PREFACE.

THIS volume concludes the Religious Encyclopædia in advance of the German original. The revised edition of Herzog has so far reached only the thirteenth volume, to article "Ring;" but, by the kindness of the German editor and publisher, I had the benefit of several advanced sheets of letter S. For the remaining titles the editors used the last seven volumes of the first edition (XIV.-XXI., published 1861-66, to which was added an Index volume in 1868). The best articles, which will be retained in the new edition, have been reproduced, condensed and supplemented to date by competent hands. But fully one-half of the volume is made up of original matter, with the aid of a large number of English and American scholars who are known to be familiar with the topics assigned to them. For their kind and hearty co-operation we again return our sincere thanks.

The three volumes of this work are equivalent in size to about seven or eight volumes of the German work on which it is based. Our aim has been to put the reader in possession of the substance of Herzog, with such additional information as the English reader needs, and cannot expect from a German work written exclusively for German readers. It is simply impossible to make an encyclopaedia of one country and people answer the wants of another, without serious changes and modifications. Moreover, an encyclopaedia ought to be reconstructed every ten years; and it is hoped that this work will renew its youth and usefulness as soon as the present edition is out of date.

With the reception of the work I have every reason to be satisfied. It has met with a hearty welcome, and secured a permanent place in the reference-library of ministers, students, and intelligent laymen of all denominations. Competent judges acknowledge its impartiality and catholicity, as well as the ability of the leading articles, which are written and signed by conscientious scholars of established reputation. The plan of condensation has been generally approved, as the only feasible way by which such a vast thesaurus of German learning could be made accessible and useful to the English reader. Errors and defects in a work which embraces many thousands of facts and dates are unavoidable; but pains have been taken to secure strict accuracy, and mistakes are corrected in the plates as soon as discovered.

The completed work is now committed to the favor of the public with the prayer that God may bless its use for the promotion of sound Christian learning.

SAADIA HA QAO, Ben Joseph, Jewish rabbi; b. at Fayyum, Upper Egypt, 892; d. at Sura, Heratj3, 941 or 942. He was educated by the Karaites, yet he became their vigorous opponent. He is distinguished for his Arabic translation of the Pentateuch, Job, Psalms, Canticles, and other books (each of which he accompanied by brief annotations), his grammatical and lexical works, and, above all, for his treatise in defence of Judaism, Religion and Doctrines, written in Arabic, but now known only by the Hebrew translation of Judah ben-Tibbon, German translations by Fürst (Die judischen Religionsphilosophen des Mittelalters, i. Bnd., Eunom We Deut oder Glaubenslehre und Philosophie von Saadia Fujjami, Leipzig, 1848) and by Ph. Bloch, in Jüdisches Literaturblatt, Magdeburg, 1878. By his translations, made between 915 and 926, he acquired such fame that in the latter year he was called to Sura in Babylon to be gaon (head teacher) of the famous Jewish school there, and held the office until his death, with the exception of four years (928-932), when he was kept from his office and住在 Bagdad. It was in this period that he wrote his Religion and Doctrines. His position in the history of exegesis is thus indicated by Professor C. A. Briggs: "The Peshat, or literal interpretation, is used in the Targum of Onkelos and the Greek version of Aquila, with reference to the law, but found little expression among the ancient Jews. The Qarites [Karaite] were the first to emphasize it in the eighth century. Before this time there is no trace of Hebrew grammar or Hebrew dictionary. The Qarites threw off the yoke of rabbinical Halacha, and devoted themselves to the literal sense, and became extreme literalists. Influenced by them, Saadia introduced the literal method into the rabbinical schools, and used it as the most potent weapon to overcome the Qarites. He became the father of Jewish exegesis in the middle ages, and was followed by a large number of distinguished scholars, who have left monuments of Hebrew learning." — Biblical Study, New York, 1883, pp. 303, 304. SAALSCHUTZ, Joseph Levin, German rabbi; b. at Königsberg, March 15, 1801; d. there Aug. 23, 1863. He studied in the university of Königsberg; became Ph.D. in 1824, and in 1849 privadoctor in philosophy, and afterwards professor extraordinary, — the first Jew who ever received the appointment. From 1825 to 1828 he taught in the Berlin Jewish public school; from 1828 to 1835 was rabbi in Vienna; from 1835 to his death was rabbi in Königsberg. His principal works are Das Mosaische Recht (1846-48, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1863), and Archäologie der Hebräter (1856, 2 vols.).

SABAOTH ["hosts", "hosts": the translation comes, in the English Version only in Rom. ix. 29, cited from Isa. i. 9, and Jsa. v. 4; elsewhere the translation is used]. The designation of God as "Jehovah Sabaoth" is not found in all the Old Testament. It is lacking in the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges; it is used for the first time in Second Samuel (1 Sam. i. 3, 11, iv. 4, xv. 2, xvii. 45; 2 Sam. v. 10, vi. 2, 18, vii. 8, 26, 27), then in Kings, but very seldom, and only by Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings xviii. 18, xix. 10, 14; 2 Kings iii. 14). In the prophetic books of Amos, Isaiah, Jeremia, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, it frequently occurs; but in the others seldom, and in Ezekiel and Daniel not at all. It is missing in Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, generally in the Psalms, entirely in the post-exilic books, except in 1 Chronicles, in direct relation to David (xi. 9, xvi. 7, 24). The original meaning of the expression "Jehovah Sabaoth" does not imply, as many maintain, that Jehovah was a god of war; for it is precisely in that way when he was fighting in a wondrous way for his people that the appellation is unknown. In 1 Sam. xvii. 45 its juxtaposition with "God of the armies of Israel" shows that it did not mean the same as the latter. So also Ps. xcv. 8 (cf. with 10) proves that "the Lord mighty in battle" was a different and lower conception to "the Lord of hosts." Nor are the "hosts" to be understood of the creation generally. The appellation comes from the "heavenly hosts," including both the stars and the angels, and calls attention to the position of Jehovah above both classes: hence the folly of star-worship, so common in the countries surrounding Israel. The stars are mere lights (Gen. i. 14), created for a definite purpose (Ps. civ. 19), although in their way eloquent of Jehovah's praise (Ps. viii. 3, xix. 1). Above them far is Jehovah, who made them, and rules them. Similar is the case respecting angels. They constitute the upper congregation of worshippers (Ps. cxlviii. 2, cl. 1), who praise God for his wonders of providence and grace (Ps. xxix. 9, xxxix. 6 sqq.). They also are the messengers of God and the witnesses of his mighty acts. When God is styled "Jehovah Sabaoth," his superiority to angels is set forth: hence the epithet rebukes star-worship, and other forms of idolatry; represents him as the absolute ruler of the world, and at the same time as ready to put down every opposition to the people of his choice. SABBATH.

SABBATH. See SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

SABBATH (Heb. shabbath; Gr., to sabbaton, or ta sabbata), the seventh day, regarded among the Israelites as holy, and a day of rest. It is of divine origin, its type being the seventh day, on which God rested from all his work. Moses introduced the sabbath first in connection with the manna (Exod. xvi. 5, 22—30), in such a manner as indicated that the sabbath was as yet unknown to the people. The people by observing this rest and sanctification, in its blessing, received then the commandment concerning that day on Sinai. The expression in Exod. xx. 8, "Remember the sabbath day," is not intended to remind of the sabbath as an ancient institution, but it rather means that the people should always remember the now existing order of the sabbath. The signification of the sabbath can only be known from the Old Testament (cf. Gen. ii. 3; Exod. xx. 11, xxxi. 13—17), which is as follows: God created the world in six days, and rested on the seventh day: he therefore blessed and sanctified this day of completing his work. In like manner, the people which he had sanctified unto himself, and which acknowledged the Creator and Lord of the world as their God, was to sanctify, after every six days of labor, the seventh day as a day of rest; and this was to be a sign of the covenant between God and his people. These sentences convey the following ideas. (1) Like God, so are they to rest. (2) It is to become a likeness of the divine: especially are the people, called to be the organ of establishing a divine order of life upon earth, to be known as the people of the living God by the change of labor and rest, corresponding to the rhythm of the divine life. (2) In blessed rest the divine work is finished: because the creating God rests satisfied in the contemplation of his works, his creation itself is finished. In short, "the seventh day is not the negation of hexahemeron, but the blessing and sanctification of the same." Therefore, also, the work of men is not to be of a negative nature, but it was to finish itself in a blessed harmony of existence. In the same manner, also, the whole history of men was to complete itself in an harmonious order of God, as is already guaranteed in the sabbath of the creation, and prefigured in the sabbath seasons. The rest of God on the seventh day of creation, which is without an end, means, was given over to the whole world to receive it at last in itself. The whole fourth chapter in the Epistle to the Hebrews bears upon this; viz., that the rest in God is to become also a rest for men.

But we get the full object of the sabbath idea by combining it with the dominion of sin and death which have entered into the development of the human society. After the divine curse had been pronounced upon the earth, and man had been destined to work for his food, the desire after the rest of God becomes a craving after redemption (Gen. v. 29). Israel, also, whilst in Egyptian bondage without any refreshing interruption, has to sigh for relief. When God, at the deliverance from bondage, gave him the seasons of rest resting regularly, is a thanksgiving feast in commemoration of the deliverance which he had experienced. Therefore it is said (Deut. v. 15), "And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt," etc. But there is yet another point. The sabbath has only its significance as the seventh day, which is preceded by six work-days. The first part of the commandment concerning the sabbath, which is a commandment itself (Exod. xx. 9), reads, "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thine work: but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God." Only in consequence of preceding labor the sabbath is to follow, as work and creation complete it. Ingathering and blessing, in the word in Gen. iii. 19 retains its force, only that the sabbath becomes "a corrective for the injuries inflicted on men living under the curse of sin, by the heavy and oppressing work, and at the same time detracting from God. We need not dwell here on the humane character of the Mosaic law, which in its enactments provides also for the rest of the servant and stranger as well as for the cattle (Exod. xx. 19, xxiii. 12). From what has been said, we see that the sabbath is a divine institution, a divine gift sanctifying the people (Exek. xx. 12). The day was celebrated by rest from labor (Exod. xxxix. 21; Num. xv. 32), and by a special burnt offering presented in the temple in addition to the usual daily offering, which was doubled on this day (Num. xxviii. 9). In the holy place of the temple the show-bread was renewed (Lev. xvi. 8). Delicate profanation of this day was punished with death (Exod. xxxix. 14 sqq., xxxv. 2), which was inflicted by stoning (Num. xv. 32 sqq.). The Israelites had to bake and cook their food for the sabbath on the preceding day (Exod. xvi. 23), to which undoubtedly refers the injunction in xxxv. 3. They were also forbidden to leave the camp on the sabbath day (Exod. xvi. 29), and, with reference to this, travelling on the sabbath was afterwards also forbidden. Marketing and public trade ceased on the sabbath (Neh. x. 31, xiii. 15, 16), and it was merely an auxiliary police regulation of Nehemiah to close the gates on that day (Neh. xiii. 19). But the passages in Nehemiah, especially x. 31, show that at that time a strict observance of the sabbath had not yet been customary among the people. The measures, however, which Nehemiah took for the sake of a more quiet sabbath contain nothing of that micrological casuistry which prevailed in later times; and when the Chasidim suffered their enemies to cut down, rather than to arm on the sabbath (1 Macc. ii. 32 sq.; 2 Macc. vi. 11), Mattathias, apprehending the great danger which would accrue to the Jews, laid down the injunction that it was permitted to take defensive measures against the enemy, and to abstain from offensive operations (1 Macc. ii. 41; 2 Macc. viii.
SABBATICAL YEAR.

26). This principle prevailed afterwards (Jos., Antt. XIV. 4, 2), but not always (Jos., War, II. 19, 2). The inventive spirit of later times laid down the minutest and strictest sabbath regulations, which are contained in the Talmud, and a whole Talmud treatise is devoted to this subject. That this micrology had already been developed in the time of Christ, we know from such passages as Matt. xii. 2, John v. 10 sq. In spite of these minute injunctions which were hedged about the sabbath, this day was to be regarded as a day of joy. The meals for the sabbath were prescribed, every one was to eat three meals; and the Talmud Shabbath (fol. 118, col. 1) says, "Whoever observes the three meals on the sabbath will be saved from the birth-pains of Messiah, the judgment of hell, and the war of Gog and Magog." SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY (Acts i. 12). From the injunction in Exod. xvi. 29 the scribes laid down the rule that an Israelite must not go two thousand yards beyond the limits of his abode. The permitted distance seems to have been grounded on the space to be kept between the ark and the people (Josh. iii. 4) in the wilderness, which tradition said was that between the ark and the tents. Whilst the rabbis on the one hand regulated the walking on the sabbath days by allowing only a certain space, yet on the other hand they also contrived certain means whereby the sabbath-day's walk could be exceeded, without transgressing the law, by the so-called mixtio terminorum, or connection of distances. They ordained that all those who wished to join their social gatherings on the sabbath were to deposit on Friday afternoon some article of food in a certain place at the end of the sabbath-day's journey, so that the people would be precluded from their domicile, and thus another sabbath-day's journey could be undertaken from the first terminus. Not only does an entire Talmudic treatise (Eru) treat on this "connection of distances," but rabbinism has also invented a prayer for that purpose, "Blessed art thou, Jehovah, who hast commanded (1) us the erub" (i.e., connection of distances). SABBATHISM. See Israel, p. 1129.

SABBATHARIANS, or NEW ISRAELITES, is the name of a religious sect founded by Joanna Southcott (b. about 1750, at Gittisham in Devonshire), who regarded herself as the bride of the Lamb, and declared herself, when sixty-four years of age, pregnant with the true Messiah, the "Second Shiloh," whom she would bear Oct. 19, 1814. She surrounded herself with prophets, and in order to prepare the way for the new dispensation ordered the strictest observance of the Jewish law and sabbath. A costly cradle was kept in readiness for the reception of the Messiah, and for a long time she waited for his birth. At last a supposititious child was declared to be he. But the fraud was detected, and those who participated in it were led around with the picture of Southcott in the public street. Joanna died in her self-delusion, Dec. 27, 1814; but her followers, who at one time numbered a hundred thousand, continued till 1831 to observe the Jewish sabbath and the ceremonial of the law in order to receive the hoped-for Messiah in a worthy manner. Her writings number sixty separate publications, of which the best known is the Book of Wonders, London, 1813-14, 5 parts. Comp. Blunt: Dictionary of Sects, e.v. "Southcottians;" Matthias: J. Southcott's Prophecies and Case stated, London, 1832.

SABBATICAL YEAR AND YEAR OF JUBILEE. (1) The Sabbatical Year.—The laws respecting the sabbatical year embrace three main enactments,—rest for the soil, care for the poor and for animals, and remission of debts. The first enactment (which is comprised in Exod. xxix. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 2-5) enjoins that the soil, the vineyards and the oliveyards, are to have perfect rest: there is to be no tillage or cultivation of any sort. The second enactment (which is contained in Exod. xxxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 6-7) enjoins that the spontaneous growth of the fields or of trees is to be for the free use of the poor, hirelings, strangers, servants, and cattle. The third enactment (which is contained in Deut. xv. 1-5) enjoins the remission of debts in the sabbatical year. It has been questioned whether the release of the seventh year was final, or merely lasted through the year. The former is in general the Jewish view (cf. Mishna Shebiith, x. 1), and was also Luther's view. Seven such sabbatical years were closed with (II.) The Year of Jubilee (Lev. xxv. 8-11), which is to follow immediately upon the sabbatical year. It was to be proclaimed by the blast of a trumpet on the tenth day of the seventh month. Like the sabbatical year, it was to be celebrated by (1) giving rest to the soil (Lev. xxv. 11, 12). While the law enjoins, that, as on the sabbatical year, the land should be falling, and that there be no tillage nor harvest during the jubilee year, yet the Israelites were permitted to gather the spontaneous produce of the field for their immediate wants, but not to lay it up in their storehouses. Another law connected with this festival was (2) manumission of those Israelites who had become slaves (Lev. xxv. 39-54), and (3) reversion of landed property (Lev. xxv. 13-34, xxvii. 16-24). Houses which were not surrounded by walls were treated like landed property, and were subject to the law of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 31), whilst such as were built in walled cities were subject to the law of wall property (Lev. xxv. 30). The houses of the Levites in the forty-eight cities given to them (Num. xxxv. 1-9) were exempt from this general law of
As to the design of the sabbatical and jubilee year, we may say that the spirit of this law is the same as that of the sabbatical year, because it is in every sense a beneficent tendency, limiting the rights, and checking the sense of property: the one puts in God's claims on time; the other, on the land. The land shall "keep a sabbath unto the Lord" (Lev. xxv. 2). This is the main idea. Man, by withdrawing his hand from the cultivation of the soil, and putting it at the disposal of Jehovah's blessing, hereby actually acknowledges the exclusively divine right of possession. At the same time, the land pays a debt to Jehovah (cf. Lev. xxvi. 34; 2 Chron. xxxvii. 21), and thus returns, in a certain sense, to that condition which it had before the words of Gen. iii. 17 were pronounced: yes, more, the sabbatical year points particularly to that time when the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption (Rom. viii. 21). The jubilee year, in which the sabbath cycle completes itself, takes up in itself the idea of the sabbatical year, but has its special significance in the idea of the redeeming restitution, and of bringing back the theocracy to the original divine order, where everyone enjoys the fruits of his inalienable possession. God, who once redeemed his people from Egypt's bondage, appears here again as their Redeemer, by giving liberty not only to the slave, but also by providing for the poor a certain portion of the heritage of his people, since there was to be no poor among the covenant people (Deut. xv. 4). To bring about such a year of grace, sins had to be forgiven: therefore the year of jubilee was proclaimed on the day of atonement. As the year in which the restitution of all things will take place, the year of jubilee in the prophecy of Isa. lx. 1-3 (fulfilled in Christ, Luke iv. 21) is taken as a type for the messianic time of salvation, in which, after all the battles of the kingdom have been victoriously fought, the dissonances of the history of mankind will be lost in the harmony of the divine life, and, with the rest that remaineth for the people of God (Heb. iv. 9), the acts of history will be closed.

As to the practicability of the system of these institutions, it is possible, provided the people were willing to sacrifice all selfish interest to the divine will. In how far this order was executed in the post-Mosaic period, we know not; but that the sabbatical year was not celebrated in the last centuries before the exile, we know from 2 Chron. xxxvii. 21. After the exile, the people took it upon themselves to observe the sabbatical year (Neh. x. 31); and from that time on it seems to have been observed (cf. 1 Macc. vi. 49, 53; Joseph., Ant. XIII. 8, 1, XIV. 10, 6, XV. 1, 2; War, I. 2, 4). As for the year of jubilee, its laws seem not to have been carried out; yet there might have been some mystical observance.

The rabbinic laws concerning the sabbatical year are contained in the Mishna treatise She'bith; but these laws had only reference to Palestine itself, because it is said (Lev. xxv. 2), "When ye come into the land." Outside of Palestine there was no sabbatical year. Comp. the arts. "Jubeljah", "Jubeljahr," and "Jubeljah." SACHS.

SACHS, Hans, b. in Nuremberg, Nov. 5, 1494; d. there Jan. 20, 1576; was the son of a tailor, but frequented, from 1501 to 1509, the Latin school under Jan. 20, 1576; was the son of a tailor, but frequented, from 1501 to 1509, the Latin school of his native city, in which he learned "Puerilia, Grammatica, und Musica, auch Rhetorica, Arithmetica, Astronomia, Poetica." He visited all the principal cities of Germany, and in the guilds of his trade he studied at the same time the craft of his profession and the art of poetry. The master-singers were mechanics, and every Sunday or holyday they assembled in the afternoon in the church or in the guild-hall. A "singing"-match took place; and he whose poem won the prize received a wreath of silken flowers, or a woollen string with a silver coin bearing the image of King David. Hans Sachs felt that only among the master-singers he could satisfy his taste. He had made a careful study of what he considered enjoyment and amusement; and in 1514, in Munich, he appeared for the first time among them as a "singer" with the poem, Gloria Patri Lab und Ehr. In 1518 he returned to Nuremberg, settled there as a shoemaker, married, and, while he sustained a numerous family with the proceeds of his professional labor, he developed a literary activity which soon made him the "prince and patriarch of the master-singers." Nuremberg was at that time a free imperial city, and at the height of its prosperity. Charles V. often visited it; Luther praised it highly; among its citizens were Albrecht Dürer (d. 1528), Peter Vischer (d. 1559), Andreas Osianer (1522-49), Peter Henlein (d. 1540), Lazarus Spengler (d. 1554), and others. Among these men,—known all over Germany, some of them all over the world,—Hans Sachs took rank. He became the representative poet of his age, and by the outspoken tendency of his poetry he occupied a place in the history of the German Reformation. It was the first rule of the Nuremberger master-singers, that nothing should be written against Luther's Bible; and, when the competing poems were tested, one of the judges had the task of comparing their ideas and language with that book.

Hans Sachs was an exceedingly prolific author, and is in this respect surpassed only by the Spanish poet, Lope de Vega. His works consist of thirty-four large volumes in folio, written with his own hand, and containing 6,836 pieces, of which several hundreds are dramas, the rest epics and lyrics. The poetical tone of these pieces is very various,—tragical and comical, humorous and sentimental, sarcastic and enthusiastic; but the esthetic character is always the same, always didactic: the ideal contents is some moral proposition, and the tendency of this proposition points directly towards the Reformation. Among his poems, which generally were printed on fly-leaves, and in that form scattered throughout all Germany, some of the most celebrated are his transcriptions of Luther's translation of the Psalms; Die Wittenbergisch Nachigteig, in seven hundred verses, and giving an explanation of the difference between "divine truth and human lies;" Eyn wunderliche weyssagung, in thirty strophes, and with a preface by Osianer, giving thirty pictures of the Pope in glory and in distress. It was forbidden for a long time to publish or represent these tracts; but immediately after, appeared Inhalt zweierlei Predigt: Hac dicit Dominus Deus — Sic dicit papa, etc. His dramas comprise tragedies, comedies, farces, fables, and dialogues (Schöndenke and Fassnachtspiele), and were represented by himself and his brother-mechanics in the guild-hall or in private residences on festal occasions. Among his tragedies is one on the expulsion of Adam and Eve from paradise, in three acts and with eleven dramatis persona, 1553; another, on the last judgment, in seven acts and with thirty-four dramatis persona, 1558, etc. Of his comedies, the most celebrated is Die ungleichen Kinder Eve, which he recast three times. The idea he took from Philip Melanchthon: God-Father visits Eve, takes her two sons on his knees, and examines them in Luther's Catechism. Abel answers correctly, Cain always goes wrong. (See Goedecke : Every-man, Homulus und Hekastus, Hanover, 1865.) His dramas are often dialogues between virtues and vices; and even his Schöndenke and Fassnachtspiele,—such as The devil marrying an old woman, The pious nobility which alone has the right of robbery, The man who hears his wife confessing, etc.,—although they certainly have not only the intention, but also the power, of "dispelling melancholy," are, nevertheless, constructed on a strictly moral plan and for a decidedly moral purpose.

King Louis I. of Bavaria put a bust of Sachs in the Ruhmeshalle at Munich; Kaubach put him in the foreground of his great picture, The Reformation; and in 1874 a bronze statue of the famous shoemaker was erected in the Spitalplatz at Nuremberg. (The earliest collective edition of his works appeared in Augsburg, 1570-79, 5 vols. folio, reprinted at Kempten, 1812-17, 4to; selections from his poems form vols. iv., v., vi., of Goedecke and Tittmann's Deutsche Dichter des 16. Jahrhunderts, Leipzig, 1870-72, 3 vols., new ed., 1874. A new edition of his poems by Adalbert Keller is in the Bibliothek der literarischen Vereins zu Stuttgart, 1870 sq. (18th vol., 1885). His Fassnachtspiele have been edited by E. Goetze for the series Neudrucke deutscher Litteraturwerke d. XVI. u. XVII. Jahrh., Halle, Nos. 29, 27 (1880), 31, 32 (1881), 89, 90 (1888), and in the same series, for the first time, Der hüren Sauffried (a tragedy in seven acts), No. 29 (1880). The majority of his works have not yet been printed.) The most comprehensive biography of Sachs is by Salomon Raniush, Altenburg, 1765: there is another by J. L. Hoffmann, Nuremberg, 1847. [See F. Schultze : Hans Sachs in seinem Verhältnisse zu Reformation, Leipzig, 1879, 45 pp.] HOFF.

SACK, August Friedrich Wilhelm, b. Feb. 4, 1703, at Harzgerode, in the principality of Anhalt-Bernburg; and d. in Berlin, April 28, 1786; was educated at Bernburg; studied theology at the university of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder; visited, as tutor to a young nobleman, the universities of Leyden and Groeningen; spent three years (1728-31) at Hôbenseslen as tutor to the young prince of Hesse-Homberg; and was in 1731 called as third preacher to the German-Reformed congregation in Magdeburg. In 1740 he was made court-preacher in Berlin; and in this position he opposed with great energy, but also with perfect tact, the French scepticism and English deism which through many channels found their way to the court of Friedrich II. In 1745 he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin, and in 1750 he was made a member of the consistory. In 1748 he published his chief work, Vertheidigte Glauben der Christen, of which a second edition appeared in 1773; and from 1735 to 1764 he published six volumes of sermons, several of which were translated into Dutch, French, and English. His biography (Berlin, 1789, 2 vols.) was written by his son, Friedrich Samuel Gottfried Sack (b. in Magdeburg, Sept. 4, 1758; d. in Berlin, Oct. 2, 1817), and his successor as court-preacher and in the consistory, with the title of bishop. K. H. SACK.

SACK, Karl Heinrich, b. in Berlin, Oct. 17, 1790; d. in Poppelsdorf, Oct. 16, 1847, was a doctor in the university of Berlin (1817), extraordinary professor in Bonn (1818), and ordinary professor (1832). In 1847 he was called to Magdeburg as Consistorialrath, and later made Oberconsistorialrath. He was a representative of the so-called "right" of the Schleiermacher school.
His writings are numerous. The chief are Christliche Apologetik, Hamburg, 1829, 2d ed., 1841; Christliche Polemik, 1888; Die Kirche von Schottland, Heidelberg, 1844–45, 2 parts; Die evangelische Kirche u. d. Union, Bremen, 1861; Geschichte d. Pforten von Mathes bis Schleiermacher, Heidelberg, 1866, 2d ed., 1875; Theologische Aufsätze, Gotha, 1871.

SACK, Brethren of the (Saccati, Sacchiti, or Saccophori), often, like the monks of Grammont, the Minims, the Cathari, and Waldenses, styled boni homines, formed an ecclesiastical order somewhat similar to that of the Augustines. It was founded in France about 1200, and confirmed by the Pope in 1219. It received its name from the sack which its members used as a garment, and spread rapidly, not only in France, but also in England. In 1275, however, it was dissolved by the Council of Leyden; and in 1293 the remaining members were incorporated with other orders. In his Entwurf einer vollständigen Historie der Ketzerreien, i. p. 437, Walch places the Brethren of the Sack among the Encratites. They abstained from flesh and wine, held no property, went about barefooted, and walked barelegged with wooden sandals on their feet, etc.; but it was no doubt, however, that the sack marked the early dissolution of the order. Besides these frateres saccati, there was also an order of sack-bearing nuns, founded in 1261 by King Louis IX. of France, on the suggestion of his mother, Blanca. They called themselves Penitent Daughters of Jesus, or, with reference to their garment, Sacariæ, and lived in nunneries near St. Andrew's in Paris. But also this order was soon abolished, even while its founder was still living; though there was in London, as late as 1357, a nunnery whose inmates wore sacks of hemp, and walked barefooted. SACRAMENT (from sacramentum, which in classical usage means an oath, especially a military oath, and also a gauge in money laid down in court by two contending parties) is not, strictly speaking, a scriptural term, but occurs repeatedly in the Latin Vulgate as a translation of the Greek συμμαχία, συμμάχια, συμμαχίας. (Tertullian, adv. Marc. c. 8. 18, and also between Luther, Zwingli, and their followers. Calvin occupied a mediate position between the two on the sacramental question, and his views passed into the Reformed Confessions. The Quakers reject the sacraments as external ceremonies, and hold only to internal baptism or regeneration by the Spirit, and internal communion with Christ. SADDUCEES.

Many Christians who shrank from actually sacrificing escaped, through the avarice of the Roman officials, by buying certificates that they had complied with the law (libellatio). But even this was severely rebuked by the Church; and, at least as long as the perquisitions lasted and the Church had to guard against apostasy, rigid measures were enforced against the sacrificati. SACRILEGE (sacrilegium) corresponds to blasphemy, as acta to words, and denotes a crime against God. Canon law, or, more especially, the Roman canonists, distinguish between sacrilegium immediate and the stealing of res more in a profane place or of objects not sacred in a sacred place: a striking difference with respect to their concepts of sacrilege. According to the Mosaic law, sacrilege could be committed by a Jew only; during the persecution of the Jansenists he lived concealed in the suburb of St. Antoine; but, as he continued to correspond with the nuns, his residence was discovered, and May 13, 1686, he was imprisoned in the Bastille. Oct. 31, 1688, he was released, and returned to Port-Royal: but in 1679 he was once more compelled to leave the monastery; and the last days of his life he spent in the house of his cousin, the Marquis of Pomponne. He is principally known by his translations of the Bible. In 1677 the New Testament, traduit en Francais, generally called Nouveau Testament de Mont, though it was printed in Amsterdam by the Elzevirs. It was vehemently attacked by several bishops, condemned by Pope Clement IX. (April 20, 1688), defended by Arnauld and Nicole, and caused a controversy which lasted twenty years. The Sainte Bible, containing the Vulgata, a translation into French, which had been deposited in the temple, or in other ways placed under the guardianship of the gods. (See 0101; Demetrius, &c.) Afterwards, by decrees of Severus and Antoninus, a distinction was made between the stealing of res sacr approximately equal to the theft (furto). In the Christian church the crime appeared very early; and complaints occur that clergy and laymen took away from the churches wax, oil, etc. The decrees of the Mosaic law were applied, and excommunication was added (Con. Apost. c. 72, comp. c. 73). But the crime spread, and is more and more frequently mentioned in the decrees of the synods, the writings of the Fathers, the penitentials, etc., though at the same time the penalties became heavier and heavier (Regius De synodalibus causis, lib. ii. c. 276 sq.). By degrees, as the Germanic element became prominent in the legislation of the Church of Central and Western Europe, the Germanic conception of sacrilege as violation of the sacredness of the church prevailed, and the Roman distinction between res sacra and non sacra was abolished (Lex Ribbara, tit. Ix. cap. 8; Lex Alamannorum, tit. vii. i. Les Bajuvarorum, tit. i. cap. 3, 6; Capitulare Paderbrunnense, a. 785, c. 3, in FURTZ: Monum. Germaniae, t. iii. fol. 48). In Lex Frisonum we even find an old law concerning the sacredness of the Pagan temples applied directly to the Christian churches. Of great interest is the legislation of Charles V. on this point (1532). Here is a return to the distinctions of the Roman law, though in such a way that the appropriation of res sacræ or of res non-sacra, deposited in a sacred place, never becomes a simple theft; and this aggravation of the crime, when it becomes sacrilegious, is adopted by all modern legislations.

SACRISTY and SACRISTAN. The sacristy is sometimes a separate building belonging to a church or convent, sometimes only an apartment in the main structure, in which the sacred vessels are kept, and in which the ecclesiastics who are to take part in the service assemble. The person who has charge of that room or building is the sacristan.

SACY, Louis Isaac Le Maistre de, b. at Paris, March 29, 1613; d. Jan. 4, 1684; studied at Beauvais together with Antoine Arnaud; was ordained priest in 1645, and became in 1650 confessor and spiritual director of the recluses of Port-Royal. During the persecution of the Jansenists he lived concealed in the suburb of St. Antoine; but, as he continued to correspond with the nuns, his residence was discovered, and May 13, 1686, he was imprisoned in the Bastille. Oct. 31, 1688, he was released, and returned to Port-Royal: but in 1679 he was once more compelled to leave the monastery; and the last days of his life he spent in the house of his cousin, the Marquis of Pomponne. La Sainte Bible, containing the Vulgata, a translation into French, which had been deposited in the temple, or in other ways placed under the guardianship of the gods. (See CONSECRATION; SACRISTY and SACRISTAN.) Afterwards, by decrees of Severus and Antoninus, a distinction was made between the stealing of res sacr as sacred cause it is devoted to God, such as the consecrated wafer, etc., and sacrilegium comprised not only the appropriation of res sacræ to secular uses, but also the appropriation of res non-sacra, deposited in a sacred place, never becomes a simple theft; and this aggravation of the crime, when it becomes sacrilegious, is adopted by all modern legislations.

SADDUCEES. All sources agree in putting the name of sect, but of a party which refused to adopt the exaggerations of ritualistic and ascetic formalism of Pharisaism. In a certain sense the Pharisees were the innovators. Their peculiar teachings were additions to the law, which the Sadducees regarded as sole authority; and thus only can we understand the reluctance of the latter against the traditional system, and its religious and ascetical requirements, as well as the rejection of the doctrine of the resurrection. Being forced by the natural course of things to make an opposition in the field of public and social life, the Sadducees were finally entangled in political matters; they thus became the opponents of the Pharisees in matters of which they had not thought at the beginning. Less favored by the people, they easily accommodated themselves.

they themselves to make political connections with foreigners, as the misfortunes of the nation required it, and having no sympathy with the people, which from the very start was Pharisaically inclined, because the Pharisees had the apparent advantage of greater piety, and had carried home, however, every thought foreign. Thus the Sadducees became at last only a political coterie, and with the destruction of Jerusalem they disappear from history. From a political point of view it must be said that they were wiser and more far-seeing than the Pharisees, and that they cannot be blamed for the final catastrophe. It must be said of them that they refused to gain an influence by hypocractic demagogy which they could not gain by straight measures: still, this also must be said, that most of them, by befriending themselves with Greeks and Romans, and serving a foreign policy, had their personal interests at heart, and cared little for the religious interests of the nation as for the civil.

This brings us back to our assertion that the Sadducees, still less the Pharisees, formed a sect. Towards the Pharisaical Judaism they observed a cold neutrality; and it is sufficient to say that the very basis of Judaism, the idea of the theocracy, was violently shaken. The weakening of the theocratic principle naturally led to giving up other ideas connected with it: hence the messianic hope and teachings, including the dogma of resurrection, appeared to them as chimerical.

In the New Testament the Sadducees are mentioned in Matt. iii. 7, xvi. 1, 6, xxii. 23, 34; Mark xii. 18; Luke xx. 27; Acts iv. 1, v. 17, xxiii. 6–8. From the Gospel narrative it seems to be evident that at that time these parties opposed each other on political grounds; and this seems to be clear from the narrative in the Acts of the Apostles where the Sadducees always opposed the Christians, while the Pharisees favored them in many respects (Acts v. 17, 34). How are we to explain this phenomenon? or are we to believe that Christianity, after the death of Jesus, had degenerated into sheer Pharisaism? The fact, however, seems to be this: the preaching of Jesus which concerned the inner life and this it shared with the Pharisees, who beheld in it something which they could utilize for their special purposes; whereas the Sadducees regarded it as something dangerous, because exaggerated, if not demagogical.

Occasionally we also hear (Acts xxiii. 8) that the Sadducees believed neither in angels nor spirits, whereas the Pharisees believed in both; and this we explain best by bearing in mind, that, as political parties, one affirmed what the other denied. Passing over from the New Testament to Josephus, who has always been regarded as the main authority in this respect, we are led to the supposition that the Sadducees were a school of philosophers; and for Greek readers every thing that concerned the future life belonged to the sphere of speculation. But the Jewish historian studiously avoided giving his readers an insight view of the political party-machinery; and that the Sadducees were philosophers was the more believed, since Josephus asserted that they denied the doctrine of fatalism, but contended for the freedom of the will. And whereas we will not deny that there were some speculating spirits among the Sadducees, yet we must bear this in mind, that Josephus only mentions what serves his purposes, since he being an inexperienced and inconsiderate reader. And the scanty notices which we find in the Talmud also lead us to the supposition that both Pharisees and Sadducees were nothing but parties; that in the main they both stood on the ground of the same Judaism as far as the inner relations were concerned, and that in this sphere there were no oppositions which had to lead to a rupture; for evidently both parties were represented in the Sanhedrin, where they could defend their different ideas, but always with a view of gaining a victory which would need endanger the State.

More confused are the notices which we find in the writings of the church Fathers, and especially in those of medieval Judaism. The Sadducees, as we have seen, were friends of the foreigners; and, as they mostly belonged to the aristocracy, it cannot be remarkable, that, by their aversion to asceticism, they gave offence by their luxury and immorality. But this did not necessarily belong to the party, and was also not the cause why later Jews called them Epicureans: for the latter name in rabbinic writings denotes all kinds of heresy; and we can easily perceive, how, with the increasing narrowness of the ecclesiastical horizon, such imputations could be made, and it is also very characteristic that Christian writers should have taken this up, and made the rabbinic-Pharisaic mode of intuition their own. To this source belongs the myth concerning the origin of the Sadducees. Of a renowned teacher of the third century before Christ, Antigonus of Socho, we are told in the Mishna (Pirke Abot, 1, 3), that he recommended to his disciples the exercise of virtue without any view of reward. In the Gemara, and later by other authorities, we are told Antigonus had two disciples, Zadok and Baitchos, who, be it advertently or inadvertently, drew the inference from their teacher's maxim that there is no reward and no future life. This is the origin of Sadduceanism. Whether and how the Sadducees and Baithouseans were the same or not, no one could rightly understand any more. Yet there are still some scholars who believe in the existence of Zadok and Baitchos; whereas the highest antiquity is silent concerning them, and prefers the etymological explanation of the name "Sadducees" [i.e., from Heb. for "just"]. Often the Sadducees have been identified with the Karaites, but the only relation between the two consists in the rejection of the Pharisaic-rabbinic system of tradition.

In 1770 he entered the Jesuit college at Landsberg, and after the dissolution of the order, in 1773, he studied theology and philosophy at the university of Ingolstadt. In 1777 he was ordained priest, and appointed repetitor publicus in theology and philosophy. In 1780 he was made professor of dogmatics, and in 1784 he moved to Dillingen as professor of pastoral theology. But on Nov. 4, 1794, he was suddenly dismissed, accused of participation in secret political intrigues, and of connection with the Illuminati; and for many years he lived in retirement in Munich or at Ebersberg, developing, however, a great literary activity. His orthodoxy had long been suspected by the Ultramontanists, but the suspicion was entirely without ground. However much he at times was harassed by doubts (see his book, Der Friede, 1821), he never swerved from that which forms the essential and vital points of the Roman-Catholic faith; and his opposition to the rationalism and indifference of the age was energetic and successful. Meanwhile his works—Briefe aus allen Jahrhunderten, Grundzüge der Religion, Glückseitigkeitstehe (afterward entitled Moralphilosophie), Ueber Erziehung für Erzieher, Die Weisheit auf der Gasse, etc.,—gathered a considerable number of disciples around him. Without forming a theological school, he wielded a great influence in diplomatic negotiations with Francis I. and Charles V. He was very accurate and very successful as an administrator and diplomatist, but continued to cultivate his literary and philosophical tastes. His Phadrus sive de Philosopha appeared in 1539. The best collection of his works, including his letters and his biography by Fiordibello, was published in Verona, 1757-58, 4 vols. fol. institution, studied law, entered afterwards the army, and became, while a young officer in the garrison of Bordeaux, an enthusiastic adherent of Dom Martinez de Pasqualis. The pupil, however, soon separated from the master, entered into connection with Cagliostro, studied Swedenborg, resigned his position in the army, wrote books which attracted much attention, — Des erreurs et de la religion (1542), and Tableau naturel des rapports entre Dieu, l'homme, et l'univers (1782). — and travelled extensively in England, Italy, and Germany, making everywhere intimate acquaintance with the mystical spirits of the age, William Law, Beatt, the Galatian family, and others. From 1788 to 1791 he lived in Strassburg, his "paradise;" and while there he studied Jacob Boehme, and wrote L'homme de désir (1790), Ecce homo (1792), and Le nouvel homme (1792). The French Revolution he hailed with great enthusiasm; but he soon discovered that there was no such thing as moral responsibility which characterized its movements, and that it had witnessed a steady growth in life and death, often of a martyr's death. As early as the second part of the second century, congregations were celebrating the memory of martyrs. The day of their martyrdom was called the day of their birth (gesthia tis martys), and set apart for special services; and the place where the remains of a martyr were interred was regarded as consecrated. When the story of his sufferings and death was related once a year, and the Lord's Supper celebrated in token of the communion of saints. Eusebius (IV. 15) states that the Church of Smyrna honored the bones of Polycarp above silver and gold. In the fourth century a yearly festival of all saints and martyrs was appointed by the Eastern Church. One of Chrysostom's homilies (De martyribus totius orbis) was delivered on this festival. The Western Church did not appoint an all saints' day till the seventh century.

The respect for the memory of the saints gradually degenerated into a worship of saints and their relics. The monkish system, which began in the third century, was the occasion of exaggerated accounts of the piety and power of men who spent their lives in caves, devoting themselves to the most severe ascetic practices. Miracles were associated with their names. Cyprian, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, Augustine, and others exalted their memories [in treatises and sermons on the saints called Panegyrics], and attributed to them a part in the judgment and power, by their intercessions, to become protectors of men on earth. It was taught that they not only interceded for the pardon of sins, but for the relief of physical infirmities (Ambrose: De Viduis 9). Chapels and churches were erected over their bones, and relics were carried as amulets. Their aid was sought at the inception of journeys, for ships at sea, etc. Special saints were associated with their names. Cyprian, Gregory of Nyssa, John and Augustine, of theologians; Ivo, of jurists; Crispin, of shoemakers, etc. Vigilantius of Barcelone protested vigorously in the fifth century against such worship and idolatriy, but Jerome defended the practice with vigor.

The worship of saints was fixed in the Oriental Church by the Second Nicene Council (787), John of Damascus having before argued for the practice. The theologians of the West took up the subject, and argued in ita way as to make it an ancient custom. Peter Lombard, Alexander of Hales, and Thomas Aquinas display much skill in this direction, but distinguished between the worship (latria, adoration) due to God, and the worship (dulia, invocatio) due to saints. Thomas demanded for Mary an honor higher than that due to the God, and yet higher than that due to the saints (superluti). The increasing host of the saints was divided into six classes; and the Roman Breviary ordains that they shall be addressed (“Apostles, martyrs, etc., pray for us”) at all other times than the high festivals. The art of the middle ages was likewise devoted to bring out the emblems and peculiarities of the saints. Peter was pictured with the keys, John with a lamb upon his arm, Paul with a sword, Bartholomew with a knife, etc. On account of the smuggling-in of martyrs, the Pope was called upon to declare who were saints; and in 1193 John XX. canonized the first saint in the person of Bishop Ulrich of Augsburg.

In the eleventh century Guibert, abbot of Nogent raised his voice against the abuses of saint worship in his work, De pignoribus Sanctorum. Wiclif ridiculed those who sought the intercession of any other than Jesus Christ. Nicolaus of Clemanges, in his De novis celebritatibus non in situendis, advocated a return to the practice of the early ages, when the worship of the saints did not prevail to the exclusion of the worship of God. The Reformers lifted up their voices in sternest protest against the practice of the church, and the confessions deny all scriptural warrant for it. The Council of Trent (XXV.) established it, condemning all who denied the efficacy of the intercession of the saints. Modern Roman-Catholic divines endeavor in vain to find a scriptural warrant for it in Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, xx. 4; and, if they appeal to the Disciplina Arcana of the first centuries, Protestants reply by giving a different explanation of that secret discipline.

The legends of the saints form a large literature, which is full of fancies and falsehoods. Calendars and Martyrologies dating back to the eighth century are in existence. The collection most highly prized in the East is that of Simon Metaphrastes of the twelfth century. The Legenda Aurea of Jacob de Voragine is highly prized in the West. The most important of the later works is the Acta Sanctorum, edited by the Bollandists, [Antwerp, 1648 sqq., Paris, 1673; Mrs. Jamieson: Sacred and Legendary Art, London, 1848, 2 vols.; Legends of the Monastic Orders, 1850; Barino-Gould: Lives of the Saints, London, 1873-77, 15 vols.]. SALT. Salt (��, 恐) plays in the Bible an important part: in the Old Testament through its use in all sacrifices (Lev. ii. 13; Mark ix. 40), and in the New Testament through its symbolic application. The history of salt was the history of the consumption of Christians in the world (Matt. v. 13). The Mosaic injunction rests upon the Oriental custom of eating salt, on the ratification of a covenant, as the pledge of perpetual and mutual friendship between the contracting parties, because of its property of preservation: hence a lasting covenant was called "a covenant of salt" (Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chron. 1:15; 18, 18:18). It was a sign of friendship and alliance, of peace and security. Hence, also, it was used to preserve victuals, and was employed, in the Mosaic law, as a symbol of holiness, and as a pledge of perpetual friendship between the parties. It was used in the sacrifices of the Old Testament, and was an emblem of the preservation of the church and its members. It was a symbol of the perpetual and mutual friendship between the parties, because of its property of preservation: hence a lasting covenant was called "a covenant of salt."

SALVATION ARMY.

The name comes from the methods adopted and the object aimed at. The army studiously avoids, as far as may be, religious phraseology, calling its places of meeting "Salvation Warehouses" and "Salvation Stores," puts its notices in military or startling terms, and deliberately adopts peculiar posters and window placards to announce its presence and work. Its object is everywhere to make a sensation. The expenses of the army are borne by collections. Care is taken to have its pecuniary affairs as public as possible, and its expenses low. In doctrine it is broadly evangelical. It does not teach sinless perfection, but the possibility of "a heart from which the blood of Christ has cleansed away all uncleanness." It does not seek to draw persons from existing churches; but it desires to make converts among the most abandoned classes, who lie outside of religious influences. Much noise and confusion attend its operations, but these it considers necessary accompaniments. The members of the army wear a peculiar though plain uniform, parade the streets with martial drumming, banners, and singing, are obligated to go anywhere they may be sent, and exhibit courage bordering upon recklessness. In November, 1883, according to report of the army's "commissioner for the United States of America," the army had 500 stations, 1,400 officers wholly paid by the work in England. It had spread all over Great Britain, the North of Ireland, the United States of America, and had entered Sweden, France, India, Africa, and New Zealand. In the United States it had 50 stations, including 3 in California, 99 permanently engaged officers, and during 1882 and 1883 had purchased, by contributions of "those blessed through the work of the army," nine properties valued at $58,000.
The War Cry, the army's organ, had a circulation of twenty thousand weekly. See All about the In 1883 the army was expelled from several cantons of Switzerland (Geneva, Bern, and Neuchatel) as disturbers of the peace.

Salve, a salutatory formula of great solemnity, is used as the opening word in many celebrated Latin hymns, of which we mention, Salve, tian Life in Song), "Hail, thou Head! so bruised and wounded;" by Alford (Year of Praise),

"Hail! that Head with sorrows bowing;" by tunatus, translated into English by Mrs. Charles tion, hail;" and by Kynaston (Lyra Messianica),

Salvianus, b. in Gaul, probably at Cologne [Treves], in the beginning of the fifth century; d.
as presbyter, in Marseilles, after 495; was an elegant and prolific writer. Of his works are still extant, De acaritate, written about 440, first edited by Richardson, Basel, 1528, a denunciation of the avarice of the laity, in favor of the church;
De gubernatione Dei, often called De providentia, written about 451, first edited by Brissianus, Basel, 1530, a defence of divine Providence, somewhat resembling the De civitate Dei by Augustine;
nine letters to different persons. Collected editions of his works were published by Pitccheau

Salzburg. From Bohemia, the Hussite movement penetrated into the diocese of Salzburg; and in 1420 Archbishop Eberhard III. was compelled to employ force in an effort to suppress that heresy in his countries. Appartently he succeeded. Nevertheless, the very first writings of Luther caused a singular commotion
throughout the whole population; and when Staup-pitz, Paul Speratus, Stephan Agricola, and Georg Scharer had successively preached the views of the Reformation in the country, the archbishop, Wolfgang Dietrich, found it necessary not only to silence and expel a number of preachers, but to cleanse the very body. In 1426 he issued a decree ordering the inhabitants of the city of Salzburg either to return to the Roman-Catholic faith, or to leave the country within a month;
and in 1614 the edict was extended to the whole country, and enforced by means of a swarm of Capuchins and a troop of soldiers. Again, for some time, the country seemed on the right path, until in 1856 a priest in the Tefferegger valley discovered a whole congregation of secret Lutherans. They used the Bible, Luther's Catechisms, Spangenberg's postils, and Urban Rhei's Seelenarseney (medicine for the soul) for their edification and instruction; and they assembled often in the dead of night for common prayer and singing. The archbishop, Maximilian Gandulph, ordered them to present their confession of faith:
but, the confession being a very simple statement of purely biblical views, it was found utterly.heretical; and, in spite of the interference of the elector of Brandenburg and the diet of Ratisbon, the archbishop gave his subjects the option between recantation and exile. The next year, however, Gandulph died; and the question was dropped by his successor. But in 1728 Leopold Anton ascended the episcopal chair, and his principal object was to amass power and wealth for himself and his family. The heresy question seemed to him a suitable point of operation; and he declared that he would have the heretics out of the country, even though all the field should be covered with thorns and thistles. The Jesuits were let loose on the population, and chicaneries very rapidly turned into actual persecutions. The old conditions were revived, — recantation, or exile; and, in order to suit the purposes of the archbishop, exile was made to mean confiscation of property, and renunciation of family. As such measures were utterly at variance with the stipulations of the peace of Westphalia, complaintes were made both to the emperor in Vienna, and to the diet at Ratisbon; and Prussia, Denmark, Holland, and England interfered. The archbishop charged a committee with investigating the whole matter, and placing it on a legal footing. The committee travelled from county to county to register the names of the Protestants, and hear their complaints, and as it gave golden promises of religious freedom, and justice in every respect, the Protestants were not slow in coming forward. But, when the archiepiscopal govern-dment discovered that no less than 20,675 persons wished to separate from the Roman-Catholic Church, they made a change in its policy. Austrian troops were sent for, and quartered upon the Protestant households; and a kind of dragonces was introduced. Only with great difficulty could the Protestants obtain permission to leave the country, and their children and property were retained. In this great emergency the king of Prussia charged the military forces with the measures to suppress the heresy. He threatened to adopt a similar policy towards his Roman-Catholic subjects, and formally invited the Salzburg Protestants to come and settle under his sceptre. The archbishop was compelled to yield, and a regular emigration was arranged. No less than 18,000 people were removed to Prussia, and Leopold Anton lived to see thorns and thistles cover large tracts of his country. See GUCKING: Emigrationsgeschichte der Salzb. Samaria and the Samaritans. Samarism is the name of a city of the province. 1. City. It was, according to 1 Kings xvi. 23, 24, built by Omri, the sixth king of Israel, who, after the burning-down of his palace at Tirzah, bought a hill from a certain Shemer, on which he built a city which he named Shomron, after the former possessor. Samarism continued to be the metropolis of Israel for two centuries of that kingdom, with the exception of the exiles in Babylon (1 Kings xi. 26 ff.), until, after the return of the exiles, when the Samaritans were reoccupied in the land of Israel, they were merely the seat of the Samaritan cult, where, for a very long time, the Samaritans, or, better, the Samaritans who lived in it, continued to maintain the ancient Sichem, the seat of Samaritan cult, which had been burned down by the conquerors of Jericho, and which they reoccupied under the name of Samaria, which name was still in use in the time of the Maccabees, and which was used by Josephus in the time of the Roman emperors. See the note on the construction of the word Samaria.

2. Province. As such, Samaria is first mentioned 1 Mac. x. 30, then in the New Testament (Luke xvii. 11; John iv. 4 sq.); Acts i. 8, vili. 1, 5, ix. 31, xv. 3), and by Josephus (War, iii. 3, 4). Two hours from Samaria, towards the south-east, lies Nabulis, the ancient Sichem, the seat of Samaritan cult, where, for a very long time, the Samaritans, or, as they call themselves, the Shomerim, i.e., custodians of the law, lived.

3. Samaritans. When Cyrus permitted the Jews to rebuild the temple, the colonists of Samaria asked to be permitted to take part in the work of building (Ez. iv. 2). On being refused to do so, the Samaritans succeeded in preventing the erection of the temple for twenty years, and offered the same unrelenting opposition to Nehemiah, when in 445 he set about rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, which till now had lain in ruins. They welcomed with open arms any refugees from Jerusalem, who for crime, or to escape the strict Mosaic rule there established, might wish to leave their country (Jos.: Ant. xi. 8, 7). No doubt the stern reforms introduced by Nehemiah on his second visit (Neh. xiii.) were hated by the Samaritans, who were in the main a class of traders and usurers, and who were thus unscrupulously seeking their own advantage; in any case, the laxity which had crept in during his absence, and to these an asylum was always open at Shechem. The alienation between the two nations was finally completed when the Samaritans at last succeeded in erecting a rival temple on Gerizim, and endeavored to transfer thither the priestly offices of the older one of Jerusalem. The immediate occasion of the undertaking was the refusal of Manasseh, brother of Jaddus, high priest, and son-in-law to Sanballat the Samaritan governor, to dissolve his irregular marriage in obedience to the admonition of Nehemiah. They succeeded in erecting a temple on Gerizim under the sanction of the Samaritans, and in conjunction with Thomas Marshall, rector of Lincoln’s College, Oxford, carried on a correspondence with the Samaritans, which lasted, with
The Samaritans have two more days of assembly, though they do not count them as holidays, termed Summōth, on which the number of the congregation is taken; and, in return, every male over twenty years of age presents the priest with half a shekel, in accordance with Exod. xxx. 12-14, receiving from him a calendar for the coming six months, prepared from a table in his possession. From these offerings the priest gains his living. He may consecrate any of his family that he pleases to the priesthood, provided the candidate be twenty-five years of age, and never have suffered his hair to be cut. Like other Oriental, he never removes his turban, and thus is not easily to be distinguished from the rest of the congregation; but, in accordance with Lev. x 6, he does not “rend his clothes” by wearing a slit on his sleeve, as other Samaritans; and, when the roll of the law is taken from the ark, he, like his assistants, places a cloth on which they call talith, around his head. They wear white turbans; ordinarily they are compelled, by way of distinction from Mohammedans, to wear them of a pale-red color. They may cut their hair, or not, as they please, but not their beards, this being forbidden in Lev. xx i. 19. Women must let their hair grow, and wear no ear-rings, because of them the golden calf was made. For fear of scandalizing the Mohammedans, none but the old ones venture to attend the synagogue. When a boy is born, great rejoicing is held; his circumcision always takes place on the eighth day after birth, even though it be a sabbath. Boys marry as early as fifteen or sixteen, girls at twelve. The Samaritans may marry Christian or Jewish girls, provided they become Samaritans. When a man has a childless wife, he may take a second, but, if she also be barren, not a third. Divorces, though permitted, are uncommon. The dead are prepared for burial by their own friends: the whole body is washed, but especially the hands and feet. The burial takes place, if possible, between sunset the same day, accompanied with the recitation of a litany for the dead:—

Lord Jehovah, Elohim, for thy mercy and for thine own sake, and for thy glory, and for the sake of our lords Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and our lords Moses and Aaron and Eleazar and Ittamar and Phinehas and Joshua and Caleb, and the holy angels, and the seventy elders, and the holy mountain of Gerizim, Beth El. If thou acceptest this prayer, may there go forth from before thee holy countenance a gift sent to protect the spirit of thy servant N., the son of N., of the sons of ..., daughter ..., from the sons of Israel who flock to Mount Gerizim, Beth El. Amen. Through Moses the trusty. Amen. Amen. Amen.”

These readings are continued every day to the next sabbath, the women of the family watching near the grave. On the sabbath it is visited by the whole congregation, except those who eat there together, reciting part of the law, and singing hymns, finishing the recitation later in the day with the relations.

The following is a part of a litany for the dead:

The Penitaleuch. — The text differs in many passages from the present Hebrew text, often agreeing with the Septuagint. It is reprinted in the London Polyglot. [The whole Pentateuch is divided into nine hundred and sixty-four paragraphs, or κεφαλαια, and is halved in Lev. vii. 15 (Authorized Version margin, verses 15 and 16).]

As to its critical character, there has always been a difference of opinion; and for nearly two hundred years one of the most extraordinary controversies on record was kept up. The leader in this controversy was J. Morin, who placed the Samaritan Pentateuch far above the received text; and in this opinion he was followed by men like Capellus and others.

The Samaritan Version [published by A. Brüll, in Hebrew characters, in 1875].

The Samaritan, in Greek (Σαμαριτικόν), probably the same which is mentioned in the Hexapla of Origen.

The Arabic version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, made by Abu Said in Egypt, on the basis of the Arabic translation of Saadia. An edition of this version was commenced by Kuenen at Leyden. Genesis was published in 1851; Exodus and Leviticus, in 1854.

The other literature of the Samaritans is very unimportant. They have ten prayer-books for the day of the week, and besides a collection of hymns, which they call Darrān ("string of pearls") and Defer ("book"). Of their chronicles, we mention the Samaritan Chronicle, or Book of Joshua (sent to Scaliger by the Samaritans of Cairo in 1584: it was edited by Juymboli, Leyden, 1648), the Chronicle of Abul-Fath, full of fables, and containing little useful matter [published recently by Vilmar, with the title Abulfathi Annales Samaritanii, etc., Gotha, 1865].

Sects.—Concerning the sects, Abul-Fath's statement is as follows: A sect appeared calling themselves "Dostān," or "The Friends," which varied in many respects from the traditions of their fathers respecting many religious matters. Thus they held for impure a fountain into which a dead insect had fallen, altered the time for reckoning the purification of women and commencement of feasts, forbade the eating of eggs which had been laid, allowing only to be eaten which were found inside a slain bird, held unclean snakes and cemeteries, and held any one whose shadow fell upon a grave as impure for seven days. They rejected the words "Blessed be our God forever," and substituted Elohim for Jehovah; denied that Gerizim had been the first sanctuary of God; upset the Samaritan reckoning for the feasts, giving thirty days to each month, rejecting the feasts and order of fasts, and the portions due to the Levites. They counted the fifty days to Pentecost from the sabbath, the day after the first day of Pentecost, not from the Sunday like the other Samaritans. Their priests, without becoming impure, could enter a house suspected of infection, as long as they did not speak. When a pure and a doubtful house stood side by side, the condition of the latter was decided by watching whether a clean or unclean bird first settled upon it. On the sabbath they might only eat and drink from earthen vessels, which, if defiled, could not be purified: they might give no food or water to their cattle; this was done on the day previous. Their high priest was a certain Zara, who had been turned out of his own community for immorality.

At a later period lived Dūsis. Being condemned to death for adultery, he was resorted on the promise of sowing dissension among the Samaritans by founding a new sect. He went to Askar (near Nablus), and formed a friendship with a Samaritan distinguished for his learning and piety. Compelled, however, to fly for his life on account of a false accusation which he had brought against his friend, he took shelter at Shueike with a widow-woman named Amentiu, in whose house he composed many writings; but, finding that a hot pursuit after him was still maintained, he retired to a cave, where he perished of hunger, and his body was eaten by dogs. Before his departure, however, he left his books with his hostess, enjoining her to let no one read them unless he first bathed in the tank hard by. Accordingly, when Levi, the high priest's nephew, arrived with seven others in search of him, they all bathed, one after the other, in the tank; and each, as he emerged from the water, exclaimed, "I believe in thee, Jehovah, and in Dūsis thy servant, and his sons and daughters;" Levi adding, when his turn came, "Woe to us if we deny Dūsis, the prophet of God." They then took the writings of Dūsis, and found that they contained more of the law, more even than Ezra. They concealed them, and on their return to Nablus reported that Dūsis had disappeared before they arrived, they knew not whither. At the next passover, Levi had to read out Exod. xii. 22 in the synagogue; but for "byssop" he substituted "thyme." Corrected by the congregation, he still persevered, crying, "This is right, as God hath said by his prophet Dūsis, on whom be peace! Ye are all worthy of death for denying the prophetic office of his servant Dūsis, altering the feasts, falsifying the great name of Jehovah, and persecuting the second prophet of God, whom he hath revealed from Sinai. Woe unto you that you have rejected and do not follow him!" Levi was stoned. His friends dipped a palm-leaf in his blood, and ordained that whoever would read Dūsis' writings, and see the leaf, must first fast seven days and nights. They cut off their hair, shaved their beards, and at their third day performed the strange ceremonies. On the sabbath they would not move from their place, and kept their feasts only on this day, during which they would not remove their hands from their sleeves. When one of their friends died, they would gird him with a girdle, put a stick in his hand, and shoes on his feet, saying, "If we rise, he will at once get up;" believing that the dead man, as soon as he was laid in the grave, would rise and go to paradise. As to the age in which Dusis lived, it must have been long before Origen; for this father, in his Commentary on John xix. 27 (ed. Lollnatzech, ii. 49), tells us that a "certain Dositheus arose, and claimed to be the Messiah. His followers are called Dositheans, who have his books, and tell wonderful stories of him, as if he had not died, and is still alive somewhere." This agrees with the statement of Abū-l-Fath concerning Dusis. According to Origen, Dositheus must have lived long before him, probably in the first, or at least in the second century of the Christian era. That he was the teacher or pupil of Simon Magus, as some have asserted, is an untenable conjecture.

SAMOSATA, Paul of. See Monarchism.

SAMPSEAN. See Elkenaites.

SAMSON (i.e., the destroyer) was an Israelite of the tribe of Dan (Judg. xii. 2). His birth was announced to his mother, who had long been barren. He was to be a Nazirite from his birth. The mother was directed, accordingly, to conform her own regimen to the tenor of the Nazarite law, and strictly abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquor, and from every species of impure food. Samson was born at Zorah (Jos. xv. 33, xix. 41). When he was grown up, he staid at the camp of the Danites (Judg. xii. 25), between Zorah and Eshtaol, where "the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times." From this time his career commences, and his deeds may be divided into six parts.

1. Samson's Wedding. — Samson goes to Timnah, where he met one of the daughters of the Philistines: "it was of Jehovah." The parents object to such a union at first, but at last yield to their son's wish. On his first visit to his future bride, he slew a lion without a weapon; and on his second visit, to espouse her, he found the skeleton, denuded of the flesh by the birds and jackals, occupied by a swarm of bees (Judg. xiv. 1—8). At his wedding-feast he propounded a riddle, the solution of which referred to his obtaining a quantity of honey from the carcass of a slain lion; and the clandestine manner in which his guests got possession of the clew to the enigma cost thirty Philistines their lives (Judg. xiv. 10—20).

2. SAMSON'S VENGEANCE. The ill treatment which he had received at the hands of his father-in-law, who, upon a frivolous pretext, had given away his daughter in marriage to another man, prompted Samson to a vindictive deed, which was executed by securing a multitude of jackals, and, by tying firebrands to their tails, setting fire to the cornfields of his enemies. The indignation of the Philistines, on discovering the author of the outrage, vented itself upon the family of his father-in-law, who had been the remote occasion of it, in the burning of their house, in which both father and daughter perished. This cruelty provoked Samson, and he anointed them "hip and thigh with a great slaughter."

3. The Battle Ramath-lehi, i.e., at the lifting-up of the Jawbone. — Having taken his residence at Etim, he was thence dislodged by consenting to a pusillanimous arrangement on the part of his own countrymen, by which he agreed to surrender himself in bonds, provided he could not himselfs fall upon him and kill him. Being brought, in this apparently helpless condition, to a place called, from the event, Lehi ("a jaw"), his preternatural potency suddenly put itself forth, and snapping the cords asunder, and snapping up the jawbone of an ass, he dealt so effectually about him, that a thousand men were slain on the spot. Wearyed with his exertions, Samson became faint from thirst. God heard his prayer, and caused a stream to gush from a hollow rock hard by; and Samson gave it the name of En-hakkore (i.e., the well of him that heareth).

4. The Gates of Gaza at Hebron (Judg. xvi. 1-3).—Samson suffered himself weakly to be drawn into the company of a woman of loose character at Gaza. The inhabitants attempt to detain him at Gaza by closing the gates of the city, and making them fast; but Samson, apprised of it, rose at midnight, and breaking away bolts, bars, and hinges, departed, carrying the gates to a hilltop near Hebron.

5. The Attempted Outwitting in the Valley of Sorek (Judg. xvi. 4-14).—Here he lived with Delilah. Tempted by the bribe of the Philistines, she employs all her arts to worm from him the secret of his strength. Three times he deceived her, abasing at the same time the Philistines lying in wait.

6. Samson's Self-treachery and Death (Judg. xvi. 15-31). At last, in a moment of weakness, Samson disclosed to Delilah the fact that his strength lay in his hair,—not that it really lay in his hair, but in the fact that it arose from his relation to God as a Nazarite. The Philistines, having deprived him of sight, at first immured him in a near Hebron. The inhabitants attempt to detain him, that a thousand men were slain on the spot. Wearied with his exertions, Samson became faint from thirst. God heard his prayer, and caused a stream to gush from a hollow rock hard by, and Samson gave it the name of En-hakkore (i.e., the well of him that heareth).
of his duties as ruler, the three chief sanctuaries,—Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpeth (vii. 16). At other times he lived at Ramah, and exercised his functions there (vii. 17). When he became old, he appointed his sons Joel and Abiah as judges, not to take his place, but to relieve him. They were judges at Beersheba (viiii. 2). But these sons possessed not their father's integrity of spirit, but "turned aside after lucre, took bribes, and perverted judgment" (viii. 3); so the elders of the people came to him and said, "Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways; now make us a king" (viii. 5). Although the Lord fulfilled the desire of the people, yet the people sinned in preferring the splendor of an outward, visible kingdom to the glory of the invisible kingdom of Jehovah (vii. 7, x. 19, xii. 12, 18 sqq.). At the command of God, Samuel anointed and made Saul king, and then retired from public office (xii. 1). Saul proved himself incapable of leading the people. Samuel's help was often needed. When after the rejection of Saul, and David's anointing to the throne, Samuel felt assured that David was the man after God's heart, able to build up the kingdom of Israel, he retired entirely from public life. Only once again he came forward before his death to defend the anointed of the Lord against the rejected by the Lord (xix. 18-24). It may be that in his retirement Samuel put in writing what is called (1 Chron. xxix. 29) the "Book of Samuel."

Samuel's Priesthood.—In this direction Samuel only filled a gap out of necessity. Eli was dead, and his two sons also. The ark was taken, Shiloh was desolated. In this time of need Samuel restored the orphaned priesthood by building an altar at Ramah (1 Sam. vii. 17). Here, as well as at Mizpeth (vii. 6), Gilgal (xi. 15), and Bethlehem (xvi. 2 sqq.), he offered sacrifices. His priestly function, however, consisted not merely in sacrificing, but more especially in praying for the people (vii. 5, 8, viii. 6, xii. 16-23); and the efficacy of the power of his prayer is often mentioned (Jer. xxv. 1). In reviewing the whole career of Samuel, we notice that he forms a transition period. He is the last judge, and mediatesthe reconstructionofthe theocracy by founding the royal and propheti cal offices, which again were of the greatest influence for the formation of the priestly office. Some regard Samuel as a type of John the Baptist. It cannot be denied that there are many striking parallels between both, but the Baptist's activity was not as comprehensive as Samuel's. John was nothing but a voice of one crying in the wilderness, whilst Samuel had to reform and to guide the whole religious and political life of the nation. Samuel died at Ramah (1 Sam. xxxv. 1, xxxviii. 3). All Israel lamented him. He was buried in his house at Ramah. See the works of Knochel: Prophet d. SAMUEL, Books of, so called because he is the prominent figure in their history, not because he was their author. They originally formed one book, as the Massoretic note to 1 Sam. xxi. 24, which states that this verse is the middle of the book, incontestably proves. In the Septuagint they are called "The First and Second Book of the Kings." Daniel Bomberg was the first to introduce the division into the printed Hebrew text (Venice, 1517). The Book of Samuel links itself directly to Judges, which presents the confusion of that period by showing how the monarchy arose, and reached its height. It divides itself into three principal parts: (A) The history of Samuel, the last judge and the prophetic founder of the monarchy (1 Sam. i.—xxii.); (B) The history of Saul, the first king of Israel (xii.—xxx.); (C) The history of David (2 Sam. i.—xxiv.). The death of David is given in 1 Kings. The book is a unit, but flows not from one source, but from several, which the author combines, without, however, being able always to disguise the fact. But the modern critics overdo the matter when they find everywhere contradictions. And they do not agree in tracing the sources. For instance, M. Duncker, Seinecke, and Reuss try to make out that these stories are not genuine, but that the history of Samuel rests upon three different and mutually exclusive accounts: (1) xi., which they say is the original historical account; (2) ix. 1—x. 16; (3) viii., x. 17—27. Dillmann and Wellhausen trace it to two sources: (1) ix. 1—10, 16, x. 27—xi. 11, 15; (2) viii. 10, 17—27, xi. 12—14. Wellhausen considers the second account as unhistorical, and of exilian or post-exilian origin. Dillmann maintains that one or the other must be false. But since the editor of the book, if he did really make up his history out of two different sources, evidently considered them of equal value, and mutually supplementary, the first question to be answered is, Was he right? Of course, if there is no living God who regulates the future in its smallest details, and can reveal it, then both accounts are equally unhistorical. But, if there be such a God, then there is no difficulty in accepting both accounts, and fitting together.

It is true that in First Samuel there are told several similar stories,—Saul's inspiration (x. 10—12 and xix. 22—24), his rejection as king (xiii. 8—14 and xv. 12 sqq.), his madness (xviii. 10 sq. and xix. 9 sqq.), David's sparing of Saul (xxiv. and xxvi.), David's flight to the Philistines (xxi. 10—16 and xxvii. 1 sqq.); but the second story is not an exact repetition of the first. The circumstances were similar: hence the same general result followed, yet they were not identical in the two. It is also true that there are genuine repetitions and breaks, formal incongruities and contradictions, transpositions, etc. Cf. vii. 12, 18 with ix. 16, x. 5, xiii., which is intelligible only on the supposition that there was a fresh attack of the Philistines (xi. 15), or that Samuel's victory was temporary. Again: in David's early history there is some confusion. In Second Samuel, otherwise more united, there are some such phenomena: e.g., 2 Sam. xiv. 8, and Michal for Merab; the name of Goliath's brother, missing in 2 Sam. xxii. 19, is to be supplied from 1 Chron. xx. 5. But the attempts (Theinius and Wellhausen) to make up deficiencies by the aid of the LXX. are conjectural, and more or less arbitrary.

While the author of Kings regularly names his sources, the author of Samuel does this only once (2 Sam. i. 18). But it is probable that the author had recourse to the official records spoken of in 1 Chron. xxix. 20. The book contains Ps. xviii. and the "last words of David" (2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7). The time of composition was after David's death (2 Sam. v. 5), after the separation of the kingdom, but before the downfall of Judah (1 Sam. xxvii. 8). Many rabbis make Jeremiah to be the author. But in truth, neither author nor definite date can be assigned to it. The author is, however, no mere compiler, but one, who, in the true prophetic spirit, made thorough use of the sources. The book takes high rank in literary and historical respects. Its style is clear, graphic. The honest and impartial character of the prophetic author comes out in his statement of many things which were in plain contradiction to the Mosaic law, and in his faithful and unvarnished account of David's failings, notwithstanding his prejudice in his favor.

SANBALLAT (Heb., סנבל), ל, סנבל, סנבל; a name, probably, of Assyro-Babylonian origin, i.e., Sin-babal, or Sin [moon-god] bestowed life") is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible, all in the Book of Nehemiah: Neh. ii. 10, 19, iv. 1 sq. (Heb. iii. 33 sq.), iv. 7 sqq., iv. 1 sqq., cf. 9, vi. 1-5 sqq., 12-14, xiii. 28. He headed the opposition which Nehemiah encountered in carrying out the plan of rebuilding Jerusalem, and resolutely vowing there a Hebrew national life. See NEHEMIAH.

We are told that Sanballat, and Tobiah "the servant, the Ammonite," were greatly displeased at the news of Nehemiah's coming, because of his interest in "the welfare of the children of Israel" (Neh. ii. 10). On learning of the determination formed by the Hebrews to build the walls of the city, these two, with "Geshem the Arabian," laughed scornfully, and contemptuously accused them of a rebellious purpose against the king, Artaxerxes (ii. 1); i.e., Artaxerxes Longimannus. Whim in spite of this, Sanballat found the work actually in progress, although still contemptuous, he grew very angry, and roused the hostility of "his brethren and the army of Samaria" (iv. 1 sq. = Heb. iii. 33 sq.). At length he conspired with Tobiah "and the Ammonites and the Asdodites" hostile peoples on various sides of Jerusalem — to go up and hinder the work by force (iv. 7 sqq. = Heb. iv. 1 sqq.). The plot, however, became known to Nehemiah, and was abandoned (iv. 15 = Heb. iv. 9). After the wall was finished, Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem endeavored to secure the person of Nehemiah by inviting him to a conference. Four messengers in succession, followed by a letter, in which Sanballat mentioned rumors that charged Nehemiah with treason, failed to entice the latter (vi. 1-5 sqq.); and even the expedient of bribing a man to prophesy danger, and so to induce Nehemiah to shut himself up in the temple, was fruitless (vi. 12-14). After this we hear nothing more of Sanballat, except that a son of "Joiaud, the son of Eliashib the high priest," was his son-in-law. This alliance seems to have taken place during an absence of Nehemiah from Jerusalem (cf. xiii. 8), and probably betokens a scheme of Sanballat to gain influence among the Hebrews, since he could not successfully oppose them by force (cf. xiii. 4, 7, 8).

It remains to inquire who Sanballat was. He is called "the Horonite" (Heb., גֹּעלה; LXX., אֱֻֽלֵית; cf. 2 Chron. xii. 8, 10, xiii. 25). We cannot be sure whether this appellation is derived from Horonaim, a city of Moab (Isa. xvi. 5, etc., and Mesha-stone), or Beth-horon, in Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3, 5, etc.). In favor of Horonaim is the association of Sanballat with Tobiah the Ammonite and Geshem the Arabian, and more particularly the fact that his daughter's marriage with the high priest's grandson is classed with the marrying of "wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab" (Neh. xiii. 28, cf. 23, 29). Against Horonaim is the lack of the term "Moabite" in connection with Sanballat, although this may be due to the fact (see below) that he did not properly belong to that people. In favor of Beth-horon is Sanballat's apparent residence in the territory of Samaria, and particularly his endeavor to have a meeting with Nehemiah at Ono in Benjamin (see vi. 2 and cf. xi. 31, 35), which cannot have been very far from Beth-horon. In any case his name points to Assyria or Babylonia as the original home of his family. They may have been among the colonists transported to the "western country" by Sargon or Esarhaddon (see those arts.). There is no evidence that Sanballat held any official position in Samaria under the Persian king, but he seems to have been a governor beyond the river (ii. 7, 9); and a Persian official would hardly have ventured to oppose so persistently one who, like Nehemiah, brought a commission from the king. We know nothing definite about "his brethren and the army of Samaria" (iv. 2 = Heb. iii. 34); but it seems to have been personal influence, and not official authority, which he exercised over them. The Sanballat (סנבלאート) whom Josephus (Ant., XI. 7, 2 sq.) names as satrap of Samaria was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. It is interesting to notice, however, that Josephus calls him a Cuthian (cf. Cuthah, Cuth, a Babylonian city; 2 Kings xvi. 24, 30), and says he gave his daughter in marriage to Manasses, brother of Jaddus, the high priest, that he might conciliate the favor of the Jewish nation. There may be here some confusion with the earlier biblical Sanballat. FRANCIS BROWN.

SANCTIFICATION is, according to the Scriptures, the fundamental principle of religious morality. Its root strike down into the holiness of God, and it is the main element in the Christian concept of God. Jehovah is the Holy One (Isa. vi.), who not only is free from all sin and impurity, but institutes a holy people, and develops it through the Holy Spirit. Christ addressed God as the Holy Father (John xvii. 11); and it is because God is holy that we are urged to sanctify ourselves, or become holy (Lev. xi. 44, 45; 1 Pet. i. 16). This vocation to become holy was symbolized in the arrangements and furniture of the temple, which was altogether holy, and consecrated to the Lord. Sanctification consists in withdrawal from the world, and presentation to God. Christ, who was holy from his birth, also sanctified himself for the world (John xvii. 19), completing the work by his self-sacrifice on the cross. Christians are designated "saints" (holy ones, Acts ix. 32; Rom. xvi. 20), not only because they are called to become holy, but because they receive with their faith in Christ his holiness or righteousness as their own. Christ is made unto believers sanctification (1 Cor. i. 30). Sanctification is treated of, now as an act of God, or Christ, or the Holy Spirit, now as an act of man. God sanctifies (John xvii. 17), and man enters into the redemption as a foreordained sanctifying economy of God (Eph. i. 4; 1 Pet. i. 15).

The Roman-Catholic Church confounds sanctification with justification. The Council of Trent (VI. 7) says that justification is not only forgiveness of sin, but the sanctification and renewal of the inner man. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, on the other hand, defines justification as a forensic act, a declaration that a person is righteous. But inasmuch as this forensic act is an actual forgiveness of sins, and a reception into the new life, it is also a creative act. What the Protestant confessions insist on is the clear distinction between the instantaneous act of justification on the part of God and the continued and gradual process of sanctification. By the act of God's justification the believer is made a creature of God: in sanctification he carries on what God has begun, and realizes the Christ in his own life. Justification is the germ of our new life, a single act: sanctification is a gradual process, the development of this new life.

SANCTION, Pragmatic (Pragmatica sanctio, or simply pragmatica), was in the later Roman imperial times a rescript of the emperor, couched in formal language, particularly one respecting the public law, issued on request of a city, province, or church (Cod. Justin., I. 12, § 1 de saec. eclecs., i. 2). It was called "pragmatic" because it was issued after consultation and treaty concerning the matter (pragmatos). The term through the middle ages, and down to modern times, has been especially used of laws respecting weighty matters. Of pragmatic sanctions affecting the church, the chief are:

1. That of Louis IX. of France (1268), which was the first ordinance of the thirteenth century designed as a check to the undue extension of papal power and to the misuses of the curia, particularly to the excessive demands for tithes, and to the enlargement of papal reservations respecting benefices. It consists of six articles. It allows all prelates, patrons, and ordinary collators of benefices, the fullest exercise and unhindered preservation of their jurisdiction, and forbids simony. This sanction was the first important law on the subject of the Endowment of Gallicanism have, therefore, always endeavored to show that it is a forgery (comp. R. SANDBURY ISLANDS.

SANDEMAN and the SANDEMANIANS. Robert Sandeman—b. at Perth, Scotland, 1718; d. at Danbury, Conn., America, 1771—was a son-in-law of John Glass (q. v.), and an elder of the Glassite Church in Edinburgh, but removed in 1760 to London, where he formed a congregation, and in 1764 to America, where he continued active for the propagation of his ideas. The sect, however, called "Glassites" in Scotland, and "Sande- manians" in England and America, never attained any high degree of prosperity, and at present it hardly numbers more than two thousand members. Doctrinally they distinguish themselves by defining faith as a mere assent to the teachings and works of Christ. With respect to liturgy, ritual, and discipline, their differences are more pronounced. They celebrate the Lord's Supper once a week; hold love-feasts, which consist in a common dinner, every Sunday between morning and evening service; abstain from blood and every thing strangled; and practise a kind of communism, so far as the members hold their property. The Sandemanians in America, for instance, had reduced the language to writing. That year the idols had been destroyed, the priesthood abolished, and human sacrifices discontinued. The name of Sandemanianism is thus bestowed on the sect, but the term Glassite is more generally employed. The sect was founded about 1760 by John Glass, who had left Scotland on account of religious differences, and settled in London. The first missionaries arrived in the Sandwich Islands March 30, 1820. They were Hiram Bingham and Asa Thurston, both graduates of Andover Seminary, at whose ordination, at Goshen, Conn., Sept. 29, 1819, Rev. Hemau Humphrey preached from Josh. xiii. 1, "There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed." The Sandwich Islands had been before the eyes of the Christian public for many years. A native, Obookiah by name (b. 1765), was brought to New Haven in 1808. He there met Samuel Mills, and became candidate for the first pupils at the Missionary Institute at Cornwall, to whose opening his presence had contributed. Obookiah died a Christian in 1818. Nine Hawaiians were educated in the school before its discontinuance in 1826, and some of them returned to their native land as teachers. Much to their surprise, Bingham and Thurston found that the idols had been destroyed, the priesthood abolished, and human sacrifices discontinued. They had ready access to the people, and by 1822 had reduced the language to writing. That year a printing-press was set up. Mr. Ellis, the devoted Polynesian missionary, visited the islands, and rendered the American missionaries valuable assistance in acquiring the native tongue. In 1823 the missionaries Bishop, Stewart, Richards, Ely, and Goodrich arrived from the United States. The queen-dowager, Keop, through the influence of the American missionaries, was induced to give the first lands to the church, and she was thus enabled to begin the work. The queen, Liholioli, was baptized in 1823. Mahana, Letters on Sandemanianism (Edinburgh, 1753), Thoughts on Christianity, Sign of the Prophet, Jonah, Honor of Marriage, etc. See also Fuller.

The religion of the Hawaiians, before the arrival of the missionaries, was indistinct, but superstitious, permitting human sacrifices, the worship of idols, etc. Polygamy was universal. No word was found in the language for chastity. Infanticide was very prevalent, and Dibble calculated that two-thirds of the children were killed by their parents. The tabu system, by which things and days were set apart as sacred, and individuals were refused contact with each other, was a prominent feature of the life on the islands, and a source of great power to the reigning family and priesthood. in 1839 by the French guns. By 1830 twenty books had been printed in the Hawaiian language.

In 1834 there were 50,000 learners in the schools.

The translation of the Bible was completed on Feb. 25, 1839.

Revivals have swept through the island at various times. In 1833 the natives sent missionaries to the Marquesas. In 1833 the Hawaiian Evangelical Association was formed; the churches being declared independent, so far as government was concerned, of the American Board. The entire expense of the mission up to 1839, when the aid of the American churches was declared no longer necessary, was $1,220,000.

The total number admitted to communion up to 1870 was 55,300. At the present time the entire population is Christian. The Roman Catholics have made some headway. The Church of England has a bishop of Honolulu and a handful of converts. The Congregational Church is still dominant. On June 15, 1876, a jubilee celebration was held in the large stone church of Honolulu; three thousand crowding into the building, and as many more unable to get admittance. The eloquent Rev. Mr. Kuaea preached in Hawaiian, the Kingdom of Hawaii, London, 1868; Burns, Boston, 1870; Trues Coax: Life in Hawaii, 1872; three thousand crowding into the building, the islands. He published a much-valued translation of the Psalms (1636), Job, Ecclesiastes, etc. (1638), and the Song of Solomon (1641). These were nearly inaccessible till H. J. Todd issued in 1839 a Selection from them, with prefatory Life: a complete edition was prepared 1872 by R. Hooper. In James Montgomery's opinion "his psalms are incomparably the most poetical in the English language, and yet they are scarcely known. Charles I., when a prisoner in Carisbrooke Castle, "vastly delighted to read" them. Dryden called Sandys "the best versifier of the former age," and Pope thought English poetry much indebted to his translations.

SANHEDRIN (Matt. v. 22, xxxvi. 59; Mark xiv. 55, xv. 1; Luke xxii. 66; John xi. 47; Acts iv. 15, v. 21, 27, 34, vi. 12, 15, xxii. 30, xxiii. 6, 15, 20, 28, xxiv. 20) was the supreme council of the Jewish nation [in and before the time of Christ]. There were two kinds of Synedria, viz., the supreme or metropolitan Sanhedrin, called the Great Sanhedrin, and provincial councils called the Small Sanhedrin, of which we shall speak farther on.

We begin with

1. Number of Members, and their Classification in the Sanhedrin. — It consisted of seventy-one members: hence it is also called the Sanhedrin of seventy-one, to distinguish it from the provincial Sanhedrins, which consisted of twenty-three. The members were in part priests (Matt. xvii. 1; John vii. 32, xi. 47, xii. 10), in part laymen, the elders of the people, and in part scribes (Matt. xxxvi. 3, 57, 59, xxvii. 41; Mark viii. 31, xi. 27, xiv. 43, 53, xv. 1; Luke ix. 22, xx. 1, xxii. 66; Acts v. 21, vi. 12, xxii. 30, xxv. 18). The members belonged either to the Pharisees or Sadducees: the scribes probably belonged to the former (Acts v. 17, 34, xxiii. 6). Included in the seventy-one was the president, the Nasi, but not the notaries. The king was not to be president; but the high priest could be, as may be seen from Acts v. 21, 27, xxii. 2, not, however, because of his dignity as priest. On the right hand of the president sat the abbeth din [i.e., the father of the house of judgment, probably the vice-president]; on the left, the hacham, the sage [referee]. Without the assent of the vice-president, the president could not ordain. The other members of the Sanhedrin sat to the right and to the left, in a semicircle; while the two notaries stood before them, one to the right, and the other to the left. Before them sat three rows of disciples, in places appropriate to their respective attainments. The president assembled the council through his messengers; and, when he entered with his assistants he was received with special ceremony. Qualifications for membership were, that the applicant had already been a member of the smaller council, and that he was morally and physically blameless. He had to be a father of children, good-looking, and learned.

2. Time of Sessions. — The Sanhedrin sat every day, from the termination of the daily morning sacrifice till the daily evening sacrifice, with the exception of the sabbath and festivals.

3. Place of Session. — They generally met in the Hall of Squares, which was built by Simon ben Shetach. It was a basilica twenty-two ells long and eleven ells wide. Forty years before the destruction of the temple, the sessions of the Sanhedrin were removed from the Hall of Squares to the Halls of Purchase (Aboda Sara, fol. 8, col. 2).

After the destruction, the Sanhedrin was removed to the Halls of Levites. When these were destroyed, the Sanhedrin met in the Halls of Purchase in the village of Hebron, near the Temple.

to Jamniah or Jabneh: it was then transferred to Usha [under the presidency of Gamaliel I., ben-Simon II., A.D. 30-116]; to Jabne, and again to Usha, to Shaphra[m under the presidency of Simon I., ben-Gamaliel I., A.D. 140-183]; to Beth-shearith and Sephoris, under the presidency of Judah I., the Ilyo [A.D. 163-193], and finally to Tiberias, under the presidency of Judah II., Ben-Simon III. [A.D. 195-220], where it became more of a consistory, [but still retaining, under the presidency of Judah II., ben-Simon III. (A.D. 220-270), the power of excommunication]: while under the presidency of Gamaliel IV., ben-Judah II., it dropped the appellation Sanhedrin, and the authoritative decisions were issued under the name of Beth Hamidrash. Gamaliel V. [A.D. 400-425] was the last president. With the death of this patriarch, who was executed by Theodosius II., for erecting new synagogues contrary to the imperial inhibition, the title Nasi, the last remains of the ancient provincial Sanhedrin, or courts of justice, and regularly the king was to be waged, and gave the sovereign the permission to do so. In capital offences, it required a majority of at least two to condemn the accused, and the verdict of acquittal could be given on the same day.

5. Jurisdiction of the Great Sanhedrin.—This body had, [1] charge over all matters pertaining to religion and the different religious institutions, and [2] to give decisions in matters concerning a whole tribe [when it was accused of having departed from the living God], a high priest, a disobedient Sanhedrist, false prophets and seducers of the people, etc. It determined whether a war with any nation contemplated by the king was to be waged, and gave the sovereign permission to do so. It also appointed the provincial Sanhedrin, or courts of justice, and regulated the calendar. It inflicted not only bodily punishments (Acts v. 40), but also capital punishments, as stoning, burning, beheading, and strangling. According to the Gospel of John, however, the Jews declare "it is not lawful for us to put any man to death" (John xviii. 31), which agrees with the remark (Sanhedrin, fol. 24, col. 2). Forty years before the destruction of the temple, the power of inflicting capital punishments was taken away from Israel," which means that, without the confirmation of the sentence on the part of the Roman procurator, the Jews had not the power to carry the sentence of the Sanhedrin into execution. This is not only confirmed by Josephus (Ant. XX. 9, 1), but by the appeal of Paul to the chief captain (Acts xxiii. 25-30), and especially by the whole manner in which the trial of Jesus was conducted. The stoning of Stephen (vii. 54 sq.) was the illegal act of an enraged multitude.

6. Origin and Date of the Great Sanhedrin.—According to the Talmud, the Sanhedrin was instituted by Moses (Sanhedrin, 1, 8) when he appointed seventy elders, who, together with him as their president, were to act as magistrates and judges (Num. xi. 16). According to the Talmud (Mish. Katan, 29b), Hillel was president of the Sanhedrin in his reign, and his son Jonathan was vice-president. After the exile, the Sanhedrin, which existed even in the Babylonian captivity, was re-organized by Ezra. Whatever may be the claims of tradition, there seems to be little doubt that this supreme court, during the second temple, developed itself while the Greeks ruled over Palestine; and to this fact points the name συνέδρυς, συνέδριον, by which it has come down to us, as this word belongs to the Macedonian period. It is true that Josephus does not mention the Sanhedrin before the conquest of Judea by Pompey (B.C. 63); but the very fact that it had such power in the time of Hyrcanus II. as to summon Herod to answer for his unjust conduct (Jos.: Ant., XIV. 9, 4) shows that it must then have been a very old institution to have acquired such development and authority.

7. The Small Sanhedrin.—Any town or village which had no less than a hundred and twenty representative men had a provincial court, which consisted of twenty-three members. In Jerusalem there were two such courts. They had the power to judge such capital offences as came not within the jurisdiction of the supreme court. They sat every Monday and Thursday, being market-days, in a room adjoining the synagogue. Before the exile, these courts of justice were held in the market-place. There was no appeal to the Great Sanhedrin against the decision of this lesser Sanhedrin. Only when the opinion of the judges was divided did they themselves consult with the supreme court. The stripes to which offenders were sentenced were given in the synagogue by the sexton (cf. Mark xiii. 9 with Matt. x. 17, xviii. 34). Besides these two courts, there was also one consisting of three judges. There were in Jerusalem alone three hundred and ninety such Sanhedrins. Within the jurisdiction of this court came suits for debts, robbery, bodily injuries, compensation for damages, thefts which involved a twofold, fourfold, or fivefold value to the proprietor.

SARGON.

SUCCEEDING SHALMANESER IV. DURING THE SIEGE OF SAMARIA, AND IT WAS IN THE FIRST YEAR OF HIS REIGN (B.C. 722) THAT THE CITY FELL. (SEE 2 KINGS XVII. 6, WHERE NOTHING INDICATES THAT "THE KING OF ASSYRIA" IS DIFFERENT FROM THE ONE MENTIONED IN V. 7. SEE SHALMANESER.) HIS INSRIPTIONS MENTION THIS CONQUEST REPEATEDLY; AND IN ONE ACCOUNT THERE SEEMS TO BE A REFERENCE TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF FOREIGN COLONIES IN THE TERRITORY OF SAMARIA, IN PLACE OF THE ISRAELITES WHO WERE CARRIED AWAY CAPTIVE (CF. 2 KINGS XVII. 24). A CONFIRMATION OF THIS APPEARS IN THE ANNALES OF SARGON, ACCORDING TO WHICH, IN B.C. 721 HE TRANSPORTED INHABITANTS OF BABYLON TO THE LAND OF HATTI (PROPERLY HITTITES, BUT UNDER SARGON OF WIDER APPLICATION). ANOTHER INSRIPTION SPEAKS OF HIS SENDING COLONISTS FROM OTHER PLACES TO "THE LAND OF THE HOUSE OF OMRI" (SAMARIA); AND THE ANNALES ARE AUTHORITY FOR THE FURTHER STATEMENT THAT STILL OTHER COLONISTS WERE TRANSPORTED TO "THE CITY OF SAMARIA" IN B.C. 715. IT WAS IN THE YEAR 721 THAT SARGON CONQUERED FOR THE FIRST TIME MERO dach-baladan of Babylon (see the art.). 720 was a famous year for Sargon. He conquered Tarsus, etc. His principal achievements are, Conciones annuae (1541, 4 vols.), Loci communes Theologice, Von einer Dis cipin (1555), Pastorale (1559), etc.

SARCERIUS, Erasmus, b. at Annaberg, 1501; d. at Magdeburg, Nov. 28, 1559—studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg; was very active in introducing the Reformation in Nassau (1538-48); and was appointed pastor at Leipzig in 1549, and at Mag deburg in 1553. He was a very prolific writer. His principal works are, Conciones annuae (1541, 4 vols.), Loci communes Theologice, Von einer Dis
cipin (1555), Pastorale (1559), etc.

SARDIS, the magnificent capital of Lydia, stood in the rich and fertile plain watered by the Pactolus, with its acropolis built on an almost inaccessible rock, a spur of the Tmolos, and was, in the Lydian and Persian period, one of the prin cipal cities of Western Asia in military, commer cial, and industrial respects. After the conquest by Alexander the Great, it lost its prominent position, and under the Romans it began to fall into decay. During the reign of Tiberius it was almost completely destroyed by an earthquake, but was rebuilt by the aid of the emperor. Under the Mohammedan rule its ruin became complete, and it is now only a heap of débris. Jews set tied early in the city (Jos. Ant. 11., 14, 10, 24), and it was the seat of a Christian congrega tion (Rev. i. 11, iii. 1).

SARGON (Heb., סרגון, better סרגון — so Baer and Delitzsch; LXX., Ἀργός, corrupt form, cf. ἀρχαῖος, Can. Ptol.; Assy., Sar-akín, "He [a god] established the king"), a powerful Assyrian king, successor of Shalmaneser IV., and father of Sennacherib, who reigned B.C. 722-705, is men tioned only once in the Bible (Isa. xx. 1): "In the year of [the] Tartan's coming to Ashdod, when Sargon, king of Assyria, sent him, and he fought against Ashdod and took it," etc. In con	rast with this solitary and incidental notice, the Assyrian inscriptions dating from Sargon's reign are numerous, and our knowledge of his achieve ments fairly complete.

From the facts that he never calls his prede cessor his father, and yet that he, his son Sen ccherib, and his grandson Esarhaddon, all speak of royal ancestors, it is probable, that, while not in the direct line of descent, he belonged to a branch of the royal family. An ancient Baby lonian king bore the same name, so that the Assyrian Sargon is often called Sargon II. He the Tartan, or general, who commanded the army before Ashdod, and narrates this conquest in the first person. But at all events his record gives us a welcome light on the relation of the fall of Ashdod to the prophecy contained in Isa. xx. 2–6. It intimates a close connection between the Philistines and Egypt at the time of the revolt of the former. It was doubtless in dependence upon help from Egypt that the revolt had been undertaken. It is probable that Ashdod had attempted to draw Jerusalem into the conspiracy, and Isaiah's prophetic act and word were designed to show the reckless folly of any such combination in view of the overwhelming power of Assyria. The Egyptian party at Jerusalem had always been an uncompromising opponent in the prophet.

In the years 710, 709, Sargon's attention was called to Babylonia again by the hostilities of the indefatigable Merodach-baladan. The result was the second overthrow of the latter, and Sargon's assumption of the title "King of Babylon" in 709. From this year and the three years following, clay tablets are in existence bearing a double date,— "13th (14th, 15th, or 16th) year of Sargon, king of Assyria, and 1st (2d, 3d, or 4th) year (as) king of Babylon." This is very important, because the Canon of Ptolemy also gives the first year of "Αραχαξος, king of Babylon, as 709; and we therefore have one point in the Assyrian chronology fixed with absolute definiteness. Sargon's name continued to inspire terror far and wide; and we have especial record of a Cypriote embassy which waited upon him this year in Babylon, and brought him tribute. He graciously replied by the presentation of an inscribed block of stone, which has been discovered in the Island of Cyprus.

In B.C. 708 a campaign against Kummuch (Comagene) took place, and this was followed by military expeditions of less consequence. The later years of Sargon's reign, beginning even as early as 712, were largely occupied with the building of a great city, Dilr-barrukin ("Fortress of Sargon"), modern Khorsabad, about fifteen miles north-east from Mosul. The chief building in this city is his own magnificent palace, where most of the inscribed tablets have been recovered. By this splendid work he raised a monument to the enduring memory of the conqueror of Babylon.

After a reign of seventeen years he died—perhaps by violence, but we do not certainly know—in B.C. 705, and was succeeded by his son Sena'durad. His most celebrated work, however, is his History of the Council of Trent, which first appeared at Geneva, 1619, and was translated into English (1670), French, and German. It is written with pronounced opposition to the Roman system, and, if not Protestant, is at least reformatory in its fundamental principles. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice, 1677 and often, Geneva, 1857, Nantes, 1790. His life was written by BRANCHI GIOVANNI (Zurich, 1830), CORNAY (Vienna, 1858). A. CAMPBELL (Florence, 1875), and GAETANO CAPASSO, in Rivista Europea, 1879–80. Besides the works mentioned above, there is an English translation of his History of the quarrels of Pope Pius V. with the state of Venice (London, 1620), History of the Inquisition (1655), and of his History of ecclesiastical benefits and revenues (Westminster, 1777).

SARTORIUS, Ernst Wilhelm Christian, an able and learned theologian of the Lutheran Church; b. at Darmstadt, May 10, 1707; d. at Koenigsberg, June 13, 1859. He studied theology at Gottingen, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1821, and at Dorpat in 1824, and superintendent-general of the province of Prussia in 1835. His principal writings are Beitrage zur evangelischen Rediglaubigkeit (1825), Lehrte von Christi Person (1831), Die Lehre von der heiligen Liebe (1840–56), Soli deo gloria, posthumously published in 1860. He was also a steady contributor to Hengstenberg's Evangelische Kirchenlehrbuch. See F. PROCTOR and CH. WORDSWORTH: Sarum Breviary, Cambridge, 1882; PROCTOR: Hist. SATURNINUS. 2114

SATURNINUS, one of the most celebrated missionaries and martyrs of the third century; was a native of Italy, and was in 245 sent as a missionary to Gaul by Pope Fabian. He settled at Toulouse, and labored with considerable success, but was killed by an infuriate mob some time between 250 and 260. He is commemorated on Nov. 29. See that date in Act. Sancl.

SAUL, the first king of Israel, was a son of Kish the Benjamite (cf. 1 Sam. ix. 1), of Gibeah. Saul, i.e., the "desired," is described as "a choice young man, and a goodly:" and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people" (ix. 2). At the desire of the people for a king, Samuel is illuminated by the Spirit of the Lord as to whom he was to anoint. Saul, who had gone out to seek the asses of his father, is advised by his servant to consult the "seer" at Ramah as to the fate of the asses. At the gate they met the seer for the first time. It was Samuel. A divine intimation had indicated to him the approach and future destiny of the youthful Benjamite. Surprised at his language, but still obeying his call, they ascended to the high place; and in the inn, at the top, they found a company, in which Saul was especially distinguished. When Saul was about to return home, Samuel poured over Saul's head the consecrated oil, and with a kiss of salutation it was confirmed by the incidents, which, according to Samuel's prediction, awaited him (ix. 9, 10). As only Samuel and Saul knew of what had taken place among themselves, Samuel convened an assembly at Mizpeh, and lots were cast as to who was to be king. Saul was named, and by a divine intimation found hidden in the circle of baggage around the encampment (x. 17-24). His stature at once conciliated the public feeling; and the people shouted, "God save the king!" (x. 23, 24.) The murmurs of the worthless part of the community, who refused to salute him with the accustomed presents, were soon hushed by an occasion arising to justify the selection of Saul. He was on his way home, driving his herd of oxen, when tidings reached his ears of the threat issued by Nahash, king of Ammon, against Jabesh-gilead. "The Spirit of the Lord came upon Saul," and in this emergency he had recourse to the expedients of the earlier days. He sent throughout Israel as a message the bones of two of the oxen which he was driving. All the people "came out with one consent" (xi. 7) to Bezeek; and Saul, at the head of a vast multitude, totally routed the Ammonites, and obtained a higher glory by exhibiting a new instance of clemency, which those experienced who had formerly despised him. Under the direction of Samuel, Saul and the people betook themselves to Gilgal, where with solemn sacrifices the victorious leader was reinstalled in his kingdom (xii.).

At Gilgal Samuel resigned his office as judge, and went away; but the people got possession of the consecrated oil, and pronounced the first curse on his impetuous zeal (xiii. 5-14). Samuel, having announced the displeasure of Jehovah and its consequences, left him, and Saul returned to Gibeah. Meanwhile the adventurous exploit of his son brought on the crisis which ultimately drove the Philistines back to their own territory. Jonathan having assaulted a garrison of the Philistines, Saul, aided by a panic of the enemy, effected a great slaughter; but by a rash and foolish denunciation he impeded his success, and, unless prevented by the more enlightened conscience of the people, would have ended with putting Jonathan to death for an act, which, being done in total ignorance, could involve no guilt. The expulsion of the Philistines at once placed Saul in a position higher than that of any previous ruler of Israel. Saul was at the zenith of his glory. He was now able not merely to act on the defensive, but to attack the neighboring tribes of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Zobah, and finally Amaleck (xiv. 47). The war with Amaleck is twice related,—first briefly (xiv. 48), and then at length (xv. 1-9). Its chief connection with Saul's history lies in the disobedience to the prophetic command of Samuel, shown in the sparing of the king and the retention of the spoils. This rebellion against the directions of Jehovah was now visited by that final rejection of his family from succeeding him on the throne which had before been threatened (xiii. 13, 14, xv. 23). Saul, after having slain Agag, withdraws to Ramah, mourning for Saul (xv. 30). David, whom Samuel had secretly bid to join him with the privilege of the Spirit of God, which departed from Saul to make room for an evil spirit (xvi. 14). David, who was a cunning player on the harp, is brought before the king in order to divert his melancholy. David's music had such a soothing effect upon the king that he loved him greatly. When, however, after the victory which David had gained over Goliath, the people shouted, "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands," Saul's love towards David was turned into hatred,—a hatred which wished David's death under any circumstances (xix. 1). Saul would have carried out his murderous intentions, whether it was the intercession of his son Jonathan, the intimate friend of David. Indeed, Jonathan succeeded for a time in bringing about a friendly relation between his father and his friend; but this was of but a short duration. David was compelled to assume the position of an outlaw. A portion of the people were an enough to give the Philistines to rise in rebellion (xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1); and others, perhaps, might color their fear by the presence of conscience (xxiii. 12). But his sparing Saul's life twice, when he was completely in his power, must have destroyed all color of right in Saul's conduct in the minds of the people, as it also did in his own conscience (xxiv. 3–7, xxvi). At last the monarchy itself which he had raised up broke down under the weakness of its head. The Philistines re-entered the country. Saul, forsaken of God, who gave him no victories, but rather became the instrument of his own destruction and divination, although he had formerly executed the penalty of the law on all those who practised these things (xxviii. 3). He consults a woman living at Endor, who conjures up the spirit of Samuel. From Samuel he hears that his doom is sealed. In the battle which took place on Gilboa, Saul, after his three sons had been killed, perished by his own sword (xxx. 4). The body, on being found by the Philistines, was stripped and decapitated. The armor was deposited in the temple of Ashtaroth, the head was deposited in the temple of Dagon (1 Chron. x. 10). The corpse was removed from Gilboa by the men of Judah at the gratitude of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, who carried off the bodies, burned them, and buried them (1 Sam. xxxi. 13). After the lapse of several years, his ashes and those of Jonathan were removed by David to their ancestral sepulchre at Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 14). The Old Testament says nothing about the length of Saul's reign, but Acts xiii. 21 states it as forty years. Comp. SCHLIER: Die Könige in Israel (Stuttgart, 1855), p. 35; Ewald: Geschichte d. SAUMUR. A town of France, on the Loire, in the department of Maine-et-Loire, now famous for its manufactories of rosaries; was the seat of the celebrated Protestant academy founded in 1598 by the national synod of Montpellier, and suppressed by a royal edict of Jan. 8, 1685. The academy, which developed the first fertile school of criticism in modern theology, owed to a certain extent both its existence and its scientific character to Duplessis-Mornay, who was the governor of the place, and watched the young institution with great tenderness. The Scotchman Cameron became one of its first professors, and he brought with him that spirit of free and independent research which afterwards characterized the academy during the whole course of its life. Three of his disciples became professors there nearly at the same time,—Moyse Amyrault (Amyrauldus), 1633–64, Josué de la Place (Placeus), 1633–65, and Louis Cappel, 1614–58. Amyrault is the father of the system of hypothetical universalism, based upon the two propositions, that God has by an absolute and arbitrary decree excluded no one from being saved by the death of Christ, but has only made persevering and unfalling faith in the Saviour an indispensable condition of salvation. The system was denounced by Pierre de Caullery (1626). Parè, and an attack upon the divine majesty of God; but the national synods of Alençon (1637) and Charenton (1645) supported Amyrault. Placeus mainly lained that original sin consists simply in that corruption to which the offspring of Adam is heir, and that the first sin of Adam is not imputed to us. The national synod of Charenton condemned those propositions; but several provincial synods held that the national synod had acted a little hastily, and refused to carry out its decree. Of still greater importance were the researches of Louis Cappel concerning the integrity of the various documents of the Old Testament. The strict Calvinists were fully aware, that, if the results of those researches were to be accepted, the doctrine of the literal inspiration of Scripture had to be given up, and a hot contest ensued. After the death of Amyrault, Placeus, and Cappel, it was apparent that the fame of the academy of Saumur had passed its zenith: still men like Etienne Gaussen, Claude Pajon (the father of Pajonism), and Etienne de Brais, continued to throw lustre over the academy, and attract a great number of students. SAURIN, Élie, b. at Usséau, in Dauphiné, Aug. 28, 1639; d. at Utrecht, Easter-Day, 1703. He studied theology at Die, Nîmes, and Geneva, and was appointed pastor of Delft in 1665, and of Utrecht in 1670. He is best known on account of his controversy with Jurieu, which grew so hot that the synod of Leuwarden (1695) forbade both parties, though in vain, to write any more on the matter. SAURIN, Jacques, the greatest orator of the French-Reformed Church; b. at Nîmes, Jan. 8, 1677; d. at The Hague, Dec. 30, 1730. He was educated at Geneva, served four years in a regiment of volunteers in the coalition against Louis XIV. (1694–97), studied theology at Geneva, and was appointed pastor of Delft in 1665, and of Utrecht in 1703. He is best known on account of his controversy with Jurieu, which grew so hot that the synod of Leuwarden (1695) forbade both parties, though in vain, to write any more on the matter. SAUVANAROLA, Hieronymus, often called Fra Girolamo, b. at Ferrara, Sept. 21, 1492; d. at Florence, May 23, 1557. He was the victim of an ecclesiastico-political reform movement, sometimes wrongly represented as an inspired prophet, and wonder-working saint, but sometimes, also, as an ambitious demagogue and deluded fanatic. He was by his parents destined to study medicine; but a steadily deepening impression of the corruption of the world in general, and the church especially, concentrated the whole force of his character on the one point, the salvation of his soul; and in 1475, in the twenty-third year of his age, he left the parental home, and sought refuge in a Dominican monastery at Bologna. The conversion was in strict harmony with the medieval ideas of monasticism, and involved no reformatory impulse at all. He simply wanted to become a lay-brother, and do the mean work of the house; but his superiors determined that he should study theology, and in course of time he became thoroughly conversant with the Bible,—which he knew almost entirely by heart, and of which especially the Old Testament and the Revelation inspired him with passionate sympathy,—and also with the writings of Thomas Aquinas the great Dominican doctor, of St. Augustine, and others. He also began to preach, but at first without any success. Suddenly, however, at Brescia, his powerful eloquence broke forth in all its wealth; and in 1490 he was sent as lector to the Dominican monastery of San Marco in Florence.

He taught first in the cell, then in the garden of the cloister, finally in the cathedral; and immense audiences thronged to hear him expound the Revelation. “Your sins make me a prophet,” he said to them; and from the depths of that stirring, brilliant, half-pagan life which the Medici’s amusement ceased. The monasteries filled up. Two pyres were formed in the market-place. They were even lighted, when a quarrel between the Franciscans and Dominicans, whether the combatants should carry the cross or the host through the fire, caused some delay. A rain-storm, in the mean time, put out the fires; and the whole disappointment of the frenzied multitude of spectators fell upon Savonarola. From that moment he completely lost his power over the people, and even became an object of pity and contempt. Arrested by his enemies, and put to the torture, he confessed whatever he was demanded to confess; and, though he afterwards retracted, he was by the Papal commissioners condemned as a heretic, and surrendered to the civil authorities for punishment. He was burned at the stake,—erected in the form of a cross,—together with two of his most zealous adherents. The Dominican order, however, has since taken great pains to have him canonized. He left several works in Latin and Italian. The treatise on Ps. li., published by Luther in 1523. Of special interest for his own life is his Compendium Revelationum, written in 1495. His philosophical and theological work is his Trionfo della Croce, a defence of Christianity against the sceptical tendencies of the Medicean epoch, written in 1497 (English Translation, Triumph of the Cross, London, 1868). In 1882 a bust of Savonarola was placed in the Hall of the Five Hundred. It began to display the power of the state after a theocratical model was intrusted to him. He seemed to succeed. With the new constitution a new spirit awakened. Love to Christ seemed to have become the predominant impulse. Deadly foes fell upon each other's bosoms. Property illegitimately held was returned. All profane amusements ceased. The monasteries filled up. The churches were thronged. “Indeed,” says a contemporary writer, “the people of Florence seem to have become fools from mere love of Christ.”

It was the idea of Savonarola, with Florence as a basis, to push the reform farther through all Italy; but he was soon overtaken by the necessity soon to have him canonized. He left several works in Latin and Italian. The treatise on Ps. li., which he wrote during his imprisonment, was re-published by Luther in 1523. Of special interest for his own life is his Compendium Revelationum, written in 1495. SCALIGER, Joseph Justus, b. at Agen, on the Garonne, Aug. 4, 1540; d. at Leyden, Jan. 21, 1609. He studied in Paris, and was in 1592 appointed professor at Leyden. He was the most learned man of his age, understood thirteen languages, and was well versed not only in philology and history, but also in philosophy, theology, jurisprudence, mathematics, etc. Most of his writings are philological; but his Thesaurus temporum (Amsterdam, 1658), the first system of chronology ever formed, and his Expositio numismatis Constantinidi (Leyden, 1694), have considerable interest to the church historian.

SCAPEGOAT. See Atonement, Day of.

SCAPULARY (from the Latin scapula, the "shoulder-blade") means a narrow shoulder-band, of various colors, and adorned with a picture of the Virgin, or a cross, which is worn by several monastic orders and religious fraternities of the Roman-Catholic Church. As a piece of dress it has no particular purpose, but it is believed to be a preservative against death by water or fire. According to the bull Sabbatina the Virgin has personally promised Pope John XXII, that any one who wears a scapulary with her image shall be delivered from purgatory on the first Saturday after death.

SCHADE, Georg, b. at Apenrade in Sleswick, May 8, 1711; d. at Kiel in Holstein, April 10, 1795. He was practising as an advocate at Altona, Holstein, where he gave strict mathematical evidence that metaphysics was the only true theoretical, and morals the only true practical, religion. Immediately after appeared a refutation of that book by Rosenstand who wrote, professor at the university of Copenhagen; but the refutation was evidently not written by him. The second edition of the book by Rosenstand was delivered to Frederic V. of Denmark, to whose dominion Holstein at that time belonged, did not relish the joke, however, but put the author in Christiania, the Danish Bastille, from which he was not released until 1775, under Christian VII., when he was called to be an advocate at Kiel. In 1697 he published Praezip des Beichtstuhls und Abendmaals, which occasioned a rescript from the government, according to which, private confession ceased to be obligatory in the Prussian Church.

SCHAEFFER, Charles Frederick, D.D., b. Sept. 3, 1807; d. Nov. 28, 1880; an eminent theologian of the Lutheran Church, son of Frederick David Schaeffer, D.D., pastor in Philadelphia; was a graduate of Pennsylvania College, and in 1840 began his theological studies under his father and the Rev. Dr. Demme; served, 1832 to 1855, congregations at Carlisle, Hagerstown, Red Hook (N.Y.), Easton (Penn.). From 1840 to 1845 he had charge of a professorship in the theological seminary, Columbus, O.; was in 1856 called to the German professorship in Pennsylvania College, and in the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Penn., and in 1864 to the chair of dogmatic theology in the newly established theological Lutheran seminary at Philadelphia, where he conscientiously performed his duties until 1879. He was a representative of the strictly conservative tendency, adhering to the symbols of the Lutheran Church according to their original meaning. Of his solid scholarship his publications bear witness,—historical, homiletical, and doctrinal articles in the Gettysburg Evangelical Review; translation of Lechler's Commentary on the Acts, in Schaff's edition of Lange's Bible-work; translations of John Arndt's True Christianity, and of H. Kurzt's Sacred History.

SCHAL, Johann Adam, b. at Cologne, 1501; d. in China, Aug. 15, 1598. He was educated in the Collegium Germanum in Rome; entered the order of the Jesuits, and was in 1528 sent as a missionary to China, where he remained to his death. He acquired the confidence of the Chinese Government (which proved of great advantage to the mission), and translated into Chinese many mathematical treatises, interlarded with religious and Christian discussions. He also wrote Historia missionis Societatis Jesu apud Chineses, Vienna, 1665, and Ratisbon, 1672.

SCHAUFLER, William Gottlieb, D.D., LL.D., missionary and Bible-translator; b. at Stuttgart, Württemberg, Germany, Aug. 22, 1798; d. in New-York City, Friday, Jan. 26, 1838. In 1804 his father removed to Odessa, South Russia. At fifteen he was confirmed in the Lutheran Church; at twenty-two, converted. He then determined to be a missionary. But his educational advantages had been small, though diligently improved, and the way seemed hedged up. But in 1829 he met the famous missionary, Joseph Schaufler, who took him to Constantinople, there to be fitted for...
missionary labors; and from there he went to Smyrna, where Jonas King induced him to go to America. For five years he studied at Andover, became an American citizen, and then, under the care of the American Board, went to Constantinople (1851), where, with the exception of a few years spent elsewhere, he resided and labored. He was particularly interested in the conversion of the Jews, and for these services he received a pension from the board. He intended the publication of the Old Testament, in Hebrew-Spanish, at Vienna, 1839-42. But his great work was the translation of the whole Bible into Osmanli-Turkish, the language of the educated Turks. This occupied him eighteen years. In 1867 Halle gave him the degree of D.D., in express acknowledgment of this work. In 1861 his peace-making between two high dignitaries at Constantinople was acknowledged by a decoration sent him by King William of Prussia. In 1877 he was made a doctor of laws by Princeton College. He was a remarkable linguist, being familiar with some nineteen languages, and able to preach extemporaneously in six (German, Italian, French, English, Spanish, and Turkish). He published Meditations on the Last Days of Christ (Boston, 1837, several editions).

Scheffler, Johann (Angelus Silesius), b. at Breslau in 1824; d. there July 2, 1877. He studied medicine at Strassburg, Leyden (where he first became acquainted with Jacob Boehme's writings), and Padua (where he took his degree), and was in 1849 appointed body-physician to the Duke of Würtemberg; but he remained only three years at the court of Oels. In 1853 he returned to Breslau, and embraced Romanism. In 1857 he published his two most celebrated works: Cherus- binische Wandersammlung (a collection of minor poems, almost of the character of proverbs), and Geist- liche Hirtenlieder (a collection of hymns), both characterized by a peculiarly deep and sweet mysticism. His polemical writings show quite a different character. In 1861 he was ordained a priest: and from that time he spent the rest of his life in a series of violent, sometimes almost unseemly, attacks on the Reformers and the Reformed churches; which (thirty-nine treatises) were collected under the title Ecclesiologia, and published his two most celebrated works: Cherus- binische Wandersammlung (a collection of minor poems, almost of the character of proverbs), and Geist- liche Hirtenlieder (a collection of hymns), both characterized by a peculiarly deep and sweet mysticism. Of his writings the following have great interest to the church historian: Auctitakes historice eccl. (Leip., 1737-46, 4 vols.), Acta hist.-eccl. Saec. XV. et XVI. (Ulm, 1762-64, 4 vols.), De vita Camerarii (1740, etc.).

In his sixteenth year he entered the university of Tubingen to study theology, together with Hegel and the unfortunate poet Hölderlin. Lessing, Herder, and Kant were the leaders of these young students; and especially the influence of Herder is seen in Scheffler's academic dissertation, Antiquissimi de prima malorum origine philosopho- matis explicandi Gen. iii. tentamen criticum (1792), as well as in the essay on Myths, Historical Le-2119 SCHELLING.

Schelling, the highest principle of philosophy, the moral order of the world, without personality and self-consciousness,—God. And this, the absolute, he made his point of departure in his later speculations.

With the enthusiasm of youth, Schelling accepted this ethical Pantheism in the earliest period of his thinking; but very soon we see him taking his own ways.

2. Schelling's "Philosophy of Nature" and "Transcendental Idealism," 1796-1800. It is in this period that Schelling creates a new epoch in German philosophy, a new form of dogmatism with a creative knowledge, instead of the critical one of Kant-Fichte. To Schelling's rich mind, open to the impressions of nature, it could not remain concealed that nature took only a subordinate position in Fichte's system,—the position of an ethical medium of the individual. The great new thought which Schelling introduced now was this, that nature is a form of the revelation of the absolute Ego as well as intelligence. Nature is visible mind, and mind is invisible nature. The highest end of nature (i.e., to reflect herself) is manifested through all nature, but is reached only in man, where she becomes wholly objective to herself. Philosophical reasoning can therefore not end with nature: it is driven to the other pole of the absolute,—to Ego, the intelligence.

In his System of Transcendental Idealism, Schelling tries to give a history of the Ego, or the development of self-consciousness. Similar to that of nature, to come to self-consciousness, there are different stages of development in the life of the Ego, the highest of which is art. Here the harmony of the conscious and unconscious is reached, and the Ego comes to the highest intuition.

The absolute identity of subject and object, which Schelling found embodied in the works of art, begins now to be the starting-point of his thinking in—

3. The Period of the System of Identity. At the head of this system he places the notion of the absolute, and defines it as absolute reason, the total identity of subject and object. The highest law of its existence is absolute identity (A = A). Every thing that exists is this absolute itself: nothing exists outside of it; and so it is the universe itself, not the cause of it. As both subject and object are contained in the absolute, and the absolute must pos it itself as subject and object, there may be a preponderance of either the subject or of the object, although the absolute will always be contained in both of them. In this way he obtains mind on one side, nature on the other: the different gradations of mind and nature are potencies of the subject-object. It is in this period, and especially in his Lectures on Academical Study, that Schelling for the first time brings religion and Christianity into the realm of his system. Corresponding to the antithesis of real and ideal, of nature and history in the universe, there is a similar antithesis in human life. The separation of the two, but their unity, i.e., subject-object. Yet these three forms of being are not being (Sein) itself: they are only attributes of the general being, which is either the absolute Spirit without the possibility of being (actus purus), and absolute free being, which is neither of the two, but their unity, i.e., subject-object. It is in this period, and especially in his Lectures on Academical Study, that Schelling for the first time brings religion and Christianity into the realm of his system. Corresponding to the antithesis of real and ideal, of nature and history in the universe, there is a similar antithesis in human life. The separation of the two, but their unity, i.e., subject-object. Yet these three forms of being are not being (Sein) itself: they are only attributes of the general being, which is either the absolute Spirit, which has the freedom of existing outside of himself, reveals himself, according to his three potencies, in the world, the world. Only through creation, which is an act of his will, not of his nature, God comes to a full knowledge of himself.

Schelling believes that his notion of God is also the original notion of monothelism; and, based upon his theory of the three potencies in God, he develops also the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The three persons of the Trinity, who proceed from the potencies by a theogonic process, are, the Father as the creator, who gives matter to the creatures; the Son, begotten of the Father, who contributes the forms; and the Spirit, who is the completion of creation. But only at the end of creation Son and Spirit become perfect personalities, yet both are in God, so that we have only one God in three personalities.

In man, as the image of God, we have the same three potencies and a similar freedom, which may separate the harmony of the potencies. The separation of the potencies has become actual in the fall of man. In order to restore the harmony, and bring the fallen world and man back to the Father, the Son himself must become man.

But the Son can at first realize this only as a natural potency, which is done in the mythological process. After having overcome here the anti-divine principle, he can act also according to his will, as the ideal potency; and this free personal acting is revolution.

It is impossible to follow Schelling here into his elaborate construction of mythology, which is rich in deep and grand thoughts.

Revelation finally broke through mythology, as it appears even in the Old Testament, where the picture of Christ's incarnation appears. The person of Christ is the centre of Christianity. Here the second potency divests itself of the "form of God," which it had in the mythologic consciousness (Phil. ii. 6-8), and becomes man, suffers and dies, not only to bring freedom to men, but to become by obedience one with the Father (1 Cor. xiv. 28).

Schelling marries his philosophy with a glance at the history of the church. He distinguishes three great periods, and names them after the characters and names of the three apostles,—The Petrine Period, or Catholicism; The Pauline Period, or Protestantism; And The Johannine Period, or the "church of the future."

While Schelling stands, on one side, in the most intimate connection with the great poetic and philosophic movements of the last century; while especially his earlier philosophy is but a philosophic expression of that yearning to comprehend the absolute as it appears above all in Goethe's Faust; and while his system is the highest glorification of genius as celebrated by the romantic school,—we have on the other side, in Schelling's later philosophy, the greatest endeavor of modern philosophy to construct the system of Christian doctrine.

His thoughts have had great influence upon modern German theology and upon Coleidge, especially his view of the three ages of church history. His philosophy is an illustration of his own saying, "The German nation strives with its whole nature after religion, but, according to her peculiarity, after a religion which is connected with knowledge, and based upon science."

Schelwig, Samuel, b. at Polish Lisa, March 8, 1643; d. at Dantzig, March 22, 1699. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Dantzig in 1675. In the great Pietist controversy he sided with the orthodox Lutherans, and published a great number of violent polemical tracts, in which he actually treated Spener as a heretic. The most important are his "Apostelwissens-Restigung" (Danzig, 1684), Synopsis controversiarum (Danzig, 1701), De Novatianismo (1702), Manductio ad Aus. Confess (1711), and Mon. ad Form. Concord. (1712).

Schem, Alexander Jacob, b. in Wiedenbruck, Westphalia, March 16, 1826; d. at West Hoboken, N.J., May 21, 1881. He studied philology and theology at Bonn and Tübingen, 1843-46; was priest of the Roman Church, but became a Protestant and emigrated to America, 1851; did literary work, and taught ancient and modern languages; was professor of the same at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn., 1854-80; was regular contributor to Appleton's New American Cyclopaedia from 1850 to 1865; to the Annual Cyclopaedia, in the foreign and religious departments, from its first number (1861) to 1872; and to McClintock and Strong's Cyclopaedia, 1867-81; foreign editor of the Tribune (newspaper), 1864-68; editor of the Deutsch-amerikanisches Conversations-Lexicon, 1869-74, 12 vols.; assistant superintendent of public schools, New-York City, 1874 till his death; with Henry Kiddle edited a Cyclopaedia of Education, 1877, and the supplements, Year-Book of Education, 1878 and 1879. He also published the American Ecclesiastical Year-Book, 1860, and an Ecclesiastical Almanac, 1868 and 1869.

Schinner, Mathias, b. at Müllibach, in the canton of Vaud in Switzerland, in 1470; d. in Rome, Oct. 2, 1522. He was educated at Zürich and Como, and became bishop of Sitten in 1569. Employed by Pope Leo X. in Swiss politics, he was very successful in bringing about an alliance between the Pope and the Union against France, and received as a reward the cardinal's hat, in 1511. In 1514 he went as legatus a latere to England to stir up a war between Henry VII. and Francis I., and the latter acknowledged that Schinner had been one of his worst enemies, not only in the diplomatic, but also on the battle field. Zwingle's works give several striking descriptions of the great impression the cardinal made on King Henry. Schinner was one of the three most celebrated cardinals in the 16th century.
made on the soldiers. When the Reformation broke out in Switzerland, he seemed to be in perfect harmony with the movement. He offered Luther a place of refuge and support in 1619, and continued for a long time to befriend Zwingli. But his close connection with the Church of Rome, and worldly regards, at last got the better of him, and he turned against the Reformation. While with him that the Reformation should be put down by force.

In 1752 he returned to America on the 1st of August, 1749. Before the end of the year he was called to the pastorate of the Reformed Church of Philadelphia. Though he accepted the call, he continued to prosecute his special mission with extraordinary energy. From the year 1747 to the beginning of 1751 he travelled, as he informs us in his Journal, a distance of not less than eight thousand miles,—not reckoning his passage across the ocean,—and preached six hundred and thirty-five times. According to his own estimate, there were at this time thirty thousand German Reformed people in Pennsylvania, with fifty-three small churches, and only four settled pastors. Schlatter formed the congregations into a pastoral charges, and, if possible, to form a coetus, or synod.

According to his own estimate, there were at this time thirty thousand German Reformed people in Pennsylvania, with fifty-three small churches, and only four settled pastors. Schlatter formed the congregations into a pastoral charges; and on the 29th of September, 1747, the pastors and delegated elders met, at his instance, in Philadelphia, and organized the German-Reformed coetus, or synod.

In 1751 Schlatter went to Europe, at the request of the coetus, to solicit aid for the destitute German-Reformed churches of America. He was very successful, especially in Holland, where a fund was raised from which the movement. He offered much assistance. In 1752 he returned to America, accompanied by six young ministers. He brought with him seven hundred large Bibles for distribution to churches and families.

While Schlatter was in Europe, he published, in Dutch, a Journal of his missionary labors, containing a tender appeal in behalf of the Germans in America. It was translated into German, and published in Freesenii Pastoral Nachrichten, and also separately. Rev. David Thomson, English minister in Amsterdam, translated the book into English, and became the chief promoter in England of a movement for the establishment of schools among the Germans in America. A large sum of money (Muhlenberg says twenty thousand pounds sterling) was collected for this purpose, and placed in the hands of a Society for the Promotion of the Knowledge of God among the Germans. Unfortunately, in the effort to enlist sympathy, the picture of German destitution was greatly overdrawn, and the Germans were represented in a manner that could not fail to be painful to a high-spirited people. In 1755 Schlatter was induced to resign his church in Philadelphia, and to become superintendent of the proposed "charity schools." This was a mistake; for by this time the movement had to some extent become political. An attempt was made to use the "charity" as a means of breaking the tacit alliance which had hitherto subsisted between the Quakers and the Germans, and in doing the latter to support the favorite measures of the government party. Christopher Sauer, the celebrated German printer, exerted his immense influence in opposition to the "charity schools," which, he claimed, were intended to prepare the way for an established church. The Lutheran and Reformed ministers for a while supported Schlatter in his work; but at last the popular feeling of opposition became irresistible, and the undertaking proved an utter failure. The manner in which the charity was offered had caused it to be regarded as an insult. Seidensticker says, "Schlatter's failure was due to his connection with the cause after it had assumed this unfortunate complexion. If the affair had remained on the basis on which he had with honest zeal and decided success originally placed it, the history of these schools would have been very different."

On the failure of the school-movement, Schlatter, in 1757, accompanied an expedition to Nova Scotia against the French, as chaplain of the Royal American regiment, and was present at the taking of Louisburg. He subsequently lived in retirement at Chestnut Hill, near Philadelphia. During the American Revolution he was an earnest patriot, and was for some time imprisoned for refusing to resume his position of chaplain in the British army.

SCHLEIERMACHER, Friedrich Daniel Ernst, b. in Breslau, Nov. 21, 1788; d. in Berlin, Feb. 12, 1834.

1. Life. — Schleiermacher's father was chaplain of a Prussian regiment in Silesia, and belonged to the Reformed communion. To his mother, a very intelligent and pious woman (as her few letters embodied in Schleiermacher's correspondence abundantly prove), he confesses himself mainly indebted for his early training, his father being frequently absent on professional journeys. Subsequently the son followed his parent's profession, where he lived from his tenth to his fourteenth year, mostly under the instruction of his parents... and of a teacher who first inspired him with enthusiasm for classical literature. At that time he had already commenced the struggle against a "strange scepticism," which he calls a "peculiar thorn in the flesh," and which made him doubt the genuineness of all the ancient writings. In 1783 his parents sent him, his brother, and sister, to an excellent Moravian school at Niesky in Upper Lusatia. Two years afterward he entered the Moravian college at Barby. The childlike piety, the wise mixture of instruction and amusement, and the rural quietness of these institutions, made a deep and lasting impression on his mind. He ever remembered that time with gratitude, and kept up a familiar intercourse with the society through his sister Charlotte (who had become one of its regular members), and through his intimate friend and classmate, Von Albertini, of the Grisons, subsequently bishop of the fraternity, and after him the tutor of the son. Both were at last fully reconciled. The correspondence between them is highly honorable to both. With all his filial reverence and affection, the son refused to yield to mere authority, and insisted on his right of private judgment and personal investigation. The father learned to respect the manly independence and earnest mental struggles of the son. Both were at last fully reconciled. With the consent of his father, he left Barby, and entered the university of Halle in 1787. His studies were rather fragmentary. He attended the lectures of Semler, the father of German neology, and of Wolff, the celebrated Greek scholar, studied modern languages and mathematics, and read the philosophical works of Spinoza, Kant, Fichte, and Jacobi. His mind was very impressible, yet too independent to follow any one teacher or system. The age was very impressible, yet too independent to follow any one teacher or system. The age was then undergoing a revolution as radical as the political revolution of France. He left the university, after a two-years' course, without a fixed system of religious opinions, yet with the hope of "attaining, by earnest research, and patient examination of all the witnesses, to a reasonable degree of certainty, and to a knowledge of the boundaries of human science and learning." In 1790 he passed the examination for licensure, and accepted a situation as private tutor in the family of Count Dohna, where he spent three years. In 1794 he was ordained to the ministry, and became assistant to his uncle, a superannuated clergyman at Landsberg on the Warta. In 1796 he was appointed chaplain at the Charité (hospital) in Berlin, and continued in this position till 1802. During these six years he was chiefly in literary circles, and identified himself temporarily with the new romantic school of poetry as represented by Friedrich and Wilhelm Schlegel, Tieck, and Novalis. In 1799 he published his first important work, the Dis-courses on Religion. It had a stirring effect upon the rising generation of theologians (as Neander and Harns from different stand-points testified from their own experience), and marks the transition of German theology from an age of cold speculation to the restoration of positive faith. He appears here as an eloquent high priest of natural religion in the outer court of Christian revelation, to convince educated unbelievers that religion, far from being incompatible with intellectual culture, as they thought, was the deepest and the most universal element in man, different from knowledge and from practice,—a sacred feeling of relation to the Infinite, which purifies and ennobles all the faculties. Beyond this he did not go at that time. His piety was strongly tinted with the pantheism of Spinoza. His Monologues followed in 1800, a self-contemplation in the face of the world, and a description of the ethical ideal which floated before his mind, and was influenced by the subjective idealism of Fichte. In 1802 he broke loose from his aesthetic and literary connections, much to his own benefit, and removed for two years to Stolpe in Pomerania, as court-preacher. There he commenced his translation of Plato, which he had projected with Friedrich Schlegel in Berlin. The completion of this great undertaking in six volumes (1804–26) gave him a place among the best Greek scholars in Germany. His searching Criticism of all Former Systems of Moral Philosophy, which opened a new path in this science, belongs to the same period (1808). In 1804 he was elected extraordinary professor of philosophy and theology in Halle. After the temporary suspension of this university in 1806, he spent some time on the Island of Rugen, then returned to Berlin as minister of Trinity Church, and married the widow of his intimate clerical friend Willich (1809), with whom, notwithstanding the great disparity of age (he might have been her father), he lived happily to the close of his life.

He took an active part in the organization of the university of Berlin, which was founded in 1810. He was a leading theological professor, and also pastor of Trinity Church, and afterwards in this double office he continued to the close of his life, and unfolded his greatest activity to an ever-widening circle of pupils and admirers. For a quarter of a century he and his colleague and successor, Neander, were the most influential teachers of theology, and the chief attraction in the university of the literary metropolis of Germany. At the same time he felt a lively interest in public affairs. He roused from the pulpit the sense of national independence during the deepest humiliation of Prussia, and urged the people to the war of liberation against Napoleon. He advocated liberal political opinions after the Congress of Vienna (1815), and ran the risk of sharing exile with his friends De Wette and Moritz Arndt. He was no favorite with Frederic William III.; but a few years before his death he received from the king the order of the red eagle, which he never wore. He was free from all sectarian bigotry. "Christ," he said, "is the quickening centre of the church. From him comes all; to him all returns. We should, therefore, not call ourselves Lutherans, or Reformed (Calvinists), but Evangelical Christians, after his name and his holy gospel." He favored the introduction of the Presbyterian form of government. He was one of the compilers of the new Moravian hymn book (1848), which, with all its defects, opened the way for a hymnological reform. Notwithstanding this extraordinary activity, he mingled freely in society, and was the centre of a large number of friends at his fireside. Many of his witty sayings and charades, in verse and prose, were transmitted by oral tradition in Berlin, and are still remembered.

In the beginning of February, 1834, he was seized by a severe cold, which fell on his lungs, and in a few days terminated in death. In his last hours he summoned his family around his bed, and with clear consciousness and calm serenity celebrated the holy communion. He himself distributed the elements, and solemnly confessed his implicit faith in Christ his Saviour, and in the atoning efficacy of his death. It was a worthy close of his religious career, which began in the bosom of Moravian piety. It was felt throughout all Germany that a truly representative man, and one of the brightest luminaries of the age, had departed. The funeral-oration of Steffens (a Christian philosopher), Strauss (his colleague and court-chaplain), and Marheineke (a speculative theologian of the Hegelian school, and his antagonist), gave public expression to the universal esteem and respect his literary remains were intrusted to his friend and pupil, Dr. Jonas. He lost his only son, Nathanael, in his early youth; and the funeral-address which he himself delivered at the grave is one of his most remarkable and touching compositions. He bases there the hope of immortality solely on Christ as the resurrection and the life.

Schleiermacher was small of stature, and slightly deformed by a humpback; but his face was noble, earnest, sharply defined, and expressive of intelligence and kindly sympathy; his eye keen, piercing, and full of fire; his movements quick and animated. In his later years his white hair made him appear like a venerable sage of olden times, yet his mind retained its youthful vitality and freshness to the close. He had perfect command over his temper, and never lost his calm composure. His philosophy and theology were violently assailed by orthodox and rationalists; but he kept aloof from personal controversy, and secured the esteem even of those who widely differed from his views. He was the Plato and Origen of Germany in the nineteenth century.

II. His Character and Works. — Schleiermacher was a many-sided man, and a master in several departments of intellectual and moral activity. He was a public teacher and writer, a preacher, a classical philologist, a philosopher, and a theologian.

As an academic teacher he had that rare personal magnetism which drew the students at once into an irresistible current of thought, and roused all the departments of intellectual activity to the most vigorous activity. He had a great genius and scholar unfolding his ideas, and building up his system. He usually lectured two hours a day: first, on every branch of theology except the Old Testament and the Book of Revelation, and then, on every branch of philosophy in a certain order. He used brief notes, and allowed his genius to play freely under the inspiration of the lecture-room filled with attentive students. All his posthumous works are based on fragmentary notes.

As a preacher, he gathered around him in Trinity Church, every Sunday morning, intellectual audiences of students, professors, officers, and persons of the higher ranks of society. Wilhelm von Humboldt says that Schleiermacher's speaking far exceeded his power in writing, and that his strength consisted in the "deeply penetrative character of his words, which was free from art, and the persuasive effusion of feeling which moved in perfect unison with one of the rarest intellects." He never wrote his sermons, except the text, theme, and a few heads, but allowed them to be taken down by friends during delivery, and to be published after some revision by his pen.

As a theologian he ranks among the greatest of all ages. His influence is seen among writers of different schools; and will long continue, at least in Germany, as a suggestive and stimulating force. He was a unique combination of mysticism and criticism, of religious feeling and sceptical understanding. He believed in his heart that from him comes all; to him all returns. We should, therefore, not call ourselves Lutherans, or Reformed (Calvinists), but Evangelical Christians, after his name and his holy gospel. He used brief notes, and allowed his genius to play freely under the inspiration of the lecture-room filled with attentive students. All his posthumous works are based on fragmentary notes.

As a clergyman, he was the Platonist and Origenist which drew the students at once into intellectual and moral activity. He modestly declined the honor of being the founder of a school; and his best pupils, Lellmann, Julius Muller, went far beyond him in the direction of a positive evangelical creed. He was willing to decrease, that Christ might increase.

The works of Schleiermacher, including his posthumous publications, cover nearly all the departments of intellectual activity: — ethics, dialectics, psychology, politics, aesthetics, pedagogics, dogmatics, Christian ethics, hermeneutics, biblical criticism, life of Jesus (posthumous lectures, exceedingly unsatisfactory), church history (likewise posthumous, and almost worthless), and a large number of philosophical, exegetical, and critical essays, and sermons. But the books which he published himself are by far the most finished (1821, 3d ed., 1835), which stands next to Calvin's sketch of the course of theological study as an organic whole (1811), and his Christian Dogmatics (1821, 3d ed., 1835), which stands next to Calvin's Institutes as a masterpiece of theological genius. It is an original reconstruction of the evangelical system of faith on the basis of practical experience and the consciousness of absolute dependence on God: it is in matter independent of all philosophy, yet profoundly philosophical in dialectical method and conclusive reasoning. But more of this in the next section. We only add, that it is Protestant to the backbone, yet remarkably conciliatory in spirit and tone towards a positive form is, nevertheless, an inherent demand in the religious feeling of the universe. Religion is that feeling of the universe in which man discovers his own destination, that feeling of the infinite in which man discovers his own immortality, that feeling of the presence of a supreme power in which man discovers the existence of God, though he may still shrink from ascribing the forms of the human personality to that being. Religion is a part of human nature. Every one has religion, whether he knows it or not; and every one is compelled to recognize the truth of his religion, whether he will or not. So far the book is admirable. By its exposition of the true nature of religion it forces the reader out of his religious indifference. But then it undertakes an exposition of religion considered as an historical fact; for, although it admits that not every one may feel called upon to join one of the historically developed religions, development towards a positive form is, nevertheless, an inherent demand in the religious feeling. And here the question arises: Does this book really point in the direction of Christianity and the Christian church? It does, though not in the common sense of those words, nor in that in which the author later on came to use them, but when compared with the stand-point of the readers whom it addressed. When Schleiermacher wrote the preface to the third edition of the book, in 1821, he observed that there was at that moment more reason for addressing the bigoted than the indifferent.

To the Reden correspond the Monologen as their ethical complement. They are written in a more lyrical style, giving freer scope to a merely subjective pathos; and they have a somewhat lighter character, in spite of the profound researches they contain concerning human freedom.

From Schleiermacher's philosophy of religion, as developed in his Reden and Monologen, to his systematic representation of the positive doctrines of Christianity, a transition is formed by his critico-exegetical writings, and more especially by his famous little book, Kurze Darstellung des Theologischen Studiums, 1811. It was not any remarkable grasp of historical and antiquarian materials which distinguished him as an exegete: but he was a good philologist and an excellent translator; and his marvellous power of understanding, and, so to speak, reproducing the whole mental process by which a literary monument has been produced, makes his criticism in the highest degree suggestive. For the Old Testament he had very little sympathy, and its close connection with the New Testament he did not understand. But his Sendschriften an J. Chr. Gass, 1807, concerning the First Epistle to Timothy, is the first thorough-going examination of that remarkable document, and has led the exegetes to appreciate the intimate relation between the pastoral epistles, — a relation so intimate, indeed, that they must be accepted or rejected together. Of still greater importance was his Kritische Versuch über die Schriften des Lukas, 1821, though only the first volume of the work on the Gospel of Luke ever appeared. Not that Schleiermacher here really achieved what he intended, viz., to represent the Gospel of Luke as a mosaic of a great number of different, previously existing narratives; but he contributed much to concentrate the interest of biblical scholars on the questions of the origin and formation of the Gospels. More successful was his hypothesis concerning the testimony of Papias (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., iii. 39). It has been used by many, accepted by more, and hardly neglected by any.

In the Kurze Darstellung des theologischen Studiums, the theological standpoint of Schleiermacher is clearly defined. The fundamental facts of the Christian faith he accepts, not because he feels compelled by any philosophical demonstration, but simply because he finds them as facts in the consciousness of the Christian congregation. He then goes on to give an encyclopedic survey of those facts and their reciprocal relations, dividing the theological science into philosophical (apologetics-polemics), historical (exegetics-dogmatics), and practical theology. But the great merit of his work is the elaborate picture: it is a drawing executed with consummate skill, and rich in illustration and suggestion.

The ripest fruit of Schleiermacher's genius is Der christliche Glaube nach den Grundzügen der evangelischen Kirche im Zusammenkange dargestellt,

But soon internal jealousy between the princes began to weaken the actions of the league, and at Mühlberg its army was completely routed, April 24, 1547. It was Maurice of Saxony, and not the league of Schmalkald, which finally secured the reformation of the church by the treaty of Passau, July 31, 1552. See HORTLEDER: Kaiser Karl V. wider die Schmal. SCHMID, Christian Friedrich, b. at Bickelsberg in Württemberg, 1794; d. at Tübingen, March 28, 1852. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed reader there 1818, extraordinary professor in 1821, and ordinary in 1826, and given the degree of D.D. He lectured on exegesis and practical theology. He was a very modest scholar, and published very little. The two books by which he is widely known, his Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testamentes (ed. C. Weiszäcker, Stuttgart, 1838 [4th ed. by A. Heller, 1868, Eng. trans., Biblical Theology of the New Testament, Edinburgh, 1870]), and Christliche Moral (ed. by A. Heller, Stuttgart, 1861, 2d ed., 1867), were published after his death. But he exercised a great and powerful influence on the side of positive Christianity, and as a counterpoise to his colleagues, F. C. Baur; and through his pupils, especially Oehler and Dorner, he wielded it still. Schmid's work upon the biblical theology of the New Testament is distinguished by its union of the historic sense and the thoughts of organic development with the most decided faith in the absolute revelation in Christ. It will long maintain its present high position. For further information respecting Schmid, and for a list of his own publications (only essays), see the preface to his Biblical Theology.

SCHMID, Konrad, b. at Kussnach, in the canton of Zürich, 1476; was educated in the house of the Johannes in his native city, and became an inmate there, 1519, after studying theology at Basel. Soon after, he became acquainted with Zwingli. In 1522 he began to preach in German, and against the Pope. In 1525 he presided at the disputation of Zürich, and that of Bern, and throughout his life he maintained a warm active labor. Schmolke's hymns were published in small collections during his lifetime, and soon found a permanent place in German hymn-books. They are pervaded by Christian piety and fervor, and are written in a simple and dignified style. They breathe a warm, personal love to Christ, and were written without effort. (The one best known in English is Mein J esu, wie du willst, translated by Miss Jane Bothwick, "My Jesus, as thou wilt." She has also translated his fine lyric, "My God, I know that I must die." His Was Jesus that das ist weoh geestan has been rendered by Sir H. W. Baker (1861), "What our Father does is well.") Schmolke's works appeared at Tübingen, 1740-44, in 2 vols. A selection from his hymns and prayers has been published by Grote (2d ed., Leipzig, 1880), to which is prefixed a good memoir.

SCHMUCKER, Samuel Simon, D.D., an American Lutheran divine, son of Rev. J. G. Schmucker, D.D.; b. at Hagerstown, Md., Feb. 28, 1799; d. at Gettysburg, Penn., July 26, 1873. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1817, and at the Princeton theological seminary, and was admitted into the ministry by the Lutheran ministerium of Pennsylvania in 1820. He was pastor at New Market, Va., 1820-26. He took a leading part in the organization of the General Synod and of the theological seminary at Gettysburg, in 1826. He was chosen its first professor, and continued to be chairman of its faculty till 1854, when he retired from official activity. The degree of D.D. was given him in 1830, simultaneously by Rutgers College, New Jersey, and the University of Pennsylvania. In 1846 he visited Germany, in company with Dra. B. Kurtz and J. G. Morris, with the double purpose of establishing, if possible, some communication between the church there and the Lutherans in the United States, and of obtaining books for the library of the seminary.

His doctrinal teaching was marked by indifference to the distinctive features of symbolical Lutheranism, which he held to be non-fundamental, and by laying stress on the common doctrines and principles of Protestantism, which he called fundamental. He accepted substantially the Augsburg Confession, but disliked the Formula of Concord. His mind was strongly impressed with the importance of mutual recognition and cooperative union among the various Protestant denominations. He was the author of two pamphlets advocating American churches, first published in 1838, and circulated in England as well as here, he aided in preparing the way for the organization of the Evangelical Alliance, and attended its first meeting in London, 1846.
Dr. Schmucker was for many years the theological champion of Low-Church American Lutheranism, and one of the most active and influential ministers of the General Synod of his church. He was better known outside of his denomination than any other Lutheran minister. He prepared in all more than four hundred young men for the ministry, and was highly esteemed for his personal character, self-denying labors, and Christian spirit. But some of his ablest pupils forsook his theological stand-point, and adopted a stricter type of Lutheranism, which is represented in the General Council. When he entered upon public life, he found the Lutheran Church almost exclusively German, and in a comparatively stagnant condition. He helped to revive, educate, and to Anglicize it, and prepared the way for its present advanced position.

Among his numerous publications, the following are the most important: Biblical Theology of Storr and Flatt, trans. from the German, Andover, 1826, 2 vols. (reprinted in England in 1845); Elements of Popular Theology, Andover, 1834 (9th ed., Philadelphia, 1860); Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches on Christian Union, New York, 1838; Psychology, or Elements of a New System of Mental Philosophy, New York, 1842; Dissertation on Capital Punishment, Philadelphia, 1845; The American Lutheran Church historically, doctrinally, and practically delineated, Philadelphia, 1851; The Lutheran Manual on Scriptural Principles, or the Augsburg Confession illustrated and sustained by Scripture and Lutheran Theologians, Phila., 1855; The Lutheran Symbola, or Vindication of American Lutheranism, Baltimore, 1856; The Church of the Reformation, or the Union of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Baltimore, 1867; True Unity of Christ’s Church, New York, 1870.

SCHNECKENBURGER, Matthias, b. at Thalheim in Württemberg, Jan. 17, 1804; d. at Bern in Switzerland, June 13, 1848. He studied theology at Tubingen, and was appointed preacher at Herrenberg in 1831, and professor of theology at Bern in 1833. His principal work is, Über den Zweck der Apostelgeschichte, Bern, 1841; Ver gleichende Darstellung des lutherischen und refor mierter Lehrbegriffs, ed. by Güder, Stuttgart, 1855, 2 vols.; Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte, ed. by Lohlein, Frankfurt-am-M., 1862; Die Lehrbegriffe der kleineren prot. Kirchenparteien, ed. by Hundeshagen, 1863. The reason why his works appeared so long after his death was the eccentricity of his widow, who kept his papers under lock and key. His chief merit lies in his historical criticism, and comparative dogmatics or symbolics. He most ably set forth the difference between the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions. See, for further information, the full art. by Hundeshagen, in the first edition of HREZOO, xiii. 609–618.

SCHÖBERLIN, Ludwig Friedrich, b. at Kolm berg, near Ansbach, Sept. 6, 1813; d. at Göttingen, July 8, 1851. He was successively repeten (1841), priester (1842), and ordinary professor of theology in the University of Göttingen; but from 1850 to 1855 he was extraordinary professor at Heidelberg. In 1862 he was appointed Consistorialrat, and in 1875 abbot of Bursfeld. He was an orthodox Lutheran, but with a mystical tendency. His principal writings relate to liturgics; but he also produced D. Grundlehren d. Heils, entwickelt aus dem Prinzip der Liebe (1849), Die Geheimnisse des Glaubens (1872), Das Prinzip u. System der Dogmatik (1881).

SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY is often identified with medieval theology, and placed over against patristic theology. Among the primitive church. It is undeniable, that, with the close of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century, Christian theology changed character; and it is perfectly correct to designate the period from that time, and down to the Reformation, as the theology of the middle ages. But it is, nevertheless, inadmissible to use the terms "scholasticism" and "medieval theology" as synonymous; for there is a most important difference between Isidore of Seville, Beda, Alcuin, Rhabanus Maur us, Paschiasius Radbertus, and Scotus Eri gena on the one side, and Anselm, Abelard, Peter the Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and John Calvin on the other. Scholasticism forms only one period of the theology of the middle ages,—from the close of the eleventh century to the Reformation.

The teachers of the primitive church are justly called the Fathers (pairs). They produced the dogmas. Through their manifold doctrinal controversies and discussions they unfolded and developed the whole contents of the Christian faith, and by the decisions of their great ecumenical councils they formulated and fixed the dogmas. But with the close of the sixth century the theological productivity ceased. The work was done. All the materials for the formation of a doctrinal system of Christianity were present.

No essential element of Christian faith was left undefined. Then there came a time,—the attempt at building up new state organizations on the ruin of the Roman Empire, the exertions of the Germanic Barbarians to adopt and assimilate the Romano-Christian civilization,—a time of confusion and chaos,—national, social, political,—during which it was the task of the theologian to gather together the doctrinal materials acquired, to sift them, to preserve them. The theologians of that time, the second period of Christian theology, from the seventh to the eleventh century,—a Cassiodorus, an Isidore of Seville, a Beda, an Alcuin,—are not men of creative genius, but of encyclopedic knowledge, compilers, though compilers of enormous industry and deep conscientiousness.

But of course the materials could not be gathered and kept together in a merely mechanical way, without any trace of individual treatment; and towards the close of the period complaints are heard, that people put more faith in Boethius—that is, in dialectics, in philosophy—than in Holy Writ. Indeed, Scotus Eri gena is often mentioned as the father of scholasticism; though he was a philosopher rather than a theologian, and though he lacks one of the essential characteristics of scholasticism,—recognition of the tradition of the church as absolute authority. In reality scholasticism begins with the controversy between Berengar of Tours and Lanfranc; and Anselm is the first who fully represents its principles.

Scholastic theology is something more than a mere preservation, or arrangement, or application of the dogmas: it is an actual treatment. But the treatment is merely formal. New dogmas were not added. Even those which received a farther development under the hands of the schoolmen—such as the doctrine of the offices of Christ, or the doctrine of the sacraments—had been fully defined by the preceding ages, at least with regard to their fundamental outlines. So were the dogmas altered with respect to their essential contents. The problem which the schoolmen undertook to solve was simply to give each dogma a rational substructure sufficient to elevate it from a mere matter of faith to a matter of science, and to form the whole mass of dogmas into a consistent and harmonious totality, a system. They were not patres: they were only doctores et magistri. The very name "scholasticism" shows the character of the movement. The dogmas was transferred from the church to the school: the university became the hearth of theology and philosophy of Christianity; to demonstrate Christianity as rational, and the rational as Christian; to fuse faith and science, theology and philosophy, into a perfect unity. But, if so, they failed. The principles of their theology prevented them from succeeding, no less than the principles of their philosophy. Theologically the schoolmen proceeded from the supposition that the whole contents of the Christian faith, that is, each single dogma, is absolute, divine truth; and the warrant for this supposition is sought for, not in the very essence of Christianity or in the inner nature of man, but in the authority of the Church and her tradition. The fault is here not the application of the principle of authority, but the external and superficial character of the authority appealed to. Of course, an attempt is made to demonstrate and prove the absolute and divine authority of the Church. But again mere externalities are resorted to,—her miracles; and at every point this authority,rationally and philosophically so poorly established, bears the sway. Scholastic theology recognized a double rule of faith—the Scripture and the tradition. And, in fact, the schoolmen use the rules promiscuously, as, for instance, Anselm, Hugo of St. Victor, and Peter the Lombard. Others, as for instance, Abelard, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus, make a distinction between the two rules, and give Scripture the precedence, but it is only theoretically, not in their practice. And how could they have done otherwise? They had not the original text of the Old and New Testament, but only the Latin translation, the Vulgate, and in their exegesis they were again fettered by the tradition, beyond which they were not allowed to make one step. To these theological principles the philosophical principles corresponded exactly. Having established the dogma on an external authority, that of the church, and made it absolutely transcendental to human reason, the schoolmen could employ philosophy only for subordinate purposes,—the analysis of the contents of its dogmas through definitions, distinctions, and questions; to find out all the arguments pro et contra; to form by means of the syllogism a bridge from one dogma to another, and to bring them all together in a viable, schematic combination. Anselm hoped by the syllogistic method to elevate the truths of faith into true scientific knowledge. But, in accordance with its very nature, the syllogism refers only to the formal relations between two given ideas: of their inner truth and necessity it can tell us nothing.

Anselm (1038–1109) was the first who clearly set forth the principle of scholasticism, and also the first who successfully employed it. That fusion of faith and knowledge, of theology and philosophy, which was the great aim of scholasticism, he tried to accomplish in opposition, on the one side, to a faith which simply excluded reason, on the other, to a reason which forgot its own natural bounds. The former stand-point was represented by the old positive theology of the preceding age, which never dreamed of a rational demonstration of the contents of faith; the latter by Roscelin, whose notion of conception led to another direction than that indicated by the church. Among the successors or continuators of Anselm, Bernard of Clairvaux (1091–1153) leaned towards traditionalism; and Abelard (1079–1142), towards rationalism. But though Bernard considered the speculations of Abelard to be dangerous novelties, liable to bring the tradition of the church into contempt, he was himself by no means satisfied with the pure traditionalism of the old theologi positivii. He demanded a fuller and deeper assimilation of the contents of the tradition; and he found it in the mystical contemplation, which, with its ecstasy, is an anticipation of the life to come. Abelard, on the other hand, was very far from being a rationalist in the modern sense of the word. A pupil both of the nominalist Roscelin and the realist William of Champeaux, he was also an adversary of both, and tried to form his own philosophical principle, the so-called "conceptualism." But though he complained very much of people who despised the dialectico-philosophical treatment of the dogmas, because they were liable to fall into superstition and fanaticism, and though his famous book, Sic et non, seems intended to undermine the authority of tradition, the subjection of the understanding to the Church, and that both theoretically and practically. A fine and harmonious union between the mysticism of Bernard and the dialectics of Abelard was effected by the Victorines,—Hugo of St. Victor (1087–1141), and his disciple, Richard of St. Victor. The stand-point of Anselm is still retained so far as the church and the tradition are accepted as rules of faith, and the necessity is recognized of progressing from faith to reason in order to reach certainty. But Hugo of St. Victor differs from Anselm by his distinction between necessaria, probabilia, mirabilia, and inrebitia, of which he placed the first and the last group entirely without any relation to faith: while of the two middle groups, the true domain of faith, only the probabilia, that is, the truths of the so-called natural religion, can receive any affirmation from reason; the mirabilia, or alia supra rationem, are rejected. This, the first departure of scholasticism, reached its point of culmination with Peter the Lombard, the magister sententiarum (d. in 1180). He united the positive and the dialectical tendencies which he found combating each other on the theological arena, and employed dialectics as a means by which to solve such contradictions as might occur in the positive statements of the authorities. His book recommended itself by its ecclesiastical correctness and its dialectical adroitness, and it became the most used and most admired scholastic text-book ever produced. But a true reconciliation between reason and revelation, philosophy and theology, was indeed achieved by Albert the Great (1193-1280), in whose works the systematic order, so that the materials and their true source, and the Pope repeatedly forbade the study of them (1209, 1215, 1231). But the character of theology, whether a science or not, is one of the most controvertible axioms.

Down to this time, only some of the logical writings of Aristotle were known to the West in Latin translations, but none of his works on physics and metaphysics. The more intimate intercourse, however, which sprang up between the East and the West on account of the crusades, and more special intercourse was established after the establishment of a Latin empire in Constantinople in 1204, and the introduction of the Arabian philosophy to the Christian world, soon put the schoolmen in possession of the whole of Aristotle. The Arabs had not only translated and commented on all his works, but they had even developed a philosophy of their own on the basis of Aristotle and the Neo-Platonists; and, towards the end of the twelfth and in the beginning of the thirteenth century, the Christian scholars of Western Europe became acquainted with this Arabian philosophy through the Spanish Jews. At first the Aristotelian writings were looked upon with some suspicion. The heretical eccentricities of an Amalric of Bena or a David of Dinanto were referred back to them as heretical eccentricities of an Amalric of Bena or a David of Dinanto were referred back to them as Even Duns Scotus gave in the reigning realism, a friend of Thomas Aquinas, added, perhaps, nothing to the common stock of ideas; but the calm repose of his character and the sweet mysticism of his mind procured for his teaching a great influence; while the fantastic formalism of Raimundus Lullus (1235-1315) had no other effect than the formation of a small school, which soon died out. With Duns Scotus (1260-1308) the great controversy between Thomists and Scotists broke out. Thomas Aquinas belonged to the Dominican order, Duns Scotus, to the Franciscan; and more than once the whole controversy between their adherents has been described as caused by mere jealousy and rivalry between their orders. It is true that it contributed nothing to the further development of scholastic theology; but the scientific dissension between Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus is, nevertheless, fundamental and decisive. Duns Scotus dissolved that unity between faith and science, between theology and philosophy, which was the pride of scholasticism; and in its stead he placed a positivism which has only to take one step in order to reach scepticism, — a step which Duns Scotus himself can justly be said to have taken by his peculiar quodlibet method, placing the pro and the contra over against each other without any mediation, and leaving the reader to make the decision for himself.

After Duns Scotus the decay of scholasticism begins, soon to end in complete dissolution. One of the reasons was the adoption of nominalism. Even Duns Scotus gave up the reigning realism, turning it into a scholastic form of realism called formalism or Simme Aristotelis ("the ape of Aristotle"). But, though he certainly lacked critical power, he was by no means without speculative ideas; and his definition of theology as a practical science, the science of God and his works, elaborated, not for the sake of knowledge, but for the sake of salvation, exercised a lasting influence. A complete theological system, however, he did not produce; but his fundamental ideas were taken up and developed by his pupil, Thomas Aquinas (1225-74), the greatest of the schoolmen, (and recognized, indeed, by the Pope, as the greatest of all the doctors of the church). The contemplation of God, he teaches, is the highest good which can fall to the lot of man, the very acme of blessedness; but, on account of the incommensurability of the divine and the created, man can never reach that goal by his own natural reason. By reason man can only acquire an indirect knowledge of God, such as can be demonstrated from his works. In order to obtain any direct knowledge of God, man needs a supernatural aid, a revelation; and just as philosophy starts from the natural knowledge of the teacher towards knowledge of God by the light of reason, so theology starts from the revealed fact, and proceeds towards knowledge of God by the light of faith. Theology and philosophy have the same method and the same goal, only the starting-points and the spheres are different. prevalent, and was actually carried through in the system, the band snapped, and theology and philosophy separated. From that time theology reigned alone, but it ceased to be a science; it became a mere commandment. The change is painfully apparent in the writings of Occam. When he undermines the Christian dogmas from end to end by his logic, and then contemplates them to retire to the faith of the church; when from the doctrines of the church he draws logical inferences which directly run out into absurdity, or indirectly lead to self-contradictions; when he connects the most sublime ideas with sordid problems or ludicrous problems,—what is that all but frivolity? The invention of a double truth, or the axiom that something can be true in philosophy though it is false in religion, and vice versa, cannot be fastened on Occam, nor on any of the schoolmen in particular. Nevertheless, when Roman-Catholic historians and critics ascribe to it the anti-scholastic philosophers of the fifteenth century, and quote its condemnation by the Fifth Council of the Lateran (1513) as an argument, they are certainly mistaken: it was openly avowed and violently attacked already in the fourteenth century. At all events, it became the stumbling-block of scholasticism: for, however firmly and decisively repudiated, it is a simple and natural consequence of nominalism; and, after Occam, nominalism reigned uninterruptedly in scholastic theology. It was the principle of Gabriel Biel (d. 1495), generally styled the last of the schoolmen.

Scholium, The, occupies a middle position between the gloss or marginal note on a single passage and the commentary, or the full interpretation of the whole work. It may be defined as a string of notes made for the use of the school, and it occurs in that sense in the works of Cicero. As instances of scholia may be mentioned the commentaries of Nicholas of Lyra, the notes of Hugo Grotius, and more especially the Gnomon of J. A. Bengel (6th ed., Tubingen, 1835, 2 vols.).

SCHÖNHERR, Johann Heinrich, b. Nov. 30, 1750, at Memel; was the son of a Prussian sergeant; in his fifteenth year he was apprenticed with a merchant at Königsberg, but soon abandoned commerce, and, after preparatory studies, entered the university of that city as student of theology, 1792; turned from theology to metaphysics, and finding the views of Kant unpalatable, and unable to satisfy his spiritual thirst for light on the momentous themes of immortality and the destiny of man, made independent inquiries designed to harmonize nature and reason with the declarations of Holy Scripture, and published the results of his investigations in two pamphlets (Sieg der Göttlichen Offenbarung, 1795, and Der Glaube der christlichen Kirche, 1796). He was wont to unfold his views to a small circle of friends: and the attempt to suppress their meetings as inimical to the teachings of the church, and sectarian, proved unsuccessful; for the Ministerium for Cultus declared (1814) that his notions, being clearly meant to sustain the doctrines of the Bible, were ethically not only not dangerous, but beneficial. The presentation of his unsystematic system in different German universities had but little encouragement; and after six years spent as a private tutor he returned (1800) to Königsberg, and settled there, lecturing in private on his favorite themes, and died in Spittelhof, Oct. 15, 1826. He and his philosophy were soon forgotten; but, in consequence of the Religious Suit (1835–32), the whole subject came up again, and gave rise to numerous publications, of which a fuller account is given in Ebel (q.v.). The whole literature, with full particulars of the cosmogony and peculiar teaching of this theosophist, may be seen in Faith Victorious, being an Account of the Life and Labors, and of the Times, of the Venerable Dr. Johann Ebel, etc., N. Y., 1882, by the present writer. See art. by Erkkam, in the first edition of Hertz's Lexicon philosophicum, and W. A. Landerer: Scholien. See Scholastische Theologie.

Schott, Heinrich August, b. at Leipzig, Dec. 5, 1780; d. at Jenne, Dec. 29, 1835. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor there in 1805, at Wittenberg in 1809, and at Jenne in 1812. His most important work is his Theorie der Bereitsamkeit, Leipzig, 1815–28, 3 vols.

Schöttgen, Christian, b. at Wurzen, March 14, 1807; d. at Dresden, Dec. 15, 1851. He was school principal in Frankfort (1716), Stargard (1719), and of the "Kreuzschule" at Dresden (1727). He wrote De secundae Herrenmessae, Leipzig, 1711; Vom Ursprung des Gregorianischen Festes, Francfort-am-O., 1716; Hora Ebraicae und Talmudicae in universum N. Testamentum, Dresden, Leipzig, 1738, 1742, 2 vols.; Jesus der wahre Messias, Leipzig, 1748 (in great part merely a German reproduction of the preceding); Monogrammata Novi et N. T. in N. He studied theology at Halle; and, having made himself master of the Tamil language, he was sent as missionary to Tranquebar in 1750 by the Danish Missionary Society in Copenhagen. Having entered the service of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in London, in 1767, his station was in 1779 removed to Tanjore, where he remained to his death. He founded many congregations among the natives, exercised a most beneficial influence during the war of Hyder Ali, and contributed much to make the name and character of Europe respected and trusted in India.

In the following year he settled at Zweibrücken in the Palatinate, and remained for the rest of his life, active in introducing the Reformation. His Latin writings appeared at Zweibrücken, in two volumes, 1565-97; his German, also in two volumes, in 1568.

HERZOG.

SCOTCH CONFESION OF FAITH. It was drawn up by John Knox and his compatriots at the request of the Parliament, which assembled at Edinburgh in August, 1560, after the death of the queen-regent, Mary of Guise (June), and the close of the civil war. It consists of a preface and twenty-five articles on the chief doctrines of religion, which are briefly, tersely, and vigorously stated. It agrees with the other Reformed Confessions of the sixteenth century, but is more protestant than most of them. It was approved and printed, 1781.

Among the revisers were Hugh Blair (author of the well-known Rhetoric, 1788, and Sermons, 1777–1800; b. in Edinburgh, April 7, 1738; d. Dec. 27, 1800; minister of the High Church, 1758; professor in the university of Edinburgh, 1762), John Logan (b. near Edinburgh, 1748; d. in London, Dec. 28, 1788; minister at Leith, 1773; author of two volumes of Sermons, etc.), John Morrison, D.D. (b. County of Aberdeen, 1719; minister of Canisbay, Caithness, 1750; d. there June 12, 1798; translated book ii. of the Ενειδ, 1787), and William Cameron (b. 1751; studied at Aberdeen; minister of Kirknewton in Midlothian, 1785; d. Nov. 17, 1811; author of sundry poems, etc.). Each of these is believed to have written at least one paraphrase, but the precise authorship cannot be determined in every case. Some twenty were altered or rewritten from Watts, and three from Doddridge; one each was contributed by Dr. Blacklock, Dr. J. Ogilvie, and W. Randall; three are by W. Robertson (1742–51), and several by Morrison. Cameron's name appears chiefly as an improver of other men's verses. The most important share, both for quality and quantity, was drawn upon by the manuscripts of Michael Bruce (1746–67: see Appendix), intrusted, after the author's death, to Dr. Blacklock, Dr. J. Ogilvie, and W. Randall; three are by W. Robertson (1742–51), and seven by Morrison. Cameron's name appears chiefly as an improver of other men's verses. The Scottish Church is divided into two classes: the Church of Scotland, which is a national church, and the Church of England, which is a provincial church. The Church of Scotland is divided into two classes: the Church of Scotland, which is a national church, and the Church of England, which is a provincial church.
SCOTTISH PHILOSOPHY has several very marked features, determined by the bones rather than by the flesh. First, it professes to proceed by the method of induction, that is, by the observation of facts. In this respect it is like the physical sciences, and differs entirely from the ancient and medieval systems, which sought to discover truth by analysis and deduction, from the joint dogmatic and deductive method of Descartes and his school, from the critical method of Kant, and the dialectic of Hegel. Second, it observes its facts, not by the external senses, but by self-consciousness. In this respect it differs from the physical science and the modern and physiological schools of our day. It does look at the brain and nerves (Reid and Brown, and, in our day, Calderwood, looked at these), but it is merely to aid it in investigating purely mental phenomena falling under the eye of consciousness. Third, by the observations of consciousness it discovers principles working in the mind prior to and independent of our observation of them or of our experience: these it calls reason in the first degree as distinguished from reasoning, intuition, common sense (Reid), fundamental laws of thought (Stewart). This is its important characteristic, distinguishing it from Locke, and from empiricists who discover nothing higher than the generalization of a gathered experience; whereas the Scottish school discover principles above experience, and regulating experience. Mental philosophy is in a sense inductive, as it is by induction we discover fundamental laws and their mode of operation; but these laws exist prior to induction, and guide to and guarantee primitive truth.

The influential philosophy, when the Scottish school arose, was that of Locke, whose Essay on Human Understanding was published in 1690. The early Scotts are under both great obligations to Locke, and never differ from him without expressing a regret that they are obliged to do so. But, in order to keep his experiential philosophy from drifting into scepticism, they call in certain primitive principles.

Francis Hutcheson (1694-1746), an Irishman of Scotch descent, and professor of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow, is entitled to be regarded as the founder of the school. In his Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue (1725), and in An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions and Affections, with Illustrations of the Moral Sense (1728), he calls in a moral sense, after the manner of Shaftesbury, to oppose the defective ethical theory of Locke. David Hume appeared in the mean time (1711-76). As Berkeley had denied the existence of matter as a substance, so Hume denies the existence of mind as a substance, and calls it a mere thing to sensation and ideas, with relations discovered between them; that of cause and effect being merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence. (See his Treatise of Human Nature, 1739.) In An Inquiry concerning the Principles of SCOTTISH PHILOSOPHY.

Morals he represented virtue as consisting in the agreeable and useful. The Scottish metaphysicians had now to defend truth from the scepticism of their countryman.

Thomas Reid (1710-96) may be regarded as the fittest representative of the school. He was a professor, first in Aberdeen, and then in Glasgow. He published An Inquiry into the Human Mind on the Principles of Common Sense, in 1764, followed by Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, in 1785, and Essays on the Active Powers, in 1788. In these works he opposes vigorously Locke’s views as to idea, which had culminated in the idealism of Berkeley, and shows that there is in the mind a reason in the first degree, or a common sense, which gives us a foundation of truth and morality. A number of other writers appeared in Scotland about the same time, such as James Beattie (1735-1803), author of Essay on Style, he recommended the Scottish metaphysics to every college, and was employed to defend the philosophy of Reid and Stewart, who were the authority of Reid and Stewart had a wonderful influence in the last century and the beginning of this, the philosophy of Reid and Stewart had a powerful influence in France, where it was used to check the sensationalism of Condillac, and in the United States of America, where it was taught in nearly every college, and was employed to defend the great truths of natural religion, and so to supply evidence in favor of revealed religion.

Dugald Stewart (1753-1828) was the most illustrious disciple of Reid, and sought to establish what he called the fundamental laws of human belief. By his clear exposition and his elegant style he recommended the Scottish metaphysics to the English people. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, the philosophy of Reid and Stewart had a powerful influence in France, where it was used to check the sensationalism of Condillac, and in the United States of America, where it was taught in nearly every college, and was employed to defend the great truths of natural religion, and so to supply evidence in favor of revealed religion.

Thomas Brown (1778-1820) rebelled against the authority of Reid and Stewart, who were charged by him with introducing too many first principles. He was influenced to some extent by Destutt de Tracy, and the ideologists of France. He allowed to Hume that the relation of cause and effect was merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence, but argued, in opposition to Reid, that it was known intuitively. He thus kept up his relationship to the genuine Scottish school, and defended the great truths of natural religion. In his lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind, published posthumously, he discoursed brilliantly on suggestion and on the emotions. Thomas Chalmers was a devoted adherent of the philosophy of his country. He expounded with great eloquence the views of Butler as to the nature and supremacy of conscience. None of the Scottish metaphysicians opposed religion—Hume did not belong to the school; but Chalmers was the first who brought the philosophy of Scotland into harmony with the evangelical faith of the nation. He argued from the moral power in man, as Kant did, the existence of God and of man’s responsibility and immortality, and, from the nature of the moral law, the corruption of man’s nature and the need of an atonement.

Sir William Hamilton (1723-1804), the most noted philosopher of the Scottish school. As Reid was distinguished for his observation and shrewd sense, Hamilton was for his erudition and his logical power. While he belongs to the Scottish school, he sought to combine with it some of the principles of the philosophy of Kant. In Note A, a dissertation appended to Reid’s Collection of Works, he shows that common sense, by which he means our primary beliefs, has been held by all the most profound thinkers of ancient and modern times. In his Logic he sought to restore the old empiricism, but modified by the influence of Kant, to improve it, especially by insisting on the universal quantification of the predicate. In his Metaphysics he has a good classification of the faculties of the mind. Some members of the school do not approve of his doctrine of the relativity of knowledge and the negative doctrines of causation and infinity expounded in his Discourses.

The Scottish school has several excellent qualities in its relation to religion. All its members seek to unfold with care the properties and laws of the mind, and thus furnish the best antidote against materialism. They do not seek to absorb it, as do the idealism of Schelling and the dialectic of Hegel. The Scottish metaphysicians have always been somewhat suspicious of the higher speculations of certain German philosophers. Hamilton, in his Discourses, cuts down the idea of the absolute as defended by Schelling and Cousin, by showing that it involves contradictions. (For accounts and criticisms, see Discourses on the Progress of Metaphysical and Ethical Philosophy by Dugald Stewart, École Écossoise by Cousin, and especially The Scottish Philosophy Biographical, Expository, Critical, from Hutchison to Hamilton, by James McCosh.)

SCOTUS ERIGENA, John. The date and place of his birth cannot be made out with certainty, but it is probable that he was born in Ireland between 800 and 815. He came to the court of Charlemagne as a philosopher and friend of the emperor; and he made there the acquaintance of Prudentius, who left the court in 817. He came from Ireland, in one of whose flourishing cloisteral schools he had been educated; and his surname, Scotus or Scoto-gena, applied to him by his contemporaries—Pope Nicholas I., in his letter to Charles the Bald; Prudentius, in his De Precatione; the synod of Langres (859), etc.—yields no argument against his being a native of that country, as its original Latin name was Scotia Major. His other surname, first occurring in the oldest manuscripts of his translation of Dionysius Areopagita, points directly to Ireland in both of its derivations.—Iriguena, from the Greek τυχών ("born in the island of the saints"), and Irigena, from "Erin," the old native name of the country.

Similar uncertainty prevails with respect to the place, date, and circumstances of his death. Ingulf, in his Historia Abbatum Croylandensium, Prince of Durham in his De Regibus Anglorum et Danorum, William of Malmesbury, and others, tell us that he was invited to England by Alfred the Great, probably shortly after the death of Charles the Bald, about 883; that he was appointed teacher at the school of Oxford, and afterwards abbot of Malmesbury; and that he finally, probably about 891, was killed by his own pupils, and in the church. Mabillon, in Act. Sanct. Ord. S. Bened., Natalis Alexander, in his Hist. Ecc. Scire, ii. 258, and others, reject this report as fabulous; because it seems impossible to them that a man who had been condemned by a pope and a synod for holding heretical opinions should afterwards be made an abbot: but the argument is not of any great weight.

At the court of Charles the Bald he was received with great honor. He enjoyed the particular favor of the king, was made director of the palatinal school, and became intimately acquainted with all the scholars of the court,—a Hincmar, a Lupus, an Usuard, a Ratramnus, and others. He appears to have held no ecclesiastical office in France; nor is it probable that he belonged to any of the monastic orders, though he may have received priestly ordination. In France he wrote most, perhaps all, of his works. The translation of Dionysius Areopagita, which became the bridge across which Neo-Platonism penetrated into Western Europe, he undertook on the express request of the king. It gave him a great fame for learning among people in general, but it also made him suspected in the eyes of the Pope. His principal work is his De Divisione Naturae, a kind of natural philosophy or speculative theology, which, starting from the supposition of the unity of philosophy and theology, ends as a system of idealistic pantheism; philosophy having, in the course of the development, entirely absorbed theology.

It cannot be made out with certainty what part Erigena took in the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper which had broken out between the Chalcedian Theodore of Mopsuestia, and others, before his arrival in France. It is certain that the book De Ecucharistia, which for a long time was ascribed to him, belongs to Ratramnus; but it is as certain that he stood entirely on the side of the latter. From some newly discovered passages in his book (esp. i. 9, and others) and from some notices in Hincmar's De Prædestinatione (c. 31), it is evident that he considered the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper as mere symbols of the presence of Christ in the sacrament,—a view which is in perfect harmony with his whole system, in which the Lord's Supper is left almost unnoticed. The only thing doubtful is, whether he has written an independent treatise on the subject, or whether he has merely touched it incidentally in his other writings.

Clearer and more important is his participation in the controversy concerning the fundament of Gottschalk concerning predestination. When Prudentius, Ratramnus, Servatus Lupus, Remigius, and others took the side of Gottschalk, at least partially, Hincmar summoned Erigena, the celebrated dialectician, to his aid; and Erigena obeyed the summons so much the more willingly, as it gave him an opportunity of arguing, in the History of the Fundamental ideas of his system,—his idea of evil. In 851, or between the first and the second synod of Chiersy (849 and 853), he wrote his book De Prædestinatione, in which he teaches that there is only one predestination, namely, that to eternal bliss. With respect to evil and its punishment, he says there is no predestination, even not a prescience: for evil is a nihil, and has no real existence; it is only a lack, a fault in the realization of good. Of course Hincmar was rather frightened by an auxiliary of this character. Some remonstrances and refutations began to pour in. Venlio, archbishop of Sens, wrote against Erigena; also Prudentius, Florus, and others. The second synod of Chiersy (853) partially endorsed the views of Erigena; but the synod of Valence (859) absolutely condemned them, and the condemnation was confirmed by the synod of Laurenz (859) and Pope Nicholas. It is not known, however, that the audacious philosopher was subjected to any direct persecution.

SCOTUS, Marianus, b. in Ireland, 1028; d. in the monastery of St. Martin, Mayence, 1083. He left Ireland in 1052, studied in Cologne and Fulda, and was ordained a priest at Wurzburg in 1059, but was in the same year shut up in the monastery of Fulda to do penance for sins committed. In 1069 he was released, and removed to Mayence, but was again imprisoned for the same reason. He wrote a Chronicon in three books,—I. The World's History till the Birth of Christ; II. The History of Christ and the Apostles; III. The History of the Church till 1082. Edited by G. Waitz, in PENTZ: Mon. Germ., v.

SCIBES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The name "scribe," which already occurs in Jer. viii. 8, Ez. vii. 6, 11, is mentioned very often in the New Testament, either in a good, ideal sense (Matt. xvii. 6; xxiii. 34), or, what is more frequently the case, in a bad, restrictive sense (Matt. xxii. 34, etc.), and designates those scribes who at the time of Christ, having themselves lost the true knowledge of the law and the prophets, became blind leaders of the people (Luke xi. 52; Matt. xv. 14). The scribes (sopherim, or γραμματείς) were originally merely writers or copyists of the law; but eventually they became the doctors of the law, and interpreters of the scriptures. According to the Talmud, these teachers were called "sopherim," because they counted every letter, and classified every precept of the law.

The period of the scribes begins with the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. Though there were popular teachers of the law during the Babylonian captivity, as is evident from Ez. viii. 16, yet the altered state after the return required new enactments, and demanded that an authoritative body of teachers should so regulate the religious life as to adapt it to present circumstances. Hence Ezra, who reorganized the Jewish state, also organized such a body of interpreters, of which he was the chief. It is for this reason, that besides the appellation "the priest," he is also called "the scribe" (Ez. vii. 6, 11, 12). The skilled in the law, both from among the tribe of Aaron and the laity, who with Ezra and after his death thus interpreted and fixed the law, were denominated "scribes," or "scribes." In synagogues, which probably at this time were built here and there, they expounded the law, either on festival and sabbath days, or on Monday and Thursday, the market-days. The most famous teachers were not only members of the Sanhedrin, but formed also a kind of spiritual college, the so-called "Great Synagogue," the last member of which was Simeon the Just. It is characteristic of the scribes of the earlier period, that, with the exception of Ezra and Zadok ( Neh. xii. 13), and of Simeon, we have no record of their names; and Jost is probably correct in ascribing this silence to the fact that the one aim of these early scribes was to promote reverence for the law, to make it the groundwork of the people's life. They would write nothing of their own, lest less worthy words should be raised to a level with those of the oracles of God (Jud. 15. 24). They devoted themselves to the exposition and careful study of the law; and, when interpretation was needed, their teaching was orally only. As these decisions, or halachoth, could not be traced to any certain author, they were called "interpretation of the scribes," also of the elders, or sages (παρατηρήματά τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, Matt. xii. 5, xv. 3 sq.; Mark vii. 2 sq.); also παρατηρεῖται τοιούτους, Gal. i. 14). The scribes of this period probably fixed the canon of the Old Testament and the textus receptus. Thus they became the bearers of the theocratic tradition, as were the prophets in the pre-exile period, but with this difference, that the former, perhaps with the exception of Ezra and those who were with him, represented the letter, which killeth; while the latter were organs of the spirit, which maketh alive. The recorded principle of the men of the Great Synagogue is given in the treatise Abodah, i. 1: "Be cautious in judging, train many disciples, and set a fence about the law." They wished to make the law of Moses the rule of life. But, as the infinite variety of life presents cases which the law has not contemplated, expansions of the literal meaning of many decisions could not finally the "words of the scribes" were honored above the law, and it was a greater crime to offend against them than against the law. Side by side with development of the halakah, another development took place. The sacred books were not studied as a code of laws only. To search into their meaning had from the first belonged to the ideal office of the scribe. But here also the book suggested thoughts which could not logically be deduced from it; and, where the literal interpretation could not help, recourse was taken to an interpretation which was the reverse of the literal. The fruit of this effort to find what was not there appears in the Midrashim; and the process by which the meaning, moral or mystical, was elicited, was known as Ḥagadah, i.e., saying, opinion. Room being once left to speculation, mysticism and fanciful speculations, which culminated in the Cabala, developed themselves. Side by side with this, the tendency of the Halakah, we also find an ethical, popular one, as is best represented in Ecclesiasticus. The later scribes, better known as the Tanaim, or "teachers of the law," fixed and formalized the views and expositions of their predecessors, and as they accumulated they had to be compiled and classified. A new code grew out of them, a second corpus juris, the Mishina (דְּבֵרֵי עַתָּ חוֹדְוִית, Epiph., Hier., 13, 1; 15, 2). In this time, when the successive ascendency of the Persians, Egyptians, Syrians, and Romans over Palestine, greatly influenced the habits and conduct of the Jewish people, different views, which finally branched out into different parties, were advanced as to how the law could and should be kept most carefully, and how every thing foreign which was in opposition to it could be eliminated. In the Books of the Maccabees frequent allusions are made to this tendency, which was especially represented in the Chasidim ( עֲבָדִית, 1 Mac. i., 62, ii. 29, 42, vii. 12 sq.; 2 Mac. xiv. 6). To the Chasidim belonged two scribes,—Jose ben Joeser of Zereda and Jose ben-Jochanan,—both disciples of Antigonus of Soho (about 180 B.C.), himself a disciple of Simeon the Just (Πίρκε Ἀβισθῆ, 1. 1). These two are the first of the five pairs of teachers of the law, who, as propagators of the orthodox tradition, distinguished themselves in the last centuries before Christ. They were succeeded by the two contemporaries of John Hyrcanus,—Joshua ben-Persia and Naphthali ben Eliezer (about 140 and 110 B.C.), in whose doctrinal views the opposition to Sadduceism first shows itself. To them succeeded, in the time of Alexander Janneus and Alexandra, Simon ben-Shetach, a hero of Pharisaism, who twice broke the influence of the Sadducees in the Sanhedrin, and Judah ben-Tabai. In the time of the last Maccabees, and in the first years of the Idumean rule, the two great doctors of the law were the two sons of proselytes, Shemaja (Sameas, Joseph., Ant., XIV. 9, 4) and Abtalion (Pollio, Joseph., Ant., XV. 1, 10, 4), the two magnates of their day. The last pair was presented by Hillel and Shammai. The most famous scribes at the time of Christ and the apostles were, besides Nicodemus (John iii.), Simon, the son of Hillel; Gamaliel, the grandson of Hillel; Jochanan ben-Zaceai; and Jonathan, the son of Uzziel, the Chaldee paraphrast. From Mark iii. 28, we know that these scholars came in vogue till finally the "words of the scribes" were honored above the law, and it was a greater crime to offend against them than against the law. Side by side with development of the halakah, another development took place. The sacred books were not studied as a code of laws only. To search into their meaning had from the first belonged to the ideal office of the scribe. But here also the book suggested thoughts which could not logically be deduced from it; and, where the literal interpretation could not help, recourse was taken to an interpretation which was the reverse of the literal. The fruit of this effort to find what was not there appears in the Midrashim; and the process by which the meaning, moral or mystical, was elicited, was known as Ḥagadah, i.e., saying, opinion. Room being once left to speculation, mysticism and fanciful speculations, which culminated in the Cabala, developed themselves. Side by side with this, the tendency of the Halakah, we also find an ethical, popular one, as is best represented in Ecclesiasticus. The later scribes, better known as the Tanaim, or "teachers of the law," fixed and formalized the views and expositions of their predecessors, and gave the people a new spiritual country, a kingdom of heaven, which was not limited by space.
But to give them a kingdom of heaven in which Moses and the prophets were fulfilled was beyond their powers; and, because they did not enter therein themselves, they prevented the people also from entering therein (Matt. xxiii. 10). The influence of the rabbis was confounding. They were found in the court-room, in the colleges, but more especially in the synagogues. In the latter places they occupied the uppermost seats (Matt. xxiii. 6), read and explained the law. They were also not wanting in the feasts (ibid.): in short,
they were everywhere; and it was a very easy thing to influence by their own opposition the people against Jesus. For a long time they tried in vain to get hold of him (Matt. ix. 3, xii. 38, xxii. 35; Luke v. 30, vi. 25, xi. 54, xv. 2, 19 sq.); but they accomplished at last his condemnation and crucifixion (Matt. xxvi. 57, xxvii.
41). The essence and character of rabbinism were such that it necessarily came in conflict with Jesus. The scribes could not bear to hear the truth out of his mouth, and thus was fulfilled what is written in Isa. xxxix. 10-14. That there were also exceptional cases among the scribes, we see in "Zenas the lawyer" (Tit. iii. 13).

Mummium (B.C. 146). The subjugation of Greece by Alexander the Great signalized the first prostitution of art from the noble ends of patriotism and religion, to those of ostentation and personal egotism. The degrading of its inspirations seems to have gone hand in hand with its tempering decadence; and when Greece, which in the Periclean age was the mistress of the world in art and all other cultures, came under the Roman yoke, the spirit of creative genius had perished, and the great masterpieces, which in their extant relics have taught the world through all subsequent centuries, became almost forgotten monuments of the past.

In considering, then, the almost puerile achievements of art in the departments both of sculpture and painting in the early Christian age, its long antecedent decline must not be left out of the account. Irrespective of other causes, presently to be specified, the form of these ceremonialism, were literally inte reted in their relation to art, especially, it may added, with respect to sculpture. Graven images contemplating religious ends had ever been the abhorreuce of the Jewish, and were scarcely less so of the eartliest Christian Church. The substitution, then,
of materialism for the spiritual worship of the
one invisible God was the one thing which primitive Christianity dreaded; and any compromise
with this was regarded with jealousy, and any concession to its demands excited the bitterest
intolerance.

We have only to consider, in the second place,
the prostitution of contemporaneous Roman art to the materialism of its human nature— a fact in-dencing itself with the most loathsome details in the relics both of painting and sculpture in Herculanum and Pompeii — in order to find another treatise of art, especially, it may be added, with respect to sculpture. Graven images contemplating religious ends had ever been the abhorreuce of
the Jewish, and were scarcely less so of the ear-
tliest Christian Church. The substitution, then,
of materialism for the spiritual worship of the
one invisible God was the one thing which primitive Christianity dreaded; and any compromise
with this was regarded with jealousy, and any concession to its demands excited the bitterest
intolerance.

We have only to consider, in the second place,
the prostitution of contemporaneous Roman art to the materialism of its human nature— a fact in-
dencing itself with the most loathsome details in the relics both of painting and sculpture in Herculanum and Pompeii — in order to find another powerful influence in the same direction. It is not surprising, that in the welfare of the soul for the subjugation of the body, with its lusts and appetites — the primal end of life according to the teachings of Christ — the early disciples could find little or nothing in contemporary Pagan art which they could contemplate with complacency;
and it seems, in the circumstances, only strange, that, at so early a period in the history of the Christian Church, art in any form could have come to be regarded as a possible auxiliary to a pure spiritual faith and worship. Tertullian (d. A.D.
220) went so far as to declare the fine arts, more especially sculpture, to be the invention of the Devil. While this extreme judgment cannot be regarded as literally expressing the universal sentiment of the early church, it nevertheless represented a very prevalent antipathy.

The earliest decided concession is found in the memorials of the dead, sarcophagi, and sepulchral slabs and monuments, on which were carved in relief the simple emblems of Christian faith and the scenes of biblical history, many of which were intentionally employed as symbols of Christian doctrine, especially that of the resurrection of the body.

Of single extant statues representing sacred personages, Dr. Ulrici specifies but four important ones in the whole range of early Christian art down to the tenth century. These are the statue of Bishop Hippolytus, who suffered martyrdom in the first half of the third century, the total upper portion of which is a modern restorature; the famous bronze image of St. Peter, in the great Roman basilica named after him, a work probably executed in Constantinople in the fifth century; and two marble statues representing Christ as the Good Shepherd, whose date he places in the fifth or sixth century. A certain school of modern German criticism has sought to prove that the statue of the Good Shepherd was borrowed from the Mercury Criophoros (or ram-bearer), well known in the sculpture of ancient Greece.
But a careful comparison of the Pagan and the Christian conception scarcely justifies this conclusion. To mention no other considerations, it is to be remarked that the Pagan statue, so far as we are acquainted with it, was always undraped, a characteristic quite unknown in any extant Christian sculpture representing the Pastor Bonus. If some suggestion as regards form might have been derived from Pagan statues with which the early Christians were familiar, there can be no doubt that the statues of the Good Shepherd, a large number of which doubtless existed in the primitive church, were original and deliberate endeavors to give a visible paraphrase of the Twenty-third Psalm, the parable of the lost sheep, and the tenth chapter of John's Gospel.

Of the sepulchral reliefs of early Christian art which have been conserved to the present time, the most important is the famous sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (prefect of Rome, d. A.D. 359), now in the crypt of St. Peter's Church in Rome.
It was probably executed in the fourth century, and contains five subjects from the Old and New Testaments. Other specimens of kindred character are found in the Christian Museum of the Vatican, in the Campo Santo at Pisa, and in the crypt of the Cathedral of Ancona. Many ancient altar-tables are found in the churches of Italy, especially at Ravena (Cathedral, S. Apollinari in Classe, S. Vitale, S. Francesco, etc.).

A remarkable sarcophagus, though of much ruder workmanship than that of Junius Bassus, is in the Church of St. Ambrose in Milan; its principal relief representing Christ teaching, sur-rrounded by his disciples.

In the representation of the scenes of biblical history by means of sepulchral reliefs, the Roman Catacombs furnished the most numerous exam-pies. Most of these have been removed to the Lateran Museum. Both the Old and the New Testaments contributed the materials for these subterranean galleries of early Christian art; and many of the subjects, for example, those having for their subjects the histories of Noah and Jonah, are so puerile as artistic performances to border on the grotesque. But, in general, have a high and noble moral significance, and were doubtless intended to symbolize great cardinal doctrines of evangelical faith.

Only second to these in importance are the sepulchral reliefs found in the Catacombs of Naples and Syracuse.

The sculptural ornamentation of ecclesiastical furniture, sacramental shrines, crucifixes, episcopal chairs (a fine example is the chair of Archbishop Maximinian in the cathedral at Ravenna), gospels, the Chersonesus, antependia in art with altars, and the covers of prayer-books and the Sacred Scriptures, constitutes an extensive though subordinate feature in the later art of this first period of Christian sculpture, which we may extend in general limitation over ten centuries.

Some of the most precious of these treasures, containing in the aggregate great wealth in the precious metals, fell a prey to the barbarian invasions of Italy, and are lost beyond recovery. Prominent examples of this vandalism, which robbed the world of some of the most costly relics of early Christian sculpture, were the plundering of the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome by the Saracens (A.D. 846) and of the churches of Constantinople in the conquest of that city by the Latins (A.D. 1204).

What is called the Romanesque period of Christian sculpture may be said to begin with the eleventh century; and we remark in this period the most striking contrast between its magnificent architectural creations and its limited fruitage in the departments both of sculpture and painting. The beginning of this period produced neither masters nor masterpieces of great importance. In subordinate departments of sculpture we may cite the famous reliefs in Hildesheim,—the bronze door of its cathedral with its sixteen reliefs, and the pillars standing before them, containing scenes from the life of Christ. These works, and others of kindred character (e.g., the magnificent bronze candlesticks in the Magdalene Church at Hildesheim), are ascribed conjecturally to Bishop Bernard (d. 1023).

The magnificent portal of the cathedral at Freiburg in Saxony ("the golden door," so called), with its fine reliefs, taken from a former edifice on the same site, is one of the most important works of this early period. Of similar works in France, the sculptured portals of the cathedrals of Arles, Bourges, and Chartres, must be mentioned.

Italy, however, gave to the church in the thirteenth century a great sculptor, who in technical excellence caught something of the lost spirit of the antique. This was Nicola Pisano, who between 1290 and 1278 executed a series of works which may justly be regarded as foretokens of the Renaissance age. Foremost of these are the famous reliefs on the pulpit of the baptistery at Pisa, representing the Birth of Christ, the Adoration of the Three Kings, the Presentation in the Temple, the Crucifixion, and the Last Judgment. A modern German critic naively, but with some justice, observes that the figure of the Virgin in the Nativity reminds one of the Sleeping Ariadne in ancient Roman sculpture.

It need scarcely be said, that in the Gothic period, next following the Romanesque, architecture was the one interest in art with which it overshadowed all others, and that almost all the sculpture of this age was simply an accessory of architecture. In Northern Europe the earnest spirit of the Romanesque period still prevailed, though the names of no great masters have come down to us through their works.

The noble reliefs in the Strassburg Cathedral, representing the death and coronation of the Virgin, with the allegorical figures of the Christian Church, are worthy of especial mention as being ascribed to the now unknown Gielch, the reputed daughter of the architect of this magnificent Gothic temple. In Italy the spirit of Nicola Pisano, the great master of the Romanesque age, was conserved in his son Giovanni (circa 1240-1321) and his pupil Andrea Pisano (1279-1349).

The names of Giotto and Orcagna, among the sculptors of this period, must not be omitted, albeit painting was the art in which both excelled, and in connection with which their fame has been perpetuated. The high-altar at Arezzo, and the façade of the cathedral at Orvieto, may be cited as the chief works of Giovanni Pisano. On the southern door of the baptistery at Florence there is a series of panels representing the life of John the Baptist, which show Andrea Pisano to have been a worthy scholar of the great Nicola. The figure of Apollo, on the bell-tower of the Florence Cathedral, is a curiosity, from the fact of its having originated with Giotto, the father of painting in the Gothic age.

It is customary with historians to divide the golden age of art, which in general terms may be said to include the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, into the Early and the High Renaissance. For the purposes of the present article, however, we may include both of these—the quattrocento and the cinquecento—in the third great period of Christian sculpture. As applied both to literature and art, the term "renaissance" signifies the revival of the antique; and it was the grand theatre of its development. At the beginning of the fifteenth century but few of the sculptures of antiquity had been unearthed in Rome; but the good work, which was carried to full activity under Julius the Second and Leo the Tenth, and which has exercised such a mighty moulding influence on all subsequent art, even down to the present day, had already commenced; and there is manifest, even in the early masters of this wonderful age, a loyalty to nature and truth, as distinguished from tradition and conventionalism, which sets them utterly apart from the sculptors of the middle ages.

The great master of what may be called the Early Renaissance was Lorenzo Ghiberti of Florence (1378-1455), who between the years 1403 and 1427 was employed on the north bronze doors of the Florence Baptistery, whose reliefs plainly evidence some of the medieval spirit yet lingering in art. The eastern doors of the same edifice, which he completed in 1532, whose panels contain representations of biblical history, form one of the greatest masterpieces of sculpture which any age has produced. It has been, perhaps, justly criticized as intruding too much upon the province of painting in attempting perspective effects.

Other eminent masters in this period were Donatello of Florence (1386-1466), his pupil Andrea Verrocchio (1432-88), and Luca della Robbia (1400-82), whose terra-cotta reliefs, representing biblical scenes chiefly, are found in the museums and in several of the churches of Florence. Luca della Robbia wrought likewise in marble and bronze; and his famous marble frieze, representing singing and dancing children, originally executed for the organ-gallery of the Florence Cathedral, and now preserved in the Uffizi Collection, is pronounced by Burchhardt to be one of the finest works of sculpture produced in the fifteenth century.

Among the sculptors of Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century, the names of Sansovino (Baptism of Christ, in the Florence Baptistery), Lombardi, and Leonardo da Vinci, deserve mention, albeit no work of sculpture by the latter has been preserved.

It need scarcely be said that the one name which glorifies the history of Christian sculpture in the sixteenth century is Michel Angelo Buonarrotti, who was born on the 6th of March, 1475, in the vicinity of Arezzo, and died in Rome on the 17th of February, 1564. His earliest important sculptural work was the well-known Pieta, now in St. Peter's Church in Rome, which he executed at the age of twenty-five. Then followed the colossal statue of David, and lastly the statues which were designed for the magnificent mausoleum of Pope Julius the Second, a project of vast dimensions, but which was never fully carried out. After a period of forty years, with occasional interruptions, but which was never fully carried out. Besides the two figures of the Captives, now in the museum of the Louvre in Paris, the colossal Moses, in the Church of S. Pietro in Vincoli in Rome, is the one great feature of this famous sculptor, and is, without doubt, the grandest creation of modern sculpture. The Medici monuments in Florence are among the noblest works of memorial sculpture in the world. His statue of Christ, in the Church of S. Maria sopra Minerva, executed about 1527, is perhaps the least successful of all the sculptural works of this Titan of art. The sculptors contemporary with Michel Angelo, of whom Giovanni da Bologna (1524—1089) and Benvenuto Cellini (1500-70) were the most eminent, occupied themselves more with mythological than with Christian themes. Christian sculpture in Germany during the sixteenth century bears a worthy comparison with that of Italy, chiefly through the name and works of Peter Vischer (d. 1529). The great work which has immortalized him is the noble group of bronze statues and reliefs on the monument of St. Sebal'd in Nuremberg.

Adam Kraft, famous for his reliefs in Nuremberg, representing the sufferings of Christ, and Veit Stoss, the father of wood-carving in the Renaissance age, deserve mention as German masters of only secondary rank.

Various names have been employed to designate that widespread degradation of sculpture in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, from truth to mannerism and ostentation, of which Lorenzo Bernini (1598-1680) was the pioneer and the foremost representative. It is not necessary to specify these names in technical language. Let it suffice to observe, that the same thing which we often witness in the history of literature and oratory, when a numerous horde of feeble aspirants set themselves to the task of imitating a great writer or speaker with extravagant expletives, startling metaphors, and wild gesticulation, came to pass in the domain of art, particularly of sculpture, through the influence of Michel Angelo, when a whole generation of copyists, with large convent and small faculty, ordained themselves apostles of a new age of pomp and sensationalism. Chieflly through this, among other causes, we look almost in vain, either in the seventeenth or the eighteenth century, for any really great work of Christian sculpture.

The nineteenth century has witnessed, both in Italy and Northern Europe, a revival of Christian sculpture with somewhat of the spirit of its golden age; and the names of Antonio Canova (1779-1822), Bertel Thorvaldsen (1770-1844), and Christian Rauch (1777-1857), representing both extremes of the European Continent, are the glory of modern sculpture, both secular and Christian.

With this illustrious trio the name of Ernst Rieck, the designer of the great Luther Monument at Worms, deserves to be associated, as well as that of his most gifted pupil, Professor Adolf Donndorf of Stuttgart, still living, who, after the death of his master, completed some of the most important figures of the Luther memorial; e.g., Savonarola, Peter Waldo, and the Mourning Magdeburg. Professor Donndorf has executed some of the finest sepulchral monuments in Germany, and has likewise won an enviable fame in America by the beautiful bronze drinking-fountain in Union Square, New York, which he finished about two years since, to the order of Mr. D. Willis James, who presented it to the city of its adoption.

SCULTETUS, Abraham, b. at Grüneberg, Silesia, Aug. 24, 1566; d. at Emden, Oct. 24, 1624. He studied at Görlitz, Wittenberg, and Heidelberg, and was appointed court-preacher in Heidelberg in 1598, and professor of theology in 1618. Entangled in the misfortunes of the Elector Friedrich V., he lost his position after the battle on the White Mountain, 1620, but was appointed preacher at Emden in 1622. He was one of the most distinguished theologians of his time in the Reformed Church. His principal works are, Medulla theologica patrum, 1605-13, 4 vols.; a history of the Reformation, of which, however, only the two first decades (1516-36) appeared, Heidelberg, 1618-20; and De curriculo vitæ, etc., a kind of self-defence, published after his death, Emden, 1625. SEABURY, Samuel, b. in Groton, Conn., Nov. 30, 1729; d. at New London, Feb. 25, 1786. He was a graduate of Yale College before he was nineteen years of age, and soon after began the study of medicine. In 1752, though he had already devoted himself to the clerical calling, he went to Edinburgh to complete his medical studies, and there became acquainted with a remnant of the ancient Church of Scotland, which, though interdicted by the law, continued to maintain its worship in garrets and out-of-the-way nooks and corners. He was ordained deacon by Bishop
Thomas of Lincoln, ministering on behalf of the aged Sherlock of London, to whose jurisdiction the colonial missions pertained; and two days afterwards the Bishop of Carlisle (Osbaldiston) advanced him to the priesthood (Dec. 23, 1753). He was appointed missionary to New Brunswick, N.-J., and arrived there May 25, 1754. In 1757 he removed to Jamaica, L.I., influenced partly by a desire to be near his father, who was rector of St. George's, at Hempstead. But shortly after this, his father dying, he became rector of St. Peter's, Westchester. And now, the spirit of the Colonies being roused by the policy of the king's ministers and the provincial governors, the clergy of the Anglican Church were placed in a very trying situation. Seabury and most of his brethren were missionaries deriving their support from England. They had also, at their ordinations and inductions repeatedly taken the oath of allegiance to the sovereign of Great Britain. How could their obligations be slighted without perjury? There was room for honest difference of opinion, in view of the constitutional revolution of 1688 and the conditional character which was thereby imparted to this oath, in the judgment of many jurists and learned men. But Seabury's habits of thought inclined him to a different opinion; and the rebellions of 1715 and 1745 were yet fresh in the memory of all, as a practical warning. He ardently resisted, therefore, what he considered a rebellion against lawful authority; and he was not the man to adopt such views of the case with passive principle only. He was justified in his supposition that he must be true and right very vigorously by word and deed; and The Letters of a Western Farmer, which called forth the efforts of Hamilton for their refutation, are commonly ascribed to him. In consequence, he was seized by a company of armed men, on the 22d of November, at his home in Westchester, and with violence and insult was taken into Connecticut, where he remained a prisoner till after Christmas. It was impossible for him, however, to continue his ministries in Westchester; and he soon made his escape to Long Island. His church was deserted, and the learning, piety, and moderation of Seabury, imputed to his escape, and continued his sacred ministries as well as he could, though forced to maintain himself, in large measure, by his skill as a physician. The acknowledged influence of the Colonies as independent States by the king himself absolved him from his oath, and he now entered upon a new and more happy period of his life and labors. He was elected by the clergy of Connecticut to be their bishop, on the 25th of March, 1753, in anticipation of the actual peace, and sailed for England soon after the preliminaries had been signed, arriving in London on the 7th of July. The appeal of his diocese to the Archbishop of Canterbury, which had been made for his ordination to the episcopate, was unsuccessful, however, because somewhat premature in its political bearings; one of the difficulties being a natural fear on the part of the government that such a measure might be regarded as an interference with States now independent of the British crown. The archbishop could not proceed to the consecration without an act dispensing with the oath of allegiance; and this gave a civil aspect to the matter, with which the ministry was not prepared to be concerned. In this dilemma, recourse was had to the bishops in Scotland not yet relieved of their restraints by the death of the Pretender, but tolerated in view of that approaching event and in consideration of their long and patient sufferings. It was on Sunday, the 14th of November, 1754, in the chapel of Bishop Skinner's residence in Aberdeen, that Seabury received the episcopate at the hands of three "non-juring" prelates, and became the first bishop of the American succession. He always regarded it as an advantage that he was thus consecrated in a primitive and "purely ecclesiastical" manner, as he expressed it, because it assured his countrymen that his future labors had no dependence upon the crown of England, and that he held his order and office without any favor of Prince or Parliament. Before leaving Scotland he signed a Concordat with the Scottish bishops, by which he agreed to promote, so far as in him lay, those restorations of the (Eucharistic) Liturgy, which have accordingly become the characteristic feature of the American Prayer-Book as compared with that of the Church of England. It has been necessary to give with some detail so much of Seabury's history as is essential to an explanation of his position and influence in the organization of the Protestant-Episcopal Church; but, referring our readers to the lately published memoir (by Dr. Beardsley, 1881) for a full account of his life and labors, it is sufficient to add a brief outline of his episcopate. After a voyage of three months he reached his diocese June 27, 1785, and on the 2d of August following, at Middleton, was received by his clergy with due solemnity. He held his first ordination on the following day. The subsequent consecration of three bishops in England and the formation of a constitution for the church thus rendered independent and autonomous, occasioned much negotiation and correspondence, before the diocese of Connecticut became duly incorporated under this constitution, with the dioceses south of New England; and in all these agitating preliminaries there was an union of learning, piety, and character, that expressed a deep respect for his character upon all his brethren, with the exception of a few whose political prejudices had survived the conflicts of the war. The "Johannian" qualities of Bishop White were precisely such as were requisite as a complement to the "Petrine" spirit of Seabury, and to their sincere mutual regard and wise co-operation was largely due the good understanding that soon followed. The episcopate of Bishop Seabury was cordially recognized, and he united with his three brother-bishops of the Anglican line in consecrating the first bishop of Maryland (Dr. Craggett); and consequently no bishop has ever been consecrated in this church without deriving his commission in part through the Scottish line of ecclesiastical ancestry. The bishop's life and labors in Connecticut have left a deep mark on the religious history of the State, and not less deeply has his influence been felt in the entire community in which he was born, and in the organization and doctor. Two volumes of his sermons have been collected and published, and others have appeared in a fragmentary shape; but valuable manuscripts remain as yet unedited. They evince
The writer of this brief notice was active in promoting the final deposit of Bishop Seabury's remains, in 1849, under the new and substantial church in New London, where they now rest; and on that occasion he had the solemn office, in connection with Bishop Williams, now the successor of Seabury, of laying his venerable relics in the place of their ultimate repose. A physician who attended to identify these relics when discontinued remarked on the massive proportions of the skull; and the well-worn mitre preserved in Trinity College, Hartford, corresponds with these proportions so remarkably as to furnish in itself a striking evidence of the fidelity of the half-length portrait of the bishop, from the pencil of Duché, which adorns the library of that college, and from which many popular engravings have been derived.

Seagrove, Robert, an earnest evangelical minister and co-worker with Whitefield; was b. Nov. 22, 1693, at Twyford in Leicestershire, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. Having mainly endeavored to bring the Church of England to his position, he left her, or at least worked outside her pale. Besides sundry sermons and pamphlets, he published in 1742 fifty hymns, which were reprinted by D. Sedgwick, 1800. The best of them is, "Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings." He was living as late as 1759.

Seaman, Lazarus, D.D., a learned English divine; b. at Leicester; d. in 1775. He was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge. In the civil war he took the Parliamentary side, and in reward of his services was appointed master of Peter House, Cambridge, a member of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and rector of Alhallows, London, from which living he was ejected in 1662. He was noted for his knowledge of church polity and controversial divinity. Besides sermons, he published A vindication of the church polity and controversial divinity. Besides sermons and pamphlets, he published in 1742 fifty hymns, which were reprinted by D. Sedgwick, 1800. The best of them is, "Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings." Seaman, Missions to. Rev. John Flavel (England, 1627-91) and English contemporaries (Ryther, Janeway, et al.) as also a few clergymen of the established and dissenting churches in England in the eighteenth century, preached occasional sermons, special and serial, some of which were printed, on behalf of seamen; but the second half of the eighteenth century witnessed the first united efforts for their evangelization. An association, styled at first The Bible Society, was organized in London in 1780, to supply English troops in Hyde Park with the Holy Scriptures, whose field of labor was speedily enlarged to embrace seamen in the British navy. The first ship furnished with Bibles by this society was "The Royal George," sunk off Spithead, Eng., Aug. 29, 1782. The society's name was soon changed, becoming The Naval and Military Bible Society. It is still in operation, confines itself to its original specific object, the diffusion of the word of God, and has been of immense service to the army and navy of Great Britain. This society had its influence in originating the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the work of the latter led eventually to the formation of the American Bible Society. (Cf. art. "Bible Societies," Encyc. Brit., 9th ed. vol. iii. p. 649.)

The need for Christian exertion among sailors was urgent. Destitute, as a class, of any access to the Bible, to preaching, or to any service, instruction, or consolations of the church, their lives passed, for the most part, without access to the gospel of Christ. "It would be difficult," says a well-informed writer, "to conceive of a deeper moral need than that which for centuries had settled upon the British navy." Early efforts made in England to furnish sailors with the gospel, however, met with serious opposition from Christian people, as well as from unchristian officers in the royal navy. So late as 1828 the king was petitioned to abrogate an order, then recently issued by the lord high admiral, prohibiting the free circulation of tracts in the navy. But in 1814 the pioneers of the movement for this end, Rev. George Charles Smith, a dissenting clergyman, once a sailor, and Zebulon Rogers, a shoemaker of the Methodist persuasion, established prayer-meetings for seamen on the Thames, at London; the first being held on the brig "Friendship," June 22 of that year, by Mr. Rogers. These were multiplied and sustained upon the shipping in the river. March 23, 1817, the first bethel flag was unfurled on the "Zephyr," Capt. Hindulph of South Shields, Eng. The Friends of London Society was organized March 18, 1818, to provide for the continuous preaching of the gospel to seamen in London, upon a floating chapel (ship) of three hundred tons burden, and Rev. Mr. Smith ministered upon it with success during the ensuing year. Nov. 12, 1819, The Bethel Union Society was formed at London, which, in addition to religious meetings held on the Thames, established correspondence with local societies that had been started by Mr. Smith's exertions in various parts of the kingdom. These two societies were subsequently united to form what is now known as The British and Foreign Sailors' Society. The Sailor's Magazine (London) merged, after publication for seven years by Rev. Mr. Smith, into the New Sailor's Magazine, also issued by him, was established in 1826. The monthly magazine now issued by The British and Foreign Sailors' Society is Chart and Compass (pp. 32), established in January, 1879. It has presented the facts, and discussed questions connected with the evangelization of seamen, with fervency and force. Up to April, 1883, Chart and Compass had circulated 128,000 copies.

In 1825 The London Mariner's Church and Rivermen's Bethel Union was organized to provide a church for seamen on shore. Mr. Smith became pastor of this church, which had been organized by Rev. Mr. Smith, as the centre of an extensive system of labor, including a sabbath school, bethel prayer-meetings, tract and book distribution, magazine publishing, and... open-air preaching to seamen on the wharves. Rev. Mr. Smith died at Penzance, Cornwall, Eng., in January, 1863.

Existing seamen's missionary societies in the empire of Great Britain, distinct from local organizations which limit the prosecution of work to their own ports, are, (1) The British and Foreign Seamen's Society (St. Saviour's Shadwell, London, E.), with receipts from April 1, 1851, to April 1, 1882, of £10,123 18s. 8d., and expenditures for the same period of £9,510 3s. 7d., which in its sixty-fifth annual report (1882-83) names the ports of Rotterdam, Hamburg, Antwerp, Genoa, Naples, and Malta, outside England, and London, Milford-Haven, Falmouth, and Barrow-in-Furness (English), as occupied more or less effectively by persons having entire or partial support from its treasury, and devoting themselves to the spiritual and temporal welfare of seamen. (2) The London Missions to Seamen (Established English Church), whose operations are, for the most part, carried on aloft. Its chaplain is in each station, at twenty English and three foreign, its Scripture-readers at twenty-nine English and four foreign seaports. Local English societies for seamen are at Liverpool (formed in 1821), Glasgow, and other ports.

Evangelical Lutheran missions to seamen are prosecuted with vigor by societies with headquarters in the Scandinavian countries, whence come, in our day, the larger number of sailors for the world's mercantile marine. The Norwegian society — Foreningen til Evangeliets Forkynelse for Skandinaviske Sjøfolk i fremmede Harme, or, in English, The Society for the Gospel's Preaching to Scandinavian Seamen in Foreign Harbors — was organized at Bergen, Norway, Aug. 31, 1864, and now (1883) has stations at Leith, Scotland; North Shields, London, Cardiff, Eng.; at Antwerp, Belgium; Havre, France; Amsterdam, Holland; New York, U.S.A.; Quebec, Can.; and at Pensacola, Fla., U.S.A.

Mission-work for seamen is also carried on by this society at Montrose, Scotland. Its aggregate working force consists of eleven ordained pastors, with five or six assistant missionaries, unordained. The society owns churches at all its stations, and publishes a monthly paper, Bud og Hilsen, now in its eighteenth year of issue. Receipts in 1881-82 were 103,855 kroner; expenditures, 58,297 kroner. The Danish seamen's mission society — Dansk Forening til Evangeliets Forkynelse for Skandinaviske Sjøfolk i fremmede Harme, or, in English, The Danish Society for the Gospel's Preaching to Scandinavian Seamen in Foreign Ports — has its stations at Hull and Grimsby, London, Newcastle, and Hartlepool (Eng.), and at New York City, U.S.A., with an aggregate of four ordained pastors. Three other ordained pastors performed some labor for sailors at Frederickstadt and Christianstadt (St. Croix, W.L.), and at St. Thomas and St. Jan, W.I. The same society supports a seamen's pastor at Madras, India; and at Bridgewater, England, an ordained pastor gives a portion of his time to the interests of Scandinavian sailors. Its bi-monthly paper is Havnen, published at Copenhagen, Denmark. Receipts in 1882, 22,034 kroner; expenditures, 10,421 kroner.

The Swedish society for home and foreign missions — Förtemandsstiftelsen — has sustained missionary work for seamen since 1869, and has the following stations where such labor is performed by its agents, — Constantinople, Turkey; Alexandria, Egypt; Liverpool, Grimsby, and Gloucester, Eng.; Boston, Mass., U.S.A.; Marseilles, France; St. Ubes, Portugal; St. John, New Brunswick, New England, and now (1883) has churches at all its stations, and five or six assistantmissionaries, unordained. The State Church in Sweden has three ordained pastors laboring for seamen, at London and Hartlepool (Eng.), and at Kiel in Prussia. The Finland seamen's mission society, Foreningen for Bereflagande af Sjöelands i Uitlandska Hamnar, organized in 1890, has a station at London, Eng., with one ordained pastor in charge, and is about to establish another at Grimsby and Hull, Eng. The Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Augustana Synod in America has a station for Scandinavian seamen, with one ordained pastor, at Philadelphia, Penn., U.S.A. The synod for the Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Church in America has a mission in Australia, with one ordained pastor. The total of stations occupied by the Scandinavian (Lutheran) societies is thirty-three, with twenty-nine ordained pastors and six unordained pastors as laborers.

No organizations exist in North or South America, outside the United States, for the sole purpose of prosecuting religious labor among seamen. At Boston, Mass., the first society for this object was formed in May, 1812, but soon suspended operations. The first religious meeting on behalf of sailors in New-York City (N.Y.) is believed to have been held in the summer of 1816, at the corner of Front Street and Old Slip. The Marine Bible Society of New-York City was organized March 14, 1817, to furnish sailors with the Holy Scriptures. The Society for promoting the Gospel among Seamen in the Port of New York, commonly known as The New-York Port Society, a local organization, was formed June 5, 1818. This society laid the foundations of the first mariner's church ever erected, in Roosevelt Street, near the East River, which was dedicated June 4, 1820, Rev. Ward Stafford preacher and pastor. In 1823 The New-York Port Society set at work in that city the first missionary to seamen, Rev. Henry Chase. This society now sustains a church at Madison and Catharine Streets in New York, and a reading-room for sailors in the same edifice, employing in the year ending Dec. 31, 1882, nine missionaries. Receipts for 1882 were $11,607.04; expenditures, $10,682.07. The New-York Bethel Union, for the establishment and maintenance of religious meetings on vessels in the port (organized June 3, 1821), had but a brief existence.

The movements noted — that at Boston, Mass., issuing in the formation of the earliest society of its kind in the world — led to similar action for the performance of local work for seamen at Charleston, S.C. (1819), At the same time (1819), Portland, Me., and New Orleans, La. (1823), at New Bedford, Mass. (1825), and elsewhere. In the latter year there were in the United States seventy bethel unions, thirty-three marine Bible societies, fifteen churches and floating chapels for seamen. There has been a notable work among sailors, and their evangelization was recognized as among the most prominent and important of Christian enterprises.

Accordingly, after its formal establishment in the city of New York (Jan. 11, 1828), succeeded by a new organization in its board of trustees (May 5, 1828, from which time its birth is dated). The American Seamen's Friend Society (80 Wall Street, New York, N.Y.), unquestionably the most widely operative and efficient of existing missionary societies for seamen, came into being. Its first President was Hon. Smith Thompson, then secretary of the United-States navy; Rev. C. P. McIlvaine, afterwards Protestant-Episcopal bishop of Ohio, was its Corresponding Secretary; and Rev. Joshua Leavitt its General Agent. Article II. of its constitution provides:

"The object of this society shall be to improve the social and moral condition of seamen by using the efforts of the wise and good in their behalf, by promoting in every port boarding-houses of good character, savings-banks, register-offices, libraries, museums, reading-rooms, and schools, and also the ministration of the gospel, and other religious blessings."

Its first foreign chaplain was Rev. David Abel, who reached his field of labor at Whampoa, the anchorage for ships trading at Canton, China, Feb. 16, 1830. In its fortieth year (1867—68) its laborers (chaplains and sailor missionaries) were stationed at twenty foreign, and thirteen domestic, seaports, as follows: at Caribou Island on the Labrador coast, N.A.; at St. John, N.B.; in Norway, at Christiansand, Kragero, and Fosgrunn; in Denmark, at Copenhagen and Odense; in Sweden, at Gottenberg, Wernersberg, and Stockholm; in Belgium, at Antwerp; in France, at Havre and Marseilles; in the Hawaiian Islands, at Honolulu and Hilo; at the Chincha Islands in Peru, at Valparaiso, and at Buenos Ayres, S.A.; and in the United States, at the following seaports: San Francisco, Cal., Norfolk and Richmond, Va., Charleston, S.C., Mobile, Ala., Boston and Gloucester, Mass., and at New York, N.Y. Its missionary work was prosecuted in 1882—83 on the Labrador coast of North America, in the countries of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, at Hamburg in Germany, at Antwerp, at the Scheldt, in France, in Franche-Comte, and at Havre, at Genoa and Naples in Italy, at Yokohama in Japan, in the Sandwich and Madeira Islands, at Valparaiso, S.A., and, in the United States, at Portland, Ore., and on the waters of Puget Sound; also in the ports of Galveston, Tex., New Orleans, La., Pensacola, Fla., Savannah, Ga., Charleston, S.C., Wilmington, N.C., Norfolk, Va., and at Boston, Mass., as well as in the cities and vicinities of New York, Jersey City (N.J.), and Brooklyn (N.Y.), including the United-States Navy-Yard, numbering forty-two laborers at thirty-one seaports (eighteen foreign and thirteen domestic) supported in whole or in part by the society.

Its receipts in the first decade of its existence were, in round numbers, $91,000; in the second decade, $165,000; in the third, $229,000; in the fourth, $375,000; in the fifth, $655,000. Receipts for the year ending March 31, 1883, with small balance from previous year, $86,762.65; expenditures for same, $70,455.55 inclusive of an investment of a legacy for permanent fund.

The Church Missionary Society for Seamen in the City of New York (Protestant-Episcopal), in its Thirty-Ninth Annual Report (1882-83), states that the society sustains, as heretofore, two chapels, three mission-houses, with reading and lecture rooms, oversight being in the hands of three clergy, with the assistance of a colportor at each station. Its total services for the year were 628: visits to reading-rooms, 5,622; seamen supplied with Bibles, 204, with Testaments, 613, with the Book of Common Prayer, 621. The bishop of the diocese is its president.

Besides the employment of chaplains, resident at seaports, and serving as Christian ministers, of Bible and tract distributors, Scripture-readers, colportors, and helpers, whose titles declare their functions, the missionary societies for seamen have usually wrought for their welfare by establishing, and in part sustaining (temporarily), Sailors' Homes in various ports. In them are resident missionaries, who, besides their services in religious meetings, devote portions of their time to spiritual and charitable visitation among sailors on shipboard and shore, at sailor boarding-houses, and in hospitals, and, in some cases, to such service for the families of seamen. The Wells Street Sailors' Home at London (Eng.) Docks was established by Mr. George Greene in 1830, was opened in 1835, enlarged in 1865. In one year it admitted 5,444 boarders, who, besides a home, had evening instruction, the use of a savings-bank, etc. The Liverpool (Eng.) Sailors' Homes were opened in 1844. The Sailors' Home at 190 Cherry Street, New York, is the property and is under the direction, of the American Seamen's Friend Society. It was opened in 1842, reconstructed, refurnished, and re-opened in 1880, and is now unsurpassed by any sailors' home in the world. During the year 1882—83 it accommodated 2,963 boarders. The whole number of boarders since the Home was established is 102,713, and the amount saved by it to seamen and their relatives during the forty-one years since its establishment has been more than $1,500,000.

The systematic supply of carefully selected libraries, to be loaned to vessels for use at sea, by their officers and crews, is now largely carried on by these organizations, especially by the American Seamen's Friend Society. Its ships of such libraries from 1858—59 to March 31, 1883, were 7,704, and the re-shipments of the same, 8,100; the total shipments aggregating 15,864. The number of volumes was 419,420, accessible by original shipment to 301,425 seamen. Of the whole number sent out, 943 libraries with 33,948 volumes were placed upon United States naval vessels and in naval hospitals, and have been accessible to 107,995 men: 106 libraries were in 106 stations of the United States Life-Saving Service, containing 3,816 volumes, accessible to 742 keepers and surfmen.

The Sailors' Magazine (32 pp., monthly), organ of the American Seamen's Friend Society, is now the oldest of the periodicals issued on behalf of seamen. It was established in September, 1828, in its fifty-fifth volume; and of its issues for 1882—83, 81,000 copies were printed and distributed. Of the whole number sent out, 12,000 copies of The Seamen's Friend (4 pp., annually), established in 1858, were issued by this society, for sailors; and 145,000 copies of the Life-Boat (4 pp., monthly) for the use of sabbath schools.

SEBALDUS.

Varied help is habitually extended to shipwrecked and destitute sailors by all these organizations. The establishment of savings-banks for seamen has ordinarily been due to their influence. The Seamen's Savings Bank in New York City (73 Wall Street) went into operation May 11, 1825. Sailors' asylum, orphanages, and "Rest" (houses of entertainment conducted upon temperance principles) are open in many seaports as the fruit of their existence. Miss Agnes Weston, from her "Rest" at Devonport, Eng., was distributing gratis, by voluntary contribution, in 1832, 15,000 monthly Blue Books (8 pp. temperature and religious tracts) in the English tongue; and these were regularly translated into Dutch and German for the navies of Holland and Germany.

It is impracticable to present detailed statistics as to results of Christian labor for seamen: the best general estimate fixes the number of Christianized sailors at not far from thirty thousand. But to say that during the last half-century these men have been gathered into the church of Christ by thousands, that as a class sailors are now manifestly being lifted out of the ignorance and degradation in which they lived at the opening of the nineteenth century, and to attribute these changes, realized and still progressing, to the exertions of these societies, is to speak with truthful moderation. The corporate and individual efforts of persons connected with them have often originated and made effective beneficent public legislation, in the interest of sailors, in Great Britain and in the United States. It is in place to add, that, with few exceptions, all seamen's missionary societies are administered upon a non-denominational basis.

SEARS, Edmund Hamilton, D. D., b. at Sandisfield, Berkshire County, Mass., 1810; d. at Weston, 1865-76. Though connected with the Unitarian body, he held Swedenborgian opinions, and often professed his belief in the absolute divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. He was converted at the age of thirteen, joining the Baptist Church. Of independent spirit, he entered at fifteen on self-support, and at sixteen began teaching school. He was graduated from Brown University in 1825, and from Newton Theological Seminary in 1828. For a short time he was pastor of the First Baptist Church of Hartford, Con. In 1829 he became professor of ancient languages in Hamilton (N.Y.) Literary and Theological Institution, now Madison University; and in this position he showed enthusiasm, learning, and power. He also served as pastor of the Baptist Church in Hamilton. In 1833 he went to Europe; spending two years in study in Halle, Leipzig, and Berlin, under Neander, Tholuck, and other great teachers of that period. He stands connected with an important chapter in Baptist history: for in 1834, in the Elbe at Hamburg, he baptized the Rev. J. G. Oncken and six others, forming the first German Baptist Church in communion with the Baptists of England and America. To avoid arrest and imprisonment, the baptism was by night; and from this beginning, through many and severe persecutions, the German-Baptist communion has increased, till it numbers more than a hundred and twenty churches with upwards of twenty-five thousand members. He returned to Hamilton in 1835, but in 1836 became professor of theology in Newton Theological Seminary, where he remained twelve years, but for the last nine years president of the institution. His teaching was broad, comprehensive, scriptural, incisive, suggestive, and apposite. For several years he was the editor of the Christian Review. Deeply interested in general education, he was appointed by Gov. Briggs a member of the Massachusetts Board of Education; and on the resignation of Horace Mann, in 1848, he was made secretary of the board, resigning his position at Newton. In this new service he continued seven years, his energy and enthusiasm, with his dignity, tact, and genial manner, giving him power and popularity with teachers and citizens. In 1856 he succeeded Dr. Wayland in the presidency of Brown University, which position he held for twelve years. In 1867 he was made general agent of the Peabody Educational Fund; and having removed his residence to Staunton, Va., he remained till his death in the successful discharge of the important duties of this position. He was revered and admired by his pupils, honored by his associates, and held in highest regard by all who in any way came into acquaintance with him. He received the degree of D. D. from Harvard in 1841, and that of LL. D. from Yale in 1862.

In addition to many review articles, reports, addresses, etc., he published a Life of Luther (1850), an edition of Roget's Thesaurus (1854), with several translations, compilations, etc. NORMAN POX.

SEARS, Barnas, distinguished as an educator; b. at Palmyra, N. Y., July 6, 1800; d. at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., July 6, 1880. He was born in the Elbe at Hamburg, baptized the Rev. Mr. Krebs, and was a charter member of the Baptist Church in Hamburg. In 1816 he came to America and settled in Nürnberg, where the St. Sebaldis Church still preserves his memory. The city has chosen him as its patron, and celebrates his memory Aug. 19. On account of the miracles performed by him alive and by his relics, he was canonized by Martin V., 1425.

SEBASTIAN, a Catholic saint, and protecting patron against the plague; was b. in the third century, in Narbonne, and educated at Milan. Eager to render help to the persecuted Christians under Diocletian, he entered the ranks of the army as a secret Christian, and was appointed by Diocletian to a high position. When it became known that he was a Christian, he was condemned to death, and pierced with many arrows. Left for dead, a Christian, Irene, who was about to bury him, found him alive. He got well, but was again condemned, and flogged to death. A church was built to his memory at Rome, and was followed by the discontinuance of the plague. His day in the Roman calendar is Jan. 20; in the Greek, Dec. 18. His remains, Talamont, and others lay particular emphasis on the Acta S. Sebastiani.

He was educated at the court of Gotha; studied law and philosophy at Strassburg, and held high positions in the service, first, of Duke Ernst of Gotha, then of Maurice of Saxony, and finally of the elector of Brandenburg. His Compendium historicecclesiasticum (Gotha, 1860–64, 2 vols.) was translated into German, and often reprinted. His principal work, however, is his De Lultheranismo (Leipzig, 1868), written against Maimbourg’s Histoire du Lutheranesme.

SEDE VACANS, a term of canon law,—properly speaking applicable only to the papal or to an episcopal see, because sedes (θησει) originally was used only in connection with the predicate apostolica, though its use has gradually been extended to abbots and other high dignities of church,—denotes the interval between the decease or deposition on translation or resignation of the occupant to the full legal instalment of his successor. During such an interval the administration of an episcopal diocese was originally confided to the presbytery, afterwards to an intercessor, interventor, or visitator, and finally to the cathedral chapter. If the vacancy is not absolute, but only partial, as, for instance, on account of the sickness of the occupant, the term sedes interdicta (hindered) is applied, and a coadjutor is appointed.

SECULARIZATION means the conversion of an ecclesiastical institution and its property into a secular institution with a secular purpose, or the transformation of a State organization with an ecclesiastical head into a State organization with a secular head, or the legal absolution from ecclesiastical vows. Secularizations of the first kind have occurred from time to time,—in the last days of the reign of the Merovingian dynasty in France, under Henry II. in Germany, during the Reformation in various countries, etc.,—though always under the protest of the Church. The first instance of a secularization of the second kind was probably the transference of the Duchy of Prussia from the possession of the Knights of the Teutonic Order to the dominion of a prince of the German Empire (1525). But on a still greater scale secularization of this kind was carried on during the Napoleonic wars, especially by the Peace of Campo Formio (1797) and that of Luneville (1801). The word was first used by the French delegates during the negotiations preceding the Peace of Westphalia (1648). Secularization of the third kind is a Papal prerogative.

SEDGWICK. Obadiah, English Presbyterian; b. in parish of St. Peter, Marlborough, Wiltshire, 1800; d. at Marlborough, January, 1857. He was graduated at Magdalene Hall, Oxford; entered holy orders; was chaplain to Sir Horatio Vere, baron of Tilbury; returned to Oxford, where in 1829 he became "reader of the sentances." Soon after, he began to preach at St. Mildred's, Breadstread of mods and until 1655, with the exception of two years (1639-41) when he was at Coggeshall, Essex, he preached in London,—in Breadstreet until 1648, and afterwards at St. Paul's, Covent Garden. His ministry was popular and fruitful. He zealously defended the Presbyterian cause. He was one of the licensers of the press, and a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. In 1853 he was appointed by Parliament one of the "tryers" (examumes of the qualifications of ministers), and in 1854 assistant to the commissioners of London for the ejection of "scandalous ministers and schoolmasters. He was succeeded in his parish by his son-in-law, Thomas Manton. Besides numerous printed sermons (enumerated by Wood), he was the author of The doubting Christian resolved, London, 1653; The humbled sinner resolved what he should do to be saved, 1686; The Shepherd of Israel, 1658 (an exposition of the Twenty-third Psalm); Synopsis of Christianity: Anatomy of secret sins, 1690; The bowels of tender mercy sealed in the everlasting covenant, 1681; A short catechism. SEDULIUS SCOTUS, Cajus Ceolus, or Caelius, a Christian poet and priest of the fifth century; lived during the reign of Theodoreus II. and Valentinian III. Of his life nothing is known with certainty; but his Carmen paschale, written in hexameters, was printed in 1473, and again in 1499 and 1502. There are also later editions by Galland, 1773, and Arevalo, 1794.

SEEING GOD. It belongs to the deepest endeavors of all religions to make sure of the nearness of the Deity: hence those places are especially sacred where he is said to reveal himself, and the persons are holy who are found worthy of that nearness, or have that higher faculty to bring others in a near relationship to the Deity. The highest degree of that desire is to see the Deity in essential reality. In the Bible also we find such a desire expressed, which is one of the most deeply rooted instincts of the religious man. This instinct is satisfied (even the sensual part of man may partake of it), but the mode of seeing changes itself in the same degree as the manner in which God appears. In this respect we find, especially in the Old Testament, the prevalence of popular views. Thus the main idea is this, that the common man (i.e., one whom no special holiness protects) must die when he sees God. This fear shows itself at first in the fiery appearances in heaven. Lot's wife dies, because she curiously sees the fiery judgment of Jehovah (Gen. xix. 28). Gideon and Manoah expect death, because they have seen the angel of the Lord in the fire (Judg. vi. 23, xiii. 22). For the same reason the people removed from Mount Sinai when they saw God in the cloud, smoke, and lightning (Exod. xx. 18, 19; Deut. xviii. 16). The explanation of that incapacity which makes it impossible for man to behold God when he appears in his peculiar glory, lies in the fact of man's frail strength: he is flesh (Deut. v. 26). But the deeper knowledge of the divine will overcomes this hindrance. God will give blessing and grace. His appearances become by degrees the sign of this heavenly grace. The transition is made in the examples of Gideon, Manoah, and Hagar; since that God who promises blessing and salvation cannot let the guiltless die. Yes, it is one of the strongest proofs of the grace of God in the theocratic covenant, that Jehovah himself leads his people in the pillar of fire and smoke: it is a clear proof of Israel's religious superiority above other nations, that he saw God in his peculiar glory, without dying (Deut. iv. 33, v. 24), or, as it is so emphatically expressed by Moses, "The Lord talked with you face to face" (Deut. v. 4). But the behavior of the people caused a limitation in the seeing of God. The stranger, or unclean, who approached the holy place, must die, as well as the Israelite who entered the sanctuary. Only God's elected, like those seventy elders who saw God (Exod. xix. 9, 10), may see God. But the circle becomes smaller still: only the patriarch Israel has seen God face to face (Gen. xxiv. 30); only Moses, the mediator and man of God, speaks with Jehovah as a man speaketh unto his friend (Exod. xxxiii. 11). And, because none else has experienced such fulness of grace, Moses is also the highest prophet. Whereas others see God in visions and dreams, he sees God from face to face, and sees the similitude of the Lord (Num. xii. 8). For God must have some kind of similitude, otherwise he could not be seen with the eye,—a similitude different from the manner in which he appears in the storm and fire. This representation is popular (1 Kings xxi. 19 sq.); but it excludes every corporeity, and in its unreflected form it is rather the concrete expression, in part of the reality, in part of the personality, of God, and forms the necessary basis for the possibility of that seeing. But already in the history of Moses we meet with a peculiar narrative (Exod. xxxii. 12-xxxvi. 7) which opposes that view which has thus far been advanced. In the first instance we are told that no man shall live who sees God (Exod. xxxiii. 20): in the second instance we are told that God's face cannot be seen at all (Exod. xxxiii. 20, 23). Instead of this, Moses bears an explanation concerning his goodness and his name, his volition full of mere and grace. With this, the visible seeing of God is made impossible. And thus we find it in the psalms and prophets; and the seeing of God is nothing else than the experience of his helpful presence, which takes the habitation of Jehovah, the temple, for its starting-point (Ps. xlii. 3). Hence, also, the hope of Job (xix. 26), "I shall see God," i.e., I will experience him. This fact belongs to the other life, but in this life: thus, also, Hezekiah (Isa. xxxviii. 11). The highest fulfilment of all religious wishes involves Ps. xi. 7: "His countenance doth behold the upright." Especially interesting and much disputed is the passage Ps. xvii. 15: "I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." Here, as in Num. xii. 8, the similitude of God appears as the object of the seeing of God, but only in so far as the subject crying out of the image makes it necessary, because it concerns here the real communion with the highest source of blessing. The awakening has no reference to the sleep of death, but is the symbol of the grace of God, which is new every morning. Among the prophets the seeing of God is already so much divested of its externality, that in a free manner it is used to express prophetic vision. In Ps. xviii. the theophany is the mediation for the singer's salvation; but in Isa. vi., Ezek. i. 26, Dan. vii. 9, it connects itself with the illumination of the prophet and his call. The image of the sovereign occupies the foreground; but in Isaiah and Ezekiel it is surrounded by the original appearances of the theophany in cloud, smoke, fire, etc. In Isaiah we also perceive the old fear of death because of the presence of Jehovah: he acknowledges he is a "man of unclean lips, and dwelling in the midst of a people of unclean lips." Human unworthiness is here reduced, not to the fact that man is flesh, but to the idea of uncleanliness, which, however, by that addition, receives another signification. The lips mediate the word which comes out of the heart: hence it refers to the sins of the heart and to sins committed by the touch. In the presence of Jehovah, sitting on his throne, so long intolerable to men, until holy fire has purged him.

By combining this idea with Ps. xi. 7 we approach the word of Christ, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," (Matt. v. 8): with this the hope of the fulfillment of the highest religious desire, the deepest knowledge of God with the richest enjoyment of grace and blessedness, is given to them, only these goods receive a fuller and more particular meaning in the kingdom of Christ. With this corresponds what John regarded as the highest Christian goal: "For we shall see him as he is." (1 John iii. 2), for only like perceivers like (1 Cor. ii. 11). Therefore, also, 1 John iv. 20 makes the real seeing of God impossible: it is a seeing mediated through love; the seeing refers to the Son whom God hath sent. In him we see the Father (John xiv. 9), because in him grace and glory have been personified (John i. 18). Yes, the Son himself is on the Father's bosom; he alone has seen the Father (John vi. 46); what the Father does, he does also; the Father himself shows him the works which he should do. But that seeing of God in the old sense is not predicated even of the only-begotten Son, since the entire sphere of this conception is taken up into the higher spiritual realm. With this also correspond the familiar expressions concerning the invisibility of God (1 Tim. vi. 16; Rom. i. 20).

dred yards wide. It is now entirely deserted, but its ruins amply attest its former grandeur. It is situated halfway between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akaba, in a deep cleft of the Mount Seir range, near the foot of Mount Hor. It is approached through a narrow defile on the east, a mile and a half long, called the Sik ("cleft ") of Wadi Mussa, because the Arabs believe it was made by Moses' rod when he brought the stream touch the sides on either hand. Once the way

"Selah" by "forever." Modern scholars are much divided. Gesenius interprets it as denoting a pause in the song while the music of the Levites ground, or a pause to reflect. (See and Leipzig, 1662, 1680. In 1618 appeared the History of Tithes, which denied the divine right of the system, and called forth the wrath of the king, so that the author was obliged to revoke his positions. Selden sustained an intimate relation with the political movements for thirty years. In 1621 he was called by the House of Commons to give his opinion concerning the dispute between it and the Crown, and strongly advised the Commons to insist on its rights. In consequence of this advice he was imprisoned by the king. In 1624 he represented Lancaster in Parliament; 1625, Great Bedwin; and, after that, Lancaster in several Parliaments. He was active in the popular cause, signed the remonstrance for the removal of the Duke of Buckingham, and was a prominent supporter of the Petition of Right. In 1629 he was committed to the Tower, from which he was released in 1631 on bail, and in 1634 without surety. He succeeded in allaying the king's anger by his Mare clausum (1636); and ever after that he seemed to have refused to enter heartily into any measures against royalty, and voted against the majority which condemned the Earl of Stafford. In 1640 he represented the university of Oxford in the Long Parliament. In 1643 he was chosen one of the members of the Westminster Assembly, and the following year subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant, and was made master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. His funeral sermon was at his request preached by his old friend, Archbishop Ussher.

Selden was a man of immense learning and a prolific author. A tablet at Oxford calls him the corypheus in antiquarian studies (antiquarium coryphas). Two of his greatest works were written during the years of his imprisonment (1629-34).—De jure naturali et Gentium justa disciplinam Hebraeorum, in seven books, and De successione in Pontificatuum Hebraeorum. His last work was De synedriis et prefecturis iuridicis veterum Hebraeorum, in three books. Among Selden's other works were Duces, or Single Combat (1610), Titles of Honor (1614), an elaborate account of king, duke, and other titles. His Table-Talk, which was published thirty-five years after his death, by Milward, who professes to have been his amanuensis, is perhaps the best known of Selden's works outside of theological circles. The statement in Selden's will may be taken to indicate his faith. "With all humility of heart," he says, "and with true repentance of my manifold sins and offences, I commend my soul and fold sins and offences, I commend my soul and expect and hope for eternal bliss and happiness in the world to come." Lord Clarendon says, "Selden was of so stupendous learning in all kinds and in all languages (as may appear in his excellent and transcendent writings), that a man would have thought he had been entirely conversant among the books, and could have been bred out of reading and writing; yet his humanity, courtesy, and affability were such that he would have been thought to have been bred in courts. In his conversation he was the most clear discoursor, and had the best faculty of making hard things easy, and presenting them to the understanding of any man that hath been known." His motto was, "Liberty concerning all things" (ελευθερία πάνω ἐπὶ όλα).

A splendid edition of Selden's complete works, furnished with elaborate indexes, was issued by David Wilkins, London, 1726, 3 vols. (the first two containing the Latin writings, the third, the English). For the biography of Selden, see the Life (in Latin) prefixed to this edition; and John Ainin, D.D.: The Lives of John Selden, Esq., and Archbishop Ussher, 2 vols. (1792). In consequence of this advice he was imprisoned by the king. In 1624 he represented Lancaster in Parliament; 1625, Great Bedwin; and, after that, Lancaster in several Parliaments. He was active in the popular cause, signed the remonstrance for the removal of the Duke of Buckingham, and was a prominent supporter of the Petition of Right. In 1629 he was committed to the Tower, from which he was released in 1631 on bail, and in 1634 without surety. He succeeded in allaying the king's anger by his Mare clausum (1636); and ever after that he seemed to have refused to enter heartily into any measures against royalty, and voted against the majority which condemned the Earl of Stafford. In 1640 he represented the university of Oxford in the Long Parliament. In 1643 he was chosen one of the members of the Westminster Assembly, and the following year subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant, and was made master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. SEMINARIES. 2151

SEMINARIES, Theological, Continental, are divided into four classes: (1) The Roman-Catholic, according to the plan of the Council of Trent, in which boys of twelve years are received, trained in theological and secular studies apart from all vows, and, on the completion of their studies, they are ordained priests; (2) The evangelical seminaries in the kingdom of Württemberg, which receive boys of fourteen years, train them until they are eighteen, then send them to the university of Tübingen for further theological study, whereas they issue as assistant pastors; (3) Institutions which receive the candidates for the ministry after they have finished their theological studies at the universities, and train them in practical ministerial duties; (4) Institutions which give training in homiletics and catechetics.

I. Before the Council of Trent, the institutions of the first class were called “schools,” or “colleges.” The discipline was monastic. The principal was an abbot, or, in the case of schools directly under episcopal control, a “scholasticus,” who was always a clergyman. The rise of the universities destroyed these schools; but the Jesuits restored them, and after Trent they were called “seminaries.” Instruction is given in grammar, singing, the ecclesiastical calendar, the Scriptures, service-books, the homilies of the saints, the ceremonies of the sacraments, and other matters relating to the services. Mass must be daily heard, and confession and communion be monthly. Every bishop must have such a school attached to his cathedral or metropolitan church.

II. The first seminary in the Protestant sense was in the Kingdom of Württemberg. It was modelled upon the cloister idea. Next to these comes Loccum, in Hanover. In 1593 the entire cloister there went over to Protestantism, but retained its organization intact, except that it undertook the special work of educating ministers. In 1820 it was revived and enlarged. Its head is still called “abbot.” In 1817 Frederick William III. of Prussia founded a seminary in Wittenberg, to honor the Luther city, which had been deprived of its university. The Reformed seminary at Herborn replaced the old “Orange and Nassau high-school.” In 1837 the seminary at Friedberg was founded. The Moravians have seminaries in Gnadendal and Nazareth (Pennsylvania, U.S.A.).

III. In Greece the future priests are instructed by deacons or other clergy, under the supervision of the bishops. In Russia most priests are the sons of priests: if the sons of a layman enter the service of the church, they generally become monks. The schools for the education of priests’ sons are of three grades,—schools, seminaries, academies. In the lowest, the scholars enter at seven, and remain until twelve years old. In the latter years of their stay they are taught Latin and Greek; so that, even if they do not go to a seminary, they can serve as reader or chorister in village churches. There may be several such schools in a parish, but there can be only one seminary. The latter is under immediate episcopal direction. The principal is a monk, archimandrite, or aspirant to a bishopric. The professors are partly monks, and partly laymen. Their number is great, for there are sometimes as many as fifty in one seminary: but the number of scholars is also great, since every priest has the right to send his sons thither; and, as there are not enough churches for the priests thus educated, many of the scholars go into other callings.

within the time of the Fathers, and which tries to follow a middle course between Augustine and Pelagius. In the West the powerful personality of Augustine, the vigorous proceedings of the African Church, the assent of the see of Rome, and the effective aid of imperial rescript, procured the victory for the views of Augustine; but in the East the Greek Church continued its course, unconcerned by what took place in the West, even after the condemnation of the Nestorians, and implicitly also of the Pelagians, by the synod of Ephesus. Soon, however, it became apparent, that, even in the West, there were many people who took offence at the rigorism of Augustine, and still more who believed that they were following him, though they had really no idea of the consequences which his doctrine involved.

The discrepancy became patent before Augustine died. His two pupils and friends, Prosper of Aquitaine, and Hilary, informed him by letters (Aug. Ep. 225 and 226) that the monks of Massilia accused him of having, in his controversy with Pelagius, set forth propositions which contradicted the doctrines of the Fathers and the church in general. In the letters the Massilian monks are described as holding, that by faith and baptism any one can be saved, if he only will; that the will to be saved is implanted in human nature by the Creator himself; that predestination must presuppose a difference of human nature, or lead to fatalism, etc. It is evident that those monks simply wanted to find a middle way between the Augustinian doctrine of predestination and the Pelagian doctrine of the free will of man. At their head stood John Cassianus, a pupil of Chrysostom, and for some time an inmate of an Egyptian desert monastery, whose writings, glowing with monkish fervor, show marks of influence from the Greek theology. The report of Hilary and Hilare called forth the two treatises of Augustine, De predestinatione sanctorum and De dono perseverantiae; but they did not succeed in convincing the Massilian monks. Shortly after (430), Augustine died, and Prosper found himself the chief opponent of the Semi-Pelagian movement. He repaired to Rome, and induced Pope Sixtus to address a letter to the Pope (Mansi: Coll. Concil., iv. p. 454). The letter is unconditional in its defence of Augustine, and full of reproaches against those bishops of Gaul who introduced novelties, and put forward indiscriminate and useless questions. But it is strikingly silent about the real point at issue. Nor did Sixtus, the successor of Celestine, find it suitable to be more explicit on the matter. Meanwhile Prosper wrote his various books against the Semi-Pelagians (see the respective articles), and others came to his aid. The De vocazione gentium, generally, though hardly on sufficient grounds, ascribed to Leo the Great, and found among his works, is an attempt at reconciliation. The expressions are very much mitigated; but, as nothing of the principle has been given up, it exercised no influence. On the contrary, the Augustinian doctrine of predestination now began to be attacked, even with great harshness, by people who did not belong to Semi-Pelagian sects, though never condemned by the church as a sect, were marked out by the Semi-Pelagians as predestinarii. Interesting in this respect is the Prædestinatus sive predestinatarum heresis, first edited by Sirmond, Paris, 1643, and by him ascribed to the younger Arnobius. It consists of three books: the first contains a catalogue of heresies ending with that of the predestinarii, the second, a representation of that heresy; and the third, its refutation from a Semi-Pelagian point of view.

For some time the controversy seems to have been brought to rest, or to have been forgotten, on account of the great political disturbances under which Gaul suffered during the fifth century. In the latter half of the century, however, it once more comes to the foreground with Faustus, bishop of Reji (Riez), and the presbyter Lucidus. The latter was a passionate adherent of the doctrine of predestination, and, as friendly expositions led to nothing, Faustus publicly attacked him, and invited him to a disputation in the presence of the assembled bishops. The disputation took place, probably in the year 495; Faustus publicly attacked him, and invited him to a disputation in the presence of the assembled bishops. The disputation took place, probably in the year 495, and was the first attempt at reconciliation. The expressions of Faustus, bishop of Reji (Riez), and the presbyter Lucidus, were received with great applause; so that the whole of Gaul seemed to have been conquered by Semi-Pelagianism. In the beginning of the sixth century, however, a sudden change took place in the state of affairs. Those Scythian monks, who, during the reign of Justin I. and Justinian, preached theopaschitism in Constantinople, were naturally opponents of Pelagius. Having tried in vain to introduce themselves to Pope Hormisdas, they sent a confession of faith to the African bishops who lived in exile in Sardinia. It is found in Bibl. Max. Patri., Lyons, ix., and ends up with a condemnation, not only of Pelagius, but also of Faustus. Fulgentius of Ruspe, the most prominent of the African bishops, responded with his De incarnatione et gratia, in which he completely rejected Semi-Pelagianism, though without mentioning the name of Faustus. The case attracted the attention of the emperor Justinian, and he asked Hormisdas to pronounce his opinion on it. The answer of the Pope (520) is very diplomatic (Mansi: Coll. Conc., viii.). It defends Augustine, it defends Faustus, it defends every thing; but clearly the bishop of Constantinople is led by Johannes Maxentius, the leader of the monks, in his Responsor ad epistolam Hormidae (Bibl. Max. Patr., Lyons, ix.), who demonstrated, that, if Augustine is right, Faustus must be wrong. The tide was now turning. Even in Gaul, Semi-Pelagianism found influential adversaries; an Avitus of Vienne, a Cassarius of Arles, and the synod of Orange (Arausio), actually condemned it (Mansi: Con. Coll., viii.). The decrees of the synod of Orange were afterwards confirmed, by Pope Boniface II. and the synod of Valence, and officially Semi-Pelagianism was denounced. This must not be understood, however, as if it had been really extinguished. By the decrees of the synod of Orange, the expressions of Augustine were accepted; but how far people were from really embracing his principles is shown by the controversies of Gottschalk, of the schoolmen and the monastics, of the reformers, of Arminius, of the Jesuits and the Jansenists, etc.

Lit. — The sources are found in the writings of Cassianus, Prosper of Aquitaine, Faustus of Reji, Fulgentius of Ruspe, and others.
SEMITIC LANGUAGES.

For modern treatment of the subject, see literature to art. Pelagianism, and J. G. Feekes: Hist. Semitic., Gottingen, 1836.

SEMITIC LANGUAGES. I. NAME.—Up to the latter part of the last century, before Sanskrit was known to Europe, or attention had been directed to the Central and Eastern Asiatic tongues, or those of Africa (except Coptic), the title "Oriental languages" signified only Hebrew and its sister dialects: these alone, with the exception of Coptic, had been the object of the attention of scholars. Up to this time, all study of non-classical languages was connected with the Bible; and it is to biblical students that we owe what was done in Hebrew, Arabic, Ethiopic, and the related tongues, for the preceding three hundred years. But when the linguistic circle began to widen, and attempts were made at classification, the need of special names for the different linguistic groups was felt; and, for the more general divisions, recourse was naturally had to the genealogies in the table of nations in Gen. x. The credit, if such it be, of having originated the name "-Semitic" (from Noah's son Shem, or Shem) for the Hebrew group, is to be given either to Schlozer or to Eichhorn, to which of the two is doubtful. The first known use of the term is in Schlozer's article on the Chaldeans, in Eichhorn's Repertorium, 8, 161 (1781), and he seems to claim the honor of its invention; but a similar claim is made by Eichhorn himself, without mention of Schlozer, in his Allgemeine Bibliothek, 6, 772 (1794). Eichhorn, however, appears to have been accepted as the author of the name: he is so said to be by Adler (Mithridates, I. 300; 1806), from whose manner of speaking of it we may infer that it had not then come into general use. In a short while, however, it was everywhere adopted, and is now the recognized name of this group of languages. In Germany and France, and to some extent at least in England (so Coleridge, Table-Talk, 1827), the form "Semitic" was employed (after Septuagint and Latin Vulgate, and Luther's "Sem." instead of Hebrew "Shem"), while some English and American writers prefer the form "Shemitic," after the more accurate transliteration of the Hebrew. Between the two there is little to choose. The shorter form, now the more common one, is preferable to the other, because it is shorter, and in so far as it is farther removed from genealogical misconception. The once popular but unscientific threefold division of all the languages of the world into Japhetic, Semitic, and Hamitic, is now abandoned by scholars. "Semitic" is misleading, in so far as it appears to restrict itself to the languages spoken by the peoples mentioned in the table of nations as descendants of Shem; while it in fact includes dialects, as the Phoenician and Philistine, which are assigned in the table to Ham. The form "Semitic" (in English, but not in German and French), as farther removed than "Shemitic" from the control in influence it has exerted on human history through its religious ideas. The original seat of the Semites is unknown. There must have been a primitive Semitic race and a primitive Semitic language, which existed before the historical Semitic peoples and dialects had taken shape; but of this primitive race we can say no more than that it goes back to a remote antiquity; since of one of its daughters, the Babylonian people, there are traces in the fourth millennium B.C. It has been attempted to determine "the habitat of the Semites, before they broke up into separate nations, from their traditions, and from the vocabulary of the primitive tongue made out of their existence of the existing dialects; but no trustworthy result has been reached. The oldest accounts say nothing definite. In Gen. xi. 2, for example, we have the statement that the whole body of the descendants of Noah journeyed "eastward" (so הָפָךְ is to be rendered), that is, toward the Tigris-Euphrates region; but we are not told from what point they of Noah's three sons several went. At most, we may see here a dim feeling that the Semites had once lived together in the Tigris-Euphrates valley; but this might be referred to the fact that the Hebrews knew that they themselves had come from that region to Canaan. No other Semitic people has, so far as we know, any ancient tradition on this point. The evidence from the primitive Semite vocabulary is equally vague. Its terms for land, mountains, rivers, seas, metals, grains, fruits, and animals, do not allow us to fix on any particular spot in Western Asia as the locality where such terms must have originated. We are obliged, therefore, to reject the hypotheses which make the mountains of Armenia, or the lower Tigris-Euphrates valley, or the Arabian Desert, the cradle of the Semitic race, and to leave the question at present unsolved.

The Semitic territory was enclosed by that of great rival peoples, Indo-Europeans (Persians and Greeks) on the east and the west, and Egypt on the south. In ancient times, however, the language was very little affected by foreign influence, except at one point. According to the view now held by most Assyriologists, the Babylonian-Assyrians, conquering the non-Semitic Accadian-Sumerians, who preceded them as occupants of the Tigris-Euphrates valley, in adopting the civilization of the conquered, adopted a number of their words, some of which are found in Hebrew also, and in others of the dialects. Hebrew made a few loans in early times from the Egyptian, and at a later period, possibly from the Indian, and then from the Persian, Greek, and Latin; and the ecclesiastical Aramaic was naturally greatly affected by Greek and Latin. The loan-words are easily recognized, except those which come from the Accadian-Sumerian.

All the Semitic nationalities, except the Arabian and the Geez (Ethiopia), died out before the second century of our era. The Babylonian-Assyrians disappeared from history in the sixth century B.C., and their language survived only a few centuries. The Phenicians lingered in Asia till the time of the Antonines, and their language in Africa (Carthage) till toward the fifth century of our era (mentioned by Augustine and Jerome). The Syrian Aramaeans lost their independence in the eighth century B.C., but continued to exist, and their dialect revived in the second century A.D. as a Christian language; and the Jewish Aramaic continued for some centuries (up to the eleventh century A.D.) to be the spoken and literary tongue of the Palestinian and Babylonian Jews. The Jewish people, broken up by the Romans in the first century A.D., and scattered over the world, have carried Hebrew with them as a learned, artificial tongue. The Arabs did not appear as a nation till the sixth century. Geez proper died out about the sixth century A.D. remaining, however, as the ecclesiastical and learned language; and the nationality is still in existence.

III. DIVISIONS.—The various Semitic dialects closely resemble one another, there being, for example, between no two of them such dissimilarity as exists between Greek and Latin; but the family is divided into two well-defined groups and several sub-groups, the difference between which, in vocabulary and forms, is considerably greater than that between any two members of the same group or sub-group. The relations of the dialects may be seen from the following table, which is designed to include all Semitic forms of speech that can lay claim to linguistic individuality, except a few modern jargons mentioned below.

I. NORTH SEMITIC.

1. Eastern.
   a. Babylonian.
   b. Assyrian.
   c. East Aramaic.
   d. Syrian: (Dialect of Edessa).
   e. Mandaic.
   f. Nabataean.
   g. West Aramaic.
   h. Jewish Aramaic: (Daniel, Ezra, Targums, Talmud).
   i. Palmyrene.
   j. Egyptian Aramaic.

2. Northern.
   a. Phoenician.
   b. Old Phoenician.
   c. Late Phoenician (Punic).
   d. Hurrian.
   e. Moabish and other Canaanitish dialects.

II. SOUTH SEMITIC.

1. Northern.
   a. Sabean, or Himyarite.
   b. Hactiv (Ekkhill).
   c. Gez, or Ethioptic.
   d. Old Gez.
   e. Tigre.
   f. Tigrinya.

2. Southern.
   a. Arabian.
   b. Mahri.
   c. Yemeni.

Of these the following are now spoken: (1) Aramaic, by the Nestorian and Jacobite Christians in Upper Mesopotamia, near Mosul, thence eastward to the western shore of Lake Urmia, and northward in the Kuridish Mountains (Noldeke, Neusyr. Gram. Einleitung); and by the remnant of the Mandaeans in Lower Mesopotamia (Noldeke, Mand. Gram. Einleitung). (2) Arabic is the only Semitic dialect that has now any real life. It is spoken in various sub-dialects, — by the Bedawin of the Arabian Desert; in Egypt, and, as ecclesiastical language, in Turkey; in the Magreb (north coast of Africa); in Syria (ii. T.); in Syria (iii. T.), where the vernacular is a strange mixture, with Arabic as its basis, but many Italian and other words; on the coast of Malabar (the Mapuli jargon). The Mosarabic, a Spanish-Arabic jargon formerly spoken in the south of Spain, became extinct in the last century. (3) Geez: the four dialects, Tigre, Tigrinya, Amharic, Harari, are still spoken in Abyssinia. (4) Hebrew is studied by the Jews as a sacred language, and by a few of them, chiefly the older orthodox bodies in Germany and Austria, is to some extent written and spoken. This spoken language contains a large admixture of modern European terms. The literary Hebrew of to-day occupies the same position among the Jews as Latin among us.

Of languages which have been strongly affected by Semitic tongues may be mentioned the Iranian Huzvaresh, or Pahlavi (the language of the Bundeish), which is greatly Aramaized; the Iranian Persian, whose vocabulary is largely Arabic, and even its syntax appears to have been somewhat Semitized; the Indian Hindustani, which, developed under Moslem influence, also contains a large number of Arabic words; and the Turkish.
especially the literary and learned language of Conversational, which in linguistic properties for the same reason, has a large infusion of Arabic.

IV. Characteristics.—These may be divided into formal (grammar), material (vocabulary), and stylistic (rhetoric and thought). (1) Grammar. The Semitic phonetic system has a marked individuality. It is probable that the original Semitic system included most of the sounds of the classical Arabic, containing six gutturals (Alef, Ha, Ha, Ha, Ayin, Gayin), five uvulars (Kaf, Ta, Sad, Dad), two palatals (Kaf, Gam), two linguo-dentals (Ta, Dal), two labials (Pa, Ba), six liquids (Ra, Ya, Lam, Waw, and the nasals Mim, Nun), three sibilants (Sin, Sin, Zayin), and perhaps six spirants (Kaf, Gam, Ta, Dal, Pa, Ba).

No existing dialect has all these letters, but there are traces of most of them in all. Thus, comparison of Assyrian and Arabic makes it probable that the former contained all these h-sounds (Ha, Ha, Ha), though only one of them (Ha) is now found in it. Hebrew (Septuagint transliteration) seems to have possessed Gayin, as well as Ayin; the South Semitic group shows all the uvulars, and the Hebrew all the spirants. It may be, however, that the parent Semitic speech had fewer uvulars and spirants, and that the Southern group developed the former, and the Northern the latter. It is doubtful whether Hebrew Samek and Sin represent two different sounds. It is likely, also, that not all the sounds above mentioned are original, i.e., some of them may be merely modifications of earlier and simpler sounds; but we are concerned here only with the consonantal material possessed by the primitive Semitic tongue, and not with the material out of which its alphabet may have been formed. The Semitic alphabet is thus seen to be characterized by fulness of guttural, uvular, and spirant consonants. In the several dialects, the movement has been towards a diminution of the number of gutturals and uvulars; namely, by changing these into similar letters pronounced farther forward in the mouth. Assyrian, Galilean Jewish Aramaic, and Mandelean threw off the most of the gutturals; modern Arabic has diminished the number of its uvulars; and Geez, of its uvulars and gutturals. This is a tendency, observable in all languages, to bring forward the consonants, and thus facilitate their pronunciation. —The vowel material of the primitive Semitic was simple, consisting, probably, of the three vowels, a, i, u, with the corresponding long a, i, u. These have been variously modified in the different dialects. Assyrian has e: Aramaic, e, o; Hebrew, a, e, e, o, o; modern Arabic, e, e, a (aw); Geez, e, e, o. — Morphologically, the Semitic language belongs to the class called inflecting, standing in this respect alongside of the Indo-European. Their most marked peculiarity is their triliteralism: most stems consist of three consonants, on which, by prefixes, affixes, and internal vowel-changes, all derived forms are made. The noun has gender (masculine and feminine), number, case, and tense, and these latter are expressed by special forms which denote respectively completedness and ingressiveness of action. The notions of reflection, intensity, causation, are expressed by derived verbal stems made by suffixes and infixes.

—the Semitic syntax is marked by great simplicity of articulation. The different clauses of the sentence are, for the most part, connected by the most general word “and”; there is little or no inversion and transposition for rhetorical effect; and there are few or no elaborate particles. The structure is commonly and properly described as monumental or lapidary. The most striking special peculiarity of the syntax is the phonetic abridgment of the noun (status constructus) to show that it is defined by the following word or clause. The absence of compounds (except in proper names) is another marked feature,—an illustration of the isolating character of the thought. The whole conception of the sentence is detached, isolated, and picturesque. Of these general Semitic characteristics, the Hebrew and Assyrian, which first produced literatures, show the most, and the Aramaic and Arabic, whose literary life began late, the least. (2) Vocabulary. The Semitic word-material differs greatly according to the periods and the circumstances of the various peoples. The pre-Christian literary remains are very scanty. From the Israelites we have only a few prophetic discourses, historical books, and sacred hymns, and ethical works, together with several law-books,—no secular productions (unless the Song of Songs be so regarded) from the Assyrians, somewhat more,—royal and commercial inscriptions, geographical, astronomical, grammatical, and religious works, and fragments of epic and other poems; from the Phcenicians, a few short inscriptions; and from the others, nothing. The Hebrew literature is full in terms relating to religious feelings and acts, scanty in philosophical and artistic terms and in names of things pertaining to common life: the Assyrian has more of the last, but is equally deficient in the first. In later times, however, the Aramaic (classical and Jewish), and the Arabic under Greek influence, created larger vocabularies, and developed some power of philosophical expression. From the nature of the national culture, these languages, though their vocabularies are sometimes (the Arabic especially) very large, do not satisfy the needs of western life. They multiply words for objects and acts which we do not care to particularize, and are deficient in terms for those which we wish to express with precision. (3) The above description of the vocabulary and syntax will serve to characterize the style and thought of the Semitic tongues. The highest artistic shape they have not, either in prose or in poetry. They do not readily lend themselves to philosophy proper or to art. But in the simple expression of emotion, and the condensation of practical wisdom into household words, they are not surpassed by the highly developed Indo-European languages: in these respects the Bible has an acknowledged pre-eminence.

V. Literary Products. —It will be sufficient here to mention briefly the general characteristics of the literature of the Semitic languages: Phonetic, case, gender, number, and person, but properly no distinction of tense (in the sense of time), instead of which there are two forms which denote respectively completedness and ingressiveness of action. The notions of reflection, intensity, causation, are expressed by derived verbal stems made by suffixes and infixes.

—the Semitic syntax is marked by great simplicity of articulation. The different clauses of the sentence are, for the most part, connected by the most general word “and”; there is little or no inversion and transposition for rhetorical effect; and there are few or no elaborate particles. The structure is commonly and properly described as monumental or lapidary. The most striking special peculiarity of the syntax is the phonetic abridgment of the noun (status constructus) to show that it is defined by the following word or clause. The absence of compounds (except in proper names) is another marked feature,—an illustration of the isolating character of the thought. The whole conception of the sentence is detached, isolated, and picturesque. Of these general Semitic characteristics, the Hebrew and Assyrian, which first produced literatures, show the most, and the Aramaic and Arabic, whose literary life began late, the least. (2) Vocabulary. The Semitic word-material differs greatly according to the periods and the circumstances of the various peoples. The pre-Christian literary remains are very scanty. From the Israelites we have only a few prophetic discourses, historical books, and sacred hymns, and ethical works, together with several law-books,—no secular productions (unless the Song of Songs be so regarded) from the Assyrians, somewhat more,—royal and commercial inscriptions, geographical, astronomical, grammatical, and religious works, and fragments of epic and other poems; from the Phcenicians, a few short inscriptions; and from the others, nothing. The Hebrew literature is full in terms relating to religious feelings and acts, scanty in philosophical and artistic terms and in names of things pertaining to common life: the Assyrian has more of the last, but is equally deficient in the first. In later times, however, the Aramaic (classical and Jewish), and the Arabic under Greek influence, created larger vocabularies, and developed some power of philosophical expression. From the nature of the national culture, these languages, though their vocabularies are sometimes (the Arabic especially) very large, do not satisfy the needs of western life. VI. RELATIONS TO OTHER FAMILIES OF LANGUAGES. — So far as our present knowledge goes, it is doubtful whether the Semitic family is genetically connected with any other in the world. Various attempts have been made to show a relation between it and its neighbors, especially the Indo-European and the Egyptian. In respect to the former, the attempt may be said to be wholly unsuccessful. The case is somewhat different with the Egyptian, between whose personal pronouns and the Semitic there is a remarkable resemblance; though this isolated point of contact, considering the very great differences between the two families in other respects, gives an insecure basis for comparison. There is a similar resemblance between the structure of the Semitic verb and that of the Cushite group of languages (the Galla, Saho, and others, near Abyssinia), but nothing definite. At most, we may conjecture an original Semitic-Hamitic family, out of which these two have grown; but in that case their separation took place so long ago, and their paths since that time have been so different, and the traces of kinship have been so far obliterated, that it is hard to see how any valuable results can be drawn from a comparison between them. One main obstacle in the comparison of Semitic words with others is the triliteralism of stems of the former; and it has therefore been attempted to reduce these to biliterals, but hitherto with indifferent success. It need not be denied that this problem may hereafter be solved, and comparisons instituted between Semitic and other families, that may be of service to all.

SEMELER, Johann Salomo, the founder of historical criticism of the Bible; was b. at Saalfeld, Dec. 18, 1725; and d. at Halle, March 4, 1791. Brought up in a Pietistic circle, he entered the university of Halle, 1743, and was much influenced by the lectures of Baumgarten. He devoted a large portion of his time to the study of the Bible, and in 1750 he became editor of the local newspaper of Saalfeld, 1751, professor of history at Altdorf, and six months later professor of theology at Halle, becoming Baumgarten's successor in 1747. After being forced to forswear freedom of thought and investigation, he drew down upon himself the keenest criticism from orthodox circles. The Nova bibliotheca ecclesiastica called him an "impious man, and worse than the Jews" (homo impius et Judaeas peor). He was the principal cause of the new attacks and among the students increased in proportion to the attacks from outside. This feeling changed, however, to some extent, in 1779, when his Beantwortung der Fragmentes eines Ungenannten exposed him to the charge of being double-tongued. During the last ten years of his life he spent much time in the laboratory, and became an advocate of alchemy. His interest in the mysterious had increased; and the miraculous cures of Gassner, and the miraculous cures of Lavater were the occasion for him to appear in the Berlin Monatsschrift (1787) as an advocate of the possibility of miracles. Semler introduced new views upon the canon. The opinion which had prevailed up to that time was, that the books of the Bible constituted one "homogeneous whole," all parts of which are equally inspired. To refute this opinion is the purpose of the Abhandlung vom freien Gebrauch d. Kanons, 1771-75, 4 vols. He tried to prove that the books of the canon were brought together by accidental considerations, and not according to any fixed and well defined plan. He also showed that the text had many variations. The Scriptures were not even designed to be a norm of faith for all men. Was not the Old Testament written for the Jews? Did not Matthew write for Jews outside of Palestine? etc. Paul alone taught that Christianity was the universal religion, and the catholic epistles were intended to harmonize the Jewish and Pauline types of Christianity. Here was the germ of the fruitful principle of the later Tubingen critics. Semler is never done stating the thought that Christ and the apostles accommodated themselves in their language to the popular notions of their day and the ideas of the Old Testament. In his commentaries on Romans, John's Gospel, the Epistles to the Corinthians, etc. Semler frequently forsook rhetoric for philosophy. After travelling in Greece, he began to practise as an orator at Rome, and achieved forensic success. On a charge of adulterous connection with Julia, daughter of Germanicus, he was banished to Corsica, where he lived for eight years, composing the De consolatione ad Helviam liber and De consolatione ad Polybium liber. On the marriage of Agrippina to Claudius, he was recalled, and made tutor of the future emperor, Nero. During his incumbency he amassed great wealth, which became the occasion of his ruin. Looked upon with suspicion by Nero, he retired from the court; and, being accused with having had a share in the conspiracy of Piso, he received an order from the emperor to commit suicide. He at once obeyed the order by opening his veins, and bleeding to death in a hot bath.

Seneca's relation to Christianity has excited much interest, and awakened much discussion. Jerome (De script. eccl., 12) speaks of letters which passed between Paul and Seneca, and says they were read by many (leguntur a pluribus). Augustine (Ep. ad Macci.) also refers to this correspondence. These are the only allusions to it during the first eight centuries. Upon the Jewish notions of that day. Of course, those things in which the New-Testament writers accommodated themselves to the opinions of their day are not to be believed by us. Nevertheless, Semler, with all his faults, is the author of the present method, in explaining a biblical author, of taking into consideration his purpose in writing and the historical environment. He reduced the difference between Christianity and natural religion to a minimum, but his Christian consciousness always insisted upon this difference. He sang Christian hymns, prayed with his wife, and they pledged one another to follow God only, and his commandments. "No one knows," he said, "what I feel when I think of God's goodness to me." In the department of church history Semler did not do as much as in that of biblical criticism. But he became the father of the history of Christianity by his studies, which led to the minute investigation and clearing-up of many points. On the history of the first Christian centuries he published Selecta capita hist. eccles. Commentarii hist. de antiquo christanorum statu, etc. He issued in all a hundred and seventy-one publications, only two of which reached a second edition. Baur, after acknowledging the value of Semler's investigations, complains that he had no power of grouping or elaborating his theories. His work consisted only in a variety of disconnected results and truths. But, as Reuss says, it belonged to Semler to speak the magic word which emancipated theology from the fetters of tradition. Though piously inclined, he gave the traditional views a deadly wound. But he was neither the head of a school nor the prophet of the future. See SEMLER: Autobiography, 1781; EICHORN: Leben Semler's, in his Bibliothek, v.; H. SCHMID: D. SENNACHERIB

Hérodiade, ou l'infiltration du christianisme naissante à travers le paganisme, 1853, 2 vol. Seneca's relation to Christianity has been exhaustively treated by Aubertin (Étude crit. sur les rapports supposés entre Sénèque et St. Paul, Paris, 1857), and F. C. Baur, in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift, 1858. The latter considers, in his usually profound way, the fundamental ideas of both men. The correspondence between Paul and Seneca consists of eight letters of the latter and six of the former, and bears upon its surface the stamp of an unscientific fabrication. Christ is not the topic, but Castor and Pollex are referred to; and the writers deal more with social conventionalities than with the great ideas of religion and philosophy. But how did it come that Jerome and Augustine were both deceived? One explanation has been, that there was a genuine correspondence, of which this is the spurious imitation; and Seneca's promise in the ninth letter, to send to Paul his work, De cons secratorum, is appealed to in confirmation of this theory. The more rational explanation is, that it was a forgery, and as such the outgrowth of the opinion that friendly relations subsisted between the apostle and the philosopher. This opinion was based on those passages of the New Testament which speak of Paul's residence at Rome (Acts xxviii. 30; Phil. i. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 17), which would have afforded them opportunity to meet, and his acquaintance with Seneca's brother Gallio (Acts xviii. 12 sqq.). These passages are, however, so indefinite, that no one would have hit upon the idea of an acquaintance between Paul and Seneca but for other considerations, which seem to indicate that he had approached Christianity. The reason for such approach was derived from his own writings; and, if we pass by the exaggerated attempts to extract distinctively Christian ideas, we cannot overlook the peculiar coloring which stoicism gets in them. We mention here two of Seneca's characteristics, — his practical tone and the tinge of mysticism with which his thinking is colored. Nor can we forget his frequent confession of universal error and estrangement, his references to a future life, etc. Such ideas as these do not, however, necessarily indicate that Seneca had undergone the influence of Christianity. His practical thought had a religious vein: but as a whole, as well as in minor details, his writings stand opposed to the Christian system; and the points wherein they seem to approach it belong to all religions. Seneca knows nothing either of the Judaistic type of Christianity, or of Christ as its Alpha and Omega. Without speaking of the specific Christian conceptions of revelation, sin, and law, Seneca stands on other than Christian ground. The stoic is himself the source of truth and his own duty. There is, however, a Christian glimmer, the moonlight of Christianity, diffused over his philosophy. But he is not the dim reflection of a new light which has appropriated, but the faint dawn on the obscure horizon of the pre-Christian world, announcing the sun, which has already begun to scatter his light across valley and on mountain. The fine ideas of Roman stoicism were the buds which only the sun of the sun would develop into beauty and perfection, but which, left alone, would never have produced rich fruits.

Ltr. — The text of the supposed correspond-declare that he did. But Sennacherib demanded more than this from the Judean king. He had taken up his position at Lachish with the expectation of forming a joint expedition against the enemy, namely, Egypt, which had joined the league against Assyria, and whose army, although too late to protect most of its allies, was on the way to meet Sennacherib. It was most important, therefore, to the Assyrian king that he should be secure in the rear. An expedition, under his Tartan (Assyr., turutanu, "general-in-chief"), was accordingly despatched against Jerusalem; and the Rab-shakeh (Assyr., rab-sat, "chief captain"), acting, no doubt, under orders from his superior, used every means of persuasion and threat, by word of mouth and by letter, to gain possession of the city (2 Kings xviii. 17-35 = Isa. xxxvii. 5-7, 14-35; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 9-18). This demand, so formidably backed, produced a great effect upon people and king (cf. 2 Kings xviii. 26, 37-39 = Isa. xxxvi. 11, 22-xxxvii. 4; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 18); but faith in Jehovah, stimulated by the exhortations of Isaiah, who had been a sturdy opponent of Assyria, and yet believed in the certainty of a deliverance, on both ground and expectation of a great misfortune in their camp, and to this extent confirms the biblical account.

After this campaign we have no mention of Sennacherib’s presence in the West (cf. “and dwelt at Nineveh,” 2 Kings xix. 36; Isa. xxxvii. 37). He reigned twenty years longer, and was engaged in important campaigns and great public works. The fourth, sixth, and eighth campaigns were against Babylonia, where a new pretender, Suzub, divided his attention with Merodach-balan, whose frequent failure did not daunt him. As a result of the fourth campaign, Sennacherib established his son Assur-Nadinum (the Assur-rada, whom Ptolemy assigns to B.C. 699) as vice-roy of Babylonia. In the sixth campaign Suzub was again defeated, and brought captive to Nineveh; and in the eighth, which was evidently the fiercest struggle of all, Suzub again appeared in freedom, and in league with Nebosumiskun, son of Merodach-balan, made a renewed attempt to throw off the Assyrian yoke, but finally succumbed. Other expeditions of Sennacherib took him to the eastward; and one of these was not a very successful campaign against Elam, whose king repeatedly appears as an ally of Merodach-baladan and Suzub.

But Sennacherib distinguished himself by his building as much as by his fighting. Early in his reign he pulled down the royal palace on the northern mound of Nineveh (modern Kuyunjik), and replaced it by a magnificent structure, even in its ruins the largest of the Assyrian palaces yet discovered. It is now known as the South-West Palace of Kuyunjik. He erected a second palace on the southern mound of Nineveh (modern Nebi Yunus). He made a broad and splendid street through the city, and erected a bridge over the waters which protected the eastern gate,— the chief gate of the city,— through which the Assyrian kings and their armies often passed. He supplied the city with water by cutting at immense cost a canal from the high land near the city Kisiri, north-east from Nineveh, through which the waters of the Khozer were conducted to his capital, and provided for a constant supply by a system of feeders. In all these enterprises he employed vast numbers of captives as laborers. The quarries of the neighboring mountains furnished the stone that was needed, and timber and all costly things for the adornment of the palaces were brought from various conquered lands.

But Sennacherib was not permitted to end his days in peace. The prediction which Isaiah had uttered concerning him while he was still in Philistia (cf. 2 Kings xix. 7 with Isa. xxxvii. 7) came true after twenty years. He was murdered by two of his sons, whose names the Bible has preserved to us as Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Kings xi. 21 = Isa. xxxvi. 37 = Isa. xxxvii. 21). Abydenus (Euseb.: Chron. I. 9) and Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb.: Chron. I. 5) also mention the murder of Sennacherib, but no account of it has yet been found in the Assyrian inscriptions. He was succeeded by his son, Esar-hadon.

SEPARES, an American Calvinistic Methodist sect, composed of Whitefield's followers, which sprang up in 1750 under the name of "New Lights." They were, however, subsequently organized into separate societies by Rev. Shubal Stearns, and then they took the name "Separates." Stearns became a Baptist in 1751, and many of the Separates followed him into that church; and the sect died out. "The distinctive doctrine of the sect was, that believers are guided by the immediate teachings of the Holy Spirit, such supernatural indications of the divine will being regarded by them as partaking of the nature of inspiration, and above, though not contrary, to reason." See BLUNTZ, Dictionary of Sects, s.v.: GARDNER: Faiths of the World, s.v.

SEPARETISM, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, means the spirit of separation in matters of faith: therefore Separatists are those who separate themselves from the State Church in order to seek in conventicles and prayer-meetings the edification they do not derive from the public religious services. They are very numerous in Russia and Wurttemberg. See INSPIRED, PENTISM, RUSSIAN SECTS.

SEPHERVAIM (Heb. שֵׁפֶר-וָיָם; LXX, Σηπαραῖα; Assy., Sippara, Sippara; Akkad., Zimuir, meaning unknown), a city of Northern Babylonia, is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible: 2 Kings xvii. 24, 31, xviii. 34 (Isa. xxxxi. 19), xix. 13 (Isa. xxxvii. 13). The last four passages name Sepharvaim among the cities conquered by the king of Assyria: the first two speak of it as one of the places from which colonists were transplanted into Sippara, in which the men of Sharon continued their prosperous state; and the city of Sepharvaim was formed in their new land (see below).

The site of Sepharvaim (Sippara) was discovered in 1881 by Hormuzd Rassam, who unearthed in the mounds now called Abu Habbâ the ruins of its famous sun-temple, with a base-relief of the sun-god himself, and valuable inscriptions. Sippara lay a little to the west of a north and south line joining Babylon with Bagdad, and somewhat nearer the latter place, in lat. about 33° 4' 20" N.; long. about 44° 10' east from Greenwich. The Sipparaeans, who inhabited it in a state of confusion, were repeatedly called "the river of Sippara," once flowed near it; but the present river-bed is several miles to the west. Sippara was an ancient and highly venerated seat of power and worship. It was sometimes called "Sippar of the Sun." See RIZOR, Euseb., Enop. Prap. D. 9, 12, and Chron. I. 7. It appears to have been a double city, with two separate parts: this follows not only from the dual form of the Hebrew Sepharvaim, but also from the distinction which the inscriptions make between "Sippar of the Sun" and "Sippara of (the goddess) Anunit." One of these twin parts was perhaps identical with the old city Agade (Akkad (?) , so George Smith), which was undoubtedly in the immediate neighborhood.

Sippara was connected with Babylonian mythology: for, according to Berossus (see Euseb., loc. cit.), Xisuthros, the Babylonian Noah, was directed back by an oracle to Sippara, to destroy Sippara the records of antiquity, and after the flood his companions were ordered by a heavenly voice to dig up the tablets deposited by Xisuthros at Sippara, which they accordingly did. The temple of the sun-god discovered by Rassam is of unknown antiquity. It was already venerable when it was restored by Sagasalti-Darius, a king who is believed to have lived about B.C. 1050. Tradition carried its origin many centuries farther back; and, indeed, an inscription of Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king, who reigned B.C. 555–538, makes the surprising statement, that, in exploring its walls and foundations, he came upon "the cylinder of Naram-Sin, son of Sargon, which for thirty-two hundred years no king going before me had seen." (See T. G. Pinches: Proceedings Soc. Bib. Arch., Nov. 7, 1882.) If this statement is accurate, then we have a Shemitic civilization (Naram-Sin is a Semitic name) in Northern Babylonia nearly four thousand years before Christ. There is no reason to doubt that Nabonidus gave these figures in good faith, but there are several grounds for questioning their correctness. (1) It cannot be proved, and is not probable, that the chronological records, which in later times, it is true, were preserved with minuteness and care (cf. the Assyrian Eponym Canon), extended back to so remote an antiquity. (2) "Thirty-two hundred" looks like an approximate, not an exact statement. (3) This statement throws back Sargon I. and Naram-Sin (from both of whom we have inscriptions) so far as to leave an immense gap between them and the later Babylonian kings,—a gap which no materials at our disposal enable us to fill. (4) Berossus, although he assigns many thousands of years to the prehistoric kings, does not trace the actual history of Babylonia beyond about B.C. 2500. It seems, then, probable that Sippara, though a very ancient city, has at present no claim to that enormous assignation to its temple. (See further, F. Hommel: Neuzt. Völker u. Sprachen, i. pp. 487–489.)

In 2 Kings xvii. 31 we are told that the Sepharvites (Heb. שֵׁפֶר-וָיָם; LXX, Σηπαραῖα) burnt their sons with fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, "gods of Sepharvaim." (The K'thith gives SEQUENCE, The, or sequentia (from sequor, "I follow"), was so called because it formerly followed the Epistle, and preceded the Gospel, in the church service. At the death of the refugee, the twenty-year-old debate had been resumed. In consequence, Notker (for whose personal characteristics see Maitland: The Dark Ages) composed a sequence, or "prose" (prose); and the monks, carrying their service-books with them. One arrived at the abbey of St. Gall, where was a celebrated school for church music, and brought thither a Gregorian antiphony in which words had been set to these otherwise meaningless notes of the neuma. The improvement was adopted at St. Gall. This is Dr. Pearson's version. But Dr. Neale maintains that Notker (Notkerus Verbi

tor, to distinguish him from a younger person of the same name) was the true author. This man (called Balbulus, "the little stutterer") had once been at Jumieges, and had there debated with Dr. Neale maintains that Notker (Nod-ems Velas) was the true author. His man who alone mentions them had four wings and four faces; and from this very refugee monk the question whether words were to be given to these notes. It is said that the sound of a mill-wheel furnished him with the idea. Further, that, on the arrival of the refugee, the twenty-year-old debate had been resumed. In consequence, Notker (for whose personal characteristics see Maitland: The Dark Ages) composed a sequence, or "prose" (prosa); that is to say, an unmetrical but rhythmic series of sentences. This he offered to Yao, the precentor. Upon emendation, it was adopted. There is no doubt that Notker deserves some credit; but the Te Deum laudamus and the Gloria in excelsis Deo, to name no other ancient hymns, are of this form. The famous sentence, "in the midst of life we are in death," etc. (Media vita in morte sumus, etc.), and which is found in the Episcopal Prayer-Book, is his composition. It was inspired by the Martinsbruck bridge-builders swinging down over the torrent. Dr. Pearson admits Notker's invention of these rhetorical proses; and the Lawdes Deo concinat orbis universus, his first production, has been recently republished. His sequence of the Holy Spirit (Sancti Spiritus adsit nobis gratia) was in use throughout Europe. In these sequences the choir "acts like the chorus of a Greek play," maintaining the attention in default of the principal characters. In the seventeenth century the rood-lobes became organ-lobes to such an extent that sequences, not being required, were disused. In later days the word "sequence" was (incorrectly) applied as synonymous with "hymn." Thus Adam of St. Victor (d. 1192) is called a writer of "sequences," and the Dies Irae is sometimes similarly entitled. Unless this term be employed with reference to the music, it is confusing; for the "sequence" differs from the hymn in being rhetorical without regular metre, and in possessing no rhymes at all. For the high ritualistic significance of its construction, see Neale's Latin monograph prefixed to Daniel's Thessaurus, tom. v.

In consequence, Notker (for whose personal characteristics see Maitland: The Dark Ages) composed a sequence, or "prose" (prosa); and the monks, carrying their service-books with them. One arrived at the abbey of St. Gall, where was a celebrated school for church music, and brought thither a Gregorian antiphony in which words had been set to these otherwise meaningless notes of the neuma. The improvement was adopted at St. Gall. This is Dr. Pearson's version. But Dr. Neale maintains that Notker (Notkerus Verbi tor, to distinguish him from a younger person of the same name) was the true author. This man (called Balbulus, "the little stutterer") had once been at Jumieges, and had there debated with Dr. Pearson's version, for Hartmann of St. Gall. MOREL'S Lat. Hymn. des Mittelalters (Einsiedeln, 1867, 2 vols.) is the richest collection.

SAMUEL W. DUFFIELD.

SERAPHIM (plural of Heb. saraph, "to burn"), beings seen by Isaiah, who alone mentions them (vi. 2-6), on either side of the throne of God. They each had six wings: two were spread, in token that instantly they were ready to go upon any errand; two covered the face, to indicate how unworthy they were to look upon their Lord; and two covered the feet,—an Oriental custom in the presence of royalty. They sang an antiphonal chant. One of them cleansed the prophet of his sins by touching his lips with a live coal from the altar before the Lord. The seraphim were manifestly quite different from the cherubim, for the latter had four wings and four faces; and from the angels, who have no wings. SERGIUS PAULUS. See Paul.

SERGIUS is the name of several saints and martyrs of the Roman-Catholic Church. One of them, a native of Rome, was martyred at Rosaph in Syria, 290; and in his honor the Emperor Justinian I. built the city of Rosaph Sergiopolis. His day of commemoration is Oct. 7.

SERGIUS with the surname Confessor was a native of Constantinople, and lived in the first half of the ninth century. His book, De rebus in publica et ecclesiastica, is a history of the image-controversies from Constantine Copronymus to Michael II. Balbus, — is lost: but under Leo Isatucius, or under Theophilus, he was imprisoned and exiled as an image-worshipper; and for that reason he is styled a confessor by the Greek Church, and is commemorated on May 13.
Trullan Council, though his delegates had signed them. The emperor, Justinian II., proposed to compel obedience, and had already ordered the Pope to be transported to Constantinople, when he was himself deposed. Thus the Papal rejection of the Trullan Council remained unshaken, and became the starting-point of that contest between the Greek and the Latin churches which ended with their complete separation.—Sergius II. (844-847) was the first pope who had the courage to ask for no confirmation of his election and consecration by the emperor; and he succeeded in vindicating himself, though the Emperor Lothair, through his son Lewis and Bishop Dragó, presented a formal protest in Rome.—Sergius III. (904-911), one of the basest characters ever placed on the Papal throne. He lived in open adultery with Marozia, who, besides other children, bore to him the later Pope John XI. See Lurrrnsn: Antapodosis, in Perz: Mon. Germ. Hist., v.—Sergius IV. (1009-12). His true name was Bocca di Porco (“Swine-snout”); but he was ashamed of it, and on his accession he changed it for Sergius. After that time it became customary for the Popes to change their family names on their election. NEUDECKER.

SERPENT, Brazen, The. When the Israelites, in the fortieth year of their journey through the wilderness, after they had overcome and banished the Canaanites, turned again to the Red Sea to compass the land of Edom, they murmured against God and against Moses for want of water. To punish the people, God sent fiery serpents; and by their bite many died. This punishment leads the people not only to acknowledge their sin, but also to ask Moses to pray unto the Lord that he take away the serpents. Moses, therefore, at the divine command, makes a brazen serpent, hangs it on a pole, so that by looking toward it every one that had been bitten was cured (Num. xxv. 5 sq.). These fiery serpents are not to be understood as flying-serpents; but they were serpents which were called fiery either on account of their red, shining, fiery-like color, or on account of their inflammatory bite. Very striking indeed is the remedy which Jehovah gives here against the consequences of the serpents' bites, and different explanations have been tried. But we must bear this in mind, that not the way in which the brazen serpent was hung up, but the very fact that it was a serpent, and nothing else, which was made visible in a far distance, is of the utmost importance. The brazen serpent was to the Israelite a symbol of the punishment with which his sin, his murmuring, was visited by Jehovah. Since he that was bitten, in order to be cured, had to look toward the brazen image of the death-bringing serpent, he was cured only under the condition that he became conscious of that punishment which he had incurred by his sin, part of which he had already suffered in the bite of the serpent, and that he wished to be spared the last consequences, the death. By looking toward the brazen serpent, the Israelite was to be cured, but only on condition that he was reminded of his deserved punishment, and took it to heart. Remission and forgiveness of sins were only to follow on reflection, when the hour of repentance had been effected. This brazen serpent was still, in the time of Hezekiah, an object of idolatrous reverence among the Israelites (2 Kings xviii. 4), and the pious king had it destroyed with other images.

In the New Testament the brazen serpent is mentioned (John iii. 14, 15), where Jesus shows unto Nicodemus the necessary elements for seeing the kingdom of God,—first the subjective condition, the new birth (3-13); then the objective condition, through which the faith in the Son of man, as effected by the new birth, can bring life eternal (14 sq.). This latter condition consists in that the Son of man is lifted up like the serpent in the wilderness. Like the brazen serpent, he becomes an image of those punishments which man has incurred, and from which he asks to be delivered. Jesus had therefore to suffer the death of the cursed, which we had incurred, in order to relieve us from the curse. By looking toward him in faith, we are cured and saved, but not without being reminded at the same time of our own sins, for which he was crucified, and of the punishment which we have deserved. This is only one, and nothing else but one, side of the great work by which Jesus has effected our redemption.

SERVENTUS, Michael (Miguel Serveto), b. at [Tudela in Spain, Sept. 29], 1521; burnt at the stake in Geneva, Oct. 27, 1553. He studied jurisprudence at Toulouse; entered the service of Father Quintana, the confessor of Charles the Fifth, and accompanied him in 1529 to Italy and Germany. The minute circumstances, however, of his earlier life, cannot be made out with certainty, as the explanations he gave before the court of Vienne often contradict those he gave before the court of Geneva. In 1530 he was at all events in Basel, and in the following year he published his De Trinitatis erroribus. While in Toulouse he began to study the Bible, and received a deep impression from it; but he had always remained a self-taught man in the field of theology, without any true scientific training. He had, however, some talent for abstract speculation, and threw himself with ardent zeal on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, sure that the development which the doctrine had found in the church was utterly wrong, and eager to turn the course of the Reformation in the direction of his own speculation. He addressed himself to Ecklampsius; and Ecklampsius was unable to convince him that his speculations, directed against the eternal divinity of Christ, and leaving the Holy Spirit almost entirely out of consideration, were obstinate contradictions to the Bible, and blasphemous. When the book appeared, it made a great sensation; but all the Reformers denounced it, and Butzer even declared from the pulpit that the author ought to be punished with death. On his return to Basel, Servetus was cast into prison. His bowe repentance had been handled, he was released only on condition of retracting; and indeed his next book (Dialogorum de Trini... tate libri ii., 1532) opens with a recantation; but he retracts only because he understands that what he formerly wrote on the subject was unripe and unintelligible; and after that kind of recantation he begins afresh. This second book, however, fell flat from the press.

Soon after, he left Basel and repaired, under the influence of De Villeneuve, to Paris, where he studied mathematics and medicine. In 1540 he settled as a physician at Vienne, on the invitation of Archbishop Paulmier; and he stayed there for twelve years, enjoying the favor of his patron and the esteem of his co-citizens, engaged in various literary pursuits of a highly creditable character, and seemingly in perfect harmony with the Roman-Catholic Church around him. But he had not given up his antitrinitarian speculations, nor abandoned his hope of exercising a decisive influence on the course of the Reformation. Probably in order to ascertain how far he could hope to find a co-worker in the French Reformed Church, he opened a correspondence with Calvin. At first Calvin answered calmly and with great composure; but, as the correspondence developed, he felt deeply provoked; and, when Servetus asked him to procure a safeguard for a visit to Geneva, Calvin refused, remarking in a letter to Farel, dated Feb. 13, 1548, "Si venerit, modo valeat mea autoritas, vivum exire nunquam patiar" ("If ever he enters the city, he shall not leave it living, if I can prevent it"). Servetus himself was aware of the danger of his enterprise; but in the excited state of mind in which he lived he was drawn onwards with irresistible force, and in the beginning of 1553 he published anonymously his principal work, Christianismi Restitutio. All the old objections to the doctrine of the Trinity are here repeated; and it is urged that the Bible and the ante-Nicene Fathers know nothing of such a doctrine, and that it is the principal reason why the Jews and Mohammedans have not been converted. The author of the book was soon found out, and his identity proved by means of papers delivered up by Calvin. Servetus was imprisoned at Vienne, and a process was instituted against him; but on April 7 he succeeded in escaping from his prison, through the intervention of Calvin; and such a hail-storm of pamphlets, in verse and prose, representing his character and conduct in the most odious light, came pouring down upon him, that he found it necessary to publicly defend himself. His Declaration appeared in the beginning of 1554 in French, and shortly after in Latin: Refutatio. It was very severely criticised by the Vaticanus (Contra librum Calvinii), who, however, was no adherent of Servetus. A remarkable book on the question is the De haeresis, an sint persequendi...sententia (Magdeburg, 1554), probably by Castellio. It is a collection of all the most noteworthy opinions pronounced upon the question.

SERVIA. Modern Servia, which on March 6, 1882, resumed her place among the kingdoms of Europe, has an area of 20,850 square miles, and a population of about a million and three-fourths. Ancient Servia had a much greater area; and the number of the Servian-speaking people, including those living under Austrian rule, and in the provinces formerly subject to Turkey, is stated to be over seven millions. The Servian tribes received Christianity from the Eastern Church, early in their history; but it was only towards the end of the twelfth century that the energetic Grand Shupane, Nemanja, abolished the partly Romanized ritual which had come into use, and brought the Servian Church into full accord with that of the Eastern Empire.

The Latins having taken Constantinople, St. Sava, son of Nemanja, in 1217, crowned as king his brother Stephen, and in 1224 induced the humble emperor and patriarch to make the Servian Church autocephalous, as a means of preserving it from Rome; St. Sava himself being the first independent archbishop. The key to the earlier church history of Servia is found in the attachment to the formule of the Eastern Church, joined to jealousy of the political power of the Eastern Empire. In 1347, when the great Stephen Dushan declared himself czar, the archbishop, as was natural in the Greek Church, where the secular and spiritual powers are so closely united, was declared patriarch, and his seat fixed at Ipek. The fatal battle of Kossava, in 1389, and the trampling of Servia under the Turks, did not interfere with the succession of the patriarchs of Ipek until near the middle of the seventeenth century; then the Porte, finding the patriarchate a centre of national feeling, interfered; and finally, in 1737, abolished it, and appointed the Greek bishops from Constantinople, who were as much hated by the people as were the Turkish rulers. As the erection of the patriarchate under Stephen Dushan marks the highest point of Servian history, so its suppression marks the lowest. In 1810, when Kara George freed his country from the Turks, the archbishopric of Carlovitz, in Hungary, which represents the patriarchate of Ipek, was acknowledged as the head of the Servian Church. The Turks reconquered the country; and when Milosh Obrenovics by his efforts, from 1803, to 1815, in the name of the Hatti-serai, from the Porte, which erected Servia into an autonomous principality, paying tribute to the Porte, the Church was also allowed to elect her own bishops and metropolitan, paying tribute to the Patriarch at Constantinople. In 1838, when the seat of government was removed to Belgrade, the metropolitan of that city was acknowledged as the head of the Servian Church, although the Archbishop of Carlovitz urged his claims. The treaty of Berlin, in 1878, made the principality of Servia wholly independent, and the connection of the church with that of Constantinople ceased. The Liturgy of the Servian Church is in ancient Slavonic, which is said not to differ more from modern Servian than does the English of Chaucer from that of the present day. Servia has a good public system of education. The parish priests of Belgrade and the more populous parts of the country are men of education and intelligence; but the standard in the mountainous regions of the interior, in this respect, is not as high as it should be. Freedom of worship is allowed, although proselytizing from the Established Church is forbidden. The metropolitan of Belgrade has five suffragans, each of whom presides over a diocesan consistory. The entire Protestant, Roman-Catholic, and Jewish populations together numbered in 1874 less than seven thousand. The districts annexed in 1878 contained a Mohammedan population of seventy-five thousand.

SERVITEx (Servi Beatae Mariae Virginis, "Servant of the Virgin Mary") is the name of a monastic order, which was formed in 1223, at Florence, on the day of the festival of the ascension of the Virgin (Aug. 15), by seven distinguished citizens, who retired to a secluded place (Villa Camartia) for the purpose of devoting themselves entirely to the worship of Mary. In 1230 they removed to Monte Serrai, and in 1239 they adopted the rules of St. Augustine, and began to receive novices. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX. and Alexander IV.; and from Martin V. it obtained all the privileges of the mendicant orders, 1424. Among the celebrated many who have belonged to the order is Paolo Sarpi. There are also female Servites. See A. GIANNISI: Annales Ordinis Fratrum Servorum, Lucca, 1719; and Paulus FloRENTinus: Dialogus de origine Ordinis Servorum, in J. LAMIOUS: Delicia Eruditorum, Florence, 1780; Schrock: Christlichen Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxvii., pp. 590 sqq.

SERVUS SERVORUM DEI ("Servant of the Servants of God") is the official formula with which the Pope signs his name. It was brought into technical official use by Gregory the Great (q. v.) in imitation of Augustine, yet as a rebuke to the Patriarch John of Constantinople, who had the audacity to style himself "(Ecumenical Patriarch."

SESSION, the lowest court in the Presbyterian Church, composed of the pastor and his elders. Before it, all candidates for admission to full communion come, and by it all business relating to the government and practice of the congregation is transacted.

SESSION OF CHRIST, a theological term derived from the phrase that Christ is "seated at the right hand of God," setting forth the perpetual presence of the human nature in heaven.

SETON (Mother), Elizabeth Ann (née Bayley), foundress of the Sisters of Charity in the United States; b. in New-York City, Aug. 28, 1774; d. at Emmitsburg, Md., Jan. 4, 1821. She married William Seton in her twentieth year. After his death (1808) she left the Roman-Catholic Church, March 14, 1805. In order to support herself she taught school at Baltimore, 1806-08; but with her sisters-in-law, Harriet and Cecilia Seton, on the inheritance of eight thousand dollars from the Rev. Samuel Cooper, she opened a conventual establishment of the Sisters of Charity—they having taken the veil Jan. 1, 1806—at Emmitsburg, July 30, 1809. In 1812 the order had increased to twenty members, with Mother Seton as superior-general. At her death it numbered fifty. In 1814 the order took charge of an orphan-asylum in Philadelphia, and in 1817 was incorporated by the Legislature of Maryland. See her biography by White, New York, 1853, and by Robert Seton, New York, 1838, 2 vols.

SEVEN, The Sacred Number. Among ancient nations, especially in the East, in India, China, Chaldæa, Egypt, Greece, we find that a symbolical significance is attached to the number seven as a pre-eminently sacred number. According to the Indian doctrines, "man is the representative of the great seven-stringed world-lyre," the "symbol of cosmic harmony," the "makro-cosmic heptachord" (v. Bohlen: Das alte Indien, ii. 247). The Chinese distinguished seven material souls in man, together with three spiritual souls (Ritter: Chinese doctrines, ii. 64; cf. Uhlemann: Aegyptologie, ii. 39, 163). There were also the sacred "Heptads" of Greece and Rome; and hence the significance attached to Rome's seven hills, to the seven reeds in the pipe of Pan, the seven strings of the lyre of Hecules. With the heathen, the number seven—which also includes the seven planets, the seven colors in the rainbow, the seven tones in music—had almost exclusive reference to natural relations; to the seven sacred divisions of the moon, which all nations seem to have recognized; and Ideler (Chronologie, i. 178, ii. 473) traces the universal division of time into periods of seven days to the phases of the moon, or the duration of each of the four divisions of the lunar month of twenty-eight days. In place of all such references, the dogmatic and religious significance of seven was alone recognized by the Hebrews. The Bible begins, in the Book of Genesis, with a seven, and ends, in the Apocalypse, with a series of sevens. The symbolical value of this number is not to be sought for, with Winer (Real-wörterbuch, ii. 715), in the ideas attached by the ancients to the seven planets, but in the seven days during which creation arose from chaos [and was pronounced to be “very good”], when God rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had done, and blessed it and sanctified it as a day of rest for the creation also. With reference to this starting-point or sacred number — seven, or seven multiplied by seven — all the legal festivals were ordered. Thus the great festivals lasted seven days, — the passover [Exod. xii. 15], the feast of tabernacles [Deut. xvi. 13]. Pentecost was seven weeks after the passover [Lev. xxiii. 15, 16]; each seventh year was “a sabbath of rest unto the land” [Lev. xxv. 4], and the jubilee year was the year after “seven sabbatical years” [Lev. xxv. 8-11]. The great day of atonement fell in the seventh month (Lev. xvi. 29, 30), as did the feasts of trumpets and of tabernacles [Num. xxix. 1, 12]; and thus the seventh day is a sabbath, the seventh week a pentecost, the seventh year a sabbatical year, the seventh sabbatical year a jubilee.

Not only the legal festivals, but also other enactments, had reference to the sacred number seven. Thus seven days were required for the ceremonies of the consecration of priests; seven days for the interval to elapse between the occasion and removal of various kinds of legal uncleanliness, as after childbirth, after contact with a corpse, etc.; seven times appointed for aspersion either of the blood of the victim (Lev. xiv. 51; cf. 2 Kings v. 10, 14, “[go and wash thyself in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh,” etc.]); and Gen. vii. 2, 3). Seven things were to be offered in sacrifice, — oxen, sheep, goats, pigeons, wheat, oil, wine; seven victims to be offered on any special occasion (Num. xxii. 1, 14; 2 Chron. xi. 11, xvi. 11, xxix. 21; [Job xii. 6]); cf. also Gen. xxxii. 30, where Jacob bowed seven times, and 2 Kings vi. 38, concerning Solomon’s temple, which was seven years in building); and especially at the ratification of a treaty, the notion of seven being embodied in the very term mabia, signifying “to swear,” literally meaning to “do seven times” (Gen. xxi. 29; Deut. iv. 31; cf. Herod. iii. 8 for a similar custom among the Arabian). The same idea is farther carried out in the vessels, adjuncts, measurements, and arrangements of the tabernacle, in the seven arms of the candlestick and its seven lamps (Exod. xxv. 31-37); the length of each curtain of the tabernacle, which was seven by four cubits (Exod. xxv. 2); the number of the pillars of the tabernacle court, which was seven by four by two [Exod. xxvii. 10-15]. The number seven also appears in cases where the notion of satisfaction is required, as in reference to punishment for wrongs (Gen. iv. 15; Lev. xxii. 18-28; Prov. vi. 3), or to forgiveness of them (Matt. xviii. 21). It is again mentioned, in a variety of passages (Isa. iv. 1, xi. 13, xxx. 26; Jer. xv. 9; Job v. 19; Matt. xii. 45, etc.), in a sense analogous to that of a “round number,” but with the additional idea of sufficiency and completeness. To this number also may be added the numerous instances in which persons or things are mentioned by sevens; tians generally during the apostolic period. It had no rival day in the Church until about the middle of the second century, when Sunday began to be observed as a festival day in honor of the resurrection, along with Wednesday, Friday, and numerous other festal days of the Latin Church, then beginning to drift upon the first great wave of its apostasy. This church made the sabbath day a fast-day, not without sinister motives looking to its suppression in favor of the festival Sunday; while the Greek or Eastern Church steadfastly observed it as a day of holy delight in the Lord. Controversy upon this subject began about the middle of the second century, and was kept up with a zealamounting to bitterness for several centuries. In the Western Church the seventh day continued to be observed quite generally till the fifth century, and traces of it were noticeable in some parts of Europe much later. In Scotland and Ireland, as well as in England, the seventh day was regarded and observed as the sabbath in the eleventh century and later. In Skene's Celtic Scotland, p. 356, vol. 2, there is this statement: "There is no want of the venera tion of Sunday, or the true doctrine of the Sabbath, as it was observed at the time of the apostles, though they held that Saturday was properly the sabbath, on which they abstained from work." In the Oriental or Greek branch of the church the seventh day continues to be observed to this day.

There is not wanting evidence that an unbroken chain of observers of the seventh day was preserved, in the face of distraction and persecution, all through the dark ages, and that they appeared in the dawn of the Protestant Reformation, and were represented in that movement by a number of its prominent actors.

In the Abyssinian, Armenian, and Nestorian churches the seventh day has not yet been supplanted by the first day of the week. Consult Geddes: History of the Church of Ethiopia, London, 1894; Gobat: Three Years in Abyssinia, London, 2d ed., 1847; Stanley: History of the Eastern Church, 1861.

As these sabbath-keepers were pressed by persecutions, they were compacted into several centres. Most prominent among these were societies in Bohemia, Transylvania, and Holland. From among these, under the lead of prominent and able dissenters from the Church of England, were gathered the "Sabbatarian Baptists" of England. This movement was accelerated as a re-action against the theory, that, while the Sinaitic sabbath law was still in force, the first day of the week had been put in place of the seventh day by divine authority. This theory was first set forth by Nicolas Bovd, in his Sabbathum ceteris et novi testamentis: or the true doctrine of the Sabbath, held and prac ticed of the Church of God, both before, and under the Law; and in the time of the Gospel, London, 1595, 2d ed. ("perused and enlarged"). 1606. See Neal, Harper ed., vol. i. p. 208.

During the English Reformation, several able and distinguished men came out of the Established Church, and took up the defence of the sabbath in the face of severe persecution, amounting, in a number of instances, to martyrdom, characterized by all the circumstances which had marked the dark ages. In 1630 Theophilus Brabourn wrote a able defence of the views of the Sabbata tarian Baptists; and he was followed by James Ockford, the Stennets, Robert Coruthwait, and others.

Out of such agitation, and from such elements, were the Seventh-Day Baptist churches of England organized during the latter part of the sixteenth century, and for part of the seventeenth. During that period eleven churches were formed in England. Three of these were in London.

The Mill-yard Church is still active, with a church-edifice, parsonage, and considerable money endowment. This church was gathered by John James, at a date not well settled, in consequence of loss of records by fire. This first pastor fell a victim to the wild spirit of intolerance abroad in the politico-ecclesiastical councils of England, and was by authoritative mandate dragged from his pulpit during sabbath service, imprisoned, and at length beheaded, drawn, and quartered, and his head was set upon a pole opposite his chapel. There are now two churches in England, two in Holland, and one (missionary church) in Shanghai, China.

II. Seventh-Day Baptist Churches in America.

In 1664 Stephen Mumford came from one of the English churches, and organized the first Seventh-Day Baptist Church in America, in Newport, R.I., in 1671. From this church others soon grew up, and were pushed out into Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, and farther west. Another centre was established, about 1700, near Philadelphia, Penn., by Rev. Abel Noble, a minister of large ability, from England Five churches were formed there, drawing largely for adherents from the Kelthian Baptists. From these, other churches were formed, in South Carolina, Georgia, and in the western part of Pennsylvania, and still farther west. A third centre was established at Piscata day, N.J., in 1705, where there is still a flourishing church. From these three radial points the churches have spread westward with the general tide of emigration, until there are now flourishing churches in no less than sixteen States, with an aggregate membership of about nine thousand.

Church Polity. — This is strictly congregational. The annual conference has simply the power of an advisory council, and is composed of two dele gates from each church, with an additional dele gate for every twenty-five members. There are five associations, which sustain the same relation to the churches composing them as the conference does to all the churches. The associations may be represented by delegates in the conference, but with no power to vote as association in that body.

Doctrines. — The Seventh-Day Baptists believe in the general doctrines of salvation held by the evangelical churches, and differ from the tenets of the Baptists generally only in regard to the sabbath.

They believe, and conscientiously regulate their practice accordingly, that the seventh day of the week is the sabbath of the Lord, and that this, at its institution in Eden, and promulgation as part of the Sinaitic code, was made binding upon all men in all times; that, in the nature of its rela tions to God and to man, it is irrepealable.

In the terms of its constitution and in the rea sons for its enactment it is inseparably connected with the seventh or last day of the week, as SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

that any attempt to connect the sabbath law and sabbath obligation with any one of the other days of the week is illogical; and in its tendency destructive of the whole sabbatic institution.

That the change of the day of the sabbath to Sunday has no warrant in the Scriptures, is only a human device brought about by such questionable and unjustifiable means as to give it no claim either to the respect or acceptance of Christendom.

That the only stay to the wave of no-sabbatism now sweeping from Europe to America is in the impregnable bulwark of the true sabbath of the Fourth Commandment.

Education and Publication. — The Seventh-Day Baptists have two flourishing institutions of college grade, — one at Milton, Wis.; the other at Alfred Centre, N. Y. This latter has a university charter, and is vigorously carrying on business, mechanical, and theological departments, in addition to the collegiate courses. Both sexes are admitted on equal terms to these colleges, and over seven hundred students were in attendance in them the last year.

The publishing-house of the denomination is also at Alfred Centre, from which, besides a large number of tracts and books, it issues its weekly organ, the Sabbath Recorder, an eight-page paper of good size, ably edited, and executed in the best style of the art. A monthly, The Outlook, has an issue of over fifty thousand copies; and a finely illustrated Sabbath-school paper, Our Sabbath Visitor, is issued weekly.

Missions. — For many years the denomination has had a mission in Shanghai, China, where it has accumulated considerable property, which it is now enlarging; and the mission force is to be enlarged at once by the addition of a female medical missionary.

General Reform. — Upon the questions of reform which have agitated the public mind, such as antislavery, temperance, religious liberty, sabbath-observance, etc., this people have always maintained a consistent and radical position, favorable to the reforms sought.

General Repute. — Baird, in his Religion in America (vol. ii. p. 86), says of them, "The population under their instruction and influence is reckoned at forty thousand. Their churches are widely scattered through the States, and altogether they are a very worthy people."

Arnold’s History of Rhode Island, vol. ii. p. 86, has the following: “The Rev. Mr. Price, missionary at Westerly, expresses his astonishment at the kind treatment he received at their hands, and that he found them most charitable and catholic, whom he thought to have found the most stiff and prejudiced.” With “charity for all, and malice towards none,” they claim their place and interest among other religious societies, nor do they find occasion to "spurn the badges their fathers have worn."

SEVERIANUS, Bishop of Gabala in Syria, was a friend of Chrysostom, and his representative in Constantinople during his absence in Asia Minor. But he used the opportunity to intrigue against Chrysostom, and was driven out of the city by the people, though afterwards recalled by his patroness, Eudoxia. He was reconciled with Chrysostom, but continued to intrigue against him. Six sermons of his are found in Montfaucon’s edition of the works of Chrysostom. In 1827 the Mekhitarists published in Venice some homilies by him.

SEVERINUS, St., the apostle of Noricum; b. in Italy in the beginning of the fifth century; d. at Favianna, a city on the Danube, near the present Pochlarn, Jan. 8, 432. After a journey to the East, where he adopted a life of the severest asceticism, he returned to the West to devote himself to missionary work. He first visited Pannonia, but then settled in Noricum, a province of the Roman Empire occupying the present Austria, Styria, Carniola, Carni, Tyrol, and parts of Bavaria. The country, which was inhabited by a Celtic tribe, was conquered by the sons of Augustus, Tiberius and Drusus, 13 B.C. Many new cities were founded, excellent roads were made, numerous castles with Roman garrisons were built, agriculture was improved, and commerce flourished. Through their commercial and military connections with Italy and Rome the inhabitants of Noricum early became acquainted with Christianity, and after the law of Theodosius the Great, which in 392 prohibited all Pagan idolatry within the boundaries of the empire, Christianity was in fact the recognized religion of the country. Thus it can hardly be considered so very heavy a task which St. Severinus undertook when he settled at Favianna. His life by Eugippeus, in Welsker, Op. Hist. et phil., Nuremb., 1672, in Act. Sanct., Jan. 8, [ed. by H. S. Sauppe, Berlin, 1873, 96 pp.], is full of tables. (See A. A. Sevierus: De mortibus boum (“On the death of the oxen”), or De virtute signi crucis domini (“On the virtue of the sign of the cross”), in which he tells us that the animals were saved from the plague by making a cross on their forehead.

SEVERINUS (Poë, 638–640), the successor of Honorius I. The Monothelite controversy was just raging, and caused him many difficulties. He condemned the Euchesis of the Emperor Heraclius, and thereby the whole Monothelite doctrine.

SEVERUS, the name of three persons. (1) The Rhetor, wrote in 386, on occasion of a fearful epidemic among the cattle, a Carmen bucolicum, generally called De mortibus boum (“On the death of the oxen”), or De virtute signi crucis domini (“On the virtue of the sign of the cross”), in which he tells us that the animals were saved from the plague by making a cross on their forehead. (2) Bishop of Mahon in the Island of Minorca, communicated in 418, by an encyclical letter, to the whole of Christendom that four hundred and fifty Jews had been converted and baptized on the intercession of Stephen, the first martyr, whose relics were deposited in the church of Mahon. The letter is found in Baronius: Ann. ad a. 418. (3) A Jacobite bishop of Egypt, who wrote in Arabic a history of the patriarchs of Alexandria, about 978.
SEVERUS, Alexander, b. at Arce, Oct. 1, 205; made Roman emperor March 11, 222; murdered at Mayence, March 19, 235. During his reign the Christians dared worship openly. He was a pan-thetic hero-worshipper, and had busts of Abraham and Christian in his private chapel, with those of Orpheus and others.

SEVERUS, Septimius, b. at Leptis in Africa, April 11, 146; d. at York, Feb. 4, 211; became Roman emperor after the assassination of Pertinax in 193. He was a just but somewhat sombre character, not destitute of true religious feeling, but a mystic easily captivated by the fantastic practices of the Pagan religions. He had Christian servants in his household, defended the Christian senators against the fury of the Pagan mob, and allowed his eldest son to converse freely with the boys of Christian families. But during his campaigns in the East a great change took place in his feelings towards the Christians. The reason is not known; but he issued laws, which,
by very severe penalties, prohibited conversions to Judaism and Christianity. From these laws the Pagan authorities took occasion to revive and even extend the former laws against the Christians, which, though not revoked, had fallen into obligation; and persecutions broke out, especially in Africa and some parts of Asia Minor. The Christians seem, however, generally to have been of the opinion that those persecutions were not really intended by the emperor. See TERTUL-LIAN: Apolog. 37.

SEVERUS, Sulpicius, b. 363 in Gaul; d. in Marselleys in 410; was a distinguished rhetorician, and successful as a lawyer, but adopted a monastic life after the death of his wife, in 392, and settled with a few companions in some secluded place in Aquitaine. He was a great admirer of St. Martin of Tours, whom he visited several times, and whose life he wrote. He also wrote a Historia secra, three dialogues on the monastic life, and some letters, which, however, are of no interest.
His collected works were edited by Hieronymus de Prata Verona, 1741, and reprinted in Gal-doff: Bibl. Patr., viii.

SEWALL, Samuel, jurist, b. at Bishopspoke,
1, 1730. He was graduated at Harvard, 1671; studied divinity, and preached for a while, until
by his marriage (Feb. 28, 1670) with Hannah Hull he got great wealth. He then turned his attention to law, was made judge (1692), and eventually (1718), chief justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. He at first shared in the popular delusion concerning witchcraft (1692), and concurred in the condemnations; but on Jan.
14, 1697, his minister, Rev. Samuel Willard, read
"a bill" before the congregation of the Old South Church, in which he acknowledged his own guilt, asked the pardon both of God and man, and deprecated the divine judgments for his sin. He contributed liberally to the spread of the gospel among the Indians, and in 1699 was chosen one of the first missionaries of the Church for the Propagation of the Gospel in New Eng-lend, and, soon after, their secretary and treasurer.
His sympathy for African slaves prompted him, in 1700 to publish a tract entitled The selling of Joseph, in which he advocated their rights; it being his opinion that "there could be no progres in gospelling "until slavery was abolished. His be-nevoleance and charity were great, and his house was a seat of hospitality."

He wrote Phenomena, etc., a description of the New Heaven, Boston, 1697, 3d ed., 1727; and Prospects touching the accomplishment of prophecies, Boston, 1713. His Diary (1674-1720) was published by the Massachusetts
Historical Society, 1878, 2 vols. See DRAKE:

SEWELL, William, Friend; b. at Amsterdam, 1650; d. about 1725. His father was a surgeon;
and he served his time as a weaver, yet acquired Greek, Latin, English, French, and High Dutch.
He is known as the author of Hist. van de Op-komste, Aanwas, en Voortgang der Christenen, bekend
by den naam van Quakers, ondermengd met de voornaamte Staatsgeschiedenis van dien tyd in Eng-

English, London, 1722, folio; 3d ed., 1795, 2 vols.; Philadelphia, 1855. One of his objects was to cor-correct the "misrepresentations" in GERARD CUS-ins, History Quakers, 1695-1704, 3 books.

SEXAGESIMA, "the sixtieth," means the sec-

Tuesday, as being about sixty days before Easter.

SEXTON, a contraction of "sacristan," a subor-

SFONDRA'I is the name of an Italian family of which several members have been intimately connected with the Church. — Francis Sfondrati,
b. at Cremona, 1498; d. there July 31, 1550. He studied law in the universities of Padua, Pavia, Bologna, Rome, and Turin, and was much used in diplomatic negotiations by Duke Francis Sforza and Charles V. After the death of his wife he entered the service of the Church, and was by Paul III. made Bishop of Cremona, and a cardinal. He acted as mediator between the Pope and the emperor at the occasion of the Augsburg Interim. — Nicholas Sfondrati, son of the preceeding, became Pope under the name of Gregory XIV.; which art. see. — Celestine Sfondrati, b. in Milan, 1649; d. in Rome, Sept. 4, 1696. He was educated in the abbey of St. Gall; taught theology, philosophy, and canon law in various places; and was elected prince-abbot of St. Gall in 1689, and made a cardinal in 1695. In the controversy between the papal see and the Gallican Church he wrote, in defence of the absolute supremacy of the Pope, Regale Sacerdotum (1684), Gallicia vindicata (1687, often reprinted), Legatio Marchiornis Lauradini (1688), etc. His Notus pre-destinationum, published in Rome, 1697, made a great sensation, as in many points it stood in open contradiction to the official system of doctrine recognized by the Church. The French bishops tried to have the book put on the Index, but did not succeed.

SHAKERS. See Deism, Insurrection.

SHAKERS. This appellation was given, in dersion, to a religious body calling themselves
"Believers in Christ's Second Appearing," because in their religious meetings, and under the inspirations of the Christ-spirit, they were sometimes led to shake, as a manifestation of hatred to the sins and elements of a wicked, worldly life. Perhaps the title is not inappropriate; as this people believe themselves to be the followers of Christ, the great shaker prophesied by Haggai (ii. 6, 7): "Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake . . . all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come." The embryotic origin of this sect is found in the Revivalists of Dunkirk and Vincennes, in the year 1747. Their first written covenant, as the manifestation of the second appearing of Christ in his glory; not of Jesus, but of the baptism that crowned and anointed Jesus the Christ in his first appearing.

Ann Lee and many of her followers received gifts pointing them to North America as the "land of Immanuel" and with wings, diseased by the prophet Isaiah (viii. 8). Accordingly, on May 19, 1774, Ann Lee and nine of her followers set sail for America, and landed in New York on the 6th of August following. One of this number, John Hocknell, purchased a lot in the wilderness of Niskayuna, about seven miles north-west of Albany, erected log buildings, and in 1776 Ann's little church gathered to this forest home. Three years thereafter, a remarkable revival of religion occurred at New Lebanon, Columbia County, N. Y.; and in 1780 many of those affected by this revival, and others from distant parts, visited Ann's little church, and embraced their testimony. Ann Lee died Sept. 8, 1784, aged forty-eight years. The Shakers' first house of worship was built at New Lebanon aforesaid in 1785. The first gathering into a community analogous to the primitive church took place in their first written covenant of a full consecration to God of life, services, and treasure, was signed by the members in 1795.

Organization and Economy.—Their societies are organized into families of both sexes and all ages, varying in numbers from a very few to a hundred and fifty or more. Their organization, formulas, and by-laws are anti-monastic, anti-Mormon, anti-Oneidan, anti-Nicolaian. Each sex, including those once married, occupy separate apartments. Both sexes congregate for meals and meetings at the same time, and in one and the same hall. At table, except small parties, each sex is grouped by itself; the same order in meetings. They kneel in prayer before, and in thanks after, each meal, also on retiring to rest, and rising in the morning.

Worship-Meetings are generally held three or four times per week. Worship consists in singing, in solo and harmony, hymns, anthems, and improvised songs, called "gift songs;" quick and slow marches, two abreast, in ranks and circles, sometimes timing with the hands to the measure, sometimes in solemn dances in ranks or circles, and occasionally interchangeably, but always each sex groupd by itself; also prayers, exhortations, and sermons by both sexes. Meetings are held for mental discipline, as reading and speaking; others, for learning new songs, and trainings in singing; also for social converse, called "Union Meetings."

Theology, Synopsis of.—1st, God, a spirit Being, a heavenly Father and heavenly Mother. 2d, Mediatorial intelligences reveal God's character and his truths to man. 3d, Jesus Christ was one of these; was not God, but the Son of God. 4th, By birth of Mary, Jesus was simply highly organized man. 5th, By baptism of the Christ-spirit he became the Christ. 6th, Of this Christ-spirit, not of Jesus, there was to be a second appearing. 7th, This was to be manifest in his glory—woman, the glory of man. 8th, In each of these dispensations its Church, while in union with and in obedience to the Christ-spirit, represents the Christ of that dispensation: the former, the Bridegroom; the latter, the Bride. 9th, The Head of Christ's church is neither man nor woman in the genitive sense, but the Christ-spirit, and, possessed of this, either man or woman may teach and lead. 10th, Thus Jesus Christ (Jesus baptized) is the Son of God par excellence, the "Elder Brother" (Paul) of other sons of God,—his true followers. In like manner we have daughters of God, females, baptized with the Christ-spirit, and, possessing the same endowments, orders of humanity,—the old, instituted by generation through Adam, the sowing dispensation; the new, instituted by regeneration through Christ, the reaping, harvesting of the world; virgin celibacy, its via vita; Christ, "the Lord from heaven," "the quickening Spirit in both male and female, its organic media; and, so far as light now revealed, those may run through for all time. 12th, Redeemed man and woman, by baptism of and in obedience to the Christ-spirit, constitute the subjects of the new creation, the heavenly kingdom of God. 13th, Reject vicarious atonement. "My reward is with me, to give to every man according as his own work shall be (Rev. xiii. 22)." 14th, Reject carnal resurrection. The Christian resurrection is of the soul, from death by sin, to a life of righteousness. 15th, The day of judgment comes to any soul, when such soul, by confession and repentance of sin, comes to the Christ-life; or, having an offer, refuses the Christ-life. "Of myself [as Jesus] I judge no man." "As I [Jesus Christ] hear, I judge; and my judgment is just" (John v. 30). 16th, Election to salvation is of man's free will, when offered. "Whosoever will, let him come and partake of the waters of life freely" (Rev. xxi. 17). Election, choice of instruments for some specific part of the work in God's vineyard, because of constituted fitness, is preferred by superiors in the order of Heaven's anointing and choosing. Thus Jesus says, "I have chosen you." 17th, Probation extends to the spirit-world. Thus only can God be just. 18th, Physical death is not the gate to heaven nor hell: heaven is opened by good deeds; hell, by deeds evil. 19th, Heaven and hell are states of the soul, the receiving and conduct of the words of judgment, according to the Christ tribunal. 20th, The end of the world has come to every soul who is born of the Christ-spirit. 21st, Old and New Testament scriptures, inspiration, revelation, eternal life of soul, the gospel-crown irizere, are the personal property of the community. Two or more of each sex also are appointed as a board of trustees, to hold in trust the legal tenure of real estate, and keep and manage the opposite sex allowed to work together alone, ride out, or walk out together alone; or hold lengthy conversations together alone. Short and necessary errands permitted. The opposite sexes, in all cases, room separately, both members of the commune, and visitors sojourning among them. All persons, both old and young, have single beds. Correspondence of Members, by letters, books, or papers, except business-letters by trustees and business-agents, is required to be open to the knowledge of the elders, and subject to their approbation. This is to prevent the intrusion of malfeasance, and the institution of cliques or private societies working against the community. Due regard is made to the feelings of novitiates. While in the communion of the saints all choose to dwell in the light, as God is light; and these compose that glorious galaxy of souls the reve-lator saw "standing on a sea of glass" (Rev. xv. 6). Nevertheless, espionage is rigorously discarded; and a liberal freedom of orderly and productive union and correspondence, both verbal and written, is encouraged and promoted. All good, moral, miscellaneous, religious, scientific, philosophic, historical, biographical, narrative, and literary books and periodicals are freely admitted.

SHALMANESER. (Heb. שָׁלָמָן; LXX. Σαλμαναζίρ, "Shalman, be gracious") was the name of several Assyrian kings, of whom only two are important for biblical his-theory.—Shalmaneser II. (reigned B.C. 860-825) is not mentioned in the Bible, but was a contemporary of Ahab and Jehu of Israel, and Ben-hadad II. and Hazael of Syria, all of whom are named in the numerous inscriptions. From these we learn that Shalmaneser defeated Ben-hadad II. (whom he calls Dad'-idri; i.e., Hadadezer) and about a dozen allied princes, at Karkar, between Halman (Jaleh-Aleppo) and Harnath, B.C. 854. Among these princes was "Ahab the Israelite;" and in the danger from Assyria, which was here realized we have one explanation of the "covenant" which Ahab made with Ben-hadad son of Omri." This designation of the king of Israel, who had destroyed the house of Omri, is one of the most striking tokens of the might of the most ancient Assyrian monarchs. Shalmaneser four distinct times,—B.C. 854 (see above), 850, 819, and 846. Hazael is mentioned as suffering defeat, B.C. 842, and as losing some towns, B.C. 850. Shalmaneser appears, however, at no time to have reached Samaria, nor did he succeed in capturing Damascus.

The dates above given are secured by the statements of the Annals of Shalmaneser compared with the Eponym Canon, or list of Assyrian officials who gave names to the years. This canon is absolutely fixed by the eclipse of the sun, which it mentions June 15, B.C. 763; and by the coin received chronology, according to which Ahab reigned B.C. 818-809; Jehu, B.C. 908-897; and Ben-hadad II., at least so far as we know, corresponding early. This is only another indication that the dates of the Hebrew kings as they now stand in the text of our Bibles are corrupt; the error in that part of the ninth century B.C. with which we are here concerned being, for the kings of Israel, something more than forty years. (Cf. TIGLATH-PILESER, and see, for various attempts to solve the difficulty wholly or in part, J. WELLENS: Jahrb. f. Deutsche Theol., 1875, pp. 607 sq.; M. DUNCKER: Hist. of Antiq. (Eng. trans., 1878-82), vol. ii. pp. 112 sq., 234, vol. iii. p. 16; J. OPPERT: Salomon et ses Successeurs, 1877; W. J. Breecher: Presbyterian Review, April, 1880; V. SCHRADER: Die Keilinschriften u. die Geschichtsforschung, 1878, pp. 299-356.) Shalmaneser IV., who reigned over Assyria B.C. 727-722, is twice mentioned in the Bible,—2 Kings xvii. 3-5, xviii. 9. The former passage tells us that Shalmaneser came up against Hoshea, king of Israel, and that Hoshea submitted to him, and gave him tribute; that Hoshea entered into conspiracy with So (better, Seveh, 3 Kings, Sabako), king of Egypt, as a punishment for which Shalmaneser bound him, and put him in prison; some interval doubtless occurred between the dates of verse 3 and those of verse 4. Finally, we are told that Shalmaneser "came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years." This took place, according to 2 Kings xviii. 9, in the seventh year of Hoshea's reign. Just before the fall of Samaria, Shalmaneser died, as we learn from the inscriptions of Sargon, his successor, who brought the siege to an end. (S. ROYCE: Whether his death was natural or violent, we do not know. The only inscriptions concerned with his reign are an inscribed weight and two Eponym lists, which give us hardly more than the dates of his reign. With the expedition against Samaria was, perhaps, connected that against Tyre, which Josephus (Antiq., IX. 14, 2) mentions on the authority of Manander. The hostilities against Tyre lasted five years, and cannot have been concluded before Shalmaneser's death. LIT.-E. Shammai, a Jewish rabbi of the first century B.C., who founded a school directly antithetical to that of Hillel; so that it became a proverb, 'Hillel loses what Shammai binds.' Nothing is known of him personally. See art. Scribes.

Sharp, Granville, English philanthropist, b. in Durham, 1794; d. in London, July 6, 1813. Disapproving of the slave trade and determined action relating to the American Colonies, he resigned (April, 1777) a position in the ordnance office, and devoted himself to study. Before this his course in befriending and successfully defending the negro slave Somerset from his master, who tried to regain him (but the Court of King's Bench declared that a slave could not be held in, or transported from, England), brought him into great notice, and determined his career. He thenceforth devoted himself to the overthrow of slavery and the slave-trade. He presided at the meeting which organized the Association for the Abolition of Negro Slavery (May 29, 1787). He was a good linguist and a pious man. See his biography by Prince Hoare (London, 1810); and bibliography in Allibone.

Sharp, James, a Scottish prelate; b. in the castle of Banff, May, 1618; assassinated on Magus Mair, near St. Andrews, May 30, 1679. He was educated at Aberdeen, and in 1640 was chosen to plead the Presbyterian cause before the Protector; in 1600 he represented the same party when Monk marched upon London, and in that capacity was sent over to Charles II. at Banff. He promoted the reorganization and preservation of "the government of the Church of Scotland, as it is settled by law, without violation." This, of course, was understood in the Presbyterian sense; but in 1661 the Scottish Parliament annulled all the Parliaments held since 1633, with all their proceedings, and thus totally abolished all the laws made in favor of the Presbyterian Church. The "Church of Scotland" thus became the old Episcopal Church; and Sharp, in Dec. 12, 1661, was in London consecrated Archbishop of St. Andrews. With the zeal of a convert he persecuted his former allies. He re-erected the Court of High Commission in 1664, which severely punished, some even with death, all those who in any way interfered with the prelatical designs, and executed nine persons after the king had required the persecutions to cease. For his perfidy and cruelty Sharp was thoroughly detested; yet the assassins who despatched him were really on the lookout for one of his underlings, Carmichael, and had no intention at first of killing him. See Hetherington, History of the Church of Scotland, pp. 205 sq., 290 sq.

SHARPE, Samuel, Unitarian layman; b. in London, March 8, 1799; d. there (Highbury) July 28, 1881. The last twenty years of his life were passed in retirement from business and assiduous study. Although he had not the advantage of a university education, but was from early life a London banker, he yet acquired much solid information upon recondite subjects. He early became interested in Egyptology, and published Egyptian Inscriptions (London, 1836-41, 7 vols.), History of Egypt from the Earliest Times till A. D. 640 (1846, 6th ed., 1876, 2 vols.). To biblical literature he contributed a translation of the New Testament from Griesbach's text with notes (1840, 5th ed., 1862), a revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Testament (1865, 3 vols.), and History of the Hebrew Nation and Literature (1869, 4th ed., 1892). These works, and others of less importance, abundantly attest the industry and learning of their author. See his biography by P. W. Clyden, London, 1883.

SH'BA. See ARABIA.

SH'CHE'M (shoulder), a town nineteen hundred and fifty feet above sea-level, thirty-four miles north of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 7), later in Samaria. It lies in the narrow valley between Mounts Ebal on the north, and Gerizim on the south; called also Sichem (Gen. xi. 6); Sychem (Acts vii. 16); Sychar (John iv. 5). It was destroyed in the Jewish war, but rebuilt, and, in honor of the Emperor Vespasian, called Flavia Neapolis (new city). Hence in early Christian times it was called Neapolis only, as in the Talmud. From this name comes its present name, Nablus or Nablusus. Shechem, under its various designations, is mentioned forty-eight times in the Bible, first in connection with Abraham, who halted there (Gen. xii. 6). There occurred the massacre of all its males by Simeon and Levi, in revenge for Shechem's insult to their sister Dinah (Gen. xxxiv.). There the Israelites solemnly erected the temple. Joseph was buried (Josh. xxiii.). Abimelech set up an independent kingdom there, but after three years was expelled, and the city was destroyed, and sown with salt (Judg. ix.). Jeroboam made the rebuilt city the capital of the northern kingdom (1 Kings xii. 1-25). After the captivity, Shechem became the centre of the Samaritan worship. There Jesus first definitely announced himself the Messiah (John iv. 5, 26). Nebuchadnezzar became the seat of a bishopric, and there Justin Martyr was born. It was captured by the Crusaders, and Baldwin II. held a great diet there (1120). It has repeatedly suffered from earthquakes, particularly in 1292 and 1833. It was destroyed by Ibrahim Pacha in 1834; but its natural advantages, being in the midst of a most fertile country, have always caused its speedy resurrection.

The present town numbers thirteen hundred inhabitants, among whom are a hundred and thirty Samaritans, six hundred Greek Christians, and a few Jews, Latins, and Protestants. It is abundantly supplied with water, there being no less than eighty springs and fountains in its immediate neighborhood, and presents a picture of great beauty. Its principal buildings are the great mosque Jami el-Kebir, which is the Church of St. John, built by the crusaders (1187), and the little Samaritan synagogue (Keniset es-Samireh) in which is the famous Samaritan Codex of the Pentateuch. Cf. art. "Shechem," in Smith's Dict. Bib.; Schaff's Bib. Dict.; "Sichem," Thiersh's Hand. d. bib. Alt., Badeker (Socin), 2d ed., p. 225.

SHECHINAH (residence, i.e., of God, his visible presence). This is the biblically Chaldean, but adopted into Christian common use from the later Jews. The idea is, however, found in the Bible expression "the glory of the Lord." This "glory," the Jews say, was wanting in the second temple.

SHEKEL. See Weights.

SHEM HAMMEPHORASH (Heb., peculiar name, i.e., Jehovah), a cabalistic word among the rabbinical Jews; the representative of a wonderful combination of twelve, forty-two, or seventy-two letters, whose pronunciation has astonishing results. Absurd stories are told by the rabbins respecting it,—how Moses spent forty days on Mount Sinai in learning it from the angel Saxael; how its right utterance would enable the speaker to create a world; how Jesus wrought his miracles by its use; how two letters of it inscribed on a tablet, and cast into the sea, raised the storm which destroyed the fleet of Charles V. (1542). See Baring-Gould: Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, p. 291.

SHE'OL, the Hebrew word (the equivalent of the Greek Hades) for the under-world, the place of the shades. It comes from a word meaning "to penetrate," "to go down deep;" hence Sheol is literally what is sunk deep, bent in. The Hebrews thought that the dead went down into deep fissures. See Hades, and Hebrew lexicon under "Hā'ē." became a preacher; was silenced for nonconformity by Laud, Dec. 16, 1630; employed as chaplain to Sir Richard Darly, Buttercrambe, Yorkshire, for a year; pastor at Heddon, Northumberland, another year; sailed for America, November, 1634, but was compelled by a storm to put back, had to hide himself lest he should be taken, but finally got off, July, 1635, and landed on Oct. 3 at Boston, and became minister to the church at Cambridge in February, 1636. He played a prominent part in the synod at Cambridge which ended the Antinomian controversy. He "was characterized by great humility, spirituality, soundness in the faith, and decision." In learning, piety, and spiritual insight he takes a first rank among Puritan divines; especially is he held in perpetual remembrance by that "rich fund of experimental and practical divinity," his treatise, The parable of the ten virgins opened and applied, first published by Jonathan Mitchell, from the author's notes, Boston, 1659, 2d ed., 1660; reprinted in London, 1695, in Aberdeen, 1838, and again, 1858, with biographical preface by James Foote. In all he is said to have written 382 books and pamphlets. Among them may be mentioned New Englands lamentation for Old Englands present errors and decisions, Boston, 1644, 2d ed., 1645; Certain select cases resolved, 1648; The clear sunshine of the Gospel breaking forth upon the Indians in New England, 1648; reprinted, New York, 1805; Theses sabatianae, 1649, 2d ed., 1655. A collective edition of his works, with memoir, was published, Boston, 1855, 3 vols. His Autobiography was published in Alexander Young's Chronicles of the First Planters of Massachusetts Bay, Boston, 1846. See Cotton Mather: Magnalia (ed. Hartford, 1855, vol. i. pp. 380 sqq.); Sprague: Annals, i. pp. 58-88; Allisone: Dictionary of Authors, s.v.; Dexter: Congregationalism, Appendix.

SHEPHERD, Thomas, b. 1665; d. at Booking in Essex, Jan. 29, 1739; a seceder from the Church of England; published sermons, and thirty Penitential Cries (1692), which were written in a year with John Mason's The Sinner, and with them reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1859.

SHEPHERD OF HERMAS. See HERMAS.

SHERLOCK. There are four literary divines by this name, who require different degrees of notice.— I. Richard Sherlock, b. at Oxton in Cheshire, 1613, and educated at Oxford and Dublin; became rector of Winwick; and d. in 1659. He fell into controversy with the Friends, and wrote an Answer to the Quakers objections to Ministers (1659), and the same year, Quakers wild objections answered.

The practical Christian (1673), by the same author, was valued by Wilson, bishop of Soder and Man, who enlarged and corrected and republished it in 1713. — II. William Sherlock, b. in London, about 1616; d. at Hampstead, June 19, 1707; educated at Cambridge University, where he went in 1637, and was successively rector of St. George's, Botolph Lane, London, prebendary of Cranbourne, bishop of Norwich, prebendary of Salisbury, and dean of Salisbury, and finally to London, 1748. He declined the archbishopric of Canterbury, and died in London, July 18, 1761. These rapid promotions could not but make a mark on his name, but his authorship is that which is most noticed by posterity. His principal works were, Discourses in the Temple Church, Discourses on Prophecy, and the Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus. This last, published in 1729, is the best known, and for a long time held a distinguished place in the literature of Christian evidence.— IV. Martin Sherlock, an Irish divine of no great reputation, wrote Counsel to a Young Poet (1772, in Italian). Horace Walpole said that his Italian was ten times worse than his French, in which language he published, the same year, Letters of an English Traveller.

SHI'NAR (Heb. "תִּנָּר"); LXX., Σουρής; almost certainly, Assyro-Babylonish Sumär, of Akkadian Shumerian origin, with the probable form, Šamgar). The name of a country or district, is found in the following passages of the Bible: Gen. x. 10, xi. 2, xiv. 1; Isa. xi. 11; Dan. i. 2; Zech. v. 11. In Gen. x. 10 it seems to be a general name for Babylonia; for it includes, besides...
Babylon, cities lying as far apart as Erech (Babyl., Uruk; modern Warka), lat. about 31° 40' N., and Accad (Agade, part of Sippars; see Sepharvaim), lat. about 33° 44' N. The same meaning is suitable for Gen. xi. 2, Isa. xi. 11, Dan. i. 2, Zech. v. 11. The language of Gen. xiv. 1, which speaks of Elasar (Larsa; modern Senkereh), in nearly the same latitude with Erech, but farther east, as if it were not in Shinar, admits of explanation. It may be that “Arioch, king of Elasar,” (Babyl., Eriyaku, king of Larsa?) was tributary to “Amraphel, king of Shinar,” in that case there is really no opposition here to what was said above.

In the form Sumér (Shumér) the name occurs very frequently in the Assyrian inscriptions, but is there applied to only a part of Babylonia. "Shumér and Akkad" is a frequent designation of the entire region extending between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris (occasionally overstepping these limits), from Mesopotamia to the Persian Gulf. "Akkad" was a name for the northern part of this region; "Shumér," probably, for the southern part. The northern boundary of Akkad is not exactly fixed with precision; but it probably lay at lat. 34° N., between the points where the Lower Zab and the Tigris flowed into the Tigris. Neither can we draw an exact line between Akkad and Shumér; but the inscriptions represent Erech as in Akkad, and Ur (modern Mugheir, probably Ur Casdim of Genesis), lat. about 30° 54' N., as outside of it. If, then, the Hebrews came from the district of Shumér, it is not strange that they should use this name in a general sense for Babylonia, especially in view of the wide sovereignty exercised by the kings of Shumér, which seems implied in Gen. xiv. 1. It is believed that Meluhha and Magon are other designations of Akkad and Shumér respectively.

The significance of these divisions dates from a time when both Shumér and Akkad were inhabited by a highly cultivated, non-Semitic people, to whom the Semitic Babylonians and Assyrians were indebted for the larger part of their civilization. These Semitic peoples have been confided to the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris. It was this people who invented the system of cuneiform characters: they had literature, art, and science. (Cf. Cuneiform Inscriptions.) It is quite likely that their earliest settlements were in Shumér: and Ur, Eridu, and the city which have been found at Tell loh, must have been centres of political and religious influence at a very ancient time; no dates, however, can be now given with confidence. It is certain that the later Babylonian tradition attributed a high antiquity (about B.C. 4000) to the Semitic civilization of Akkad, and the non-Semitic culture must have been much earlier than the Semitic; but it is not wise to repose full confidence in this tradition. See Sepharvaim.

The distinction between Akkad and Shumér appears to have been not merely geographical, but also linguistic: the language used in one had certain characteristics peculiar to Shumér, and to Akkad, and the non-Semitic culture must have been much earlier than the Semitic; but it is not wise to repose full confidence in this tradition. See Sepharvaim.

The comparative age of the normal language and the dialect is as far as is now known, comparatively small. It is still disputed, whether the name "Akkadian" belongs to the normal language, and "Shumerian" to the dialect, or the reverse; i.e., which of the two was the language of Northern Babylon, and which of Southern Babylonia. In favor of the view that the normal language was that of Akkad, and the dialect peculiar to Shumér, it is claimed, that, while the dialect is sometimes called émé-sal ("women's language") the reason for this name is in doubt, it is also called émé kú ("language of the master"); and, since "Land émé kú" is a name for Shumér, the desired inference is plain. Akkad is called, on the other hand, "Land émé lú" ("land of slaves' language"). It is further claimed that the name Shumér itself, and the name Kingé, another designation of the same district, show characteristics of the dialect; that Tintir and Kadingira, on the other hand, names of Babylon, which was in Northern Babylonia, belong by their form to the normal language; that one inscription which contains dialectic peculiarities bears the colophon "Tablet of Shumér;" another argument is drawn from the fact that many loan-words, borrowed from the normal language, being held that Semitic contact with the pre-Semitic civilization must have been chiefly in Akkad, etc. To these arguments it is replied, that the émé sal is identical, not with the émé kú, but with the émé lú, that the dialect belongs therefore to Akkad: that Shumér was a North Babylonian form of the normal Shumér, this latter lying at the foundation of the Hebrew יִשְׂרָאֵל, Shinar, and that Kingé is not a dialectic form at all; that Kadingira may have been pronounced Kadumira (dialectic form); and that Tintir, although the normal form, may simply indicate that people from Shumér founded the city, and is therefore consistent with the view that the normal language belonged to Shumér; that in the inscription with the colophon "Tablet of Shumér," the dialectic peculiarities occur only in citations, the body of the text being neither Akkadian nor Shumerian, but pure Semitic; and that many names of places mentioned in the texts of the dialect denote cities in Northern Babylonia, or Akkad, and that the converse, though the instances are fewer, is also true; i.e., that Shumerian cities are mentioned in texts of the normal language; that the sea (Persian Gulf) is mentioned frequently, and as something familiar, in the texts of the normal language; that texts of the old Shumerian king Guda, discovered at Tel loh, show no dialectic peculiarities; that the Hebrews coming from Ur (in Southern Babylonia) carried the name יִשְׂרָאֵל with them; this name corresponding to the normal, not the dialectic, form of the word (see above), etc. The problem cannot yet be regarded as fully solved: but the weight of evidence seems to press strongly in favor of this view; namely, that the normal language is entitled to the name Shumerian, and the dialect to the name Akkadian.

FRANCIS BROWN.

SHIN-SHIU, or "REFORMED" BUDDHISM, is claimed by its followers to have been established A.D. 381 in China, by Huwei-yuen, who established the worship of Buddha Amitabha ("the Eternal"), or Amitabha ("the Bud of Infinite Light"), the fourth of the five Dhyanis. It was called the "White Lotus School." Pupils were sent to India, where copies of the sacred texts, the dharani, were translated into Chinese. Three translations of the smaller, and twelve of the larger, Sukhavati-vyuha ("the Description of the Land of Bliss") were made, of which two of the former, and five of the latter, are in existence. Recently the original Sanscrit text of the sutra on which the religion of Amitabha is founded, and which was taken from India to China in the second century of our era, has been found in Japan. The cardinal doctrines of the sect are salvation by faith in the boundless Buddha, or Amita, and the hope of attaining bliss in the western paradise. The Chinese translations of Sukhavati-vyuha were known in Japan from 640 A.D.; but the Jodo-shinshu ("True Sect of the Pure Land") was not founded until 1173, at Kioto, by the priest Ho-nen, whose pupil Shinran still further developed the protestant features of the system. Shinran married, and thus set the example of revolt against priestly celibacy, made worship more attractive and sensuous, while translating the sacred books into the vernacular, making missionary journeys, and sending to India, who collected Sanscrit texts, and translated them into Japanese. Shinran, or "True Sect," is the most numerous, the most active, and perhaps the most enlightened, sect of modern Buddhism, and numbers in Japan alone ten million adherents, with its chief temple and "archbishop" at Kioto. Of two Japanese students of this sect, studying under Professor Max Muller at Oxford, one, Mr. Bunyiu Nanjio, has collated the ancient text recently discovered in Japan with the Sanscrit manuscripts of the Sukhavati-vyuha found in Europe, and compared with them the five authorized translations now in use, to discover which of these latter is the best. The publication of this original text of their sacred book, which has been likened to the issue of the Greek text of the New Testament by Erasmus, is the latest proof of their protestant principles. The sect is distinct by itself. By its corrupting or over-laying Shinó, several sects or systems now repudiated by pure Shintòists were formed, such as Riobu ("twofold," i.e., of Shinó and Buddhism mixed), Yuitzu (Buddhism with a Shinto basis), Déguchi (Shintó explained by the Chinese Book of Changes), and Suiga, a combination of Déguchi and the tenets of the Chinese rationalist Chu-hi, whose system of thought has, since the seventeenth century, prevailed among the educated classes in Japan. In the course of the late developments, we shall outline the characteristics of pure Shinto, which is interesting as a "natural religion in a very early stage of development, which perhaps originated quite independently of any natural religion known to us;" that is, "neither by revelation, nor by introduction from without." The native term Kami no mikki ("way or doctrine of the gods") is rendered by two Chinese characters, Shin ("god") and to ("way"), equivalent to θεός-Λόγος. Its scriptures are the Kojiki ("Record of Antiquities"), a collection of oral traditions reduced to writing A.D. 712, in pure Japanese, uncurred by any but native ideas; the Nihongi ("Chronicles of Japan"), composed 720 A.D., containing, in the main, similar narratives to those in the Kojiki, but cast in the mould of Chinese philosophical thought and expression; and the Engishiki ("Book of Ceremonial Law"), promulgated in A.D. 927, in which are found many of the dreams and visions, by tasting of the fountain. The Buddhism of Shinó Muni does not, however, acknowledge or know of this Amida Buddha, nor is it heard of in Burmah or Siam. Rhys Davids (Buddhism, p. 206) speaks of Amida as the fourth of these hypothetical beings, the creations of a sickly scholasticism, hollow abstractions without life or reality." Dr. E. J. Eitel (Religion in China, p. 153), after showing how the doctrine of Nirvana failed to satisfy the cravings of humanity, says, "It was to satisfy this want that the fiction of the 'Boundless Land in the West' was framed. A Buddha was imagined distinct from the Buddha of history, Gautama, or Shakymuni. He was called Amitaba, 'boundless age.'" See BUDDHISM.

SHINTO (Sintoism) is the cult of the primitive Japanese. Japan is now classified among Buddhists countries; since the vast majority of her thirty-three millions of people worship according to the doctrines, greatly modified, of Shakya Muni. (See SHIN-SHIU.) Since 552 A.D., when the first images and sutras were imported from Corea by missionaries of the India faith, Buddhism has been steadily propagated in Japan. Conquest was not made in a day or century, but it required fully a thousand years to convert the Japanese from their indigenous faith. Nor was the victory secured by overthrow or extermination of the primitive belief, but rather by absorption of it. This will account partly for the fact that Japanese Buddhism, so different from that of Siam or China, is distinct by itself. By its corrupting or over-laying Shinto, several sects or systems now repudiated by pure Shintóists were formed, such as Riobu ("twofold," i.e., of Shinto and Buddhism mixed), Yuitzu (Buddhism with a Shinto basis), Déguchi (Shinto explained by the Chinese Book of Changes), and Suiga, a combination of Déguchi and the tenets of the Chinese rationalist Chu-hi, whose system of thought has, since the seventeenth century, prevailed among the educated classes in Japan. ward populated it. "Of old, when heaven and earth were not yet separated, chaos, enveloping all things like a fowl's egg, contained within it a germ. The clear and ethereal substance, expanding, became heaven: the heavy and thick, precipitating, became earth. Subsequently deity was born. The first kami sprouted upward like a rush. After successive evolution of several pairs of gods in imperfection, sex or differentiation was reached by the perfect manifestation of the creative principle in Izanagi and Izanami, who proceeded to make and furnish the earth. Standing in the floating region of heaven, Izanagi plunged his jewelled spear into the plain of the green sea beneath, and, stirring it round, withdrew the point, from which the drops, trickling, consolidated, and formed an island, to which the creator and creatrix descended to make other islands, and populate and furnish them with kami (gods), rocks, trees, songs, together, and animals. Gradually the earth and sun separated; though, before they did so, the brilliant daughter of the first pair ascended to reign over the luminary of day, while a less fortunate son became ruler of the moon. Japanese mythology is full of the adventures of Izanagi and Izanami, not only on earth, but in the nether world. With the reign of Amatérasti, the sun-goddess in heaven, a new epoch begins. This heaven-illuminator, dissatisfied with the anarchy that reigned among the earthly kami, or gods, sent her agents to earth to restore order, and abolish feuds. None was able to do this work, until she despatched her grandson, Ninigi no Mikoto, who descended to the earth; and, after a series of violent struggles between the heavenly and the earthly powers, the grandson of Ninigi no Mikoto established his throne near Kiotó, and became the first emperor of Japan. The mikado is thus the personal centre of Shinto, and the vicar of the heavenly gods on earth, the pope, who claims both spiritual and temporal power over his subjects. In the primitive government of Japan the Jin-gi Kuan, or Council of the Gods of Heaven and Earth, was the highest legislative body; next to this, the Chieftain and his kin, selecting one of the "heavenly gods," made him, as their ancestor, their tutelary deity, and erected a shrine to his honor. A remarkable fact in Shinto is that the mikado, dressed so as to do vicarious duty for his clothes, were cast into the river, which was supposed to deposit the offences in the nether world beneath the sea. "And when they have thus been got rid of, there shall from this day onwards be no offence that is called offence with regard to the men of the offices who serve in the court of the Sovran, nor in the four quarters of the region under heaven." All offices were divided into "earthly" and "heavenly," — a division which is based either on mythical incident, according to which the wicked brother of the sun-goddess committed a series of destructive and defiling tricks upon his sister and her companions, houseloom, and rice-fields, or, as a writer (Ernest Satow) in the Westminster Review suggests, upon the division of the early inhabitants of Japan into agriculturists (the invaders or conquerors) and their ancestors, the aborigines whom they conquered. In Shinto, as in the scriptures, the earth is Japan, and the mikado's palace the most sacred of all places. The nobility claim their descent from inferior deities; the mikado, directly from the sun-goddesses. The common people are the progeny of the earthly kami, though all claim Izanagi and Izanami as their creators.

In its essence, Shintó is ancestor-worship. In the earlier mythology the kami seem to be but the deified forces of nature, but the later traditions and the liturgy show that the gods addressed are hero-ancestors. After the division of the country by its first conquerors into feudal divisions, the chieftain and his kin, selecting one of the "heavenly gods," made him, as their ancestor, their tutelary deity, and erected a shrine to his honor. A remarkable fact in Shinto is that the mikado, or temples, are austerely simple, containing no idols, religious or sacred objects, no paintings, gilding, symbols, or any thing sensuous, except the temporary offerings, or their permanent substitute, the gohe, which are strips of notched paper suspended from unpainted wands; nor can this absence of effigies of the gods worshipped be explained by the rudimentary condition of art in early Japan, since figures, in terra cotta or carved wood, of men, horses, and birds, were known and employed in the interment of the dead, — a merciful substitute for the human beings anciently buried alive with their departed master. Living animals were dedicated to the gods, but they were not slaughtered. In front of the shrine was the bird-rest (torii), on which the cocks perched to give notice of dawn and the time for morning-prayers. This "sacred gateway," now so called, is still a striking feature in the landscape of Japan. Prayers were offered for protection, health, freedom from evil, for offspring, and for harvests; and thanksgivings were especially profuse at festival time, when offerings of silk, cloth, rice, weapons, horses, and equipments, were made. The root-idea of sin was pollution, and, of righteousness, purity. Actions were good or bad according as they were concerned with purification or defilement. Lustrations, vegetables, were frequent; and twice a year the festival of general purification took place, both at the imperial palace and at each one of the chief local shrines. Polluted persons were washed in the waters of running streams, and their clothing was destroyed. Later, paper figures representing the people, and an iron image of the mikado, dressed so as to do vicarious duty for his clothes, were cast into the river, which was supposed to deposit the offences in the nether world beneath the sea. "And when they have thus been got rid of, there shall from this day onwards be no offence that is called offence with regard to the men of the offices who serve in the court of the Sovran, nor in the four quarters of the region under heaven." All offences were divided into "earthly" and "heavenly," — a division which is based either on mythical incident, according to which the wicked brother of the sun-goddess committed a series of destructive and defiling tricks upon his sister and her companions, house, looms, and rice-fields, or, as a writer (Ernest Satow) in the Westminster Review suggests, upon the division of the early inhabitants of Japan into agriculturists (the invaders or conquerors) and their ancestors, the aborigines whom they conquered. sensuous ritual of Buddhism, by their overwhelming superiority, paralysed all further growth of the original cultus: still there might have been a re-action, and the old faith have re-asserted its power, had not an Euhemerus appeared, who resolved Japanese mythology into Buddhist history. A learned priest named Kukai (A.D. 774–835), called Kôbô Daishi, who professed to have received a revelation from the gods at the Mecca of Shintôism at Ise, promulgated a scheme of reconciliation, according to which the chief deities of Shintô were avatars, or manifestations of Buddha to Japan prior to his perfect incarnation in India. All the legends, dogmas, cosmogony, and traditions of the primitive cult were explained according to Buddhist ideas; and the old native gods, baptized with Buddhist names, were henceforth worshipped according to the new and more sensuous ritual. Under this new teaching, Shintô as it was sunk out of popular sight, and its remembrance was centred in scholarly circles. After the long wars of the middle ages, and the establishment of profound peace by Iyeyasu and the Tokugawa rulers, a school of writers arose in the eighteenth century whose enthusiasm led them to recover, decipher, and edit the scriptures of Shintô, and to enrich the native literature by a very creditable body of antiquarian and polemical writings, which helped greatly to prepare the way for the revolutions of 1868 and later, which have so surprised the world. Yet after the restoration of monarchy in Tôkô, and the temporary revival of Shintô as manifested in propaganda, and purging of some old temples, the Jîn-gi kuan, instead of being restored to ancient power, was degraded to a department, and finally abolished. The shrines and priests (of the latter, in 1880, 14,215) are now maintained partly by government appropriations, and partly by popular subscriptions. Shintô is still a living power among millions of the people, who oppose Christianity with patriotic animus rather than with martyr's convictions. It is also the source of occasional polemic literature. Japanese Christians, in whom the sense of patriotism is very strong, hold to the narratives of the Kojiki in a rationalizing way, explaining them as the product of primitive superstition, or decay, or according to similar reasoning. Mr. Takahashi Gorô, a Christian writer, in his Ōshû Dôshû Discussed Arefh, follows this plan. Two English scholars, Mr. Ernest Satow and Mr. Basil Hall Chamberlain (to whose labours the writer of this article is greatly indebted), are now engaged in translating portions of the original literature of Shintô, as seen below.

SHIRLEY, Hon. Walter, b. 1725; d. 1786; was rector of Loughrea in Ireland, and cousin of Lady Huntingdon, whose celebrated Collection of Hymns he revised in 1774, inserting six of his own, which were above the standard of that time in elegance, and have often been copied. He also published two poems, Liberty and The Judgment (1781), and some sermons.

SHOWBREAD is the rendering of the Hebrew lechem hap-panim (lit., "bread of the face," because placed before the face of Jehovah); it is also called "bread of the orderings" (1 Chron. ix. 32, xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. xiii. 11; Neh. x. 33); once it is called the "continual bread" (Num. iv. 7), and "holy bread" (1 Sam. xxi. 5). According to the number of the twelve tribes of Israel, twelve loaves were placed on the table, which stood within the holy place, near the curtain of the Holy of holies. The loaves, which, according to Jewish tradition, were unleavened, were placed in two rows, of six loaves each. An addition to the showbread was the frankincense (Lev. xxiv. 7). It was to be "on the bread for a memorial, an offering, made by fire unto the Lord;" the two golden pots containing it being (according to Josephus: Ant. III. 10, 7) taken out along with the bread, and the frankincense burned on the altar of burnt offering before the bread was given to the priests to be eaten. On each sabbath this place took; twelve new loaves, which had been prepared the evening before, was then added to the old ones (1 Chron. ix. 32), being made every returning sabbath to replace the old, and fresh frankincense put in the golden vessels in the room of that which had been burned (Lev. xxiv. 8, 9).

The signification of the showbread is expressed in the words "from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant:" they are a sign of covenant made by Israel,—a sign whereby they continually prove their connection with the Lord. The loaves are a symbol and type of the spiritual bread, which the people of God presents as a visible, practical proof before the Lord, an emblem of Israel's spiritual blessing in that kingdom of God. That the priests alone were permitted to eat them, and this only within the sanctuary, would indicate, Be diligent in good works, and you shall live in the house of God as a priestly people, and shall receive from his communion such spiritual blessing as the frankincense which was burned on the altar of burnt offering before the bread was eaten was an offering made unto the Lord, whereby Israel was symbolically reminded, and at the same time con-
SHOWBREAD.

According to the description given in Exod. xxv. 29-30 this table was two cubits long, a cubit in breadth, and a cubit and a half in height, made of shittim-wood, overlaid with pure gold, and having a golden crown to the border thereof round about. This table, which is called "the table of the face" (Num. iv. 7) and "the pure table" (Lev. xxiv. 6; 2 Chron. xiii. 11), stood on the north side of the sanctuary, and was adorned with dishes, spoons, bowls, etc., which were of pure gold (Exod. xxv. 29). When it was transported, it was covered, with every thing that was thereon, with a cloth of blue (Num. iv. 7). In 2 Chron. iv. 10 we have mention of "the tables wherein the showbread was set," and at verse 5 we read of Solomon making ten tables. This is probably explained by the statement of Josephus (Ant., VIII. 3, 7), that the king made a number of tables, and one great golden one on which they placed the showbread. The table of the second temple is mentioned by Antiochus Euphrates (1 Mac. i. 22), and a golden one (1 Mac. iv. 49). Since the table was made only for the person, shrines were often made of the most splendid and costly materials, and enriched with jewels. The movable shrines were carried in religious processions, were kept behind and above the altar; and before and around them lamps were burning.

SHRINE (Lat., scrinium, a case for keeping books, etc.), a repository for relics, whether fixed, such as a tomb, or movable. The term is also sometimes applied to the tomb of an uncannized person. Shrines were often made of the most splendid and costly materials, and enriched with jewels. The movable shrines were carried in religious processions, were kept behind and above the altar; and before and around them lamps were burning.

SHRIVE, to confess sin: hence Shrove-tide, the time immediately before Lent, when it was customary to confess as a preparation for the forty days' fast; and Shrove-Tuesday, the day before Ash-Wednesday, which was spent merry-making, and so, in England, came to be called "Pancake-Tuesday," from the fritters and pancakes eaten on that day.

SHRUBB, William, b. at Sheerness, Kent, Nov. 21, 1759; d. at Highbury, Aug. 25, 1822; a devout and active layman; was an officer of the Bank of England, of the London Missionary Society, and of the Religious Tract Society. He wrote two much used missionary hymns (1785), and that beginning "When streaming from the eastern skies" (1810), often attributed to Sir Robert Grant.

SHUCKFORD, Samuel, D.D., Church of England; d. in London, July 14, 1754. He was graduated M.A. at Caius College, Cambridge (1720); was successively curate of Shelton, Norfolk, prebendary of Canterbury (1738), and rector of All-hallows, Lombard Street, London. He is the author of the famous Connection, intended to supplement Prideaux's work, but only finished to the death of Joshua. The full title is, The sacred and profane history of the world connected from the creation of the world to the dissolution of the Assyrian Empire at the death of Sardanapalus, and to the decline of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel under the reigns of Ahaz and Pekah, London, 1727, 4 vols., 3d ed., 1743; rev. ed. by J. Talboys Wheeler, 1838; 2 vols., 2d ed., 1865.

SHU'SHAN (Heb., שׁוֹשָׁנָה; LXX., Σοῦσάν, accus., Σουςάν, gen. and dat., Σούσαν, Σούσαν; Elamit., Σουδάν; Assy., Susân, etymology unknown), generally known as Susa, the capital of Elam or Susiana, is mentioned in the Bible as follows: Neh. i. 1; Esth. i. 2, 5, ii. 3, 5, 8, iii. 15 (l.), iv. 16, viii. 14, 15, ix. 0, 11-15, 18; Dan. viii. 2; cf. "Shushanchites," i.e., "men of Shushan" (Est. iv. 9). It was situated on the river Eulaeus (so Dan. viii. 2, and Assyrian inscriptions and sculptures), which formerly emptied into the Persian Gulf, and must, at all events in its lower part, have been identical with the Pasitigris and the modern river Kurân. The ruins of the ancient city are found in the mounds of Shush, lat. about 32°10' N.; long. about 49° 48' E. from Greenwich; but these mounds lie forty miles distant from the present course of the Kurân at its nearest point, and this might at first sight seem to favor the statement of some classical writers, that Susa was on (or near) the Chosapes (modem Kurân), which flows to the west of Shush. Loftus, however, who visited the spot, was told that the Kerkhâ was once connected with the Kurân, and found the ancient river-bed, through which the water must have flowed, about two miles east of Shush. It is, then, quite possible that this was regarded as the Eulaeus, which in its lower part was certainly the same with the Kurân, and which, it is thus natural to suppose, may sometimes in its upper part have passed under the name of the Chosapes. Elam was repeatedly invaded by the Assyrarians in their campaigns; but Susa is not mentioned until the time of Assurbanipal (9th century B.C.), and of the Assyrian king (B.C. 688-629), who captured it about B.C. 655. After the fall of Assyria and Babylon, and the accession of the Achemenidans, Susa became the winter and spring residence of these monarchs, and was greatly improved and adorned by them. According to the Book of Esther, there were great numbers of Jews in it. Alexander found great wealth there, and even after his time it preserved a reputation for riches. Under the Parthian Arsacide (B.C. 250-A.D. 226) it continued to be a chief city, but thereafter declined; and after its capture by the Mohammedans, A.D. 640, it is heard of only from time to time, e.g., in the eighth and twelfth centuries. Its site has been even yet but very imperfectly explored, owing to the extreme difficulties which attend excavations, arising in large part from the bigotry and fierceness of the present inhabitants of the region.

SIBYLLINE BOOKS.

1835. He was successively student and fellow of St. John's College, and lecturer of Trinity Church, Cambridge; preacher of Gray's Inn, London, 1618-25; master of Catharine Hall, Cambridge. His best-known works are The bruised reed (to which Baxter attributed his conversion) and The soul's conflict (1638). He wrote, also, The returning backslider, or a commentary upon Hosea xiv. (1643), and wrote the exposition upon the first chapter of second Corinthians (ed. by T. Manton, 1655). See his Complete Works, with memoir by A. B. Grosart, Edinb., 1862, 7 vols.

SIBEL, Caspar, b. near Elberfeld, June 9, 1560; d. at Deventer, Jan. 1, 1638. He was educated at Herborn; studied theology at Leyden; and was appointed pastor at Randerath in 1609, at Juliers in 1611, and at Deventer in 1617. He was a very prolific writer, and left a number of sermons, homilies, catechetical and devotional works, besides an autobiography (unfinished). Of his Opera Theologica, a collected edition appeared at Deventer in 1644, and another in folio at Deventer in 1650.

SIBYLLINE BOOKS. The sibyl is "the half divine prophetess of the arrangements and decisions of the gods in reference to the fate of cities and countries" (Lücke: Versuch einer vollständ Einleitung in die Offenb. Joh., 1852, pp. 40 sqq.). Etymologically it is probably the same as ἰδώρια, the Eclectic form for ἰδώρια, Hieronymus (Adv. Jos. i. 14) derives it from ἰδώρια. Earlier classical writers recognize but one sibyl, who was first localized at Erythrae, or Cumae: later many sibyls are spoken of. (Cf. Suidas' Lexicon, s. v., and the classical dictionaries, especially Lübker, 6th ed., p. 327.) The idea thus originated among the heathens. When, after the conquests of Alexander, the period of religious syncretism was introduced, and the Jews of the dispersion became acquainted with the pseudo-prophets of the Gentiles, they made use of her influence to make their peculiarities of religion and life palatable to the Greeks. Still more did the early Christians endeavor to make propaganda of their views in this manner; so that there were Gentile, Jewish, and Christian sibylline oracles. In the earlier centuries they enjoyed a high authority in the church, being quoted as evidences of the truth of Christianity by such apologists as Athenagoras, Justinus, Theophilus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and especially Lactantius. (Cf. Besançon: De l'emploi que les Peres de l'église ont fait des oracles sibyllins, Paris, 1851.) These different oracles, as many as have been preserved, originating at different places, in different times, and by authors of various tendencies, are now united in twelve books and some fragments, written in Homeric hexameters and language. In former times but eight books were known, which were published first by Xystus Betuoljus, Basal, 1485. Angelo Mai in 1817 discovered the twelfth book, and in 1828 the ninth to twelfth books. C. Alexandre (1841-50) published the first complete edition in Paris (2d ed., 1867), and Friedlieb, in 1852, published a critical edition, together with a metrical translation into German. The contents are most varied. After two fragments of a general character, book i. (298 lines) contains three sections of prophecies concerning the good and the evil; book ii. (190 lines), prophecies of various kinds and the tenth generation; book v. (531 lines), the fate of various nations and the better future for the Jews; book vi. (25 lines), Christian prophecy concerning the Messiah; book vii. (102 lines), the Messiah and his time; book viii. (501 lines), prophecies concerning the destruction of Rome and its lands at the final consummation, together with messianic predictions; book ix. (324 lines), address to all the nations, and predictions; book x. (298 lines), the Latin race and its fate; book xi. (173 lines), the fate of different nations in the east and west; book xii. (360 lines), admonitions and prophecies, closing with the glory of Israel. In a collection of this sort, naturally no unanimity as to author, date, country, object, etc., of the various parts, can be expected among the investigators; and in reality, but a small portion has been thoroughly examined. The most searching work in this respect was done by Bleek in his articles Uber die Entstehung und Zusammensetzung der uns in 8 Büchern erhaltenen Sammlung Sibyllinischer Orakel (Theol. Zeitschrift, herausg. von Schleiermacher, de Wette, u. Lücke, vol. i., 1819, pp. 190-246, vol. ii., 1820, pp. 172-239), and his conclusions have found general acceptance among scholars. The prophecies which we have here collected into one volume extend over a period of from five to six centuries. The majority of the books are of little or no importance historically. Religiously, however, as the index to a certain train of thought and spirit in certain times and places, they are not only interesting, but also instructive. The following results can be regarded as safe: book iii. (97-507) is the production of an Alexandrian Jew in the Maccabean period (170-160 B.C.), combined with two older poems of heathen origin (97-161, 438-488) and later Christian interpolations (86-92), and dates from the second triumvirate (40-30 B.C.). All the other books, with the exception of the fifth, which is yet sub judice, are of Christian origin. The third book is in every way the most important, and in it three sections can be traced (97-294, 295-488, 489-507). The first section, after an historical survey from Cronus to the Romans, begins with 161 to prophesy, that, after the seventh king of Hellenistic origin shall have ruled over Egypt, then the people of God will again come into power, and the evil nations of the earth will be destroyed. The second section pronounces a judgment on all nations who directly or indirectly have stood in opposition to the Israelites. The third section predicts the final judgment, and finishes with the promise of a messianic kingdom and glory. The statement about the seventh king, as well as the epithet στηθίστημι ("republican") and τεφθαίνει ("the monstrous being, as was seen, pre-Christian and of Jewish origin, are really the only ones of special value in the whole collection. As the Sibylla of 296 refers to Cyrus, and the σῶν θεός of 775 should be ἠρώτθη θεός (cf. Schürer: N. T. Zitateh., p. 567), these two passages are not messianic. But the whole section (623-739) is messianic. God will send a king from the rising of the sun (ἀπὸ γῆς), who will put an end to all war on earth. The Gentile rulers will rise up against him and the realm, but they will be destroyed around Jerusalem. God will then establish an eternal kingdom over all nations. Peace will reign over the whole earth, and the laws of God will be recognized and obeyed everywhere. The main stress lies on the establishment of this everlasting kingdom, the person of the Messiah as the medium of its establishment being of minor importance. The later and younger section (lines 36-72) finds its historical background in the career of Anthony and Cleopatra in Egypt. Vv. 40-50 read, "But when Rome will rule also over Egypt, then the greatest of kings, that of the immortal King, will appear among men, and there will come a holy king (ἅγιος βασιλεύς), who will rule all the lands of the earth for all times as long as time continues." This king is naturally God or the Messiah. Cf., in addition to the works mentioned, Hilgenfeld: Die jüd. Apokalypse in ihrer geschichtl. Entwicklung, 1857, pp. 51-90; Ztschrift f. wiss. SICARI (assassins), a set of Jewish fanatics which did much to hasten the war which terminated so disastrously, and on the downfall of Masada went to Egypt, where they continued to resist the Roman power (Josephus: Antiq., XX. 8, 5, 6; Hist. H. VII. 10, 1). See Judas of Galilee, Zealot.

SICKINGEN, Franz von, b. in the castle of Ebernburg, near Kreuznach, May 1, 1481; d. in the castle of Landstuhl, near Zweibrücken, May 7, 1523; one of the heroes of feudalism, always at war with the powerful and arrogant, always defending the suppressed and meek, but specially famous for the great services he rendered to the Reformation. He enjoyed the confidence of Maximilian, and, in the beginning also, that of Charles V.; but in 1522, when he attacked the Archbishop of Treves, he openly declared in favor of the Lutherans. The undertaking proved too great for his means; and he was, in his turn, besieged in his own castle by the archbishop, and compelled to surrender the day before his death. Reuchlin, Ulrich von Hutten, Butzer, Eccampaicus, and numerous others, found at various times a refuge at Ebernburg; and his castles were justly styled the "Asyl of the Protestants." His life was written by F. Münch, Stuttgart, 1827, 2 vols.

SIDNEY, Sir Philip, b. at Penshurst in Kent, Nov. 9, 1554; d. at Arnhem in the Netherlands, Oct. 7, 1580; was educated at Shrewsbury, Oxford, and Cambriage; went abroad in 1572, and narrowly escaped the Massacre of St. Bartholomew; became a courtier and diplomatist; was married and knighted, 1583; wished to join Drake's second expedition in 1585, but was forbidden by Elizabeth, who feared to lose the jewel of her court. The news of the engagement of Flushing, and general of horse; and was mortally wounded at Zutphen, Sept. 22, 1586, marking the event by an illustrious act of humane magnanimity. This model gentleman did not omit religion from the list of his accomplishments, as may be seen by his noble sonnet, "Leave me, O love which reachest but to dust," and by the version of Psalms made in conjunction with his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. His poetic talent, if not lofty, was more than respectable. His Works appeared in 3 vols., 1728, 1739, etc. His Poems were edited by Mr. Grosart in 1875. His Arcadia and Defence of Poesie, once popular, are still famous.

SIDONIUS, Michael, b. at Essingen in Baden, 1506; d. in Vienna, Sept. 30, 1591. He studied theology at Tübingen, entered the service of the Archbishop of Mayence, and was by Paul I. made bishop of Sidon in partibus infidelium, whence his surname Sidonius: his family name was Hedin. He represented for some time the Archbishop of Mayence at the Council of Trent, and the emperor in the negotiations of Ulm. By the latter he was made bishop of Mainz in 1550, and in the colloquy of Worms (1557) he took a prominent part. He was very active, though without exercising any influence, and the mediating position he tried to occupy between Romanism and the Reformation he had not strength enough to vindicate. He wrote the Catechismus Magnutinianus.

SIENA, Council of. The Council of Constance ended in a general confession of incompetence to deal with the question of the reformation of the church. It strove to keep the matter open, by providing for the recurrence of general councils, and fixed Padua for the meeting-place of the next, where it would be nearer Rome, and more under the Pope's influence. On July 2, 1423, the council assembled at Siena. It was scantily attended; for European politics were disturbed, and few hoped that any thing would be done by a council held in Italy. The council began by a contest with Martin V. about the wording of his safe conduct, and negotiated with the citizens for greater security. Martin V. complained of this conduct as seditious, and the Papal party used personal pressure to intimidate the Reformers. The council agreed in condemning the heresies of Wiclif and Hus, and approving of negotiations for union with the Greek Church. The French then pressed for a consideration of the reforms projected at Constance. The Papal party took advantage of the small numbers present to throw the machinery of the council, which was organized by nations, into confusion. They contrived to have a disputed election to the office of president in the French nation, and urged the appointment of deputies to Amalie, a distinguished philanthropist of noble birth; was b. in Hamburg, July 26, 1794; d. in Hamburg, April 1, 1859. Left an orphan at an early age, she took up her home with an elder relative, and began at a tender age works of charity, by instructing a girl living in the house. From this beginning there grew a school, which enjoyed an enviable reputation in Hamburg. Her mind was deeply interested in the organization of a Protestant sisterhood, but was diverted from the realization of her plans, for a time, by the aversion of her relative. At the outbreak of the cholera in 1833 she offered her services to the hospital at Hamburg, and remained in attendance upon the sick for eight weeks, when the plague had abated, winning for herself general esteem by her courage and devotion. The year following, 1832, she realized her design, and formed the female society for the care of the sick and the poor. The society grew rapidly, and became the mother-institution of similar organizations in other parts of Germany. A careful record was kept of each case: those with whom poverty was a chronic disease were not aided. Money was never distributed: orders on the butcher, grocer, etc., were given instead. While the primary object of the society was to alleviate physical ills, it did not overlook the needs of the soul. See Emckündigkeiten aus d. Leben von A. Siercking, married a merchant of Hartford. She began to write verse at seven, and published in 1815 her first poems, "Old English Poetry," twelve years after her birth. In 1831, "Poems, Religious and Elegiac," a selection from former books, appeared in London, 1841, during or after her visit there. In all, she published fifty-nine volumes, largely poetical, and chiefly on sacred or moral themes. She was long counted the first of New England women poets, and many hymns of her, some of them from Netleton's "Village Hymns" (1824), may be found in the various collections; but none is of the first merit or the highest popularity. Her autobiography appeared as Letters of Life in 1866. She was a Baptist. F. M. BIRD.

SI'HOR, i.e., "the dark," is a name common to three rivers. (1) The Nile (Isa. xxiii. 3; Jer. ii. 18), called by Greeks and Romans, "the black," from the black mud which it carries along during the time of the inundation. (2) The river of Egypt (Num. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xv. 4, 47; 1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. vii. 8; Isa. xxiv. 12), the "Shior of Egypt" is before Egypt (Josh. xiii. 3). "Shior of Egypt" (1 Chron. xiii. 5), "the river to the great sea" (Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28), which, formed through the confluence of many wadys, falls into the Mediterranean at the Wady el-Arish, between Pelusium and Gaza. During the summer it is almost dried up. Gessinius (Thesaurus, iii. 1393) thinks that this also means the Crocodile River, probably the Naiir, the river of the old "rws," in De Simeonum scriptis, Paris, 1664, and by Simler (1824), may be found in the various collections; but none is of the first merit or the highest popularity. Her autobiography appeared as Letters of Life in 1866. She was a Baptist. F. M. BIRD.

II. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE MACCABEAN PERIOD.—1. Simon, the grandfather of Mattathias (1 Mace. i. 31). 2. Simon the Hamaite, a governor of the temple, who informed the Syrians, in the time of Seleucus Philopator (186 B.C.) and Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C., 2 Macc. iii.), concerning the treasures of the temple. Having quarrelled with the high priest, Onias III., he went to the Syrian king, and informed him of the treasures of the temple, and caused the sending of Heliodor to rob the temple. 3. Simon, surnamed “Thassi,” second son of Mattathias, and last survivor of the Maccabean brothers. He deserved well of his people, which acknowledged his merits by appointing him prince and high priest. The document which mention this fact shows a remarkable, though a little heeded, light upon the messianic hopes of the people during the entire post-prophetic period, when it reads: “And. And he hath pleased well the Jews and the priests that Simon should be their prince and high priest forever, until there arise a trustworthy prophet” (1 Macc. xiv. 41). In the reserve at the end of the clause the theocratic conscience of the people and priests has evidently reserved the right of the Messiah, but with a disheartened expression; for to say that the advent of the Messiah was near at hand meant at that time to do away with the Maccabean dynasty. In accordance with this supposition an exclusive opposition between the advent of the Messiah and the political dynasty, the Idumenean Herod had all the children killed at Bethlehem. John the Baptist, however, preached the advent of the messianic kingdom mostly under the protection of the Roman Government.

III. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE GOSPEL HISTORY.—(1) Simon Zelotes, see below; (2) Simon Peter (q.v.); (3) Simon, father of Judas Iscariot (John vi. 71, xii. 4, xiii. 2, 28); (4) Simon the Pharisee, in whose house the penitent woman anointed the head and feet of Jesus (Luke vii. 36 sq.); (5) Simon the leper of Bethany, in whose house Mary of Bethany anointed Jesus (Matt. xxvi. 6 sq.); Mark xiv. 3 sq.; John xii. 1 sq.; (6) Simon of Cyrene (Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxii. 28). Mark describes him as the father of Alexander and Rufus. Besides these names, other Simeons are mentioned: (1) Simeon in the genealogy of Jesus (Luke iii. 30); (2) Old Simeon, who took the child Jesus upon his arms (Luke ii 25); (3) Simeon usually designated Simon Peter; and (4) a Simeon the father of Gamaliel.

IV. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE APOSTOLIC HISTORY. (1) Simon Niger (Acts xiii. 1); (2) Simon Magus (q.v.), the counterpart of Simon Peter; (3) Simon, the tanner of Joppa, in whose house Peter tarried many days (Acts ix. 43). The counterpart of Simon, the apostle and brother of the Lord, is Simon of Gerasa, who plays a remarkable part in the Gospels (Matt. x. 8; xxvii. 55). It is worthy of notice that the blind Jewish people at Jerusalem rather followed a certain Simon and John in order to be destroyed, than the apostles John and Simon, who offered them the salvation in Christ, and who had to leave the city with the Christians.

SIMON MACCABEUS. See Maccabees.

SIMON MAGUS. heads, in the early church, the list of heretics. From Irenaeus (i. 30) on, he is known as the heresiarch, and is called by Ignatius (Ad Traj.) the first-born of Satan. In the middle of the 2nd century the name Simon first occurs in connection with the Apollonius, informed him of the treasures of the temple, and caused the sending of Heliodor to rob the temple. According to Eusebius (iii. 11) and Niceronius (iii. 10), this Simon, after the death of James, was made bishop of Jerusalem by the apostles. As this must have taken place soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, we may suppose that Simon already before that time led the Christians to Pella (Euseb., iii. 5). And since he was crucified at the age of a hundred and twenty (about 107 A.D., Hegesippus by Euseb., iii. 32, 1, Cotel. ed. Const. apost. 7, 48), we may surmise with certainty that as bishop he directed the affairs of the Jewish-Christian Church at Pella-Jerusalem in the spirit of union with the Gentile Christians, whilst Bishop John directed the Gentile-Christian Church of Asia Minor more in the spirit of union with the Jewish Christians. That Simon should have resided in Egypt, Cyrene, Mauritania, Lybia, and in the British Isles, where he is said to have been crucified, is mere fiction.

Simon Magus. We shall now give a survey of the accounts current amongst the Fathers concerning his personal fortunes and his system.

1. Simon's Personal Fortunes. — The first post-biblical author to mention Simon is Hegesippus (Cod. epigr., 1, 1, 2), who states that he belonged to the Jewish sects with which the heretical corruption of the church originated, the Samaritans being counted among such sects. Justin Martyr, himself born in Samaria, has more to say about him; and his account, with that of the Acts, forms the firm foundation of all subsequent accounts. According to him, Simon was born at Giotton, Samaria, and was revered by the majority of the Samaritans as the most high God; and his attendant, Helena, whom he had found in a brothel at Tyre, was his isrnœa. He visited Rome under Claudius, and created such an impression by his magical arts, that the Senate and people worshipped him as a god, and erected to him a statue bearing the inscription to the “Holy God Simon” (Simon Deo Sancto). Hilgenfeld and others have supposed that Justin confounded a Samaritan village with Kitiham in Cyprus, but without sufficient reason. The strange statue was explained by a discovery, in 1854, of a marble pedestal bearing the inscription, Semoni D20 Sande. Justin, without doubt, was misled by this inscription. The Clementine Homilies speak of Simon's parents, and his education in Greek and magic at Alexandria, and represent him as originally one of the thirty disciples of John the Baptist. He travelled about with Helena, giving himself out as the highest power, superior to the Creator of the world, and representing Helena as having descended from the highest heaven, and being the mother of all and of wisdom. Many magical tricks are attributed to him. He commanded statues to walk, walked without injury in the fire, transformed himself into a serpent or goat, opened locked doors, etc. The relations between him and Peter are especially dwelt upon and elaborated. They held a disputation in the area Strato, and Peter are especially dwelt upon and elaborated. The relations between him and Peter are especially dwelt upon and elaborated. They held a disputation in the area Strato, and Peter, but ever pursued by the apostle, until finally, at Antioch, Simon was compelled by the apostle's right to the claim of a true apostle. The controversy of Simon and Helena was a modification of the Phoenician mythology; the sun-god (Melquarth, Baal) representing the male, and the moon-god (Astarte) representing the female principle. These two principles are represented as a syzygy from which all things that exist have been derived. The fall is connected with the woman, and redemption with Simon, who descends from heaven, and makes the highest revelation. See Mosheim: Institut. h. eccl. mai. sect., i. 389 sqq.; Simson: Leben u. Lehre Simon's d. Mag., in Illgen's Zeitschrift, 1871; the different works upon Gnosticism, and the reign of Nero, while Justin puts it in the reign of Claudius. Henceforth the story of the Roman meeting between Peter and Simon is associated with the Clementine descriptions. Thither the magician fled, pursued by the apostle. His death is differently related. According to some, he promised to fly to heaven, and in fact did succeed in flying, until, stopped by the prayer of Peter, he fell dead to the earth. According to others, overcome with shame and chagrin, he threw himself from a rock (Const. Ap., vi. 8 sqq.; Arnob.: Adv. gentes, ii. 12; Cyril.: Hieros., vi. 15, etc.).

2. Simon's System. — The Fathers agree in representing Simon as the coryphaeus of the heretics, from whom came the devilish poison of heresy. From Justin on, a communion or sect is spoken of who recognized him as leader, or worshipped him as God. Justin expressly speaks of the “Simonian system” (Apol., ii. 14). Ireneus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Terrullian (De an., 57.), Origen, and even Celsus, speak of the sect of the Simonians. Epiphanius and Eusebius speak of its gradual disappearance, and Theodoret, of its extinction. The Simonian teachings gradually took on the form of an elaborate gnostic system. Simon is the highest power, the father over all. Helena is the prolific mother from whom he gets the idea of creating angels and archangels. She brings them forth; and they, in turn, create the world. These angels, which do not know their father, out of jealousy detain their mother in captivity. Confined for centuries, she passes from one female body to another, until she at last is found in a brothel at Tyre. Simon descended from heaven, and freed his lost sheep, and emancipated those who believed in him from the world and the service of the angels who created it. This is in general the view of Tertullian (De an., 34.), Hippolytus (v. 19 sqq.), Epiphanius, and, in part, Theodoret. Hippolytus (v. 7 sqq.), however, speaks of another and quite different Simonian system, and mentions a writing by Simon, the ἀποκαταστάσις (the Great Denial), Simon, as the great power above all, is called the icônos, a designation which the Clementines and Clemens Alexandrinus also mention. Jerome (Com. in Matth., xxiv.) preserves Simon's words to this effect: “I am the word of God, I am the light, the paraclete, the all of God.”

The following may be said concerning the growth and development of the Simonian sect. Simon was originally the false Messiah. A sect of Samaritans sprung up who worshipped him as the most high God. Around his person was formed a gnostic system compounded of mythological and Christian elements. Baur (Manich. Syst., 408 sqq.) was the first to show that the myth of Simon and Helena was a modification of the Phoenician mythology; the sun-god (Melquarth, Baal) representing the male, and the moon-god (Astarte) representing the female principle. These two principles are represented as a syzygy from which all things that exist have been developed. SIMON.

SIMON, Richard, the founder of biblical isagogies; b. at Dieppe, May 13, 1638; d. there April 11, 1712. He early became a novice of the Oratorians; but, as the prescribed ascetical practices embroiled his studies, he left the order, and studied with private support in Paris. His connection, however, with the Oratorians, was not altogether dissolved. In 1662 he was made a novice, and having obtained permission to continue his studies; but he never felt at home in the order. The Oratorians were at that time the most successful competitors of the Jesuits in the field of education, and this circumstance drew them nearer towards the Jansenists. But Simon, so to speak, a rationalist by nature, felt averse to the Jansenists; and these conflicting tendencies made his position in the order somewhat difficult. If; was first sent to Juilly to teach philosophy, but afterwards appointed at the library of the order in Paris to catalogue its Oriental manuscripts,—a task which was fully congenial to him, and of great advantage in his biblical studies. After the publication, however, of his great work on isagogics, he was again compelled to leave the order; and the latter part of his life he spent mostly in his native city, in literary retirement.

The earlier works of Simon have no special interest. — Fides ecclesiae orientalis (1671), a translation from the Italian of Gaudini's "Travels among the Maronites" (1675), Comparaison des cérémonies des jifs avec la discipline de l'Eglise (1881), Histoire de l'origine des revenus ecclésiastiques (1894), etc. But in 1685 appeared his Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, and it was followed by his Histoire critique du texte du N. T. (1890), Histoire critique des versions du N. T. (1893), and Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du N. T. (1893). The first part of the work was done in 1878. It was passed by the censor, and printed; but its publication was retarded on account of the dedication to the king. Meanwhile, some stray copies began to circulate, and attracted attention; and Bossuet, on this occasion acting in unison with the Jansenists, succeeded in having the work suppressed. The whole edition was destroyed; and only a few copies, in the possession of private persons, were saved. From one of these copies the Amsterdam bookseller, Elzevir, made a very incorrect edition in 1679; and from that edition Noël Aubert de Versé made his Latin translation, 1881. Finally, the author himself, who in the mean time had left the order of the Oratorians, published an authentic edition at Rotterdam, 1885. It was anonymous, but the other parts of the work bear the name of the author. The work in its totality is the first scientific attempt at writing the history of the Bible considered as a literary product; and, in view of the immense importance of the subject since that time has been bestowed on the subject, the idea of such an undertaking commands respect, both on account of its originality and on account of the courage it presupposes. The execution bears, of course, the marks of its time, of the scantiness of the materials and the insufficiency of the tools at the disposal of the author; but it cannot be denied that it also bears the marks of his narrowness and peculiarities, his hobbies, and his antipathies. The amount of criticism which the work called forth was enormous; and as Simon was somewhat ticklish person, of a not altogether lovely temper, he could overlook nothing. The first attacks, by Weil, a converted Jew from Metz, and Spanheim, Prussian ambassador in London, with the responses of Simon, are added as an appendix to the Rotterdam edition of the first part. But more vehement and more protracted controversies ensued, with Van Leiden (Clercicu), and others. Generally speaking, the literary history of the work is very interesting, as most of the questions brought forward in the controversies were new; but it is also difficult, as Simon published most of his answers pseudonymously.

Having criticised so many other translations of the Bible, Simon at last undertook to make one himself. The works appeared in 1702, in four volumes, printed at Trévoux, without the name of the author. It was soon discovered, however; and Bossuet took pains to gather from the translation a sufficient number of heresies, especially of a Socinian color. The book was forbidden, first by episcopal authority in some single dioceses, then by royal authority in the whole kingdom. Simon did his utmost to avoid the verdict, but in vain. Among his later works are Lettres choisies de M. Simon (1700–05, 3 vols.), and Bibliothèque critique (1708, 3 vols.), both of which contained striking evidences of the immense learning of the author, and valuable contributions to the literary history of the time. His papers and his excellent library he bequeathed to the cathedral of Rouen, but during the Revolution most of them disappeared. See the elaborate and reliable biography of Richard Simon by K. H. GRAF, in Strassburger theolog. Beiträge, 1847, pp. 158–242; [also G. MASSON: Richard Simon, London, 1867; and A. ED. REUSSE.

SIMON OF TOURNAI lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century as teacher of philosophy and theology in the university of Paris. He was the first who applied the Aristotelian philosophy to theology, which circumstance filled his lectures with so much light that the best of his pupils was alleged to have been made a doctor of theology by him crazy from vanity. Matthew Paris tells us that one day he exclaimed, "O Jesus! what have I not done for the consolidation of thy doctrine, though I could have done so very much more for its destruction!" after which he lost the powers of speech and memory, and had to learn his letters over again; but he never reached farther than spelling the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. Thomas Cantipratus ascribes the famous saying about the three impostors — Moses, Christ, and Mohammed — to him. But Henry of Ghent, who was a canon of Tournai, and doctor of the Sorbonne in 1290, and who, consequently, ought to know, says nothing of those stories in speaking of Simon. None of his works have been printed, but they are said to be in perfect harmony with the doctrinal system of the church.

SIMONY is, according to canon law, the heaviest of all ecclesiastical crimes (delicta graviora, delicta maxima), and has found its most pregnant description in c. 21, § 1; c. 1, qu. 1. The name is derived from Simon Magus (Acts viii. 18); and by degrees, as the view developed of ordination by the laying-
SIMPICIUS

SIMPLICIUS.

SIN. 1. A city of Egypt, which is mentioned only in Ezek. xxx. 15, 16, in connection with theopolitan Gulf to the mouth of the Wady Taiyibeh, which reaches from the south end of the Ieroo gate with pelusium, "the clayey or mudd " town, and seems to be reserved in the Arabic liit-Tineh (" tiueh " signifying mud). Pelusium is famous for the many battles fought here. Here Seton drove back the army of Sennacherib, and here Cambyses defeated Psammenitus (IIerod., II. 141, 3 sq.). The Persians defeated here also Nectanebos (Diod., 16, 42 sq.). The Egyptians defeated here also Nectanebos (Diod., 16, 42 sq.).

2. A wilderness between Elim and Rephidim, where the Israelites arrived on the fifteenth day of the second month after their departure out of the land of Egypt, and where they received quails and manna. It is generally held to be the region near the source of Murkeh, south of Ras Zelima, the northern part of the plain el kas, which reaches from the south end of the Heteropolitan Gulf to the mouth of the Wady Taiyibe in the north. Its desolate aspect appears to have produced a most depressing effect upon the Israelites. [Cf. Exod. xvi. 3.]

SIN. Though Scripture gives no definition of the term, it leaves no element of the doctrine of sin unnoticed, but gives a full account of how sin penetrated into human nature by the fall of man, how it develops into special acts through the self-determination of man, and how its power is finally broken by the atoning sacrifice of God. This account is the basis of the whole historical development of the Christian dogma of sin: the impulses which pushed on the development it derived from the steadily increasing clearness and depth with which the ideas of freedom and necessity, and their reciprocal relation, were conceived. The older Fathers, the apologists, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus of Antioch, as well as Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Athanasius, the two Gregories, Chrysostom, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Methodius, defined sin as opposition to the holy will of God, and affirmed that such an iniquity involved death as its necessary consequence. But, though they were well aware that an unchangeable order of things, a pre-established harmony, a pre-established justice, a pre-established happiness, a pre-established unhappiness, a pre-established guilt, a pre-established state of sin, a pre-established state of virtue without leaving one single human being as an exception, they did not put that universal state of iniquity in any necessary connection with the fall of Adam. Every single sin, they taught, is an act of free will, and, in its relation to the sin of Adam, only a repetition; and consequently an infant is as incapable of committing a sin as unable to do anything good. Even Tertullian, though he taught that the sinfulness of a human nature, with death as its consequence, is propagated by generation (corpus traduz am'mlz), asserted that man in his natural state had the power to do good, that the natural state of man was not one of sin and guilt. It was first during the controversy between Pelagius and Augustine that people became conscious of the contradiction between sin as an act of individual freedom and sin as the result of organic necessity. Pelagius and his adherents, Celestius, Julian of Eclanum, and others, held that the propagation of sin by generation is unthinkable; that good and evil are not born with us, but done by us; that man has now the same nature as Adam had when he was created; that sin is an act of free will, etc. Thus the concupiscencia, or that sensual movement from which, when not governed by man, sin originates, is not an effect of the sin of Adam, but, like death itself, an element of the very nature of man; and between the sins of Adam and those of his offspring there is no significant difference, but sin as an example and imitation: the power which sin exercises over man is simply the power of habit. Augustine, who in his earlier writings spoke with marked compoosure about Manicheism, but who afterwards absolutely submitted to the ideas of a total change of human nature, spiritual and physical, as the result of the first sin, placed against that of the Pelagian views the following propositions: that the sin of self-vindication and disobedience which Adam committed with free self-determination completely corrupted his whole nature; that the corruption consists in concupiscencia, or the dominion of the lower sensual instincts over the spirit, which unfit man for good, and makes it impossible for him to escape sin by his own power; that the corruption and its consequence, death, are propagated by generation, which means that sin is hereditary sin (viitam originis, peccatum originale), and the offspring of Adam massa perditionis; that the nature of man, not only one of sin, but one of guilt and punishment, as sin and guilt are correlative ideas, etc. Between these two extremes Semi-Pelagianism reared its system, according to which man, though the victim of hereditary sin, and subject to death, has still a desire for good. His powers have been weakened; he is neither completely dead nor fully alive; he is sick. But the liberum arbitrium has not been lost. In vindicating the freedom of the will, however, Semi-Pelagianism actually oversteps the dividing-line between Pelagianism and Augustinism, and sides with the former; and it continued to incline that way, even in the milder forms which it developed after its condemnation.

In the East, John of Damascus, the systematizer of the theology of the Greek Church, taught that death, and the loss of communion with God and converse with the angels, are the necessary consequences of the first sin, and are propagated by generation. But he knows nothing of an unfitness for good and an hereditary guilt propagated in the same manner: on the contrary, according to him, man is still as free as Adam was on the day of his creation; and the image of God, in which man was created, and which... consists in reason and a free will, has not been lost. The later Greek theologians, Theodorus, Studitas, Theophylact, Euthymius Zigabenus, and others, followed in the same track. In the West the subject received a very peculiar treatment by John Scotus Eriigena. In his system of Platonizing philosophy, he ascribed to sin, not as Augustine of Hippo, not as Aquinas related, not as the Jesuites and the Scotists related, but as a mere negation of God. Eriigena, however, exercised very little influence on this point; and, generally speaking, mediæval theology may be said to have left the subject nearly in the same state in which it received it. Of the schoolmen, Anselm of Canterbury, Peter the Lichard, and Thomas Aquinas expounded the dogma on the basis of the category of necessity; Abelard, Duns Scotus, and the Scotists generally, on the basis of the category of freedom. According to the former, sin is disobedience to God, caused by pride, and the sinfulness of the race is the effect of the fall of Adam. In Abelard, the person corrupted nature (peccatum originale originans): in his offspring, nature corrupts the person (peccatum originale originatum). Consequently, although the senses are by themselves not of the character of sin, and only enter as an element into the single, actual sin, hereditary sin is, nevertheless, truly sin, and the unchristened infant is justly damned. In this sense of the word, neither Abelard nor Duns Scotus recognized the existence of hereditary sin. That which was lost by the fall of Adam was, according to Duns Scotus, the justitia originals; and the Scotists in general laid great emphasis on the free activity of man, a circumstance which aided them considerably in the defence of the doctrine of immane conception. In all essential points of the doctrine of sin the mystics of the middle ages agreed with the schoolmen. To them, too, sin had its root in the innermost nature of man. Sin, in its nature, was, according to Lestrange, a fall from the Creator; while the Cathari, the Albigenses, and other mediæval sects, sought the source of sin in the very body of man.

A deeper conception of the dogma was prepared by the Reformers through the clearer consciousness of sin as the object to which the sinners. On the one hand, Protestantism awakened a more vivid feeling of the unity of the race and the organic necessity of sin; on the other, it more strongly vindicated the individual person, and proclaimed the freedom of the will as one of its chief principles. A new and more subjective view of the relationship of man to God and the world became necessary, and the change is already apparent in the symbolic books both of the Lutheran and the Reformed Church. The Lutheran theologians Gerhard, Quenstedt, and others, starting from the distinction between peccatum originale originans (the fall) and the pec- catum originale originatum (hereditary sin), and the latter as a loss of the original perfection, entailing a lack of true knowledge, love, and fear of God; as a faulty concupiscencia rising from a complete corruption of the body in all its qualities, so that the capacity for salvation is reduced to a mere possibility; as a reatus (guilt) which brings man, on account of the evil which is propagated in him, under the wrath and judgment of God. Calvin, although, on account of his supralapsarian views, he experienced some difficulties in isolating the charge that he must bear, to the extent that he became, nevertheless, that hereditary sin is connected with guilt; and the later Reformed theologians, Polanus, Alstedt, van Til, and others, defined the fall as a breach of the fadus naturæ, and sin as a defectus naturæ. A transition to a stronger emphasizing and a more minute elaboration of the second element of the doctrine, the freedom of the will, became visible in Calixtus (who rejected the idea of hereditary sin as a guilt) and the syncretists in general; and during the period of rationalism and supernaturalism the movement was completed. The rationalists, who generally liked to speak of the dignity of man and sin as something negative, the mere negation of God, as little as sin. Erastianism is a transition to a stronger emphasizing of the guilt of Adam to his offspring, the pureness and innocence of the will, and in the perfectness of freedom. It is the characteristic of the theology of our age, that a perfect mediation between the two opposites is now demanded. Daub’s attempt, in his Judas Ischaritont, at explaining the origin of evil as having its root in the pure will of man, found no favor; but, under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy, Marheineke, in his Grundlinien der theolog. Moral, defined sin as a contradiction between the finite and the infinite spirit, necessarily arising from the abstract, unconscious unity of God and man, and as necessarily resulting in the imperfect, finite unity; and this idea did not prove altogether sterile. By Vatke, Romany, and others, sin was represented as a necessary transition through evil, without which man can neither fully know nor fully do that which is good; and generally the Hegelian school of theology taught the absolute necessity of faith as a condition of the development of the human spirit. Schleiermacher, however, abandoned this track. He sought to establish the notion of the historical Jesus as a double fact—a free deed of the subject on the one side, and a necessary result of the objective development on the other,—and the sinful state of man as a disturbance of his nature, not necessary to it; so that we become conscious of our sins, partly as something which we ourselves have done, and partly as something which has its cause outside of our being. Later theologians generally show an influence either from Hegel or from Schleiermacher, and their treatment of the doctrine of sin is generally shaped after one of those two models. But hardly any of them can be said to have established a perfect balance between freedom and necessity in their solutions of the problem. Nitzsch, Marquart, and Rothe incline towards the absolute necessity of the will; Lange, Thomasius, and Philippi towards the absolute necessity of organic nature.

F. DÖRTENBACH.

SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT (Matt. xii. 31, 32). This must be carefully distinguished from blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. The latter is unforgivable: the former is not. As Matthew Henry well says, "It is not all speaking against the person or essence of the Holy Spirit, or some of his private operations, or merely his existing of his internal working in the sinner himself, that is here meant; for who, then, should be saved?" But blasphemy against the Holy Spirit implies complete deadness to spiritual things; so that holiness is hateful and hated. Wherever there is apprehension felt that the "unpardonable sin" has been committed, there has been no commission of it; for he who really sins in this way feels no contrition. And the latter fact is the reason why it is never forgiven. The sinner continues obstinate and malignant till his death. It is therefore equivalent to final impenitence. Cf. Lange on Matthew (Am. ed., p. 227); PHILIP SCAPPA: Die Sünde wider den heiligen Geist, Halle, 1841; A. VON OETTINGEN: De peccato in spiritum sanctum, Dorpat, 1856; LEMMEL: Die Sünde wider d. heiligen Geist, Breslau, 1858; and art. by HERMANN WEISS, in HERZOGR, vol. ii. p. 190-199.

SIN-OFFERINGS. See Offerings.

SINS, The Forgiveness of, is the negative effect of justification, which in conception precedes the positive, adoption, and rests as the subjective importation of the work of Christ upon the atonement as the objective fact. The doctrine is found in the Old Testament (Num. iv. 14, xviii. 10; 2 Chron. vii. 14; Ps. ci. 10, 12, 13, cxxv. 4; Isa. i.; Mic. vii. 18, 19, etc.), where, however, it rests upon sacrifices (see Offerings); but in the New Testament it is frequently represented as the immediate result of Christ's death (Matt. xxvi. 28; Rom. iv. 22; 2 Cor. v. 10, 21; Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 13; Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. i. 18, 19), and again as the result of the acceptance of the atonement on the part of the individual (Matt. vi. 12, ix. 2; Luke vii. 47; Acts ii. 38, xiii. 38; Rom. iii. 25; Col. ii. 13). Man, renouncing all works and all merits, is forgiven out of God's grace, for the sake of Christ's merits, through faith (Matt. ix. 2; Rom. iii. 25, iv. 4, 5). Righteousness is, however, reckoned as the condition of faith (Acts xiii. 39; Gal. ii. 10). Forgiveness, which removes guilt and its attendant punishment (Rom. v. 19), and sin itself (Rom. viii. 2 sqq.) is granted to all believers (cf. Rom. v. 12-21; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22). See SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT.

In the historical development of the doctrine, there was at first no clear understanding of the relations of God and man in the act of forgiveness; and so the apostolic Fathers represented it simply as the result of the atonement, and conditioned it upon a better life. Clement of Rome conditions it upon "faith," i.e., in the conception of the time, mere reception of the truths of Christianity, and obedience to the divine commands; the Shepherd of Hermas, upon "faith" and repentance, only once possible; Justin Martyr, upon "faith," baptism, and a righteous life; Clement of Alexandria, upon "faith" and good works; Origen, in his commentary upon Romans, upon "faith," but in other places adds good works, which he enumerates,—baptism, martyrdom, repentance, virtue, alms, forgiveness of sins against us, conversion of a sinner, brotherly love. The Latin Fathers—Irenæus, Tertullian, and Cyprian—attribute forgiving efficacy to baptism and to good works, as alms, and lay great stress upon penance. So the Greek Fathers—Cyril of Jerusalem, Basíl the Great, Gregory of Nazianzen, Theodoret, Chrysostom—condition forgiveness upon faith,—one mere acceptance of truth, the other firm confidence upon God's promises, but did not attain to a perception of the connection between the latter and forgiveness. Scævis Erigena denied forgiveness, since all that man needed to be reconciled with God was intellectual perception of the evil. The scholastic theologians were Semi-Pelagians. They taught that penance, which atoned for actual sin, consisted in confession of the heart, conversion of the mouth, and works of satisfaction, which were such as fasting, prayers, alms, flagellation, pilgrimage. They taught also, in fear of the doctrine of purgatory, that, although of heaven, punishment followed sin until the soul was cleansed by the purgatorial fire. They emphasized auricular confession and indulgences, the equivalent for penance, and thus perverted the doctrine of forgiveness. The mystics of the middle ages emphasized the inward connection between God and the heart. The Roman-Catholic doctrine, since the Council of Trent, is that forgiveness is received by man along with grace, consequent upon repentance and faith entering into fellowship with Christ, and is no result of a divine decree; but every act of conversion which includes the consciousness of deliverance from guilt, and desert of punishment, is only a declaration of the general decree to justify for Christ's sake. Maritain and Rothe deny that forgiveness is possible out of Christ. Nitzsch considers forgiveness as a direct act of God, resultant upon faith in the atoning death of Christ. Lange also holds fast to the objectivity of the act, which, according to him, is judicial.

SINAI, i.e., "sharp-pointed," "toothed," or "notched" (Exod. xvi. 1; Deut. xxxii. 2), also Mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 11, 18, 20, 23, xxiv. 16, xxxi. 18, xxxiv. 2, 4, 9, 32; Lev. vii. 38, xxxv. 1, xxxvi. 46, xxvii. 34; Num. xxvii. 6), also Horeb, i.e., "dry," "dried up" (Exod. iii. 1, xvi. 6, xxxvi. 8, xxxv. 20). The "mountain of God," "mountain of the Lord" (Exod. iii. 1, iv. 27, xviii. 5; Num. x. 33), denote, in the narrower sense, a single mountain, the historic mountain on which God revealed the law unto Moses, but, in a wider sense, the mountain range in the peninsula formed by the Gulf of Suez and Akabah. On the north it is bounded by the upland plain of Ed-Raháh, and on the south by the Um-Shauber mount. A distinction has been made between Sinai and Horeb; and Hengstenberg (Authentnc des Pentateuchs, ii. pp. 390 sq.), with whom Robinson (Researches in Palestine) agrees, explains the change in the names, in that by Horeb the mountain ridge, and Sinai the individual summit from which the Ten Commandments were given. Gesenius suggested that Sinai might be the more general name, and Horeb a particular peak; and in this conjecture he was followed by Rosenmüller. Ewald sees not a local, but a temporal, difference in the use of both names (Geschichte, ii. 89, note). According to Ewald, Sinai is the older name, therefore it occurs in the ancient song of Deborah (Judg. v. 5); whereas Horeb is not discoverable before the time of the fourth narrator, in whose time, however, it had become quite prevalent. But there really seems to be no local difference between Horeb and Sinai; but it rather belongs to the peculiarity of the author using the names. Josephus and the New Testament (Acts vii. 50, 38; Gal. iv. 24 sq.) only speak of Sinai; and modern Arabs call the whole mountain range in the peninsula Jebel-et-Tór, sometimes with the addition of Sina, though Robinson says extremely rarely.

As to the locality, it is very difficult to designate a certain spot. Some, as Burckhardt and Lepsius, have claimed that the mountain on which the law was given was the Jebel Serbal. But the nature of the country around Serbal is against this hypothesis (comp. Dieterici: Reisebilder, ii. 54 sq.). A second hypothesis is the one which claims the Ras es-Sulsáfeh to be the Sinai of the Bible. This hypothesis was advocated by no less an authority than Robinson, who was followed by all writers and travellers till Léon de Laborde (in his Commentaire sur l’Exode Append., pp. 1, 41 sq.), who advocated the old tradition in favor of Jebel Músa, and was followed by Kráfft, Straus, Graul, Ritter, and in part, also, by Tischendorf. Above all things, it is necessary to point out that the Bible. According to Exod. xix. 2 sq., the Israelites, after their departure from Rephidim, came into the wilderness of Sinai, and encamped before the mount. God sends his message by Moses unto the people of the mount, to tell them how he will receive them as his covenant people. Barriers are put up, to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. "On the third day there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud, so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire. . . . And the Lord came down upon Mount Sinai, on the top of the mount; and the cloud covered the mount, and the glory of the Lord filled the mount. And Moses went up." And in Exod. xx. 18 sq. we read, "And all the people saw the thunders, and the lightnings, and the voice of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they removed, and stood afar off. . . . And Moses said unto the people, Fear not; for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye sin not. And the people stood afar off, and Moses drew near unto the thick darkness, where God was." And in Exod. xxiv. 1 sq. Moses is called up into the mountain with Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel. Moses alone was to come near to the Lord: the rest were to worship afar off. Moses does according to God's commandment, and then continues alone on the mountain forty days and forty nights. In the mean time Aaron makes the golden calf. On going down from the mount Moses hears the rejoicing of the people; and as he came nigh unto the camp, and saw the calf and the dancing, his anger waxed hot, and he cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount. From this description we must infer that immediately at the base of the mount there was a large plain, where the camp of the Israelites was, and from which the mount ascended immediately, because barriers were put up to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. Robinson and those who follow him find this plain in the plain Er-Rahah, from which the granite wall of Sinai rises with the three-toothed peak Ras es-Sufafleh, asserting at the same time that no such plain is found on the south side. Others, who are in favor of the Jebel Masis, claim the Wady Sebalyeh to be that plain, which has been overlooked by Robinson, and from which, also, the cone of Sinai immediately rises like a gigantic altar of God. The plain Er-Rahah they claim as that spot of the camp from which Moses brought forth the people to meet with God, through the Wady Sebalyeh, and through which the people fled back into the camp.

It is remarkable that Sinai never became a place of Jewish pilgrimage. Elijah went there to escape the vengeance of Jezebel (1 Kings xix. 3—8). At a very early period, however, in the Christian era, Sinai began to be an object of reverence. It appears that refugees from persecution in Egypt first sought an asylum amid the mountains. Anarcheta consequently fled to it, and convents were founded. In the early part of the sixth century the Emperor Justinian caused a church to be erected, and a fortified convent [the present Convent of St. Catharine] to be built round it. The number of resident monks is now usually about twenty-four. They are ruled by a prior (Waldl), but there is an archbishop who always resides at Cairo. The library of the convent contains some fifteen hundred (according to Lepsius sixteen hundred) printed books, and about seven hundred manuscripts. [Among them Tischendorf discovered, in the year 1838, the celebrated Codex Sinaiticus.]

SIRIMAN, monk, afterwards deacon, and finally presbyter, in the monastery of St. Gall; lived in the tenth century, and was so celebrated as a copyist, that every place of note was eager to have a manuscript by him. The so-called Evangelium longum, bound between the tablets of Chartre, is his work. He was, however, not a simple copyist, but a real artist, and combined in his art the vigorous but somewhat rough and awkward Lombard style with the refined and elegant style of the Irish monks. E. SION COLLEGE, or the college of the London clergy, which has been a religious house from the earliest times, under the domination of a priory or of a hospital, was dissolved under Henry VIII., but again organized. It now exists under charter of 1631, and is both a clergy house, and a hospital for ten poor men and ten poor women. See Dict. of the Church.

SIRICIUS, Pope 384—398; condemned the monk Jovinian, Bishop Bonitus of Sardica, and suppressed the Manichaeans and the Priscillianists in Rome. His Epistola ad Himerium Episcopum Tarraconensem is the first decretal concerning celibacy.

SIRMOND, Jacques, b. at Riom, Oct. 12, 1556; d. in Paris, Oct. 7, 1651. He was educated by the Jesuits at Béillon: entered the order in 1578; was in 1590 called to Rome as secretary to the general; returned in 1608 to Paris; became rector of the Jesuit college in Paris in 1617, and was appointed confessor to Louis XIII. in 1617. He edited works of Enectius, Flodoardus, Fulgentius of Ruspe, Petrus Celensis, Apollonius Sidonius, Pasechius Radbertus, Hinmen of Rheims, and others.

SIX ARTICLES, The, passed by the English Parliament, June 28, 1539, mark the retrograde movement of Henry VIII. from the principles of the Reformation. They imposed upon the English people the doctrines of transubstantiation, the usefulness of private masses, auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the communion in one kind. They were popularly called the "Bloody Articles" and the "Whip with six strings." See Article XVI.

SIX-PRINCIPLE BAPTISTS, so called from their six doctrines, contained in Heb. iv. 1, 2; viz., (1) repentance from dead works, (2) faith toward God, (3) the doctrine of baptisms, (4) the laying-on of hands, (5) the resurrection of the dead, (6) eternal judgment. Their "laying-on of hands" is similar to episcopal confirmation. They refuse to fellowship with those who do not practise it. Their general type of theology is Arminian. They claim to date, as an organization, from 1639, and have always been, for the most part, confined to Rhode Island. In 1700 they had not more than a dozen (very weak) churches in New England, all but two in Rhode Island. They have no periodical organ, and no institutions or societies. See Cathcart's Baptist Encyclopedia, s. v.

SIXTUS, the name of five Popes.—Sixtus I. (May 23, 69—July 21, 78), the successor of Alexander I., ascended the Papal throne either 116 or 119, and died a martyr's death, by decapitation, 128 or 139. He introduced the celebration of Easter at Rome, and was the author of the law prohibiting women touching the vessels on the altar.—Sixtus II. (Pope 257—258) was executed in the reign of Valerian. Sixtus III. (432—440) was appealed to by the metropolitans of Tyana and Tarseus, who were afraid of being deposed. The erection of several churches is ascribed to him, especially the Basilica of St. Maria Maggiore.—Sixtus IV. (1471—1513), whose family name was Francois d'Albes, was a descendant of a family of Savages which had a princely inheritance. In order to accomplish this, he accompanied the Papal legate to Spain, where he held high positions in the Franciscan order. His success won for him the bishopric of Agatha de Goti, which he administered well, attempting to reform the morals of the clergy. Honored with a cardinal's hat in 1570, he retired to Montalto. Sixtus四级, was b. Dec. 18, 1521, at Grotte-a-Mare, a village near Fermo; d. Aug. 24, 1590, at Rome. He visited the universities of Ferrara and Bologna, and was made professor of canon law at Rimini in 1544, and at Siena in 1546. He was a Franciscan. From Siena he went to Rome, became noted as a preacher, secured the friendship of men in power, but, on account of complications, went to Venice (1556), where he held high positions in the Franciscan order. Paul IV. showed him favor; and in 1565 he accompanied the Papal legate to Spain, where he secured the confidence of Philip II. by his preaching. Paul V. also showed him favor, and appointed him vicar-general of the Franciscan order. His success won for him the bishopric of của Agatha de Goti, which he administered well, attempting to reform the morals of the clergy. Honored with a cardinal's hat in 1570, he retired to Montalto, lived a solitary life, expended his means in deeds of charity, engaged in the preparation of an edition of Ambrose (1580), and died a martyr's death, by decapitation, 128 or 139. He introduced the celebration of Easter at Rome, and was the author of the law prohibiting women touching the vessels on the altar.
SLAVERY AMONG HEBREWS.

According to the Old Testament, which ascribes to man the inalienable trait of his nature, because of his being created in the image of God, and which presents the brotherhood of mankind, because originating from one blood, slavery as it appears according to the very beginning. That one tribe, however, at a part of property (Gen. xxiv. 35, xxvi. 14; Job i. 3); and also the sale of slaves, as something which was customary in the patriarchal age. The servants of the patriarchs were of two kinds, — those "born in the house" (Gen. xiv. 14), and those "bought with money" (Gen. xvii. 13). Abraham appears to have had a large number of servants. At one time he armed three hundred and eighteen young men "born in his house." The servants born in the house were, perhaps, entitled to greater privileges than the others, and were honored with the most intimate confidence of the masters, as may be seen in the case of Eliezer (Gen. xxiv. 1 sq.), when Abraham's heir, should the latter have died without issue (Gen. xv. 2 sq.). The servants of Abraham were admitted to the same religious privileges with their master, and received the seal of the covenant (Gen. xvii. 7, 27), and (c) the exercise of paternal authority (Exod. xxi. 5, 14). Slavery, as far as it was allowed by the Mosaic law, was regulated by laws, which, on account of their humane character, form a contrast to that degradation of human nature which was so prominent in heathenism. The laws regulating slavery may be divided into two classes, — such as relate to the Hebrew slaves, and such as relate to non-

SLATER FUND FOR THE EDUCATION OF FREEDMEN.

In the spring of 1882 a fund of one million dollars was given to trustees by John P. Slater of Norwich, Conn., for the purposes of educating and uplifting the freedmen of the United States, and preparing them for the duties of citizenship. The trustees were organized by the State of New York, and were organized with ex-President Hayes as their chairman, and Chief Justice Waite as their vice-president. It is expected that the income only of the fund will be distributed, and that schools which combine industrial training with mental and moral instruction will receive particular encouragement. The donor of the fund is a descendant of William Slater, to whom is largely due the establishment of cotton manufactures in this country; and he acquired a fortune by business-pursuits in Connecticut and Rhode Island.

I. Hebrew Slaves. — The circumstances under which a Hebrew might be reduced to servitude were, (a) poverty (Lev. xxv. 39, 47), (b) the commission of theft (Exod. xxi. 1, 3) — in that case the thief could not be sold to a foreigner, Jos.: Antt. XV. 6, 3, 27 was a leader in the New-School branch of the Presbyterian Church, a preacher of great spiritual power, an able theologian, and a pattern of saintly goodness. the recurrence of the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 40), which might arrive at any period of his servitude, and (c) failing either of these, by expiration of six years from the time that his servitude commenced (Exod. xxii. 2; Deut. xv. 12). There can be no doubt that this last regulation applied equally to the cases of poverty and theft. The period of seven years has reference to the sabbatical principle in general, but not to the sabbatical year. We have a single instance, indeed, of the sabbatical year being celebrated by a general manumission of Hebrew slaves (Jer. xxxiv. 14).

If a servant did not desire to avail himself of the opportunity of leaving his service, he was to signify his intention in a formal manner before the judges; and then the master was to take him to the door-post, and to bore his ear through with an awl, thus establishing a connection between the servant and the house in which he was to serve. A servant could be redeemed to the only by the arrival of the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 37). The condition of a Hebrew servant was by no means intolerable. His master was admonished to treat him, not "as a bond-servant, but as a hired servant and as a sojourner;" and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 39, 40). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14).

In the event of a Hebrew becoming the servant of a "stranger" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), the servitude could be terminated only by the purchase-money paid for the servant, after deducting a sum for the value of his services proportioned to the length of his servitude (Lev. xxv. 47-55). The servant might be redeemed either by himself or by one of his relations. A Hebrew woman might enter into voluntary servitude on the score of poverty; and in this case she was entitled to her freedom after six years' service, together with the usual gratuity at leaving, just as in the case of a man (Deut. xv. 12 sq.). Different is the case with a young daughter whom a father sold to a Hebrew with a three above-specified alterations took place, the maid was entitled to immediate and gratuitous liberty (Exod. xxii. 7-11).

II. NON-HEBREW SLAVES. — The majority of non-Hebrew slaves were war-captives, — either the Canaanites who had survived the general extermination of their race under Joshua, or such as were imported into the land by means of the paschal sacrifice (Exod. xii. 44), as well as of the other religious festivals (Deut. xii. 12, 18, xvi. 11, 14). He was to rest on the sabbath-day (Deut. v. 14); and, in case the master had no male issue, he could give him his daughter in marriage (1 Chron. ii. 35). As to the treatment of female slaves, see Deut. xxii. 10 sq. The master had no power over the life of a slave (Exod. xxi. 20). Willful murder of a slave entailed the same punishment as in the case of a freeman (Lev. xxiv. 17, 22); but no punishment at all was imposed if the slave survived the punishment for a day or two (Exod. xii. 42 sq.). If a Hebrew slave accused his master of "money" (Exod. xxi. 21). A minor personal injury, such as the loss of an eye or a tooth, was to be compensated by giving the servant his liberty (Exod. xxi. 26, 27). The general treatment of slaves appears to have been gentle, occasionally too gentle, as we infer from Solomon's advice (Prov. xxix. 19, 21). The slave was considered as entitled to justice (Job xxxi. 13-15). The Essenites entirely abolished slavery. C. C. PHILP: Quod omnis probus (Mangey's ed.), ii. 467.

SLAVERY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The New Covenant declares all mankind equal sharers in salvation (Tit. ii. 11; 1 Tim. ii. 4); and this principle was in itself sufficient to determine the view concerning slavery (Gal. iii. 28; Col. iii. 11), and to bring about its extinction. Since Christianity does not propose to withdraw from the heathen nations never apprehended, and which were veiled in the Old Testament, but which, in their progress and complete realization under Protestantism, must ultimately bring about the utter extirpation of slavery from the earth. Christ postulated the law of liberty, and made free the privilege of believers (John viii. 36) through which the individual lays hold on Christ, and becomes united with him, it recognizes the rights of the inner man (Acts ii. 41, xiii. 48; Gal. iii. 19-21), which the heathen nations never apprehended, and which were veiled in the Old Testament, but which, in their progress and complete realization under Protestantism, must ultimately bring about the utter extirpation of slavery from the earth.

With regard to slavery, the passage in 1 Cor. vii. 21 is of especial importance; and, whatever explanation may be given, certain it is that Paul did not intend to subvert by force the then existing condition, however adverse to the spirit of Christianity, but that first the inner freedom was to be implanted in the human heart, from which, in the course of time, the outer freedom was to proceed. It is evident from Rom. xiii. 1 sq., that a disposition to refuse obedience to government existed, to some extent, in apostolic times, and, from the case of Onesimus, that bondmen sometimes broke away from their masters' rule. In the latter instance Paul succeeded in effecting the voluntary return of the fugitive Christian slave by imparting to him a deeper and more correct knowledge of the nature and aims of Christianity (Phil. 10-18).

Similar tendencies we find among the slaves at Corinth, where many had no doubt become converts to Christianity (1 Cor. i. 20, 26-28). The apostle, therefore, laid it down as a rule, that converts to Christianity were to continue in the station and condition of life to which the providence of God had assigned them (1 Cor. vii. 17, 20). The argument by which that rule is enforced—that the present is a time of distress, in which it becomes prudent for the unmarried to retain their virgin state, and the slave to remain contentedly in his bondage—indicates its primary reference to the Corinthian Christians of that day; but the further considerations adduced—that the time is short, and the grand catastrophe through which the world's conditions shall be changed is drawing near—have universal force, and adapt the rule to the conditions of all Christians. It is, however, evident that the apostle does not strike at the right to liberty and personal independence in these instructions. 1 Cor. vii. 23 asserts that right most forcibly, and shows that the saving grace of the Lord involves a setting-aside of all human bondage. A denial of that right would bring him into conflict with his own claim to freedom (1 Cor. ix. 1) and with his fundamental state of mind (Philem. 4 sq.). He never commands that slave was it then (2 Cor. v. 17). The principles of Christian liberty were already then exhibited in such a manner that Christian masters, even if they were not to give freedom to their slaves, as Philemon to Onesimus, were exhorted to treat their slaves kindly and as brothers (Eph. vi. 6; Col. iv. 1; Philem. 16).

[Bishop Lightfoot says, "The gospel never directly attacks slavery as an institution; the apostles never command the liberation of slaves as an absolute duty. It is a remarkable fact that St. Paul in this Epistle (Philemon) stops short of any positive injunction. He tells him (Philemon) to do very much more than emancipate his slave, but this one thing he does not directly enjoins" (p. 389).]

J. G. VAIHINGER.

SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY. Christianity and slavery seem to the present generation, with its settled opinions concerning natural rights and the teachings of the New Testament, to form the opposite poles of the moral sphere; and yet it is certain that society in antiquity was based on slavery, and that at no period of history was the slave system more completely organized than in the Roman Empire during the life of Christ in whose world it just became newly prevalent (2 Cor. v. 17). The apostle, therefore, laid it down as a rule, that Master never commanded that slavery as it then existed should be abolished, like other evils,—idolatry, for instance,—by the direct act of his followers; and further, that, for three hundred years after his advent, no writer among either the defenders or the enemies of Christianity ever spoke of the abolition of slavery as a consequence of the new doctrine (Biot, 129). It seems, however, equally clear that the total change which has since taken place in the opinion of the civilized world in regard to slavery has been mainly due to the gradual outgrowth of Christian doctrine, morals, and example. This inconsistency can only be explained by a view of the history of the opinion of the church on this subject.

1. Relations of Christianity towards Slavery to the Reign of Constantine. — Among the early converts there were, of course, masters and slaves. The apostle Paul preaches liberty to the individual; because the gospel concerns the total abolition of human distinctions in a race which had a common Father, and were the subjects of a common redemption. He insisted, also, that in the new kingdom all men were equal in the sight of God, who was no respecter of persons, whatever they might be as subjects of the Roman emperor: nevertheless, he maintained the duty of obedience on the part of the slave, and the claim of authority on the part of the master, as not only sanctioned, but commanded, by the new doctrine. The apostle, and his followers during the first three centuries, accepted slavery as a fact, a settled condition of Roman society which they were as powerless to change, had they so desired, as to change the imperial government itself. The object, the only object which was then practicable, was to remedy moral evils under existing institutions. The apostles and fathers addressed their exhortations to the heart rather than to the intellect of the downtrodden classes. They taught meekness and humility, and consecrated for the first time in history the servile virtues. They seem to have regarded the service of God by slaves as conferring upon them, in an important sense, personal freedom of the early Christians, quite as much as slavery ought, we think, to have done; but all these evils the Christians met with submission and resignation and by their own example of good works and virtues. When the Roman law came in conflict with their Christian duties, they made no futile attempts at change by revolutionary force and violence. An illustration of their position is found in the history of the Quakers, who gained all their early strength by opposing the iniquities of society in the reign of Charles II.; and yet they remained loyal subjects of the king.

Opinion of the Christian Fathers in regard to Slavery.— It cannot be doubted that the opinions of many of the Fathers on this subject were derived from the moral philosophy of the stoics of the empire. "Liberty," says Epictetus, "does not consist in the enjoyment of the things we desire, but in our having no desires." Marcus Aurelius made the question of true liberty dependent upon the mind and the will of the individual. The Fathers taught, after the example of St. Paul, that the true slavery was the slavery of sin. St. Jerome insists that there is no true freedom except in the knowledge of the truth. St. Ambrose says, all perception of liberty a more noble servitude, in which freemen and slaves may unite, and where both may work together for the good of others. According to St. Augustine, the inferior position of woman relatively to man, as well as slavery, was introduced into the world at the same time and by the same means, the sin of Adam. Clerics were not required by the church to accept this idea, but it did recommend the suppression of slavery, lest men should lose an opportunity of seeing how nobly liberty of soul could be preserved in the body of the slave. And yet, with these opinions of the advantages of the existing system, the Fathers speak of the original equality of mankind, of the fraternal love which should bind all men together, of that great human family of which tyranny, and not nature, had made two races, of the dignity of man created in the image of God, and, above all, of the sin of Adam, while he became a slave through the sin of Adam, becomes a freeman through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. (See Wallon: Histoire de l'Esclavage dans l'Antiquite, vol. iii., for full details on this point.)

While Christianity did not attack what may be called the principle of slavery in the Roman Empire, it did not content itself with preaching merely moderation to the masters, and resignation to the slaves: it favored the manumission of slaves (Const. apost., iv. q. t. i. p. 297), and strove to suppress or mitigate those features of slavery which made men forget that they were all children of the same family on a footing of equality with their masters in the new "City of God." In this city all, slaves and free, worshipped the same Father; they were bound by the same law; their religion taught them that they were all brethren, sharing in the offices of the church and the administration of its charities, members of the same collegium in the new Roman sense, with equal rights as such, and, above all, with the same hope of a common reward in the life to come.

Doubtless there were many evils in Roman society, established by law or usage, which shocked the moral sense of the early Christians quite as much as slavery ought, we think, to have done; but all these evils the Christians met with submission and resignation and by their own example of good works and virtues. When the Roman law came in conflict with their Christian duties, they made no futile attempts at change by revolutionary force and violence. An illustration of their position is found in the history of the Quakers, who gained all their early strength by opposing the iniquities of society in the reign of Charles II.; and yet they remained loyal subjects of the king.

The Christian Fathers, at the Council of Nicaea and afterwards, procured some legislation which forbade the employment of slaves as gladiators, and of women as actresses; but in practice these prohibitions were of no avail, such was the passion of the populace for theatrical spectacles. By the same influence was the manumission of slaves, that manumissions should be thenceforth made in the church, in the presence of the bishop, rather than in that of the praetor, in order to give greater sacredness to the act. This custom was transmitted to the medieval church.

So Constantine gave the right to the parents of new-born children to sell them into slavery; and this law, which was in direct opposition to the provisions of the old Roman code, was, it is said, rendered necessary by the increasing misery of the times, and was adopted as an alternative against permitting the children to perish from neglect and starvation.

From the time of Constantine to that of Alexis Comnenus (1095), there was, it is now apparent, in the Eastern Empire, a secret conflict of opinion between the Christian authorities and the imperial government concerning the treatment of slaves. A striking illustration of the nature of this conflict is found in the general opinion that the marriage of a slave in the church made him ipso facto a freeman. Up to the time of Basil the Macedonian, no such marriage was permitted to take place; the union of male and female slaves being still regarded as contubernalium, not having the sanction of the connubium, essential to the valid, legal marriage of the Romans. Basil (867-886) directed that the priestly benediction should hallow the marriage of slaves. Thus enactment met with violent opposition from the deeply rooted prejudices of centuries, and was often evaded. Alexis Comnenus renewed the edict, invoking for its support the Christian maxim, "one God, one faith, one baptism," and directed that all slaves whose masters forbade that they should be married in the church should become free. See Wallon, iii. 402, and Milman’s History of Latin Christianity, i. p. 48.

In the Western Empire, after it was conquered by the Teutonic tribes, domestic slaves were still to be found; although the vast majority of the bondmen were serfs, who, like the Roman coloni, were adscripti gleboe, and could not be sold apart from the land, of which they formed, in legal phrase, an incident. Many of the harshest features of the slave-code of the empire and of the Barbary pirates were kept up for the government of these serfs. The tendency, under the feudal system during the middle age, was to replace slavery by serfage; and this last form of servitude died out gradually in Europe, when the employers of labor, from a variety of motives, chiefly economic and selfish, found it to their advantage to pay wages, and to agree with their serfs that they should hold their lands on condition of rendering services thereon, certain in kind, and fixed in amount.

We are not to suppose that either the church or the clergy (who were all, in the earlier period, of the conquered races) were unmindful of the treatment of the serfs and bond-laborers during this age. The church did not attack mere slave-holding,—indeed, under the operation of the feudal system, churches and monasteries became, by the gift of the faithful, among the largest slave-holders and proprietors of serfs,—but it constantly protested against abuses of the system, and in favor of humane measures. Charles L. Brace (Gesta Christi, p. 229) says that thirty-seven church councils passed laws favorable to slaves. In the middle age no Christian captives were permitted to be sold into slavery; the right of asylum in the churches was offered to fugitive slaves; large sums were spent for their ransom; manumissions were frequent, and were encouraged by the church as acts inspired by the love of God; for the benefit of the soul of the master. Still, the noble declaration of Pope Gregory the Great, towards the close of the sixth century, "that slaves should be freed because Christ became man in order to redeem us," does not seem to have been the guide if the church’s policy during the middle age. Larroque (L’Esclavage chez les Nations Christiennes, 65-118), indeed, gives a list of fifteen councils of the church, whose decrees, he claims, were unfavorable to the freedom of the slave.

Personal slavery having disappeared in Europe in the fourteenth century, it was revived upon a gigantic scale on this continent shortly after the discovery of America. The scarcity of labor in the New World, and the necessity for it, seem to have overcome all objections to the system, whether founded upon motives of Christian duty, or upon economic considerations. All the European nations, Catholic and Protestant, who had colonies in America, engaged in transporting slaves from the coast of Africa to this continent. The result was, that, according to the calculation of Sir Arthur Helps, there were carried between the years 1579 and 1807 more than five millions of human beings from Africa to America, where they and their descendants became slaves. For more than two centuries and a half no voice, either in the church or out of it, was publicly heard against the slave-trade and its consequences. About the middle of the eighteenth century, however, two distinct movements become apparent. They are distinct, because one was based on philosophical, and the other on Christian, grounds; and because one was confined to France, and the other to England. Upon one or the other of them, modern opinion and legislation in regard to negro slavery have been based. The philosophical basis is found in that portion of the celebrated work of Rousseau, Emile, called Profession de foi d’un Vicaire Savoyard. The views there laid down made a profound impression upon all writers on theories of government during the remainder of the century, and formed the element of strength in the French Revolution. According to Rousseau, man is a being by nature good, loving justice and order. In an ideal state of society each member would be free, and the equal of every other,—equal, because no person, or family, or class, would seek for any rights or privileges of which any other was deprived; and free, because each one would have his share in determining the rule common to all.

These doctrines, and the vast system which grew out of them, were, for various reasons, embraced with the utmost enthusiasm in France. People looked for the millennium as a consequence of their adoption to an age, when, according to Condorcet, "the sun shall shine only on freemen, when tyrants and slaves and priests shall survive only in history and on the stage." It is curious that the first public official document in which these opinions are clearly set forth should be our own Declaration of Independence; for it is there proclaimed that all men are "equal," and that "they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." So in France, the first article of "The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen," adopted in 1789, at the beginning of the Revolution, asserts, "Men are born free and equal, and have the same rights." And as a logical result of this declaration, based upon the teaching of Rousseau, the French Convention (Feb. 4, 1794) decreed that negro slavery should be abolished in all the French Colonies, and that all men therein should have the rights of French citizens. Two things are worthy of remark concerning this decree: (1) That it was the first act by which any nation in Europe decreed the abolition of slavery; and, (2) That the men and the nation adopting it were so far from being Christians, that they had, only three months before its date, enthroned and worshipped a woman as the goddess of reason in the Cathedral of Notre Dame at Paris.

In the tide of these attacks of the French philosophers on slavery as a violation of natural rights, there began a movement about the same time, chiefly in England and in this country, having the same object in view, but founded wholly upon convictions of Christian duty. Conscience was here substitute for mere sentiment, as the impulse to action; and the result was that earnest, persistent, and personal work which is purported by deep, conscientious conviction of duty. The African slave-trade was made at first the main point of attack by the abolitionists. In 1772 Granville Sharp urged its suppression on religious grounds. Just before the Revolution, Virginia petitioned that no more African slaves should be sent into the Colony; a few years later, Clarkson, a man of deeply religious nature, gave up his whole life to efforts to convince his countrymen that they should prohibit the slave-trade by law, as violating every principle of Christian humanity. The only religious denomination which as a body took an active part in this work was the Quakers, who presented to the House of Commons a petition for the abolition of the slave-trade in 1784. By incessant work, and constant agitation of the subject in the press and public meetings, the little band of abolitionists gained the support of many prominent public men in England, Wilberforce, Pitt, Fox, and Burke among the rest. Such was the feeling roused by the discussion of the subject, and especially the general conviction of the violation of Christian duty in maintaining the traffic, that, forced at last by the public consent, Parliament abolished the slave-trade in 1807. This movement in England may be considered as directed wholly by Christian sentiment.

In the United States the foreign slave-trade was prohibited in 1808 by virtue of a power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Shortly afterwards, all the maritime nations of Europe followed the example of England and of this country; and the work was fittingly crowned by the declaration of the European Congress of Vienna in 1815, engaging all the powers to discourage the traffic, that, forced at last by the public consent, Parliament abolished the slave-trade in 1807. This movement in England may be considered as directed wholly by Christian sentiment.

In this country the testimony of the Quakers, as a religious body, against slavery has been uniform from the beginning. In 1688 the German Friends residing in Germantown, now a part of Philadelphia, petitioned the Yearly Meeting to take measures against slaveholding. From 1696 to 1776, the society was not made a subject of discipline, notwithstanding that the old rule affirming slaveholding, as violating every principle of Christian duty, was still unrepealed. Just before the Revolution, Virginia petitioned that no more African slaves should be sent into the Colony; a few years later, Clarkson, a man of deeply religious nature, gave up his whole life to efforts to convince his countrymen that they should prohibit the slave-trade by law, as violating every principle of Christian humanity. The only religious denomination which as a body took an active part in this work was the Quakers, who presented to the House of Commons a petition for the abolition of the slave-trade in 1784. By incessant work, and constant agitation of the subject in the press and public meetings, the little band of abolitionists gained the support of many prominent public men in England, Wilberforce, Pitt, Fox, and Burke among the rest. Such was the feeling roused by the discussion of the subject, and especially the general conviction of the violation of Christian duty in maintaining the traffic, that, forced at last by the public consent, Parliament abolished the slave-trade in 1807. This movement in England may be considered as directed wholly by Christian sentiment.

In this country the testimony of the Quakers, as a religious body, against slavery has been uniform from the beginning. In 1688 the German Friends residing in Germantown, now a part of Philadelphia, petitioned the Yearly Meeting to take measures against slaveholding. From 1696 to 1776, the society nearly every year declared "the importing, purchase, or sale of slaves" by its members to be a "disownable offence." John Woolman and Anthony Benezet, illustrious as Quaker philanthropists, were the pioneer abolitionists of modern times. In 1770 the holding of slaves was prohibited by the discipline of the Society of Friends, and since that time its members have always been conspicuous in supporting antislavery opinions and legislation.

The highest judicatory of the Presbyterian Church in this country is said (Stanton: The Church and the Rebellion, p. 398) to have made a formal declaration in favor of the abolition of slavery no less than six times between 1787 and 1836; viz., in 1787, in 1795, re-affirming its action in 1787; in 1795, by expressing "the deepest concern that any vestiges of slavery remained in the country;" in 1815, and again in 1818, denouncing slavery "as utterly inconsistent with the law of God." In 1845 and in 1849 the General Assembly (Old School) in its action, without avowing any change of opinion as to the sinfulness of slavery, dwelt more particularly upon the formidable obstacles to the practical work of emancipation. In 1884, during the Rebellion, that body being no longer hampered by complications of this kind, proclaimed openly "the evil and guilt of slavery," and its earnest desire for its extirpation.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has been opposed to slavery from the beginning. At the organization of the General Conference in 1784, a general rule of its discipline was adopted, declaring slavery contrary "to the golden law of God and the inalienable rights of mankind," and directing that preachers holding slaves should be expelled. Still, the rule was often evaded, and not executed, out of regard for the position of the Southern members of the denomination. After 1808 slaveholding among the private members of the society was not made a subject of discipline, notwithstanding that the old rule affirming slavery to be a great evil, and that slaveholding should be a bar to office in the church, was still un repeal.

The aggressive antislavery sentiment at the North was always very powerful among the Methodists; and in the General Conference of 1844 it was strongly evoked to effect the passage of a resolution by which Bishop Andrew, who had come into the possession of certain slaves in right of his wife, was requested to suspend the exercise of all episcopal functions until the slaves were freed. This led to the disruption of the conference, and the formation of two Methodist Episcopal churches in this country,—one at the North, and the other at the South.

It must be remembered that there were, before the war, in the Northern States, vast multitudes of Christians of thoroughly antislavery sentiments who took no active part in the abolition movement, because they were restrained by conscientious convictions as to their duties as citizens; but when slavery was made the pretext of rebellion, and war against the government, an attempt was made to found an empire the corner-stone of which was slavery, and especially when the National Government had decreed the emancipation of the slaves, every motive for its further toleration was removed.

SMALEY, John, D.D., b. in Columbia, Conn., June 4, 1754; d. in New Britain, Conn., June 1, 1820, within three years of being eighty-two years old. He was prepared for Yale College by his pastor, Eleazer Wheelock, afterward president of Dartmouth; was befriended while at Yale by Ezra Stiles, afterward president of the college; was graduated in 1756. He was thought by Dr. Joseph Bellamy, he was ordained April 19, 1758, over the Congregational Church in New Britain, Conn. He remained in this pastorate more than fifty-five years. In the pulpit he fixed his eyes on his manuscript, read it with a harsh and nasal voice, with few, and those awkward, gestures; yet he enchanted the attention of his hearers by his exhibition of naked doctrines,—often the distinguishing doctrines of Calvinism. His success as a theological instructor was yet more remarkable. Twenty of his pupils can now be remembered. One of them was an eminent revivalist, and was accustomed to read in the pulpit a printed sermon of Smalley, and to read it with such impressive elocution that the reports of its influence are well-nigh fabulous. Two of Smalley's pupils were Nathanael Emmons of Franklin, and Ebenezer Porter, who, as a professor at Andover, exerted a formative influence on the seminary. Two other theological pupils of Smalley turned their attention afterward from the ministerial to the legal profession. One of these was Oliver Ellsworth, who became chief justice of the United States: the other was Jeremiah Mason, to whom Daniel Webster ascribed much of his own success at the bar. The pupils of Smalley were charmed with his wit, but often awed by the severity of his criticisms. He studied fourteen hours a day, yet made no parade of learning. He was confident in his opinions, and impatient of contradiction, but was venerated for his profound and simple-hearted piecés. Four of his sermons had an epochal influence. Two of the four were on Natural and Moral Inability, published in 1768, republished in England. Two were entitled Justification through Christ an Act of Free Grace, and None but Believers sat-ed out of the Kingdom of Heaven, repeated republished. In addition to other sermons in separate pamphlets, Dr. Smalley published in 1803 a volume of Discourses, and in 1814, when he was eighty years old, a second volume. EDWARDS A. PARK.

SMARAGDUS, abbot of the monastery of St. Michael, situated on the Meuse, in the diocese of Verdun, was one of the most learned theologians of the Carolingian age, and held in great esteem both by Charlemagne and Lewis the Pious. His writings, however, consisting of commentaries on the New Testament, on the rules of St. Benedict, etc., are mere compilations, altogether without originality. They are found in Migne: Patr. Lat., vol. 102. Another Smaragdus, whose true name was Ardo, was a friend of Benedict of Aniane, and wrote his life. See Act. Sanct., and Migne: Patr. Lat., vol. 103. ZÖCKLER.

SMART, Christopher, b. at Shipbourne, Kent, 1722; d. in the King's Bench prison, 1771; fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge, 1745; followed literature in London, and led a disorderly and dissipated life, which did not quench his religious feeling. Among his works are The Parables of Christ done into Verse, 1765; On the Divine Attributes; and A Translation of the Psalms of David attempted in the Spirit of Christianity, with Hymns for the Fasts and Festivals, 4to, 1765. These are piously intended, and curious, but met with no success. More memorable is his Song to David, written on the wall of a madhouse, or, according to the old tradition, indented with a key on the wainscot, he being debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper. F. M. BIRD.

SMECTYMNUUS, a word made up of the initials of S(tephen) H(arshall), E(dmund) C(alder), T(homas) Y(ong), M(atthew) W(illiams), and W(illiam) S(purstow), who composed in common a treatise in reply to Bishop Joseph Hall's Humble Remonstrance to the high court of Parliament, Lond. 1640, under the title, An answer to a book entitled "An humble remonstrance, in which the original of liturgy and episcopacy is discussed," 1641 (104 pp. 4to); and later in the same year, A vindication of the answer to the hum-antiquity of liturgies, or forms of prayer; (2) of the apostolic institution of diocesan episcopacy. See NAZARETH: Hist. Puritans, vol. 1. pt. ii. c. vii. HALLER, 2 vols., London, 1834). In 1838, Smith accompanied Dr. Edward Robinson on a journey in 1852, and contributed materials to the accuracy and discoveries of Robinson's Researches. The expedition, which lasted a year, and during which the travelers visited the grave of Henry Martyn at Tocat, resulted in the establishment of a mission among that people.

Smith published an account of the journey, in Missionary Researches in Armenia, of the Rev. Eli Smith and H. G. O. Dwight, etc. (Boston, 1853, 2 vols., London, 1854). In 1838, Dr. Smith accompanied Dr. Edward Robinson on a journey from Suez through the Sinaitic peninsula and up the Jordan. He accompanied the same scholar on his journey in 1839, and contributed materially to the accuracy and discoveries of Robinson's Researches. In 1846, he began his translation of the Bible into Arabic, having the assistance of Butrus el-Bistany and Nasif el-Yasee. By August, 1853, he had completed the translation of the four Gospels. Before his death he succeeded in translating the entire New Testament, and the Pentateuch, historical books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other portions of the Old Testament. His labors have been supplemented by the scholarship of Dr. Van Dyke. Dr. Smith possessed eminent attainments in Arabic, and will always have a distinguished place in the annals of the American mission at Beyrout. For a good account of his life, see Missionary Herald, 1857, pp. 224—229.

SMITH, George, b. in England about 1825; d. at Aleppo, Aug. 19, 1876. He began life as bank-note, copper and steel plate engraver; taught himself the Oriental languages, and first came into prominence in 1866 by a contribution to the London Athenaeum, upon the "Tribute of Jehu," which revealed his studies, assiduously carried on at leisure moments, of the Ninevite sculptures in the British Museum. In 1867 he was appointed a senior assistant of the Lower Section in the department of Egyptian and Oriental Antiquities in the British Museum, and from thence's position in bis department of Assyrian scholars. He made expeditions to Nineveh in 1873 at the expense of the London Daily Telegraph (newspaper), and in 1874 and 1875 on behalf of the British Museum, and obtained immense treasure in cuneiform inscriptions, etc. His subsequent works on the Assyrians were: "History of Assyria from the Monuments" (1875), "The Assyrian Eponym Canon" (1875), "Chaldean Account of Genesis" (1876, new ed. by Sayce, 1880), "History of Sennacherib." SMITH, Henry Boynton, D.D., LL.D., an eminent American scholar and divine; b. in Portland, Me., Nov. 21, 1815; d. in New York, Feb. 7, 1877. He was graduated at Bowdoin College in the class of 1834; studied theology at Andover and Bangor, written before he held any charge. He went abroad on account of ill-health, and passed the winter in Paris, hearing lectures at the Sorbonne, at the Institute, and at the Royal Academy. The next two years were spent chiefly at Halle and Berlin, in enriching his mind with the treasures of German thought and culture. The friendships formed at this time with Tholuck, Ulrici, Neander, Twesten, Baron von Kottwitz, Kahnis, Besser, Godet, and others, eminent then or since as theologians and men of faith, he counted among the greatest blessings of his life abroad. After a short visit to England, he returned home in the summer of 1840, and was at once licensed to preach the gospel. But his health again gave way, delaying his settlement until the close of 1842, when he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church at West Amesbury, Mass. Here he labored four years with zeal and success, supplying also during two winters the chair of Hebrew at Andover. In 1847 he became professor of mental and moral philosophy in Amherst College. In 1850 he accepted a call to the chair of church history in the Union Theological Seminary of New-York City. Three years later he was transferred to the chair of systematic theology. In both departments he wrought with the hand of a master, and, alike by his teaching and his writings, won a commanding position as one of the foremost scholars and divines of the country. His influence was soon felt throughout the Presbyterian Church, and was especially powerful in shaping opinion in the New School branch of it to which he belonged. He wrote a good deal for the editorial columns of The New-York Evangelist, on religious and ecclesiastical topics of the day; while in The American Theological Review, in The American Presbyterian and Theological Review, and, later, in The Presbyterian Quarterly and Princeton Review, he discussed the leading philosophical and theological questions of the age. Of the first-named review he was the sole editor, and of the other two he was joint editor. He contributed articles on Schelling, Hegel, Calvin, Pantheism, the Reformed Churches, and other subjects, to Appleton's Cyclopedia. In 1859 he published Tables of Church History, a work embodying the results of vast labor. In 1863 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly at Philadelphia, and the next year, at Dayton, preached a sermon later published in Christian Union and Ecclesiastical Re-union, which did much to bring together again the two severed branches of the Presbyterian Church. He took a leading part in the memorable Union Convention at Philadelphia in 1867. During the war he wrote very ably in support of the national cause. In 1859 he revisited Europe, also in 1866, and again in 1869. The latter visit, which was caused by overwork and the breaking-down of his system, lasted a year and a half, and included a journey... to the East. After his return he resumed his labors in the seminary, but with health so greatly enfeebled, that early in 1874 he resigned his chair, and was made professor emeritus. After long struggles with disease, and severe suffering, he entered into rest.

Whether regarded as a theologian, as a philosophical thinker, or as a general scholar and critic, Dr. Smith was one of the most gifted and accomplished men of his time. Such was the opinion of him often expressed by those best qualified to judge, both at home and abroad. Unfortunately, with the exception of his invaluable History of the Church of Christ, in Chronological Tables, his writings consist chiefly of occasional discourses, essays, and reviews. But, although occasional, they discuss many of the most important and vital questions of the age; and they do it with such exhaustive power, that in several instances the discourse or essay might readily be enlarged into a book, with no other change than that of greater fulness of statement and illustration. His address at Andover in 1849, on The Relations of Faith and Philosophy, may serve as an example. The strong points are so vividly presented, the principles involved are set forth with such distinctness, the discussion is so luminous and complete, that a whole treatise on the subject could hardly add to the force of the argument. This address was greatly admired, and at once attracted to its author general attention. It was reprinted in Edinburgh, and elicited the highest praise from such men as Sir William Hamilton and Rev. Dr. John Brown. Referring to this address, and to the inaugural discourse on Church History, Mr. Bancroft, the eminent historian, wrote to Dr. Smith, "I know no one in the country but yourself who could have written them." It is not too much to say that the United States has produced no theologian who combined in a higher degree than Dr. Smith great learning, the best literary and philosophical culture, wise, discriminating thought, and absolute devotion to Christ and his kingdom. It is deeply to be regretted that he was not spared to give to the public his theological system. It had been elaborated with the utmost fidelity and care, as well as of his faith and his lifelong studies, and would have been a lasting boon to the world. Its informing idea is happily expressed in his early address at Andover; as, e.g., in the passage, "Christianity is not only an historic revelation and an internal experience, but also an organic, diffusive, plastic, and triumphant force in human history; and in this history, as in the revelation and as in the experience, the centre around which all revolves is the person of Jesus Christ." Professor Smith was specially gifted as a theological teacher, arousing enthusiasm in his students, inspiring them with reverence for the Holy Scriptures, fostering in them a devout, earnest, catholic spirit, dealing gently and wisely with their doubts; and impressing upon them continually, alike by example and instruction, the sovereign claims of their Redeemer, the glory of his kingdom, and the blessedness of a life consecrated to him. His services to the Union Theological Seminary were varied and inestimable. The Presbyterian Church in the United States also owes him a lasting debt of gratitude. He has been called "the hero of re-union," and certainly no man better merited the praise. His genial influence as a teacher of divine truth was equally wide and strong, and, wherever felt, it was an ennobling and irenic influence, tending to exalt the faith once delivered to the saints, and to draw closer together all sincere disciples of Jesus. Nor did his influence cease with his death. His name continues to be spoken with love and reverence; his opinions are still full of vital force; and all schools of Christian thought appeal to him as to a master in Israel. A very full and admirable account of him will be found in Henry Boynton Smith; his Life and Work, edited by his wife, New York, 1881. See also Faith and Philosophy, Discourses and Essays by Henry B. Smith, edited by Dr. Prentiss, New York, 1877; Apologetics, a Course of Lectures, 1882; Introduction to Christian Theology, comprising (I.) A General Introduction, (II.) Special Introduction, or the Prolegomena of Systematic Theology, 1883, Systematic Theology, 1874 (all edited by Dr. Karr). GEORGE L. PRENTISS.

SMITH, John, the Cambridge Platonist; b. at Achurch, near Oundle, in Northamptonshire, 1618; entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, April, 1638; chosen fellow of Queen's, 1644; d. there Aug. 7, 1652. His fame rests upon his posthumous Select Discourses (London, 1660, 4th ed., Cambridge, 1859), which "show an uncommon reach of understanding, and penetration, as well as an immense treasure of learning in their author." See his biography in the Discourses; John Tulloch: Rational Theology, vol. ii.; art. Platonists (Cambridge).

SMITH, John Cotton, D.D., Protestant-Episcopal; b. at Andover, Mass., Aug. 4, 1826; d. in New-York City, Monday, Jan. 9, 1882. He was a descendant of John Cotton and Cotton Mather, and a grandson of Dr. Leonard Woods; and son of Dr. Leonard Woods; b. at Andover, Mass.; graduated at Bowdoin College in 1847; was from 1850 to 1852 rector of St. John's Church, New-York City; from 1852 to 1856, assistant minister in Trinity Church, Boston; and from 1860 till his death, rector of the Church of the Ascension, New-York City.

By his writings, sermons, and addresses, and by the attractive influence of his personal character, he did more, perhaps, than any one person of his time to develop a generous sympathy between various schools of thought, and that state of harmony which now prevails in the Episcopal Church.

SMITH, John Pye, D.D., LL.D., b. at Sheffield, May 25, 1774; d. at Guildford, Surrey (London), Feb. 5, 1851; an English Congregational divine and author; studied theology at Rotherham College, under Rev. Dr. Edward Williams; was professor of theology at Homerton College from 1805 to 1850. A man of unusual learning, and of most admirable Christian spirit. He was one of the earliest converts, from the time when he recognized the value of the contributions to theology made by German scholars, and to essay a reconciliation between modern science and divine revelation, bringing on himself thereby no small suspicion on the part of less enlightened brethren. His Scripture Testimony to the Messiah (London, 1816–1821, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1858) is an elaborate exegetical study of all the passages of Scripture referring to Christ. In Four Discourses on the Sacrifice and Priesthood of Jesus Christ (London, 1828, 5th ed., Edin., 1858) he defends the Evangelical against the Socinian doctrine. Scripture and Geology (London, 1819, 5th ed., 1849) was the Conгрегatонаl Lecture for 1839. His First Lines of Christian Theology was published after his death (1854, 2d ed., 1860), and contains his lectures to his classes, in syllabus form. See J. Medway: Memoirs of the Life and Writings of John Pye Smith, London, 1853.

SMITH, Samuel Stanhope, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian; b. at Pequea, Penna., March 16, 1750; d. at Princeton, N.J., Aug. 21, 1819. He was graduated from Princeton College, 1767; tutor there, 1770–73; first president of Hampden Sidney College, 1777; professor of moral philosophy, 1779; and president, 1794–1812. In 1798 he was a member of the committee which drew up the Form of Government of the Presbyterian Church. He had a high reputation as a pulpit orator and a college president. He published Sermons, New York, 1797; Evidence of Christian Religion, Phila., 1809; Moral and Political Philosophy, Trenton, N.J., 1812; Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, New Brunswick, N.J., 1815; (posthumous) Sermons, with Memoir, Philadelphia, 1821, 2 vols. See Sprague: Annals, iii. 335–345.

SMITH, Sydney, Church of England; b. at Woodford, Essex, June 8, 1771; d. in London, Feb. 22, 1845. He was graduated at Oxford, 1792; took holy orders, 1794; was minister of Charlotte Episcopal chapel, Edinburgh, 1797–1802; canon of Bristol, 1828; and canon residuary of St. Paul's, 1831. He is one of the most famous of English wits; but he was also a forcible, earnest preacher, and a sagacious critic and reviewer. He was the first editor of The Edinburgh Review. Besides numerous Sermons, he published Letters on the Subject of the Catholics by Peter Pymly, London, 1808, which did much to promote Catholic emancipation, and Elementary Sketches of Moral Philosophy, 1830. See his Memoir by his daughter, Lady Holland, London and New York, 1855, 2 vols., and at the Art. in Allibone.

SMITH, William Andrew, D.D., a leading minister of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. at Fredericksburg, Va., Nov. 29, 1802; d. at Richmond, Va., March 1, 1870. His parents dying while he was a child, he was cared for and brought up in the family of Mr. Hill, a worthy merchant of Petersburg, Va. He professed religion at seventeen years of age, prepared for the ministry, and was admitted into the Virginia Conference in 1825. He rose rapidly to eminence in the conference. In 1833 he was appointed agent for Randolph-Macon College, then in its infancy. In September of that year, by a painful accident, he was made a cripple for life. He continued to fill many of the most important stations in his conference until 1848, when he was elected to the presidency of Randolph-Macon College, and while here he raised, largely by his own personal efforts, an endowment of one hundred thousand dollars. This position, as well as that of professor of mental and moral philosophy, he filled with great acceptability and efficiency until 1866, when he moved to St. Louis, Mo. After serving here as pastor of Centenary Church for two years, he became president of Central College, located at Fayette in that State, and raised for the institution at once, by his personal exertion, about a hundred thousand dollars. About this time he became the victim of a fatal malady, which two years later, while on a visit to Richmond, Va., terminated in his death. He was a member of every general conference from 1822 till his death. At the eventful general conference of 1844 he took a specially prominent part; and in the celebrated appeal of Rev. Francis A. Harding, and in the extra-judicial trial of Bishop James O. Andrew, he won a national reputation for deliberative and forensic eloquence and for rare powers of argument and debate. From that time he became one of the foremost men in Southern Methodism. He was a hard student and an earnest thinker. His sermons were clear, forcible, and instructive, being able discussions of the cardinal doctrines of the gospel. He was more of a logician than of an orator, yet his logic was not cold and dry, but steeped in emotion, and aglow with zeal. His ministry was blessed with powerful revival. He was always bold to avow and defend his sentiments, regardless of consequences. The vigor and clearness of his intellect, his candor, independence, energy, and unquestioned ability, caused him to stand in the front rank of the leading minds in the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. (See biographical sketch by Bishop J. C. Granberry, in the General Minutes for 1870.) His Philosophy and Practice of Slavery (Nashville, 1857) attracted wide attention, and was universally recognized as one of the ablest presentations of the Southern side of the slavery question ever published.

SMYRNA, situated on the Hermean Gulf on the coast of Lydia, became very prosperous after the time of Alexander the Great, and was, during the first two centuries of the Christian era, one of the principal commercial centres of the world, and the richest and most beautiful city of Asia Minor. It contained a Jewish and a Christian congregation, and the latter had occasion to prove its faith under persecutions instituted by the former (Rev. i. 11, ii. 8). Its venerable bishop, Polycarp, suffered martyrdom under Marcus Aurelius in 169. The city was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake in 176. It has now a mixed population of about 150,000. SMYTH, John, founded for Separatists; date of birth unknown; d. in Holland in 1612. Like many of the separatists he was a churches of the General-Baptist type are found of John Smyth (q.v.), Thomas Helwys, John Torr, and a good preacher. Smyth accepted Arminian doctrine, took an anti-Paedobaptist view of baptism, and, with Thomas Helwys, published a "Confession of Faith," in twenty-six articles, of the General-Baptist pattern. Smyth died; but Helwys and some of his comrades came to London, and founded the General-Baptist Church of England. Smyth was a man of incorruptible sincerity, beautiful humility, glowing charity, a fair scholar, and a good preacher.

General Baptists, also called Arminian, Free-will, and Free Baptists. I. Origin. — Traces of churches of the General-Baptist type are found in the reign of Henry VIII., at Elythorne, Kent, Eng., and Bocking, or Braintree, in Essex. But the organized life of the General Baptists dates from 1611 (that of the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists from 1633), and becomes a distinct historical and continuous force under the leadership of John Smyth (q.v.), Thomas Helwys, John Morton, Leonard Busher, Henry Denne, and Dr. Du Veil.

II. Their Doctrinal Basis embraced, (1) the universality of redemption, hence the name of "General," (2) the obligation of baptism on all believers in Christ, (3) the essentially spiritual character of the church, and (4) the principle of absolute religious liberty, along with other doctrines common to the Reformed Faith of the opening years of the seventeenth century. Professor Masson, in his Life of Milton, vol. iii., states that the General Baptists were the first to pronounce with energy and distinctness in favor of the great modern idea of absolute liberty of conscience. Cf. Busher's book quoted at end.

III. Their organization embraced, (1) "assemblies," for the transaction of business common to the welfare of all the churches, not annual at first, but as occasion required; (2) "messengers," or "apostles," who visited the churches to "stir them up," and were also sent out to preach, not only in different parts of England, but also to Ireland, and even to Virginia and South Carolina (MSS. Proceedings of General Baptist Assembly, vol. ii. 32); (3) "elders," or pastors of churches; (4) "deacons," or helps in government. The churches were not fixed to any one building, but consisted of members scattered over wide areas, meeting in several buildings, and sometimes having two or three "elders." The discipline was most rigid, and extended to speech and dress. In this and other matters they were closely akin to the early Friends, or Quakers.

IV. Growth. — The General Baptists spread rapidly in the first quarter of a century of their existence. In 1649 there were forty churches in London. During the Commonwealth they were planted in most of the midland and southern counties of England, and had grown so extensively, that Thomas Grantham (1634-92), author of Christianismus Primitivus (published 1678, London), describes a petition presented to Charles II. In 1662, representing 30,000 General Baptists. Increased to 30,000 in 1692, they must have been one of the most numerous, as they were one of the most vigorous, of the English religious bodies.

V. Decay. — Several causes contributed to the rapid decline which followed. (1) They lacked organizers, like George Fox and John Wesley, and a few General-Baptist churchmen ventured to the Quakers. (2) Men of culture and ability were rare in the ministry. An educated pastorate was slighted. (3) They made their centre rural, and not metropolitan. (4) But chiefly they fell under the blight of that negative and critical spirit which nearly destroyed English Presbyterianism, enerated the Particular Baptists, Independents, and Episcopalians, and made the eighteenth century one of feeble convictions and sharp debate, of acute reasoning and practical godlessness. Matthew Caffyn, one of the "messengers," and elder of Horsham Church, in Surrey, was charged with Arianism. Discussion concerning the person of Christ became heated and hurtful; and in 1698 a rupture took place, and a fresh body, called "The General Association," was formed, in repudiation of Arianism. Three years afterwards a reconciliation was effected on a seemingly orthodox basis; but it was not enduring, and in 1709 the friends of comprehension withdrew, and reorganized themselves on the "Six Principles" of Heb. vi. 1, 2, and the declarations of the Assembly of 1688. This division lasted till 1731, when they came together again on the understanding... that difference of opinion concerning the Trinity and the person of Christ should be allowed.

VII. The New Connexion.—For the next forty years Arianism was quietly gaining sway, when in 1770 the New Connexion of General Baptists was formed in Whitechapel, London, out of (1) ten churches, containing 659 members, belonging to the assembly, and located in the south;
(2) five churches, embracing 976 members, in Leicestershire, Derbyshire, and Warwickshire, that had formed themselves on the General Baptist type solely by the study of the Scriptures;
and (3) a community of 69 members, which arose
in a similar fashion in Yorkshire under the Methodist Dan Taylor (q. v.), who forthwith became the leader of the New Connection. The object of this new federation was “to revive experimental religion or primitive Christianity in faith and practice;” and the basis of agreement added to the principles above named (§11) the declaration

SOCIOLISM. This word of modern origin, does not explain itself fully. By its connection with social, socialize, it ought to denote a doctrine or system which aims to make men social, or, more exactly, to bring about the ends involved in the social nature of man; or, if we give prominence to the supposed abuses of society, the system of equity and equality by which the abuses which are found in society, especially in old, established societies, may be removed. Giving to it some such definition, we find it to be a broader term than communism, which, by rules freely adopted, or by public force, aims at a common life on principles of equality, as far as their application is possible amid the natural differences of human beings.

But communistic experiments, although numerous if we glean them carefully out of the history of mankind, are all on the small scale, and, for the most part, are tried for particular purposes, such as for the pursuit of a religious life; or they are mere philosophical speculations, which seldom are put into practice. They are temporary, like the early Christian community at Jerusalem, where the exceptional poverty of many believers led to an equality of goods; or they are sanctioned by political communities, owing to a pervading opinion, of their religious character; or for some other use, like monastic brotherhoods:
or, whatever be the principle of their unions, they need the consent of the government and society to their existence, and thus depend on the general will of the great community around them, as well as on the permanent will of a succession of members, to keep up the same forms of common life. Thus, unless the society which surrounds them, although constructed on wholly different principles, defends and protects them, they will wither away, or will disband of themselves. Where they have been tolerably successful, their success seems to be partly due to an abridgment of the rights of the families of which they are composed, and to a mode of life, which, if adopted by all, would be far from promoting the ends of human brotherhood.

Communism, then, is no cure, on any theory, for the evils or corruptions of society. If it had a cure within itself, it could be of little avail, inasmuch as it withdraws its healing influences from society, and yet depends on society for protection. All separate communities, therefore, contain an anti-social principle. They are in spirit unlike families, and to a certain extent there is an opposition between their feeling and that of families. The family is so small a society, that it is obliged to look for the supply of a multitude of wants to the world around, and feels the protection of society in all things and continually. "The union of family life and communal life," as we have elsewhere remarked, "is not fitted to make the community system flourish. The two are different, and, to an extent, hostile principles. The family must draw off the interest of its members from the larger or communistic body which enclloses it, and concentrate them on itself." "The family implies a sort of privacy and seclusion from the world, without separation: the community implies separation from the world, and a new unity, inconsistent with, or controlling, the family union." Plato, in his republic, would not let the citizens of the warrior class know who their own children were, because they would thus have separate and personal interests. The communistic spirit, as distinguished from the socialistic, is indifferent to the good of the family, or hostile to it, and makes use of family for its own protection. Without doing any thing for society it could not exist. If a whole nation were divided up into communities, the national strength and the family tie both would be weakened. A state so constituted would resemble, in important respects, one consisting of small brotherhoods, or societies, or sects, but with much less of the family tie than is found in the latter when general society is as yet undeveloped.

We now come to consider the essence and genius of socialism: and here at the outset we labor to accomplish its task. It should raise money, which should be appropriated without remuneration of interest, in order to effectually organize labor. This should be done in such a manner as to prevent the creation of social works (ateliers) in the country.

The government itself must be invested with new power, such as no constitutional government has ever had, and no people has ever favored. The necessity of absolute power in the state has been acknowledged by socialists to be indispensable, as a means of overthrowing the existing relations of capital to labor. And, indeed, the necessity is too apparent to be doubted. If the state itself is to take the office of being sole capitalist, all other proprietors must be sooner or later "expropriated." It is to be the sole producer, through its capital invested in machinery and land, it can have, of course, no competitor. It, if, for instance, it decides what kinds of stuffs for wear shall be made, of course no others from abroad can be imported and sold in the land. It must determine the quality and quantity of things made. It must own the manufactories, it must put an end to all money-lending by private persons. Its power is shown to be tremendous by the single consideration that it must be authorized to remove laborers en masse from place to place, and to decide practically what objects shall be made in all the employments of life.

The experiment of modern times which comes nearest to socialism is that initiated by Louis Blanc, who has recently died, after winning distinction by his historical writings, and who was so prominent in his party at the downfall of Louis Philippe, in 1848, as to be chosen a member of the Provisional Government in France. He had, however, but a brief opportunity to put his plan of organizing labor into practice. Being compromised in the disturbances of May, 1848, he fled to England, where he lived many years. His socialist starting-point is not a new one.

"It is not the man who is responsible for his wrong-doings. To a society which is strong, and settled on a good basis, will make the individual good. The evils of slavery flow from inequality, and that from property. Property, then [i.e., personal or family property], is the great scourge of society: it is the veritable public crime.

"Government should be the supreme regulator of production, and capital must be invested in machinery and land, in order to accomplish its task. It should raise money, which should be appropriated without payment of interest, for the creation of social workshops (ateliers) in the most important branches of national industry. In
SOCIALISM.

As the division of society began to arise which had been ever, known in the world; and, if it should not be still, the unity with which demagogues socialistic doctrines was soon shown to be serious. The danger in a number of European states from an attitude of hostility to the bourgeois or class property is no easy one. In fact, a change like this could not be accomplished without a struggle of classes and interests such as has seldom, if ever, been known in the world; and, if it should succeed in a single country, every contiguous country, every civilized country, would feel the necessity of resisting it to preserve its own property, its commerce, its safety against the strife of classes, its good hopes for the future. Yet the danger in a number of European states from socialist doctrines was soon shown to be serious. A class of society, which was now called the proletariat, or the laboring-class, began to take an attitude of hostility to the bourgeoisie, or class of employers, in many parts of Europe, and a division of society began to arise which had been unknown on so large a scale and in such favorable circumstances before. One peculiarity of the new movement was that the modern science of political economy had come to be propagated among the operatives of the towns; another was the free movement of opinions from one country to another; a third, the increasing decay of religious faith and the spread of free thinking; another still, the impunity with which demagogues could spread revolutionary opinions through the lower strata of society, and, again, the greater ease of co-operation, not only among the laborers of the same crafts in the same centres of industry, but also among workingmen of all civilized lands. These causes, appearing not suddenly, but by slow degrees, together with the increased communication between different lands, with the growth of individual liberty, and, to an extent, with the progress of education, seemed to be leading society into new breakers on a great scale, and to bring on an angry struggle between governments and large masses of their subjects.

Before the February revolution in 1848, there had been workingmen's associations in several countries of Europe, and some very able leaders began their career before that period, such as among the Germans, Marx (recently dead), Engels, and Liebknecht; but the International Working-men's Association was not formed until 1864. Long before this, Marx aided in a manifesto of the communist party, which called on the proletariat of all lands to unite. "It demands the abolition of private property in the soil; the centralization of credit in a state bank, union of the means of intercourse in the hands of the state, national workshops, fertilizing and tilling the soil on a common prescribed plan, and gratuitous instruction." The plan of the General Association contemplated an annual congress of deputies, consisting of one from each branch association, section, or group, or of two when the members of the primaries amounted to more than five hundred. A general council of fifty was to meet at London, and every subordinate union, also, was to have a committee or council. The union spread through nearly all the countries of Europe, except in the German lands and in Austria, where the Workingmen's Union, founded by Lassalle, had pre-occupied the field.

Our limits forbid us to speak of the proceedings of this union at any length. At the congress of Lausanne, in 1867, it was maintained that "modern production on a great scale renders co-operative industry a necessity," and "that the state ought to be made the holder of the means of transport and circulation in order to annihilate the powerful monopoly of great companies." At the congresses of 1868 and 1869 a report on property revealed a difference of opinion, proving that the extreme theorists had not yet got complete ascendency. In 1868 it was decided that the ways of communication, and forests, soil, mines, coal-pits, and railroads ought to be common property. Dupont, general secretary of the International, used at this congress the following language: "We want no governments any longer, for governments oppress us by taxes; we want no armies any more, for armies butcher and murder us; we want no religion any longer, for religion stifles the understanding." At the congress of Basel, in 1869, it was moved and carried that society may abolish individual property, putting collective property in its place in the soil. On the same occasion a motion that the right of inheritance ought to be completely and "radically" abolished did not meet with entire acceptance.

In consequence of the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, no congress of this union was held in 1870; and the horrors during the siege of Paris in 1871, which were, without due cause, ascribed to the members of the International as originators, put the International under the ban of Europe. Socialism could not stand under the crimes of those with whom it sympathized. The Workingmen's Union was founded a little after the International, by a brilliant and accomplished man, Ferdinand Lassalle, whose early death was followed by the division of his adherents. Universal suffrage adopted by the North German Confederation weakened it again by satisfying the more moderate of the German socialists. In 1869 Liebknecht, an old socialist, founded the Social Democratic Workingmen's Party; and this was succeeded by the Socialist Workingmen's Party, at Gotha, in 1875. The extreme principles of the International prevailed in this new organization, as they have done in Germany ever since, over the more moderate form of socialism that was in vogue before.

Meanwhile, in 1871, the new empire was established; and, in the Reichstag, socialistic representatives, few, yet in increasing numbers, have had an opportunity to ventilate their opinions. Outside of the political arena, several professors of political economy have some leaning toward socialistic doctrines, although disagreeing among themselves. Such are Brentano, Schmoller, Schaeffle, F. A. Lange. The socialistic party is also extremely active in propagating its opinions through the press. Its strength at the polls has been estimated as being in 1877 from six to eight hundred thousand.

We close our sketch of socialism with considering some of the results to society from the system, if it should ever become predominant.

1. At present the instruments of work belong to the class of the capitalists. The dependence of the working-class, due to this fact, is held to be a cause of misery in its every turn. To liberate work, the means of production must be converted into the common property of society. Thus all land and instruments must cease to belong to private persons. All capitalists must be stripped of their possessions, however small in extent. The incomes of the present owners may be converted into terminable annuities, if states are able to take on them such a burden.

2. The reward of work, or wages, is, according to the doctrine of Marx, to be measured by time spent in work. Whether this principle would not ruin the whole plan is doubtful; for a sense of injustice on the part of the faithful would be roused against the idle, and thus some other measure of comparative wages would be demanded.

3. Tickets of work are to be given to each workman, which will entitle him to the value of his day's work, estimated in the productions which he needs. As all production is for the state, and all labor applied by those state, to another side of the subject,—to its relation to the family, the state, to individual character and the progress of society. Here, whatever side we take, we may see there is an infinite complication in the process, when the government takes the work of supply into its own hands.

4. By this process all money is superseded, except so far as dealings with foreign lands, where barter cannot be made use of, are concerned. Drafts must be issued by the government, and be payable in so many tickets of work.

5. The government, being the only employer, is free from all competition. But what is to prevent over-production, which is checked at present by want of sale? What is to prevent comparative over-production of articles in great use; for instance if too little food were produced to meet the amount of things manufactured?

6. The government, being the only transporter and distributor, will be liable to an infinity of mistakes, which are at present reduced to their minimum by individual caution. Wants of one thing, or in one place, cannot be supplied in another place in vogue another thing, by competition; for competition is excluded by the system. Every change must be provided for by the government, and new wants be met by new supplies, according to its judgment. The present rapid movements of industry would be retarded by the clogs and breaks necessary in the action of central power.

Could so vast a city as London, or even as New York, be sure of not being exposed to famines on the plan of destroying private capital?

7. International exchanges would add to the difficulties of a socialistic state. It must own vessels, collect things produced elsewhere, and pay for them by barter of productions not needed at home, or by purchasing gold and silver. Here, again, the stimulus of competition being necessarily absent, the agents of a government would be brought into straits which might be of most serious injury.

8. It must not be supposed that all the final results of labor will accrue to the laborer. The certificates of work will amount to an immense sum; but the deductions from them must be immense also. The expenses of governments, the support of all transporters, of education, of the poor, the sick, the disabled, the police, of legislation, official salaries,—which in such a state would include the payment to all who buy, sell, or carry,—the prevention, trial, and punishment of crime, the care of roads, protection of every sort, workhouse, in all its torturing form, involve an amount of certificates of work, which must be deducted from the reward of work, to an extent which no one can foresee. Lawyers, it is true, would, for the most part, cease. Inheritance would, or might, cease also,—at least the savings from labor invested in certificates of work would be, no doubt, small; and the absence of private means of acquisition would take away'a principal stimulus to work beyond the supply of pressing wants. A general equality just above the subsistence-point would, it is probable, prevail, and take away another most important stimulus.

But perhaps we have indulged in a useless method of looking at socialism on the industrial side, when there is so much uncertainty in the action of causes under new conditions. We turn to another side of the subject,—to its relations to the family, the state, to individual character and the progress of society. Here, whatever side we take, we may see there is an infinite complication in the process, when the government takes the work of supply into its own hands.

The state, as we have seen, must be invested, in socialism, with all power over industry; which thus may be called practically unfree. It must be a state of serfs with a democratic government over them. It is harsh or unjust to say that the slaves on a Southern plantation, under a slave-driver, were in some respects better off; for the master himself, over against the driver, might represent clemency and kindness.

Religion will not stand very high in the regard of socialists. Schaeffle says, in his Quintessence SOCIALISM.

SOCINUS.

of Socialism, that it is "through and through irreligious, and hostile to the church." But perhaps this may be owing to the fact that the religious institutions of society have hitherto been bulwarks against revolutionary causes like socialism, and that religious feeling involves a spirit of subordination to existing order, except when such order strikes at the roots of religion itself. In the social state it would be wholly uncertain whether a nation of laborers could or would restore religious brotherhood on the foundation of the New Testament, when once state churches should be overthrown.

And again: how would socialism affect individual character? Here we notice, first, that mere equality, with no power to rise above the condition of birth,—a form of life where competition, and advantage from special energy or ability are cut off,—would deaden nearly all the motives by which human nature is at present carried forwar

Leroux. Lorenz Stein has written in German a valuable history of socialism and communism in France, 1844.

SOCIÉTÉ EVANGÉLIQUE DE GENÈVE (the Evangelical Society of Geneva), the oldest of the Continental evangelical societies, was founded in 1831 for the spread of sound apostolic doctrine throughout Switzerland and France. It has a theological school at Geneva, supports numerous missionaries, pastors, and colportors, and is entirely dependent upon the funds yearly collected, not only in Switzerland, but in different parts of Europe, and from the United States of America. It is undenominational, having as its confession of faith substantially the creed of the Evangelical Alliance. It is the product of the revival of gospel truth which attended the labors of Robert Haldane (see art.). In the society's theological school, Gaussen, Malan, Pronier, and Merle D'Aubigné have taught. In the year from March, 1881 to March, 1882, the receipts were, from gifts and sales, 254,187 francs. In 1881 it celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, and issued a memorial volume, Récits et Souvenirs de quelques-uns de ses ouvriers. See its Annual Reports.

SOCIÉTÉ CENTRALE PROTESTANTE D'ÉVANGÉLISATION. This society, connected with the Reformed Church of France, was founded in 1852. Its centre is Paris, but it operates in all parts of France. Its object is to develop the faith of Protestants, and in every way advance the Protestant cause. It supports theological schools at Tournon and Bagnoles, and numerous churches, pastures, and stations. It has also fostered forty-two churches, that now they are independent of its help. During 1882 its receipts were 281,029 francs.

SOCINUS (Faustus) AND THE SOCINIANS. Faustus Socinus, or Fausto Sozini, was b. at Siena, 1539; d. at Lucalivice in Poland, 1604. Left an orphan at a tender age, his early education was neglected. Following the example of his ancestors, he at first devoted himself to the study of law, but corresponded with his uncle Lelio Sozini about religious questions. In 1559 the misfortunes of his family forced him to leave Italy; and he went to Lyons, and then to Zurich, where he spent three years examining the manuscripts of his uncle. It was from there, as he himself says, that Socinus got the suggestion of publishing the exposition of the first part of the first chapter of John (1562), which appeared anonymously. From 1562 to 1578 he was again in Italy, and at the court of Francesco de Medici in Florence, where he spent most of the time between 1574 and 1578 he spent in Basel, occupied with the elaboration of his system and disputations. The latter were the occasion of two of his principal writings. — De Jure Christi et Rerum, etc. by the Protestant preacher, Covet, and De statu primi hominis ante lapsum, against the Florentine Pucci. In 1579 he went to Poland, where the name of his uncle was still held in honor, and remained there till his death. At Cracow, Socinus applied for admission to the society of Unitarians, but was refused, except on condition of his being rebaptized, the Unitarians being leavened with Anabaptist notions. Socinus, not accepting admission on these grounds, employed his powers and influence to have the law changed in this regard. He was active with his pen and at synods, and he lived to see his view accepted at the synod of Rakow in 1603. In 1588 he married into a Polish family of noble birth. He was not free from abuse and persecutions, and in 1598, while ill, was taken out of his bed by Cracow students who had been incited by Roman-Catholic priests, dragged half naked through the city, and scourged, but was rescued by the positive action of a professor, Maslen. On this occasion, all of his books, papers, and manuscripts were burned in the marketplace.

In 1605, immediately after Socinus' death, the so-called Rakow or Socinian Catechism appeared in the Polish language, for which he had made preparations. It was completed, upon the basis of these and his writings, by Felsting, Schmalz, Moscorovius, and Vökel. A German translation was made in 1608, and a Latin one in 1609, of which a second, third, and fourth edition appeared at Amsterdam in 1655, 1680, 1684. This catechism is a very good compendium of the Socinian theology. At Socinus' death there were a number of Unitarian congregations in Poland, made up largely of noblemen. Good schools were connected with them. The city of Rakow was the chief citadel of Unitarianism, and the excellent institution of learning was attended at one time by nearly a thousand students, three hundred of whom were of noble birth. The general synod of the Socinians met there every year. Many of their theologians and preachers were celebrated. Among these were Schmalz (d. 1622), who wrote fifty-two works in defence of Socinianism; Vökel (d. 1618), a student of Wittenberg, and for a time amanuensis of Socinus, whose work, De vera religion is a systematic presentation of the Socinian theology; Ostorodt (d. 1611), who advocated the specific Anabaptist principles of refusing to do military duty, serve in public offices, etc.; and Moscorovius (d. 1595), who, amongst other things, wrote the Defence of the Socinians, which he sent to the king. Among the more distinguished men of the succeeding generation were Crell (d. 1631), a very prolific author, whose biblical commentaries, two books De uno Deo patre (the keenest Socinian attack upon the doctrine of the Trinity), and other works, fill vols. iii. and iv. of the Biblia fratum Polonorum; Schlichting (d. 1681), the author of a very famous catechism (1622), De trinitate, de unico Deo et N. T. homine, and a full literary history of his sect, and Felstinger (b. 1616), and (d. at Amsterdam, 1661), a full literary history of his sect, and De slaluprimi hominis antelapsum, lyabolished. By a decree of 1638 the school at Mannheim was abolished. All of his books, papers, and manuscripts were burned in the market-place.

The Rakow Catechism begins with the question, "What is the Christian religion?" Answer. "Christianity is a special revelation. It is made known in the Scriptures, and to a very positive supernaturalism. The Rakow Catechism begins with the question, "What is the Christian religion?" Answer. "The Christian religion is the way revealed by God for securing eternal life." Christianity is a special revelation. It is made known in the Scriptures, which, clothed with divine authority, is the only source of religious knowledge. The authority of the Old Testament rests upon the testimony of the New Testament. Both the Testaments are inspired documents. The sacred writers wrote under the impulse and dictation of the Divine Spirit (divino Spiritu impulse eoque dictante)."

The Socinians,
however, taught that only the essential parts, those pertaining to doctrine, were of immediate divine inspiration. The views concerning the relation of reason to revelation differ somewhat from those of orthodox Protestants. Reason is man's spiritual eye; and, in all controverted matters, it is judge, and not the Pope or the believing Christian. The truths of revelation are above reason, but never contrary to it. Miracles are above reason, and credible. The doctrines of the trinity and divinity of Christ are contrary to reason, and therefore incredible. Wisnovaty, in his Religio rationalis, went so far as to teach the agreement between the true philosophy and religion. Thus the latent rationalism in genuine Socinianism became more and more prominent.

In the department of theology the proper use of the usual attributes are attributed to God. His omniscience is defined in such a way that it does not conflict with the contingency of events and the freedom of the will. God does not know in such a way that whatsoever he knows will surely come to pass. If God's knowledge, says Crell, were to make every thing be as he pleased it would necessarily be that there would be no real sin, or guilt of sin. In the doctrine of the mode of the divine existence, it is taught that God is one. This proposition is based upon such passages as Deut. vi, 4, Mark xii, 29, Gal. iii, 20, Eph. iv, 6, etc. The antithesis to the threefold personality of God forms the centre of the Socinian opposition to historical Christianity, and it is the special and single aim of many Socinian works to prove the doctrine of the Trinity irrational and unscriptural. The plural Elohim, Socinus explained, with Beza, as the plural of majesty. The thrice-repeated "holy" (Isa. vii, 14) is laid, in the argument against Christ's deity, by and by. We may also observe that every thing Socinus intended to prove he gathered from the New Testament and did not appeal to the Old Testament.

The free will, and as such it was not even known in advance by God. The sin of Adam did not entail upon his posterity the loss of freedom; that is, the ability to choose between the right and the wrong. So far as the doctrine of original sin is in opposition to this view, the Socinians most positively denied it. The first of Rom. v. 12 is explained to mean quoniam, quatenus. The doctrine of original sin is opposed to the Scripture which calls upon men to repent and be converted. The mere inclination to sin, Socinus held, might exist in all, but did not necessarily so exist. But this inclination is not a consequence of the sin of Adam; and, if this were the case, it would cease to be sin, for sin exists only where there is guilt. Hence no corruption came upon the human family by Adam's sin.

In the Socinian system, Christ is not divine. He was more than a mere man. His attributes were extra-human, but he was not of divine nature. He had to be a man in order to redeem. Immortality, the goal of the Christian religion, was mediated by the resurrection of Christ. It, on the other hand, has happened, that when the sin was satisfied in his divinity, he could not have died. The argument from Scripture and reason is pressed. The divinity of Christ cannot be derived from the affirmation that he was God's Son, for all men are called the sons of God (Rom. ix. 20); and, when Christ is called the only-begotten Son, it is simply meant that he was the chief and highest of the sons of God, as Isaac and Solomon are also known by this designation. The expression "I and my Father are one" (John x. 30) refers to unity of will and power, as in John xvii. 22. The passages referring to Christ's pre-existence are explained away easily. In John i. 1, the expression "in the beginning" is declared to mean "in the beginning of the gospel," or the Christian dispensation. The statement that "all things" were made by Christ (John i. 3; Col. i. 16) refers simply to all things pertaining to the gospel; and the statement, "the world was made by him (John i. 10), has reference either to the reformation of mankind by the gospel, or to the future world. From such passages as John iii. 13, 31, vi. 36, xvi. 28, the conclusion is drawn, that Christ was caught up into the heavens for a season, like Paul. Stress is laid, in the argument against Christ's deity, on his habit of praying to the Father, his being sent by the Father, his ignorance of the day of judgment, etc. Christ, however, was more than man. He had superior endowments to the mass of mankind. He was (1) conceived of a virgin, (2) was perfectly holy, and (3) was exalted to absolute power, all things being made subject unto him.

Christ's work is treated in the Catechism under his threefold office of prophet, priest, and king. As prophet, Christ ordained the Lord's Supper, which is simply a memorial feast, a declaration of that which we already possess by faith. He also promised the Holy Ghost and forgives sin rectitudinously, but a power or activity of God, and eternal life. Looking at the priestly office, Christ is regarded as a mediator; but the view that salvation was secured by his sufferings and death is declared to be false and pernicious. The Scripture teachings are very often taken literally. Thus the Father was mistress of the sensual nature. Sin is an act of the free will, and as such it was not even known in advance by God. The sin of Adam did not entail upon his posterity the loss of freedom; that is, the ability to choose between the right and the wrong. at complete variance with a free gift (Eph. ii. 8, et al.). It is the resurrection upon which the stress is laid; and Socinus expressly declares, that it is the head and ground of all our faith and salvation in the person of Christ (caput et tandem fundamentum totius fidei sancta et salutis nostrae in Christo persona). The obedience rendered to the law was due from him, for God had commanded him to obey. But the guilt and punishment of one cannot be borne by another. Christ had to obey for himself, and could not obey or suffer for others. The word "redemption" in the New Testament does not contain the notion of satisfaction, but simply means emancipation. The reconciliation accomplished by Christ consists simply in this, that to us who were enemies of God he showed the way to become converted, and return to God. The meaning of the atonement is, that God in Christ has shown himself to be above measure gracious (propitius). Christ's high-priestly office consists in the help he gives us. He delivers us from the punishments by reason of the absolute power which he received from the Father, and which protects us. He delivers us from the bondage of sin by keeping us from all manner of sins. This he does by presenting to our thought his own person, which remained sinless in temptation. Predestination is nothing more than the divine decree to give eternal life to as many as the pleasure which springs from the possession of riches, honor, power, and the gifts of fortune, but that well being which results from well doing in obedience to the will of God and with the blessing of Heaven. The true, the beautiful, and the good are all essentially identical with each other, since they all consist in the material and the fitting; and that which is good for nothing is neither good nor beautiful nor true. Xenophon and Plato agree in making Socrates teach that he who knows justice is just, and the man who understands virtue is virtuous: in other words, he resolves all virtue into knowledge. But it is plain from both these writers that he used knowledge in a high and comprehensive sense unusual in ethical treatises, but strikingly analogous to that in which it is used in the Scriptures. He makes knowledge identical with wisdom, and ignorance with folly and sin, just as in the Bible. He declares the existence of one supreme Divinity, the Creator and Disposer of the universe, the Maker and Father of mankind, the Ruler and Governor among the nations, invisible, all-powerful, omniscient, and omnipresent, perfectly wise and just and good. His method of demonstrating the existence of such a being was strictly Baconian, the same argument which Paley uses in his Natural Theology: indeed, we almost seem to be reading Paley when we read the chapters in which Xenophon records his master's arguments in proof of the divine existence and benevolence. And the same method of author, of those unwritten laws in the soul of man which execute themselves, and make it impossible for any man to be unjust, or impure, or licentious, without paying the penalty (which proves a greater and better than any human lawgiver), we seem to be sitting at the feet of Bishop Butler himself.

The doctrine of Socrates touching the inferior deities, whose existence he admits, and whose agency he recognizes, particularly in the providential care of human affairs, probably did not differ essentially from the Christian doctrine of the angels; though it marks the greater elevation of the Christian revelation and the Christian consciousness, that what the most enlightened heathen called gods, and worshipped, Christians consider as only ministers of God, whom to worship were idolatry.

We have not space to enlarge upon the teaching of Socrates respecting providence and prayer. He believed himself to be under the constant guidance of a divine voice, which always warned him when he was in danger of going or doing wrong; and thus, indirectly, always led him in the right way; and he taught that every man might have the same divine guidance; and he could not but wonder at the folly and madness of men who preferred a blind and ignorant guide to one who was unerring, and perfectly acquainted with the way in which they should go. Hence his one only and constant prayer was, that God would guide him, and give him, not riches, pleasure, honor, power, which were as likely to prove a bane as a blessing, but what was best for him; since God only knew what was for his true and highest good.

Socrates held the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the future life as strenuously as Plato did, but without those dreams and chimeras of its pre-existence and successive transmigrations by which the creed of the latter was disfigured; and, with these exceptions, he doubtless relied on the same arguments in proof of the doctrine which have been stated in the article on Plato and Christianity: and what has been usually wanting in heathen philosophers, and too often in the lives of Christians also—it was the beauty and glory of Socrates' character, that his doctrine of providence and prayer and a future state was the controlling principle of his life. And so he died a martyr's death with a cheerful composure, in the highest good and the richest blessing. "Bury my body as you please," he said to his friends, "but do not mourn as if you were burying Socrates. Think of me, rather, as gone to be with the wise and the good, and with God, the fountain of wisdom and goodness, in that world where alone wisdom is to be found." Such teachings, illustrated by a conscientious, unselfish, heroic, missionary life, and sealed by a martyr's death—these are the main secrets of his power, and these exhibit him in his true relation to Christianity. It would not be difficult, on the one hand, to point out defects in his teaching, and imperfections in his life, nor, on the other, to magnify the points of resemblance to, and encom pass the founder of our holy religion. Such comparisons have been elaborately made by Priestley, for example, in his tract, Socrates and Jesus Compared, and by Baur, in his Sokrates und Christus, the second of those three treatises (Drei Abhandlungen), which were re-edited by Zeller in 1876. But the disparity is so great as to forbid comparison. The intuitions of Rousseau, sceptic as he was, taught him this: "What prejudice," he says (Emile, bk. iv.), "what blindness, must it be to compare the son of Sophronicus to the son of Mary! ... If the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus were those of a Deity. Socrates himself would have aspired to no higher honor than that of being a forerunner of Christ among the Greeks. That honor justly belongs to him; and his prophetic influence can easily be traced, like that of Plato, and largely through him and his followers, in the history and philosophy of the Greeks and Romans before and after Christ, while the power of his teaching and his life is still felt in the literature, the philosophy, and the religion of all Christian nations.

SOCRATES, the Greek church historian, was born in Constantinople about 390, and lived there as scholasticus. His work is a continuation of that of Eusebius, and embraces the period from 306 to 439. It is a simple and natural report of facts, supported by rich extracts from the sources, and marred by comparatively few mistakes; but it is not distinguished by an artistic form, nor is the author above his time with respect to a critical spirit; and it has not been edited (Greek and Latin) by Valesius, Paris, 1659, together with the histories of Eusebius and Sozomen; by R. Hussey, Oxford, 1853, 3 vols., Greek text separately, with Introduction by W. Bright, Oxford, 1873. SOD'OM, the most important of four cities (Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Sodom) in the vale of Siddim, which were destroyed by "brimstone and fire" out of heaven, on account of the great wickedness of their inhabitants (Gen. xix. 21). Lot lived there (Gen. xiii. 12, xix. 2), and there his daughters married (Gen. xix. 14). Chedorlaomer and his allies plundered the cities, but the captives and spoils were recovered by Abraham (Gen. xiv. xiv.). The fate of Sodom and the other cities of the plain is held up in the Bible as a warning (Deut. xxix. 23; Isa. i. 9, 10; Amos iv. 11; Matt. x. 15; 2 Pet. ii. 5-8; Rev. xi. 8), and so deeply impressed itself upon the neighboring peoples, that Strabo, in his description of the Dead Sea (16, 2), which he erroneously calls the Sirbonian Sea, and Tacitus (Hist. 5. 7), relate, that, according to tradition, there once were cities and fruitful plains where then there was death. The question, whether these cities of the plain were upon the southern or northern end of the Dead Sea, is often referred to—(1) Lot chose the Plain of Jordan at the northern end; (2) Abraham, standing near Hebron, saw the smoke of their burning (Gen. xiv. 10); (3) The mountain of salt at that end is called Jebel Uzum, apparently an echo of Sodom; (4) Pillars of salt detached from the great salt cliffs at that end have been called "Lot's Wife;" (5) Numerous slime-pits, i.e., bitumen (Gen. xiv. 10) are found at that end; (6) The portion of the sea south of the Lisan Peninsula is very shallow, as if it were beyond its original limits. If the sea now covered the site of the cities, this would be the case. This view has been advocated by Robinson, Lynch, Porter, Baedecker, Schaaf, and many others. For the northern end, the arguments are, (1) Lot chose the Plain of Jordan (Gen. xiii. 11), which must have been at the northern end, for in that case only could Abraham and Lot have seen it from Bethel; (2) Since the hill near Hebron was midway between the two ends of the sea, Abraham could just as well have seen the burning if it was at the northern end as if it was at the southern; (3) The presence of numerous slime-pits in the vale of Siddim, at the northern end; (4) The account of Chedorlaomer's attack fits best with the northern site for Sodom. Prominent advocates for the northern site are Grove, Tristram, and Merrill.

The destruction of the cities of the plain was probably the result of natural causes under divine control. The explosion of gas would easily account for it all. The soil, soaked with bitumen, would easily convey the fire until all the cities were destroyed.

SODOR AND MAN, an English bishopric (Sodor comes from Surduregar, Southern Isles, corresponding to Norduregar, Northern Isles), is the name applied to the western islands of Scotland, especially to those contiguous to the Isle of Man; and hence the name of the bishopric. The income of the bishop is £2,000.

SOHN, Georg, b. at Rossbach, Dec. 31, 1551; d. at Heidelberg, April 23, 1589. He studied theology at Marburg and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1574, and at Heidelberg in 1575. He was a member of the humanist and lutheran school, and considered himself a member and teacher of the Reformed Church. His works, — the principal of which are Synopsis corporis doctrine Phil. Melanchthonis, De vero Dei, Methodus theologica, etc. — appeared in a collected edition at Heidelberg, in 4 vols., 1581.

SOISSONS, a town of France in the department of Aisne, was the seat of a number of important synods. — I. The synod of 743 was convened by Pepin the Short, and presided over by Boniface, Archbishop of Mayence. Besides a number of secular lords, twenty-three bishops were present; and the canons issued by Carlogan in 742 were confirmed, forbidding the clergy to hunt, to marry, etc., prohibiting unknown persons from performing ecclesiastical duties, enjoining the counts to suppress Paganism, etc. — II. The synod of 852 numbered twenty-six bishops, and was convened by Charles the Bald, who had some time previously been deposed for participation in a revolt against the Frankish kings. But there was a canon forbidding the transference of a bishop from one diocese to another, unless with the consent of his brother-bishops; and the validity of Ebbo's ordinations was now impeached on account of that canon. The synod declared them invalid. — III., IV., and V. The synods of 861, 862, and 866 treated the same subject. — VI. The synod of 1092 was convened to decide in the controversy between Anselm of Canterbury and Roscelin. The former accused the latter of tritheism, and the latter was compelled to recant. — VII. The synod of 1121 was convened by the Papal legate, Bishop Conon of Przeneste, to examine the writings of Abelard. As Abelard refused to attempt any defence of what he had written, he was compelled to throw his works into the fire with his own hands. — VIII. The synod of 1201 was convened by the Papal legate, Octavian, for the purpose of cancelling the permission to a second marriage which the French bishop had given King Philip August, and compelling the king to take back his first wife, the Danish princess Ingeborg, whom he had repudiated. — IX. The synod of 1449, finally, was convened by the Archbishop of Rheims, John Juvenal Ursinus. It adopted the decrees of the Council of Basel concerning liturgy, and treated a number of misuses which had crept into the church. See Chr. W. FR. SOLITARIUS, Philip, a Greek monk who lived in the latter part of the eleventh century in Constantinople, wrote a work in verse and in the form of a dialogue, under the title ἄνωθεν, "the mirror." It is a representation of the ascetic views of the Greek mysticism of the time. It found SOLOMON.

Much favor, was commented upon by Michael Psellus, and translated into Latin prose by the Jesuits, Josephus, and other translators. The translation, which is also found in the Bibl. Max. patr. Lugd., vol. xxi., is very incorrect. Of the Greek text, only a few fragments have been printed by Oudin, Lambecius, and Cotelerius. GASS.

SOLOMON, second son of David by Bathsheba, his successor upon the throne, and third king over Israel, who reigned forty years (1015-975 B.C.; according to Ewald, 1025-986). Compare 1 Kings i.-xi.; 2 Chron. i.-ix.; Joseph. Ant., VIII. 1-7. His early education was intrusted to the prophet Nathan, who called him Jedidiah, i.e., the beloved of Jehovah (2 Sam. xi. 24, 25). Through the influence of his mother, Nathan, and Zadok the priest, Solomon, at the age of twenty, was made king while his father was yet alive. Riding on the mule, attended by Nathan and Zadok, and by the king’s special company of the thirty mighty men, and the body-guard under the command of Benaiah, he went down to Gihon, and was proclaimed and anointed king. Egypt, Egipt, acts, showing moderation, prudence, and energy, were well adapted to gain for him the esteem and confidence of his people. The death of Joab, who had insidiously killed Abner and Amasa, and who had openly sided with Adonijah, combined justice with prudence, fulfilling at the same time David’s dying counsels. Shimai also is killed at David’s wish; Adonijah is put to death; Abiathar is deposed and exiled, sent to a, to the descendant of Barzillai he shows kindness. Such a firm and circumspect appearance secured to the new king general obedience. Soon he displayed signs of wisdom which made him known throughout the country; and, as it was the king’s intention to walk in all the ways of Jehovah, the God of his father granted his desire, and endowed him with true royal wisdom.

His name and his deeds made Solomon a prince of peace, under whose sceptre the people and the country prospered. But at the beginning and towards the end of his reign, in the south, north, and west some princes rose. Hadad the Edomite, who had fled into Egypt, when he had heard that David and Joab were dead, returned into his country, of which he takes possession (1 Kings xi. 21, 22, 25). Rezon, also, gathered some men unto him, and took Damascus; but he had at last to yield to Solomon. The little kingdom of Gazer, or Geshur, between Israel and Philistia, rose also, but fell into the hands of the king of Egypt, who gave it to Solomon when he married his daughter. Solomon’s success against the usurpers was sufficient to secure his authority, even beyond the confines of his own country; and for a long time peace reigned throughout his kingdom. In the beginning of his reign he married the daughter of King Pyrchnes of Egypt.

Many structures which Solomon had erected made his name very famous in the east and in the west. Like his father, he secured builders from Hiram, king of Tyre. For the lower commercial enterprises by land and by sea enriched the royal treasury. Besides he had a captain over his body-guard. The king’s enormous household was supplied with provisions by the provinces of his domain.

Trade and commerce became also very flourishing under Solomon, and the revenues from these commercial enterprises by land and by sea enriched the royal treasury. Besides these direct revenues, the kings and princes of the subject provinces paid tribute in the form of gift, in money and in kind, “at a fixed rate by year” (1 Kings x. 25).

Thus Solomon’s reign marks the entrance of Israel on a nearer intercourse with the Asiatic peoples. That such an intercourse was not without an influence upon the intellect of the Jewish people, is certain. A special wisdom, whose most prominent representative Solomon himself was, was cultivated. The Queen of Sheba, attracted by his wisdom, came to his court to hear him. He also cultivated poetry (he himself is said to have composed a thousand and five hymns, besides three thousand proverbs); and historiography, no doubt, found in him a great patron.

In spite of his greatnesses, Solomon had his blemishes. Nathan his teacher was dead, without leaving another person in his stead to protect and govern the kingdom. Solomon had not fulfilled the duties of the theocratic ruler, without exactly needing such a support as David had in Nathan and Gad. By and by the consciousness that such royal glory was incompatible with the advancement of the true theocracy was awaked and alive: the prophets Ahijah of Shilo, Shemajja, and Iddo were not favorably disposed toward the king; the first sees the coming of the ruin. The people was dissatisfied on account of the many oppressive contributions which were laid upon it. The greatest stumbling-block, by which he wounded the religious feeling of the people, was his harem; for, whatever might have been the number of his wives, the harem was in opposition to the spirit of true Jehovah-religion, and the more so as most of these women were foreigners, "who turned away his heart after other gods." It was not Solomon's intention to change or abandon the religion of Jehovah, but "his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God," (1 Kings xi. 4). Beside the worship of Jehovah, he allowed the worship of strange gods, and built altars for Ashtaroth, Molech, and Chemosh. Thus Solomon came more and more in opposition with the true patriotic spirit of the people; and the pious Jew connects, therefore, his highest hopes, not with his name, but with that of his father David, whilst among heathen and Mohammedans Sulaiman is still highly celebrated. SOMASCHIANS, The Order of the (or Clerici regulares S. Majoli Papiae congregationis Somaschae), the most important institution resulting from the apostolic recovery with the Roman-Catholic Church in the first half of the sixteenth century, received its name from the village Somasco, between Milan and Bergamo, in which its founder, Girolamo Miani, or Hieronymus IEmilianus, first established the association, and wrote its rules. Miani was born in 1481, and descended from a rich and distinguished family. He served in the army of the Emperor Charles VIII. in Lombardy, and became a nun, and devoted herself to deeds of charity. SOPHOPHRONIUS, a native of Greece; made the acquaintance of Jerome in Palestine, and is mentioned in De viris illustribus (cap. 134). He translated parts of the Old Testament, and some of Jerome's works, from Latin into Greek. His name has excited most interest, however, in connection with the regular translation of De viris illustribus, which Erasmus and Fabricius ascribed to him, while Vossius simply considered it a Greek exercise of Erasmus. The translation is men Sorbonne.

As a result of the work of Sophronius, the universities were founded by Robert de Dreux, a son of Louis the Fat, under the name of S. Thomas of Champagne (d. 1277). He was chaplain to the emperor and as a result of the papal investiture controversy he moved from the Domus, the archiepiscopal palace, to the hospital of St. Victor, and Godescalc became a kind of mini-university. Such a college was originally destined only for the education of ecclesiastics, but was soon active in the twelfth century. When John of Salisbury arrived in Paris (1136), he found two flourishing faculties in the university: artes (rhetoric and philosophy, or rather dialectics) and theologica (Scripture, the Fathers, the councils, and canon law). After Gratian's compilation of decretals had been accepted and confirmed by Eugenius III., in 1151, a faculty of law was established; and its professors, though theologians, lectured not only on canon law, but also on civil law, especially after the discovery of the pandects of Justinian by the sur-render of Amalfi. A faculty of medicine was not founded until 1180. In 1160 people who wanted to study medicine were still compelled to go from Paris to Montpellier. Celibacy was obligatory on all professors, also the medical.

A college was originally destined only for the study of theo-ology, but in the thirteenth century it was opened to the lay student and became a kind of minor universit. They lived there under strict rules, yet with more freedom than in a monastery. The lectures were given in the schools; the theological generally in the Domus, the archiepiscopal palace, though William of Champeaux lectured in St. Victor, and Abelard in Ste. Genevieve. The oldest college in Paris was founded by Robert de Dreux, a son of Louis the Fat, under the name of S. Thomas du Louvre. But as a course of theology comprised from seven to nine years, and the custom soon arose that the older students in a college in-structed the younger, and as doctors issuing from a certain college often continued to reside there for a long time, and a library generally was formed in connection with the institution, the college naturally became a kind of minor university. Such was more especially the case with that of the Sorbonne, founded by Robert of Sorbon, or Sorbonne, in 1257, when he was chaplain to the Emperor Louis IX., and very zealous for the promotion of the study of theology. From the king he obtained a suitable site in the Coupe-gorge ("Cutthroat Street") — a rather significant name; and there he built a magnificent college for his Con-gregatio pauerum magistrorum studiendum in theologica facultate, which congregation was confirmed by Clement IV. in 1268.

After the example of the Franciscan and Dominican orders, a teacher of theology was also appointed at the Sorbonne; and the happy choice of the first teachers — William of Saint-Amour, Eudes of Douai, and Laurent l'Anglois — contributed much to increase the reputation of the establishment. Afterwards a considerable number of great doctors took up their abode in the college; and, when the regular lectures of the faculty were removed from the archiepiscopal palace to the Sorbonne, it was quite natural that people in general should identify the college with the faculty; so much the more natural as its theology really determined the character of the theology of the faculty. The general tendency of that theology was that which must underlie all true theology — a perfect mediocrity, and a kind of knowledge, religion and science, theology and philosophy; but, in pursuing that tendency, the Sorbonne always kept its doctrines pure, that is, in harmony with the teachings of the church, though without submitting in a slavish manner to ecclesiastical misuses or sacerdotal eccentricities. It was the Sorbonne which drove the scandalous Feast of the Fools out of the church; and it was also the Sorbonne which successfully opposed the introduction of the Peter's-pence and of the Inquisition into France. Among its other merits may also be mentioned, that it established the first printing-press in Paris, 1470; and, as an indication of the high rank it held in the world's estimation, it may be added that it represented the university of Paris at the councils.

The decadence of the Sorbonne began when it fell into the hands of the Guises, and became the handmaid of Ultramontanism; and the public soon discovered the antiquated and re-actionary tendencies of its activity. In 1624 it obtained an edict of the Parliament forbidding, under penalty of corporal punishment, and even death, to teach any thing against the accepted authorities. The edict was directed against Descartes; and the Sorbonne was soon from hence under the influence of Malebranche, Fénelon, or Leibnitz, that it wanted to have the edict renewed in 1671. The president of the Parliament, Lamoignon, found it difficult to refuse, until, one day, he found on his table Boileau's burlesque, Arrêt donné en la Grande Chambre du Parlement. That decided the case. In 1751 appeared Voltaire's Le tombeau de la Sorbonne; and no voice was raised in its defence, when, in 1790, the state seized all its property, as belonging to the nation, and disposed of it for other purposes.

Soter (pope 168-176 or 177), a native of Campania, is said to have written a work against the Montanists, which was refuted by Tertullian; but the work is lost, as St. Augustine explains in his Ep. ad Felix. Soter was a teacher of theology, which was not uncommonly read in the congregations at Sunday service. The decretales bearing his name are spurious. Neudecker.

Soteriology (ζωτηριολογία) is that branch of Christian theology which treats of the work of the Saviour,— the doctrine of salvation, so far as such salvation has been wrought out by the second person in the Holy Trinity. It is to be carefully distinguished from soteriology, or christology (v. Christology), which treats solely of the person of the Redeemer,— his incarnation, his divinity, and his humanity, and the combination of these two elements in his single and perfect personality. Yet it should be borne in mind always, that any adequate conception of his soteriological work must be based on right views, antecedently obtained and established, respecting the Christ as he is in himself,— the appointed and qualified Saviour of men.

Soteriology does not include the concurrent work of the Son of God in other spheres, such as creation, or providence, or moral administration. Nor does it include those specific salvation which involve, on the one side, the elective purpose and love of the Father, or, on the other, the interior ministry of the Spirit in the application of saving grace. While the Son is concerned with the Father in the original plan of redemption and in the selection of those in whom that plan becomes effectual (v. Predestination), his specific work lies rather in the execution of that plan, and in the actual securing of redemption to all who believe. While, again, the Son is concerned with the Holy Spirit in the conviction of sinners, and in bringing them, through regeneration and sanctification, into the full enjoyment of the salvation provided (v. Holy Spirit), his primary work is rather the provision itself on which, as a divine foundation, this subsequent work of spiritual restoration must be based. The Father creates, preserves, governs, plans, elects, as introductory; the Spirit enlightens, educates, sanctifies, and completes the saving process in the individual soul; the Son, acting as intermediate, represents, reveals, instructs, atones for sin, placates law, and lays a foundation in justice, whereby, under an economy of grace, everyone who believes in him, the Father and the Spirit concuring, may be saved.

The most general conception of this specific work of the Son of God is expressed in the term mediation (v. Mediator, Mediation). His peculiar mission is to interpose, in the temper of grace and for the purpose of both forensic and spiritual reconciliation, between man as a sinner, and the Deity against whom man has offended, and with whom he is morally at variance. As a mediator, the Son of God, who was also the Son of man, was amply qualified, both by inherent endowment and through official appointment; and in his work of mediation he is actually successful in removing alienation, in restoring the lost harmony between God and the sinner, and in securing to man a complete and blessed eternal one-ment with his heavenly Father. This generic work of mediation is generally described by Calvinistic theologians under the three specific forms indicated in the terms prophet, priest, and king (v. Jesus Christ, Three Offices of). It has been questioned whether this distribution is in all respects desirable; whether, by the division of the one work into these three parts or offices, our sense of the essential unity of that work is not impaired; and whether the underlying idea of mediation is not weakened by such multiplicity of particular functions and relations. (Van Oosterzee: Christian Dogmatics, see cviii.) Is this central idea adequately expressed in these three forms? Do they contain neither more nor less than the underlying conception? And, where the distribution is made, are these three offices always kept in their proportionate place, and severally invested with their proper dignity and value in the one mediatorial work? Whatever answer may be given to these questions on exegetical or speculative grounds, there is no adequate reason for rejecting an analytic presentation which has gained such definite expression in current evangelical creeds (Heidelberg Catechism, Ans. 31; Westminster Confession, chap. viii.), and which has been so extensively adopted as a regulative guide in modern theology.

Studying soteriology in this triple aspect, we may first note the prophetic function of the Saviour, as including that entire revelation of saving truth which he, as the divine Logos, came among men to make (v. Prophet, Prophecy). All religious, and especially all inspired, teachers who were prior to him as revealers of sacred doctrine or duty, were actually, in the other way, as the forerunners of the work before him; and all who followed after had it as their mission simply to elucidate and expand what he taught. Christ was the one perfect Logos, in virtue both of his eternal relationship within the Trinity (v. Trinity) and of his specific appointment as the Word of the Godhead to man. In him resided all the qualifications requisite to the complete fulfillment of this prophetic work, and from him came in highest form, and with most commanding power, all the truth which man needs to know in order to his salvation. This prophetic function may be subdivided into direct and indirect,—direct teaching through the formal enunciation of saving truths, and indirect teaching through the superadded power of example and personality. Christ, as teacher and prophet, becomes an enduring pattern also. In himself, as well as in his message, was light; and the light was the life of men. It may be queried, whether, in consequence of the inclination of evangelical Protestantism to exalt the priestly work of our Lord as central, this prophetic mission has not been relatively too much ignored, and, more specifically, whether the biblical view of him as the true norm and example of our humanity has not been surrendered too much to the uses of those who altogether reject his priestly character and mission.

Concerning this priestly function, it is needless to repeat what has been said elsewhere (v. Atonement, Justification, Jesus Christ, Three Offices of). Priests, Priesthood, Offerings in the Old Testament, etc.). The essential fact in the case is the voluntary and vicarious surrender of himself by our Lord as a sacrifice before God for sinners, on account of their sin, and in order to expiate sin, and to render possible the reconciliation and restoration of man as sinful. As a sacrifice, Christ was inherently and judicially appointed as such. It was without spot: as a priest, he was in every way qualified for the sacrificial work in which he was thus engaged; and his administration of the priestly office was voluntary, official, and acceptable. In him both the Aaronic priesthood and the peculiar priesthood of Melchisedec were singularly blended. He was, in his own person, the absolute culmination of the priestly as well as the prophetic order and idea. As priest and as sacrifice he was perfect.

That this vicarious intervention and offering of himself in behalf of sinners and for sin was an essential part of the mediatorial work of our Saviour, is too clearly revealed in Scripture to be questioned by any who receive its testimony in the case as conclusive. It was not a merely arbitrary scheme, resting on no recognizable necessity: it was rather a scheme imperative demanded by the ethical nature of both God and man, and by the character of the salvation which man as sinful needed. The exigencies of that moral government against which the sinner had rebelled, the requisitions of justice as an eternal principle in the Deity, and the needs of the soul itself in order to its spiritual recovery, alike required — as the Bible in multiplied ways asserts — such a sacrifice of himself, even unto death, on the part of our Redeemer. Without this, mediation would have been both inadmissible and ineffectual.

Whatever may be the precise method or methods in which that sacrifice in the divine economy becomes efficacious in satisfying justice, in placating law, in revealing grace, and making that grace potent, there can be no question in believing minds as to the fact. It must needs be that Christ to this end must suffer; and it must needs be that through his suffering, vicarious and substitutional, we are saved.

The nature and the extent of the atonement, as thus exhibited specifically in the priestly work of Christ, are matters respecting which wide differences of opinion have long existed within evangelical circles. Whether he personally assumed our guilt, and became, by the direct imputation of that guilt, a transgressor, deserving the infliction of actual penalty, or simply took our sin upon him as a weight to be carried and removed, meanwhile himself remaining sinless, alike in person and before the law; whether he endured the actual penalty of human transgression, or, a king literally made in his representative relation a curse for us, or simply suffered what might be equitably regarded as an equivalent for penalty remitted, and a sufficient ground for the bestowal of pardon and all other spiritual blessings; whether his work was an actual and special provision for the redemption of the elect only, or was rather a generic arrangement of which all men may, through grace, alike avail themselves, a salvation offered implying in the fullest sense a salvation provided, — these are questions respecting which evangelical minds have differed, and which need no discussion here. Whatever may be the views of believers as to either the nature, or the extent and scope, of this sacrificial work of Christ, all are agreed in regarding the fact itself as both unquestionable and vital. That our Lord suffered as well as taught, and that he suffered on account of our sin and in order to save us from it, and that through his suffering we are saved from both the condemnation and the power of evil, and that this salvation is immediate and certain, and will be complete at last, — these are the great facts of grace which lie at the basis of the evangelical system, and which constitute the foundation of all evangelical hope.

Justification is the divine act of pardoning sin, and accepting sinners as if they were righteous, on the ground generically of all that Christ has done in the Munus Triplex of mediation, and specifically on the ground of what he has suffered as well as done in our behalf as our great High priest and sacrifice. The unconditional pardon of sin, with no appropriate regard for the nature of moral government and the claims of justice, would be an act unworthy of God. To accept the sinner as if he were righteous, and to adopt him (v. Adoption) into the family of God, and make him an heir of spiritual privileges and blessings, without requiring from him repentance, and return to loyalty, as conditions, and with no provision for his deliverance from the legal penalties incurred by his sin, would be a transaction still more unworthy. And the only adequate warrant for such pardon, acceptance, and adoption, must be found, not in any worthiness inherent in the nature of man or any merit seen in his life, nor even in his faith and repentance viewed as concomitants or consequences, but simply in the mediatorial, and especially in the sacrificial, work of Christ only. Our justification is in him, and in him alone.

The kingly office of the Saviour is a necessary element in his broad work of mediation. He is king because he has been prophet and priest; he is also king inherently, as divine. His kingdom commences in the believing heart, and is essentially spiritual: it is an authority exercised in love, and for the purpose of salvation. His church, as composed of those who have thus submitted to him personally, is his gracious empire; and over that empire he is the supreme head, everywhere and always. Within that church there can be no authority to supersede, or even, in the papal sense, to represent his: all its laws, officers, administration, activities, are subject entirely to him. This kingdom was founded by him before his earthly advent; it has been extended through many lands and centuries by his grace and power; it will coninue to increase; his present heavenly agency of the future, is now incorporated in it, until it has filled the earth. The notion, that, as a kingdom of love, it will ever be long supplanted by a kingdom of power, in which Christ will visibly appear as an earthly monarch, subduing his enemies by irresistible strength, and exalting his saints with him to a species of temporal domination (v. Millenari-anism), is in variance with the view here presented. Beyond this earthly empire of our Lord as already defined, we discern his princely exaltation even now, at the right hand of the Father, to be advocate and intercessor for his people. This advocacy and intercession are to continue until all who are his are finally brought together with him into what is literally the kingdom of heaven.

Returning from this survey of the specific functions or offices of Christ to the underlying idea of mediation, we are able to comprehend in one view the full doctrine of salvation as wrought out by him of the sacrifice and atonement for sin and the subjective soteriology, which includes especially the work wrought within the soul of man by our Saviour through his spirit, and which is expressed in the terms regeneration and sanctification. But objective soteriology, such as we are considering, is summed up rather in the triple phrase of Aquinas,—Christus Legislator, Sacerdos, Rex. To the Protestant mind it is pictured rather generally in the term justification, which, equally with regeneration and sanctification, shows us wherein the divine salvation consists.

SOTO, Dominicus de, b. at Segovia in 1494; d. at Salamanca, Nov. 15, 1560. He studied at Alcala and in Paris; began in 1520 to teach philosophy at Alcala, where he re-established realism in its old rights as the true principle of philosophy, and published Commentarii in Aristotelis Dialecticam (Salamanca, 1544), Categories (Venice, 1568), Libri vii. physicorum (Salamanca, 1545), etc. In 1524 he entered the Dominican order, on which occasion he changed his baptismal name Francis for that of Dominicus; and in 1532 he was appointed teacher of theology at Salamanca. In 1544 he was sent as a deputy to the Council of Trent in 1545; and there, too, he appeared as a stanch champion of realism, publishing De natura et gratia (Venice, 1547), Apologia (Venice, 1547), etc.; but, after the transference in 1547 of the council to Bologna, he returned to the court, where he was appointed confessor to the emperor. In 1550 he resigned that position, and retired to Salamanca, where he spent the rest of his life, partly as teacher in the university, and partly as prior in a monastery. Among his works from this last part of his life, are commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans (against the Protestants) and on the Gospel of St. Matthew (unprinted), and De justitia et jure, Salamanca, 1556, etc.

SOTO, Petrus de, a passionate adversary of the Reformation; b. at Cordova, d. at Trent, April 20, 1568. He entered the Dominican order in 1519, and accompanied Charles V. as confessor to Germany, where he was appointed teacher of theology at Dillingen. Afterwards he went with Philip to England, and taught theology at Oxford; but after the death of Mary, in 1558, he returned to Dillingen, whence he was called in 1561 to the re-opened Council of Trent, by Pius IV. He wrote Institutiones Christianae, Augsburg, 1548; Methodus confessionis, Dillingen, 1558; Compendium doctrine catholicae, Antwerp, 1556; Tractatus de institutione sacerdotum, Dillingen, 1558, etc.

SOUTH, Robert, b. at Hackney, a suburb of London, in 1633; d. in London, July 8, 1716. His father was a wealthy London merchant, who afforded his son every advantage for a thorough education. His preparatory studies were pursued in the Westminster School, where he became a king's scholar, under the famous master, Dr. Busby. South is said to have read the Latin prayers in the school on the day of the execution of Charles I.; and it is said for him by name; thus early showing that attachment to the established government and religion which ever afterwards distinguished him. In 1651 he was admitted as a student of Christ Church, Oxford, at the same time with John Locke. In 1655 he took the degree of bachelor of arts. During this year he composed a Latin poem congratulating Oliver Southwell.

Cromwell on the peace which he had concluded between England and Holland. As this was a prescribed university exercise, it is not necessary to infer that South was ever a Cromwellian at heart. Indeed, he appears to have been unpopular, even at that early day, with the Puritan party; though he was, for which in 1657, he obtained the degree of master of arts. John Owen, then dean of Christ Church, opposed his application. South was ordained in 1658 by one of the bishops who had been deprived of his bishopric during the Protectorate. In 1660, the year of the restoration of the monarchy, South was elected orator to the university of Oxford, and preached before the royal commission a sermon entitled the Scribe instructed, which immediately placed him in the front rank of English preachers. He delivered the university oration when Clarendon was installed Chancellor of Oxford,—a discourse which so impressed Clarendon, that he appointed him his domestic chaplain. This led to his installation, in 1663, as the Prebendary of St. Peter's, Westminster. In the same year he took the degree of doctor in divinity; and in 1670 he was made a canon of Christ Church, Oxford. In 1677 he was presented to the rectory of Islip in Oxfordshire, and in 1678, as the Prebendary of St. Peter's, Westminster. In the same year he took the degree of master of arts. John Owen, then dean of St. Paul's, Lawrence Hyde, on an embassy to congratulate John Sobieski upon his election to the crown of Poland. He gave an interesting account of what he saw abroad in a letter to Pococke, the professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and a fellow-canon. Soon after his return to England, in 1678, he was presented to the rectory of Islip in Oxfordshire, the revenue of which, some two hundred pounds, he applied, half to the payment of his curate, and half to educating and apprenticing the poorer children of the parish.

South soon became one of the king's chaplains, and preached a sermon before Charles II., marked by invective against Cromwell, and, what is not very common with South, violation of good taste. This recommended him to the monarch, who suggested his appointment to the next vacant bishopric. But South declined all such offers, both in this reign and in that of James II. While he was a strenuous advocate of the Equinoctial Calendar, he was a determined enemy of the Roman-Catholic. The concealed Popery of Charles and the open Popery of James met with no support, but with determined opposition, from South. His stiff loyalty led him to refuse to sign the invitation, drawn up by the archbishop and bishops, to the Prince of Orange to assume the throne, saying, that "his religion taught him to bear all things; and, however it should please God that he should suffer, he would, by the divine assistance, continue to abide by his allegiance, and use no other weapons but his prayers and tears for the recovery of his sovereign from the wicked and undutiful councils witherwhich he was entangled." But subsequently, when James had formally abdicated the throne, and the crown was settled upon William and Mary, South gave in his allegiance to the new government. He would, however, accept no bishopric for himself. Yet during his life, he opposed the Act of Toleration. When an attempt was made, through a royal commission, to unite the Dissenters with the Established Church, by modifying the Liturgy, South treated them to part with none of its ceremonial. In 1692 he had a controversy with Dr. William Sherlock, a fellow-churchman, and dean of St. Paul's, who, in his construction of the doctrine of the Trinity, fell into tritheism. South advocated the Nicene view with "great power of argument, and infinite wit and humor; more, indeed, than suited the solemnity of the subject."

The last part of South's life was clouded with sickness and debility which laid him aside from the active duties of his calling. His life was prolonged; and Dean Swift, it is said, waited impatiently, with other aspirants, for his decease, that he might seize the little bishopric and rectory.

South died at the age of eighty-three, and was buried beside his old master, Dr. Busby, in Westminster Abbey.

South's distinction is that of a preacher, and he is second to none in any language. No one has combined and blended logic and rhetoric in more perfect proportions. Every sermon is founded upon a clear and clean plan that can be analyzed, and presented in its parts; and yet every sermon moves forward, from beginning to end, like a flowing stream, without break. He argues closely and rigorously; but the argument never interferes with the fluency and impecuniosity of the discourse. The fire of his intellect kindles into a flame all his materials, however heavy and unwieldy. Even such subjects as predestination and the trinity are made popular and interesting by his powerful grasp and handling. And all this is heightened by his remarkable style. His mastery of English is almost unrivalled. The closeness and intimacy of the connection between the thought and the word is hardly excelled even by Shakspeare himself.

South was a Calvinist at a time when the drift of the High-Church Episcopacy, which he favored, was strongly towards Arminianism. Though an ardent Puritan, and bitterly so, in regard to polity, both civil and ecclesiastical, he was a Puritan in theology. John Owen was not a higher predestinarian than he, and Richard Baxter was a lower one. It must have been from an intense conviction of the truth of this type of doctrine, that South, in the face of all his prejudices and of his ecclesiastical and courtly connections, defended it with might and main. For this reason, the great anti-Puritan has had, and always will have, warm admirers among Puritans and Nonconformists.

South's Sermons have been often reprinted; e.g., Oxford (1823, 7 vols.), Boston (1867-71, 5 vols.), London (1875, 2 vols.); and in these editions memoirs will be found. A volume of selections, with a memoir entitled The Wisdom of the Fathers, appeared in London, 1867, W. G. T. SHEDD.

SOUTHWELL, Robert, poet and martyr; was b. at Horsham, St. Faith's, Norfolk, about 1562; and hanged at Tyburn, Feb. 22, 1595. He was educated at Paris, Douay, Tournay, and Rome; received into the Society of Jesus, Oct. 17, 1576.
when not yet seventeen; ordained, 1584, and made prefect of the English college at Rome; sent as a missionary to England, 1586; chaplain to the Countess of Arundel; betrayed to the government, 1592, imprisoned for three years in the Tower, found guilty of "constructive treason," and excuted. According to Cecil, he, though "thirteen times most cruelly tortured, cannot be induced to confess anything, not even the color of the horse whereon, on a certain day, he rode, lest thereby his friends might fall into the same trouble. His poems were published shortly after his death, and a complete edition appeared 1586, edited by W.
B. Turnbull. Some of them, since then widely copied, are of a very high order, and no less philosophic than Christian.

SOZOMENOS, Salamenes Hermias, a contemporary of Socrates; lived, like him, as a scholaticus in Constantinople, and wrote, like him, a history of the church from 328 to 439, edited by Valesius (1658), together with the histories of Eusebius and Socrates, and found in Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothéque. He seems to have known and used the work by Socrates. What he adds of his own, concerning hermits and monks, is of no great interest. But his style is better than Socrates'.

SPAIN. Christianity penetrated into Spain from North Africa. It is uncertain whether St.
Paul carried out his intention to visit Spain. The first Christians were found in Andalusia. The story of the martyrdom of the apostle James at Compostella dates from the ninth century. Towards the end of the fourth century the whole country was Christianized, and divided into eclesiastical provinces. The Council of Elvira (360) was attended by nineteen bishops and twenty-six presbyters, under the lead of Hosius. The councils and synods were presided over by the oldest bishop, afterwards by the metropolitan, of the province.
Communications with Rome began during the Pris-cillianist controversy, and became more frequent and intimate after the conquest of Spain by the Visigoths, in 456. The Goths were Arians, and the Catholic Church naturally sought for support from without. Nevertheless, when the Goths adopted the Catholic faith, at the Third Council of Toledo (589), the Spanish Church at once assumed an active and intimate interest. But by this time the clergy seems to have been rather low; though several brilliant names occur, such as Orosius, Leander and Isidore of Hispalis, Idefons, and Julian of Toledo, and others.

During the rule of the Visigoth kings (456—711) the Jews were kept under strict ecclesiastical supervision, on account of their dangerous connections with their co-religionists in Africa;
and under the Arab dominion (711—1492), all spiritual and political pressure was removed, and they prospered very much. They produced men of consequence in almost every department of life;
and by their wealth and commercial talent they exercised great influence, even in the Christian states of the country, though they generally excited the hatred of the people by their avarice.
As soon, however, as the Christians gained the ascendancy, persecutions were instituted; and in 1492, the year of the conquest of Granada, all Jews were expelled from Spain. Many were converted to Christianity, and remained in the country: but their conversion was generally nothing but a mask; and, whenever the Inquisition detected the fraud, it was cruelly punished.

Under the Moors the Christians were allowed to retain their faith; though very heavy taxes were levied on them, — one-tenth of their revenue on those who submitted without resistance, and one-fifth on those who were subjugated by armed forces. They were commanded not to speak disparagingly of the Koran and the Prophet, not to marry a Mohammedan woman, not to try to convert a Mooslem to Christianity, not to make alliances with the enemies of Islam, etc.
They were requested not to wear the same dress
as the Mohammedans, not to build their houses higher than the Mooslem, not to let their bells be heard, nor their cross be seen, in the street, not to drink wine or eat pork in public, etc. In the north-eastern part of the country, which, since the days of Charlemagne, stood under Christian rule, a peculiar liturgy, the so-called Mozarabio, was in use, until the Roman Liturgy was introduced in Aragonia in 1071, and in Castile in 1085.
Between the two, the Moors, when the Goths were separated by the water-borders, and the monasticism spread widely in the country. The Franciscans, who came to Spain in 1208, had a hundred and twenty-one monasteries there in 1400, and a hundred and ninety in 1506.

The revival of letters in Italy in the fifteenth century was soon transplanted to Spain; and there, in every department of life, it effectively prepared the way for the Reformation. The Protestant doctrines found from the very first many adherents among the Spaniards, especially among the higher classes;
and several Spanish translations of the Bible were published, — by Francisco Enzinas (Dryander) in 1548, Juan Perez in 1555, Cassidoro de Reyma in 1568, and Cypriano de Valera in 1596. King Philip II., however, and Pope Paul IV., supported by the Inquisition and the Jesuits, finally succeded in completely suppressing the movement. But the means they employed are among the greatest horrors history ever heard of. The first auto-da-fé took place at Arles, 1562; May 26, 1563; when Charles II. celebrated his marriage with Louise of Orleans in 1679, an auto-da-fé formed part of the solemnities, and for fourteen hours the young couple sat looking at the burning of twenty-three heretics. During the latter part of the eighteenth and the first part of the nineteenth century, various moves were made in a more liberal direction. In 1780 the Inquisition performed the last auto-da-fe, and its office was reduced to the mere censorship of books. In 1835 the Jesuits were expelled, and all monasteries numbering less than twelve monks were closed. But with the concordat of 1851 a heavy re-action set in. The Virgin was declared Queen of Spain, and all civil and political rights independent of denomination. The number of Protestants is hardly 60,000, of a population of nearly 17,000,000. [KLOSE.]

SPALATIN, Georg, b. at Spalt in the diocese of Eichstadt, 1484; d. at Altenburg Jan. 18, 1543. He studied at Erfurt and Wittenberg; was ordained a priest in 1507, and appointed librarian, secretary, and chaplain to the Elector Frederick the Wise in 1512, and superintendent of Altenburg in 1525. As he was an intimate friend of Luther and the other Reformers, and enjoyed the full confidence of Frederick the Wise and his successors, he exercised a very great influence on the course of the Reformation. See his life by CREMER.

SPALATIN, Johann Joachim, b. at Tribsees in Pomerania, Nov. 1, 1714; d. in Berlin, May 28, 1804. He studied theology at Bostock and Halle; as he was both in temperament and spirit so perfectly fitted for the work of a lawyer, his principal works as "Uber die Bestimmung des Menschen" (1748), "Uber den Werth der Gefuhle im Christenthum" (1764), "Uber die Nutzbarkeit des Pietigants" (1773), "Vertrauten Briefe, die Religion betreffend" (1784), etc., most of which were several times reprinted, and translated into French. He also left an interesting autobiography, published by his son, Berlin, 1804.

SPANGENBERG, Augustus Gottlieb, b. July 15, 1704, at Klettenberg, Prussia; d. Sept. 18, 1792, in the eighty-ninth year of his age, at Berthelsdorf, Saxony; was a bishop of the Moravian Church, and, next to Count Zinzendorf (q.v.), its most illustrious leader. He attended the grammar-school at Ilefeld, and the university of Jena, where an exegetical lecture of Buddeus, at which he happened to be present, induced him to give up the study of law, and devote himself to theology. He graduated in 1728 as master of arts, and soon after began to lecture in the university, and occasionally to preach. The free schools in the suburbs of Jena, established by a circle of pious students to which he belonged, and which he sustained and enriched with all his means and talents, formed a very close fellowship with the Brethren. His labors at Jena continued to be crowned with great success. After having declined various advantageous offers, he was induced, in 1732, to accept the position of adjunct of the theological faculty of the university of Halle, and superintendent of the schools connected with Francke's Orphan-House. But it soon became evident that he was not in sympathy with his colleagues. They took offence at some of his doctrinal views, at his association with separatists, and especially at the intimate connection which he persisted in keeping up with the Brethren. Complaints were lodged against him, and in 1733 he was dismissed from the university by a royal mandate. He immediately went to Herrnhut, and entered the service of the Moravian Church, laboring in various parts of Germany, in America, in the West Indies, and in England, where he organized (1741) the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen; which association still exists. His work in America was particularly distinguished. After having been consecrated a bishop in 1744, he stood at the head of the Moravian Church in this country, with occasional interruptions, until 1792. He showed himself to be a wise ruler, a faithful pastor, an ardent evangelist. So prudent was the forethought with which he cared for his brethren, both in temporal and spiritual things, that they gave him the name of "Joseph," which he adopted, often signing official documents in this way. Nor was his work confined to his own church. The settlers in various Colonies, and especially the Indians, learned to know and revere him as a faithful missionary of the Gospel. In 1762 he returned to Europe, took an active part in framing the new constitution of the Brethren's Church, and became the most prominent member of the commission for revising the constitution of their church.
of its governing board. The enthusiasm of Zinzendorf, which sometimes led him beyond bounds, was supplemented by the prudence and wisdom of Spangenberg. Among his numerous writings the most important are Idea Fidei Fru- trum, oder Kurzer Begriff der christ. Lehre in den engl. Brüdergemeinen, Barbry, 1762, translated into English by La Trole, and entitled Exposition of Christian Doctrine, London, 1774; and Leben des Grafen von Zinzendorf, 1775, in 3 vols., abridged English translation by Jackson, London, 1853. Spangenberg composed many hymns, some of which are known and used wherever the German tongue is spoken; for instance, Die Kirche Christi die Er erscheint (Eng. trans., Moravian Hymnal, No. 612, "The Church of Christ, that he hath hallowed here"), and Heil'ge Einfall, Gnadenwunder (Eng. trans., abridged, Moravian Hymnal, No. 432, "When simplicity we cherish"). The two most important biographies of him are, Leben Spangenbergs, von Jeremias Rischer, Barbry, 1794, French trans., Neuchâtel, 1835, and Leben Spangenbergs, Heidelberg, 1846, Eng. trans., London, 1855.

SPANGENBERG, Cyriacus, b. at Nordhausen, June 7, 1528; d. at Strassburg, Feb. 10, 1604. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was in 1553 appointed court-preacher to the Count of Mansfeld. As a passionate adherent of Flacius, he became implicated in the controversy concerning hereditary sin, and was in 1575 compelled to flee from Mansfeld, disguised as a midwife. Appointed pastor of Schützei-on-the-Fulda shortly after, his stubborn advocacy of the Flacian views once more disturbed the peace of the congregation, and again drove him into exile, in 1590. He found refuge at Vacha in Hesse, but only for a time, finally returning to Strassburg. His writings are devotional, polemical, and historical. See his life by J. G. Leuckfeld, Quedlinburg, 1712.

SPANHEIM is the name of a family which has produced several noticeable theologians. — Friedrich Spanheim, b. at Amberg in the Upper Palatinate, Jan. 1, 1600; d. at Leyden, April 30, 1648. He studied at Heidelberg and Geneva, visited Paris and England, and was in 1631 appointed professor of theology at Geneva, and in 1641 at Leyden. He was a very prolific writer, and wrote in the controversy with Amyraut, Disputatio de gratia universal i, 1644; Esercitationes de gratia universal i, 1646; Epistola ad Matthaeum Cotterium, 1648; Vindicia exercitationum, 1649. — Friedrich Spanheim, son of the preceding; b. at Geneva, May 1, 1632; d. at Leyden, May 18, 1701. He studied theology and philosophy at Leyden, and was appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg in 1655 and at Leyden in 1670. He wrote in defense of Calvin against Descartes and Cocceius. His collected works appeared at Leyden, 1701-08, 8 vols.

SPARROW, William, an eminent theologian of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, United States; descended from a highly respectable Irish family; b. in Massachusetts, March 12, 1801. His parents returning to Ireland in 1805, he attended boarding-schools in the Vale of Avoca. Returned to America, 1817. In his seventeenth year was appointed principal of Utica Academy; student at Columbia College, New York, 1819-21; professor of Latin and Greek at Miami University, 1824-25; ordained in 1826; collarcer with Bishop Chase in founding Kenyon College; eleven years Milnor professor at Gambier; professor of systematic divinity and Christian evidences in the Theological Seminary of Virginia, 1840-74; for thirty years delegate to General Convention from Virginia, and chairman of standing committee. Died at Alexandria, Va., Jan. 17, 1874.

During the civil war (1861-64) he carried on the work of the seminary in the interior of Virginia. At its close his unique relations to both sections enabled him to exert important influence in restoring the church in Virginia to its former ecclesiastical relations. As he had by the fame of his powers raised the Virginia seminary to an important position, so now his hand was chiefly concerned in its restoration.

Dr. Sparrow was recognized as the ablest theologian and the most original thinker of the evangelical school in the Protestant Episcopal Church. His acute and powerful intellect, enriched by accurate learning, and strengthened by patient thought, moved with freedom among the profoundest questions of metaphysics and of theology. He bowed with unquestioning faith to the supremacy of Scripture, yet he welcomed modern criticism as an ally; and all his thinking proceeded on the conviction of the ultimate harmony of revelation and science. An earnest evangelical and a zealous Protestant, he was usually classed as Arminian in theology; yet he abhorred the narrowness of theological systems, and led his pupils up into the pure atmosphere of independent thought and rational inquiry. By the hundreds of young men who sat at his feet at Gambier and at Alexandria he was looked up to as a great teacher; and many of the best minds in the church have acknowledged their indebtedness to his suggestive and stimulating instruction.

He was an earnest Episcopalian, but he put doctrine before order: hence he felt himself at one with Protestant Christendom, and rejoiced in the Evangelical Alliance as an expression of Protestant unity. He earnestly maintained the scriptural character of the Prayer-Book, but desired a revision, to remove ambiguities, and to relieve weak consciences. Accordingly, he sympathized with the difficulties of Bishop Cummins, he deprecated his secession, and remained firm in his adhesion to the church. Perhaps no man of his time in America did more to check the spread of the trascratician theology.

He was also an earnest antagonist of the dogma of a temporal apostolical succession, holding it to be essentially unscriptural and anti-Protestant. To his great intellectual powers he added the influence of exalted piety, a character of great modesty and humility, and a life of simplicity and self-denial. He sealed his deep interest in Christian missions by the cheerful surrender to the Chinese mission of a daughter of remarkable talents. His lifelong feebleness of health, combined with an almost morbid aversion to appearing in print, unhappily prevented his entering the field of authorship; but a number of his occasional sermons and addresses, saw the light, and a posthumous volume of Sermons appeared in 1876, New York (T. Whittaker).

The spirit of his teaching and of his life is well summed up in words of his own, graven on his tomb: "SEEK THE TRUTH, COME WHENCE IT MAY, COST WHAT IT WILL." See his Life and Correspondence, by Rev. W. W. New, D.D., New York, 1876.

SPEE, Friedrich von, b. at Kaiserswerth in 1591; d. at Treves, Aug. 7, 1635. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1610; taught grammar, philosphy, and morals in the Jesuit college in Cologne;
was at the same time engaged in the persecution of witches, and led more than two hundred of them to the stake; and worked during the last years of his life as a missionary among the Protestants of Northern Germany. He published a book, Cautionem criminalis, against the common method of trying witches, but is chiefly known as a religious poet,—Trutz-Nachtegal, Cologne, 1649 (edited by Godecke and Tittmann, 1879), and Gütdene Tengelbuch, probably published in the same year (last ed., Coblenz, 1850). Selections from those two collections of poems have been made by

C. M. Pfaff. In the two editions last-mentioned the fourth book, left in manuscript by the author, for the first time appears. The object of this very learned book is to show that Jewish law and ritual are in origin independent of those of surrounding nations, and expressly designed to fix a gulf between the Jew and his neighbors.
Yet Spence has been accused by Witsius, in his Aegyptiaco, and by Archbishop Magee, in his Atoment, of maintaining the hypothesis of the Egyptian origin of the Jewish ritual. Besides this famous work, Spence wrote A discourse concerning prodigies, London, 1663, 2d ed. with Discourse concerning vulgar prodigies, 1665; Dissertatio de Urim et Thummim, Cambridge, 1699 (a comprehensive work upon several obscure Bible matters,
e.g., Hebrew Lustrations and purifications, circumcision, music, dancing, and burials).

SPENER, Philipp Jakob. Among the theologians of the Lutheran Church of the seventeenth century, Spener was the purest and most spotless
in character, and the most successful in his work.
He was born Jan. 13, 1635, in Rappoltstein, in Upper Alsace, and d. at Berlin, Feb. 5, 1705. But as both father and mother came from Strassburg, and were of the Ulmaisches Blut, Spener usually called himself a Strassburger.

With justice he is counted among those who retained their baptismal grace, and in it harmoniously continued to develop their Christian life.
This natural piety was nourished by congenial family associations. His relation to the noble widow of the Count of Rappoltstein, and by his study of the ascetic productions of Armin, as also of Sonthom, Bayly, Dykes, Baxter, and other English writers at that time much read along the Rhine. His principal instructor, and the spiritual forerunner of theLearned school of preachers at Rappoltstein, Joachim Stoll, who in 1645 became his brother-in-law. "I owe to him among men the first sparks of Christianity," says Spener. On Stoll, see Rohrich: Mittheilungen aus
After being thus prepared by a young and venerable youth in 1651 entered the university of Strasburg.
According to his own statements, he lived a very retired life, devoting himself entirely to his books.
His theological leaders were Dorsche, Dannhauer, Johann Schmid, Sebastian Schmid. The first-named, a strict Lutheran theologian, Spener called his "preceptor." The last-named was the most famous exegete of his day; and in Johann Schmid Spener saw his "father in Christ." In accordance with the custom of the day, a peregrinatio academica completed his course of studies. He first went to Basle to sit at the feet of the younger Buxtorf, at that time the most celebrated teacher of Hebrew. Then he spent a year in Geneva, which long stay tended to widen the mental horizon of the young Lutheran theologian; and he found much to praise in the organization of the Reformed Church as there represented. Labadie's fiery eloquence so influenced him, that he translated his Manuel de prière into German.

In 1661, in company with his pupil, the young Count of Rappoltstein, he paid a visit to Wurttemberg, and remained there five months. His qualities of mind and heart gained him many friendships in Stuttgart and Tubingen; and his permanent employment in Wurttemberg was only frustrated by a call to become pastor in Strasburg in 1663. He secured a situation which gave him leisure as a master to deliver various courses of lectures at the university on history and philosophy.

In 1666 he received a call to become pastor and senior in Frankfurt-am-Main; and, after consultation with his political and ecclesiastical superiors, he accepted this vocation, so honorable for a man but thirty-one years of age. He endeavored to awaken a consistent and live Christianity in the Frankfurt churches, but was prevented to a great extent by the senate and city government. Cf.
Bedenken, iii. pp. 105, 215, iv. 66. He first attempted to revive a thorough system of catechetical instructions, which had sadly fallen into decay. Mechanical memorizing was the first object of his attack; and, to effect his reformation in this regard, he published his Einflüsse Erklärung der christl. Lehre, 1717, and his Tabula catechetica, in 108 tablets, in 1683. In his sermons his chief object was to inculcate purity of doctrine; but he no longer considered himself bound to confine himself to the pericopes, his endeavors being to make his congregation acquainted with the contents of the whole Scriptures. This in-brought about a more thorough preparation for the first reception of the Lord's Supper in connection with confirmation. He was successful, however, only in the country congregations. Cf.
Bedenken, iii. 395. For a reformation of church discipline he could do little or nothing. His sermons, always written in part or whole, though chiefly of a didactic character, yet they were marked by experience, and a deep knowledge of Scriptures; and his influence began to extend far beyond the boundaries of Frankfurt. Even his polemics against mechanical Christianity were not aggressive or challenging. Yet in 1689 a sermon on the false righteousness of the Pharisees caused a division between the earnest and the careless members of his flock, and in 1670 the former effected a closer union among themselves. The result was an organization, at first only of a few, for practical religious purposes. It met at first in Spener's study, and read different ascetic works, considered the last sermon, and the like. Soon assemblies were held in other houses also. In 1682 Spener succeeded in receiving permission to hold these meetings in the church, which somewhat changed their character.

Spener's days in Frankfurt were pleasant. He says, "In the honorable ministerium of Frankfurt, during the twenty years of his senior, the form of peace kept us in brotherly harmony." His own character and nature contributed most to bring about this state of affairs. He continued to abide by his strict theological views, and thus did not as yet give any offence. In 1675 he published his famous Pia Desideria. In them he lamented the corruption of the Evangelical Church, and recommends six different remedies. His Desideria were an earnest word to his church, and found an echo in many hearts in Germany. Only in Strasburg did they meet with a cool reception. More injurious to Spener's reputation were his collegia pietatis. In them he proposed a closer union among themselves. Although these assemblies had before this already found favor, even with the heads of orthodoxy; but after their multiplication they also developed peculiarities looking toward a separation from the church, and thus "Pietists" gradually was regarded as the name of a sect. Among others, Spener's former friend, Menzler, the court-preacher in Darmstadt, now also became his enemy. Dilfeld, in Nordhausen, in 1679, published his Theosophia Horbio-Speneriana, in which he maintained that regeneration was not necessary for true theology. Spener answered in his Gotisches Jahrhundert, etc., and this ended the controversy. In them he opposed the separatistic tendency among his followers, especially in his Die Klagen über das verdorbene Christenthum, Missbrauch und rechter Gebrauch, 1654.

Spener had thus labored with great success in Frankfurt for twenty years, when in 1689 a call to become court-preacher, and member of the consistory at Dresden, usually regarded at that time as the highest ecclesiastical position in Germany, was extended to him. This was done at the especial request of the elector, George III., who had seen and heard Spener in Frankfurt, and learned his upright character through personal experience. The latter modestly put a low estimate on his Frankfurt work, and had no great plans for his labors at the Saxon court. His departure from Frankfurt on the 10th of July, 1688, was a day of sorrow for the whole city.

The new position indeed offered the possibility of a more diffuse labors, but the vastness of the city,ath the height of its power and prosperity, tended to make its labors more difficult. In Dresden, Spener immediately began his work with catechetical instructions, and the establishment of a collegium philobilicum. He sought also to secure appointments for earnest pastors; and among the counselors of the throne he found at least one sympathetic person, Herr von Schweinitz,—vir pietate nulli secundus, as Spener says. Schade, his Leipzig friend, also soon came to Berlin; and in him he found a congenial soul. Here again, as in Frankfurt and Dresden, Spener immediately began his work with catechetical instructions, and the establishment of a collegium philobilicum. He sought also to secure appointments for earnest pastors; and, chiefly through his influence, Breithaupt, Francke, and Anton, the later leaders of the pietistic movement, were made members of the theological faculty. In Spener's zeal and conscientiousness, not only at Berlin, but also elsewhere, his voice was ever in favor of peace. His colleague Schade, through his inability to distinguish between use and abuse, had in blind zeal condemned private confessions in toto, and it was with great difficulty that Spener could allay the storm. Later he complains that his greatest sorrows had been caused, not by his enemies, but by his inconsiderate friends. And from abroad now come the accusations that Spener was the source of the many fanatical sects springing up everywhere by virtue of his opponents, and not by contact with the thorough theological discussions of previous decades, was entirely of a personal and rancorous character: no means were too low for the purpose. The masterpiece among these libels is the Christusatherische Vorstellung . . . etc., published by the entire Wittenberg faculty in 1696. No less than two hundred and eighty-three heterodox views are here catalogued against Spener. This document, the production of the mentally weak senior of the faculty, Deutschmann, proved harmless fabrication; which fact Spener attributes to the influence of a kind Providence. This and the many other polemical writings, Spener answered in a becoming spirit. His principal work in this department is his Aufrichtigste Uberfussung mit der Augsburgischen Confession, directed against the Wittenberg faculty. These answers show learning, research, and a deep piety.

In an indirect way he was drawn into another controversy of the church. The movement inaugurated by Calixtus had assumed a Romeward tendency; and several prominent teachers in Königberg, and others, were strongly inclining in that direction. The elector authorized Spener, in conjunction with two other prominent theologians, to defend the Evangelical Church against the accusations of this new movement. This he did in a thorough manner in his Der evangel. Kirche Rettung vor falschen Beschuldigungen, 1695; which work produced a marked effect. Two years later, however, Spener experienced the grief of seeing his former pupil, Frederick August of Saxony, join the Roman Church.

Spener did not live to see the victory in Berlin of the movement he represented. This took place when the king of Prussia in 1708 took as his third wife Sophia Louisa von Mecklenburg. Under the leadership of the court-preacher, Forst, prayer-meetings were held at the royal castle, in which the king at times would participate. Just after having finished his work on dogmatics, entitled Von der einigen Gottheit Christi, the noble teacher, who had been the guide for so many unto righteousness, himself entered into his final rest, Feb. 5, 1705. His death-bed scene and end are described by the eye-witness v. Canstein. Blankenburg, his former assistant, was appointed his successor.

Spener's wife, a lady from Strassburg, was one with him in mind and soul. Of his eleven children, eight survived him; but not all of these caused him joy.

In theological culture Spener was equal to any of his contemporaries. His sermons and polemical works show that he was a thorough exegete. In systematic theology he raved the best of his day, but did not depart from the formalistic and logomachical spirit of the age, but rather, subordinated to poetry, by no means absent, and more definitely by his Hymnes of Heavenly Love and Beautie (1596), in which "may be found the germ of Paradise Lost, including the epitome..." of Milton's 'great argument.'" He graduated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, 1573; issued The Shepheare's Calendar, 1579; was intimate with Sidney and Raleigh; held offices, and received an estate in Ireland; was expelled and ruined by the insurgents in Tyrole's rebellion, 1598, and ended his life miserably in London. His works, whether read or not, continue to be printed and praised; and his rank among the poets of that great age is next to Shakespear. F. M. BIRD.

SPERATUS, Paulus, an active Reformer and much esteemed hymn-writer; b. at Rottweil, Franconia (whence the surname a Rublis), Dec. 13, 1484; d. at Marienwerder, Aug. 12, 1551. He studied theology in Paris and Italy, but embraced the Reformation, and preached its ideas at Dinkelsbühl, Wurzburg, Salzburg, and Vienna, whence he was compelled to flee, in 1521, on account of a sermon against the monastic vows: Von dem llO/lefl kelsbiihl, Wurzburg, Salzburg, and Vienna, whence he was arrested by Bishop Thurzo of 011 tiitz, and accused of heresy. Released at the instance of Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg, he went to Wittenberg, where he aided Luther in his collection of German hymns, and was in 1526 made court-preacher to Duke Albrecht of Prussia. To this period belong most of his own hymns, original and translated; and in 1529 he was made bishop of Pomerania, in which position he was so zealous for the consolidation of the Protestant Church in Prussia. His life has been written by Cosacx (1881), [PRESSEL (1862), and Trautenberger (1863)]. D. SEDDMAN.

SPICE AMONG THE HEBREWS. By spice, especially aromatics are meant, which the Israelites used in common life. The common word for these aromatics is besamim: another term seems to be neshet (1 Kings x. 23). The terms rokach, rikutum, merkachah, mirkachah, signify more especially salves prepared from aromatics; whilst merkach seems to be the general term for aromatic wood. In the gardens of kings and nobles, such exotic plants were often raised (Cant. i. 12, iv. 13 sq., v. 18); but the gums, wood, etc., for the preparation of incense and salves, were mostly imported to Palestine and Egypt from the south of Arabia, Sabas, and India, and negotiated by the Phenicians (Ezek. xxvii. 22) and Ishmaelites (Gen. xxxvii. 25). Some of the species belonging here have already been treated, as BALT (q.v.), BDUEUIM (q.v.), FRANKINCENSE (q.v.), GALBANUM (q.v.), MYRRH (q.v.). We must not omit the ladanum and spikenard. As to the former, which is mentioned in Gen. xxxvii. 25 and xiiii. 11 (Authorized Version, "myrrh"), it is the name of a bitter, aromatic, slimy, and sticky resin, flowing from the juice of cistus, of which there are several species. It was gathered from the beards of goats, where it is found sticking. The ancient versions, knowing the meaning of the Hebrew word no more, rendered it "stacte,"—istachio nut, or chestnuts. As to spikenard, the ar-famed perfume of the East, there were several kinds, one a very precious, the other less valuable. The latter was gathered from a plant growing in North and East India, South Arabia, and Gedrosia, and belonging to the family valeriana. It still grows at the foot of the Himalayan Mountains. The Phenicians imported this perfume to the West, and thus it came also to Palestine. Less precious than the Indian was the Syrian (especially well prepared at Tarus), which was composed of oil, most of which also belonged to aromatic plants of the valeriana family. It was sold in small alabaster boxes (Mark xiv. 3), and was carried in smelling-bottles. It was used not only as salve, but also for seasoning the wine. With such precious nard, Mary of Bethany anointed the Saviour six days before the passover (John xii. 1). This oil was also used for the purpose of preserving the dead. The name "nard" is of Sasanrit origin, and points to the home of the plant: it denotes "giving an odor." Besides these different species, the Bible also mentions the following species: Aloes (Num. xix. 8; Prov. xvi. 7; Cant. iv. 14; Ps. xiv. 8; John xix. 38), a fragrant wood (hence aloes-wood) growing in India, where it is called ogil. The Europeans call it lignum aquila [i.e., eagle-wood]. The wood is resinous, of a dark color, heavy. The Indians regard the aloes-trees holy. Another aromatic wood is the algam, from Ophir (1 Kings x. 11 sq.; 2 Chron. ii. 8, ix. 10); also almuq, not "pearl," as the rabbits explain, but probably sandal-wood. Besides the wood we must also mention the bark of different trees growing in India, and which the Hebrews at a very early period counted among the spices; thus especially the cinnamon (Ezxd. xxx. 23, where it is enumerated as one of the ingredients employed for the preparation of the holy anointing oil). It also occurs Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14; Rev. xviii. 13. The home of the cinnamon is Ceylon. According to Nees von Esenbeck (Disp. de cinnamono, Bonn, 1829), the cassis was not a distinct species, but only a wild or original form of the Cinnamomum Ceylonicum. There are two Hebrew words rendered "cassia,"—kiddah and ketsiah,—which were among the ingredients of the holy incense, according to the rabbis. To these ingredients the Talmud adds also the koshet, the costus-root. Another ingredient was the "bitter of kings and nobles," which the Hindus call hava-tob; Ezxd. xxx. 23; Jer. vi. 20; Isa. xiii. 24) and Karkom, or saffron, only mentioned in Cant. iv. 14. To the resinosus and balmy spices already mentioned we may perhaps add the nekota (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xiiii. 11), some kind of gum; the "iliem," or poplar (Gen. xxx. 10), by some regarded as the storax-tree; the mastic (Susan. v. 54), a tree growing in Greece, Asia Minor, and Palestine,—the Pistacia lentiscus. It is extensively used in the East in the preparation of spirits, as a sweetmeat, as a masticatory for preserving the gums and teeth, as an anti-spasmodic in medicine. To the spices we may also add the Cypress-brunch (kopher, A.V., camphure, but in the margin cypress, Cant. i. 14, iv. 13), carried by the Mohammedan women in the bosom. The powdered leaves, which are mixed with the juice of citrons, are used to stain therewith the hair and nails. The sirpad, in Isa. iv. 15, translated "bitter," is, according to the Geichhorn (Piscator's Table), the same thing. Finally, we mention the gourd (kikayon, Jon. iv. 6-10), whose growth was miraculous: it is the Ricius communis, or castor-oil plant. In the Talmud the kit-oil is mentioned, prepared from the seed of the ricinus.
SPIERA, Francesco, the unfortunate man, who, for worldly considerations, denied his Protestant profession; murdered; and consequently died in a condition of sudden despair and remorse; was b. at Citadella, near Padua, Italy, about 1498; d. there December, 1548. A lawyer and public official in his native city, greatly honored, rich, and ardently devoted to the pursuit of wealth, he accepted the message of the Reformation; and experiencing pain, comfort, and joy in a remarkable degree, according to his own account, he preached everywhere, on the streets and in private, to his fellow-townsmen. He studied the Scriptures carefully. His change of life produced a great excitement. He was accused by the priest of the town at Rome. When Spiera learned that he was about to be summoned to appear before the papal authorities, he lost courage, and went of his own free will, but only after a terrible struggle with his conscience, to Venice, to confess repentance to the papal legate, della Casa. He subscribed a penitential document which the legate drew up, and read a similar document, recanting the doctrines of the Reformation, in the church of Citadella, before two thousand people. No sooner, however, had he arrived at his own home than he was overcome by the most terrible fears of the judgment and eternal condemnation. He could not leave his bed, lost his appetite, attempted several times to take his own life, was carried to Padua, but brought back to Citadella, and died a few days afterwards in despair. These experiences, and the manner of Spiera’s death, produced an intense excitement. Spiera believed he had committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and refused all consolation from the consideration of the divine mercy. He held he belonged to the congregation, and not to the Church. Spiera had the most painful visions. Devils surrounded him, stuck needles into his pillow; a fly buzzed about his head, which was sent by Beezelbub; and, in his terrible consciousness of sin, he often roared like a lion, causing those about him to tremble.

Criticising the history of Spiera, we come to the conclusion, that in spite of his preaching the gospel, and laying claim to the finest Christian justification by faith, but did not accompany his faith, and eternal damnation. He could not leave his bed, lost his appetite, attempted several times to take his own life, was carried to Padua, but brought back to Citadella, and died a few days afterwards in despair. Criticising the history of Spiera, we come to the conclusion, that in spite of his preaching the gospel, and laying claim to the finest Christian justification by faith, but did not accompany his profession by a forsaking of sin. Calvin and the other Reformers took a deep interest in the case; and Calvin, who wrote a preface (December, 1549) to the account of Henricus Scotus, regarded his sufferings and remorse as a terrible judgment of God, sent to awaken Italy. He regarded Spiera as one of those who deceive themselves with the belief that they are of the predestinate, when they are not. There have been other cases similar to that of Spiera, as Henry IV. of France. Other cases are mentioned in Coquerel: Hist. des Eglises du Desert. Spiera is to be looked upon as one of the negative evidences for the truth of Protestantism. We have no instance of any pervert from the Roman Church having a similar experience. There are several accounts of Spiera’s life and death. Those of Vergerius, and serious Protestants were scandalized at
after the death of Spinola. See LEIBNITZ and MOLANUS.

H. MALLETT.

SPINOZA, Baruch de, b. at Amsterdam, Nov.
24, 1632; d. at The Hague, Feb. 21, 1677. His parents were Jews who had been driven from Portugal by religious persecution. His teacher in Hebrew was the celebrated rabbi, Saul Levi Marteira, who introduced him to the study of the Bible and the Talmud; besides, he studied Latin under the celebrated physician, Franz van der Ende. Differences between his views and the Jewish doctrine were soon noticed, and so he was expelled from the Jewish communion on account of "frightful heresies." He left Amsterdam, and lived in the vicinity from 1656 to 1660, then at Rhymsberg and Voorburg, near The Hague.
Finally he settled at The Hague; residing there to the end of his life, and to the end of his income by grinding lenses. In 1673 he refused to take a call as professor of philosophy to Heidelberg, saying that he might be hindered there in his liberty of philosophizing.

Clearness and calmness are the main features of his character. He was never seen laughing, very rarely, but kind and gentle to all. Free from hypocrisy, a man of few wants, he was the image of a true sage.

His writings are, Renati Descartes Principiorum philosophiae, pars i. et ii., etc, Amstelodami apud Joh. Rieuwertz, 1663; Tractatus theologico-politicus, Hamburgi apud Henricum Kirnraht, 1670; Baruch de Spinoza's Opera posthuma, Amsterdam, apud Joh. Rieuwertz, 1677, containing Ethica ordine geometrico demonstrata, etc, Tractatus politicus, Tractatus de intellectus emendatione, Epistles; Baruch de Spinoza tract. de Deo et homine ejusque faciicati (recently discovered): The unfinished Essays of Spinoza, ed. Hugo Ginaberg, Heidelberg, 1882. We shall only consider here the Ethics and the Tractatus theologico-politicus as the most important works for philosophy and theology.

Spinoza, the second great philosopher in the course of the purely rationalistic development of modern philosophy, stands in very close connection to his great predecessor, Descartes. The fundamental notion of Spinoza's system is the notion of substance, which is thus defined: "By substance I understand that which is in itself, and which is conceived by itself; i.e., the conception of which does not need the conception of another thing in order to be formed. There is but one substance, which is identical with God.
We cannot predicate any thing of it, as omnis determinatio est negatio, and the infinite cannot contain any negation, because it is the absolute affirmation of existence." All predicatives used by Spinoza to define its nature are therefore but a circumlocution of the first definition.

In order to comprehend something of the infinite substance, we must look to the second important notion in the system,—the notion of the attributes. Substance cannot be comprehended by merely attributing it to some other substance, which are what reason percieves as constituting the essence of substance. The attributes, therefore, belong only to our mind, not to substance itself, which cannot admit any determination,
i.e., negation. Our mind may therefore ascribe
a number of attributes to substance. Spinoza, however, considers substance only under the attributes of thought and extension. The cause of these two attributes is not in God, but in the human mind, which finds both thought and extension in itself. The attributes are independent of each other, and are not comprehended per se, not by substance; as the notion of attributes is not dependent on the notion of substance, which excludes every determination. Res cogitans and res extensa are the same thing, i.e., considered from different stand-points; but it is indifferent to substance how it is considered.

The notion of substance, being but one, seems to imply that substance = everything existing,
i.e., the world. But how can the finite proceed from the infinite? This question is senseless according to Spinoza, because the finite, as the finite, does not exist; for all determination is non esse, and the finite is only as being composed of the finite things have real being only as far as they are in God, in whom omnia sunt simul natura. This produces the third important notion,—the notion of the modes or affections. Modes are the accidents of substance, or that which is in something else,
i.e., in God, by whom, also, they are conceived.
For modes are nothing in themselves: they are like the waves of the ocean. There is nothing existing outside of God, and it would be absurd to say that God was composed of modes. It is false, therefore, to say of Spinoza that he taught God and the world were identical, because we can conceive of the world only as being composed of single objects. Single objects do, therefore, not exist as such, but only as modifications and accidents of substance.

There is a threefold mode of considering things.
The first kind of cognition, which he calls opinio or imagination, is cognition through unregulated experience or signs, by which we connect certain ideas. The second kind of cognition, ratio, is cognition through the peculiarities of things, and notiones communes. The third kind of cognition is the intuitive knowledge of the mind, or true knowledge. Looking at the world through imagination, it appears to us as being composed of many objects or ideas, and the finite is consisted of things; and so we have the idea of a natura naturata, i.e., of a world. But it is the nature of our mind to know things as necessary or external;
and substance considered in this way, i.e., the true way, produces the idea of a natura naturata.

There is no relation between both, not even the relation of causality. Spinoza, speaking, however, of causality, means an immanency of causality. God is therefore only the substance, or the substratum of objects.

As will is but a mode, it is self-evident that God cannot act with free will: everything follows from his necessity, i.e., his nature being his power. It is foolish to assume that God acts according to aims, for this means to subject him to something else. The basis of his being is the basis of his acting. The law of causality rules, however, in the natura naturata.

In like manner by substance is conceived under the modes of thought and extension, single objects must be conceived, because they are modes of thought and extension; for the world is either a material world, or a world of ideas. Being modes of the same substance, they must stand in accordance, so that the order and connection of ideas is identical with the order and connection of things. For it is not only a thing, and an idea by a thing; not a thing by an idea, or an idea by a thing. This is true of all single modes, which are things or ideas according to the way they are considered. All things are therefore animated, but they differ in the grade of body and idea. According to this, identical, considered under different modes. It is self-evident that the mind cannot act upon the body, and the body cannot act upon the mind. But, as there is an idea of the human body, there is also an idea of the soul, or the idea of the idea.

The individual man is therefore nothing but a mode of the divine substance. The human mind may thus be called a part of the divine reason, and we can say that all intellects together form the infinite intellect. Man, being only a mode of substance, stands in an endless series of causes. He will as a modification of the body is therefore also determined. Men think to be free because they are not conscious of the determining causes. Will is the faculty to affirm or deny: this is again determined by the idea of that which is to be affirmed or denied. Will and intellect are therefore identical. We are active when any thing happens of which we are the adequate cause; passive, however, if any thing happens of which we are not, or only partly, the cause. The mind is therefore active only when having adequate ideas; passive, when having inadequate ideas, or being under the influence of the imagination. The endeavor to become free from this, and to reach a state of perfection, is called will, or, speaking of the body, appetite. The transition of the mind to greater perfection is joy: the opposite is sadness. Joy accompanied by the idea of its external cause is love: sadness accompanied by its external cause is hate. All other passions are derived from these. The servant of man consists in his inability to control his passions. The common conceptions of good and evil are wrong. These terms denote nothing positive which exists in themselves, but are conceptions and notions which result from our comparing of things. The evil, or sin, is nothing positive; for nothing happens against the will of God. It is therefore a negation which appears to be something only in our conception. There is no idea of the evil in God; for, if sin was something real, then God would certainly be its author. In order to get a precise notion of the terms "good" and "evil," he defines good to be that of which we know with certainty that it is useful to us, and evil, that of which we know with like certainty that it hinders us in the attainment of any good.

Virtue is nothing but the power to produce that which is according to one's nature. I do not sin again, because I approve it, because it is against my nature; and reason does not require any thing which is against nature. That is of real usefulness which brings man to a greater perfection. But as the true nature of reason is knowledge, then nothing is useful but that which serves knowledge. The highest good is the knowledge of God. The highest good is something good, something bad; likewise all passions which involve sadness, like compassion, meek-
SPIRES, a city of Bavaria on the Rhine, is noticeable in church history as the seat of four diets concerning the Reformation. — I. The first diet was opened June 26, 1526. The situation of Christ, contained in this essay, are also of great interest.

The logical fallacies and other defects in the system of Spinoza have been frequently pointed out. The principal objections to be made are the following. The idea of substance is notionless, and insufficient for an explanation of growth and life: the modes stand, therefore, in hardly any connection with substance, and thus do not fulfil what they are intended for. The practical philosophy, although grandly drawn, does not cover the whole realm of the social, artistic, and ethical life of man: nevertheless, the system, and especially the sublime ideas of substance, has had the greatest influence upon modern philosophy.

Fichte, Schelling, Schleiermacher, Hegel, and many others, owe very much to Spinoza. And the theologians of his time, are to-day accepted as true by theology. The old roach of atheism disapppear more and more by a thorough knowl edge of his writing. And, while the scholars at the greatest influence upon modern philosophy.

it is never said that the spirit dies, but that the soul dies (Num. xxxi. 19; Judg. xvi. 30; Matt. x. 28; Mark iii. 4). Only the soul is the subject of will and desire, inclination and aversion, pleasure and disgust (cf. Deut. xii. 20, xiv. 26; 1 Sam. ii. 16; Job xxiii. 13; Ps. xliii. 2, lixii. 1; Prov. xxii. 10; Isa. xxvi. 8; Mic. vi. 1, etc.), but soul and spirit are alike the subject of perception, self-consciousness. It must not, however, be overlooked, that consciousness, perception, willing, are attributed to the heart; and soul and spirit are spoken of only as they concern the hidden state to which these functions and phenomena belong, and because some weight would be laid upon it.

Again: the dead are spoken of as spirits (Luke xxiv. 37, 39; Acts xxiii. 8 sq.; Heb. xii. 23; 1 Pet. iii. 19), but the living as souls, for the soul as such outlasts death. Finally, and this is the most important difference in the Bible use of these words, whereas soul is applied to the individual, the subject of life, spirit is never so used. Spirit as an independent subject is always something different from the human spirit.

This latter distinction rests upon the original difference of the terms: δύναται, "spirit," is the condition, while δύναμις, "soul," is the manifestation, of life. But for the explanation of this and other peculiarities of usage, it is, of course, not sufficient always to call to mind the different points of view from which the inner being of man is described, now as spirit, and now as soul. One must go a step beyond the original relation of the two descriptions. Granted that spirit and soul are related as vital principle and life, still it is possible to distinguish them, not only in conception, but in fact; because the spirit, the principle of the soul, is the divine vital principle, immanent in, but not identical with, the individual life. Soul and spirit cannot be separated as soul and body, but they can be distinguished. Spirit is the principle of the soul; and it cannot be said of the spirit, which proceeds from God, and always bears the divine vital principle, that it dies or sins.

It is the knowledge of God and of the fall which leads us to make the distinction between the divine and human spirit. Spirit is wherever life is; and this spirit is the spirit of God, and in a peculiar manner. This spirit belongs to man. Not by the mere fact of creation does the holy spirit come to man, for this spirit is something different from the human spirit. The holy spirit is the cause of the soul, not identical with it. Sin has broken the connection between the human spirit and the spirit of God. So death came in as the opposite of the spirit wrought and filled eternal life, which was man's before the fall. Man now has a consciousness of guilt. He feels the pressure of law, and his inability to obey it. Through the impartation of the spirit, man is, however, renewed. He has life in its true sense. And this renewal affects his whole being in all its relations (Rom. viii. 11; 2 Cor. v. 5; Eph. iv. 23, 30; 1 Thess. v. 23).

The distinction between spirit and soul is the peculiar characteristic of the Bible's idea of the nature of man. But this is not saying that the Bible teaches a trichotomy, as for instance, the Platonic. The biblical trichotomy, as we find it in 1 Thess. v. 23, Heb. iv. 12, and which there rests upon the knowledge of sin and the experience of salvation, does not exclude a decidedly dichotomic expression, as 1 Pet. ii. 11, where the soul is regarded simply according to her spiritual determination as the bearer of the divine life principle (cf. Matt. i. 27).

SPIRITUALISM is a term, which, in its wider sense, is often applied to various forms of mysticism and quietism, as represented by Jacob Boehme, De Molinos, Mme. Guyon, and others; while in its narrower, but now more common, sense, it simply denotes a belief in a natural communication between the human spirit and the other world. A leading Spiritualist paper, Spiritual Magazine, established in London in 1860, defines Spiritualism as "based on the cardinal fact of spirit communion and influx;" as an "effort to discover all truth relating to man's spiritual nature, capacities, relations, duties, welfare, and destiny;" as aiming "through a careful, reverent study of facts, at a knowledge of the laws and principles which govern the occult forces of the universe, of the relations of spirit to matter, and of man to God and the spiritual world." In this sense of the term the phenomenon has attracted more physiological than theological interest; though its devotees pronounce it an indispensable weapon in the contest with the religious indifference, materialism, and atheism of our age.

Spiritualism, or, as it is sometimes called, Spiritism, dates back only to 1848. In that year it was discovered that certain rappings which were heard in the house of John D. Fox in Hydeville, Wayne County, N. Y., and which could not be accounted for in any ordinary way, conveyed intelligent communications. In 1850 the two girls Margaret and Kate Fox came to New York; and soon "spirit-rapping," the moving of heavy bodies without any mechanical agency, involuntary writing, etc., were phenomena which everybody had witnessed, or heard discussed by witnesses. Still more powerful mediums — that is, persons of such sensitive organization that the spirits can act upon them or through them — appeared. One of the most remarkable of these was Daniel Douglas Home, a lad of seventeen years, who gave sittings before Napoleon III. in Paris, and Alexander II. in St. Petersburg. Greater things were now accomplished, — speaking in foreign languages; lighting of a phosphorescent light in the dark; producing of drawings, pictures, and photographs; and, finally, the celebrated embodiment of the human spirit, at least so far as to make him recognizable to friends and relatives. Numerous books were written for and against, and a multitude of proselytes were made; but a sect or party, properly so speaking, was not formed.

The Spiritualists generally reject the doctrine of the Trinity, considering Christ simply as one of the great teachers of mankind, not in any essential point different from the founders of the other great historical religions. They also generally reject the doctrine of a personal devil, though they believe in evil spirits, ascribing to them a power over man which may amount to possession. But they all believe in a future life, and in a natural, not miraculous, communication between that life and life on earth. The idea of miracles they have completely discarded, and the miracles of Scripture they accept as natural though unexplained facts. Life on earth they consider as a preparation for the life to come; though unexplained facts. Life on earth they have always been possible, though under certain conditions of which we as yet have only very slight knowledge; but the motives which bring the spirits to reveal themselves to us are simply love and mercy, a desire to convince man of the existence of a future life.

SPITTA, Karl Johann Philipp, a distinguished German hymn-writer; was b. in Hanover, Aug. 1, 1801; d. in Burgdorf, Sept. 28, 1859. His mother, a converted Jewess, was left a widow in 1804. Sent to school, Spitta's studies were interrupted for four years by a dangerous sickness. At the time, and he associated with the circle to which he was introduced by Professor Adolf Peters. Among Spitta's best friends, and published a collection of hymns in Psalter und Harfe (Psaltery and Harp), which has gone through many editions. A second collection appeared in 1843, and a third in 1861 (edited by Professor Adolf Peters. Among Spitta's best hymns are Ein lieblich Los ist uns gefallen ("Our lot is fallen in pleasant places"), O Jesu meine Sonne ("O Blessed Son, whose splendor"), O selig Haus wo man dich aufgenommen ("O happy house! O home supremely blest"), all translated by MAASCH, 1860.) See Life of Spitta by MUNKEL, Leipzig, 1861, and Peters's edition of the Psalter und Harfe.

SPONDANUS (Henri de Sponde), b. at Mau-leon, Jan. 6, 1568; d. at Toulouse, May 18, 1643. He was educated in the Reformed faith at Orthez; studied law, and entered the service of Henry IV.; but was, by the writings of Bellarmin and Du Perron, induced to embrace Romanism in 1585; went to Rome; was ordained a priest in 1606, and was in 1626 made bishop of Pamiers. He published an abbreviation of BARONIEUX's Annales, Paris, 1612, which was often reprinted, and translated into other languages; also a continuation from 1127 to 1622.

NEUDECKER.

SPORTS, Book of, a royal proclamation drawn up by Bishop Morton for James I., issued by that king in 1618; republished by Charles I., under the direction of Laud, in the ninth year of his reign. Its object was to encourage those people who had attended divine service to spend the remainder of Sunday after evening prayers in such "lawful recreation" as dancing, archery, leaping, vaulting, May games, Whitsun ales, Morris dances, setting of May-poles, etc. The proclamation was aimed at the Puritans, and Charles required it to be read in every parish church. The majority of the Puritan ministers refused to obey, and some were in consequence suspended. See EADIE: Eccles. Censuses without ill success.

SPOTSWOOD (SPOTISWOOD), John, Scotch prelate; b. at Mid-Calder, near Edinburgh, 1565; d. in London, Dec. 26, 1639. He was educated at Glasgow University, and succeeded his father as parson at Calder, in 1583, when only eighteen. In 1601 he accompanied the Duke of Lennox as chaplain in his embassy to France, and in 1603 James VI. to England. In 1603 he was made archbishop of Glasgow, and privy-councillor for Scotland. In 1615 he was transferred to St. Andrews, so that he became primate and metropolitan. On June 18, 1616, he crowned Charles I. at Holyrood. In 1633 he was made chancellor of Scotland. He was the leader in the movement to introduce the Liturgy into the Church of Scotland, which occasioned the rebellion (1637). When the Covenant was signed (1638), he retired in disappointment to London. He wrote The History of the Church and State of Scotland (2 vols., 1629), London, 1655. best ed., Edinburgh, 1647-51, 3 vols., with the life of the author.

SPRAGUE, William Buell I0.0.,LL.D., b. in Andover, Conn., Oct. 16, 1795; d. at Flushing, L.I., N.Y., May 7, 1876. He was graduated with honor from Yale College in 1813; was tutor for about a year in the family of Major Lewis (whose wife was the adopted daughter of Washington), at Woodlawn, near Mount Vernon; entered the Princeton Theological Seminary in the fall of 1816; was graduated in 1819, and immediately settled over the Congregational Church in West Springfield, Mass., as colleague with the Rev. Dr. Joseph Lathrop, who was about sixty-eight years of age, and had spent his whole professional life of sixty-three years in that parish. Dr. Lathrop died in the following year, and Mr. Sprague was left sole pastor. In 1829 he accepted the call of the Second Presbyterian Church of Albany to become its pastor; and here he passed the succeeding forty years of his life, and closed the period of active labor by resignation of his charge in 1869. He then removed his residence from Albany to Fushing, L.I., where he died in the eighty-first year of his age. In 1828 Columbia College conferred upon him the degree of D.D.: he received the same honor from Harvard in 1848, and the degree of LL.D. from Princeton in 1869.

Among the preachers and public speakers of this country, Dr. Sprague attained very high eminence. In 1848 he delivered the oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvard, in 1850 the annual address to the Yale alumni, and in 1862 the discourse to the alumni of the Princeton Seminary upon the semi-centennial anniversary of that institution. More than one hundred and fifty of his sermons and occasional discourses were published by request. He was a voluminous author. He published more than a dozen separate works, among which may be mentioned Letters from Europe (1828), Lectures on Revivals (1832), Life of Rev. Dr. E. D. Griffin (1838), Aids to Early Religion (1847), Words to a Young Man's Conscience (1848), Visits to European Celebrities (1855), Memoirs of the Rev. Drs. John and William A. McDowell (1864), Life of Rev. Dr. Jedidiah Morse (1874). The great literary work of his life, however, which earned for him the title of 'biographer of the church,' was the Annals of the American Pulpit; begun in 1832, when he was fifty-seven years of age, of which nine large octavo volumes were published, and the manuscript of the tenth and unfinished volume includes Quakers, German Pietists, Swedenborgian, and Universalist. A. Alt-Dowel (1864), Life of Rev. Dr. Jedidiah Morse (1874).

In his personal appearance Dr. Sprague was a very notable man. More than six feet in stature, with a clear, direct, large-framed countenance, proportioned, with a grand head and dark-brown hair (which was unchanged to the day of his death, in his eighty-second year), he was unusually observant and noble in his bearing. His bearing was natural, as of one entire self-possessed, and the expression of his countenance pleasing; so that, while he impressed by his dignity, astonishment or surprise was not attracted. The words of the famous orator Sterne, with respect to Sir Joshua Reynolds, are equally applicable to him. "No one could spend an hour with him, and not be conscious of having enjoyed a rare pleasure. Of all that makes a Christian gentleman he was certainly a rare example."

EDWARD E. SPRAGUE.

SPRENG, Jakob (generally called Probst, from his being propositus in an Augustine convent in Antwerp), d. at Bremen, June 30, 1662. He was one of Luther's first adherents in the Netherlands; preached his views in Antwerp, and founded a Lutheran congregation there; was arrested and compelled to recant; went to Spain, his native city, and continued to preach the Reformation; was arrested a second time, but escaped to Wittenberg; and was in 1524 appointed preacher at Bremen, where the Reformation was established in 1525. He left some minor treatises. See J. G. Neumann's preface to Spreng's edition: M. Lutheri Commentarius in Joannis epistolam, etc., Leipzig, 1708; and especially the rare book of Sleiden: De vita J. Propositi, Lubeck, 1747.

SPRING, Gardiner, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian, b. at Newburyport, Mass., Feb. 24, 1783; d. in New-York City, Jan. 1, 1853. Sprague was graduated from Yale College, 1805; taught in Bermuda until 1807; admitted to the bar, 1808; abandoned law for theology, and studied at Andover Theological Seminary, 1809-10; ordained pastor of the Brick (Presbyterian) Church, Aug. 8, 1810, and held the position till his death. The first four years of his ministry were spent in steady growth; but from 1814 to 1834 there were frequent revivals, the result of God's blessing upon his faithful preaching, and utterly independent

of machinery. During this period he took part in the formation of the American Bible Society (1816), American Tract Society (1825), and American Home Missionary Society (1830). From 1834 to the close of his ministry, there were no revivals; but steadily growth increased in his power as a preacher. It was then that he used the press to extend his usefulness, and published a number of volumes of connected discourses. His congregation first met in Beekman Street, but in 1856 removed to their present church, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-sixth Street. After 1861 he had a colleague. His ministry, both for length and power, is remarkable. His principal publications are Essays on the Distinguishing Traits of Christian Character, New York, 1813; Fragments from the Study of a Pastor, 1838; Oblications of the World to the Bible, 1839; The Attraction of the Cross, 1841; The Bible Not of Man, 1847; The Power of the Pulpit, 1848; The Mercy-Seat, 1850; First Things, 1851, 2 vols.; The Glory of Christ, 1852, 2 vols.; The Contrast between Good and Bad Men, 1855, 2 vols.; Pulpit Ministration, 1864, 2 vols.; and Personal Reminiscences of the Life and Times of Gardner Spring, 1866, 2 vols. This autobiography of Spring was edited by Rev. Dr. J. O. Murray, New York, [1873].

SPRING, Samuel, D.D., b. in Northbridge, Mass., Feb. 27, 1746; d. in Newburyport, Mass., March 4, 1819, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. A graduate of Princeton College in 1771; a classmate and room-mate there with President James Madison. The friendship between these two men remained uninterrupted through life; although Spring was an ardent Federalist, and a determined opposer of Madison's administration.

He began the study of theology with his particular friend, Dr. John Witherspoon, president of Nassau Hall. He continued the study with Dr. Joseph Bellamy, Dr. Samuel Hopkins, and Dr. Stephen West. With the three divines last named he became very intimate, as likewise with Dr. Jonathan Edwards, who had been Spring's tutor at Nassau Hall. He coincided, however, in his theological opinions, with his brother-in-law, Nathanael Emmons, more nearly than with any other man.

In 1775 he connected himself, as a chaplain of the Continental army, with a volunteer corps of eleven hundred men under the command of Benedict Arnold. With this corps he marched through the wilderness to Quebec. He stood with Col. Burr on the Plains of Abenaw when Gen. Montgomery fell. At Nassau Hall he had become interested in his college-mate, Aaron Burr. This interest was deepened as he became more intimate with Burr during the disastrous expedition to Canada. After the death of Hamilton, in 1804, Dr. Spring, although a distant relative of Burr, published a terrific sermon against duelling, and did not spare either the murderer or the murdered.

Dr. Spring was pastor of the Second Congregational Church in Northampton, Mass., for one year and seven months. He was ordained Aug. 6, 1777; was a distinguished patriot during the war of the Revolution and that of 1812. He was eminently a doctrinal preacher, vigorous, dignified, commanding, subduing. He desires the gratitude of the churches for the impulse which he gave to the cause of theological education between the years 1777 and 1819. To him, as much as to any one man, may be traced the origin of at least four important institutions of learning. To him and Eliphalet Pearson may be ascribed the idea of forming the American Theological Seminary. To him, more than to any one man, is due the formation of the Massachusetts Missionary Society,—a society which trained the principal men by whom the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was first conducted. To Dr. Spring or Dr. Worcester, or both united, is due the honor of having first suggested the idea of forming the American Board.

Twenty-six of Dr. Spring's published sermons are, some doctrinal, some political, some addressed to charitable societies, some to children. His most memorable theological treatises are his Dialogue on the Nature of Duty, 1784; his Moral Disquisitions and Statutes on the Rev. [Professor] David Toppan's Letters [in reply to the Dialogue], 2d ed., 1815. He also published The Youth's Assistant, or a Series of Theological Questions and Answers, 1818, and a large number of essays in The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, of which he was an editor.

STABAT MATER are the first words of the famous hymn of Jacopone da Todi (d. 1306), and mean "The mother was standing." It is the most pathetic hymn of the middle ages, and, in spite of its adoration of the Virgin, is one of the softest, sweetest, and chastest lyrics in Christian literature. Suggested by the scene depicted in John xix. 25, it describes with tender feeling the piercing agony of Mary at the cross. It has furnished a theme for musical composition to Nanini (about 1629), Palestrina (whose music is the best, and is sung at Rome on Palm-Sunday), Astorga (about 1760), Pergolése (about 1736), Haydn, and Rossini (whose composition, according to Palmer, may be compared to a mater dolorosa painted standing under the cross, and clad in a maroon court-dress). The original is in ten stanzas (Wackernagel, i. 196, 102: Moore, ii. 147-154; Daniel, ii. 147-154). The tune (about 1843) gives fifty-three German and several Dutch translations. It has been translated into English by Lord Lindsay, Caswall, Mant, Coles, Benedict, etc. One of the best translations, "At the cross her station keeping," is found in Schaff's Christ in Song, p. 169. Dr. Colker's translation, beginning "Stood the afflicted mother weeping," is also very excellent. See JACOPONE DA TODI and the literature there given.

Another Stabat Mater celebrates the joy of the Virgin Mary at the birth of Christ, as the former celebrates her grief at the cross, and may be called the "Mater speciosa," as distinct from the "Mater dolorosa." It was published in the edition of the Italian poems of Jacopone at Brescia, 1495, but attracted no attention till Ozanam published a French translation in his work on the Franciscan poets (Paris, 1852), and John Mason Neale, an English translator, shortened and adapted it to us (1866). It is not equal to the Mater dolorosa, and seems to be an imitation by another hand. It was discussed by P. Schaff in Hours at Home (a monthly magazine), New York, May, 1887, and translated again by Ernestus C. Benedict, Hymn of Hildebert, etc., New York, 1888, p. 20.
STACKHOUSE. 2285  STANISLAUS.

STACKHOUSE, Thomas, Church of England, b. 1680, became vicar of Beenham, Berkshire, where he died, Oct. 11, 1732. He is remembered for his New History of the Holy Bible, from the beginning of the world to the establishment of Christianity (London, 1732, 2 vols. folio; frequently republished and reprinted; best ed. by G. Gleig and Dewar, 1830), and his Complete body of divinity (1755, revised in 1847, vol. i., under the title, Geschichte der Rechtsphilosophie, vol. ii., Rechts- und Staatslehre. Of the fundamental problems of human life, he considered two solutions as possible, both philosophically and juridically,—one on the basis of pantheism, and one on the basis of faith in a personal God who has revealed himself to man. He considered two solutions as possible, both philosophically and juridically,—one on the basis of pantheism, and one on the basis of faith in a personal God who has revealed himself to man.

STANCÁRÓ, Francesco, b. at Mantua, 1501; d. at Stobnitz, Poland, Nov. 12, 1574. As a friend of the Reformation, he was in 1543 compelled to leave Italy. In 1546 he published a Hebrew grammar at Basel, and in 1550 he was appointed professor of Hebrew at Cracow. His relation, however, to the Reformation was soon dissoned, and he was arrested; but he escaped, and was in 1551 appointed professor of Hebrew at Königsberg, and the next year at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. There he immediately entered into the Osiandrian controversy, and published his Apologia contra Osiandrum, in which he set forth his peculiar ideas of Christ as being the mediator between God and man, only on account of his human nature. The ideas caused great scandal; and Stancaro went first to Poland, then to Hungary, where he took active part in the controversy between the Lutherans and the Reformed. Having returned to Poland in 1558, he settled at Pitszew, and came naturally in contact with the Italian Antitrinitarians active in Poland,—Blindrata, Lismaini, and others. In the correspondence between the Polish Protestant and the German and Swiss Reformers concerning the Italian Unitarianism, which was spreading in the country, some regard was also paid to Stancaro and his anti-Osiandrian ideas; and he published in 1561 De Trinitate. But though he gathered some pupils, called "Stancarists," he soon fell into oblivion.

H. SCHMIDT.

STANHOPE, Lady Hester Lucy, daughter of Earl Stanhope, and niece of William Pitt, the great Earl of Chatham; b. in London, March 12, 1776; d. at Jun in the Lebanon, June 28, 1839. She was the private secretary and confidante of her distinguished uncle, and a member of his family from her twentieth year until his death, 1806, when, unable to live in her accustomed style upon the twelve hundred pounds yearly stipend granted her as the ward of the nation, she retired to a solitude in Wales, and in 1810 to Syria; and in 1813 she established herself at the deserted convent of Mar Elias, near Jun, and eight miles from Sidon, where she lived until her death, exerting a remarkable influence upon the Arabs around. Her servants were Albanians; her house, a fortress which afforded shelter to the persecuted. She dressed like an emir, ruled despottiically, practised astrology, and preached a creed compounded of Bible and Koran. She was eccentric to the verge of insanity. See her Memoirs, London, 1845, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1846; The Seven Years' Travels of Lady Hester Stanhope, 1846, 3 vols.

STANISLAUS, Bishop of Cracow, the patron-saint of Poland; was b. near Cracow, July 26, 1030, and, after studying canonical law at Gnesen and Paris, entered the clerical profession. He was a stern ascetic, distributed his paternal property to the poor, and boldly denounced the cruelty and licentiousness of Boleslaus II., king of Poland, whom he finally excommunicated. In revenge, the king had Stanislaus murdered while he was celebrating mass near Cracow, May 8, 1079. Miracles are ascribed to the bishop, both alive and dead. cfr. 1234. In 1258 the deacon Weng Wolking printed against the Reformed and the Unitarians the work Verhältniss zu Deismus und Judenthum, 1847; Der Protestantismus als politisches Princip, 1856, etc.
STANISLAUS.

Stanislaus, St. I was born Oct. 20, 1550, at Slanislav, Moravia; d. in Rome, Aug. 15, 1568. In his thirteenth year he went to Vienna; had a vision of two angels and the Virgin Mary, who urged him to become a Jesuit; sought admission to the order at Vienna, which was refused on account of his father's aversion to the step; and finally went to Rome, where he was admitted Oct. 28, 1567. He predicted the day of his death, and on account of his severe ascetic practices was beatified by Clement VIII. in 1604.

STANLEY, Arthur Penrhyn, b. Dec. 13, 1815, was son of Edward Stanley, at that time rector of Alderley, Cheshire; d. in London, July 18, 1881. In the village made memorable from being his birthplace, he spent his childhood under the fostering care of his father and mother, whose admirable characters he has embalmed in a volume of family memoirs. Their influence on him for good was very great, and to this is to be added the effect of intercourse with the Leycesters, amiable and interesting relatives on the mother's side. The scenery of Alderley Edge, its pine-trees and beacon-tower, also the rectory-garden, with bird cages hung among the roses, no doubt served to stimulate the child's active imagination. When eight years old he was remarkable for retentive memory,—a faculty which was singularly powerful in after-life. But this was associated with an incapacity for mathematical studies, and even a sum in arithmetic puzzled him to the end of his days. In January, 1828, he was entered as a schoolboy at Rugby; and there he exhibited the amiable and decision so well described in "Tom Brown," and came under the formative power of Dr. Thomas Arnold, prince of schoolmasters, to whom he owed much of the mental and moral strength which distinguished him in the whole of his subsequent career. He early showed a fondness for history, and, as he records, "got through all Mitford and all Gibbon, and several smaller authors." Rugby became to Stanley a second home; and, when he had received the last of five prizes, his master said to him, "Thank you, Stanley: we have nothing more to give."

He was elected a scholar of Balliol at Oxford in 1833, and signalized his undergraduateship by a prize-poem entitled The Gipsies. His father was made Bishop of Norwich in 1837; and there, of course, he was wont to spend his vacations; in no other way did he become connected with the old English Episcopal City. He undertook a tour in Greece in 1840-41, and there, as was his wont, studied nature on its poetical side and in its historical relations, and returned to the university full of knowledge and inspiration derived from the acquaintance he formed with the classic scenery amidst which he wandered. He soon commenced as college-tutor, and the attachment he inspired in the hearts of his pupils foretold what was to be the result of his social intercourse in after-years. His lectures on history and divinity awakened much attention, and gave promise of what the faculty of the Regius professorship of ecclesiastical history at Oxford, in 1858. These lectures were published in 1861. It should further be recorded of his work at Canterbury, that there his influence was deeply felt by both clergy and laity: for he succeeded in breaking down walls of partition surrounding the intercourse of cathedral dignitaries, and brought together persons who had before stood aloof from each other.

In 1862 he accompanied the Prince of Wales during his tour in the East, and, after his return to England, published a volume of sermons preached to the royal party, from time to time, as they travelled over never-to-be-forgotten Bible lands. The death of Stanley's mother, to whom he was tenderly attached, occurred while he was absent from England. In 1863, soon after his return, he was appointed Dean of Westminster. That appointment was speedily followed by his marriage with Lady Augusta Bruce, who was "the light of his dwelling" to the day of her death. The fascination of her society, and the perfect sympathy she manifested in all his literary, religious, and social enterprises, contributed to the crowded gatherings in the deanery which will ever live in the recollection of those who were privileged to enjoy them; and she also strengthened her husband to perform those illustrious labors which rendered him most distinguished among all the Westminster deans of ancient or modern times. This brings us to the third and last stage of Stanley's public life.

His residence in Westminster, which opened up to him a new and wide sphere of exertion, he employed for the purpose of improving and popularizing the abbey, of promoting objects connected with the welfare of the church, and of advancing the interests of literature, charity, and religion in general. He really loved that ancient edifice, so grand and picturesque in itself, and so rich in its historical associations; and, when he had familiarized himself with its details, it was no common treat to wander through its aisles and workshops. His pulpits were his chief opportunities; for he condescended to fill for the gratification of the poor as well as the rich. The hospital at Westminster and other local institutions found in him apostles, were published in 1846; but before that, in 1844, he made a mark on biographical literature by his Life of Arnold, a book said at the time to set everybody talking about the hero, rather than the author,—a sign of the wonderful success he had achieved. He was appointed secretary to the first Oxford Commission, which resulted in considerable improvements of university education; and, watching the progress of theological controversy, he wrote in 1850 an article on the Gorham Judgment, the harbinger of several successive criticisms on ecclesiastical questions, which he afterwards published.

In 1851 he became a canon of Canterbury, and then entered on the second stage of his public life. There he wrote his Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians and his Memorials of Canterbury; and, having already travelled in the East, he added to these his Sinai and Palestine. A tour in Russia was taken by him whilst he was a Canterbury canon, and this awakened in him a deep interest respecting the Eastern Church. Of this he availed himself in lectures on its history, after he entered upon the Regius professorship of ecclesiastical history at Oxford, in 1858. These lectures were published in 1861. It should further be recorded of his work at Canterbury, that there his influence was deeply felt by both clergy and laity: for he succeeded in breaking down walls of partition surrounding the intercourse of cathedral dignitaries, and brought together persons who had before stood aloof from each other.

In 1862 he accompanied the Prince of Wales during his tour in the East, and, after his return to England, published a volume of sermons preached to the royal party, from time to time, as they travelled over never-to-be-forgotten Bible lands. The death of Stanley's mother, to whom he was tenderly attached, occurred while he was absent from England. In 1863, soon after his return, he was appointed Dean of Westminster. That appointment was speedily followed by his marriage with Lady Augusta Bruce, who was "the light of his dwelling" to the day of her death. The fascination of her society, and the perfect sympathy she manifested in all his literary, religious, and social enterprises, contributed to the crowded gatherings in the deanery which will ever live in the recollection of those who were privileged to enjoy them; and she also strengthened her husband to perform those illustrious labors which rendered him most distinguished among all the Westminster deans of ancient or modern times. This brings us to the third and last stage of Stanley's public life.

His residence in Westminster, which opened up to him a new and wide sphere of exertion, he employed for the purpose of improving and popularizing the abbey, of promoting objects connected with the welfare of the church, and of advancing the interests of literature, charity, and religion in general. He really loved that ancient edifice, so grand and picturesque in itself, and so rich in its historical associations; and, when he had familiarized himself with its details, it was no common treat to wander through its aisles and workshops. His pulpits were his chief opportunities; for he condescended to fill for the gratification of the poor as well as the rich. The hospital at Westminster and other local institutions found in him a warm supporter: whilst his garden-parties, in connection with the encouragement of floral cultivation amongst the humblest classes, were attractive, not only to the gentry and nobility around, but to many living at a distance. As a lecturer, an advocate at public meetings, and especially as an abbey-preacher, he commanded large audiences, and delighted those who listened to his original remarks. A Broad-Churchman, and too often throwing into the background truths which evangelical Christians love to hear, he interested all classes by his earnest devoutness, his catholic spirit, and his abstinence from all factious combinations. He was a zealous son of the Church of England; and, making no secret of his strong attachment to the principle of an Establishment, he nevertheless conciliated Nonconformists, and delighted to cultivate among them some intimate friendships. He was busy with his pen throughout the whole period of his residence in the deanery. His Lectures on the Jewish Church appeared in three successive volumes under the dates of 1863, 1865, and 1879. Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey was published in 1868; Essays on Church and State followed in 1870. The History of the Church of Scotland, delivered as lectures at Eared Church, appeared in three volumes, the first in 1866, the second in 1867, and the third in 1868. It was a solace to go back to early days; and he felt unable to carry through any of the projects of his life; and the publication of his final volume, a rather large one, on Christian Institutes, occurred in 1881. The death of his beloved wife in 1875 was a bereavement from the effect of which he never fully recovered. For a short time he could accomplish but little; but, gradually recovering his energy, he devoted himself anew to works of faith, and labors of love, and in 1880 found some relief by preparing for the press Memoirs of Edward and Catherine Stanley, his father and mother. It was a solace to go back to early days; and he also contemplated writing memorials of Lady Augusta, a work he did not accomplish.

He visited the United States in 1878, and returned home greatly refreshed, when his friends in America, whom he grieved at his cordial reception by friends in America. His addresses and sermons delivered there were published in New York in 1879, and have since been republished in England. Always rather delicate, the state of his health in latter years often awakened anxiety; but, as he rallied from his illness, he returned to his abode at Bern. Henry Vischer, his son, in 1881. He died in Paris, March 27, 1840. In 1792 he was appointed professor of the fine arts, and subsequently professor of philosophy and theology. In 1798 he was appointed minister of education of Switzerland. His generosity enabled Pestalozzi to give his method a fair trial in the castle at Burgdorf. After conspicuous services for his country, he retired to private life in 1804, and soon after went to Paris to reside. In a time of religious indifference he retained his evangelical fervor, and occupied a conspicuous position in religious circles in France. His salon was the meeting-place of great men, as Guizot, Cousin, and others. He also endeavored to introduce Kant to the knowledge of the French. He was president of a number of religious societies. Among his works, most of which were written in French, are De vita immortalis ap., etc., Bern, 1787; La mission divine et la nature sublime de Jesus Christ, deduets de son caractere, Lausanne, 1799. A volume containing some of his writings, and introduced by a biography from the pen of Vinet, appeared in 1841 under the title Mélanges philosophiques, littéraires, historiques et religieux.

STAPHYLUS, Friedrich, b. at Osnabruck, Aug. 17, 1512; d. at Ingolstadt, March 5, 1564. He studied theology at Wittenberg; became an intimate friend of Melanchthon, and was, on his recommendation, appointed professor at Konigsberg, in 1548. As he felt unable to carry through the controversy which he had begun with Osiander, he resigned his position, went to Breslau, embraced Romanism, and entered the service of the Duke of Bavaria. The duke gave him a fief; the emperor, the title of nobility; the pope, a purse with one hundred gold crowns; and he was very active for the restoration of Romanism in Bavaria and Austria. Among his most important writings, the most noticeable are Epitome Martini Lutheri theologiae trimemoria; Defensa pro trimembris M. L. theologit, etc. He also wrote a life of Charles V., and published a Latin translation of Diodorus Siculus.

STARK, Johann August, a well-known Crypto-Catholic; was b. at Schwerin in 1741; studied at Göttingen; became an enthusiastic Freemason; was made professor of Oriental languages (1769) and theology (1770) at Konigsberg; and died as court-preacher and councillor, in Darmstadt, in 1789.
STAUPITZ, Johann von, the noble friend of Luther; d. at Salzburg, Dec. 28, 1524. The time and place of his birth are unknown. Entering the Augustinian order, he studied at several universities, at last in Tubingen, where in 1505, secured a higher position for him in the convent, and sought to turn his attention from ascetic thoughts and metaphysical speculations to the cross and the stoning love of God. "Your thoughts are not Christ," said he to Luther on one occasion, as the latter looked with a shudder at the elements which Staupitz was carrying in a funeral procession; "for Christ does not terrify, but console." In his letter of May 30, 1518, at his recommendation, Luther was called to Wittenberg, and at his advice Luther entered the pulpit. In 1516, while absent on a mission in the Netherlands, Staupitz showed his confidence in Luther by making him temporary inspector of forty convents in Saxony and Thuringia. As late as October, 1518, he sympathized with his young friend, and was at his side in the discussion with Cajetan in Augsburg. On that occasion he said, "Remember, my brother, that thou hast begun this work in the name of Christ." He soon afterwards drew back from the Reformation; but he did not oppose it, like Erasmus. He was "a pious Christian mystic," who deplored the abuses of the church, but had not the heroism to be a Reformer. In 1519 he went to Salzburg (not because he had fallen into disfavor with the Elector of Saxony, as Daubigné supposes), became court preacher in 1522, abbot of the Benedictine convent of St. Peter at Salzburg, having changed his order previously, and, later, vicar of the archbishop. In 1519 he wrote to Luther, offering him a refuge at Salzburg. But Luther was displeased with the course of his old friend, and wrote, Feb. 9, 1521 (De Wette, i. 556), "Your submission has saddened me, and abominates to me another Staupitz than the preacher of grace and the cross." In another letter, of Sept. 17, 1523 (De Wette, ii. 407), he writes to him as the one "through whom the light of the gospel was first made to shine from the darkness in our hearts" (per quern primum coepit Evangelii lux de tenebris spendiacer e cordibus nostris). Some of Luther's writings which he took with him to Salzburg, and gave to the monks to read, were burned by one of his successors. Staupitz exercised a deep influence upon Luther; so that the latter, in his dedication of the first collection of his writings to Staupitz, in 1516, could call himself his disciple. In his letter of May 30, 1518, to accompany his Theses to Leo X., he says he heard from Staupitz, as "a voice from heaven," an explanation that true penance starts from love, and ends in righteousness. This truth, he said, acted like a sharp arrow in his heart until the word "repentance" came to him. Besides ten letters which Grimm edited, only one of which is to Luther, he left behind him some tracts, Von d. Nachfolge d. wülligen Sterbens Christi (1516), Von der koldseligen Liebe Gottes.
STEDINGERS. The, a heroic German family living on the banks of the Weser, near its mouth, which originated with the indignity of a priest to a nobleman, who, at the communion, instead of the host, put into her mouth the chalice which she had given him at the confessional. Her husband, taking up the case, and only receiving denunciation from the priest, murdered him. The deed stirred up the priesthood; not only the delivery of the murderer, but a large indemnity. Being refused both, he put the disported by the powerful Duke Otto of Liineburg, and received the denunciation from the priest, murdered him. He died more than a century ago. Her name was transmitted to the diocese of Bremen, where she was known as Stedinger. The case was brought before Pope Gregory IX. The Stedingers were accused of being not only heretics, but in league with Satan; whom they worshipped under the image of an idol of Ammon, to whom they offered their children. When a candidate for admission to their society, a large frog entered the room, which the members kissed, a shudder passing through their system with the kiss, and with the shudder the memory of the Christian faith completely disappeared. These and other calamities were taken up by the Papal inquisitor-general, Konrad of Marburg, who persuaded the Pope in 1283 to issue the ban against the Stedingers as cursed heretics. A crusade was preached against them. They raised an army of eleven thousand, and successfully resisted the Archbishop of Bremen and his allies till May 27, 1294, when the battle of Altenesch completely broke their resistance. Half the army was destroyed, and many of the survivors fled to Friesland, where they surrendered to the Counts of Oldenburg. The defeat was celebrated in the archiepiscopal church of Bremen by a yearly festival on the fifth Sunday after Easter. All the writers of the middle ages speak disparagingly of the Stedingers as heretics. It remained for the impartial historian since the Reformation to honor their resistance as a just opposition to the oppression of a presumptuous priesthood. See SCHMINCK: De expeditione cruciata in Stedingo, Marburg, 1723; RITTER: De pago Steding et Stedingo sicc. XII. historici, Viteb., 1714; LITTEBROK: Ein Kreuztag in die Staats- und Lebensgeschichte, Stadt, 1755, etc.

STEELE, Anne, author of many popular and useful hymns; was the daughter of a Baptist minister at Broughton in Hampshire, where she was b. 1716, and d. November, 1775. She was always an invalid; her last illness commenced on the morning before the wedding-day. Her poems on subjects chiefly Devotional, by Theodosia, appeared in two volumes in 1760, and were reprinted, 1780, with a third volume of Miscellaneous Pieces in Verse and Prose: the profits in each case being devoted to benevolent uses. The whole was re-issued at Boston in two volumes, 1848, and most of them in one volume by D. Sedgwick, 1883. Her hymns, to the number of sixty-five, were included in Ash and Evans's Collection, 1799, and were found to be accordant with the best taste of that period, and remarkably adapted to public worship. Dr. Rippon (1757) used fifty-six of them, and Dobell (1806), forty-five. To probably a majority of the hymn-books published in England and America she is the largest contributor after Watts, Doddridge, and C. Wesley, often preceding the latter, and sometimes standing next to Watts, though occasionally outnumbered by Newton. This implies an amount of influence in leading devotion, in moulding thought and character, and in assuaging sorrow, which any one might be proud to gain, and which can be attained by very few. On the other hand, James Montgomery, a discerning critic, concerning her to the tenth rank in his Christian Psalmist (1825), and said nothing about her in the Introductory Essay. She certainly had more elegance than force, and was less adapted to stand the test of time than her masculine rivals. Her hymns are a transcript of a deeply sensitive, humane, and pious mind, with little intellectual variety or strength; but they have a free and graceful lyrical flow, and no positive faults beyond a tendency to repetition and too many endearing epithets. A fragment of one of them, "Father, whate'er of earthly bliss," may last as long as any thing of Watts or Doddridge.

STEINHOFER, Maximilian Friedrich Christoph, b. at Owen in Wurttemberg, Jan. 16, 1706; d. at Weinsberg, Feb. 11, 1761. He studied theology at Tubingen; entered into connection with the congregation of Herrnhut; became court-preacher at Ebersdorf early in 1734; joined the Moravian Brethren in 1748, but returned in 1749 to Wurttemberg, and held various minor pastoral charges, finally that of Weinsberg. He wrote a number of sermons and devotional books,—Tägliche Nahrung des Glaubens, 1745 (last edition, Ludwigsburg, 1858, with his autobiography); a commentary on Levis for the first edition of Herzog, most of which have been re-issued in the second edition, besides numerous contributions to the Studien u. Kritiken and elsewhere. He was a man of rare and accurate learning, and sound judgment. His articles on Herzog are very elaborate and valuable. See Stephens in Herzog are very elaborate and valuable. See ULLMANN: Reformers before the Reformation, [a new edition of his works by B. 1716, and November, 1775. She was always an invalid; her last illness commenced on the morning before the wedding-day. Her poems on subjects chiefly Devotional, by Theodosia, appeared in two volumes in 1760, and were reprinted, 1780, with a third volume of Miscellaneous Pieces in Verse and Prose: the profits in each case being devoted to benevolent uses. The whole was re-issued at Boston in two volumes, 1848, and most of them in one volume by D. Sedgwick, 1883. Her hymns, to the number of sixty-five, were included in Ash and Evans's Collection, 1799, and were found to be accordant with the best taste of that period, and remarkably adapted to public worship. Dr. Rippon (1757) used fifty-six of them, and Dobell (1806), forty-five. To probably a majority of the hymn-books published in England and America she is the largest contributor after Watts, Doddridge, and C. Wesley, often preceding the latter, and sometimes standing next to Watts, though occasionally outnumbered by Newton. This implies an amount of influence in leading devotion, in moulding thought and character, and in assuaging sorrow, which any one might be proud to gain, and which can be attained by very few. On the other hand, James Montgomery, a discerning critic, concerning her to the tenth rank in his Christian Psalmist (1825), and said nothing about her in the Introductory Essay. She certainly had more elegance than force, and was less adapted to stand the test of time than her masculine rivals. Her hymns are a transcript of a deeply sensitive, humane, and pious mind, with little intellectual variety or strength; but they have a free and graceful lyrical flow, and no positive faults beyond a tendency to repetition and too many endearing epithets. STEITZ, Georg Eduard, D.D., b. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, July 25, 1810; was pastor and d. theri Jan. 19, 1879. He wrote Die Predelbeichte u. Privatsabsolution d. luther. Kirche aus den Quellen des 16ten Jahrhunderts, Frankfort, 1854; Das römische Bussessacrament, 1854; and forty-one articles for the first edition of Herzog, most of which have been re-issued in the second edition, besides numerous contributions to the Studien u. Kritiken and elsewhere. He was a man of rare and accurate learning, and sound judgment. His articles on Herzog are very elaborate and valuable. See Stephens in Herzog are very elaborate and valuable. See ULLMANN: Reformers before the Reformation, [a new edition of his works by the Anabaptists. His Hymns for the Lord's Supper appeared in 1697, and were increased from thirty-seven to fifty in the third edition, 1709. He also published a Version of Solomon's Song with the Forty-Seventh Psalm, 1700 (2d ed., 1709), and twelve hymns on the Believers' Baptism, 1712. A complete edition of his hymns, poems, sermons, and letters, was published, with a memoir, in 4 vols., 1732. Stennett is the author of the familiar hymn, "Another six days' work is done," which in the original had fourteen stanzas.

STENNETT, Samuel, an English hymnist, and grandson of the preceding; was b. 1727, in Exeter, where his father was pastor of the Baptist Church; d. in London, Aug. 24, 1795. He assisted his father as pastor of the Baptist Church in Little Wild Street, London, and in 1758 became his successor, remaining with the church till his death. He was a fine scholar, and was made D.D. by Aberdeen University, 1783. He was a man of influence among the dissenters, enjoyed the confidence of George III., and had John Howard for a frequent hearer. Writing from Smyrna under date of Aug. 11, 1786, the great prison-reformer speaks of the pleasure he experienced in reviewing his notes of Stennett's sermons. Stennett's works (On Personal Religion, 1769, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1801, being the most extensive) were published with a memoir in 1824, 3 vols. Thirty-four of his hymns are given at the end. Five others have been found in Rippon's Selection. His best hymns are "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand," "Majesty, sweetness sits enthroned," "I'm finished! so the Saviour cried."

STEPHAN, Martin, and the Stephanists. Martin Stephan (b. at Stramberg, Moravia, Aug. 13, 1777; d. in Randolph County in the State of Illinois, Feb. 21, 1840) was of humble parentage, and early apprenticed to a weaver. In 1798 he went to Breslau, where he soon became intimate with the pietist circles, and finally contrived to enter the university. From 1804 to 1809 he studied theology at Halle and Leipzig in a peculiarly narrow way, but not without energy; and in 1810 he was appointed pastor of the congregation of Bohemian exiles in Dresden. He was a Lutheran of the strictest type of orthodoxy. His success as a preacher and an organizer was very extraordinary. Though he severed his connection with the Moravian Brethren, and though the revival movement he started bore a decided separatistic character, his congregation grew rapidly, and gifted and serious men became exceedingly devoted to him. He maintained stations all through the valley of the Mulde; he sent out young missionaries whom he had educated; and he found followers, even in Wurtemberg and Baden. The separatistic tendency, however, of his work, and perhaps, also, the very success of his labor, brought him in manifold conflicts with the regular clergy of Dresden; and certain peculiarities in his personal habits and in his arrangements finally brought him into collision with the police. In the spring of 1838 the congregation for which he originally had been appointed pastor formally accused him of unchurchly fraud, and sentenced him to laterrimes; and, as the statements made were found to be correct, he was deprived of his dignity, and excommunicated. But the congregation, after passing through various vicissitudes and troubles, prospered, and became the nucleus of the "Missouri" type of High-Church Lutheranism, which adheres most closely to the symbolical books, and has its headquarters in the Concordia College at St. Louis. Among the writings of Martin Stephan the most important are Der christliche Glaube (a collection of sermons, Dresden, 1827) and Gaben für unsere Zeit (Nuremberg, 1834). See Von Polenz: Die öffentliche Meinung und der Pastor Stephan, Dresden, 1840; Verh. Die Stephan'sche Auswanderung nach America, Dresden, 1840; and the elaborate art. by Kummer, in Herzog: Real-Encyklopädie, 1st ed. vol. xv. pp. 41-61.

STEPHEN, deacon of the congregation at Jerusalem, and first martyr of the Christian Church. It is only in our day that his influence upon the development of Christianity has been adequately brought out. All that we know of him is found in Acts vi., vii. He was chosen in an emergency deacon of the church; and no one doubts any more that he was a Hellenist, although this is not definitely stated. He did not confine himself to the duties of the diaconate, but devoted himself to preaching, and was especially successful in those synagogues of Jerusalem where the Greek language was used. In connection with him, we for the first time hear of discussions in the synagogues (Acts vii. 5). It was a Hellenist, emphatically Moses and God, and was brought up for trial, false witnesses being subpoenaed to testify against him. The people finally exercised lynching law upon the accused. Stephen preached, as the apostles up to that time had not preached. He was accused of speaking against the Jewish religion, fathers, and temple. He had entered most deeply into the meaning of many of Christ's sayings about the difference between the law and the gospel, and especially the saying recorded in John i. 19. Can there be any doubt that he had become convinced that the Mosaic institutions could not be combined with the spiritual contents of the gospel as a basis for the church and the kingdom of God? This is made certain, not only by the form of the accusation, but by the address of Stephen. At first sight the latter seems to be disconnected and irrelevant. Closer inspection, however, reveals that this is not the case. The speaker proves that God had revealed himself independently of the forms of the law, and that the history of revolution was progressive, and closes by showing the temporary nature of the temple, and the other forms of the law. Nothing of the kind had ever been brought out by the apostles before. Stephen was not merely the protomartyr of the church. He was the first Christian preacher who fully understood the distinction which Christ taught between Judaism and Christianity, a forerunner of Paul, yes, perhaps, and even Simon Peter, in the person of the Pope, the way for Paul's conversion. At any rate, the extension of the gospel beyond the limits of the synagoge was, according to the statement of the Acts, the immediate consequence of his death, and not the planned work of the elder apostles. [Augustine said, "If Stephen had not prayed, the church would not have had Paul"] (St. Steph. non orasset, ecclesia Paulum non habet). Archdeacon Farr calls him the "undeveloped St. Paul."

Tradition did not forget Stephen. The Fathers put him among the seventy disciples. The Apocalypse of Stephen will be found in Fabricius: Cod. Apocr.

Stephen, the name of ten popes. — Stephen I. (253–257), a Roman by birth, is of importance on account of his relation to the controversy concerning heretical baptism. The majority of the churches in Asia Minor and Africa had declared in favor of the view that heretics baptized by heretics should be rebaptized on their entrance into the orthodox church. The Roman practice, however, had been to admit them without the repetition of the rite, and with a simple exhortation to repentance. The Eastern Church, and especially Cyprian, strongly opposed this practice; and the councils of Carthage (255, 256) again sanctioned the opposite view. A synodal letter informed Stephen of this action, and a heated controversy ensued. — 253-257, a Roman by birth, is of importance on account of his relationship to the controversy concerning heretical baptism. II Stephens.

Robert, the second son of Henry, and the founder of the splendid reputation which the name of Stephens still enjoys, was born, according to the usual opinion, in 1526; died in Geneva, Sept. 7, 1559. He early became acquainted with the ancient languages, and entered the printing establishment of Simon de Colines, who married his mother upon his father's death. He corrected the edition of the Latin New Testament of 1523. This work was the first occasion of the endless charges and criticisms of the clerical party, especially the theological faculty of the Sorbonne, against him. In 1526 he began to print on his own account. In 1550 he emigrated to Geneva to escape the ceaseless opposition of the clergy. In 1539 he assumed the title of "royal typographer," and adopted as his devices an olive-branch around which a serpent was twined, and a man standing underneath an olive-tree, with grafts from which wild branches are falling to the ground, with the words of Rom. xi. 20, Noli altum sapere ("Be not high-minded"). The latter was called the Oliva Stephanorum ("the olive of the Stephens family"). The Paris establishment was made famous by its numerous editions of grammatical works and other school-books (among them many of Melanthon's), and old authors, as Dio Cassius, Eusebius, Cicero, Sallust, Caesar, Justin, etc. Many of these, especially the Greek editions, were famous for their typographical elegance. Twice he published the Hebrew Bible entire,—in 1539 in four volumes, and 1548 sqq. in seventeen parts. Both of these editions are rare. Of more importance are his four editions of the Greek New Testament (1548, 1549, 1550, and 1551), the last in Geneva. The first two are among the nearest Greek texts known, and are called O mirificam; the third is a splendid masterpiece of typographical skill, and is known as the editio regia. The edition of 1551 contains the Latin translation of Erasmus and the Vulgate, is not nearly as fine as the other three, and is exceedingly rare. It was in this edition that the versiculardivision of the New Testament was for the first time introduced. Stephens's editions have much in common with the new journey to Geneva. [See facsimile specimens of the last two editions, in Schaff's Companion to the Greek Testament, pp. 530-539.] A number of editions of the Vulgate also appeared from his presses, of which the principal are those of 1528, 1532, 1540 (one of the ornaments of his press), 1548. The text of the Vulgate was in a wretched condition, and Stephens's editions, especially that of 1545, containing a new translation at the side of the Vulgate, was the subject of sharp and acrimonious criticism from the clergy. On his arrival at Geneva, he published a defence against the attacks of the Sorbonne. He issued the French Bible in 1538, and many of Calvin's writings; the finest edition of the Instituto being that of 1553. His fine edition of the Latin Bible with glosses (1556) contained the translation of the Old Testament by Santes Pagninus, and the first edition of Beza's translation of the New Testament. The name of Henry's sons—Robert, Paul, and Francois—became celebrated as printers. Francois (b. in 1540) printed on his own account in Geneva from 1562 to 1568, issuing a number of editions of the Bible in Latin and French. French writers identify him with a printer by the name of Estienne in Normandy, whether he is supposed to have emigrated in 1582. Robert (b. in 1530; d. in 1571) began to print in Paris on his own account in 1556, and in 1561 received the title of Imprimeur du Roy; and his presses were busily employed in issuing civil documents. His edition of the New Testament of 1568-69 (copies with both dates being in existence) was a reprint of his father's first edition, is equal to it in elegance of execution, and is now exceedingly rare.

III. Henry, the eldest son of the great Robert, and without doubt the most distinguished member of the family, was b. in Paris, 1528; d. at Lyons, March, 1598. He displayed in his youth a genuine enthusiasm for the study of Greek, which he learned before Latin. In his nineteenth year he undertook a protracted journey to Italy, England, and Flanders. In 1554 he published at Paris his first independent work, the Anacreon. Then he went again to Italy, helping the Aldens at Venice, discovered a copy of Diodorus Siculus at Rome, and returned to Geneva in 1555. In 1557 he seems to have had a printing-establishment of his own, and, in the spirit of our own day, advertised himself as the "Parisian printer* " typographerius parisiensis." The following year he assumed the title, illustris viri Huldrici Fuggeri typographus, from his patron, Fugger of Augsburg. In 1559 Henry assumed charge of his father's presses, and distinguished himself as the publisher, and also as the editor and collator, of manuscripts. Many of his editions were the first. Athenagoras, Maximus Tyrius, Zeschylus, appeared in 1557; Diodorus Siculus, 1559; Xenophon, 1561, 1581; Thucydides, 1564, 1588; Sophocles, 1568; Herodotus, 1570, 1592, etc. He improved old translations, or made new Latin translations, of many Greek authors. According to the writer of the article "Estienne," in La France Protestant, Henry took a personal part in editing fifty-four publications. His most celebrated work, the Thesaurus linguae grecae, which has served in our own century as the basis of Greek lexicography, appeared in 1572, 5 vols. Of the Greek editions of the New Testament, that of 1576--87 deserves mention those of Beza, with his commentary, 1565, 1582, 1589, and the smaller editions of 1565, 1567, 1580. A triglot containing the Peshito appeared in 1569, of which some copies are in existence, bearing the date "Lyons, 1571." In 1565 a large French Bible was printed. Henry's own editions of the Greek New Testament of 1578 and 1587 deserve mention; the former containing the first scientific treatise of the language of the apostolic writers; the latter, a discussion of the ancient divisions of the text. In 1594 he published a concordance of the New Testament, the preparatory studies of which his father had made. Much earlier he translated Calvin's Catechism into Greek. It was printed in 1554 in his father's printing-room.

Henry was married three times, and had fourteen children, of whom three survived him. His son Paul (b. 1567), of whose life little is known, assumed the title of the proprietor of the press, which in 1570 was sold to the Chaton brothers. Two of Paul's sons were printers,—Joseph at La Rochelle, and Antoine (d. 1674), who became Imprimeur du Roy in Paris in 1613. Pronton Le Duc's Chrysostom, and Jean Morin's Greek Bible (1628, 3 vols.) were... issued from his press. At his death the history of the family stops.

STERCORANISTS (from the Latin stercora, "excrements"), a term first used in 1564, by Cardinal Humbert against Nicetas Petoratus, and referring to a grossly sensational conception of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to which the body of our Lord is eaten, digested, and evacuated, like any other food. The conception has been falsely ascribed to Origen, and also to Rhabanus Maurus; but it no doubt existed in the time of the latter.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, b. probably at Hayfield, near Blakeney, Gloucestershire (or, according to another account, in Hampshire), about 1560; d. August, 1549; was groom of the chambers to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He is said to have versified fifty-one psalms, of which nineteen appeared 1548, and thirty-seven the next year, immediately after his death. The work was continued by John Hopkins of the Wodden, Aure, Gloucestershire (B A., Oxford, 1544; said to have held a living in Suffolk). The Whole Booke of Psalms Collected into English Metre appeared 1552, and was bound up with innumerable editions of the Prayer-Book; making for two centuries or more the only or chief metrical provision of the Church of England. Since 1700 or so, it has been called the "Old Version," in distinction from its rival, Tate and Brady. Of its contents about forty-one psalms bear the initials of Sternhold (the only notable sample of his skill being a few stanzas of Ps. xviii.), and sixty-four, those of Hopkins. The rest are by Thomas Norton, a lawyer who translated Calvin's Institutes, etc., and d. about 1600; William Whittingham, b. at Chester, 1524; d. in Tiibingen, Oct. 24, 1573; and was an independent man, and thoroughly evangelical. "I will serve no other master than Christ," he said, "and I wish to belong to him more and more exclusively and fully." His style was involved and heavy, and obscured the matter.1 He attacked Strauss's Life of Christ, a few weeks after the appearance of vol. i., in a little tract (1835), which stirred up the wrath of Strauss to appear in the polemic, Herr Dr. Steudel oder d. Selbstbautungen des verhängnisvollen Superchristus. The full article on Steudel by Oehler (his son-in-law), in Herzog's Encyclopädie, first edition, vol. xv. pp. 75-81.

STERDE, Johann Christian Friedrich, professor of theology at Tiibingen, and the last representative of the elder Tiibingen school of theology; was b. at Esslingen in Wurttemberg, Oct. 25, 1779; d. in Tiibingen, Oct. 24, 1837. He studied at the Tiibingen seminary; became vicar at Oberesslingen; in 1806 rector at Tiibingen; in 1808 went to Paris, where he learned the study of Persian; returning to Germany, was pastor in Canstatt and Tiibingen, and became professor of theology at Tiibingen in 1815. His department was the Old Testament till 1826, when he began to lecture upon systematic theology and apologetics. His Lectures on the Theology of the Old Testament were edited by Oehler after his death (Berlin, 1840). He wrote a number of articles for periodicals. He was an independent man, and thoroughly evangelical. "I will serve no other master than Christ," he said, "and I wish to belong to him more and more exclusively and fully." His style was involved and heavy, and obscured the matter.1 He attacked Strauss's Life of Christ, a few weeks after the appearance of vol. i., in a little tract (1835), which stirred up the wrath of Strauss to appear in the polemic, Herr Dr. Steudel oder d. STEWARD, church-officer among the Methodists, whose duties are similar to those of deacons in the Presbyterian and Reformed churches, relating especially to the care of the sick and of the monies of the church. See the appropriate sections in The Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the art. "Steward," in McClintock and Strong.

STEWART, Dugald, Professor of moral philosophy at the University of Edinburgh; was b. in Edinburgh, Nov. 22, 1733. He was the son of the professor of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh. The boy spent his winters in Edinburgh, and his summers in Catrine, Ayrshire, where his father had a house. Dugald Stewart was educated at the high school of Edinburgh and at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow. From 1765 to 1789 he was a student in Edinburgh University, and was greatly influenced by Adam Ferguson, professor of moral philosophy, whose teaching completely overtook his "conception" as a power of mind by which we can know of existence external to self. On account of growing infirmity, and to that chair he was elected on his resignation, in succession to his father, in 1775. In 1778 he lectured for Adam Ferguson while the latter was acting as secretary to the commission sent to America to negotiate as to pending disputes. The chair of moral philosophy was the one for which Dugald Stewart was eminently qualified; and to that chair he was elected on the resignation of Ferguson, in 1785, holding it till 1820, though during the last ten years of this period the duties of the chair were performed by Thomas Brown, who had been appointed his colleague in 1810, and who died before Brown's death, Stewart resigned the chair, and John Wilson ("Christopher North") was elected. Dugald Stewart was the strenuous supporter, and elegant exponent, of Reid's philosophy, known as the "Scotch philosophy" and "the philosophy of common sense;" being a defence of the certainty of human knowledge and belief against the scepticism of Hume. For an exposition of the philosophy of common sense, see article on Thomas Reid. Stewart's contributions to philosophic literature are numerous. His collected works, edited by Hamilton, were published in Edinburgh and Boston, in eleven octavo volumes. His Outline of Moral Philosophy, first published in 1793, containing a sketch of psychology and ethics, was long in circulation as a handbook for beginners in ethical science. An edition of it was prepared by Dr. McCosh of Princeton. Besides this, his works are the following: Dissertation on the Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Philosophy (first published in Encyclopaedia Britannica); Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind, of which an edition was published in Boston; Philosophical Essays; Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers; and Lectures on Political Economy. As a professor he was very highly esteemed by his students. Lord Cockburn, who writes enthusiastically of him as a teacher, describes his lecturing as "gentlemanlike, calm, and expository." On account of his careful treatment of political science, and the special influence he has had on many who were destined for political life, including Lord Brougham, Lord Palmerston, and Earl Russell. Many who afterwards rose to eminence in public life acknowledged special indebtedness to him. The shrewd, sagacious, but somewhat embrowned Reid was thrown into a pleasing and attractive form by Stewart, through whose clearness of logic, literary taste, and power of eloquence, it secured a greatly extended influence. These two were the representatives of a philosophy which has largely governed the philosophic thought of Scotland since, and for a time exercised considerable influence in France through the teaching of Cousin and Jouffroy. Stewart, like Reid, was hesitating and unsatisfactory in his mode of stating the evidence for personal existence, making it matter of belief, rather than of direct knowledge. Thus he says, "We cannot properly be said to be conscious of our own existence; our knowledge of this fact being necessarily posterior, in the order of time, to the consciousness of those sensations by which it is suggested." In this way, he spoke of the knowledge of self rather as an acquired notion than as a fact of present consciousness. Stewart treated, with special fulness, of "conception" as a power of mind by which we are able to represent past sensations and perceptions. In his treatment of this subject his analysis was so careful as to recognize dependence on physical organism for this mental representation, in strict harmony with more recent physiological teaching. As the follower and exponent of Reid, Stewart was the resolute opponent of the theory that all knowledge comes from experience; maintaining, on the contrary, that intelligence itself is the source of all that is fundamental to intelligent procedure in dealing with the confused mass of our sensations and perceptions. Like Reid, he devoted special attention to the doctrine of external perception; making it his special aim to ascertain the amount of direct and certain knowledge we have of existence external to self. On account of growing infirmity, and in the midst of general regret, Dugald Stewart withdrew from active professional duty in 1810, and thereafter lived in comparative retirement at Kinneil House, Linlithgowshire, a residence placed at his command by the Duke of Hamilton. He died in Edinburgh, when visiting a friend, on the 11th of June, 1829. His body lies in a covered and completely enclosed massive tomb in the lower portion of the Canongate Burying-ground, Edinburgh, the same cemetery in which is the grave of Adam Smith, professor of moral philosophy in Glasgow, and author of the Wealth of Nations. So profound and widespread was the admiration of Dugald Stewart, that, shortly after his death, a meeting was held in Edinburgh at which it was resolved to erect a monument to his memory. The result was the classic monument now standing on the Calton hill in the Scotch metropolis.

STICHOMETRY. The data of stichometry consist chiefly of subscriptions at the close of manuscripts, expressing the number of lines which are contained in the book that has been copied; of marginal annotations from point to point, expressing the extent of the previous text; or of quotations and allusions which are found in various writers, which indicate either the locality of some passage in a quoted work, or the compass of the whole or part of the works of a given author.
For example, at the close of Isocrates, Busiris, in Codex Urbinos, we have in the Archias character
the number 2, while on the margin of the same work, in the more recent character, we have on
fol. 22, 10 (§ 25), before τοῦτος οίκος, the number 2 (§); and on 25, 12 (§ 38), before γεγονότας δ' τούς, the number 3 (Γ'); and these numbers represent the second and third hundreds of lines measured on some exemplar, either actual or ideal; Diogenes Laertius quotes a passage from Chrysippus, cατά τῶν χάλκων στίχων; and Galen estimates
the extent of a certain portion of the works of Hipprocrites at two hundred and forty verses; τότους τοῦ βιβλίου τὸ μὲν κατά τὸ ἐν γράμμα μέρος πρὸς τὸ πρῶτος αὐτοῖς στίχοις ἔδρα (Galen, in Hippocratem de nat. kom., xv. p. 9).
Full collections of such data may be found in Ritschl: Opusc. Philol., vol. i. pp. 74 sqq.; and Birt: Das Antike Buchweesen, c. 4.
Every thing in these data suggests that the number has reference to standard lines or copies;
and since the actual number of lines in the manuscripts never tallies with the stichometric record, and we are unable to point to any copies which do furnish an agreement, it is evident that there is somewhere a common unit of measurement upon which these subscriptions and quotations are based: in other words, the στίχος must have an element of fixity in it, even if it be not absolutely fixed.
It is important, therefore, to determine in what direction the meaning of the στίχος defeccts from its normal indefinite sense of line, row, and verse.

The term στίχος is of itself extremely vague.
It may be nothing more than row or line; as, e.g., the LXX. use it for the rows of stones in the high priest's breastplate; or, in a military sense, it may represent the number of men in a rank or file of soldiers, especially the latter; and so in other cases.
But in literature it is easy to demonstrate that the στίχος is defeccted in meaning in the direction of the hexameter line. In the first place, such a unit is convenient for the comparison of prose-works with poetry; in the next place, we have actual instances of prose-passages reduced to their equivalent verse-lengths; in the third place, we may actually find the term στίχος used of hexameter poetry, in distinction from any other; and, finally,
we may actually divide any given work into hexameter rhythms, and compare our results with the transmitted numerical data. If we take these points in order, we may say that the prose-unit is more likely to be taken from poetry than the unit of measurement for poetry is likely to be adopted from prose for the unit of poetry is usually measured in a sensibly constant unit, and no reposi-tion exists for a change of that unit. The only question that would arise here is whether we ought not to expect a variety of units of measurement; as, for instance, an iambic unit in distinction from a hexameter unit. It is sufficient to observe this point, that such varieties of measurement, if they exist, are extremely rare.

In regard to the actual reduction of a prose-passage to its equivalent verse-length, we have an important case in Galen (v. 656. ed. Kuhn), where, having quoted a sentence from Hippocrates,
he continues:

εἰς μὲν οὖν ὁ λόγος εἶναι καὶ τρία ἴσα ἑλλαζον ἐπὶ
πέντε ἕξιοις καὶ ἕξιοις ἕξιοις ἐπὶ ἑξεντροὺς κτλ.

If Galen then reckons thirty-nine syllables as being equivalent to two hexameters and a half, or, as he continues, eighty-two syllables to five hexameters, the hexameter can hardly be different from a sixteen-syllabled rhythm. We are invited, therefore, to the assumption that stichometric measurement is made by preference in syllables of which sixteen go to the hexameter, or unit-verse. The number 16 invites attention as being the number of syllables in the first line of the Iliad, and as being a square number, a peculiarity which always had a certain attractiveness for early calculators.

That the term στίχος deflects in the direction of hexameter verse as against any other line of poetry which might have been chosen for a proper unit of measurement, will appear from Montfaucon (Bibli. Cousin, p. 587), where there is quoted from a tenth-century manuscript the following catalogue of poets:

περὶ ποιητῶν
δουαδεκα στίχων καὶ ᾽άγιων ἔφασαν
Ομηρός στίχος, Ἀπολλώνιος στίχος, Θέαταρτος ὁμώς, Ἀρτος ὁμῆς, Νικανόρος ὁμῆς, Μενανόρος ἡμίους κτλ.

This broad division of poets into writers by στίχος and writers of iambics can only have result-edit from a specialization of the meaning of the term στίχος by constant use in a particular sense.

In the demonstration of the same point in actual measurement, the most important researches are those published by the late Ch. Graux, in the Revue de Philologie, April, 1878, in which he monstrated, by an actual estimation of the number of letters in certain works, that the στίχος represented not a certain number of words, but a fixed quantity of writing. The average number of letters to the verse he found to vary between narrow limits, generally thirty-four to thirty-eight letters; and an enumeration of the letters in fifty lines of the Iliad opened at random supplied him with an average of 37.7 letters to the verse. This very important identification of the στίχος with the hexameter is the starting-point for a great many new critical investigations as to the integrity of transmitted texts, their early form, etc. Whether the unit of measurement is a certain number of syllables, or a certain number of letters, is not easy to decide. We may be tolerably certain that the measured line is, as above stated, a space-line, and not a sense-line; but to discriminate between a letter-line and a syllable-line is a more delicate matter. If we adopt the former, we must probably fix the unit at thirty-six letters, because this is the nearest symmetrical number to the average hexameter. We have very few instances, however, in which the actual letters of a line are found to be numbered; while we can readily trace the custom of limiting a line by the division of the syllables, in the earliest manuscripts. Moreover, we have the actual measurement in the passage quoted from Galen; and Pliny seems to allude to the custon of syllable-counting, when, in one of his epistles, he demands an equally long reply from his correspondent, and threatens to count, not only the pages, but the syllables of each verse ("Ego non pagina tantum, sed versus etiam syllabasque numerabo."— Pliny, iv. 11). The preference must, therefore, be given to the syllable-line, though, perhaps, not entirely to the exclusion of the other. It is comparatively easy to count the latter, but the verses of a hexameter or iambic, rhythms, but a toilsome enough process to estimate with equal accuracy the number of thirty-six-letter lines.

It is interesting to compare the relative sizes of the two line-units. M. Graux deduces 37.7 as the average hexameter in letters, and Diels (Hermes, xvii. Bd.) makes the average of the first fifty lines in Homer to be 15.6 syllables. A verse of sixteen syllables is then equivalent to about 1.074 verses of thirty-six letters each. In precisely the same way as M. Graux determined the average number of letters to the verse from the total stichometry in the manuscripts of Herodotus, Demosthenes, Eusebius, Gregory of Nazianzus, etc., we may proceed to examine the partial stichometry. This has been done for Isocrates by Fuhr (Rhein. Mus., Bd. 37, p. 468); for the Plato manuscripts, by Schanz (Hermes, xvi. p. 308); and for the Demosthenes manuscripts, by W. v. Christ, in a very able discussion entitled Die Atticussausgabe des Demosthenes, Munchen, 1882.

The partial stichometry is of the highest value for the study of texts; and in every case the data which it supplies are found to accord very closely with our fundamental statements as to the palaeographical meaning of the word προσφορά. Some degree of confusion is introduced by the existence, apparently, in early times, of an alternative iambic verse of twelve syllables, as well as by the introduction of writing by Cola and Commata. The latter of these points has been an especial ground of combat, in consequence of the countenance which the custom seemed to lend to their lengths, Cola and Commata, and in some instances an attempt was made, not only to number these Cola, so as to form a colometry similar to stichometry, and sharing the advantages which it offered for reference and book-measuring, but even to accommodate the arrangement of these Cola so as to reproduce the original number of verses. Thus we find the rhetorician Castor (Walz. Rhet. Gr., iii. 721) discussing the omission of Demosthenes against Philip as follows: τοῦτον τῶν λόγων στίχων κατὰ κλάματα διασπάσας εἰς τὰ πεντάτευχα τῶν ἔκτυχον περί ἑκάστου τῶν εἰκόνων καὶ τῶν ἀρχών τῶν ἔπειδη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις βιβλίοις, ὡς ἔμμετρον αὐτῷ ἡ διαιτησία τῶν τῶν λόγων. It seems also that this change of form took place first for those books which were publicly recited, or which had a semi-poetical structure; so that the oldest Bible manuscripts desert the continuous uncial writing in the Prologues, prologues, etc.; and St. Jerome proposed to imitate this peculiarly divided text in the prophets: "Sei quod in Demosthen et Tullio solet fieri, ut per cola scribantur et commata, qui utique prosa et non versibus conscriberunt, . . . nos quoque utiliitatem legentium providentes, intentione quo scribendi genere distinctum", (preface to Isaiah).

We shall now turn to the stichometry of the New Testament, and in particular to the Epistles: here we shall show that the theory already advanced is completely confirmed, and that we have a very powerful critical implement for the restoration of early New-Testament texts in the traditional data. As before, we have both total and partial stichometry. There is, however, a good deal of variation between the transmitted data, arising from various causes, such as variation in the text, variation in the unit employed in the measurement, difference in versions measured, and difference in the abbreviations employed. The greatest authority, however, for New-Testament stichometry, is found in the work of Euthalius, edited by Zacagni, Collect. Mon. Antiq. Eccles. Græc., Rome, 1889; Migne, Patr., Græc., iom. 55. Euthalius was a deacon of the Church of Alexandria, and afterwards bishop of Sulca, supposed to have been a small city in Upper Egypt. He has frequently but erroneously been credited with the introduction of stichometry to the New Testament, and these verses which he measured have been by many persons identified with the colon-writing previously described. There is very little ground for any such idea; and we shall find that the προσφορά mentioned by Euthalius are hexameters of sixteen syllables, a very slight allowance being made for certain common abbreviations. The work of Euthalius consisted in editing the Acts and Catholic Epistles, with a complete system of prologues, prefaces, and quotations: every book was divided into lections, and to every lection, as well as to the greater part of the prefaces, was appended its numerical extent. The verses were also marked on the margin from fifty to fifty.

We have thus a mine of stichometric information sufficient to test any theory in the closest manner. Moreover, the work has this importance, that Euthalius professes to have measured his verses accurately, and to have employed the best manuscripts; viz., those preserved in the Pamphilian Library at Cæsarea. It thus appears that we have the right to set a high value on the measurements made, on the ground of antiquity as well as of accuracy.

We shall now test these results given by Euthalius for the lections of the Acts of the Apostles; and, taking no account of the abbreviations which might have been found in the text, we shall divide the text of the Acts in Westcott and Hort's New Testament into sixteen-syllabled rhythms. If we had allowed for abbreviation, the results would have been somewhat less, as we might subtract a syllable at every occurrence of the words ἀπὸ καὶ ἀνάμεσα, and two syllables for each occurrence of ἐκ τῶν, ἐκ τῶν ἀπό τῆς, and two other rarely recurring words, as varying. Our data for Euthalius are taken from Cod. Escorial. ψ. iii. 6, as there are some errors in Zacagni's figures.

Allowing for one or two obvious corruptions, such as the dropping of the figure ρ in section 6, the agreement is very complete.

The lines of the table are nearly hexameters, so that the table affords a picture of the arrangement of an early bibliomnacal Codex:—
Still more remarkable is the harmony between the measured text of Westcott and Hort and the Euthalian figures, when we allow for the abbreviations previously mentioned. We give the results for the Epistles in a form suitable for comparison. The first column represents the stichometric number supplied by Euthalius and Hort into sixteen-syllabled verses; the second gives the result of the best manuscripts; the third expresses the same result with the proper abbreviations previously mentioned. We give the Euthalian figures, when we allow for the abbreviations. A fifteen-syllabled hexameter seems to agree best with the traditional figure. The Gospel of John, in the text of Westcott and Hort, is 2,025 abbreviated fifteen-syllabled hexameters, an almost absolute agreement with the result given above (2,024). For the other Gospels the matter must be left for more extended investigation.

The agreement between the first and third columns is very complete and decisive as a test of the hypothesis proposed with regard to the nature of the Euthalian στιχος.

In the Gospels the data may be handled in a similar manner; but the difficulties arising from the variety of text, etc., are great: moreover, many manuscripts transmit not only the number of verses, but also another number corresponding to the στιχος of the separate books. We have from a large group of manuscript the following numbers for the four Gospels:—

<tr>

From this it appears that the number of στιχος is sometimes in excess, and sometimes in defect, of the number of verses. What these στιχος are is a hard question. Some persons have identified them with the στιχος,—a supposition that will scarcely bear scrutiny. It is doubtful, moreover, whether the verses of the Gospels are measured by the same unit as we found employed in the Acts and Epistles. A fifteen-syllabled hexameter seems to agree best with the traditional figure. The Gospel of John, in the text of Westcott and Hort, is 2,025 abbreviated fifteen-syllabled hexameters, an almost absolute agreement with the result given above (2,024). For the other Gospels the matter must be left for more extended investigation.

STIEFEL (STIFEL), Michael, a distinguished arithmetician of the Reformation; was b. at Esslingen, April 19, 1486; entered the Augustinian convent there, left it for Wittenberg in 1520; stood on friendly terms with Luther; after holding several pastorate, was appointed in 1558 professor of mathematics at Jena, with a salary of forty florins (afterwards increased to sixty florins); d. in Jena, April 10, 1567. In 1532 he published Ein Rechenbiuchlein vor dem Ende Christi, in which, upon the basis of the figures in Daniel, he set the day of judgment at eight o'clock in the morning of Oct. 19, 1533. His arithmetical studies and works (Rechenbuch von d. welschen and deutschen Fracktiek, 1546, etc.) did much to promote the study of mathematics in Germany. Luther called Stiefel a "pious, learned, moral, and industrious man." C. SCHWARZ.

STIEKNA (or DE STEKEN), Conrad, also called Conradus ab Austria, one of the forerunners of John Hus; d. at Prague, 1368. Balbinus speaks of him as preacher in the Tein church, Prague. He zealously condemned the hypocrisy, simony, and licentiousness of the priests, which he described in dark colors. In his larger work, Accusationes Mendicantium, he attacked with great heat the orders of begging friars, and did not spare the bishops. STIER. 2248

STIER, Rudolf Eduard, a distinguished German exegete; was b. at Fraustadt, March 17, 1800; d. at Eisleben, Dec. 16, 1862. Set apart for the study of law, he entered the university of Jena in 1815, but the year following enrolled himself among the students of theology. His ideals at that time were Jahn and Jean Paul, with the latter of whom Stier was often a coteworthy companion. In 1818 he went to Halle, where he was chosen president of the Halle Burschenschaft. It was not till 1819 that he truly gave himself up to Christ, and began the study of theology from the proper motive. The occasion of this change was the death of a young lady whom he loved. He then went to Berlin, and after completing his studies, successively held the position of teacher at Wittenberg, Karalene, and in the missionary institute of Basel. In 1829 he became pastor at Frankleben. The writer of this, at an inn, got the following answer to a question about Stier: "He is a mystic." On asking what that meant, he received the reply, "They are the preachers who live as they preach." In 1838 Stier was called to Wichlinghausen in the Wupperthal, from which he retired in 1846, and passed three years in literary activity at Wittenberg. He was then appointed superintendent at Schkeuditz, and in 1859 at Eisleben. If any theologian has had to learn the "theology of the cross" of biblical exegesis, he was interested in the latter of whom he carried on a correspondence. His principal works are in the department of biblical exegesis. He was interested in the German translation of the Bible; wrote Altes u. Neues in deutscher Bibel, Basel, 1828, and Darf Luther's Bibel unberichtet bleiben?, Halle, 1836; was associated with Von Meyer in the last edition of his translation, 1842, and prepared an edition of his own in 1866 (Bielefeld), in which many changes were introduced. His principal work was the Words of the Lord Jesus (Reden d. Herrn, 1st ed., 1843, 3 vols.), [3d ed. 1865-74, 7 vols.; Eng. trans. by Pope, Edinb., 9 vols.; revised by Drs. Strong and H. B. Smith, N.Y., 1869, 3 vols.]. It is a storehouse of information for ministers, among whom it has had a wide circulation. Stier bases his exegesis upon a firm faith in inspiration, and is dogmatic and mystical rather than historic and critical. I wrote to him, "You are a Christian cabalist;" to which he replied, "You are a pietistic rationalist." The Words of the Lord Jesus, like all his works, lacks in conciseness and point. Among his other exegetical writings are, Auslegung von 70 ausgewählten Psalmen, 1834-36; [Jesaias nicht Pseudo-Isaias, 1851; D. Reden d. Apostel, trans. by Venables (The Words of the Apostles), Edinb., 1869; D. Reden d. Engel, 1890, Eng. trans., The Words of Angels, Lond., 1962]; Among Stier's other writings are a treatise on homiletics, Grundriss d. Kerygik, 1844, 2d ed., 1855; Luther's Katechismus, etc., 6th ed., 1855. [See his Life, by his sons, Wittenberg, 1868, 2d ed., 1871].

THOLUCK.

STIGMATIZATION (from the Greek stigma, "a mark") denotes a spontaneous formation of wounds closely resembling those our Lord received by being crowned with thorns, crucified, and pierced with a spear. The first instance of such stigmatization is that of St. Francis of Assisi, who in 1224, two years before his death, saw the crucified Saviour in a vision, and, when he awakened from the trance, found himself marked on hands and feet with the marks of crucifixion. Thomas of Celano, Bonaventura, Alexander IV., and many others testified as eye-witnesses of the truth of the statement. On the Dominicans would not believe it. In Castile and Leon they openly denied the fact; a bishop of Olmütz forbade to sell in his diocese representations of St. Francis with the stigmata; and a Dominican monk, Evehard of Oppau in Moravia, protested that the whole story was a product of the egotism and deceitfulness of the Franciscans. Later on, stigmatization became not so very rare in the Roman-Catholic Church. The last who was canonized on that account was the Capuchin nun Veronica Giuliani (d. at Citta di Castello in 1727); the canonization took place in 1801. But several pretended instances have occurred in the present century. Maria of Mörl, living at Kaltern, in the southern part of Tyrol, received the stigmata on her hands and feet in 1838, when she was twenty-two years old. She was visited by more than forty thousand people before she retired into the Franciscan nunnery at Kaltenern. [Even the Protestant Church can boast of instances of stigmatization. In 1820 a pious maiden in Saxony received the stigmata under great sufferings, fell into a deathlike state on Good Friday, but began to recover on Easter morning. The most recent case in the Roman-Catholic Church is the Belgian Louise Lateau, who in 1873 attracted great attention by her flowing wounds. Thousands came to see her, but suspicion was aroused by the air of secrecy which surrounded her. She was closely watched, and the priests refused to allow her to be examined by surgeons. The excitement soon passed away; and she died (Oct. 32), scarcely noticed, in August, 1883. It is noteworthy that stigmatization occurred on a man in only one case, and that the women thus signalized were sickly and hysterical. Leaving out of account the element of fraud, it may be said that "stigmatic neuropathy" is a pathological condition of occasional occurrence, either natural or artificial. Therefore, while freely admitting the fact, one must not lay any stress upon it. It is no more a sign of divine favor than the shattered constitution and disordered brain which produce it.] See MALAN: Histoire de S. STILLING, a famous German writer, whose proper name was Johann Heinrich Jung; b. at Grund in Nassau-Siegen, Sept. 12, 1740; d. at Carlsruhe, April 2, 1827; a mystic and a theologian, but childlike and pure-minded, with a ready and energetic sympathy for the actual sufferings around him, which, more than his apocalyptic visions, made him one of the most popular devotional writers of Germany. His parents were exceedingly poor; and while a young man he taught school two days a week, and sewed four, having freed himself from the anguish of poverty, and fired by the enthusiasm for studies. He learned mathematics, Latin, Greek, and even Hebrew. A Roman-Catholic priest confided to him a secret means by which to cure certain eye-diseases, and this circumstance changed his destiny. An audacious but successful cure made him acquainted with a well-to-do gentleman, whose daughter he afterwards married; and in 1771 he went to Strassburg to study medicine. He there obtained a scientific training, and became doctor medicinae; but it was still of greater consequence to him, that he there became acquainted with Goethe and Herder, and elevated above the level of a somewhat narrow and barren pietism. He settled first at Elberfeld as an eye-physician; and there he published, by the aid of Goethe, his H. Stilling's Jugend, which by its wonderful blending of poetry and fact, of fiction and truth, gained him as a writer of rank. But he had a genius for getting into debt; and for many years his time and labor were divided between managing creditors, curing poor people's eyes, and writing devotional books which were the consolation and admiration of the German people. In 1778 he was made professor of political economy in the academy of Kaiserslautern, whence he removed, in the same quality, to Heidelberg in 1782, and to Marburg in 1787. But it was not until 1803 that he, by being appointed privy-councillor to the grand duke of Baden, was liberated from drudgery and pecuniary troubles, and allowed to follow their powers, and which had a peculiar charm for that time: Geschichte des Herrn von Morzenthau (The Life of Sir Morning dew), Theodore von den Linden, F. von den Linden, and C. V. Denz. The greatest literary value have his autobiographical writings: Jugend, Junglingjahre, Wunderschaft, and Lehrjahre. His chief theological works are, Siegesgeschichte, an exposition of the Revelation, and Geisterkunde, partially based on Swedenborg. MATTER.

STILLINGFLEET, Edward, b. at Cranborne in Dorsetshire, April 17, 1835; d. at Westminster, March 27, 1890. He was educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1853. Just after the Restoration, he published his Irenicum, a weapon salve for the Churches wounds (1861), a moderate and healing treatise, very appropriate in that age of fierce ecclesiastical strife, and reflecting honor on the courage and catholicity of the author at that particular crisis. The following year appeared his Origins Sacred, or Rational Account of the Christian Faith as to the Truth and Divine Authority of the Scriptures. In this work he criticised the history and chronology of heathen writers, undermining their credibility, and contrasting them with the authors of the Bible records. He dwelt upon the knowledge, fidelity, and integrity of Moses, and the inspiration of the prophets, as inferred from the fulfilment of their prophecies. Afterwards he treated of the being of God, the origin of the universe, the nations of mankind, and pagan mythology; and it is interesting to find that he appears in harmony with modern geologists, by maintaining, not the universality, but the partial extent, of the Deluge. Of course, in many points, the work is superseded by later productions; yet it remains a storehouse of learning, and displays much logical ability and lawyer-like habits of thought. This volume was followed, in 1864, by A Rational Account of the grounds of the Protestant Religion, a timely publication, when Popery was favored by the court and by personalities in the upper circles. Other attacks upon Romanism, from the same pen, were made in publications we have not room to specify: it is sufficient to say that Stillingfleet was perhaps the most learned and effective champion of Protestantism just before the Revolution. The Mischiefs of Separation, a sermon which he preached in 1860, and which was immediately published, gave unmistakable proof that he had abandoned the moderate opinions, and dropped the conciliatory temper, expressed in his Irenicum. This brought on him answers in the way of defence, written by Owen, Baxter, and other nonconformists. But he candidly acknowledged his mistake, being perfectly subdued by what John Howe wrote on the subject, "more like a gentleman," he said, "than a divine, without any mixture of rancor." In 1893 a violent controversy took place between nonconformists, respecting Antinomianism; and some of the disputants appealed to Stillingfleet as a sort of arbitrator, a circumstance which showed that by this time he had recovered his reputation as a healer of strife. An active mind like his would make him so important a question, and he could not refrain from taking part in the great doctrinal controversy of the age. A Discourse in Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, by Stillingfleet, was published in 1697. He was a metaphysician, as well as a divine, and criticized Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding the same year, following that up soon afterwards by a rejoinder to Locke's reply. He wrote also on other subjects, and gave "the best account," says Bishop Nicholson, "of the present state of our Bible." A collected edition of this author's works, with his life and character, was published after his death in 1689.

As bishop of Worcester, which he became in 1889, he took part in the commission for revising the Prayer-Book; and in his episcopal capacity he procured a stall in Worcester Cathedral for Bentley, the great classical scholar, who was the prelate's chaplain.

JOHN STOUTON.

STOCKER, John, of Honiton, Devonshire, published in the Gospel Magazine (1776-77) nine hymns, which were reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1861. Two of them, "Graceful Spirit, Dove divine," and "Thy, mercy, my God," have been widely used.

STOCKTON, Thomas Hewlings, D.D., Methodist-Protestant; b. at Mount Holly, N.J., June 4, 1808; d. in Philadelphia, Oct. 9, 1868. Converted in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, he joined the Methodist-Protestant Church on its organization, and in 1829 was placed upon a circuit. He was stationed in Baltimore, 1830; chaplains to the House of Representatives, 1833-35, 1859-61, and of the Senate, 1862. He preached in Philadelphia, 1838-47, in Cincinnati until 1850, in Baltimore until 1856, in Philadelphia, over an independent church, until his death. He was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. He compiled a hymn-book for his denomination (1837), and published some original poetry, and several volumes in prose. See his biography by A. Clark, New York, 1869, and by J. G. Wilson, Philadelphia, 1869.

STODDARD, David Tappan, Congregational missionary; b. at Northampton, Mass., Dec. 2, 1818; d. at Tabriz, Persia, Jan. 22, 1857. He graduated at Yale, 1838, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1841; sailed as missionary to Persia on Oct. 20, 1843. He was stationed at Sheherizade and Shiraz, where he labored fourteen years. His last letter is dated 1848; his last letter is dated 1848; he was in America on a visit. He was particularly interested in the Nestorian youths whom he gathered in the seminary established in 1844 at Oroomiah. He was a model missionary. His Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language was published in the Journal of the American Oriental Society, New Haven, Conn., 1853. See J. P. Thompson: Memoir of D. T. Stoddard, New York, 1858.

STODDARD, Solomon, Congregationalist; b. in Boston, Mass., 1843; d. at Northampton, Mass., Dec. 11, 1879. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1862; was chaplain in the Barbadoes for two years; preached at Northampton from 1869 until his death, when he was succeeded by his grandson, and colleague from 1727, Jonathan Edwards. From 1867 to 1874 he was first librarian to Cambridge. He is remembered for his theory that God's Spirit is "the means of regeneration," and that persons may choose to come to it, though they know themselves to be in a "natural condition." He wrote The Safety of appearing at the day of Judgement in (the righteousness of Christ, Boston, 1837 (2d ed., 1879; republished, Edinburgh, 1792, with Preface by Dr. John Erskine); The doctrine of instituted churches explained and proved from the Word of God, Boston, 1700, 34 pp., 4to; a reply to Increase Mather's The order of the Gospel, prefixed and by the churches of Christ in the England, etc. (1727); and An Appeal to the learned, being a vindication of the right of visible saints to the Lord's Supper, though they be destitute of a saving work of God's Spirit in their hearts, 1709; A guide to Christ, or the way of directing souls that are under the work of conversion, 1714; and An answer to some cases of conscience, 1722 (among other things, it discusses whether men have the right to live at an inconvenient distance from church; when the Lord's Day begins; whether the Indians were wronged in the purchase of their land). See art. Congregationalism, p. 558; and Dexter: Congregationalism as seen in its Literature.

STOICISM, the noblest system of morals developed within the pale of Greek philosophy, received its name from the place in Athens in which its founder, Zeno of Citium (about 308 B.C.), established his pupils, the Stoas, or colonnades. The metaphysical foundation of the system involves a final identification of God and nature, submerging both those ideas in that of an inevitable destiny. In its more austere forms, stoicism defined moral perfection as complete indifference to destiny. Man shall do that which is good, independently of surrounding influences and circumstances; and, having done that which is good, he shall feel happy, independently of the sufferings and misery which may result from his acts. In its later and somewhat mitigated forms, stoicism defined that which is good, virtue, as conformity to the all-controlling laws of nature, or even as agreement between the human and the divine will. Always, however, it placed action far above contemplation or enjoyment; and, by so doing, it exercised a great influence on the Roman mind. In Rome it found its most eloquent exponent, Seneca, and its noblest representatives, Marcus Aurelius the emperor, and Epictetus the slave; and by inculcating the metaphysical foundation of the system involves a final identification of God and nature, submerging both those ideas in that of an inevitable destiny. The best representation of the whole subject is found in Zeller: Philosophie d. Griechen, iii., Eng. trans., The Stoics, Epicureans, and Skeptics, London, 1860. See also Ravarross's: Essai sur le Stoicisme, Paris, 1856; Dourif: Du Stoicisme et du Christianisme, Paris, 1863; H. A. Winkler: Der Stoicismo unozio del Christiano, Leipzig, 1871; B. W. W. STOLBERG, Friedrich Leopold, Count von, b. at Bramstedt in Holstein, Nov. 7, 1750; d. at Sondermuhlen in Hanover, Dec. 5, 1819. He was educated in Copenhagen, but, under the influence of Kramer and Klipstock, studied at Halle and Göttingen, where he lived for the most prominent members of the Hainbund, and travelled (1775-76) through Germany and Switzerland with Goethe and Lavater. In 1777 he went to Copen- hagen as the representative of the prince-
STONING AMONG THE HEBREWS.

This capital punishment was ordained by the Mosaic law for the following classes of criminals: [(1) All who trenched upon the honor of Jehovah, i.e., idolaters (Lev. xx. 2; Deut. xvii. 2 sq.) and inciters to idolatry (Deut. xxiii. 6 sq.), all blasphemers (Lev. xxiv. 10 sq.; comp. 1 Kings xx. 10 sq.; Acts vi. 13, vii. 50 sq.), sabbath-breakers (Num. xx. 2 sq.), fortune-tellers and soothsayers (Lev. xx. 27), also false prophets (Deut. xiii. 6, 11: in fine, those who had shared in any accursed thing (Josh. vii. 23); (2) Notoriously and incorrigibly disobedient sons (Deut. xx. 18 sq.); (3) Brides whose tokens of virginity were wanting (Deut. xxii. 20 sq.), and so an allied woman who had compelled with a seducer, together with the seducer himself (ver. 23 sq.).] According to Jewish criminal procedure, the same penalty was incurred by those who cursed their parents, or had sexual connection with their mother, stepmother, daughter-in-law, or with a beast. Adulterers were to be stoned (Deut. xxii. 23 sq.). Fortune-tellers had to be put to death (Lev. xxvi. 27). The mode of stoning seems to be indicated in the expressions saikal, i.e., to hit with a heavy stone, and raguem, i.e., to overload one with stones. The place of execution appears to have been outside of the city (Lev. xxiv. 14; Num. xv. 36; 1 Kings xxi. 10, 13; Acts vii. 53); and that the witnesses threw the first stone upon the culprit, we see from Deut. xvii. 7; Acts vii. 57 sq. Stoning was a frequent resort of a mob (a very old practice, Exod. viii. 26, xvii. 4) in order to avenge itself on the spot upon such as had excited popular ill will (1 Sam. xxii. 16; Luke xx. 6; John x. 31 sq., xi. 8; Acts v. 26, xvi. 5-19; 2 Cor. xi. 25; Josephus, Ant. IV. 2, 1, XVI. 10, 5; War. II. 1, 3; Life, 18, 55). It was resorted to, not only by the Jews, but also by Syrians (2 Macc. 1. 16), Greeks (Herod. ix. 2; Thucyd. v. 60; Plut. viii. 5, 8; Elian, Var. Hist. v. 19; Curtius, viii. 21), and other nations.

STRAUSS.

(Tübingen, 1835, 1836, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1840; French trans. by Littré, Paris, 1839, 2 vols.; Eng. trans. by George Eliot, London, 1846, 3 vols.). He was removed from his position at Tübingen after the appearance of the first volume (see Wieszacker, in Jahrb. für deutsche Theologie, 1875, 4th part), and transferred as provisional professor at Leipzig. In 1838 he retired from public life. The action of the authorities was wise, for his book raised a storm of opposition. He applied the mythical theory which had made such havoc with Greek and Roman history, and which De Wette had applied to the Old Testament, to the Gospels, with the result that all miracles were turned into myths (see MYTHICAL THEORY): all that remained was a Christ idea. There was no such thing as prophecy, an incarnation, or a miracle; for nothing which is supernatural can be historical. There was no God-man as a person. The Incarnate God is the human race. Humanity is the work of a single mother, but invisible father. It is the race which works miracles by its use of natural forces. It dies, and lives again, and mounts to heaven, because, raised above personal existence, it is united with the heavenly and eternal spirit. In this work Strauss ignored critical study of the text. He considered the four Gospels as the altered oral tradition. He accepted, however, the synoptical discourses. His theory was confronted by the dilemma so masterfully put by Ullmann in his Historisch oder Mythisch? (Hamburg, 1838) that either the Christ was the invention of the apostolic church, or the apostolic church was founded by Christ. Neander, Tholuck, Lucke, Lange, and others successfully refuted his theory; and his book is of value only for its purely negative criticism. In the second and third editions, and in his Streitschriften (Tübingen, 1837–38, 3 vols.), he endeavored to reply to the attacks made upon him, and conceded spiritual authority to the Founder of Christianity. It was his desire to make his peace with the theologians, which led him in 1838 to write the Zwei friedliche Blätter, Altona, 1838. In 1839 the radical party at Zürich nominated him professor of theology in the university, but a popular outbreak prevented his acceptance, although for the rest of his life he continued to draw a thousand francs yearly (half the salary). In 1839 he published at Leipzig Charakteristiken u. Kritiken, 2 ed., 1844, embracing essays upon Schleiermacher, Dab, Kerner, animal magnetism, and modern possessions, etc. In the fourth edition of his Leben Jesu (1840), the first one printed in German characters, Strauss withdrew all the concessions of the second and third, and boldly threw down the glove to the theologians. His second chief work was Die christliche Glaubenlehre in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und im Kampf mit der modernen Wissenschaft dargestellt (Tübingen, 1840, 1841, 2 vols.), which has been characterized as resembling a theology in the same way that a cemetery resembles a city. Strauss maintains that the opposition between science and religion is hopeless. The latter is indeed an inferior form of thought, which no longer satisfies the most among those who have given a higher ideal to humanity, and that it was impossible to refrain from admiring and loving him. He also says we cannot do without Christianity, and it cannot be lost. In the second work, Strauss ridiculed Schenkel's liberalism as contrasted with Hengstenberg's whole-souled orthodoxy. In the third, he reviews Schleiermacher's life of Christ, then first published. In his fourth work he sets himself to answer four questions: Are we yet Christians? Have we still a religion? How do we look at the universe? How shall we regulate our life? The first question he answers negatively. He repudiates his former veneration for Christianity, and calls Christ's resurrection "a world-historical humbug." To the second query he replies, "we establish that we live only by an absolute dependence upon the universe; an absolute being cannot be conscious or personal." To the third, he says, the universe is "only a develop-

During the first part of it, amid our colonial troubles with Great Britain, he published many political papers which exerted a wide and deep influence. He possessed one faculty which gave him great power in political discussions. His wit was woven "into the very texture of his mind." "Notwithstanding all his struggles against it," he could not entirely repress it; and he often let it fly like a javelin against the opponents of the Revolution. He never yielded to it in the pulpit: there he was uniformly and eminently solemn and impressive. In his controversies, however, with the infidels of his day, he did not restrain his instinctive tendency to sarcasm. Their safety lay in letting him alone. Like many other pastors, he suffered in his finances from the influence of the Revolutionary war. His salary became insufficient and uncertain. In order to relieve his failing exchequer, he invested a part of his patrimonial estate in a mercantile establishment, which afterward became bankrupt. Several circumstances connected with this loss, followed as they were by two severe bereavements, had a decisive influence on his ministerial character. During the last twenty years of his pastoral life, he became eminent as a revival preacher. In the best sense of the term he was a pulpit orator. His person was attractive and imposing, his eloquence was earnest and emphatic, his thoughts were clear, his sympathies ardent, his religious feelings profound. He had a wonderful memory, and a command of appropriate language. He was sometimes thought to be preaching extempore when in fact he was reading his manuscript, and sometimes he was thought to be reading his manuscript when in fact he was preaching extempore. His knowledge of human nature was remarkable. This gave him an exceptional degree of authority among the churches, and a rare degree of skill in conducting religious revivals. He was an indefatigable student; but his learning was developed in his intellectual character, and not in his references to books. His talents were versatile: his attainments were multifarious, and not concentrated on a few points. His method of writing was rapid: he did not stop to perfect his manuscript when in fact he was preaching extemporaneously. The principal work was *Hypomnemata in omnes libros N. EDWARDS A. PARK.

STRYPE, John, a distinguished historiographer of the English Reformation; was b. at Stepney, Nov. 1, 1643; d. at Hackney, Dec. 11, 1737. After passing through St. Paul's school, he entered Jesus College, Cambridge (1662), from which he was transferred to Catherine Hall, where he took his degree. He was made curate of Theobald's Bury, Essex, in 1669, and of Low Leyton, Essex, the same year. Archbishop Tenison afterwards conferred upon him the sinecure of Tarring, Sussex, and he received the lectureship of Hackney, which he resigned in 1724. His principal writings are an edition of Lightfoot's Works, London, 1684, 2 vols.; Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, 1704, new ed., Oxford, 1843, 3 vols.; Life of Sir Thomas Smith, 1698; Life of Dr. John Aylmer, Bishop of London, 1701; Life of Sir John Cheke, 1705; Annals of the Reformation, 1709—31, 4 vols.; Life and Actions of Archbishop Grindal, 1710; Life and Letters of Archbishop Parker, 1711; Life and Acts of Archbishop Whitgift, 1718; Ecclesiastical Memoirs, 1721, 3 vols. The most important of these works, which have been a storehouse for modern historians of the Elizabethan period, is the Annals of the Reformation, which, as the author says in his dedication to the king, "commences at the happy accession of Queen Elizabeth to the throne, when the great and divine work was taken in hand again of removing the gross superstitions and errors of Rome which had been restored by Queen Mary." Strype was a diligent collector of materials, faithful and minute, but lacked skill of arrangement. The complete works of Strype were issued at Oxford, 1820-40, in 27 vols.

STUART, Moses, b. in Wilton, Conn., March 26, 1780; d. in Andover, Mass., Jan. 4, 1852, aged seventy-one years, nine months, and nine days. When a lad of but twelve years, he became absorbed in the perusal of Edwards on the Will. In his fifteenth year, entering an academy in Norwich, Conn., he learned the whole Latin grammar in three days, and then joined a class who had devoted several months to Latin studies. In May, 1797, having been under the careful tuition of Roger Minot Sherman, he was admitted as a sophomore to Yale College. Here his tastes were pre-eminent for the mathematics. At his graduation, in 1799, he delivered the salutatory oration, at that time the highest appointment awarded to the class. One year after leaving Yale he taught an academy in North Fairfield, Conn., and in the following year was principal of a high school at Danbury, Conn. Having pursued the study of the law, he was admitted to the bar in 1802, at Danbury. His fertile and versatile mind, his enthusiasm and prodigious memory, gave promise of eminent success in the legal profession. From his legal study at this time he derived signal advantage through life. A few weeks before his admission to the bar, he was called to a tutorship in the Latin of Ernesti, 4th ed. in 1842; Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1827—28, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1836, in 1 vol.); Hebrew Christomathy, 1829 (2d ed., 1832); Grammar of the New Testament Dialect, 2d ed., improved, 1834; Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 1832, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1835, in 1 vol.); Notes to Hug's Introduction, from the Latin of Ernesti, 1830; Hints on the Prophecies, 2d ed., 1842; Commentary on the Apocalypse, 1845, 2 vols., pp. 1008; Critical History and Defence of the Old Testament Canon, 1845; Translation of Roediger's Gesenius, 1846; Commentary on Daniel, 1850; Conscience and the Constitution, 1850; Commentary on Eccle-STUDITES.

In addition to the preceding works, he published fourteen pamphlets; thirty-four articles, containing fifteen hundred pages, in the American Biblical Repository, for the years 1851 to 1855; together with two hundred and forty pages, in the Bibliotheca Sacra; thirty-three important articles for other periodicals,—in all more than three thousand printed octavo pages.

STUDITES, Simeon, is mentioned as a monk in the famous monastery of Studium in Constantinople, and as author of a number of noticeable religious hymns. See MÜLLER (Studium con. Const., Leipzig, 1721) and LEOPHALLATIUS (De Symeonum scriptis, Paris, 1864), where another Simeon Studites, a theologian, and writer of homilies and hymns, is also mentioned.

STUDITES, Theodore, b. in Constantinople in 759; d. in the Island of Chalco, Nov. 11, 826. He became a monk in the monastery of Studium in 781, and in 794 its abbot. He was an ardent champion of image-worship, wrote tracts, poems, etc., in its defence, and was four times sent into exile by iconoclastic emperors. See JACOB STURM: Opera varia, Venice, 1728, especially part v.

STURM, Johann, b. at Sleida, in 1507; d. at Strassburg, in 1569. He was educated at Liège, and studied at Louvain. He then visited Paris, where he lectured on dialectics, after the method of Rudolph Agricola, and was in 1537 called to Strassburg, where he founded the celebrated gymnasium on humanist principles, completely discarding the scholastic methods. In Paris he had adopted the Reformation; and, as he was a man of tact and eloquence, he was often employed in the negotiations between Protestants and Romanists, and maintained to the end of his life a hope of their final reconciliation. Personally acquainted with Calvin and the French Reformers, he inclined towards the Reformed conception of the Lord's Supper. See the works of JAKOB STURM, in 1553, he was vehemently attacked by the Lutherans in Strassburg. After ten years' controversy, a consensus was brought about in 1563; but the disagreement broke forth again, and in 1561 Sturm was deposed from his office as rector of the gymnasium. See C. SCHMIDT: La vie et les travaux de Jean Sturm, Strassburg, 1855.

C. SCHMIDT.

STYLITES (from στύλος, "a pillar"), or PILLAR-SAINTS, are one of the most extreme forms of Christian asceticism; a class of anchorites who spent their life on the top of a pillar, never descending, always standing (protected from falling between his successor, Linus, and the abbot of ionly by a frail railing), exposed to the open air through Central Germany; studied in the cloister school of Fritzlar, and was ordained a priest there in 733. As he took a prominent part in the foundation of the monastery of Fulda, he was by Boniface made its first abbot, and under his rule the institution became very prosperous. But after the death of Boniface, in 754, conflicts arose between his successor, Lullus, and the abbot of Fulda, first concerning the possession of the remains of St. Boniface, and then concerning the administration of the property of the monastery. As internal troubles were added, Sturm was summoned before King Pepin, and banished to the Frankish Empire, that Pepin not only restored his thirteenth year, but forth the first time attended the assembly at the foot of the pillar, advised them, and he grew up as a shepherd; but when, in his thirteenth year, he for the first time attended service in a church, he was so completely overwhelmed, that he decided to leave his herds, and become a monk. He entered first a monastery in the vicinity of his home, where he spent two years, and then the monastery of St. Eusebonas, near Telida, where he spent ten years. But the asceticism of the monastery was not severe enough for him. He settled as anchoret at Telinessa, and one of the feats to which he trained himself was fasting for forty days in imitation of Moses and Elijah. He first lived in a hut; but the crowds of admirers which thronged around him disturbed him; and, in order to escape them, he ascended a column seventy-two feet high and four feet in diameter. On the top of that column he spent thirty years. From sundown to sunrise he meditated, generally bending for ward, sometimes standing, in regular alternation, without intermission: from sunrise to sundown he preached to the people assembled at the foot of the pillar, advised them, and gave them what spiritual aid he could. He wrote sharp letters to Theodosius II., Leo I., and the Empress Eudoxia, and his admonitions were followed; and when he died he was buried with all possible ecclesiastical and military pomp at Antioch. There was, indeed, something in his life, which though it seems almost monstrous to the eyes of our time, impressed his own time as truly great, and he found many imitators. Stylites are mentioned as far down as the twelfth century. Simeon Fulminatus, who was hurled from his pillar by a thunderbolt, lived from 1143 to 1180. The champion of the whole class was Alypius, who spent seventy years on his pillar. At one time it was almost a fashion among rich people to maintain a stylite on a magnificent pillar: at others, the religious life of the congregations was, no doubt, invigorated and purged by the example of the pillar-saint.

S. Francis, a learned and approved teacher of the order of the Jesuits; was b. at Grenada, Spain, Jan. 5, 1548; d. in Lisbon, Sept. 25, 1617. Following the desire of his parents, he began the study of law. Deeply impressed in his seventeenth year by a sermon of the Jesuit Noel made an excerpt from his works in two volumes, Geneva, 1730. The rich invention of his time and his order. Especially famous was his Defence of the Catholic and Apostolic Faith against the Errors of the Anglican Sect (Defens. Edti Cat. et Apost. contra errores anglicorum), 1618. He wrote the work against James I. of England, and at the suggestion of Paul V. Its main burden is, that the Pope has the right to depose and set up kings in virtue of his authority received from Peter. Applauded by Paul V. in a letter to its author, dated Sept. 9, 1613, it was burnt by the public hangman in front of St. Paul's, London; and by a decree of Parlia- ment it received a like treatment in Paris, June 26, 1614. See Descharmes' Latin Life of Suarez, Perggdnau, 1671; Alegamb: Bibl. Script. S. J., Antw., 1643; Werner: Suarez u. d. Scholastik d. letzten Jahrhunderte, Regensburg, 1861. A. Tertz.

SUBDEACON. The primitive church knew only two classes of officers, — leaders (protophorensis, proeminent, agnoscuntur, praebentur) and servants (diakonos); the former for the functions of worship, the latter for the administration of chariti- ties. But as the episcopate on one side developed from the deaconate to the episcopal chair, the second order shrank; or the subdeacon from the deaconate as the deaconate from the presbyterate, so, on the other, the sub- deaconate is a merely human institution (adsumtum caussa). Its existence in the middle of the third century in the churches of Italy and anterieur dates is proved by the letter of Pope Cornelius to Bishop Fabius of Antioch (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl. VI. 43) and by the letters of Cyprian (2, 3, 29, 30, etc.). In Spain it is first mentioned by the synod of Elvira 305 (can. 30); in the Orient, by the synod of Laodicea, 361 (can. 21-23). From Amalarius (De domin. offic. 1, 11) it appears, however, that in the middle of the ninth century it was not yet universally established. With respect to dignity it was reckoned among ordinates maiores; though all its offices were of a subor- dinate character, — guarding the tombs of the martyrs, the sacrifices of the Lord's Supper, etc. It came more ele- vated, however, when Gregory the Great extended the law of celibacy to its members, and when Urban II., in 1091, admitted them to competition for the episcopal chair. See Morinus: De sacris ordinationibus, iii. 12. E. Friesberg.

SUBINTRODUCTÉ is a term of canon law applied to women living in the houses of clerical persons for purposes of unchastity. When the unmarried state became identified with chastity, relations to subintroducté very soon sprang up, and gradually developed into actual concubinage. They were noticed by the councils of Elberius (305), Ancyra (314), Nicaea (225), etc., down to the Council of Trent (Sess. 25, cap. 14).

SUBLAPSARIANISM, a theory held by moder- ate Calvinists, according to which the fall of man was not decreed, though it was foreseen, by God; the purpose of that distinction being to avoid ascribing the origin of sin to God as the author of evil. Infall- aharism is the name of Sublapsarianism.

SUBORDINATIONISM. See Trinity.

SUCCESSION, Apostolical, means an unbroken series of ordination from the days of the apostles to our time. It is claimed, in the most absolute sense of the words, by the Roman-Catholic Church, which for that reason declares all other churches schismatic or heretic. But it is also claimed, though in a less dogmatic way, by the Greek, the Syrian, the Coptic, and the Armenian churches, and by various Protestant churches, especially the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

Theodore of Mopsuestia (2 Kings xvii. 30) as the name of some deity, whose worship the Babylonian settlers in Samaria are said to have set up on their arrival in that country. Opinions vary as to its meaning. (1) According to the connection and according to the ancient versions (Septuagint, Vulgate, Arabic, Syrian, Targum), it is the name of an idol. According to the rabbins it was a goddess under the form of a hen and chickens: others regard it as an astronomical emblem of the Babylonians. A third opinion is this, that it denotes the Mylitta. Hengstenberg's view is, that it means "the daughters of the goddess Mylitta, whose images were contained in small tabernacles, where they were worshipped with others." With this view he approaches (2) the more general one, that it denotes "the booths in which the daughters of the Babylonians prostituted themselves in honor of their idol (i.e., Mylitta). Thenius, who mediates between these two main views, says that the original meaning of Succoth-Benoth was booths, in which the daughters or the servants of Mylitta prostituted themselves in her honor; but the word was later pronounced as one, and was used to denote the name of the deity which was worshipped in the booths. Thus, according to the connection, and according to the Septuagint, some special idol was meant.

LUYER.

SUDAILI, Stephanus Bar, a monophysite monk, who lived about 500, first at Edessa, and after on the basis of a pantheistic interpretation of the theology of Bar Sudaili according to the rabbins it was a goddess under the name of Hierotheus, the famous predecessor of Pseudo-Dionysius. As there is some connection, and according to the Septuagint, some special idol was meant.

SULZER, Simon, b. at Interlaken, Sept. 22, 1508; d. at Basel, June 22, 1585. He grew up under very humble circumstances, but was enabled by the support of the government of Bern to study at Basel and Strassburg. After he finished his studies, he spent ten years in reconstructing the schools in the canton of Bern, and was in 1549 appointed preacher at Basel, and professor of theology. In the controversy between the Swiss and the German Reformers concerning the Lord's Supper, he occupied a peculiar position, as he held the views of Luther, and openly labored for their introduction in Switzerland.

SUMMERFIELD, John, Methodist-Episcopal; b. in Preston, Eng., Jan. 31, 1798; d. in New York City, June 13, 1852. He was the son of a Wesleyan local preacher, but educated at the Moravian Academy at Fairfield, near Manchester, was sent into business at Liverpool; removed to Dublin, 1813; was converted in 1817, and next year became a local Wesleyan minister. In 1819 he was received on trial in the Methodist Conference of Ireland, and in March, 1821, having emigrated to America, in the New-York Conference. He leaped into astonishing popularity by reason of his eloquence. In 1822 he preached in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, everywhere listened to by great crowds; but in June of that year his health gave way. He spent the winter of 1822-23 in France; returned to New York, April 1824, but was unable again to do full work. He was a founder of the American Tract Society. He published only one sermon; but in 1842, at New York, many of his Sermons and Sketches of Sermons were published. His life was written by J ohn Holland, New York, 1850, 21 ed., 1850, and William M. Wyl- lert, Philadelphia, 1857.

SUMMERS, Thomas Osmond, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Methodist minister, professor of systematic theology in Vanderbilt University, and general book editor of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. near Carlisle, Isle of Purbeck, Dorsetshire, Eng, Oct. 11, 1812; d. at Nash- ville, Tenn., May 5, 1882. His parents, James and Sarah Summers, died when he was quite young, leaving him to the foster care of a grand- aunt. While yet a youth he came to America, and settled in Baltimore. His parents being independents, his early religious training and reading were Calvinistic. Not being satisfied with the teachings of that system, and knowing no other, he was fast drifting, as he writes, into scepticism and infidelity, when some one to whom he was dear became a local Wesleyan minister. In 1819 he was received on trial in the Methodist Conference. In Gen. i.16 the sun is called shemesh; but in poetry chamotih. SUMNER, John Bird, D.D., b. at Kenilworth, Warwickshire, 1780; educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; assistant master at Eaton, rector of Maple Durham, 1820-28; canon of Durham, 1829; bishop of Chester, 1829; arch- bishop of Canterbury, 1848; d. in London, Sept. 6, 1862. He was the leader of the “evangelical party” in the Church of England, and earnestly opposed to Romanism and the Oxford movement. His primacy covered the restoration of “Catholic hierarchy” to England, the “Essays and Reviews” controversy, and the revival of the synodical power of the convocations. His publications include Apostolic Preaching, considered in an Examination of St. Paul’s Epistles, London, 1815, 9th ed., 1850; Records of the Creation, 1816, 2 vols., 7th ed., 1850; Evidence of Christianity, 1824, 9th ed., 1861; Practical Exposition [of the New Testa- ment], 1832, 4th ed., at which the Methodist-Episcopal Church South was organ- ized. In 1846 he was appointed by the General Conference to assist the late Bishop (then Dr.) Wightman as editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, published at Charleston, S.C. While here, he started, and edited for four years, the Sunday-School Visitor. At the organization of the Southern Church he was elected general book editor, which office he continued to fill with emi- nent ability and with great acceptability till his death. In the season of the latter three hundred volumes. In 1855 he moved to Nash- ville, Tenn., where the publishing-house was located, and where he continued to reside until he died. He was chairman of the committee that compiled the hymn-book, which he edited. He was considered an authority in hymnology, hav- ing devoted much time to its study. He was for many years editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, and of the Quarterly Review of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. At the organi- zation of Vanderbilt University he was elected professor of systematic theology; which position he retained until he became also dean of the theological faculty. He died, after only two days illness, during the quadrennial session, in Nash- ville, of the General Conference, where for the tenth consecutive time he had been elected and was acting as secretary. Surrounded by his brethren and colleagues, he died, as he had wished, at the post of duty, in the midst of his labors, ceasing at once to work and live. Possessed of encyclopedic knowledge, always abreast of the times, thoroughly Wesleyan and Arminian in his creed, but in hearty sympathy with all evange- lical denominations of Christians, simple as a child in faith, consecrated, earnest, outspoken, an uncompromising enemy of sin and error in what- ever form, he was an ornament to Christianity and an honor to the church of his choice.

Dr. Summers is the author of the following works: Commentary on the Gospels, Acts, and Romans, in 6 vols.; Commentary on the Ritual of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; Christian Holiness; Baptism; Golden Censer; The Sunday-School Teacher, or the Catechetical Office of the Church; Seasons, Months, and Days; Talks Pleasant and Profitable; Refutation of the Theological Works of Paine; Way of Salvation; and some twenty other books and pamphlets on religious, mora- l and practical subjects. SUN, Worship of the. The common Hebrew name for sun is shemesh; but in poetry chamotih and cheres are used. In Gen. i. 16 the sun is called the greater light, and is to serve, in conjunction with the moon, “to rule the day” (Gen. i. 14; Ps. cxix. 8; Jer. xxxii. 35) and the year; i.e., the solar year. It was originally believed that the sun was created by God (Ps. lxxxix. 4; Gen. i.), but is always under his command. In the end of the day the earth hath set a tabernacle for the sun (Ps. xix. 4; Hab. iii. 11); from thence he appoints his way (Ps. civ. 19), or “commandeth, and it riseth not” (Job ix. 7), and at his command the sun stands still (Job xix. 12; 2 Kings xx. 11). He, and not the sun, is the God Sabaoth: before his glory the sun is no more light (Isa. ix. 19; Job xxv. 5). This is especially the case before the judgment of God (Joel ii. 31, iii. 15; Isa. xiii. 28, xlix. 10; Rev. vii. 16). Even poetical personification praises God (Ps. civ. 19, cxlviii. 3; Job xv. 15, 16). When this sun shall be ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his glory the sun is no more light (Isa. xxiv. 23). As the sun was called into existence, there will also be once a time when it shall shine no more (Matt. xxiv. 29; Luke xxiii. 45; Rev. vi. 12, viii. 12, 1x. 2, xxi. 23, xxii. 5). But the same God will make the light of the sun sevenfold (Isa. xxx. 20). The sun is also spoken of in scripture in a figurative sense. Thus the sun is used to express the image of the ruler (2 Sam. xxiii. 4), especially of his lasting government (Ps. lxxxix. 36, 37). The glory of the righteous is compared to the sun (Judg. v. 31), also the divine protection (Ps. lxxxiv. 11; Isa. lx. 20). The benefit, glory, and purity of righteousness is called the “Sun of righteousness” (Mal. iv. 2). Like brightness, the salvation of Zion and Jerusalem goes forth (Isa. lxii. 1). The sun is also the image of moral purity (Cant. vi. 10). Thus we read (Matt. xxi. 43) that “the righteous shall shine forth as the sun.” But the sun is also the image of destruction (Ps. cxvi. 6; Job xxx. 25, xlix. 10; Rev. vii. 16). Even poetical personifications are found in the Bible. Thus, when the sun praises God (Ps. civ. 10, cxvi. 3; Job xv. 16, xxv. 5, xxxvi. 8, 7), or when the sun comes out of his chamber like a bridegroom, “ and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race” (Ps. xix. 5). But there will be a time when the sun shall be ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously” (Isa. xxv. 23).

Worship of the Sun among the Israelites.—To worship the sun was expressly forbidden (Deut. xvii. 3). This worship, which commenced during the Assyrian period, was abolished by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 3, 11; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4). It consisted in burning incense on the house-tops, in dedication of chariots and horses to the sun (Jer. xix. 13; Zeph. i. 5), in adorations directed towards the rising sun (Ezek. viii. 10), in lamentations of the women for Tammuz (Ezek. vii. 14).

Worship of the Sun among the Adjacent Heathen Nations.—The worship of the sun as the most prominent and powerful agent in the kingdom of nature was widely diffused throughout the countries adjacent to Palestine. This worship was either direct, without the intervention of any statue or symbol, or indirect. Among the Egyptians the sun was worshipped under the title of Re. The chief seat was On (sun, light), the Greek, Helipolis, and Hebrew, Beth-shemesh, i.e., the house of the sun (Jer. xxxii. 13). To the temple at On belonged very many learned priests, one of whom became the father-in-law of Joseph (Gen. xlii. 45). In the Roman calendar the first day of the month was dedicated to Fides, as Amun-rea, “the king of all the gods,” and which belonged Khonah-Hercules, the god of the pillars of the sun. The sun-god of the third order was Osiris. Among the Phœnicians the sun was worshipped under the title of Baal. At Tyre, Gaza, and Carthage, human sacrifices were offered to him. Among the Chaldæans the sun was worshipped under the title of Tammuz; and that the Arabiana worshipped the sun we know from Theophrastus (De plant., 5, 4, 5) and Strabo (16, 784). Still more propagated was the worship of the sun among the Syrians (Arames). Famous temples were at Heliopolis, Emessa, Palmyra, Hierapolis. Sun-worship there was very old, and direct from the beginning; and even in later times, sun and moon were worshipped at Hierapolis without the intervention of any image (Lucian: De Dea Syria, cap. 34, p. 904). Among the pure Semites, or Aryans, direct worship to the sun was paid from the beginning, and still later. Thus among the Assyrians, and afterwards among the Persians, whose sun-worship is one and the same. The idolatrous sun-worship of the Israelites, which once the time of Ahaz is mentioned in connection with the worship of the moon and stars, first originated from the Assyrians. The dedication of chariots and horses to the sun (2 Kings xxiii. 11) we also find among the Persians (Herod., 1. 189; Xenoph., Cyrop., 5, 3, 6; Quint. Curtius, 3, 3). Besides that the Persians offered to the sun (Herod., 1. 31), they also directed their adoration towards the rising sun with branches in their hands (Zend Avesta, ii. 204; Herod., iv. 15, 1; HYDE: De relig. Persarum, 350). Up to this day the Parsees worship the sun. The Manicheans also adopted the sun-worship from the Persians, referring it, however, to Christ (DUPUY: Orig. de cultes, v. 244, vi. 267). In later times the sun was worshipped among the Persians under the form of Mithras, which finally became the Sol Dei ictivus throughout the West, especially through the Romans.

The Sun in the Christian Church and Art.—The Mithras-worship even exercised its influence upon the fixing of the Christian Christmas-festival in December. As the new birth of the sun-god was celebrated at the end of December, so, likewise, in Christ the new sun in the field of spiritual life was adored. Many Christian writers of older times speak of Christ as the sun of eternal salvation, to which the visible sun, with moon and stars, form the chorus (CREUZER: Symbolik, ii. 221, iv. 465 [1st ed.]). For the representation of the sun in Christian art, comp. PIFFR: Mythologie der christl. Kunst, i. 2, 110.

SUNDAY (Dies solis, of the Roman calendar, “day of the sun,” because dedicated to the sun), the first day of the week, was adopted by the early Christians as a day of worship. The “sun” of Latin adoration they interpreted as the “Sun of righteousness.” Sunday was emphatically the weekly feast of the resurrection of Christ, as the Jewish sabbath was the feast of the creation. It was called the “Lord’s Day,” and upon it the primitive church assembled to break bread (Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2). No regulations for its observance are laid down in the New Testament, nor, indeed, is its observance even enjoined; yet Christian feeling led to the universal adoration of the day, in imitation of apostolic precedent. In the second century its observance was universal.
SUNDAY LEGISLATION.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION.

The institution of a weekly religious rest-day has existed, and its observance has been the subject of legislation, from very early times. Traces of such laws are found among the remains of Chaldaean antiquity. The Assyrians had laws for the observance of their sabbath similar to those by which the sabbath was maintained among the Jews. Civil legislation in behalf of the observance of Sunday, as distinguished from ecclesiastical or purely religious ordinances, commenced with the famous statute of Constantine (321): "On the venerable day of the sun let all magistrates and people residing in the cities rest, and let all workshops be closed. In the country, however, persons engaged in agriculture may freely and lawfully continue their labor, because it often happens that another day is not so suitable for grain-sowing or for vine-planting, lest, by neglecting the proper moment for such operations, the bounty of Heaven be lost."

Constantine subsequently prohibited lawsuits on Sunday, while expressly permitting such legal acts as the manumission of slaves and the visitation of prisoners. Theodotus the Great (386) prohibited the transaction of business on Sunday, as well as the shows or spectacles which had become customary on that day among the heathen Romans; to which succeeding emperors added the proscription of business and labor on Sunday. Leo and Anthemius (469) provided that "the Lord's Day be exempt from all compulsory process; let no summons urge any man; let no one be required to give security for the payment of a fund held by him in trust; let the sergeants of the courts be silent; let the pleader cease his labors; let that day be a stranger to trials; be the crier's voice unheard; let the litigants have breathing-time and an interval of truce; let the rival disputants have an opportunity of meeting without fear, of comparing the arrangements made in their names, and of working out a compromise. If any officer of the courts, under pretence of public or private business, dares to despise these enactments, let his patrimony be forfeited."

These Roman laws are important as forming the basis of the English legislation on this subject, and consequently of the American Sunday laws.

The Lord's Day was embodied in the capitularies, or general statutes, of the Frank emperors; and its observance, as prescribed by canonical authority, was enforced by severe penalties. During the French Revolution of the last century, when the Christian calendar was abolished, and the decade substituted for the week, each tenth day was made a rest-day, and its observance enforced by laws (17 Thermidor, An. vi.) which required the public offices, schools, workshops, stores, etc., to be closed, and prohibited sales except of food and medicine, and public labor except in the country during seed-time and harvest. On the restoration of the Gregorian calendar, Sunday was recognized in the Code Napoleon. A law of 1814 prohibited traffic, ordinary labor, etc., on Sundays and certain church festivals. In 1880 this law was repealed; a provision for the suspension of certain civil and judicial functions on Sunday, and in regard to the employment on that day of young children and minor girls in factories, alone remaining.

In England, Sunday laws have existed from a very early date. Ina, king of the West Saxons (about 680), forbade servile work on Sunday. Alfred (876) prohibited work, traffic, and legal proceedings. His example was followed in subsequent reigns. Edgar (968) prohibited "heathenish songs and diabolical sports," and markets and county courts, and made Sunday to begin at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, and to last till Monday morning light." The laws of Canterbury (1028-35) strongly insisted on the observance of the Lord's Day; prohibiting marketing, hunting, and the holding of the local courts, except in case of great necessity. After the Conquest, the tendency to greater strictness in the Sunday laws continued.

The statute of 28 Edward III. (1354) forbade the showing of 20ths at the market-town. The 12 Richard II. (1388) forbade servants and laborers to play at tennis and other games, yet ordered them to have bows and arrows, and use them the same on Sundays. The statute of 4 Edward IV. (1464) forbade cordwainers and cobblers to sell shoes on Sunday. Under Henry VI. the holding of fairs and markets on Sunday was prohibited. The laws of 5 and 6 Edward VI., prohibiting "lawful bodily labor" on Sundays, allowed husbandmen, fishermen, and others to work in harvest or at any other time where necessary required. This act was formally revived under James I. Subsequently (1614) James I. issued The Book of Sports, allowing after divine service on Sundays certain games.
and recreations, but expressly refusing this liberty to “Papists and Puritans.” The issuing of The Book of Sports created intense dissatisfaction, and it soon became a dead letter. Parliament, in the first year of Charles I., passed an act “for the strict observance of Sunday;” and another law of Parliament in 1627 (3 Car. 1.) enacted that no carriers,engers, or drovers, should travel on Sunday. In 1633 Charles I., under the sup-poused influence of Laud, re-issued his father’s Book of Sports.

The statute of 29 Charles II. (1676) is the most important of the English laws on this subject, as that which, with some modifications, is still the law of the land, and which, as being in force at the time of the American Revolution, gave more or less color to the laws of the American Colonies and States. It prohibits on Sunday all worldly labor or business except works of necessity or charity, the public sale of goods, the travelling or recreations, but expressly refusing this liberty of dropping, or setting, the dress of meats in families, and its sale in inns and eating-shops, and the crying of milk before nine A.M., and after four P.M.

The early American colonists brought with them the observance of Sunday both as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforced this observance by law. The early laws of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Georgia, South Carolina, and Virginia, required attendance at church.
The Massachusetts law (1782) provided that such attendance was not required where there was no place of worship which the person could consciously attend. But, as the separation between Church and State became better understood, the Sunday laws were modified in conformity with this principle. The legislatures and courts have carefully distinguished between Sunday observance as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforce only the latter. The laws of the several States differ in minor details, but are alike in their main features. They forbid on Sunday com-labor and traffic, except in cases of necessity and mercy, public and noisy amusements, and whatever is likely to disturb the quiet and good order of the day. They make Sunday a non-legal day, when legal processes may not be served, nor the courts and legislatures sit. In many of the States some exception is made in favor of those who observe the seventh day of the week.
In Louisiana — which before its admission was under the Code Napoleon, and where alone, of all the States, the common law is not in force — Sunday is merely recognized by law as a public holiday. In many of the States there are also laws, with special penalties, against the selling of intoxicating drinks on Sundays and election-days.
The Federal Constitution provides that Sunday shall not be reckoned in the ten days within which the President may return a bill; and the Federal laws relieve the cadets of the military and naval academies from their studies on Sunday; and in theexcise statutes distilling on Sunday is prohibited under a fine of one thousand dollars.

The first Sunday law of the United States has been frequently affirmed by the highest courts of the several States, upon such grounds as the following: the right of all classes, so far as practicable, to rest one day in seven; the right to undisturbed worship, on the day set apart for this purpose, by the great majority of the people; the decent respect which should be paid to the religious institutions of the people; the value to the State itself of the Sunday observance, as a means of that public intelligence and morality on which free institutions are founded.

The spirit of modern Sunday laws is protection, not coercion. The need of civil intervention, especially to secure to the working-classes the seventh-day rest, becomes more and more imperative with the growth of industries and of the desire for rapid wealth. In evidence of this may be mentioned the petition, hitherto ineffectual, of working-men in Germany, for the help of legislation in obtaining a weekly rest-day. The Social-labor party of Germany, at their meeting at Gotha in 1857, announced as one of their demands in the present exigencies of society the prohibition of Sunday work.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS. — A Sunday school is an assembly of persons on the Lord’s Day for the study of the Bible, moral and religious instruction, and the worship of the true God. It is a method of training the young and the ignorant in the duties we owe to God and to our neighbor.
As the family and the church are institutions of divine appointment, so the Sunday school has been approved by divine blessings.

1. Biblical Authority and Form. — Godly instruction of the young and the ignorant has been in harmony with the divine government from the earliest history of the race. Although the word “school” does not occur in the Bible previous to the Babylonian captivity, instruction after the school method was clearly known and practiced from very early times; and not long after the captivity, no less than eleven different expressions for “school” were current in the Hebrew speech.
Glimpses of the essential features of the school method appear in the early era of biblical history.
In patriarchal times the school, like the church,
was in the family: the father was the teacher and the priest. Omitting a notice of the faithful religious instruction of the young by Abraham, Job, Jacob, Moses, and other patriarchs, and passing over the public training of children indicated by the passover service, by the reading of the law from Gerizim and Ebal in Joshua’s time, and by the so-called schools of the prophets in the days from Samuel to Elijah, as well as the royal commission sent out by Jehoshaphat to re-establish religious instruction, and a similar movement in the time of Josiah, it will be sufficient here to notice simply the day law school which gathered the people with the children, requiring the priests as teachers to explain the meaning of the law of God, not unlike the instruction in the modern Sunday school (Neh. viii. 7, 8). See also John Knox and the HEBREWS.

In the New Testament period, religious schools connected with the synagogue were found in every city and considerable village in the land. These schools were one branch of an extended system of religious instruction. Lightfoot finds four kinds of schools teaching among the Jews: (1) The elementary schools in the time of Christ's ministry; (2) The teaching of the synagogue; (3) The higher schools, as of Hillel and Shammai; and (4) The Sanhedrin, or great school, as well as great judicatory, of the nation. Some have questioned the prevalence of the elementary schools in the time of Christ's childhood; but, according to the Talmud, synagogue schools were of earlier origin, and had become common. They used the Hebrew scriptures, and, later, little parchment rolls prepared for children. The Mishna says, "At five years of age let children begin the Scripture, at ten the Mishna, and at thirteen let them be subjects of the law." These children were required to come with clean hands and faces, and, later, little arment rolls prepared in parts of the Bible in verse, Jewish antiquities, sacred poems, and dialogues. The Sixth General Council at Constantinople (A.D. 680) required presbyters in town counties and villages to hold schools to teach all such children as were sent to them, taking no reward nor any thing therefor, except the parents made them a voluntary present. The Second Council at Chalons likewise required bishops to set up schools giving instruction in the Scriptures. In view of the missionary aim, and the graded and comprehensive instruction of these schools, it might be an interesting problem for a modern scholar to define important features of the present system not to be found in these primitive Bible schools. See Catechetics.

3. Sunday Schools of the Reformation Period. — Luther founded regular catechetical instruction on Sundays as early as 1529, and this custom spread wherever the Reformation gained a foothold. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, had a system of schools 1560–84, almost identical in form with the present Sunday school.

Children were gathered in two divisions, — boys and girls, subdivided into smaller groups or classes, with a minister for each class, aided by a layman for boys and a matron for girls. These schools were introduced into all the churches of his diocese, and are continued on much the same plan now, but without the Bible. The labors of Spener, Francke, Zinzendorf, and the English Reformers, further prepared the way for the modern Sunday-school system. Legions of persons and places claim to have had Sunday schools previous to those in Gloucester. Among the many worthy of recognition, only the few following can be noted. Sunday schools were founded in Scotland about 1560, by John Knox; in Bath, Eng., 1650–68, by Joseph Alleine, author of "Alleine's Alarm!" in Roxbury, Mass., 1674; Plymouth, Mass., 1650; in England, by Bishop Frampton, about 1693; in Glasgow, Scotland, about 1707; in Bethlehem, Conn., 1740, by Dr. Joseph Bellamy; in Ephrata, Penn., 1739–40, by Ludwig Hacker, a school continuing for thirty years with gratuitous instruction, children's meetings, and having many revivals; at Brechin, Scotland, 1760, by Mr. Blair; at Catterick, 1768, by Rev. Theophylactus Linzey; at Frampton, 1693, by Miss Harrison; at Waldbach, 1767, by Oberlin; at High Wycombe, 1769, by Hannah Ball; at Bright Pariah, County Down, Ireland, 1770–78, by Dr. Kennedy; in Bohemia, 1773, by Kindermann; at Bolton, Eng., 1775, by James Heyes; at Macclesfield, Eng., by Rev. David Simpson, 1778.

4. Modern Sunday Schools. — Sunday schools like those just noted were sporadic; there was need for a popular and general movement, bringing them into affiliation with each other, if not into an organized system. Of this movement, Robert Raikes is justly regarded as the founder. He was a citizen of Gloucester, Eng., and proprietor of the Gloucester Journal. Business calling him into the suburbs of that city in 1780, where many youth were employed in the pin and other factories, his heart was touched by the groups of ragged, wretched, and cursing children. He encouraged them to attend school and required an exacting instruction in reading and in the Catechism such children as should be sent to them on Sunday. The children were required to come with clean hands and faces, and hair combed, and with such clothing as they had. They were to stay from ten to twelve, then to go home; to return at one, and after a lesson to be conducted to church; after church to repeat portions of the Catechism; to go home at five quietly, without playing in the streets. Diligent scholars received rewards of Bibles, Testaments, books, candies, shoes, and clothing: the teachers were paid a shilling a day. Raikes published a brief notice of his efforts in the Gloucester Journal, Nov. 3, 1783 (copied into the London papers), and, later, another notice in the Gentleman's Magazine of London, which attracted wide attention.
William Fox, already interested in the improvement of the moral condition of London youth, saw the notice, opened a correspondence with Raikes, urged the plan at public meetings, and with the aid of Jonas Hanway, Henry Thornton, and other philanthropists, formed the Society for Promoting Sunday Schools throughout the British Dominisions, Sept. 7, 1785. From 1785 to 1800 the society expended about four thousand pounds for teachers' wages. The scheme commended itself to popular esteem. Learned laymen and influential persons became its warm friends. Among them were Mr. (afterwards Bishop) Horne, Bishop Porteous, the Bishops of Salisbury and Llandaff, Rev.
Thomas Scott, the poet Cowper, Adam Smith, the Wesleys, and Whitefield. If, however, met with determined opposition from professors of religion, who questioned its usefulness. The then Bishop of Rochester violently attacked the movement, and the Archbishop of Canterbury found the bishops together to see what could be done to stop it.
In Scotland, sabbath-school teaching by laymen was declared to be an innovation, and a breach of the Fourth Commandment. Sunday schools continued to multiply, however, in face of opposition, rapidly extending throughout England, Scotland, Ireland, upon the Continent, and in America. Though the Gloucester schools founded by Raikes died out in a few years, they were replaced by others instituted on an improved plan. Following a meeting at Philadelphia, Dec.
19, 1790, attended by Bishop White, Dr. Rush, William Fox, and others, the First-Day or Sunday-school Society, was formed Jan. 11, 1791, to give religious instruction to poor children on Sunday. Like the British society, it employed paid teachers. It spent about four thousand dollars in support of schools between 1791 and 1800. As early as 1791 it urged the Legislature of Pennsylvania to establish free schools.
This society still continues its usefulness, granting to needy schools in Philadelphia books and other religious publications. It has expended in these donations about thirty-five thousand dollars.

The schools of Raikes, and those of the British society and the First-Day Society of Phila-adelphia, employed paid teachers. Their chief aim was to reach, not the children of church-members, but of the poor and of those who neglected the church. The schools they established were purely mission Sunday schools. But paid teachers made the work more regular and efficiently limited in usefulness. Next to founding these schools, the most important step was the securing of instruction by unpaid teachers. Sir Charles Reed says that Oldham, Eng., claims to have had the first Sunday-school teacher who declined to receive pay, and began the gratuitous instruction. John Wesley in 1787 speaks of Sunday schools at Bolton, Eng., "having eighty masters who received no pay but what they received from the great Master." In the famous Stockport Sunday school in 1794, only six of its thirty teachers were paid.
In 1790 the Methodist Conference at Charleston,
S.C., directed that schools for whites and blacks, with voluntary teachers. A Sunday school for Indian children was opened in Stockbridge, N.Y., in 1792, by a sister of Occom, the noted Indian preacher. The children working in a cotton-factory. In Passaic County, N.J., were given gratuitous instruction in a Sunday school in 1794; and Samuel Slater had a similar one for his factory-operators in Pawtucket, R.I., 1797. W. B. Gurney introduced gratuitous instruction into several Sunday schools in London, Eng., about 1796. He also used questions on Scripture-texts, and urged improved methods in a letter to the Evangelical Society of London, which early provided literature for Sunday schools. Gratuitous instruction speedily became a popular feature in the scheme, and in a short time was generally substituted for the earlier plan of paid teachers.

Though the growth of the system had been remarkable before, so that, within five years after the beginning by Raikes, it was estimated that 250,000 scholars were enrolled in the schools then established, yet this new feature of voluntary teachers gave it a fresh impetus by adapting it to the needs of the poorest community in city or country. In America the movement was promoted by the visit of Mrs. Graham and Mrs.
Bethune to England, who founded schools in New York on their return in 1803, and by the visit to Philadelphia of the Rev. Robert May, a missionary from London, in 1811, who had specimens of reward-tickets, and urged improved
methods in a letter to the Evangelical Society of London, which early provided literature for Sunday schools.

The rapid growth of Sunday schools, the American Sunday-school Union estimated that in 1827 the number of scholars enrolled in the Sunday schools of the different countries was 1,350,000. According to the census of 1851 the number attending Sunday schools in England and Wales was 2,407,- 642; in Scotland, 292,549. The number reported for Ireland in the returns of the Sunday-school Society, and by other authorities, was 272,112;
making the total for 1851 in Great Britain and Ireland, including the British Isles, 2,987,980. The total estimated number of schools for England, Wales, and Ireland, for the same year, was 32,498, and of teachers, 326,450. The number of Sunday-school scholars in America at the same period was estimated at about 3,000,000. In 1861-62 the number of Sunday schools in Ireland was 3,235, teachers 25,502, scholars 275,900; while a competent authority estimates the total catechetical instruction in Roman-Catholic parishes in Ireland at 800,000. In 1862 J. Inglis estimated the Sunday schools in Scotland had 40,000 teachers and 460,000 scholars. A competent Welsh authority in the same year states that 26.4 per cent of its population were in Sunday school, which would give a membership for Wales of about 295,000; and W. H. Watson of London claimed that there were nearly 300,000 teachers and 3,000,000 scholars in the Sunday schools of one country and, counting one for the United Continential Mission in 1881 gave in the United States in 1883 the number reported at the Raikes centenary in 1880 for England and Wales was 422,222 teachers and 3,000,000 scholars, and, for the world, 1,559,823 teachers and 13,063,523 scholars. These statistics were gathered by voluntary organizations, and, though not giving satisfaction as to accuracy and completeness, are the best issued. (See statistics at end of this article.) A government census of Sunday schools was commenced in the United States in 1880, but was not completed. A tentative compilation of its reports showed upwards of 91,000 schools in this country.
SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

Nor do numbers alone indicate the immense growth of Sunday schools. The great improvement in the modes of instruction, which will be treated in another paragraph; the beautiful and costly buildings, the ample, airy rooms with glass partitions, carpeted floors, fountains, flowers, and cushioned seats, for the accommodation of these schools in America, as compared with the dark and dingy apartments first provided; the wide enlistment of the ablest talent in the country in teaching, and also in providing lesson-helpers and literature; the suitable grading of instruction; the substantial settlement of the right principles of religious education; the clear definition of the place of the Sunday school, not as a thing separate and apart from the church, but as all Christians at work teaching or learning the Lord's message to his church; the remarkable and constant influence this widespread instruction has had in lessening vice and crime, in diffusing a saving and greater familiarity with the Bible text, in imparting a greater knowledge, and all of these are forcible illustrations of the wonderful growth of this Christian institution in modern times.

Foreign Societies. — It is impossible, in this brief space to notice the many Sunday-school societies and organizations which have been formed to promote this cause. A brief description of some of the earlier and more important societies will illustrate the work conducted by all. The London Sunday-School Union — which was formed in 1803, for the improvement of teachers, the extension of Sunday schools, and to supply the various local Sabbath-school unions with suitable literature at reduced prices — is sustained by members of different evangelical denominations, and conducted by a general committee of fifty-four, divided into various sub-committees. The members of the committee render their services gratuitously. It did not in its early history employ missionaries, but aimed to accomplish its object through the formation of local unions in Great Britain, more particularly in England, and also through affiliated schools. Influenced by the example of the American Sunday-school Union, it employed a missionary in the north of England for some years, but at his death, in 1837, discontinued the effort in England. For the last fifteen or twenty years it has aided in supporting missionaries on the Continent for the establishment of Sunday schools in the various countries of Europe, and has expended in this field a sum of money regularly in thousands annually for the past few years. Its chief work for eighty years has been the improvement of schools, the publication and distribution of juvenile religious literature, and the collection of Sunday-school statistics. It has on its catalogue a large number of books and publications, which it furnishes to schools connected with the society, in special cases, at from one-half to one-third regular prices. The amount of its grants for 1883 was £2,974; its affiliated schools numbered 5,286, having 123,599 teachers and 1,182,199 scholars. Over 16,000 scholars from its schools united with churches in 1883. In London 58 per cent, and in the country 81 per cent, of scholars were church-members; and 88 per cent of the teachers were former scholars in the schools. It maintains a circulating library, a museum, a reading-room, Hebrew and Greek classes, teachers' meetings, and still sustains one of the best Sunday-school examinations for teachers and scholars.

A sabbath-school society was formed in Edinburgh in 1797, and one for the support of Gaelic schools to teach the Scriptures, in 1811. These employed paid teachers; later, voluntary teachers were introduced. The labors of Stowe and James Gall brought important improvements in the modes of instruction. The formation of various local Sabbath-school unions at Edinburgh and Glasgow, the adoption of schools in the churches, holding conventions, employing missionaries, and the adoption of juvenile services, mark the progress of the work in Scotland. The Sunday-school Society for Ireland was formed in 1809. Among its publications, Hints on Conducting Sunday Schools had a wide sale, and was reprinted in America. The Church of England Sunday-school Institute began training classes and institutes for Sunday-school teachers in 1844; and still sustains one of the best Sunday-school magazines issued. In 1881 it had returns from 8,405 parishes, representing 16,498 Sunday schools, 113,412 teachers, and 1,289,273 scholars. Estimating the same average membership for the 6,064 parishes not reporting, it computed the total number of scholars in England and Wales connected with the Church of England as about 2,220,000, and of teachers about 195,500. The Wesleyans of Great Britain formed a Sunday-school Union in 1874. The total number of Wesleyan Methodist Sunday schools in Great Britain and Ireland, according to their report for 1882, is 6,488; teachers and officers, 122,999; scholars, 829,666; library books, 781,176. The various Ragged School societies are efficient in promoting the cause in their respective fields. On the Continent, the Dutch, French, German, Swiss, and Italian Sunday-school societies are growing in importance, and the school system of instruction was largely due to the efforts of Albert Woodruff of New York, about 1864, and, later, of the several missionaries of the London Union.

American Societies. — The First-Day or Sunday...
SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

School Society of Philadelphia, formed in 1791, has been noticed. As early as 1808 the Evangelical Society was formed for promoting sabbath-evening schools in Philadelphia with voluntary teachers. The New-York Female Sunday-school Union and the New-York Male Sunday-school Union were formed in 1816, at the suggestion of Eleazar Lord, who had observed the working of the Sunday-school system in Philadelphia. The Sunday and Adult School Union in Philadelphia was formed in 1817, to unite all the Sunday and adult associations in that city and vicinity. In 1821 it employed a missionary, who organized upward of sixty schools. It also issued a large number of Scripture tickets, cards, tracts, and small reward-books. After seven years of marked efficiency and usefulness, it, with other similar unions, was merged in a national society, — the American Sunday-school Union, in 1824. The Adult Union was at that time the largest society of the kind in the country, having auxiliaries in all the States, with over 700 schools and 50,000 scholars. The object of the American Sunday-school Union, as stated at its formation, "is to concentrate the efforts of sabbath-school societies in different sections of our country, to strengthen the hands of friends of pious instruction on the Lord's Day, to disseminate useful information, to circulate moral and religious publications in every part of the land, and to endeavor to plant a Sunday school wherever there is a population.

Twenty-one years later, when its charter was obtained, it states the object: "to establish and maintain Sunday schools, and to publish and circulate moral and religious publications." It is an undenominational society, conducted by representative laymen from different evangelical denominations; employs missionaries, lay and ministerial; and clergymen likewise cooperate in its work as editors, secretaries, and literary contributors. The first year it reported 321 auxiliaries, 1,150 affiliated schools, 11,295 teachers, 82,697 scholars; and it estimated the number of Sunday-school scholars in the world at over 1,000,000. Among the more important achievements of the Union, or promoted by this Union are the employment of missionaries to form Sunday schools; a world's concert of prayer (monthly) for Sunday schools; a system of selected uniform lessons in 1826; the Mississippi Valley scheme for planting Sunday schools throughout that region in 1830; a teachers' magazine (monthly) in 1824, and a teacher's journal (weekly) in 1831; proposing a national Sunday-school convention in 1832; introducing a free circulating library for Sunday schools; a system of graded question-books; issuing cheap illustrated Sunday-school periodicals for children; providing suitable records and manuals for conducting and improving Sunday schools. Its missionary work is sustained by benevolent contributions; and the extent of it may be indicated by the report for the year ending March 1, 1883, showing 2,252 schools organized, with 10,376 teachers and 82,749 scholars. Among the results of its work, the membership of 102,000: 19,029 Bibles and Testaments were distributed, and 35,308 families visited for religious conference. Including $11,600 worth of publications given, it expended in the year's benevolent operations $98,048.51. During the fifty-nine years of its existence it reports over 74,000 Sunday schools organized, with 460,000 teachers, and upwards of 3,100,000 scholars in these schools: and has expended in missionary work $2,925,000, of which over $800,000 were given in books and papers to needy schools. It has circulated by sale and donation, publications to the value of about $7,500,000.

The Massachusetts Sunday-school Union was formed in 1825 of delegates from different denominations, but disbanded, and the Massachusetts Sabbath-school Society instituted in 1832, — a Congregational organization, which was consolidated with the Congregational Board of Publication in 1868. It employs secretaries and agents, and issues publications to promote Sunday schools among Congregational churches. The Sunday-school Union of the Methodist-Episcopal Church was formed in 1827, and re-organized in 1844, and has been very efficient in publishing and distributing literature through the preachers attached to its denomination. It does not employ Sunday-school missionaries. The Presbyterian and Baptist boards of publication have Sunday-school departments; they employ colporters, who promote the extension of Sunday schools in connection with their churches, and distribute denominational literature. The (Dutch) Reformed Sunday-school Union soon after 1850 was merged in that of its publishing society. The Protestant Episcopal Sunday-school Union, and the Evangelical Knowledge Society, provide a denominational juvenile literature for schools in that church. The Foreign Sunday-school Association of New York, formerly auxiliary to the American Sunday-School Union, was incorporated in 1873, and labors to promote Sunday schools in foreign lands, chiefly on the continent of Europe.

Conventions. — Early in this century local Sunday-school conventions were held, especially from 1820 to 1830, in many of the Eastern and Middle States. In 1832, at the suggestion of the American Sunday-school Union, a national convention was held in New York, comprising two hundred and twenty delegates from various conventions. The Massachusetts Sunday-school Union was held in Philadelphia in 1833, at which full reports and papers were presented as arranged for by the previous convention in New York. The chief work accomplished by these early national meetings was to discover and agree on the principles of a system of religious education. That of 1833 also adopted the recommendation of the American Sunday-school Union, that a systematic and simultaneous canvass of the entire country be made, to obtain scholars, and enlist parents in this work, on the 4th of July following. It also approved of a Uniform Series of lessons already introduced. A third national convention was held in Philadelphia in 1859, "marking a revival of interest in Bible study, and in religious training of the young." A world's convention was held in London in 1862, at which paperly discussing the methods and progress of the cause were presented. The fourth national convention in America was held at Newark, N.J., in 1869, attended by five hundred and twenty-six delegates representing twenty-eight States and seven countries; the fifth, at Indianapolis in 1872, marked by the adoption of the present International Series of Uniform Lessons, and the appointment of a general statistical secretary; the first international (sixth national) convention, at Baltimore in 1875; the second, at Atlanta in 1878; the third, at Toronto in 1881; and the fourth, at Louisville in 1884. Besides these, there have been State and local conventions in every part of the United States and the Dominion of Canada, which have given added impetus to the movement, and disseminated useful knowledge in regard to the methods of conducting, and teaching in Sunday schools, and imparted more of unity to the cause. Upon the local conventions, which were very prevalent from 1860 to 1870, the "institute" has been widely grafted,—a modification of the convention, aiming to give instruction specially to teachers, rather than simply to create enthusiasm. The wide influence of conventions on the cause may be inferred from the statement that over five thousand were held in the United States in the year 1893. The "institute," exhibiting advanced methods of teaching and conducting schools, became popular in 1865. This form of meeting had likewise been adopted in England for many years previous to that date. Out of these institutes and conventions have come the "summer assemblies," among the most noted of which is that of Chautauqua, conducted by the Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., which has normal courses of study, lectures on teaching, a "literary and scientific circle" of about sixty thousand members, and classes in Hebrew, Greek, and other languages.

Organisation.—The modern Sunday school commonly has three departments, corresponding to three grades of instruction,—the primary or infant, the intermediate, and the advanced. In the intermediate grade the scholars are arranged in classes of from six to ten, with a teacher for each class; in the advanced grade the classes are somewhat larger. In the infant department, until recent years, it was usual to have only one or two teachers for the entire department, even when it consisted of from one hundred to two hundred pupils. The class system is being more widely introduced into the infant or primary grade of the best schools in America. The entire school is in the charge of a superintendent, with an assistant, a secretary, treasurer, and a librarian; the latter gives out the books from the circulating library in connection with the school, charging them to the teacher or scholar, and recording their return at each session. There are church and mission schools. Sunday schools are not intended to be a substitute for, but a supplement to, family and pulpit instruction. Schools in connection with a church are sustained and directed by the church. Mission schools are often established by Christians of different denominations in neglected portions of the country and of large cities. Sunday schools in the United States hold one session (except Sabbath schools); many of them held two sessions. A few schools in the cities still hold two sessions, and this custom yet prevails widely in England.

Modes of Instruction and Literature.—The schools founded by Raikes were chiefly for the lower classes in the community, who were ignorant, and hence were taught the elementary branches of reading and writing, with oral instruction in the Catechism. Reading, and memorizing texts in the Bible, followed. Cramping the memory with large portions of Scripture and the Catechism seems to have been a hobby in Scotland, England, and America, for some time. Rev. J. Inglis states that children committed and repeated seven hundred texts every week, until limited to two hundred per week; and R. G. Pardee asserts, that, in the opinion of New-York physicians, it developed a brain-disease in children. James Gall, by his End and Essence of Sabbath-school Teaching and his Nature's Normal School, aimed to introduce a more sensible lesson system in Scotland, which was also used in some schools in America as early as 1830. Stowe's training system, giving prominence to pictorial methods of instruction, also aided in reforming this excessive use of the memory. The reform in America was completed by the introduction of the Uniform Limited Lessons, prepared in 1825, and adopted by the American Sunday-school Union and its three hundred or four hundred auxiliaries in 1826. This in its principle is a popular system of an extensive course of study for the whole Bible,—one and the same lesson for all, of from seven to fifteen verses, and questions and comments in at least three grades, and reviews. It was national in its purpose. In 1829 Mr. Gall urged his lesson system upon teachers in England; and in 1830 regular lessons were furnished, with notes for the use of teachers. Following the wide use of the Uniform Series of Lessons of 1826 to 1832 and the Union Question-Books, in many American schools teachers "applied to the imagination, and resorted to stories and anecdotes." In 1840 the London Sunday-school Union issued a List of Lessons for general adoption, adding lesson notes in 1842, which it claims to have continued uninterruptedly till the present time, now using the International Series. Mimpiss's Graduate Simultaneous Instruction for Sunday Schools, founded on the gospels, history, and moralities, in 1844, was an attempt to have one lesson for the whole school; but it had only a limited use. In America, previous to 1863, where the series of "Union Questions" were not used, each school selected its own lessons (or had impromptu lessons); a method of instruction not inaptly termed the "Babel series" of lessons. Schemes of lessons for Sunday schools, with notes, were issued in the Sunday-school Teacher of Chicago, in 1863; and in 1867 B. F. Jacobs suggested uniform lessons anew. The desire for such a series increased, until in 1871 a meeting of Sunday-school publishers was held in New York, at the suggestion of the executive committee of the National Sunday-school Convention, which agreed upon a tentative scheme of uniform lessons for 1872. At the Indianapolis convention in that year, a lesson committee was appointed to arrange a course of lessons for seven years, covering the whole Bible, and which was recommended by a majority of them. These held two sessions. A few schools in the cities still hold two sessions, and this custom yet prevails widely in England.

SUPERSTITION.

EDWIN W. RICE
(Editor of the American Sunday-school Union).

SUPEREROGATION. The doctrine of works of supererogation (opera supererogatoria) is based on the distinction of supererogation and essence. The former is the duty of every man to obey, but the fulfillment of the latter establishes a merit. The doctrine has never been an article of faith in the Roman-Catholic Church; the Council of Trent is silent upon the matter.

But in the practice of the church it has played a most disastrous part as the true foundation of the doctrine of indulgences, which art. see.

SUPERSTITION. The derivation of the Latin term superstio is doubtful. Cicero can hardly be right when he says (De nat. deor., ii. 28), Qui totos dies preceabantur et immolabant, ut sui sibi liberis supersitiones essent, superstitiones esse appellaverint. Lactantius is also wrong when he says (Inst. div., iv. 28) those are called superstition who revere the 1 This table does not include Sunday and parish schools of the Roman-Catholic or the Greek Church; nor is it in all cases complete for Protestant Sunday schools. The statistics for the United States were compiled by K. Payson Porter, statistical secretary, International Sunday-school Union; for England and Wales, by F. J. Hartley, statistical secretary, London Sunday-school Union; for Ireland, by T. Rice, Bishop, London Sunday-school Almanack and reports of Free Reformed Church; for Germany and German Switzerland, by W. Brunckenhoff; and, for other countries, by prominent Sunday-school authorities and missionaries.

Superstition is the product of an unregulated fancy, a deficiency of religious strength. It is immoral, and for that reason transforms Christian thought into polytheism, dualism, or spiritualism. It is the most dangerous despot of the human mind, assenting, as it does, full authority to override the laws of sound thought. It has led to great cruelties and enormities. We need only recall the trials of so-called witches. Superstition, however, is better than unbelief, although harder to cure. We agree with Jean Paul when he says, "I would rather be in the densest atmosphere of superstition than under the air-pump of unbelief."

In the former case, one breathes with difficulty; in the latter, one is suffocated." RUD. HOFMANN.

SUPRALAPSARIANISM, a theory held by the strictest Calvinists, according to which God not only foresaw and permitted, but actually decreed, the fall of man, and overruled it for his redemption; it being supposed that nothing could happen independently of the divine will. It is logically the most consistent type of Calvinism, but it at the same time raised high barriers on fatalism and pantheism, and hence was excluded from the Reformed Confessions, all of which deny emphatically that God is the author of sin. SURIES, Laurentius, b. at Lübeck in 1522; d. at Cologne, May 23, 1578. He was educated in the Protestant faith, and studied at Frankfort-on-the-Oder and Cologne; but in the latter place he became acquainted with Canisius, embraced Romanism, and entered the Carthusian order in 1540. He was a prolific writer. In opposition to Sleidan's celebrated work on the Reformation, he wrote a Commenaria brevis, etc., 1566; but the performance is rather weak: he accuses the Reformers of having borrowed their doctrines from Mohammed. His best work is his Vida Sanctorum ab Alayo Lipomanno olim consecret, Cologne, 1570-75, 6 vols. fol. [often reprinted; e.g., Turin, 1875 sqq., 12 vols.]. "He was the first who used a sound criticism in narrating the lives of the saints."—Darling.

SURPLICE (Lat., super pellicem, "over garments") is a loose white linen garment, a modification of the alb, dating back to the end of the twelfth century. It is worn by clergymen of the Church of England during celebration of service, as also by clergymen of the Danish, Norwegian, and Swedish churches, but by them only during celebration of the Lord's Supper.

SURO, Heinrich, b. at Überlingen, March 21, 1595; d. at Ulm, Jan. 23, 1635. He was educated in a Dominican monastery in his native city, studied theology at Cologne, and became an enthusiastic disciple of Eckert; but, having more imagination and sentiment than true speculative talent, he gave his mysticism quite a different form, and became the representative of the poetical mysticism of the middle ages. The idea never satisfied him until it assumed the form of personality, and became clothed with all loveliness and perfection. Thus arose before his eyes the idea of the Eternal Wisdom, sometimes identified with Christ, and sometimes with the Virgin. In order to become the true apologist of his ideal, he retired to the Dominican monastery where he was educated, devoted himself to a study of sacred books, and wrote his book, Von der ewigen Weihheit, 1338. In 1340 he began to preach, stopped for several years in the monastery of Winterthur, and, later on, in a monastery in Ulm; formed connections with Tauler, Heinrich from Nordlingen, the Friends of of God; founded brotherhoods, for which he wrote rules; and called many individual converts back from the world. His collected works, which give no consistent system, most of the materials having been derived from other mystics, consist of three parts,—on the eternal wisdom, on the eternal truth, and a narrative of his own inner history. They appeared at Augsburg in 1182; last ed. by Diepenbrock, Ratisbon, 1829 (2d ed., 1838). The book, Von den neun Felsen, often ascribed to Sussi, is by Ruhman Merswin.

SUTTON, Christopher, b. in Hampshire, Eng., 1565; entered Hart Hall, Oxford, 1582; soon transferred to Lincoln, of which he proceeded M.A., 1589; held several livings, and was prebendary of Westminster, 1605, and of Lincoln, 1618; d. 1629. He was pious, eloquent, and admired. He wrote Disce morti (Learn to die), Lond., 1600, frequently reprinted in ordinary condition, with memel, 1593, Oxford, 1560); Disce vivere (Learn to live), Lond., 1608 (modern edition, 1853); Godly meditations upon the most holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, 1622, 13th ed., 1677 (modern edition, with preface by John Henry Newman, Oxford, 1884, again 1929). See sketch in Wood: Athen. Oxon., 4th ed., vol. ii., pp. 459 sq.

SWAIN, Joseph, a hymn-writer of marked talent; was b. at Birmingham, 1761; and d. in London, April 14, 1796. He was originally apprenticed to an engraver. Removing to London, he was baptized by Dr. Rippon, 1788, and from June, 1791, was a successful Baptist minister. His Walworth Hymns, 1792, while abrupt and unequal, are strongly, fervid, spontaneous, and marked by frequent bursts of a really poetic imagination. They have been most extensively used by extreme Calvinists, but some of them may be found in almost every collection.

B. M. BIRD.

SWEDEN. Christianity was first preached in Sweden by Ansgar. No doubt the Swedes, like the Danes and the Norwegians, had long before that time become acquainted with Christianity on their commercial and erratic expeditions, but only in a vague and indefinite way. Ansgar made several voyages to Sweden and Norway. On his first visit he made H errof, one of the most distinguished men in the country, a zealous Christian; and by his aid a congregation was formed, and a chapel was built, at Birka. In 834 Gautbert was consecrated Bishop of Sweden, and went thither with his nephew Nithard. But even H ergoir's authority was not sufficient to keep the irritated heathens within bounds. They broke into Gautbert's house, and murdered Nithard. The chapel was destroyed, the bishop fled, and, when H ergoir soon after died, the cause of Christianit y seemed lost in Sweden. On his second visit Ansgar came with letters of recommendation from the emperor, with great pomp and costly presents; and, having won the favor of the king, he succeeded, at a great assembly of all the freemen of the people, in obtaining toleration for the Christian religion. Ansgarf, a Christian Dane, was settled at Birka, the chapel rebuilt, and a congregation formed anew. In Sweden, however, as in Denmark, the real introduction and actual establishment of Christianity was effected from England. It was the Anglo-Saxon Siegfried, and the English and Danish monks in his company, who, in the reign of Olat Skotkonung (d. 1021), began the work of converting the Swedish people. It was completed during the reign of Eric the Saint (1150-60), when the first monasteries—Alvastra, Nydala, and Warnhem—were founded. Originally Sweden belonged to the archiepiscopal see of Hamburg-Bremen; but in 1163 it obtained its own metropolitan (settled at Upsala), with the suffragan sees of Skars, Linköping, Strengnäs, Westerås, Wexio, and Abo.

In Sweden the Roman-Catholic Church struck deeper roots than in either of the other two Scandina vian countries, perhaps because the Swedes are a more imaginative and impulsive people, with ready enthusiasm for anything grand and magnificent. Nevertheless, after the great political revolution in 1623, the Reformation worked its way among the people, without meeting any considerable opposition. Gustavus Vasa found the church in a miserable condition, and addressed himself to Pope Adrian VI. with complaints, and proposals of reform; but he received no answer. He then undertook to reform the church himself; and in the two brothers Olaus and Laurentius Petri, and their friend Lars Anderson, he found the fit instruments by which to work. The Swedish translation of the Bible appeared in 1526. At an assembly at Oerbro in 1529, all the reforms which had been introduced by the government on the advice of Luther were sanctioned by the Swedish clergy. Laurentius Petri was consecrated the first evangelical bishop of Sweden. Under Eric XIV (1560-68) the country was opened as an asylum for all persecuted Protestants. Very soon, however, controversies broke out between the Lutherans and the Reformed; and the Roman Catholics were not slow in availing themselves of the opportunities of the situation. Johan III. (1568-92) actually leaned towards Romanism. After his death the assembly of Upsala (1593) took the necessary precautions for the preservation of the Evangelical Church; but how long a Roman-Catholic party continued lingering in Sweden may be seen from the fact that Queen Christina, the daughter of Gustavus Adolphus, became a convert to Romanism, 1636.

The protracted though never violent contest with Romanism had a double influence on the Swedish Church: on the one side it retained more of the hierarchical organization of the Church of Rome than either the Danish or the Norwegian Church, and on the other it also became more exclusive and intolerant. But the Reformation the clergy did not lose their political power: they continued to form the fourth estate of the diet of the realm until the revision of the constitution in 1865-66. And how this power was used may be inferred from the fact, that, down to 1827, any deviation from Lutheranism to any other denomination was punished with exile, and confiscation of property. Full religious liberty, that is abolition of all connection between civil rights and religious faith, was not introduced until 1877. The consequences are, that, of the 4,578,901 inhabitants of Sweden (in 1879), only an insignificant percentage belongs to other denominations, while the internal state of the Lutheran Church in Sweden by no means can be pronounced healthy. In the present century widespread religious movements (the Read-ers, the followers of Eric Jansen, etc.) have occurred among the lower classes; showing not the least trace of sectarianism, but giving ample evidence that the spiritual wants of the masses are not duly administered. They wanted no other theology than that developed by Lutheran orthodoxy, but they wanted more practical religion than that offered by the Swedish Church; and it can hardly be doubted that the emigration, which of late has assumed such dimensions as to frighten the government, is caused as much by the barrenness of the Swedish church as by the poverty of the Swedish soil. It is also a significant fact that during the last ten years the number of theological students has decreased so much, that it has not always been possible to provide every parish with a pastor. SWEDENBORG, Emanuel, was b. in Stockholm, Sweden, on the 29th of January, 1688, and d. in London on the twenty-ninth day of March, 1772. His father’s name was Jesper Swedberg; his mother’s, Sarah Behm. He was well born. He descended from families of successful and opulent miners, and combined in his nature the energy, insight into the qualities of material substances, and the practical good sense, which such an employment, followed from generation to generation, would tend to produce.

But little is known of his mother. His father was a clergyman, who gradually rose to be chaplain of the court, professor in the university of Upsal, and superintendent of the Swedish churches in America, London, and Portugal. In 1719 the family of Bishop Swedberg was ennobled by Queen Ulrica Eleonora with the name of Swedenborg, which entitled the family to seats in the diet,—a privilege which Swedenborg in due time enjoyed. Bishop Swedberg was simple in his habits, direct in his action, and courageous to attack evil and error wherever he found it,—in king or subject. He was a zealous reformer, a prolific writer, and constantly on the alert to correct abuses, and provide improved methods of instruction. He was a sturdy, devout, wise, practical man. Such was the parentage which had its influence in determining the mental and spiritual qualities of Swedenborg.

He was well educated. But little is known of his early life. The following account, written by himself, gives us a glimpse of the qualities and natural bent of his mind. He has said, "I was constantly occupied in thought upon God, salvation, and the spiritual experiences of men; and sometimes I revealed things at which my father and mother wondered, saying that angels must be speaking through me." From my sixth to my twelfth year I used to delight in conversing with clergymen about faith; saying that the life of faith is love, and that the love which imparts life is love to the neighbor, also that God gives faith to every one, but only those receive it who practise that love." Nurtured by such a love, and penetrated by the influences of a pure home and a cultivated society, by which his native endowment became imbued with pure and true principles of life, he spent his early years. These influences and principles formed the groundwork and best part of his education.

In 1709, at the age of twenty-one years, he graduated from the university of Upsal with the degree of doctor of philosophy. In the following year he set out on his travels at that time an essential part of a young man’s education. His mind had now taken a strong bent towards mathematics and the natural sciences, especially in their application to practical use. He sought access to every man in power from whom he hoped to gain any knowledge upon his favorite studies. He declares that he has an "immoderate desire" for his studies, especially for astronomy and mathematics. But this was not an aimless desire, looking only to the gratification of his thirst for knowledge. He always, even in these early years, regarded knowledge as a means to a practical end. This was a dominant quality of his mind. He even turned his lodgings to use in gaining practical knowledge; living with a watchmaker for a time, afterwards with a cabinet-maker, and then with a mathematical-instrument maker, that he might learn from them arts which would be useful to him and to his country.

But he did not let his thirst for knowledge absorb his whole thought and affection. When he found that his intense devotion to study prevented him from being as "sociable as is desirable and useful to him, and as his spirits were somewhat exhausted, he took refuge for a short time in poetry, that he might be somewhat refreshed by it, but with the intention of returning to his mathematical studies. And in his "mathematical studies" he made more discoveries than any one else in his age." He now spent five years abroad; passing his time in London, Holland, Paris, and Germany. His mind was open to every phase of human life. He examined the customs, habits, and character of the people, and the influence of their institutions and industries upon them. He returned home with his mind enlarged and enriched with knowledge gained by observation, experience, and intercourse with learned men, and teeming with new inventions and plans for giving them a practical test.

In 1716, a year after his return from his travels, he was appointed by Charles XII., king of Sweden, assessor extraordinary in the College of Mines. This office gave him "a seat and a voice in the council, whenever he was present, and especially whenever any business was brought forward pertaining to mechanicks;" though he was particularly directed in the royal commission "to attend Pollheimer, the councillor of commerce, and to be of assistance to him in his engineering works and in carrying out his designs." This appointment brought him for a time into personal relations with the king or subject. He was a zealous reformer, a prolific writer, and constantly on the alert to correct abuses, and provide improved methods of instruction. He was a sturdy, devout, wise, practical man. Such was the parentage which had its influence in determining the mental and spiritual qualities of Swedenborg.

For the rest, the conditions of his life were simple and domestic, for he lived in a small house near the College of Mines, the headquarters of the govern with the king, who was fond of mathematics, and to whom Swedenborg rendered great service by constructing machines by means of which two galleys, five large boats, and a sloop were conveyed overland a distance of fourteen miles.

Swedenborg now devoted himself entirely to the duties of his ministry. Though his studies did not require oversight of the practical workings of the mines so much as inquiry into the nature of the elements the miners dealt with. He began to study the nature of heat and the constitution of matter. In the pursuit of this purpose he made several visits abroad, examined the mines and the methods of working them in other countries, and gained knowledge from every source to which he could get access that would throw light upon the subjects he was investigating, and be of any practical value to his country. He continued in this office for more than thirty years, to the satisfaction of his countrymen and the interest of science. During this time he had written and published a great number of works, comprising all branches of science. A catalogue of his writings shows that he had written seventy-seven distinct treatises, some of them of a directly practical nature, others upon the profoundest subjects of scientific research, in the investigation of which he showed the most penetrating insight, and anticipated many of the important discoveries of modern times. Says a recent writer, "Among all the men who rose to eminence in any of the departments of natural science during his time, it would be difficult to name one whose labors in the different departments of applied science it would be more interesting or more profitable to dwell upon."

After giving the titles of his scientific and literary works, he adds, "The ability to treat such a variety of topics, and most of them, I may add, upon the authority of perfectly competent testimony, as no other man of his time could have treated them, is due to qualities of mind and character which have not received from his biographers the attention they merit. There was no kind of knowledge which could be made useful to his fellow-creatures that he thought it beneath him to master, or which he neglected an opportunity of mastering."

Having attained the highest rank among the scientists and philosophers of his time, and being in favor with the king and royal family and his countrymen, he laid aside his philosophical and scientific studies, and turned his attention wholly to questions of a spiritual and religious nature. The end he was seeking led directly to this result, though he reached it in a manner most unexpected to himself. He had been for some years in search of the soul, and had written four large octavo volumes, the first two of which were called the Economy of the Animal Kingdom, and the others, the Animal Kingdom, in which he describes his methods and their results. Before the last work came from the press, he had an experience which changed the direction and character of his studies for the rest of his life. After giving an account of how and what he was brought up to write, he says, "But all that I have thus far related I consider of little importance; for it is far transcended by the circumstance that I have been called to a holy office by the Lord himself, who most mercifully appeared before me, his servant, in the year 1743, when he opened my sight into the spiritual world, and enabled me to converse with spirits and angels; in which state I have continued up to the present day. From that time I began to print and publish the various arcanum that were seen by me, or revealed to me, concerning heaven and hell, the state of those who served, with the true worship of God, the spiritual sense of the Word, and many other important matters conducive to salvation and wisdom."

From this time until his death, a period of nearly thirty years, he devoted himself entirely to the new work committed to him. He resigned his office as assessor, discontinued his scientific studies, and turned his attention to those subjects which were necessary to the performance of his work. He learned Hebrew, and read the Word attentively and critically in its original languages, and showed the same systematic diligence, and sincere devotion to Truth, that he had exhibited in his scientific works. Though claiming special illumination and direction by the Lord, his writings conclusively show that his illumination was gradual, and subject to immutable spiritual laws. His theological works, devoted to an exposition of the spiritual meaning of the Word, to the doctrines of spiritual truth derived from the Word so interpreted, and to what he claims to have seen and heard during his intromission into the spiritual world, comprise about thirty octavo volumes, and give the most ample means for testing the truth of his claims. To this test they must finally come. They cannot be established or destroyed by assertion or personal authority. They must stand or fall by the only infallible test,—their accordance with the immutable laws of the divine order.

Whatever may be the result of this weighing in the balances of divine truth, with regard to his seership and his claim to be divinely commissioned to reveal new truth to men, the unprejudiced mind can hardly fail to conclude that Swedenborg was in many respects the most remarkable man of his own or any age. He had a peculiar genius, which amounted almost to intuition, for penetrating into the secret causes of natural phenomena, while at the same time he was faithful to facts and experience, which he followed as constant guides. He was an unselfish and devout lover of the truth. Regarding it as the order of the divine wisdom, he valued it above all other possessions, and followed wherever it led. He was eminently practical, and valued truth for its use far more than for its beauty and possession. While a member of the Diet, and engaged in writing his religious works, he prepared some of the best papers that were presented on finance, the currency, and other questions concerning the conduct of civil affairs. He saw the evils of intemperance, and proposed measures to prevent them. He was a welcome guest in the highest social circles; and, though absorbed in the great work which he believed had been committed to his hands, he did not forget the children and those who served at time. He was a sincere and devout Christian. Though living in a sceptical age, there is no evidence that he ever doubted the existence of a Supreme Being, and his direct control of human affairs: even his scientific works contain many devout acknowledgments of his dependence upon him for every faculty and every blessing of life. His nature was large, round, full, and complete. It is a significant fact, that at the present time, more than a century since his decease, his life and works, both scientific and religious, are receiving more attention than ever before. A brief statement of his theology can be found in the article on the NEW- JERUSALEM CHURCH.

Swift, Elisha Pope, O. O., b. at Williams- town, Mass., April 12, 1792; d. at Allegheny, Penn., 1865; grandson of Hon. Heman Swift, Revolutionary colonel, by fifth remove descended from John Eliot, "Apostle to the Indians;" converted at twenty; graduated from Williams Col- lege with a degree in 1813; studied theology at Princeton; licensed by New-Brunswick presbyte- ry, Winchester, where, after his ordination (1830), he accomplished his most remarkab- le work. He had the foresight to see the necessity of every faculty and every blessing of life. His nature was large, round, full, and complete. He was of noble birth, educated in the Old Monas- tery, Westminster; an article of erque, to his care, and availed himself of his counsels. Ethelwolf, on his accession, made him his minister, especially in ecclesiastical affairs, and in 852 procured his election to the see of Westminster. St. Swithin's Day is July 15; be- cause on that day, in 904, his relics were moved from the churchyard where he had been buried at his own request, so that his grave might be trodden on by passers by, to the Cathedral of Winchester. There is a saying, demonstrably erroneous, "If it rain on St. Swithin's Day, there will be rain, more or less, for forty succeeding days." See Butler: Lives of the Saints, July 15.

SWITZERLAND. I. Introduction of Chris- tianity, and Outline of Ecclesiastical Affairs to the Beginning of the Sixteenth Century. In the middle of the third century Christianity was established in Geneva by Bishops Parakodus and Dionysius of Vienne. From Geneva the new reli- gion spread to Wallis, and then to other parts of the land, the way for it, very likely, prepared by Roman Christian soldiers; but its history is en- veloped in great darkness. By the sixth century this wave of Christianity, coming from France, had exhausted itself. Back preaching had been established,—Geneva, Sitten, Lausanne, Chur, and Constance. Then came Columban and the monks of St. Gall, and evangelization was given a fresh start. Christianity at length was everywhere embraced. It was, as elsewhere, Ori- ental in type. Monasticism was its highest devel- opment. Monasteries kept on multiplying; yet they were, with the exception of St. Gall, so far from being centres of learning, that, in the four- teenth century, no member of the one in Zürich knew how to write. But in 1460 the first Swiss university (Basel) was founded, and at once a change for the better set in. A printing-press was set up, first at Beromünster (1470), and then at Basel and Geneva; and an abbot of Einsiedeln, Albert of Bonstetten, wrote a history of the Bur- gundian War, and described the Confederacy. The number of parishes and the might of the bishops had increased, likewise, very greatly, since the eighth century. In 60,000 ducats annually. The see of Constance, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, embraced 350 cloisters, 1,790 parishes, and 17,000 priests. The six Swiss bishops were princes of the Holy Roman Empire: the abbots of St. Gal- len, Einsiedeln, Pfaffikon, Disentis, and Muri were princes. The church was rich and splendid: but it was luxurious and lax, and not entirely able to carry out its plans; on the contrary, everywhere was opposition to its politics and its doctrines. In the fight between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. Western Switzerland sided with the emperor. The clergy were forced to pay their taxes, like other people. Whole districts purchased their independence of the church. No attention was paid to interdicts, episcopal or papal. The Basel- ers in 1323 threw into the Rhine the Papal legate who would publish the ban among them. The sermons of the Hausenland sided with the emperor. There was no agitation to the introduction of religious changes, were listened to attentively. The Zurichers in 1274, and again in 1331, set before their priests the alternative, either to lay down their ecclesiastical functions, or to leave the city.
At the end of the fifteenth century there were increasing symptoms of the imminence of relief from the intolerable burden of ecclesiastical crimnality. Nevertheless, the church everywhere exercised its wonted power over the majority of the people. The Waldenses had shown themselves in the cantons of Bern and Freiburg in 1509, but had quietly disappeared. In 1514-15 Constance (1414-15) and Basel (1431-43) had only shaken the pillars of the Papacy, not broken them. The Swiss cities of Bern and Zurich received long indulgences in recognition of their fidelity to the Pope. No serious attempts were made by the clergy to stem the tide of wickedness. The pulpit was dumb. But the light of the rising sun of the new and better day was meanwhile gilding the snow-clad peaks of Switzerland.

II. The Period of the Reformation from 1519 till 1566. — In Switzerland as in Germany, the Reformation was carried through in consequence of the capacity of its leaders, the readiness of the people, and the favorable political situation. The Pope, for his own ends, had loosened the Swiss Confederacy; and this state of things wrought against the Papacy. The birthday of the Reformation in Switzerland is April 13, 1525, when in Zurich, under the guidance of Zwingli, who had since 1519 preached Reformed doctrine, the first Reformed Eucharist was celebrated. The next year the canton of Zurich was read out of the Confederacy for its heresy. But this act of arrogance stirred only the deeper the Swiss desire for liberty, and love for independence; and the effort to raise the religious question into a political one aborted. The Reformation before 1529 had carried the day in all the German cantons.

But this happy result had come about in no easy fashion. The Anabaptists had given no end of trouble to the Swiss cantons,— Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, Luzern, Freiburg, and Solothurn — were arrayed against the Protestant; and in May, 1529, Jacob Kaiser was for the Reformed faith burnt at the stake in Schwyz. [See R. Stahelin: Die ersten Martyrer d. evang. Glaubens in der Schweiz, Heidelberg, 1893, 81 pp.] This event made an immense sensation, and was seemed imminent. It was for a time averted; but in 1531 it broke out, and on Oct. 23, Zwingli fell, at the head of the Reformed combatants, in the defeat at Cappel. An humiliating treaty of peace was concluded Nov. 10, 1531; and the future of the Reformation was black enough. On Nov. 28, 1531, Zellampladius died. The Reformed cantons fell into mutual recriminations; the Anabaptists renewed their disturbances; the latent sympathy for the old religion dared express itself: but the Reformation did not fail. Bullinger appeared as the worthy successor of Zwingli, and in 1533, Bucer at Basle, and Farel labored for the cause; and on Aug. 27, 1535, Geneva abolished the Papal power. In 1536 appeared John Calvin, whose energy made Geneva the metropolis of the Reformed Church; by his side were Viret and Beza. The first authorititative symbol of the Reformed Church of Switzerland was the Second Helvetic Confession (1536), the work of Bullinger; and with its promulgation closes the period of the Swiss Reformation. See arts. Calvin, Farel, Reformation (pp. 2007, 2008), Zwingli.

III. The Period from 1566 to the Present. — The conflict between Protestants and Roman Catholics, which in Germany lasted until 1648 (the Peace of Westphalia), in Switzerland terminated only in 1712 (the second battle of Villerpen). The Catholic re-action in the second half of the sixteenth century found its leader in Carlo Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, who introduced into Switzerland the Capuchins and Jesuits, who founded the Reformed Church. With the second battle of Villerpen, a nunsate in Switzerland, and in 1583 entered into a plan to overthrow the Reformation there altogether. At length the two Confessions met in a decisive battle at Villerpen, the result of which was a permanent peace.

The great men on the Protestant side who in this period carried on the Reformation, were such as Bullinger, Peter Martyr Vermigli, Heidinger, the two Hottingers, the Buxtorfs, Wolfgang Musculus, Diodati, Spanheim, and Turretin. The Helvetic Consensus Formula of 1576, with its Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, and its Buxtorfan doctrine of the inspiration of vowel-points, is the symbol of the performance of this period; but after 1729 it ceased to have any authority.

The nineteenth century brought an awakening of religious activity. Fresh troubles, however, broke out. In 1839 the call of David Friedrich Strauss to the university of Zurich led to a revolution. In 1851 the Swiss Council passed a similar fate because the radicals arose against the call of Jesuits to teach theology in Luzern. It was really, however, a protest of the ungodly against the progress of evangelical truth. In November, 1845, the Vaudois clergy left the Established Church, and formed the Free Church of the Vaudo canton. (See Vaudo, Free Church of.) In the Roman-Catholic cantons, Ultramontanism grew apace until it received a severe blow from the Vaudo canton. In 1847-48 the Sonderbund, or union of the Roman-Catholic cantons of Switzerland, vigorously opposed the reorganization of the Diet in the interests of progress; but it was worsted, and the old regulation which forbade the establishment of Reformed congregations in Roman-Catholic cantons, and vice versa, was abrogated. Thus the defeat at Cappel was avenged.

HERZOG.

SYLLABUS, the Papal, is an index, or catalogue, of all heresies condemned by Pope Pius IX, Dec. 8, 1864, on the basis of several encyclical letters issued by the same pontiff during his long reign. Its full title is, A Syllabus containing the Principal Errors of our Times, which are noted in the Consistorial Allocations, in the Encyclicals, and in other Apostolical Letters of our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX. A Syllabus... was probably suggested by the work of Epiphanius against the eighty heresies of the first three centuries, which are mostly of a Gnostic character. The Papal document is purely negative, but indirectly it teaches and enjoins the very opposite of what it condemns as error. It is divided into ten sections. The first condemns pantheism, naturalism, and absolute rationalism; the second, moderate rationalism; the third, indifferentism and latitudinarianism; the fourth, socialism, communism, secret societies, Bible societies, and other "pests of this description;" the fifth, errors concerning the Church and her rights; the sixth, errors concerning civil society; the seventh, errors of natural and Christian ethics; the eighth, errors concerning Christian marriage; the ninth, errors concerning the temporal power of the Pope; the tenth, errors of modern liberalism. Among the errors condemned are the principles of civil and religious jurisdiction of Church and State. The Syllabus indirectly asserts the infallibility of the Pope, the exclusive right of Romanism to recognition by the civil government, the unlawfulness of all non-Catholic religions, the complete independence of the Papal hierarchy, the power of the Roman Church to coerce and enforce, and its supreme control over public education, science, and literature.

It will be seen that the Syllabus condemns many errors which are likewise rejected by all good Protestants. At the same time it condemns, also, important truths. It re-asserts the ecclesiastical claims of the mediaeval Papacy, and is a declaration of war against modern civilization and progress. It is a glaring anachronism.

What authority attaches to this document? Cardinal Newman, in his defence of the Syllabus against Gladstone's attack, virtually denied its dogmatic force, saying (Letter to the Duke of Norfolk, p. 108), "We can no more accept the Syllabus as de fide, as a dogmatic document, than any other index or table of contents." But the Syllabus is more than a mere index, and contains as many definitions and judgments as titles. Moreover, the Papal infallibility decrees of 1870 make all ex-cathedra or official utterances of the Pope on matters of faith and discipline infallible. It acts backwards as well as forwards: otherwise it would be null and void (Si falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus). The Syllabus is certainly an official document, addressed to all the bishops of the Catholic world, and sent to them with a Papal encyclical. And herein lies its importance and danger. As a personal manifesto of the Pope, it would be comparatively harmless and unheeded outside of the Roman communion; but clothed with infallible authority, and followed by the decrees of the Vatican Council, it provoked and stimulated the so-called Kulturkampf in Germany, a pamphlet war in England about its bearing on civil and political allegiance, and led to serious conflicts between Church and State in Italy, Austria, Prussia, France, Belgium, and Brazil. Where Church and State are united, there must be collision when both claim sovereignty, and the one claims infallible authority in addition. Even in the United States, where the government has nothing to do with the Church, the influence of the Syllabus is felt in the legislation on marriage and in public education, both of which have a supreme authority. The State claims and exercises the right and duty of educating the people for intelligent and useful citizenship; while the Syllabus condemns all public education which is not controlled by the teaching of the Roman Church, and stimulates the efforts of the priesthood to Romanize or to break up the public schools, or, where neither can be done from want of power, to neutralize them by parochial schools in which the doctrines and principles of Trent and the Vatican are inculcated upon the rising generation. Time must show what will be the ultimate issue of this irrepressible conflict.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

SYLVESTER is the name of three Popes. — Sylvester I. (514-556), of whom it is said that he baptized Constantine the Great, and received the famous donation from him, is a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, and commemorated on Dec. 31. — Sylvester II. (999-1003), whose true name was Gerbert, descended from humble parents in Auvergne, but distinguished himself by his immense brilliancy of accomplish-SYMBOLS of the origin, history, and contents of the various creeds of Christendom. It is comparative dogmatism. It was formerly known under the name of "Polemics," and "Controversial Theology," but is now treated in a more historical and irenic spirit. This modern form it may be said to have begun with Marheineke, who in 1810 published his Symbolik. The distinguishing Christians from non-Christians, since they were regarded as soldiers of Christ. Symbolical confession, as a military watchword, disappeared. Its origin, history, and character, are commemorated on July 18. See Acta Sanctorum, July 18, and Ruinart: Acta prim. martyrum. GA88.

SYMPHOROSA, a Christian widow, whose husband, a tribune, had suffered martyrdom. She was summoned before the Emperor Hadrian, and commanded to sacrifice, and partake in the Pagan solemnities at the consecration of the new imperial palace at Tibur. As she refused, she and her seven sons were cruelly tortured and killed. They are commemorated on July 18. See Acta Sanctorum, July 18, and Ruinart: Acta primorum martyrum, who accepts the story as true, though it does not harmonize with what is else known of Hadrian. GA88.

SYMPOSIUM, the Great, according to Jewish tradition, denotes the council first appointed, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, to re-organize the religious life, institutions, and literature of the people. Ezra, if he was not the originator of that council, certainly was its president. [Comp., against this view, Graetz, in Frankel's Monatschrift, Leipzig, 1867, etc., pp. 31 sq., 61 sq.] This council consisted of a hundred and twenty men, who were not contemporaneous, but who are to be regarded as transmitters of tradition from Moses and Joshua down to the time of Simon the Just (q.v.), who, according to Pirke Aboth (i.1), was the last surviving member. As to the work of the Great Synagogue, see the arts. CANON and BIBLE-TEXT (or THE OLD TESTAMENT), and Synods. The existence of the Great Synagogue [was first questioned by Richard Simon: Hist. Vorträge, p. 33), maintain that there is much historical truth underlying the tradition of a body of men, who, between the time when prophecy was about to die out and the Greek period, were leaders among the Jewish people, transmitted tradition, and made such provision for the spiritual welfare of the people, that the law of God again permeated their life. But the name "Great Synagogue" was probably first adopted some centuries later. Whether there were really a hundred and twenty men or not is difficult to say. We must not, however, identify the Great Synagogue with SYMPHORIANUS, a Gallic martyr from the reign of Aurelian; d. probably in 250. He was a native of Paris, where he was described as a youth of distinguished appearance and excellent education. Having refused to do homage to the statue of Berezynthia (Cybele), he was carried before the prefect Hercules; and as he continued repeating, "I am a Christian," and absolutely refused to make any concessions to the demand of the prefect to sacrifice a blood sacrifice, he was decapitated. He is commemorated on Aug. 22. See Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 22, and Ruinart: Acta prim. martyr. GA88.

SYMMACHIANS was the name of a sect which lived in Rome, and taught that the human body was created, not by God, but by the Devil, and was consequently to be misused in every way possible. The origin of the sect is doubtful,—whether founded by that Symmachus who translated the Old Testament into Greek, or by some other Symmachus. In the time of Augustine it was rapidly disappearing. See Contra Crescini- um, i. 31; see also Philastrius: De Haresibus, ed. Fabricius, Hamburg, 1721. NEUFECER.

SYMMACHUS, Pope, 480-514. After the death of Anastatius II., a double election took place; the popular party in Rome electing the deacon Symmachus, the imperial the archpresbyter Laurentius. Theodoric, the king of the Ostrogoths, was called in as umpire, and decided in favor of Symmachus; but it was several years before Laurentius finally yielded. At the synods of Rome (in 502, 503, and 504), Symmachus introduced various measures, limiting the participation of the laity in the Papal election and in the administration of the property of the Papal see; so, on the whole, his government tended towards the consolidation of the Papal power. SYNAGOGUES OF THE JEWS. I. NAME, ORIGIN, AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SYNAGOGUE. — Synagogue (Greek, synagoge) is the name of a Jewish religious assembly. During the post-exile period, existed first side by side with the sacrificial service in the temple, and which, after its existence, were substituted for it. Metonymically, synagogues denote also “places of assembly.” After Israel had lost, not only its national independence, but also its national sanctuary, the Jews were anxious to preserve the unity in faith, doctrine, and life. To achieve this, regular assemblies were inaugurated on certain days, in the different places of Palestine where Jews lived, and where men of learning expounded the law. Thus, in all places where a certain number of Jews lived, synagogues were called into existence, which afterwards became the only bearer and banner of their nationality. According to Jewish law, wherever ten Jews lived, a house of assembly was to be erected. At the time of Jesus, not only each city in Palestine, but also the cities of the diaspora, had each at least one synagogue. Of the many synagogues which were at Jerusalem, the temple synagogue was the most famous.

II. INTERNAL ARRANGEMENT, WORSHIP, ETC., OF THE SYNAGOGUE. 1. The Building. — Taking the temple as the prototype, and following the traditional interpretation of Prov. 1. 22, and Ex. ix. 9 (“to set up”), taken to mean that the voice of prayer is to be raised on heights, the Jewish canons decreed that synagogues are to be built upon the most elevated ground in the neighborhood, and that no house is to be allowed to overtop them. Failing of a commanding site, a tall pole rose from the roof to render it conspicuous. The building was commonly erected at the cost of the district: sometimes it was built by a rich Jew, or even, as in Luke vii. 5, by a friendly proselyte. The river-side outside the city was also deemed a suitable spot for building the synagogue. Sometimes, when the noise of the city, the people could worship God without distraction, and at the same time have the use of pure water for immersions and other religious exercises. Often synagogues were erected near the tombs of famous rabbins or holy men. The congregation was divided — men on one side, women on the other — by a low artition, five or six feet high, running between them (Philo: De Vita Contempl., i. 476). In modern synagogues the separation is made more complete by placing the women in low side-galleries, screened off by lattice-work (Leo Mutin: De cerem. Jud., 10, 4).

When the building was finished, it was set apart, as the temple had been, by a special prayer of dedication. From that time it had a consecrated character. No one was to pass through it as a short cut. Even if it ceased to be used, the building was not to be turned to any purpose, might not be turned, e.g., into a bath, a laundry, or a tannery. A scraper stood outside the door, that men might rid themselves, before they entered, of any thing that would be defiling.

2. Furniture. — In oldest times the people probably stood in the synagogue (Neh. vii. 5, 7), or sat upon the floor. But there were also armchairs, or seats of honor, for the elders of the synagogue, the doctors of the law, etc. (Matt. xxiii. 2, 6; Mark xi. 32; Luke xi. 43; Jas. ii. 2, 3). They were placed in front of the ark containing the law, or at the Jerusalem end, and there distinguished persons sat with their faces to the ark, while the congregation stood facing both these honorable ones and the ark. Besides the rostrum or platform, capable of containing several persons (Neh. viii. 4, ix. 4), there was a reading-desk, on which the sacred scrolls were laid. These scrolls were wrapped in linen or silk wrappers, often adorned with letters or other ornaments of gold and silver, and were kept in the wooden chest, or ark, or sanctuary. In some synagogues there was also a second chest for the rolls of the prophets, and where damaged rolls were preserved. There were, moreover, a perpetual light, and lamps brought by the people, which were lighted at the beginning of the sabbath, i.e., on Friday evening. To the furniture also belonged alms-boxes at or near the door, also notice-boards, on which were written the names of offenders who had been put out of the synagogue.

3. Times of Worship. — Besides on sabbaths and festivals, the people also met on Monday and Thursday, which were the two market-days in the week.

4. Liturgy, or Order of Service. — (1) The prayers which took the place of the daily sacrifices were offered up also at those hours when the Jews celebrated the daily sacrifices. In the synagogues, and festivals additional sacrifices were offered besides the usual, so, likewise, additional prayers were added to the regular ones. The main part of the daily service was the Shema and the eighteen benedictions. The prayer was followed on the sabbath and festivals by (2) the reading of the section of the law, which was originally divided in a hundred and fifty-four sections, or parashiyoth. After the section of the law (3), a section from the prophets, or Haftarah, was read; then came (4) the homily, exposition, or derasha. The service closed (5) with the benediction, to which the congregation on returning home went up before the ark to conduct divine service. He was called shaliach zibor, i.e., the legate of the congregation. There was also the chazzan, or sexton of the syna-
SYNCELLES (one who shares his cell with another) denotes, generally, the visitant of one of the higher ecclesiastical officers. The Patriarch of Constantinople had several syncelles, of whom the first (protopsyndelus) at one time even ranked before the metropolitans. Syncelles were also known in the West.

SYNCRETISM is a word of Greek origin, though of rare occurrence in ancient literature, referring to a saying about the Cretians,—that they were very much disposed to wage war against each other, but immediately made peace, and joined hands, when attacked by foreigners. It was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see his letter of April 22, 1519, to Melanchthon), and though of rare occurrence in ancient literature, was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see his letter of April 22, 1519, to Melanchthon), and was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see his letter of April 22, 1519, to Melanchthon), and was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see his letter of April 22, 1519, to Melanchthon), and was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see his letter of April 22, 1519, to Melanchthon).
SYNERGISM.

SYNERGISM is a sublimated type of Semi-Pelagianism, and had for its representatives Erasmus, and specially Melanchthon and his school. Protestant theologians in its first stage as strictest Augustinianism. Luther taught that the fall rendered man incapable of all good, and incompetent to contribute any thing towards his conversion. In his Enarratio in Ps. xc. (1511) he says, "In spiritual matters, so far as the soul's salvation is concerned, man is like a pillar of salt, like Lot's wife, yea, like a clod and stone, a dead picture, using neither mouth nor eyes, mind nor heart." Conversion is solely the act of divine grace. Melanchthon held to this view at first. In his Loci of 1621 he speaks of the will as des-stitute of all freedom, and of a man's works which seem to be good as only "the cursed fruit of a cursed tree (arboris malefici). As a consequence, Luther taught [in his earlier period] the strict doctrine of predestination, as did also Melanchthon, who says, "All things which happen, happen by necessity, according to divine predestination," —the treachery of Judas, as well as the conversion of Paul. This was the theology of Melanchthon's head, not of his heart; and in the third series of his Loci (1569) sin is regarded as the work of the Devil and the human will. God is not the cause of it. Man abused his freedom of will, and a certain measure of will-power remained to him after the fall. Three agents are active in every truly good deed,—the word of God, the Holy Spirit, and the human will, which is called the "power of seeking after grace" (facultas esse applicandi ad gratiam). This theory of co-operation between God and man got the name of synergism. It prevailed in the Leipzig Interm. "God does not deal with man as with a block, but draws him, so that his will co-operates." Pfeiffer, professor in Leipzig, in his De liberate ratione cognitionis (Leipzig, 1634), advocated this view, but was caustically opposed by Amsdorff. Then Flacius took up the controversy, in his Refutation of Pfeiffer's Propositions (1558), declaring that man is absolutely passive (pure passive) in conversion. Man has no more part in it than a stone or piece of wood in the work of the artist who forms out of them a statue. The campaign of the anti-synergists was organized at which he had given a description, Aiy-imnot (edited by Dom. J. Fridericill. . . . confilcitioet condemnatio jelegance. SYNERGISUS, b. about 375, at Cyrere, the capital of the Libyan Pentapolis; studied philosophy and rhetoric in Alexandria, and became a passionate disciple of the heresiarch Arian in 397 or 398. He was posted at the head of an embassy which Cyrere sent to Constantinople, and on that occasion he delivered before the Emperor Arcadius his celebrated speech, On Kingship (edited by Krabinger, Greek and German, Munich, 1835). He staid two years in Constantinople, but returned home in 400, thoroughly disgusted with the state of affairs, of which he had given a description, Aiy-imnot (edited by Krabinger, Greek and German, Salzbach, 1835). For several years he staid on his estates, occupied with agriculture and the chase, studying philosop-y, and writing hymns, Neo-Platonic and pom-pous: in short, leading a life of ease and refined elegance. In 409 or 410 the people of Ptolemais elected him — the Pagan philosopher, a married man — their bishop; and after some hesitation he accepted. Materials for the explanation of this singular fact are found in a letter he wrote to Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, in 410. He speaks of the Christian priesthood with the greatest reverence. He con-siders it as something divine; and in order to ob-tain it he declares himself willing to give up his fields, his garden, the chase, all his amusements. But he will not give up his wife, and he cannot give up his philosophical ideas. Theophilus, though at times a most stubborn and vindictive adherent of strict orthodoxy, gave his consent; and Synesius was consecrated. Very soon, how-ever, after entering upon his office, he came into conflict with the prefect of the province, Andro-nicus. It seems that the church was liable to misuse its right of asylum; and it seems that An-dronicus fell into the opposite extreme, trying to cancel the right altogether. Synesius finally excommunicated him, and the speech he delivered on that occasion is still extant. It gives a very vivid picture of the dreary and unhappy life he led, unable to give up his amusements, his thought about his old friends; and new calamities — the invasion of the barbarians, the loss of his children, etc. — made it still worse. He seems to have died in 414, at all events before the cruel death of Hypa-tia in 415 or 416. His collected works first ap-peared at Liege, 1612, and again in 1833. See SYRIA.

In the middle of the tenth century it was taken by the Fatimite dynasty of Egypt; and toward the close of the eleventh century, Syria was invaded by the Seljukian Turks, and annexed to their empire.

The period of the Crusades continued from A.D. 1099 until A.D. 1291, when Acre was taken by the Mamelukes of Egypt.

For more than two centuries after this period Syria suffered from the fierce wars of the "Shepherd hordes of Tartary," and their brethren the Tartar Slav sovereigns of Egypt. In 1401 Timur the Tartar (Tamerlane) invaded the country, burnt Antioch, Emessa, Baalbek, and Damascus, and either massacred their inhabitants, or sold them into slavery.

In 1517 Syria and Palestine were conquered by the Ottoman Sultan, Selim I., and have continued under Turkish rule to this day, declining in wealth and prosperity until the people of the interior provinces sunk to the lowest point of intellectual and moral degradation.

In 1832 Ibrahim Pacha conquered Syria for his father, Mohammed Ali, but was expelled by the English in 1841, and Syria restored to the Porte.

SYRIA, AND MISSIONS TO SYRIA. 1. History.

I. THE LAND. — Syria and Palestine lie along the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, extending from Egypt and the Sinai desert on the south to the confines of Asia Minor on the north, and reaching from 31° to 36° 30' north latitude. The length of the country is 360 miles, and its breadth from 60 to 100 miles; its area being about 28,000 square miles.

A mountain chain, under different names, runs through the land from north to south, being intersected at different points, thus forming distinct ranges. From the wilderness north of Beersheba, the foot-hills rise to mountains about Hebron; and the broken, undulating range extends north-west to the headland of Carmel. North of the Carmel range lies the plain of Esdraelon, which extends through to the Jordan. Over this plain a railway route has just been surveyed.

North of Esdraelon the range continues broad and broken, to the deep ravine of the Litany, which empties into the sea near Tyre. Beyond the Litany rises the noble range of Lebanon, which runs a hundred miles to the north, varying in height from four thousand to eleven thousand feet, and breaking down north-east of Tripoli into a broad plain, which sweeps from the sea eastward to the Orontes at Hamah, forming the "entrance of Hamath," mentioned by Moses as the northern border of the land of Israel (Num. xxxiv. 8). North of this plain rises the Jebel el Ham, the southern spur of the Nusairiteh range, anciently Barylus Mons, which extends north, and terminates in the beautiful conical peak of Mount Casius at the mouth of the Orontes.

North of the Orontes the range is known as Gawar Dagh, the Amanus of Ptolemy, which extends north fifty miles to Mount Taurus.

The chain of Anti-Lebanon rises in the plain of Hamath, about twenty miles east of the northern end of Lebanon, and runs parallel to the latter, culminating in Mount Hermon, which has an elevation of about ten thousand feet. From Hermon the ridge breaks down into an irregular and lower range, which runs due south along the eastern bank of the Jordan and the Dead Sea to the mountains of Edom.

The political geography of Syria has changed with every change of dynasty for centuries. At present Syria and Palestine constitute one Welaieh, or pachalic, extending from Antioch to Gaza, which is styled the Pachalic of Damascus.

The province of Mount Lebanon was erected into a distinct pachalic after the massacres of 1860; the pacha being always a Latin Christian, appointed by the Porte, with the approval of the great powers of Europe. David Pacha was the first pacha of Lebanon; Franco Pacha, the second; and the next mutserrif was Rustem Pacha, an Italian by birth, a man of enlightened views and liberal education. The present pacha is Wassa Pacha, a Catholic Albanian. Under this regime, Lebanon has become, in proportion to its size, the most prosperous part of the Turkish Empire. Schools are encouraged, roads built, new land cultivated, and everywhere is security to life and property.

III. THE PEOPLE. — The population of Syria in 1881 was estimated at 2,076,300, as follows: —

Mohammedans, Sunnites, and Metawilieh . 1,000,000
Nusairiyeh . 250,000
Maronites . 250,000
Orthodox Greeks . 235,000
Papal sects . 80,000
Jews . 30,000
Isma'ilieh Gypies, etc. . 30,000
Armenians . 20,000
Jacobites . 15,000
Druzes . 100,000
Protestants . 6,300
Bedawin Arabs . 60,000

Total . 2,076,300

The limits of this article forbid a detailed description of these sects; but of the more obscure it may be said, that the Druzes and Nusairiyeh are semi-Pagan; the Bedawin, nominally Muslim, but really ignorant and superstitious despits; the Maronites, devout adherents of the Papacy; the Isma'ilieh and Metawilieh, heretical Muslims: while the Greeks, Armenians, and Jacobites are Oriental Christians.

The bulk of the population in the cities is Mohammedan, excepting Beirut, of whose population of eighty thousand not more than one-third are Mohammedans.

The northern part of Lebanon is almost exclusively Maronite; the southern portion, south of the Damascus road, being chiefly Druze, with scattering villages of Greeks, Maronites, Muslims, and Metawilieh. In Palestine Proper the most of the villagers are Muslims, the Greeks and Papal Greeks being dispersed in Northern Palestine and on the plain of Sharon.

IV. THE NATIVE ORIENTAL CHURCHES are the Orthodox Greek, the Maronite, the Papal Greek, the Jacobite, Armenian, and Papal Armenian.

The Greeks are supposed to number about two hundred and thirty-five thousand. They are Syrians by birth and descent, and speak only the Arabic language. The doctrines and ritual are the same as in Greece and Russia. They differ from the Roman Church in the following points: (1) the calendar, (2) the procession of the Holy Spirit, (3) the use of pictures and the exclusion of images from sacred buildings, (4) the rejection of purgatory, (5) communion in both kinds, (6) the marriage of the secular clergy.

The church is divided into the patriarchates of Antioch and Jerusalem, which, though nominally independent, are really under the control of the Primate of Constantinople.

The Patriarch of Antioch governs the bishoprics of Beirut, Tripoli, Akkar, Latakia, Hamah, Homs, Saidnaya, and Tyre. The patriarchate of Jerusalem includes Palestine and Peres, and has under it the bishoprics of Nazareth, Akka, Lydda, Gaza, Sebastia, Nabalus, Philadelphia, and Petra. Among these the Bishop of Akka is the only one who resides in his diocese: all the others live in the convent at Jerusalem.

The Greek Church allows the reading of the Scriptures by the people, and hence they have become more enlightened than any other of the Syrian sects.

The Syrians, or Jacobites, separated from the Oriental Church on account of the monophysite heresy. The Syrian language is used in the church services, although it is not understood by the people. Their head is the Patriarch of Mar-din. Their number is small, chiefly in Sudud, Kureytem, Hums, Nekb, Damascus, and Aleppo. They are poor and industrious, and receive the Scriptures without opposition.

The Maronites originated as monothelites in the seventh century, although Bishop Dibbs of Beirut has written laboriously and vainly to disprove their heretical origin. Their name was derived from a monk, John Maron, who died in 701. In 1180 they renounced monothelitism, and submitted to the Pope. They are devoted Romanists, and call their part of Lebanon the Holy Mountain.

Although adhering to the Pope, they still retain many of their former peculiarities. Their ecclesiastical language is Syriac. Their patron saint, Maron, is not found in the Roman calendar. They have their own church establishment, and the people regard their Patriarch as not inferior to the Pope. Their secular clergy marry.

Their convents, numbering nearly 100, own the best estates in Lebanon, and support about 2,000 monks and nuns, with a revenue of not less than $350,000.

The people are independent, hardy, and industrious, but are left in gross ignorance, illiteracy, and superstition. Their clergy are educated at Ain Werka; and those trained in Rome are men of fair learning: but the mass of the priests are lamentably ignorant.

The Papal schismatic churches—the Papal Greek, Papal Syrian, and Papal Armenian—have sprung from the missionary efforts of Romish priests and Jesuits during the past two centuries. The Papal Greeks retain the marriage of the clergy, their Arabic service, Oriental calendar, and communion in both kinds.

The Armenian population is confined to the vicinity of Antioch and Aleppo, speaking the Turkish and Armenian languages.

The Jews of Palestine are foreigners, numbering about fifteen thousand; having come from every country on earth, and living chiefly in Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberius, and Safed. But the Jews of Damascus, Aleppo, and Beirut, are natives, speaking the Arabic, and many of them possessed of great wealth.

V. MODERN PROTESTANT MISSIONS IN SYRIA.

Jerusalem and Beirut continued for years the two centres of American missionary labor, until 1843, when the American mission was withdrawn from Jerusalem, and confined to Syria Proper, leaving Palestine to the Church Missionary Society.

In 1871 the Syria mission of the American Board was transferred to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions of the United States, owing to the then recent reunion of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church.

The whole number of American missionaries laboring in Syria under these two boards from 1829 to 1883, is as follows: male missionaries, 58; female missionaries, 63; printers, 4; total, 122.

The missionaries were at first directed to attempt the reform of the Oriental churches, leaving the converts within the Oriental communions; but it soon became necessary to organize a distinct Oriental Evangelical Church.

The great work undertaken by the American Syria Mission, however, was not merely for the two millions in Syria, but, through the medium of the Arabic Scriptures and Christian Arabic literature, for the hundred and seventy-five millions of the Mohammedan world. The work of translating the Bible from the original tongues into Arabic was begun in 1843 by Dr. Eli Smith, who labored assiduously until his death, Jan. 11, 1857.

Only Genesis, Exodus, and the first sixteen chapters of Matthew had received their final revision; but he had revised and nearly prepared for publication, the whole of the New Testament, and all except Jeremiah, Lamentations, and the last fourteen chapters of Isaiah, of the Old Testament.

On his death, Rev. Dr. C. V. A. Van Dyck continued the work of translation. In 1860 the New Testament was completed, and issued from the press; and in 1865 the entire Bible was published, and sent forth to the world. Dr. Smith had prepared in 1837, with the aid of Mr. Homan Halluck, the punches of a new font of Arabic type, made for readers, and readers for books.

A medical class was formed in 1867. In the autumn of 1873 the present permanent buildings at Ras Beirut were occupied. The departments of the college are three, — preparatory, collegiate, and medical, including pharmaceutical. The language of the preparatory and collegiate departments is English; and, in the future, medical instruction will also be in English. The whole number of students in the college in the year 1882-83 was 168. The total number of graduates in pharmacy for the year 1892 was 9; medical, 70; collegiate, 74; total, 153.

Progress has been made in founding a library and scientific museums.

The mission has also three female seminaries, — in Beirut, Sidon, and Tripoli, — with about 100 boarders and 300 day pupils, and 118 common schools, with about 5,000 pupils. A theological seminary building adjoins the college, in which several members of the mission give instruction to candidates for the Christian ministry.

In addition to this, nearly two hundred different books have been printed at the Beirut press; comprising works on medicine, surgery, anatomy and physiology, chemistry, natural philosophy, botany, astronomy,legal, mathematics, geography with atlases, grammar, arithmetic, history, theology, homiletics, church history, evidences of Christianity, mental philosophy, hermeneutics, etc., together with religious books and tracts, and illustrated books for the young, and weekly and monthly journals.

Mr. Butrus Bistany, a learned convert from the Maronite faith, who aided Dr. Eli Smith in the Bible translation, has published a fine dictionary of the Arabic language, in two volumes octavo, 1,200 pages, and is now publishing an Arabic encyclopedia in twelve octavo volumes, 800 pages each, of which the sixth is already completed.

During the year 1882, 21,000,000 pages in Arabic were printed at the Beirut press, making 243,000,000 from the foundation of the press. The demand for the Beirut publications is greater in Egypt than in any other country. The Beirut press has an Arabic type foundry and electrotype apparatus.

Education is a prominent branch of the mission work in Syria. The first missionaries found the people in a deplorable state of intellectual and moral ignorance. The only schools were the Muslim madrishehs, attached to the mosques, and the clerical training-school of the Maronites in Ain Wurka, Mount Lebanon. Books were to be made for readers, and readers for books.

Drs. Thomson and Van Dyck founded a seminary for boys in Abeeib in 1846, which was placed under the care of Mr. Calhoun in 1849, and continued in his care until 1876. It was the highest literary institution in Syria for years, until the founding of the Syrian Protestant College in Beirut.

This institution was incorporated by the Legislature of New York in 1863, and is under the control of a board of trustees residing there. The college began with a preparatory class in 1865, and the college proper opened in the fall of 1866. A medical class was formed in 1867. In the autumn of 1873 the present permanent buildings at Ras Beirut were occupied. The departments of the college are three, — preparatory, collegiate, and medical, including pharmaceutical. The language of the preparatory and collegiate departments is English; and, in the future, medical instruction will also be in English. The whole number of students in the college in the year 1882-83 was 168. The total number of graduates in pharmacy for the year 1892 was 9; medical, 70; collegiate, 74; total, 153.
Fourteen native evangelical churches have been organized, of which four have native ordained pastors; and twenty-seven licensed preachers aid in the work of evangelization. The number of communicants is about 1,000, of whom 400 are women. Eighteen Sunday schools contain about 4,000 scholars. The number of Protestant adherents is about 4,000.

Medical mission work has received especial attention, both in hospital services and in medical practice among the poor in the interior towns and villages.

The American Bible Society and the American and London Religious Tract societies have given substantial aid in the printing and publishing work of the mission.

(b) The Irish Presbyterian Mission in Damascus was founded in 1843. The United Presbyterian Church of the United States soon entered upon the work, and continued to co-operate with it until a few years since, when the latter church concentrated its work upon Egypt. Rev. Messrs. Crawford and Phillips, with a corps of lady-teachers, now carry on the work, with 14 catechists, 7 preaching-stations, 110 communicants, and 430 pupils in their schools. Their work embraces Damascus and vicinity, and the eastern and southern parts of Anti-Lebanon.

(c) The Church of England Missions in Palestine have their centre at Jerusalem, and embrace (1) the London Jews Society, with 8 foreign laborers, 8 native teachers, 80 communicants, and 2 schools with 104 pupils; (2) the Church Missionary Society, with 20 European laborers, 4 ordained natives, 37 catechists, 24 female teachers, 25 preaching-stations, 214 communicants, 45 schools with 1,142 pupils.

The Protestant bishopric of Jerusalem, founded by Frederick William IV. of Prussia, is supported half by Prussia and half by England. The first bishop was Dr. Michael S. Alexander; the second, Dr. Samuel Gobat; and the third, Dr. Barclay, who died in 1881. At present there is no incumbent. See JERUSALEM, EPISCOPAL SEE OF ST. JAMES I.

The Church Missionary Society labor in Palestine proper as far north as Acre, and east of the Jordan.

(d) The German Evangelical Missions embrace (1) the German Deaconesses of Kaiserswerth, whose work comprises orphan-training, higher education, and hospital nursing (they began labor in Sidon in 1860 after the massacres, then transferred their work to Beirut, where they have spacious premises, and are engaged in a work which is of the greatest value to the people of Syria. They have in Beirut 16 deaconesses, 6 native female assistants, and 240 pupils. They have also the care of nursing the indoor patients to the number of 500 in the Johanniter Hospital in Beirut. In Jerusalem four of the deaconesses act as nurses in the hospital, with about 700 indoor patients annually); (2) German chaplains in Beirut and Jerusalem, who preach to the German and French speaking Protestants; (3) The Jerusalem Verein of Berlin, which supports Dr. Reinieke at Jerusalem, and Mr. Müller at Bethlehem, whose work embraces 185 communicants, 8 schools with 296 pupils.

(e) The British Syrian Schools, founded by the late Mrs. J. Bowen Thompson, and now conducted by her sister, Mrs. A. Mentor Mott, are doing a great work for female education in Syria. They have schools in Beirut, Damascus, Baalbek, Tyre, Hasheya, Bukfeiya, Mukhtara, Zelah, and Ain Zeha. There is also a girls' school, 12 catechists, 22 catechists, 75 female teachers, 24 Biblewomen, and 30 schools with 2,878 girls and 452 boys; total, 3,330 pupils.

(f) The Free Church of Scotland has a mission in the Metn district of Mount Lebanon, in connection with the Lebanon schools' committee. This mission has 23 catechists, 7 female teachers, 35 communicants, 21 schools, and 882 pupils. Rev. W. Carslaw, M.D., labors in harmony and close connection with the American mission.

(g) The Society of Friends in England and America have a mission in Lebanon at Brummana, and also schools at Ramallah and vicinity in Palestine. Mr. Theophilus Waldemeier of the mission at Brummana was one of the captives in Abyssinia under King Theodore, and has labored industriously in founding the Boys' Industrial School, the Girls' Boarding-school, and the Hospital and Dispensary, together with various village schools. The society have 10 schools with 300 pupils.

Other societies besides those mentioned above are laboring in Syria and Palestine, the chief of which are the Church of Scotland Mission to the Jews, Miss Taylor's Muslim Girls' School, the Society for promoting Female Education in the East, the Reformed Presbyterian Mission in Latakiah, the Chishona Orphan-House Mission, Miss Arnot's School, the Mary Baldwin Memorial School, and Miss Mangan's Medical Mission (the last three at Jaffa).

The whole number of foreign laborers, male and female, in Syria and Palestine in 1881 was 191, with 581 native teachers and catechists, 26 churches, 140 preaching-stations, 1,700 communicants, 6,311 Protestant adherents, 302 schools with 14,024 pupils, of whom 7,475 were boys and 7,149 girls.

The medical missions are 12 in number, with 15 physicians, 24 nurses, 1,805 indoor-patients, and 73,432 outdoor-patients in polyclinique.

In addition to the Protestant educational institutions in Syria and Palestine, numerous schools have been opened by other sects, foreign and native; and the Turkish Government is urging upon the provincial governors the opening of medrissas for the Muslim children.

VI. THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC MISSIONS IN SYRIA AND PALESTINE may be said to date back to the Crusades, when the Latin priests made an attempt to convert the Oriental churches to Rome. But within the past two centuries their efforts, as stated above, have resulted in the founding of various affiliated churches, known as Greek-Catholic, Syrian-Catholic, Armenian-Catholic, etc. More recently the Jesuits, Franciscans, and Lazarists have set themselves to the work of caring for these native Catholic sects proselytizing the Oriental sects, and counteracting the influence of Protestant missions.

The Jesuits have a college in Beirut with 250 pupils, and other schools with 1,000 pupils. They have also a large printing-house, and made, under Dr. Von Hamm, an Arabic translation of SYRIA.

SYRIAC LITERATURE.

The Franciscans have a monastery and church, the Capuchins, a church and schools, and the Lazarists, schools, in Beirut. The Lazarists also have a large boys' boarding-school at Ainturna in Mount Lebanon.

The French institution of the Sœurs de Charité de St. Vincent de Paul embraces an orphanage of about 600 pupils, and a day-school and boarding-school.

The Dames de Nazareth have also erected a stately building east of the Damascus Road, and have about 180 pupils.

The most important of the native Catholic institutions are the Maronite Bishop Dibbè's college with 250 pupils, and the College Patriarchal Grec Catholique with nearly 300 boys.

The city of Beirut takes the lead in education, and has become a city of schools, as the following official statistics for 1881 will show:

While the Protestant schools are 30 in number, with 128 teachers, 575 male pupils, 2,429 female pupils, a total of 3,004, the non-Protestant schools (as Orthodox Greek, Maronite, Jesuit, Papal Greek, Lazarist Monks, Sisters of Charity, Sisters of Nazareth, Maronite Bishop Dibbè's, Mohammedan, Jewish, Italian, Madame Melhamy [a Maronite lady], and the Catholic St. Joseph's) number 58, with 301 teachers, 4,893 boys, 3,492 girls, a total of 8,385 pupils. Adding to these the 3,004 Protestant pupils, we have 11,389 pupils in the schools of Beirut.

The most remarkable proof of a popular awakening on the subject of education is the opening of boys' and girls' schools by the Mohammedans in Beirut, Damascus, Tripoli, Sidon, Hums, and other places.

They have erected neat school-edifices, fitted with seats and desks (the girls' schools with American sewing-machines); and in Beirut they now have 1,150 boys and 420 girls under instruction.

One of the great obstacles to the evangelization of the Mohammedans is the political-religious alliance between Islam and the State. This has increased the fanaticism of the Muslim masses. But contact with European influence, the growth of education, the reading of the Bible, the newspaper press, and the spread of a pure Christianity, are gradually changing the minds of the Mohammedans. In 1860 the Muslims everywhere sympathized with the massacre of Christians. In 1882 the Muslims of Beirut formed a relief committee to aid the ten thousand Christian refugees who fled from the Muslim fanatical outbreak in Egypt.

Diplomacy can never regenerate the East. The patient work of education, the preaching of the gospel, the distribution of God's word among the masses, and the diffusion of Christian literature, will gradually disarm prejudice, awaken inquiry, promote social harmony, destroy polygamy, reform the Oriental churches, and bring the followers of Islam to the religion of Jesus Christ. Thus will the press, the church, and the school cooperate in hastening the true regeneration of that most interesting, and, until recently, so degraded land.

HENRY II. JESSUP (of Beirut, Syria).

SYRIAC LITERATURE. The literature of the Syriac tongue is mostly biblical and ecclesiastical; the rest being historical, poetical, legendary, folk-lore, and translations (chiefly) from the Greek classics and Fathers. The extinct Syriac literature (proper) begins with the second century A.D., and ends shortly after the Crusades; though modern works exist, related to the earlier, like the Latin of the middle ages to that of the classic period. The modern Syriac, easily acquired by a reader of ancient Syriac or of Arabic, has a literature of its own, both native, and fostered by the American and the Jesuit missionaries, and current from Mosul to Urmi (Oromiah). For an account of this language and literature, see Dr. Justin Perkins's Eight Years in Persia, Andover, 1843; also a partial bibliography in the Introductory Remarks of Rev. D. T. Stoddard's Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language (in Journal of the American Oriental Society, also separately, New Haven, 1855); also Socin's Die Neu-Aramäischen Dialekte von Urmiia bis Mosul (autolithographic text, with German translation, Tübingen, Laupp, 1882); and Nöldeke's notice of the same in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 36, pp. 800 ff. The words of this dialect are incorporated into R. Payne Smith's Thesaurus Syriacus, vol. i. Oxon., 1879. The chief monument of this dialect is the Bible by Dr. Justin Perkins (Urmi, New Testament, 1846; Old Testament, 1852). and, next, a manuscript lexicon, Syriac-English, compiled principally by Deacon Joseph, Dr. Perkins's assistant and translator. (See art. PERKINS.) Other works are missionary literature, Protestant and Catholic, with a few native historical, poetical, and moral works. A great portion of this literature is still extant only in manuscript.

Another dialect, called Turdi, is spoken in the Mesopotamian region of Tūr 'Abdin, a portion of which has been reduced to writing, and published by Eugen Prym and Albert Socin. For an account of this dialect, see Prym and Socin's Der Neu-Aramäische Dialekt von Tūr 'Abdin (Göttingen, Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 1881, 2 vols.), and by Socin in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 36, p. 296 ff. Neither the modern Syriac nor the Turdi has yet superseded the ancient Syriac in the church service-books, except among the Protestants.

The ancient Syriac literature might be treated under various divisions, but the most convenient is that of age. There are two distinct periods: I. From the second century to the Mohammedan conquest, A.D., 636; II. From the

Mohammedan conquest to the decay of Syriac as a spoken language, A.D. 636-1318; III. From 1318 onward, when Arabic was established as the common vernacular, and writers wrote in either tongue, and some in Greek also. Throughout, the Syriac maintained itself as a beautiful and flexible language; easily receiving accessions from other tongues, abounding always in Grecisms and Greek words, till it even naturalized French and English words in the times of the Crusades, and later.

Period I., Second Century to A.D. 536. — Chiefly worthy of note are the Bible versions. First, doubtless, the Curetonian, dating, probably, from the second century, extant only in fragments of sixth-century manuscripts (found at the convent of Sta. Maria Dei ara, in the Nitrian Desert), named from the discoverer, and published by him (London, 1858); other fragments privately printed by W. Wright [London, 1872]. Second, the Peshitto, a revision of the Curetonian, perhaps, which probably assumed its present shape in the fourth century; a noble version, and the best monument of the ancient language. The New Testament lacks the Epistles, Second Peter, Second and Third John, and Jude, with the Apocalypse. Third, the Philoxenian, made by the chorepiscopus Polycarp, A.D. 508, for Philoxenus, Bishop of Hierapolis (or Mabug). This was based on the Peshitto. It is probably extant in those Epistles which are lacking in the Peshitto, but printed in the common editions of the Syriac New Testament; and in the Gospels it is probably most nearly represented by a manuscript belonging to the Syriac-Protestant College at Beirut, and brought to light by the present writer. (See Notes on the BeirZt Syriac Codex, in Jour. Soc. Bibl. Lit. and Exegesis, 1882, pp. 2 ff.) Fourth, the Harklesian, a recension of the Philoxenian, made by Thomas of Harkel, A.D. 616. The Gospels are extant in several manuscripts. The rest of the New Testament, except the Apocalypse, is extant in one manuscript. Fifth, contemporaneous with the Philoxenian, and almost a part of the same labor, is the Hexaplar version of sundry portions of the Old Testament, made by Paul of Tella, A.D. 616. Sixth, the Jerusalem version, extant only in portions of an Evangelistarium in the Vatican Library (published at Verona, 1861, by Count F. Miniscalchi Erizzo), and a few fragments published by Land in his Anecdola (tom. iv., Lugd. Bat., 1875). A few other versions of portions (at least) of the Bible are extant only in scraps and quotations.

In this connection it is to be mentioned the Diastessaron of Tatian the Assyrian, which was either originally composed in Syriac, or had its chief circulation in a Syriac version. The work itself is now lost; but a commentary thereon by Ephrem Syrus (fourth century) is extant in an Armenian translation (published with a Latin version at Venice, 1836; Latin version again, revised, Venice, 1876). Tatian's work dates about A.D. 155-170, and is the most important early witness to the general recognition of the four Gospels.

Other works of this early period were translations of: epistles, of which Ephrem Syrus made an Armenian version (published with a Latin version at Venice, 1836; Latin version again, revised, Venice, 1876); Titus (of Marcion), of the Festal Letters of Athanasius (extant in one of the earliest known Syriac manuscripts, discovered by Cureton, and published by him at London, 1848), of portions of Eusebius, of Josephus, etc. The commentaries, and especially the hymns and homilies of Ephrem Syrus (fourth century, deacon of Edessa) have been hitherto as noted as any non-biblical Syriac remains. (The homily, in Syriac, is usually a sermon in verse, heptaasyllabic, octosyllabic, or dodecaasyllabic.) Ephrem was inspired to sing by the earlier poetry of Bar Dasees the Gnostic. Ephrem is the greatest name in early Syriac literature and sainthood, and many works of others have wrongly been attributed to him. His hymns and homilies are beautiful and poetic, but very didactic and dogmatic.

A throng of writers — homilists, chroniclers, and translators — belong to this period, many of whose works are lost, and many others extant only in manuscript, for a catalogue of whom reference is best had to Aug. Friedrich Pfeiffer's condensation of J. S. Assemani's Bibliothek Oriental., Erlangen, 1776. Of especial note are Joshua the Stylite, who published his Chronicle (A.D. 507) was here published by W. Wright (Cambridge, 1882); Jacob, or James, of Sarug, of whose works one of the most curious is the Homily on the Baptism of Constantine, published at Rome, 1892, with Italian translation and notes, by Arthur L. Frothingham, jun. Of very great importance is the anonymous Chronicle of Edessa (circa A.D. 550), containing a great wealth of church and secular history. Edessa was the literary home of the Syriac tongue, as Antioch of the Syrian Church.

The Syriac hymnology and liturgical literature of this period deserves a volume for their treatment, if for no other purpose than to show their influence on the Western hymnology and liturgies.

The publication of many important works of this period has been accomplished in great part by the enterprise of scholars of the present generation.

Period II., A.D. 536-1318. — During this period chroniclers and poets were more in fashion, and they have preserved many important matters of history that otherwise would have been lost. Lexicographers and grammarians also, with law-writers, scientific authors, collectors of proverbs and riddles, were more in vogue. And they have preserved many important matters of history that otherwise would have been lost. Lexicographers and grammarians also, with law-writers, scientific authors, collectors of proverbs and riddles, likewise abounded in this period; although almost every writer was an ecclesiastic of some grade, or a monk. Prominent is Dionysius of Tell Mahre, a Jacobite bishop and patriarch (flor. A.D. 750-848), established in power by the Caliph Abdallah. His Chronicle was written before he became bishop, or before A.D. 778; and in it he treated of historical subjects from the beginning of the world to about A.D. 755. His Chronicle incorporated, and preserved as well, the Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite above mentioned. A long list of chroniclers followed, until we reach the important name of Dionysius Bar Salibi, bishop of Amida (flor. circa A.D. 1154-71), whose commentaries, theological works, and liturgies are of great value for critical purposes. Then, after another swarm of writers, appears Gregory Bar-Hebraeus, called also Abu-l-Farag (Abuilpharagius) (b. A.D. 1226). His Chronicle and commentaries are very voluminous, and among Syriac authors he ranks among the very first for utility and value, although of so late a date.
SYRIAC LITERATURE.

A long list of writers on other topics might be named as belonging in this period, but we can stop to mention but one for his importance,—Joshua (Jesus) Bar-Bahlul (circa A.D. 963), who published a lexicon of his tongue that is still extant. Several grammars of the period are extant, both in manuscript and in print.

To this period belong many of the Nestorian (a word which ought to be replaced by "Chaldean") writer, Ebed-Jesu, metropolitan of Soba and Armenia (d. 1318). His most noted and noteworthy book is his catalogue of the Sacred Scriptures and of patristic writings or writers, including many, if not most, of the known Greek and Syrian Fathers. This work, like that of Gregory Bar Hebraeus, is among those indispensable to the biblical critic.

This period was one of great literary activity, as well as of life, throughout the Syriac-speaking peoples. Missions were extended eastward to the Pacific. It was in A.D. 791 that the famous Chinese-Syriac monument was set up, which records the planting of Christianity in China by the Syrian missionaries. Copies of this tablet, in facsimile, are in several of our libraries; and notices and translations appear in a long series of books in many languages, from Kircher (1631) to Doell and Williams. (See, e.g., Pfeiffer, ubi supra, pp. 493 ff.)

Period III., from A.D. 1318 onward.—The death of Ebed-Jesu marks the close of the classic period. After him there follows a very long and numerous series of writers of less note, among whom few, if any, could require particular mention. Their works are chiefly valuable to the historian, both in manuscript and in print.

Concerning the development of the language, the contrast between the Peshitto and the Harklesian versions appears very strong to one who reads only those specimens of the literature. Such a reader is apt to suppose that the Peshitto represents the pure Syriac, and the Harklesian a strong Greek element; but a more extended acquaintance with the language of the fifteenth century, author of a valuable article, see respective arts. See also Semitic Languages, Syria.

SYRIAC VERSIONS. See Bible Versions.

SYROPULOS, Sylvester, a Greek ecclesiastic of the fifteenth century, author of a valuable history of the Council of Ferrara-Florence (see art.). He was δικαιοδοτής ("law-officer") and chief sacristan in Constantinople, one of the five dignitaries immediately about the patriarch. He was passionately devoted to his church, and opposed to the Latin. Nevertheless, he was a delegate to the Council of Ferrara-Florence, especially designed to effect a union between the Greek and Latin churches, took part in its deliberations, and by command of his sovereign signed the decree. This act of weakness he deeply lamented; and by his efforts to defeat the practical effect of the decree he encountered such opposition, that he was forced to retire to private life. The only edition of his work is the copy of the Paris Codex, which unhappy lacks the first book, issued by Robert Creyghton, Vera hist. unionis, . . . see Concilii Florentini exactissima narratio. The Hague, 1690. See Schröder: Kirchengesch., vol. xxxiv. pp. 411 sqq.
TABERNACLE (οἰκέων μοίραμ, or ὠλέλα ἐδαυθ, or miskhān ha-eduth) denotes the movable sanctuary of the Hebrews prior to the time of Solomon. Other terms are mishkān (Exod. xxv. 8; Lev. xxiv. 1), mishkān (Exod. xxv. 9), bayith, i.e., house (Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Josh. vi. 24, ix. 23; Judg. xviii. 31), ὠλέλ, i.e., the tent, also ἑγκατέστησις, i.e., temple (1 Sam. i. 9, iii. 3), and ma'ōn, i.e., dwelling (1 Sam. ii. 29, 32).

PREPARATION OF THE BUILDING. — As Jehovah went before the people in the pillar of cloud and of fire, as it was his intention to show and to reveal his presence unto the people, whether they were on the way or in their tents, therefore he promised unto the people, " in all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee " (Exod. xx. 24). To make this place of blessed meeting a visible reality, not only does God show unto Moses the model pattern of the tabernacle and of all the instruments (Exod. xxv. 9, 40, xxxvi. 30, xxxvii. 8), but the people are also directed to bring freewill offerings, or rather the material, which is to be used under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab. The sin of the golden calf apparently delays the execution. On the intercession of their leader, a tent is pitched robably that of Moses himself, which had hitherto been the headquarters of consultation) outside of the camp, to be provisionally the tabernacle of meeting. This provisional tent is accepted of God, and dedicated by his divine presence (Exod. xxxiii. 9). After God has become reconciled again to his people, the work is resumed. The people offer the necessary materials in excess of what was wanted (xxxvi. 5, 6). Other workmen (xxxvi. 2) and workwomen (xxxv. 25) place themselves under the direction of Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, and Aholiab of the tribe of Dan.

STRUCTURE OF THE TABERNACLE AND THE COURT (Exod. xxv.-xxvii., xxxiv.-xxxviii.). — 1. The Tabernacle formed a rectangle of thirty cubits long, ten wide, and ten high. The outside length was thirty cubits and a half; the outside width, eleven cubits. The walls were built of forty-eight planks of shittim-wood, overlaid with gold on both sides, ten cubits high, and a cubit and a half broad. Of these boards, which were in close contact with each other, twenty were on the north, and twenty on the south side: for the west end were eight boards. From the foot of each plank came out two " tenons " (γυάλα), which were thrust into two silver sockets, of which two were prepared for each plank, each socket being the weight of a talent of silver (xxxviii. 27). These tenons were to be " coupled together. " The walls or planks were bound together by five bars or bolts, thrust into rings attached to each plank. These bars ran along; one is said to have gone in the middle. The structure was adorned by four kinds of hangings. The roofing material was canvas, consisting of ten " curtains, " each twenty-eight cubits long and four cubits wide. Ten of these were to be " coupled," i.e., sewed together, five in one sheet, and five in another. This was done by means of fifty " loops " and as many taches of " gold." The connecting line run over the curtain of the Holy of holies. This curtain was of byssus, with figures of cherubim stitched upon it apparently with the art of the embroiderer. The second set of curtains, or tent-roof, of goat's hair, called also ὠλέλ, consisted of eleven pieces of stuff, each thirty cubits long and four cubits wide. They were sewed into two large cloths, and suspended on fifty knobs, or taches, of brass by means of fifty loops. A coat of "rams' skins dyed red, and tachash (A. V. badgers') skins, " was furnished as an additional covering (xxxvi. 14, 并不是很, i.e., from upward). The entrance to the tabernacle was towards the east, and closed by a " hanging " of byssus, and embroidered, suspended upon five copper-sOCKETED and gilded pillars of acacia-wood by means of golden hooks. A " veil " divided the interior into two apartments, called respectively the " holy place " and the " most holy." This partition-cloth was suspended upon four pillars precisely like those of the door " hanging," except that their sockets were of silver.

2. The Court was a large rectangular enclosure a hundred cubits long and fifty broad. It was composed of a frame of four sides of distinct pillars, with curtains hung upon them. The sixty wooden pillars were five cubits in height. At the bottom they were protected or shed by sockets of brass. At the top these pillars had a capital, which was overlaid with silver. Connected with the head of the pillar were hooks and rods, joining one pillar to another. These rods were laid upon the hooks, and served to attach the hangings to, and suspend from them. The hooks and rods were silver. The hangings of the court were of twisted shesh, that is, a fabric woven out of twisted yarn of the material called shesh (A. V., fine linen).

THE FURNITURE OR " INSTRUMENTS OF THE TABERNACLE. — The only piece of furniture within the inner or most holy place was the ark of the covenant (q. v.). The furniture of the outer room, or holy place, consisted of the altar of incense, the table of shewbread, and the " golden candlestick " (q. v.). In the court was the altar of burnt offering and the laver (q. v.).

3. Provisions for the Transport (Num. iv. 4-38). The Levitical family of Kohath, to which Aaron's family also belonged, had to carry all the vessels of the Holy of holies (Num. iv. 4, 15). They came the family of Gershon with the tabernacle and its lighter furniture, while the Merarites had charge of its heavier appurtenances. The sons of Aaron prepared for the removal by covering every thing in the Holy of holies with a purple cloth. The Kohathites had to carry every thing on their shoulders: the Merarites had four wagons for their transport.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TABERNACLE. — As the name indicates, it was to be the dwelling of Jehovah in the midst of his people. As king of his people he dwells in his palace. His throne is over the κοπηρευτής ("the mercy-seat "); between the cherubim, which, however, must not be taken in an anthropomorphic manner. If there was to be a mutual relation between the holy and living God and his people, which he selected from among the nations of the earth to be the bearer of his name, revelation, and word, it was necessary to have some means of approaching God. This access is mediated in a typical (prophecy of the Messiah) and a typical (prophecy of the Messiah) manner. In the court, as the lowest grade, the people meet partly to bring their offerings to Jehovah, partly to hear the revelation of his divine will, and to receive his mercy and blessing. Being sinful, the people do not dare yet to enter the sanctuary: they need human mediators, the priests, who in their stead present themselves to God. But the priests themselves can only approach Jehovah in an immediate manner in their high priest, who only once in the year can enter the Holy of holies, where the throne of Jehovah's glory is. This leads us to the New Testament idea of the Tabernacle (cf. Heb. viii. 5, ix. 1-14 sq. x. 1, 19 sq.; cf. Col. ii. 17; Eph. ii. 14-22; Rev. xxi. 3), — that the entire structure of the tabernacle was nothing but a typical prophecy of the New Testament economy, according to which, after the eternal high priest had entered the Holy of holies with his own blood, all curtains are removed, and that all who have become Abraham's children by faith have a daily access to the mercy-seat, and that they shall once also enter the Holy of holies of the heaven (Heb. xii. 14 sq., 25 sq.). As to the symbolic significance of the tabernacle, there can be no doubt that the structure of the same was obviously determined by a complex and profound symbolism; but its meaning remains one of the things which will always be guess-work. Jewish rabbis as well as Christian theologians have exercised their ingenuity, with more or less success. Thus the materials, not less than the forms, in the Holy of holies, was significant. The metals, colors, and numbers had their signification. Thus three is the numerical "signature" of the Divine Being and of all that stands in any real relation to God (Num. vi. 24-29; Isa. vi. 3). The number three being the "signature" of God, of the Creator, of the holy of holies, of the created things of the world; not of the world as "without form, and void," but as a kosmos, as the revelation of God so far as nature can reveal him. Ten is the symbol of completeness and perfection, while fes represents one-half of the "signature" of perfection. Seven (i.e., 3+4) is the note of union between God and the world, the number of religion, the signature of salvation, blessing, peace, perfection. Twelve denotes by multiplication the combination of the signature of God and the signature of the world (3 x 4).

History of the Tabernacle. — After the same access is completed in a direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab, it was dedicated on the first day of the second year from the exodus, and the ritual appointed for it began (Exod. xi. 2). After the entrance into Canaan, the tabernacle was in the camp of Israel, at Gilgal (Josh. iv. 19, v. 10, vi. 24; ix. 6, x. 6, xiv. 9), and, after the taking and division of the country, in the camp of the SANCTUARY, where it connected itself with the worship of the high places (1 Kings iii. 4), while the ark remained at Kirjath-jearim. The capture of Jerusalem, and the erection there of a new tabernacle, with the ark, of which the old had been deprived (2 Sam. vi. 17; 1 Chron. xv. 1), left it little more than a traditional, historical sanctuary. The provisional tabernacle erected by David was to make room for the temple which he intended to build. His purpose was fulfilled by Solomon, who had the tabernacle, and the ark, and all the holy vessels, brought to Jerusalem, and put in some place within the temple, to remain there as holy relics (1 Kings viii. 4; 2 Chron. v. 5). Tabernacle is a term that originally referred to an amnby above the altar, for the preservation of the Eucharist, contained in the pyx, which had the shape of a tower, more often that of a dove. This amnby stood either on the altar, or was suspended. From the fourteenth century on, the pyx containing the Eucharist was preserved in a stationary place called tabernacles, built either in the form of a tower, and standing near the wall or a pillar, or made like coffers, which were more or less decorated. In both forms they were on the right side of the altar. They form an indispensable piece of furniture in the Church of Rome. In the Protestant Church, however, is the ultra-sacramental use of the body of the Lord, they have no liturgical value; yet as works of art there still exist some very fine tabernacles in some evangelical churches, as in Nuremberg and Ulm. Since the sixteenth century, the tabernacles have been connected with the altar in the manner of the costa. The tabernacle, as well as the pyx, is also termed kiborium, which must not be connected with the Latin cibus (i.e., food), but with the Greek kiborion, meaning the canopy on the TABERNACLES. The Feast of (NAGN JD.

The tabernacles were designed to be a reminder of the time when the Israelites dwelt in booths in the wilderness (Lev. xxiii. 43), and lasted seven days Lev. xxiii. 39), from the 15th to the 21st of Ibris. The people were to dwell in booths (Lev. xxiii. 42), and to take branches of palm-trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook. This festival was emphatically a festival of rejoicing; and a proverb in Sukkah says, "He who has never seen the rejoicing at the pouring out of the water of Siloam has never seen rejoicing in his life". Burnt, meat, drink, and other offerings were to be made. Deuteronomy alone designates the place of celebrating the feast,—"the place which the Lord shall choose" (xvi. 15). Zechariah (xiv. 16) insists upon its celebration, and Nehemiah (viii. 17) says the feast had not been celebrated since the days of Joshua as it was in his day. This notice cannot exclude, however, all celebration of the festival during the interval (1 Kings viii. 2; 2 Chron. vii. 8-10).

The booths were erected in the streets, outside the walls of Jerusalem, and on the roofs. Joy and mirth prevailed in them. The main features of the public celebration were the sacrifices by day and the illumination at night. Four hundred and twenty-four priests were in attendance, to serve those who brought sacrifices. Once every day the entire congregation encompassed the altar of burnt offerings, waving palm-branches. On the seventh day this was repeated seven times, in memory of Jericho. The branches mentioned in Lev. xxiii. 40 were tied into a bunch, and called lulab. During the sacrifices the great Hallel (Ps. xcvii.-xcviii.) was sung, and at the twenty-fourth verse of Ps. cxviii. every one shook his palm-branch a number of times. After the sacrifices the priestly blessing was conferred. Wine, and water from the brook of Siloam, were used for the drink-offering, both morning and evening. One of the priests carried a cup of the water through the water-gate of the temple, when another priest took it, with the words, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation" (Isa. xii. 3). The priests and people took up the sheaves and the branches for such as were to the priest, and gave it with wine, and poured it out into a duct which led to the Kidron. The origin of this custom is unknown; but it is very generally agreed that our Lord had reference to it when he said, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink" (John vii. 37). The words of John viii. 12 ("I am the light of the world") seem to contain an allusion to the great illumination which took place on the evenings of the feast of tabernacles; four golden lamps, or candelabra, in the Presence-chamber, the women, being illuminated. Upon the lighting of these lights, there followed dancing and processions.

The eighth day of the feast, a sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 39), had a special name, yom azereth, and marked the dismantling of the booths. The seventh day marked the crowning of the feast, and was undoubtedly "the great day of the feast," referred to in John vii. 37.

TABOR (mount). This interesting and remarkable mount in Palestine, at the boundary between Issachar and Zebulon (Josh. xix. 22; Judg. iv. 6, 12, 14), rises abruptly from the northeastern arm of the plain of Esdraelon, and stands entirely insulated, except on the west, where a narrow ridge connects it with the hills of Nazareth. It presents to the eye, as seen from a distance, a beautiful appearance; being so symmetrical in its proportions, and rounded off like a hemisphere, yet varying in shape and aspect from different directions, being more conical when seen from the east or west. It is now called Jebel et-Tür. The body of the mountain consists of the peculiar limestone of the country. Mount Tabor lies about six or eight miles almost due east from Nazareth. The ascent is usually made on the west side, and it requires three-quarters of an hour, or an hour, to reach the top. The path is circuitous, and at times steep. The trees and bushes are generally so thick as to intercept the prospect; but now and then the traveller, as he ascends, comes to an open spot which reveals to him a magnificent view of the plain. All round the top are the foundations of a thick wall built of large stones. The chief remains are upon the ledge of rocks on the south of the little basin, and especially towards its eastern end. The walls and traces of a fortress are seen here. Whilst now a little chapel stands here, where the priests from Nazareth perform divine service, in olden times the mountain had cities and a large population. Thus a city of Tabor is mentioned in the lists of 1 Chron. vi. as a city of the Merarite Levites in the tribe of Zebulon (77). Mount Tabor makes a prominent figure in ancient history. Here Barak assembled his forces against Sisera (Judg. iv. 6-15). The brothers of Gideon were murdered here by Zebah and Zalmunna (viii. 18, 19). In the year B.C. 218 Antiochus the Great got possession of Tabor by stratagem, and strengthened its fortifications. In the monastic ages Tabor, in consequence, partly, of a belief that it was the scene of the Saviour's transfiguration, was crowded with hermits (but there is no foundation for this tradition); partly because, according to Matt. xvii. 1, Mark ix. 2, Luke ix. 28, the transfiguration must have taken place on some high mountain near Cesarea-Philippi; and partly because a fortified and inhabited place could hardly have been a proper place for such a scene. In the tenth century again fortified the mount, at whose base the main street runs from Egypt to Damascus. In their time Mount Tabor was an archiepiscopal see belonging to the Patriarch of Jerusalem. Tancred built there a church, and the Cluniacensians a monastery. But all was lost in the battle of Hattin, July 6, 1187.
The Saracens, under Saladin, destroyed the fortresses; and in 1283 Broccardis only found the remains of palaces, convents, and churches there.

Tadmor. Mentioned only in 2 Chron. viii. 4, is undoubtedly the name of that ancient city which to the Greeks, Romans, and to modern Europe, is known by the name of Palmyra. In the Chronicles the city is mentioned as having been built by Solomon after his conquest of Hamath-zobah, and is named in conjunction with "all the store cities which he built in Hamath." It was probably built with the view of securing an interest in, and command over, the great caravan traffic from the East, similar to that which he had established in respect to the trade between Syria and Egypt. We do not again read of Tadmor in Scripture, nor is it likely that the Hebrews retained possession of it long after the death of Solomon. No other source acquaints us with the subsequent history of the place, till it re-appears in the account of Pliny (Hist. Nat., v. 24) as a considerable town, which, along with its territory, formed an independent state between the Roman and Parthian Empires. In the second century it seems to have been beautified by the Emperor Hadrian. As may be inferred from a statement of Stephansus of Byzantium, as to the name of the city having been changed to Hadrianopolis ("city of Hadrian"). Under Septimius Severus it became the capital of a province of Mesopotamia, and defied Sapor beneath the walls of Ctesiphon (A.D. 260). The service thus rendered to Rome were so great, that Odenathus was associated in the sovereignty with Gallienus (A.D. 264). He enjoyed his dignity but a short time, being murdered only three years afterwards. Zenobia, his widow, succeeded Odenathus, and ruled the country during a period of five years. In A.D. 271 the Emperor Aurelian turned his arms against her; and Zenobia, having put Antioch, and in another at Emesa, she drove her back upon her desert home. She then marched his veterans across the parched plains, and invested Palmyra. Zenobia attempted to escape, but was captured, and brought back to the presence of the conqueror. She was taken to Rome, and there she was led along in front of the triumphant Aurelian. Palmyra, which was taken in A.D. 272, never recovered its former opulence. Twenty years later, under the reign of Diocletian, the walls of the city were rebuilt. It eventually became the seat of a metropolitan see, but never recovered any importance. When the successors of Mohammed extended their conquests beyond the confines of Arabia, Palmyra became subject to the caliphs. From this period Palmyra seems to have gradually fallen into decay. Not once is it mentioned in the history of the crusades. In 1173 it was visited by Benjamin of Tudela, who found there a large Jewish population, besides Mohammedans and Christians. It was again visited in 1751 by Wood and Dawkins. In our century many travellers have visited the place, and their descriptions are very valuable. A complete list of all travels till the year 1854 is given by Ritter, Erdkunde von Kleinasiaten, vol. viii. 2d division, 3d section, pp. 1432 sq.

Tai-Ping (great peace), a Chinese religious sect established by Hung-Siu-Tsuen, b. in a little village thirty miles from Canton, 1813; d. at Nanking, July 19, 1892. While on a visit to Canton to attend the official examinations, he received from I. J. Roberts, an American missionary, a package of tracts in Chinese. Five years afterwards he fell sick, and had visions, in which an old man with a golden beard commanded him to destroy the demons (i.e., the idol-gods) of his countrymen. He then first read the tracts and, associating the man in his visions with Christ, and catching up several Christian ideas, he abandoned the Chinese mythology, and contentedly to preach his new faith. He retired to the mountains, and gathered by 1840 many converts, whom he styled "God-worshippers." He carried out his supposed commission, and destroyed some Buddhist idols. This brought him in conflict with the government, so that he again retired to the mountains. In 1850 he started upon a new enterprise. The time was ripe for rebellion; and he shrewdly proclaimed himself as sent by Heaven to drive out the Tartars, and set up a native Chinese dynasty. His standard was pushed victoriously forward. Nanking was captured in 1852. The Tai-ping dynasty was founded, with himself as the first emperor, under the title Teen-Wang ("the heavenly king"). The rebels would probably have been able to carry out their plans, had they not been defeated by the English and French troops, acting in concert with the Chinese. When Nanking was taken, Siu-Tsuen burned himself and wites in his palace.

Siou-Tsuen's religious views were a mixture of Christian and Chinese elements. He considered Christ the oldest of the sons of God, and himself... one of the younger. In his manifestoes he grouped God the Father, Jesus Christ, himself and his son, whom he styled the "Junior Lord," as the co-equal rulers of the universe. He adopted baptism, but rejected the Lord's Supper, allowed polygamy (he had himself a hundred and eighteen wives), punished adultery and opium-smoking with death. Cf. TALMUD, written also THALMUD (from lamad, "to learn"), is the designation given by the Jews to their body of law not comprised in the Pentateuch. It was long forbidden to reduce it to writing; and hence it bears the name of the oral law, to distinguish it from the written law contained in the five books of Moses, of which it professes to be the guardian (Gemara) and explanation. According to the rabbis, the oral law was necessary from the beginning for the understanding of the written law, and was actually given to Moses by God. This latter point they attempt to prove by appealing to Exod. xiv. 12, where the Lord declares to Moses, "I will give thee tables of stone, and a law, and commandments which I have written; that thou mayest teach them." Of these words we have it in the Talmud (Berakoth, fol. 5 a) this curious exposition: "The tables are the ten commandments. The law is the written law. The commandments is the Mishna. Which I have written means the prophets and Hagiographa. To teach them means the Gemara. It teaches us that they were all given to Moses from Sinai." In this quotation, mention is made of the two parts of which the Talmud is composed,—the Mishna and the Gemara. The former is the text, and the latter the Commentary. The name Talmud is often restricted, especially by Christian writers, to the Gemara. The compiler of the Mishna (from shannah, "to repeat," also "to learn") was Rabbi Judah, surnamed Hak-kadosh, the Holy, and Hanni, the Prince. He is often called simply "rabbby" by way of eminence. According to Josephus, he died A.D. 219 or 220; according to others, shortly before the close of the second century. He undertook to sift and reduce to order the oral law. Such an attempt had been made before him, but he completed the work. He wrote nothing down, but arranged every thing in his mind. He twice subjected his compilation to a revision and correction. The doctors introduced as speaking in the Mishna are called Tanaim, from the Aramaic form of the root of Mishna. The Ta-naim profess to be the repeaters of tradition. The teachers of the oral law were first called scribes (Sopherim), next elders (Zekefim), next the wise (Chakhamim), and finally doctors (Rabbanim). A.D. 70, Tanaim: after the compilation of the Mishna till the completion of the Gemara, Amoraim, lit., speakers, interpreters. Comp. Jost's Geschichte des Judenthums, ii. pp. 219 sq.

The Mishna is divided into six books or orders (sedarim), entitled (1) Zeraim, seeds; (2) Moed, festivals; (3) Nisim, women; (4) Nezikim, damages; (5) Kadisham, sacred things; (6) Tukroth, purifications. Under these six orders there are sixty-three treatises, which are again subdivided into chapters. After the completion of the official Mishna by Rabbi Judah, additional laws were collected by his successors: but they were not incorporated in the proper Mishna, but kept distinct from it: and this is indicated by the designation given to these extra-Mishnaic laws, Baraitas, from the word bar or bara, which means without. There are also additions to the Mishna, called Toseftas, collected during the third century. It was not till the year 550 A.D. that the Mishna was committed to writing (comp. Graetz: Geschichte der Juden, iv. p. 404). The scribes, by setting up their oral law, violated the strict injunction not to add to the law of Moses (Deut. iv. 2). Traditional precepts additional to the written law were at an early date current in Israel. Isaiah complains of these human ordinances (Isa. xxix. 13); and our Lord charged the Pharisees with making the word of God of none effect by their traditions. The oral law, instead of securing the observance of the written law, superseded it. And significantly is it said in the Book of Numbers, "The grace of Moses is the Mishna, and therefore no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." The Sadducees rejected the divine authority of the oral law; and so do the Karaite sects, who arose in the eighth century, and who, though few in number, still exist as a distinct sect. The Mishna was not sufficient to satisfy the Jewish doctors. On its basis they formed the Gemara, a word meaning complement, or doctrine; for it can bear both these significations. The Gemara exhibits the opinions and discussions of the wise men on the Mishna. There are two Gemaras, called the Jerusalem and the Babylonian, both expounding the same Mishnaic text. It was in Tiberias, near the close of the fourth century, that the redaction of what is commonly called the Jerusalemite Talmud was finished. Hence its proper title should be, not the Talmud of Jerusalem, but the Palestinian or Western Talmud. Its compilation is often attributed to Rabbi Jochanan of Tiberias, who, however, only began the work, being the first of the Amoraim, or doctors of the Gemara.

The Babylonian Talmud had for its chief compiler Rabbi Ashe, head, till 427 A.D., of the school of Sura in Babylon; but its completion was reserved for Rabbi Abina, who died in 498, and who is regarded as the last of the Gemaric doctors. The mass of traditions ascribed falsely to Moses went on increasing from age to age by the addition of the sayings of later doctors; and thus, like a snowball, the longer it rolled, the greater the bulk of the conglomerate.

It should be stated that only a portion of the treatises of the Mishna have their commentary in the Gemara. The Babylonian Talmud is much more highly esteemed by the Jews than the Jerusalemitc, and is about four times as large as the latter. It contains two thousand men on the Mishna. There are two Gemaras, or commentaries, added to the Mishnaic text. Its paging in the various editions is kept uniform, to facilitate reference. The Mishna is written, for the most part, in Hebrew in its later form, with a mixture of foreign words (Aramaic, Greek, and Latin). It is composed with extreme conciseness; the aim in expression being to use the fewest words possible, so as not to overburden the memory, when it was unlawful to write down the oral law. The language of the Gemara is a corrupt Chaldee or Aramaic. The Talmud is without vowel-points, and abounds in abbreviations. Delitzsch specifies brachology as characteristic of its style. Deutsch affirms, that, "in the whole realm of learning, there is scarcely a single branch of study to be compared for its difficulty to the Talmud." Lightfoot, in the preface to his Horae Hebrewae et Talmudicæ, thus depicts the unattractiveness of this book: "The student's first discovery is the unapproachable difficulty of the style, the frightful roughness of the language, and the amazing eminence and sophistry of the matters handled, do torture, vex, and tire him that reads them. . . . In no writers is greater or equal trifling." But he adds, "And yet in none is greater or so great benefit." And he maintains that Christians "may render them most usefuly serviceable to their studies, and most eminently tending to the interpretation of the New Testament."

The Talmud treats of a vast variety of subjects. There are separate works on its civil and criminal law, its religious philosophy, its ethics, its psychology, its education, mathematics, medicine, magic, geography, zoology, botany, etc. Dr. Pick, in his article on the Talmud, referred to below, gives the titles of monographs on all these subjects. The Talmud is described by Diirræus, in his Genius of Judaism, as containing a "prodigious mass of contradictory opinions, an infinite number of casuistical cases, a logic of scholastic theology, some recondite wisdom and much rambling doctrine, many puerile tales and Oriental fancies, ethics and sophisms, reasonings and unreasonings, riddles, and maxims and riddles. Nothing in human life seems to have happened which these doctors have not perplexed or provided against."

It is not necessary to take much trouble to find in the Talmud places illustrating these charges. Wagenseil (Teles. Igner, p. 887) refers to the very first words of the Mishna to show the contradictory opinions which are brought together in the Talmud. It begins with the question regarding the time of evening prayer. The answer of the Mishna and Gemara to this simple question will be found in Fresel's article on the Talmud, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopædia. Those who have the patience to read it will admit that it fully establishes the point for which Wagenseil made the reference. Two distinct currents of teaching may be traced in the Talmud. These are denominated respectively Halakha and Haggadha. Halakha from halakh,("togo") means the way which one ought to go, rule, authoritative precept. Haggadha is literally what is said, declared. It is homiletical teaching, intended to edify, console, or even to entertain, and combines instruction with parable and legend. The Talmud commends the study of the oral law above that of the written word, or double that number of folio pages. Its paging in the Talmud places illustrating these charges. Deutsch's celebrated article, which appeared in The Quarterly Review, London, October, 1867, is the best known essay of this kind in the English language. But it is only one of a multitude of writings having the same aim. Deutsch makes Christianity to have appropriated the teaching of the Jewish doctors of the Mishnaic period, and "to have carried those golden germs, hidden in the schools and among the silent community of the learned, into the market of humanity." He would have us to regard even Paul's doctrine concerning faith as genuine Pharisaism! "The faith of the heart—the dogma prominently dwelt upon by Paul—was a thing that stood much higher with the Pharisees than the outward law. It was a thing, they said, not to be commanded by any ordinance, yet was greater than all. 'Every thing,' is one of their adages, 'is in the hands of Heaven, save the fear of Heaven.'"

How any one who had read Paul's writings could make faith in his system of doctrine identical with the simple fear of God may well excite astonishment. The adage which Deutsch quotes, with the simple fear of God may well excite make faith in his system of doctrine identical and which is a rabbinical commonplace, is dia

"Life, children, and a livelihood depend not on merit, but on the influence of the stars. An eclipse of the sun is an evil sign to the nations of the world. An eclipse of the moon is an evil sign to Israel; for Israel reckons by the moon, the nations of the world, by the sun."

The virtue of amulets is recognized both in the Mishna and in the Gemara. The Mishna (Shabbath, fol. 61 a) teaches it is not lawful to go forth on the sabbath with an amulet that is not approved. An approved amulet is one that has cured three men (comp. Buxtorf: Lez. Tal, . 2057, under Qamia). The charm prescribed in the Gemara for the expulsion and bite of a mad dog has been often quoted. It is an extraordinary specimen of profane folly. We give the briefer and less known statement of the way by which we may obtain a sight of the mischievous demons, invisible to ordinary eyes, who wear out the clothes of the rabbis rubbing against them, cause bruised legs, and want of room at the sermon:

"Whosoever wishes to see them, let him take the interior covering of a black cat, the daughter of a first-born black cat, which is also the daughter of a first-born, and let him burn it in the fire, and pulverize it, and let him then fill his eyes with it, and he will see them," etc. (Berakoth, fol. 6 a).

The little effect, it has been rightly observed, produced on the minds of the scribes and Pharisees by the display of divine power in the miracles wrought by our Lord and his disciples, was largely owing to their faith in charms and magical arts. They forgot the teaching of the law of Moses, for the observance of which they could profess such zeal (Deut. xviii. 10-12).

It is idle to quote from the Talmud examples of teaching similar to what we read in the Gospels, and thence to argue the dependence of the latter on the former. The Gospels were, we know, extant in a permanent written form long before the Mishna was compiled, and centuries before it was reduced to writing. And what if authorities for Talmudic sayings analogous to words in the New Testament can be shown to have imbibed instruction from Christians? This can be done. The Mishnaic doctor Rabbi Eliezer, to whom a striking saying, very like one uttered by our Lord, is credited, confessed to Rabbi Akiba that he had intercourse with James, a disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, and that he was greatly pleased with instruction which James communicated to him as he had heard it from Jesus (Aboda Sora, fol. 16, 17). So Jonathan ben Joseph, whose teaching (Tract. Joma, 85 b) strikingly resembles that of our Saviour concerning the sabbath, is said to have had much intercourse with Christians (comp. Biesenthal: Zur Geschichte der christl. Kirche, 2. Aufl., Kap. 29). Biesenthal calls attention to the fact that the Mishna (Tract. Megillah, cap. 4, 9) prohibits the use of Christian phrases in the public prayers of the synagogue. Expressions recognized as of Christian origin were actually heard, according to the testimony of the Mishna, at the public worship of the Jews. It is admitted, too, that the Talmud ascribes to Jesus and his church the windows of heaven, and the secrets of the mysteries of grace. The words of the Lord, as recorded in the Mishna, are not to be compared with words of our Lord and Saviour Jesus. The account which Jost gives of the Mishna is the best answer to the attempt to degrade Jesus of what the Talmud contains regarding Hillel is of itself sufficient to show how absurd and, unlike the "Golden Rule" enunciated by Christ, it sets forth only the negative side of our duty to our neighbor. A full and fair statement of what the Talmud contains regarding Hillel is the best answer to the attempt to degrade Jesus from his unique position of having none of the sons of men worthy to be placed on a line with him. Indeed, the account which Jost gives of Hillel is of itself sufficient to show how absurd and, unlike the "Golden Rule" enunciated by Christ, it sets forth only the negative side of our duty to our neighbor. A full and fair statement of what the Talmud contains regarding Hillel is the best answer to the attempt to degrade Jesus from his unique position of having none of the sons of men worthy to be placed on a line with him. DUNLOP MOORE.

TAMMUZ. A sun-god, worshipped with peculiar rites by women among the Chaldeans, and even in Jerusalem (Ezek. viii. 14). In Babylon, and also in the Jewish sacred year, his month was from June 20 to July 20, the time when the days begin to shorten; in Jerusalem in the autumn, when the nights begin to be longer than the days. His annual festival, which celebrated his supposed death and resurrection, was a time of mourning, followed by one of joy. The old (Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome) and the majority of the new commentators connect Tammuz and Adonis, who was similarly mourned for. In the beautiful story of Ishtar's descent to Hades, Lenormant's "histoire de l'art religieux et moral," and in other places, Tammuz is named as the son of the "Son of life," Du-mu-zi (D M Z) or Dö-zi, which he thinks was changed into T M Z, as might easily be, in view of the frequency with which D and T exchange places. Tammuz was the name of the fourth month of the Jewish sacred year. See W. BAUDIBIN: Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, vol. i. pp. 300 sq.; SCHRADER: Kettinschriften u. das A. T., 2d ed. p. 425.

TANCHELM, or TANCELIN, or TANQUELIN. A characteristic specimen of that peculiar kind of opponents which arose in various places, towards the close of the eleventh and in the beginning of the twelfth century, attacking, sometimes the hypocrisy and corruption of the clergy, sometimes the base superstitions out of which Taoism sprang, and so did nothing to destroy their force. The latter now makes common cause with Buddhism; so that the shaven Buddhist and the yellow-topped "Taoist priest" (so called) are seen officiating side by side in the same service. Frequent attempts have been made to unite the sects, but the Taoists have always refused to adopt the celibacy of the Buddhists. One feature of Taoism is its eschatology. It teaches that each one has three souls, one of which remains with the corpse, one with the spirit-tablet, while the third is carried off to purgatory, which consists of "ten courts of justice, situated at the bottom of a great ocean which lies down in the depths of the earth." The soul can pass through endless transmigrations; and, if its punishments do not improve it, it is assigned to an endless transmigration, because later is the widow of Tammuz legend, because later is the widow of Tammuz was similarly mourned for. In the beautiful story of Confucius unhappily ignored, rather than opposed, the base superstitions out of which Taoism sprang, and so did nothing to destroy their force. The latter now makes common cause with Buddhism; so that the shaven Buddhist and the yellow-topped "Taoist priest" (so called) are seen officiating side by side in the same service. Frequent attempts have been made to unite the sects, but the Taoists have always refused to adopt the celibacy of the Buddhists. One feature of Taoism is its eschatology. The soul can pass through endless transmigrations; and, if its punishments do not improve it, it is assigned to an endless transmigration. Some become "immortals" without passing through purgatory. The offerings of the living, and the services of the priests (either Buddhist or Taoist), deliver souls from purgatory. The two most important functions of a Taoist priest are, (1) to deliver unfortunate persons from the domination of evil spirits, and (2) to choose grave-sites. He does the first by writing charms, and preparing amulets. The head of the religion has uninvolved skill in this way.

"It is said, that about his residence on the Lungan mountain there are thousands of jars in rows, all tenanted by demons whom the great magician haunts. In them they perform the second function: it is very important; for, if a proper spot be not selected, "the spirit of the dead is made unhappy, and avenges itself by causing sickness and other calamities to the relatives who have not taken sufficient care for its repose." The Tioist priest selects the site on geomantic principles.

TAPPAN, David, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Manchester, Mass., April 21, 1752; d. at Cambridge, Aug. 27, 1803. He was graduated at Harvard University, 1771; was pastor of Third Church in Newbury, 1774, until, on Dec. 26, 1792, he became Hollis Professor of Divinity in Harvard University. He held the position at his death. After his death, two volumes of his writings appeared, —"Sermons on Important Subjects," Boston, 1807; "Lectures on Jewish Antiquities," 1807. See biographical sketch in the first-named volume; also SPRALGE: "Annals," ii. pp. 97-103.

TAPPAN, Henry Philip, D.D., LL.D.; b. at Rhinebeck, N.Y., April 29, 1830; d. at Vevey, Switzerland, November, 1881. He was graduated at Union College, 1852; studied theology at Princeton; was pastor of a Reformed Dutch church in Schenectady, N.Y., and subsequently of a Congregationalist church in Pittsfield, Mass. (1828-33). From 1832 to 1838 he was professor of moral philosophy in the University of the City of New York. After keeping a private school for some years, he was elected chancellor of the University of Michigan in 1852, and held the office until 1863, when he resigned. He spent the rest of his days in Europe. He was an eminent educational and philosophical writer. He was a corresponding member of the Institute of France, 1856. Among his works may be mentioned, —"A Review of Edward's On the Will," New York, 1839; "Doctrine of the Will determined by an Appeal to Consciousness," 1840; "Doctrine of the Will applied to Moral Agency and Responsibility," 1841 (the three volumes were issued in a revised form in Glasgow, 1857, 1 vol.); "Elements of Logic," 1844, new ed., 1856.

TAPPAN, William Bingham, b. at Beverly, Mass., Oct. 29, 1794; d. at West Needham, Mass., June 16, 1849; began life as an apprentice in Boston, but removed to Philadelphia, 1813, and was there engaged in business and in teaching. From 1822 he was in the employ of the American Sunday-School Union, and in its service lived a while in Cincinnati, but chiefly in Boston. In 1841 he was licensed as a Congregational preacher.

He published New-England and Other Poems, 1819; Poems, 1819; "Lyrics," 1822; and, after a long interval, "Poems and Lyrics," 1842; "Poetry of the Heart," 1845; "Sacred and Miscellaneous Poems," 1846; "Poetry of Life," 1847; "The Sunday School, etc., 1848; "Late and Early Prone," 1849. Some of these are reprints; but Griswold called him "the most industrious and voluminous of our religious poets." Some of his hymns have been extensively used, especially the two beginning "There is an hour," which appeared in his first volume, 1819.

TARASIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople; d. 808; was secretary of state during the reign of Constantine and Irene; and, when the empress discovered that he was an ardent worshipper of images, she raised him, in 784, to the patriarchal see of Constantinople, though he was a layman. By some adroit manoeuvres he procured the recognition even of Adrian I.; and at the synod first assembled in Constantinople in 785, but broken up by a sudden rebellion in the city, and then reassembled at Nicaea in 787, the worship of images was once more established in the Greek Church.

TARGUM (i.e., translation) is the name given to a Chaldee version or paraphrase, of the Old Testament. The origin of the Chaldee paraphrase may be traced back to the time of Ezra. After the exile it became the practice to read the law in public to the people, with the addition of an oral paraphrase in the Chaldee dialect. Thus we read in Neh. viii. 8, "So they read in the book of the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense," which expression the Talmud ("Megillah," fol. 3, col. 1) explains "to give the sense means Targum." At what time these paraphrases were written down, we cannot state; but it must certainly have been at an early period. In [the Talmud "Shikkuth," fol. 115, col. 1], a written Targum on Job, of the middle of the first century, is mentioned. "Since it is not likely that a beginning should have been made with Job, a still higher antiquity, as very probably belonging to the first renderings of the law, may be assumed" (Zunz, p. 62). The two best-known Targums are the Targum of Onkelos on the law, and that of Jonathan ben Uzziel on the earlier and later prophets.

I. As to the person and time of Onkelos, he was, according to tradition, the disciple and friend of the older Gamaliel; and thus the Targum of Onkelos must have originated at least in the first half of the first century of our era.

The language of Onkelos greatly approaches the biblical Chaldee. His translation is, on the whole, very simple and exact. His elucidations of difficult and obscure passages and expressions, perhaps less satisfactory, are commonly those most accredited by internal evidence, and in particular he is worthy of more careful regard and assent than have usually fallen to his lot. Larger additions, and deviations from the original text, are found mostly in the poetical parts of the Pentateuch (Gen. xlix.; Num. xxiv.; Deut. xxxii.), and in passages relative to the Divine Being we perceive the bias in certain deviations from the Hebrew text. Anthropomorphic and anthropopathic expressions are avoided, and Elohim and Jehovah are rendered by "the word of God." It is obvious, from the character of the work, that the author was in possession of a rich legacy of Jewish tradition.

Editions. — The Targum of Onkelos was first published, with Raashi's commentary on the Pentateuch, Bologna, 1482. It was subsequently reprinted in the rabbinic and polyglot Bibles. [A new and critical edition according to that of Sabionetta (1557) is in course of preparation by Dr. A. Berliner of Berlin, the author of Die Masorah der Targum Onkelos, Leipzig, 1879. This Targum has been translated into Latin by P. Fagius and by John Merceir, 1588. The translation of Fagius is the best. It was rendered into English by Etheridge, London, 1862–65.]

II. The Targum on the Prophets [i.e., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets] is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzial, a pupil of Hillel, according to tradition (Baba Batra, 134 a; compare Saccâ, 28 a, Megillah, 3*). As to his paraphrase, it is simple, and tolerably literal in the historical books; but in the prophetic books the text is more freely handled. Another peculiarity of this Targum is the Jewish dogmatical opinions of this day, with which the work is interwoven, and the theological representations, in introducing which a special preference was given to the Book of Daniel. Examples of this are the interchange of the phrase "stars of God" by "people of God" (Isa. xiv. 19; comp. Dan. viii. 10); 2 Macc. ix. 10), the application of the passage in Dan. xii. 1 to that in Isa. iv. 2, etc. Here and there the author indulges in many perversions. There is little doubt that the text has received several interpolations. The first edition was published at Leipsic, 1494, then again in the rabbinic and polyglot Bibles. [For the different editions, translations, and older literature, see Fürst: Bibl. Jud., ii. 106 sq.; Wolf: Bibl. Hebr., ii. 1166, Le Long (ed. Masch), ii. 1, 39 sq.; Rosenmüller: Handbuch, iii. 9 sq.; Frankel: Zu dem Targum der Propheten, Breslau, 1872; Lagarde: Prophete Chaldaicis. Gesellschaft, 1874, xxvii. 1 sq.; 1875, xxx. 157 sq., 319 sq. An English translation of Isaiah was published by R. D. Pauli, Leipsic, 1849.]

III. Pseudo-Jonathan and Jerushalmi on the Pentateuch. — Besides the Onkelos Targum, there are still two targumim on the Pentateuch, one on the whole Pentateuch; the other, on single verses and words. The former is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzial; the latter goes under the name of Jerushalmi. That Jonathan did not use the same as the paraphrast on the prophets is acknowledged on all sides. That he wrote at a later period, we see from his mentioning of Constantineople, Mohammed's wives (Chadija and Fatima), and other things which betray the later date,—the second half of the seventh century. That Pseudo-Jonathan had Onkelos before him, a very slight comparison of both shows. Substantially in the same dialect is the Jerusalem or Jerushalmi Targum written. The similarity of both is striking; there is so much inter- vention as to prove diversity of authorship. But how is their resemblance to be explained? Only by the fact that both have relation to Onkelos. The author of the Jerushalmi Targum worked upon that of Onkelos; his object being to correct it according to certain principles, and to insert in it a selection of Haggadahs current among the people. Pseudo-Jonathan afterwards resumed the same of his, and completed what his predecessor had begun. The Jerusalem Targum formed the basis of Jonathan, and its own basis was that of Onkelos. Jonathan used both his predecessors' paraphrases; the former of Jerusalem Targum, that of Onkelos alone.

Editions. — The Pseudo-Jonathan Targum was first published in Venice, 1590; then at Hanau, 1618; Amsterdam, 1640; Prague, 1846; [Berlin, 1705; Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1858]. It is also in the London polyglot, vol. iv. [together with a Latin translation made by Antony Chevalier. It was translated into English by Etheridge, London, 1862–65. The Jerusalem Targum was first printed by Bomberg, Venice, 1518, [and reprinted in the subsequent rabbinical Bibles issued by him], and in the London polyglot; also at Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1859; Warsaw, 1875. Francis Taylor made a Latin version of this Targum (Lon- don, 1849); but the more correct one is that of Antony Chevalier, above noticed. There are also commentaries on these Targums.]

IV. Targums on the Hagiographa. — These Targums are generally divided into three groups: viz., (a) Job, Psalms, Proverbs; (b) the five Megilloth; (c) Daniel, Chronicles, and Ezra. Tradition ascribes to Rabbi Joseph the Blind the authorship of these Targums; but this is contradicted by the R. bet. Pauli, Leipsic, 1849. [An English translation of Isaiah was published by R. D. Pauli, Leipsic, 1849.] (a) [The Targum on the Book of Job. — A feature of this Targum is its Haggadic character. In many places we find a double Targum. The language is intermixed with Latin and Greek words. It sometimes agrees with the Septuagint or with the Peshito. It was published by John Terentius, and made by Mercier, Francfort, 1863, and Scialai, Rome, 1818. Compare on this Targum, Bacher, in Graetz: Monatsschrift, 1871, pp. 208–223; and

lau, 1873.)

2. The Targum on the Psalms.—Sometimes it follows the original with a tolerable degree of closeness, as in i., iii., v., vi., etc. In more cases, however, it indulges in prolix digressions, absurd fables, and commonplace remarks. Two or three different versions of the same text occasionally follow without remark, though the introductory notice w"n", i.e., another Targum, sometimes precedes. [Comp. Bacher: Das Targum zu den Psalmen, in Graetz's Monatsschrift, 1872, pp. 408-416, 468-473. It was printed in Justiniani's polyglot Psalter (Genoa, 1610) and in the hexaeglot edition of the Psalter published at Rostock, 1643. It is also printed in the latest rabbinical Bible, Warsaw, 1875. The Antwerp and following polyglots (1672, 1645, 1657) contain the Latin version of Aria Montanus. From the Codex Reuchlin it was published by Lagarde, in his Hagiographa Chaldauca (Leips., 1879), and republished by Neisser in his Psalterium Tetraglotum, Tübingen, 1877-79.]

3. The Targum on Proverbs.—This Targum is not Haggadic, and adheres more closely to the original text. Its remarkable agreement with the Syriac version has been noticed,—an agreement which extends even to the choice and position of words; comp. i. 1-4, 8, 10, 12, 13; ii. 9, 10, 13-15; iii. 2-9; iv. 1-3, 26; v. 1, 2, 4, 5; viii. 27;
x. 3-5; xxvi. 1; xxvii. 5, 6, 8; xxix. 5, 6; xxxi.
31. Comp. Dathe, De Ratione Consensus Versionis
Chaldauca et Syriaca Proverborum. Solomonis (Lips., 1764), who endeavors to prove that the Chaldean interpreter was dependent on the Syriac. [An opposite ground to that of Dathe is taken by Maybaum, Ueber die Sprache des Targum zu den
Sprüchen u. dessen Verhältniss zum Syrer, in Merx's
Archiv für wissenschaftliche Erforschung des Alten Testaments, ii. 86 sq.; cf. also Pick's art. "Relation of the Syriac Version to the Septuagint and Chaldee," in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia,
vol. x. pp. 121-124.]

(d) The Targum on the Five Megilloth [i.e., on Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, and the Lamentations] is written in an intermediate dialect, and is found in the Targum of the Penta-glot, and Proverbs, and the East Aramaic of the Babylonian Talmud. The whole, which may perhaps belong to one author, bears the impress of a date considerably posterior to the Talmudic time, and is a Midrashic paraphrase, exceedingly loose and free in character, containing legends, fables, allusions to Jewish history, and many fansiful additions.

[1. The Targum on Ruth was published separately, with a Latin translation and scholia by J.
Mercier, Paris, 1854.

2. The Targum on Ecclesiastes has been translated by Ginsburg, in his Commenta-

3. The Targum on Canticles is found in the rabbinical Bibles. It has been translated into Latin, and also into English by Gill, at the end of his Commentary on the Song of Solomon, London, 1814, pp. 50 sq., etc.

4. The Targum, rather Targums, on Esther.—
One translation of concise form, and adhering closely to the text, occurs in the Antwerp polyglot. It was issued enlarged, with glosses by Tailer, in Targum Prius et Posterior in Esther, studia F. Tailer, London, 1855, which follows the Targum Prius, which is contained in the London polyglot. Much more prolix, and amplifying still more the legends of this Targum, is the Targum Posterior, in Tailer. [Its final reduction probably belongs to the eleventh century. With a commentary, the second Targum is found in the Warsaw rabbinical Bible. A separate edition, with notes, etc., was published by Munk, Targum Scheni dem Buche Esther, in Graetz's Monatsschrift, 1876, pp. 161 sq., 276 sq., 398 sq.]
the name of a people and country in the southwest of Spain, beyond the Columns of Hercules. With this view of Movers agree not only the biblical notices, but also the older Greek writers. This also will explain the fact, that nowhere the destruction of Tartessus is mentioned. With this fact, that Tarshish is the name of a Spanish people and country, all etymological efforts to derive the word from the Semitic care in vain.

In fine, the two passages of the Book of Chronicles in which Tarshish occurs need to be mentioned. While we read in 1 Kings x. 22, that Solomon had at sea a navy of Tarshish with a navy of Hiram, bringing once in three years gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks, which (with reference to 1 Kii ix. 25-28) leads to the supposition that a voyage to Ophir is meant, — Tarshish-ships only meaning "large vessels," — we read in 2 Chron. ix. 21 of a trip to Tarshish. The same is the case with 1 Kings xviii. 36. The difference in the two statements is only to be explained by assuming that the Tarshish-ships intended for Ophir were changed into ships going to Tarshish. Keil's efforts to save the correct statement of the chronicle-writer are unsatisfactory; and we can only assume, with Bleek (Eindeutung, pp. 397 sq.), that the writer did not correctly understand the expression, hence his endeavor to fix it more precisely, which he did in an incorrect manner, — a view which is also adopted by Bertheau and Ewald; or, with Movers, that in the course of time the knowledge of the real Tarshish was lost among the Hebrews, and that it came to mean all distant countries in the west or in the south, or, as Movers says, a western and eastern Tarshish.

II. A precious stone, which was probably found in Tarshish, whence it took its name (Exod. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13; Ezek. i. 16, x. 9, xvii. 13; Cant. v. 14; Dan. x. 6). The Septuagint, followed by Josephus, makes it the "chrysolite" or topaz. Comp. Braun; De Vestitu Sacerdol., ii. 17.

III. Proper noun (Esth. i. 14; 1 Chron. vii. 10).

TAR'SUS, the chief town of Cilicia, was in Xenophon's time a city of some considerable consequence (Anab., i. 2, 23). In later times it was renowned as a place of education under the early Roman emperors; and Strabo compares it in this respect to Athens and Alexandria, giving, as regards the zeal for learning shown by the residents, the preference to Tarsus (xiv. 673). To the Christian, Tarshish is of the greatest importance, because it was the birthplace and early residence of the apostle Paul. His rabbinic training he received at Jerusalem (Acts xii. 3). At Tarshish he prepared himself for his apostolic work; and here, as well as in the neighborhood, he first preached (Acts i. 11, 30, xi. 25, xii. 39, xii. 25 sq., xiii. 34). At a very early period Tarshish had a Christian church, and at the time of the Council of Nice it had an archiepiscopal see. In the period of the crusades Tarshish had an archiepiscopal see. The learning which was there cultivated exercised also its influence upon the Christians there. We only mention Diodorus of Tarshish, the founder of the school of Antioch, and Theodore of Tarshish, whom Pope Vitalianus sent to England as archbishop of Canterbury in the year 667. The caliph Harun al Rashid fortified the city, especially against the Byzantines; but under the Turkish regime it lost all its former splendor. Many ruins remind of the former magnificence of Tarshish; but the city is dirty, and has about six thousand inhabitants. In modern times the European residents have contributed largely to the amelioration of its affairs. It is remarkable, that up to this day the main industry is the same as in the time of the apostle (Acts xviii. 3).

TAR'TAN (2 Kings xviii. 17; Isa. xx. 1), not a proper name, but an Assyrian title equivalent to our field-marshall, — the commander-in-chief of the army. This officer occupied the highest rank, and is named immediately after the king. A tartan mentioned in the inscriptions as being under Sennacherib was Belemurani, and it was quite likely that he was the one sent to Jerusalem to solicit the people to revolt from Egypt.

TASCODRUGITES (from τασοκοτρυγίς, "a wooden nail," and φωυκοτρυγίς, "a nose"), a nickname applied to an heretical sect which arose in Galatia in the fourth century, because they placed the finger on the nose while praying: Epiphanius (Hier., 45) and Augustine (De. Ham, 63). According to Theodoret, they rejected the doctrines of the sacraments, the incarnation, etc.

TASMANIA is a triangular-shaped island, a hundred and twenty miles south of the Australian Continent. It is situated between 40° and 44° south latitude, and between 144° and 149° east longitude. In extent, it is one hundred and seventy miles from north to south, and one hundred and sixty from east to west, with an area of over fifteen millions of acres. It is nearly the size of Scotland. The climate is proverbially one of the most healthy and delightful in the world. The annual rainfall averages twenty-four inches; being higher than on the Australian Continent, and lower than in Britain and America. The mean midwinter temperature is about 46° F.; and that of midsummer, 63° F. There are no extremes of heat or cold. The winter is severely severe enough to merit the name. Cattle are turned out in all seasons; and life in the open air may be enjoyed all the year round. The scenery is in harmony with the climate; and the island is a favorite resort for people from neighboring colonies, and travellers from a distance. It was discovered by the Dutch navigator Abel Tasman in 1642, who named it Van Diemen's Land, in honor of Anthony van Diemen, governor of Batavia, whom he had seen. The work of the first discoverer remained as he left it till the closing years of the eighteenth century, when Capt. Cook and others gradually opened up what had so long been as a sealed book. The settlement of the colony took place in 1803, when the convict establishment at Botany Bay, near Sydney, which had existed for about fourteen years, being overcrowded, a number of the most dangerous felons had to be dispersed, and were brought to Tasmania. Transportation ceased a quarter of a century ago; and in 1836 the event was signalized by changing the name from "Van Diemen's Land" to "Tasmania," in honor of the rightful discoverer. Practically there is now nothing to remind one that the land was once a convict settlement. The aborigines, who presented, probably, almost the lowest type of savage tribes, numbered somewhere from five thousand to ten thousand in the early part of the century. The last of them died in 1886. Tasmania, like other colonies, has a governor of her own, appointed by the British cabinet, who holds office for six years. The Parliament consists of two chambers, the Legislative Council with sixteen members, and the House of Assembly with thirty-two members, both elective. The system of education is compulsory, secular, and free. "By exhibitions from the schools, a certain number of pupils of both sexes are enabled annually, even in the absence of private resources, to proceed to the best private schools, and thus qualify themselves eventually for examination for the local degree of associate of arts. Two Tasmanian scholarships, of two hundred pounds a year each, tenable for four years at a British university, are awarded annually to associates of arts (male) who pass a prescribed examination."

There is no lack of mechanics' institutes, public libraries, and scientific societies. New books, and all leading British and some American periodicals and journals, arrive regularly. The population is now only a hundred and twenty thousand, and composed of English, Irish, and Scotch, without almost any admixture of foreign nationalities. But there are signs of awakening activity and enterprise, giving hope of a successful future. Mineral and other resources are being vigorously developed; and by liberal land-laws such encouragement is given to immigration as affords a reason why the rate of emigration is low. It may not be rapid, increase of population. The chief exports are wool, tin, timber, gold, jam, fruit, hops, grain, bark, stud-sheep, etc. Hobart is the capital, with a population (in 1878) of 22,500. Launceston, the only other considerable town, has 13,000.

As in the rest of Australasia, the usual religious bodies flourish in Tasmania; although it may be noted that the Presbyterian Church has not been quite so prosperous as in the other colonies. There is an Anglican and a Roman-Catholic bishop. The church-buildings throughout the country are suitable, and some are in the position of colonial chapels, paid by government, like other civil servants. But the State-aid Abolition Act put an end to this a quarter of a century ago; the churches receiving as compensation a certain sum in government debentures. Most of the Presbyterian ministers, and some of the Episcopalians, come from the Old Country or the neighboring colonies; but progress is being made in all the churches towards training a native ministry. According to a recent census, the nominal returns are as under:—

At the time of the above census the ministers of all denominations numbered a hundred and twenty-nine. As in the case in Australasia generally, they are for the most part efficient pastors, and highly respected. E. S. DUFF.

TATE, Nahum, b. in Dublin, 1652; d. Aug. 12, 1715, in the precincts of the Mint at Southwark, being in hiding from his creditors; was a son of Faithful Tate, D.D., a voluminous but long-forgotten versifier; educated at Trinity College, Dublin; went to London; became poet-laureate, 1690; published various poems of no great fame or value. He is remembered by a New Version of the Psalms of David, made in conjunction with Nicholas Brady, D.D., who was born at Brandon, Ireland, 1659, and died 1726; held preferments in London, and at Richmond, Surrey; published some sermons, and a Translation of the Enovid. It is impossible to assign the precise authorship in the case of any of their renderings; but Tate is supposed to have been the better poet, and to have shown it chiefly here. Twenty psalms appeared 1685, and the entire psalter 1696. This first edition is rare; "as, from some objectionable passages, the whole edition was recalled and destroyed." It was soon after (probably by 1696) revised, and in parts rewritten. Having been by the king "allowed and permitted to be used in all such churches, chapels, and congregations as shall think fit to receive the same" (Dec. 3, 1696), it was recommended by the Bishop of London, May 23, 1698. Although it may not be rapidly in popular acceptance, not entirely driving out Sternhold and Hopkins till the present century was somewhat advanced, and being, in turn, displaced of late by the greatly increased supply and use of hymns in the Church of England. In one section, at least, of this country, it was largely used in preference to the New-England version, or Bay Psalm-Book; many editions appearing in Boston between 1750 and 1800. This extended and long-continued use may be pleaded against the unfavorable opinions of critics. James Montgomery speaks of its "neutral propriety," and found it "nearly as inanimate, though a little more refined," than the old version; and Bishop Wilberforce gave "Tate and Brady" as the definition of a "dry-salter." From the stand-point of modern taste, no one has ever succeeded in verifying the entire Psalter. Any close rendering was designed to be a summation of necessity made easy reading. Of all such attempts, that of Tate and Brady is probably the least uncreditable, and the most useful. It contains some fairly poetical portions, many that are still well adapted to public reading.
TAULTER, Johannes, b. at Strassburg about 1290; d. there June 16, 1361; one of the most prominent representatives of mediaeval German mysticism, and one of the greatest preachers of his time. Of his life very little is known. He entered the Dominican order, and studied theology in Paris, but drew more mental nourishment from the writings of the Areopagite, St. Bernard, and the mysticism of St. Victor, than from the dialectical exercises of the professors. After finishing his studies, he returned to his native city, where, or he became acquainted with Meister Eckart, and spent the rest of his life; making short voyages to Basel (where he entered into connection with the Friends of God), to Cologne, and other cities. That he continued officiating during an interdict laid upon Strassburg by the Pope for political reasons, is a legend first put into circulation in the sixteenth century by Speckle. It may contain some kernel of historical fact, not now to be discerned with certainty; but all its main features are due to the eagerness of the Reformers to enroll the great and famous preachers among their predecessors. Still more fictitious is the tale of his conversion by Nicholas of Basel. His works consist of sermons, a few minor treatises, and some letters. The first collected edition of his sermons was printed at Leipzig in 1498, and often reprinted, English translation by Miss Winkworth, London, 1857, and New York, 1858 (edited by Dr. Hitchcock). The Nachfolgung des armen Leben Christi, Exercitia super vita et passione Christi, and Institutiones divinae (also called Medulla animae), are not by Tauler. The doctrinal views of Tauler often remind the reader very strongly of those of Meister Eckart, though, generally speaking, they enliven another character: the speculative element is weaker; the devotional, stronger. Tauler was of a practical turn of mind, a preacher, not a philosopher. The speculative bearing of his ideas is consequently only slightly developed, while their application to real life is emphasized with great energy. It was this practical, and, for that very reason, truly evangelical tendency of his preaching, which gave him a much greater influence on his time than any of the other celebrated mystical teachers. They were either too metaphysical, as was Meister Eck-

TASAEN, Hans, b. at Birkinde in the Danish Island of Fiiien, 1494; d. at Ribe, Jutland, Nov. 11, 1603. As a monk of Antvorskov in Seeland, he was by his abbot sent to foreign countries to study. He went to Wittenberg; and on his return, in 1524, he began to preach the Reformation. The abbot shut him up in the convent dungeon; but he was released by order of the king, who made him his chaplain, and afterwards pastor of the Church of St. Nicholas in Copenhagen, 1528.

Tausen was the first who preached the Reformation in Denmark; and, together with Bugenhagen, he was the principal agent in its establishment in the country, after its adoption by the Diet of Copenhagen in 1530. In 1542 he was made Bishop of Ribe. He translated the Psalms into Danish, wrote several hymns, and published a number of sermons and treatises bearing on the Reformation.

Taverner, Richard, a translator of the English Bible; was b. at Briskle, Norfolk, 1505; studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and Cardinal College, Oxford, where he graduated; studied law, became, at Cromwell's recommendation, clerk of the signet, 1537; was licensed to preach by Edward VI., 1552; appointed high sheriff of Oxfordshire, 1569; and d. July 14, 1575.

of the General Baptist denomination. He was its leading spirit for nearly half a century, founded its college in 1797, started and edited its magazine, 1788, presided at its annual gatherings, and impressed his sturdy, enterprising, progressive, and liberal individuality on its institutions and churches. His chief literary works are, Principles of Religion in Faith and Practice, Dissertations on Singing in Public Worship, Letters on Andrew Fuller’s Scheme.

TAYLOR, ISAAC, English theological writer: b. at Lavenham, Suffolk, Aug. 17, 1787; d. at Stanford Rivers, Essex, June 28, 1865. His father was a line engraver, and later a dissenting minister, and author of popular children’s books; but he entered the Established Church. After following for a while the profession of engraver and artist, he turned his attention to literature and inventions. He invented two very ingenious engraving-machines; one for illustrations, and another for patterns upon rollers for calico-printing.

As an author he was very prolific and original. Among his religious and theological writings may be mentioned History of Translation of Ancient Books to Modern Times, 1827; Natural History of Enthusiasm, 1829 (very popular); Natural History of Fanaticism, 1833; Spiritual Despotism, 1835; Physical Theory of Another Life, 1836 (after this work he dropped his inoculation); Ancient Christianity, and the Doctrines of the Oxford Tracts for the Times, 1839—40, 8 parts, 4th ed., with supplement and indexes, 1844, 2 vols. (a reply to those who desired to restore “primitive” doctrine, and magnify the “Primitive” Church, by showing the seamsy side of the early church; but it goes too far, and thus really conveys a false impression); *Man Responsible for his Dispositions, Opinions, and Conduct, 1840; Loyola and Jesuitism, 1849: Wesley and Methodistism, 1851; The Restoration of Belief, 1855; Logic in Theology, 1859; Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1851; Considerations on the Penitulent, 1859; the Christian in Sin was accused and his passionate yearning for pardon and light urged him to travel ten and even twenty miles to hear Wesley, Whitefield, and Grimshaw. But he did not rest till he understood and accepted the message of universal love in John iii. 16: that gave the trend to his character and career.

He joined the Wesleyans, and became a “local preacher;” but his essentially independent and growing spirit forced him out of the Methodist ranks, and he accepted the pastorate of a few like-minded folk at Nook, Birchcliffe. Further study of the Bible led him to the Baptist idea, and so he came into contact with the General Baptists. Detecting their Unitarian drift, he confronted it, and sought to arrest it. Failing, he, together with the Barton Independent Baptists, formed, in June, 1770, the New Connection of General Baptists. Now he found his true sphere, of his place as a poet with conspicuous fidelity, first at Birchcliffe (1763—83), next at Halifax (1783—85), and finally at Church Street, Whitechapel, London (1785—1816). He meanwhile wrote copiously and ably on the theological questions of the day, and also shaped the course
College, and, after seven years' study, took his degree of M.A. Archbishop Laud noticed and patronized the youth, and gave him a fellowship in All Souls', Oxford, 1636. Probably through the same influence, he obtained a royal chaplaincy about the same period; and soon afterwards he became rector of Uppingham, in the county of Rutland. Of that living he was deprived by Parliament, thus suffering a penalty for his royalism and attachment to the Church of England. Sermons were issued in 1653, and in 1654 came forth from the press his book on The Real Presence of Christ in the Sacrament. The Golden Grove, a guide of infant devotion, succeeded in 1655; and in 1656 a Collection of Polcmical and Spiritual Discourses was given to the world. These are more remarkable works of the kind. The original illustration, multifarious learning, ingenuous argument, poetical imagination, and exuberant, florid diction. The rhythm of his sentences flows like music, and captivates the taste, when his reasoning does not satisfy the judgment. His opinions were all struck in the Anglo-Catholic mould; though he practically claimed for himself "a liberty of prophesying," which led him sometimes to break bounds, to wander out of the orthodox enclosure, and to enter fields of Pelagian thought. His Unum Necessarium, or the Doctrine and Practice of Repentance, printed in 1655, especially laid him open to this charge, and involved him in very serious controversy. He was one of those thinkers who cannot endure the trammels of a system, and though faithful, on the whole, to a certain creed, feel compelled by a restless gacity of a prophet, the reason of an angel, and the piety of a saint. He had devotion enough for the illustrious divine, "This great prelate had the good-humor of a gentleman, the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the acuteness of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher, the wisdom of a chancellor, the sagacity of a prophet, the reason of an angel, and the piety of a saint. He had devotion enough for a cloister, learning enough for a university, and wit enough for a satirical dialogue; with immense ardor, speaking extravagantly of baptismal regeneration, piling up figures on figure to illustrate its efficacy, and, though less figurative in his exposition of the Lord's Supper, insisting that the symbols of bread and wine become changed into the body and blood of Christ after a sacramental, that is, a real and spiritual manner. Generally it may be said of Jeremy Taylor that he was one of the last men from whom qualified and cautious statements could be expected. He certainly was like a cloud, "which moveth altogether, if it move at all." Upon the doctrine of justification he is very misty, deprecating inquiries respecting it as leading into useless intricacies; in short, cutting away the ground from any definite theological representation of it whatever. In argument he is often defective; in declamation, always unrivalled.

In 1658 Taylor removed to Ireland, and carried on clerical ministrations at Lisburn and Portmore. He returned to London in 1660, and promoted the restoration of Charles II. by signing the Loyal Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry in the April of that year. In 1660 also, he published his elaborate Ductor Dubilitantium, or the Rule of Conscience in all her General Measures, pronounced by Hallam to be "the most extensive and learned work on casuistry which has appeared in the English language." Taylor's acuteness, and command of quotations, his insight into human nature, and his pleasing, at times poetical, thought, qualified him to make a mark in this department of moral and religious literature; but the usefulness of the whole is more apparent than real, and supplies little that is of much practical value. Casuistry is more fitted to suggest excuses for what is wrong than to convey clear unmistakable rules for doing and thinking what is right. The Worthy Communicant, by Taylor, bears date 1660; and that year the author was raised to the bishopric of Down and Connor.

His Episcopalian career was not successful. He found his cathedral chair full of thorns. The Episcopalians of the Commonwealth troubled the Presbyterians, and now the Presbyterians of the Restoration troubled the Episcopalians. Jeremy Taylor complained of them as "incendiaries." He said they robbed him of his people's hearts, and "threatened to murder him. The first charge probably was not founded, but may detect the exercise of his vivid imagination. His hope was in the government of force, and he no longer advocated liberty of prophesying. It is said, that, within three months after his consecration, he deposed thirty-six Presbyterian ministers. Of the period of his life between 1660 and 1667, when he died, interesting and curious particulars may be found in Notes and Queries, Nov. 11, 1865.

Bishop Rust, who succeeded him, caught his rhetorical mantle and exclaimed, in his funeral sermon for the illustrious divine, "This great prelate had the good-humor of a gentleman, the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the acuteness of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher, the wisdom of a chancellor, the sagacity of a prophet, the reason of an angel, and the piety of a saint. TAYLOR, Nathaniel William, D.D., an eminent Congregationalist preacher, theological teacher, and author; b. at New Milford, Conn., June 20, 1764; d. in New Haven, March 10, 1858. He was graduated at Yale College in 1807; studied theology with President Dwight, and became pastor of the First Church in New Haven in 1811, which office he resigned in 1822, to take the chair of Dogmatic Theology in the theological department of Yale College, where he continued to teach until his death. As a preacher he was singularly impressive, combining solidity and clearness of thought with a remarkable eloquence. Unusual results followed upon his sermons, especially in connection with "revivals." From early youth deeply interested in the problems of theology, and endowed with metaphysical talents of a very high order, he worked out, on the basis of the previous New-England theology, an elaborate system, which gained numerous adherents, and powerfully affected theological thought and preaching in America beyond the circle of its professors.

Taylor, the author of "The New-Haven Theology," sometimes it was called "Taylorism." It was one of the most influential of the types of so-called "New-School Divinity." There were able coadjutors of Dr. Taylor, notably his colleagues, Rev. Eleazar T. Fitch, D.D. (b. 1791; d. 1871), college preacher at Yale from 1817 to 1852, and professor of homiletics, a man of rare and versatile powers; and Rev. Chauncy A. Goodrich, D.D. (b. 1790; d. 1860), also an influential professor in the college and in the divinity school at Yale, and the principal editor of The Christian Spectator, the review in which many of the controversial essays of "New-Haven Divines," were published. But the peculiarity of "New-Haven Divinity" as it existed in the generation among whom Dr. Taylor was a prominent leader, are mainly and justly associated with his name.

When Dr. Taylor began his investigations, New-England theology asserted, as it had done from the time of Edwards, a doctrine of natural ability as the condition of responsible agency. It rejected the imputation of Adam's sin in every form; but, outside of the Hopkinson school, it associated with this denial a vague theory of an hereditary, sinful taint, or a sinful propensity to sin, propagated with the race, —what Dr. Taylor termed "physical depravity," and it vindicated the introduction, or divine permission, of sin, by affirming that sin is the necessary means of the greatest good, and that the system of things is better with sin than without it.

The aim of Dr. Taylor was to relieve New-England theology of remaining difficulties on the side of human responsibility, and thus accomplish the end which it had always kept in view. The fundamental question was that of liberty and necessity. There must be, on the one hand, a firm foundation for the doctrine of decrees and universal providential government, and for the exaltation of the divine dignity, an absolute exaltation on the part of men in view of all events; otherwise, the Calvinistic system is given up. There must be, on the other hand, a full power in men to avoid sin, and perform their duty: otherwise, the foundation of accountability is gone, and the commands and entreaties of the Bible are a mockery. The true solution of the problem, in Dr. Taylor's view, is in the union of the doctrine of the previous certainty of every act of the will — a certainty given by its antecedents collectively as well as by the power of human choice. Freedom is exemption from something: it is exemption from the constraining operation of that law of cause and effect which brings events to pass in the material world. If the antecedents of choice produce the consequent according to that law, without qualification, there is no liberty. Yet Dr. Taylor did not hold to the liberty of indifference or of contingency which had been charged upon the Arminians, and had been denied by his New-England predecessors. He held to a connection between choice and its antecedents, of such a character as to give in every case a previous certainty, that the former will be what it actually is. The ground or reason of this certainty lies in the constitution of the agent, and the motives under which he acts; that is to say, in the antecedents taken together. The infallible connection of these with the consequent, the Divine Mind perceives, though we may not dogmatize on the exact mode of his perception. The precise nature of the connection between the antecedents and consequent, Dr. Taylor did not profess to explain; but he held that the same antecedents will uniformly be followed by the same consequent. There are causes which do not necessitate their effect, but simply and solely give the certainty of it. Now, all admit that every event is previously certain. It is a true proposition, that what is to occur to-morrow will thus occur. No matter, then, what may be the ground of this certainty, as long as the events in question are not necessitated, there is no interference with moral liberty.

The leading principles of Dr. Taylor's system may now be stated:—

1. All sin is the voluntary action of the sinner, in disobedience to a known law.

2. Sin, however, is a permanent principle, or state of depravity, underlying all subordinate vitiations and acts. Stated in theological language, it is the elective preference of the world to God, as the soul's chief good. It may be resolved into selfishness.

3. Though sin belongs to the individual, and consists in sinning, yet the fact that every man sins from the beginning of responsible agency is in consequence of the sin of Adam. It is certain that every man will sin from the moment when he is capable of moral action, and will continue to be sinful until he is regenerated; and this certainty, which is absolute,—though it is no necessity, and co-exists with power to the opposite action,—is somehow due to Adam's sin. In this sense, Adam was placed on trial for the whole human race (Revealed Theology, p. 239).

There is in men, according to Dr. Taylor, a bias or tendency—sometimes called a propensity or disposition — to sin: but this is not its own sin; it is the sinner, and consists in sinning, that he is to be conceived of as a separate desire of the soul, having respect to sin as an object. Such a propensity as this does not exist in human nature.

It is proper to say that men are sinners by nature.
ture, since, in all the appropriate circumstances of their being, they sin from the first. The certainty of their sin as soon as they are capable of sinning is the consequence of two factors — the constitution and condition of the soul (subjective), and the situation (objective). These together constitute nature in the statement, "We are sinners by nature." 4. Man is the proximate efficient cause of all his voluntary states and actions. No man is necessitated to choose as he does. There is ever a power to the contrary. A sinner can cease to love the world supremely, and can choose God for his portion.

5. Insensible from the foregoing assertion of a power to the contrary choice, however, is the doctrine of a moral inability on the part of the sinner to repent, and convert himself. He can, but it is certain he will not. "Certainty with power to the contrary" is a condensed statement of the truth on both sides. Thus the sinner is both responsible and dependent — perfectly responsible, yet absolutely dependent.

6. Natural ability being a real power and not an incapable faculty, there must be something in a sinner's mind to which right motives can appeal, some point of attachment for the influences of the law and the gospel. Hence the importance of the distinction between the sensibility and will, or of the threefold classification of mental powers, which Dr. Taylor was among the first to introduce.

What is the particular feeling which may thus be addressed? According to Dr. Taylor, it is the love of happiness, or self-love.

Dr. Taylor believed, with a great company of philosophers (from Aristotle to the present time), that the involuntary love or desire of personal happiness is the subjective, psychological spring of all choices.

Benevolence is the choice of the highest good of the universe in preference to every thing that can come into competition with it. But one's own highest happiness can never thus come into competition with it. Virtuous self-love and virtuous benevolence denote one and the same complex state.

7. The author of regeneration is the Holy Spirit. The change that takes place in the soul is due to his influence so exerted as to effect that change in the sense of rendering it infallibly certain. It is a change of character. It is the production of love to God as the supreme object of choice, in the room of love to the world. Now, a sinner is naturally able to make this revolution in the ruling principle of his life. But there is a moral inability which constitutes practically an insuperable obstacle; and this is overcome only by the agency of the Spirit, who moves upon the soul, and induces, without coercing, them to comply with the requirements of the gospel.

8. Dr. Taylor's doctrine on the relation of the introduction of sin, and its continuance to the divine administration, accords with the general spirit of his theology. Theologians from Calvin to Bellamy had discussed the question, as if there were only this alternative, — the existence of sin, or the prevention of it by the power of God.

Dr. Taylor held that we are not shut up to the alternative just stated. There is a third way in which sin might have been prevented, and that is by the free act of the beings who commit it. It is not true, then, that sin is in any case better than holiness in its stead would be, or that sin, all things considered, is a good thing. But it may be true that the non-prevention of sin by the act of God is in certain cases better than its forcible prevention by his act.

Dr. Taylor took up the question in answering sceptical objections to the benevolence of the Creator. The ground that he took in reply was this, that it may be impossible for sin to be excluded by the act of God from the best possible system. The system would be better without sin, if this result were secured by the free action of the creatures comprising it, with no other alteration of its characteristics. It might not be so good if the same result were reached by divine intervention. We are too little acquainted with the relations of divine power to free agency to declare confidently to what extent the exertion of such power is beneficial when the universal system is taken into view. It is wiser and more modest to judge of what is best by what we actually see done.

9. Dr. Taylor's conception of election is conformable to his doctrine respecting the divine permission of sin. Regeneration is the act of God. He has determined to exert such a degree of influence upon a certain part of the race who are sinful by their own act, and justly condemned, as will result with infallible certainty in their conversion. He is not bound to give such influence in equal measure to all: rather does he establish a system of influence which his omniscient mind foresees to be most productive of holiness in his kingdom as a whole. It is not the act or merit of individuals that earns or procures this effectual influence, but that large expediency which has respect to the entire kingdom, and the holiness to be produced within it.

He organizes a plan, not in an arbitrary way, but in order to secure the best results that are attainable consistently with the wise and benevolent laws that underlie his whole administration.

TAYLOR, Thomas Rawson, b. at Ossett, near Wakefield, May 7, 1807; d. at Airedale, March 7, 1835; a Congregational minister at Sheffield, and tutor at Airedale College. He wrote only a few hymns, best known among them is "I'm but a stranger here." His Memoir and Remains appeared 1836.

TAYLOR, William, D.D., a prominent and venerable minister of the Presbyterian Church in Canada; b. in the parish of Dennie, Scotland.
March 18, 1803; d. in Montreal, Can., Sept. 4, 1876. His father was a farmer. After the usual preparation in school and college, he attended the Theological Hall of the Secession Church for five sessions, and was licensed to preach in 1827. In 1831 he was ordained the pastor of a congregation in Peebles. In 1833, along with two other ministers, he joined the Presbyterian Church. He was sent to Canada, where a mission had been commenced the preceding year. He arrived in Montreal immediately after the city had suffered severely from the scourge of cholera. He was immediately called as the pastor of a congregation just formed, and was installed July, 1839. He retained the same pastoral charge till the close of his life,—forty-three years. Dr. Taylor was a thorough scholar, an able theologian, an earnest preacher, and a wise counsellor in all ecclesiastical affairs. He was an acknowledged leader in the church courts, and held a high place in the esteem of his brethren in the ministry. He labored for years most indefatigably to secure the union of all the branches of the Presbyterian Church, and had the happiness to see its accomplishment in 1875. He was truly an apostle in the cause of temperance, and an able advocate of every cause of social and moral reform. He was especially interested in the evangelization of the French Canadians. His manners were courteous, yet affable, his devotion to his work zealous and unflagging, his ministry successful and greatly blessed, his influence great and widely extended, his life pure and eminently useful, his death calm and peaceful; and his memory is cherished, not only by the congregation whom he served so long and so faithfully, and by the city where his labors abounded, but by the whole denomination, which long regarded him as one of her pillars. He published many articles and several able discourses on the topics of the day. WILLIAM ORMSTON.

TELEOLOGY (from τέλος, "an end," and λόγος, "discourse"), a technical term denoting a line of speculative researches concerning the final ends involved in and revealed by the phenomena of nature. It possesses a theological and philosophicalexplanation he aims at. Convinced that a thorough understanding of the peculiar Greco-Hebraic manner of speech will offer a new key to the understanding of the doctrines of the New Testament, he lays hand on the task, and explains that such an expression as the "kingdom of heaven" (which Christ had come to found) is simply a peculiar Greco-Hebraic idiom, meaning nothing but a "new religion." The same is, of course, the case with such expressions as law and gospel, sacrifice and atonement, etc. The edict of 1789 again brought him into difficulties; and on account of his vote in the trial of Schulze he was sentenced to suspension for three months, and a fine to the insane-asylum. Nevertheless, in 1792 he was able to publish his Die Religion der Volkommeneren, which represents the very perfection of rationalism. Christianity is there explained to have been, from the very day of its birth, in a steady process of development, which will not stop until it has made the Christian religion a religion of morals only. TELLIER, Michael, b. at Vire, Normandy, Dec. 16, 1848; d. at La Flèche, Sept. 2, 1712. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1661; devoted himself for some time to the study of history, but threw himself finally into theological polemics. By his attacks on the Jansenists he acquired so great a notoriety that he was made a provincial of his order, and, after the death of Louis XIV. after the death of Père La Chaise in 1709. He was fanatical, ambitious, unimpressible, a master of diplomatic trickery; and he had the old king completely in his power. The destruction of Port-Royal, the condemnation of Quenel's writings, the enforcement of the bull Unigenitus, were among his principal exploits. After the death of Louis XIV. he was banished from the court.

TEMPERANCE. Our English word "temperance" is of Latin derivation. Its etymological meaning may perhaps be best understood by observing the meaning of the Latin word. Substances, mortar for example, are properly tempered when their ingredients are mingled in correct proportions, with the result of making the article exactly fit for the purposes for which it is designed. A steel tool is tempered to a standard degree of hardness. Temperance as a virtue is the virtue of being properly tempered for the purposes for which a human being is designed. One possesses this virtue in the proportion in which he possesses desirable elements of character desirably balanced.
This, therefore, a good word by which to translate the Greek 'Eprdmn of the New Testament. The latter term properly denotes mastery over one's self. A self-controlled character is a well-tempered character, at least in some important respects.

But it is not without good reason that the word has come to be prevailingly restricted to a much narrower meaning. The use of intoxicating drinks is so conspicuously connected with the loss of self-mastery and of proper balance, that we very naturally connect the terms 'temperance' and 'intemperance' peculiarly and almost exclusively with the drinking-habit.

Intoxicants, in the form of wine and beer at least, have been known from the earliest historical times; and the vice of drunkenness has also been known. This is evident from the familiar biblical instances of Noah, Nabal, and others, from the figures on the early Egyptian monuments, from the Greek myths concerning Bacchus, and from many other sources. But the conditions of the problem of drunkenness and of the transmission of this vice materially changed within the last few centuries by the extent to which the art of distillation has been developed. This art has long been known and practised; but it was not until a comparatively recent period that it came to be the powerful means it now is for increasing and cheapening the world's stock of intoxicating beverages.

According to an article by Professor Theodore W. Dwight, LL.D., published in the Independent of April 27, 1882, the earliest recognition of the existence of distilled liquors to be found in English legislation is in the year 1639; and it was not until much later in the seventeenth century, that these came to be recognized as in general use. As might have been expected, their introduction greatly increased the evils of intemperance. Says the Encyclopaedia Britannica, in its article on "Gin," —

"In the early part of the eighteenth century, gin-shops multiplied with great rapidity in London; and the use of the beverage increased to an extent so demoralizing, that retailers actually exhibited placards in their windows, intimating that there might get drunk to a gony, and that clean shew, in comfortabele cellars, would be provided for customers."

Contemporaneously with these changes in the facilities for the practice of drunkenness occurred certain other changes in men's habits of living, which also greatly affected the question of the use of alcoholic drinks. Coffee was known as early as 976 A.D., but it was first brought from Abyssinia into Arabia early in the fifteenth century. Coffee-houses were established in Constantinople about the middle of the sixteenth century, and in London in 1632; and, before the close of the seventeenth century, coffee was a customary beverage in Europe. Chocolate and tea came to be generally used as beverages within a few years of the same time.

In both these directions, throughout Europe and America, and parts of Asia and Africa, the generation of men who were of middle age about the year 1700 witnessed a radical revolution in the conditions of human life. In their childhood, fermented drinks largely superseded, in the one use of them by the hot drinks which have ever since been on our tables. In their childhood, however plenty wine and ale may relatively be said to have been, they were yet scarce enough so that habitual drunkenness was beyond the reach of most; why except those that had access to the cellars of the rich. Before they died everybody could get drunk, at any time, for a penny.

It should be added to this, that the use of tobacco became general during the seventeenth century. And as having a real, though less direct, connection with the temperance problem, we must count all the marvellous discoveries and inventions which have rendered human life in these later centuries so utterly different from what it ever was before.

These radical changes of condition naturally led to corresponding changes in the convictions of men in regard to the use of alcoholic drinks. To trace the development of these convictions is to sketch the history of the modern temperance movement in America and the Old World.

Until the current century, the general opinion of mankind has certainly not condemned the use of intoxicating drinks, nor even occasional drunkenness, provided the drinker kept himself prudently guarded from further bad results. Philo the Jew, contemporary with Jesus, wrote extensive treatises on Drunkenness and Sobriety, which are largely of the nature of allegorical comment on the passages in the Mosaic writings which mention the use of wine. These include a formal discussion of the question, "Whether the wise man will get drunk?" He replies by citing the expressed opinions of men, as well as evidence of other sorts, on both sides of the question. He says that "the sons of physicians and philosophers of high repute...have left behind ten thousand commentaries entitled treatises on drunkenness," and censures these for the narrowness of their treatment of the subject. He insists on the difference between the drinking of "unmixed wine," which will produce intoxication, and that of lighter or diluted wines. He calls unmixed wine a poison and a medicine. He condemns the drinking contests which were common in his day. He exposes in graphic pictures the wiliness of drunken orgies and riots, and the deterioration of health and morals which results therefrom. He holds that "the wise man will never of his own accord think fit to enter upon a contest of hard drinking, unless there were great things at stake, such as the safety of his country, or the honor of his parents," etc. But he none the less indorses what he represents to be the current opinion; namely, that a wise man will occasionally get drunk. His helplessness when drunk no more disproves his wisdom than if it resulted from a bilious attack, or from sleep, or from death. Philo intimates that the opposite opinion is quite respectable defended, but proves, to his own complete satisfaction, that it is indefensible. His explanation of the doctrine of the Scriptures in the matter is, that "Moses looks upon an unmixed wine as a symbol, not of one thing only, but of many; namely, of trifling, and of playing the fool, and of all kinds..."
of insensibility and of insatiable greediness...and of a cheerfulfulness which comprehends many other objects," and the like. Philo's opinion does not seem to be at all that the Scriptures commend drinking but condemn excess, but rather that they either commend or condemn, according to the aspect which they look at the case; that is, they commend drinking, and even intoxication, when they associate these with cheerfulfulness and plenty, and condemn them when they look at them in connection with their bad results or accessories.

Philo's opinions concerning the drinking-habit are certainly those which have been commonly held until our own century. But, as far back as we can trace the matter, we also find a highly reputable line of opinion in favor of total abstinence from intoxicating beverages. Of this, in the eighteenth century, the distinguished Samuel Johnson is an instance. Somewhat earlier in the century, the author of Gil Blas sarcastically admires "the patriotic forecast of those ancient politicians who established places of public resort, where water was dealt out gratis to all customers, and who confined wine to the shops of the apothecaries, that its use might be prohibited, but under the direction of physicians," and the wisdom of those who frequented these resorts, not for "swilling themselves with wine, but...for the decent and economical amusement of drinking warm water" (Adventures of Gil Blas, book ii., chap. 4). This sarcasm must have been aimed at opinions held by respectable contemporaries of Le Sage. In 1743 John Wesley, in his General Rules, mentions as sinful, "drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." It is said that in 1733 the trustees of the Colony of Georgia, who were living in London, enacted that "the drink of rum in Georgia be absolutely prohibited, and that all which shall be brought there be staved." In 1759 the synod, after duly considering the evil of it, we had abandoned it,' and I hoped they would do the same.'

Joseph Tallcot was a member of the Society of Friends, living a few miles south of the town of Auburn, N.Y. In all that vicinity, in 1816, the crops were so short that poor people found it difficult to procure breadstuffs for food. At the same time, Tallcot noticed, the distilleries kept in operation. He says,—

"The circumstances affected me not a little, and induced me to write an address to the sober and influential part of the community, inviting them to a serious consideration of the melancholy situation, and the evils and calamitous consequences of intemperance. I insisted that nothing short of the example of that part of society which gives habits to the world, of abstaining altogether from the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes, would correct this alarming evil."

It occurred to Joseph Tallcot to offer his views for the consideration of the members of the Presbyterian synod of Geneva at one of their meetings held in Geneva. In his narrative he says,—

"I found my way to the house of Henry Axtell, the Presbyterian clergyman of that place. His brethren from the surrounding country came into the village, and call on him for instruction where they might find entertainment among their friends. The master of the house appeared very hospitable, inviting them to partake of his brandy; which they did, with what would be thought moderation. The master of the house, the synod, and I, turned to me, and pleasantly said he 'supposed it would be useless to invite me to partake,' considering my business. I as pleasantly replied, that 'we had been in the same habit, but, seeing the evil of it, we had abandoned it,' and I hoped they would do the same."

Joseph Tallcot read his paper, first before a committee, and afterward before the synod, and went his way. The synod, after duly considering it, published it, with resolutions "full of approving it, and solemnly declaring, that from that time they would abandon the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes; that they would speak against its common use from the pulpit, and use their influence to prevail with others to follow their example."

Similar incidents were transpiring in different parts of the country and among people of various religious professions. Total abstainers were forming. In 1793 the Presbyterian synod of Geneva at one of their meetings, after reading the paper of Joseph Tallcot, was authorized to publish the principles of total abstinence. The synod, after duly considering the principles of total abstinence, and the evils and calamitous consequences of intemperance. I insisted that nothing short of the example of that part of society which gives habits to the world, of abstaining altogether from the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes, would correct this alarming evil."

In the same year the General Association of Connecticut recommended entire abstinence from ardent spirits; while the Consociation of Fairfield County adopted the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks whatever, especially for "those whose appetite for drink is strong and increasing." The Temperance Society, formed at Moreau, N.Y., 1808, and the Boston Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, 1813, were not total abstainers, but went their way. In 1818 the Presbyterian Assembly made a deliverance "not only against actual intemperance, but against all those habits and indulgences which may have a tendency to produce it." In 1819 the General Association of Connecticut recommended entire abstinence from ardent spirits; while the Consociation of Fairfield County adopted the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks whatever, especially for "those whose appetite for drink is strong and increasing." The Temperance Society, formed at Moreau, N.Y., 1808, and the Boston Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, 1813, were not total abstainers. In 1812 the Presbyterian General Assembly made a deliverance "not only against actual intemperance, but against all those habits and indulgences which may have a tendency to produce it." In 1823 President Nott of Union College published his..."
TEMPERANCE.

Sermons on the Evils of Intemperance. In 1826 the American Temperance Society was organized, The National Philanthropist was started, and Dr. Lyman Beecher published his Six Sermons on Intemperance. In the same year Rev. Calvin Chapin, in The Connecticut Observer, advocated abstention from all intoxicating drinks, and not from distilled spirits merely. From about 1836 this principle came to be generally accepted by the reformers.

The spread of the movement was very rapid in Great Britain, and marvellously rapid in the United States. Societies, local and general, were organized. Temperance books, pamphlets, and newspapers were published in great numbers. Public meetings were held. The pledge was circulated. Total abstainers came to be counted by millions. Lancashire, Eng., contributed the word "teetotal" to characterize the reform. In 1840 six hard drinkers in Baltimore suddenly signed the pledge, and started the "Washingtonian" movement. In a few months, about 1838, the Irish Roman-Catholic priest, Father Mathew, administered the pledge to near a hundred and fifty thousand persons in Cork alone. He was eminently successful in temperance work in different parts of Great Britain, as well as in the United States, which he visited in 1849.

Fuller accounts of the movement in this country may be found in the article on Temperance Reform, in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia, and in the article by Professor J. W. Mears, in the Presbyterian Review for 1881, p. 500; while the temperance article in the Library of Universal Knowledge is pretty full in regard to the movement in Great Britain. To these sources the present article is indebted for a few of its facts and dates.

Many seem to suppose that the effort to secure the legal prohibition of the liquor-traffic is a later and more advanced stage of the temperance reform than the efforts for total abstinence; but this is only true in a modified sense. We have already seen, that there was prohibitory legislation for the Colony of Georgia as early as 1783. Many of the earlier attempts to restrict the use of liquors were accompanied either by demands for the legal restriction of their sale, or else by actual legislation for that purpose. Dr. Beecher's Six Sermons emphatically declared the remedy for intemperance to be "the banishment of ardent spirits from the list of lawful articles of commerce," and invoked the interference of legislation to this end, as well as of public sentiment (edition of 1828, p. 64). As the numbers of the temperance men increased, they became more and more pressing in their demands for legislative remedies. During the decade beginning about 1846, they found it easy to carry the elections in most parts of the United States. Rigid prohibitory laws were very generally enacted, and local option laws in a few instances where general prohibition could not be obtained. It proved easier to enact laws, however, than to execute them. In most cases they have either been pronounced unconstitutional, or repealed, or allowed to become a dead letter.

The passage of these laws may, perhaps, be regarded as the culmination of one great movement of temperance reform. The subject has not since been so prominently before the public. This is doubtless to be accounted for, in part by the fact that it has ceased to be a novelty, in part by the fact that the advocates of temperance have unwisely allowed their attention to be too largely diverted from the great issues at stake to the minor points in which they differ among themselves, and in part to the presence of other public questions of absorbing interest, notably those connected with our civil war. Many imagine that the temperance movement is receding, but there is no sufficient evidence that such is the case. The larger part of the increase of our population for forty years past has been of immigrants and their descendants; that is, of classes of people who did not participate in the great reform movement. During the same time there has been a drifting into the large towns, which have always been centres of temptation. Though our population has grown, the classes of it among whom the reform achieved its principal successes have not increased in anything like that ratio. In these circumstances, if the proportion of our total abstainers to our whole population were now half as large as it was forty years ago, that would probably indicate that the reform had held its own. But doubtless the ratio is at least as large now as it was then, instead of being much smaller; and this indicates, on the whole, a decided and steady progress. Among the Irish members of the Roman Church, in particular, the gain is very marked and gratifying; and it seems to be even greater in Great Britain and the different parts of Europe.

In the temperance-work of the past thirty years, the Sons of Temperance, the Rechabites, and other so-called secret temperance organizations, have been quite prominent. The various red-ribbon and blue-ribbon movements are familiar to all. Organizations of women, as well as of men, have made their influence felt in what have been described as praying "crusades" in the places where liquors were sold, in working with voters for better laws, and doubtless yet more effectively in the establishing of friendly inns, coffee-houses, and the like, and in securing temperance sermons and addresses, circulating temperance literature, forming temperance schools, and introducing temperance instruction into Sunday schools. Possibly the work now done, though less public than formerly, is not less in amount, nor less effective.

For some years renewed attention has been paid to the legislative aspects of the subject. The laws recently enacted in Michigan, which attempt to restrict the traffic by a high special tax, without the form of a license, seem to many the best available kind of legislation; while prohibitory constitutional amendments such as have lately been approved by the States of Kansas and Iowa are advocated by others. Experiments have been tried in what are known as civil damage laws, by which those who sell intoxicating drinks are held responsible for certain of the evils thereby produced. Such laws were passed in Wisconsin as early as 1849, and in some other States at a much later date. In regard to all these, temperance-workers need to keep in mind that they cannot afford to cheapen the sanctity of law by the passage of infeasible or care-

LESS.] TEMPERANCE.

But, except in these two points, they differ so radically as greatly to hinder their work. They flatly contradict one another in their teachings as to the grounds of the duty of total abstinence, its limits, and some of the means by which it is to be urged. It is evident that some of them, at least, are seriously mistaken. The cause has, now, no more pressing need than that its advocates should carefully and candidly sift the arguments they are accustomed to use, throwing away the bad, and retaining only those that will endure testing.

In the physiological argument, for example, it is sometimes held, on the one side, that alcohol is properly a food, and a genuine stimulant; and, on the other hand, that it is merely an irritant poison. But with alcohol, as with other substances, this may depend on the quantity of the alcohol, the presence of other ingredients, and the condition of the body when the alcohol is taken. Joseph Cook asserted, in his lectures in Boston, in 1882, that the tables of certain insurance-companies which insure total abstainers in one class, and moderate drinkers in another, show that there is a distinct and considerable difference of longevity in favor of the former. This and similar facts conclusively prove that alcohol habitually taken in the form of an intoxicating beverage is deleterious, even when it does not lead to drunkenness. Nevertheless, alcohol is commonly believed to have a genuine medicinal use, though it is a dangerous medicine. And while the experience of some generations of total abstainers proves that it is never necessary as a food, the most trustworthy experiments seem to show, that, in minute quantities, it is sometimes harmless, and even salutary. It would not be easy to determine the percentage of alcohol necessary to render a beverage intoxicating. But, from the considerations just mentioned, it seems clear that the using of dilutions in which alcohol is contained in quantities clearly less than that percentage is a very different thing from using intoxicating drinks. Owing, let us remember, is not against alcohol, but against intoxicating alcohol. Doubtless the two are so related as to render it prudent to abstain from even the very light wines, beers, and ciders. But we ought to remember that this obligation, unlike that to refuse the stronger beverages, depends on local and temporary conditions. It would have been impossible, for example, in the state of things which existed in the world prior to about the year 1700.

Again: it is argued, on the one hand, that literature, ancient and modern, recognizes two different meanings of the word "wine;" namely, fermented grape-juice, and unfermented. The common reply to this is a sweeping and contemptuous denial that the word is ever used to denote unintoxicating juice of any kind. The facts proved are, that preparations of unfermented grape-juice have been well known among many peoples, that they have sometimes been used in beverages, and that the name "wine" has been frequently applied to them, though certainly not in such a way as to establish this as one of the current and natural meanings of the word.

As a rule, both the parties in this discussion studiously ignore any distinction between the terms "fermented" or "alcoholic," and "unfermented." But the existence of precisely this distinction is the one fact of real importance which the evidence adduced in the discussion abundantly proves. In the history of the grape a very important part is played by wines sometimes of cheap and ordinary quality, and sometimes of much greater value, which contained alcohol in such quantities and combinations as to render the wine agreeable, but absolutely unintoxicating. It is these uninebriating wines, which, with some confusion of thought as to their relations to the grape-jellies, have been mistaken by many for unfermented juice.

Men who are accustomed to recognize the Bible as an inspired rule of conduct have been compelled to try to reconcile its occasional approval of wine, in the example of Jesus at Cana, for example, with its repeated and sweeping denunciations of wine. Those who hold that the word “wine” may equally well mean either the fermented or the unfermented juice of the grape, think that, when the Bible approves of wine, it must be held to refer to that which is unfermented. Their opponents, denying the distinction, commonly assert that the Bible approves of the drinking of intoxicants, but disapproves of excess. The opinion thus denied is certainly erroneous; but, as certainly, that substituted for it does not follow from the premises. Philo, as we have seen, held the different theory, that the Scriptures approve wine-drinking in certain aspects of it, but not in others. It would be easy to construct other theories as plausible as either of these. The discussion of this question properly belongs, not to this article, but to that on Wine. It is sufficient here to say, that we must look for a better solution of it than has yet been offered. Meanwhile, whatever solution we may adopt, it will still be true that the specific precepts concerning wine, found in the Scriptures, may not apply in the changed conditions of our modern civilization; while the scriptural principles on which our obligation to total abstinence is based are at all times applicable.

LIT.—The various religious publishing boards and societies, the private houses that publish Sunday-school literature, and the National Temperance Society and Publication House, offer each its own list of temperance stories and of other temperance books and tracts. Many of the secret and other temperance organizations publish each its newspaper. At different times, and notably within a few years past, the subject has been discussed in the reviews. To the catalogues and indexes of these publishers and publications the reader is referred. It is impossible particularly to name more than a very few works out of the vast number. Some of the more celebrated older publications are mentioned in the body of this article. Others are, L. M. Sargents: Temperance Tales, (The Temperance School, the Lesson Book for Schools, and the Juvenile Temperance Society), 1839; Temperance Sermons, and Dr. Mears: Temperance Sermons, Dr. Cuyler: The Moral Duty of Total Abstinence; William E. Dodge: The Church and Temperance; Moody: Talks on Temperance; J. M. Vanburen: Gospel Temperance; Canon Farrar: Talks on Temperance; Dr. Hammond: Alcohol as a Food and Medicine; and Dr. E. M. Hunt: Alcohol as a Food and Medicine.

For other medical views, see the Tribune lecture of Dr. Hammond; and, by index, the two volumes on Physiology, by Drs. J. W. Draper and J. C. Draper. For additional literature, including that of prohibition, consult any current number of the organs of the National Temperance Society,—the National Temperance Advocate, or the Youth's Temperance Banner. The theory of unfermented wines, and the view that the churches ought to use unalcoholic grape-juice at the Lord's Table, are advocated in many of the publications of this society, but in none of them more reasonably than in The Bible Rule of Temperance, published by the Rev. George Duffield in 1834-55, and republished, 1868. These two doctrines are attacked by Dr. Dunlop Moore, in the Presbyterian Review for January, 1831, and January, 1832. In the same Review, for April, 1832, is an article which advocates the using of the unalcoholic juice of the grape in the communion, and maintains generally the positions taken in the present article. Of temperance Sunday-school stories, which are being produced in considerable numbers, We Three, by Miss Kate W. Hamilton, is a highly creditable specimen. The stories by Mary Dwinnell Chel- lis are favorites with many, W. J. Beecher.

TEMPLE AT JERUSALEM. I. Temple of Solomon.—David, when he was inhabiting his house of cedar, and God had given him rest from all his enemies, meditated the design of building a temple in which the ark of God might be placed, instead of being deposited within curtains (2 Sam. vii. 2; 1 Chron. xvii. 1). In this he was discouraged by the prophet Nathan, on account of his many wars, and the blood which he had shed, but promised at the same time that his son and successor shall build a house unto the Lord. While David was prohibited from building the temple, he nevertheless made preparations for it (1 Kings v. v.; 1 Chron. xxii.); and, as far as the material and ideal of the building is concerned, David was its author, while Solomon merely executed the design. The workmen and the materials employed in the erection of the temple were chiefly procured by Solomon from Hiram, king of Tyre. The building, which was begun four hundred and eighty years after the exodus from Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, in the third month of the year 1012 B.C., was finished in the twelfth year of his reign, in the eighth month (1 Kings vi. 39).

In its construction the temple was mainly built after the pattern of the tabernacle; since it was only to be an enlarged and fixed dwelling of the Lord, a palace in place of the movable tent. Of course every thing was on an enlarged scale, and of more substantial materials. The temple in the Beit is pe, exhibits long, twenty wide, and thirty high. The floor was throughout of cedar, but boarded over with planks of fir.
The temple was surrounded by a court of priests, probably stood the brazen scaffold which Solomon had built for the dedicatory prayer (2 Chron. vi. 13), and which afterwards probably served as the king's stand (2 Kings xi. 14, xxiii. 3). There was perhaps an ascent by which the king went up into the temple from his own house (1 Kings x. 5; 2 Chron. ix. 11). The covert for the sabbath (2 Kings xvi. 10) probably served as a kind of protection against the sun and wind.

After the temple was finished, it was consecrated by the king. It remained the centre of public worship for all the Israelites, only till the death of Solomon, after which ten tribes forsook this sanctuary. But even in the kingdom of Judah it was from time to time desecrated by altars erected to idols (comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 13). There was a treasury in the temple, in which much precious metal was collected for the maintenance of public worship. The gold and silver of the temple were, however, frequently applied to political purposes (1 Kings xv. 18 sq.; 2 Kings xii. 18, xvi. 8, xviii. 16). The treasury of the temple was repeatedly plundered by foreign invaders; for instance, by Shishak (1 Kings xiv. 26), by Jehoshaph, king of Israel (2 Kings xiv. 14), by Nebuchadnezzar (xxiv. 19), and, lastly, again by Nebuchadnezzar (xxxv. 11). There was perhaps an ascent by unsuitable contents, caused the temple to be burned down (xxv. 9 sq.) four hundred and sixteen years after its dedication.

The restoration of the temple was prophesied; and, fourteen years after the destruction of the Temple of Solomon, Ezekiel saw in a vision a new temple, which he describes in chapters xl.-xliii. II. THE SECOND TEMPLE.—In the year 536 B.C. Cyrus permitted the Jews to return to their country, and rebuild the temple, at the same time commanding that the sacred utensils which had been pillaged in the first temple should be restored, and that, for the restoration of the temple, assistance should be granted (Ez. iv., vi. 2). The first colony which returned under Zerubbabel and Joshua, having collected the necessary means, and having also obtained the assistance of Phoenician workmen, commenced, in the second year after their return, the rebuilding of the temple. The Ezionites brought cedar-trees from Lebanon to Joppa. The Jews refused the co-operation of the Samaritans, who, being thereby offended, induced the king, Smerdis, to prohibit the building. It was only in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (520 B.C.) that the building was resumed; and was completed 516 B.C. (Ez. iv.-vi.; Hag. i. 15). According to Ez. vi. 3, it was sixty cubits high and wide, thus larger than the Temple of Solomon; while, according to Hag. ii. 3, it was inferior to the first. The inferiority probably consisted in the absence of the ark and precious metals. Antiochus Epiphanes pillaged and desecrated it through idolatry (1 Macc. i. 21, iv. 38; 2 Macc. vi. 2). Judas Macabeus repaired, furnished, and cleansed it, 105 B.C. (1 Macc. i. 30; 2 Macc. i. 15, x. 3), whence the Jewish "feast of dedication" (John x. 22). He also fortified the temple mount (1 Macc. iv. 60, vi. 7). Alexander Janneus (about 106 B.C.) separated the court of the priests from the external court by a wooden railing (Joseph. Ant. XIII. 13, 3). In the year 63 B.C. Pompey attacked the temple from the north side, caused a great massacre in its courts, but abstained from plum-

the Holy of Holies (Ibid. XIV. 4, 2 sq.). Herod
the Great, with the assistance of Roman troops, stormed the temple, 37 B.C., on occasion
some halls were destroyed (Ibid. XIV. 16, 2).

III. THE Herodian Temple. — Herod, wishing to ingratiate himself with the Jews, undertook to raise a perfectly new temple. The work was commenced in the eighteenth year of his reign (20 or 21 B.C.). Priests and Levites fintished the temple in one year and a half, while the courts required eight years. The out-buildings, however, were completed under Agrippa II.

and under Albinus the procurator, in the year
A.D. 64 (Joseph. Ant. XX. 9, 7). The structure of the temple is described by Josephus (Ant. XV.
11; Jewish War, V. 5), and in the Talmudic treatise Middoth. Already under Archelaus
the courts of the temple became the scene of revolt

Tenison, Thomas, was born at Cottenham,
Cambridgeshire, in 1586; and studied at Benet
College, Cambridge. In the University the ejectment (1692) he became a fellow, and in 1695 was appointed university preacher. The rectory of Holywell, Huntingdonshire, the living of St. Peter's Mancroft, Norwich, the vicarage of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, London, the archde-cony of the metropolis, and the bishopric of Lincoln, successively fell to his lot; and in all these preferrments he showed administrative power, for which he was more remarkable than for pulpit eloquence. He was an active Churchman, and busy in matters connected with the Revolution of 1688. On the death of Tillotson, he was raised to the primacy, in which he made a considerable figure, both as to temporal and spiritual affairs. When William III. was absent from England in 1695, Tenison filled the part of a lord-justice, being first in the commission appointed by the sovereign for that purpose; but his actual power and political influence in that capacity must have been far below what accrued to some of the English archbishops in the middle ages. It was as president of the Upper House of Convocation that he had the most arduous duties to discharge, and the greatest trouble to endure. The Lower House was chiefly composed of High-Churchmen, unfriendly to the Revolution (which Tenison cordially approved), and advocating the independence of the Ecclesiastical Establishment in a way which he condemned. The Upper and Lower Houses of Convocation came into hosannous conflict; and scenes were enacted in the Jerusalem Chamber, the adjoining organ-room, the dean's yard, and Henry VII.'s Chapel, such as were disgraceful to the High-Church clergy, who figured as chief actors in the strife. The archbishop manifested a steadiness of purpose and an invincibility of calm resistance, which won for him the name of the "rock-like" Tenison. He aimed at church reform, and issued circulars to the bishops with that view, but achieved little success. A funeral sermon he preached for Mary, consort of William III., was warmly censured in a letter attributed to Bishop Ken. He was more a man of words than letters, but he founded a library which bore his name. He attended his royal master on his death-bed, and survived Queen Anne, in whose reign he had fresh convocation troubles. He died in 1715.

JOHN STOUGHTON.

TENNENT, a family of ministers illustrious in the history of the American Presbyterian Church.

1. William Tennent, b. in Ireland, 1673; d. at Neshaminy, Bucks County, twenty miles north of Philadelphia, Penn., May 6, 1745. Originally in the Established Church of Ireland, he arrived in Philadelphia, Penn., Sept. 6, 1718, and entered the Presbyterian Church in 1726; acted as tutor in Log College for a year; was ordained and installed pastor in New Brunswick, N.J., in the autumn of 1727. Like his father, he was an ardent admirer of Whitefield; and, in imitation of the great evangelist, he made a preaching-tour through West Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, and in 1740, at Whitefield's solicitation, through New England, as far as Boston. By his fiery zeal, deep moral earnestness, spirituality, no less than by his logic and argumentative ability, he produced everywhere a profound impression. His popularity was second only to Whitefield's. But he was lacking in tenderness and consideration for those who differed from him. At that time many Presbyterian ministers were conscientiously opposed to the methods adopted by the revival preachers. Tennent had no appreciation of such scruples, but set them down to a lack of vital religion. Moreover, Log College was openly criticised by the synod of Philadelphia, because of the type of piety there fostered, and its educational defects. Tennent naturally resented these attacks, and, under what he deemed sufficient provocation, preached in 1742 his famous "Nottingham sermon," "one of the most severely abusive sermons which was ever penned." (Alexander), in which he lashed his ministerial brethren for their "hypocrisy." Tennent had a large following throughout the country, and able ministers were upon his side. The agitation lasted for many years. The presbytery of New Brunswick seceded from the synod of Philadelphia in 1741 (see art. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES, p. 1907). In May, 1742, Tennent was called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, then just started, made up of the admirers of Whitefield and the friends of the revival. But, although he remained their pastor till his death, he did not repeat in his second charge the triumphs of his first. He was faithful and highly useful; but his preaching was quieter, and not so many souls came under his influence. His delivery was much less impassioned, due very probably to his use of a manuscript. In 1758 he raised in Great Britain some fifteen hundred pounds for the College of New Jersey, a sum much beyond his expectations. Although he had contributed so largely to the disruption of the Presbyterian Church in 1741, he toiled to effect a reconciliation, and saw with great satisfaction the breach healed in 1758. Besides a memoir of his brother John (Boston, 1735), he published a volume of sermons (Philadelphia, 1743), and occasional sermons and pamphlets. See list in Log College, pp. 65 sq.—2. William Tennent, brother of the preceding; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, June 5, 1705; d. at Freehold, Monmouth County, N.J., March 8, 1777. He studied under his father in Log College, and theology under Gilbert Tennent, b. in County Armagh, Ireland, April 5, 1703; d. in Philadelphia, July 23, 1764. He came to America with his father, 1718; was educated by him; was licensed by the presbytery of Philadelphia, May, 1726; acted as tutor in Log College for a year; was ordained and installed pastor in New Brunswick, N.J., in the autumn of 1727. He is the subject of several highly remarkable stories, of which the two most famous are: (1) that, while preparing for his examination for the ministry, he fell sick, and after a trance which lasted three days, during which time he was, as he believed and declared, in heaven, and heard "utterable things." he was dead, and were upon the point of burying him, notwithstanding the protestations of his physician, when he revived. He regained his health in a year, but had lost all his knowledge of reading and writing, much more, all his previous learning. After a time, however, he experienced a more shock in his head; and his knowledge from that moment began rapidly to return, until all was regained. “For three years,” he said, “the sense of divine things continued so great, and every thing else appeared so completely vain, when compared to heaven, that, could I have had the world for stooping down for it, I believe I should not have thought of doing it.” No autobiographic record of his experiences during his trance is believed to be extant, although his intention to prepare one is known. See Log College, pp. 112-118, 147. (2) The second story is, that “one night, when Mr. Tennent was asleep in his own bed, he was waked up by a sharp pain in the region of the toes of one of his feet; and upon getting a light, and examining the foot, it was discovered that several of his toes had been cut entirely off, as if by some sharp instrument. But, though the wounded part was bleeding, nothing was seen of the excised members, nor any means by which such a dismemberment could have been effected” (Log College, p. 151). Mr. Tennent was a remarkable character, full of resources, indefatigable in Christian labors, wise to win souls and to guide them to heaven. By his earnestness, eloquence, simplicity, and, above all, ardent piety, he made such an impression upon his neighborhood, that he is vividly remembered until this day. — 4. April 23, 1732, leaving behind him a pleasant and godly memorandum. “His labors were attended with three notable qualities,—prudence, diligence, and success.” Two of his sermons, and memoir, were published in a volume by Gilbert Tennent, Boston, 1736. — 5. Tepharm (Gen. xxxi. 19, 34; 1 Sam. xix. 15, 16), a word found only in the plural form, derived, probably, from Heb. "to be rich," designating a sort of household gods, or penates, in size and appearance approaching the human, which were regarded as dispensers of good-fortune, and shields against evil (Judg. xviii. 24). They were objects of worship, and consulted as oracles (Ezek. xxi. 26; Zech. x. 2). The Israelites engaged in commerce with the Canaan itans, and they existed in common private use, although forbidden in public worship, and always described by the prophets as idols, even after the Babylonian captivity (Gen. xxivv. 4; 2 Kings xxiii. 24; Zech. x. 2; Hos. iii. 4).

Terminus and the Terministic Controversy. Medieval theology, partially supported by Augustine, maintained that the terminus of grace coincided with the terminus of life; so that infant baptism without baptism could not possibly escape hell. During the Reformation, this doctrine was modified in various ways. On the one side, the idea of the free, infinite grace of God expanded the terminus beyond life, and gave rise to the doctrine of apokatastasis: on the other side, the conviction that a certain interior, moral-religious state was an absolute condition of grace, narrowed the terminus down almost to a single moment of life, and gave rise to the doctrine of terminism. The Friends are the principal representatives of this doctrine, holding that every person has in his life a moment or period of visitation, but that no second opportunity is granted. The Pietists, with their suspicion against the late repentance, also incline towards this doctrine; and in J. G. Böse, deacon of Sorau, it found a decided and eloquent spokesman. His Terminus pereniorus salutis humanae (Francfort, 1698) attracted much attention, and called forth a great number of refutations. The most remarkable among these were J. G. Neumann's Dissertatio de termino salutis humanae perenioro (Wittenberg, 1700) and Dissertatio de tempore gratiae divinae, etc. (Wittenberg, 1701). As Böse died in 1700, A. Rechenberg, the son-in-law of Spener, took up the defence of his ideas, and a long and bitter controversy ensued with Ittig, professor at Leipzig; but the spreading rationalism finally bereft the question of all interest. [F. H. Hesse: Der terministische Streit, Giessen, 1877.]

Territorialism denotes a theory of church government which originated with the Reformation, and according to which the ruler of a country has a natural right to rule also over the ecclesiastical affairs of his people. The theory found its principal supporter in Christian Thomasius, and its principal opponent in J. B. Carpzov. See the art. Church and State.

Tersteegen, Gerhard, b. at Meurs in Rhenish Prussia, Nov. 25, 1697; d. at Mulheim in Westphalia, April 3, 1769; a famous mystic and hymnist of the Reformed Church. He was educated in the Latin school of his native city, and in 1713 apprenticed to a merchant in Mulheim, where he soon after made the acquaintance of Wilhelm Hoffmann, the leader of a pietistic revival movement in those regions. As he found that mercantile business interfered with the development of his religious life, he left that profession in 1718, and learned the trade of a ribbon-maker. Settling in a lonesome little hut, he led a secluded and ascetic life, dividing his time between work and prayer, and distributing not only his earnings, but also the inheritance from his mother, among the poor. After 1724, his activity in the service of Christ assumed greater dimensions. He began to preach, and he engaged in literature. Travelling from one place to another, he visited the Rhenish cities in Holland and Westphalia, held conventicles, and formed minor communities. He translated numerous books of the French mystics, — Labadie, Madame Guyon, Louvigny, and others. Of his own compositions, the principal are, Auserlesene Lebensbeschreibungen heiliger Seelen (1783–85, 8 vols.), Gothische Briefe (1789–94, 4 vols.), Weg der Wahrheit, Gebete, etc., and a number of beautiful hymns. His Gedanken über die Werke des Philosophen von Sans Souci was read by Friedrich II., and is said to have made an impression on him. A collected edition of his works has appeared at Essen, and separate editions are still made. The principal source of his life is in his correspondence, of which the German part appeared at Solingen, 1773–75, 2 vols., and the Dutch at Hoorn, 1772. His biography was written by Kerlen (Mülheim, 2d ed., 1853) and Stursberg (1869). See art. Hymnology, p. 1051.

Tertiaries, Tertiiarii (Tertiusardo de paneitiente), formed associations whose members, though not obliged to live in monasteries, or take the three monastic vows, nevertheless led a religious life according to certain definite rules. They remained in the world, and were distinguished from other people only by their sombre, undecorated costumes and certain religious restrictions, and certain religious practices. But in the world they represented the interests of the order with which they were connected, and enjoyed, beside the reputation of greater sanctity than was to be found among ordinary laymen, not few of the privileges of the orders. It is said that such associations were first formed by Norbert, the founder of the order of the Premonstratensians; but its complete organization and success the institution owes to Francis of Assisi, who, afraid of receiving into the monasteries all the persons who were awakened by his preaching,—because, in that case, whole regions might have been depopulated,—and yet unwilling not to meet the popular craving for penitence, had recourse to this device. The success of the institution was prodigious. The highest persons became members of the order,—the Emperor Charles IV., King Louis of France, King Bela of Hungary, Queen Blanche of Castile, and others. Of the later monastic orders it followed the example of the Franciscanes, and formed associations of tertiaries. There were also female tertiaries.

Tertullian (Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus), b. at Carthage about 150 or 160; d. there between 220 and 240; the first great writer of Latin Christianity, and one of the grandest and most original characters of the ancient church. Of his life very little is known. His father held a high position (centurio, aide-de-camp) in the Roman garrison in Africa; but the Punic blood of his descent is visibly pulsating in his style, with its archaism and provincialisms, its glowing imagery, its passionate temper. He received an excellent education. He was a scholar. He wrote books in Greek, of which, however, none has come down to us. But his proper study was jurisprudence, and his method of reasoning shows striking marks of his judicial training. It is not known at what time he was converted to Christianity, nor how the conversion came about. But the event must have been sudden, decisive, transforming at once his whole personality; for afterwards he could not imagine a truly Christian life without such a conscious breach, a radical act of conversion: sunt, non nascentur Christiani. In the Church of Carthage he was ordained a presbyter, though he was married,—a fact which is well established by his two books to his wife, though Roman-Catholic writers have tried to deny it. At Rome he visited once or twice; and it may be that the laxity and corruption of morals which at that time (see Calixtus) he found prevailing in the Church of Rome contributed not a little to drive him into Montanism. At all events, a few years after his conversion (about 202) he became the leader, the passionate and brilliant exponent, of that movement (see Montanism),—that is, he became a schismatic; and the story, that before his death he returned to the bosom of the Catholic Church, is very improbable, since his party, the Tertullianists, continued to exist. Nevertheless, in spite of his schism he continued to fight heresy, especially Gnosticism; and by these doctrinal works he is the teacher of Cyprian, the predecessor of Augustine, and the chief founder of Latin theology.

The writings of Tertullian are very numerous, though generally not very large. As they cover the whole field of the religious and political conflicts against Paganism, polemics against heresies, and polity, discipline, morals, or the whole reorganization of human life on a Christian basis, they give a picture of the religious life of the time which is of the greatest interest to the church historian. Their general character is stern and practical, but they are also original. In his endeavors to make the Latin language a pliant vehicle for his somewhat tumultuous ideas, he now and then becomes strained, queer, and obscure; but as a general rule he is quick, precise, and pointed. And he is always powerful, compelling the attention of the reader, not begging it; always rich, lavish with wit and satire, sometimes, also, with sophism and lawyer’s tricks; and always original. Though thoroughly conversant with Greek theology, he was entirely independent of it. Indeed, he forms a direct contrast to Origen, just as Montanism forms the opposite extreme of Gnosticism. While Origen pushes his idealism far in the direction of a Gnostic spiritualism, Tertullian carries his realism to the very verge of materialism. Rejecting the Platonic doctrine of pre-existence, and the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis, he adopts the traducianist view of hereditary sin, teaches that soul and body originate at the same moment, and proves, metaphysically and from the Bible, that the soul has corporeality. Greek philosophy he despised; Gnosticism he considered a crime; and Neander has exactly hit the centre of his spiritual character by calling his monograph upon him, Antignoslicus. But it is just this practical bearing of his ideas, even the most abstract ones, which places him at the head of the theology of the Western Church. The direction he thereby gave to all theological speculation has never since been entirely lost sight of, not even by the schoolmen.

The chronology of Tertullian’s writings is very uncertain. The principal question, however,—Which of them belong to the Catholic period of his life, and which to the Montanist?—can in many cases be decided by internal criteria. To the Montanist period belong Adversus Marcionem, De anima, De carne Christi, De resurrectione carnis,...
TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION.

Adversus Praezean, De corona militis, De fuga in persecutione, De monogamia, De jejuniis, De pudicitia, etc.; certainly Catholic are his Apologeticus (A.D. 197), De paenitentia, De oratione, De baptism, Ad uxorern, Ad martyres, perhaps also, De praescriptione haereticorum, etc.; while others, Ad Nationes, Pro testimonio famae, De poltro, Adversus Hermogenem, etc., are of uncertain date. Among his apologetical writings, his Apologeticus, written during the reign of Septimius Severus, and addressed to the Roman magistrates, is the best defence of Christianity and the Christians ever written against the reproaches of the Pagans, and one of the most magnificent monuments of the ancient church, full of enthusiasm, courage, and vigor. It first clearly proclaims the principle of religious liberty as an inalienable right of man. Of his dogmatical works, the most important is his De praescriptione, developing as its fundamental idea, that in a dispute between the church and a separating party, the whole burden of the evidence lies with the latter, as the church, in possession of the unbroken tradition, is by its very existence a guaranty of its truth. His five books Adversus Marciomenon, written in 207 or 208, are the most comprehensive and elaborate of his polemical works, and invaluable for the true understanding of Gnosticism. Of his moral and ascetic treatises, the De patientia and De spectaculis are among the most interesting; the De pudicitia and De virginibus velandis, among the most characteristic.

TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION. An act passed by the English Parliament in 1688, which enacted that all persons holding public offices, civil or military, should receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the usage of the Church of England, take the oaths of supremacy and uniformity, and declare their rejection of the doctrine of transubstantiation. It was mistrusted to be dangerous from Popish Recusants," and was in the first instance levelled against the Catholics. The Toleration Act of William (1689), and especially the legislation of the present century (the Relief Act of May 9, 1828, and the Roman-Catholic Relief Bill of April 13, 1829), have abolished the hardships of the Test Act.

TESTAMENT, The Old and New, is the dominant name in the Occidental Church for the collection of Holy Scripture, and the translation of the Greek designations σατάν καὶ ἄγγελον δαίμονον. The term arose in this way: δαίμον means disposition; then the special form, a will; then, so far as the execution of this will depends upon certain conditions, an agreement binding upon a covenant (σατανής), yet differing from it, since in a δαίμον one of the parties takes the initiative, and lays down the terms. It was in obedience to a right instinct that the LXX translated ἔν τις by δαίμον, instead of by σατανής; for thereby they expressed the correct idea, that, in the "covenant" between God and man, God appears, not as one of the parties simply, but as the founder, who holds the other strictly to certain terms. It is upon this idea that the argumentation in Gal. iii. 15 sqq. rests. The Itala translates "covenant" also by testamentum ("will"), where Jerome, in the Old Testament, uses fãdus. The Scriptures are το βιβλίον τῆς δαίμονος ("the books of the will"), which meant at first the Decalogue, then the whole law. For sake of brevity the phrase was replaced by the single word δαίμον (so 2 Cor. iii. 14). In the Greek Church the expression was used of the whole canon (so Origen: π. αρξ., iv. 1). In old ecclesiastical Latin, besides testamentum, instrumentum was used (so Tertullian: Adv. Prax., c. 20). For the contents of the Old and New Testament, see CANON.

TETRAGRAMMATON (four letters), the combination יְהֹוָה (Jehovah), by the use of which name the miracles of Christ were said by the early opponents of Christianity to have been performed.

TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION (also called Suevica or Argentinensis), the Confession which the four cities of Strassburg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau, presented to the diet of Augsburg (July 11, 1530), and, properly speaking, the first Confession of the Reformed Church. Landgrave Philipp of Hesse in vain exerted himself to bring about a union between the two branches of the reformatory movement. But the Saxon princes and theologians obstinately excluded the representatives of the cities of Southern Germany suspected of Zwinglian heresy, from all their political and theological conferences. Under such circumstances, it became necessary for them to present a confession of their own. It was drawn up by Bueter and Capito, who arrived at Augsburg a few days after the presentation, by the Saxon theologians, of the Confessio Augustana, and consists of twenty-three articles. The formal principle of the Reformation — the absolute authority of Scripture in matters of faith, worship, and discipline, for ecclesiastical purposes, the Conf. Aug. passes by silently — is stated with great energy; and the whole instrument is distinguished for clearness and precision, with the exception of the representation of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, which is held in somewhat various and divergent forms, not to make a reconciliation with the Lutherans impossible. The Confession was not read before the diet; though its refutation, drawn up by Eck, Faber, and Cochleius, and full of misrepresenta-
TETRARCH (ruler of a fourth part of a kingdom, called a "tetrarchy"), according to the later Roman practice, the vassal-governor of portion of a province under the Roman sovereignty, but not necessarily of a fourth. The word "tetrarchy" first appears in connection with Philip of Macedon's division of Thessaly into four parts (Demos: Phil. iii. c. 26; Strabo, 9, p. 430).

The term is applied to the ruler of each of the four Celtic tribes which lived in Galatia before the Roman conquest, B.C. 189 (Pliny, 5, 42). In the New Testament the term "tetrarch" is used as synonymous with king (Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; compare Matt. xiv. 9; Mark vi. 22). It is applied to three persons,—Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1), Herod Philip (Luke iii. 1), and Lysanias (Luke iii. 1).

TETZEL, Johann, b. at Leipzig between 1450 and 1460; d. there in July, 1519. He studied theology and philosophy at the university of his native city, entered the Dominican order in 1489, theology and philosophy at the university of his native city, entered the Dominican order in 1489, and was in 1543 appointed preacher at the Elizabeth Church in Marburg. He was an ardent Lutheran, but the experiences he made as a field-preacher gradually led him to the conviction that the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith was a most fertile cause of immorality. By his vehement attacks on that doctrine he caused much disturbance, and was finally deposed. He went to Italy, entered the Roman-Catholic Church in 1557, and died as professor in Freiburg, May 23, 1569. See Hochhuth: De Thameri vita et scriptis, Marburg, 1568.

THEATINES (Clerici regulares Theatini, or Cajetani, or Chietini), an order of regular clergy founded in Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century as a kind of counter-Reformation. The Pope and the higher clergy of the Roman-Catholic Church considered for a long time the Reformation merely external, which could be made wholly ineffectual by re-organizing the clergy, and raising it in the estimation of the laity; and for this purpose the order of the Theatines was founded in 1524 by Cajetan of Thiene, Bishop Caraffa of Theater or Chieti (afterwards Paul IV.), and Boniface of Colle. It was confirmed by Paul III., 1540, and by Pius V., 1568. The members renounced all property. They lived neither by labor nor by begging, but simply by what Providence bestowed on them. They had convents in Rome, Naples, Venice, Milan, and other Italian cities. They also spread to Poland, Germany, and France; but their number was always small. They made some attempt at missionary labor in Tartary, Georgia, and Circassia, but without any result. Two female orders, founded in 1683 and 1610 by Ursula Benincasa, were by Urban VIII. and Clement IX. united with them. See HELYOT: Hist. des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-18, 8 vols.

THEATRE, The, and the Church. Dramatic poetry is of heathen origin. Neither biblical authority nor biblical interdiction of the drama can be found. The Old Testament contains all other kinds of poetry—epic, lyric, didactic, and idyllic—except dramatic poetry, although in Job and the Song of Songs there are dramatic combinations. It is historically certain that the stage was introduced into Greece from the Greeks. Antiochus Epiphanes (176-164 B.C.) was the first to venture to erect a theatre at Jerusalem. Herod the Great followed his example by inviting Greek players to his court, and erecting a theatre at Caesarea. Both these attempts to domiciliate theatrical spectacles in Judea were met with glum opposition by the Jews. It was only one of his many characteristic surmises, when Luther called the Book of Judith a tragedy, and the Book of Tobit a comedy. In all his parables and figurative words, Christ never referred, even in the most remote way, to the theatre. The case was different with Paul, who uses in a figurative sense the term "theater" (2 Cor. iv. 18), and Paul was also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and refers to the gladiatorial games. It is no wonder that the early Christians looked with horror and disgust upon the amphitheatres, in which many of their own number were given to the wild beasts, and called them the domiciles of the Devil. To these feelings, Tertullian more especially gave expression in his famous work on spectacular displays (De Spectaculis). The dramatic art he regarded as the offspring of hell, and the stage as a part of the Devil's pomp (pompa diaboli), which the candidate for baptism must renounce forever. He was not alone in these opinions among the Church Fathers. Chrysostom courageously opposed the theatrical passion of Antioch and Constantinople, and declared the stage the house of Satan and lies, the consummation of unchastity, the Babylonian furnace, which is heated with combustible material of unchaste words and attitudes. [Chrysostom, Opera, ii. 387, 682 ; iv. 696, 697; vi. 266, 267; vii. 71, etc.] Augustine, after his conversion, condemned the theatre as severely (De Civ. Dei, i. 32) as he had before patronized it habitually. Cyprian not only forbade a converted actor plying his occupation, but refused to allow him to give instruction in declamation and mimicry to gain his daily bread. [The Council of Carthage in 419 forbade plays on Sundays and other sacred days of the calendar.] The Trullan Council of 682, and other councils, forbade the clergy attending the theatre. Now and then an actor was converted, like Genesis, whose confession of Christ brought him a violent death.

The Catholic Church, however, during the middle ages, adopted and transformed the heathen drama in the miracle-plays. (See Religious Dramas.) The Reformers took a less favorable view of the scene than heathen blasphemy; and Tertullian more especially opposed it. Ecolampadius in his youth composed a tragedy, Nemesis Theophili. Luther spoke out boldly in his Table-Talk: "Christians should not flee comedies entirely, because now and then they contain gross jokes and mimicry; for the same consideration would prevent us from reading the Bible." Calvin, in the spring of 1546, allowed some of the pious citizens of Geneva to act in a play which showed how true piety increases a people's happiness. But he opposed the frequent repetition of such plays; and Michael Cop, one of his colleagues, sternly denounced them, so that the magistrates issued a permanent edict prohibiting them in Geneva. The synod of Rochelles issued a similar edict in 1571. In 1633 the Puritan Pryme published his celebrated Histrio-mastix, the Player's Scourge, against the theatre. The Janzenists, especially Nicole, were opposed to it; and it is said that Racine, who inclined to Janzenism, regretted his life having written plays. The Pietists of Germany included among the worldly pleasures which are to be shunned theatrical spectacles, although Spener made a distinction between good and bad plays. Pastor Reither of Hamburg in 1681 issued his work against the theatre, Thetramania oder Werke d. Finsterniss in den öffentlichen Schauspielen ("theatre-mania, or works of darkness in the public plays"). At a later age Jean Jacques Rousseau threw himself, with the zeal of a Puritan or Pietist, into the ranks in opposition to the theatre, and in a tract of 1758 sternly condemned it. In Germany, Lessing opened a new period for the drama, and sought to make it a moral power; but in 1777, in a letter to his brother, he complains that actors look to their support, and care little about their art as such. Schiller and Goethe lent their powerful influence to the stage, and clergymen who would have dared to speak out against it from the pulpit were warned and checked by the civil authorities. In the present century, such writers on ethics as De Wette, Nitzsch, and Rothe, have discussed the moral side of the theatre; and a deeper study of Shakespeare and of Dante has also brought into prominence the question of dramatic representations. Without going into the question, we will content ourselves with quoting from Rothe's Ethics:

"Our theatre certainly stands in need of a reform from the base upwards; but the way to reach it is certainly not for Christians to denounce the stage as unchristian, and then to withdraw from it all sympathy and solicitude."

[Among the early writers of English plays in the sixteenth century were Bishops Bale and Still (Gammer Gurton's Needle, acted at Cambridge, 1586). The public interest in the theatre in Elizabeth's reign met with considerable opposition from the clergy. Archbishop Grindal advised Cecil to suppress players. The first public license granted in England to give theatricals was granted to the servants of the Earl of Leicester in 1571. The Puritans were always opposed to the stage, but on it members of the royal family in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. figured. In 1647 Parliament suppressed the theatres, and forbade actors to exercise their vocation, under penalty of being whipped. After the restoration of the Stuarts, the theatres were again in full blast. Theﱋwho do, as do, also, the majority of nonconformists. The most recent public discussions of the claims of the stage to the patronage of the Christian public have been carried on by the Bishop of Manchester, in England, who hopes to elevate it by such patronage, and Dr. Herrick Johnson of Chicago, who looks upon it as a school of immorality beyond the reach of reclamation.]

with his brother, Die Einführung der erzeugenen Ekelogisi bei den christlichen Gelehrten (Altenburg, 1828, 2 vols.), which was put on the Index. Afterwards, however, he made his peace with Rome, entered the Congregation of the Oratory, and was in 1855, by Pius IX., appointed conservator at the papal archives. But during the Council of the Vatican he was by the Jesuits accused of procuring documents from the archives for the bishops in opposition, and removed from his position. He was a very industrious writer; published a new edition of the Annales of Baronius, with continuation, and Geschichte der Pontifices Clemens XIV., 1852; Vetera Monumenta Polonie et Lithuanie, 1860-64, 3 vols.; Acta genuine Conc. THEISM. Theism in its etymological and widest acceptance is a generic term for all systems of belief in the existence of the Divine. Thus understood, it includes pantheism, polytheism, and monotheism, and excludes only atheism; but this acceptance of the term is rare. Common usage has determined that theism must be identified with monotheism, and consequently opposed to polytheism and pantheism, as well as to atheism. In this sense, the one here adopted, it is the doctrine that the universe owes its existence, and continuance in existence, to the wisdom and will of a supreme, self-existent, omniscient, righteous, and benevolent Being, who is distinct from and independent of what he has created. The articles on Deus, God, and Infidelity, published in previous volumes of this encyclopaedia, treat more or less either of theism or of its history. To these the reader is referred, as the writer of this article wishes to avoid repeating what has already been said.

There has been much discussion as to the historical origin of theism. Herbert of Cherbury, Cudworth, Creuzer, Ebrard, and others have learnedly argued that monotheism was the primitive form of religion. Lubbock, Tyler, and the majority of recent anthropologists, maintain that monotheism can be proved to have been everywhere preceded by polytheism. Schelling and Max Müller have held that the starting-point of religion was henotheism, an imperfect kind of monotheism, in which God was thought of as one, not even an exclusively divine attribute. The conceptions and judgments, and are valid only in so far as they have the warrant of intelligence. Max Müller, in his Hibbert Lectures, traces the idea of God to a special faculty of religion, — "a subjective faculty for the apprehension of the infinite," "a mental faculty, which, independent of, nay, in spite of, sense and reason, enables man to apprehend the infinite under different names and under varying disguises." This view will not bear a close scrutiny. The infinite, as an implicit condition of thought, is not more involved in religious than in other thought. We cannot think any thing as finite without implying the infinite. Space cannot be thought of except as extensively, nor time except as proleptically, infinite. As a condition of thought, the infinite is involved in religious knowledge, only so far as it is involved in all knowledge. On the other hand, as an explicit object of thought, it is not present in the lower forms of religion at all, which exist only because the thought of infinity is not associated in the religious consciousness with that of Deity, except where reflection is somewhat highly developed; and, even in the highest stages of religion, it is only apprehended as an aspect of Deity. Infinity is not God, but merely an attribute of the attributes of God, and not even an exclusively divine attribute.

The hypothesis that the idea of God is gained by intuition or vision is proved to be ill founded by the fact that the idea of God, and the process by which it is reached, are capable of being analyzed, and therefore not simple; and, likewise, by the variety and discordance of the ideas of God which have been actually formed. The apprehension of God seems to be only possible through a process which involves all that is essential in the human constitution, — will, intelligence, conscience, reason, — and the ideas which they supply,—cause, design, goodness, infinity. These are so connected that they may all be embraced in a single act, and coalesce into one grand issue. The theistic inference, although a complex process, is a thoroughly natural one, similar in char-
THEISM.

1. THEOCRACY. the "rule of God," in contradistinction to monarchy, democracy, aristocracy, etc., was first applied by Josephus in relation to the science. It is in close contact and connection with every science. No positive science leads to results which seem ultimate to reason, but only to results beyond which the science does not carry us. The view of the constitution of matter with which chemistry must be content to close its inquiries is no more self-explanatory than the one with which it began them. The laws of development reached by biology are as mysterious as were the facts which have been reduced under them. Is reason to affirm that the sciences lead to unreason, or merely that the special methods of each science carry us only so far, and that the conclusions of the sciences are data of philosophy, and also of natural theology?

Fifthly, the relationship of theism to philosophy has to be determined. If there be no philosophy except a phenomenalism or positivism which rests on criticism and agnosticism, there can clearly be no theism, no theology of any kind. The materialism which proclaims itself a monism, and therefore a philosophy, not only transcends the science as much as any theological doctrine, but contravenes the findings of science. A philosophy which rises above such materialism must necessarily be, to some extent, a religious philosophy. It will find that there are only two plausible ways of conceiving the first or ultimate principle,—the monotheistic or the pantheistic. The theist has to show that the only satisfaction of philosophical reason is to be found in the personal God of his religious faith. The philosophical view and the religious view of the universe must harmonize, and even coalesce, in a comprehensive theism.

A history of theism embraces (1) A survey of heathen thought regarding God so far as it has approximated to the theistic idea. Hegel's Philosophy of Religion, Bunsen's God in History, Freeman Clarke's Ten Great Religions, the St. Giles Lectures on the Faiths of the World, still more, the series of Sacred Books of the East, and the Dispensature of the Scripture records identified with the God of creation, the Author of man, and the Disposer of history. In almost every page of the Bible refers its readers to the revelation of God in nature, mind, and society. It is therefore distinctly to disregard its own teaching to attempt to derive a doctrine as to God from it alone, or to the exclusion of any of the sources of knowledge of God.

Thirdly, theism must be compared and contrasted with other forms of religion. The respects in which it differs from animism, polytheism, pantheism, and deism, must be indicated; and it must be shown whether or not the differences are in its favor, whether or not they are necessary to true and worthy conceptions of God and of religion. In opposition to animism, theism claims for the Divine freedom and intelligence; in opposition to polytheism, unity, self-existence, and independence; in opposition to pantheism, transcendence and personality; in opposition to deism, an all-presence and activity, etc. The theist has to show that it, in consequence, responds better to the demands of the intellect, affections, and conscience, than any other phase of religion. A history of theism, therefore, should be related to the sciences. It is in close contact and connection with every science. No positive science

The name may, however, justly be applied to any

THEODICY (Gk. θέωδος, “God,” and δίκαιος, “justi-cence”) denotes a vindication of God’s wisdom and goodness in the creation and government of the world, in spite of seeming imperfections and the actual existence of evil. The Book of Job may be mentioned as an attempt of the kind, though its true philosophical form the theodicy did not obtain until LEIBNITZ’S Essais de Théodicè, Am-

THEODORA is the name of two Byzantine em-presses who have exercised considerable influence on the history of the Greek Church. — I. Theodora, b. 508; d. June 12, 548; the wife of Justinian I., 527–565. She was a native of Cyprus, but came evolved to Constantinople with her parents.

Her father was a bear-trainer. She herself became an actress, and that of the worst possible notoriety. She accompanied Hecebolus as his concubine, when he was made prefect of the African Pentapolis; but she was soon after dismissed, and she returned to Constantinople in a state of destitution. She profited, however, by the experience, became studious of decent appearances, and having incidentally become acquainted with Justinian, the heir-apparent to the throne, she completely captivated him by her beauty, her

many social charms, and her real mental superiority. After the death of the Empress Euphemia, he married her (525), and after his accession to the throne he made her co-regent. Justinian hated

many social charms, and her real mental superiority. Nevertheless, Theodora succeeded in having a successor, Vigilius, in 536. As soon, however, she convened a synod in Constantinople, which restored the images to the churches throughout the realm, and instituted an annual festival, the feast of orthodoxy, in commemoration of the act.

At the same time she renewed the persecutions against the Paulicians; but as the latter formed a very powerful party, and, for their defence,

entered into alliance with the Saracens, a war

ensued, in which several of the fairest provinces of the empire were laid waste. More considerate was her policy with respect to the Bulgarians, whose conversion to Christianity was effected in 862 by Cyrillus and Methodius. In the meantime, her son, Michael III., had grown up in complete ignorance, a prey to his own unbridled passions and corrupt caprices; and a conspiracy between him and Bardas compelled her to lay down the sceptre, and retire into private life.

She was suspected, however, by her own son, and shut up in a monastery, where she died shortly after, in 855. See the literature under IMAGE-

WORSHIP.

THEODORA is the name of two popes. — Theodore I. (642–649) was a Greek by birth. As a decided adversary of the Monothelites, he excom-unicated Paulus, the Patriarch of Constantinople, in 645, and recognized Pyrrhus, who, deposed himself as a Monothelite, had recanted in Rome.

When restored to his see, Pyrrhus returned to Monothelitism, and Theodore then also excom-unicated him. In 649 he convened a synod in Rome, which condemned the Typus. He wrote an Epistula synodica ad Paulum, and an Exemplar propositionis . . . adversus Pyrrhum. See the art.

MONOTHÉLITI.POS.

THEODORE, St., was, according to Gregory of Nyssa (Oper., Paris, 1615, tom. ii. p. 1002) a Syrian or Armenian by birth, and served in the Roman army when the persecution of Maximin and Galerius began. Discovered, and brought before the Pagan court, he refused to recant, was sentenced to death, and burnt. He is commemorated by the Greek Church on Feb. 17, by the Roman on Nov. 10.

THEODORI., surnamed Graptus, b. in Jerusalem; educated in the monastery of St. Saba, and ordained a presbyter there; was in 816 sent to Constantinople by the Patriarch Thomas of Jerusalem; was later sent to Rome by the Patriarch Ruffin and the Synod of 829, to persuade the emperor to accept the putsch of the images, and that he did, so regardless of circumstances, that he was thrice scourged and banished, the last time to Apamea in Bithynia, where he died. A Nicephori Diaptyxatus written by him, a letter from Bishop John of Cyzicum, telling us about his sufferings, and a life of him, are found in Conclusion (Orig. Constantinop., p. 159), together with fragments of a larger work, De fide orthodoxa contra Iconomachos.

THEODORE LECTOR.

Theodore Lector, one of the last of the Old Greek Church historians, was lector in the Constantinopolitan school. He wrote a Historia Tripartita,—extracts from Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret; but it has never been published. Of much importance was a second work by him, a continuation down to the time of Justin the Elder; but it has perished. Only fragments of it have been preserved by John of Damascus, Nilus, and Nicephorus Callisti; they have been published in Paris, 1544, and at Canterbury, by G. Reading, 1720.

THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA.

b. at Antioch about 350; d. at Mopsuestia, in Cilicia secund., 428 or 429; one of the chief leaders of the Antiochian school of theology. As a preparation for a juridical career, he studied philosophy and rhetoric under the famous Libanius, but at the same time he made the acquaintance of Chrysostom; and the religious enthusiasm of the latter induced him to devote his life to Christian philosophy and asceticism. Soon after, however, he repented of the change, and mediated a return to his former occupation; but the reproaches and admonitions of his friend finally decided him (see Chrysostom: Ad Theod. lapsum). His biblical studies he made under Diodorus the presbyter, afterwards bishop of Tarsus: indeed, his whole character as a theologian was modelled by Diodorus. He was ordained a presbyter in the Church of Antioch, and as a teacher in the school he soon acquired a great reputation. John, afterwards bishop of Antioch, Theodoret, and perhaps, also, Nestorius, were among his pupils. In 392 he was elected bishop of Mopsuestia; and in 394 he was present at a synod in Constantinople, where the emperor, Theodosius I., is said to have been very much impressed by his preaching. Throughout the whole Eastern Church his name had a great weight: even Cyril of Alexandria, to whom he sent his Commentary on Genesis, the Psalms, the Prophets, Job, the four Gospels, the Acts, and the Pauline Epistles; which, however, is very instructive in respect to his exegetical method — has come down to us in its original Greek text. A Latin Commentary on the minor Pauline Epistles, which Pitra has published under the name of Theodore, is generally considered as belonging to Theodore; and extracts of his other commentaries have been collected by Wegner, A. Mai, and Fritzsche, from the Concilia. Under the influence of the Alexandrian school, the mystico-allegorical interpretation of Scripture prevailed throughout the Greek Church, more especially the christological interpretation of the Old Testament, totally neglecting the orginal connection and all historical relations. In opposition to this method of exegesis, Theodore, following the track of Eusebius of Emesa and Diodorus of Tarsus, placed the human, rather than the divine, attributes, based on the given historical conditions; not that he, for instance, denied the idea of prophecy, but he confined its application within very narrow limits, outside of which he ascribed to it only a typical designation. Thus he referred all the messianic Psalms, with the exception of three, to Zerubbabel and Hezekiah, and denied altogether that the Old Testament knew any thing of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit as forming the Trinity. Equally free was his treatment of the canon. He distinguished between historical, prophetic, and pedagogical books; and the last group (Job, the Proverbs, and Wisdom) he sacrificed without reserve. The Canticles he rejected altogether, and spoke of with great contempt.

It took some time before the Pelagian controversy, which originated in the West, reached the East, and at first it made no deep impression there. Nevertheless, there came a moment when Theodore felt compelled to make an open attack on the Augustinian doctrine of hereditary sin; and he wrote his book Against those who say that man falls by nature, and not by sentence. The book itself has perished: but Marius Mercator has preserved some fragments of it in Latin translation; and Photius, who had read it, gives a summary of its contents. It was directed against Augustine, but addressed to Jerome. The latter is very plainly indicated by allusions in his translation of the Bible, his journey to the East, etc.; and the circumstance that he had spread the new heresy in Syria; by writing books in its defence was the very cause of Theodore's interference. Theodore absolutely rejects such propositions as these,—that man, originally created good and immortal, became bad and mortal by Adam's sin; that sin now has its origin in human nature, and not in the will of man; that newly born infants are tainted by sin; that sin is by nature, etc. According to Marius Mercator and Photius, he even went so far as to assert that man was created mortal by God, and that the doctrine of death as a punishment of sin is a mere fiction invented for the purpose of sharpening man's hatred of sin. In his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans he expresses himself very cautiously on this point; and, though he does not directly deviate from the Pauline doctrine of the relation between sin and death, he evidently considered the history of human nature so closely connected with the general development of the world, that death became to his eyes a necessary and indispensable transition in human existence. At a later date, Julian of Eclanum, and other Pelagians who were expelled from Italy, found refuge with his followers, and the latter were considered as belonging to Theodore; and extracts of his other commentaries have been collected by Wegner, A. Mai, and Fritzsche, from the Concilia. Under the influence of the Alexandrian school, the mystico-allegorical interpretation of Scripture prevailed throughout the Greek Church, more especially the christological interpretation of the Old Testament, totally neglecting the organic connection and all historical relations. In opposition to this method of exegesis, Theodore, following the track of Eusebius of Emesa and Diodorus of Tarsus, placed the human, rather than the divine, attributes, based on the given historical conditions; not that he, for instance, denied the idea of prophecy, but he confined its application within very narrow limits, outside of which he ascribed to it only a typical designation. Thus he referred all the messianic Psalms, with the exception of three, to Zerubbabel and Hezekiah, and denied altogether that the Old Testament knew any thing of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit as forming the Trinity. Equally free was his treatment of the canon. He distinguished between historical, prophetic, and pedagogical books; and the last group (Job, the Proverbs, and Wisdom) he sacrificed without reserve. The Canticles he rejected altogether, and spoke of with great contempt.

versy, gives a preliminary idea of his christological views. While presbyter of Antioch, he wrote fifteen books on the incarnation, and a special work against Eunomius. Thirty years later on, as bishop of Mopsuestia, he wrote a work against Apollinaris. These books have perished, with the exception of a few fragments; but we know that he was the true representative of the speculative theology of the Antiochian school, and that, in contradistinction to the Alexandrian school, he emphasized in his christology the completeness of the human nature of Christ, and its indelible difference from his divine nature. It was, however, not he, but Nestorius, who was destined to carry this view to its last consequences, and fight for it in the world. At the Council of Ephesus (431) no one dared to attack Theodore directly; and, though open attacks were made upon him shortly after by Marius Mercator and Rabulas of Edessa, it took more than a century before the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in weaning the Eastern Church from its great teacher, and branding his name with the stamp of heresy. See Nestorius and THREE-CHAPTER CONTROVERSY.

THEODORIT, b. at Antioch towards the close of the fourth century; d. at Cyrus, or Cyrrhus, the capital of the Syrian province of Cyrrhestica, 457. He was educated in the monastery of St. Euprepius, near Antioch; ordained a deacon by Bishop Porphyrius; and elected bishop of Cyrus in the year 423. Theodore, John, and Theodorus of Mopsuestia, he joined at the synod of Ephesus (431) the minority which deposed Cyril; but by the robber-synod of Epheus (449) he was himself deposed, and banished to the monastery of Apamea. By the synod of Chalcedon, however (451), he was again restored to his see. He was a very prolific writer. Exegetical, historical, polemical, and dogmatical works, sermons, and letters by him, still exist. But his principal work is his Church History, comprising the period from 325 to 429, translated into French by Mathieu (Poitiers, 1544). The most collected edition of his works was published by Simron (Paris, 1612, 4 vols. fol.), to which was added in 1684 a fifth by Hardouin, containing, among other things, his life by Garner. There are also editions by Schulze (Halle, 1789—94, 4 vols.) and Migne (Paris, 1858—60, 5 vols.). See Ross: De Theod. ep. Mops., 1844; and afterwards his compiler, Halle, 1883, 69 pp.; A. Bertram: Theodori episcopi Cyreniensis, doctrina christologica, Hildesheim, 1883.

THEODOSIUS (L) THE GREAT, Emperor of the East, Jan. 19, 379—Jan. 17, 395. He was a native of Spain, b. at Cauca in 348. He was educated in the camp; and it was his military exploits which induced Gratian to accept him as co-regent, and leave him the eastern part of the empire. Nevertheless, he exercised as great an influence on the religious as on the political affairs of the realm. He belonged to the orthodox party, and one year after his accession to the throne (Feb. 28, 380) he issued a decree which declared the Nicene Confession the only true and catholic one, and threatened with severe punishment any deviation from it. Immediately after his entrance in Constantinople, he deposed the bishop, Demophilus, one of the leaders of the Arians, and banished him from the city; and, in spite of the riots of the Arian populace, he gave all the churches of the capital to the orthodox, and put a heavy penalty on the celebration, even in private, of Arian service. In spring, 381, he convened a synod in Constantinople,—the second ecumenical council, consisting of a hundred and fifty picked bishops. The thirty-six bishops belonging to the semi-Arian group, and forming the party of Macedonius, were at once brought to silence; and the council confirmed the Nicene Creed, adding the new clause of the procession of the Holy Spirit. The decrees of the council were followed by a number of imperial edicts depriving Christians who relapsed into Paganism of the right of making a will, or inheriting a bequest, confiscating the property of the Manicheans unless they allowed their children to be educated in the Catholic faith, and forbidding the Eunomians and the Arians to build churches, and celebrate service. He also exercised considerable influence on the religious affairs of the West, especially after the overthrow of Maximus in 388, and the establishment of Valentinian II., and still more especially after the crushing of the rebellion of Arbogast in 392, and the establishment of Honorius. He was a friend of Ambrose, and accepted with meekness a very severe rebuke from him. In order to avenge the assassination of Botricus, his governor in Thessalonica, he allowed over seven thousand mostly innocent people to be massacred (April, 390); but, when Ambrose heard of his cruel deed, and denounced it to the emperor, the church until due penance was done. In Alexandria he ordered, and in other places he allowed, the Pagan temples to be destroyed; and certain forms of Pagan worship—sacrifice, investigation of the future, etc.—he absolutely forbade, even under penalty of death. See Fléchier: Histoire de Th. le Grand, Paris, 1860; P. Eramus Müller: Comment. de Th., Göttingen, 1797—98; Sufken: De Theod., Lyons, 1828; Gudsenpenning u. THEODULPH. See Bible Versions, p. 281.

THEODULPH, surnamed Aurelianus, one of those men whom Charlemagne invited from Italy to France for the advancement of science and art in the latter country. He was probably a Goth by descent. He came to Gaul at the latest in 781, and was made abbot of Fleury, and afterwards bishop of Orleans, where he died in 821. His literary character is not unlike that of Alcuin. He was a poet and a theologian. His theological works consist of minor treatises: De ordine baptismi, De spiritu sancto, etc., and capitolaria for his priests, which show that he was very anxious for the establishment of schools. His THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION.

Among the ancient Jews, at the time of Samuel on, there were schools of the prophets, in which young men were trained for the office of public instruction. (See Education among the Hebrews.) The sons of priests were trained in the temple service for their subsequent duties. At a later date the synagogues were the schools of the Jews. The apostles received their special training, first in the school of John the Baptist, and then in that of Christ. Paul alone had a rabbinical education. The necessity of special training was felt even in the Christian Church, not only for the conduct of worship, but the opposition of error, and, above all, the Pagan religion. The first instruction was given, probably, in the local churches, by their bishops; but, at the close of the second century, there existed at Alexandria a theological seminary, the first of its kind, in which students were trained in Christian apologetics, and guided in the study of the Scriptures. It is known as the Catechetical school. Its primary purpose was to prepare catechumens for baptism; but it answered a wider design, and instructed those already Christians. The first known superintendent of this school is Pantænus, but the most famous are Clement and Origen. At first the school had only one teacher, then two or more, but without fixed salary or special buildings. The more wealthy pupils paid for tuition, but the offer was often declined. The teachers gave instructions in their dwellings, generally after the close of the day, or in the evening. Origen established a similar school at Caesarea. The dissensions in the Alexandrian Church put an end to the school at the close of the fourth century.

Next in point of time and importance comes the school of Antioch, which was founded about 268 by the presbyters Dorotheus and Lucian. In opposition to Alexandrian allegorizing, it developed a severe grammatico-historical exegesis. Its most eminent members are Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Nestorius. In Edessa, Ephrem Syrus (d. 378) founded a school, and continued the methods of Antioch. It furnished ministers for Mesopotamia and Persia.

In the West the priests were trained in cloisters and private episcopal schools. The Roman Church has continued to train her clergy in this fashion. Several of the most learned Fathers, such as Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, and Augustine, were educated in heathen schools, and then studied theology, either in ascetic retirement or under some distinguished church-teacher.

In the middle age the cloister schools were the sole centres of learning until the universities arose at Paris, Oxford, Cologne, and elsewhere. In them the theological faculty ranked first, and dominated the others. In England, John Wiclif (d. 1384) had a seminary at Oxford, and later at Lutterworth, in which he trained the "poor priests," who disseminated Lollard doctrine all over the land. The Reformers were university trained men. The ministry of the Protestant churches of most denominations has always been distinguished for its education. On the Continent, theology in all its branches is taught as a department of the university. The theological students are on a par with those of the other faculties. The professors are members of the university corps, but constitute a separate faculty. In the great English universities those who contemplate entering holy orders read with a professor, and are examined by a bishop's chaplain. There is no regular theological faculty, and no theological department, though there are theological professors. Independent of the universities, there are, however, eighteen theological schools connected with the Church of England, under the supervision of bishops. In Scotland the Established Church has regular theological faculties at its four universities,—Glasgow, Edinburgh, St. Andrews, and Aberdeen. The Free Church has three "theological halls," as they are called,—at New College, Edinburgh, with seven professors; at Glasgow, with five; and at Aberdeen, with four. The United Presbyterian Church has its "hall" at Edinburgh, with four professors. The Presbyterianists of England have a "theological college" in London; those of Ireland, one in Belfast, and another in Derry. The Wesleyans have their college in Great Britain. Its pupils are Congregationalists fourteen, the Baptists nine, and the Roman Catholics twenty-six. All these are supported by voluntary subscriptions.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES. 2332

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES. Sketches of (arranged according to denominations, in alphabetical order, and chronologically under each).

Each sketch is prepared by a professor or secretary of the institution. Some sketches are anticipated in earlier articles of the series. The following characteristics,—a biblical theology, an educational and mission department, a capable faculty, a well-organized library, good educational results, and an impress upon alumni are claimed to be the important points in the history of the seminaries. Thereader is referred to the Theological Institutions series for additional details of each institution. The following sketches are arranged according to denominations, in alphabetical order.

HAMILTON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY is situated in Hamilton, N.Y., a suburban village of rare beauty and healthfulness, distinguished as an educational institution among Baptists, where in one system of schools are trained one-tenth of all ministerial students of that denomination in the United States. The seminary was founded in 1819 by far-sighted pioneers, who were actuated by a profound conviction, then widely felt, of the necessity of higher education for the ministry. It is the oldest Baptist seminary in the country, has sent out the largest number of students, and has the most important influence and characteristic. Among other past instructors, are pastors in Boston, New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, in the Southern States, and on the Pacific coast. Forty have been professors in colleges and theological seminaries, and about the same number have become foreign missionaries. Of the six hundred students connected with the English department, nearly four hundred have completed the full course, including the study of the Scriptures in Hebrew and Greek.

For several years the financial resources of the seminary were entirely inadequate, and altogether disproportionate to its usefulness. In 1888 the funds amounted to only $100,000, and there were no permanent buildings. In 1889 Mr. John B. Trevor was the largest donor of Trevor Hall, a spacious dormitory building, which cost $42,000. In 1879 Rockefeller Hall, containing convenient lecture-rooms, a chapel, a fire-proof room used as a library, and costing $38,000, was erected by Mr. John D. Rockefeller. Other prominent benefactors are Messrs. Jacob F. Wyckoff, Joseph H. Hoyt, John H. Deane, Charles Pratt, and James O. Pettengill. At present the invested funds amount to $450,000. The land and buildings are valued at $1,250,000.

The library, numbering nearly 20,000 volumes, is well arranged, and of exceptional value for theological study. It comprises the entire collection of Neander, the church historian; and during the last five years $25,000, the timely gift of Mr. William Rockefeller, has been expended in the purchase of carefully selected works. Subscription to creeds or to formal statements of doctrine is never required of either students or instructors. Persons of all evangelical denominations who give satisfactory evidence of personal religious experience, and of a call to the Christian ministry, are admitted to the privileges of the institution. BENJAMIN O. TRUE (Professor).

ROCHESTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—This institution was established at Rochester, N.Y., in 1850. It is supported and controlled by Baptist churches, and is strictly a professional school for the higher education of candidates for the Christian ministry. The seminary has no organic connection with the University of Rochester, either in management or instruction, though both institutions were founded at about the same time, and largely through the same instrumentalities. The influence and characteristics of the seminary during the first twenty years of its history are due, more than to any other one man, to Ezekiel G. Robinson, D.D., LL.D., for many years in charge of the institution. Among other past instructors, are included Drs. Thomas J. Conant, Horatio B. Hackett, John H. Raymond, Asahel C. Kendrick, and George W. Northrup. There were at first only two professors. There are now, in the English department alone, six active professors; viz., Rev. Augustus Strong, D.D. (since 1872 president), Rev. Howard Oswood, D.D., William A. Stevens, D.D., LL.D., Rev. T. Harwood Pattison, D.D., Rev. Adelbert S. Coats, and Rev. Benjamin T. Tremper. The German department, altogether distinct from the regular English course, was founded in 1854. It is the only school in America expressly designed to train men for the ministry in German Baptist churches. Since 1858 Rev. Augustus Rauschenbusch, a pupil of Neander, has had charge of this department. A peculiarity of the seminary has been the widely separated sections of country from which its students have come, and to which they have gone. During its entire history of thirty-two years, about eight hundred persons have entered the institution, and thirty-five have become foreign missionaries. Of the six hundred students connected with the English department, nearly four hundred have completed the full course, including the study of the Scriptures in Hebrew and Greek.

For several years the financial resources of the seminary were entirely inadequate, and altogether disproportionate to its usefulness. In 1888 the funds amounted to only $100,000, and there were no permanent buildings. In 1889 Mr. John B. Trevor was the largest donor of Trevor Hall, a spacious dormitory building, which cost $42,000. In 1879 Rockefeller Hall, containing convenient lecture-rooms, a chapel, a fire-proof room used as a library, and costing $38,000, was erected by Mr. John D. Rockefeller. Other prominent benefactors are Messrs. Jacob F. Wyckoff, Joseph H. Hoyt, John H. Deane, Charles Pratt, and James O. Pettengill. At present the invested funds amount to $450,000. The land and buildings are valued at $1,250,000. The library, numbering nearly 20,000 volumes, is well arranged, and of exceptional value for theological study. It comprises the entire collection of Neander, the church historian; and during the last five years $25,000, the timely gift of Mr. William Rockefeller, has been expended in the purchase of carefully selected works. Subscription to creeds or to formal statements of doctrine is never required of either students or instructors. Persons of all evangelical denominations who give satisfactory evidence of personal religious experience, and of a call to the Christian ministry, are admitted to the privileges of the institution. BENJAMIN O. TRUE (Professor).

SOUTHERN BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was established in 1850 at Greenville, S.C., and removed in 1857 to Louisville, Ky. Its plan of instruction is quite peculiar, all the studies being systematic and synopsis in character. Among other past instructors, are included Drs. Thomas J. Conant, Horatio B. Hackett, John H. Raymond, Asahel C. Kendrick, and George W. Northrup. There were at first only two professors. There are now, in the English department alone, six active professors; viz., Rev. Augustus Strong, D.D. (since 1872 president), Rev. Howard Oswood, D.D., William A. Stevens, D.D., LL.D., Rev. T. Harwood Pattison, D.D., Rev. Adelbert S. Coats, and Rev. Benjamin T. Tremper. The German department, altogether distinct from the regular English course, was founded in 1854. It is the only school in America expressly designed to train men for the ministry in German Baptist churches. Since 1858 Rev. Augustus Rauschenbusch, a pupil of Neander, has had charge of this department. A peculiarity of the seminary has been the widely separated sections of country from which its students have come, and to which they have gone. During its entire history of thirty-two years, about eight hundred persons have entered the institution, and thirty-five have become foreign missionaries. Of the six hundred students connected with the English department, nearly four hundred have completed the full course, including the study of the Scriptures in Hebrew and Greek.

For several years the financial resources of the seminary were entirely inadequate, and altogether disproportionate to its usefulness. In 1888 the funds amounted to only $100,000, and there were no permanent buildings. In 1889 Mr. John B. Trevor was the largest donor of Trevor Hall, a spacious dormitory building, which cost $42,000. In 1879 Rockefeller Hall, containing convenient lecture-rooms, a chapel, a fire-proof room used as a library, and costing $38,000, was erected by Mr. John D. Rockefeller. Other prominent benefactors are Messrs. Jacob F. Wyckoff, Joseph H. Hoyt, John H. Deane, Charles Pratt, and James O. Pettengill. At present the invested funds amount to $450,000. THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES. 2332 THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.
THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Theological course to those desiring and prepared for it, and at the same time a good theological course to those studying the English Scriptures, and also opportunity for any student to select special studies at will. This was considered necessary to meet the wants of the Baptist ministry, which includes men of all grades of general education.

In order to fulfill these conditions, the whole range of theological study was divided into eight independent schools, some of them having two separate departments; as Old-Testament English and Hebrew, New-Testament English and Greek, Systematic Theology English and Latin. Among these schools and departments, each student selects, under the guidance of the professors, according to his preparation, and the number of years he can give to theological studies. Some remain only one session (of eight months); others, two, three, four, or even five years. A separate diploma is given in each school to those who have passed their studies, and have passed very thorough written examinations, intermediate and final. Those who have been thus graduated in all the schools receive at last the diploma of "full graduate;" and those graduated in all except the departments of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Theology, receive the diploma of "English graduate." Some of the students thus pursue an unusually extensive course, such as would not be possible where there is the same curriculum for all. It is noticed that all alike elect to attend the "English" classes in the Bible and theology, the most scholarly finding these highly profitable along with their more erudite studies.

Beginning in 1859 with a good endowment (subscribed by Southern planters) and a large attendance, the seminary was suspended, 1862-65, by the war, and began again in 1865 with seven students and no endowment, the private bonds being then valueless. It has lived, through great exertions and sacrifices, with a steadily increasing attendance, till, in 1882-83, there were a hundred and twenty students from twenty different States. The invested endowment has reached over $200,000, besides $80,000 in real estate. Most of this has been contributed at the South, but several friends in New-York City and elsewhere have given very generous assistance.

(5) THE BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL UNION, located at Chicago, was organized in 1866, its object being to provide a theological seminary. In 1865 W. W. Cook of Whitehall, N.Y., and Lawrence Barnes and Mial Davis of Burlington, Vt., pledged fifteen hundred dollars per year, for five years, for the support of a professor. Instruction was given, under this encouragement, to about twenty students, in 1866, by Rev. C. Colver and Rev. J. C. C. Clark, in the building of the Chicago University.

In September, 1886, Rev. G. W. Northrup, D.D., professor of church history in the Rochester Theological Seminary, was invited to the presidency, and professorship of systematic theology; and Rev. J. B. Jackson, D.D., of Albion, N.Y., was chosen to the chair of church history. They accepted the appointments, and entered on their duties in October, 1867, when the seminary was fully organized, and commenced its work with twenty students. In the early years of its history the seminary was bound most strongly to the Chicago University. In 1869 the first seminary building was erected in Chicago.

In 1873 a Scandinavian department was organized, under the care of Rev. A. N. Edgren. It began with four students. In 1882-83 the number had increased to twenty-five.

In 1877 the institution was removed to Morgan Park, a suburb eight miles south of Chicago. Here the seminary has a beautiful site of five acres, and one commodious building. It is proposed eventually to use the present building for dormitories exclusively, and to add three others, one for the Scandinavian department, one for the library, and one for chapel and lecture-rooms.

Rev. G. W. Northrup has been president from the beginning, and conducted the affairs of the seminary with distinguished ability.

Rev. G. S. Bailey, D.D., was financial secretary from 1867 to 1875, and was succeeded by Rev. T. W. Goodspeed, D.D., in 1876.

The growth of the seminary has been rapid from the beginning. The first year there were twenty students; the second year, twenty-five; and, with occasional fluctuation, this rate of increase has continued through sixteen years, the number of students in 1882-83, reaching ninety-four. Being the only Baptist theological seminary in the West, it seems destined to attract increasing numbers of students every year.

The library numbers about 20,000 volumes, and is of great value.

In 1880 the endowment of the seminary was about $50,000. In 1881 E. Nelson Blake of Chicago, long a most liberal friend of the institution, subscribed $30,000, on condition that the amount be increased to $100,000. The effort to do this was successful. In 1883, J. D. Rockefeller of Cleveland subscribed $40,000, on similar conditions. The completion of this subscription gives the seminary a living endowment. T. W. GOODSPEED (Sec'y).

(2) BANGOR THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was chartered by the Legislature of Massachusetts in February, 1814. It was designed to provide an evangelical ministry for the State, then the District, of Maine. It was originally located at Hampden on the Penobscot River, where it began its work in October, 1816. The founders of the seminary had especially in view the needs of students desirous of entering the ministry without a previous college-training. Accordingly the original course of study occupied four years; the first two chiefly devoted to literary and classical studies, and the last two to the strictly theological branches. In 1849 the institution was removed to Bangor, at the head of navigation on the Penobscot, then a town of twelve hundred inhabitants. In 1820 the first class, numbering six students, was graduated. In the same year the District was separated from Massachusetts, and became the State of Maine. It was in territory larger than the rest of New England, and had a population of three hundred thousand, largely of Puritan descent. In 1827 the classical department was given up, the period of study reduced to three years, and the curriculum made similar to that of other theological institutions in this country.

During the sixty-seven years of its existence, the seminary has numbered among its instructors not a few men eminent for piety, scholarship, and influence. Not to speak of any still living, mention may be made of Jehudi Ashmun, afterwards distinguished by his labors in the service of the American Colonization Society; the scholarly and accomplished Leonard Woods, jun., afterwards president of Bowdoin College; George Shepard, so widely known and eminent as a pulpit-oralator and Enoch Pond, to whom, more than to any other man, the success of the institution was due, and who for fifty years was connected with it as professor and president.

The seminary has sent out more than six hundred graduates, and given a partial theological education to nearly two hundred more. These men have made a faithful and useful body of workers. The majority of them are still living, and are at their posts all over the land, or laboring in foreign countries, in pulpits of many denominations and every grade of eminence.

The seminary has been from the first connected with the Congregational denomination, its board of trustees and faculty being members of Congregational churches. Its aim, however, has always been practically Christian, rather than denominational. Its founders favored the type of theological education as "New-England" Calvinistic, and the creed is in accordance with the accredited formulary of New-England Congregationalism. The present faculty recognize, more fully than did the founders of the institute, the exegetical and historical point of view; but the doctrinal result is substantially the same. The views on the doctrine of original sin are probably more Augustinian than those of Dr. Tyler; and the entire range of theological science is now regarded, in its higher unity, as centring in the person and work of Christ.

The methods of instruction are less formal than in many institutions,—fewer lectures and more constant drill, together with a greater demand for individual labor on the part of the students.

The chief benefactor of the seminary has been Mr. James B. Hosmer, who not only gave the present building, and endowed the chair of New Testament and theology; but the chapel, recitation-rooms, dormitories, dining hall, etc., are under the same roof; the well-equipped gymnasium is a detached building. For an account of the origin of the institute, see art. BENNET TYLER. The Pastoral Union of Connecticut chooses ten trustees annually (since 1880 one-third retire each year); the former body elects its own members, who are required to subscribe its creed, to which the professors give their assent annually. The three professors first chosen were Bennet Tyler, D.D., Jonathan Cogswell, D.D., and William Thompson, D.D. The last-named survives, and continued in active service until 1881, when he became professor emeritus. There are at present (1885) five active professors, an instructor in music and voice-building, and one in gymnastics. A course of lectures on the Carew foundation is given each year.

The number of students in all amounts to 405: at present there are 5 in attendance. Twenty-eight graduates have become foreign missionaries. The theological position of the seminary has from the beginning been Calvinistic, and the creed is in accordance with the accredited formulary of New-England Congregationalism.

convention, called for that purpose, of delegates from the Congregational churches of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Missouri. It was made directly responsible to the churches by being placed under the general supervision of triennial conventions, composed of the Congregational ministers, and one delegate from each of the Congregational churches in the States and Territories west of Ohio, and east of the Rocky Mountains. These triennial conventions elect the board of twenty-four directors and the board of twelve visitors, under whose direct control the seminary is placed, and who, by the requirements of its constitution, must be members of some Congregational church within the bounds of its constituency. The members of these boards hold their office for six years, and are eligible for re-election.

The seminary was thus, from the first, under Congregational control; but its privileges were equally open to students from all denominations of Christians. A special and liberal charter, exempting all the property of the seminary from taxation, was secured from the State of Illinois, Feb. 15, 1854.

The institution was formally opened Oct. 6, 1856, with two professors—Professor Joseph Haven, D.D., and Professor Samuel C. Bartlett, D.D.—and twenty-nine students. Subsequently other chairs were filled; and the present faculty (1883) are:

Rev. F. W. Fisk, D.D., Wisconsin Professor of Sacred Rhetoric.
Rev. G. B. Wilcox, D.D., Stone Professor of Pastoral Theology and Special Studies.
Rev. H. McDonald Scott, B.D., Sweetser and Michigan Professor of Ecclesiastical History.
Professor J. R. Anthony, Instructor in Rhetoric.
Professor Gustav A. Zimmerman, Instructor in German Department.

A special course of study is provided for those, who, though not able to acquire a liberal education, may yet possess both the talents and piety requisite for the Christian ministry. Also a German department is established, giving such instruction and training, additional to the regular studies of the seminary, as will best qualify German students to preach the gospel in their mother-tongue as well as in English.

During the twenty-five years since the opening of the seminary, 496 have been under instruction, and 243 have graduated. The seminary-buildings, Keyes and Carpenter Halls, and Hammond Library, are located fronting Union Park, Chicago, and in addition to lecture-rooms, chapel, and library, furnish study and dormitory rooms for nearly a hundred students.

The library numbers about 7,000 volumes, and with the completion of the new fire-proof library-building, immediate efforts will be made for its enlargement. Seven professorships are established, which are in part or fully endowed; also twenty-five scholarships, yielding an average annual income of fifty dollars of annual aid is given to the students who need it.

The seminary has had a vigorous growth, and now furnishes to theological students ample privileges and instructions. With its able faculty, its central position, and the large and continually increasing number of churches embraced in its constituency, its future enlargement and usefulness are assured. There is no reason to question, that it will be the peer of the best seminaries in the land. G. S. F. Savage (Secretary and Treasurer).

III. Episcopalian. (1) The General Theological Seminary in New York was founded May 27, 1817, by the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, to provide a school for the education of its candidates for holy orders, whose plan and situation would meet the wants of the church in all sections of the country. Bishop Bowen of South Carolina, Bishop White of Pennsylvania, and Bishop Hobart of New York, were most active in its behalf. In accordance with this plan, drawn up by the two latter bishops, foreshadowing the institution and its several professorships as they exist to-day, it was opened in a room of St. Paul's Chapel, May 1, 1819. The first professors were the Rev. Samuel H. Turner, D.D., and the Rev. Samuel F. Jarvis, D.D. But notwithstanding the munificent offer by Dr. Clement C. Moore, of the ground on which the buildings now stand, and the efforts of a large committee, subscriptions came in so slowly, that the General Convention, in 1820, removed it to New Haven, where it was thought it might be supported at less expense than in New York. That was an error soon made itself apparent; and the death of Mr. Jacob Sherred of New York, who left a noble legacy of $60,000 to a seminary to be established in New York, gave the Convention an opportunity to bring it back in 1822, and thus correct a mistake which would have proved fatal to its continuing a general institution. It was re-opened in a building belonging to Trinity School, on the corner of Canal and Varick Streets, in February, 1822, with twenty-three students and six professors. The constitution laid the foundation of a widely extended system of theological instruction. It provided not only for the seminary in New York, but also for branch schools under its control in different parts of the country. In its board of trustees, which is elected in part by the General Convention and in part by certain dioceses, the church in all parts of the United States is represented. The course of study is to be prescribed by the House of Bishops; and each bishop is not only ex officio a trustee, but a visitor of the institution, with all the powers that that involves. Thus the interest, as well as the rights, of every part of the Episcopal Church in its general seminary, is amply secured and protected.

The corner-stone of the first building, now known as the East Building, was laid July 28, 1825, by Bishop White, in the presence of a large assemblage of clergy and citizens, on the ground given by Dr. Clement C. Moore. At that time the site was an apple-orchard on the banks of the Hudson River, which at that time flowed a little east of the present Tenth Avenue.

In 1834, to accommodate the increasing number of students, a second building, now known as the West Building, was erected. But it was still the day of small things for the Episcopal Church in this country, as well as for the city. The large fortunes now so common were then unknown; and, in common with all our other collegiate institutions, it had to struggle to do its work with a very small and insufficient endowment, but always with the unimpeachable record, that not a dollar of its trust-funds has ever been lost. More than once in its history, in consequence of the growth of the city, heavy assessments have been laid upon it, which have absorbed all its available income; and had not the professors, at great personal sacrifice, and some of the leading clergy of the city, voluntarily offered their services to the institution without remuneration, its trustees would have been compelled to close its doors. Thus it has gone on steadily endowment, but always with the unimpeachable daily, from ten A.M. to five p.m., for the use of professors, as follows:—

The library, which is particularly rich in some departments of theology, contains 17,500 volumes, and upwards of 10,000 pamphlets. It is open daily, from ten a.m. to five p.m., for the use of the students, and others who wish to consult its treasures.

The faculty is composed of a dean and six professors, as follows:—

The Rev. Samuel Buel, D.D., Professor of Systematic Divinity, etc.

The Rev. Andrew Oliver, D.D., Professor of Biblical Learning, etc.

The Rev. Francis T. Russell, Instructor in Elocution.

ved at Frederick, Md. The General Synod appointed the first board of directors, and elected the first professor, Rev. S. S. Schmucker. The right of electing professors was thenceforth vested exclusively in the board of directors, who are chosen by such synods, in connection with the General Synod, to patronize the seminary, and contribute to its support. An official connection with the General Synod is maintained, and this continues the only theological school sustaining such a relation.

The board at its first meeting selected Gettysburg, Penn., as the location; and Professor Schmucker was inaugurated, and active operations began, in September, 1826. Although designed for the entire Lutheran Church in the United States, the seminary encountered strong prejudices and open hostility from the Lutherans not connected with the General Synod. It had consequently to struggle for years with formidable difficulties; and, in view of prevailing divisions, the institution has always been in substantial accord with the general type of God. The spirit of the institution has always been made for indigent students, and a so-called practical seminary, owned by the synod at Fort Wayne, was removed to St. Louis, and combined with the Concordia Seminary. In 1875, however, the Practical Seminary was removed to Springfield, Ill. To the present time, about four hundred Lutheran ministers have in this institution (Concordia Seminary) received a thorough theological education, not including those of the Practical Seminary. The old building, erected during the years between 1850 and 1857, was taken down in 1882, and a new, large, splendid edifice erected, the dedication of which took place Sept. 9 and 10, 1883, in the presence of fifteen thousand people. Addresses were made in defense of the support of the seminary; and, in view of the support of the entire Lutheran community. The doctrinal basis recognizes the Augsburg Confession and the Smaller Catechism of Luther as "a correct exhibition of the fundamental doctrines of the word of God." The spirit of the institution has always been in substantial accord with the general type of American Christianity. Since 1826 six hundred students are enrolled among its alumni. The second professor, E. L. Hazeltine, D.D., was elected in 1830. Since that time, H. I. Smith, D.D., C. P. Krauth, D.D., C. F. Schaeffer, D.D., J. A. Brown, D.D., LL.D., and M. Valentine, D.D., have been incumbents of the different chairs. The present faculty consists of C. A. Stork, D.D., C. A. Hay, D.D., E. J. Wolf, D.D., and J. G. Morris, D.D., LL.D. The library numbers 11,000 volumes. The endowment amounts to about $100,000, and the real estate is estimated at $50,000.

The Holman Lecture is a foundation, the income of which is devoted to an annual lecture on one of the twenty-one doctrinal articles of the Augsburg Confession. The Rice Lecture is a foundation providing for an annual lecture on "Methods of Ministerial Work." Special provision has always been made for indigent students, and scholarships covering the expenses of the entire course of three years are at the disposal of the faculty. A full History of this seminary, by Dr. J. G. Morris, is contained in vol. vi. of The Quarterly Review of the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

(2) CONCORDIA SEMINARY of St. Louis, Mo., is one of the institutions of the German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, the largest Lutheran body in America. In it young men who have passed through a gymnasium (college), and are acquainted with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, are taught theology according to the Lutheran Confessions (Concordia of 1580). The school was founded toward the end of the year 1839 by a number of Lutheran theologians (among them Rev. C. F. W. Walther), in the midst of a settlement of German Lutherans that had emigrated the same year from Saxony in Germany. At first it comprised a gymnasium and a theological seminary, and in 1849 was removed to St. Louis. In the following year it was granted by the Lutheran congregations of Perry County and St. Louis, that had hitherto supported the same, to the aforesaid synod, which had been organized in 1847. In 1853 it was chartered by the Legislature of the State of Missouri. In 1861 the gymnasium was separated from the theological seminary, and removed to Fort Wayne, Ind., where it still flourishes; and a so-called practical seminary, owned by the synod at Fort Wayne, was removed to St. Louis, and combined with the Concordia Seminary. (3) THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH at Philadelphia.—In consequence of resolutions passed by the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States, at its meeting in Pottstown, Penn., Aug. 26, 1844, and at a special meeting held at Allentown, Penn., July 26 and 27, 1864, this seminary, after the appointment of a board of directors, and the election of the faculty (Rev. Drs. C. F. Schaeffer, W. J. Mann, C. F. Krauth, C. W. Schaeffer, G. F. Krotele), began operations Oct. 5, 1864, which since that time have been regularly continued. In the government of the seminary, other Lutheran synods, uniting with the Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States in the endowment and support of the institution, have a pro rata representation, a right of which the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of the State of New York now avails itself. The seminary has sent out up to this time more than two hundred graduates; whilst a considerable number of students of various denominations gratuitously received instruction without graduating. The character of this seminary is clearly indicated by the official declaration, "that this institution shall be devoted to the interests of the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

of the United States, and that its doctrinal character shall be unreservedly and unalterably based on all the Confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church." Of like tenor is the firmament of twenty students demanded of the professors before entering upon their duties. Instruction is imparted through the medium of the English and German languages, the large field of labor providentially intrusted to the care of the Lutheran Church requiring at the present time both those languages in Pennsylvania and distant parts. Those who apply for admission as students must have graduated at a college, or else have acquired in some literary institution an education of a similar character. The Rev. Dr. J. A. Seiss, pastor of the Church of the Holy Communion at Philadelphia, is president of the board of directors. The faculty consists at present of the Rev. Drs. C. W. Schaeffer (chairman), W. J. MANN, A. Spaeth, and H. E. Jacobs. Dr. Krauth died on Jan. 2, 1883. See the arts. SCHAEFFER, KRAUTH]. W. J. MANN (Professor).

V. Methodist. (1) GARETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE.—This institution is a theological seminary, under the supervision and patronage of the Western Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is located at Evanston, Ill., ten miles north of Chicago. It was opened provisionally in 1856, but was regularly organized, under a charter from the Legislature of Illinois, in the year following. By the terms of its charter, its trustees are empowered to accept and hold trust funds of any kind; and the real property of the institute is forever exempt from taxation. The professors elected in 1856 were the Rev. John Dempster, D.D., the Rev. Daniel P. Kidder, D.D., and the Rev. Henry Bannister, D.D. They were co-ordinate in rank, the senior in office acting as president of the faculty. Subsequently the Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D., the Rev. Francis D. Hemenway, D.D., the Rev. William X. Ninde, D.D., and the Rev. Henry B. Ridgaway, D.D., were added to the faculty. In 1879 Professor William X. Ninde, D.D., was elected president. The course of study is strictly biblical and theological, and continues three years. Instruction is largely by lectures, written and oral; but text-books as syllabus-work are in use. The faculty confers the degree of bachelor of divinity upon graduates of colleges who complete its course. Others, who have not enjoyed a collegiate training, are admitted to its classes, and on the completion of the course are granted a diploma. The school is sustained chiefly by income from properties in the city of Chicago, bequeathed as a perpetual foundation by the late Mrs. Eliza Garrett, from whom its name is derived. Their present value is estimated at $300,000, yielding an income in 1883 of $25,200. Against this there is a mortgage-debt of $25,000, which is more than covered by subscriptions. The corporation owns a fine educational building in Evanston, containing a chapel, library, lecture-rooms, and dormitories for the accommodation of one hundred students. Since the organization of the seminary in 1856 it has graduated more than one hundred students, while nearly twelve hundred students have fully or partially shared its advantages. Far the larger part of those now surviving continue preaching the gospel, and are held in worthy estimation as alumni of the institution. Not a few have attained prominence in the church as preachers and pastors, foreign missionaries, and presidents and professors of colleges and seminaries. The catalogue for 1883 shows an attendance of a hundred and three, with a graduating-class of twenty-eight. The institute holds a general relation of sympathy with the Methodist colleges of the West, two of which — the North-western University of Evanston, Ill., and Chaddock College of Quincy, Ill. — have formally adopted it as their theological department.

VI. Presbyterian. (1) PRINCETON. See art. (2) UNION THEOREGICAL SEMINARY (Va.) OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Both Liberty Hall Academy in Lexington, Rockbridge, Va., and Hampden-Sidney College in Prince Edward, Va., were founded by the Presbyterians of that State, mainly for the purpose of rearing an educated ministry. The former still exists as Washington and Lee University, the latter as a well-endowed college of the Presbyterian Church. It is located at Evanston, Ill., ten miles north of Chicago. It was opened provisionally in 1856, but was regularly organized, under a charter from the Legislature of Illinois, in the year following. By the terms of its charter, its trustees are empowered to accept and hold trust funds of any kind; and the real property of the institute is forever exempt from taxation. required to expound some parts of it from the original.

The seminary is now governed jointly by the synods of Virginia and North Carolina, through a board of twenty-four trustees, but under the superior control of the General Assembly, to whom annual reports must be made, and which exercises a retro-power over the election of professors and over all changes in its constitution and plan. The property of the seminary consists of about forty acres of land, with good buildings for seventy-five students and four professors, a handsome chapel and a superior library-building, and endowments of $250,000 for the support of the institution and twenty-five scholarships. The library, which is unusually select, numbers 12,000 volumes.

The seminary has had, since its separation from Hampden-Sidney College, the following professors:

In Theology.—Dr. John H. Rice, 1824-31; Dr. George A. Baxter, 1831-41; Dr. Samuel B. Wilson, 1841-59; Dr. Robert L. Danney, 1859-83;

In Hebrew Literature, etc.—Hiram P. Goodrich, D.D., 1830-39; Samuel L. Graham, D.D., 1839-49; Francis S. Sampson, D.D., 1849-54; Benjamin M. Smith, D.D., 1854-64.

The seminary was also served in this department by the following gentlemen as tutors: Elisha Ballantine, Benjamin M. Smith, Francis S. Sampson, Danney C. Harrison, and Thomas Wharey. The largest number of students ever collected in the seminary in one session was seventy-four: the number this session (1882-83) is fifty-six.

The Presbyterian Theological Seminary whose seat is at Columbia, the capital of South Carolina, was established in the year 1828, under the corporate title "The Theological Seminary of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia." When, several years later, the synod thus named was divided into the two synods of South Carolina and of Georgia, an equal share in its management was continued to each. In 1857 the synod of Alabama accepted a joint interest to its control, with the same rights and privileges as belonged to either of the others. These three ecclesiastical bodies were empowered to elect a board of directors, that should meet and act in common, under a written constitution similar to that of the seminary at Princeton; the professors being chosen, in the event of a vacancy, by the synods themselves in rotation. In 1865 the seminary was transferred to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America, which body (its legal title altered in 1865 so as to read the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States) still governs it; the single limitation being, that its locality cannot be changed unless by the consent of the transferring synods.

Including the fund for the endowment of professorships, legacies, scholarships, real estate, and library, the property of this institution at the date of the transfer was valued at the nominal sum of $275,000. The civil war, however, which closed in 1865, left the productive funds in a condition so disabled as to render necessary the inauguration of immediate efforts for their rehabilitation. Meanwhile the deficiency was in a large measure met by extensive and liberal contributions from the churches. At the present time (1883) this method of supply is discontinued, in view of the fact that an efficient re-endowment agency has succeeded in securing an income, which, being in a condition of constant increase, will serve for a competent support and for an enlarged usefulness. Happily, its fine buildings, and its noble library of about 20,000 volumes, escaped the ravages of war. In 1880 the seminary was closed, and its faculty disbanded, partly owing to a lack of funds, and partly to other causes. But in the fall of 1882, the seminary was again opened, with three of its former professors and with the addition of two more; its students numbering about twenty-five. Many distinguished names have in the past graced the list of its instructors, notably that of the illustrious Dr. Thornwell, whose decease (in 1882) gave to the institution its severest blow, and that of a venerable Dr. Howe, who since 1831 continued to occupy the chair of Hebrew literature until his lamented death in 1883.

(7) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE NORTHWEST.—Since the opening for settlement of that vast region drained by the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers and their tributaries, the feeling has existed, that institutions of sacred learning should be established within the region to which to supply an educated ministry for the evangelization of the rapidly increasing population. In response to this feeling, the New Albany Theological Seminary was founded. It was started first as an adjunct of Hanover College, Indiana, in the year 1830, but in 1840 was removed to New Albany, Ind., and for some years sustained by contiguous synods of the then Old-School branch of the Presbyterian Church. After a time it became apparent that the seminary was crippled by its proximity to similar institutions (though it had accomplished a great work by sending into the ministry of the church many able men); and its friends decided to suspend the enterprise at New Albany, and seek a more favorable location.

At the meeting of the General Assembly at Indianapolis in 1859, the Hon. Cyrus H. McCormick of Chicago offered $100,000, to endow four professorships in the theological seminary to be located at Chicago. The assembly gratefully accepted the offer, and elected Rev. N. L. Rice, D.D., to the Cyrus H. McCormick chair of didactic and polemic theology, Rev. Willis Lord, D.D., to the chair of biblical and ecclesiastical history, Rev. L. J. Halsey, D.D., to the chair of pastoral

Theological and Rev. W. M. Scott, D.D., to the chair of biblical literature and exegesis. Opened September, 1859, it has continued with varying fortune, until now (1883) it has an invested endowment-fund of about $210,000, and buildings (including dormitory, chapel, recitation-rooms, and three professors' houses) valued at $70,000. The last of these edifices, on a sound scriptural basis, not subject to the control of accidental majorities in the General Assembly, and to no ecclesiastical party, and occupying ground on which good and faithful men of Pressbyterian affinities could meet together, and raise up a sound and thoroughly furnished ministry for the church.

At a meeting of four ministers and five laymen, on the evening of Oct. 10, 1835, at No. 8 Bond Street, New York, it was determined "to attempt to establish a theological seminary in the city of New York." At a subsequent enlarged meeting, Nov. 9, $31,000 were subscribed. Two months later the subscription had been doubled. A constitution was adopted. Jan. 11, 1836, a large and highly responsible board of directors was chosen (whose first meeting was held a week later), and order was taken for an act of incorporation, which,
after much delay, was obtained, March 27, 1839,
from the Legislature of the State of New York.
The government of the institution was vested in a self-perpetuating board of twenty-eight directors,
one-half of whom were to be renewed each year.
Twenty-seven were in attendance in 1882-83. Such ample pecuniary provision is made, that all the necessary expenses of needy students are fully met.

The professorships as now constituted are as follows:

Rev. L. J. Halshy, D.D., LL.D., Emeritus Professor of Church Government and the Sacraments.
Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, D.D., Cyrus H. McCormick Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology.
Rev. William G. Craig, D.D., Professor of Biblical and Ecclesiastical History.
Rev. D. C. Marquis, D.D., Professor of New-Testament Literature and Exegesis.
Rev. Henry Johnson, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology.
Edward L. Curtis, A.B., Instructor in Old-Testament Literature and Exegesis.

Located in the heart of a territory unparalleled in fertility, with an ample equipment and liberal endowment, with a large and increasing constitu-tency, with a vast field of labor open to its alumni, and with a learned, energetic, and devoted fac-culty, the Seminary of the North-west has before it, under God, a future of unexampled usefulness.

(9) Union Theological Seminary, New York, was founded late in the year 1835. It grew out of a desire to provide adequate theological instruction for the rising ministry, in a central position, as free as possible from partisan prejud-ces, on a sound scriptural basis.

Origin. — For years previous to the great disruption of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, this great body of Christians had been deeply agitated by theological controversies and ecclesiastical strife. The schools of sacred learning were to some extent committed to partisan views of existing conflicts. It was thought that a theological seminary could be established on a sound and thoroughly furnished ministry for the church.

Measures have now been taken for the removal of the seminary to a more eligible site on the west side of Park Avenue, between Sixty-ninth and THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Seventieth Streets, including the whole front on the avenue, and extending back on each of the streets a hundred and fifty feet. The buildings are now in the process of erection. They will include a fire-proof library edifice, a commodious chapel, and a large structure for lecture-halls, with a dormitory of six stories extending across the rear from street to street. They are to be of brick, with brown-stone trimmings, in the University Gothic style. The cost of the ground and buildings will considerably exceed half a million of dollars. The site is one of the most eligible in the city.

Library. — The nucleus of this unique collection of books was gathered by the Benedictine monks of Paderborn, in Germany, and was the growth of centuries. Large and valuable additions were made to it by the learned Dr. Leander Van Ess, until it numbered more than 18,000 volumes. The classification of this collection is not complete, and the titles of 30,000 volumes, 40,000 pamphlets, and 163 manuscripts, which have passed into the McAlpin collection of rare and interesting books and pamphlets relating to the Latin and Greek Fathers, church histories, decrees of councils and popes, with a most valuable collection of Incunabula and Reformation tracts, all of which were purchased in bulk by the seminary in 1838.

Large and useful additions of the best modern theological publications, many of them from the private collections of the late Drs. Robinson, Sprague, Field, Marsh, Gillett, H. B. Smith, Adams, and others, have been made, together with the unique McAlpin collection of rare and interesting books and pamphlets relating to the Puritan divines, and the deistic, Trinitarian, and ecclesiastical controversies of the eighteenth century. The library comprises not less than 42,000 volumes, 40,000 pamphlets, and 163 manuscripts.

Funds. — For several years the institution was conducted under great embarrassments. The original subscriptions were soon exhausted in providing buildings and the payment of salaries. The treasury at one time was overdrawn to the amount of not less than $15,000. In 1843, $25,000 were obtained for the endowment of the theological chair, the first permanent fund. A further sum of $100,000 was received or six years later, by a bequest of Mr. James Roosevelt. In 1853 a further sum of $100,000 was obtained by a general subscription, a bequest of $20,000 by Mrs. Fassett of Philadelphia in 1854, and a subscription of $25,000 in 1855, to endow the professorship of ecclesiastical history. A further subscription of $100,000 was obtained in 1859, of $150,000 in 1865, and in 1871 of $300,000. In 1873, by the princely gift, by Mr. James Brown, of $300,000, the institution was put upon an admirable foundation, the original corps of professors was increased from three to seven, and the funds of professorships from $25,000 to $90,000 each.

The late Gov. Edwin D. Morgan proved himself a most munificent patron of the seminary by his gifts of $100,000 for the library, and $100,000 towards the new site, together with a noble bequest of $200,000. Large sums have also been contributed by the late John C. Baldwin, William E. Dodge, Anson G. Phelps, jun., Frederick Marquand, and others still in the land of the living; so that now the general endowment-fund amounts to $157,000, and the buildings, which, it is expected, will be completed in 1884, without incumbrance.

Faculty. — The corps of instruction now consists of seven full professors in addition to one instructor. Several courses of lectures are also provided by guest instructors among the distinguished men who have filled the professorships are to be named, of those who have departed this life, the Rev. Drs. Henry White, Edward Robinson, Henry B. Smith, Thomas H. Skinner, and William Adams, all of precious memory. The present faculty is thus constituted:—

ROSEWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D.D., LL.D., President, and Professor of Church History.
WILLIAM G. T. SHEDD, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Systematic Theology.
PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Sacred Literature.
GEORGE L. PENDLETON, D.D., Professor of Pastoral Theology.
CHARLES A. BRIGGS, D.D., Professor of Hebrew and the Cognate Languages.
THOMAS H. HASTINGS, D.D., Professor of Sacred Rhetoric.
FRANCIS BROWN, A.M., Associate Professor of Biblical Philology.

Students. — The seminary has, almost from the start, ranked with the first in the land as to the number under instruction. More than 2,000 students have availed themselves of its privileges, of whom 1,330 have graduated in due course. Not less than 1,750 of the whole number are still serving in the gospel ministry, and 127 are reported as missionaries to the heathen.

Ecclesiastical Control. — The General Assembly, since the re-union in 1870, has had an optional veto over the appointment of the professors, and receives from the board an annual exhibit of its condition. EDWIN F. HATTIEFD.

VII. Reformed (Dutch). See New Brunswick, by Professor Demarest.

VIII. Reformed (German). (1) Reformed Church Theological Seminary, at Lancaster, Penn. — Though the need of a theological seminary for the Reformed (German) Church had long been felt, it was not until the year 1817 that anything definite was needed for the support of the church, and not until seven years later, that, after several abortive efforts, the institution was actually founded. At that time Dickinson College, then under the care of the Presbyterian Church, had been resuscitated; and, as its friends deemed it advantageous to bring the contemplated seminary into some connection with the college, liberal offers of accommodation and assistance were made by its trustees to the seminary of the Reformed Church in 1824. These were accepted; and the seminary was opened March 11, 1826, with Rev. Lewis Mayer as professor of theology, and five students in attendance. After an experience of four years and a half, Carlisle was felt to be an unsuitable place for the seminary; and in the fall of 1829 the institution was removed to York, Penn. In 1837 it found a new home in Mercersburg, Penn., the seat of Marshall College, which had grown out of the classical department of a theological college organized by the Seminary. Subsequently Marshall College was united with Franklin College, and in the spring of 1853 transferred to Lancaster, Penn.; and in the fall of 1871, after a separation of eighteen years, the
THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Theological seminars followed. During the fifty-eight years of its existence the seminary has had in its service thirteen professors and tutors. The chair of systematic theology has had five incumbents,—Rev. Dr. E. V. Gerhart, D.D., thirteen years; Rev. W. Nevin, D.D., eleven; Bernard C. Wolff, D.D., ten; Henry Harbaugh, D.D., four; and E. V. Gerhart, D.D., fifteen. The chair of church history and exegesis, established 1829, has likewise had five incumbents,—Daniel Young, in office one year; Frederick A. Rauch, Ph.D., nine years; Philip Schaff, D.D., twenty-one, inclusive of two years not in actual service; F. E. Higbee, D.D., seven, including two years under appointment by the board of visitors; and Thomas G. Apple, D.D., twelve. In 1857 a theological tutorship was established; and during the twelve years of its actual existence (1861-73), there were three tutors,—William M. Reily, Ph.D., in office three years; Jacob B. Kerschner, A.M., seven; and F. A. Gast, D.D., two. In 1873 the tutorship was abolished, and the chair of Hebrew and Old Testament theology established, which Professor Gast has occupied since May, 1874. The seminary, from 1859 to 1873, has had but one professor to attend to the full course of study; in 1859, Rev. W. F. Kieffer, and in 1860, Rev. Dr. Hermann Rust, who formally opened the seminary in May, 1851, with two students. The seminary has been in uninterrupted operation since that time. For ten years (1851-61) it had but one professor to attend to the full course of study; namely, Dr. E. V. Gerhart from 1853 to 1855, and Dr. Moses Kieffer from 1855 to 1861. In 1861 a second professor was called, namely, Dr. Hermann Rust, then of Cincinnati. Since 1861 it has been under the care of two professors. The present incumbents are Rev. Dr. J. H. Good, president, and professor of dogmatical and practical theology (called in 1880), and Rev. Dr. Hermann Rust, professor of exegetical and historical theology (called in 1881). The plan of the institution includes four professorships. Its productive endowment at present is about $50,000. It has no buildings of its own. The recitations and lectures are held in a hall of the college-building. Both the seminary and the college are named Heidelberg, out of respect to the celebrated Heidelberg Catechism, which is the only creed or confession of this branch of the church.

From 1853 to 1883 this institution has graduated 195 theological students, of whom 132 are still living, and laboring in the ministry. About one-half of these officiate in both the English and German language. They are somewhat widely distributed, as will be seen from the following: in Ohio, 77; in Pennsylvania, 27; in Indiana, 16; in Illinois, 5; in Iowa, 7; in Wisconsin, 4; in New Jersey, 1; in Michigan, 4; in New York, 1; in Kansas, 4; in Nebraska, 2; in Minnesota, 2; in Colorado, 1; and 1 missionary in Japan.

The number of students in attendance each year varies from twelve to twenty. The field of the seminary is somewhat circumscribed. For fuller account of its history, see Sermon before Alumni Association in 1860, by Rev. J. H. Reiter, Dayton, Ohio, 1860. J. H. GOOD (President).

(3) THE THEOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT OF UR SINUS COLLEGE is an integral part of the institution. It was organized simultaneously with the founding and opening of the college in 1850, and is located in the same buildings, Collegeville P.O., Montgomery County, Penn., thirty miles by railroad north-west from Philadelphia. In its organization it corresponds with that of the theological department of Yale College and similar schools. Ecclesiastically and theologically it is based upon the principles, faith, and polity of the Reformed Church, as symbolically represented by the Heidelberg Catechism and cognate Confessions: indeed, firm adherence to these in their historical sense, and progressive development in true harmony therewith, is a distinctive characteristic of the school. Although under no formal synodical control, it is as amenable in all essential respects to the jurisdiction of the "Reformed Church in the United States" as any other institution of the church, and acknowledges such amenable.

In 1872 it was officially recognized by the General Synod of the church, convened in Cincinnati; and several years later the General Synod at Easton gave it a vote of recommendation.

The department is under the immediate charge of three professors, and the course of study prescribed conforms to the requirements of the constitution of the church with which it stands connected.
THEOLOGY (from θεός and λόγος). I. In the widest sense, the science of religion, or, more definitely, the science of the Christian religion as taught in the Bible, and carried on in the history of the church. It is usually divided into: (1) Exegetical theology, or biblical learning; (2) Historical theology, or church history; (3) Systematic or speculative theology; (4) Practical theology. See special arts on those topics.

II. In the narrower sense, systematic theology, or, more particularly, dogmatics. This is again divided into: (1) Theology proper ("the doctrine of God"), in which are treated theistic and anti-theistic theories, the knowledge, nature, and attributes of God, the Trinity, the divine decrees, providence, and miracles; (2) Anthropology ("the document of man”), in which division are treated the different questions relating to man, his origin, nature, original condition, the fall, and especially the doctrines of sin and free agency; (3) Christology (“the doctrine of the person and work of Christ as the God-man”); (4) Pneumatology (“the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, the third person in the Trinity, and his work”); (5) Soteriology (“the doctrine of salvation”), under which head are treated the plan of salvation, and the way in which his salvation is brought to man, vocation, regeneration, faith, justification, sanctification—some include under this head also the doctrine of the person of Christ and of the atonement; (6) Ecclesiology (“the doctrine of the church, the sacraments, and the means of grace”); (7) Eschatology (“the doctrine of the last things”), which includes the doctrines of the condition of the soul after death, and second coming of Christ, the resurrection, and the final judgment. See the separate arts. Dogmatics, Election, Eschatology, Justification, Christology, Soteriology, etc.

THEOLOGY, Monumental. See Monumental Theology.

THEOLOGY, Speculative, denotes a certain method of treatment, not a particular part of the system. Its direct opposite is empiricism. The empirical theologian starts from the well-ascertained experiences of conscience and religious life in general, and reaches his general ideas by way of induction, never transgressing the boundaries of fully established facts. All empiricism is rationalistic. The speculative theologian starts from an intuition, and approaches reality by way of deduction, explaining the occurring facts by the theory assumed. All speculation is mystical. Rationalism, however, is not always empirical; nor is mysticism always speculative. In the domain of mysticism, speculative theology has a problem of its own. As Christianity will not content itself with being one of the many religions existing, even not by being the most perfect one of them, but claims to be the absolute religion, the last and complete revelation of God, or as Christianity will not content itself with ruling the will of man, but also demands to rule his intellect, to the exclusion of any foreign or hostile principle, it cannot help coming into conflict with science, which proceeds, and must proceed, on another principle than that of authority. The problem of speculative theology, then, becomes to reconcile knowledge and faith, science and religion, natural civilization and Christianity; and it solves this problem by stripping the fact, scientific or religious, of its crude positiveness, uncovering and seizing upon its informing idea, and demonstrating the ideal harmony which results from the discrepancies of reality.

The school of Alexandria presents the first striking instance of a speculative theology. In Alexandria, Christianity met with the Greek philosophy, the first of which, Greek philosophy, was as it were the one possible for the one as for the other to avoid conflict. But the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation, or, rather, an amalgamation. They taught that besides faith (σωφρος), the simple confidence in the facts of revelation, there is a deeper insight in the mysteries of revelation (γνωσις), which unfolds the latent working of the Logos in the history of mankind before the incarnation in Christ, and unites Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity into one grand scheme of the Providence. None of those theologians—Clement, Origen, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa—has given a complete speculative system; but speculative views of peculiar grandeur and depth are scattered through all through their writings; and by concentrating the interest on such doctrines as the origin of the world, the origin of evil, the Trinity, the personality of Christ, they gave the whole theology of the Eastern Church a decidedly speculative character. At first the Western Church proved hostile to this tendency. Irenæus and Tertullian considered the philosophers the true here-siers, and philosophy the fountain-head of all spiritual errors. Augustine was a genius of rare speculative force. He combated the Manichaens with Platonice and Neo-Platonic ideas; Pelagianism, with profound expositions of the experimental doctrines of sin and grace; and he finally crushed Arianism by a speculative development of the doctrine of the Trinity. From him, and directly from the influence of the Greek Church, through the Areopagite and Scotus Eri- gena, a stream of speculation passed into the medieval theology of the Western Church, which, though sometimes feeble enough, never disappeared altogether. Having mastered the logic of Aristotle, scholasticism was almost wholly occupied with the logical demonstration of the doctrines of the church; and, as a general rule, it was rather adverse to speculation. Only the powerful protection of Charles the Bald saved Scotus Eri- gena from actual persecution, and several of his views were formally condemned by the synods of Valence (855) and Langres (859). Nevertheless, some of the greatest and most orthodox schoolmen felt the need of speculation. In his Monologium, Prosologium, and Cur Deus Homo, Anselm goes behind the authority of the doctrines to establish them on a priori deduction. And in the writings, not only of the direct pupilsof Scotus Eri- gena, Amalric of Bena, David of Dinant, but also of the mystics, from the Victo- rines to Meister Eckart and Tauler, speculative ideas are met with as subtle as profound.

The Reformation had to be practical, or to fail; and consequently it had very little use for speculation. Nevertheless, Zwengli was a scholar and humanist before he became a Reformer: he had a philosophy before religion became his passion, and he felt the need of bringing these two sides of his spiritual character into perfect harmony. His De Præsidio shows many traces of a genera- lise speculative power (see Siggew: Cicero, Zwengli und Picus von Mirandula, 1855). Luther's combative ness also compelled him now and then to borrow from the schoolmen some speculative sub- struction for his ideas. Thus the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity is based on the nominalism of Duns Scotus, and the doctrine of the Providence of God in the writings of Scholz: Luther's Ansicht, etc., in Brieger's Zeitschrift für Kirchen- geschichte, iv., 1880). Even Melanchthon, who in the beginning of his career was very hostile to scholasticism and philosophy in general, gave,

Later on, a profound speculative construction of the doctrine of the Trinity (see Herrlinger: Die Theologie Melanchthons, 1879). Some gleams of speculation are also found in the works of Ostian- der, Schwenkfeld, Brenz, and Keckermann: but the successive periods of orthodoxy, piety, and rationalism, were very unfavorable to speculative theology; and it died out almost completely, until re-awakened in the beginning of the present century by the starting development of philosophy under Kant and Hegel. Schol in himself, though he-based religion on feeling, — that is, on immediate consciousness as a primal fact of human nature, and thereby hoped to give religion a foundation of its own, independent of philosophy, — was, nevertheless, too much of a philosopher himself to carry on with rigid consistency an empirical principle; and at the same time the right wing of the Hege- lian school — Daub, Marheineke, Goeschel, Rosen- kranz, Erdmann, Schaller, and others — firmly asserted, that, in the formulas of the Hegelian metaphysics, they had found the key of the mys- teries of Christianity, and were able to effect a thorough and final reconciliation between the doctrines of the Christian Church and the spirit of modern civilization. They did not succeed. After the first enthusiasm had gone, the world felt disappointed. But the impulse which specu- lative theology had received, was, nevertheless, by no means spent. In Rothe, Martensen, Dorner, Biedermann, and others, it is still working, more cautiously perhaps, but also, it would seem, with a more intense force; and it has become pretty generally recognized, that speculation has become an almost indispensable element of systematic theology. "A theology," says Dorner, "whose last guarantee is the authority of the Church or of Scripture, must always feel embarrassed and anxious when that authority is assailed, even though the points attacked are of slight impor- tance." All authority needs, in order to become truly authoritative to man, to be made part and parcel of his innermost consciousness; and to do this is the proper task of speculative theology.

THEONAS, or THEON, Bishop of Marmarica, in the Egyptian province of Cyrenaica, is mentioned in the synodal letter of Bishop Alexander (see ATHANASIUS: Opera, edit. Montfaucon, i. p. 398) as an adherent of Arius. Indeed, he and his neighbor-bishop, Secundus of Ptolemais, were the only two Egyptian bishops who sided with Arius; and it is probable that their line of conduct was regulated by political rather than by theological reasons. At all events, they absolutely refused at the Council of Nicaea (325) to con- demn Arius, and on that account were deposed and banished. All notice concerning Theonas is found collected in TIlLEMON: Mémoires, vi.

THEOPASCHITES (from θεός, "God," and παχώς, "I suffer") is a by-name applied to such as accepted the formula, that, in the passion of Christ, "God had suffered and been crucified." The first traces of it are found in the letters of Isidore of Pelusium, and it played a prominent part in the Monophysite and Monothelite controversies.

THEOPHANES OF BYZANTIUM, the confess- or; b. about 758; d. 816; not to be confounded with the historian of the same name who lived in the sixth century, and wrote the history of the Persian war (567—573). He was educated at the court of Constantine Copronymus, and held various high offices under Leo IV, but retired during the reign of Irene, and became monk in the monas- tery of Polychronium, near Sigiriona, in Mysia Minor. Afterwards he built a monastery, Agor, in the vicinity, of which he became abbot him- self. He was an ardent image-worshipper, for which reason he was dragged in chains to Con- stantinople by Leo the Armenian (813), and banished to the Island of Samothrace. His Chronographia is a chronicle, not very interesting, nor very reliable, of the events, secular as well as ecclesiastical, from Diocletian to Leo the Arme- nian. The best edition of it is that by CLASSEN, Bonn, 1840, 3 vols.

THEOPHANES, surnamed Ceraneus, flour- ished in the first half of the eleventh century, and was bishop of Tauramena, situated be- tween Syracuse and Messina. Sixty-two homilies by him — written in Greek, which was still spoken at that time in his diocese, as in other parts of Sicily — were published with his birth, his baptism, and his second coming. The biblical conception of theophany may be thus stated. (1) By it is never to be understood an immediate revelation of the supermundane Deity himself (John i. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 16); for God reveals himself only in Christ (Matt. xi. 27); and therefore every theophany is really a Christophany. (2) The theophany, or Christophany, has three great stages of development: (a) The form of Old-Testament manifesta- tion; (b) The incarnation of Christ; (c) Christ's second coming, which will be the completion of the theophany, the revelation of his "glory." (Tit. ii. 13.) (3) The theophany or the Christophany of the Old-Testament Scriptures is the epiphany of the future Christ. It was made in the person of the angel of the Lord (Gen. xvi. 7, etc.), or of the presence (Exod. xxiii. 14); or of the covenant (Mal. iii. 1). The pillar of cloud and of fire was the symbol of his presence: the appearance of the "glory" of God in the Old Testament is thus the Christophany of the Old-Testament Scriptures. (4) The manifestation of God in his christological theophany begins with the miracle of hearing, or the voice of God, which is identical with the voice from heaven, but to be distinguished from the voice of the Lord, or of the Spirit, in the Spirit of hearing. (5) The theophany, which in rabbinical terminology was called the Shechinah, was his attribute. THEOPHILANTHROPISTS.

(19) The different forms of divine manifestation can be distinguished only by comparing the predominantly objective theophanic facts with those facts of the vision which are predominantly subjective. (7) The theophanic christophany in a marvellous manner reduces both the elements of nature and the life of the soul; it is now revealed by the angels, and now by symbols (Gen. iii. 24; Exod. iv. 16; Ps. xviii. 10, civ. 4; Isa. lxii. 3; Mal. ii. 7), but particularly through the Urim and Thummim of the high priest. (8) In the life of Christ all the pre-Christian modes of theophany find a higher unity. In his personal life God himself was revealed. The whole universe was for him a theophanic environment by which his divine nature was attested; because his whole inner life was spent in a constant subjective vision, in which the contrast between ecstasy and the usual consciousness of worldly things did not exist. (9) The theophanic movement died away. "What shall I do to restore my church?" exclaimed Reveillère-Lepeaux. "Well, just hang yourself, and rise again the third day," Talleyrand replied. There is a difference between a 'religion of rhetoric' and a "religion of facts," which, to his own detriment, he had overlooked. In 1802 the First Consul, Bonaparte, took their churches from the Theophilianists, and restored them to the Roman Catholics.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Alexandria (885—412), is known from his participation in the Origenistic controversy. Three letters by him, condemnatory of Origen, are still extant in a Latin translation by Jerome. GALLAND: Bibl. Patr., vii.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Antioch (176—186), was educated in Paganism, but was converted to Christianity by the study of the Bible. He was a very able and prolific writer. His principal work, and the only one extant, is his Apology of Christianity, written in 180—181, and addressed to a Pagan friend, Autolycus. The last trace of his existence is that by Otto, Jena, 1861. His Commentary on the Gospels has probably been enlarged by a later hand. See TH. ZAHN: Der Evangelienkommentar des Theophilius von Antiochien, Erlangen, 1888 (in favor of the genuineness); and A. HARNACK, in Texte und Untersuchungen, i. Heft. 4, pp. 97—175 (against Zahn). See SCHAF: History of the Christian Church, rev. ed., New York, 1888, vol. ii. pp. 732 sqq.

THEOPHILYCT, a celebrated Greek exegete who flourished in the eleventh century, during the reign of Johannes Ducas, — not to be confounded with Theophylactus Simocattii, an Egyptian who flourished about 690, and wrote the history of the Emperor Mauritius. The exegete was a native of Eurius, in the Island of Euboea; lived for some time in Constantinople as tutor to the imperial prince Constantinus Porphyrogenneta; was appointed archbishop of Achrida in Bulgaria, 1078; and died in 1107. His controversial works are mentioned in the first and second centuries, and they pertain on most of the books of the Bible, which, though generally keeping very close to the track of the elder Fathers, are still worth examining, and far surpass any thing of the kind produced at the same period in the Latin Church. THEOSOPHY (from ἥθος, “God,” and σοφία, “wisdom”) is distinguished from mysticism, speculative theology, and other forms of philosophical and theological, to which it bears a certain resemblance, by its claims of direct divine inspiration, immediate divine revelation, and its want, more or less conspicuous, of dialectical exposition. It is found among all nations,—Hindus, Persians, Arabs, Greeks (the later Neo-Platonism), and Jews (Cabala),—and presents itself variously or less conspicuously, of dialectic exposition. It was adopted at the Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451) against Nestorianism. It declared that Mary was the mother of God in the sense that she bore her was most intimately united with deity, so that the person she bore was really divine. The word is now a favorite designation in the Greek Church for the Virgin Mary, See CHRISTOLOGY, p. 455.

THERAPEUTE (ἔραπευτής, “wresters”), the name of a sect of ascetics allied to the Essenes, the Buddhists, and early Christian monks described in ἡ τεκνία ἔραπευτῶν (“On a Contemplative Life.” See Yonge’s translation of Philo, Bohn’s edition, vol. iv. 1–20). The treatise was formerly attributed to Philo; but it is now adjudged to be a Christian forgery of an ascetic origin, and the Therapeute to be creatures of the imagination. The grounds for this decision are solid. (1) The style of the treatise is not that of Philo. (2) If the book is his, why was the sect not mentioned in Quod omnis probus liber (“On the Virtuous being able to see where the Essenes are spoken of? (3) Why is the Greek philosophy despised, the term definitive of the expression that Christ was the “law,” so frequent in Philo, displaced by the priestly law,” peculiarities unlike Philo? connected Rome with the whole region to the north of the Ægean Sea." Before Constantinople was built, it was virtually the capital of Greece and Illyricum, as well as of Macedonia, and shared the title of the Heathen with Rome and Corinth. In the middle of the third Christian century it was made a Roman "colony;" i.e., soldiers were permanently settled there in order to increase its strength as a bulwark against the Gothic hordes. In 390, in a sedition there, the prefect Botericus was murdered; in 409, the trans-Adriatic provinces, which had been under its immediate jurisdiction, from the year 306, were sold to the Venetians by Andronicus, and finally taken by the Turks from the Venetians in 1430. The modern city has a population of eighty thousand, of whom thirty thousand are Jews, and ten thousand Greeks. Its commerce is extensive, and it retains its ancient importance.

The apostle Paul introduced Christianity into Thessalonica upon his second missionary journey, 51. He came with Silas and Timothy, preached for three Sundays in the synagogue there, and, as the result of the work, a church was gathered, principally composed, however, of Gentiles. Among the converts were Calius, Aristarchus, Secundus, and perhaps Jason (Acts xvii. 1-15, xx. 4, xxvii. 2; cf. Phil. iv. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 10). Paul wrote the Thessalonian Church two epistles from Corinth (close of year 52; or beginning of 53), which are the earliest of his preserved writings, "perhaps the earliest written records of Christianity" (Bishop Lightfoot). In striking proof of the minute accuracy of Luke, upon the arch of the Varðar gate, so called because it leads to the Vardar, or Axios, there occurs the word πολεμωρικὴν (poliarchia) as the designation of the seven magistrates of the city, a word unmentioned in ancient literature, yet the very word Luke employs to designate them (Acts xvi. 8, πολιάρχους).

From Thessalonica the gospel spread quickly all around (1 Thess. i. 8). "During several centuries this city was the bulwark, not simply of the later Greek Empire, but of Oriental Christendom, and was largely instrumental in the conversion of the Slavonians and Bulgarians. Thus it received the designation of the "Orthodox City"" (Howson). Its bishop baptized the Emperor Theodosius. Its see had well-nigh the dignity of a patriarchate; and it was because Leo III. (Isaurus) severed the trans-Adriatic provinces, which had been under its immediate jurisdiction, from the Roman see, that the division between the Latin and Greek was in great measure caused. Eustathius, metropolitan of Thessalonica (1175-94), was not only a man of great learning, as his invaluable commentary upon Homer proves, but also a true Christian and an able theologian. From 1205 to 1418 there was an archbishop, called the "archbishop of Thessalonica." At the present day it is the seat of a Greek metropolitan, and contains numerous churches and schools of different denominations. Many of the mosques were formerly churches.

THEU'DAS, a popular leader mentioned by Gamaliel in his speech before the Sanhedrin (Acts v. 36). He was not the Theudas mentioned by Josephus (Antiq., XX. 5, 1); because that Theudas rebelled under Cuspius Fadus, in A.D. 44, some ten years after Gamaliel's speech. Nor was he any obscure person, otherwise unknown; since it is unlikely that Gamaliel would, under the circumstances, allude to such a one. But in all like-lihood he was the man called Matthias by Josephus (Antiq., XVII. 6, 2, and War, i. 33, 2); because Marthiok is the transliteration of Matthias, whose Greek translation is Μαθαυως, i.e., Μαθαυς, i.e., Μαθαους. This Matthias was an eloquent teacher, who headed a band in the days of Herod, and destroyed the Roman eagle set up by the king over the great gate of the temple.

THIETMAR, b. July 25, 976; d. Dec. 1, 1018; a Saxon of noble descent, related to the imperial house; was educated in the collegiate school of Magdeburg, and made bishop of Merseburg in 1000. He wrote a chronicle, of which especially the last four books, comprising the reign of Henry II. (1002-18), are of the greatest importance for the history of Germany. It was edited by Lappenberg, in Mon. Germ. Hist., vol. iii., and translated into German by Laurent, 1849.

THILO, Johann Karl, b. at Langensalza in Thuringia, Nov. 28, 1794; d. at Halle, May 17, 1853. He was educated at Schulpforte, studied at Leipzig, began to lecture at Halle in 1819, and was in 1822 appointed professor of theology there. His Codex Apocryphus N. T. remained incomplete. The first volume, containing the apocryphal Gospels, appeared 1832, and was followed by Acta apostolorum Petri et Pauli in 1838, and Andreae et Matthiae in 1846. His Bibliotheca patrum Graecorum dogmatica also remained incomplete. Only one volume, containing the dogmatical works of Athenæus, appeared 1835.

THIRLWALL, Connop, a scholarly English bishop; was b. at Stepney, Middlesex, Feb. 11, 1797; d. at Bath, July 27, 1875. He displayed such remarkable precocity, that in 1809 he published, under his father's direction, a volume of essays and poems entitled Primrose. He was educated at the Charter House and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was presented as a scholar-collor's medallist, 1818, and became fellow and tutor; studied law, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, 1825. He took orders in 1828; became rector at Kirby-under-Dale, Yorkshire, and bishop of St. David's, 1840. He resigned his see in 1874. He was an active member of the

In 1625 the Elector and Prince of Transylvania, and the Evangelical Union in Germany; and as Matthias died on March 20, 1619, and Ferdinand shortly after succeeded him as emperor, they declared the Bohemian throne vacant, and offered it to the young elector-palatine, Friedrich V., a son-in-law of James I. of England. He accepted the offer, but was very unfortunate. The Protestant army was completely routed in the battle at the White Mountain, just outside the walls of Prague, Nov. 8, 1620, by Tilly, the commander of the imperial army, which chiefly consisted of the contingent of the Holy League: and Bohemia was speedily reduced to order; that is, more than thirty thousand families belonging to the Lutheran and the Reformed denomination were driven out of the country, and their property, valued at more than forty million crowns, was confiscated. Next year the Palatinate was invaded by a Spanish army under Spinola; and at the diet of Regensburg, March 6, 1623, Friedrich V. was put under the ban of the empire, and the Palatinate was given to Maximilian of Bavaria, James I. looking on as the friend of Julius Hare, and jointly with him translated two volumes of Niebuhr’s History of Rome, 1829–31. He also published a translation of A Critical Essay on the Gospel of St. Luke, by Dr. F. Schleiermacher, with an original Introduction (1825). His principal literary work was a History of Greece, published at first in Lardner’s Cabinet Cyclopaedia, 1835–40, and separately (revised edition, London, 1845–52, 8 vols.), and again, 1855, 8 vols. Grote (Preface to his History of Greece, 1846) says he would probably never have conceived of writing a history of Greece if Thirlwall’s work had appeared a few years earlier. Thirlwall’s letters, charges, etc., are collected under the title of Literary and Theological Remains, edited by Dean Perowne, London, 1875–76, 3 vols. See his Letters, 1881, 2 vols., and new edition of his Letters to a Friend, edited by Dean Stanley, 1892.

THIRTY YEARS’ WAR. The (1618–48), one of the fiercest and most protracted of wars, was so far forth a religious war, as at that time religion formed one of the principal elements of politics. But of how mixed a character the whole affair was, may be seen from the circumstance, that though Roman Catholics on the one side (headed by Austria, Spain, and Bavaria), and Protestants on the other side, under various leaders (Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden), always formed the groundwork of the party position, Roman-Catholic powers, as, for instance, France, would at times ally themselves with the Protestants, and Protestant princes with the Roman Catholics, as, for instance, the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony.

The war began in Bohemia. In 1517 Ferdinand of Styria, a brother of the Emperor Matthias, a pupil of the Jesuits, and a fanatical enemy of Protestantism, was crowned king of Bohemia; and on the other side, under various leaders (Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden), always formed the groundwork of the party position. THOLUCK, Friedrich August, D.D., an eminent German divine and pulpit orator; b. in Breslau, March 30, 1799; d. in Halle, June 10, 1877. Descended from very humble parentage, he first learned a trade, but by the assistance of friends attended the gymnasium of his native city, and the university of Berlin. When he left college, he delivered an address on The Superiority of the Oriental World over the Christian, which was chiefly a eulogy on Mohammedanism. But during his university course he was thoroughly converted from his pantheistic and sceptical, under the influence of the lectures of Schleiermacher and Neander, and more especially by personal intercourse with Baron Ernst von Kottwitz, a member of the Moravian brotherhood, who combined high social standing and culture with a lovely type of piety. His character is finely described in the unamed "patriarch" in Tholuck's Weite des Zweifters. (See Jacobi, Erinnerungen an B. v. K., Halle, 1882.) In 1821 he was graduated as licentiate of theology, and began to deliver lectures as privat-docent. In 1824 he was appointed extraordinary professor of Oriental literature, in the place of Dr. DeWette. In 1825 he made a literary journey to Holland and England, at the expense of the Prussian Government, and in 1826 was called to the university of Halle as ordinary professor of theology, in the place of Dr. Knapp, which he occupied to the time of his death, with the exception of a brief period (1827-28), which he spent in Rome as chaplain of the Prussian embassy on Capitol Hill, in intimate intercourse with Bunsen. In Halle he had at first to suffer a good deal of opposition and reproach from the prevailing rationalism of his colleagues (Gesenius and Wegscheider), but succeeded in effecting a radical change; and the whole theological faculty of Halle has since become decidedly evangelical. In Dec. 2, 1870, his friends prepared a surprise for him by the celebration of the semi-centennial jubilee of his professorship. The university and magistrate of Halle, delegates of several universities and of all schools of theology, took part in it; and his pupils in Europe and America founded a seminary adjoining his own home, for beneficiary students of theology, as a perpetual memorial of his devotion to students. He was always in delicate health, but by strict temperance and great regularity of habits he managed to do an unusual amount of work that he spent in Rome as chaplain of the Prussian

His principal works are as follows: Sin and Redemption, or the True Consecration of the Sceptic (Berlin, 1855, many times reprinted; translated into English by Ryland, with an Introduction by John Pye Smith; republished in Boston, 1854, under the title, Guido and Julius, or Sin and the Propitiation), in opposition to DeWette's Theodore, or the Consecration of the Sceptic, 1825, Richard sammung aus der morgenländischen Mystik, 1825 (a collection of translations from the mystic poets of the East); Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (4th ed., 1842; twice translated into English, last by K. Menzies, Edinburgh, 1845, 2 vols.), the first exegetical fruit of the new evangelical theology; Commentary on the Gospel of John, 1828 (7th ed., 1857, translated into English by Kaufmann, 1836, and by Dr. C. P. Krauth, Philadelphia, 1859), less thorough and permanent, but more popular, and better adapted for students, than his other commentaries; Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, 1833 (3d ed., 1844; translated into English by R. L. Brown, Edinburgh, 1860; new ed., 1869), his most learned, elaborate, and valuable exegetical production; Commentary on the Hebrews, 1836 (3d ed., 1860; translated by James Hamilton, Edinburgh, 1852); Commentary on the Psalms, 1839 (translated by Dr. Mombert, Edinburgh and Philadelphia, 1845; 2d edition of the possibility of the Gospel History, 1837 (2d ed., 1838), a vindication of the Gospels against the mythical theory of Strauss; and Hours of Christian Devotion, 1840, 2 vols. (well translated by Rob. Menzies, Edinburgh and New York, 1875), containing several original hymns. In this book he pours out his fervent evangelical piety with all the charm of freshness. He was one of the most eloquent German preachers in his day, and published a series of university sermons (collected in 6 vols., 3d ed., Gotha, 1866–68, one volume being translated, Light from the Cross, Sermons on the Passion of our Lord, Philadelphia, 1858). He issued also two very interesting volumes of Miscellaneous Essays, 1839. His last works were contributions to German church history since the Reformation, derived in part from manuscript sources; namely, Lutherische Theologen Wittenbergs im 17ten Jahrh. (Hamburg, 1852), Das akademische Leben des 17ten Jahrh. (Hamburg, 1852, 1854, in 2 vols.), and Geschichte des Rationalismus (part i. Berlin, 1865, never finished). A complete edition of his works appeared 1863–72, in 11 vols. He also republished the Commentaries of Calvin on the Gospels and Epistles, and his Institutio Christianae Religionis, and made that great divine better known in Germany, although he himself was of Lutheran descent and predisposition. He conducted for several years a literary periodical, and contributed largely to the first edition of the Encyklopädie of Herzog, whom he recommended as editor to the publisher, having first himself declined the position.

Tholuck was one of the most fruitful and influential German theologians and authors during the second and third quarters of the nineteenth century, and better known in England and America than any other. He was original, fresh, brilliant, suggestive, eloquent, and ingenious, and so much in humor. He cannot be classified with any school. He was influenced by Pietism, Moravianism, Schleiermacher, Neander, and even Hegel. His elastic mind was ever open to new light; but his heart was always right, and never shaken in faith and love to Christ. He had an extraordinary
THOMAS THE APOSTLE was also known by the Greek equivalent Didymus, meaning twin. In the Gospels he is associated with Matthew (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15); in the Acts, with Philip (Acts i. 13). He was probably a Galilean, as the mention of his name with the other Galilean fishermen among the apostles (John xxii. 2) seems to indicate. According to the oldest tradition, he was born in Syrian Antioch, preached to the Parthians, and was buried at Edessa (Euseb., III. 1; Socrat.,I. 19, etc.). According to later statements, he preached to the Medes and Persians, baptized the three kings (the nine months being the accepted age for Baptism), and returned to Edessa. In Origen (Orat. 25) speaks of his labors in India, where a later tradition makes him suffer a martyr's death by being pierced to death by lances at the king's command. The Thomas Christians show his grave at Meliapur, India. His relics, according to later traditions, were sent to the Catholic Church by the king of Persia, and were brought to Edessa, thence to Ortona, Italy. The Greek Church commemorates his memory June 3; the Latin Church, Dec. 21. The name "Thomas Christians," by which the old Christians of India were known, seems to confirm the tradition that Thomas labored in India; but this conclusion is denied by Philo and others. [See CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS, NAGAS.]

Two apocryphal works are associated with the name of Thomas, The Gospel according to Thomas [Evang. sec. Thomam, edited by Tischendorf, who gives two Greek texts and a Latin translation, and by Dr. W. Wright in Syriac], and The Acts of Thomas [Acts of Thomas, edited by Thilo, Leipzig, 1823]. Our authority for a characterization of Thomas is three passages in John's Gospel (xi. 18, xiv. 5, xx. 24). They present him as one

Talent for languages, and could speak English, French, Italian, Greek, Arabic, and several other tongues, ancient and modern, almost like a native. In that line he was scarcely surpassed by Cardinal Mezzofanti, whom he met in Rome. His learning was extensive rather than thorough and exhaustive. He gathered honey from the literature of all ages, from the Old Church to Gnosticism, but made it tributary to faith. He is one of the regenerators of German theology, leading it from the barren heath of rationalism to the green pastures of the Scriptures and the literature of the Reformation. His Commentaries broke a new path. His personal influence was as great and good as that exerted by his works, and yields only to that of Neander among his contemporaries. He was gifted with personal magnetism, and brilliant powers of conversation. Having no children, he devoted all his paternal affections to his students, and was nobly assisted by his second wife (a most lovely and refined Christian lady). He loved, as he said, candidates more than ministers, and students more than candidates, because he was more interested in the process of growth than in the result of growth. His life was a life with the young, fruitful in blessings. He was in the habit of taking long walks with two or three students, every day from eleven to twelve, and from four to five; he invited them freely to his house and table, tried experiments on their minds, proposed perplexing questions, set them disputing on high problems, inspired and stimulated them in the pursuit of knowledge, virtue, and piety. He had great regard for individuality, aimed to arouse in every one the sense of his peculiar calling rather than to create a school. Like John the Baptist, he sent all away from him to a higher Master. His chief aim was to lead them to a humble faith in the Saviour, and to infuse into them that love which was the ruling passion of his heart. He adopted, as he says, Zinzendorf's motto, "I have but one passion, and that is He, and He alone." His lecture-room was truly a school of Christ. And herein lies his chief and He alone." His lecture-room was truly a

He was invited to the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in 1873, and promised to the writer to come with the American Presbyterians, and The Acts of Thomas (Acts of Thomas, edited by Thilo, Leipzig, 1823). of your kindred"). But his feeble health prevented him; and he sent one of his favorite pupils as his representative, with a modest sketch of his labors and the condition of theology in Germany. It is the last public document from his pen (except some letters), and gives a faithful idea of this devoted youth for Christ's sake.

He was very intimate with Dr. Edward Robinson, Dr. Charles Hodge (who studied at Halle in 1827, and was daily in his company), Dr. Henry B. Smith, Dr. Prentiss (who studied there in 1840), and Dr. Park of Andover. He called them "his American pets." Once met him promenading with a pious Canadian Methodist, and an American sceptor who never went to church, but worshiped God, as he said, in his own temple, under the blue skies, and basking in the light of the sun. "But," asked Tholuck smilingly, "what do you do when it rains?" He told me afterwards that this agnostic was seeking religion, and we must aid him. He often tried the wits of American students by curious questions; e.g., "Why did God make so many Chinese, and so few Yankees?" or, "How is Mr. Erbsenkopf" (Peabody, the philanthropist)? He was invited to the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in 1873, and promised to the writer to come with the humorous remark, "I am afraid of your American mobs, your hot cakes for breakfast, and especially

THOMAS OF AQUINO (or Aquinas), the profoundest and keenest defender of the doctrines of the Roman-Catholic Church; was b. in 1225 or 1227, in the castle of Rocca Sicca, near Aquino, a city not far from Naples; d. March 6, 1274, in the Cistercian convent of Fossa Nova, near Terracina. I. Life.—Thomas, who was of noble birth, was placed in his fifth year under the monks of Monte Casino. In his tenth year he went to Naples; and in his sixteenth year, in spite of the opposition of his family, which was finally overcome by the intervention of Pope Innocent IV., he entered the Dominican order. In 1245 he was sent to Cologne to enjoy the instruction of Albertus Magnus, who directed his attention to Aristotle's philosophy and the writings of Dionysius the Areopagite. In 1248 he was made baccalauréate of the Faculty of Paris, and in the same year began to lecture on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, at Cologne. Returning to Paris, he taught there a large throng of students. Urban IV. repeatedly offered him high ecclesiastical preferment, which he declined in humility. Under the pontificate of Clement IV. and till 1268, he taught in Rome, Bologna, and Paris. In 1272, in obedience to his order and the wish of King Charles, he made Naples the seat of his activity. The last years of his life were principally occupied with the completion of his great work, Summa theologica. He died on his way to the church council at Lyons. In 1228 he was canonized by John XXII. If any one is entitled to this dignity by his life and works, Aquinas was. His piety, though monkish, was unfeigned; and he prepared himself for his writings, lectures, etc., by prayer. Louis IX. several times consulted him on matters of state. His industry, as his writings show, was intense. [Aquinas was declared a doctor of the church by Pius V. in 1567, and has a place with Augustine, Jerome, and Ambrose, among the most authoritative teachers of the church. Leo XIII., in an encyclical dated Aug. 4, 1879, recommended his works to the Catholic seminaries and theological faculties throughout the world, as a proper foundation of their religious and philosophical teaching, and particularly emphasized his political doctrines as conservative for society. The special title of this great theologian is the "Angelic Doctor."—The Apology for the Church of Christ, by H. J. M. van Hemert, vol. i. pp. 235-236.]

II. Theology.—In certain respects, Thomas of Aquino marks the culminating point of scholasticism. He sought to establish for the science of theology a position of superior dignity and importance over the science of philosophy, and, on the other hand, the harmony of the two sciences, by distinguishing between the religious truths which can be excogitated by the use of reason from those which are only known by revelation. The doctrinal creed of the church, Thomas treats as absolute truth; but it is a remarkable fact, that he uses the arguments of the church-teachers only as of probable authority (Summa theologica, i. qu. 1, art. 8). He refers more frequently to biblical texts than the other scholastics; but this practice does not purify his theology, but helps to confirm the church-doctrines. His exegetical principles were good; and he expressly commended the literal interpretation of the Scriptures, omnes sensus scripturarum fundamenta super unum sensum litteralem, quod solo potest traher argumentum, etc. (Summa theologica, i. qu. 1, art. 10), but could not free himself from ecclesiastical authority. Thomas did not grant the ontological argument of Anselm for the existence of God. He gives several forms of the cosmological and teleological arguments, but says, that, while reason can prove that God exists, it cannot discover what his nature is. His fundamental conception of God is that of spiritual and active being. God is intelligence and will et voluntas, the first cause. Thinking and willing are inseparable from his being. He is consequently forever returning to the idea of the absolute identity and simplicity of God. He employs all his speculative talent to explain the doctrine of the Trinity; and yet he declares that it is beyond the sphere of reason to discover the distinction of persons in the Godhead, and affirms that he who tries to prove the doctrine of the Trinity by the unaided reason derogates from faith: qui probare multitatem personarum naturali ratione, fidei derogat (Summa theologica, i. qu. 32, art. 1). Although Thomas did not, like his teacher Albertus Magnus, regard the world as an emanation from God, he refers its origin to God's active will, which is nothing more than his active intelligence, which, in turn, is only the essence of God working as the first cause. He is again and again forced to regard the world as a necessary product of the Divine Being, and inclines to the thesis of its eternal existence; so that he contents himself with saying, "It is credible that the world had a beginning, but neither demonstrable nor knowable: et mundum incipisse credibile est, sed non demonstrabile et scibile (Summa theologica, i. qu. 46, art. 2). The doctrines of election and reprobation he considers in connection with the doctrine of providence. Every thing occurs under the Divine Providence, and serves a single and final end. Both reprobation and election are matters of divine decree; and the exact number of the reprobate, as well as of the elect, is determined in advance. Reprobation, however, consists not in a positive action on God's part, but in a letting-alone. God is not the cause of sin. He simply withholds his grace, and man falls by his own will. In opposition to the Arab philo-phers, Thomas insists upon the efficiency of second causes (Summa, 1. qu. 105, art. 5), through which God works. He lays emphasis on the ability of the will to choose between two tendencies in the interest of the doctrines of guilt and merit.

Passing over to the creatures of God, Thomas dwells at length upon the subject of the angels, which he discusses with minute care and speculative skill. He teaches, with Augustine, that the original righteousness of Adam was a superadded twine of Christ's work, as when he deniesthe abso-lu tire of the Incarnation, and affirms the meeting in Christ of the two absolute principles of human ignorance and imperfection, and divine omniscience and perfection.

He departs in some details from the Anselmic doctrine of Christ's work, as when he denies the abso-olute necessity of the incarnation, and affirms that God might have redeemed man in some other way than by his Son. A human judge cannot release from punishment without expiation of guilt; but God, as the Supreme Being, can forgive without expiation, if he so chooses (Summa, iii. qu. 46, art. 1). But in the same sentence he adds, that the satisfaction of Christ removes all original guilt; and, by the application of his merit, the sinner secures freedom from and forgiveness of sin. Man's nature is corrupt, and God alone enables him to reach eternal life.

Thomas passes directly from the consideration of the work of Christ to the sacraments. The numer of the sacraments had already been fixed at seven, but his treatment had a shaping influence upon the discussion of the subject in after-time.
He proved the necessity of seven sacraments, and the immanence in them of a supernatural element of grace. His treatment of the Eucharist, penance, and ordination, is characteristic. He held to the change of the elements to the body and blood of Christ, justified the withholding of the cup from the laity with casuistical arguments, and spoke of the sacrifice of the mass, now as a "symbolical picture of the passion" (imago reprationis), now as a real sacrifice. It is noticeable, that, in his doctrine of the mass, he does not emphasize, as do his successors, the idea of sacrifice to the detriment of the sacramental idea. The subject of indulgences, Thomas handled at length; teaching that the efficacy of an indulgence does not depend upon the faith of the recipient, but upon the will and authority of the church, and extends to the dead as well as to the living (Summa, iii. qu. 71, art. 10). The discussion of eschatology follows the discussion of the sacraments. Thomas teaches the doctrines of purgatory and the intercession of saints. He treats the doctrines of the resurrection and future blessedness at length, and teaches that the body of the resurrection will in form be identical with the present body, even to the hair and the nails.

Thomas was not less great as a teacher of ethics than as a theologian. Neander has said, that, next to that of Aristotle, his is the most important name in the history of ethics (Wissenschaft. Abhand-lungen, ed. Jacob, p. 48). But both as a moralist and a theologian he was a true son of the church. His system is, as Baur says, only an echo of the doctrinal teaching of the church. In the spirit of the day he discussed many idle and useless questions with casuistical minuteness and far-fetched argumentation. But he was in this respect more moderate than his contemporaries.
On the other hand, he discussed many important subjects with a depth and clearness of insight which make his views permanently interesting and valuable.

After the death of Aquinas, a conflict went on over his theology; Duns Scotus being the leader of the other school. The Dominicans were ranged on the side of Aquinas, whose followers were called Thomists; and the Franciscans on the side of Duns Scotus, whose followers were known as Scotists. The difference between the teachers was not in the doctrines they taught, but in their treatment of these doctrines. With Scotus, theology was a practical science; with Aquinas, a speculative science. The controversy lasted down to the eighteenth century; and the Franciscan De Rada mentions in his work, Controversic inter Thomam et Scotum (Cologne, 1820), no less than eighty-six points of difference between the two schools. The most important points of controvery were the cogiscibility of God, the distinction between the divine attributes, original sin, the merit of sacrifice to the detriment of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, the two teachers held divergent views; Thomas denying it, Scotus asserting it. The Jesuits opposed Thomism, as Bellarmin's example proves; but it prevailed at the Spanish universities of Salamans, Coimbra, and Alcala. The Roman-Catholic Church cannot forget the most profound and penetrating defender of its doctrines until it renounces them; and the Protestant Church will not fail to share in the admiration of Thomas Aquinas so long as it continues to admire literary greatness.

LIT. — The principal works of Thomas on theology are his Commentary on Peter the Lombard's Sentences, a work of his earlier years, in which his own system is worked out; the Compendium theologiae (incomplete); the Summa de veritate fidei catholica, or Adversus Genuites, whose purpose was apologetic, to defend the creed of the church; and Summa totius theologiae, the work of his ripe thought, which, however, breaks off at the doctrine of penance, and was completed in the fifteenth century, from the Commentary on the Lombard's Sentences.
His exegetical works include some commentaries on the Old Testament, a commentary on the Pauline Epistles, and a valuable one on the Gospels ( Aurea catena in Evangelia), containing excerpts from eighty church writers. Complete editions of the works of Aquinas have appeared at Rome, 1672, 17 vols. [1862 sqq., ed. Zighiara]; Antwerp, 1612; Paris, 1660, 23 vols.; Venice, 1787, 26 vols.; Parma, 1652–71, 25 vols. [Migne has published an edition of the Summa theologica,

THOMAS OF CELANO, a native of Celano in Abruzzo Ulteriore; was appointed custos of the Minorite monasteries of Cologne, Mayence, Worms, and Spire, by Casarius of Spire, the first provincial of the Franciscan order in Germany, about 1221. Nothing more is known about him; but the authorship of the oldest biography of St. Francis of Assisi, and of the celebrated hymn, Dies irae, dies illa, is generally ascribed to him. With respect to the biography, there is nothing which positively contradicts his claims; though it is singular that Mark of Lisbon, in enumerating the twenty-five first and most noted pupils of St. Francis, does not mention Thomas, while the biography evidently is written by one who lived familiarly with the saint from an early date. With respect to the hymn, Bartholomew Alibizi of Pisa is the first who mentions him as the author, in Liber decretalium (1385); and most of the other claimants or pretenders are absolutely impossible.

THOMAS OF VILLANOVA, b. at Fuenlana, in the diocese of Leon, 1847; d. at Valencia, Nov. 8, 1555. He studied at Alcala; entered the order of the Augustinian hermits in 1517; became the provincial of his order for Andalusia and Castile; confessor to Charles V., and in 1544 bishop of Valencia. In 1568 he was canonized by Alexander VII., Act. Sanct., Sept. 5. He published some sermons and a Commentary on the Cauticles; published at Alcala 1581, Brescia 1813, Cologne 1814, and Augsburg 1817. His life was written by Quevedo, and translated into French by Malmourg, Paris, 1866.

THOMASIN OF ZIRKLARIA, in Tylor, flourished in the beginning of the thirteenth century, and wrote in 1215 Der wunderbare Gast, a didactic poem, which inaugurated that long series of poems so interesting for the moral and religious history of the middle ages. Though it does not mention the Virgin, and says some sharp truths concerning the church, it is not polemical against the pope and the priests. It was first printed at Leipzig in 1826, and published in German, French, Italian, and English.

THOMASIN, Louis, b. at Aix, Aug. 28, 1819; d. in Paris, Dec. 9, 1875. He studied theology at Erlangen in 1842. His studies were principally occupied with the history of doctrines, and in that line he published Origenes, Nuremberg, 1837, and Die christliche Dogmengeschichte, 1874-76, 2 vols.

THOMPSON, Joseph Parrish, D.D., LL.D., b. in Philadelphia, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, Aug. 7, 1819; graduated at Yale, 1838; ordained October, 1840; pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church in New York from 1845 till 1871, when, on account of ill health, he resigned, and went to Germany, and d. in Berlin, Sept. 20, 1879. In 1843 he became associated with five other gentlemen in establishing and conducting The New-England. In 1848, in connection with Drs. Leonard Bacon, Joshua Leavitt, and Richard S. Storrs, he established The Independent, a weekly newspaper which at once became a leader of thought on all matters affecting the welfare of the nation and the kingdom of Christ. For fourteen years a large measure of editorial responsibility for the paper devolved upon Dr. Thompson. Apart from this editorial work, he was a prolific writer of books, addresses, occasional pamphlets, and reviews. The list of his separate publications includes more than ninety titles; among them are, The Theology of Christ in his own Words (1870), The United States as a Nation (1877), and Church and State in the United States (1873), a work which was printed in German, French, Italian, and English.

During thirty-one years of pastoral work he recognized the paramount claims of the pulpit upon his best energies; and though he had unusual gifts as a platform speaker, and peculiar facility in adapting himself to his surroundings, he rarely ventured to appear in the pulpit without an elaborate written sermon. This conscientious fidelity in official work was rewarded with large success, and his congregation came to be one of the largest and most intellectual in the metropolis. At the same time he bore a conspicuous part in the missionary work of his denomination and in its local councils. as well as in movements to promote general philanthropy and reform.

No sketch of this period of his life would be complete which did not hold up to view the immense influence which he exerted by pen and voice in the pulpit, on the platform, and in every appropriate way, in the discussions which preceded the overdraw of abolition of Negro slavery found apologists in Northern pulpits, when antislavery sentiments were unpopular to the last degree, when criticism of the fugitive-slave law exposed one to obloquy, when an appeal to a higher law was denounced either by the religious press, he had the nerve to do what many shrank from doing, and the pluck to carry out his convictions in speech and act. In all this he was untrammelled by ecclesiastical or political ties; and it is believed that few men of this generation have exerted a larger influence over thoughtful minds in the elucidation of principles and the application of those principles to the life of the nation. During the whole period of the civil war he labored with assiduity for the maintenance of national unity on principles of universal freedom. Unfortunately, these arduous labors, in connection with personal exposure while on a visit to the Union army as an officer of the Sanitary Commission, resulted in such physical prostration, that in 1871 he was compelled to resign his pastoral office, and seek repose abroad.

A visit to Egypt as long ago as 1853 had led him to take a deep interest in Egyptology, and to make extensive preparations for writing an elaborate work on the Life and Times of Moses. It was his hope that a residence in Berlin would enable him to carry out this design. He did not readily abandon it: but his temperament was such that he could never be indifferent to the many a state of things which seemed to call for eloquent denunciation. By 1859 he was ready to make the annual "Thanksgiving" address in the American chapel. In 1873, in the dead of winter, he went to Thorn, on the confines of Germany, to represent the American Geographical Society at the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of Copernicus. In Berlin he made addresses commemorating Agassiz, Bryant, and Bayard Taylor. He regularly attended the meetings of the Association for the reform and codification of the Law of Nations, and contributed papers which were held in high esteem by jurists. Three years in succession he spoke on the Papacy and Protestantism in Glasgow, where the papers styled him "that fiery American from Berlin." Many of his addresses and papers were designed to show that difficulties which threatened the peace of Europe were to be overcome by following the American plan of separating Church and State. During the "centennial" year he vindicated his native land against European prejudices by a course of six philosophical lectures on American political history, which he delivered in Berlin, Florence, Dresden, Paris, and London. His pastoral influence secured the insertion, in the Berlin Treaty of 1878, of a clause favoring religious liberty. Among his last works was the preparation, for the Evangelical Alliance at Basel (1879), of a memorial in behalf of religious liberty in America, which he delivered in Berlin, Florence, Dresden, Paris, and London. The Alliance appointed a deputation of prominent men, of whom he was one,—the sole representative from the United States,—to wait on the Emperor of Austria, and invoke redress. On hearing of this result, he said, looking at his helpless arm, "This old hand has struck one more blow for liberty." Before the deputation could fulfil its mission, he died in Berlin, and was buried in the cemetery of the Jerusalem Church.

THO'RAH (thelaw). 1. The Feast of the Law. On the evening of the eighth day, which concludes the feast of tabernacles, commences what is called the "Feast of the Rejoicing of the Law," which fitsly celebrates the termination of the year,—by reading of the law and the beginning of the chapter of a new covenant. The rabbis are chosen to perform the ceremonies connected with the festival. The first, called the "Bridegroom of the Law," after the singing by the cantor of a long Hebrew formula of address, reads Deut. xxxiii. 1—xxxiv. 12, the closing verses of the Pentateuch; and the Alliance appointed a deputation of prominent men, of whom he was one,—the sole representative from the United States,—to wait on the Emperor of Austria, and invoke redress. On hearing of this...
2. The Writing of the Law-scrolls, being an honorable and important work, can only be intrusted to a grown-up and experienced man. The scrolls are made of parchment prepared expressly for the purpose by a Jew from the hide of a clean animal slaughtered by a Jew. It must not be so porous or thin as to allow the writing to show through. The leaves should be joined by gut-string from a clean animal; but silk may, if the Jesuit be not willing, by wax, if he be once joined: if it breaks again, it must be thrown aside. The leaves thus fastened together are rolled upon a wooden rod with wooden or silver handles. Each leaf has an upper margin not less than three fingers broad, and a lower not less than four, and a space between every two columns two fingers broad. No column must be wider than half the height of the leaf, nor have less than forty-eight, or more than sixty lines. No line must be longer than three four-syllable words, or have space or more than thirty letters. The leaf is lined before the writing begins. The ink is made of lampblack, oil, or grease, and pounded charcoal, with honey; and the mass is then thoroughly dried. The ink is prepared for use by being moistened with water colored by gall-nuts. The writing-instrument is a stylus. The sample to be copied must be fully correct. No word may be divided. The square character must be placed equidistantly. The letters י, ש, כ, ט, יז must have each three little strokes; מ, little points on the head; א should have in it a double broken line, as if two "p's" were written one within the other. Where the sign כ stands, there must be a space left of three, where ב of nine, letters; for these signs marked off the sections. At the close of the book there must be left a space of four lines. With particular care the sacred name "Jehovah" (יהוה) is to be written. Before beginning, the pen must be wiped, then dipped carefully in the ink, so that it may not blot. No word must the scribe speak while writing it and the margins of three words, not even if the king spoke to him. If in the copy a mistake is made, it must be corrected within thirty days: otherwise the copy cannot be used. If there are more than four mistakes on a leaf, it must be discarded. Every Jew must either write a roll, or have one written. If he inherits one, he cannot sell it, except for money to support himself during his studies, or to pay his wedding-expenses, or to buy his freedom. A thoroughly correct law-roll is the object of especial respect. So long as it is open, no one may spit, move out his foot, or turn his back. When it is carried by, all must stand. The bearer must assume the attitude of the profoundest reverence. It is dehifent to touch the text with the naked finger: therefore a hand holding a silver stylus is used to trace the words with in the public reading. To pack up the rolls, and carry them upon beasts of burden, is forbidden; they must be carried by riders, and closely be世人心s.

THORN, The Conference of (Colloquium caritatis), took place in 1645. In Poland the attempt at reconciling the various Christian denominations was not altogether fruitless. The Bohemian Brethren and the Reformed entered into community with each other in 1555. A consensus was established between those two parties on the one side, and the Lutherans on the other, in 1570; and in 1578 the Pax Disidendum, a kind of toleration act, became part of the Polish constitution. Nevertheless, the arrogance and intrigues of the Jesuits every now and then produced great irritation, and utterances of jealousy and rancor were by no means wanting. As now, the overwhelming majority of the population of Poland proper was Catholic, while in the two greatest fiefs of the Polish crown (Courland and Prussia) the majority of the population was evangelical, it became to the king of Poland a problem of the greatest political moment to prevent an open and general outburst of discord. For this purpose, Ladislaus IV. invited twenty-eight representatives of each of the three Christian denominations found in his realm to meet at Thorn, and by a congress of three months' duration to try to come to some general agreement. The most prominent among the Roman-Catholic representatives were Bishop Georg Tyszkiewicz of Samogitia; the Jesuits, Gregory Schönhof; the Carmelites, Hieronymus Cyrus a St. Hyacinthus; and the former Protestant, Bartholomew Nigrius, preacher in Dantzic: among the Reformed, Johann Bergius, court-preacher to the elector of Brandenburg; Fr. Reichel from Francfort-on-the-Oder; Amos Comenius, bishop of the Moravian Brethren; Johann Bythner, superintendent of Great Poland; and Zbigneus Gorayski, castellan of Culm: among the Lutherans, Hulsemann from Wittenberg; Calovius and Botsack from Dantzic; Georg Calixtus from Heimstadt; Mich. Behm from Königsberg; and Sig. Guildenstern, starost of Sturm. The conference opened Aug. 18, 1645, under the presidency of Prince Georg Ossolinis, chancellor of the Polish crown, and closed Nov. 21, same year. No result was arrived at. The Lutherans showed the same unmitigated hatred to the Reformed as to the Roman Catholics. They began with foul intriguing among themselves, in order to poison the medeiuim, whom they knew to be in favor of a union, from any active participation in the debate. They went on disturbing the business of the assembly with ridiculous questions of etiquette (who should sit on the front seats,—the Lutherans, or the Reformed; who should make the opening prayer,—a Lutheran, or a Reformed, etc.); but they were finally debarred from participating in the debate, as the other representatives chose to speak Polish, which the Lutheran theologians did not understand. The principal points of controversy between the Reformed and the Roman Catholics were the demand of the former to style themselves catholics, and the refusal of the latter to incorporate with the official acts of the conference the Confession which the Reformed had presented to the assembly, and which had been read in a general session, — the so-called Declaratio Thurniensis. The Roman Catholics were, as Schönhof happened to intimate, afraid of the Protestant reading the Reformed Confession in the report, should find it too sensible, and lose something of their fanaticism. The assembly separated, however, with many courteous compliments: whence it has been called caritatis. LTR.—The official Acta conventus Thornensis (Warsaw, 1648) are very defective. A better

Thornton, Robert H., D.D., an early, earnest, and laborious minister of the Canadian Presbyterian Church; b. in the parish of West Calder, Scotland, April, 1806; d. in Oahawa, Can., Feb. 11, 1875. He was descended from a godly ancestry. His father was an elder in the church, and his mother was a woman of singular piety. At the age of nineteen he became the assistant of his elder brother, Patrick, as a teacher of a school in Falkirk, where, with great diligence and self-denial, he prosecuted his classical studies. He entered the university of Edinburgh well prepared, and took a high place in his classes. He obtained the warm commendation of the professors, specially of Professor Wilson, who characterizes him in a certificate as "a most able student." Attracted by the fame of Dr. Thomas Chalmers, he attended a session at St. Andrews. In 1829 he entered the Divinity Hall of the Secession Church in Glasgow, and for four years attended the lectures of Dr. Dick and Dr. Mitchell, nomina nobilissima. In 1833 he was ordained, and ordained as a missionary to Canada. He began his labors in that province in July, 1833, along the north shore of Lake Ontario, a territory at that time wild, and sparsely settled. He was installed as pastor of a congregation in the township of Whitby, which formed the centre of his widely extended evangelistic and missionary circuit. His labors extended for fifty miles along the lake-shore, and as far northward as settlers were to be found. His labors were arduous and most abundant. He organized many stations which are now large and prosperous congregations. He was among the foremost in every good work, a fearless and vigorous advocate of temperance at a time when a man needed the courage of his convictions to withstand the reproaches of his friends and the assaults of the vile. His efforts in the cause of general education were second to few, and every movement for the social, intellectual, and civil improvement of society, found in him a ready and eloquent supporter. He lectured frequently and gratuitously in all sections of the country, and was for a time the able and efficient agent of the Bible Society. He held a prominent place in the esteem of the community, and was fully appreciated by the church, and his brethren in the ministry. He was for many years clerk of his presbytery, and occupied the moderator's chair of the synod. In 1850 the College of Princeton, N.J., conferred on him the honorary title of D.D., —an honor well bestowed. After a most active and widely extended ministry of forty-two years, and a life of varied and valuable services as a citizen, patriot, and philanthropist, Dr. Thornton died of pneumonia, after a few days' illness. Thoroughly devoted to his life-work, happy in his family, revered by his congregation, honored by his brethren, he has left a strong legacy of charity to his children and to the church. His congregation erected a monument to his memory. The motto of his life, however, was "Prodesse quam conspi cere." William Ormiston.

Thorndike, Herbert, is supposed to have been born in 1598, but no satisfactory proof of this date can be found; nor is it known where he was first educated, it being certain, however, that he became a pensioner at Cambridge in 1613, and a Trinity-College scholar the following year. He was made canon of Lincoln in 1639; vicar of Claybrooke, Leicestershire, in 1639; rector of Barley in Hertfordshire, 1642; master of Sidney College in 1643. Being a stanch Churchman of the Anglo-Catholic type, he was ejected from his benefice during the civil wars, but restored to them at the Restoration. He, however, resigned them on being appointed a stall at Westminster Abbey in 1661. He published a Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic lexicon in 1655, assisted Walton in the preparation of his Polyglot during the Commonwealth, and designed an edition of Origen, which he did not execute. He also entered into plans for preserving and restoring episcopal institutions in those unsettled times. He assisted at the Savoy Conference in 1661, and had a share in the revision of the Prayer-Book the same year, being then a member of convocation. He resumed his residence at Cambridge, in broken health, in 1662, and afterwards divided his time between the university and the abbey. The plague drove him from Cambridge in 1666; after which he vacated his fellowship, and died at Chiswick in 1672. He is best known by his writings, and must be regarded as the most learned, the most systematic, and the most powerful advocate of Anglo-Catholic theology and High-Church principles in the seventeenth century. His theological works, which include a number of treatises, have been collected in the Oxford edition of six volumes, 1844–57. This edition presents a model of editorship; being enriched with explanatory notes, which form a guide to the study of controversial theology in general, and not only as it appeared in Thorndike's day. The book which most succinctly unfolds his scheme is entitled An Epilogue to the Tragedy of the Church of England (1659), in which he treats of the principles of Christian truth, the covenant of grace, and the laws of the church. The covenant of grace is his central idea. He dwells upon the necessity of the covenant as arising out of original sin, the mediator of the covenant as the divine Christ, and the method of the covenant as an economy of grace. In the treatment of this branch, he brings out the Anglican doctrines of salvation as distinguished from those of Puritanism. His trains of thought are prolix and excursive, and his style is crabbed and unreadable. His works could never be popular, but they demand the admiration and polemic which tie the theological scholars [see STOUGHTON: Religion in England, 1881, 6 vols. (Index)]. John Stoughton.

woman of great intelligence, piety, and strength of character, he acknowledged his indebtedness, when in the zenith of his fame he spoke of her in a public address as one "who had taught him from his cradle the eternal principles of grace" as they were contained in the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church.

Notwithstanding the hindrances of early poverty, he obtained the elements of a good education under the training of an excellent teacher, and soon displayed such original genius and capacity for acquisition as to attract the attention, and secure the patronage, of two noble men, whose honor it was to furnish him with every facility for the prosecution of his studies, and whose reward was in the distinction to which he attained as a scholar, professor, pastor, and theologian. While a student of South-Carolina College, Columbia, before his seventeenth birthday, his dialectic talent, his passionate love for the classics, and his devotion to metaphysical studies, united with an extraordinary power of abstraction and mental concentration, together with a capacity for learning best, or special, gave presage of the distinction he was afterwards to win on every arena to which duty summoned him.

It is a remarkable circumstance in his history, that with the knowledge of the fact fully before him that his generous patrons had destined him to the study of the law, neither of them at the time professed of religion, and not yet being a professor himself, he came to the unalterable decision, that, inasmuch as it was the duty of every one to devote his life to the glory of God and the good of man, he could best fulfil the end of his being by becoming a minister of the gospel. Three years after this he became a member of the church; and then, after spending about two years in the business of teaching, in the prosecution of his great design he went first to the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., but, without articulating the reasons required to Cambridge, where, in the divinity school of Harvard University, he commenced the study of Hebrew and biblical literature. But, finding the climate too cold for his constitution, after a few months' stay he returned to South Carolina.

He was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Harmony in 1834. His first pastorate was in Lancaster, in the presbytery of Bethel.

In 1837 he was elected to a professorship in Columbia College, South Carolina. In 1839 he resigned his chair in that institution to become pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Columbia, but was recalled to the college in 1841, and remained connected with it as professor or president, with a few intervals of service elsewhere, for fifteen years.

At the close of 1855 he was transferred from the college to the theological seminary; and the beginning of 1856 found him, in what was perhaps the last act of his life, in the chair of didactic and polemic theology, and also editor of the Southern Quarterly Review.

Twice during his life Dr. Thornwell visited Europe. Ten times he represented his presbytery at the General Assembly; and he was moderator of the assembly [Old-School Branch] which met in Richmond, Va., in 1847.

It was at the assembly held in Rochester, N.Y. [1860], that the great debate between himself and the Rev. Charles Hodge, D.D., took place, on the subject of church boards.

Dr. Thornwell took a leading part in the organization of the Southern General Assembly in 1861. On the 1st of August, 1862, he died in Charlotte, N.C., where he had gone to meet his wounded son, then a soldier in the Confederate army. He was taken away in the meridian of his fame and usefulness, not yet having completed his fiftieth year, his last words being those of wonder and praise.

The collected writings of Dr. Thornwell, edited by Rev. James B. Adger, D.D., Richmond, 1871-75, are contained in four volumes, the first of which is entitled Theological; the second, Theological and Ethical; the third, Theological and Controversial; and the fourth, Ecclesiastical. See his Life and Letters, by B. M. Palmer, Richmond, 1875.

THUGS (Hindi, Ṭhuna, “to deceive”), an organized body of secret assassins and thieves, who for many years had been the terror of India. They were worshippers of the bloody goddess kali, who presided over impure love and death. Roaming about through the country, they usually strangled their victims by a skillful use of the handkerchief. They devoted one-third of their plunder to their tutelary divinity. The administration of Lord William Bentinck (1828–35) succeeded in putting an end to their dreaded deeds. See Capt. Sleeman: Ramaseeana, or a Vocabulary of the Peculiar Language used by the Thugs.

THURIBLE, THURIBULUM, or THYMIATE-RIUM, a vessel for burning incense, a censer, generally made of precious metal, in the form of a basin with a pierced cover and suspended by three chains for swinging. In this form, however, the thurible is not found until the twelfth century. The thuribles which Constantine presented to the churches of Rome, or Chosroes to the churches of Constantinople, must, by reason of their weight, have been stationary.

THYATIRA, a city of Asia Minor, on the northern border of Lydia, near the road from Pergamum to Sardis, which was about twenty-seven miles distant. The Lycus flows near it. Its early names were Pelopis, Semiramis, and Euhippia. Lydia, the seller of purple stuffs, who received Paul so kindly, came from Thyatira (Acts xvi. 14). Dyeing was apparently an extensive industry there, and the scarlet cloth now produced there is very famous. Lydia very likely belonged to the dyers' guild. She was probably helpful in the establishment of the church of Thyatira, if not the founder. This church was honored with one of the Epistles of Revelation (ii. 18–29). Some commentators explain “the woman Jezebel” as the sibyl Sambath, whose face stood outside the walls. The modern city is called Ak-Hissar (“white castle”), and numbers some twenty thousand.

THIARA, a head-dress worn by the Pope on solemn occasions, consisting of a high cap of goldcloth, encircled with three crowns, and provided, like the mitre, with two flaps hanging down the neck. The original tiara had only a golden circle along the nether brim. John XIII. (985) added the first crown; Boniface VIII. (1266), the second; and Benedict XIII. (1335), the third.

TIBERIAS, the modern Tiberiath, stands on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, at a point where the cliffs, generally surrounding the lake, retreat from the waters, and form an open plain. It was built by Herod Antipas, and named after the Roman Emperor Tiberius; and it was the capital of Galilee from that time till the reign of Herod Agrippa II., who removed the seat of government back to its old place at Sepphoris. As Herod Antipas was educated in Rome, the city he built was, with its palaces, theatres, gymnasiums, etc., more Roman than Jewish, and the strict orthodox Jews felt a kind of aversion to it. This may explain why Christ, who spent most of his time in Galilee, never visited the city, though perhaps, also, the fate of John the Baptist may have been to this reason. The city has been times three times in the New Testament.—John vi. 1, 23, 21. 1. During the war with Rome, it played, on account of its fortifications, quite an important part; and when, in the middle of the second century, it was the seat of the Sanhedrin, removed thither from Jamma, it became one of the four holy cities of the Jews. At present it has some four thousand inhabitants, of whom about one-quarter are Jews, the rest Mohammedans and Christians. It stands at the northern end of the plain; but the ruins extend far away to the southern end, where are the famous warm baths which are mentioned by Pliny.

TIGLATH—PILESER (Heb., תִּגְלַת-פְּלַזֶּר, also תִּגְלַת-פְּלַזֶּר, also תִּגְלַת-פְּלַזֶּר), (Authorized Version, “Tiglath-Pilesier”), LXX., Θηγαλάθ-Πλήζερ, Θηγαλάθ-Πλήζερ, τοιαυτίαν, Θηγαλάθ-Πλήζερ, etc.; Assyry, Tuktat-apal-šarrā, “(My) trust(is)the son of the house of favor,” or “house of assembling;” apalšarrā is probably a title of the god Adar), the second Assyrian king of that name, who reigned B.C. 745–727, and is identical with Pul (Heb., יְבָל; LXX., Πελώ, Πελώ, Πελώ, Πελώ, Πελώ, —see below,— is mentioned under one or other of these names in six passages of the Bible (2 Kings xv. 19, 29, xvi. 7–10; 1 Chron. v. 6, 26; 2 Chron. xxiii. 20), and as “Tuktat-apalšarrā” in various Assyrian inscriptions.

The identity of Tiglath-pilesier and Pul appears from the following grounds. (1) The Bible and the inscriptions agree in making Azariahs of Judah and Menahem of Israel contemporaries. As the Assyrian king contemporary with both, the Bible names Pul; the inscriptions, Tiglath-pilesier. (2) The inscriptions leave no room for Pul as a king distinct from Tiglath-pilesier. The Eponym Canon, or list of Assyrian officials who gave names to the successive years, and includes the kings, does not allude to him; and the hypothesis of a break in the list, resulting in the omission of his name, is groundless. Nor does Tiglath-pilesier, whose inscriptions are numerous and full, ever allude to such a person as a rival or rebel. (3) Berossus, the Babylonian priest and historian (third century B.C.), says that Pul the Chaldean reigned before Sennacherib, and invaded Judea. No mention is made of the name Tiglath-pilesier. See Alex. Polychistor in Euseb. Armen. Chron., i. 4. (4) Pòros (Πόρος), according to Ptolemy’s Canon, became king of Babylon in 731. Πόρος(ος) can easily be the same with Pul, as Persian inscriptions give Bābirīn for Bābilu, Babylon, etc. The Assyrian inscriptions tell us that Tiglath-pilesier, who called himself “King of Shumār and Akkad” (i.e., Southern and Northern Babylonia), reduced the Babylonian princes to subject. In 731, (5) Nebuchadrezzar gives the name of another Babylonian ruler, Chinniros (Χιννιρος), for the same year, 731, and puts it before that of Pòros. The inscriptions tell us that among the Babylonian princes who did homage to Tiglath-pilesier in 731 was Ukinèzsuccessor ascended the Assyrian throne B.C. 727. Ptolemy's Canon gives 725 as the first year of Ptolemaeus' successor in Babylonia. These considerations make the identity of Pul with Tiglath-pileser a matter of the strongest historical probability. The name Pul was not unknown in Assyria, and was probably the private name of this king, who seems not to have been the son of his predecessor. The name Tiglath-pileser would then have been assumed on his ascending the throne.

The Bible makes the following statements about this king: (1) That he threatened the northern kingdom (Israel), and that Menahem the king gave him a thousand talents of silver to secure his favor and support (2 Kings xv. 19); (2) That in the days of Pekah, a usurper, the second successor of Menahem, he took Ijon, Abel-beth-maachah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, and Galilee, "all the land of Naphtali," "and carried them captive to Assyria" (2 Kings xv. 19; cf. 1 Chron. vi. 20); (3) That Ahaz, king of Judah, induced him by homage and presents to come to his aid against Syria and Israel; that he captured Damascus, carried the inhabitants away captive, and slew Rezin the king; and that Ahaz went to Damascus to meet him (2 Kings xvi. 7–10; cf. 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, which, however, says, "Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, came unto him [Ahaz], and [b]ressed him, but strengthened him not"). These statements are partly explained, partly supplemented, by the inscriptions, from which we are enabled to give, with approximate accuracy, a sketch of Tiglath-pileser's reign. In B.C. 745, his first regnal year, he made a successful expedition to Babylonia. In 744 he was occupied in the countries east of Assyria. In 743 his forces were engaged, partly in Armenia, partly before the city of Arpad, in the land Chatti, west of the Euphrates, receiving tribute from the kings of Karkemish, Tyre, etc. The years 742–741 were occupied in the siege of Arpad. In 740 Hamath was punished for revolting to "Azariah of Judah," who was himself not molested. This agrees with what the Bible tells us of Azariah's formidable power. In 739 there was an expedition to the land of Ullula and the city Birtu (on the Euphrates?). The conquered Hamathites were transported to Ullula. In 738, besides other conquests, the king received tribute from Rezin of Damascus, Menahem of Israel (cf. 2 Kings xv. 19), Hiram of Tyre, and various rulers of Asia Minor, Phoenicia, and Arabia. The years 737–735 were spent in the East; but in 734 the king marched to Philistia (Philistia), taking in Phoenicia, Israel, Judah, Edom, Moab, and Ammon. Before this expedition, or in its early stages, must be placed the homage, gifts, and treaties of Ahaz (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8). Tiglath-pileser speaks, in one inscription, of receiving tribute from "Je-u-chi-zi (Ahaz, IVN) of Judah." His account of the campaign of 734 (cf. 2 Kings xvi. 9) is the biblical account; but, he tells us, that he plundered the kingdom of Israel ("the land of the house of Omri"); and, killing Pekah the king, set Hoshea on the throne. This shows us what power was at work behind the conspiracy and usurpation of Hoshea (mentioned 2 Kings xv. 30). After this the Assyrian king turned toward Damascus, and besieged it for two years, finally capturing it, and putting Rezin to death (cf. 2 Kings xvi. 19). It must have been at this time that the King of the Ashurites visited him at Damascus (2 Kings xvi. 10). In 731 occurred the second expedition to Babylon, with the subjugation of Merodachbaladan (see art.) and Ukinzer (see above). 730–728 were spent in Assyria, where the king's death probably occurred in 727.

The only difficulty occasioned by the comparison of the Biblical with the Assyrian account of this king is a chronological one. He reigned, according to the Eponym Canon (which is fixed by its mention of the solar eclipse of B.C. 763, and by its correspondence with Ptolemy's Canon), B.C. 745–727. But the received biblical chronology puts the death of his contemporary, Azariah, in B.C. 758, and that of Menahem B.C. 761. It also gives 739, and not 734, as the date of Pekah's death, putting the invasions of Judah by Pekah and Rezin in 742–741. The discrepancies are in part due to the same causes which we find operating in the previous century, in the times of Ahab, Jehu, and Shalmaneser II (see Shalmaneser), but are connected in part with some special inaccuracies in the present text of that section of Kings with which we are here concerned. A solution of the difficulty cannot be attempted here; but it must be sought in the restoration of correct numbers in the Hebrew text, and not in a modification of the Assyrian data, which are here self-consistent and well-attested.

TILLEMONT, Louis Sebastien, Le Nain de, a Roman-Catholic historian; b. in Paris, Nov. 30, 1630; d. there July 19, 1698. He was educated in Port-Royal, shared the views and fortunes of the Jansenists, and was consecrated priest in 1676. [He took his name from the town of Tillemont, near Paris, where he was rector.] He devoted much time to historical studies, and, after furnishing biographies for editions of several of the Fathers, published the first volume of his larger work, Histoire des Empeureurs et des autres princes qui ont regne durant les six premiers siecles de l'Eglise, des persecutions qu'ils ont faites aux chrétiens, etc., 1690. He published three more volumes of this work during his life. Two posthumous volumes were added. His principal work was the Memoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclesiastique des six premiers siecles. The first three volumes were published at Paris, 1694. Thirteen others followed [till 1712] after the author's death, bringing the history down to 513. This was the first church history based upon conscientious researches published in France up to that time. It consists for the most part of quotations from the Fathers, arranged in chronological order. The author's own remarks are included in brackets, or consigned to the foot of the page as notes. Tillemont's labors do not satisfy the present generation of scholarship, but were valuable for their minute and careful research.

TILLOTSON, John, b. at Sowerby in Yorkshire, October, 1630; son of a clothier, who was a zealous Puritan; studied at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where Puritan principles were inculcated, and where he joined the same round of study and worship, one of the subsequently ejected clergy. But Tillotson did not imbibe Puritan doctrines; he rather leaned in what was called the "Latitudinarian" direction. The Cambridge school of divines, including Cudworth, More, Smith, Wilkins, and others, manifested a bias of that kind; but Tillotson probably exerted an influence over the future archbishop. Chillingworth, through his writings, is also said to have moulded Tillotson's opinions. Yet he appeared on the Presbyterian side at the famous Savoy Conference, but was too young to take any important part in that assembly.

When the apostle visited Lystra on his second missionary journey, he heard the best reports of Timothy, and decided to take him with him as a companion. He was probably ordained at that time (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6), and circumcised (Acts xvi. 3). Timothy accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey to Macedonia, as it would seem from Acts xvi. 1–3, and as far as Silimel, and then continued that kind; but, when Silas, he remained behind for a time, while Paul went on to Athens. He afterwards met Paul at Athens, whence he was despatched on a mission to the church in Thessalonica (1 Thess. i. 2).

Yet he appeared on the Presbyterian side at the famous Savoy Conference, but was too young to take any important part in that assembly. How, when, or where, he was ordained is a mystery; but he was a preacher in 1661, and was offered the church of St. Mary Aldermanbury in 1662, when Edmund Calamy was deprived of it. After submitting to the Act of Uniformity, he was appointed to the rectory of Keddington, Suffolk, and soon afterwards preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He began as an author in 1664, by publishing a sermon on The Wisdom of being Religious, and another in 1666, on The Rule of Faith. It was as a preacher, and the author of sermons, that he became most distinguished; his plain, almost colloquial style, free from learned notations, appealed to reason as well as revelation in support of his opinions. He showed a strong Erastian tincture in a book entitled The Protestant Religion vindicated from the Charge of Singularity and Novelty, in which production he curiously said, that "no man is at liberty to affect the establishment of religion of a nation, though it be false." This brought him into trouble with many of his friends, and he soon retreated from such a strange position. He was a Whig in politics, opposed to the despotism of the Stuarts, and an advocate of ecclesiastical comprehension. He attended Lord William Russell on the scaffold, and bailed with joy the Revolution of 1688; after this he took part in the ecclesiastical commission for revising the Prayer-Book. Not without high preferment before, for he was dean successively of Canterbury and St. Paul's, he rose to the primacy of all England in 1691, where he endured many insults from the Nonjurors. Stricken with palsy, he died Nov. 22, 1694.

JOHN STOUGHTON.

TIMOTHY, the friend and co-laborer of Paul, was the son of a heathen father and a Jewish mother named Eunice (Acts xvii. 1; 2 Tim. i. 5). His home seems to have been at Lystra, where he enjoyed the pious instructions of his mother and grandmother Lois (2 Tim. i. 5), and was probably converted at Paul's visit on his first missionary journey. Paul frequently calls him his child (1 Cor. iv. 17; 1 Tim. i. 2, 18; 2 Tim. i. 2, etc.). At the time of his conversion he must have been very young, for Paul desired Paul afterwards, to let no man despise his youth (1 Tim. iv. 12), and to flee youthful lusts (2 Tim. ii. 22).
Old as the Creation, or the Gospel a Republication of the Law of Nature,—which appeared in 1761, when the writer was seven years old,—marks the culminating point of the deist controversy. The second volume of this work was withheld by Bishop Gibson, to whom the author had intrusted the manuscript. "It has not the force of style or the weight of thought which could secure a permanent place in the literary world," says Lachmann. "It was intended to be a reply. What is the object of the command of circumcision and sacrifices as implying a low and unworthy conception of God, and laid great stress upon the inconsistencies of the patriarchs, the wars of extermination, etc. Conyers, James Foster, Leland, and others attacked Tischendorf's work; and it was to it, more than to any other, that Bishop Butler's Analogy was meant to be a reply. Tischendorf's other works are, The Rights of the Christian Church Asserted, an attack upon High-Church assumptions (1766), and some pamphlets. See Lechler: Deismus; Farrar: Critical History of Free Thought, London and New York, 1863 (lect. iv.); Leslie Stephen: History of English Thought, 2d ed., New York, 1881, 2 vols. (i. pp. 134—163).

Tischendorf, Lobegott (Einothenus) Friedrich Constantin, b. Jan. 18, 1815, at Lengenfeld in Saxony; d. Dec. 7, 1874, at Leipzig. Tischendorf was the ninth child of his father, who, by birth a Thuringian, served as village physician and apothecary at Lengenfeld in the Saxon Vogtland. Leaving the village school in 1829, he entered the gymnasium at Plauen, and in 1834, at Easter, aged nineteen, he was matriculated at the university of Leipzig. At school he had been remarkable for his diligence and for his poetical talent. His interests were put into the shade by his work at the uncials of the Bible. But the young German did what Paris failed to do, reached the above-mentioned Codex Ephraemi, a biblical manuscript which had been erased, and re-written with the works of Ephraem Syrus. Tischendorf did not spoil the manuscript with chemicals: that was done by the librarians while he was a schoolboy at Plauen. From Paris he sped to Rome, only delaying at Basel to collate Ec.; and he remained in Italy about a year, working diligently at the uncial manuscripts of the Bible. But the first one, the Codex Vossianus, was profaned to him, because Mai had an edition under way; and it was only after the personal intervention of the Pope that he received permission to use it for three hours each, on two days, and to make a facsimile. He looked, however, with eagerness towards the East, and was so fortunate as to succeed in his plans for a journey thither.

On March 12, 1844, he sailed from Livorno for Alexandria, whence he proceeded to Cairo, and after examining the manuscripts in the Coptic monasteries of the Libyan Desert, he started for Sinai on May 12, and reached it by the 24th, remaining until June 1. Here he discovered the forty-three leaves of the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, now at Leipzig, which are a part of the famous Codex Sinaiticus; the leaves of it that he was not allowed to bring with him were the incitement to his later Eastern journeys. With a glance at Palestine, Constantinople, and Patmos, he passed through Vienna and Munich, and reached Leipzig in January, 1845, well supplied with treasures. He married Miss Angelika Zehme on Sept. 18, 1845. During this and the next few years he published the Old-Testament part of the Codex Ephraemi, and the facsimile of the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, the Monumenta Sacra Inedita, with fragments of seven New-Testament manusscripts, his two volumes of travels in the East, and the Codex Palatinus. He visited London, Paris, and Oxford again in 1849, and in the same year published a new edition of the Greek New Testament, with increased critical apparatus. The year 1850 dates the edition of the Codex Fritriciana; and his ordinary honorary, the Tische, and his edition of the Septuagint version of the Old Testament; while the next year saw the issue of his essay upon the origin and use of the Apocryphal Gospels, of his edition of the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, and of his Synopsis of the Gospels; and in 1852 the Codex Claromontanus appeared.

His second Eastern journey, in 1858, failed in its chief intention, namely, the recovery of the rest of the leaves of the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, but supplied him with a number of manuscripts in various languages, which now adorn the shelves of the libraries at Oxford, London, St. Petersburg, and Leipzig. The holidays of 1854, 1855, and 1856, were used for collations at Wolfenbüttel and Hamburg, at London, Oxford, and Cambridge, and at Munich, St. Gallen, and Zürich. A new collection of his Monumenta Sacra Inedita appeared in 1855, and this ran into a series not yet completed. A famous controversy took place, in the following year, about the forgeries of a sharp Greek named Simonides, who tried to sell his productions as old manuscripts. Simonides was arrested at Leipzig on Feb. 1. The large amount of material gathered together during these years was presented in a compact form, in his "seventh larger critical edition" of the Greek New Testament, which began to appear in 1856, and was completed at Christmas in 1858. Up to that date no edition had offered such a mass of valuable various readings.

After long effort, Tischendorf succeeded in gaining from the Russian Government the necessary pecuniary support and the scarcely less valuable moral support, of the Russian emperor, for a new Eastern journey; and he left Leipzig on Jan. 5, 1859, reaching Sinai on the 31st. He was disabled by a stroke of apoplexy, and never recovered sufficient power to work again. He died on Dec. 7, 1874, and was buried in the new cemetery at Leipzig. Five of his eight children are daughters; the eldest son, Paul Andreas, is second dragoman in the German embassy at Constantinople; the second, Johannes, is a lawyer, at present attached to the Imperial Law Office at Berlin; the third, Immanuel, is a physician, at present assisting a professor at Kiel.

Tischendorf was a man of unusual mental ability and diligence. His services to biblical students cannot easily be over-estimated and will be more and more gratefully acknowledged as the increase of distance in time removes the observer from the influence of that prejudice against him due to his estimate of himself. His editions of the New Testament, culminating in the eighth, are very valuable for the text presented, and still more for the vast amount of material which they place at the disposal of the student of the text; and the comparative agreement of Tregelles and of Westcott and Hort with him shows that his critical judgment was of a high order. A list of his works may be found in the writer's article in Biblical Dictionary (1856, pp. 568-569, 858-859); and in the Prolegomena to T. G. E. VIII. crit. mai., Leipzig, first part, 1884, pp. 7-22.

TITHE. Down to the seventeenth century it was generally held that all tithes, without exception, had been introduced by the Church on the basis of the Mosaic law, and had only been confirmed and extended by the State. The investigations, however, of Selden, Hugo Grotius, and others, proved that tithes (decima) were also known to the Roman law, and had in many cases been introduced from it into the economical organization of the State. Tithes obtained a part of the public land (ager publicus) in a conquered country paid a tenth of the revenue he derived from it as a rent to the State, and generally he transferred this system of rent to the colonists he settled on the soil. Nevertheless, when speaking of tithes as part of the ecclesiastical organization of the State, that which obtained chiefly in the Church, which, again, had borrowed the institution from the Synagogue. It was an old custom, older than Moses, to offer up one-tenth of one's income as a sacrifice.

TITHES.

2365 TITHES AMONG HEBREWS.

To God (Gen. xiv. 20). Moses himself ordered (Num. xviii. 21) that the Levites should be paid for their service in the sanctuary from the tithes which were paid by the other Israelites, and which, properly speaking, belonged to Jehovah (Lev. xxvii. 30-32), and that one-tenth of those tithes should be set apart for the Aaronic priests. At the same time the practice of the Mosaic law in general, were enforced with the greatest strictness, and from the Synagogue the whole arrangement was transferred to the Church. When the epistles of the apostles never mention tithes, the reason is simply, that in their time the voluntary offerings of the members still sufficed for the wants of the Church. But complaints arose as soon as the zeal began to grow lukewarm (Cyprian: De unitate ecclesiae, 23). In the East, all soon agreed in demanding the introduction of tithes in accordance with the precepts of the Old Testament (comp. Constit. Apostol., ii. 25, 45, vii. 29; Can. Apostol. 5, 9), and in the West, Jerome and Augustine spoke in favor of the same idea. It was recommended by the Second Council of Tours, 567 (Hardouin: Coll. Concil. iii. 368), and commanded, under penalty of excommunication, by the Second Council of Magon, 585 (Brusn: Concil Matiscon., ii. 5), and in the West, Jerome and Augustine spoke in favor of the same idea. It was recommended by the Second Council of Tours, 567 (Hardouin: Coll. Concil., iii. 368), and commanded, under penalty of excommunication, by the Second Council of Magon, 585 (Brusn: Concil Matiscon., ii. 5). Even the confessional was used to enforce the decree. Not to pay tithes was represented as a sin (see Pastinary Theodori, in Valerschleben; Bussordnungen, Halle, 1851). During the Carolingian age the institution became firmly established in the Frankish Empire; that is, in France and Germany. Charlemagne imposed it upon even the Roman curia. See Taxarrox, Ecclesiae, Paris, 1678-79 (p. ill. lib. i. cap. i.-xv.); Barthel: De decimis, in his Opuscula, Bamberg, 1548; Zacharias von Lichtenburg: Decimensonnen, Heilbronn, 1830; Birnbaum: Die rechtliche Natur d. TITHES AMONG THE HEBREWS (תְּנֵה, "a tenth"). Not only the Hebrews, but other ancient peoples, devoted the tenth part of their produce, cattle, or boot, to sacred purposes. The Phoenicians and Carthaginians sent to the Tyrian Hercules yearly a tithe (Diod. Sic., XX. 14); the Lydians offered a tithe of their booty (Herod., i. 89), as also the Greeks (especially Apollo and the Romans (to Hercules) applied a tenth to the gods. These, however, were voluntary rather than obligatory offerings. The Mosaic law of tithes was not an innovation, but a confirmation of a patriarchal practice. The earliest instances of tithes in the Old Testament are Abraham's offering of a tenth of the spoil to Melchisedec (Gen. xiv. 20), and Jacob's devotion of a tenth of his property (Gen. xxviii. 22). The tithed objects consisted of the fruits of the ground and cattle. The cattle were selected by the practice of having them pass under the rod (Lev. xxvii. 32); the tenth one being set apart, no matter whether it were bad or good, blemished or unblemished. The Talmud ordains that only the cattle born during the year, and not those that were bought, or received as presents, were to be tithed, and that, unless ten animals were born, there should be no offering. According to the Talmud, the sheep were tithed as they passed out of an enclosure, the tenth being touched with a rod steeped in vermilion. The alleged contradiction of the rules in Deuteronomy to those of Leviticus and Numbers cannot be made out. If Deuteronomy only prescribes vegetable tithes, and enjoins that they shall be eaten at the altar by the offerer and the Levites in company, these injunctions are to be regarded as a development of the previous rules (Winer); or the omission of reference to the tithal feast in Leviticus and Numbers is to be looked upon as due to the fact that its existence was taken for granted by them (Michaelis, Hengstenberg, Keil, etc.).

The principal tithal rules are as follows. (1) The tenth part of the fruits of the earth and cattle were given to the Levites, who received it as a compensation for their want of an inheritance, and might eat it at their several places of abode (Num. xviii. 21). (2) The Levites must give one-tenth part of this tithe to the priests (Num. xviii. 26); this latter portion after the exile (Neh. x. 38), and perhaps before (2 Chron. xxxi. 12), had to be delivered at Jerusalem. (3) A second tenth was eaten at the tabernacle, at a joyous feast (Deut. xiv. 22 sqq.); the offerings, if they were ceremonially clean, and the Levites, joining therein. In case the distance was so great as to make the transportation of the tenth part inexpedient, it might be converted into money, and the money used again in the purchase of the necessary vegetables and meat for the feast (Deut. xiv. 25, 26). (4) Every third year this titheal feast was celebrated by the people at their homes (Deut. xxvi. 12); the Levites, stranger, fatherless, and widows being invited thereto.

The tithes were considerably neglected after the exile (Neh. xii. 10; Mal. iii. 8, 10); and, at the later period of Roman rule, high priests often laid violent hands on the priestly tithes (Joseph., Ant. XX. 8, 8; 9, 2). The Pharisees, on the other hand, insisted upon the tithal rules as conditions of admission into the synagogue, and made the exact and minute application of them. Our Lord refers to their particular care in this regard (Matt. xxiii. 23).

TITTAMANN, Johann August Heinrich, a distinguished German theologian of moderate rationalistic tendencies; was b. in Langenalza, Aug. 1, 1773; d. in Leipzig, Dec. 30, 1831. He studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and was made professor of theology at the latter university. His principal works were, Instituto symbolica ad sentientiam eccles. evangel., 1811, Uber Supranaturalismus, Rationalismus u. Atheismus, 1816, and an edition of the Symbolik Boessis, 1817.

TITULAR BISHOP, see as Bishop in partibus. See Episcopus in partibus.

TITUS, the “fellow-helper” of Paul; a Gentile (Gal. ii. 3); was probably one of Paul’s converts (Tit. i. 4), but was never circumcised (Gal. ii. 3). He is not mentioned in the Acts, and first appears in connection with the apostle on his journey to the Council of Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 1-3). We next find him at Ephesus during Paul’s third missionary journey. Paul sent him thence, with a companion, on a mission to Corinth (2 Cor. vii. 14, xii. 19). After meeting Paul in Macedonia (2 Cor. vii. 9), he was sent again to Corinth (2 Cor. vii. 16, 18-24). Our next information about Titus is found in Paul’s Epistle to him. At the time the apostle wrote, Titus was in Crete (Tit. i. 5), where the apostle had left him after his release from the first Roman imprisonment. Titus was with Paul in the second Roman imprisonment, and was the last who visited him (2 Tim. iv. 19). According to tradition (Euseb., III. 4; Constitutions Apostolicæ, vii. 49; Hieronymus on Tit. ii. 7; Theodoret on 1 Tim. iii. 13), Titus died as Bishop of Crete.

A. KöHLER.

TITUS, Bishop of Bostra in Arabia: a distinguished opponent of Manicheism; d., according to Jerome, in the reign of Valens. Nothing further is known of his personal history than that he came into a personal conflict with Julian the Apostate, who, in a letter to him accused him of exciting the Christians to acts of violence against the heathen. This letter, which falls in the year 362, was written from Antioch. The great reputation of Titus in the early church rests upon his work against the Manicheans. Jerome mentions it twice, and speaks of its author as one of the most important church-writers of his time (Ep. 70, 4, ed. Villari). Sozomen (iii. 14) likewise speaks of him as one of the most distinguished men of his day. In this work, Titus denies the conceivable of two beginnings, admits the distinction of good and evil only in the moral sphere, denies that death is an evil for the good, and starts from the general proposition of Plato concerning the beauty of the world. The three books which are preserved of this work were originally known only by the Latin translation of Turrianus, but have since been edited from a Greek manuscript at Hamburg, in the Thesaurus Canitii, and by Gallandi, in his Bibliotheca, v. 289 sqq. The Commentaries on Luke and the Orations upon the passover, edited by Gallandi, and ascribed to him, are probably spurious. See Tillemont: Mémoires pour servir à l’histoire ecclésiastique; Baur: D. Manichäische Religionssystem, p. 9; Neander: Church History, vol. ii.

TOBIT. See Apocrypha.

TOBLER, Titus, b. at Stein in the canton of Appenzell, Switzerland, June 25, 1806; d. Jan. 21, 1871, in Munich. He studied medicine at Zurich and Vienna, and undertook for medical purposes a journey in Palestine (1835-36): Lustreise im Morgenland, Zurich, 1836. Having become interested in the geographical and topographical investigations of the Holy Land, he made three more journeys to Palestine, the first in 1845; and as the literary results of this journey appeared, Bethlehem, St. Gall, 1849; Plan of Jerusalem, 1850; Golgotha, 1851; Die Siloahquelle und der Oelberg, 1852 (3rd ed., 1856); Topographie von Jerusalem und seinen Umgebungen, Berlin, 1853-54, 2 vols. After the second he published Planographie von Jerusalem, 1856, and Dritte Wanderung nach Palästina, 1858. In 1865 he undertook his last journey to Palestine, and published his Nahreiss, Berlin, 1868. See also his Bibliographia Geographica Palestina, Leipzig, 1867, Palestine Descriptions ex Sveculo iv. r., et vi., Leipzig, 1869, and ex Sveculo viii., ix., xii., et xc., Leipzig, 1874. His life was written by Heim, Zurich, 1879.

TODD, Henry John, Church of England; b. about 1763; d. at Stettin, Yorkshire, Dec. 24, 1845. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1786; rector in London; keeper of manuscripts at Lambeth Palace, 1803; rector of Stettin, 1820; prebendary of York, 1830; archdeacon of Cleveland, 1832; and queen’s chaplain. He edited Milton (1801), Spenser (1805), Johnson’s Dictionary (1805, 1813), with the assistance of Leech, Dictionary of Canterbury, Canterbury, 1793; Vindication of our Authorized Translation and Translators of the Bible, London, 1819; Memoirs of Rt. Rev. Brian Walton, 1821, 2 vols.; Life of Archbishop Cranmer, 1831, 2 vols.; Authentic Account of our Authorized Translation of the Bible, 1838.
TODD, James Henthorn, D.D., Irish Church; b. at Dublin, April 23, 1805; d. at Silverace, Rathfarnham, near Dublin, June 28, 1869. He was graduated B.A. at Trinity College, Dublin, 1825; Kew College, London, 1828-30; or, in the Apocrypha of St. John, 1848; Historical Memoirs of the Successors of St. Patrick and Archbishops of Armagh, 1861, 2 vols.; Memoir of St. Patrick's Life and Mission, 1863; edited some of Wiclif's writings (see literature under that art.), and greatly distinguished himself as an Irish antiquary.

TODD, John, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Rutland, Vt., Oct. 9, 1800; d. at Pittsfield, Mass., Aug. 24, 1873. He was graduated at Yale College, 1822; studied four years at Andover Theological Seminary; was pastor in Groton, Mass., 1826-31; at Pittsfield, Mass., 1836-43; at Tisbury, 1843; First Congregational Church, Philadelphia, to 1842; Pittsfield, to 1872. He offered prayer at the driving of the last spike of the Central Pacific Railroad. He was a man of national reputation, and the author of many excellent and widely circulated books, among which may be mentioned Lectures to Children, Northampton, 1834 and 1858, 3 series (translated into French, German, Greek, etc., printed in raised letters for the blind, and used as a school-book for the liberated slaves in Sierra Leone); Student's Manual, 1835, new English edition; London, 1877; Index Rerum, 1835 (prepared for noting books read); Sabbath-school Teacher, 1838; Simple Sketches, Pittsfield, 1843, 2 vols.; Future Punishment, New York, 1833; Hints and Thoughts for Christians, 1867; Woman's Rights, 1867; The Sunset-land, or the Great Pacific Slope, 1870. A collected edition of his books appeared in London, 1853, later edition, 1879. See John Todd, The Story of his Life told mainly by Himself, New York, 1876.

TOLAND, John, a distinguished English deist; was b. near Londonderry, Ireland, Nov. 30, 1699; d. at Putney, March 11, 1722. He was born of Roman-Catholic parentage (was charged with being the illegitimate son of a priest), changed his original name, Janus Junius, at school, and became a Protestant at the age of sixteen. He studied at the universities of Glasgow, Edinburgh (where he graduated M.A., 1709), and Leyden, where he studied theology with a view to becoming a dissenting minister. He spent several years at Oxford, and in 1696 published his principal work, Christianity not Mysterious (2d ed., Amsterdam, 1702), which made a great sensation. The conclusions of the book are not very distinct; but the author defines that to be "mysterious" which is "above," not "contrary to," reason, and declares that Christianity contains nothing "mysterious" (that is, not explained). His defense is himself a good Christian and a good Churchman. The book was burnt by the hangman at Dublin on Sept. 11, 1697, Toland being in the city at the time. "The Irish Parliament," says South, "to their immortal honor, sent him packing, and, without the help of a fagot, soon made the king dom too hot for him." From this time on, he led a Bohemian life, fitting between London and the Continent; wrote some political pamphlets favor ing the claims of the house of Brunswick; spent some time at Berlin in a semi-official position, and died a pensioner of Lord Molesworth. He defended his Christianity not Mysterious, in an Apology for Mr. Toland, London, 1697, and Vin dicetius liberius, London, 1702. He published an edition of Milton's Works, Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous, with a Life, London, 1697, 1698, 3 vols.; Ammon, or a Defence of Milton's Life, 1699 (construed into an attack upon the canon); Tetrarhymus, 1720; Impartial History of Servetus, 1724, etc. An historical account of his life and writings appeared in 1722, and a Life by Hudleston, Monrose, 1814. His Posthumous Works were published, London, 1726, in 2 vols., with a Life by Des Maizeaux. See LELAND: Deist. Writers; LECHLER: Deismus; A. S. TOLEDO, Councils of. The old Spanish city of Toledo (Toletum), on the Tagus, (forty-two miles south-west of Madrid, with a population to-day of eighteen thousand, and still the seat of an archbishop), early became the seat of a bishopric, and was the scene of numerous church synods. The First Council was called by Bishop Patronus, or Petruinus, of Toledo, in 406. With eighteen other bishops, he passed twenty canons against the Priscillians. A second council was probably held there in 447, in obedience to the demand of Pope Leo the Great, that the Spanish bishops should take further measures against the Priscillians. The bishops of four provinces constructed a creed in Toledo, in which it is to be noticed that the phrase, "proceeding from the Father and the Son" (a patre filioque procedens), occurs. In the eighteen anathemas that are appended to it are found the best materials for the knowledge of the doctrines of the Priscillians. The Roman dominion in Spain was overthrown in the latter part of the fifth century by the West Goths, who ruled for fifty years from Toulouse as the seat of power. They were zealous Arians, but did not institute severe persecutions against the Catholics. The Second Council of Toledo (synod. Toledoana II.) was held in 531 (or 527), and passed five unimportant canons. In 531 the king of the West Goths took up his residence in Toledo. This change gave to the city great importance as a civil and ecclesiastical centre. In 582 the Arian King Leuwigild held a synod of the Arian bishops in the city to take measures for the conversion of the Catholics. But the Goths, instead of converting the Catholics, were themselves converted; the Catholic bishops having full control of the people who were Catholics, and never ceasing to denounce the Gothic rulers as foreigners, barbarians, heretics, etc. King Reccared entered the Goths in 588, and in 589 summoned the celebrated Third Council of Toledo. After three days of fasting and prayer, the assembly held its first sitting May 8, being opened by the king, who used in his address the phrase, procedit a patre et a filio ("proceedeth from the Father and the Son"). He announced, as the reason for his having convened... the synod, his desire to lay down a confession of his orthodoxy. He pronounced the anathema of Arius, and expressed his acceptance of the Creed of Nicea, Constantinople (with the addition of the statement, "proceeding from the Father and the Son"), and Chalcedon. The Goths who took part in the synod condemned Arianism in twenty-three articles. The synod also passed twenty-three articles bearing upon the interests of the church, and took measures against the Jews and heretics. The Fourth Council of Toledo was called by King Wamba in 653, and convened Dec. 16, 653. Fifty-two bishops were present, and Isidore of Seville acted as president. The king, who had dethroned his predecessor Suintila, threw himself prostrate before the bishops, and with tears begged their intercession with God for himself. The synod passed seventy-five articles confirming the rights of the king, pronouncing eternal excommunication upon all who engaged in rebellion against the throne, etc. The Fifth Council of Toledo convened in 656, at the command of the King Chintila, who sought thereby to confirm his power. The Sixth Council of Toledo was summoned by the same king, in 658. Fifty-two bishops were present. All crimes against the king were declared punishable with eternal damnation. The Seventh Council of Toledo was held in 646, under Chindaswinth, who had risen to the throne by violence. In the collections of the acts of the councils, decrees about the offices of archdeacon, presbyter, sacristan, etc., are attributed to this council, which have no connection with it whatever. The Eighth Council of Toledo was opened by King Receswinth, on Dec. 16, 653. Fifty-two bishops, twelve abbots, sixteen knights, and ten episcopal vicars, were present. The council re-affirmed the sacredness of the oath of fealty to the king, and took measures against the Jews and heretics. The Ninth Council of Toledo convened Nov. 2, 655, transacted no important business. The Tenth Council met in 656, and established the celebration of the feast of the Annunciation of Mary on Dec. 18. The Eleventh Council of Toledo was called by King Wamba in 657, took measures against the licentiousness of the priests, and recommended them to study the Bible assiduously. In 658 Erwig, who had come to the throne by intrigue, called the Twelfth Council of Toledo, in order to have his claims to the crown, his orthodoxy. He pronounced the anathema of the priests (sodomy, etc.), and the worship of trees, stones, etc., were condemned; and it was ordered that every day of the year (Good Friday excepted) mass should be celebrated in every church for the king and his family. The Seventeenth Council was called by King Erwig in 660, and takes its name from being a conspiracy against the king, in which the Jews were said to have had the principal part. It was ordered that the Jews should be deprived of their property, and with their wives and children put under the protection of Christians as slaves; Jewish maidens were to marry Christian men; and Jewish men, Christian maidens. The Eighteenth and last Council of Toledo was held probably in 701. Its decrees are lost. Soon after its adjournment the kingdom of the West Goths succumbed to the Mohammedans, and for several centuries the Spanish Church had no opportunity to hold synods.

Looking over the history of the councils of Toledo, we find that the right was conceded to the king of calling and opening the synods, and authorizing their decrees. Civil affairs were adjudicated as well as ecclesiastical matters, and the prime occasion of many of the synods was the settlement of some question concerning the crown. The synods had become parliaments. The metropolitans of Toledo secured great power, but was not regarded as the primate of the Spanish Church. See CENNI: De antiq. eccles. Hispaniae; HEBELE: Concilien geschichte; [GAMS: Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, 1892 sqq.]

TOLEDOTH JEBHU (יוֹלְדוֹת יְחֶבּוּ, "generations [i.e., history] of Jesus"), a Jewish apocryphon of the middle age, made up of "fragmentary Talmudic legends," which pretends to be a life of Jesus, but is in reality a clumsy and stupid fiction. Its author is unknown. Luther shows up the book in his usual vigorous style in his Schem Hamphoras. There are two widely different recensions of it. Wagenseil published a Latin translation of one of his Tela Ignea Satane, Altdorf, 1880, and Huldrich of his Historia Jeshuah Nazareni a Judaeis blaspheme corpora, Leyden, 1705. According to the first, Jesus was born B.C. 106-79; according to the second, B.C. 70-4. After studying at Salamanca, he became professor there of philosophy, and was transferred to Rome, where he acted in the same capacity. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1624; entered holy orders; soon became famous for his preaching, especially among the Puritans, and was successively lecturer at St. Martin's, Oxford, preacher at Worcester, 1630, shortly afterwards at Leominster (Lemster), and 1641 at Bristol; master of the Temple, London, 1647; preacher at Beaudley, 1647. Between Tomes and Baxter there was incessant controversy, especially upon infant baptism and church polity. In 1658 Tomes was appointed one of the triers for the approbation of public ministers, and removed to London. In 1658 he married a rich widow, and retired from pastorale duties. He spent the rest of his days in quietness and prosperity. He was a vigorous, learned, and unwearied opponent of infant baptism. He had public debates upon this topic with Baxter and others, and wrote numerous treatises upon it. For a list of his writings and further account of the man, see Wood: Athen. Oxon. (ed. TOMLINE, George, D.D., Church of England; b. at Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, Oct. 9, 1750; d. at Winchester, Nov. 14, 1827. Graduated at Cambridge, he was successively rector of Corwen (1782), prebend of St. Peter's, Westminster (1784), rector of Sudbury-cum-Offord, Suffolk (1785), bishop of Lincoln, with the deanery of St. Paul's (January, 1787), and finally bishop of Winchester (July, 1820). His family name was Pertyman, but he changed his own name to Tomline in order to inherit a considerable fortune. He left two hundred thousand pounds. He is best known by his Elements of Christian Theology, London, 1799, 2 vols. (14th ed., 1843; vol. i. separately printed as Introduction to the Study of the Bible; rev. ed., N.Y., vol. i., 1882, p. 224, and his note Glossolalia, pp. 234—242.

TONSURE, The, denotes the practice of the Roman-Catholic and Greek churches, by which a portion of the skull of the priest is shaved. It precedes the consecration to clerical orders, and is a specific mark of distinction between the clergy and the laity (Conc. Trid., xxxiii. 4). He who has once received the tonsure must always retain it. It may be conferred upon candidates in their seventh year, but in this case they may not exercise spiritual functions till they are fourteen years old (Conc. Trid., xxxiii. 3). The tonsure is regarded as a symbol of Christ's crown of thorns, the regal dignity of the priesthood, and the renunciation of the world, and is sometimes based upon Acts xxii. 24, 26, 1 Cor. xi. 14, 15. It is held that Paul and Peter practised it. It is an historical fact that in the fourth century, neither monks nor priests practised the tonsure [so also Wetzer and Welte]. The cutting of the beard, and hair of the head, was forbidden by the Council of Carthage (388); and Jerome, in his Commentary on Ezek. xlviii., says that the Christian priest was not to appear with shorn head, lest he be confounded with the priests of Isis and Serapis, and other heathen divinities. The custom of cutting the hair at first prevailed.
among the penitent, and was taken up by the monks in the fifth century. They shaved the hair down to the chin; and this practice was considered symbolical of penitence. From the sixth century on, the priests followed the practice. Three principal styles of tonsure have prevailed. The Roman tonsure consists of the shaving of the entire skull, except a ring of hair extending all around the skull. The tonsure of the Keltic or British tonsure, called also the tonsure of James or Simon Magnus, consists in shaving the head bare in front of a line drawn across the skull from ear to ear. The style of the tonsure formed a subject of most violent controversy in England after the arrival of Augustine and his monks, until the final victory of the Roman type of Christianity over the old Keltic Church in the eighth century.

The tonsure is conferred by the bishops, cardinal priests, and abbots (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 10). The Pope may also vest the right in priests. [See BERKE: Historia Ecclesiastica, iv. 1; MARTENS: De antiqua eccles. rit.; art. "Tonsur," in WETZER U. WELTE.]

TOPLADY, Augustus Montague, was b. at Farnham in Surrey, Nov. 4, 1740; and d. in London, Aug. 11, 1773. He was "awakened" in a barn in Ireland, 1755, and "led into a full and clear view of the doctrines of grace," 1758. He was ordained 1762, and was vicar of Broad Hembury, Devonshire, from 1768 till his death. He published The Church of England vindicated from the Charge of Arminianism (1774, 2 vols.) and some sermons, and wrote many articles in the Gospel Magazine. His works appeared in six volumes, 1825. They are filled with the most advanced doctrine and the most conscientiously acrimonious controversy.

His intellect was precocious. In 1759, at the age of nineteen, he issued in Dublin Poems on Sacred Subjects, pp. 136. His later hymns are better than his polemic, and have often received credit for some of their best. His own poetry was better than his polemic, and has often "a peculiarly ethereal spirit." Some of his hymns are heavily weighted with divinity; but his "Rock of Ages" and "Jesus at the Cross" are classics. He was not a blind Arminian. His "Rock of Ages" is the only one of his hymns in any language. For sketch, see Bishop RYLE: Christian Leaders of a Hundred Years Ago, London, 1869.

TORQUEMADA (TURRECREMATA), the name of two distinguished Spanish ecclesiastics.

1. Juan de, b. in Valladolid, 1383, educated there and in Paris; appointed (1431) by Eugenius IV. "master of the holy palace," sent by him to the Council of Basel, and made cardinal in 1439. He wrote De conceptione dei pare Mariae, libri viii. (Rome, 1457, ed. with preface and notes, by Dr. E. B. Pusey, Lond., 1869, etc.), and lived at Rome, Sept. 1448. See LEDERER: Der spanische Cardinal Johann von Torquemada, sein Leben u. seine Schriften, Freiburg-im-Br., 1879. — II. Thomas de, the famous inquisitor, was b. at Valladolid, 1420; d. at Avila, Sept. 1498. He belonged to the order of St. Dominic, and gave himself up wholly to the organization of the Spanish Inquisition, and overcame the scruples of Isabella. It was at the request of Ferdinand and herself that the "Holy Office" of the Inquisition was created by Sixtus IV., Nov. 1, 1478. When this Pope determined to appoint an inquisitor-general, the appointment fell on Torquemada (1482). The laws and methods of the Spanish Inquisition were his work. The laws appeared in Madrid, 1576, with the title Copiacion de las instrucciones del office de la santa inquisicion, hechas por el muy reverendo senor Fray Thomas de Torquemada, etc. It was due largely to him that the large sum offered by the Jews was not accepted by Ferdinand, and that they were expelled from Spain in 1492. Torquemada's name has become synonymous with cold-blooded cruelty. LONGFELLOW has a fine poem on the subject; and PRESCOTT has given a picture of him in his Ferdinand and Isabella. See INQUISITION.

TOREY, Joseph, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Rowley, Mass., Feb. 2, 1797; d. at Burlington, Vt., No. 26, 1867. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1816, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1819; pastor at Royalton, Vt., 1819—27; and of intellectual and moral philosophy from 1842 till his death. He was president of the university from 1863 to 1865. He edited the Remains of President James Marsh, 1843, the Select Sermons of President Worthington Smith, 1861, prefacing each volume with a carefully prepared Memoir; wrote A Theory of Fine Art (lectures, New York, 1847), and of intellectual and moral service was his masterly translation of Neander's General History of the Christian Religion and Church, Boston, 12th ed., 1851, 5 vols., with model index volume.

TOSSANUS, Petrus (Pierre Toussaint), b. at Saint-Laurent, Lorraine, in 1499; d. at St. Ippolyte, Cantal, in 1573. He was ordained a priest in 1526. His collected works were published at Basel, Paris, and Rome, and were made a canon at the Cathedral of Meiz. But, when the perse-TOULMIN, Joshua, D.D., English Unitarian; b. in London, May 11, 1740; d. at Birmingham, July 23, 1815. He was a Baptist minister at Taunton, 1765; but, becoming a Unitarian, he was one of Dr. Priestley's successors at Birmingham. He was the author of several books, of which may be mentioned, Memoirs of Faustus Socinus, London, 1777; Review of Life of John Biddle, 1789; History of the Town of Taunton, Taunton, 1781; Biographical Tribute to Dr. Priestley, London, 1800; Samuel Bournes, 1809; Historical View of the Protestant Dissenters in England under King William, 1814; and edited, with Life, Neal's History of the Puritans, 1794-97, 5 vols., the basis of all subsequent editions.

TOULOUSE, Synods of. Many ecclesiastical councils have been held in Toulouse, some of which are important. At the suggestion of Louis, a synod was convened in Toulouse, probably in 829. The decrees are lost. One was held in 883 to adjust the complaint which Jews had made to King Carlmann, of being abused by clergy and laity. One in 1056, summoned by Pope Urban, consisted of eighteen bishops, and passed thirty-one canons forbidding simony, insisting upon the rule of celibacy, and placing the age of ordination to priests' orders at thirty, and to deacon's orders at twenty-five. The synod of 1118 was concerned with the inception of a crusade against the Moors in Spain. The synod which Pope Calixtus II. presided over in person reiterated the laws against simony, confirmed the right of the bishops to tithes, etc. The synod of 1161, at which the kings of France and England, and legates of Pope Alexander III. and his rival, Victor III., were present, declared Alexander pope, and pronounced excommunion upon Victor. The synod of 1210 forbade the conferment of offices upon heretics, and forbade all work upon church-festival days which are mentioned by name.

The synod of 1229, in the pontificate of Gregory IX., is important. It obliged archbishops and bishops, or priests, and two or three laymen, to bind themselves by oath to search out heretics, and bring them to punishment. A heretic's house was to be destroyed. Penitent heretics were to be obliged to wear a cross on their right and left side, and might not receive an office until the Pope, or his legate should absolve the party of his faith. All men of fourteen years and over, and all women of twelve years and over, were to be required to deny all connection with heresy and heretics. This oath was to be repeated every two years. Laymen were also forbidden the possession of the Old and New Testament; and the suppression of vernacular translations was expressly commended. In 1590 a Council of Toulouse declared the Tridentine Decrees binding, and took up various subjects, such as relics, the consecration of churches, oratories, the administration of hospitals, etc. As late as 1850 a provincial synod was held at Toulouse, under the presidency of Archbishop d'Alstos, which declared against the tendencies of modern thought, indifference, socialism, etc. See HABDUIN, MANSI, etc.; and for a sketch of Toulouse's religious history, Vincents, Life of St. Vincent de Paul, New York, 1883, pp. 211-232.

TOURNEMINE, René Joseph, b. at Rennes, April 26, 1681; d. in Paris, March 16, 1735. He was educated by the Jesuits; entered their order, taught theology and philosophy in several of their houses, and was in 1656 placed at the head of the Journal de Toulouse, which he conducted till 1718 with great moderation and tact. He also published in 1710 an excellent edition of the Brevis exposition sensus literalis totius scripturae (Cologne, 1630, 2 vols.) of the Jesuit Menochius (b. at Padua, 1576; d. at Rome, Feb. 4, 1655); but his principal work, De Deisme, remained unfinished. See Journal de Toulouse, September, 1735.

TOURS, Synods of. The first synod of Tours of which any account has been preserved convened in 401, passed thirteen canons re-affirming the decrees of former synods, forbidding priests to whom the privilege of marriage was accorded to marry widows, pronouncing excommunication upon priests who renounced their orders, etc. The synod of 567 met with the consent of King Charibert, and passed twenty-seven canons regulating matters of church-discipline. The synod of 813 was convened by the order of Charlemagne, and passed fifty-one canons defining the duties of bishops, putting the ordination of priests in their thirtieth year, regulating the relation of nuns and monks, forbidding markets on Sunday, etc. The canons close with a profession of absolute submission to Charlemagne. Another synod was held at the time the remains of St. Martin were conveyed from Auvergne to Tours,—either in 912 or 887. The synod of 942 is barely mentioned, and that of 1055 was convened with reference to the views of Berengar concerning the Lord's Supper, which had been condemned as heretical. Berengar on that occasion renounced his views.

In 1090 the cardinal legate Stephen convened a synod at Tours, which concerned itself with the purchase and sale of church-offices, the licentiousness and concubinage of the clergy, etc. The council of 1096 was occupied with the release of King Philip of France from the ban of the church, and with the preparation for the first crusade. In 1163 Pope Alexander III. presided in person over a synod at Toulouse which excommunicated the antipope, Victor IV., and recognized his own claims. The synods of 1236 and 1282 were concerned with matters of church-discipline. The important synod of 1410 took up the great conflict which was then raging between Louis XI. of France and the belligerent Pope, Julius II. The chancellor of Louis opened the council with complaints against the Pope, and in the King's name presented several questions to the assembled dignitaries bearing upon the relations of states to the papal see. The law of conciliation, whether the Pope might carry on war against princes who with their lands acknowledge allegiance to the church. The synod answered that the Pope had no right to begin such a war. A second question con-
TRACTARIANISM.

The series consisted of ninety tracts, of which Newman wrote twenty-four, and Keble also a goodly number. The movement was essentially a revival of medieval ecclesiasticism and scholasticism, in protest to evangelicalism, and to that political liberalism which abolished the Test Act in 1828, and ten of the Irish bishops in 1833, whose occupants had voted against the Reform Bill. Froude urged the claim of celibacy, fasting, relics, and monasticism. But the tendency of the political movements of their time was directly against such a return of the middle age, the little coterie at Oxford published The Churchman's Manual (1833), in which they made prominent the three points of the idea of the church, the importance of the sacraments, and the significance of the priesthood. On July 14, 1833, Keble preached an assize sermon upon National Apostasy, from 1 Sam. xii. 23. This sermon Newman regarded as the actual start of the movement. Upon July 28–29, 1833, Rose, Froude, Keble, Newman, Palmer, and Perceval held a conference at Hadleigh, to revise the Manual, and devise a plan of action. It was then agreed that the two points to be aimed at were the maintenance of the doctrine of apostolic succession, and the preservation of the Prayer-Book from Socinian alteration. In September, Keble drew up the programme of the party; and on Sept. 9, 1833, the tract Times (designed to indoctrinate the laity in Catholic theology and polity) appeared, and the coterie, through their connection with the series of Tracts, received the name "Tractarians," as the writers or compilers of thetracts themselves, and as the indorsers of the sentiments advocated. The first tract was by Newman, entitled Thoughts on the Ministerial Commission. The Churchman's Manual had been sent to all the Scottish bishops, and approved by them, while the Archbishop of Canterbury did not object to its publication. And the first tracts also found a warm reception. They were looked upon as valuable allies in the defence of the Established Church against the insidious attacks of the Liberals. By November, 1835, seventy of them had appeared. The first sixty-six consist of extracts from the Fathers, Beveridge, Bull, Cosin, and Wilson, with a few original tracts. The succeeding twenty-four are longer, and more elaborate. In the following year a remarkable movement in the Established Church of England, due to the so-called Tracts for the Times, a series of pamphlets published at Oxford from 1833 to 1841. The leaders of the movement were all Oxford men, and members of Oriel. They were John Keble, John Henry Newman, Richard Hurst, Edward Bouverie Pusey, and Isaac Williams. The series was a remarkable movement in the Established Church of England, due to the so-called Tracts for the Times, a series of pamphlets published at Oxford from 1833 to 1841. The leaders of the movement were all Oxford men, and members of Oriel. They were John Keble, John Henry Newman, Richard Hurst, Edward Bouverie Pusey, and Isaac Williams.
great pamphlet war was thus opened; but the Tractarians were defeated. In 1837 the Roman tendency of the movement more plainly manifested itself, especially in Isaac Williams's tract (No. 80), On Reserve in Communicating Religious Knowledge. It advocated a revival of the discipline of the ancient Church, i.e., the idea that there were doctrines which should not be publicly taught; and that the Bible should not be promiscuously circulated. Keble's tracts were in similar strain. The effect of such writing was twofold,—the public was dismayed, and certain members of the Tractarian party avowed their intention to become Romanists. In 1838 the Library of the Fathers (see Patristics) was started by the Tractarians, and in 1840 the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, which contained old High-Church writings of the Church of England who more or less sympathized with the views of the Tractarians. But the decision was the setting of the tide towards Rome, that Newman made a vigorous effort to turn it by his famous tract (No. 90), Remarks on Certain Passages in the Thirty-nine Articles, in which he endeavored to show how it was possible to interpret the Thirty-nine Articles in the interest of Catholicism. He maintained that “the sixth and twentieth articles, on Holy Scripture and the authority of the Church, were not inconsistent with the Anglo-Catholic idea; that the true rule of faith is not in Scripture alone, but in apostolic tradition; that Art. XI., on justification by faith only, did not exclude the doctrine of baptismal justification; and of justification by works as well; that Arts. XIX. and XXI., on the Catholic Church and general councils, did not mean that the true church is not infallible, but that the idea of express supernatural privilege, that councils properly called shall not err, lies beyond the scope of these articles, or at any rate beside their determination; that Art. XXII., on purgatory, pardons, images, relics, and invocation of saints, only condemned the Romish doctrine concerning them, not any other doctrine on these subjects, consequently not the Anglo-Catholic; that Art. XXV. did not deny the grace incident to sacramental and extreme unction, were sacraments, but only that they were not sacraments in the same sense as baptism and the Lord's Supper; that Art. XXXII., on purgatory, pardons, images, relics, and invocation of saints, only condemned the Romish doctrine concerning them, not any other doctrine on these subjects, consequently not the Anglo-Catholic; that Art. The articles on masses and clerical celibacy were in like manner explained away” (Stoughton). The tract appeared in March, 1841: Newman acknowledged on the 16th. The violent controversy which the tract occasioned led to the "discontinuance" of the series.

The tract, although nominally an attempt to discredit Rome, was document as in reality leading towards it. Then came a sifting of the party. Those who were content to stay in the Church of England drew all the closer together. They were such men as Pusey, Williams, Keble, and Perceval. But soon the movement swept away from this middle position such leading spokesmen as New of the Anglican Church, i.e., the true church as real, objective; truth is really objectively given; the gift of the Holy Spirit is really transmitted through the apostolic succession; Christ is present in the Eucharist, so also in worship. The external must have a real meaning: it must express some idea. A change was therefore made in the accessories of worship. Everywhere beauty is architecture, in vestments, in music (vocal and instrumental), was insisted upon, with the result of striking improvement. Enormous sums have been spent in these directions. Cathedrals have been restored, religious houses have been erected, and the appointments of the sanctuary multiplied and altered.

And Tractarianism powerfully affected the religious life of thousands. The church was to be served by organizations for religious and philanthropic action, and these have sprung into existence. The influence of doctrine upon life was emphasized; daily duties were explained and enforced; and so the movement proved a great good to the community. But it has also been a fruitful source of secession to Rome, and has produced an agnostic and rationalistic re-action in the Church of England.

TRACT SOCIETIES, Religious. I. Great Britain.—The maintenance and diffusion of religious opinion by means of pamphlets or tracts is a habit older than the invention of printing; and perhaps John Wyclif was the greatest tract-writer that ever lived. But it has been reserved to modern times to make full use of the same method as a means of evangelization; and tract societies are now recognized by all churches as among their most effective instruments for good. Among the pioneers in this work, a foremost place must be given to Hannah More, whose Cheap Repository tracts, towards the close of the eighteenth century, circulated by hundreds of thousands, served greatly to counteract the influence of the irreligious, anti-social, cheap literature which at that time was diffused, chiefly by hawkers, throughout Great Britain. The Book Society for promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor had been founded as early as 1778; but it was not until in 1789, that the formation of the Religious Tract Society in London, chiefly through the influence of the Rev. George Burder of Coventry and his coadjutors; the Rev. Joseph Hughes of Battersea being the first secretary. The object set forth in the first minute was "to form a society for the purpose of printing and distributing religious tracts." The first meeting was held in Surrey Chapel, the Rev. Rowland Hill himself exerting much influence in the establishment of the society. Two principles from the first were recognized: first, that there is a common Christian faith, in the expression and enforcement of which all evangelical believers may unite, irrespective of ecclesiastical or doctrinal distinctions; and, secondly, that this faith may be set forth in so brief a compass and so simple a way, that even the smallest tract may contain the essentials of saving truth. A tract, in other words, no less imperative than this was the "Rational Divinity." Through the indefatigable energy of Mr. George Stokes, a gentleman of fortune (founder, in 1840, of the well-known Parker Society), who

long gave his editorial services to the society, the chief practical and experimental works of the English Reformers, and of their great successors in the seventeenth century, were issued mostly in an abridged form. To the writings of Wicliff, Tyndale, Latimer, Becon, and many more who took part in the struggle against papal domination, were added the choicest works of Baxter, Howe, Owen, Flavel, Shibbes, Charnock, and a host of others, mostly abbreviated to suit the taste or the leisure of modern times. These writings had for a while a very large circulation, and contributed not a little to sustain among thoughtful readers the relish for the old English Protestant theology. Other publishers have since taken up the work, and the fashion of abridgments has passed away; so that in a great measure this part of the society's labor has been superseded. Besides preparing these editions, Mr. Stokes also wrote a considerable number of manuals on biblical history and antiquities in a form suited to young people and Sunday-school teachers; entering thus upon a wide field, which has since been largely filled by others, mostly by the late Mr. J.0seph Gurney, treasurer of the society, who, besides providing all expenses of editorial labor, had the stereotype plates prepared at his own cost. This work has stood the test of thirty-two years; and, notwithstanding the more recent appearance of several important commentaries on Scripture, it still holds a high place in the esteem of competent judges. Bible dictionaries and concordances have also been issued by the society for a while a very large circulation, and contributed not a little to sustain among thoughtful readers the relish for the old English Protestant theology.

The range of the society's publications has been gradually widened beyond that of exclusively religious teaching. Books "on common subjects written in a religious spirit," to adopt the phrase of Dr. Arnold, have been multiplied. Foremost among these in utility has been the Educational Series including the well-known Handbooks of the English Language and of English Literature, by Dr. Angus; also Histories of England, Greece, and Rome, with a system of Universal Geography. For some years a six-penny Monthly Volume treated, in a popular but thoroughly competent way, many great questions of philosophy, science, and history. These were truly "small books on great subjects," and have had an important share in the education of many. Biographies published by the society have been very numerous, both of the saints and heroes of the church, and of many in humber positions, whose example it seemed well to preserve. The Lives of Tyndale and of Latimer, by the late Robert Demaus, rank among the highest in this class of literature; and it may be that almost as much real usefulness has been achieved by Leigh Richmond's Annals of the Poor, or the unpretending memoir of Harian Page.

Books of a yet more popular class have been published by the society in great abundance. The Pilgrim's Progress has been issued in sixty-five languages, mainly by the society's aid. For many years the kindly humor of "Old Humphrey," the "Christian Elia," as he was called by the late Dr. James Hamilton—irradiated many a little volume, both for younger and for elder readers. The name of this charming author was George Mogridge. He died in 1854, at the age of sixty-seven. A long array of juvenile publications, from Mrs. Sherwood's Little Henry and his Bearer, down to the last boy's story by Mr. G. E. Sargent, or pathetic tale by Mrs. Garnett, is well known on both sides of the Atlantic, and has been remarkably useful to many readers.

The Periodicals of the society have also become a very important part of its work. The first was The Child's Companion, begun in 1824, and still teaching its attractive lessons to generation after generation of little ones. The Weekly Visitor (commenced in 1828) sought to combine useful information with Christian teach...ing; but in 1892 the same work was undertaken by The Leisure Hour, with a higher standard of literary merit. The Sunday at Home attempts for what The Boy's Own Paper strives to do for the week. In 1879 The Boy's Own Paper was started as a weekly journal, followed by The Girl's Own Paper in 1880. Intended at the outset to convey healthful moral and religious teaching, with a due admixture of the attractive and amusing, so as to supersede as far as possible the frivolous and often debasing literature offered to our young people, the success of these periodicals has surpassed the highest expectations of their promoters, and English-speaking boys and girls throughout the whole world welcome them as their own magazines. The circulation of the two together now amounts to about 350,000 of each number. The Tract Magazine and The Cottager and Artisan are also published by the society.

There are now in all some 10,000 separate publications on the catalogue of the society; and taking into account the books, tracts, and periodicals, both illustrated cards, texts, and the like, the total issues of the society in 1882-83 amounted to a total of 79,879,350; being by far the largest number in any year of the society's existence.

The Religious Tract Society is also a great Missionary Institution. For the furtherance of its highest purposes, the committee make every week large grants of tracts to distributors at home and abroad, either altogether gratuitously, or at a considerable reduction in price. One circumstance that contributes no little to its usefulness is, that it has at its back, so to speak, a vast army of Christian men and women who are voluntarily engaged in circulating its publications, often accompanying the silent message with the living voice, and so in a twofold manner acting the part of evangelists. Part of the constant work of the committee is to second and assist these publications at a greatly reduced price. School and district libraries are furnished at a large reduction, and great facilities for purchase are allowed to Sunday-school teachers. In the efforts also to diffuse a Christian literature in foreign languages, the society is continually active, having representatives or correspondents in every country of Europe, and in all the chief mission-fields of the East and West. It publishes, or aids the publication of, tracts, books, and periodicals in as many as one hundred and sixty-six languages and dialects, and is, in fact, an auxiliary to every Protestant missionary society. The methods in which it acts are very various. Large money grants are made in aid of the publication-work of many missions. Gifts of printing-paper are voted for periodicals; electrotype illustrations are also freely given, or supplied at a low price; and grants of publications are made for gratuitous distribution. The societies and missions thus aided are naturally, for the most part, English; but those of the United States and of Germany to a large extent also share in the benefit. Important societies at Paris, Toulouse, Basle, Berlin, Hamburg, Gernsbach (Black Forest), Stockholm, Kristiania, and other places, carry on their several plans of publication and distribution; the London Tract Society being in various ways the helper of all.

To meet these varied claims, the society has to rely, first upon its benevolent income; the money it receives from subscriptions, donations, legacies, and collections, being applied, without any deduction whatever, to the missionary work of the society. But these furnish less than half what is actually expended, the remainder being supplied from trade profits after the payment of all expenses. The benevolent income for the year 1882-83 has amounted to £14,824 sterling, to which sum £25,574 have been added from the profits on sales, and £11,403 from the part payments of the individuals and societies receiving grants; out of a total of £46,501 spent in the missionary work of the society.

These details respecting one institution, the largest of the kind in Great Britain, will illustrate the working of other societies that have a similar end in view, but work either in denominational channels, or in a more restricted way. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, founded in 1698, is wholly connected with the Church of England, and publishes yearly a vast amount of popular literature, reporting an issue, for the year 1881-82, of 6,525,091. The Wesleyans and the Baptists have also special organizations for tract-work. Christian workers connected with Mildmay Park in London, and various sections of Plymouth Brethren, publish many tracts. The Monthly Tract Society (founded 1837), and the Weekly Tract Society (1847), publish and issue each a tract periodically, to subscribers and others, chiefly through the post. The Pure Literature Society (1854) repares and circulates lists of books judged suitable for reading and distribution. And, in addition to all these, the private ventures of able tract-writers make no inconsiderable addition to this class of literature; the Rt. Rev. Dr. Ryle, Bishop of Liverpool, and the Rev. P. B. Power, being especially noteworthy. In Scotland, the Scottish Tract and Book Society devotes itself rather to distribution than to publication, employing a large number of colportors with marked success; while the Stirling Tracts, at first prepared and printed by the private enterprise of the late Mr. Peter Drummmond, a wealthy seed-merchant in that town, but now conducted by a committee, and entitled "The Stirling Tract Enterprise," are circulated by millions. A Dublin Tract and Book Repository was, until lately, carried on with a special view to Ireland; but the work for that country is now chiefly in the hands of the London and Scottish societies. Many publishers in England and Scotland find it remunerative to publish "leaflets" — miniature tracts — or single hymns, chiefly for enclosure in letters. A vast circulation is thus secured in the correspondence of relatives and friends, and much good is accomplished in a quiet
TRACT SOCIETIES.

The power of the press, indeed, only begins to be understood as a means of countering error, of diffusing truth, and, in the largest sense of the phrase, of preaching Christ's gospel.

The Jubilee Historical View of the Religious Tract Society, by Mr. William Jones (London, 8vo, 1850), contains in full detail the history of this institution for the first fifty years of its existence, and abounds in valuable information respecting the methods and results of tract-distribution in the earlier days of the enterprise. It is still the standard volume on the subject. The yearly reports of the various societies mentioned above must be studied to complete the details, and to bring them down to the present time.

[There are also tract societies supported by all branches of the Protestant Church in Paris, Lausanne, Toulouse, Brussels, Geneva, and other Continental cities.]

S. G. GREEN, D.D.
(Secretary Religious Tract Society, London.)

II. United States. — The word "tract" was used by old English writers as nearly equivalent to "treatise," and was often applied to volumes, as well as to pamphlets of a few pages only, and on any subject, — scientific, political, reformatory, etc. The Scriptures themselves are a series of tracts. In our own time, though the word "tract" may still cover the same extent of meaning, in common parlance it is understood to denote a short religious appeal or pamphlet; and tract-societies are voluntary associations of Christians to publish and circulate religious tracts, volumes included.

The importance of adding to the influence of spoken truth the permanent effectiveness of the printed page was early felt by Christians. What a good book can do, and how its influence may germinate and perpetuate itself, is well shown in the familiar history of Baxter's conversion, aided by reading Dr. Gibb's book, The Bruised Reed, and Baxter's instrumentality in the conversion of Doddridge, by whose Rise and Progress Wilberforce was led to the truth, into which his brothers were ere long convinced that it could only be carried on prudently and effectively by a national association centrally located, and securing the confidence and support of evangelical Christians of all denominations. Hence originated, in May, 1825, The American Tract Society, New York; the Christians of this city leading off in the organization, and the society at Boston and the Christian public joining it. A building was provided for the manufacture and sale of its publications, and the tracts of the Boston society were transferred to New York. The movement gained general approval, and rapidly expanded, and took rank with the Bible Society among the chief undenominational Christian charities of the nation.

After two years, volumes began to be published in addition to unbound tracts. Handbills, leaflets, children's tracts, illustrated cards, wall-rolls, etc., followed in quick succession; publications in German, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Swedish, Danish, Welsh, and Dutch; publications for all ages and classes, and treating upon all ordinary phases of truth and duty, to meet every variety of religious want. In 1848 the publication of periodicals commenced, the number increasing at intervals to supply the Sabbath school and the family, in English and in German. Many of these various publications were beautifully illustrated; and in excellence of contents, and attractiveness of style, were unsurpassed by any, and a stimulus and model to many.

For the circulation of its publications, the Society has depositories in Boston, Philadelphia, Rochester, Cincinnati, Chicago, and San Francisco, supplied from the Tract House at New York, and sold at uniform prices. It sells also largely through the trade. So far as its means allow, it furnishes its publications gratuitously, or at reduced prices, in aid of ministers, life-members, missionaries, chaplains, and lay Christians engaged in efforts to reform and save; and these go to soldiers and sailors, to freedmen and immigrants, to hospitals, prisons, and asylums, to poor Sabbath schools, to the destitute and neglected in our cities and on our wide frontiers. In many places it has employed the services of local auxiliaries, for systematic tract-distribution, by voluntary Christians making a monthly visit to each house, or canvassing the whole region, to leave a tract and talk to the people, giving a message of love. For the vast population outside of church care it has employed numerous colportors, going from house to house, supplying some of its publications to all, if possible, by sale or grant, converting with the families, holding meetings for prayer, and organizing Sabbath schools. This system of union missionary colportage this Society originated for this country, sending godly and faithful men to the destitute wherever found, — on our vast and rapidly-advancing frontiers, to the freedmen and to the immigrants. The wisdom, necessity, and efficiency of the plan, are so evident, that the Christian public recognized it as an essential part of national evangelization. It rapidly expanded, and has accomplished a vast work that could not have been done by any church organization. In its forty-two years it has performed the equivalent of some 5,500 years' labor for one man, has made 12,960,000 family visits, has sold or granted 14,959,000 volumes, and led to the organization of very many Sabbath schools and churches.

For the direction of its operations, the Society has an executive committee composed of a publishing, distributing, and finance committee of TRADITION.

Christian faith drew its living waters. Congregations were founded in foreign countries, among foreign people; but paper and ink had nothing to do with the affair. Independent of the fragmentary notices from the hands of the apostles, which circulated among the congregations, but made no claims on completeness, either with respect to history or doctrine (John xxi. 20), the fulness of the faith lived on its immortality, stereotyping, printing, binding, and issuing its books, tracts, and papers, including tens of thousands of stereotype-plates and engravings. The whole cost of the manufacture of its issues and of the administration of its business is defrayed by the sales. But for its benevolent work of grants and colportage, it is dependent on its friends; and to this work all gifts and legacies not donated for special purposes are devoted without abatement. These "benevolent" moneys are the voluntary annual gifts of its friends, in many cases coming regularly and unsolicited; in others it is found necessary to call upon public appeals in each church, and subsequent collections, — a service requiring the employment of several district secretaries, or collecting agents, who are also, in some of the fields, superintendents of colportage.

The foreign work of the Society is mainly carried on by the aid of missionaries at seventy different stations in the nominally Christian, Mohammedan, and heathen world. At the principal mission-centres, committees are formed, each member representing one of the several denominations there laboring; and these prepare and recommend the tracts proper for publication by this Society; and to these undenominational and soul-saving books the annual grants of the Society are devoted. These grants are everywhere highly prized. They have amounted in fifty-eight years (1863) to $450,000, besides many thousands in engravings, books, and other helps. Many valuable books also have been printed at the Tract House for the sole use of foreign missions,—in Armenian, Hawaiian, Zulu, Grebo, etc. The Society has printed more or less, at home and abroad, in 146 languages and dialects, and at foreign stations 4,340 different publications, including 694 volumes,—a work which has borne a very considerable part in conquering heathendom for Christ.

The issues of the Society from its home presses,—numbering 6,671, of which 1,481 are volumes,—have amounted in fifty-eight years to nearly 28,000,000 volumes and 409,000,000 tracts.

Of its periodicals, which are now seven in number,—The Illustrated Christian Weekly and Deutscher Volksfreund, The American Messenger and its companion family monthly in German, and two monthly and one weekly children's papers, finely illustrated,—the total issue for one year is about 4,500,000 copies.

The American Tract Society, Boston, in 1858 resumed for some years its separate organization and work, chiefly for greater freedom of action respecting slavery, but since 1878 again co-operates with the National Society. The Western Tract and Book Society of Cincinnati also co-operates with the Society at New York.

 came clearly defined, and attained full practical power. In the Church of Asia Minor and Greece, there existed a living apostolical tradition, besides the written testimonies of Paul and John, it must not be understood that any one — even not Tertullian, though he recommended such a measure — ever sent messengers to Ephesus, Corinth, Philippi, and Thessalonica, to ask what the apostles had orally taught concerning subordinationism or modalism. On the contrary, Tertullian, in whose interest it certainly lay to argue from tradition, in his work De prescriptione, drew all his arguments, not from the general doctrine of his church, but from the books of the New Testament; and Irenaeus, who actually addressed the faithful of his time for advice to Ephesus and Smyrna on the one side, and Rome on the other, made in the Easter controversy the humiliating experience, that the apostolical traditions of those congregations contradicted each other. A tradition with the true characteristic of antiquitas — that is, well-authenticated connection with the source — had become an impossibility. A new characteristic of what was true tradition had to be adopted, namely, that of universitas; that is, universal acceptance throughout the church. But even thus difficulties arose. Cyprian, who invented the theory of the collected episcopacy as the true representative of the church, could not agree with his brother bishop of Rome concerning the validity of heretical baptism, and fell back upon the dangerous proposition that tradition without truth was only an old error. For a long time the state was one of transition, fermentation, and confusion.

Under these circumstances the Arian controversy came to exercise a decided influence. Quite otherwise than during the previous contest with Gnosticism, the orthodox theology had now to encounter an adversary, who, like herself, stood on biblical ground. The question was not now of excluding some apparently Pagan element. The whole controversy lay full within the pale of Christianity: it was essentially exegetical. But in exegetical respect the orthodox theologians were not the proper match for the Arians, and they were consequently compelled to seek aid from tradition. It was, indeed, by claiming to be possessed of the true ancient interpretation of certain passages of Scripture, that the orthodox succeeded in overthrowing Arius at Nicaea; and doctrinal tradition was thus introduced under the guise of exegetical tradition. But the mask was soon thrown off. In the East the doctrine of a secret apostolical tradition, from which the master theologians drew their wisdom, was first developed by the three Cappadocians. Basil the Great says in a passage, De Spiritu Sancto, 27 (which, however, is much contested), that Christian theology is derived partly from Scripture, and partly from a secret apostolical tradition, both of which have equal authority; and on the basis of this proposition he develops his doctrine of the Holy Spirit. In the West it was Vincentius of Lirinum who gave the final definition of the idea of true tradition. In his Commonitorium occurs the famous passage, Magnopere curandum est, ut id teneamus, quod ubique, quod semper, quail ab omnibus credilum est getus, must be sure that we hold that which has n...
TRANSCENDENTALISM.

According to the various circumstances of its application. But who was to decide on such a question? The Pope. The universality of tradition, established by the complete representation of the church in the ecumenical councils, was suspended by the titulus subterraneus, in which the rule of faith was defined by the verdict of the Chair of Peter. This conception, however, did not appear fully developed until after the breach between the Roman-Catholic Church and the Reformation had taken place. Luther's opposition to tradition became one of principle as early as 1520, and in 1522 he declared that tradition could be tolerated only so far as it was in perfect harmony with Scripture. Over against this principle of Scripture being the highest, the absolute authority, which was carried out with still greater rigorosity by the Reformed Church, the Council of Trent placed the declaration (April 8, 1546), that there were two sources of Christian knowledge, Scripture and tradition, and that the interpretation of Scripture had to be regulated by tradition; which, however, simply meant the Pope. The arguments on both sides are fully set forth in Martin Chemnitz (Examens concilii Tridentini, 1556-73), and Stuutheim (Egentschul, 1581). Within the Protestant camp, however, various movements have been made in favor of tradition,—by Lessing, Delbrück, and Daniel in Germany; by Pusey and the Tractarians in England; and by N. F. S. Grundtvig in Denmark. Litt.—Jacobi: Die kirchliche Lehre von d. Tradition u. heiligen Schrift, Berlin, 1847; Holtmann: Kanon u. Tradition, Ludwigsh., 1859; Tanner: Das kathol. Traditions- und prot. TRAJAN (Marcus Ulpius Trajanus), emperor of Rome (98-117), was, no doubt, one of the best rulers of the Roman Empire, and a sincere, mild, even benevolent character. Nevertheless, he was the emperor who issued a decree against the Christians. He made persecution of Christianity legal. The occasion was the appointment of his youngest son to govern the East. In the East, Christianity numbered many more adherents than in the West. In the great cities, more than one-half of the inhabitants were Christians; and the Pagan temples began to be left empty and almost desolate. Pliny noticed it with alarm, and in lack of any thing better he determined to apply the laws against secret societies to the case. But the accusations were so numerous, and the results of the legal proceedings so unsatisfactory, that he felt obliged to address the emperor himself for instruction. Trajan's answer is very characteristic. It forbids to search after suspected persons, to pay any regard to anonymous accusations, etc., and it grants full forgiveness to those who repent and abjure; but it also authorizes the punishment of such as are convicted and will not retract. As a consequence of this rescript, the general position of the Christians was very insecure, not to say dangerous. Among those who actually suffered were Simeon of Jerusalem, and Ignatius of Antioch. See the Epistles of Pliny, book x. (Bohn's ed., Lond., 1878), and his panegyric of Trajan.

TRANSCENDENTALISM IN NEW ENGLAND. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, a strong re-action took place against materialism. As philosophy, it began in Germany. Voltaire brought from London to Paris the ideas of Hume. From Paris they went with him to the court of Frederick, king of Prussia, and the court of the Duke of Orléans. They were subjected to searching analysis in his famous work, the Kritik of Pure Reason, published in 1771, and became the leader in a great philosophical reform. Materialism took no deep root in the German mind. The great names in German idealism are Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel; and the sequence of their doctrine, so far as it can be conveyed in very few words, is as follows: Kant sounded the depths of the human mind; Fichte imparted reality to the idea of the human person; Schelling combined the inward and the outward by supposing an Absolute, which he called reason; Hegel transformed what was to him the unsubstantial reason into a being, thus completing, as is claimed, the fundamental "categories" of Kant. The word "transcendentalism" is of Kantian origin. It means that which is valid beyond the experience of the senses, though present in the human mind. It describes a form of idealism. In the judgment of Dr. J. H. Stirling, "The transcendental philosophy is a philosophy of the merely speculative pure reason; for all moral practice, so far as it involves motive, refers to feeling, and feeling is always of empirical origin." Again: "I call all cognition transcendental which is occupied not so much with objects as with the process by which we come to know them, in so far as that process has an a priori element. A system of such elements would be a transcendental philosophy."

In France, materialism was represented by Condillac, Cabanis (author of the saying that "brain secretes thought, as the liver secretes bile"), and others; idealism, by Maire de Biau, Destutt de Tracy, Cousin, Jouffroy, and others.

In England, not to mention the poets, who are always idealists, Coleridge reflected Schelling; and Carlyle, Goethe and Richter. The Aids to Reflection and Friend, of Coleridge, were eagerly read in American editions. So far as this goes, transcendentalism in this country was of foreign extraction, an invasion of the German intellect; though it doubtless had roots and a character of its own, being derived from the same general impulse, but shaped by peculiar circumstances.

In New England, materialism was abroad, sometimes implicitly, sometimes by formal statement. Unitarianism, itself a protest, on the ground of common sense, against "Orthodoxy" and "Evangelicalism," was infected with the metaphysics of John Locke. It was a system of rationalism, prosaic, unimaginative, critical, suspicious of ideal elements and manifestations. Its teaching was enthusiastic, its spirit was excitable, its interpretation of Scripture was literal in the extreme. It was, in the main, a negative system, its forms mechanical, its beliefs traditional, its associations conventional. It was destitute of genius. The elder men, like Channing and Lowell, retained the sentiments of piety which... they had brought with them from the faith they had left; but the new society did not share the orthodoxy of the meeting. In 1832 Abner Kendfield became The Investigator: in 1836 he was prosecuted for blasphemy. There was great interest in clairvoyance, mesmerism, and kindred doctrines. As early as 1834 the Universalists, who allowed the individual the name of Graham. Every kind of medication was called in to do the work of the Holy Spirit.

At this juncture, idealism appeared in the shape of a protest against the drift of the time towards animalism and materialism. The soil was prepared by orthodox mystics, who proclaimed "the life of God in the soul of man," by the spiritualism taught by Jonathan Edwards; by the Reformed Quakers, with their doctrine of an all-sufficing "Inner Light;" by the traditions of Abby Hutchinson, Mary Dyer, and the apostles of soul-freedom. Not that the positions taken by these men and women were the same as those assumed by the transcendentalists. They were not: they were quite different. Indeed, they were precisely opposite; for these all recognized some supernatural authority, whereas the transcendentalists as a class were pure "naturalists," believers in the inspiration of the individual soul; but they looked only at apparent results, disregarding adjacent beliefs. The leaders were young men, almost without exception, educated for the ministry, Unitarians, members of the best class in society, eloquent speakers and talkers, scholars, men of general culture, outspoken in the declaration of their opinions. Of these Ralph Waldo Emerson was chief, most sarcastic and persuasive, most uncompromising, too, in his ecclesiastical action. He resigned his charge in 1832, from scruples in regard to the "communion-service," which he regarded as a spiritual rite, and was willing to continue as such, not as an ordinance imposed by church or Scripture. Later, he was unwilling to offer public prayer, and retired from the pulpit altogether, making the secular platform his sole visible elevation above the multitude,—an elevation not of authority, but of convenience.

A few young men gathered round him. In September of 1836, on the day of the celebration of the foundation of Harvard College, four persons—Emerson, Hedge, Ripley, and Putnam—met together in Cambridge, and, after discussing the theological and ecclesiastical situation, agreed to call a meeting of a few like-minded men, with a view to strengthen each other in their opposition to the old way, and see what could be done to inaugurate a better. At a preliminary meeting at the house of George Ripley, in Boston, there were present Emerson, Hedge, Alcott, Bartol, Brownson, Bartlett (a young tutor at Cambridge). The short lived Dial and the shorter lived Massachussets Quarterly were results of the "transcendental" spirit.

At the time when the transcendental movement was at its height, the atmosphere of New England was filled with projects of reform. Every kind of innovation on existing social arrangements had its advocate, its newspaper, its meetings, its convention. Temperance, non-resistance, woman's rights, antislavery, peace, claimed attention from those concerned for the progress of mankind. Some of these projects were wild, visionary, and, in the eyes of cool observers, grotesque. It is not unlikely that they owed their origin to the same impulse which produced transcendentalism, though the historical and logical connection has not been discovered. That a large part of the ridicule which was vented on the transcendentalists was owing to their presumed affiliation with these summary iconoclasts is more than probable. Nor was such a presumption unreasonable; for the transcendentalists not merely took no pains to correct the impression, but rather gave it encouragement. In 1840 The Friends of Universal Progress held conventions in Charlestown. Emerson, who was present, gave an account of the meetings in the Dial. He wrote:

"The singularity and latitude of the summons drew together from all parts of New England and also from the Middle States, men of every shade of opinion, from the straitest orthodoxy to the wild heterodoxy, and many persons whose church was a church of one member only. A great variety of dialect and of costume was noticed. A great deal of confusion, eccentricity, and fancy appeared, as well as zeal and enthusiasm. . . . Madmen, madwomen, men with beards, Dunkers, Muggletonians, Come-outers, Groenians, Agrarians, Seventh-Day Baptists, Abolitionists, Calvinists, Unitarians, and philosophers, all came successively to the top, and seized their moment, if not their place, to pray, or preach, or protest. . . ." ilamentary order, there was life, and the assurance of that constitutional love for religion and religious liberty which in all periods characterizes the inhabits of this part of America. These men and women were in search of something better and more satisfying than a vote or a definition.

Emerson's lecture on Man the Reformer was an elegant argument out of society. "One day all men will be lovers, and every calamity will be dissolved in the universal sunshine." In his lecture on The Times, delivered the same year (1841),

"These reformers are our contemporaries; they are ourselves, our own light and sight and conscience; they only name the relation which sub-exists us and the vicious institutions which they go to rectify. . . . The reforms have their high origin in an ideal justice; but they do not retain the purity of an idea. . . . The reforming movement is sacred in its origin; in its management and details, timid and profane. These benefactors hope to raise man by impulse of his circumstances by combination of that which is dead, they hope to make something alive. By new infusions, alone, of the spirit by which he is made and directed, can he be remade and re-enforced."

But the general public took no notice of the distinction between regeneration and reform:
the great body of transcendentalists did not, as the experiment of Brook Farm bore witness.
The interest of the transcendentalists in reformers was, in part at least, due to the principle of sympathy, which made them desirous of extending to others the liberty they claimed for themselves,
a feeling that may have led them to extremes
in the direction of promiscuousness of advocacy,
but saved them from practical license.

The moral tendencies of transcendentalism were what might have been expected from individualism. But the theories were bolder than the actions. Mr. Emerson, in his essay on Self-Reliance, said, —

"I would write on the lintels of the doorpost, Whim. I hope it is somewhat better than whim at last, but we cannot spend the day in explanation.
. . . The idlest reverie, the faintest native emotion, command my curiosity and respect."

Yet no loftier, purer man ever lived than Ralph Waldo Emerson. Certain theoretical implications may have, to vulgar eyes, looked towards "free love;" but their authors were men of cleanest life.

Religion in the typical transcendentalist might be a sublimated theist: he was not, in any accepted sense, a Christian. He believed in no devil, in no hell, in no evil, in no dualism of any kind, in no spiritual authority, in no Saviour, in no church. He was humanitarian and optimist.
His faith had no backward look: its essence was aspiration, not contrition. His regard was fixed on the individual soul. Very remarkable was his confidence in nature, in natural powers and capabilities, in the results of obedience to natural law, in spontaneity, impulse, unfolding, growth.
His love of childhood, flowers, landscape, was pro-vocational. Emerson called transcendentalism an "excess of faith." But the faith was in human nature as a possible realization of the divine.

At present there is a vehement re-action against transcendentalism, partly from the quarter of the materialists, and partly from the quarter of the supernaturalists. But, except for a few local and incidental extravagances, its influence was noble, and the idealism which was the essence of it is the foundation of all spiritual belief. As one form of the great intuitive school of philosophy, it has, perhaps, seen its best days; but its elements will render vital other faiths, which will endure
when it is forgotten. [O. B. Frothingham:

TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. xvii. 1-13; Mark
ix. 2-13; Luke ix. 28-36). The transfiguration is that extraordinary episode in Christ's earthly life which anticipated his future state of glory
just before he entered the path of suffering, according to his own prediction (comp. Matt. xvi.
21-28; Mark viii. 31-38; Luke ix. 21-27). It marks the culminating point in his public ministry, and stands midway between the temptation
in the wilderness and the agony in Gethsemane.
It is recorded, with slight variations, by all the evangelists except John, who omits this, and many other events and miracles, as being already known from the popular gospel tradition. It is also alluded to long afterwards by Peter, as an eyewitness of the transcendent majesty of the scene
(2 Pet. i. 16-18).

1. The place mentioned by the synoptists is "an high mountain" (ὅς ὑψιστάς). Peter calls it
"the holy mountain" (τὸ ὁσιότατον) and
"the holy mountain" (τὸ ὁσιότατον) from which we may infer that it was well known, and had acquired a halo of glory from the event. The Lord was wont to withdraw to a mountain for prayer (Matt. xiv. 23; Luke xxi.
37; John vi. 15); and several of the greatest events in the history of revelation, from the legislation on Mount Sinai to the ascension from Mount Olivet, took place on mountains. But the particular mount of transfiguration is in dispute.
Three mountains have been named. (n) Mount Olivet. This rests on the earliest tradition (in the Itiner. Burdig., A.D. 333), but is inconsistent with the context, as Christ was in Galilee before and after the event, and a journey to Judea in the intervening time could not have been left unnoticed. The mountain must be sought in the province of Galilee.

(b) Mount Tabor (the Ἱερονήμου of the Septuagint, the Jebel et-Tur of the Arabs), an isolated, beautiful dome-shaped mountain, wholly of limestone, on the southern border of Galilee, on the plain of Esdraelon, about eighteen hundred feet above the sea.1 Owing to its isolation, it looks twice as large as it really is. It rises gracefully, like a truncated cone or hemisphere, from the plain. It is six or eight miles east of Nazareth.
and can be easily ascended, on foot or on horseback, in an hour. It is often mentioned in the Old Testament (Judg. iv. 6, 14, viii. 18; Ps. lxxxiv.
12; Jer. xlv. 18), though nowhere in the New.
The tradition that Tabor is the mount of transfiguration dates from Jerome, in the fourth century, and soon gained almost universal acceptance.
It gave rise to the building of churches and mon-estries on the summit of Tabor, and it should correspond to the three tents which Peter desired

1 According to Ritter (vol. ii. p. 311, Eng. ed.), Tabor is 1,750 Paris feet above the sea. According to Tristram (Land of Israel, 2d ed., p. 129, and Topography of the Holy Land, 9d ed., p. 202), it is 1,400 feet from the base, and the base about 500 above the sea.
transfiguration.

To build,—one for his Lord, one for Moses, one for Elijah, forgetting himself and the two other disciples, and "not knowing what he said," in his dreamy state of mind; his name also gave the name Το Ἡλιοσφαίρα to the festival of the transfiguration in the Greek Church. There is a poetic fitness in this tradition. No mountain in Palestine was by nature better suited for the event than Tabor. It lies in the very centre of the country, and commands from its flatttened summit one of the finest views of the whole land of Palestine. It rises in three summits very busy crowd. "There are several retired platforms a few days before, and 3) its retirement from the way, and gone back from Mount Tabor to Capernaum. Dr. Lange (Commentary on Matt. xiv. 23, 24). The apostles were asleep, and are described as "heavy with sleep, yet having remained awake" during the act of transfiguration (καὶ καιρὸν ἐκπέμπετο, διαφυγόντας δὲ, Luke ix. 32); and they did not descend till the next day (Luke ix. 37).

The actors and witnesses. Christ was the central figure, the subject of the transfiguration. Moses and Elijah appeared from the heavenly world as the representatives of the Old Testament,—the one of the Law, the other of Prophecy,—to do homage to Him who was the fulfilment of both. They were the fittest persons to witness this anticipation of the heavenly glory, both on account of their representative character and their mysterious departure from this world. Moses died on the mountain, as the rabbinical tradition has it, "of the kisses of Jehovah," in sight of the holy mount in the visions of God; and now they appeared on earth with glorified bodies, "solemnly to consign into his hands once and for all, in a symbolical and glorious representation, their delegated and expiring power" (Alford).

Among the apostles, the three favorite disciples were the sole witnesses of the scene, as they were also of the raising of Jairus' daughter, and of the agony of Christ in Gethsemane. Peter alludes to the event in his Second Epistle. John, the bosom-friend of Jesus, probably had in view this, among other manifestations of his glory, when he testified, "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (John i. 14). And his brother James, as the procormartyr among the apostles, was the first to follow him in the elevation of which the transfiguration was a forerun and a sure pledge.

The event itself. The transfiguration, or transformation, consisted in a visible manifestation and effulgence of the inner glory of Christ's person, accompanied by an audible voice from heaven, declaring him to be the Son of God, with... whom the Father is well pleased. The expression used by Matthew and Mark is that the Lord was metamorphosed (μεταμορφωθη). Luke, who wrote for Gentile readers, avoids this expression, and simply states "that the fashion of his countenance was altered." But it was not only his countenance which shone in supernatural splendor: even "his raiment was white and glistening." Or as Mark, borrowing one image from nature, and another from man's art, says, it "became shining, exceeding white as snow, such as no fuller on earth can whiten them." This is one of those incidental picturesque touches, not infrequent in Mark, which betray the report of an eye-witness, and may be traced to a communication from Peter (comp. 2 Pet. i. 18). We have analogies in Scripture which may be used as illustrations. When Moses returned from the presence of Jehovah on Mount Sinai, the skin of his face shone (Exod. xxxiv. 29—30), which circumstance Hilary calls a figure of the transfiguration. Stephen's face, in view of his martyrdom, shone like the face of an angel (Acts vi. 15). The human countenance is often lighted up by joy; and the peace and blessedness of the soul, in moments of festive elevation, shine through it as through a mirror.

In the case of Christ, the transfiguration was the revelation and anticipation of his future state of glory, which was concealed under the veil of his humanity in the state of humiliation. The cloud which overshadowed him was bright, or light-like, luminous (φωτεινος), of the same kind as the cloud at the ascension, or the clouds of heaven at the second advent of Christ (Matt. xxiv. 30; Mark xii. 26; Luke xxi. 27), and symbolized the presence of God (Exod. xiv. 19, xix. 16; Isa. xix. 1; Dan. vii. 13).

5. Different Explanations.—The event is described as a vision (σοπα, Matt. xvii. 9). This does not exclude its objective reality: it only places it above the sphere of sense and ordinary consciousness. It was partly an objective appearance, partly a spiritual vision. The apostles saw the scene "in spirit (συν νεφελησι), as distinct from μετα του ναου; comp. Acts x. 10; 1 Cor. xiv. 15; Rev. i. 10). They were in an ecstatic "state of supernatural bayance," so to speak, "heavy with sleep," yet "keeping themselves awake through out." And Peter did "not know what he said," being only half conscious, overawed with fear and wonder, delighted so as to hold fast this goodly state, yet "sore afraid."

(a) The older orthodox commentators and divines describe the transfiguration as an outward, visible manifestation. Some suppose that Moses and Elijah appeared in their own bodies; others, that Moses, not yet having risen, assumed a foreign body resembling his former body (so Aquinas).

(b) The rationalists resolve the transfiguration into a dream, or a meeting of Jesus with two secret disciples.

(c) Strauss presents it as a pure myth, a poetic imitation of the transfiguration of Moses (Exod. xxiv, 1, xxxiv. 29 ff.); similarly Keim, who draws a minute parallel between the two events.

(d) Ewald regards it as an actual occurrence, but with mythical embellishments.

(e) Weiss: a real but spiritual vision of the three disciples.

The circumstantial agreement of the three evangelists who narrate the event, the definite chronological date, the connection with what follows, and the solemn reference to it by Peter, one of its witnesses (2 Pet. i. 16—18), as well as the many peculiar traits to which no parallel can be found in the transfiguration of Moses, refute the mythical hypothesis, and confirm the historical character of the event. But it is useless to indulge in speculations concerning the precise form and mode of a supernatural event.

6. Significance.—The transfiguration was, as already remarked, a visible revelation of the hidden glory of the person of Christ in anticipation of his future state of exaltation, and at the same time a prophecy of the future glory of his people after the resurrection, when our mortal bodies shall be conformed to his glorious body (Phil. iii. 21).

It served as a solemn inauguration of the history of the passion and final consummation of his work on earth; for, according to Luke's account, the order of Christ's suffering, especially his death, the great mystery of the atonement for the sins of the world, and the following resurrection, and return to the Father—was the topic of conversation between Jesus and the two visitors from the other world. The event bears a relation to the history of Christ's suffering similar to that of his baptism in the River Jordan to his active ministry. On both occasions he was brought into contact with representatives of the Old Testament, and strengthened for his course by the solemn approval of the voice from heaven declaring him to be the well-beloved Son of the Father.

The transfiguration, no doubt, confirmed the faith of the disciples, and prepared them for the approaching trial. It took away from them, as Leo the Great says (Sermon. xciv.), the scandal of the cross. It furnishes also a striking proof for the harmony of the Old and New Testaments, for personal immortality, and the mysterious intercommunion of the visible and invisible worlds. Both meet in Christ: he is the connecting link between the two dispensations, as also between earth and heaven, between the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of glory. It is very significant, that at the end of the scene the disciples saw no man save Jesus alone. Moses and Elijah, the law and the prophets, types and the law of the second commandment, the glory of the person of Christ in anticipation of his future state of exaltation, and at the same time a prophecy of the future glory of his people after the resurrection, when our mortal bodies shall be conformed to his glorious body (Phil. iii. 21.1 It served as a solemn inauguration of the history of the passion and final consummation of his work on earth; for, according to Luke's account, the order of Christ's suffering, especially his death, the great mystery of the atonement for the sins of the world, and the following resurrection, and return to the Father—was the topic of conversation between Jesus and the two visitors from the other world. 1 Gregory I. (Moralia, xxxvi. 8): "In transfigurations quid aliud quam resurrectionem ultima gloria nundinatur."
TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

The doctrine of transubstantiation, a scholastic term from trans and substantia, “a change of one substance into another,” introduced in the twelfth century, for the Roman-Catholic theory of the real presence in the Eucharist.

1. The Doctrine is, that the elements of bread and wine in the sacrifice of the Mass are, by the consecration of the priest, transubstantiated, i.e., changed as to their essence, into the very body and blood of Christ. The miraculous change was first clearly set forth (without the term) by Paschasius Radbertus in the ninth century, but it never took root in Greek mythology, in spite of Pythagoras and Plato; or in Judaism, though it is found in the Cabala; or in Christianity, though Jerome relates that it was taught by some obscure sects, and reminiscences of it are found, not only among the Fathers, but also in the middle ages.

2. The transubstantiation is the subject of three of Bishop Hall’s Contemplations, bk. iv. 12, 13, 14. The last four sermons of F. W. Kuropadie’s Elijah the Tishbite (German ed., vol. iii. pp. 300-426) are devoted to the transfiguration, and are highly poetical.

3. The transfiguration is the subject of three of Bishop Hall’s Contemplations, bk. iv. 12, 13, 14. The last four sermons of F. W. Kuropadie’s Elijah the Tishbite (German ed., vol. iii. pp. 300-426) are devoted to the transfiguration, and are highly poetical.

4. The doctrine of transubstantiation led, with other causes, to the withdrawal of the cup from the laity to avoid possible profanation by spilling the blood of Christ; and both the doctrine and the usage combined greatly to strengthen the power of the priesthood, and to widen the gulf between the priesthood and the laity.

5. It may be admitted that a great and precious truth underlies this as every other great error; and it is the truth which gives the error such power and tenacity over millions of devout Catholics to this day. This truth is, that Jesus Christ is the bread of life from heaven, and nourishes the soul of the faithful in the sacrament of the Eucharist, a nourishment of the body and soul, a food in the very sense of the word. It is the token of the love of God for the creature, the expression of the love of God for man, a token of the love of God for the sinner, a token of the love of God for the devil, a token of the love of God for all the world.

6. The doctrine was finally settled for all orthodox Roman Catholics by the Council of Trent (in the thirteenth session, Oct. 11, 1551), in opposition to the Protestant denial, in the following terms:—

“This holy Synod doth now declare it anew, that, by the consecration of the bread and of the wine, a conversion is made of the whole substance of the bread into the substance of the body of Christ our Lord, and of the whole substance of the wine into the substance of his blood; which conversion is, by the Holy Catholic Church, suitably and properly called Transubstantiation.”

Canons 1-4 of the same session condemn the contrary opinions. The same statement is repeated in the Trinitarian Profession, art. vi. (See the Latin and English text in Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, vol. ii. 130, 136, 137, and 208.)

The doctrine as thus stated involves a stupendous miracle, or, rather, a series of miracles and magic transformations. It is not only above reason, but contradicts directly the testimony of three senses. All attempts of Catholic divines to explain it by scholastic distinctions of various kinds of presence, and by speculations about the relation of the substance to the accidents, are failures.

Two opposite tendencies meet in this dogma: on the one hand, the divine is materialized; and, on the other hand, the material is spiritualized. Christ’s real body and blood are enclosed in the narrow dimensions of the sacramental elements, and yet they are everywhere, by innumerable acts of priestly creation, wherever the mass is celebrated; and they are wholly partaken of by the mouth (yet not digested) by every communicant, good or bad, without division or diminution.

The doctrine of transubstantiation led, with other causes, to the withdrawal of the cup from the laity to avoid possible profanation by spilling the blood of Christ; and both the doctrine and the usage combined greatly to strengthen the power of the priesthood, and to widen the gulf between the priesthood and the laity.

It may be admitted that a great and precious truth underlies this as every other great error; and it is the truth which gives the error such power and tenacity over millions of devout Catholics to this day. This truth is, that Jesus Christ is the bread of life from heaven, and nourishes... his people spiritually by faith, as truly as he fed the five thousand physically by the miracle of the five loaves. The error lies in the carnal, Caper-nastic misunderstanding; and this is condemned by our Lord at the close of that very discourse which sets forth that great and comforting truth (John vi. 53). The flesh profits nothing, the spirit maketh alive.

II. The Arguments which Papal divines produce in defence of this doctrine are:

1. Exegetical. — (a) A literal interpretation of the words of institution, "This is my body; this is my blood;" which, however, refers to the preceding "cup," the wine not being mentioned] is my blood of the covenant" (Matt. xxvi. 26, 27). The Lutheran symbols agree with this exegesis, but nevertheless reject transubstantiation. The Reformed symbols reject it for the following reasons: (1) the word "is" may indicate a figurative as well as a real relationship between the subject and the predicate, and yet mean "represents," or "sets forth," in the Septuagint and the Greek Testament (e.g., Gen. xii. 26, 27; Matt. xiii. 38, 39; 1 Pet. iv. 24; Rev. i. 20); (2) the surrounding circumstances of the institution of the Holy Supper (the living Christ amidst his disciples, his body not yet broken, his blood not yet shed, etc.) forbid a strictly literal interpretation, and application to the first celebration; (3) the literal interpretation cannot be carried out, inasmuch as the Lord himself (Matt. xxvi. 27; Luke xxi. 20) and the apostle Paul, in quoting the words of institution (I Cor. xi. 26, το το πάσαν sprende, etc.; x. 16, "the cup of blessing," etc.), substitute the word "cup" which contains the wine, for the wine itself; i.e., they use the figure of synecdoche continens pro contenlo: and yet no Catholic assumes the transubstantiation of the vessel.

(b) The mysterious discourse of our Lord in the synagogue of Capernaum, about eating his flesh, and drinking his blood (John vi. 52-59). To this may be objected, that this discourse is appealed to and rinking his blood (John vi. 52-59). To this synod of Capernaum, about eating his flesh, and drinking his blood (John vi. 52-59). To this synod the figure of synecdoche continens pro continenlo; but this result was not yet fixed in the mind of the church. The first controversy occurred in the ninth century. Paschasius Radbertus, abbot of the monastery of Corbie, first expounded and defended transubstantiation in a tract, De Sacramentis Corporis et Sanguinis Domini (831, 2d ed., 844), but expressly says that some taught only a spiritual communion of the soul with the Redeemer in the Eucharist. The tract provoked considerable opposition, and Ratramnus (Bertram), also a monk of Corbie, refuted it (without mentioning the name of his abbot) by a tract, De Corpore et Sanguine Domini et Caro/um Caluum. He appealed to the Scriptures (John vi. 83) and to St. Augustine, and taught that bread and wine remain unchanged after consecration, as the water in baptism, but the body and blood. John of Damascus said substantially the same; and the Greek Church has even adopted the Roman dogma, under the name μετατροπής.

But this result was not reached in the Latin Church till a much later period. During the middle ages two controversies on the real presence took place, which prove that transubstantiation was not yet fixed in the mind of the church.

The eucharistic controversy took place in the eleventh century. Benedict of Aniane (between 1040 and 1050) attacked in a work, De Cena Sacra, the doctrine of transubstantiation as contrary to reason, to the Scriptures, and to the older church Fathers, especially St. Augustine. His former friend Lanfranc, prior of Bee in Normandy, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1088), was the principal champion of transubstantiation. He first drew the logical inference from the doctrine, namely, that unbelievers as well received the essence of the sacrament (but not its salutis efficiencia). Hildebrand, then papal legate in France, after Pope Gregory VII. while protected Berengar; but a Roman synod condemned him as a heretic. Berengar was forced to commit his writings to the flames; but on returning to France he renewed his opposition, was again cited to Rome, and even Pope Gregory VII. could not protect him any longer against the powerful current in favor of transubstantiation: he saved him, however, from a violent end. Berengar was allowed, after a sort of forced recantation, which he afterwards regretted, to retire to a solitary island near Tours, and lived till 1088. (See Neander, iii. 502-530; Schaff, Ch. Hist. IV.)

After this, the doctrine of transubstantiation triumphed completely in the Western Church, and held its sway almost undisputed till the sixteenth century. It fell in with the magic supernaturalism and superstitious pietas of medieval Christianity. Thomas Aquinas has given it its poetic expression in his famous hymn, Lauda Sion Salvatorum, for the Corpus Christi Festival. Thomas à Kempis, in his inimitable book on The Imitation of Christ, best represents the devotional use made of it by pious Catholics.

III. Opposition.—The forerunners of the Reformation began the opposition, especially Wiclif, Hus, and Wessel. The Reformers were unanimous in rejecting transubstantiation as a fundamental error, contrary to Scripture, to reason, to the testimony of the senses, to the very nature of the sacrament, and leading to gross superstition and the adoration of the host (first prescribed by Cardinal Guido in Cologne, 1203). The last was denounced as downright idolatry (though it followed as a logical consequence from the doctrine that the very body and blood of our Lord are literally present on the altar).

There was, however, a serious difference among the Reformers in the extent of opposition. Luther, from constant immersion in the literal interpretation of the words of institution, the doctrine of the corporeal presence, and the fruition of the true body and blood of Christ by all communicants (though with different effect), but substituting for transubstantiation the idea of co-existence of body and blood "in, with, and under" bread and wine during the sacramental transaction; while Zwingli and Calvin held it as a logical consequence from the doctrine that the very body and blood of our Lord are literally present on the altar.

II. On the Protestant side, transubstantiation is discussed in the works on symbolism by MARHEINEKE, GUERICKE, HASE, ÖHNER, etc., in the history of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper by EBARD and KAHINIS, and in the standard works on dogmatics under the head of "Sacraments" and the "Lord's Supper." Besides God's Love Tokens (London, 1637), he issued a Commentary on the entire Bible, in 5 vols. folio, 1654-56 (reprinted, edited by Revs. W. WEBSTER and HUGH MARTIN, with Memoir by Rev. A. B. DROBART, 1866-68, 5 vols., quarto royal 8vo). It is in some respects the best of the Puritan commentaries.

TRAPPISTS, The, are the members of an order in the Roman-Catholic Church which arose out of a Cistercian abbey founded by Count Rotrou of Perche, in 1140. This abbey, called "Notre Dame de la Maison Dieu," lies in a damp, unhealthy valley, reached by a narrow and stony passage: hence the name La Trappe ("the trap"). The monks distinguished themselves by austerity until the fourteenth or fifteenth century, when they became so notorious for revelling, licentiousness, and robbery, as to win the title of the "Bands of La Trappe." This state of affairs continued till the middle of the seventeenth century, when the abbey passed into the hands of Dominique Armand Jean le Bouthillier de Rancé, then (1639) a boy of ten years. The young abbot was well endowed with mental gifts, but abandoned himself to a wild career of sensual indulgence. Overcome by feelings of repentance, he went to the opposite extreme of austerity, retired to La Trappe, and, in spite of opposition on the part of the monks, carried through a rigid discipline. In order to do this, he introduced some Benedictine monks to his abbey.

Rancé's rules obliged the inmates of La Trappe to rise at two o'clock, and retire at seven in winter, eight in summer. They slept on sacks of straw, spent eleven hours daily in spiritual exercises, the rest of the time in hard work. During the hours of work, as in all their relations to one another, the monks observed almost absolute silence, and in greeting one another used the formula, Memento mori ("Remember that we must die"). Their wishes were made known through signs. Their fare was simple, consisting of vegetables, bread, and water. After the evening meal, the monks spent some hours in singing the Psalms, and then went to their future graves. Their garb was a white cloak with wide sleeves, of a gray color, and a black cap.

Rancé was opposed to literary pursuits, and expressed his views in the Traité de la sainteté et des devoirs de la vie monastique, 1833. He was an-TRAUTHSON, Johann Joseph, a distinguished ecclesiastic of the Roman-Catholic Church; was b. in Vienna, 1704; d. in Vienna, March 10, 1757. In 1751 he was made archbishop of Vienna, and in 1750 honored with a cardinal's cap by Benedict XIV. He caused a great deal of excitement by his pastoral letter of Jan. 1, 1751, in which he exhorted the people to the expense of the intercession of the saints, and urges the proclamation of the central truths of the gospel. The letter called forth a number of notes and defenses of the Authenticity of the Book, 1852; On the Original Language of St. Matthew's Gospel, 1850; Remarks on the Prophecies of Daniel, 1847, 4th ed. enlarged by Notes and Defense of the Authorship and Transmission of the New Testament, 1883), pp. 262 sqq.

TREGELLES, Samuel Prideaux, LL.D., b. at Wodehouse Place, Falmouth, Jan. 30, 1813; d. at Plymouth, April 24, 1875. He was educated at the Falmouth classical school; was employed in the Neath Abbey Iron-works, Glamorganshire, 1828 to 1834; and in 1836 became private tutor to Tracadie, N.S. In 1848 some of them emigrated to the United States. He succeeded in introducing some reforms, as the diminution of the number of holy orders. In 1850 he received the degree of LL.D. from the University of St. Andrews; in 1863 he was put in the Old Testament (1843, 2 Vols); translated Gase man's Greek Concordance to the New Testament (1847); wrote the 4th vol. of the 10th ed. of Horne's Introduction (1850), and the original, independent volumes, Remarks on the Prophecies of Daniel, 1847, 4th ed. enlarged by Notes and Defense of the Authenticity of the Book, 1852; On the Original Language of St. Matthew's Gospel, 1850; The Jansenists, 1851; Lecture on the Historic Evidence of the Authorship and Transmission of the Books of the New Testament, 1851; Heads of Hebrew Grammar, 1852; Account of the Printed Text of the Greek New Testament, with Remarks on its Revision on Critical Principles, 1854.

TREMELLIUS, Emmanuel, b. of Jewish parentage, at Ferrara, about 1510; d. at Sedan, 1580. He was converted to Roman Catholicism by Cardinal Pole, and to Protestantism by Peter Martyr, with whom he went to Strasbourg, and thence to England in 1547, where he enjoyed the friendship of Cranmer and Parker, and taught Hebrew at Cambridge. When Queen Mary came to the throne (1553) he went to Germany, and taught Hebrew at Heidelberg; but the first part of his great work, containing Matthew and Mark, did not appear until 1567 (London). By the side of the Greek he gives Jerome's Latin Version from personal collation of the Codex Amiatinus. He was stricken with paralysis in 1861, just after Part Second had appeared, and again in 1870, while at work upon Part Sixth (Revelation), which appeared in 1872. Part Seventh, containing the Prologomena, and finishing the text, appeared in 1873, edited by Dr. Hort and A. W. Streane. Besides his Greek New Testament, Tremellus edited the Codex Zacynthius (1861) and the Canon Muratorianus (Cambridge and London, 1868); revised the manuscript and superintended the publication of The Englishman's Greek Concordance to the New Testament (London, 1839, 2d ed. 1844), Index to (1845), The Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance to Homer's Latin Version from personal collation of the Codex Amiatinus. He was stricken with paralysis in 1861, just after Part Second had appeared, and again in 1870, while at work upon Part Sixth (Revelation), which appeared in 1872. Tregelles was of Quaker parentage, but in early life joined the Plymouth Brethren, from whom, however, he later separated himself. He was converted to Roman Catholicism by Benedict XIV, who caused a great deal of excitement by his pastoral letter of Jan. 1, 1751, in which he exhorted the people to the expense of the intercession of the saints, and urges the proclamation of the central truths of the gospel. The letter called forth a number of writings from Protestants and Catholics. Trauthson, however, had no thought of protestantizing the Church. He succeeded in introducing some reforms, as the diminution of the number of holy days in his diocese.

Session II. (June 17, 1546).— On original sin.

SESSION XIV. (Nov. 25, 1561).— On the sacraments of penance and extreme unction.

SESSIONXXV. (July 15, 1553).— Sacrament of ordination.

SESSION XXVII. (March 3, 1567).— On the seven sacraments in general, and some canons on baptism and confirmation.

SESSION XIII. (Oct. 11, 1551).— On the sacrament of the Eucharist.

SESSION XXII. (Sept. 17, 1562).— Doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass.

SESSION XXIII. (Sept. 17, 1562).— Doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass.

SESSION XXV. (Dec. 3 and 4, 1563).— Decrease approving the scholastic doctrines of purgatory, the invocation, veneration, and the relics of saints and thron and Brentius, with some other German Lutherans, actually started in 1552 on a journey to Trent; but they were refused a deliberative voice, and their mission was an entire failure.

(2) To effect a reformation of discipline, which was admitted by all honest and earnest Catho-lics to have fallen into such deplorable decay as to explain, if not justify, the Reformation. Twenty-five public sessions were held, but about half of them were spent in solemn formalities. The chief work was done in committees or congregations. The entire management was in the hands of the papal delegates. The court of Rome, by diplomacy and intrigue, outwitted all the liberal elements. The council abolished some crying abuses, and introduced or recommended disciplinary reforms as regards the sale of indulgences, the morals of convents, the education of the clergy. In this respect the Reformation produced a salutary effect upon the Roman Church itself, as is admitted by the best historians of that church. But in regard to the department of doctrine, although liberal evangelical sentiments were uttered by some of the ablest members in favor of the supreme authority of the Scriptures, and justification by faith, no concession whatever was made to Protestantism.

The doctrinal decisions of the council are divided into decrees (decreti), which contain the positive statement of the Roman dogmas, and into short canons (canones), which condemn the dissenting Protestant views with the concluding "anathema sit." They are stated with great clearess, precision, and wisdom. The decree on justification betrays special ability and theological circumspection. The Protestant doctrines, however, are almost always exhibited in an exaggerated form, and mixed up with real heresies, which Protestants condemn emphatically as the Church of Rome.

The following is a list, in chronological order, of the articles of faith which were settled by the council in favor of the views held ever since by the Roman-Catholic Church:

SESSION XXX. (Nov. 11, 1563).— Sacrament of matrimony.
sacred images, also on the selection of food, fasts, feasts, and providing for an index of prohibited books, catechism, breviary, and missal, to be issued under the direction of the Pope.

The council was acknowledged in Italy, Portugal, Spain, France, the Low Countries, Poland, and the Roman-Catholic portion of the German Empire, but mostly with a reservation of the royal propagandists. In France it was never published in form, and was only recognized in its doctrinal part. No attempt was made to introduce it into England. Pius IV. sent the decrees to Mary, Queen of Scots, with a letter, dated June 13, 1564, requesting her to publish them in Scotland; but she dared not do it in the face of John Knox and the Reformation.

The canons and decrees of the council were first published by Paul Manutius (Rome, 1564), and often since in different languages. Best Latin edition by Le Plat (1779), and by Schnitte and Richter (Lips., 1853); best English edition by Rev. J. Waterworth (with a history of the council, Lond., 1848). The original acts and debates of the council, as prepared by its general secretary, Bishop Angelo Massarelli, in six large folio volumes, are deposited in the Vatican Library, and remained there unpublished for more than three hundred years, until they were brought to light at last, though only in part, by Augustin Themer, priest of the oratory (d. 1874), in Acta genuina SS. Eccum. Concilii Tridentini nunc primum integre edita, Lips., 1874, 2 vols.

Most of the official documents and private reports, however, which bear upon the council, were made known in the sixteenth century and since. The most complete collection of them is that of Le Plat: Monum. ad Histor. Conc. Trident., Lovan., 1781-87, in 7 vols. New materials have been brought to light by Mendham (1834 and 1846) from the manuscript history of Cardinal Paleotto, and more recently by Sickel (Actenstucke aus österreichischen Archiven, Wien, 1872), and by Dr. Dollinger (Unedruckte Berichte zur Geschicte des Conc. v. Trient, Nördl. 1876, 2 parts); Druffel, Mon. Trid., München, 1884 sqq.

The history of the council was written chiefly by two able and learned Catholics of very different spirit,—the liberal, almost semi-Protestant monk Fra Paolo Sarpi of Venice (Istoria del Concilio Tridentino, Lond., 1619, and repeated since in Italian, Latin, French, and German; best ed., with notes by Courayer, Amsterdam, 1751, 3 vols.; Eng. trans. by Sir N. Brent, 1619, also 1676), and, in the interest of the Papacy, by Cardinal Sforza Pallavicino, who had access to all the archives of Rome (Istoria del Concilio di Trento, Rome, 1658-57, 2 vols. fol., and other eds. Rome, 1665, Milan, 1717, 3 vols. 4to; Latin trans. by J. B. Guttino, Antwerp, 1673, fol.). Both accounts must be compared to get a full view. For a criticism of both, see Ranke's History of the Popes, Appendix, and Brischar's Bertheilung, etc. (Tubing, 1844). Weisenberg, a liberal Catholic, gives a history in the third and fourth volumes of his work, Die grossen Kirchenversammlungen des 15ten und 16ten. Jahh. (Constanz, 1840). Professor (now Bishop) Hefele intended at first to carry his valuable History of the Council (Istoria del Concilio Tridentino) down to the Council of Trent, but gave it up at last for reasons assigned in his Preface to vol. vii. part ii. (1874), and stopped with the Councils of Basel and Florence. Among Protestant historians of the Council of Trent were Salig (1743-45), J. A. Buckley (London, 1852), Bunge (in French; Eng. trans. by D. S. Scott, Edinburgh, 1855; republished by McClintock, New York), Dr. Purvey discusses the doctrinal articles in his Eirenicon. On the Tridentine Standards, see Schaff's History of the Christian Church, vol. i. pp. 90-100, and vol. ii. 77-720. A good sketch of the Council is given in the fifth volume of Gieseler's Church History (Eng. trans. by Henry B. Smith and Mary A. Robinson, N. Y., 1880), pp. 21-44, with judicious extracts from the sources. Cf. Küllner's Symbolik, vol. i. 8-86, and the art. "Trienter Concil," by H. Schmitt, in the first edition of Herzog, vol. xvi. 369-394, and Cardinal Hergenröther's Kirchengeschichte (2ed.), vol. ii. pp. 402-422. See also TRIDENTINE PROFESSION OF FAITH.

TRESPASS OFFERING. See Offerings.

TRENT, Holy, coat of. This coat, preserved in the Cathedral of Trent, is said to be the seamless garment mentioned in John xix. 23. There are several traditions about it. In the thirteenth century the story went, that Mary spun the garment out of wool, and that Jesus wore it uninterrupted till the day of his death. Herod then gave it to a Jew, who threw it into the sea. It was thrown up on the shore, and picked up by a pilgrim, who cast it back again into the water. A whale swallowed it; but a fisherman recovered it, and sold it to King Orendel of Treves. This king put it on, and, as long as he wore it, was invincible. Among the other legends is the one that a maiden carried the garment into Treves; and, as she approached the city, all the bells began tolling at once. It is claimed that the mention of the garment occurs in the Gesta Tectorum (467 or 827). But we have no mention of it till 1054. The notice seems to have been inserted in the Gesta Tectorum, under the Abbot Thorold of Echternach, between 1106 and 1124. The coat was first used at the consecration of Archbishop Bruno, Oct. 28, 1121. It was allowed to remain at rest till 1512. Then, and at a later time, it was presented for worship. Luther refers to the matter as a shameful and foolish travesty. It was again displayed for worship from Aug. 18 to Oct. 7, 1844. The bishops of Metz, Cologne, Limburg, and many others, attended the spectacle; and, as she approached the city, all the bells began tolling at once. It was discovered; that twenty other Seamless Garments competed for the honor of having been worn by Christ. See Gildemeister and V. Sybel: D. heil. Rock zu Trier und d. zwanzig anderen heil. ungedeih. Röcke, Düsseldorf, 1844; Bintz: Zeitung für die Vaterländisch d. heil. Rockes zu Trier, Düsseldorf, 1845, etc.

TRIALS, the name given to the examinations and literary exercises required in the Presbyterian Church of all candidates for the ministry. These are examined in Greek and Hebrew, systematic theology, church history and polity, and are required to present a sermon, a lecture, a Latin thesis, and an exegetical essay.
TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

The Israelitish people, the house of Jacob or Israel, was divided into twelve tribes (Heb. mattathah or sheba'ith). The two Hebrew words are thus distinguished: the former denotes the tribes according to their genealogical relation as branches of a people; the second, as constituted of particular houses or families. The tribes are enumerated according to their progenitors. As Joseph received a double portion in Ephraim and Manasses, there were, strictly speaking, thirteen tribes; but, on account of the peculiar position of the tribe of Levi, the number twelve is preserved, as may already be seen from the order during the wandering in the wilderness (Num. ii. x. 13 sq.). In the midst, round the tabernacle, we find the priests and the three families of Levites, and then, towards the region of the sky, the twelve tribes in four triads, each led by a prince. The triads are formed with reference to the maternal relationship: (1) Leah, Reuben, Simeon, Levi; (2) Zilpah, Gad, Asher, Naphtali; (3) Bilhah, Joseph, Benjamin, Dan; (4) Zophiel, Gad, Judah, Issachar, Zebulon. The number twelve is also regarded as the division of the country, since Levi received no portion. Where, however, as in the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xliv. 28) and of Moses (Deut. xxxiv. 2), Levi is mentioned with the other tribes, Ephraim and Manasses are mentioned only as one tribe,—Joseph; thus Ezek. xlviii., where the future division of the country is spoken of (1—7, 23—28), Ephraim and Manasses are numbered as two tribes. Where, however, the twelve gates of the new Jerusalem are to be named after the twelve tribes (30 sq.), Levi is also counted in, and Joseph is only mentioned as one tribe.

The twelve tribes were again divided into families [mishpachoth, διοικεῖς], these, again, into households [ba'it, οἶκος], then came, “man by man” (Josh. vii. 14, 17 sq.). At the head of the tribes stood the princes (Exod. xxxiv. 31; Num. i. 10, 14, 16, vii. 12 sq.), who were also called the heads of the tribes (Num. xxx. 1). Then came the chief of the house of the fathers (Num. iii. 24, 30). This tribal constitution, which developed itself during the stay of the people in Egypt, was not abolished by the law of Moses. The people of the covenant was to have its tribes: hence everything was avoided where by a tribe could be destroyed out of Israel (Judg. xxi. 17). Each Israelite is a citizen of theocracy, because he belongs to one of the families of the twelve tribes: hence the importance of the list of generations. The Mosaic law contains enactments which tend towards the preservation of the integrity of the generations and families, since each family was to remain in its heritage. The chiefs or elders of the house also were drawn into the service of theocracy, because out of the midst of them the judges were taken (Deut. i. 15); and the commission of the Seventy was formed, who was to assist Moses. Twelve of them are commissioned with the numbering of the people (Num. i. 4, 10); the same number was sent to search the Holy andNum. xiii. 2); and, for to enter Canaan, the number was raised to 53,100 (Num. i. 40, xvi. 44). In the reign of David the tribe had become so insignificant, that its name is altogether omitted in the list of the chief rulers (1 Chron. xxvii. 16—22). The territory assigned to the Asherites comprised the fertile plain of Acre, and the coast of Phenicia up to Sidon (Josh. xix. 24—31); but for a long time they were unable to gain possession of the territory actually assigned them, and “dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land” (Judg. i. 32). In the struggle against Sisera, Asher forgot the peril of the sea (Judg. v. 22). The territory which was occupied by this tribe (Josh. xvii. 11 sq.) was a narrow strip bounded on the east by the Jordan; and from thence it mainly extended to Kirjath-jearim, about six miles west of Jerusalem; while in other directions it stretched from the valley of Hinnom on the south to Bethel on the north. Thus Dan intervened between this tribe and the Philistines. In this territory lay Jericho, Beth-hogla, Bethel, Gibeon, Ramah, and Jebus, or Jerusalem. In the time of the judges the tribe of Benjamin, whose emblem according to Jacob's blessing was the wolf (Gen. xlix. 27), became involved in a civil war with the other tribes, which almost extinguished the tribe (Judg. xix.—xxi.). But it revived again, and in the time of David it numbered 50,400 able warriors (1 Chron. vii. 6—12); in that of Asa, 280,000 (2 Chron. xiv. 8); and in that of Jehoshaphat, 200,000 (2 Chron. xvii. 17). It furnished a deliver in the person of Ehud, who killed the king of the Moabites, Eglon (Judg. iii. 12 sq.); and the first king of the Hebrews (2 Sam. i. x.), whose dynasty (2 Sam. ii.), as well as that of David (1 Kings xii. 21; 1 Chron. xxiii.), it supported. At the division of the kingdom after Solomon's death, it belonged to the southern kingdom. After the exile, together with the...
TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

The tribe of Judah, it constituted the flower of the new Jewish colony in Palestine (Ez. i. 5, iv. 1, x. 9). To the tribe of Benjamin also belonged Mordecai and Esther (Esth. ii. 5), more especially that "Saul who also is called Paul" (Rom. xi. 1; Phil. iii. 5).

3. Dan (i.e., "judge"), fifth son of Jacob, by Bilhah (Gen. xxx. 6). He was the last of the tribes to receive his portion; and that portion, strange as it appears in the face of the numbers, — 62,700 at the first mustering (Num. i. 89), and 64,400 at the second (Num. xxxvi. 40), — was the smallest of the twelve. On the north and east it was completely embraced by Ephraim and Benjamin, while on the south-east and south it joined Judah. On the west it was bounded by the Mediterranean. The boldness of the tribe is characterized by the taking of Laish (Judg. xviii. 1). In the time of David, Dan still kept its place among the tribe of Dan, but soon, for some unknown reason, was carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvii. 5).

4. Gad (i.e., "fortune"), Jacob's seventh son, by Zilpah (Gen. xxx. 9). He was the last of the tribes to receive his portion; and that portion, 54,400 men (Num. i. 28); at the second mustering, 64,300 (Num. xxxvi. 25). In David's time the tribe had 57,000 fighting men (1 Chron. vii. 5). His territory was the noble plain of Edron, a territory, however, whose fertility was more than overbalanced by its exposed situation (Josh. xix. 23–27). One among the judges of Israel was from Issachar, — Tola (Judg. i. 1). When Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, had invaded the north of Palestine, and had taken Samaria, Issachar, with the rest of Israel, was carried away to his distant dominions. Allusion is also made to this tribe in Rev. vii. 7.

5. Joseph (i.e., "increase"). See Ephraim and Manasseh.

8. Judah (i.e., "praise"), the fourth son of Jacob by Leah (Gen. xxix. 35). For his character, life, etc., comp. Gen. xxxviii., xliii. 3, xlv. sq. The important position which Judah was to occupy in the history of the tribes is indicated in the final blessing of his blessing, which was conveyed in lofty language, glancing far into futurity, and strongly indicative of the high destinies which awaited the tribe that was to descend from him (Gen. xlix. 8–12). Judah's sons were five. Of these, three, — Shelah, Pharez, and Zerah, — together with two sons of Pharez, went into Egypt. When the Israelites quitted that country, the tribe of Judah numbered 74,600 adult males (Num. i. 26, 27); at the second mustering, 76,500 (Num. xxxvi. 22). Its representative amongst the spies, and amongst those appointed to partition the land, was the great Caleb (Num. xiii. 6, xxiv. 19). After Joshua's death this tribe is appointed to attack the Canaanites (Judg. i.). The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are narrated at great length, and with greater minuteness than the others, in Josh. xvi. 20–63. The whole of the extensive region was a very early part, in the hands of the Philistines. For this reason it is divided into four main divisions: (1) The Mountain, the "hill-country of Judah," with thirty-eight (or, according to the Septuagint, with forty-eight) towns (Josh. xvi. 48–80); (2) The Wilderness, the sunken district immediately adjoining the Dead Sea (Josh. xvi. 61 sq.); (3) The South (Josh. xv. 21 sq.), containing twenty-nine cities with their dependent villages (Josh. xv. 32–39), which, with Ether and Ashan in the mountains, were ceded to Simon (Josh. xix. 1–9); (4) The Lowland (Josh. xvi. 33 sq.), or the Shephelah, between the Mountain and the Mediterranean Sea, the garden and the granary of the tribe. This very tract was, for the greater part, in the hands of the Philistines. To this tribe belonged Othniel (Judg. iii. 9) and Ibzan (Judg. xii. 8 sq.). It made David king (2 Sam. ii. 4), and adhered to his house (1 Kings xii. 3; 2 Chron. x. xii.), and after the disruption of the kingdom, together with Benjamin, it formed the southern kingdom, in opposition to the northern or Ephraimitic kingdom of Israel.

To Judah's tribe belonged the ten tribes, like Amos, Isaiah, Micah, perhaps, also, Obadiah, Joel, Nahum, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, and others.
After the exile most of those who returned belonged to that tribe: in consequence, the name "Judah" has since been applied to the entire nation from about the epoch of the Restoration. Thus we also find the name "Jews" in Jeremiah (xxxiv. 9). More frequently this name occurs in the post-exile books, also in the New Testament. The highest honor which was bestowed upon that tribe consists in the fact that it belonged to the Messiah of the world, in the Lion of the tribe of Juda" (Heb. vii 14; Rev. v. 5).

9. Manasseh (i.e., "causing forgetfulness"), the elder of the two sons of Joseph (Gen. xlii. 51). At the beginning this tribe was the smallest,—it only numbered 32,200 (Num. i. 34 sq.); but it afterwards increased to 52,700 (Num. xxxvi. 29). At the distribution of the country, one half of the tribe settled east of the Jordan, to which was allotted all Bashan, and part of Gilead; while the other half settled west of the Jordan, which, together with Ephraim, occupied a territory reaching from the Jordan to the sea, and from Bethel to the border of Edom. (Josh. xvii. 26, 27; xix. 32-39). In addition to this large mountain territory, the cities of Bethshean, Taanach, Megiddo, and a few others situated in Esdraelon, were allotted to them. As Manassites, may be mentioned Gideon of Naphtali; and itssouthern section consisted in the fact that to it belonged the tribe of Gad, which was also carried to the border of Esdraelon (Josh. i, 32, 33); subdue the Canaanites (Judg. iv. 10, 11); the five lords of the Amorites (Judg. i, 33);Judah and Issachar (Judg. iv. 19); the inheritance was allotted largely in Naphtali; and its southern section became the most densely populated district in Palestine. It became the principal scene, also, of our Lord's public labors, fulfilling the prophecy of Isa. ix. 1.

10. Naphtali (i.e., "wrestling"), the sixth son of Jacob, and his second by Bilnah (Gen. xxx. 8, xxxv. 20); blessed by Jacob (Gen. xlix. 21) and Moses (Deut. xxxii. 29); his descendants (Gen. xlii. 24) numbered (Num. i. 42, x. 27, xiii. 14, xxvi. 48; Judg. i. 33); subdue the Canaanites (Judg. iv. 10, v. 18, vi. 35, vii. 23). Their inheritance was in the mountains of the northern border (Josh. xii. 32-39), and made them in a great measure isolated from the Israelitish kingdoms. Barak is the one great hero whom nature has purposely withheld from history to have produced. Tobit also belonged to this tribe (Tob. i. 5, vii. 3), which was also carried captive by Tiglath-pileser to Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29). After the captivity, the Jews again settled largely in Naphtali; and its southern section became the most densely populated district in Palestine. It became the principal scene, also, of our Lord's public labors, fulfilling the prophecy of Isa. ix. 1.

11. Reuben (i.e., "behold, a son"), Jacob's firstborn child, the son of Leah (Gen. xxix. 32, xxx. 14); loses his birthright (Gen. xlix. 4; 1 Chron. v. 1) for his transgression (Gen. xxxvii. 22); he intercedes for Joseph (Gen. xxxvii. 21, xxvii. 29), and entreats Jacob (Gen. xlii. 37). His descendants are numbered (Num. i. 21, li. 10, xxxvi. 5; 1 Chron. v. 18), and their request for land beyond the Jordan is granted (Num. xxxiii.; Deut. iii. 12; Josh. xvii. 13); Moses' charge to them (Num. xxxii. 20), and his blessing (Deut. xxxii. 6); Joshua's charge to them (Josh. i. 19); commended and dismissed by him (Josh. xii. 1). They build an altar for a memorial (Josh. xii. 10), and justify themselves when accused (Josh. xii. 21). The tabernacle (mishor) extending from the Arnon to the Jordan, the tribe of Reuben was the owner of them (Josh. xii. 15 sq.). Immediately after the cap tivity (1 Chron. v. 26), the Moabites again re turned to their old country, and occupied their old cities. This is the reason why, in the later prophets, many of the cities of Reuben are embraced in the curses pronounced upon Moab (Jer. xlviii.).

12. Simeon (i.e., "a hearing" by Jehovah), the second of Jacob's sons by Leah (Gen. xxix. 33); avenges Dinah's dishonor (Gen. xxxiv. 7, 23); is detained by Joseph (Gen. xliii. 24); Jacob's prophecy concerning him (Gen. xlix. 2). His descendants are numbered (Num. i. 22, xxvi. 12), and receive a section on the south, which was originally allotted to Judah. To that tribe belonged Judith, who prays to "the Lord God of her father Simeon" (Judg. ix. 2). Simeon is mentioned by Ezekiel (xlviii. 25), and in the Book of Revelation (vii. 7), in their catalogues of the restoration of Israel.

13. Zebulun (i.e., "dwelling"), the sixth and last son of Leah, and the tenth-born to Jacob (Gen. xxx. 20, xxxv. 23); is blessed by Jacob (Gen. xlix. 15) and Moses (Deut. xxxii. 18). His descendants are numbered (Num. i. 39, xxvi. 26), and receive their lot amid the picturesque hills and plains of Lower Galilee, having Tabor on the east and the great sea at the base of Carmel on the west (Josh. xix. 10-18). In the great campaign and victory of Barak it bore a prominent part (Judg. iv. 6, 10), and Deborah praises Zebulun and Naphtali as a people that jeopardized their lives unto the death (Judg. v. 15). This tribe also came to Hezekiah's passover (2 Chron. xxx. 11, 18); and though it appears to have shared the fate of the other northern tribes at the invasion of the country by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvii. 18, 24 sq.), yet the land of Zebulon occupied a distinguished place in New-Testament times (comp. Isa. ix. 1, 2; Matt. iv. 15, 16). In the visions of Ezekiel (xlviii. 26-33) and of John (Rev. vii. 8), this tribe finds its due mention.

For prophecy, the re-union of the twelve tribes under one head is an important feature of the future salvation (Hos. ii. 1; Ezek. xxxi., xlvii. 22); and, since the bringing-back of the tribes as such is predicted (see especially Ezek. xlviii.), their continuance is naturally presupposed. The same is also historically guaranteed for the following centuries (1 Chron. v. 20). The tribal constitution was continued in the goa (i.e., "dispersion"), for (Jer. xxxix. 1; Ezek. xiv. 1, xx. 1) the elders of the people are mentioned; and among those who returned from the exile we meet with the chief of the fathers (Ex. ii. 6, iv. 2), from whom went forth the princes and elders (Ex. v. 7, vi. 8; Neh. x. 1). That those who returned regarded themselves as representatives of all the tribes, we see from Ex. vi. 17, where twelve he-goats are offered for a sin-offering for all Israel (cf. also Ez. viii. 35). That in the new commonwealth each had to show his pedigree is seen from Ez. ii. 59 sq.; and priests who could not prove their pedigree were suspended from priestly functions: but for the rest we are not told that those who "could not show their father's house and their seed, whether they were of Israel," were excluded from the congregation. According to Ez. vi. 21, Neh. x. 29, there were also proselytes, "who had separated them from among them" (Joseph. xii. 15 sq.). After the captivity (1 Chron. v. 26), the Moabites again re turned to their old country, and occupied their old cities. This is the reason why, in the later prophets, many of the cities of Reuben are embraced in the curses pronounced upon Moab (Jer. xlviii.).

TRICHOTOMY.

TRICHOTOMY means the division of human nature into three parts,—body, soul, and spirit (σώμα, νοῦς, and ψυχή).

1. In mathematics, trichotomy means the condition where a set of elements can be divided into three non-empty subsets.

2. In chemistry, trichotomy refers to the division of properties or states into three categories.

3. In psychology, trichotomy is used to describe the division of the mind into three parts:
   - The body (corpus), which is the physical aspect.
   - The soul (anima), which is the mental aspect.
   - The spirit (spiritus), which is the spiritual aspect.

4. In religion, trichotomy is the belief in the division of the divine into three distinct persons or entities:
   - Father (Pater)
   - Son (Filioque)
   - Holy Spirit (Sanctus)

5. In philosophy, trichotomy is used to describe the division of the world or existence into three realms or categories:
   - The physical world
   - The mental world
   - The spiritual or divine world

6. In biology, trichotomy refers to the division of a group of organisms into three distinct species or groups.

7. In genetics, trichotomy is the division of a gene into three distinct alleles or variants.

8. In genetics, trichotomy is also used to describe the division of gametes into three distinct types.

9. In genetics, trichotomy can refer to the division of a chromosome into three distinct segments or regions.

10. In genetics, trichotomy can also refer to the division of a cell into three distinct parts.

11. In genetics, trichotomy is used to describe the division of a cell into three distinct layers or tissues.

12. In genetics, trichotomy is used to describe the division of a cell into three distinct functional roles or tasks.

13. In genetics, trichotomy is used to describe the division of a cell into three distinct signaling pathways or processes.

14. In genetics, trichotomy is used to describe the division of a cell into three distinct signaling nodes or regions.

15. In genetics, trichotomy is used to describe the division of a cell into three distinct signaling pathways or processes.

TRINITY. Since that time the Roman-Catholic Church has added two more dogmas to her creed; one on the sinlessness of the Virgin Mary (in 1854), and one on the infallibility of the Pope (in 1870), in the following words:

"(1) That the blessed Virgin Mary, by a singular grace and privilege of Almighty God, in view of the merits of Christ Jesus the Saviour of mankind, has been preserved free from all stain of original sin.

"(2) That the Roman pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra, that is, in discharge of the office of pastor, and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith or morals, — is possessed of that infallibility which the divine Redeemer willed that his Church should be endowed; and that therefore such definitions of the Roman pontiff are irrefutable of themselves, and not from the consent of the Church."

TRIDENTINUM. See Trent, Council of.

TRINE BAPTISM denotes that form of the administration of baptism by which the person baptized is immersed thrice in the water, or the water poured thrice over him, in the name of the three persons of the godhead. Its symbolic meaning is striking; and its origin from the apostles, or, at all events, from the second century, cannot be doubted. The Arian Eunomius introduced baptism by single immersion, and this form was adopted for a short time in Syria during the Arian ascendancy (7th century); but trine Baptism still continues to be the usual form of the sacrament throughout the church.

TRINITARIANS, a monastic order, founded in 1197 by St. John of Matha, and Felix of Valois, for the purpose of redeeming Christians who were taken captive by the infidels. The order was confirmed by Honorius III., and received its name from the circumstance that all its churches and houses were dedicated to the Holy Trinity,—the most characteristic difference between the Christian and all other religions. The order employed one-third of its revenues for its special purpose.

TRINITY. The Old-Testament revelation contained the doctrine of the Trinity in germ. Its very statement of the unity of God admitted of interpretation in the light of the later revelation of the Trinity in this unity; for God comes before us in the two names of Elohim and Jehovah, in the one before God is the Angel of the Presence, between God absolute and Wisdom, by whom he built the world, between the God of Israel and the Messiah. But as this distinction is throughout pneumatic, and not psychical, the centre of identity of these two rep-presentations of God is the Spirit of Jehovah, the fulness of the divine impartation to the Anointed One. Thus the way was prepared for theampler revelation of the New Testament. The three divine persons—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost—were brought together in Matt. xxviii. 19, 2 Cor. xiii. 4-14, 1 Pet. i. 2, in such a way as to imply equality. Moreover, to each one of them is assigned an ante-mundane, hypostatic, divine existence. Respecting the Father, the statement demands no proof; but respecting the Son see John xvii. 5; Col. i. 17; John i. 1; Phil. ii. 6; John i. i, 20, 27; Gal. i. 1; and for the Spirit see 1 Cor. ii. 10; John xiv. 17, 16, 26; Acts v. 3. These passages prove that the distinctions in the Trinity are not those of mere manifestation, but are inherent.

An imperative and never-resting impulse towards the development of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity is contained in the very formula of Christian baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19). But it is not to be wondered at that the first attempts, such as we meet them in the writings of Justin, Tatian, and Theophilus, or in those of Athenagoras, Clement of Alexandria, and Irenaeus, should present a somewhat vague and aphoristic character. They lack not only systematic completeness, but also dialectical sharpness. Nevertheless, when surveyed as a whole, they appear to point in two different directions, of which Tertullian represents the one, and Origen the other. Tertullian made the Logos the Son; but, in spite of his true conception of the Sonship, he reached only a trinity of succession, and it remained a question whether Athanasius or Sabellius should take up the thread of the development after him. Origen made the Sonship an eternal fact, above and outside of time, but his trinity is only one of subordination; and Arius might as well become his pupil as Athanasius.

The ecumenical Council of Nicea (325) decided against both of these tendencies, directly rejecting Arianism, and indirectly, also, Sabellianism. The confession of truth, however, is not identical with the destruction of error. Both heresies continued to develop for a long time after the decision of the council, even entering into queer combinations with each other, until finally overcome by the indefatigable labor of Athanasius, Basil the Great, the two Gregories, and Hilary. The positive doctrine thus established is not merely a cautious compromise between Arianism and Sabellianism, a single negation of two extremes: it is, indeed, a conscientious and courageous affirmation of the truth, excluding the errors. But it cannot be denied that this affirmation is not yet the fulness of the truth. It has its weaknesses; it has its defects. The monas is identified with the Father. The hypostasis is merely negatively defined; the third hypostasis of the Trinity, the Holy Spirit, remains undeveloped. Up to 360 the whole development was markedly dyadic; and even after the researches of Athanasius and the Cappadocians, and after the condemnation of the Macedonians by the ecumenical Council of Constantinople (861), it took a long time before the Holy Spirit attained full equality with the Father and the Son in the divine triad.

How far Augustine can be said to have made good the above defects is doubtful. With the full development of the three hypostases in the Holy Trinity, the danger of tritheism begins; and, indeed, the trinitarian doctrine of Augustine, so conspicuous for its idea of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, called forth the tritheism of Philoponus. Nevertheless, though the acceptance by the whole Western Church of the Augustinian doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit, and the encyclical by Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople (867), denouncing that doctrine as heretical, called forth a very warm discussion, the only treatment of the subject which has any theological interest is, for the whole earlier part of the middle ages, that of Scotus Erigena. On the basis of the psychological triad of reason, understanding, and the senses, he builds up the divine triad of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. But, however well such an analogy may suit his Neo-Platonic idea of God, it is very far from the track which the Church has chosen to follow: indeed, he makes trinity a mere name. At the beginning of the latter part of the middle ages, the period of scholasticism proper, Anselm proved very successful in refuting the nominalistic tritheism of Roscelin; but the positive exposition of his own views is cold and abstruse. Quite otherwise with Richard of St. Victor, who poured his whole wealth of half-poetical mysticism into the subject, and produced one of the greatest efforts of medieval theology. God is love, he says; but love is not the highest love, unless that effort of mediaeval theologians to the third,—from the Father and the Son which is loved has the highest worth. God can love only God. Thus the step is made from the one hypostasis to the other, from the Father to the Son. The next step, from the first two hypostases to the third,—from the Father and the Son to the Holy Spirit,—is not made with the same unwavering certainty. Love, he says, has always a longing after communicating itself to the world. Of greatest importance, however, is the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, not beyond a dyadic development; and that the Deity evolves into a trinity is one of the profoundest speculative thoughts which ever sprung from the dogma, and has exercised a widespread, fertilizing influence both on theology and philosophy. That this immanent process, just on account of its immanency, involves no element of time, Boehme was aware of from the very first, and has expressed with great emphasis and felicity. But on other points his exposition is very obscure; and, in spite of its great wealth of striking hints, it was forgotten, or at least neglected, for a long time. Leibnitz, who in a very happy way ties up the idea of God with the idea of eternal truth, making the eternal truth the very nature of God, reaches, in his construction of the trinity, not beyond a dyadic development; and the formula of the Wolfian school, according to which the Deity became triniue by virtue of three different acts of his will, — voluntas primitiva, mediana, and finialis,—hardly touches the question. It was Schelling, and after him Franz Baader, who first drew attention to the speculations of Jacob Boehme, though their complete incorporation with the idea of the world as the absolute unity. He acknowledged that it was “almost” necessary to accept the idea of a personal god; “but” the case had to him also another side. His exposition of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity is Sabellian.

The problem of the Reformers lay in another field; of psychology and speculation; and whenever they undertook to remodel, or farther develop, a doctrine, they attached themselves to its anthropological or soteriological bearings. Nevertheless, Luther often and with great fondness reverted to the idea that the true Christian seeks and finds the traces of the Holy Trinity everywhere in the creation, from the most modest flower in the fields to the most gorgeous flower of art; and he, as well as Calvin, felt the necessity of regenerating and remodelling the dogma. In that point, however, Protestantism achieved very little, at least for a long time. The doctrine was taught in accordance with the old symbols of the Church, and to the exclusion of all old and new errors; but a farther development was not attempted. Some Protestant theologians, as, for instance, Calovius, laid very little stress on the dogma; and others, such as Quenstedt, became entangled in its formal difficulties, and reached no farther than the declaratory string of the dogma itself.

The first really new departure in the development of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, since the days of Richard of St. Victor, was due to the Protestant philosophy, now set free from the fetters of the Church, more especially to Jacob Boehme. His idea of an immanent process by which the Deity evolves into a trinity is one of the profoundest speculative thoughts which ever sprung from the dogma, and has exercised a widespread, fertilizing influence both on theology and philosophy. That this immanent process, just on account of its immanency, involves no element of time, Boehme was aware of from the very first, and has expressed with great emphasis and felicity. But on other points his exposition is very obscure; and, in spite of its great wealth of striking hints, it was forgotten, or at least neglected, for a long time. Leibnitz, who in a very happy way ties up the idea of God with the idea of eternal truth, making the eternal truth the very nature of God, reaches, in his construction of the trinity, not beyond a dyadic development; and the formula of the Wolfian school, according to which the Deity became triniue by virtue of three different acts of his will, — voluntas primitiva, mediana, and finialis,—hardly touches the question. It was Schelling, and after him Franz Baader, who first drew attention to the speculations of Jacob Boehme, though their complete incorporation with the idea of the world as the absolute unity. He acknowledged that it was “almost” necessary to accept the idea of a personal god; “but” the case had to him also another side. His exposition of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity is Sabellian.

But, while Schleiermacher thus treated the dogma with apparent indifference, hardly a decade elapsed after the publication of his Der christliche Glaube (1821–22), before it once more came to the foreground, and again assumed, though under various forms, its old position as the true centre of the whole theological system. The old psychologio-soteriological analogy, first invented by Augustine, and then elaborated in a somewhat eccentric way by Scotus Erigena, but never wholly abandoned by the schoolmen, has been renewed (K. Ph. Fischer, Billroth, Martensen); and more especially the abstract form of self-consciousness — the subject making itself object, and through that process returning to itself as self-conscious — has furnished a fertile scheme for trinitarian speculation. The old attempt at developing the Holy Trinity by means of the idea of the world (well known to the ancient Church from the apologists, and to the middle ages from Anselm), has also been repeated with success (J. H. Fichte, Weisse, Twesten). It allureis the interest of the philosopher by its undeniable connection with the profoundest efforts of the classical, especially the Alexandrian speculation; and at the same time it takes hold of the attention of the theologian, because Scripture undoubtedly places the Son, the Logos, in connection with the idea of the world. But, while it is true that this guess of the days of Richard of St. Victor, was due to the Protestant philosophy, now set free from the
TRINITY SUNDAY.

TRINITY SUNDAY, the first Sunday after Pentecost; was introduced into the calendar by Benedict XI. in 1305. It concludes the festival part of the Church Year in the West. In the Church of England the Sundays from Whitsun to Advent are counted as the first, second, etc., till twenty-sixth Sunday after Trinity. The universal use in the Western Church of this festival of Trinity Sunday dates from Pope John XXII. (1334).

TRISAGION, a liturgical formula, which, during the Monophysite controversy of the fifth century, secured dogmatic importance. It was originally nothing else than the ascription of praise in Isa. vi. 3. It was used at the beginning of divine service, and runs ευλογίας τοῦ οικετοῦ, άγίου θεοῦ, άγίου τριχρόνου, άγίου ανθρώπου, ἀγίου πνεύματος, ("Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us!"). The origin of this formula is involved in obscurity. The tradition that it was received during an earthquake at Constantinople, in the reign of Theodosius II., through a boy, who, being caught up into the sky, heard it from the angels, is unreliable. The earliest testimonies to the existence of the Trisagion date from the fifth century, or the latter part of the fourth. In Antioch the clause was added, ἐν σαρκίσει του θανάτου ("who was crucified for us"), and probably originated with the defenders of the orthodox doctrine found in the patriarchal chair of Antioch,— Peter the Fuller. The defenders of the orthodox doctrine found in this change the rudest Eutychianism. Peter's orthodox successor, Calendio, did not throw out the phrase, but changed its reference by prefixing the expression Ἰησοῦς υἱός ("Christ our King"). On his re-instatement, Peter cast out this limiting clause. The introduction of the additional clause under Anastasius, who was inclined to Monophysitism, led to bloody scenes at Constantinople. It was in fact, as Walch first (Ketzerrhistorie, iii. 329 sq.), and Dorner since, have shown, a supplement to the expression βασιλεία του θανάτου (mother of God"), with which the Nestorian controversy began. The suffering of the divine nature on the cross, emphasized by it, grew out of a deep experimental interest in the atonement. See PETER AILIX: Dia. de Triagio origine, Rouen, 1829; HAJDEK: In: Buxtorf, Raccolte, ii. 1516; BINGHAM Orig. ecc. xiv. 2; AUGUSTIN: De Trinitate; DORNER: Lehre von d. TRITHEISM, Johann, a distinguished German theologian of the period just preceding the Reformation; was b. at Trittenheim, near Trier, Feb. 1, 1462; d. at Würzburg, Dec. 16, 1516. He struggled hard with poverty, but succeeded in securing an education at Heidelberg. On his way home from that city, he stopped at a convent at Spanheim; and, being prevented by a violent storm from starting on his journey at the hour intended, he took it as an indication of the will of Providence, continued at the convent, became a monk, and was elected abbot when only twenty-one years old. The convent became famous under his direction. Reuchlin and Pirkheimer were among his friends and correspondents. In 1508 he was transferred to a convent in Würzburg. Tritheimius wrote a number of works on the natural sciences, scholasticism, etc., most of which were published after his death. Among them are Naturalium libri quattuor, 1507; De doctrina graphiae, sive de ratione occulte scribendi, Frankfort, 1606; Sermones et exhortationes ad Monachos, 1516. He laid in Germany the foundation of church history by his works, Catalog. illustr. virorum Germaniae suis ingenis et lucubrationibus omnium sacrarum et de scrip., eccles., iii. 387 sqq., Magd., 1832.

KLIPTEL.

TROAS, or ALEXANDREIA TROAS, or AL-EXANDREIA, a town on the coast of Mysia, built by Antigonus; was during the Roman rule one of the principal towns of the province of Asia, and the centre of the traffic between Macedonia and the western part of Asia Minor. Paul visited the place four times (Acts xvi. 8-11, xx. 5-6; 2 Cor. ii. 12-13; 2 Tim. iv. 18).

TRONCHIN, the name of two distinguished Genevan theologians of the period of the Reformation: Peter, Geneva, April 17, 1582; d. there Nov. 19, 1657. After studying theology at Geneva, Basel, Heidelberg, Franeker, and Leyden, he became professor of Hebrew at Geneva in 1606, and of theology in TRUBER, Primus, b. at Rastschiza in Carniola, 1508; d. at Dredingen in Wurtemberg, June 28, 1586. He was educated at Salzburg, studied theology in Vienna, was ordained priest in 1527, and appointed canon at the cathedral of Laibach in 1531, but embraced the Reformation, and was compelled to flee in 1547. In the following year he obtained a small benefice near Nuremberg, and later on he settled in Wurtemberg. But he never broke off the connection with his native country, and the work he had begun there; publishing in the Slav dialect a catechism (1550), a translation of the Gospel of St. Matthew (1558), of the three other Gospels (1556), of the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Corinthians (1561), besides making frequent though perilous visits. His life was written by Sillem, Erlangen, 1861.

TRUCE OF GOD (trensa or trensa Dei), an institution of the middle ages, designed to mitigate the cruelties of war by enforcing a cessation of hostilities on all the more important church festivals, and from Thursday evening to Sunday evening each week. The scheme was recommended by the councils of Orleans (1016) and Limoges (1031), and by the efforts of the Bishop of Aquitaine (1030) enforced. The second (1139) and third (1179) Lateran councils adopted it. The Truce was a praiseworthy attempt to check the passions and barbarities of warfare.

TRUHORN COUNCILS, The, were held in a room of the imperial palace at Constantinople, which had a dome (προσκελεσία), whence the name. The First Trullan Council was called (680) by the Emperor Constantinus Pogonatus, and held eighteen sittings. The legates of Pope Agatho were accorded the highest rank, then followed in order the Patriarch Georgius of Constantinople, the legate of the Patriarch of Alexandria, Macarius of Antioch, the legate of the Patriarch of Jerusalem, etc. The doctrine of Monophysism was taken up and condemned, and Christ declared to have two natures and two wills. Macarius of Antioch was indicted for his allegiance to the false doctrine. Georgius of Constantinople went over in the eighth sitting to the Roman doctrine. In the sixteenth sitting, Pope Honorius I. was anathematized, and his Monothelite views, and the anathema was repeated at the eighteenth sitting. Pope Agatho's confession of two wills in Christ, in his Epistola ad Imperatares, was declared the doctrine of the council, and all Monophysites were anathematized. The Patriarch Macarius was deposed at a later time.

The Second Trullan Council was called by Justinian in 692. It was designed to supplement the fifth and the sixth (the First Trullan) ecumenical councils, and passed 102 canons bearing upon matters of church-discipline. Six of these (I., XIII., XXXVI., LV., LXXVII., LXXXII.) met with determined opposition in Rome; and, although the legate of Pope Sergius I. was sent to them, he himself firmly rejected them, and in spite of the Emperor Justinian's demand that he should accept them. The emperor was about to compel the Pope's acceptance, when he was de-throned. Canon XIII. (upon the basis of Matt. xix. 6, 1 Cor. vii. 27, Heb. xii. 4) allowed the marriage of priests, but forbade their remarriage, and the continuance of bishops in the married state after their ordination. Canon XXXVI. gave to the Patriarch of Constantinople a rank after the Pope, but granted him equal privileges with the latter. The Second Trullan Council is regarded as spurious (synodus erratica) in the West, but is accepted in the East; its canons being denominated "the canons of the sixth synod." From this time the Eastern and Western churches grew farther and farther apart. The Second Trullan Council was the entering wedge of the great Christian division which followed. See church history of SCHRÜCK and GIESERLE.

TÜBINDEN SCHOOL, The, the name given to two schools of theology, whose chief representatives were connected with the university of Tübingen, either as professors or students, or both.

1. THE OLD TÜBINDEN SCHOOL played an important part in the history of German theological thought in the latter part of the last century by being the champion of biblical supranaturalism. It had its first representative in Gottlob Christian Storr. He was b. in Stuttgart, Sept. 10, 1746; studied at Tübingen; was appointed professor of philosophy at Tübingen, 1775, and professor of theology in 1777; and, d. in Stuttgart, Jan. 17, 1809, as counterpart. His entrance upon his professional duties at Tübingen, as Baur has said, marked an epoch in the Tübingen theology. The activity of the great Bengel had not introduced any new period of theology, so much as it worked as salve purifying the religious life of the day. The so-called theology which had sprung up in the latter half of the eighteenth century saw in positive and orthodox Christianity an enemy of progress and humanity which it felt called upon to resist. This idea was the prevailing idea of the day; and against it Storr rose up, and sought to recover an incontestable position for the defense of what is true and unchangeable in Christianity.
He planted himself firmly and solely upon the authority of divine revelation as it is contained in the Scriptures; and the historical and historical exegesis to build up a system of theology. As a preliminary work, he sought to prove the integrity and credibility of the New Testament, and thence to deduce the authority of Christ as the son of God, laying special emphasis upon the evidential value of the miracles. The foundation-stone of Storr's theology was the authority of divine revelation as it is contained upon the evidential value of the miracles. The foundation-stone of Storr's theology was the authority of divine revelation as it is contained in the Scriptures, and sought by grammatical and historical exegesis to build up a system of the absolute and divine contents of Revelation. His own theological system is laid down in his last great work, Doctrina christ. pars theoreticae sacris[pleris repelita, 1793 (German translation, 1803). Among his other writings are works upon The Revelation of John (1789), the Gospel of John (1790), the Epistle to the Hebrews (1790), etc.

The immediate followers of Storr, and representatives of the Old Tubingen school, were the brothers Johann Friedrich Flatt (b. Feb. 20, 1759, at Tubingen; d. Nov. 24, 1821, at Tubingen), Karl Christian Flatt (b. Aug. 18, 1772, in Stuttgart; d. Nov. 20, 1843), and Friedrich Gottlieb Suskind (b. Feb. 17, 1767, at Neustadt; d. at Stuttgart, 1829). All three were pupils of Storr, and became professors at Tubingen. The elder Flatt edited the Magazin für Dogmatik und Moral from 1796 to 1803, when it was continued by Suskind. This periodical became the organ of the school, which contended against the alleged references to Gnostic systems, and not upon mere processes of ratiocination. His own theological system is laid down in his last great work, Doctrina christ. pars theoreticae sacris[pleris repelita, 1793 (German translation, 1803). Among his other writings are works upon the Revelation of John (1789), the Gospel of John (1790), the Epistle to the Hebrews (1790), etc.

The younger Flatt, although at first inclined to Kant, and sharply criticised his Religion within the Limits of Pure Reason. He also contended against the accommodation theory of Semler, Teller, and others. He held that systems of theology and morals are to be found upon the evidential value of the miracles. He also contended against the accommodation theory of Semler, Teller, and others. He held that systems of theology and morals are to be found upon the evidential value of the miracles.

The elder Flatt was an exceedingly conscientious student. Suskind was the dialectician of the school. The younger Flatt, although at first inclined to Kantianism, renounced it, and wrote at length upon the current topics of the Tubingen circle, the absolute and divine contents of Revelation, the miracles of Christ, etc.

Another representative of the early Tubingen school was Ernst Gottlob Bengel (b. 1769; d. March 26, 1826), a grandson of the great commentator Bengel, who, as professor of theology and church history at Tubingen, exerted a very extensive influence. He was somewhat more liberal than his predecessors. Steudel and Christian Friedrich Schmid also represented the same general tendency. It was the idea of supranaturalism, the idea that in Christianity something more than human powers and blessings is conferred, that the Scriptures contain the truth of religious and exegetical skill. Theirs is the merit of having defended the inheritance of the fathers, and preserved it for a better period. Though they did not build up so well as they fought, yet there are times when a militant theology must fight with both hands, and when it was their task, and thus they fought, and in doing so conscientiously they did what they could to defend the truth (Mark xiv. 8). surpassed him in the lucidity and elegance of his style. More audacious was Schwengler, with his rare critical gifts. Köstlin and G. Pianck were exceedingly industrious. The most distinguished co-operators outside of Wurtemberg were Hilgenfeld, Holsten, and Ritschl.

The name of Paul was the one around which the critical study and ingenuity of the school marshalled their forces. Much appeared between 1830 and 1845; the Theologische Jahrbücher, edited by Zeller (1842 sqq.), being the organ of the movement. In the year 1843 Baur summed up the results of the investigations in his work on Paul (2d ed., 1886), in which he denied the Pauline authorship of all the Epistles attributed to Paul, except Galatians, First and Second Corinthians, and Romans. The genuineness of the last two chapters of Romans, however, was called in question. The historical picture which was left was this: The older apostles and the entire early church were Judaistic, and distinguished from the Jewish Church only by their faith in the crucified Christ as the Messiah. All the elements of a new religion which lie concealed in the teachings and life of Christ were undeveloped. Stephen in his first homily brought them into conflict with the older apostles and the church. He preached to the Gentiles; and the older apostles, for the sake of peace, suppressed their hostility. But one party in the church grew more and more bitter against him. It was the endeavor of a later age to harmonize these conflicting parties and principles. Hence, wherever an ironic tone is met with in the New Testament, it is to be regarded as an unmistakable sign of the late date of the writing; and that there was no attempt made in the apostolic age to reconcile the two parties was proved by the Apocalypse of John, which is a product of Jewish-Christian narrowness.

The question was what the Christianity of Christ really was. Baur did not answer this until ten years after Strauss had spoken. In the Jahrbücher for 1844, and a special book on the Gospels, published in 1847, he attempted to prove the un genuineness of John's Gospel. It was declared to have been written with the special purpose of reconciling the differences between Judaistic and Pauline Christianity, and consequently belonged to the second century. Mark, by concealing these differences, also betrayed that it was not apostolic; and Luke's Gospel was only a revision of Marcion's Gospel. Schwengler's Montanismus, Ritschl's Gospel of Marcion and Gospel of Luke, and the first edition of his Origin of the Old Catholic Church (Entstehung d. altkath. Kirche), Köstlin's John's Doctr. System [Johanneischer Lehrbegriff, [Zeller's Acts of the Apostles, and other works, were the allies of Baur. But the most important of all was Schwengler's Post-Apostolic Age (Vetter), which set forth the writings that had been declared un genuine to construct a history of the development of Judaistic and Pauline Christianity to the Old Catholic Church. This development was put in two centres,—Rome and Asia Minor. At Rome the chronologi-

But Keim, Weizsäcker, and others admitted the possibility of miracles as a necessary deduction from them. H. Schultz attempted to answer the question, which Baur left unanswered, — how an ideal man-Christ could have existed without a miracle, — but was more than met by Dorner. The judgment concerning John’s Gospel, as is well known, has been largely reversed; and the synoptic Gospels are declared, even in the circle nearest Baur, not to have been written with a special and partisan purpose (Tendenzschriften). The return to the person of Christ has been followed by a recognition of the historic value of the Gospels; and even O. Pfeiderer, who once declared himself a partisan of the Tübingen school, finds in the Acts a larger portion credible than was once conceded. The fact is, that the logical conclusion from Baur’s own premises was the Life of Christ, by his own scholar, Strauss. The first shot against the Tübingen school was fired by Dietlein (Das Urschristenthum, 1845); he was followed by Thierisch (Versuch zur Herstellung d. hist. Standpunkts für d. Kritik d. neuesten Schriften), Lechler (D. Apost. und nachapost. Zeitalter, 1851, 2d ed., 1857), and Ritschl, in the second edition of his Entstehung d. althth. Kirche, Bonn, 1857, etc.

TUCKERMAN, Joseph, D.D., American Unitarian philanthropist; b. in Boston, Jan. 18, 1778; d. at Havana, April 20, 1840. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1798; pastor at Chelsea, Mass., 1801–20; in 1812 founded at Boston first American society for the religious and moral improvement of seamen; in 1826 took charge of the “Ministry at Large,” a city mission organized by the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches in Boston; visited Europe to promote similar organizations, and on his return, in 1838, published Principles and Results of the Ministry at Large.

TUDELA, Benjamin of. See BENJAMIN OF TUDELA.

TUNKERS, or DUNKERS, so called from the German tunken (”to dip”), a denomination of Christians originating in Germany at the beginning of the last century. The name originally adopted by themselves, and which is now generally used, is simply “The Brethren;” but they frequently use the term “German Baptists,” even in their official documents.

In the year 1708 Alexander Mack of Schwartzman and a few of his neighbors agreed to meet together and study the word of God without reference to existing creeds, and to submit themselves wholly to its guidance, wherever it should lead them. Without being aware of the existence of any body of Christians holding similar views, they were led to adopt, (1) the Bible as their creed, without any catechism or other confession of faith; (2) the independent or congregational form of church government; (3) believers’ baptism; and (4) immersion. To these general principles of the Baptist denomination they added in their Covenant of Conscience some views held, it would seem also without their knowledge, by the Friends; namely, an unpaid ministry, nonconformity to the world in dress, etc., and not to take oaths, or to engage in war.

In addition to these views and the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith (the Trinity, atonement, etc.), they agreed not to go to law, or to invoke the aid of the civil authorities, in self-defence; to refuse interest on money; to salute one another with the kiss of charity; to anoint the sick with oil for recovery; and to celebrate the Communion in connection with the Agape, or love-feast (in imitation of the Paschal Supper), feet-washing, the salutation or “holy kiss,” and giving the right hand of fellowship.

They also adopted triune immersion (in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost); the candidate kneeling, and being plunged by a forward movement under the water, from which they were sometimes called “Tumblers.” The little company of eight persons, whose names are piously preserved by the society, soon increased in numbers; and colonies were formed at Marienborn with John Naas as minister, and at Epstein with Christian Levy as minister. Although leading harmless and peaceful lives, the Brethren were persecuted by their enemies, who followed no dissent from the authorized churches (the Lutheran, the Reformed, and the Catholic); and many of them took refuge in Holland, Friesland, and the Dutchy of Cleves. Shortly after,
The society insists upon a regular ministry. Members are not allowed, "without being authorized by the church, to exhort in our public or general meetings" (Annual Meeting, 1859, art. 5). The ministers are of three orders or grades: (1) The lowest, called a minister of the first degree, who is regarded merely as an "assistant" in preaching, and is subject to the authority of his superiors in the ministry; (2) The minister of the second degree, who is always chosen from those of the first—he makes his own preaching appointments, baptizes, performs the marriage-ceremony, etc.; (3) The highest official is called the elder or bishop, sometimes the housekeeper, and is always taken from the ministers of the second degree, usually the senior. He presides at councils, love-feasts, etc., and exercises a general supervision over all the members. There is only one elder in each congregation, but there may be several ministers of the lower degrees.

The only other official in the church is the deacon. There are usually three or four of these in each congregation: they care for the poor and needy, and visit in couples all the members at their homes before the annual love-feast, to ascertain whether there is peace and union.

The records of the early church at Germantown show that several of the sisters were chosen as deaconesses: but the sisters are no longer appointed to any official position in the church; and the Annual Meeting, 1859, decided that "a female cannot teach or preach in the ordinary acceptance of those terms, yet we cannot forbid them to prophecy" (art. 7). At installations (for ministers of the first and second degrees) and ordinances (for the bishops) the wife of the minister is also saluted by the congregation, the men giving the hand, and the sisters both the hand and kiss: "the church esteems the believing wives of teachers the duty of aiding, by their humble example and chaste conversation, their husbands in the solemn duty laid upon them."

The ministers and deacons are chosen from the congregation by the vote of all the members; the election was held Dec. 30, to be "granted for departures from ancient principles, by what is called the General Council of the German Baptist Church." Their first yearly meeting was held at Brookville, O., May 27, 1852. The Progressives are in favor of greater liberty in what they regard as non-essentials, and seceded last year, protesting that "our annual conference in almost wholly taken up with legislation tending to abridge our liberties in the gospel, enforcing customs and usages, and elevating them to an equality with the gospel, and defending them with even more vigor than the commands of God." Their first convention was held at Ashland, O., June 29, 1882, and their Annual Meeting of the present year at Dayton, O. The main body, who are known as "Conservatives," and who insist upon the decisions of the Annual Meeting as "mandatory," or obligatory upon all the members of the society, decided at their last meeting that such as have left the church, and are members in what are called "Progressive" churches, should not be received into the church without being rebaptized" (Annual Meeting, 1883, art. 3); so that these divisions in the church may now be regarded as permanent.
TUNKERS. 2403 TUNKERS.

Each district meeting. These councils, or "Big Meetings," put in order such matters as cannot be agreed upon in the congregations, or by the district meetings; matters in dispute being submitted to the meeting in the form of "queries." Formerly all the brethren and sisters present, often several thousand, took part in settling the questions brought before the council, as in one of the congregational meetings; but now the discussions and voting are confined to the delegates, two-thirds of the votes cast being required for a decision. The first of these Annual Meetings was held in 1742, but there are no minutes preserved prior to those of 1788.

An examination of these minutes (by which alone the doctrines and usages of the Brethren can be really ascertained) shows that "queries" with reference to doctrines are rare, and proves that there has always been a general adherence to the fundamental and distinctive principles originally adopted by the society. But the application of these principles in special cases is the subject of frequent "queries" from the district meetings, referring to such minute questions of casuistry as the following: Is it right, according to the tenor of the gospel, for brethren to erect lightning-rods (1854)? whether we shall have a rolling or a standing collar on our coats (1876)? must members of the church who come themselves to the Washington Mutual Live Stock Insurance Company (1871)? is it right to burden brethren with paying postage for letters sent by mail, they being not interested in the same (1851)? is it becoming for members to get the walls of their houses adorned with flower paper (1859)?应当アンモニア of feet-washing, that is, whether the person who washes the feet must also wash his own (1856)? Is it right, according to the tenor of the gospel, for brethren to attend to the Scriptures (art. 22)? shall we have a rolling or a standing collar on our coats (1876)? must members of the church who come themselves to the Washington Mutual Live Stock Insurance Company (1871)? is it right to burden brethren with paying postage for letters sent by mail, they being not interested in the same (1851)? is it becoming for members to get the walls of their houses adorned with flower paper (1859)?

As the application of the principles of the Brethren as to plainness in dress are insisted upon, both for teachers and pupils. "Dresses are plain, without tucks, ruffles, etc. Gay attire and jewelry are prohibited" (Mount-Morris College Catalogue). But the Brethren continue to bear testimony against the establishing, "under any pretext or color whatever, theological schools or theological department of schools or colleges" (Annual Meeting, 1882, art. 10). The same meeting approves of Sunday schools as "promotive of good;" but "the unnecessary appendage of Sunday-school conventions," is declared to be "contrary to the principles of the gospel, and contrary to the Scriptures" (art. 22).

The first paper in the interests of the society, a monthly called The Gospel Visitor, was published by Henry Kurtz, in 1851, at Poland, O.; the next, a weekly called The Christian Family Companion, in 1854, by Henry Holzheimer, at Tyrone, Penn. Their present publications are,

The Yound-Order Companion, the organ of the Order of Young-Men, was published at Kinsey's Station, O.; and The Progressive Christian, the organ of the Progressives, at Berlin, Penn.

The Sieben Taeger, or German Seventh-day Baptists, are a secession from the Tunkers. They are now nearly extinct as a denomination, but at one time existed in considerable numbers at Ephrata, Lancaster County, Penn., where, under Conrad Beissel, they formed a monastic community in 1782, and has continued to this day, though the Annual Meeting of 1842 considered it "not advisable for members to put their hands to the pledge, or to meddle with the proceeding and excitement of the world upon this subject." Members are not allowed to join secret societies.

Although a high school was founded by the Brethren in Germantown as early as 1762, education has not, until very recently, had much favor with them. The Annual Meeting, so recently as 1833, declared that "colleges are a very unsafe place for a simple follower of Christ, inasmuch as they are a centrifugal tendency to lead us away from the faith, and obedience to the gospel" (art. 28). Four years later, in answering a query concerning the contemplated establishment of a high school, the Annual Meeting declares "It is conforming to the world. The apostle Paul says knowledge puffeth up" (art. 10). And the next year (1838) the question was debated, "whether the Lord has commanded us to have a school besides our common schools; and, if it is not commanded of the Lord, ought we to have one?" (Art. 51.) But in 1890 an academy was established in Ohio by Elder James Quinter; and there are now three colleges under the control of Brethren, though not officially connected with the society; namely, at Huntingdon, Penn., established 1878; and at Mount Morris, Ill., established 1879. The catalogues for 1881-92 give the total number of students in all the departments as 665.

The usual classical and scientific courses are pursued. To these three colleges should be added the normal school at Bridgewater, Va. The coeducation of the sexes is regarded "as the only true method of education," but the principles of the Brethren as to plainness in dress are insisted upon, both for teachers and pupils. "Dresses are plain, without tucks, ruffles, etc. Gay attire and jewelry are prohibited" (Mount-Morris College Catalogue). But the Brethren continue to bear testimony against the establishing, "under any pretext or color whatever, theological schools or theological departments of schools or colleges" (Annual Meeting, 1882, art. 10). The same meeting approves of Sunday schools as "promotive of good;" but "the unnecessary appendage of Sunday-school conventions," is declared to be "contrary to the principles of the gospel, and contrary to the Scriptures" (art. 22).

The Sieben Taeger, or German Seventh-day Baptists, are a secession from the Tunkers. They are now nearly extinct as a denomination, but at one time existed in considerable numbers at Ephrata, Lancaster County, Penn., where, under Conrad Beissel, they formed a monastic community in 1782, and colonies were afterwards formed near York, Bedford, and Snow Hill. Beissel, a native of Germany, came to this country in 1720, and settled at Mill Creek, where he was baptized by Peter Becker, the Tunker minister of the Germantown church, in 1725. He published a pamphlet protesting against the change of the sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, and also advocating celibacy as a higher order of Christian life. Owing to the disturbed and opposition which these views caused, he withdrew from the society, and led a solitary life on the banks of the Cocolico River, where he was soon joined by a number of those who shared his views. In 1728, still living in solitary cottages or cells, they organized a distinct society, which soon assumed a monastic character; and several buildings were erected at Ephrata for the use of the order. There was at first a community of goods; but this was afterward partially abandoned, only the donations to the society, and the labor of the inmates of the cloisters, being regarded as common stock. Celibacy was enjoined upon those living in the cloisters, and was recommended to all others, but not absolutely required. They adopted a garb similar to that of the Capuchins, and, upon entering the order, assumed monastic names. Beissel took the name of Friedsam (Peaceable), to which the Brethren added that of Gottrecht (Godright), and also gave him the title of Spiritual Father. Israel Eckerlin (Onesimus) was the first prior (Vorsteher). In 1740 the cloisters contained thirty-six single brethren and thirty-five sisters; and the members living in the neighborhood swelled the numbers of the Order of the Solitary to nearly three hundred. After the battle of Brandywine (1777), one of the buildings was used as a hospital for the wounded soldiers. The society derived its support from the products of various mills (paper, grist, oil, fulling, etc.), together with the labor of the members upon the farm and in various occupations within the cloister, especially printing. Their printing-press became quite famous. The Martyr-Book (Der Blutige Schafspostel, etc.), translated from the Dutch for the Mennonites, and printed in 1748, a large folio of 1,512 pages, is pronounced by Mr. S. W. Pennypacker (Pennsylvania Magazine of History, vol. v. p. 276) "the noblest specimen of American colonial bibliography." Nearly forty years before Robert Raikes established his Sabbath School in Gloucester, Ludwig Hacker, the teacher of the common school at Ephrata, established a school for religious instruction on Sabbath afternoons. The society flourished for nearly fifty years, or until the death of the last of the Brethren in 1796. He was a man of great learning and sincere piety; but before his death the society began to decline, and there are now but few members, held together mainly by the property which is vested in the society. This consists of about eighty acres of the original tract, with the old dilapidated cloisters. There is also a large cloister still remaining at Snow Hill, but having at the present time only six inmates.

The Tunkers are often confounded with the other peace sects, in Pennsylvania, of German origin, especially with the Mennonites, the Amish, Schwenckfelders, etc.; but they have no historical connection, and differ from them in some important particulars. The Mennonites and the Amish believe in baptism, but by water; the Tunkers, on the other hand, by immersion. The Schwenckfelders do not observe the sacraments, though recently some attempt has been made to introduce them. This society was founded in Silesia by Kaspar Schwenckfeld von Oseing, a nobleman, and counsellor to the Duke of Sigmund. He was a very learned and pious man; but differing from Luther upon the nature of the Eucharist, the efficacy of the Divine Word, and the human nature of Christ, he was opposed by the Protestants as well as by the Catholics. He died in 1562. His followers were at first partially banished, and many of them, during the next century, took refuge in Saxony. In 1734 a number of families emigrated to Pennsylvania, and settled in Montgomery and the neighboring counties. For a hundred and fifty years they have held, each year, a festival (Gedächtnistag) in grateful memory of their arrival. They have but five or six churches, all of them in Montgomery and the adjoining counties, and number about two hundred families.

The doctrines, government, and discipline of the Schwenckfelders in many respects resemble those of the Friends, whom they also resemble in intelligent and pious zeal, leading sober, honest, peaceful, and industrious lives.

TURKEY. The Turkish tribes coming from Central Asia accepted Mohammedanism when they came in contact with it. The Ottoman Turks founded a Mohammedan Empire, and carried on their wars in the name of the Prophet. When Sultan Selim conquered Egypt, he brought away the last of the caliphs of the family of Koreish, and held him as a prisoner at Constantinople until he ceded to him his rights as caliph, or Imam-ul-Muuminin. Since that time the Ottoman sultans have claimed to be caliphs, or successors of the Prophet, and are generally recognized by orthodox Mohammedans, on account of their ability to maintain it, in spite of the fact that the Prophet himself declared that the caliph must be of his own family. These caliphs of Constantinople, the constitution of the government has been strictly Mohammedan. The law has been based upon the Koran, the religious traditions, and the decisions of the distinguished doctors of the Mohammedan law. The Sultan is in all things absolutely supreme; but he is expected to consult the Sheik-ul-Islam, or he may consult the Ulema, i.e., the learned doctors of the law under him. This religious constitution of the Ottoman Empire has stood in the way of any real reform in the government. Every thing is sacrificed to the interests of the caliphate. The Koran declares that any Mohammedan who may deny his faith shall be put to death; and there has consequently never been any such thing as religious liberty possible in Turkey, although, at times since the Crimean war, conversions to Christianity have been tolerated on account of the vigorous action of the English Government in defence of the few converts.

When the Turks conquered the country, they found already established in it a number of Christian churches, as well as communities of Jews and Pagans. In Egypt was the Coptic Church; in Asia, the Armenian, the Catholic, the Syriac, the Orthodox or Greek; in Europe, the Greek and the Roman Catholic. The majority of the adherents of these churches refused to become Mohammedans, and it was impossible to destroy them: so the Turks applied to them the third principle of the Koran, and allowed them to pay tribute, and live in the country as aliens. The church organizations and hierarchy were maintained and used by the Turks as means of more easily governing the people. Certain privileges and rights were conferred upon them by imperial firman. The patriarchs and bishops were appointed by the joint action of the Church and the Government, and were, in fact, officers of the Turkish Government quite as much as of the Church. They had civil as well as ecclesiastical authority over their flocks, and were sometimes the instruments of Turkish oppression, sometimes oppressors themselves, and sometimes the protectors of the Christians. The idea of the Turk was, that, by controlling the ecclesiastical organization, he could control the people more easily than if he dealt with them as individuals. This was true; but, on the other hand, in so doing he prepared the way for the destruction of his empire. This system has enabled the different nationalities of the empire to maintain a separate existence, to keep up national feeling, and to resist Mohammedan propaganda. The Turks have at last begun to appreciate this; and of late years the authority of the Christian ecclesiastics has been curtailed, and efforts have been made to do away with the special privileges accorded to the churches. The churches have vigorously resisted, and have been supported in this by the European powers. There are now in Constantinople, officially recognized by the Porte, Patriarchs of the Armenian, Catholic, and Greek orthodox churches, the Exarch of the Bulgarian Church, the Vekil of the Protestants, and the Haham-Bashi of the Jews. Except the Catholics and Protestants, these religious bodies have done nothing since the Turkish conquest to propagate their faith; but their hostility to each other has been almost as great as their hatred of the Turks.

Protestant Missions. - The Protestant Reformation in Europe was not without influence in Turkey, and some of the highest ecclesiastics of the Orthodox Church were more or less in sympathy with it. But the people were too ignorant and too isolated to be reached by any movement from without; and Protestantism was practically unknown to them until the establishment of Protestant missions in Turkey, early in the present century. These missions have been confined almost exclusively to the Jews and the Oriental Christians. There are now (1883) twenty-five societies for Christian missions. The most important are the British and Foreign Bible Society, the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, the London Religious Tract Society, the British and Foreign Bible Society, the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, the London Religious Tract Society, the German missions are the Kaiserwerth Dea-
TURKEY.

The work of the board in Turkey was commenced in 1819, when two missionaries, Messiah, Fisk and Parsons, were sent out to begin work at Jerusalem. This mission was never fairly established, but in 1823 the Syrian mission was commenced at Beyrout. The Armenian mission was founded at Constantinople in 1831, and the Jewish mission in 1832, the Assyrian mission in 1849, and the Bulgarian in 1858. Several missionaries have at times been appointed to work among the Mohammedans, but without any permanent result. The board has now four distinct missions in Turkey,—the European, Western, Central, and Eastern Turkey missions; and its work is chiefly among the Armenians, Bulgarians, and Greeks.

The missionaries at first had no intention of establishing an independent Protestant church in Turkey, but sought rather to reform the existing Christian churches. The peculiar constitution of the Turkish Empire, which not only gave civil power to the patriarchs, but treated as an outlaw every person not belonging to some established church, together with the violent animosity of the ecclesiastics against evangelical teaching, finally forced the missionaries to found a Protestant church, or, more properly, a Protestant civil community, which was recognized by the Porte in 1850, through the influence of England. In 1852 the American Board had in Turkey 156 male and female missionaries. They also supported, wholly or in part, 650 native pastors, preachers, teachers, etc. They have 97 churches, with 6,728 communicants; 484 having been added during the year. They have 24 theological and high schools, 18 high schools for girls, 379 common schools, with about 15,000 pupils in all. They have printed and circulated, since the establishment of the missions, 2,555,139 books, or 347,200,364 pages. Two colleges, at Aintab and Kharpoot, are in part connected with the board.

The mission to Syria was transferred by the American Board in 1870 to the Presbyterian Church, and reports the following statistics: missionaries, 33; native laborers, 155; churches, 12; communicants, 877; added during the year, 58; theological and high schools, 9; high schools for girls, 3; common schools, 91; pupils in all, 4,371; pages printed from beginning, 206,715,217.

The American Bible Society was founded in 1849, and the Syrian Protestant College at Beyrout, are in part connected with the mission. The work of this board in Turkey is chieflY among the Armenians, Bulgarians, and Greeks. The missionaries at first had no intention of establishing an independent Protestant church in Turkey, but sought rather to reform the existing Christian churches. The peculiar constitution of the Turkish Empire, which not only gave civil power to the patriarchs, but treated as an outlaw every person not belonging to some established church, together with the violent animosity of the ecclesiastics against evangelical teaching, finally forced the missionaries to found a Protestant church, or, more properly, a Protestant civil community, which was recognized by the Porte in 1850, through the influence of England. In 1852 the American Board had in Turkey 156 male and female missionaries. They also supported, wholly or in part, 650 native pastors, preachers, teachers, etc. They have 97 churches, with 6,728 communicants; 484 having been added during the year. They have 24 theological and high schools, 18 high schools for girls, 379 common schools, with about 15,000 pupils in all. They have printed and circulated, since the establishment of the missions, 2,555,139 books, or 347,200,364 pages. Two colleges, at Aintab and Kharpoot, are in part connected with the board.

The mission to Syria was transferred by the American Board in 1870 to the Presbyterian Church, and reports the following statistics: missionaries, 33; native laborers, 155; churches, 12; communicants, 877; added during the year, 58; theological and high schools, 9; high schools for girls, 3; common schools, 91; pupils in all, 4,371; pages printed from beginning, 206,715,217.

The American Bible Society was founded in 1849, and the Syrian Protestant College at Beyrout, are in part connected with the board. of Roman-Catholic missions in Turkey; although an offer was made to publish what they might furnish, without note or comment. Without such statistics, only general statements can be made.

All Roman-Catholic missions in Turkey are political agencies of the French Government, and as such receive pecuniary aid and diplomatic support, even from the present anti-clerical government of France. In return for this they are expected to propagate and sustain French influence under all circumstances. So far as my observation goes, the principal Catholic organizations represented in Turkey are the Lazarists, Mechitarists, Franciscans, Dominicans, Capuchins, Carmelites, Jesuits, and various organizations of Sisters of Charity.

For many years past they have made but little apparent progress in winning converts from other Christian churches, and they have not attempted to convert Mohammedans.

For a time the Bulgarians, after their conversion to Christianity, inclined toward Rome; but they finally united with the Eastern Church; and of a small body of Paulicians are now Catholics. Since the commencement of the conflict between the Bulgarians and the Greek Patriarch, great efforts have been made to win the Bulgarians over to Rome; and, since the expulsion of the religious orders from France, this mission has been largely re-enforced, and so much protection has been offered to converts, especially in Macedonia. The results have thus far been small.

The number of Roman-Catholic missionaries in the empire, native and foreign, male and female, including the ecclesiastics of the native Catholic churches, cannot be less than ten thousand. I have no means of estimating the annual expenditure, but the Roman-Catholic missions have certainly been more successful than the Protestant in "living on the country." They depend much less, in proportion to their numbers, upon foreign aid.

It is not easy for a Protestant to form an estimate of the success of Roman-Catholic missions. They have no doubt planted the church so firmly in this empire, that it can stand by itself without foreign aid; but they have done nothing towards converting the Mohammedans, and have made no progress in winning over the Oriental churches to a union with Rome. They have not essentially weakened these churches, nor have they made converts enough to enter into any rivalry with them. They will not advance farther, unless, as in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the country falls under the control of some Catholic power.

GEORGE WASHBURNE

(Turner, Daniel, was b. at Blackwater Park, near St. Albans, March 1, 1710; and d. at Abingdon, Berkshire, Sept. 5, 1798; Baptist pastor at Reading, 1741, and from 1748 at Abingdon. He published Short Meditations, 1771, and two other prose works: Divine Songs, Hymns, etc., 1747; and Poems, Devotional and Moral, 1794. Four of his hymns appeared in Ash and Evans's Collection, 1790, and eight in Rippon's, 1787. Several of them have been widely popular, and are still in use.

TURNER, Francis, English prelate, d. Nov. 2, 1700. He was graduated at New College, Oxford, April 14, 1699; proceeded D.D., 1699; was master of St. John's College, Cambridge, April 11, 1707; dean of Windsor, 1683; bishop of Rochester, Nov. 11, 1688; translated to Ely, Aug. 23, 1684.

On May 18, 1688, he joined Archbishop Sancroft and five other bishops in refusing to read James II.'s Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, and was with them committed to the Tower, June 8, but acquitted June 18. He was thus not called upon to take the oath to William and Mary on their accession to the throne, he was suspended March, 1859, and deprived Feb. 1, 1691. He then went into retirement. He published Vindication of the late Archbishop Sancroft and his Brethren; Brief Memoirs of Nicholas Farrar, 2d ed., 1837.

TURNER, James, Presbyterian, b. in Bedford County, Va., May 7, 1758; d. at New London, Jan. 8, 1818. He was one of the authors of the Helvetic Consensus. He eternally opposed his more liberal contemporaries, as the ear.

TURRETIN, or TURRETIN, the name of several reforming theologians of the Reformed Church, whose ancestor Francesco emigrated in 1579 from Lucca to Geneva, for religious considerations. — I. Bénédict, was b. in Zürich, 1588; became successively pastor (1612) and professor of theology (1618) in Geneva; d. [March 4, 1631]. He took a prominent part at the synod of Alais and Nismes, he became pastor of the Italian congregation, and in 1697 professor of church history. His lectures were published in 1734. At Tronchin's death, in 1705, he was transferred to the chair of theology. Turretin's influence as a pastor, a theologian, and a man, was very great. His career was specially marked by the successful effort to modify the strict Calvinism which his father had taught, and to reconcile the fundamental and non-fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and to incorporate his views in a volume [English translation, A Discourse concerning the Fundamental Articles in Religion, London, 1720]. He defines the fundamental doctrines to be those doctrines "a knowledge and acceptance of which are necessary to secure the grace and salvation of God" and a number of sermons, and especially a Defence de la fidélité des traductions de la Bible faites à Genève, Geneva, 1618-20, 2 vols. — II. François, son of the preceding, a distinguished representative of Calvinism; was b. in Geneva, [Oct. 17], 1623; d. there [Sept. 29], 1657. After studying at Geneva, Leyden, Paris (where he heard Gassendi), Montauban, and Nismes, he became pastor of the Italian congregation in Geneva, and in 1653 professor of theology. He is specially known for his zealous opposition to the theology of Saumur, as the earnest champion of the strictest orthodoxy of the canons of Dort, and as one of the authors of the Helvetic Consensus. He sternly opposed his more liberal contemporaries, Mestrezat and Louis Tronchin, and exercised a preponderating influence upon the Geneva ministry of his day. His principal work is his Theological Institutes, Institutio theologica, which has passed through many editions, the first in 1685; the third was published by Jahn's Introduction to the Old Testament (N. Y., 1827), and Planck's Introduction to Sacred Philology and Interpretation (1834); wrote commentaries upon the Greek text of Hebrews (1852, 3d ed., 1859), Romans (1853, 3d ed., 1859), Ephesians (1850), Galatians (1850, 2d ed., 1809); prepared Commentary to the Book of Genesis, 1841; Biographical Notices of some of the most Distinguished Jewish Rabbies, and Translations of Portions of their Commentaries and other Works, 1847; Thoughts on the Origin, Character, and Interpretation of Scripture Prophecy, 1852; Teachings of the Master, 1853; Spiritual Things compared with Spiritual, or Gospels and Acts illustrated by Parallel References, 1859; The Gospels according to the Ammonian Sections and the Tables of Eusebius, 1861. TWINS, or DWINS, Councils of. Twin, under Chosrov II., became the capital of Armenia, and the religious centre of the realm. Eight councils were held there. The First Council, held in 452, declared Twin the seat of the Catholicos. The Second Council was summoned by the Catholics, Nerses II., in 527, and passed thirty-eight canons, one of which ordered a fast of one week every month. The Third Council was held under Moses II. in 551, and decreed that the 11th of July, 553, should begin the Armenian era, and be the New-Year's Day of the first year. The Fourth Council (596) was important for bringing about a separation between the Armenians and Georgians: the latter, unable to agree upon a catholicos, had requested Moses II. to appoint one. He chose Cyircon, who deeded the acceptance of the Council of Chalcedon. The Fourth Council took up this decree, and condemned Cyircon and his followers. This act was the occasion of much controversy among the Armenians. The Fifth Council was held under Nerses III. in 645; condemned all heretics, and especially the Council of Chalcedon and its supporters. The Sixth Council was convened by Nerses III. in 646, and the seventh by John IV. in 719. The latter passed thirty-two canons, which provided that the altar and baptismal font should be made of stone, unleavened bread and unmixed wine should be used in the communion, the clause "Thou that wast crucified for us" (σωφροσῦνας K'n), in the Trisagion, shall be sung three times morning and evening, as well as at the mass, etc. The last canon strictly forbade all intercourse with the Paulicians. The Eighth and last Council was held in 726, and condemned Julian Halicarnassensis, his followers, and his writings. H. PETERMANN.

TWISSE, William, D.D., by action of Parliament first moderator of the Westminster Assembly of Divines; b. at Speenham-Land, near Newbury, Berkshire, Eng., 1575; d. in London, July 20, 1646. He was a fellow of New College, Oxford. In 1604 he proceeded D.D., and then became chaplain to the princess-platine, daughter of James I. On his return he was made vicar of Newbury, and so remained until compelled to leave at the beginning of the Civil War; although he had been offered a prebend's stall at Winchester, several other preferments in the Church of England, and the professorship of divinity at Franeker, Friesland. He was of German descent, noted as a high Calvinist of the supralapsarian school, full of learning and speculative genius, but not well fitted to preside over such an assembly. He distinguished himself by his writings against Arminianism. See Opera, Amsterdam, 1652, 3 vols. folio. He also wrote, The morality of the Fourth commandment as still in force to bind Christians, London, 1641, 4to; The riches of God's love unto the vessels of mercy consistent with his absolute hatred or repudiation of the vessels of wrath, Oxford, 1653, folio. He was buried in St. Peter's, Westminster; but his bones were dug up, by order of council, Sept. 14, 1691, and thrown, with those of many other persons, into a pit in St. Margaret's churchyard. See NEAL: Hist. Puritans, vol. ii. 40.

TYANA, Apollonius of. See APOLLONIUS OF TYANA.

TYANA, the Synod of, held in 368 in Tyana, Cappadocia, has some importance in the history of the spread of the Nicene doctrine of the coessentiality of the Son. Eusebius of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, Athanasius of Ankyra, Gregory Nazianzen, and others, were present. A deputation which had been appointed by the semi-Arians was present, and professed the Nicene faith. The synod proposed a great council at Tarsus for the renewed affirmation of the Nicene faith, but it was interdicted by the Emperor Valens. See SOZOMEN, vi. 12; SOCRATES, iv. 12; HEPFELE: Conciliengeschichte, i. 167; FRONMÜLLER: CONCILIA, iv. 390; TYCHONIUS, d. about 390; belonged to the Donatist sect, though without giving up his connection with the Catholic Church, for which reason he was violently attacked by Parmenianus as a traitor. Of his writings, we have only one, Liber de septem regulis; but as the first attempt at forming a theory of Christian hermeneutics, and on account of the influence which its author exercised on Augustine, it is of great interest. It was first edited by GRYNAEUS, Basel, 1569, and best by GALLANDI, in his Bibl. Vet. Patr., viii. pp. 107-128.

TYCHSEN, Oluf Gerhardt, b. at Tender, Sleswick, Dec. 14, 1734; d. at Rostock, Dec. 30, 1815. He was educated at Altona; studied theology and Oriental languages at Halle; became in 1759 a member of the Kullenberg missionary institution for the conversion of Jews and Mohammedans, but proved very unsuccessful in his practical attempts; and was in 1790 appointed professor of Oriental languages at Butzow, whence in 1798 he was removed to Rostock. He was a man of great learning, but without judgment, as appears from his controversy with Kennicott (Tentamen de varis codicibus Hebr. Vetoris Test. MSS. generibus, Rostock, 1772), with Bayer (Die Unechtheit der jiidischen Miinzen mit hebrdischen und samaritanischen Buchstaben, Rostock, 1779), and with others. The best he has written is found in his Bützwischen Nebenstudien, 1796-99, and Introductio in rem numarium Muhamedanorum, Rostock, 1794; which latter has been highly praised by De Sacy. His life was written by HARTMANN, Bremen, 1818-20, 4 vols.

TYLER, Bennet, D.D., Congregational theologian (first president of the Theological Institute of Connecticu, now located at Hartford); b. in Middlebury (then a part of Woodbury), Conn., July 10, 1783; d. at East Windsor, Conn., May 14, 1858. He was graduated at Yale College in 1801; spent a year as teacher in Weston, Conn.; studied theology with the Rev. Asahel Hooker at Goshen, Conn.; licensed in 1806; begun to preach in 1807 at South Britain, where he was ordained in 1808; became president of Dartmouth College in 1822; received the degree of D.D. from Middlebury College the same year; succeeded Dr. Payson as pastor of Second Congregational Church, Portland, Me., in 1828; elected president of the Theological Institute in 1838; inaugurated May 13, 1834, when the corner-stone of the new edifice was laid in East Windsor, Conn.; resigned this position May 14, 1838, when the house of his daughter, from a neuralgic affection in the head and lungs.
all these positions Dr. Tyler was successful; and though much of his public life was spent in theological controversy, his Christian character was recognized even by his opponents, while his friends testify as to his genial temper, unaffected candor, genuine humility, and cheerful piety. As a teacher of theology he was clear in statement, apt in meeting objections, and, above all, successful in making his pupils feel that he believed, felt, and lived the truth he taught them.

Dr. Tyler's name has been conspicuous in connection with a theological controversy among the Congregationalists of Connecticut, which was occasioned by a discourse of N. W. Taylor, D.D. (conciso ad clerusum, General Association, 1828), professor in the recently established divinity school of Yale College. On a visit to Connecticut in 1829 (he was then pastor at Portland), Dr. Tyler collected the pamphlets which had been issued in the controversy, and shortly afterwards began a correspondence with Dr. Taylor (who had been a classmate at Yale), which passed into a public discussion, continuing for years, and finding its practical issue in the formation of the Pastoral Union of Connecticut (Sept. 10, 1833), and the establishment of the Theological Institute, of which Dr. Tyler became president. The views of Dr. Taylor were regarded by those who took this step, as "dangerous innovations;" and the Pastoral Union was organized with a creed which left no room for doubt on the points at issue.

The germ of the controversy was the position, attributed to Dr. Taylor, "that no human being can become depraved but by his own act, and that the sinfulness of the race does not pertain to man's nature." In connection with this, regeneration was regarded as the act of man's own will or heart; and the primary cause of this right choice was found in self-love, or a desire of the greatest happiness. Incidentally there was involved the question whether God could prevent sin in a moral system. Dr. Taylor's statements on these points have been qualified by himself and his friends, and some of his views now find few defenders. There is less uncertainty as to Dr. Taylor's views. He claimed to be in accord with the New-England Calvinism, represented by the "dangerous innovations;" and the Pastoral Union was organized with a creed which left no room for doubt on the points at issue.

Of Dr. Tyler claim that he was eminently scriptural in his arguments. The exegetical and historical methods of our present day have strengthened rather than weakened the defences of the system which Dr. Tyler represented, though some of his subordinate positions and arguments cannot now be maintained; and yet nothing occurred to impeach the wisdom of Dr. Tyler and his associates in founding the Theological Institute of Connecticut.

In later times Dr. Tyler became engaged in discussion with Dr. Bushnell (see below), and his orthodoxy was called in question before the Pastoral Union in 1856. From this charge he was almost unanimously exonerated.

Dr. Tyler not only contributed largely to the theological controversy above named, but published many sermons and addresses, and contributed many articles to the religious periodicals of the day. — Christian Sentinel; Christian Speculum; National Preacher, Connecticut Magazine, New-England Panoplist, etc. His style is forcible and clear; and his matter always manifests the grand old Puritan faith in a personal God of holiness.

LIT.—Memoir of Bennet Tyler, by N. G. GALE, also prefixed to Dr. Tyler's Lectures on Theology, Boston, 1859; Dr. Tyler and his Theology, by E. A. LAWRENCE (New-Englander), 1859; Bennet Tyler, by A. H. QUINT (Congregational Quarterly), 1880; The Spirit of the Pilgrims (1832-33) contains Dr. Tyler's articles in the controversy with Dr. Taylor. Compare Letters on the New-Haven Theology, New York, Carter and Collier, 1837. Dr. Tyler published, also, Memoir of Asahel Nettleton, Hartford, 1844 (several other editions); Letter to Dr. Bushnell, 1843; New-England Revivals, Boston, 1846; Letters to Dr. Bushnell (strictures on "Christian Nurture"). A volume of sermons, Worth of the Soul, etc., was published in Boston after his death, last edition, 1873.

TYNDALE, William, descended from an ancient Northumbrian family, b. 1484, most probably at Northibley, Gloucestershire; went to school at Oxford, and afterwards to Magdalen Hall and Cambridge, and about 1520 became tutor in the family of Sir Humphrey Monmouth, and also pecuniarily aided by him and others in the accomplishment of his purpose to translate the Scriptures into the vernacular. Having become attached to the doctrines of the Reformation, and devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, the open avowal of his sentiments in the house of Walsh, his disputes with Roman-Catholic dignitaries there, and especially his preaching, excited much opposition, and led to his removal to London (about October, 1523), where he began to preach, and made many friends among the laity, but none among ecclesiastics. He was hospitably entertained at the house of Sir Humphrey Monmouth, and also pecuniarily aided by him and others in the accomplishment of his purpose to translate the Scriptures into the vernacular. Unable to do so in England, he set out for the Continent (about May, 1524), and appears to have visited Hamburg and Wittenberg; but the place where he translated the New Testament, and how he became acquainted to have been a Wittenberg, cannot be named with certainty. It is, however, certain that the printing of the New Testament in quarto was begun at Cologne (in the summer of 1535), and completed at Worms, and that there was likewise printed an octavo edition (both before the end of that year). From an entry in Spalatin's Diary, Aug. 11, 1526, it seems to follow that he continued at Worms about a year: but the notices of his connection with Hermann von dem Busche and the University of Marburg are utterly unwarranted conjectures; and, if being now an established fact that Hans Luft never had a printing-press at Marburg, the colophon to Tyndale's translation of Genesis, and the titlepages of several pamphlets purporting to have been printed by Luft at Marburg, only deepen the seemingly impenetrable mystery which overhangs the life of Tyndale during the interval between his departure from Worms and his final settlement at Antwerp. His literary activity during that interval was extraordinary. When he left England, his knowledge of Hebrew, if he had any, was of the most rudimentary nature; and yet he mastered that difficult tongue so as to produce from the original an admirable version of the entire Pentateuch, the Books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, First and Second Samuel, First and Second Kings, First Chronicles, contained in Matthew's Bible of 1537, and of the Book of Jonah, so excellent, indeed, that to this day his work is not only the basis of those portions of the Authorized Version, but constitutes nine-tenths of that translation. His biblical translations appeared in the following order: New Testament, 1525-26; Pentateuch, 1530; Jonah, 1531. (See English Versions.) In addition to these, continued to his dying hour, he produced sundry other works, which will now be enumerated. His first original composition, A Pathway into the Holy Scripture, is really a reprint, slightly altered, of his Prologue to the quarto edition of his New Testament, and had appeared in separate form before 1530; The Parable of the Wicked Mammon (1532); and The Obedience of a Christian Man (1527-28). These several works comprised the titlepages of several pamphlets purporting to have been printed by Luft at Marburg, and seem to be a sthumous publication. Joshua, Second Chronicles also was published after his death. All these works were written during those mysterious years, in places of concealment so secure and well chosen, that neither, the ecclesiastics, or the secular emissaries of Wolsey and More's Dialogue, etc., to the Dialogue, his Exposition of the First Epistle of St. John, and the famous Prologue to Jonah; in 1532, An Exposition upon the V. VI. and VII. Chapters of Matthew, and a brief declaration of the Sacraments, etc., which, though alleged to have been printed during his life, appears to be a posthumous publication. Joshua—Second Chronicles also was published after his death. All these works were written during those years of concealment, in places of concealment so secure and well chosen, that neither, ecclesiastical nor diplomatic emissaries of Wolsey and Henry VIII., charged to track, hunt down, and seize the fugitive, were able to reach them, and they are even yet unknown. Impressed with the idea that the progress of the Reformation in England rendered it safe for him to leave his concealment, he settled at Antwerp in 1534, and combined the work of an evangelist with that of a translator of the Bible. Mainly through the instrumentality of one Philips, the agent either of Henry or English ecclesiastics, or possibly of both, he was arrested, imprisoned in the Castle of Vilorden, tried, either for heresy or treason, or both, and convicted; was first strangled, and then burnt in the prison-yard, Oct. 6, 1536. His last words were, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes." Excepting the narrative of Foxe, which is very unsatisfactory, and the opulent discovery of a letter written by Tyndale in prison, showing that he was shamefully neglected, and that he continued his literal labors to the last, no official records of his betrayal, arrest, trial, and martyrdom, have as yet been discovered. Indeed, less is known of Tyndale than of almost any of his contemporaries, and his history remains to be written. If the unknown and the mysterious excite and sustain our interest, no theme can excel that attached to Tyndale. His life must have abounded in incident, variety, and adventure; and it has culminated in tragedy. The writer has thus far striven in vain to secure additional information; but, as it is improbable that even the records have been destroyed or lost, some may be recovered. That his precious life might have been saved, cannot be doubted; and, although neither Cromwell nor Henry has been convicted of planning and convincing at his death, it is impossible to exonerate them from criminal indifference and culpable neglect.

Tyndale's place in history has not yet been sufficiently established as a translator of the Scriptures, as an apostle of liberty, and as a chief promoter of the Reformation in England. In all these respects his influence has been singularly undervalued. The sweeping statement found in almost all our histories, that Tyndale translated from the Vulgate and Luther, is most damaging to the reputation of the writers who make it; for, as a matter of fact, it is contrary to truth, since his translations are made directly from the originals. (See Mombert: Handbook of the English Versions, chap. iv.) As an apostle of liberty, he stands foremost among the writers of the period, whose heroic fortitude and invincible love of the truth were heard with a force superior to royal and ecclesiastical injunctions; and the very flames to which fanaticism and tyranny consigned his writings burnt them into the very hearts of the people, and made them powerful instruments in attaching and converting multitudes to the principles of the Reformation; and it is not exaggeration to say, that the noble sentiments of William Tyndale, uttered in pure, strong Saxon English, and steeped in the doctrines of the gospel, gave shape to the views of the more conspicuous promoters of that grand movement, who, like himself, sealed their convictions with their blood.

TYPE.

TYPE, from the Greek ῥῆμα, means a prefiguration in a lower sphere of a fact belonging to a higher. It is allied to prophecy, allegory, and symbol: but prophecy is a prefiguration in words; type, in facts: allegory is a prefiguration through a fictitious image; type, in the form of full reality: symbol is a prefiguration by a hint which leads farther on through the natural association of ideas; type, as a complete, self-sufficient representation.

Types, in this sense of the word, are of so frequent occurrence, both in nature and history, that no total view of any comprehensiveness can be formed without involving a typical element; and, on the other side, it comes so natural to the human mind to discover types, or, rather, to recognize them, that no true method of interpretation, in any sphere, can afford to neglect that element. How prominent it was in scriptural interpretation at the time of Christ, the New Testament itself gives striking evidence. Christ represents the brazen serpent of the desert as the type of the crucifixion of the Son of man (John xii. 40), and Jonah as a type of the burial of the Son of man (Matt. xii. 40). Paul represents the first Adam as a type of the second Adam (Rom. v. 14), and the paschal lamb as a type of Christ (1 Cor. v. 7). It occurs in almost every book of the New Testament; and it was, indeed, one of the most prominent features of the general education and spiritual character of the age.

Led on by the spirit of the time, and partly, also, by the example of the New Testament, the Christian theologians plunged with all their heart into the “profound interpretation of Scripture,” putting the whole apparatus of types, allegories, symbols, etc., in full operation. In the Eastern Church the arbitrariness of Justin and Origen provoked both Jews and Pagans (Tryphon and Celsus). In the Western Church the exuberance of Ambrose and Hilary was hardly checked by Augustine. Although Augustine never abandons the historical sense, he considered it slavish weakness to stick to the literal sense, as the Jews did. He distinguishes between four methods of interpretation, — secundum historiam, csaololigam (which discovers the purpose of an event), analogiam (which demonstrates the harmony between the Old and the New Testaments), and allegoriam. Under the last head he further distinguishes between allegoria historia, facti, sermonis, and sacrament, which divisions correspond to the four methods of interpretation prevailing during the middle ages, — historic, allegorica (including the typical); tropologica (comprising the ethical and paratelic application); and anagogica (explaining the bearing upon future life).

With the Reformaion, the allegorical interpretation of Scripture came to a sudden end, at least so far as the evangelical church was concerned. Though Luther did not disdain to use the allegorical narrative as a means of edification, he, as well as Melancthon and the other Reformers, was fully aware of its illegitimacy when used as doctrinal evidence (see Apol., xii.). But, with the allegorical interpretation in general, the type, which had only a partial form of it, was not discarded. The Dutch theologian Rivetus made an acute and just distinction between type and allegory. The distinction was adopted by Gerhard (Loci, ii. 67), and farther developed into distinctions between literal and typical types, and between types insatis (established by Scripture itself) and types illati (introduced into Scripture by analogy). Finally, Coccejus and the other great Dutch theologians, Hulsius, D’Oultrem, Van Til, Vitringa, made the typical interpretation as prevalent in the Reformed Church as the allegorical had formerly been in the Church universal. The great interest with which Jewish antiquities were studied at that time pushed on the movement, and into what vagaries it strayed an instance from Cranmer’s De arca will show. Having represented the altar as a type of Christ, and having noticed that the altar is quadrangular, he asks, “Quadratus quomodo Christus fuisset?” (“How can Christ have been quadrangular?”) In the Lutheran Church the literal sense was above acknowledged as the true one, and typical interpretation was employed only as a means of edification. See Calov: Syn. theol., i. 669. Nevertheless, in the circle of the Wurttemberg Pietists, by Bengel and his pupils, the latter received a new and most interesting development; the types being sought, not in the trivial details, but in the grand totalities of the old and new dispensations. See Hiller: Neues System der Vorbilder Christi im Alten Testament, 1788, new ed., 1858.

It was, however, only within the narrow circle of the Wurttemberg Pietists that typology was really cultivated. Outside of that circle rationalism flourished, and to the eye of rationalism typical interpretation seemed a mere dream. An unbelieving view of the sacred history will never hit upon the true characteristics of the divine economy: where the religious reader finds preparation and fulfilment, the indifferent reader will find nothing but empty accommodation and subjective parallelisms. The Spencerian view of the Mosaic worship, as having been borrowed from the Egyptian and other Oriental religions, gradually destroyed the typical character of the Old Testament; and, towards the middle of the eighteenth century, Henke declared typology to be a “trick long ago played out.” Semler, in his Versuch einer freieren theologischen Lehrart, declares, that, at all events, typology has nothing to do with true religion; and the unhappy method of interpretation was considered as completely destroyed by Rau’s Freimüthige Untersuchung über die Typologie, 1784. It revived, however, with the general revival of religion in the beginning of the present century, and has since produced some of its finest fruits. See Hofmann: Was sagt und Erfüllung, Nördlingen, 1841, 2 vol., and Ed. Böhmer, on the Revelation, 1855, the chapter, Zur biblischen Typik. A. Tholuck.

TYRE (the Greek Τήρη, the Hebrew יְרֵי), a city of Phoenicia, and one of the most celebrated commercial centers of the ancient world, stood on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean, in latitude 33° 17’ north. It consisted of two parts, — one situated on the mainland, and called Old Tyre, for some reason not known; and the other, the city proper, situated on an island, and containing the principal portions of the temple. From the temple of Tyche it is first mentioned in Scripture in Josh. xix. 29, where it is spoken of as a fortified place. It was a monarchy, and not, like most of the great con-

After studying at Wittenberg and Leipzig, he became successively pastor at Mitweida, professor at Wittenberg in 1805, and professor of theology at Leipzig. He was also made pastor of St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig, and subsequently held other positions in connection with his professorship. He was a rationalist, with a strong leaning towards the supranaturalist school. He excelled as a pulpit orator. His principal work was his continuation of Schroër's Church History in 2 vols., Leipzig, 1810-12. He spent ten years upon a work edited by Niedner (Leipzig, 1829), Der Fall d. Heidenthums. His Lectures on Theology were edited by Karl Hase, Leipzig, 1829. See H. G. Tzschirner: Skizze s. Lebens, etc., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1828. —

(6) CROZER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY is situated fourteen miles south of Philadelphia, on the border of the city of Chester, in the borough of Upland, Delaware County, Penn. It was founded under the auspices of the Baptist denomination, by act of the Legislature, in 1867, and owes its name to the liberality of the children of John P. Crozer, Esq., then recently deceased, whose wide public munificence his family were simply carrying forward. For the establishment and permanent support of the institution they have contributed at least four hundred thousand dollars.

The seminary entered upon its work of instruction in the fall of 1868 with twenty students; graduated its first class in 1869, some having entered advanced in studies; and has now near two hundred alumni engaged in the work of the Christian ministry at home or abroad.

Its course of instruction extends through three years, and its diploma presupposes a thorough training in all those lines of study generally recognized as necessary to the candidate for the ministry. A special provision is made, however, for the training of those, also, who from any circumstances cannot pursue the study of the Bible in its original languages. They, on completing their course, receive a corresponding diploma.

GEORGE R. BLISS (Professor).
UBBONITES. A party of moderate Anabaptists founded in 1534 by Ubbo Philips (Ubbe Philippzoon). Born at Leuwarden, he was consecrated priest, and went with his brother, Dirk Philips, over to the Anabaptists in 1533. He displayed great zeal for the establishment of a strict church-discipline, and ordained Dirk, David Joris, and Menno Simons preachers. The Ubbonites differed from the rest of the Anabaptists by denying that the kingdom of Christ was an earthly kingdom in which the pious were to exterminate the wicked. They rejected divorce. Ubbo died in 1568, but left the Anabaptists several years before his death, on account of their excesses, and went over to the Reformed Church.

UBERTINUS, surnamed de Casali, from the place of his birth; d. about 1330; was one of the principal leaders of the strict party among the Franciscans, which insisted upon the rigid rule of poverty, and declared the church to be wholly corrupt. This party, led by Peter John Olivi (d. 1297), was condemned by Pope Alexander IV. (1255). Ubertiuns laid down his views in the work Arbor vitae crucifiri (Venice, 1485), and a Defence of Olivi (in Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. v., Rome, 1733). Called upon to answer for his opinions by Clement V., he went, with the permission of John XXII., over to the Benedictines, and at a later period changed to the Carthusians. He also wrote Tractatus de septemstatibus ecclesiae (a sort of commentary on the Apocalypse), Venice, 1516. NEUDECKER.

UBIQUITY is the designation of the doctrine stated by Luther, and held in the Lutheran Church, of the omnipresence of the humanity, and more especially of the body, of Christ. It was deduced from the doctrine of the hypostatic union of the two natures in Christ, and was designed to explain the real presence of the body in the Lord's Supper, upon which Luther insisted. The biblical passages for testing the doctrine are those which record the institution of the Lord's Supper, and refer to Christ's ascension, his session at the right hand of God (Eph. i. 20–23; Col. iii. 13; 1 Pet. iii. 22, etc.), and his presence with the church (Matt. xxviii. 20).

Origen and Gregory of Nyssa (Antirrheticus ad Apollinararem, c. 59) were the only ones of the Fathers who represent the glorified body of Christ as ubiquitous. Augustine expressly denies that the hypostatic union of the two natures had for its result that the human nature is everywhere, as God is everywhere (non est consequens, ut quod in Deo sit, ita sit ubique, ut Deus). The God-man is with his church everywhere in his majesty and grace, etc., but not in his flesh, which the Logos assumed. He is everywhere by reason of being God; but he is in heaven by reason of his human nature (ubique per id, quod Deus est, in caelo autem per id, quod homo). Thus he also said, in explanation of the word to the thief on the cross (Luke xxiii. 43), "Christ as man on that day, according to his flesh, would be in the grave; . . . but as God, that same Christ is always everywhere" (homo Christus ubi die secundum carnem in sepulcro . . . Deus vero ipse idem Christus ubique semper est, Ep. 187). With Augustine, "the right hand of God," at which Christ sits, is a restricted locality. John of Damascus denied the local explanation of the expression, "right hand of God," but held that Christ's glorified body is localized, and distinguished from his earthly body by its immunity from pain and want (De Ortho. Fide, iv. 1, 3).

In the middle ages the Augustinian view prevailed. Hugo of St. Victor, in his work on the sacraments (ii. 1, 13), says, "Christ as to his humanity is in heaven, as to his divinity everywhere" (Christus secundum humanitatem in caelo est, secundum divinitatem ubiqui). Peter Lombard (iii. 22), in the same tone, says that Christ as to his person is everywhere (totus ubique), but not as to his nature (seit non totum). The doctrine of the middle ages may be indicated by the three propositions: (1) Christ's divinity is ubiquitous; (2) His glorified body is confined to a certain celestial locality; (3) This same body is present by the miracle of transubstantiation wherever the Eucharist is celebrated.

It remained for Luther to formulate the doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's glorified body. He deduced it from the doctrine of the real presence in the Lord's Supper, and used it to explain the real presence. Although as early as 1520 he called the doctrine of transubstantiation the second prison in which the Roman Church had confined the consciences of men, he spoke of the Piaras of Bohemia as "heretics, because they do not believe that Christ's flesh and blood are truly present in the sacrament." His doctrine of the real presence was expressed in the words, the body and blood of Christ are "in, with, and under" the bread and the wine. He says, "The glorified body is in all the parts of the substance of bread," and illustrates it by the relation of fire and iron, "two distinct substances, and yet mingled in one glowing mass of iron, so that every part is iron and fire." There is an interpenetration of the body and bread, but no mixture. The clearest statement of Luther's views on this subject is found in his work on the Lord's Supper (1528), in the chapter headed De praedicatioane identica. As in Christ, divinity and humanity were united in one person, and interpenetrated each other without any change, so, in the Lord's Supper, bread and body were united in a sacramental way, and interpenetrated each other without any change. In order to explain this process, Luther affirmed the ubiquity of the humanity and body of Christ. "Not only as to his divinity, but also to his humanity, he is everywhere present," he expressly says. "Heaven and earth are a bag, and as grain fills the bag, so he fills heaven and earth; and as my voice reaches so many ears, how much more can Christ distribute himself totally and indistinguishably in so many pieces!" The right hand of Christ was not a definite spot, but it is everywhere where God is. The three reasons he gives for the real presence are, that God is essentially and truly God and man in one person, that God's right hand is everywhere, and that God's word is not false.

Zwingli, Calvin, and Ecolampadius distinctly rejected the doctrine of ubiquity in rejecting Luther's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Melanchthon in his earlier period taught the doctrine of ubiquity, in 1530 edited a number of patristic testimonies to confirm the real presence, and expressly antagonized Zwingli's view that Christ's body can only be in one place. At a later period he renounced these views, and distinctly stated (Responsio de controversia Stancari) that "Christ is everywhere, but only according to his divine nature." In 1562 Joachim Westphal renewed the sacramental controversy, which seemed to have been ended, by denouncing Calvin as a Zwinglian; and at the synod of Stuttgart, Dec. 19, 1559, the Württemberg church re-affirmed Luther's doctrine of ubiquity, which was thus made for a protracted period the centre of all investigations in christology. Brenz, the most prominent theologian in Germany after Melanchthon's death, was the author of this document, and developed his views in the following works: De personali unione durum naturarum in Christo, 1561; De libello H. Bullingeri, 1561; De majestate Dom. nos. Jesu Christi et de vera presentia, 1562. He insisted upon the union of the two natures in one person and the communication to the humanity of the majesty of the divinity; so that Christ in the totality of his nature fills heaven and earth. "For if the Deity of Christ were anywhere without his humanity, there would be two persons, not one."

The Wittenberg school, which followed Melanchthon, could not, of course, accept this statement of Württemberg. Both the two parties, Martin Chemnitz took up his position as a mediator. He held that Christ is present with his whole person (divinity and humanity) in the Lord's Supper: and yet the glorified body is not omnipresent, but multispresent or volupresent; that is, its presence was subject to the will of Christ, and not confined absolutely to one locality. Beza (Refutatio dogmatis de ficticia carnis Christi omnipotentia, etc.), Danaeus (Examen. libri de duabus in Chr. naturis a M. Chemniti conscripti, Geneva, 1581), Ursinus, and others opposed these views. Hutter and Hünnius returned to the stricter view of Luther, which again prevailed. In the last century the doctrine was not much discussed. In the present century Philippi has sought to revive and prove it in its strict form as held by Luther.

Among English and American theologians, the doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's body has never been a prominent subject, or even seriously discussed. Professor Hitchcock has advocated the "potential ubiquity" of the God-man. "In this sense is he ubiquitous, that he may anywhere, at any moment, reveal himself in his God-manhood to the willing soul. Such ubiquity best explains the vision of the martyred Stephen, the vision of Paul near Damascus," etc.

ULLMANN, Karl, one of the first evangelical theologians of this century in Germany; the son of a clergyman; was b. at Epfenbach, near Heidelberg, March 15, 1796; d. at Carlsruhe, Jan. 12, 1865. In 1812 he entered the university of Heidelberg, where Paulus, Daub, and Schwarz were teaching their different systems of theology, and in 1813 passed to Daub's advice. Here he got admission to the circle of Uhland's friends, and formed an intimate friendship with the poet Gustav Schwab, which was only terminated by death. In 1817 he was ordained vicar of Kirchheim, near Heidelberg, but a year later, at the suggestion of his friends, began to prepare himself for a professional career; took up his studies again at Heidelberg, and went to Berlin, where, under the influence especially of Neander, he adopted that evangelical type of theology of which he became one of the most genial and distinguished representatives. In 1819 Ullmann began to lecture at Heidelberg, and in 1821 was elected professor. In 1825 he published a work on Gregory Nazianzen, which deserves a place at the side of Neander's monographs. In 1828 he founded, in connection with Ümbrecht, the Theologische Studien u. Kritiken ("Theological Studies and Discussions"). It became the chief organ of the evangelical school of theology, represented by Neander, etc. The opening article, on the sinlessness of Jesus (Über die Unsündigkeit Jesu), was subsequently published in an enlarged form under the title Die Sündlosigkelt Jesu ("The Sinlessness of Jesus," Eng. trans. from the 7th ed., Edinburgh, 1870), which then passed through seven editions (7th ed., 1883), and was one of the most valuable and influential writings of the modern evangelical school in Germany. In 1829 Ullmann followed a call to Halle, where he lectured on church history, symbols, and systematic theology. In 1833 an article appeared from his pen on John Wessel, which he afterwards incorporated in his principal historical work, Die Reformatoren vor d. Reformation, [2d ed., 1866, 2 vols., Eng. trans., "The Reformers before the Reformation," Edinburgh, 1841-42, 2 vols.]. It is characterized by thoroughness of treatment, and grace and fervor of style. In 1839 he returned to Heidelberg. He wrote a number of articles against Strauss's "Life of Christ" (1835) and the principles it involved, one of which, directed against Strauss's suggestion of a change in the nature of public worship, was published, with a dedication to Gustav Schwab, under the title Über den Cultus u. Genius ("The Worship of Genius," 1839). Hitchcock has advocated the "potential ubiquity" of the God-man. "In this sense is he ubiquitous, that he may anywhere, at any moment, reveal ested in the practical government of the church, and, when the controversy about the union of the confessions began, wrote, at length and repeatedly in the Studien upon subjects suggested. Some of these articles were printed separately, as Ueber d. Verhältniss von Staat u. Kirche. In 1853 he was appointed prelat [an officer with functions somewhat similar to those of a bishop], and, unfortunately for himself, accepted the position. He threw himself with earnestness into the management of the ecclesiastical duties of the position, and in 1856 was appointed director of the supreme ecclesiastical council (Oberkirchenrathe). In this position he found himself constantly at variance with the ministers of the cabinet; and his efforts to introduce a new liturgy, etc., aroused serious opposition, and called forth the criticism that he was seeking to introduce re-actionary, hierarchical, and high-church movements. Unwilling to be the mere subordinate of the ministry, and to face longer the opposition in the ranks of the clergy, he resigned his office in 1861. He was thenceforth without any public office, and devoted his energies to the editing of the Studien. During the last years of his life he suffered from a complication of physical infirmities.

Ullmann was not one of the creative minds and prophetic men who cut new paths for the church and theology; but he was one of the noblest characters, and had one of the most highly gifted minds, which the German Church can boast of in our century. He was, in the best sense of the word, a Christian humanist, whose writings and example are still exercising a blessed influence. He died after hearing repeated, at his own request, the last two verses of Paul Gerhard's hymn, O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden. See W. BEYSchLAG: D. Karl Ullmann, Gotha, 1866; [SCHAFF: Germany and its Universities, pp. 345 sqq.], WILLIBALD BEYSchLAG.

ULPHILAS, the Apostle of the Goths (313–383). According to the Arian church historian, Philostorgius (Hist. Eccl., 15: 49), who was corroborated by other Greek church historians, he belonged to a Cappadocian family which was carried away from its homestead as prisoners of war by the Goths, but which soon found itself so well installed among the captors, and so closely allied to them, that the son received a Gothic name, Wulfa ("Little Wolf"). He was educated in Christianity and in Greek learning, and on account of his great natural gifts he was destined for the church. The Goths, at that time settled on the northern bank of the Danube, just outside the pale of the Roman Empire, were rank heathens; but they were converted by Ulpilas. His missionary labor among them must have begun very early; for in 343 he was ordained their bishop, probably by an Arian bishop, since he himself afterwards declared that Arianism had always been his faith. How successful his work was may be inferred from the fact that the Gothic chief Athanaric became frightened, and instituted a violent persecution in 350. But Ulpilas obtained permission from the Emperor Constantius to immigrate with his flock of converts to the Roman Empire, and to settle in Moesia near Nicopolis, at the foot of Mount Hemus. Meanwhile the mission among the Goths north of the Danube did not stop its work; and in 370 a new persecution brought a new flock of Gothic converts into the Roman Empire, under the protection of the Emperor Valens. Shortly after, a Gothic chief, Frithigern, embraced Christianity, and his whole tribe following his example: and finally Athanaric himself was won for the new faith, which simply meant that the conversion of the whole Gothic nation was completed. They were Arians; and on Jan. 17, 385, a council was opened in Constantinople for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation between the Arian Goths and the Orthodox Greek Church. It is probable that Ulpilas was present at that council. Its purpose, however, was not accomplished. See the art. Goths.

In his missionary work, Ulpilas had use, not only for his natural gifts, but also for the accomplishments of his education. One of his most effective means of success was, no doubt, his translation of the Bible into the vernacular tongue of the Goths, for which he had to invent a new alphabet, a combination of Greek and Runic letters: it is the oldest existing monument of any Teutonic language. Whether he translated the whole Bible, or only portions, is doubtful: only fragments have come down to us. Seven codices have been discovered,— Codex Argenteus, written on purple vellum in gold and silver letters, dating from the sixth century, discovered in 1587 in the Benedictine abbey of Werden, now preserved in the library of Upsala, and published with diplomatic accuracy by Upptström (1854); Codex Carolinus, discovered in the library of Wolfenbüttel in 1756, and published in 1762–63; finally, palimpsest fragments of five codices discovered in the Ambrosian library at Milan by Angelo Mai, and published 1819–38. The best collected editions of these fragments are those by Von der Gabelentz and Hoebe, Leip., 1836–46, with Latin version, grammar, and lexicon; E. Bernhardt, Halle, 1875, with full critical notes; and Stammers, Paderborn, 1878 (7th ed. by M. Heyne), the most convenient manual edition. Compare The Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels in Parallel Columns with the Versions of Wycliffe and Tyndale, by Jos. Bosworth, London, 1874, 2d ed.; and SKEAT: The Gospel of St. Mark in Gothic, Oxford, 1882, with glossary, grammar, and notes.

ULRICH, Bishop of Augsburg, the son of Hupald, Count of Dillingen, was b. at Augsburg in 890; d. there July 4, 973. Made bishop in 923, he administered his diocese with conspicuous vigor and ability, and proved himself one of the greatest ecclesiastics of his day. Twice during his episcopate the Magyars laid siege to Augsburg. The first time (928) he mingled his prayers with the cries of the babes who were laid prostrate on the earth before the altar; the second time (955) he displayed great courage and firmness, and held out against great odds, till relieved by the army of the king. Ulrich practised a princely liberality, and laid Augsburg under obligation to him by the construction of chapels, churches, and houses. He was zealous in the observance of the hours of worship, and on many days celebrated three masses. He was strict towards the clergy, and at a synod in Augsburg (1532) he insisted upon the practice of celibacy. In his regard for relics, he made a journey to St. Moritz to secure some trophies of the Thebais legion, and to Rome to get the head of St. Abundus. The latter years of his life he spent in a convent, as a Benedictine, and died on a floor sprinkled with ashes. His relics were regarded as possessing a miraculous virtue; and John XV., in 993, pronounced him a saint,—the first example of a special Papal decree demanding reverence for a saint. A work entitled Catalogus testium veritatis, first printed by Flacius in 1560, and protesting against the celibacy of the clergy, is wrongly ascribed to Ulrich. See Gra-

ULTRAMONTANE, or ULTRAMONTANISTS (from the Latin, ultra montes, "beyond the mountains," referring to the regions within the Roman-Catholic Church, applied to those who wish to see all power in the church concentrated in the Pope, in opposition to those who desire a more independent development of the national churches.

UMBREIT, Friedrich Wilhelm Karl, distinguishing editor (from 1828) of the Theolog. Studien und Kritiken ("Theological Studies and Discussions"), and an exponent of the Old Testament; was b. at Sonneborn, near Gotha, April 11, 1795; d. at Heidelberg, April 26, 1860. He studied at Göttingen, where Eichhorn inspired him with enthusiasm for Oriental studies, and became privatdocent there in 1818. He accepted a call to Heidelberg as professor in 1820. Here he spent a quiet and happy life in the midst of an affectionate family and a large circle of friends. Rothe, in his funeral-address, speaks of "the childlikeness and broadness of his personal Christianity," while Eichhorn, who had been a "bridge" to the study of the Old Testament, the beauty of whose poetry, and the divinity of whose contents, he profoundly recognized. It was his effort to find out the meaning of the Scriptures, and to secure for the Old Testament its proper place in Christian theology. Without being an Orientalist in the present sense of the term, he had an accurate knowledge of Hebrew, and a fine sense of appreciation for the characteristic traits of Oriental life; and without laying claim to being a keen critic, or a stern dogmatist, he entered into sympathy with the feelings of the men of God in the Old Testament. His first commentary was on Ecclesiastes (Gotha, 1818); it was followed by commentaries on the Song of Solomon (Lied d. Liebe, d. älteste u. schönste aus d. Morgen-lands. Neu übersetzt u. ästhetisch erklärt, Göttingen, 1820, 2d ed., Heidelberg, 1828); Job (Heidelberg, 1824, 2d ed., 1822), the Proverbs (Phil.-krit. u. histor. Hinführung zum Salomon, 1829), the Psalms (mit einer neuen Übersetzung u. einer Einleitung in d. morgenländische Weisheit überhaupt u. in d. hebräisch-salamonische insbesondere, Heidelberg, 1829), the prophetic books, except Jonah and Daniel (Hamb, 1841-46, 4 vols., Isaiah appearing in a second edition in 1846), Romans (Gotha, 1866). Umbreit's commentaries are practical, and display a profound sympathy with the life of the Old Testament. Whatever may be the opinion about their literary merits, there can be no doubt that he opened the eyes and hearts of many to the beauties and religion of the Old Testament, and that his whole personality, adorned as it was "with a rare combination of divine gifts and virtues," was one of the most beneficent influences in the history of the Vermittelungstheologie; [i.e., the conciliatory, unionistic school of modern German theology]. UNCIAL (from uncial, the "twelfth part" of any thing) and CURSIVE (i.e., in running, sc., hand) MANUSCRIPTS. The former are written in capital letters (litterae unicales, or majuscule), usually, but not necessarily, of large size; the latter, in small letters (litterae minusculae), or in current hand. The uncial manuscripts are older. New-Testament manuscripts of this character vary in age from the fourth (Sinaitic and Vatican) to the tenth century. The Sinaitic is the only complete manuscript of the New Testament. The uncial manuscripts are extant and written upon costly and durable velum or parchment, on quarto or small folio pages of one, two, even, though very rarely, of three or four columns. The older ones have no division of words or sentences, except for paragraphs, no accents or ornamented letters, and but very few name-marks. The manuscripts are designated by Roman capitals, Greek letters after Cod., and the Hebrew Aleph for the Cod. Sinaiticus. The number of uncial New-Testament manuscripts was probably once large; but they perished during the middle age, and now only eighty-three distinct manuscripts (not including lectionaries) are extant. The cursive manuscripts are indicated by Arabic numerals, number over a thousand, date from the ninth to the middle of the fifteenth century, are upon vellum, parchement, cotton paper (which came into use in the ninth or tenth century), are on lined paper (first introduced in the twelfth century). The comparatively late date decreases their critical value; but "some twenty or thirty of them are very important for their agreement with the oldest authority, or for some other peculiarity." UNIFORMITY. Acts of, denote several parliamentary decrees establishing the worship and ritual of the Church of England. The first, passed in 1549, set forth the penalties for the neglect to use the First Service-Book, which were, for the first offence, loss of the profits of one benefice for a year, and imprisonment for one year; for the second, loss of all benefices, and imprisonment for one year; for the third, imprisonment for life. The second Act was passed April 6, 1552, and established the revised Book of Common Prayer. The third and principal Act of Uniformity (after a strong opposition, passed April 28, 1558), established the new Prayer-Book under penalties similar to those of Edward VI., subjected all who were absent from church without excuse to a fine of one shilling, and gave to the sovereign liberty to “ordain and publish such further ceremonies and rites as may be most for the advancement of the church,” etc. A fourth Act of Uniformity was passed May 19, 1662, and enforced the new revision of the Prayer-Book. It required all ministers to give their unfeigned assent and consent to every thing in the book before Aug. 24, and to swear “that it is not lawful, on any pretense whatsoever, to take up arms against the king.” About two thousand clergy-men, some of them the most distinguished in England, unable to conform, were deprived of their livings. Neal, referring to the Elizabethan Act, says, “Upon this fatal rock of uniformity in things merely indifferent, in the opinion of the imposers, was the peace of the Church of England split” (History of Puritanism, i. p. 78, Harper’s ed.). The Act of Uniformity was set aside by the Act of Toleration under William and Mary, May 24, 1689.

UNIGENITUS is the name of that famous bull which Clement XI. issued (Sept. 8, 1713), at the instance of the Jesuits, in condemnation of the propositions condemned by the Pope. It was the peace of the Church of England split” (History of Puritanism, i. p. 78, Harper’s ed.). The Act of Uniformity was set aside by the Act of Toleration under William and Mary, May 24, 1689.

UNION OF CHURCHES. The first difference which entered Christendom, and threatened to split the Christian congregation, was that between Jewish and Gentile Christianity. It was hardly a difference either of doctrine or constitution, but simply one of social habits: nevertheless, it was important, even dangerous; and widely various views were held with respect to the solution of the problem it presented. Some thought that the Gentile Christians were not Christians in the full sense of the word, that they could never be considered as brethren, that baptism ought to be denied them, etc.; others, among whom was Paul, thought that it was not necessary to circumcise a Gentile in order to make him a Christian, that the Gentile Christians should not be bound by the Jewish law, etc. From the very first, however, there seems to have been a third party, a middle party; and at the synod of Jerusalem (Acts xv.) a reconciliation was easily brought about. Each party set forth its own views, the Jewish Christians the obligation of the law; the Gentile Christians, the unlimited freedom of social habits; and thus the Christian congregation became able to present itself before the infinite as one social body, based on one common faith.

Much deeper, and consequently much more difficult to manage, was the difference which separated the Greek and Latin churches: it was one not of social habits, but of nationality. In spite of her social and political superiority, the Latin Church lived for a long time in complete doctrinal adhesion to the Greek Church. But when, with one gigantic effort, Augustine developed the theology of the Latin Church, the internal difference between the two churches at once became manifest. The principal events which gave it practical shape were the Henotikon of Zeno (498), the decrees of the Concilium quinquecentum (892), and the controversy in the ninth century between Nicholas I. and Photius. But it must not be overlooked, that, besides the national difference between East and West, the monarchical tendency of the Church of Rome—developed by Victor I., Stephen I., Leo the Great, Gregory the Great, and gradually established as the informing principle of her whole policy—exercised a powerful influence; and when the Council of Constantinople (867), instead of recognizing the supremacy of the Pope, excommunicated him, the separation was accomplished. From the fact, however, that the various attempts at union which were afterwards made were wrecked, not on the vanity and fickleness of the governing classes, but on the instinctive dislike and distrust of the mass of the peoples, it is evident that the split was not caused simply by a clash between sacerdotal ambitions, but had its roots deep in the nature of the people. A compact of union was subscribed by the Greek and Latin delegates at the Council of Lyons (1274), and accepted both by the emperor and the Pope; but it could not be carried out on account of the fanaticism of the Greek people. A similar compact, compromising the principal doctrinal divergences, and recognizing the supremacy of the Pope, was subscribed at the Council of Florence (1439), but proved to be of a little practical consequence.

A still more decisive difference was established by the Reformation between the Roman-Catholic Church and the Evangelical churches. It was not one of social habits or nationality, but one of principle. By the Protestant principle, the unity of form was given up for the truth of the contents, and evangelical freedom was substituted for the despotism of tradition. It must not be understood, however, that, in the historical process from which the separation resulted, all the advantages were on the one side. The Protestant principle was not an invention of the Reformers. It has been present and at work in the Church from the day of her foundation, latent, unrecognized, suppressed, but never destroyed. On the other hand, the Roman-Catholic Church did not die by the separation, but continued to be the harbinger of much true religious life. These views were openly set forth by Hugo Grotius, in his On the Truth of the Christian Religion and other tracts; and in his annotated edition of Cassander’s Consultation (1641) he even went so far as to recommend, under certain conditions, the Papacy, as a way to prevent the danger of liberalism, at the basis of the theological system of Calvist (see that article and SYNCRETISM); and they actually prompted Leibnitz to undertake his attempts at uniting the Church of Rome and the Evangelical Church. If any man was fit for such an undertaking, he was. His philosophy gave him
UNITARIANISM.

The origin of this system of theology was in the rejection of the Trinity, or the doctrine of three persons—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—existing in the Godhead, and constituting one God. As monothelitism was the antipode of polytheism, Unitarianism is the antipode of Tritarianism. But associated with this fundamental doctrine are the denials, in general, of the fall of man in Adam as the federal head of the race, the total depravity of human nature, the vicarious atonement of Christ, and eternal punishment; and the affirmations of the mission of Christ to make a revelation of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; of the dignity of human nature, but its elementary and incomplete condition; of man's natural sonship to God; of sin, not as natural, but unnatural, to man; of a holy and social love to God and love to man; and of the destiny of all mankind to holiness and happiness by the grace of God, and man's moral discipline here and hereafter. The Unitarians regard the atonement as a moral agency designed to draw men to God, and reconcile, or make them at one, with God, as the term signifies, rather than as a legal or governmental expedient, or as a vicarious substitute in a literal sense to cancel human sins. Jesus, speaking of his cross, said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Christ is variously regarded as a being between God and man; or as a man superhumanly endowed, impeccable, and infallible; or as a mere man on the natural plane, but a natural religious genius of great power. The second view is the more common one among modern Unitarians. The Holy Spirit is identified with God himself, or the spirit of man constituted man. The Holy Spirit indicates the holy influence which the mind of God exerts upon the mind of man. The prevailing views in regard to a future life are that of the inborn immortality of the soul, that of perpetual progress, and that of the hopeful, rather than the assertive, belief of the eventual restoration of all men to holiness and happiness,—conditions which Unitarians believe to be inseparably connected.

The methods of attaining these results, and the working principles of this body of believers, are: (1) The Protestant canon of the right of private judgment; (2) Reason, or the moral and religious nature of man, as the final arbiter where creeds clash, or the doctors disagree; (3) The interpretation of the Scriptures after the spirit rather than the letter. This method of interpreting the Bible as an Oriental book, poetical, parabolic, and often paradoxical, has justified many of the Unitarian as well as Protestant conclusions in general, in regard to theological doctrines. Thus the expression, "I and my Father are one," is not taken literally, as teaching identity of nature, and personality with the Father, but that union of will, love, and purpose with the Father, which is also predicated in the oneness of Christ and his apostles. "Labor not for the meat that perisheth," etc., is a Hebraism to exhort to seek spiritual ends in life more earnestly than material interests. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," is not a lesson of the actual presence, but of the necessity of nourishing the soul with the teaching of Jesus, and blending it with the whole spiritual constitution as thoroughly as food is digested, and assimilated to the body. The delivery of the keys of the kingdom of heaven to Peter, and his authority to bind and loose, are explained and qualified elsewhere by the same distinction being granted to the whole body of the apostles. The declaration that a man must hate his father and his mother in order to be an accepted disciple of Christ, is well understood by the Hebrew scholar to signify, not the literal hatred of parents, a sense the farthest possible from the spirit of Jesus, but the preference of spiritual to natural interests. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," is not a lesson of the actual presence, but of the necessity of nourishing the soul with the teaching of Jesus, and blending it with the whole spiritual constitution as thoroughly as food is digested, and assimilated to the body. The history of Unitarianism is claimed to date back to the time of Christ and his apostles as preachers of pure monotheism. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," is declared by the Master to be the first and great commandment. Early church Fathers and writers, under varying forms of language at the perpetual unity of God. The term "trinity" as applied to the Godhead is not found in the Scriptures, nor was it employed by any writer till Tertullian, about A.D. 200. It is argued that the thing did not exist, because the name descriptive of the thing did not come into use till that time. Unitarians, accordingly, regard the whole system of theology known as Trinitarian, or Orthodox, as a gradual development from the time the Gentiles, imbued with Oriental speculation or Greek philosophy, entered the Christian Church. The school of Alexandria hellenized Christian thought, and the Platonic doctrine of the Logos led to the dual deification of Christ. But alongside of this tendency, step by step, proceeded a counter-movement—led by Theodotus, Artemon, Paul of Samosata, Arius, and others of the early writers—to maintain the strict unity of God in Christian belief. In the battle of words between homo- and homoeousian, of the same substance or of like substance, as applied to the nature of Christ, Arius maintained that he was a created being. The climax was reached at the Council of Nicea (A.D. 325), when, after an im bittered debate, the doctrines of the unity of God and the subordinate nature of the Son with the Father were established. It is an opinion held by many Catholic and some Protestant advocates of the Trinity, that this dogma came in the development of the church, rather than as a doctrine revealed or taught in the Scriptures; also it is a remarkable fact, that no single passage or verse of the Old or New Testament is received as an assured proof-text of the Trinity by the unanimous consent of all Trinitarian writers: some ground their faith on one passage, some on another. Griesbach and Tischendorf, two of the most distinguished Trinitarian critics of the text of the New Testament, reject as spurious 1 John v. 7, and read (Acts xx. 28) "the church of the Lord," instead of "the church of God," and (1 Tim. iii. 16), "he who was manifested," instead of "God was manifested." These emendations remove some of the most decided proof-texts of the Trinity. Unitarians also claim that John i. 1 and Rom. ix. 6 are erroneously quoted and interpreted as proofs of the Trinity. The new revised translation in general favors their criticism and interpretation.

Before the Reformation, Unitarian opinions, though not under that name, were in existence in various parts of Christendom. Some suffered martyrdom for the faith. Adam Duff, for his adherence to the ancient religious institutions, and spreading the kingdom of God on earth. Faith, as a sentiment of the heart, is the uniting tie, rather than the declaration of a series of intellectual and dogmatic propositions. This was the original Puritan method. In this light it is remarkable that the identical covenants used by some of the primitive churches in New England in the first settlement of the country have been still in active use down to the present day, though those covenants are now Unitarian sentiments received a new impulse, and led to new martyrdoms; for both Catholics and Prot...

estants united to destroy the heresy. Among these confessors and martyrs were Ludwig Hetzer, Michael Servetus, and Gentilia in Switzerland; Paleologus, Segar, Guirlandas, and hundreds of others in Italy; Flekwyk in Holland; George von Parris, Joan Bocher (called “the Maid of others”), Bartholomew Legate, Hanmont, Lewes, Ket, Wright, Wightman, and many others in England; Thomas Aikenhead in Scotland; Catharine Vogel, at the age of eighty, in Poland; and Doleat France. The Socini and others were banished from Italy; John Biddle died in prison in England, and Francis David in Transylvania.

In Poland the Unitarian faith was spread by refugees from less tolerant lands. In 1562 the Bible was translated, chiefly by Unitarian scholars and divines, into the Polish tongue. Faustus Socinus came hither from Italy. All ranks of society, nobles and commoners, felt the power of the faith, and awakened the bitter jealousy of Rome. In the city of Leipzig, a heathen of the doctrines of the Unitarian Church was printed and widely circulated, and drew so much attention that it was publicly burned in London by order of Parliament. The king of Poland, Sigismund II., became a convert himself to the faith. Such was its flourishing condition for a century, till 1660, when Cardinal Caraffa, a Jesuit, coming to the throne, burned the houses of its disciples and believers, and drove them to exile or death, thus by the same blow killing a church and a nation. The theological works of the Polish Brethren, in eight thick volumes folio, remain as the monument of their zeal and faith. Driven from Poland, many Unitarians took refuge in Transylvania. Faustus Socinus and Georgio Blandrata were prominent leaders. Transylvania tolerated four forms of faith,—the Roman Catholic, the Reformed Evangelical, the Lutheran, and the Unitarian. The bishop Francis David, however, under subsequent persecution, was cast into prison, where he died in 1579,—an event which received in 1879 its tercentenary celebration in the land of his martyrdom. In their most flourishing condition the Unitarians of Transylvania possessed four hundred church-buildings, eleven clerical residences, thirty in the British Colonies—Canada, India, Australia—several more. Divinity schools for the education of ministers are established in Manchester, Carmarthen, and London. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association was formed on May 24, 1825,—the same year, month, and day as the American Unitarian Association in Boston, though without concert. The National Unitarian Conference of Great Britain was first organized at Liverpool in the spring of 1882. The periodicals are the Modern Review, the Inquirer, the Unitarian Herald, the Christian Life, and some local papers. Among the eminent leaders, lay and clerical, may be mentioned Drs. Price, Samuel Clarke, Priestley, Belsham, Lardner, Sharpe, Bowring, Taylor, Thom, and especially James Martineau, one of the greatest living exponents of a Christian spiritual philosophy against materialism and agnosticism.

In America, while the church of the Puritans was strictly Calvinist and Trinitarian at the outset, the keynote of progress had been struck by John Robinson in his famous farewell to the Pilgrims of “The Mayflower,” that “there was more light to break out from God’s word.” Dr. Gay of Hingham, ordained in 1717, was probably the earliest preacher of Unitarianism. Dr. Mayhew, of the West Church, Boston, advocated liberal sentiments. In 1783 Dr. James Freeman, of King’s Chapel, Boston, the grandfather of Dr. James Freeman Clarke, removed from the Book of Common Prayer all references to the Trinity, or the Deity, and worship of Christ; and his church from that time on became distinctly Unitarian. In 1801 the Plymouth Church, the oldest of the Puritan faith in America, declared itself, by a large vote, Unitarian. Organized usually on the basis of covenants instead of creeds, the New-England churches, without any violent change in their articles of union, gradually adopted the new faith. Dr. Henry Ware, the first American professor of divinity at Cambridge. Zealous controversies were waged between Dr. Woods and Dr. Ware, and Dr. Channing and Dr. Worcester.
UNITARIANS.

Dr. Channing, in 1819, in his Baltimore sermon at the ordination of Jared Sparks, gave the Unitarian Declaration of Independence. From that date he became the foremost leader of this faith, not only in America, but throughout the world. His works have been translated into the languages of Europe, and are known and read throughout the English-speaking world. Bunsen, in his work entitled "God in History," says of Channing, "A grand Christian saint and man of God, nay, also, a prophet of the Christian consciousness regarding the future." In April, 1880, the centenary of his birth was celebrated in America and many other countries; and an issue of a hundred thousand copies of a complete edition of his works was circulated in a cheap and popular form in England; and a Channing Memorial Church was dedicated at his birthplace, Newport, R.I. On May 24, 1825, the American Unitarian Association was formed, whose headquarters are in Boston, Mass., whose purpose is declared to be "to diffuse, and promote the interests, of pure Christianity." Besides many home missions, Rev. C. H. Dall and associated laborers are employed in a foreign mission at Calcutta in India. On April 5, 1865, the National Unitarian Conference was organized in New York City, for the promotion of "the cause of Christian faith and work." The Western Conference was created in 1852. Thirty-nine state, local, auxiliary, ministerial, benevolent, or Sunday-school associations and conferences express the activity of the missionary, educational, and philanthropic work of the body. There are two theological schools,—one at Cambridge, Mass., and the other at Medford, Penn. The periodicals are the Unitarian Review, the Christian Register, Unity, the Day-spring, and several local papers. The number of Unitarian churches in America, according to the "Year-Book" of 1883, is three hundred and sixty.

The actual Unitarian faith of the country, so far as the doctrine of the Trinity is concerned, has been computed to number at least three thousand churches, including not only the Unitarians proper, but the Universalists, the Christians (so-called), the Hicksite Quakers, the Progressive Friends, and some other minor bodies.

UNITARIANS. This title is given to those persons, but one God,—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The term appears to have been used first in Poland and in Transylvania, and derived from "Unitas Fratrum" (Unitated Brethren), the name employed by the Moravians. There is also a political party in Buenos Ayres, South America, devoted to centralization in government, called United Brethren.

UNITAS FRATRUM. See Moravians.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, a denomination of evangelical Christians, Arminian in doctrine, founded by Philip William Otterbein in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Mr. Otterbein, a man of thorough learning and liberal culture, came to America, in the year 1722, as a missionary of the German Reformed Church. His first charge was at Lancaster, Penn.; afterward he served congregations at Tulpehocken in the same State, Frederick, Md., York, Penn., and Baltimore City,—the last from 1774 to the time of his death, in 1813. He always experienced what he regarded as his first real change of heart, and his ministry thereonforward assumed a deeply spiritual character. Impelled by a fervent desire to save men, he began early to hold frequent evangelistic services, a practice which he continued until late in life. He instituted, also, special prayer and experience meetings, and encouraged believers to give expression to their faith and spiritual experience. In pursuing his evangelistic labors, he made numerous visits to surrounding places, near and remote, often conducted largely attended open-air meetings, and invited to a hearty co-operation all spiritually minded persons of whatever name or church. He found congenial association with such men as Asbury of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, Boehm of the Mennonite Church, and others of other names. His broader labors resulted in the organization of numerous societies of converts, who, because of their former and more earnest spiritual life, frequently found it difficult to remain in harmonious connection with their parent churches. To supply these people with the ministration of the word, he appointed or approved for them teachers, who visited them at irregular intervals, expounded to them the gospel, and encouraged them to continue faithful in their religious life. As the work extended, it became necessary to devise a regular system of supply; and conferences of ministers, chiefly for this purpose, began to be held. Finally, in the year 1800, at one of these conferences, these scattered societies were organized into one body; and the name "United Brethren in Christ" was adopted, and the official title of the denomination thus formed. Mr. Otterbein and Mr. Boehm were chosen bishops. The people thus organized spoke at that time almost exclusively the German language: at the present time that language is used by less than four per cent of the membership. The government of the church is vested primarily in a General Conference, holding quadrennial sessions. The delegates are ministers only, but are chosen by the church at large. There are also annual conferences, whose powers are chiefly executive, and of which laymen or members are given to those being entitled to one lay-representative. The bishops are elected by the General Conference quadrennially.
also the editors, publishing-house manager and the several general boards with their executive officers. The churches are supplied with pastors on the itinerant plan, the ministers being appointed to their charges by a stanting committee. Presiding elders, elected by their respective conferences, have general supervision over districts, or subdivisions of the annual conferences. The denomination has 10 colleges, 5 seminaries and academies, and 1 theological seminary, 99 instructors, and 1,775 students, 43 of the students being in the theological seminary. The church owns, and through the General Conference controls, a publishing-house, located at Dayton, O., whose net capital on April 1, 1888, was $192,562.89. The house publishes 9 weekly, monthly, semi-monthly, and quarterly periodicals, with an aggregate average circulation of 225,224 copies for the year ending as above. The house is free of debt, and has a surplus fund in its treasury.

A thoroughly organized missionary society is in existence since 1853. Its foreign missions are in West Africa and Germany. The moneys raised specifically for these missions, during the period of its existence amount to about $2,000,000. A woman's missionary society, organized in 1877, also has missions in Africa and Germany. The operations of both these societies, especially in West Africa, have resulted in marked success. A general Sunday-school board was organized by the General Conference in 1845, and a church-erection society and a general educational board in 1869.

The general statistics of the church for 1882 show a membership of 150,542; itinerant ministers, 1,257; local ministers, 983; scholars in Sunday schools, 185,749; teachers and officers in Sunday schools, 25,690. On questions of reform, such as temperance and slavery, the historical attitude of the church is that of strong radicalism; its position on the latter question preventing, before the war, any considerable extension in the Southern States. The church also forbids its members to join in religious membership in secret societies. The territories, in which the denomination is chiefly from Pennsylvania, Maryland, Northern Virginia, and Western New York, in nearly parallel lines westward, and extending to the Pacific coast.

LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA. — In the discovery, settlement, and historical development of the country, scientific curiosity, bold enterprise, ambition, self-interest, as well as religious motives, have conspired. Columbus was a religious enthusiast, and intended his discoveries should spread the Christian religion among the people in which plan he had the hearty co-operation of Queen Isabella of Spain. Indeed, he designed the dedication of a portion of his expected gains to the fitting-out of a crusade to the Holy Land; so that the solution of the Occidental question should lead to the solution of the Oriental question in its greatest extent, and the ends of the earth should be brought under the banner of the cross. Still more decidedly did the religious factor enter into the beginning of the North-American settlements, but this time in the interest of English Protestantism, and not of Romanism. The great discoveries of the fifteenth century plainly stand in providential connection with the Reformation of the sixteenth; since they opened a new and boundless field for the further development of the religious, social, and political principles of Protestantism. It is important also to notice, that the northern half of the New World was first discovered, under the auspices of England, by the two Cabots. This was in 1497, or a year before Columbus set foot upon the mainland of South America. In this way that half was from the beginning brought into closest connection with the nation which a century later was to be the greatest naval power and chief bulwark of Protestantism.

The religious history of North America begins in 1607, with the settlement of Virginia, or more exactly with the landing of the Pilgrims in Massachusetts Bay (1620). From then on, America was, in an immensely larger scale, what Geneva was under Calvin,—a refuge for persecuted Protestants of all lands. Puritans, Presbyterians, Quakers, Baptists, Huguenots, Salzburg Lutherans, Moravians, Lutherans and Reformed refugees from the Palatinate, Mennonites, etc., emigrated thither in order to find there a quiet place to practise their religion, and showed in their new home predominantly that religious earnestness, and at the same time tolerance, which sprang, not from indifference, but from bitter experience of unrighteous persecution. English Roman Catholics, also, who then were subjected to severe penalties in England, found in Maryland an asylum. These were joined by the Dutch Reformed in New York, and the English Episcopalians in Virginia, the two Carolinas, and Georgia, who, however, had not come for conscience' sake. Thus the American Colonies were made up of almost all branches of European Christianity, mostly Protestants, with a small number of Roman Catholics. Of course these churches were all weak; but they were strong enough to produce a people able to defend themselves against the demands of England, and under the leadership of George Washington,—the purest and most unselfish of American patriots,—by the aid of France, to carry on a successful war of seven years' duration, which issued in their complete independence of the British crown.

With the peace of 1783, or even with the Declaration of Independence in 1776, the colonial period of the country closed. The nation was then composed of thirteen Colonies, loosely bound together, and numbering scarcely three million inhabitants. The representatives of the free people, assembled in Philadelphia in 1787, drew up a constitution, modelled, indeed, upon that of England, but further developed upon its principles. A sharp line was drawn between Church and State. Upon this constitution they stood united as a compact nation, with a sovereign national government. At their head was a president, elected every four years. The happy issue of the UNITED STATES.

War of Independence compelled those churches, as the Episcopal and the Methodist, which had formerly been united with the English bodies, to make separate organizations, on the basis of universal civil and religious liberty. Favoring the widespread fertility of the soil, the exhaustless mineral wealth, numberless avenues of trade, and free institutions which afforded the fullest play to individual enterprise, and at the same time guaranteed complete security to person and property, the United States has ever since, but particularly during the last fifty years, advanced in a way unparalleled in history. The number of inhabitants has grown since 1800, when it was 5,000,000, until, according to the official census of 1880, it was 50,152,866, distributed as follows: Whites, 43,404,876; blacks, 6,577,151; natives, 43,475,506; foreign-born, 6,077,360; males, 25,620,552; and females, 24,632,284. The number of States in the same period has increased (mostly through the purchase of Louisiana in 1803, Florida in 1821, California and New Mexico in 1848, and the organization of the North-western Territories) from thirteen to thirty-eight; and besides these there are nine Territories and the District of Columbia (the seat of the national government).

Of course, emigration, which is favored by the most liberal naturalization laws, is the explanation of this enormous growth. This began to be larger after the close of the Napoleonic wars, and now pours a steady stream into the country. In the year 1820 the number of emigrants from Europe, especially from Ireland and Germany, was 8,093; in 1830, 23,074; in 1840, 83,584; in 1850, 279,980; in 1853, 368,643; in 1855, 460,474; in 1881, 740,000, of which sixty per cent were Germans and Scandinavians. And yet the available land is by no means all taken up. From the Alleghanies to the Pacific Ocean, there are unnumbered acres ready for the tiller's hand. Emigration keeps pace with immigration; and the dwellers in the older States are continuously removing to the newer, especially to Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota, Colorado, and Oregon.

Hand in hand with the increase in the number of States and inhabitants go industry, wealth, and general culture. The United States has not had to struggle, through two thousand years, out of barbarism to civilization, as the countries of the Old World have done. It fell heir to its progress, but with it have come the Old World's evils. And the New World has also its troubles, arising from haste after wealth, from reckless speculation, and those misunderstandings between capital and labor which issue sometimes in blood. It is almost incredible how quickly the chaotic confusion of so many different peoples thrown together under one general government is reduced to order, how thoroughly the new dwellers are assimilated in the body politic. Thus it has come about that the type of American civilization is Anglo-Saxon, and the speech English,—the predestined world-language.

The unhappy races have met in this assimilating process,—the Indians, who are driven gradually into smaller territory, and who are slowly civilized; and the Chinese, who do not come to stay, and whose coming, national legislation has endeavored to check. The two will, in the providence of God, be brought under the influence of Christianity. As for the negroes, so long held down under slavery, they are already Christianized, and have attained to a measure of civilization. Those of them who emigrate to the West-African republic of Liberia, founded for them particularly by American friends of that race, will carry thither the blessings they have obtained in the United States, and thus lighten the "dark continent."

The enormous increase of population adds, of course, proportionally to the field of labor and to the membership of the different churches. America is the land of church-erection, congregation-forming, and of every conceivable ecclesiastical and religious experiment, in which there are not missing the elements of fanaticism, hypocrisy, and humbug. It is the seed-plot of almost all branches of the Christian Church, and there is no check put upon their fullest development.

The religious life in the United States is in general like that of other lands; but it presents some peculiar features, of which the chief are,—

II. THE SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE

AND THE UNIVERSAL FREEDOM OF BELIEF AND WORSHIP WHICH FOLLOWS. — A distinction must, however, be made between the General Government and the individual States. (1) The General Government has been from the beginning limited to political affairs, and has nothing to do with the internal arrangements of the several States, and especially with any thing relating to religion.

The Constitution, adopted under Washington in 1787, provides, "No religious tests shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States" (Art. vi. § 3). And even more emphatically speaks the First Amendment, made by the first Congress, 1789: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the rights of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." Cf. Gale's edition of Debates and Proceedings in the Congress of the United States, vol. i. pp. 729.

In this way there was secured, on the one hand, the separation of the Church from the government, and, on the other, the free, unhindered exercise of religion in every way which does not endanger the State or public morals. The above-quoted articles are not only a declaration of independence of federal control, they are also a declaration of the independence of the Church from the civil power. They originated in no indifference respecting religion, on the contrary, in so great respect, that their framers would separate religion permanently from the defiling influence of politics, and guarantee to the whole people a solemn manner religious along with civil liberty.

The two institutions Church and State were not set opposite to each other as foes, but side by side, as the two different spheres of the social life, in the conviction that each had best restrict its jurisdiction to its own immediate concerns, because the attempt of one to rule the other was sure to issue disastrously. The power of the State is consequently, in the United States, reduced to narrower limits than in Europe, where it controls the Church also. The American status of the Church differs from the hierarchical patronage of the State by the Church, from the imperial and papal patronage of the Church by the State, and also from the pre-Constantinian separation and persecution of the Church by the heathen State: hence the United States presents a new phase in the history of the relation of the two powers on earth.

This separation between Church and State is not to be understood as a separation of the nation from Christianity; for the State represents, in America, only the temporal interests of the people. The independent churches care for the religious and moral interests; and the people are religious and Christian as no other, and express their sentiments in different ways,—by the voluntary support of their very numerous churches and sects; by benevolent organizations of every kind; by attendance upon church, and respect for the ministry (who are second to none in dignity and influence); by a steady stream of edifying books, tracts, and periodicals; by reverence for the Bible; by a steady attendance upon church, and respect for the civil powers; by a steady observance of Sunday, which is not equalled elsewhere, except in Scotland; by constant zeal for home and foreign missions; by reverence for the Bible; by a steady stream of edifying books, tracts, and periodicals; and by their public morals. Congress nominates chaplains, of different confessions naturally, and opens every sitting with prayer. The President appoints chaplains for the army and navy. Fast-days have been frequently observed in particular emergencies: thus in 1849, during the cholera; in 1865, on the assassination of President Lincoln; and in 1881, on the death of President Garfield. A Thanksgiving-day is yearly celebrated in November in all the States, on the proclamation of the President and the concurrent action of the different governors. Indeed, religion, it may be justly claimed, has all the more hold upon the American character, just because it is free from political control. No one is forced to make a religious profession; that is a matter of personal conviction and voluntary action.

(2) As far as the individual States are concerned, Church and State are now separated; but this has not been the case from the beginning. Nor is the separation the consequence of indifference, but because of bitter experience of intolerance, and practical necessity. And this toleration was limited to the different confessions of the Christian faith, and did not apply to infidels or blasphemers, who were excluded from civil rights. In the other and older Colonies, Church and State were from the beginning closely connected. In Massachusetts and the other New England Colonies, the Congregational form of Puritanism was the State religion; and the civil rights, in imitation of the Jewish theocratic State principles, were dependent upon a certain religious adherence. The Roman Church not only was excluded, but also, until the close of the seventeenth century, all Protestants who could not accept the Established creed were dealt with as strictly as the Pilgrim Fathers had themselves been by the bishops of Old England. Massachusetts banished the Baptists Roger Williams, and other Baptists, and the followers of the Antinomian Anne Hutchinson; the Quakers were tried, and condemned to public scourging, ear-slitting, nose-boring, and even (by a vote of twelve to eleven in the Boston Legislature) to the gallows. It should be remarked, however, that the Quakers in New England between 1658 and 1660 had acted fanatically. They had publicly denounced, in the churches and upon the streets, the civil and spiritual authorities. They thus provoked persecution and martyrdom by their impetuous zeal. Four such fanatics (one a woman), who had been already admitted to the Assembly, were finally excluded from the Council (by a vote of twelve to eleven in the Boston Legislature) to the gallows.

In Virginia and other Southern Colonies the Church of England was the State Church, and all other denominations felt the pressure of the English laws against dissenters. Nevertheless, the latter increased, especially the Baptists, Presbyterians, Quakers, and, later, the Methodists; and it was from them that the first impulse in Virginia proceeded to separate Church and State. Even before the Declaration of Independence, the Presbyterians and Baptists presented petitions to the Colonial Legislature to that intent. The measure found a defender in Thomas Jefferson, who in his interest of Christianity, favored putting faith and unfaith upon the same political level. Through the exertions of the dissenters, the liberal Episcopalians, and the unbelieving Jefferson, the principle of separation between Church and State was, in December, 1776, and, more completely, in 1789, 1788, and the following decade, carried through the Virginia Legislature. Cf. Semple: History of the Rise and Progress of the Baptists in Virginia, Richmond, 1810, pp. 25 sqq., 62; Burke: History of Virginia, 1804-16, p. 59; Jefferson: Writings, vol. i. p. 44; Hawkes: Contributions to the Ecclesiastical History of the United States, vol. i. History of Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia, New York, 1836, pp. 150 sqq.

Soon after the close of the War of Independence (1783), and the adoption of the National Constitution by the several States, the connection between Church and State was broken in New York, and South Carolina, and the other Colonies where the English Episcopal Church was the predominant State Church, was broken, and complete religious freedom proclaimed. Last of all, and only very gradually, did the New-England States, where Puritanism was deeply rooted in the mass of the people, adopt the new order of things. Now the principle of entire separation is universally operative. Only among the Mormons in Utah are Church and State combined. But the Mormons are powerfully to prevent other sects coming among them; and, indeed, in Salt Lake City there are already four or five.

III. THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM OF CHURCH SUPPORT IS THE NATURAL CONSEQUENCE OF SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. — There is in the United States no obligatory baptism or confirmation. There are, on the contrary, thousands of grown persons who have not been baptized; but there are comparatively few who hold themselves aloof from all church attendance and from all contributions for religious purposes. And the churches independent of State control are more particular as to the conduct and beliefs of their members than State churches are; so that the churches of America are more orthodox, and more faithful to their avowed principles, than the mother-churches in Europe.

The different churches are, almost without exception, dependent entirely upon voluntary subscriptions and contributions. The most prominent exceptions are Trinity Church (Episcopal) and the Collegiate Church (Reformed Dutch), both in New-York City, which have inherited property from the colonial period. But, speaking generally, the churches look to their membership for the means to carry on their work, and support their ministers. The theological seminaries are the foundations of churches or individuals. The minister's salary is paid by the pew-rents or collections. Voluntary payments support the Bible, tract, and other societies, and send out porters and missionaries in city and country. It is considered a general duty and privilege to support religion as a necessary and useful element of society. The average salary of ministers in the United States is about seven hundred dollars; of theological professors, a thousand dollars. A few ministers in large cities receive from five to fifteen thousand dollars.

The voluntary system has its drawbacks, especially in the new congregations formed of emigrants who are accustomed to the European system of State support. But, on the other hand, it promotes liberality and individual enterprise; and the result is a yearly increase in churches, ministers, and ecclesiastical organizations of all sorts, while the old are maintained with vigor. On the average, it is said, each minister serves a thousand souls; but of course there is great disproportion. The Irish and the Germans are most destitute of ministers, because emigration swells their numbers out of proportion to the supply. This free, self-regulated and self-supported Christianity and church existence is one of the most characteristic features, and one of the greatest glories, of the United States, and constitutes a new leaf in church history; but it has its antecedents in the first three centuries and in the history of dissenters and free churches in Europe.

IV. THE LEADING DENOMINATIONS. — It is impossible here to go into the details of the various denominational histories: for these, reference must be made to the several articles of this encyclopedia. But a few general remarks will be in place.

Almost all American denominations are of European origin; but those which in Europe are divided by geographical and political boundaries are in the United States found thrown together. In England were used as many sects as in the United States; but all Christians outside the Church of England are classed together as dissenters. In America, there being no State Church, there can be no dissenters. Churches of many denominations are found in all the large cities. Thus in the city of New York, which has a population of 1,206,690, there are 500 congregations of different nationalities and creeds, each of which has its regular place of meeting, or church-building. Until recently the Greek Church also had a chapel in New York. She has now chapels in San Francisco and in Alaska.

The American denominations may be divided into three groups: (1) The Evangelical churches; i.e., those which stand upon the principles of the Reformation theology, and accept the Bible as the sole guide of faith and life, and the confessions of the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries as a rule of public teaching. They embrace the great majority of the Christian population, and exert the strongest influence upon society. The Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Episcopalians have the most intelligence, theological culture, and social influence with the middle and upper classes. The Methodists and Baptists are the most numerous among the middle and lower classes and in the Southern and Western States. The Episcopal Church is the oldest and proportionally the richest, and dates from 1607, the year of the settlement of Virginia; next come the Congregationalists, from the landing of the Pilgrims (1620); then the Dutch Reformed, from 1629, the year of the formation of the first congregation in New-York City. The first prominent Baptist in America was Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island, 1636. The Quakers date from 1680; and the Methodists, from 1768. The German churches, in their organized state, date from the middle of the last century. Among them the Lutheran Church is by far the largest and most influential; then come the German Reformed, the Evangelical United, and the Moravians. A considerable number of Germans belong to the different branches of the Methodist Church, which also sends missionaries to Germany.

(2) The Roman-Catholic Church was a century ago incalculable, but, through the enormous emigration, now outnumbers any other single denomination. Yet it does not keep pace with the Roman-Catholic migration, which is reported to form forty-seven per cent, or nearly one-half, of the total immigration to the United States. The emigration from Ireland is predominantly, that from Germany largely, and that from Southern Europe almost exclusively, Roman Catholic.

(3) A third class consists of those denominations which reject the doctrines of the ecumenical creeds and the confessions of the Reformation churches, and strike out in new paths. The most respectable among these are the Unitarians, whose headquarters are in Boston and Cambridge, and who are distinguished by high literary and social culture, and active philanthropy; the Unit...
universalists, who teach as one of the three articles of their creed the ultimate restoration of all men to holiness and happiness; and the Swedenborgians, who believe in the divine mission of the great seer of Sweden, and accept his revelations of the spirit-world.

V. THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION. This differs with the different denominations, but on the whole has greatly and rapidly improved of late. It is carried on in theological seminaries, endowed and supported by free gifts. Each respectable denomination has one or more, and in all there are a hundred and forty-two. We mention those at Andover, New Brunswick, Princeton, Cambridge, New Haven, Hartford, New York (the Union Seminary of the Presbyterian Church, and the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church), Madison (N.J.), Rochester, Philadelphia (two,—one Episcopal, one Lutheran), Gettysburg, Lancaster, Allegheny, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago (which has four, representing as many denominations), and San Francisco (which has two). The faculties number from two to seven regular professors: some have as many as a hundred students and over. The libraries comprise from a few hundred to fifty thousand volumes. The course of instruction lasts three years. Greater stress is laid upon practical gifts and moral and religious character than in the theological seminaries of the United States, made from the sources, is a desideratum.

VI. STATISTICS.—The official ecclesiastical statistics of the last census (1886) have not yet (December, 1883) appeared, no attempt at a complete statement is here made; but the following carefully compiled table is interesting as showing the denominational growth in the first century of the United States' independence:

LIT. — A general church history of the United States, made from the sources, is a desideratum. So far, we have only sectional contributions or brief sketches.

1. General Works.—ROBERT BAIRD: Religion in America, Glasgow, 1842, New York, 1856 (which describes the recent condition, but gives no regular history); RUFF-ZEHRENBERGER: History of All the Religious Denominations in the United States, Harrisburg, Penn., 1844, 2d ed., 1848 (a diligent but dry and uncritical collection of historical and statistical materials); W. SPRAGUE: The Annals of the American Pulpit, or Commemorative Notices of Distinguished American Clergymen of Various Denominations, with Historical Introductions, New York, 1857 sqq. (9 vols., and one yet unprinted; valuable for the history of American pulpit eloquence and for biography, but almost uniformly eulogistic, as the notices come from friends or admirers of the subjects); PHILIP SCHAFF: America, New York, 1856 (the second part contains sketches of the leading denominations); by the same: Christianity in the United States of America (report, to the Basel Conference, of the Evangelical Alliance, 1879, published in German, Basel, and in English in The Religious Condition of Christendom, London, 1890, pp. 79-117.

2. Particular Denominational Histories.—The monographs of Hodge and Gillet on the Presbyterian Church; Bangs and Stevens on the Methodist; Hall, Punchard, Bacon, and Dexter, on the Congregational; Backus and Benedict on the Baptist; Wilberforce, Hawks, and Perry, on the Episcopal; Hazelius, Schmucker, and Mann, on the Lutheran; Corwin on the Reformed Dutch; Meyer, Harbaugh, and Heisler, on the German Reformed; Gunison, Olmhausen, R. J. Burton, and Stenhous, on the Mormons. See literature under the different arts. PHILIP SCHAFF.

UNIVERSALISM is the form of faith which they hold who declare that all souls will finally be saved, that evil is temporary, that good is permanent, and will achieve a complete and perfect triumph in the divine economy.

1. Universalism begins in a peculiar conception of God. Agreeing with Christians generally in the attributes ascribed to him, it holds that love is not merely an attribute, but the very nature, of the Deity, and that all his attributes and activities spring out of and are controlled by it. Thus the sovereignty of God is infinite and eternal: it is exerted everywhere and always, to secure, not a formal and arbitrary obedience, but one that is voluntary and filial, and it will work until the harmony of the moral universe is secured from

2. Christ belongs to the category of the supernatural; although his manifestation in time, and his work, are in perfect accord with nature and reason. Universalism holds, as to the nature of Christ, that it is identical with God's; as to his relationship, that it is that of a Son; as to his office, that it is mediatorial, i.e., that he is the connecting link between humanity and God, that he is the way by which humanity is brought into the presence and fellowship of God. His existence, as declared in the proem of John's Gospel, has been from the beginning. From the beginning also, as taught, not only in the proem aforesaid, but in the Epistles,—notably in Heb. i. 2, also 1 Cor. viii. 6,—he is the instrument through whom God works. Having the same nature as God, and being actuated by the same spirit, he is literally "God manifest in the flesh," he is literally or essentially the express image of his person." But not only is he the Son of God in the highest and most complete sense, he is the Son of man in a sense equally complete. He is the expression, the type, of perfected humanity. He entered fully into the human condition. He had not alone the form of manhood, but the attributes and motives. He was in all respects like one of ourselves, except in the matter of sin. His freedom from sin, however, was due, not to any abridgment of his humanity, but to the perfect use of that moral choice which is the distinguishing characteristic of humanity. He is here, then, as the revealer of God and the healer of men, as the Teacher and Saviour, or, finally, as the living, immortal Word.

3. Concerning man, Universalism holds that he is made in the image of God, that he is the child of God. He has a moral sense. He instinctively distinguishes between right and wrong, he feels the difference and association is native to his mind. He knows that he is responsible for his conduct: at the same time he is free; he may choose whatever course he will. Here is the origin and essence of sin,—that a man knowing the difference between right and wrong, knowing the responsibility under which he acts, deliberately chooses the wrong, that he puts himself voluntarily in an attitude of disobedience to the moral law. There is no other definition to be given of it than the scriptural one, "Sin is the transgression of the law." It is conditioned, first upon the fact of man's freedom, and secondly upon the fact that he is under law, the inexorable law of the moral universe. This is true of every man; and every man, whatever may be his theory of God, or providence, or of his own essential being, knows that it is true. But law without a sanction is no law. Penalty, therefore, is an indispensable instrument in that moral universe: by which it is springing from the soul the image of the Father. The moral government of God, thereafter, is not a temporal affair merely, it reaches forward into eternity. It was instituted for man's sake, that he might receive his moral development under it, and that, when he had sinned, he might be reconciled to God.

4. These views foreshadow the Universalist doctrine of destiny. Universalism holds that the sovereignty of God will be completely vindicated in the ultimate harmony of the moral universe. No power on earth or in heaven can defeat the purpose of God to bring all things into subjection to himself. The process by which this result is to be secured is neither violent nor mechanical, but through voluntary obedience. Righteousness, in reality, is the end; happiness is only an incident. That which God demands of every soul is restitution, moral purity, spiritual submission. This is the end towards which he works, and there will be no pauses until the end is reached. Man's freedom cannot defeat the beneficent intentions of the Deity, for that would be a poor sort of freedom which practically dooms men to endless sin. Neither can the power of evil habit become so strong, that it will be impossible for men any more to make effectual choice of the right: for that would be to contradict every theory on which the recovery of souls is sought in this world; the uniform assumption being, that no case is so desperate as to be beyond the saving efficacy of infinite grace. Universalism savors both of fatalism and atheism. It is fatalistic in so far as it fixes, beyond all hope of amendment, the condition of any soul. It is atheistic, in so far as it puts the final destiny of man entirely in his own keeping. Equally futile, according to Universalist.
ism, is the claim that death determines the moral condition of humanity. It is absurd to suppose that death will change either the nature of man, or the disposition and purpose of God. Death, to be sure, may be, and doubtless is, a very important factor in the discipline and development of the soul. It can scarcely fail to change inconceivably the whole environment of the soul. The conditions and circumstances which are earthly and sensual will disappear. Conditions and circumstances which are alone adapted to the new state in which the soul finds itself will come into being. New relations will undoubtedly appear, or the old relations will be revealed in an entirely new light. It may also be, that a complete set of motives, unknown to time and sense, will have active operation. The methods for teaching and moral influence may also be unseparably enhanced. But the nature of man as a moral agent, and the nature of God as a moral governor, must remain the same after death as before; and there is no Scripture, which, rightly interpreted, warrants a different doctrine. So long as man is man, he may forsake evil, and embrace righteousness. So long as God is God, he will certainly restore the penitent, and welcome the returning prodigal. Looking at the object which has been steadily pursued in the granting of the law and the promulgation of the gospel, the Universalist feels that the poet manifests a profoundly philosophic insight when he sings,—

"I can but trust that good shall fail
At last—far off—at last, to all,
And every winter change to spring."

He sees the whole creation, in one vast, resistless movement, sweeping towards the grand finality of universal holiness and universal love.

History.—The Universalist denomination traces its origin directly to James Kelly, a London preacher in the middle and latter part of the eighteenth century, whose father was a clergyman in the Union, and who had for his disciple John Murray. The latter came to this country in September, 1770, and immediately began preaching at various places along the Atlantic seaboard, from New Jersey to Massachusetts, establishing himself at Gloucester four years later. Through the efforts of Mr. Murray, and a few who entertained similar views, churches were established at important points in the New-England and Middle States. But the doctrine spread somewhat slowly. In the year 1800, there were scarcely more than twenty Universalist ministers in the country. At that time the Rev. Hosea Ballou, who is justly called the father of Universalism in its present form, was approaching the maturity of his powers. He already entertained views which differed widely from those of Mr. Murray and his fellow-laborers. He had ceased to base his convictions of the universal holiness on Calvinistic principles. He had wrought out a system of theology which was clear, consistent, rational, and biblical throughout; and he was proclaiming it with a vigor and an earnestness which have not been surpassed by any American preacher of the nineteenth century. Universalism, with the rise of Hosea Ballou (although it has undergone many modifications, and made important developments, since his time), entered upon a new epoch; and its growth was rapid, not only in numerical strength, but in organic life and power. The General Convention, at its session in Winchester, N.H., in 1803, adopted the following Profession of Belief:

"ART. I. We believe that the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation of the character of God, and of the duty, interest, and final destination of mankind.

"ART. II. We believe that there is one God, whose nature is love, revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.

"ART. III. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected, and that believers ought to be careful to maintain order, and practise good works, for these things are good, and profitable unto men."

This brief creed has been regarded as embracing the essential features of Universalism, in a phraseology sufficiently elastic to cover the most divergent views; and it has been made the test of fellowship in churches and conventions. A large and respectable minority of Universalists to-day are not satisfied with the language of some of these articles; and a special committee of the General Convention is at present (1883) engaged in considering whether a modification of them may not be desirable and practicable.

The polity of the Universalist Church is republican in form, embracing both the clerical and lay elements. In each State of the Union, there is a convention made up of the ministers in fellowship residing within the State, and of lay-representatives from each parish. Each State Convention has jurisdiction within its own borders in matters of fellowship, and has charge of local missions. Over all is the General Convention of Universalists, which meets annually, and is composed of delegates, clerical and lay, in definite proportions, chosen by the State conventions. This body has a national charter and a permanent board of trustees. During the interim of the conventions, have charge of the funds, direct the general missionary operations of the church, and dispense scholarships to theological students. The permanent funds now belonging to the General Convention amount to $150,000. The resources are still further enhanced by annual contributions in all the churches. Many State conventions also have funds of considerable amounts.

The latest statistics (1883) of the denomination give 23 State conventions, 938 parishes, 36,528 families, 36,338 communicants, 685 Sunday schools with 51,793 members, 780 church buildings, a total valuation of parish property, above indebtedness, of $6,443,010, 713 clergymen, and 10 licensed lay-preachers. During the last forty years the denomination has made great progress in educational matters. There are now in New England and in the State of New York five academies, the most of which are well equipped and endowed. In the whole country, there are four colleges and three theological schools. Over one thousand pupils, during the year 1882, were enrolled in these different institutions. Altogether they represent a permanent investment of at least two and a quarter millions of dollars. Organized Universalism is confined chiefly to this continent; but the doctrine is widely diffused, not only in UNIVERSITIES.

England and Scotland, but in Germany, Switzerland, and Sweden. Many of the leading scholars of Germany in recent times have strongly advocated it. Conspicuous teachers, both within and without the English Establishment, have championed it ardently. It has had some of its ablest defenders among the Scotch clergy. A mission-church of the denomination has been established in Glasgow by the Women's Centenary Association of America, and for some years it has had regular pastoral care. There are organizations and churches at other points in Scotland.

UNIVERSITIES. 2. Medieval. — Universities were founded in the twelfth century. The instructors were mainly clergymen: hence the terms "rector" and "dean." Colloquy was generally demanded of the teachers. Paris, where the theological faculty dates from 1218, took the lead in theology and philosophy; Bologna, whose law-faculty dates from 1158, in canonical and civil law. The bulls of Innocent III. (of 1209 and 1213) first gave the Paris university independent corporate existence. A university comprised four "nations," — French, Norman, Picard, and English, — according to the nationality of the scholars in democratic Bologna, according to that of the teachers in aristocratic Paris. Gradually the four faculties of theology, medicine, canonical law, and arts, acquired individual corporate rights, the theological latest (about 1300). The first three dominated the fourth, because it was considered preparatory to one of the three. Each nation and faculty formed a little corporation, with seal, banner, funds, and disciplinary institutions. The more general interests were decided by a general council. Every four years a university met, and every month a "national" procurator. The popes and kings gave the universities great privileges, — independent jurisdiction over the students, immunities, inviolability of their property, etc. One of the most important was the right to confer degrees, — bachelor (in theology, at first after eight, but, after the fourteenth century, after fourteen years' study), licentiate (the right to lecture), and in the same year master.

The instruction was given by lectures and disputations. In theology the subjects were Bible-texts expounded, with the help of glosses, tropically, analogically, and allegorically; and the Sentences of Peter Lombard. The students attached themselves to their respective masters; but the discipline was lax, and disturbances frequent. (For the famous Sorbonne, which excelled all other theological schools, and was almost identical with the Paris theological faculty, see art.)

The dates of the medieval German universities are, Prague, 1345; Vienna, 1365; Heidelberg, 1386; Cologne, 1388; Erfurt, 1393; Leipzig, 1409; Rostock, 1419; Greifswald, 1458; Freiburg, 1457; Basel, 1460; Ingolstadt, 1472; Mayence and Tubingen, 1477; Wittenberg, 1502; Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, 1506. The instruction was broad rather than deep; novelties were shunned; tradition ruled: Paris gave laws to all the others. The humanities were not encouraged; so that although in Paris there was, after 1514, a professor of Greek, he complained that least impetus to his department was given by the university. The universities conspicuously showed their hidebound character: Prague opposed Wiclif and Hus; Paris thundered against Luther (1521) and against R. Stephen's edition of the Bible (1544), and drove him from the city.

The great English universities are Oxford and Cambridge, founded in Athens, the Scotch universities, — Edinburgh, founded 1582; Glasgow, 1450; St. Andrews, 1411; Aberdeen, 1494.)

3. The Protestant Universities since the Reformation. — Only in theology have these universities
The most radical departure from old methods and modes of life was made in this century when the Reformation, effected great changes, not only in the subjects taught, but in their presentation. Instruction was by lectures and disputations, and it was said that by the latter one could learn more than by twenty lectures. The professors, in their own pecuniary interest, paid more attention to their private than to their public lectures and disputations. Even after the invention of printing, the dictation of lectures was the rule; and a great amount of gratuitous work was required. Thus at Rostock the professor of theology formerly received eighty guineas, and the professor of medicine, only thirty. The salaries were, however, eked out by the patronage of princes in return for dedications of books, the fees for disputations and promotions, and, but seldom, by ecclesiastical benefits.

The Reformation, the chief of the universities, in the majority of German churches waited for it to arrive. But if the expansion of the Reformation, — the Wolffian. The doctrines were not substantially changed; but they were supported by logical demonstration, not by appeal to the word of God and the methods and modes of life was made in this century when Berlin University was founded (1810).

4. The Theological Animus and Influence of the Different Lutheran Universities. — The Lutheran Church counts the following universities: Wittenberg, Erfurt (since 1525), Rostock (since 1531), Tubingen (since 1633), Leipzig (since 1539), Greifswald (since 1545), Konigsberg (1544), Jena (1558), Helmstadt (1576), Altdorf (1578), Giessen (1607), Rinteln (1621), Strassburg (1621), Kiel (1665), Halle (1694), Gottingen (1737), Erlangen (1743), Berlin (1810), Bonn (1817). The principal universities of this period were Wittenberg (twelve hundred students), Leipzig (between three and four thousand, most of them in law), and Jena (twenty-five hundred).

In the eighteenth century, Wittenberg began to wane, and Halle (where Pietism ruled) and Jena to assert their authority. But if the expansion of the Reformation, — the Wolffian. The doctrines were not substantially changed; but they were supported by logical demonstration, not by appeal to the word of God and the methods and modes of life was made in this century when Berlin University was founded (1810).

pass through pietism to rationalism, on the contrary, vigorously opposed the latter. Out of fear lest the Roman-Catholic universities would not sufficiently instil Tridentine ideas into their students, the bishops organized theological seminars. Indeed, their fears were well grounded; for in Vienna, Freiburg, and Dresden, Josephinists ruled in Bonn, Breslau, Freiburg, Tubingen and Giessen, the Roman-Catholic faculties railed the Protestant in scientific theological training.

In each of these three cantons of French Switzerland, Geneva, Vaud (at Lausanne), and Neuchatel, there are two theological seminaries, — one belonging to the State Church, and the other to the Free Church of the canton.

UNIVERSITY IN AMERICA. Educational terms are so much confused in the United States, that at one time we hear it said that there are "no American universities;" at another, that there are so many as to be ridiculous. The difference is between the real and the nominal. By name, the printed lists record many scores of institutions which call themselves universities: in fact, there is not one score which a jury of American scholars would acknowledge to be worthy of this designation, and a still smaller number which would be called universities according to the English or the German standard. The confusion is injurious to the progress of education in the United States. A seminary which would be respectable under a modest name seems pretentious under a lofty title: worse than this, the proper object of a college is in danger of being forgotten, and the legitimate office of a university wholly lost sight of. A study of European universities will show, that, with many differences in their formal organization, they have generally, for a long time past, adhered to certain fixed principles.

1. They have furnished liberal education in the most advanced branches of knowledge, both practically, in law, medicine, and theology, — and also in the various studies which are called philosophy, including mathematics, the natural and physical sciences, the historical and moral sciences, and philology; and this instruction has been given to young men who have been fitted for it by long continued training in subordinate colleges, gymnasium, and lyceum.

2. They have encouraged scholars of exceptional powers to devote a considerable part of their time, while engaged as teachers, to the advancement of human knowledge by researches in libraries and in laboratories, and to the publication of their results for the benefit of mankind.

3. They have retained the right to bestow academic degrees, and have bestowed these honors with rigid restrictions; so that the public may have some assurance of the intellectual ability of young men engaging in intellectual pursuits, and so that young students may be encouraged in their most advanced intellectual work by the approbation of an incorporated society of scholars.

4. They have built up, by their direct and indirect agencies, libraries, museums, observatories, laboratories, and other costly agencies for increasing and perpetuating knowledge. Judged by these high standards, there are few, if any, institutions in the United States which can be called complete universities; but there are some strong, well-planned, and prosperous foundations, which, within the next few years, to be developed into universities differing from the English, the German, the French, the Scotch, or the Italian type, but having distinctive American characteristics. Among their peculiarities will doubtless be a readiness to study the experience of all other countries, and to apply the lessons learned to the peculiar civil, ecclesiastical, and social conditions of the United States. These American universities will differ from one another as the requirements and the history of different parts of the country differ. Generous pecuniary gifts have already been made for university purposes in distinction from collegiate, and other large endowments.

dowments are known to be forthcoming. Before 1900, or, in other words, before the youth who are now in their cradles are ready to graduate, there will be several institutions worthy to be called universities, and to be compared with like foundations in the most enlightened countries; that probably one in or near each of the ten or twelve great cities of the country, and a few others developed in the older States from the present collegiate foundations, and, in the newer, established by legislative aid or private munificence.

The older colleges, originally organized on the type of English colleges, began early in this century to unfold into universities. Thus Harvard, in addition to its college, has now its schools of law, medicine, and theology, its museum of comparative zoology, its botanical garden, its astronomical observatory, its scientific school, its agricultural school, its dental school. Yale has besides its college, its schools of science, law, medicine, theology, and of the fine arts, and its astronomical observatory. Columbia has its schools of law, medicine, and mines in addition to its college. A like development, if not as widely seen as in the cases above, is observable in several others of the older foundations.

Another promising group of universities includes those which have been organized under the auspices of State governments, largely maintained by public appropriations. The University of Virginia, initiated by Jefferson, was one of the earliest of this class, and has always borne the marks of freedom and individuality which impressed upon it. The States of Georgia, North and South Carolina, and Louisiana followed, to some extent, the lead of Virginia. Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, California, and other Western States, have likewise initiated strong foundations.

Within a few years a third variety of university foundations has sprung up, the result of private gifts,—as at Boston, Ithaca, Baltimore, and New Orleans,—free from historic traditions and from governmental superintendence. These three varieties of organization are not unlikely to present perpetually three types,—the collegiate university, the state university, and the independent university.

There is a fourth form of university organization, that of the State of New York, which has the distinctive function, that, without giving instruction from its own forces, it has a sort of advisory and even supervisory charge of the colleges and academies of the State.

The points to be aimed at by those who are endeavoring to organize universities should be these,—broad and comprehensive arrangements for the advancement of knowledge, and for the education of superior minds; ample funds, free as possible from petty restrictions; a careful adaptation to the conditions of American society, especially to the schools and colleges already established. If the universities could recover the exclusive right to confer degrees, it would be a great gain.

D. C. GILMAN.

UPHAM, Thomas Cogswell, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Deerfield, N.H., Jan. 30, 1799; d. in New-York City, April 2, 1872. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1818, and at Andover Seminary, 1821; taught Hebrew, 1821—23; and from 1825 to 1867 was professor of mental and moral philosophy in Bowdoin College. He was a voluminous writer. Among his works may be mentioned Elements of Mental Philosophy, 1839, 2 vols. (abridged ed., 1844); Outlines of Disordered Mental Conceptions, filled in by the Institution of the Congregational Churches Examined, Portland, 1844; Life of Madame Guyon, New York, 1847; and several others.

URBAN is the name of eight popes.——Urban I. (229—230), a native of Rome, is said to have suffered martyrdom under Alexander Severus, and is commemorated on May 25.——Urban II. (1088—June 29, 1099). He was born at Châtillon-sur-Marne, studied at Rheims, entered the monastery of Cluny, and was by Gregory VII. called to Rome, and in 1084 sent as legate to the Emperor Henry IV. After the death of Victor III. he was elected Pope by the Gregorian party; and, as a council in Rome (1089), he excommunicated both Henry IV. and Clement III. Expelled from Rome in 1091 by the emperor and the antipope, he fled to Count Roger of Benevent; but the rebellion of Conrad against his father enabled him to return to Rome in 1093, and from that time till his death he vindicated the dignity and rights of his position with uninterrupted success. The greatest event in his life was the Council of Clermont (1095), where his speech to the multitude became the actual starting-point of the first crusade. His letters and a life of him are found in Mansi: Conc. Coll., vol. 20; [M. F. STURN: Zur Biographie des Papstes Urban's II., Halle, 1883].——Urban III. (1185—Oct. 19, 1187). He was a native of Milan, and made archbishop there by Lucius III. His whole policy was dictated by one single motive,—his hatred to the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa; but all his rash enterprises against him were foiled. See Gesta Trevirorum, ed. Muller, Treves, 1856, vol. i. — Urban IV. (1188—Oct. 12, 1264). He was a native of Troyes, studied in Paris, was made bishop of Liége, went as Papal legate to Germany, and was by Alexander IV. made patriarch of Jerusalem. The great aim of his policy was to overthrow Manfred of URSUSINUS.

Sicily. He summoned him to Rome; and, when Manfred refused to appear, the Pope gave his land to Charles of Anjou. But Manfred expelled the Pope from Rome, and Urban died on the flight. His bulls and letters are found in Mansi: Conc. Coll., vol. V. (Oct. 28, 1362—Nov. 13, 1370). He was born in the diocese of Menda; became abbot of Auxerre in 1335, and of St. Victor in 1358; taught canon law at Montpellier, Avignon, Toulouse, and Paris; and was sent as Papal legate to Naples and Sicily. He was the last pope who resided at Avignon. In 1367 he determined to return to Rome, and on Oct. 16 he entered the city; but he left it again in September, 1370, and died at Avignon. The confusion of Italian politics he could not master. Bernabo Visconte, who seized several cities belonging to the States of the Church, he communicated; but he was nevertheless compelled to pay him half a million of gold uldens in order to have the cities restored. His life has been written by Magnan (1862), Alranks (1872), and Carbonel (1872). See also Mansi: Conc. Coll., vol. 26.—Urban VIII. (April 8, 1378—Oct. 15, 1388). He had been the intimate follower of the cardinal of Anagni, declared the election of Urban invalid, and chose Clement VII. pope: thus the great schism began. Clement VII. took up his residence at Avignon; while Urban succeeded in vindicating himself in Rome, supported by Catherine of Siena and Catherine of Sweden, and recognized by England, Denmark, Germany, and Poland. He espoused the cause of Charles of Durazzo against Johanna of Naples and Sicily, but fell out with Charles, too, was besieged by him in Nocera, and barely escaped (1385), first to Sicily, then to Genoa. After the death of Charles he tried to take possession of Sicily as a vacant fief; but his soldiers abandoned him in Perugia (1386), and he had to give up the scheme. See Mansi: Conc. Coll., vol. 26.—Urban VII. (Sept. 15—27, 1590) died before he was consecrated.—Urban VIII. (Aug. 6, 1623—July 29, 1644). He was a native of Florence; studied in Rome and Bologna, under the Jesuits; entered the service of the curia, and was made archbishop of Nazareth in 1604, and sent as apostolical nuncio to France. In his policy he was an Italian prince, rather than the head of the Roman Catholic Church. He supported Richelieu and France against Austria and Spain, and was thus indirectly in alliance with the Protestant. The Emperor Ferdinand II. complained bitterly, and even the cardinals thought of convening a council against him. He canonized Ignatius Loyola, and Philip of Neri, and beatified Francis Borgia, Andreas Avellino, and others. His poems—paraphrases of psalms in metres of Horace, and hymns to the Virgin—appeared at Antwerp, 1634, and Paris, 1642. He is also the author of the pseudepigrapha written under his name in 1639, and also of the polemical treatise upon comets, directed against the Jesuit astronomer in Rome. In January, 1632, Galileo issued his Dialogo dei due Massimi Sistemi del mondo, repeating the “heresies” of the Copernican philosophy, which in 1616 he had promised not to do; and in October, 1632, Urban, in indignation at Galileo’s supposed ingratitude and insubordination, summoned him peremptorily to Rome, and handed him over to the Inquisition. He was treated, however, with great leniency, kept only a few days in captivity, and at last suffered to depart unharmed, after he had renounced his “heresy” June 22, 1633. Urban never signed the sentence of the Inquisition. See Grisar: Galileistudien, Regensburg, 1882; Inquisition, p. 1100.] A life of Urban (Gesta Urbanii) appeared at Antwerp, 1637. URIN AND THUMMIM (לפטם פטת; LXX., ὁμογενής καὶ διόγενες [command and truth]; Vulgate, doctrina et veritas) are mentioned first in Exod. xxviii. 30, in connection with the “breastplate” of the high priest, and in a manner to imply that they were sensible objects, at least two in number, which were put into the “breastplate,” which was, indeed, a sort of bag. This is all we know about them. They were used as a sort of divine oracle, probably with certain traditional ceremonies: sometimes no answer could be obtained from them (1 Sam. xxviii. 6). URLSPERGER, Johann August, founder of the German Christian Association (Deutsche Christentums-gesellschaft); was b. in Augsburg, Nov. 25, 1728; d. in Hamburg, Dec. 1, 1806. After studying at Halle, he became pastor at Augsburg, where he retained his official position till 1776. He was an earnest defender of the faith in an age of neology and deism, and wrote several works. The chief labor of his life was the organization, after many discouragements, of an association of Christians for the promotion of “pure godliness,” at Basel, which has continued to this day as a fruitful source of blessing, and out of which have grown the Basel Bible (1804) and Missionary (1816) societies. The last years of his life were saddened by disappointments, and spent in restless travels.

URSICINUS, Antipope; was chosen pope by a minority of the Roman clergy in 306, the majority having declared in favor of Damasus. In consequence of the continued division among the clergy, he was driven from Rome, and went to Cologne. Returning to Italy in 311, his appearance was again the occasion of violent commotions, until he was finally banished from Italy by the Council of Aquileja.

URSINUS, Zacharias, was b. at Breslau, July 18, 1534; d. at Neustadt-on-the-Hardt, March 6, 1583. Descended from poor parents, he was forced to rely for his education upon friends and his own efforts. He matriculated at Wittenberg University in 1550, and remained there till 1557, being on terms of intimacy with Melancthon. At the latter’s invitation he was present at the Diet of Worms, whence he went to Geneva (where he met Calvin), and to Paris, where he pursued the study of Hebrew under Jean Mercier. In 1558 he accepted a professorship in the Elizabeth school at Breslau. The sacramental controversy reaching that city, he published Theses de Sacramentis, de Baptismo et de Cana Domini ("Theses on the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper"), in which he ranged himself on the side of Calvin and Melancthon. The opposition these views aroused was the occasion of his leaving Breslau; and, as Melancthon had died, he went to Zurich, where he found a friend and teacher in Peter Martyr. In 1561 he accepted a call to Heidelberg as professor in the Collegium Sapientiae. In September, 1562, he began his lectures on theology, which he continued till Feb. 10, 1568. In 1568 he was appointed to deliver the sermon on the Catechism on Sunday afternoon, and was called in to take part in the preparation of the church discipline of the Palatinate, of which the Heidelberg Catechism (see art.) forms a part. In connection with Olevianus, he made the preliminary draughts of the latter; and upon him principally devolved its defence. He was the author of the two works in defence of the Catechism which appeared in 1561,—Verantwortung vor die unvergessenen Wunderungen und Verurteile mit welchen der Catechismus Christlicher Lehre, zu Heidelberg im Jahr M.D.LXIII. ausgingen, von etlichen unblicklichen weise beschrieben ist, and Antwort auf etlicher Theologen Censur vor die am rand des Heidelberg Catechism aus heiliger Schrift angogene Zeugnisse. The same year he issued two works on the Lord's Supper,—Antwort und Gegenfrag auf sechs fragen von dess Herrn Nachtmael, and Gründlicher Bericht von heiligem Abendmahl, etc. He enjoyed the full confidence of the elector, Frederick III., and was constantly called in to defend him against theological opponents. But, like Melancthon, he shunned controversy. Broken down in health, he was relieved of his theological professorship, and Zanchius made his successor (1568). The apostasy of Sylvanus, Neuser, and others, from Calvinism, and their rejection of the Trinity and divinity of Christ, were hailed by the Lutheran party as proof that Calvinism led to fatalism and Mohammedanism, and called forth a work on these subjects from Ursinus' pen,—Bekennnus der Theologen und Kirchendieners zu Heydelberg von den einigen waren Gott in dreyen Personen, den zwoen Naturaen inn der einigen Person Christi, etc. (1574).

In 1576 Ludwig succeeded to the electorate, and completely overthrew the Reformed government of his father. [More than six hundred preachers and teachers lost their places on account of their adherence to the Reformed faith.] The Colle- gium Sapientiae was abolished the year following, and Ursinus left without a position, in spite of the request of Frederick III., before his death, to his son, that he should be retained. In 1578 he accepted a position in the Colle-gium illustre Casimirianum at Neustadt-on-the-Hardt [which formed a part of the domain of Frederick's second son, John Casimir]. In 1577 he was appointed by the Synod of Frankfort to take part in drawing up a confession for the Reformed churches of Europe, but he declined. In 1581 he published, in the name of the theologians of Neustadt, a forcible criticism of the Formula of Concord (Admonitio Christiana de libro Concordiae). Ursinus, however, beyond doubt, a Calvinist, but refused to acknowledge a human leader, saying at the Colloquy of Maulbronn, "We are not baptized in the name of Luther, or Zwingli, or of any other, but of Christ alone." He fully accepted the doctrine of predestination, and taught his pupils to regard it as the pillar of their Christian faith and life. See HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, OLEVIANUS.

URSULA, a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church. According to a legend of the church of Cologne, contained in Siegbert von Gemblours Chron. ad an. 455, Hagen's Reimchronikon (about 1275), the Cronica van de heiligen Stat van Coelmarn (about 1480), the Legenda auro, or Lombardi, a hystoria (Strassburg, 1498), Ursula was the only daughter of the Christian king, Deonotus, or Dinognetus, of Britain, sought in marriage by the heathen prince Holofernes, she put off the marriage for three years, and in the mean time started on a pilgrimage, with ten close companions and eleven thousand other virgins. They crossed the sea to Tila, on the coast of Gaul, went up the Rhine to Cologne, thence to Basel, and from there to Rome. Returning, Pope Cyriacus accompanied the party, which, as it approached Cologne, was totally annihilated by the Huns, with King Ezzel at their head. Ursula, who, on account of her beauty, was proclaimed the wife of the king, resisted, and was killed with an arrow. The Huns were immediately compelled to flee by hosts of angels. The city of Cologne, thus delivered, buried the martyred virgins' bodies, and placed over each grave a stone bearing the name of the occupant. The palmer Clematius subsequently built the St. Ursula Church on the spot. The credibility of the legend in this form was doubted in the middle ages by Jacobus a Voraigne, in the Legenda aurea, and Gobelinus Personae, in his Cosmodromium (about 1418), on the ground that no Pope Cyriacus lived in the reign of Maximinus Thrax (233-238) or Maximianus Hercu- lius (284-305), that the Huns had not appeared in Europe at that early date, etc. Baronius himself (Annal. ad an. 388, 384) felt compelled by these considerations to reject the legend in its German form, and to receive that of Geoffrey of Monmouth, in his Hist. regum Britan. According to this, Holofernes was slain at Zancasburg, and the seventy-one thousand virgins to Gaul, at the requisition of the usurper Maximus (383-388). Driven upon islands inhabited by barbarians, they were slain by Huns and Picts (').

The foundation of the Ursuline legend is to be decided from the martyrology written prior to the twelfth century. One most of them, belong-

(1807) AS ANGELA OF BRESCEA IN BRESCEA, NOV. 25, 1535. IT DID NOT BIND ITSELF BY STRICT CONVENTUAL RULES, AND VOWS OF CHASTITY OR POVERTY. ITS OBJECT WAS TO INSTRUCT IN THE LITURGY AND ECCLESIASTICAL CUSTOMS, AND TO CARE FOR THE POOR AND SICK. ANGELA DREW UP THE ORIGINAL TWENTY-TWO RULES OF THE ORDER ON THE ADVICE OF ANGELA MERCI. THE PAPAL CONFIRMATION OF THE ORDER WAS GRANTED BY PAUL III. IN 1544. CARDINAL BORROMEO TOOK IT UNDER HIS SPECIAL PATRONAGE. THE RULES BECAME MORE STRICT; AND THE UR SULINES, WHO BEGAN TO SPREAD IN FRANCE (PARIS, 1611) AND GERMANY, ALSO ESTABLISHED CONVENTS, WHICH WAS NOT THE IDEA OF THE FOUNDER. advocacy of a modified episcopacy. His life was blameless, his personality imposing. Impressive as he was more renowned as a scholar. He did excellent service in discovering and securing old manuscripts, as, for example, the Samaritan Pentateuch from Aleppo.

Ussher's writings, which were numerous, may be divided as follows. (1) Apologetic writings: Graecoromanicam theologiam, 1615 (ed. Bernard, 1657). (2) Historical writings. Ussher was a pioneer in the department of the early church of Britain, and hoped to prove that the early British Church was independent of the Roman Church and its unscriptural traditions. The principal works of this kind were, A discourse of the Religion anciently professed by the Irish and British, 1657. (2) Historical writings. USURY. He was strongly influenced by Schleiermacher. Returning to Zürich, he engaged in preparatory work, and devoted himself to literary work. In 1823 he issued a Commentatio critica in qua Evangel. Joannis genuinum esse ex comparatis IV. Evangelii narratio non de cena ultima et passione J. Christi ostenditur, in which he vindicated John's accuracy concerning the last passover of our Lord. In 1824 he issued an essay on the Roman ecclesiastical system (Entwicklung d. paulin. Lehrbegriffs mit Hinweis auf d. übrigen Schriften d. N.T.). The author lived to see four editions, and two appeared after his death (6th, 1851). This work at once gave him a wide reputation, and secured for him a call to Bern as professor and director of the gymnasium. The work would not be accepted as an authority now. His fundamental position, for example, is, that Paul's doctrinal system was developed from the fact of the contrast between the pre-Christian age and Christianity. He rightly affirms, however, that Paul, after his conversion, sought for righteousness in the grace of God alone, and was active in spreading the gospel, because he believed in Christ as the Son of God and the Redeemer. In 1833 a commentary on Galatians appeared from his pen, and was designed to be the first of a series on Paul's Epistles. [In connection with S. Vogelin he issued an excellent selection of Zwingli's works, Zurich, 1819—20, 2 vols.]

USARUS, a Benedictine of the abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, near Paris; after his return with Hilduin from Spain, with a number of martyrs' relics, prepared, at the request of King Charles the Bald, a Martyrology. It was completed about 876, and was very popular. The work was first published in Rudimentum novitiorum, Lub., 1475; later editions, Antwerp, 1480; Venice, 1493; Padua, 1500; Cologne, 1515, 1521; Paris, 1536 (with notes by Molanus); Lyons, 1569, 1573; Antwerp, 1714 (critical edition by Soller); Paris, 1718 (by Bouillart). [Migne, in his Latin Patrology, vol. cxxi., reprints Soller's edition and notes.]

USURY now means the taking of illegal interest, but originally it meant the taking of any interest at all. The Mosaic law absolutely forbade a Hebrew to take interest from a Hebrew, but not from a foreigner (Deut. xxiii. 20). The New Testament does not forbid to take interest, though it recommends to lend money gratuitously (Luke vi. 34). The Fathers unanimously condemned the taking of interest,—Tertullian: Adversus Marcionem, 4, 17; Cyprian: De lapsis; Ambrose: De bono morbo, 12; Augustine: Contra Faustum, 19, 25; Jerome: Execli., 6, 18. The Popes followed the track of the Fathers, and canons law forbade, first the clergy, afterwards every member of the church, to take interest. The penalty was, for the clergy, suspension; for the laity, excommunication. The interest paid could be claimed, not only from him who had received it, but also from his heirs. An oath never to claim back the interest paid was not binding. Of the Reformers, Luther condemned the taking of interest, Calvin admitted it, Melanchthon vacillated; but the universal practice of modern civilization has abandoned the principles of canon law, and for good reasons. UTILITARIANISM. This term may be used as synonymous with hedonism (eudaemonism), but more commonly denotes a species of it. In the wider or generic sense it is the doctrine that sensation can give no account. The moral consequences; that right in conduct is what tends to promote happiness, and wrong what tends to produce misery; that the ethical is dependent on, and derived from, the useful. This doctrine has four forms, because the consequences of actions must be personal or social, temporal or eternal. The distinction of consequences into personal or social is, however, the deeper and more essential distinction. It is a distinction of nature, which that into temporal or eternal is not. It therefore has to be taken as the principle according to which hedonistic theories should be distributed, and it divides them into the two classes of egoistic and altruistic. Egoistic hedonism is what is known as the selfish theory, and altruistic hedonism is what is commonly called utilitarianism. Hedonism is not a better term, however, for the generic doctrine than utilitarianism: on the whole, it is not so good, as pleasure (hédone) is per se, still less than utility, identical or commensurate with morality.

Egoistic hedonism, the selfish theory, the utilitarianism of personal interest, has assumed various phases. It was maintained both in the Cyrenaic and Epicurean schools of antiquity; but the ideal of happiness in the former was the greatest attainable sum of sensations of gentle motion, and, in the latter, of pleasures of rest (freedom from discomfort and anxiety). The self-interest to which virtue is traced by Hobbes, Mandeville, and Paley, centres, according to the first of these writers, in the pleasures which spring from the sense of power; according to the second, in the satisfaction of the desire of applause; and, according to the third, in the hope of everlasting happiness and the fear of everlasting pain. But in every form the theory is subject to insuperable objections. It makes interest and duty identical both in idea and fact; whereas consciousness declares that they are quite distinct in idea, and experience testifies that they may be separated and even opposed in fact. To act from a desire of personal advantage is felt by every one to be very different from acting from a sense of duty. The more self-love reigns, the less power there is of this virtue or merit is present. We approve of disinterestedness, and our approbation is itself disinterested. Duty may dictate, in direct antagonism to self-interest, the sacrifice of health, fortune, reputation, and life. Further: egoistic hedonism denies by implication the possibility of intentional wrong-doing, and so involves a reductio ad absurdum. It affirms that men always act from self-love, or with reference to their own good, and also that thus to act is right. The plain inference is, that, so far as purpose goes, men always act rightly, and that there is no intentional wrong-doing. Men always mean to do right, i.e., what is for their own advantage; and if sometimes they do what is contrary to their interest, it is only from error of judgment. Thus the hypothesis tends to obliterate the distinction which it professes to elucidate. It is, likewise, an hypothesis logically incompatible with belief in the existence of life, and eternal life, inasmuch as it proceeds on the assumption that sensation is the root and source of our entire mental being. Every proof of the Divine Existence involves principles of which sensation can give no account. The moral attributes of God specially transcend all powers of proof possessed by sensationalism, and are specially irreconcilable with the system that self-interest is the motive-principle of all that is known as morality. According to this system, man possesses no truly moral attributes. But he can have none which are irreconcilable with self-interest, of in the world, or history, or himself. And there being no proper principle of morality in man; there being no true moral judge over man; selfishness, not righteousness, being that which is deepest in the universe,—the moral arguments for immortality, which are far the most powerful ones, are overturned, and the hopes of a future life are rendered delusive. Those who have advocated the selfish theory have generally allowed that this was its legitimate conclusion. Historically it has rarely been found to exist apart from atheism and irreligion: logically it never can.

The utilitarian theory, in the special sense of the designation, is a decided advance on the selfish theory. It takes account of the social as well as of the personal consequences of actions. It has been the favorite theory of English ethical writers, and especially in recent times. Dr. Richard Cumberland, in his De Legibus Naturae (1762), made a very great and remarkable attempt to found the theory on a philosophical basis. Locke, Norris, and Hume were either almost or altogether utilitarians. Jeremy Bentham, James Mill, John Stuart Mill, and Alexander Bain may be mentioned as among the chief defenders, during the present century, of utilitarianism in its immediately pre-Darwinian stage. Jeremy Bentham's utilitarianism, as presented in his Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation (1789), may be summed up in the following propositions: (1) The desire of pleasure and the fear of pain are the only possible motives which can influence the human will; (2) The supreme interest of every individual is the attainment of his own greatest happiness; (3) The supreme interest of society is the attainment of the greatest happiness possible to all its component individuals; (4) The principle of utility or of the greatest happiness is the only proper principle of morality; (5) All adverse principles may be reduced to two,—the principle of asceticism, according to which actions are approved of in proportion as they tend to diminish human happiness, and disapproved of as they tend to augment it; and the principle of sympathy, according to which actions are approved and disapproved of as a man feels himself disposed; (6) The moral character of an action is to be ascertained by a calculation of the pleasures and pains involved in the elements which constitute it; (7) Pleasure or pain may be ascribed to (a) intensity, (b) duration, (c) certainty or uncertainty, (d) nearness or remoteness, (e) peculiarity, (f) purity, and (g) extent, i.e., number of persons affected; (8) The sanctions or sources of pleasure and pain are physical, political, moral, and religious; and (9) The moral faculty is constituted by goodness or by the amelioration of the love of reputation, the dictates of religion, and prudence. James Mill maintains, in his Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind (1829), these four positions: (1) The standard of morals is utility, and all moral rules are based on an estimate, correct or incorrect, of utility; (2) Useful actions are of four kinds,—acts of prudence, fortitude, justice, and benevolence; (3) Prudence and fortitude including those acts which are useful to ourselves in the first instance, to others in the second instance; and justice and benevolence, those which are useful to all social relations, for the benefit of all mankind, to ourselves in the second instance; (3) The moral feelings are a complex product or growth, of which the ultimate constituents are our pleasurable and painful sensations; and (4) Disinterested sentiment is a real fact, but developed by association from our own personal interest, and at length detached from its original root. John Austin, in his Province of Jurisprudence determined (1832), assails the view that moral distinctions are perceived by an innate sentiment, moral sense, or intuitive reason, etc.; opposes to it the theory of utility, which he connects with a belief in the Divine Benevolence designing the happiness of sentient beings, utility being the index of the Divine Will; and endeavors to refute the various objections which have been urged against the theory. John S. Mill, in his Utilitarianism (1863), assumes that the criterion of morality, the foundation of morality, and the chief good, are identical, and affirms other propositions: (1) That the steadiness and consistency of the moral beliefs of mankind are mainly due to the tacit influence of utilitarianism; (2) That utilitarianism sets before men as chief aim the greatest happiness, not of the individual, but of the race; (3) That it rests on a distinction of pleasures into kinds,—high and low, noble and ignoble pleasures; (4) That it recognizes in human beings the power of sacrificing their own greatest good for the good of others; (5) That conscientious feeling invests utility with obligatory force; and (6) That justice is the animal desire to repel or retaliate hurt, widened so as to include all persons by the human capacity of enlarged sympathy and the human conception of intelligent self-interest. Dr. Alexander Bain, in his works on The Emotions and the Will and Mental and Moral Science, argues that utility or human happiness is the proper ethical standard; that moral rules are of two kinds, the first constituting morality proper, obligatory morality, duty, imposed by authority under a penalty for neglect or violation, and the second constituting optional morality, merit, virtue, or nobleness, having rewards for its own external support; that human beings are endowed with a prompting to relieve the pains, and add to the pleasures, of others, which is inexplicable by association, and irrespective of self-regarding considerations; and that prudence, sympathy, and some co-operating emotions, along with the institution of government or authority, give rise to moral ideas, their peculiar attribute of rightness being stamped on them by authority.

Jeremy Bentham is, perhaps, the best representative of those who have expounded and defended utilitarianism as a doctrine which takes into account not only the amelioration of pleasures and pains; and John S. Mill, of those who have held that their qualitative differences, their distinctions of kind and nature, are equally to be estimated. Neither form of the theory is consistent, and the latter form is extremely inconsistent. If regard be had merely to quantity of pleasure or pain, utilitarianism can never justify its separation from the selfish theory. Thus presented, it leaves out of account all the higher principles of human nature, and takes into account only what is measurable and calculable, which can only be what is animal and selfish. On the other hand, recognition of distinctions of kind or quality in pleasures and pains, when followed out, must lead, not to the confirmation, but to the destruction, of the theory. Quantity exclusive of quality must rule in a properly utilitarian system. Admit a qualitative gradation among pleasures, and you can no longer have a greatest happiness principle, but only a highest happiness principle. Now, what is highest happiness, if it be not a happiness which flows from a consciousness of doing what is right, if it be not a happiness which presupposes a right beyond itself? If, from devotion to what is right, a man sacrifice all other happiness in the world, this highest happiness will it be true, still remain with him; but why? Is it because this happiness is set by him over against other happiness, and preferred? or is it because right is set over against happiness, and this particular kind of happiness springs necessarily from the very act of sacrificing happiness to right? It cannot be the former, which would transmute all martyrdom into selfishness. He who makes the pleasure which flows from virtue his end will never get it, for this plain reason, as Dr. Newman says, that he will never have the virtue. If the latter be the true supposition, utilitarianism is erroneous. It is in this case the rightness which explains the pleasure, and not the pleasure which explains the rightness.

Very serious objections may be urged against utilitarianism in every form. It mistakes what is, at the most, a criterion of rightness, for its foundation, the effect for the cause, a tendency or consequence for the constitutive essence. It is easy to prove that virtue is useful; but to prove that virtue is derived from utility, that utility is the source of virtue, is what no utilitarian seems to have accomplished. Austin and Bain plainly abandon utilitarianism at the central and critical point,—where the one appeals to the will of God, the other to the authority of law. John S. Mill does so not less when he refers "the obligatory force of utility" to "conscientious feeling." The foundation of virtue should have its obligation, but only a highest happiness principle. If there be a moral law and moral distinctions, which are quite original and peculiar, a long process of evolution may be required before mind can apprehend them; and yet their apprehension may be no product of the process of evolution, but a thoroughly original and peculiar act, the reflex of the objective reality. Further: general presumptions in favor of evolution do not prove it to be without limits. It may be generally true, and yet have many limits. The distinction between moral and expedient may be one of its limits.

LIT.—The works of Austin, Bain, Bentham, Cumberland, Darwin, James and John S. Mill, Spencer, and Stephen, already mentioned; John Grote's Examination of the Utilitarian Philosophy, 1870; Henry Sidgwick's Methods of Ethics, 1874; F. H. Bradley's Ethical Studies, 1876. In M. Guyau's La Morale d'Epicure et ses rapports avec les doctrines contemporaines (1877), and La Morale Anglaise Contemporaine, Morale de l'utilite et de l'évolution (1877), the history of utilitarianism is traced with great fairness and the various phases of the theory considered with much penetration.

UTRAQUISTS and TABORITES, two religious parties amongst the Bohemians in the fifteenth century. A strong movement in favor of ecclesiastical reform pervaded Bohemia in the fourteenth century, and found a worthy exponent in Hus, whose religious and philosophical ideas were largely derived from the writings of Wiclif. The execution of Hus at Constance set Bohemia in antagonism to the Roman Church, and the outward expression of this antagonism was found in the demand for the reception of the Holy Communion by the laity under both kinds. This demand had been mentioned in the teaching of the Bohemian Reformers, but was put prominently forward by Jakubek of Mies, when Hus was in prison at Constance. The chalice became the Hussite symbol; and the name given to the Hussite party was that of "Utraquist," or "Conformers." When Hus died in 1420, the Utraquists put forth their religious aspirations in the Four Articles of Prague. These articles demanded, (1) freedom of preaching, (2) communion under both kinds, (3) the reduction to grant that the one can pass into the other by mere length of development, or that the one can be traced back to the other, merely by being pushed out of sight into dim and distant ages. Their demand for proof that the one ever has passed into the other can certainly not be met by a reference to the general evidence in favor of evolution. For evolution does not necessarily imply the transition in question. There may have been a continuous process of evolution in psychical capacity, from the lowest animal to the highest man; and, if so, it must have been only at some definite point in that evolution that moral distinctions could be recognized, and moral feelings entertained: but, if moral distinctions be in themselves quite different from distinctions of expediency and inexpediency, the apprehension of them cannot be said to have been derived out of experiences of expediency and inexpediency, merely because these experiences helped to develop intellect to a stage at which it was capable of grasping something higher than themselves. If there be a moral law and moral distinctions, which are quite original and peculiar, a long process of evolution may be required before mind can apprehend them; and yet their apprehension may be no product of the process of evolution, but a thoroughly original and peculiar act, the reflex of the objective reality. Further: general presumptions in favor of evolution do not prove it to be without limits. It may be generally true, and yet have many limits. The distinction between moral and expedient may be one of its limits.
of the clergy to apostolic poverty, (4) severe punishment of all open sins. Their objects were practical, and they asserted the great principles of the Reformation. The first claimed for every man the right to search the Scriptures for himself, the second attacked sacerdotism, the third cut at the root of ecclesiastical abuses, and the fourth claimed for Christianity the power to regulate society. But these articles were not the result of a compromise, but were held in different senses. Parties sprang up amongst the Bohemians. The most moderate party—"The Praguers" as they were called, because they had their seat in the University of Prague—were content with these articles, and wished in all else to hold the orthodox practices. In opposition to this conservative party stood the radicals, who were called "Taborites," from their custom of meeting in the open air on hilltops, to which they gave biblical names, such as Tabor and Oreb. The most moderate of the Taborites were the followers of Zizka, who after his death were called Orphans. They were more simple in their ritual than the Praguers, but joined the extreme Taborites, chiefly from political reasons. The Taborites proper set aside all ecclesiastical traditions, and stood only upon Scripture, which each man might interpret for himself. They denied transubstantiation, which the Praguers and Orphans held. Besides these were a group of extreme sectaries, Millenarians and Antinomians, who asserted that God existed only in the hearts of the believers. Most notorious of these were the Adamites, who lived a life of nature, which degenerated into shamelessness. They were exterminated by Zizka. The belief that it was a duty to punish sins led to intolerance of one party towards another, and also to great cruelty in war. The Hussite wars are amongst the most bloody which are recorded in history.

The religious zeal of the Bohemians formed the foundation of a military system which enabled them for ten years (1426-30) to defy Catholic armies of Europe. But the Utraquists, though victorious against the enemy, were divided amongst themselves; and peace abroad only brought discord and anarchy at home. Bohemia exhausted itself in warfare, and longed for peace. To the necessity of negotiating with the Utraquists, the Council of Basel owed its existence. In 1433 Bohemian representatives went to a conference with the council. In the discussion of the Four Articles of Prague, the council gradually succeeded in shaking the union of the Utraquists and Taborites. The moderate party favored an agreement with the church; and, when peace was possible, its advocates increased in number. After much negotiation, the Bohemians agreed to be reconciled to the church on the basis of the "Compacts," which defined the sense in which the council accepted the Four Articles of Prague. (1) They admitted freedom of preaching by priests duly commissioned; (2) If the Bohemians received on all other points the faith and ritual of the church, those who had the use of communicating under both kinds might continue to do so with the authority of the church; (3) The clergy and the church might possess temporalities, but were bound to administer them faithfully; (4) Open sins ought to be corrected, but by those who had jurisdiction given them in such matters. It was clear, that, in accepting this compromise, the Utraquists abandoned their position. The Compacts were signed at Iglau in 1436, and were regarded by both sides as a temporary arrangement. The Utraquist leaders hoped to use them as the foundation of a national church: the Catholics regarded them as a peace-compromise, but Utraquists hoped to enforce them as far as possible. The Catholics were right in their hope of re-action in Bohemia. The extreme Taborites dwindled away: the moderate Utraquists had not a sufficiently strong position from which to withstand the pressure of orthodoxy. The Bohemian movement had been, in the beginning, largely political,—a rising of the Czechs against the Germans. When its force was spent, it left a church in communion with Rome, which practiced a slight deviation in ritual from the common use. Moreover, the permission to exercise this peculiar ritual was given by a council, and received no papal sanction. For some years the Papacy judged it prudent neither to accept nor repudiate the Compacts. The Utraquists strove to consolidate their national church, and set up Rokyca (q.v.) as its archbishop. The Papacy refused to sanction his appointment, and strove by every means to strengthen the Catholic party in Bohemia. George Podiebrad (q.v.) strove to unite Bohemia politically, and hoped that this was only possible on the basis of the Compacts. But Pope Pius II. was alarmed at the successes of King George; and in 1462 declared the Compacts to be extinguished, and required George to unite his church with the Church of Rome. The majority of the Bohemians were still attached to Utraquism, and stood by their king against the enemies whom the Pope raised up against him. Utraquism still triumphed, and the machinations of the Catholics were likely to plunge Bohemia into another religious war. But a truce was made at Kutna-Hora in 1485, and a truce developed into a peace. Catholics and Utraquists lived peacefully side by side. Utraquism, however, had by this time lost its meaning, and was merely an empty protest. Its leaders had hoped to find in the Compacts the basis of a national church. The Catholics had been too strong for them: they steadily refused to unite with them. The Utraquists sacrificed their fundamental principles to gain peace, and the demand of the cup for the laity became a meaningless symbol when detached from the rest of the Utraquist beliefs. Yet Utraquism, in its decadence, threw out a sect which was important,—the Brethren of the Law of Christ, or Bohemian Brothers as they were afterwards called (q.v.). To the example and writings of the Utraquists, Lutheranism owed much. But the Utraquists did not at first recognize Lutheranism. When they did, they accepted it entirely, and added nothing of their own. Utraquism vanished, and was absorbed in the full tide of the Reformation.

UYTENBOGAERT (WYTEMBOOARD), Jan, one of the most influential and distinguished leaders of the Remonstrants; b. at Utrecht, Feb. 11, 1557; d. at The Hague, Sept. 24, 1644. He studied in Geneva, under Beza; in 1584 was appointed preacher at Utrecht; deprived of his position in 1589, on account of his friendship for Arminius; appointed preacher at The Hague in 1590, and court-chaplain of Prince Moritz of Orange. He pleaded for a national synod, in which the Remonstrants should have an equal right of speech with the Calvinists, and, with Episcopius and others, met the opponents at The Hague in 1611 to discuss propositions of peace. A decree banishing him, and confiscating his goods, was passed. He fled to France in 1622, and returned in 1626 to Rotterdam, where he lay concealed for a time. In 1629 his goods were restored to him; and in 1631 he preached again at The Hague, but his enemies succeeded in having him silenced. Uyttenbogaert wrote a Church History, Rotterdam, 1646; De auctoritate magistriatus in rebus eccles., Rotterdam, 1647, etc.; [Cattenburgh: Bibl. Script. Remons., Amsterdam, 1729. See Motley: Life of John of Barneveld].

NEUDECKER.

UZZIAH (might of Jehovah), the tenth king of Judah; son of Amaziah and Jecoliah (2 Chron. xxvi. 1, 3); called in 2 Kings (xlv. 21, xv. 1, and elsewhere), except in four places (xv. 18, 30, 82, 34), Azariah (whom Jehovah helps). It is likely that the latter name was given to him in view of his great victories, so evidently the result of divine help. He was sixteen years old, when, by choice of the people, he succeeded his father. He justified this selection. He was a more pious and devoted servant of Jehovah than his father had been. During his reign of fifty-two years the prophets Amos (i. 1), Hosea (i. 1), and Isaiah (i. 1, vi. 1), and possibly Joel flourished. His piety is attributed largely to Zechariah's influence (2 Chron. xxvi. 5). He was warlike and victorious. His army was large, well appointed, and well drilled. He was the first Judite, apparently, to use stone and dart throwing machines (2 Chron. xxvi. 11–15). Under him Judah threw off all dependence upon Israel, the seaport Elath was captured, the Philistines and the Arabians conquered, the fenced cities rebuilt, Jerusalem fortified, towers erected, and wells dug,—the latter because “he had much cattle,” and “loved husbandry” (2 Chron. xxvi. 6–10). But, lifted up by his successes, he essayed to usurp the priest's office, and burn incense in the temple. Resisted valiantly by Azariah and eighty other priests, he was effectually stopped in full career by the appearance of leprosy upon his forehead; and he died as a leper in a separate house from the palace, and was buried in the “field of burial.” According to the usual chronology, he reigned from 810 to 758 B.C.
VADIAN, the Reformer of St. Gall, properly Joachim von Watt; b. at St. Gall, Switzerland, Dec. 30, 1484; d. there April 6, 1551. He was educated first at home, and then at Vienna, where he met Zwingli; and there he changed his name, according to the pedantic fashion of the time, first to Vadinus, and then to Vadianus. His studies took a very wide range, embracing all the learning of the time. His proficiency and versatility are shown by his appointment as professor of the Latin and Greek languages and literature in the university (1510-18), his reception of the degree of doctor in medicine, and from the emperor the laureate's crown. But of more permanent consequence was his study of Luther's writings, in correspondence with Zwingli, and presided at the conferences held at Zurich (1523) and at Bern (1528). He headed the Reformation party in St. Gall, vigorously opposed the Anabaptists, and in every way played the part of chief. In 1529 his fellow-citizens testified their appreciation of his services by electing him chief magistrate, and again in 1531. He was emphatically the people's friend. He stood by them in time of need; he entered into their pleasures; he led them in religious thought. He died bewailed by his fellow-countrymen in every way played the part of chief. In 1527 he wrote a dialogue between a courtier and a Piedmontese, who for a decade was the motive power in the imperial policy, and made himself noticed by the zeal with which he defended Erasmus against the fury of the Spanish monks. In 1527 he wrote a dialogue between a courtier and an archdeacon, in which he defended the recent seizure of Rome and the Pope by the imperial army under the constable of Bourbon. Though as yet circulating only in manuscript, the dialogue fell into the hands of the papal nuncio, Count Castiglione, who denounced it in a most violent manner to the imperial government; but Alonso was protected by the chancellor. And, just as the embroilment reached its point of culmination, another dialogue appeared between Mercury and Charon. It was written by Juan de Valdés, and was chiefly political; though it also contained some very sharp criticisms on the Church and the papal policy. Both dialogues were first printed in 1529, anonymously; latest edition, 1850. In 1530 Alonso was present at the diet of Augsburg, where he translated the confession of the Lutherans to the emperor, and generally acted as mediator between the opposing parties. He gained the esteem and confidence, not only of Melanchthon, but of the Protestants in general; and, indeed, he showed so much sympathy for the Reformation, that he afterwards found it advisable not to return to Spain. In 1531 he was at the imperial court in Brussel, and in 1534 he was still at the service of the church. But of the events of his life after that time nothing is known. Juan also found it prudent to keep out of the reach of the Spanish Inquisition. In 1531 he staid in Rome, in intimate intercourse with Sepulveda, the imperial historiographer, and deeply interested in the study of natural science. In 1533 he settled in Naples, and published there in the same year his Diálogo de la lengua (last edition, Madrid, 1860), concerning the origin, history, style, and literary monuments of the Spanish language. In Naples he conversed much with Ochino, Peter Vermigli, etc.; and gradually formed a circle, which, though it never openly espoused the Reformation, held a Roman-Catholic Church, stood in decided opposition to the leading principles of its constitution and policy. Juan de Valdés was a theologian both by talent and by study; though he had not enjoyed professional training; and his views on justification, on the authority of the Bible, and the importance of its study, etc., approached often very closely to those of Luther. His Alfabeto Christiano, in 1541, freed him from falling into the hands of the Roman-Catholic Church. Having put down the insurrection of the Eastern Empire. Having put down the insurrection of Prosperus, a relative of Julian, he prepared for a campaign against the Goths; and one of the preparations he wanted to make was to receive baptism. But the patriarch of Constantinople, Eudoxius, was an Arian; and the Orthodox had, at that moment, not one single church left to them in the capital. Thus the rude and ignorant monks happened to be secretly in a conspiracy, and the monks happened to be secretly in a conspiracy, and, after the fall of the empire, the religious leaders of the Eastern Empire were driven into the hands of the Hellenists. VALEARIAN (Roman emperor 253–259) showed himself quite friendly to the Christians in the beginning of his reign. But by Leo I. ordered all who disobeyed to be sent to work in the mines; and the third, of 258, enacted that all bishops, presbyters, and deacons should be put to death. Sixtus of Rome, and Cyprian of Carthage, fell as victims. But in 259 Valerian was defeated and taken prisoner by King Saporos; and his son and successor, Gallienus, immediately put an end to the persecution. See Basil.: Hist. Eccl., VII. 10; Cyprian: Epp., 82, 83. ZÖCKLER.

VALEARIAN, St., was Bishop of Cemene, a see belonging under the archbishop of Embrodunum, and situated in the Maritime Alps, but by Leo I. removed to Nizza. He flourished in the fifth century; was present at the synod of Riez, 439; signed the letter of the Gallican bishops to Leo I., 451 (see Leo: Opp., i. pp. 998 and 1110); and sided with the monks of Lerins in their controversy and situated in the Maritime Alps, but by Leo I. ordered all who disobeyed to be sent to work in the mines. VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, located at Nashvillle, Tenn., is under the control of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South, and owes its existence to the munificence of Cornelius Vanderbilt of New York, who on the 27th of March, 1873, made, through Bishop II. N. McTyeire (whom he named as president of the Board of Trust for life), a donation of five hundred thousand dollars; which amount he subsequently increased to one million.
It has also received from Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, son of the founder, four hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and from other sources about seventy-five thousand. It has an endowment of nearly nine hundred thousand dollars. The buildings are commodious and well equipped;
and the grounds, located on an eminence In the suburbs of the city, and consisting of seventy-five acres, are ample and beautiful. The university is organized into six distinct departments (academic, biblical, legal, medical, pharmaceutical, and dental), with a chancellor and forty-two professors and instructors. It enrolled on its last catalogue (1885-86) 499 students. It is the largest and best endowed denominational institution of learning in the South.

VAN DOREN, William Howard, D.D., b. in Orange County, N.Y., March 2, 1810; d. at Indi-apolis, Ind., Friday, Set. 8, 1882. He was graduated at Columbia College, N.Y., and at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Penn., 1882; taught until 1886, when he was licensed by the Louisville presbytery. For two years he was a missionary in Mississippi. In 1839 he entered the regular pastorate, and served in the Reformed Church, East Brooklyn, N.Y. (1839-51), in the mission which ultimately became the 34th-Street Reformed Church, and in the Second Presbyterian Church, St. Louis. In 1865 he removed to Chicago, and there began the preparation of his Suggestive Commentary on the New Testament, on an Original Plan, of which have appeared Luke (New York, 1868, 2 vols.), John (1870, 2 vols.), Romans (1870, 2 vols.). In 1878 he removed to Indianapolis.
His Commentary is homiletical, and has been widely used.

VANE, Sir Henry, often called "Sir Harry Vane," was b. in 1612. His father was a statesman in the reign of James I and Charles I., but lost court-favor by his opposition to Lord Straf-ford. Young Henry imbibed republican principies, probably strengthened by his Swiss travels, and in 1635 visited New England, when he was chosen governor of Massachusetts. The following years were redolent with the pursuits of a career which made him distinguished in the history of his country. He took part in all the important questions discussed by the new Parliament, and promoted the impeachment of Laud, and the adoption of the Solemn League and Covenant. He was one of the members of the Western Assembly, and a commissioner at the treaties of Uxbridge and the Isle of Wight. But he had little sympathy with Oliver Cromwell, either in his military or political views, being a stanch republican, and thinking more of the power of the tongue and the sword than of the musket. Cromwell was thoroughly practical, but Vane was a determined theorist. Cromwell was both soldier and statesman; Vane, little more than a dreamy philosopher. Vane, however, became one of the Council of State after the execution of Charles I. in 1649, and in that capacity, and as a member of Parliament, greatly displeased his colleague, who denounced him as "a juggling fellow," and exclaimed, as he broke up the House of Commons in 1653, "The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" His book entitled A Healing Question Propounded and Resolved, published in 1656, so incensed the lord-protector, that he imprisoned the author in Carisbrooke Castle, Isle of Wight. Cromwell then tried gentle means to win over his intellectual antagonist, but in vain.
The latter preferred, in his noble retreat at Raby,
in the County of Durham, those speculative studies, which he always pursued with great mental earnestness, to any participation in public affairs during Oliver's protectorate. Vane's advocacy of republicanism afterwards was utterly in vain;
and upon the restoration of Charles II. he was indicted for "compassing and imagining the death" of that monarch. He pleaded justly, that what he had done during the Commonwealth was no breach of the statute of treason, as that statute applied to a king regnant, not to him who could only claim to be one de jure. Charles wrote to the lord-chancellor, saying that "Vane is too dangerous a man to let live, if one can honestly put him out of the way." He was put out of the way by being beheaded June 14, 1662. His be-behavior on the scaffold was very noble, and his character has been eulogized by his admiring biographer, John Forster, in his Statesmen of the Commonwealth of England. Vane's Retired Man's Meditations, and his England's Remembrancer, contain many eloquent passages; but the tone of the latter is very violent.

VARIOUS READINGS are the differences in the text between the various manuscripts, translations, and patristic quotations of the Scriptures.
In the case of the Bible manuscripts they are mostly accidental, arising from the scribe's not reading his copy correctly, or not hearing correctly when the passage was dictated to him, or, perhaps, from simple carelessness; such as copying the margin into the text, repeating a phrase or part of one. A few intentional variations have been claimed; but they are unimportant, and affect rather the form than the substance of the text. The various readings in the New-Testament manuscripts are in the aggregate very numerous. In Mill's time they were estimated at thirty thousand, and subse-cquent comparison has increased the number to about one hundred and fifty thousand. The statement once occasioned great alarm; but now it is generally understood that the variations are slight in the vast majority of cases, — mere difference in spelling, in the order of words, reduplication, etc., and that no doctrine is affected. In regard to the Old Testament manuscripts the case is different. The source of the various readings is the same, but their number is very much less. The Hebrew manuscripts were copied by an official class, under strict regulations; and many deviations from the standard text occasioned rejection of the scribes' work. So the number of Hebrew variations is very small, being not more than 2,000. See BIBLE TEXT, pp. 260, 270, 278; KEN and KETTHIN.

VASSAR COLLEGE, located at Poughkeepsie, N.Y., was incorporated by the General Assembly in January, 1861. It was founded by Matthew Vassar, b. in East Dereham, Norfolk, Eng., April 29, 1792; d. at Poughkeepsie, June 28, 1863, who had acquired a fortune by his own exertions, and, being childless, resolved "to found and perpetuate an institution which should accomplish for young women what our colleges are accomplishing for young men." By gift and bequest lie had acquired a fortune by his own exertions, and, being childless, resolved "to found and perpetuate an institution which should accomplish for young women what our colleges are accomplishing for young men." By gift and bequest he placed in the hands of its trustees funds amounting to about $778,000. The whole property of the college now (1883) amounts to $1,149,572.57; of which $128,748.57 is in productive funds, $125,000 of this last amount being in funds for scholarships, and but $90,000 in endowments for instruction.

Its faculty consists of a president, a lady principal in charge of the domestic life of the students, and seven professors in the different departments of collegiate instruction. The departments of art and music are also in charge of two professors. There are also twenty teachers distributed in the several departments.

The course of study is similar to that in colleges for men. It is prescribed to the middle of the sophomore year; after that, elective under the regulation of the faculty. Latin is required, and one other language, which may be Greek, German, or French. Each student may take simultaneously three studies. It was found necessary in the beginning to provide for a preparatory course; and, though it is still continued, it is regarded as provisional and temporary. The degree of A.B. is granted to students who complete the collegiate course of four years. The degree of A.M. is granted to graduates who pass examination in studies approved by the faculty as equivalent to a postgraduate course of two full years. Twenty-three graduates have received this degree. No honorary degrees have been conferred. A diploma is granted in the schools of art and music to students who complete the full course of three years. The whole number of graduates is above 2,000. See BIBLE TEXT, pp. 260, 270, 278; KEN and KETTHIN.

VATICAN COUNCIL, the last ecumenical council of the Roman-Catholic Church. It was held in the Church of St. Peter, in Rome, from Dec. 8, 1869, to July 18 (or Oct. 20), 1870, but is not yet completed, and may be reconvened by the Pope. The council of Trent as the eighteenth, and the majority of Roman divines and canonists count the Council of Trent as the eighteenth, and this would make the Vatican the nineteenth. The difference arises from the various readings in the Vulgate, including the so-called Vatican reading (from A.D. 1449) and the so-called Roman reading (from A.D. 1449), which are rejected by many in whole or in part. Hefele excludes Pisa, but accepts several decrees of Constance and Basel as ecumenical. The Old Catholics, under the leadership of Bishop Hefele, who was himself a member of it. (See his Concilien geschichte, vol. i. pp. 59 sq., of the second and revised German edition, 1873.) Bellarmin (De conc., lib. i. c. 5) and the majority of Roman divines and canonists count the Council of Trent as the eighteenth, and this would make the Vatican the nineteenth. most important event in the doctrinal history of that church since the sixteenth century, and completes the system of papal absolutism. The Council of Trent was convened for the settlement of the questions raised by the Reformation, and ended with the condemnation of the Protestant or evangelical doctrines. The Vatican Council was convened for the condemnation of modern rationalism and liberalism within the Roman Church, and for the settlement of the question of final authority.

It was summoned by Pope Pius IX., in the twenty-third year of his pontificate, by an encyclical letter (Eterni Patris unigenitus Filius), June 29, 1868, solemnly opened Dec. 8, 1869, and indefinitely postponed Oct. 20, 1870, in consequence of the Franco-German war, which broke out immediately after the passage of the Infallibility Decree (July 18), and ended in the destruction of the temporal power of the Papacy, and the establishment of the German Empire with a Protestant head, — the king of Prussia. The attendance was the largest known in the history of councils, and reached the number of 764 out of 1,037 dignitaries who are entitled to a seat and vote in an oecumenical synod of the papal communion. But, after the outbreak of the war, it dwindled down to 200 or 180. The Italians had a vast majority of 276, of whom 143 belonged to the former Papal States alone. The French and German bishops were weak in number, but strongest in learning and the importance of the dioceses which they represented. The deliberations were conducted in strict secrecy, but four public sessions were held for the solemn proclamation of the results.

The subject-matter of the council was divided into four parts,—faith, discipline, religious orders, and rites (including missions); and each part was assigned to a special commission (congregatio, or deputation), consisting of twenty-six prelates, with a presiding cardinal appointed by the Pope. The decrees were prepared on the basis of schemata previously drawn up by learned divines and canonists, discussed, revised, adopted in secret sessions by the general congregations, and then solemnly proclaimed in public sessions in the presence and by the authority of the Pope. The management was entirely in the hands of the Pope and his cardinals and advisers (Jesuits). The proceedings were conducted in Latin, the official language of the Roman Church.

The doctrinal results of the council are embodied in two sets of decrees,—the first against infidelity, the second against Gallicanism.

(1) "The decrees on the dogmatic constitution of the Catholic faith " were unanimously adopted in the third public session, April 24, 1870. They are directed against modern rationalism, pantheism, materialism, and atheism, and set forth the orthodox doctrine of God, the creation, and the relation of faith to reason. The Roman Civilita Catolica praised these decrees as " a reflex of the wisdom of God; " the Paris L'Univers, as " a masterpiece of divine and human wisdom;" the London Times, as " the broadest and boldest affirmation of the supernatural and spiritual order ever yet made in the face of the world." But, during the discussion, a Swiss prelate declared the schema de fide a work of supererogation, and said, " What is the use of condemning errors which have been long condemned, and tempt no Catholic? The false beliefs of mankind are beyond the reach of your decrees. The best defence of Catholicism is religious science. Encourage sound learning, and prove by deeds as well as words that it is the mission of the Church to promote, among the nations, liberty, light, and true freedom. The Bishop of Strossmayer from the Turkish frontier, the boldest and most liberal member of the council, attacked the preamble to the scheme which made Protestantism responsible for modern infidelity, and said, "Protestants abhor these errors as much as Catholics. The germ of rationalism existed in the Catholic Church before the Reformation, and bore its worst fruits in the midst of a Catholic nation at the time of Voltaire and the Encyclopaedists. Catholics produced no better refutation of the errors to be condemned than Leibnitz and Guizot." (2) Far more important are the " decrees on the dogmatic constitution of the Church of Christ," or the decrees of papal absolutism and infallibility, which agitated the council for several months, and, after a vigorous opposition and the departure of the anti-infallibilist bishops, passed, with two dissenting votes, in the fourth public session, July 18, 1870. This is the crowning act of the council, on which its historical significance rests. The question of papal jurisdiction and authority in relation to the general episcopate and the authority of an ecumenical council, had been left open by the Council of Trent, and was a subject of dispute for three hundred years between Gallicans and Ultramontanes, Jansenists and Jesuits, constitutional monarchists and absolute monarchs, until it was brought to final rest within that church. Ultramontanism and Jansenism achieved a complete triumph over a powerful minority of liberal bishops, who at last gave up in despair, left Rome before the vote, and then submitted, one by one, to the decision of the council for the sake of unity and peace, which they esteemed higher than their personal conviction and the facts of history. Even Hefele, Kendrick, and Strossmayer submitted, and ind to do so, or deny the infallibility decrees. The solemn proclamation was entirely in the hands of the Pope and his cardinals, and Jesuits, and share the fate of the Old Catholics. The council decided that the Roman pontiff has an ordinary episcopal authority and immediate jurisdiction over all the Catholic churches and dioceses; that he is the bishop of bishops; and that all bishops are simply his vicars, as he himself is the vicar of Christ; moreover, that the Roman pontiff, whenever he speaks ex cathedra, i.e., in his official capacity, to the Catholic world on any question of faith or morals, is infallible, that is, absolutely final and irreversible in and of themselves, even without the consent of an ecumenical council. See INFALLIBILITY."

VATICAN, Palace of the, the residence of the Pope. It is on the right bank of the Tiber, in that part of Rome called the "Leonine City," and on the Vatican Hill. It is not one building, but a group of buildings, dating from different periods; but such as it is the largest palace in the world, 1151 feet long by 767 wide, containing a number of rooms variously estimated at from 4,422 to 10,000. The name "Vatican" is from sote, a prophet, because the district was believed to have been the site of Etruscan divination. The name was once given to the whole district between the foot of the Vatican Hill and the Tiber, near St. Angelo. It was considered an unhealthy locality. In it was the Circus of Caligula, decorated by the obelisk which now stands in front of St. Peter's. It afterwards became the Circus of Nero; and in his gardens on the Vatican Hill he put to death many Christians ("an immense multitude," says Tacitus) on the groundless charge of setting fire to Rome, and in awful mockery nailed them, clad in garments dipped in pitch, upon stakes, and set fire to them. The apostle Peter is said to have been crucified there.

The earliest residence of the popes at Rome was the Lateran. But Symmachus (498—514) built a palace on the Vatican, near old St. Peter's; and in it Charlemagne is said to have resided when in Rome shortly after the establishment of the library (1448), and appears in the earliest catalogue (1475). It was to Paris by Napoleon I., but restored after his fall. For further information, see BIBLE TEXT, p. 270; SCHAFF: Companion to the Greek Testament, pp. 113 sqq. But the treasures of the Vatican Library are not only of biblical but also of classical and literary. These have not been examined as they should be. On the general subject of the Vatican Palace, see particularly HARKE'S Walks in Rome.

VATICANUS, Codex. See BIBLE TEXT, p. 270, and above art. VATKE, Johann Karl Wilhelm, b. in Behudorf, near Magdeburg, March 14, 1806; d. at Berlin, April 19, 1882. He was privadoctor in theology at Berlin from 1830 to 1837, when he became extraordinary professor. He wrote Die Religion des Alten Testaments, Berlin, 1885,—the first part as a garden house. Julius II. (1503—13) united it to the palace by a courtyard, which Sixtus V. (1585—90) divided in two by the library-building. This latter pope began the present papal residence proper, and it was finished by Clement VIII. (1592—1667). The apartments occupied by the Pope are very plain. Immediately above them are the apartments of the cardinal secretary of state. Of all the parts of the Vatican, the Sistine Chapel, built by Baco Pintelli in 1473, is probably the most famous, by reason of the ceiling and the altar-wall, frescoed by Michael Angelo (1475—1564), who did the former in 1508—09, and the latter 1533—41. Upon the ceiling he put those wonderful pictures from the Old Testament, from the first day of creation to the intoxication of Noah, and the prophets Jonah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Joel, Daniel, Isaiah, and Zechariah, and the sibyls Persica, Erythrea, Libyca, Cumæa, and Delphica. Upon the altar-wall is the famous fresco, The Last Judgment. The paintings are said to be only fifty in number, among them are Domenichino's Communion of St. Jerome, Raphael's Madonna di Foligno and Transfiguration, and Titian's Madonna and Saints. The Vatican Library contains 23,580 Greek, Latin, and Oriental manuscripts, but under 50,000 printed volumes. The books and manuscripts are hidden from sight of the tourist, behind locked cases; but permission can be obtained, by the use of due influence, to examine the books. Most precious of the treasures of the library is the Codex Vaticanus designated B. It is written on seven hundred and fifty-nine leaves of very fine vellum (the New Testament covers a hundred and forty-two of them), in small but clear and neat uncial letters, in three columns of forty-two lines each to a page, ten inches by ten inches and a half. It is more accurately written than the Codex Sinaicuus, and probably is a little older, but not so complete. It dates from the fourth century. It was apparently copied in Egypt by three skilled scribes. It contains the Septuagint version of the Old Testament (with a few gaps and the omission of Maccabees), and the New Testament as far as Heb. ix. 14. The manuscript was brought to Rome shortly after the establishment of the library (1448), and appears in the earliest catalogue (1475). It was carried to Paris by Napoleon I., but restored after his fall. For further information, see BIBLE TEXT, p. 270; SCHAFF: Companion to the Greek Testament, pp. 113 sqq. of a comprehensive work upon biblical theology, which was never finished. On account of the liberal views expressed and advocated in this book, he was debarred from becoming full professor. Vatke is one of the writers who first developed the present Wellhausen views of the Old Testament, in connection with the Congregational body, as pastor of a church in the cathedral city of Worcester, and continued there for six years, working hard both in the study and in the pulpit. At the end of that period he accepted a call to Kensington, the court suburb of London, and there made a deep impression by his thoughtful and earnest exposition of the truths of Christianity, gathering round him persons of rank and of superior culture. In a few years his attainments procured for him the chair of modern history in the newly founded university of London; and in 1843 he was invited to the principalship of Lausanne College — a rising institution just removed from Blackburn.

In his new sphere he made his presence felt, not only by his influence over the students, but by his occasional sermons, and especially by his speeches at Manchester, in the outskirts of which city the college had been erected. He was decidedly a platform orator, and displayed more ability in that way than by his pulpit discourses, superior as they were generally acknowledged to be. He resigned his principalship in 1857, and retired to the town of xbrid e, undertaking the care of a small church in that place. He subsequently removed to St. John's Wood, and in 1867 went down to Torquay to preside over a newly formed congregation. There he died June 15, 1868. He was chairman of the Congregational Union in 1846, and visited America in 1865 as a delegate from that body. He is best known by his numerous works, especially his Life and Opinions of Wycliffe, in two volumes, 1828, and his Monograph of the Reformer, 1853. He was editor of the British Quarterly from its commencement in 1845 down to the year 1866. He delivered in 1834 the congregational lecture entitled Causes of the Corruption of Christianity, and published A History of the House of Stuart, 1810, also Revolutions in History, 3 vols., 1859-63. His publications altogether were very numerous.

tion of ecclesiastics, Jews, and women—to appear before it. Its sittings were partly public,—held under open sky,—partly secret; and its verdicts were executed by its own members. In the early middle ages, when might was right, and the will of the strong the only law in power, the Vehm Court was an institution of great value; but, when the State became able to maintain its laws, the Vehmic Court became superfluous, and at the same time it degenerated into an outrageous tyranny. In the fifteenth century several emperors tried to circumscribe its authority, and alter its character; and in the sixteenth century it held its last open session. VEIL is the translation of the Authorized Version for words properly meaning mantles or shaws in Gen. xxiv. 65, xxxviii. 14, 19; Ruth iii. 15; Cant. v. 7; Isa. iii. 23. Veils were rarely used among the Hebrews, the Egyptians, or Assyrians, as is abundantly proved by the absence of allusion to them in the writings of the first, and by the pictures upon the monuments of the last two nations. Women in the Bible lands of to-day are never seen in public without a veil, or an apology for one; but the practice dates from Mohammed.

VEIL, Taking the, the ceremony of reception into a nunnery. On her first profession, the woman takes the "white veil," and thus enters upon her year's novitiate. If she still desire to become a nun, she takes the "black veil," and pronounces the irrevocable vows.

VENATORIUS, Thomas, b. at Nuremberg, about 1488; d. there Feb. 4, 1551. He studied mathematics, classical literature, and theology, and entered then the order of the Dominicans. But about 1530 he emigrated, and entered the Reformed Church, and was appointed preacher at St. Jacob's in his native city, and contributed much to the establishment of Protestantism there. He wrote Axiomata rerum christianarum (1526), Defensio pro baptismo (1527), etc.; but his principal work is his De virtute christiana (1529), the first attempt at a Protestant ethics.

VENCE, Henri Francois de, b. at Pareid about 1675; d. at Nancy Nov. 1, 1749. After holding several curacies, he became curate of Clapham, 1754; vicar of Huddersfield, Yorkshire, 1759, whence he removed in 1771, to become vicar of Yelling. Henry Venn stands alongside of the foremost workers in the Christian ministry in England in the eighteenth century. He was upon intimate terms with Whitefield and Lady Huntingdon, who had an important share in bringing him to a pure knowledge of the gospel. His sympathies were broad and evangelical. According to Bishop Ryle, the best memorial sermon over Whitefield was the one he preached in Lady Huntingdon's chapel at Bath. As a preacher, man-of-war, and moralist, he had a large influence in the religious and manufacturing town, he leavened the irreverent mass with gospel truth, and was among the first to carry the gospel with success to the manufacturing classes. He was an indefatigable preacher, delivering often eight or ten sermons a week, and wholly engrossed in instructing others in the doctrines of the cross. He published two works, The Complete Duty of Man (1763, etc.), and Mistsakes in Religion (1774, etc.), a collection of essays on the prophecy of Zachariah, John the Baptist's father. See JOHN VENN: Life and Letters of Henry Venn (of which Bishop Ryle says, "I know few volumes in the whole range of Christian memoirs so truly valuable as this one"), 1834, 7th ed., London, 1853; RYLE: The Christian Leaders of the Last Century, London, 1869; W. VERENA. 2453

VERENA, a Christian virgin who came with the Theban legion of Mauritius from Upper Egypt to the West. In Milan, where she stopped for some time, she heard of the thing which had overtaken the legion; and shortly after she went to Switzerland, where she labored — first in the neighborhood of Solothurn, and afterwards in the region near the junction of the Rhine and the Aar — for the conversion of the Pagan population. She died at Zurzach, near Constance, where she lies buried. See Martyrologium Nuperi, in Canisius: Lect. Antiqu., ii., and Act. Sanct., Sept. 1. ZÖCKLER.

VERGERIUS, Petrus Paulus, b. at Capo d'Ischia in 1498; d. at Tubingen, Oct. 4, 1565. He studied law at Padua; entered the papal service, and was twice sent as nuncio to Germany by Clement VII. and Paul II. When he gave so great satisfaction, that in 1536 he was made bishop of his native city. Sent to the colloquy at Worms (Jan. 1, 1541), his speeches seemed to the curia to be too conciliatory, and he retired to his see. He then began to study the writings of the Reformers for the purpose of refuting them: but the result of his studies was his own conversion; and the reforms he introduced in his diocese, the manner in which he spoke of justification by faith, invocation of saints, etc., very soon roused the suspicion of the Inquisition. His frequent intercourse with Francesco Speria finally induced the authorities to take measures against him; but he escaped, and fled into Switzerland, 1542. After laboring for several years in the grisones as minister of Vicosoprano, he removed in 1552 to Tubingen, where he spent the rest of his life, enjoying a pension from the Duke of Württemberg. VERGIL, b. at Salem, Mass., Aug. 28, 1818; and d. there May 8, 1880; graduated at Harvard, 1836, and was Greek tutor there, 1838-39; was licensed as a Unitarian preacher, 1843, but took no charge, and lived in retirement at Salem. His Essays and Poems (1839) show a delicate religious genius, and contain "some of the best sonnets in our language." VERONICA. According to the legend in its most common form (Act. Sanct., Feb. 4), St. Veronica was a pious woman of Jerusalem, who, when Christ passed by her on his way to Golgotha, took off her head-cloth, and handed it to him in order that he might wipe the blood and sweat from his face; and, when he returned the cloth, his features had become impressed upon it. One modification of the legend identifies Veronica (or rather Beopovien, according to Johannes of Malala: Chronographia, p. 305) with the woman "diseased with an issue of blood" (Matt. ix. 20-22; comp. Euseb.: Hist. Eccles., VII. 17). Another represents her as sprung from royal blood, a grand-daughter of Herod, and the Great, evidencing confounding her with Berenice, the niece of Herod the Great. In the manner in which the portrait was brought to Rome is generally represented as follows. The Emperor Tiberius was sick; and, having heard of the wonderful cures wrought by the portrait, he sent for Veronica. She obeyed the call, and went to Rome, and, as soon as the emperor had touched the cloth, he was cured. Veronica remained in Rome; and, when she died, she bequeathed the costly relic to Clement, the successor of Peter. In the beginning of the reign of Tiberius the emperor John VII. asserted that the Church of St. Maria Maggiore was actually in possession of the miraculous portrait; but it was shown only to kings and princes, and only on certain conditions. Both Milan, however, and Jaen in Spain, claim to have the genuine head-cloth of Veronica; and, in unriddling this entanglement, it is worth noticing, that, in the thirteenth century (Gersasius of Tilsburg: Otia imperialia, 25; Matthew Paris: Ad an. 1218), it was not the possessor of the cloth, but the cloth itself which was called VERONICA, that is, ceria icon (the true picture), a circumstance which speaks in favor of Grimm's combination of the legend with that of Helen. VESPERS.

or, more properly, that of the higher ranks, coming into fashion just at that time,—a kind of retinue, a bishop, Maximian with two clerks, representing the Emperor Justinian with his dotal costume arose is answered alike in the history of all nations. It is simply the popular costume, while among the other classes it became subject to the changes of fashion. The same is the case in the Christian Church. The New Testament never hints at a peculiar, priestly costume, different from that of common people. We meet with such a distinction for the first time on a mosaic in the Church of St. Vitale in Ravenna, representing the Emperor Justinian with his retinue, and Bishop Maximinian with two clerks. The emperor and the courtiers wear over the short tunic the so-called paludamentum, which was coming into fashion just at that time,—a kind of loose mantle covering the whole body to below the knees, and held together and fastened on the right shoulder, purple-colored, and ornamented with gold and precious stones. The ecclesiastics wear long, plain white tunics, adorned with two black stripes descending from the shoulders,—the so-called oraria. Over the tunic the bishop wears a toga Graecorum,—a light-green mantle, which, in the first century of our era, superseded the heavy, old Roman toga: and under the toga the omophorion is visible,—a black scarf ornamented with crosses. But stripes on the tunic were very common, and so was the scarf; nor was it uncommon for laymen to adorn their garments with crosses. The first official ecclesiastical costume, in the strict sense of the word, we meet with on a mosaic in the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, dating from the period between 556 and 573. It is there represented on plain white garments: only the broad omophorion, visible under the toga, shows different colors,—blue and red. The tunic has no oration; and the toga is thrown in a free and easy manner around the shoulders.

From these two pieces of dress,—the tunic, or stola, tunica talaris, tunica alba, and the toga, or paenula, planeta, casula,—the liturgical costume of the Armenians, the Greek, the Roman-Catholic, and even the Abyssinian Church, developed. Christianity is said to have been introduced into Abyssinia in the time of Athanasius, about 300, and was probably brought thither from India or Arabia. At all events, a connection with Rome cannot be established. The Abyssinian priest wears a white tunic, called kamis, with sleeves, and which is opened behind. Now, in Rome, under the emperors, it became the fashion to put on several tunics, one above the other; and the first was called camisia. Nevertheless, scholars are inclined to derive the Abyssinian kamis from an Arabic root. When officiating, the Abyssinian priest wears over the tunic a toga of silk or satin, and many colored,—the so-called cappa: but the derivation of this word is also uncertain, however much it reminds one of the Latin cappa, the travelling-mantle of the Romans. The kamis is held together by a sash twenty to thirty yards long, and wound around the waist; and below that are visible the ample white trousers, called sanafit. On great occasions the priest wears a crown of mesh-chains, the cappa, is the property of the church. His every-day head-dress is a turban made up of thirty to forty yards of white stuff. He is also provided with a fly-flap and crutch, as he often has to stand up, singing, for hours.

In the Greek Church the tunic has been retained under the name of stickarian, from στιχαριόν, "a line," referring to the black stripes. But the principal vestment of the Greek priest is the phelonion, the old toga, fitting closely around the chest, but falling in ample folds below and behind, and provided with a shoulder-piece, which stands up stiff behind the neck. The stickarian is always white; the phelonion, of various colors. Around the neck the Greek priest wears a kind of tie, from which hang down in front two stiff ends embroidered with crosses. As a personal distinction, he sometimes wears the epigonation, a square pouch, or satchel, richly embroidered, and fastened by a belt around the waist. It is the symbolic receptacle for the spiritual weapons with which he, like a well-armed soldier, shall defend the pure faith against heresy: and there is, indeed, not a little in the costume of the Greek priest which reminds one of the Turkish mollah, who steps into the pulpit with a drawn sword in his right hand. Instead of the phelonion, the Jewish priest wears the saccos,—a piece of clothing of the same form as the sticharion, but shorter, of various colors, and richly embroidered with golden crosses. Originally the saccos was reserved for patriarchs and metropolitans; but, since the time of Peter the Great, it has been worn by all bishops. Over the saccos the mantia is spread,—a loose mantle fastened on the shoulder, blue or black, ornamented with stripes, sash, or cords, with the living spirit, and provided in front with two small, stiff tablets, signifying the Old and the New Testament. When officiating before the altar, he wears the mitra, which is often of gold, and very costly; and in his hand he holds the patresissa, or episcopal staff, ending in a crook and a small cross.
VESTMENTS.

The farther east, the more gorgeous the liturgical apparel becomes. In this respect the Armenian Church stands foremost in all Christendom. The principal articles of vestment are also there the tunic (shabag) and the toga (pilon). The shabig is white, adorned with lace, and held together around the waist by a sash embroidered with gold. The pilon has the form of the paludamentum, and is black, or, in the case of bishops and catholicoi, violet. When mass is said, all the clergy, from the priest upwards, wear the shartshkar (a more or less richly ornamented mantle, of different colors, open in front, and falling down in ample folds) and the anzero (a handkerchief of fine white linen, for use at the three ablutions). On the head the priests and the doctors of theology wear the sacraeivard, of the form of a crown, and made of pasteboard, covered with silk and gold; and the bishops and the catholicoi wear the tak,—a magnificent and very costly specimen of the mitre. The bishop's staff reaches a little above his head, and is made of ivory, gold, silver, or ebony: it ends in a serpent, referring to the serpent raised by Moses in the desert. During service the shoes are often taken off, and replaced by a peculiar kind of slippers. On Maundy-Thursday all ecclesiastical vestments are white; and during "the night of weeping and howling," the whole church is covered with black, or, in the case of bishops and catholicoi, black, or, in the case of bishops and catholicoi, black.

As many of the vestments of the Roman-Catholic Church are most closely connected with the service of the mass, it was quite natural that the Reformation should cause considerable changes to be introduced. Luther's ideas are strikingly expressed in his letter of Dec. 4, 1539, to George Buchholzer, provost of Berlin, the pith of which is, If the elector will allow you to preach the pure faith, you may do it in frock-coat or gown, just as it pleases him best; and, "If he is not satisfied with one gown, you may put on two or three." Zwingli, offended at the worldliness and vanity which found expression in the costume of the Roman-Catholic clergy, was more severe. See his Uelegen und gründ der Schlussreden oder artikel, 1523. Nevertheless, the Lutheran Church taking the doctor-coat of Luther, and the French Reformed Church, the robe de Calvin, for their models, the differences between the ecclesiastical costumes of those two branches of the Evangelical Church became very slight. The Church of England, with its cassock, rochet, surplice, stole, and cappe, kept in this respect, as in several others, a little nearer to the Church of Rome; while, on the other hand, the English Dissenters, often abrogated ecclesiastical vestments altogether. [See the interesting essay on "Ecclesiastical Vestments," in A. P. Stanley's Christian Institutions, New York, 1881.]

G. BUNZ.

VESTRY (vestriarium, sacristia, secretarium) was the name of an apartment in the ancient church-building, destined to receive not only the vestments of the officiating clergy, but also the sacred vessels and other treasures of the church. The vestry often was of considerable size and was used in the fact that it was often used as a assembly-room for provincial synods. Thus the third, fourth, and fifth councils of Carthage, and the synod of Arles, are stated to have been held in secretario ecclesie. Hence the modern word in the Episcopalian Church; a vestry meaning an assembly of all parishioners for the discussion of the affairs of the parish, regardless of the place in which the assembly convenes. The officers who manage the parochial affairs are called the "parochial vestry-board."
VICAR. 2456

VICTOR.

Theologians, and also by modern writers, applied specially to the Eucharist when administered to a dying person as the due provision for his journey through death. The Council of Nicaea (325), in its can., xiii., forbade the priest to withhold the Eucharist from any dying man who wished for it, even if he were an apostate or a particle; and in that connection it designates the Eucharist as the viaticum, êkóðon. VICAR (vicarius), generally one qui alterius vices agit ("who plays another man's part"), more specially the substitute of an officer, secular or ecclesiastical. The whole subject of vicars, vicariages, etc., received a very elaborate development in the Roman-Catholic Church. The head of the church is Christ: but Christ appointed St. Peter his vicar, and through St. Peter the vicariate was forever conferred on the bishop of Rome, who calls himself vicarius S. Petri, vicarius Christi, vicarius Dei (in terris). Various, then, in a more restricted sense, the Roman curia; and finally, in the narrowest but most proper sense, the papal legates, mmcios, and missionary superintendents. And as the Pope has his vicars, so have the archbishops and bishops, coadjutors (vicarii in pontificibus), vicar-generals (vicarii in jurisdictione), and officials (vicarii forani), not to speak of the capellani, members of the chapters, of whom the grand vicar (summus vicarius domini) or summi alterius vicarius) played a conspicuous part in the interval between the death of a bishop and the election of his successor. Finally, the priests or parsons themselves had their vicars (vicarii parochiales), and these were either vicarii perpeti, or vicarii temporales, according as the parson was perpetually or temporarily disabled. See the various commentators on the Decretals, i., 28. De officio vicarii. H. F. JACOBSON.

VICELIN, the apostle of Holstein, b. at Quernheim, a village on the Weser, in the latter part of the eleventh century; d. at Aldenburg, Dec. 12, 1154. Educated in the school of Paderborn, he was appointed teacher in the school of Bremen, and brought it into a flourishing condition, but left it again, and went to Paris, where he studied for three years under Anselm. After his return from Paris, he began to prepare himself for missionary work among the Pagan Wends of Northern Germany; and, having been ordained a priest, he repaired, together with Rudolf of Hildenheim, and Ludolf of Verden, to Henry, king of the Obotrites. Christianity had previously been preached among the Obotrites settled in Mecklenburg, and living also in Holstein, but not with permanent success. Relapses into Paganism had taken place, and were three years under Anselm. His labor in that place was so successful, that the emperor Lothair was induced to come to his aid. In 1134 the fortress Segeberg was built; and, under its protection, a church was erected, and a monastery built in the city. Meanwhile new aspects of successful missionary labor among the Obotrites of Mecklenburg were opened up, when Henry, the Lion of Saxony, began to interfere in the affairs of the country, and to meddle more and more over the Pagan Niclot. The bishopric of Aldenburg was re-established; and in 1149 Vicelin was consecrated bishop. His health failed him, however, and the last years of his life he spent in retirement. See the Chronicles by Helmold, Adam of Bremen, Saxo Grammaticus, and Hofffer: Der Weltkampf der Deutschen und Slaven, Hamburg, 1847. G. H. KLIPPEL.

VICTOR is the name of three popes and two antipopes. — VICTOR I. (185—197 according to Pagi, Brevisarium Paparum Rom., I., but, according to others, 187—200) occupied the papal chair between Eleutherus and Zephyrinus. He was an African by birth, and a rash and hot-headed man, as his interference in the Paschal controversy showed. In a letter addressed to Polycrates, the successor of Polyeuces, he threatened with excommunication all those Oriental bishops who would not adopt the Roman computation of the Easter festival. The harshness of this measure, however, was condemned by many Western bishops who held the same views as Victor; among others by Ireneus, whose letter to Victor has been preserved by Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., V. 24. He was at last prevailed upon to recall the letter. Theodotus, the Tanner, the famous Monarchian leader, excommunicated; but his adherents formed a party, the Theodotians, which lived on for a long time in Rome. (The spurious decrees which have been ascribed to him are enumerated in Jaff: Regesta, edited by Wattenbach, Berlin, 1882.) — VICTOR II. (1055—57) was bishop of Eichstätt before his elevation to the papal see, a relative and intimate friend of Henry III.; his true name was Gebhard. According to Leo of Ostia (Chron. Casinense, ii. 88) it was Hildebrand who carried through his election, and if so, it must have been Hildebrand's idea to produce a split in the imperial camp, and gain over to the side of the reform party one of the most determined opponents of the measures of Leo IX. The experiment succeeded. In his short reign, Victor held one council in Italy (Florence), and three in France (Lyons, Lisieux, Toulose), against the two great weaknesses of the church, simony and the marriage of the priests. The sources to his history are found in Watterich: Pontif. Roman. Vite. See also Hoffler: Die deutsche Päpste, Leipzig, 1839. — VICTOR III. (1056—87) was abbot of Monte Cassino when the dying Gregory VII. designated him as the most worthy to succeed him. It was nearly a whole year, however, before Victor consented to accept the election by the cardinals, and his energetic reign, carried on completely in the spirit of his great predecessor, lasted only half a year. See the continuation, by Petrus Diaconus, of the Chron. Casinense, by Leo of Ostia. — VICTOR IV. (1110—1138) was the son of a family of the twelfth century; first by Cardinal Gregory Conti (1138), who, however, was overthrown by Innocent II., through the exertions of Bernard of Clairvaux, after the lapse of two months; and then by Cardinal Octavianus, who was elected in 1159 by the Ghibelline party and Frederick Barbarossa, and maintained himself till his death at Luco, in 1164, but never equalled his rival, Alexander III., either in actual power or in moral influence. See Reuter: Alexander III., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1860-64, 3 vols.

Victor, Claudius Marius, also called Victorinus, was a poet and rhetorician; lived at Marcellina, a city of Panonia, on the Danube, in the pres-ence of which the part treating the period between 444 and 465 has come down to us, edited by Scaliger, in Thesaurus Temporum Eusebii, Amsterdam, 1658, T. II., and by Basnage, in Thesaurus Monumentorum Eccles., Antwerp, 1725, T. I.

Victor, Bishop of Cartenna, flourished in the middle of the fifth century, and wrote Adversus Arianos ad Genserico, De paenitentiapublica, and an energetic protest against that whole development which is represented by Jerome. Vigilantius attacked the worship of the martyrs and their relics on doctrinal grounds: the flight from orthodoxy became suspected, and he had to go to Rome in order to vindicate himself before Innocent I. He left a work, De laude Sancitorum, edited by Lebeuf, Paris, 1739. He is commemorated on Aug. 7.

Vienne, one of the oldest cities of France, and the cradle of the Church of Gaul; stands on the Gère, near its influx in the Rhone, in the department of Isère, and has been the seat of a number of councils,—the first in 474, the last in 1557,—most of which, however, are only of slight interest. One of 1112 cancelled the agreement of 1111 between Pascal II. and Henry V., according to which the Pope conceded the right of investiture to the emperor. (See Harduin: Acta Concilior., T. VI. pars ii.; Mansi: Concil. Coll., T. XXI.) Another, of 1199, executed the ban which Innocent III. had laid on Philippe Auguste for having repudiated his wife, Isabelle. (See Harduin, L.c., and Mansi, T. XXI.) The most important, however, was that convened by Clement V., and generally recognized as the fifteenth ecumenical council. It was opened Oct. 16, 1311, attended by a hundred and fourteen, or, according to another report, by three hundred bishops, and closed May 6, 1312. The principal business transacted was the dissolution of the order of the Templars, besides a number of decrees, doctrinal and disciplinary, against Juan de Oliva, the Fraticelles, the Dolcinists, the Beghards, etc. See Harduin, T. VII., and Clementinum, Lib. III. Tit. 16, de reipuis, 1311.

Victorinus (Petavionensis), Bishop of Pettau, a city of Panonia, on the Drave, in the present Styria, and not, as stated by Baronius and others, Bishop of Poitiers; flourished about 350, and wrote a Chronicle, of which the part treating the period between 444 and 465 has come down to us, edited by Scaliger, in Thesaurus Temporum Eusebii, Amsterdam, 1658, T. II., and by Basnage, in Thesaurus Monumentorum Eccles., Antwerp, 1725, T. I.

Victorinus (Petavionensis), Bishop of Pettau, a city of Panonia, on the Drave, in the present Styria, and not, as stated by Baronius and others, Bishop of Poitiers; flourished about 350. According to Cassiodorus and Jerome, he was a Greek by birth, understood Greek better than Latin, and taught rhetoric before he became a bishop. A fragment of his De fabrica mundi is still extant, and has been edited by Cave; but his other writings have perished. The Commentary on the Revelation ascribed to him, and found in Max. Bib. Patrum, Lyons, 1677, T. III., is by some considered spurious, because it rejects the chiliad, and maintains, like St. Jerome, Victorinus held. Others, however, consider the passages in question to be interpolations. See Dupin: Nouvelle Bibliothèque, Paris, 1693, T. I.; and Cave: Historia literaria, Geneva, 1693.

Victorinus, St., was a soldier, and subjected to fearful tortures by his Pagan commander when he desired to leave the army, and become a Christian, but was miraculously liberated, and became bishop of Rouen in 380 or 389. He undertook some missionary-work in Hainaut (Belgium) and went in 394 to England, on account of the troubles caused there by the Pelagians. But his belief in orthodoxy became suspected, and he had to go to Rome in order to vindicate himself before Innocent I. He left a work, De laude Sancitorum, edited by Lebeuf, Paris, 1739. He is commemorated on Aug. 7.

Vigilantius, b. in the latter half of the fourth century, at Calagurris, a village in southwestern Gaul, probably the present Casere in Comminges; was ordained a presbyter at Barcelona in 395, and went then to Jerusalem, carrying with him a letter of recommendation from Paulinus of Nola to Jerome. The visit to the East, however, seems to have made a similar impression on Vigilantius as the visit to Rome made on Luther. He and Jerome soon fell out; and the sixty-first letter of Jerome is evidently an answer to an attack made upon him by Vigilantius, perhaps during the latter's stay in Alexandria. Some time after his return to his native country, Vigilantius was denounced to Jerome by the presbyter Riparius as a teacher of unsound doctrines. Jerome answered, and finally he wrote his essay, Contra Vigilantium. It is not possible, from the quotations of Jerome, to form a complete conception of the theological system of Vigilantius; but its general tendency is perfectly clear, and of such a character as to give a satisfactory explanation of the conflict between him and Jerome, for it is an energetic protest against that whole development which is represented by Jerome. Vigilantius attacked the worship of the martyrs and relics on doctrinal grounds: it seemed to him to be a relapse into Paganism. And he attacked monasticism on moral grounds: the flight from the world is not a victory over the world. He was especially severe upon the celibacy of the priests, on their vow of poverty, etc., accepted altogether the idea of a higher morality for the monks and the clergy, and a lower for people of the world. VIGILS

H. SCHMIDT.

VIGILS (Pope 540-553) was a Roman by birth, and deacon during the reign of Agapetus, who accompanied him to Constantinople. Ambitious and grasping, but without talents or courage to realize his aspirations, he fell a prey to the intrigues of the Byzantine court. When Agapetus died, in Constantinople, he was appointed his successor, but on the secret condition that he should support the emperor's scheme for the reconciliation of the Monophysites with the orthodox Church. On his arrival at Rome, however, he found the see already occupied by one Silverius; but, in accordance with the bargain he had made with the emperor, Belisarius came to his aid, and Silverius was removed, partly by intrigues, partly by violence. Vigilius was not so prompt in fulfilling his part of the bargain. He wrote a letter to the three deposed Monophysite patriarchs of the East, — Theodosius of Alexandria, Anthimus of Constantinople, and Severus of Antioch, — in which he professed perfect agreement with their faith. But he demanded that the letter should be kept a secret, on the plea that he was able to do more for the Monophysite cause when he preserved the appearance of being in agreement with the synod of Chalcedon. Meanwhile the emperor had been persuaded that a condemnation of the three principal representatives of the Nestorian view — Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrus, and Ibas — would silence all the objections of the Monophysites to the synod of Chalcedon; and he consequently issued an edict to that end. But the edict met with resistance even in the East; and in the West it was generally condemned, the African Church taking the lead of the opposition. The emperor demanded of Vigilius that he should subscribe the edict, and Vigilius dared not. For three years he succeeded in escaping the dilemma by prevarications and subterfuges of all kinds. But in 547 he was peremptorily summoned to Constantinople. Synod after synod was convened to return to his secret, to hold out to the end. In 555 he publicly retracted, writing a judicium in favor of the edict, but demanding that the document should be kept a secret. Pressed hard by the court, he fled from Constantinople; and from Chalcedon he issued an edict, but the latter was not accepted by the Western bishops in general continued to resist. Finally the Council of Constantinople, chiefly composed of Oriental bishops, proved pliant, and the imperial edict was formally accepted by the Church. Vigilius first tried his old game, — writing a judicium in favor of the edict, but demanding that the document should be kept a secret. Pressed hard by the court, he fled from Constantinople; and from Chalcedon he issued a formal protest, the so-called constitutum, against the decrees of the synod of Chalcedon. But he was too much frightened by the wrath of the emperor, and too anxious to return to his see, to hold out to the end. In 555 he publicly retracted, and accepted the Constantinopolitan decrees, in order to be allowed to return to Rome. He died at Syracuse, however, on the way home. The sources are (besides the Liber pontificalis by Anax. the letter of the pertinent acts in Genn. Conc. Col., vol. ix.) the Breviarium, Liber usus, Chronicum, by Victor of Tunnunum, and the Pro defensione trium capitulatorum, by Facundus of Hermiane, all three found in Galland: Bibl., vols. xi. and xii.

H. SCHMIDT.
VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS.

VIGNOLLES, Alphonse de, b. at Aubais in Languedoc, Oct. 29, 1649; d. in Berlin, July 24, 1744. He studied theology at Saumur and Oxford, and was made a member of the newly founded academy of science, of whose mathematical division he became director in 1727. His Chronologie de l'histoire sainte, Berlin, 1738, 2 vols. in quarto, attracted the attention of the whole learned world. Less successful was his edition of Lenfant's Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne, The Hague, 1720, with notes and additions, in which he defended that blundering legend as a historical fact.

VILLEGAGNON, Nicholas Durand de, b. about 1510; d. at 1571; the leader and the betrayer of the first missionary attempt of the Reformed church. He descended from a noble family in Brittany; was educated for the navy; distinguished himself in 1541 in the campaign which Charles V. made to Algeria; brought in 1548 the young Scotch queen to France in spite of the exertions of the English fleet to prevent it; took part in 1550 in the defence of Malta, and was made a knight of the order, etc. As vice-admiral of Brittany he fell out with the governor of the province, who was favored by the king. His position became difficult; and the glowing descriptions of South America which at that time circulated in Europe induced him to leave France, and try to found a colony in South America. But he knew that he could obtain the king's support only through the influence of Admiral Coligny, and that he secured by declaring in favor of the Reformation, and pretending that the colony should be a place of refuge to the Reformed faith. July 15, 1555, he left Havre; and in November he arrived at the Bay of Guanabara. On an island in the bay, where now stands the city of Rio de Janeiro, he built a fort, which he called "Coligny;" and, in spite of many difficulties, the colony seemed to prosper. Not only Coligny, but also Calvin, took an interest in the undertaking; and in 1557 a new lot of emigrants arrived. Dissensions, however, soon arose between the pastors from Geneva and a young pastor, Cointa, who had been educated in the Sorbonne. Cointa insisted that the Lord's Supper should be administered with the sacerdotal robe, etc.; and Villegagnon supported him. An embassy was sent to Europe to lay the case before the whole Reformed Church in the Dominicans and Jesuits. Under the influence of the displeasure which his undertaking had caused among the powerful Romanist party at the French court, Villegagnon completely relapsed into Romanism, and actually endeavored to convert the colony. He not only abandoned the colony, but the establishment organized on the model of Geneva, but he forbade the colonists to meet in private for prayer, and inflicted the most cruel punishments on the disorderly. Several were executed. The result was the speedy dissolution of the colony, though missionary work had already begun among the natives along the Brazilian coast. Some of the colonists returned to Europe: others were scattered over South America. Villegagnon himself returned to France, and made several attempts at attracting attention; but he was generally considered indifferent, and died in obscurity, shortly after, of Cancer.

VILLERS, Charles François Dominique de, b. at Belchen in Lorraine, Nov. 4, 1754; d. at Göttingen, Feb. 28, 1815. He was educated in the military schools of Metz, and entered the army in 1782, but studied at the same time classical literature, and philosophy. His La liberté (1791) proved too moderate for the Jacobins, and in 1792 he was compelled to flee. He settled at Lübeck, and became, in the course of time, thoroughly acquainted with German character and civilization, German language and literature, and became thereby a useful middle-man between Germany and France. Having written with great openness against the violence of Napoleon's generals, he was expelled from the Hanseatic States by Davoust in 1806. He went to Paris, and obtained from the emperor the repeal of the order. In 1811 he was made professor of philosophy at Göttingen, from which position, however, he was dismissed in 1814 by the returning Hanoverian dynasty. His principal work (Essai sur l'esprit et l'influence de la réformation de Luther) received the prize of the French Academy in 1804, and was translated both into German and English. He also wrote Philosophie de Kant, Metz, 1801.

VILMAR, August Friedrich Christian, b. at Solz in Hesse, Nov. 21, 1800; d. at Marburg, July 30, 1868. He studied theology at Marburg, and was appointed professor there in 1855. As a member of the consistory of Cassel, he was one of the chief supporters of the Hassenpflug administration, and became one of the principal leaders of the religious reaction which followed the revolution of 1848. His principal work (Essai sur l'esprit et l'influence de la réformation de Luther) received the prize of the French Academy in 1804, and was translated both into German and English. He also wrote Philosophie de Kant, Metz, 1801.

VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS (Bellovacensis, or the Speculator) flourished in the first half of the thirteenth century; a contemporary of Alexander of Hales, Thomas Aquinas, etc. He belonged to the Dominicans, and had already begun among the natives along the Brazilian coast. As a writer, he is a collector, condensateur, systematizer, rather than an original author. His Speculum majus, consisting of three parts,—speculum naturale, doctrinale, and historiale,—is a stupendous work, laden with importance for the history of civilization: it appeared at Strassburg, 1478, and afterwards often. His De institutione filiorum regiorum seu nobilium was a VINCENT OF LERINS. a monk in the celebrated monastery of Lerinum in Gaul; flourished in the fifth century; wrote his famous book, Conmonitorium, according to a notice in its forty-second chapter, three years in the synod of Ephesus, that is, 434; and died, according to Gennadius (De vir. ill., 64), during the reign of Valentinian I.; according to the Martylol. Romanaum, May 23, 450. Nothing more is known of his personal life. In the history of doctrines the Conmonitorium occupies a prominent place. At the time of its authorship, Southern Gaul was the seat of a wide-spread and decided Semi-pelagian opposition to Augustine; and though the book is written with great calmness, and without the least trace of direct polemics, its Semi-pelagian character and its silent reference to Augustine are unmistakable. (L'Estournel. p. 575; Norisius: Hist. Pelagiana, ii. 2, 3, 11; and the elaborate analysis by H. Schmidt, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie.) But a still greater interest the book acquires from the circumstance that it is the most complete representation of the Roman-Catholic doctrine of tradition. Feeling the necessity of having some external, irrefragable evidence of truth, Vincent passes from Scripture to tradition, as containing the true interpretation which alone can make Scripture infallible. But if Scripture needs the interpretation of tradition — quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus creditum est — is tradition exempt from misinterpretation? This last step, however, to make tradition dependent on the living church in its entirety, or on the infallible pope, Vincent refrained from taking. The book has been edited by Baluze, Coster, E. Klipfel (Augsburg, 1843), etc. See Elpelt's monograph, Breslau, 1840.

VINCENT DE PAUL, b. at Pouy in Gascogne, April 24, 1576; d. in Paris, Sept. 27, 1660; beatified, 1737; and canonized, 1773. He was educated by the Franciscans, and ordained a priest in 1600. On a tour from Toulouse to Narbonne, he was captured by corsairs from Tunis, and sold to a Christian renegade; but the end of the adventure was, that he reconverted his master. After a short stay in Rome, he repaired to Paris, where he became one of the chaplains of Queen Marguerite. The surroundings, however, seem to have bred scepticism in him; but he soon left the court, and through his friend Berulle, who had just founded the order of the Féres de l'Oratoire, he was appointed pastor of Clichy, and tutor in the house of Count Gondy. So great was his success as a pastor of souls, that the countess, established a fund of seventeen thousand livres to provide better pastoral care for tenants. Nevertheless, feeling somewhat oppressed by her religious enthusiasm of the countess, Vincent left the house, and was appointed pastor of Chatillon les Dombes, 1617. There he formed the first Confrérie de Charité; an association of women, who personally went to the aid of poor and sick people. Persuaded to return to the Gondy family, he left the chapel of the countess, and went to Chatillon. He also began to visit the prisons, the galleys, and such places; and so irresistible was that message of Christian love he brought, that he melted even those half-petrified hearts. In 1619 Louis XIII. made him Aumêntier royal des galères de France. In 1623 he founded at Macon the Society of St. Borromeo against begging; and in a very short time the beggars disappeared. His religious and philanthropic zeal was connected with a wonderful knowledge of human nature and great practical tact. No wonder, then, that every thing he undertook succeeded. His greatest institution was the order of the Priests of the Mission, confirmed by Parliament in 1631, and settled in the House of St. Lazarus in 1632. At first his order did not thrive so very well. After two years' hard work, it counted only nine members. But gradually it became customary for young priests to spend some time at St. Lazarus before they received ordination. In 1632 the Tuesday Conferences were inaugurated, where the younger clergy of Paris gathered for instruction and edification; and before long the priests of the mission were heartily welcomed, and even eagerly sought for, by all kinds of people. As most of the members of the Confréries de Charité were married ladies, whose domestic duties had the first claim on their attention, Vincent instituted a new order, the so-called Filles de Charité, also called Seures Grises. They were not nuns. After their novitiate, they took a vow; but it bound them only for one year. "The hospitals were their cloister; the holy discipline, their veil." The influence of these institutions soon spread far beyond France,— to Ireland, Poland, Tunis, Algeria, Madagascar, etc.; and under great crises, as, for instance, during the war between France and the German Empire, it was felt as a great blessing. The life of St. Vincent has been written by Abelly (1604), Noiret (1729), Collet (1748), Capéfigue (1827), Bussière (1850), Maitriès (1851), Maynard (1860) [Loth (1881).] W. HOLLENBERG.

VINCENT OF SARAGOSSA, one of the most celebrated martyrs of the ancient church; descended from one of the most distinguished families in Arragonia; was archdeacon of the church of Saragossa, and suffered martyrdom at Valencia during the persecution of Diocletian, about 303. Though the Passio S. Vincentii (Act. Sanct., Jan. 12) is rich in details, the authenticity of the narrative, it must, nevertheless, be very old, as it was known, at least in all its most prominent features, to Augustine (Sermo, 4; 274; 275; 276), Prudentius (Peristephanon), Paulinus of Nola (Poem., 27), Venantius Fortunatus (Carm., 1, 8), and Gregory of Tours (De glor. mort., 90).

VINCENT, Samuel, b. at Nimes, Sept. 8, 1787; d. there July 10, 1857. He belonged to a family, which, through several generations, had been attached to the service of the Reformed Church of Nimes; and, after studying at Geneva, he settled in his native city as pastor; and afterwards was not even the most tempting offers could induce him to leave it. In 1829 he was made president of its consistory. His spiritual character, however, developed under the influence of English (Paley and Chalmers) and German (Bretschneider and Schleiermacher) Protestantism, rather than under that of French and Swiss Protestantism. After a brief stay in Basle, the Reformed Church gradually sunk down into the deism of Rousseau, and its theology became mere conventionalism without any true vitality. Vincent felt the evil; and it is his great merit that he pro-enced the remedy. His first original production was an attack on Lamennais' Éssai de l'indifférence; and his Observations sur l'Unité religieuse (1820), and Observations sur la voie d'autorité appliquée à la religion, created quite a sensation. From 1820 to 1824 he published Mélanges de religion, 18 vols., and Méditations religieuses (most complete edition by Fontanès, 1863); which latter work opened up new and rich opportunities to the preacher. His life was written by Antonin (1863) and Corbire (1873), besides a number of monographs by Fontanès, Prévost-Paradol, Coquereil fils, etc.

VINES, Richard, b. at Blazon, in Leicester County, Eng., about 1600; d. February, 1655 (6). He was educated at Mountalen College, Cambridge; became teacher of a school at Hinckly in Warwickshire, after finishing his course at the university, and afterwards rector of Wedington. He was appointed a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines in 1649 from Warwickshire, and was very influential in matters of church government and the sacraments. He was chairman of the Committee of Accommodation with the Independents. He often preached before Parliament. During the session of the Westminster Assembly he was, in 1643, made minister of the parish of Clements Danes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the rectory of Walton in Hertfordshire, and soon after became pastor of Lawrence Jewry, London. In 1644 he was also appointed master of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and held the position until 1649, when he was turned out for refusing the engagement. In 1669 he was appointed by Parliament one of the Committee of Divines to draw up the Fundamentals as a basis of Toleration. He died on sabbath evening, from bleeding at the nose, which was brought on by excessive labor in preaching, and administering the Lord's Supper. During his life a number of sermons were published, e.g., A Treatise of the right institution, administration, and receiving of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, 4to, p. 376, London, 1657; God's Drawing and Delivering of his people, 4to, p. 335, 1662. His funeral sermon was preached by Thomas Jacombe, entitled Enoch's walk and change, and published 1656, with introductory remarks by Simeon Ashe and Edmund Calamy, followed by poetical epitaphs from William Spurstone, Matthew Newcommen, Matthew Poole, and others, all speaking of him in the warmest terms. He is represented as "a man of extraordinary ability, a smart disputant, well studied, a perfect master of the Greek, a real orator; his ministry solid, pithy, quick, and searching, having a clear head. He could dive deep into subjects, pierce the mystery of men. He was a man of gracious, tender spirit." Fuller says of him, "He was most charitably moderate to such as dissented from him, though most constant to his own principles."
