to it, the emperor, on his part, gave up all investiture by ring and staff; allowed free election and consecration to all churches, according to ecclesiastical law. The pope, on his part, conceded that the election of German bishops and abbots should take place in the presence of the emperor, but without simony or violence; that, in case an election was disputed, the emperor, on the advice of the archbishop and bishops, should take the side of the party favored by the pope. The pope then should preserve the temporalities of his see by the imperial sceptre, and obliged himself to perform the accompanying duties. In other parts of the empire, the bishop, six months after consecration, should take place in the presence of the emperor, but without simony or violence; that, in case an election was disputed, the emperor, on the advice of the archbishop and bishops, should take the side of the party favored by the pope. The pope then should preserve the temporalities of his see by the imperial sceptre, and obliged himself to perform the accompanying duties. In other parts of the empire, the bishop, six months after consecration, should receive his temporalities in like manner, on the same conditions, but without any payment. The Concordat was ratified by the first Lateran Council, March, 1123. For a further account of it, see Hase: Kirchengeschichte, 10th ed., Leipzig, 1877, pp. 224-225; Robertson: History Ch. Church, London, 1856, pp. 693-697; H. Witte: Forschungen zur Geschichte d. Wormser Concordats, Göttingen, 1877; E. Bernheim: Zur Geschichte d. Wormser Concordats, Göttingen, 1878.

2. The Diet of Worms, 1521, before which Luther was summoned to appear, closed the first period of the Reformation, by showing to the world that the movement started by Luther was something greater, and likely to take quite another turn, than that started by Hus. Luther arrived Tuesday, April 16, in the forenoon, and was lodged in the house of the Knights of St. John. Great excitement prevailed in the city: thousands of people thronged the streets through which he passed. The next day (Wednesday, April 17), at six o'clock in the afternoon, he appeared before the diet, assembled in the episcopal palace, where the emperor and King Ferdinand staid. Johann Eck, a brother of the disputant of Leipzig fame, and official to the Bishop of Worms, addressed him in the name of the emperor, and demanded that he should recant. Luther answered by asking time to consider, and a respite of twenty-four hours was granted him. The impression he made was not favorable. The archbishop declared that he had written books; and, with a fying at the uncourteous manners of the monk, he added, "He shall never make me a heretic." Thursday, April 18, at six o'clock in the afternoon, he again appeared before the diet; and, the demand of recantation having been repeated, he answered with a Latin speech, which has been preserved in his own draught. It is short, and clothed throughout in respectful terms; but every sentence is stamped with that decision which characterizes the action of natural forces, and which, when met with in human life, almost inspires with horror. And it was well delivered: in every corner of the hall it was heard that not one word would be retracted. A short dispute followed between Luther and Eck, ending with the famous words by Luther, "Here I stand. I can do no otherwise. So help me God! Amen!" The emperor left in a rage. It had become quite dark in the hall; and the Spaniards filled the room with their hisses and yells, while outside in the streets the crowd growled and threatened. When Luther passed by the seat of Duke Eric of Brunswick, an inveterate Romanist, the duke saw that the man was exhausted almost to fainting, and handed him his big silver mug with Ermische beer. When he came home to his lodgings, he threw up his arms, and cried out with joy, "Now I am through." Some further negotiations with a committee took place, though without any result.

April 28, Luther left Worms. See J. Köstlin: Martin Luther, Elberfeld, 1875. On June 25, 1808, a colossal monument of Luther, with figures of the principal Reformers and of the cities of Wurz, Magdeburg, and Augsburg, was unveiled in Worms.

3. 4. Later on, two colloquies took place in Worms, between Protestant and Roman-Catholic theologians, for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation between the two parties without having recourse to armed force. The first, January, 1541, was presided over by Cardinal Granvella. The Protestant side were present Melanthon, Calvin, Crusiger, Grynaeus, Menius, etc.; on the Roman-Catholic, Coelxes, Eck, Nausea, etc. Though, no doubt, both parties met with the sincere intention of doing their utmost in order to avoid war, it soon became evident that no compromise was possible unless some very strong influence from without could be brought to bear on the negotiations; and by an imperial decree of Jan. 18, 1541, the assembly was transferred to Ratisbon, where the diet was about to meet. The second colloquy, the so-called "Consultation of Worms," took place in 1557 under the presidency of Julius von Pfug, Bishop of Naumburg; but, beside Melanthon, the president was probably the only one present who took a real interest in the union. The Protestants were represented by Melanthon, Frenz, Morlin, Schaeuf, et seq.; the Roman Catholics, by Sibinius, Bishop of Merseburg, Canisius, Staphylus, Wizelius, et seq. It seems to have been the object of the Roman Catholics to break up the compact unity of the Protestant party; and, if so, they succeeded. In the sixth sitting, Sibinius demanded a formal declaration, whether the whole Protestant Church accepted the Calvinist doctrine of the Lord's Supper, the Osiandrian doctrine of justification, the Placius doctrine de: and without any alteration the internal discord of the Protestant party broke out in full blaze. The assembly finally dispersed.
WORSHIP.

The earliest account we have of Christian worship after the close of the canon is from a pagan source. When Pliny the Younger entered upon his proconsulship of Bithynia in Asia Minor, about A.D. 110, he found the number of Christians already so great, and the heathen worship so seriously undermined, that he was obliged by the popular clamor to exert himself against the new religion. Even under the cruel application of the torture, he could find out nothing worse than that the Christians were accustomed to meet together on a set day, before dawn, and sing responsive hymns to Christ as their God, and to pledge themselves in a sacrament to abstain from every form of evil, to commit no theft, rape, or adultery, to falsify no word, and betray no trust. At a later period in the day they met together again, and joined in a harvest supper (Pliny to Trajan, Let. 85). This higher type of worship could be done without the purity of the Christian life and worship. The next account is from a Christian source, and, as might be expected, somewhat more particular. Justin Martyr, in his first Apology, says, that on the day called Sunday, all the Christians of a neighborhood meet together in one place, and listen to the reading of the Gospels and the Prophets. The presiding bishop preaches a sermon, exhorting them to holy living. All stand up, and pray. Bread is then brought in, with wine and water, the sacramental wine being invariably diluted. After further prayers, to which the people respond with audibly “Amens,” the body and blood of Christ are distributed. Portions are sent to the sick, and a collection is taken for the poor. Justin adds, “Sunday is the day on which we all meet together; because it is the first creative day, on which God called forth the light out of darkness, and on which also Jesus Christ our Saviour rose from the dead.” The first important change in public worship to be noticed after this is the division of the service into two parts,—the service (missa) of the catechumens, which is open to all, and consisted of prayer, reading, and the preaching of the gospel. The great catacombs that were built after the end of the Crusades were unadapted to that purpose. They were little if anything that can be regarded as the preaching of the gospel. The great cathedrals that were built after the end of the Crusades were not adapted to that purpose. They were suited only to a dramatic show of worship, with altars, pictures, processions, and other features appealing to the spirit of ignorant, popular devotion. The liturgies, however, were greatly improved; and noble hymns were composed, which still serve to express the deepest sentiments of the Christian heart. With the opening of the Reformation the function of preaching, which had begun, indeed, during the preceding century, to recover from its long neglect, re-asserted its divine right, and again made a prominent part of public worship. Luther, Calvin, Knox, all the great Reformers and their disciples, preached indefatigably. The devotional element gradually dropped into the background, and the sermon came to fill nearly the entire scheme of divine worship. The use of prescribed forms of prayer became characteristic of episcopally constituted churches. Instead of a Liturgy, the English dissenters and the entire body of non-Episcopal churches in America conducted prayer by means of the extemporaneous effusions of the preacher. The defects to which this method is liable are pointed out in the Presbyterian Directory for Worship, in which the minister is charged to “prepare himself carefully for the right conduct of public prayer, that it may be performed with propriety and dignity, as well as to the profit of those who join in it, and that he may not disgrace that important service by mean, irregular, or extravagant effusions. A sense of the responsibility of the profession of the gospel, and the nature of divine admonition, the Presbyterian clergy continued to give so little attention to this part of their duty, that, about the close of the first quarter of the century, the venerable Dr. Miller of Princeton, one of the recognized leaders of that church, pointed out no less than eighteen separate faults into which they were accustomed to fall. This invariable tendency has led, from about the time of the publication of Dr. Miller's treatise, to a reaction in favor of the primitive mode of worship, by means of a partial Liturgy; and various works designed to encourage and assist that movement have been laid before the church. No marked change, however, in the forms of worship has yet been effected. Among the Scottish Presbyterians, a large and active society, embracing many distinguished members, lay and clerical, has devoted itself to the improvement of public worship, and has published several excellent liturgical works for that purpose. Their Euchologion, or Book of Common Order, has passed through four editions, and an improved fifth edition is about being issued (1883).

In the Roman-Catholic Church in America a marked change for the better in respect to public worship is to be noticed. Brought into immediate competition with a powerful and vigorous Protestantism, the Roman Church has been obliged to borrow something of its methods in self-defence. Its churches are mostly large, but not too large for the purposes of preaching; and the pews are often upholstered, and rented permanently by the same families. A sermon always makes a part of the service. The children are gathered into Sunday schools, in which the Catechism is taught, and hymns are sung to the popular tunes familiar to Protestant children.

In the department of hymnology a great development of activity has taken place, both in Europe and America, during the last half-century. Many new hymn and tune books have appeared, mostly worthy of high commendation, including from one thousand to fifteen hundred hymns each. A serious fault with some of them is the unauthorized "tinkering" of old and familiar hymns, at the discretion of the individual editor. The intrusion of modern "sentimental" hymns is another fault. The conference of Eisebach (1853) went to the opposite extreme, and adopted the principle of accepting no hymn of a later date than 1750. Many hymns are also objectionable as being too exclusively didactic. A hymn may properly include doctrine, reproof, or warning; but the great function of sacred song is the utterance of the devout emotions in praise to God: preaching hymns, in which the whole object, apparently, is to rouse and terrify the sinner, are illegitimate. The German collections are generally free from these faults. On the whole, the modern church worship must be regarded as more ornate and didactic, appealing more both to the intellect and the taste, than that of earlier ages, and as having something the same relation to it that modern confessions have to the Apostles' Creed, or a finely constructed and furnished modern church to the bare basilica of the Nicene period. WOTTON, William, D.D., English divine; b. at Wrentham, Suffolk, Aug. 13, 1600; d. at Buxted, Sussex, Feb. 13, 1726. In childhood he showed remarkable precocity; and when he was twelve years and a half old he was skilled in Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Greek, and Latin, besides in logic, philosophy, geography, and the arts and sciences. He entered Catherine Hall, Cambridge, in 1676; was passed B.A., January, 1679; M.A., 1683; and was elected fellow of St. John's College, 1685. He entered holy orders; in 1693 was rector of Middleton Keynes, Buckinghamshire; in 1705 prebendary of Salisbury. Among his learned works may be mentioned, Reflections upon Ancient and Modern Learning, London, 1694, 3d ed., 1705 (a reply to Sir William Temple's extravagant eulogy of the ancients); Miscellaneous Discourses relating to the Traditions and Usages of the Scribes and Pharisees in our Blessed Saviour Jesus Christ's Time, 1718, 2 vols. WRITING AMONG THE HEBREWS. The Hebrew word Kaeb denotes originally, to "en-grave" in stone (Exod. xxxi. 18, xxxii. 15), metal (Exod. xxxix. 30; Job xix. 24; Isa. viii. 1; Hab. ii. 2), wood (Num. xvii. 3); then to "write." The discovery and first use of the art of writing is certainly at least as old as the times of Abraham, yet in the patriarchal age we meet with no absolutely certain traces of its employment by the Hebrews. But undoubtedly they made this art their own during their stay in Egypt; for here already we find Israelite officers who derived their name, sheorin, from "writing." All the more we may assume that Moses, brought up as he was in the Egyptian court, and instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians (Acts vii. 22), not only was acquainted with it, but was so practised in it that he could set down in writing the laws which were given to his people, and so inscribe them against that disfiguration which is the case of mere oral tradition. Nay, in the time of Moses, the art of writing is presupposed, and mentioned as being already known and in common use among the people (Exod. xvii. 14, xxiv. 4, xxxiv. 27, 28; Lev. xix. 28; Num. v. 23, xi. 26, xxxiii. 2; Deut. xvii. 17, 18, xxxi. 9, 12, 22, 24). The Shew-lights of the Hebrew is merely a branch, was not invented by the Hebrews, neither was it invented by the Phoenicians. It was certainly invented and used by a Semitic race, because it is adapted to the peculiarities of the Semitic languages, and was developed out of the primitive type independently of Egypt or Babylonia, whence the Phoenicians got it, and were the instruments of communicating it to other nations.

The Semitic primitive alphabet presents itself in a threefold stage of development, while it was contributing to the formation of the present Hebrew character. In its oldest (iconographical) state it exists in Phoenician monuments, both stones and coins. The letters, characterized generally by stiff, straight down-strokes, without regularity and beauty, were used among the Samaritans, and on coins struck under the Maccabean princes. While the old character thus contiguity without much change among the Phoenicians and Samaritans, it had gradually altered among the Aramaeans, and assumed somewhat of a cursive, or tachygraphical form, by opening the heads or tops of the letters, which were closed before, so that they presented themselves as two projecting points or ears, and by breaking the stiff down-strokes, which were either upright, or but slightly bent into horizontally inclined ones, to serve for union in writing. This character appears in a twofold form on Aramaean monuments. It is seen as an older and more simple one on the Carpentras stone, where it still inclines to the old writing, and is just beginning to deviate from it by opening the heads of the letters. It is also seen as a younger character, in inscriptions found among the Samaritans, deriving very considerably from the primitive alphabet, by the open heads of the letters and by the horizontal strokes of union. The ancient character also underwent a similar process among the Jews. It is probable that the influence of the later Aramaean character (Palmyrene) contributed most to this effect, until the present Hebrew writing, the אֵבֶן [Hebrew writing] (so called on account of its angular form), more commonly called אֵבֶן [the Assyrian writing], was formed. To give the characters more uniformity and symmetry, the calligraphic principle, or effort to write beautifully and ornamentally, came in use. Letters which had been joined together it divides, and attaches various ornamental flourishes to them, agreeably to current taste.

At what time the Hebrew writing thus altered passed from the Aramaeans, or Syrians, to the Jews, it is very difficult to discover. In the Talmud, Origen, and Jerome, the change of the character ascribed to Ezra, who, after the captivity, is said to have introduced the square character for the old. [Hence it is called the Assyrian, meaning the Chaldean writing, אֵבֶן אֵבֶן.] According to a tradition (Euseb., Chron. ad ann. 4720), Ezra is said to have invented the square writing, that the Jews might not become mixed with the Samaritans. This square writing was also called the "holy," in opposition to the more ancient, the גֶּפֶן i.e., the broken, irregular one, or גֶּפֶן [Hebrew writing], which was now regarded as the "profane," and only in use among the Samaritans. But the fact that this character was still retained for a considerable time, and on account of its antiquity was used in the Maccabean coinage, and that the Samaritans may have accepted it along with the Pentateuch, while, out of hatred to the Samaritans, the Jews may then have preferred the running hand, and may have perfected it calligraphically into the square character, shows that the square character must have been introduced later. The name אֵבֶן cannot, indeed, be held absolutely to determine the origin and home of the square character, since the meaning of the word אֵבֶן is greatly disputed. Thus rabbi Jehudah [surnamed the Holy] explains it, "beatified," "sanctified." The same is to be said of the explanations "rectilinear writing" (Michaelis, Orient. Bil. xxii. p. 138) and "straight, strong, firm writing" (Hupfeld). Although we cannot determine with precision the time at which the square character was perfected, still there is complete evidence that it cannot have taken place so late as the fourth century of the Christian era (as Kopp, Bilder-Schreiben der Vorzeit, ii. 97 sq.). In the New Testament (Matt. v. 18) we find that the αυδ is referred to as the smallest letter, which suits better the square character. The Talmud, in its discussion of the Samaritan alphabet, designates this letter as similar, and exposed to change by mistake, which can only refer to the square character. [Comp. Pick, art. "The Old Testament in the Time of the Talmud," in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopaedia, vol. x. p. 187.] During the middle ages we find another kind of cursive writing, the rabbinic, which is also a kind of square writing. The question whether the Hebrew system of writing was derived from the writing of consorts, or not, is still pending. According to Hupfeld, there were from the beginning three vowel-signs for the vowels a, i, and u. Of these, however, the first, the aleph, was used only with a commencing sound, and in a concluding sound it was not written; but every consonant was sounded with the a. Moreover, in the beginning, the a sound was very greatly predominant; the whole sound was then only as the language became developed, the other vowels became more frequent, — i and u, also e, o, ai, and au. Yet the writing was developed less rapidly than the pronunciation; and thus the vowel-marks ַ and ָ were not applied everywhere, but only in ambiguous forms. In the later books of the Old Testament we find a manifest progress in the written symbols for the vowels, as the so-called scrivere pleno comes much more frequently into use. At the time of the Alexandrian version the vocalization had not attained to its later perfection, and therefore in many cases it deviates from that which is now adopted. In the Targums it meets us in a much firmer and less variable form; and by the time of the Talmud it is thoroughly fixed, and it agrees essentially with the later vocalization: though it has not yet attained the completeness of vocalization (Hupfeld: Studia u. Kritiken, 1860, p. 549; Exercitatt. Ethioip. §§ 3–5; Hebrew Grammat., § 11). The first traces of diacritical signs we find in the marketa, the Samaritan diacritical line, and which is also found on Phoenician inscriptions.

The ancient Hebrews, like the ancients generally, had neither complete separation of words, nor complete scriptural punctuation; but they divided the sentences, for the most part, the words also, by little spaces, whilst closely connected words were frequently written without any break. But, WÜRTTEMBERG, The Kingdom of, has, according to the census of 1880, a population of 1,971,255 souls, of whom 1,361,412 are Protestants, 660,405 Roman Catholics, 13,328 Jews, etc. The constitution of the Protestant Church is consis-torial. The highest legislative and administrative authority is, so far as concerns canonical matters, vested in the consistory, composed of a president, a legal councillor, and seven ordinary councillors (five laymen and two ecclesiastics), who are all appointed by the king. Since 1845, however, there has been established alongside the consistory, and acting in unison with it, a series of parish councils, diocesan synods, and annual synods—general, to which its membership is elective. The territory of the church is divided into six superintendencies, each with a "prelate" at its head, 49 deanes, and 906 parishes with 1,021 pastors. The university of Tubingen has a faculty of Protestant theology, consisting of five ordinary professors, besides professors extraordinary and privatdozenten. The Roman Catholics of Württemberg form the episcopal diocese of Rottenburg, with 672 parishes and 946 priests, paid by the state. The university of Tübingen has also a faculty of Roman-Catholic theology consisting of six professors. The diocese of Rottenburg belongs to the ecclesiastical province of Freiburg, to which it was long confided. See Sprague: Reformed

XIMENES DE CISNEROS, Francisco, b. at Torrelaguna in Castile, in 1436; d. at Roa, Nov. 8, 1517. He belonged to a family of old nobility, but without wealth or any other distinction. He was educated at Alcala; studied at Salamanca; took holy orders; visited Rome, and returned in 1473 with an expectative letter from the Pope on the archpriestship of Uzeda. The archbishop of Toledo felt provoked at the Pope's arrogance in giving away benefits in his diocese; and, as Ximenes would not yield his claim, he locked him up in a convent, and kept him there for six years. Having been released, Ximenes was in 1480 appointed vicar-general to the bishop of Siguenza, and in that position he gave evidence of an administrative talent of the highest order. But he suddenly broke off the brilliant career which opened before him, and entered the Franciscan monastery of San Juan de los Reyes in Toledo. The austerity of his ascetic practices, and the fervor of his preachings, soon made him a great name in this new field; but again he astonished the world, and retired to the lonely monastery of Our Lady of Castafar, where he built a hut with his own hands, and lived for several years as a hermit. In 1492 he was summoned back into the world by being appointed confessor to Queen Isabella. The position was of great political importance, as the queen used to confer with her confessor, not only on her private affairs, but also on public business; and Ximenes so completely gained the confidence of the queen, that in 1495 she made him archbishop of Toledo, and shortly after, also grand-inquisitor of Spain. The archbishopric of Toledo was probably, next to the papacy, the richest and most influential position in the church. Ximenes, however, continued to live like a monk; and, even when a bull from Rome ordered him to keep up a certain style answering to the dignity of his position, he continued in secret his ascetic practices, wearing the hair-shirt under his gorgeous robe, and sleeping on a wooden board. Though the relation between him and King Ferdinand had been very cool while Isabella lived, he did not lose his influence after her death; on the contrary, by his will the king made him regent of Spain during the minority of his heir, Charles V.; and Ximenes had the good fortune to die just as Charles landed in Asturia, probably without learning that his deposition was the first act of the king.

Ximenes was an ultramontanist and a fanatic. He opposed with all his might the translation of the Bible into the vernacular tongue, as a profanation and a dangerous measure; since common people (vulgus) respect only what they do not understand, while they despise any thing which becomes easily accessible to them. He also opposed the introduction of publicity in the transactions of the Inquisition. And when the newly converted Jews and Moors offered King Ferdinand, who was always in need of money, a considerable sum for the introduction of such a measure, Ximenes paid the king a still larger sum out of his own pocket in order to prevent the establishment of the reform. Against the conquered Moors he advocated the harshest measures, and it was he who persuaded the king and queen to give them the choice between conversion and banishment. On the other hand, he was perfectly sincere. He carried out the necessary reform of the Franciscan order in Spain, in spite of the interference of the general of the order and the Pope himself, and though more than one thousand monks emigrated in order to escape the severe discipline which he established. For the promotion of education and learning he did very much, though he was not himself a scholar. He founded the university of Alcala. There had for more than two centuries been a flourishing school in the place, which he extended into a complete university, with forty-two professors,—six in theology proper, six in canon law, four in medicine, one in anatomy, one in surgery, eight in philosophy, one in moral philosophy, one in mathematics, four in Greek and Hebrew languages, four in rhetoric, and six in grammar. The erection of the many new and splendid buildings began in 1498, and was completed in 1508. Another magnificent undertaking of his was the publication of the Complutenian Polyglot (see Polyglot). But it was chiefly as a statesman that he earned his great fame. He even won the laurels of a general. In 1509, in his seventy-second year, he equipped at his own expense a brilliant armament, consisting of ten thousand foot, four thousand horse, and a fleet; crossed in person the Mediterranean; conquered Oran; and made forever an end of the Moorish piracy on the southern and south-eastern coasts of Spain.

YALE UNIVERSITY, in New Haven, Conn., owes its origin to the action of a few Congregational ministers, principally of the old New-Haven Colony, who met by agreement in 1700, and gave books in a formal way “for founding a college.” The action of these ministers, however, at this time, was only the carrying into execution of a plan which had been conceived by the first settlers of New Haven more than sixty years before, — probably before they had left England, their native land. A charter was obtained from the General Court of Connecticut, Oct. 9, 1701; and the location of the college was fixed temporarily at Saybrook. The Rev. Abraham Pierson was elected rector; and in March, 1702, instruction was begun. The first commencement was held at Saybrook, Sept. 13, 1701. As the college grew in importance, it began to appear that it would be worth something as a prize; and an attempt was made to capture it, and remove it to Wethersfield. A great struggle ensued, in which New Haven was at last successful. In 1716 the college was permanently established in the town which was its natural home, and where it had been the object of the hopes and efforts of successive generations. Just at this time, a considerable gift having been received from Elihu Yale of London, governor of the East India Company, a son of one of the original colonists, the trustees were enabled to erect a college building, to which, in 1718, at the first public commencement held in New Haven, they gave the name of their benefactor,— a name which was soon transferred to the institution itself.

According to the original charter of 1701, the government of the college was placed in the hands of a rector and ten fellows, all of whom were ministers. A new charter, more ample in its provisions, was obtained in 1745, in which the president officer was styled the president. In 1792, in consideration of pecuniary assistance received from the State, the trustees voted that the governor, lieutenant-governor, and the six senior assistants (in 1818 called senators), should be added to their number. In 1806 the Legislature relinquished the privilege of being represented in the corporation by the six senators in favor of as many graduates, to be elected by their fellow-graduates. The arrangement for the terms of office of these members was so made, that there is every year an election of one graduate, who is to serve six years. All the departments of the college are under the control of this corporation, whose legal title is the “President and Fellows of Yale College in New Haven.” The president is ex officio the head of each department, but each is practically independent of the others in the management of its internal affairs. The corporation alone has the power to give degrees, which are conferred on candidates, only after passing a satisfactory examination.

The college is thought to have been remarkably fortunate in its presidents, whose terms of office have been as follows: Abraham Pierson, 1701-07; Samuel Andrew, 1707-19; Timothy Cutler, 1719-22; Eliah Williams, 1725-39; Thomas Clap, 1739-66; Nathanael Daggett, 1766-77; Ezra Stiles, 1777-95; Timothy Dwight, 1795-1817; Jeremiah Day, 1817-46; Theodore Dwight Woolsey, 1846-71; Noah Porter, 1871- .

At first there was no permanent instructor besides the rector, who was assisted by tutors temporarily employed. In 1755 (public worship having been shortly before commenced on the college ground, and a church established) a professor of divinity was appointed, who was to be college pastor; and not long after, in 1771, a professor of mathematics, physics, and astronomy, was added to the corps of instructors. At the end of the first hundred years of the history of the college, its progress had been all that its founders could have anticipated. There had been a steady increase in the number of students and a marked enlargement in the range of studies required. But after 1800, under the presidency of the Rev. Timothy Dwight, a rapid development of the college began. Through the influence of Dr. Dwight, three recent graduates of the college—Jeremiah Day, Benjamin Silliman, and James L. Kingsley—were appointed professors. These three men, for half a century, — first as his coadjutors, and after his death as colleagues,—laborated together with great zeal and unbroken harmony to advance the interests of learning in the institution. As the prosperity of the country advanced, not only was the number of professors enlarged, but new departments were organized, as follows: medicine in 1812, theology in 1822, law in 1824, philosophy and the arts in 1847, the fine arts in 1864, and a department of original research in astronomy in 1871. At last, in 1871, the corporation, recognizing that the college already comprised all the courses of instruction which are usually found in an institution of the highest rank, organized the university with the departments of theology, medicine, law, and philosophy, and the arts; which last was made to consist of four sections, viz., (1) for graduates, (2) for academical undergraduates, (3) for undergraduates of the Sheffield Scientific School, (4) for students of the fine arts; each section having a separate organization.

In the section for graduates, or those who have already taken a bachelor's degree, there are forty-two instructors, and the course of instruction occupies two years. In the section for academical undergraduates there are thirty-one instructors, and the instruction occupies four years. The Sheffield Scientific School is devoted especially to instruction in the mathematical, physical, and natural sciences. The school was established in 1847; but in 1860, through the liberality of Mr. Joseph E. Sheffield, it was re-organized, and received its name. There are twenty-seven instructors in the school, and the course occupies three years. The Street School of the Fine Arts has for its end the cultivation and promotion of the arts of design; viz., painting, sculpture, and architecture, thorough practice, and criticism. The
The Theological School, as a distinct department, was founded in 1822; though, from the origin of the college, the instruction had been specially arranged to favor the education of ministers. But from the establishment of the chair of divinity in 1755, and probably from a much earlier period, classes of candidates had been in the habit of continuing their residence for the purpose of pursuing theological studies; so that, out of the large number of the alumni who entered the ministry during the hundred years before 1822, a considerable portion had been trained for their duties at the college. Among these may be mentioned Jonathan Edwards of Northampton, Samuel Hopkins of Newport, Nathanael Emmans of Franklin, Joseph Bellamy of Bethlehem, Timothy Dwight of New Haven, Joseph Buckminster of Portsmouth, John Smalley, Stephen West, Abel Backus, Moses Stuart, Nathaniel W. Taylor, Lyman Beecher, Eleazar T. Fitch, Bennet Tyler, Edward Dorr Griffin, and Edward Robinson. The faculty consisted at first of Nathaniel W. Taylor, Eleazer T. Fitch, and Josiah W. Gibbs. Chauncey Al Gore died in 1828, and was immediately added to the faculty. The president of the university, a professor of Hebrew literature and biblical theology, a professor of systematic theology, a professor of homiletics and the pastoral charge, a professor of ecclesiastical history, and a professor of sacred literature and New-Testament Greek. There are, besides, eight special lecturers and instructors. Students of every Christian denomination, in case they are possessed of the required qualifications, are admitted. The course of instruction occupies three years; but, at the close of the studies of the second year, students may be licensed to preach. In one of the theological buildings is a library of three thousand volumes in various languages, open several hours each day, which takes the place of a well-selected private library for the students. The valuable library of church-music, which was collected by Dr. Lowell Mason, was, after his death, presented to the seminary. There is in this department no charge for instruction, room-rent, or the use of the library. Students whose circumstances require it receive a hundred dollars a year from the income of scholarships, and other funds. In special cases there is additional aid. The Hooker Graduate scholarship, with an annual income of seven hundred dollars for two years after graduation, was established in 1876; and there is another graduate scholarship, yielding five hundred dollars for one year. The term begins in September, and the session continues for eight months, without vacation, to the close of May. The degree of bachelor of divinity is conferred at the end of the course upon those who pass the required examination. Students in this department have the special advantage of being allowed to attend the lectures in the other departments of the university. The alumni of the seminary number about fourteen hundred. Of the alumni of the academical and theological departments, about a hundred have been foreign missionaries. A course of instruction for two years is also arranged for graduates, or those who have already completed a three-years' course in this or any other theological school.

The faculty of the department of medicine consists of eight professors and ten special lecturers. The system of instruction is arranged in a graded course for three full years. The faculty of the department of law consists of six professors and eight special lecturers and instructors. The course occupies two years. There is also a graduate course of two additional years, for those who have already taken the degree of bachelor of laws. The Peabody Museum of Natural History was endowed in 1866 by Mr. George Peabody of London, for the preservation of the valuable collection already owned by the college, and of those which may be made hereafter, in the departments of zoology, geology, palaeontology, and ethnology. In 1871 the department of astronomy was enlarged in its organization, when, to the former facilities for instruction in this science, were added ample means of original investigation and research. At present there is a corps of eight astronomers connected with the observatory.

According to the report of the treasurer in 1882, the invested funds of the university were $1,533,983.47. The annual income from tuition was $138,815.43. The number of the volumes in the several libraries which are open to students is about 135,000.

Over 13,000 degrees have been conferred by the corporation, of which about 1,000 have been pro honore causa. There have been, besides, several thousand students in the academical department of the university who received no degree. The number of the alumni who had entered the ministry before 1843, and of the theological department before 1867, are not included in the catalogue of the alumni, as, till those years, degrees were not conferred in law or theology. About 2,200 of the graduates of the academical department have been ordained as ministers.

The number of students in attendance in 1882-83 was as follows; department of theology, 104; department of medicine, 30; department of law, 85; department of philosophy and the arts (graduate instruction, 41; undergraduate academical department, 611; Sheffield Scientific School, 268; School of the Fine Arts, 40), 698; deduct for names inserted twice, 23. Total, 1,086.

YEAR. The Church does not rest upon a commandment of the New Testament, but was the gradual product of the needs of the church. The periods of its development can be readily traced. In the apostolic age, the Jewish Christians seem to have followed the Jewish cycle of feasts; while the Gentile Christians at first seem to have observed no yearly church festivals. In the middle of the second century, two such festivals meet us,—the Paschal and Pentecost festivals. The former at first commemorated the passion of our Lord (see Paschal Controversies, Easter), and was prolonged to a period of six days, marked by solemnity and fasting. Pentecost commemorated the resurrection and ascension of Christ and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, comprehended fifty days, and was a period of joyousness, in which there was no fasting, or kneeling in prayer. The second period in the formation of the church year is marked by the elevation of Ascension Day to the rank of a distinct festival, the closer association of the day of resurrection, Easter, with the Christian Passover. Good Friday, and the addition of the festival of Christ's birth,—Christmas,—and Epiphany. There were then three festive cycles, — Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost, two being preceded by preparatory periods, — Quadragesima (forty days) and Advent.

The ancient church celebrated the anniversaries of the deaths of martyrs as local festivals. The veneration of martyrs was accompanied by the feeling that their intercession made prayer effective. History, however, in this direction, is vitiated by myths. The oldest festivals of the church year, which runs a circuit. The word countenance bestows heavenly overcasting, the moon could not be seen, the light was scattered, and the night was prostrated; the rest of the earth was enlightened with a joyful light: the new moon was hallowed, officially declared a new month begun. Of course there was no astronomical observation possible, and much depended upon the weather. If, on account of overcasting, the moon could not be seen, there was no proclamation; but, if there should be a sudden lapse of the clouds, the news was despatched through the land, at first by signal-fires from height to height, later by messengers. Those months which had thirty days in them (of which there was to be no less than four or more than eight in the year) had two days called סנהר, סנהר, of which one was the thirtieth of the old, and the other the first of the new month. The present Jews use an astronomical table of moons, which dates from a century after the destruction of the second temple.
The ancient Hebrews corrected the discrepancy between the lunar year and the solar by the insertion every two or three years of a month before the last month of the year, except in the sabbatical year. It is true that there is no mention in the last month of the year, except in the sabbatical years. Every two or three years a month before the last month; but since, in this period, there was such a year among the Babylonians, Assyrians, and the Greeks, the omission may be merely accidental. In later times the Sanhedrin determined in the month Adar, according to the state of vegetation, whether a month should be intercalated or not. In the fourth Christian century the Jews adopted the Greek astronomer Menon's 19-year cycle, according to which, in every nine years there were seven leap-years, the 3d, 6th, 8th, 11th, 14th, 17th, 19th. There were two important legal enactments to be allowed for: the Feast of Tabernacles must not end before the autumnal equinox, and the full moon of Passover must not precede the spring equinox.

II. The Months. — These were, giving them their pre- and post-exilian names, as follows:

1. Ab (Exod. vii. 11, Zech. v. 1); 2. He Hew (Esth. viii. 9); 3. Borch (Jer. xxxvi. 30); 4. Mattath, the beginning of the summer solstice, the month of mourning for "Tammuz," — the name of 4 and 5 do not occur in the Scriptures.) 6. Eul (Neh. vi. 15). 7. Ethanim (1 Kings vii. 2), the "month of the overflowing waters," or Tishri. 8. Bul (1 Kings vi. 38), the "rain" or "fruit" month, and Marhemshon, abridged to Heshvan. 9. Kislev (Neh. i. 1; Zech. vii. 1), the "Orion" (7) month. 10. Tebeth (Esth. ii. 15; Zech. vi. 7). 11. Shebat (Zech. i. 7). 12. Adar (Ex. vi. 15; Esth. iii. 7, 18, viii. 12). There are no known pre-exilian names for the last four months, and the origin of this post-exilian nomenclature is in dispute; but probably it is derived from Babylonian. The names are found upon Syrian, Arabic, and Palmyran inscriptions, and names closely similar upon the Nineveh tablet. Before, as well as after the exile, it was customary to give the number rather than the name of the month (e.g., Zech. i. 7; Esth. ii. 16).

III. The Civil and Ecclesiastical Years. — Besides the ecclesiastical, there was apparently, from the earliest times, a civil year, which began in the autumn. The reasons for believing the existence and antiquity of this state of things are,

1. In Exod. xxv. 16 and xxviv. 22 the Feast of Ingathering is said to have been "in the end of the year." (2) The sabbath- and jubilee-year began upon the tenth day of the seventh month, according to Lev. xxv. 4, 9 sq. This puts the Feast of Tabernacles in the actual beginning of the civil year. (3) The flood began in Bul, the second month, which was in autumn, according to tradition. (4) By the later Jews, 13 months, reckoned from the Creation of the world, began in autumn. (5) The day of the new moon in the seventh month was by the later Jews celebrated as New-Year's Day. (6) The Talmud expressly recognizes two beginnings to the year (Rosh hash., i.). (7) Josephus (Antiq., i. iii. 3) says, "Moses appointed Nisan (i.e., Xanthikos) as the first month of their religious festivals, because upon it he had led the Hebrews out of Egypt . . . but he preserved the original order of the months as to . . . ordinary affairs." (8) The Targum to 1 Kings vii. 2 says that the ancients called Tishri the first month.

IV. The Seasons. — Properly speaking, there are only two seasons in the Holy Land, — summer and winter. The former is characterized by cloudless heavens, heavy dews at night (Sirach xviii. 16, xliii. 22), great heat by day, and cool evenings and nights (Gen. xxxi. 40; Jer. xxxvi. 30). The winter begins with the sowing-time, and lasts until the later rains of March. It is a period of rain and snow. Reference is made in the Bible to various seasons, — barley-harvest, wine-making, etc., — as was to be expected in the records of an agricultural people.

YEOMANS, Edward Dorr, D.D., Presbyterian divine; b. at North Adams, Mass., Sept. 27, 1829; d. at Orange, N.J., Aug. 26, 1895. He entered Lafayette College, Pennsylvania, under the presidency of his father, and passed through the junior year, then continued academic and theological studies under his father's direction until his licensure by the presbytery of Northumberland, Penn., April 21, 1847. He was stated supply at New Columbia, Penn., from 1848 to 1853; pastor at Warrior Run, Penn., Nov. 29, 1854 (the date of his ordination), until November, 1858; at Trenton, N.J., until May 1859; at Oceanic, N.Y., until July 2, 1867, when he was installed over the Central Church, Orange, N.J., and was pastor there at his death. In 1864 he received the degree of D.D. from the College of New Jersey. Dr. Yeomans received high praise for his thoroughly idiomatic and elegant translation of Dr. Schiff's History of the Apostolic Church (New York, 1853) and the first two volumes of The History of the Christians Church, 1858 and 1867. He prepared a book of worship, and collection of hymns, and began the translation of Lange's Commentary on John, but was obliged by failing health to desist in the summer of 1868. See Lange on John, p. xii.

YORK (Eboracum), the capital of Yorkshire, Eng., the seat of an archbishopric, situated on both sides of the Ouse, a hundred and seventy-two miles north-north-west of London. It was the seat of the first bishop of the See of York, and the seat of its bishops. 925. Its first minster was built of wood by Edwin of Northumbria, 927, who also began one in stone before 633. The building was completed in 642, repaired in 869, burnt April 23, 741, and rebuilt 767–790. Since then, it has been burnt several times,—wholly in 1099, partly in Feb. 2, 1829, and May 30, 1840. The present building dates its beginning from the twelfth century, but was not consecrated until July 3, 1472.

...two hundred and thirteen feet high, and two hundred and forty-nine feet. The east window is seventy-eight feet high, and thirty-two feet wide, and filled with stained glass representing about two hundred historical events. An elaborate screen contains statues of all the kings of England from William I. to Henry VI.; and upon this screen is the organ, one of the finest in the kingdom. The cathedral has a peal of twelve bells, one of which weighs eleven tons and a half, and is the largest in Great Britain."

The archbishop's palace, now the library of the dean and chapter, dates from the twelfth century, and is on the north side of the cathedral. The archbishop now lives at Bishopthorpe, near York. See the Diocesan History of York by Canon George Ord, Rev. London, 1888.

YOUNG, Edward, b. at Uphain, Hampshire, 1814; d. at Welwyn, Hertfordshire, April 12, 1765; was educated at Winchester and at Corpus Christi, Oxford; fellow of All Souls; LL.D. there 1719; defeated as a candidate for Parliament; ordained, 1727; rector of Welwyn, 1730. He wrote three tragedies, which were acted at Drury Lane, 1719, etc.; The Centaur not Fabulous; A Vindication of Providence, and letters, essays, etc.; a poem on Resignation, with others; and the Night Thoughts, 1742–46, once extremely popular, and still famous.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS.

These are undenominational societies of young men, organized upon an evangelical basis, for the promotion of the mental, moral, social, and physical welfare of young men. Their actire, voting membership is confined to Christian young men: but large numbers of unconverted young men, without regard to denominational affiliations, become associate members for the sake of social and educational privileges. The work of the associations is carried on through the personal efforts of Christian young men themselves, laboring individually in the sphere of their daily calling, and collectively in connection with committees having charge of the reading-rooms, libraries, gymnasiums, evening educational classes, lecture-courses, prayer-meetings, and Bible-classes for young men exclusively, boarding-house and employment bureaus, visitation of sick young men, etc. The associations also, as opportunity offers, hold undenominational religious services in neglected neighborhoods, in public institutions, and in the open air.

The parent English-speaking association was organized at London, by George Williams, June 6, 1844. Societies formed in Germany earlier than in England have affiliated with the English-speaking associations and those of other lands. The society now bearing the name of the Young Men's Christian Association in Glasgow, Scotland, claims an origin, under a different name, prior to that of London. But the brotherhood bearing the distinctive title of the Young Men's Christian Association, which has developed into provincial, state, national, and international organization, can be traced in its origin and name distinctly to the London association, and cannot be traced behind it. And the societies claiming priority under different names belonged, rather, to the multitude of societies of Christian young men which have been formed in every period of the Christian Church, but which have not developed into the permanent and varied organization just referred to. The Montreal Association was organized Dec. 9, 1851; and that of Boston, Dec. 29, 1851. The first International Convention of the associations of the United States and British Provinces met in Buffalo, June 7, 1854. The first World's Conference convened in Paris, Aug. 19, 1855. Here the following text of membership, since known as the "Paris Basis," was adopted:

"The Young Men's Christian Associations seek to unite those young men, who, regarding Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour, according to the Holy Scriptures, desire to be his disciples in their doctrine and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of his kingdom among young men."

In April, 1860, the associations of North America had about twenty-five thousand members. At the breaking-out of the civil war, many members of the associations entered the military service, and others, and the associations naturally followed them with efforts for their welfare and that of their comrades. At the instance of the New York Association, a special convention was called, Nov. 14, 1861, to consider Christian work in the army. This resulted in the organization of the United-States Christian Commission (q.v.); and during the civil war the energies of the associations were largely absorbed in army work. With the close of the war, a new season of growth and... fulness of the Godhead bodily, and who was made of kings, and Lord of lords, in whom dwelleth all the glory of God, year to year in different cities, was located for a time in New York City (where the work is carried on) and has become known and incorporated as the "International Committee." The convention which met in Detroit, June 24, 1868, adopted the following test of active membership, since known as the "Evangelical Test:"—

"Resolved, That as these organizations bear the name of Christian, and profess to be engaged directly in the Saviour's service, so it is clearly their duty to maintain the control and management of all their affairs in the hands of those who profess to love, and publicly avow their faith in Jesus, the Redeemer, as divine; and who testify their faith by becoming the faithful members of churches held to be evangelical; and that such persons, and none others, should be allowed to vote, or hold office."

At the Portland convention, July 14, 1869, the word "Evangelical" was thus defined:—

"We hold the offices of church, and as such, can employ helpers by the Holy Scriptures to be the only infallible rule of faith and practice, do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (the only-begotten of the Father, King of kings, and Lord of lords, in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and who was made sin for us, though knowing no sin, bearing our sins in his own body on the tree), as the only name under heaven by which we must be saved from everlasting punishment."

All associations organized since the passage of the above resolution, in order to be entitled to representation in the International Convention, must limit their active, voting membership to members of evangelical churches. The formal adoption of this test by the American associations has secured for them the active sympathy of churches and Christian communities. It is only since this time that the associations have received the real estate and buildings which are now valued at over $3,000,000, and which give the societies a permanent foothold in the communities where they are located. At the World's Conference of 1878, held in Geneva, Switzerland, forty-one American delegates were present; and, under their influence and leadership, a central international committee, on the plan of American associations, has been appointed, with a working quorum resident in Geneva. The number of associations in the world is now 2,671, with a total membership of about 200,000. They are grouped as follows: United States, 824; Dominion of Canada, 56; Bermuda, 1; South America, 1; England, 198; Scotland, 188; Ireland, 18; France, 65; Germany, 423; Holland, 450; Switzerland, 406; Sweden and Norway, 85; Belgium, 24; Denmark, 3; Spain and Portugal, 10; Italy, 20; Turkey, 25; Austria, 4; Russia, 7; Syria, 5; India, 2; China, 2; Japan, 2; Africa, 15; Australasia, 25; Hawaiian Kingdom, 1.

The affiliated associations of North America have organized an admirable system of intercommunication and mutual help. At the suggestion of the International Convention, and with the concurrence of the American and Provincial committees, the districts are grouped as follows: United States and Dominion of Canada, 1,600,000; Sweden and Norway, 85; Belgium, 24; Denmark, 3; Spain and Portugal, 10; Italy, 20; Turkey, 25; Austria, 4; Russia, 7; Syria, 5; India, 2; China, 2; Japan, 2; Africa, 15; Australasia, 25; Hawaiian Kingdom, 1.

YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS. Upon the general plan of the Young Men's Christian Associations, Women's Christian Associations have been organized in various European and American cities. In America this movement dates from the year 1857, when the first association for distinctive work among young women was organized in New York City. Ten years later a general interest in this subject resulted in the formation of associations in many of the large cities of the United States. There are now fifty-six associations in the United States and British Provinces, with an aggregate membership of about fifteen thousand. A great variety of work in behalf of young women has been undertaken. Many of the associations use their buildings as lodging or boarding houses for women, and a few have restaurants; but there is a growing tendency to emphasize such methods of educational, social, and religious work for women, as the reading-room, library, educational classes, social receptions, Bible-classes, and prayer-meetings. Employment offices are also a very general feature in this work. An effort to organize associations among young women in schools and colleges is meeting with considerable success.

The American associations hold a Biennial International Conference, which has convened six times. The last conference met in St. Louis, Mo., in October, 1881. Eighteen associations were represented by thirty-four delegates: written reports were received from many others. In twenty-two cities buildings have been secured for the purposes of the associations, amounting in value to $349,000. Monthly newspapers devoted to the interests of this specific work are issued by the associations of Cleveland, O., Philadelphia, Penn., Utica, N.Y., and Memphis, Tenn. Other publications of the society are the Conference Journal and reports of the associations. J. P. Catteell.

YULE, the old name for Christmas. Skeat connects the word with the Middle English you.len, yollen (“to cry out”), because it was a time of revelry. December was called the “former yule,” and January the “latter yule.”

YVONETUS, the supposed Dominican author of Tractatus de karesi pauperum de Lugduno (printed in Thesaurus novus anecdotorum, edited by Martine and Durand, vol. v. pp. 1777 sqq.). Franz Pfeiffer has, however, conclusively demonstrated, that the author was the Franciscan David of Augsburg, who lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century. Manuscripts of this work are found in Stuttgart and Strassburg. It is one of the authorities in Waldensian history. C. Schmidt.
ZABARELLA, or DE ZABARELLIS, b. at Padua, 1339; d. at Constance, Sept. 26, 1417. He studied canon law at Bologna; lectured in his native city; was employed in various diplomatic missions; and was by Boniface IX. called to Rome to take part in the negotiations concerning the schism; but when his De schismatibus was printed at Basel, in 1565, it was put on the Index. Having returned to Padua as arch-priest at the cathedral, he was again summoned to Rome by John XXIII.; made a cardinal, and archbishop of Florence, and sent as a legate to the Council of Constance, on whose transactions he exercised considerable influence. He was a prolific writer, but many of his works have never been printed. It is doubtful whether he is the author of Capitula agendorum in concilio generali Constantinensi de reformatione ecclesiae.

ZACCHEUS, Roman chief tax-gatherer in Jericho, and a convert of Christ (Luke xix. 2). He was a Jew, and his name is Hebrew נ3f, "righteous" (Ez. ii. 9; Neh. vii. 14). In the Talmud there is mention made of a well-known Zaccæus of Jericho, whose son was the celebrated rabbi Yochanan ben Zachai. According to tradition, Zaccæus of the Gospels became bishop of Cesarea in Palestine by the ordination of Peter (Apost. Const., vii. 46; cf. Clement: Homilies, iii. 63, 71, 72; Recognitions, iii. 65 sqq.). A half-ruined tower in Jericho, now used by a Turkish garrison, is pointed out as the house of Zaccæus. See the Bible dictionaries, s.v., and the commentaries upon Luke xix. 2-10.

ZACHARIAS, Pope 741-752; carried forward the aspirations of the Roman see with great adroitness and dignity in his relations with the Lombards, the Greeks, Boniface, and Pepin, whom he raised to the throne of the Merovingians. He translated the Dialogues of Gregory the Great into Greek. His letters to Boniface are found in Migne (Patrologia Latina, vol. 89) and in Giles's edition of Boniface Opera, London, 1845, vol. i. See D. Bartolini: Di S. Zaccaria papa e degli anni del suo pontificato, Regensburg, 1879; H. Cramp: Le pape Zacharie et la consultation de Pépin le Bref, Amiens, 1879; J. Cozza-Luizi: Historia S. P. Z. Benedicti a SS. pontificibus Romano; Gregorio I. descripta et Zacharia graece redditia, Rome, 1880.

ZACHARIUS SCHOLASTICUS, Bishop of Mytilene in the Island of Lesbos; was present at the synod of Constantinople (686) which deposed Athanasius, the patriarch of Constantinople, as Eutychian. He had studied philosophy and rhetoric in Alexandria, and for some time practised as an advocate at Berytus. His dialogue, Ammonius sic de mundi opificio, is a defence of the Christian view of the creation and government of the world against objections to it raised from the point of view of the Greek philosophy. It was first published in Paris, 1610. The best edition is that by Boissonade, Paris, 1836, where it stands, together with Ζηνας' De immortalitate animae, a work of similar kind. He also wrote a Disputatio against the Manicheans; but it exists only in a Latin translation, in Bib. Pat. Max., IX. Gass.

ZAMZUMMIM (Deut. ii. 20), or ZU'ZIM (Gen. xiv. 9), a tribe of giants in the East-Jordan country, who were part of the original settlers of Palestine. They were attacked and routed by Chedorlaomer, and finally expelled by the Ammonites.

ZANCHI, Hieronymus, b. at Alzano, near Bergamo, 1516; d. at Heidelberg, Nov. 19, 1590. He entered the order of the regular canons of St. Augustine in 1531, but studied the writings of Luther, Melanchthon, Calvin, etc., under the guidance of Vermigli, and began to preach the Reformation in Lucca. Compelled to flee, he visited Geneva, England, and Strassburg, and was in 1553 appointed professor of the Old Testament in the last-mentioned place. His relations with the Lutheran theologians of Marbach were, in the beginning, very peaceable; but his open advocacy of the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, and his attack on the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity, finally caused a breach; and in 1563 he removed to Chiavenna as pastor of the Reformed Church, where in 1568 he published an account of his controversies with the Marbach theologians, — Miscellanea. In 1568 he was appointed professor at Heidelberg, where he lectured on the Summa, and gradually acquired a great reputation as one of the most learned theologians of his time. He took part with great energy in the controversy with the Antitrinitarians, and wrote De tribus Eligism (1572), De natura Dei, De operibus Dei, etc. When the Palatinate became Lutheran, he retired to Neustadt-an-der-Ilardt, where he spent the rest of his life. A collected edition of his works appeared at Geneva, 1619, 3 vols. [Eng. trans. of his Spiritual Marriage between Christ and the Church (1529), and of his Confession of the Christian Religion, 1599].

ZEALOT, the epithet given in Luke vi. 15 and Acts i. 13 to Simon called the Canaanite (not Canaanite, as in Authorized Version, Matt. x. 4, Mark iii. 18), to distinguish him from Simon Peter. The Greek Ζαυλωτός is a mere transliteration of the Aramaean "zeal". The Zealots were one of the parties or factions in Palestine noted for their advocacy of the Mosaic law. Their founder was Judas the Galillean, also called the "Gaulonite" (Acts i. 37); but they degenerated into the Sicarii (from the Latin sica, "a dagger”), and were then guilty of many a dark deed. They were a prominent cause of the Jewish war, and increased its horrors (Joseph. iv. 3–7).

ZECHARI'AH (Jehovah remembers), the eleventh of the Minor Prophets. He describes himself as son of Berechiah, and grandson of Iddo, but in Ezra (v. 1, vi. 14) is mentioned as son of Iddo, whence it has been inferred that his father died young, and that he was brought up as Iddo’s son and successor (see Neh. xii. 1, 4, 16). In that case Zechariah, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, was a priest as well as a prophet. He appears to have been born in Babylon, and to have come up, while yet young, with the first company of exiles who returned to Palestine.

I. DATE. — In 536 B.C. Cyrus issued a decree permitting the captive Jews to return to their own country. More than forty thousand men with their families and slaves availed themselves of this permission, and re-occupied the land of their forefathers. Barely a year elapsed before preparations were made for rebuilding the temple; and in the second month of the return, the foundation was laid with mingled joy and grief (Ez. iii. 11–13). Speedily, however, the work was interrupted by the jealousy of the Samaritans, who continued during the reigns of Cyrus and Cambyses to misrepresent the Jews at the court of Persia. In the reign of Goïmates, the pseudo-Smerdis, they obtained a decree absolutely prohibiting the further prosecution of the work. The tide turned, however, when Darius Hystaspes came to the throne. In the second year of his reign he renewed and confirmed the original decree of Cyrus, and thenceforth there was no longer any outward difficulty in the way. But by this time (520 B.C.) a great change had occurred in the views and feelings of the people. Their zeal in divine things declined; they were engrossed in the care of their private affairs; and it needed very energetic appeals to rouse them to the toils and sacrifices required for the completion of the temple. These were furnished by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Ez. vi. 14), and were successful; so that the building was finished in the sixth year of Darius, B.C. 516. But it is not necessary to suppose that all Zechariah’s earlier prophecies were mainly directed to this end. Undoubtedly they had more or less reference to it; but they also looked farther, even to the whole character and condition of the covenant people, their dangers and discouragements, and their influence upon the future prospects of the world. So that the prophet’s historical position was simply a background for his delineation of the present and coming fortunes of the kingdom of God.

II. FORM AND STYLE. — From the earliest ages, interpreters have complained of the book as obscure and difficult,—a feature which results from the predominance of symbolical and figurative language, and occasionally from the brevity and conciseness of the expressions. But in general the style is easy and flowing. Zechariah leans much upon his predecessors prior to the captivity, and yet not unfrequently shows a marked individuality in thought and utterance. Sometimes his oracles are given in direct speech, at others in the relation of visions, and again in the description of symbolical acts. The two latter forms are not to be ascribed to his Chaldaic education, for both are found in the older prophets; e.g., Isa. vi.; Amos vii.–ix.; Hab. iii. There are some orthographic peculiarities; but in the main the Hebrew is pure, and remarkably free from Chaldaisms.

III. CONTENTS. — The first part (chaps. i.–viii.) consists of three portions, the dates of which are distinctly given. 1. (i. 1–6) A general introduction in the shape of a warning not to imitate the sins of their fathers. 2. (i. 7–vi. 15) Three months afterward, a series of visions, all given in one night, closely connected together, and exhibiting an orderly progress of thought in respect to God’s dealings with his people. These are appropriately closed by the recital of a symbolical action,—the crowning of the high priest, that is, the glory of the man whose name is Branch. 3. (vii.,viii.) Two years later, a long answer to inquiries about the need of continuing to observe fasts commemorating former calamities. The prophet rebukes the formalism of the people, and then promises which will change fasts into festivals, and even attract the heathen to their fellowship. The second part of the book, which bears no dates, is divided into two oracles by the title prefixed to chapters nine and twelve. The general theme is the future destiny of the covenant people. (a) The First Burden (ix.–xi.) outlines God’s providence toward Israel up to the appearance of the Saviour. The ninth chapter begins by recounting Alexander’s conquests, and ends with the triumph of the Maccabees, interposing in the middle a dramatic sketch of Zion’s King of peace (9, 10). The tenth chapter describes the increase of the people in means and numbers under native rulers. The eleventh, under the figure of the rejection of a good shepherd by his flock, offers a striking delineation of our Lord’s treatment by his own people. (b) The Second Burden (xii.–xiv.) carries forward the outlook upon the future, even to the time of the end. (1) The twelfth chapter, in the first nine verses, tells of Israel’s victory over trials, meaning, doubtless, the triumph of the early church over persecuting foes. (2) The remaining verses, with the first one of the following chapter, show the power of Christ’s death to awaken and renew. (3) Chap. xiii. 2–6 illustrates the fruits of repentance in the abolition of false worship and false prophecy, which stand for all forms of sin. (4) Verses 7–9 show the sword drawn against the Shepherd and his flock, or Christ smitten by his Father, and his people suffering also. (5) The last chapter seems to be a general survey of the checkered course of God’s kingdom in this world from beginning to end, concluding with a vivid picture of the universal reign of holiness.

IV. MESSIANIC PREDICTIONS. — These are six in number, and represent a gradual development. (1) In iii. 8 the lowly servant, as in Isaiah and Jeremiah, is called “Branch.” (2) In vi. 12, 13, as priest and king he builds the Lord’s spiritual temple. (3) In ix. 9, 10, he reigns as a meek and peaceful but universal monarch. (4) In xi. he appears as a suffering, rejected, betrayed, and (by implication) slain. The expressions are obscure, but the New Testament leaves no doubt of the application. (5) In xii. 10 his pierced form, seen by the eye of faith, becomes a mean of deep and general repentance, attended by pardon and conversion. (6) Finally (xiii. 7) the fellow of Jehovah, smitten by Jehovah himself, becomes the redeemer and the pattern of the flock. These predictions are more numerous and emphatic than in any of Zechariah's predecessors, save Isaiah. Their Messianic character is established both by the intrinsic evidence of the utterances themselves, and by citation or reference in the words of our Lord or his apostles.

V. The Genuineness of the Second Part.

The objection to the genuineness seems plausible at first sight, but disappear when carefully weighed; for example, Ephraim and Judah are spoken of together, as if they still existed as distinct kingdoms, which they never did after the exile. True, they are so mentioned, but only in the same way as Malachi (ii. 11) uses the name Israel, i.e., merely as designating a part of the existing population. Again: Assyria and Egypt are mentioned as formidable powers, which they were not; Persia having absorbed one, and subdued the other. The answer is, that the prophet uses these names as natural and convenient representatives of the foes existing in his day. Similar is the reply to the objection that false prophecy did not exist in the restoration, and therefore could not be rebuked by Zechariah; viz., that in accordance with prophetic usage he represents the present under the forms of the past. It is also urged that Phoenicia, Damascus, and Philistia, are set forth as foes of importance, when, after Zechariah's time, which is an insuperable difficulty to those who hold that prophecy confines itself to what immediately concerns the existing generation. But, even admitting this very doubtful postulate, what was to hinder Zechariah, or the Spirit which guided him, from upholding the small and weak restored people amid their fears of the incapacity of their neighbors, by the assurance of a very marked and specific deliverance in the distant future. Jehovah says the heavy stroke shall fall upon the sea coast, but "I will encamp about mine house." The safety of the temple amid a wide-spread overthrow in every other direction was well suited to the post-exilian period, but in no sense, and in no degree, to the earlier history. And, if any earthly event merited a place on the prophetic page, it was that rapid conquest by which Alexander changed the face of the world, and paved the way for the triumph of the gospel.

Another objection cites the threatened disrup tion of the nation (xi. 14), "I cut asunder the staff . . . that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel," as a gross anachronism. But, if this is to be taken literally, it will put the composition of the book back to a period prior to the secession of Jeroboam; which is simply absurd. The obvious sense of the passage is the disintegration of the nation, which could not be better expressed than by the use of the old, well-understood nomenclature of the days of Solomon's successor, which was the first and most serious step in the decline of the monarchy. That calamitous event was a natural figure of the bursting of the bond which united the Jews as a nation.

It is certain that there are numerous references in both parts of Zechariah to the events of the distant future. The objection, therefore, cannot be better handled than by the use of the old, well-understood nomenclature of the days of Solomon's successor, which was the first and most serious step in the decline of the monarchy.

The contrary view yields no aid toward an orderly and reasonable explanation of the successive prophetic utterances, but rather embarrasses the interpretation.

ZEDEKIAH. 2570
ZEISBERGER.

The Yalkut on Zechariah, trans. with notes and appendices, Lond., 1882. T. W. CHAMBERS

ZEDEKIAH (to whom Jehovah will be just), the last king of Judah, third son of Josiah, and uncle of Jehoahaz. His, gave him his Mattanah (gift of Jehovah). Nebuchadnezzar raised him to the throne (597 B.C.) in the room of Jehoiachin, and altered his name. The new name may have been Zedekiah's own choice, and intended to express his hope of release from the Babylonish yoke. He was twenty-one at this time, and reigned eleven years; but he did not govern, for anarchy prevailed. Instances of his weakness are his bearing towards his princes, and failure to protect Jeremiah (Jer. xxxviii. 5, 24 sq.); his belief in false prophets (Jer. xxxviii., xxxvii. 19); and the very striking incident, which sets the king in a very bad light, — that the princes and the people, after obeying the command of Jehovah to free their fellow country men and women from bondage, compelled these persons to return to slavery. He expelled the study that was sent to rainfall on the nation as punishment of this disobedience (Jer. xxxiv. 8-22). In the fourth year of his reign, Zedekiah made a journey to Babylon to pay his respects to his lord, to procure the release of the captives, a loosening of the vassal yoke, and very probably to clear himself of suspected infidelity toward the Babylonian king. By his own conduct in his ninth year, he proved how faithless he was. He rebelled, on the strength of his nation as punishment of this disobedience (Jer. xxxiv. 8-22). In the fourth year of his reign, Zedekiah made a journey to Babylon to pay his respects to his lord, to procure the release of the captives, a loosening of the vassal yoke, and very probably to clear himself of suspected infidelity toward the Babylonian king. By his own conduct in his ninth year, he proved how faithless he was. He rebelled, on the strength of his promises from Egypt (Jer.xxxvii.5 sqq.; Ezek. xvii.15 sqq.). His punishment came on apace. Zedekiah attempted flight, was easily overtaken at Jericho. His sons were killed before his eyes chained, he was carried prisoner to Babylon, where, according to tradition, he ground in a mill until he died (Jer.xxxix.). His fate was a literal fulfilment of Ezekiel's prophecy (xii.19). LEYMER.

ZEISBERGER, David, a missionary, who deserves to be called the apostle of the Western Indians of North America; b. at Zauchtenthal in Moravia, April 11, 1721; d. at Goshen, O., Nov. 17, 1808. His parents, David and Rosina Brethren, and in 1726 fled to Herrnhut in Saxony, where, according to tradition, he ground in a mill until he died (Jer.xxxix.). His fate was a literal fulfilment of Ezekiel's prophecy (xii.19).

ZEISBERGER, David, a missionary, who deserves to be called the apostle of the Western Indians of North America; b. at Zauchtenthal in Moravia, April 11, 1721; d. at Goshen, O., Nov. 17, 1808. His parents, David and Rosina Zeisberger, were descended from the Bohemian Brethren, and in 1726 fled to Herrnhut in Saxony, leaving all for the gospel's sake. Nine years later they joined a body of Moravians that emigrated to Georgia. Meanwhile young David remained at school at Herrnhut, and when he had finished his studies was sent to Herrrendorf, a settlement of the Brethren, in Holland. There he was subjected to so harsh a discipline that he ran away. He reached England in safety, and through the kind offices of Gen. Oglethorpe succeeded in joining his parents in Georgia. In 1740 the Moravians left this colony, and settled in Pennsylvania, where young Zeisberger helped to build their towns of Nazareth and Bethlehem. He took great delight in the hardy life which he was leading, and rejoiced at the thought that America was to be his home. Great, therefore, was his disappointment, when, in the beginning of 1743, he was designated as one of the escort that was to accompany Count Zinzendorf on his return to Europe. But he did not venture to protest against this decision. It was not until he was aboard the ship, which was on the point of sailing that his disappointment was known, and that he received permission to remain in the country which he loved. He hastened back to Bethlehem, and soon after was deeply convicted of sin by a hymn which treated of the love of Christ. In answer to his fervent prayers, he found peace in believing. No sooner had this change taken place than he determined to devote his life to the evangelization of the Indians. His work among them began in 1745, and was continued for sixty-two years with unflagging courage and apostolic zeal. He labored in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, and Canada, among the Iroquois, or the Six Nations, the Delawares, the Mohicans and Wampanoags, the Nanticokes, Shawnees, Chippewas, Ottawas, and Wyandots. He established in different parts of the country a body of Christian Indians. Zeisberger wrote numerous works. The following were published: A Delaware Indian and English Spelling-Book, Philadelphia, 1776; reprint 1819; A Delaware Indian Hymn-Book, Philadelphia, 1803; Delaware Indian Sermons to Children, Philadelphia, 1803; Lieberkühn's Harmony of the Four Gospels translated into Delaware Indian, Philadelphia, 1821; and a Collection of Delaware Indian Conjugations, published in Vater's Annalen, vol. vii, Leipziz, 1821. Some of his most important works remain in manuscript; for instance, A German and Onondaga Lexicon, in 7 vols.; An Onondaga Grammar; A Delaware Grammar; A German and Delaware
ZELL.

Matthäus Zell, the first Protestant pastor in Strassburg; b. at Kaysersberg, Upper Elsass, Sept. 21, 1477; d. at Strassburg, Jan. 10, 1518. He studied successively at Mainz and Erfurt; made a journey into Italy, and served a while as soldier in the imperial army; took the degree of M.A. at Freiburg in Breisgau, 1505; taught theology in that university; was chosen rector, Oct. 31, 1517; and finally was nominated, in 1518, preacher in the Cathedral of Strassburg, and pastor of the parish of St. Lawrence. Under the influence of his own study of the Bible, and the writings of Geiler and Luther, he embraced the Reformation, and commenced in 1521 his evangelistic labours by the exposition of the Epistle to the Romans. He was the first in the city to celebrate mass in the vulgar tongue, and to dispense the Eucharist under both forms. He broke with the ecclesiastical authorities in 1523, and replied to the charge of heresy by his Christliche Verantwortung, in which he eloquently pleaded the Eucharist and the Reformation. He was the first in the city to protect the Anabaptists. In his view of heartiness and Christian love he extended his charity to the Anabaptists. In 1524 he wrote in the days of Josiah, king of Judah. In the same year he married Katharina Schiitz (b. 1497; d. Sept. 5, 1502), a carpenter's daughter, who made him a faithful and intelligent companion and fellow-laborer. Along with six other married priests, he was summoned by the bishop of the city to leave the church. He took little part in theological contests. Besides his writings mentioned, he issued Ein Colation auf die Einführung M. Anthonii, 1523; Auslegung des Vater Unsers; Kurze schriftliche Erklärung für die Kinder, 1534 (designed, however, apparently rather for teachers than for children). His wife wrote Entschuldigung K. Schiitz...in für Matthes Zellen, 1534 (designed, however, apparently rather for teachers than for children). He defended the memory of her husband against Lutheran attacks, printed in Füssli's Beiträge, 1873, endeavor to decide the question in favor of the latter part of the fourth century. But Dorner, in his Entwickelungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi, places the Zenonian treatises as a transition from Tertullian and Hippolytus to Dionysius of Rome. ZEPHANIAH (he whom Jehovah protects, in LXX. Σοφοιος), one of the so-called Minor Prophets. He was a descendant of a certain "Hezekiah" (Is. 1), who may have been, but probably was not, the king of that name, since Zephaniah would in all likelihood have indicated "Hezekiah's" rank, had it been royal.

I. Outline of the Book.—1. The announcement of the near approach of judgment upon Judah (i. 2-13), with a description of the terrors of that day (i. 14-18). In this section is the suggestion of the famous hymn, Dies irae. 2. The call of the people to repentance, and the pious to constancy (ii. 1-6); for the Philistines and other nations are to be destroyed, while the remnant of Judah will return, and spoil their foes (ii. 4-15). 3. Woe over Jerusalem for its obstinacy (iii. 1-7); upon it comes judgment; then follows the conversion of the heathen, and the restoration of Israel (iii. 8-10). After the removal of the courtiers, the believing remnant will rejoice in the presence of Jehovah, and the day of suffering will be over (iii. 11-20).

II. Date.—Zephaniah himself tells us in his introductory words, in the days of Josiah, king of Judah. Confirmation of this fact is afforded (a) by a comparison of this book with Jeremiah's. It will be found that precisely the same state of things is described in both, and the expressions used are in many cases the same. Thus, both speak of idolatry alongside of Jehovah-worship (Zeph. i. 4, 8; cf. Jer. i. 2, 11, 12, 18); of wickedness permeating all classes (Zeph. i. 4, 8, 9, ii. 1, iii. 5-6; cf. Jer. ii. 8, 26, iii. 9, vi. 15, viii. 12).

Lexicon, etc. These manuscripts are preserved, partly in the library of the American Philosophical Society at Philadelphia, and partly in the library of Harvard University at Cambridge. Biographies: Hauser: D. Zeisberger, Bielefeld, 1849 (inaccurate); Fromm: Zeisberger, in Mackracken's Leaders of Our Church Universal, De Schweinitz: Life and Times of D. Zeisberger, Phila., 1870. Bishop E. De Schweinitz.
Both announce the approach of punishment (Zeph. i. 2, 3, 18; cf. Jer. iv. 4, 25, vii. 7, ix. 9, xii. 7). Both prophecies that the called executioner of this punishment will come from the north (Zeph. i. 10; cf. Jer. i. 15), and that Jerusalem, Judah, and the surrounding peoples, will fall under the avenging strokes of Jehovah (Zeph. i. 10, ii., iii. 8; cf. Jer. v. 2, 7, 9, vi. 12, x. 10, 25). (b) By the position of Zephaniah in the arrangement of the Minor Prophets. This arrangement was chronological (Batra 14 b.), and, in the case of the pre-exilian Minor Prophets, also according to subject-matter. The fact that Zephaniah is put with other prophets of Josiah's time is therefore proof that he prophesied in that reign. But there remains the settlement of the question, in what portion of this long reign of thirty-one years did he prophesy? or, what is the same thing, When were the words, "I will cut off the remnant of Baal" (i. 4) spoken? Manifestly, not before, but after his independent period. In progress to uproot the Baal-worship, all but a "remnant," and that would not be until the closing period of his reign, when the Jehovah-worship was the only one tolerated in the kingdom, i.e., after his eighteenth year. Additional proof of this is the fact, that, according to 2 Kings xxii. 29, 27, the prophetic voices announced the oncoming of the day of wrath in spite of the reform. Jehovah was probably one of those who foretold the dire event. Another expression of Zephaniah yields the same answer to the question concerning the date of his prophecy. Jehovah says through him, "I will punish the king's sons" (children) (i. 8). This prophecy was fulfilled in the subsequent history. Jehoahaz died a prisoner in Egypt (Jer. xxii. 11, 12); Jehoiakim was carried in chains to Babylon, and finally was murdered (Jer. xxii. 19; and Zedekiah died in blindness at Babylon. But since Jehoiakim was born in the sixth year of Josiah's reign, Jehoahaz in the eighth, and Zedekiah in the twelfth, it will be seen that Zephaniah's prophecy more properly dates from the close of Josiah's reign than from any earlier period.

III. CHARACTERISTICS. — Dividing the prophets into the Jeremiah and the Zephaniah kind, Zephaniah is the first of the latter. But his chief peculiarity is his employment of the words of other prophets in the expression of his own prophetical ideas. To quote a striking example (i. 7), "Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord (Hab. ii. 20); for the day of the Lord is at hand (Joel i. 15); for the Lord hath prepared a sacrifice (Isa. xxxiv. 6); he hath bid his guests" (Isa. xiii. 3). This does not detract from his independence. It only shows that, when the prophetic spirit impelled him, it brought to mind the former words; and this mingling of old phrases and new became the vehicle of new thoughts, a new body of living words. He was in a sense an epitomizer of his forerunners, even as Martin Butzer says, "If any one desires a compendium of the prophets, let him read through Zephaniah."

ZEPHYRINUS, Bishop of Rome, 189-218; the successor of Victor; occupied the chair during a dangerous period, when the Church was at once imperilled by Montanism and Monarchianism, but was himself an insignificant person, who exercised very little influence on the course of affairs. The sources of his life are EUSEBIUS: Hist. Ecc., v., vi.; and the ninth book of HIPPOLYTUS: Adv. Har. See CALIXTUS, HIPPOLYTUS, MONARCHISM, and MONARCHIANISM.

ZERUB'BABEL (begotten in Babylon), the leader of the first band of returning exiles from Babylon (Ez. ii. 2); the custodian of the sacred vessels (Ez. i. 11); the governor of Judaea (Hag. i. 1). He is called a "prince" by the Hebrews, Egyptians, (Greeks, and Romans. He was one of our Lord's ancestors (Matt. i. 12; Luke iii. 27).

ZIDON, or SJDON, the present Sidon, was situated on the Mediterranean, in lat. 33° 34' N., about twenty miles north of Tyre, and built on a low promontory, which juts out into the sea from the narrow plain at the foot of Lebanon. In ancient times it was the largest, richest, and most powerful city of the Phoenicians: hence it was known in the world's market. Christianity early gained a foothold there (Luke vi. 17; Acts xxvii. 3), and in the second century it became the seat of a bishop. During the crusades it was several times taken and fortified by the Christians, and retaken and burnt down by the Moslems. From its ruins, however, many relics, both Christian and Phoenician, of great antiquarian interest, have been dug up; the most remarkable being the marble sarcophagus of Eshmunazar, which in 1855 was brought to Paris. ZILLERTHAL, a valley of Tyrol, stretching for about twenty miles along the Ziller, between Salzburg and Innsbruck and bounded by about fifteen thousand souls; has become memorable in church history on account of the infamous manner in which the Roman-Catholic clergy succeeded in overthrowing an evangelical rising which took place there in the fourth decade of the present century. In the diocese of Salzburg it was suppressed by force in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and its last oscillations were thought to have been brought to a close through the cruel persecutions of Archbishop Firmian in 1730. Nevertheless, it reappeared in the Zillerthal, in the beginning of the present century. As soon as the Roman clergy became aware of the danger, the number of priests was doubled in the villages, and the strictest watch was kept. As admonitions and petty chicaneries proved ineffective to stop the movement, violent measures were resorted to. The Protestants were excluded from baptism, communion, marriage-consecration, burial in consecrated ground, etc. Their neighbors were warned against holding any kind of intercourse with them. Their servants were allured to desert them. Their children were forced to frequent the Roman-Catholic schools, where they were placed on separate seats as "children of the Devil," apart from the "Christian children," etc. The toleration edict of Joseph II. and the stipulations of the congress of Vienna, were thrown aside; and, instigated by the fanatical clergy, the provincial estates of Tyrol decreed that no split in the church of the country should be allowed, that those who would not conform to the Church of Rome should leave the country, etc. In this emergency the Protestants of Zillerthal addressed themselves to Friedrich Wilhelm III. of Prussia, in 1837; and a person of the Saxon cabinet, died. His mother took him to her home at Gross Hennersdorf, in Upper Lusatia. When he was four years old, she married the Prussian field-marshal, Von Natzmer, and removed to Berlin. Young Zinzendorf remained with his grandmother, the Baroness von Gersdorf. She was a distinguished representative of Pietism, and a personal friend of Spener. Her unmarried daughter, the Baroness Henrietta, belonged to the same school of thought and practice. These two godly women, with the assistance of a private tutor, educated Zinzendorf until his tenth year, and shaped his religious character. ZIRNAN, a son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv.), according to which an Arabic tribe is meant, which, according to Jer. xxxv., lived towards Persia. Grotius finds a trace in the Zamerensi, a tribe of the interior of Arabia (Pliny, vi. 92). H. wig and Lengerke propose to refer the name of Zirnran with Zimirisin Ethiopia (Pliny, xxxvi. 16). Winer (Real-Wörterbuch, i. p. 465, 3d edition) suggests the Zimara of Asia Minor or Armenia.

of young noblemen in that day. He first visited Paris. In this city he became intimate with the regent's mother; but in all places was introduced at court, where he won the special regard of the Bohemian Brethren, as published by Bishop Amos Comenius. This work made a very deep impression upon him, and he now resolved to do all in his power to bring about a resuscitation of the Moravian church. In 1740 he went to London, where he met with the opposition of the Anglican Church.

During his travels he became acquainted with many distinguished men. In obedience to their express commands, he studied law, with a view to entering the service of the State: privately, however, he devoted himself to theology. After having finished his course at the university of Utrecht, and then proceeded to Paris. In 1719 he began his travels, as was the custom of young noblemen in that day. He first visited various parts of Germany. In the picture-gallery at Dresden de Watteville, Rothe the parish minister, introduced him with this inscription, "Hoe feci pro te; quid faciis pro me?" He made a deep impression upon him, and induced him to consecrate himself anew to Christ. Continuing his journey to Holland, he spent some time at the university of Utrecht, and then proceeded to Paris. In this city he became intimate with the devout Cardinal Noailles, and formed the acquaintance of other distinguished men. He was introduced at court as the court preacher. In this capacity, he boldly confessed Christ, and kept himself unsentimentalized. After having finished his course at the university, he again yielded to the wishes of his family, declined with deep regret the position which Francke offered him at Halle, as the successor of Baron von Canstein in the Bible House, and accepted a judicial councillorship under the Saxon Government at Dresden. In the following year he purchased of his grandmother the estate of Berthelsdorf, in Upper Lusatia, and married the Countess Erdmuth Dorothy Reuss, sister of Henry XXIX., the reigning count of Reuss-Ebersdorf. When bringing his bride to his newly acquired domain, he met for the first time with the refugees from Moravia to whom he had afforded an asylum. (Vide art. Moravian Church.) He gave them a cordial welcome, but otherwise took little notice of them. Of the ancient church which they represented, he knew nothing; that he was to God's instrument in bringing about its renewal was a thought that consequently could not enter his mind. His plans were of an entirely different character. In the course of the year 1723 he formed with Frederick de Watteville, Rothe the parish minister at Berthelsdorf, and Schaefer, the pastor of the Church of the Trinity at Gürlitz, the so-called "Covenant of the Four Brethren." Its object was the spread of the religion of the crucified Saviour (Die Unioerreligion des Weltleidens) in all the world. The means to be employed in accomplishing this work were the preaching of the Word, itinerant evangelists, schools, publications, and correspondence. But, the more Zinzendorf urged this enterprise, the more evident it became that it did not constitute the mission to which he had been called of God; whereas Herrnhut, that settlement of refugees from Moravia and Bohemia which had been established on his estate, continually increased in population and importance, until it comprised a body of several hundred souls. By slow degrees Zinzendorf realized that his work lay among the Moravian Brethren. In 1727 he resigned his office at Dresden, and took up his abode at Berthelsdorf. Soon after, he met with a copy of the Ratio Disciplinae of the Bohemian Brethren, as published by Bishop his friends: the assaults of those who remained hostile made no more impression upon him, says his biographer, Bishop Spangenberg, than the waves of the sea beating upon a rock. He died in peace, on the 9th of May, 1760, at Herrnhut, honored by thousands in many parts of the world. Thirty-two presbyters and deacons, from Germany, Holland, England, Ireland, North America, Greenland, and other countries, bore his remains to their last resting-place. His tombstone describes his work in these brief words: "He was ordained to bring forth fruit, and that his fruit should remain." However great and distinguished a man he was, his hymns, of which he composed a very large number, are and will remain in universal use; for instance, Christi Blut und Gerechtigkeit ("Jesus, thy Blood and Righteousness," etc.), Jesu geh‘ vonan ("Jesus still lead on," etc.), etc. Zinzendorf has had numerous biographers. The most important are the following, Spangenberg: Leben von Zinzendorf, 1773-75, 3 vols.; Schraukenbach: Graf v. Zinzendorf, Gnadau, 1851; Verbeek: Graf v. BISHOP E. DE SCHWEINITZ.

ZION, or SI'ON (sunny), strictly speaking, the south-western hill of Jerusalem, although sometimes used as a synonyme for the entire city, and sometimes symbolically. It was bounded on the south by the Valley of Hinnom; on the west, by the "Valley of Gihon," a part of Hinnom, originally two deep valleys with precipitous sides, but now partially filled up; while on the north there was no such definite boundary, but the hill extended to the Jaffa gate. It is 2,330 feet above the Mediterranean, and 105 feet higher than Moriah, on which was the temple.

Zion is first mentioned in Josh. xv. 63 as a Jebusite stronghold. David took it, and built upon it his palace; and it was the site of his capital, the "city of David" (2 Sam. v. 7), and eventually the aristocratic portion of Jerusalem. Josephus never speaks of it as Zion, but as "the city of David," "the upper city," and "the upper market-place." Herod built a palace upon its north-west corner, which became the praetorium, the residence of the Roman procurator (Mark xv. 18). It was the last part of the city to yield to the Romans under Titus (War, VI., viii.). The name "Zion" occurs six times in the historical, and a hundred and forty-eight times in the poetical and prophetical books of the Old Testament, and seven times in the New Testament; making in all, a hundred and sixty-one times in the Bible. In the later books it is sometimes used symbolically.

The present wall around Jerusalem includes only half of Mount Zion, but the only building outside it is the tomb of David. Upon the part of the hill from Zion gate, southwards towards the Jaffa gate, are the Christian cemeteries; the other part is under cultivation (cf. Jer. xxvi. 18; Mic. iii. 12). See Jerusalem and the Bible dictionaries.

ZO'AN, the present San, the Avaris of Manetho, and the Tanis of the Greeks; a city of Lower Egypt; was situated on the eastern bank of the ancient Tanitic branch of the Nile, in latitude 31° N. It was an ancient city, built seventy years after Hebron (Num. xiii. 22), and fortified by the shepherd-kings. According to tradition, it was the place of the meeting between Moses and Pharaoh; and in "the field of Zoan" (Ps. lxxviii. 12, 43) God's wonders were wrought. The mounds and ruins which surround the present city are very extensive; and interesting discoveries have recently been made there by Brugsch-Bey.

ZOAR. one of the cities of the plain (Gen. xiii. 10); originally called Bela (Gen. xiv. 2); was spared from the destruction which overtook Sodom; and became the refuge of Lot (Gen. xix. 20–30). Its exact location has not been identified. It was included in the view Moses had from Pisgah (Deut. xxxiv. 3). The prophet's place it among the cities of Moab (Isa. xv. 5; Jer. xlvi. 34).

ZO'BA, or ZO'BAH (station), that part of Syria between the north-east of Palestine and the Euphrates; the home of a powerful people who were frequently at war with the Israelites (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. vii. 3 sqq.; x. 6 sqq.; 2 Chron. xiv. 8). The region is rich in natural resources, but is now deserted save by the wandering Bedouin.

ZOLLIKOFER, Georg Joachim, b. at St. Gall, Aug. 5, 1730; d. at Leipzig, Jan. 29, 1788. He was educated at Bremen, studied theology at Utrecht, lived from 1749 to 1753 in Francefort as tutor, and was in 1758 appointed pastor of the Reformed Congregation in Leipzig. He was considered one of the greatest preachers of his time. The collected edition of his sermons (1798–1804) comprises fifteen volumes [Eng. trans., London, 1803–12, 10 vols.]. His tombstone characterizes him very aptly by telling us that he is now "conversing in the sphere of the spirit with Socrates and Jesus." He was, however, not one of the common herd of rationalists, though he held that "conversion" was not necessary to everybody, but only improvement and progress. He also published a number of devotional books [some of which have been translated; e.g., Exercises of Piety (London, 1790) and Devotional Exercises and Prayers]. See R. Fischer: Gelehrtenkampf.

ZONARAS, Johannes, b. in the last part of the eleventh century; d. in the middle of the twelfth; was secretary to the Byzantine emperor Alexius Comnenus, but retired in 1118 to the monastery of St. Elijah in Mount Athos, and devoted himself to theological and literary studies. His Chronicle, from the creation, till the death of Alexius (edited by Hieronymus Wolf, Basel, 1557; Du Fresne, Paris, 1689; Pinder, Bonn, 1841–44, 2 vols.), is a mere compilation without interest. Of more value is his Commentary on the Synagogm of Phothis, the best edition of which appeared in Paris, 1619, together with a Latin translation. See Morteuil: Histoire du droit Byzantin, Paris, 1843, tom. iii. pp. 429–428. He also wrote scholia to the New Testament, Commentaries on the poems of Gregory Nazianzen, etc. HA. F. JACOBBON.

ZORASTER. See Parseism.

ZOSIMUS, Bishop of Rome, 437–418; the successor of Innocent I.; was a Greek by birth. He began his reign by cancelling the condemnation of Pelagius and Celestius, issued by several African synods, and confirmed by his predecessor. But when the African bishops refused to yield, and, after a new synod of Carthage, obtained a sacrum rescriptum against the Pelagians from the Emperor Honorius, Zosimus and Celestius saw fit to retract, and condemned also Pelagius in an Epistola tractatoria, or encyclical to the Eastern Churches. See Schröcker: Kirchengeschichte, Leipzig, 1782, viii. 148.

ZWICK, Johannes, b. at Constance, about 1490; d. at Bischofszell, Oct. 23, 1542. He studied theology and canon law in Constance and Basel, took his degree in Padua, and was considered a rising light in the Roman Church when he became acquainted with the writings of the Reformers; went to see Zwingli in Zürich, and inaugurated his entrance upon his first pastoral charge, Riedlingen, by marrying. In 1525 he was expelled from Riedlingen; and he then settled in his native city, where he contributed much to the establishment of the Reformation by his preaching, his disquisitions, his devotional publications, especially hymns, and his re-organization of the whole department of public edifices. His activity, however, was by no means confined to Constance, but extended to Württemberg and the whole of south-western Germany. In the union negotiations he took an active part. A collection of his letters is found in manuscript in Constance.

ZWINGLI, Huldreich, b. at Wildhaus, an Alpine village in the canton of St. Gall, Jan. 1, 1484; d. Oct. 11, 1531, on the battlefield of Kappel, whither he had accompanied the Protestant army as chaplain.

Zwingli's parents were peasants, grave and well-to-do people. One of his uncles was deacon of Wesen; another, abbot of Fischingen. As he was an uncommonly bright boy, eager to learn, and with a talent for music, he was destined for the church, and educated in the schools of Basel and Bern. In 1499 he entered the university of Vienna, where he went through the common course of philosophy, acquired the friendship of Vadian and Glarean, and made the acquaintance of Faber and Eck. In 1502 he returned to Basel, where he taught school, studied theology, lived in intimate intercourse with Leo Jud, and heard Thomas Wytttenbach. In 1506 he was ordained a priest, and appointed pastor of Glarus.

In Glarus, where he was in intimate intercourse with Erasmus, he learned Greek, an arduous task, as he had none to help him along; studied Plutarch and Plato, and especially the Bible; copied the Epistles of Paul, in order to have them always with him; read Origen, Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustine, also Wielf, Petrus Waldus, Hus, and Pecus de Miranda; and entered into correspondence with Erasmus. He became a learned man; and his scholastic pen, no less than his earnestness and energy he evinced in the discharge of his pastoral duties, and the great charm of his personal address, attracted attention. From the Pope he received through the legate, Cardinal Schinner, a pension of fifty guineas a year for the continuation of his studies. As a humanist, and a pupil of Wytttenbach, his relation to the doctrinal and disciplinary system of Rome was somewhat free; but there was nothing anti-Romanist or distinctly evangelical in his ministration. Its character was moral rather than religious, and so were his first publications; — Der Lahmkr nebisch und pahlisbisch Gesilich von einem Ochsen und etlichen Thieren, 1510, 1511. Switzerland was at that time the barracks of Europe. Tens of thousands of young men hired themselves out every year as mercenaries; and foreign powers, France, the emperor, the Pope, inundated the country with enrolling agents, and paid regular pensions to the nobility in every canton in order to control the politics of the union. The results were the gradual decay of the old, stern republican virtues, and a steadily increasing profanity and corruption. Zwingli, who, while pastor of Glarus, several times accompanied such regiments of Swiss mercenaries as their chaplain, saw the evil in all its hideousness, and attacked it with vehemence, both in the above publications and in his sermons. More especially he opposed the alliance with France; but, as the French party had the majority in the council of the canton, he was pursued with slander and chicanery to such a degree, that in 1516 he was glad to leave Glarus, and accepted the office of preacher at Einsiedeln.

Einsiedeln, in the canton of Schwyz, was the most celebrated place of pilgrimage in the country. Ilc est piena remissio omnium peccatorum ("For it is full remission of all sins") is written over its gates; and pilgrims, not only from Switzerland, but from the whole Southern Germany, flocked around its shrines. Zwingli, who knew what waste of human strength, what disturbance of human life, what suffering to the human heart, is the inevitable result of such superstition, turned away many a pilgrim by his sermons, to seek for consolation in some other way. He made no open attack; but he did not conceal, either, that he was fully aware of the horrible discrepancy between the ordinances of the Church and the ordinances of the Bible. He asked Cardinal Schinner, the papal legate Pucci, the Bishop of Constance, to employ their influence and power for the abrogation of gross misuses and the restoration of a pure preaching of God's word. In 1517 he began to discuss with his friends the possibility of abolishing the Papacy; in 1518 he drove the indulgence-seller, Samson, out of the canton by his open denunciations. The cardinal, the legate, the bishop, kept silent. They hoped to keep down the rising whirlwind by making Zwingli a titular chaplain to the Pope. But they mistook the man with the large, calm eyes, and the firmly-set mouth. In December, 1518, the canton, of especially he opposed the exclusion of all human authorities. Thus he asserted what the Church was not willing to grant,— the freedom of the pulpit; and the impression he made was very great. Distinguished persons in the city who long before had ceased to frequent the church, because they derived no good from their visits, returned, and became active and zealous members of his flock. Even the peasants of the adjacent country crowded into the cathedral when he preached on market-days; and he had a peculiar manner of gaining their confidence also, outside of the church, always succeeding, when conversing with them, in "slipping a tract into their pocket, and the devil into their heart," as one of his adversaries expresses himself. In 1521 his influence had grown so great, that he was able to prevent Zurich from joining the other cantons in their alliance with France; and his Vermahnung an die zu Schwyz was received with much respect, though it did not achieve its purpose. But this political success, or, rather, this deed of patriotism, made him more enemies than his opposition to the practices of the Church. For the first time, the name "heretic" was applied to him. He answered with a sermon on 1 Tim. ii. 1-5, the pith of which is, that "it is no sin to eat flesh on a fast-day, but it is a great sin to sell human flesh for slaughtering;" and the result of which was, that a number of his hearers, for the first time, openly broke with the established discipline of the Church. The monks, the pensioners, the French partisans, the agents of foreign enrolment, then united, and caused an interference by the Bishop of Constance. The bishop sent his vicar-general to Zurich; but, in the debate which took place before the council, the vicar-general was miserably worsted by Zwingli, who shortly after, April 18, 1522, published his first tract of decided reformatory character,— Von Erkiesen und Freyheit der Spysen. The pamphlet became the signal of battle. The ecclesiastical authorities decided that Zwingli should be put down speedily. But in July, same year, Zurich had preferred ten other pastors at Einsiedeln, and thence an address was sent to the Bishop of Constance and the magistrates of Zurich, demanding, not only the freedom of the pulpit, but also the abolition of celibacy. In August he published his Archeolog, one of his boldest and one of his most characteristic polemical writings; and in the mean time echoes began to answer from everywhere in the neighborhood,— from Vadian in St. Gall, Myconius in Lucerne, Trachslar in Schwyz, Haller in Bern, etc. The mysterious disappearance of Luther after the diet of Worms, naturally made Zwingli the centre of the whole reformatory movement; and connections were opened with Capito, Hedio, and Bucer in Strassburg, with Pirckheimer and Dürer in Nuremberg, with Nesen in Francfort, etc. Zwingli himself became so violent, that the magistrates recognized the necessity of energetic action; and, in harmony with the temper of the time, a public religious disputation was decided upon.

It was held in the city-hall of Zurich, Jan. 29, 1523. About six hundred persons were present. The Bishop of Constance was represented by his vicar-general, Faber. For the occasion, Zwingli had drawn up ten theses, in general he maintained that Christ is the only means of reconciliation with God, the only way to salvation, while the whole apparatus gotten up by the Church of Rome— papacy, mass, intercession of the saints, absolution, indulgences, etc.— is a vain thing; that Scripture is the highest, and, indeed, the only authoritative, guide, while the whole scheme laid out by the Church of Rome— priests, hood, confession, faith, pilgrimage, monasticism, etc.— is a dangerous delusion. Both the formal and the material principles of the Reformation are set forth in these theses with great completeness, and applied with merciless logic. But the most characteristic and original feature in them is the new principle which i added,—the principle of ecclesiastical polity, which has exercised so decisive an influence on the whole development and organization of the Reformed Church. The congregation, and not the hierarchy, say the theses, is the representative of the Church; and to the congregation, consequently, and not to the hierarchy, belongs the right of considering the discrepancies which may arise between the doctrine and the practice of the Church. The administration of the Church belongs, like all administration, to the State authorities,—a proposition which at once overthrows the whole fabric of the Church of Rome. But, the theses add, if the State authorities go beyond the ordinances of Christ, let them be deposed. The disputation ended with a complete victory for Zwingli: the Reformation was formally adopted for the territory of Zurich. An artfully written letter was addressed by Pope Adrian VI. to Zwingli, insinuating that omnia praeter sedem papalem ("everything but the papal chair") was within his reach; but it failed to impress him. He published an explication of his theses, Ueber Grund der Slussreden oder Artikel, and began the gradual carrying-out of the necessary reforms in practical life. In June the ten convents in the city and in the country were closed by the magistrates, without any preliminary conference with the bishop, and the nuns were sent back to their homes. In September the chapter of the cathedral was dissolved, and transformed into an educational establishment for theological students. April 2, 1524, the real but not formal marriage of Zwingli with Anna Reinhard was celebrated in the cathedral; and many of his colleagues followed his example. Meanwhile the question of the necessary reforms of the ritual began to cause considerable excitement. In September, 1523, Zwingli published his De Canone Missae epichreisis, which in August, 1524, was followed by his Antibolon adversus Erasmum. In these two pamphlets he for the first time broached his views of the Lord's Supper. In it, however, the question of the admissibility of images, which attracted, in order to calm down the public mind, and prevent excesses, a second religious disputation was held, Oct. 26, 1523. About nine hundred persons were present. Vadian presided. The conclusions arrived at were, that images are forbidden by Scripture, and that the mass is not a sacrifice. Shortly after, the images disappeared from the churches, together with the organs and reliques. A number of festivals, processions, and ceremonies, were abolished; and at Easter, 1525, the Lord's Supper was for the first time celebrated in the Reformed manner, with the white spread table instead of the altar, the laity partaking of the cup, etc. In the same year Zwingli published his Commentarius de vera et falsa religione, the most complete, though not a systematic, presentation of his views on the Reformation. Thus the Reformation had been established in Zurich through a gradual and peaceful development, without violence, almost without disturbances. Nevertheless, the situation was by no means without difficulties. First, the Anabaptists caused much embarrassment, and even some danger. They appeared at Zurich as early as 1520 (during the second disputation), represented by Grebel, Manz, and others, and demanding the formation of a holy congregation, from which all members who were not thoroughly regenerated and sanctified should be excluded. Zwingli held two conferences with them (March 20 and Nov. 30, 1525), and wrote against them, Vom Tauf, rom Wiedertauf und vom Kindertauf, May 27, 1526. But the peculiar manner in which they blended social and political radicalism with the religious enthusiasm, and their apparent connection with the peasant revolt in Germany, made more energetic measures necessary. By a decree of March 7, 1526, the magistrates put the penalty of drowning on re-baptisms. At the same time the attacks of the Roman-Catholic Church on the Reformation in Zurich became more and more vehement. They were directed through the union. At a diet of Lucerne, Jan. 26, 1524, the united canton decided to send a solemn embassy to Zurich, warning her from abandoning her old, time-honored traditions, and complaining of certain innovations already introduced. But Zurich answered (March 21), that, in matters referring to the word of God and the salvation of souls, she would brook no interference. A new embassy of July 12, same year, threatened Zurich with exclusion from the union, and she consequently immediately began to prepare for war. The invitation to the great disputation of Baden, where the Roman-Catholic Church was represented by Faber and Eck, Zwingli declined, as he knew that he could not accept it with safety. The Romanists gained a cheap victory, and the diet put Zwingli under the ban. To these difficulties was added the controversy with Luther, which finally split the whole reformatory movement into two hostile camps. It was Carlstadt's exposition of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper which occasioned Zwingli to give a full presentation of his views in the address to Alter, Nov. 16, 1524. All circumlocutions or ambiguous phrases are here avoided, and the symbolic conception of the copula of the words of institution (ex = significat) is formally adopted. In the course of the winter, Zwingli further published, Subsidium sive coronis de Eucharistia (Aug. 17, 1525), Ein klare Underrichtung vom Naehtmai Christi (Feb. 26, 1526), Amica exequas (March, 1527), Uber Doctor Martin Luthers Buch (August, 1528), all distinguished by clearness and moderation; while the rejoinders of Luther are somewhat unattractive, both in form and tone. Finally, Landgraf Philipp of Hesse succeeded in gathering together all the principal representatives of the opposing views at the Conference of Marburg, October, 1529, and for a time the controversy subsided; but it did not remain a secret to the world, that there existed a discord between the two evangelical churches as deep and as passionate as that between the evangelical and the Roman-Catholic churches. Meanwhile, the Reformation made rapid progress in Switzerland. By the conference of Jan. 4, 1538, at which Zwingli was present, the city of Bern was gained for the Reformation; and soon after, Basel, St. Gall, and Schaffhausen followed the example of Bern. But of course the progress of the Reformation carried with it a closer union of the opposite party. In November, 1526, five Roman-Catholic cantons, Freiburg i their head, concluded a separate alliance; and the following spring Archduke Ferdinand of Austria became a member of that alliance. April 21, 1529, Zürich, St. Gall, etc., formally protested against the ambition of the House of Austria and the internal politics of the union; but the answer they received was very chilling. A month later (May 29, 1529), a Protestant pastor from Zürich was seized on the public highway, carried into Schwyz, tried for heresy, and sentenced to be burned. Zurich immediately declared war, and marched her troops into position, according to a plan of operation probably drawn up by Zwingli. He stood with the bulk of the army at Kappel, and the battle was about to begin, when mediators succeeded in preventing bloodshed; and a peace was negotiated June 25, 1529. Zwingli was not satisfied with the conditions of the peace, but predicted that they would cause still graver conflicts. During the Conference of Marburg he had by Landgrave Philipp been induced to take up a plan of forming a great coalition against the ambitious schemes of the House of Austria, and preliminary negotiations were opened with Venice, France, and other countries. At the same time he labored with great enthusiasm and energy for a reconstruction of the Swiss Union. The threads of the different plans became entangled; and at one time Zwingli's position was doubtful, even in Zurich. His theocratic ideas of civil government he had carried through with great severity, and discontent with him was actually brooding in the city. His wide political plans were used against him as a weapon of attack. He understood the situation very clearly; and on June 26 he appeared before the council, and handed in his resignation. The city was taken by surprise. All opposition grew dumb, and Zwingli's power was again almost without any restrictions. But only a few more moments were left to him. A fortnight later in Roman-Catholic cantons, and the rigid system of prohibition which Zurich maintained against the advice of Zwingli, brought about the conflict. On Oct. 10, 1531, the army of the Roman-Catholic cantons stood on the frontiers of Zurich. On the following morning Zwingli accompanied the troops of Zurich. At Kappel it came to a desperate battle. The troops of Zurich were utterly routed. Among the fallen was Zwingli: bending over a dying man, to comfort him, he was hit himself with a spear. His last words were, "They can kill the body, but not the soul." Huldreich Zwingli was a well-balanced nature, wholly free from eccentricities, with a mind of large dimensions, and a character of great and noble simplicity. His will was his genius. An able scholar, with a ready perception of actual life, he saw, what most of the humanists saw, the evils of the time. But he had, what most of the humanists had not, a will to correct those evils; and with great practical tact he began with that which was most easy to handle, gradually enlarging his plans as his opportunities increased. His theology was in perfect harmony with his character. His transcendental speculation he had no thought. The metaphysical expositions of the ideas of the Holy Trinity, found in the writings of the schoolmen, he adopted in a rather mechanical manner. The doctrines of creation, angels, miracles, status integritatis, the questions of the possibility of a fall and of the propagation of hereditary sin, the ideas of the intercession and royal office of Christ, he rarely touched. He took an active interest in the political questions which had a direct and practical bearing on the relation between God and man.—the way in which God communicates himself to man, and through man to the world; the indwelling of the Spirit of God in man, and the unity thereby effected between God and man; Christ as the great example entailing responsibility on every one who looks at it; faith as an organ, not of receptivity, but of spontaneity, etc. His writings have in a literary respect no particular merit; and he himself thought, that, as soon as the Bible was studied as it ought to be studied, they would prove superfluous, and fall into oblivion. The first collected edition of them is that by Gualther, his son-in-law, Zurich, 1845: the last and most complete is that by Schuler and Schultz, Zurich, 1828-42, supplement, 1861. His correspondence with Excalamus Radius appeared in Bâle, 1536. His works have been made by Usteri and Vogelin, Zurich, 1819, 3 vols., and translations into High German by R. Christoffel, Zurich, 1843-46, 11 vols. [The following translations into English are mentioned by Lowndes: The Reckynge and Declaration of the Fayth and Beleue of Huldrique Zwingli, Zuryk, 1548 (another trans. ADAMS, Mrs. Sarah Flower, b. at Harlow, Essex, Feb. 22, 1805; d. Aug. 13, 1849; was the second daughter of Benjamin Flower, a well-known Liberal, and long editor of the Cambridge Intelligencer. In 1834 she married William Bridges Adams, an engineer and a writer of some eminence. She published Vivia Perpetua, a dramatic poem, 1841, and The Flock at the Fountain, a catechism with hymns, 1845. Her pastor in London was the able and distinguished William Johnson Fox (1787-1864), who was an Independent, and rather a deist than a Unitarian. To his remarkable Hymns and Anthems (1840-41) she contributed thirteen lyrics, among them the famous "Nearer, my God, to thee." In later years she is said to have become a Baptist. The story of her supposed residence in America, credited by Sir B. Palmer and Professor Cleveland, had no other basis than a purchase by a cousin of some land in Illinois, whereon her uncle settled in 1822. She has been confounded by Allibone and Dr. Belcher with her elder sister, Eliza Flower (b. at Cambridge, 180-; d. 1847), who sets some of Mrs. Adams's songs to music, wrote sixty-two tunes for Fox's Hymns and Anthems, and published some poems, called Adoration, Aspiration, and Belief.

ADVENTISTS, the general name of a body embracing several branches, who look for the proximate personal coming of Christ. William Miller, their founder, was a converted deist, who joined the Baptist church in Low Hampton, N.Y. He became a close student of the Bible, especially of the prophecies, and soon satisfied himself that the advent was to be personal and pre-millennial, and that it was near at hand. He began these studies in 1818, but did not enter upon the work of the ministry until 1831. The year 1843 was the date agreed upon for the advent; subsequently other dates were fixed, the failure of which divided a body of followers which had become quite numerous. In the year of his death (1849) they were estimated at 50,000. Many who had been drawn into the movement by the prevalent excitement left it, and returned to the churches from which they had withdrawn. After the second failure, Mr. Miller and some other leaders discouraged attempts to fix exact dates. On this question and the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, there have been divisions. There are now at least five distinct branches, all of which agree that the second coming of Christ is to be personal and pre-millennial, and that it is near at hand.

The oldest branch is the Evangelical Adventists. They believe in the natural immortality of the soul and in eternal future punishment. They publish a weekly paper in Boston, called Messiah's Herald. Their number has been estimated at from 5,000 to 9,000.

The most numerous branch is the Advent Christians, who are said to be upwards of 50,000 strong. They have two or three weekly papers, the chief of which is the World's Crisis of Boston. They also have a few missionary and denominational organizations. They believe that man is material, that the wicked are to be finally destroyed, and that the earth is to be made anew for the abode of the saints.

The third branch, the Seventh-Day Adventists, has a compacted organization, and has grown considerably, especially in the West. Its headquarters are at Battle Creek, Mich., where it has a health-institution, a college, a publishing-house, and other denominational enterprises. It maintains a number of missionaries abroad, and does home missionary work very systematically. It holds that it is still obligatory to observe the seventh day as the sabbath, and believes in visions as seen by Mrs. White, who has published several volumes of visions and testimonies. It numbers 16,000 or 17,000.

The Life and Advent Union, the fourth branch, believe that only the righteous dead will take part in the resurrection. They do not exceed 10,000 in number. They have a weekly paper, published in Springfield, Mass., called the Herald of Life.

The Age-to-come Adventists believe that the Jews are to be re-established in Jerusalem. A weekly paper called The Restitution, published in Plymouth, Ind., represents them. They are not numerous. All these bodies, excepting, perhaps, the Seventh-Day, are Congregational in polity. The latter has a general and annual conferences, and is, perhaps, more Presbyterian than Congregational.

The last census credits the Adventists with a total of 90,079 members, including 749 ordained ministers, and with 1,282 churches.

There is no wholly trustworthy literature. History of the Advent Message, by I. D. Wellcome, Yarmouth, Me., 1874, is the fullest general his-
ory. The Seventh-Day Adventists publish a brief historical sketch of their own branch, with a statement of belief. The literature on the annihilation controversy is abundant. H. K. CARROLL.

ADVOWSON is the right of presentation to a church or ecclesiastical benefice. It is synonymous with patronage, but more often is appendant (annexed to the possession of the manor), in gross (by legal conveyance separated from such possession), prestantive (where the patron has absolute right of presentation), collative (where the bishop is also the patron), donative (where the patron puts the clergyman in possession by a simple written donation). See Dictionary of the English Church, Ancient and Modern, London and New York, 1881, n.s.

ALLATIUS, Leo (Leone Allacci), b. of Greek Catholic parents on the Island of Chios, 1586; d. in Rome, Jan. 19, 1669. He early manifested aptitude for learning, became a Roman Catholic, entered the Greek college at Rome (1600), and was graduated as doctor of theology and philosophy. For the next three years he taught in the established Greek college of Anglona, then became vicar-general of the Latin bishop of Chios, returned to Rome, took the degree of doctor of medicine (1619), became assistant in the Vatican Library, and professor of rhetoric in the Greek college; which latter position he resigned a few years afterwards. In 1622 Pope Gregory XV. sent him to Heidelberg to superintend the removal to Rome of the Palatinate library, which the Emperor Maximilian had given to the Pope. This he accomplished (arriving at Rome Aug. 5, 1623), beset as he was with many difficulties; but Gregory XV.'s death (July 8, 1623) prevented his being rewarded for his valuable services, since the new pope, Urban VIII., did not like him. By the influence and assistance of friends—Cardinal Barberini made him his librarian—he was able, however, to continue his work in the Vatican Library and upon his private studies. In 1661 Alexander VII. appointed him custodian of the Vatican. His services to Greek learning, secular and patristic, are inestimable. There is scarcely an author among the Greek Fathers concerning whom he did not do some pioneer work, but his judgment by no means equalled his learning. One of the interests which lay near his heart was the union between the Greek and Latin churches, and his great learning was freely displayed to prove the insignificance of the separating causes.

His principal writings upon this subject are De ecclesia occidentalis et orientalis perpetua consensione, Cologne, 1618; De urbeque ecclesia in legate de purgatorio consensione, Rome, 1635; De symbolo Athanasii, 1638; Vindicta Synodi Ephesini et S. Cyrilli de processione Spiritu Sancto ex Patre et Fili, 1681. He also wrote upon Iohanna Papius (1630), Grece orthodoxa (1652, 1659, 2 vols.), and innumerable topics connected with church history, philosophy, literary criticism, etc. His correspondence and his literary remains are found in the library of the Oratorians in Rome.

ALLEINE, Joseph, Nonconformist; b. at Devizes, 1634; d. Nov. 17, 1688. He was educated at Oxford, and took the degree of B.D. July 6, 1658; became chaplain to his college (Corpus Christi); resigned in 1655, to become assistant minister in Taunton. On Aug. 24, 1662, he was rejected from his benefice because there were open questions, however, he ever had opportunity. In consequence, he was imprisoned; released May 26, 1664; again imprisoned, within a year, as violator of the Five-Mile Act, and again released. His last few years were troubled by constant danger of arrest for preaching. Before his ejection he had proved himself a model pastor. He had also remarkable learning. He associated as an equal with the fellows of the Royal Society, and armed himself with scientific study and research. It is, however, as the author of An Alarm to Unconverted Sinners, that he is now remembered. This little book appeared in 1672, and has been ever since a religious classic. It is the fruit of a consecrated life. In 1675 its title was changed to A Sure Guide to Heaven. He wrote also an Explanation of the Aposle's Creed (1656), and other works. See his Life by Baxter (London, 1672) and by Charles Stanford (1861).

ALLEN, James, b. at Gayle, Yorkshire, June 24, 1734; d. there Oct. 31, 1804; was one of the Inghamite preachers from 1752 to 1781, then associated with Glas and Sandeman, and during his later years ministered at a chapel which he built on his own estate. He edited the Synod Book 1737, and, with W. and C. Batty, wrote most of its contents. One or two of his hymns are still used.

ANAN THE KARAITE. See KARAITES.

ANDREW, one of the twelve apostles, brother of Peter, like him born in Bethsaida (John i. 41, 45), and a member of Peter's family in Capernaum (Mark i. 21, 29). His name, although Greek, was common among Jews (Dio Cassius, 68, 32). According to John (i. 35 sqq.), Andrew was the first one to follow Jesus in consequence of the Baptist's testimony, and the one to introduce Peter to Jesus. In Jesus' later Galilean choice of disciples, the two brothers were the first called to the apostleship (Matt. iv. 18 sqq.; Mark i. 16 sqq.). It is not, therefore, without good grounds that the Greeks give to Andrew the epithet euboulados. The Gospels evidence, that next to Peter, James, and John, Andrew with Philip occupied a prominent place among the twelve (Mark iii. 18, xili. 8; John vi. 7, xii. 22; Acts i. 13). Yet in the Acts he is, like almost all the other apostles, barely mentioned. The apocryphal Acts of Andrew (Tischendorf: Acta apocr., pp. 105 sqq.), which is distinguished from the other apocryphal Acts by its relatively earlier date (Tischendorf, pp. xii. sqq.), relate that he labored in Greece, but Eusebius (H. E., III. 1) says in Scythia. According to tradition he was crucified on Nov. 30, at Patra in Achaia, by the proconsul Egeas, and upon a Cruz decussata (X), hence called a "St. Andrew's cross." See, on the traditional Andrew, FABRICIUS: Codex Apocr., pp. 456; [LIPSIUS: Apok. Apostelgesch., i. pp. 54-622]; [EARMERH].

ANSTICE, Joseph, b. at Madeley Wood, Shropshire, 1808; d. at Torquay, Feb. 29, 1836; was educated at Westminster and Oxford, where he graduated with great distinction, and when only twenty-two became professor of classical literature. He wrote some prize essays, poems, etc., and translated Selections from the Greek Dramatic Writers, 1832. His fifty-four Hymns appeared posthumously in 1836; and twenty-seven of them were incorporated in Mrs. Yonge's Child's Christian Year, 1841. Several of them are much used.

ANTI-MISSION BAPTISTS (Primitive or Old-School Baptists) agree with the regular Baptists, except in their organization into Sunday schools, and similar church enterprises. The Chemung Association (New York and Pennsylvania) in September, 1835, withdrew fellowship with those associations which countenanced such enterprises; in May, 1836, the Baltimore Association did the same; and similar divisions ran through other churches and associations, mostly in the South and West. In 1834 The Baptist Almanac reported 184 Anti-Mission Baptist Associations, 1,622 churches, 900 ministers, 61,162 members; in 1883 The Baptist Year-Book gives these Baptists 900 churches, the same; and similar divisions ran through other associations. The Baptist Almanac (New York and Pennsylvania) of 1844 reported 184 Anti-Mission associations, 900 churches, 900 ministers, 61,162 members; in 1883 The Baptist Year-Book gives these Baptists 900 churches, 40,000 members; in May, 1836, the Baltimore Association did the same; and similar divisions ran through other churches and associations, mostly in the South and West. After the Anti-Mission Baptist Associations, 1,622 churches, 900 ministers, 61,162 members; in 1883 The Baptist Year-Book gives these Baptists 900 churches, 40,000 members; but the figures are doubtless too high. See Baptist Encyclopedia, pp. 77 sq.

ATWATER, Lyman Hotchkiss, D.D., LL.D., b. at Hadam, Conn., Feb. 23, 1813; d. at Princeton, N.J., Feb. 17, 1888. He was graduated at Yale College, 1831; was a tutor and theological student at Yale, 1832-36; pastor of the First Congregational Church in Fairfield, Conn., 1833-34; and from 1834 till his death a professor in the college at Princeton, N.J., at first of mental and moral philosophy, afterwards of logic and moral and political science. His numerous contributions to the Princeton Review, of which he became an editor in 1839, and to other periodicals, were of marked ability, and gave him a high place among American theologians. In 1867 he published A Manual of Logic, Philadelphia.

AUBER, Harriet, b. in London, Oct. 4, 1773; d. at Hoddesdon, Herts, Jan. 20, 1862; lived in retirement at Broxbourne and Hoddesdon, and studied at Cambridge, but became a Roman Catholic. He is credited with The Christian Moderator, 1829. With the similar works of Montgomery (1822) and H. F. Lyte (1834) it is sometimes ascribed to him. Notwithstanding these practical employments, he produced a vast amount of verse, though wisely dissuaded by Byron and Lamb from trusting wholly to authorship. He published Metrical Epistles, 1812; Poems, 1820; Napoleon, 1822; Poetic Vigilia, 1824; Devotional Verses, 1827; Household Verses, 1845; and others. His muse, if not wise, strong or striking, is pleasing, pure, and pious. One or two of his pieces have been used as hymns, and many of them are found in the collections of sacred poetry. His Memoirs and Letters were edited by his daughter.

BATHURST, William Hiley, b. at Cleve Dale, near Bristol, Aug. 28, 1796; d. at Sydney Park, Gloucestershire, 1877; was educated at Winchester and Oxford, and in 1890 became rector of Barwick-in-Elmet, Yorkshire. This living he resigned, 1852, and retired to Darleydale, Derbyshire, removing in 1863 to his inherited estate of Sydney Park. He published An Essay on the Limits of Human Knowledge, 1827; Merit and Punishment, 1834; The Geometrician, 1849; and Psalms and Hymns, 1831, 2d ed., 1842. Of his two hundred and six hymns many have been used in England, and a few are well known in America, especially "Oh for a faith that will not shrink!"

BAUER, Bruno, b. at Eisenberg, Saxony, Sept. 9, 1809; d. near Berlin, April 13, 1882. He was educated at Berlin; became a licentiate of theology there in 1834, privatdocent at Bonn in 1839, and extraordinary professor there in 1839. In 1842 he was deposed. From belonging to the right of the Hegelian school, he turned in 1839 to the left. He then went to Berlin, and sent forth book after book full of the wildest speculation, although full of learning. He outdid the Tübingen school in that he gave up all the Pauline Epistles. He outdid Strauss in that he traced Christianity to the conscience of Roman imperial times, sown with the seeds of stoical and Alexandrine philosophy, indeed, made Seneca the real founder of Christianity. He appears to have been of unsound mind. Of his numerous writings may be mentioned Kritik der evangeof Watts, with no taint of Wesleyanism and probably, next to Doddridge and Steele. James having been included in Rippon's Selection, 1787- estimate of his verses, finding them "very agreeable as well as impressive, being, for the most part, brief and fitting," and crediting them with "the terseness and simplicity of the Greek epigram." Other critics have hardly confirmed this judgment, but the lyrics have a modest usefulness yet.

Beaumont, Joseph, D.D., b. at Hadleigh in Suffolk, March 13, 1615; d. at Cambridge, Nov. 23, 1699; was educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and became a fellow and tutor there, but was ejected by the Puritans in 1644. At the Restoration he became a king's chaplain and D.D.; made a journey to the court, and of Peterhouse, 1693; rector of Eversham near Cambridge, 1683, and of Barley in Hertfordshire, 1684; and professor of divinity, 1670. In 1685 he had a controversy with Henry More, and received the thanks of the university for it. His Psyche, or Love's Mystery, the longest English poem, was begun in April, 1647, finished the following March, and published in folio, 1648. The second edition (1652) has 38 ballads, with some of his shorter poems in the noblest style of that heroic age. If Beaumont had not the pathos of Herold, he sometimes approaches the bluntness of Wither, the wit of Quarles, and the sublimity of Waverley.

Beddome, Benjamin, b. at Henley-in-Arden, Warwickshire, Jan. 23, 1717; d. at Bourton, Gloucestershire, Sept. 3, 1795; spent his early years at Bristol and in London, and from 1734 was Baptist pastor at Bourton-on-the-water. Modest and unambitious, he declined a London charge, and left his writings, except an Exposition of the Baptist Catechism (1752), to be published by others. Twenty of his sermons appeared 1805, and sixty-seven, with a memoir, in 1835, forty years after his death. His eight hundred and thirty Hymns were gathered 1818; some sixty-four of them held place still. Among his hymnists of the old sober school—i.e., followers of Watts, with no taint of Wesleyanism and trochaic metres—Beddome stands high, ranking, probably, next to Doddridge and Stowes. James Montgomery, in the Introduction to his Christian Psalmist (1825), gave a somewhat exaggerated estimate of his verses, finding them "very agreeable as well as impressive, being, for the most part, brief and fitting," and crediting them with "the terseness and simplicity of the Greek epigram." Other critics have hardly confirmed this judgment, but the lyrics have a modest usefulness yet.

Begg, James, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Free Church of Scotland; was b. at New Monkland, near Airdrie, in Lanarkshire, where his father was parish minister, in 1806. He having been licensed in 1829, he was ordained to the ministry at Maxwelltown, Dumfries, in May, 1830, and from the first was a powerful and popular preacher. From Maxwelltown he was trans-
Dr. Begg was a great pamphleteer, and was fond of writing in newspapers and magazines. He was for a long time editor of the Bulwark, a journal devoted to the maintenance of Protestantism. The Watchword was this: in order for the union with the United Presbyterians more recently the Signal was started, to oppose instrumental music in worship. Among his larger publications were A Handbook of Popery; Free-Church Principles; Happy Homes, and how to get them. In figure, Dr. Begg was tall and massive, with a handsome and expressive countenance. His bonhomie, frankness, and good-nature made him popular with both friends and foes; while at the same time it was apparent that he wanted certain qualities needful to one who would successfully lead a large body of earnest, spiritual men.

BELLows, Henry Whitney, D.D., prominent Unitarian clergyman; b. in Walpole, N.H., June 10, 1814; d. in New York, Monday, Jan. 30, 1882. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1832, and at the Divinity School, 1837; was called to the First Congregational (Unitarian) Society, subsequently known as All Souls' Unitarian Church, New York, 1838, and remained their pastor till his death. He was faithful, energetic, zealous, and at times eloquent. An indefatigable worker and a man of broad sympathies, he connected himself prominently with all the best movements of art, literature, history, education, and philanthropy in the city. By his connection with the United-States Sanitary Commission (1861-66) during the American civil war, of which he was one of the organizers, president, and tireless advocate, he achieved a national reputation, and endeared himself to innumerable households.

In 1867, on a visit to Europe, he promoted the organization there of International Sanitary Commissions, which have proved of great benefit in subsequent wars. Of his books may be mentioned Restatements of Christian Doctrine, Boston, 1859 (new ed., 1870), and Old World in its New Face: Impressions of Europe in 1867-68, New York, 1868.

BERRIDGE, John, b. at Kingston, Nottinghamshire, February, 1716; d. at Everton, Jan. 22, 1793; was long famous for evangelical zeal and eccentric humor. The son of a farmer, he was educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. In his own words, he "remained ignorant of [his] fallen state till 1730, lived proudly on faith and works for salvation till 1754, fled to Jesus for refuge 1755." He became curate of Stapleford, 1749, and vicar of Everton, 1755. He was one of the few beneficed clergymen who co-operated actively with Wesley, Whitefield, and Lady Huntingdon. He published The Christian World Unmasked, 1773, and 342 Sion's Songs, 1785. A previous Collection of Divine Songs, 1780, he carefully recalled and burned. The same fate might well have befallen some of those which retained his approval, so coarse and extravagant is their imagery: but two or three of them are still valued and used.

BIBLE CHRISTIANS. This denomination originated in the west of England in 1815, under the ministry of W. O'Bryan, who had been a member and "local preacher" with the Wesleyan Methodists, and had subsequently for a while labored independently. On New-Year's Day, 1816, the first quarterly meeting was held, and the number of members was 237. It was soon found necessary, for carrying on the good work which had extended through Devon and Cornwall, that other laborers should be associated with W. O'Bryan; and these were supplied from among the young converts, James Thorne being the first. Preaching and other religious services were chiefly conducted in dwelling-houses, hired rooms, and the open air. The preachers had their food and entertainment among the friends where they labored, and a small salary was allowed them to meet other necessities. Mr. O'Bryan and his co-laborers expressed themselves strongly against ministerial titles, believing that ministers calling themselves "Reverend" was contrary to the teachings of Christ and the practice of the primitive church; but gradually this scruple has passed away, and the use of the title almost universally obtains. In about two years from the formation of the first society, there were 6 itinerant preachers, 4 helpers, and 1132 members of society. In the summer of 1819 the first conference was held at Launceston in Cornwall. There were then 16 men and 14 women itinerant preachers, as reported in the minutes of conference. The denomination from the first favored female preaching, though it did not consider it their place and work to take part in church government. And, if great success in winning souls is a proof of divine sanction, then was the approbation of God manifested in connection with the labors of these pious sisters; and though every brother could not be said to be without fault, yet of these devout sisters it may be said, not one of them disgraced her sex or the cause of Christ. After some years, however, from various causes, instead of increasing, the number of female preachers grew less; so that, at the conference of 1829, though a few females still acted as local preachers, not one remained on the list of itinerant preachers in the conferences of England and the colonies. The Tenth Annual Conference (1829) reports a membership of 7,845, with 59 male and 22 female itinerant preachers. In 1836 the itinerant men preachers had increased to 84, while the itinerant females were reduced to 11. The membership had risen to 8,968. For some years the conference consisted of preachers only; and, by the consent of all, Mr. O'Bryan presided at these assemblies, and, without being appointed to any one circuit in particular, had the superintendence of the whole work. Ultimately lay-delegates were admitted to the conference; and, as some of Mr. O'Bryan's doings did not give general satisfaction, it was thought by other members of the conference, that, though they were willing he should still preside at their annual assemblies, yet some restraint ought to be laid on the power of government which he claimed. This was so contrary to Mr. O'Bryan's principles, and caused such unpleasantness between him and the preachers and lay-delegates, as led, after two or three years, to a rupture between them. At the conference of 1829 Mr. O'Bryan, not being able to outrace the other members, declared himself incorporated, and left. Few, if any, of the members of conference left with Mr. O'Bryan: the rest remained, and carried on the business. Some of the members of society, and two or three preachers, held with Mr.
O'Bryan and some others he called out as preachers to assist him. Each party claimed the right of property, and an unhappy conflict and rivalry continued for about two years. God, however, with a view to the welfare of the work, was pleased to lead Mr. O'Bryan to a better mode of procedure. He first, did not prosper him in this movement. Ultimately a reconciliation took place. The members and most of the preachers, in connection with Mr. O'Bryan, returned to the other party; and Mr. O'Bryan left England for America, and settled in New York, where he died Jan. 8, 1883. He never became nominally united to the Bible Christians after he left; but a friendly intercourse was kept up, and Mr. O'Bryan paid more than one visit to his friends in England. He also once visited the Bible Christians in Canada, and after the re-union he received a liberal annuity from the English conference till his death. His error was one of judgment rather than of principle, for he still lived as an exemplary Christian till his earthly course terminated. Before the separation from Mr. O'Bryan, the work had extended from Devon and Cornwall to the Scilly Islands, the Normandy Isles, Somerset, Wales, Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, London, Kent, and Sussex. In 1831 missionaries were sent to Canada and Prince Edward Island, and subsequently to the United States, Australia, Melbourne, New Zealand, and Queensland. In 1885 the jubilee of the denomination was held, and a jubilee volume published at the book-room, 26 Paternoster Row, London, Eng. Before this, in 1854, the American work was organized into a separate conference; and the same privilege was subsequently granted to South Australia. In 1882, under the government of the Canadian conference, there were ten districts,—one in Prince Edward Island, six in Ontario, one in Manitoba, and two in the United States, one of which is in the State of Ohio, and the other in Wisconsin. On these stations there were 81 itinerant preachers and 7,531 members. The Australian conference has 31 ministers and 2,306 members. Victoria, New Zealand, and Queensland are not as yet invested with conferential powers. The entire denomination as reported in 1882 had a membership of over 34,000, with 299 ministers. The denomination has a good school, or college as it is now called, situated at Shebbear, in the County of Devon, Eng. It has three publishing-houses, one at 26 Paternoster Row, London, Eng., another in Bowmanville, Ontario, Can., and the third in Adelaide, South Australia. In doctrine the Bible Christian Church is Methodist, according to the recognized standards; and their polity is liberal, admitting to all their church courts the laity as well as ministers. The name "Bible Christian" was not assumed in disrespect to other Christian bodies, as though they were unworthy of the appellation; but having been first given them because the preachers made so much use of the Bible in their sermons, family visits, and their closets, they adopted it, as they desired that both their faith and practice should be in harmony with divine revelation as contained in the Bible, and they did not wish to be called after any mere name.

With the small sect bearing the same name in the Eastern States of America this denomination has no connection.

in Spanish; and as a fruit the Methodist-Episcopal mission in Mexico is almost exclusively manned by former members of these classes. Large numbers of graduates have also gone to other missions throughout the world. Six years ago, when Washington he was given before the school by President McCosh, ex-Presidents Hopkins and Woolsey, Presidents Martin B. Anderson and E. G. Robinson, and a great number of other foremost divines and scholars of the country.

At the present time (1883-84) the governing faculty is as follows: William F. Warren, president, professor of comparative theology and of the history and philosophy of religion; James E. Latimer, dean, professor of systematic theology; John W. Lindsay, professor of exegetical theology and New Testament Greek; Luther T. Townsend, Harris professor of practical theology; Henry C. Sheldon, professor of historical theology; Samuel S. Curry, professor of sacred oratory; Hinckley G. Mitchell, instructor in Hebrew and Old Testament.

BOWDLER, John, jun., b. in London, Feb. 4, 1783; d. there Feb. 1, 1815; was a young lawyer of talent and high character, whose promising career was cut short by consumption. He studied at Sevenoaks and Winchester; was articled to a solicitor, 1800; admitted to the bar, 1807, and travelled abroad 1810-12, in a vain search for health. His Select Pieces in Verse and Prose, issued 1816 by his father, in two vols. 8vo, contain a few hymns of unusual elegance.

BROWN, Matthew, D.D., LL.D., b. in Northumberland County, Penn., Jan. 29, 1838. He was graduated at Dickinson College, 1854; pastor at Mifflin; called to Washington, Penn., as first pastor of the church, and principal of the academy, Oct. 16, 1865. In 1866 a charter was obtained, and Washington College began, Dr. Brown president. Success here in all functions pronounced. Reserved presidency in 1816, continued passive until 1822 then called to Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Penn. Here ability, energy, teaching faculty, and marvellous personal influence, with experience and growing popular power, told in the rapid development of the institution. In twenty-three years the graduates numbered seven hundred and seventy-two. "Nearly one-half entered the ministry, and not a few went as foreign missionaries" (Brown-ann). Six years after leaving Washington he was invited to resume his place there as pastor and president, but declined. Yet at his death he was, according to his own request, buried there.

BROWN, Phoebe (Hinsdale), b. at Canaan, N.Y., May 1, 1783; d. at Ellington, Conn.; there, in August, 1818, her famous "I love to steal a while away" was written, under circumstances, probably, the most pathetic that Simon Grundy ever met. It was altered and abridged by Nettleton, or some one else, and appeared, with two more by her, in Village Hymns, 1824. She contributed other hymns, some of them still popular, to later collections, and wrote sundry newspaper articles, tracts, and a volume of tales, The Tree and its Fruits, N.Y., 1836. After living some thirty years at Monson, Mass., her last years were spent with a daughter in Illinois. Her autobiography was "written at the urgent request of her children, at Chicago, in 1849." and, with her poetical manuscripts, is preserved by the family of her son, Dr. S. R. Brown, the first American missionary to Japan, who was not alone in reverently cherishing her memory. (See New-York Independent for Jan. 6, Jan. 29, and April 14, 1881.) "My history," she wrote, "is soon told, a sinner saved by grace and sanctified by trials."

BROWNE, George, the first Protestant archbishop of Dublin; d. about 1556. He was graduated at Oxford, and was an Augustinian friar when he embraced the Reformation. On March 19, 1535, he was consecrated archbishop of Dublin. In consequence of his reformatory labors he was deposed by Queen Mary.

BROWNE, Peter, in Ireland about 1860; educated at Trinity College, Dublin; consecrated bishop of Cork and Ross, 1710; d. 1735. His principal works are The procedure, extent, and limits of human understanding, 1728, 2d ed., 1729 (an able critique of Locke's Essay); Things divine and supernatural conceived by analogy with things natural and human, 1735 (asserts that God's essence and attributes can only be expressed analogically).

BROWNE, Samuel, b. at Hatherleigh, Devonshire, about 1630; d. 1732; was Independent pastor at Portsmouth, and from 1716 at Old Jewry, London. This charge he gave up in 1723, when laboring under a singular mania,—a case long cited in books of mental philosophy. In that year, grief for the deaths of his wife and son, and of a highwayman whom he had killed unintentionally and in self-defence, unhinged his mind, though only in a manner. He maintained that God had "annihilated in him the thinking substance, and utterly divested him of consciousness," and replied to a friend who inquired his learned and laborious occupations, "I am doing nothing that requires a reasonable soul; I am making a dictionary.” Yet, as Toplady said, “instead of having no soul, he wrote and reasoned and prayed as if he had two.” His publications numbered twenty-three, including A Dissertation on the Trinity and a defence of Christianity against Woolston, etc. Prior to his misfortune had appeared Sermons, 1722, and two earlier treatises, besides two hundred and sixty-six Hymns and Spiritual Songs, 1720. This last is an important volume, and places him high in the school of Watts, whom he was the first to follow in order of time. His hymns, if not eminently poetical, are unusually solid: their strongly ethical character has caused many of them to be long and largely used by Unitarians, though Browne himself was rigidly Orthodox; and a few of them are still general favorites, as eminently, “Come, gracious Spirit.”

BRUCE, Michael, b. at Kinnesswood, Kinross-shire, March 27, 1746; d. there July 5, 1767: is the hero of one of the most pathetic chapters in literary history. The son of a poor weaver, he was not meant for the ministry, and managed to study at Edinburgh; but severe labors and privations cut short his promising career. His parents intrusted his poetical manuscripts to his friend Logan, who published a few of them in 1770, and in 1781 printed nine hymns and the famous Ode to the Cuckoo as his own. The Rev. A. B. Grose, in The Works of Michael Bruce, with Memoir, and Notes, 1865, has done justice to his memory, and exposed Logan’s villany. Several of Bruce’s lyrics were admitted among the Scotch Paraphrases, 1781, of which they are the chief ornament.

BRYANT, William Cullen, b. at Cumington, Mass., Nov. 3, 1794; d. in New York, June 12, 1878; entered Williams College, 1810; began to study law, 1812; admitted to the bar, 1815, and practised at Plainfield and Great Barrington; removed to New York, 1825, and became connected with the Evening Post, 1828. His long, honorable, and successful career is known to every reader. His poetry, which he began to write at the age of ten, and to publish in 1821, though never extensively practised at Plainfield and Great Barrington; removed to New York, 1825, and became connected with the Evening Post, 1828. BULFINCH, Stephen Greenleaf, D.D., b. in Boston, June 18, 1809; d. at East Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 12, 1870; graduated at Columbia College, Washington, D.C., 1827, and at the Cambridge Theological School, 1830; Unitarian minister at Charleston, S.C. (1831), Pittsburgh (1837), Washington (1838), Nashua, N.H. (1846) and Dorchester (1852), East Cambridge (1865). Besides sundry prose-works, he published Contemplations of the Saviour, 1832; Poems, Charleston, 1834; Lays of the Gospel, 1845; Harp and Cross (a selection), 1857. His hymns pass into all hymn-books. Some of them have been widely used.

BURDER, George, b. at Kersall, near Manchester, 1691; d. there Sept. 28, 1763; entered Trinity College, Cambridge, 1708, and became a fellow of it, 1714; contributed to the Spectator: invented a system of shorthand, and taught it with much success; became F.R.S., 1724; succeeded to the family estate at Kersall, and spent his later years there in peace and honor. Though a disciple of Jacob Browmen and other mystics, he was a man of great acuteness and equanimity, and combined ardent piety with views then novel. His Poems, written in easy, colloquial style, for his own and his friends’ amusement, were printed posthumously in 1773 and 1814, and his Literary Remains in 1867. He wrote some of the best epigrams in the language, and a Christmas-hymn which is in almost universal use.

BULFINCH, Stephen Greenleaf, D.D., b. in Boston, June 18, 1809; d. at East Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 12, 1870; graduated at Columbia College, Washington, D.C., 1827, and at the Cambridge Theological School, 1830; Unitarian minister at Charleston, S.C. (1831), Pittsburgh (1837), Washington (1838), Nashua, N.H. (1846) and Dorchester (1852), East Cambridge (1865). Besides sundry prose-works, he published Contemplations of the Saviour, 1832; Poems, Charleston, 1834; Lays of the Gospel, 1845; Harp and Cross (a selection), 1857. His hymns possess considerable merit, and have been rather extensively used.

BURNHAM, Richard, b. 1749; d. in London, Oct. 30, 1810; was a Baptist minister, and wrote some three hundred and twenty hymns, which appeared 1786 and 1796. They are of low order, but have been used in certain quarters.

CARLYLE, Joseph Dacre, b. at Carlisle, June 4, 1758; d. at Newcastle, April 12, 1804; was professor of Arabic at Cambridge, 1794, and, later, chancellor of Carlisle, and vicar of Newcastle-on-Tyne. He published Specimens of Arabic Poetry, 1796, etc. His Poems appeared in quarto, 1806, including a hymn now in nearly universal use.

CARY, the name of two sisters, Alice (b. near Cincinnati, O., April 26, 1829; d. in New York City, Feb. 12, 1871) and Phoebe (b. Sept. 4, 1824; d. at Newport, R.I., July 31, 1871). They were joint workers in literature, and published a volume of poems in 1850. In 1852 they came to New York City, and supported themselves by literary work. Their poems and prose-works are much admired. Phoebe Cary’s “One sweetly solemn thought,” written when but seventeen years old, has passed into all hymn-books. Her Poems of Faith, Hope, and Love (1868) sold widely. See M. C. Ames: Alice and Phoebe Cary, N.Y., 1871.

CASWALL, Edward, b. July 15, 1814, at Yate-ly in Hampshire; d. Jan. 2, 1878; was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford; ordained deacon 1838, and priest 1839; perpetual curate of Stratford-sub-Castle, near Salisbury, 1840. In 1846 he resigned this charge, and in January, 1847, exchanged the Church of England for that of Rome. His wife dying in 1849, he entered Dr. J. H. Newman’s Congregation of the Oratory in Birmington, March 29, 1850. He has published
The Child’s Manual, 1844; Sermons on the Seen and Unseen, 1845; Devotions for Confession, 1849; Verba Verbi, 1855; Confirmandy Manual, 1861, etc. To hymnody his services have been illustrious. His Lyra Catholica (1848) is one of the most important volumes of translations from the Latin, and has been more or less extensively drawn upon by nearly every subsequent collection. These renderings are usually simple and unpretentious, aiming chiefly at fidelity and usefulness. His talent had freer range in Poems (1858) and A May Pageant, etc.
(1866): these are sometimes marked by delicacy of thought, beauty of expression, and fervency of devotional feeling. With Palmer, Newman, and Bridges, Caswall leads the roll of Roman-Catholic poets of our time and tongue, all of them bred in the English Church; and among our hymnists of the last forty years, he, if judged by translations and originals together, may probably stand next to Dr. Neale. An apparently complete edition of his Hymns and Poems, Original and Translations, appeared 1873.

CAWOOD, John, b. at Matlock, Derbyshire, March 18, 1775; d. Nov. 7, 1852; was the son of a farmer; educated at Oxford; ordained 1801; curated at Ribbesford and Dowlow; in 1814 became perpetual curate of Bewdley, Worcestershire. He published The Church and Disent, 1831, and two volumes of Sermons, 1842. Cotterill’s Selection, 1819, included nine hymns of his, two or more of which have been much used.

CENNICK, John, b. at Reading, Berkshire,
Dec. 12, 1718 (?); d. in London, July 4, 1755;
was teacher of Wesley’s school at Kingswood, but joined Whitefield 1741, and the Moravians 1745.
He published an autobiography, 1745; some tracts and sermons; Sacred Hymns for the Children of God in the Days of their Pilgrimage, 1741-42, 2 vols.; Sacred Hymns for the Use of Religious Societies, 1743-44, 3 pts.; and Hymns for Children, 1754.
The last is not now known to exist: the others are scarce and remarkable volumes. Cen-nick’s talents were better than his education, and his piety in advance of both. His Muse had the Wesleyan fire without the Wesleyan elegance, but with a passionate simplicity of her own. His first book of verse was corrected, and the contents of all were more or less suggested and inspired, by G. Wesley; but he had something of his own.
His hymns, extensively used during the last century, have, with a few exceptions, been condemned by the colder taste of our age; but they are vivid renderings and originals together, may probably stand next to Dr. Neale. An apparently complete edition of his Hymns and Poems, Original and Translations, appeared 1873.

CHRISTADELPHIANS, a small sect originating in this country half a century ago. They call themselves Christadelphians because of the belief that all that are in Christ are his brethren, and designate their congregations as “ecclesias” or “churches of the apostasy.” John Thomas, M.D., the founder, seceded from the Disciples of Christ, and established a separate denomination, because he bethought that, though the Disciples were the most “apostolic and scripturally enlightened religious organization in America,” the religious teaching of the day was contrary to the teaching of the Bible. It is not known how many “ecclesias” there are in this country. Jersey City has one or two, and there is one in Philadelphia, and one in Washington. A few have been organized in England, where most of the literature of the denomination is printed.

Christadelphians reject the Trinity. They believe in one supreme God, who dwells in unap-proachable light; in Jesus Christ, in whom was manifest the eternal spirit of God, and who died for the offences of sinners, and rose for the justification of believing men and women; in one baptism only,—immersion, the “ burial with Christ in water into death to sin,” which is essential to salvation; in immortality only in Christ; in eternal punishment of the wicked, but not in eternal torment; in hell, not as a place of torment, but as the grave; in the resurrection of the just and unjust; in the utter annihilation of the wicked, and in the non-resurrection of those who have never heard the gospel, lack in intelligence (as infants), or are sunk in ignorance or brutality; in a second coming of Christ to establish his kingdom on earth, which is to be fitted for the everlasting abode of the saints; in the proximity of this sec-don coming; in Satan as a scriptural personification of sin; in the millennial reign of “Christ” to earth over the nations, during which sin and death will continue in a milder degree, and after which Christ will surrender his position of supremacy, and God will reveal himself, and become Father and Governor of a complete family; in salvation only for those who can understand the faith as taught by the Christadelphians, and become obedient to it.

COAN, Titus, D.D., missionary; b. at Killingworth, Conn., Feb. 1, 1801; d. at Hilo, Sandwich Islands, Sept. 16, 1882. He was graduated at Auburn Theological Seminary in 1833, and on Dec. 24, 1834, sailed for the Sandwich Islands, where he labored as missionary, under the care of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, until his death, with great success; his conversions up to 1880 numbering 12,113. In 1870 he returned to America for a very brief visit. He published Life in Hawaii, New York, 1882.

COLEMAN, John William, D.D., b. at Tintinhull, Somerset, Eng., Feb. 1, 1801; d. at Hilo, Sandwich Islands, Sept. 16, 1882. He was graduated at Yale College, 1817; principal of the Latin Grammar School at Hartford, 1817-20; tutor in Yale College; student of theology, and for seven years pastor of the Belchertown (Mass.) Congregational Church. He resigned, spent two years in foreign travel, held various positions, until in 1862 he became professor of Latin in Lafayette College. He was the author of several widely circulated volumes embodying the results of much study,—Antiquities of the Christian Church, Philadelphia, 1841; Ancient Christianity Exemplified, 1852; Historical Text-book and Atlas of Biblical Geography, 1854; Preaching and Ritualism, 1859.

COLENSO, John William, D.D., English prelate; b. at Killingworth, Conn., Feb. 1, 1801; d. at Hilo, Sandwich Islands, June 29, 1883. He was graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, 1836; became fellow of his college; was assistant master of Harrow School, 1838-42; re-sided at St. John's College, Cambridge, 1842-46; rector of Forncett St. Mary, Norfolk, 1846-53; and on Nov. 30, 1855, was appointed first bishop of Natal, South Africa. He made a great sensation before the Congregational Union at Southampton, 1855, and on the Associate Ministrels (with others), 1810; The Star in the East, 1836, containing some sixty-two pieces of his work. His best and most familiar lyrics are among the fifty-eight earliest, which are generally graceful, though sometimes too ornate.

CONDER, Joseph, b. in London, 1779; d. Dec. 27, 1855, was a Congregational layman and a voluminous author, memorable for his services to hymnology. Being a publisher in early life, he purchased the Eclectic Review in 1814, and conducted it till 1837. He edited The Patriot from 1832 till his death. His prose-works are, Protestant Nonconformity, 1819-19, 3 vols.; The Village Lectures, 1822; The Law of the Sabbath, 1830; the Modern Traveller, 1834; Poet of the Sanctuary, 1835; View of all Religions, 1838; Exposition of the Apocalypse, Literary History of the New Testament, 1845; Poet of the Sanctuary, 1851. The last is a sylloquy on Dr. Watts, read before the Congregational Union at Southampton, 1836. The works of Watts were sold in seven years; and then, in a slightly revised form (1844), it remained the official book till 1850. His revised and expurgated edition of Watts (1838) was less successful, as at that date Watts's entire was ceasing to be used. Conder's own hymns always show a devout and cultivated mind, and in elegance and taste are far above the average. Some of them are widely known and used, especially "Bread of heaven, on thee we feed."

COOPER, Peter, an American manufacturer, inventor, and philanthropist; was b. Feb. 12, 1791, in New York, and d. there April 4, 1883. His grandfather and father were soldiers in the American Revolution, after which his father resumed business as a hatter. Peter was the fifth of nine children, seven of whom were boys. He attended school for part of one year only; learned and practised his father's trade; and at the age of seventeen, the family having left New York, he returned to that city, and worked for hire for five years to a carriage-maker. Upon a salary of twenty-five dollars a year and board, he kept out of debt, and saved money. His industry and inventive ingenuity won the favor of his employer, who offered to loan him the necessary capital to establish himself in business. Not wishing to assume the burden of debt, he declined this offer, and went as a workman on day-wages to a woolen-factory at Hempstead, L.I. Here he perfected a machine for shearing the nap from cloth, for which he obtained a patent. By the war of 1812 American cloth manufactures were greatly stimulated, and this machine found for a brief period a rapid sale. It is said that the first five hundred dollars realized by the inventor were devoted to the relief of his father, then seriously embarrassed. In 1818 Mr. Cooper married Sarah Bedell, a lady of Hempstead, with whom he enjoyed more than fifty-six years of wedded happiness. Of six children, two survive,—Edward Cooper, recently mayor of New York, and Mrs. Sarah Amelia Hewitt, wife of Abram S. Hewitt, several times elected a representative in Congress from New York City.

At the close of the war with England, Mr. Cooper turned his shop at Hempstead into a manufactory of cabinet-ware. A year later he established a grocery in New York; and after another year he sold out this business, and embarked in the manufacture of glue and isinglass, which he carried on with great success, amassing from this and other enterprises the large fortune which he administered with so much generosity and public spirit. Among his business undertakings may be mentioned the establishment of iron-works at Baltimore, New York, Trenton, and Phillipsburgh, N.J., and the laying of the Atlantic cable, which he promoted with enthusiastic faith, by large advances of money at critical periods. Of his genius as an inventor, many instances might be cited: among them, the construction, in 1829, of the first steam locomotive ever made in America; the movement of canal and river-boats by means of an endless chain (now revived as the traction for women); the natural sciences, mechanics, engineering, etc.; a free library and reading-room; and a free course of popular scientific lectures. It may be said in round numbers, that nearly 4,000 students are enrolled annually in the various classes, about 1,500 persons frequent the reading-room daily, and an audience of 2,000 attends the weekly lectures. The expenses of the institution amount to over $50,000 per year, the greater part of which is obtained from the rents of stores and offices in the building. Any deficit has been met by Mr. Cooper, who also left by his will an additional endowment of $100,000. To this, his son and daughter have notified the trustees that they will add another $100,000. This will make the total endowment, apart from building and apparatus, $400,000.

The funeral of Mr. Cooper was an imposing spectacle, testifying the universal love and esteem in which he was held. A popular subscription is in progress for a monument in his honor. This purpose all must applaud. Yet, after all, his best monument is the "Cooper Union." And what epitaph can be better than that inscribed upon the scroll, which, thirty years ago, he deposited within its cornerstone?

"The great object that I desire to accomplish by the erection of this institution is to open the avenues of scientific knowledge to the youth of our city and country, and so unfold the volume of nature that the young may see the beauties of creation, enjoy its blessings, and learn to love the Author from whom cometh every good and perfect gift."

being withdrawn, to be succeeded by an abridged and altered edition. Though its life was so short, its influence was great. Cotterill's hymns, while not highly poetical, were judicious, neat, and sometimes impressive. They met a want then widely if not deeply felt, and for a generation were largely copied into most Anglican hymnals; some of the chief favorites being such as were his only in part, for he was the most successful practitioner of the doubtful art of "tinkering," or amending. Several of his alterations and originals keep a place still.

COTTON, Nathaniel, M.D., b. 1707; d. at St. Albans, Aug. 2, 1788; studied medicine at Leyden, and kept a lunatic-asylum at St. Albans. He was praised and loved by Cowper, who was for some time (1763–64) his patient. He published two medical books in 1780 and 1749, and Visions in Verse, 1751. His Various Pieces in Verse and Prose appeared, 1791, in 2 vols., containing a few very sober and studious minds, with moderate inclinations toward religion.

COWLEY, Abraham, M.D., b. in London, 1618; d. at Chertsey, in Surrey, July 28, 1667; entered Trinity College, Cambridge, 1636, and was ejected as a royalist, 1643. He published various poems, essays, and Liber Plantarum, 1662–78. Once counted the first poet of his time, he is now mildly valued for his graver strains, which show a sober and studious mind, with moderate inclinations toward religion.

CROLY, George, LL.D., b. in Dublin, August, 1780; d. in London, Nov. 24, 1800; was from 1835 rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, London. He published many volumes of prose, mostly on sacred themes, and of verse, chiefly secular, besides a slight collection of Psalms and Hymns (1854), largely made up of unimportant originals. Mrs. Hall thought him "an almost universal poet, grand and gorgeous, but too cold and stately."

CROSSMAN, Samuel, b. at Bradfield, Suffolk, 1824; d. at Bristol, Feb. 4, 1883; was prebendary of Bristol, and published sundry sermons, etc., and The Young Man's Meditation, 1664, reprinted by D. Sedgwick, 1863. This contains nine hymns, one or two of which are meritorious and well known.

CROSSWELL, William, D.D., b. at Hudson, N.Y., Nov. 7, 1804; d. in Boston, Nov. 9, 1861; graduated at Yale, 1822; studied divinity at New York and Hartford; became rector of Christ Church, Boston (1829), of St. Peter's, Auburn (1840), and of the Advent, Boston (1844). His memoir was published by his father. His Poems, edited by Bishop Coxe, appeared 1861. They contain some meritorious hymns, one of which is widely used.

DARBY, John Nelson, b. in London, Nov. 18, 1800; d. in Bournemouth, April 29, 1882. He was graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, 1819; took orders, and served a curacy in Wicklow, until, in 1827, double as to church establishments led him to leave the Church altogether, and meet with a little company of like-minded persons gathered in Dublin. In 1830 he visited Plymouth, and carried on the work there. An assembly of Brethren was shortly formed in the town that has lent its name to this movement. James L. Harris, perpetual curate of Plymstock, resigned his living to unite with them, and in 1834 started the Christian Witness, their first periodical. Darby became an assiduous writer. In the first volume of the Witness appeared his Parochial Arrangement of Order in the Church. In 1836 he wrote for the same serial A postasy of the Successive Dispensations, afterwards published in French as A postasie de l'économie actuelle, in which he "laid the axe to the tree of the Christian Church" (Herzog, cf. "Plymouth Brethren").

Between 1838 and 1840 Darby worked in Switzerland. In the autumn of 1839 an influential member of the congregation at Lausanne invited Darby thither to oppose Methodism. In March, 1840, he came, and obtained a hearing by discourses, and a tract, De la doctrine des Wesleyens à l'égard de la perfection, etc. In the spring of 1841 the greater part of the Methodists joined the other dissenters of Lausanne. Some lectures by Darby on prophecy made great impression, bringing together nationalists and dissenters. The key to his opponents' position had been formed, and Darby at this time continued his preaching. He soon gathered young men round him at Lausanne, with whom he studied the Scriptures. The fruit of these conferences was his Etudes sur la Parole, a work which has appeared in English as Synopsis of the Books of the Bible. His associates were not long in beginning missionary enterprise among, not the indifferent or worldly, but awakened souls. Many congregations were formed in Canton Vaud, Geneva, and Berne. Certain of his followers started a periodical, Le témoignage des disciples de la Parole.

When, by Jesuit intrigues, a revolution broke out in Canton Vaud (February, 1845), the Darbyites in some parts of Switzerland suffered persecution. Darby's own life was in jeopardy. He therefore took a more active lead among the English Brethren, and in particular, from 1845 to 1848, in respect to the disruption at Plymouth (cf. PLYMOUTH BRETHREN); but his heart seems ever to have turned towards Switzerland and France.

The appearance of Newman's Phases of Faith evoked a reply from Darby, The Irrationalism of Infidelity (1858). Nor did the advance made by Anglo-Catholics, inspired of old by another Newman, escape his notice. See his Remarks on Puseyism (1874), and review of The Church and the World, his Christianity and Christianism (1874), etc.

It was not long before Darby had formed links with several congregations in Germany. In 1858 he paid a first visit to Elberfeld. Already there were some dozen assemblies of Brethren, holding the same views of the church as those already spoken of in Great Britain and Switzerland, but without formal connection. Darby was soon to say, "The Lord has not given me Germany." Nothing was required, however, but his appearance on the scene to turn these "Baptisten" into "Darbisten." In 1854 he was in Elberfeld a second time, translating on their behalf the New Testament into German. In 1858 he exercised his ministry far and wide.

In 1858 Darby took up independently a subject which he had before touched only in controversy with Newton (cf. PLYMOUTH BRETHREN)—the sufferings of Christ. Though harassed by opposition, he retained the confidence of the bulk of his supporters, manifest when he offered to withdraw from his ministry. In 1868 appeared his Righteousness of God, which subject also plunged him into controversy. In the latter year he executed a French translation of the New Testament (Veyve). After the completion of this work, he made a first visit to Canada, where had been assemblies of Brethren for many years. Shortly after his return to England (1863) he published his papers on the Essays and Reviews. In 1864-65 he was again in Canada: in 1866 he issued his dialogue on the Essays and Reviews. In 1867 he went to France.

In 1868-69 he was in Italy, the encouragement of his presence for a short time. His Meditations on the Acts of the Apostles (C. W., xxv.) was composed in Italian. In 1872-73 came a vigorous campaign in the United States. A Boston journal, the Traveller, records at that time his daily meetings at 3 Tremont Row, and says, "Now seventy-two years of age, he is hale and dignified, yet genial and joyful in his life of unclouded faith." At a subsequent period he visited the West Indies. He was again in the States in 1874, and visited, in 1875, the Brethren in New Zealand. Between 1878 and 1880 he was occupied very much with his translation into French of the Old Testament, in connection with which he sojourned long at Paris, after having made several other occasional visits to France.

He had, besides, found time to make known his judgment on several points of scholarship. His view of the Greek article approximates to that expressed by Donaldson. In the Bible Witness and Review (1877-81) appeared several articles by him in apologetics; e.g., a review of W. Robertson Smith's well-known article in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, another of Mill's Logic, and a paper on Miracles, with reference to Hume. In metaphysics, as in theology, he struck out his own path. Well acquainted with Kant's system, he valued the KÖnigsberg philosophy as little as Mill's. We possess papers of his on the Relative and Absolute, Self-consciousness, and the Infinite with reference to the Baptist Lectures of Mansel.

Though his works are largely doctrinal and controversial, his delight was to write anything devotional and practical. How he lived in the Psalms appears from his Practical Reflections thereon. Never did any Englishman live more in the Bible than he, unless it were John Bunyan. He was, besides, a hymn-writer. The hymn Donaldson. His writings have been collected and edited by W. Kelly. EDWARD E. WHITFIELD (Member of the Brethren at Oxford, Eng.).
Canada. He was a prominent member of the Chamber of Commerce, and for several years its presiding officer. He acted as director in various corporations and companies, and was a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress.

Mr. Dodge's chief distinction, however, was the zeal and liberality he displayed in every form of Christian and benevolent work, not merely in his own city, but in all sections of the country, and throughout the world. Trained by godly parents, and converted during the revival days of Nettleton, it was his delight to engage in direct personal labors for the cause of Christ. He especially loved to take part in general religious awakenings, where sects and classes united. In his early days he was an efficient promoter of the labors of Finney and other evangelists, and, more recently, of Moody and Sankey. He long held prominent positions in the church. A Presbyterian elder, a sabbath-school superintendent, and a director of the American Bible Society, he was soon placed in important positions. He was president of the American Missionary Society, which he organized in New York City, and was its first president. He stood in a similar relation to the Christian Home for Intemperate Men, and his last work was to aid in creating a like institution for women. During the civil war his patriotic zeal was manifested in a hearty support of the government by both voice and purse, and also in the work of the Christian and the Sanitary Commission. He felt peculiar sympathy for the freedmen, and gave largely to institutions and churches for their benefit. He believed in sound Christian education, and aided colleges and schools in every part of the land. He was a trustee of the Union Theological Seminary in New York City, and a liberal donor to its work. He also gave freely to theological seminaries in other places. His wide railroad and business relations and frequent journeys kept him familiar with the growing wants of the West and South. Impressed with the urgent need, in those sections, of gospel institutions and influences, he constantly maintained at his own expense, in different seminaries and colleges, a number of carefully selected young men, who could make special and somewhat shorter preparation for the ministry. He left a fund to continue this work. In foreign missions he took prominent interest. He was vice-president of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and also a member of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. His regular annual subscriptions to this cause for many years amounted to ten thousand dollars, and his special contributions were frequent. Scarcely a field or station but knew his name, and enjoyed his aid. He was the principal founder of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, and himself laid the corner-stone. But in his sympathies and gifts he never confined himself to his own denomination or immediate surroundings. Any cause which sought to honor his Master, and benefit his fellow-men, was sure to gain his ear, and, if wisely conducted, to share his bounty, whatever ecclesiastical body it represented, or wherever it was located. His private charities, and his individual exertions to help the needy or degraded, were, perhaps, more generous and characteristic than any acts known to the public; and it was in the family circle, or in dispensing the hospitalities of his own home, that his engaging personal qualities shone most brightly, although in every company, and with all associates, he seemed instinctively to inspire warm and lasting affection. His business insight, industry, and integrity gave him ample means, and also the unfailing confidence of his fellow-merchants. His conscientious and scriptural views of stewardship led him to acquire wealth that he might use it for philanthropic ends, and the same spirit is manifest in the liberal bequests his will contained for the leading religious and charitable organizations. In his wife he always found the fullest support and most devoted interest for all his benevolent undertakings. She and their seven sons survive him.

DOREMUS (Sarah Platt Haines), Mrs. Thomas C., b. in New York City, Aug. 3, 1802; d. there Jan. 29, 1877. Her life was consecrated to Christ and to the relief of sorrow in every form. For thirty-two years she was a manager of the Woman's Prison Association, and from 1868 its presiding officer. For twenty-six years she was a manager of the City and Tract Mission Society, and twenty-eight years of the City Bible Society. In 1850 she was a founder of the House and School of Industry, and since 1867 its president. She was also a founder, and always second directress, of the Nursery and Child's Hospital. In 1855, by her hearty co-operation, she enabled Dr. J. Marion Sims (d. Nov. 13, 1883) to establish the Woman's Hospital in New York City,— the first institution of the kind to be founded anywhere. In 1866 she helped to organize the Presbyterian Home for Aged Women, presided at its first meeting, and continued a manager. During the civil war she played a prominent part in distributing supplies to all the hospitals in and around the city. All her life she was a Sunday-school teacher, and greatly interested in child-life. Her own family was large, and she never forgot her home duties amid the distractions of her many public enterprises.

But her greatest work was for foreign missions. She was called the "Mother of Missionaries." No missionary entered or left the port of New York without substantial evidence of her interest. At ten years of age she attended, with her mother, meetings held by Mrs. Harris Graham and her women to pray for the conversion of the world; and from that time on she labored in the great cause. In 1828 she organized a band for the relief of the Greek Christians persecuted by the Turks, in 1835 a society in New York in aid of Madame Feller's Baptist Mission at Grand Ligne, Canada. Her memorial is the Woman's Union Missionary Society, which she organized in New York, November, 1860, and which has led to similar organizations all over the country. It is unconnected with any church board, is supported by voluntary contributions, and devoted to work among women in heathen lands.

Mrs. Doremus was a member of the South Reformed (Dutch) Church; but in her love for the Master she knew no denominational lines. Among all the women who have advanced the world she has a foremost place.

DRUMMOND, William, of Hawthorn, b. Dec. 13, 1585; d. Dec. 4, 1649; "the first Scottish poet who wrote well in English;" was educated at the university of Edinburgh, and studied civil law in France, whence he returned in 1609 to occupy his beautiful ancestral seat. There Ben Jonson visited him in 1619. He wrote a History of Scotland and other prose-works, besides many poems, which have been published together, 1711, 1719, and, with life by Peter Cunningham, 1833. His Flowers of Zion appeared 1828. His Divine Poems include some of our earliest translations of Latin hymns.

DUNN, Professor Robinson Porter, b. 1834; d. Aug. 28, 1867; was a professor in Brown University, and an accomplished scholar. He translated from the Latin, German, and French a few hymns which have been published.

EDMESTON, James, b. at Wapping, London, Sept. 10, 1791; d. at Homerton, Middlesex, Jan. 7, 1828; was an architect, but better known as a voluminous writer of sacred verse. Besides one or two prose-works he published The Search, and other Poems, 1817; Sacred Lyrics, 1820-23, 3 vols.; The Cottage Minstrel, 1821; a hundred hymns for Sunday schools, 1821; another hundred for particular occasions, and fifty for missionary prayer-meetings, 1822; Patmos, etc., 1824; The Woman of Shunem, etc., 1829; Sonnets: Hymns for the Chamber of Sickness, 1844; Closet Hymns and Poems, 1845; Infant Breathings, 1846; Sacred Poetry, 1847. In all he produced near two thousand of these effusions, some of which are spirited and elegant, while many of them have been useful, and one or two are still largely used.

ELLIOTT, Charlotte, b. 1798; d. at Brighton, Sept. 22, 1871; was a daughter of Charles Elliott, and sister of two somewhat eminent clergymen, Henry V. and Edward B.; but her "Just as I am" has been far more widely useful than her brother Edward's Horse Apocalyptic. She wrote Hours of Sorrow, 1836; Morning and Evening Hymns for a Week, 1842; Poems by C. E., 1863; and over a hundred lyrics in The Invalid's Hymn-Book, 1844-54, the last edition of which she edited, as also The Christian Remembrancer, an annual. Several of her hymns have been and are very popular. The earliest of them appeared in the Psalms and Hymns of her brother, Henry Venn, whose wife, Julia Anne Elliott (d. 1841), also contributed to it several of great merit.

ΕΛΛΙΟΤΤ, David, D.D., LL.D., b. at Sherman Valley, Penn., Feb. 5, 1805; of pious ancestry, and carefully educated in religion; d. at Allegheny, Penn., March 18, 1874; diligent at academies; successful teacher at Washington, Penn., in 1806-07; valedetorian at Dickinson College in 1808; licensed, 1811; pastor from 1812 to 1829 at Mercersburg, Penn., from 1829 to 1836 at Washington, Penn. Both pastorate were filled with "well-studied, clear, convincing, and persuasive" sermons, successful conflicts with error, faithfully in the spirit of the organization of Christian activity in various directions, revival-seasons, initiation of prayer-meetings and Sunday schools, and accompanied by a steadily increasing influence in the denomination.

Dr. Elliott's educational life began with the re-organization of Washington College in 1830. Owing to his enterprise, wisdom, and resolution, the new movement rapidly attained success. He was "acting president" two years, president of the Board of Trustees thirty-three years. His transfer to Allegheny in 1836 brought him to the theological seminary at one critical period, and he continued through many others. He made the burdens of the seminary his own, laid all his gifts and experience upon its altar, pleaded its cause against all opponents, bound it upon the heart of the church, increased the number of its students, often performed the extra duties of its unoccupied chairs, accepted whatever place best suited its needs, proved equal to every exigency in teaching and administration, sustained its work alone in 1840, begged it out of difficulties in 1850, watched with delight its later rapid growth, saw nearly a thousand men go from its doors to preach the gospel, and when mad. 1871, lived to pray for it and with its every student, and still lives as its model of piety and devotedness.

For ecclesiastical usefulness Dr. Elliott was pre-eminently fitted by clear thinking, directness in expression, perfect impartiality, and a judicial habit of mind. All these traits were often exhibited, but especially in the dispute over the re-organization of 1837, of which his moderatorship was a marvel of fairness as tested by the feelings of the time, and his decisions unimpeachable in their accuracy as tested by subsequent judicial deliberations. Present and assenting at the re-union of the Presbyterian Church in 1839, he died, leaving to the church and the world the legacy of a great work well done, and of a character wonderfully symmetrical.

SYLVESTER F. COVEL.

ENFIELD, William, LL.D., b. at Sudbury in Suffolk, March 29, 1741; d. at Norwich, Nov. 3, 1797; was an eminent Unitarian minister and author. After studying at Daventry, he ministered successively at Liverpool, Warrington, and Norwich. His Speaker, 1774, and History of Philosophy, 1789, passed through several editions, and are well known. He also wrote An Essay towards the History of Liverpool, 1774; Observations on Literary Property, 1774; Exercises on Election, 1791; Institutes of Normal Philosophy, 1781; and some volumes of sermons; and compiled the Preacher's Directory, 1771, and a Selection of Hymns, 1772 (2d ed., 1797), containing a few of his own.

ΕΦΡΑΙΜ. See Tribes of Israel.

ERSKINE, Ralph, b. at Monilaws, Northumberland, March 18, 1655; d. Oct. 6, 1752; was educated at the university of Edinburgh; became minister at Dunfermline 1711, and joined the seceders 1734. His Gospel Sonnets, 1729, which are extraordinary reading now, were long very popular, and went through many editions. They were followed by A Paraphrase on the Song of Solomon, 1738, and Scripture Songs. His entire Poetical Works were printed in one volume, 8vo, Aberdeen, so lately as 1858.

ΕΥΧΑΡΙΣΤΗ. (Greek εὐχαριστία, "a giving of thanks"), the ancient church-name for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper as a feast of thanksgiving, a thank-offering of the whole church for all the favors of God in creation and redemption. The term denoted in the first place the prayer of thanksgiving, which was part of the communion-service, and so called in the New Testament; but the designation quite naturally followed from the use of εὐχαριστίας (“he had given thanks”) in Matt. xxvi. 27, Mark xiv. 23, Luke xxii. 19, 1 Cor. xi. 24, and is used by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 65, 66), Ireneaus (Adv. haer. iv. 44), Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. ii. 2), and others. See Lord’s Supper.

FACETT, John, D.D., b. at Lidget Green, near Bradford, Yorkshire, Jan. 6, 1739; d. at Bredarley Hall near Wainsgate, July 25, 1817; was an eminent hymn-writer of the school of Watts. Converted under Whitefield in 1753, he became in 1764 Baptist minister at Wainsgate, and there remained through life, rejecting all allurements to larger fields. His most popular hymn, “Blest be the tie that binds,” is said to have been composed during his refusal, under touching circumstances, of a London charge in 1772. He also declined the presidency of the Baptist academy at Bristol in 1793, and eked out his scanty income by taking pupils at home, and by his pen. He published The Devotional Family Bible, 1811, 2 vols., and sundry smaller works in prose, besides Poetic Essays, 1767, and a hundred and sixty-six Hymns, 1782; 2d ed., 1817. Many of these had merit enough to be largely used in former days, and some of them still retain a place in our collections. His Life and Letters were published by J. Parker, London, 1818.

FITCH, Eleazar Thompson, D.D., b. at New Haven, Jan. 1, 1791; d. there Jan. 31, 1871; graduated at Yale, 1810; studied theology at Andover, and was professor of divinity, and college pastor, at Yale, 1817-60. He published some sermons, etc., and was one of the compilers of the Connecticut Congregational Psalms and Hymns, for which he wrote a few pieces of merit.

FOLLEN, Eliza Lee (Cabot), b. in Boston, Aug. 15, 1787; d. at Brookline, Mass., Jan. 26, 1860; was a voluminous writer of prose and verse for children and adults. In 1826 she married Professor Charles Follen, who was exiled from Germany, fled to America, 1825, and was lost on the “Lexington,” 1840. Her Poems appeared 1839. Some of her hymns have been popular and are still sometimes used.

FRIENDS, The Society of, commonly called Quakers. Liberal Branch.—Until early in this century, American Friends were generally united on the original ground of the society, viz., “conversion to God, regeneration, and holiness, not scheme of doctrines, and verbal creeds, or new forms of worship” (Penn’s Rise and Progress), and did not “require a formal subscription to any articles, either as a condition of membership, or to qualify for the service of the church” (London Summary, 1790).

For more than forty years, Elias Hicks of Long Island had been an eminent minister, and apparently acceptable, when in 1810 he was publicly opposed in Philadelphia. A separation in that Yearly Meeting took place in 1827; one party styling the other “Hicksites” and “Separatists,” terms which have ever been repudiated. These Friends constituted the much larger portion of the membership in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore Yearly Meetings.

The utterances of Elias Hicks will bear comparison with those of the sentiment Friends; and Job Scott of Rhode Island, who died in 1793, acknowledged to be an acceptable minister and writer, was his contemporary and of a kindred spirit. Facts prove that other causes were potent in producing the difficulties.

The re-organized Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1830 wrote to London Yearly Meeting: “We are not sensible of any dereliction on our part from the principles laid down by our blessed Lord. The history of the birth, life, acts, death, and resurrection of the holy Jesus, as in the volume of the book it is written of him, we reverently believe. We are not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, because it is the power of God unto salvation to all them that believe; neither do we hesitate to acknowledge the divinity of its author, because we know from living experience that he is the power of God and the wisdom of God, and, “under the present glorious dispensation, he is the one holy principle of divine life and light.” “Neither are we sensible of any departure from the faith or principles of our primitive Friends. We are not ignorant, that, on some points of speculative nature, they had different views, and expressed themselves diversely. . . . In the fundamental principle of the Christian faith, the light of Christ within, as God’s gift for man’s salvation, . . . they were all united, and in that which united them we are united with them” (Printed Epitapes).

The Scriptures, without this divine illumination, “will not give a knowledge of Christ” (Fox’s Great Mystery). “Christ is the substance of all figures, and his flesh is a figure; for every one passeth through the same way as he did who comes to know Christ in the flesh” (George Fox’s Great Mystery).

“The true grounds of salvation by Christ . . . in all ages has been a real birth of God in the soul, a substantial union of the human and divine nature,—the Son of God and the Son of man, which is the true Emanuel state” (Job Scott).

The “second covenant is dedicated with the blood, the life of Christ Jesus, which is the only atonement unto God, by which all his people are washed, sanctified, cleansed, and redeemed to God. . . . The true witnesses of this” are “they only that have drunk of the blood of Christ, and eaten of his flesh, which he gives for the life of the world” (Fox’s Doctrinals).

Friends do not believe in imputative righteousness, nor that “Christ died as a substitute for the whole human race in order to satisfy the offended justice of God, and render him propitious to guilty man” (Janney’s Converisons).

They do not accept the commonly received doctrine of the Trinity, and hold that children are only sinners by actual transgression of the divine law.

(For other views held by all branches of Friends, see under Friends.)

They have seven Yearly Meetings, laboring jointly on behalf of the Indians; and recently four of these agreed to co-operate in a Union for Philanthropic Labor.

First-day schools are maintained in very many localities, and an official sanction to some extent has been extended. Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania, and Friends College, Long Island, are well patronized; and flourishing schools are supported in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other places.

FROTHINGHAM.

He was graduated at Harvard, 1811, and was pastor of the First Church in Boston, 1815-50. He published Sermons, 1852; Metrical Pieces, Translated and Original, 1855; Part Second of the same, 1870. The latter includes many versions from the German. Several of his hymns have been largely used by Unitarians.

HAMMOND.

He published Principles of Moral Philosophy, 1789; Duties of Men, 1795; Duties of the Female Sex, 1797; Familiar Survey of the Christian Religion and History, 1797; On Christian Morality, 1810; and several volumes of sermons, poems, etc. His Walks in a Forest (1794) was much esteemed, and one of his hymns is still valued by those who use it.

GOODE, William. b. at Buckingham, April 2, 1782; d. April 16, 1816; was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford; curate of Abbots Langley, Herts, 1784; curate to Romaine at St. Ann, Blackfriars, London, 1786; rector of the same, 1795, besides filling several lectureships; was one of the founders of the Church Missionary Society. His New Version of the Book of Psalms (1811, 2 vols.) has been a good deal valued and extracted from. A volume of his sermons appeared, 1812; and his Essays on All the Scriptural Names and Titles of Christ, etc., with a memoir, was published in six volumes by his son in 1822. The Divine Rule of Faith and Practice (1842), and sundry other works against the Tractarians, were written by a later London rector of the same name.

GRAHAM, James. b. at Glasgow, 1765; d. 1811; was educated at the university of Glasgow; was for a time a lawyer; took orders, and served as curate at Shipton, Gloucestershire, at St. Margaret's, Durham, and at Sedgefield, near Durham. He published sundry poems, as The Sabbath (1804), Birds of Scotland, etc. (1800), which were once much valued.

GRANT, Sir Robert. b. at Dapoorie, in Western India, July 9, 1838; graduated at Cambridge, 1860; was admitted to the bar, 1867; member of Parliament for Inverness, 1826; privy-councillor, 1831; governor of Bombay, 1834. He wrote one or two books on India, and twelve Sacred Poems, issued by his brother, Lord Glenelg, in 1889. All of these are meritorious, most of them are more or less used as hymns, and two are of the first rank. "When gathering clouds around I view," appeared in The Christian Observer, February, 1806, and "Saviour, when in dust to thee," November, 1815.

GRIGG, Joseph. d. at Walthamstow, near London, Oct. 29, 1768; was a Presbyterian assistant minister in Silver Street, London, 1748-47, and after that seems to have lived at St. Albans and Stourbridge. He issued a few tracts in prose and verse. His hymns and poems were collected by D. Sedgwick, 1861; two of them have long been very popular. "Jesus, and shall it ever be," was written at the age of ten.

GURNEY, John Hampden. b. in London, Aug. 15, 1602; d. there March 8, 1682; was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; curate at Lutterworth, 1727-44; district rector of St. Mary's, Marylebone, 1747. He published sundry historical sketches, lectures, etc., and two hymn-books, 1850 and 1851. These contain several good and useful originals.

HABINGTON, William. b. at Houdlip, Worcestershire, Nov. 5, 1605; d. there Nov. 30, 1654; wrote several books in prose and verse, chief of which is Castara, 1634, reprinted by C. A. Elton, 1812. His Muse was sober and devout.

HAMMOND, William. b. at Battle, Sussex, Jan. 6, 1719; d. in London, Aug. 16, 1788; was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, but joined... the Calvinistic Methodists, and afterwards, with his friend Cennick, the Moravians. He published Medulla Ecclesiae (1744), and Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs (1745). The latter show the Wes-leyan influence strongly, and form a volume of considerable size and importance. Many of them were in use during the last century, and one or two of them are still somewhat popular.

HANNA, William, D.D., LL.D., author of the Life of Dr. Chalmers, etc.; b. at Belfast in 1808, d. in London, May 24, 1882. Having studied in Glasgow, he became a licentiate of the Church of Scotland, and was settled at East Kilbride, and subsequently removed to Kirling, both in Lanarkshire. He married the eldest daughter of Dr. Chalmers. At the disruption, in 1843, he joined the Free Church. Subsequently he was called to Edinburgh as colleague to the Rev. Dr. Guthrie. He was a very graceful and impressive preacher, but his fame rests chiefly on his books.

Besides the Life and Letters of Dr. Chalmers (Edinburgh, 1868-09, 6 vols.), he published Lectures on Wicliffe and the Huguenots; The Life of Christ, and the Death. W. O. BLAIKIE.

HART, Joseph, b. in London about 1712; d. there May 24, 1708; "received a classical education," and for some years was a teacher of languages, translating Herodian’s History of his Own Times (1749), and doing other work which he afterwards considered immoral and profane; e.g., a pamphlet on The Unreasonableness of Religion (1741). He began preaching about 1759, and soon settled at the independent chapel in Jewin Street, where his ministry was most vigorous and effective. He was an advanced Calvinist, but not an Antinomian. Personally he was an original and striking, if not an attractive, character, with a plain and narrow mind, a temper sincere, vehement, and entirely devoted, and an utterance blunt and unpolished to the last degree. His Hymns, with the Author’s Experience, appeared 1759, with additions in 1762 and 1773. Like nearly all the lyrics of last century dissent, they are without refinement, or any evidence of culture, but, like him, commonplace. Hart established a new and strong type of his own. His rudeness often runs into quaint boorishness, but has occasional gleams, not only of good sense and good feeling, but of something like poetry. Such as they are, these hymns have been immensely influential. With the extreme Calvinistic sects they have always been prime favorites, and some of them are still largely used by most English-speaking Christians. But the natural effect on a cultivated man is expressed in the familiar anecdote of Dr. Johnson’s giving a crown at church to “a poor girl in a bedgown, though I saw Hart’s Hymns in her hand.”

HASTINGS, Thomas, Doctor of Music; b. in Washington, Conn., Oct. 15, 1784; d. in New York City, May 15, 1872. In 1796 he removed to Clinton, Oneida County, N.Y. In early youth he began his musical studies, and, prosecuted them without a teacher, mastering every treatise that came within his reach. He began his career as a teacher in singing-schools in 1806, and as an editor in 1816. In connection with Professor Norton of Hamilton College he published two pamphlets (1816), afterwards enlarged, and united with The Springfield Collection, in a volume entitled Musica Sacra, 1836. From 1822 to 1839 Mr. Hastings, by special request, was the editor of The Western Recorder, a religious paper published at Utica. In 1832, at the call of twelve churches, he removed to the city of New York. Not only had he studied his favorite art, but with great diligence he had applied himself to the study of English literature, philosophy, and theology, and had acquired facility in public address and in writing. Before leaving Utica he had begun to write hymns, impelled by the lack of variety in those then current, and by the need of adapting suitable words to the music he arranged. In The Spiritual Songs (1832) there are more than thirty of his hymns published anonymously. Among these are some of the best that he wrote; such as, “How calm and beautiful the morning!” “Gently, Lord, oh gently lead us,” “Child of sin and sorrow.” The popularity of these first attempts led him to continue and cultivate the habit thus early begun. About two hundred of his hymns are in current use, and he left in manuscript about four hundred more. Doubtless his name will live longer as a writer of hymns than as a writer of tunes. His music, with that of Dr. Lowell Mason, did important service in the church, and marks in this country the transition period between the crude and the more cultivated periods of psalmody. In his lifetime Dr. Hastings was criticised, as a musician, as too far in advance of the general cultivation: now he is criticised as too far behind the present wants. Both criticisms point to the truth that he aimed to lead higher the people of his own time. His cardinal principle was, that in church music the artistic must be strictly subordinated to the devotional. He was a devout, earnest Christian, a hard student, a resolute worker, not laying aside his pen till three days before his death, which came to his relief in his eighty-eighth year. A list of his publications, with their dates, is subjoined.

Musica Sacra, 1816-22; The Musical Reader, 1819; A Dissertation on Musical Taste, 1822, revised and republished, 1833; Spiritual Songs (by Lowell Mason, co-editor), 1832-36; Prayer, 1831; The Christian Psalmist (the Rev. Dr. William Patton, co-editor), 1836; Anthems, Motets, and Sentences, 1836; Musical Magazine, 24 numbers, 1837-38; The Manhattan Collection, 1837; Elements of Vocal Music, 1839; Nursery Songs, The Mother’s Hymn-book, The Sacred Lyre, 1840; Juvenile Songs, 1842; The Crystal Fountain, 1847; The Sunday-school Lyre, 1848. With William B. Bradbury as joint editor from 1844 to 1851,—The Psalmist, 1844; The Choralist, 1847; The Mendelssohn Collection, 1849; The Psalmist, 1851; Devotional Hymns and Poems, 1850; The History of Forty Choirs, 1854; Sacred Praise, The Solah, 1856; Church Melodies, 1858; Hastings’s Church Music, 1860; Intronis, or Short Anthems, 1865. Dr. Hastings edited, for the American Tract Society, Sacred Songs, 1855, and Songs of Zion (1856), and, for the Presbyterian Church, The Presbyterian Psalmist (1862) and The Juvenile Psalmist. THOMAS S. HASTINGS.
HATFIELD, Edwin Francis, D.D., b. at Elizabethtown, N.J., Jan. 9, 1807; d. at Summit, N.J., Sept. 22, 1883. He was graduated at Middlebury College, Vt., 1829; studied two years (1829-31) at Andover Theological Seminary; was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, St. Louis (1832-35), of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, New-York City (1835-56), during which time he received 1,556 persons on profession of faith, and 652 by letter), and of the North Presbyterian Church (1856-68). In 1863 he retired from the pastorate on account of loss of health. From 1864 to 1866, and again from 1870 to 1873, he acted as special agent of the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City, and raised much money. He was Stated Clerk of the General Assembly from 1846 until his death, first of the New-School Assembly (1846-70) and then of the united body. In 1866 he was a member of the Re-union Committee of the General Assembly; and, although seventy-six years old, he discharged the onerous duties of the position with surprising freshness and vigor. He was an eminent student of hymnology, had collected a large and valuable library in this branch, and in 1872 published at New York The Church Hymn-Book, with Tunes. His library is now in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City. His acquaintance with ecclesiastical polity, with parliamentary law, and with the history and the members of the Presbyterian Church, was remarkable. He wrote the Memoir of Elihu W. Baldwin, D.D., 1843; St. Helena and the Cape of Good Hope, 1852; and The History of Elizabeth, N.J., 1868. For his contributions to this encyclopedia, see Analysis.

HAWEIS, Thomas, M.D., b. at Truro, Cornwall, 1732 (or 1734); d. at Bath, Feb. 11, 1820; was educated at Christ College, Cambridge; became rector of Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, 1764, and chaplain to Lady Huntingdon. He published Communicant's Spiritual Companion, 1763; Evangelical Principles and Practice, 1762; Evangelical Expositor, 1765-69; 2 vols.; of faith, and of the Church, 1795; Catechism, 1775; Translation of the New Testament, 1800, 3 vols. His Carmina Christo, or Hymns to the Saviour, appeared 1792 and 1808: some of them are valuable and popular.

HEGINBOTHAM, Otiwell, b. 1744; d. at Sudbury, 1783; was a student of Daventry, and a youth of "uncommon merit and abilities." Nov. 20, 1765, he was ordained at Sudbury as pastor of a congregation made up of two hostile parties, whose disputes drove him (being noted for "sensibility, gentleness, and tenderness") into consumption and an early grave. His twenty-five hymns were not printed till 1794, in a small volume now rare. They are of fair merit, and have been considerably used.

HEMANS, Felicia Dorothy (Brown), b. in Liverpool, Sept. 25, 1794; d. near Dublin, May 12, 1835; was married to Capt. Hemans 1812, and separated from him 1818. Her voluminous poetry, long very popular, appeared in some nine-teen separate publications, beginning 1808, and was collected, with a memoir by her sister, 1839, in 7 vols. Her Hymns for Childhood, and Scenes and Hymns of Life, were her last publications, 1894.

HERBERT, Daniel, b. about 1751; d. Aug. 29, 1833; was an illiterate but indefatigable rhymier, whose Hymns and Poems (1819-27) fill three volumes of over a thousand pages. Despicable from a literary view point, they have been used by extreme Calvinists. He lived at Sudbury.

HERRICK, Robert, b. in London, Aug. 20, 1591; d. at Dean Prior's, Devon, October, 1674; one of the most eminent of our lyric poets; was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge; M.A., 1617; vicar of Dean Prior's, 1629; ejected by the Puritans, 1648, and reinstated 1660. His Nōde Num- bers appeared 1647; and Hesperides, or Works both Human and Divine, 1648. The frequent levity and licentiousness of what he calls "My un baptiz'd rhymes, Writ in my wild, unhallowed times," rather heavily outweighs his occasional sober moods, and but a small proportion of his verses entitle him to be called a sacred poet; but his fresh style and joyous fancy have won as many admirers in our time as he ever had. His "Litanie to the Holy Spirit" is well known.

HERON, Francis, D.D., b. June 28, 1774, near Shippensburg, Penn.; d. Dec. 9, 1834, at Pitts- burgh, Penn. He was born of Scotch-Irish and pious parents, and trained by them and the times to faith and manliness; Dickinson graduated, May, 1794; studied theology with Cooper; licensed Oct. 4, 1797; toughened by severe journey West, 1798-99, kindled by great revivals in progress there; settled at Rocky Springs, Penn., in April, 1800, and, after eleven years' successful pastorate, translated to Pittsburgh First Church.

Here began "labors more abundant." As preacher, he was careful in preparation, impressive, and experimental. The house, too large before, soon became too small. As pastor, he was affectionate, accessible, and progressive in methods. As presbyter, a born leader in synod and presbytery, and moderator of General Assembly in 1827. He was president of the board of directors of the Theological Seminary, Allegheny, from its beginning till his death. Having secured its location at Allegheny, he carried the institution by force of will, large influence, incessant begging, and indomitable trust in its future. As Pittsburgher, he was devoted to the city's interests, jealous of its morals, helpful in extending the churches, founding the first Moral Association, and holding the first temperance meetings.

He was pre-eminently a man to mould the times. "There are but two things in Pittsburgh," was once said,—"Dr. Herron and the Devil; and the doctor seems to be getting the advantage." In personal influence he was commanding and magnetic (aided by an unequalled majesty of presence), equal to emergencies in church or city, with pronounced opinions and well-understood convictions, sound judgment, and warm sympathies, of remarkable courage, and great prudence and wisdom.

SYLVESTER F. SCOVEL.

HERZOG, Johann Jakob, D.D., b. at Basel, Sept. 12, 1805; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 30, 1882. He pursued his university studies (1823-29) at Basel and Berlin. In 1830 he became licentiate in theology, and privydocent in the university of Basel. In 1835 he was called as provisional, but in 1838 was appointed definitely professor of historical theology in the academy at Lausanne. There his colleague was Alexandre Vinet (see art.). He contributed to the Studien u. Kritiken, 1839, an essay upon Zwingli's doctrine of providence and election. Four years later he issued his sketch of John Calvin (Basel, 1843), and the same year and place his elaborate Life of Ecolampadius and the Reformation in Basel (Basel, 2 vols.). In 1845 he criticised the Plymouth Brethren in his Les fiores de Plymouth et John Darby, Lausanne, and that year resigned his professorship (November, 1845) in consequence of a radical revolution, and retired into private life, until, on Tholuck's suggestion, he was called in 1847 to Halle as professor of church history. His acquaintance with two Waldensian students at Lausanne had led him to investigate that ancient sect's early history, and he published De Origine et pristino statu Valdensium (Halle, 1848), the first-fruits of such study. His essay attracted great attention; and under the patronage of the Prussian Government he made a journey through Switzerland, France, and Ireland for the inspection of manuscripts bearing upon the Waldenses. In 1853 he published Die romanischen Waldenser (Halle); in which he proved, that both the Waldensian and other historians were mistaken in attributing to the sect direct primitive descent from apostolic times, but, on the contrary, that the Roman-Catholic historians were right in maintaining that it started in the twelfth century. He also showed, that the sect had from the beginning biblical principles, but was first brought by the Hussite movement and the Reformation of the sixteenth century. He made a journey through Switzerland, France, and Italy for the inspection of manuscripts and documents of apostolic times. His essay attracted great attention; and the whole of the Waldensian and other historians were mistaken in attributing to the sect direct primitive descent from apostolic times, but, on the contrary, that the Roman-Catholic historians were right in maintaining that it started in the twelfth century. He also showed, that the sect had from the beginning biblical principles, but was first brought by the Hussite movement and the Reformation of the sixteenth century upon truly Protestant ground. His work was based upon comprehensive and careful study of the sources, and written in a friendly spirit. In 1854 Herzog went to Erlangen as professor of Reformed theology; and there he lectured until 1877, when he retired upon a pension. At the time of his death he had just finished his Abriss der gesammten Kirchengeschichte, Erlangen, 1876—82. The eleventh and twelfth volumes in this work and Italian have been made, or are in preparation. It was Dr. Herzog's intention to add a supplementary volume, upon the church history of the nineteenth century.

But Dr. Herzog's greatest service was his Real-Encyklopädie für protestantische Theologie u. Kirche. The idea of a religious encyclopedia of a very comprehensive character had long been in the minds of Protestant theologians, and preparations had been made for it under the editorship of Schneckenberger (q.v.); but the Revolution of 1848 put a temporary end to the enterprise. After the excitement of that time had passed, and their business again justified it, the publishers revived the project; and Tholuck was asked to take charge of it, Schneckenberger having meanwhile died (1851) but recommended Herzog to Tholuck, and under the latter's care the first volume appeared at Hamburg in 1854, and the twenty-second and last volume, which contained the very elaborate index, at Gotha in 1888. The encyclopedia was an extraordinary success. It became at once a standard and indispensable work. Such a display of learning had not been previously made. And Dr. Herzog was just the man for his position,—learned, modest, energetic, wise in his sympathies, and liberal in his theology; for, although of the Reformed Church, he had the friendliest feelings towards Lutherans. He treated his contributors with uniform courtesy, kindness, and liberality. Besides bearing the burden of responsibility and care necessarily attached to the editing of so extensive a work, he assumed a large part of the authorship, contributing no less than five hundred and twenty-nine articles, some of them quite extensive and elaborate. But within less than ten years after the completion of his encyclopedia he was called upon to edit a second edition. He prudently allied himself to a younger man, Professor G. L. Plitt, his colleague; and the first volume of the new edition appeared at Leipzig in 1877. Professor Plitt died in 1880, and the burden of responsibility and care necessarily attached to the editing of so extensive a work, he assumed a large part of the authorship, contributing no less than five hundred and twenty-nine articles, some of them quite extensive and elaborate. But within less than ten years after the completion of his encyclopedia he was called upon to edit a second edition. He prudently allied himself to a younger man, Professor Albert Hauck, and three volumes appeared under their conduct; but part 103, the third part of the eleventh volume, brought the announcement that Dr. Herzog had finished his work on earth.

HORNBLOWER, William Henry, D.D., b. March 21, 1820, at Newark, N.J.; son of Chief Justice Hornblower; graduated at Princeton College in 1838; led to Christ by a tract written by Dr. Archibald Alexander, and devoted himself to the ministry; graduated from Princeton seminary in 1843; ordained by presbytery of Elizabeth-town; missionated some months; ordained and installed pastor of church at Paterson, N.J., Jan. 30, 1844; resigned in October, 1871, to become professor of sacred rhetoric, pastoral theology, and church government in the Western Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Allegheny, Penn.; died in that position, July 16, 1863.

He relinquished brilliant prospects in choosing the ministry, and proved his earnestness by devotedness. He earned so good a degree in the faith and practice of his kinsmen that he was the most loving, bright, and genial of friends, the stanchest of advocates where principle was concerned, and eminently spiritually minded and devout.

HORNBLOWER's unvarying characteristics were a firm gentleness, a dignified courtesy, a winning and unselfish interest in others, a tenderness to the suffering which overlooked none. He was the most loving, bright, and genial of friends, the stanchest of advocates where principle was concerned, and eminently spiritually minded and devout.

HOSKINS, Joseph, b. 1745; d. at Bristol, Sept. 28, 1788; was for his last ten years an earnest and successful divine; minister at Castle-Green Chapel, Bristol. His three hundred and eighty-four Hymns, published 1789, are of the humblest and most commonplace character; but a few of them are still used.

HUNT, William, b. at Breccles Hall, Norfolk, Dec. 21, 1754; d. at Woodbridge, Oct. 9, 1829; was ordained, 1781, and became vicar of Debden, Suffolk, 1790. In October, 1822, he left the Established Church, and in 1823 became Congregational pastor at Woodbridge. He wrote The...
Fundamental Principles of the Established Church proved to be the Doctrine of the Scripture, 1790; A Farewell Testimony, 1823; Reasons for Secession, 1830; A Glance at the Stage, A Catechism, and four hundred and twenty Hymns, 1813-24. Most of them are full of spirit, and respectable; but a few have merit, and are used.

HYDE, Abby (Bradley), b. at Stockbridge, Mass., Sept. 28, 1790; d. at Andover, Conn., April 7, 1872; married Rev. Lavius Hyde, 1818, and lived at Salisbury (Mass.), Bolton and Ellington (Conn.), Wavland and Becket (Mass.). She contributed to Nettleton’s Village Hymns, 1824, nine pieces, three of which have been widely copied and used.

INDIANS OF NORTH AMERICA. 1. Religion.

The Indians universally believe in God or gods, and in the immortality of the soul, and its existence in a conscious state hereafter. There has never, probably, been an infidel among them. They believe in multitudes of spirits or gods everywhere,—gods of the woods, gods under the lakes, gods everywhere: in fact, the world to them is full of spiritual existences. Very likely of animals even, as the bears, has, according to their belief, its spiritual a-type, of which the body which they see is but the outward expression. In their religious rites, or Grand Medicine, they call all these gods, one by one, in endless numbers to their aid. Besides this, the Algonquin races now acknowledge one of these innumerable gods as God supreme: but whether this was their original belief before their discovery by white people, or whether they have insensibly imbibed this from the missionaries with whom they have come in contact from time to time for the last few hundred years, the writer does not pretend to decide; but he believes the latter to be the case. This Supreme Deity the Algonquin races call sometimes “Kitchi-Manido” (“the Great Spirit”), sometimes “Kie-Manido” (“the Kind, Cherishing Spirit”). The writer is, on the whole, inclined to believe, from all he has heard from the Indians, that their fathers had gradually lost entirely the notion of one supreme God, and had degenerated into that of gods everywhere, among whom Kie-Manido was only one. Even now the heathen Indians occasionally speak of him as such.

They are also worshippers of idols, even to this day. About their villages one may often see a rude image—carved in wood, and dressed up with clothes—placed aloft at the outskirts of their village, to ward off disease and ill luck, to which they pay their devotions. Everywhere, too, if there be a stone of striking shape or size, or naturally resembling the human face or figure, they will bow down in adoration to it, or to the spirit of which it is the outward expression; and one may everywhere see the offerings of tobacco, which, in their veneration, they have laid upon it.

As to their great religious rite, the “Grand Medicine,” or “Me-da-wi-win,” which is common to all the tribes, we quote from one of themselves (an educated mixed-blood, who spent his life in finding out their true beliefs on all subjects) as to its origin and purpose, and which any one who is much among them and hears them will know to be the truth.

“They fully believe that the red man mortally angered the Great Spirit, which caused the deluge; and at the commencement of the New Earth it was only through the medium and intercession of a powerful being whom they denominate Wa-wen-a-bo-zho, that they were allowed to exist, and means were given them whereby to subsist, and support life; and a code of religion was more lately bestowed upon them, whereby they could commune with the offended Great Spirit, and ward off the approach and ravages of death. This they term ‘Me-da-wi-win,’ or ‘Grand Medicine.’”

All the heathen Indians firmly believe, as the above writer states, that the Grand Medicine was given them by the Great Spirit. It is also right and proper, saying that they use it in obtaining long life in this world, and warding off the ravages of sickness and death. It has no reference to life in the other world, all the Indian’s hopes and fears being bounded by this life. He tries to prolong his life in this world by every means, of which he esteems this the very chief; but beyond that his thoughts do not go. He has no fear or dread of the future, nor any idea that his actions here may influence his state there. Very often, accompanying his most solemn performance of the Grand Medicine, there will be in the same vicinity gamblers, lewdness, and even murder; and it is not thought that there is any thing out of consonance with what he is engaged in. Very often he is drunk when beginning its performance, and that is thought to be just as proper as if he were sober. Morality is entirely divorced from his religion, and has nothing to do with it.

As to their belief about the immortality of the soul, it cannot be more exactly told than in the words of the writer before quoted, who had it from Indian sources, and was most careful to have it exactly correct.

“When an Ojibway dies, his body is placed in a grave, generally in a sitting posture, facing the west. With his body are buried all the articles needed in life for a journey,—of a man, his gun, blanket, kettle, fire-steel, flint, and moccasins; of a woman, her moccasins, axe, portage-collar, blanket, and kettle.

“The soul is said to depart from the body either after the death of the body, on a deep beaten path, which leads westward. The first object he comes to in following this path, is the great ‘Cherishing Spirit’ (‘He-nah-berry’), or strawberry, which stands on the roadside like a huge rock, and from which he takes a handful, and eats on his way.

“Traveling until he reaches a deep, rapid stream of water, over which lies the much dreaded ‘Go-gog-azh-o-gun,’ or ‘Rolling and Sinking Bridge.’ Once safely over this, as the traveller looks back, he sees the whole form of a huge serpent swimming, twisting and untwisting its folds across the stream.

“After camping out four nights, and travelling each day through a prairie country, the soul arrives in the land of spirits, where he is greeted by his relatives accumulated since mankind were first created. All is rejoicing, singing, and dancing. They live in a beautiful country, interspersed with clear lakes and streams, forests and prairie, and abounding in fruit and game to repeteption: in a word, abounding in all that the red man most covets in this life. It is that kind of a paradise which he only his manner of life in this world is fitted to enjoy.”

The Ojibways call the road which leads to this place “Tchi-be-kuna,” or “the Road of Souls.”

They all — good, bad, and indifferent — expect to go there, and to find all their relatives there. There also, they believe they will be waited on by the souls of those whom they have slain in battle, as slaves.

When entering on manhood, the heathen Indian practises a rigid fast, that he may, if possible, obtain a vision of the Great Spirit, or of some subordinate spirit, and may in consequence be directed to a long and prosperous life. He builds himself a sort of nest in a tree, or on the top of a rock, and there retires, and fasts for from four to ten days, till he obtains the much desired vision, or is compelled by hunger to desist. By this vision, if he obtain it, all his subsequent life is directed. He never mentions it but with the utmost veneration, and even with the sacrifice of tobacco or other things precious to him, to the spirit of the vision he has seen. They often hang up an offering of tobacco or clothing on poles to the sun (whom they suppose to be a god, a man) and the moon his wife. They have some sense of guilt, though faint till it is aroused by contact with Christianity; for in circumstances of great distress they will take a dog, and, carrying him out in a canoe, drop him into the middle of a lake as a sacrifice to appease the angry powers unseen.

2. Influence of Christianity. — Within the last twenty-five years almost have serious efforts been begun to Christianize the Indians. These efforts have been attended with, on the whole, good success, and have done more towards preventing wars, saving the treasury, protecting the frontier settlers, spreading peace, prosperity, and advancement, as well among the Indians as among the whites, than all the countless wars, ten thousands of lives, and hundreds of millions of dollars spent in hostile operations against them during the last hundred years. There are now very many native clergy and Indian congregations; and in consequence, though a very remote and unexpected consequence, there are now tens of thousands of acres of land tilted, and hundreds of thousands of bushels of grain of all kinds raised by them, and more progress made by them since that policy was inaugurated than in all the previous hundred years of hopeless wars.

3. Prospects of the Indian. — If the present policy of peaceful Christian missions to civilize and Christianize the Indians be continued and prosecuted, they will be as much brighter than ever before, and not many years will pass till they will be self-sustaining Christian farmers and herdsmen. Experience shows that there is no use trying to make a civilized man out of an Indian, without first making a Christian of him: it is beginning at the wrong end. In our experience, no heart can ever amounts to anything as a farmer. The two are inseparably bound up together, — to be a farmer Indian and to be a Christian Indian. Christianity changes the very expression of their faces, especially of the women. One can tell a Christian Indian woman, by her expression, from a heathen as far as one can see her. She has lost that hard, wild, and forbidding expression, more like that of a wild animal than of a human being; and in its place an expression of softness, gentleness, mildness, and love, has crept over her features. She is no longer a wild animal and a slave: she has become human by the gospel.

The Indians are not so quick to adopt Christianity, or any new thing, as the negroes, being very slow and deliberate in the movement of their minds; but, once embraced, they cling faster to it. They seem to value religion, when they do embrace it, far higher than we, as, indeed, it is often all they have. It makes them well dressed, clean, quiet, and industrious.

What the Indian needs now is to have all law extended over him the same as over all the other people of the land, to have schools like little district schools established everywhere by the government wherever there are Indian children, to have their lands allotted to them in severality the same as white people, to be made to pay taxes as soon as possible, to be made citizens, and allowed to vote.

The system of free rations should cease the earliest possible moment, and in its stead a complete outfit for farming should be offered to every Indian family willing to commence that life; namely, a hundred and sixty acres of land in severality, a yoke of oxen, wagon, sleigh, cow, plough, harrow, and all necessary farming-implements, seed for his land, and provisions to last until he can raise a crop; and, having once given him this complete outfit, let him then shift for himself. Cease to baby him. If white people were always so babied, it would take all the manliness and self-reliance out of them.

And, with all this, let missions be sustained among them by the good Christian people; so that Christianity can have an opportunity to do its work among them, and raise them, as it has raised all other people with whom it has come in contact. And, as the chiefest means to this end, let native Indian clergy be raised up and employed, of whom there are now very many, and whose labors have been blessed with abundant success. Thus employing the two powerful arms, — the temporal and the spiritual, education and Christianity, — an end will be reached which will gladden every lover of humanity, and solve the most difficult of problems.

J. A. GILFILLAN (Indorsed by Bishop Whipple).

IRONS, Joseph, b. at Ware, Herts, Nov. 5, 1785; d. in London, April 3, 1862; was originally a builder, but became an Independent minister, and settled at Ware about 1812. Samuel Irons died in the parish of Cambridge 1818, where he was pastor of Grove Chapel from 1819. He wrote Jazer, and other works in prose, besides Calvary, Zion’s Hymns, 1818; Judas, a paraphrastic version of the Psalms, 1847; and Nympheas, being Canticles similarly treated, 1841. Some of his hymns have been used by advanced Calvinists. A memoir by C. Bayfield appeared 1852.

IRONS, William Josiah, D.D., b. at Hoddesdon, Herts, Sept. 12, 1812; d. June 19, 1883; was a son of the above, but became an advanced Anglican. He was educated at Queen’s College, Oxford; curate of Newington, 1836; vicar of Walworth, 1837; of Barkway, Herts, 1838; of Brompton, London, 1842; since then prebendary of St. Paul’s, and rector of St. Mary Woolnoth. He published many theological works besides a Metrical Psalter, 1857, and a hundred and ninety original Psalms and Hymns for the Church, 1875. He has made the best version of Dies Irae, now generally used.

JOHNS, John, D.D., b. in New Castle, Del., July 10, 1796; d. April 5, 1875, at the Protestant-Episcopal Theological Seminary of Virginia. Bishop Johns entered Princeton College in 1812, and graduated with the first honors in 1815. In 1816 he entered the theological seminary of Princeton. In both the college and seminary he was the classmate of Rev. Dr. Charles Hodge. Their friendship was lasting, and, like that of David and Jonathan, was "wonderful." On hearing of Bishop John's death, Dr. Hodge said, "I have no such friend on earth." He was ordained by Bishop White in 1819. His first charge was in Frederick, Md.; from thence, in 1829, he became rector of Christ Church in Baltimore, where he remained till he was elected assistant bishop of the diocese of Virginia. He was consecrated in 1842, and on the death of Bishop Meade, in 1862, became bishop.

Bishop Johns was no ordinary man. He was by his natural gifts "fashioned to much honor." His classmate, Dr. Hodge, said of him, "He was always first, — first everywhere, and first in every thing." He had a well modulated voice, an earnest and impassioned delivery, a tenacious memory, and extraordinary fluency of language, which made him very popular as a preacher. As bishop, in the administration of his diocese and of the affairs of the church generally, he manifested wisdom, prudence, and gentleness. He was the author of a professor of homiletics and pastoral theology in the Protestant-Episcopal Theological Seminary of Virginia. As a man he was greatly beloved for the indecipherable charm of his manner and the warmth of his friendship. His last hours were cheered by the full assurance of faith in that gospel he had always preached. The sting of death was taken away, and the grave robbed of its victory. JOSEPH PACKARD.

JOYCE, James, b. at Frome, Somersetshire, Nov. 2, 1781; d. at Dorking, Oct. 9, 1850; was vicar of Dorking, and wrote A Treatise on Love to God, 1822, The Lay of Truth, 1825, and some hymns, one of which, on the Jews, is much used.

KEY, Francis Scott, b. in Frederick County, Md., Aug. 1, 1779; d. in Baltimore, Jan. 11, 1843; is remembered as the author of The Star-spangled Banner, 1814. He was educated at St. John's College, Annapolis; began to practise law at Frederick, Md.; removed to Washington, and became United-States district attorney. His Poems, 1857, include three hymns of some value.

KRAUTH, Charles Porterfield, D.D., LL.D., b. in Martinsburgh, Va., March 17, 1829; d. in Philadelphia, Jan. 2, 1883. He was the oldest son of Charles Philip Krauth, D.D.; was educated at Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, Penn. (of which his father was president), graduating in 1839, and at the Lutheran Theological Seminary at the same place; was pastor at Baltimore, Md. (1841–47), Shepherdstown, Va. (1847–48), Winchester, Va. (1848–55), Pittsburgh (1855–60), and of several churches in Philadelphia after 1858; editor of Lutheran and Missionary, 1861–67; professor of systematic theology in the Lutheran seminary at Philadelphia from its foundation in 1864 until his death; professor of mental and modern science, University of Pennsylvania, from 1868; vice-provost of same institution from 1873. He was a member of the American Oriental Society, of the American Philosophical Society, and of the Old Testament Company of the American Bible Revision Committee. He was by universal acknowledgment the most accomplished scholar and theologian of the Lutheran Church in the United States. Furnished with a well-selected library of fourteen thousand volumes, which, in some of the departments represented, was almost exhaustive with respect to primary sources of information, a most exact and conscientious student of a wide range of subjects, and a master of the Bible Revision Committee record their estimate in the words, "America has produced few men who united in their own persons so many of the excellence which distinguish the scholar, the theologian, the exegete, the debater, and leader of his brethren, as did our accomplished associate. His learning did not smother his genius, nor did his philosophical attainments impair the simplicity of his faith." His greatest work, The Conservative Reformation and its Theology (Philadelphia, 1872), is both historical and doctrinal. He translated Tholuck's Commentary on John (1860) and Ullrich's Review of Strauss (1874), and edited Berkeley's Principles of Human Knowledge (1874) and Fleming's Vocabulary of Philosophy (1860), to the last edition of which (1877) he added a Vocabulary of the Philosophical Sciences of equal extent. The Revised doctrinal basis of the General Synod (1869) is a modification of a form of subscription to the Augsburg Confession he had prepared for the Pittsburgh synod (1868). Of the General Council he was president for ten years, composed its Fundamental Principles of Faith and Church Polity, co-operated largely in the determination of its liturgical forms, moulded to a great extent all its legislation involving doctrinal questions, while, in the defence of doctrinal theses at various times presented, all his exalted gifts shone with their fullest brilliancy. Failing health prevented the completion of a life of Luther for the fourth Luther centenary, for which he had made extensive preparations, including a visit to the homes of Luther in 1880. A memoir is in preparation by his son-in-law and colleague, Dr. A. Spaeht. See also biographical sketch by Dr. B. M. Schmucker, in Lutheran Church Review for July, 1885 (separately printed), where Dr. Krauth's bibliography fills five pages of fine type.

LELAND, John, b. at Grafton, Mass., May 14, 1794; d. at North Adams, Jan. 14, 1841; was an eminent and active Baptist minister and politician in Virginia, 1775-90, and thenceforth at Conway, Cheshire, and New Ashford, Mass., excepting the years 1804-06 in New-York State. His influence contributed largely to the election of Madison instead of Patrick Henry to the Virginia Convention, and the consequent ratification of the United-States Constitution. Leland was a man of some talent and immense energy, and a local celebrity and power through life. He preached near eight thousand sermons, baptized 1,278 persons, and published some thirty pamphlets. He wrote some hymns, one or two of which are still used. His autobiography, sermons, etc., appeared 1845.

LENOX, James, b. in New-York City, August, 1800; d. there Feb. 17, 1880. He inherited and possessed a life great wealth, but lived in noble simplicity. He was educated at Trinity College, and studied law, but never practised it. His means enabled him to gratify his taste for art and rare books. He accumulated a most valuable library of some twenty-five thousand volumes, and a gallery of choice paintings. These he removed to the Lenox Library, on Fifth Avenue, opposite Central Park, New York, which he founded in 1870, and built at an expense of nearly half a million of dollars. The library is particularly rich in Bibles (including a Mazarin Bible, the Complutensian Polyglot, and one of the two extant copies of Tyndale's Pentateuch), in Shakespeare, Dante, Milton, and Bunyan literature, and in American history. He founded the New-York Presbyterian Hospital in 1872, and in 1873 gave the site of the Presbyterian Home for Aged Women. He contributed liberally to literary and religious institutions, especially to Princeton Theological Seminary, and perhaps, in the aggregate, still more largely in ways unknown to the public. He was president of the American Bible Society from 1864 to 1871, and a lifelong member of the Presbyterian Church. He had such an imagination, and a temperament essentially poetical, and spent all his life gTeat wealth, but lived in noble simplicity. He was educated at Princeton, became a devoted student of theology, and studied with marked zeal and swift progress, but providentially hindered from finishing his studies, went into politics, and in 1811 he was chosen to the Senate of Pennsylvania; after seven years' service, elected to the United-States Senate, and, after six years in that office, made secretary of the Senate. This honorable life-station he surrendered in 1836 for a call to the secretarial post of the infant missionary society of the synod of Pittsburgh, which became, the year following, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church.

The place for the man was the result of Christian faith and moral heroism; the man for the place, the result of a long chain of preparatory providences. His public life had proven his ability, integrity, sagacity, practical judgment, systematic study, and thorough mastery of every subject considered, and had demonstrated permanency and depth of his Christian convictions and character under the most trying circumstances. The man who had elicited the respect of Webster and Clay as "authority upon all points of political history and constitutional law," and had opposed slavery, studied and befriended the Indians, founded the congressional prayer-meeting and temperance society, was just the man in heart, to undertake the new and difficult cause, to allay the irritations of the times while developing the true principles, to awaken the churches, to enlist the public authorities, to grasp comprehensively the world to be evangelized, and rapidly to develop the latent energies, and shape the hitherto unknown instrumentalities.

That he did all this is simple matter of precious history. Walter Lowrie lives everywhere in mission zeal and efficiency. In the work he constantly manifested executive energy, unflagging industry, self-sacrificing readiness to endure the exposure of distant journeys, and the utmost patience with the grossest details. He was for thirty years the efficient head of the mission society, editing their publications. He wrote a number of good hymns.

LOWRIE, Hon. Walter, b. near Edinburgh, Scotland, Dec. 10, 1784; d. in New-York City, Dec. 14, 1868. He was brought to America at eight years of age; wrought on the farm in Butler County, Pennsylvania, until after conversion at eighteen; sought the ministry, and studied with marked zeal and swift progress, but providentially hindered from finishing his studies, went into politics, and in 1811 he was chosen to the Senate of Pennsylvania; after seven years' service, elected to the United-States Senate, and, after six years in that office, made secretary of the Senate. in Aid of Self-Improvement, 1854; Among Transgressors, 1860; A Group of Six Sermons, 1891; The Mornington Lecture, 1870; and Sermons for my Curates, 1871, reprinted as The Moral of Accidents, etc. Sylvestor Bloody, so much written by him, as reported from his delivery.

In 1855 he published The Rivulet, a Contribution to Sacred Song. This was attacked with great virulence by James Grant in the Morning Advertiser, and Dr. John Campbell in The British Buanner. Newman Hall, Thomas Binney, and other leading Independents stood by Mr. Lynch; and thus arose the once famous "Rivulet Controversy," which filled some thousand pages, chiefly of close, printed octavo. The most memorable part in it was borne by Lynch himself, as "Silent Long," in Songs Controversial and The Ethics of Quotation, and under his own name in the Christian Spectator for November, 1856. In his puny frame dwelt an indomitable spirit, with the indignation as of a Hebrew prophet for meanness, shams, compromises. The Rivulet won him many friends, and the assaults upon it many enemies. The book itself is full of fresh thought, delicate poetry, uncommonplace experience, and quiet devotion: it reached a third edition, much enlarged, in 1868. Selections from it are found in many recent hymnals, both English and American; the most familiar of them beginning, "Gracious Spirit, dwell with me." See Lynch's Memoirs, edited by William White, London, 1874.

Most eminent as factor in revivals of 1802. Much in prayer.Originated the sunset, fifteen-minute concert of prayer for revival. On fourth sabbath of September, 1802, after sermon on "Choose ye this day," etc., whole night spent by people in prayer; interest deepened; bodily pros- trations were experienced. Other neighborhoods sired the continued together, despite rain and snow. Enlarged communion seasons. Ten thousand present at Upper Buffalo, 14th November. There Macurdy preached, as if by inspiration, from Ps. ii., the famous "war sermon." Scene at close, says an eye-witness, "like the close of a battle in which every tenth man had fallen, fatally wounded." Revival continued from two to four years; saved the district from infidelity and immorality, and exerted powerful influence on the West. Macurdy's Indian work as remarkable for sagacity, bravery, perseverance, and self-sacrifice. Eight missionary journeys to Wyandottes, Maumees, etc., travelling forty-five hundred miles, all on horseback. Pastorate resigned, 1835, for infirmity. Laborered unremittingly in Allegheny City as long as strength endured.

MADAN, Martin, b. 1728; d. 1790; was a cousin of Cowper, and the founder and first chaplain of Lock Hospital, in London. There he was long useful, but lost repute through his Thelyphthora, which favored polygamy. His Collection of Psalms and Hymns, 1760, was one of the most important and influential of early hymnals. He wrote no originals, but altered and enlarged some verses of others, and with unusual judgment and taste, so that several favorite hymns as now used are his in part.

McMILLAN, John, D.D., Presbyterian; b. Nov., 1762, of Scotch-Irish parents, at Fagg's Manor, Penn.; d. at Cannonsburgh, Penn., Nov. 16, 1838. His sisters labored in the field to aid in educating him, first at academy, and then at Princeton College, from 1770. Awakened in the academy when less than seventeen years old by the passage through characteristically strong religious struggles, but finally yielded his will to God's call to the ministry. His theological studies were with Dr. Robert Smith of Pequea. He was ordained at Chambersburg, Penn., June, 1776; as pastor of Chartiers and Pigeon Creek in Washington County. Revolution intervening, he visited the congregations frequently, but removed with his family only in November, 1778. Once settled among a people grappling with the forests, and surrounded by savages housed in log huts, clothed in linsey-woolsey, fed from the products of their own labor, but true to God and their standards, he shared their lot, organized their churches, re- buked rising immorality, kept the generations true to the faith, provided for a needed ministry, visited, catechised, preached and lived the truth through the nearly sixty years most fruitful min- istry, whose fruits remain. He was prominent in the revivals of 1781, when the people spent whole nights in prayer, of 1795, of 1799, of 1802, and of 1823. As ecclesiastic, he was the nucleus of presbyteries, the stern advocate of sound discipline, the relentless opponent of laxity in doctrine; as citizen, he was the defence of law and order during the whiskey insurrection (1794); as educator, he was the father of the "Log-cabin College," the "founder of Jefferson," and the teacher in theology of more than a hundred min- isters, who were well taught despite defective apparatus. He resigned his pastoral charge in 1830.

MEDLEY, Samuel, b. at Cheshunt, Herts, June 23, 1798; d. at Liverpool, July 17, 1879; was apprenticed to an oilman in London, 1753; entered the navy as a midshipman, 1755; was wounded, 1759, and soon after "converted;" opened a school in London, 1760 or 1761; became Baptist pastor at Watford, Herts, 1767, and at Liverpool, 1772, where his ministry was earnest and efficient. His Hymns appeared on leaflets or broadsides: seventy-seven of them were gathered in a volume, 1759, and two hundred and thirty-two in 1800. They show some talent and good taste, and of them all have been very popular. He was fond of building a hymn on some text or catchword, repeated as often as possible and usually at the end of of Scotland, and had given to that church in almost unbroken succession a line of most estimable ministers. The baronetcy in the family is one of the oldest in Scotland, having been created in 1626. The grandfather of Sir Henry was long and widely esteemed as minister of St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, and a leader of the evangelical party in the church.

After receiving education at the high school and university of Edinburgh, young Moncreiff entered the university of Oxford, where he was a fellow-student of Mr. Gladstone and other eminent men. Influence was brought to bear on him to join the Church of England; and, as the Archbishop of Canterbury was the husband of his aunt, his prospects there were excellent. But he preferred to labor in the church of his fathers, and, returning to Edinburgh to study at the Divinity Hall, he was ordained to the ministry in the country parish of Baldernoch in 1836, whence he was translated to East Kilbride, near Glasgow, in 1837. At the disruption in 1843 he joined the Free Church, and in 1852 was translated to Free St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, in which charge he remained till his death. Sir Henry was one of the principal clerks of the General Assembly of the Free Church; and he likewise held the situation of secretary to the Queen's printers in Scotland, in which capacity it was his duty to see to the correctness of the various editions printed of the Bible. In 1869 he was moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church. He was the first lecturer under the foundation of the Chalmers Lectureship, and had but recently delivered and published his course of lectures on the Principles of the Free Church.

Sir Henry had quite a genius for ecclesiastical law and ecclesiastical procedure and forms. His services as clerk of the Free-Church Assembly were of great value, not only in promoting the orderly course of business, but also in guiding deliberations, and elucidating the principles that were applicable to difficult questions. The whole question of the relation of Church and State in Scotland, especially as it came to a crisis in 1843, was the subject of his very profound and careful study. He published several treatises on the subject, including A Letter to Lord Melbourne, in 1840; The Practice of the Free Church in her Several Courts, 1871; A Letter to the Duke of Argyle, in 1875; Vindication of the Claim of Right of the Free Church, 1877; and, most elaborate of all, his Chalmers Lectures, just referred to. The Practice of the Free Church is the book by which he will probably be most remembered. He deemed it quite competent, in harmony with Free-Church principles, to negotiate for union with the United Presbyterians; although, when the question of disestablishment came up, he thought that step inconsistent with these principles. He equally disapproved of the existing Established Church, and of the attempt to pull it down without rearing a purer establishment in its room.

Sir Henry Moncreiff was an assiduous and faithful minister. His discourses were earnest, evangelical, substantial, and often powerful, though he was always a very polished preacher. He was regular and unstinted in visiting the members of his congregation, and in all the other parts of pastoral duty. Personally he was kind, affable, and the true bearing of a Christian minister. In 1847 he became a member of the Presbyterian Church, to which he remained bound by a love and loyalty which deepened with every year of his life. Connected during his later years with the Brick Church of New York, and devoted to its interests, he brought forth abundant fruits of Christian benevolence in large gifts and earnest labors for many good causes. His benefactions to Union Theological Seminary, Williams College, the Woman's Hospital, the Presbyterian Boards of Missions, the Presbyterian Hospital, and other similar objects, were most generous. He furnished funds for a fire-proof building of the valuable library of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, now called "the Morgan Library." He was a director by many of the religious and charitable societies; and his name abides in honor in the church as one who feared God, adorned his faith, and did great good in the world.

HENRY J. VAN DYKE, JUN.

PATTERSON, Joseph, b. County Down, Ire., March, 1752; d. at Pittsburgh, Feb. 4, 1832. Accepted Christ behind the scenes of his youth. Held prayer-meetings with his playmates at ten years of age. Married and immigrated in 1773. Present at first public reading of the Declaration of Independence; in the army until 1777. Came to Washington County, Penn., 1779. Shared perils of time and place until 1785. Prepared for the ministry, and graduated at the presbytery; licensed, August, 1788; settled at Raccoon and Montours churches, April, 1789. Preached to people who walked ten to fifteen miles to worship without house or fire even in winter. Made missionary journey to Maumee Indians in 1802. Resigned pastorate in 1818. Removed to Pittsburgh, where he sought the river population, distributed Bibles (6,663 copies in all), formed the Sabbath-school Association (in 1817), stimulated the piety of all the churches, led the "sunrise" prayer-meetings, conversed with inquirers in all the revivals, helped every good work, prayed in every room of the unfinished theological seminary, led the sick, and gave tender exhortations at the communion-table. SYLVESTER F. SCOVIEL.

SCHWAB, Gustav, b. at Stuttgart, June 19, 1792; d. there Nov. 4, 1850. He studied theology and philosophy at Tubingen as a classmate of Baur; was appointed professor of ancient literature in the gymnasium of Stuttgart in 1817, pastor at Gomringen in 1837, and at the St. Leonar Church in Stuttgart in 1842, and member of the highest ecclesiastical tribunal of Wurttemberg. His reputation is chiefly literary. He belonged to the Swabian school of poets, with his intimate friend Ludwig Uhland; and his poems are distin guished by purity and warmth of feeling, and simplicity and naïveté of form. A few of them are religious, and one (Lass dich nicht den Früh ling täuschen) was admitted into the new hymn-book of Wurttemberg. The first collected edition of his Gedichte appeared in 1832, a second revised edition, Neue Auswahl (1832), has often been reprinted. Of his prose works, mostly consisting of sketches from nature and history, the most remarkable are Schiller's Leben (1840), VENI, CREATOR SPIRITUS. The authorship of this hymn has been very much disputed. George Fabricius (1564) assigns it to Ambrose; Thomasius and Daniel, to Charlemagne; the Encyclopedia Britannica (art. “Hymns”), to Charles the Bald (Carolus Crassus, grandson of Charlemagne); and Mone, Wackernagel, and March, to Gregory the Great. It is first mentioned in the Annalen Bemersheim as one of the remainders of the relics of St. Marculfus, A.D. 898. The Anglican Church retains it in the offices for ordering of priests, and consecrating of bishops; the Roman Church, additionally, in the consecration of the Pope. Superstitious reverence attached to its repetition as a charm against enemies. It is found, generally, in the German breviaries and missals of the thirteenth to the fourteenth century. Its true author is doubtless Rabanus Maurus, pupil of Alcuin, bishop of Mayence, and poet-laureate of the time of Charlemagne. The arguments in behalf of this view are, (1) The hymn can only be attributable to a scholar, a theologian, and a poet. (2) Its latest date is restricted by the considerations just offered, and its earliest date depends on the doctrinal point of the process of the Holy Spirit from both the Father and the Son. The election of the relic of St. Marculfus, A.D. 898. The Benedictine Order, Sit laus, etc.) was found by the Council of Toledo, A.D. 589, and re-affirmed by the synod of Aquisgranum (Aachen), A.D. 809. (3) The word “paracletus” (παρακλητος) in the hymn is scanned differently from Prudentius and Adam of St. Victor, who in the usual manner make the penultimate syllable short. This would go far to establish the author as a person who pronounced Greek by quantity rather than by accent, and certainly shows him to have understood that language. (4) The hymn (divested of its modern stanza, Da gaudiorum, etc., and of Hincmar of Rheims’ doxology, Sit laus, etc.) was found by Christopher Brower (1559–1617) in “an approved and very ancient manuscript.” Brower was a Jesuit, and the antiquarian and rector of the college at Fulda, and published the poems of Rabanus Maurus as an appendix to those of Fortunatus (Cologne, 1617). Wackernagel (i.75) admits that this assignment deserves “some notice,” though he prefers the Gregorian authorship. (5) But this hymn does not appear among the eight which are included in the works of Gregory the Great (cf. Migne: Patrof., 78, 849), and does appear in those of Rabanus Maurus (Migne: Patrof., 112).
White. 2609. Zschokke.

1867). (6) Charlemagne was not scholar enough to have composed it without Alcuin's help (Wackernagel, i. 75). (7) The hymn is really a paraphrase of Rabanus Maurus' own chapter on the Holy Spirit (Migne, 111, 25); and in his hymn "Aeterne rerum conditor, et clares," etc., Rabanus Maurus scans "paracletus" as in the "Veni, Creator." (8) In respect to the lines "Injirma," it is noticeable that these are in the "very doubtful" stanzas of Ambrose's "Veni, Redemptor gentium," where they probably are an interpolation.

Samuel W. Duffield.

White, Norman, a New-York merchant and Christian philanthropist; son of Daniel White; was b. at Andover, Conn., Aug. 8, 1805; and d. at New Rochelle, N.Y., June 13, 1883. He was a lineal descendant of John White, one of the original settlers in 1635, of Hartford, Conn. Mr. White commenced his life as a merchant in New York, in 1827, and for more than fifty years was actively and successfully in business-life. He was principally engaged in the manufacture and sale of paper, but was also interested in various other branches of trade, and was for several years president of the Mercantile National Bank.

During all this period of more than half a century he was prominent in works of benevolence and in the religious movements of the day. He was an active member of the Presbyterian Church, and for more than forty years a ruling elder. He was president of the Young Men's Bible Society, and afterwards an influential manager and vice-president of the American Bible Society. To his wise foresight and practical sagacity when upon its building committee, it is largely indebted for its present site and its model building. He was interested in the Union Theological Seminary from the time of its founding, was for twenty-five years one of the directors upon its board, and for twelve years its vice-president.

The chief public work of Mr. White's life was in connection with the New-York Sabbath Committee. He had long been deeply impressed with the danger to morality and religion from the increasing desecration of the Lord's Day, especially in our larger cities; and, after much thought and prayer, it was at his suggestion that in 1857 a meeting of Christian men was held in New York at which the Sabbath Committee was formed. The details of the work of this organization are given elsewhere [see art. in loco]; and need not be repeated. On this committee Mr. White was made the chairman, a position he held until his death; and, while he was nobly seconded in his efforts by the eminent Christian men who were associated with him, it is beyond doubt that the very successful results of the work were largely due to the zeal, courage, and patience with which for so many years he guided the undertaking.

He was also instrumental in the establishment of similar committees in other places, and when abroad in 1871 was invited to address a meeting, held in London, and explain the methods of his work for the sabbath, which had attracted the interest of Christians in that city.

Mr. White's character and influence are well expressed in the following words extracted from the resolutions passed at the time of his death by the directors of the Union Theological Seminary:—

While energetic in action, he was eminently sagacious in council. In difficult emergencies his advice was always sought, and had great weight. It may be said with perfect truth that both in the church and in society he was characterized by the same union of boldness and wisdom. He was always ready for any good cause, and during his long Christian life was one of the most influential laymen which this city has produced."

Wilson, Samuel Jennings, D.D., LL.D., b. July 19, 1828, in Western Pennsylvania (Washington County), of godly parentage; converted in Washington College (Dr. Brownson, pastor) at twenty-one years of age; graduated thence in 1852; entered the Western Theological Seminary (Presbyterian) the same year; licensed at close of his course, in 1855, by presbytery of Washington; during 1855-57 instructor in Hebrew in the same seminary, elected to its chair of ecclesiastical and historical subjects, and re-elected in 1857, and ordained sine titulo by presbytery of Washington the same year; relinquished homiletics to Dr. William M. Paxton in 1860; became senior professor in 1876, and about 1879 added history of doctrines; preached as stated supply at Wheeling and at Sharpsburgh; pastor of Sixth Church from 1862 to 1877; completed twenty-five years of continuous service in his professorship, at an event celebrated with enthusiasm, on the 18th of April, 1883; died four months later, Aug. 17, 1883, at Sewickley, Penn., on the Ohio, twelve miles from Pittsburgh.

He was an excellent teacher, preacher, and speaker, and in private life unselfish, sympathetic, and sincere. He had great influence in the region of his birth. He was a stanch Presbyterian, and sat as delegate in the Presbyterian General Assembly in 1857, and in the Presbyterian Council in Philadelphia (1880). On the latter occasion he read a paper upon "The Distinctive Principles of Presbyterianism." (See Report of Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, Philadelphia, [1880], pp. 145-156.) He contributed the art. Western Theological Seminary in the third volume of this Encyclopedia.

Zschokke, Johann Heinrich Daniel, b. at Magdeburg, March 22, 1771; d. at Biberstein, June 27, 1848. He studied at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and in 1792 began to lecture there upon literary and historical subjects. In 1796 he was refused the appointment as professor, in consequence of his opposition to the Prussian minister's (Wöllner) order, that all preachers should conform their sermons to the Confessional statements. He went to Switzerland, and for the rest of his life played a prominent part in Swiss affairs, especially at Aarau. He was a poet, a novelist, an historian (cf. especially his Des Schweizerlandes Geschichte für das Schweizervolk, 1822, Eng. trans., N.Y., 1855); but he is best known as the author of Stunden der Andacht (1808, last ed., 1874, 6 vols.; twice translated, last in 1892, Meditationen auf Todes.
MARTENSEN.  2610  MARTENSEN.

and Eternity). It is the best devotional volume produced by rationalism, and has received great popularity in England by royal favor. It was partly to counteract its influence that Tholuck wrote his Hours of Christian Devotion.

Just as we concluded this volume, the intelligence of Bishop Martensen’s death arrived.

MARTENSEN, Hans Lassen, D.D., an eminent Danish theologian and bishop; b. at Flensburg, Aug. 19, 1808; d. in Copenhagen, Feb. 4, 1884. He was brought up in the ideas of Hegel and Franz Baader, and these ideas influenced his Lutheran theology. He obtained the gold medal for his ecclesiastical examination (1822), and, at state expense, studied at Berlin, Munich, Vienna, and Paris, particularly the philosophy of the middle age. On his return, in 1836, he took the degree of licentiate in theology, for which he presented a remarkable thesis on the autonomy of the human conscience, De autonomia conscientia sui humanae, Copenhagen, 1837 (translated into Danish, 1841, and into German, Kiel, 1844). He began lecturing upon moral philosophy, at the university of Copenhagen, in 1837, and was made ordinary-professor in 1840.

He attracted throngs of hearers. In 1843 he was made bishop of Seeland, and in 1845 court-preacher, but still continued his lectures and writing. He was a man of great spirituality, learning, and ability. He sympathized with the old German mystics, whom he knew so well, and of whom he has written so charmingly. His principal writings (all published in Copenhagen) are Principles of Moral Philosophy, 1841 (German trans., Kiel, 1841); Master Eckart (German trans., Hamburg, 1842), Christian Baptism, 1843 (2d ed., 1847; German trans., 2d ed., 1860); Christian Dogmatics, 1849 (2d ed., 1850; German trans., 4th ed., 1858; English trans., Edinburgh, 1866); Christian Ethics, 1871-78, 2 vols. (German trans., Gotha, 3d ed., 1876-78, 2 vols.; English trans., 1873-82, 3 vols.); Catholicism and Protestantism (German trans., Gutersloh, 1884); Jacob Boehme, 1879 (Eng. trans., London, 1886); Autobiography, 1883 (German trans., Carlsruhe, 1883). Beside these, Bishop Martensen published Sermons (four series, 1849-54), and occasional discourses, in which with great skill he opposed destructive tendencies in the Danish Church, of which he is one of the most distinguished ornaments.

Nicholas II. to V.
Paschal I. to III., V.
Paul I. to III., VI. to VIII.
Explanations.—The acute accent (') denotes the accented syllable. The grave accent (') over a, e, and i, denotes that they are pronounced as in "far," "e as, and i as respective. The italicized letters in parentheses immediately after a name give the pronunciation of a portion of the name. The system of pronunciation adopted is in the main that used by a well-known Pronouncing Biographical Dictionary, Philadelphia, 1871. Biblical and common English names have been omitted.
