A RELIGIOUS ENCYCLOPÆDIA: OR DICTIONARY OF
BIBLICAL, HISTORICAL, DOCTRINAL, AND PRACTICAL THEOLOGY.
BASED ON THE REAL-ENCYKLOPÄDIE OF HERZOG, PLITT AND HAUCK.
EDITED BY PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D.,
Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New York.
ASSOCIATE EDITORS:
REV. SAMUEL M. JACKSON AND REV. D. S. SCHAFF, TOGETHER WITH AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF LIVING DIVINES
AND CHRISTIAN WORKERS
OF ALL DENOMINATIONS IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.
EDITED BY
REV. PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D.,
AND
REV. SAMUEL MACAULEY JACKSON, M.A.
THIRD EDITION REVISED AND ENLARGED.
FUNK & WAGNALLS COMPANY, TORONTO.
1891.
NEW YORK.
LONDON.
Copyright, 1882, by Funk & Wagnalls.
RELIGIOUS ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

E TO L.
EADIE, John, D.D., LL.D., pastor, professor of theology, and commentator on some of the Pauline Epistles; b. at Alva, Stirlingshire, Scotland, May 9, 1810; d. at Glasgow, Saturday, June 3, 1876. He was educated at the University of Glasgow in 1844, and that of D.D. from the University of St. Andrews in 1850.

LIT.—Besides contributions to the Eclectic and North British Reviews, and Kitto's Journal of Sacred Literature, Dr. Eadie did an immense amount of literary work in connection with McKENZIE'S Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography (in which he had charge of the department of ecclesiastical biography), with the first and last (3d) editions of Kitto's Cyclopaedia, and with FAIRBAIRN'S Imperial Bible Dictionary. He prepared an excellent Concordance to the Scriptures on the Basis of Cruden (1839), and compiled the series published in Edinburgh, and very widely circulated, The Bible Cyclopaedia (1848), based upon The Union Bible Dictionary, Phila., in condensed form, under the caption Dictionary of the Holy Bible for the Young; new ed. of the Cyclopaedia, entirely re-written, (1850); An Analytic Concordance to the Holy Scriptures (1855); and The Ecclesiastical Cyclopaedia (1861). He published two volumes of discourses, The Divine Love (1855), and Paul the Preacher (1859). But his fame rests on his commentaries on the Greek text of Ephesians (1854), Galatians (1859), and Thessalonians (1869), and, published posthumously, on First Thessalonians (1877). In addition must be mentioned his interesting biographies of John Kitto (1857) and William Wilson, his posthumous treatise on Scripture Illustrations from the Domestic EADMER, monk in Canterbury; was elected Bishop of St. Andrews in 1120, but never took possession of the see, on account of disagreement with King Alexander, and died in Canterbury, 1124. He is one of the most important English historians of the period, and wrote: 1. Historia Novorum, in six books, giving the history of the three archbishops of Canterbury, Lanfranc, Anselm, and Radulf, edited by Selden, London, 1623, reprinted in Gerberon's edition of Anselm's works, Paris, 1873; II. The Life of Anselm, edited by Surius and the Bollandists, April 21; III. Two letters to the monks of Glastonbury about the life of St. Dunstan, and to the monks of Winchester about episcopal election; IV. The Lives of St. Bregwin, St. Oswald, and St. Odo, edited in Wharton's Anglia Sacra; V. The Life of St. Wilfrid of York, edited by the Bollandists, April 24; VI. Finally, some minor works, hitherto wrongly ascribed to Anselm. His collected works are found in Migne: Patrol., CCLIIX., pp. 315 seqq.

EADMUND, or EDMUND, king and martyr; was b. in 840, and ascended the throne of East Anglia in 855, when King Offa abdicated, and retired to Rome as a penitent. Edmund ruled in meekness, was the shelter of the weak, learned the psaltery by heart, and made his whole life a preparation for martyrdom. In 870 the heathen Danes landed in East Anglia, slew the clergy, outraged the nuns, burnt and pillaged churches and houses. Edmund tried to stem the flood, but was overwhelmed, taken prisoner, tortured, and finally beheaded, Nov. 29, 870. His remains were interred at Bury St. Edmunds, and miracles were wrought at his grave. In 1020 Canute the king of the Anglo-Saxons; b. 1004; crowned King at Winchester, April 3, 1043; d. at Shene Jan. 5, 1066. He dedicated Westminster Abbey, Dec. 28, 1065. His virtues were monastic rather than regal; but such was his reputation for sanctity, that he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1106. An interesting and sympathetic sketch of Eadward is given by Green, in his Short History of the English People (Harper's ed., pp. 91-100); but for full information see Freeman's History of the Norman Conquest (vol. ii.), and also Luard's Lives of Eadward the Confessor.

EASTER. See CLOTHING AND ORNAMENTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

EAST. The Hebrew mikrach and kedem are both translated "east." The first means literally rising (i.e., of the sun), and therefore indicates the place of the sun's rising, answering to awodah and aris (the rising sun as one of the three archbishops of Canterbury, Lanfranc, Anselm, and Radulf, edited by Selden, London, 1623, reprinted in Gerberon's edition of Anselm's works, Paris, 1873; II. The Life of Anselm, edited by Surius and the Bollandists, April 21; III. Two letters to the monks of Glastonbury about the life of St. Dunstan, and to the monks of Winchester about episcopal election; IV. The Lives of St. Bregwin, St. Oswald, and St. Odo, edited in Wharton's Anglia Sacra; V. The Life of St. Wilfrid of York, edited by the Bollandists, April 24; VI. Finally, some minor works, hitherto wrongly ascribed to Anselm. His collected works are found in Migne: Patrol., CCLIIX., pp. 315 sqq.

EADMUND, St., b. at Abingdon c. 1195; d. at Soissy Nov. 16, 1240; studied at Oxford and Paris, and became a teacher at Oxford, treasurer of Salisbury Cathedral (1222), and Archbishop of Canterbury (1233). But Eadmund belonged to the national party, and was consequently in opposition to the king; and, when the king succeeded in having a papal legate sent to England to neutralize the influence of the archbishop, Eadmund found himself in opposition also to the Pope. He fought manfully, but was at last compelled to yield. He left England in 1240, and settled, first at Pontigny, then at Soissy, where he died, Nov. 16, same year. He had adopted and practised asceticism since a boy: in 1227 he had reached a crusade. Miracles were wrought at his grave, and 1246 the Pope canonized him. His life has been written by his brother, Robert Rich, and by Bertrand, prior of Pontigny.

EADWARD, or EDWARD, III., the Confessor, king of the Anglo-Saxons; b. 1004; crowned at Soissy Nov. 16, 1240; studied at Oxford placed the Festival of St. Edmund among the English holy days. The English kings have taken him for their patron. His life was written in his honor, £1.11.11. 122 the national council of Great Britain built them a magnificent church and abbey at St. Andrews, and miracles were interred at Bury St. Edmunds, and miracles were wrought at his grave. In 1020 Canute the king of the Anglo-Saxons; b. 1004; crowned King at Winchester, April 3, 1043; d. at Shene Jan. 5, 1066. He dedicated Westminster Abbey, Dec. 28, 1065. His virtues were monastic rather than regal; but such was his reputation for sanctity, that he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1106. An interesting and sympathetic sketch of Eadward is given by Green, in his Short History of the English People (Harper's ed., pp. 91-100); but for full information see Freeman's History of the Norman Conquest (vol. ii.), and also Luard's Lives of Eadward the Confessor.

EASTER, or EDWARD, III., the Confessor, king of the Anglo-Saxons; b. 1004; crowned at Soissy Nov. 16, 1240; studied at Oxford placed the Festival of St. Edmund among the English holy days. The English kings have taken him for their patron. His life was written in his honor, £1.11.11. 122 the national council of Great Britain built them a magnificent church and abbey at St. Andrews, and miracles were interred at Bury St. Edmunds, and miracles were wrought at his grave. In 1020 Canute the king of the Anglo-Saxons; b. 1004; crowned King at Winchester, April 3, 1043; d. at Shene Jan. 5, 1066. He dedicated Westminster Abbey, Dec. 28, 1065. His virtues were monastic rather than regal; but such was his reputation for sanctity, that he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1106. An interesting and sympathetic sketch of Eadward is given by Green, in his Short History of the English People (Harper's ed., pp. 91-100); but for full information see Freeman's History of the Norman Conquest (vol. ii.), and also Luard's Lives of Eadward the Confessor.

EAR-RING. See CLOTHING AND ORNAMENTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

EAST. The Hebrew mikrach and kedem are both translated "east." The first means literally rising (i.e., of the sun), and therefore indicates the place of the sun's rising, answering to awodah and aris (the rising sun as one of the three archbishops of Canterbury, Lanfranc, Anselm, and Radulf, edited by Selden, London, 1623, reprinted in Gerberon's edition of Anselm's works, Paris, 1873; II. The Life of Anselm, edited by Surius and the Bollandists, April 21; III. Two letters to the monks of Glastonbury about the life of St. Dunstan, and to the monks of Winchester about episcopal election; IV. The Lives of St. Bregwin, St. Oswald, and St. Odo, edited in Wharton's Anglia Sacra; V. The Life of St. Wilfrid of York, edited by the Bollandists, April 24; VI. Finally, some minor works, hitherto wrongly ascribed to Anselm. His collected works are found in Migne: Patrol., CCLIIX., pp. 315 sqq.

EADMUND, or EDMUND, king and martyr; was b. in 840, and ascended the throne of East Anglia in 855, when King Offa abdicated, and retired to Rome as a penitent. Edmund ruled in meekness, was the shelter of the weak, learned the psaltery by heart, and made his whole life a preparation for martyrdom. In 870 the heathen Danes landed in East Anglia, slew the clergy, outraged the nuns, burnt and pillaged churches and houses. Edmund tried to stem the flood, but was overwhelmed, taken prisoner, tortured, and finally beheaded, Nov. 29, 870. His remains were interred at Bury St. Edmunds, and miracles were wrought at his grave. In 1020 Canute the Great built them a magnificent church and abbey at St. Andrews, and miracles were interred at Bury St. Edmunds, and miracles were wrought at his grave. In 1020 Canute the king of the Anglo-Saxons; b. 1004; crowned King at Winchester, April 3, 1043; d. at Shene Jan. 5, 1066. He dedicated Westminster Abbey, Dec. 28, 1065. His virtues were monastic rather than regal; but such was his reputation for sanctity, that he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1106. An interesting and sympathetic sketch of Eadward is given by Green, in his Short History of the English People (Harper's ed., pp. 91-100); but for full information see Freeman's History of the Norman Conquest (vol. ii.), and also Luard's Lives of Eadward the Confessor.
endeavored in vain to persuade Anicetus to adopt the 14th day of the moon, or April 25, as Easter day; but Irenaeus, from excommunicating the quartodecimans, so grave an offence was it considered to observe the 14th. The Council of Nicaea (325) decreed that there should be uniformity in the date of observance. It is not in place here to go farther into the question of the ancient controversy on the date of Easter. See art. Paschal Controversies. It is, however, proper to state the results of the decree of Nicaea which determines our date of Easter. By that decree, it is fixed on the Sunday immediately following the fourteenth day of the so-called Paschal moon, which happens on or first after the vernal equinox. The vernal equinox invariably falls on March 21. Easter, then, cannot occur earlier than March 22, or later than April 25. In the former case the fourteenth day of the moon would coincide with March 21, the day of the vernal equinox. In the latter, the fifteenth day of the moon would have to intervene before the condition, “the fourteenth day of the moon first after the vernal equinox,” was fulfilled; and, as this might be Sunday, Easter sabbath would not occur till seven more days had elapsed, i.e., April 25.

Celebration.—The key of the observance of Easter is set in the exultant strain of St. Paul, “Now is Christ risen!” (1 Cor. xv. 20). The ancient church celebrated it with solemnity and joyous observances. The fasting which had begun on Good Friday was discontinued on Saturday, at midnight (89th Trullan Canon) or at the cockcrow on sabbath morning (Apost. Constit., v. 13). Gregory Nazianzen (d. 390) and Gregory of Nyssa (d. 395; Orat. xii. De Pascha) speak of persons of all ranks carrying lamps and setting up tapers on Easter Eve. This custom was significant of the vigil which were kept (Lactant., Div. Inst., vii. 19) in the expectation that the Lord at his coming again would appear at this time. Easter Eve was also set apart as a special season for the baptism of catechumens. Easter Day itself was observed as a feast of universal gladness and jubilation. Gregory Nazianzen (Or., xix.) calls it the “royal day among days” (παντεσπαντα των ημερων ἡμερα). The early Christian emperors signaled its return by setting minor criminals at liberty (Cod. Theod., i. 38, 3). For fourteen days public spectacles were intermitted, and business largely stopped. But by the third Council of Orleans, Canon 30 (538), and the Council of Constantinople 14 (581), Jews were forbidden to tread the streets, and mingle with Christians, lest their joy should be interrupted. In the Roman-Catholic Church elaborate rites are still observed; and at the cock-crowing the tapers are re-lighted with the words Lumen Christi! (“Light of Christ!”) to which the priest responds Deo Gratias! ("Thanks be to God!") St. Peter's at Rome is illuminated, and the Pope from the balcony at mid-day pronounces a blessing upon the world.

In the Protestant churches of Europe, Easter is generally observed, especially among Lutherans and Episcopalians. It was formerly entirely disregarded, with other church festivals, by the English dissenters and Scotch Presbyterians, but is coming to be pretty generally observed in America. See Smith and Cheetham, Dict. Antiq., the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and art. Paschal Controversies.

EASTERN CHURCH meant originally simply the Greek Church in contradistinction to the Latin or Western Church, but means now generally those churches which in the East sprung from the Greek Church, and includes the orthodox Russian Church, and in a wider sense also the Oriental schisms, namely the Armenians, the Copts, the Nestorians, and the Jacobites. See Greek Church.

EATON, George W., D.D., LL.D., b. at Henderson, Penn., July 8, 1804; d. at Hamilton, N.Y., Aug. 3, 1872. He was professor of ancient languages in Georgetown College, Ky. (1831–33), of mathematics and natural philosophy (1833–37), and of ecclesiastical and civil history (1837–50), at the Literary and Theological Institution, Hamilton, N.Y. The institution was incorporated in 1846 as Madison University; in it he served as professor of systematic theology (1850–61), was president (1866–68), and president of the theological seminary, and professor of homiletics (1861–71).

E'BAL (stone, stony), a mountain opposite Gerizim; rises 3,076 feet above the sea, and 1,200 feet above the valley. The distance between the two peaks is at the summit about a mile and a half, while their bases nearly meet; and experiments have shown that the voice can be distinctly heard from one to the other, as well as in the intervening valley. Elal was one of the two mountains upon which Israel stood pronouncing blessings and cursings (Deut. xi. 29; Josh. viii. 30–35); and Conder thinks that the site of Joshua's altar may be found at the modern Amad-ed-Din ("monument of the faith"), a sacred place on the top of Ebal. The modern Nabulus (the ancient Shechem) is situated in the valley.

EBBO, Archbishop of Rheims; b. 788; d. March 20, 851; was the son of a serf, but the foster-brother of Louis the Pious, and was given freedom by Charlemagne; educated in a cloister school, ordained priest, and appointed to some ecclesiastical position at the imperial court. Louis the Pious made him Archbishop of Rheims in 816; and in 822 he assumed the lead of the Danish mission. He visited Denmark twice; and it was no doubt due to him that the Danish king, Harold Klak, when heavily pressed by domestic foes, sought refuge at the Frankish court, was baptized, and returned with Angsar in his retinue. But there is no evidence, except his own words (Apologia Archiepiscopi Remensis cum ejusdem ad gentes septentrionales legatione), that he did anything for the introduction of Christianity in Denmark, beyond cunning utilization of confused political circumstances. He was a most skilful man to be the kind in his native country. Though he owed every thing to Louis the Pious, he deserted him as soon as it became apparent, that, in the contest with his three sons, the sons had the ascendancy. When the armies met at Colmar, Ebbo did what he could in order to allure people away, by bribes and by threats, from the camp of Louis; and when the battle was lost, and the poor emperor was condemned to make public penance, Ebbo was there to take off his golden arms, and lay on the sackcloth and ashes, announcing to the world that he was thereby incapacitated to reign. But there came a turn in the affairs. Louis the Pious once more was in power; and Ebbo hastened to the diet of Diedoehofen (835) to be reconciled to him. The emperor was too angry, however. He threw the archbishop into a dungeon at Fulda; and there he lay, in spite of the Pope's protest, till the death of Louis (840). Lothair re-instated him in the archiepiscopal see, but Charles expelled him. Lothair then gave him as a recompense the abbeys of Stablo and Bobbio; but Ebbo felt disappointed, and tried Louis the German, who, however, had only a pitance left for him,—the administration of the diocese of Hildesheim. Besides the above Apologia, Ebbo has also written an Indiculum de ministris Remens. Ecle.

Lit. — Gallia Christiana, IX.; Goussart: Les actes de la province eccles. de Rheims, 1842; Simson: Jahrbucher d. fruuk. Reichs unter Ludwig d. Frommen.

EBED JESU (Syriac, "Servant of God"); sur named Bar Brikā ("Son of the Blessed"), a Nestorian theologian of comprehensive scholarship, was born in the middle of the thirteenth century, in Gozarta, an island in the Tigris; became early Bishop of Sinshar and Arabia, and was, between 1285 and 1297, made metropolitan of Ninisibis, or Zoba, where he died in the beginning of November, 1318. He left twenty works: one, exegetical, on the Old and New Testaments (not allegorical, as often stated); three, dogmatical, on the incarnation of the Logos, on the sacraments, and on the verity of the faith (edited in Syriac and Latin by A. Mai, in Script. Vet., 10, 317-366); several works relating to canon law; The Paradise of Eden, a collection of fifty poems (comp. Assemani, Bibl. Ori., 3, 1, p. 825); twelve poetical tracts on the sciences; a book on the philosophy of the Greeks; a rhymed catalogue of two hundred Syrian authors (Assemani, Bibl. Ori., 3, 1, p. 1-362), enumerating also his own works.

Different from this Eb̦ed Jȩtu is another Nestorian patriarch of the same name, who in 1562 was converted to Romanism. R. Gösche.

EBEL. Johannes Wilhelm, Or., b. March 4, 1810, at Passenheim; d. Aug. 18, 1881, at Hoheneck-in-Württemberg. After his graduation at Königsberg, he became acquainted with Johann Heinrich Schönherz one of the most original thinkers of the period, and espoused his views of relative dualism (see Schönherz). His pro duction as theologian, views, and eloquent advocacy of practical Christianity, were distasteful to the rationalistic and dead orthodox clergy of the province, who tried, from the very beginning of his ministerial career at Hermodorf (1807-1809), to awe him into submission, and, upon his removal to Königsberg as master of the seminary, where Frederick College (1810), resented his growing popularity by charging him with heresy. The matter being referred to Berlin by the local consistory, the latter, whose masked purpose was to awe him into submission, and, upon his removal to Königsberg, Eb̦el and Diestel were openly charged with having founded a sect. Schön appointed Kähler, a member of the consistory, known to be personally hostile to and jealous of Eb̦el, to investigate the matter, with the result that he discovered, or rather invented, him guilty of the alleged charge of having founded a sect. Eb̦el refusing to admit the charge, and to submit to an interrogatory, unless the specifications were communicated to him, the consistory arbitrarily and illegally decreed his suspension ab officio, Oct. 7, 1835, and that of Diestel, Dec. 9, 1835. The action of the consistory led to a criminal suit, which lasted four years, with the result that the accused were acquitted of all charges except that of having founded a sect, and sentenced to be deposed, and Eb̦el to be imprisoned until he should have given proof of amendment. From this sentence appeal was made; and, after a further delay of eighteen months, the finding of the lower court was cancelled, Eb̦el acquitted of the charge of having founded a sect, but nevertheless deprived, on the ground of gross neglect of duty. There is probably no criminal case on record more flagrantly unjust; for, in spite of the acquittal of the offence with which Eb̦el and Diestel were falsely charged, they were punished with degradation from the ministerial office, of which they were bright and shining ornaments. Their persecution, originating in theological hatred, and eventuating in their sacrifices to it, took place at a time (1842) when the judicial process in Russia was still private: that persecution was unjust. To-day it would be impossible to bring such a case to the cognizance of a jury. After his deprivation, Eb̦el lived at Grunenfeld from 1842 to 1848, at Meran-in-the-Tyrol from 1848 to 1850, and at Hoheneck-in-Württemberg from 1850 to 1861, in which year he entered into rest. The memory of that noble man, purified from all the aspersions of theological hatred, and the calum-EBIONITES. This designation was at first, like "Nazarenes," a common name for all Christians, as Epiphanius (d. 403) testifies (Adv. Hær., xxix. 1). It is derived from the Hebrew הועי, "poor," and was not given, as Origen supposes, in reference to their low views of Christ, but to their own poverty. This poverty, especially characteristic of the Christians of Jerusalem, evoked from the pagan and Jewish world the contemptuous appellation of "the poor." Minutius Felix says, "That we are called the poor is not our disgrace, but our glory" (Octas., 88). Subsequently its application was limited to Jewish Christians. "The Jews who accept Christ are called Ebionites," writes Origen (c. Cels., II. 1). Then, when a portion of the Jewish Church became separate and heretical, the designation was used exclusively of it. Later in the fourth century Epiphanius, Jerome, and others use it of a separate party within the Jewish Church distinct from the Nazarenes. This outline of history proves that Tertullian was wrong when he derived the term from a pretended founder of the sect called Ebiom.

The notices in the early fathers are fragmentary, and at times seem to be contradictory on account of the double application of the term, now to Jewish Christianity as a whole, now only to a party within it. The New Testament knows of no sects in the Jewish Church, but indicates the existence of different tendencies. At the Council of Jerusalem a legalistic and Judaizing spirit manifested itself, which was in antagonism to the spirit of Paul, and was shown in the Judaizing teachings which did so much mischief in the Galatian churches. But it was not until after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the founding of Aelia Capitolina by Hadrian, in 134, that Jewish Christianity became a distinct school, gradually becoming more and more heretical till it separated into the two sects of Ebionites proper and Nazarenes. The latter still held to Paul as an apostle, and, while they kept the law themselves, did not demand its observance of the Gentile Christians. The former held the observance of the law to be obligatory upon all Christians alike, and rejected Paul as an apostle. This was the state of affairs at the time of Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph., 47). Ireneus, who does not mention this party division, describes the Ebionites as stubbornly clinging to the law, as rejecting the apostle Paul as an apostate, and all the Gospels except Matthew. He further notices a christological heresy. Denying Christ's birth from the Virgin, they regarded him as a mere man. Origen (c. Cels., V. 81) distinguishes between two branches of Ebionites, — those who denied and those who accepted the miraculous birth. Here the distinction between Nazarenes and the Ebionites proper becomes less apparent. Its relation to the Ebionites, Nazarenes, etc., the notices are more frequent; but nothing is added to our knowledge except that the EBRARD OF BETHUNE.

Eborani were chiliasm (Jerome ad. Exod., 35, 1). In Epiphanian's day (d. 403) they dwelt principally in the regions along the Dead Sea, but also in Rome and Cyprus. The disintegration of Jewish Christianity was accompanied by the introduction of Greek philosophy and culture, as also, perhaps, of Oriental theosophy. See the art. Elkesiates.

EBRARD OF BETHUNE, a place in Artois, lived in the latter part of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth century, and acquired a name as a writer on grammar and theology. Of his personal life nothing is known. His two known works are, Greciamus, a poem of two thousand verses, on grammar, prosody, rhetoric, etc., used by G. B. Asseman in his Institutes of the middle ages, and Liber antitheses, a refutation of the heresies of the Cathari, at that time very numerous in the Flanders. The latter work, still important as a source of information concerning the doctrines of the Cathari, was first printed by the Jesuit Gretser, under the title Contra Waldenses, in his Trias Scriptorum contra Waldenses, Ingolstadt, 1814, then in Max. Bibl. Patr., Lyons, vol. XXIV., and finally in Gretser's Works, vol. XII. Several other works are ascribed to Ebrard; but the books are unimportant and the authorship doubtful. G. SCHMIDT.

ECBATANA (Grec Αβαβανα, or 'Εβαβα, Babylonian Agamatanu or Agamanu), the capital of Media, is mentioned (Ex. vi. 2) as Ακαβάνα, Achbe'Ta or Achbeta. It was the place where, in Darius' time, was found the record of Cyrus' decree authorizing the restoration of the temple at Jerusalem. The name also occurs in other authors (Eusebius, Cassian, Theodotus (Ethculus, Eclesias), and notably in the apocryphal books (Tob. iii. 7, vii. 1, xiv. 12, 14; Jud. i. 1, 2, 14; 2 Macc. x. 3, etc.). It was, however, applied to several different places; and the question has been discussed whether the Ecbatana, whose magnificent fortifications are described by Herodotus (i. 98, 99), and in the Book of Judith (i. 2-4), is the same with the Ecbatana which was the summer residence of the Persian kings, the modern Hamadan, and if not, which of the two is the Hebrew 'Achbe'Ta. Sir H. Rawlinson has sought to place the former at Takhi-Suleiman, to the north of Hamadan, where there are remarkable ruins, and where topographical features are thought to favor Herodotus' description. There is, however, no evidence from the cuneiform inscriptions that the Agamantan, the royal city of Astyages, which Cyrus captured (Eusebius Soc. Bibl. Arch., VII.), was another description of the Agamatanu of Darius (Behistun Inscri. 60); and the identity of this with the old Median capital on the one hand, and with 'Achbeta on the other, is probably to be maintained. In the autumn of B.C. 324, after the battle of Arbela, Alexander the Great spent some months in Ecbatana, and administered the lands of Media, and also furnished the Syriac, the latter part of the sixteenth century; d. in Rome 1644; was educated in the Maronite College in Rome, and appointed professor of the Syriac and Arab languages at the Congregation of the Propaganda. His chief work was his participation in the edition of the Paris polyglot under Le Jay, which lasted from 1640 to 1658, though with interruptions. He furnished the Syriac, Arab, and Latin texts of the Book of Ruth, and the Arabic text of the third Book of the Macca-bees. He also undertook a revision of the labor of his predecessor, Gabriel Sionita; but this vigilance brought upon him a very severe criticism by Valerian de Flavigny (Paris, 1646), to which, however, he gave a very sharp answer (Paris, 1647). Comp. Masch: Bibl. Sacra, 1, 387 sqq. Among his independent works are: a Syriac handbook, Rome, 1828; Eugenius Patriarcha Alexandrinus vindicatus (Rome, 1828); a defence of the episcopacy, directed against J. Selden; an edition of the letters and sermons of Anthony, Paris, 1641 and 1646; an edition of the Chronicon Orientale of Ibn ar-Rabbah, Paris, 1853; Concordantia nationum Christ. Orient. in fidei catholicœ dogmata, Mayence, 1655 (together with Leo Allatis, etc.). Assemani's verdict on him is severe but undeserved. G. GOSCHIE.

ECCE HOMO ("behold the man"), the Vulgate rendering of the words of Pilate on presenting Jesus to the people (John xix. 5). The expression is technically applied to pictures of Jesus as the suffering Saviour. See Christ, Pictures of.

ECCLESIA SEMITICA, a handbook, Rome, 1828; Eugenius Patriarcha Alexandrinus vindicatus (Rome, 1828); a defence of the episcopacy, directed against J. Selden; an edition of the letters and sermons of Anthony, Paris, 1641 and 1646; an edition of the Chronicon Orientale of Ibn ar-Rabbah, Paris, 1853; Concordantia nationum Christ. Orient. in fidei catholicœ dogmata, Mayence, 1655 (together with Leo Allatis, etc.). Assemani's verdict on him is severe but undeserved. G. GOSCHIE.

ECCE HOMO. See Church.

ECCE HOMO (γαρ ηυμνον εις αυτους, LXX., Αξοκεκαλλοις). 1. Title. — "The Book of Koheleth, the son of David, King in Jerusalem" (I. i). The word Koheleth is the feminine participle of K̄ałāh, "to call together," "to assemble." Though feminine in form, which does not necessarily imply that the writer wished to identify himself with Wisdom (cf. Prov. 1. 20), it is masculine in meaning, following the analogy of Sopeoth, of the Book of Agamatanu of Darius (Behistun Inscri. 60); and the identity of this with the old Median capital on the one hand, and with Ἀκαβάνα on the other, is probably to be maintained. In the autumn of B.C. 324, after the battle of Arbela, Alexander the Great spent some months in Ecbatana, and administered the lands of Media, and also furnished the Syriac, the latter part of the sixteenth century; d. in Rome 1644; was educated in the Maronite College in Rome, and appointed professor of the Syriac and Arab languages at the Congregation of the Propaganda. His chief work was his participation in the edition of the Paris polyglot under Le Jay, which lasted from 1640 to 1658, though with interruptions. He furnished the Syriac, Arab, and Latin texts of the Book of Ruth, and the Arabic text of the third Book of the Maccabees. He also undertook a revision of the labor of his predecessor, Gabriel Sionita; but this vigilance brought upon him a very severe criticism by Valerian de Flavigny (Paris, 1646), to which, however, he gave a very sharp answer (Paris, 1647). Comp. Masch: Bibli. Sacra, 1, 387 sqq. Among his independent works are: a Syriac handbook, Rome, 1828; Eugenius Patriarcha Alexandrinus vindicatus (Rome, 1828); a defence of the episcopacy, directed against J. Selden; an edition of the letters and sermons of Anthony, Paris, 1641 and 1646; an edition of the Chronicon Orientale of Ibn ar-Rabbah, Paris, 1853; Concordantia nationum Christ. Orient. in fidei catholicœ dogmata, Mayence, 1655 (together with Leo Allatis, etc.). Assemani's verdict on him is severe but undeserved. G. GOSCHIE.

ECCE HOMO. See Church.

1. Title. — "The Book of Koheleth, the son of David, King in Jerusalem" (I. i). The word Koheleth is the feminine participle of K̄ałāh, "to call together," "to assemble." Though feminine in form, which does not necessarily imply that the writer wished to identify himself with Wisdom (cf. Prov. 1. 20), it is masculine in meaning, following the analogy of Sopeoth, of the Book of Agamatanu of Darius (Behistun Inscri. 60); and the identity of this with the old Median capital on the one hand, and with Ἀκαβάνα on the other, is probably to be maintained. In the autumn of B.C. 324, after the battle of Arbela, Alexander the Great spent some months in Ecbatana, and administered the lands of Media, and also furnished the Syriac, the latter part of the sixteenth century; d. in Rome 1644; was educated in the Maronite College in Rome, and appointed professor of the Syriac and Arab languages at the Congregation of the Propaganda. His chief work was his participation in the edition of the Paris polyglot under Le Jay, which lasted from 1640 to 1658, though with interruptions. He furnished the Syriac, Arab, and Latin texts of the Book of Ruth, and the Arabic text of the third Book of the Maccabees. He also undertook a revision of the labor of his predecessor, Gabriel Sionita; but this vigilance brought upon him a very severe criticism by Valerian de Flavigny (Paris, 1646), to which, however, he gave a very sharp answer (Paris, 1647). Comp. Masch: Bibli. Sacra, 1, 387 sqq. Among his independent works are: a Syriac handbook, Rome, 1828; Eugenius Patriarcha Alexandrinus vindicatus (Rome, 1828); a defence of the episcopacy, directed against J. Selden; an edition of the letters and sermons of Anthony, Paris, 1641 and 1646; an edition of the Chronicon Orientale of Ibn ar-Rabbah, Paris, 1853; Concordantia nationum Christ. Orient. in fidei catholicœ dogmata, Mayence, 1655 (together with Leo Allatis, etc.). Assemani's verdict on him is severe but undeserved. G. GOSCHIE.

2. Author. — (1) Solomon. — This is the traditional view. It is maintained by the rabbins, the fathers, and by the great majority of commentators. In its favor are: (a) The age of the opinion, which is strong a priori evidence in its favor; (b) The eminent fitness of Solomon to write this book, because of his divine wisdom and wide experience; (c) The style and diction belong to the golden age of Hebrew literature (so, e.g., argue Taylor Lewis; but others maintain the exact opposite); (d) The claim of the book itself, not made, it is true, in so many words (i.e., Koheleth does not say he was Solomon), but still made in the very title, in the sentence, "I was king over Israel in Jerusalem" (i. 12), and in many allusions (i. 16, ii. xii. 9, etc.); (e) The lack of agreement among critics as to date and authorship, if the Solomonic view be given up; (f) The natural desire to find some confession of repentance from one who so flagrantly disobeyed the elementary truths of Judaism; for, as Dante says, "All the world creates the tides of his book;" (Par., x.); (2) An unknown personator of Solomon. — In favor of this view are: (a) The spirit of the book, which is sceptical, and most unlike that of Proverbs; for, whereas the latter book is cheerful and inspiriting, Ecclesiastes is sad and depressing; (b) The difference of style between Ecclesiastes and Proverbs; for, whereas the latter's is correct and elegant, the former's is so full of irregularities, that "one might almost say the writer was in a death-struggle with the language:" (c) Such expressions as "I have been king in Jerusalem" (i. 15), "all that have been before me over Jerusalem" (i. 16); (d) The studied absence of direct statement regarding the personality of the writer; (e) The vocabulary is of an Aramaic cast; (f) The author's allusions to prevalent corruptions (iv. 1, v. 8, viil. 9, x. 5) are those of a student of life, and not of a king directly responsible for such abuses; (g) The late reception (in the first century B.C.) of Ecclesiastes into the canon, and that not without debate; for, as Plumptre says, "Absolutely the first external evidence which we have of its existence is found in a Talmudic report of a discussion between the two schools of Hillel and Shammai as to its admission into the canon of the sacred books" (Comm., p. 27); the decisive fact in its favor was that its first and its last words were in harmony with the law; (h) The existence of an apocryphal book called The Wisdom of Solomon, which would scarcely have been written as a rival, and in places (cf. Wisd. ii., iii.; Eccles. ii. 18–20, iii. 18–22) as a corrective, of Ecclesiastes, if the latter were generally believed to have been Solomon's.

To these arguments the defenders of the traditional view reply: (a) The differences between Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, are explicable on the ground that Solomon was an old and jaded man when he wrote the former book; and, besides, Hebrew is unfit for philosophy, while it is eminently fit for pithy, sententious expressions; (b) The Aramaic cast is much exaggerated; the one hundred (so styled) non-Hebrew words, or expressions (Herzfeld), may be reduced to eight (Herzfeld); and we know too little of the ramifications and connections of Hebrew with cognate dialects to make the argument of much weight either way; (c) The author's use of the past tense ("I was king," etc.) is happily paralleled by Mr. Bullock's quotation (Speaker's Com., iv. p. 623) of the language of Louis XIV. in his old age, — quand j'eus roi ("when I was king"); (d) The allusion to those who had been before the writer (i. 18) is quite easily interpreted of the "long line of debauched kings;" (e) The allusion to those who had been outside of Judaism, nor was Solomon responsible for them all; (f) and (g) do not materially weaken the Solomonic origin theory.

The advocates of this theory emphasize the point that no other Hebrew than Solomon answers the descriptions given of the man, in which the unnamed author lived, nor is known to have possessed so rich an experience.

3. Date. — Among those who deny the Solomonic origin there is no agreement as to time. Opinions among the deniers vary from 975–585 B.C.—somewhere between Solomon and Jeremiah (Nachtman's — to A.D. 181 (that of the death of Herod the Great (Grätz, a modern rabbi); the reason for this extraordinary difference being the different opinions held as to the historical period whose social condition could explain the general tone of the production; for all agree that the time must have been very evil. To quote two eminent modern commentators upon Ecclesiastes, — Zöckler, in Lange, and Dean H. Plumptre. Zöckler says, "The book may be considered as contemporary with Nehemiah and Malachi, or between B.C. 450 and 400, and the author to be a God-fearing Israelite of the sect of the Chasidim" (p. 15). Plumptre thinks that Ecclesiastes was written somewhere between B.C. 240 (the death of Zeno) and B.C. 181 (that of the death of Ptolemy Epiphanes); his principal reasons for this late date being the traces in the book of the influence of the teaching both of Stoic and Epicurean philosophy, and the thorough saturation of the book with Greek thought and language. Such phrases as 'under the sun,' 'seeing the sun,' 'birds in the air,' are echoes in Hebrew of Greek expressions and ideas" (Comm. pp. 30–34).

4. Plan. Shammai as to its admission into the canon of the sacred books" (Comm., p. 27); the decisive fact in its favor was that its first and its last words were in harmony with the law; (h) The existence of an apocryphal book called The Wisdom of Solomon, which would scarcely have been written as a rival, and in places (cf. Wisd. ii., iii.; Eccles. ii. 18–20, iii. 18–22) as a corrective, of Ecclesiastes, if the latter were generally believed to have been Solomon's.
tentsof his teachings. Zückler, following other commentators, divides each of these discourses into almost as many subdivisions as there are verses. But instead of putting the book under scepticism, subdued and checked by the Hebrew fear of God, and reaping lessons of wisdom from the scalpel, and laying bare its bones, it is better to consider it as a living body, and discover the secret of its life. Taken thus as a whole, it may be considered as a confession written in prose, of vanities, all is vanity." And et the conviction of the merciful and beneficent. Nothing turns out as he would like. "O vanity of vanities, all is vanity." And yet the conviction is fixed that it is always right to do right; and, in view of the coming judgment (xi. 9), the book closes with this memorable sentence: "Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is all of man." Such a book is edifying rather than depressing, and represent the secret of its life. Taken thus as a whole, it may be considered as a confession written in prose, of observations, that some interpret the title, Ecclesiastes as a confession written in prose, of observations, that some interpret the title, Ecclesiastes, and that seriousness of conviction which alone is able to create conviction in others. Though by no means a charlatan, he was one of those vain characters who believe the victory won when they feel their vanity gratified. Characteristically enough, he won his first laurels as a disputant by defending, in October, 1514, at the instance of the merchants of Augsburg, the proposition that "usury," as the taking of five per cent interest, was then called by the Church, was legitimate business.

Having received the ninety-five theses of Luther, with whom he before had had friendly relations, Eck circulated, in March, 1518, a manuscript criticism on them, — Obietici (marks made in books to draw the attention to suspicious passages). As Luther was away on his Heidelberg journey, Carlstadt published some counter-criticism (Conclusiones); and, when Luther returned, he answered with his Asterisci. A rapid exchange of these and counter-theses now followed; and the affair was finally wound up by a grand dissertation, which was solemnly opened at Leipzig, June 27, 1519. On June 27 and 28, and on July 1 and 3, Eck disputed with Carlstadt concerning divine grace and good works, etc.; and from July 4 he disputed for ten successive days with Luther concerning the absolute supremacy of the Pope, purgatory, penance, etc. The general impression was that Eck had won. He was flattered and tested as the "Achilles of the Church." But the real result was, that Luther went away much clearer and more decided with respect to the futility of the Pope's claims to infallibility. Eck himself, however, does not seem to have felt quite sure about his victory. He suffered the humiliation that the arbitrators declined to give any verdict; and though he continued to shower a multitude of rabid theses, criticisms, etc., down upon Luther and the other reformers, he now saw fit to appeal to force. With the German princes he failed; but in January, 1520, he went to Rome, and the result was the bull Ezurge Domine, which he was to make public in Germany himself in the quality of apostolical prothonotary and papal nuncio. The task, however, proved less enjoyable than he had expected. From Leipzig, from Erfurt, etc., he had to flee from the riots himself in the quality of apostolical prothonotary and papal nuncio. The task, however, proved less enjoyable than he had expected. From Leipzig, from Erfurt, etc., he had to flee from the riots himself, for the Pope's claims to infallibility. Eck was accused, before the grand-master Hervé (at that moment present at Metz), of entertaining connections with suspicious persons. An investigation was instituted, and Eckart was acquitted. Archbishop Henry of Cologne, however, the implacable enemy of the Beghards, had formed an opinion of his own about Eckart; and in 1525 very heavy accusations against him were laid before the chapter of the order assembled in Venice. Nicholas of Strassburg, as papal nuncio, was charged with the investigation; and, as he himself belonged to the mystical school of theology, he found nothing to blame in Eckart. But Henry would not suffer himself to be robbed of his prey in this way. He accused both Eckart and his protector, Nicholas, of heresy; and a regular process was instituted before an episcopal court of inquisition. Both Eckart and Nicholas protested against the competency of the court, and appealed to the Pope; but they were, nevertheless, both of them condemned. On Feb. 13, 1529, Eckart read from the pulpit of the cloister-chapel in Cologne a solemn declaration, in which he protested his willingness to recant any error into which he might have fallen. Immediately after, he set out for Avignon; but when the papal decision was given, in the bull of March 27, 1529, he had died. The bull, however, treated the case with great leniency. On account of the declaration he had made at Cologne, Eckart was evidently considered as one who, before death, had returned to the bosom of the Church. The bull condemned seventeen propositions of his, and pointed out eleven more as suspicious. But, in spite of only conciliatory censure, his pupils were still inclined to him with great reverence and love. When Heinrich Suso wrote his autobiography, in 1300, he spoke of Eckart as the "holy master;" and his sermons were frequently copied in the monasteries of Germany, Switzerland, Tyrol, and Bohemia. In 1430 the papal condemnation was repeated; but in 1440 Nicholas of Cusa, nevertheless, mentions Eckart's works as one of the sources of his system. A collected edition of his works was given by Franz Pfeiffer, Leipzig, 1887.

What startles the reader in Eckart's writings is his strongly pronounced though mystic pantheism, often expressed with singular power. God is not the highest being, he says, for he is the only being. Outside of God there is nothing but illusion and deception. In its true existence every creature is not only a revelation of God, but a part of him; and—here enters the easy transition from mystic pantheism to the ascetic morals—the true object of human life must consequently be to strip it of all illusions and deceptions, and return into the one great being, God.

Lit.—I. K. SEIDEMANN: Die Leipziger Disputatio, 1843; TH. WIEDEMANN: Dr. Johann Eck, Regensburg, 1885. BERNHARD RIGGEBACH.

ECKHART (generally called Meister Eckart), the chief representative of German mysticism of the thirteenth century, was probably born at Strassburg, 1260, and died, probably on a journey to Avignon, 1329. He belonged to the Dominican order, and was prior of Erfurt towards the close of the thirteenth century. In 1262 he taught in the College of St. Jacques in Paris, and took the degree of licentiatum theologiarum. In 1303 he was appointed provincial of his order for Saxony, and in 1307 vicar-general for Bohemia. In 1308 he again taught in Paris, and in 1316 he settled at Strassburg as vicar for the grand-master of his order. There he became acquainted with the Brethren of the Free Spirit; and when some time after, he was removed to Francfort as prior of the Dominican monastery, the extraordinary character of his preaching aroused suspicion, and he was accused, before the grand-master Hervé (at that moment present at Metz), of entertaining connections with suspicious persons. An investigation was instituted, and Eckart was acquitted. Archbishop Henry of Cologne, however, the implacable enemy of the Beghards, had formed an opinion of his own about Eckart; and in 1325 very heavy accusations against him were laid before the chapter of the order assembled in Venice. Nicholas of Strassburg, as papal nuncio, was charged with the investigation; and, as he himself belonged to the mystical school of theology, he found nothing to blame in Eckart. But Henry would not suffer himself to be robbed of his prey in this way. He accused both Eckart and his protector, Nicholas, of heresy; and a regular process was instituted before an episcopal court of inquisition. Both Eckart and Nicholas protested against the competency of the court, and appealed to the Pope; but they were, nevertheless, both of them condemned. On Feb. 13, 1529, Eckart read from the pulpit of the cloister-chapel in Cologne a solemn declaration, in which he protested his willingness to recant any error into which he might have fallen. Immediately after, he set out for Avignon; but when the papal decision was given, in the bull of March 27, 1529, he had died. The bull, however, treated the case with great leniency. On account of the declaration he had made at Cologne, Eckart was evidently considered as one who, before death, had returned to the bosom of the Church. The bull condemned seventeen propositions of his, and pointed out eleven more as suspicious. But, in spite of only conciliatory censure, his pupils were still inclined to him with great reverence and love. When Heinrich Suso wrote his autobiography, in 1300, he spoke of Eckart as the "holy master;" and his sermons were frequently copied in the monasteries of Germany, Switzerland, Tyrol, and Bohemia. In 1430 the papal condemnation was repeated; but in 1440 Nicholas of Cusa, nevertheless, mentions Eckart's works as one of the sources of his system. A collected edition of his works was given by Franz Pfeiffer, Leipzig, 1887.

What startles the reader in Eckart's writings is his strongly pronounced though mystic pantheism, often expressed with singular power. God is not the highest being, he says, for he is the only being. Outside of God there is nothing but illusion and deception. In its true existence every creature is not only a revelation of God, but a part of him; and—here enters the easy transition from mystic pantheism to the ascetic morals—the true object of human life must consequently be to strip it of all illusions and deceptions, and return into the one great being, God.

Lit.—MARTENSEN: Meister Eckart, Hamburg, ECLECTICISM. 689

EDEN.

ECLECTICISM, a philosophical method by which a philosopher extracts from various systems of philosophy that which seems to him to be most strikingly true, and fits it together as best he knows how. The method is completely unsystematic, and has never produced results of any account. It generally becomes very fashionable, however, in all post-philosophical ages, when the true philosophical productivity has died out. Neoplatonism was at the bottom eclecticism, and so was Roman philosophy in general.

ECTHESES. See MONOTHELETES.

ECUADOR, The Republic of, situated between Brazil, Peru, the Pacific Ocean, and Colombia, comprises an area of about three hundred thousand square miles, and contains, according to the census of 1875, about nine hundred thousand inhabitants, besides two hundred thousand Indians wandering about the country. The bulk of the civilized population consists of descendants of whites and Indians, Indians with fixed abodes, negroes, and descendants of negroes and whites, and negroes and Indians. They are all Christians; while the Indians, among whom there formerly was carried on a very active mission, have now relapsed completely into Paganism. According to the relation to Rome is based upon a concordat of Sept. 26, 1862. The capital (Quito) is the seat of an archbishop. There are episcopal seats at Cuenca, Guayaquil, Riobamba, Loja, and Ibarra, and an apostolical vicariate at Napo. The number of the clergy is not given in the latest statistics. In 1858 it was insufficient. By the revolution, the Church lost its estates: it is now poor. Nor is proper care taken of popular education: its standard is very low.

EDMANN, Johann Christian, b. at Weissenfels, July 9, 1808; d. in Berlin, Feb. 15, 1877; studied theology at Jena and Eisenach; was tutor in several Austrian families; lived for some time with the Moravian Brethren, and partook in the Berleburg translation of the Bible. He translated the Second Epistle to Timothy and the Epistles to Titus and Philemon. In the mean time he had reached the stand-point of absolute rationalism, confounding all the positive religions as defective forms, and reason as the highest authority also in the field of religion; and with this conviction he proposed to retire into obscurity, and maintain himself as a weaver. But he had already written his Unschuldige Wahrheiten (1735), and his friends induced him to go on with his authorship. There followed Moses mit aufgedecktem Auge (1740). Die Göttlichkeit der Vernunft (1741), etc., books which attracted some attention by their coarse eloquence, and talent for blasphemy, but which made no real impression. The last years of his life he spent in Berlin, under the protection of Friedrich II., though on the condition that he should publish nothing more. His autobiography was published by Klose, 1849. See MÜNCHEBERG: Reimarus und Edelmann, Hamburg, 1867; GUDEN: Edelmann, 1870.

EDEN (Heb. יָדָן; LXX. τοίχος; Ezek. xxi. 26; C. SCHMIDT), the land or region in which "the Lord God planted a garden," where "he put the man whom he had formed" (Gen. ii. 8). The Hebrew word (יָדָן) used in the plural, has the meaning "delights;" and hence Eden has been supposed to mean "land of delight" (LXX. τοίχος; Vulg. voluptas). The Hebrews themselves may have so understood it; but the real origin of the name is more probably to be found in the Assyrian тідум (from Accadian tilmu), "plain."

Description of the Garden of Eden. — Eden and the garden are so closely related in the Old Testament and in Christian thought, that it is necessary to treat of them together. Although in Gen. ii. 8, 10 they are not identical, and "the garden" is repeatedly mentioned alone in chapters ii., while in iv. 16 Eden is so mentioned, with apparent reference to the land or region, yet the expression יָדָן ("garden [of] Eden") occurs Gen. ii. 15, iii. 23, 24; Joel ii. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 35; and in the following passages Eden alone seems to be used in the same sense: Ezek. xxviii. 18, xxxi. 9, 16, 18; Isa. ii. 3. We find also the expression "garden of God," יָדָן יָדָן, Ezek. xxviii. 13, xxxi. 8 (twice), 9, and "garden of Jehovah," יָדָן יָדָן (Gen. xiii. 10, Isa. ii. 8), and, with kindred meaning, "mountain of God," שָׁם יָדִין (Isa. xi. 9, lxv. 25, Ezek. xxviii. 14, 16).

The LXX. generally translate יָדָן by тοίχος (see above), in Gen. ii. 8, 10, iv. 16, by έδαφος, and in Isa. ii. 3 by γη του θεου. This latter word (from Pers. pairidaeza, whence also Heb. שָׁם יָדָן) is generally employed by the LXX. for יָדָן, "garden" (Ezek. xxxvi. 35, שָׁם יָדִין, and the Vulgate in most cases follows their example.

Eden and the garden were situated "toward the east;" i. e., eastward from the writer (Gen. ii. 8). The vegetation was luxurious (ii. 9): among other fruit-trees was found the fig-tree (iii. 7), and two trees beside, which are repeatedly named, but not minutely described, — "the tree of life," and "the tree of knowledge of good and evil." Irrigation was secured by a river flowing into the garden from Eden: where its sources were we are not distinctly told. On leaving the garden it divided into four "heads," or branches; and the course of each is indicated, except in the case of the fourth, which was too well known to need it. Besides its abundant fertility, the garden was also the home of all kinds of animals. Although, in including cattle, beasts of the field, and birds (ii. 19, 20).

Into this garden man was put "to dress it and to keep it" (ii. 15); i. e., to cultivate and guard it. Here he gave names to all the animals (ii. 20), where the woman was fashioned out of his rib (ii. 21, 22); here the two lived unclothed and innocent (ii. 25), accustomed to intercourse with God (ii. 19, 22, cf. iii. 8), with only one restrictive command to observe,—the prohibition to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (ii. 17). Through the specious words of the serpent (iii. 1-5) the woman was led to dis obey the command, and the man followed her example (iii. 9). Thus they lost their innocency, and the Lord passed sentence upon them, and cursed the serpent. He provided tunics of skins (iii. 21) to take the place of the aprons of fig-leaves which the man and his wife in their shame had made (iii. 7), and then sent them out of the garden, that, with their newly-gained knowledge of good and evil, they might not eat of the tree of life any more forever (iii. 22, 23). On the east of the garden the Lord placed the cherubim, and the flaming sword, self-brandishing, to guard the way to the tree of life" (iii. 24). (See ADAM, CHERUBIM, CREATION, EYE, SERPENT, SIN.)

The conception of an early home of man, where innocence and happiness reigned, and there was habitual intercourse with divine beings, is found, with some striking similarities to the account in Genesis, in the mythologies of other peoples, notably those of India and Persia. According to the former, Mērā, the "mountain of the gods," situated in the north, gives rise to the spring Gānōqā, which waters the "land of joy," on the summit, and then forms four lakes, whence issue four rivers that flow through four regions, and empty into four seas. On the northern side of Mērā was Uītāra-Kuru, a kind of paradise, in which Menu Vīivasalalived before the flood. According to the Persian myths, the sacred mountain Hārdā-Berēzaitis, from which flow twenty rivers, overshadows the happy land, Airyana-Voedja, where Yīma dwelt in the time of his purity.

Such details as the tree, the serpent, and the loss of innocence through sin, also re-appear in these mythologies. The two first are found also in that of Babylon; and here the conception of the cherubim appears under the form of the winged bull, called generally lamāru and nādu, and by other names, but also Kirīšu = Sīrā (derivation probably from karēbu, "to be mighty, powerful"). The exact belief of the Babylonians as to the primitive condition and surroundings of man is not yet known.

But, whatever the general or even detailed resemblance between the biblical account and those in heathen mythologies, the differences are still more marked. The former is unique in its simplicity, dignity, lofty conception of God and of man, and in its distinct idea of sin as a voluntary and responsible violation of God's command, entailing the gravest moral consequences. And, while the Old-Testament writers looked back to the garden of Eden as the ideal of that which was lovely and desirable (Gen. xiii. 10; Joel ii. 28; Isa. li. 3; Ezek. xviii. 3 sq., xxxv. 27), it became to the prophets a standard to measure the coming blessedness of the Messianic age (Isa. li. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 30 sq.; cf. Ps. li. 18, xlii. 2, lxxv. 4); and the conception of that happy time was more or less shaped by the recollection of what had been (Isa. xi. 6-9, xvi. 25; Ezek. xxvi. 1 sq.). Later Jewish thought, "as seen especially in the Book of Enoch" developed the notion of the future abode of the chosen, and in the New Testament there appeared the clear belief in the Christian paradise. (See PARADISE.)

Location of Eden. — The writer evidently desired and intended that his readers should understand where Eden lay. He speaks of it as "eastward." He points out, incidentally, marked features of the land and climate. He seems to regard Eden as a definite region or district, by whose location another land could be described,— "the land of Nod on the east of Eden" (Gen. iv. 18). But most important of all is his statement with regard to the rivers. First there is a "νήσος" (sometimes = "current," and then it may be used of the sea, as Jon. ii. 4; Ps. xxiv. 2; generally = "river," never "river-system"), flowing into the garden: this is not named. Then there are the four branches which into this river divides as it leaves the garden. The first is Pīṣon (וֹסִּון), whose course is described with reference to "the land of the Hāvilāh" (ᡥᡰᡳᡳᠶᠠ‬), as Ĺ(rotation). "Which compasseth," "goes about in," "flows quite around," or "bends around" one side (Num. xxi. 4; Judg. xi. 18), or even "goes about in," i.e., goes circuitously in; cf. Isa. xxiii. 16. (If this last is the meaning here, then we understand the use of Ĺ(rotation), "all" before the names of the countries. Without this, the idea of passing quite through the countries would be unexpressed.) The land of the "Hāvilāh" is then described as the land "where the gold is," and "the gold of that land is good; there is the brēdolach and the shokham-stone." The brēdolach (ܒܪܕܘܠܐܟ) is mentioned in Num. xi. 7, where the manna is compared with it. Joseph., Ant., III. 1, 6, calls it bēlāshon, a reddish-brown resinous gum, transparent and fragrant, and he is generally followed. The manna was white (Exod. xvi. 31); the resemblance was perhaps partly in the consistency, and partly in the transparent character. The shokham-stone (ܫѫܗܡܡܢܐ) has not been satisfactorily explained. LXX. (Job xxviii. 16) render νῆσος, "onyx," "onyx;"); Joseph., "sardonius." LXX. (Exod. xxxv. 9), lidos ophiopat, "sardius;" LXX. (Exod. xxviii. 20; Ezek. xxviii. 18, and Targg.) "beryl" (πηλαῖον); LXX. (Gen. ii. 12), "lidos o ophiopat, "chrysporassus." LXX. (Exod. xxviii. 9, xxxv. 27); lidos ὁμορφάσιον, "amaragdus." All these interpretations and other later ones (derived from Arabic sāhīm, "sun-burnt," or Hebrew oẓōw, "leek," from the green color) are wholly uncertain. The Babylonians apparently knew the stone as (abnu) ṣdmū, "sahim.

The second river ((cp) as above) is Gibōn (גִּבֹּן), "which flows about," or "winds through," "all the land of Cush." The third river is Chiddēkel (Titris): "this is the one going before Assyria." The fourth river is Phratē (Euphrates). No one questions the identity of the third and fourth rivers. The whole question turns about the first two, and the lands around or through which they flow. Each of these two rivers bears a name admitting of explanation from the Hebrew, Pīṣon from פִּשֹּׁן, and Gibōn from גִּבֹּן, both with the same general meaning, "to break forth," "flow forth." It is, however, quite conceivable that the original derivation was different, and that the Hebrews merely associated them with these roots.

But there is the greatest difficulty in harmonising the statements in regard to them with modern geographical knowledge, and wide disagreement still prevails. There are said to have been in all some eighty hypotheses as to the position of Eden. This number, however, includes the eccentric proposals to find it in Prussia on the shores of the Baltic (Haske), or in the Canary Islands (Credner), and others of like character. All the views which deserve notice here may be grouped under three heads:

I. THEORIES WHICH PLACE EDEN IN THE FAR EAST. — This class of views is sometimes called "traditional," because it can be traced back to Josephus, and has been thought to rest on genuine tradition. It identifies the Pison with the Indus or the Ganges, and Havilah with India or, vaguely, with the Eastern region. Cush is then commonly the country south of Egypt, or, in general, the south land of Asia and Africa (see Cusan), and Gihon is the Nile; or else Cush is derived from the supposed Caspian people, Kooaia; and Gihon is the Oxus, called by Islamites Gaikhun. (When Pison is made identical with Indus, then Gihon has sometimes been explained as Ganges.) It is then sometimes supposed that Cush and Gihon cannot be found on the eastern shore of the Caspian, neither can they on its western shore; and although some might be tempted to make use of the name of the country Kian, or Kusua, which appears on a Cappadocian tablet (Proceedings Soc. Bib. Arch., November and December, 1881), still it is not easy to see how this could be connected with an Armenian river. The other proposed identifications are still more precarious. Further: by no possibility could these four rivers be supposed to be branches of one parent-stream. When it is claimed that Nahar can mean "river-system," this is not borne out by the usage of the language (see above); and the hypothesis (Luther and others) that the flood altered the physical features of Asia, so that the courses of streams are now different from the original courses, is unsupported by any thing in the biblical account of the flood, from being hinted at by the writer of Gen. ii. that he evidently expects, in his description, to be understood by his contemporaries as referring to a region still accessible to men, and recognizable by them.

II. THEORIES WHICH FIND EDEN IN ARMENIA. — These take as the starting-point the known sources of the Tigris and Euphrates, and seek two other rivers rising in the same region. Thus, Pison = Phasis, Havilah = Colchis (or Pison = Kurl, Cyrus), Gihon = Araxes, Cush = Kooaia. Representatives of this class of views are Reland, Calmet, Leclerc, Keil, etc. But, if the Kooaia were the eastern shore of the Caspian, neither could they on its western shore; and although some might be tempted to make use of the name of the country Kian, or Kusua, which appears on a Cappadocian tablet (Proceedings Soc. Bib. Arch., November and December, 1881), still it is not easy to see how this could be connected with an Armenian river. The other proposed identifications are still more precarious. Further: by no possibility could these four rivers be supposed to be branches of one parent-stream. When it is claimed that Nahar can mean "river-system," this is not borne out by the usage of the language (see above); and the hypothesis (Luther and others) that the flood altered the physical features of Asia, so that the courses of streams are now different from the original courses, is unsupported by any thing in the biblical account of the flood, from being hinted at by the writer of Gen. ii. that he evidently expects, in his description, to be understood by his contemporaries as referring to a region still accessible to men, and recognizable by them.

III. THEORIES WHICH PLACE EDEN IN BABYLONIA. — Advocates of this location had their attention fixed by the fact that the Euphrates and the Tigris are actually united for a certain distance in the Satt el-Arab, which then empties into the Persian Gulf by two or more mouths. The Satt el-Arab was therefore regarded as the "river" of Gen. ii. 10; the Euphrates and Tigris were looked upon as its branches, reckoning up the stream; and the Pison and Gihon were identified with the two main arms through which the Satt el-Arab empties. Calvin, who held this view, considered the Pison to be the eastern arm, and the Gihon the western. Scaliger and others followed him; while as to the Havilah, Keil, etc., found Pison in the western, Gihon in the eastern arm. A modification of this view is given by Pressel (Herzog's Real-Encycl., ed. i., vol. XX., Art. Paradis), to the effect, that, instead of being these outlets of the Satt el-Arab, Pison and Gihon are two tributary streams rising in from the east. This form of the theory is more consistent.
than the other, since it seeks all four branches in the same general direction,—up the stream; but the words of Gen. ii. oblige us to seek them all in the opposite direction,—down the stream. Only in the direction of its current could the river, on leaving the garden, divide into four branches. Against these theories it is further urged that we have ample grounds, from classical history and from the cuneiform inscriptions, as well as from the nature of the soil and the present rate of physical change in that region, to believe that the sea once extended a hundred miles or more beyond its present limits to the north, thus covering the supposed site of Eden, and that the Euphrates and Tigris emptied into it without uniting (PLINY: Nat. Hist., VI., § 31; RITTER: Erdkunde, X. 3; KIEPERT: Allé Geog., p. 138).

Another view has been proposed, and advocated with great force and skill. It finds Eden in Northern Babylonia, immediately about the site of Babylon (FRIEDR. DELITZSCH, Wo lag das Paradies?). Where the Euphrates and Tigris approached nearest to each other, the country was intersected by very numerous water-courses, whose current was always from the Euphrates toward the Tigris, on account of difference of level (ARRIAN: Exp. Alex., VII. 7, contr. Xen. Anab., I. 7, 10). The effect was that of an extensive river flowing in almost countless channels. This is claimed to satisfy the requirements of Gen. ii. 10, and to be precisely the way in which an Oriental would conceive of irrigation,—the express object of the "river." As the Euphrates and Tigris, which have thus formed in effect only the outside limits of this great irrigating stream, diverge more widely from each other, they resumed their independent course; and from the former there proceeded two streams, and from the latter one, which approached nearest to each other, the country was intersected by very numerous water-courses, whose current was always from the Euphrates toward the Tigris, on account of difference of level (ARRIAN: Exp. Alex., VII. 7, contr. Xen. Anab., I. 7, 10). The effect was that of an extensive river flowing in almost countless channels. This is claimed to satisfy the requirements of Gen. ii. 10, and to be precisely the way in which an Oriental would conceive of irrigation,—the express object of the "river." As the Euphrates and Tigris, which have thus formed in effect only the outside limits of this great irrigating stream, diverge more widely from each other, they resumed their independent course; and from the former there proceeded two streams, and from the latter one.

The weak points in this theory are the following: the difficulty of understanding why the main river is not named in Gen. ii., if it is thus really the divided current of the Euphrates; the description of the Tigris by naming its course previous to its reaching Babylonia; the uncertainty attaching to the identification Pison = Pallakopas, and to the location of Havilah (the statements in Gen. x. 29, etc., quoted above, are, after all, vague); the lack of clear knowledge about the Amsu (= Amsu) in Babylonia. While, therefore, Delitzsch has the merit of treating the biblical account as intelligent, and meant to be intelligible, and has much in its favor, we must await further light before accepting it as fully established.

EDEN (Heb. יִדְיָם) is named (Ezek. xxvii. 23) after Haran and Canneh. It denotes a People, probably the same with "the children of Eden," יִדְיָם (2 Kings xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12), who are said to live in "Telassar" (תֵּלָסָר), and are perhaps to be identified with the "Adini, house of Adin" in Western Mesopotamia, often named in the cuneiform inscriptions.
Whether the Beth-Eden of Amos 1. 5 ("Beth-Yez," A.V., "house of Eden") is the same people, is still a matter of question. This is at any rate more likely than its identification with 'Eineden on Lebanon, Beit Djeenn at the foot of Hermon, or Djujsik el-Kadimeh, south-east from Laodicea, the Parthenus of Polterny. The fact that it is named in connection with Amos does not necessarily disprove its identity with the Mesopotamian Eden; for the intention of the prophet might be to extend his threatening to the Aramaic tribes generally.

At all events, the Hebrew pointing of 13:1 in these passages shows a correct apprehension that these Edens were distinct from the Eden ("Yez") of Genesis.

(See Fr. Delitzsch: Wo lag das Paradis? Leipzig, 1881; R. Smend: Der Prophet Ezechiel, Leipzig, 1880; E. Schrader: Die Keilschriften und die Geschichtsforschung, Giessen, 1878.)

EDESSA, a city of Northern Mesopotamia (the Armenian Edessa, the Syrian Urhöi, the Arab er-Rohd, the present Orfa or Urfa), is situated on the Daisun, a tributary to the Euphrates, fifty-five miles west of Diabekir, and is estimated to have a population of from twenty-five thousand to fifty thousand. It seems to be a very old city. One tradition identifies it with Erech, one of the principal cities of the Babylonian Empire; another, with the Ur of the Chaldeans. But nothing is known with certainty of its history until after the Macedonian conquest of Persia. A Greek-Macedonian colony was settled in the city and its neighborhood; and in 116 B.C. Urhöi, or Osrhoës, founded an independent kingdom there, Osrhoëne, which lasted till 217 A.D., when Caracalla made the country a Roman province. In 637 the city was conquered by the Arabs; but in 1097 Count Baldwin of Flanders succeeded in establishing once more an independent state in the country, which for fifty years formed a bulwark for the kingdom of Jerusalem. It was conquered in 1146 by Nourreddin, and the city is now a Turkish possession.

Christianity was early introduced in Edessa; though the legend about the correspondence between Christ and King Abgarus appears to have no historical foundation. In the third century the city became the seat of a bishop, and in the fourth the seat of the Syrian school of theology. At the same time the Persian church flourished in the city. After the death of Ephrem, however, his school fell into the hands of the Arians, just as, later on, the Persian church became the stronghold of Macedonianism. After the Mohammedan conquest all the Christian churches were transformed into mosques. The city is still the seat of a Greek archbishop and an Armenian bishop.

EDICT (1) is an order issued by a ruler, either of command or prohibition. It is a used in church history to the orders of the Roman emperors relating to Christianity. From Trajan to Constantine these edicts had instituted persecution. But Constantine issued three which forbade meddling with Christians on the part of the authorities. Several religious edicts of previous Roman emperors are extant; but they are altogether too favorable to Christianity, grave doubt is thrown upon their genuineness. The distinction between an edict and a rescript is that the latter is issued in answer to an inquiry. See PERSECUTIONS, and Krim, Rom und d. Christentum, Berlin, 1881.

(2) Edict is the technical name for a formal invitation given by presbytery in Scotland to all who know any thing against the character of a pastor-elect to come forward and testify.

EDICT OF NANTES. See HUGUENOTS, NANTES.

EDICT OF WORMS. See LUTHER, WORMS.

EDIFICATION, a New-Testament designation, comparing the Church and the Christian believer to a house or temple (1 Cor. iii. 9; Eph. ii. 21). Christian character is an edifice built on Christ (Eph. ii. 20; Col. ii. 7), and enlarged by the Word (Acts xx. 32), Christian intercourse (1 Thess. v. 11), and all the other means of grace. The Holy Ghost himself dwells in the believer regarded as a temple (1 Cor. v. 19); and the constant injunction is, that it should be kept holy, and thus be a fit sanctuary of God (1 Cor. iii. 17).

EDMUND (1) and (2). See EADMUND.
upon which in the spring-time the traveller feasts his eyes.

The People and their History. — There were kings in the land of Edom before there reigned any kings in Arabia Petraea (Joseph. Antiq. X. 8, 7). The Edomites were brave warriors, and fond of the chase; but they also cultivated the soil, and carried on trade, especially from their great ports Elath and Ezion-geber. They, or at least the Temanites, one of their tribes, were famous for wisdom (Jer. xlix. 7; Obad. v. 2; cf. Eliphaz, the Temanite, Job ii. 11). In religion they were polytheists, and probably Baal-worshippers.

Their history as given in the Bible begins with the victory of their King Hadad over Midian (Gen. xxxvi. 35). When the Israelites, on their way to the promised land, asked permission to go through Edom, they were refused (Num. xx. 14—17), and therefore they went around (xx. 21). The insult was all the greater because of Moses' recognition of brotherhood in Edom. The ill feeling thus naturally increased; and, as soon as the Israelites were united under a king (Saul), they made war upon the Edomites, whom they now called "enemies," and under David they brought them to subjection (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 1 Kings xi. 15 sqq.), in which condition they remained until the reign of Jehoram (2 Kings viii. 20—22), when they broke the yoke, and "made a king over themselves." Amaziah fifty years afterwards attempted to reconquer them, but was only partially successful (2 Kings xiv. 7; cf. 2 Chron. xxvii. 17). The later kings of Judah were too much engrossed by troubles with Assyria to undertake expeditions against Edom, and therefore the Edomites enjoyed independent government (Jer. xxvii. 3). The relations between the two kingdoms probably continued hostile; at all events the Edomites joined Nebuchadnezzar in the siege and pillage of Jerusalem, and therefore were cursed by the prophets (Ezek. xxxi. 15; Amos i. 11, 12; Obad. 10—16). They also improved the opportunity to leave their territory, and go as far north as Hebron (1 Macc. v. 85); and therefore the later name, Idumea, designated quite another district than the old Edom. Into the lands they left, Arab tribes came, and built up a mighty kingdom, with Petra as its capital. The highly interesting ruins discovered at Petra by Burckhardt, in 1812, date from the time of the Roman occupation, before the building of Hadrian's temple (Joseph., Antiq. XIII. 9, 1, X. 7, 9); but Antipater, the son of the governor of Idumea, having gained Julius Caesar's favor, was by him appointed Procurator of Judaea (47 B.C.). His son was Herod the Great, whom the Roman senate appointed (40 B.C.) King of Judaea (Joseph. Antiq. XIV. 8, 7). In his family, the kingdom was held until the death of the last king, Agrippa II. (A.D. 100).

Under the Romans, Idumea formed one of the eleven toparchies into which Judea was divided (Joseph. War, III. 3, 5). During the confusion of the great Jewish war against Rome, the Idumeneans make their last appearance on the stage of history, and their role is tragic. Twenty thousand of them came to Jerusalem on the invitation of John of Gischala and the Zealots; and, because they were so enraged that they caused the streets of Jerusalem to run with blood (Joseph., War, IV. 4 and 5). — Curiously enough the name of "Edomite" is given by the rabbins to the Romans, because the latter were also the death-foe to the Jews.

ED'RIE (strength, stronghold) was (1) the name of the second capital of Bashan, situated on the road which the Israelites under Moses followed to go from Gilead to Bashan, and the place where King Og attacked them, and lost his life (Num. xxxi. 33; Deut. iii. 1—10). Its ruins, covering a space of three miles in circuit, and consisting of remains of temples, churches, and mosques, form the present Edhra or Der'at, a place inhabited by about five hundred souls.

II. A town of Naphthali, identified by Porter with Tell Khuraibeh, two miles south of Kedesh (Num. xix. 37).

EDUCATION AMONG THE HEBREWS, before the exile, consisted mainly in the knowledge of the distinctive tenets, facts, and symbolism of their religion, and was imparted by parents to their children (Exod. xii. 27, 28; Deut. iv. 9, vi. 18—20). Some have inferred from Deut. vi. 8, 9, that a knowledge of reading and writing was common; but this is probably going too far. The priests, of course, could read and write; and thus there was always a large body of educated men. Educated laymen are also mentioned, such as the historians of the Judges and Kings, the surveyors of the promised land (Josh. xvii. 8, 9); and the diplomats, who conducted the business with foreign courts and peoples (2 Kings xvii. 28). That the mass of the people were illiterate was nothing particularly unfavorable to Judaism; for what ancient people, except possibly the Chinese, could show any different state of things? Popular education is, in our sense of the term, a very modern and Protestant phenomenon. It may be claimed for the ancient Hebrews that their sacred books and their profound religious mysteries and services gave them a mental training far superior to that of any contemporary nation.

From the time of the "five books of the prophets" (1 Kings xx. 35; 2 Kings ii. 3, 5), it has been inferred that certain young men were trained for the prophetic office in so-called "schools of the prophets," at Naioth (1 Sam. xix. 18 — for this name is interpreted in the Targum "the house of learning"). Bethel, Jericho (2 Kings ii. 3, 5), and other places; but such training was given to few, and, besides, was technical, consisting of homiletics and music.

During the captivity the synagogue system of worship was developed; and as a consequence, a higher grade of religious and educational matters characterized the national life. On the return, the disuse of Hebrew as a vernacular rendered instruction in it imperative, if the people at large were to understand their own sacred books. Contact with great nations like the Babylonian, the Greek, and the Roman, enlarged the Hebrew mind. Other things than religion claimed attention. Jerusalem became the seat of a university, and in strange contrast to former exclusiveness there was generous appreciation of heathen culture. In the towns and villages education was not carried so far. Reading and writing, the law, and the tenets of the Jewish faith, were probably the only topics taught. “At five years a child should study the Bible, at ten the Mishna, and at fifteen the Talmud.” A graphic description of the school in Nazareth in our Lord’s day is given by an anonymous writer in these words: “The school-room is the interior of a squalid building rudely constructed of stone, with a domed roof, and whitewashed walls, a wooden desk or cupboard on one side, and an inscription in Hebrew over the door. From the building, as we approach, comes the hum of many children’s voices, repeating the verses of the sacred Torah [the law] in unthinking and perfunctory monotone. The aged teacher sits silent in the midst. As we look in, we see his huge turban, his gray beard, and solemn features, appearing over the ruddy faces of the dark-eyed boys who sit on the floor around him. The long row of tiny red slippers extends along the wall near the door. The earthen water-bottle stands on the mat beside the Khazzan, or synagogue teacher. The scholars are the children of the richer members of the village community; of the Bethanias, or ‘men of leisure,’ who form the representative company of the community, and constitute the ‘standing men,’ who go up yearly with the village priest for a week in Jerusalem, to fulfil similar functions in the temple ritual.” (Rabbi Jeshua, Lond. and N.Y., 1881, pp. 28, 24).

Thus, even then, education was limited, and there was much ignorance; so that the phrase “country people” was synonymous with the “illiterate.” Of these the contemptuous remark was made by the Sanhedrin, “This multitude which knoweth not the law are accursed” (John vii. 49). Very probably this ignorance was principally among the lowest class, the lineal descendants of the primitive settlers of Palestine, whose children are the wretched fellahin of to-day. According to Philo (On the Virtuous being also Free, Bohn’s trans., vol. iii. 500) Josephus (Contra Apion, i. 12), and the Talmud, the pious Jews took great pains with their children’s education. “Jews write in a language of the highest rank, and the education of children was neglected.” “The world is preserved by the breath of the children in the schools.” So said the rabbins. The later Jews were taught a trade in their schools, and thus could earn their own living. That Saul of Tarsus, the learned pupil of the great rabbin Gama-
EDUCATION.

As an example may be cited the act passed by the first national synod of the French Reformed Church in 1559: "In order that the church may be furnished with a sufficient number of ministers and officers, and to prevent them, and preach the word of God unto them, they shall be advised to choose those scholars who are already well advanced in good learning, and of most promising and hopeful parts, and to maintain such in the universities, that they may be fitted and prepared for the work of the ministry. Kings, princes, and the nobility shall be petitioned and exhorted particularly to mind this important affair, and to lay by some part of their revenues towards their maintenance; and the richer churches shall do the like. Colloquies (i.e., presbyteries) shall, as they see meet, take the best measures in the premises that matters of so great necessity may be successful. If single churches have not means, their neighbors shall join them, so that one poor scholar at least may be maintained in every colloquy. And, in order that this design shall not fail, every fifth penny of the receipts, or some of the revenues of the richer churches shall be put aside, and when it may conveniently be done, to be employed in this service." A like policy was general throughout the Reformed bodies of France.

In 1819 the General Assembly of the Scotch Church recommended that every presbytery consisting of twelve ministers should maintain one bursar, and, when the number was fewer than twelve, they should be joined to another presbytery. Four years later, the minimum of aid ordered to be given was put at a hundred pounds Scots yearly. Shortly after the session of the Westminster Assembly, a society for securing and aiding candidates of the ministry was organized by leading divines and laymen, several of whom were members of that assembly; and among these were such men as Baxter, Bates, Poole, Stillingsfleet, and Cudworth. This movement, however, came to an end soon after the Restoration. The Church of England attained the same result by scholarship endowments at her universities.

In the United States of America the scarcity of ministers, and the exigencies of an extending population, constrained the leading ecclesiastical bodies and prominent members in the church early to adopt vigorous measures for meeting the demand thus created. Colleges were founded at Cambridge (1636) and New Haven (1700) and in New Jersey (1748), where education was freely granted to young men contemplating the ministry who were unable to defray their own expenses. In 1751 the synod of New York "recommended an annual collection from all its churches for the support of young students whose circumstances render them incapable of maintaining themselves at learning." Funds also were obtained from England and Scotland and Ireland for this same cause, but with special reference to the supply of the ministry. In 1770 the combined synods of New York and Philadelphia approved and recommended a plan proposed by the president of New Castle "for the assistance of candidates for the ministry by assessment in proportion to the number of ministers and on vacant congregations, as well as by voluntary annual subscriptions." The and other initiatory measures culminated in the organization of a "board of education" by the General Assembly in 1819. This board, with various modifications of rules and measures, has continued until this time. At present (1881) the maximum appropriation for a student, when the funds allow it, is sixty dollars for one student in college and theological seminary. Besides the aid thus given, there are scholarships attached to her institutions, of which worthy students may avail themselves. Full three-fourths of her ministry have thus been more or less helped into sacred orders.

There is also a board of education in Presbyterian churches (South), conducted on the same principles.

In the Episcopal Church the education work is left to the several dioceses, some of which have small societies collecting each a few hundred dollars per year. It has, besides, two general societies representing the two prominent schools of thought in the Church; viz., the Society for the Increase of the Ministry (organized 1837, and having its office in New York, mainly High Church in its tendencies, which has helped to ordination sixty thousand, and the Evangelical Education Society (organized 1862, and having its office in Philadelphia, which has contributed two hundred and fifty men to the ministry). It acts upon a liberal policy, and grants stipends according to the needs of the student, even to the amount of three hundred dollars per annum.

In 1815 was formed the American Education Society, a voluntary association, combing among its members at the first both Presbyterians and Congregationalists, but of late years confined almost exclusively to the latter body. For a long period this society was strengthened by auxiliary bodies organized in the several States of the North and in parts of the West; but these auxiliaries have now altogether expired. In 1873 this society was united under one administration with the college society, and has its office in Boston. In the same annual contributions from the Church, it has fifty-four endowed scholarships, the revenues of which go to aid students. The whole number of students aided by it up to the year 1880 is 6,724.

The Baptists have no general education society; but, instead, they have a number of limited organizations scattered throughout the States. Of these there are at present nine. The amount of aid granted by these varies according to the need of the students; some receiving per year between two hundred and fifty and three hundred dollars.

The Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1869, and has several auxiliary societies established in different parts of the Union. Its scope is broader than most of the other kindred organizations; as it contemplates aiding, not only individual students, but also literary and theological institutions, both at home and abroad. The grants made to students are chiefly in the form of loans, to be paid back at the earliest opportunity.

The Reformed Church (lately Dutch), the Lutheran Church, the German-Reformed Church, and indeed nearly all other Christian bodies, operate on the same principle to secure a ministry among themselves suited to their congregations, and command public respect. And we must add, that it is to the wise and liberal policy thus pursued the fact is largely due that the ministry of Protestant Christendom throughout the world has attained its present high repute, not only for sound moral and religious character, but also for broad intelligence and extensive learning.

EDWARDS, Bela Bates, D.D., was b. in Southampton, Mass., July 4, 1802; graduated at Amherst College in 1824, at Andover Theological Seminary in 1830. In the two years 1826-28 he was a tutor in Amherst College, and in the five years 1828-33 he was assistant secretary of the American Education Society. In 1837 he was ordained a minister of the gospel, and was also appointed professor of the Hebrew language in Andover Theological Seminary. Professor Moses Stuart having resigned his office in 1848, Professor Edwards was elected as his successor. In this professorship he edited and amended the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures with great accuracy and success. He was an enthusiast in sacred philology. He injured his constitution by unremitting toil. In 1846, in consequence of enfeebled health, he made an extended tour in Europe, visiting England, France, Germany, and Italy. In 1851 he was again compelled to absent himself from Andover, and spend the winter in the South. He died at Athens, Ga., April 20, 1852 when he was nearly fifty years of age. He was distinguished not only as a skillful instructor, but also as a wise counselor. He united soundness of judgment with rare delicacy of taste and poetic sensibility. Without grace of elocution, he was an eloquent preacher. The tenderness of his sensibilities, and the earnestness of his piety, were indicated in his countenance and tones of voice, as well as in his pure and classical language. He originated and planned many philanthropic institutions, among others, that has resulted in the Congregational Library at Boston. He published various addresses and sermons, and an indefinite number of newspaper articles. In 1831 he edited the Memoir of Henry Martyn, and added to it valuable Notes and an Introductory Essay, and reprinted some of his sermons. In 1832 and 1835 he edited two high-school books, The Eclectic Reader and The Introduction to the Eclectic Reader. In 1832 he published The Biography of Self-taught Men, also The Missionary Gazeteer. The former of these works has been repeatedly republished. In 1839 he united with E. A. Park in a volume of Selections from German Literature. In 1843 he united with Dr. Sears, afterward president of Brown University, and Professor Fellon, afterward president of Harvard College, in publishing a volume entitled Classical Studies. In 1844 he and Dr. Samuel H. Taylor translated and published the larger Greek Grammar of Dr. Kühner. While assistant secretary of the Education Society, he became an editor of The American Quarterly Register, and had the chief care of this periodical from 1829 to 1842. In 1835 he founded The American Quarterly Observer, took the sole care of it for thirty years. Two years later he united with Dr. Samuel H. Taylor in editing The Biblical Repository, which, during the four preceding years, had been edited by Professor Robinson at Andover. In 1844, in conjunction with E. A. Park, he established the Bibliotheca Sacra on its present plan. Of this periodical he remained editor-in-chief until 1862. Mainly through his influence The Biblical Repository, then published in New York, was united with the Bibliotheca Sacra in 1851. For twenty-three years he was employed in superintending periodical literature, and, with the assistance of several annual and monthly periodicals, he left thirty-one octavo volumes as the monuments of his enterprise and industry. As an early and active friend of two important academies and of Amherst College, which he served as a trustee, as a director of the American Education Society, and a zealous member of other philanthropic institutions, he performed a vast amount of labor, the results of which will long remain. Some of his discourses and essays were published in Boston in 1853, in two duodecimo volumes. The first volume contains a Memoir in 370 pages by the editor. EDWARDS A. PARK.

EDWARDS, John, D.D., b. at Hartfort, Feb. 26, 1837; d. at Cambridge, April 16, 1713. He was "a zealous Calvinist, and a most voluminous writer." His principal works were, Discourse concerning the authority, style and perfection of the books of the Old and New Testament, London, 1693, 3 vols.; A complete history, or survey, of all the dispensations and methods of religion from the beginning of the world to the consummation of all things, as represented in the Old and New Testament, London, 1699, 2 vols.; The preacher, London, 1705—1709, 3 vols.; Theologia reformata, London, 1713—26, 3 vols. folio.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, the Elder. The ancestors of Jonathan Edwards in this country were notable men. His great-grandfather, William, and his grandfather, Richard, were among the pillars of society in Hartford, Conn. His father, Rev. Timothy Edwards, was born at Hartford, in May, 1699, graduated with distinguished honor at Harvard College in 1711, ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in "Windsor Farms," now East Windsor, Conn., in 1714. He remained pastor of this church more than sixty-three years, and died Jan. 27, 1758, at the age of eighty-eight. There was a marked resemblance between the sermons of the father and those of his son.—The mother of Jonathan Edwards was Esther Stoddard, daughter of the noted "father in Israel," Solomon Stoddard, who for more than fifty-six years (1672—1729) was pastor of the Congregational Church in Northampton, Mass. She was a woman of queenly presence and admirable character. She was born in 1672, married in 1694, became the mother of eleven children, and died in 1770, in the ninety-ninth year of her age. Ten of her eleven children were daughters; Jonathan being the only brother in a nest of sisters, four of whom were elder, and six younger, than himself. He was born in East Windsor, Conn., Oct. 5, 1703. In his early years he was instructed, partly at the public school, chiefly by his parents and sisters, at home. His father being an excellent classical scholar, his mother being uncommonly intelligent and refined, his elder sisters being well trained in Latin and Greek, were the best instructors he could have had. He began the study of Latin when he was only six years old. Before he was thirteen, he had acquired a good knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. In his childhood he was taught to think with his pen in hand. — thus
EDWARDS.

...to think definitely, in order that he might express his thoughts clearly. When he was about nine years old he wrote an interesting letter on Materialism, and when he was about twelve he wrote some remarkable papers on questions in natural philosophy. One month before he was thirteen years of age, he entered Yale College. There he spent four years, and was graduated, with the highest honors of his class, in 1720. At the age of fourteen, one of his college studies was Locke on the Human Understanding: "Taking that book into his hand upon some occasion, not long before his death, he said to some of his select friends who were then with him, that he was beyond expression entertained and pleased with it when he read it in his youth at college; that he was as much engaged, and had more satisfaction and pleasure, in studying it, than he was as much engaged, and had more satisfaction and pleasure, in studying it, than the most greedy miser in gathering up handfuls of silver and gold from some new-discovered treasure."

As a child, his sensibilities were often aroused by the truths of religion. He united himself to the church, probably at East Windsor, about the time of his graduation at college. After his graduation he spent nearly two years as a resident scholar in New Haven; then and there he pursued his theological studies. He was "approved" as a preacher in June or July, 1722, several months before he was nineteen years of age. From August, 1722, until April, 1723, he preached to a small Presbyterian Church in New-York city. Here he penned the first thirty-four of his well-known Resolutions, and some exquisitely poetical descriptions of the spiritual life. His eloquence in the pulpit moved his hearers deeply. They desired him to become their pastor, but he felt impelled to labor elsewhere. In September, 1723, he was appointed a tutor in Yale College. He devoted himself to severe study in the winter and spring of 1723-24, and entered on his tutorship in June, 1724. In this office he remained about two years.

On the 15th of February, 1727, when in his twelfth year, he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church at Northampton. On the 27th of the next July he was married to Sarah Pierrepont, daughter of Rev. James Pierrepont, one of the fathers and trustees of Yale College. At the time of her marriage she was in the eighteenth year of her age, was distinguished by her graceful and expressive features, her vigorous mind, fine culture, and fervent piety. The description which Mr. Edwards gave of her in her girlhood was regarded by Dr. Chalmers as a model of fine writing. During her married life she relieved her husband of many burdens which are commonly laid upon a parish minister, and thus enabled him to pursue his studies with comparatively few interruptions.

During the first two years of his pastorate he was colleague with his grandfather, the celebrated Solomon Stoddard; but in 1729, after the death of his grandfather, he took the entire charge of the congregation. As a youthful preacher he was eminent for his weighty thought and fervid utterance. His voice was not commanding, his gestures were few; he was apt to keep his eye fixed upon one spot above the front gallery of his meeting-house: but many of his sermons were overwhelming. He wrote some of them in full. Often he spoke extempore, often from brief but suggestive notes. The traditions relating to their power and influence appear well-nigh fabulous.

In 1734-35 there occurred in his parish a "great awakening" of religious feeling; in 1740-41 occurred another, which extended through a large part of New England. At this time he became specially intimate with George Whitefield. During these exciting scenes, Mr. Edwards manifested the rare comprehensiveness of his mind. He did not favor the extravagances attending the new measures of the revivalists; but he felt compelled to advocate the principle out of which those extravagances needlessly sprang. He did more, perhaps, than any other American divine in promoting the doctrinal purity, and at the same time quickening the zeal, of the churches; in restraining them from fanaticism, and at the same time stimulating them to a healthy enthusiasm. His writings were in his own day, and are in our day, a kind of classic authority for discriminating between the warmth of sound health and the heat of a fever. He did not remain stationary, like the centre of a circle: he moved in an orbit not eccentric, but well-rounded and complete.

As early as 1744 he preached with great vehemence against certain demoralizing practices in which some of his parishioners indulged. He offended several influential families by his method of opposing those practices. In process of time he became convinced that his grandfather, Mr. Stoddard, was wrong in permitting unconverted persons to partake of the Lord's Supper. He feared, that, in resisting the authority of Mr. Stoddard, he would make a sacrifice of himself. He followed his convictions: he made the sacrifice. After a prolonged and earnest controversy, he was ejected from the pastorate which he had adorned for more than twenty-three years.

In August, 1751, about a year after his dismission from Northampton, Edwards was the pastor of the small Congregational Church in Stockbridge, Mass., and missionary of the Housatonic tribe of Indians at that place. Here he was in the wilderness. He was sadly afflicted with the fever and ague and other disorders incident to the new settlement. His labors were interrupted by the French and Indian War. He persevered, however, with marked fidelity in his mission. He preached to the Indians through an interpreter. He gained their admiration and their love.

While living in a kind of exile, among the Indians at Stockbridge, he was invited to the presidency of the college at Princeton, N.J. He was elected to the office on the 26th of September, 1757. He was reluctant to accept it; but finally yielded to the advice of others, and was dismissed from his Stockbridge pastorate, Jan. 3, 1758, after having labored in it six years and a half. He spent the entire remainder of his time at Princeton, performing some duties at the college, but was not inaugurated until the 16th of February, 1758. One week after his inauguration he was inoculated for the small-pox. After the ordinary effects of the inoculation had nearly... subsided, a secondary fever supervened, and he died on the 22d of March, 1758. He had then resided at Princeton about nine weeks, and had been the inaugurated president of the college just five weeks. His age was fifty-four years, five months, and seventeen days. His aged father died only two months before him. His son-in-law, President Burr, died in his forty-second year, only six years before him. His daughter, Mrs. Pulaski, (the wife of the late President Thomas P. Burr,) died in her twenty-seventh year, only sixteen days after him. His wife died in her forty-ninth year, only six months and ten days after him.

While the pastor at Northampton, President Edwards published the following works: God glorified in Man's Dependence, 1731; A Divine and Supernatural Light Imparted to the Soul by the Spirit of God, 1734 (a sermon noted for its spiritual philosophy; the hearers of it at Northampton requested it for the press); Curse ye Meroz, 1735; A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God in the Conversion of many Hundred Souls in Northampton, etc., London, 1736; Five Discourses prefixed to the American Edition of this Narrative, 1738; Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God, 1741 (one of his most terrific sermons; frequently republished; severely criticized without regard to the character and condition of the persons to whom it was preached); Sorrows of the Bereaved spread before Jesus, 1741; Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the True Spirit, 1741; Thoughts on the Revival in New England, etc., 1742; The Watchman's Duty and Account, 1743; The True Excellency of a Gospel Minister, 1744; A Treatise concerning Religious Affections, 1748 (one of his most spiritual and analytical works; "it will no doubt always be considered as one of the most important guards against a spurious religion"); An Humble Attempt to promote Explicit Agreement and Visible Union among God's People in Extraordinary Prayer, 1749; True Saints when Absent from the Body Present with the Lord, 1747; God's Awful Judgments in breaking the Strong Rods of the Community, 1748; Life and Diary of the Rev. David Brainerd, 1749 (a volume which exerted a decisive influence on Henry Martyn, and has affected the missionary spirit of the English as well as American churches; Brainerd was a beloved pupil of Edwards, and was engaged to be married to Edwards's second daughter, Jerusha); Christ the Example of Gospel Ministers, 1749; Qualifications for Full Communion in the Visible Church, 1749 (a treatise of great historical not less than theological importance); Farewell Sermon to the People of Northampton, 1750. After he had left his first pastorate, his more important works were published; some of them not until after his death: Misrepresentations Corrected, and Truth Vindicated, in a Reply to Mr. Solomon Williams's Book on Qualifications for Communion among God's People, 1752; True Grace distinguished from the Experience of Devils, 1752; An Essay on the Freedom of the Will, 1754 (Dr. Chalmers said that he recommended to his pupils this Treatise on the Will "more strenuously" than any other book of human composition;" and he added, it was "read by me forty-seven years ago, with a conviction that has never since faltered, and which has helped me, more than any other uninspired book, to find my way through all that might otherwise have proved baffling and transcendental and mysterious in the peculiarities of Calvinism"); The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin defended, etc., 1758; Eighteen Sermons annexed to Dr. Samuel Hopkins's Memoir of Edwards, 1761; History of Redemption, 1772; Dissertation concerning the End for which God created the World, and Dissertation concerning the New-Presbyterians, 1777; Remarks on Important Theological Controversies, 1798; A Defence and Illustration of the Protestant and Independent Church, 1809 (the last work of Edwards was published in 1790, under the editorial care of Dr. Samuel Austin, in 1809). A larger edition of his writings, in ten volumes, including a new Memoir and much new material, was published at New York, in 1853, and reprinted in 1885. Some of Edwards's writings were originally published, and many of them have been republished, in Great Britain. They have been collected in an English edition, and published by Messrs. Ogle & Murray, Edinburgh. The edition more commonly used in the United States at the present time is entitled The Works of President Edwards, in four volumes: a Reprint of the Worcester Edition, with Valuable Additions, and a Copious Index, New York.

The works of Edwards have received the highest encomiums from Dr. John Erskine, Dugald Stewart, Sir Henry Moncier, Dr. Priestley, Dr. George Hill, Isaac Taylor, and other British scholars. Robert Hall says, "I consider Jonathan Edwards the greatest of the sons of men. He ranks with the brightest luminaries of the Christian Church, not excluding any country or any age, since the apostolic." Sir James Mackintosh says of Edwards, "This remarkable man, the metaphysician of America... His power of subtle argument, perhaps unmatchted, certainly unsurpassed, among men, was joined, as in some of the ancient mystics, with a character which raised his piety to fervor." Robert Morehead says, "Edwards comes nearer Bishop Butler as a philosophical divine than any other theologian with whom we are acquainted."
the Indian. By these means I acquired the knowledge of that language, and a great facility in speaking it. It became more familiar to me than my mother-tongue. I knew the names of some things in Indian that I did not know in English. Even all my thoughts ran in Indian; and, though the true pronunciation of the language is extremely difficult to all but themselves, they acknowledged that I had acquired it perfectly as they said, had never been done before by any Anglo-American. On account of my skill in their language in general, I received from them many compliments applauding my superior wisdom. This skill in their language I have in a good measure retained to this day.

The elder Edwards, being himself a missionary to the Indians, intended that his son should be one also, and therefore sent him, in October, 1755, to a settlement of the Oneida Indians, on the banks of the Susquehanna, in order that he might learn their language. At this time the boy was not eleven years old. He was accompanied by his father's friend, Rev. Gideon Hawley, and resided about six months in the family of Mr. Hawley, the noted missionary to the Oneidas. The boy endeared himself to the Oneida tribe; and on one occasion, when they expected an attack from the French, the Indians took him upon their shoulders, and bore him many miles through the wilderness to a place of safety. The settlement of the Oneidas was about one hundred miles distant from any English settlement; but young Edwards exhibited a rare degree of courage, fortitude, and perseverance. He uttered no complaint, when, in the depth of winter, he was compelled to sleep on the ground in the open air. He returned to Stockbridge in 1756, and resided there until January, 1758, when his father removed to Princeton. In less than ten weeks after that removal the father died, and in less than seven months after the father's death the mother died; and thus in his fourteenth year young Edwards was left an orphan.

He entered the grammar-school at Princeton in February, 1760; was admitted to Princeton College in September, 1761, and was graduated there in September, 1765. He became a member of the church in 1760, studied theology with Dr. Joseph Bellamy in 1765-66, and was "approved" as a preacher, in October, 1766, by the Litchfield County Association in Connecticut. In his early childhood he had been afflicted with an ocular disease, and therefore did not learn to read at so early an age as his instincts prompted. His father's ecclesiastical troubles deprived him of certain facilities for his education; but his native power triumphed over all discouragements. He was indefatigably diligent while at college; was appointed a tutor there in 1767, remained in that office two years, and received an appointment (which, however, he declined) to a professorship of languages and logic in the college. On the 5th of January, 1769, he was ordained as pastor of an important church in New Haven, Conn. He remained in this office more than twenty-six years. Several members of his church were members of the "Great Awakening" in 1740-42, and by the de-
EDWARDS. 701

EGBERT.

West. Perhaps this volume is the fairest exponent yet given of President Edwards’s theory of the will.

Dr. Edwards published a large number of articles in the New York Theological Magazine, over the signatures “I” and “O.” He also published many sermons: one in 1783, at the ordination of Rev. Timothy Dwight, at Greenfield Conn.; one in 1791, on the Injustice and Impolicy of the Slave-trade (Dr. Edwards, like his friend Hopkins, was an early opponent of the slave system); one in 1793, on Human Depravity; one in 1792, at the ordination of Rev. Dan Bradley, at Hampden; one in 1792, at the ordination of Rev.
William Brown at Glastenbury; one in 1792 (Concio ad Clerum), preached in the chapel of Yale College, on the Marriage of a Deceased Wife’s Sister; one in 1793, on the Death of Roger Sherman; an Election Sermon, in 1794; a Sermon on the Future State of Existence, and the Immortality of the Soul, in 1797; and a Farewell Sermon to the people of Colebrook, in 1798. The most celebrated of his discourses are the three On the Injustice of the Slave-trade, and the Consistency with the necessity of the Atonement, and the 参股 in Forgiveness. They were reprinted by before his Excellency the Governor, and a large number of both Houses of the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, during their sessions at New Haven, in October, 1785, and published by request. They have been frequently republished; and they form the basis of that theory of the atonement which is sometimes called the “Edwardean theory,” and is now commonly adopted by what is termed the “New-England school of divines.” Closely connected with this volume was another, entitled The Salvation of all Men strictly examined, and the Endless Punishment of those who die impenitent, argued and defended against the Reasonings of Dr. Chauncey in his book entitled The Salvation of all Men.” This work was originally published in 1789, but has been frequently republished. It exhibits a singular acuteness of mind, a depth of penetration, and rare precision of thought and style. In 1798 he published a paper which established his fame as a philologist, and elicited the enthusiastic praises of Humboldt. This work is entitled Observations on the Language of the Muhhekaneew Indian, in which the Extent of that Language in North America is shown, its Genius grammatically traced, and some of its Peculiarities, and some Instances of Analogy between that and the Hebrew, are pointed out. These observations were “communicated to the Connecticut Society of Arts and Sciences, and published at the request of the Society.” One of the most accomplished of American linguists, Hon. John Pickering, who edited one edition of this paper, says of it, “The work has been for some time well known in Europe, where it has undoubtedly contributed to the diffusion of more just ideas than once prevailed respecting the structure of the Indian languages, and has served to correct some of the errors into which learned men had been led by placing too implicit confidence in the accounts of hasty travellers and blundering interpreters. In the Mithridates, that immortal monument of philological research, Professor Voigt refers to it for the information he has given upon the Moha-gan language, and he has published large extracts from it. To a perfect familiarity with the Muhhekaneew dialect, Dr. Edwards united a stock of grammatical and other learning which well qualified him for the task of reducing an unwritten language to the rules of grammar.”

Nearly all of Dr. Edwards’s published writings were collected and reprinted in two octavo volumes, each of above five hundred pages, in 1842. Rev. Tryon Edwards, D.D., edited them, and prefixed to them a Memoir.

Dissimilar as the two Edwardses were in some,
some were similar to each other in many respects.
Dr. Samuel Miller of Princeton says, “The son greatly resembled his venerable father in metaphysical acuteness, in ardent piety, and in the purest exemplariness of Christian deportment.”
The son, like the father, was a tutor in the college where he had been a student; was first ordained over a prominent church in the town where his maternal grandfather had been the pastor; was dismissed on account of his doctrinal opinions;
was afterwards the minister of a retired parish;
was then president of a college; and died at the age of about fifty-five years, soon after his inauguration. His Memoir states that both father and son preached, on the first Sabbath of the January preceding their death, from the text, “This year though shalt die.”

EDWARDS, Justin, D.D., b. in Westhampton, Mass., April 25, 1737; d. at Virginia Springs.
July 23, 1853. He was settled in the ministry at Andover, Mass., 1812–28; was one of the founders of the Tract Society at Boston, 1814; and in 1825, with fifteen others, founded the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance, of which he was, from 1829 to 1836, the efficient secretary. From 1837 to 1842 he was president of the seminary at Andover. In the latter year he became secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union. He was the author of numerous popular tracts, and a work upon The Sabbath.
For several years he was engaged upon a compendious Bible commentary, of which the New Testament was finished; and the first volume of the Old Testament was in the press of the American Tract Society, Boston, at the time of his death. See WILLIAM A. HALLOCK: Life and Lab-

EDZARD, Ezra, b. at Hamburg, June 28, 1629;
d. there Jan. 1, 1708; studied at Leipzig, Wittenberg, and Tubingen, and more especially at Bazel, under Buxtorf. On his return to Hamburg he declined to accept any office, and lived as a private teacher of Hebrew, and as a missionary among the Jews. In both respects he was very successful. His fame as a Hebrew scholar drew pupils to his school from all Germany. Most of his writings still remain in manuscript. See MOELLER: Cimbria literata, III, p. 221; GLEISS:
E. E. ein alter Judenfreund, Hamburg, 1871.—
His youngest son, Sebastian Edzard, b. at Hamburg, Aug. 1, 1673, d. there June 10, 1736, succceeded him as teacher and missionary, but became more noticeable as a polemist against the Reformed Church. Several of his books were publicly burnt at Berlin. See MOELLER: Cimbria literata, I, 147–151.

EFFECTUAL CALLING. See CALL.

EGBERT, St., b. in Northumbria [689]; d. at Hy [April 24], 729; was monk in the monastery of Rathmelsigi, and made, when smitten by the plague (684), the vow that, if he recovered, he would go to foreign countries to preach the gospel to the Pagans. He recovered, and immediately set out for Germany, but was by storm compelled to return, and settled in the monastery of Hy. Thence he sent out Wicbert and twelve others missionaries to Friesland, and contributed materially to stimulate the heathen savages; and the heathen savages; and the reading of old Nor EGEBERT, or ECOBERT, Archbishop of York, a pupil and friend of Bede, was first teacher in the cathedral school of York, and brought it into a flourishing condition by his talent and learning. Among his pupils were Alcuin and Albert. In 731 he was made Bishop of York; and in 735 York was made an archiepiscopal see, with metropolitan authority over all bishoprics north of the Humber. He continued, however, his activity as teacher in the school till his death, 767. Alcuin he appointed librarian of the library he founded, and also his successor as teacher. He left a collection of canonical prescriptions: De jure sacri dolatuli, of which, however, only fragments are still extant; Dialogus de eccl esiatric institutionis: De remedis pec catorum, probably an extract from the first-mentioned work made by another hand, — all to be found in Mansi, XII. The penitentials ascribed to him are not by him.

ERZOG.

EGEDE, Hans, the apostle of the Greenlanders, b. at Senjen, in the northern part of Norway, Jan. 31, 1686; d. at Stubbekjøbing in the Danish island of Falster, Nov. 5, 1758; studied theology in the University of Copenhagen, and was appointed pastor of Waagen, one of the Lofoten Islands, 1707. In the same year he married Gertrude Kaas. From his brother-in-law, a whaler from Bergen, he heard that the south-western part of Greenland was inhabited by heathen savages; and the reading of old Norwegian chronicles made him believe that these heathen savages were descendants of former Norwegian colonists. Greenland was, indeed, discovered by Pagan Norsemen from Iceland in the tenth century; and, the natives having been pushed towards the interior, a flourishing colony was founded on the south-western coast. Under Olaf the Saint, about 1000, Christianity was introduced in this colony. In 1055 an Itinerant bishop was established there by the archbishop of Bremen, and in 1125 a fixed episcopal see was founded by the Archbishop of Lund. Sixteen congregations, with their churches and several large monasteries, belonged to the diocese. But in 1348 the whole of Scandinavia was scourged by the “black death;” and so completely was the monastic life annihilated that all communication with the colony in Greenland immediately stopped. For half a century the colony strove along as best it could; but the natives took advantage of its insolation, and attacked it time after time. The last authentic report which reached Norway from it dates from 1410. In the seventh century the Hiberno-Scoto-Irish Church. In Hy he persuaded the monks to adopt the Roman calculation of Easter, and the Roman tonsure. See Beda: Hist. Eccl. Angl., III. 27, V. 10, 11, 23. ERZOG.

EGEBERT.
his death. His son, Paul Egede, remained in Greenland till 1740, wrote a Greenland grammar and dictionary, and translated the New Testament into Greenland. The Greenland mission was afterwards never abandoned by the Danish Government; and, though the zeal slackened somewhat during the rationalistic period (1790—1820), the Christian Church in Greenland is at present in a flourishing condition. There are no more heathen in the country.

LIT. — Besides the archives of the collegium de Cursu Evangelii Propagandi, in Copenhagen, Gronlands historiske Mindesmærker, Copenhagen, 1842-43. [One of Egede’s diaries has been translated into English: A Description of Greenland, 1745.] See also KALKAR: Die dänische Mission und die Kirche in Grønland, 1887; [H. M. FENGER: Bitrag til Hans Egedes og den Grønlandskes Missions Historie 1721-60 efter trykte og urtrykte Kilder, Copenhagen, 1879; É. BEAUVOS: Origines du plus ancien des missions du reve monde, le diocèse de Garda en Groenland 986—1126, Paris, 1879, 16 pp.].

EGINHARD, or EINHARD, b. in Francia about 770; d. at Seligenstadt, March 14, 844; was educated at the court of Charlemagne, a pupil of Alcuin; acted first as secretary to the emperor, and superintendent of public buildings at Aix-la-Chapelle, then as tutor to the children of Louis le Débonnaire, and retired finally to the monastery which he had founded at Seligenstadt, near Muhihelm, on the Rhine. He wrote a life of Charlemagne, which is invaluable for the general history of the age, and of great interest also to church history. He left seventy-one letters, and a minor essay, De adoranda cruce, which now is lost. His works have been edited by Teulet, Paris, 1840—43, and by Jaffé, in *Monumenta Caro-

EGLINUS, Raphael (Latin Iconius), b. at Rüssi-

cok, in the canton of Zürich, Dec. 28, 1559; d. at Marburg, Aug. 20, 1622; studied at Zürich, Geneva, and Basel; settled as a teacher at Sonders, in the Veltlin, in Lombardy, but was compelled, like all other Protestants, to leave the place in 1592; made professor of the New Testament in Zürich, 1592; and was called to Marburg in 1606 as professor of theology. He was an enthusiastic student of alchemy; and it was his reputed proficiency in that art which procured for him the call to Marburg. In other respects, too, he was inclined to a fanciful mysticism. He wrote, in defence of the Rosicrucians, Assertio fraternitatis R. C., 1618, and also Meerwundertische Prophezeiung, etc., 1611, in which, from the peculiar appearance of a herring caught in Norway in 1598, he believed himself able to discover the secrets of the future. He is of interest in church history, however, on account of the influence he exercised on the Hessian theologians: gradually bringing them over from the standpoint of Melanchthon to that of Calvin. His two principal theological works are, besides a number of disputations, theses, etc., Dizotien theol. de mortu"lillo Christi, Christianum mysterio, and Disput. theol. de sedere gratiae. A list of all his works is found in STRIDER: Hess. Gelehrten-Geschichte, III. pp. 301—318. HEPPE.

EG'LON (calf, calf-like). I. A king of the Moabites who made an alliance with the Ammon-ites and Amalekites, subjugated Israel, and kept them in bondage for eighteen years (Judg. iii. 14). He resided at Jericho, and was assassinated there by Ehud.

II. An Amorite town conquered by Joshua, and allotted to Judah (Josh. x. 3—5, xv. 39). Ruins of it were found ten miles north-east of Gaza, covering a hill, now called Ajlon, and situated among corn-fields and tobacco-plantations.

EGYPT, Ancient. NAME. — The name "Egypt" is used by Homer both of the country and of the river which has formed the country, the Nile. Some have derived it from a Semitic root, gyp; others, from a Sauscrat, apayta: but as it occurs only among the Greeks, among peoples connected with the Greeks, its Greek origin seems certain, though no root has been found for it in the Greek language. The native name was Kene, represented hieroglyphically with the ideographic character of the crocodile-tail. It means "black," both in the hieroglyphic inscriptions and in the Coptic language. Egypt was thus called "black country," not on account of the color of the skin of its inhabitants, for that was red and not black, but on account of the color of its soil; the floods of the Nile covering the bottom of the valley with a black mud, and thereby distinguishing the fertile fields from the surrounding deserts. Herodotus noticed that the soil of Egypt resembles neither that of Arabia nor that of Libya, but is black from the mud which the river carries down with it from Ethiopia. The native name has often been brought into connection with the Hebrew name Ham, the name of one of the sons of Noah, the progenitor of the Hamites. But the Hebrew root ham means "hot," and not "black;" though the Hebrew Ham, like the Greek Athiopos, was used as a general designation of the hot southern countries. The common Egyptian de-ignation of Egypt was Maur, or more frequently the dual form Mitrasyrum, from Matar, to enclose or to watch over. Originally this name was probably used only for the capital, that is, Memphis, just as, in our days, Cairo is called by the Arabs El Maor. The dual form referred to the division into Upper and Lower Egypt being not simply geographical or political, but historical, manifesting itself in the language, customs, and worship of the two peoples. The cuneiform inscriptions show that Maur was generally used in Asia as name for Egypt.

COUNTRY. — Egypt, in the narrower sense of the word, comprises only the Valley of the Nile from the first cataract to the Mediterranean, between 24° 6’ N. and 31° 36’ N. Lat. So far as the river runs along undivided, the average breadth of the valley is only about six miles, though occasionally it widens to about sixteen miles; but at 30° N. Lat. both the walls enclosing the valley retreat to the east and to the west, and the river divides into several arms, and forms the low fertile plain of the Delta. Surrounded on the north by the sea, and on all other sides by immense deserts, the long narrow strip of fertile and inhabited country forms an oasis, whose perfectly secluded position has exercised a decisive influence on the development of the Egyptian people. The two high walls enclosing the valley are often, but wrongly, described as two mountain ranges running parallel with the river. They are simply abrupt cleavages in the elevated stone plateau of the desert, through which the Nile has carved a deep furrow for its bed. Only at a distance of several days' journey to the east is the level surface of the desert broken by a mountain range, which runs parallel with the coast of the Red Sea, and of which several peaks rise about six thousand feet. This broad stretch of land between the Nile Valley and the Red Sea has always been considered a part of Egypt, as have also the oases in the western desert, so far as they can be reached from the Nile Valley. To the south the first cataract, formed between the Islands of Elephantine and Philae by a ledge of granite stretching east to west for many miles, and absolutely interrupting all navigation, has always formed a national and linguistic boundary, separating in old times Egypt from Ethiopia, as it now separates Egypt from Nubia. On the western boundary of the Delta lived the Libyan people; and near this frontier lay, in the Delta, the principal part of the country in the oldest times, as later on. To the east, Egypt communicated with Syria and Palestine by a route along the desert coast of the Mediterranean. The "River of Egypt," the present Wadi-el-Arish, which runs through the northern part of the Sinaitic peninsula, formed the boundary between Egypt and Palestine; and at its issue in the Mediterranean lay the Egyptian frontier fortress Pelusium. The climate is different in different parts. The Delta near the sea has the common coast-climate of the Mediterranean, and rain is not rare; while in the Thebaid not a cloud is seen on the sky all year round. The fertility of the country depends altogether on the floods of the Nile, whose regulation and utilization are and always have been of the utmost importance for the welfare of the people. In the southernmost part of Egypt the flood does not now reach the height of the banks any more; and there, as in Nubia, the water has to be raised by means of water-wheels. The annual rise of the Nile is caused by long protracted rains regularly occurring in the tropical highlands between $15^\circ$ and $16^\circ$ N. Lat. The flood reaches the first cataract in the middle of June, and the Delta at the end of June. The water rises during three months: at the end of the second month the dams are cut in Upper Egypt, a month later in Lower Egypt, and the waters are let in over the fields. At the end of September the waters retreat; in the course of October the ground becomes dry, and is sown; towards the close of March the harvest begins, the river decreasing all the while until June, when a new rotation begins. Egypt has thus only three seasons, each of four months,—the water-season, June—September; the gardening season, October—January; and the harvest-season, February—May.

Egypt was in antiquity famous for its great fertility. It was the granary of all the neighboring countries. Abraham and the sons of Jacob were attracted by its fertility (Gen. xii. 10, xiii. 1, xiii. 2). But, besides corn, also other kinds of food abounded. The children of Israel longed for the flesh-pots of Egypt (Exod. xvi. 3), and for its fish, cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic (Num. xi. 5). Pictorial representations of foreign animals, like the Egyptian richness in cattle, sheep, goats, swine, game, wine, figs, fruits, and vegetables of all kinds. In a tomb near the Pyramids of Memphis 835 cows, 220 calves, 700 asses, 974 sheep, and 2,235 goats are enumerated as belonging to the interred person. Among the animals growing in Egypt, especially in the papyrus and the lotus were especially noticeable: the former, however, is not found any more in Egypt. The date-palm, on the other hand, which now is of the greatest importance to the country, occurs very seldom, either in the hieroglyphic inscriptions, or in the pictorial representations on the monuments, and the camel not at all. The camel cannot have been entirely unknown to the ancient Egyptians, as it was much used by all neighboring peoples, especially in Palestine, for mercantile expeditions to Egypt (Gen. xxiv. 10, xxx. 43, xxxvii. 26): Pharaoh even presented camels to Abraham (Gen. xii. 16). The horse was also introduced from Asia. During the old empire, before the invasion of the Hyksos, it does not appear: it occurs for the first time during the new empire, in the reign of Thothmes III., in the sixteenth century B.C., in a representation of a procession of foreigners bringing as presents various Asiatic animals, among which are a couple of horses. Under the kings of the nineteenth dynasty great numbers of horses were used, though only to draw the chariots: the Old Testament, however, speaks also of cavalry (Gen. l. 9; Exod. xiv. 9, 20). The animal generally used for riding was the ass, which was kept in great numbers. Wild asses are still found in great herds in the highlands of Nubia. The Leviathan of Job xli. 1 is the crocodile: the Behemoth of Job xI. 15 is the rhinoceros. The country was also rich in minerals and in building-stones. Through the larger part of the country both the walls of the valley consist of limestone of a fine and firm quality. Beyond Thebes, in the neighborhood of El Cab, the sandstone begins, of which there are famous quarries at Silisileh. Granite and sienite of beautiful coloring occur in the cataracts. The parallel side-walls and various kinds of porphyry are found in the Arabian mountains. Gold occurs at Syene, emerald at Berenice. Copper-mines were worked from the oldest times in the Sinaitic peninsula.

History. — The fertility of the soil, the ease of life under a sky always gay, and in a warm, healthy climate, and especially the seclusion of the geographical position of the country, preventing all interference by unruly neighbors, were the natural advantages which made the Egyptians the first people on earth having a history. The historical sense, once awakened, found in the country exact and abundant materials for its gratification by erecting monuments; and in this respect the Egyptians have preceded and surpassed all other peoples. After further development, a want arose for correct annalistic reports of events requiring an exact chronology; and the monuments even of the first historical epoch. The old engravings in granite and sandstone, or on the edge of as 'onomatical periods based upon long and accurate observation of the stars. What we know chronologically of the first Egyptian
Before the invasion of the Hyksos, we owe to the work of Manetho (supreme pontiff at Heliopolis), which he wrote in Greek on the command of Ptolemy Philadelphus, drawing his materials from the annals and chronicles of the temple archives. Extracts of this work have come down to us through Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius; and the historical character of the statement that there ruled thirty dynasties in Egypt before the Greek rule began is proved by the deciphering of the hieroglyphics. Already Champollion reached back as far as the beginning of the new empire (the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries), and now also the first part of Manetho’s dynasties must be considered an indubitable historical fact. A great multitude of monuments, whose dates are ascertainable, present a nearly continuous series of kings as far back as the fourth dynasty; and we have the hieroglyphic names and annalistic reports as far back as Menes himself, the head of the first dynasty. There were originally two different views with respect to Manetho’s dynasties: one represented by Böckh, Munich, 1845; and the other by Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, Hamburg, 1845, and Lepsius, Chronologie der Ägypter, Berlin, 1848. Böckh holds that the thirty dynasties have succeeded each other, and places the first year of the reign of the first king (Menes) at 3572 B.C. Bunsen and Lepsius hold that several of these dynasties have been contemporary, and place the beginning of the Egyptian Empire, the former at 3643, the latter at 3892. The latter view is now generally adopted by Egyptologists.

The Egyptians, like all other peoples, assumed, that, before the human dynasties spoke of in the annals began, there had been a government by gods, and that in three dynasties: the first consisting of Ra, the sun-god, the family of Osiris, and the local god of the oldest royal residences, This, in Upper Egypt; the second of twelve gods, with the moon-god Tuthmosis at their head; and the third of thirty demigods. See Lepsius: Ueber den ersten ägyptischen Götterkreis, Berlin, 1849. Between the government by the gods and the first historical king (Menes) the Egyptians further placed a prehistoric dynasty of so-called Menes, whose residence was at This, the native city of Menes. Menes came from this, and settled in Lower Egypt, where he founded Memphis and the first historical dynasty. During the fourth dynasty the old empire reached its point of culmination. The two largest Pyramids—those of Cheops and Khafre—and the temples and chapels of the inscriptions were then built. From the tombs arranged around the royal Pyramids, partly hewn into the cliffs, and especially from the chambers destined for the worship of the dead, with their innumerable inscriptions and pictorial representations, we derive a surprisingly complete idea of the life which the Egyptians then led,—their arts and trades, their riches, customs, offices, honors, their worship of the gods and the dead, etc. More than three thousand years before Christ, while all the rest of the world is still mute, human speech becomes audible to us. At the same time as the fifth dynasty, the names of whose members we find in the tombs of Memphis, reigned in Lower Egypt, the sixth dynasty, descending from Elephantine on the Ethiopian frontier, reigned in Upper Egypt; and thus the Egyptians appear for the first time in Egyptian history. Under the following dynasties up to the eleventh the prosperity of the country decreased. The eleventh was the first Theban dynasty; and with it begin the power and fame of that city, hitherto unmentioned, and of its local god Ammon. Under the twelfth dynasty (the second in Thebes) the country again flourished. The grand character of the whole epoch is proved by the gigantic undertakings which were accomplished, as, for instance, the construction of the Joseph Canal. It carried the waters of the Nile into an artificial lake (Moris), and thereby transformed Fayum, by nature one of the poorest provinces of the country, into one of the most fertile. Amenemhe III., was a king of kings, who extended the empire to the present Semneh in Ethiopia, beyond the second cataract. He ordered the height of the annual flood to be measured, and denoted on the cliffs of the shore. The pyramid and temple which he built in Fayum afterwards became famous.

Shortly after the death of Amenemhe III. (about 2100 B.C.), the Hyksos, a warlike people, shepherds, coming from the East, invaded the country. Without opposition, they took possession of all Lower Egypt, captured Memphis, which they made their capital, laid tribute both upon Lower and Upper Egypt, and fortified the north-eastern entrance to the country, which they themselves had found open, but which they wanted to close against any other people likely to follow them, more especially against the Assyrians, who at that time were powerful in Asia. For five hundred and eleven years they reigned in Egypt. At last the native kings, who had kept independent in Upper Egypt and Ethiopia, succeeded, after long and stubborn resistance, in expelling them from their principal stronghold, Avaris, near the later Pelusium, and drove them into Syria. This first counter-movement from the south, against the stream of peoples which from Central Asia rushed onwards to the south and to the west, must have produced an effect so much the greater as it was followed by the brilliant victories and great conquests of the Pharaohs of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties, which extended the boundaries of the Egyptian Empire far into Asia. A people numbering hundreds of thousands, and, at least to some degree, conversant with the arts and sciences of Egypt, could not be compelled to change abode without causing a corresponding commotion among other peoples; and, indeed, all the historical or historico-mythical reminembrances of the nations of antiquity, especially so far as they concern immigration, colonization, introduction of divine worship, or knowledge of mythological genealogies, can be traced back to this epoch (fifth to sixteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C.), and no farther.

The expulsion of the Hyksos has often and very early been put in connection with the exodus of the children of Israel. The two events have even been declared identical. Josephus held this view. He gives no other proof, however, than that which he extracted from Manetho; and he does not notice that he is in complete contradiction to his source. An impartial examination of the statements of Manetho do not leave it in the least doubtful that the Egyptians themselves considered the two events as entirely different. According to Manetho, the expulsion of the Hyksos from Auaris took place under King Thummos or Tuthmosis (Tuthmoses) III.; while the Exodus of the Israelites—which by Egyptian historians is generally spoken of as the expulsion of a rebellious tribe under the leadership of a Helopholitan priest, Osarsiph, who afterwards called himself Moses—took place under a king who was the son of a Rameses and the father of a Sethos, and who consequently can be no other than the Menophtes, or Menephthes (Africanus reads Amenephte), of the list of Manetho, who was the son of Rameses II. and the father of Sethos II. (Josephus calls him sometimes Ammoniphis, and sometimes Menophis). As the two kings, Thothmos III., and Menophetes, denote the beginning and the close of the epoch of the greatest prosperity of Egypt, they are both perfectly well known to us through the monuments. The latter lived about two hundred and fifty years later than the former, and that period consequently separated the two events from each other.

With respect to Manetho's views of the two events there can be no difference of opinion. The date of the reign of King Menophetes can be ascertained from the fact that the last Sothis period, beginning 1322 B.C., and ending 139 A.D., was, according to the mathematician Theon of Alexandria, called the era of Menophetes, because it opened during his reign. The question now arises, How do the statements of the Old Testament correspond with those of the Egyptian historian? They are so far from contradicting each other, that, on the contrary, the Egyptian tradition would receive its most decided confirmation from the Hebrew documents, if we could presume a mistake in the latter's calculation of the period between the Exodus and the building of the temple, which, according to 1 Kings vi. 1, comprised four hundred and eighty years. But this figure does not harmonize with the figures in the Book of Judges, or with the reading of the Septuagint, or with the view of the author of Acts (xii. 20, or with the reading of the Septuagint, or with the reading of the Septuagint). Yet it does not harmonize with the figures in the Book of Judges, or with the reading of the Septuagint, or with the reading of the Septuagint, or with the reading of the Septuagint.

Of the three kings of the nineteenth dynasty whom we know best,—Sethos I., under whom Joseph arrived in Egypt; Rameses II., at whose court Moses was educated; and Menephtes, in whose reign the Exodus took place,—Rameses II. is by far the greatest; yet, we may say that under him the Egyptian Empire reached the culminating point of its power and fame. His successor, Menephtes, under whom Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt, and founded the Jewish theocracy, is by Herodotus (ii., 111) described as a weak but haughty man, smitten with blindness for ten years as a punishment of godlessness. "[He impiously hurled his spear into the overflowing waves of the river, which a sudden wind caused to rise to an extraordinary height.]"

Under the last kings of the nineteenth dynasty, and under the following dynasties, the empire gradually declined. Only the first king of the twentieth dynasty, Rameses III., is by the monuments pointed out as a ruler who made several successful campaigns into Asia. But at that time the Asiatic empires themselves began to rise in power and activity.

The next noticeable contact between Egyptian and Israelitic history took place during the twenty-second dynasty, about 970 B.C., when Shishak made war upon Rehoboam, the first king of Judah, and conquered Jerusalem (1 Kings xiv. 25); which event is also commemorated on the monuments of Memnon, the name of the city. From these monuments we know that this powerful Pharaoh dug many canals, and founded many cities, and, more especially, that he constructed the great canal in the province of Goshen, which afterwards was used to complete the communication between the Red Sea and the Nile, and at whose western termination Pithom (Pathmen, path of the sea) was situated, as a memorial of the Pharaoh's life. He and his successors, Shabatak and Taraka, the Tirhakah of the Old Testament (2 Kings xix. 9; Isa. xxxvii. 9), constitute, according to Manetho, the twenty-fifth dynasty. Tirhakah afterwards retired to the old Ethiopian residence on the mountain of Barkal, the Meroe of Herodotus, where he built several temples, the names upon whose ruins show that his dynasty still flourished there for a long time.

When the Ethiopians had gone, there followed a period of dissolution and confusion, described by Herodotus as the dodekarchy, but not mentioned by Manetho, who speaks only of the legitimate rulers. Finally, Ptolemy I. ascended the throne by the aid of Ionian and Carian mercenaries; and in reward he gave them large estates and great privileges, which no doubt was the reason why, during his reign, a large portion of the national warriors emigrated to Ethiopia. The Greek colony in the country increased rapidly. Amasis allowed them to build the city of Alexandria, which became an important commercial port. The gates of Egypt were opened to foreign commerce, and greater riches flowed into her lap than in the times of the victories of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties.

The number of cities is said to have increased under Amasis to twenty thousand; and private people were able to build for themselves rock tombs larger and more magnificent than the royal tombs of Bab-el-meluk. But the military strength of the country did not increase in a corresponding measure, and the empire finally succumbed before the power of Persia. From 525 to 504 Egypt was a Persian province; and though she once more enjoyed a short period of independence under the twenty-ninth and thirtieth dynasties, she was conquered a second time by the Persians in 406, and fell in 332 to Alexander the Great, who founded Alexandria, where he was buried (323).

During this period, Greek curiosity, still young and sound, took possession of all the accumulated wisdom and learning of the dying country as its legitimate inheritance; and Alexandria became the centre of Greek study. Immense libraries were formed; and every important work, not only of the Egyptian literature, but of all Oriental literatures, was translated into Greek. While this infiltration of the Oriental into the Greek civilization was still going on, Egypt finally lost its independence under Cleopatra VI. After the battle of Actium (30 B.C.), the country was incorporated with the Roman Empire. Already in the first century after Christ, Christianity was introduced into Egypt, and spread rapidly, though hieroglyphical inscriptions are found in the temples of Esneh dating from the middle of the third century; and the Isis-worship at Philae did not cease completely until the middle of the sixth century, under Justinian.

RECENT DISCOVERIES. — In the summer of 1881 there were discovered in a cave near Thebes thirty-nine royal mummies, besides papyrus rolls and other objects of interest and value. Among the mummies was that of Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression. It was in a perfect state of preservation, in a mummy-case of plain sycamore wood, unpainted and unvarnished, carved to represent Rameses as Osiris. The arms are crossed upon the breast. In his right hand he holds the royal whip, in the left the royal hook. The mummy itself is wrapped in rose-colored and yellow linen, figured with lotus-flowers, of a texture finer than the finest Indian muslin. One of the bands which pass across the shrouds to keep them in place bears a hieratic inscription statin:... that this (the mummy of Rameses II.) was concealed in a pit at a time when a foreign army invaded Egypt. In January, 1882, G. Maspero, the director of the Bulaq Museum, made his celebrated discovery of this region.

Another discovery in 1881 was that of a trilingual stele containing the decree of the synod of priests assembled at Canopus, ordaining the deification of Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Euergetes (q.v.), and creating a fifth order of priests, to be called Euergetes. This Ptolemy is supposed to have been prophetically described Dan. xi. 7, 8. He was one of Egypt's greatest rulers. The date of the decree is B.C. 238, and it is therefore a century older than the Rosetta Stone. The inscription upon the newly discovered tablet is the same as that upon the stone of Sân, discovered in 1865, but better preserved.

The year 1881 witnessed also the opening of the Pyramid of Maydooom, which is a century older than the Great Pyramid of Cheops, and probably is the tomb of Snefroo of the third dynasty, B.C. 4200 or 3766. Meanwhile, our knowledge is being increased through the correct decipherment of the demotic writing, which was a very much abbreviated form of the hieratic,—the usual style of penmanship employed by the priests. In the demotic the ordinary business and legal transactions of the Egyptians were recorded. From the numerous documents written in it which have been preserved, an insight will be given into the laws, social state, customs and manners, of the Egyptians, such as is not afforded by those in the monumental styles of the hieroglyphic and hieratic. But there is a growing conviction among Egyptologists, that the earliest Egyptian civilization we know of is the highest, and that all we know of it is its decadence.

Religion of Ancient Egypt.—The Egyptians were among the most religious of the ancient nations. It is true that the principal reason why most of the documents which have come down to us are of a religious character is that all the ancient monuments of Egypt have perished, except some which were necessarily of a religious nature,—the temples and the tombs. The palaces of kings and nobles have utterly disappeared. Our knowledge of Egyptian civil architecture is derived from paintings in the tombs. Many texts of historical interest have been preserved; but the original intention was not historical, but religious. Religion in some form or other was dominant in every relation of life in ancient Egypt. The Egyptian deities were literally innumerable. Every town and village had its local patrons. Every month of the year, every day of the month, every hour of the day and of the night, had its presiding divinity. All these gods had to be propitiated; and Egyptian life thus became a constant round of religious and semi-religious ceremonies and festivals which amazed the beholder into dumbness. When Herodotus visited Heliopolis in the middle of the fifth century B.C., the first remark he made of the people was that they were religious to excess. He said it was easier to find a god in Egypt than a man.

In order to reduce this bewildering multitude of gods, it was necessary to notice that special titles and names were given to divinities according to the place in which they were worshipped. Thus Osiris was called Che (“the child”) at Thebes, Ora (“the great one”) at Heliopolis, Oti (“the sovereign”) at Siwa, and Anch (“hathor”) at Memphis, and Nakht, at Memphis, and Nehebut at Hermopolis, with Bast. At Bubastis, with Sokhib at Elephantine, etc. Hence the explanation of the singular fact that Apis is called the son of Ptah, of Tut, of Osiris, and of Sokhib; that Horus is called the son of Isis and of Hathor; that Osiris is called the father, brother, husband, and son of Isis, and also the son of their child Horus; that Horus is said to have been born in Tattu, but also in Cheb, etc. What at first glance represents itself as different deities is in reality only different aspects of the same deity. That Egypt which Menes first gathered together under one sceptre was a country divided up into nomes. Each nome had its own capital, and each capital had its own gods with their special names. It is only the names which are different: the doctrines are the same. It is evident that Mentu and Tut, two of the great gods of Thebes, are merely individual or local aspects of the sun-god Ra; and so are Ptah and Amon: indeed, the whole swarm of gods of the first order is easily reduced to two groups; the first representing the sun-god Ra and his family, and the second, Osiris and his family. Ra is not only the name of the sun-god, but also the word commonly used to denote the sun itself. In other mythologies the sun-god generally rides across the sky in a chariot drawn by horses: in Egypt he sails in a boat. The sky is conceived as an expanse of water, to which the Nile forms the earthly counterpart. The adversary of Ra is Apap, and the conflict between them is that between light and darkness. Osiris is the eldest son of Seb (“the earth”) and Nut (“the sky”), but more powerful than his parents. He wedded his sister Isis whilst they were yet in their mother’s womb, and their son was Horus. Osiris’ adversary is Set, who shall slay him; but he shall be avenged by Horus. Osiris means the same as Ra, only his myth is more elaborate and wilder in its features. Already in antiquity it was the subject of much subtle meditation and many fanciful interpretations. Modern mythologists do not find it difficult,—either with this particular myth, or with the whole Egyptian mythology—to go behind the wild, gaudy, coarse, and often ridiculous polytheism, which was the religion of the multitude, to the subtle, mystical, often sublime monotheism, which was the heart and conscience of the educated classes.

Egyptian religion, considered not as a mythological system, but in its bearing upon morals and practical life in general, presents two very remarkable features,—its worship of the dead, and its worship of sacred animals. In Egyptian life the tomb played a much more prominent part than in the temple. The temple was exactly a place of worship in our sense of the word; it was principally and essentially an offering made by the king to some god: but the tomb was the centre of all family worship. The greatest importance was attached to the permanence of the tomb, to the continuance of the religious ceremonies, and even to the prayers of passers-by. We constantly find men praised for having made the names of their father and mother, or of their "fathers," live again. Ancestor-worship, however, even though it may not be the first origin of all religion, is a part of human nature itself, commands respect, even when it presents itself under very curious forms, and will continue under some refined form as long as human nature keeps whole and sound. But animal worship is always a strange phenomenon, and it became especially so in Egypt on account of the grotesque forms under which it presented itself. Some kinds of animals were held sacred universally, others received only a local veneration. To the first class belonged the cat, sacred to Bast or Sekhret; the ibis and the cynocephalous ape, sacred to Thoth; the hawk and the beetle, sacred to Rs, etc. None of these animals were allowed to be killed or injured. In each locality where any kind of animal was sacred, some individuals of the species were attached to the principal temple, where they had their special shrines or chambers, and their train of priestly attendants cleaned them. When they died, they were embalmed according to the most approved method, and entombed with much pomp and ceremony. The origin of this animal-worship may have been natural enough, starting from the idea of transmission; but its continuance down to the third century of our era exposed the Egyptians to the laughter and contempt of the rest of the civilized world. The Greek comedy-writers of the middle and of the last school, and the Christian fathers, as, for instance, Clemens Alexandrinus and Origens, agree in their feelings on this point. See P. Le Page Renouf: Religion of Ancient Egypt (the Hibbert Lectures for 1879), New York, 1880, from which these last paragraphs have been chiefly drawn.

RELATIONS OF EGYPT AND THE BIBLE. — With Abraham the mention of Egypt in the Bible begins, and is, as always, minutely accurate (Gen. xii. 10—xiii. 3). The plenty in Egypt that in time of famine was the attraction, for the overflowing of the Nile has always blessed that land. Sarah was unveiled (xii. 11), for at that time women upon the monuments always appear so. No mention is made of horses (xii. 16, xiii. 2) in the caravans which accompanied him thither, nor among his presents when he went away, for none are portrayed until Thothmes III., neither are camels; but bones of dromedaries were dug up in the tombs of the last school, and of the first, as, for instance, Clemens Alexandrinus and Oriens. The wine-drinking habits of the country (xxxvii. 36) to Potiphar ("consecrated to the god Phra, i.e., the sun") the captain of the guard, which had its headquarters in a famous fortress, known to the Romans as the "White Castle," at Memphis. A papyrus of the period states the daily quantum of bread supplied to the fortress (xxxix. 5, 6). The wives of the Egyptian nobles were admitted to approach (xxxix. 7—17; cf. The Two Brothers). The very prison where Joseph was confined is copied upon an existing mosaic found in a Roman house at Preneste (see woodcut in Geikie's Hours with the Bible, vol. i. p. 461). The wine-drinking habits of the country (xi. 1) are illustrated by the tombs of Beni Hasan, built long before Abraham. The importance of dreams was universally granted in antiquity; but Joseph dared a good deal in invading priestly prerogatives in interpreting those of his fellow-prisoners (xli.). His sudden call to the presence of the Pharaoh (a Hyksos), Apepi, according to Brugsch, cleanly dressed and closely shaven (xli. 14), as custom demanded, and his sudden promotion (xlii. 41), are thoroughly Egyptian. So, too, are the insignia of his rank, the new name, and the mode of his public reception (xlii. 42, 43). By his marriage with Asenath ("devoted to the goddess Neith"), the priestess at the great university temple of the Sun at On, near Memphis, he was incorporated into the priesthood, and therefore into the highest class of the land. The "divining bowl," which comes up in the subsequent narrative (xliiv.), is a proof how a man's environment saps his faith. Brugsch finds an allusion to the seven years of famine in an inscription at El-kab from the age of Joseph: "I gathered grain, a friend of the god of harvest; I was watchful at the seed-time, and, when a famine arose through many years, I distributed the grain through the town in every famine." The land of Goshen, where Joseph settled his family (Gen. xlvii. 4), was admirably adapted for the purpose. It lay on the north-east of the Delta, toward the Isthmus of Suez, and was isolated from the native Egyptians in the Valley of the Nile, who held in abhorrence all shepherds (xlii. 34). Goshen was famous for its fertility; and, being especially fitted for tillage, the Israelites there were providentially led to change from a pastoral to an agricultural people. To the south were Memphis, the ancient capital, and On, the seat of a great university. In direct contact with Egyptian pomp, at a period when the nation was at its height, the Israelites lived unmolested for four hundred years. The Pharaoh who welcomed them was a Hyksos king; but after a struggle of a hundred and fifty years the Hyksos were driven out, and a native dynasty once more reigned. Then began oppression. They were set to building and beautifying cities (Exod. i. 11). The outrages to which the modern fellahin in Egypt are subjected give an idea of the sore trials of the chosen people. But "at evening time it shall be light," and to the weary Israelites day was about to dawn; for in one of their most pious families, to judge by the names of his parents, — Amram ("kindred of the Lofty One") and Jochebed ("my glory is Jehovah") (vi. 20), — Moses, their future savior, was born (ii. 2). By the instrumentality of his brother, as Josephus calls him, who found him (one of the wives of Rameses II., as a contemporary document proves), he was taught all the learning of the Egyptians. But his mother was... his first teacher, and from her he received his religion. His killing of an officer was the cause of his flight, rendered all the more imperative because he had buried the body in the sand (ii. 12), and thus prevented its embalming, without which, according to Egyptian belief, the dead man's soul could not live.

When Moses returned, Menephta, the thirteenth son of Rameses, was on the throne. The thousand horsemen, and took all the walled towns because he had buried the body in the sand.

... demonstrated that a greater than any god in their divinity;

... 'he destruction of the first-born god of the Nile, the sacred river; ... Hold, the idolatry of Egypt. By them, in order, the following gods were mocked: ...' (3) and (4) e fly gods;

... Osiris, the great god of the Nile, the sacred river; ... (5) The sacred ram worshiped at Thebes, and ... (6) "Human sacrifices of foreigners were offered yearly, and the sacred ox at Memphis an On; (7) The multitude of divinities who had charge of the air; (8) The sun, the chief Egyptian divinity; (10) The destruction of the first-born put the whole religion to shame; for it demonstrated that a greater than any god in their pantheon had the Egyptians in his power, and favored unmistakably the despised Israelites. For a discussion of the exodus, see Exodus of the Children of Israel.

The references to Egypt after the exodus are few and incidental, although several Pharaohs are named. Sheshonk, or Shishak, in the ninth year of Rehoboam (909 B.C.) came up against Jerusalem with twelve hundred chariots and sixty thousand horsemen, and took all the walled towns of Judah (2 Chron. xii.). Upon the south wall of the Temple of Karnak is inscribed, among the conquered kings, "Yuthmalik: " probably Rehoboam is meant. Osarchon, or Zerah, the Ethiopian who was expelled by Asa 940 B.C. (2 Chron. xiv. 9), is inscribed on the same temple. In 1878 an inscription of Tiribak (2 Kings xix. 9), contemporary of Izezekiah (700 B.C.), who defeated Sennacherib, was discovered at Tanis (the Bible Zano). Pharaoh-Hophra is mentioned in Jer. xlv. 30. A recently deciphered cuneiform inscription proves that Jeremiah's prophecy was fulfilled in the thirty-seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar. Pharaoh-Nechoh (2 Kings xxiii. 29) is sculptured at Thebes. See Hengstenberg: Egypt and the Books of Moses, Eng. trans., Edin., 1847; Ebers: Agypten u. d. Bücher Moses, Leipzig, vol. i. 1889; Vigouroux: Le Bible et les découvertes modernes en Égypte et en Assyrie, Paris, 1877; Schaff: Through Bible Lands, N.Y., 1879; S. C. Bartlett: Egypt to Palestine, N.Y., 1879; C. Geikie: Hours with the Bible, London and N.Y., 1881 sqq.

Christianity in Egypt dates, according to tradition, from St. Mark the evangelist, who is said to have founded two churches in Alexandria. This became afterwards a metropolitan and even a patriarchal see. In the second century, Alexandria (see art.) was the seat of a theological school where the great Origen taught. It flourished for two centuries, and trained some of the most distinguished divines of the Greek Church. Nevertheless, Christianity spread, and over a thousand communicants. In Cairo and Osiout the mission has acquired valuable property, and in the latter place has even a college and theological seminary for training a native clergy.

Miss M. L. Whately, a daughter of the late Archbishop of Dublin, has for the past twenty years conducted a school in Cairo for the training of Arab youth. It is unsectarian, but strongly Christian, and spreads Bible truth into households which otherwise would be wholly inaccessible. There are also a few English and German churches in Alexandria and Cairo for the foreign population there.

The Roman-Catholic Church has also a hold in Egypt; and there is a sect, called the United Copts, which acknowledge the papal supremacy.
EICHHORN, Johann Gottfried, b. at Düren, in the principality of Hohenlohe-Oehringen, Oct. 16, 1752; d. at Göttingen, June 27, 1827; studied at Göttingen, and was appointed professor of Oriental languages and literatures at Jena in 1775, and professor of theology at Göttingen. To his Jena residence belong Gesch. d. ostindischen Handels vor Mohammed (Gotha, 1775), Monumenta antiquissima historia Arabum (Gotha, 1775), De rei numмарiae apud Arabes initia (Jena, 1776), Der Naturmensch, a translation of an Arab romance (Berlin, 1783), a great number of historical and critical essays in his Repertorium für biblische und morgenländische Litteratur (18 vols., 1777–86), which from 1787 to 1803 was followed by his Allgemeine Bibliothek der bblischen Litteratur (10 vols.), and finally his Einleitung in's Alte Testament (Leipzig, 1780–83, 3 vols.), a work written with great boldness and enthusiasm, and published by its times as a new departure in theological science. To his Göttingen residence belong his Einleitung in d. apokryphischen Bücher des A. T. (1785: Krüßische Schriften, I.–IV.), Einleitung in d. N. T. (1804–12: Krüßische Schriften, V.–VII.), Die Propheten (3 vols., 1816–19), a number of voluminous works on history, Weltgeschichte (5 vols., 1801–14), Gesch. d. drei letzten Jahrhunderte (1803, 1804), Gesch. d. Litteratur von ihr Anfänge bis auf d. neuesten Zeiten (5 vols., 1805), etc., besides a multitude of minor essays and reviews. When it is remembered that during fifty-two years he lectured every day three hours in the university, his activity is simply amazing. His historical writings have now fallen into oblivion; but his works on biblical criticism, though their rationalistic tendency has been completely overthrown, are still acknowledged to contain many happy views and profound investigations. See H. EWALD: Jahr bücher d. bibl. Wissenschaft, 1, 1849, Die ehemaligen Götting. Lehrer, J. D. Michaelis, J. G. Eichhorn, Th. Chr. Tychsen.

EICHHORN, Karl Friedrich, son of J. G. Eichhorn; b. at Jena, Nov. 20, 1781; d. at Berlin, July 5, 1854; studied law at Göttingen, Wetzlar, and Vienna; and was appointed professor of law at Francfort-on-the-Oder in 1805, at Berlin in 1811, at Göttingen in 1817, and again at Berlin in 1832. His Grundzüge d. Kirchenrechts d. kathol. u. d. evangel. Religionspartei in Deutschland, 1831–38, one of his best works, and the first attempt to apply the principles of the so-called historical school to ecclesiastical law. See HUGO LÖRSCH: Briefe von K. F. Eichhorn, Bonn, 1881.

EINHARD. See EINHARD.

EINSIEDELN, or MARIA–EINSIEDELN, a Benedictine monastery in Switzerland, and a famous place of pilgrimage. In the first half of the ninth century Meginrad, or Meinrad, from Sulichgau, in the Neckar region, settled on the top of the Ezel, a cliff on the southern shore of the Lake of Zürich, whence he afterwards penetrated far into the Alpine regions, until in 861 he was murdered by robbers in his cell. In the beginning of the tenth century Benno and Eberhard from Strassburg came to the spot where St. Meinrad had been murdered; and there they founded a monastery, which was splendidly endowed by Otho I. and Otho II., and prospered much. It never attained, however, the celebrity of the neighboring St. Gall; and when the Reformation began, it became almost completely deserted. Abbot Joachim Eichhorn (1544–89) retrieved its good fortune, and made it a stronghold for the counter-Reformation. The French invasion of 1798 it also outlived; and when, in 1861, it celebrated the six hundredth anniversary, it numbered about a hundred inmates, and was visited by about a hundred and fifty thousand pilgrims. The object of the pilgrimage is a visit to the black image of the Virgin, preserved in a separate chapel; and the origin of a special devotion in this chapel is, according to the legend, the circumstance that on Sept. 14, 948, Mary herself and the angels came down from heaven, and consecrated the chapel. Materials for the history of the institution are found in Documenta Archivii Einsiedleniensis, published in 3 vols. fol. in the seventeenth century, under Abbot Placidus Heymann; and a new departure in theological science. To his Jena residence belong his Einleitung in's Alte Testament (Leipzig, 1780–83, 3 vols.), a work written with great boldness and enthusiasm, and published by its times as a new departure in theological science. To his Göttingen residence belong his Einleitung in d. apokryphischen Bücher des A. T. (1785: Krüßische Schriften, I.–IV.), Einleitung in d. N. T. (1804–12: Krüßische Schriften, V.–VII.), Die Propheten (3 vols., 1816–19), a number of voluminous works on history, Weltgeschichte (5 vols., 1801–14), Gesch. d. drei letzten Jahrhunderte (1803, 1804), Gesch. d. Litteratur von ihr Anfänge bis auf d. neuesten Zeiten (5 vols., 1805), etc., besides a multitude of minor essays and reviews. When it is remembered that during fifty-two years he lectured every day three hours in the university, his activity is simply amazing. His historical writings have now fallen into oblivion; but his works on biblical criticism, though their rationalistic tendency has been completely overthrown, are still acknowledged to contain many happy views and profound investigations. See H. EWALD: Jahr bücher d. bibl. Wissenschaft, 1, 1849, Die ehemaligen Götting. Lehrer, J. D. Michaelis, J. G. Eichhorn, Th. Chr. Tychsen.

EINHARD. See EINHARD.

EKKEHARD. The name of several monks of literary fame, of the Monastery of St. Gall. — Ekkehard the First, d. 973; was educated there; became director of the cloister-school, and dean of the convent, and made the place a centre of learning and study. He wrote hymns, and a Latin poem on the life and deeds of Walter of Aquitania, last ed. by R. Peiper, Berlin, 1873. — Ekkehard the Second (surnamed Palatinus), d. April 23, 990; was a nephew of the preceding, and educated by him; taught for some time in the school of St. Gall, but was by the Duchess Hedwig of Slesvia invited to Hohenwiel, where he taught the duchess Latin and Greek. He was afterwards drawn to the imperial court as one of the chaplains of Otho II., and was finally made provost of the Cathedral of Mayence. — Ekkehard the Third was a cousin of the preceding, and accompanied him to Hohenwiel as teacher of the young clerks at the court of the duchess.
He afterwards returned to St. Gall, and died, as dean of the convent, in the beginning of the eleventh century. — Ekkehard the Fourth (Ekkehardus junior), b. about 960; d. about 1060; was educated at St. Gall by the celebrated Notker Laeto, and became early a master in Latin, Greek, mathematics, astronomy, and music. In 1022 he was invited to Mayence by Archbishop Aribo as director of the cathedral school; but in 1024 he returned to St. Gall. He continued the Chronicle of St. Gall, Carus Monasterii Sancti Galli (Monum. Germ. Hist. Script., II. pp. 74–163), commenced by Ratpertus. He made a collection of hymns (Liber Benedictinum), wrote a poem (De ornatu dictitionem), and translated into Latin the Life of St. Gall, written in German by Ratpertus. — Ekkehard the Fifth (sumamed Minimus) lived in the beginning of the twelfth century, and wrote a Vita Sancti Notkeri, of no great interest. — See Meyer von Knonau: Die Ekkhearte von St. Gallen, Basel, 1876. ALBRECHT VOELK.

ELAGABALUS. See HELIOGABALUS.

ELAM (highland), the classical Elamites, was the home of a conquering people, on the other side of the Tigris, bounded north by Assyria and media, east by Media and Persia, and south by the Persian Gulf. Its capital was Susa. According to Gen. x. 22 this land was inhabited by descendants of Sem, and called after his son Elam. But from the circumstance that the Hebrews called the land Elam, and the Assyrian inscriptions Ilam, or llamti, it cannot be inferred that the people itself also used the name: on the contrary, the Elamites named themselves after their principal cities,—Kis, whence the Greek Cissixe; Uwaya, whence the Greek Uxias, etc. When the Semites settled in Elam, they found there, as in Babylonia, a primitive non-Semitic population; but while, in Babylonia, the Semites gained the ascendency over, in Elam they were absorbed by, that population, as is proved by the circumstance that the language of the inscription found in Elam does not belong to the Semitic, but to the Altai-Turanian stock. In the time of Abram the Elamites were quite a powerful nation (Gen. xiv. 9). By the Assyrians, however, they were conquered; and they followed Sennacherib's army when he invaded Judaea (Isa. xxi. 6). Afterwards they once more became independent; and Jeremiah mentions them among those nations upon which the wrath of God was about to descend (Jer. xxii. 34–39). The doom came with Nebuchadnezzar. After the fall of Babylon they were incorporated with the Persian, then with the Syro-Macedonian, and finally with the Parthian Empire. A remarkable confirmation of the Scripture is a record of the Assyrian Assur-bani-pal (B.C. 668–629), recently deciphered: "In my fifth expedition to Elam I directed the march... I overwhelmed Elam through its extent, I cut off the head of Tumman, their viceroy, I destroyed evil. Beyond a castle I slew my soldiers; alive in hand I captured his fighting men" (Records of the Past, vol. I. p. 71).

ELATH, or ELOTH (strong trees), a seaport at the northern extremity of the eastern arm of the Red Sea, the Gulf of Akabah, belonging to the Edomites, and the seat of a bishop, received its name, "Free City," from Alexander Severus (203), and was a place of importance in the days of Eusebius and Jerome. In 796 it was razed to the ground by the Saracens, and its Greek name was replaced by the Persian Alath. In the eleventh century the crusaders built a fortress on their exodus from Egypt; and David conquered it (Deut. ii. 8; 2 Sam. viii. 14). From it and Ezion-geber Solomon sent his ships to Ophir (1 Kings ix. 26, 28). But after his death it was retaken by the Edomites (2 Kings viii. 20), and was only for a short time in the possession of Israel, during the reign of Uzziah (2 Kings xiv. 22; 2 Chron. xxvi. 2). Under the Romans it was still an important mercantile place, the station of a legion, and the seat of a bishop, present at various councils between 320 and 630. Under the Mohammedans it lost its trade. Various ineffectual attempts were made by the crusaders and the kings of Jerusalem to regain it. About 1300, at the time of Alphedda, it had been completely deserted. The present town of Aka-bah consists only of some scattered huts, and an old fortress with towers, occupied by some Turkish troops. It forms the tenth station on the pilgrims' route from Cairo.

ELCSAIITES. See ELKESAIITES.

ELDER. See PRESBYTER.

ELDERS AMONG THE HEBREWS were not necessarily the first-born of the several chief families in each tribe, just as to-day the Arab sheik claims authority by reason of priority of birth. The same phenomenon was true respecting the Midianites and other neighboring tribes (Num. xxi. 4, 7; Josh. ix. 11). There must have been hundreds of them in Israel when Moses chose the "seventy" to be the National Council. It is not stated that this number was composed of one from each of the fifty-eight families (Num. xxvi.), and one from each tribal chief family; and indeed the phraseology is against this idea (Deut. i. 15). The elders were sometimes judges, but not necessarily, for David put priests and Levites in this office; and in Deut. xxii. 6, the elders are expressly distinguished from judges. After the settlement in Canaan the elders constituted the governing body in every village, town, and city (Ruth iv. 2 sqq.), and the medium of business with another place every village, town, and city (Ruth iv. 2 sqq.), and the medium of business with another place (Deut. xii. 10). It was the elders who demanded a king in the people's name (1 Sam. viii. 4 sqq.), and who chose him (2 Sam. iii. 17): they were also the natural companions and advisers of the king (1 Kings viii. 1; 2 Kings xxii. 1), and the best agents of the inquisitor in promoting a revival of religion (Jer. xix. 1). In the exile the elders kept up their authority; and on the return they sided with the priests, and next to the princes were the rulers (Ez. x. 8, 14, 15). The great synagogue, according to tradition, was composed of priestly and civil elders. In our Lord's mouth the elders are the channel of tradition (Matt. xv. 2; Mark vii. 8, 5), which bound like fetters the pious Jews. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

ELECT, ELECTION. See PREDESTINATION.

ELEMENTS, the materials used in the sacraments: water in baptism, bread and wine in the Lord's Supper. See BAPTISM, LORD'S SUPPER.

ELLEPHANT, ELEPHANTINE. See ELEPHANTINE ISLANDS.

ELLEUHEROPOLIS. See ELEUTHEROPOLIS.

ELMOTH, or ELOTH (strong trees), a seaport at the northern extremity of the eastern arm of the Red Sea, the Gulf of Akabah, belonging to the Edomites, and the seat of a bishop, received its name, "Free City," from Alexander Severus (203), and was a place of importance in the days of Eusebius and Jerome. In 796 it was razed to the ground by the Saracens, and its Greek name was replaced by the Persian EIATH. In the eleventh century the crusaders built a fortress on the spot, which was taken by Saladin, and retaken by Richard. At present the site is occupied by an insignificant village (Beit Jibrin), and covered with ruins. See Robinson: Biblical Researches, New York, 1841.

ELEUTHERUS, a river of Syria, mentioned in Matt. xi. 7, xii. 30, the modern Na'af el-Kebir, rises at the north-eastern base of the Lebanon, and enters the Mediterranean about eighteen miles north of Tripolis.

ELEUTHERUS, Bishop of Rome 177-183; was a Greek by birth. Two events are noticed during his administration: first, the churches of Lyons and Vienne sent Cyprian (then a presbyter, afterwards bishop) to Rome to present to Eleutherus the acta martyrum from the persecutions from which the churches had just suffered (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., V. 4); next, the British king, Lucius, wrote to Eleutherus (according to Beda, Hist. Eccl., III. 43, 472) asking him that he was ready to accept Christianity as soon as Eleutherus would send him teachers. The latter notice is a little suspicious; as, towards the close of the sixth century, Augustine found in Britain a Christianity quite different from the Roman type, while Beda was naturally anxious to catch any hint at an early connection between Britain and Rome.

ELEVATION OF THE HOST. See Mass.

ELI ("eIli, "elevation"), a descendant of Ithamar, and high priest. The proof of the first statement is this: Abiaathar was a lineal descendant of Eli (1 Kings ii. 27; 1 Sam. ii. 31, 35), but his son Ahimelech is expressly stated to have been "of the sons of Ithamar" (1 Chron. xxiv. 3). The sins of his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, brought sorrow upon his head, and entailed the destruction of his house. Samuel disclosed to him these judgments (1 Sam. iii. 13, 14). He judged Israel forty years (1 Sam. iv. 18). At the news of the defeat of the Israelite army he fell backward and broke his neck. He had grown dim of sight, and was ninety-eight at the time of his death (1 Sam. vi. 1). He was born 1472 (probably Feb. 8), at Neustadt, and was in reward aided and lodged on the spot, which was taken by Saladin, and retaken by Richard. At present the site is occupied by an insignificant village (Beit Jibrin), and covered with ruins. See Robinson: Biblical Researches, New York, 1841.

ELIGIUS, b. at Châtelat, near Limoges, about 658; d. at Noyon, Nov. 30, 658 or 659; descended from a Gallo-Roman, not Frankish family, and was apprenticed to the goldsmith Abbo, at Limoges, the mint-master of the king of Aquitania. In 610 he went to Paris, the residence of the king of Neustria; got work in the royal treasury; acquired the particular favor of King Clotaire; and accumulated a fortune. Meanwhile, the influence of Columban reached the Neustrian court from Burgundy and Austrasia, and obtained absolute sway over Eligius and his young friend Audoenus, at that time page to the king. Without abandoning his trade, Eligius began an ascetic life; and he soon earned a great reputation, not only as an artist, but also for his piety. In 628 he went to the Neustrian court, though as assistant of Paul Fagius, who he established as assistant of Paul Fagius, who he established

ELIGIUS. ELIGIUS, b. at Châtelat, near Limoges, about 658; d. at Noyon, Nov. 30, 658 or 659; descended from a Gallo-Roman, not Frankish family, and was apprenticed to the goldsmith Abbo, at Limoges, the mint-master of the king of Aquitania. In 610 he went to Paris, the residence of the king of Neustria; got work in the royal treasury; acquired the particular favor of King Clotaire; and accumulated a fortune. Meanwhile, the influence of Columban reached the Neustrian court from Burgundy and Austrasia, and obtained absolute sway over Eligius and his young friend Audoenus, at that time page to the king. Without abandoning his trade, Eligius began an ascetic life; and he soon earned a great reputation, not only as an artist, but also for his piety. In 628 Clotaire died, and was succeeded by his son Dagobert; but this change only made the influence of Eligius stronger at the Neustrian court, though he was opposed by the Frankish chieftains and courtiers, headed by the major domus. Young Saxons were then brought to Paris, often in great numbers, and sold there as slaves. He bought them by the hundreds, and gave them freedom, either sending them home or making them monks. Monasteries and churches he founded, built, adorned, and supported in the most lavish manner. The Monastery of Solignac, near Limoges, was one of his foundations; the great nunnery in Paris, another. Even on the young priests, he is said to have exercised a decisive influence. But in 638 Dagobert died, and herculean, the major domus, who governed the realm during the minority of Clodwig II., wished to have Eligius removed from the court. In 640 he was made Bishop of Noyon, at the same time that his friend Audoenus was made Bishop of Rouen. As a bishop he was very austere and active, reforming not only the chapter of his cathedral and the monasteries of his dioceses, but also the courts of the Frankish chieftains, whose wild drinking-bouts and fighting-feasts were finally scanted to him. In the synod of Chalons (641) he effected the ELIJAH.

The exact spot is now probably determined. In a beautiful district the great prophet was born; and some ten miles east of the Jordan, and some six miles south-east of ancient Pella. The brook Cherith was probably in the same immediate neighborhood, though no relic of the name has yet been discovered.

We have no account of the early life of the prophet, nor is it certain at what time exactly his translation occurred. From the narrative in Kings it might be supposed to have occurred in the reign of Ahaziah, king of Israel (897-886 B.C.), the immediate successor of Ahab. But if the "writing" spoken of in 2 Chron. xxi. 12 was a personal letter from Elijah to Jeoram, king of Judah (892-885 B.C.), Elisha must have commenced his public ministry before his master's translation. At all events, the public ministry of the Tishbite in Israel ended with his rebuke of Ahaziah (897-896 B.C.); the great errand of his life having been to antagonize the idolatry of Ahab (891-877 B.C.).

The date of the death of Elijah in the narrative is surmised only by that of the exodus from Egypt. Ahab, seventh of the nineteen kings of Israel, a weak man, who had married the Phoenician Jezebel, gave himself up also to the Phoenician idolatry, and the true religion was in imminent danger of being rooted out. Suddenly the apostate king is confronted by a rough-looking man from beyond the Jordan, described as a hairy man wearing a leathern girdle and a sheepskin cape or mantle. It was Elijah the Tishbite, who had come as a prophet of Jehovah to tell the king there should be neither dew nor rain but according to his word. And then the prophet hastens back to Gilead. There, in the Wady Yabis, he feeds a widow till the brook dries up, and he is told to betake himself to the Phoenician Zarephath, where a widow-woman had been commanded to care for him, where he and the widow's family are fed miraculously, and the dead son of the widow is restored to life. Some years later, when drought and famine had become well-nigh intolerable, he meets Ahab again, calls down fire from heaven upon his altar on Carmel, and slays, with Ahab's consent, the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, redressing the Kishon with their blood. Then he prayed for rain; and then he ran before the chariot of the apparently repentant Ahab, sixteen miles across the plain of Edreelon, to the entrance of Jezreel. But the rage of Jezebel drives him to Beersheba, and into the desert south of it, where he sinks down discouraged, praying for death. Thence he goes to betake himself to the thracian Zarephath, which opens westward into the Jordan Valley. El-Istib (or Listib) is about twenty-two miles in an air line south of the Lake of Galilee, some ten miles east of the Jordan, and some six miles south-east of ancient Pella. The brook Cherith was probably in the same immediate neighborhood, though no relic of the name has yet been discovered.

We have no account of the early life of the prophet, nor is it certain at what time exactly his translation occurred. From the narrative in Kings it might be supposed to have occurred in the reign of Ahaziah, king of Israel (897-896 B.C.), the immediate successor of Ahab. But if when it is considered that the true religion was in such desperate straits. Elijah had been canonized in both the Greek and the Latin churches, the twentieth day of July being sacred to his memory. The literature of the subject is abundant. We mention only FRISCHMUTH, in the Critici Sacri; CAMARTUS: Elias Thebaitis, Paris, 1631; EWALD: Geschichte des Volkes Israel (III. 523 sqq., 573 sqq.); STANLEY: History of the Jewish Church (II. 321 sqq.); MILMAN: History of the Jews, i. 389 sqq.; F. W. Kummer: Elias der Thebaiter, Elberfeld, 1828, 6th ed., Cologne, 1874, translated and published in several editions in England and America, e.g., eighth thousand, Cheltenham (Eng.), 1838, N.Y. (American Tract Society), 1838; W. M. Taylor: Elijah the Prophet, 1875; also art. "Elia," by v. Orelli, in Herzog.

ELIM (strong trees), the second station of Israel after crossing the Red Sea (Exod. xv. 27; Num. xxxiii. 9). As the place had twelve springs and seventy palm-trees, and no alteration is likely to have taken place in the desert since that time, Elim is with most probability identified with Wady Qharandel; though by some it is placed a little more to the south, at Wady Usit, or Wady Taiyibeh. See SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, pp. 152, 164.

ELIOT, John, "The Apostle to the Indians" (1604-90), was a native of Nasing, Essex County, Eng. Of his childhood and youth but little is known, except that he was blessed with eminently godly parents, by whom, to use his own language, his "first years were seasoned with the fear of God, the Word, and prayer." He was educated at the University of Cambridge, where his superior attainments, especially in the knowledge of the Hebrew and Greek languages, marked him out already for the great work to which in the New World his life was to be consecrated. Upon leaving the university, he became an usher in the grammar-school of the Rev. Thomas Hooker, at Little Baddow, near Chelmsford in Essex. Mr. Hooker had been silenced for nonconformity. He afterwards emigrated to New England, and is known in history as the father of the Connecticut churches. Eliot's connection with this admirable man formed a turning-point in his spiritual history. "When I came to this blessed family," said he, "I then saw, and never before, the power of godliness in its lively vigor and efficacy." He resolved to devote himself to the ministry of the gospel; and as his nonconformist principles exposed him to the tyranny of Laud, he sought the shores of America, arriving at Boston in 1631. In November, 1632, he was settled as teacher of the church of Christ in Roxbury, and continued in that office until his death,—a period of nearly sixty years. He married also in the same year. In 1639 he was appointed, with his colleague Mr. Welde, and Richard Mather of Dorchester, to make a new version of the Psalms; and the result was printed in the following year, and was called The Bay Psalm Book, but is now best known as The New-England Version of the Psalms. It was the first book printed in North America.

Soon after his settlement at Roxbury, Eliot became deeply interested in the Indians, and at length resolved to preach the gospel to them. There were some twenty tribes within the limits of the Colonies, but they spoke substantially the same language. Having acquired a competent knowledge of it, he met for the first time an assembly of Indians at Nonantum, in the present town of Newton, Oct. 28, 1646, and opened to them the way of salvation. He thus entered upon that career of missionary zeal and labors which has rendered his name so illustrious throughout Christendom. He was violently opposed by the sachems and powwows, or juggling priests; but, nothing daunted, he prosecuted his mission with apostolic energy until villages of praying Indians began to appear in different parts of the Colony. In 1660, at Natick, the first Indian church was organized. Eliot tried also, though with only partial success, to civilize as well as convert the Indians. In process of time he came to be regarded by them as their best friend. His influence over them was extraordinary; and he exerted it for their good, in things temporal and spiritual alike, with rare wisdom and sagacity. The story of his missionary tours among the different tribes is full of interest. In 1691 he had the joy of publishing the New Testament in the Indian language, and three years later the whole Bible. Richard Baxter said of a copy of it sent to Charles II., "Such a work and fruit of a plantation was never before presented unto a king." Of this Bible Cotton Mather wrote: "Behold, ye Americans, the greatest honor that ever ye were partakers of,—the Bible printed here at our Cambridge; and it is the only Bible that ever was printed in all America, from the very foundation of the world." Eliot's Indian Bible is the grandest monument of early American scholarship and evangelism. The longest word in it is in Mark i. 40, Watapesittukquasunnohekwetunkquoh ("kneeling down to him"). Eliot also translated into the Indian tongue a catechism, Baxter's Call to the Unconverted, and various other treatises on practical religion, besides preparing an Indian grammar. At the end of the latter he wrote, "Prayer and pains, through faith in Christ Jesus, will do any thing." In his last years, when weighed down by bodily infirmities, and unable any longer to preach, or to visit the Indians, he induced several families to send their negro servants to him once a week, that he might instruct them in the truths of the gospel. His old age was adorned with the simplicity and artlessness of a little child, with wonderful humility, and a charity that never failed. Nor was he wanting in fine touches of humor. He pretended to fear that his old friends and neighbors, Cotton and others, had gone the wrong way, because he staid so long behind them. His missionary work excited great interest in England; and the funds for carrying it on were chiefly supplied by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in New England. This corporation, instituted in 1649 by an ordinance of the famous Long Parliament, largely aided him also in defraying the expense of publishing the first and second editions of his Indian Bible. Mr. Eliot died on the 26th of May, 1690, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. His wife, a woman of uncommon excellence, and singularly adapted to be his companion and helpmeet, passed on to the better country three years before him, in the eighty-fourth year of her age. "They had had children,—a daughter and five sons. Four of the sons were graduated at Harvard College, and three of them became ministers of the gospel. Only the daughter and one son survived their father. "A worthier or more venerable name than that of John Eliot is to be found in all the annals of New England. "There was no man on earth whom I honored above him," wrote Richard Baxter. Southey pronounced him "one of the most extraordinary men of any country." Even in his own day he was called "The Apostle to the Indians;" and, although he earnestly deprecated such a title, it has adhered to him ever since by common consent of the Christian world.

LIT.—In addition to his Indian Bible, grammar, etc., Eliot published various other works, among them, The Harmony of the Gospels, The Divine Management of Gospel Churches by the Ordinance of Councils, The Christian Commonwealth, also several letters and other writings relating to the progress of the gospel among the Indians. The best account of him and his missionary labors is Life of John Eliot, the Apostle to the Indians, by Convers Francis, vol. V. of Sparks's Library of American Biography (Boston, 1838).

GEORGE L. PRENTISS.

ELISÆUS (Armenian Egišè), an eminent Armenian historian and theologian of the fifth century; was educated by Sahak and Mesrob, and served as secretary to the Armenian prince Vartan during the rebellion against Yazgedr I., the Persian king, who threatened the existence of Christianity in Armenia. Elisæus was afterwards made Bishop of Amatunik, and was as much present at the great national synod of Ardashad, 446. He died 480 at Reschdonni, on the south-western shore of Lake Van. He is the author of a history of the Persian persecution of Christianity in Armenia, which he narrates as an eye-witness, and with the employment of all official sources. The work was first printed in Constantinople, 1794: the best edition of it is that of Venice, 1832. It was translated into English by Neumann, Lond., 1839. He has also written commentaries on various books of the Old Testament and other theological works, of which a collected edition appeared at Venice, 1838.

R. GOEBEL.

EL'ISHA (פ'שא, "God issalvation;" LXX. "Eia oua; New Testament "Eiaoua"), Hebrew prophet, and successor of Elijah. As he was engaged in ploughing, Elijah consecrated him to the prophetic office by throwing his mantle over him (1 Kings xix. 19-21). He left his plough, and became the most faithful and eminent disciple of the great master. His prophetic activity fell in the reigns of four kings, and lasted more than half a century (c. 840-780 B.C.). Under his predecessor a religious reformation had been effected, so that the times of Elisha were favorable to a dispensation of healing and of grace. It was this difference of surroundings, and also a difference in temperament, to which is to be attributed the difference in kind of the activity of the two prophets. Elijah was stern and severe, solitary and lonely; Elisha benevolent and tender, a man of the city and the home. He was often seen in the vicinity of Jericho, and on the Jordan, at Gilgal and at Bethel, and owned a house at Samaria. He is the friend of the poor and needy, who interested himself in the smallest details of domestic life. Now he heals the impure waters with salt (2 Kings ii. 19-22), now he makes the penurious fare of the sons of the prophets palatable (iv. 38-41). He helps the widow out of debt (iv. 1-7), and restores to a poor boy the axe which he had thrown into the water (vi. 1-7). A few loaves through his blessing suffice for a hundred (iv. 42-44). To his hospitable Shunammite friend he promises a child (iv. 8-17), and, when it has died, restores it to life (viii. 1-6). His fame extended to Syria; and Naaman the captain, by his counsel, bathes in the Jordan, and loses his leprosy (vii.).

But Elisha's gracious activity was not confined to cases in private life. King Joram applies to him for counsel in his distress (iii. 11-20). His prediction of the Syrian attacks is so accurate, that the Syrian commander attributes his defeats to a traitor in the camp (vi. 11); and, when he seeks to take the prophet captive, Elisha leads him and his army to Samaria, as though they had been stricken with blindness (vi. 18-19). Elisha was obliged to follow the divine direction, and, against his will, and with tears, predicted before Hazael that he would come to the throne, and would ravage Israel (viii. 7-15). He had constantly before his mind the well-being of his people, as is evidenced by the unceasing esteem of the nation, and the testimony of a king at his death, who called him his father, and Israel's "chariot and horsemen" (xiii. 14).

In sublime intellectual power Elisha was not equal to his predecessor; but in him the grace of God shows its tender and solicitous care for the smallest events. His miracles approach nearest to those of the Saviour, in which the fulness of divine grace revealed itself. He who sees deeds of supernatural power in the saving life of Christ will not deny them to his type in the Old Testament.

LIT.—See the Bible histories by Ewald, Hengstenberg, and especially Stanley, II. pp. 333-364, and the articles in the Bible dictionaries (especially in Smith). V. ORELL.

ELIZABETH, ST. See England, Church of.

ELIZABETH, QUEEN. See England, Church of.

ELIZABETH, ST., of Hungary, the daughter of Andreas II., King of Hungary; b. in Pressburg, 1207; d. at Marburg, Nov. 10, 1281. In her fourth year she was betrothed to Ludwig, son of Hermann, Landgrave of Thuringia, to whose court she was at once sent in a silver cradle. The Wartburg, the residence of the landgrave, was at that time one of the most brilliant courts in Germany. The marriage was perfected in 1221, Ludwig having succeeded his father in 1216. It proved to be a happy one. Both were of serious temperaments, and under their administration the tone of life rapidly changed at the Wartburg. Elizabeth displayed in an ever increasing measure the virtues of humility, mercy, and charity. She was the friend of the afflicted, in person relieved the sufferings of the sick, and distributed large sums among the needy; and in the famine of 1226 her charity relieved the poor from far and near. She founded a hospital
ELIZABETH ALBERTINE. 717

ELKESAITES. 717

at Eisenach for twenty-four persons enfeebled by age, or rendered helpless by disease. The even tenor of this life of marital felicity and charita-table effort was interrupted by the death of Ludwig in 1227, in Apulia, on the eve of departure on a crusade with Frederick II. Beautiful and bright as her life had heretofore been, it henceforth becomes a melancholy record of ascetic mortification, which the religious sentiment of the time commended and praised as the best evidence and most perfect fruit of piety, but which the more evangelical spirit of modern Christianity condemns as unnatural and barbarous.

While her husband was still living, and with his consent, Elizabeth had made Conrad of Marburg, the papal inquisitor-general in Germany, her confessor and religious guide. Under his influence she gave herself up to an ascetic discipline, undergoing severe castigations at the hands of her attendants. Conrad endeavored to separate her from her husband by a petition to the pope in extracting a promise, that, in the event of his death, she would not marry again. After Ludwig's demise, she submitted herself slavishly to this iron-hearted priest. She received harsh treatment from Heinrich Raspe, her brother-in-law, who had usurped the throne, and was driven forth from the Wartburg. After much suffering she found refuge with her uncle Egbert, Bishop of Bamberg. The knights who brought back her husband's remains, sought and secured justice for Elizabeth. She was invited back to the Wartburg, but at her own request was sent to Marburg, where she ended her days. After occupying for a while a dilapidated cottage, she entered a convent, but did not become a nun.
She was wholly under the withering influence of Conrad, who set himself to the task of destroying every natural affection, however pure, in the hope of making a saint. Elizabeth submitted to the most menial services, separated herself from her three children, and bared her back while brother Gerhard flagellated it, and Conrad sang the Misere re as an accompaniment. From this painful and ghastly spectacle, which was, however, in accord with the morbid and moronic taken religious ideas of the day, we turn away with relief, and think only of the Christian humility and tender charity of character which underlay this asceticism. In Mar burg, as in the bright days on the Wartburg, she labored to relieve the wants of the sick and poor. A hospital which still stands attests her munificence. She was canonized by Gregory IX. in 1235; and the same year the Landgrave Ludwig laid in Marburg the foundations of a hospital, which was completed in 1331. (Pp. 277-300.) von Sybel's Hist. Zeilschrifl, Leipzig, 1836, 14th ed., 1876. (An enthusiastic description, but the writer himself calls it a "legend"); Simon: Ludwig IV. u. s. Gemalin.

Frankf., 1854; Wegele (Roman Catholic), in
v. Sebott., 1881, p. 277-300.)

ELIZABETH ALBERTINE, countess-palatine,
b. at Heidelberg, Dec. 28, 1618; d. at Herford, Westphalia, Feb. 11, 1680; was a daughter of Friedrich V., elector of the Palatinate, and king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth Stuart, a daughter of James I. She was educated at the Hague, where her parents kept a quiet court. She learned six languages. Descartes was her teacher in mathematics. Maloranche and Leibnitz were among her friends and correspondents. She early decided to remain unmarried, and devote her life to philosophy; and the decapitation of her uncle, Charles I. (1648), and the unhappy marriage of her brother, Karl Ludwig of the Palatinate, etc., only confirmed her decision. In 1667 she retired to Herford in Westphalia as abbess; and there she had opportunity to show hospitality to the followers of Labadie in 1670, and to the Quakers in 1676; circumstances which, towards the close of her life, gave her mind a more decidedly religious turn. Biographies of her have been written by Guhrauer, in Kramer's hist. Taschenbuch (1851), and by Gorbil, in his Geschichte d. christ. Lebens, etc., Coblenz, 1855, vol. II.

ELKESAITES, a school in the Jewish Christian Church, whose doctrines were tinged with Gnosticism. Our principal sources of information are the Philosophumena of Hippolytus and Epiphanios, who also calls them Sampsaioti (from σαμπσαίοι, "sun"). The derivation of the name has led to many conjectures. Delitzsch derives it from a Galilean village (Elkesi); others, from a Hebrew word meaning apostate; while the church fathers derive it from a pretended founder, Elxai.
Epiphanios (Her., xix. 2) defines the name to mean "hidden power" (δυναμεσ κοκκαλιαμι). It was probably merely the designation of a book.
At any rate, the Elkesaites had in their possession a book which was widely used, and, according to Guiseppe, believed to have fallen from heaven, or, according to the more accurate Philosophumena, was revealed by the Son of God himself. Elxai is reported to have received it in Parthia in Trajan's reign, and to have presented it to the Sobiani (Epiphan., xix. 1; Philos., ix. 10). The work itself contains a large element of material religion mingled with Judaistic and Christian ideas. It authorizes the practice of astrology and magic. Besides those features which Elke-saitism had in common with Ebionism may be mentioned the doctrine that baptism washes away sins; and the frequent repetition of the rite is enjoined. Before the Philosophumena were discovered (1851), the Elkesaites were identified with the Ebionites (Gieseler), and the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies were regarded as the main authority on the subject. But the two works differ: the Philosophumena teaching an intentional and accurate account. [Charles Kingsley drew the materials for his "Saint's Tragedy from Elizabeth's life. See KAHNIS: Der Gang der Kirche, Leipzig, 1881, p. 277-300.]
ELLER. 718

ELLER, Elias, b. at Ronsdorf in the duchy of Berg, 1890; d. there May 16, 1750; married at Elberfeld a rich widow (Bolchhaus), and established himself at the head of a sect of apocalyptic millenarians, called "Ellerians," or "Ronsdorfer," who received their revelations through a young baker-daughter from Elberfeld (Buchel), whom Eller married after the death of his first wife. The Bible the sect accepted as the word of God: but it needed various kinds of supplements; and these were given by Buchel, in the Hirten tasche ("shepherd's bag"). Abraham, Moses, and Elijah were only prototypes of Eller, in whom the whole fulness of divinity dwelt. The Messiah was to be born again by Buchel, etc. When investigations were had at Elberfeld concerning the meetings of the sect, Eller moved (1797), with all his followers, to Ronsdorf, where a church was to be built, and a minister was appointed (Schleiermacher). After the death of his second wife, Eller married another rich widow (Bos塞尔mann); and the sect, though suspected of immoralities, began to spread, when disagreement broke out between Eller and Schleiermacher. Schleiermacher was expelled, and fled to Holland, formally accused by Eller of sorcery. Wülffing was appointed minister in his place. After the death of Eller, Wülffing and Bolchhaus (a son of Eller's first wife) tried to propagate the sect; but it soon after died out. Full accounts of it are found in the writings of J. W. Nevekly, (the defender of Schleiermacher), P. Wülffing, and J. Bolchhaus. See J. A. Engel: Geschichte der religiösen Schwärmerie im Herzogthum Berg, Schelm, 1829. G. H. Klippel.

ELLIOTT, Charles, D.D., b. at Glenconway, County Donegal, Ireland, May 16, 1792; d. at Mount Pleasant, Io. Jan. 6, 1869. He was licensed as a local Methodist preacher 1813, and in 1815 emigrated to America. He served in various capacities, having been superintendent of the mission among the Wyandotte Indians at Upper Sandusky, a presiding elder of the Ohio district, professor of languages in Madison College, Uniontown, Penn., and for many years editor of different Methodist religious papers. From 1857 to 1860 he was professor of biblical literature, and president of the Iowa Wesleyan University, and again from 1864 to 1867. His general reputation rests upon his Delineation of Roman Catholicism, N.Y., 1841, 2 vols., London, 1851 (with full index); but he also wrote The Great Secession (a history of the division of the Methodist-Episcopal Church in 1844 on account of slavery), N.Y., 1852; and South-western Methodism, a History of the M.E. Church in Missouri from 1844 to 1864, N.Y., 1868.

ELLIS, William, missionary, b. in London, Aug. 29, 1794; d. at Hoddesdon, Hertfordshire, June 25, 1872. He was sent by the London Missionary Society to the South Sea Islands in 1816, and labored there until 1823, when he removed to Hawaii, and rendered efficient service to the American missionaries in reducing the Hawaiian language to a written form. See Sandwhich Islands.

The state of Mrs. Ellis's health compelled his return to England in 1825. He entered into the home-work of the society, at first as travelling agent, but from 1832 to 1839 as foreign secretary. In 1839 he published the Martyr Church of Madagascar; in 1844, the first volume of a history of the London Missionary Society. Circumstances prevented the completion of the work. In 1850 he was sent out to Madagascar to revive the mission there, which had suffered so terribly from persecution. By his tact and zeal he succeeded in putting Christianity upon a firm basis. Between 1853 and 1863 he visited the island four times; and he has published his experiences and information in Three Visits to Madagascar (London, 1853), Madagascar Recounted (London, 1807).

Mr. Ellis was one of those missionaries who have laid the church and the world under tribute. He was not only indefatigable in labor, and solicitous for the spiritual welfare of his converts and their brethren, but he was also able to improve their temporal condition by his practical knowledge. In his boyhood he had worked enthusiastically at market-gardening; and, in the year before he sailed on his first missionary journey, he learned not only theology, but printing and book-binding. He was able, therefore, to acclimatize crops and plants in the South Sea Islands, which have been a source of revenue to the inhabitants, and also to set up the first printing-press in Polynesia. His books are not merely faithful and interesting records of missionary labor, but contributions to science.

ELLWOOD, Thomas, a Quaker, the suggester of Paradise Regained, b. at Crowell, Oxfordshire, 1639; d. at Hunger Hill, near Amerdean, Buckinghamshire, March 1, 1713. He was a native of America. In 1654, he went to Milton for some months. During the Great Plague in London (1665) he took a house for Milton at Giles Chalfont; and there he read the manuscript of Paradise Lost, which he returned with the remark, "Thou hast said much here of Paradise lost; but what hast thou to say of Paradise found?" To Ellwood we are indebted for much information in regard to Milton and the persecutions of the Quakers. Of his own works the most important are, Forcery no Christianity (London, 1674, and Foundation of Tithes Shaken (1682), and his Autobiography, with supplement by Joseph Wyeth (1714), reprint, Boston, 1877, in the Choice Autobiographies series, edited by W. D. Howells.

ELO'HIM (אֱלֹהִים), the term most frequently used in the Old Testament for God. It is the plural form, the singular, Eloah (אֱלֹה), being exclusively used in poetry. The ancient Semitic name for God, El (אֵל), occurs seldom. It defines God, beyond dispute, as having absolute power. So in Assyrian elu means "powerful." But Eloah cannot be proved to mean "powerful." The verb means in the Arabic "to be afraid," and (according to Oehler) is connected with the Assyrian alul, so that it would mean power which inspires fear. Elohim, as the designation of the true God, is not used in any of the Semitic languages except biblical Hebrew. Various explanations have been given of this plural form. The old theologians, beginning with Peter Lombard, found a reference to the Trinity; and, by pointing to the inexhaustible fulness of the Deity, it is, to say the least, inconsistent with an abstract monothelism. A second view sees in the plural form a relic of an ancient polytheism; but the opinion is untenable, that the monotheism of the Old Testament developed out of polytheism. A third view finds the highest bearer of God and God referred to; but the use of the word for angels cannot be proved, confessedly not [many commentators, like Perowne on the Psalms, dissent] in Ps. viii, xvii. 7, cxxxviii. 1, where the Septuagint translates it "angels." And in Ps. lxxxii. Elohim does not mean, as Hupfeld thinks, angels, but the moral officers of the law. The correct view was advanced by Dietrich in his Hebrew grammar (1846), as in some copies of the acts), mentioned in the Bible only in the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gen. 1. 2, 26), both of whom died in Egypt, and were afterwards transferred to Canaan; the former immediately after his death, the latter not until after the lapse of centuries (Exod. xiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32). According to Herodotus (II, 88), the Egyptians knew three different methods of embalming. After the first, which cost about one talent of silver, the brain was removed through the nostrils, and replaced with drugs. An opening was then steeped in the left flank, and the intestines taken out by the hand, placed in a peculiar vessel, and thrown into the river. The cavity was rinsed with palm-wine, and filled with aromatic herbs, after which the opening in the flank was again closed by being sewn up. The corpse thus prepared was then steeped for seventy days in "natron" (according to a recent analysis, sub-carbonate of soda), and swathed in linen bandages smeared with gum. The mummy was finally laid in a coffin of sycamore-wood, which was placed vertically in the tomb. After the second method the intestines were not removed by hand, but by means of cedar-oil, which, introduced into the body, dissolved them. The corpse was then steeped, as usually, in natron. After the third method, the corpse was only rinsed internally by an infusion, and then steeped. The embalming of Jacob's corpse took only forty days; but it appears, from the mummies preserved at Memphis, that a method of embalming was employed there, less complete and less careful than that employed at Thebais. In the Christian Church embalming seems to have been used now and then with martyrs and saints, as intimated by Tertullian (Apoll., 42); or perhaps this was only an adaptation of the Jewish custom of filling the grave with myrrh and spices (2 Chron. xvi. 14; John xix. 39). See Wilkinson: Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians, London, 1837-41, re-edited by S. Birch, London, 1878; Masspero: Mémoire sur quelques papyrus du Louvre; le ritual de l'embaumement.

EMBER DAYS are the first Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after the first Sunday in Lent, after Whitsunday, after the 14th of September, and after the 1st of December. The dates are fixed by the council of Placentia, 1085. Their name is in Latin, Jejumna Quatuor Temporum; in French, Quatre-Temps; in German, Quattember; in Danish, Tamperedag; which seems to indicate pretty plainly the derivation of the English name, though another has been attempted, from the Anglo-Saxon Ymbreu, "a circuit." In the ancient church they were solemnized with fasting, and prayers for God's blessing on the seasons ushered in by them. Afterwards they were fixed by the Roman and the Anglican Church as fit periods for eschatological meetings.

EMBURY, Philip, the first Methodist minister in America; b. in Ballygarvan, Ireland, Sept. 21, 1729; d. at Camden, Washington County, N.Y., August, 1775. He emigrated to America 1760. He was a carpenter by trade, and had been a preacher in Ireland. He settled first in New York City, but did not preach until 1766, when he acted on the advice of Barbara Heck. The first services were in his own house; but in 1767 the famous "Rigging Loft" was the place of meeting, and there Methodism in New York may have been introduced.
said to have been born. In 1708 the first Methodist chapel was built, on the site of the present John-street Church; and upon it he worked as a carpenter. In 1709 the first missionaries sent out by Wesley came to the city, which then had a population of only twenty thousand; and Embury resigned his charge, and went to Camden, near which place (at Ashgrove) he organized a society, and continued his joint work of carpenter and preacher. His remains were thrice interred,—in Camden, Ashgrove, and finally, by order of the Troy Conference, in Woodland Cemetery, Cambridge, N.Y.

EMERSON, Ralph, D.D., b. at Hollis, N.H., Aug. 18, 1757; d. at Rockford, Ill., May 26, 1803. He was graduated at Yale College 1811, and at Andover Seminary 1814, and was professor of ecclesiastical history and pastoral theology in that seminary from 1829 to 1854. Besides a life of his brother, Rev. Joseph Emerson, he translated and annotated the first volume of Wigger's Augustinianism and Pelagianism (Andover, 1840), and contributed to various periodicals.

EMMAUS (Hebrew Ḫannaḥaḥ, “hot spring”), thereore, “thirty-six stadia” (seven miles and a half), from Jerusalem, where Christ revealed himself to the two disciples on the day of his resurrection (Luke xxiv. 13). Its site has not yet been satisfactorily determined, although many attempts have been made. It has been identified with (1) Amwas, the Em carpenter. In 1769 the first missionaries sent a population of only twenty thousand; and Embury resigned his large, and went to Camden, interred,—in Camden, Ashgrove, and finally, Cemetery, Cambridge, N.Y.

EMMERAM, or HAIMAREM, was made Bishop of Poitiers in the beginning of the eighth century, but abdicated shortly after in order to go to Pannonia as a missionary to the Pagan Avars. At Radauons, the residence of Duke Theodo of Bavaria, he was persuaded to remain for some time, purifying and consolidating the Christian Church in Bavaria. After a stay of three years, he left for Rome, but was overtaken, still on this side of the mountains, by Theodo's son, Lantbert, who had him tied to a ladder, and sawed to pieces joint by joint; the reason being that Lantbert's sister Uta confessed, immediately after the missionary had left, that she was pregnant by him. Just before dying, however, Emmeram explained that he was innocent, that he had allowed Uta to accuse him only in order to save herself, that the guilty man was one Singibald, etc. When Duke Theodo heard this, he ordered the bones of Emmeram to be gathered, and deposited in a chapel at Aschheim. Another chapel was afterwards built in his honor in Regensburg, and he was made a saint, Sept. 6 being fixed by the Roman-Catholic Church as his day of celebration.

The life of St. Emmeram was written in the second half of the eighth century by Aribo, Bishop of Freising, and again in 1086 by Arnold of Vochburg, and finally by Meginfred a short time after. These three biographies are found in Acta Sancruum (Exc. vii.; Cavn.: Lection. Antiqua III.; and Perz: Monum., VI. It has proved very difficult, however, to lay bare the historical kernel of the Emmeram legend on account of its chronological absurdities; and it must be added that such a feat, even if it could be done, would probably hardly be worth doing.

EMMONS, Nathanael, D.D., was b. April 20 (O.S.), 1745, in the parish of Millington, in the town of East Haddam, Conn. This town was also the birthplace of the missionary brothers, David and John Brainard, of President Edward Dorr Griffin, and his brother George D. Griffin, Esq., of the jurist, Jeremiah Gates Brainard, and the poet, James Brainard Taylor. In 1763, at the age of eighteen, he entered Yale College. Here he was a classmate of John Trumbull, the author of McFingall; John Treadwell, governor of Connecticut; and Dr. Samuel Wales, professor of divinity in Yale College. These three and Emmons were the fames, now declars of his knowledge. He contained other eminent men, among them Rev. Dr. Joseph Lyman of Hatfield, Mass. A few months after his graduation, in 1767, he began his theological studies with Rev. Nathan Strong of Coventry, Conn., and finished them with Dr. John Smalley of Berlin, Conn. Smalley was a pupil of Bellamy, and Bellamy of the elder Edwards. Through Smalley, Emmons gained a well-nigh personal acquaintance with the Bethlehem and Northampton divines. In 1769 he was "approbated" as a preacher, and on the 21st of April, 1773, was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Franklin, Mass. He resigned his pastorate on the 28th of May, 1827. He had remained in the office fifty-four years. He died Sept. 23, 1840, in the sixty-eighth year of his ministry and the ninety-sixth year of his age. He retained his faculties to a surprising degree until his death (Dec. 25). His men formed with a more unfaltering and solid faith in Christ. He enjoyed to the last the reverence of his parishioners and the highest esteem of the neighboring churches. He was an intimate friend of Dr. Hopkins of Newport, R.I., Dr. Hart of Preston, Conn., Dr. West of Stock-EMMONS.

He was a brother-in-law of Rev. Dr. Spring of Newburyport, Rev. Dr. Austin, President of Burlington College, Rev. Leonard Worcester, Rev. William Riddle. These four Hopkinessian ministers married the daughters of Rev. Dr. Hopkins of Hadley, who himself was not a Hopkinessian.

Dr. Emmons published more than two hundred Articles in various periodicals, such as The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, The Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, The Utica Christian Repository, The Hopkinessian Magazine, and The Christian Magazine. He also published numerous ordination and funeral sermons, which are not found in the collected editions of his works. The following are more important publications: A Dissertation on the Scriptural Qualifications for Admission to the Christian Ministry (1786); a volume of sermons (1800); a second volume (1812); a third volume (1813); a fourth volume (1823); a fifth volume (1825); a sixth volume (1828); a seventh volume (1829); a case of Dr. Emmons' sermons were collected, and published in a uniform edition of six octavo volumes. His son-in-law, Rev. Jacob Ide, D.D., prefixed to this edition A Memoir of Dr. Emmons. In 1850 a seventh volume of his sermons was published. In 1860 and 1861 a new collected edition of his works was published in Boston in six large octavo volumes; and to this edition was prefixed a Memoir containing 468 pages, by E. A. Park of Andover Theological Seminary.

The house of Dr. Emmons was a theological school. No private instructor in our land has educated so many young men as he for the Christian ministry: the number of them cannot be exactly ascertained, but was probably not less than a hundred. Among his pupils nine became presidents or professors of colleges or theological seminaries, fourteen had an important agency in establishing literary and charitable institutions, forty-six are noticed in the biographical dictionaries of eminent men.

Few ministers in the world have devoted themselves so earnestly, patiently, and methodically as Dr. Emmons to their professional work. He preached nearly or quite six thousand times, and spent ten, twelve, or fourteen hours every day in his study, with his pen or book in hand, for more than seventy years. He was temperate, even abstemious, in his diet, regular in his habits, and was a model of punctuality, self-consistency, perseverance in study. He combined a sprightly wit with a profound reverence for the truth. His style of thought was precise, definite, sharp. Dr. Leonard Woods of Andover said, "Emmons has one of the grandest understandings ever created." He was an original thinker, and formed his theological system with rare independence of mind. Although a man of study, rather than a "man of affairs," he entered with zeal into several public enterprises. He was one of the fathers of the Massachusetts Missionary Society, and for the first twelve years of its existence was its president. He was one of the original editors of The Masonic Magazine (1796). When the Masonic fraternity was most popular, he was a pronounced anti-Mason. When anti-lavery was most generally condemned, he was an active abolitionist. In politics he was an outspoken Federalist. II. Jeroboam Sermon is a curiosity in politico-homiletical literature.

The theological system of Dr. Emmons is often confounded with that of Dr. Samuel Hopkins. The following statement of the two systems was given by Emmons himself, and will explain the difference, as well as the agreement, between the two.

The distinctive tenets of Hopkinsianism are:

1. All real holiness consists in disinterested benevolence; 2. All sin consists in selfishness; 3. There are no promises of regenerating grace made to the doings of the unregenerate; 4. The impotency of sinners with respect to believing in Christ is not natural, but moral; 5. A sinner is not required to approve of the doctrines of Christ in his conduct, even though it should cast him off for ever; 6. God has exerted his power in such a manner as he purposed would be followed by the existence of sin; 7. The introduction of moral evil into the universe is so overruled by God as to result in promoting the general good; 8. Repentance is beforehand faith in Christ; 9. Though men became sinners by Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have and are accountable for no sins but personal; 10. Though believers are justified through Christ's righteousness, yet his righteousness is not transferred to them.

The distinctive tenets of Emmons's system are:

1. Holiness and sin consist in free, voluntary exercises; 2. Men act freely under the divine agency; 3. The least transgression of the divine law deserves eternal punishment; 4. Right and wrong are founded in the nature of things; 5. God exercises mere grace in pardoning or justifying penitent believers through the atonement of Christ, and mere goodness in rewarding them for their good works; 6. Notwithstanding the total depravity of sinners, God has a right to require them to turn from sin to holiness; 7. Preachers of the gospel ought to exhort sinners to love God, repent of sin, and believe in Christ immediately; 8. Men are active, not passive, in regeneration. Dr. Emmons believed that these eight statements are involved in the system of Dr. Hopkins; that they are evolved from that system, rather than added to it. Still they characterize Emmonism as it is grafted upon Hopkinessianism.

EMORY, John, a Methodist-Episcopal bishop;
b. in Queen Anne County, Maryland, April 11, 1759; d. in Reisterstown, Md., Dec. 16, 1856. From 1824 to 1835 he was both a heat and the bishop of the Methodist Church at New York, during which time he paid off all the debts of the book concern, and put it in a far better position than ever before. He also founded the Methodist Quarterly Review; and nearly all the original articles in the first two volumes are from him. In 1824 he was elected a bishop. He was one of the organizers of Dickinson College. He wrote Defense of our Fathers, N.Y., 1824; The Episcopal Controversy Reviewed, N.Y., 1838. — Robert, son of preceding; b. in Philadelphia, July 29, 1814; d. in Baltimore, May 18, 1846. He was elected president of Dickinson College in 1846. He wrote Life of his father (N.Y., 1841), a History of the Discipline of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, N.Y., 1843 (in a new edition brought down to 1864, and an unfinished analysis of Butler’s Analogia, completed by Dr. Crooks, N.Y., 1856.

EMSER. Hieronymus, b. at Ulm in March, 1577; d. at Dresden, Nov. 6, 1577; studied at Tübingen and Basel, and the mystical of Petrandi as secretary on his tour of visitation through Germany. Raymund was a great collector of relics, and Emser’s first work was an essay on crosses said to have fallen down from heaven. After lecturing on humaniora at Erfurt, where he had Luther among his hearers, and editing the works of Picus of Mirandola, he went to Leipzig, where he lectured on canon law, and published some essays on the propriety of toasting each other when drinking (1563), on the improvement of wine, beer, and vinegar (1567), etc., and an apologetics of Bishop Benno, which has been incorporated with the Acta Sanctorum. In 1510 he was sent by Duke George of Saxony to Rome to negotiate the canonization of Benno; and on his return he received several rich benefices, and settled at Dresden, where Luther was his guest in 1517. It was already then apparent, however, that, if the case of the reformer should ever become decidedly serious, Emser would not be found on his side; and immediately after the conference of Leipzig a rupture took place between them, and a controversy began, of a character by no means edifying, and without any profit to the cause. Luther called him the goat of Dresden, with reference to his escutcheon, and he called Luther the bull of Wittenberg: that is about all which needs be said of the controversy. The only one of Emser’s polemical writings which has any real worth, and has exercised any real influence, is his Annotationes uber Luthers neuer testament. Many of his corrections were adopted by Luther himself, and others were afterwards introduced in Luther’s translation by others. A translation he himself made of the New Testament after the Vulgate (1527) is completely worthless. See WALDAU: Nachricht von Hieronymus Emser Lehen, Erfurt, 1783; WEVERMANN: Nachrichten von Gelehrten, Künstlern, und andern merkwürdigen Personen aus Ulm, Ulm, 1798. BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

EMS, Congress of (1786). In the latter part of the eighteenth century there prevailed among the German prelates a general discontent with the encroachments of the Pope upon the episcopal authority. More than once complaints were lodged with the emperor, and protection was urgedly demanded at every new imperial election. Finally the establishment of a new nunciature at Munich brought the archbishops of Cologne, Mayence, Trévès, and Salzburg to combine in action. The papal nuncios had always by the German prelates been considered a great inconveniencia; and the nunciature was, indeed, by its very nature a limitation, if not an infringement, of the episcopal power. That just the above four prelates should feel called upon to take hold of the matter was only partly owing to the Gallican principles of episcopal independence which recently had been so vigorously expounded by Hontheim, the suffragan Bishop of Trévès, in his famous work, Justini Febronius Icti de statu ecclesiae et legitima potestate Romani pontificis liber singulares ad reuniores dissidentes in ecclesia Christi.

In the controversy which now ensued, the Pope took care not to touch the principal question,—whether the conception of the Papacy set forth by... the Punctuation was right or wrong. His first step was to order the nuncios to continue their work in accordance with the instructions given. This, however, it was impossible for them to do, as the archbishops thought the Punctuation was right or wrong. Then came from various sides. The emperor, on receiving the Punctuation, advised the archbishops to try to come to a complete understanding with their suffragan bishops and the secular powers of their dioceses. But this the archbishops neglected to do, and the exclusiveness of their proceedings gave umbrage to the bishops. Many bishops believed, and perhaps not altogether without reason, that the real purpose of the Punctuation was to transfer the power which had hitherto been exercised by the Pope to the metropolitans; and they preferred the Pope far away in Rome, to the metropolitans close at their doors. Thus it came to pass that several German bishops, headed by the Bishop of Spires, declared against the Punctuation. A still more effective aid the Pope obtained from the establishment of the Fürstenbund of Charles Theodore. Bavaria did not form a compact diocese, but was in ecclesiastical respects cut up in a number of sections, each section belonging to some foreign diocese. Discontented with this state of affairs, Charles Theodore had worked hard for the establishment of a nunciature in Munich, and he now supported the nuncio with all his might in the contest with the archbishops. The archbishops were defeated. Finally the union between the archbishops became loosened by the ambiguous behavior of the Archbishop of Mayence. He was a member of the Fürstenbund (Union of Princes) which Friedrich II. had formed in 1785 against Austria; and, as he was an old man, Friedrich was very anxious to have Baron von Dahlberg, who was decidedly in favor of the Fürstenbund, appointed his coadjutor. But this could not be done without the consent of the Pope; and it was not probable that the Pope would give his consent without certain stipulations with respect to the Punctuation. Secret negotiations were carried on with the papal court through Prussia; and, though no definite results ensued, the union of the archbishops was incapacitated for action. When the case was laid before the diet of Ratisbon (1788), the diet advised the archbishops to seek reconciliation with the Pope, each for himself. The brooding thunderstorm in France, whose first low murmur just now became audible, also acted as a persuasion and incitement to the archbishops to try to come to a complete understanding with the Pope's answer to the question; and the Pope's answer to the Punctuation. Secret negotiations were carried on with the papal court through Prussia; and, though no definite results ensued, the union of the archbishops was incapacitated for action. When the case was laid before the diet of Ratisbon (1788), the diet advised the archbishops to seek reconciliation with the Pope, each for himself. The brooding thunderstorm in France, whose first low murmur just now became audible, also acted as a persuasion and incitement to us). Marburg, 1572, in which the quadruplicate division of theology into exegetical, dogmatical, historical, and practical theology occurs for the first time; and the Academy of Saumur, corresponding in the Reformed Church to the University of Helmstedt in the Lutheran, the essays of Stephan Gaussen, De studii theologici ratione, De natura theologia, etc. The Roman-Catholic Church also showed signs of life. The Bibliotheca selecta de ratione studiorum (Cologne, 1607) is merely an instance of modern scholasticism; but the Methode pour étudier la theologie, by L. Ellis du Pin (1718), is a meritorious work, and was translated into several foreign languages.
EN C Y C L O P Ä D I A S. 724 EN E R G U M E N S.

A new epoch in the history of the theological encyclopedia, by which this branch of theological science really became a science itself, was ushered in by Schleiermacher's Darstellung des theologischen Studiums zum Behufe einleitender Vorlesungen, Berlin, 1811. An exposition of the internal organization of the theological system is here attempted and achieved on the best possible line. A tripartite division into philosophical, historical, and practical theology, is employed. But the philosophical theology comprises only apologetics and polemics; while dogmatics and ethics, as well as exegesis, belong to historical theology. That part of the book, however, which most strikingly shows the author's powerful grasp of his subject, is the section on practical theology, considered under the double view of church-government and church-service. At its first appearance this book seemed not to have attracted any particular attention; but, after the appearance of its second edition in 1830, the strong influence which it had exercised soon became evident. In 1831 appeared the Encyclopädie der theologischen Wissenschaften, by K. Rosenkranz, completely under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy; in 1838, the Encyclopädie und Methode der theologischen Wissenschaften, by K. R. Hagenbach (11th ed., edited by Kautzsch, 1881); in 1837, the Encyclopädie und Methodologie, by G. C. A. Harless, etc. The influence of Schleiermacher's work was felt also in the Reformed Church—J. G. Kienlen: Encyclopädie des sciences de la théologie, Strasbourg, 1811; Groot: Encyclopædia theologi christiani, Groningen, 1851—and even in the Roman-Catholic Church, F. A. Staudenmaier: Encyclopädie der theologischen Wissenschaften, Mayence, 1834; John McClinton: Theological Encyclopedia and Methodology, Cincinnati, 1837; Doeder: Encyclopädie der christeliche theologie, Utrecht, 1876; J. R. Lange: Grundriss d. Theolog. Encyk., Heidelberg, 1877; J. Ch. K. v. Hofmann: Encyk., ed. Bestmann, Nördlingen, 1879; J. F. Räther: Eng. trans., Edinb., 1894 sq.; R. Rothe, Wittenberg, 1890; Crook and Huerst, N. Y., 1885; Walser, Phil.: Encyk., 1862—Pap. ENCYCLOPÆDIAS, Theological. See Dictionaries.

ENCYCLOPÆDIST is the name generally given to the editors and contributors to the Encyclopædie ou Dictionnaire raisonné des Sciences, des Arts, et des Mœurs, etc. Many of the articles appeared in Paris, 1751–64, in 21 vols. fol. This work, so far as it goes on account of the extraordinary influence which it exercised on its age, was edited by Diderot, and, for its mathematical and physical articles, by D'Alembert. Among its contributors were Roussé, Voltaire, E. Buffon, Haller, Mengel, Montesquieu, D'Anville, Holbach, Sulzer, Turgot, etc. Its religious, theological, and ecclesiastical articles were mostly written by Abbé Mallet, professor of theology in the University of Paris, and the abbés Yvon, Pastré, and De Prades.

It is generally believed that this book is full of open and bold attacks on Christianity, the Roman-Catholic Church, etc. But this is a mistake. Though the article on the Jesuits is written with great gusto for scandals, and though the article on the Pope vindicates the Gallican views of the episcopacy, the work as a whole is confessedly Roman Catholic, and the Reformation, with all that belongs to it, is treated in a supercilious manner as a vicious innovation; to which must be added that there is hardly any Christian dogma which is not accepted and defended,—such as those of the trinity, of inspiration, of the atonement, etc. But (and this is characteristic of the reasons for the acceptance of the Christian dogmas) they are generally of such a quality that a flat rejection, for no reason whatever, could not have made the matter worse. Theism is preferred to atheism, because it is better for the development of human happiness to accept than to reject the idea of the existence of God. Christ is the first and foremost of all religious founders, because he revealed the best and highest morality, etc.

By this perfidious acquiescence in something which it felt itself too weak to overpower, the book presented itself to the eyes of a godless and religiously indifferent age as the soundest and wisest compromise with an existing superstition, and obtained freedom to preach its sensualistic philosophy, which sooner or later would surely extinguish said superstition. The philosophical programme of the book— that is, its intellectual and moral stand-point—is set forth in the preface, written by D'Alembert; and there is really no contradiction between the sensualism and eudemonism of the preface, and the choice reasons on which religion, Christianity, and the Roman-Catholic Church are accepted and defended in the book.

ENDOCRINE 1842; END. ENERGUMEN (ἐνεργούμενος, "possessed by an evil spirit;"
spirit;"

The exorcists daily brought them food, laid their hands upon them, and prayed for them. After their recovery they kept a twenty to forty days' fast, then partook of the sacrament; a particular prayer was made for them by the priest, and their names were entered upon the church-records, with especial mention of their recovery. See the excellent art., Ev. quippe Roman., in Kraus: Real-Encyklopädie.

ENGEDI (the fountain of the kid), the present Ain Jidy, a small town about one mile from the western shore of the Dead Sea, at the foot of the mountains of Judæa, between three hundred and thirty and five hundred feet above the level of the Dead Sea, and about twelve hundred feet below the summit of the cliffs; received its name from the neighboring thermal springs, and is known to history as David's hiding-place from Saul (1 Sam. xxiii. 29, xxiv. 1-4).

ENGELBRECHT, Hans, b. at Brunswick, 1599; d. there 1644; was the son of a tailor, and a weaver by trade, but suffered from infancy so much from bodily illness, that he became very melancholy, and at times was oscillating between suicide and lunacy. In his twenty-second year he began to be haunted by religious visions, in anticipation of which he was so much afraid of being detected before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations; collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697 [Eng. trans., Northampton, 1789]. See Rehmeyer: Brunsche Kirchengesch., IV. p. 417.

ENGELHARDT, Johann Georg Veit, b. at Neustadt-on-the-Aich, Nov. 12, 1791; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 13, 1855; studied at Erlangen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium there (1817), and professor of theology in the university (1821). Besides a number of dissertations on the church fathers and the mystics, he wrote a Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte in 4 vols., Erlangen, 1833-34, and a Dogmengeschichte in 2 vols., Neustadt-on-the-Aich, 1839.

ENGLAND. ENGLAND, Church of, is the established National Church of England, and adopts as its creed the Thirty-nine Articles, together with the Church of the Creed the Thirty-nine Articles, together with the decrees of the councils of 1541 and 1553. See the excellent art., Ev. quippe Roman., in Kraus: Real-Encyklopädie.

The annals of the British period are sparse and unsatisfactory. The traditional accounts of the founding of the Christian Church among the Britons by Joseph of Arimathea, St. Paul, or other of the apostles, as well as the history of the conversion of King Lucius, adopted by Ussher, must be given up as untrustworthy. Of first reliable information comes from Tertullian, who writes early in the third century that Christianity had penetrated into regions of Britain inaccessible to the Romans. The history of the British Church was thenceforth that of early Christianity everywhere. It furnished victims to persecution, one of whom, Alban (303), was early canonized. It sent its representatives to councils, as, for example, that of Arles (314), which three of its bishops attended,—Eborius, Restitutus, and Adelphus. And it had its heresies. Pelagius was a Briton; and, although he went to the East with Celestius of Ireland, he left the seed of his errors behind him.

The Anglo-Saxon period dates from the arrival, in 597, of the monk Augustine, who had been despatched by Gregory I. The Anglo-Saxons were still heathen when he landed on the Isle of Thanet. Augustine exorcised evil spirits, and, before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations; collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697 [Eng. trans., Northampton, 1789]. See Rehmeyer: Brunsche Kirchengesch., IV. p. 417.

ENGELHARDT, Johann Georg Veit, b. at Neustadt-on-the-Aich, Nov. 12, 1791; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 13, 1855; studied at Erlangen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium there (1817), and professor of theology in the university (1821). Besides a number of dissertations on the church fathers and the mystics, he wrote a Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte in 4 vols., Erlangen, 1833-34, and a Dogmengeschichte in 2 vols., Neustadt-on-the-Aich, 1839.

ENGELBRECHT, Hans, b. at Brunswick, 1599; d. there 1644; was the son of a tailor, and a weaver by trade, but suffered from infancy so much from bodily illness, that he became very melancholy, and at times was oscillating between suicide and lunacy. In his twenty-second year he began to be haunted by religious visions, in anticipation of which he was so much afraid of being detected before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations; collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697 [Eng. trans., Northampton, 1789]. See Rehmeyer: Brunsche Kirchengesch., IV. p. 417.

ENGELHARDT, Johann Georg Veit, b. at Neustadt-on-the-Aich, Nov. 12, 1791; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 13, 1855; studied at Erlangen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium there (1817), and professor of theology in the university (1821). Besides a number of dissertations on the church fathers and the mystics, he wrote a Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte in 4 vols., Erlangen, 1833-34, and a Dogmengeschichte in 2 vols., Neustadt-on-the-Aich, 1839.

ENGELBRECHT, Hans, b. at Brunswick, 1599; d. there 1644; was the son of a tailor, and a weaver by trade, but suffered from infancy so much from bodily illness, that he became very melancholy, and at times was oscillating between suicide and lunacy. In his twenty-second year he began to be haunted by religious visions, in anticipation of which he was so much afraid of being detected before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations; collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697 [Eng. trans., Northampton, 1789]. See Rehmeyer: Brunsche Kirchengesch., IV. p. 417.

ENGELBRECHT, Hans, b. at Brunswick, 1599; d. there 1644; was the son of a tailor, and a weaver by trade, but suffered from infancy so much from bodily illness, that he became very melancholy, and at times was oscillating between suicide and lunacy. In his twenty-second year he began to be haunted by religious visions, in anticipation of which he was so much afraid of being detected before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations; collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697 [Eng. trans., Northampton, 1789]. See Rehmeyer: Brunsche Kirchengesch., IV. p. 417.

ENGELHARDT, Johann Georg Veit, b. at Neustadt-on-the-Aich, Nov. 12, 1791; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 13, 1855; studied at Erlangen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium there (1817), and professor of theology in the university (1821). Besides a number of dissertations on the church fathers and the mystics, he wrote a Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte in 4 vols., Erlangen, 1833-34, and a Dogmengeschichte in 2 vols., Neustadt-on-the-Aich, 1839.

ENGELBRECHT, Hans, b. at Brunswick, 1599; d. there 1644; was the son of a tailor, and a weaver by trade, but suffered from infancy so much from bodily illness, that he became very melancholy, and at times was oscillating between suicide and lunacy. In his twenty-second year he began to be haunted by religious visions, in anticipation of which he was so much afraid of being detected before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations; collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697 [Eng. trans., Northampton, 1789]. See Rehmeyer: Brunsche Kirchengesch., IV. p. 417.

ENGELHARDT, Johann Georg Veit, b. at Neustadt-on-the-Aich, Nov. 12, 1791; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 13, 1855; studied at Erlangen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium there (1817), and professor of theology in the university (1821). Besides a number of dissertations on the church fathers and the mystics, he wrote a Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte in 4 vols., Erlangen, 1833-34, and a Dogmengeschichte in 2 vols., Neustadt-on-the-Aich, 1839.

ENGELBRECHT, Hans, b. at Brunswick, 1599; d. there 1644; was the son of a tailor, and a weaver by trade, but suffered from infancy so much from bodily illness, that he became very melancholy, and at times was oscillating between suicide and lunacy. In his twenty-second year he began to be haunted by religious visions, in anticipation of which he was so much afraid of being detected before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations; collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697 [Eng. trans., Northampton, 1789]. See Rehmeyer: Brunsche Kirchengesch., IV. p. 417.
bury (1070–89), secured the institution of special ecclesiastical courts, in which all ecclesiastical cases were tried. His successor, the learned Anselm (1033–1109), obliged the crown to renounce its ancient custom of investing the new bishops with ring and crosier, and vindicated the dangerous precedent, that appeals should be made to Rome. Another great archbishop, Thomas Becket (1162–70), contended with Henry II., who sought to reform the abuses growing out of clerical exemption from civil jurisdiction. The churchman was murdered, but victory did not rest with the king. It still remained for the State as a national body to come into subjection to the ecclesiastical power of Rome. This was accomplished under the most depraved, but, according to Green, the ablest, of the Angevin kings, John. For daring to resist the wishes of the papal see, his realm was placed under interdict by Innocent III. (1208). John finally submitted (a submission which was no more ignominious than it was politic), and accepted Stephen Langton (1207–29), the papal appointee, as primate.

The clergy passed in a state of lethargy, and the clergy into official carelessness and personal corruption. The earnest and plain preaching of the Dominican (1221) and Franciscan (1224) friars aroused the laity for a time; but, becoming fat with lands, they lost their hold on the popular mind. Here and there a great bishop, like Grosseteste of Lincoln, 1235–53 (see Grosseteste), lifts up his voice boldly against the corruption of the clergy, dares to resist the Pope's assumption to force appointments within his diocese, and insists upon the authority and preaching of the Scriptures. The State is not completely paralyzed, and seeks to meet the ecclesiastical abuses with remedial legislation. Two great acts stand out as protests against them. The statute of mortmain (1279) forbade the alienation of lands to religious corporations in such wise as to be exempt from taxation. The statute of praemunire (Richard II.) made a royal license necessary to the validity within the realm of papal appointments and bulls. Neither of these acts accomplished much at the time, but the latter was used effectively by Henry VIII. Finally protests from the people and clergy themselves were beginning to be spoken. John Wyclif (1328–84), the "morning star of the Reformation," translated the Scriptures, and asserted the rights of conscience. William Longland, without Erasmus' scholarship, but in a more popular and earnest vein than he, sang rhymes ridiculing the friars. The Lollards were so numerous, that, according to the chronicler Knighton, every other person on the road was one. The indistinct mutterings of the Reformation were heard; and although Wyclif's ashes were disinterred, and scattered in the Swift, and the Church slumbered on for more than a century longer, the great movement finally came, out of what Christianity in England, crystallized in the Church of England, started forward on a new career of life and achievement.

II. History since the Reformation.—The Church of England dates its existence as a national body, independent of the papal see, from the passage of the Act of Supremacy (1534), and received its distinctive doctrinal character from the Forty-two Articles in the reign of Edward VI. (subsequently reduced to thirty-nine under Elizabeth), and the approval of the Book of Common Prayer. The same general principle of revolt against the Church in England was involved in the Reformation movement in England that inspired the Reformation on the Continent. However, the movement in England had its own salient and distinguishing features. It preserved in unbroken continuity the ecclesiastical orders and succession of the Catholic Church, many of the bishops identifying themselves with it. But it did not in the first instance owe its origin to a pure motive to remedy ecclesiastical abuses, and correct doctrinal errors. The inglorious character of some of its early history, as Canon Perry says, cannot be denied. Yet some of the reformers of England, like Ridley and Latimer, were men of most fervent piety and lofty devotion; and its first annals describe the heroic constancy of a noble galaxy of martyrs who sacrificed their lives for their faith.

Circumstances had been preparing the way for the Reformation in England. The signs of the times in the second part of the sixteenth century indicated a mighty movement of men's minds in England as well as on the Continent. The revival of classical learning with such names as Erasmus, Colet, and Thomas More, the bold satire upon clerical abuses, the independence of thought (e.g., Erasmus' appeal to the Greek New Testament in the preface of his edition, Basel, 1516, and More's dreams of improvements in Church and State in his Utopia), the translation of the New Testament by Tyndale (1526), and its circulation in spite of public burnings and private espionage, were amongst the signs. Luther's mighty words from across the sea, arraigning the papal dominion as the Babylonish captivity of the Church (1520), found an eager audience in England, which the public confiscation of his tracts by Wolsey (1521) could not quiet. But these were only the signs and forerunners of the Reformation: they did not accomplish it. The rupture from Rome in England was not, in the first instance, the product of the protest of religious principle against ecclesiastical abuse, however widely prevalent Reformation sentiments were among all classes: it was a political necessity to which Henry VIII. resorted in order to accomplish and to justify his divorce from Catherine, and marriage with Anne Boleyn. In 1531 Henry arraigned the clergy of a violation of praemunire for being accomplices with Cardinal Wolsey, who had exercised legatine functions without the royal consent. The two convictions compounded by the payment of a hundred and eighteen thousand pounds. But the king, not satisfied with this evidence of a submissive temper, demanded that he should be recognized as "chief protector, the only supreme lord and head of the Church and clergy in England." The Convocation of Canterbury accepted the title, only adding the limiting clause "so far as the law of Christ will allow." In 1533 a parliamentary statute forbade all ecclesiastical appeals beyond the kingdom. The year following, actuated thereto by the Pope's command to take back Catherine, Henry secured the passage of the Act of Supremacy, by which the English sovereign at the assumption of the supreme head in earth of the Church of England,
ENGLAND. 727

ENGLAND.

called the "Anglicana Ecclesia." This statute made all papal appointments within the realm illegal, and vested in the crown unlimited authority to reform and redress ecclesiastical abuses. The Church in England was thus severed from the papal communion, and constituted an independent body. It was not long before the king made a bold use of his new authority by abolishing the monastic establishments, and confiscating their wealth, amounting to thirty-eight million pounds (1536-39).

But a thorough doctrinal reformation was not among the purposes of Henry. With the Continental Reformation he had little or no sympathy. The ten articles adopted by convocation in 1536 retained the doctrine of the real presence, the use of images, prayer to saints, purgatory, and auricular confession, and only divested these practices of some of the grosser superstitions. The king seemed to take higher ground when he gave his sanction to the translation of the Scriptures known as the Great Bible (1539). But all hopes of a thorough doctrinal reformation were doomed to disappointment. The six so-called "Bloody articles" of 1539 contained all denial of transubstantiation as heresy, and declared strongly in favor of auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the sacrifice of private masses. Henry had done his work. He was no reformer from principle; but Providence had used him to assert the independence of the Church of England, and to break the spell of tradition.

Under Edward VI. the doctrinal reformation was accomplished. The six articles were repealed, and the sympathy with the Continental reformers shown in the call of Bucer and Fagius to Cambridge, and Peter Martyr and Ochino to Oxford. A Prayer-Book was issued in 1549, and a Second A Prayer-Book was issued in 1552. The independence of the National Church being thus permanently settled, it only remained to settle disputes within her own pale. The great question was, whether Puritanism should be tolerated. This was a question not of doctrine, divine sovereignty, and predestination; for the prevailing doctrinal views were Calvinistic, and all of Elizabeth's bishops, almost without an exception, were Calvinists. It was a question of ecclesiastical polity and ritual. Many of the refugees who had fled to the Continent in Mary's reign returned strongly prejudiced against an elaborate ritual, and in favor of the Genevan form of government. Cartwright, Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, was the ablest exponent of these views (1570). There was no uniformity practised in the conduct of public services and the dress of the clergy. Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester, who died at the stake (1555), for a long time refused to be consecrated, from conscientious scruples against the usual episcopal habits; and Bishop Jewell pronounced the clerical garb a stage dress, and a relic of the Amorites. It is noticeable that two of Elizabeth's archbishops — Parker (1559-75) and Grindal (1575-80) — were averse to enforcing uniformity in these matters. The latter, with Bishops Parkhurst and Ponet, not only would not have allowed a co-ordinate authority to the presbyterian system of Geneva, but would have gone even farther (Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vol. I. p. 39, Boston ed.). Grindal was so lukewarm in obeying the wish for the suppression of the Puritan "Prophecyings," as to incur suspension from his office. By a royal proclamation these were suppressed, as before a royal proclamation had required the use of clerical vestments. It was thus decided that no liberty in matters of ritual and the conduct of public worship was to be tolerated. These acts forced many Puritan clergymen to resign their benefits. In Grindal's successor, Archbishop Whitgift (1583-1604), Elizabeth had a prelate more to her hand. The breach between the two parties became wider; and if the Church on her part was intolerant of all disagreement, the Puritans on theirs became coarse, as in the so-called Mar-prelate controversy (1588), when they issued scurrilous libels against the queen and bishops. The controversy was closed in 1683 by an act of Parliament making Puritanism an offence against the statute law.
ENGLAND.

728

ENGLAND.

The history of the seventeenth century is marked by the consolidation of the Church in spite of a temporary triumph of Puritanism, the growth of the doctrine of the essential necessity of episcopacy, the first indications of which show themselves in the Puritan controversy of the Elizabethan period, and a consequent intolerance towards all dissent from its forms and doctrines, culminating in the harsh legislation of Charles II. Under James I. (1603-25), who came to England with a cordial hatred of Presbyterianism, the Puritan party was completely humiliated. All their hopes, expressed in the famous Mildmay Petition, signed by eight hundred clergymen, and asking for the removal of superstitious usages from the Prayer-Book, etc., were doomed to disappointment. James maintained relations with the churches of the Continent, and sent five commissioners to represent the Church of England at the synod of Dort with instructions to "favour no innovations in doctrine, and to conform to the confessions of the neighboring Reformed churches." But full sympathy with the Continental churches was hereafter rendered impracticable, and recognition of their orders (as was the case under Elizabeth, see Professor Fisher, in the New-Englisher, January, 1874, pp. 121-172) impossible by the high views of episcopacy which were spreading, and which, under Archbishop Laud (1633-45), assumed an extreme form. This prelate taught that episcopacy was not necessary to the well-being, but essential to the very being, of the Church. His administration revived the ritual of Rome, and displayed, or seemed to display, so much sympathy with it, that he was offered a cardinal's hat. Since his day a large liberty of opinion has been allowed and practised. Discontinued the use of the Liturgy (Scott. 10, 1642). Puritanism triumphed for a time; but its attempt to establish an ecclesiastical government was, in spite of towering theological intellects, and the massive and stern genius of Cromwell, a failure. (See the masterly account of Green, vol. iii. 321 sqq.)

The accession of Charles II. in 1660 restored the Episcopal Church to the national position which it has ever since held. Harsh measures against the Puritans soon followed. By the Act of Uniformity of 1662 the use of the Prayer-Book was rigidly enforced; and two thousand English clergymen, amongst them some of the most scholarly and pious divines of the time (Baxter and Howe), were driven from their benefices. These hardships were increased by the Five-Mile Act (1665), which forbade them to approach within five miles of any parliamentary town or other place where they had preached. The Test Act of 1673, by excluding all Puritans from office, completed their discomfiture, and marked the culminating device of legislation disabling dissenters. Charles II. died a Roman Catholic. His brother James II. lived one. His efforts, however, to restore confidence and toleration for the Roman Church failed.

The accession of William and Mary ushered in a new epoch. To put it in a strong way, the principle that the National Church had an exclusive right to existence and protection was abrogated. The movement in favor not only of toleration, but of the heathen abode abroad and the deposed classes at home, in practical efforts to plant missions, and found charitable institutions. —men like Venn and Newton and Cowper and Wilberforce, —brought a warm consecration to their work, and vied with the more eloquent but no more devoted leaders of the Methodist movement to spread the truths and blessings of the gospel. And so the century went out with an intense sympathy for the heathen abroad and the deposed classes at home, in practical efforts to plant missions, and found charitable institutions. The present century has witnessed the realization of these plans in part or in whole. No preceding period has been distinguished for piety at home and abroad as the century of the nineteenth century. This is eminently true of the Church of England. It has also given evidence of vigor, as well as been distracted, by discussions of ecclesiastical order and discipline. The so-called Tractarian movement has agitated the Church to its depths. While Parliament was legislating in the interest of equal political rights, a movement in the interest of deeper piety, more aggressive effort, churchly zeal, and church authority, was spreading at Oxford (1839). Dr. Pusey was the moral, Dr. Newman the intellectual leader, and the saintly Keble the poet, of this movement. It led to a new investigation of the claims of the Catholic Church; and, before a decade had passed, the Church received a blow, from which, Lord Beaconsfield said a few years ago, it "still continues to reel." John Henry Newman, Edward Manning, Frederick W. Faber, and others of her ablest men of the clergy and nobility, went over to the Roman-Catholic communion.

The present state of opinion in the Church is classified under three heads. The High-Church party lays emphasis upon the exclusive right of episcopacy and apostolical succession, and practise an advanced ritual. The extreme wing, known as the Ritualists, has introduced practices which the Reformers regarded as papistical, such as the elevation of the host, auricular confession, the burning of candles, etc. Some of their number go even so far as to declare the Reformation to have been a mistake and a misfortune. They display great zeal and devotion in benevolent church-work. Occupying opposite ground is the Low-Church party, which holds strictly to the natural interpretation of the Thirty-nine Articles, denies episcopacy to be of the essence of the Church, and renounces so-called ritualistic practices. Between these two schools a third has grown up within the last fifty years. Its combination of tolerant sympathies with loyalty to the Church has secured for it the name of the Broad-Church party. Among its more prominent representatives have been Arnold, Julius Hare, Maurice, Kingsley, and Stanley. During the century the vigorous life of the Church has been further shown by the restoration of cathedrals, and construction of churches, in the creation of new episcopal sees at home, — Truro, St. Albans (1877), and Liverpool (1880), — and the rapid extension of the Church and episcopate in the Colonies. At no time in its history has it been stronger and more vigorous than now, more munificent in its gifts for the conversion of the heathen, or more adapted to secure the esteem, and win the rest, of the Anglo-Saxon people.

The worship of the Church of England is liturgical, and regulated by the Book of Common Prayer, one of the most precious legacies of the Protestant Reformation. Its beautiful forms of service, and its solemn and venerable prayers, are not only among the choicest specimines of English, but exert an influence on the ear and heart of those who use them which nothing else can replace. The rubrics (so called from having been printed in red ink) give directions for the small details of the service. The sabbath services consist of prayers, lessons from the Scriptures, responsive reading of the Psalms, chants, hymns, the offertory, and the sermon. The form and matter of the service of baptism, communion, marriage, and other services, are all prescribed. The inconveniences of this method are not to be overlooked, by which all departure from the fixed form is forbidden. An illustration is found in the service of burial. In all cases, over the most notorious sinner, as well as the pious churchman, the same consolatory passages (1 Cor. xv., etc.) are read, and the same prayers offered. But, on the other hand, there are manifest advantages which it would be hard to deny. See, on this subject, art. LITURGY.

IV. The Clergy and Clerical Patronage. — The clergy consists of three orders, — deacons, priests (presbyters), and bishops. The canonical age is respectively twenty-three, twenty-four, and thirty. The duties of the deacons are to render assistance to the priest in the services of the sanctuary and in pastoral work. He may preach, read the prayers and Scripture-lessons, assist in the distribution of the elements at communion, and administer baptism. In his ordination he asserts to the Thirty-nine Articles and the constitution of the Episcopal Church as agreeable with the word of God. The priest serves at the altar, and consecrates the elements in the Lord's Supper.
At his ordination the bishop pronounces upon him the words, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God," etc.
This is interpreted to be a petition for the anointing of the Holy Spirit, or to mark the transmission of a heavenly grace through the bishop, according to the different standpoint of the interpreter.
The bishop has the exclusive right of ordination, confirmation, or admitting members to the Lord's table, and the consecration of churches. Bishops are appointed by the crown. A conge d'elire is sent to the chapter when a bishopric is vacant; but it is only a formality, as the name of the new incumbent is sent with it. A class of the priesthood known as the dignited clergy are the deans and archdeacons. Deans have charge of cathedral churches, and are assisted by canons, the number of which may not exceed six for any cathedral.
The archdeacon assists the bishop in his official duties as superintendent of the diocese. He holds synods, delivers charges, and visits parishes. He is himself sometimes aided by rural deans. Both these classes are members of convocation by virtue of their office. No bishop is allowed to transgress the limits of his diocese in the performance of episcopal functions, unless requested so to do.
The bishops frequently associate with themselves suffragan bishops.

England is divided into the two archbishoprics of Canterbury and York. Within the limits of the former there are twenty-three sees, including the two new ones (Truro and St. Albans) created 1877, within the latter, seven. — Durham, Ripon, Chester, Carlisle, Manchester, Liverpool (organized 1880), and Sodor and Man. In the order of dignity they rank, Canterbury, York, London, Durham, Winchester, etc. In addition to the Irish (twelve) and Scotch (seven) bishops, there are at present, in connection with the Church of England, sixty-five colonial and ten missionary bishops. The first colonial see was Nova Scotia (1756). The see of Calcutta was organized 1813.
Nineteen colonial or missionary bishops have resigned their sees, and are now living in England. There are thirty deans presiding over as many cathedrals. The Deans of Westminster and Winchester are independent of episcopal control, and directly subject to the crown. All the sees have deans, except Liverpool, St. Albans, Truro, and Sodor and Man. There are eighty-two archde-acons, and six hundred and thirteen rural deans.
The lower clergy of the Church in England and Wales (who number about 25,000) are called rectors, vicars, curates, etc. The benefices, or livings, number nearly 13,500. Their patron-ate is divided between the crown (1,550 livings), the bishops (1,885), universities (750), private patrons (5,000), etc. The consent of the bishop at the deanery is necessary to the induction of an archdeacon, but the consent of a dean is necessary to the induction of a rector, vicar, or curate.
In cases of disagreement between pastor and people the case is decided by the Court of Arches. The people have no voice in the choice of their rector; but the rector, one inducted, has absolute control of his church, so that even the bishop may enter it without his consent. Many of the parishes have endowments in lands: others are supported, in whole or in part, from public funds, such as Queen Anne's Bounty. The system of patronage has led to very great abuses, some of which still remain. Benefices are sometimes held up for public sale, and, being subject to the choice of private patrons, may be filled with men of little ability or small interest in the spiritual welfare of the people. The Plurality system, by which a clergyman might hold any number of livings at the same time, and which was so much abused in the latter part of the last century, has been modified by parliamentary legislation. Under the present law no one can hold two cathedral positions at the same time. The holder of a cathedral position may hold besides only one parish. A dean may have two parishes; but, if the one numbers three thousand souls, the other may not include more than five hundred.
The evils of non-residence have likewise been restrained by law. The yearly income of the Church of England amounts to at least eight million pounds. The income of the Archbishop of Canterbury is fifteen thousand pounds; of York, ten thousand pounds; of London, ten thousand pounds; of Durham, eight thousand pounds.
The lowest income is that of the Bishop of Sodor and Man which amounts to two thousand pounds.
The average income of a dean is one thousand pounds. The incomes of the clergy are from one hundred and fifty pounds upward. A fund managed by the so-called "Ecclesiastical Comission," and supplied by the revenues of suppressed canories, sinecures, and the surplus revenues of bishops' and above the episcopal salary, is used for the augmentation of bishoprics, the increase of the smaller salaries, the endowment of new ministers, etc. This commission was constituted in 1835.

V. Church Polity. — The Church or spirituality of England is one of the estates of the realm.
It relates to the State is one of dependence, the Sovereign being its supreme governor; and a Parliament its highest legislature. The Archbishop of Canterbury is the first peer in the realm, and crowns the king. The bishops have their "palaces," and seats in the House of Lords, except the Bishops of Sodor and Man, Liverpool, Truro, and St. Albans. The Church does not legislate for itself independently or directly; it is subject to Parliament.

The Convocations of Canterbury and York are the two highest official church bodies. Constittuted by Edward I., they enjoyed independent rights of ecclesiastical legislation until 1532, when, by the Submission of the Clergy, they became subject to the king. In 1717 the Convocation of Canterbury was dissolved by George I., for the supposed hostility of the lower house to the House of Hanover, was not revived till 1852, and did not receive the royal license to proceed to business till 1861. These convocations consist of two houses. Over the upper house the bishop of the archdiocese presides. The lower house, whose presiding officer is called prolocutor, is made up of the archdeacons, deans, and representatives of the lower clergy. The laity have no representation. In the Convocation of York the distinction between the two houses is only made on occasions of actual transaction of business. The archbishops have the right of veto upon all measures. Convocation is assembled by the king's writ, and cannot proceed to make new canons without his license, nor have its decisions validity till confirmed by his sanction.

England.

The judicial business is transacted in three courts. The lowest is the Diocesan Consistory Court, presided over by the bishop's chancellor. Appealed cases go up to the Court of Arches, the official head of which is styled Dean of the Arches. The last tribunal of appeal is the king in council. There are three church censures,—suspension (for the neglect of parish duties), deprivation, and degradation. The two latter follow upon the disuse of the Prayer-Book, teachings subversive of the Thirty-nine Articles, simony, or conviction in a civil court. The Court of Arches alone exercises the right of deprivation.

ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS. 1. Anglo-Saxon.

—The earliest monument is that of CEDMON, a monk of Whitby (d. 690), On the Origin of Things, consisting of poetical paraphrases of parts of the Bible, some of which were published by Junius at Amsterdam, 1655, and most of them by Thorpe (Cedmon's Metrical Paraphrase of Parts of the Holy Scripture, with an English translation, notes, etc.), London, 1832. In the beginning of the eighth century Aldhelm and Guthlac produced an interlinear Anglo-Saxon version of the Psalter on the basis of the Roman text. The manuscript is among the Cotton Manuscripts marked Vespasian A., I. In 790 (circa) Eadfrith, Bishop of Lindisfarne, translated parts of the Gospels (Durham Book; Cotton Manuscripts, Nero D., IV.); and the Venerable Bede died (735) while engaged on the translation of John, in which he only proceeded to the beginning of chapter six. Parts of the Book of Exodus and the Psalter were translated by King Alfred (d. 901). The Rushworth Gloss (in the Bodleian Library), an interlinear evangelistic, made by Farmen and Owen about the same time, is peculiarly interesting from the agreement of its Latin text with the Codex Bezæ where it differs from the Textus Receptus. Proverbs, in part, in an Anglo-Saxon version, belongs to the tenth century (Cotton Manuscripts, Vespasian D., VI.).

Towards the close of that century Aelfric, peculiarly curious to the monks of the period, produced in popular form paraphrases of the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, parts of the historical books (Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles), Esther, Job (perhaps), Judith, and the Maccabees. Of these, the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Job, and part of Judith, were printed by Whittaker's Almanack, Lond., 1868, 8vo.

An Anglo-Saxon version of the Gospels, of somewhat later date, by an unknown translator, based on an ancient Byzantine Latin text, with a preface by John Foxe the martyrologist, was printed in London by John Daye, 1571, 4to.

There exist, likewise, in manuscript, several copies of the Psalter, written shortly before the Conquest, and three Anglo-Norman manuscripts of the Gospels, of which the first is assigned to the time of William III., and the two others to

1 The Durham Book, however, is ascribed to the priest Aldred, eighth or ninth century.

2. Wiclifite. — Prior to Wiclif we have the Ornulum, so called from its author,Orm or Ormin, an English monk who lived in or about the twelfth century, and says in the preface,This bos is neccessary, for that Orrnum it werhite. It is a metrical paraphrase on the Gospels and Acts, neither alliterative nor in rhyme, but in imitation of a certain species of Latin medieval poems, and is remarkable for its smooth, fluent, and regular versification. It was published by Dr. White, Oxford, 1832. — The Socioelethe, a very large volume (Bodelian Manuscripts, 779), ascribed to the thirteenth century, author unknown, contains, among other writings, a metrical paraphrase of the Old and New Testaments. — A paraphrase, in the Northern dialect, of Genesis and Exodus, author and date unknown (? before 1300), and a metrical version of the Psalms, the first known translation into English, from the text of the Gallican (Jerome's) Latin Psalter, are among the manuscripts of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. — The first prose translation of the Psalter into English is that of Richard Rolle, hermit of Hampole (assigned to the first half of the fourteenth century). It is excellent in its way; e.g., (Ps. xxiii. 4) "For woon I haldes gow in myydil of the shadow of death; I shall not dredes yeles for thou art with me." There are quite a number of other manuscripts, notably one in Benet College, mentioned by Lewis, of which this is a specimen (Mark vi. 22) "When the doughtyr of that Herodias was in comyn and had tombide and pleisd to Harowde, and als to the sittonde at mete the king says to the wench." — John de Trevissa, Vicar of Berkeley, said to have translated the whole Bible into English before 1387, appears to have Englished only a few isolated passages: the assertion cannot be verified. The literature is given below. — Wiclif, b. 1324 at Wiclif, near Richmond, in Yorkshire; studied at Oxford; was warden of Balliol Hall, rector of Fylingham, and warden of Canterbury Hall (1361–65), royal chaplain, and commissioner to Bruges (1374); on his return to England he was presented by the crown with the prebend of Aust and the rectory of Berkworth, in Yorkshire; studied at Lutterworth in Leicestershire, which he held until his death (1384). The generally received statement, that it was only during the last ten years of his life that he was engaged upon the translation of the Scriptures, lacks proof; and it is safer to hold, with Baber, that he bestowed upon that great work a much longer period. His translation of the Bible is the first published translation, which imports that he must have been unremitting in his zeal to diffuse it among the people; and the proof is furnished in the fact, that, 22 years after the publication of 1408, numerous copies of it have come down to us. His version was made from the Vulgate; i.e., from Jerome's version, or such copies as passed for it. The portion from Genesis to Baruch iii. 20 was made by Nicholas de Hereford, an English ecclesiastic: the balance of the Old Testament and of the Apocrypha, as well as the whole of the New Testament, are ascribed to Wiclif. The original text of the version was completed about 1380; the revision of it by Richard Purvey was finished about 1388. It may be considered certain that Hereford did not translate from the Latin alone, but used the French translation from which the new idiom introduced is clearly taken. The New Testament of Wiclif was made from the Latin and Anglo-Saxon, and is rather literal: the revision by Purvey, and other unpublished versions in manuscript, seek to give the sense. Purvey's authorities were Augustine, Jerome, the Glossa Ordinaria, and Lyra. Wiclif's Version is, as to style, robust, terse, and homely; Purvey's, and that of the others referred to, more polished, though quaint. The peculiar strength of the Authorized Version is of Wiclifite origin. In the absence of illustrations, for which no space can be found, a few examples of curious renderings may be given (Matt. v. 22, "fy" or "fogh" for "race"); Luke xvi. 13, "bishop" for "high priest"), as well as of explanatory glosses, now more obscure than the word to be explained; e.g., yovel fame, schendeschep; incorruptile, that may not dye ne ben pygre; justified, founten trew; acception of persons, that is put con before an other that is usuftoun deserte. Of obsolete words employed, the following are samples: tendith, kindlith; anenitis, with; unbileful, unbelieving; leende, loins; herbore, lodging; mawmetis, idols; haburioun, breastplate; areltid, imputed; (hill-e, employed, the following are samples: tendith, kindlith; anenitis, with; unbileful, unbelieving; leende, loins; herbore, lodging; mawmetis, idols; haburioun, breastplate; areltid, imputed; (hill-e,
ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS.

fixed: the strongest probability points to Wittenberg. But the writer of this article feels warnanted to announce the established facts, that the Pentateuch in the first editions of the Bible, Hans Luft never had a printing-press in that place, and that neither Tyndale nor Fryth ever were at Marburg. These conclusions, published by the author Dec. 10, 1881, have since been fully confirmed by Professor Dr. Julius Cesar, the librarian of the University of Marburg, and are stated at length in his forthcoming volume on the English versions. — The numerous surrep-titious editions of Tyndale's New Testament cannot be noticed here. The Pentateuch was published in 1530, the Book of Jonah in 1531. There is evidence that Tyndale translated, though he did not live to publish, other portions of the Old Testament from the Hebrew, most probably to the end of Second Chronicles, and several of the prophethical books. The translation of the Old Testament was his occupation in the gloomy prison of Vilvorde, where he was confined from May 1535, till Oct. 6, 1536, which day he suffered martyrdom, having been first strangled, and then burned. — Tyndale's translation is the first English version made from the original tongues.
His helps were very meagre; and although he used the Vulgate, Wiclif, and Luther, he is thoroughly independent. His English is noble, and his phraseology Saxon, his idiom singularly pure; and much of his version remains unchanged in the Authorized Version, of which it is really the original basis. Samples of his felicitous renderings are:
(Matt. xiv. 14) "his heart did melt upon them;"
(xv. 27) "the whelps eat of the crumbs;" (xxiv.
11) "iniquity shall have the upper hand;" (Mark viii. 29) "thou art very Christ;" (Luke xxii. 1)
"the feast of sweet bread drew nigh, which is called Easter;" (John i. 7) "filled them up to the hard brim;" (Acts xii. 18) "there was not a little ado among the soldiers;" (1 Cor. ii. 10)
"searcheth the bottom of God's Secrets;" (Phil.
i. 8) "I am as near to the very heart of the root in Jesus Christ;" (1 Tim. vi. 4) "but wasteth his brains about questions;" (Heb. viii.
1) "this is the pith;" (Jas. i. 1) "which are scattered here and there." Samples of homely phrases: (Matt. xxvi. 60) "and when they had said grace;" (Bev. i. 10) "I was in the Spirit on a Sunday;" (Acts xiv. 13) "brought oxen and garlands unto the church porch." — The numerous editions of Tyndale's New Testament cannot be noticed here beyond saying that that of 1526 (1528) is the first; and that of 1534-35, with the monogram G. H. on the second title, the last.
(See Fry's Collation of Three New Testaments of William Tyndale, etc., and Biographical Description of Tyndale's New Testaments, and of two editions of the Bishops' Version, London, 1879.)

4. Coverdale's. — Miles Coverdale, b. about 1498 at Coverdale, in the North Riding of Yorkshire; educated at Cardinal College, Oxford, and by John, Bishop of Chalcedon, at Norwich, in 1514. He fled to the Continent; but his meeting with Tyndale is purely conjectural, and his having assisted him in the translation of the Scriptures not only improbable, but absurd; for he was not an independent scholar, and his moderate proficiency in the tongues the accretion of a later period. Where he was from 1528 to 1535 is not positively known. At the instance of Cranwell took in hand the translation of the Bible; and, as he was unquestionably an excellent German scholar, his proficiency in German as the nature of its execution sustains, the honest titlepage of his first edition of the Bible (printed most probably by Froshover at Zürich, 1535) Viz., Biblia — the Bible: that is, the Holy Scripture of the Olde and Newe Testament, faithfully and truly translated out of Douce and Latyn into Englishes, MDXXXV. The "Douce" un doubt-edly signifies "German," and the German versions he used were Luther's and the Zurich, perhaps also the Worms editions. The Latin versions he used were the Vulgate and that of Pagninus; and the published portions of Tyndale were the basis of his English. The Old Testament from Second Chronicles onward is Coverdale's own work: that is, it is a translation of Luther's and the Zurich versions, and a very servile one. His Diglott New Testament (exhibiting the English and the Vulgate in parallel columns) appeared in three editions (1538); his Bible was published in London by Andrewes Hester in 1550, and by B. Johnson in 1553. The part Coverdale had in the production of the Great Bible is noticed below. Coverdale's Version, though a second-hand production, has the merit of a pure and strong idiom: it is the basis of the version of the Psalter in the Book of Common Prayer. His language and his renderings are very musical; e.g., (Ps. x. 10) "The days of our age are threescore years and ten;"

(Isa. xlviii. 19) "Thy seed shall be like as the sand in the sea, and the fruit of thy body like the gravel-stones thereof; thy name shall not be rooted out, nor destroyed before me." He is also very quaint; e.g., (Job xix. 18) "Yea, the very desert fools despise me;" (Prov. xvi. 28) "he that is a blabbe of his tongue maketh division;" (Jer. xvi. 1) "graven upon the edge of your altars with a pen of iron and with an adamant claw;" (Col. ii. 10) "Let no man make you shoo t at a wrong mark, which after the own choosing walketh in humbleness and spirituality of angels, things which he never saw."

5. Matthew's. — The name of Thomas Matthew is an alias of John Rogers, b. about 1500, at Deritend (in Birmingham); educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge (B.A., 1525); transferred to Cardinal College, Oxford, where he took orders the same year. He was next rector of Holy Trinity, London (1582), and accepted the chapllancy at Antwerp, probably in 1584; there he became acquainted with Tyndale, and subse-sequently his literary executor. He published (whence is not known, but most probably at Wittenberg) a folio edition of the Bible, entitled The Bible, which is all the Holy Scriptures, in which are contained the Olde and Neve Testaments, truly and purely translated into English, by Thomas Matthew. Ensy, I, Hearcken to, ye heavens, and thou earth, grace and priyce. London, 1587.
MDXXVII. This folio is a composite volume, and its critical analysis shows that the Penta-teach, and the portion from Joshua to Second Chronicles, as well as the whole of the New Testament, are Tyndale's translation; the remainder is Coverdale's. He mishandled these materials unless explicitly ed and revised them. He added very valu-

ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS.
ble preatory matter, especially the "Summe and content of all the Holy Scripture, both of the Olde and the Newe Testament," and "A Table of the pryncypal matters conteyned in the Bybble, in which the readers may fynde and practyse many commune places," filling twenty-six folio pages, and constituting a sort of concordance and dictionary. It is chiefly taken from the French Bible of Olivetan. He likewise added several alternate renderings in his notes, introduced by the formula, "Some reade." He placed the contents or summaries before each chapter, and the notes at the end. His notes are diversified (textual, doctrinal, polemical, and practical), and form almost a running commentary. They are of various origin: many are taken from Pellicanus, and quite a number are original. His anti-papal notes are very striking: that on Matt. xvi. ("I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock, etc.) reads, "That is, as saith St. Austin, upon the confession which thou hast made, knowing me to be Christ, the Son of the living God, I will build my congregation or Church;" that on xxv. ("And the wise answered, Not so, lest there be not enough, etc."). "Note here that their own good works sufficed not for themselves, and therefore remained none to be distributed unto their fellows." The title of the Apocrypha reads, The volume of the bokes called Aporypha conteyned in the comen translation in Latyn, which are not found in the Hebrue, nor in the Chalde. He supplies the prayer of Manasses, omitted by Coverdale, from the French version of Olivetan; and he protests, in the language of the same writer, against their reception as an inspired collection. The peculiarities of the version, as distinguished from Tyndale's and Coverdale's, cannot be illustrated here; but an idea of it may be conveyed by two or three of its characteristic notes. "Selah. This word, after Rabbi Kimchi, was a sign or token of lifting up the voice, and also a monition and advertisement to enforce the thought and mind earnestly to give heed to the meaning of the verse unto which it is added. Some will that it signifies perpetually or verily." "Messiah. It signifieth anointed. Jesus Christ was a sign or token of lifting up the voice, and therefore remained none to be distributed unto the Israel of God." In 1551 his Old Testament appeared in the folio Bible, revised by Becke, and printed by Jhon Day. After that period it fell into neglect. The Epistles in this edition, as well as Matthew's Bible, follow the order of the Authorized Version as far as Philo-DEM, after which come the Epistles of John, Hebrews, First and Second Peter, James, and Jude.

7. The Great Bible.—Tyndale's and Matthew's Bibles were for ecclesiastical reasons, Coverdale's, on account of its inaccuracy, not acceptable to Cranwell, at whose instance and charge the latter was directed to produce a new edition on more critical principles. Coverdale, accompanied by Grafton, repaired for that purpose to Paris (1538), where better paper and more skilful printing were to be had; and the work progressed satisfactorily at the press of Regnault, until, by the interference of the inquisitor-general, it was stopped, and had to be distributed (April 1539) in London. This handsome folio, on account of its size, is the Great Bible, not Cranmer's, as it is sometimes loosely called. Its title runs: The Byble in Englyshe, that is to saye, the content of all the Holy Scripture, bothe of the Olde and Neue testament, truly translated after the vurgie of the Hebrue and Greke teztes, by the dylygent studye of dyverse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tonges. Prynetyd by Rychard Grafton & Edward Wachchurch. Cum privilegio ad imprimitum solum, 1539. These dyverse excellent learned men "appear to have been the works of Münster and Erasmus. The elaborate frontispiece of this Bible is said to have been designed by Iolbein. It is the text of Matthew, revised, or Coverdale's revision of Tyndale and of his own Bible; and he was so little attached to that, that (e.g., in Isa. lxxii.) he corrected it, and very unequal. His revision is frequently in servile imitation of the Vulgate, on which he seems to have wholly relied in the Old Testament; e.g. (Gen. i. 2) "the Spirit of God was borne upon" (ferebatur); (i. 7) "and so it was done" (factum est); "bereath seed" (afferentem). In the New Testament, on the other hand, both the number and quality of his renderings proclaim the finished Grecian; and a large proportion of them are retained in the Authorized Version. Matt. i. 25 (Matthew's "Till shr short brught forth her first borne sons") he renders "yll at last she had brought forth her first borne sonne;" xxii. 12 ("he was even speechless") is changed into "had never a word to say;" and xxii. 84 ("put the Sadducees to silence") into "stopped the Sadducees mouth." In his studious endeavor to find Saxon terms, he gave us (1 John ii. 1) "spokesman" for "advocate," and (at ii. 2) coined "mercystock" as the equivalent of Daapoc, and in place of Tyndale's and Coverdale's "he it is that obtaineth grace for us." To his regard for the Greek article are due the renderings (John i. 9), "that was the true light which . . . coming." (i. 20) "I am a voice of one crying," (i. 25) "Art thou the prophet?" Among the many phrases introduced by him, and retained in the Authorized Version, are, (Matt. xiii. 58) "because of their unbelief," (xviii. 12) "ninety and nine," (xxv. 8) "a stranger," (xxvi. 65) "Ye have a watch," (Gal. iv. 20) "I stand in doubt of you," (vi. 16) "the Israel of God." In 1539 his Old Testament appeared in the folio Bible, revised by Becke, and printed by Chyon Day. After that period it fell into neglect. The Epistles in this edition, as well as Matthew's Bible, follow the order of the Authorized Version as far as Philo-DEM, after which come the Epistles of John, Hebrews, First and Second Peter, James, and Jude.

8. Taverner's.—Richard Taverner, b. at Bris-ley, Norfolk, about 1505; studied at Cambridge and Oxford (B.A., 1529); was a fine Greek scholar, and, though a laic, was asked by Cranwell to revise the Bible, which work he completed in 1539. It is more than an examination (recognition), and less than a new translation, occasioned partly by criticism, and very unequal. His recognition is frequently in servile imitation of the Vulgate, on which he seems to have wholly relied in the Old Testament; e.g. (Gen. i. 2) "the Spirit of God was borne upon" (ferebatur); (i. 7) "and so it was done" (factum est); "bereath seed" (afferentem). In the New Testament, on the other hand, both the number and quality of his renderings proclaim the finished Grecian; and a large proportion of them are retained in the Authorized Version. Matt. i. 25 (Matthew's "Till shr short brught forth her first borne sons") he renders "yll at last she had brought forth her first borne sonne;" xxii. 12 ("he was even speechless") is changed into "had never a word to say;" and xxii. 84 ("put the Sadducees to silence") into "stopped the Sadducees mouth." In his studious endeavor to find Saxon terms, he gave us (1 John ii. 1) "spokesman" for "advocate," and (at ii. 2) coined "mercystock" as the equivalent of Daapoc, and in place of Tyndale's and Coverdale's "he it is that obtaineth grace for us." To his regard for the Greek article are due the renderings (John i. 9), "that was the true light which . . . coming." (i. 20) "I am a voice of one crying," (i. 25) "Art thou the prophet?" Among the many phrases introduced by him, and retained in the Authorized Version, are, (Matt. xiii. 58) "because of their unbelief," (xviii. 12) "ninety and nine," (xxv. 8) "a stranger," (xxvi. 65) "Ye have a watch," (Gal. iv. 20) "I stand in doubt of you," (vi. 16) "the Israel of God." In 1539 his Old Testament appeared in the folio Bible, revised by Becke, and printed by Chyon Day. After that period it fell into neglect. The Epistles in this edition, as well as Matthew's Bible, follow the order of the Authorized Version as far as Philo-DEM, after which come the Epistles of John, Hebrews, First and Second Peter, James, and Jude.
table before me again mine enemies: "thou anointest my head with oil, and fullest my cuppe full;" (GREAT BIBLE, 1539) "Thou shalt prepare a table before me against them that trouble me; thou hast anointed my head with oil, & my cuppe shalbe full;" (2 Gal. iii. 7 (TYNDALE), "Understand therefore that," (GREAT BIBLE, 1539), "ye know therefore" (scitis iujur); iii. 29 (TYNDALE), "by promise," (GREAT BIBLE) "by promise;" (casus duplicis) "by promise." This Bible was very popular. A new edition appeared in the next year, again revised (and unsparring, though often for the worse) by Cranmer. It had a preface by Cranmer; and the editions of April, July, and November, 1540, and May, November, and December, 1541, are really the Cranmer Bibles. This Bible (the Great and Cranmer's) remained the authorized version for twenty-eight years. The greater part of the portions of the Scriptures in the Prayer-Books of 1549 and 1552 were taken from it. It contains numerous paraphrastic and supplementary clauses from the Vulgate, and is decidedly inferior to Matthew's.

8. The Genevan.—Three among the English exiles at Geneva (namely, William Whittingham, Thomas Sampson, and Anthony Gilby) are conspicuous among the translators of this version; and among these three the most laborious was William Whittingham, b. at Lanchester, near Durham, in 1524; an Oxford man; married the sister of John Calvin's wife (Catherine Jaquemaine of Orléans); and was minister of the English Church at Geneva. They produced from the original Greek the New Testament, first in 1549, and a distinct version of it, with the whole Bible, in 1560. The first seems to have been the sole work of Whittingham, and was printed before the translation of the entire Bible was taken in hand. The Testament of 1549 was a small octavo, entitled The Newe Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ, conferred diligently with the Grecce and best approved translations. With the arguments as well before the Chapters, as for every Boke and Epistle, also diversities of readings, and most profitable annotations of all hard places: wherunto is added a copious Table. At Geneva, printed by Conrad Badius, MDL VII. This Testament is really Tyndale's, revised, collated with the Great Bible; which in the New Testament is likewise based on that version, and a strong leaning on Beza, with the result of a substantial agreement with Tyndale, a less frequent difference from him, and agreement with the Great Bible, and an occasional agreement with Beza and difference from the two former. Among its peculiar readings note: (Matt. ix. 16) "No man receiteth an ole garment with a peece of new clothe and vnressed. For that same piece taketh away something from the garment, and the cutte is made worse;" (Luke xvi. 9) "there is a little boy here;" (Acts xxvii. 9) "because also the tyme of the Fast was passid;" (xxvi. 13) "lowsed nearer" (cf. ASISON, in Wiclif, Tyndale, and Great Bible), all exhibiting independent and superior scholaraship, which likewise distinguish the notes for which the Genevan Testament is famous, and most of which were put into the edition of 1560. These notes are mostly original, or selected from Calvin and Beza, and treat of theology, history, geography, etc.; some are also inferential. This Testament is the first English Testament with verse division. The whole Bible of 1560 is a noble, scholarly, philosophic product, with important Hebraist; and the translators were indebted in the Old Testament to Pagninus, Munster, and Leo Judae. In the New Testament the force of the Greek particles ywv, &c., is uniformly attended to. It was finished and published April, 1660, and printed by Rowland Hall. It is known also as the Breeches Bible, from the rendering of Gen. iii. 7. "They sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves breeches." It was printed — at the expense of the English congregation at Geneva, of which John Bodley (father of Sir Thomas, the founder of the Bodleian Library at Oxford) was a generous member — in quartos, and became very popular, more than one hundred and thirty editions having been published, the last in 1644, and the Authorized Version, with the Genevan notes, in 1715. Peculiar and novel features were, the attempted restoration of the original form of Hebrew names, the omission of St. Paul from the title of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the use of Italic letters for supplemental words, the substitution of biblical events and the names of reformers for the names of saints in the Calendar, and the entire omission of the Apocrypha. The Anglo-Genevan edition of the New Testament of 1576, by Lawrence Tomson, one of the best linguists of the day, introduced many changes, especially in the rendering of the article by that (e.g., John i. 1, 4, 5, 9, 14, etc.), and the notes, which, though more numerous, are less pithy than the old ones. The first Bible printed in Scotland (1579) is an exact reprint of the Genevan of 1561.

9. The Bishops'.—The superior merits of the Genevan Bible, its great popularity, and the general dissatisfaction with the Great Bible, induced Archbishop Parker to make preparations for a new edition under church authority, leading to a revision of that Bible by the originals with the aid of Pagninus and Munster, etc., temperate annotations, the marking of unedifying portions, and the use, where required, of nobler forms of expression. Some of his episcopal coadjudors held extraordinary views (e.g., Bishops Guest, Cox, and Sandys), and the archbishop exercised accordingly a wise discretion in the assigning of the several books. The revision — on which not less than eight bishops were engaged (hence its name), as well as several deans and professors — was completed, and the Bible published in a hand-some folio, on good paper, and superbly printed, in 1568, 1569, 1570, 1571 (New Testament), and 1572. It contains a vast amount of excellent prefatory and introductory matter, among it the preface by the archbishop, and Cranmer's prologue, and is highly ornamented, some of the ornaments of very dubious taste; but it is of unequal merit; the different books in the edition of 1568 being qualitatively unequal, and the whole edition of 1572 greatly superior to the former. That of 1572 is the basis of the Authorized Version. The critical helps available to the Genevan translators were used by the translators of the Bishops' Bible; and, while the influence of the Genevan Version on this is very pronounced, the original was diligently consulted. The critical examination of Isa. liii. by Professor Westcott yields the result, that, of twenty-one corrections, five are due to the Genevan, five agree with Pagninus, three with Leo Judas, one with Castalio, one with Munster, one is linguistic, and three are apparently original. These last are the omission (lii. 3) of "Yea, he was . . . regarded him not," and (lii. 4) of "and punished," and the correction (lii. 4) of "infirmities" into "infirmity." In Job xix. 25 the Bishops' of 1568 brings the new rendering, "he shall raise up at the latter day them that lie in the dust." Twenty-nine passages in the New Testament of 1568, faulted by Lawrence as incorrect, were, for the most part, as corrected by him, received in the text of 1572, and into the Latin fathers text of the Authorized Version. The examination of Eph. iv. 7-16 (by Westcott) in the Great Bible of 1560, and the Bishops', shows, that, among twenty-six changes, seventeen are new, nine being due to the Genevan, and the remainder the result of close and thoughtful reference to the Greek. The independence of the revision is evident in that only four of the new changes agree with Beza, while nine go against him. But, in spite of many excellences, the Bishops' Bible was the least successful of all the English versions. As peculiar to this Bible appear the attempted classification of the books of the Bible into legal, historical, sapiential, and prophetic (with the curious result that the Gospels, the Catholic Epistles, and those to Titus, Philemon, and the Hebrews, are described as legal, the other Pauline Epistles as sapiential, the Acts alone as historical, and Revelation as prophetic), the indication of ostraconized portions, and, in one edition, two versions of the Psalter (Matthew's and the new).
ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS. 736

10. The Rheims and Douay. — William Allen, Gregory Martin, and Richard Bristow were the chief promoters of this extraordinary version, which contained for the Vulgate, threescore and six books made, not only equal authority with the original Scriptures, but superior, reasoning thus: As a rule, the Latin agrees with the Greek; when it differs from the common Greek text, it agrees with some copy, "as may be seen in Stephens's margin," and the adversaries frequently concede the superiority of the marginal readings; when the Greek goes against the Latin, quotations from the Greek fathers are sure to sustain it, and, where these fail, conjecture may come in to adapt the Greek to the Latin; and, where conjecture and the Greek fathers fail, the Latin fathers are almost sure to sustain the Vulgate, and, if their readings should differ, the cause is to be sought in "the great diuersitie and multitude" of the Latin copies. Admit these principles, and the superiority of the text of the Vulgate to the Greek text is established.

I am undecided whether the actual translation of the Rhenish New Testament agrees or conflicts with the expressed purpose of its authors; for their text, especially in the correct use of the article, often agrees with the Greek, and in spite of their deification of the Vulgate, even as authorized by the Council of Trent, and their ceaseless fulminations (in the notes) against heretics, they are greatly indebted to the Genevan monument, as the Genevan Version, the Bishops' Bible, and to Wiclif. The New Testament appeared in 1582, at Rheims, and the Old Testament in 1609, at Douay. The production is very scholarly, in fact, equal to that of any version extant at the time, and in the Genevan in useless as a translation. It is designedly literal, and its English so utterly unenglish, that it might pass for Latin; e.g., (Matt. i. 17) "transmigration of Babylon," (vi. 11) "supersubstantial bread," (xvi. 20) "what permutation," (Mark v. 35) "archangel stepped him in the sindon." (Luke xxii. 7) "the day of the Azymes . . . the pasche," (John vii. 5) "Scenopogis was at hand," (Rom. i. 30) "odible to God," (1 Cor. x. 11) "written to our correcption," (xi. 4) "dishonesteth his head," (Phil. ii. 7) "examinet himself," (Phil. iv. 15) "evidence of the present uncertain," (Eph. vi. 12) "agress commodious," (ix. 28) "exampler of the celestial," (xii. 16) "God is promerited," (Jas. iii. 4) "with a little sterne whither the violence of the director will," (iii. 6) "the wheels of our natuirty," (1 John iv. 5) "every spirit that dissolueth Jesus," (Rev. xxii. 14) "blesed are they that wash their stoles." This new beatitude may have been necessary in certain monasteries, but cannot be accepted by the Latin Church; for many copies of the Vulgate add, "in sanguine Agni." The version is nevertheless meritorious in other respects, notably in the uniformity of its renderings (e.g., of Amen, Rabbi, charity, multitude, work): but not a word of commendation can be said of the notes, which are truly savage. Lord Bacon liked this version. It is proper to add that the modern editions are less unenglish and less furious. See Vulgate New Testament with the Douay Version of 1688, London, 1881. See also below in Miscellaneous.

11. The Authorized Version. — At the Hampton Court Conference (1604) the demand of Reinolds for a new translation was really the starting-point which eventuated, mainly through the king's dislike (pretended or real) of the Authorized Version, the work (in all) of fifty-four scholars (forty-seven on the list), divided into six companies, of which two met at Westminster, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, for the space of three years; after which six men, two from each place, met in London to superintend the publication. Bishop, Bishop of Winchester, who wrote the arguments of the several books, and Dr. Miles Smith, who wrote the noble preface, were the final correctors. The preface states, among many other matters, that their object was to make of many good translations a principal good one, to avoid extremes, and produce uniformity of rendering. "Never was a great enterprise like the production of our Authorized Version, carried out with less knowledge handed down to posterity of the labourers, their method, and order of working" (Striver, Intro. to Cambridge Paragraph Bible). It was published in 1611; and a number of years elapsed before its intrinsic superiority and merits drove all other English translations out of the field. Taken as a whole, it is the best and most truly English version. Couched in noble language, it abounds in felicities. It is musical, dramatic, and even tragicall. It is, in turn, pathetic and sublime, and has, withall, a directness and force which commend it to all classes and conditions of men. But it is far from perfect; and wherein, in the opinion of many of its most ardent admirers, it should be made to conform more thoroughly and consistently with the original Scriptures remains to be briefly indicated under the following heads, preparatory to the Anglo-American revision:—

(1) The critical apparatus at the command of the translators of King James's Version was that already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arier Montanu (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597).

For the Greek text of the New Testament they had Beza's edition of 1586, and the third edition of Stephens, with this result (following from the critical value, or rather want of value, of those Testaments), that many readings of the Authorized Version were abandoned three times, and the Spanish y C. Reynal (1569), and Valera's already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arier Montanu (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597). For the Greek text of the New Testament they had Beza's edition of 1586, and the third edition of Stephens, with this result (following from the critical value, or rather want of value, of those Testaments), that many readings of the Authorized Version were abandoned three times, and the Spanish y C. Reynal (1569), and Valera's already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arier Montanu (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597).

For the Greek text of the New Testament they had Beza's edition of 1586, and the third edition of Stephens, with this result (following from the critical value, or rather want of value, of those Testaments), that many readings of the Authorized Version were abandoned three times, and the Spanish y C. Reynal (1569), and Valera's already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arier Montanu (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597).

For the Greek text of the New Testament they had Beza's edition of 1586, and the third edition of Stephens, with this result (following from the critical value, or rather want of value, of those Testaments), that many readings of the Authorized Version were abandoned three times, and the Spanish y C. Reynal (1569), and Valera's already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arier Montanu (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597).

For the Greek text of the New Testament they had Beza's edition of 1586, and the third edition of Stephens, with this result (following from the critical value, or rather want of value, of those Testaments), that many readings of the Authorized Version were abandoned three times, and the Spanish y C. Reynal (1569), and Valera's already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arier Montanu (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597).

For the Greek text of the New Testament they had Beza's edition of 1586, and the third edition of Stephens, with this result (following from the critical value, or rather want of value, of those Testaments), that many readings of the Authorized Version were abandoned three times, and the Spanish y C. Reynal (1569), and Valera's already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arier Montanu (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597).
American co-operation are substantially as follows: 'The English revisers to send their revision to the American revisers, to consider the American suggestions, to improve on them, and to furnish them with copies of the revision in its final form before publication, and to allow them to present in an appendix remaining differences of reading and rendering of importance not adopted by the English revisers. The result, thus far, of this harmonious union and cooperation, is the Revised New Testament, which is unquestionably a most faithful and noble English version, and equal to any version of the sacred original, for the following reasons:

1. Its text, i.e., the Greek, is the purest extant, based on the authority of documentary evidence without deference to any printed text of modern times; which imports that only the most ancient and authentic manuscripts, versions, and patristic quotations were received, and diligently compared by competent experts, and their united testimony required for the adoption of any, even the minutest, integral portion of the sacred volume. The readers of the new revision have the undoubted assurance that the Greek text from which it has been translated has been verified, as far as human learning and fidelity could verify it, as the word of God. What the revisers rejected from the text had been added by careless or designing transcribers, what they received into it had been omitted by them. No version rests on a purer text.

2. Its translation is a marvel for fidelity, accuracy, elegance, purity of idiom, and harmony of expression. Some of its noblest features depend for their full appreciation on the publication on the Old Testament. The changes introduced are fivefold: 1. Those required by change of reading in the Greek text; e.g., (1 Pet. ii. 21) "Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example." 2. Where the Authorized Version appeared to be incorrect; e.g., (1 Cor. xi. 34) "that your coming together be not unto judgment." 3. The removal of ambiguous or obscure renderings; e.g., (Matt. xvi. 23) "thou art a stumbling-block unto me." 4. The removal of inconsistent renderings; e.g., (1 Cor. xvi. 27, 28) "For He put all things in subjection, it is evident that he is virtually placed in the true word of God, who are under the greatest possible obligation to the noble company of learned and devoted men who have spent so many years on its production.

13. Miscellaneous. — During the short reign of Edward VI. there were published, in 1547, an edition of the New Testament in English and Latin Of Master Erasmus' Translation with the Pulpit taken out of the Old Testament, and altogether thirty-five editions of the New Testament, and thirteen of the whole Bible, distributed as follows: three of Coverdale (two in 1550, one in 1553), seven of Cranmer's Bible, and eight of the New Testament, five of Matthew's, two of Taverner (1548–51), twenty-four editions of Tyndale's or Matthew's New Testament; further, the Worcester edition of the New Testament sold by royal order at twenty-two pence, and, besides the Latin-English New Testament of 1547, two others with the paraphrase of Erasmus, translated by Nicholas Udall, 1548–49; that of 1548 ends with Hebrews, and the translator states, in the fulsome speech of the period, that the Princess Mary (of bloody memory) did part of John's Gospel; that of 1549 added Revelation in a translation of Leo Judae's paraphrase of that book. The fragment of Sir John Cheke's translation from the Greek (published by James Goodwin. B.D., London, 1543) bet. Spec.," (Matt. xxvii. 44) "cast upon him the same reproach." Such archaisms as "anon," "offend," "serip," "an eight days," "highest room," "lewd," "carriages," "profited," "proper," etc., used in senses now unintelligible, have been corrected by proper words. Consistency has been introduced in the rendering of proper names by the uniform preservation of one word for the same person or place. Technical expressions, such as "deputy," "chief of Asia," "executioner," and "chamberlain," have been corrected by more appropriate terms. Some modern improvements furnish them with copies of the revision in its final form before publication, and to allow them to present in an appendix remaining differences of reading and rendering of importance not adopted by the English revisers. The result, thus far, of this harmonious union and cooperation, is the Revised New Testament, which is unquestionably a most faithful and noble English version, and equal to any version of the sacred original, for the following reasons:

1. Its text, i.e., the Greek, is the purest extant, based on the authority of documentary evidence without deference to any printed text of modern times; which imports that only the most ancient and authentic manuscripts, versions, and patristic quotations were received, and diligently compared by competent experts, and their united testimony required for the adoption of any, even the minutest, integral portion of the sacred volume. The readers of the new revision have the undoubted assurance that the Greek text from which it has been translated has been verified, as far as human learning and fidelity could verify it, as the word of God. What the revisers rejected from the text had been added by careless or designing transcribers, what they received into it had been omitted by them. No version rests on a purer text.

2. Its translation is a marvel for fidelity, accuracy, elegance, purity of idiom, and harmony of expression. Some of its noblest features depend for their full appreciation on the publication on the Old Testament. The changes introduced are fivefold: 1. Those required by change of reading in the Greek text; e.g., (1 Pet. ii. 21) "Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example." 2. Where the Authorized Version appeared to be incorrect; e.g., (1 Cor. xi. 34) "that your coming together be not unto judgment." 3. The removal of ambiguous or obscure renderings; e.g., (Matt. xvi. 23) "thou art a stumbling-block unto me." 4. The removal of inconsistent renderings; e.g., (1 Cor. xvi. 27, 28) "For He put all things in subjection, it is evident that he is virtually placed in the true word of God, who are under the greatest possible obligation to the noble company of learned and devoted men who have spent so many years on its production.

13. Miscellaneous. — During the short reign of Edward VI. there were published, in 1547, an edition of the New Testament in English and Latin Of Master Erasmus' Translation with the Pulpit taken out of the Old Testament, and altogether thirty-five editions of the New Testament, and thirteen of the whole Bible, distributed as follows: three of Coverdale (two in 1550, one in 1553), seven of Cranmer's Bible, and eight of the New Testament, five of Matthew's, two of Taverner (1548–51), twenty-four editions of Tyndale's or Matthew's New Testament; further, the Worcester edition of the New Testament sold by royal order at twenty-two pence, and, besides the Latin-English New Testament of 1547, two others with the paraphrase of Erasmus, translated by Nicholas Udall, 1548–49; that of 1548 ends with Hebrews, and the translator states, in the fulsome speech of the period, that the Princess Mary (of bloody memory) did part of John's Gospel; that of 1549 added Revelation in a translation of Leo Judae's paraphrase of that book. The fragment of Sir John Cheke's translation from the Greek (published by James Goodwin. B.D., London, 1543) bet. Spec.," (Matt. xxvii. 44) "cast upon him the same reproach." Such archaisms as "anon," "offend," "serip," "an eight days," "highest room," "lewd," "carriages," "profited," "proper," etc., used in senses now unintelligible, have been corrected by proper words. Consistency has been introduced in the rendering of proper names by the uniform preservation of one word for the same person or place. Technical expressions, such as "deputy," "chief of Asia," "executioner," and "chamberlain," have been corrected by more appropriate terms. Some modern improvements furnish them with copies of the revision in its final form before publication, and to allow them to present in an appendix remaining differences of reading and rendering of importance not adopted by the English revisers. The result, thus far, of this harmonious union and cooperation, is the Revised New Testament, which is unquestionably a most faithful and noble English version, and equal to any version of the sacred original, for the following reasons:

1. Its text, i.e., the Greek, is the purest extant, based on the authority of documentary evidence without deference to any printed text of modern times; which imports that only the most ancient and authentic manuscripts, versions, and patristic quotations were received, and diligently compared by competent experts, and their united testimony required for the adoption of any, even the minutest, integral portion of the sacred volume. The readers of the new revision have the undoubted assurance that the Greek text from which it has been translated has been verified, as far as human learning and fidelity could verify it, as the word of God. What the revisers rejected from the text had been added by careless or designing transcribers, what they received into it had been omitted by them. No version rests on a purer text.

2. Its translation is a marvel for fidelity, accuracy, elegance, purity of idiom, and harmony of expression. Some of its noblest features depend for their full appreciation on the publication on the Old Testament. The changes introduced are fivefold: 1. Those required by change of reading in the Greek text; e.g., (1 Pet. ii. 21) "Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example." 2. Where the Authorized Version appeared to be incorrect; e.g., (1 Cor. xi. 34) "that your coming together be not unto judgment." 3. The removal of ambiguous or obscure renderings; e.g., (Matt. xvi. 23) "thou art a stumbling-block unto me." 4. The removal of inconsistent renderings; e.g., (1 Cor. xvi. 27, 28) "For He put all things in subjection under his feet. But when he saith, All things are put in subjecti...
utterly undignified, if not vulgar and profane, production. The edition of the Authorized Version, containing for the first time the chronological dates (see Authorized Version) is known as Archbishop Tenison's of 1701. The Cambridge edition of the Bible by Dr. Paris (1782) and the Oxford edition by Dr. Blayney (1789) are important: the latter, on account of its great accuracy, is regarded as the standard in England. Dr. Scrivener's Cambridge Paragraph Bible (1873) is said to be the most accurately edited in the language. The Rheims New Testament was printed in a second edition, 1600, in a third at Douay, in 1621, and in a fourth, probably at Rouen, in 1633. The Old Testament appeared in a second edition in 1635. Among the later Roman-Catholic versions are prominent: (1) Nary's New Testament, 1719 (Dublin?), a vast improvement on the Rheims and Douay in tone and English; (2) Weitkamp's New Testament, 1730-33 (Douay); (3) Troy's Bible, Dublin, 1816, with very savage notes; (4) The Holy Bible, Dublin and London, 1825, in better English, but a very corrupt text; (5) A New Version of the Four Gospels by a Catholic Dr. Lins- gunner (Liverpool, 1816, with very savage notes) and the Levenson Latin edition, 1836, by far the best of all, an on that account disparaged by Roman-Catholic writers, notably by Cardinal Wiseman.

ENNODIUS. Magnus Felix, b. at Arles about 473; d. at Pavia, July 17, 521; belonged to a distinguished but poor Gallic family; lost his parents very early, and was educated at Milan by an aunt, who died 489, and left him nearly destitute. Having made a rich match, he lived, as it seems, only to enjoy himself, when a severe sickness awakened him to serious reflections. His wife entered a nunnery, and he was ordained a deacon: as such, he accompanied Bishop Epiphanius of Pavia on his mission to the Burgundian King Gundeobad (494), and, two years later on, he distinguished himself in Rome by an apology for Pope Symmachus and a panegyric of Theodoric. By Pope Hormisdas he was made Bishop of Pavia, and as such he was twice sent as ambassador to Constantinople (515 and 517). His works (consisting of some poems, a number of letters, the panegyric of Theodoric, the defence of Symmachus, a life of Bishop Epiphanius, etc.) were first printed at Basel, 1569, Paris, 1611, in Migne, Patr. Lat., vol. 63; best editions by Hartel, Vienna, 1882, and Vogel, Berlin, 1885. They have no aesthetic merits, and only small historical interest: they show that in theology he was a semi-pelagian, and with respect to church-polity an ardent champion of the Papal supremacy. He was the first who addressed the Bishop of Rome as papa.

ENOC (initiator, or initiated). There are several of this name mentioned in the Old Testament (Gen. iv. 17; and, in the Hebrew text, xxxvii. 1; 47. xvi. 9; and Exod. vi. 14); but the one of any interest is the son of Jared and the father of Methusaleh (Gen. v. 18, 21-24). He "walked with God," a phrase expressive of constant companionship, an undisturbed, intimate intercourse with God; and so, at the age of three hundred and sixty-five years (very young for an antediluvian), suddenly he was not, for God took him. His disappearance, was, in the antediluvian age, the striking evidence of immortality, just as Elijah's was to his age, and Christ's resurrection is to us. Men may have looked for him, as they did subsequently for Elijah (2 Kings ii. 10), but as vainly. He had gone, not to return. He had been translated. In the absence of biblical information, speculation has been active. According to the majority of the rabbins and the fathers he was taken to paradise, although some put him in heaven, and others in the seventh heaven. A parallel to Enoch's translation will be that of the saints who are alive at the second coming of Christ (1 Thess. iv. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 51). In the Epistle to the Hebrews, Enoch's walk with God is regarded as a triumph of faith (Heb. xi. 3).

Tradition has made of Enoch not only a preacher of repentance, and prophet of judgment, which indeed is very likely, but also (as "Enoch") may mean the initiated a sage acquainted with divine secrets by reason of his walk with God, the transmitter of the true religion in contradistinction to the knowledge which demons had brought into the world, and the inventor of writing and the sciences, particularly astronomy. Finally, in the century before Christ, a book was attributed to him, in which all the knowledge then attained about God, nature, and history, was by a fiction transferred to him. A quotation is made from it in Jude 14. See Enoc, Boeotis; the conjecture of the Old Testament, and A. Dillmann, Das Buch Henoch, Leipzig, 1853. Among the Arabs, Enoch or Idris (the learned), as he is more commonly called, plays the rôle of a medium of the higher knowledge and science.

The heathen myths of the assumption of Hercules, Romulus, and others are not in point; because the ground for the translation of Enoch was his relations with God, while the legends rest upon a naturalistic conception of divinity, which merges the gods with the highest human development. Much nearer to the biblical account is the Babylonian Xisuthrus in the history of Berossus, who indeed corresponds to Noah, but ENTHUSIASM. 740

EON.

who was after the flood translated, and was sought for until his voice was heard announcing, that, on account of his piety, he had been removed to dwell among the gods. In the cuneiform inscriptions he is called Ardrakhasis, and was with his wife taken away to live as the gods in aremote place at the mouth of the rivers. [See GEORGE SMITH: The Chaldean Account of Genesis, ed.
Sayce, pp. 296, 300.] Another supposed parallel to the Bible Enoch is King Annaos, or Namkos, who is said to have lived three hundred years before the Deukalion flood, and to have prophesied with tears the overthrow of the race after his death. But this story comes through Zenobius (200 A.D.), who borrowed freely from Didy-mus of Alexandria (30 A.D.); and it is therefore extremelyprobable, as these the similarity of names would itself indicate, that the story is really derived from Jewish sources.

An endeavor has been made to identify Enoch with the Latin Janus, the god of the new year,because the year has 365 days, and he had 365 years; but it remains only an endeavor. See the commentaries and Bible histories and Bible dictionaries upon Enoch; [BARING-GOULD: Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, American reprint, N.Y., pp. 85—91].

VON ORELLI

ENTHUSIASM (from τρωμ, filled or inspired by God) is an intense moral impulse or all-engrossing temper of mind. There is an enthusiasm for popular freedom and for art, for the emancipation of the slaves and for conquest. The term as applied to religion designates both a noble temper of mind and moral fervor (expressed by the apostle as "a being zealously affected in a good cause"), and also a misdirected and even destructive intensity of feeling.

The distinction between genuine and morbid enthusiasm will often depend upon the nice discrimination of a keen judgment, or the moral stand-point of the critic, as in the case of that ridiculous story which is by some applied to all religious workers or philanthropists who have undergone hardship, or even death, in the service and for the benefit of others; as in the case of monasticism, and of the apostles on the Day of Pentecost, who were said by some to be drunken (Acts ii.13).

Enthusiasm is the quality without which the best in any department cannot be reached, nor the largest amount of results achieved. It is also a quality, which, controlled by ignorance, or misapplication, although conscientiously it may be, may work great harm.

In the better sense of the term, our Lord was the highest illustration of enthusiasm. His soul was possessed with an overwhelming affection for men, and an intense impulse to help them. The apostles were enthusiasts in a good sense; being constrained by an overwhelming desire to preach the gospel, and ready to show it by suffering and death. The early monks, St. Francis of Assisi, Dominic, Hus, the Reformers, the early Methodists, and the present missionaries in foreign land-are also examples of religious enthusiasm. Hethen religions have had their enthusiasts, as well as the Christian.

Christian enthusiasm in the good sense is derived from two motives, — love for men (brought out in a strong way by the author of Eccle-Homo) and love for Christ. The New Testament combines both these motives in the labors and heroism of the apostles, the greatest of whom, however (St. Paul), attributes his enthusiasm prevailingly to the love for Christ (Phil. i. 21;
"To me to live is Christ; 2 Cor. v. 14, "The love of Christ constraineth us ").

In the bad sense, enthusiasm is almost synonymous with fanaticism, and enthusiasts with zealots. It is fervor of soul drawn from wrong principles, founded on wrong motives, and applied to wrong ends. Neither selfish nor impure motives necessarily prevail in such a temperament of mind, and zeal of activity. Such enthusiasm may proceed from a sincere desire to glorify God.
It substitutes fancies for the truth, and in its last stages the disorder of the mind becomes mental insanity. Warburton defines enthusiasm in this second sense as that "temper of mind in which the imagination has got the better of the judgment" (Div. Leg., V., Appendix).

The term "enthusiasts" has also had a technical sense, as in the Elizabethan period. Jewel, Rogers (Thirty-nine Articles, p. 158, Parker Soc. ed.), and others speak of Enthusiasts as they do of Anabaptists. During the Commonwealth period, and afterwards, the term was frequently applied to the Puritans in a tone of depreciation, as notably by Robert South, who preached a special sermon on the subject, "Enthusiasts not led by the Spirit of God," meaning by enthusiasts the Puritans. See ISAAC TAYLOR: Natural Hist. of Enthusiasm, 9th ed., Lond., 1843.

ENZINAS, Francisco de (Dryander, Duchesne, Van Eyck, Eichman, translations of the Spanish name "oakman"), b. at Burgos, 1520; d. at Geneva, 1570; studied in Italy, afterwards at Louvain and Wittenberg; embraced the Reformation; was arrested at Brussels (1548), escaped to England (1545), and lived afterwards on the Continent,—at Strassburg, Basel, and Geneva. He translated the New Testament into Spanish, and dedicated it to Charles V. His brother, Jaques de Enzinas, also embraced Protestantism, and was burnt at the stake in Italy, 1546.

EON, or EUDO DE STELLA, an enthusiast in the middle of the twelfth century, and probably connected with the Cathari; was b. in Bretagne, and was, by the words which he once heard in the church ("per eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos"), led to believe that he ("Eon") was meant by that eunm. Preaching, prophesying, and working miracles, he roved about in Bretagne, and much people gathered around him, and were seduced by him. In 1145 the papal legate, Cardinal Albericus of Ostia, preached against him at Nantes; then Archbishop Hugo of Rouen wrote a book against him, Dogmatum christianae fidei Libri Tres (found in Bibl. Patr. Max., Lyons, T.
XXII.; and finally troops were sent against him.
Several of his adherents were burnt in the diocese of Alet, while he himself retreated into Guienne.
In 1148 he appeared in Champagne, but was cought, together with a number of his disciples. When placed before the synod of Rheims, and asked by Pope Eugenius III. who he was, he answered, "Is qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos." The synod declared him crazy, and ordered him shut up in a dungeon: his followers were burnt, and very soon all trace of his sect disappeared. C. SCHMIDT.
EON. See ERA, Gnosticism.

EPAON. The Council of, was held in 517 in a town of Burgundy whose site cannot be identified any more. It was called by Avitus, Bishop of Vienne, and Varinus, Bishop of Lyons, and attended by twenty-four bishops. On Sept. 14, 517, they subscribed forty canons, mostly of a disciplinary character, regulating the relations of bishops, priests, and monks. Canon 4 forbids bishops, priests, and deacons to keep hawks or dogs for hunting; canon 9 forbids an abbot to preside over two monasteries; canons 15, 16, 29, and 33 concern heretics, and forbid Catholic clergymen to eat at the same table with a heretic, etc.; canon 26 forbids any altar not of stone to be consecrated with chrism, etc. See LABBE: Dissertatio philosophica de Concilio Epaonensi; MANSI: Con. Conc. VII. 319-342, 347-352, 555-574.

EPARCHY (ἐπαρχία) denoted originally a merely political division, being the official administrative name of a province. It consisted of counties, and formed part of a diocese. This scheme of secular and spiritual jurisdiction was followed by the organization of the church; so that the head of a county community became a bishop, the head of an eparchy a metropolitan, and the head of a diocese a patriarch. At the time of the Council of Nicaea (325) this organization and its terminology were fully developed.

EPHESIANS, Epistle to. See PAUL.

EPHESUS, renowned as a seat of heathen rites, and conspicuous in the history of early Christianity, was an opulent city on the western coast of Asia Minor. It was advantageously situated on the fertile banks of the Cayster, and built partly on the plain, and partly on the hills, of which Prion and Coressus were the two principal ones. It was on the direct road to Sardis. To the south of it, on the Maeander, lay Miletus; at an equal distance to the north, Smyrna, on the Hermus. The city was colonized as early as the eleventh century, by Androclus, the son of the Athenian king, Codrus. It soon became famous as a mart and hostelry, the harbor affording ample shelter for ships. Asiatic elements mixed on its streets with Greek influences, and colored the social life. The city came successively under subjection to Croesus, the Persians, the Macedonians, and the Romans. In 292 A.D. it was destroyed by the Goths. Although rebuilt, it never regained its former glory. The ravages of time and the ruthlessnes of man have secured its total desolation. A squallid village, containing only twenty regular inhabitants (Wood: Ephesus, p. 14), occupies, in mockery of human magnificence, the ancient site, but in its name Ayasaluk (a corruption of ἀγέος φανάριον, "holy theologian ") retains a reminiscence of the Evangelist John, and the early Christian congregations.

Temple of Diana. That which made Ephesus most famous was the celebrated Temple of Diana. It was reputed one of the seven wonders of the world, and was visited from all parts of Greece. The divinity was primarily an Asiatic goddess, and seems to have had little in common with the fair huntress. She was represented as the goddess of nature, with breasts, a symbol of fertility, or a type of the many fountains which bubbled up on the Ephesian plain (GUHL). Her statue was believed to have fallen from heaven (Acts xix. 35). In 356, on the night of Alexander's birth, the temple was burned down. The Ephesians immediately set to work with great enthusiasm to rebuild, the women of the city contributing their ornaments. The structure was erected on a magnificent scale, and when completed was regarded as the most perfect work of Ionic architecture. The priestesses that ministered at the fane were virgins, and the priestesses celibates. When the Goths ravaged the city (262 A.D.), they spared not the temple. Some of its graceful columns are said to be incorporated in the Church of St. Sophia. But the very site of the magnificent structure was completely obliterated by the detritus of the river, and remained a mystery until the important discoveries of Mr. J. T. Wood (1863-74). Its dimensions were four hundred and twenty-five by two hundred and twenty feet. The roof was sustained by a hundred and twenty-seven columns sixty feet high.

Ephesus and the Christian Church. — The city early became one of the most conspicuous scenes of apostolic labors. The Church was distinguished by having St. Paul for its founder, St. John for its counsellor, and Timothy for its bishop. To it St. Paul addressed one of his Epistles, which abounds in references to the temple and theatre of the city. The congregation was fully organized at an early date, as is evident, from the presbyters who bade Paul farewell at Miletus (Acts xx. 24 sqq.), and its mention as the first among the churches of Asia Minor (Rev. ii. 1). Here St. John spent his last years (Eusebius), and was probably stirred up to write his Gospel by the indications of heretical sentiments here manifesting themselves. Here Apollos first preached (Acts xviii. 24-28); and here the third ecumenical council met, which defined the doctrines of the Church over against Nestorian. Before passing away from the history of Christianity in Ephesus, it is proper to make a more specific mention of the labors of St. Paul in the city. His first visit was on his return from the second missionary tour. He was then accompanied by Priscilla and Aquila. On his second visit he made a sojourn of two or three years (Acts xx. 21). In teaching the new gogge, he went to the school of Tyrannus. His preaching was so effective, that many brought their books of magic, to which the city was addicted (Acts xix. 12), and made a bonfire of them; and it interfered so materially with the superstitious traffic in silver shrines (xix. 26), as to arouse the enmity of Demetrius and the craftsmen. A riotous popular tumult was excited, and the watchword rang through the city, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians;" but Paul himself escaped.

EPHESUS, Councils of. The third ecumenical council was held in St. Mary's Church, Ephes-
EPHESUS, A.D. 431 (June 22—Aug. 31). It condemned the heresy of Nestorius, that Christ had two persons as well as two natures. It was convened by letters of Theodosius II. and Valentinean II. Cyril of Alexandria presided, and opened the meetings with a hundred and sixty bishops. The number was afterwards increased to a hundred and ninety-eight. Nestorius was cited, but refused to appear until all the bishops had arrived, some of whom, like John of Antioch, were delayed. In the mean time, his heresy was denounced, and himself excluded from the episcopal office, and from all sacerdotal fellowship.

The so-called Robber Council was convened by Theodosius in 449. It was first so denounced by Leo, Bishop of Rome (Epist. 95), on account of the partisan and overbearing demeanor of the presiding officer, and the use of violence in the introduction of soldiery. Dioscuros of Alexandria, a man of hierarchical temper and inordinate ambition, presided. As nineteen and thirty-five bishops were present. The council restored Eutyches, who had been deposed by the synod of Constantinople (448). Flavian, Patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed from his office for the hand he had taken in the deposition of Eutyches. All efforts to express dissent were brutally checked. Hilary, Deacon of Rome and papal delegate, one of the dissidents, only narrowly escaped with his life; while Eusebius, Bishop of Dorylaeum, the accuser of Eutyches, lost his life through the violence of the soldiery. The decisions of this scandalously conducted council were reversed by the Council of Chalcedon (451).

EPHESUS, The Seven Sleepers of. This legend gained currency very early, and was adopted in the Koran. Seven Ephesian youths of noble extraction, in the persecutions of Decius (249—257), concealed themselves in a cave which was ordered by the authorities to be sealed up. They fell into a number which lasted for a hundred and eighty-seven years. Some of the stones being removed from the entrance, a ray of light was admitted. Awaking, as from a night's sleep, they sent one of their number (Jambllichus) into the city to buy bread. The obsoleteness of his dress, and the antiquity of the coin which he offered to the baker, no more startled the inhabitants than the change in the aspect of the city confounded himself. The facts becoming known, the bishop and magistrates of the city visited the cavern. After confessing their blessing, the Seven Sleepers immediately expired. See the story well told, Gibbon's Roman, Am. ed., iii. 388 sq.

EPHRAEM. See TIBS.

EPHRAEM SYRUS (or Ephraem) is the most prominent of the fathers of the Syrian Church in the fourth century, and the greatest orator and hymn-writer produced by that church.

Life.—Besides the so-called confession of Ephraem (existing both in Greek and in Armenian) and his testament (existing both in Syrian and Greek), we have a panegyric of him by Gregory of Nyssa (written shortly after his death, and found third in the third volume of the Roman edition of Ephraem's Greek works), and an elaborate life of him (Acta Ephraemi), written in Syriac, and found in the third volume of the Roman edition of his Syrian works. All these materials are very unreliable, however. They contradict each other, and are full of legendary matter. In modern times his life has been written by Zingerle, in the first part of his translation, and by Alaleben, Berlin, 1853.

Ephraem was born in the beginning of the fourth century, according to a notice in his commentary on Genesis (Ep. Syn, l. 28), in Mesopotamia; according to Sozomen (Hist. Ecc., III. 16) and the Syrian biography, at Nisibis. He was educated by Bishop Jacob of Nisibis, and seems to have accompanied him to the Council of Nicea (325). When, in 363, the Emperor Jovinian surrendered Nisibis to the Persians, Ephraem moved first to Amid, the native place of his mother, and then to Edessa, at that time the centre of Syrian learning. He settled among the anchorites in a cave outside the city, adopted a life of severe asceticism, and devoted himself wholly to theological study and authorship. Now and then he appeared among the people; and his hymns and polemical speeches, directed against the Chaldaean astrologers, against Bardesanes and Harmonius, the Arians and Sabellians, Apollinarius, Marcion, etc., made a deep impression, and obtained a lasting influence. Later writers (Assemani, Bibl. Orient., IV. 924) tell us that he founded a school in Edessa; and it is, at all events, certain that he had pupils, and among them some of great celebrity. A tradition reports that he visited Egypt, and stayed there eight years; another, that he visited Basil the Great at Cesarea. He died during the reign of Valens, either 375, or 374, or 376, 387.

Works.—Ephraem was a very prolific author; but of his numerous writings only a part exists in the original Syrian text, and the rest in Greek, Latin, Armenian, and Slavic translations. A complete list of his writings is given by J. S. Assemani, in Bibl. Orient., I. 68—104, and in the preface to the Roman edition of his Greek works. See also Wright: Catalogue of Syriac Manuscripts in the British Museum, 3, 1271. The Slavic translations from his works were edited by J. P. Kohl, Moscow, 1701; the Armenian, by the Methoearly translated into Greek, even in the lifetime of the author; and this statement is corroborated by the fact that Chrysostom and Jerome were acquainted with them. They consist of sermons, homilies, and tracts, exegetical, dogmatic, and ascetic. But in the Syrian works (nol. 190) he knew fifty-two such productions by Ephraem, and had heard that there existed more than a thousand. In many churches in the East they were read aloud during service, after the Bible readings; and they seem to have attained the same honor in the Western Church. Translations into Latin were early made. Small collections of Ephraem's discourses translated into Latin circulated in the fifteenth century. The first larger collection (in 3 vols. fol.) was given by Gerhard Vossius, Rome, 1584, and reprinted in 1603 and 1608. It contains 171 pieces, of which only one was translated from the Syrian. Augmented editions of this collection appeared at Cologne (1603) and at Antwerp (1619). The first collected edition of Ephraem's Greek works was given by Ed. Thwaites, Oxford, 1709. The best edition is Rome, 1792-46, 6 vols. folio, ed. by Math. Dippel. The existing Syrian works of Ephraem consist of commentaries on the Pentateuch and most of the historical and prophetical books of the Old Testament. According to Ebed Jesus (Assemani,

EPIPHANIUS, Bishop of Constantia (the old Salamis of Cyprus), was b. in the beginning of the fourth century, at Besandirke, a village of Palae

estine, in the vicinity of Eleutheropolis, and educated among monks. He afterwards lived for some time in Egypt, also among monks, and founded, after his return to Palestine, a monastery in his native town, of which he became abbot. His fame for holiness brought him to the metropolitan chair of Constantia (367), and from that time he took an active part in the theological controversies of his age. He was present at a synod in Antioch (378), and at another in Rome (382), where the two questions were debated. He went to Palestine in 394 to crush the heresies of Orius and to Constantinople in 408 for the same purpose. He died in 415. The life of Epiphanius fell in a period when monasticism — sprung from the martyr-inspiration of the primitive Church, and having at the same time assumed a character of narrow hostility to all free theological investigation, always preferred theological abstractions to the life of a vigorous personal conviction. But the man's character was in 90 A.D., together with the other stoical philosophers, expelled from Rome, and settled at Nicopolis, in Epirus, where he continued teaching, and finally died. He wrote nothing himself; but many of his teachings were taken down by his pupils, Flavius Arrianus and others, and are still preserved. They have a peculiar interest to the church-historian on account of the influence they exercised on Marcus Aurelius. The best edition of the works of Epictetus is that by Schweighäuser, Leipzig, 1798-1800, 6 vols. There are at least two English translations,—one by Elizabeth Carter (London, 1758, 4to, new revised ed. by Thomas W. Higgens, Boston, 1865), and one by George Long (London, 1870). The Enchiridion was translated by T. Talbot, and also by T. W. H. Rolleston, both London, 1881. See F. W. Far

EARLY, one of the most imposing representatives of the stoic philosophy, was b. at Hieropolis, in Phrygia, lived afterwards in Rome, first as a slave in the house of Epaphroditus, then as a freedman, and teacher of philosophy, but was well suited to the demands of the time; and he, as well as his friends, considered it a great merit to spend a whole life in bitter opposition to the greatest genius the Eastern Church ever produced, without understanding him. He seems, however, to have discovered during his stay in Constantinople, — whither he went at the instance of Theophilus of Alexandria, and for the purpose of opposing Chrysostom, and through him Origen, — that he had in most cases been a tool only in other men's hands. He left the city abruptly and in a rage.

His principal works are, Πανάγιον ("the drug-chest"), a description and refutation of eighty different heresies, confused and trivial, but of historical value, and Αγαθοποίησις ("the anchor of faith"), a dogmatical work, much read in its time. A life of him by a friend was edited, together with his works, by Petavius, Paris, 1622. 2 vols. fol. The best edition of his works is Diendorff's, Leipzig, 1859, 5 vols.: and that of the Panarion by Oehler, Berlin, 1859–61, 3 vols. (4 parts). See Guérin: L'Histoire et la Vie de St. Epiphane, Paris, 1789; Edermann: Die Betheiligung des Epiphanius an dem Streite über Origenes, Treves, 1859; Lisch: Zur Quellenkritik des Epiphanius, Vienna, 1867.

EPHAPHNIUS. Bishop of Pavia, was b. in that city (430) of noble descent, and educated for the Church. When he was eighteen years old he was ordained a sub-deacon, and in 466 he was unanimously elected bishop by the clergy and the people. After his accession to the episcopal dignity, he increased the severity of his asceticism: he took only one meal a day; he abstained altogether from flesh, from wine, from baths, etc. The same energy he also evinced in taking care of his diocese and the Church in general. He was one of those admirable Italian bishops, who, while the dissolution of the Western Empire was going on, rapidly and inevitably, stood like rocks in the midst of the confusion, breaking the surges. In the wars between Anthemi and Ricimer, he was at the instance of his friend Cassiodorus, formed the Historia Tripartita so famous in the middle ages. Epiphanius also translated the so-called Codex Encyclicus, a collection of synodal letters to the Emperor Leo I. in defence of the synod of Chalcedon, the commentary by Epiphanius, Bishop of Cyprus, on the Song of Songs, the commentary of Driccimus on the Catholic Epistles, etc.

EPHAPHNY (ἐπιφάνης). Tit. ii. 11, iii. 4), one of the oldest Christian festivals, originated in the Eastern Church, and opened the annual cycle of festivals, though it referred to the baptism of Christ rather than to his birth. It was generally held, however, by the Eastern Church, that the manifestation of Christ to man took place at his baptism, and not at his birth; and consequently his nativity was celebrated only as an introduction to his epiphany, which fell on Jan. 6. The separation of the two festivals did not take place until the latter part of the fourth century, according to a homily preached by Chrysostom in Antioch, Dec. 25, 380. It was also generally held in the Eastern Church, that, by his baptism, Christ imparted certain qualities to the waters, which made them a fit bath of regeneration; and consequently the Epiphany became a favorite term for baptism.

From the East the festival was introduced to the West. The first trace of it in the Western Church is the report, by Ammiannus Marcellinus (XXI. 2), that Julian celebrated it at Vienne in 360. But its doctrinal basis was changed. It was referred, not to the manifestation of Christ to man in general, but to his manifestation to the heathens, to the Three Wise Men of the East, to the Three Holy Kings. It also lost favor as a term for baptism. Pope Leo I. opposed this custom as an "irrational novelty." On the whole, in the Western Church it never became more than an appendix to the nativity; hence its familiar English name "Twelfth-Day."

EPISCOPACY. Under Bishop will be found a discussion of the origin, functions, and relative position of the episcopal office. The design of this article is to give a concise statement of the views held on the subject by different Christian communions.

I. The Roman-Catholic Church holds to the divine origin and authority of Episcopacy. Its position was distinctly defined by the Council of Trent at its twenty-third session: "If any one saith that in the Catholic Church there is not a hierarchy instituted by divine ordinance, consisting of bishops, priests, and deacons, let him be anathema" (Canon vi.). Episcopacy is as essential to the Church as the sacraments. The Church cannot exist without it. The words of Cyprian (iv. Ep. 8), Ecclesia est in Episcopo ("The Church is in the Bishop"), concisely represent this view. The bishops are the immediate successors of the apostles (Apostolis vicaria ordinatione succedit, Cyprian, Ep. 69 ad Flor.), and superior to the priests and deacons, not merely in extent of jurisdiction, but in the kind of grace and function. Ordination is a sacrament, and confers a special grace, which is permanent. The Pope, or Bishop, of Rome is at the head of the hierarchy of bishops, and is the immediate successor of St. Peter, upon whom Christ promised to rear his Church (Matt. xvi. 18, 19), and who was the first Bishop of Rome. All bishops are subject to him as the vicar of Christ, but their apostolic power is derived through consecration. The Vatican Decrees (Session iv.) assigned to the Roman pontiff authority over the "Universal Church," and above ecumenical councils. This limits the prerogative of the bishop materially, and is opposed to the view ably advocated by D'Ailly and Gerson in the fourteenth century and by Gallicanism, and adopted by the Old Catholics.

II. The Eastern Church holds likewise to the divine origin of Episcopacy, to the transmission of apostolic grace, and to apostolic succession; but it dissent from the Latin Church in refusing to recognize the Pope, whom it regards as an usurper, and to acknowledge any pontiff with supreme authority in the Church and over the bishops.

III. The Jansenist Church of Holland, and the Old Catholics, both agree with the Roman-Catholic Church on the question of Episcopacy, but differ from it in their allegiance to the Pope. The episcopate in Holland was received (in 1724) from Dominique Marie Varlet, Bishop of Babylon, then living in Amsterdam. Other Catholic bishops, on being applied to, refused the rite of consecration. Each new consecration ever since has been noticed by a special ecxoomunication from Rome. The Old Catholics secured their orders from the Jansenists of Holland, the Bishop of Deventer consecrating Bishop Reinkens (Aug. 11, 1783), who subsequently consecrated Dr. Herzog, Bishop for Switzerland (Sept. 18, 1876); so that they preserve the apostolic succession.

IV. The Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States tolerate two classes of opinion,—the Anglo-Catholic or High Church view, and the Low or Broad Church view. The Anglo-Catholic view of the episcopate is in essential particulars that of the Roman-Catholic Church. It does not recognize the superior authority of the Pope, as the vicar of Christ and the infallible successor of St. Peter, nor even the doctrine of papal infallibility; it regards Episcopacy as indispensable to the very being of the Church, holds to the transmission of apostolic succession. Bishops, as the successors of the apostles, are possessed of the same power of jurisdiction (Blunt). They are, and have been from the time of the apostles, an order distinct from the priesthood and diaconate, and higher than both. Archbishop Laud (1633—45) was the most extreme representative of the jure divino right of Episcopacy. 2. The Low and Broad Church view regards the episcopate as desirable and necessary for the ecclesiastical being of the Church, but in no wise indispensable to its existence. The episcopate is not the only form of government with scriptural authority (if, indeed, it or any other be recommended by Scripture); but it is the one best adapted to forward the interests of Christ's kingdom among men. The episcopate was formed out of the presbyterate, and that there are only two orders of the ministry in the New Testament,—presbyters and deacons.

This view, which is also held by such men as Arnold, Alford, Jacob, and Hatch, was the view of the divines of the English Reformation. Cranmer, Jewel, Grindal, and afterwards Field ("The apostles left none to succeed them," Of the Church, vol. iv. p. vii.), defended Episcopacy as the most ancient and general form of government, but always acknowledged the validity of Presbyterian orders. (See this subject ably discussed by Professor Fisher, in the New-Englander, 1874, pp. 121—172.) Bishop Parkhurst looked upon the Church of Zurich as the absolute pattern of a Christian community; and Bishop Ponet would have abandoned even the term "bishop" to the Catholics (Macaulay, Hist. of Eng., vol. i. p. 89, 2nd ed.). Eastern Episcopates in positions in the Church of England who had only received Presbyterian ordination. Such were Wittingham, Dean of Durham, and Cartwright, Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. It is doubtful whether any prelate of the Church in England's reign or before held the jure divino theory of Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of church polity (Declar. of Principles, passed Dec. 2, 1875). Its founder and first bishop was Dr. Cummins, who had been assistant bishop of the Episcopal Church in Kentucky.

VI. The Moravian Church deserves separate and special mention, for three reasons. Its episcopate was active before the Reformation on the Continent and in England began; it is in the apostolic succession; and its bishopric in America antedates those of the Episcopal (1784) and Methodist (1784) denominations by forty years. The first Moravian men who came to America in 1467, by the regularly ordained Waldensian Bishop Stephens. (See Wetzer and Welte, Encylop., ii. p. 65, and De Schweinitz, Moravian Episcopate, Lond., 1877.) The British Parliament, in 1749, recognized the validity of Moravian ordination. But the recent course of Bishop Stevens of Pennsylvania, in re-ordinating a Moravian presbyter, disparages the episcopate of this venerable body. This occurred in Philadelphia (Sept. 30, 1881), and was designed to give the applicant, to use Bishop Stevens's own language, "a more ample ordination." The Moravians, or, as they prefer to be called, the Brethren, recognize the ordination of other Christian bodies as valid, admitting presbyters at once into their ministry (Law Book of the Church, ix. 63).

VII. The Lutheran Church has for the most part abandoned Episcopacy. The bishops on the Continent, unlike the bishops in England, held aloof from the Reformation. In Germany one order of the ministry only is recognized. An officer with jurisdiction somewhat similar to that of bishop is called superintendent. The office is... only one of expediency. The Lutheran Church in Sweden has bishops, the validity of whose orders a committee was appointed in 1874, by the convention of the Episcopal Church in the United States, to investigate. The convention has taken no further action. There is much doubt concerning the integrity of the succession. Lawrence Peterson was consecrated by Paul Justin, Bishop of Abo, in 1575 Archbishop of Upsala. The evidence for the validity of Justin's consecration is defective. But the confessions of the Swedish Church recognize the equality of the ministry. The bishops of the Church of Denmark have no claim whatever to apostolic succession, although the English bishops of India have recognized Danish ordination. Christian III. in 1536 imprisoned the old bishops; that Episcopacy as a matter of expediency is justifiable; but they do not concede either its divine origin, or the transmission of grace by the imposition of hands, or apostolic succession, in the Anglo-Catholic sense. (See Form of Government of Presbyterian Church, chaps. iii. v., etc.)

IX. The American Methodist church has an Episcopacy. It is neither diocesan nor hierarchal, but itinerant and presbyteral. The bishops constitute an "itinerant general superintendent," and are "amenable to the body of ministers and preachers," who may divest them of their office. They do not deny that Episcopacy as a matter of expediency is justifiable; but they do not concede either its divine origin, or the transmission of grace by the imposition of hands, or apostolic succession, in the Anglo-Catholic sense. (See Form of Government of Presbyterian Church, chaps. iii. v., etc.)

D. S. SCHAFF.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The Protestant, in the United States of America. History.—The first known clerical representative of the Church of England in America was Albert de Prato, a learned mathematician, and a canon of St. Paul's, London, who visited St. John's, Newfoundland, in August, 1527. The next clergyman appeared after the Reformation, in connection with Popham's expedition of 1578. This was Woolfall, who landed in the Countess of Warwick's Sound, where, in 1587, the clergyman attached to the Colony baptized Manteo, an Indian chief. About the same time he also baptized Virginia Dare, the first white Christian born in Virginia. In 1595 the expedition of Waymouth reached the coast of Maine, and explored the Kennebec, having on board a person who regularly performed the service of the Church of England. In 1607 the work of colonization was commenced, both in Virginia and New England. On the coast of Maine the passengers and crews of two ships, the "Mayflower" and the "Savage," went on under Gilbert, as governor, and Monhegan, Aug. 9, 1607 (Q. S.). A sermon was preached, and the first New-England Thanksgiving was observed. A colony was commenced at the mouth of the Kennebec, where, until the spring of 1608, the chaplain (the Rev. Richard Seymour) regularly celebrated the service of the Church of England, which was familiar to the savage ear on that coast nearly twenty years before the arrival of "The Mayflower" at Plymouth. This colony attempted on the peninsula of Sabino was not successful, though scattered emigrants continued to pursue the fisheries on the adjacent coasts. In Virginia, however, the work of colonization, under Church-of-England leaders, went on without interruption, the minister being the Rev. Mr. Hunt. When the Leyden adventurers reached New England (in 1620), the Virginia Colony was an accomplished fact. On Christmas Day, 1621, the "most part" of the people at Plymouth desired to keep the festival, showing their attachment to the Church of England. Soon, however, they were outnumbered by fresh arrivals; and the majority of the people who landed elsewhere set up their standard against the church, which it was expected they would favor on reaching their new homes. Soon the scattered adherents of the Church of England found that they were not to be tolerated in Massachusetts; and New Hampshire, under Mason, became the chief resort of the persecuted who sought religious liberty, though the Rev. William Blackstone went to Rhode Island. In 1651 the church services were celebrated in New Hampshire by the Rev. Richard Gibson; and in 1640, at Portsmouth (the ancient "Strawberry Bank"), an Episcopal Church (the present St. John's) was duly organized, being the first church so known on this continent. In 1662 the royal proclamation secured to churchmen in Massachusetts the nominal liberty to observe their own forms of worship, and in 1682 King's Chapel was organized at Boston. After this period, Church-of-England clergymen labored in various parts of New England; and, though bitterly opposed, they met with some success, especially in Connecticut, where, in 1722, Cutler (president of Yale College) and six others declared for episcopacy. During the colonial period the strength of the church advanced in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, and the Carolinas. Trinity Church, New-York City, was in existence as early as 1693. The Rev. William Veasey, formerly a Presbyterian minister, became the first rector; and the churchmen of New York appear to have acted on the belief that the Ministry Act of 1691 was designed for their exclusive benefit. In due time the church became an acknowledged power. In New Jersey also, under Lord Cornbury, the church practically enjoyed the benefits that attend establishment. In Maryland, Virginia, and Georgia the church was formally established by law; and at one period the Vir-
The church continued to grow, especially under the impetus given by the missionaries of the Venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, organized in 1701; but the Revolutionary period, generally speaking, was a period of decline. A large portion of the clergy being royalists, the congregations, to a great extent, were broken up, and their property dissipated. At the close of the war the church was a melancholy wreck.

Nevertheless, the clergy who remained commenced the work of restoration, aiming especially to secure the episcopate, which many had desired to obtain during the colonial period. Before the evacuation of New York by the British, the Rev. Samuel Seabury had been recommended for the office, and was consecrated by the non-juring bishops at Aberdeen, Scotland, Nov. 14, 1784.

The first meeting for organization was held at New Brunswick, N.J., in May, 1784. In September, 1785, another convention was held in Philadelphia, when the so-called "Proposed Book" was drawn up, and when the convention also framed and adopted the constitution for the church known as "The Protestant Episcopal Church." At the convention held in Philadelphia the following June, the members not being satisfied with the consecration of Dr. Seabury, the Rev. Samuel Provoost, D.D., the Rev. William White, D.D., and the Rev. David Griffith, D.D., were chosen, and instructed to proceed to England, to obtain the consecration of Dr. Seabury, the Rev. Samuel Seabury had been recommended for the office, and was consecrated in Lambeth Chapel by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. John Moore, Dr. Griffith failing to appear. Subsequently the Rev. James Madison, D.D., was consecrated, the lower house being made threefold. At the triennial convention of 1789 the consecration of Bishop Seabury was recognized, thus securing the admission of New England. The convention adjourned to September, when the present Book of Common Prayer was adopted, and the church entered fully upon her independent career, under the leadership of the sagacious Bishop White, who stood the acknowledged head for a period of forty years.
EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

extreme view of "the washing of regeneration" which has been pushed to the border of the opus operatum; yet the bishops of the church, in 1870, put forth what is known as the "Declaration," affirming that the word "regenerate" is not used in the baptismal office so "as to determine that a man is in the subjective state of being regenerate in the sacrament." The Articles, to which Bishop Seabury was strenuously opposed, as the Scotch Church had none, do not meet with universal approval. In substance they are orthodox, and in spirit thoroughly Protestant; still they are intended to be comprehensive. On Predestination and Free Will they seem to serve the purpose of both Calvinist and Arminian. Indeed, the entire doctrinal system of the Protestant-Episcopal Church is tolerant. The church has continued in the lines of reformation adopted by the Church of England, in opposition to the policy of many Protestants on the Continent; the intention being to embrace all of the laity who accept the Christian faith as contained in the Apostles' Creed, no one being debarred from communion on account of any opinion entertained in connection with the test questions of certain denominations. Accordingly the Episcopal Church embraces various schools of thought, ranging from the so-called Evangelical to the Sacramentarian, or from the Genevan to the advanced Oxford type. Yet the schools in the American Church are not always to be considered as identical with those passing under the same name in England. All phases of theological opinion undergo essential modification in passing from the English to the American Church. This is especially the case with respect to the Broad-Church type of thought, which, in the Protestant Episcopal Church, often comprehends the liberal Evangelical and the high advocate of church order; being a feeling as well as a conviction, though it also includes the rationalist and the legendarian.

Institutions.—The institutions of the church are quite numerous, and the principal ones only are named. The Episcopal Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, founded in 1820, and incorporated in 1846. Its work extends throughout the United States, to Mexico, Africa, China, and Japan. The General Theological Seminary, situated in New-York City, was founded at about the same period as the Missionary Society. Its trustees are selected from all the dioceses. The American Church Missionary Society, the Evangelical Education Society, and the Evangelical Knowledge Society are of more recent origin, being devoted to the promotion of so-called evangelical interests. The Society for the Increase of the Ministry has a wider scope. Mention should also be made of the Free Church Association (devoted to the work of increasing the number of free sittings), the Church Congress, the Church Temperance Society, and the American Church Building-Fund Commission, with the Western Church Building Society. The colleges and theological seminaries number about twenty-five; Columbia and Trinity College holding the foremost rank. A Quarterly Review is published, together with twelve or more newspapers, several of which are influential and widely circulated.

Statistics.—At the present time (1886) the church numbers 60 bishops, 3,729 priests and deacons, 4,565 parishes and missions, 321 candidates for orders, 397,192 communicants, 36,001 Sunday-school teachers, 326,203 Sunday-school scholars. Aggregate of contributions and offerings for the work of baptism is wrought in the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, New York, 1849, 12mo; Bishop Perry: Journals of General Conventions of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Claremont, 1874, 8 vols. 8vo; Wilberforce: History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, New York, 1849, 12mo; Bishop Perry: Journals of General Conventions of the Protestant Episcopal Church, giving its History and Constitution, 1788-1880, New York, Thomas Whittaker, 1881, 12mo; White: Memoirs of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, 2d ed., 1836, third ed. by the Rev. B. F. DeCosta, D.D., New York, 1880; DeCosta: A Voyage unto Sages deboe, Boston, the Massachusetts Historical Society, 1880; The Protestant-Episcopal Almanac and Parochial List for 1882, T. Whittaker, New York.

B. F. DE COSTA.

(Rector St. John the Evangelist, N.Y.).

EPISCOPAL CHURCH, Reformed. The English, unlike the Continental Reformation, was political in its origin. Henry VIII., casting off the yoke of the Pope of Rome, became himself the Pope of England. This released from ecclesiastical bondage, the English Church, under Edward VI., who was largely guided by Archbishop Cranmer, attained a much more intelligent conception of spiritual truth. The Edwardian reformers compiled the First Book of Common Prayer; the second volume of it had the royal approval, but not before they had completed the second. During Mary's reign the Church of England fell back into the superstition from which it seemed to have escaped; and the teachings of the Reformation, to use the language of Froude, "passed away like a dream." It was Elizabeth's policy to frame such a Liturgy as would satisfy and conciliate both her Roman-Catholic and Protestant subjects, and unite them in peaceable submission to the church and the throne. Such a Liturgy was published early in her reign, at a time when there was some hope of effecting a reconciliation with Rome, and, as might be expected, was so constructed as to foster this hope. Later on, Elizabeth became greatly offended with the Pope; and the Articles of Religion, which were issued in 1571, were, as a consequence, uncompromisingly Protestant in their tone. The royal commissioners of 1669 failed in their effort to bring English Church back to the spirit of the Second Book of Edward.

The English Prayer-Book, being thus the offspring of compromise, contains within itself antagonistic elements; its ritual (which constitutes its educating power) looking towards Rome; its articles of faith, towards Geneva. As a consequence of this the Church of England has always contained within itself two manner of peoples, the one asserting its Protestantism, the other claiming its aflinity with Rome.

When the Church of England in the Colonies became the Protestant-Episcopal Church of the United States, these influences, which had been transmitted and perpetuated here, secured the retention of the same Formularies and Articles; and so the American Book of Common Prayer wears all the marks of the old compromise.

In the early part of the second quarter of the present century the Tractarian movement began at Oxford. It was an attempt to revive those Anglo-Catholic sentiments which had been largely developed by Archbishop Laud, and, after his time by the non-juring clergy. It counted among its High, protosynical, Ritualistic party, affiliated with the Church or Evangelical party to the defence of the Church or the Anglican Church were the more pure, considered the Reformation from the Church of Rome unjustifiable, and declared that he received their now clearly endangered principles.

This Romeward drift became shortly afterwards apparent in the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States; conspicuously so at the time of the ordination of the Rev. Arthur Carey in New York, July, 1843. This young man deemed the difference between the Protestant-Episcopal Church and the Church of Rome such as embraced no points of faith, doubted whether the Church of Rome or the Anglican Church were the more pure, considered the Reformation from Rome unjustifiable, and declared that he received the Articles of the Creed of Pius IV. so far as they were repetitions of the decrees of the Council of Trent. On the ground of these views the Rev. Drs. Hugh Smith and Henry Anthou pressed against his ordination, and were referred to committee for redress and relief. These proceedings brought no result. The applications were either dishonored, or referred to committees, for quiet burial, to be heard of no more.

The fate of these measures convinced many of the Low-Church party that the dominant majority could be hoped for within the Protestant-Episcopal Church, and they must either crush their consciences, or seek relief elsewhere.

They were anxiously waiting the indications of Providence when the Sixth General Convention of the Evangelical Alliance met in the city of New York (October, 1859). While this distinguished body was in session, a union communion service was held in one of the churches of the city, at which, in company with the representatives of other denominations, Bishop George D. Cummins, D.D., assistant bishop of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the diocese of Kentucky, by invitation officiated. For this act of Christian courtesy and fellowship he was at once bitterly assailed through the press by representatives of the High-Church party. Pained by this manifestation of exclusiveness, and convinced, by previous experience in the diocese of Kentucky, that his official position obliged him to countenance, to some degree, the growing evils of ritualism, Bishop Cummins reached the conclusion that he could not, without sin, longer give his life, ministry, and influence to the advancement of a Church, the theould and compromising of the church in the interest of medievalism became increasingly apparent. Discussions were had, conferences held. Particular attention began to be paid to the writings of the English reformers; and finally the conclusion was reached by many, that the root of the difficulties which beset the church was to be found in the Romanism latent in the Book of Common Prayer as a result of the Elizabethan compromise. Urged by this conviction, a movement was quietly set on foot looking toward the revision of the Prayer-Book; and at a conference held in Philadelphia, 1867, a committee was appointed to consider and report upon the subject. Meanwhile the flames of discontent were fanned by events which indicated a determination on the part of the High-Church party to deal oppressively and repressively with their opponents.

These events were keenly watched by the Christian public generally, and undoubtedly exerted a great influence on the struggle.

I. The trial (February, 1867) and admonition of the Rev. S. H. Tyng, jun., for preaching in a Methodist Church in New Brunswick, N.J., within the claimed parochial limits of a parish of the Protestant-Episcopal Church.

II. The trial (1868) of Rev. J. F. Hubbard of Rhode Island, for exchanging pulpits with a Baptist clergyman.

III. The sentence of suspension, subsequently of degradation, passed by an ecclesiastical court, in the diocese of Illinois, upon Rev. (now Bishop) Charles E. Cheney, for the omission of the word "regenerate" in the baptismal office.

Meanwhile the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, which meets triennially, was besieged with remonstrances, suggestions, and petitions for redress and relief. These pleadings brought no result. The applications were either dishonored, or referred to committees for quiet burial, to be heard of no more.

The fate of these measures convinced many of the Low-Church party that the dominant majority were resolved to yield nothing, that no reform could be hoped for within the Protestant-Episcopal Church, and they must either crush their consciences, or seek relief elsewhere.

These measures widened the chasm. Evangelical men became more and more restive as the purpose of the Tractarian movement was to defend, conserve, and disseminate its principles.

These measures widened the chasm. Evangelical men became more and more restive as the purpose of the Tractarian movement was to defend, conserve, and disseminate its principles.
Accordingly, in a letter addressed to the Right Rev. Bishop Smith, D.D., the presiding bishop, he, on the 11th of November, 1873, withdrew from the ministry of the Protestant-Episcopal Church.

After consultation had with brethren like-minded, the Reformed Episcopal Church was organized, Dec. 2, 1873, in the parlor of the Young Men's Christian Association, New-York City, eight clergymen and twenty laymen giving in their adhesion to the movement. At the same time and place Bishop Cummins was chosen the presiding officer of the church; Rev. C. E. Cheney, D.D., rector of Christ Church, Chicago, was elected bishop (consecrated by Bishop Cummins in Chicago, Dec. 14, 1873); and a Declaration of Principles (of which subsequent statements of doctrine, polity, worship, and discipline are little more than an expansion) was set forth, as follows:

I.—The Reformed Episcopal Church, holding "the faith once delivered unto the saints," declares its belief in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God, and the sole Rule of Faith and Practice; in the Creed "commonly called the Apostles' Creed," in the Divine institution of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; and in the doctrines of grace substantially as they are set forth in the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

II.—This Church recognizes and adheres to Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and admirable form of church polity.

III.—This Church, retaining a Liturgy which shall not be imperative or repressive of freedom in prayer, accepts the Book of Common Prayer, as it was revised, proposed, and recommended for use by the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, A.D. 1785, reserving full liberty to alter, abridge, enlarge, and amend the same, as may seem most conducive to the edification of the people, "provided that the substance of the faith be kept entire."

IV.—This Church condemns and rejects the following erroneous and strange doctrines as contrary to God's Word:

First, That the Church of Christ exists only in one order or form of ecclesiastical polity:

Second, That Christian ministers are "priests," in another sense than that in which all believers are "a royal priesthood;"

Third, That the Lord's Table is an altar on which the oblation of the Body and Blood of Christ is offered anew to the Father:

Fourth, That the Presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper is a presence in the elements of Bread and Wine:

Fifth, That Regeneration is inseparably connected with Baptism.

The Reformed Episcopal Church has upon its roll ninety-two clergymen, including seven bishops. It has parishes in the chief cities of the United States, in England, Canada, and the Bermudan Islands.

According to last official report, on June 1, 1885, it had

Communicates
Sunday-school scholars
School teachers
Church property (exclusive of encumbrances) valued at
At the late General Council (May, 1885) the additions to the membership by confirmation and letter were 889.

The contributions for parochial, benevolent, and missionary objects, were, at the same time, reported as $132,200.

This church recognizes but two orders in the ministry,—the presbyterate and the diaconate. The episcopate is not an order, but a bishop being simply the first presbyter. The bishops preside over synods or jurisdictions, do not, as in the Protestant-Episcopal Church, constitute a separate house, but in council vote with and as their brother-presbyters, and are subject to confirmation by the General Council.

Accordingly, in a letter addressed to the Right Rev. Bishop Smith, D.D., the presiding bishop, he, on the 11th of November, 1873, withdrew from the ministry of the Protestant-Episcopal Church.

After consultation had with brethren like-minded, the Reformed Episcopal Church was organized, Dec. 2, 1873, in the parlor of the Young Men's Christian Association, New-York City, eight clergymen and twenty laymen giving in their adhesion to the movement. At the same time and place Bishop Cummins was chosen the presiding officer of the church; Rev. C. E. Cheney, D.D., rector of Christ Church, Chicago, was elected bishop (consecrated by Bishop Cummins in Chicago, Dec. 14, 1873); and a Declaration of Principles (of which subsequent statements of doctrine, polity, worship, and discipline are little more than an expansion) was set forth, as follows:

I.—The Reformed Episcopal Church, holding "the faith once delivered unto the saints," declares its belief in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God, and the sole Rule of Faith and Practice; in the Creed "commonly called the Apostles' Creed," in the Divine institution of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; and in the doctrines of grace substantially as they are set forth in the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

II.—This Church recognizes and adheres to Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and admirable form of church polity.

III.—This Church, retaining a Liturgy which shall not be imperative or repressive of freedom in prayer, accepts the Book of Common Prayer, as it was revised, proposed, and recommended for use by the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, A.D. 1785, reserving full liberty to alter, abridge, enlarge, and amend the same, as may seem most conducive to the edification of the people, "provided that the substance of the faith be kept entire."

IV.—This Church condemns and rejects the following erroneous and strange doctrines as contrary to God's Word:

First, That the Church of Christ exists only in one order or form of ecclesiastical polity:

Second, That Christian ministers are "priests," in another sense than that in which all believers are "a royal priesthood;"

Third, That the Lord's Table is an altar on which the oblation of the Body and Blood of Christ is offered anew to the Father:

Fourth, That the Presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper is a presence in the elements of Bread and Wine:

Fifth, That Regeneration is inseparably connected with Baptism.

The Reformed Episcopal Church has upon its roll ninety-two clergymen, including seven bishops. It has parishes in the chief cities of the United States, in England, Canada, and the Bermudan Islands.

According to last official report, on June 1, 1885, it had

Communicates
Sunday-school scholars
School teachers
Church property (exclusive of encumbrances) valued at
At the late General Council (May, 1885) the additions to the membership by confirmation and letter were 889.

The contributions for parochial, benevolent, and missionary objects, were, at the same time, reported as $132,200.

This church recognizes but two orders in the ministry,—the presbyterate and the diaconate. The episcopate is not an order, but a bishop being simply the first presbyter. The bishops preside over synods or jurisdictions, do not, as in the Protestant-Episcopal Church, constitute a separate house, but in council vote with and as their brother-presbyters, and are subject to confirmation by the General Council.

Accordingly, in a letter addressed to the Right Rev. Bishop Smith, D.D., the presiding bishop, he, on the 11th of November, 1873, withdrew from the ministry of the Protestant-Episcopal Church.

After consultation had with brethren like-minded, the Reformed Episcopal Church was organized, Dec. 2, 1873, in the parlor of the Young Men's Christian Association, New-York City, eight clergymen and twenty laymen giving in their adhesion to the movement. At the same time and place Bishop Cummins was chosen the presiding officer of the church; Rev. C. E. Cheney, D.D., rector of Christ Church, Chicago, was elected bishop (consecrated by Bishop Cummins in Chicago, Dec. 14, 1873); and a Declaration of Principles (of which subsequent statements of doctrine, polity, worship, and discipline are little more than an expansion) was set forth, as follows:

I.—The Reformed Episcopal Church, holding "the faith once delivered unto the saints," declares its belief in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God, and the sole Rule of Faith and Practice; in the Creed "commonly called the Apostles' Creed," in the Divine institution of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; and in the doctrines of grace substantially as they are set forth in the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

II.—This Church recognizes and adheres to Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and admirable form of church polity.

III.—This Church, retaining a Liturgy which shall not be imperative or repressive of freedom in prayer, accepts the Book of Common Prayer, as it was revised, proposed, and recommended for use by the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, A.D. 1785, reserving full liberty to alter, abridge, enlarge, and amend the same, as may seem most conducive to the edification of the people, "provided that the substance of the faith be kept entire."

IV.—This Church condemns and rejects the following erroneous and strange doctrines as contrary to God's Word:

First, That the Church of Christ exists only in one order or form of ecclesiastical polity:

Second, That Christian ministers are "priests," in another sense than that in which all believers are "a royal priesthood;"

Third, That the Lord's Table is an altar on which the oblation of the Body and Blood of Christ is offered anew to the Father:

Fourth, That the Presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper is a presence in the elements of Bread and Wine:

Fifth, That Regeneration is inseparably connected with Baptism.

The Reformed Episcopal Church has upon its roll ninety-two clergymen, including seven bishops. It has parishes in the chief cities of the United States, in England, Canada, and the Bermudan Islands.

According to last official report, on June 1, 1885, it had

Communicates
Sunday-school scholars
School teachers
Church property (exclusive of encumbrances) valued at
At the late General Council (May, 1885) the additions to the membership by confirmation and letter were 889.

The contributions for parochial, benevolent, and missionary objects, were, at the same time, reported as $132,200.
died, a successor was immediately appointed to him. Something similar took place when the Eastern Church was broken up by the Mohammedans. Dioceses entirely in the hands of the infidels (in pertibus mosticibus) had bishops, who lived in Rome, or elsewhere, as it became customary to employ these bishops without dioceses as help to such bishops as were unable to manage the whole business of their diocese. Many abuses and corruptions grew up from this custom; and the councils, from that of Ravenna (1311) to that of Trent (1545), tried hard to regulate, without destroying altogether, the useful practice.

EPISTLES. The letters of the apostles contained in the New Testament are called, may be divided into congregational, those addressed to a particular church, and dealing with doctrinal or practical questions; private, those addressed to individuals, yet containing matter of wider interest; and general, those of an encyclical character, not meant for any one church or person. Paul belonged to the first two classes, or even to all three, if the words, “to Ephesus,” be left out of Eph. i. 1, as it is of weighty authority for doing; in which case this Epistle would be general. John’s Epistles belong to the last two classes; James’s, Peter’s, and Jude’s to the last. There are thirteen Epistles of Paul, three of John, two of Peter, and one each of James and Jude. The Epistle to the Hebrews is of uncertain authorship. The Epistles in their outward form are similar to those of their day. With the exception of Hebrews and 1 John, they begin, according to the custom, with the author’s name, and that of the person or congregation primarily addressed. Then follows the salutation (omitted in 3 John). This is usually “grace” and “peace;” but in 1 and 2 Timothy, 2 John, and Jude, “mercy” is added; while James employs the classic Greek expression, “greeting.” “Grace” was Greek, and “peace” Hebrew; but they were not used by these writers in their original sense, which referred rather to physical health and temporal comfort, but transformed into a prayer for the saving grace of God and the peace in Christ. In the body of the Epistle the first personal pronouns, singular and plural, are used indiscriminately, just as they are in Cicero’s letters. The terminations of the Epistles vary. James closes abruptly, and so does 1 John; 2 and 3 John close with salutations; Romans and Jude, with a doxology; the remaining Epistles, with a brief benediction.

The earlier Epistles antedate the Gospels. There was need of direction prior to written accounts of the life of Jesus. Our collection by no means includes all the letters of the apostles, but only such as were inspired for the reading and guidance of the Church in all ages.

Paul employed an amanuensis (Rom. xvi. 22), and only added a few words at the close in his own hand, by way of authentication; for it would seem that his letters had been forged or plagiarized (1 Cor. xii. 6; 1 Thess. ii. 17, cf. ii. 2). This fact explains many of the peculiarities of the style of the great apostle; for his sentences often read like the utterances of an impassioned speaker. His letters were the answers of his heart and head to questions submitted to him. He put all his learning, his dialectical skill, his tact and judgment, and also all his affection, at the service of his converts and friends. His fellow-writers did the same, according to their ability.

The Epistles are many doctrinal statements, upon which different theologies are founded, besides rich practical instruction. The chief facts of the gospel are alluded to; and so, if the Gospels were destroyed, the Church would yet possess an inspired though fragmentary history of her Lord. One of the most important services of the Epistles is their stimulus and support to the piety of the Church. Many passages in Paul’s writings, 1 and 2 Peter, and 1 John entire, have ever been of inestimable value in centring the thought of the Church upon Christ. The common sense of James makes it the “business man’s epistle;” but even this is full of the spirit of the Master. No other religion can boast of such letters as the twenty-one Epistles of the New Testament. Their existence is an unanswerable argument for the divine origin of Christianity. See LETTERS, PAUL, WRITING; also art. Epistle in the Bible Dictionaries.

TABLE OF THE EPISTLES.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Epistle</th>
<th>Date (approximate)</th>
<th>Place</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>James</td>
<td>before 50</td>
<td>Jerusalem</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thessalonians I.</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>Corinth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thessalonians II.</td>
<td>56 or 57</td>
<td>Athens</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Galatians</td>
<td>57</td>
<td>Ephesus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corinthians I.</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>Macedonia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corinthians II.</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>Corinth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Romans</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Colossians</td>
<td>61-62</td>
<td>Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ephesians</td>
<td>64 (?)</td>
<td>Philippians</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philemon</td>
<td>64 (?)</td>
<td>Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hebreus</td>
<td>64 (?)</td>
<td>Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peter I.</td>
<td>64 (?)</td>
<td>Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Timothy I.</td>
<td>64 (?)</td>
<td>Babylon or Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Titus</td>
<td>66 (?)</td>
<td>Macedonia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philemon</td>
<td>66 (?)</td>
<td>Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peter II.</td>
<td>65 or 67 (?)</td>
<td>Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jude</td>
<td>65 or 67 (?)</td>
<td>Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John I., II., III.</td>
<td>80 and 100</td>
<td>Ephesus</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

EPISTOLE OBSCURORUM VIRORUM. The first edition of this famous book appeared in 1515, containing forty-one letters. A second edition, unchanged, soon followed, and a year later a third, augmented with seven letters. In 1517 a new series appeared, numbering sixty-two letters, which in the second edition were augmented with eight. Full information with respect to the history of the work may be found in EDOUARD BÜCKING: Ulrichi Huettii operum supplementum, Leipzig, 1884-70, 2 vols., containing also the various answers to the book.

The immediate occasion for the production of the Epistole obscurorum virorum was the publication in 1514, at Tübingen, of the Epistole clarorum virorum. The latter intended to place the mental wealth of the humanists in a proper light; and, as a supplement, the former undertook to give a picture of the mental poverty and moral obscurantism of the Roman Catholic Church, its monks, and its scholasticism. In its details the book is often coarse, and somewhat offensive to modern taste; but, considered as a whole, it is nevertheless a brilliant performance. The caricature of the style and language then used in the monasteries is extremely ludicrous; and the saeculic with which the cxrr obscurs lay bare their own ignorance and stupidity is very enjoyable.
ERA. 752

With respect to the authorship, the plan of this "mimical satyre" was due to Crotus Rubianus; and Ulrich von Hutten, a learned and fearless knight (see art.), was his principal collaborator. The effect was tremendous. In some places the monks mistook the book, and believed it to be a serious performance in their favor; but the mistake was of course soon discovered, and the delight turned into rage. Ortvin Gratius, to whom the letters are addressed, a comical person, a scholastic in humanist robe, the poetissimus, as Luther called him, did his utmost to suppress it by means of a papal brief, and to disturb its influence by writing against it. [German trans., by Dr. Wilhelm Binder, Briefe von Dunkelmaerern, Stuttgart, 1870.]

ERNHARD RODENBERG.

EQUITIUS, abbot of several monasteries in the province of Valeria (a district in Abruzzo Ultra, thus called because it was traversed by the Via Valeria), flourished in the sixth century, and preached often in the neighboring towns and villages, though he was not ordained. This excited the jealousy of the ordained priests, and he was summoned to Rome by the Pope; but, after an interview, the Pope dropped the case. According to Al anus, the Waldenses afterwards used his example against the hierarchy, when forbidden to preach because they were laymen. An account of him, much mixed up with legendary matters, is found in Gregorian I.: Dial., I. 4.

HERZOG.

ERA (Latin era, or era) occurs for the first time in Isidorus' Etym. (V. 38), and is there applied to a chronological arrangement by Augustus, beginning with the year 710 A.U.C. Afterwards it became the common name for any chronological arrangement starting from a fixed point. Its etymology is uncertain. Ideler derives it from the Gothic jera ("year"), and asserts that it was first used for the chronology which the Visigoths found established in Spain and Southern France. Others derive it (and with more rigkt) from the Latin jera, from os, and era from os. The term era (singular femi- nine) is used already by Cicero to denote the unit of certain measurements.

In the books of the Old and New Testaments, traces of an era, properly speaking, occur only in a few passages; a circumstance not to be wondered at, on account of the great age and devotional character of these books. The nations of antiquity used no era, either in their private or in their public life; contrivances of that kind were left solely to the historians and the chroniclers by profession. Even the Romans, though they had a fixed era, that of the Roman Consul, the year of the building of Rome, dated all public and private documents, in social and political life, simply by the name of the consul in office, to which afterwards was added the year of the reign of the emperor. In the historical and prophetic books of the Old Testament, date of some kind or other are of frequent occurrence; but continuous computation of time from a fixed point is very rare. In the Pentateuch, and down to the time of Jacob, all chronology is bound up with genealogy. When the Israelites had kings of their own, they dated the year after the reign of the king, as is done in Kings, Chronicles, and Jeremiah. When they were subjugated by foreign peoples, they dated after the reign of the foreign ruler; as, for instance, after the Babylonian kings (Jer. xxv. 1, lxi. 28; Dan. ii. 1, vii. 1), or the Persian kings (Ez. iv. 24, vi. 15, Neh. i. 1. 11; Zech. vii. 1; Dan. x. 1). Dates of this kind also occur in the New Testament (Luke iii. 1; Matt. ii. 1; Luke i. 5). Sometimes, though not often, great national events are used as chronological starting-points; as, for instance, the exodus (Exod. xix. 1; Num. xxxiii. 38; 1 Kings vi. 1), or the beginning of the Babylonian exile (Ezek. xxxiii. 21, xi. 1). When the Jews became Syrian subjects, they adopted the Seleucidian era, beginning with the year 312 B.C. It is uniformly used in the first two books of the Maccabees; though else it appears that the authors of the books of the Maccabees do not date from exactly the same starting-point.

The establishment of the Christian Church was not immediately followed by the establishment of the Christian era. For centuries the Christians continued to date, each in the way to which he was accustomed. Thus the Christians of the East continued to use the Seleucidian era; and, indeed, the Syrian Christians still use it in all ecclesiastical affairs besides the Christian era, only that a difference with respect to the computation of New Year has crept in among them; the Nestorians and Jacobites reckoning from Oct. 1, and the Roman Catholics from Sept. 1. In Alexandria the era of Diocletian was adopted for the computation of Easter. It begins with the reign of Diocletian (Aug. 29, 284); and, as this reign was ushered in with horrible persecutions, the era received the name of Era Martyrion. It was commonly used in Egypt, in all civil affairs, down to the invasion of the Arabs; and it is still used by the Egyptian and Ethiopian Christians, though the latter also employ a world-era, beginning from the creation. The Christian Armenians date from the year 551 A.D., while the Syriac and Persian, reformed and finally fixed by the patriarch Moses.

The Christian era, thus called because it dates from the person of Christ, is now universally used by the nations of Europe and America; but five centuries elapsed before it was invented, and five more before it was generally adopted. In 537 the Emperor Justinian ordered that all public documents should be dated by the year of the emperor, the name of the consul, the indication (tax-period), the month, and the day (Novella, XLVII); but in 541 the last consul was elected, and the need of a new starting-point for the computation of years became more and more urgent. Meanwhile, in 535, the Roman abbot, Dionysius, had begun in his Easter-tables to count the years ab incarnatione Domini, and not after the era of Diocletian; which, though adopted by the Alexandrians, was not generally adopted, became more and more urgent. The first year of this Dionysian era runs from Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 754 A. U. C.; and the birth of Jesus falls towards the close of the year. — Dec. 25, as, according to common patristical usage, incarnatio means conceptio, and not nativitas. This method of computing time found great favor; and Bede and Charlemagne contributed much to introduce it. In the tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish era is represented with the intestines laid bare, he has much to introduce it. In the 'tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish era is represented with the intestines laid bare, he has much to introduce it. In the 'tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish era is represented with the intestines laid bare, he has much to introduce it. In the 'tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish era is represented with the intestines laid bare, he has much to introduce it. In the 'tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish era is represented with the intestines laid bare, he has much to introduce it. In the 'tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish era is represented with the intestines laid bare, he has much to introduce it. In the 'tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish era is represented with the intestines laid bare, he has much to introduce it. In the 'tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish era is represented with the intestines laid bare, he has much to introduce it. In the 'tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish era is represented with the intestines laid bare, he has much to introduce it. In the 'tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates. — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.
fame which has never been surpassed in the annals of men of letters. He remained in England and the Netherlands for a time, and was a part of the scholarly and cultural life of the time. In 1515, he was elected by the archduke one of his counsellors, and subsequently to a similar position by Charles V. From 1515 to 1521 he resided in Brussel, Antwerp, and Louvain (Ep. 354). A papal brief gave him a much desired relief from the duties and dress of his monastic vow. From 1514 all his writings were published by Froben at Basel. This necessitated frequent journeyings to Switzerland through Germany. These journeys were triumphant processions; scholars, councils, and bishops doing him homage. His correspondence at this period was enormous, and included princes, the highest prelates, and the Pope himself. In Germany a party grew up called the "Erasmi," which regarded him as a leader of a new movement in the church as well as in the department of letters. Among the writings of this period are a school-book, de Duplici Copia Verborum ac Retum, 1512, and the Colloquia Familiares, 1518, 1522, much enlarged in 1526. The latter is the most read of all Erasmus' writings. It contains the keenest sarcasm, and Wittiest salutes against conventional life, fastings, pilgrimages, and the worship of saints. He edited numerous editions and translations of classic authors and the fathers, the most valuable of which is that of Jerome. The most important of all Erasmus' works appeared in 1516. It had a decided influence upon the Reformation. It was an edition of the Greek Testament under the title of Novum Instrumentum omne, diligenter ab Erasmo Roterdamo recognitum et emendatum, etc. Besides the text, it contained a Latin translation, which departs quite largely from the Vulgate, and annotations justifying these departures, explaining different passages, and condemning frequently, by comparison with apostolic teaching, the excesses and ignorance of the monks. The work was preceded with a dedication to Leo X. to stamp it with the sanction of the Church. An Introduction, composed of three parts, exhorts to the study of Scripture, the text was faulty, and inferior to that of the Complutensian Polyglot, which, although completed two years previously, did not appear till 1520. The printer's errors were corrected in subsequent editions, but the editorial faults remained. This text had a very large circulation. Within a few decades, thirty unauthorized reprints were made. Erasmus himself sent out four more editions. Luther's translation was based upon the second edition (1519); and in the third (1522) the editor restored to the text 1 John v. 7, "ne cui foret ansa calumniandi." (See Butzer, p. 325). In 1517 he began to publish the Paraphrases of the Epistles and Gospels, which also exerted an extensive influence upon the Reformation.

In these writings Erasmus is in many points the precursor of the Reformation. His satire against the ecclesiastical abuses and corruption of the day is keen and bold. He also made the Scriptures the standard of doctrine and life in the Church. They had disabused his own mind of prejudices in favor of the specific holiness of clerical and celibate life. With the Reformers he thus far agreed. He differed in particulars equally important. They found the essence of Christianity in the reconciliation of the sinner to God and the time limitation of the redemption of human nature. Erasmus regarded Christ from another standpoint, as the exemplar of all virtue, and the restorer of moral order to the world. The Reformers were Augustinian in their theology, he Pelagian. Erasmus treated with somewhat of indifference the doctrinal part of Christianity, and at times estimated the morality of Greece and Rome so high as to obliterate the line between it and that of Christianity (Enchir., ii., etc.).

There were certain defects of character, and certain qualities of disposition, which explain the failure of Erasmus to understand and advocate the Reformation. His opposition to the state of the Church had proceeded from aesthetic feeling, rather than from moral indignation. He lacked the enthusiasm of a moral cause. He says he had rather sacrifice the safety of the truth than destroy peace (Ep. 643, Dec. 25, 1522). After long vacillation, in which the fear of man comes out only too conspicuously, he cut loose from the Reformation.

The third period of Erasmus' life is marked by a complete rupture with the Reformers. The most prominent of these attributed their emancipation from the dominion of the Church to his writings. He was popularly classed with them. But Luther saw deeper, and wrote to Lange (Letters 22, 29), "I fear that Erasmus does not sufficiently dwell Christ and the divine grace." But down to his letter of March 28, 1519, to Erasmus, he had the highest esteem for him, calling him "our pride and hope." In his reply (Ep. 325), Erasmus, while applauding Luther's attitude towards the friars, counsels him to be moderate and careful. After preserving, as long as it was possible, an attitude of neutrality, he gradually drew off from the German reformer, and studiously avoided his writings, lest he should be called upon to give an opinion upon them. [Mr. Froude keenly discriminates between these two men in his essay: "In Luther, belief in God was the first principle of life. In Erasmus it was an inference which might be taken away, and yet leave the world a very tolerable and habitable place," etc.] In spite of this, his enemies (Ep. 562) said Luther had sucked poison at his breast, or that he "laid the egg which Luther hatched out." Erasmus was, however, still opposed to persecution, and did not conceal his disgust at the papal bull of excommunication. But in a letter to Leo X., dated Sept. 13, 1520, he hastens to clear himself of all connection with the excommunicated reformer, and to declare that he himself was not of that number which Luther has condemned. He hastens to add that he had not been consulted by Luther, and does not wish to be called upon to give an opinion upon him. Erasmus' opposition to the Reformation is marked by a complete rupture with the Reformers. The work shows him to be unequal to the problem, and inferior to Luther, who replied in the De Servo Arbitrio. Erasmus wrote, in 1528, a feeble retort, — Hyperaspistes. Luther henceforth regarded Erasmus as a “sceptic and epicurean, an enemy of all true religion.” In 1523 Erasmus broke all connection with Zwingli, and henceforth he regarded the Reformation as a calamity and a crime (Ep. 906). In contrast to his former utterances, he now ridiculed the marriage of the clergy, and proclaimed for the authority of the Church to punish heretics with death. The Sorbonne, in 1527, condemned thirty-two articles extracted from his works, after having previously forbidden the circulation of the Colloquies in France. But the Pope’s friendship suffered no abatement. Paul III. offered to make him cardinal, but he declined on account of age. Erasmus returned to Basel in 1535, where he died of an attack of his old trouble, the stone, combined with dysentery. He died without the priest, but invoking the mercy of Christ. His body lies interred in the cathedral of Basel. A life-like portrait by Hans Holbein hangs in the museum of the same city.

ERASTIANISM. See Erastus.

ERASTUS, Thomas, b. Sept. 7, 1524, at Baden, in Switzerland, or, according to another account, at Auggen, in the margraviate of Baden; d. at Basel, Jan. 1, 1583; studied theology at Basel, and philosophy and medicine at Bologna and Padua, and was in 1558 appointed body-physician to the elector-palatine, and professor of medicine at Heidelberg, 1560. He was a pupil of Zwingli; took active part in the conferences at Heidelberg (1560) and Maulbronn (1564); and, defended, in the controversy concerning the Lord’s Supper, the Swiss view against Dr. Johann Marbach, a Lutheran minister at Strassburg; and on one occasion he had occasion to defend his master’s ideas against the Calvinists in a question of church-polity. There was in Heidelberg a Calvinist party, headed by Caspar Olevianus, which wanted to introduce in the country a purely presbyterian church-constitution with a corresponding church-discipline. Erastus strongly opposed the movement, but in vain. He was himself the very first victim of the established church-discipline, being excommunicated on a charge of latent Unitarianism. He was restored after five years; but, six years after his death (1589), Castellvetro, who had married his widow, published a work of his, Epistola gravissima questionis, utrum excommunication mandato nitatur divino, an excoigitati sit ab hominibus, written in 1588, and found among his posthumous papers. The book, written, according to the fashion of the time, in form of theses, and denying that excommunication is a divine ordinance, that the Church has any power to make laws or decrees, and to inflict pains and penalties of any kind, that the sins of professing Christians are to be punished by pastors and elders, instead of the civil magistrate, etc., attracted much attention, and was attacked by Beza. It was translated into English in 1659, and again, in 1844, by R. Lee; and its views were adopted by a distinct party in the Westminster Assembly, headed by Selden, Lightfoot, Coleman, and White-locke. Since that time the doctrine of the State supremacy in ecclesiastical causes generally goes under the name of Erastianism; though in its broad sense, and wide application, this doctrine is by no means due to Erastus. G. V. LECHLER.

EREMITE. See Anchorites.

ERENST, Johann August, b. Aug. 4, 1707, at Tennstatd, in Thuringia; d. at Leipzig, Sept. 11, 1781; studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and was appointed professor, in the latter place, of classical literature (1749), of rhetoric (1756), and of theology (1758). As a philologist he enjoyed a great fame. His editions of Cicero, Homer, Xenophon, Tacitus, etc., were celebrated; and his Opuscula Oratoria (1782), Opuscula philologico-critic (1784), and Inmuta Doctrina Solidaria (1780) were much read. His principal theological work is his Institutio Interpretis N.T. (1761), [translated into English by Terrot, and published in the Biblical Cabinet, Edinburgh, 1834,] which opened a new epoch in the history of hermeneutics, and founded the grammatico-historical school. Its principle is, that in an inspired book, the sense shall not be sought for, nor can it be found out, by any other method than that applied to an ordinary human book; and by this principle the chains of the old dogmatical method of interpretation were burst. He also edited the Thesaurus, 2d ed., 1760-69, second, 1773-79. See TELLER: Earnest Verdienste um Theologie und Religion, Leipzig, 1783; SEMLER: Zusätze zu Teller, Halle, 1785.

ERENSTI, Johann August, b. Aug. 4, 1707, at Tennstatd, in Thuringia; d. at Leipzig, Sept. 11, 1781; studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and was appointed professor, in the latter place, of classical literature (1749), of rhetoric (1756), and of theology (1758). As a philologist he enjoyed a great fame. His editions of Cicero, Homer, Xenophon, Tacitus, etc., were celebrated; and his Opuscula Oratoria (1782), Opuscula philologico-critic (1784), and Inmuta Doctrina Solidaria (1780) were much read. His principal theological work is his Institutio Interpretis N.T. (1761), [translated into English by Terrot, and published in the Biblical Cabinet, Edinburgh, 1834,] which opened a new epoch in the history of hermeneutics, and founded the grammatico-historical school. Its principle is, that in an inspired book, the sense shall not be sought for, nor can it be found out, by any other method than that applied to an ordinary human book; and by this principle the chains of the old dogmatical method of interpretation were burst. He also edited the Thesaurus, 2d ed., 1760-69, second, 1773-79. See TELLER: Earnest Verdienste um Theologie und Religion, Leipzig, 1783; SEMLER: Zusätze zu Teller, Halle, 1785;
ERPSKINE.

HAGENBACH.

ERPSKINE, Thomas (van Erpe), b. at Gorkum, in South Holland, Sept. 7, 1584; d. at Leyden, Nov. 13, 1624; studied at Middelburg and Leyden; travelled in England, France, Italy, and Germany; and was in 1613 appointed professor of Oriental languages at the University of Leyden, acting at the same time as instructor to the government. He was the first to draw attention to the great advantages which the student of the Bible may derive from a knowledge of the Arab language and literature. His Grammatica Arabica (1613) and Rudimenta Linguae Arabice (1920) were universally used by Arab students for two centuries, until they were superseded by the works of De Sacy. His translation of the New Testament into Arabic appeared 1618; that of the Pentateuch, 1622. See P. SCRIVERIUS: Manes Erpennianii, Leiden, 1625.

R. GOSCHE.

ERSKINE, Ebenezer, M.A., founder of the Secession Church; b. June 22, 1680; d. June 2, 1754. His father, Henry Erskine, an English Nonconformist minister (ejected by the Act of Conformity, 1662, and a sufferer otherwise from the persecutions of the reign of Charles II.), belonged to the family of the Earls of Mar. His mother, Margaret Halcro, was descended, on one side, from Halcro, Prince of Denmark, and on the other from the Duke of Albany, son of James V. of Scotland. Both parents were even more distinguished by their piety and holy living than by birth. The son inherited their more valuable qualities, but also somewhat of the high spirit not unbecoming the noble blood which flowed in his veins. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and having been licensed as a probationer in February, 1703, he was ordained minister of the parish of Portmoak before the end of the same year. In 1731 he was translated to the more important charge of Stirling, which he occupied till his deposition from the ministry of the Church of Scotland, in 1740.

As a minister of the National Church, no less than after his secession, his labors were most abundant, and most successful. Few ministers of that day enjoyed greater popularity as a preacher. People came from distances of sixty or seventy miles to benefit by his ministrations; and at the dispensation of the communion it was sometimes found necessary, even in the small parish of Portmoak, to make provision for no fewer than two thousand participants. His discourses were plain, even homely in style, but were delivered with a certain elevation and dignity of manner which was always characteristic of him. A contemporary, Mr. Hutton, minister of Dalkeith, writes, "I never saw so much of the majesty of God in any mortal man as in Ebenezer Erskine."

But it is chiefly as a leader in ecclesiastical affairs, at a critical period of the history of the Church of Scotland, that Mr. Erskine was known in his own day, or will be remembered in after-times. The history of the secession of 1732 (a movement small in its beginnings, but destined to influence materially the ecclesiastical and religious life of Scotland) cannot be told here. (See SECESSION CHURCH.) Of this first considerable division in the Scottish Church, Mr. Erskine is admitted both by friends and foes to have been the prime mover. The immediate occasion of the rupture was an act of the General Assembly, of 1732, in connection with the querelle des ritaux of Patronage. It may be noticed, however, that the relations of Mr. Ebenezer Erskine and his followers to the "ruling party in the Church" had been already strained long before this: first, in the controversy of the Marrow of Modern Divinity, a book condemned by the Assembly, but which Erskine and others as warmly approved; and again, in a celebrated case of alleged heresy, the case of Mr. John Simson, professor of divinity in the University of Glasgow. In fact, in announcing their secession in the formal Protest of Nov. 10, 1733, the original members of the Associate Synod, as the new body was at first called, expressly ascribed the step which they felt it their duty to take, not to any one act of the Church, but to "a course of defection from our Reformed and covenanting principles."

Among the incidents of his later years must not be omitted the part he took at the time of the rebellion of 1745, when he even offered his services as a volunteer soldier on behalf of the government, and for his patriotic conduct received the public thanks of the Duke of Cumberland. It is also to his credit, that when the Associate Synod was in 1747 rent asunder by disputes as to the religious clauses in some burgher oaths, he took the side of toleration, refusing to make non-subscription a term of communion.

Mr. Erskine was twice married, and left a numerous family. His only published works were occasional sermons, collected after his death in four volumes 12mo.

LIT. — DONALD FRASER: Life and Diary of Ebenezer Erskine, Edinburgh, 1881; JOHN MCKERRROW: History of the Secession Church, Glasgow, 1841; ANDREW THOMSON: Historical Sketch of the Origin of the Secession Church, Edinburgh, 1848.

WILLIAM LEE.

ERSKINE, John, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Church of Scotland; b. at Edinburgh in (or about) 1721; d. there Jan. 19, 1803. He was the eldest son of John Erskine, Esq., the gentleman of Carnock, a member of the Scottish bar, and author of The Institutes of the Law of Scotland. His mother was a daughter of the Hon. James Melville of Bagarvie, and grand-daughter of the fourth Lord Melville. It had been intended by his parents that he should follow his father's profession; and for a year or two, out of deference to their wishes, he applied himself to the study of the law. But a strong predilection for the service of the Church had been early formed, and showed itself, even while he was still a law-student, in the publication of a theological work which gained him the friendship of Bishop Warburton. He became a licentiate of the Church in 1743; and in 1744 he was ordained minister of the parish of Kirkintilloch, near Glasgow. In this laborious country-charge Dr. Erskine, from the first, devoted himself earnestly and faithfully to his professional duties, —duties which throughout his life he always regarded as having paramount claims on his attention. And he here, also, formed those habits of careful preparation for the pulpit which never failed to render his sermons, which are vigorous, expositions of Calvinism, if not eloquent, interesting and useful.

It was at this period of his life, too, that he began a practice which illustrates an important phase of his character; namely, that of maintaining friendly intercourse on religious questions with the representatives of foreign churches. In an age of bigotry and intolerance—at least among the members of the party to which he himself belonged—Dr. Erskine was, if no Broad-Churchman in the modern acception of the term, a man of wide sympathies and enlightened Christian liberality. In the list of his earliest correspondents were several distinguished ministers of America, amongst them being found the honored name of Jonathan Edwards. A frequent interchange of letters between Dr. Erskine and leading American ministers was indeed continued down to his death. Reference has already been made to his friendly relations with Bishop Warburton, many of whose letters will be found in Moncreiff's Life. He had no less loyal intercourse with some of the English Dissenters, especially with Mr. George Whitefield and the Wesleys. His correspondence with members of the Continental churches was carried on for a long time under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, from his ignorance of any foreign language except French; and it is a singular proof at once of his energy, and of the importance he attached to fellowship with Christian brethren outside his own church, that, for the purpose of carrying it out more extensively, Dr. Erskine undertook, as late as in his sixtieth year, the acquisition of the Dutch and German languages, and, in the absence of any teacher of these languages within his reach, gained a competent knowledge of them without assistance except from books.

It is greatly to Dr. Erskine's honor that he was one of the first advocates of missions to the heathen in the Church of Scotland, having actively supported and strenuously defended them at a time when, as a rule, churchmen and dissenters were, in Scotland at least, equally indifferent to what is now recognized as one of the chief obligations of the Christian Church. He was married in the year 1746; his wife being Christian Mackay, a daughter of George, Lord Reay. In 1758 he was translated from Kirkintilloch to the parish of Culross, and thence he removed, in 1756, to New Greyfriar's Church, Edinburgh; which charge he held for nine years, afterwards exchanging it for the Collegiate Church of Old Greyfriars in the same city. Here he had Principal Robertson, the historian of Charles V., as his colleague, and, in spite of their differences in ecclesiastical politics, as one of his best friends. In Edinburgh he found his work as a minister somewhat different in character from that of either of his country parishes, but not less laborious; and he was equally conscientious in giving his attention to it, while in the finding time for literary study, and for social intercourse with his friends. As an Edinburgh minister, he was also called to take a more prominent place in public business than before. As a leader in the church courts, he represented for many years the evangelical party, and his decisions were not infrequently submitted to him for those conceptions of the atonement which have had so great an effect upon later English and American popular religious thought; and it was Campbell's public advocacy of them which led to his expulsion from the Kirk. Mr. Erskine's theology was part of his life, it permeated his being; and it was his unflagging delight to impress his views upon all he met. His sincerity, his earnestness, his pure and lofty character, gave him a great influence. Of minor and fugitive pieces, he wrote (all except one published in Edinburgh): Remarks on the Internal Evidence for the Truth of Revealed Religion, 1820, 3d ed., 1821, reprinted Anverdoer, 1855, new ed., 1871; An Essay on Faith, 1822, 3d ed., 1823; The Unconditional Freeness of the Gospel, 1828, new ed., 1873; The Brazen Serpent, or Life coming from Death, 1831; The Doctrine of Election, London, 1837. There also appeared, posthumously, Spiritual Order and Other Papers, 1871, 2d ed., 1876, and in 1877 two volumes of his letters, edited by Dr. William Hanna, with reminiscences by Dean Stanley and Principal Shirly.

ESARHADDON. (Heb. יְשַׁרְיָדִים, LXX. ἡσαραπᾶδος, Assyr. Asur-ah-iddina, "Assur gave a brother"). Son and successor of Sennacherib, was king of Assyria B.C. 681-668. He is named in the Bible, 2 Kings xix. 37 (= Isa. xxxvii. 39), and Ez. iv. 2; see also Tob. 1. 21, where he is called Sargobâd. It is disputed whether the "king of Assyria" who carried Manasseh captive to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11) was Esarhaddon, or his son Asurbanipal, with the probabilities in favor of the latter. The passages in 2 Kings and Isaiah relate Esarhaddon’s accession after the murder of Sennacherib by two other sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer. From the latter we learn that the "adversaries of Judah and Benjamin" (Ez. iv. 1) had been brought into Palestine by him. The numerous cuneiform inscriptions dating from his reign give no additional information in regard to the circumstances of his ascending the throne, if we except the account of a battle in the countries of Hamagalait or Hanirabbat (perhaps Eastern Cappadocia) against enemies who are believed to have been his parricidal brothers. (Comp. Abydenus, in Euseb., Chron. I. 8. Abydenus calls him Azeridas: Alexander Polyhistor, in Euseb., Chron. I. 5, calls him Asordanes.) The statement of Ez. iv. 2 receives incidental confirmation from an inscription which speaks of his transplanting "inhabitants of the mountains and the sea of the rising sun" (i.e., the Persian Gulf) to the conquered city of Sidon (Cum. Inc. of West. Asia, 1. 45, 1. 31-35). His records, and those of his son Asurbanipal, represent him, further, as a mighty and sagacious king. One of the earliest acts of his reign was to subjugate Babylon (B.C. 680). Thenceforth he repeatedly designates himself "Ruler of Babylon, King of Sumir and Accad" (Southern and Northern Babylon). Ptolemy’s canon, or list of Babylonian kings, names him as Asapodàwaou, and, in agreement with the inscriptions, assigns him a reign of thirteen years. But, besides this, he waged successful wars against districts of Media, and subdued all Western Asia as far as Cyprus, including Ptolemais and Philiastia. Cylinders from his reign and that of his son give the names of "twelve kings of the seacoast" and ten kings of Cyprus who paid tribute to him. The list begins "Baal, king of the land of Tyre: Manasseh, king of the land (var. ‘city’) of Judah; Kausgabri, king of the land (var. ‘city’) of Edom; Musuri, king of the land (var. ‘city’ of Moab; Sil-Bel, king of the land (var. ‘city’) of Gaza," etc. Among the tributaries from Cyprus are the kings of Idalion, Salamis, Paphos, Soli, and Amathus. In the latter part of Esarhaddon’s reign (subsequent to B.C. 673) he extended his authority over Egypt. He vanquished the powerful Cushite king, Tirhakah, and put an end to the Cushite dominion in Egypt, where he established his own governors. In his later inscriptions he takes the title "King of Egypt and Cush," or "King of the Kings of Egypt and Cush."

Besides these conquests, in which he often showed a wise clemency as well as great military vigor, his reign was marked by splendor at home. He built or rebuilt great palaces, fortresses, and temples, particularly in Nineveh, Calah (Nimrod), and Babylon. The last and greatest of these buildings, the "South-west Palace" at Calah, was unfinished at his death. It shows the influence of Egyptian art in the appearance, for the first time, of sphinxes by the side of the usual colossal bulls and lions. Esarhaddon was succeeded by his son Asurbanipal, probably the "great and noble Asnapper" of Ez. iv. 10.

ESAU. See EDOM, JACOB.

ESCHATOLOGY, or "the doctrine of the last things," is that branch of theology which concerns itself with the termination of our earthly life, and those things which may lie beyond death. The term may have been derived, like the old designation, De Novissimis, from Jesus Sirach (vii. 36). The expression τά ἐσχατά, or "the last things," is of biblical origin (comp. Isa. ii. 2; Mic. iv. 1). This sketch cannot go into a discussion of the particular subjects of eschatology. They will be found treated under their special heads, APOCALYPSE, DEATH, HADES, PUNISHMENT, PURGATORY, etc.

The meaning of death, and the question of a future life, have engaged thought at all times; and hardly a people has been found destitute of all belief in a future existence.

The position of the Old Testament on this question has been a matter of dispute. Expositors, from the older Jews and the church fathers down to the present day, have differed as to whether it teaches immortality or not. Israel, in the first instance, turned its hopes not to the destiny of the individual, but to the coming of the Messiah and the regeneration living at the time of that coming (Ios. vi. 2; Isa. xxxv. 8; Ezek. xxxvii.). Only as a secondary matter is the presentment introduced of the restoration of the righteous dead, who should participate in the glory of Israel (Isa. xxv. 19; Dan. xii. 2, 13). The Messianic hope is the subject of the eschatology of the death and its kingdom (Deut. xxxii. 39; 1 Sam. ii. 6); and his power over life is the pledge of the immortality of his people (Isa. xl. 28 sqq.; Ps. cii. 5).
ESCHATOLOGY.

Of the Greek Church still held firmly to that notion of the incarnation which makes it the implanting of the germ of eternal life in our nature (Dorner). The Church of the middle ages presumed to have a jurisdiction beyond the grave, and developed the ideas of purgatorial fire. It was this eschatological excrecence of a Pelagianizing hierarchy which gave the external occasion for the Reformation. Four points were taken up in the eschatology of the Protestant confessions,—death, the resurrection, the judgment, and the consummation,—and stress laid upon the intimate connection of the second of life implanted here, and its perfect development hereafter. Rationalism knew only of a certainty of immortality which was based upon philosophical reasoning, and the prevalence of the belief among different peoples (Wegscheider). This was followed by the pantheistic renunciation of individual immortality. Finally came the triumphant sneer against the future life, as the last enemy of "speculative criticism" (Strauss, Glaubenslehre, § 106 sq.).

M. KAHLER.

ESCORBAN MENDOZA, Antonio, b.at Valladolid, 1589; d. July 30, 1646; entered the Society of Jesus in 1604, and acquired a great name both as a preacher and as a writer. His collected works, mostly on morals, comprise forty volumes in folio. The principal are Summula Casuum Conscientiae, Universae Theologiae Moralis Problemata, and Liber Theologiae Moralis, the last of which appeared in Lyons, 1646, ran through forty editions in the author's lifetime, and has been translated into several foreign languages. His works give the most complete and also the most authoritative representation of the moral system which the Jesuits inculcated; and they far outran all other attempts of the kind, even the writings of Busenbaum, in the audacious frivolity of their probabilism and the ludicrous subtlety of their casuistry. After passing through the hands of Pascal, Molière, and Boileau, they became an object of scorn, even to devout Roman Catholics; and in French speech the author's name, Escobar, is now synonymous with egotism, levity, and licentiousness adroitly covered up with hypocrisy.

ESCORIAL, or ESCURIÁL, one of the most remarkable buildings in Europe,—at once a palace, a church, a convent, a museum, and a museum,—is situated twenty-seven miles north-west of The book was first printed at Smyrna, 1762, and forms of Pagan infidelity and Gnostic heresy. It was translated into French by Le Vaillant de Flori then by the Mekhitarists, Venice, 1826. It was Sahak and Mesrob; travelled in Mesopotamia, July 9, 1646; d. at Amersfort, in the diocese of Utrecht, Oct. 2, 1728; studied theology and canon law at the university of his native city, and was appointed professor there of canon law, 1675. As he sided with the Jansenists, his Jus Ecclesiasticum, which appeared at Louvain, 1700, was put on the Index; and he escaped from further persecution only by living in a very quiet and retired manner. Nevertheless, when, in 1723, the chapter of Utrecht elected an archbishop in opposition to the Roman curia, he stepped forward, and defended the election as valid. But he was then compelled to flee from Louvain, and all his works were put on the Index; which condemnation, however, does not seem to have detracted anything from their authority. See Du Pac de Bellegarde: Vie de Van Espen, Louvain, 1707; Laurent: Van Espen, Brussels, 1800.

ESSENCE (Latin essentia, from esse, “to be”) denotes that which makes a thing to be what it is. The schoolmen made a distinction between essence and substance, referring the former to the logical combination of qualities expressed in the definition, the latter to the abstract notion of matter underlying all existence. Ancient philosophy, however, did not know this distinction, the Greek φύσις denoting at once essence and substance; and so again in modern philosophy.

ESSENCES, The. At the time when Christ appeared on earth, Judaism was divided into three religious parties,—the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. With the first two we are somewhat familiar from the New Testament, but not with the last, who were the object of admiration to Jews, heathens, and Christians, although their admirers are uncertain to this day whether they were Jews, or a school of Jewish proselytes, or, as Eusebius thinks, Christians.

Sources. —The sources from which our information is derived concerning the Essenes are, chiefly, Josephus (Jewish War, II. 8, 2–8; Antiquities, XIII. 5, 9, XV. 10, 4, 5, XVIII. 1, 2–8), Philo (On the fragm. of M. B. 171, 172, 173, while Pliny’s ed. ii. 457–459) and Apology for the Jews (preserved by Eusebius, Prep. Evang., VIII. 11, also found in Mangely’s ed. ii. 682–684), and Pliny (Nat. Hist., 6, 17). These sources were again made use of by Solinus, Porphyry, Eusebius, Irenaeus, Augustine, and Jerome, all of whom copy either the one or the other.

Name. — As to the name, which is variously... written in the Greek, it has provoked countless interpretations. The best is probably that given by Ewald, according to whom it means "the point," whilst Lightfoot prefers "the silent tones."

Origin. — As difficult as the explanation of the same is the fixing of the precise date of their origin. The probable date may be derived from Josephus, who assigns their rise to the time when the Pharisees and Sadducees had their origin; that is, in the middle of the second century before Christ. But it is questionable whether they were the outgrowth of Judaism, or whether they stand between Judaism and Hellenism. They were allied to the Pharisees, and yet with very distinctive differences: they were zealous for the law, and yet transgressed it; they were righteous in the spirit of the prophets, and yet more painfully intent than the Pharisees on outward purification. They were Jews, and yet shut themselves out from the nation; servants of Jehovah, and yet praying, like the heathen, to the sun. "They were," as Keim remarks, "like a mosaic picture, with no inward unity,—a phenomenon of religious despair."

Organization and Tenets. — According to Philo and Josephus, the number of the Essenes amounted at their time to more than four thousand, and they lived exclusively in the Holy Land and in the adjoining parts of Syria. But Pliny found the Essenes also on the western side of the Dead Sea, near the city of Engeddi; and, if we may believe Josephus, they were found everywhere.
They lived in a separate community, having every thing in common. There existed no distinction among them. They lived peaceably with all men, reproved slavery and war, and would not even manufacture any martial instruments whatsoever. They were governed by a president, who was elected by the whole body, and who also acted as judge of the community. All matters of the society were governed by a jury of at least a hundred members. A brother guilty of a gross offence was excommunicated, but received again after due repentance. Celibacy being the rule of the order, the ranks of the brotherhood had to be filled up by recruits from the Jewish commonwealth. They preferred taking children, whom they educated most carefully, and taught the practices of the order. Every grown-up candidate, upon entering the order, had to cast all his possessions into the common treasury. He then received a copy of the regulations of the brotherhood, a spade to bury the excrement, an apron to be used at lustrations, and a white robe to put on at meals. He was not at once admitted, but had to pass through a novitiate of twelve months, when he was admitted to the lustrations.
Then followed another novitiate of two years;
and at the end of this period he was admitted to the common meals, after having bound himself by a most solemn oath not to divulge any thing to outsiders, and to be open with the members of the order.

In order not to come in contact with such as did not practise the laws of Levitical purity, the Essenes raised the vessels of all their meals among themselves. Each one of the community took his share of work in the department in which he most excelled. Some were tillers of the ground; others tended flocks, and reared bees; some prepared the food; some made articles of dress; some attended to the sick, and some instructed the young; whilst others, after certain hours to studying the mysteries of nature and revelation, and of the celestial hierarchy.
They always got up before the sun rose, and never talked about any worldly matters till they had all assembled together, and, with their faces turned towards the sun, offered up their prayer.
This done, every one betook himself to his allotted work. They remained at their work till about eleven o'clock A.M., when they assembled together for a common bath. Having put on their white robes, they entered, with great solemnity, the refectory, to partake of the common meal, which was very simple, consisting chiefly of vegetables. The blessing having been invoked by the priest, the repast commenced. The deepest silence reigned throughout, to be interrupted only by the priest, who concluded the meal by offering thanks; which was the sign of dismissal. Thereupon all withdrew, dressed themselves in their working-dress, resumed their several employ-m ents till the evening, when they assembled again in the aforesaid manner to partake of a common meal. Whilst every thing was done according to the directions of the overseers, yet they were at liberty to act as they pleased in relieving the distressed with as much money as they thought proper, and to manifest their compassion for those who were not of the brotherhood as much as they liked and whenever they liked.
Such was their mode of living during the week.
The Sabbath was observed very strictly. They prepared the food on the previous day in order that no fire need be lighted on the Sabbath, and did not dare to remove a vessel from its place on that day. They even restrained the necessities of the body. The whole day was given up to religious exercises and to exposition of the Scriptures. In the synagogue, as at meals, each one took his seat according to age, in becoming attire.
One read aloud out of the law of their land, and the most experienced among them expounded, clothing the mystery in symbols. The others remained quiet, only giving a sign of assent or disassent with the head, the roar of which denoted abstinence they went even so far as to abstain from anointing the body, which in hot climates is almost a necessity of life.

Theology of the Essenes. — They had a tendency to sun-worship. This tendency is rather a foreign element in Judaism. As has already been indicated above, at daybreak they addressed certain prayers to the sun, "as if entreating him to rise."
They were careful, also, to conceal and bury all polluting substances, so as not "to insult the rays of the god." They denied the resurrection of the body, but believed in the immortality of the soul. Whilst they refused to offer sacrifices at Jerusalem, they sent gifts to the temple. They believed in angels; and to conceal the names of the angels was included in the oath taken by the candidate. They studied sacred books, which, however, are not described. They also learnt the qualities of rocks; and the mysteries of stones.
By means of these and similar studies connected with their lustrations, the Essenes believed to be eenabled to foretell the future; and Josephus affirms, that, in their prophecies, they seldom erred, giving some examples of fulfilled prophecies.

The question has been raised, and has been agitated by Continental scholars, whence Essenism derived its foreign influences, which distinguished it from Pharisaic Judaism; for, although many of the peculiarities which distinguish Essenism could be traced back to Judaism, yet there is an alien admixture of foreign elements which could hardly be reconciled with Judaism. Some have regarded the distinctive characteristics of the sect as an offshoot of the Neo-Pythagorean school grafted on the stem of Judaism. This solution is suggested by the statement of Josephus, that "they practise the mode of life which among the Greeks was introduced by Pythagoras." This theory has found its ablest and most persistent advocate in Zeller, who draws out the parallels with great force and precision (Geschichte der Philosophie der Griechen, III. 2, p. 281). This theory of Zeller was objected to by Lightfoot from a chronological and geographical standpoint, showing, on the one hand, the priority of Essenism to Neo-Pythagoreanism, and, on the other hand, that Essenism (having its home on the eastern borders of Palestine, the shores of the Dead Sea) was least of all exposed to the influences of Greek philosophy. Lightfoot is rather inclined to trace the tenets of Essenism back to the influence of Parseism, and makes his assertion good by drawing out the parallels between both. Which of the two theories is the correct one is hard to decide. This much is certain, that the theories of Jewish and Christian writers who would explain Essenism from a Talmudic standpoint have no foundation at all. Of greater importance, however, is the question as to the relationship between —

Essenism and Christianity. — It has become a common practice with a certain class of Jewish and Christian writers to call Essenism to their aid in accounting for any distinctive features of Christianity. We cannot enter into a refutation of the points of resemblance between Essenism and Christianity adduced by Graetz and Ginsburg. This theory has been ably treated and refuted by Lightfoot. Suffice it to say that Essenism, notwithstanding all its favorable effect upon individuals, had no influence upon the Jewish people in particular, or upon the world in general. "Essenism," as Keim says, "was, in fact, only an admission of helplessness against the actual state of things, renouncing the attempt to restore all Israel, to which it was opposed as heterodox and impure. . . . In short, the salvation of individuals in the general shipwreck is frankly the watchword of the party. We hear nothing from the cornerstone, the throne of God, nor for the Messiah, since these were enclosed within their own limits. . . . We may learn from its weakness, that the healing power which arose upon the nation, and, indeed, upon the world, with fresh creative fruitfulness, cannot be counted among the impulses and forces of Essenism."

Litur. — The literature on the Essenes is very rich. Besides what has been enumerated by Schürer (Lehrbuch der Neuestamentlichen Zeitgeschichte, Leipzig, 1874, pp. 589 sq.), see Keim: The History of Jesus of Nazara, Lond., 1873, vol. I, pp. 338 sq.; Clemens: De Essenorum Moribus et Institutionibus, Königsberg, n.d.; the same: Das 5. Evangelium, oder d. Ueavegelium d. Esser, Berl., 1879; P. E. Lucius: Der Essenismus, Strassb., 1881; Sieffert: Christus und die Esser, in Beweis des Glaubens (November, 1873); Demmler: Essenes und Essener (Geschichte und Lieder aus Württemberg, 1880, I., II. pp. 122-149; Ginsburg: The Essenes, their History and Doctrines, London, 1864 (reproduced in Alexander's edition of KittO's Cyclop.). A general survey of the English literature has been given by B. Pick, in Zeitschrift für die gesammte luth. Theologie und Kirche, ed. by Guericke and Delitzsch (Leipzig, 1878, pp. 397 sq.); but the most thorough and important treatise on this subject is by Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians and to Philemon, London, 1875, pp. 82-179. G. Uhhorn (Greatly enlarged, and with literature added by B. Pick).

ESTHER (star, from the Persian starch), the Persian name of the Jewish Hadassah (ii. 7), and the adopted daughter of Mordecai, her cousin. After the deposition of Vashti, her charms won the admiration of Ahasuerus, who chose her above many competitors for his queen. Through her mediation the extermination of the Jews in the Persian Empire was averted, and their bitter enemy, Haman, executed. Esther's patriotism and heroism have won for her a place beside Deborah and Judith in the gratitude of her nation.

Book of. The Book of Esther describes the elevation of Esther to the Persian throne, the overthrow of Haman's scheme for the destruction of the Jews, and Haman's own ignominious death. The scene is laid in Susa, at the court of Ahasuerus (Xerxes). The book opens with the description of a great feast for the princess of the empire (488 B.C.), the deposition of Queen Vashti for refusal to comply with the king's request (i. 12), and the elevation of Esther to the throne. The narrative then dwells upon the power of the prime minister Haman, his wounded pride at the refusal of Mordecai to bend before him, and his such writers as Graetz and Ginsburg. This theory has been ably treated and refuted by Lightfoot. Suffice it to say that Essenism, notwithstanding all its favorable effect upon individuals, had no influence upon the Jewish people in particular, or upon the world in general. "Essenism," as Keim says, "was, in fact, only an admission of helplessness against the actual state of things, renouncing the attempt to restore all Israel, to which it was opposed as heterodox and impure. . . . In short, the salvation of individuals in the general shipwreck is frankly the watchword of the party. We hear nothing from the cornerstone, the throne of God, nor for the Messiah, since these were enclosed within their own limits. . . . We may learn from its weakness, that the healing power which arose upon the nation, and, indeed, upon the world, with fresh creative fruitfulness, cannot be counted among the impulses and forces of Essenism."

Litur. — The literature on the Essenes is very rich. Besides what has been enumerated by Schürer (Lehrbuch der Neuestamentlichen Zeitgeschichte, Leipzig, 1874, pp. 589 sq.), see Keim: The History of Jesus of Nazara, Lond., 1873, vol. I, pp. 338 sq.; Clemens: De Essenorum Moribus et Institutionibus, Königsberg, n.d.; the same: Das 5. Evangelium, oder d. Ueavegelium d. Esser, Berl., 1879; P. E. Lucius: Der Essenismus, Strassb., 1881; Sieffert: Christus und die Esser, in Beweis des Glaubens (November, 1873); Demmler: Essenes und Essener (Geschichte und Lieder aus Württemberg, 1880, I., II. pp. 122-149; Ginsburg: The Essenes, their History and Doctrines, London, 1864 (reproduced in Alexander's edition of KittO's Cyclop.). A general survey of the English literature has been given by B. Pick, in Zeitschrift für die gesammte luth. Theologie und Kirche, ed. by Guericke and Delitzsch (Leipzig, 1878, pp. 397 sq.); but the most thorough and important treatise on this subject is by Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians and to Philemon, London, 1875, pp. 82-179. G. Uhhorn (Greatly enlarged, and with literature added by B. Pick).
ESTHER.

763

Ca (Clement of Alexandria), Ezra (Augustine), and Joia k, the high priest. These names are nothing more than conjectures. But the references to Ahasuerus and Mordecai (comp. i. 1 sqq. x. 1 sqq.) make it necessary that the work should have been written after their death. As to the time of composition, we can only speak with probability. Eichhorn, Keil, and others put it in the reign of Artaxerxes I. (464-425 B.C.); but the earliest reference is in the book of Esther, xii. 6 (183 B.C.). [Rawlinson fixes upon 444-443 B.C. as the date. That the author wrote in Persia is made very probable by the accuracy of the references to Persian customs, and the absence of all allusion to Palestine.]

The authenticity has been questioned, but without good reason. The allusions to Persian manners are minute and accurate. The luxurious habits and capricious temper of Xerxes are in exact accord with the portraiture of secular history. The great assembly of his princes, recorded in chap. i., agrees with the statement of Herodotus, that the king began to make preparations for his Grecian campaign in the third year of his reign. That Herodotus does not mention Esther (for Amestris cannot be identified with her) offers no difficulty when we remember that Persian monarchs did not limit themselves to one wife. But an irrefutable argument for the truth of the narrator is the Feast of Purim, which commemorates the facts, and is inexplicable on any other hypothesis than that they occurred.

The religious character of the work has from the earliest times been the subject of unfavorable criticism. It makes not a single mention of God by name, and yet mentions the Persian monarch a hundred and eighty-seven times. Luther speaks of its marked Judaistic features, and its heathen frivolity, and thought it unworthy of a place in the canon. Others have spoken of the spirit of national revenge and pride which pervades it (De Wette). But, in spite of these criticisms, the book is not irreligious in tone. And, if the religious allusions are few, this is due to the fear of profaning the sacred in a book which was to be read at joyous feasts. The canonicity of Esther was at one time questioned in the Jewish Church, as we infer from the conduct of the eighty-five elders in opposing the observance of the Feast of Purim. In the early Greek Church it was placed by some (e.g., Athanasius) amongst the Apocrypha; but the Latin Church always held it to be canonical.

In the Septuagint Esther appears with apocryphal additions, which were no doubt made by some Hellenistic Jew. They bear on their face the marks of being spurious, inaccurate as their references to Persian customs are, and designed as their frequent mention of the name of God is, to give to the original work a specifically religious character.

ETHELBERHT, or ÆTHELBERTH, d. Feb. 24, 616; king of Kent 560-616, and, since 593, bretwalds among the Anglo-Saxon kings; married Bertha, a daughter of Charibert, king of Paris, and allowed her to practise her own Christian religion at the old Roman-British Church of St. Martin, in Canterbury, under the guardianship of her bishop, Liudhard, but seems to have taken no further interest in the peculiar faith of his wife. When Augustine, however, landed at the Isle of Thanet in 597, he was well received by Ethelbert, who was converted and baptized in the very same year; and it seems that Ethelbert henceforward used all his influence as king and bretwald as promotion for Christianity. He removed the royal residence to Reculver (Regulbium), and left Canterbury to Augustine; he aided in the rebuilding of the old Roman church, and himself built a large monastery (St. Augustine) outside the walls of Canterbury; and, among the ninety dooms and decrees of his which are extant (Thorpe: Ancient Laws and Institutes of England), one makes provision for the security of the property of the church and the ecclesiastical officials. He issued (600) the earliest code of Anglo-Saxon laws now extant. He founded the see of Canterbury (602) and that of Rochester (604).

ETheldreda, St., a daughter of the East Anglian king, Anna, made a vow that she would remain a virgin, and kept her word, though she was twice married, first to Tondert, an East Anglian prince, who died shortly after the marriage, and then to Egrif, King of Northumbria, from whom she was divorced. After the divorce she retired to the Isle of Ely, where she led a life of severe asceticism, and died from the plague, June 23, 679. See Butler: Lives of Saints, June 23.

ETHERIDGE, John Wesley, a Methodist Orientalist; b. at Grangewood, near Newport, Isle of Wight, Feb. 24, 1804; d. at Camborne, May 24, 1866. Although not a university man, he made himself master of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, French, and German. He was nearly all his life a circuit preacher, yet found time to prepare valuable books showing biblical and linguistic research.
ETHICS.

ETHICS, from the Greek ἠθική, which, besides the objective element (customs, habits, the Latin mores, whence disciplina moralis), also includes a subjective element, a conscious feeling at home in the customs, an approval by conscience of the habits, which transforms the merely mechanical routine into responsible action, and elevates the merely instinctive disposition to character. Ethics is the science of conduct; Christian ethics, the scientific representation of the truths of Christianity in their practical application to individual life as duties and ideals. (Philosophical ethics, see Moral Philosophy.) In the science of divinity considered as an organic whole ethics occupies a position of its own as one part of systematic theology. From exegesis and church history it is distinguished by its very object; for it is neither a demonstration of what, according to the authentic documents of the divine revelation, is true Christianity, nor a record of what, in the course of history, has vindicated itself as such, but an exposition, with respect to a peculiar sphere,—the sphere of conduct,—of Christianity as the highest truth. Less distinct is its relation to dogmatics, which forms the other part of systematical theology. At one time it was treated as a mere appendix to dogmatics; at another it was fairly in the way to entirely supersede it. In general, however, the relation between dogmatics and ethics may be defined as that between the theoretical and practical aspects of the same thing; not that ethics has no theoretical interest, and dogmatics no practical bearing: on the contrary, the connection between them is a deep, reciprocal interdependence.

Rich materials for a Christian ethics are found in the writings of the apostolical fathers, Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, Polycarp, Barnabas, Hermas. They refer mostly to individual life, often also to married life and the family, and sometimes to the life of the church. Still more deeply Tertullian penetrated into the subject in his numerous ethical writings, De spectaculis, De velandia virginibus, De monogamia, De panisentia, etc.,—everywhere expanding his peculiar conception of Christianity as a spiritual power which shall keep aloof from the Pagan world, organize its children into a compact army, attack Paganism in closed ranks, conquer it, judge it. Starting from quite a different conception of Christianity, and not at all afraid of any element of philosophy, Clemens Alexandrinus develops a number of striking ethical ideas in his Pedagogus, Stromata, Exhortation to the Pagans, etc. To him Christianity is a spiritual power, which certainly raises the soul far above any epicurean eudaemonism, or stoical apathy, or merely negative asceticism, but whose proper task it is to get itself naturalized in the world, to penetrate every fibre, to regenerate it. With Cyprian (De ecclesiæ uniate, De observatione discipline, etc.) the church comes into prominence in the sphere of ethics, not simply as governing Christian life, legislating for it, influencing it in many various ways, but as the very centre of the whole field of ethics: to every Christian individual his relation to the church now becomes the principal ethical relation of his life. The full realization of this idea was the result of a long development; but in this development Cyprian occupies a central position. His views were the natural outcome of the Montanist and the Novatian movements; and they reached their perfection by Augustine's victory over the Donatists. While the Montanists accepted the sudden outbursts of individual enthusiasm as the true medium through which the Holy Spirit communicates with the congregation, and consequently demanded absolute obedience to the dictates of this ecstatic prophecy as a condition of communion between the spirit and the individual, the Novatians found the true vehicle of spiritual communion in the church itself considered as a totality, as an organization of the universal priesthood under presbyteral forms; and they were consequently very rigorous with respect to admission to membership. Cyprian opposed both parties, and did so in favor of the hierarchical development of the idea of the church. Though he asserted the possibility of a second history, he disavowed the legality of a church of saints, he agreed with the Novatians in the holiness of the church as a totality; but this totality he found represented by the episcopacy, which, in its nature and essence, is one and undivided, though in reality it is distributed over a plurality of individuals. With this idea of the episcopacy as the true expression of the unity of the church, he turned upon the Montanists, and opposed to their abrupt, sporadic, and incidental ecstasies the sacrament of ordination as the true medium of communion between the spirit and the church. He did not go the full length, however, of his own argument. He never dared assert the infallibility and personal holiness followed as necessary effects of the sacrament. He demanded blind obedience to the bishop, but he granted that the congregation might expel an unholy and unworthy bishop. He stopped in a self-contradiction. The Council of Nicaea led the way to the wuatio, Hermas, Clemens, Clement, Romanus).
Especially the Lutheran Church, in the beginning, Augustine was naturally led to object, that, in that case, the whole idea was reduced to something merely subjective, and quite impalpable. It is not necessary, he said, that the sacrament of ordination shall confer personal infallibility and personal sanctity, the more clearly its ethics assumed the aspect of a criminal code. A new, so-called higher virtue, with the character of a pre-eminently negative asceticism, and blooming forth in monasticism, virginity, poverty, etc., became the real focus of Christian life, and found in the penitential its true literary expression. Ethical studies, in the broader and sounder sense of the word, were few and far between; nor do they generally evince any marked originality. Innumerable: some of the most prominent are Ambrose, De officiis (comp. J. Daseke, Ciceronis et Ambrosii de officiis Libri III., etc., Augsburg, 1875); Gregory the Great, Magna Moralia; Martin of Bracara, Formula honeste vita; Alcuin, De virtutibus et vitiiis; Paschasiai Radbertus, De fide, spe, et caritate—that is about all produced down to the time of Thomas Aquinas. On the other hand, the so-called Libri Pontificalia (that is, collections of disciplinary precepts extracted from the apostolical constitutions, the fathers, and the canons of the councils) were innumerable: some of the most prominent are those made by Johannes Jejunator, Fulgentius Ferrandus, Cresconius, Theodorus Cilix, Bede, and Rhabanus Maurus.

The medieval mystics is also ascetic, but the asceticism is there of another and higher type. By John Scotus Erigena the Greek mysticism—represented by Makarius the Egyptian, Dionysius Areopagita, and Maximus Confessor—was introduced into the Latin world, and became the starting-point of the mysticism of the Western Church, both in its Romanic form (Hugo and Richard of St. Victor, Bernard of Clairvaux, Bonaventura, Gerson, Molino) and in its Germanic form (Suso, Ruysbroeck, Tauler, Eckart). So far as this mysticism developed an ethics, the principle of the false asceticism was retained. The contradiction between finite and infinite, matter and spirit, world and God, was left standing. To escape from the finite, to die away from the world, to crush the flesh, was still considered the only true ethical process. But to this mere negation was added a positive object,—to be absorbed by the infinite, to arrive at spiritual freedom, to live in God; and thereby the mainspring of Christian ethics was actually touched. When, nevertheless, the medieval mystics failed to produce a true ethics, the reason was that they lacked that conception of the human personality which achieves a perfect union of finite and infinite by means of the created soul’s capability to receive and to give—a conception that first obtained full scope in Luther’s doctrine of faith and justification by faith. Alongside with the mystics—who, in spite of all shortcomings, form the real sap-carrying vessels both of ethics and dogmatics during the middle ages—the scholastics went their own way. In some of the continuators, they too, of asceticism, though generally more deeply engaged in other directions. After the example of Petrus Lombardus, they used to incorporate a certain amount of ethical materials with their dogmatic & sententiae and summae. To the four theological virtues— justitia, fortitudo, moderatio, and sapientia—the three theological virtues were added,—faith, hope, and charity; thus making the sacred seven full. The internal relation, however, between these two groups of virtues always remained somewhat vague. The best treatment which the subject found among the schoolmen was that by Thomas Aquinas, in his Prima et secunda secundae, which became the model for all later Roman-Catholic ethics. But, besides these products of the theoretical interest of the scholastic philosophy, the practical wants of the confessional called forth a luxuriant ethical literature of quite another type, the so-called casuistry. (See article.)

When the Reformation took its final stand upon Scripture, it not only escaped the great errors of the middle ages, but it also succeeded in establishing the true principles of Christian ethics. By the new doctrines of faith, and justification by faith, the fundamental ethical ideas of duty, virtue, and highest good, were, so to speak, melted down and recast. A new ethics appeared, bearing the characteristic marks of the double development of the Protestant or evangelical principle,—the Lutheran Church, with its talent for plastic representation, art, hymnology, science; and the Reformed Church, with its talent for practical action, discipline, missions, statesmanship. Though neither Luther nor Calvin has written on ethics, in the proper sense of the word, both have occasionally treated of various ethical subjects, such as prayer, oath, marriage, civil authority, etc., especially in the form of expositions of the Decalogue in the Catechism. The Catechism is, indeed, the primitive form of evangelical ethics. Just as evangelical dogmatics arose from the re vera fidei and the apostolical symbolum, so evangelical ethics grew out of the Decalogue. The religious relations of ethics were treated under the first three Commandments,—more especially the doctrines of worship, prayer, and devotion, under the third,—family, education, school, state, and civil authority, under the fourth; the duties towards our neighbors, temperance, care of the body, also the question of capital punishment, under the fifth; marriage and chastity, under the sixth; property and honor, under the seventh and eighth. Even the scientific writers returned to this form; as, for instance, David Chytreaus (Virtutum descriptiones, 1555), Paul von Eifzen (Ethicae doctrinae libri IV., 1571), Lambert Danaeus (Ethices Christianae, Geneva, 1577). Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the evangelical churches, especially the Lutheran Church, in the beginning, showed a lack of fertility in the field of ethical science; and the reason seems to have been a certain awkwardness in the establishment of the true relation between philosophical and theological ethics. The new principle was obtained in the doctrines of faith, and justification by faith. Materials were plentifully at hand and in the works of the ancient philosophical ethics; but the evangelical theologians felt a certain shyness when applying the new principle to the old materials, and for some time this, the most fertile of all ethical principles, was left in a state of lonesome heaven as the highest good,—an idea which, when brought into the field of ethics in the Christian system, was left alone in the field. They lost, however, their hold on public confidence by their doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and their works,—De jure et jure (Joh. de Lugo; Bn. d. Engl., 1625), Grotius defines the highest good, and the principle of faith as the true principle of the Roman-Catholic ethics; and this idea Rothe retained, making it the object of the study of the Roman-Catholic Church, so to speak, to resolve itself into the State. Beside Rothe must be mentioned Schmid (Christliche Sittenlehre, ed. by A. Heller, Stuttgart, 1861, noticeable especially for its development of the idea of the law). Strongly polemical, both against Schleiermacher and Rothe, is Wuttke (Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre, 3d ed., Leipzig, 1874, 2 vols. [translated by Lacroix, N.Y., 1873, 2 vols.], giving in the first part of first volume an interesting survey of the history of ethics). Noticeable are also the works of A. von Oettingen (Die Moralstatistik u. die christliche Sittenlehre, Erlangen, 1872 sqq., 2 vols.; J. Chr. von Hofmann (Theologische Ethik, Nordlingen, 1878) and H. Martensen (Den christelige Ethik, Copenhagen, 1871-78, 3 vols., Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1873-82, 3 vols.); though both are of a somewhat more popular character.

The ethics of the Roman-Catholic Church continued, from the middle ages down to the eighteenth century, to run along in the two above described parallel lines,—scholasticism and mysticism. The peculiar legalism of the former is often apparent from the very title of their works,—De jure et jure (Christliche Ethik; Dominicus a Soto). Among the principal representatives of the latter are Bellarmin, St. Theresa, Francis of Sales, Molinos, Pascal, Arnault, Nicole Perrault. But, when the quietism of Molinos was condemned, the whole mystical branch of Roman-Catholic ethics withered, and the Jesuits were left alone in the field. They lost, however, all hold on public confidence by their doctrine of probability, by their attack on Port Royal, and by the merely mechanical method of their ethics. But from the philosophy the Roman-Catholic, like the evangelical moralists, received powerful and fertile impulses during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries: from the Wolffian school, ETHIOPIA.

767

EUDES.

ISAAC AUGUST DORNER.

ETHIOPIA. See Abyssinian Church.

ETHIOPIC VERSION. See Bible Versions, VII.

ETHNARCH (Gr. ἔθναρχ, "ruler of a nation") was the title of a ruler or prince, who, though not fully independent, or possessed of royal power, nevertheless governed his people according to their national laws. It was specially applicable to the Jews, after their relations with the Romans had begun, and several of their rulers bore it; as, for instance, Simon (1 Macc. xiv. 47), his son Hyrcanus (Josephus, Arch., 14, 6, 5), and Archelaus, the son and successor of Herod the Great. The term was also applied among other nations. Thus King Aretas had settled an ethnarch at Damascus (2 Cor. xi. 32).

ETSCHMIAZIN, or ECHMIEDZIN, a famous Armenian monastery, situated fifteen miles west of the city of Erivan, in Asiatic Russia. It was founded in 524, contains a valuable library, is the seat of the Catholics, or patriarch of the whole Armenian Church.

ETTWEEN, John, a Moravian bishop; b. at Frankfurt am Main, June 29, 1721; d. Jan. 2, 1802. In 1754 he emigrated to America, and labored efficiently as evangelist and bishop. In 1766 he was the 4th bishop in the Congregate Brethren in Pennsylvania to the Tuscarawas in Ohio. He enjoyed friendly intercourse with Washington, and devoted himself to the care of the sick soldiers in the general army hospital at Bethlehem, Penn. In 1784 he was appointed a bishop in the Brethren in Christ Church, and for ten years was the bishop of the House of the Oratorians at Caen, but was shortly after called to Paris by Cardinal Richelieu, for the purpose of founding an ecclesiastical seminary. This plan was foiled by the death of the cardinal; but, on the advice of several bishops, Eudes, nevertheless, left his See, and founded an independent congregation — the Eudists, or the Congregation of Jesus and Mary — for the education of priests and for missions among the clergy. The congregation, however, never attained any great

EUDES, Jean, founder of the Eudists; b. at Mezerai, in Normandy, Nov. 14, 1601; d. at Caen, Aug. 19, 1650; was educated by the Jesuits at Caen; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in Paris, 1623; was ordained priest in 1625; labored among the plague-stricken people of Normandy and as a missionary among the clergy; was in 1630 made prior of the House of the Oratorians at Caen, but was shortly after called to Paris by Cardinal Richelieu, for the purpose of founding an ecclesiastical seminary. This plan was foiled by the death of the cardinal; but, on the advice of several bishops, Eudes, nevertheless, left his See, and founded an independent congregation — the Eudists, or the Congregation of Jesus and Mary — for the education of priests and for missions among the clergy. The congregation, however, never attained any great EUCHARIUS was, together with Valerius and Maternus, sent by the apostle Peter across the Alps to preach the gospel in the Valley of the Rhine, and occupied the episcopal chair of Treves for twenty-five years. According to the criticism of the Bollandists he belongs to the second half of the third century; and the legends of his missions and miracles are mere fables.

EUCHEREAON, or EUCHELEAION, in the Greek Church, is the "prayer oil," consecrated by seven priests, and used for the unction of the sick. It is counted one of the seven sacraments of the church, and corresponds to the extreme unction of the Roman Church, but is not limited to cases of mortal illness. See EXTREME UNGATION.

EUCHERIUS, St., d. about 450; was b. at Lyons, of a distinguished family, and was a senator, and married; when, in 422, he entered the monastery of Lerinum, and became a monk. He afterwards retired to the island of Ler (St. Marguerite), where he lived as a hermit till 434, when he was elected Bishop of Lyons. He has left several works, among which are Epistola de contentu mundi et ecclesiae philosophia (edited by Rosewe, Antwerp, 1621), Epistola de laude eremi (edited by Rhenanus, Basel, 1516, and by Erasmus, Basel, 1520), Liber formularum spiritualium (ed. Paulus, Graz, 1884), etc. There are collected editions by Brassicanus (Basel, 1531), also in Bibl. Patr. Max. (Ly, Tom. VI.), and in Migne, Patril. Lat., vol. 50, containing, however, many spurious writings. See A. MELLIER: De vita et scriptis sancti Eucherii, Lyon, 1878; A. GOUILLARD: Saint Eucher, Lerins et l'église de Lyon au Ve siecle, Lyon, 1861.

EUCHITIDES. See Messalians.

EUCHOLEOOGION (Gr. Εὐχολογίον, "collection of prayers") is in the later Greek Church the common name for books on liturgy, and rituals. It occurs for the first time in the writings of Anastasius Sinaita (Quast. 141) in the sixth century, but is afterwards very frequent in the liturgical works of the Byzantines. Numerous manuscripts of books of this kind, in which the Greek Church was much richer than the Latin, are found in the libraries of Venice, Rome (Bibliotheca Barbe- rina), Paris, Venice, and among the Greek monks of Athos. A series of printed editions have appeared at Venice since 1526 (1544, 1553, 1570, etc.); but the best and most complete edition is that by Jacobus Goar, Paris, 1645.

EUDAMONISM. See Epicureanism.

EUDES, Jean, founder of the Eudists; b. at Mezerai, in Normandy, Nov. 14, 1601; d. at Caen, Aug. 19, 1650; was educated by the Jesuits at Caen; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in Paris, 1623; was ordained priest in 1625; labored among the plague-stricken people of Normandy and as a missionary among the clergy; was in 1630 made prior of the House of the Oratorians at Caen, but was shortly after called to Paris by Cardinal Richelieu, for the purpose of founding an ecclesiastical seminary. This plan was foiled by the death of the cardinal; but, on the advice of several bishops, Eudes, nevertheless, left his See, and founded an independent congregation — the Eudists, or the Congregation of Jesus and Mary — for the education of priests and for missions among the clergy. The congregation, however, never attained any great importance. During the storms of the Revolution it was dissolved. In 1829 it was re-established. It has a college in Indiana.
EUDOCIA. 768

EUHEMERUS.

EUDOCIA, Empress, wife of Theodosius II.; was b. at Athens; the daughter of a sophist; came while very young to Constantinople, where she capitivated not only Pulcheria, but also her brother, with her accomplishments; was baptized, and married to the emperor, 411 or 421. The latter part of her married life was clouded, however, by some misunderstanding between her and her husband; and she lived, separated or divorced, in Palestine. Photius mentions several works by her,—a paraphrase in verse of the Pentateuch, Joshua, etc.; a poem on the martyrdom of St. Cyprian, etc.,—and he praises them much; but they have not come down to us. She is also said to have finished the Centones Homericis of Patri-

EUDOXIA, Empress, wife of Arcadius; descended from a Frankish family; was married to the emperor, April 27, 395, and d. Nov. 6, 404. The origin of the enmity between her and Chrysostom is not clear, but she caused his banishment in 403. The horror which seized the court, in disguise to Florence. But the greatest danger to him was the Council of Basel, opened Aug. 27, 1431. It first assumed the character of an ecclesiastical aristocracy, and then changed into an episcopal aristocracy.

EUDOXIUS was made Bishop of Germanicia, on the confines of Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, in 331, Bishop of Antioch in 347, and finally Patriarch of Constantinople in 360. He died in 370. He was a full-blooded Arian, a disciple of Aetius, a friend of Eunomius, and the leader of worst of all the Arians.

EUGENIUS is the name of four popes. —Eugen-

EUHEMERUS, a Greek philosopher who flour-

EUGIPPUS, or EUGYPPIUS, a monk of Italian descent; lived for some time in the monastery of St. Severinus, near Fabianze, in Noricum; returned after the death of the saint, and carrying his remains with him, to Castrum Lucullum, near Naples, and wrote (in 511) a Vita St. Severini, often printed, best by Friedrich, at the end of the first volume of his Kirchengesch. Deutschlands. Besides this work, which is invaluable for the first period of the church history of Germany, he also compiled a Thesaurus ex D. Augustini Operibus, Basel, 1542; wrote monastic rules, etc. See Opera, ed. Knoll, Wien, 1885.

EUEHMERUS, a Greek philosopher who flour-

EUHEMERUS, the name of four popes. —Euge-

EUGIPPIUS, or EUGYPPIUS, a monk from Citeaux, and a pupil of St. Bernard of Clairvaux. Immediately after his election, the Roman people rose, and demanded that he should content himself with the spiritual authority, and renounce all secular power. He fled to Viterbo, laid interdict upon the rebellious city, and succeeded in returning in 1146. But in the mean time Arnold of Brescia had begun his stirring agitations; and Eugenius was compelled to flee a second time. Over Sera, Aid or Basile. The latter part of her married life was clouded, however, by some misunderstanding between her and her husband; and she lived, separated or divorced, in Palestine. Photius mentions several works by her,—a paraphrase in verse of the Pentateuch, Joshua, etc.; a poem on the martyrdom of St. Cyprian, etc.,—and he praises them much; but they have not come down to us. She is also said to have finished the Centones Homericis of Patri-

EUDOXIUS was made Bishop of Germanicia, on the confines of Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, in 331, Bishop of Antioch in 347, and finally Patriarch of Constantinople in 360. He died in 370. He was a full-blooded Arian, a disciple of Aetius, a friend of Eunomius, and the leader of worst of all the Arians.

EUGIPPUS, or EUGYPPIUS, a monk of Italian descent; lived for some time in the monastery of St. Severinus, near Fabianze, in Noricum; returned after the death of the saint, and carrying his remains with him, to Castrum Lucullum, near Naples, and wrote (in 511) a Vita St. Severini, often printed, best by Friedrich, at the end of the first volume of his Kirchengesch. Deutschlands. Besides this work, which is invaluable for the first period of the church history of Germany, he also compiled a Thesaurus ex D. Augustini Operibus, Basel, 1542; wrote monastic rules, etc. See Opera, ed. Knoll, Wien, 1885.

EUEHMERUS, a Greek philosopher who flour-

EUHEMERUS, the name of four popes. —Euge-

EUGIPPUS, or EUGYPPIUS, a monk from Citeaux, and a pupil of St. Bernard of Clairvaux. Imme-fathers. Of the works of Euhemerus, nothing has come down to us but a fragment of a Latin translation by Ennius.

EULALIUS was put up as antipope against Boniface I. (in 418) after the death of Zosimus, by a minority of the clergy of Rome, and the city prefect, Symmachus. The emperor convened a council to decide the question, and ordered the two contenders meanwhile to leave the city. Boniface obeyed; but Eulalius did not, and was consequently banished from the city by the emperor. He was afterwards made Bishop of Nepe, and kept quiet during the reign of Boniface I. After the death of the latter the friends of Eulalius wished him to step forward and try to enforce his claims; but he declined.

EULOGIA (εὐλογία), properly fine, sonorous speech, then praise, benediction, consecration. Thus the formulas with which the liturgical materials were consecrated, or the benediction of the congregation spoken by the bishops and presbyters, were called "eulogia." From many passages in the works of Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, etc., it appears, that up to the fifth century, eulogia was used synonymously with eucharistia, probably referring to Paul's words (1 Cor. x. 16); but after that time it was confined to the consecrated bread which the participants of the Lord's Supper brought home with them to sick persons or absent friends.

EULOGIUS OF CORDOVA was elected Archbishop of Toledo in 858, but by the Moors prevented from entering upon the duties of his office. He was a zealous champion of Christianity in its contest with Mohammedanism, and was beheaded March 11, 859, because he had been instrumental in the conversion of a young Moorish girl. His writings, among which his Memoriale Sanctorum sive Libri III. de Martyribus Cordubensibus occupies the chief place, were first printed by Peter Pontius Leo at Complutum, 1574. They are found, together with the commentaries of Ambrosius de Morales, in Andreas Schott's Hispamia Illustrata, IV., and, together with his life by his friend Alvarus of Cordova, in Migne, Pat. Lat., CXV. See BAUDISSIUS: Eulogiasuan Alvarus, Leipz., 1872. KLUPFEL.

EULOGIUS OF CORDOVA was elected Archbishop of Toledo in 858, but by the Moors prevented from entering upon the duties of his office. He was a zealous champion of Christianity in its contest with Mohammedanism, and was beheaded March 11, 859, because he had been instrumental in the conversion of a young Moorish girl. His writings, among which his Memoriale Sanctorum sive Libri III. de Martyribus Cordubensibus occupies the chief place, were first printed by Peter Pontius Leo at Complutum, 1574. They are found, together with the commentaries of Ambrosius de Morales, in Andreas Schott's Hispamia Illustrata, IV., and, together with his life by his friend Alvarus of Cordova, in Migne, Pat. Lat., CXV. See BAUDISSIUS: Eulogiasuan Alvarus, Leipz., 1872. KLUPFEL.

EUNOMIUS and the EUNOMIANS. Eunomius, bishop of Nicaea, and kept quiet during the reign of Boniface I. After the death of the latter the friends of Eulalius wished him to step forward and try to enforce his claims; but he declined.

EUNOMIUS (έυνομίς) was a zealous champion of Arian views; but hypocrisy with Constantius; and in 359 he was made Patriarch of Constantinople. Aetius could not or would not re-instate; but Eunomius was recalled, and made Bishop of Cyzicus, 360. He remained there four years. In the beginning he refrained, at the instance of Eudoxius, from openly proclaiming his extreme Arian views; but hypocrisy was not his vice, and the contempt he felt for people who were not of his opinion soon made him forget all prudence. The inhabitants of Cyzicus repeatedly and bitterly complained of him and his heresies; and finally Eudoxius was compelled, by a direct order from the emperor, to summon him to Constantinople, and institute an investigation, the result of which was that he was deposed and banished. He then placed himself at the head of the Anomoeans (who from this time generally bore the name of the Eunomians), and wrote and spoke in their interest; but he never again held an official position in the church. He moved about from place to place, always in banishment.

In his treatment of the great question of his day,—the divinity of Christ,—he started from the conception of an absolute likeness in substance between the Father and the Son, and was thereby led to represent the Son as a creature among other creatures, as a mere man. These views produced such an indignation, that successive imperial edicts ordered his books to be burnt. Of his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans and of his Letters (more than forty, according to Photius), nothing has come down to us. The Confession (Εύνομος ο ἁρχηγός), which he presented to Theodosius in 383, but which was not accepted, was first printed by Valerius, in his Notes to Socrates, then by Baluze, in his Concill. Nov. Collect., I. 80. Of his two Apologies the first was written directly against the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, the second as a defence against the attacks of Basil. From several manuscripts of the latter's work (Adversus Eunomium) it has been possible to restore the whole first Apologia of Eunomius. The attempt was first made by CAYE (Hist. Lit., I. 220), and then more completely by FABRICIUS (Bibl. Graeca, V. 23). There is also an English translation of the book by WHISTON, Eunomianismus Redivivus, Lond., 1711. About the second Apology, Philostorgius, an admirer of Eunomius, tells us that Basil died of despair after reading it; while Photius, an adversary, states that Eunomius dared not publish it until after the death of Basil. The writings of Eunomius were, indeed, as much extolled by his adherents as they were disparaged by his enemies. After his death, his partisans carried him into the church, and branched off in a number of minor divisions named after various leaders, such as Eutyches, Theophronius, etc., until it was dissolved by internal dissensions. See KROE: Gesch. u. Lehre d. Eunomius, Kiel, 1839. GASS.

EUNUCH (lit. bed-keeper, chamberlain). This class of persons is a natural consequence of polygamy, and is numerous to-day throughout the East. Frequent mention is made of them upon Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, and they were common in the degenerate days of Greece and Rome. The men who sing soprano in the Sistine Chapel at Rome are eunuchs. Eunuchs always display the same character: they are cowardly, jealous, intriguing, licentious, and shameless. They incline to melancholy, and frequently commit suicide. Yet they rose to the highest eminence, and were intrusted with the life of the sovereign.

According to Deut. xxiii. 1, eunuchs could not enter into the congregation of the Lord. In the Christian Church eunuchs could not be ordained.
EUSEBIUS.

History records a few instances of self-mutilation (of which the most famous is Origen) out of a fanatical or ascetic obedience to our Lord’s words (Matt. xix. 12): “There are eunuchs who made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven’s sake.” If, however, a man was a born eunuch, or was made one by his persecutors, the prohibition against ordination did not apply to him. Abaelard was mutilated, but, notwithstanding, rose to be an abbot. In “the Murad Sn or Eastern Euphrates,” already referred to, the word “eunuch” is used in three senses: (1) Of those who were born so, (2) Of those who were made so, (3) Of those who abstain from marriage in order that they may give their attention more exclusively to the interests of the kingdom of heaven.

EUPHRATES. (Hebrew עפרת; LXX. Εὐφρατῆς; Assyr. Purādu, Purūtū, “the river”) occurs (Gen. ii. 14, xv. 18; Deut. i. 7, xi. 24; Josh. i. 4; 2 Sam. viii. 3; 2 Kings xxiii. 29, xxiv. 7; 1 Chron. v. 9, xviii. 3; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20; Jer. xiii. 4, 5, 8, 7, xlii. 4, 6, 10, lii. 63) as the name of the well-known river, called also “the great river” (יֶלֶם, Gen. xiv. 18; Deut. i. 7, etc.), “the river” (יוֹרֵמ, Gen. xxxii. 21; Exod. xxxii. 31; A.V. “flood,” Josh. xiv. 15), and even “river” (יוֹרֵם, Isa. vii. 20; Jer. ii. 18; Mic. vii. 12).

It takes its rise in the mountains of Armenia, its volume being due to the union of two streams, — the Murād Su or Eastern Euphrates, and the Frat or Northern Euphrates, — which unite about lat. 39° and long. 39°. The sources of the Euphrates are expressly mentioned by Salmonasar II. (B.C. 890–852), who relates how he marched from the sources of the Tigris to those of the Euphrates (probably meaning the sources of the Murād Su, north-east of Lake Van; the Frat begins near Erzroum), and there sacrificed to the gods, dipped “the weapons of Assur” in the water, and set up his royal likeness.

The river breaks through the Taurus range toward the west, then turns southward in a winding course, making a second great bend toward the south-east, in about lat. 36°, and following this general direction till it joins the Tigris in Lower Babylon, and empties into the Šatt el-Abāb into the Persian Gulf. Its total length is from sixteen hundred to eighteen hundred miles, and it is navigable for small craft twelve hundred miles from its mouth. After the junction of the two branches, it has few tributaries. The only considerable ones are the Sajur (Assyr. Sangura, or Sagura), entering from the west in lat. 30° 49’; the Belik (Assyr. Bollu), entering from the north (below the great south-easterly bend), in long. 38° 9’; and the Khābr (Assyr. Ḫabbār), entering from the north-east in lat. 35° 7’, long. 40° 30’. From the Khābr to the sea, a distance of eight hundred miles, there is no tributary, but, on the other hand, a tendency toward the mouth to divide into smaller streams. The melting of the mountain snows causes a yearly flood, beginning in March, and increasing gradually till May; when, after some weeks, the waters sink by degrees, until, in September or October, the river is at its lowest. This great physical change is evidenced in classic writers (e.g., Herodotus, i. 193; Xen., Anab. ii. 3, §§ 14–16; Strabo, xvii. 1, §§ 14), which, by proper engineering, might be restored.

The union of the Euphrates and Tigris in the Šatt el-Abāb is of comparatively modern date. The encroachment of the land on the water of the Persian Gulf is said by Lord Loftus (Chaldée and Susiana, p. 262) to have been going on at the rate of a mile in seventy years since the beginning of the Christian era. It is believed that the rate was once larger, so that in the earliest historic times the sea may have extended a hundred and fifty or two hundred miles farther to the north-west than at present. This great physical change is confirmed by the statement of Pliny (Nat. Hist. VI. § 31) and by the cuneiform inscriptions. These (Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia, III. 12 s.) represent Sennacherib (B.C. 705–681) as sailing down the Euphrates to its mouth, and then, after solemn sacrifices, as before a powerful voyage, embarking his army in Phenician ships, and crossing the sea to the mouth of the Eueles, the River of Elam : this is now the Karun, and enters into one of the arms of the Šatt el-Abāb. An inscription of Sargon (Cun. Inscr. West. Asia, III. 11, 28–25) speaks also of the city Dilman, situated “three hundred and twenty miles, which may be an exaggeration) in the sea. The island or peninsula where this city stood now has become a part of the mainland.

EUSEBIUS, a Greek by birth, the son of a physician, succeeded Marcellus as Bishop of Rome in 310. There raged at that moment a bitter controversy in Rome concerning the treatment of the lapsi. Eusebius insisted on penance, but caused thereby great tumults, which caused Maxentius to banish the leaders of both parties. Eusebius died in Sicily, after a reign of four, or, according to other authorities, of seven months. He is honored in the Roman calendar as a saint. Sept. 26 is his day.
EUSEBIUS OF ALEXANDRIA is the author of a number of homilies (twenty-one) which enjoyed great reputation in the Eastern Church during the sixth and seventh centuries. Nothing is known with certainty of his life. In the manuscripts of his works he is described as a monk and high dignitary of the church,—bishop, archbishop, patriarch, papa: in an old biography of him, printed by Cardinal Mai, in Spicileg. Rom., IX. p. 703, he is designated as Bishop of Alexandria after Cyril. But we have the list of Alexandrian bishops; and there is nowhere room for an Eusebius, least of all immediately after Cyril. Some of the homilies, which, however, are of no great interest, are found in Gallandi, Bibl. Patrum, VIII. p. 252. See Thilo, Uber d. Schriften d. E. v. A., Halle, 1832.

EUSEBIUS, surnamed Bruno, Bishop of Angers from 1047 to his death (1081), was, at least for some time, an adherent and defender of Berengarius of Tours. In a letter dating from 1049 he bitterly complains of the manner in which the Pope of Rome, Benedict IX., reckoned him one of his patrons (Cen. Scr., ed. Vischer, p. 52): so did others. Bishop Theotwin of Liége expressly charges him with having renewed the old heresy concerning the Lord's Supper, that it contained only a semblance or shadow of Christ's body (Gallandi, Bibl. Patrum, XIV. p. 244). Nevertheless, after the death of Count Gaufried of Anjou (1060), the valiant champion of the cause of Berengarius, he seems to have lost his courage. At the conference of Angers (1062) he assumed a very cool attitude towards Berengarius; and in the same mood is the famous letter written (somewhere between 1063 and 1066), in which he declines to act as arbiter in a dispute between Berengarius and Gaufried Martini.LESSING has called this letter one of the most excellent theological productions of the eleventh century; but this is simply a mistake. The letter is nothing but a cunningly devised cover for a cowardly retreat. The letters of Eusebius are found in an authentic text in Mai's Script. Vet. Nov. Coll., VIII. p. 499. The texts given by Du Roye and Du Bouley are mutilated. Two new letters were given by SUDENDORF, Bereng. Turonensis, 1850.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Cesarea (surnamed Pamphili, "the friend of Pamphili"), was b. in the latter part of the third century, between 260 and 270, probably in Palestine; d. at Cesarea, 340. One of his earliest teachers was Bishop Melitius of Pontus, who, during the persecution of Diocletian, sought refuge in Palestine. Afterwards he studied at Antioch, under the presbyter Dorotheus. But the two great decisive influences in his education were the writings of Origen, and the intimate intercourse, at Cesarea, with Pamphili, under whose guidance he made his first steps in the study of the Holy Scriptures. When he was compelled to leave Cesarea on account of the persecution, during which Pamphili suffered martyrdom. He fled to Tyre, and thence to Egypt. After his return he was made Bishop of Cesarea (318). The principal problem which presented itself for solution during his episcopate was the Arian controversy, opened in 318. His own stand-point was one intermediate between Arians and Athanasius, based on Origen; but he had neither dialectical power to justify, nor force of character to maintain it. At the Council of Nicaea (325) he tried to effect a reconciliation between the two contending parties, but failed. After fighting against the idea of "homoousion" to the last, he finally yielded, and signed the orthodox confession. But he retained in his heart a feeling of rancor against Athanasius, and he was ever afterwards one of the leaders of the Arians. He presided at the synod of Tyre (335), convened for the purpose of deposing Athanasius. But the attempt at reconciliation he made at Nicaea procured him the friendship of the emperor. He enjoyed the confidence of Constantine in a particular degree; though it may be, that, in many cases, this confidence was addressed to the author, rather than to the person. In his relation to Constantine, however, he showed the same weakness of character as in his relation to Athanasius. As he was unable to see the truth when it concerned Athanasius, he was unable to speak the truth when it concerned Constantine.

It is as an author, however, rather than as a bishop, that Eusebius attained his great fame. His writings are historical, apologetic, theological, and exegetical. The most important of them are those on history; and his Elenchos, in ten books, giving the history of the Christian Church from its origin to 324, has naturally procured for him the title of "Father of Church History." Not because he was a master of the historiographer's art,—for he has neither method with respect to the whole, nor criticism with respect to details; neither style nor absolute veracity,—but because he was the first in the field; because he was possessed of materials which would soon have been lost if he had not utilized them; and because he availed himself of these advantages with indefatigable industry and energy. As a repertory of facts and documents, his work is invaluable. The principal editions are by Valesius (Du Vallois), with Latin translation, Paris, 1659, re-edited by Reading, Canterbury, 1720; by Heinichen, Leipzig, 1827, 2d ed., 1828, 3 vols.; Burton, Oxford, 1838; Schwester (pocket edition), Tubingen, 1852; Dindorf, Leipzig, 1871. [Into English the book has been translated by Hamner, 1864, and, better, by C. F. Cruson, N.Y., 1865.] Special investigations into the trustworthiness of the book have been made by Muller, Copenhagen, 1813; Danz, Jena, 1815; Keßler, Gottingen, 1816; Reuterdahl, Lund, 1820; Rienstra, Treves, 1833. Before he wrote his Ecclesiastical History, and as a preparation for it, Eusebius compiled his Chronicle, of which the first part gives an outline of the history of the world to 325, and the second an extract of this outline, arranged in tabular form. Of the original Greek text, only fragments have come down to us. Of the second part, Jerome gave a free translation into Latin. Collections of all fragments (Greek, Latin, and Armenian) of the Chronicle have been made by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll., 1833, VIII.), and Stein, Berlin, 1853. Among the other historical works of Eusebius are: a Life of Constantine, written after 337, edited by Heinichen, Leipzig, 1830, 2d ed., 1859.
a somewhat fulsome panegyric of Constantine, written on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of his reign, by a book on the Martyrs of Palestine, during the persecution of Diocletian; a letter on pictures of Christ, to the sister of Constantine, etc.

Next in importance to his historical writings are his apologetic works, especially the two most elaborate ones—The Preparation [for the demonstration] of the Gospel (προσερμόσεως ενεργείας) and the Demonstration of the Gospel (ἀποφθέγματος). The former (edited by Vigerus, Paris, 1888, and Heinich, Leipzig, 1842) shows the insufficiency and inner unreasonableness of Paganism; the latter (edited Paris, 1828, Cologne, 1888, and by Gaisford, Oxford, 1832) proves the truth of Christianity from its internal character and its external effects. The gist of both these works was compressed into the Theopham'α; but that book exists now only in a Syrian translation, first discovered in a Nitrian monastery by Tattam, edited by Lee, London, 1839, and translated into English in 1843. His Prophetical Extracts (προφητικοὶ ἐκλογαὶ) was edited by Gaisford, Oxford, 1842. Of his Defence of Origen, written in company with Pamphilus, only the first book is extant, and that only in an unreliable translation by Rufinus.

Of much less consequence are Eusebius' dogmatical and exegetical writings. The former comprise two works against Marcellus, generally printed as an appendix to the ἀποφθέγματος, independently edited by Gaisford, Oxford, 1852. The latter contain commentaries on the Psalms, Isaiah, Daniel, the Song of Songs, the Epistle to the Hebrews, etc.; but they are extant only in fragments. A work of special interest is his Onomasticon, of which the first part contains a topography of Palestine, and specially of Jerusalem; the second, an alphabetically arranged list of names of biblical places, with descriptions. The work was edited (Greek and Latin, the Latin text being a free translation by Jerome of the second part) by Bonfrère, Paris, 1831; Clericuza, Amsterdam, 1707; Larsoy and Parthey, Berlin, 1862; Lagarde, Göttingen, 1870. A collected edition of all the works of Eusebius is found in Migne, Patrol. Græco, XIX.—XXIV.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Dorylæum, lived as a rhetorician in Constantinople, and held some minor government office (aeres in rebus), when one day, in 430, he arose in full church, and interrupted Nestorius in the midst of his sermon, with a protest against his views as heretical; and shortly after he posted in the principal church of Constantinople an elaborate denunciation of the Nestorian heresy. Having compared them to the thievish character of Paul of Samosata; as he thus opened the Nestorian controversy, he also opened the Eutychian by his complaint of Eutyches at the synod of Constantinople (449). He had in the mean time been appointed Bishop of Doryleum in Phrygia; and by his persistency he succeeded in getting Eutyches deposed, and the synod of Ephesus, however (449), he was himself deposed, and fled to Rome; but by the Council of Chalcedon (451) he was re-instated, and died in his see. Some minor polemical writings of his—Libellus adv. Eutychem, Libellus adv. Dioscurum, etc.—have come down to us, and are found in Labbe, Conc. Coll., IV.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Emesa, d. about 360; was b. of a distinguished family in Edessa, Mesopotamia; studied under Eusebius of Cæsarea, and Patrophilus of Scythopolis, also in Antioch after 330 (with the method and spirit of whose school he became thoroughly acquainted); and finally in Alexandria. His fame as an exegete and preacher was so great, that in 341 the synod of Antioch designated him as a fit successor to the deposed Athanasius; but he knew too well how ardently the Alexandrian congregation adhered to his bishop, and he declined. He was then appointed Bishop of Emesa, in Phoenicia; but there, too, he encountered great opposition. The inhabitants feared his astronomical knowledge, and rose against him as a magician. He fled to Laodicea, and settled afterwards in Antioch, where he spent the rest of his life. Of his numerous writings (Jerome mentions polemical works against the Jews, Pagans, and Novatians, ten books of commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, and homilies on the Gospels; Theodoret mentions polemics against the Marcionites and Manicheans; Ebed Jesus, a work on the Old Testament, etc.), nothing but fragments have come down to us. The homilies edited by Gagnée, (1547) and by Fromy (1575) are spurious; but the first two homilies against Marcellus, ascribed to Eusebius of Cæsarea, and found among his works (Opuscula 14, ed. Sirmondi, 1646), belong probably to Eusebius of Emesa. His Life, written by Bishop George of Laodicea, is also lost. See Augusti: Eus. Emes. Opuscula, Elberfeld, 1829; Thilo: Eus. of Alex. and Eus. von Emes., Halle, 1832.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Laodicea, in Syria, d. 269; was b. in Alexandria, and gave, while deacon, of the church in his native city, the most striking proofs of Christian love, and fearless constancy of faith, both during the persecution of Valerian (257) and during the plague (263). As the representative of the Alexandrian bishop, he was present at the synod of Antioch, which condemned Paul of Samosata; and the impression he made was so favorable, that he shortly after was elected Bishop of Laodicea. See Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., 7, 11, 21, 23, 32.

EUSEBIUS OF NICOMEDIA was first Bishop of Nicomedia, in Phoinicia, then of Nicomedia, where the imperial court resided, and finally of Constantinople, where he died 342. Distantly related to the imperial house, he not only owed his removal from an insignificant to the most splendid episcopal see to his influence at court, but the great power he wielded in the church was also derived from that source. With the exception of a short period of eclipse, he enjoyed the complete confidence both of Constantine and Constantius; and it was he who baptized the dying emperor, May, 337. Like Arius, he was a pupil of Lucian of Antioch, and it is probable that he held the same views as Arius from the very beginning. He afterwards modified his ideas somewhat, or perhaps he only yielded to the pressure of circumstances; but he was, if not the teacher, at all events the leader and organizer, of the Arian party. At the Council of Nicaea (325) he signed the Confession, but only after a long and desperate opposition. His defence of Arius excited the wrath of the emperor, and a few months after the council he was sent into exile. After the lapse of three years, he succeeded in regaining the imperial favor; and after his return (in 329) he brought the whole machinery of the state government into action in order to impose his views upon the church. In 331 a synod of Antioch condemned and deposed Eustathius, one of the pillars of the orthodox party. In 336 Athanasius was banished to Treves, and in 337 Arius was invited to Constantinople to be solemnly received again into the ranks of the Catholic Church. The Arian party was victorious, and ready to take possession of the church; and the victory was due chiefly to Eusebius. See, for further information, literature, etc., the article on Arianism.
EUSEBIUS. 778  EUSTOCHIUM.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Samosota, on the Euphrates, since 361, d. about 379; was one of the chief pillars of the orthodox church during its contest with Arianism in the latter part of the fourth century. During the reign of Valens he travelled through the dioceses of Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine, in the disguise of a soldier, exhorting the faithful, and consecrating orthodox priests; and the election of Basil to the see of Cesarea, in Cappadocia, was chiefly due to his exertions (370). In 373 he was banished to Thrace, and lived in exile to the death of Valens, 378. Shortly after his return, while engaged in the re-organization of the Syrian Church, he was killed at Dolica (a small town in the district of Comagene) by a stone thrown at him by an Arian woman. See, besides Theodoret (Hist. Eccl., 2, 28; 4, 12, etc.), the Letters of Basil (Ep. 5–9, 253–265; Opp., ed. Paris, 1638, III.) and Gregory Nazianzen (Ep. 28—30, 204; Opp., ed. Paris, 1638, III.) SEMISCH.

EUSTOCHIUM, a daughter of Paula; was b. in

EUSTATHIUS, Bishop of Thessalonica, flourished about 600; wrote ten books against the Aphthartodocetae (a branch of the Monophysites), which have been lost, but of which Photius gives the list of contents (Bibl. Cod., 162); and was by Gregory the Great encouraged to employ still more vigorous measures against heretics (Ep. 10, 42; 11, 74).

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Vercelli, in Piedmont, d. about 371; was b. in the island of Sardinia, and educated in Rome by Pope Eusebius. Elected Bishop of Vercelli by an unanimous vote of the people and the clergy, he became one of the principal champions of the orthodox church in its contest with Arianism during the reign of Constantius. The synod of Milan was convened in 355. The orthodox party hoped to procure a vindication and restitution of Athanasius. The Arians tried to get the condemnation of Arians reversed, and, convinced that Emperor Julian was employed force, and the Arians gained the ascendancy; but Eusebius did not yield. He was banished, first to Scythopolis, afterwards to Cappadocia, and finally to the Thebaid; and in the latter places he was kept in close confinement. After the death of Constantius he regained his liberty; but the contest with Arianism still continued, and he was finally stoned to death, according to the legend, by his adversaries. His Letters are found in Gallandi, Bibl. Partr., V. p. 78, etc. For his life, see Jerome, Vies Illustrès. c. xvi. Migne's ed., T. 23, pp. 987; Act. Sanct., Aug., T. I. p. 840; and Ughelli, in Italia Sacra, IV. p. 747.

EUSTATHIUS, or, as the Greeks call him, EUSTATHIUS, is one of the most celebrated saints of the Roman-Catholic Church, though his life lies wholly in the field of romance. According to his acts, written in Greek, and dating from the eighth century, he was an officer of some repute in the army of Trajan. His name was Placidus. By a miraculous apparition of Christ he was converted; and, after many wonderful vicissitudes, he was roasted to death in Rome, together with his whole family. The remains were afterwards sent to France, and rest now in the Church of St. Eustache in Paris. In the Roman-Catholic Church he has been celebrated since the sixth century as a saint and martyr. His day is Sept. 20. His acts, Greek and Latin, were edited by Cambefils, Illustrum Christi Martyrum Lecit Triumphi, Paris, 1690.

EUSTATHIUS, Bishop of Antioch, b. at Side, Pamphylia; d. at Philippi 337; was first Bishop of Bithynia (Syria), and then of Antioch. In the Council of Nicaea he vehemently opposed the Arians; but they took revenge when they got into power, and deposed him in 331. The inhabitants, however, of Antioch, arose in defence of their bishop, though in vain: they only succeeded in provoking the emperor, and Eustathius was banished to Thrace. Of his numerous writings, only a work against Origen is still extant: Bibl. Max. Patr., XVII.

EUSTATHIUS, Bishop of Sebaste (Armenia) from 350; a native of Cappadocia; d. 380; changed several times from orthodoxy to Arianism, and from Arianism to Semi-Arianism, and back again, and joined finally the Eunomians, but was condemned by several synods, and lost at last the confidence of all parties. He built a hospital for sick people and travellers in Sebaste, and introduced monasticism in Armenia, Pontus, and Paphgia, which gave rise to the formation of an enthusiastic ascetic party, the Eustathians. They were condemned by the synod of Gangra, and disappeared speedily. See Socrates: H. E., II. 48; Sozomen: H. E., III. 14. HERZOG.

EUSTATHIUS OF THESSALONICA, b. in Constantinople in the first half of the twelfth century; metropolitan of Thessalonica since 1175; d. there in 1194; has long been famous for his commentaries on the Greek classics, especially Homer. But the publication of his theological works by Tafel (Opuscula, Francfort, 1832, and De Thessalonica, Berlin, 1839) shows, furthermore, that he was a man of true Christian spirit, with a sharp eye for the moral and religious depravity of his time, and with something of the talent and character of a reformer. His Theologia Monastic Life (μοναχικός ζωή) was translated into German, Betrachtungen über d. Mönchstand, by Tafel, Berlin, 1847. GASS.

EUSTOCHIUM, a daughter of Paula; was b. in EUTHALIUS. Rome about 370; made while young a vow of perpetual virginity, which caused Jerome to write his De Virginitate, and devoted herself to an ascetic life. Together with her mother, she accompanied Jerome to Palestine (385); and, after the death of Paula, she became superior of the convent in Bethlehem, where she died 418. In the Roman Church she is considered a saint. Her day of celebration is Sept. 28.

EUTYCHES, a deacon of the Alexandrian Church, and afterwards Bishop of Sulca; flourished in the middle of the fifth century, and introduced in the Acts, the Epistles of Paul, and the Catholic Epistles, the same division into chapters and verses which had already been introduced in the Gospels by Ammonius of Alexandria in the middle of the third century. See Bible Text, p. 298.

EUTHYMIUS ZICADENUS, or ZICABENUS, one of the most prominent Byzantine theologians of the twelfth century, and a characteristic representative of the whole school. Of his life very little is known. He was monk in a monastery near Constantinople, enjoyed the favor of the Emperor Alexius Comnenus, is spoken of with praise by Anna Comnena, and died after 1118. Of his exegetical works his commentary on the Psalms was published in a Latin version by Philip Saul, Verona, 1350, and afterwards often. The Greek text of the preface and introduction was printed by Le Moyne, Varia Sacra, Lyons, 1585, 1. pp. 190–210. The whole work, Greek and Latin, is found in Opera Omnia Theophylaci, Venice, 1754–63, T. IV. Another and still more important work, a commentary to the four Gospels, was likewise first printed in a Latin version by J. Hentenius, Louvain, 1534: the Greek text was not published until 1702, by C. F. Matthai, at Leipzig. His great dogmatical work, Πανοπλία διαμαρτητική, a refutation of twenty-four different heresies, was written at the instance of the Emperor Alexius. In the Latin version by P. F. Zini (Venice, 1555) the twelfth and thirteenth chapters against the Pope and the Italian heretics are left out. In the only Greek edition (Tergovist, Wallachia, 1771), the twenty-fourth chapter against the Mohammedans is lacking. Single parts of the work have been specially edited; for instance, the chapter against the Bogomiles in Wolf: Hist. Bogomilorum, Vitæb., 1712 (edited by Gieseler, Gottingen, 1842); the chapter against the Monophysites in Tollius: instanția Itinera. Ital., Treves, 1696, etc. See Ullmann: Nikol. von Methone, Euth. Zigm. und Nic. Choniates. GABS.

EUTYCHES and EUTYCHIANISM. Eutychianism denotes that form of the older Christology in which the Alexandrian doctrine of one nature in the incarnation was pushed to a docteric absorption of the human by the divine in the person of Christ. It originated as a re-action against Nestorianism. The reconciliation which (in 483) was effected between the Syrian and Egyptian Churches, and between the schools of Antioch and Alexandria, was nothing but a compromise; and the vague formulas of the instrument could not fail increasing the confusion. Both parties claimed the victory. The Antiochians pointed to the strong emphasis which was laid upon the two natures; and the Alexandrians excelled over the actual condemnation of Nestorius. In the dogmatical stand-points of the two adversaries nothing was changed. The Antiochians continued accusing the Alexandrians of Apollinarianism and Docetism; and the Alexandrians answered by accusing the Antiochians of Nestorianism and Photinanism. The Alexandrians were supported by the court and the monks, and labored secretly but successfully to spread suspicion throughout the church with respect to the orthodoxy of Diodorus and Theodore of Mopsuestia. The Antiochians employed chiefly the weapons of science; and they were in this respect far superior to their antagonists, especially since the death of Cyril. In 447 Theodoret published his Eranistes, which is simply a challenge to all the adherents of the Anathematisma of Cyril. In the Eastern Church the whole atmosphere was overloaded. A storm was inevitable. Eutyches finally caused it to burst forth. He was at that time about seventy years old, and had lived for more than thirty years as superior of a monastery in the neighborhood of Constantinople. A severe ascetic, he seldom left the monastery; but in his cell he used to converse with his visitors in an astonishing manner about the mystery, and was no doubt one of the leaders of that procession of psalmizing monks which penetrated into the imperial palace, and compelled Theodosius II. to confirm the party-manœuvres of the synod as ecumenical decisions. At present he was in great favor at the court, especially with the imperial minister of state, Chrysaphius; and, playing with equal force the saint in the halls of the palace and the oracle in the cell of the monastery, he was deeply engaged in counteacting the Antiochians. In the spring of 448 he wrote to Pope Leo I. (Leo. Ep., 20, in Mansi, V. p. 1828), to the effect that the Nestorian heresy was still living in the Eastern Church. Indeed, when at this time Domnus, Patriarch of Antioch, appeared before the emperor, and accused Eutyches of heresy, it was simply an act of self-defence from the Antiochian side. The move of Domnus had no effect; but in the fall of the same year (448) Bishop Eusebius of Doryleium laid before the synod of Constantinople a formal accusation of Eutyches, as holding and teaching blasphemous views of the person of Christ. Flavian, who was a moderate Antiochian, and that he had a bitter enemy in Dioscorus, Cyril’s successor in Alexandria, wanted to have the whole matter smoothed down by means of a personal conference between Eutyches and Eusebius; but the latter pushed his case with so much vigor, that Eutyches was actually summoned before the synod. After many delays he appeared, accompanied by a division of the imperial guard, and swarms of excited monks. He was examined, and he answered half defectively, half evasively. Nevertheless, he acknowledged that he considered the body of Christ to have been of quite another substance than other human bodies, and that was of course enough to prove his Apollinarianism, Valentinianism, Docetism, etc. Under tears and sobs, as the official style and archimandrite, and expelled from the community of the faithful.

Eutyches, however, Dioscorus, Chrysophius, and the whole party whose interests were at stake, did not feel willing to acquiesce in the decision. Their first move was to demand a revision of the acts of the synod. It was granted, but no irregularity was discovered. They then began to clamor for a new ecumenical council. Flavian and Leo I. tried to prevent such a measure; but when Leo I. dated his famous letter (Leo. Ep., 28, in Mansi, V. p. 1306), by which he hoped to place himself as arbitrator between the two contending parties (June 13, 449), the invitation to the new council had already been sent out (March 20, 449). It opened at Ephesus (Aug. 8, 449), under the presidency of Dioscorus, a shameless and violent character; it proceeded amid the howlings and tumult of drunken soldiers and fanatical monks; and it bears in history, for good or evil, the name of the "Robber Synod." Eutyches was re-instated, and Eusebius was even not allowed to speak. Flavian was condemned; and when some bishops attempted to embrace the feet of the president, and move him to pity, he cried out for the soldiers; and in broke the rabble with unspeakable confusion. Flavian was trampled upon, and beaten almost to death. Eusebius fled; also the papal legato escaped. Domnus of Antioch, Theodoret, and other prominent members of the Antiochian school, were deposed; and by means of falsified acts the sanction of the emperor was obtained. The triumph of the Alexandrian party was complete; but it did not prove lasting.

The sudden death of Theodosius II. (450) produced a change in the affairs. The new rulers, Pulcheria and her husband Marcian, were orthodox. The bishops who had been banished by the instrumentality of Dioscorus were recalled; but the remains of Flavian were brought to Constantinople, and entombed in the Church of the Apostles; Eutyches was once more excommunicated, and banished from the metropolis. It was the wish of the new government to give the country peace; and nothing seemed better suited to stop all controversies, and appease the reigning feeling of excitement, than a fourth (ecumenical) synod. It was convened at Chalcedon, and opened Oct. 8, 451. Dioscorus was unanimously condemned; not on account of heresy, however, but on account of the frightful accusations of fraud, violence, and crimes of almost every description, which were raised against him by his own congregation. More difficulty was experienced in elaborating a set of christological formulas, which should exclude all heresies, and gather the whole church into the communion of the faithful. The measures which were employed against the Eutychians were rather harsh. Nevertheless, remnants of the party, having monasteries of their own, and celebrating service in a somewhat peculiar manner, lived on for a long time. See the article CHRONOLOGY.

SEMSCH.

EUTYCHIANUS, Bishop of Rome (from January, 275, to December, 283), is honored in the Roman-Catholic Church as a saint and martyr. His day falls on Dec. 1. There is, however, no proof of his martyrdom but a report found in some later recensions of the Liber Pontificalis. The earlier recensions, as well as all other sources, are silent on the subject. Some decretales ascribed to him, but spurious, are found in Migne, Patr. Lat., V.

EUTYCHIUS, Patriarch of Alexandria, b. 576, at Fostat, the present Cairo; d. May 12, 640; was originally a physician; studied afterwards history and theology; entered the church, and was made patriarch in 933. As such he suffered very severe attacks from the Jacobite Copts, he himself being the leader of the orthodox or Melchite party. He was a prolific writer, and wrote in Arabic; but most of his writings have perished. His principal work, however (a world's history from the creation to 937, and of no small interest for the history of the Eastern Church), is still extant, and was edited in Arabic, with a Latin translation by E. Pococke, Oxford, 1658, 1659.

EUTYCHIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, b. about 510; d. 582; was a monk and catholicos in the city of Amasia, in Pontus; came in 552 as delegate from his bishop, and gained the favor of the Emperor Justinian by proving from Scripture that it was right to lay the ban of the church upon men, even though they had died long ago; was in the same year made Patriarch of Constantinople; played a prominent part in the "Three Chapters" controversy, and presided at the ecumenical synod of 558, but lost the favor of the emperor by refusing to acknowledge the doctrine of the monophysite Apthartodocetes as orthodox; was deposed, and banished to Amasia 565. After twelve years of banishment he was reinstated in his see by Justin II.; and by the church he was honored with the dignity of a saint on account of his sufferings for the cause of orthodoxy. His Life, written by an intimate servant of his, is found in Act. Sacra., April, I. p. 550. Of his writings three fragments on the Lord's Supper have been published by Mai; Class. Auct., X. 493, and Script. Vet. Nov. Col., IX. 623. A letter from him to Pope Vigilius, dated 563, is found in Mansi, X. 186.

EVAGRIUS PONTICUS was b. at Iberia, on the Black Sea; studied under Basiliius, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory Nazianzen, who brought him to Constantinople in 379, and with whom he went to Jerusalem in 385. He afterwards retired into the Nitrian Desert, and lived a hermit among the hermits. The year of his death is unknown. From contemporary documents it is evident that he enjoyed a considerable reputation; and the reason why the after-time treated him so coldly is simply, that, in the Origenite controversy, he took the side of Origen. What has come down EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS. See Kirchentag.
EVANGELICAL CHURCH CONFERENCE. See Kirchentag.
EVANGELICAL SOCIETY OF GENEVA. See Société Evangélique de Genève.
EVANGELICAL UNION. In 1841 James Morison, minister of the United Secession Church at Kilmarock, Scotland, was deposed for holding anti-Calvinistic views upon faith, the work of the Spirit in salvation, and upon the extent of the atonement. Faith was declared to be one's belief that Christ died for him; the Spirit is "poured upon all flesh," and strives with all the unredeemed save in all believers, while the atonement was universal. Mr. Morison's father, who was a minister, and two other ministers who held these views, met at Kilmarock, and formed the Evangelical Union. The movement spread, and now the union embraces about sixty churches. These are independent, with a general council, and also in doctrines resemble in general the Congregational churches of Scotland and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of the United States. Mr. Morison is the author of very valuable commentaries upon the Third Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans (Lond. 1868), Matthew (1870), and Mark (1873; 3d ed., 1881). See Evangelical Union Annual, and F. Ferguson, History of the Evangelical Union, Glasgow, 1876.

EVANGELIST (Ἐυαγγελιστής, "a herald of glad tidings") is from the same root as the words translated "gospel" (Evangelion) and to "preach the word" (Evangelizō). In Eph. iv. 11 the evangelists are enumerated side by side with apostles, prophets, pastors, and teachers, and follow prophets. This special mention leads us to attribute to them a distinct form of activity. It did not consist in the execution of apostolic functions, the exercise of prophetic gifts, the oversight of churches, or diaconal service, but in preaching, and testifying to the facts of Christ's life. But the evangelists are not to be regarded as a distinct order of church officials. Deacons, presbyters, and apostles are similar to that of the Methodists-Episcopal Church. Bishops and presiding elders are elected by the general and annual conferences, and hold office for four years. The itinerant system is practised. In doctrine they are Armenian, but are very decidedly biblical. The progress of the body in its early history has in recent years been rapid. The first general conference was held in 1810 in Union County, Pennsylvania. The labors of the association were at first exclusively among the Germans, whence the name "German-METHODIST CHURCH." More recently English congregations have been organized. It has also a conference in Germany numbering 8,000 adherents, and carries on a mission in Japan. The strength of the denomination in 1885 was 24 conferences, 1,611 ministers, and 128,634 church-members. It has three bishops, and conducts a biblical institute at Naperville, Ill., in connection with the Northwestern College. Its book concern at Cleveland is in a prosperous condition, and publishes several papers in German and English, the principal of which are Der christliche Botschafter and The Evangelical Messenger.
EVANGELIUM AETERNUM was a supposed book, rather than a real book, based upon the writings of Joachim of Floris, and referring to certain ideas entertained by one party of the Franciscans concerning the reforming and re-organizing mission of their order. Gerhardus, a Franciscan monk belonging to the above party, compiled in the middle of the thirteenth century, from the writings of Joachim of Floris (d. 1262), a book, which he called Introductarium in Evangelium Aeternum, and in which he applied to his order Joachim's vague prophecies of a third stage in the history of mankind,—the era of the Holy Spirit. From the title of this book arose the rumor of a new gospel, the Everlasting Gospel, in the possession of the Franciscans. The book itself has perished; but it is partially known to us from a fragment of a work by Hugo of Caro (d. 1262), Processus in Evangelium Aeternum, commented upon by Quetif and Echard, in Script. Predict., I. 202-213. See Joachim of Floris.

EVANS, Christmas, an eloquent Baptist preacher of Wales; b. at Esgaiswen on Christmas Day, 1766; d. July 14, 1838. He was the son of a shoemaker, and after his father's death was forced to work at servile employments for a living. At the age of seventeen he was converted, and for the first time learned to read. At this period he lost an eye in an act of self-defence. He was ordained 1790, and, after a pastorate of two years at Lleyn, went to the Isle of Anglesea, where his salary for many years was only seventeen pounds. In 1826 he removed to Tonyvelin, and in 1833 to Caernarvon. Evans was a man of ardent piety, and great power as a preacher. The fragments that remain of his sermons show him a master in parabolic comparison and dramatic representation. These characteristics have won for him the title of "Welsh Bunyan." When Robert Hall was reminded that Evans had only one eye, he replied, "Yes, sir; but that eye could lead an army through a wilderness at midnight." In recent times Evans' career has acted as a powerful stimulus upon Mr. Moody.

EVANS, John, D.D., a nonconformist divine; b. at Wrexham, Denbighshire, 1800; d. in London, May 16, 1839. He succeeded Dr. Daniel Williams in London. He completed Matthew Henry's commentary on Romans, and gathered much of the material subsequently used by Mr. Neal in his history of the Puritans. His best-known work is his Discourses concerning the Christian Temper; being Thirty-eight Sermons upon the Principal Heads of Practical Religion, London, 4th ed., 1797, 2 vols., etc., with a Life, by Dr. John Erskine, London, 1825.

EVANS, John, LL.D., a Baptist minister; b. at Usk, Monmouthshire, 1767; d. in London, 1827; wrote A Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World, with a Persuasive to Religious Moderation, London, 1794; 13th ed., revised by the author, 1827; 18th ed., 1841, trans., into Welsh and Continental languages, reprinted in several editions in United States. Upwards of a hundred thousand copies were sold during the author's lifetime; but for the copyright he received only ten pounds.

EVANSON, Edward, a minister of the Church of England; b. at Warrington, Lancashire, April 21, 1731; d. at Colford, Gloucestershire, Sept. 25, 1805. He took his M.A. at Cambridge, 1758. In 1773 he was tried in the Consistory Court of Gloucester for publicly altering or omitting such phrases in the church-service as seemed to him to be untrue, correcting the authorized version of the Scriptures, and for conversing against the Creeds and the divinity of Christ. The case was carried on appeal to the Court of Arches, and finally quashed, on technical grounds, in 1777. He gave the widest currency he could to his heretical views in his Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, and the Evidence of their Respective Authenticity examined, with that of other Scriptures deemed Canonical (Gloucester, 1792), in which he rejected the greater part of the New Testament as a forgery, and accepted the Gospels of Luke alone of the four. To this book Thomas Falconer replied in the Bampton Lecture for 1810, Certain Principles in Evanson's Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, etc., examined. Evanson's views upon the sabbath brought him into controversy with Dr. Priestley.

EVE (אֵו, "life;" so LXX., in Gen. iii.), the mother of all living. According to Gen. ii. 20, God would give man a "help meet for him;" literally, a help as before him; i.e., corresponding to him, his fellow in body and spirit. The simple, straightforward Bible narrative of Eve's creation and reception is given in Gen. ii. 21-25. Different interpretations have found defenders and expositors.

1. The Literal.—While Adam slept, God took one of his ribs, and fashioned out of it a woman. Now Adam recognized the identity of substance and unity of life, and called the new creation הָאָדָם (Ishha, "female man"), because she was taken out of אֵו (Ish, "man"). The name הָאָדָם was not given until after the fall, and was not an appellative, but her proper name, having not only a natural, but an historical significance, connected with the history of redemption; for it indicated Adam's faith that new life and salvation would issue from the womb of Eve. How long the first pair lived in Eden is unknown. By eating the forbidden fruit, under the temptation of Satan, they fell. Outside of the garden, Eve bore her first-born, and called him Cain ("possession"), apparently under the impression that she had borne the promised deliverer. Her second son she named Abel ("vanity"), indicating her disappointment: the third son she called Seth ("compensation"), because God had appointed her a seed, instead of dead Abel. With this remark the history of Eve closes.

2. The Allegorical.—The allegorists find their Coryphaeus in Philo, who, having declared (in the second book of his Allegories of the Sacred Laws, after the Work of the Six Days of Creation, II. § vii.) the literal statement (that Eve was made from Adam's rib) to be fabulous, proceeds to explain that by the story is meant the creation of the external sense immediately after the creation. of the mind. This took place when the mind was asleep. By "rib" he understands "one of the many powers of the mind; namely, that power which dwells in the outward senses." This mode of interpretation was followed by the Alexandrian school among the fathers, who, however, granted the historicity of the story. To them Eve represented the sensuous or perceptible part of man, and Adam the rational. The Latin fathers did not go quite this length, although willing to allow that a spiritual sense underlay the literal, and to find in the formation of Eve from the side of Adam a type of the formation of the Church from the Saviour's side. Later on, among the schoolmen, Thomas Aquinas speaks of Eve as a type of the Church, and her formation from the side of Adam as a type of the formation of the Church from the Saviour's side.

1. The Poetical.—The advocates of this interpretation believe in all the results stated in Genesis, but not in the processes. The creation of woman after that of man they allow; but as for the story it is a charming idyl. The Bible opens with a poem. Adam and Eve doubtless existed, but one cannot vouch for the actions attributed to them.

It remains to glance at the legends which are actually told about Adam and Eve. A very widely circulated opinion is, that man and woman were originally joined in one body, and that God separated them, the rabbins say by a hatchet. The rabbins say further, that, "When Eve had to be drawn out of the side of Adam, she was not extracted by the head, lest she should be vain; nor by the eyes, lest she should be wanton; nor by the mouth, lest she should be given to gossiping; nor by the ears, lest she should be a gossiper; not by the feet, lest she should be a gadabout; not by the heart, lest she should be jealous; but she was drawn forth by the side: yet, notwithstanding all these precautions, she has every fault specially guarded against. It was a rabbinical fancy that Eve was Adam's second wife, the first being Lilith. In this way the double account of woman's creation (Gen. i. 27 and ii. 18) was accounted for. Lilith was formed of clay at the same time with Adam, but expelled for pride and bad conduct. She subsequently married the Devil, and was the ancestress of the Jews—creatures endowed with human and devilish qualities. According to the Targum of Jonathan, Eve was made from Adam's thirteenth rib.

Much curious information is found in Fabri:

Cius: Codex Pseudep. V. 7; Bartolocci: Bibliotheca Rabbion; Eisenmenger: Enucleated Christian; See Aronoes'rrcs.

EVEN. See Vigils.

EVIDENCES, Christian. See Apologetics.

E'VILMERODACH (Heb. Hif3 Li'm; LXX.

Elia/mardh, Othara/and, and variants; BabyI.

Arali deter/dh; late pronunciation mid-Morduk, "man of the god Merodach") was the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and reigned, according to Ptolemey's canon (list of Babylonian kings), B.C. 561-580. The only scriptural mention of him is in 2 Kings xxv.

27-30, where it is said, that, in the year of his accession, he released from prison, after a captivity of thirty-seven years, Jehoiachin, king of Judah, that he changed his prison-garments, set his seat above the seat of the Babylonian vassal-kings or princes, gave him a daily allowance, and made him his constant table companion. Notwithstanding this, Josephus (c. Ap. 1. 11. 2), that he reigned eighteen years, is as little worthy of credence as the twelve years assigned to him by Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb., Chron., 1. 6), or his regency of seven years, of which Jerome speaks (on Isa. xiv. 19). Contemporary records exist in the form of eleven contract tablets, inscribed in the cuneiform character, and dated in his reign, three from the year of his accession (B.C. 693), four from his first year, and four from his second year (W. St. C. Boscawen, in Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch., VI. p. 52).

EVOLUTION and DEVELOPMENT. These phrases, so much used in the present day, have much the same meaning. Both point to one process viewed under two different aspects. Both indicate that one thing comes out of another. But development denotes the process going on; whereas evolution refers more to the process as we look back upon it. We talk of the seed being developed into the plant, and of the plant being evolved from the seed. Development or evolution is a method of procedure adopted by God, both in the kingdom of nature and the kingdom of grace.

I. There is undoubtedly development in nature. It is wrong in religious people to deny it. Everybody acts upon it. We all regard events as coming out of antecedent circumstances, commonly out of a concurrence, or train of occurrences. The process is seen more particularly in organic nature, in which there is a double development,—the seed from the plant, and the plant from the seed; the child from the parent, and, it may be, growing into the parent. Generally, in God's works, the present is the fruit of the past and the seed of the future. This was noticed from the beginning of observation. But of late years it has been scientifically examined, and the process is shown to be extensively employed, in a sense to be universal. For several ages it has been recognized, and the process is shown to be extensively employed, in a sense to be universal. It is an evidence of the great power of God. Let us notice its limitations.

1. It cannot give us the original matter, which must be there before it begins to develop. Its very name and nature indicate that there was something prior, from which it is derived. Hence did this come? We have clear proof of the existence of intelligence needed to organize nature (αναγόμενον, as Anaxagoras expresses it), and it is most reasonable to believe that He who arranged it also made it. At all events, evolution cannot give us the original matter, and we have to call in a power which I believe is still working.

2. Development cannot account for the beneficent order and special arrangements of the universe. Being itself blind, it might as readily work...
evol as good. A railway train, without a head and hand to set it on the track, might go on to destruction. We have to call in a power above itself to account for the beneficence of evolution. 3. There is evidence that new potencies have been added from time to time. Geology shows us new powers coming in. It is not possible to account for the actual phenomena of the world by a mass of molecules acting according to mechanical laws. There is no proof that there was life in the original atom, or molecule formed of atoms. How, then, did life come in when the first plant appeared? Was there sensation in the original molecule? If not, what brought it in when the first animal had a feeling of pleasure and pain? Was there mind in the first molecule, say a power of perceiving objects out of itself? Was there consciousness in the first monad, say a conscious- ness of self? Was there a power of discerning things, of comparing and judging, of noting re- semblances and differences? Had they the power of reasoning, of inferring the unseen from the seen, of the future from the past? Were there emotions in these primitive existences, say a hope of continued existence, or a fear of approaching dissolution? All sober thinkers acknowledge that there is no evidence whatever in experience or reason to show that matter can produce mind, that mechanical action can gender thought, that chemical action can manufacture consciousness, that electricity can reason, or organic structure give us the idea of the good and holy. According, then, to the principles of thinking and right observation, we have to call in powers above the original physical forces to produce such phe- nomena. In particular there must have been a special act when man appeared with intelligence and moral discernment, with free will and love. 4. When these new and higher potencies come in, they act upon and act with the previously existing powers. In our bodily frame, mind acts harmoniously with matter, and the two produce joint results. The memory proceeds upon the information given by the senses, and the understand- ing and the conscience presuppose both the sense and the memory. The Man is made of the dust of the ground; but there is breathed into him the breath of life, and he becomes a living soul. 5. As the result of the whole — of the action of the old forces and the introduction of the new — the work goes on in eras or epochs, in which we have, first, lifeless creation with all things mixed, then the separations of air from water, the distinct appearance of the heavenly bodies, the forthcoming of plants, and animals rising higher and higher till they cul- minate in man. 6. This work combined — the evolution of the old and the superaddition of the new — is progressive, advancing from the inferior to the higher. This progression is still going on; and from causes now operating, especially from the intelligence and industry of man, there will be an increased fertility and wealth; and the earth and its prin- cipal inhabitant will be brought to a higher and higher condition.

In regard to development, see, on the one side, DAWKIN'S Origin of Species and Descent of Man, and HERBERT SPENCER'S works; and, on the other side, DAWKIN'S works, — FOSSIL MEN AND THEIR MODERN REPRESENTATIVES, THE CHAIN OF LIFE IN GEOLOGICAL TIME, LIFE'S DAWN, NATURE AND THE BIBLE, THE BEGINNING OF THE WORLD ACCORDING TO REVELATION AND SCIENCE. — AND MIYART, ON THE GENESIS OF SPECIES, AND MAN AND APES.

II. Analogous to this there is evolution in the kingdom of heaven. Many interesting corre- spondences may be traced between the two king- doms. The spirit of the prophets was subject to the old and the superadded ones. They work in concert, as the soul does with the body, as the higher reason does with the senses and the ani- mal impulses. The inspiration of Moses, of the prophets and apostles, did not destroy their natu- ral character: it only sanctified and elevated them. The spirit of the prophets were subject unto them. Religion does not eradicate the natural powers: it moulds and directeth them.

The development goes on in eras or epochs, like the ages of geology, like the days of Genesis. The patriarchal dispensation grows out of the antediluvial, of the patriarchal, the Christian out of the Jewish. We may dis- cover marked epochs, even in the Christian Church, — the time of the fathers (a time of establishing), the mediaval church, the reformation churches, the denominational churches, the missionary churches, to expand into the millennial church.
The issue of this joint action of the old powers and the new is progression. We have an example in the opening of Genesis, where new manifestations appear in successive days or epochs, the whole culminating in man, in the image of God. In the church there was first the shadow, and then the substance. There are first types, and then the archetype. There are promises and then performances, predictions and then fulfilments. "Howbeit, that was not first which is spiritual (πνευματικόν), but that which is natural (ψυχικόν); and afterward that which is spiritual. "And so it is written The first man was made a living soul; the second Adam was made a quickening spirit” (1 Cor. xv. 44–46); where we may mark the advancement from the merely living soul (ψυχὴ ζωοονική) to the quickening spirit (πνεῦμα ζωοονικόν).

There is undoubtedly progression, development, if we properly understand it, in the revelation which God has been pleased to make of His will. In the antediluvian times there was light like that of the dawn. There were prefigurations under the Levitical dispensation more minute and specific than in the patriarchal dispensations. There is higher ethical teaching in the prophetic books than in the older Scriptures. There is more spiritual teaching in the New Testament than in the Old. Jesus, in the fulness of time, becomes the light of the world. There is the fullest revelation of specific truth in the Epistles of Paul and John. This progressive work goes on under the two sets of powers,—the old and the new. This does not entitle us to argue, with some rational divines, that the new superseded or sets aside the old.

Earnest minds have never been satisfied with such distant views of God as we have in causa tion and development. They have longed for and aspired after immediate communion with God. They have such in the dispensation of the Spirit. Here there is provision made for God dealing with each individual soul. There is room for convictions and conversions, for getting grace and growth for seasons of revival and refresh ing. See Man.

EWALD, Georg Heinrich August, one of the most learned Oriental scholars of the century; b. Nov. 10, 1803, in Göttingen; d. there of heart-disease, May 4, 1875. His father was a linen-weaver. In 1820 he entered the University of Tübingen, where Eichhorn was then teaching; but Ewald denied having been much influenced by him. After teaching in the gymnasia at Wolfenbüttel for two years, he began in 1824 to teach as Repetent at Göttingen, and was made professor in 1827. In 1837 he was expelled from his position for having signed, with six other Göttingen professors, a protest against the revocation of the liberal constitution of 1833; which Ernst August, king of Hanover, effected. This action made him famous. In 1829 and 1836 he had visited France and Belgium, and in 1831 the Netherlands. The same year he received a call to Tübingen. He was never contented during his stay there, and came into bitter feud with Baur and the Tübingen school. After laboring ten years in Tübingen, he was recalled in 1848 to Göttingen, where he continued until 1875, when his bitter attacks upon the Prussian government, and his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the king of Prussia, were punished with his exclusion from the faculty of philosophy; but he was still allowed his salary and the privilege of lecturing. This latter privilege was withdrawn in 1868 on account of utterances in his Praise of the King and the People (4th ed., Stuttgart, 1869). He continued the uncompromising foe of the Prussian monarchy, and in 1869, and twice afterwards, was sent as the delegate of Hanover to the Prussian Parliament. [In 1874 he was imprisoned for three weeks for libel against Bismarck, whom he accused of ruining religion and morality in the war against Austria, and of picking on the time for plunder and robbery in the war against France.]

Ewald was a solitary man. He was married twice; but from his childhood up he stood aloof from his fellows, had no intimate friends, and gave instruction not only in Hebrew and Arabic, but in Hebrew language. His History of Israel, in spite of its mistakes, in an ever-increasing number of errors. Their silence he construed into a confession that they were in the wrong. [Being asked why the Pope never answered his letter in which he called upon him to resign, Ewald replied, "He dare not!"

But the intemperate vehemence of Ewald the citizen is only an accident to the patient laboriousness of Ewald the student, and his eminent contributions to philology and history. In the departments of Oriental language and criticism he has not had a superior. [His genius is even more remarkable than his learning, and in absolute defiance of all opinions which contradicted his own. He felt himself called upon to go beyond the mere duties of the student and professor. He became a violent political pamphleteer, first against Ernst Georg of Hanover, and then against Prussia. In overweaning but naive confidence, he dared to advise courts and church consistories, and addressed the Pope and the prelates in Germany on Roman errors. Their silence he construed into a confession that they were in the wrong. [Being asked why the Pope never answered his letter in which he called upon him to resign, Ewald replied, "He dare not!"

But the intemperate vehemence of Ewald the citizen is only an accident to the patient laboriousness of Ewald the student, and his eminent contributions to philology and history. In the departments of Oriental language and criticism he has not had a superior. [His genius is even more remarkable than his learning, and in absolute defiance of all opinions which contradicted his own. He felt himself called upon to go beyond the mere duties of the student and professor. He became a violent political pamphleteer, first against Ernst Georg of Hanover, and then against Prussia. In overweaning but naive confidence, he dared to advise courts and church consistories, and addressed the Pope and the prelates in Germany on Roman errors. Their silence he construed into a confession that they were in the wrong. [Being asked why the Pope never answered his letter in which he called upon him to resign, Ewald replied, "He dare not!"]
EXCOMMUNICATION.

BERTHEAU.

EWING, Alexander, Bishop of Argyll and the Isles, Scotland; b. in Aberdeen, March 25, 1814; d. May 22, 1876. He was elected bishop 1846, and represented the Broad-Church school on the episcopal bench. The characteristics of his theology have been thus presented: "He dwelt specially upon the illuminating power of Christianity as revealing the Fatherhood of God, and thus 'rolling back the clouds of human sin and sorrow,' so as to reach a point in his argument. This was the supreme manifestation of that light, and the Bible was but the medium of its revelation, the means for enabling it to stream in upon the soul from sources beyond the mere letter of the truths which the written word contained. One of the chief of these external sources of light, specially welcomed by Ewing, was science, to the discoveries of which he looked forward as destined to lead to the higher and higher aspects of Christianity than were yet fully realized." These views were found in his volume of discourses, Revelation considered as Light, London and N.Y., 1873. See also Memoir of Alexander Ewing, D.C.L., by A. J. Ross, B.D., London, 1877.

EWING, Finis, one of the founders of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; b. in Bedford County, Virginia, July 10, 1773; d. at Lexington, Mo., July 4, 1841. From Virginia he early removed to Tennessee, and subsequently to Kentucky. His education was limited; but, under the influence of the revivalist preachers, he offered himself as a candidate for the ministry, and was licensed in 1802 by the presbytery of Cumberland. In 1810 he formed, with two others, the presbytery out of which grew the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. He is the author of Lectures on Import. Subjects in Divinity, Nashville, 1824.

EXCOMMUNICATION. I. AMONG THE HE- brews. — Any person or thing — man, animal, weapon, tool, or piece of ground — which to pious eyes seemed abominable, or dangerous, or incorrigible, the Hebrews used to set aside from common life, transforming it into a kind of ban-offering, and sacrificing it to God, for him to do with it what he pleased, — destroying it, or simply rendering it harmless, or perhaps forgiving it. This usage, of which traces are found both among the Gauls (Cesar, De Bello Gallico, 6, 17) and the Germans (Tacitus, Ann., 13, 57), was very old among the Hebrews, and showed itself conspicuously in their relation to foreigners, to heathenism, and to any manifestation of other and higher religions. Not only objects of heathen worship, such as altars, idols, temples, etc., but even the larger part of the booty made in war, such as chariots, weapons, horses, etc., were destroyed. Whole cities, with all their inhabitants, every thing breathing within their walls, yea, whole nations, such as, for instance, the Canaanites, were annihilated; and that not for political reasons, but on account of a religious principle.

Its most awful application, however, this principle obtained within the nation itself, as a weapon against any thing attacking the sacred institutions of the theocracy. It then became, not the fulfilment of a vow, but the execution of a punishment, and assumed the form of an excommunication. Thus a single person, or even a whole city, which broke the covenant with God, and fell into idolatry, was put under the ban, and with a curse abandoned to destruction. If a single person, he was killed (Lev. xxvii. 29): if a whole city, all that breathed within its precincts were killed, and the rest were burnt (Deut. xiii. 16). That which could not be thus destroyed, such as metal utensils, the soil, etc., became the property of the sanctuary (Lev. xxvi. 21-28).
EXCOMMUNICATION.

As instances, may be mentioned the punishment of the people of Succoth and Penuel (Judg. viii. 4-17), of Jabez (Judg. xxi. 10), of Benjamin (Judg. xx. 26), etc.

In the course of time the rigor of the law abated, and the punishment assumed the character of a simple ecclesiastical penalty; as in the time of Ezra, when those Israelites who would not send away their foreign wives were excluded from the synagogue, and their property confiscated.

In the period of the New Testament there seems to have been two different kinds of excommunication,—one milder (the ἀφορίζειν of Luke vi. 22), and another more severe (the ἀποστείλειν ἢ γίνεσθαι ὡς ναζιν of John ix. 22, xii. 42, and xvi. 2). The Talmud and the Rabbins also distinguish between two kinds of excommunication,—the ἀποστείλειν, which was limited to thirty days, and to the most intimate relations, and which did not exclude from the service, though the excommunicated was compelled to enter the synagogue through a peculiar door; and the ἁγγίασις, which should be pronounced by at least ten members of the congregation, and meant not only exclusion from the temple and the synagogue, but also from intercourse with co-religionists.

RUTSCHI.

11. In the Christian Church.—On scriptural authority (Matt. xvi. 19, xvii. 18; John xx. 23; 1 Thess. v. 14; James v. 16; 1 John i. 8, v. 16; 2 Cor. v. 18) grave sins were punished in the ancient church with excommunication; and by the councils of Ancar, 314 (c. 4, 6, 8, 9, 16), and Nicea, 325 (c. 11, 12), the proceedings were completely systematized; only after a severe course of penitence the excommunicated was re-admitted into the bosom of the church.

In the Western Church, however, this practice of doing public penance never obtained firm foothold, and soon disappeared altogether. But a double kind of excommunication developed,—an excommunicatio minor, excluding the culprit from the sacraments only; and an excommunicatio major, which also excluded him from the mass, from burial in consecrated ground, from ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and from all intercourse with other Christians, excepting a few words of dispute,—itize, lex, humile, res ignara, necesse. This last part, however, of the punishment, the Church could not enforce by her own power: she had to ask for the aid of the State, and she obtained it.

The State declared the excommunicated infamous (c. 17, C. 16, qu. 1), all obligations to him, as, for instance, the feudal obedience, null and void (c. 4, 5, C. 15, qu. 6), etc. How completely the mediaval State submitted to the Church may be seen from the demands which the Pope made (1213 and 1219) to the Emperor Frederick II. and (1230) to his son King Henry VI., and to which these princes consented (Pertz, Mon., 4, 224, 231, 267).

The canon law reigned supremely in most relations, and aspired to do so in them all.

With the Reformation a great change took place. In all Protestant countries where the State took the supremacy over the Church, the excommunicatio major was abolished as a secular punishment; but the excommunicatio minor was still retained as a point of church discipline, as a pena medicinalis. Luther held, as did most of the Reformers, that, by admitting an impenitent to the Lord's Supper, the minister shared in the sin thereby committed. But he also held that this excommunication from the Lord's Supper should never be administered unless with the concurrence of the whole congregation. This last idea, however, was not carried out; and the excommunication itself gradually fell into disuse in the Reformed churches. The Roman-Catholic Church, which still pretends to maintain her social independence, and her supremacy over the State, continued to treat the prescriptions of canon law as valid theoretically. Practically she has found out long ago that modifications are necessary, since an excommunication pronounced by the Pope, but not enforced by the State, would have no civil effect whatever; and an enforcement by the State is not likely to take place any more. The present theoretical arrangement of the whole question is set forth in the constitution of Oct. 12, 1899, Apostolica sedis. See KOBER: Der Kirchenban, Tubingen, 1887; GOESCHEN: Doctrina de disciplina ecclesiastica ex ordinibus, Halle, 1859.

MEJER.

EXEGESIS, EXEGETICAL THEOLOGY. I. DEFINITION. —One of the four leading departments of theological science, and lying at the base of the others,—historical, systematic, practical. It has to do with the interpretation of the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, which in the Protestant churches are regarded as the only infallible rule of the Christian faith and life, and the ultimate tribunal in all controversies. The term ἐξευθέντως (from ἐξευθέντως, to lead out, "to expound") is borrowed from classical usage: the expounders of the oracles of Delphi, and the sacred rites in Athens, were called "exegetes" (ἐξεγέται). In the New Testament the verb occurs once, in John i. 18, where it is said of Christ that he declared or revealed (ἐξευθέντως the hidden being of God. Exegesis originated among the Jewish scribes, passed into the Christian Church, and is now most extensively cultivated in Protestant Germany, Holland, England, and the United States. Every theological school must, first of all, have a chair of exegesis or biblical literature: most of them have two or more, for the Old and the New Testaments.

II. BRANCHES. —Exegetical theology, in the widest sense, embraces, beside exegesis proper, the following auxiliary and supplementary branches of theological learning: 1. Biblical philology (Greek for the New Testament, Hebrew and Chaldee for the Old Testament); 2. Biblical geography (Egypt, Mount Sinai, Palestine); 3. Biblical archaeology or antiquities; 4. Biblical history (from the creation to the close of the apostolic age); 5. Textual criticism (the restoration of the original text of the sacred writers); 6. A literary history of the Bible, usually called Byzantine or Critical Introduction (including an account of the several books, their genuineness, integrity, authorship, time and place of composition); 7. History of the canon; 8. Biblical hermeneutics (the science of the laws of interpretation); 9. Biblical theology (the summing-up of the results of exegesis in systematic form). See these titles.

III. KINDS OF EXEGESIS. —1. Translation; 2. Periphrase; 3. Commentary. Of commenta-EXEGESIS.

EXEGESIS.

ries proper we may distinguish again three kinds.
1. Philological or grammatico-historical exegesis, be defined simply the meaning of the writer according to the laws of language and the usus loquendi at the time of composition, and according to the historical situation of the writer, irrespective of any doctrinal or sectarian bias. It implies a thorough knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, and familiarity with contemporar literature.
2. Theological exegesis develops the doctrinal and ethical ideas of the writer in organic connection with the whole teaching of the Scriptures, and according to the analogy of faith.
3. Homiletical or practical exegesis is the application of the well-ascertained results of grammatical and theological interpretation to the wants of the Christian congregations, and belongs properly to the pulpit.

IV. HISTORY OF EXEGESIS.—1. Jewish Exegesis, confined to the Old Testament. It began soon after the age of Ezra, but was first carried on by oral tradition of the scribes or Jewish scholars. It was especially devoted to the law (the Thorah), i.e., the Pentateuch, and derived from it minute rules for the individual, social, and ecclesiastical relations. The body of these interpretations is called "Midrash." The prevailing method of exegesis was the rabbinical or literal. It excluded all foreign ideas, and was subservient to the strict legalism of the Pharisees.
But among the Hellenist (Greek-speaking) Jews, especially in Alexandria, the allegorizing method obtained favor, especially through Philo (d. about 40 A.D.), who endeavored to combine the Mosaic religion with Platonic philosophy, and prepared the way for the allegorizing exegesis of Clement, and Origen of Alexandria. The Jewish rabbins of the middle ages cultivated grammatical exegessis at a time when the knowledge of Hebrew had died out in the Christian Church. The most distinguished among them are Ibn Ezra (d. 1167), R. Sal. Isaac or Rashi (d. 1105), David Kimchi (d. 1190), Moses Maimonides (d. 1204). Their commentaries are printed separately, and also in the so-called Rabbinical Bibles (e.g., of Buxtorf, Del), 1618, 3 vols. folio.

2. Patristic Exegesis.—The first use made of the Bible in the Christian Church was practical and homiletical. It was to the early Christians what it is still to the great mass of believers, and will be to the end of time,—a book of life, of spiritual instruction and edification, of hope and comfort. Scientific or learned exegesis began when the Bible was perverted by heretics, and made to serve all sorts of errors. The Greek Church took the lead. Origen (180-254), the greatest scholar of his age, a man of genius and iron industry, is the father of critical exegesis.
He is full of suggestive ideas and allegorical fancies. He distinguishes three senses in the Bible corresponding to the three parts of man:
(a) A literal or bodily sense, (b) A moral or psychic sense, (c) An allegorical or mystic, spiritual sense.
Where the literal sense is offensive, he escaped the difficulty by adopting a purely spiritual sense.
The greatest commentators of the Greek Church are Chrysostom (d. 407), who in his Homilies explained the principal books of the Old and New Testaments, Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428), Theodoret of Cyrus (d. 457). Among the Latin scholars, Augustine (d. 430) is the profoundest and most spiritual, Jerome (d. 419), the mos. learned, expounded. The latter achieved the highest merit by his improved Latin translation of the Bible (the Vulgate), which remains to this day the standard version of the Roman Church.
The Council of Trent forbade the interpretation of Scriptures, except according to "the unanimous consent of the fathers." This rule would prevent all progress in theology; and, besides, such a "unanimous consent" does not exist, except in the fundamental doctrines.

3. Medieval Exegesis was purely traditional, and consisted of brief glosses (glossaria), or extractions from the fathers (called Catena Patrum).
The original languages of the Bible were unknown in the West; and even the first among the scholastics had to depend upon Jerome's version for their knowledge of God's word.
The prevailing method distinguished four senses of the Scriptures: (a) The literal, or historical;
(b) The spiritual, or mystical, corresponding to faith, teaching what to believe (credenda); (c)
The moral, or tropological, which corresponds to love or charity, and teaches what to do (agenda);
(d) The anagogical, which refers to hope (spe-randa). These senses are expressed in the monmonic verse:

"Littera gesta docet;
Quid credas, allegoria;
Moralis, quid agas;
Quo tendas, anagogia."

The principal patristic compilations are: (a) In the Greek Church, those of Ecumenius (d. 999), Theophylactus (d. 1007), Euthymius Zigabenus
(d. 1118), and Nicephorus (fourteenth century);
(b) In the Latin Church, Wallafred Strabo (d.
849), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). The Catena aurea in Evangelia of Thomas Aquinas has been reproduced in an English translation by Pusey, Keble, and Newman.

Among the more independent biblical scholars of the middle ages who prepared the way for the Reformation must be mentioned Nicolaus a Lyra (d. 1540); "Si Lyra non saltasset, Lutherus non saltasset," and Laurentius (d. 1463).

4. The exegesis of the Protestant Reformers of the sixteenth century marks a new epoch. It is full of enthusiasm for the word of God, and free from the slavery of ecclesiastical tradition. It went directly to the original Greek and Hebrew Scriptures, and furnished the best translations for the benefit of the people; while Romanism regards the Bible as a book for the priesthood, and discourages or prohibits efforts for its general circulation without note or comments. All the leading Reformers wrote commentaries, more or less extensive, on various books of the Bible,— Luther (d. 1546), Melanchthon (d. 1560), Zwingli (d. 1531), Ecolampadius (d. 1531); the ablest of them are by Calvin (d. 1564) and his pupil and successor, Beza (d. 1603). Calvin combines almost all the qualifications of an exponent, in rare harmony; and his commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, the Prophets, and all the books of the New Testament (except Revelation, on which he did not write), are valuable to this day. Beza, by his Greek Testament, his Latin version and notes on the New Testament, had great influence on the English version of King James.

5. Protestant commentators of the seventeenth

A. Theodoret of Cyrus (d. 457). Calvin combines all most all the qualifications of an expounder, in rare harmony; and his commentaries on Genesis,
the Psalms, the Prophets, and all the books of the New Testament (except Revelation, on which he did not write), are valuable to this day. Beza, by his Greek Testament, his Latin version and
notes on the New Testament, had great influence on the English version of King James.

5. Protestant commentators of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, by Hugo Grotius (d. 1645; Arminian); Vitringa (d. 1722; Dutch Calvinist); Hammond (d. 1600; Church of England); Matthew Poole (Presbyterian; d. 1679; Annotations upon the Whole Bible, an English synopsis from his Latin synopsis); Matthew Henry (Independent; d. 1714; the best homiletical commentator of England; many editions, from 3 to 9 vols., Lond. and N.Y.); Patrick, Lowth, and largely used by John Wesley in his Notes, an admirable specimen of maltum in paro); Thomas Scott (Family Bible, London, 1796, 4 vols., 11th ed.); Fausset, and Brown, A Commentary, Critical, Experimental, and Practical (Edinb., repub. in Phila., repub. in Phila., 1875, in 6 vols., and at Hartford, Conn., in 1 vol.); Henry Cowles (d. 1881) commentaries on the whole Bible: Lange's Biblewerk (Bielefeld and Leipzig, 1857-77, in 10 parts; English translation, with large additions, by Philip Schaff, aided by more than forty American contributors, New York and Edinburgh, 1894-80, in 25 vols. royal 8vo, including a separate volume on the Apocalypse and a complete index), a threefold commentary, critical, doctrinal, and homiletical, for the use of ministers and theological students (London, 1869-78, 4 vols. in 5 fol.), a very useful abridgment from the Critici Sacri and other commentators.

6. Exegesis in the nineteenth century. It is exceedingly prolific, chiefly German, English, and American. The Bible is now more studied than ever before, and with a better knowledge of the languages, antiquities, geography, and history. We can only mention a small number of works.

(a) Commentaries on the whole Bible: Lange's Biblewerk (Bielefeld and Leipzig, 1857-77, in 10 parts; English translation, with large additions, by Philip Schaff, aided by more than forty American contributors, New York and Edinburgh, 1894-80, in 25 vols. royal 8vo, including a separate volume on the Apocalypse and a complete index), a threefold commentary, critical, doctrinal, and homiletical, for the use of ministers and theological students (London, 1869-78, 4 vols. in 5 fol.), compiled from the principal commentators, as an appendix to Walton's Polyglot, under the direction of Bishop Pearson and others; Poole's Synopsis Criticorum aliorumque S. Scrip... (b) On the Old Testament: Keil and Delitzsch, Eng. trans., pub. by Clark, Edinburgh, 1869 sqq.; Kurzgefasster exegetischer Handbuch zum Alten Test.; by Knobel, Bertheau, Dillmann, and others (new ed., Leipzig, 1880, etc.).

(d) The present century has also produced a large number of exegetical works of the first order on separate books of the Bible, which it would be impossible here to enumerate. Among recent commentators on one or more books of the Old Testament, Gesenius (Isaiah), Ewald (the poetical and prophetical books), Hupfeld (the Psalms), Hitzig (Psalms, minor prophets), Hengstenberg (Psalms, etc.), Delitzsch (Psalms, Isaiah), Keil (historical books), Schlotmann (Job), Stuart (Daniel, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes), Joseph A. Alexander (Psalms and Isaiah) occupy the first rank. Of New Testament commentators on special books must be mentioned Winer (on Galatians), Fritzsche (Matthew, Mark, Romans; all in Latin), Tholuck (Romans, Hebrews, Sermon on the Mount), Lücke, Bleek, Harless, Stier, von Hoffmann, Godet, Stuart, Hodge, Alexander, Stanley, Jowett, Elliott, and Lightfoot. Among these, again, the following commentaries may be recommended as being very useful for a critical study of the Greek Testament: Tholuck on the Sermon on the Mount; Lücke on the writings of John; Luthardt on the Gospel of John; Keil on the four Gospels; Morison on Matthew and Mark; Tholuck, Forbes, Philippi, Hodge, Beet, and Shedd on Romans; Stanley on Corinthians; Wieseler on Galatians; Harless on Ephesians; Bleek on the Hebrews (especially the large work in 3 vols.); Beck on the Pastoral Epistles; Elliott on the Apocalypse; Elliott on Galatians, Ephesians, Thessalonians, and Pastoral Epistles (republished in Andover); Lightfoot on Galatians, Philippians, and Colossians; Godet on Luke, John, and Romans (in French, and trans., in Clark's For. Thed. Libr.).

EXODUS.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

EXEMPTION, in ecclesiastical law, means the transference of persons or institutions from the jurisdiction of their nearest regular superior to that of some special or higher superior. The most noticeable instance of exemption in the Roman-Catholic Church is found in the history of monasticism. The monks were originally subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop. See the Council of Chalcodon, 451, can. 4 (c. 12, Can. XVI. qu. 4.; c. 16, Can. XVIII. qu. III.). But in course of time, first single monasteries and then the whole orders, succeeded in liberating themselves from the episcopal rules, and placing themselves immediately under the Pope. The change, however, did not take place without contest; and the acts of the Councils of Constance and Trent show the bitterness which prevailed on both sides. In the Reformed Churches there was no use for exemptions, except in cases in which the Reformed and the Roman Catholic Church met each other in the same parish. The first instance of exemption in the Reformed Churches was that of the prince, who placed himself outside of the regular ecclesiastical jurisdiction; then followed, in some countries, that of the royal officers, in others, that of the army, and in others, that of the whole nobility, etc.

EXERCISES, Spiritual (exercitii spiritualis), a term applied, in the Roman-Catholic asceticism, to certain exercises in meditation and mortification practices, both by ecclesiastics and laymen, generally under the guidance of the confessor, and partly as general penance, partly as a preparation for the Lord's Supper, ordination, etc. It was Ignatius Loyola who developed this institution of spiritual exercises to its highest and most elaborate form; and Pope Alexander VII. granted full absolution to any one, ecclesiastical or layman, who for eight days should practise these exercises in a house of the Jesuits, and according to the method of Loyola. See THE SPIRITUAL EXERCISES OF ST. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, trans. from the Latin by Charles Seager, Baltimore, 1819.

EXETER, chief town of Devonshire, Eng.; population, 31,650; on the Exe, ten miles from its mouth, in the English Channel; is on the site of an ancient fortress and city, and is divided by two town, Isca Dumnorium. It was afterwards occupied by Britons and Saxons, and called Exanecaster, whence comes the modern name. In 1060 the episcopal see of Devon, founded at Crediton, 910, was removed to Exeter. Its cathedral dates from the twelfth century, and, although not as large as some others, is inferior to none in architectural beauty. It was restored 1877. The income of the see of Exeter is £4,200; and the present bishop is Dr. Frederick Temple, who was consecrated 1869.

EXILE. See Captivity.

EXODUS, Book of. See PENTATEUCH.

EXODUS OF THE CHILDREN OF ISRAEL.

The Pharaoh of the exodus is Menephthah I., the son of Rameses the Great, the Pharaoh of the oppression. This is now so generally acknowledged that it may be accepted as a settled fact. The other view—that Amosis I. was the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Thothmes I. that of the exodus—has been given up by R. S. Poole, formerly its chief advocate, in his article upon Egypt, in the ninth edition of the Britannica. The date of the exodus may be set down as April 15, 1317 B.C. The other view mentioned would put it in 1485 B.C. A striking though strangely unnoticed passage in Herodotus seems to add confirmation to the accepted date. (See Schaff, Through Bible Lands, p. 102.) He says that the son of Rameses, whom the Greeks called “Sesostris,” undertook no warlike expeditions, being struck with blindness, owing to the following circumstance. The river had taken an unusual height of eighteen cubits, and had overflowed all the fields, when, a sudden wind arising, the water rose in great waves. Then the king, in a spirit of impiious violence, seized his spear, and hurled it into the strong eddies of the stream. Instantly he became blind, continuing after a little while, he became blind, continuing without the power of vision for ten years” (II. c. 111). This reads like a confused reminiscence of Menepthah’s overthrow in the Red Sea. It is no objection that the king is said to have lived ten years thereafter; for the Bible-account does not compel us to believe that the Pharaoh perished then. The monuments, as was to be expected, contain no account of the disaster.

The route of the exodus is thus described in Scripture language: “The children of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth” (Exod. xii. 37); from Succoth they went to Etham, in the edge of the wilderness (xiii. 20); there they turned, and encamped “before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-Zephon” (xiv. 2). In Numbers (xxiii. 2-10) there is another account, which presents the same facts in a more condensed form. The identification of the localities mentioned is not yet settled; but that given by Ebers seems most probable. This is: Rameses was el Maskhuta, at the head of the Wady Tumilat; Succoth, Sechet (Taustabum of the Romans), north-east of Lake Timnah; Etham (fortress), a frontier town less city; Pi-hahiroth, Ajrud, a fort a few miles north-east of Suez (“Pi” is merely the Egyptian article); Migdol, Bir Suweis, about two miles from Suez; Baal-Zephon is Mount Atakah.

The collection of the great multitude—six hundred thousand men and four hundred women and children, or in all between two millions and three millions—was the work of three or four days. The rallying-place was Rameses (el Maskhuta). To this point the Israelites streamed from different parts, as they had been directed to do. The existence of trial organization explains the fact that they marched in some sort of order. Yet they had so recently been emancipated, and were so entirely unarmed, that it was, humanly speaking, impossible for them to stand an attack from the disciplined Egyptian army. Accordingly, when Moses had led them as far as Etham...
upon the highway to Palestine, the seat of a 3. The theory now associated with Brugsch (Die Landenge von Suez, Leipzig, 1881) also identifies the wide
4. To this view there are so many objections, that, as Dr. Bartlett says, it "derives its chief importance from the eminence
5. The sea, then, was a mere channel about four miles broad, and supposesthe host to have made the distance thither in the night. This
6. The crossing took place at the head of the gulf, near or north of Suez. The gulf is here
7. The crossing was not over the Red Sea at all, but over the Serbonian bog. To this view there are so many objections, that, as Dr. Bartlett says, it "derives its chief importance from the eminence
8. There is very plain when another passage in Exodus is compared. Thus (Exod. x. 19) the locusts were cast by a west wind "into the Red Sea" (i.e. τὸ τιθάλασσαν τὸν θαλάσσαν), but it would have required a south wind to have blown them into the Serbonian bog.
9. The crossing was not over the Red Sea at all, but over the Serbonian bog. To this view there are so many objections, that, as Dr. Bartlett says, it "derives its chief importance from the eminence and ability of its latest advocate (Brugsch)." It requires a renaming and replacing of every locality, — in itself, be it granted, an insuperable objection. Yam Suph is the Serbonian bog; Mara is the Bitter Lakes; Elim is Thent-remu; Etham is just before one crosses the lowest part of Lake Menzaleh; Pihahiroth is at the latter side of the Serbonian bog; Baal-Zephon is Mount Casius, upon the Mediterranean Sea. There the Israelites crossed, and came south-west and south to Ain Musa. The theory turns up the meaning of yam suph. The words mean literally the weedy or reedy sea. Surely they fit better the shallow, reedy lakes of North-eastern Egypt than the Red Sea; but the stubborn fact is, that they are uniformly applied to the latter by the Seventy, who had the best means of knowing what the Hebrew meant; and thus the argument upon which the theory rests is worthless, and all Brugsch's learning and enthusiasm cannot give it value. He derives his proofs mainly from the following letter, written, Geikie thinks, to recall the gen-
10. The crossing was not over the Red Sea at all, but over the Serbonian bog. To this view there are so many objections, that, as Dr. Bartlett says, it "derives its chief importance from the eminence and ability of its latest advocate (Brugsch)." It requires a renaming and replacing of every locality, — in itself, be it granted, an insuperable objection. Yam Suph is the Serbonian bog; Mara is the Bitter Lakes; Elim is Thent-remu; Etham is just before one crosses the lowest part of Lake Menzaleh; Pihahiroth is at the latter side of the Serbonian bog; Baal-Zephon is Mount Casius, upon the Mediterranean Sea. There the Israelites crossed, and came south-west and south to Ain Musa. The theory turns up the meaning of yam suph. The words mean literally the weedy or reedy sea. Surely they fit better the shallow, reedy lakes of North-eastern Egypt than the Red Sea; but the stubborn fact is, that they are uniformly applied to the latter by the Seventy, who had the best means of knowing what the Hebrew meant; and thus the argument upon which the theory rests is worthless, and all Brugsch's learning and enthusiasm cannot give it value. He derives his proofs mainly from the following letter, written, Geikie thinks, to recall the gen-
11. That the Seventy were correct in interpreting yam suph by τὸ τιθάλασσαν τὸν θαλάσσαν ("the Red Sea") is very plain when another passage in Exodus is compared. Thus (Exod. x. 19) the locusts were cast by a west wind "into the Red Sea" (i.e. τὸ τιθάλασσαν τὸν θαλάσσαν); but it would have required a south wind to have blown them into the Serbonian bog.
12. There are other objections to the Schleiden-Brugsch theory. Ebers contests the Egyptological proof. Dr. Bartlett (p. 171) urges that the identification of Rameses and Zoan "seems incompatible with the use of both names in the Scriptures and in the same book (e.g., Numbers), without a hint of their identity." Dr. J. F. Thompson, in the Bibliotheca Sacra for January, 1875, adds: (1) "This theory, locating Rameses at Zoan, would require the Israelites first to march a long distance away from their destination to the place of rendezvous, to cross the Pelusian arm of the Nile, and to recross it next day,—a process sufficiently improbable; (2) That the supposed route would take them on the most direct way towards the Philistines, contrary to the express statement of Exod. iii. 17; (3) That the leading of an army into the treacherous Serbonian bog, when there was a military road at a great thoroughfare south of it, is a stratagetical blunder not supposable in Moses, much less in Egyptian generals who were accustomed to the whole region, having frequently led their armies to the east."
It is important to remember that the night of the crossing was a terrible one. In the language of the Psalmist, "The clouds poured out water; the skies sent out a sound; thine arrows [the lightnings] lightened the world; the earth trembled and shook" (Ps. lxvii. 17, 18). The pillar of fire was between the Israelites and the Egyptians: so where the latter, accustomed to see the flaming torches at the head of the host, supposed the van of the Israelites to be, there was really their rear. Misled, therefore, they forced their jaded horses onward, thinking they had already got into the very midst of the flying slaves. Under divine guidance, and perhaps miraculously hastened, the Israelites made the crossing in safety; but the Egyptians labored under unexpected difficulties. "At the morning watch the Lord looked unto the host of the Egyptians," and "troubled" (i.e., threw them into confusion), and "took off their chariot-wheels, so that they drove them heavily." The morning dawned. The Egyptians saw their slaves upon the bank, but saw also that the sea had broken its barrier, and was pouring in upon them. Amid groans and curses the pride of Egypt's army sank beneath the waves; while the Israelites sang their new song: "Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like unto Thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in raises, doing wonders?" "Thus the Lord saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians, and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the seashore."

For the after-route of Israel, see WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

EXORCISM.

EXORCISM (ἐξορκασμύς, "adjuration"), a solemn adjuration with the intent of expelling evil spirits. Our Lord cured many cases of demonic possession, and conferred the power to do the same upon his disciples (Matt. x. 8). They were, however, not always successful (Matt. xvii. 19). The Jews likewise professed to have the power of casting out evil spirits; and Josephus mentions that it was done in his day with the aid of roots and a ring, by which the demon was extracted through the nose.

In the early church, exorcism was regarded as a charism which belonged to all Christians. Tertullian (Apol. 38) lays it down as an indisputable fact that the simple command of a Christian was sufficient to expel evil spirits. Origens (Cont. Celsum, VII.) testifies to the same thing, and notices that no artificial incantations were used. At a later period the exorcist was one of the four inferior orders of the clergy, and received ordination (Apost. Const., VIII. 26). Bishop Cornelius of Rome (251) makes mention of this. The Roman-Catholic priesthood are still ordained exorcists before being ordained priests.

It was the practice to exorcise catechumens, on the principle that all who did not believe in Christ belonged to the Devil. In the case of children at baptism, the priest breathed upon the child. The name of Christ, or a simple passage of Scripture, was considered efficacious in exorcism.

The Greek and Latin Churches still use not only formulas of exorcism at baptism, but also practise it over those actually possessed. In the latter case the patient is first sprinkled with holy water, after which the priest says, "I exorcise thee, unclean spirit, in the name of Jesus Christ: tremble, O Satan, thou enemy of mankind," etc. The Calvinistic Churches, at the Reformation, renounced exorcism. But Luther and Melanchthon favored its retention, and the other Lutheran theologians followed them. Hesusiuus, in 1583, was the first to propose its omission, but was answered by Memus, in a tract (De Exorcismo), 1590. At present exorcism is given up; and the catechumens in the Lutheran Church says, "I renounce the devil and his works," etc. [The English Church retained exorcism in the Prayer-Book of Edward VI., the priest saying, "I command thee, unclean spirit, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, that thou come out and depart from this infant," etc. It was, however, omitted in the revised Prayer-Book; and the seventy-second canon of the Church of England expressly forbids any priest attempting to expel demons. See SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dict. Antiq.]

EXPECTANCY (expectatio, exspectatio, gratia exspectiva), in canon law, means a prospective claim to an ecclesiastical benefice, granted before the benefice has actually fallen vacant. This curious custom, of giving a man a successor before the vacancy to be filled, and by them developed very early in the medieval church, and not altogether without some good reasons. It proved an effective means of preventing a benefice from being kept vacant, during which vacancy its revenues fell into the hands of strangers; and it might also be successfully applied as a check to too narrow provincial interest in the appointment of ecclesiastical officers, whereby the general interest of the church was made to suffer. But it soon developed into a hideous cancer,—an opportunity for the meanest speculation, for greed, fraud, and violence. Already the Lateran Council of 1179 forbade this custom, but in vain. It was restricted by the Council of Constance, again forbidden by the Council of Basel, and finally abolished by the Council of Trent. Only in one case the Council of Trent still acknowledged it (Sess. 25 de reform. c. 7), in the case of the appointment of a coadjutor to a bishop with expectation of succession.

EXPIATION. See ATONEMENT.

EXPIATION, Feast of. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

EXSUPERIUS, Bishop of Toulouse in the latter half of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century, distinguished himself by the noble charity he showed during the frightful depredations of the Alani, Vandals, and Suevi, neglecting his own sufferings in order to administer to the sufferings of others. Jerome dedicated his commentary on the Prophet Zechariah to him. See Act. Sacr., Sept. 26.

EXTREME UNCTION (the rite of anointing the dying with oil) is the fifth of the seven sacraments of the Roman-Catholic Church. It is based upon Mark vi. 13 and Jas. v. 14, 15. In both these cases the rite is applied for the purpose of healing the sick, not in order to prepare them for death; which is the principal meaning of the sacrament in the Catholic Church. As for the fathers of the Greek Church, it will suffice to say that John of Damascus treats only of baptism and the Lord's Supper under the mysteries of the Church. Among the writers of the Western Church, Ireneus has been appealed to as the first witness to the existence of the institution; but Ireneus (I. 21, 5) simply says that the Harkleones, a Gnostic sect, anointed the dying with a mixture of oil and water to protect them from hostile spirits in the other world. This practice by no means implies, as Bellarmine and other Catholic theologians affirm, a church sacrament of which it was a perversion. Tertullian and Cyprian, who describe at length the customs of the Western Church, do not mention extreme unction, while they discuss the Lord's Supper and baptism at length.

The use of oil, however, for producing miraculous cures, is noticed by many of the Fathers. Tertullian (Ad Scap. 4) mentions that Proculus healed the Pagan Severus, the father of Antoninus, with oil. Popular superstition took hold of these cures, and went so far, that, as early as the fourth century, we find the people stealing the lamps from the churches in order to preserve the oil for miraculous cures (Chrysost., Hom. 32, in Math. vi.). They did the same with the baptismal water. This superstition was the germ of the subsequent sacramental idea of the church. The transition is apparent in a letter of Innocent I. (416) to Bishop Decentius of Eugubium, which expressly calls an oil a kind of sacrament (genus sacramenti). But the application of the oil was not confined to the priesthood: it was the prerogative of all Christians. From the close of the eighth century the rite is mentioned very frequently in the acts of councils. Theodulf of Orleans (788) and the first Council of Mayence (847) associate repentance and the Eucharist with it. The synod of Chalons (813) attributes spiritual as well as physical efficacy to the oil; and the synod of Regignicium (855) calls the rites a healthful sacrament (salutare sacramentum), of which one must partake by faith in order thereby to secure forgiveness of sins, and restoration of health. The question consequently arose in the twelfth century, whether the anointing could be repeated. Gottfried, Abbot of Vendome (1100), and Ivo, Bishop of Chartres, answered in the negative. The popular idea was, that those who received the oil must be healed in order to preserve thereby the earth with bare feet, to eat meat, etc. Councils spoke out against this superstition, but it contributed not a little to give to the act the solemn significance subsequently attached to it. For the first time in the twelfth century do the expressions "extreme unction" and "sacrament of the dying" occur.

Hugo de St. Victor (d. 1141) was the first to introduce its treatment into a theological system; and Peter Lombard gave it the fifth place among the seven sacraments (Sentent., iv. 23). Thomas of Aquinas developed at length the doctrinal definition and significance of the rite. Eugenius IV., at the Council of Florence (1439) and the Decrees of Trent (Sess. xiv.), gave the final definition of the Church. The latter declare extreme unction to be a real sacrament instituted by our Lord, and revealed by James.

The purpose of the sacrament has been variously stated. The first idea was, that it healed the body. Peter Lombard says that it serves for the "remission of sins and the alleviation of bodily infirmity." Albertus Magnus (in Lib. iv. 23, 14) held that it removed the remainder of sin unexpiated by penance, or unwashed away by baptism; and Aquinas defined these remainders as spiritual weakness. He says that the physical restoration is only a secondary end. The Council of Trent states that the purpose of the sacrament is "to confer grace, and heal the sick."

The oil of anointing is consecrated by the bishop, and the act of anointing is alone performed by the priest. The Council of Mayence (847) limited its application to those in peril of death. The Roman Catechism confines it to the very sick, but denies it to children, and criminals condemned to death. Thomas of Aquinas held that the eyes, ears, nose, mouth, hands, reins, and feet should be anointed.

The Greek Church calls the sacrament euchelaison ("prayer" and "oil"), and gives it the seventh place among the sacraments. The consecration of the oil is the prerogative of the priest; and the rite, which may be repeatedly administered, is only in extreme cases applied in private dwellings. In all other points its practice and definition agree with those of the Latin Church. [The late Bishop Forbes of Brechin (d. 1875), in his exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, calls "the anointing of the sick the lost pleiad of the Anglican sacrament."]

LIT.—Besides the writings of the scholastic theologians mentioned above, see DALLEUS: De duobus Latinorum ex Unctione Sacramentis, etc., Genes., 1659; LAUNOY: De Sacramentis Unctionis agroratus, Paris, 1873. STEITZ.

EYLERT, Redlemeister Friedrich, b. April 5, 1770, at Hamm, in Westphalia, where his father was preacher of the Reformed congregation, and professor of theology; d. at his estate, near Hamburg, Feb. 8, 1852; studied theology at Halle, where he became a pupil of Niemeyer; and became preacher at Hamm in 1794, court-preacher at Potsdam, 1806, superintendent, 1817, and afterwards member of the Council. He was a prolific writer; but his greatest influence he exercised as the confidential adviser and intimate friend of Friedrich Wilhelm III. His best-known and most widely read work is his Charakterzüge und historische Fragmente aus dem Leben Friedrich Wilhelm, 1844, 3 vols. He also published collections of sermons, and devotional books of a general description, and wrote in support of the attempted union of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches within the Prussian dominion.

THOLUCK."
EZEKIEL (God will strengthen, or the strength of God), one of the prophets of the exile. He was the son of Buzi, and a priest (Ezek. i. 3). He lived in his own house (iii. 24, viii. 1), on the River Chebar, near Tel Abib, among the captives whom Nebuchadnezzar had deported with King Jehoiachin. He was arrested, as we learn incidentally (xxiv. 18). He prophesied from the fifth to at least the twenty-fifth year of the captivity (594-572 B.C.). The statement of Josephus (Ant. X., 6, 3), that he was only a boy when carried to Babylon, is rendered improbable by the date of the close of his prophetic activity, which we assume to have been the probable date of his death. This would have made him quite young at the time of his death. Although the exiles at times took offence at his prophecies (ii. 9), he was held in high esteem by them (viii. 1, xiv. 1 sqq., xx. 1, etc.). This is the extent of our reliable traditions speak of a meeting between Ezekiel and Pythagoras, of various miracles, and a death of martyrdom. His pretended tomb was held in high esteem by them (viii. 1, xiv. 1 sqq., xx. 1, etc.). This is the extent of our reliable traditions speak of a meeting between Ezekiel and Pythagoras, of various miracles, and a death of martyrdom. His pretended tomb was shown near Bagdad, where an autographic copy of his writings was preserved, and in which the Chaldeans built a shrine. In the vision of the dry bones gathered together and revived, the prophet sees the new spiritual creation which the Lord will accomplish upon his people (xxxvi. vii.). The final peril of Israel in the campaign of Gog is depicted in the vision of the Chaldean eagle plucks away; but God will plant another twig therefrom. He justifies God's punishment of Jerusalem, which is compared to a robbed lion's lair (xxxvii. 1 sqq.), the description of the stream of living waters flowing out from the temple, and the new parceling out of the land among the tribes. The prophecies of Ezekiel are to be traced to the peculiar position of the author in Chaldea. Separated as he was from Jerusalem and the excitement of passing events, his prophecies differ from those of the other prophets (Jeremiah, for example), in that they are not adapted to arouse immediate activity, but to immediate action, is play more care in preparation, and give evidence of retirement and reflection. The short stirring appeal is not often heard; but in its stead there is a calm treatment of the subject in hand. Compare, for example, the extended description of the vision in chap. i. with the brief outline of the analogous vision of Isaiah (vi.). Ezekiel delights to give perfect pictures. His symbolism and imagery are rich, but here and there so enigmatical as to have frequently discouraged both Jewish and Christian expositors, and to have led the Jews to forbid their people from reading it before they had reached the thirty-third year. But the prophet is a master in the description of the grand and sublime; and many passages are examples of the finest lyric and elegiac poetry; as, for example, the lamentation for the princes of Zion (xix. 1 sqq.), the description of the fall of Tyre (xxvi. 15-xxvii.), the dirge over Pharaoh, represented under the image of the crocodile (xxiii. i sqq.), etc. Although he excels as an author, he is not to be regarded as never having spoken his prophecies. His popular eloquence is expressly attested in chap. xxxiii. 30 sqq. And, in the absence of immediate activity, there are man references to the peculiar position of the author in Chaldea. Separated as he was from Jerusalem and the excitement of passing events, his prophecies differ from those of the other prophets (Jeremiah, for example), in that they are not adapted to arouse immediate action, but to immediate action, is play more care in preparation, and give evidence of retirement and reflection. The short stirring appeal is not often heard; but in its stead there is a calm treatment of the subject in hand. Compare, for example, the extended description of the vision in chap. i. with the brief outline of the analogous vision of Isaiah (vi.). Ezekiel delights to give perfect pictures. His symbolism and imagery are rich, but here and there so enigmatical as to have frequently discouraged both Jewish and Christian expositors, and to have led the Jews to forbid their people from reading it before they had reached the thirty-third year. But the prophet is a master in the description of the grand and sublime; and many passages are examples of the finest lyric and elegiac poetry; as, for example, the lamentation for the princes of Zion (xix. 1 sqq.), the description of the fall of Tyre (xxvi. 15-xxvii.), the dirge over Pharaoh, represented under the image of the crocodile (xxiii. i sqq.), etc. Although he excels as an author, he is not to be regarded as never having spoken his prophecies. His popular eloquence is expressly attested in chap. xxxiii. 30 sqq. And, in the absence of immediate activity, there are man references to Jeremiah, he shows the influence of the Mosaic legislation (comp. chaps. xiii.—xvi.), and the history of the case (comp. Gen. i. 28 with Ezek. xxviii. 13, xxxi. 8 sqq., xxxvi. 35, and Gen. i. 28 with Ezek. xxxvi. 11).

The spiritual and theological teachings of the book. The characteristic of Ezekiel is, that he taught as an exile in a foreign land, and lived in a period of disintegration, he points to a better time in the future. Jeremiah, he shows the influence of the Mosaic legislation (xlv. sq.). But it was his purpose to revise it, or he would have made some reference to the ark of the covenant, which were to receive portions west of the Jordan.

Ezra does not re-appear again for thirteen years (Neh. viii.). The narrative is ere suddenly broken off, and the last part of Nehemiah, are the only reliable sources of his life. He was of high priestly descent (Ex. vii. 1). With Artaxerxes' consent he led an expedition to Jerusalem (458 B.C.).

The Christian Church has also found difficulty in distinguishing between that which was merely Jewish in the prophecies, and that which is Messianic. Less clear than in the other prophetic references must impress us all the more when we bear in mind the prophet's separation from Jerusalem (see xii. 12 sqq., xvi. 23 sqq., xlii. 2, etc.). But Ezekiel restored again in the picture of his visions the old institutions of the temple, and in a pure form. In these descriptions his priestly training shows itself; but he did not, in his concern for the outward form, overlook the ethical and spiritual. In chap. xviii. he urges the double duty of honoring God, and loving our neighbor, and reminds his hearers of their individual and personal responsibility. He insists upon the necessity of a new heart (xi. 19 sqq., xxxvi. 25 sqq.). God's glory is the ultimate end of the restoration of Jerusalem (xxxvi. 22), and his aim not to destroy, but to revive, his sinful people (xxxiii. 11). It is the prophet's peculiarity that his eye is directed not so much to the personal representatives as to the kingdom itself, where the glory of God should dwell in the midst of a holy nation of priests, serving him (xlii. 7). The description is given in the last eight chapters, and stands alone in the Old Testament. The vision here recorded of the temple is not of a mere building, although the architectural proportions given are exact. He passes beyond the material edifice to an ideal temple with its waters of life (xlvii.).

The book is, nevertheless, a prophecy of the new covenant of grace in the language of the old covenant of the law. The complete consummation of the kingdom of God on earth, however, alone can reveal how far the form in which Ezekiel clothes it was mere shadow, how far an adequate picture of that perfect manifestation. (For the influence of Ezekiel on the Apocalypse, see Revelation.)

V. ORELLI.

EZEKIEL.

791

EZRA.

791

LIT. — Besides the Introductions to the O. T.,
by EICHORN, DE WETTE, BLEEK, KEIL, DAVIDSON, REUSE, see the Commentaries by HÄVERNICK (Erlang., 1843); HITZIG (Berlin, 1869); REFOH (Weimar, 1864, 1865, 2 parts); HENGSTENBERG (Berlin, 1868, 2 parts, Eng. trans. Edinb., 1869); KEIL (Leipzig, 1868, 2d ed., 1882, Eng. trans., Edinb., 1876, 2 vols.); ZÖCKLER, in Lange (Bielefeld, 1873, Eng. trans., New York, 1876); SMEND (Leipzig, 1880); (English) by PATRICK FAIRBAIRN (Edinb., 1851, 3d ed., 1863); HENDERSON (London, 1855, reprinted Andover, 1870); COULNES (N.Y., 1887); CURRIE, in the Speaker's Comm. (London and N.Y., 1876). — LEHR: Les trois grands prophètes, Paris, 1877. Special Works. — SOLOMON BENNETT: Temple of Ezekiel, London, 1824; W. NEUMANN: D. Wasserl. Lebens (exposition of Ezek. xlvii. 1–12), Berlin, 1849; BALMER-RINCK: D. Prophet Ezechiel's Gesicht v. Tempel, Rudwigsb., 1858. For homiletical treatment, see Guthrie's Gospel in Ezekiel.

E'ZION-QAS'BER, or OESEB (giant's backbone), a city in the neighborhood of Edath, mentioned as the last station of Israel before entering the Wilderness of Zin (Num. xxxiii. 35; Deut. ii. 8), and as the navy station of Solomon (1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Chron. vii. 17) and Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 40); but its precise site has not been identified.

EZ'RA (help), priest, scribe (Neh. viii. 1, 2), and reformer of the period succeeding the Babylonish captivity. The book which bears his name, and the latter part of Nehemiah, are the only reliable sources of his life. He was of high priestly descent (Ex. vii. 1). With Artaxerxes' consent he led an expedition to Jerusalem (458 B.C.). He must have been held in esteem at court; for the king intrusted him with authority to appoint magistrates and judges, and with the power of life and death in Jerusalem (vii. 12–20). At the River Ahava (vii. 15) he gathered the members of the expedition together, and ordered a fast and prayer for divine protection. Arriving in Jerusalem, he delivered up the gifts the king had sent to the temple and his commissions to the Persian officials (viii. 30). He was grieved to find that his countrymen had intermarried with women of other nationalities, and succeeded in inducing them to put away their "strange wives." The narrative is here suddenly broken off, and Ezra does not re-appear again for thirteen years (Neh. viii.). The conjecture has been made, that he returned to Persia during the interval; but nothing certain is known. He performed priestly functions after his return. The time of his death is not noticed. Ezra marks an epoch in the study of the Mosaic law. He made that study the employment of his own life (vii. 10), and was thus led to become a scribe of the law (vii. 11). He had about him a cos of helpers (Neh. vii. 26), with whose aid he read the law; and he had some help in expounding it. The pulpit first made its appearance in connection with him (Neh. viii. 4), and became the original of those synagogical desks from which Jewish rabbins in succeeding centuries read and interpreted the history and sacred writings of Israel. He was afterwards looked up to with reverence by the scribes as the founder of their order. According to Kuenen and others, Ezra was the author of a large share of the Pentateuch,—the so-called priestly Torah. According to the somewhat modified view of Professor W. R. Smith (The O. T. in the Jewish Church, chap. ix), he at least “gave the last touches to the ritual” of the Pentateuch, which he calls the “Canon of Ezra.” (See Pentateuch.) Tradition, which is rich in details of Ezra’s life, once says that he restored the entire Pentateuch (which had been lost), either from memory, or by special inspiration. In another place it describes him as the president of the great synagogue, and the collector and editor of the canon. The latter is made very probable when we remember the intense interest he had aroused in the law. In this interest a desire to have the writings of the history of Ezra only the general editor, and the collector and editor of the canon. The latter is made very probable when we remember the intense interest he had aroused in the law. In this interest a desire to have the writings of the history described by Keil, Schultz in Lange’s Commentary, Rawlinson in the Speaker’s Commentary, etc.) in its favor the opening words of Nehemiah: “The words of Nehemiah,” etc. Their union in the Hebrew canon may be explained by the fact that they are chronicles of one and the same general period of restoration.

The Authorship.—It is not disputed that Ezra wrote chaps. vii. 27—ix. He here speaks in the first person. The preceding portion of the book and chap. x. have been attributed to other authors. The reasons urged are the laudatory reference to Ezra in chap. vii. 6, and the use of the third person instead of the first (vi. 6, 11, x. 1). But examples of such transitions are found both in other portions of Scripture (comp. Isai. vii. 1—16 with vii. 1, etc., also Dan. vi. 4 with vii. 2) and in profane writers (e.g., Thucydides, comp. Hist. I. 1 with I. 20—22, etc.); and the notice of vii. 6 is not so laudatory but that a modest man might have written it. The second objection would be equally valid were Ezra only the general editor, which it is generally acknowledged he was. The reasons are not sufficient to overthrow the traditional view, which is defended by Keil (Einleitung), Lange, Rawlinson (Speaker’s Commentary), etc. That Ezra was the author of the whole work. The text of Ezra is in a bad condition, and many variant readings exist. Portions of the work are in Chaldee (iv. 8—vi. 13, and the decree of Artaxerxes, xii. 22—28). The language bears a close resemblance to that of the Chronicles and Daniel.

Lit.—See Introductions to the Old Testament by Bleek, Keil, Reuss, etc., and Commentaries by Bertheau (Leipzig, 1862), Keil (Leipzig, 1870, Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1873), Canon Rawlinson in the Speaker’s Commentary (Lond. and N.Y., 1873), Schultz in Lange (Bielefeld, 1876, Eng. trans., N.Y., 1879), Rosenzweig (Berlin, 1876), B. Neteler (Münster, 1877), also art. Ezra, by Bishop Hervey, in Smith’s Bible Dict. D. S. Schaff.
FABER, Basilius, b. at Sorau, in Nether-Susatia, 1520; d. at Erfurt, 1575 or 1576; studied at Wittenberg; was a teacher in Nordhausen, Tennstadt, and Magdeburg, and became rector of the school of Quedlinburg in 1560, but, being a strict Lutheran of the Flacian wing, he refused to sign the Corpus Doctrine Philippicum as a crypto-Calvinistic innovation, and was discharged in 1570. Next year, however, he was made rector of the gymnasium of Erfurt, where he remained till his death. Besides some writings of pedagogical interest,—Theesaurus eruditionis scholasticae (1571)—he translated Luther's commentary on Genesis into German (1557), was a contributor to the Magdeburg Centuries (1557–60), and published some eschatological tracts.

FABER, or FABRI, Felix, b. at Zurich, 1441 or 1442; d. at Ulm, March 14 or May 15, 1502; studied theology at Basel; entered the Dominican order in 1472, and was made lector and preacher at the cloister of Ulm in 1478. Twice he visited the Holy Land (1480 and 1483–84); and his principal work is Evagatorium in Terra Sancta, Arabica et Egyptian peregrinationem, edited by Hasler, Stuttgart, 1843–49, 3 vols. He also wrote a Historia Suevorum, edited by Goldast, Frankfort, 1605, Ulm, 1727. He was bright, and a good observer, but very credulous, and too fond of curiosities. His Latin is of an exceptionally canine description.

FABER, Frederick William, a Catholic theologian, and distinguished hymn-writer, of Huguenot ancestry; b. June 28, 1814, at the Vicarage of Calverley, nr., of which his grandfather, Thomas Faber, was the incumbent; d. Sept. 26, 1863. He was educated at Oxford, and became fellow and tutor of Lincoln College. In 1801 he delivered the Bampton Lectures, which appeared under the title of Horae Monasticae. In 1803 he left the university, and was vicar at various places, till he was made prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral (1831), and master of Sherburn Hospital (1832). He was a man of varied erudition, and a voluminous author of theological works; among these the principal are, The Origin of Pagan Idolatry, 3 vols. (1818), Difficulties of Romanism (1826), Sacred Calendar of Prophecy, 3 vols. (1828), and Papal Infallibility (1851).

FABER, George Stanley, D.D., an English divine, and uncle of the former; b. Oct. 25, 1778; d. Jan. 27, 1854. He was educated at Oxford, and became fellow and tutor of Lincoln College. In 1801 he delivered the Bampton Lectures, which appeared under the title of Horae Monasticae. In 1803 he left the university, and was vicar at various places, till he was made prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral (1831), and master of Sherburn Hospital (1832). He was a man of varied erudition, and a voluminous author of theological works; among these the principal are, The Origin of Pagan Idolatry, 3 vols. (1818), Difficulties of Romanism (1826), Sacred Calendar of Prophecy, 3 vols. (1828), and Papal Infallibility (1851).

FABER, Johannes, is the name of several Roman Catholic theologians of the sixteenth century, whose persons and writings are often confounded.

—I. Johannes Faber of Leutkirch (called Malteus Harreticorum, from the book named below), b. at Leutkirch, in Suabia, 1478; d. in Vienna, May 21, 1541; studied theology and canon law at Tubingen and Freiburg-im-Bruesgau; and was vicar-general of the diocese of Constance (1518); chaplain and confessor to King Ferdinand (1524); and Bishop of Vienna (1531). He belonged originally to the humanistic and liberal party, and maintained friendly relations to Erasmus, Zwingli, and Melancthon. In 1520 he corresponded with Zwingli in a cordial and familiar manner; in 1521 he openly disapproved of Eck and his manoeuvres; but in the same year he made a journey to Rome in order to straighten some difficult money matters, and he returned as one of the busiest and most violent adversaries of the Reformation and the Reformers. He wrote against Luther Opus adversus nova quaedam domata Lutheri (Malteus in haresin Lutheranam), and, in defence of celibacy and the papal authority, Pro celibatu and De potestate papae contra Lutherum. He fought on the Roman side in the conferences and disputations; and he was active in burning people in Austria and Hungary (Kaspar Tauber and Balthasar Hubmeier). Of his works there is a collected edition in 3 vols. fol., Cologne, 1537–41, and a minor collection containing only his polemical writings, Leipzig, 1538. See C. E. Kettnner: De J. Fabri vita scriptisque, Leipzig, 1737.—II. Johannes Faber Augustanus, d. about 1530; was b. at Freiburg, in the latter half of the fifteenth century; entered the Dominican order, and was made prior of the monastery of Augsburg in 1515, professor of theology at Bologna in 1516, confessor to the Emperor Maximilian I., and afterwards counsellor to Charles V. He was a friend of Erasmuse, and in favor of lenient proceedings against Lutheran; but he afterwards changed his mind, and became a harsh adversary of the Reformation. His funeral oration over Maximilian I. (Jan. 10, 1519) is the only work he has left. — III. Johannes Faber of Heilbronn was b. at Heilbronn, on the Neckar, 1504; studied theology and philosophy at Cologne; entered the Dominican order, and was made preacher at a cathedral of Cologne, 1526. The date of his death is unknown. He was a bitter adversary of the Reformation, and wrote Quod fides esse posit sine caritate (1548), Enchiridion bibliorum (1549), Fructus quibus dig-noscitur haretici (1551), etc. — WAGENMANN.

FABER, or FAVRE, Pierre François, b. at St. Barthelemy, in the canton of Vaud; was minister of Laudun, in Lower Languedoc; accompanied Francis de la Baume, Bishop of Haliacarnassus, on his tour of visitation to Cochino-China, as his secretary and confessor; and published in 1746 his Lettres écrites, et curieuses sur la visite apostolique de M. de la Baume à la Cochinchine en 1740, which gives a report of the abominable manner in which the Jesuits pushed the mission in those regions, and the infamous intrigues with which they tried to cover up their misdemeanors. The book was condemned by the Bishop of Lausanne, and publicly burnt at Freiburg; and the Jesuits bought up every copy they could reach. Large extracts of the work are found in SIMLER, Urtkunden zur Beleuchtung der Kirchengeschichte, I., pp. 159—256. — STEITZ.

FABER STAPULENSIS, Jacobus (Jacques Le-fere d'Etapes), b. at Etapes, a village in Picardy, 1450; d. at Nérac, 1536; studied in Paris; visited Florence, Rome, and Venice; and began, after his return to Paris, to lecture on Aristotle, and to publish Latin translations, and paraphrases of the Aristotelian writings. From 1507 to 1520 he lived in the Benedictine abbey of St. Germain des Prés, near Paris, where his friend Briçonnet was abbot; and while here he began to study the Bible. The first result of this study was his Psalterium quintuplex, 1508; then followed, in 1612, his commentary on the Pauline Epistles, in 1522, on the Gospels; and in 1523, on the Catholic Epistles. A critical essay (De Maria Magdalena) which he published in 1517 gave the authorities occasion for an accusation of heresy; and Noël Bédier, syndic of the theological faculty of Paris, had the book formally condemned by a decree of Parliament, Nov. 9, 1521. Bédier, who suspected a secret Lutheran in Faber, wanted to institute further proceedings against him, but was prevented by the interference of Francis I. and Marguerite of Navarre in his behalf. In 1523 Briçonnet, who in the mean time had become Bishop of Basanz, made him his vicar-general; and in the same year he published his French translation of the New Testament, which spread rapidly, not only in his own diocese, but all over France, and produced a deep impression. But after the battle of Pavia (Feb. 24, 1525), and the imprisonment of Francis I. in Madrid, the Parliament and the Sorbonne felt to employ more vigorous measures against the reformation movement. Several of the clergymen appointed by Briçonnet were accused of heresy: some of them recanted. Pauvant was burnt: Faber fled to Strassburg. After the release of Francis I., he was recalled, and made librarian in the royal castle of Blois; but even then he was not safe: after publishing his translation of the Old Testament, he retired to Nérac, the residence of Marguerite of Navarre, where he died. He had, indeed, espoused all the chief principles of the Reformation, and applied them with vigor in his writings; but he remained in the Roman Church, hoping, perhaps, to attach heretics within any violent concussion. For open fight with hostile powers he was completely unfit. He was not unlike Melanchthon, but he had no Luther by his side.

Lit. — Graf: Essai sur la vie et les écrits de Leferre d'Etapes, Strassburg, 1842, and an elaborate biography in Zeitschrift für histor. Theologie, 1852, 1 and 2. C. SCHMIDT.

FABER TANAQUIL. See LEFEBVRE TAN-

FABRIC, the nineteenth bishop of Rome (286—296), according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VI. 29), incidentally present at the election after the death of Anterus, and was unanimously chosen, because a dove came down from heaven and rested on his head. Of his reign nothing is known with certainty. In Cyprian’s Letters to his successor, Cornelius, he is often mentioned with respect.

FABRICA ECCLESIE, a technical term referring to the provision made for the maintenance of the fabric of the church,—its buildings, furnishing, utensils, etc. In the latter part of the fifth century, Simplicius, and after him Gelasius, ordered that one-fourth of the whole revenue of a church should be put aside for this purpose, and afterwards the matter became the subject of a very varied and intricate, but wholly local, legislation. Thus, in the grand duchy of Baden, it is the rule that the nave and roof are kept in repair by the treasury of the church, the choir by the minister, the walls and outer buildings by him who enjoys the tithes, and the tower by the parish.

FABRICIUS, Johann, b. at Altorf, Feb. 11, 1644; d. at Helmstedt, Jan. 29, 1729; studied at Altorf and Helmstedt; travelled in Germany and Italy; and in 1702, on the Catholics, and in 1705, on the Catholic Theo-

FABRIUS, Johannes Albert, b. at Leipzig, Nov. 11, 1808; d. at Hamburg, April 3, 1793; studied theology at Quedlinburg, and was made professor of rhetoric and moral philosophy at Hamburg in 1808. He was a very prolific writer, especially on literary history and bibliography, in which branches his principal works are: Bibli-

FABRISMUS, in favor of lenient proceedings against Lutheran; but he afterwards changed his mind, and became a harsh adversary of the Reformation. His funeral oration over Maximilian I. (Jan. 10, 1519) is the only work he has left. — III. Johannes Faber of Heilbronn was b. at Heilbronn, on the Neckar, 1504; studied theology and philosophy at Cologne; entered the Dominican order, and while here he began to study the Bible. The first result of this study was his Psalterium quintuplex, 1508; then followed, in 1612, his commentary on the Pauline Epistles, in 1522, on the Gospels; and in 1523, on the Catholic Epistles. A critical essay (De Maria Magdalena) which he published in 1517 gave the authorities occasion for an accusation of heresy; and Noël Bédier, syndic of the theological faculty of Paris, had the book formally condemned by a decree of Parliament, Nov. 9, 1521. Bédier, who suspected a secret Lutheran in Faber, wanted to institute further proceedings against him, but was prevented by the interference of Francis I. and Marguerite of Navarre in his behalf. In 1523 Briçonnet, who in the mean time had become Bishop of Basanz, made him his vicar-general; and in the same year he published his French translation of the New Testament, which spread rapidly, not only in his own diocese, but all over France, and produced a deep impression. But after the battle of Pavia (Feb. 24, 1525), and the imprisonment of Francis I. in Madrid, the Parliament and the Sorbonne felt to employ more vigorous measures against the reformation movement. Several of the clergymen appointed by Briçonnet were accused of heresy: some of them recanted. Pauvant was burnt: Faber fled to Strassburg. After the release of Francis I., he was edited by Harless, 1790-1811; Bibliotheca Latina (3 vols., 1697), new edition, 1721, 1722, continued by the Bibliotheca Latina, medii et infima aetas (5 vols., Hamburg, 1734-38); and the Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica (1718). More special theological interest have his Codex Apocryphus N. T. (1703, 2 vols.) and Codex Pseudopigraphus V. T. (1713), which have not been made superfluous by the labors of Thilo, Tischendorf, Volkmar, and Hilgenfeld. He also wrote a Hydrotheologie (1730) and a Pyrotheologie (1732), which now strike the reader as very curious, but suited the taste of his time, and were translated into other languages.
FACULTY. 795

FAITH.

FACULTY usually means some power, inborn or cultivated, and, in the special sense, a body of men to whom is given the right to teach a particular science (thus we have the faculties of theology, law, medicine, and philosophy); but it is also a technical term of canon law denoting the transference of a certain power of ecclesiastical jurisdiction from the original holder to a subordinate officer for the purpose of speedier execution. The earliest cases in which such faculties were granted occurred in the middle ages, when the Pope transferred a certain measure of his power to the missionary on account of his necessary independence of papal oversight through his distance from Rome. Later on, in the sixteenth century, similar faculties were granted to the papal nuncios as a means of insuring a prompter enforcement of the canons of the Council of Trent, and of giving strength and energy to the Roman-Catholic mission in Protestant Germany. As, under these circumstances, conflicts would now and then arise between the papal nuncios and the bishops, the latter generally received the same faculties, though only for a certain length of time; as, for instance, five years (facultates quinquennales). Bishops may also grant faculties, transferring to their vicars-general, officials, deacons, or priests, some measure either of their own authority (auctoritas ordinaria or propriis), or of that granted to them by the Pope (auctoritas apostolica). See PAPAL NUNCIO.

MEJEL.

The word is used in England in the sense of a special officer given to be of the table by law, who was not to be done. Under the Archbishop of Canterbury there is a special court, called the "Court of Faculties," presided over by the "Master of Faculties," which has the power to grant these dispensations; usually for such purposes as marriages without previous asking of the bishops, ordinations of deacons under age, the succession to a benefice on the part of the clergyman's son, etc. In this court are also registered the certificates of bishops and noblemen granted to their chaplains to qualify them for pluralities and non-residence.

FAGNANI, Prosper, b. 1598; d. in Rome, 1678; practised as an advocate with great success in Rome; was for fifteen years secretary to the Congregatio Conc. Trid. Interprett, and afterwards professor in canon law at the academy of Rome. On the instance of Alexander VII. he wrote a commentary on the decretals, 1651, which has been often republished, and is frequently appealed to by the canonists. He was blind from his forty-fourth year.

FAIRBAIRN, Patrick, b. at Greenlaw, Berwickshire, Scotland, January, 1806; d. at Glasgow, Aug. 6, 1874. He was graduated at the University of Edinburgh, and after many years' pastoral experience was professor at Aberdeen, and, from 1856 to his death, principal, and professor of systematic theology and New-Testament exegesis, in the Free Church Theological College at Glasgow. Principal Fairbairn was one of the firmest of the Free Church. His scholarship was respectable, and his books, especially the Typology, are useful. In person he was of commanding figure. His principal works, which are published in Edinburgh, are, The Typology of Scripture, 1847, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1860; Ezekiel and his Books of Prophecy, 1851, 4th ed., 1876; Prophecy viewed in its Distinctive Nature, its Special Functions, and its Proper Interpretation, 1856, 2d ed., 1866; Hermeneutical Manual, 1858; Revelation of Law in Scripture, 1868; The Pastoral Epistles, 1874; Pastoral Theology, with a Biographical Sketch of the Author, 1875. He also edited The Imperial Bible Dictionary, London, 1867, 2 vols. royal 8vo, and translated, in part, Schrader's Commentary upon Ezekiel, in the American edition by Lange, N.Y., 1876.

FAITH (fiahte). All personal relations in human life rest on faith. I can respect no one, unless I believe him possessed of some affinity to me, naturally in the blood, or spiritually in the mind. In human life, faith is the connecting link between man and man. Thereby it becomes the latent source from which all individual development springs, mental and spiritual. Man was made just as the impious that makes the man. He who has lost his power of faith, his faculty of belief, is dead. But in no relation is this more true than in man’s relation to God.
FALASHAS. 796

With respect to its form, faith is not a simple opinion formed by the intellect, and differing from cognition only by the subjective character of its evidences. The Church distinguishes between a fides historica (“historic faith”) and a fides salutifica (“saving faith”). The latter is a movement of the heart, of all the fundamental powers of the soul, of the very roots of the personality; and hence it is propagated to all the branches: it involves knowledge, it stirs up the feelings, it acts upon the will. Knowledge, assent, and trust are all demanded in faith according to the doctrine of the Evangelical Church. None of them can be entirely missing; but their measure may be very different, according to the different standpoint of the individual.

The object of faith cannot be seen by the eyes, nor can it be grasped by the understanding: it belongs to the realm of the invisible, the spiritual, the divine (Heb. x. 1, 6; 1 Pet. i. 8; 2 Cor. v. 10; John xx. 26). But this invisible, spiritual, divine, is not something unknowable: it proves itself to the inner man. The absolute object of faith is the revelation of God to mankind, originating in his love, and making his holiness manifest: and the centre of this revelation, the true fulfilment in relation to which all preceding preparations are only accommodations to the susceptibility of the race (Luke xxiv. 25, 26; Heb. i.), is the incarnation of God in Christ. Faith, in the absolute sense of the word, is therefore a personal and spiritual union with Christ, through which we become one with him, as he is one with the Father.

This union with Christ man cannot accomplish by his own efforts: God himself must awaken the new life in his soul (John vi. 29; 1 Cor. ii. 5). It is the Holy Spirit who works the faith in the heart; and the means by which he does this is the preaching of the word of grace (Rom. x. 17; 1 Cor. i. 21). The soul can prepare itself for the coming of the new life by abandoning all confidence in itself and in the world, and by breaking all the selfish instincts under which it labors; and when, by repentance, it has made itself a fit receptacle for the work of the Holy Spirit, that movement of the heart will follow which is the faith,— the faith by which sins are forgiven (Acts xxvi. 15).

FALASHAS (exiles), a people in Abyssinia, who are either Jews, or, more probably, descendants of proselytes to Judaism, and whose belief and practice is a mixture of Judaism and Paganism. There is no authentic information when they came into the country. They pretend to belong to the tribe of Levi, but their appearance is not Jewish. That they were early converted to Judaism is manifest from their ignorance of both the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmud, of the fringed praying-scarf (tallith), of phylacteries, and of the Feasts of Purim and Dedication. They are also entirely ignorant of Hebrew; yet they possess in Geez the canonical and apocryphal books of the Old Testament; a volume of extracts from the Pentateuch, with comments given to Moses by the Lord, upon Mount Sinai; the Laws of the Sabbath; the Ārādīt, a book of secrets revealed to twelve saints, which is used as a charm against disease; lives of Abraham, Moses, etc.; and a translation of Josephus, called Sana Aḥlud. They practise circumcision; fast every Monday and Thursday, every new moon, and on the Passover; keep the Sabbath with such strictness that they will not even put on their clothes upon it; and observe the Feasts of the Passover. The Ingathering, Tabernacles (although they do not build booths), the Day of Assembly, and Abraham’s Day. But joined to these Jewish rites are Pagan ones, such as the shedding of the blood of a sheep or a fowl in a new house in order to render it inhabitable, the use of fire in purification of unchastity, and the worship of the goddess Sanbat, really the Sabbath rite, which it is said can be easily recognized by the red clay pots on the tops of their synagogues. Their exact number is unknown,—perhaps about a hundred and fifty thousand. See FALASHAS of Abyssinia (trans. from the German), London, 1890; J. HALLER: Trachten in Abyssinia (trans. from the French), London, 1878.

FALK LAWS, The (also called the "May Laws"), is the name generally applied to a series of laws carried through the Prussian diet, in the period between 1872 and 1875, by Dr. Falk, at that time Minister of Cultus and Public Instruction and Sanitary Affairs in Prussia. In March, 1872, the first of these laws was passed, transferring the superintendence of the primary schools from the Church to the State, by ordering that the school-inspector should be a layman. In June followed a ministerial order, prohibiting the members of religious orders to teach in the schools, and thereby still further limiting the influence of the Roman-Catholic clergy on the school. Next, the laws of November, 1872, and March, 1873, materially narrowed the bishop's power over the inferior clergy, and the clergy's power over the pews. The ecclesiastical law of the country was radically changed; and at the same time a royal ecclesiastical court was established, enabling the government to deal in an effective manner with refractory bishops. A law of March, 1874, made civil marriage obligatory; and another, of April, 1875, required the bishop and clergy to sign a declaration of obedience to the laws of the State, before entering upon office. At the same time laws were passed forbidding the religious orders living within the borders of the Prussian dominion to receive new members, and transferring the control of the church property of a parish to a board of trustees of laymen.

In the so-called Kulturkampf those laws played a most prominent part; that is, in the contest between the feeling of national independence so deeply roused in Germany by the Franco-Prussian war, and the ambitious aspirations of the Roman church, the church property being denounced by the council of the Vatican and the promulgation of the dogma of papal infallibility. They originated, as simple acts of self-defence, from the side of the State; and it was repeatedly declared, both by Dr. Falk and Prince Bismarck, that, within the State, every confession (church) should have freedom to move and develop, but none of the opportunity of crippling the actions of the State, by opposing the secular power for particular denominational purposes, or of eluding its civil duties, under pretence of some religious precept. "We will never go to Canossa" (Nach Canossa gehen wir nicht) said the chancellor, May 14, 1872. The Ultramontane party, however, among the Roman-Catholic clergy in Germany, was very far from viewing the Falk Laws as merely defensive measures. On the contrary, it considered them as evidences and means of an intolerable tyranny; and encouraged by the Pope, whose encyclical of 1874 declared the laws null and void, the party adopted a policy of bitter and unflinching opposition. Several bishops were banished from their sees; and other sees, which became vacant by death, remained vacant. A turn, however, took place in the course of affairs when Pius IX. died, in 1878. Prince Bismarck had observed more than once during the contest, that, as the so-called May Laws were merely defensive measures, it would be possible to abandon them, or at least to modify them, when once again there reigned a "peaceable pope" in Rome; and, indeed, immediately after the accession of Leo XIII., negotiations concerning a modus vivendi between Germany and the Pope were begun, and seem, on account of reciprocal concessions, likely to succeed. See Ludwig Hahn: Geschichte des Kulturkampfes, Berlin, 1881; and the addresses by Leopold Witte and August Dorner, in Evangelical Alliance Conference, 1873, New York, 1874.

FALL OF MAN. See SIN.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS (from the Latin familia, "a household servant") were the spirits supposed to be at the service of the necromancers, by which they divined, and wrought their spells (Lev. xx. 27; Deut. xviii. 11; 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 8, and many other places).

FAMILIÆRES is the name of certain lay members of monasteries, such as servants, mechanics, etc., generally admitted as members of the community through certain religious rites. As in the middle ages they often proved the very channels through which worldly tendencies were introduced into the monasteries, several popes insisted upon their complete separation from the monks and the monastic community.

FAMILIÆS OF THE INQUISITION, the officers who arrested suspected persons. Their name came from the circumstance that they formed part of the inquisitor's family. They were often men of rank; and peculiar spiritual privileges, such as indulgences, were attached to the position.

FAMILISTS, Familia Charitatis, Huis de Liefde, a sect founded by a certain Henry Nicholas, a native of Münster, who, after living for some time in Holland, came to England under the reign of Edward VI. His efforts to make proselytes seem at first to have succeeded quite well: even theologians were found willing to listen to his ideas. But in 1580 Elizabeth ordered an investigation, and after that time very serious steps were taken against the sect, which disappeared during the reign of James I. The ideas of Henry Nicholas are often identified with those of David Joris, with whom he lived in close personal connection, FANATICISM. 798

as his followers were often confounded with the Anabaptists, though they acknowledged the bar-tism of infants, and showed no antagonism to the rituals of the churches. The predominant trait of the sect was its mysticism, which gave rise to very peculiar doctrines of Moses as the prophet of hope, Christ as the prophet of faith, and Henry Nicholas as the prophet of love, etc. In 1575 they published a confession of faith, in which they endeavored to prove themselves in harmony with the Reformed Churches. See JOHN ROGERS:
The Displaying of a horrible Sect naming themselves the Family of Love, London, 1579; and KNEENSTUB: Confutation of the heresies of Henry J. KOSTLIN.

FANATICISM (from Latin fanum, "temple").
The term "fanatici" was originally applied to all priests who pretended to receive divine revelations, and announced oracles, but more especially to the priests of Cybele and Bellana, who were noted for their wild enthusiasm. In the writings of the satirists, Horace, Juvenal, etc., the word gradually changed its sense, and came to imply something of a fraudulent inspiration, consisting of hollow excitement and empty visions. In this sense it was still used in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when applied, for instance, to Cromwell, Mohammed, the prophets of the Church of the Desert, etc. At present the term "fanaticism" denotes a state of the mind in which enthusiasm for an idea has been transformed into mere hatred of its opposite.

FAREL, Guillaume, b. at Gap, in Dauphiny, 1489; d. at Neuchatel, Sept. 15, 1565; studied in Paris, and was appointed professor in the college of Cardinal le Moine on the recommendation of Lefèvre d'Étaples (Faber Stapnlensis). His reformatory activity he began in the diocese of Meaux, under the auspices of Guillaume Briconet; but in 1523 he was compelled to fly by the beginning persecutions. He went to Basel, where he was cordially received by Ecolampadius; but his disputations, lectures, and preachings in that city, came to a sudden end in 1524: he was expelled, probably, on the instance of Erasmus.
After a short stay in Valenciennes, he returned to Switzerland in 1525, and began to preach the Reformation in various places belonging under the authority of Berne,—Aigle, Morat, Grandson, Biel, etc.,—often with danger of persecution. At the Battle of Marignano, 1515, he contended that our Lord's temptation was subjective, a divine vision, and not real and objective; A Dissertation on Miracles, designed to show that they are Arguments of a Divine Interposition, and Absolute Proofs of the Mission and Doctrine of a Prophet, 1771, new ed., 1810; An Essay on the Demonics of the New Testament, 1775, 3d ed., 1818 (these were, he maintained, mentally persons strongly affected by certain diseases. This work is a classic with those who hold this view);
The General Prevalence of the Worship of Human Spirits in the Ancient and Heathen Nations asserted and proved, 1783. See DOMBOK, Memoirs of the death. As a theologian he does not occupy a place in the foremost rank; but practically he was one of the boldest, as he was one of the first, of the French reformers. Among his most noticeable works are: Sommaire, 1584, new ed. by Baum, Geneva, 1867; Des Actes de la dispute de Rive, 1535 (first ed., Dufour, Geneva, 1866); Du vrai usage de la parole ou de la voix de Christ, 1535; Paris, 1865; Traité de purgatoire, 1543; La gloire de la parole véritable, 1550; Traité de la Cène, 1555, etc. There is no collected edition of his works.

LIT.—His biography was first written anonymously (probably by Olivier Perrot; compare HALLE, Biblioth. d. Schlesiergeseke, III. No. 781), then by ANCILLON, Amsterdam, 1691 (French); KIRCHHOFFER, Zürich, 2 vols., 1831–33 (German);
SCHMIDT, Elberfeld, 1890 (German); JUNOD,
Paris, 1865 (French); and GOUGEL, Neuchâtel, 1875 (French).

HAGENBACH.
Life and Writings of the Rev. Hugh Farmer, Lond., 1806.

FARNOVIUS (Stanislaus Farnowski), one of the principal leaders of the Polish anti-trinitarians in the sixteenth century; studied in Heidelberg; became a disciple of Petrus Gonesius, and formed a Unitarian party, the Farnovians, which, however, amalgamated with the Socinians immediately after his death. See BOCK: Hist. Antitrinitarianism, Königsberg, 1774-75, 2 vols.

FASTING. See MONEY.

FASTIDIUS, a Christian writer of the fifth century, and one of the few literary representatives of the ancient Briton Church. What we know of his life we owe to a few critically uncertain notices in Gennadius (Catal. s. u. l., 60), which have given rise to many untenable and self-contradictory speculations. The only certain facts are, that he was a Briton by birth, and lived about 420. His book De vitu Christiana was originally printed anonymously among the works of Augustine, until Olstenius discovered the true author, and published the work separately, Rome, 1663. It shows a strong Pelagian tendency.

FASTING, among the Hebrews. Properly speaking, there was only one divinely-ordained public fast,—that of the Day of Atonement (cf. Lev. xvi. 29 sq.; xxxiii. 27 sq.; Num. xix. 7). But it was quite in accordance with the will of God, and the spirit of the Old-Testament dispensation, that when great national calamities had overtaken Israel, or great national wants arose, or great national sins were to be confessed, a day of public fasting and humiliation should be proclaimed (cf. Judg. xx. 26; 1 Sam. vii. 6; 1 Kings xxi. 27; 2 Chron. xx. 3). During the Babylonish captivity the Jews observed four other fasts,—the fasts of the fourth, the fifth, the seventh, and the tenth months (Zech. vii. 1-7; viii. 19). "The fast of the fourth month" took place on the 17th of Thammuz (about June or July), in memory of the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and the interruption of the daily sacrifice. According to tradition it was also the anniversary of making the golden calf, and of Moses breaking the tables of the law. "The fast of the fifth month," on the 9th of Ab, was kept in memory of the destruction of the first (and afterwards of the second) temple. "The fast of the seventh month," on the 2d of Tishri, commemorates the death of Gedaliah and his associates at Mizpah (Jer. xiii. 2). "The fast of the tenth month" was on the 10th of Tebeth, when the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar commenced.

To these fasts has been added that of Esther, kept on the 13th of Adar (Esth. iv. 16). Besides these six fasts, the Jewish calendar at present contains other twenty-two fast-days. But that is not all. It was customary to fast twice a week (Luke xviii. 12); viz., on Monday and Thursday, and came down again on a Monday. Very minute directions concerning fasting are contained in the Talmudical treatise TaNakh. The Essenes early fasted as a means of subduing the flesh, often eating nothing for three days in succession. The present Jews fast on the Day of Atonement, wearing a white shroud and cap: hence the fast is called "the white fast." On other days, mourning is worn: hence they are called "black fasts." The chief of these fasts is the Easter Fast before Easter, which a latertime has designated as an apostolic tradition relating to the precedence of Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 28), and to the circumstance of our Lord lying forty hours in the grave. Originally this fast lasted only forty hours, but it was gradually extended. In the fourth century it lasted three weeks in Rome, but six in Illyria, Achaia, Alexandria, etc.; and this latter term was finally adopted also by Rome. As, however, there was no fasting on Sundays, the six-weeks' fast comprised only thirty-six fast-days; and, in order to reach the symbolic number of forty, it became customary to begin the fast on the Wednesday (Ash-Wednesday) of the preceding week. An attempt was also made to introduce a quadragesimal fast before Christmas and the day of John the Baptist; but the practice never became firmly established. See H. Liemke, Die Quadragesimalfasten der Kirche, Munich, 1853.

Fasting on certain days of the week is also an old custom of the Roman Church. The Pharisees fasted twice a week,—on Thursday and Monday, in commemoration of Moses ascending Mount Sinai, and again descending from it. The Christians adopted this practice, only the days and their significance were changed. Wednesday and Friday (feria quarta et sexta) were selected as the days on which our Lord was betrayed and crucified. These days were called dies stationalis, the life of a Christian being compared to that of a soldier (Tertullian, De Oratione, XIV.). Wednesday, however, was afterwards dropped as a fast-day. The custom, prevalent among the Jews after the exile, of keeping a fast-day respectively in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months, in commemoration of the conquest of Jerusalem, the destruction of the temple, the murder of Gedaliah, and the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, was also adopted by the Christians; but, in this case too, both the days and their designation were changed. The days were put down as days of general fasting and prayer, and so that the year thereby became divided into four seasons (quattuor tempora): hence the name of Quatember-fast. (See EMBER-DAYS.) In former times these quarter-days were also days for the collection of taxes, and hence called angariae ("servitude"). The vigiliae (which see) are also fast-days; and, besides these arranged fast-days, the Roman Church also appoints extraordinary fast-days on special occasions.
II. The Greek Church has on this field developed different practices in its different sections; but one characteristic mark is common to them all,—strictness in keeping the rules. The principal fasts are: 1. A quadragesimal fast before Easter, based on Matt. iv. 2; 2. A quadragesimal fast before Christmas (from Nov. 15 to Dec. 24), based on Exod. xxxiv. 28; 3. The Fast of Mary (from Aug. 1 to Aug. 10); 4. The Fast of the Apostles (from the day after Whitsuntide to June 29). The old dies stationum (both Wednesday and Friday) are still retained, except between Christmas and the Epiphany, during the third week after the Epiphany (in opposition to the Armenians), and in the weeks following Easter and Whitsuntide.

III. The Reformed Churches. — The reformers were by no means averse to fasts; they returned to the original conception of them, as a means of self-discipline and a preparation for prayer. They rejected all compulsory regulations of the practice, and wholly discarded the idea of direct moral meritoriousness. To this purport Luther expresses himself in his commentary to Matt. vi. 16; and so does Calvin in his Institutiones, IV. 12, 14, 15: "Therefore let us say something of fasting, because many, for want of knowing its usefulness, undervalue its necessity, and some reject it as almost superfluous; while, on the other hand, where the use of it is not well understood, it easily degenerates into superstition. Holy and legitimate fasting is directed to three ends: for we practise it either as a restraint on the flesh, to preserve it from licentiousness, or as a preparation for prayers and pious meditations, or as a testimony of our humiliation in the presence of God when we are desirous of confessing our guilt before him." Accordingly we find ideas of this or a very similar character incorporated with all the confessional books of the Reformed Churches (Confessio Augustana, XXVI.; Conf. Helvetica Secund., XXIV.; Conf. Bohem., XVIII.; Conf. Gall., XXIV.; Westminster Confession, XXI. 5), and carried out practically in Switzerland, England, the United States, etc. [During the civil war (1861—65), the President of the Southern Confederacy, Jefferson Davis, proposed a "Confession of Faith," but it was not adopted.]

FATALISM. (Late fatum) denotes the doctrine of an irresistible necessity, differing, however, from the idea of nemesis by being the effect of an external, arbitrary power, rather than the result of an inherent, inevitable law. In its sterner form, presenting itself as an irrevocable decree, it bears some resemblance to the Christian idea of predestination, but has found its only full expression in the fanaticism of Mohammedanism. In its more frivolous form, looking like a mere haphazard, it crept stealthily about in the Greek philosophy, and shows itself sometimes, too, in modern pantheism and materialism.

FATHERS OF THE CHURCH. The term is applied to several classes of persons,—to the patriarchs, to the rabbins, to the founders of churches or denominations, to venerable men in churches or denominations, but chiefly to certain orthodox teachers in the early centuries of the Christian Church. While Protestants refuse to accept the authority of any writer out of the sacred canon as conclusive and final in matters of doctrine and discipline, the other branches of the Church catholic appeal to many authors who lived prior to the eighth century. For the Latin Church the line of the fathers closes with Gregory I. (d. 604); for the Greek Church, with John of Damascus (d. 754). The High-Church party of the Church of England place particular stress upon the orthodox writers prior to and of the Nicene period, and consider them especially worthy of attention as expositors of Scripture. The study of these early writers is called PATRISTIC, which see.

FAUCHET, Claude (commonly known as Abbe Fauchet), b. at Dorpes, in the department of Nièvre, Sept. 22, 1744; guillotined in Paris, Oct. 31, 1793; entered the service of the church, and was rapidly promoted. He was grand vicar of the Archbishop of Bourges, preacher to the king, and Abbot of Montfort-l'Amaury; but his Discours sur les mœurs rurales, delivered at the festival of La Rosière, at Suresnes, in 1788, gave such offence on account of its open sympathy with the revolutionary ideas of the time, that he was deprived of his office as preacher to the king. When, shortly after, the revolution actually broke out, he took his place in the foremost rank of its champions. He was one of the leaders of the people in the attack on the Bastille (July 14, 1789), and in the next year he delivered in the rotunda of the corn-market an Eloge civique on Franklin, which appealed in the strongest manner to the revolutionary passions. Having contributed to the re-organization of the church by his Discours sur la religion nationale, he was made constitutional Bishop of Calvados in 1791, and by his diocesan sent to the legislative assembly and the convention. In the beginning he followed the Jacobins unhesitatingly; but the trial of the king alarmed him. He spoke against the proposal to put the king to death, voted for the appeal to the people, etc., and, after the execution, he joined the Girondins, with whom he fell, accused, and on 22 December 1792, the President of the revolutionary government, in a sermon delivered at the rotunda of the court of the church, cast the first stone in the temple of Marat.

FAUCHEUR, Michel Le, b. at Geneva, 1585; d. at Charenton, 1657; was successively minister of the Protestant congregations of Dijon, Montpellier, and Charenton, and enjoyed a great reputation as a preacher. Besides a number of sermons, he published Traité de la Cène, Geneva, 1635, Traité de l'action de l'orateur, Paris, 1637, etc. His The Wages of Sin and the Reward of Grace is translated in COBBIN'S French Preacher.

FAUSTINUS, a presbyter of Rome; lived in the second half of the fourth century, and distinguished himself in the Athenian controversy. As an adherent of Bishop Lucifer of Cagliari, he wrote against the Arians; but his works (De trinitate et Fides), first published in Rome (1673), circulated for a time under the name of Gregorius Baeticus, the Luciferian bishop of Elberi, or Granada, in Spain, until Tillemon discovered the true author. In the contest between Damasus and Ursinus, Faustinus sided with the latter, and by his Libellus precum moved Theodosius to interfere. His collected works are given in MIGNE, Bibl. Patr. Magn., XIII. 98.
called Faustus the Breton, or of Riez, an ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, and one of the most important literary representatives of the so-called Semi-Pelagianism; was b. in Britain, or Brittany, towards the close of the fourth, or in the beginning of the fifth century; entered the monastery of Saint Martin, became its abbot in 434, and succeeded Maximus in 462 as Bishop of Rej or Regium, the present Riez, in Provence. In 481 he was expelled from his see by Eurich, king of the West Goths; but he returned in 494, and died at Rej till his death, in 491. He wrote letters and tracts against the Arians and Macedonians (Responsor ad objecta quaedam de ratione fidei catholicae), against the Nestorians and Monophysites (Ad Gratum), on various dogmatical and ethical questions, especially on the nature of the soul, whose corporeality he asserted. He also wrote homilies and sermons, of which extant are the Six Monachos are celebrated; but his principal work is the De gratia Dei et humanae mentis libero arbitrio libro II. In 474 the Gallic presbyter Lucidus gave a rather coarse-grained exposition of Augustine's ideas of grace and predestination. Faustus answered, first in a Epistola ad Lucidum, and then in the above-mentioned work. In this book he refutes Pelagius, whom he calls pestiferus; but he also rejects Augustine, though he calls him quidam sanctorum. He attempts to take up an intermediate position, and he does it with great adroitness and no small acumen. The book proved a great success in Gallia; but in Constantinople and North Africa it met with bitter opposition, and Hormisdas afterwards declared that its author does not belong among those whom the church calls its fathers. A collected edition of Faustus' works does not exist; but most of them may be found in Bibl. Lugd., VIII.; Migne: Patr. Lat. LVI., etc.

FAUSTUS REJENSIS. FELGENHAUER.

FAUSTUS REJENSIS, or REQIENSIS, also called Faustus the Breton, or of Riez, an ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, and one of the most important literary representatives of the so-called Semi-Pelagianism; was b. in Britain, or Brittany, towards the close of the fourth, or in the beginning of the fifth century; entered the monastery of Saint Martin, became its abbot in 434, and succeeded Maximus in 462 as Bishop of Rej or Regium, the present Riez, in Provence. In 481 he was expelled from his see by Eurich, king of the West Goths; but he returned in 494, and died at Rej till his death, in 491. He wrote letters and tracts against the Arians and Macedonians (Responsor ad objecta quaedam de ratione fidei catholicae), against the Nestorians and Monophysites (Ad Gratum), on various dogmatical and ethical questions, especially on the nature of the soul, whose corporeality he asserted. He also wrote homilies and sermons, of which extant are the Six Monachos are celebrated; but his principal work is the De gratia Dei et humanae mentis libero arbitrio libro II. In 474 the Gallic presbyter Lucidus gave a rather coarse-grained exposition of Augustine's ideas of grace and predestination. Faustus answered, first in a Epistola ad Lucidum, and then in the above-mentioned work. In this book he refutes Pelagius, whom he calls pestiferus; but he also rejects Augustine, though he calls him quidam sanctorum. He attempts to take up an intermediate position, and he does it with great adroitness and no small acumen. The book proved a great success in Gallia; but in Constantinople and North Africa it met with bitter opposition, and Hormisdas afterwards declared that its author does not belong among those whom the church calls its fathers. A collected edition of Faustus' works does not exist; but most of them may be found in Bibl. Lugd., VIII.; Migne: Patr. Lat. LVI., etc.

FAUSTUS THE MANICHEAN was an African by birth, a native of Milevis; settled in 383 in Carthage, but was in 386 banished by Messianus. He was the chief of the Manichæans of Africa, and although of low birth, but he, as well as his book, is known to us only through Augustine, who at one time wanted his instruction (Confessiones, V. 3, 6, 7, etc.), and afterwards wrote against him, Contra Faustum.

FAWKEs, Guy. See Gunpowder Plot.

FEAST OF ASSES. See Asses, Feast of.

FEAST OF FOOLS. The celebration of the Pagan Saturnalia on Jan. 1 was continued in the Christian Church, and almost without restraint, although the church tried to give the festival a Christian character by celebrating it in honor of the circumcision of Christ. From Italy the festival was introduced into the whole Western Church; and in the twelfth century it was everywhere celebrated in Spain, France, Germany, and England, and generally in a most wanton way. A boy-bishop was elected, and surrounded by boys, boys-deacons, etc. He conducted service in the church, generally on some day between Christmas and New Year, but especially on the first of January, interpreting the liturgical acts with travesties and parodies of the coarsest description, but all to the greatest amusement of the congregation. In the thirteenth century the church tried seriously to stop this disturbance: council after council, pope after pope, forbade it, but in vain. It was, indeed, the Reformation and the secular authorities which finally put a stop to the scandal. In Ducange, Glossarium, is found a complete ceremonial for the whole feast, written out in 1368, at Viviers, in Southern France. See Du Tilleul, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la fête des fous, Lausanne, 1741.

FAUSTUS REJENSIS. FELGENHAUER.
FELICISSIMUS was appointed deacon in the Church of Carthage by the presbyter Novatus, without the assent of Cyprian, and belonged to that party which represented the aristocratical and presbyterian system of government in opposition to the monarchical and episcopal system, represented by Cyprian. Cyprian protested against the appointment, but did not depose Felicissimus; and when, shortly after, the Decian persecution broke out, he fled from the city, and left his see. During his absence the presbyters undertook to re-admit the lapsi into the church by virtue of the liberatos pacis, which they procured from the martyrs. This, too, Cyprian considered as an encroachment upon his authority; and he sent an episcopal committee to the city. Felicissimus, however, supported by five presbyters, declared that he would admit none into the community of his church who appeared before the episcopal controversy having at this time broken out. When Cyprian returned (Easter, 251), he was formally excommunicated by the party of Felicissimus, which chose a certain Fortunatus for its bishop. Felicissimus himself repaired to Rome, to obtain over to his side the Roman Bishop Cornelius; but, the Novatian controversy having at this time broken out both in Rome and Carthage, Cornelius and Cyprian were naturally allies, and Felicissimus' mission failed; after which nothing more is heard of him and his party.

FELICITAS is the name of two saints of the Roman-Catholic Church: one, a distinguished Roman lady, a widow, who, together with her seven sons, was martyred in Rome under Marcus Aurelius, and is commemorated on July 10; and another, a servant-girl, who was martyred under Septimius Severus, in Carthage, together with Perpetua, and is commemorated on March 7. See Act. Sanct. on the respective dates.

The facts which the Acts give—that Felix at the time of Paul's imprisonment (58 or 59) had been "of many years a judge unto this nation" (xxiv. 10); that he had married a Jewess, Drusilla (xxiv. 24); and that, after the lapse of two years, he was succeeded by Porcius Festus (xxiv. 27) — are confirmed by the other sources, without being affected by their differences. Thus when Josephus calls Drusilla a sister of Agrippa II., while Tacitus calls her a grand-daughter of Anthony and Cleopatra; or when Josephus tells us that Felix was not sent to Judea as procurator until after the deposition of Ventidius Cumanus (52 or 53) by Claudius, and at the instance of the high priest Jonathan, at that time present in Rome, while TACITUS says that he was for many years procurator of a part of the province Samaria, until by the deposition of Cumanus he was appointed procurator of the whole province by the Syrian prefect, Quadratus; — these differences have no effect on the report of the Acts. Among the additional facts derived from extraneous sources may be mentioned: that Felix was a brother of Pallas, the imperial favorite, and, like him a freedman; that Festus died in Judea, holding office only a very short time, etc. The picture which the Acts give of the two men — of Felix as a vulgar ruffian, and of Festus as a frivolous cynic — corresponds well with that which Josephus and Tacitus give.

FELIX THE MANICHÉAN, one of the leaders of the sect in Africa, came to Hippo, and held a disputation with Augustine in the Christian Church, and in presence of the congregation. The disputation lasted in two days, and ended with the conversion of Felix. The acts, prepared by notaries, and signed both by Felix and Augustine, are still extant, and are found both in the Paris and the Benedictine edition of Augustine's works.

FELIX THE MARTYR, and his fellow-sufferer Regula, were, according to tradition, the first to bring Christianity to the city of Zürich, and are still venerated as its patrons. They were executed under Decius, 250-251, and are still venerated as its patrons. Their act of sacrifice, as related by Eusebius, is a very luxuriant legend. See Mitteilungen d. ant. Gesellschaft zu Zürich, 1841, vols. I. and II.

FELIX OF NOLA became a confessor during the persecution of Decius. Legend tells us how he concealed himself in a fissure of an old building, and was saved by a spider drawing her web across the fissure, and thereby hiding him from the messengers. His fate was celebrated by Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, in a long poem of fourteen songs.

FELIX OF URGEI. See ADOPTIONISM.

FELIX is the name of five popes. Felix I. (269-274), a Roman by birth, is said to have buried with his own hands three hundred and forty-two martyrs, and was probably martyred himself during the persecution of Aurelian. His day falls on the 9th of May. The fragment of a letter from him to Bishop Maximus of Alexandria, which Cyril (Apol. Noth. Alex., 34) attributes to his Apologiae, is of doubtful authenticity; but the letters ascribed to him by the pseudo-Isidorean collections are certainly spurious. See Act. Sanct., April, pars 1.; JAFFE: Reg. Pontif. Rom. — Felix II. (355-356) was elevated to the Roman see by the Arian court party, without the concurrence of the clergy and the people, when Liberius refused to sign the condemnation of Athanasius, and consequently was driven into exile. After the lapse, however, of three years, Liberius, tired of his exile, submitted to the imperial will, returned to his see, and drove away Felix. On the latter fate of the latter nothing is known with certainty. According to Jerome, he tried to regain the see by force; according to Socrates, he was formally banished by the emperor; according to others, he lived in seclusion at Porto, and died in obscurity. Singularly enough, though his title is very dubious, it is said that he was Roman Catholic by birth. His saintship was confirmed by Gregory XIII. in 1582. His day falls on July 29. See BARONIUS: Ann. eccl. ad an. 357; JAFFÉ: Reg. Pontif. Rom. — Felix III. (March, 483—Feb. 25, 492) was elected by the influence of Odoacer, and became noted for the vigor and decision with which he interfered in the affairs of the Eastern Church. The Emperor Zeno issued the Henoticos on the instance of his patriarch, Acacius, and for the purpose of reconciling the Monophysites. But Felix placed himself at the head of the opposition against this measure, and deposed and excommunicated Acacius at a synod of seventy-seven bishops; thereby occasioning the first schism between the Eastern and Western churches. See Act. Sanct., Februar., III., and Jaffé: Reg. Pontif. Rom. — Felix IV. (July 12, 526—September, 530) was elected by the influence of Theodoric the Great, an Arian. — Felix V. (Jan. 5, 1440—49), Duke Amadeus of Savoy, was b. 1368, and d. Jan. 7, 1451. In 1434 he abdicated, left the government of Savoy to his son, and retired to Ripaille, on the Lake of Geneva, as head of the knightly hermit order of St. Mauritius. The process which the Council of Basel instituted against Eugenius IV. roused his ambition; and when, through various intrigues, he was actually elected Pope by the council, he eagerly accepted, assumed the name of Felix V., and immediately formed a curia, mostly consisting of Frenchmen. But residing at Geneva, without any revenue, not in possession of the States of the Church, not acknowledged by any of the great powers, he presented a pitiful spectacle. Even the cardinals he made declined the honor. When Germany and France recognized Nicholas V., Felix abdicated, and retired to Ripaille. His reign forms simply an interlude in the history of the Council of Basel, and is described in its acts.

FELTEN, Henry, D.D., a learned English divine; b. in London, 1679; studied at Oxford; made rector of Whitewell, 1711; principal of Edmund Hall, Oxford, 1722; and d. 1740. Among his works are: The Christ. Faith asserted against Deists, Arians, & Socinians, in 8 Sermons (with a long preface on the necessity of a revelation), Oxf., 1732; The Resurrection of the same Numerical Body, in which Mr. Locke's notions of personality & identity are confuted, 3d ed., Lond., 1733; Sermons on the Creation, Fall, and Redemption of Man, Lond., 1748.

FENCE cities. See FORTIFICATIONS.

FENCING THE TABLES, a Scotch-Presbyterian term for the address made before the administration of the Lord's Supper, because in it the character of those who should partake was described.

FÉNELON, François de Salignac de la Mothe, Archbishop of Cambrai, and one of the most brilliant and devout of French divines; was b. Aug. 6, 1651, at the castle of Fénelon, in Périgord; d. Jan. 7, 1715, in Cambrai. Brought up by pious parents, he was early set apart for the priesthood. In his twelfth year he was sent to the then flourishing university of Cahors, and passed from there to his uncle's in Paris, the Marquis de Fénelon, an able statesman. At his request, Fénelon, who was now eighteen, preached several times, and with great acceptance. He entered the college of St. Sulpice, where he remained for five years, applying himself assiduously to study and to spiritual exercises. The Archbishop of Paris, M. de Harley, recognizing his talents, appointed him the superior of the Nouvelles Catholiques,—an association of Catholic ladies of noble birth, for the instruction of Protestant girls. The experiences which he had at this post during ten years of service were embodied in his book De l'éducation des filles ("The Education of Girls"). Intended in the first instance for the Duchess de Beauvilliers, the pious mother of a large family, it unfolded the principles of education and heart-training as they are found in Scripture and suggested by a careful observation of child-nature, with a practical wisdom that can hardly be surpassed.

Fénelon's success as Superior of this association attracted the attention of the king, and brought him into contact with Bossuet, the eloquent Bishop of Meaux, with whom he entered into a close friendship. Louis XIV. determined to use his gifts for furthering a plan of bringing over the whole of France to one faith, and assigned him a mission in Poitou for the conversion of Protestants. Fénelon accepted the duties, but declined the military escort which it was customary to send on such occasions, preferring, like the apostles, to use only the weapons of the Spirit. He secured, at least, the respect of the Protestants, if he did not succeed in bringing them over to the Roman Church. Returning to his old position, he was accused of holding Protestant principles,—an accusation which he sufficiently refuted.

in his day, was b. in Suffolk about 1609. At the age of eighteen he published Resolves, divine, moral, political, giving pointed moral and religious maxims. The work was subsequently augmented, and passed through many editions. The edition of 1806 contains the little that is known about his life, written by James Cumming.

FELL, John, D.D., Bishop of Oxford, was b. in Berkshire, June 28, 1625; d. July 10, 1686. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, of which his father was the dean. He was a royalist, and after the restoration of the Stuarts was made dean of Christ Church, and in 1676 Bishop of Oxford. He was distinguished for learning, and munificent benefactions to the university. The following famous lines were written by a student to whom Dr. Fell had given the thirty-third edition of the Greek Testament, Lond., 1675 (which was the standard edition until Mill, and Paraphrase and Annotations upon the Epiph. St. Paul, Lond., 1675, 3d ed., 1703. See Hook, Eccl. Biog.

FÉLCHARD, Francois Xavier de, b. at Brussels, Aug. 18, 1735; d. at Regensburg, May 23, 1802; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1757; went to Hungary after the expulsion of the order from France; returned to the Netherlands in 1770, and lived since 1798 at the court of the Bishop of Freysing, in Bavaria. He was an exceedingly prolific writer, publishing about a hundred and twenty volumes during his lifetime, among which are the Journal of Luxemburg, 1774—94 (a periodical, 70 vols., but chiefly written by him), Dictionnaire, 8 vols., 1781, etc. One of his most interesting productions is his Coup d'œil sur le congrès d'Emms, 2 vols., Dusseldorf, 1789.

FELTHAM, Owen, an author highly esteemed...
in his Sur le ministère des pasteurs ("The Ministry"). This tract denies the divine authority of the Protestant clergy, on the ground that such authority depended upon regular episcopal ordination handed down from the apostles.

The year 1689 was an important epoch in Fénélon's life. The king appointed him tutor for his grandson—the Duke of Burgundy (afterwards king of Spain), and Berri. For the duties of this office he was eminently adapted by the unimpeachable nobility of his own character, high sense of honor, magnetic power, patience, and gentleness of temper. The Duke of Burgundy was of a violent temper ["so passionate that he would break the clocks which summoned him to some unwelcome duty, and fly into the wildest rage with the rain which hindered some pleasure," as St. Simon says]. But the teacher succeeded not only in mollifying his disposition, and enriching his mind, but in securing the prince's respect and gratitude. The king presented him with the abbey of St. Valérie, and in 1695 with the see of Cambrai; Fénélon, much to the former's surprise, resigning the abbey at his elevation.

With his promotion to the archbishopric began a succession of hard conflicts and humiliations. In 1687 he had formed the acquaintance of Madame Guyon (see art.), which ripened into intimate friendship. It was a severe trial for him, when a theological examination of her devotional works was instituted, that he should have been placed on the commission. Bossuet, one of the commissioners, sought to secure his signature to the Instruction sur les états d'oraison ("Instruction about the States of Prayer"), which he had written in refutation of Madame Guyon's views. Fénélon's conscientious scruples forbade his assent; and Bossuet not only began to grow cold towards him, but to antagonize him. Fénélon never fully approved of Madame Guyon's tenets and language, but always defended her intentions as above suspicion. In 1697 he made public his views on Madame Guyon's fundamental principles, and elaborated the two propositions,—that the love towards God, were possible on earth, and that a state of perfect sanctification, and absolute rest in God, were possible on earth, and that a state of perfect Christians, love is the predominant grace. Without just ground.

In the mean time the controversy with Bossuet went on. Fénélon had submitted his case to the Pope, and sought his judgment upon the Maxims of the Saints, which Bossuet insisted he should renounce. The latter drew the most severe logical consequences from Fénélon's work, and embodied them in an answer to his Exposition des Maxims des Saints (The Exposition of the Maxims of the Saints), which he likewise sent to Rome. Fénélon answered every criticism with ability. In 1688 Bossuet wrote his Relation du quitisme, a history of the controversy, to which Fénélon replied in his Réponse, which aroused a very favorable feeling towards him. But the Sorbonne had already condemned twelve articles of the Exposition; and in 1699 a papal brief declared the Maxims of the Saints, and twenty-three articles drawn from it erroneous (not heretical). The general interest as to the archbishop's course was speedily put at rest. Fénélon submitted unconditionally, finding the papal sentence severe, but recognizing in it the "echo of the divine will;," and he believed only one course to be open to a true son of the church. He revoked the twenty-three articles, and forbade the circulation of the book in his diocese.

Although, from the stand-point of the gospel, we cannot approve of Fénélon's course, we cannot help but admire the spirit of moderation and humility which guided him during the whole progress of the controversy. Bossuet, on the one hand, eulogized his submission: the people, on the other, throughout France, had learned to esteem him.

The leisure he could find in the administration of his diocese, Fénélon employed in furthering the education of the Duke of Burgundy. This he did by correspondence. In order to instil in him the principles of justice and goodness, he gathered together the fragments of the Télémaque, and revised the whole. He gave the manuscript to a copyist in order to secure a nearly-written copy for his ward. The copyist made a second copy, without the knowledge of Fénélon; and it was printed at Paris under the title Aventures de Télémaque ("Adventures of Telemachus"), but, being suppressed by royal order, was reprinted in Holland in 1700. The book was translated into every language of Europe, and had one of the largest circulations of any book after the Bible. The king thought he discovered in the work a satire against his administration, but without just ground.

In 1712 Fénélon wrote two other works for the Duke of Burgundy, —Dialogues des morts ("Dialogues of the Dead"), and Directions pour la conscience d'un Roi ("Rules for a King's Conscience"). The latter was first printed in Holland, 1734. It is full of sapient advice, and searching questions, such as only an experienced confessor can ask the pardon of the soul, or the punishment of those who have sinned against conscience, or against conscience, or against conscience.

Paris was split up into two parties over this work. Bossuet opposed it with passionate bitterness. Fénélon observed an exemplary moderation and patience. The King decided for Bossuet, and Fénélon was ordered to leave the court, and proceed to his diocese. He was received with joy, and at once devoted himself, with a consecration seldom equalled, to the duties of his see. He was unceasing in his visitation, preached in all the churches he visited, confounded the clerical abuses, and became the father and friend to poor and rich. His sermons were not studied works of art, but flowed with evangelical simplicity from the fulness of his heart.
The nobility of Fénelon's character was shown most conspicuously during the war of the Spanish Succession and the war of Flanders was for a while the seat of war. In a general way he sought to mitigate the horrors and ravages of the war by wise counsels to the Duke of Burgundy, who was commander-in-chief. When, in 1708, Flanders, in which Cambray was located, was deserted, he opened the chambers of his palace to the wounded and the sick; and when a dearth of grain was felt he offered his whole income to the state. The French admired their archbishop for his self-denying interest in the suffering and wounded, and bowed before his piety. No less did the enemies of France esteem his virtues; and Prince Eugene and Marlborough not only treated him politely, but sent troops to guard his property.

He died of a fever. His last days were peaceful. The latter part of the fourth chapter of Second Corinthians and the fifth chapter were read and re-read to him, affording great comfort. After listening to the high-priestly prayer in Gethsemane (John xvii.), he blessed his attendants, and went to sleep, aged sixty-four. Fénelon's death was regarded as a loss, not only to the diocese of Cambray, but to all France. His virtues and talents were known throughout Europe, and recognized by all church communions. He was a strict son of the Roman-Catholic Church; but, above all, he was a genuine, believing, active Christian, liberal and charitable enough to sympathize with Protestants, who, in turn, revered his memory.

The description of St. Simon, in his Memoirs (XXII.), deserves to be quoted. "He was a tall, thin man, well made, pale, with a large nose, eyes whence fire and talent streamed like a torrent, and a physiognomy the like of which I have never seen in any other man, and which, once seen, could never be forgotten. . . . It united seriousness and gayety, gravity and courtesy; the prevailing characteristics, as in everything about him, being refinement, intellect, gracefulness, modesty, and, above all, nobleness, etc."

Ferguson, David, one of the fathers of the Scottish Reformation, was b. not later, and perhaps earlier, than 1542 (see Wodrow MSS., vol. xvii. No. 16). He d. in 1598, "the ablest minister that tyme in Scott land" (James Melvil's Diary, Edin., 1842, p. 437). He seems to have been a native of Dundee, and by original occupation a Glover (Ferguson's True and virtuous life, p. 36). Though not a graduate of any university (Row, Hist. p. 418), he shows in his writings, and in the many wise and witty sayings which have been, doubtless, attributed to him, a familiarity with the classical languages and classical literature. In July, 1560, he was selected by the Parliament to be minister of Dunfermlin, an important charge, as containing a royal palace, which afterwards became the favorite residence of James VI. But he had been one of six men, as he tells us himself, who began to preach the Reformed faith in Scotland some years before the Reformation; and at a time "when" (to use his own words) "there was no stipend heard tell of; when the authority, both ecclesiastics and civil, opposed themselves; and when scarcely a man of name and estimation was found to take their cause in hand" (James Melvil's Diary, p. 357). As to the matter of stipend, indeed it must be here added, that, even after the establishment of the Reformation, there was for some years little change for the better in this respect. In one of the Tracts already referred to, and afterwards more particularly noticed, a tract published in the year 1563, Ferguson, speaking of himself and his brethren generally, says, "We are a considerable number of us have lived in penury, without all stipend; some twelve months, some eight, and some half a year, having nothing to sustain ourselves and our families, but that which we have borrowed of charitable persons, until God send it to us to repay them" (Answer to Renan Benedict, p. 11). He proved an excellent minister, "preaching," says Row (Hist. p. 418), "with great boldness, wisdom, and holiness," and "bringing the people [of his charge] to very good order, knowledge of the truth, and obedience to the discipline of the Kirk." As a church-leader, he was characterized by firmness, sagacity, sound judgment, and also what Wodrow (Jamaica, Glasgow, 1842, vol. 1., p. 120) calls "pleasant and facetious conversation, by which," Wodrow adds, "he often pleased and pacified the king when he was in a fury." He was, accordingly, very frequently employed by the Church as a medium of communication with the king.

Ferguson published two tracts in his own lifetime. The first is a controversial work, entitled An Answer to Ane Epistle written by Renan Benedict, the French doctor, to John Knox, and the rest of the brethren." This treatise was printed at Edinburgh, in the year 1563, and was reprinted for the Bannatyne Club in 1860, from a unique copy in the library of the University of Edinburgh. It contains an able discussion of the chief points at issue between the Romanists and Protestants at the period of the Reformation. His second publication appeared nine years afterwards, being a sermon preached before the regent and nobility at Leith (Jan. 13, 1571-72), during the meetings of the General Assembly of that year. It relates chiefly to the inadequacy of the existing provision for the Reformed ministers, the schools, and the poor; and it condemns in no measured terms the neglect of the king and Parliament of objects regarded by the Church from the first as having paramount claims on their attention. The sermon was printed at the request of the General Assembly held at Perth in the year 1572, with the special approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been presented, with the approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been presented, with the approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been presented, with the approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been presented, with the approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been presented, with the approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been presented, with the approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been presented, with the approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been presented, with the approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been presented.
FERRAR, Nicholas, an English clergyman of ascetic tastes; b. in London, Feb. 22, 1592; d. Dec. 2, 1637. He studied at Clare Hall, Cambridge; in 1624 was elected to Parliament; and in 1626 was ordained deacon by the Bishop of St. David's (Laud). He consecrated himself to a life of retirement and devotion, and refused flattering offers to benefices. He turned his manor, Little Gidding, into a sort of conventual establishment, at which vigils and other formal religious exercises were scrupulously observed. Ferrar himself slept on the floor, and rose at one in the morning for religious meditations. He did much good by providing a free school for the children of the neighborhood, and himself catechised them. See Lives of Ferrar by Dr. Peckard (Camb., 1700), Macdonough (2d ed., Lond., 1837), and by his Brother and Dr. Jebb (1 vol., Camb., 1855).

FERRAR, Robert, Bishop of St. David's, and martyr: b. at Halifax, Yorkshire; d. at the stake, in Caermarthen, Wales, March 30, 1555. He studied at Cambridge and Oxford, and was elevated to the see of St. David's, under Edward VI., in 1547. Bishop Burnet (Hist. of Ref., I. p. 431) describes him as "a rash and indiscreet man," and as having been arbitrary in his treatment of the canons of his cathedral. At the accession of Mary he was deprived of his see, and tried and condemned for heresy. To a young man who defied his death-sentence he is reported to have said, "If you see me come to the pains of burning, then give no credit to those doctrines for which I die." He made good his assertion, and was beheaded on the head. See Foxe: Acts and Monuments: Hook: Eccles. Biogr., vol. v.

FERRARA-FLORENCE, Council of. The course of opposition to the Pope and the curia, which the Council of Basel pursued, was even more pronounced than had been anticipated. A breach became unavoidable; and the project of a union between the Eastern and Western churches, started for political reasons by the Byzantine emperor, and eagerly caught at by Eugenius IV., gave the occasion. For many reasons, Eugenius IV. wished that these negotiations should be carried on in Italy; and he proposed to transfer the Council of Basel to some Italian city. But the council refused; and after the stormy meetings on March 6 and 7, 1437, the papal minority left Basel, and placed itself at the disposition of the Pope. Jan. 8, 1438, the council was solemnly opened at Ferrara; and in March, same year, the Eastern delegates arrived, numbering about seven hundred persons, and including, besides the em-threw into prison: Bessarion had to flee to Rome, etc. In 1472 the Greeks solemnly renounced the union.

LIT. — The authentic acts of the council are lost; but a documentary history of it, probably written by Archbishop Dorotheus of Mitylene, is found in vol. 9 of Harduin, and vol. 31 of Mansi. It is in favor of the union. From the opening scene wrote Bessarion, a Greek priest, whose work was edited by Creyghton, London, 1860. See also Ceconi: Studi storici sul concilio di Firenze, Florence, 1869; Frommann: Kritische Beiträge zu Geschichte d. flor. Kirchenreunigung, Halle, 1872; [A. War- schauer: Ueber die Quellen zum florentiner Concil, Breslau, 1881].

FERRARA, Renata (Renée), celebrated for her relations to the Reformers, was the daughter of Louis XII. of France, and wife of Hercules of Este, Duke of Ferrara, whom she married in 1527; was b. at the castle of St. Blois, Oct. 25, 1510; and d. at Montepulciano, June 12, 1575. Brought up in the court of Francis I., she came into intimate relations with Margaret of Navarre, whose evangelical sentiments she imbibed. Her mind delighted in the pursuits of literature and art; and her court at Ferrara attracted the learned men of Italy. She remained true to evangelical sentiments, in spite of opposition and the forced separation of her children, and welcomed to her palace Oehino, Peter Martyr, Calvin, and other evangelical divines. Calvin, during his stay (in 1556) of several months, instructed her carefully in the Reformed doctrines, and afterwards maintained a correspondence with her. On the death of her husband (in 1559) she returned to France, and made profession of the Reformed faith, in which she died. See P. Bayle (Dictionary), Merle d'Aubigné (iv. 420-427, v. 420-423. Am. ed.), Wetzl (Renée de France, New York, 1883).

FERRER, Vincentius, b. at Valencia, Jan. 28, 1515; d. at Vannes, in Ile de France, April 5, 1519; entered the Dominican order in 1574; studied at Barcelona and Lerida; wrote Tractatus de moderato Ecclesiae schismate, visited Paris; was appointed confessor to Queen Yolanda of Aragon; wrote Tractatus de Spiritu et inspiratione; and was, in 1595, called to Avignon by Benedict XIII., as Magister Sacri Palatii. But two years later on he gave up this position, and determined, in spite of the opposition of the Pope, to devote his life to missionary labors. Travelling on foot through France, Italy, Spain, and England, he preached, often twice a day, in the streets or on the road, to great crowds. Soon he was not alone any more. A wandering congregation formed around him, accompanying him everywhere, practising the severest asceticism, and filling the towns and the fields with their sombre songs. He was canonized by Calixtus III., June 29, 1455. See LUDWIG HELLER: Vincentius Ferrer, Berlin, 1830; Hohenthal: De Vincentio Ferrerio, Leipzig, 1839.

FERREIRA, Jerôme, b. at Nîmes in 1565; d. in Paris, Sept. 26, 1626; was appointed pastor of the Reformed Congregation of Nîmes in 1601, and was one of the most talented and courageous champions of the Reformation in France. He publicly defended the thesis that the Pope was Antichrist. He preached with such a violence against the Jesuits as to cause riots, etc. Nevertheless, some suspicion of his sincerity arose in 1611; and in 1613 he was forbidden to preach, because it was evident that he had sold himself to the Court and the Romanists. He went to Paris and abjured Protestantism in 1614. In the same year he wrote De l'Antechrist et de ses marques, contre les calomnies des ennemis de l'Eglise catholique, See Borrel, Hist. de l'Egl. réj. de Nîmes, 1856.

FERRIS, Isaac, D.D., LL.D., b. in New York, Oct. 3, 1790; d. at Roselle, N.J., June 16, 1873. He was graduated from Columbia College, 1816; a pastor in the Reformed Dutch Church over different charges (New Brunswick, N.J., 1821-24; Albany, 1824-26; New York, Market Street, 1836-54); and chancellor of the New York University, 1852-70, emeritus, 1870-73. His service to the university was long and faithful. By his efforts a crushing debt of a hundred thousand dollars was extinguished, four professorships endowed, and several new departments added to the course of instruction. He possessed great sagacity, common sense, and administrative ability. As preacher, pastor, and professor, he was beloved. His presence was majestic. He delivered the address at the Jubilee of the American Bible Society, New York, 1866, subsequently published, —Jubilee Memorial of the American Bible Society: being a Review of its First Fifty Years of Work, N.Y., 1867.

FERRY, Paul, b. at Metz, Feb. 24, 1591; d. there July 28, 1689; was pastor of the Reformed Congregation there for about sixty years. He was a very prolific writer; but most of his works still remain in manuscript, and those which have been printed are mediocre. He is noticeable, however, for his participation in the project of uniting the Protestants and Romanists of France. His correspondence with Bossuet on that occasion is found in vol. xxiv. of the works of the latter. His Lettre aux ministres de Genève, in defence of a poor lunatic who was burnt at Geneva for blasphemies against the Trinity, is found in vol. ii. of Bibliothèque Anglaise.

FERRY LAW, The, is the name generally applied to a law concerning public instruction, especially in the higher schools, which was laid before the Legislative Chamber of France, March 15, 1879, by Jules Ferry, at that time minister of public instruction, and passed by the Senate, July 19, same year. The tendency of this law is to exclude the influence of the Roman-Catholic Church from the school. Article VII. of the law, the centre of the debate, and the object of a very bitter contest, prohibits the member of a not recognized religious association to be the director of, or to teach in, a public school. In consequence of this article, twenty-seven Jesuit colleges were closed, and eight hundred Jesuit teachers were forbidden to work. But, besides the Jesuits, twenty-six other religious communities which could not obtain, or would not seek, the confirmation of the government, were affected by the law. See FRANCE, ECONOMIC STATISTICS OF.

FESCH, Joseph, b. at Ajaccio, Jan. 3, 1763; d. in Rome, May 13, 1839; was a younger stepbrother to Letizia, the mother of Napoleon I., and was educated for the church in the seminary.
of Aix. After the outbreak of the Revolution, he entered the military service, and accompanied his nephew on his first Italian campaign as an army commissary. He took part in the negotiation of the concordat, returned to the church, and was made Archbishop of Lyons in 1802, and Cardinal in 1803. As ambassador to Rome, he succeeded in inducing the Pope to go to Paris to crown Napoleon; and the day before the crowning, he gave the civil marriage of Napoleon and Josephine the consecration of the church. He was, however, not a mere tool in the hands of his nephew. He afterwards absolutely refused to annul the marriage which he had consecrated; and as president of the National Council assembled in Paris, 1810, he resisted the policy of Napoleon so persistently, that he entirely lost his favor. After the fall of the emperor, Cardinal Fesch sought refuge in Rome, and was very kindly received by the Pope. He joined Napoleon during the Hundred Days, but returned then to Rome, where he spent the rest of his life. His correspondence with Napoleon was published by Du Casse, in 3 vols., Paris, 1855. See Lyonnet: Le Cardinal Fesch, Lyons, 1841, 2 vols.; and La vérité sur le Cardinal Fesch, Lyons, 1842.

FESTIVALS OF THE JEWS. The festivals of the Jews may be divided into pre-exilian and post-exilian. They will be found described under their respective titles.

I. The Pre-Exilian Festivals.—There are (a) The Seventh Day, or the Sabbath; (b) The Feast of Trumpets, or New Year; (c) The Day of Atonement; (d) The Feast of Tabernacles; and (e) The Feast of Pentecost. Besides, each seventh year was observed as a sabbatical, and, after seven times seven years, the Feast of Jubilee was observed. On the holy seasons in general comp. Exodus xxiii. 10-17; Lev. xxiii., xxv.; Num. xviii., xix.; Deut. xvi. As these festivals are treated separately, we need not enter upon the mode of their observation.

II. The Post-Exilian Festivals.—After the exile, other holy seasons were added to those already enacted by Moses; thus the four fasts mentioned in Zechariah (for which comp. the art. Fasts), the Feast of Esther, or the Festival of Purification of the Temple on its restoration by Judas the Maccabaeus, and that of Wood Offering, on which offerings of wood were brought for the use of the temple, and on which see the Mishna Taam'lah iv. 5, and Josephus, Jewish Wars, ii. 17, 6. Comp. Delitzsch, in Herzog's Real Encyclopedia (2d ed.), s. v. Feste.

FESTUS. See Felix and Festus.

FETICISM, or FETISHISM (from the Portuguese fetico, fetisso, a "charm"), denotes one of the lowest forms of religion,—the worshiping of fetishes. The fetish is not itself considered a deity by the worshipper, or even a symbol of a deity; it is simply supposed to be a vehicle through which a supernatural power makes itself felt in the world; and, as no logical connection is demanded between the power and the vehicle through which it acts, any object whatever, natural or artificial, animate or inanimate, may become a fetish. Entirely incidentally,—by a dream, by some kind of delusion, by a mere whim,—one is induced to believe that a supernatural power exercises influence on his destiny through this pebble or that feather; and immediately he falls down and worships the pebble or the feather, and makes it his fetish. But just as the objects may lose this dignity of being a fetish, if the worshipper discovers, or thinks he has discovered, that the influence is not so real as he supposed, he will withdraw his allegiance, and perhaps take vengeance. If the fetish is an animate object, it will be punished; if it is an inanimate object, it may be destroyed. The idea of a dead or supertemporal soul, perhaps coercing, the supernatural power through the vehicle, is not altogether foreign to the fetish worshipper; for the fetish has, at least to some extent, the character of being a means of witchcraft.

This form of religion was observed and described for the first time, when, in the fifteenth century, the Portuguese boarded the coasts of Guinea. Afterwards numerous traces of it were found among the savages in America, Australia, and Siberia; and De Brosses, in his Du Culte des Dieux Plaisirs (Nancy, 1760), brought it into connection with the religion of the ancient Egyptians. General attention was drawn to it by A. Comte, who, in his Philosophie positive (Paris, 1830-42), places it as the first stage in the logical evolution of religion, and defines it as a conception of nature, according to which all bodies are animated, in the same manner as the human body, and, like that, governed by a will. This definition depends upon a mistake; for fetishism is not pantheism, but just the reverse of pantheism, a very coarse dualism, as has been very ably shown by Sir John Lubbock, in his Origin of Civilization, 1870, and by Herbert Spencer, in his Sociology, 1879. See Fritz Schultz, Der Fetischismus, Leipzig, 1871.

FEUERBACH, Ludwig Andreas, b. at Landshut, Bavaria, July 28, 1804; d. at Bruckberg, near Anbach, Sept. 15, 1872; studied at Heidelberg and Berlin, and began to lecture on philosophy at Erlangen, but spent most of his life in literary retirement at Bruckberg. In 1848, 1849, he once more began to lecture publicly at Heidelberg; but, when the revolutionary movement completely failed, he again retired to private life. In that year the Fidelitatsversprechen was published, under the name of De Brosses, in his Du Culte des Dieux Plaisirs (Nancy, 1760), Targelles, in his Dictionnaire de la Religion; and the religion, as a simple psychological process, as an illusion. The book was translated into English with a commentary by George Eliot (Mrs. Cross), Essence of Christianity, London, 1858, new ed., 1881. See Schallers: Darstellung und Kritik d. Philosophie L. F., 1847; R. Hagen: Feuerbach und die Philosophie, 1847.

FEUILLANTS, The, received their name from the abbey of Feuillans, about eighteen miles from Toulouse, and were originally a branch of the Cistercian order, subject to the authority of Citeaux, but became an independent congregation by the reforms of Jean de la Barrière (b. 1544, d. 1600). He became abbot of Feuillans in 1574, and in spite of much opposition, and many difficourse of his mental development, he successively moved from the freethinking of Lessing to the determinism of Spinoza, and again from the determinism of Spinoza to the criticism of Kant. In Kant's limitation of causality to the world of phenomena he found the starting-point for his own philosophy,—that audacious deduction of both nature and God from the human ego, to whose true character (atheism, or not) people still disagree. In 1794 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Jena; and the following year he published his chief work, Die Wissenschaftslehre (translated into English by A. E. KROEGER, Science of Knowledge, Philadelphia, 1868), and the beautiful essay, Ueber die Bestimmung des Gegenstandes (translated by W. SMITH, The Vocation of the Scholar, in his Popular Writings of J. G. Fichte, 2 vols., London, 1847-49, new edition, 1873).
FICINUS. 810  FIJI ISLANDS.

his Die speculative Theologie, Heidelberg, 1846, and System der Ethik, Leipzig, 1850-53, are of special interest. He founded the Zeitschrift für Philosophie.

FICINUS, Marsilius, b. at Florence, Oct. 19, 1433; d. in his villa, at Careggi, Oct. 1, 1499: was a son of the body-physician of Cosmo di Medici, and grew up in the palace, enjoying the instruction of Gemistus Pletio, and the intercourse of all the leaders of the Renaissance. In time he became one of the leaders himself; and more, than any one else, was instrumental in familiarizing the age with the ideas of Plato and the Neo-Platonists. It was an enthusiastic conviction of his, that the depraved theological practice of his time could be regenerated only by an infusion of Platonism. In that spirit he preached, having been consecrated priest in 1477; and in that spirit he wrote and lectured as president of the Platonic Academy. He gave a complete Latin translation of Plato and Plutinus, and published a number of original works.—Theologia Platonica, De Religione Christiana, De Immortalitate Animorum, etc. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice, 1516; Basel, 1641. Among his pupils were Pico di Mirandola, Reuchlin, Sixtus IV., etc. See SIEVEKING, Geschichte der platonischen Akademie zu Florenz, Göttingen, 1812.

FIDDES, Richard, D.D., a fertile theological author: b. at Humanley, Yorkshire, in 1671; and d. at Putney in 1723. He was educated at Oxford; became rector of Halsham about 1694, but, losing his voice, resigned, and devoted himself with much industry to authorship. Among his works are: A Body of Divinity, Lond., 1718-20, in 2 vols. (the first discussing the doctrines of natural and revealed religion,—Theol. speculativa, the second, the duties,—Theol. practica); a Life of Cardinal Wolsey, Lond., 1724 (in which the writer disparages the Reformation); and 3 vols. of Discourses, Lond., 1713-15, vol. i. passing through three editions.

FIDELIS, St., properly Marcus Roy, was b. at Sigmaringen, 1577; studied law, and began to practise as a lawyer in Ensisheim, but suddenly changed career, entered the order of the Capuchins, and was consecrated priest, and appointed preacher at Feldkirch, in the Vorarlberg, 1621. His great aim was to re-establish the Roman-Catholic Church in these regions; and at the head of an Austrian regiment of dragoons he set out on a missionary trip. But the peasants rose in defence of their religious liberty, defeated the dragoons, and put Fidelis to death, April 24, 1622; for which Benedict XIV. declared him a saint. G. PLITT.

FIELD, Richard, an eminent divine of the Anglican Church; b. Oct. 15, 1561, in Hempstead, Hertfordshire; d. Nov. 21, 1616. He studied at Oxford; was made rector of Burghclere in 1598, chaplain in ordinary to Elizabeth, and in 1610 raised to the deanery of Gloucester. He was an intimate friend of Hooker, recognized as a good preacher and profound theologian, and esteemed by James I., who, after hearing him for the first time, expressed his sentiments in the pun, "This is a Field for God to dwell in." Fuller, in his Holy War, calls him "that learned divine, whose memory swelleth like a Field the Lord hath blessed." Field's fame rests upon his work entitled Of the Church, Five Bookes, by Richard Field, D.D., and sometime Deane of Gloucester, 1606-10. It treats of the nature, members, and government of the true church, and was occasioned, as he says in the dedication to the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the "unhappy divisions of the Christian world, and the infinite distractions of men's minds." It seeks to "discover the vanity of the insolent boastings of the Papists, that all men may know that we have not departed from the ancient faith, or forsaken the fellowship of the Church Catholic." In the fifth book, which discusses the ministry, he takes the moderate view of episcopacy. "When the Apostles had finished their course, they left none to succeed them . . . yet they authorized prebendaries and deacons," etc. (Epistle to the Reader). Field's work has been republished by the Ecclesiastical History Society, 4 vols., Cambridge, 1847. For his life, see Some Short Memorials concerning his Life, by his son, Nathaniel Field, London, 1716, 1717.

FIFTH-MONARCHY MEN, republican and millenarian enthusiasts of the Commonwealth period, who affronted the authorities of Elizabeth and Charles II. They formed a plot in 1657 to murder Cromwell; but it was discovered by Secretary Thurloe, and the leaders of the movement, namely, Foxe, Feake, and the fifth monarch of Daniel. Powell and Feake were the first leaders, and called Cromwell "the dissemblingest perjured villain in the world." They formed a plot in 1657 to murder Cromwell; but it was discovered by Secretary Thurloe, and some of the chief conspirators imprisoned. On Sunday, Jan. 6, 1661, a band numbering about fifty, and headed by Venner, a wine-cooper, rose again in insurrection. They carried a banner with the design of a lion couchant (the lion of the tribe of Judah). They were quickly dispersed, and Venner taken prisoner, and hung. The Independents and Quakers were unjustly accused of being in sympathy with the Fifth-Monarchy Men. See Neale: Hist. of the Puritans, ii. 176, 220 (Harper's ed.); Carlyle: Life of Cromwell; StoUGHTON: Rel. in England, new ed., Lond., 1881, vol. ii. pp. 57-99.

Fiji Islands, a group of two hundred and fifty islands in the Southern Pacific, and comprising an area of nearly eight thousand square miles. The two largest are Vanua Levu (Great Land), which is a hundred miles long, and has an average breadth of twenty-five miles, and Viti Levu (Great Viti, or Fiji), which is ninety by fifty miles. Eighty of these islands are inhabited. They are the result of coral and volcanic formation. The climate is delightful. The thermometer seldom rising above 90°. The islands were discovered by Tasman in 1643, and visited by Bligh in 1780, and by Wilson in 1787. The ethnological relations of the Fijians have given much difficulty. They combine characteristics of the Melanesian and Polynesian types. Physically they are an athletic, well-formed race, and mentally they are far above the Papuans. The population was divided up into tribes, and ruled by kings, until 1874, when the islands were annexed to Great Britain. The more powerful chiefs voluntarily proposed the cessation, and signed articles to that effect in October of 1874. Sir Arthur Gordon was appointed the first governor. The advantages accruing to the islands from the annexation have been signal. A code of laws has been adopted, and justice is now administered in sound that greets your ears in the morning, and the last at night, is the sound of family worship in the village” (p. 86). The same writer, referring to the change that has taken place in the habits of the population, says, “I often wonder if some of the cavillers who are forever sneering at Christian missions could see something of their results in these isles” (p. 86). See Williams, Fiji and the Fijians, and Calvert, Missionary Labors among the Cannibals, in 1 vol., 3d ed., Lond., 1870 (an interesting and exhaustive work); Lyttleton Forbes: Two Years in Fiji, Lond., 1875; Miss Cumming: At Home in Fiji, Lond., 1881 (2 vols.), and N.Y., 1882 (1 vol.). D. S. Schaff.

FILIOQUE CONTROVERSY. One of the principal differences between the Eastern and the Western Church is the addition at the latter of the word Filioque to its creed. The Apostles’ Creed has simply, “And in the Holy Ghost,” to which the Nicene Creed added, “Who proceedeth from the Father.” But there the Greek Church stopped; while the Latin Church, without the sanction of an ecumenical council, or even consultation with the Greek Church, further added, “and the Son” (Filioque). The Greek Church protested as soon as it discovered the addition; and every attempt which afterwards was made to re-establish union between the two churches, has been wrecked on this word.

The addition is met with for the first time in the acts of the third council of Toledo (589), in opposition to Arianism. From Spain it spread into France, where it seems to have been generally adopted at the time of Charlemagne. The councils of Constantineople (891) and of Nicaea (787) did not notice it. But in 800 two monks from the court of Charlemagne made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and were accused of heresy by the hermits of Mount Olivet for their use of Filioque. Charlemagne felt provoked; and the council which he convoked at Aix-la-Chapelle (809) sanctioned the use of the addition.

But Pope Leo III., whose confirmation of the decision of the council was asked for by Charlemagne, refused to formally incorporate the Filioque with the Creed, though he admitted the justness and soundness of its doctrinal bearing; and this attitude of cautious reserve the Pope endeavored to maintain so far as he could under the pressure of the steadily-growing impatience of the East and the all but universal practice of the West. Towards the close of the century, however, this attitude became impossible. Photius, in his encyclical letter, emphasizes the Filioque as one of the gravest errors of the Pope; and the Council of Constantinople anathematized it. Political circumstances compelled the Pope to take up the challenge. Nevertheless, the first time a pope actually used the addition to the Creed was in 1014, by Benedict VIII., at the crowning of Henry II. But from that moment the Pope himself appears as the defender of the practice of the Western Church, and at the Council of Ferrara-Florence he seemed to have entirely forgotten, that, at least historically, there was a flaw in his argument.

The doctrine in whose statement the word Filioque was destined to play so prominent a part is called the “Procession of the Holy Ghost.” The term comes from John xv. 25, in which Christ... speaks of the Spirit of truth who "proceedeth from the Father" (πανταί ταὶς παραφήνεσι). Inasmuch nothing is said in this passage or in any other of the "double procession," i.e., from both the Father and the Son, the Greek Church holds to the single procession, and defends its position, not only by an appeal to the text of Scripture and to the original form of the Nicene Creed, but also to the "Day of Pentecost." The Latin Church defends the double procession on the grounds of the double mission of the Spirit and the essential unity of the Son with the Father; so that, if the Spirit proceeded from the essence of the Father, he must also proceed from the essence of the Son, because they have the same essence. The Greek patriarchs declined to attend the Vatican Council of 1870, on the ground of the heresy of the Latin Church upon this point.

A compromise was suggested from the writings of John of Damascus, to say that the Spirit proceeds from the Father, through the Son. This was accepted by the conference held in Bonn (August, 1875) between the Old Catholics, Orientals, and Anglo-Catholics, in which the Filioque was surrendered as an unauthorized addition to the Creed.

FILLAN. (the Scotch form of the Irish Faelan) is the name of two Iro-Scocht saints. The one whose festival falls on June 20 had his chief churches at Ballyhealyand, Queen's County, Ireland, and at the eastern end of Loch Earn, Perthshire, Scotland. The other, whose festival falls on Jan. 9, had his chief churches at Cluain Maoscna, Westmeath County, Ireland, and at Strathfillan, Perthshire, Scotland. The legend of the latter is found in Act. Sanct., Jan. 9, Tom. I. p. 594, and in Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 342.

FINLAND. The Christianization of, is the common story of the Roman-Catholic missions in the middle ages,—the conquest of the country, the forced baptism of the people, the building of forts and castles, and the establishment of bishoprics. The Finns, a branch of the Ural-Altaic family, and allied to the Magyars, lived in scattered settlements throughout Northern Europe at the time when the migration of the nations began. Pushed farther towards the North by the Germanic peoples and the Russians, they seemed in many places to melt away; and Finland, the large peninsula between the Bosphorus Gulf and Gulf of Finland, is the only part of Europe in which a Finnish tribe succeeded in maintaining itself as a nation up to our time. The country comprises an area of 144,221 square miles, with 1,912,647 inhabitants, according to the census of 1875.

On account of their somber and savage religious rites, the ancient Finns had the reputation, among their neighbors, of being a nation of sorcerers and magicians; and their passion for piracy and plunder was, of course, not suited to mend the reputation. Sweden was especially exposed to their attacks; and the last victory of the twelfth century the Swedish king, Eric the Saint, determined to put a stop to their disturbances. As the war was waged against heathens, the campaign became a crusade; and Archbishop Henry of Upsala, an Englishman by birth, accompanied the king. After landing in Finland (1157), Eric completely defeated the Finnish army, baptized those of the soldiers he did not slay, built the fortress of Abo, and established a bishopric at Rendamacki. Christianity, however, did not make great progress in the country. Some Finns came and paid their tithes, in ermine, at Rendamacki; but the great majority of them remained heathen, and Henry was killed. Even the political ascendancy of Sweden waned away; and small support for it was derived from the elevation of the slain Henry to a saint, and the patron of the country. But in 1248 Birger Jarl made a new campaign, and built the fortress Tavaste; and in 1268, under the reign of the young King Birger, the Swedish chancellor, Torkil Knutson, completed the conquest of the whole country, built the fortress of Viborg, moved the episcopal see from Rendamacki to Abo, and made Finland a Christian province. It was found, however, when in the sixteenth century the Reformation was introduced in the country from Sweden, that most of the inhabitants, even such as regularly paid their ermine tithes, lived in utter ignorance of Christianity, and in open enjoyment of their heathen licenches. The Lutheran Church upon this point.

In 1809 the country came under Russia, but a considerable measure of national independence was granted to it. The Czar of Russia bears the title of Grand Duke of Finland; yet the government of all the inns, especially the ecclesiastical affairs of the country, is completely separated from that of Russia. Of the population, ninety-eight per cent belong to the Lutheran Church, and only two per cent to the Greek-Russian Church or other denominations; but there is complete freedom for other religious bodies. The Lutheran Church is represented by the Archbishop of Abo, the Bishops of Borgå and Kuopio, and an ecclesiastical assembly, consisting of thirty-four clerical and fifty lay members, and convened every ten years. The country has four hundred and forty-eight primary schools, besides a number of itinerant teachers in the sparsely settled regions, three seminaries, and a university with a flourishing theological faculty. The official language is Finnish. Swedish is spoken only in a few parishes. See Ruhn: Finland und seine Bewohner, Leipzig, 1808; and Bishop Reuter-
FINLEY, James Bradley, a distinguished pioneer of Methodism in Ohio; b. in North Carolina, July 1, 1781; d. at Cincinnati, Sept. 6, 1856. Joining the Ohio Conference in 1806, he was made presiding elder 1816. In 1821 he was sent to the Wyandotte Indians, where his labors were attended with much success. From 1845 to 1849 he was chaplain of the Ohio Penitentiary. He was a man of rugged eloquence and large influence. His chief works are Wyandotte Mission, Sketches of Western Methodism (Cincinnati, 1857), Life among the Indians (Cincinnati, 1857), Memoirs of Prison Life (Cincinnati, 1890).

LIT. — Autobiog. of J. B. Finley, Cincinnati, 1854; Stevens: Hist. of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, vol. iv.

FINLEY, Robert, D.D., a Presbyterian divine; b. in Princeton, 1772; d. at Athens, Ga., 1817. He graduated from Princeton College in his sixteenth year. After studying theology under Dr. Witherspoon, he became pastor at Basing Ridge, N.J., 1795. In 1803 a powerful revival was felt in his church, a hundred and twenty persons being admitted at one communion. He took a very prominent part in the organization of the Civilization Society (1816). In 1817 he accepted the presidency of the University of Georgia (Franklin College), located at Athens, where he died a few months after. Several of his sermons were published during his lifetime.

FINLEY, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, and president of Princeton College; b. in Ireland, 1715; d. July 17, 1799. He came to America in 1734, and studied, so it is supposed, under Mr. Tennent in Log College. Licensed in 1740 by the presbytery of New Brunswick, he co-operated vigorously with the friends of revival preaching. In 1743 he was called to Milford, Conn., but was before many months expelled from the colony for preaching beyond the limits of the society. He was pastor of another church in New York, and reached to England, which Mr. Finney visited in 1849 and 1858, preaching with much power. In 1832 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Second Free Church of New-York City, and, two years later, another to the recently organized Congregational Church known as the Broadway Tabernacle. In 1835 he went to Oberlin as professor, where he continued to labor till the time of his death as instructor of theology, pastor, and college president (1852). During his residence at Oberlin he still continued, as before, to hold revival meetings in Eastern cities until 1860.

Mr. Finney's career naturally falls under the two heads of revivalist preacher and theological teacher. His power as a preacher was very great; and his labors produced, in many places, wonderful effects. Wherever he went, extensive revivals prevailed. His manner was vigorous, direct, and personal. He used simple language and illustrations. His presentation was clear, and strictly logical. He directed his appeals to the conscience, rather than the affections, and made it tremble and quake by the most searching analysis of the motives of the heart. On one occasion he says, "Everybody was out at meeting, and the Lord let me loose upon them in a wonderful manner" (Autobiog., p. 100). He chose for themes those passages which delineate the sinner's condition as one of conscious alienation from God, and sinning against him. He dwelt upon the enmity of the carnal mind, the want of holiness, and the certain destruction of the impenitent. He called upon his hearers to come to an immediate decision, and submit to God. "Instead of telling sinners," he says, "to use the means of grace, and pray for a new heart, I called on them to make themselves a new heart and spirit, and pressed the duty of immediate surrender to God" (Autobiog., p. 189). These meetings were often accompanied by violent bodily manifestations; and Finney practised the methods of calling upon the audiences to go forward to the anxious-bench, or to rise in attestation of new resolutions. These attendant circumstances, and Mr. Finney's methods of preaching, early evoked criticism and strong opposition. Mr. Nettleton and Dr. Beecher were among the opponents of the “new measures;” and a convention was held in July, 1827, at New Lebanon, of prominent ministers (such as Dr. Hawes of Hartford, Edwards of Andover, Beecher of Boston, Beman of Troy, etc.), to take the whole matter into consideration. However, with better information, the opposition decreased. Mr. Finney’s preaching reached all classes; lawyers and educated men being particularly convinced by it, as notably at Rochester.

As a teacher at Oberlin, Mr. Finney’s influence was also great. He was an original thinker, and very positive in his convictions. His lectures on theology define his position as a theologian. It is here not necessary to do more than merely state the West.

As one of the leaders of the Church of Asia Minor, he was regarded as notably at Rochester.

...
that a feeling of gratitude toward the Giver of all good was shown by the first men in offering the first-fruits, or the first and best which they had. What seems to have been at first a natural following first-fruit offerings. (a) On the morrow after the Passover sabbath (i.e., on the 16th of Nisan) a sheaf of new corn was to be brought to the priest, and waved before the altar. This offering was accompanied by a lamb as sacrifice, two tenth-deals of flour, and a drink offering of a fourth part of a hin of wine (Exod. xxix. 39 sq.; Lev. xxiii. 9 sq.). (b) Seven weeks from this time (i.e., at the Feast of Pentecost), an oblation was to be made of two loaves made of two tenth-deals of flour. They were accompanied by a butter-cup and two rams, a meat and drink offering, a sin offering of one kid of the goats, and two lambs for a peace offering, which were waved with the loaves, but afterwards belonged to the priests (Lev. xxiiiil. 17 sq.). (c) The Feast of Ingathering the firstfruits of the vintage, the twentieth day of the seventh month, was itself an acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest (Exod. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiiiil. 39).

Besides these stated occasions, every Israelite was to consecrate to the Lord a part of the first-fruit of the land; as of oil, honey, dough, wool,—in fact, of every thing. The fruits of every newly-planted tree were not to be eaten or sold, or used in any way for the first three years, but considered "uncircumcised," or unclean. In the fourth year, however, the first-fruits were to be consecrated to the Lord, and in the fifth year became available to the owner (Lev. xix. 23 sq.). As the quantity of these offerings was not fixed by the law, but was left to the good will of the individual (Deut. xvi. 10), tradition has laid down rules and regulations, with such minuteness as only rabbinism is capable of; and the Talmudic treatises, Biccurim and Talmudic (cf. art. Talmod) are especially full on this matter. For a description of a Bicurim procession, see Deitzsch: Jewish Artisan Life at the Time of Jesus, Eng. trans., Lond., 1877, p. 94 sqq. (Ger. orig., p. 66 sqq.). Rüetschi (B. Pick).

FIRST-FRUTS, Ecclesiastical. See Taxes, Ecclesiastical.

FISCH, George, D.D., b. at Nyon, Canton de Vaud, Switzerland, July 6, 1814; d. at Vallorbe, Switzerland, Sunday, July 3, 1881. He studied theology at Lausanne, and was for five years pastor of a vernacular German church at Yenigut; he joined and two rams, a meat and drink offering, a sin offering of one kid of the goats, and two lambs for a peace offering, which were waved with the loaves, but afterwards belonged to the priests (Lev. xxiiiil. 17 sq.). (c) The Feast of Ingathering the firstfruits of the vintage, the twentieth day of the seventh month, was itself an acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest (Exod. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiiiil. 39).

Besides these stated occasions, every Israelite was to consecrate to the Lord a part of the first-fruit of the land; as of oil, honey, dough, wool,—in fact, of every thing. The fruits of every newly-planted tree were not to be eaten or sold, or used in any way for the first three years, but considered "uncircumcised," or unclean. In the fourth year, however, the first-fruits were to be consecrated to the Lord, and in the fifth year became available to the owner (Lev. xix. 23 sq.). As the quantity of these offerings was not fixed by the law, but was left to the good will of the individual (Deut. xvi. 10), tradition has laid down rules and regulations, with such minuteness as only rabbinism is capable of; and the Talmudic treatises, Biccurim and Talmudic (cf. art. Talmod) are especially full on this matter. For a description of a Bicurim procession, see Deitzsch: Jewish Artisan Life at the Time of Jesus, Eng. trans., Lond., 1877, p. 94 sqq. (Ger. orig., p. 66 sqq.). Rüetschi (B. Pick).

FIRST-FRUTS, Ecclesiastical. See Taxes, Ecclesiastical.

FISCH, George, D.D., b. at Nyon, Canton de Vaud, Switzerland, July 6, 1814; d. at Vallorbe, Switzerland, Sunday, July 3, 1881. He studied theology at Lausanne, and was for five years pastor of a vernacular German church at Yenigut; he joined and two rams, a meat and drink offering, a sin offering of one kid of the goats, and two lambs for a peace offering, which were waved with the loaves, but afterwards belonged to the priests (Lev. xxiiiil. 17 sq.). (c) The Feast of Ingathering the firstfruits of the vintage, the twentieth day of the seventh month, was itself an acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest (Exod. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiiiil. 39).

Besides these stated occasions, every Israelite was to consecrate to the Lord a part of the first-fruit of the land; as of oil, honey, dough, wool,—in fact, of every thing. The fruits of every newly-planted tree were not to be eaten or sold, or used in any way for the first three years, but considered "uncircumcised," or unclean. In the fourth year, however, the first-fruits were to be consecrated to the Lord, and in the fifth year became available to the owner (Lev. xix. 23 sq.). As the quantity of these offerings was not fixed by the law, but was left to the good will of the individual (Deut. xvi. 10), tradition has laid down rules and regulations, with such minuteness as only rabbinism is capable of; and the Talmudic treatises, Biccurim and Talmudic (cf. art. Talmod) are especially full on this matter. For a description of a Bicurim procession, see Deitzsch: Jewish Artisan Life at the Time of Jesus, Eng. trans., Lond., 1877, p. 94 sqq. (Ger. orig., p. 66 sqq.). Rüetschi (B. Pick).

FIRST-FRUTS, Ecclesiastical. See Taxes, Ecclesiastical.
FISK, Wilbur, D.D., first president of Wesleyan University; b. in Brattleborough, Vt., Aug. 31, 1792; d. at Middletown, Conn., Feb. 22, 1839. After graduating at Brown University, he gave himself up to the study of law, but soon changed his mind, and became an itinerant preacher in the Methodist Church. In 1828 he was appointed principal of the Wilbraham Academy, and in 1830 of the new university at Middletown, Conn. While travelling in Europe in 1833, he was elected bishop, but declined the office. Dr. Fisk was a saintly man and an enthusiastic educator. Among his works are The Calvinistic Divinity (N.Y., 1837), Travels in Europe (N.Y., 1838), Sermons and Lectures on Universalism. See [ALVAN] BOND: Memoir of W. Fisk, Boston, 1838; ANDERSON: Oriental Missions, Boston, 1872, i. 1-33.

FISK, Pliny, a devoted American missionary in the Levant; b. at Albano in Istria (hence the surname Illyricus); d. at Francfort, March 11, 1575; was very early sent to Venice to study ancient languages, and was about to enter a monastery and become a monk, when, through the influence of his father, a provincial of the Minorites, advised him to go to Germany, and study theology there. He visited first Basel (1539), then Augsburg, and came in 1541 to Wittenberg, where he was kindly received by Luther and Melanchthon; and in 1544 was appointed professor in Hebrew. He also lectured on the Epistles of Paul and on Aristotle; but his activity was suddenly interrupted by the outbreak of the Smalcaldian war. He fled to Brunswick, where he lived by teaching school; but, though he was recalled by the elector Maurice, the establishment of the Leipzig Interim drove him away again, and he settled at Magdeburg (1549), where printing and publication were still free. The literary activity he there developed against the Interim, in the adiaphoristic controversy and in the Osiander, Schwenkfeld, and Major controversies, was very comprehensive, and of great influence: but it placed him in direct opposition to Melanchthon. And when, in 1557, he was appointed professor at Jena, together with Museus and Wingard, Jena became the headquarters of the strict Lutheran party, as Wittenberg was that of the Philippians. In the beginning he exercised the duties of the deanship of affairs in Saxony, but, having lost the confidence of the duke, he was discharged in 1561, and went to Regensburg. There he endeavored to found an academy, but his plans were frustrated by his enemies. In 1566 the magistrates of the city even withdrew their protection, and he was glad to accept an invitation to Antwerp. The progress, however, of the Spanish army, soon compelled him to leave that city; and he betook himself to Francfort. Meanwhile a somewhat hasty utterance of his raised the storm of persecution into a very whirlwind. In an essay accompanying his Clavis, he declared (1567) hereditary sin to be the very substance of human nature since the fall; and this untenable proposition was immediately made the basis for an accusation of Manicheism. Even his old friends from Jena, ultra-Lutherans like himself, attacked him in the harshest manner; and every thing he did in order to come to an understanding with them was in vain. Expelled from Francfort, he went to Strassburg; expelled from Strassburg, too, he returned to Francfort, but was hardly allowed to die there.

FIVE-MILE ACT (called also Oxford Act, the session of Parliament which passed it having met at Oxford), entitled "An Act to restrain Nonconformists from inhabiting Corporations," was promulgated by Clarendon, Archbishop Sheldon, and others, and passed by Parliament in 1665. It enjoined upon all nonconformists an oath not to take up arms against the king, or attempt any alteration of government either in Church or State." It forbade their approach within five miles of any corporation represented in Parliament, or any place where they had preachers, on penalty of a fine of forty pounds for each offence. A penalty of forty pounds was also enacted against those who, refusing to take the oath, taught school or kept boarders. Any offence against the act might be punished with six months' imprisonment. This legislation caused intense suffering among the nonconformists, only very few of them took the oath. See NEAL: Hist. of Puritanism, ii. p. 255 sqq. (Harper's ed.); GREEK: Hist. of Engl. People, iii. 375 sqq.
That there was something narrow and exclusive in his stand-point, something obstinate and bitter which overtook him may not have been altogether undeserved. But the great ability of the man, and the fundamental integrity of his character, are proven by his brilliant scientific performances,—the Catalogus testium veritatis, answering the Romanist's objection to the Reformation as a mere innovation; the Magdeburg Centuries, of which he was the originator and leading spirit (see Centuries, Magdeburg); and the Clavis scripturae sacrae, the basis of biblical hermeneutics.

The antipathy which for centuries has clung to his name is unjust. W. Preger has recently vindicated his memory by his excellent work, Matthias Flacius Illigicus und seine Zeit, Erlangen, 1859-61. [See also J. W. Schlote, Beiträge zur Entstehungsgeschichte d. Magdeburger Centurien, Niesse, 1877.]

FLAGELLANTS (Flagellantes), Brothers of the Cross (crucifrati), Crossbearers (cruciferi), Brothers in White (sahne, their shoes and stockings), and Indefinites (acephali), because they had broken with the hierarchy, are the names of morbid fanatics from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century. The prelude to the Flagellant pilgrimages was the fraternity brought into life by the preaching of Anthony of Padua (about 1210). The men composing it went about in large bodies, singing, and scourging themselves. In 1260–61 many of the inhabitants of the Guelph city of Perugia began suddenly, as if vehemently moved by a mighty spirit of repentance, to flagellate themselves with leather thongs. High and low, old and young, went together in procession two and two, with bodies bare above the waist, through the streets. Their numbers increased like an avalanche. Some marched through Lombardy to Provence; others went to Rome. The Pope did not molest them, as they did not resist the ecclesiastical authorities; and a perceptible improvement in morals, the reconciliation of enemies, and generous gifts of alms, attested the sincerity of their penance.

In Italy the enthusiasm soon cooled; but beyond the Alps it broke out afresh, and in 1291 large bodies of Flagellants marched in Bohemia, Saxony, the Upper Rhine country, Austria, Bavaria, and Poland. They marched two or three abreast, with body bare above the waist, and face veiled. They were preceded by flags or crosses, and flagellated themselves twice a day for thirty-three days, in memory of the three years of our Lord's life. They accompanied the strokes of the scourge with the music of hymns (among which was the Stabat Mater of Jacopone da Todi). At first priests were found in the ranks. But the Flagellants soon came to be accused of opposing the hierarchy, and the clergy not only separated themselves from their company, but preached against them, and persecuted them, so that by the end of the year hardly a vestige was left in Germany of their existence.

The movement was at its height in the fourteenth century. They made their first appearance again in Italy, and impetus was given by the terrible plague which in 1347–49 ran through Europe, carrying off 60,000 people in Florence, 100,000 in Venice, 1,200,000 in Germany, not to mention other cities and lands. While many gave full sway to their passions, and some sat down in despair, others gave themselves up to self-inflicted flagellations, in the hope of appeasing the divine anger, and with the purpose of preparing for the end of the world, which they regarded as being near at hand. On the 17th of April, 1349, the first Flagellant fraternity appeared in Magdeburg. This was quickly followed by others in Würzburg, Speyer, and Strassburg. They were regarded with awe on all sides; and the movement spread throughout all Germany, and extended to Denmark and England. Women were also found in the ranks. There was a regular organization, and conditions of membership. The candidate had to have the permission of his wife, promise obedience, have at least four shillings and fourpence to defray expenses, as begging was prohibited, etc. When they came to towns, the bands marched in regular military order, and singing hymns. At the time of flagellation they selected a square, or churchyard, or field. Taking off their shoes and stockings, and forming a tepee, they girded themselves with aprons, and laid down flat on the ground. The particular position or gesture of each signified his chief sin. (“They fell on their back, side, or belly, according to the nature of their sin” (Chron. Thuring.)).

The leader, then stepping over each one, touched them with the whip, and bade them rise. As each was touched, they followed after the leader, and imitated him. Once all on their feet, the flagellation began. The brethren went two by two around the whole circle, striking their backs till the blood trickled down from the wounds. The whip consisted of three thongs, each with four iron teeth. During the flagellation a hymn was sung. After all had gone around the circle, the whole body again fell on the ground, beating upon their breasts. On arising they flagellated themselves a second time. While the brethren were putting on their clothes, a collection was taken up among the audience. The scene was concluded by the reading of a letter from Christ which an angel had brought to earth, and which commended the pilgrimages of the Flagellants. The fraternities never tarried longer than a single day in a town. Though Barendt [see also J. W. Schlote, Beitrdge zur Entwicklungsgeschichte d. Magdeburger Centurien, Niesse, 1877.] described them as a burden to the people. Nine thousand passed through Strassburg alone in three months. The clergy inveighed against their assumption. The arrival of a band at Avignon was finally the occasion for Clement VI. to issue a bull (Oct. 20, 1349) forbidding their pilgrimages, and commanding the authorities in Church and State to suppress them. This was efficacious; and only now and then did the enthusiasm break out again. The trial of a Flagellant in Anhalt, 1481, is the last vestige of the movement in Germany.

The fraternities which appeared at the end of the fourteenth century, in Italy, France, and Spain, were of a different character, but likewise pleaded a divine command. Christ and Mary appeared to a peasant; and impetus was given that the destruction of the world could only be averted on condition of a Flagellant pilgrimage. In 1398 large bands appeared in Genoa, clad in long whi...
FLAVEL. 818

FLAVEL.

GARMENTS which covered the head, and had only two holes for the eyes. Priests and bishops joined them. But in 1399 Boniface IX. had one of their number executed, and the fanaticism disappeared. The Council of Constance took the matter under discussion [and Gerson wrote a tract against them, "Contra Sectum Flagellantum."]. Flagellating fraternities existed in France in the sixteenth century, were used by Henry III., and suppressed by Henry IV. [So late as 1820 a procession of Flagellants passed through the streets of Lisbon.]

FLAVEL, John, an eminent English Nonconformist divine, the son of a minister; b. in Worcestershire about 1627; d. in Exeter, June 28, 1691. He was educated at Oxford, and became curate of Deptford. From there he went to Dartmouth in 1646. By the Act of Uniformity he was deprived of his living, with two thousand others, and retired to Hudscott Hall, in Devonshire, where he was liberally supported by the lord of the domain. He preached privately in the woods and remote places until, at the expulsion of the Stuarts, he returned to Dartmouth, and labored as pastor of the Nonconformist Church. Flavel was a prolific writer on practical religion; and some of his works are eminently adapted to stimulate piety. His principal works were suppressed by Henry IV. [So late as 1820 a procession of Flagellants passed through the streets of Lisbon.]

HERZOG.

FLAVIANUS, Patriarch of Antioch (381-404), sprung from a rich and distinguished family, but devoted himself from early youth to a life of severe asceticism. While still a layman, he and his friend Diodorus, afterwards Bishop of Tarsus, formed the centre of the opposition to the Arian tendencies of Bishop Leontius. By Meletius he was made a presbyter; and in 381 he accompanied Bishop Leontius, when a procession of Flagellants passed through the streets of Lisbon. But in 387, when the procession of Flagellants passed through the streets of Lisbon, Flavian made a voyage to Constantinople, and succeeded in appeasing the wrath of Theodosius. See Socrat.: Hist. Eccl., V.; Sozomen: Hist. Eccl., VIII.; Theodoret: Hist. Eccl., II.

FLAVIANUS succeeded Proclus as Bishop of Constantinople, in 447, and played a prominent part in the Eutychian controversy. Deposed by the synod of Ephesus (449), he died, on his way into exile, at Epipa in Lydia. But on the accession of Marcian and Pulcheria a re-action set in. His remains were brought to Constantinople, and interred in the Church of the Apostles, with great solemnity; and his name was inscribed among those of the martyrs. See Act. Sanct. III., Feb., and the article Eutyches.

FLECHIER, Esprit, b. at Pernes, in the county of Avignon, June 10, 1692; d. at Montpellier, Feb. 16, 1710; was educated by the Jesuits, and studied theology in Paris, but devoted himself chiefly to poetry, and attracted some attention by a Latin poem on a grand tournament held by Louis XIV. Compelled to leave Paris on account of poverty, he lived for some time in the country, as a tutor and school-teacher, but returned again to Paris, and gained soon a high reputation as a preacher. Especially his funeral orations became very celebrated; and in 1673 he became a member of the Academy, together with Racine. In 1685 he was made Bishop of Laval, and in 1687 of Nimes. As a bishop he was greatly beloved, even by the Protestants, who hid in his diocese on account of his mildness and great benevolence. A collected edition of his works appeared, in 10 vols., at Nimes, 1782. His life was written by A. Delacroix, Paris, 1805, 2 vols.

FLEETWOOD, John, the name, probably assumed, under which a life of Christ, Lives of the Apostles, John the Baptist, and the Virgin Mary, usually found together, were issued. These have very frequently been printed. Before the modern elaborate Lives of Christ, which are far superior in point of scholarship, appeared, Fleetwood's was almost the only one found in Christian families. Two other volumes, The Christian Prayer-Book, London, 1772, and The Christian's Dictionary, 1773, are attributed to him.

FLEETWOOD, William, a learned English prelate; b. in London, Jan. 21, 1650; d. at Totten-ham, Middlesex, Aug. 4, 1723. He was educated at Cambridge; became Canon of Windsor 1702, Bishop of St. Asaph 1706, and of Ely 1714. He was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. A complete collection of his Sermons, Tracts, etc., appeared at London, 1737; Complete Works, 3 vols., Oxford, 1854.

FLESH (mlp€) Biblical Meaning of. The Bible has different representations of man's material nature. The term "flesh" is always used with reference to man's body; so that Chrysostom's comment on Gal. v. 16 is anything but precise, —"The flesh (σάρξ) is not the body, nor the essence of the body, but the evil disposition, the earthly, lustful, and lawless reason." The same is true of Julius Müller's definition,—"The flesh is the tendency or inclination of human life turned away from God, the life and movement of man in the midst of the things of this visible world." The flesh is regarded as being endued with mind (νοῦς), soul (δύναμις), and body (σάρξ) (Gal. v. 16, 1 John ii. 16), will, δύναμις (Eph. ii. 3), etc. It cannot, therefore, stand for a disposition of the will. But as σώματος ("world") designates, not a tendency of the world hostile to God, but the world with that tendency, so σάρξ ("flesh") designates, not a tendency or disposition of the flesh, but the flesh itself with that disposition.

Flesh is the substance of the body. It is sometimes used with the bones, as constituting the body (Luke xxiv. 39), or with blood (1 Cor. xv. 50). By synecdoche it is used for the body (Ps. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. x. 3). This use of the term is a Hebrew idiom, and is really foreign to the Greek; so that the LXX. often translates the Hebrew word נָפֶשׁ ("flesh") by σῶμα ("body"). The expression "all flesh" is sometimes used for the race in its totality (Gen. vi. 17), but usually for the race as human (Gen. vi. 12; Luke iii. 6, etc.).

We are thus led to the peculiarity of the biblical use of the word. It designates man, because man appears through it, and manifests his nature by it. Thus, as flesh, he is weak and frail, "a wind that passeth away" (Ps. lxxxviii. 39). Flesh is not spirit, nor vital power (Isa. xxxi. 3), but stands in living and moral contrast to spirit, the spirit of God (Deut. xv. 20).

Flesh also indicates the peculiarity of man's visible or tangible nature. Thus it is opposed to σῶμα, or spirit (Col. ii. 1, 5); and a distinguishing characteristic of the earthly life is that it is a "life in the flesh" (Phil. i. 22). To boast of the flesh means to build on man's visible nature. The expression "The Word was made flesh" (John i. 14) gets its force from the contrast with (ver. 1) "The Word was God." The same contrast is brought out in Ps. i. 5, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 8, 2 Cor. xiii. 4. The flesh then designates human nature as weak (Matt. xxvi. 41) and sinful in contrast to God.

The sinfulness of the flesh is specially brought out by Paul (Rom. vii. 3). In this sense he calls the body a "body of the flesh," σῶμα τῆς σαρκός (Col. ii. 11), and life a "walking in the flesh" (2 Cor. x. 3). But sinful flesh is not a disposition (Chrysostom and Müller), as above quoted, nor is it sufficient, with Neander, to define it as "human nature in its alienation from God," nor, with Holsten, to describe it as essentially finite and evil, so that in the Pauline theology sin was a necessity. The flesh is only the substance of the body, the seat of sin, but not essentially evil; it is man's human or bodily nature, as Hofmann says (Schriftenwerke, I. 559), in the state in which it was left after the fall.

The flesh contains the germ of physical life (John i. 13, iii. 6); it is the essence: the body is the form. Sin now inheres in the flesh, and therefore all who are sons of Adam are sinners, because he was a sinner; and he who overcomes the flesh overcomes it by a conflict between the νοῦς ("mind") and the flesh, and thereby overcomes sin. Christ entered into the flesh with all the consequences of sin or the fall (Col. i. 22; Heb. ii. 14); but his own spiritual nature overcame, so to speak, at the very beginning, its disposition to sin.

FLETCHER, Giles, preacher and religious poet; b. in Cranbrook, Kent, about 1584; d. at Alderton, 1623. He was educated at Cambridge, where he remained till 1617, preaching with much acceptance from the pulpit of St. Mary's. He then became rector of Alderton, Suffolk. Fletcher is principally known by a poem published in 1610,—Christ's Victory and Triumph in Heaven, in Earth, and over and after Death. It is one of the "most remarkable religious poems in the language," and furnished not a little material to the author of Paradise Regained. In 1623 he published The Reward of the Faithful, a theological treatise in prose. The latter has not been republished. See Groseart's edition of the Victory and Triumph, Lond., 1869.

FLETCHER, John William, Vicar of Madeley, associate of John Wesley, and one of the most pious and useful men of his generation; was b. at Nyon, Switzerland, Sept. 12, 1729; d. at Madeley, Eng., Aug. 14, 1785. His original name was De la Fléchière. He was a fine scholar in his youth, studying German, Hebrew, etc., and taking off all the prizes at the school in Geneva which he attended. He was designed by his parents for the ministry, but preferred the army. Against their wishes he went to Lisbon and enlisted, but was providentially prevented from going to Brazil, a servant spilling, the very morning of the intended embarkation, a kettle of boiling water on his limbs, which confined him for some time in bed. The vessel was lost at sea. Fletcher returned to Switzerland, but, not disheartened, went to Flanders at the invitation of his uncle, who promised to secure a commission in the army for him. But the sudden death of his relative, and the termination of the war, again providentially interfered with his plans. He now went to England, and, after acquiring a good knowledge of the language, became tutor in the family of T. Hill, Esq., of Shropshire, in 1752.

A new period soon began in Fletcher's history. His curiosity being aroused by a casual conversation, he went to hear the Methodists. Their language about faith was a new revelation to him, but it was not till two years later that he gained peace in believing. In 1757 he was ordained priest by the Bishop of Bangor. During the next few years he preached occasionally for John Wesley and others, and became known as a public supporter of the great religious revival. In 1760 he accepted the living of Madeley, after having refused the living of Dunham with much easier work and a much larger salary. He accepted this position against the advice of Mr. Wesley, with whom, however, he preserved a lifelong friendship, so that he is called by Tyerman (Life of Wesley, iii. 463) "Wesley's most valuable friend."

For twenty-five years, with the exception of the interval between 1776 and 1781, when the feeble state of his health forced him to take a respite from work, Fletcher labored at Madeley with singular devotion and zeal. The parish was very much run down, and the people knew little or nothing of vital religion, when he became vicar. He preached with great fervor the plain truths of the gospel, and labored incessantly during the week to awaken sinners. Now he rose at five o'clock Sabbath morning, and went through the neighboring church ringing a bell, that no one might be able to give an excuse for non-attendance at church that he did not awake early enough. Now he appeared suddenly at vulgar entertainments, and with Knox-like fearlessness preached to the astounded revellers upon the folly of forbidden pleasures. "Those sinners," says John Wesley, "that tried to hide themselves from him, he pursued to every corner of his parish by all sorts of means, public and private, early and late," etc. Great and blessed results necessarily followed from such fidelity. In 1768 he was called to preside over Lady Huntington's College at Trewecca, Wales. He accepted the position, but did not leave his parish. Disagreements with the authorities on points of doctrine led him to resign in 1771, but no unpleasantness was connected with the resignation.

As a preacher, Fletcher directed his appeals to the conscience. He was well trained, and had a fine voice. J. Wesley said, that, if he had had physical strength, he would have been the most eloquent preacher in England. As a man, he was characterized by saintly piety, rare devotion to God, and blamelessness of life, which Wesley said he had not found equalled in Europe or America. In the judgment of Southey, "no age ever produced a man of more fervent piety, or more perfect charity, and no church ever possessed a more apostolic minister;" and, according to Bishop Ryle, "his devotion has been equalled by few, and probably surpassed by none."

In theology, Fletcher was an Arminian of Arminians. Most of his writings are directed against Calvinism, were written to defend Mr. Wesley, and grew out of controversies with Toplady and Mr. Rowland Hill. Some of these works are still extensively circulated, and are authorities in the Methodist churches. However, controversial as his writings are, Fletcher was not a polemic, but always treated his opponents with fairness and courtesy, and in this presented a marked contrast to Toplady. He was also a millennialist (see his letter to John Wesley, Nov. 28, 1755).

FLEURY, Claude, b. in Paris, Dec. 6, 1640; d. there July 14, 1723; was educated by the Jesuits at Clermont; studied law in Paris, and practised as an advocate for nine years, but changed his career, was ordained priest in 1672, and lived there until his death at the age of 81. He was an ardent student and a prolific writer. He was made Abbé of Loc-Dieu (1684), member of the Academy (1696), prior of Argenteuil (1709), when he resigned his abbacy, and was throughout a friend of Fénelon. The results of his juridical studies came out in his Histoire du droit français (Paris, 1674, last ed., 1822) and Institution au droit ecclésiastique (1692, often republished) in which he wrote Les maurs des Israelites (1681, Eng. trans., Lond., 1756, 2d ed., enlarged, by Adam Clarke, Manchester, 1805, and New York, 1880), Les maurs des Chrisiens (1852, last ed., 1810, trans. Newcastle, 1786), and several other historical sketches of a pedagogical tendency. But his principal work is his Histoire ecclésiastique (Paris, 1691 sqq. 20 vols., extending to 1414, but continued to 1584 by Claude Fabre, in 16 vols., 1732-36, with 4 vols. of indexes, 40 vols. in all), a work of considerable merit, designed for the educated public in general, and still read with satisfaction. In 1722-36, with 4 vols. of indexes, 40 vols. in all), a work of considerable merit, designed for the educated public in general, and still read with satisfaction. In 1722-36, with 4 vols. of indexes, 40 vols. in all), a work of considerable merit, designed for the educated public in general, and still read with satisfaction. In 1722-36, with 4 vols. of indexes, 40 vols. in all), a work of considerable merit, designed for the educated public in general, and still read with satisfaction.
indesatigable zeal, fervent piety, and rare talent of organization. Left an orphan at the age of thirteen, he studied at Giessen, Göttingen, and Hessen-Darmstadt, and returned to Cologne, and began to doubt his fitness for the ministry, when he received and accepted, in November, 1821, what he considered a providential call, with the promise of a salary of a hundred and eighty Prussian dollars, from a small Protestant clergyman at Kaiserswerth, a Roman-Catholic town of eighteen hundred inhabitants, on the Lower Rhine, below Düsseldorf. The failure of a silk manufactory, upon which the town depended largely for support, led him to undertake, in the spring of 1822, a collecting tour to keep his struggling congregation alive. By the end of the week he returned with twelve hundred thalers. This was the beginning of much greater things. By experience and perseverance he became one of the greatest benefactors in the service of Christ. In the year 1823 he made a tour to Holland and England, which not only resulted in a permanent endowment of his congregation, but suggested to him the idea of his benevolent institutions. "In both these Protestant countries," he tells us himself, "I became acquainted with a multitude of charitable institutions for the benefit both of body and soul. I saw schools and other educational organizations, almshouses, orphanages, hospitals, prisons, and societies for the reformation of prisoners, Bible and missionary societies, etc.; and at the same time I observed that it was a living faith in Christ which had called almost every one of these institutions and societies into life, and still preserved them in activity. This evidence of the practical power and fertility of such a principle had a most powerful influence in strengthening my own faith."

Fliedner made two more journeys to Holland, England, and Scotland (in 1822 and 1853), in the interest no more of his congregation, but of his institutions. He also visited the United States in 1849. Twice he travelled to the East, — in 1851 to aid Bishop Gobat in founding a house of deaconesses in Jerusalem, and again in 1857, when he was, however, too feeble to proceed farther than Jaffa. King Frederick William IV. of Prussia and his Queen Elizabeth took the most cordial interest in his labors for the sick and poor, granted him several audiences, furnished him liberally with means, and founded a Christian hospital, with deaconesses at Berlin (Bethany) after the model of Kaiserswerth. In the parsonage garden at Kaiserswerth there still stands the little summer-house, with one room of ten feet square, and an attic over it, which was the first asylum for released female prisoners, and the humble cradle of all Fliedner's institutions, the most important of which is the institution of Evangelical Deaconesses, founded in 1838 on the basis of the apostolic precedent, and with some resemblance to the catholic sisterhoods of charity, but without binding vows. At his death the number of deaconesses in connection with Kaiserswerth and its branch establishments exceeded four hundred. In 1873 there were thirty-four houses, with over seventeen hundred nursing and teaching sisters; in 1878 the institutions of Fliedner's in England, France, Scandinavia, Russia, and Austria, rose to fifty-two, and the number of sisters to nearly four thousand, who labored on eleven hundred stations.

PHILIP SCHIAFF.

FLODOARD, or FROADD, or FLAVALDUS, b. at Epernay in 884; d. March 28, 989; was canon at the cathedral of Rheims, and wrote a poem in hexameter, and in three parts, on the life of Christ, the exploits of the first martyrs, and the history of the popes; a chronicle (Annales) of his own time, from 919 to 966, best edition in Pertz, M. G. Script., III.; and a Historia Ecclesiae Remensis, first published by Sirmond, Paris, 1611. There is a collected edition of his works by Le Jeune, Rheims, 1854, also in Mine, Patrol. Lat., vol. CXXXV.

FLOOD. See NOAH.

FLORE, The Order of (Floriacenses, or Flores, to be distinguished from Floriacum, the Latin name of the abbey of Fluerus), was founded by Joachim, Abbot of Flore (Fiore), in Calabria (1111-30); which article see. The constitution of the order was confirmed by Coelestine III. (1196), and its houses were richly endowed by Henry VI. and his wife Constantia. It spread rapidly, and numbered many monasteries, not only in Calabria, but throughout Italy. Originally it rose as a branch of the Cistercian order; but its rules were more severe, and this circumstance gave Gregory IX. occasion to forbid the Cistercians to receive any Floriacenian into their order. The Cistercians became infuriated at this slight, and did their utmost to ruin the privileged rival; they finally succeeded. In the beginning of the sixteenth century the order of Flore disappeared. Most of the members joined the Cistercians; others, the Carthusians or the Dominicans. See HELOY, Histoire des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-18, 8 vols.

FLORENC, Council of. See FERRARA-FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF.

FLORIAN, a martyr, and a saint in the Roman-Catholic Church, whose day falls on March 4. He was a soldier in the army of Diocletian (284-305), and was drowned in the Enns, because he confessed the Christian faith. On the spot where his corpse drifted ashore, a magnificent monastery was afterwards built. But his remains were brought to Rome, where they rested until 1183, when Pope Lucius III. presented them to King Casimir of Poland. Thus St. Florian became the patron saint of Poland.

FLORUS (not Drepanius, surnamed Magister, on account of his great learning; or Diacus, from... his ecclesiastical position), lived at Lyons in the ninth century, and took a prominent part in the dogmatical controversies of his time. A decided adversary of Paschalis Radbertus's doctrine of transubstantiation, he taught that there is no complete participation in the body and blood of Christ than that through faith, and calls the bread the mystical body of the Lord. See his Expositio in Canon. Missar, written before 834, and first printed in Paris, 1548, though without his name.
In the controversy concerning predestination he wrote his Liber adversus Joh. Scott erroneas de finitiones (852) and Sermo de predestinatione, though without fully adopting the ideas of Gottschalk.
He was present at the first synod convened in the case by Hincmar, at Chiercy, 849. In the controversy between Agobard and Amalarius he wrote a number of passionate letters, which made much noise in their time. They are found in Bibl. PatR.
Max., XV., and, together with his other essays, in Migne, Patr. Latm., 119. His most compresensive work, a commentary on the Epistles of Paul, is a mere compilation from Augustine. It was formerly ascribed to Bede, and is found in the Basel and Cologne editions of his works; but Florus's authorship has been conclusively proved by Mabillon. [F. Maasen: EinCommentar des Flosus von Lyon zu einigen d. sogenannnten Sirmondschen Constitutionen, Wien, 1879.]

FLORUS, Gessius, succeeded Albinus in 64
A.D. as Roman governor of Judea, and caused by his rapine and tyranny that insurrection which led to the destruction of the the temple in Jerusalem, and the annihilation of the national independence of the Jews. What finally became of Florus himself is not known; but vivid descriptions of his nefarious rule in Judea are found in Josephus (Antiq., XX, 9, and De Bello Jud., II.
24, 25) and in Tacitus (Hist., V. 10).

FLUE, Nikolaus von, generally known under the name of Bruder Klaus, was b. at Flueili, in the canton of Unterwalden, Switzerland, March 21, 1417; and d. in his hermit's cell at Ranft, close by his native place, March 21, 1487. He grew up without receiving any other education than that which naturally resulted from active participation in the business of the home. Nevertheless, he served his country well, both in the army and as a judge. In 1450 he married. He had ten children in seventeen years; and he was known as an energetic, prudent, and tender house-father.
Nevertheless the whole bent of his nature was towards a life of seclusion and devout contemplation. From early youth he practised a severe ascesis; and Oct. 16, 1467, he actually retired from his home and family, and settled in a lonely place up among the Alps, where he built a cell, and spent the rest of his life. To the great esteem and reverence which all who knew him felt for him, was soon added a tinge of the miraculous.
People told of him that he never ate. Pilgrimages were made to his cell. Everybody wanted him, was soon added a tinge of the miraculous.

FONTÉVRAUD, The Order of (Ordo Fonti Ebrati), was founded by Robert of Arbrisseau
(the present Arbrisseau), b. 1047; d. 1117. After acting for some years as administrator of the bishopric of Rennes, and teaching theology for some other years at Angers, Robert retired into the forest of Craon, and settled there as a hermit.
Others joined him; and in 1093 he formed a community of regular canons, out of which afterwards grew the abbey De la Roc, or De rota.
Selected by Urban II. to go through the country,
and preach penance, the overwhelming impression he made, especially on women, led to the foundation of the great monastic institution of Fontèvraud. It comprised, under the title of proveres Christi, a male and a female division.
The former was dedicated to the Holy Virgin, and contained three hundred virgins and widows; the second to St. Lazarus, containing a hundred and twenty lepers; and the third to Magdalene, containing a number of nuns, influenced by the miracle of the surrounding country, not only in general by his example, but in numerous special cases by his exhortations or warnings. At the diet of Stanz (1481) he actually saved the confederation from civil war, and brought about an agreement on that constitution under which Switzerland lived until the close of the eighteenth century. After his death, his countrymen made the greatest exertions to have him canonized. But a canonization is a very expensive affair; and in spite of subscriptions, heavy taxes, etc., nothing more than a beatification could be obtained from Clement IX., 1669.

LIT. — The literature concerning Bruder Klaus is very great. A complete list of it may be found in E. L. Rochholz, Schweizerlegende von B. K., Aarau, 1875, pp. 255—309. The best biography of him is that by Jon. Ming, 3 vols., Luzern, 1861—71.

FONSECA, Pedro da, b. at Cortiza, Portugal, 1528; d. at Coimbra, Nov. 4, 1599; entered the order of Jesuits in 1548; studied at Evora, and became professor at Coimbra. Among his works are a Latin commentary on the metaphysics of Aristotle (4 vols., Rome, 1577—80), and Institutiones dialecticae (Lisbon, 1594), etc.
He was the first who taught the doctrine of a scientia media Dei (i.e., what God might have done, but did not), which afterwards received its name, it's due development, and its influence, under the hands of Molina.

FONT, The Baptismal, originally a cistern, rather beneath the level of the floor of the baptistery, surrounded by a low wall, and entered by steps; afterwards a vessel for containing water used at the administration of baptism. The form of the font, whether a cistern or a vessel, was generally the octagon, with reference to the eight day, as the day of the resurrection of our Lord;
though other forms, the circle, the hexagon, etc., are also found. In the Western Church the fonts were generally made of some fine marble, and often highly ornamented: in the Eastern Church they were made of metal or wood, and generally without any ornamentation. See art. Font, in Smith and Cheetham, Dict. Chr. Antiq., and art. Baptism, in this Cyclopaedia, p. 203.

FONTEVRAUD, The Order of (Ordo Fonti Ebrati), was founded by Robert of Arbrisseau
(the present Arbrisseau), b. 1047; d. 1117. After acting for some years as administrator of the bishopric of Rennes, and teaching theology for some other years at Angers, Robert retired into
the forest of Craon, and settled there as a hermit.
Others joined him; and in 1093 he formed a community of regular canons, out of which afterwards grew the abbey De la Roc, or De rota.
Selected by Urban II. to go through the country,
FOOT—WASHING. 823

FORMOSUS.

FOOT—WASHING. an ancient act of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 4; Judg. xix. 21; 1 Sam. xxv. 41, etc.), made necessary in Palestine by the dry climate, dusty roads, and the fact that sandals, covering only the sole of the foot, were worn. Our Lord, the night before his crucifixion, washed the feet of his disciples, and wiped them (John xiii. 1–17), and commanded his disciples to "wash one another's feet" (xiii. 14). This is usually interpreted to mean that they should emulate his spirit of ministration and humility. It has, however, been taken literally. Upon the basis of this passage and of 1 Tim. v. 10, in which one of the conditions of being admitted to the order of widows is that she had "washed the sinner's feet," the Roman and Greek churches and the Tunkers still practise the rite.

Augustine (Ep. ad Januarium) refers to the ceremony of foot-washing as taking place on Maunday-Thursday (the Thursday before Easter). The synod of Toledo, in 694, went so far as to exclude from the communion-table those who refused to have their feet washed on this day. Bernard of Clairvaux even went so far as to have it recognized as one of the sacraments, but without success. The ceremony is still observed in some of the convents of the Roman Church, and very generally in those of the Greek Church. The czar of Russia, the emperor of Austria, and the kings of Spain, Portugal, and Bavaria, have observed, and perhaps do still observe, the custom of washing the feet of twelve beggars on Maunday-Thursday. The Pope at Rome, likewise, in illustration of Christian humility, sprinkles a few drops of water on the feet of thirteen poor men, attired in white tunics, and seated in the Clementine Chapel.

This ceremony Luther denounced as hypocritical, and not at all in the spirit of the Lord's command. He thought the people would be far better served if they were given a common bath, where they could wash their entire body. "And Bengel, in his Commentary, suggested that the Pope would "deserve more admiration, if, instead of washing the feet of twelve beggars, he would in real humility wash the feet of a single king." The Moravians practised foot-washing till 1818, and was abolished by a decree of the Frankish Empire, the Poenning; and his work, Instructions Historico-Theologica, etc. (Amst., 1645), had a considerable reputation, and is referred to by Baur as one of the two most important on the history of doctrine of the seventeenth century. See CHAMBERS, Bio. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen.

FORMOSUS, Pope (Sept. 21, 881—April 4, 896), entered Rome, and took his revenge by the aid of the monks, consecrated the church. At the death of Robert, the monastery numbered three thousand nuns; and the number rose still higher. Indeed, the institution was still flourishing when it was dissolved by the Revolution. The buildings were transformed into a jail; and the last abbess, Charlotte de Pardaillan, died in destitution, in Paris, 1643; J. DE LA MAINFERME: Clupeus Fontebraulensis, Paris, 1684 (an apologetic work).

TH. PRESSEL.

FOOT—WASHING, an ancient act of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 4; Judg. xix. 21; 1 Sam. xxv. 41, etc.), made necessary in Palestine by the dry climate, dusty roads, and the fact that sandals, covering only the sole of the foot, were worn. Our Lord, the night before his crucifixion, washed the feet of his disciples, and wiped them (John xiii. 1–17), and commanded his disciples to "wash one another's feet" (xiii. 14). This is usually interpreted to mean that they should emulate his spirit of ministration and humility. It has, however, been taken literally. Upon the basis of this passage and of 1 Tim. v. 10, in which one of the conditions of being admitted to the order of widows is that she had "washed the sinner's feet," the Roman and Greek churches and the Tunkers still practise the rite.

Augustine (Ep. ad Januarium) refers to the ceremony of foot-washing as taking place on Maunday-Thursday (the Thursday before Easter). The synod of Toledo, in 694, went so far as to exclude from the communion-table those who refused to have their feet washed on this day. Bernard of Clairvaux even went so far as to have it recognized as one of the sacraments, but without success. The ceremony is still observed in some of the convents of the Roman Church, and very generally in those of the Greek Church. The czar of Russia, the emperor of Austria, and the kings of Spain, Portugal, and Bavaria, have observed, and perhaps do still observe, the custom of washing the feet of twelve beggars on Maunday-Thursday. The Pope at Rome, likewise, in illustration of Christian humility, sprinkles a few drops of water on the feet of thirteen poor men, attired in white tunics, and seated in the Clementine Chapel.

This ceremony Luther denounced as hypocritical, and not at all in the spirit of the Lord's command. He thought the people would be far better served if they were given a common bath, where they could wash their entire body. And Bengel, in his Commentary, suggested that the Pope would "deserve more admiration, if, instead of washing the feet of twelve beggars, he would in real humility wash the feet of a single king." The Moravians practised foot-washing till 1818, and was abolished by a decree of the Frankish Empire, the Poenning; and his work, Instructions Historico-Theologica, etc. (Amst., 1645), had a considerable reputation, and is referred to by Baur as one of the two most important on the history of doctrine of the seventeenth century. See CHAMBERS, Bio. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen.

FORMOSUS, Pope (Sept. 21, 881—April 4, 896), entered Rome, and took his revenge by the aid of the monks, consecrated the church. At the death of Robert, the monastery numbered three thousand nuns; and the number rose still higher. Indeed, the institution was still flourishing when it was dissolved by the Revolution. The buildings were transformed into a jail; and the last abbess, Charlotte de Pardaillan, died in destitution, in Paris, 1643; J. DE LA MAINFERME: Clupeus Fontebraulensis, Paris, 1684 (an apologetic work).

TH. PRESSEL.

FOOT—WASHING, an ancient act of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 4; Judg. xix. 21; 1 Sam. xxv. 41, etc.), made necessary in Palestine by the dry climate, dusty roads, and the fact that sandals, covering only the sole of the foot, were worn. Our Lord, the night before his crucifixion, washed the feet of his disciples, and wiped them (John xiii. 1–17), and commanded his disciples to "wash one another's feet" (xiii. 14). This is usually interpreted to mean that they should emulate his spirit of ministration and humility. It has, however, been taken literally. Upon the basis of this passage and of 1 Tim. v. 10, in which one of the conditions of being admitted to the order of widows is that she had "washed the sinner's feet," the Roman and Greek churches and the Tunkers still practise the rite.

Augustine (Ep. ad Januarium) refers to the ceremony of foot-washing as taking place on Maunday-Thursday (the Thursday before Easter). The synod of Toledo, in 694, went so far as to exclude from the communion-table those who refused to have their feet washed on this day. Bernard of Clairvaux even went so far as to have it recognized as one of the sacraments, but without success. The ceremony is still observed in some of the convents of the Roman Church, and very generally in those of the Greek Church. The czar of Russia, the emperor of Austria, and the kings of Spain, Portugal, and Bavaria, have observed, and perhaps do still observe, the custom of washing the feet of twelve beggars on Maunday-Thursday. The Pope at Rome, likewise, in illustration of Christian humility, sprinkles a few drops of water on the feet of thirteen poor men, attired in white tunics, and seated in the Clementine Chapel.

This ceremony Luther denounced as hypocritical, and not at all in the spirit of the Lord's command. He thought the people would be far better served if they were given a common bath, where they could wash their entire body. And Bengel, in his Commentary, suggested that the Pope would "deserve more admiration, if, instead of washing the feet of twelve beggars, he would in real humility wash the feet of a single king." The Moravians practised foot-washing till 1818, and was abolished by a decree of the Frankish Empire, the Poenning; and his work, Instructions Historico-Theologica, etc. (Amst., 1645), had a considerable reputation, and is referred to by Baur as one of the two most important on the history of doctrine of the seventeenth century. See CHAMBERS, Bio. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen.

FORMOSUS, Pope (Sept. 21, 881—April 4, 896), entered Rome, and took his revenge by the aid of the monks, consecrated the church. At the death of Robert, the monastery numbered three thousand nuns; and the number rose still higher. Indeed, the institution was still flourishing when it was dissolved by the Revolution. The buildings were transformed into a jail; and the last abbess, Charlotte de Pardaillan, died in destitution, in Paris, 1643; J. DE LA MAINFERME: Clupeus Fontebraulensis, Paris, 1684 (an apologetic work).

TH. PRESSEL.

FOOT—WASHING, an ancient act of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 4; Judg. xix. 21; 1 Sam. xxv. 41, etc.), made necessary in Palestine by the dry climate, dusty roads, and the fact that sandals, covering only the sole of the foot, were worn. Our Lord, the night before his crucifixion, washed the feet of his disciples, and wiped them (John xiii. 1–17), and commanded his disciples to "wash one another's feet" (xiii. 14). This is usually interpreted to mean that they should emulate his spirit of ministration and humility. It has, however, been taken literally. Upon the basis of this passage and of 1 Tim. v. 10, in which one of the conditions of being admitted to the order of widows is that she had "washed the sinner's feet," the Roman and Greek churches and the Tunkers still practise the rite.

Augustine (Ep. ad Januarium) refers to the ceremony of foot-washing as taking place on Maunday-Thursday (the Thursday before Easter). The synod of Toledo, in 694, went so far as to exclude from the communion-table those who refused to have their feet washed on this day. Bernard of Clairvaux even went so far as to have it recognized as one of the sacraments, but without success. The ceremony is still observed in some of the convents of the Roman Church, and very generally in those of the Greek Church. The czar of Russia, the emperor of Austria, and the kings of Spain, Portugal, and Bavaria, have observed, and perhaps do still observe, the custom of washing the feet of twelve beggars on Maunday-Thursday. The Pope at Rome, likewise, in illustration of Christian humility, sprinkles a few drops of water on the feet of thirteen poor men, attired in white tunics, and seated in the Clementine Chapel.

This ceremony Luther denounced as hypocritical, and not at all in the spirit of the Lord's command. He thought the people would be far better served if they were given a common bath, where they could wash their entire body. And Bengel, in his Commentary, suggested that the Pope would "deserve more admiration, if, instead of washing the feet of twelve beggars, he would in real humility wash the feet of a single king." The Moravians practised foot-washing till 1818, and was abolished by a decree of the Frankish Empire, the Poenning; and his work, Instructions Historico-Theologica, etc. (Amst., 1645), had a considerable reputation, and is referred to by Baur as one of the two most important on the history of doctrine of the seventeenth century. See CHAMBERS, Bio. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen.
FORSTER.

Formosus's successor, Stephen VII. The corpse of the late pope was dug up from the grave and shoved in the papal chair; and then a synod was held, accusing him of having intruded himself in St. Peter's see, etc. He was declared guilty; and his remains were atrociously mutilated and defiled, while all his ordinances and consecrations were canceled. The confusion which arose herefrom was still further increased, under Reuchlin, by the circumstance that some popes (Sergius III. and John X.) recognized the proceedings of the synod, while others (Theodore II., John IX., and Benedict IV.) declared them null and void; a circumstance which presents an embarrassing argument in the question of papal infallibility. See the writings of Auxilius and Vulgarius, in MABILLON (Analecta Vetera, Paris, 1723) and in DUMMELER (Auxilius und Vulgarius, Leipzig, 1866). R. ZÖPPFEL.

FORSTER, Johann, b. at Augsburg, July 10,
1495; d. at Wittenberg, Dec. 8, 1556: studied Greek and Hebrew at Ingolstadt, under Reuchlin, and theology at Leipzig and Wittenberg; became one of Luther's favorite pupils, aided him in translating the Old Testament, and was, on his recommendation, made preacher in Augsburg, 1555. But in Augsburg, as afterwards in Tübini-gen and in other places, his strict and exclusive Lutheranism brought him in conflict with his colleagues. In 1548 he was made professor in Hebrew at Wittenberg. His great work is his Dictionarium Hebraicum Novum, published at Basel, after his death, 1557.

FORTIFICATIONS AMONG THE HEBREWS.
In general each place was surrounded by a wall;
but municipal places had fortifications containing garrisons, especially in times of war (2 Chron. xxvii. 2). Thus Jerusalem was fortified by David (2 Sam. v. 7, 9), and the work of its fortification continued in later times (2 Chron. xxxiii. 5).
Solomon also built forts throughout the land (1 Kings ix. 15, 17 sq.; 2 Chron. viii. 5); and their number was increased as necessity required it, especially after the exile and during the Jewish war. Among them were Masada and Macherus.

Such fortified places were surrounded by one, sometimes by double or triple, walls (2 Chron. xvii. 16), with bulwarks and towers. Over the gateways, which were closed by ponderous doors, and secured by wooden or metallic bars, were watch-towers, and around the walls was a ditch. Besides these large fortresses, there were also castles or citadels, as well as forts. In the forests and in the open fields watch-towers were also found.
During the war, in case a city thus fortified would not surrender voluntarily, a siege was laid against it, and operations began, whereby the wall could be approached (2 Sam. xx. 15; 2 Kings
xix. 32; Jer. vi. 6, xxxii. 24; Ezek. xxvi. 8 sq.).
After this the batteries were set against it.
That the besieged did not remain idle, but deavored to prevent the approach of the enemy, we see from passages like Isa. xxii. 10, Jer. xxxiiii. 4, 2 Sam. xi. 21, 24, 2 Chron. xxvi. 15; and thus it happened that strongly fortified places were more rarely taken. Thus Ashdod was besieged twenty-nine years, Samaria three years (2 Kings xvii. 5), Jerusalem a year and a half (xxv. 1, 2).

But cities taken were razed to the ground, and their inhabitants killed, or sold as slaves. If they capitulated, they were more leniently dealt with (Deut. xx. 11 sq.; 1 Macr. xiii. 12 sq.). The Chaldeans were the most famous besiegers of antiquity.

RÜTSCHI.

FORTUNATUS, Venantius Honorius Clementianus, b. about 530 at Treviso; d. at Poitiers about 609; studied grammar and rhetoric at Ravenna; lived for some time at the court of Sigibert, king of Austrasia. He became famous by his poetry; repaired themes to Tours, and afterwards to Poitiers, where he settled in a monastery founded by the divorced wife of Clothaire I., the learned Radegunde; entered finally the sertice of the church, and became Bishop of Poitiers about 590. His fame, however, he acquired as a poet; and he is, indeed, the last great poet of the period before Charlemagne. He wrote epics among which is the life of St. Martin, in hexameter, based on the works of Sulpicius Severus), lyrics (especially hymns), epistles, epigrams, didactical and descriptive poems, etc. The two most celebrated of his hymns are Veri dixit regnum and Pange, lingua, gloriosi; of which Neale's translations are found in SCHAFF'S Christ in Song, New York, 1869. The best edition of his works is that by Luchi, Rome, 1758, in 2 vols. 4to, incor-polated with MINUS, Patrol. Lat., vol. lxvii., cola. 595 sqq. See EKERT: Geschichie d. laten.
christ. Literatur bis zum Zeitaller karis d. Grossen, vol. 1., Leipzig, 1874, pp. 494—516.

FOSCARARI (Egidius Foscherarius), b. at Bologna, Jan. 27, 1512; d. in Rome, Dec. 23, 1564; entered early the Dominican order; preached, and taught theology, in various cities of Italy; and was appointed Magister sacri palatii by Paul III.
in 1546, and Bishop of Modena in 1550 by Julius III. In 1551 he was sent to the Council of Trent, and when (April 28, 1552) its meetings were suspended he returned to his episcopal see. Under Paul IV. (in 1558) he was accused of heresy, and imprisoned in the Castle St. Angelo. Though the Inquisition could prove no heresy against him, he was not released until after Paul's death. By Pius IV. he was once more sent to the Council of Trent, and made a member of the Committee on the Catechism and the Revision of the Missal.

FOSTER, George, D.D., b. at Martock, Nov. 5, 1715, and wall-Doctor of Divinity, minister; b. in Exeter, Sept. 16, 1867; d. Nov.
5, 1758. He became pastor in London in 1724.
He was an eloquent preacher, and won the eulogies of Pope and others. Many of his sermons were published. Amongst his other writings the most important is The Usefulness, Truth, and Excellency of the Christian Revelation, etc., 1734, a defence against Tindal the deist.

FOSTER, John, a Baptist clergyman and eminent essayist; b. in Halifax, Yorkshire, Sept. 17, 1770; d. at Stapleton, near Bristol, Oct. 15, 1848.
He engaged in weaving wool till he was seventeen.
He determined to study for the ministry; entered Brearl Hall, and subsequently passed into the Baptist College, Bristol. In 1792 he preached five sermons at Newcastle-on-Tyne; passed to the Baptist college, Bristol. In 1792 he preached from there to Dublin, and in 1797 was invited to become pastor of the Baptist Church, Chichester, where he remained till 1800, when he was called to Downend. From here, in 1804, he removed to Froome. A throat trouble obliged him to resign in 1806. The year before, he published his essays, and became contributor to The Elective Magazine. In 1827 he was appointed to the professorship of moral philosophy in Downe, and remained only six months. He was frequently called upon to lecture, and preached at intervals, until his death in 1843. Foster was a man of very delicate sensibilities, reserved disposition, and humility of Christian character. He was not successful as a preacher; but as an essayist he excels in vividness of imagination, penetration of thought, and earnest sincerity. Writing was, however, a laborious task to him, and he is said to have spent several days in the elaboration of a single paragraph. His friend Robert Hall said of him, "His conceptions are most extraordinary and original." Foster's principal work is Essays on Decision of Character, which has passed through many editions. Other works are, Evils of Popular Ignorance (1818), Introductory Essay to Dodridge's Rise and Progress (1825), Lectures delivered at Broadmead Chapel (2 series, 1844-47), a hundred and eighty-five contributions to The Elective Review, and Observations on the Character of Mr. Hall as a Preacher. See Ryland: Life and Correspondence of J. Foster, 1846, republished in Boston, 1851; W. W. Everts: Life and Thoughts of J. Foster, New York, 1849.

FOUNDLING HOSPITALS. See Infanticide.

FOX, George. This great reformer, a man of original genius and deep spiritual discernment, was born in July, 1624, at Drayton-in-the-Clay, now called Fenny Drayton, in Leicestershire. His father, Christopher Fox, was a weaver, called "righteous Christian" by his neighbors; his mother, Mary Lago, was, as he tells us, "of the stock of the martyrs." From childhood, Fox was of a serious, religious disposition. "When I came to eleven years of age," he says (Journal, p. 2), "I knew puresness and righteousness; for, while I was a child, I was taught how to walk to be kept pure before the Lord."

The Lord taught me to be faithful in all things, and to act faithfully two ways; viz., inwardly to God, and outwardly to man; ... and that my words should be few and savory, seasoned with grace; and that I might not eat and drink to make myself wanton, but for health, using the creatures in their service, as servants in their places, to the glory of Him that hath created them. As he grew up, his relations "thought to have made him a priest;" but he was put as an apprentice to a man who was a shoemaker and grazier. In his eleventh year he was privileged at the healths-drinking of two companions who were professors of religion, and heard an inward voice from the Lord, "Thou seest how young people go together into vanity, and old people into the earth; and thou must forsake all, both young and old, and keep out of all, and be as a stranger unto all. Then began a life of solitary wandering in mental temptations and troubles, in which he "went to many a priest to look for comfort, but found no comfort from them." Some of his friends advised him to marry, some to enter the army; "an ancient priest in Warwickshire" bade him "take tobacco, and sing psalms." At one time he was invited by William Crispe, the editor of The Elective Review, "to be opened unto" him "that being bred at Oxford or Cambridge was not enough to fit and qualify men to be ministers of Christ," but that a spiritual qualification was necessary. Not seeing this requisite in the priest of his arish, he "would get into the orchards and fields" with his Bible by himself. Regarding the priestess less, he looked more after the dissenters, among whom he found "some tenderness," but no one that could speak to his need. "And when all my hopes in them," he says, "and in all men, were gone, so that I had nothing outwardly to help me, nor could tell what to do, then, oh! then, I heard a voice which said, 'There is one, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition.' And when I heard it, my heart did leap for joy. ... Christ it was (who had enlightened me) that gave me his light to believe in, and gave me hope, which is himself, revealed himself in me, and gave me his spirit, and gave me his grace, which I found sufficient in the deeps and in weakness." Afterwards the hearts and natures of wicked men were revealed to him, that he might have a sense of all conditions, and thus be able to speak to all conditions; and he "saw that there was an ocean of darkness and death, but an infinite ocean of light and love which flowed over the ocean of darkness," and in that he saw "the infinite love of God." In 1648 he began to exercise his ministry publicly in market-places, in the fields, in appointed meetings of various kinds, sometimes in the "steeple-houses," after the priests had got through. His preaching was powerful; and many people joined him in professing the same faith in the spirituality of true religion. In a few years the Society of Friends had formed itself spontaneously under the preaching of Fox and his companions. Fox afterwards showed great powers, as a religious legislator, in the admirable organization which he gave to the new society. He seems, however, to have had no desire to found a sect, but only to proclaim the pure and genuine principles of Christianity in their original simplicity. In 1650 he took the name "Quakers" was first applied to the Friends in derision, by "one Justice Bennet," because Fox had hidden the justices to "tremble at the word of the Lord." Fox was often arrested and imprisoned for violating the laws forbidding unauthorized worship. He was imprisoned at Darby in 1650, Carlisle in 1653, London in 1654, Lancing in 1655, Lancing in 1656, Lancing in 1659 and 1663, Scarborough in 1666, and Worcester in 1674, in noisome dungeons, and with much attendant cruelty. In prison his pen was active, and hardly less potent than his voice. In 1669 Fox married Margaret Fell of Swarthmore Hall, a lady of high social position, and one of his early converts. In 1671 he went to Barbadoes and the English settlements in America, where he remained two years. In 1672 he attended the Yearly Meeting at Newport, R.I., which lasted for six days. At the end of this meeting he says, "It was somewhat hard for Friends to part; for the glorious power of God which was in the brethren, and his blessed truth and life flowing amongst them, had so knit and united them together, that they spent two days in taking leave one of another, and of the Friends of the island." In 1677 and 1684 he visited the Friends in Holland, and organized their meetings for the first time. He died in London, Nov. 13, 1690, having preached with great power two days before, and was buried on the 16th, in the Friends' Ground, near Bunhill Fields.

Fox is described by Thomas Ellwood, the friend of Milton, as "graceful in countenance, manly in personage, grave in gesture, courteous in conversation." Penn says he was "civil beyond all forms of breeding." We are told that he was "plained hymn-powerful in prayer," "a discernor of other men's spirits," and very much master of his own," skilful to "speak a word in due season to the conditions and capacities of most, especially to them that were weary, and wanted soul's rest;" "valiant in asserting the truth, bold in defending it, patient in suffering for it, immovable as a rock."

Fox (or Foxe), John, author of the Book of Martyrs; was b. in Boston, Lincolnshire, 1517; d. April 15, 1587. He was educated at Oxford, and became fellow of Magdalen College, where he applied himself to the diligent study of church history. He espoused Protestant sentiments, and for this was expelled from his college. He became tutor in Sir Thomas Lucy's family, and then to the children of the Earl of Surrey, but was obliged to seek refuge from persecution on the Continent. He went to Basel, where he laid the plan of the work which has given him fame.

At the elevation of Elizabeth he returned to England, but never received higher position than that of prebend of Salisbury Cathedral. Called by Archbishop Parker to subscribe to the canons, he refused, and, holding up a Greek Testament, said, "This will I subscribe." He was finally received into the Church of England, in the avowal of his convictions, and petitioned the queen earnestly but unsuccessfully to spare the lives of two Dutch Anabaptists. Fox's title to fame rests upon the Book of Martyrs, in the compilation of which he had the assistance of Cranmer and others. It required eleven years of preparation, and appeared in its first form at Basel, 1554; the first complete Eng. ed., in 1563, 4th ed., 1583, etc. The original title was Acts and Monuments of these latter perillous days touching matters of the churches . . . from the year of ours Lord a thousand to the time now present, etc. By order of Elizabeth this work was placed in the common halls of archbishops, bishops, deans, etc., and in all the colleges and chapels throughout the kingdom. It exercised a great influence upon the masses of the people long after its author was dead. The Roman Catholics early attacked it, and pointed out its blunders. Fox wrote other works; for these see a volume in British Reformers, published at London. The Book of Martyrs has appeared in numerous editions, the best of which are those of Rev. M. H. Seymour (New York, 1838) and of Rev. George Townsend, M.A. of Trinity College, Cambridge, with a Life of the Author, and Vindication of the Work, London, 1843.

D. S. Schaff.

Fox, Richard, English prelate and statesman; b. at close of the reign of Henry VI.; d. Sept. 14, 1528. He was educated at Oxford. He was a great favorite of Henry VII., and filled the offices of privy councillor, keeper of the privy seal, and secretary of state. In turn he was Bishop of Exeter, Bath and Wells (1491), Durham (1494), and Winchester (1600), and master of Pembroke College, Cambridge (1507-19). Wolsey was his protege'; and he was much mortified at that favorite's insults and superior influence. He founded Corpus Christi, Oxford (1516), and the free schools of Taunton and Grafton.

FRAGMENTS, Wolfenbüttel. See WOLFENBÜTTEL FRAGMENTS.

France, Ecclesiastical Statistics of. France comprises an area of 258,577 square kilometers, with 36,905,788 inhabitants (census of 1876), of whom 35,387,703 belong to the Roman-Catholic Church, 467,531 to the Reformed, 90,117 to the Lutheran, and 33,109 to other Protestant denominations; 49,499 are Jews, and the rest belong to no confession. Thus the overwhelming majority of the French people is Roman Catholic, and there is no prospect of any change in the proportion at present; but liberty of conscience, and freedom of worship, are constitutionally guaranteed in the country, and a remarkable religious movement (headed by McAll) has been going on among the laboring and lower Roman-Catholic classes in Paris and other cities.

1. The Roman-Catholic Church. — In order to give a just representation of the state of the Roman-Catholic Church in France at this moment, it is necessary to consider (a) its organization and official relation to the State and the Pope, (b) the support it receives from the congregations and the religious associations, and (c) the influence it exercises on the school, and education in general.

(a) The French Church consists of 18 archbishoprics and 88 bishoprics; that is, of 96 dioceses: the bishop is the sole and proper chief of his diocese, and maintains direct communication with the State and with the Pope. Apostolic equality between the bishops is the first maxim of the French Church. The bishop governs his diocese independently, restrained only by the general ecclesiastical laws and the will of the Pope. He arranges the whole course of theological education, lays out the programme of study, selects the handbooks, chooses the professors: he ordains, appoints, and discharges the priests, founds or confirms all religious associations, calls or installs the ecclesiastics who teach in the State schools, excommunicates and re-admits, etc.

In the administration of his diocese the bishop is aided by vicar-generals, secretaries, a court, and a chapter. The number of vicar-generals varies with the size of the diocese. The government pays two, or sometimes three. Their title is vicaires généraux honoraires, and their number is 187. Others are appointed by the bishop himself, but only for the internal affairs of the church. Their title is vicaires généraux titulaires, and their number may be larger. Of secretaries, the government pays 135. The episcopal court, with its chapels and fraternities, is composed of an official, a vice-official, one or more assessors, a promoteur, and a greffier; but all the members hold other offices at the same time. The chapter has also lost its former importance. It is divided into three classes, — chanoines d'honneur, titulaires, and honoraires; but only the second class is paid by the State, and has any practical significance. It takes care of the service, and numbers 763.

The lower clergy consists of curés, desservants, and vicaires. The curés are priests of the curés, or principal parishes, and are appointed by the bishop; though their appointment must be confirmed by the government. In 1878 they numbered 3,440. The desservants are priests of the succursales, or subordinate parishes, and are appointed and dismissed by the bishop alone (ad nutum amovibili). Though they are only a kind of help to the curés, the latter have no authority over them, only a right of superintendence with report to the bishop. The number of desservants is 31,191. The vicaires, finally, who act only as assistants to the curés and desservants, number 11,678. As in the large cities the service of the mass requires a greater number of officials, the State pays 4,423 prêtres habituels for this purpose. Adding furthermore the almoners of the lyceums, colleges, normal schools, hospitals, and asylums (who are appointed by the respective administrations, but stand under the authority of the bishop), the clergy of the army, the navy, and the colonies, the teachers and pupils in the theological seminaries, etc., the total number of the clergy recognized and paid by the State amounts to 63,750. The budget of 1877 allowed 51,526, 445 francs for the expenses of the Roman-Catholic Church, of which 1,640,000 francs were for the support of the clergy; 1,810,000 francs for the support of the laity; 8,000,000 francs for the support of religious orders; and 32,843. In certain respects, however, the associations which never sought and never obtained the sanction of the civil government were of

was a merely contemplative life, the congregations, nevertheless, contrived to set apart for this purpose a portion of their members. It is very difficult, however, to obtain complete and reliable statistics on this field. There is a general report from 1861, — Statistique de France, Strasbourg, 1864, the result of the general census of 1861; and there is a more special report, — Etat des congrégations, communautés et associations religieuses autorisées ou non autorisées, laid before the legislative assembly in 1878. Both are valuable documents, but neither is complete. A comparison between these two reports reveals the interesting fact, that while, in 1861, the number of all the members, male and female, of the religious orders in France was only 108,119, it had in 1878 risen to 158,040. This last figure, however, is not correct any longer, since the law of 1879 made the confirmation by the State necessary to the legal existence of any association whatever; and disobedience to this law caused the expulsion of the Jesuits, Benedictines, Dominicans, etc.

The religious associations which have been confirmed by the State comprise 224 Congrégations à supérieure générale proprement dites, organized for the whole country, namely, 11 for nursing, 68 for education, and 155 both for nursing and education, with 2,450 houses and 98,215 sisters; 35 Congrégations diocésaines à supérieure générale, organized only for some special diocese, namely, 8 for nursing, 6 for education, and 23 both for nursing and education, with 102 houses and 3,794 sisters; and 844 Communautés à supérieure locale indépendantes, namely, 312 for education, 150 for nursing, 157 both for education and nursing, and 18 for a contemplative life, with 16,741 sisters. The total number of members of these associations is 113,750, to which must be added, according to the report of 1878, 14,003 sisters belonging to religious orders not recognized by the State.

The names of the principal orders of the first kind are, Filles de la Charité de S. Vincent de Paul, numbering 9,130 members, with 80 stations; Petites Soeurs des Pauvres, founded at St. Servan, in Bretagne, in 1840, by Abbé le Poilieu, and numbering 2,685 members, with 184 stations; Filles de Sainte-Geneviève, numbering 2,988 members, with 105 stations; Soeurs de S. Jésus, numbering 2,530 members, with 155 stations, etc. See CALMETTE, Traité de l'administration des associations religieuses, 1877.

Only 32 male associations have obtained the confirmation of the State; the reason being, that according to the law of Jan. 2, 1817, the chief of the State can confirm a female association by a simple decree, while a male association must be recognized by the legislative assembly. Among the legalized associations two are devoted to work in the seminaries, — Congrégation de S. Lazare (numbering 1,105 members) and Compagnie des prêtres de S. Évre (numbering 300 members), and three are devoted to missionary work, — Congrégation des Missions étrangères (with 480 members), Congrégation de S. Ésprit (with 515 members), and Congrégation de S. François de Sales (with 28 members). The total number of members belonging to these associations is 22,843. In certain respects, however, the associations which never sought and never obtained the sanction of the civil government were of much more importance,—the Jesuits, Benedictines, Dominicans, Carthusians, Franciscans, etc.
The Jesuits returned to France with the Bourbons in 1814, and from that time their influence has been steadily increasing up to 1879, in which year they possessed 58 houses, with 1,471 inmates. The Benedictines numbered 239 members, in 15 houses; the Dominicans 303, in 21 houses; the Trappists 1,158, in 17 houses, etc. But, as all these associations refused to seek the State's legalization of their existence, the houses were broken up in 1860, and the inmates expelled.

Among the lay associations, especially two have acquired great celebrity; namely, Société de St. Vincent de Paul and Société de St. François Régis. The former devoted itself, besides, to other kinds of charity,—to guarding the youth from temptation and seduction; and in 1852 no less than 131,000 young persons stood under its protection. The latter devoted itself to the regulation of unhappy matrimonial affairs; and from 1826 to 1865 it treated no less than 43,236 cases. In 1870 these two associations were united in one, which holds its annual convention in May or June, in Paris. The clergy exercises, of course, a great influence in the working of this great society; but the president's chair is always occupied by a layman. Another lay association of great importance is Société de Foi, in Lyons, devoted to missionary work. It has about six millions of francs a year at its disposal, and publishes Annales de la propagation de la Foi and Les Missions catholiques, which appear at Lyons, the former in eight, the latter in four languages. See Manuel des œuvres et institutions religieuses et charitables, Paris, 1877.

(c) From of old the Christian clergy has considered the education of the children of the Christian congregation their duty and their privilege; and the French clergy has, in the face of a strong opposition, steadily endeavored to bring this whole field under their authority. They were already near their goal, when the so-called Ferry Laws of 1879 entirely reversed the state of affairs. The effect of those laws cannot yet be exactly stated; but a fair estimate may be formed by considering the contents of the laws, and the state of affairs before their issue.

With respect to the primary schools (in which free instruction is given), the latest statistics are found in A. Legoyt, La France et l'Étranger, études de statistique comparée, Paris, 1870. Of primary schools maintained by the State, 35,486 schools for boys, or for boys and girls, with 1,880,441 pupils, had lay teachers; while 2,038 schools with 317,342 pupils had teachers from the congregations. Connected with these schools were 4,648 supplementary schools for apprentices, Sunday classes, etc., of which 4,471 with 54,427 pupils were under lay, and 977 with 38,088 pupils under clerical leadership. Of 14,059 schools for girls, 5,998 with 317,342 pupils had lay teachers; while 8,061 with 897,195 pupils had teachers from the Congregations. Of 1,192 boarding-schools for girls, 184 with 1,862 inmates were under lay, and 1,008 with 15,065 inmates under clerical leadership. Of primary schools maintained by private, religious, and independent bodies, 2,572 schools for boys with 125,779 pupils had lay, and 548 with 82,903 pupils, teachers from the Congregations; 7,687 schools for girls with 290,206 pupils had lay, and 5,871 with 417,852 pupils, teachers from the Congregations. Of 3,474 boarding-schools, 2,090 were under clerical direction.

In the middle and higher schools the clergy also had gained considerable ground. Especially in the middle schools the Jesuits exercised so great an influence, that the political leaders and state authorities became alarmed; and March 15, 1879, the then minister of public instruction, Jules Ferry, laid before the Chambers a law almost eliminating the influence of the clergy. As the law prohibits any member of a non-recognized association to be director of or teach in a school, the 27 Jesuit colleges which at that moment flourished in France were closed, and 948 teachers put out of activity. Twenty-six other communities, having 61 establishments and 1,089 teachers, fared no better. The teachers belonging to the recognized associations, and numbering 22,789, were as yet not interfered with; but they will in the future be subjected to the same examinations as lay teachers, instead of simple revocation in May or June.

II. The Protestant Churches. The constitutions of the Reformed and Lutheran churches rest on the law of April 7, 1802, completed and somewhat modified by the law of March 26, 1852. Each congregation has its presbytery, whose lay members are elected by universal suffrage. Above the presbytery stands the consistory, one for each six thousand souls, and consisting of the ministers and representatives of the presbyteries. The consistory chooses its own president; but he must be a clergyman, and obtain the confirmation of the government. Five consistories were destined to form a provincial synod in the Reformed, and an inspection in the Lutheran Church. The provincial synods, however, were never formed, nor was the Reformed Church allowed to convene its general synod until 1872. The Lutheran Church was in this respect more fortunate. It formed its inspections, and obtained in its directory a centre of organization, to which the power of appointing the ministers was confided, without any restrictions from the side of the consistories or the congregations. The Reformed Church comprises 100 consistories (one for each 4,675 souls), and the Lutheran 6 (one for each 15,065 souls). The State pays 616 Reformed ministers (one for each 759 souls), and 64 Lutheran (one for each 4,675 souls). The budget of 1877 allowed 1,430,000 francs for the expenses of the Protestant churches; but this sum was overrun by 20,000 francs.

For the historical development of the French churches see the arts. FRANKS, GALICANISM, GAUL, HUGUENOTS, etc.

The above article is a condensation of the articles by Alb. Matter and C. Fiender in Herzog, in some cases supplemented with more recent statistics.

FRANCE, Protestantism in, since the Revolution. At the outbreak of the Revolution the number of Protestants in France, including the Lutherans of Alsace, amounted to about eight hundred thousand; but their religion was not recognized by the State. They were excluded from all civil offices; as they mostly lived in small groups, dispersed all over the country, they were prevented from exercising any appreciable social influence, and had to submit to numberless petty chicaneries from the surrounding Roman-Catholic population; and, though the churches of the Desert were generally connived at, actual persecutions occurred now and then. In this state of affairs the edict of toleration brought a change in 1787; and as the Protestants could not fail recognizing the movement towards liberality in the dawning Revolution, they joined it with eagerness: there sat nine Protestant pastors in the Constituent Assembly. A decree of Dec. 24, 1789, made the Protestants eligible to all civil offices, and another, on Dec. 25, 1790, restored the property confiscated by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes to the descendants of the exiles, on the condition that they should return home, and become French citizens. The real work of restoration, however, did not begin until after the conclusion of the concordat (July 15, 1801), when Napoleon undertook to reorganize the church affairs of France. The Protestants were placed on equal terms with the Roman Catholics; their churches were restored to them; their pastors were to be paid by the State; a Lutheran seminary was founded at Strassburg, a Reformed at Montauban, 1808, etc. All these reforms were, of course, received with gratitude by the Protestants, though it soon became evident that the new church constitution was very inferior to the old. In 1837 the Reformed Church in France had had eight hundred and six churches, served by six hundred and forty-one pastors; in 1806 she had had only a hundred and seventy-one churches, and of these fifty had no pastors. This loss might be repaired; but how was the religious life of those times, the active piety, the fervent spirit, to be revived? In its new constitution the Church was wholly dependent on the State, and curtailed both in its freedom and in its authority. The congregation exercised no influence on the choice of its pastor, the most essential element of freedom; and Napoleon refused to revive the national synod, the most essential element of authority. Indeed, the prospects were not so very promising. Twenty years had passed since the Edict of Toleration, and Napoleon their activity almost ceased. After the battle of Waterloo, however, they immediately resumed work, and a church was built at Cherbourg. They labored with prudence and moderation; but it was, nevertheless, easy to see, that, if they succeeded, the result of their labor would be the establishment of a number of independent churches, and the breaking-up of the Reformed Church of France. In 1825 Guizot characterized the situation as merely involving a difference between those who looked at the primitive, and those who looked at the progressive, in the common religion. But the characterization was too mild: independent churches were at that moment formed or forming in Lyons, Havre, Strassburg, St. Etienne, etc. In 1834 the consistory of Paris took some steps in order to organize an authoritative representation of the Reformed Church of France, and thereby procure a revision of her organic law. In 1836 the minister of worship and public instruction made a similar attempt, but both in vain; and when, finally, an unofficial synod was assembled in 1848, the actual split took place. There were at that moment three parties within the Church: one, the Latitudinarians, whose principal object was the maintenance of the national Church; another, the Revivalists, who considered a separation unavoidable when the cause of true religion should be truly served; and a third, which considered it possible to reach the object of the Revivalists by means of the Latitudinarians. The synod assembled Sept. 11, 1848; but when the assembly altogether refused to attempt the establishment of a clear and positive confession of faith, F. Monod and Count Gasparin retired, and invited, a month later, the Protestant Church to meet at a new synod the following year. At this synod, which assembled Aug. 20, 1849, thirteen churches perfectly constituted, and eighteen churches in process of formation, were represented; an explicit confession of faith was adopted, and the Union des Eglises evangéliques de France was constituted. The imperial decree of March 26, 1652, made considerable changes in the organization of the Reformed Church in France (thus it gave back to the parishioners the right to elect their pastor); but on the development of the internal life of the Church it had no influence. The last hope of healing the split was the convocation of a national synod such as had not met since the synod of Loudun, 1639.

June 6, 1872, the thirteenth national synod met in Paris, but not under the most favorable auspices. All relations had ceased for several years between the orthodox and the liberal; and the incessant polemics had caused many to entirely forget that they were members of the same church. A vehement debate arose on the question of the confession of faith. By a vote of sixty-one against forty-five, a short confession was adopted, and its subscription made obligatory on all young pastors. But the result of this vote was, that, when the synod assembled in a second session (Nov. 20, 1872), the seats of the two parties stood empty, and the liberal party was represented only by a protest laid on the table. There was, however, on both sides, among the orthodox as well as among the liberals, a strong feeling against a schism, even though it might be effected without the separating party losing any of the advantages which accrue to the Church from its connection with the State. In a circular of Nov. 12, 1874, the liberals declared that the difference between the orthodox and themselves was not a question of faith, but simply a question of authority in matters of faith; that though, on account of this difference, there had arisen factions within the Reformed Church, these factions were not sects, etc. Equally conciliatory are the orthodox in their expressions; but there is nevertheless very little hope at present that a new national synod will be able to bring about a full and thorough agreement.

FRANCIS OF ASSISI, St., was b. at Assisi, 1182; d. there Oct. 4, 1226. His true name was Giovanni Francesco Bernardone. His father was a rich merchant. Handsome, bright, and adventurous, with a keen relish of beauty in all its manifestations, but disinclined to serious work of any description, he grew up without learning anything, became the leader of a club (corti) of the gay youths of Assisi, served in a regiment of the Visconti, and was taken prisoner, etc. But a heavy sickness which befell him brought a change into his life. He retired into solitude; and when again he appeared in the world it was as a nurse to the sick, selecting such as suffered from contagious or disgusting diseases. He made a pilgrimage to Rome; and while there, a voice from above seemed to say to him that he should go and restore the ruined house of God. He took the words in their literal meaning; and, with the money which he begged together, he rebuilt a small decayed church in his native city (the Portiuncula), which ever afterwards remained his favorite retreat. A sermon he heard on Matt. x. 9, 10, opened up a new channel to his energy. He determined to become a preacher, to restore the ruined house of God in a higher sense of the word; and fitted out like one of the apostles with the alms, and with no staff (for he had already some time before inherited himself), he began to preach penitence in the streets of Assisi. He made an impression. Other young men joined him; and in 1210 he lived with ten followers in hermitages near the Portiuncula Church. For these ten followers he wrote a set of rules containing the common monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, but emphasizing the first point with particular stress. He then repaired to Rome, to have his rules confirmed, and his society recognized, by the Pope; but he obtained only the verbal assent of Innocent III. Shortly after his return from Rome, however, he was joined by Clara Scitti, the foundress of the order of the Clarissæ (which article see); and this circumstance threw great lustre both over his person and his enterprise. In 1212 he sent out the brethren, two and two, to reform the world by preaching penitence. He went himself to Tuscany. In Perugia, Pisa, and Florence he found many followers; in Cortona he was able to found the first Franciscan monastery; from the Count of Casentino he received Monte Alberno as a present. But the five brethren he had sent to Morocco to preach the gospel to the Mohammedans were martyred; and he now determined to go thither himself. In Spain, however, through which he took his way, he was detained by sickness, and compelled to return. Meanwhile, the order grew steadily and rapidly in Italy. At the general assembly of the order, in 1219, no less than five thousand members came together; and brethren were sent to Spain, Egypt, Africa, Greece, England, and Hungary. Hitherto every attack the order had made to penetrate into Germany had failed. But in 1221, Cesarius of Spires, with twelve other brethren of German descent, went to Germany; and from that moment the order took root in the country. In the very next year, however, he left the government of the order to Elias of Cartong, and retired to the Portiuncula Church, where he died. He was canonized in 1228 by Gregory IX.

Lit. — His Opuscula were published by Wadding, Antwerp, 1628, and often afterwards. His life was first written by Thomas of Celano, only three years after his death: this, together with that by Bonaventura, is found in Acta Sanctorum, Oct., 11. Modern lives are by F. Moms, 1870), and L. C. neascn (Paris, 1879). See also BERNARDIN, L'esprit de saint François d'Assis, Paris, 1880, 2 vols. [ENGELHARDT, FRANCIS OF PAULA, St., b. at Paula, Naples, 1416; d. at Plano, near Lucca, 1507; entered, when he was twelve years old, the Franciscan monastery of San Marco, in Calabria, and became in a short time a great virtuoso in fasting and other ascetic practices. When he was fourteen years old, he retired to a cave on the seashore, where he lived as a hermit; and when he was twenty, so great a number of hermits had gathered around him, that he could constitute them an order, and give them a rule. They were to observe the Franciscans in austerity; and to the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience was added a fourth one, of perpetual fasting; that is, of refraining not only from all kinds of flesh, but also from milk, butter, cheese, eggs, etc. The order was confirmed in 1210 by Pius IX., under the name of the "Hermits of St. Francis," which by Alexander VI. was changed to that of the "Minims," and Francis was made its superior. His fame as a miracle-worker was so great, that Louis XI., on his death-bed, had him brought to France, and implored him to prolong his life; which, however, he refused to try. Charles VIII. also held him in great favor; and he remained in France, where he founded several monasteries. He was canonized by Leo X. in 1522. See HALLER, M. Coste: Le portrait de S. Francois de Paul, Paris, 1855; Fr. Giry: Vie de S. Francois de Paul, Paris, 1860; Act. Sanct., April; [Rolland: Histoire de Saint Francois de Paul, 2d ed., Paris, 1870]. See MINIMS.

FRANCIS OF SALES, St., b. at Sales, Savoy, 1567; d. at Lyons, Dec. 28, 1622; studied law and theology in Paris and Padua; entered the chapter of the Bishop of Geneva, who, when Bonaventura wrote his life of St. Francis, believed when told of the "seraphic" saints; and in 1299 Bartholomew Albizzi actually instituted the order. Already in 1222 Honorius III. allowed the Franciscans to celebrate service, though with closed doors, in places which were under the ban. Soon after, they obtained the right to preach wherever they liked without first procuring the consent of the bishop or parish priest. They were permitted to hear confession, and give absolution; and, in the same year they were constituted as an order, they received the Portiuncula indulgence; that is, every one who visited the Portiuncula Church on the anniversary of its consecration (Aug. 2) was released from all sins. But, beyond these and other favorable circumstances, the very idea on which the order was based, the very principle on which it worked, corresponded to the deepest wants of the time.

Everybody felt that reform was necessary; and the humble, miserable Franciscan, clad in rags, but filled with holy enthusiasm, struck everybody as the reformer.

But success always engenders jealousy; and the Dominicans were the born rivals of the Franciscans. The two orders united at a time coincidentally, side by side, as long as they had a common object; namely, to get access to the universities. But hardly were Bonaventura the Franciscan, and Thomas Aquinas the Dominican, installed as doctores theologiae at the university of Paris, before a strongly marked scientific difference between the two orders became apparent, and it continued to separate them during the whole period of the middle ages. The Franciscans were realists; the Dominicans, nominalists: the Franciscans leaned towards Semi-Pelagianism; the Dominicans were ardent disciples of Augustine: the Franciscans were Scotists; the Dominicans were Thomists: in the debate on the immaculate conception of Mary, the Franciscans said Yes, and the Dominicans, No. But the difference was by no means confined to the sphere of science: it came to many vexatious and sometimes ridiculous outbursts of rivalry between the two orders also in practical life.

Of much greater importance, however, was the difference which arose within the order itself almost immediately after its foundation. The absolute poverty which the founder had ordered seemed to some to be a mere impediment to the success of the order; while by others it was vindicated as the very character of the order. There thus arose two parties,—a milder, headed by Elias of Cortona; and a severer, headed by Cassarius of Spiraes (see H. Ryba, Elias von Cortona, Leipzig, 1874); and the contest between these two parties not only threw the order itself into confusion, but at times also involved the Pope and the kings in serious difficulties. Nicholas III. attempted a reconciliation by the bull Exiit, 1279, in which he explained, that though the Franciscans were not allowed to own things, they were, of course, allowed to use things; that the real owner of all the treasures they amassed, was the Pope; and that the members of the order only had the use of these treasures by his permission, etc. This subtle distinction did not satisfy the severer party. Under the leadership of John of Oliveto, they raised a violent opposition to the bull and to the general of the order, Matthias of Aquas Sartas, who headed the milder party. The latter was victorious, however; and the Spiritualists, as the severer party was called, were cruelly persecuted. In Naples they were expelled; and in many places they were seized by the Inquisition, tortured, and burnt.

Nevertheless, they continued their resistance, and under John XXII. the strife broke out with renewed vehemence; the general, Michael of Cesena, being this time at the head of the Spiritualists (see E. Gudenat, Michael von Cesena, Breslau, 1876). The result was a permanent split in the order. The Observants, the severer party, were formally recognized by the Council of Constance in its nineteenth sitting (Sept. 23, 1415); and Leo X., after an ineffectual attempt to gather the whole order under one obvious, constituted the milder party, the Conventuals, an independent congregation, by a bull of 1517. Each division obtained its own superior, though that of the Observants (the minister generalis) took rank before that of the Conventuals (the magister generalis).

In another respect these internal differences contributed to separate the order also. The frequent formation of more or less independent congregations proved the presence of an active principle of development and reform. By the Reformation the order lost heavily, and a great number of its convents were broken up. Nevertheless, at the beginning of the eighteenth century it still numbered about a hundred and fifteen thousand monks; and its monasteries are still flourishing, from the interior of Russia to the interior of America. It has produced five popes (Nicholas IV., Alexander V., Sixtus IV., Sixtus V., and Clement XIV.), a considerable number of theologians (Bonaventura, Alexander of Hales, Ockham, etc.), and of poets, Thomas de Celano, the author of Dies irae, Jacobone da Todi, the author of Statut mater, etc. (See OZANAM, Les poetes franciscains en Italie, Paris, 1802.)

LIT. — The history of the order has been written by an Irish Franciscan, Lucas Wadding (Annales minorum s. trium ordinum a. a. Franciscorum institutorum), 17 vols., Rome, 1731-41, reaching to 1840, and continued to 1858 by I. de Luca. See also the works of HELYOT (vol. vii.) and HERION-FELLER and F. MORIN, Si. Francois et les Franciscains, Paris, 1853. [GAUDENTIUS, Franziskaner Orden im Kampfe gegen den Protestantismus, 1 Bd., Botzen, 1880.]

ZÖCKLER.

FRANCK, Sebastian, b. at Donauworth, 1499; d. at Basel, 1542; was appointed evangelical preacher at Gustenfeld, near Nuremberg, 1525, but resigned this position in 1528, and followed for some time the Anabaptists. Dissatisfied with them, too, he separated from them, and determined to belong to no party-church, but to devote his life to a literary representation of the ideal, the truly spiritual church. Sustaining himself and his family, first by running a soap-factory, and afterwards by working a printing-press, he published Chroma, Zeilbuch and Geschichtsbibel, and afterwards working a printing-press, he published Chroma, Zeilbuch and Geschichtsbibel, and afterwards a number of theological books,—Paradoxa, Die guldene Arch, Das Kriegsbüchlein, etc. But as these books contained very sharp criticisms, not only of the Roman, but also of the Reformed churches, the author was bitterly persecuted, and driven from place to place. Nevertheless, his books became popular in the true sense of the word, and many of them are still living among the people. See C. A. HAESEL, Sebastian Franck, der Schwarmgeist, Leipzig, 1866.

FRANCKE, August Hermann, b. at Lübeck, March 23, 1683; d. at Halle, June 8, 1727; studied theology at Erfurt, Kiel, and Leipzig, where, together with Paul Anton, he founded the famous Collegium Philobiblicum. The spiritual direction which he took from Spener, whom he met in 1688; and the success he achieved, and the enmity he aroused, at the very beginning of his career, were due to his "Pietism." In 1689 he began to lecture on the Epistles of St. Paul in the university of Leipzig, the Cabala, but accepted the doctrine of the heresy led to his imprisonment; and he was not allowed to develop all his energy undisturbed and in peace. [Of his works several have been translated into English, such as Manuductio ad Lectionem Scripture Sacrae, Halle, 1693, by Jacques, London, 1813; Nicodemus, a Treatise against the Fear of Man, London, 1709; and Footsteps of Divine Providence, London, 1797.] But it was less as a writer than as a teacher and practical philanthropist that Francke exercised his great influence. On Nov. 5, 1665, he had received an orphan into his house; but, before the month ran out, he had nine, and twelve before New Year. The number steadily increasing, a neighboring house was bought, and, as this also soon proved too small, the foundation was laid, on July 24, 1698, of the Orphan Asylum,—the first and one of the greatest establishments of the kind. In 1695 he also opened a small children's school in his house. In 1698 the school numbered five hundred pupils, eleven hundred in 1709, over two thousand at the death of the master. In the same manner developed the printing-press and publishing establishment, which he connected with the Orphan Asylum: it is now one of the greatest publishing establishments of Germany. For the various foundations of Francke, see Die Stiftungen A. H. Franckes, Halle, 1883. An important source for his life and character is KRAMER: Beiträge zur Geschichte A. H. Franckes, Halle, 1861, containing his correspondence with Spener; Neue Beiträge, 1875 [and a Life of Francke, Halle, 1880 sq.]. A good biography of him is that by GUERKIE, Halle, 1827 [Eng. trans., London, 1837]. There are numerous minor sketches.

FRANK, Jacob Joseph, a Hebrew sectary; b. in Poland, 1712; d. in Offenbach, Austria, Dec. 10, 1791. He acquired fame as an expounder of the daily necessities, frankincense was often given as a freewill offering (1 Chron. ix. 29; Neh. xiii. 5, 9; Jer. xvii. 26, xliii. 23, lxvi. 3). From notices of ancient writings we see that frankincense was also used in the religious services of the Hebrew plant, comp. BIRDWOOD, The Genus Boswellia, London, 1870. It is called frank, because of the freeens with which it burns, and gives forth its odor.

FRANKENBERG, Johann Heinrich, was b. at Grossglogau, in Silesia, Sept. 18, 1726; d. at Halle, Dec. 25, 1759. He studied theology in his native city and in Rome, and was made co-adjuror to the archbishop of Göttingen 1749, archbishop of Malines 1759, and cardinal 1778. He was one of the most decided opponents against the church policy of Joseph II. The question was about the abolition of the episcopal seminaries, and the establishment of a general seminary, under royal superintendence, at Louvain. Frankenberg protested, and continued to protest, until the whole country was brought almost into open revolt. He also opposed the Revolution, and was by the Convent sentenced to deportation, but escaped by flight. See Arndt, Theurk, Der Kardinal Frankenberg, Freiburg, 1850.

FRANKFURT CONCORDAT. See Concordat.

FRANKFURT, The Council of, was convened by Charlemagne, in 794, at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, and was attended, according to later writers, by three hundred bishops, from Germany, Gaul, England, Spain, and Italy, and two delegates of the Pope. Fifty-six canons are ascribed to it, the most important of which are,—the first, condemning Felix and Elipandus, the leaders of the Adoptionists; and the second, condemning the decisions of the second Council of Nicaea (787) concerning image-worship, which had been accepted by the Pope. See Mansi, Concill., XIII.

FRANKINCENSE (Hebrew, lebona), the odoriferous resin of trees of the genus Boswellia, which grew in India and Arabia (Isa. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20), and perhaps also in Palestine (Song of Songs iv. 14); was not only used as perfume (Song of Solomon iii. 6), but also for fumigation in sacrifices (Lev. ii. 18, v. 11; Isa. xliii. 23, lxvi. 3), and was one of the ingredients in the perfumes which was to be prepared for the sanctuary (Exod. xxx. 34). It was offered both morning and evening (Exod. xxx. 7 sq.), and used as an accompaniment of the meat offering (Lev. ii. 1, 16, vi. 15, xxiv. 7; Num. v. 16). Being one of the daily necessities, frankincense was often given as a freewill offering (1 Chron. ix. 29; Neh. xiii. 5, 9; Jer. xvii. 26, xliii. 5). From its fragrant odor when burnt, the incense came to be an emblem of prayer (Ps. cxxii. 2; Luke i. 10; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3). From notices of ancient writings we see that frankincense was also used in the religious services of the Hebrew plant, comp. BIRDWOOD, The Genus Boswellia, London, 1870. It is called frank, because of the freedom with which it burns, and gives forth its odor.

FRANKS, The, was the name of a wild, warlike, and cruel, but highly gifted Germanic race, which, divided into several branches (the Salian Franks, the Ripuarian Franks, etc.), lived, during the third century after Christ, on the right shore of the Rhine, along its middle and lower course. When Carausius conquered Brittany, and drew the legions away from Belgium, the Salian Franks crossed the Rhine; and the historians tell us that they were often defeated by Constantius, Constantine, and Julian, they were never thrown back beyond the Rhine. In 406 they began to advance towards the western and the south; and in 406, Chlodwig, the son of Childeric, the son of Merowig, who in 451, when only fifteen years old, had succeeded his father as chief of the Salian Franks, defeated Syagrius, the Roman governor of Gaul, at Soissons, and extended the Frankish Empire to the Loire. In Gaul the Franks met with a remarkable after-bloom of the classical civilization: and though for centuries they remained rude and coarse and cruel to the very core of their being, yet so completely did they yield to the mental superiority of the conquered race, that, even before 490, Latin had become their official language, — the language in which their famous law, Lex Salica, was written down. In Gaul the Franks also met with Christianity; and though Chlodwig allowed his men to burn and plunder the Christian churches, he nevertheless stood in great awe of the Christian bishops. In 493 he married Chlothilde, a Burgundian princess, and a Christian. Their children were baptized; and Chlodwig, like many of his men, was hesitating with respect to this new and strange religion, when an incident decided his course. He was compelled in 496 to give battle to the Alemanni; and on the issue of this battle depended the very existence of the Frankish Empire in Gaul. But the Franks wavered; and in this emergency Chlodwig made a vow to the God of the Gauls, that, if he gained the victory, he would become a Christian. The victory he gained, and he and many of his men were baptized. But in this, as in so many other cases of conversion, the way from the baptism to a thorough Christianization was very long, a distance of several centuries.

Fraternities (Fraternitas, Sodalitas) are associations formed in the Roman-Catholic Church for special religious purposes, such as nursing the sick, supporting the poor, practising some special devotion, etc., but of a less rigorous description than the monastic orders. They have their own statutes, religious exercises, privileges, etc.; but they stand under the authority of the bishops, and are only morally separated from the world. Such a fraternity, dedicated to Mary the Virgin, is mentioned by Od. Bishop of Paris, about 1208; another, the so-called "Gonfalonieri," was confirmed by Clement V., 1285—71. Among the most prominent were those of the Scapulariy, the Rosary, Corpus Christi, etc. One, the Frères Pontifes, was formed for the purpose of procuring good bridges across the water-courses. The fraternities may be divided into four classes. 1. Those which particularly relate to the worship of Christ, such as the fraternities of The Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar, of The Most Holy Heart of Jesus, of The Most Holy Name of Jesus, The Holy Five Wounds, etc. 2. Those which pay particular honor unto the Virgin Mary. They are very numerous. The most famous one, and one of the most celebrated in modern times, is The Fraternity of the Most Holy Heart of Jesus. Of The Most Holy and Immaculate Heart of Mary for the Conversion of Sinners, founded in Paris, 1857, by Abbé Dufranch. Deconsecratees. 3. Those for the honor of particular saints — very numerous. 4. Those that are charitable.

FRATICELLI, FRATICELLI. Wishing to put an end to the split in the Franciscan order, which had prevailed for the larger part of the thirteenth century, Celestine V. authorized the brothers Petrus de Mascara and Petrus de Faro Sempron, and some other Italian Spirituals, to form an independent congregation under the name of Pauperes Eremitice Domini Celestini. This congregation was heavily persecuted by the rest of the Franciscans, and by the Emperor Charles of Anjou, and by the King of France, Louis VIII.; but, excited by Peter Olivi's apocalyptic prophecies and vehement invectives against the Pope, the hermits, now generally called "Fraticelli," determined to resist. They declared that there had been no true pope since Celestine. They pushed the vow of poverty to the extreme, whence they were often called "Bizochi," from the Italian bizocho, French besace, a "beggar's sack." They entered into communication with the Beğhards, and taught that they were possessed of the Holy Spirit, and exempt from sin; that they needed neither penitence nor sacraments, etc. An attempt of Clement V. to re-unite the Spirituals with the Franciscans failed in 1312; and meanwhile the Fraticelli grew more and more unmanageable. In 1314 they expelled by force the Franciscans from the monasteries of Béziers and Narbonne. This caused John XXII. to adopt a severer policy. Under this inquisition was ordered to step in. In Italy, Sicily, and Southern France, where they had spread widely, a number of Fraticelli were seized by the Inquisition between 1318 and 1322, condemned, and burnt. only a few were willing to recant. But after the middle of the fourteenth century they gradually disappeared. By later writers they, like all heretical sects, have been accused of various abominable vices; but there are no proofs.

FRAYSSINES, Denys, b. at Curières, in Gascon, May 9, 1765; d. at St. Geniès, also in Gascony, Dec. 12, 1841; studied theology, and appeared, after the conclusion of the concordat of 1801, as one of the most zealous and most successful agitators for the Roman-Catholic Church, and against the reigning atheism and materialism. In 1809 he was forbidden to continue his conferences in the Church of St. Sulpice, in Paris; but he resumed his work after the Restoration, and, made grand-almoner to Louis XVIII., Bishop of Hermoplia in partibus infidelium, peer of France, and minister of public instruction from 1824 to 1828. He went into exile with Charles X., and after his return to France he lived in retirement. His principal works are, Les vrais principes de l'église gallicane, 1818 (in which he proves himself a staunch defender of the principles of Gallicanism), and Defense de Christianisme, 1828, translated into English, London, 1830. 2 vols.

FREDERICK III., THE WISE, Elector of Saxony, 1486—1526; was b. at Torgau, Jan. 17, 1463; and d. at Lochau, May 5, 1526. He was a man of common sense, probity, and firmness, and much respected, both in the realm and among foreign princes. One of the most consequential of his acts as a ruler was the foundation, in 1502, of the university of Wittenberg, and the appointment of Luther as its principal. It was by no means his intention, however, to make his new university a school of reform: on the contrary, he was as yet a true son of Rome. In 1493 he had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and brought back five thousand pieces of relics for the church of Wittenberg. Nevertheless, when Luther, in 1517, nailed his theses on the church-door in Wittenberg, the elector kept quiet; and when the Roman curia, in 1518, demanded that Luther should be sent to Rome to be punished for heresy, the elector refused: yea, when Luther, in 1517, nailed his theses on the church-door in Wittenberg, the elector declined to lend his aid to its enforcement; and, when Luther publicly and solemnly burnt this same bull, the elector saw no reason why he should interfere. The greatest service, however, which Frederick the Wise did to the cause of the Reformation was the removal of Luther to the Wartburg after the Diet of Worms, probably the only means of protecting him against the Pope and the emperor. There was in this policy,—so firm, so consistent, and yet so cautious,—no doubt, a high political wisdom; but there was also something else. A spark of Luther's conviction had fallen into Frederick's soul, and shortly before he died he took the Lord's Supper under both forms. See TUTSCHMANN: Friedrich der Weise, Grimma, 1848; G. SPALATIN: Fried. d. W., ed. by Neudecker and Preller, Jena, 1851; [CARL BUCKER: Das edle sächsische Fürsten-Kriegs-Jahr 1519; R. SCHMIDT: Wittenbergs ander Kurfürst Fried. dem W., Erlan., 1877; TH. DOR KOLLE: Fried. der Weise u. d. Anfänge d. Reformation, Erlan., 1881.]

FREDERICK III., THE PIOUS, Elector of the Palatinate, 1559–76; was educated by Bishop Eberhard of Liege, and at the court of Charles V., but was, nevertheless, early impressed by the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced the ideas of the Reformation. In 1545 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced the ideas of the Reformation.

In his accession he founded the Lutheran Church almost fully established in the Palatinate; but, shortly after, a violent controversy broke out between the Lutheran and the Reformed theologians, concerning the Lord's Supper. Frederick asked Melancthon to interfere; but the memoir which Melancthon wrote approached the ideas of Zwingli or Calvin so closely that Frederick himself became wavering. The religious disputation at Heidelberg (1560) completed his conversion; and, as his people also seemed inclined to Calvinism, the festivals of Mary and the saints were abolished; the altars, organs, baptismal fonts, images, etc., disappeared from the churches; Calvinists were appointed as teachers and preachers; the government of the church was confided to a council-board, consisting of three ecclesiastical and three lay members, etc. In 1562 the Heidelberg Catechism, written by Ursinus and Olevianus, but under the eyes of the elector himself, and it found so much favor, that it immediately was translated into French, English, Dutch, and Latin, and adopted almost by the whole body of the Reformed Church. An attempt was made by the Lutheran princes of the empire to prevent the establishment of Calvinism in the Palatinate; and they even went so far as to threaten the elector with war and deposition. But at the diet of Augsburg (1563) he met them with such courage and straightforwardness, that the case was dropped. The end of his life he was a support to the Reformed Church, both in France and in the Netherlands. See his life, by Kluckhohm (Nördlingen, 1877–79), who has also edited his letters (2 vols., Brunswick, 1868–72).
FRELINGHUYSEN.

FRELINGHUYSEN, Hon. Theodore, b. at Millstone, Somerset County, N.J., March 26, 1757;
d. at New Brunswick, N.J., April 12, 1861. He was graduated with the highest honors at Nassau Hall 1804; called to the bar 1808. From 1817 to 1829 he was attorney-general of New Jersey; was graduated with the highest honors at Nassau Hall in 1829; served a term in the United-States Senate, during which he delivered many eloquent speeches, and displayed in the highest stations his earnest Christian character. He heartily supported all acts tending to ameliorate the condition of the poor and oppressed, or to elevate their moral or religious character. He advocated bills for the improvement of the condition of the Indian tribes, and the suppression of Sunday mails.

When his term was ended, he resumed his practice. In 1837 and 1838 he was mayor of Newark, N.J. In 1839 he became chancellor of the University of the City of New York, from which office he went in 1850 to the presidency of Rutgers's College, New Brunswick, N.J., and held it until death. In 1844 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the vice-presidency of the United States on the ticket with Henry Clay for President. At one time he was president of the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. "His eloquent tongue was ever ready to plead for every good Christian or humane cause." He was one of the most distinguished Christian laymen of his day. See his Memoir, by the Rev. T. W. Chambers, D.D., N.Y., 1863.

FRENCH CONFESSION OF FAITH. See GALICAN CONFESSION.

FRENCH PROPHETS were Camisards (see art.), who appeared in England in 1706, and prophesied the speedy establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. For a time they produced a great impression, and won the allegiance of distinguished men, among whom was John Lacey, who, although previously a member of Dr. Calamy's congregation, "entered into all their absurdities, except that of a community of goods, which he strongly objected, having an income of two thousand pounds per annum." But these prophets overreached themselves by their fanaticism, even going so far as to murder one of their number, lately deceased, would rise from the dead upon a certain day. Failure in this and other predictions weakened their hold on the credulous, and their little day ended in disgrace. See HUGHSON: A Copious Account of the French and English Prophets, London, 1814.

FRENCH PROTESTANTISM. See FRANCE, Protestantism in.

FRENCH VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE. See Bible Versions, p. 288.

FRESBENIUS, Johann Philipp, b. at Niederweis, near Karlsruhe, Oct. 22, 1715; d. at Frankfort, July 4, 1761; studied theology at Strassburg; and was appointed minister at Oberwies, 1727, court-preacher at Giesen, 1734, and preacher at St. Peter's in Frankfort, 1743. The influence which he exercised as a preacher and as a minister in general was very great and lasting. Several of his sermons are still living in the church; such as Die heilsamen Betrachtungen (1750, new edition, 1872), Epistelpredigten (1754, new edition, 1858), etc. He followed the Spener-Francke direction, but was strongly opposed to the Moravian Brethren, against whom he wrote many volumes. His Antwortschriften against the Jesuits also attracted much attention (1731). His life was written (1743) by K. K. Griesbach, the father of the famous editor of the Greek Testament. Goethe describes him in the fourth book of Wahrheit und Dichtung, as a "mild man, of handsome and pleasing appearance, who was universally revered in Frankfort as an exemplary minister and good pulpit-orator, but not relished by those who sympathized with the Moravians, because of his attacks upon them." G. E. STRITZ.

FRESNE, DU. See Du CANGE.

FREYLINGHAUSEN, Johann Anastasius, one of the principal hymnists and leaders of the Pietistic movement in Germany; b. at Gandersheim, near Wolfenbüttel, in Hanover, Dec. 2, 1670; d. at Halle, Feb. 12, 1739. He received from his mother a strictly pious though legalistic education; studied theology at Jena, 1689; became acquainted with Augustus Herman Francke, the founder of the Orphan House at Halle, married his only daughter, Anastasia, and succeeded him in 1727. In connection with him and Spener he labored for the revival of practical piety in Germany. He combined the activity of an academic teacher, pastor, and superintendent of the benevolent institutions at Halle, and exerted a very salutary influence upon the rising generation. His theological works, of which the Fundamentale Theology (Grundlegung der Theologie, 1703) deserves to be mentioned, are not distinguished for any vigor or depth of thought, but for their piety and practical tendency, in opposition to the dry and cold scholasticism which then prevailed in the German universities. His most valuable productions are forty-four hymns, pregnant with Scripture truth, and fervent love to the Saviour. Some of them have passed into common use, and found a place in every good German hymn-book; as, "Wer ist wohl wie du, Jesus süße Ruh," "Jesus ist kommen, Grund ewiger Freuden," "Mein Herz gieb dich zufrieden," etc. [See translations in Miss Catharine Winkworth's Lyra Germanica, first and second series.] Freylinghausen published also collections of the best German hymn-books, in 2 vols., Halle, 1704 and 1713. The historical significance of this collection consists in its Pietistic spirit, and the introduction of the element of subjective devotion as a supplement to the older, more objective, and churchly hymns of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

FRIDOLIN or FRIDOLD (also Tridolin or Trudelin, often styled the "First Apostle of Allemania," and still venerated there as St. Fredolin, bishop of the diocese of St. Clara) was a native of Scotland, and preached Christianity to his heathen countrymen, but repaired afterwards to Poitiers, where he restored the church and congregation of St. Hilary (ruined and corrupted under the influence of Arianism) to their former splendor and purity. Moved by a vision of St. Hilary, he set out for Allemannia, and received from Chlodvid an island in the Rhine (Säckingen), where he built a church, and founded a monastery, and wherein he died. All that is known of Fridolin is drawn from a Life of him written by Balther, a monk of Säckingen, and dedicated to Notker Laboe of St. Gallen, who died 1022; but as this Life is written four centuries after the time of Fridolin, as it presents several chronological difficulties, and is much emblazoned with legendary ornament, the historical foundation it furnishes is rather slim. The best edition of it is found in MONK: Quellensammlung d. badischen Landesgeschichte, Carlshude, 1845, vol. I. See GELPE: Kirchengeschichte d. Schweiz, Bern, 1856; HEBER: Die vorkaroling. christlich. Glaubenshelden, Göttingen, 1867; EBERARD: Die truchcht. Missionarikirche, Gütersloh, 1873. R. ZÖPPFEL.

FRIENDLY ISLANDS. This group, discovered by Tasman, 1643, and named by Capt. Cook, on account of their friendly demeanor towards him, lies in the South B. E., twenty-one by twelve miles, and fifty miles south-east of the Fiji group. It consists of a hundred and fifty islands with an area of four hundred square miles. The islands are mostly of coral formation, some of them, however, of volcanic origin. Tonga, the largest, is twenty-one by twelve miles, and Vavau, the second in size, is forty-two miles in circumference. In 1847 the missionaries estimated the population to be fifty thousand. It does not now exceed twenty or twenty-five thousand. These islanders were excellent seamen, and frequently visited the Fiji group to procure wood for the manufacture of boats. They were superior in intelligence to the Fijians, but, with them, cannibals, and far sunken in iniquity. The first missionaries went to them in 1797, of whom several were murdered, and the rest retired in 1800. In 1825 the Wesleyan Missionary Society undertook missionary work amongst them in earnest. In 1847 a revival of great power passed over the islands. King George Tubou was converted, and became an active Christian worker, often occupying the pulpit himself. A great change took place in the habits of the people. Slavery has been utterly abolished, the language has been reformed, and writing, schools are scattered through the islands, and education is compulsory. The Christians of the islands early sent missionaries to the Fiji group. In 1869 the contributions of the native churches were £5,866, £3,000 of which were devoted to foreign missions and missionary work amongst them in Borea. One of the last reports gave 126 churches, 8,800 communicants, and 17,000 attendants on church. LIT.—MARINER: Account of the Natives of the Tonga Islands, 2 vols., Lond., 1813; Rev. T. WEST: Ten Years in South Central Polynesia; WILLIAMS and CALVERT: Fiji and the Fijians, and Missionary Labors among the Cannibals, etc., Lond., 1870, 3d ed.

FRIENDS, Society of. The rise of this body of Christians is one of the most noteworthy events in the religious history of England in the seventeenth century. In the midst of the efforts that were made to rescue the Church from the corruptions which had grown up around it, there were men who felt that Luther and Cranmer had not gone far enough, and that there was still much sacerdotalism to be purged away, before the original simplicity of Christianity could be restored. Such men found a leader in George Fox. He and his followers announced as their aim the revival of primitive Christianity; and this phrase remains as the best definition of their work. The privilege of direct access to God, without the intervention of human priest or rite, was revealed to Fox's soul. Having found one, "even Christ Jesus, who could speak to his condition," he longed to impart his discovery of the spirituality of true religion to others, and in 1647 began his labors in public ministry, going forth through England on foot, and at his own charges. His message appears to have been mainly to direct the people to the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, who died for them, and had sent his spirit into their hearts, to instruct and guide them in the things pertaining to life and salvation. "I was sent," he says, "to turn people from darkness to the light, that they might receive Christ Jesus; for, to as many as should receive him in his light, I saw that he would give power to become the sons of God, which I had obtained by receiving Christ. I was to direct people to the Spirit that gave forth the Scriptures, by which they might be led into all truth, and so up to Christ and God, as those had been who gave them forth." To the illumination of the Holy Spirit in the heart he turned the attention of all, as that by which sin was made manifest and reprobated, duty unfolded, and ability given to run with alacrity and joy in the way of God's commandments. He preached repentance towards God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and showed that one became a true disciple, not by a bare assent of the understanding to the truths contained in the Bible, nor by any outward rite, but by a real change of the heart and affections, through the power of the Holy Spirit. The soil was ready for the seed, and the rapid spread of Fox's doctrine was surprising. All classes flocked to his preaching; and among his converts were persons of the best families in the kingdom, priests of the Established Church, and ministers of other societies, and many men of wealth and learning. For four years Fox was the only minister of the society; but the most noted preacher was Elizabeth Hooton. In the fifth year there were twenty-five preachers; in the seventh, upwards of sixty. Within eight years, ministers of Friends preached in various parts of Europe, in Asia, and in Africa, and heretically endured persecution in Rome, Malta, Austria, Hungary, and other places. Among the noteworthy preachers in the earlier years, Francis Howgill, John Audland, and Samuel Fisher had been clergymen; George Bishop, Richard Hubberthorn, and William Ames, officers in the army; Anthony Pearson and John Crook, justices of peace. The curiously and culturized John Barclay, a member of a noble family in Scotland, a near relative of the Stuart kings, and a man of thorough classical and patrician scholarship, joined the society about twenty years after its formation. In 1660 the number of Friends in Great Britain was not less than sixty-six thousand.

America was first visited by Friends in 1656, when Mary Fisher and Anne Austin arrived in Boston from Barbadoes, to which island they had gone to preach the gospel the preceding year.
They were charged with holding "very dangerous, heretical, and blasphemous opinions," and were kept in close confinement, at first on the vessel, and afterwards in jail. Their books were burned by the court, the construction of the Indians and others of mankind, in the amelioration of penal laws and prison discipline, in the adoption of enlightened methods for the care and relief of the insane, in testimony against war, intemperance, oaths, corrupting books and amusements, extra-\vance, insincerity, and vain display, it has been in the front of Christian reformers; while it has maintained the highest standard of integrity and practical virtue, and in the everyday charities of life its bounty has been unstinted.
About the year 1827 the society in America was divided into two bodies—evangelical or "orthodox," and liberal or of Hicksite," each of which claims to be the true representative of the early Friends. The orthodox society is the one acknowledged as genuine by the London Yearly Meeting. A tone of thought similar to that prevailing in the evangelical section of the Church of England was fostered by the preaching and writings of Joseph John Gurney (1788-1847), and had great influence on both sides of the Atlantic.
This school of opinion found an opponent in the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, which claims to maintain the truths taught by the founders, against perversion on either hand; but it has been very influential in the society at large. An earnest school is now arising, holding the essential doctrines of orthodox faith, and animated with an increased zeal for education and for the growth of the church, while discarding formal-ties of dress and speech, and all undue asceticism.

Distinctive Creed.—The creed of the Society
of Friends may be described, as, from the first,
one singularly free both from heresy and from exaggeration. Objecting to scholastic terms and
"man-made" symbols, the Friends endeavor to object to scholastic terms and "man-made" symbols, the Friends endeavor to statement of their views is found in a letter addressed by Fox and others to the Governor of Barbadoes in 1671. What is most distinctive of the society is its belief in the immediate influcence of the Holy Spirit, and its ex-citation of the Old Bailey, will forever remain as noble monuments of their resistance to the arbitrary procedings of the courts of judicature at that time,
and the intolerant rigour of that period's justice.
‘Soon after the Revolution of 1688, the persecution ceased on both sides of the Atlantic.
When the martyr age had passed, the society
became less aggressive, and made fewer converts to its views; but it devoted itself to the quiet practice of all the Christian virtues, and to an ascetic philosophy, the wider observance of which was to be in all the churches. An exaggerated asceticism in some directions, and a rigid, though in most respects admirable, discipline, visiting with excommunication even the offence of marrying a person not by the London Yearly Meeting. A tone of thought similar to that prevailing in the evangelical section of the Church of England was fostered by the preaching and writings of Joseph John Gurney (1788-1847), and had great influence on both sides of the Atlantic.
This school of opinion found an opponent in the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, which claims to maintain the truths taught by the founders, against perversion on either hand; but it has been very influential in the society at large. An earnest school is now arising, holding the essential doctrines of orthodox faith, and animated with an increased zeal for education and for the growth of the church, while discarding formal-ties of dress and speech, and all undue asceticism.

Distinctive Creed.—The creed of the Society
of Friends may be described, as, from the first,
one singularly free both from heresy and from exaggeration. Objecting to scholastic terms and
"man-made" symbols, the Friends endeavor to statement of their views is found in a letter addressed by Fox and others to the Governor of Barbadoes in 1671. What is most distinctive of the society is its belief in the immediate influcence of the Holy Spirit, and its ex-
citation of the Old Bailey, will forever remain as noble monuments of their resistance to the arbitrary pro-
cedings of the courts of judicature at that time,
and the intolerant rigour of that period's justice.
‘Soon after the Revolution of 1688, the persecution ceased on both sides of the Atlantic.
When the martyr age had passed, the society
became less aggressive, and made fewer converts
to its views; but it devoted itself to the quiet practice of all the Christian virtues, and to an ascetic philosophy, the wider observance of which was to be in all the churches. An exaggerated asceticism in some directions, and a rigid, though in most respects admirable, discipline, visiting with excommunication even the offence of marrying a person not a member of the society, co-rites themselves as inconsistent with the whole spirit of Christianity, in which types have given place to the substance. Their views in regard to the ministry are also characteristic. They believe that no one should preach the Word without a direct call from God, and that this call is to be spoken to males or females. No high human learning and no course of theological study are necessary qualifications for a minister, who may be as unlettered as were most of the apostles; if plenteously endued with heavenly grace. But Friends do not deny the self-evident proposition that learning and intellectual ability conduce to the usefulness of a preacher of the gospel, and that a church needs men possessing both, to assert and defend the truth. Any one who feels it laid upon him is allowed to speak in the meetings for worship, so long as he speaks things worthy of the occasion. If, after sufficient probation, he gives evidence of a divine call, he is formally acknowledged as a minister, and is allowed one of the seats at the head of the meeting. Besides ministers, the society appoints elders, whose especial duty is to sympathize with and advise ministers, and watch that they be sound in the faith; and overseers, as in the primitive church, who have a general care of the flock. In meetings for business, the society recognizes the presidency of the great Head of the Church, and strives to do all in his fear, and with his guidance. Decisions are not made by votes and majorities, but are recorded by the clerk, in accordance with what appears to be "the weight" of either side; or, if there is not a general spirit of acquiescence, action is postponed.

Worship and Ministry.—Believing that every act of divine service should proceed from an immediate impression of duty, prompted by the Holy Spirit, the meetings of the society for worship are held in silence, unless some one feels called upon to preach or teach, to offer prayer in behalf of the congregation, or to give praise to God, and strengthened for his future warfare with the world, the flesh, and the devil. And, if some brother or sister is led to offer vocal service, it often happens that the word of exhortation or reproof or comfort, or the earnest petition to the throne of grace, harmonizes with the private exercise of mind which the hearer has passed through, confirming his faith, and invigorating his resolution.

The theory of the exercise of the ministry among Friends asserts the prompting and guidance of the Holy Spirit, both what to say, and when to say it. It does not, however, intelligently understood, claim any infallibility, or plenary inspiration, in the speaker. The treasure is borne in earthen vessels, and the imperfections of the instrument may sometimes appear. Yet he that lives daily near his Lord, and is careful not to assert more than he has tested in his own experience, or to utter words beyond those in which he feels a full consciousness of divine leading; seldom outruns his Guide, or fails to speak to the edification of the church.

Education.—The society provides that all its members shall receive a good practical education, and cherishes also the higher learning. It has colleges at Haverford, Penn., Richmond, Ind., Wilmington, O., and Oskaloosa, Ia., and one for girls at Bryn Mawr, Penn. There are excellent boarding-schools in most of the Yearly Meetings.

Organization.—The congregations are grouped together to constitute Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly Meetings; the Monthly Meetings sending representatives to the Quarterly, and the Quarterly to the Yearly. Each Yearly Meeting is an independent body, but united with all the others by a common faith. There are two Yearly Meetings in Great Britain, and ten in America. The number of members is about twenty thousand in Great Britain, and eighty thousand on this continent. Besides these, there is a large number of regular attenders of Friends' meetings, sympathizing with their views.

Hickites (so called). There are six Yearly Meetings of this body, all in America, with about forty thousand members. They have a flourishing college for both sexes at Swarthmore, near Philadelphia. (See Hicks, Elias.)

FRIENDS OF GOD.

FRIENDS OF GOD, the beautiful name of a large brotherhood of mystics which existed in Germany in the thirteenth century. They did not constitute a sect; on the contrary, they attended the church-services assiduously, but gave novel interpretations to the ecclesiastical symbols. Their centres were at Cologne, Strassburg, and Basel: their teachers were mostly Dominicans. Their ideas and principles were drawn from the German mystics. They held more or less personal and epistolary communication with one another, especially with the members of the same local society. They protested against the corruptions of the times, and set an example of holy living. Their great leader, henceforth known as Nicholas of Basel: their preacher was John Tauler. (See those articles.) In 1380 some of the more earnest of them assembled in the mountains, according to an agreement made the year before; but, being warned that the explosion of divine wrath would not come for three years, they disbanded, and no later meeting is recorded. See Essays upon the Gottesfreunde, by C. Schmidt (1854) and Rieger (1879).

FRIENDS OF LIGHT. See Free Congregations.

FRIEANS (Frizi, Frisones), The, inhabited, at the beginning of our era, the coast of Holland and Germany from the Scheldt to the Weser, the Islands of the German Ocean (Silt, Fohr, Heligoland, etc.), and the western coast of Sleswick. They were a rude and warlike people, not aggressive, but jealous for their nationality, and fanatical in their religion. Christianity entered the country, together with the Franks, in the seventh century; and for two centuries it rose and fell among the people together with the Frankish power. It was not Frankish missionaries, however, who converted the Frisians, but Anglo-Saxon. The Franks and the Frisians did not understand each other, but the Anglo-Saxons and the Frisians did. St. Amandus (626) and Eligius (641) met with only indifferent success; but Wilfred of York (677) made an impression; and Willibrord, the apostle of the Frisians (700-730), procured a footing for Christianity in the country. The conversion of the Frisians seems at that time to have been what we now would call a fashion among the Anglo-Saxons. One missionary followed the other. Winfred, too, made his first and his last attempt as a missionary in Friesland. Willibrord's successor, Gregory, founded at Utrecht a school where the Scholastics discovered in the Friesian language a fertile seed-plot for Christian piety and learning. Among his helpers were Lebuin and Wilhelad; among his pupils, Lindger, a native Frisian. In the latter part of the eighth century Christianity had advanced from the Scheldt to the Yssel, and it approached the same point from the other. But Charlemagne treated the Frisians as he treated the Saxons. The country was made a province of the Frankish Empire, a branch of the Christian Church. Bishops with liturgy, schools, jurisdiction, and tithes were settled in the country; and all became quiet, though remnants of rank heathenism were still lingering among the dark, impenetrable forests to the south of the country until the twelfth century. Wiarda: Ostfriesische Geschichte, Aurich, 1791-98, 9 vols.; Friedländer: Ostfriesisches Urkundenbuch, Emden, 1875; and the biographical art in this Cyclopaedia on Amundus, Boniface, Willibrord, etc.

FRITHE (or FRYTH), John, an English Reformer and martyr; b. at Sevenoaks, Kent, about 1503; d. at the stake, July 4, 1533. He studied at Cambridge, and was selected by Cardinal Wolsey to be a member of the college (now Christ Church) at Oxford, which he had recently founded from the spoils of several monasteries. In 1525 he became acquainted with Tyndale, and in his intercourse with him imbibed those evangelical sentiments for which he afterwards died. At Oxford he was imprisoned, with several companions, by the Romanists, for his attachment to the views of Luther and Zwingli. In 1528 he retired to the Continent, having escaped from prison, into which he had been thrown with the connivance of Wolsey. He remained abroad for two years. Returning to England, Frith was a marked man. Sir Thomas More had replied to a sharp attack against the ecclesiastical establishments of England (The Supplication of the Beggar) in a work entitled The poor see (simple) souls persecuted out of purgatory. Frith published, in answer to More's work, Disputacion of Purgatory, in which he denies all efficacy to papal indulgences, and maintains that Christ's satisfaction is sufficient, and precludes the necessity of purgatorial cleansing. The author was forthwith confined in the Tower. The authorities were disposed, however, to deal leniently with him. But he not only persisted in his views on purgatory, but wrote in prison a treatise on the Lord's Supper, in which he denied transubstantiation. He was tried, and condemned by Dr. Stokesly, Bishop of London, to the stake. He was burned at Smithfield, in company with Andrew Hewet, a tailor's apprentice, who professed the same views of the Lord's Supper.

Frithe was regarded as an able and learned man by his contemporaries. He was the first English martyr for the true doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and the first of the Reformers of England to write against transubstantiation. Besides the treatises already mentioned, he put forth a tract on Baptism, and A Mirror or Glass to know thyself. His writings are published in vol. iii. of the Writings of the Brit. Fathers, London (Rev. Tract Soc.). For his life, see that volume, and Foxe's Acts and Monuments.

FRITZSCHE, Karl Friedrich August, b. at Steinbach, near Borna, Dec. 16, 1801; d. at Gießen, Dec. 6, 1846; studied theology at Leipzig; was appointed professor at Rostock, 1828, and removed to Gießen, 1841. About the time of his emigration to America, he applied the philological principles of his master to biblical exegesis, and thereby promoted a more exact grammatical interpretation.

of the sacred documents. His principal works are Latin commentaries on Matthew (1826), Mark (1830), and the Epistle to the Romans (1836–43), 3 vols., all marked by great philological learning and acumen. He always lectured in Latin. He was by nature a controversialist, and gave stinging blows.

FROMENT, Antoine, b. at Trier, near Grenoble, 1509 or 1510; d. in Geneva at an unknown date, but after 1574; entered early into relations with Faber Stapelensis, Marguerite of Navarre, Farel, and the whole party of Reformers, and exercised considerable influence on the reformatory movement in its beginning. In 1529 he labored at Aigh, in 1530 at Tavannes, in 1531 at Bienne and Grandson. In 1532 he arrived at Geneva. As it was not possible to preach the Reformation there openly, he established a school, and advertised that he would teach everybody, young or old, man or woman, to read and write that was in 1532. People crowded to the school, where they were taught, not only reading and writing, but also the new religion; and in 1533 Froment preached publicly in the market-place. But he was immediately driven out of the city by the Roman priests. He returned, however, a month later, but caused a tremendous uproar by protesting in the very church against the invectives and slander of the priests, and was again compelled to flee from the city. This time, however, he returned, backed by an embassy from the canton of Bern; and in 1535 the council granted permission to preach the Reformation in the city. In the presence of Viret, Farel, and Calvin, Froment naturally re-entered into the background; and the latter part of his life was much troubled. His wife proved unfaithful to him, but numerous sketches of his life in La France Protestant, Gabaret, Histoire de l'église de Genève, etc. THEODOR SCHOTT.

FROMENT le Duc ( Ducceus), b. at Bordeaux, 1558; d. in Paris, Sept. 25, 1624; entered the property appropriated by the monasteries. After ten years of exile and misery, the old man was allowed to return to Geneva, and in 1555 he was re-instated as a notary. His principal work is Les actes et gestes merveilleux de la cité de Genève (edited by Gustave Revilliod, Geneva, 1854), a work full of freshness and vivacity, but not fully reliable. There is no independent biography of him, but numerous sketches of his life in La France Protestant, Gabaret, Histoire de l'église de Genève, etc. THEODOR SCHOTT.

FRONTON LE DUC (Ducceus), b. at Bordeaux, 1558; d. in Paris, Sept. 25, 1624; entered the Society of Jesus in 1577; taught rhetoric and theology at Pont à Mousson, Bordeaux, and Paris, and was in 1594 made librarian at the royal library. Besides editions with notes, and Latin translation of Chrysostom, John of Damascus, Irenaeus, Gregory of Nyssa, Basil, etc., he published a number of polemical and apologetical works, of which a list is given by Backer, in Bibliothèque des ecrits de la Compagnie de Jésus.

FROSARD, Benjamin Sigismond, b. at Nyon, in Switzerland, 1754; d. at Montauban, 1830; studied theology at Geneva; was appointed pastor of the Reformed Church at Lyons, 1777, and professor of morals in the École Centrale of Clermont-Ferrand, 1792. In 1808 he was charged with the organization of a Protestant theological faculty in Montauban, of which he himself became dean, and professor of morals. Besides translations of Hugh Blair, Wilberforce, etc., he published La Cause des Éclats Nègres (1788, 2 vols.), which attracted great attention in France.

FROUDE, Richard Hurrell, an ardent supporter of the Oxford movement; b. March 25, 1803, at Dartington, Devonshire; d. there Feb. 28, 1866. He was educated at Eton and Oxford; elected fellow of Oriel College, 1826; and ordained priest, 1829. During the last four years of his life he resided in Southern Europe and the West Indies. He was a man of fair talents and a love of the pure and good, but of gloomy temper and ungovernable will, as his mother's letters expressly testify. He fell in heartily with the Tractarian movement. "Really I hate the Reformation more and more," he says. And again: "I think people are injudicious who talk against the Roman Catholics for worshipping the Virgin, and honoring the Virgin and images." He was very bitter in his judgment of Milton and the Puritans.

To a friend he writes, "Try to un-Protestantize and un-Miltonize Southey and Wordsworth." His Remains, consisting of sermons, letters, journals, etc., appeared in 2 vols., 1888, 1889. He was a brother of the well-known historian. See Newman's Apologia, also Tractarianism.

FRUCTUOSUS, the apostle of the Sueves and Lusitanians, Archbishop of Braga, in Galicia, since 656; d. about 670; was educated in the monastery of Complutum (not the famous place in Lusitania, Asturia, and Galicia, up to 647; and afterwards, of which he had built no less than seven, in Lusitania, Asturia, and Galicia, up to 647; and he continued building to his death. There exist two sets of rules written down by him for his monks. The first (Regula Complutensis) is based on the rule of St. Benedict, and written for the monks of Complutum (not the famous place in Castile, the present Alcala, but a place of the same name, probably in Asturia or Leon). It fixes the life of monks, and the minutest details. Not only the monks, but the laymen also are required to speak without the permission of the superior, but they were even forbidden to turn their heads, or rise from their seats, unless on a given signal. The other (Regula Communis) regards cases in which a whole family entered a monastery. All family ties were immediately dissolved, and all the property appropriated by the monasteries. Both rules are given by Holsten-Brockie, in Cod. reg. monasticorum, II. See Montalembert: Monks of the West, II.

ZÖCKLER.

FRUMENTIUS. See ABYSSINIAN CHURCH.

FRY, Elizabeth, an eminent philanthropist, daughter of John Gurney, a Friend; was b. near Norwich, Eng., May 21, 1780; d. at Ramsgate, Oct. 13, 1845. She was of fascinating manners, but the were even forbidden to turn their heads, or rise from their seats, unless on a given signal. The other (Regula Communis) regards cases in which a whole family entered a monastery. All family ties were immediately dissolved, and all the property appropriated by the monasteries. Both rules are given by Holsten-Brockie, in Cod. reg. monasticorum, II. See Montalembert: Monks of the West, II.
the closeness of the rooms, the ferocious manners and expressions of the women toward each other, and the abandoned wickedness which everything bespeaks, are quite indescribable," were her own words in describing what she had seen.

Mrs. Fry at once instituted measures for the amelioration of prison morals and life, daily visiting the prison, reading to the prisoners the Scripture and the sermons he delivered on Sundays. A committee of ladies was soon organized to carry on the work on a larger scale. These labors effected a complete change in the condition of the criminals. Riot, licentiousness, and filth were exchanged for order, sobriety, and comparative neatness of person. Previously many who had entered the prison only comparatively abandoned, left completely debauched. Now the process was reversed, and many profligate characters went out of the prison renewed. The mayor and aldermen early took notice of these labors, and acknowledged their beneficence.

In 1818, in company with her brother, J. J. Gurney, Mrs. Fry visited the prisons of Northern England and Scotland, and in 1827 those of Ireland. Kindred societies for the help of female criminals were organized in other parts of Great Britain; and the fame of her labors attracted the interest, and stimulated the competition, of women in foreign lands. In 1839, 1840, and 1841 she visited the Continent, extending her travels as far as Hungary. She found the condition of the prisons lamentable. In Hungary many of the criminals slept in stocks, and whipping was universally practised, even to bastinadoing. Her example and immediate efforts secured remedial legislation, and the organization of prison-reform societies in Holland, Denmark, France, Prussia, and other Continental countries. In the mean while her efforts secured the organization of a society (1839) for the care of the criminals after their discharge from prison, and for the visitation and in BUCHON: Chronique de la prise de Constantinople, and in BUCHON: Coll. des chroniques nationales françaises, vol. iii.

FR. DIBELIUS.

FULDA, The Monastery of, was founded in 744, by St. Boniface, who lies buried there. The place was selected by Sturm, a pupil of Boniface; the ground was given by Duke Karlmann; the internal organization was adopted from Monte Casino and the rule of St. Benedict. In 754 the Pope sanctioned the institution, and exempted the abbey from episcopal authority, placing it immediately under the papal see. The first abbot was Sturm; and before his death, in 770, the number of monks was increased to five hundred. New donations were given by Pepin and Charlemagne; and under the leadership of Rabanus Maurus, himself a pupil of Fulda, the school became the centre, not only of learning, but of general progress and civilization in Germany. It gave instruction in theology, grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, mathematics, physics, and astronomy. Among its pupils were Walafrid Strabo, Servatius Lupus, Otrfried, etc. It also cultivated the arts. Isambert, Rudolf, Candidus, Hatto, and others of its monks, were celebrated artists; and great numbers of well-trained artisans, weavers, tailors, carpenters, etc., were trained in the school over all Germany. After the time of Rabanus Maurus, the school lost some of its lustre, but it continued to exercise a great and beneficial influence for several centuries. Under Abbot Werner (968-982) the monastery obtained the primacy among the abt. Odo of Chartres and Odo I. gave the abbot the title and dignity of arch-chancellor of the realm. In the fourteenth century the abbey successfully resisted an attack of theburghers of the city of Fulda, and was elected Bishop of Chartres in 1007. He left, besides some hymns and minor essays, a hundred and thirty-eight letters, which are of great interest for the history of his time, and are found in Migne: Patro. Lat., vol. 141.

FULCHER OF CHARTRES was chaplain to Baldwin, the second king of Jerusalem, and wrote Gesta peregrinantium Francorum, a history of the Crusaders up to 1127. The best edition of it is that by DUCHARMONT: Chronique de la prise de Constantinople, and in BUCHON: Coll. des chroniques nationales françaises, vol. iii.

FR. DIBELIUS.

FULCO, minister of Neuilly, near Paris, and one of the most popular preachers of his time; d. 1202; seems to have led a rather supercilious life of pleasure until a great change suddenly took place with him in 1192. He went every week-day to Paris to study under Peter Cantor; and the sermons he delivered on Sundays began to attract the greatest attention. Soon he preached, not only in the church, but also in the marketplace, not only in Neuilly, but also in Paris and all the great cities of France. In 1198 he was charged by Innocent III. with preaching the fourth crusade; and at the chapter-general of the Cistercians, in 1201, he asserted that more than two hundred thousand had received the cross from his hands. Of most importance, however, was, perhaps, the influence he exercised on his own colleagues, whom his words and example led to a more conscientious fulfilment of the duties of their office. See JACOB. A VITRIACO and OTTON DE ST. BLASIO, in Recueil des Historiens de la France, vol. xviii.; GEOFFREY DE VILLE-HARDOIN: Chronique de la prise de Constantinople, and in BUCHON: Coll. des chroniques nationales françaises, vol. iii.

FR. DIBELIUS.

FULCO. FULDA.
FULGENTIUS FERRANDUS. 844

in the sixteenth it fortunately escaped the Reformation; but its significance as a social institution is of course lost long ago.

FULGENTIUS FERRANDUS, a friend or relation of Fulgentius of Ruspe, whom he followed into banishment under Thrasimund, king of the Vandals, and with whom he lived at Cagliari, in Sardinia, until 523, when he returned to Carthage, where he became a deacon, and died before 547. He left a Vita Fulgentii Ruspensis, a Breviatio Canonum (of great interest for the history of canon law), and a number of Letters, of which especially one addressed to the Roman deacons Pelagius and Anatolius, concerning the Three-Chapters controversy, is of great interest. His works were first edited by P. F. CHIFFLET, Dijon, 1649, afterwards often; as, for instance, in MIGNE: Patr. Lat., vol. 67.

FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE, b. at Telepte, a city of North Africa, 408; d. at Ruspe, in the province of Byzacena, Jan. 1, 533; belonged to a distinguished senatorial family, and was educated for a brilliant political career, but felt himself so strongly drawn towards a life of devotion, seclusion, and asceticism, that he entered a monastery, very much against the wishes of his family. After a journey to Sicily, Italy, and Rome, occasioned by the Arian King Thrasimund's persecutions of the Catholics, he was chosen Bishop of Ruspe in 508, but was shortly after banished, together with sixty other Catholic bishops, from North Africa. He settled in Sardinia, and remained there till 523, when the death of Thrasimund allowed him to return. A year before his death he retired from office, and spent his last days in a monastery. As well during his exile, as before and after he developed a great literary activity; and his writings, among which were first published by W. Pirkheimer (Nuremb., 1520), and most completely by Mangeant (Paris, 1864), also in MIGNE: Patr. Lat., vol. 65. [See Mally's translation of his Life by a pupil, Wien, 1885.]

FULKE, William, D.D., an able Puritan divine; b. in London some time before 1538 (as we learn incidentally from his own statements); d. August, 1589. Educated at Cambridge, he became fellow of St. John's College. He studied law for six years; but, turning his attention to the ministry, he espoused the Puritan cause and became a most zealous champion of Puritanism. A sermon preached in 1565 against popish habits in ecclesiastical establishments evoked the opposition of the university authorities. Removed from his office, he was made, in succession, rector of Warley and Kedington. After a trip to the Continent, he was chosen (1578) Master of Pembroke Hall and Margaret Professor of Divinity. On a tablet erected to his memory at Kedington are these two lines amongst others:—

"His works will show him free from all error, Rome's foe, Truth's champion, and the Remishes' terror."

They indicate the general tenor of Fulke's life. He was a fearless opponent of Romanism, at different times being engaged in public disputations with Papists. In controversy he was one of the ablest divines of his day. His principal works are, Confutation of a libelle, etc. (1671), The Discovery of the Dangerous Rock of the Popish Church (1580), Defence of the sincere and true translation of the Holy Scriptures into English against the Cavils of Gregory Martin (1583, recently published by the Parker Society, Cambridge, 1848). He was also the author of some works against astrology. See BROOK, Lives of the Puritans, I, p. 385 sqq., Lond., 1830, and the Memoir prefixed to the volume of the Parker Society.

FULLER, Andrew, a distinguished Baptist divine; was b. at Wicken, Cambridgeshire, Feb. 6, 1754; d. at Kettering, May 7, 1815. He received only a common-school education. Joining the church at sixteen, he exercised his gifts occasionally at religious meetings, and was ordained (1775) pastor of the Baptist Church in Soham. In 1782 he passed to the church at Kettering. He was honored with the degree of D.D. by Princeton and Yale Colleges, but never used the title. Mr. Fuller's reputation rests, not upon his pulpit achievements, but upon his services as a theological writer, and a promoter of Baptist missionary efforts. He stood in intimate relations with Carey, and contributed to awaken in his mind an interest in the heathen. He was one of the founders of the Baptist Missionary Society in a back-parlor at Kettering, Oct. 2, 1792, and was made its first secretary. As a theological writer, one of his biographers (Dr. Ryland) pronounces him "the most judicious and able theological writer that ever belonged to the Baptist denomination." He shared with Robert Hall and John Foster a first place in the esteem of the Baptists of his day. His principal works are the following. The Gospel Worthy of all Acceptation, a work which involved him in a protracted controversy of nearly twenty years. In opposition to hyper-Calvinism, he here elaborates the principle that all may apply for the gospel, confidently expecting to receive its benefits. "No man is an unbeliever," he says, "but because he will be so." The Gospel is its own Witness, an able criticism upon Deism, and reply to such writers as Thomas Pain. The Calvinistic and Socinian Systems Examined, pronounced by Robert Hall to be his ablest work. Expository Notes on Genesis, 2 vols. Dialogues and Letters between Criacus and Gaicus, containing discussions of Total Depravity and other theological topics.

LIT.—Complete Works, Am. ed., 1833, 2 vols., with Memoir by his son, Andrew Gunton Fuller; Lives of Fuller, by his friend JOHN RYLAND, D.D. (Lond., 1816), J. W. MORRIS (Lond., 1830), and THOMAS EKINS FULLER, his grandson (Lond., 1863).

FULLER, Richard, D.D., an eloquent Baptist preacher; b. in Beaufort, S.C., April 22, 1804; d. in Baltimore, Oct. 20, 1876, from a malignant carbuncle. After graduating at Harvard (1824), he practised law in his native town, where he soon secured a lucrative practice. In the meetings of the great revivalist Rev. Daniel Baker, in 1832, he was converted, and joined the Baptist Church.
“His case was a very clear and delightful one,” is an entry in Mr. Baker’s journal, referring to him. He was ordained the same year, and began his missionary work in the Chippewa country. The bene-pastor of the Seventh Baptist Church in Baltimore, and in 1871 removed with a part of the con-tegation to the fine new edifice on Eutaw Place.
Dr. Fuller was a man of fine presence of body, and endowments of mind. He was a born orator, and is said to have carried off, on several occasions, the honors with Webster and Clay on the platform. As a preacher he stood in the front rank of the most eloquent and scriptural of his generation. He was for a time co-editor of the Baltimore Herald, and published Letters on the Roman Chancery (Balt., 1840), Baptism and Communion (Balt. 1841), and a number of sermons in pamphlet form. See CUTHBERT: Life of R. FULLER, N.Y., 1879.

FULLER, Thomas, D.D., a learned and witty divine and church-historian; b. 1608, at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, where his father was rector; d. Aug. 16, 1661, in London. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1621 was made fellow of Sidney College, and prebend of Salisbury. This year he issued his first publication, David’s Harious Sinne, Heartie Repentance and Heavie Punishment. In 1634 he was made rector of Broad Windsor, and, 1641, lecturer of the Savoy in London. The year before, he published at Cambridge The Hist. of the Holy War, an account of the Crusades, and in 1642 The Hist.
of the Holy and Prophane States, an interesting collection of essays and biographies. Fuller was a Royalist; and in 1643 he entered the Royal army as chaplain, but kept a prudent silence during the Commonwealth period. During his service in the army, he began the investigations which resulted in a work, published after the author’s death (1662), entitled History of the Worthies of England, Endeavoured by Tho. Fuller, D.D. The subject matter of this work is treated under the central categories of England’s Worthies, and includes the most varied information about their products, animals, buildings, battles, proverb, eminent men, etc. In 1650 appeared his Piagah sight of Palestine and the Confines thereof, with the history of the Old and New Testament actei thereon.
Fuller was presented with the living of Waltham Abbey in 1648, and at the Restoration, in 1660, was re-admitted to his lectureship in the Savoy,
and made chaplain in extraordinary to the king.

In 1656 Fuller published his great work, Church Hist. of Britain from the birth of Jesus Christ to the year 1648, to which was subjoined a Hist. of the University of Cambreidge, as well as all of his works, abounds in quaint humor and epigrammatic sayings. He was an inveterate punster, and delighted in striking alliterations, but was also recognized by his contemporaries as a “ perfct walking library.” His memory is also reminiscent of his incredible feats. He was able to repeat five hundred strange words after hearing them twice, and on one occasion undertook to repeat backwards and forwards in regular order all the shop-signs along the street from Temple Bar to Cheapside, after passing them once, and accomplished it. Coleridge says that “he was incomparably the most sensible, the least prejudiced, great man of an age that boasted a galaxy of great men.”

LIT. — Amongst the works by Fuller not already mentioned are his devotional manuals, Good Thoughts in Bad Times (1645), Good Thoughts in Worse Times (1647), Mist Contemplations in Better Times (1860); all bearing upon the vicissitudes of the Royalist cause, but containing thoughts for all times, and which to-day are read with delight and profit. Most of Fuller’s works have been republished in this century. The best edition of his Church History is that of J. NICHOLS, 3 vols., Lond., 1888; Of the Worthies of England, by NUT-TALL, 3 vols., Lond., 1840. See the biographies by RUSSELL (Lond., 1844) and of BAILEY (Lond., 1874), the latter an exhaustive work.

FUNCK, Johann, b. at Wohrd, a suburb of Nuremberg, Feb. 7, 1518; d. atipzig, Oct. 28, 1566; studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed preacher in his native town in 1539, but was dismissed by the magistrate of Nuremberg in 1547, on the approach of the emperor. In the same year he entered the service of Duke Albrecht of Prussia; was made court-preacher in 1549; became one of Osiander’s most ardent adherents, and after his death the leading representative of his ideas, and exercised, through his intimacy with the duke, a decisive influence on all affairs in Prussia, political as well as ecclesiastical. Though he in 1556 became reconciled with the Wittenberg theologians, and in 1563 actually retracted what he had written in defence of Osiander, he was, nevertheless, in 1566, put under the accusation of heresy, and disturbance of the peace, and condemned. Of his Chronologlcb oder konrond., the first part appeared in 1545, the rest in 1562. See C. A. HASE:
Hersch Albrecht von Preussen u. sein Hofprediger [Funck], Leipzig, 1879.

FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINES OF CHRISTIANITY. The distinction between fundamental and non-fundamental doctrines is a useful one,
as adapted, by bringing out in sharp outline the great cardinal articles of the Christian Church,
and non-fundamental doctrines is a useful one,

as adapted, by bringing out in sharp outline the great cardinal articles of the Christian Church, and to develop a spirit of tolerance towards each other with regard to the articles of lesser importance in which they disagree.

History. — The Roman-Catholic Church rejects the distinction (Wetzer and Welte, art. Dogma, III. pp. 195 sq.) on the ground that it resolves doctrines into essential or necessary, and unessential or incidental. Although it is not universally made by Protestant theologians, it early came into use. Hunnius, in 1526, was the first to use the distinction in the Lutheran Church in his De fundamentali diversi. Luther, and which the fundamental difference in the Lutheran and Calvinistic theologies). He was followed by Quenstedt and others, and recently by Philippi (Glaubenslehre, i. 73 sq.), who, starting from the atonement as the constitutive principle, defines the fundamental all articles which necessarily follow from it.

The distinction was urged by the younger Turretin, and in England by Chillingworth, Stilliglees, Waterland, and others in the interest of ecclesi-asical toleration; Lord Bacon having before, in his 845 FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINES.

Advancement of Learning, insisted upon distinguishing "between points fundamental and points" which he calls "points of further perfection." The Parliament of 1653 voted indulgence to all who professed the "Fundamentals," and appointed a commission, consisting of Archbishop Usher (who resigned, his place being filled by Baxter), Owen, Goodwin, and others, to define what these were. Baxter was for holding to the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments. But the commission drew up sixteen articles, which were presented to Parliament, and only missed ratification by its sudden dissolution. Neal (Hist. Puritans, II. pp. 148 sq., Harpers' ed.) gives a full account of this movement. The varying importance of the doctrines of the Christian system and the growing tolerance of this century have produced the conviction that it is desirable to emphasize the more important articles. The Evangelical Alliance, therefore, -- "the system and the growing tolerance of this century on the assumption that agreement in fundamentals is a sufficient foundation for Catholic communion, adopts a constitution of nine articles.

Definition. — The distinction of fundamentals and non-fundamentals is based upon the valid assumption that some articles are of greater importance than others. It is justified by the example of Paul in his teaching over against the Judaizing tendencies of his time. The following distinctions will help us in defining the term fundamental.

1. Fundamental when applied to articles does not imply that they are the only articles which it is expedient or desirable for a church to teach, and the individual to believe. The apostasy of the angels, the eternal duration of future punishment, the single or double procession of the Holy Spirit (the Filioque clause being rejected by the Greek Church), may all be scriptural doctrines, and ought to be believed, but are not fundamental doctrines of Christianity (although some would so consider the endlessness of future punishment).

2. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are not to be confused with the distinctive tenets of a denomination. Denominational differences may and often do embody the truth; but the mode of baptism, for example, or the particular theory of the decrees (however valuable a right principle in dogmatic theology), or the special form of ecclesiastical polity, cannot be regarded as fundamental. Christianity might not do as well with one class of opinions on these subjects (say, baptism by sprinkling, supralapsarianism, and the congregational principle of church government) as it would with another; but it would still remain radically unchanged, and continue to exert its beneficent influence.

3. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are not synonymous with the doctrines essential to salvation. The latter depend upon the answer of the individual to two questions. — "What think ye of Christ?" and "What must I do to be saved?" A living faith in Christ as the Saviour of the world is essential to salvation, and sufficient for it (John vi. 47; Acts xix. 20). But the essential doctrines of Christianity are broader in their scope. They concern it as an objective system of truth.

4. Again: the term fundamental is not applied to doctrines which distinguish Christianity from natural religion. There is a distinction between the fundamentals of religion and those of Christianity. Religion is possible on the basis of the Five Articles of Lord Herbert of Cherbury; but the superstructure of the Christian religion needs a broader and deeper foundation. But some of the tenets which Christianity has in common with natural religion, as the existence of God, are fundamental to the former.

5. The Apostles' Creed, though a most valuable and excellent summary of the Christian's faith, is not a perfect statement of the fundamental articles of Christianity. On the one hand, it brings out only by implication the doctrine of atonement, passes over entirely the Scriptures, and on the other, as Waterland puts it, is in this connection "percent in excess."

Waterland's definition is as follows: "Fundamental, as applied to Christianity, means something so necessary to its being, or at least its well-being, that it could not subsist, or maintain itself tolerably, without it" (v. p. 74). And again: "Whatever verities are found to be plainly and directly essential to the doctrine of the Gospel covenant are fundamental" (p. 103). According to Sherlock (Vindication, etc., p. 256), they are doctrines "which are of the essence of Christianity, and without which the whole building and superstructure must fall."

The most fundamental doctrine of Christianity is salvation by Christ; and the principle will hold good, that whatever doctrine stands in most necessary connection therewith is the most fundamental. The statement in Rom. 1: 16-18 (the divine existence, Scriptures, incarnation, grace, faith, and resurrection) appears to be a great passage in Scripture to a comprehensive enumeration of the fundamental doctrines. Waterland enumerated seven; as follows: (1) The Creator, or Cozennoter; (2) Covenant; (3) Charter of the Covenant, or Sacred Writ; (4) Mediator; (5) Repentances and a holy life; (6) Sacraments; (7) Two future states. The central principle from which he started was the Christian covenant. The sacraments, however, can hardly be regarded as a fundamental. We prefer the following statement: (1) The Fatherhood of God; (2) The Trinity; (3) The Incarnation; (4) Atonement; (5) Faith or union with Christ; (6) The condition of man's best being; (6) The immortality of the soul; (7) The Scriptures the summary of the divine purposes concerning man.

In defining what is fundamental in Christianity it is necessary to avoid a narrow and a latitudinarian tendency. Certain combinations insist upon regarding episopacy and the authority of the church as fundamental. Individuals might insist upon particular views of original sin, the divine decrees, the inspiration of the fundamental doctrines, and nature and nature of future punishment. But few of these are touched upon in the Apostles' Creed, and none definitely answered. Divergence of view on these points is of inconsiderable importance in comparison with the cardinal doctrines of God's existence, the Messiah's work, saving faith, the soul's immortality, and the sufficiency of Scripture for human illumination and guidance, and cannot limit the perpetuity of Christianity. It is, however, not to be forgotten that a church may profess these fundamental doctrines, and yet so combine fundamental errors as to modify, if not to completely destroy their force. Of such errors, as held in the Roman Catholic Church, Sherlock says (p. 314) that "all the wit of man cannot reconcile them with the Christian faith." On the other hand, a religious communion (as the strict Unitarians or Universalists) may deny fundamental truths, and yet sincerely accept Christianity as the only and perfect religion, and Christ as the Lord and Saviour.

FUNERAL. See Burial.

FURSEUS (Fursey), b. of noble parents in Ireland, d. at Macerries or Mazeoêræs (modern Mezières, in Ardennes), 130 miles n.e. of Paris, about 650. He was educated in the monastery of Inicquin, an island in Lough Corrib, 3 miles north of Galway. He gathered a school at Rathmat (now, probably, Killuras), and there built a church. At some later period he removed to Munster to labor among his relatives, and while with them, in 627, he had his first visions, which occurred, however, when he was very seriously ill. The publication of these visions was a very importunate effort towards developing and fixing the eschatological ideas of the Middle Age. Indeed, his visions lay at the basis of Dante's Divina Commedia. When he removed to England is uncertain, but on coming to East Anglia he was kindly received by King Sigebert, and preached successfully. He also, about 633, built a monastery at Cnobheresburg (now Burghcastle, in Suffolk), beautifully acknowledges. See Commentaries. Among his other works (all published in Leipzig) are: Bibliotheca Judaica, 1849-63, 8 vols.; Gesch. d. Kard. Theol. (said to be very inaccurate), 1862-65, 8 vols.; Gesch. d. bb. Lit. u. d. jiid.-kel. Schriften, 1867-70, 2 vols.; and Kanon d. A. T. nach d. Ueberset, in Talmud u. Midrash, 1868. Fürst's books evince great learning, but must be used with caution, for they are not reliable.

FUTURE PUNISHMENT. Belief in the punishment after death of sin committed in this life is well-nigh universal. It accords with instinctive justice, and is one of the bases of the doctrine of a future existence. But as to the nature and duration of that punishment there is great divergence. The Old Testament gives little information in its eschatological portions, although there was a belief in a future state and in some sort of punishment for the wicked. The New Testament is largely taken up with the affairs of the kingdom, and pays only passing attention to those who live outside of it, but the overwhelming majority of Christians have always believed, and their creeds have well-nigh unanimously maintained, that the New Testament plainly teaches that the punishment of those outside the kingdom is endless and conscious. This opinion was held by the early Fathers, who had, however, gross views on this subject. Conceiving that the life of the wicked after death was necessarily carried on in a place, they set forth that place as full of the cries of woe. Fire was commonly represented as the instrument of punishment. But to Origen (185-254) the punishment was remedial or disciplinary, and when its end was accomplished the soul was freed from it. He, moreover, considered this punishment as mental, such as the sense of separation from God, remorse of conscience over committed sin, and the general loss of all peace of mind (De Principiis, ii. 10). When we come down to a later period we find increasing grossness in the conception of the pains of the damned, although Lactantius (4th cent.) and Gregory Nazianzen (330—390) are exceptions; and increasing outspokenness or conviction of their eternity. Arnobius (Adv. Gentes, ii., 38, 61) maintained that these pains would cease because the sufferer would be ultimately annihilated. Origenian restorationism was generally condemned. The great Augustine (353—430) taught that there were degrees in the punishment; the mildest degree he assigned to those who had died in infancy unbaptized. The Schoolmen mapped out the unseen universe, and made hell to consist of different departments. Its punishments were frightful, an endless repetition of the cruelties of the Inquisition. Dante borrowed his descriptions of them in large part from Thomas Aquinas. The modern Roman Catholic Church and the orthodox Protestant churches agree in maintaining the essential points of the historic creed upon this tenet—viz., the eternity and the severity of future punishment.

In opposition to this view there are three. First, the absolute denial of all future punishment. This was preached by the elder Ballou (1771—1852) as true Universalism; but it has few advocates to-day. Second, punishment is disciplinary and remedial, and therefore that when the divine purpose is accomplished, the sinner, purified by suffering, is restored to the divine favor. This is the doctrine of Restorationism or the Apokalastasis (q.v.). Third, eternal life is the gift of God; it is not given to those who die in wilful rebellion against God; such never live in any true sense, but are punished while they exist, and finally become extinct. This is the theory of Annihilationism or Conditional Immortality. See Punishment for literature and further discussion.
GABBATHA (John xix. 13), an Aramaic word signifying "a hill, or elevated spot of ground." The Greek name, ἱλιομερόν, means "pavement;" and, as the two words occur together, we are probably to understand that Pilate's tribunal was erected in the open air, upon a rising ground, the top of which was laid with tessellated pavement. Ewald proposed to give to ἱλιομερόν the same meaning as the Greek ἱλιομερόν, by deriving it from a root, ἵλιος, with the meaning of ἅπαξ (Aramaic, to insert). But, as Weiss in Meyer is loco says, "This is too precarious a derivation."

GABLÉR, Johann Philipp, one of the prominent rationalists of his day; b. at Francfort, June 4, 1758; d. at Jena, Feb. 17, 1826; professor of theology at Altorf 1785, and at Jena 1804. His principal work is his edition of Eichhorn's Urfgeschichte, to which he wrote an introduction and notes, Altorf, 1790–93, 2 vols. As editor of various theological periodicals, he wrote a great number of minor essays, of which a selection was made by his sons, Ulm, 1831, in 2 vols. A memoir was written by W. Schröter, Jena, 1827. He was a man of ceaseless activity, stainless life, and profound piety. His rationalism was of a sober and reverential type, like that of Herder.

HENKE.

GABRIEL (man of God), the angel who explained to Daniel the vision of the ram and the he-goat, predicted concerning the Seventy Weeks (Dan. viii. 19, ix. 21), announced the births of John and Jesus (Luke i. 19, 26), and was, according to Enoch (chap. ix.), one of the four great archangels (Gabriel, Michael, Uriel, and Raphael). He figures prominently in post-biblical Jewish literature. Pseudo-Jonathan declares that he was the man who directed Joseph to his brethren (Gen. xxxvii. 15), and also, with Michael, Uriel, Jophiel, Jephthahiah, and the Metatron, buried Moses. The Targum on 2 Chron. xxxii. 21 names him as the angel who smote the host of Sennacherib. In the Koran he becomes the medium of divine revelation; and so Mohammedans call him the "Holy Spirit," and "Spirit of Truth." He is upon the calendar of the Greek, Coptic, and Armenian churches.

GABRIEL SIONITA, b. at Edden, a village on the slope of Mount Lebanon, 1877; d. in Paris, 1848; was educated in the Maronite college in Rome, and appointed professor of Syriac language at Collège de France in 1814; furnished the Syriac and Arabic versions to Le Jay's polyglot Bible, and wrote several works in Arabic, Latin, and Italian; as, for instance, Doctrina christiana ad uso de fidei oriental (1698), and an Arabic grammar.

GAD, the name of a divinity only once mentioned in the Old Testament, in Isa. lxi. 11 (in the A. V., Gad is translated "troop"); but it was evidently adored in Canaan, as the name Baal-Gad (e.g., Josh. xi. 17) testifies, as do also allusions in the Mishnah, in Jacob of Sarug, and Isaac Antiochus. The Hebrew word had meant "lucky;" and, as it was connected with the divinity, the latter must have been considered a friend to man, and therefore prayed for luck. Perhaps a trace of its general use, in the sense of "lucky," is in the exclamation of Leah (Gen. xxx. 11) and in the name Gadriel (Num. xiii. 10). Some would, upon insufficient grounds, identify Gad with the planet Jupiter; cf. Baudissin, Jahve et Moloch, 1874, pp. 38 sq. More probably Gad was related to the Syro-Phenician divinity 'Ath. See P. Scholz: Göttendienst u. Zauberwesen bei den alten Hebräern, Regensburg, 1877, pp. 409–411, and the art. Gad, in WINER'S, in SCHENKEL'S, and in RIEHM'S Bible Dictionaries.

WOLF BAUDISSIN.

GAD. See TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

GAD'ARA, the fortified capital of Perea, stood on a hill south of the river Hieromax, or Yarmuk, the present Shere'at el-Mandhir, and south-east of the southern end of the Sea of Galilee, sixty stadia from Tiberias. The great roads from Tiberias and Scythopolis, to the interior of Petraea and to Damascus, passed through it. After a siege of ten months, it was taken by Alexander Jannæus, but was restored by Pompey (Josephus, Antip. XIV. 4, 6; Acts iv. 37). On numerous coins which have come down to us the years are counted from this restoration. It became the seat of one of the five sanhedrins established by Gabinius, and was by Augustus presented to Ilerod, after whose death it was incorporated with the Province of Syria, though without losing entirely its autonomy. It formed part of the so-called Decapolis (Matt. iv. 25; Mark v. 20, vii. 31); and March 4, 68, it was captured by Vespasian (Josephus, Bell. Jud., IV. 7, 3). Most of its inhabitants were heathens; and the gods principally worshipped were Zeus, Hermes, Astarte, and Athene. Afterwards it became the seat of a Christian bishopric. The date and cause of its destruction are unknown. Its site was identified with the present village Umm Keis, by Seetzen and Burckhardt. The hot sulphur-springs in the neighborhood, famous in antiquity under the name of Amathis (Euætus, Onomasticon, Aïd at), are still used. It may have been the scene of the miracle of our Lord healing the demoniac (Luke viii. 26; though the text is somewhat doubtful, varying between λαός των Γαργαριων and Γαργαριῶν and Γαργαριῶν). As each of these readings has some weighty evidence in its favor, and a mistake either one way or the other is easily explained, a final decision can hardly yet be pronounced. [Dr. William M. Thomson has clearly identified the biblical Gergesa with Chersea, or Khersa, on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, opposite Medjel, on the slope of a hill in Wady Samakh, within forty feet of the water's edge. The narrative of the evangelists corresponds precisely with the nature of the locality, while Gadara is too far distant from the sea. See W. M. THOMSON: The Land and the Book, II. pp. 34–35; and SCHRÖTER, Talmud and Bible Lands, p. 340.] RÜETSCHL.
GALATIA. A Roman province occupying the central portion of Asia Minor, and bounded north by Bithynia and Paphlagonia, east by Pontus, south by Cappadocia and Lycaonia, and west by Phrygia. It was inhabited by Celtic tribes, which in 279 B.C. were brought as mercenaries from Macedonia into Asia Minor by Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. Afterwards they made war on their own account, and devastated the country in all directions. The pushing northwards of the Romans had at that time put the Celtic masses in motion; and new swarms continued to pour into Asia Minor, until in 229 B.C. they were utterly defeated by Attalus, King of Pergamum, and compelled to settle down in peace in the region which then received its name from them,—Galatia, Gaul. There they lived in three distinct tribes,—the Trocmi with the capital Tavium, the Tectasseges with the capital Aerapyhren, and the Toletoboni with the capital Pessinus, but united first under a kind of republican constitution, afterwards under a king. Augustus made the country a Roman province (25 B.C.); and its boundaries were afterwards several times changed. But in Galatia proper the inhabitants retained the stamp of their Celtic origin, both in language and customs, down to the time of Jerome. Paul visited the country twice,—on his second and on his third missionary tour (Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23); and to the congregations founded there he addressed one of his most important epistles. See Introduction to the Commentaries on Galatians, by Meyer (6th ed. by Sieffert, 1880), Wieseler, Lightfoot, Schaff, especially Lightfoot. GALENISTS, Epistle to the. See Paul.

GALBANUM, one of the ingredients of the sacred perfume prescribed in Exod. xxx. 34. It is the resin of a plant growing in Abyssinia, Arabia, and Syria, obtained by an incision. It is fat, sticky, of bitter strong smell and taste: at first white, it becomes yellow with white spots. When burnt, it gives out a disagreeable smoke, by which snakes and vermin are driven away. It is uncertain from what plant it is produced. The resin of a lant growing in Abyssinia, Arabia, was one of the greatest in the world. Many classical works have been preserved only through copies made by the monks of St. Gall; and in artistic respects their works were often masterpieces. They also excelled as musicians, probably started in both these directions by the Irish founders of the abbey. In 1413 the city of St. Gall, having acquired great industrial and commercial importance, revolted against the abbott and obtained its freedom. The Reformation the abbey withstood without any great loss, but after that period its occupation was gone. In possession of enormous revenues, it lived on, quietly decaying, until the time of the Revolution, when in 1798 it was secularized: its estates were confiscated, and its territory formed into a bishopric. Sources to the history of St. Gall are found in the two first volumes of Monumenta Germaniae, and in Wattenbach, Deutsch. Geschichts-Quellen, I. See REFORMED CHURCHES OF THE TWO GALLICANS: See Genealogists. GALLICANS. See Inquisition, Urban VIII.

GALL, the Monastery of St., was founded by St. Gall, an Irish monk, and pupil of St. Columban, on the Steinach, in Switzerland. He built his cell in the thick forest there about 613, and gathered a number of hermits, who lived together according to the rule of St. Columban; he died Oct. 18, 627, the date varies between 625 and 650. Under Otmar, who is considered the first abbot of St. Gall (720—759), the institution began to grow very rapidly. He substituted the rule of St. Benedict for that of St. Columban, erected a church in honor of St. Gall, founded a hospital for lepers, and organized the school, afterwards so famous; as early as 771 a monk of the monastery wrote a life of its patron. Under Godbert (816—837) the monastery was exempted from the authority of the Bishop of Constance, and made a free, royal abbey, with right to elect its own abbot. He rebuilt the church, and parts of the monastery, in a magnificent style. Under Salomon III. (899—918) the prosperity of the institution reached its height. Under Notker Laube and the Eckehards the school became one of the great centres of learning and culture. The monks of St. Gall were especially famous as transcribers. The library was one of the greatest in the world. Many classical works have been preserved only through copies made by the monks of St. Gall; and in artistic respects their works were often masterpieces. They also excelled as musicians, probably started in both these directions by the Irish founders of the abbey. In 1413 the city of St. Gall, having acquired great industrial and commercial importance, revolted against the abbott and obtained its freedom. The Reformation the abbey withstood without any great loss, but after that period its occupation was gone. In possession of enormous revenues, it lived on, quietly decaying, until the time of the Revolution, when in 1798 it was secularized: its estates were confiscated and its territory formed into a bishopric. Sources to the history of St. Gall are found in the two first volumes of Monumenta Germaniae, and in Wattenbach, Deutsch. Geschichts-Quellen, I. See REFORMED CHURCHES OF THE TWO GALLICANS: See Genealogists. GALLICANS. See Inquisition, Urban VIII.

GALLANDI, Andrea, b. at Venice, Dec. 6, 1709; d. there Jan. 12, 1779; was abbot of the congregation of the Oratorians, and published Bibliotheca veterum Patrum, antiquitatum, &c. These works were exempted from the sacred fountain of Siloam. Among his other works were, The True Idea of Jansenism (1669), Anatomy of Infidelity (1672), Idea Theologica (1673). See Wood: Athen. Oxon.
GALLAUDET, Thomas Hopkins, LL.D., the beginner of deaf-mute instruction in America;
b. at Philadelphia, Dec. 10, 1877; d. at Hartford, Sept. 9, 1851. He was graduated at Yale College 1805, and at Andover 1814; became interested in deaf-mute instruction; superintended the organization of an institution at Hartford for the purpose, having solicited the aid of the State and the money with their flourishing schools aided the movement, until finally the Gallo-Frankish Church was moulded into perfect shape by the powerful hands of Charlemagne; and from that moment the independence of the French Church, meaning simply her national individuality, has been vindicated with energy and decision whenever an able king or parliament or bishop appeared upon the stage.

Very characteristic in this respect are the three decrees of Louis IX. (1226-70), issued 1229, 1239, and 1270. The first gives in its introductory part a general survey of the Liber Pontificalis: "Immunitats de l'Eglise Gallicane; the second limits the bishop's power of excommunication, and places the clergy under the jurisdiction of the State in all civil affairs; the third, the pragmatic sanction, guarantees the independence of the episcopal authority against the encroachments of the Pope, secures the privilege of electing the bishop to the chapters and the diocesan clergy, and vindicates the right of the French Church to convene a French council. Still more precisely defined became the position of the Gallican Church by the controversy between Boniface VIII. and Philippe IV., the Fair, 1286-1314. The questions at issue were of the greatest importance,—to the nation, as Boniface VIII., in a public speech, declared France to be a dependency of the German Empire; to the state, as immense sums of money yearly crossed the Alps under the form of annats; to the king, as the Pope denied his right to tax the clergy for certain purposes of urgent necessity; and to the church in general, as the Pope attempted to introduce essential changes into the relation between the bishops and the curia. The moment for this controversy was very untimely chosen by the Pope. The king was most cordially supported, not only by his Parliament, but also by the
and the mass of the people, and he came out of the contest victorious. But though both the kings and the parliaments, the bishops and the univer-

GALICANISM.

GALLICANISM denotes that spirit of nationality, which, within the Church of France, developed a peculiar set of customs, privileges, maxims, and views, especially with respect to her relations to Rome. Not that there is anything like a tendency towards beresy or schism in this spirit, not even towards independence in the sense of separation; but there is a consciousness of its own oneness with the rest of the world, which causes resistance to any attempt by Rome at absorption or amalgamation.
GALLICANISM. 852

Naples; and his chancellor, Duprat, expected to be adorned with cardinal's hat. But, however great this change was theoretically considered, practically it did not amount to much. The decrees of the above-mentioned three councils continued to regulate the feeling of the nation, the teaching of the university, the proceedings of the clergy, the measures of parliament; and, with the decrees of the Council of Trent (1545-63) were promulgated (which, if accepted in toto, would, indeed, have annihilated Gallicanism), only such of them were accepted in France as agreed with the privileges of the French Crown, the maxims of the French State, and the maxims and laws of the French Church. If there ever had reigned in the French mind any doubt or hesitancy with respect to the true relation between the papal see and the national church, Pierre Pithou caused it to disappear. Not to speak of his Corpus juris canonici, Codex canonum, and Gallicano Eclesiae in schismate status, in his L'Instruction juridique (1594) he gave in eighty-three articles a representation of the whole case, so clear and precise, that everybody could comprehend it.

From another point of view, but with equal clearness and pithiness, Bossuet gave a representation of the principles of Gallicanism in the Déclaration du Clergé, issued in the name of the Assemblée du Clergé, 1682. It declares that St. Peter, his successors, and the whole Church, have power only in spiritual things; that, however great may be the power of the apostolic see in spiritual things, it cannot overthrow the decrees of the Council of Constance, which it has itself confirmed; that consequently the laws and rules and customs of the Gallican Church, recognized by that council, must remain intact; and, finally, that the decisions of the Pope are not unchangeable, unless the whole Church agrees with him. Alexander VIII. declared this declaration null and void, and addressed a long memoir to the Pope. The current of political reaction which set in with the Restoration was accompanied by a similar current of religious re-action, led by Joseph de Maistre, Louis de Bonald, Francois de Lamennais, etc. The connection between Rome and the French clergy became more and more intimate: the Jesuits returned; the Gallican Liturgy gave place to the Roman; the textbooks of the seminaries were changed, and, shortly after the middle of the present century, Ultramontanism had completely superseded Gallicanism.

GALLIENUS, Publius Licinius (Roman emperor 260-268), b. 218 or 219; associated with his father, 253; acknowledged by the senate, 254, abolished, immediately after his accession, the decrees of his father Valerian, against the Christians, and made Christianity, if not a religio licita, at least tolerated. For this reason he appears in Eusebius' Hist. Ecc. (VII. 28), in the words of Dionysius of Alexandria, as the "restorer of the empire;" and the prophecy of Isa. xiii. 19 is applied to him, the "chief of those who are for the acceptance of a favorable Old-Testament prophecy being applied to an emperor; while the profane historians describe him as a supercilious and frivolous trifier. The edict itself is not extant, and the causes of it are unknown.

GALLICUS, a brother of Seneca the philosopher, was prosenecul of Achaia when Paul first visited Corinth (Acts xviii. 12). His true name was Marcus Annius Novatus: the name of Gallio he assumed after being adopted by the rhetorician, Junius Gallio. The date and manner of his death are uncertain: it is probable, though, that, like his brother, he was put to death by Nero.

GALLITZIN, Demetrius Augustine, b. at the Hague, where his father was minister plenipotentiary, Dec. 22, 1770; d. at Loretto, Cambria County, Penn., May 6, 1841. He was the son of a Russian prince, and was sent to America by Catharine II., in 1792, as an officer of the imperial Russian guard, not only to study American institutions, but also to overcome a natural timidity of disposition. But, instead of pursuing his profession, he gave himself to the Roman-Catholic priesthood, and March 18, 1795, was ordained to the holy order of priest in the Cathedral Church of Baltimore. In 1809 he, at his own request, to Cambria County, Pennsylvania, and began the great work of building up Roman-Catholic settlements upon land in that county given and purchased. He won fame by charity and zeal, as "Father Smith," by which name he was naturalized (1802). In 1809 he was allowed by a special act of the Legislature to take his family name. His difficulties and pecuniary embarrassments, arising from his failure to pay for the extensive tract he had bought in the expectation of receiving his Russian fortune, were numerous; but, by unwearied diligence and unsparing self-denial, they were largely overcome. He wrote several good books, particularly Defence of Catholic Principles (Pittsburg, 1816), and Letters to a Protestant Friend on the Scriptures (Pittsburg, 1818). See his Life, by Thomas Heyden (Baltimore, 1869), and by Sarah M. Brown (Pittsburg, 1873).

GALLUS, C. Vibius Tresionianus (Roman emperor 231-254), put an end to the persecutions of the Christians which Decius had instituted, but was afterwards led, probably by a horrible plague which terrified the people in Italy and Northern AfricA, to adopt harsh measures. Cyprian, in a letter of 253 (Ep. 59), speaks of an edict which ordered all to sacrifice to the Pagan gods. Cornelius, the Bishop of Rome, was banished, and so was the accession.

GAMALIEL. (God is a rewarder), a Pharisee and distinguished rabbi of the first half of the first century, invariably called "the Elder" in distinction from his grandson, Gamaliel of Jabneh. He was the grandson of Hillel. The Talmudists are loud in his praise, and said, that, "since Gamaliel the Elder is dead, there is no glory of the law left." They state that he was president of the Sanhedrin during the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius; but this is doubtful. He appears only as a simple member of that body in the Acts. In the New Testament, Gamaliel is known as Paul's preceptor (Acts xxii. 3), and tolerant above his contemporaries in his attitude towards the Christian religion (Acts v. 34, 39). He wisely counselled moderation on the ground, that, if the new doctrine were of God, man could not overthrow it, or, if it were of man, it would perish of itself. Christian tradition represents that he was the cousin of Nicodemus, and, becoming a new doctrine were of God, man could not overthrow it, or, if it were of man, it would perish of itself. Christian tradition represents that he was the cousin of Nicodemus, and, becoming a Christian, was baptized by Peter and John (Clem., Recogn., I. 65; Photius, Cod., 171). This must be regarded as apocryphal, being entire out of accord with the Talmud.

GAMALIEL OF JABNEH, or the Younger; d. about 115; was famous as a legislator, and head of the supreme judicial Jewish body which met at Jabneh. He visited Rome in 95; and the Talmud abounds in incidents of the journey. See DERENBOURG: Hist. de Palestine, chap. xx.

GAMES AMONG THE HEBREWS. The games enjoyed by the Hebrew youth were music, song, and dancing (cf. Ps. xxx. 11; Jer. xxxi. 13). Another amusement seems to have been the lifting of heavy stones (Zech. xii. 3), and target-shooting (1 Sam. xx. 20). After the exile, Greek games were introduced in Jerusalem and in other cities of Palestine. Thus Herod created a theatre and amphitheatre at Jerusalem (Joseph., Ant., XV. 8, 1), as well as at Cesarea (Ibid., XV. 9, 6; War, I. 21, 8); and even contests with wild beasts were celebrated. No wonder that the general body of the Jews hated him. In the Talmudic period other games were known; but in general gaming was interdicted, and a gambler's testimony was not admitted.

GANRHA, the metropolis of Paphlagonia, was the seat of a council which assembled there, at an uncertain date in the middle of the fourth century, against the Eustathians. This sect had pressed their asceticism to an extreme, rejecting marriage, not only for priests, but also for laymen, demanding complete abstinence from flesh, etc. They were condemned by the council, but as the council recommended marriage not only in general, but also for priests, it has caused great embarrassment to the Roman-Catholic Church in her propaganda for sacerdotal celibacy.

CARASSE, François, b. at Angouleme, 1585; d. Poitiers, June 14, 1651, was the order of the Jesuits in 1601, and made quite a sensation as a preacher by his smart allusions and the peculiar vivacity of his manner. To posterity, however, he is principally known as a polemical writer. He wrote, against the freethinkers of the age, La doctrine curieuse des beaux-arts, de la langue, de la musique, du temps, 1623; against the Protestants, Elixir Catalinicum, 1615, and Rabelais réformé, 1622. He was the grandson of Hillel. The Talmudists are loud in his praise, and said, that, "since Gamaliel the Elder is dead, there is no glory of the law left." They state that he was president of the Sanhedrin during the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius; but this is doubtful. He appears only as a simple member of that body in the Acts. In the New Testament, Gamaliel is known as Paul's preceptor (Acts xxii. 3), and tolerant above his contemporaries in his attitude towards the Christian religion (Acts v. 34, 39). He wisely counselled moderation on the ground, that, if the new doctrine were of God, man could not overthrow it, or, if it were of man, it would perish of itself. Christian tradition represents that he was the cousin of Nicodemus, and, becoming a Christian, was baptized by Peter and John (Clem., Recogn., I. 65; Photius, Cod., 171). This must be regarded as apocryphal, being entirely out of accord with the Talmud.

GARDINER, James, Col., was b. in Scotland, Jan. 10, 1688, and killed at the battle of Prestonpans, Sept. 21, 1745. The interest of his life centres in his remarkable conversion. He led a career of licentiousness until July, 1719. At a midnight hour, just before the time he had appointed for an assignation with a married woman, he saw a "visible representation of the Christ upon the cross, and heard a voice," etc. The consequence was that he forsook his old courses, and thereafter led an exemplary Christian life, each day being inaugurated with two hours spent in devotion. These facts are narrated in Donbridge's Life of Col. Gardiner. The edition of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia, is convenient in size.

GARDINER, Stephen, Bishop of Winchester, a conspicuous actor in the opposition to the English Reformation; was b. at Bury St. Edmund's, 1483; d. Nov. 12, 1555. He was the illegitimate son of Dr. Woodville, Bishop of Salisbury, and brother of Elizabeth Woodville, Edward IV.'s queen. He was educated at Cambridge, and attained great proficiency in the departments of canonical and civil law. After acting as Wolsey's private secretary, he came into the service of the king. He took a prominent part in the negotiations for the divorce with Catherine, and was sent on missions to Pope Clement VII. In 1521 his services were rewarded with the bishopric of Winchester. He defended the supremacy of the king in an able tract, De Vera Obedientia. But he was not in sympathy with the reforming tendencies, and, but for the royal intervention, would have fastened charges of heresy on Cranmer. Under Edward VI. he was committed to prison for his opposition to the Reformation, where he remained, with the exception of a brief interval, for five years. The favor of Mary released him from prison, restored him to his bishopric, and made him lord-chancellor. He negotiated the marriage treaty with Philip, for which he had, however, a personal repugnance. He was at first in sympathy with the persecution of the Protestants, but afterwards seems to have revolted from it, and retired, leaving the work to the more callous Bonner. Gardiner was an able man, as his influence in two administrations attests. He was probably neither so unscrupulous nor vindictive as some historians have contended.

GARISSOLES, Antoine, b. at Montauban, 1557; d. there 1651; was first pastor of Puylaurens, and then, after 1628, professor of theology in the academy of his native city. He presided at the national synod of Charenton (1645), and published in 1648 Decreti Synodi Carentonensis, sett-GARNET, Henry Highland, D.D., a prominent colored clergyman; b. in New Market, Kent County, Md., April 15, 1815; d. at Monroeville, Liberia, April 13, 1883, and some Latin poems in honor of Gustavus Adolphus and Queen Christina.

GARNET, Henry, b. at Connerai about 1670; d. at Bône, Aug. 18, 1744; bap. Apr. 3, 1671; m. Marie Chardon, March 1, 1705; his was a professor of theology at various colleges of the order, and produced a series of critical and historical works relating to the history of doctrines, which are still of great value: Julioni Examenis Libellus (1688), and Marii Mercatoris Opera (1789), editions with notes and introductions throwing new light on the history of Pelagianism; Liberatur Brevisarium (1675), a valuable contribution to the history of the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies; Liber diurnus Romanorum pontificum, and a supplement to The Christiani et Paganini; and in 1848, at the synod of the Reformed Churches, he joined Frédéric Monod in advocating the necessity of a well-defined creed. The last twenty-three years of his life were spent in Switzerland, at Geneva. His eloquence did good service in the cause of evangelical religion and morality. He delivered lectures on many different subjects in the hall of the “Reformation,” many of which were published. He was a pronounced enemy of slavery, and wrote, in advocacy of the Northern cause, two book, Un livre petit, qui virel, 1841, and l’Amérique devant l’Europe, 1862 (Eng. trans., America before Europe, 3d ed., New York, 1882). A paper prepared by him on The Care of the Sick, for the Evangelical Alliance Conference, New York, 1873, was forwarded by his widow, and is published in its proceedings. He wrote also Schools of Doubt and Schools of Faith, Edinburgh, 1854. Madame Gasparin, his wife, was also a graceful author. Her Near and Heavenly Horizons (New York, 1864), and Human Sadness (Boston, 1864), have been translated. See A. NAVILLE: Le Comte Ag. de Gasparin, Genève, 1871; and BOREL: Le Comte Ag. de G., Paris, 1879 (Eng. trans., New York [1880]).

GATAKER, Thomas, a scholarly divine, and member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, was the son of the chaplain to Robert, Earl of Leicester; b. in London, Sept. 4, 1674; d. at Rotherhithe, July 27, 1754. In 1590 he went to St. John’s College, Cambridge, and in 1599 was chosen fellow of the newly founded Sidney College. In 1601 he became preacher at Lincoln’s-inn, and in 1611 removed to the living of Rotherhithe, Surrey. He outlived four wives. In 1643 he was appointed by the Assembly of Divines, and in 1661 was a member of the Assembly of Divines. He was offered and refused the mastership of Trinity College, Cambridge. Gataker was a man of much learning, and the author of a number of works. His first book, Of the Nature and Use of Lots (London, 1619, pp. 360), grew out of sermons preached at Lincoln’s-inn, and was designed to vindicate the lawfulness of “lusorious lots” (games of chance), and to condemn “divinatory or consultory lots.” This work led to a controversy, and drew forth from him two more books on the same subject in 1623 (pp. 275) and 1638 (in Latin, A Discussion of the Popish Doctrine of Transsubstantiation, and A Short Catechism, appeared in 1624. Two volumes of Sermons, 1637 sq.; and in 1645 (3d ed., 1657) he published English Annotations upon Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations (a part of the Assembly’s Annotations). Gataker sent forth valuable critical works, among which was the edition of Marcus Antoninus, which Itallum says “was the earliest edition of any classical writer published in England with original annotations.” These last were edited by the learned Witsius.
GAUDEN.

855

GAUSSEN.

GAUDEN, John, b. at Mayfield, in Essex, 1605; d. at Worcester, Sept. 23, 1663; educated at Cambridge, and Fellow of the Tennie 1628; bishop of Exeter 1630, and of Worcester 1662. He claimed to have written the Eikon Basilik (Εἴκον Βασιλικά, — The Pourtraiture of his Sacred Majestie in his Solitudes and Sufferings); but careful and protracted examination has decided against him, and in favor of Charles I., who was the king meant. The book itself appeared in 1648; was replied to by Milton (Εἰκονοκλαστας, 1649). It is a defence of the king's conduct, and an account of his misfortunes from the calling of the Long Parliament (1640) to his confinement in Caris-brooke Castle (1648), written throughout in the first person, divided into short sections, each of which is followed by a page or two of meditations and prayers; and at the end are more extented meditations upon death, and a proposed address to Parliament. The book is well written, and its piety is genuine. Gauden was a member of the Savoy Conference (see Conference, Savoy); and according to Baxter, though he had a bitter pen, he was moderate in speech; "and, if all had been of his mind, we had been reconciled."

GAUDENTIUS, b. about 360; succeeded Philastrius as Bishop of Brixia (the present Brescia) in 387, and was still living in 410, in which year Rufinus dedicated to him his translation of the Recognitiones of Clement. A number of sermons by him, among which ten are dedicated to a certain Benevolus who by sickness was prevented from attending service in the church, are still extant, and are found in Migne: Patro- lat., X.X.

GAUL. Of the Christianization of Gaul there is a double report by the école légendaire, or antigrégorienne, and by the école historique, or grégorienne. According to the former, all the principal places of Gaul were Christianized by persons mentioned in the New Testament, or closely connected with it. Thus Lazarus and his two sisters and their servants were put in a small boat by the Jews, and abandoned to the winds and the waves. The boat drifted ashore in Southern Gaul; and Manereilles, Aix, Tarascon, etc., were Christianized by its crew. The three disciples of Paul (Trophimus, Crescens, and Sernius Paulus) preached at Arles, Vienne, and Narbonne.
St. Aphrodisius, who for seven years rendered hospitality to the holy family in Egypt, founded Christianity at Béziers; Dionysius Areopagita, in Paris; Zaccariaus the publican, at Cahors, etc.
The only particle of historical foundation for all theses legends is 2 Tim. iv. 10, where Paul says that Crescens had gone to Gaul; but the reading is uncertain. Tischendorf and the revised English translation have Galatia, instead of Gaul.

The école historique ascribes the conversion of Gaul to the energy of the papal see, and founds its view on the authority of Gregory of Tours, who certainly had the very best opportunity to learn the truth about it. In his *Annales Fran-

GAUSSEN, Étienne, b. at Nimes in the begining of the seventeenth century; d. at Saumur, 1673; was professor of philosophy (1651), and then of theology (1665). The school of Saumur represented at that time a more liberal conception of French Protestantism than that represented by the schools of Sedan and Montauban; and Gausen contributed much to propagate those views. His works were frequently reprinted both in Holland and Germany;
as, for instance, his De Utilitate Philosophie ad Theologiam, Saumur, 1670, last edition, Halle, 1727.

GAUSSEN, François Samuel Robert Louis, b. at Geneva, Aug. 25, 1700; d. there June 18, 1835; was appointed pastor of Satigny in 1818, but dissmissed in 1834; and from 1836 till his death taught dogmatics in the theological school of Geneva, founded by the Evangelical Society in 1831. Under the influence of Cellérier (his predecessor at Satigny) and the remarkable Scotch layman Robert Haldane, he became an ardent champion of the strict orthodox Calvinism; and, though he was very far from being an agitator, he soon came in decided opposition to the ration-alistic compagnie des pasteurs of Geneva. In 1827 the compagnie tried to compel him to introduce their rationalistic catechism in his church; but he absolutely refused. A compromise was effected, however; but when the Evangelical Society, one of whose founders had established a new theological school in direct opposition to the old one taught by the Rationalists, and Merle d'Aubigné and Havernick were invited to Geneva, he left Satigny, and became a professor there. Of his works several have been translated into English; as, for instance, Théonymie, 1722; 14th ed. 1850 (a defence of verbal inspiration): Geneva and Jerusalem, 1814; Geneva and Rome, 1844; Lessons for the Young, 1860; Canon of Holy Scripture, 1862, abridged by Rev. Dr. Kirk, Boston, n.d. GAUTAMA. See Buddhism.

GA'ZA (schoen), the present Qudhah, a city on the shore of the Mediterranean Sea, near the boundary-line between Egypt and Palestine; was a flourishing centre of Canaanite civilization in the time of Abraham, and fell by the division of the country to the lot of Judah (Josh. xv. 47). It afterwards formed one of the members of the Philistine Pentapolis, and figured prominently in the history of Samson, Solomon, the Prophets, Alexander the Great, the Ptolemies, the Maccabees, Herod the Great, and the Romans. Taken and almost destroyed in A.D. 634 by the Arabs, it was restored by the crusaders, but was again conquered by Saladin in 1170. At present it has about sixteen thousand inhabitants.

GEBHARD II. (Truchsess von Waldburg), b. at Waldenburg, Nov. 10, 1547; d. at Strassburg, May 21, 1601; was elected Archbishop of Cologne, Dec. 5, 1577, and confirmed by the Pope, April 14, 1578. But a love-affair with Agnes of Mansfeld gave a sudden turn to his career in the service of the church. By an edict of Dec. 19, 1582, he established religious liberty and freedom of worship in his dominions; Jan. 16, 1583, he published a declaration acknowledging his own conversion to the Lutheran Church; and Feb. 2, 1583, he married Agnes of Mansfeld. But by a bull of April 1, 1583, Gregory XIII. deposed him, and declared the see of Cologne vacant; and May 22, 1583, Duke Ernst of Bavaria was elected Archbishop by the chapter. The fight now began. Ernst held the metropolis of the diocese, but Gebhard was in possession of the strong fortress Bonn. The latter, however, did not receive the support he expected from the other Protestant princes of Germany. They had no sympathy for him. Toleration and religious liberty they hated and despised as heartily as did the Roman Catholics, and a suspicion of Calvinism hovered over the unfortunate Gebhard. In January, 1584, Bonn was taken, and thereby his cause was lost. He sought aid in Holland, in England, in Germany, but everywhere in vain, and retired finally to Strassburg, where he lived and died entirely forgotten.

GEDDES, Janet, or Jenny, a Scottish heroine. When it was proposed, in the reign of Charles I., by advice of Archbishop Laud, to introduce the English Liturgy into Scotland, it raised a storm of indignation. The dean of Edinburgh, however, made the experiment in the Cathedral Church of St. Giles, Sunday, July 23, 1637, in the presence of the privy council and the city magistrates. According to the usual story, an old herb-woman called Janet Geddes, hearing the archbishop direct the service of the church, threw a stone at the dean in finding the collect for the day (seventh Sunday after Trinities), confused “chole” and “collect,” and exclaimed in indignation, “Villain, dost thou say mass at my lug?” (ear), and hurled the stool upon which she had been sitting at the dean’s head. This was the signal for a riot in and about the cathedral. The people shouted through the streets, “A pope, a pope! Antichrist! the sword of the Lord and of Gideon!” Was the result of which was, because it was an outburst of popular feeling by no means confined to Edinburgh, the withdrawal of the Liturgy. Thus, as Stanley says, “The stoole which was on that occasion flung at the head of the dean of Edinburgh extinguished the English Liturgy entirely in Scotland for the seventeenth century, to a great extent even till the nineteenth, and gave to the civil war in England an impulsion which only ended in the overthrow of the Church and Monarchy.” The disturbance was entirely unpremeditated. Some historians give Barbara Hamilton as the name of the heroine. Comp. Burton: History of Scotland, vol. vi.; Stanley: Lectures on the History of the Church of Scotland, pp. 80 sqq.; Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, vol. i. p. 598.

GEHENNA. Is a word used in the New Testament for “hell.” Comp. Matt. v. 29, 30, x. 28, xviii. 9, xxi. 15; Mark ix. 48, 45; Luke xii. 5;

GEDDES, Alexander, a Roman-Catholic scholar; b. at the farm of Arradoul, in the parish of Rathen, Banffshire, Scotland, Sept. 14, 1727; d. in London, Feb. 26, 1802. After studying in the Roman Catholic seminary at Scalab, and later in Paris, he became chaplain to the Earl of Traquair (1765), pastor at Auchinhalrigh (1789), deprived (1779) for attendance upon Protestant worship, after having been repeatedly blamed by his bishop for his intimacy with Protestants. He finally went with Lord Traquair to London. In 1792 he was able, through the munificence of Lord Petre, to publish the first volume (Genesis to Joshua) of a translation, with notes, of the Bible from the original text, and the second in 1797. By an edict of Dec. 5, 1577, and confirmed by the Pope, April 14, 1578. But a love-affair with Agnes of Mansfeld gave a sudden turn to his career in the service of the church. By an edict of Dec. 10, 1582, he established religious liberty and freedom of worship in his dominions; Jan. 16, 1583, he published a declaration acknowledging his own conversion to the Lutheran Church; and Feb. 2, 1583, he married Agnes of Mansfeld. But by a bull of April 1, 1583, Gregory XIII. deposed him, and declared the see of Cologne vacant; and May 22, 1583, Duke Ernst of Bavaria was elected Archbishop by the chapter. The fight now began. Ernst held the metropolis of the diocese, but Gebhard was in possession of the strong fortress Bonn. The latter, however, did not receive the support he expected from the other Protestant princes of Germany. They had no sympathy for him. Toleration and religious liberty they hated and despised as heartily as did the Roman Catholics, and a suspicion of Calvinism hovered over the unfortunate Gebhard. In January, 1584, Bonn was taken, and thereby his cause was lost. He sought aid in Holland, in England, in Germany, but everywhere in vain, and retired finally to Strassburg, where he lived and died entirely forgotten.

GEDDES, Janet, or Jenny, a Scottish heroine. When it was proposed, in the reign of Charles I., by advice of Archbishop Laud, to introduce the English Liturgy into Scotland, it raised a storm of indignation. The dean of Edinburgh, however, made the experiment in the Cathedral Church of St. Giles, Sunday, July 23, 1637, in the presence of the privy council and the city magistrates. According to the usual story, an old herb-woman called Janet Geddes, hearing the archbishop direct the service of the church, threw a stone at the dean in finding the collect for the day (seventh Sunday after Trinities), confused “chole” and “collect,” and exclaimed in indignation, “Villain, dost thou say mass at my lug?” (ear), and hurled the stool upon which she had been sitting at the dean’s head. This was the signal for a riot in and about the cathedral. The people shouted through the streets, “A pope, a pope! Antichrist! the sword of the Lord and of Gideon!” Was the result of which was, because it was an outburst of popular feeling by no means confined to Edinburgh, the withdrawal of the Liturgy. Thus, as Stanley says, “The stoole which was on that occasion flung at the head of the dean of Edinburgh extinguished the English Liturgy entirely in Scotland for the seventeenth century, to a great extent even till the nineteenth, and gave to the civil war in England an impulsion which only ended in the overthrow of the Church and Monarchy.” The disturbance was entirely unpremeditated. Some historians give Barbara Hamilton as the name of the heroine. Comp. Burton: History of Scotland, vol. vi.; Stanley: Lectures on the History of the Church of Scotland, pp. 80 sqq.; Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, vol. i. p. 598.

GEHENNA. Is a word used in the New Testament for “hell.” Comp. Matt. v. 29, 30, x. 28, xviii. 9, xxi. 15; Mark ix. 48, 45; Luke xii. 5;
and James III. It is used in distinction from "hades" when either the torments of hell itself, or the idea of a hellish torment, is to be expressed. The passages of the New Testament show plainly that the word "gehenna" was a popular expression for "hell," of which Jesus and the apostles made use; but it would be erroneous to infer that Jesus and his apostles merely accommodated themselves to the popular expression, without believing in the actual state of the lost. The word "gehenna" is the Greek representative of a Hebrew word denoting the "Valley of Hinnom," or "of the son," or "children of Hinnom," — a deep, narrow gln to the south of Jerusalem, where the Jews offered their children to Moloch, (2 Kings xxiii. 10; Jer. vii. 31, xix. 2-6). In later times it served as the receptacle of all sorts of putrefying matter and all that defiled the holy city; and thus it became the image of the place of everlasting punishment, especially on account of its ever-burning fires. This fact the words of Christ refer when he says, "and the fire is not quenched." PRESSEL.

GEIBEL, Johannes, b. at Hanau, April 1, 1776; d. at Lubeck, July 25, 1853; studied at Marburg, and became pastor of the Reformed Congregation in Lubeck 1797; which position he resigned in 1847. He was an eloquent and impressive preacher, an ardent adversary of the reigning rationalism, and exercised considerable influence also outside of the Reformed Congregation. One of his most remarkable writings, besides his sermons, is his "Widderstellung der ersten christlichen Gemeinde," LuObeck, 1840, published under the pseudonym of Philalethes.

GEIGER, Abraham, Hebrew and Talmudical scholar; b. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, May 24, 1810; d. at Berlin, Oct. 23, 1874. He was rabbi at Wiesbaden, Breslau, Frankfort, and Berlin; belonged to the Reformed Jews, and in their interest founded, with some others, the "Zeitschrift für jüdische Theologie" (1835). His principal publications were an essay upon the Jewish sources of the Koran ("Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judentum aufgenommen?" 1856), monographs ("Studien") upon Jewish subjects, and translations of Hebrew works, from Brant's "Narrenschiff," from a barber's song, from every-where, and the text chosen he applied directly, without flinching, to the real life which presented itself before his pulpit, in form which our taste may now and then find somewhat coarse, but which on his time produced the deepest impression. His sermons were often taken down while he delivered them, then translated into Latin (often with omission of the facies which could not be translated), and then again into High German. Thus there exists a great number of collections of his sermons, more or less genuine; but all of them, even the tamest Latin renderings, show the same fundamental character. See works upon Geiler's life and writings by AMMON (Erlangen, 1826), August STOEKER (Strassburg, 1834), [DACHEUX (Paris, 1877), also by Dr. F. DE LORENZI, in his edition of Geiler's "Ausgewählte Schriften, vols. I., II., Trier, 1881." C. SCHMIDT.

GELASIUS is the name of two popes. — Gelasius I. (March 1, 492—Nov. 19, 496) in the controversy with the Constantinopolitan see concerning Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, whom Pope Felix III. had excommunicated because he leaned towards Monophysitism, but whose name was still retained in the diptychs of the Constantinopolitan Church. In 495 Gelasius repeated the excommunication, and cursed all who did not accept it. The controversy became so much the more acrimonious as the real question at issue was one of precedence. It was not the orthodoxy of his predecessor, but the supremacy of his see, which Gelasius fought for.; and, in the numerous letters he wrote during the controversy, he pushed his arrogance to an extreme, and set forth claims hitherto unheard of. He demanded the right to receive appeals from everywhere in the world, though he allowed no appeal from Rome to any other court; the right to confirm or cancel the decrees of other bishops, though none were allowed to question the decisions of Rome, etc. Besides his letters, he left several minor writings, of which the most remarkable is the "Decretum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis," the first Index liberorum prohibitorum.
GENEALOGY. 858

GELASIUS OF CYZICUS. Its genuineness is contested; but though it may have been begun by Damasus, and finished by Hornissadus, the bulk of the work seems, nevertheless, to belong to Gelasius. Among the books forbidden are the works of Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Arnobius, Lactantius, and Origen. His writings are found in AND.THEL: Epist. Rom. Pontif., Brunsberg, 1867; his life, in Liber. Pontif., vol. i.; and in JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 53. —Gelasius II. (1118-Jan. 19, 1119) was seized, immediately after his election, by the faction of the Frangipani, and liberated only by the rising of the people of Rome. But he had hardly escaped the Frangipani before a still greater danger began to loom up. As soon as Henry V. heard that a new pope had been elected without his consent being asked for, he hastened to Italy, and March 2, 1118, he entered Rome. Afraid of being attacked, if asked for, and knowing that his predecessor Paschal II. had made, Gelasius II. fled to Capua, and April 7, 1118, he excommunicated the emperor, and the antipope whom the emperor had got elected in Rome under the name of Gregory VIII. Shortly after, he returned to Rome. But it was once more driven away by the Frangipani and the imperial party. He fled to France, and died on the way to Cluny. His life by Pandulphus, is found in WATTERICH: Pont. Rom. Vite, Tom. II.; his letters, in Moine: Patril. Latin., vol. 163; cf. JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., pp. 522 sq. R. ZOEPFL.

GELASIUS OF CYZICUS lived about 475, and wrote a history of the first Council of Nicea, which was published by Robert Balfour, Paris, 1599, and is found in the collections of councils by Labbé, Harduin, and Mansi. The work is of very little value, however, consisting mostly of fictitious speeches, and of debates between heathen philosophers and Christian bishops. GELLERT, Christian Fürchtegott, b. at Haynichen, Saxony, July 4, 1715; d. at Leipzig, Dec. 13, 1769; studied theology at Leipzig, and was appointed professor extraordinary there in 1751. He wrote comedies, fables, essays on morals and aesthetics, and hymns. His Fables was one of the most popular books which the German literature produced in the eighteenth century, and it is still read. His hymns made an equal impression: they were translated into Dutch, Danish, Bohemian, Russian, etc., and were praised even by the Roman Catholics. It is true that they have been severely criticized; but no disparagement has been able to take Gellert out of the hearts of the people, nor his poems out of his sanctuary, and, finally, in sending, when the set time had come and all things were ready, his Son into the world. As far as the Bible is concerned, the preservation of these genealogical lists was for the authentication of Christ’s descent. But the historical use is by no means to be ignored: indeed, in proportion as we grasp its value shall we attain conviction of the perfect reality of the earthly descent of Christ from the seed of David, according to prophecy. “The genealogies of Scripture,” says Professor G. Rawlinson, “dry and forbidding as is their first aspect, will well repay a careful and scholarly study. They are like an arid range of bare and stony mountains, which, when minutely examined, reveals to the investigator mines of emerald and diamond. Only let the searcher bear in mind that where all is dark to him it may be reserved for future inquirers to let in upon the darkness a flood of light” (The Origin of Nations, p. 166).

The first biblical genealogy is Gen. iv. 16-24. It gives the descendants of Cain. The following chapter gives the family of Seth. The tenth and eleventh chapters, though the ordinary reader might pass them over because they seem to consist of mere unimportant names, are regarded by ethnologists as invaluable, since they contain a history of the dispersion of the nations in prehistoric times. The first eight chapters of 1 Chronicles are devoted to genealogical accounts, beginning with Adam, because, as it is stated, “all Israel were reckoned by genealogies” (1 Chron. i. 1). It is, however, to be observed that these several lists are not in all cases records of direct descent; though perhaps, in the majority of instances, they are there for future inquirers to let in upon the darkness a flood of light (see Gen. xi. 29; Exod. vi. 23; 1 Chron. iii. 1). It is, however, to be observed that these several lists are not in all cases records of direct descent; though perhaps, in the majority of instances, they are there for future inquirers to let in upon the darkness a flood of light. They are called “the book of the genealogies of the children of Israel, and the book of the kingdoms of the house of David,” in 1 Chron. viii. 9-13.

GEM. See Precious Stones.

GEMARA. See Talmud.

GENEALOGY. The matter of edigreewas begun by Damasus, and finished by Hornissadus, the bulk of the work seems, nevertheless, to belong to Gelasius. Among the books forbidden are the works of Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Arnobius, Lactantius, and Origen. His writings are found in AND.THEL: Epist. Rom. Pontif., Brunsberg, 1867; his life, in Liber. Pontif., vol. i.; and in JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 53. —Gelasius II. (1118-Jan. 19, 1119) was seized, immediately after his election, by the faction of the Frangipani, and liberated only by the rising of the people of Rome. But he had hardly escaped the Frangipani before a still greater danger began to loom up. As soon as Henry V. heard that a new pope had been elected without his consent being asked for, he hastened to Italy, and March 2, 1118, he entered Rome. Afraid of being attacked, if asked for, and knowing that his predecessor Paschal II. had made, Gelasius II. fled to Capua, and April 7, 1118, he excommunicated the emperor, and the antipope whom the emperor had got elected in Rome under the name of Gregory VIII. Shortly after, he returned to Rome. But it was once more driven away by the Frangipani and the imperial party. He fled to France, and died on the way to Cluny. His life by Pandulphus, is found in WATTERICH: Pont. Rom. Vite, Tom. II.; his letters, in Moine: Patril. Latin., vol. 163; cf. JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., pp. 522 sq. R. ZOEPFL.

GELASIUS OF CYZICUS lived about 475, and wrote a history of the first Council of Nicea, which was published by Robert Balfour, Paris, 1599, and is found in the collections of councils by Labbé, Harduin, and Mansi. The work is of very little value, however, consisting mostly of fictitious speeches, and of debates between heathen philosophers and Christian bishops. GELLERT, Christian Fürchtegott, b. at Haynichen, Saxony, July 4, 1715; d. at Leipzig, Dec. 13, 1769; studied theology at Leipzig, and was appointed professor extraordinary there in 1751. He wrote comedies, fables, essays on morals and aesthetics, and hymns. His Fables was one of the most popular books which the German literature produced in the eighteenth century, and it is still read. His hymns made an equal impression: they were translated into Dutch, Danish, Bohemian, Russian, etc., and were praised even by the Roman Catholics. It is true that they have been severely criticized; but no disparagement has been able to take Gellert out of the hearts of the people, nor his poems out of his sanctuary, and, finally, in sending, when the set time had come and all things were ready, his Son into the world. As far as the Bible is concerned, the preservation of these genealogical lists was for the authentication of Christ’s descent. But the historical use is by no means to be ignored: indeed, in proportion as we grasp its value shall we attain conviction of the perfect reality of the earthly descent of Christ from the seed of David, according to prophecy. “The genealogies of Scripture,” says Professor G. Rawlinson, “dry and forbidding as is their first aspect, will well repay a careful and scholarly study. They are like an arid range of bare and stony mountains, which, when minutely examined, reveals to the investigator mines of emerald and diamond. Only let the searcher bear in mind that where all is dark to him it may be reserved for future inquirers to let in upon the darkness a flood of light” (The Origin of Nations, p. 166).

The first biblical genealogy is Gen. iv. 16-24. It gives the descendants of Cain. The following chapter gives the family of Seth. The tenth and eleventh chapters, though the ordinary reader might pass them over because they seem to consist of mere unimportant names, are regarded by ethnologists as invaluable, since they contain a history of the dispersion of the nations in prehistoric times. The first eight chapters of 1 Chronicles are devoted to genealogical accounts, beginning with Adam, because, as it is stated, “all Israel were reckoned by genealogies” (1 Chron. ix. 1). It is, however, to be observed that these several lists are not in all cases records of direct descent; though perhaps, in the majority of instances, they are there for future inquirers to let in upon the darkness a flood of light. They are called “the book of the genealogies of the children of Israel, and the book of the kingdoms of the house of David,” in 1 Chron. viii. 9-13. But, notwithstanding these alterations and abridgments, it is capable of proof that the Bible presents us transcripts from certain official records. They bear the evidence of substantial truth. That such records existed is indicated rather than proved. Thus the assignments of the temple-service by David were genealogical. In the reign of Rehoobaam, Iddo wrote a book on genealogies (2 Chron. xii. 15). From 2 Chron.
xxxii. 18–19 we learn that in Hezekiah's day there existed genealogies of the priests, at all events. The lists in Ezra and Nehemiah prove that such lists and others survived the captivity. It is a monstrous assumption to say that they were forged. Lord Hervey (in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible) points out an incidental allusion to the census (Gen. ii. 3) as the basis of that of the apostle Paul. The census went upon them as a basis; since Joseph went to Bethlehem because he was of the house of David. Manifestly Joseph had, in the genealogy of his family, good grounds for this belief. Probably the registers of the Jewish tribes and families perished at the destruction of Jerusalem, and not before; although some partial records may have survived the event. When the temple fell, there was no longer any special need of these lists. The Aaronic priesthood was no more; the nation was dispersed in captivity; the Messiah was come.

1. The Genealogy of Joseph (Matt. i. 1–17; Luke iii. 23–38). This is the only genealogy given us in the New Testament. "We have two lists of the human ancestors of Christ. Matthew, writing for Jewish Christians, begins with Abraham; Luke, writing for Gentile Christians, goes back to Adam, the father of all men. According to his human nature, Christ was the descendant of Abraham, David, and Mary: according to his divine nature, he was the eternal and only-begotten Son of God, begotten from the essence of the Father. John (i. 18) begins his Gospel by setting forth his divine genealogy. In him, the God-man, all the ascending aspirations of human nature toward God, and all the descending revelations of God toward men, are harmonized. Matthew begins at Abraham (1) to prove to Jewish Christians that Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Messiah, (2) to show the connection between the Old and New Testaments through a succession of living persons ending in Jesus Christ, who is the subject of the Gospel, and the object of the faith it requires. Christ is the fulfillment of all the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, the heir of all its blessings and promises, the dividing-line and connecting-link of ages, the end of the old and the beginning of the new history of mankind. In the long list of his human ancestors we have a cloud of witnesses, a compend of the history of preparation for the coming of Christ down to the Virgin Mary, in whom culminated the longing and hope of Israel for redemption. It is a history of divine promises and their fulfillment, of human faith and hope for the future, and of all the names in the list as named illustrious heroes of faith, but also obscure persons written in the secret book of God, as well as gross sinners redeemed by grace, which reaches the lowest depths, as well as the most exalted heights, of society. Matthew's table is divided into three parts, corresponding to three periods of preparation for the coming of Christ."—Schaff.

The differences between Matthew and Luke have been variously explained. They prove the independence of the two evangelists, who drew from different but equally trustworthy sources. Both lists are incomplete, and names must be supplied (there are only fifteen names for a period of eight hundred and thirty-three years). They coincide until David; when Matthew takes the reigning line through Solomon, Luke the younger and inferior line by David's son Nathan. A more serious difficulty is, that names do not appear in the same place in the two lists. Luke gives twenty-one names between David and Zerubbabel, Matthew only fifteen; and all the names except that of Shealtiel (Salathiel) are different. Luke gives seventeen names between Zerubbabel and Joseph, Matthew only nine; and all the names are different. The greatest difference is, that Matthew calls Joseph the son of Jacob, while Luke calls him the son of Heli, or Eli. He cannot have been naturally the son of both; and it is not likely that the two names are meant for one and the same person. Hence the following theories:

1. The oldest explanation assumes one, or perhaps two, levirate marriages in the family of Joseph; i.e., a marriage of a man to the childless widow of his elder brother, the children of the second marriage being reckoned as the legal descendants of the first husband. Heli and Jacob may have been brothers, or half-brothers (sons of the same mother, but of different fathers), successively married to the mother of Joseph, who, according to law, was registered by Luke as the son of Heli, though naturally the son of Jacob, as recorded by Matthew. But this view involves inaccuracy in one or the other of the two genealogies.

2. Matthew gives the legal or royal genealogy of Joseph; Luke, the private line of Joseph. The one gives the heirship to the throne of David and Solomon (the jus successionis); the other, the actual descent, through Nathan and private persons, from the Jus sanguinis. This is the prevailing view of English divines: but then Matthew could not have properly used the verb "begat;" for the line of Solomon failed in Jeconiah (Jer. xxii. 30).

3. Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph; Luke, the genealogy of Mary. Heli may have been the father of Mary and the father-in-law of Joseph, and consequently the grandfather of Jesus. Luke, writing for Gentiles, and proving that Christ was the seed of the woman, traces the natural or real pedigree of Jesus through his mother, Mary, in the line of Nathan, and indicates this by the parenthetical remark, "Jesus being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph [but in reality], the son of Heli," or his grandson by the mother's side. Mary is always called by the Jews "the daughter of Heli." Matthew, writing for Jews, gives the legal pedigree of Jesus (which was always reckoned in the male line) through Joseph, his legal father, in the line of Solomon. This explanation is the easiest, and has been adopted by Luther, Grotius, Bengel, Olshausen, Ebrard, Wieseler, Robinson, Gardiner, Lange, Plumptre, Weiss, Godet. It is supported by the GENEVA (French, Genève; German, Genf), the largest city of Switzerland, numbering 68,165 inhabitants in 1876, and the capital of the canton of the same name; was, before the period of the Reformation, subject to the bishop of the diocese of Geneva, who, again, was an immediate fief-holder of the German emperor. There was, however, always dispute between the bishops and the counts of Genevois, later on between the bishops and the dukes of Savoy, concerning the possession of the city; and there was within the city itself, as within most mediaeval towns of commercial and industrial consequence, a party which strove for liberty and independence. Backed by Freiburg and Bern, with which alliances were concluded respectively in 1519 and 1526, the party of liberty finally gained the ascendency. The city constituted itself a republic, expelled the bishop, adopted the Reformation, and succeeded in vindicating its independence against the insidious attacks of the Duke of Savoy until 1798, when it was incorporated with France. In 1814, however, it regained its independence; and, its territory having been increased with some French and Savoy communities, it joined the Swiss confederacy as the twenty-second canton. The area of the canton comprises only 107 square miles, with 98,352 inhabitants in 1876.

The first seeds of the Reformation were sown in Geneva by the French translation of the Bible by Le Fèvre d'Étaples (Faber Stapulensis); and already in 1538 the bishop, the Duke of Savoy, and the Pope were busily engaged in punishing people who possessed or read le livre maudit; they were fined, or scourged, or beheaded. In September, 1532, Farel arrived at Geneva, preceded by Froment, followed by Viret; and in March, 1533, the Reformed doctrine was allowed to be preached and practised in the city. In July, same year, the bishop, Pierre de la Baume, resigned his office; and from September from Geneva to Annecy. A violent Roman-Catholic re-action took place in the following year; but it was of short duration. In 1535 the Reformation was adopted as the religion of the State; and in October, 1536, Calvin arrived. He soon found himself at the head of the whole movement, political as well as religious; and by his iron hand a theocracy of a very stern type was established. The Reformed doctrine became a civil duty, and dogmatical deviations were treated as treason. Ecclesiastical discipline was carried even into the routine of daily life, and a breach of its dictates was punished as a crime. The transition proved too sudden, however. A party was formed, not with any tendency towards Romanism, but for the purpose of sustaining a greater measure of liberty, and in 1538 Calvin was expelled. But it soon became apparent that his austere regimen was a necessity, if Geneva really should fulfill her mission as a frontier fortress against Rome. The city was crowded with refugees from Italy, Spain, France, and England. Each new-comer brought a new system of Protestantism along with him; and the liberty very soon degenerated into a laxity, which the Roman Catholics were not slow to avail themselves of. Calvin was recalled, and the severe order returned with the dictator. Under his rule, and, indeed, for a long time after his death, Geneva stood as the "Rome of Protestantism," the "moral capital of the half of Christendom," forming the strongest and loftiest characters, and sending forth the noblest and most vigorous impulses. It was not only a place of refuge to those who were persecuted, but also a centre of active labor. The English version, called the Geneva Bible, received its name from its being made in that city by English refugees. (See English Bible Versions, p. 735.)

Under such circumstances it was only natural that the Roman-Catholic Church should consider it one of her great objects to convert Geneva; and many attempts, insidious, daring, foolish attempts, were made, as, for instance, that by François de Sales. But none was more cunningly planned, and more patiently carried out, than that of which our own time has seen the issue. The inhabitants of the territory added to the city in 1814 in order to form the canton of Geneva were exclusively Roman Catholics, and the population of the whole canton was thus nearly equally divided between the two churches. Here was a chance for Rome, and she knew how to improve it. Disputes between the priests and the pastors were of frequent occurrence, and sometimes of great danger to the republic, as, after the fall of Napoleon, a strong current of re-action, both political and religious, had set in everywhere in Europe; and it proved easy for the Roman-Catholic party to bring the influence of France, Russia, and Austria, to bear against their Protestant adversaries. The dissolution of the Holy Alliance, however, and the revolution of 1830, gave the Protestants freer hands; but then the secret work of the Romanists in the social foundation of the State began to show its results. Within a day of the annexation of the rural territories, the Roman clergy exerted itself to prevent an amalgamation between the two denominations. Mixed marriages were prohibited; neighboring courtesy was discouraged; the two confessions seldom met each other, except when doing military service. At the same time a Roman-Catholic immigration was highly favored. Laborers, mechanics, retail dealers, etc., were imported in considerable numbers, and se-tled in the city, a propaganda at Lyons furnishing funds; and the Roman Church was soon able to take up the contest with the Protestant party in the political field. The fight actually began, stirred up by the priests. But in the course of a generation the march of affairs took an unexpected turn. The young voters were sent to the polls by their confessors, and to the political medias; but the contest between the two confessions; and confessional matters could, of course, not be excluded. The result was that suddenly there appeared within the pale of the Roman-Catholic community a decided opposition to the ultramontanists. This new party, the Liberal-Catholics, invited in 1873 Father Hyacinthe to preach at Geneva; and, as the Genevese laws grant to every congregation the right of electing its pastor itself, many Roman-Catholic congregations chose Old Catholic priests, who rejected the dogma of papal infallibility, and were made. The history, however, of the Church of Geneva, is by no means confined to her duel with the Roman Church: on the contrary, considerable changes of organization and a significant doctrinal development have taken place. The organization of the sixteenth century remained unaltered for a long time, or underwent only minor modifications, until, in 1846, a radical change was effected, amounting almost to a revolution. Up to 1846 the pastors were chosen by the Vénérable Compagnie des Pasteurs, one of the institutions of Calvin, which also had in hand the administration of all religious affairs of the church, and exercised great influence on the academy and the schools. But from that year the authority of the compagnie was confined to questions of worship proper; while the other branches of the administration of the church were placed under the consistoire, composed of twenty-five lay-members and six pastors, and elected by the people; and the pastors were chosen by the congregations. At the same time began that doctrinal difference to develop, which finally led to the formation of the Evangelical Society, and the foundation of a new theological school; for which see the articles on GAVARD, FRANKEL, D'ARBUS, SOCIÉTÉ ÉVANGÉLIQUE, etc.

GENÈVIEVE, St., b. 419 or 425, at Nanterre; d. in Paris, Jan. 3, 512; became the patroness of Paris by averting the attack of the Huns, under Attila, from that city by her prayers; built the first church over the tomb of St. Denis; and lies buried in the Church of St. Geneviève, in Paris, which, however, twice (in 1792 and in 1830) has been for a time transformed into a national pantheon. The earliest life of her, written shortly after her death, was published in Paris, in 1657, by Charpentier. See Act. Sac., and BUTLER, Lives of the Saints, Jan. 3.

GENÈVIEVE, Canons of St. (also called Canons of the Congregation of France), a congregation of regular canons founded in 1614 by Charles Faure, from the abbey of St. Vincent de Senlis, who, by the Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld, was called to Paris, and successfully carried through a reform of the abbey of St. Geneviève there. A female community of the order (the Daughters of St. Geneviève, or the Miranmonis) was founded in 1698 by Francisca de Bisegna, and in 1698 united to the congregation founded by Marie de Mira- mion. See Constitutiones Canonarum regularum Congregationis Gallicana, Paris, 1676.

GENNADIUS MASSILIENSIUS lived, according to notices drawn from his own works, in Gaul during the time of Bishop Galienius of Rome (492-496) and the Byzantine Emperor Anastatius (491-518), and was a presbyter, not a bishop, at Marseilles. He understood Greek, was well versed both in Eastern and Western ecclesiastical literature, translated several Greek works into Latin, and wrote original works on all heresies,—against Nestorius, against Pelagius,—and against Semi-Pelagianism; which, however, twice (in 1792 and in 1830) has been for a long time, or undergone only minor extensions in the course of time. It was first printed among the works of Augustine, but separately edited by Elmenhorst (Hamburg, 1614) and by Oehler, in Corp. Haresol., I. The De viris illustribus is valuable, both on account of the vast reading on which it is based, and on account of its impartiality. It was first printed in connection with the work of Jerome, and then edited separately by Fuchte (Helmstedt, 1612) and by S. E. Cyprian (Jena, 1703). Both works are found in Migne, Patro. Latin., vol. 58. The dogmatical stand-point of the author is one of Semi-Pelagianism, such as this view prevailed in Gaul, and more especially at Marseilles, at his time.

WAGENMANN.

GENNADIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople (1453-59), was one of the most prolific philosophical and theological writers of his age, and one of the most representative of Byzantine learning. Of his personal life very little is known. He seems to have been born in Constantinople about 1400. His true name was Georgios Scholarios. Having entered the court-service, he was made an imperial councillor, and accompanied in 1454 the Emperor Johannes to the Council of Ferrara-Florence. As a layman, he could not take part in the discussions of the council; but he presented to it three elaborate speeches in favor of the projected union between the Greek and Latin churches, and addressed also his own countrymen in a separate work on the subject. After his return to Greece, however, he entirely changed his views of the union, and became one of its most decided adversaries, speaking and writing against it with passionate obstinacy. This change also disturbed his relations with the emperor; and in 1448 he retired to the monastery of Pantokrator, and became a monk, though still continuing his literary activity. As Mohammed II., after the capture of Constantinople, demanded that the vacant patriarchal chair should be filled, Georgios Scholarios, who as a monk had assumed the name of Gennadius, was unanimously elected, and was duly installed by the Sultan, as had formerly been the patriarchs by the emperors. He presented to the Sultan a kind of confession or exposition of the Christian faith, written with admirable clearness and precision, translated into Turkish by Achmad, Judge of Borea, and first printed by A. Brascianus, Vienna, 1530; and he later on followed up the subject by a more elaborate disquisition, in the form of a dialogue between a Turk and a Christian, first printed by A. Brascianus, Vienna, 1539. He found, however, the position as patriarch under a Turkish sultan so irksome, that in 1459 he abdicated, and retired to the monastery of John the Baptist, near Serrze, in Macedonia, where he died at an unknown date. The number of his works amounts to about a hundred; but most of them still remain in manuscript, and for many of them grave questions have been raised concerning their authenticity and integrity. What has been printed is found in Miron: Patrologia Graec, vol. 186. See Gass: Gennianus et Pletho, Berlin, 1814; (Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, I. 46 sqq.). WAGENMANN.

GENNESARET is the name of a lake of Palestine, also called the "Sea of Galilee;" of a plain along the north-western shore of the lake, generally called the "Land of Gennesaret," and of a town situated in the plain. The name is Chinnereth, or Chinnereth, in the Old Testament (Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xi. 2; 1 Kings xv. 20), and Gennesar in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. xi. 67), but Gennesaret in the New Testament (Matt. ix. 1; Mark vi. 53; Luke v. 1—11). The town was still in existence in the beginning of the fourteenth century. For the lake and the land, see PalesTINE.

GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH, a famous English chronicler; b. at Monmouth, early in the twelfth century; created Bishop of St. Asaph, 1152; d. 1154. His fame rests upon a history of early Britain, entitled Chronicon sicte Historia Britonum. The work has been a mine from which later chroniclers drew, and poets down to Tennyson. The first printed edition appeared at Paris, 1568. An English translation by A. THOMPSON, London, 1718, has been revised by J. A. GILES, Lond., 1842. See WRIGHT: Essays on Archael. Subjects, Lond., 1861 (vol. 1).

GEOFFREY, St., descended from a distinguished family in Cappadocia; entered the Roman army, and rose rapidly, but left it with open protest when the persecution of Diocletian began; and was beheaded at Nicomedia, April 23, 303. According to some he was the person mentioned in Eusebius (Hist. Ect., VIII. 9), who tore down the imperial proclamation, and was punished by being roasted over a slow fire. The acts of his martyrdom are evidently spurious. Baronius thinks that the Arians falsified them. Many features of the legends about him, as, for instance, the slaying of the dragon, show a decidedly mythical character, a legend which doubtless grew out of a kind of confession, etc. A biography of him was published at Paris by a former colleague in journalism.

GENTILIS, Giovanni Valentino, b. at Cosenza, in Calabria, about 1525; beheaded at Bern, Sept. 10, 1569. He embraced the Reformation, fled from Italy, and settled at Geneva. Remembering the fate of Servetus, he signed the confession of faith which the magistrates demanded every member of the Italian community at Geneva to subscribe to, but continued, nevertheless, to propagate the truth of Christianity by an irrefragable argument against the Council of Trent. Both works have often been reprinted.

GENUFLECTENTES. See Catechetics.

GENULF, Count of (767), was one of those mixed synods, composed of bishops and barons, which were frequently held by the Frankish kings.

The occasion was an embassy from the Byzantine emperor, Constantine Copronymus, to King Pepin, and the subjects treated were, no doubt, the questions of image-worship and the procession of the Holy Spirit. But the acts of the council have not come down to us.

GENTILLET, Innocent, was b. at Vienne in Dauphiné, but fled to Geneva on account of the persecutions against the Reformed. In 1576 he returned to France, and was at one time president of the Parliament of Grenoble: but in 1585 he was again expelled, and died at Geneva at an unknown date. He wrote Apologia pro christianis Gallis religionis evangelica (1578), which is considered the best apology for the Reformation ever written, and Le bureau du concile de Trente (1588), an irrefragable argument against the Council of Trent. Both works have often been reprinted.

GENTILLY, Council of (767), was one of those mixed synods, composed of bishops and barons, which were frequently held by the Frankish kings.

The occasion was an embassy from the Byzantine emperor, Constantine Copronymus, to King Pepin, and the subjects treated were, no doubt, the questions of image-worship and the procession of the Holy Spirit. But the acts of the council have not come down to us.

GEORGE, St., descended from a distinguished family in Cappadocia; entered the Roman army, and rose rapidly, but left it with open protest when the persecution of Diocletian began; and was beheaded at Nicomedia, April 23, 303. According to some he was the person mentioned in Eusebius (Hist. Ect., VIII. 9), who tore down the imperial proclamation, and was punished by being roasted over a slow fire. The acts of his martyrdom are evidently spurious. Baronius thinks that the Arians falsified them. Many features of the legends about him, as, for instance, the slaying of the dragon, show a decidedly mythical character, etc. A biography of him was published at Paris by a former colleague in journalism.

GEORGE, ST.}
II.), he appeared in the battle of Antioch (June 28, 1098), and aided the Franks to overthrow the Saracens. The Normans under Robert, the son of William the Conqueror, then adopted him as their patron. As he continued to appear in aid of the Norman crusaders, a Council of Oxford (1222) made his day a festival throughout England; and after the battle of Calais (1349) he came to be considered the patron saint of the country, and the order of the garter is said by some to have been instituted (1350) under his patronage. See HEYLYN: History of St. George of Cappadocia, Lond., 1651; MILNER: Inquiry into the History of St. George, 1792; J. HOOG: Notes on St. George the Martyr, Lond., 1862.

GEORGE III., Prince of Anhalt; b. at Dessau, Aug. 13, 1507; d. there Oct. 17, 1553. He studied at Leipzig; was ordained a priest in 1524, and appointed provost of Magdeburg in 1526. He was at that time a true son of the Roman Church, and considered the Reformation a mere innovation. But he considered it necessary to make thorough study of the Bible and the history of the Church in order to meet successfully the "Lutheran sectarians;" and the result of this study was his conversion. In 1530 he subscribed to the Augsburg Confession; and in 1534 the Lutheran Church was established in the principality of Anhalt. At the instance of Duke Maurice, Prince George assumed in 1544 the administration of the diocese of Merseburg; and in the following year he was consecrated bishop by Luther. During the Smalcaldian war he defended himself in Merseburg; but, after the establishment of the Leipzig Interim, he retired to Dessau. See O. G. SCHMIDT: Georg von Anhalt, in MEURER: Leben der Altenster d. luth. Kirche, which also gives information about the writings of George III.

GEORGE, Margrave of Brandenburg-Ansbach; b. at Onolitzbach, March 4, 1484; d. there Dec. 17, 1543; embraced early the Reformation, and maintained very intimate relations with Luther. In 1527 he became sole ruler of the margraviate, and immediately introduced the new doctrine in the principality of Anhalt. At the instance of Duke Maurice, Prince George assumed in 1544 the administration of the diocese of Merseburg; and in the following year he was consecrated bishop by Luther. During the Smalcaldian war he defended himself in Merseburg; but, after the establishment of the Leipzig Interim, he retired to Dessau. See O. G. SCHMIDT: Georg von Anhalt, in MEURER: Leben der Altenster d. luth. Kirche, which also gives information about the writings of George III.

GEORGE OF TREBIZOND, b. in Crete, 1396; d. at Naples, 1486; took his surname, not from his native island, but from the city of his ancestors; came in 1420 to Venice; taught rhetoric and grammar in Rome, but lost the favor of Nicholas V. by his ill-natured polemics against Bessarion, Pitech, and the Platonic school, and was rescued from starvation only by a small pension from King Alphonse. His two essays against the Greek Church are found in LEO ALLATIUS: Graecia Orthodoxa, Rome, 1652. His translations of Plato and Eusebius are inaccurate and unreliable.

GEORGE OF CAPPADOCIA, likewise called George the Fuller, was appointed Bishop of Alexandria in 356, after the banishment of Athanasius, and entered the city at the head of a military force. In 361 he was most savagely massacred by the Pagans. He was a rank Arian, a grasping and peremptory nature, a character by no means without blemish; but the picture which the orthodox writers give of him is very exaggerated, and sometimes even self-contradictory.

GEORGE THE PISIDIAN lived in the middle of the seventh century, and was a deacon at the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople. He wrote a number of long poems of historical, philosophical, and religious contents; but, though he was much appreciated by the later Byzantine writers, most of his productions remain in manuscript. The Hexameron and De vanitate vitae were published, with a Latin translation, by Morel, Paris, 1584, and are found in Bibliotheca Patrum, Paris, 1654, vol. XIV.

GEORGIAN VERSIONS. See BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 286.

GEORGIIUS, Bishop of Laodicea in Phrygia, was born at Alexandria, and received orders there. In the controversy between Bishop Alexander of Alexandria and the Arians he tried to mediate, but was excommunicated by Alexander for Arianism. Made Bishop of Laodicea by the Arians, he could not agree with them, either, and became, together with Bishop Basil of Anymetz, founder of the Semi-Arian party. Under Con-stanius the doctrine of the Semi-Arians became the theology of the court; and when the third symod of Sirmium (358) confirmed this doctrine and the anathemas of the symod of Ancyra, the breach between the Arians and the Semi-Arians became complete. Among the works of Georgii are mentioned a life of Eusebius of Emessa, and an essay against the Manichеans.

GEORGIIUS SYNCELLUS received his surname from his position as syncellus, or privy councillor, to Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the middle of the eighth century. He wrote a Chronographia, extending from Adam to the time of Diodetian, and valuable especially on account of the frequent extracts it gives from other writers. It was first edited by Goar, Paris, 1652; best by Dindorf, 1829, 2 vols.

GERBERON, Gabriel, b. at St. Calais, between Angers and Chartres, Aug. 12, 1628; d. at St. Denis, March 29, 1711; entered the congregation of St. Maur in 1649, and became not only one of the most prolific writers of that order (his works numbering a hundred and eleven), but also one of the most moderate of his theo logical learning. He taught philosophy and theology in various schools, after 1675, at Corbie near Amiens. While there he published (1676, at Brussels) his Miroir de la piété chrétienne, which by several archbishops was considered a revival of the five condemned propositions of Jansen. On the instigation of the Jesuits an order was issued for his imprisonment; but he fled, first to the Netherlands, afterwards to Brussels, where he edited the works of Bajus, and Jansen's letters to St. Cyran. He was discovered, however, in 1708, and imprisoned in the citadel of Amiens till 1707, when he was brought to St. Denis, after having been compelled to recant, and sign the condemnation of the five propositions of Jansen. But he never yielded completely. Shortly before his death he dictated Le vain triomphe des Jesuits, whose publication was prevented, however, by his superior.

GERBERT, Martin, b. at Horb, on the Neckar, Aug. 13, 1720; d. at Sanct Blasien, in the Black Forest, May 3, 1793; was educated in the Jesuit academy of Freiburg; entered the monastery of Sanct Blasien in 1737; was ordained priest in 1744, and elected abbot in 1748. From 1759 to 1762 he travelled in Germany, France, and Italy, and published a Latin description of his voyage, afterwards translated into German. He was a learned historian, and wrote, among other works, a Historia nigram sylvis O. S. B., Cologne, 1785. But his specialty was sacred music, its history and theory: De canatu et musica sacra (2 vols., 1774); Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra (3 vols., 1784). He was a friend of Gluck.

GERDES, Daniel, b. at Bremen, April 19, 1698; d. at Groningen, Feb. 11, 1763; studied at Utrecht; was appointed professor of theology at Duisburg 1726, and at Groningen 1735. His principal work is his history of the Reformation.—Historia Reformationis, 4 vols., Groningen, 1744. He wrote also specially about the Reformation in Italy, in the diocese of Salzburg, etc.

GERGESA. See GA'ARA.

GERHARD, Johann, b. at Quedlinburg, Oct. 17, 1582; d. at Jena, Aug. 20, 1637; studied, first medicine at Wittenberg; then theology at Jena and Marburg; was appointed superintendent of Heldburg in 1606, but removed in 1615 to Jena as professor of theology. He was one of the heroes of Lutheran orthodoxy, unquestionably the most learned, and, among the scholars of his age, certainly the most amiable. It is especially as a dogmatist and by his two works, Doctrina catholica et evangelica (1634, 3 vols.) and Locii communis theologici (Jena, 1611-22, 9 vols., modern edition, Leipzig, 1863-76, 10 vols.), that he gained his great fame. The progress he made beyond his predecessors Chemnitz and Hutter consists partly in a more perfect systematization, partly in a deeper and more speculative argumentation of the dogmas, but especially in the completeness and comprehensiveness of the treatment. Of his exegetical works, which are distinguished by their patriarchic learning, his Comm. in Harmoniam histor. ev. de passione et resurrectione Christi (1617) is the most important. His commentaries on the Old Testament, published after his death, are not so much read. Of his devotional books his Meditationes Sacre appeared in 1606, and have been often reprinted; among the most important is his De Oratio (17 vols., Leipzig, 1676); while his Schola Pietatis has fallen into oblivion. His Enchiridion Consolatorium was re-edited and translated into German by C. I. Botcher, 1877. See E. R. Fischer: Vita J. Gerardi, Gottha, 1725.

GERHARD, St., b. at Staves (Stabatcella), in the diocese of Namur, 890; d. in the monastery of Brogne (Bronium), Oct. 3, 906; retired early from the gay service of the Count of Namur, on account of a vision which came to him in a dream; and, having built a new church and a monastery at Brogne (916), he entered the monastery of St. Denis, and became a monk. Ordained a presbyter in 928, he returned to Brogne, and spent the rest of his life in reforming monasteries. He was canonized by Innocent II. See Act. sanct., Oct. 3, and F. Günther, Das Leben d. k. Gerhard de Brogne, Halle, 1857.

GERHARD, Paul, b. at Gräfenhainichen, in the electorate of Saxony, March 12, 1607; d. at Lübben, June 7, 1676. He studied at Wittenberg; was made preacher at Mittenwalde in 1651, and at the Church of St. Nicolai, in Berlin, in 1657, but was dismissed in 1666, because he refused to subscribe to the edicts of June 2, 1662, and Sept. 16, 1664, considering them as attempts to unite the Lutheran and the Reformed churches. In 1667, however, he was made Archdeacon of Lübben. He is generally considered as the greatest hymn-writer Germany has produced. In his sweet songs, Christianity does not appear as something imposed on or in conflict with human nature, but, on the contrary, as the strongest, soundest, purest, and truest form of humanity. His form is often artistically perfect; and yet the expression comes so naturally, and the rhythm flows so easily, that his verses remain in the memory after the first hearing. The first collection of his hymns appeared in 1598, and the last, in 1680, by Cruger (in his Praxis Pietatis Melica, 1648) and J. G. Ebeling (Berlin, 1666); the last and best by C. I. Bettcher, 1877. See E. R. Fischer: Vita P. Gerhardi de Brogne, Halle, 1857.
GERHOCHE.

[Many of Gerhardt's hymns have been incorporated in our collections of hymns or of devotional poetry; and one of them, O sacred Head, now in the revival of orthodoxy and national poetry; and one of them, O sacred Head, sung. Other familiar ones begin, Oh! how shall I receive thee; Commit thou all thy griefs, and Give to the winds thy fears. More than fifty of his hundred and twenty-three hymns are classical. His English translators include Rev. John Wesley, Miss C. Winkworth, Rev. Dr. James W. Alexander, and John Kelly. The latter has furnished a complete translation, Paul Gerhardt's Spiritual Songs, London, 1867.]

GERHOCH, b. at Polling, in Bavaria, towards the end of the eleventh century; d. at Reichersberg, near Passau, 1169; frequented the schools of his native town, Mosburg, Freysing, and Hilodesheim, and was appointed canon of Augsburg, and magister scholurarum, but left this position, disgusted at the irregularities of the lives of the canons. He did not find the state of affairs better at Raitenbuch, whither he moved, and went to Rome, where Honorius II. officially charged him (1125) with the reform of the canony. He had no opportunity, however, to try his own strength as a reformer as yet. In 1126 he entered the service of Bishop Kuno of Regensburg, and was ordained priest. But in 1132 Archbishop Conrad I. of Salzburg placed him at the head of the canony of Reichersberg, and there he spent the rest of his life, an active and rigorous Reformer. As a writer he was strongly opposed to scholasticism, and accused even Peter Lombard of heresy. A writer he was strongly opposed to scholasticism, and accused even Peter Lombard of heresy. A list of his works have been edited by Scheibelberger, Vienna, 1871 and 1876. [See H. F. A. NOBBE: Gerhoch v. Reichersberg, Leipzig, 1881.]

GERIZIM, a mountain of Ephraim, opposite Elar, with Shechem in the north, and near Nablus, was one of the mountains on which Israel stood pronouncing blessings and curses (Deut. xi. 29; Josh. viii. 30-35). (See Ebal.) It is 2,895 feet above the level of the sea, and 800 feet above the bottom of the valley. It was the scene of the parable of the trees and the brambles (Judg. ix. 7-21), and the site of the Samaritan temple referred to by the woman at the well (John iv. 20). Samaritan tradition points it out as the place where Abraham offered Isaac; and the remnant of the Samaritan sect living at Nablus (Shechem) still performs the annual paschal sacrifices on its top. [See also Gitzim.]

GERLACH, Otto von, b. in Berlin, April 12, 1801; d. there Oct. 24, 1849. He studied, first law at Heidelberg and Göttingen, then theology in his native city, and was appointed preacher at the Elizabeth Church there in 1834, and court chaplain in 1847. He and his equally distinguished brother, von Gerlach, of the name of Christ Catholics, and with whom Gen. von Gerlach, an aide-de-camp of King Frederick William IV.) were closely associated with Hengstenberg in the revival of orthodoxy and piety in Prussia. He translated Awake, thou that sleepest (by Wesley), the Reformed Pastor (by Baxter, and the Charity and the Church (by Baxter), and wrote a very useful popular commentary on the Bible, of which a collected edition appeared in Berlin, 1847-53, 6 vols.]

GERLE, Christophe Antoine, b. in Auvergne, 1740; entered the order of the Carthusians; became one of the mountains on which the people of his native city to accept the nomination for bishop in 1418; adopted immediately after the most rigorous ascetic practices; visited England in 429 to aid the orthodox against the Pelagians; and went in the year of his death to Ravenna to interfere in favor of the Armoricans. He enjoyed a great fame during his lifetime, and is still much revered in France. See Act. Sanct., July 31.

GERMAIN D'AUXERRE, St., b. at Auxerre, 380; d. at Ravenna, July 31, 448; was forced by the people of his native city to accept the nomination for bishop in 418; adopted immediately after the most rigorous ascetic practices; visited England in 429 to aid the orthodox against the Pelagians; and went in the year of his death to Ravenna to interfere in favor of the Armoricans. He enjoyed a great fame during his lifetime, and is still much revered in France. See Act. Sanct., July 31.

GERMAIN DE PARIS, St., b. at Autun, 496; d. in Paris, May 28, 576; was made Abbot of St. Symphorian, near Autun, in 540, and Bishop of Paris in 550. He vindicated his episcopal authority with great intrepidity in this the worst period of Merovingian rule, and was greatly revered by the people. His life was written by his contemporary. Fortunatus Venantius. See Act. Sanct., May 28.

GERMAN CATHOLICS (Deutsch Katholiken). Oct. 15, 1844, there appeared in the Sächsische Vaterlandsblätter an article in which the Bishop of Treves was openly accused of seducing his flock to idolatry by his exhibition of the holy coat; and an appeal was made to the lower clergy to unite with the opponents in the Protestation movement. The author of the article was an entirely obscure person, one Johannes Ronge, a Roman-Catholic priest, formerly a chaplain at Grottkau, in the county of Neisse, Saxony, but suspended on account of a previous article in the same paper, and now living at Lanrauhütte, near the Polish frontier, teaching a children's school in a Protestant neighborhood. But the effect of the article was like that of a spark in a powder-mine. Fifty thousand copies of the article were immediately sold, and tokens of sympathy of every kind and description showered down upon the author. Ronge's appeal of separation had already been anticipated and carried into effect in another place. At Schneidemühl, a small town on the northern frontier of Posen, one Czersky had formed a community, which on Oct. 18, 1844, broke off from the Roman Church, and constituted itself as an independent congregation, under the name of Christ Catholics, and with him as their pastor. To lead these two currents into one common stream was a problem of the greatest importance, but not without peculiar difficulties.

GERMAN CATHOLICS.

RUD. KÖGEL.

GERLE, Christophe Antoine, b. in Auvergne, 1740; entered the order of the Carthusians; became one of the mountains on which the people of his native city to accept the nomination for bishop in 1418; adopted immediately after the most rigorous ascetic practices; visited England in 429 to aid the orthodox against the Pelagians; and went in the year of his death to Ravenna to interfere in favor of the Armoricans. He enjoyed a great fame during his lifetime, and is still much revered in France. See Act. Sanct., July 31.

GERMAIN D'AUXERRE, St., b. at Auxerre, 380; d. at Ravenna, July 31, 448; was forced by the people of his native city to accept the nomination for bishop in 1418; adopted immediately after the most rigorous ascetic practices; visited England in 429 to aid the orthodox against the Pelagians; and went in the year of his death to Ravenna to interfere in favor of the Armoricans. He enjoyed a great fame during his lifetime, and is still much revered in France. See Act. Sanct., July 31.

GERMAIN DE PARIS, St., b. at Autun, 496; d. in Paris, May 28, 576; was made Abbot of St. Symphorian, near Autun, in 540, and Bishop of Paris in 550. He vindicated his episcopal authority with great intrepidity in this the worst period of Merovingian rule, and was greatly revered by the people. His life was written by his contemporary. Fortunatus Venantius. See Act. Sanct., May 28.
GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH. 866 GERMAN TRANSLATIONS.

The Christ Catholics rejected the celibacy of the clergy, the use of the Latin language in divine service, the doctrines of purgatory, transubstantiation, etc.; but they retained the seven sacraments, the Nicene Creed, etc. The German Catholics, who had formed their first independent congregation at Breslau, March 9, 1845, with Rouge as their pastor, went much farther in their deviation from Romanism, and had, for instance, made considerable changes in the Nicene Creed. A common council was held at Leipzig, Easter, 1845, and delegates were present from twenty-seven congregations. But at the council it soon became evident that the watch-er of secession, -away from Rome,- was about the only thing common to all the secters; and it was only by the highest degree of reciprocal forbearance that a very vague and very weak confession was agreed upon. The divinity of Christ was passed by in silence in this confession.

The work of the council was not received with enthusiasm by the constituencies. The congregations in Berlin protested against the rejection of the Apostolical Creed, dissolved its connection with the movement, and established itself as an independent congregation, July 15, 1846, under the name of Protest Catholics. The congregation of Schneidemühl was equally dissatisfied, but continued in outward communication with Rouge, on account of the weakness and timidity of its leader, Czersky. In other places the complaints went in the opposite direction. No confession was wanted at all; dogma in any form or shape should be avoided as a mere clog on the free movement of the church; irreligious and anti-Christian tendencies became apparent. From that moment, people of distinction and ability began to keep aloof from the affair, while recruits were enlisted from the ranks of the social and political radicals. The state-governments, having watched the movement all along with distrust and suspicion, now adopted energetic measures against it. Austria and Bavaria excluded the German Catholics altogether from their territories; Prussia, Saxony, and Baden, admitted them, but on conditions.

This state of affairs was, of course, changed in 1848, and all interference from the side of the State ceased. But the impulse had already spent its force. In 1848 the German Catholics numbered about sixty thousand: in 1858 there were only about one hundred congregations still alive. In some districts they united with the Protestant free congregations; in others they clubbed together, even with the Reform Jews.

GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH. See Reformed Church, German.

GERMAN TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE. Many centuries elapsed after the Gothic version of Ulflas, who d. in 381 (see Bible Translations), before the Bible was translated into High-German. In the eighth century the church began to put the German to use. (See R. v. Rau-mer, Einwirkung d. Christenth. auf d. alt-germ. Sprache, Stuttgart, 1845.) In the manuscripts of that time there are many glosses in German; and German translations of single books of the Bible were attempted. Of the latter, the preserved fragments of Matthew (eighth century, ed. Massmann, 1841), a translation of the harmony of the Gospels of Ammonius Alex. (ninth century, ed. Schmeller, Vienna, 1841), and a version of the Psalms in Low-German (ninth century, ed. Hoffmann, Leipsic, 1829), have also come down to us. In the centuries immediately following, the interest in the vernacular translation decreased, and the reading of the vernacular Scriptures was forbidden by the ecclesiastical authorities. (See Hegelmaier, Gesch. d. Bibelcercbots, Ulm, 1783.)

The earliest date of the translation of the whole German Bible cannot be ascertained; but it is certain that one was in existence at the beginning of the fifteenth century. Among the first publications of the printing-press were copies of it. Fourteen editions appeared before 1518,—at Mainz (by Fust and Schöffer), 1463; Stras-burg, 1466 (?), 1483; Augsburg, 1470 (?), 1475 (?), 1477, 1477, 1480, 1487, 1490, 1507, 1518; and Nürnberg, 1470 (or Basel ?), 1483. Four complete editions, but based upon the former, appeared in Low-German,—two at Cologne about 1480. one at Lübeck 1494, and one at Halberstadt 1529. In the two first the Song of Solomon is given in Latin to avoid any scandal among the young. This translation was made exclusively from the Vulgate, which in some instances was grossly misunderstood. It was quite literal, and made use of an older translation, of which we know nothing. The editions were small, and were not circulated among the people.

The great translator of the German Bible was Martin Luther. About the same time that he began the work of translation, others were engaged in the labor. Among these were Biscain (from the side of the State), etc. Luther, who translated "not for scholars, but for the people," put forth in 1517 a version of the seven Penitential Psalms, with commentary, and before 1521 the Lord's Prayer, the prayer of Manasseh, the Ten Commandments, the Magnificat, etc. These were repeatedly reprinted. It was in the latter part of 1521 that he conceived the plan of translating the whole Bible into German, from the original languages. The year of his confinement at the Wartburg he spent upon the New Testament, which was printed, but without the name either of the printer or translator. Nor was the date given; but we know it was the year 1522, for a second edition, dated, appeared the same year. Luther at once began work on the Old Testament, which appeared in parts,—in 1523, part I. (Pentateuch); 1524, parts II. and III. (historical books and Hagiographa); 1528, Jonah and Habakkuk; 1528, Zechariah and Isaiah; 1530, Daniel; and in 1532 the remainder of the Prophets. The Apocrypha...
GERMAN TRANSLATIONS.

867

complete, "that is, books which are not of equal authority with the Holy Scriptures, but which it is useful and good to read," were first published in 1534. In subsequent editions Luther made many improvements in his version. The translation of the Psalms was much altered; so that he himself, in comparing the edition of 1531 with that of 1534, says the latter is nearer the Hebrew, the former the German. This is true of the whole.

Luther lived to see ten original editions of his Bible, and, in order to make the work as perfect as possible, formed a committee on translation (collegium biblicum), consisting of Melancthon, Bugenhagen, Jonas, Crusiger, Aurogallius, and Ronarius, which met in his rooms one evening every week, for consultation. With the edition of 1544, 1545, Luther's work of emending came to an end.

Luther's Bible had a very extensive circulation. Between 1522 and 1533 it is almost certain that there were sixteen original editions of the New Testament; and the reprints amounted to fifty-four (fourteen in Augsburg, thirteen in Strassburg, twelve in Basel, etc.). Luther complained of the reprints; and in the edition of 1530, opposite the title-page, is a warning against them as "careless and faulty" (unheetsig und falsch), and an appeal to others who wanted a German Testament "to make one of their own." Many changes were introduced into these reprints. The Old Testament was also frequently reprinted,—the Pentateuch twenty-two times (seven in Wittenberg), the historical books nineteen times, and the prophetical books fourteen times. Single books were also reprinted. The Psalter went through seventeen editions. Before the completion of Luther's Bible, in 1534, editions had appeared with all the books,—four such in Zürich between 1522 and 1531, one in Worms 1530, two in Strassburg 1530, and one in Frankfurt 1534. These were made up of Luther's translation, so far as it went, and the missing books supplied by Haetzner (on the prophets), Leo Judaeus (on the Apocrypha), and others. The four last of these editions also contained the Epistle to the Laodiceans in the old German translation.

Luther translated directly from the original, using for the Old Testament the edition of Brescia, 1494, and for the New Testament the Erasmus text of the edition of 1519. Although he was not the best philological scholar of his day, he was sufficient of a scholar to be independent; and what he lacked in philological penetration he made up by his accurate exegetical intuition, and by his spiritual understanding of the Bible. There are mistakes, especially in the harder passages of Job and the Prophets; but as a whole his translations are accurate. In the Apocrypha he was not so careful, and translated from the Vulgate as far as the German itself was concerned, Luther was eminently fitted for his task. He was a German through and through, and possessed to a remarkable degree the gift of strong and pithy speech. He avoided being a "literalist" (Buchstabilitat), and sought to "give the pure and clear German." His danger was that the German itself in the letters of Scripture kept him from serious errors in this direction. Yet he does not at times shrink from adding to the text where he thinks the truth demands emphasis, as in Rom. iii. 28, where he adds alone,—"A man is justified by faith alone" (allein durch die Glaube). The language is clear, vivid and forcible, rich and melodious, noble and chaste. Often he sought diligently for the proper word. "We," he says, "that is, Melanchthon, Aurogallius, and I, are working on Job, but so that sometimes we have been hardly able to finish three lines in four days."

Not only did Luther's Bible have an immense influence in extending the Reformation. It was a national work, and fixed the German language, making High-German the common dialect. Within a hundred years, through its influence, it had come into general use in the churches and schools, and Low-German had degenerated into the patua. But there were not wanting violent attacks upon it. One of his critics, Emser, in his Aus was grund und wirsch Luther's dolmatschung dem gemeinen man billich verboten worden say, Leipzig, 1529 ("For what cause and reason Luther's translation has been properly forbidden to the common people"), pronounced it to be full of heretical errors and lies. Wicelius (Annnotationes, Leipzig, 1536) followed substantially in the same line, and the Roman Catholics (Taub 1578, Zanger 1806, etc.) Luther and his friends took little notice of these criticisms.

Luther's translation has never been regarded by the Lutheran Church as unsuscceptible of improvement. Its need of revision cannot be questioned; but any revision must be accomplished in the spirit of Luther. Private revisions have been made by J. F. v. Meyer (3d ed., Frankfurt, 1853, revised by Stier, Bielef., 3d ed., 1867), Kraus (Tübingen, 1830), and Hopf (3d ed., Leipzig, 1854). The variations in the text of Luther finally led to a movement towards revision. It started at the meetings of the church diet at Stuttgart 1857, and Hamburg 1858; and in 1863 the meeting at Eisenach, at the advice of the church council (Oberkirchenrat) of Berlin, appointed a revision commission. They performed their labors, but did not attempt a thorough revision. The New Testament appeared at Halle, 1867, and the whole Bible, 1888.

The Roman Catholics could not remain idle spectators of the wonderful success of Luther's Bible. Beringer put forth an edition of Luther, with only a few changes (Speier, 1526), but was followed by Hieronymus Emser, "the scribbler of Dresden" (d. Sudler in Dresen), with a more extensively emended text (Dresden, 1827). It was often reprinted. Johann Eck also put forth a Bible (Ingolstadt, 1537), but it proved a failure. The New Testament was taken from Emser, and the Old Testament was a reprint of the pre-Luther version. Eck's German is beneath criticism. In 1544 appeared at Mainz the Bible of the Dominican Dr. Dietenberger, which is also not an original translation. It was afterwards revised by Ulenberg (Cologne, 1630) and the theologians of Mainz (Cologne, 1662), and has since, under the title Catholic Bible, been used by the German Catholics.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries new translations or revisions were attempted. Of these the best was the Berleburg Bible (1726-42). One of the best translations is that of De GERMANY.

GERSON, Jean Charlier, a distinguished theologian, and one of the founders of Gallicanism, known as the Doctor Christianissimus ("Most Christian Doctor"); b. in the village of Gerson, in the diocese of Rheims, Dec. 14, 1689; d. at Lyons, July 12, 1429. His parents were peasants; his mother, according to his own statement, a "second Monica." In 1377 he entered the College of Navarre, and began, five years later, the study of theology, under Peter D'Ailli and Gilles des Champs." Aelianische Handschrift, welche dem im XV. Jahrhundert gedruckten deutschen Bibeln zu Grund gelegen, Augsburg, 1881—84, 3 parta sqq.] O. F. FRITZSCHE.

GERMANY, meaning the German Empire (constituted in 1871, after the brilliant victory over France), comprises an area of 280,000 square miles, with 42,727,360 inhabitants (according to the census of 1875), of whom 26,718,823 are Catholics; 100,608 Dissenters, and 16,127 of no religion stated. Thus about two-thirds (a little less) of the population of Germany are Protestant, and one-third (a little more) is Roman Catholic; and the relation between the two denominations was nearly the same two centuries ago, at the end of the Thirty-Years' War, in 1648. The Protestants have increased a little faster than the Roman Catholics; not on account of conversions, however, but because the population increases at a somewhat higher rate in the Protestant regions.

The location of the two denominations is also nearly the same now as two centuries ago. In South Germany the Roman Church prevails; in Northern, the Evangelical. Bavaria, Baden, and Alsace-Lorraine are predominantly Roman Catholic; Schleswig-Holstein, Mecklenburg, Hanover, Brandenburg, and Saxony are almost wholly Protestant.

In the Protestant Church attempts have been made to unite the Reformed and the Lutheran; and such a union was actually established in Prussia and Nassau 1817, in the Palatinate 1818, and in Baden 1822. Nevertheless, when, in 1860, Prussia annexed Hanover and Schleswig-Holstein, whose inhabitants are Lutheran, and Hesse, whose inhabitants are Reformed, the union was not introduced in those countries. The government of the Evangelical State Church of Prussia is consistiorial: at the head of the whole church stands an ecclesiastical council (Oberkirchenrat), of each province a superintendent-general with a consistorial board, of each diocese a superintendent, of each parish a minister.

The Roman Church has six archbishops,—Breslau, Gnesen-Posen, Cologne, Freiburg, Münster, Bamberg; and eighteen bishops, Ermland, Kulm, Pulta, Hildesheim, Osnabrück, Paderborn, Münster, Limburg, Treves, Metz, Strassburg, Spires, Würzburg, Ratisbon, Passau, Eichstätt, Augsburg, and Rottenburg.

An apostolic vicar resides in Dresden. The Jesuits were expelled in 1774. After the promulgation of the dogma of papal infallibility in 1871, the secession of the Old Catholics (see art.) took place. In 1878 they numbered about fifty-two thousand, divided into a hundred and twenty-two congregations. See Bühler, Der Achtkatholizismus, Leiden, 1860, p. 49.

For further statistical details, and for the history of the Church in Germany, see the articles on the separate states (Bavaria, etc.), on the ancient tribes (Alemanni, Saxons, etc.), on the special periods, places, and sects (the Reformation, Cologne, Anabaptists, etc.) and, finally, biographies.

The German Empire is, like the government of the United States, a purely political union of the different German states, and has, as such, nothing to do with religion, which is left to the several states. But the emperor of Germany, who is at the same time king of Prussia, is at the head of the Evangelical Church of Prussia.

GERSON, Jean Charlier, a distinguished theologian, and one of the founders of Gallicanism, known as the Doctor Christianissimus ("Most Christian Doctor"); b. in the village of Gerson, in the diocese of Rheims, Dec. 14, 1689; d. at Lyons, July 12, 1429. His parents were peasants; his mother, according to his own statement, a "second Moni
c. In 1377 he entered the College of Navarre, Paris, and began, five years later, the study of theology, under Peter D'Ailli and Gilles des Champs. By 1887 he had attained so considerable a reputation as to be chosen by the university officials, representatives to plead before Pope Clement VII. for a sentence against the Dominican, John of Monton, who denied the immaculate conception of the Virgin. In 1892 he succeeded D'Ailli as chancellor of the University of Paris, then in the zenith of its fame. As a theologian, Gerson reverted against scholasticism, and in his many theological tracts uttered his voice against its untenable and useless subtleties. In his De Ref. Theol. (“The Reformation of Theology,” 1400) he urged the study of the Bible and the Fathers. A nominalist in philosophy, he adopted a mystical type of theology. It was, however, not the Gospel method of the fourteenth century, which sought to lose the identity of the individual by a bold flight of the intellect in the Deity, and revelled in fanciful religious emotions. Following Hugo and Richard de St. Victor, he turned the gaze of the soul inward upon its own states, and sought in this way to derive a theory of its laws. He constructed a system consisting of two parts, — De Mys. Theol. Spec. (“Speculative Mysticism”) and De Mys. Theol. Pract. (“Practical Mysticism”). The former is devoted principally to the discussion of questions in psychology, under the heads of sia cognitiva (“the intellect”) and affectione (“will and emotions”). Mystical theology is defined to be a theology of love. Love is the experimental apprehension of God (Experiment. Dei percepitio), and through the instrumentality of love the will becomes submissive to God’s will, and lost in it. Among his many treatises on the mystical life, perhaps the most important is the De Monte Contemplat. (“The Mount of Contemplation”).

But Gerson’s main activity was his attempt to bring order and peace out of the ecclesiastical confusion of his day, and to define the relation of the Church to the Pope. In this latter regard he is the founder of Gallicanism, and the forerunner of Bossuet. The papal schism at one time oppressed him to such a degree, and attempts to heal it seemed to be so hopeless, that he retired from the office of chancellor and public life, and was only induced to return to Paris after five years of seclusion, about the time of the flight of Pope Benedict XIII. (1403). Gerson again devoted himself, by tracts and personal addresses before Benedict, to the task of healing the schism, and securing his submission to the laws of the Church. To his other labors he added those of preserving in print the decrees of the council of Pisa, which the French deputation, first printed in 1536, and afterwards often reprinted — sermons de Gerson, Paris, 1835, 5 vols.; (For the Imitation of Christ, wrongly ascribed to Gerson, see THOMAS À KEMPIS.) Besides the Lives in the editions of his works, by RICHER and DU PIN, see LÉCUY: Essai sur la Vie de Gerson, Paris, 1835, 2 vols.; C. SCHMIDT: Essai sur Gerson, Strassb., 1839; especially SCHWARZ: *Joh. Gerson, Würzburg, 1858; [H. JADART: Jean Gerson, recherches sur son origine, son village natal et sa famille, Rheims, 1882]. See also JOURDAIN: Doct. Gers. de Theol. Mystica, Paris, 1838; BAURHET: Les sermons de Gerson, Paris, 1858. [An edition of his Tractatus de parvulis ad Christ. trahendis appeared in Paris, 1878.]

GERTRUDE is the name of several saintly women known to medieval church-history, of which the most noticeable are, — St. Gertrude, also called “The Great Gertrude” ; b. at Eisleben, Jan. 6, 1256. She entered the monastery of Helfta when she was only five years old, and studied the liberal arts with great eagerness. But Jan. 21, 1281, she had a vision which led her to the study of the Bible and the Fathers. She had afterwards many more visions, of which a kind of report has been given in the Institutiones divinae scripturae, first printed in 1540, and afterwards reprinted. — St. Gertrudis, a daughter of Pippin of Landen (major domus to Clothaire II.) and Itta. After the death of Pippin, in 839, Itta built a large double monastery for male and female recluses at Niviala, the present Nivelle, and made her daughter abbess of it. St. Gertrudis died in 859 or 864, and is still honored in Flanders as the patroness of cats, travellers, and pilgrims. She is represented with rats and mice at her feet, or running up her pastoral staff, or on her dress. See Act. Sanct., March 17.

GERVAISE, François Armand, b. at Paris, 1899; d. there 1751; entered the order of the Barefooted Carmelites, but left them, not finding their rules severe enough, and joined the Trappists in 1695. In the following year he was made Abbot of La Trappe, but resigned in 1698. He was a prolific writer. Of his works the most noticeable is the Histoire générale de l'ordre de Cîteaux en France, Avignon, 1748, which is a sharp attack on the Benedictines, and was much resented by them.

GERVASIUS and PROTASIUS, two brethren who were martyred at Ravenna during the reign of of Nero, and then entirely forgotten until a vision revealed to St. Ambrose the whereabouts of their remains. This vision and the miracles which the relics immediately performed were used as proofs of orthodoxy by St. Ambrose in his contest with the Arians; but the latter had good reason to doubt, and instituted a line of criticism, which, in spite of the emphatic assertions of St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, has found its followers down to our times. See Mosheim, Gibbon, Isaac Taylor (Ancient Christianity), and others. The fanciful legends of the two martyrs are found Act. Somct., June 19.

GESENIUS, Justus, a Lutheran theologian; b. July 6, 1601, at Essbach; d. at Hanover, Sept. 18, 1673. He was court-preacher at Hanover. In 1648 (or 1647) he edited a hymn-book with Denicke, and was the first to change the text of German hymns. (See also Eichhorn.) He was the author of some hymns, one of which (Wenn meine Sünder mich kränken) is popular in Germany.

GESENIUS, Wilhelm, a celebrated Hebrew scholar; b. in Nordhausen, Feb. 3, 1785; d. at Halle, Oct. 23, 1842. He was educated at Helmstädt and Göttingen, where he received in Eichhorn's class-room the impulse to critical and philological studies. His public life began as docent at Göttingen, and in subsequent years he took pleasure in relating that Neander had been his first student in Hebrew. In 1810 he was called to Halle, where he continued during the remainder of his life, in spite of an invitation to become Eichhorn's successor at Göttingen. His lectures were very popular, more than four hundred students at one period crowding to hear them. He made two visits to England (1820, 1835) in the interest of his Oriental studies.

Gesenius' Hebrew Lexicon appeared in two volumes (1810-12). His Hebrew Thesaurus (3 vols.) began to be printed 1826, but was not finished till after his death, under the editorship of his pupil Rödiger. This great work is indeed a store-house full of the most materials in the department of the Hebrew of the Old Testament; but it is to be regretted, that, with his thorough Semitic erudition, he did not include the forms of post-biblical Hebrew. His Grammar appeared in 1813, his Gesch. d. heb. Sprache u. Schrift, 1815, and his Lehrgebäude d. heb. Sprache, 1817. These grammatical labors did not meet with the same general favor as the lexicographical. This was due both to the appearance of other works in this special line, and to the fact that the author did not pursue a strict and philosophical method in his treatment. In 1821 his Commentary on Isaiah appeared in three volumes, and was just at the very period during which the rationalistic mode of exposition had absolute sway. The work deserves to be regarded as one of the best products of that school, being distinguished for philological thoroughness, lucid presentation, and acquaintance with historical criticism, as well as for freedom from dogmatic and apologetic prepossessions. Gesenius belonged to the rationalistic school, but was no partisan. The philological element preponderates in his works. When rationalism began to wane at Halle, he was regarded, on account of his personal influence over the students and the fame of his scholarship, its chief representative. He was one of the principal persons aimed at in the attack against rationalistic teachers, which started in Berlin in 1830. But he held his position, and the complaints ceased. In addition to the works mentioned above, he published Versuch üb. d. malt. Sprache (1810), De pentateuch. Samm. Origine, etc. (1815), De Samaritan. Theol. (1822), Carmina Samaritana (1824), an Edition of Bureckhardt's Travels (1823), Monumenta Phenica (1837). Gesenius also made large contributions to Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie and to the Hallische Literaturzeitung. For a well-prepared sketch of his life, see Gesenius: 'Eine Einleitung für seine Freunde' (by Haym), Berlin, 1842.

[The 8th ed. of Gesenius' Lexicon (Heb. u. Chal. Handw.) appeared Leipzig, 1878, ed. by Mühlau and Volck; the 23d ed. of his Grammar ed. by Kautzsch, Leipzig, 1881. There are English translations of earlier editions of the Lexicon by Eichhorn and Neander. (1.) These remarks begin (Boston, 1855). A thoroughly revised edition of Robinson's translation, on the basis of the 8th ed. of the German original, is preparing by Professors Briggs and Brown of the Union Theological Seminary, New York City. There are English translations of Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, by Moses Stuart, Andover, 1826 (last ed., 1849), T. J. Conant, Boston, 1839 (rev. ed., N. Y., 1855), and by B. Davies, London, 1869 (ed. by E. C. Mitchell, on the basis of the 22d of the original, Andover, 1891).]

GESTA ROMANORUM (Deeds of the Romans), a Latin collection of anecdotes and tales intended primarily for preachers to introduce into their discourses. It was probably of monkish origin. It has great literary interest, because it contains the germs of many famous tales: for the theologian it has value as a revelation of the morals of the times. The various stories are excellent in their tone, and the piety and zeal of the authors are noticeable. The date of the collection may be set down as about the beginning of the fourteenth century: author and nativity are equally unknown. The compositions of the Latin text have been produced by A. Keller (Stuttgart, 1842) and Astery (Berlin, 1872). There is an English translation by Rev. C. Swan, published in Bohn's Antiquarian Library, London, 1877.

GETHESEMANE (oil-press), a place at the foot of Mount Olivet, noted as the scene of our Lord's agony (John xviii. 1; Mark xiv. 28; Luke xxii. 39), is, by a tradition dating back to the fourth century, located about one hundred yards east of the bridge over the Kedron. It consists of a quadrangular spot some seventy paces in circumference, and surrounded with a wall, and contains a flower-garden, with eight very old and venerable olive-trees. As the Latin Church has control of the place, the Greeks have set up a Gethsemane of their own farther up Mount Olivet.

GROERER, August Friedrich, b. at Calw, in the Black Forest, March 5, 1605; d. at Carlsbad, July 10, 1671. He studied at Tübingen, and was appointed librarian at Stuttgart in 1830, and professor of history at Freiburg in 1846. His first works, Gustav Adolf (Stuttgart, 1835-37, 2 vols.) and Geschichte des Urchristentums (Stuttgart, 1838, 8 vols.), represent an independent rationalistic research. But with his Allgemeine Kirchengeschichte (Stuttgart, 1841-46, 4 vols.) he entirely changed position, and, though he did not actually embrace Romanism until 1853, he was long before that time considered one of the leaders of ultramontane Rome. The remainder of his life belong his Geschichte der Karolinger, Freiburg, 1848, 2 vols.;Pastor Gregorius und sein Zeitalter, Schaffhausen, 1850-51, 7 vols., etc.

GIBBON. See GHERL.

GIANTS. Like all nations of antiquity, the Hebrews had also their stories about giants. The word "giants" has different representations in the Hebrew. Thus (Gen. vi. 4) they are called (1) Nephilim. (Gen. xiv. 5) we find (2) the Rehaim. Of his race was Og, King of Bashan, whose "bedstead was nine cubits in length and four cubits in breadth, according to the cubit of a man" (Deut. iii. 11). (3) The Anakim (Num. xiii. 28, 32, 33; Deut. ii. 10). They were destroyed by Joshua (Josh. xi. 22; Judg. 1.20). Another race of giants (4), the Emim, is mentioned in Deut. ii. 10, who dwelt in the country of the Moabites. Another race, known (5) as the Zamzummim, is described Deut. ii. 20, 21. In Job xvi. 14 that authorized version reads, "like a giant;" but the Hebrew word here used is elsewhere translated "a mighty man;" i.e., champion or hero. Comp. the art. Riesen, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop.

GIBBON, Edward, the author of The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; b. at Putney, Surrey, April 27, 1737; d. in London, Jan. 16, 1794. His early education was often interrupted by ill health. He entered Oxford University, 1752, but was expelled, after fourteen months, because of his (temporary) conversion to Roman Catholicism (June 8, 1753), due to reading Bossuet's Variations of Protestantism, when he was consecrated Bishop of Lincoln 1715, and of last words of his History; and the last volume appeared April 27, 1788. The original edition was in six quarto volumes. Its sale was remarkable, indeed unprecedented. The historian's life was brief. He had nothing to live for, now that his life-work was done. The loss of intimate friends, and a physical malady, saddened the close of his days.

Of his History it is superfluous to speak. It has been put in the first rank by universal suffrage. The historians of every land unite in its praise. Later researches have confirmed its judgments, and corrected but few statements. It probably never will be antiquated. Its period extends from the middle of the second century to 1453. The only charge which has been successfully brought against it is that it betrays an unfriendly animus to Christianity. He had so little sympathy with the aims of the Church, that it was not to be expected that he would throw the mantle of charity over the foibles and failings of churchmen. In regard to the famous fifteenth and sixteenth chapters, which relate to the rise and spread of Christianity, wherein its success is explained by reference to secondary causes, and the severity of its early trials declared to have been over-estimated, it may be remarked, that Gibbon himself admitted that his array of secondary causes left the question of the divine origin of Christianity untouched; and, now that the smoke of the battle against this portion of the History has cleared away, church historians allow the substantial justness of his main positions. It was, of course, not Gibbon's intention to write a church history; but, in spite of himself, he has traversed the ground, and also, however unwilling he might be, it remains true, that, "in tracing the gradual decline and fall of imperial Rome, he has involuntarily become a witness to the gradual growth and triumph of the religion of the cross." See Schaff: Church History, revised ed., vol. i. p. 47.

The best edition of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire is that published by Murray of London, 1854 (again 1872), 8 vols. (reprinted by Harper and Brothers, New York, 1880, 6 vols.), edited by Dr. William Smith, who has incorporated the notes of Guizot, Wainzek, and Milman. His Miscellaneous Works, with Memoirs of his Life and Writings, composed by himself, illustrated from his Letters, with occasional Notes and Narrative, appeared in new ed., 1837. His Autobiography, one of the best ever written, is prefixed to the editions of his History and Miscellanies mentioned above, and also published separately in the Choice Autobiographies, ed. by W. D. Howells, Boston, 1878.

GIBERTI, Giovanni Matteo, b. at Palermo, 1495; d. at Verona, 1543; was made bishop of the latter place in 1524. He was one of those Italian prelates, who, before the Council of Trent, showed a serious interest for the reform of the Church, drawing his inspiration from Erasmus, Raffaello, and exercising considerable influence on Carlo Borromeo. His works (Constitutiones Giber- tine, Monitiones generales, Editae selecta, etc.) were edited by Pietro Ballerini, who also wrote his life (Verona, 1738).

GIBSON, Edmund, D.D., b. at Bampton, in Westmoreland, 1669; d. at Bath, Sept. 6, 1748; was consecrated Bishop of Lincoln 1715, and of London 1728; ordered Dr. Mead's edition of Saintius' Restitutio Christianiæ to be burnt 1729.
He translated Camden's Britannia (1695), edited Sir Henry Spelman's posthumous works (1689), and compiled Corpus juris ecclesiastici Anglicani, or the statutes, constitution, canons, rubrics, and articles of the Church of England (1713, reprinted at Oxford, 1781, 2 vols. folio),
d. preacher against Popery (1738, 3 vols. folio), consisting of writings on the subject by eminent English divines during James II.'s reign. Dr.

GICHTEL, Johann Georg, b. at Regensburg,
May 14, 1658; d. at Amsterdam, Jan. 21, 1710; studied law at Strassburg; settled at Spires, and began a brilliant career as an advocate, but was by his acquaintance, J. E. von Betz, led astray into a mist of fantastic mysticism and ascetic theosophy, from which he never escaped. Expelled, he was publicly on account of an open letter to the preachers of Nuremberg and Regensburg, he spent most of his time at Zwolle with Friedrich Breckling, and in Amsterdam with Antoinette Bourignon and the Labadists. His writings have been collected in seven volumes, under the title of Theosophia practica.

GIDEON (גִּדִּיָּה), one of the more illustrious judges of Israel and of the tribe of Manasseh. His history is recorded in the sixth to the eighth chapters of Judges. The occasion of his public appearance as judge was the severity of the Midianitish oppression, which lasted seven years. He received a divine call under the terre-bineh in Ophrah (vi. 11), and built an altar there in commemoration of God's recollection of his people. He struck at idolatry by destroying the altar of Baal, for which he received the title
His great achievement was the defeat of the Midianites, who had encamped in large numbers on the plain of Jezreel. The tribes of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulon, and Naphtali acknowledged him as leader. But Gideon first demanded a sign, and received the famous signs of the fleece, before undertaking the campaign (vi. 36-40). God was determined to show that it was His power which delivered Israel, and so reduced the army from thirty-two thousand to three hundred. The commander was encouraged by overhearing in the Midianite camp the story of the dream of the barley-cake (vii. 13); and the following night, by the stratagem of the trumpets and lamps, threw the enemy into a panic, and completely routed them. For similar instances see 2 Chron. xx. 23, Hag. ii. 22. In his pursuit of the flying army, the cities of Succoth and Penuel refused him provisions, for which, on his return, he severely punished them (Judg. viii. 13-17).

Of the subsequent forty years (Judg. viii. 28)
of Gideon's official activity, little is recorded. He refused the title of king, but instituted a special worship at Ophrah (vii. 27). He was perhaps led to do this by the fact that the national place
of worship was in the proud tribe of Ephraim.
Gideon made an ephod, which he probably wore himself as priest. It proved a snare to his tribe
and people, who were led thereby into an idolatrous worship (perhaps of the Urim and Thum-mim on the ephod). Gideon's heroism was long remembered after his death (Ps. cxliii. 9, 11;
Isa. ix. 4, x. 26; Heb. xi. 28). [See the Commentaries on Judges, and Canon Farrar's article
in Smith's Bible Dict.]

GIESELER, Johann Karl Ludwig, b. at Petershagen, near Minden, March 3, 1788; d. at Gött-ingen, July 7, 1854. He studied at Halle, fought in the 17, of liberation 1813, and was appointed director of the gymnasmium of Gotha in 1818.
His principal work is his Church-History, in its kind one of the most remarkable productions of German learning, distinguished by its immense erudition, accuracy, and careful selection of passages from the sources which constitute the body of the work in the form of footnotes, while the text is a meagre skeleton down to 1648. First volume appeared 1824; fifth and last (containing his lectures, and treating the period from 1814 to the present time) 1855, after his death. No less than three English translations have been published of this work,—one after the earlier editions, by Cunningham (Philadelphia, 1836, 3 vols.); and two after the last edition, by Davidson (Edinburgh, 1848-56, 5 vols.), and by H. B. Smith
(New York, 1857-91, 5 vols.), completed by Miss Mary Robinson. Among his other productions are, Dogmengeschichte (posthumous, 1855), Versuch über die Entstehung der schriftlichen Evangelien (his first book, 1818, and a death-blow to the theory of one primal gospel, Urevangelium); Unruhen in
d. niederland.-ref. Kirche (1840); Uber die Lehranzen Weisagung (1840), etc. Redepenning wrote a Life of him in the last volume of the Church-History.

GIFTS, Spiritual (Charismata). The old Protestant theologians understood by this term the endowment to perform miraculous works,—such as the speaking with tongues, healing the sick, raising the dead,—and limited it to the primitive Church. This is still the view of the Protestant Church, which regards these gifts either as forfeited by the Church's guilt (Irvingism), or extinguished by God as no longer necessary. The Catholic Church regards the miracles of the saints as the result of their continuance. They are special endowments of the Holy Spirit, and not merely the characteristic faculties of the individual as they appear in various forms of activity subsequent to conversion, as Baur would have it.

Nothing definite as to the nature of the charismawaga is to be drawn from the etymology. The term outside of the Pauline Epistles is only used twice,—once by Philo (De Alleg. ii. 75), and once by Peter (1 Pet. iv. 10). It gets from charis (grace) the special meaning of a gracious gift in two cases, the pardon of sin (Rom. v. 15), and eternal life (Rom. vii. 23). From which, on his return, he severely punished them (Judg. viii. 13-17).

Of the subsequent forty years (Judg. viii. 28)
of Gideon's official activity, little is recorded. He refused the title of king, but instituted a special worship at Ophrah (vii. 27). He was perhaps led to do this by the fact that the national place
of worship was in the proud tribe of Ephraim.
Gideon made an ephod, which he probably wore himself as priest. It proved a snare to his tribe
and people, who were led thereby into an idolatrous worship (perhaps of the Urim and Thum-mim on the ephod). Gideon's heroism was long remembered after his death (Ps. cxliii. 9, 11;
Isa. ix. 4, x. 26; Heb. xi. 28). [See the Commentaries on Judges, and Canon Farrar's article
in Smith's Bible Dict.]

Oehser.
characteristic of the state of grace. Neander is right when he defines the charisma as a capacity in which the power and activity of the indwelling Spirit are present; this capacity immediately imparted by the Spirit, or merely a natural capacity sanctified and enlarged by the principle of the new life. The comprehensive definition, then, would be as follows: charismata are capacities and aptitudes necessary for the edification of the Church, and produced by the Holy Spirit, in consequence of which individuals are enabled to use their natural endowments in the service of the Church, and are furnished with new powers to effect this end.

The charismata are the necessary preparation for the administration of offices in the Church; and Christians may themselves become charismata (1 Cor. xii. 28). Church offices are not something distinct from them (1 Cor. xii. 5), as Thiersch and others hold, but impossible without charismatic endowment. The question then arises, To what extent are the charismata permanent in the Church? Their number is as various as the needs of the case; among the latter is the requirement of 1 Cor. xii., nor of Eph. iv., nor Rom. xii. can be regarded as exhaustive. But those are permanent which are necessary for the government of the Church, and those temporary which had a miraculous element, as the miraculous gifts of the apostles. But among the latter is not to be included the "gift of proclaiming the gospel so as to produce faith" (Weiss). The apostolic charismata bear the same relation to those of the ministry, that the apostolic office does to the pastoral office, and consist in the power to lay the foundations of the Church. They are therefore not repeated, as the Irvingites hold, for there are no circumstances calling for their repetition. [The fullest list of the charismata, or spiritual gifts, is given in 1 Cor. xii.,—speaking with tongues, working miracles, gifts of healing, knowledge, etc.] See DAVID SCHULZ: D. Geisteszaben d. ersten Christen, Berlin, 1799; HELMANN: V. d. Charismen im Allgemeinen, etc., Regensb., 1818; The Histories of the Ap. Ch., by TRAUTMANN, Leip., 1848 [NEANDER und SCHAF].

GIFTTHEIL, Ludwig Friedrich, son of an abbot in Wurttemberg, and noted for his fanatical declamations against the State Church. The date of his birth is not known; but his literary activity belongs to the period of the Thirty-Years' War; and he died in Amsterdam, 1661. He stood in connection with Brecklin and other persons of the same description, published letters of warning to the king of England (1643-44) and to Cromwell, whom he styled "field-marshal of the devil, street-robbet, thief, and murderer," and wrote in 1647 Declarlation aus Orient, etc. See Böhme: Acht Bücher von der Reformation der Kirche in England, Altona, 1734. [HAGENBACH.

GIHON. See Eden, Jerusalem.

GIYORÉ (Gilbert Porretanus), b. at Poitiers, 1070; d. there 1154; studied philosophy in the school of Chartres; was afterwards a teacher there, and became bishop of his native city in 1142. He was a virtuoso in dialectics, and wrote commentaries on Plato, Aristotle, and Boethius; but to the mystics he naturally appeared as the champion of a dangerous rationalism. Walter of St. Victor called him one of the "four labyrinths of France," Abelard, Pierre de Poitiers, and Petrus Lombardus, being the three others; and on account of his commentary on Boetius de Trinitate, printed in the Basel edition of "Boethius"'s works (1570), Bernard of Clairveaux accused him of heresy. The case was tried at the councils of Paris and Rheims (1148), in the presence of Eugenius III.; but, though the Pope accepted Bernard's counter propositions against Gilbert, he did not officially confirm them, and Gilbert returned unmolested to his see.

GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM, founder of the order of the Gilbertines, or Sempringham canons (Ordo Gilbertinorum Canoniconorum, or Ordo Sempringensis); b. about 1083, at Sempringham, Lincolnshire, of a Norman noble family; d. there Feb. 4, 1180. He was ordained a priest and pastor of Sempringham-Tirington, in 1123; in 1135 he built a convent for the shelter of seven destitute girls, and shortly after was called upon to establish others for numerous parts of England. To the nuns he gave the Benedictine rule. In 1148 he was refused permission by Pope Eugenius III. to merge all these monasteries in the Cistercian order, and therefore they were per force independent. At the time of his death the order possessed eighteen hundred members (seven hundred males, eleven hundred females), thirteen double monasteries with hospitals, almshouses, and orphanages attached; seven hundred monasteries in the Cistercian order, and therefore they were per force independent. At the time of his death the order possessed eighteen hundred members (seven hundred males, eleven hundred females), thirteen double monasteries with hospitals, almshouses, and orphanages attached; when suppressed by Henry VIII., it possessed twenty-five monasteries. In the Hollandist Acta Sacro, Feb. 4, Gilbert appears as the author of the Gilbertinorum Statute and Exhortations ad Fratres. He was canonized by Innocent III. 1202, and is commemorated Feb. 4. See HURTER: Gesch. des Innocenz III. u. seiner Zeitgenossen, Gotte, 1834—42, 4 vols. ZÖCKLER.

GILBOA (bubbling fountain), a mountain-range east of the plain of Jezreel, the present Jebel Faktu'a, bleak and bare, 1,717 feet high, and for the most part very steep, running east south-east for about ten miles; was the place where Saul and his three sons were slain in battle against the Philistines the day after his visit to the witch of Endor (1 Sam. xxviiii. 4; 1 Chron. x. 1; 2 Sam. i. 21).

GILDAS, the oldest and the only extant of the historians of the ancient Britons; wrote a Historia and an Epistola, in which he gives a record of the British history under the Romans, and from their withdrawal to his own time. Though these works have been quoted by Bede, Alcuin, William of Newbury, Geoffrey of Monmouth, and Giraldrus Cambrensis, no reliable biographical notice of the author exists. The legends from the later middle ages are mere fiction. It seems, however, that he was born in Gile, became a monk in the monastery of Bangor, and died 570. The best of the preserved works is that by Stevenson, London, 1888. Translations have been made by Habington, London, 1838, and by Giles, London, 1841, republished, with additions, in Bohn's Six Old English Chronicles.

GILEAD. See Tribes of Israel.

GILES, St. (the same as the Greek Alydis; Latin, Egidius; Italian, Egidio. Spanish, Gil; and French, Gillier, b. in Greece, 640; d. before 725, in a monastery on the Rhone. He came to the coast of Provence about 665, and lived a hermit's life till 670, when he went still deeper into the forest, where he was discovered by the king, Wamba (Flavius), under these circumstances: one day the hind upon whose milk the saint was nourished, wounded by an arrow, sought refuge from the king's dogs in the cavern occupied by the saint. The king on coming up was much struck by the sight of the saint kneeling, with the wounded animal by his side, and desired the holy man to attend upon him at court. St. Giles obeyed, but did not stay long; for in 673 he was again in the forest, and founded a monastery which bore his name. His reputation for sanctity was extraordinary. Miracles were likewise attributed to him. He once refused treatment for an accidental lameness, in order that his pain and inconvenience might be a trial to his flesh, and is therefore honored as the patron saint of cripples. He has churches in all parts of Europe, many in Great Britain. In art he is portrayed as an old man, with a long white beard, on whose lap, or at whose feet, is a hind wounded by an arrow through its neck. He is commemorated Sept. 1. His relics are in St. Sernin's, Toulouse. See Smith and Wace: Dict. Chr. Biog., art. Egidius.

GILFILLAN, George, a popular writer of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland; b. at Comrie, Perthshire, Scotland, Jan. 30, 1813; d. Aug. 13, 1878. After study at Glasgow University, he was ordained pastor of a Secession congregation at Dundee, in March, 1836. Beginning with Five Discourses (1839), he issued many volumes of popular literary criticism, which have had a large circulation. His best work is Bards of the Bible (1851, 8th ed., 1874), which attempts to be "a poem on the Bible," with, however, questionable success; for he indulges too much in rhapsody, and lowers, while attempting to revivify, the heroes of the past. His life was laborious, spiritual, and useful. As a preacher and lecturer he was successful, not alone in attracting numbers, but in making a profound impression by his thrilling eloquence.

GILL, John, D.D., a learned Baptist divine and biblical expositor; b. Nov. 23, 1697, at Kettering, Northamptonshire, where his father preached to a mixed congregation of Dissenters; d. Oct. 14, 1771, at Camberwell. His school education was limited; but by private study he acquired much knowledge, and is said to have learned Hebrew without any assistance. After preaching for a time in Higham Ferrers, he was called in 1720 to the Baptist church at Horsleydown, near London. Dr. Gill was a profound theologian and a voluminous author. He was one of the leading advocates of his day of Hyper-Calvinism, but a vigorous opponent of infant-baptism (against Jonathan Dickinson and others). He published one of the ablest answers to Whitby's Five Points, under the title The Cause of God and Truth (4 vols., 1735-36). The same views are stated in his Body of Divinity, 2 vols., 1708 (new ed., Lond., 1838), to which he added a volume on Practical Divinity (1770). Like Dr. Dwight's Theology, it contained the substance of sermons preached from the pulpit. Of his advocacy of Calvinism, Toplady said, "Certainly no man has treated that momentous subject, the system of divine grace, in all its branches more closely, judiciously, and successfully." Dr. Gill's great work was his Exposition of the New Testament (1746-48, in 8 vols.) and of the Old Testament (1763-76, in 6 vols.). His first effort in this department was an Exposition of Solomon's Song, which he preached from the pulpit in 1724, and published in 1728. This commentary is enriched with the stores of rabbinical learning. Mr. Spurgeon calls it "in valuable in its own line of things." It is still useful for homiletic purposes, but pursues the allegorizing method to an extreme. The best edition of Gill's commentary is in 9 vols., Phila., 1811-19, with a full Memoir. Kirroon: Brief Memoir of the Life and Writings of J. Gill, 1839.

GILLESPIE, George, one of the four Scotch commissioners to the Westminster Assembly of Divines; was the son of a clergyman; b. at Kirkcaldy, Jan. 21, 1613; d. at Kirkcaldy, Dec. 17, 1648. He studied at St. Andrew's, and in 1638 was ordained pastor at Wemyss, whence in 1644 he was translated to Edinburgh. In 1644 he was chosen a member of the Westminster Assembly. He was the youngest member of that body, but proved himself to be one of its closest reasoners, and one of its readiest and most able debaters. He was always listened to with attention, and opposed at times, with success, even the great learning of Lightfoot and Selden. The story is told, that when the Assembly came to the question in the Shorter Catechism, "What is God?" all declined to give a definition except Gillespie, who was hit upon as being the youngest member. He reluctantly consented, but called upon the body to unite with him in prayer before attempting it. His very first words of invocation were taken down, and incorporated as the best possible human answer. In 1646 he was moderator of the General Assembly of Scotland. His brilliant and meteoric career was cut short at the early age of thirty-five. In 1637 he put forth The English Popish Ceremonies obtruded upon the Church of Scotland (a work which attracted much attention), and in 1641 Assertion of the Government of the Church of Scotland (in which he brings keenness of argument and able and effectual work against the "Independent Scheme"). His ablest work, Aaron's Rod blossoming, or the Divine Ordinance of Church-Government vindicated (pp. 500), appeared in London 1646, and was directed against Erastianism. The best edition of these and Gillespie's other works is by Londonston, 2 vols., Edinb., 1844-46, with a Memoir.

GILLESPIE, Thomas, b. in the parish of Duddingston, Midlothian, Scotland, in 1708; d. at Dunfermline, Jan. 19, 1774. In connection with Boston of Jedburgh, and Collier of Colinsburgh, he organized in 1761 the so-called "Presbytery of Relief" (i.e., "from the tyranny and the yoke of patronage and the church courts"), because, having been deposed for contumacy in refusing conscientiously to attend presbytery meetings called to ordain an unacceptable minister, his persistent efforts to be re-admitted were rejected. See Life of the United Presbyterian Church, Edinburgh, 1849.

GILLETT, Ezra Hall, D.D., a distinguished American Presbyterian divine and historian; b. at Colchester, Conn., July 15, 1823; d. in New-York City, Sept. 2, 1875. After graduating at Yale College (1841) and Union Theological Seminary (1844), he became pastor of a Presbyterian church in Harlem (1846), which he left in 1866 to enter politics. He was a prolific writer, and his works—Topography in America, Itinerarium Cambriae, Speculum Ecclesiae, Epiphanius, etc.—have their value, in spite of his credulity and vanity. They were best edited by Brewer and Dimock, Lond., 1860-77, in 7 vols. [Of his Itin. Camb. there is a translation, with a life of Giralduc, and notes, by R. C. Hoare, Lond., 1866, in 2 vols.]
GILPIN.

GIRDLE, among the Hebrews. One of the essential articles of dress in the East, worn alike both by men and women, was the girdle. There were different kinds of girdles, corresponding to their equivalents in the Hebrew. There was (1) the ezor, denoting something bound, which was worn by men of different states (comp. 2 Kings i. 8; Job xii. 18; Isa. v. 27; Jer. xiii. 1; Ezek. xxiii. 15); (2) the abnet, or the girdle of sacerdotal and state officers, especially worn by the priests about the close-fitting tunic (Exod xxviii. 36, xxxix. 29); (3) the kvishurim, mentioned Isa. iii. 20, which seems to have been a girdle worn by women. In general the girdle was made of leather (2 Kings i. 8; Matt. iii. 4). The nobles wore girdles of linen, four fingers broad, and embossed or studded with all kinds of precious stones, or pearls, or metals (Dan. x. 5). It was fastened by a clasp or buckle of gold or silver, or tied in a knot. Men wore the girdle about the loins; whilst the women, having generally their girdle looser than that of the men, wore it about the hips, except when they were actively engaged (Prov. xxxi. 17). The military girdle was worn about the waist; the sword or dagger was suspended from it (Judg. iii. 18; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ps. xiv. 3). Here girding up the loins denotes preparation for battle (1 Kings, xviii. 46; 2 Kings iv. 29); whilst to “loose the girdle” was to give way to repose and indolence (Isa. v. 27). It was a token of great confidence and assurance to loose the girdle, and this was the word to another (1 Sam. xviii. 4). Girdles were used as a kind of purse (Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8); and inkhorns were also carried in them (Ezek. ix. 2).

GLANVL.

Joseph, a philosophical divine of the Church of England; b. in Plymouth 1636; d. in Bath, Nov. 4, 1690. After graduation at Oxford he took orders, and was for a time chaplain to the king; in 1666 elected to the Royal Society, of which he was a vigorous defender, and in 1678 appointed a prebendary of Worces- ter. He was the leader of the philosophical sceptics, who “attacked all philosophy by denying the self-evident and authoritative character of its original categories and axioms, and resolved all trustworthy knowledge into the vague operations of experience, supplemented by the testimony of revelation, or into what could be verified by physical experiment.” But his motive in favoring scepticism is to be found in his passion against all attacks. His principal work was Scippsis Scientifica, or Confess Ignorance the Way to Science, an Essay of the Vanity of Dogmatizing and Confident Opinion (Lond., 1665), which was an enlargement of his first work, The Vanity of Dogmatizing (1661). He believed in witches, and wrote Philosophical Considerations, or the Existence of Sorcerers and Sorcery (1666), and...
Sadducimus Triumphans, or a Full and Plain Evidence concerning Witches and Apparitions (ed. by Dr. Henry More, who gave an account of his life and writings, 1631, 2d ed., 1682).

GLASS, John, b. in Fifeshire, Augt. 21, 1695; d. at Dundee, 1773; minister of the kirk at Tealing, 1719; deposed by the General Assembly in 1728, in consequence of his publication, in the previous year, of a book in which he maintained that an Established Church was contrary to the gospel. He gathered a sect called in Scotland Glassites, but in England and America Sanhedrims (which see). His works appeared at Edinburgh, 1761, 2d ed., Perth, 1782, 5 vols.

GLASSIUS, Salome, b. at Sondershausen, 1593; d. at Gotha, July 27, 1656; studied theology, especially the Semitic languages, at Jena and Wittenberg, and was made professor of theology at Jena in 1637, and superintendent-general of Saxe-Gotha in 1640. His principal work was his Philologia Sacra, a combination of a critical and historical introduction to the Bible and a biblical hermeneutics. It appeared in 1625, was much appreciated at its time, and often reprinted. The general theological standpoint of the author forms a transition from the old orthodoxy to the Pietism of Spener.

GLEFT (church land), most commonly the land belonging to a parish church, besides the tithes. There are several important statutes in relation to glebes, dating from the reign of Henry VIII. Originally every church had a house for the minister, and a glebe: indeed, there could be no consecration where these were not.

GLORIA PATRIS, see DOXOLOGY.

GLORY. See NIMBUS.

GLOSSES, Biblical. The word "gloss," which is derived from the Greek glossa, denotes not only tongue and language, but was also used among grammarians to denote any note appended to a word or phrase for the purpose of interpretation or illustration. Works containing such glosses, or "glossaries," comprised not only the wide range of philology, but also science, medicine, geography, etc., and even the sacred literature of the Bible. Notes thereon were called "sacred glosses." Before, however, such glosses were noted down, the text of the Bible had been the subject of exegetical studies; and the word "glosses," which among the Greeks denoted "the word to be interpreted," was used among the Latins for the "explanation itself." In the latter sense it was used among the Christian writers of the middle ages, and is still used in our own days.

Almost as old as writing itself is the habit of placing annotations in the margin, either explanatory or otherwise, of the text. This was especially the case with the Bible; partly because it was read more than any other book, partly because it was read by such who needed an explanation, or believed themselves fit for making explanations. At first very brief, often confined to a single word, these glosses grew finally into more extended remarks. In the Hebrew codices these glosses were the source of not a few of the keri readings; and the glosses on the margins of the codices of the Septuagint and the New Testament have given rise to many of the readings which exist in both of these, an elimination of which requires sound and cautious judgment. The more difficult the understanding of the sacred writings was regarded, the longer were the marginal annotations (glosses marginales), which were especially made on the text of the Vulgate,—some grammatical, some historical, some theological, some allegorical and mystical. The most famous collection of these glosses marginales is that of Walafrid Strabo, made in the ninth century, which became the great exegetical thesaurus of the middle ages, and was known as the Glossa Ordinaria. Besides notes being written in the margin, there were also such as were written between the lines (glosses interlinearis) and a collection of the latter was made by Anselm of Laon in the beginning of the twelfth century. Both works were often printed together. In the last century special attention was given to these glosses: such is the work of Ernesti, entitled Glossae Sacrae, Leipzig, 1785.

Glosses, or, as they are usually denominated, additions, and their practical application was at the same time in a vourered. The teachers, however, did not confine themselves to lecturing: a literary activity also developed. Explanations of single words or phrases, and illustrations of positive facts or relations, were put down in the form of short notes, glosses between the lines (interlinear glosses) or in the margin (marginal glosses); and, besides such short notes, the glossatores also produced summæ (or surveys of the contents of a chapter), causæ (or fictitious cases illustrative of certain principles), questions, distinction, etc. From the Roman law this method was transferred to canon law, and flourished among the canonists of the University of Paris no less than among the legists of Bologna. Several of the pupils of Gratian wrote glosses on his decreetum: and in 1212 Johannes Teutonicus undertook to gather these glosses into a continuous commentary on the decreetum, called an apparatus, or glosa ordinaria. Similar glossa ordinaria were also made to the decreets of Gregory IX., the Liber sextus, the Clementines, and Extravagantes, and are of great value, not only scientific, but also historical. See SAPT: De claris archivermasini Bonon. profesoribus, 1789. WASSERSCHLEBBEN.
GLOUCESTER. 877

GNOSTICISM.

GLOUCESTER, capital city of the county of the same name; situated on the Severn, 106 miles north-west from London; population 18,350; founded by the Romans under the name of Aulus Plautius; called by the Saxons Gleannasteor; is one of the most famous cities of England. Here was the favorite residence of Edward the Confessor and the Norman kings; here Charles I. was received by Parliament. Here the first Sunday school was instituted, the first one being held by Robert Raines, 1781. Its cathedral dates from the eleventh century, and the diocese of Gloucester from 1541. Among its famous bishops may be mentioned Hooper (1530-55) and Warburton (1739-79). Since 1838 it has been consolidated with Bristol. The present episcopal income is five thousand pounds per annum, and the incumbent (1882) is Dr. Charles John Ellicott, who was consecrated in 1863.

GNAHPEUS, Wilhelmus (Fulonius), b. at The Hague, 1493; d. at Norden, Sept. 9, 1568; a noticeable Dutch humanist; was rector of the gymnasia of his native city, but joined the reformatory movement; was twice imprisoned by the Romanists, and finally compelled to flee the country. He went to Prussia, first as rector of a school in Elburg, then as director of the pedagogicium in Königsberg. But he found no more tolerance among the Lutherans of Prussia than among the Romanists of his home. Though he was not a theologian, he was dragged from one theological disputation into another, condemned for heresy, as he belonged to the Reformed confession, excommunicated, and banished, 1547. He found a refuge in Friesland.

GNOSTICISM, an ecletic philosophy of the first Christian centuries, which constructed its systems out of Pagan, Jewish, and Christian elements, and clothed its ideas in mythological drapery. The term is originally derived from gnostos, or "knowledge," which Paul uses for a deep acquaintance with God's purpose in redempion (1 Cor. xiii. 21). Lipsius has shown that the Syrian-Ophite Gnostics first bore the name in a pre-eminent sense. Irenæus states, speaking of the whole sect, that the Carpocratians, one of the chief systems, received the title of the Gospel from the angels. But the Gnostics, in fact, and the early development of a Christian philosophy in Alexandria, led us to the conclusion that it was used at a very early date in that city. Gnostos was used in contrast not only to pieta, or "faith," but also to the Pagan philosophia.

Gnosticism was the resultant of two processes, starting from different directions, — the contact of the Church, on the one side, with Pagan thought; and the attempt of philosophy, on the other, to harmonize Christian revelation with its own systems. It gave up the monotheism of the Son of God for the law of nature, and allegorized away, in part or in whole, the great facts of Christ's work and person. Gnosticism drew largely from the Greek systems of Plato and the Stoics; but that which is characteristic was derived from Oriental religions. It incorporated their dualism; while Greek philosophy, for the most part, favors the Pantheistic conception of the universe. As a rule, it represented individual life as the result of a process of emanation from the original essence; while Greek speculation taught a process of development by evolution in an ascending scale from chaos. Unlike Greek systems, its thought was not methodical, but poetical, and charged with Oriental imagery and freedom. The Gnostics, likewise, showed their preference for Oriental mythologies in the names of the angels. Parseeism with its fully-developed idea of God as light, Chaldaean astrology (in Bardeanes and Saturninus here transferred by him with its ascetic tendency, — all combined with the Syrian and Phenician mythologies to give to Gnosticism its Oriental coloring.

The principal task which Gnosticism proposed for itself was to lead man by speculative knowledge to salvation. The chief questions which pressed upon it for solution were how the human spirit became imprisoned in matter, and how it might be emancipated. The former is almost synonymous with the question concerning the origin of evil; which Tertullian, with other polemical writers, regarded as the main subject of Gnostic thought. In the latter, the purification and deliverance of the soul, it agitated one of the profoundest thoughts of Christianity.

Influenced by Hellenic philosophy, the Gnostics subordinated the will to knowledge, and represented experimental Christianity as knowledge rather than faith, and made knowledge the standard of the moral condition. They would have changed the consecution of Christ's words in Matt. v. 8 to the statement, "They that see God are pure in heart." They were influenced by the aristocratic class-feeling of the Greek philosopher, who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes, — spiritual (nystes, pneumatikos), psychic, and carnal (chudos, carnich, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instinct. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire. Peter. Who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes, — spiritual (nystes, pneumatikos), psychic, and carnal (chudos, carnich, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instinct. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire. Peter. Who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes, — spiritual (nystes, pneumatikos), psychic, and carnal (chudos, carnich, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instinct. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire. Peter. Who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes, — spiritual (nystes, pneumatikos), psychic, and carnal (chudos, carnich, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instinct. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire. Peter. Who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes, — spiritual (nystes, pneumatikos), psychic, and carnal (chudos, carnich, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instinct. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire. Peter. Who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes, — spiritual (nystes, pneumatikos), psychic, and carnal (chudos, carnich, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instinct. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire. Peter. Who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes, — spiritual (nystes, pneumatikos), psychic, and carnal (chudos, carnich, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instinct. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire. Peter. Who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes, — spiritual (nystes, pneumatikos), psychic, and carnal (chudos, carnich, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instinct. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire. Peter. Who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes, — spiritual (nystes, pneumatikos), psychic, and carnal (chudos, carnich, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instinct. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire. Peter. Who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humil...
Different writers have endeavored to derive the various phases of Gnosticism from a single leading principle. Baur finds it in the idea of the absolute religion of which it treats when it discusses the agreements and disagreements of Christianity on the one hand, and Paganism and Judaism on the other. Lipsius finds it in the distinction between knowledge and faith. Without denying this antithesis, Neander and Hilgenfeld represent the person of the World-Creator as the point of departure. This mythological figure is called by Valentinus (following Plato), Demiurge; by Basilides, Archon; and by Ophitic sects, Jaldabaoth, or Son of Chaos. This is, at any rate, the most characteristic figure in Gnostic systems, and concentrates in itself its most important ideas. The introduction of this being between God and the visible universe grows out of the antithesis of God and matter. This speculative chasm between it and God. The description of the God of the Old Testament. He Demiurges is almost invariably represented as having a very subordinate activity, compared with God (and Justinus is the only one who even ascribes to him a spiritual or pneumatic nature), and then he is devoid of the foreknowledge of God. The spirit which proceed from God are high above him. He belongs to the world, and marks the chasm between it and God. The description of his creative work draws largely from the first chapters of Genesis. He is the God of the Jews. But his kingdom is broken into by the kingdom of Satan and by that of spiritual or pneumatic life.

The classification of Gnostic sects offers much difficulty. Since the discovery of Hippolytus, the difficulty has become greater on account of the additional systems he brings to our notice. He also has made it apparent that the Pantheistic conception also had some currency, as well as the Dualistic, among the Gnostics. Gieselher groups them into Alexandrian, in which Platonic influences are potent, and Syrian, in which there is a stronger Dualism. But, by his own confession, the system of the Syrian Marcion does not favor this division. The classification, on the basis of religious influence, which Hase makes into Oriental, Hellenic, Christian, and Jewish, is inexact. Lipsius, on the double basis of date of origin and characteristics, distinguishes three stadia: (1) Early Gnosticism, in which elements of Syrian mythologies were blended with the Judeo-Christian ideas; (2) Hellenic Gnosticism, beginning with the assumed transition of Basilides to Alexandria; (3) A stage in which speculation wanes, and the conflict of Gnosticism against faith ceases. Here belongs Marcion. The alleged transition from a Syrian to Hellenic Gnosticism in Basilides is not borne out by facts. The two developed contemporaneously. In Alexandria, Gnosticism was strong as early as the middle of the second century. Cerinthus began his career there; and, if we follow the account of Hippolytus, Basilides belonged there. Baur arranges the systems thus: (1) Such as combine Christianity with Judaism and Paganism (Basilides, Valentinus, the Ophites); (2) Such as oppose Christianity to both (Marcion); (3) Such as, identifying Judaism and Christianity, oppose them to Paganism (Clementine Homilies).

A better grouping than either of these is Neander's, who distinguishes two main classes,—the Judaizing and Anti-Judaistic. We prefer a classification based upon historic development, and distinguish (1) The period of apocalyptic Gnosticism at the close of the first century, (2) The period of greatest fertility of speculation till the middle of the third, (3) The period of decay in which there is little of original thought after the fifth century there are no new systems, (4) The revival of Gnostic ideas about the seventh century in the sect of the Cathari. We shall here concern ourselves only with the first two classes.

Gnosticism exerted a powerful reflex influence upon the Church. When the Church was about to sink into a stagnant literalism, and into formalism of life, the idealistic speculation of the Gnostics gave her an impulse towards thought, and a more comprehensive discussion of doctrine. The consequence was, that those points in which Christianity is distinguished from Judaism and Paganism were investigated and emphasized. The Alexandrian school of theologians, who more than equalled the Gnostics in depth of speculative thought, was one evidence of the new life. Not altogether free from the error of finding the essence of Christianity in knowledge, it was Christian in tone, both of doctrine and morality. It borrowed from the rich speculations of Greek philosophy, but held aloof from Oriental theosophy. The influence of Gnosticism was not only good in arousing the Church to a clearer definition of her fundamental doctrines; it gave also the stimulus to exegetical labors by itself leading the way. Basilides and Heracleon were the first to comment upon whole Gospels. The Gnostics also preceded in the department of religious poetry. Learning, as she did, from Gnosticism, the Church, on the other hand, gathered more closely about her bishops, and emphasized more strongly her distinctive doctrines, peculiar rites, and apostolic origin.

[Gnosticism was the Rationalism of the ancient Church. It was an effort of profound speculative thought to bring about a union with reason. It brought forward the distinguishing principles of Hellenic philosophy, Oriental theosophy, and the Jewish religion, and compared the great ideas of Christianity with them. Christianity was often clothed in fantastic drapery, and associated with grotesque images; but it was always declared superior to any thing that had preceded it. This movement of thought was perhaps inevitable; but the Gnosticism of the early Church is distinguished from the Rationalism of our century by having been confined to the speculations of scholars. Modern Gnosticism has gone among the people. The contrast may be accounted for by the circumstance that the people then saw more plainly the effects of non-Christian thought and life upon the world, and knew more clearly the superior merit and power of Christianity over all the systems that had preceded it.]

The first period of Gnosticism belongs to the close of the first century. The earliest proleptic signs of Gnosticism are to be looked for in Simon Magus. He was one of the numerous magicians of the East who pretended to have the power of working miracles. Judaistic Gnosticism is prefigured by the false teachers against whom Paul contends in his Epistle to the Colossians. Without denying the Messianic office of the Christ, they seem to have had a well-developed doctrine of angels, who, perhaps, were regarded as having participated in the creation. There are also traces of Gnosticism in the Epistles to Timothy.
 The First Epistle of John opposes Docetism. At the close of the apostolic age, Cerinthus was active in part of Asia Minor where John laborated. He retained some doctrines of the Old Testament, but placed at the side of God a World-Creator, the God of the Jews, who is also the head of the lower angels. Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary. The Redeemer descended upon him at his baptism, and left him just before the passion.

 The golden period of Gnosticism closed about the middle of the third century. After the first decades of the second century, Gnostic speculation was fruitful of systems to an extent of which there is no parallel in the history of philosophy, either ancient or modern. Starting from Egypt and Syria, they extended themselves to the remote part of the Church, even as far as Edessa and Lyons. The distinctive Gnostic features are more clearly outlined, and the various schools stand in relations of antagonism or friendship.
 We pass now to a description of the Gnostic systems in detail.

 I. Judaizing Gnostics. BASILIDES.—Two divergent accounts of the system of Basilides have come down to us. Irenaeus and Epiphanius describe it as teaching a bold Dualism, and draw in the falseteachers against whom Iaul'.

 The following is an outline of the Basilidean system. God is the Unnamable, and, in contrast to all other beings, he may be called the Non-Existent One; for he is so high above us, that we cannot affirm of him any predicates. He discards the doctrine of emanation commonly held by the Gnostics. Matter is not eternal, but the product of divine creation. Far beneath his throne, God deposits the seed, out of which, as from an egg, the world bursts and develops. The expression,
 "seed of the world," is Stoic; and the illustration of the egg, originally Oriental, was adopted extensively in the cosmogonic poetry of the Greeks.
 This seed is conceived of as a chaotic mixture of the three elements in the world,—the spiritual or pneumatic, the psychic, and the hylic. The spiritual or pneumatic first detaches itself; and the most subtle and ethereal portion of it swells into a vast, undisturbed sea, the ocean of God.
 To it belong the highest spirits,— Mind, Word, Intelligence, Wisdom, Power, Justice, Peace,— which, with the Father, constitute the great Ogddoad, the type of the lower spheres. The second class of pneumatic beings exist beneath these.
 Out of the archetypal or primordial sea and ruler of the world, the Archon, who, without being conscious of it, is governed by the divine laws. With the aid of astronomical forces he forms three hundred and sixty-five heavens, the lowest of which stretches from the moon downwards. A lower Archon presides over this sphere.
 God uses both Archons for his purposes.
 The lower Archon appropriates to himself the Jewish people, reveals himself in the Old Testamant, and also to the heathen world. Prophecy begets a longing for deliverance from the fetters of matter. When the fulness of time had come, the Redeemer was born of the virgin. At the baptism he was endowed with new spiritual powers, and, after preaching the higher knowledge of salvation, was put to death. Christ died on account of the remainder of sin left in him, but also to deliver the children of God from the fetters of matter. The process of deliverance is now going on, and will be completed when all pneumatic beings are gathered to God. Basilides and his son Isidore, who wrote a work on ethics, taught a moderate asceticism. The former appeals to the apostle Mathias, and used the Gospel of John, for which, and the Epistles to the Corinthians, Ephesians, and Romans, he is the first witness. See art. BASILIDES.

 VALENTINUS.—All that we know of the life of this teacher is, that he came to Rome in the days of Bishop Hyginus (about 138), was at the height of his influence under Pius (about 165), and was teaching until the administration of Anicetus (about 166). It is certain that he hailed from the East. But Tertullian's statement, that he broke with the Church, and was repeatedly excommunicated, is suspicious. Val-etinus was endowed with rich powers of mind.
 His system is the most artistic of all the Gnostic systems. It is an epic describing creation, apostasy, and redemption, in two spheres,—heaven and earth.

 God is unfathomable profundity, and the most sufficient name for him is Abyss (βάσαρος). For endless ages he remains in himself, undisturbed contemplation of his own glory. His thought, denominated Ennoia ("conception"), or Sige ("silence"), is associated with him. From Bythos and Sige emanate pairs in a downward scale,—Nous ("mind") and Aletheia ("truth"), Logos ("word") and Zoe ("life"), Anthropos ("man") and Ecclesia ("church"). With eleven other pairs these four constitute the divine Pleroma, or fulness. These beings are called Eons.
 The further they are removed from the Bythos, or God, the greater the defect of divine life, and longing after it. The furthest off is Sophia ("wisdom"), which has a vehement desire to comprehend God. Her sinful passion disturbs the harmony in the Pleroma, and, being separated from herself, is placed outside of the Pleroma.
 This marks the transition to the world. Harmony is restored; and out of gratitude the Eons construct out of their best gifts the finest Eon of all,—the star in the divine fulness, the upper Christ, who is surrounded by hosts of angels. Valentinus seems not to be clear about matter. It is either identical with the expelled ράθος ("passion"), or exists, distinct from the Pleroma, as Kenoma, or the Void. But in Sophia matter is of one kind with the world.

 The second part of the system descends to the formation of the visible world. The separated part, or ξύλον, still has pneumatic life. She is the product of Sophia, and called Acanthotho, from the Hebrew Chochmah ("wisdom"). From her proceed the fundamental elements of the world. She delegates the formation of the world and man to the Demiurge, who dwells in the seventh heaven. Man lives at first in paradise, the third heaven, but repeats the apostasy, and is cast down to earth. The Dei Dei sends the Messiah, upon whom the ΞΩΝ Christ descends. Only the human Messiah dies, the ΞΩΝ leaving him before his passion. After the resurrection, the Messiah tarried eighteen months among the disciples, teaching them the mysteries of the divine Pleroma. All pneumatic beings will be completely delivered. The Demiurge, who humbled himself before the ΞΩΝ Christ as he passed through his kingdom, will lift up the righteous psychic beings to a place where they will hear the jubilant echoes of the Pleroma. Then fire will consume matter and the psychic evil-doers. The most prominent representatives of this school were Heracleon of Alexandria, Ptolemy, and Marcus of Palestine. The correspondence of ideas makes it almost certain that Valentinus used the Gospel of John.

BARDESANES is inaccurately made by Irenæus the founder of a sect. The name is derived from the Hebrew kol arba, and designates the fourfold principle in which the original essence at first manifests itself. SIMON MAGUS was, as early as the second century, denounced by the Church as the arch-heretic, and founder of Gnosticism. Although he professed to be a believer (Acts viii. 13), he gave himself out as "the Great Power of God." A sect in the second century derived their origin from him, regarding his authority as coordinate with that of the apostles. To this system was monistic. All life, by an ever-expanding procession, emanates from the monad. On the limits of the divine development is matter, wherein the spirits who are finally fallen away from God have their habitation. EPIPHANES his son, who wrote a work on justice, followed closely his father's system. The Antinomianism of the Carpocratians gave occasion to the heathen world for accusations against the Christians, with whom it identified them.

Clement of Alexandria mentions a number of sects which belong here, and which he describes merely on the side of their moral teachings. Pantheism was common to all. The Antitacites hoped to attain salvation by deducion of the moral law, thereby defeating the Demiurge. So also, the followers of PRODICES, who proudly applied to themselves the name Gnostics. The Nicolaitans appealed to the deacon Nicolas (Acts vi. 5) as their authority, and likewise taught the freedom of the flesh. They have no connection with the sect of the same name in the Apocalypse.

IV. The Ophites. — This class of Gnostics—called by Hippolytus Ophites, by Clement of Alexandria Ophians—give a prominent place in their systems to the serpent,—a demon now of evil, now of good. In doing this they were in the line of the mythologies of ancient Babylon (in which the seven-headed serpent fights against the powers of light), of Persia, and of Egypt. The apocryphal literature of the Jews also refers frequently to the serpent. The Ophites drew largely...
GNOSTICISM.

also, from Greek philosophy. The sharp antithesis in which they set Judaism and Christianity, and the preponderance of the former precludes the theory that they were of Jewish origin.

Justinus, whose system Hippolytus has noticed, was more largely influenced by Old-Testament ideas than any other of the Ophites. From an original good and male being there proceeded a female being, Edem, whose upper part was human, and whose lower part was serpent-soul, Emah, from which the body to Edem. Elohim emanates from God. He has intercourse with Edem, and begets two kinds of beings corresponding to her twofold nature. Forsaken by him, Edem fills the earth with evils. Elohim seeks to draw men upwards, loves the Jews, and reveals himself through Baruch, one of the angels, to Moses and the prophets. These are, however, traduced by Edem. Elohim then turns to the prophets of the heathen world. They share the same fate. Baruch finally finds in Jesus, the Son of God, a firm opponent of Edem. Elohim, and the body to Edem.

The Ophites of Irenaeus place Christianity in sharper antagonism to the Demiurge. Dualism is distinctly avowed. On the one side is Pythos, the divine being; on the other, matter, a desolate ocean made up of water, darkness, chaos, and abyss. From the mingling of the light with matter proceeds Jaldabaoth, the Son of Chaos. He is the World-Creator. Looking down with grim hatred upon Hyle, his diabolic image is produced, — Ophiomorphus, or the "crooked serpent" (Isa. xxvii. 1). From him go forth all evil, sorrow, and death. He dominates Cain and the heathen; Jaldabaoth, the Jews, and inspires Moses and other prophets. But he crucifies Jesus, upon whom the heavenly Christ had descended, and does not share in the kingdom of light. But Christ brings salvation to all pneumatic beings.

The Sethians used a "Paraphrase of Seth," whose name was Seth. Matter is an ocean, tempestuous, chaotic, dark. The light excites the serpent-soul in matter, which then becomes the Demiurge. The Logos descends from the light, deceives the Demiurge by assuming the form of a serpent, and lifts the soul up to the realm of light.

The Naaseni (serpent-worshippers) flourished in Phrygia. They taught that the serpent emanates from God, and is the soul of the world. Christ does not redeem men by his death, but by his gnosis and teaching.

The Perate, as their name signifies, looked upon themselves as belonging to another world, and as only in a state of transition in this. They numbered about 150; for Clement of Alexandria mentions them. The Archon of matter is a hylic demon, and his companions are the poisonous serpents of the desert. The serpent, as the apostle of wisdom, frees Eve from the bondage of the Archon. To it belong Cain, Nimrod, and, none the less, Moses, who lifts up the serpent in the wilderness, like as did Christ. "The serpent of the desert is the appeaser, and makes Judas the true apostle. Thus the whole story of the Gospels was completely inverted, the serpent being regarded as the symbol of intellect, who first gave true knowledge to our first parents, and the very betrayer of Christ declared to be the highest apostle.

The various Gnostic sects described by Epiphanius — the Phihonites, Stratiiotes, etc. — were distinguished by a moral rottenness which almost staggered belief. On the one hand, theology and apologetics had shown the vast superiority of Christianity to Gnosticism; on the other, Gnostic sects, once with notable (and even celebrated) applause, that no doubt was left that its time was past.

GOSBAT, Samuel, D.D., Bishop of Jerusalem; b. at Cremona, Bern, Switzerland, Jan. 26, 1799; d. at Jerusalem, May 11, 1879. He entered the mission house at Basel in 1821; in 1823 proceeded to Paris and London, where he learned Arabic, Ethiopic, and Amharic; and in 1826 was sent by the (English) Church Missionary Society to Abyssinia, but, owing to the unsettled state of that country, could not begin operations until 1830, and left in 1832. He returned in 1839, but sickness prevented his working; and so, in September, 1835, he came back to Europe. From 1839 to 1842 he was in Malta, superintending the translation of the Bible into Arabic, and taking charge of the printing-press there. In 1845 he was appointed vice-principal of the Malta Protestant College, and in 1846, consecrated at Lambeth, Sunday, July 6, 1846.
His work in the Holy City was very successful and vigorous. Particularly worthy of mention is the Diocesan School and the Orphanage on Mount Zion. In November, 1847, he began with nine children in the former; when he died, there were in Palestine, under his care, 57 schools, with 1,400 children. He also had under him twelve native churches. He had an efficient helper in his wife. He wrote A Journal of Three Years in Abyssinia, Lond., 1847. See Samuel Godet: Sein Leben und Werken, nebst seinen eigenen Aufzeichnungen, Basel, 1884. English trans., London, 1884.

GOCH, Johannes, or properly Johannes Pupper; was b. at Goch, near Aix-la-Chapelle, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, and probably educated in one of the establishments of the Brethren of Common Life. Studied in Paris, and founded the priory of Thabor, for canonesses of St. Augustine, in Mechlin, which he governed himself till 1473. His first (Ezek. iii. 2) have passed along quietly and unnoticed; but when his De libertate Christiana was published in 1521, by Corn-Grapheus, it attracted great attention, and its author was recognized as one of the true predecessors of the Reformation. See ULMANN: Die Reformator vor der Reformation, I. p. 188.

GOD. I. NAME AND GENERAL IDEA.—Although the existence of God is the most certain of all facts for Christians and religious people generally, and although all moral and religious life depends upon him for its motives and aims, yet Christian theologians of every period have agreed that it is impossible to give an exhaustive definition of his being. This is due to the fact that God neither stands in a relation such as exists between genus and species, nor can be reduced to the distinguishing feature of the Old-Testament revelation. Of the two names for God which the Hebrews had in common, God is the name of the invisible being and power (Rom. i. 20). As the highest religious concept, it is defined in the higher religions as almightiness, origin- and controlling all things. Speculative thought takes a step higher when it represents this will, upon which all depends, as unconditioned by any thing outside of itself, and eternal. But it remains for the Christian revelation to add the most important feature; namely, that God is a moral being, absolutely good, and guiding the world to a perfect consummation. Of the two names for God which the Hebrews had in common with other Semitic peoples, El expresses the notion of power, and Elohim represents him as an object of awe, and dread. But neither contains any allusion to God's redeeming love. Our God is not connected etymologically with good (Max Muller, 2d series, p. 148), but is probably derived from the Sanscrit jut or dyut, Gothic, guha, meaning to shine. The same word is the root of the Latin Deus and the Greek Zeus.

II. GOD IN THE SCRIPTURES.—Characteristic of the Old-Testament revelation of God is the moral relation he sustains to the world. The Old Testament does not give theoretical definitions of the Divine Being, or arguments for his existence, but assumes the belief in him. The religious reverence and fear which are becoming in our relations to him are based upon his moral elevation, his absolute holiness, which cannot be tolerated sin. Jehovah, the name which indicates God's covenant relation to Israel, designates the immutability and absoluteness of his being. God is a personal spirit, not a force of nature. He is separate from and independent of the universal spirit in the creating and moving principle of all life (Ps. civ. 29 seqq., etc.), and particularly of man's life (Gen. ii. 7; Job xxxii. 4, etc.). The earth is a monument revealing his glory (Num. xiv. 21, etc.). The plural form of the divine name Elohim points to his infinite fulness of life. Although the holiness of God is the predominant conception of the Old Testament, the thought of divine love and grace is not wanting. God in mercy chooses Israel to be his people, and desires to be called Father (Exod. iv. 22 sqq.; Deut. xxxii. 6; Isa. lxix. 16; Hos. xi. 1). He effaces guilt, purifies the heart, and imparts his own spirit (Ezek. xxxvi. 22 sqq., etc.). It is this ethical and religious conception of God, and not the divine unity, or Monotheism, which is the distinguishing feature of the Old-Testament revelation.

The New Testament is characterized by the presentation of God as the Father of Jesus Christ and of those who belong to his kingdom. The relation is now strictly a personal one, the Old Testament representing God as the Father of a people. We are made God's children by a new birth (John i. 12; 1 John iii. 9). Thus, having become partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. i. 4), we shall at last be filled with "all the fulness of God" (Eph. iii. 19). God himself lives and works in them (Eph. iv. 6). He is in a peculiar sense the Father of Christ, who was begotten before the worlds (John i. 1 sqq.), and possesses the divine fulness (Col. ii. 9). In the name Father the principle of love is contained. "God is love" (1 John iv. 8), and this love controls his use of all the other attributes. It leads God to reveal himself in the gift of his Son (1 John iv. 10, etc.), and to take men into communion with himself. God is also light or holiness (1 John i. 5) and spirit (John iv. 24), and has eternal life (Rev. i. 4, 8). Man derives from God's works the knowledge of his invisible being and power (Rom. i. 20). As the God of love and light, he is revealed to us through Moses and the Prophets, and perfectly in the person of his own Son (John i. 18, xiv. 9). This knowledge which the believer has of God depends upon God's own special agency through the Spirit (Matt. xvi. 17; John vi. 44, etc.). Our present knowledge, however, is imperfect. "We see through a glass darkly" (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. v. 7, etc.). But in Christ, who is his image (2 Cor. iv. 4), we see God's dear purposed and revealed, etc., from him derive all the knowledge necessary for salvation and for consummate communion with God.

III. GOD IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.—Theology cannot be entirely divorced from philosophy. And, fixed as the notion of God is which the Scriptures present, it was proper, as well as unavoidable, that it should be subjected to the scrutiny of reason. In its infancy Christian theology came in contact with the products of Greek philosophy, and was influenced by the definitions of Plato, the Neo-Platonists, and of Philo, who himself owed much, directly or indirectly, to Plato.
The general influence of these extra-Christian forces was in the direction of a negative and abstract conception of the Deity. In Gnosticism this abstractly conceived God is transformed into the dark background, which, according to Valentinus, is the first beginning and cause of all things, and has Silencio (ένν) for a consort. (See Gnosticism.) Valentinus, Theognis, and the apologolitic writers who followed him, and especially the Alexandrine school, emphasized with Plato God's transcendence above nature; although the Scriptures always affirm, at the side of this, that he is a personal, holy, and loving Spirit. The more the influence of philosophy was felt, the more prominently did Christian theologians urge the negative and abstract element in God's nature. Origen defined him as simple being, without predicates, exalted above mind and matter, yet nevertheless as the Father, who eternally begets the Logos, and reveals himself through him. In contrast to this tendency mind and matter, yet nevertheless as the Father, who eternally begets the Logos, and reveals himself through him. In contrast to this tendency, Augustine was the first in the Western Church to concern himself with the scientific investigation of the divine nature. He laid stress, first of all, upon the self-conscious personality of God; but Platonic influence is evident in his further prosecution of the subject, when he defines God as the unity of all abstract perfections, as an absolutely simple essence, in which knowledge, volition, being, and all attributes, are one and the same.

The writings of Dionysius were given to the Western Church in the translation of Scotus Erigena. Dionysius, following the old saying, "To know is to belong only to God;" so that whatever in finite things truly exists is nought else than God himself. This is Pantheism, from the charge of which he rescues himself by illogically teaching the doctrines of Creation and the Trinity. Scholasticism was under the immediate influence of Augustine, in its definition of God. Realism, if pressed, would have forced it to the conclusion that the Infinite only exists as it is found in the finite. But from this it held back. Thomas Aquinas and Albertus Magnus said God was not the essence of finite things, but its final cause and original moving principle. On the other hand, Duns Scotus insists that from the beginning God had will, and exercised volition; but this will was essentially absolute and arbitrary. Occam strongly emphasized this point; whence, from Abelard on, those protracted and subtle discussions whether any thing was impossible for him. In the Middle Ages, demanded mediators and intercessors in its approach to God; so that Luther afterwards complained that he was no longer regarded as a being full of love and compassion, but as a stern governor and executioner. Avoiding the metaphysical subtleties of scholasticism, the Reformers emphasized the proposition that God is the God of redemption, who threatens the sinner with the curse and death, but subordinates every thing to his purpose of saving the lost. The dogmatic divergencies of the Lutheran and Reformed confessions point back to different conceptions of God's nature.

The latter emphasized more strongly God's sovereignty, and the eternal decree by which he rejects a portion of the race. Against this the Lutheran theology guards. However, it must not be forgotten that Luther, in his earlier writings, predicates the same decree of God, and that he never subsequently, in a systematic way, contradicted this position. The theology of the next period enumerated the divine attributes under the heads "natural" and "moral," and affirmed, that, though our knowledge of God cannot be exhaustive, it is real, and sufficient for salvation. Socinianism presented God in the aspect of a Ruler endowed with consummate power and justice, whose knowledge of the future, however, is conditioned by the free will of man, which acts independently of him.

At the side of the traditional doctrine of the Church, philosophy now began to work out independent metaphysical systems. Spinoza's pantheism was condemned by theologians as palpably unchristian, yea, godless. But the philosophy of Leibnitz and Wolff enjoyed wide favor. It treated at length the arguments for God's existence, but replaced them by the moral argument, based upon the intuitive facts of the conscience, beyond reason. Reason, however, gets no farther than a moral order in the universe; and the speculations of Schelling and Hegel substitute for God the idea of the Absolute, from which all the forms of thought and matter are derived. The descent from this proud Idealism to a bleak Materialism was startlingly rapid.

A new period begins with Schleiermacher, who built up his system of theology upon the facts of Christian experience, instead of metaphysical speculation. The theologians who agreed with him on this point sought to confirm the definition of God from Scripture, and contended against the pantheistic conceptions of the former; e.g., J. Muller and Rothe. Philosophers like J. H. Fichte, K. Ph. Fischer, Chalybaeus, Ulrici, and Lotze, have likewise stood forth as champions of God's personality. On the other hand, Biedermann still insists that God is an absolute spiritual but an impersonal essence; and Strauss in his last period took the final step over to materialism. In conclusion, it may be said that theology must always be ready to confess the imperfection of its definition of God. But this can never justify that school of thought which turns the living God into an abstraction, called the Absolute, which neither explains any thing, nor is itself intelligible.

[See the Histories of Christian Doctrine of Baur, Hagenbach, and Shedd; Gillett: God in Human Thought, New York, 1874, 2 vols.; also the works on Systematic Theology, by Hodge (vol. i.), Van Oosterzee, and Johnson (§§ 15-27); and the excellent art. G. in Johnson's Cyclopaedia, by Dr. A. A. Hodge. — On the Cognoscenti-

GOD. I. ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.— The statement of St. Paul, that the “world by wisdom knew not God,” (1 Cor. i. 21), is strictly true in the light of the history of religious systems. No heathen religion ever embodied the true conception of God: some of them had the most monstrous conceptions of him. The highest achievements of the best human systems of philosophy, such as Plato's, need to be supplemented by revelation. For Christians, sufficient proofs of the divine existence will always be the person, words, and works of Christ. So-called rational arguments have by some been considered impossible, on the ground that God is incomprehensible to rational thought (Jacobi). Others, from Arschius down to Watson, the celebrated Methodist theologian (Theol. Institutes), have regarded them as either improper or superfluous. While they are in no wise essential to Christian piety, yet they have their place as attempts to show the accord of reason and revelation, and as a demonstration of the inadequacy of the former as compared with revelation. Before Kant sent forth his disparaging criticism, philosophy and theology dwelt extensively on the arguments: since that time, they have met with a varying fate. Schleiermacher's example in excluding them from his system of theology has been followed by not a few theologians (Thomassius, Philippi, etc.).

The arguments may be grouped in two classes, — those derived from a contemplation of ourselves, or the ontological and moral arguments; and those derived from a contemplation of the universe, or the cosmological and teleological arguments.

1. The Ontological Argument. — This proof argues from the pure intellectual idea of God up to the reality of his existence. The first to give this form to it was Anselm. He reasons as follows: There is Something than which nothing greater can be conceived. Even the fool who says, “There is no God,” has this idea; for he understands what is meant when he hears the proposition. But this “Something,” etc., must exist in reality (in re), as well as in the intellect (in intellectu); for, if it exist only in the intellect, then something greater than it could be conceived, viz., that “Something” having objective existence; which is contradictory. Therefore that “Something,” etc., exists in reality, as well as in the intellect. Clean as this argumentation seems to be, it is not free from serious logical error. It may be fairly questioned whether the first statement does not itself posit as having objective existence what it sets out to prove to exist. However, leaving this aside, the great objection lies in comparing that which has objective existence with a conception considered as having mere subjective existence, and declaring the former to be greater than the latter. A thing in real existence is exactly equal to its corresponding conception in the mind, neither less nor greater than it. A number written out on the slate is just equal to, and not greater than, the conception of that number. Not a single quality is added to the “Something,” etc., as an objective reality, which it does not have as an idea. Kant was the first to apply this criticism. “Objective existence,” he said, “is not a real predicate.” Descartes restated the argument: We have the conception of a most perfect Being. He must be an existent Being, he proceeded to argue, or we should have a most perfect Being imperfect. Leibnitz added a new element. It is absolutely necessary that something should exist whose existence inheres in its very essence. God is such a being; and such a being, if at all possible, exists. Wolff in Germany, Dr. Samuel Clarke in England, and others, have made able and elaborate statements of the argument. Dr. Clarke's argument starts with the proposition that something has existed from eternity, which, he says, “is so evident and undeniable, that no atheist in any age has ever presumed to assert the contrary.” The ontological argument will always have a fascination for the mind. It does not prove God's existence; but, to use the language of Professor Flint (Theism, p. 285), it “has at least succeeded in showing, that unless there exists an eternal, infinite, and unconditioned Being, the human mind is in its ultimate principles self-contradictory and delusive.”

2. The Cosmological Argument. — This proof starts from the sequences or effects in the universe. Aristotle among the ancients, and Thomas Aquinas and Leibnitz among Christian philosophers, have been its ablest exponents. Dr. Samuel Clarke, Kant, and others have denied its validity. Aquinas' argument was threefold. He argued back from motion to a first Mover, himself unmoved; from effects to a sufficient Cause; and from that which is only possible, and may cease to be, to a Being who exist necessarily. The validity of this argument hinges upon the answer to the question whether an endless retrogression of causes and effects is conceivable (regressus in infinitum). If the answer is, that it is impossible for the mind to conceive such a retrogression, then it follows necessarily that there exists an Absolute Essence, uncreated and eternal. But it may, according to Kant, with equal probability be asserted (on the basis of our experience), that such a retrogression is conceivable, and involves nothing contradictory to human experience. We know that every consequence has its antecedent, and every phenomenon its sufficient cause; so far as the human mind is concerned, it has a fascination for the mind. It does not prove God's existence; but, to use the language of Professor Flint (Theism, p. 285), it “has at least succeeded in showing, that unless there exists an eternal, infinite, and unconditioned Being, the human mind is in its ultimate principles self-contradictory and delusive.” Gad is a necessary postulate of our whole thing one. It has been stated in different forms.

(as some have ventured hastily to assert), but, on the other hand, no less so. The world itself, then, with its unchanging energy, bears absolute essence. The argument, then, by itself seems to be inconclusive.

3. The Teleological Argument.—This proof is the oldest of the arguments. In modern times Paley and the Bridgewater Treatises have ably stated and illustrated it. The adaptation of means to ends. From these facts it draws the conclusion of a wise Intelligence as their only explanation. The “reign of law” (Duke of Argyle) has been abundantly illustrated and insisted upon; the marvellous order which reigns in the sidereal heavens, the wonderful adaptation of the members of the human body, as the eye and the hand, for the needs of man, the adaptation of the lower creation to supply his wants have been dwelt upon at length, and used to establish the conclusion that they betray Intel-gent Design. This is known as the “physico-teleological,” in opposition to the “historicoteleological” argument, which concerns itself with the facts and development of human history.
Objections have been urged against the argument from design on two grounds: (1) That what is called design may as justly be called haphazard nature (the exact adjustment, for example, of the parts of the eye to vision, is indisputable; but this adjustment is conceivable as the blind combination of nature); (2) A broad class of facts is overlooked by the argument, and proves with equal force the want of design. Blights, famines, diseases, prevail, which interrupt the order of the universe, and interfere with the physical and mental happiness of man, and the life of other creatures. The world has malformations and monstrosities. Men are even born into the world crippled, so as to be unable to reach physical happiness. This class of objections has been ably stated by Mr. Mill, in his Three Essays on Theism. These objections may not be lightly set aside. It may be urged, in refutation of them, that there is an outlying purpose which even these exceptions must serve; that these inconsistencies and discords are apparent, and not real. But this is a mere assumption, which no one can prove without Revelation. On the other hand, if it be granted that there is a preponderance of design or adaptation in the universe, this would fall short of proving that the world is the product of an omnipotent and intelligent Mind. Kant, who rejects the teleological argument, has well urged that at best it would bring us to an Architect of the world, not to a Creator. Even if it be agreed that the teleological argument does not establish the certainty of a supreme creative Intelligence, it cannot be denied that illustrations of design will always be powerful aids to faith for those already religiously disposed. The Scriptures fre-cently use them. “He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see?” (Ps. xciv. 9, etc.).

4. The Moral Argument.—This proof starts from the facts of man's moral and spiritual nature.
Kant, Sir William Hamilton, and others who reject the other arguments, grant the force of this one. It has been stated in different forms.
(1) God is a necessary postulate of our whole spiritual nature. The idea of God seems to be germane to the race. From Cicero down, stress has been justly laid on the absolute existence of all nations of a belief in a superior being. Again:
without God our spiritual natures remain unsatisfied. The personal sense of dependence which expresses itself in prayer is universal. Worldli-iness and education may lead men to overcome or ignore it; but the need and impression comes out in its power, when, in times of shipwreck or other peril, man cries aloud for help, and, be it oberved, not to the forces of nature, but to a supreme Will who exists behind them. (2) The existence of the moral law within us can only be explained on the supposition of a Lawgiver.
The sense of right and wrong is universal.
Conscience declares them radically antagonistic and irreconcilable: it speaks in defiance of the will, even when that is set against hearing it, determined to disobey it; and it commands and threatens with authority. Its word is ought, which Kant calls the categorical imperative. (3) Merit and happiness do not always go together in this world. Our sense of right demands that this should be the case, and forces us to believe in a just God, who in another world will rectify the inequalities of this.

The objections urged against the moral argument are two. The first asserts that conscience is a product of education. History proves the very opposite,—that the degeneracy of conscience is due to an indurating process, which Paul compares to searing with a hot iron (1 Tim. iv. 2).
The second objection denies the assumption of a spiritual nature.

The general conclusions from a discussion of the arguments for God's existence are two. (1) That the mind of man is a hopeless enigma, and full of intuitive delusions; and that the universe is a cavernous mystery, if God do not exist. The beliefs of the great mass of mankind, as well as the confident assertion of the best philosophies, have alike been groundless, and the most enmoblishing counsels and the finest moral achievements been built upon a falsehood, unless he rule and govern. The human intellect shrinks from these awful inferences, and is forced, in spite of the apparent contradictions, to bow with Revelation before an omnipotent Governor of the universe.
(2) The second thought is, that, although none of these arguments (except the moral argument) is by itself valid and convincing, each one contains elements, the combination of which makes the divine existence very probable, if not necessary for the mind. Professor Diman (Theistic Argument, p. 247) has put the case well in the following language: “The argument for the divine existence is complex and correlative. Not from one, but from many sources is the evidence derived; and its force lies in the whole, not in any of its parts.”

Lit. Sources.—Saint Anselm (Monologium and Proslogium), Thomas Aquinas, Descartes (Meditations), Leibnitz, Samuel Clarke (A Discourse concerning the Being and Attributes of God, London, 1704), Kant (Kritik d. praktischen Vernunft), etc. On the Whole Subject.—Tysska: Gesch. d. Beweise für d. Dasein Gottes bis zum 14ten Jahrhundert, 1875; Krebs: Gesch. d. Beweise für d. Dasein Gottes von Cartesius bis Kant, 1876; GODFREY OF BOUILLON.

GODFREY OF BOUILLON (Duke of Lower Lorraine, and King of Jerusalem), the beloved leader of the first crusade; b. at Bayeux, in Bel gium, about 1090; d. in Jerusalem, July 15 or 18, 1100. He took the cross 1095, pawned his lordship of Bouillon to the church of Liege for thrir teen hundred marks, collected eighty thousand infantry and ten thousand horsemen and, after many adventures, arrived with the crusaders at Jerusalem, and took it, after a five-weeks' siege, July 15, 1099. "A Christian kingdom of Jeru salem was then founded, of which Godfrey was unanimously elected sovereign; but he refused to wear a crown of gold where his Lord had worn a crown of thorns, and accepted, instead of the kingly title, the humbler designation of 'Defender.
and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre." His reign was very brief (only a single year), but full of brave deeds. He died lamented by both his Mohammedan and Christian subjects. He has immortalized him in his Jerusalem Delivered; and history confirms his description of Godfrey as a pious, accomplished, and prudent knight. The only blot upon his record was his massacre of the Mohammedan defenders of Jerusalem; but even that is excused by the circumstances of the times and the circumstances of the siege.

GODWIN, Francis, Bishop of Llandaff, and church historian; b. 1561, at Hatington, Northamptonshire; d. April, 1633. He was the son of Thomas (d. 1590), Bishop of Bath and Wells, who fell into disgrace for marrying a second time. He studied at Christ Church, Oxford. His work, A Catalogue of the Bishops of England since the first planting of the Christian religion in this island (published 1601), secured for him a bishopric. Rerum Anglic. Henrico Vlll., Edwardo VI., et Maria regnantibus, Annales, appeared 1616, and the posthumous work, The Mon. in the Mo., 1638, in which he advocates the Copernican system.

GODWIN, Thomas, a learned antiquarian; b. in Somersetshire, 1587; educated at Oxford; d. 1643. His work, Moses & Aaron; or the civil & ecclesiastical Rituals used by the Ancient Hebrews, etc., Oxford, 1616 (12th ed., 1655), was a celebrated book for a century.

GOEPP, Jean Jacques, b. at Heiligenstein, Alsace, April 8, 1771; d. in Paris, June 21, 1855; studied at Strassburg; made a campaign in the republican army; and was appointed pastor of the French Protestant Congregation in Strassburg in 1802, and of the Lutheran Congregation in Paris in 1809. In Paris he developed a great and beneficial activity, gathering and organizing the Luthers living in the city, establishing schools for their children, asylums and mutual insurance associations for their poor, a mission society, a Bible society, etc. He published a volume of sermons, and various pamphlets at special occasions.

GOERRES, Johann Joseph, b. at Coblenz, Jan. 25, 1776; d. at Munich, Jan. 27, 1848; one of the most conspicuous names in modern German literature, and, if not a man of great influence, at all events a character of much significance. He was an enthusiast. His first enthusiasm was the French Revolution. Hardly out of school, he established a paper (Das rothe Blatt) preaching liberty, equality, republicanism, and radicalism of the deepest dye. The paper was soon interdicted; but he immediately established another (Rübezaki im Blauen Gewande), which also was interdicted. In 1798 he went to Paris on a political mission to the Directory; but the sight of Napoleon, who had just returned from Egypt, and overthrown the Directory, fell like a chill on his enthusiasm. He gave up politics, and returned to his studies. His second enthusiasm was the philosophy of Schelling, at that time rising in its day; and many of his friends have said that he wrote on every thing,—art, faith, and reason, physiology, mythology, etc.,—and always brilliantly. But it proved easier to make a sensation than to get followers: his attempts to make a university career failed. His third enthusiasm was the new departure of the time, and the new movements. In 1820, he returned to politics, and published the Rheinischer Merkur, a paper whose leading idea is nationality rather than liberty, and which contains the soundest thoughts and most powerful expositions he ever produced. He had called it the "fifth grand power." But it was interdicted in 1816 by a Prussian cabinet-order; and when, in 1820, his Deutschland und die Revolution was followed by another Prussian cabinet-order, this time for his arrest, he fled to Strassburg, despairing of ever seeing the world for the cause of Literature. His fourth and last enthusiasm was the Roman-Catholic Church. He had always been a member of the Romantic school; and he now became the leader of the extreme left wing of that school,—those who were marching straightway to Rome. He wrote with the same enthusiasm for this ghost of the past as he had formerly written for the ideals of the future. In 1827 he was appointed professor of history in Munich; and there he published, both large scientific works (Geschichte der christlichen Mystik, 1836—42, 4 vols.), and small polemical articles for the occasion, in Historisch-politische Blätter (1838). He was, indeed, the literary champion of Ultramontanism in Germany; but as literature is no fit weapon for Ultramontanism, as Ultramontanism likes best to avoid literature, with its arguments and its publicity, he could not help feeling that he was merely writing on running water.

GOESELH, Karl Friedrich, b. at Langensalza, Oct. 7, 1784; d. at Naumburg, Sept. 22, 1861; was educated at Gotha; studied law at Leipzig; held appointments, first in the superior court of Naumburg (1819—24), then in the Department of the Interior in Berlin (1831—40), and was in 1845 made president of the consistory of the province of Saxony, with residence in Magdeburg, from which position he was forced to retire by the revolution (1848). He was a very prolific writer, and published about thirty volumes, besides about three hundred articles in periodicals. His great object was to work out a reconciliation between Christianity and modern culture as represented philosophically by Hegel, and poetically by Goethe, and to that end tend his principal works: Unterhaltungen zur Schilddergung Göschers Dicht- und Denkweise, Leipzig, 1834—38, 3 vols.; Uber Nichtwissen und absolutes Wissen, 1829 (referring to Hegel as the former to Goethe); and Zerstreute Blätter aus den Hand- und Hülf'st-acten eines Juristen, 1832—42, 4 vols. (relating to modern jurisprudence).

GOEZE, Johann Melchior, b. at Halberstadt, Oct. 16, 1717; d. at Hamburg, May 18, 1755; studied at Halle, and was master of the Church of the Holy Spirit at Magdeburg, 1750, and of the Church of St. Catharine in Hamburg, 1755. In 1777 he attacked Lessing on account of the publication of the Waffenbüllet Fragments. And, of the many challengers who rose against him, Lessing selected Goze especially because he considered him the most important and the most dangerous. Goze opened the controversy with an essay in the Freyriigen Beyträge, Dec. 17, 1777; then followed, in 1778, Einas Vor-läufiges gegen d. Herrn Hofrat Lessing, and Lessings Schiedsdelen, in three parts. Lessing published in all eighteen pieces against Goze, which are found in the collected editions of his works. See Röve: J. M. Goze, eine Retting, Hamburg, 1800; and A. Boden: Lessing und Goze, Leipzig, 1862.

QOG AND MAGOG. In Gen. x. 2 the second son of Japhet is called Magog, i.e., the name of a people living between Armenia and Media, somewhere on the shores of the Araxes. Ezek. xxviii. and xxix. is a prophecy against Gog, who is the king of the land of Magog, which evidently was then much farther north, across the Caucasus. Ezekiel's description of the inroad of Gog reminds us of that of the Scythians (B.C. 630), which had the same characteristics (cf. Herod., i. 108 sqq.), and probably the Scythians were in his mind when he wrote the prophecy; but they are not really described. Rather by Gog, King of Magog, is meant the leader of the movement of the great world-power against the kingdom of God,—the attack mentioned by other prophets of Israel (Ezek. xxxviii. 17), especially by Joel (iii. 9 sqq.). Micah (iv. 11 sqq.), Zachariah (xii. 2 sqq., xiv.). But the sentence of condemnation is already spoken, and the world-power is to be overthrown. The interpretation of this prophecy is simple. The overthrow of Magog has nothing to do with the overthrow of the Chaldaeans: rather it means, that, after judgment has fallen upon all those peoples brought into contact with the Jews, there will be left a remnant from whom will come the world-power against the kingdom of God,—the attack mentioned by other prophets of Israel (Ezek. xxxviii. 17), especially by Joel (iii. 9 sqq.). Micah (iv. 11 sqq.), Zachariah (xii. 2 sqq., xiv.). But the sentence of condemnation is already spoken, and the world-power is to be overthrown. The interpretation of this prophecy is simple. The overthrow of Magog has nothing to do with the overthrow of the Chaldaeans: rather it means, that, after judgment has fallen upon all those peoples brought into contact with the Jews, there will be left a remnant from whom will come the impulse upon the world-power to incite it to oppose the kingdom, and by so doing to seal its own fate. In the Revelation (xx. 7 sqq.) Gog and Magog appear as two peoples, and, as in Ezekiel, are similarly overthrown. The names are also separated in Jewish theology (Targum to Num. xi. 27) and among the Mohammedans (Koran, 18, 93).

v. Orelli.

The legendary interest in Gog and Magog is considerable. Thus in Astrikan the story is told, that Alexander the Great overthrew these two great peoples, and drove them into the recesses of the Caucasus, where they are now in terror, because of the noise of twelve trumpets blown by the winds. But out of their captivity they are sure to come, and devastate the world. In Guild Hall, London, there are two effigies, fourteen feet high, of Gog and Magog, who, according to the legend, were the sole survivors of the race of giants descended from Dolicetan's thirty-three bad daughters which Brute destroyed. These two were brought by him to London, and made porters at the royal palace's gate; and, when they died, their effigies took their place. The present figures were made in 1708; but similar ones can be proven to have existed as early as 1415, and probably much before. Geoffrey of Monmouth tells (Chron., i. 10) of a giant eighteen feet high, called Goinegog (a corruption of Gog and Magog), who, with his brother Corineus, was the terror of Cornwall. See art. Gog and Magog, in Encyc. Brit., 9th ed., and Brewer's Reader's Handbook.

Goucherly, Daniel John, a Wesleyan missionary, b. in London, August, 1792; d. Sept. 6, 1882. In 1818 he was sent to Ceylon to take charge of the Wesleyan mission presided at Colombo; and by devoting his great talents to Pali, the sacred language of the Buddhists, he achieved an acknowledged mastership. He was the author, in large part, of the Cingalesse version of the Scriptures, published by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in that dialect issued Christiani Pragmata (Colombo, 1822), a treatise upon the evidences and doctrines of the Christian religion. Many of his studies appeared in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, of the Ceylon branch of which society he was the vice-president.

GOLDEN Calf. See CALF.

GOLDEN LEGEND (Legendae Aureae), a collection of legends of saints, without historical value, but very popular. It was compiled by the Dominican Jacobus de Voragine, in the thirteenth century, first edition, with date, but without place, 1474, seventy-one editions before 1600, new edition by Th. Graesse, Dresden, 1846. The book has great value for the student of middle-age superstition. See Jacobus de Voragine, and LEGEND.

GOLDEN NUMBER, the place of a given year in the lunar cycle, which cycle is equal to nineteen Julian years. The golden numbers were introduced into the calendar about 530, but arranged as if they had been introduced in 326 (the Council of Nicesa). They were usually marked in red or gold. But they are rejected from the Gregorian Calendar, as they fit only the Julian.

GOLDEN ROSE is made of wrought gold, and set with gems, blessed by the Pope on the fourth Sunday of Lent, and sent by him, as a token of his special regard, to some person, church, or community: if not sent, it is preserved in the Vatican. The first mention of the "rose" occurs in the eleventh century. Pope Urban V. decreed one should be sent every year. Among the recipients of this favor have been Joanna of Naples, Henry VIII. of England, Gonsalvo de Cordova, Napoleon III., Isabel I., Stephanie, Crown Princess of Austria (1882).

GOLGOTHA. See Holy Sepulchre.

GOMARUS, Francis, b. at Bruges, Jan. 30, 1563; d. at Groningen, Jan. 11, 1641; studied at Strasbourg, Neustadt, Cambridge, Oxford, and Heidelberg, and was in 1587 appointed pastor to the Flemish congregation at Franeort. In 1594 he was called to Leyden as professor of divinity, but resigned this position in 1611, because Vorsius was made the successor of Arminius. In 1614 he accepted an invitation to Saumur as professor of theology, and in 1618 he removed to Groningen. He was the leader of the severe Calvinistic party, and the declared adversary of Arminianism, which he opposed with virulence and intolerance, and finally caused to be condemned at the synod of Dort, 1618. His collected works, mostly polemical, appeared in one volume fol., in Amsterdam, 1645. See the art. ARMINIANISM.

GOMER ( glyph 4 Sept. Taw) is, in Gen. x. 2 and 1 Chron. i. 5, the name of the first-born son of Japheth. In Ezek. xxxviii. 6 it designates, together with Togarmah, a northern tribe, which, in alliance with Magog, fought the last battle against Israel.
The question, What nation or race is meant by this designation? has been differently answered at various times. Josephus (Antiq., 1. 6, 1) derives the Galatians from Gomer; and a gloss on Syriacus reads Paiete, i.e. in the Targums, on the contrary (Jonath. and Jerush.), on Gen. x. 2, in the Targum on 1 Chron. i. 5, as well as in Breshit R., Gomer is explained by ג"ופר ("Germania"), or ג"ופר ואופר ("Africa"). As the ancestor of the Germanic race, the Targums specially designate the third son of Gomer, Togarnah; though later Jews also mention the first-born son, Ashkenaz. Africa—for ג"ופר can hardly be explained by Phrygia, or some obscure place—they probably stumbled upon, because at one time a Germanic tribe, the Vandals, were settled there. Earlier Christian exegetes, as, for instance, Jerome, Nicholas of Lyra, and others, generally adopted the views of Josephus. Luther, however, arguing from Ezek. xxxviii. 6 and the striking similarity of names, explained Gomer by Cimmerians; and through Arias Montanus, J. A. Osiander (who identifies the Cimmerians with the Cimbrians), Calmet, and others, this view spread widely.

Which of these different interpretations is the true one is perhaps not so very difficult to decide. In spite of their various discrepancies, they all agree in the one point,—that Gomer designates a people native of Europe, living in the far-off north, and thence penetrating towards the south, even into Asia; and, if this the fundamental view is correct, the interpretation which explains Gomer by Cimmerians is the best. Nor is the view of Luther so completely at variance with that of Josephus. The Gauls, or Galatians, who, in the third century B.C., invaded, first Thracia and Greece, and then Asia Minor, resembled the Cimmerians so much on account of their European origin, wide-sweeping campaigns, and terrible savagery (Livy, 38, 37; 1 Macc. viii. 20), that it was quite natural to consider the one a continuation or revival of the other.

In the early Church it was also known as the “Festival of the Crucifixion” (πάσχα σταυροσκύψαμον), the “Day of Salvation,” etc. Its observance must date back to the earliest period of the Church. The early Church kept it as a rigorous fast and period of mourning; for, although the crucifixion was the last atoning act of Christ’s life, yet it brought it us guilty to the Saviour, and removed him, for a time, from the disappointed disciples. The public services were conducted with deep solemnity and with the outward signs of sorrow. Constantine the Great (Euseb., Vita. I. 4) forbade the holding of judicial trials, markets, etc., on the day. In Spain they went so far as to close the churches, a procedure which the Council of Toledo (633) condemned. At the present day the Greek and Latin churches celebrate Good Friday with as strict severity as they do Easter with glad jubilation. The bells on the church-towers are silent, the light on the altars is extinguished, the altar furniture covered with black, and the usual communion omitted, the priest alone communicating. See EASTER.

GOOD FRIDAY, the anniversary of our Lord’s passion and death. In the early Church it was also known as the “Festival of the Crucifixion” (πάσχα σταυροσκύψαμον), the “Day of Salvation,” etc. Its observance must date back to the earliest period of the Church. The early Church kept it as a rigorous fast and period of mourning; for, although the crucifixion was the last atoning act of Christ’s life, yet it brought it us guilty to the Saviour, and removed him, for a time, from the disappointed disciples. The public services were conducted with deep solemnity and with the outward signs of sorrow. Constantine the Great (Euseb., Vita. I. 4) forbade the holding of judicial trials, markets, etc., on the day. In Spain they went so far as to close the churches, a procedure which the Council of Toledo (633) condemned. At the present day the Greek and Latin churches celebrate Good Friday with as strict severity as they do Easter with glad jubilation. The bells on the church-towers are silent, the light on the altars is extinguished, the altar furniture covered with black, and the usual communion omitted, the priest alone communicating. See EASTER.

GOODWILL, William D.D., eminent missionary of the American Board; b. at Templeton, Mass., Feb. 14, 1792; d. in Philadelphia, Monday, Feb. 18, 1867. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1817, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1820. Already in 1818 he had determined to become a foreign missionary: so after graduation, he studied medicine for a while, and then spent a year in visiting the churches as agent of the American Board. He sailed for Beyrouth, Dec. 9, 1822, where he arrived Nov. 18, 1823, having stopped for several months at Malta. He expected to proceed thence to Jerusalem; but the disturbed state of the country, in consequence of the Greek Revolution, prevented him. Finally (1828) all the missionaries in Beyrouth were compelled to leave Syria, owing to the withdrawal of all consular protection, and went to Malta. In 1831 he received instructions from the Board to begin a new mission to the Armenians at Constantinople, and there arrived June 9; and until 1865 he labored with fidelity, enthusiasm, and success. He was rarely gifted, full of general culture, guileless, simple, courageous to the last, above all, holy. He won hearts, and moulded lives. One of his most important labors was the translation of the Bible into Armenian-Turkish, which was begun in Syria; the New Testament finished Jan. 5, 1850, and the Old Testament, Nov. 8, 1841. See E. D. G. Prime: Forty Years in the Turkish Em-GOODWIN, John, an able Arminian divine and controversialist; b. in Norfolk, 1593; d. 1655. He was a fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge; vicar of St. Stephen's, London, 1633; lost his vicarage (1645) by his literary efforts against the Presbyterians, and was restored by Cromwell, to whom he rendered services by his tracts, Right & Might well met (1649), a justification of the proceedings of the army against the Parliament in 1648, and The Obstructors of Justice (1649), vindicating the sentence of the High Court of Justice upon Charles I. At the Restoration, the latter tract, with several of Milton's, was publicly burned, and Goodwin himself declared incapable of holding any office, ecclesiastical or civil. Dr. Goodwin was an Arminian in theology, and has been called the Wiclif of Methodism. He was educated at the University of Cambridge, and had a very happy faculty in descanting upon the Scriptures as to ring forth surprising remarks. Although his life was that of a lawyer, yet his tastes lay in the direction of philology. He edited the Anglo-Saxon Life of St. Guthlac, Anglo-Saxon Legends of St. Andrew and St. Veronica. He wrote, for the Cambridge Essays of 1658, an exhaustive essay upon Hieratic Papyri, and, for Essays and Reviews, upon Mosaic Cosmogony. He contributed to Lipsius' Zeitschrift für ägyptische Sprache, and prepared translations of the Egyptian monuments for Records of the Past. In the judgment of competent critics he occupied a first place among Egyptian decipherers.

GOODWIN, Thomas D.D., a "Patriarch and Atlas of Independency," b. at Rollesby, Norfolk, Eng., Oct. 5, 1600; d. in London, Feb. 23, 1679. He was educated at the University of Cambridge, and was successively fellow and preacher and vicar of Christ Church; but, unable to stand Laud's interference, he resigned his prebends in 1634, left the university, and went to London, where he married. He lived in Holland as pastor of a small English congregation at Arnheim, 1639-41; but, when Laud was effectually silenced, he returned to London, and was one of the eminent Independent ministers there. From January, 1650, to the Restoration, he was president of the Woodbridge College, and had a very happy faculty in descanting upon Scripture so as to bring forth surprising remarks, which yet generally tended to illustration." He is supposed to be the Puritan president described by Addison in No. 404 of the Spectator. His learning was very great, his spiritual experience profound, his controversial skill great, and his judgment of competent critics he occupied a first place among Egyptian decipherers.

GORHAM CASE, a case involving the tenets of the Church of England on the question of baptismal regeneration. In 1647 the Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Henry Phillpotts, an energetic and bold High-Churchman, refused to institute Mr. Gorham as vicar of Bramf ord-Speke, to which he had been appointed by the lord-chancellor. The ground was that Mr. Gorham denied spiritual regeneration to be conferred by the sacrament of baptism, or that infants were made members of Christ. The case was taken into the courts, and decided against Mr. Gorham by the Court of Arches (1649), on the ground that baptismal regeneration was the doctrine of the Church of England. The case being appealed to the privy council, this decision was reversed; it being held that a difference of opinion had prevailed amongst the English Reformers, and ever since among prelates. Mr. Gorham was consequently admitted to the vicarage. See Gorham versus the Bishop of Exeter. The Arguments, with the Judgments verbatim, before the Committee of Privy Council, the Court of Queen's Bench, etc. To which is added the Bishop of Exeter's Protest, and Mr. Gorham's Formal Institution. 5th ed., Lond., 1850.

GORIUN, an Armenian scholar from the fifth century; was a pupil of Mesrop, and by him sent to Constantinople to study Greek, and gather Greek manuscripts; partook with Esnich in the translation of the Bible and some works of the Greek fathers; was made bishop of a Georgian diocese, and wrote a life of Mesrop, which has been published by the Mekhitarists, Venice, 1833. See WELTE: Gorin's Lebensbesch. d. a. Mesrop, Tübingen, 1844.

GORTON, Samuel, b. at Groton, Eng., about 1600; d. in Warwick, R.I., November or December, 1677. Before coming to America, he was in the employ of a linen-draper in London; but, desiring more religious liberty, he emigrated to Boston, 1636; removed to Plymouth because of religious troubles; was banished the Colony for heresy (winter of 1637, 1638); went to Aquidneck, R.I., with a few followers; was publicly whipped for calling the magistrates "just assassins" (1641) to Providence, but again got into difficulties, and went (September, 1642) to Shawomet, on the west side of Narragansett Bay, where he purchased land from the Indians. In 1643 Gorton and ten of his sect were tried in Boston for "damnable heresy," found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged; afterwards they were allowed to leave the Colony in fourteen days. Gorton went to England, and returned (1648) with an order from the Earl of Warwick to the Massachusetts magistrates, that the Shawomet Colony should be allowed to continue. The first three years of Gorton's life were peaceful. He named the Colony Warwick, out of gratitude to the earl. His sect, which quickly died out, was called the "Gortonians." Their belief has been thus given:

"They contemned a clergy and all outward forms, held that by union with Christ believers partook of the perfection of God, that Christ is both human and divine, and that heaven and hell have no existence save in the mind." See Gorton's Simplicities Defence against seven-headed collections (1836), and in FORCE's Tracts (1846), vol. iv. no. 6; and Answer concerning Part of "New Englands Memorial," reprinted in FORCE's Tracts (1846), vol. iv. no. 7; also J. M. Mackie: Life of Samuel Gorton, Boston, 1848.

GO' Shen. See Egypt.

GO'SPEL and GO'SPELS. I. MEANING or the WORD—Gospel (Anglo-Saxon, "god-spell,"

"good spell," from spellian, "to tell") is the English equivalent for the Greek εὐαγγέλιον (from εὖ, "well," and ἀγάγεις, "to bear message"); εὐαγγέλιον, "to announce good news"); and the Latin evangelium, which has passed into French, German, Italian, and other modern languages. The Greek means (1) Reward for good news, given to the messenger, or to God, a thank-offering or sacrifice (so in Homer, Xenophon, Plutarch, etc., but always in the plural, ἀγάγειαν); (2) Good news, or glad tidings of any kind; (3) In the Christian sense, as used in the New Testament, good tidings of salvation by Jesus Christ; (4) In the ecclesiastical sense, the historical record of this salvation, or of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, or the gospel history, which we have in a fourfold form.

II. KINDS OF GOSPELS.—(1) Four Canonical Gospels, written by apostles and apostolic men, and recognized by the Christian church as authentic and reliable. (2) A large number of Apocryphal Gospels, of later and obscure origin, and rejected as mere fictions. They serve, however, the good purpose of confirming the truth of the Canonical Gospels, and show, by their infinite inferiority and silliness, the utter incapacity of the human imagination to produce such a character as Jesus of Nazareth. They are counterfeits and caricatures of the inimitable original. See Apocrypha of the New Testament. We confine ourselves here to the Canonical Gospels.

III. GENERAL CHARACTER of the GOSPELS.—They are beyond all question the most important and the most popular books ever written. They contain the only authentic record of the history of all histories, which interests the whole world, and can never grow old. The very opposition to them, and the immense and ever-growing literary interest that surrounds them, is a testimonial to their power and charm. And yet they were written by humble and unlearned fishermen of Galilee, but they were in the school of Christ, and filled with His Spirit. This, and this alone, explains the mystery. Without the miracle of Christ's person, the Gospel is mere stories of all miracles. They are properly only one and the same Gospel in its fourfold aspect and relation to the human race ("the fourfold Gospel," τετραδύομον εὐαγγέλιον, according to Irenaeus): hence they are styled in ancient manuscripts the Gospel according to (not of) the four, to indicate the four divisions of the second century, AD 60 and 70, certainly before the destruction of Jerusalem, to which they point as a future event, though near at hand. "This generation [then living] shall not pass away till all be fulfilled." Had they been written after the terrible catastrophe of 70, they would have referred to it in some way. The attempt of the Tubingen school to assign them to a later date, even the most advanced critics of that school (as Hilgenfeld and Keim) have returned to the traditional view, at least as far as Matthew is concerned; while Mark has been vindicated by other unbiased critics (Weisse, Wilke, Ewald, Meyer, Weiss) as the primitive Gospel, which faithfully records the oral preaching of Peter. The fourth Gospel was probably written towards the close of the first century, at Ephesus. Before the middle of the second century, all four were generally received and used in the churches as one collection. This is confirmed by the independent testimonies of the Ante-Nicene Fathers (Justin Martyr, Tatian, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Origin, etc.), by the Gnostics, and other heretics. They are not complete biographies of Jesus, but selections of characteristic features, as they seemed most important to each evangelist for his purpose. Justin Martyr (140) properly called them memoirs, or memorabilia (ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν ἀπόστων). The common aim of the Gospels is to lead the reader to the faith that Jesus of Nazareth is the promised Messiah of the Jews, and the Saviour of all men (John xx. 30, 31).

IV. CHARACTERISTIC Differences.—Each Gospel has a marked individuality, corresponding to the author's education, talent, taste, and mission. Matthew wrote in Palestine, and for Jews, to show them that Jesus is the fulfiller of prophecy, and the true King and Lawgiver of Israel; Mark, in Rome, for Roman readers, to exhibit Jesus as the mighty wonder-worker and Son of God; Luke, for Greeks and Gentiles, to set him forth as the merciful Saviour of all men; John, for Jewish and Gentile Christians combined, and for all future ages. Matthew (formerly a tax-gatherer, and accustomed to keeping accounts) follows the topical and rubricall order; Luke (an educated Hellenist and a physician), the chronological order; John (the trusted bosom-friend of Christ) combines both with an internal development of the growing antagonism between Christ and carnal Judaism, and from the first impressions of his master, the impassive Peter) fresh, rapid, graphic sketches. The first three evangelists agree much in matter and language, and are consequently called "Synoptists;" their Gospels, the "Synoptic Gospels." John stands alone, as the idealistic, speculative evangelist, who introduces us into the holy of holies: his Gospel is the purest, deepest, and sublimest of all literary compositions, the Gospel of Gospels, "the one, true, tender, main Gospel," "the heart of Christ." Yet the first three are just as necessary, and give the historical basis, the divine humanity of Christ; while John, going back to the eternal Logos, presents to us the incarnate divinity of Christ. The poetry and pictorial art of the Church (since the time of Irenæus and Jerome) has represented the four Gospels under the four rivers of Paradise, the four living creatures (Zoo of the Apocalypse (iv. 4–9, etc.), which reflect the Divine majesty and strength in the animal creation. To Matthew is assigned the figure of a man; to Mark, the lion; to Luke, the sacrificial ox; to John, the soaring eagle. Adam of St. Victor, the greatest Latin poet of the middle ages, has devoted two of his finest poems to this subject. His description of John is very musical and striking:

"Volat avis sine meta
Quo nec vates, nec propheta
Tam implenda quam impleta,
Nunquam vidit tot secreta
Purus homo purior." (1)

V. CREDIBILITY OF THE GOSPELS. — They make upon every unsophisticated reader the impression of absolute honesty and trustworthiness. They cannot possibly be the mythical or legendary production of a pious fancy (as Strauss and Renan would fain make us believe), or of a calculating adaptation to certain religious tendencies (Baur and the Tubingen school). It would take more than a Jesus to invent a Jesus. The evangelists tell with the utmost frankness and simplicity the story of Christ, without note or comment, without mentioning their name, without concealment of the errors and failings of the disciples (themselves included), even the denial of their leader, and the treason of Judas. The discrepancies in details only heighten the credibility, and exclude the suspicion of collusion and conspiracy. They show the independence of their witness to the essential facts. The genuineness and truthfulness of these books rest on stronger evidence than that of any other historical records, ancient or modern. This has been acknowledged by eminent writers who are free from all doctrinal or sectarian bias. Goethe says, "I regard the Gospels as thoroughly genuine; for we see in them the reflection of a majesty which proceeded from the person of Christ,—a majesty which is as divine as anything that ever appeared on earth." Rousseau remarks that "the gospel history can be no fiction, else the inventor would be greater than the hero" (L'homme que rien n'efface). And yet the Jesus of the Gospels is admitted by all competent judges to be the purest character conceivable. If there is no truth and reality in him, it is nowhere to be found. Take away the historical Christ, the Life and Light of the world, and history is as dark as midnight; but with him it is a revelation of the infinite wisdom and love of God in the salvation of mankind. — For particulars, see Arts. Harmony, SYNOPSIS, MATTHEW, MARK, LUKE, and JOHN.

VI. LIT. — This has immensely increased in the last thirty years, in connection with the numerous Lives of Jesus, e.g., by Strauss, Keim, Weiss, Edersheim; see List under art. Jesus Christ. We mention here:

(2) The general commentaries on the Gospels, by Olshausen, De Wette, Meyer, Lange, Naast, Keil, Alford, Wordsworth, also the Speaker's Report (with an analysis of the four cherubim figures of Ezekiel (i. 15, x. 1, xi. 22), and the four living creatures (Zoa) of the Apocalypse (iv. 4–9, etc.), which reflect the Divine majesty and strength in the animal creation. To Matthew is assigned the figure of a man; to Mark, the lion; to Luke, the sacrificial ox; to John, the soaring eagle. Adam of St. Victor, the greatest Latin poet of the middle ages, has devoted two of his finest poems to this subject. His description of John is very musical and striking:

"Volat avis sine meta
Quo nec vates, nec propheta
Tam implenda quam impleta,
Nunquam vidit tot secreta
Purus homo purior." (1)

(4) Critical discussions on the origin, genuineness, and inter-relationship of the Gospels began with Eichhorn, Marsh, and Schleiermacher, and were carried on chiefly by Gieseler, Bleek, Hilgenfeld, Holtzmann, Ewald, Renan (Les Évangiles, 1877), Bleek, Wieseler, Ebrard, Weiss, Weizäcker, the anonymous author of Supernatural Religion, reviewed and refuted by Lightfoot (in the Contempory Review, 1875 sqq.).

GOSSNER, Johannes Evangelista, b. at Hauin the latter part of the fourth century, a great portion of the Visigoths, pushed beyond the Danube by the advancing Huns, came to settle within the boundaries of the Eastern Empire, conflict arose with the Orthodox Church. The Emperor Theodosius (379-395) seems to have treated the matter with great delicacy. But his exertions to bring the Goths over to the Orthodox Church failed, and so did those of Chrysostom.

Immediately after the death of Theodosius the Visigoths arose, and began to wander. Under the leadership of Alaric they invaded Greece in 395, and took and sacked Athens. In 402 they broke into Italy, and in 410 they took and sacked Rome. But it was Paganism, and not Christianity, which suffered under this calamity. The Pagan inhabitants were scattered to the winds; while the Christians remained, and even enriched themselves by appropriating the Pagan temples, and transforming them into Christian churches. Alaric's son, Ataulf, married Placidia, sister to the Emperor Honorius, left Italy, and founded in Southern Gaul a Gothic empire, with Toulouse as his residence. Of the rulers of this empire Theodoric I. fought by the side of the Roman governor of Gaul, Aëtius, on the Catalanian field (415), against Attila; and Theodoric II. invaded and conquered Spain (466). In the beginning the Arian Goths lived peaceably among the orthodox Romans and Romanized Celts in Gaul; but when their king, Euric (466-483), instituted persecutions, partly from religious and partly from political reasons, the orthodox made an alliance with the Frankish king, Clovis, who defeated the Goths at Vouillé, near Poitiers (507), and drove them beyond the Pyrenees. In Spain the Gothic Empire flourished until overthrown by the Saracens after the battle of Xeres de la Frontera (711). But in Spain the Goths were converted. At the Council of Toledo (581), the Arians under the king, Leo-vidil, and the Catholics under their metropolitan, Leander, met together, and a grand disputation was held, the result of which was, that, at the next Council of Toledo (589), King Reccared and most of his Gothic subjects abjured Arianism.

Meanwhile the Ostrogoths had first followed Attila, and fought with him against Aëtius and Theodoric; then, after Attila's death, they separated from the Huns, and settled in Pannonia; and finally, under their great king, Theodoric (475-528), they conquered Illyria and Thessalia from the Eastern Empire, defeated Odoacer several times in Northern Italy, captured Rome, and formed a great empire, bounded north-west and north by the Rhone and the Danube, and with Ravenna for its capital. The Ostrogoths were also Arians; but Theodoric's relations with the Catholic Church in Italy were most friendly. He protected and enriched it, which, perhaps, was due to the influence of his counsellor, Cassiodorus. Only when the East-Roman emperor, Justin, issued edicts against the Arians among his subjects, and even raised persecutions against them, Theodoric was provoked, not to retaliation, but to a kind of self-defence. He sent the Bishop of Rome, John, to Constantinople, and, as this had no result, he felt sure of his case; and the Pope was imprisoned, and the senators Symmachus, Albinus, and Boethius were beheaded. But Theodoric died the very next year, and... with his death began immediately the dissolution of the Ostrogothic Empire. During the next twenty-six years, or until the defeat of Tejas by Narses (552), the religious questions were completely at rest; and, with the death of Tejas, not only the Ostrogothic Empire, but the Ostrogoths themselves, disappeared from history.

GOTTSCHALK, a monk, and the originator of the predestination controversy in the tenth century; was, while yet a child, brought to the monastery of Fulda, but protested afterwards, when he grew up, that it had been done against his will. The synod of Mayence (829) declared in favor of releasing him from his vow; but his abbot, Rabanus, refused to do so, and Gottschalk was sent to the monastery of Orbais, in the diocese of Soissons, where he remained a monk. But his doctrines were condemned as heretical; and the view he adopted or developed he took no pains to conceal. Already in 840 Bishop Noting of Verona told Rabanus, whom he met in the emperor's camp on the Lahn, of the confusion Gottschalk had caused on a visit to Italy by his views of predestination, according to which God was the author of evil, and forced the lost to sin. Afterwards, when Gottschalk visited Italy a second time, Rabanus, now Archbishop of Mayence, wrote to the Count of Friuli, and warned him against the heresies of the subtle monk. Gottschalk wandered, preaching, through Dalmatia and Pannonia, to Bavaria, and arrived at Mayence in the fall, while the general diet was sitting. Before a synod of German bishops, convened by Rabanus, he laid his confession of the double predestination, and accused Rabanus of Semi-Pelagianism. But his doctrines were condemned as heretical; and he was sent to Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims and his metropolitan superior, to be imprisoned and punished. In the spring of 849 Hincmar convened a synod of French bishops at Quiercy; and not only were the doctrines of Gottschalk condemned, but his papers were burnt, and he himself was cruelly whipped, and then shut up half dead in the dungeon of the monastery of Hautvilliers. He remained, however, firm to the last. On his death-bed (868) the sacrament was offered him on the condition that he should recant; but he refused. But Gottschalk was finally defeated by Duke Bernard of Saxony, and taken prisoner, and in his captivity he returned to Christianity. After a stay of ten years at the court of Canute the Great, King of Denmark and England, he went back to Wendland, and by the aid of Canute he united (1047) Holstein, Mecklenburg, Pomerania, and the Brandenburg districts under a powerful Wendish empire. He became himself one of the most zealous missionaries Christianity ever had had in those regions. He translated the liturgical formulas into the Wendish tongue; he built schools, churches, and monasteries; and he preached himself to his subjects. But there was among the Wends an actual hatred to Christianity. It broke out once more; and June 7, 1068, Gottschalk was murdered by his Pagan countrymen.

the oracle of his time." In his early ministry he was brought into trouble with King James and the government by his publication of Henry Finch on The Calling of the Jews (1621), and was thrown into prison. After nine weeks he was released, having given a statement of his own opinions, which were entirely orthodox. He took his degree of doctor of divinity in 1628. Several volumes of his sermons were issued, The Whole Armour of God (1618, 4to, pp. 229), Domestic Duties (1622, 3d ed., 1634, 4to, pp. 704), Guide to go to God (1629, 4to, pp. 340), God's Three Arrows (1631, pp. 176), The Saint's Sacrifice (1632, pp. 290), and others. He was also distinguished for his method of catechising, which was first published without his knowledge, but afterwards revised and edited by himself in many editions; the eighth volume of his sermons were issued, The Whole armour of God (1633, 4to), containing a finger and lesser catechism, with prayers. In 1643 he was made a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and took an active part in their proceedings, in 1647, taking the place of Herbert Palmer, latey deceased, as one of the assessors. He was on the committee of divines, and the minister's, chosen with others to write the Assembly's Annotations on the Bible, his part being from 1 Kings to Job. He assisted in the preparation of the Westminster Confession of Faith and in the conflict with the separatists of the day. He was chosen prolocutor of the first Provincial Assembly of London, May 3, 1647, and was a recognized leader of the London ministers, uniting with them in protesting against the murder of Charles I. and the usurpations of Cromwell. His last work was his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, which he barely lived to finish, and which was published after his death, by his son, in 1650 (2 vols. folio).—a very able and useful work of exposition, and of permanent value to the Church.

For further information, see his Life by his son, in the Introduction to the folio edition of the Commentary on Hebrews: also in Clark's Lives of 32 English Divines, 3d ed., 1677; Rein's Memoirs of Westminster Divines, 1811; Brook: Lives of Puritans, vol. III. p. 165.

C. A. BRIGGS.

GOULART, Simon, b. at Senlis, 1543; d. at Geneva, 1628; was pastor, and, after the death of Beza, president of the clergy of Geneva. He was a learned man and a prolific writer, though most of his works (of which a list is given in Sénébière, histoire littérale de Genève, II. 72) are collections: as, for instance, Memoires de la Ligne, Geneva, 1590-99, 6 vols., re-edited and augmented by Goujet, Amsterdam, 1758; Recueil des choses notables sous Henri II., 1593, etc.

GOVINDA. See Srius.

GO'ZAN (Heb. גוזן; Assyr. Kuza-na; LXX. Γοζᾶν) is mentioned in the following passages of the Old Testament: 2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11, xix. 12 (= Isa. xxxvii. 12); 1 Chron. v. 26. From these we learn that it was a place which Assyrian kings had subjugated, and that by the "river of Gozan" (= the Habor; Assyr. ḫabur) the conqueror of Samaria (Sargon), and Tiglath Pileser, or Pul, before him, had made settlements of Israelitish captives. The cuneiform inscriptions locate Gozan between the Tigris and the Euphrates. But probably the Habor, a large eastern tributary of the Euphrates, is its mention (2 Kings xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12) in connection with the Mesopotamian names Haran, Rezeph, and B'né Eden, are additional proofs of this location. Gozan was originally the name of a city, and always appears with the prefix "city" in the inscriptions: later the name seems to have been applied to a district. It is in all likelihood the Banūt its of Ptolemy (Geogr., V. 17 (18), ed. Wilberg.), lying in northern Mesopotamia.

GRAAL, The Holy (also called "St. Grail," "Sangreal," etc., and incorrectly spelled "Grail"), is the name of the bowl out of which our Lord, on the night of his betrayal, ate the Paschal lamb. It was removed from the upper room by Joseph of Arimathea, and used by him to catch the blood from Christ's wounds as the body was taken down from the cross. Joseph carried it with him to Britain, whither he was sent by Philip the Evangelist. The Holy Grail figures largely in the Arthurian legends, and is the subset of one of Tennyson's idyls. It had miraculous qualities. By it Joseph was kept alive, without food, for forty-two years while imprisoned by the Jews; and by it he was spiritually enlightened. One of Joseph's descendants, to whom the keeping of the Holy Grail had come, proved unworthy, and the cup was lost. Arthur's knights endeavored to recover it; but all save Sir Galahad failed, because it could not be found by any one who was not a virgin in body. Several churches in France and Italy claimed to have it; and there is now in Genoa a cup brought by the Crusaders of 1101, which was at one time considered the Holy Grail. The explanation of all this is, that by the Holy Grail is meant the holy wafer which has been transmuted into the veritable body of Christ. The legend is, therefore, a legend of the Eucharist. The "quest of the Holy Grail" is the attempt to see the Saviour as he is revealed in the Eucharist.

"The word 'grail' is a corruption of gradale, or graduale, the Latin name for a liturgical collection of psalms, and texts of Scripture, so called because they are sung as the priest is passing from the epistle to the gospel side of the altar. The author of the Grail conception meant by grail, or gradale, not the sacred dish (escuelte), but the mysterious book revealed to the supposed hermit of 717, in which he finds the history of the escuelte." The author of the legend was probably Walter Map, a canon of Salisbury, in the twelfth century. From England it spread all over Europe. Besides the derivation already given, there are others, as from the Old French graual ("the sacramental cup"), a corruption of sanguinis realis, corrupted to sangreal, sangreal. See the comprehensive article of Thomas Arnold, in the 9th ed. Encycl. Brit., vol. x1. pp. 34-36; also Villemarque: Les romans de la table ronde, Paris, 1890; F. J. Furnivall's edition of a manuscript History of the Holy Grail, London, 1874; Paulin Paris: Romans de la table ronde, Paris, 1876; E. Hucher: Le St. Grail, ou le Joseph d'Arimathie, Le Mans, 1877-79.

GRABE, Johann Ernst, b. at Königsberg, July 10, 1868; d. in London, Nov. 13, 1711; went to GRACE.

GRACE. The grace of God is the underlying principle and essential characteristic of the Christian religion. The doctrine has a place, and sheds a peculiar lustre, in all the five divisions of systematic theology. It is to a certain extent the crown of the divine attributes, appears in anthropology as the decree of salvation, is the fundamental idea of Christ's life and work, underlies the agency of the Spirit, and accomplishes its perfect work in the consummation of redemption in the life to come. God shows himself gracious by hearing prayer (Exod. xxii. 27), foregoing wrath (xxxi. 12), and the eternal good pleasure (didoxiu) and fore-ordination (Gen. iii. 15) of God, extended toward sinners, and overcoming the resistance by ethical means. It is its very essence to destroy the guilt of sin, and redeem the sinner. It was, however, not for the first time called into exercise at the fall, but was active in the spiritual good pleasure (cosolos) and foreordination (paroxous) of God. It is the harmonious co-working of love and justice. The relation of grace to mercy is this: grace removes guilt, mercy removes misery from all creatures that suffer. Grace to mercy is this: grace removes guilt, mercy transforms death into the poison of death, or the effectual steps (gradus) leading up to the altar. Grace, however, is irresistible; but the Roman Catholics, Arminians, and Socinians allow a co-operation of the human will before repentance, so long as this is not confused with the final judgment. The grace of God in Christ has established a kingdom of grace which lies intermediate between the kingdoms of wrath and glory. This kingdom is the Christian Church, so far as Christ's word and spirit rule in her. Connected herewith is the idea of the duration of the period of grace. For the world, it is limited by the general judgment; for the individual, it reaches out through purgatory, according to the Roman-Catholic view: according to the Scriptures, however, it is measured by the obduracy of the sinner. But the Church properly regards the termination of the lives of the impenitent as a judgment, so long as this is not confused with the final judgment. The design of grace, however, is the perfection of man, and his glorification in heaven. The reward he will there receive will be in consequence of works of faith; but he will receive it upon the basis of grace, and from the hands of grace.

J. P. LANGE.

GRADUAL, a part of a psalm chanted in the mass between the epistle and the gospel: formerly called antiphonarium, or responsorium; received the name of "gradual" from its being sung from the steps (gradus) leading up to the altar.

GRAHAM, Isabella, an eminent Christian philanthropist, b. in Lanark, Scotland, July 29, 1742; d. in New York, July 27, 1814. She joined the Presbyterian Church at Paisley under Dr. Witherspoon, afterwards president of Princeton College. In 1765 she married Dr. Graham, a surgeon in the English army, with whom she went to Carolina, and subsequently to Georgia, where he died (1774). Returning in poverty to Scotland, she taught school in Paisley and in Edinburgh. In 1789, at the advice of Dr. Witherspoon, she embarked for New York, where she established a successful seminary for young ladies.

The grace of God is more than an attribute of his nature, it is the very soul of revelation. God's eternal decree of grace (§ 80) defines it as the power of the divine conciousness in the soul. Grace is the benevolence of God extended toward sinners, and overcoming their resistance by ethical means. It is its very nature to destroy the guilt of sin, and redeem the sinner. It was, however, not for the first time called into exercise at the fall, but was active in the spiritual good pleasure (cosolos) and foreordination (paroxous) of God. It is the harmonious co-working of love and justice. The relation of grace to mercy is this: grace removes guilt, mercy removes misery from all creatures that suffer. But they not only remove, they make evil to work upon the basis of grace, and from the hands of grace. But they not only remove, they make evil to work upon the basis of grace, and from the hands of grace. But they not only remove, they make evil to work upon the basis of grace, and from the hands of grace.

The design of grace, however, is the perfection of man, and his glorification in heaven. The reward he will there receive will be in consequence of works of faith; but he will receive it upon the basis of grace, and from the hands of grace.
Mrs. Graham was foremost among the women of her day, in New-York City, in all benevolent enterprises. She was a pioneer in "woman's work" for woman in America. In 1796 she formed the New-York missionary society for the Indians, and in 1797 helped to found the society for the relief of poor widows with small children, in 1806 presided at a meeting for the organization of the first asylum for orphan children in the city, and in 1811 of a Magdalene society. She was also widely known for her activity in the church (Dr. John Mason's) with which she was connected, and for distributing Bibles among the poor, long before the Bible Society was established. See Life and Letters, last edition, London, 1888; Mason (her pastor): Life of Isabella Graham, Tract Society, New York; Mrs. Bethune (mother of Dr. Bethune, and her daughter): Letters and Correspondence of Mrs. Graham, 1888.

Grahame, James, a religious poet; b. at Glasgow, April 22, 1765; d. at Sedgfield, Durham, Eng., Sept. 14, 1811. After practising law for many years, he took orders in the Church of England, and became curate of Shipton and Sedgfield successively. He is best known as the author of The Sabbath (1804), a poem in blank verse, descriptive of the sabbath of his native land, and characterized by a fine vein of tender and devotional feeling, and by a happy delineation of Scottiah scenery."

Grandmont, or Grammont, Order of, one of the many religious orders arising in the latter part of the eleventh century; was founded in 1073 by Stephenus of Tigrerno, whose life has been written by Gerhard, the seventh prior of Grandmont, and is found in Martene and Durand (Ampias. Collectio, VI. p. 1050). Born at Thiers (Tigrerno), 1048, he was educated by Bishop Milo of Benevento, and returned to France in 1073, having obtained permission of Gregory VII. to found a religious order after the model of the Calabrian monks. He settled in Auvergne, at Muret, and found followers. After his death, Feb. 8, 1124, his disciples moved to the desert of Grandmont, after which they were called. The third successor of Stephen (Stephen of Lisias) gave a new and still more rigorous set of rules. The order suffered very much from internal dissensions, and was finally dissolved during the revolution. See Elammon: Annal. Ord. S. Bened., V.; and Helvot: Histoire des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols. (vii. pp. 470-493). Zöckler.

Grant, Asahel, M.D., an American missionary; b. in Marshall, N.Y., Aug. 17, 1807; d. at Mosul, Persia, April 24, 1844. He was practising medicine in Utica, when his interest was excited in missions, and he was commissioned in 1835 by the American Board to labor among the Nestorians of Persia. The chief seat of his labors was Oromiah. He gained the confidence of the Persian officials, and, in the terrible war of the Khords against the Nestorians, succeeded in ministering to their wants. Under the commission of Dr. Griswold, he published The Nestorians, or the Lost Tribes, London, 1841, 3d ed., 1844. See Lovethrop: Memoir of A. Grant, M.D., New York, 1847; Laurie.

Grant and the Mountain Nestorians, Boston, 3d ed., 1856.

Gratian, b. at Sirmium, 359; killed at Lyons, Aug. 25, 389; son of his father, Valentinian I., on the throne of the West-Roman Empire, 375, and his uncle Valens, on that of the East-Roman Empire, 378. In the last year he chose Theodosius as co-regent. The policy which he pursued with respect to the Church, and in which he was pushed still farther onward by Theodosius, was of decisive consequences. Religious liberty reigned; that is, Paganism, Arianism, and Catholicism were allowed to fight each other with what means they possessed. Under the influence of Ambrosius, Gratian made Catholicism not only the ruling, but the only tolerated Church. In 376 he forbade all heretics to assemble for any religious purpose, confiscated the property belonging to their churches, and transferred the buildings to the Catholics. In 377 he exempted all officers of the Catholic Church, down to the ostensarius, from all municipal services and all practising laws. In 390 he renewed even made the retail trade which the lower clergy was used to carry on in Illyria, Italy, and Gaul, free of duty. In 381 the Council of Constantinople spoke the anathema over all non-Nicene denominations. After the ascension of Theodosius, Paganism was treated with the same severity as heretical Christianity. In 381 apostates from Christianity to Paganism lost their right to make a will. In 382 all sacerdotal privileges, even those of the vestal virgins, and all state-support, were withdrawn from Paganism, and real estate belonging to the Pagan temples was confiscated. Edicts against sacrifices, haruspices, etc., followed. The altar of victory in the hall of the senate was removed; and the emblems of the office of Pontifex Maximus Gratian declined to accept, because they were to him, as a Christian, a scandal. Of course, for these measures, the Pagan historians compared him with Nero; while the Catholics almost defied him. Adolphe Harnack.

Gratiani, the compiler of the Decretum Gratiani; was a monk, first in Closae, near Raveonna, afterwards in St. Felix, in Bologna; but the dates of his birth and death are unknown. About his work, which he finished in 1141 or 1151, see the art. on Canon Law.

Gratry, Father, b. at Lille, March 30, 1805; d. at Montreux, near Lausanne, Feb. 7, 1872; studied in Paris, but entered, after having determined to devote his 75th to the service of God, the convent of Buchenberg in the Vosges. After the revolution of 1830, the convent was dissolved, and Father Gratry was appointed teacher of theology and philosophy, first in the seminary of Strassburg (1839-42), afterwards in the Stanislas College, in Paris (1842-47). In 1839 he published the order of the Oratorians; and from 1868 he lectured on theology and philosophy in the Sorbonne. He followed a somewhat similar direction as that of Lamennais, Lacordaire, and Montalembert; but he was of a milder and more poetic disposition. During the Council of the Vatican he published four letters in opposition to the doctrine of papal infallibility; but, when the dogma was promulgated, he accepted it. Most of his works are half devotional, and half GREECE.

It was almost indispensable for a Roman youth learning and art, Athens still held the first rank. The procousul resided at Corinth, which, politically and commercially, was the most important city of the country. As a place, however, of learning and art, Athens still held the first rank. It was almost indispensable for a Roman youth who wanted to distinguish himself in life to go to Athens and study. Her schools of grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, and philosophy, were crowded; though they had lost all productivity, and labored only as educational institutions. Christianity was first planted in these regions by Paul, on his second voyage (51). He first visited Philippi (Acts xvi. 12), then Thessalonica, then Beraea, then Athens (Acts xvi. xvii., xviii.): only the last two cities belonged to Achaia. But, while the congregation of Corinth became one of Paul's most brilliant and most important foundations, very little is heard of the congregation of Athens. Paul's stay there was very brief; but his address on Mars' Hill was one of the most remarkable speeches in history, whether we consider the speaker, the audience, or the theme (xvii. 22-31). Dionysius the Areopagite, converted on this occasion, is said to have been its first bishop. The reason why the first city in the world, in intellectual respects, showed itself so singularly backward in its relation to Christianity, was, no doubt, the presence of the above-mentioned schools, which made it the very centre of Paganism. They were closed by Justinian, A.D. 529. In the interior of Peloponnese, Paganism was found as late as the fourteenth century. Leo the Legates, in the beginning of the eighth century, laid Achaia under the authority of the Patriarch of Constantinople; and there it remained for more than a thousand years.

During the war of independence (1821-27) the connection between the Church of Greece and the Patriarch of Constantinople gradually loosened: he received no reverence from the country, and the ecclesiastics he appointed and sent thither were not accepted. Capodistrias favored the separation; and (July 23, 1833) the regency took the decisive step, and declared, on the instance of thirty-six metropolitans assembled at Nauplia, that the Orthodox Church of Greece was independent of any foreign authority. The new church organization was moulded after the model of the Russian Church; but the union of Church and State, still cherished by the political party, because the present king is a Protestant (Lutheran), from Denmark, while the Czar is actual head of the Church in Russia. At the head of the whole Church was placed a permanent synod, consisting of two royal officials and five ecclesiastics, chosen annually by the king. This synod, in whose discussions the royal officials have a right to participate, though without voting, has full authority in all purely spiritual matters; but in matters also presenting a civil aspect, such as marriage, divorce, excommunication of laymen, appointment of feasts and fasts, etc., it shares its authority with the civil government. At the same time the ecclesiastical division of the country was made to correspond with the political, and the number of monasteries was reduced; that of male monasteries from 400 to 82, that of female monasteries from 450 to 917, belonging to other religious communities. In 1879 there were 16,084 persons in the country not belonging to the State Church.

At the beginning of the Christian era those territories which now form the kingdom of Greece formed the Roman province of Achaea. The proconsul resided at Corinth, which, politically and commercially, was the most important city of the country. As a place, however, of learning and art, Athens still held the first rank. It was almost indispensable for a Roman youth...

GRAUL.

Karl, b. at Worlitz, in Anhalt-Dessau, Feb. 6, 1814; d. at Erlangen, Nov. 10, 1864; studied theology at Leipzig; lived for some time in Italy; studied and traveled in France in an English family; published in 1843 a translation of Dante's Inferno, with theological explanations; and was in 1844 appointed director of the missionary society in Dresden. This institution he gradually raised from a very subordinate to a very prominent position, making it the missionary organ of the whole Lutheran Church, instead of a mere appendix to the missionary society of Basel. In 1848 he had it removed to Leipzig in order to give the students the benefit of the university. The point upon which he concentrated the energy of the institution was the Tamil, a nation of about twelve millions of souls in Southern India; and the object was not simply to make converts, but to convert the whole people. From 1849 to 1853 he made a visit to the country himself, published a description of his journey (in five volumes, Leipzig, 1853-56), wrote a Tamil grammar, and brought back some of the principal monuments of Tamil literature, which he edited, partly with German, and partly with English translations (Bibliotheca Tamulica, Leipzig, 1854-56, 3 vols.). His views of the attitude which the missionary ought to assume with respect to the question of caste, differed radically from those entertained by the English missionaries; which occasioned him to publish an English pamphlet at Madras (1852), and a German at Leipzig (1861), in their defence. In 1860 his failing health compelled him to retire. Among his other works are Unterschiede der Lehren (1845, 9th ed. by Harnack, 1872), Indische Singpflanzen (1864), etc. LUTHERD.

GRAVEN IMAGES. See IDOLATRY.

GRAVES, Richard, D.D., b. at Killinarn, Ireland, Oct. 1, 1783; d. March 29, 1829; Dean of Armagh, and Regius, Trinity College, Dublin, 1813; author of the Organellar Lectures for 1797-1801, On the Four Last Books of the Pentateuch, London, 1807, 2 vols. His whole works were collected (London, 1840, 4 vols.) with a biography by his son.

GREECE, The Kingdom of, such as its boundaries were fixed by the great powers of Europe, July 21, 1832, comprises an area of 19,353 square miles, and has (according to the census of 1879) 1,079,775 inhabitants, of whom an immense majority belong to the Orthodox Greek Church. By the treaty of Berlin, Thessaly has been added to the kingdom. In 1870 there were in Greece 12,585 Roman Catholics, 2,582 Jews, and 917 belonging to other religious communities. In 1879 there were 16,084 persons in the country not belonging to the State Church.

During the war of independence (1821-27) the connection between the Church of Greece and the Patriarch of Constantinople gradually loosened: he received no reverence from the country, and the ecclesiastics he appointed and sent thither were not accepted. Capodistrias favored the separation; and (July 23, 1833) the regency took the decisive step, and declared, on the instance of thirty-six metropolitans assembled at Nauplia, that the Orthodox Church of Greece was independent of any foreign authority. The new church organization was moulded after the model of the Russian Church; but the union of Church and State, still cherished by the political party, because the present king is a Protestant (Lutheran), from Denmark, while the Czar is actual head of the Church in Russia. At the head of the whole Church was placed a permanent synod, consisting of two royal officials and five ecclesiastics, chosen annually by the king. This synod, in whose discussions the royal officials have a right to participate, though without voting, has full authority in all purely spiritual matters; but in matters also presenting a civil aspect, such as marriage, divorce, excommunication of laymen, appointment of feasts and fasts, etc., it shares its authority with the civil government. At the same time the ecclesiastical division of the country was made to correspond with the political, and the number of monasteries was reduced; that of male monasteries from 400 to 82, that of female to three,—probably with an eye to the fact that in Greece are more men than women (a majority of 82,385 in 1879). The country is divided into eleven archbishoprics and thirteen bishoprics. An archbishop's salary is a hundred and eighty pounds; a bishop's, a hundred and forty-five pounds; they are paid by the State. The lower clergy is not paid at all, but lives by fees for... prayers, exorcisms, consecrations, purifications, and other spiritual services. The total number of ecclesiastics was 5,102 in 1861. There were 1,600 monks and 1,500 nuns in 1879.

In Greece the Church forms the strongest band around the nation,—much stronger than either blood or speech. During the war of independence the Moslems of Crete and the Latins of Syros sided with the Turks, though they were of the purest Greek descent, and spoke the Greek language. Under such circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the missions which have been established in the country by the Protestant Church, by the Episcopal Church, by the American Board of Missions, and, lately, by the Danish Board of Missions, and, lately, by the Danish, have had very little success. In 1886 the Archbishop of Athens communicated all the families which allowed their children to be educated in the English and American mission schools, though the religious instruction was given there by a member of the Orthodox Greek Church. It was hoped that the university established at Athens in 1837 would have an influence on this stubborn narrowness. But of its twelve hundred and forty-four students in 1872, only twenty-six studied theology. Besides the theological faculty of the university, there are four theological seminaries, one in Athens, and three in the provinces; but they had in 1872 only a hundred and fifteen students in all. The lower clergy in Greece receives no education at all. The Anglican Church maintains five chaplains in Athens, Syros, Patras, Corfu, and Zante, who stand under the Bishop of Gibraltar.

Protestant Missions in Athens. These are not extensive. 1. The pioneer missionary was the Rev. John Henry Hill, D.D., LL.D., b. New York, Sept. 11, 1791; sailed with his wife for Athens, September, 1830; d. there July 1, 1862. He was careful to avoid collision with the Greek hierarchy; did not attempt to organize a church, but confined himself to teaching. His school of six hundred pupils is still kept up. The children are taught, besides the usual secular branches, Bible history, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and the Nicene Creed in its original form (i.e., without the Filioque clause). This mission is supported by the (American) Church Missionary Society.

2. The Southern Presbyterian Church has two missionaries in Athens. Rev. Mr. Sampson and Rev. Mr. Kaloyanakis, M.D. They have a fine church at the foot of the Acropolis. In connection with this mission is a union depot of the Episcopal Church at the foot of the Acropolis. In connection with the mission is a union depot of the Episcopal Church, under the Bishop of Gibraltar.

Protestant Missions in Athens. These are not extensive. 1. The pioneer missionary was the Rev. John Henry Hill, D.D., LL.D., b. New York, Sept. 11, 1791; sailed with his wife for Athens, September, 1830; d. there July 1, 1862. He was careful to avoid collision with the Greek hierarchy; did not attempt to organize a church, but confined himself to teaching. His school of six hundred pupils is still kept up. The children are taught, besides the usual secular branches, Bible history, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and the Nicene Creed in its original form (i.e., without the Filioque clause). This mission is supported by the (American) Church Missionary Society.

3. Near the Presbyterian Church is a Baptist mission in a private house, conducted by another Americanized Greek, Rev. Mr. Sakellarios.

The hero of Protestant missions in Greece is Rev. Dr. Jonas King, who died in 1869 (see art.). The Woman's Union Missionary Society had a girl's school in Athens; but the government closed it because the teachers refused to teach the Greek Catechism and to hang up a picture of the Virgin Mary. This is an instance in the vast empire of Russia, which was Christianized in the ninth and tenth centuries by missionaries from Constantinople, and matrimonial connection with the Byzantine court.

III. Division. The Greek Church is divided into several great branches. 1. The Orthodox Church in Turkey, under the Patriarch of Constantinople, with the subordinate patriarchates of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch. Constantinople, the city of the first Christian emperor (New Rome), though now in the hands of the Turk, is still the natural centre of the whole Greek Church, and may become for the Eastern world at some future day, in Christian hands, what Gregory Nazianzen eloquently described it to be in the fourth century, "the eye of the world, the strongest by sea and land, the bond of union between East and West, to which the most distant extremes from all sides converge, which they look up as to a common centre and emporium of the faith."

2. The Orthodox Church in Russia, which was at first subject to the Patriarch of Constantinople, then under a special Patriarch of Moscow (since 1802), and now (since 1721) under the permanent holy synod of St. Petersburg and the Czar, whose dominion stretches in an unbroken line across the two Continents of Europe and Asia. The Czar is the personal, as Constantinople is the local, centre of the whole Greek Church; and he keeps a lustful eye upon the city of the Bosphorus, her future capital, where, at no distant day, there must be a tremendous reckoning with Mohammedanism.

3. The National Church of the kingdom of Greece, which since 1833 is governed likewise by a permanent holy synod, but less dependent upon the State than the Russian Church. See GREECE.

4. The Greek Church in the formerly Turkish provinces of Servia, Roumania, and Montenegro, are now independent of the Patriarch of Constantinople, and ruled by their metropolitans and synods, more or less under the influence of Russia. Distinct from these, and belonging to the Roman Church, are the united Greeks, scattered through Turkey, Hungary, Galicia, Transylvania, and Russia, but chiefly in Austria and Poland, and numbering in all about four millions and a half. They acknowledge the authority of the Pope, and adopt the dogmas of the double procession of the Holy Spirit, but are otherwise allowed to hold to their ancient discipline, marriage of the lower clergy, communion under both kinds (communio sub utraque), leavened bread, their liturgy, and the use of the Greek language.

6. The Greek, or rather Oriental Schismatics, Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians, Copts, and Abyssinians, are separated from the Greek and Latin Catholic Church, mostly on the dogma of the process of deeneracy and stagnation had already set in; and the former life and vigor of the Greek Church had given way to idle speculations, distracting controversies, and stagnation; she is iso ated from the main current of progressive Christendom; her languages and literature are little known among Western scholars. Yet this Church is the oldest in Christendom, and for several centuries she was the chief bearer of our religion. She still occupies the sacred territory of primitive Christianity, and claims most of the apostolic sees, as Jerusalem, Antioch, and the churches founded by Paul and John in Asia Minor and Greece. All the apostles, with the exception of Peter and Paul, labored and died in the East. From the old Greeks she inherited the language and certain national traits of character, while she incorporated into herself also much of Jewish and Oriental piety. She produced the first Christian literature, apologetics of the Christian faith, refutations of heretics, commentaries of the Bible, sermons, homilies, and ascetic treatises. The great majority of the early fathers, like the apostles themselves, used the Greek language. Polycarp, Ignatius, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Cyril of Alexandria preserved Christiantiy. Antichristianism. Constantine the Great, together with a host of martyrs and confessors, belong to the Greek communion. She elaborated the ecumenical dogmas of the Trinity and Christology, and ruled the first seven ecumenical councils, which were all held in Constantinople or its immediate neighborhood (Nicea, Chalcedon, Ephesus). Her palmy period during the first five centuries will ever claim the grateful respect of the whole Christian world; and her great teachers still live in their writings far beyond the confines, nay, even more outside of her communion, as the books of Moses and the prophetic books are studied and better understood among Christians than among the Jews, for whom they wrote. But she never materially progressed beyond the stand-point occupied in the fifth and sixth centuries. She has no proper middle age, and no Reformation, like Western Christendom.

We may distinguish three periods in the history of the Greek Church:—

1. The classical or productive period, the first five or six centuries, which has just been characterized. The last great divine of the East is John of Damascus (about 750), who summed up the scattered results of the labors of the preceding fathers into a tolerably complete system of theology; but he is an isolated phenomenon. The process of degeneracy and stagnation had already set in; and the former life and vigor gave way to idle speculations, distracting controversies, dead formalism, and traditionalism.

2. The Byzantine period, corresponding to the middle ages of the Latin Church, from the rise of Mohammedanism to the fall of Constantinople (A.D. 650-1453). Here we have the gradual separation from the West and from all progressive movements; dependence on the imperial court at Constantinople; the chief literary works are the Kastronok, or Old Believers, who protest against all the innovations introduced by Patriarch Nikon and Peter the Great.

4. The Greek Church in the formerly Turkish provinces of Servia, Roumania, and Montenegro, are now independent of the Patriarch of Constantinople, and ruled by their metropolitans and synods, more or less under the influence of Russia. Distinct from these, and belonging to the Roman Church, are the united Greeks, scattered through Turkey, Hungary, Galicia, Transylvania, and Russia, but chiefly in Austria and Poland, and numbering in all about four millions and a half. They acknowledge the authority of the Pope, and adopt the dogmas of the double procession of the Holy Spirit, but are otherwise allowed to hold to their ancient discipline, marriage of the lower clergy, communion under both kinds (communio sub utraque), leavened bread, their liturgy, and the use of the Greek language.

6. The Greek, or rather Oriental Schismatics, Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians, Copts, and Abyssinians, are separated from the Greek and Latin Catholic Church, mostly on the dogma of Christ's person, and have independent organizations, which rise up, as the broken fragments of ancient national churches, from surrounding Mohammedanism and heathenism in Western Asia and Africa. The Maronites on Mount Lebanon were formerly schismatic, but were converted to the Roman Church during the middle ages. The Roman Church has made inroads also among the other Oriental sects, especially the Armenians. The dissenters from the Orthodox Church of Russia are the united Greeks, scattered through Turkey, Hungary, Galicia, Transylvania, and Russia, but chiefly in Austria and Poland, and numbering in all about four millions and a half. They acknowledge the authority of the Pope, and adopt the dogmas of the double procession of the Holy Spirit, but are otherwise allowed to hold to their ancient discipline, marriage of the lower clergy, communion under both kinds (communio sub utraque), leavened bread, their liturgy, and the use of the Greek language.
conquest in the conversion of the Slavonians (namely, the Bulgarians and Russians, in the ninth and tenth centuries); while the Latin Church converted the Celtic and Teutonic races.

3. The modern period may be dated from the downfall of the Greek Empire (1453). It presents in Asia stagnation and slavery under the tyranny of the Turks, but with great tenacity and independence as to all internal affairs; in Europe, the political growth and growth of power of Russia, with some reforms in manners, customs, and the introduction of Western culture, protests against Romanizing and evangelical movements, the orthodox confession of Peter Mogilas (1842), the synod of Jerusalem (1872), the Russian Church, the patriarchate of Moscow, the reforms of Patriarch Nikon (d. 1681) and of the Czar Peter the Great (d. 1725), the reaction of the Old Believers (Raskolnik), the holy synod of St. Petersburg (since 1833), modern influences from the West, prospects for the future, depending chiefly on Russia.

V. RELATION TO THE LATIN CHURCH.—No two churches are so much alike in their creed, polity, and culture, as the Greek and Roman; and yet no two are such irreconcilable rivals, perhaps for the very reason of their affinity. They agree much more than either agrees with any Protestant church. They were never organically united. They differed from the beginning in nationality, language, and genius, as the ancient Greeks differed from the Romans; yet they grew up together, and stood shoulder to shoulder in the ancient conflict with Paganism and heresy. They co-operated in the early ecumenical councils, and adopted their doctrinal and ritual decisions. But the development of the papal monarchy, and the establishment of a Western Empire in connection with it, laid the foundation of a schism which has not been healed to this day. The controversy culminated in the rivalry between the Emperor and the Pope of Rome. It first broke out under Photius and Nicholas I., who excommunicated each other (869 and 879). Photius, the greatest scholar of his age, whom Pope Nicholas refused to acknowledge as patriarch, charged, in a famous encyclical letter, the Roman Church with heresy, for the unauthorized insertion of the Filioque into the Nicene Creed, and with various corrupting practices. The controversy was renewed under the Patriarch Cerularius (1053), and became irreconcilable through the Venetian conquest of Constantinople (1204), and the establishment of a Latin Empire (1204-61), and Latin rival bishops in eastern seas, with the sanction of Pope Innocent III. Attempts at a re-union were made from time to time, especially in the Council of Lyons (1274) and the Council of Ferrara (1439), but all in vain. The compromise formula of the latter council was rejected with scorn in the West, and condemned by the Council of Florence (1439), and the fall of Constantinople (1453) the political motive for seeking a union with the West ceased; and the schism continues to this day, even with increased force, since the Vatican Council in 1870 intensified the chief cause of separation by declaring papal, which was never before, an article of faith. Popery knows no compromise; and the Greek Church can never submit to its authority without committing suicide.

The points in which the Greek Church differs from the Roman are the following: the single procession of the Holy Spirit (against the Filioque); the equality of the patriarchs, and the rejection of the papacy as an antichristian innovation and usurpation; the right of the lower clergy (priests and deacons) to marry (though only once); the communion under both kinds against the withdrawal of the cup from the laity; trine immersion as the only valid form of baptism; the use of the vernacular languages in worship; a number of minor ceremonies, as the use of common or leavened bread in the Eucharist, infant communion, the repetition of holy unction (extava) in sickness, etc.

On the fruitless negotiations for union between the Lutheran and the Greek Church, and the Anglican and the Greek and Russian Church, see Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. I., pp. 50 sqq. and 74 sqq. The Reformation of the sixteenth century had no effect upon the Oriental Church. The reform movement of Cyril Lucar, who, as Patriarch of Constantinople, attempted to ingraft Calvinism upon the old trunk, failed completely: he was strangled to death, and his body thrown into the Bosphorus (1838); and his doctrines were condemned by several synods, in 1838, 1843, and 1872. (See Schaff, Creeds, I. 54 sqq.) In recent times, however, German universities are often frequented by Russian and Greek students; and the works of German divines have exerted some modifying influence. The Old Catholic movement was followed with interest; and the Old Catholic conferences in Bonn (1874 and 1875) were attended by several dignitaries from Greece and Russia. There has been also considerable intercourse between Greek and Anglican bishops. The Greek Church is not so strongly committed against Protestantism as the Roman, and may therefore learn something from it.

VI. CREED.—The Eastern Church holds fast to the decrees and canons of the seven ecumenical councils; i.e., of Nicea (325), Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), Chalcedon (451), the second of Constantinople (553), the third of Constantinople (680), and the second of Nicea (787). Her proper creed is the Nicene Creed as enlarged at Constantinople (381), and indorsed at Chalcedon (451), without the Latin Filioque. This creed is the basis of all Greek catechisms and systems of theology, and a regular part of worship. The Greeks have never acknowledged in form the Apostles' Creed, which is of Western origin, nor the Athanasian Creed, which teaches the double procession, and is likewise of Western origin. Besides this ecumenical creed, the Eastern Church acknowledges three subordinate confessions, which define her position against Romanism and Protestantism; namely, (1) The Orthodox Confession of Peter Mogilas (metropolitan of Kieff), A.D. 1643,—a catechetical exposition of the Nicene Creed, the Lord's Prayer and Beatitudes, and the Decalogue; (2) The Eighteen Articles or Decrees of the Synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 1872; (3) The Longer Russian Catechism of Philaret (metropolitan of Moscow), adopted by the holy synod of St. Petersburg (1839), and published in all the languages of Russia. (See these creeds and con-
VII. THEOLOGY. — The Greek Church is in doctrine substantially agreed with the Roman, but, upon the whole, more simple and less developed, though in some respects more subtle and metaphysical. The only serious doctrinal difference is that on the Procession of the Holy Spirit (see Filioque Controversy). She holds to the leading principles, but rejects many of the consequences or results, of Roman Catholicism. She adheres to the theology of the Greek fathers down to John of Damascus, and ignores the succeeding scholastic theology of the schoolmen, who completed the Roman system. The Eastern theology is not properly systematized: it remains rigidly in the fragmentary state of the old councils. The resistance to the Western clause, Filioque, implied a protest against all further progress both in truth and in error, and meant stagnation, as well as faithful adherence to the venerable Nicene symbol. The Greek theology is most full on the doctrine of God and of Christ, but very defective on the doctrine of man and the order of salvation. The East went into all sorts of theological and christological subtleties, especially during the long and tedious Monophysite controversies, which found little or no response in the West; but it ignored the Pelagian controversies, the development of the Augustinian and later evangelical theology. It took the most intense interest in the difference between ousia and hypostasis, the homoousian and homonousian, the relations of the persons in the Trinity, the agennesia of the Father, the eternal generation, faith and good works, merit and eternal life, the procession of the Spirit, the perichoresis, the relation of the two natures in Christ, the Nestorian, Eutychian, Monophysite, and Monothelite heresies, but was never seriously troubled with questions about predestination, vicarious atonement, or procession of the Spirit, the perichoresis, the relations of the persons in the Trinity, the agennesia of the Father, the eternal generation, faith and good works, merit and eternal life, the procession of the Spirit, the perichoresis, the relation of the two natures in Christ, the Nestorian, Eutychian, Monophysite, and Monothelite heresies. It was more to the senses and imagination than to the intellect and heart. It is strongly Oriental, unintelligibly symbolical and mystical, and excessively ritualistic. The Greeks reject organs, musical instruments, and sculpture, and make less use of the fine arts in their churches than the Roman Catholics; but they have even a more complicated system of ceremonies, with gorgeous display, semi-barbaric pomp, and endless changes of sacerdotal dress, crossings, gestures, genuflections, prostrations, washings, processions, which so absorb the attention of the senses, that there is little room left for intellectual and spiritual worship. They use the liturgy of St. Chrysostom, which is an abbreviation of that of St. Basil, yet very lengthy, and contains, with many old and venerable prayers (one of the finest is incorporated in the Anglican Liturgy under the name of Chrysostom), later additions from different sources to an excess and littleness.
of dangerous illness, which Rome has changed into extreme unction of the dying; infant communion, which the Latin Church has not only abandoned, but forbidden; the communion under two kinds (κατὰ τὰ δύο είδη, sub utraque); the use of leavened instead of unleavened bread in the Eucharist; the standing and eastward posture in prayer; the stricter separation of the sexes; the use of the screen or veil before the altar; and the withdrawal of the performance of the mysteries (sacraments) from the eyes of the people.

The worship of saints, relics, flat images, and the cross, is carried as far as, or even farther, than in the Roman Church; but statues, bas-reliefs, and crucifixes are forbidden. The ruber the art, the more intense is the superstition. In Russia especially the veneration for pictures of the Virgin Mary and the saints is carried to the utmost extent, and takes the place of the Protestant veneration for the Bible. The holy picture with the lamp burning before it is found and worshipped in the corner (the sacred place) of every room, in offices, taverns, steamers, railway and telegraph stations, and carried in the knapsack of every soldier, not as a work of art, but as an emblem, a lesson of instruction, an aid to devotion. The vernacular languages are used in worship,—the Greek in Turkey and Greece, the Slavonic in Russia; but they have to a considerable extent become unintelligible to the people. The old Slavonic differs from the modern Russian about as much as Chaucer's English from our English. The Oriental sects hold to their native dialects,—the Syriac, Armenian, etc. The old Greek calendar, which is eleven days behind the new style introduced by Gregory XIII., is still retained in distinction from the Roman and Protestant churches.

X. As to Christian Life, it has the same general features as in the Roman-Catholic Church. The mass of the people are contented with an ordinary morality, while the monks aim at a higher degree of ascetic piety. The monastic system originated in the East (in Egypt), and continues to this day, but has not developed into great monastic establishments, an aid to devotion. The vernacular Scriptures are used in worship,—the Greek in Turkey and Greece, the Slavonic in Russia; but they have to a considerable extent become unintelligible to the people. The old Slavonic differs from the modern Russian about as much as Chaucer's English from our English. The Oriental sects hold to their native dialects,—the Syriac, Armenian, etc. The old Greek calendar, which is eleven days behind the new style introduced by Gregory XIII., is still retained in distinction from the Roman and Protestant churches.

As to the circulation of the Scriptures among the laity, it is not encouraged; and certain portions, especially of the Old Testament, are declared to be unfit for general use. But the Greek Church has never expressly prohibited the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue to the people; and the Orthodox Church of Russia has a popular version of the Bible, first in the old Slavic, and now in modern Russian. Alexander I., by a ukase of Jan. 14, 1813, allowed even the British and Foreign Bible Society to establish a branch in St. Petersburg. Through the labors of this society nearly five hundred thousand copies of the New Testament; and the Psalms were scattered, in thirty-two languages, all over the empire, and read with great avidity. A recent traveller says, "Except in New England and Scotland, no people in the world, so far as they can read at all, are greater Bible-readers than the Russians" (Harw," Free Russia, p. 280). A priest told him, "Love for the Bible and love for Russia go with us hand in hand. A patriotic government gives us the Bible: a monastic government (Nicholas) takes it away." But it should be remembered that not more than one out of ten Russians can read at all. The Bible drove the Jesuits from Russia, who opposed it with all their might. In 1825 Nicholas, under the influence of the monks, or the black clergy, placed the Bible under arrest, and replaced it by an official Book of Saints. Alexander II., the emancipator of the serfs, has also emancipated the Bible, and restored, in part at least, the liberty of the Bible Society, but restricted it to the Protestant population. The printing and circulating of the Bible in the Russian language and within the Orthodox Greek Church is under the exclusive control of the holy synod of St. Petersburg. Agents of the Bible Society were allowed to circulate the Scriptures in the army during the recent war with Turkey (1877).
GREEK CHURCH.

XII. Missions.—The Eastern Church spreads, through Russian influence, in Siberia, the Aulonian Islands, and wherever the civil and military power of the Czar prepares the way; but, apart from the aid of governments, she has little or no missionary spirit, and is content to keep her own. In Turkey she would not be permitted to approach the Moslems on the subject of religion. Her greatest mission-work was the conversion of Russia; and this was effected, not so much by preaching as by the marriage of a Byzantine princess and the despotic order of the ruler. In the midst of the Mohammedan East the Greek populations remain like islands in the barren sea; and the Bedouin tribes have wandered for twelve centuries round the Greek convent of Mount Sinai, probably without one instance of conversion to the creed of men whom they yet acknowledge with almost religious veneration as beings from a higher world (Stanley, p. 34). If the Turks are ever to be converted to Christianity, it must be done by other churches. Mohammedans regard the Greek and Roman Christians as idolaters, and cannot but despise the monks who disagree by their rights the traditional spot of the nativity and crucifixion, and have to be kept in order by Turkish soldiers.

The want of missionary spirit, however, accounts also for greater freedom from the curse of proselytism and persecuting intolerance. The history of the Greek Church is not disfigured by bloody tribunals of orthodoxy, like the Spanish Inquisition, or systematic and long-continued persecution, like the crusades against the Waldensians, Huguenots, with the infernal scenes of St. Bartholomew's Massacre. Yet the Greek Church of old has mercilessly expelled and exiled Arian, Nestorian, Eutychian, and other heretics, persecuted the Paulicians (885); and modern Russia rigidly prohibits secession from the orthodox national Church. Nobody can be converted in Russia in the act of another, except to the national orthodox Church; and all the children of mixed marriages, where one parent belongs to it, must be baptized and educated in it. The spirit of fanatical intolerance has manifested itself recently in the atrocious persecution of the Jews (1881), which excited the indignation of the civilized world; but it would be unfair to hold the Eastern Church responsible for these excesses. A church which has been wonderfully preserved through so many centuries, and allows the word of God to circulate among her people, justifies a hopeful view of its future mission and prospects.

Lit.—The chief sources are the acts of the first seven ecumenical synods; the writings of the Greek fathers, especially Athanasius, Chrysostom, John of Damascus, and Photius; the Confession of Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople (delivered to the Turkish Sultan, Mahomet II., 1453); the orthodox Confession of Peter Mogila, metropolitan of Kiev (1643); the eighteen decrees of the synod of Jerusalem, or the Confession of Dositheus (1672, mainly directed against the Patriarch Cyril Lucar, and his attempt to Protestantize the Greek Church); the Russian catechisms of Platon, and especially of Philaret (metropolitan of Moscow, d. 1867). The Longer Catechism of Philaret, issued by authority of the holy synod of St. Petersburg, 1839, is used in all the churches and schools of the Russian Empire, and is by far the best modern exposition of the orthodox doctrine of the Eastern Church. It contains, in question and answer, a Catechism of the Nicene Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Nine Beatitudes, and the Ten Commandments. The creeds of the Greek Church, see in Kimmel: Monumenta Fidei Ecclesiae Orientalis, June, 1843-50, 2 vols.; and in Schwarz: Creeds of Christians, vol. ii.; comp. also vol. i. pp. 40 sqq. Modern Works.—Leo Allatius (a convert to Rome, who endeavored to Romanize the Greek Church), on the consent of the Greek and Latin churches (Col., 1848); Le Quien: Oriens Christianus, 1740; JAC. GOAR: Euchologium, s. Rituale Gracum, 1687; John King: Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church in Russia, London, 1772; J. Mason Neale: History of the Holy Eastern Church, London, 1850; Dean Stanley: Lectures on the Eastern Church, London and New York, 1861 (3d ed., 1886); Gass: Symbolik der griech. Kirche, 1872. On the Russo-Greek Church, see also the works of Strahil, Mouravieff, Pinkerton, Blackmore (The Doctrine of the Russian Church, 1865), Haixhauser, Philaret (Geschichte Russlands, 1872), Basaroff, Boisard (L'eglise de Russie, 1867, 2 vols.). Lectures 11 and 12 of Dean Stanley's work on the Eastern Church, and especially Wallace: Russia, N.Y., 1878; Harnack: Statistik d. is not discussed in Schriften fur K.G., 1879; the articles on the Greek Church by Schaff, in Johnson's Cyclopaedia, by GREEK VERSIONS. See Bible Versions.

GREEN, Ashbel, D.D., LL.D., an ecclesiastical leader in the Presbyterian Church of the United States, b. in Hanover, N.J., July 6, 1762; d. at Philadelphia, May 19, 1848. He served as a surgeon in the Revolutionary war; graduated at Princeton 1783; and was successively tutor and professor at the college, and pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia from 1797 to 1812. He was one of the founders of Princeton Seminary, and president of the college 1812-22. He afterwards resided in Philadelphia, editing the Christian Advocate 1822-34. Dr. Green excelled as a leader, and was born to command. "In any sphere or calling he would have held a high rank. As a legislator, he could have shaped the policy of his party, if not of his country," etc. (Gillet, Hist. Preb. Ch., I. 568 sq.)

He wielded great influence in the Presbyterian Church, and by his arriangement of Albert Barnes (first when the congregation appeared before the presbytery of Philadelphia, to get permission to hold services of worship, and also to secure a meeting-house), he was instrumental in bringing on the division in the Presbyterian body in 1837. He published a History of Missions, Lectures on the Assembly's Catechism (2 vols.), and other works. His Life, begun by himself, was finished by J. H. Jones, and published New York, 1849.

GREEN, Joseph Henry, F.R.S., D.C.L., author of The Spiritual Philosophy; b. in London, Nov. 1, 1791; d. at the Mount, Hadley, Middlesex, Dec. 13, 1863. He was by profession a surgeon, and achieved the highest success; but he devoted much time to philosophical studies. In 1817 he made the acquaintance of Coleridge, and became at last his almost daily companion. Coleridge, who died July 25, 1854, made him his literary executor; and in 1856 Mr. Green resigned his professorship of surgery at King's College, London, retired from practice, and spent the rest of his life in studious seclusion. Shortly before his death he finished the work by which he will be remembered,—The Spiritual Philosophy, founded on the Teaching of the Late Samuel Taylor Coleridge (London, 1855, 2 vols.). The work was carried through the press by Mr. John Simon, who prefaced it with a brief Memoir. It is the best concatenated exposition of Coleridge's philosophy. Mr. Green was a man of lovely characters.

GREENFIELD, William, a celebrated linguist; b. in London, April 1, 1790; d. there Nov. 5, 1831. He edited, for Bagster, the Comprehensive Bible (1829), the Syriac New Testament (1829, 1829), a Hebrew New Testament (1830), a lexicon of the Greek New Testament, and an abridgment of Schmidt's Greek Concordance. He was appointed in 1823 editor of foreign versions to the British and Foreign Bible Society. He was b. in Oxfordshire; entered Oxford 1804; became minister at Stepney before 1843; was cast out of his living by the Act of Uniformity; d. before 1677. His Exposition of Ezekiel, in five volumes (London, 1645-92, new edition by Sherman, London, 1839) of an average of 600 pages each, is one of the better Puritan commentaries. See REID: Memoirs of the Westminster Divines, 1811.

GREENLAND. See EGEDE, HANS.

GREEG, John, D.D., b. at Velo, a village near Lunéville, Dec. 4, 1750; d. in Paris, May 28, 1831; was educated in the Jesuit college at Nancy, and became teacher in the Jesuit school of Pont-à-Mousson, pastor of Embeménil, and Bishop of Blies from 1791 to 1801; after 1814 he retired altogether from public life. Sent as a delegate to the assembly of the States-General in 1789, he played a prominent part during the whole revolution, advocating the most advanced views with respect to social reforms, but opposing, often with great courage, the reign of terror. He was the first French priest who took the oath on the constitution (Dec. 27, 1790). His episcopal office he resigned, in consequence of the concordat of 1801. During the Restoration he was much persecuted by the ultramontanists; and Guillon had to suffer considerably because he administered the sacrament to him on his death-bed. He wrote Sur la régénération (Metz, 1798, translated into English, London, same year), De la littérature des Nogres (Paris, 1808, translated both into English and German), Histoire des secles religieuses (Paris, 1828, 5 vols.), Mémoires de Grégoire (Paris, 1837, 2 vols.). See his life, by Krüger, Leip., 1858; Maggiolo, Nancy, 1855; C. Ranz, Geschichte der französischen Revolution, Leip., 1876.

CASPAR RENÉ GREGORY.

GREGER VON HEIMBURG was b. in the beginning of the fifteenth century, probably at Würzburg, and descended from a noble family in Franconia. After studying law at the university of his native city, and obtaining the degree of doctor uritusque (1450), he repaired immediately to Basel, at that time the centre of public attention as the seat of the ecumenical council. He said there till 1435, when he was made syndic of Nuremberg, and became acquainted, even intimate, with Erasmus and Luther. In Nuremberg he remained till 1460; and as syndic of this free city of the empire he immediately entered upon that protracted and bitter but never-interrupted contest with the curia, which filled his whole life. To break the influence of the Italian papacy on Germany, and stop that drainage by the mouths of the very heart-blood of his fatherland, were the great objects of his life. In 1448 Eugen IV. deposed Archbishop GREGORIAN CHANT.

Theodoric of Cologne, and Archbishop Jacob of Treves, on account of the reformatory tendencies their government evinced. The electors of the empire immediately assembled at Frankfort; and, supported by the Emperor Frederic III., they sent an embassy to Rome to move the Pope to cancel the depositions. Gregor stood at the head of this embassy; and, when nothing came of the negotiations, he published his Admonitio de injustis usurpationibus popumar. (GOLDAST, Monarchia, I. p. 557), burning with indignation. In 1453 his friend Enea Silvio ascended the papal throne under the name of Pius II.; and in the very next year Gregor had an opportunity to plead before him, as the representative of Duke Sigismund of Austria, at the congress of Mantua. But Gregor spoke against the Pope's plans, and the friendship turned into a deadly hatred. Shortly after, the duke was put under the ban, because he had imprisoned Nicholas of Cusa, Bishop of Brixen; and when Gregor, in behalf of his client, appealed to an ecclesiastical council, he, too, was put under the ban. He sought refuge, first with George Podiebrad, king of Bohemia, afterwards with the Duke of Saxony; and he continued to harass the curia with his scornful and defiant denunciations. After the accession, however, of Sixtus IV., the ban was abrogated; and he died (1472) reconciled with the Church.

Lit.—Besides those of his writings which are found in Goldast (Monarchia), there is a collection, Scriptio nervosa, etc., Francfort, 1608. His life was written by Ballenstadius (Heilin-städt, 1737) and Cl. Brockhaus (Leipzig, 1861). See also Voigt: Enea Silvio Piccolomini, 1586-63, 3 vols. P. Tschackert.

GREGORIAN CHANT. See Music.

GREGORIUS AGRIGENTINUS was Bishop of Agrigentum in the latter part of the sixth century, and wrote (in Greek) a commentary on Ecclesiasties, which, together with a life of him (also in Greek) by Leontius, was edited by Morelli, Venice, 1791, with Latin translation and notes, and reproduced in Patrologia Graeca, vol. 98. Though the sketch by Leontius is very full, the character of Gregory's life is very uncertain.

GREGORIUS ANTIOCHENSIS, or THEOPOLITANUS, was a monk in Constantinople, then abbot of the monastery of Mount Sinai, and finally patriarch of Antioch, or, as the city was then called, Theopolis (590-594). His life was very stormy. He was exceedingly unpopular in Antioch, and was compelled twice to defend himself against the most infamous accusations. A homily by him (In mulieres uguentiferas), and a speech he delivered to the rebellious soldiers on the Persian frontier, are still extant; Galland: Bibl. Patr., XI.

GREGORY NEO-CESARENSIS THAUMATURUS, the enthusiastic disciple of Origen, and the apostle of Pontus; was born at Neo-Caesarea in Pontus, and destined for some kind of civil career, but happened to come to Caesarea in Palestine, where Origen had settled down shortly before (231), and remained there, studying under his tutelage for the next years. Before he returned home he wrote his panegyrics on his great teacher (especially edited by J. A. Bengel, 1722); and shortly after his arrival home he was consecrated bishop of his native city by Phaedimus of Amiasus. He found seventeen Christians in Neo-Caesarea when he entered his office: there were only seventeen Pagans left when he died (about 270). Testimonies of the energy he developed and the influence he exercised are not only the legends which cluster around his name, but also the writings which he left,—his so-called canonical letters, his Admonitio de injustis usurpationibus popumar. They were edited by G. Voss, Mayence, 1604, in Paris, 1622; in Galland: Bibl. Patr., III.; and Migone: Patrol. Graeca, X. His life was written by Gregory or Nyssa (utterly unreliable), Pallavicini (Rome, 1644), J. L. Boyk (Jena, 1708), and Victor Ryssel (Leipzig, 1880). W. Mülller.

GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR. See Armenia.

GREGORY NAZIANZEN, one of the three celebrated Cappadocians of the fourth century who defended the Nicene faith, and one of the most eloquent orators of the early Church. Compared with his two other fellow-countrymen, he was neither an ecclesiastical leader, like Basil, nor a deep thinker, like Gregory of Nyssa, but a combination of talents such as neither of them had. A romantic interest attaches to his career, which moved to and fro between an active participation in the enterprises of the church, and the free leisure of a Christian philosopher and monk, as monasticism then allowed. Rich biographical notices are found in Gregory the Prebyter, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Rufinus, and Suidas. The most important sources of his life are, however, his own writings. He was b. 330 at Nazianzus in Cappadocia, or in Ari-anzus, a village near by, and d. 389 or 390. His mother, Nonna, was a woman of ardent piety and devotion. Brought into the Church by her persuasions, his father was made Bishop of Nazi-anzus. Gregory visited, in turn, the two Cæsareas, Alexandria, and Athens; devoting himself in the latter city to the study of grammar, mathematics, rhetoric very uncertain. Gregory sought refuge, first with George Podiebrad, king of Bohemia, afterwards with the Duke of Saxony; and he continued to harass the curia with his scornful and defiant denunciations. After the accession, however, of Sixtus IV., the ban was abrogated; and he died (1472) reconciled with the Church.

Lit.—Besides those of his writings which are found in Goldast (Monarchia), there is a collection, Scriptio nervosa, etc., Francfort, 1608. His life was written by Ballenstadius (Heilin-städt, 1737) and Cl. Brockhaus (Leipzig, 1861). See also Voigt: Enea Silvio Piccolomini, 1586-63, 3 vols. P. Tschackert.
GREGORY OF NYSSA.

as coadjutor till his death (374). In 379 he was called to Constantinople to lead the Nicene party, which was so inconsiderable that it did not even have a church to worship in. But Gregory's eloquence and devotion soon attracted crowds, who, under the spell of his words, forgot his smallness of stature and sickly emaciation of face. Even such scholars as Jerome desired to be his pupil; and the little congregation soon passed into a church, which, with reference to the revival of the true faith, received the name Anastasia. In 380 Theodosius consummated the defeat of the Arian party; and Gregory was led in triumph into the principal church of the city. He was elected Bishop of Constantinople, and consecrated by the order of the second ecumenical council (381). But the Macedonian and Egyptian bishops on their arrival pronounced the act a violation of the canons of Nica, which limited a bishop to one diocese. Gregory resigned, too noble to have recourse to intrigue, as was then so frequently the case, and yet not without some regret. He returned to Cappadocia, where for a time he devoted himself to ecclesiastical matters, and then retired to his paternal estate at Arianus.

Gregory's writings consist of orations, letters, and poems. In these he shows himself a skilful author: his diction is rich, and glowing with figures, his emotion ardent, his rhetorical gifts shedding a constant lustre. His letters, addressed to Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, etc., abound in beautiful thoughts. His poems contain some fine hymns, but are often wearisome and prolix. Most important are the orations, forty-five in number. Five are devoted to the exposition and defence of the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, and won for Gregory the title of the "Theologian." The others are devoted to public events, or to the memory of martyrs, friends, and kindred. No one of them is a pure treatment of a biblical subject. In christology Gregory opposed Arianism and Apollinarism: in anthropology he teaches original sin, and derives the mortality of man from the fall. But he held to the ability of the human will to choose the good, and to the co-operation of man with God in these particulars, he shows the influence of Origen, as, in his views of the Trinity, the influence of Athanasius.

LIT. — The first edition of his works by HERVAGIUS, Basing, 1550. The best edition is that of the BENEDICTINES, Paris, 1778-1840 (his progress was interrupted by the French Revolution). This edition contains the annotations of Nicetas, Elias, and Psellus, and is introduced with a Life by HERMANN: [H. Hurter, ed.]. Gregory's Oratio apologetica de fuga sua, Innsbruck, 1870; ULMANN: Gregoryus et Nazianzus. d. Theolog., Darmstadt, 1828; Eng. trans., G. F. COX, 1837, an excellent monograph; BENIGN: St. Grégoire de Naz., Paris, 1877; [GIBBON: Decline and Fall of Roman Empire, chap. xvii.; SMITH and WACE, Dict. Chr. Biog.].

GREGORY OF NYSSA, one of the ablest defenders of the Nicene faith against Arianism and Apollinarism, and an elder brother of Basil; was b. in Cappadocia about 332; d. about 395. He was indebted to his brother for his literary training. Under the influence of a dream he undertook the office of anagnost, or reader; but, the duties not being congenial to his tastes, he forsook it to become a teacher of rhetoric. Gregory Nazianzen, reposing on him with seeming to prefer the fame of a rhetorician above the calling of a Christian, he returned to the service of the Church, and in 371 or 372 was made, by Basil, Bishop of Nyssa, an inconsiderable town of Cappadocia. Gregory was married to Theosebia, who was the mother of his promotion. The synod of Ancyra (375), convened by the Arian Demetrius, governor of Pontus, pronounced him, though unjustly, guilty of misuse of church-funds, and violation of the canons for the election of bishops. In the following year another synod deposed him from his bishopric. This was followed by his banishment by Valens. Crushed by these events, Gregory retired into solitude. The death of Valens (378) was the signal for his return to his diocese, which he entered amidst the acclamations of the people. The following year Basil died, a few months later his sister Macrina, whom Gregory saw in her dying hours on his return from the synod of Antioch. In 381 we find him at the Council of Constantinople. At this meeting he read his work against Eunomius to Gregory Nazianzen and Jerome. Of the two discourses he pronounced during his stay in the city,—at the consecration of Gregory Nazianzen, Bishop of Constantinople, and at the death of Miletius of Antioch,—the latter only is preserved. The council appointed him, in conjunction with Helladius, overseer or patriarch of the churches of Pontus; but he seems to have been ignored by the latter. In obedience to an order of the synod of Antioch (or the Council of Constantinople), Gregory visited the church of Arabia (Babylon) in the interest of its reformation. He afterwards went to Jerusalem, where he found the church in a very unsatisfactory state. A result of this tour was the work De Eunobio Hiero-sylypha, which warns against the uselessness and evils of pilgrimages. He was in Constantinople in 383, and again in 385, when he delivered funeral orations over the young Princess Pulcheria and the Empress Placilla. We hear nothing more of him till 394, when he attended at a synod of Constantinople, and delivered a sermon at the dedication of a church at Chalecedon.

Gregory of Nyssa was of a retiring disposition, and laid himself open, by his irresolute and pliant administration of his diocese, to the charge of weakness and incompetency from Basil. He lacked the practical gifts of a leader, which his brother possessed in an eminent degree, and was not endowed so richly with oratorical talents as Gregory Nazianzen; but he was a profounder theologian than either. In general, except on the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation, he leaned upon Origen. In his vindication of the Nicene articles he makes a clear distinction between essence (οβία) and person (επιστάσεως). The simplicity of the divine essence excludes all subordination of persons in the Trinity. The Son is equal with the Father by reason of an eternal generation. Sin has interfered with the realization of man's design, which was to participate in the divine fulness, and has antagonized the world to God. To enable man to realize this design is the object of the Incarnation. Man still retains free will and a love for the good, which is inde-
GREGORY OF TOURS.

908

GREGORY.

GREGORY OF TOURS. b. at Arvena, the present Clermont, the capital of Auvergne, 540; d. at Tours, Nov. 17, 584; descended from one of the most distinguished Roman families in Gaul. His true name was Georgius Florentius, which he changed in honor of his maternal great-grandfather, Bishop Gregory of Langres. Having been educated for the Church, he was chosen Bishop of Tours in 573, and governed his diocese with great ability under very difficult circumstances. A time of great trouble to the Eastern Church, some of the most distinguished Roman families in Gaul. They were not without their opportunities; and Gregory was unanimous with the election of Pope Pelagius II. He was unanimously elected Pope, by the clergy, the senate, and the people, and compelled to accept.

The position of the Bishop of Rome was at that time by no means an easy one. Pressed on one side by the Eastern Church, and on the other by the barbarian Lombarids, he was not free on the other, but had to yield in many ways to the authority of the Byzantine emperor and his representative in Italy, the exarch of Ravenna. Nevertheless, the position was not without its opportunities; and Gregory knew how to utilize them. The Pope was the greatest lord of the state. He was first printed in Paris, 1511, and critically edited by Ruinart, Paris, 1899. There is an excellent German translation by Giesebrrecht in Pertz, Geschichtschreiber der deutschen Vorzeit, Berlin, 1851, 9th ed., 1873. Best ed. of his Opera, by Arndt and Krusen, Hannover, 1884 sqq.

GREGORY OF UTERCHT, the son of Albéric, who, through his mother, Wastrade, was related to the royal family of the Merovingians; met in 722 with Boniface in the monastery of Pfalzel, near Treves, and became from that day his friend and companion. After the death of Boniface he was charged by the Pope with the conversion of the Frisians; and he labored with success for this object, both as a missionary, and as leader of the school of Utrecht. He died in the Church of St. Salvador, in Utrecht, Aug. 25, 775. His life, by his pupil, Liudger, is found in Act. Sanct., August V.

GREGORY is the name of sixteen popes; namely, of G, the Great (Sept. 3, 590), the most important of Gregory's dogmatic works are his twelve Books against Eunomius, Antirrhct. adv. Apollinarum (the most valuable refutation of Apollinarianism), and Oratio Catechet. Magna. Of his exegetical works the most important are his De Hominita Opificio, Apologet. de haeresibus, two works on Moses, expositions of Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, the Beatitudes, the Lord's Prayer, etc. To these must be added his epistles, funeral orations, and ascetic writings, such as De Virginitate, in which he represents celibacy as the perfection of life, from which, however, he laments that he is himself debarred. Editions of his works, Basel, 1562 and 1871; by Fronto Ducexus, Paris, 1615, 2 vols.; the Antirrhct. adv. Apolli., fourteen letters and two orations for the first time in Zacagni: Collec. Monum. vet. eccl. Grac., Rome, 1898; the same, with seven additional letters, by Carrasscius, Florence, 1731; Migne: Pat. Gr., pp. 44-48; Fr. Oehler, Leip., 1858. 1 vol. (not complete); Rupp: Gregors d. B. von Nyssa Leben u. Meinungen, Leip., 1884; Heyns: Disput. hist.-theol. de Greg. Nysa., Lugd., 1885; Moller: Greg. Nys. Doct. de hominis nat. et illustr. et cum Origennana compar. Halle, 1864; Gr. Nysa. Sententia de Salute Adipiscenda, Halle, 1875; [Smith and Wace, Dict.].

W. Moeller.

GREGORY OF UTERCHT.
certain prestige not ecclesiastical. On account of the weakness and inability of the exarchs, the Pope became the real ruler of Rome; and this rôle was quite natural to Gregory, who had been prætor urbis before he became Pope. Thus he stood almost as an independent power, mediating between the Lombards and the Byzantines. Through Theodelinde, a Bavarian princess, belonging to the Orthodox Church, and the wife of King Agilulf, he exercised some influence on the Lombards; though at one time (593), just while he was delivering his homilies on Ezekiel, he had to buy off Agilulf from the gates of Rome by an immense sum of gold and silver. In Constantinople, too, he could give his voice some weight; though his relations with the Emperor Mauricius became more and more troubled, especially after the controversy with John Jejunator. John IV., Patriarch of Constantinople, liked to call himself the "ecumenical patriarch." But he was neither the first to assume this title, nor the only one to whom it had been applied: his predecessor, Menas, had borne it 536; and it had been given to Leo I. by the Council of Chalcedon 451, to Hormisdas by the Syrian monks 517, and to Boniface II. by the metropolitan of Larissa in 531. Gregory, however, who called himself servus servorum Dei (not as a rebuke to the Constantinopolitan patriarch, but simply in imitation of Augustine), took umbrage at this title, complained of it to Mauritius (595), and Gregory became more and more irritated, especially as Mauritius declined to interfere. In November, 602, Mauritius was overthrown by Phocas; and not only was he himself beheaded, but also his wife, his five sons, and his three daughters. The new emperor, however, the usurper, the murderer, was hailed by the Pope with letters of congratulation, whose fulsome ness and flattery and adulation can be explained only on the supposition that Gregory, when he wrote the letters, was ignorant of the wanton cruelty which had accompanied the usurpation,—a supposition which, in view of the times, by no means is improbable.

In a similar way his relation to Brunehild must be explained. Brunehild was simply a monster. The crimes she committed during the reign of her son, Childebert II. (575-596), and her two grandsons, Theudebert II. and Theuderic II., earned for her the name of the "Frankish Fury," the "new Jezebel." And to this woman Gregory wrote letters full of praise and flattery. But what did he know of her? Probably nothing more than what he learnt from her own letters; and in these she simply asked for some relics for a church, or the pallium for St. Syagrius of Autun, or a privilege for some monastery, or a papal legate to a Frankish synod; while she promised to support the English mission, to build churches and monasteries, to proclaimed the observance of celibacy, to refrain from giving ecclesiastical offices and benefits to laymen, etc. To him Brunehild may have looked as he described her,—a very pious woman.

The two brightest points, however, in Gregory's relations with foreign countries, are Spain and England. Through the influence of Bishop Leander of Seville, an intimate friend of Gregory since they first met in Constantinople, Reccared, King of the Visigoths, was led to abandon Arianism, and join the Catholics. In a letter dated 596, the king communicated his conversion to the Pope; and at the same time he sent a grollet of gold as a present to St. Peter. Gregory answered most graciously, and sent abbot Cyriacus to Spain with the pallium to Leander. The synod of Barcelona, held in the same year under the presidency of the metropolitan Tarragonus, and treating the questions of simony and laymen's investiture with ecclesiastical bene fices, was probably connected with the sending of Cyriacus. England had already attracted the attention of Gregory while he was yet a monk. The sight of the Anglo-Saxon boys exhibited in the slave-markets of Rome had moved him to pity, and he determined to go to England as a missionary. He actually started on the way, but was recalled by the Pope. When he became Pope himself, he sent (596) Augustine and forty other monks to King Ethelbert of Kent; and already the next year Augustine could report the baptism of the king and ten thousands of his subjects. How great an interest Gregory took in the English mission appears from his letters to Augustine, which are full of the most detailed instructions.

However successful Gregory was in extending the influence and authority of the Roman see throughout the Western countries, that which he accomplished for the internal organization and consolidation of the Church was, nevertheless, of far greater importance. The delicate question of the dependence of the Western metropolitan sees on the see of Rome, he handled with great adroitness. In North Africa, whose clergy were extremely jealous of their independence, he acted with great caution, and in strict conformity with the canons of the Council of Sardica (347). Gennadius the exarch, and the two most prominent bishops in the province, Dominicus of Carthage, and Columbus of North Africa, were friends of his; and many appeals were made to the Roman see. But the parties were never summoned to Rome: the cases were treated in loco, and by papal legates. Quite otherwise in the diocese of Ravenna. He forbade the Archbishop John, in a rather sharp manner, to wear the pallium, except when celebrating mass; and when a conflict arose between John's successor, Marinianus, and a certain abbot, Claudius, he summoned both parties to Rome to plead their cause before him personally. He attempted the same in Illyria, on occasion of a contested episcopal election at Salona (598); but in that case the Emperor Mauricius interfered, and to his great chagrin and humiliation he was compelled to make a compromise.

Gregory's ideas of a papal supremacy may have been somewhat vague; but his instincts were strong, and pointed towards the loftiest goal. Very characteristic in this respect were his exertions to separate the monks from the clergy proper. He had been a monk himself, and he knew to what temptations and illusions human nature is exposed by monastic life: consequently he fixed the term of the novitiate at two years, and for soldiers at three. He forbade youths under eighteen years to enter a monastery, and married men, unless with the consent of their wives. He ordered all ecclesiastical officials to seize those monks, who, often in great swarms, roamed about in the country, and really were neither more nor less than throngs of the most indolent and impertinent description, and to deliver them up to the nearest monastery for punishment. Thus he did much for the reform of the monks, but he did still more for their emancipation.

One monastery after the other was exempted from the episcopal authority; and at the synod of Rome (801) the power of the bishop over the abbeys was generally confined to the installation of the abbot. It was evidently his idea to form out of the monks a powerful instrument which might be wielded by the Pope independently of the clergy. On the other hand, he transferred some of the ranked characteristics of monastic life to the clergy, as, for instance, the celibacy, for whose introduction he was exceedingly anxious. For the clergy he wrote, shortly after his accession to the papal throne, his famous book, Regula Pastoralis, which, for centuries was regarded as the moral code of the clergy. The Emperor Mauritius had it translated into Greek (Alfred the Great translated it himself into Anglo-Saxon), and Hincmar of Rheims as late as the 9th century; and (IV.) by Johannes Diaconus (ninth century), both in Opp. Greg. Some notices are also found in Paulus Diaconus: *De gentis Longobardorum, III. 24—25, IV., and V.; Gregory of Tours; Annales Francorum, X. 1—2; Beda: Hist. Eccles. Anglorum, III. 23—27, 53. II. 1—3. Among modern treatises of the subject we mention those by Bianchi-Giovin, Milan, 1844; G. Laup, Leipzig, 1845; G. Pfahler, Francfort, 1852; Victor Luzorch, Tours, 1857; J. Barnaby, London, 1879. Special points have been treated by Lilienthal: De canone missae Graec., Lyons, 1740; Gerbert: De canone et musica sacra, Bamberg, 1744; F. Bernardi: J. Longobardi, e. s. Greg. M., Milan, 1843; Guettier: La papauté moderne..., Greg. le Grand, Paris, 1861; [G. Maggio: Prolegomena allo studio di Greg. il grande e de' suoi tempi, Prato, 1879].

R. Zöffer.

Gregory II. (May 10, 715—Feb. 10, 731) was a Benedictine monk, and rebuilt Monte Cassino, which had been destroyed by the Lombards. He was the first Pope who addressed himself to the Franks for aid against the Lombards, but he did not succeed. His letters are found in Jaffé: Regest. Pont. Roman., his life, in Vignoli: Lib. Pont., II. 911—912; Gregory III. (Feb. 11, 731—Nov. 28, 741) was a Syrian by birth. He, too, asked the Franks for aid against the Lombards, but with as little success as his predecessor. A work he wrote, according to Anastasius, on the legitimacy of image-worship, seems to have been lost.—Gregory IV. (827—844) was, by his ambition to be a divine appointed arbiter, led to interfere in the dismal family troubles of the Frankish dynasty, and became, perhaps unwillingly and unwittingly, the tool with which Lothaire accomplished his treachery on the fields of Colmar. His life is found in Vignoli: Lib. Pont., III.—Gregory V. (May 3, 996—Feb. 18, 999) was a son of Duke Otho of Carinthia, and a near relative of Otho III.; was the first German pope. He was placed on the throne by Otho III.; but the emperor had hardly left Italy before the Roman nobility rose in rebellion, headed by Crescentius, and an antipope (John XVI.) was elected. But when the emperor returned, the rebellion was quelled, Crescentius was beheaded, and John XVI. was dragged through the streets of Rome, mutilated, and imprisoned. Jaffé: Reg. Pont. Roman.—Gregory VI. (1044—46) bought the papal crown from Benedict IX., and ruled for a year and a half with prudence and tolerable success. But he did not please the Roman nobility, and they allured Benedict IX. to return. The emperor, Henry III., was called in as arbiter; and Gregory VI. met him at Piacenza, and accompanied him to Sutri. There he openly confessed in the council that he had bought the papal dignity in order to save it; and, when all the bishops agreed in condemning such a measure, he laid aside the papal insignia, and went with the emperor to Germany, where he died at Cologne, 1048.—There was also an antipope of the name, Gregory VI., under Benedict VIII., but only for a short time. Escher: Triumphus Mergoburg, Chron., in Precht: Mon. Germ. Script.—Gregory VII. (April 22, 1073—May 25, 1085). His true name was Hildebrand; and he was born of humble parentage, either at Saona or in Rome. He was chaplain to Gregory VI., accompanied... him on his journey to Cologne, and entered, after his death, the monastery of Cluny. There Leo IX. became acquainted with him in the time of the synod of Rheims (1049). He returned to Italy, was made a deacon and cardinal, and soon became the very soul of the papal government.

One of the first measures of Nicholas II. was a decree by which the papal election was put entirely into the hands of the cardinals and the Roman nobility, to the exclusion of the German emperor, and at the head of the government during the minority of Henry IV. By the Councils of Augsburg (October, 1062) and Mantua (May, 1064), Alexander II. was recognized as the legitimate Pope. Alexander II. died April 22, 1073; and the very same day Hildebrand was elected Pope. He assumed the name of Gregory VII., and was conscious from the very beginning, that the German emperor was not asked for: indeed, the relation between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. was not legitimate elected, since he had not the consent of the German emperor, which, according to the decree of Nicholas II., he should have. Gregory VII. answered simply by putting Henry IV. and his adherents under the ban. A number of the German princes at once withdrew their allegiance, and invited the Pope to be present at the diet of Augsburg (Feb. 2, 1077), to give judgment in the case. Henry, who understood that such a diet would not only be an humiliation and a danger to him, but complete ruin, hastened to Italy in December, 1076, found the Pope at Canosa (one of the castles of Mathilde), presented himself, clad in sackcloth, with bare feet, and ashes on his head, in the courtyard, and was, after three days' waiting, admitted to the Pope's presence, and absolved.

The German princes, fearing the revenge of Henry IV., chose an anti-king, March 15, 1077; and a war began which lasted till 1080. During these years, Gregory VII. constantly urged the convocation of a diet, GREGORY.

912

in which he himself would adjust matters; and, when he discovered that Henry never would consent to appear before such an assembly, he put him a second time under the ban, in the spring of 1080. But Oct. 15, in the battle on the Elster, he succeeded in defeating the anti-king, and suppressing the rebellion; and in the spring of 1081 Henry was driven out of Germany. The ban having in the mean time made Clement III. anti-pope. He besieged Rome four years in succession, occupied the Leonine part of the city, and shut the Pope up in the castle of St. Angelo; but he was finally driven away by Robert Guiscard, who rescued Gregory VII., and brought him to Salerno, where he died. See GUIBERT OF PARMA.

Gregory VIII. (Oct. 21—Dec. 17, 1187). There was also an antipope of that name, Mauritus Burdini, Archbishop of Braga, raised to the papal throne by Henry V., March 8, 1188, afterwards deserted by the emperor, deposed by Calixtus II., and dragged from one prison to another until his death, 1125. See Vita Burdini, in BALUZ: Miscell. III.; and JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont. IV. — Gregory IX. (March 19, 1227—Aug. 22, 1241) was eighty years old when he ascended the papal throne, but proved a match for Frederic II. of Hohenstaufen, both in courage and energy. Frederic had vowed a crusade, but seemed inclined to make light of his vow. Admonished by the Pope, he embarked at Brindisi, but landed a few days afterwards at Otranto, on account of sickness, as he said. Sept. 29, 1227, the Pope put him under the ban; and though he succeeded in expelling Gregory from Rome, first to Viterbo, then to Perugia, the ban was not removed. June 28, 1228, he embarked a second time, reached the Calabrian coast, made a brilliant campaign, and was crowned king of Palestine in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; but the ban still persisted against him. After his return, however, Hermann of Salza, the grand-master of the Teutonic order, brought about a reconciliation (Sept. 1, 1230), and the ban was removed. But when, in 1238, he experienced some military and political reverses in Upper Italy, Gregory IX. again placed himself at the head of his enemies, and the ban was renewed (1239). Frederic II. immediately advanced against Rome; and the old Pope was a prisoner in his own capital when he died. His decrees were collected by Raymundus de Pennaforte, and published in five books in 1234. Of his letters, about 4,550 in number, 3,200 are found in POTTHAST: Regest. Pontif. Rom., 1: lives of him in MURA- TORI: Script. Rer. Ital., III. — Gregory XI. (Sept. 1, 1370—Jan. 10, 1376) was elected after a vacancy of four years, caused by the contention between the French and Italian parties among the cardinals. He tried to reconcile the Guelphs and the Gibellines for the sake of a new crusade; and at the second Council of Lyons (1274) he labored to effect a union between the Eastern and Western churches: but in both respects he failed. His life is found in MURATORI: Script. Rer. Ital., III.; his letters, in POTTHAST: Reg. Ponti. Rom., II. — Gregory XII. (Dec. 30, 1370—March 27, 1378) removed the papal residence from Avignon, and entered Rome, Jan. 27, 1377. Five lives of him are found in BALUZ: Vite Papali. Assen. I., — Gregory XIII. (Dec. 2, 1406) was deposed by the Council of Pisa, June 5, 1409, but protested; resigned before the Council of Constance, July 4, 1415; and died, as cardinal-bishop of Porto, Oct. 18, 1417. — Gregory XIV. (May 13, 1572—April 10, 1585) founded twenty-two Jesuit colleges; celebrated the Massacre of St. Bartholomew with processions and medals; supported Henry III. against the Huguenots, etc. In 1582 he finished that improvement of the Julian Calendar which the councils of Constance, Basle, and Trent, and many popes, had labored on; and in the same year he issued a new and improved edition in folio of the Concordia duelorum of Banco by France. His bulls are found in CHERUBINI: Bull. Magn., II. — Gregory XV. (Feb. 9, 1621—July 8, 1623) was an old and sickly man, and left the business to his young and energetic nephew, Ludovico, who most heartily supported the Jesuits in their exertions to restore the Roman Church in Bohemia, Hungary, Austria, Bavaria, France, and the Netherlands. The congregatio de propaganda fide was founded, and some improvements were introduced in the organization of the conclave. His bulls are found in CHERUBINI: Bull. Magnum, III. — G. VOIGT.

Gregory XVI. (Feb. 2, 1831—June 1, 1846) was an old monk when he ascended the throne; b. at Belluno, Sept. 18, 1775; since 1823 general of his order, the Camaldolensians; since 1828 prefect of the propagandas, and known as author of the Il trionfo della santa Sede, etc., 1799. He was very successful in his government of the church in general. He undertook a new missionary campaign, and was crowned king of Palestine in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; but though he succeeded in expelling Gregory from Rome, first to Viterbo, then to Perugia, the ban was not removed. June 28, 1228, he embarked a second time, reached the Calabrian coast, made a brilliant campaign, and was crowned king of Palestine in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; but the ban still persisted against him. After his return, however, Hermann of Salza, the grand-master of the Teutonic order, brought about a reconciliation (Sept. 1, 1230), and the ban was removed. But when, in 1238, he experienced some military and political reverses in Upper Italy, Gregory IX. again placed himself at the head of his enemies, and the ban was renewed (1239). Frederic II. immediately advanced against Rome; and the old Pope was a prisoner in his own capital when he died. His decrees were collected by Raymundus de Pennaforte, and published in five books in 1234. Of his letters, about 4,550 in number, 3,200 are found in POTTHAST: Regest. Pontif. Rom., 1: lives of him in MURA- TORI: Script. Rer. Ital., III. — Gregory XI. (Sept. 1, 1370—Jan. 10, 1376) was elected after a vacancy of four years, caused by the contention between the French and Italian parties among the cardinals. He tried to reconcile the Guelphs and the Gibellines for the sake of a new crusade; and at the second Council of Lyons (1274) he labored to effect a union between the Eastern and Western GRELLET, Stephen (Étienne de), b. at Limoges, France, Nov. 2, 1773; d. at Burlington, N.J., Nov. 16, 1855. Born in the French nobility, at seventeen he was one of the royal body-guard. After a variety of adventures, he landed in New York 1795, in which year he was converted, and joined the Society of Friends. His ministrations during the yellow-fever visitation in Philadelphia, 1798, revealed his rare qualities. He rose to great eminence, and acquired wealth. He felt called upon to preach, and to this end made long journeys through the United States, and even to Europe, which he visited several times. On one occasion, being presented to the Pope, he had the courage to preach even in such a presence; similarly he exhorted the Czar of Russia. See Memoirs of Stephen Grellet, by B. Skebohm, Philadelphia, 1860, 2 vols.

GREISBACH, Johann Jakob, a distinguished textual critic of the New Testament, mark the beginning of a new period in that department. Bengel before him had introduced some changes into the Elzevir text from the Complutensian Polyglot; but all others he only placed in the margin. Griesbach was the first in Germany to edit a Greek Testament embodying in the text the results of critical study. Following, in some respects, the previous labors of Bengel and Semler, he grouped the manuscripts in three classes—the Occidental, characterized by glosae; the Alexandrian, by grammatical corrections; and the Byzantine, combining the readings of the other two (a division recently adopted in Westcott and Hort's New Testament, Ed.). He only altered the Elzevir text when the arguments were imperative. His critical theory rested upon a combination of logical principles and historical facts; the agreement of Occidental and Alexandrian manuscripts being regarded as especially important, and frequently decisive. Griesbach's bold effort called forth violent criticisms from the advocates of the inviolability of the received text, among which may be mentioned a work by Hartmann, professor in Rostock, which appeared in 1775. But for once and all time, in Germany, he answered such objections in the second edition. The editions of Griesbach's text appeared in the following order: Libri N. T. Historici, Halle, 1774, 1775; principal edition, Halle and London, 1796, 1806, 2 vols., with extensive critical apparatus and important prolegomena; in a corrected edition, Leipzig, 1808 and 1827; a new edition, by David Schulz, 1827, of which only the first part appeared. Other critical works by Griesbach: De Codd. Evv. Origenianis, 1771; Cursus in Hist. Textus Epp. Paul., 1777; Symbolae Criticae ad Supplendas et Corrigendas Varias N. T. Lectiones, 1785—98; Commentarius criticus in Text. Gr., 1794 sqq. only includes Matthew and Mark. His other writings were edited by Gabler, Jena, 1825, 2 vols. In theology Griesbach took a position midway between the conservative and radical schools. See AUGUSTI: Ueber Griesbach's Vermuthungen, Breslau, 1812. ED. REUSE.

GRIFFIN, Edward Dorr, a distinguished pulpit orator, and president of Williams College; b. Jan. 6, 1770, at East Haddam, Conn.; d. Nov. 8, 1837, at Newark, N.J. He graduated with the highest honors, at Yale, 1790, and studied theology under Dr. Edwards, afterward president of Union College. In 1794 he accepted a call to the Congregational Church at Farmington; but the council having twice refused to ordain him, on account of alleged erroneous views on baptism and the doctrines of grace, he withdrew, with its consent, and in 1795 was installed pastor of a church in New Hartford. In 1801 he became colleague of Dr. McWhorter, in the First Presbyterian Church in Newark, and pastor in 1807. Here, as before in New Hartford, extensive revivals prevailed under his ministry. In 1809 he became the first incumbent of the chair of pulpit eloquence at Andover Seminary, which he exchanged for the pastorate of the Park Street Church, Boston, in 1811. In 1815 he returned to Newark as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, and in 1821 was elected president of Williams College, holding the office till 1836.
The institution at that time had only forty-eight students, and was in a critical condition. A powerful revival occurred in 1824. Dr. Griffin succeeded in putting the college on a firm basis.

Dr. Griffin was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. To a commanding presence went a voice with the archbishops' he added a vivid imagination and fine reasoning powers. His sermons are simple, fervid, and evangelical. In theology he opposed the "New Divinity," as it was called, of New Haven. He published Lectures delivered in Park-street Church, Boston, 1815; The Extent of the Atonement, New York, 1819. His Sermons, with Memoir of his Life, were edited by Dr. Sprague, in 2 vols., Albany, 1838.

See also Cooke: Recollections of E. D. Griffin, Boston, 1860.

GROEN VAN PRINSTERER, Guillaume, b. in the Hague, Aug. 21, 1801; d. there May 19, 1876; studied at Leyden; was appointed secretary to the king in 1827, and soon afterwards director of the royal archives; was, in the Dutch Parliament, the leader of the anti-revolutionary party, and opposed with great zeal the separation of State and Church, the emancipation of the school from the Church, etc. He was a Christian statesman, and occupied in Holland a position similar to that of Professor Stahl in Prussia. His idea that the Church ought to be the foundation and informing-power of the State is very apparent in his Handboek der Godsdienst en den wetenschappen, Amsterdam, 1852. He also published Archives de la maison d'Orange-Nassau, 1840-55, 13 vols.; Maurice et Barnetville, Utrecht, 1875.

GROOT, Geert. See BRETHERN OF THE COMMON LIFE.

GROPPPER, Johann, b. at Soest, February, 1592; d. in Rome, March, 1599; studied theology and canon law at Cologne, and was appointed, first canon, then archdeacon there. He was a reform friend of the Erasmian type; represented the conciliatory element at the deputations of Hagenau, Worms, and Regensburg, and encouraged the archbishops to reform, as long as those touched only points of doctrine. But when Butzer began to preach in Cologne (1542), and the archbishop seemed inclined to undertake a re-organization of the hierarchical system, Gropper denounced them to the Pope and the emperor; and when Hermann von Wied was deposed, and Adolf von Schaumburg put in his place, Gropper became a decided opponent to ecclesiastical reform in any shape. His principal work is Institutio catholica, 1550.

GROSSETESTE, Robert, called also GREAT-HEAD, Bishop of Lincoln, one of the most independent and distinguished English prelates in the middle ages; b. about 1175; d. at Buckden, Oct. 9, 1253. He was famous as a scholar, and, in the administration of his see, as a reformer of ecclesiastical abuses; and although, during the greater part of his career, a loyal and submissive son of Rome, he broke away in the last period, and not only spoke out boldly against the corruption of the papal court, but refused to obey its commands. He was of humble birth. The first we know of him is as a student of Oxford, from which he passed to the University of Paris. Returning to England, he entered the service of the Bishop of Hereford, at whose death, shortly after, he went to Oxford as a teacher.

The first period of his public life dates from this point. It is the period of scholarly activity, extending over a number of years. He was master of the schools (rector scolarum), or chancellor, and, to quote the chronicler Trivet, was "a man of excellent wisdom, and of most lucid power of teaching," etc. His attainments included an acquaintance of Greek and Hebrew. With the assistance of others he put forth translations of Aristotle, the De Orthodoza Fide of John of Damascus, and other works, such as the De Cessatione Legalium (a book designed for the conversion of the Jews), a collection of theological Dicta, and the French poem, Le Chastel d'Amour. He also enjoyed, according to Roger Bacon, a great reputation for scientific attainments. On the arrival of the Franciscan friars in Oxford (1224), Grosseteste was chosen as their instructor in divinity and homiletics. During the Oxford period he held several preferments,—two prebends in Lincoln, the archdeaconry of Wilts (1214) and Northampton (1221), etc. Ascetic enthusiasm, perhaps the result of a severe attack of fever, induced him to resign them all, except a prebend in Lincoln.

The second period begins with Grosseteste's elevation to the see of Lincoln, in 1235, by the vote of its dean and chapter. His episcopal administration was marked by great zeal in advancing its Church interests, and not infrequently by the use of arbitrary and high-handed measures. From the first he attacked the corruption, and condemned the incompetency, of the clergy. He instituted a systematic visitation of his diocese, and a careful scrutiny of the religious houses. With the monastic institutions he was especially severe, not only condemning the unclerical amusements and immoral lives of the monks, but endeavoring to do away with the evils of "farming" by endowing parishes, that they might secure pastors who would care for the souls of the people. To this end he used the revenues of the monasteries. Grosseteste, however, was not a foe to religious life, but zealously sought to raise the standard, and increase the efficiency of the ministry, by refusing to appoint to livings those whose youth, worldliness, or illiteracy made them unfit, and by removing corrupt and incompetent incumbents. Within a short time after his consecration, he deposed seven abbots and four priors. This vigorous administration aroused opposition. The bishop's life was even attempted by poison. Some of the monasteries endeavored to evade his visitation; but he was equal to such emergencies, and, as in the case of Hertford, placed the whole town under interdict. In 1244 Pope Innocent IV deposed the abbot of Bardney, deposed him in spite of the sentence of excommunication against himself, pronounced by the Convent of Canterbury (the see being vacant), to which the abbot had appealed.

Grosseteste's hottest conflict of this kind was with the dean and chapter of Lincoln, who denied him the right of visitation. He suspended the dean, excommunicated the proctor, and finally went to Lyons (1245) to secure a papal decision of the case. The bishop displayed an overbearing temper in this affair; and the abbot of Leicester had ground for blaming him, in a letter, for having "a heart of iron, and one lacking pity." He secured a judgment in his favor from the Pope, but, as it would seem, at the expense of his own independence; for he appears as a servile agent of papal designs in the period immediately following. He lent his name to a scheme for laying the English dioceses under tribute of the Roman pontiff and his court for being the founder of the abbot at Lincoln, to which the Pope, his uncle, had appointed him. In a very plain letter the bishop tells the pontiff that it is his duty to make appointments for the edification, and not for the destruction, of the Church. Matthew Paris reports that the Pope was in high dudgeon on receiving this letter, and was only pacified by the cardinals, who reminded him of the fearless courage, the power, and popularity of the English prelate.

Like Luther, previous to the diet of Worms, so Grosseteste had trusted in the Pope, and hoped for relief from Rome against the ecclesiastical corruption of England. Once undeceived, he was drifting rapidly away from all veneration for the pontiff, when death overtook him. In a conversation on his death-bed with the scholarly cleric and physician, John de St. Giles, he gave a definition of heresy, and asked whether the Pope did not fulfill it. To those around him he lamented the detestable condition of the Church. He bore uttering protests against the avarice, simony, lust, and worldliness of the papal court. "He was the open rebuker of both the Pope and the king, censor of prelates, corrector of monks, instructor of clerks, an unwearyed examiner of the books of Scripture, a crusher and desirer of the Romans," says the chronicler Matthew Paris. He was buried in great pomp at Lincoln; the Archbishop of Canterbury and several bishops being present at the funeral. This seems to disprove the statement that the Pope had excommunicated him. Miracles were reported to be performed at his grave; but in vain did prelates and King Edward I. (1307) apply for Grosseteste's canonization. The popular veneration was shown in the legend that the bishop appeared to the Pope on the night of his death, with the words, "Arise, wretch, and come to thy doom."

Grosseteste has been called a "harbinger of the Reformation." He certainly was a zealous reformer of ecclesiastical abuses in the diocese of Lincoln, and boldly protested against the corruption of the papal court. In his large acquaintance with and constant appeal to the Scriptures he was in advance of his age. He was the first link in the chain of the Reformation in this sense, that Wiclif appealed to him, and quotes his protest against Rome, as, later, Luther quoted Hus, and Hus learned from Wiclif. In his impetuous and fearless temper he resembles Luther. Not only Wiclif, but others, like Bishop Hall, delighted to find in the Bishop of Lincoln a support for their scriptural views, or, like Field, to use his name against the claims of the Pope to authority in the Church (Of the Church, vol. iv. pp. 384 sqq.).

D.S.Schaff.

Grotius, Hugo (Huig van Groot), a celebrated Dutch statesman, lawyer, and theologian; was b. at Delft, April 10, 1583, and d. at Rostock, Aug. 29, 1645. His career was intimately associated, and largely sympathized, with the fortunes of the Arminians. His contributions to exegetical and apologetic literature, to systematic theology and canon law, also give him an important place in the history of theological thought. His family was of noble extraction; his father a jurist, and fearlessly he resembles Luther. Not only Wiclif, but others, like Bishop Hall, delighted to find in the Bishop of Lincoln a support for their scriptural views, or, like Field, to use his name against the claims of the Pope to authority in the Church (Of the Church, vol. iv. pp. 384 sqq.).

D. S. Schaff.

Grotius, Hugo (Huig van Groot), a celebrated Dutch statesman, lawyer, and theologian; was b. at Delft, April 10, 1583, and d. at Rostock, Aug. 29, 1645. His career was intimately associated, and largely sympathized, with the fortunes of the Arminians. His contributions to exegetical and apologetic literature, to systematic theology and canon law, also give him an important place in the history of theological thought. His family was of noble extraction; his father a jurist, and fearlessly he resembles Luther. Not only Wiclif, but others, like Bishop Hall, delighted to find in the Bishop of Lincoln a support for their scriptural views, or, like Field, to use his name against the claims of the Pope to authority in the Church (Of the Church, vol. iv. pp. 384 sqq.).

D. S. Schaff.

Grotius, Hugo (Huig van Groot), a celebrated Dutch statesman, lawyer, and theologian; was b. at Delft, April 10, 1583, and d. at Rostock, Aug. 29, 1645. His career was intimately associated, and largely sympathized, with the fortunes of the Arminians. His contributions to exegetical and apologetic literature, to systematic theology and canon law, also give him an important place in the history of theological thought. His family was of noble extraction; his father a jurist, and fearlessly he resembles Luther. Not only Wiclif, but others, like Bishop Hall, delighted to find in the Bishop of Lincoln a support for their scriptural views, or, like Field, to use his name against the claims of the Pope to authority in the Church (Of the Church, vol. iv. pp. 384 sqq.).

D. S. Schaff.

Grotius, Hugo (Huig van Groot), a celebrated Dutch statesman, lawyer, and theologian; was b. at Delft, April 10, 1583, and d. at Rostock, Aug. 29, 1645. His career was intimately associated, and largely sympathized, with the fortunes of the Arminians. His contributions to exegetical and apologetic literature, to systematic theology and canon law, also give him an important place in the history of theological thought. His family was of noble extraction; his father a jurist, and fearlessly he resembles Luther. Not only Wiclif, but others, like Bishop Hall, delighted to find in the Bishop of Lincoln a support for their scriptural views, or, like Field, to use his name against the claims of the Pope to authority in the Church (Of the Church, vol. iv. pp. 384 sqq.).

D. S. Schaff.

Grotius, Hugo (Huig van Groot), a celebrated Dutch statesman, lawyer, and theologian; was b. at Delft, April 10, 1583, and d. at Rostock, Aug. 29, 1645. His career was intimately associated, and largely sympathized, with the fortunes of the Arminians. His contributions to exegetical and apologetic literature, to systematic theology and canon law, also give him an important place in the history of theological thought. His family was of noble extraction; his father a jurist, and fearlessly he resembles Luther. Not only Wiclif, but others, like Bishop Hall, delighted to find in the Bishop of Lincoln a support for their scriptural views, or, like Field, to use his name against the claims of the Pope to authority in the Church (Of the Church, vol. iv. pp. 384 sqq.).

D. S. Schaff.

Grotius, Hugo (Huig van Groot), a celebrated Dutch statesman, lawyer, and theologian; was b. at Delft, April 10, 1583, and d. at Rostock, Aug. 29, 1645. His career was intimately associated, and largely sympathized, with the fortunes of the Arminians. His contributions to exegetical and apologetic literature, to systematic theology and canon law, also give him an important place in the history of theological thought. His family was of noble extraction; his father a jurist, and fearlessly he resembles Luther. Not only Wiclif, but others, like Bishop Hall, delighted to find in the Bishop of Lincoln a support for their scriptural views, or, like Field, to use his name against the claims of the Pope to authority in the Church (Of the Church, vol. iv. pp. 384 sqq.).

D. S. Schaff.
trees was commonly idolatrous (Deut. xii. 2; 1 Kings xiv. 23; 2 Kings xvi. 4; 2 Chron. xxviii. 4; Isa. xlv. 4; Jer. ii. 20).

The Hebrews shared their veneration for trees with other Semitic races. Among them, however, trees were sacred to female divinities only, because the latter were the agents in transmitting to the earth the reproductive power of the male divinities; and the moon, as the seat of these female divinities, was considered as a star which dispensed dew, and was therefore the great helper to the plant-world. See Wolf BAUMBAUM: Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, Leipzig, 1876-79, 3 pts., II., 143 sqq., and his art. Haines, in Herzog, 2d ed., vol. 5, pp. 550-552.

GRUNDTVIG, Nicolai Frederik Severin, b. at Udby, a village in the Island of Sealand, Sept. 8, 1783; d. in Copenhagen, Sept. 2, 1872; studied theology in the university of Copenhagen, and was tutor in a private family in the island of Lolland, 1805-08, teacher of history in a school in Copenhagen 1808-10, vicar to his father at Udby 1810-13, and again teacher in Copenhagen 1813-21. He lived like a monk during those years of his youth; through about twenty years he never slept in a bed, and he slept only two hours in the night. He was not monastic, though: on the contrary, practical influence on real life was one of the deepest cravings of his nature. His powers as a poet and historian were the earliest to develop. From 1809 (Nordern Mythology, and the grand drama, Fall of Heithenism in the North) to 1822 (the translations of Saxo Grammaticus, Snorre Sturleson, and Beowulf's Drapa) he published a series of poetical and historical works, most of them referring to the heroic age of Scandinavian history, and all of them pregnant with a peculiarly stirring life. Meanwhile the other side of his nature, his religious genius, was not altogether without manifestation. His occasional sermons attracted great attention; and his View of the World's Chronicle of our Saviour in Copenhagen. There he soon marked. In 1825 H. N. Clausen, professor in the university, and the noble and learned rector of the Pfarrei—Paul Frey: N. F. S. Grundtvig, Copenhagen, 1871; J. KAFTAN: Grundtvig, der Prophet des Nordens, Basel, 1876. CLEMENS PETERSEN.

CRYNESUS is the name of a Susian family which settled at Basel, and during two centuries produced several celebrated theologians there. — Simon Cynenus, b. at Vehringen, 1493; d. at Basel, Aug. 1, 1541; was educated in the school of Pforzheim; studied theology, first in Vienna, afterwards at Wittenberg; was professor of Greek at Heidelberg (1524-29), and was called to Basel when Erasmus left that city on account of the introduction there of the Reformation. In 1531 he was made professor of theology; in 1534 he established the Reformation in Wurttemburg; in 1540 he partook in the disputation of Worms. His letters and a list of his works were published by W. Th. Streuber, Basel, 1847. — Johann Jacob Cynenus, b. at Bern, Oct. 1, 1540; d. at Basel, Aug. 13, 1817; studied at Basel and Tubingen, and was appointed preacher at Rödeln 1565, professor of the Old Testament at Basel 1575, at Heidelberg 1584, and professor of the New Testament at Basel 1586. Some of his letters were published by Scultetus 1619, others by simul 1720. A life of him, partly an autobiography, and containing a list of his numerous writings, appeared at Basel 1818.

QUALBERT, Giovanni, founded in the middle of the eleventh century the Cenobite order of Vallombrosa (calce umbrosa), in the Apennines, GUIDO OF AREZZO, monk in the monastery of Pomposa, in the diocese of Ferrara; distinguished himself as a musician and made a number of improvements in the method which he saw introduced, not only in Italy, but also in France and Germany. His activity falls between 1024 and 1037, but the dates of his birth and death are unknown. His inventions he has described in his Micrologus de Disciplina Artis Musicae, and Argumentum nosti Cantus. And also in Act. Sanct., Jan. 8.

GUENEE, Antoine, b. at Etampes, Nov. 23, 1717; d. at Fontainebleau, Nov. 27, 1803; was successively professor of rhetoric, canon of Amiens, and tutor to the children of the Count of Artois; travelled much in Italy, Germany, and England; translated several books from English, and wrote, against Voltaire's attack on the Old Testament, Lettres de quelques Juifs, etc. (Paris, 1769, 4 vols.; republished six times in the lifetime of the editor, last edition, Paris, 1857; translated into English by Lefaun, Dublin, 1777), the only book of any account which the Roman-Catholic Church produced against the encyclopedists.

QUERICKE, Heinrich Ernst Ferdinand, b. at Wettn, Feb. 25, 1803; d. at Halle, Feb. 4, 1878; studied theology at Halle; was appointed professor there 1829, and wrote a biography of Francisc 1827, a handbook of church history 1833 (8th ed., 1866; translated into English by W. G. T. Shedd, New York, 1857-63, 2 vols.), an Alg. chrisl. Symbolik 1839, etc. He was a very strict Lutheran, and opposed the exertions of the Prussian Government to effect a union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches, and founded, together with Rudebach, the Zeitschrift f. luth. Theologie und Kirche, 1840.

QUIBERT OF NOGENT, b. at Clermont, 1053; d. at Nogent, 1124; entered in 1064 the Benedictine monastery of Flav or St. Germer, where he came under the influence of Anselm, at that time prior of Bec, and a frequent visitor in Flav, and was in 1104 made abbot of Nogent-sous-Coucy, in the diocese of Laon. He was a man of great learning, and exercised considerable influence on the circle to which he belonged; but he knew it too well himself, and the impression which his writings make it not always so very agreeable, on account of his vanity and conceit, and was edited by D'Achery (Paris, 1651), and reprinted in Migne (PatroL Latim, 158 and 184). The most interesting of his works are: 1. De pignoribus sanctorum, occasioned by the exhibition, in the monastery of St. Medard, near Soissons, of one of Christ's teeth, and criticizing with great frankness the worship of saints and relics which was the rage of the time; 2. Historia Hierosolymitana, a history of the first crusade, written about 1108, and a rich source of knowledge; 3. De vita sua sive Monadiorum Libri III., of which the first book contains an autobiography in imitation of Augustine's Confessiones, the second the history of the monastery of Nogent, and the third the history of the diocese of Laon. The two last works have been translated into French, in Guizot: Coll. de Memoires, Paris, 1825.

QUIBERT OF PARMA was by the Empress Agnes made chancellor of the kingdom of Italy, and was thus by the very nature of his office placed in opposition to Hildebrand. It was due to him that Nicholas II., in his famous decree concerning papal elections, admitted the influence of the king of Germany; and when Alexander III. was elected Pope, without the consent of Henry IV. or his mother, the Empress Agnes, Guibert caused Bishop Cadalus of Parma to be elected antipope, under the name of Honorius II. The measure proved a complete failure; but, by the exertions of Agnes, Guibert was reconciled to Hildebrand, and in 1073 he was made Archbishop of Ravenna. His opposition, however, to Hildebrand's policy, was not merely the result of his office as chancellor. He hated that manner in which Gregory VII. used the monks, the Patarini, and the mass of the people, to enforce his authority over the clergy; and, as Archbishop of Ravenna, he resisted this policy in every way possible. In 1075 he was suspended, but he did not yield. In the contest between Henry IV. and Gregory VII. he sided with the former; and in 1080 he was elected antipope at Brixen by thirty bishops, and assumed the name of Clement III. In 1084 he crowned Henry Emperor in Rome. But, though Henry never abandoned him, he was never able to vindicate himself against the fury of the Hildebrand party. Not only Gregory VII., but also Victor III., Urban II., and Paschalis II., cursed and excommunicated him. He died at Ravenna, 1100; and, after the death of Henry IV., Paschalis II. ordered his bones to be dug up, and thrown into the water. See JAFFÉ: Regest. Pontif. Roman., pp. 443-447.

ALBRECHT VOGEL.

GUIDO OF AREZZO, monk in the monastery of Pomposa, in the diocese of Ferrara; distinguished himself as a musician and made a number of improvements in the method which he saw introduced, not only in Italy, but also in France and Germany. His activity falls between 1024 and 1037, but the dates of his birth and death are unknown. His inventions he has described in his Micrologus de Disciplina Artis Musicae, and Argumentum nosti Cantus.
GUIDO DE BRES, b. at Mons, 1528; d. at Valenciennes, 1567; was educated in the Roman Church, but converted by the reading of the Scriptures. Expelled from his native city, he went to London, where Wallon, the Mergentorf, had been formed in the reign of Edward VI., and where he prepared himself for the office of a preacher. In 1563 he returned to Flanders, labored as an itinerant preacher, and founded the first evangelical congregation at Lille. A second congregation was dispersed by armed force, and Guido was again compelled to flee. He repaired to Geneva, became an ardent disciple of Calvin, returned once more to Flanders, formed congregations at Tourna, Lille, and Valenciennes, wrote the Belgic Confession (which article see), but was taken prisoner at the capture of Valenciennes, in 1567, and hanged. His life and some of his letters are found in Histoire des Martyrs, Geneva, 1617.

GUILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM. See Gilbert of Sempringham.

GUIDLS, voluntary associations for the promotion of religious or moral objects within the pale of the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, are of recent origin. The prototypes of the modern institution were the guilds of the middle ages, the last vestiges of which in England were swept away by the Reformation. These were merchant, craft, and religious guilds; and their object was to advance the temporal and eternal welfare of their members by mutual protection, support, and prayer. After a long interval, the name was revived, and given to a new organization in 1851, the Guild of St. Alban of Manchester. The ends this league proposed to itself were wholly religious, and the membership composed of communicants in the Church of England. Previously, in 1844, the Brotherhood of the Holy Trinity was organized at Oxford, which is sometimes, but wrongly, represented as the first guild. In 1861 two other religious guilds, the Brotherhood of the Holy Ghost, Plymouth, and the Sisterhood of St. Peter, Kilburn. Since that time, the idea and the name have become very popular; and the number of organizations has largely increased, not only in England and her colonies, but also in the Episcopal Church of the United States. In 1873 a union of the guilds of Great Britain was effected under the title of the Church Guilds' Union, which holds an annual meeting.

The primary object of the guilds is to carry on more effectually parish-work, by inducing each communicant to exercise his own natural talents, and by pointing out the work proper for each to do. The spiritual objects vary, and are such as the visitation of the sick, inducing persons to be confirmed, caring for the poor, providing healthy amusements, etc. They are essentially lay societies, and designed to " impart dignity to the layman's work now wanting to it." They assist the parson and the clergyman, and would go so far as to exclude the parish clergyman from the offices of the society. The guilds may direct their energies to the general interests of the parish. But they are also organized for special objects; as the medical Guild of St. Luke, the missionary Guild of St. Savior, the Church and Stage Guild, A Soul's Guild for the reform of burial, etc. For a good account of the history and objects of guilds, see Guild Papers, contributed by Officers of Various Church Guilds, London.

GUILLLON, Marie Nicolas Sylvester, b. in Paris, Jan. 1, 1760; d. at Meudon, Dec. 16, 1837; was almoner and librarian to the Princess Lamballe, but fled from Paris, after her execution in 1792, and lived for several years in the provinces under an assumed name (Pastel), practising medicine. Having returned to Paris in 1798, he served Napoleon, the Bourbons, and the Orleanists successively, and with equal ease; accompanied Cardinal Fesch to Rome, and was made professor of rhetoric in the Lycée Bonaparte; was almoner to the Princess of Orlean; and became canon of St. Denis, Bishop of Morocco (in partibus infidelium), Dean of the Sorbonne, etc. He was a very prolific writer, and some of his works (Collection des breves du Pope Pie VI., Paris, 1708; Bibliothèque choise des Pères grecs et latins, Paris, 1822, 26 vols.; a translation of Cyprian with notes, Paris, 1837, 2 vols., etc.) are valuable.

GUINE, The House of, formed a younger branch of the house of Lorraine, and was founded in the beginning of the sixteenth century by Claude, the second son of René II. In 1508 he received all the French possessions of the family,—Guise, Elbeuf, Aumale, Mayenne, Joinville, etc.,—the archbishops of Rheims, the bishopric of Metz, etc., which were family benefices; and in 1527 he was made Duke of Guise, and governor of Champagne and Bourgoyne. He died in 1550; but in the next two generations his sons (Duke Francis of Guise, and Cardinal Charles of Lorraine) and his grandsons (Duke Henry of Guise, and Cardinal Louis of Lorraine) played the most prominent part in the history of France as leaders of the Roman-Catholic party, heads of the League, supporters of the Jesuit movement, and cruel suppressors of the Huguenots.

Duke Francis of Guise, b. Feb. 17, 1519; d. Feb. 24, 1563; was a valiant soldier. In 1552 he stopped Charles V. at Madrid; in 1559 he took Calais from the English. When Francis II., who had married his niece, Mary, Queen of Scots, ascended the French throne in 1559, the whole military command of the realm was intrusted to him, just as the whole civil administration was put into the hands of his brother, Cardinal Charles of Lorraine.—Charles, b. Feb. 17, 1524; d. Dec. 26, 1574; was made Archbishop of Rheims when he was fourteen years old, and cardinal when he was twenty-three. He held ten bishoprics, besides a great number of abbeys, and had an annual income of three hundred thousand crowns at a time when the total revenue of France was not more than five or six millions. He was supercilious and depraved, but cunning and eloquent. He began life as a pupil of the Renaissance and a friend of ecclesiastical reform; but, after his meeting with Cardinal Granvelle, he became a partisan of Philip II., and a champion of the Roman Church. Suddenly turn took place in his fortunes and in those of his family by the unexpected death of Francis II. in 1560. He retired to Rheims, Francis to Guise; and the royal princes, the Bourbons, Condé, etc., returned to power. On the basis, however, of the defence of Romanism against Protestantism, Francis succeeded in forming an alliance at the court, and... he was on his way to Paris when the massacre at Vassy occurred (1562); — the slaughter of a whole Protestant congregation, assembled at worship, lip to lip. The Huguenots arose, and the civil war began. Francis was placed at the head of the Roman-Catholic army, defeated the Huguenots at Dreux, and besieged their stronghold, Orleans, where he was shot dead by Poitrot de Mercé. At the re-opening of the Council of Trent in 1563 the cardinal wanted to gather the whole opposition around himself, but he utterly failed; and he afterwards became very zealous for the introduction in France of the canons of the council. On his return, he was very coldly received by the court; but the particular friendship which Philip II. showed him, the brilliant military successes of his nephew, Duke Henry of Guise, and the lavish support he gave to literature and art, continued to give him a certain influence. He left a considerable debt when he died.

Duke Henry of Guise, b. Dec. 31, 1550; d. Dec. 29, 1588: a son of Duke Francis; inherited his father's valor and military ability, but exceeded him far in political ambition, and hatred to the Huguenots. If not the founder, he was at all events the head, of the League from its very beginning in 1576. He formed the closest alliances with Philip II. (who gave him an annual pension of two hundred thousand francs) and with the Pope, who, at his instance, excommunicated Henry of Navarre. After the death of the Duke of Anjou, in 1554, he actually aspired to the throne of France; and both the Pope and Philip II. considered it necessary to support him, if France should not become Calvinistic. But he seems to have lacked courage. He procrastinated; and when the king, Henry III., thoroughly understood the drift of affairs, he had him assassinated at Blois by his guardsmen, him and his brother, Cardinal Louis of Lorraine. — Louis, b. July 6, 1555; d. Dec. 23, 1588; was a wit, and played only a secondary rôle.

Lit. — Duke Francis left a kind of diary, which is found in Michaud et Pajoulot: Nouvelle Collection de Mémoires, Paris, 1839. The best account of the destinies of this famous family is Résa de Bouillic, Histoire des Ducs de Guise, Paris, 1853, 4 vols.

GUNPOWDER PLOT, a conspiracy (1604—05) of some Roman Catholics for blowing up Parliament House with gunpowder while Parliament was in session, and killing the king, and thus securing advantages for their Church. The Roman Catholics, who had been held down under Elizabeth, expected concessions from James I., but were disappointed. Robert Catesby and Guy Fawkes were the leading conspirators. A building was rented next to Parliament House in 1604, and work begun in boring through the walls, which were nine feet thick, when an opportunity was afforded them of renting the cellar of the Parliament House itself. The conspirators deposited thirty-six kegs of powder there, covering them with stones and fuel. The plot was to be consummated the 5th of November, 1605, the opening day of Parliament. Lord Monteagle, a Roman-Catholic member of the House of Lords, was apprised of the danger by letter, and immediately communicated the matter to the king. The powder was discovered, and Fawkes taken in the cellar. Severe tortures were employed to draw from him confession to implicating others, but without avail. With three others he was put more to the foreground in his works. In 1852 he was chosen president of the consistory, and in his government of the Reformed Church he applied the Calvinistic system of the sixteenth century; but just thereby he made the difference between the various branches of the Reformed Church in France. His principal religious works are, L'Eglise et la Société chrétienne (1861), and Méditations sur l'essence de la religion chrétienne (1864), Eng. trans., New York, 1863: of a more popular character Les Vies de quatre grands chrétiens français. I. St. Louis, II. Calen (1868, all published), Eng. trans., St. Louis and Calen, London, 1868. In 1826 he founded the Société Bibliique, in 1833 the Société d'instruction primaire protestante, and in 1857 the Société d'histoire du protestantisme français. See M. Guizot in Private Life, by his daughter, Madame De Witt, London and Boston, 1880.

GUNDEULPH. Bishop Gerard of Cambrai and Arras discovered in 1625 a heretical sect in his diocese, whose members profess to have received their peculiar tenets from one Gundulph, an Italian by birth. As the bishop was very zealous for the purity of the faith, he had the heretics seized, and placed before a synod assembled in the Church of Mary at Arras. The doctrines, however, which the accused were willing to recognize as theirs, turned out to be perfectly innocent; and the whole affair threatened to become a mere triviality, when the bishop arose, and proved that he knew more about the sect than the sect itself, ascribing to it a multitude of hideous and dangerous heresies. As the excitement of the assembly reached a very high pitch under the bishop's speech, the accused deemed it most advisable to submit to every thing, recant every thing, and subscribe to every thing: so they did; and the acts of this towering stupidity are still extant (D'Achery, Spiriol., I.; Mans, Concil. XIV.). But outside of those acts nothing is known either of Gundulph, or his doctrines, or his followers.

GUNPOWDER PLOT, a conspiracy (1604—05) of some Roman Catholics for blowing up Parliament House with gunpowder while Parliament was in session, and killing the king, and thus securing advantages for their Church. The Roman Catholics, who had been held down under Elizabeth, expected concessions from James I., but were disappointed. Robert Catesby and Guy Fawkes were the leading conspirators. A building was rented next to Parliament House in 1604, and work begun in boring through the walls, which were nine feet thick, when an opportunity was afforded them of renting the cellar of the Parliament House itself. The conspirators deposited thirty-six kegs of powder there, covering them with stones and fuel. The plot was to be consummated the 5th of November, 1605, the opening day of Parliament. Lord Monteagle, a Roman-Catholic member of the House of Lords, was apprised of the danger by letter, and immediately communicated the matter to the king. The powder was discovered, and Fawkes taken in the cellar. Severe tortures were employed to draw from him confession to implicating others, but without avail. With three others he was put to death Jan. 31, 1806. The day previous four had suffered for the same crime.

In this plot was very disastrous to the cause of the Roman Catholics in England. The 5th of November was ordered to be kept as a national holiday by an act which was not repealed for two hundred years. One of the popular festivities of the day has been to dress up a figure in rags, parade the streets, singing rhymes, and to light it. See the Histories of England.

GÜNTHER, Anton, b. at Lindenau, in Bohemia, Nov. 17, 1783; d. at Vienna, Feb. 24, 1803; studied first law, then theology; was ordained priest in 1820, and lived mostly in Vienna, as teacher of philosophy. His works, of which the principal are Vorlesungen zur spekulativen Theologie (1828), Sünd-und Nord-lichter (1823), Thomas a Scrupulis (1835), Die Juste-Mitleue (1837), do not present a finished philosophical system, but are only an attack on the reigning monism, and an attempt at reconciling the Roman-Catholic dogma and modern science. They attracted much attention, however, and found, like those of Hermes, many ardent students; but in 1857 they were put on the Index. See P. Knodt: Anton Guntner, Wien, 1881, 2 vols.; J. Flekel: A. Guntner's Dualismus von Geist und Natur, Brseiss, 1882, pp. 42.

GURNALL, William, author of a quaint and popular book, The Christian in Complete Armour; b. at Lynn, 1616; d. at Lavenham, October, 1679. He graduated at Cambridge; in 1644 became rector of Lavenham, and at the Restoration signed the Act of Uniformity. The Christian in Complete Armour, or a Treatise on the Saints' War with the Devil, etc., is a series of sermons on Eph. vi. 6-20, abounding in epigrammatic sayings, and displaying great skill in applying Scripture. It was published in three volumes in 1655, sixth edition, 1679, and many times since; new edition, London, 1886, in two volumes, with Introduction by J. Ryle.

GURNEY, Joseph John, an eminent philanthropist, and minister of the Society of Friends; b. at Earlham, near Norwich, Aug. 2, 1788; d. Jan. 4, 1847. He attended lectures for a while at Oxford, and was recognized in 1818 as a minister by the Friends. The three years between 1837 and 1840 he spent in the United States and the West Indies, preaching. He was a man of rare piety and simplicity of character, and always foremost in enterprises of benevolence and humanity, using his large wealth with a liberal hand. He aided his sister, Mrs. Fry, in her measures for prison-reform, and was the associate with Clarkson, Wilberforce, and his brother-in-law, T. Powel Buxton, in their efforts for the abolition of the slave-trade. The latter cause lay nearest to his heart. He was also a prominent advocate of total abstinence, having signed the pledge at Ipswich, April 8, 1843. His temperance tracts, as are the Bibles, have been much circulated.

Mr. Gurney issued quite a number of tracts and pamphlets, with some larger works. Of these the principal are, Essays on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Practical Operations of Christianity, Lond., 1827, trans. into Spanish and German; History, Authority, and Use of the Sabbath, Lond., 1831; Peace restored to its Root, 1845. These works passed through a number of editions. See Memoirs of J. J. Gurney, by Braithwaite (Norwich and Phila., 1854, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1855) and Hodgeson (Phil., 1855).}

QUY, Jean Pierre, b. at Mailerencourt, Jan. 23, 1801; d. at Mirecourt, France, April 18, 1869; became a Jesuit, 1824; taught moral theology in Jesuit Colleges; and wrote Compendium theologiae moralis (1850) and Casus Conscientiae (1863), which, as specimens of the morals taught by the Jesuits, procured for their author an unenviable notoriety. See LINN: Das Handbuch Gurs und die christliche Ethik, Freiberg, 1869; and Vie (anon.), Paris, 1867.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS. See Thirty Years' War.

GUSTAVUS-ADOLPHUS-ASSOCIATION. The idea of this association was first conceived by Dr. Grossmann of Leipzig in 1832, when the second centennial of the death of the great Protestant hero was celebrated at Lützen, Nov. 6. Not simply a monument of brass or stone should be raised in his honor, but a monument of living men, doing the same work as he had done,— aiding and supporting Protestant families and congregations whenever aid and support were needed. An association was formed; and Oct. 4, 1834, its statutes were confirmed by the Saxion king. In the beginning the success was very slender. Though 10,000 thalers were sent from Sweden, the total capital of the association in 1841 was only 12,850 thalers. But in the same year Legrand, pastor of Basel, and Karl Zimmermann, court-preacher at Darmstadt, made most effective appeals to the public, setting forth the religious privations, chicaneries, and dangers to which evangelical families and congregations are exposed when living in the midst of a Roman-Catholic population. Branch societies were formed in various places in Germany, as also in foreign countries, and were brought in connection with the mother association; and at the general assembly in Stuttgart, 1845, the accounts of the association showed an income of 42,000 thalers for the last year. Aid had been given to 62 congregations. In several countries, as, for instance, in Bavaria, the association met with strong opposition from the Roman-Catholic government; and during the revolutionary years of 1848 and 1849 the interest slackened,— the revenue sank down to 21,000 thalers. But in 1850 matters began to improve, and since that time progress has been made every year. The association, comprising 45 minor associations, with 1,100 branch societies, 8 students' and 371 women's associations, owns now a capital of 336,401 marks. Since its foundation it has distributed 14,183,798 marks, and has built 1,068 churches, 639 schoolhouses, 42 cemeteries, and 358 parsonages. See K. Zimmermann: Geschichte des Gustav Adolf Vereins, Darmstadt, 1877; W. Pressel: Bauenteine zur Geschichte d. G. A. Vereins, 1878, 2 vols., and Der G. A. Vereins und das Volk Israel, Tübing., 1879. K. Zimmermann—Guthlac, Sta., presbyter, and hermit of Ireland; b. 874; d. 714. The child of nobles, he early showed martial prowess, and attacked, at the head of his band, the hereditary British foe; but, in his twenty-fourth year suddenly experiencing a change of heart, he gave up his wild life, repaired to a monastery, and then, full of enthusiasm for a solitary life, crossed over to Crooked Island, a desolate island off the extreme south coast of Lincolnshire, and there lived as a hermit. But his fame for piety attracted many admirers, and the hermit became a teacher of righteousness, while "men of divers conditions, nobles, bishops, abbots, poor, rich, from Mercia, and all Britain," made up his congregation. He was ordained a priest by Heddia, Bishop of Lichfield. At first in his discourses he was pensive and melancholy; but he resisted vigorously, and found in the cultivation of the soil, and in the giving of spiritual counsel, abundant distraction. One day he made this beautiful remark to a visitor. "Who hath led his life after God's will, the wild beasts and wild birds have become more intimate with him, and the man who will pass his life apart from worldly men, to him the angels approach nearer." On the site of his cell and oratory Ethelbald erected a monastery. See article in Smith and Wace, Dict. Chr. Biog., vol. ii. pp. 823–826.

GUTHRIE, Thomas, D.D., Scottish preacher and editor; son of David Guthrie; b. at Brechin, July 12, 1808; d. at St. Leonard's-on-the-Sea, Feb. 23, 1873. He was educated first at the schools of his native place, then at the University of Edinburgh, which he attended from 1815 to 1829; studied medicine in Paris in 1827; and conducted a bank agency in Brechin from 1828 to 1830. He was licensed to reach in 1825; ordained minister of the parish of Arbirlot on May 13, 1830; translated to collegiate charge of old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh, Sept. 10, 1837; and appointed minister of the new parish of St. John's, in the same city, Nov. 19, 1840. At the disruption he joined the Free Church, and became minister of the Church of Free St. John's, which charge he held until disabled by illness in 1864, when he became pastor emeritus. After this he became editor of the Sunday Magazine, in the pages of which most of his later works appeared. He obtained the degree of D.D. from the University of Edinburgh in 1849; and was moderator of the Free Church of Scotland in 1862.

He was greatly distinguished as a preacher, though his peculiarities were not those which have usually been associated with the Scottish pulpit. Recovering the members of his Bible-class at Arbirlot, how much an illustration did to assist the understanding and memories of his hearers, he cultivated the pictorial and illustrative in his discourses; and by the charm of his figures, the simplicity of his style, and the dramatic power of his manner, he rose to the front rank of pulpit orators. He wrote his sermons, and committed them to memory so fully, that he could give with ease that which he had prepared with elaboration. His delivery was at first slow and measured; and, though he waxed warmer as he proceeded, he never lost his self-possession. He had nothing of the whirlwind of Chalmers, and rarely became impassioned; but he was always dramatic. Occasionally the drapery of his illustration rather overlaid the truth which he desired to illustrate; but generally "the story, like the feathers of an arrow, made it strike, and, like the barb, made it stick."

Guthrie was eminent also as a philanthropist. His pastorate of St. John's took him down into the dens of the Edinburgh Cowgate, and stirred him up to do his utmost for the elevation of the deprived. Thus began his labors for Ragged Schools, with which his name will be always associated; for, though Sheriff Watson of Aberdeen was in that field before him, it was Guthrie's plea that first roused public attention to the need for such institutions. He was also prominent in the temperance cause, and for years was one of the foremost advocates of total abstinence. In the same line he took up Chalmers's territorial system, and was instrumental in rearing, on that principle, several churches in Edinburgh, which are now prosperous and self-supporting.

He was the means of raising a large sum of money for the erection of parsonages for the ministers of the Free Church; and every cause which had for its object the righting of wrong, or the alleviation of distress, or the restoration of the fallen, found in him a noble advocate.

His editorial labors, while sustaining fully, did not increase, his reputation; but they furnished him with an opportunity of showing, that, while he was steadfastly attached to his own religious belief, he could stretch a brother's hand to all classes of Christians; and so, when he died, there was no man more generally lamented by men of every denomination.

Lit. — Autobiography and Memoirs of Thomas Guthrie, D.D., by his sons David K. and Charles Guthrie, 1873; Plea for Ragged Schools, 1847; Second Plea for Ragged Schools, 1849; Seed-time and Harvest of Ragged Schools, 1860; The Gospel in Ezekiel (sermons), 1855; The City, its Sins and Sorrows, 1857; Christ and the Inheritance of the Saints, 1858; The Way to Life, 1862; Speaking to the Heart, 1862; Man and the Gospel, 1865; The Angel’s Song, 1865; The Parables, 1866; Our Father’s Business, 1867; Out of Harness, 1867; Early Piety, 1868; Studies of Character from the O.T., 1868, 1870; Sundays Abroad, 1871. Works, reprinted N.Y., 1873–76, 11 vols., and his Autobiography and Life in 2 vols. WM. M. TAYLOR.

GUTZLAFF, Karl Friedrich August, b. at Stettin, 1802; d. at Victoria, Aug. 9, 1851; went in 1823 to Singapore as a missionary in the service of the Netherland Missionary Society, thence in 1825 to Siam, and in 1831 to China, where he remained as his intercourse with the members of his Bible-class at Arbirlot, how much an illustration did to assist the understandings and memories of his hearers, he cultivated the pictorial and illustrative in his discourses; and by the charm of his figures, the simplicity of his style, and the dramatic power of his manner, he rose to the front rank of pulpit orators. He wrote his sermons, and committed them to memory so fully, that he could give with ease that which he had prepared with elaboration. His delivery was at first slow and measured; and, though he waxed warmer as he proceeded, he never lost his self-possession. He had nothing of the whirlwind of Chalmers, and rarely became impassioned; but he was always dramatic. Occasionally the drapery of his illustration rather overlaid the truth which he desired to illustrate; but generally "the story, like the feathers of an arrow, made it strike, and, like the barb, made it stick."

Guthrie was eminent also as a philanthropist. His pastorate of St. John's took him down into the dens of the Edinburgh Cowgate, and stirred him up to do his utmost for the elevation of the depraved. Thus began his labors for Ragged Schools, with which his name will be always associated; for, though Sheriff Watson of Aberdeen was in that field before him, it was Guthrie's plea that first roused public attention to the need for such institutions. He was also prominent in the temperance cause, and for years was one of the foremost advocates of total abstinence. In the same line he took up Chalmers's territorial system, and was instrumental in rearing, on that principle, several churches in Edinburgh, which are now prosperous and self-supporting.

He was the means of raising a large sum of money for the erection of parsonages for the ministers of the Free Church; and every cause which had for its object the righting of wrong, or the alleviation of distress, or the restoration of the fallen, found in him a noble advocate.

His editorial labors, while sustaining fully, did not increase, his reputation; but they furnished him with an opportunity of showing, that, while he was steadfastly attached to his own religious belief, he could stretch a brother's hand to all classes of Christians; and so, when he died, there was no man more generally lamented by men of every denomination.

Lit. — Autobiography and Memoirs of Thomas Guthrie, D.D., by his sons David K. and Charles Guthrie, 1873; Plea for Ragged Schools, 1847; Second Plea for Ragged Schools, 1849; Seed-time and Harvest of Ragged Schools, 1860; The Gospel in Ezekiel (sermons), 1855; The City, its Sins and Sorrows, 1857; Christ and the Inheritance of the Saints, 1858; The Way to Life, 1862; Speaking to the Heart, 1862; Man and the Gospel, 1865; The Angel's Song, 1865; The Parables, 1866; Our Father's Business, 1867; Out of Harness, 1867; Early Piety, 1868; Studies of Character from the O.T., 1868, 1870; Sundays Abroad, 1871. Works, reprinted N.Y., 1873–76, 11 vols., and his Autobiography and Life in 2 vols. WM. M. TAYLOR.

GUTZLAFF, Karl Friedrich August, b. at Stettin, 1802; d. at Victoria, Aug. 9, 1851; went in 1823 to Singapore as a missionary in the service of the Netherland Missionary Society, thence in 1825 to Siam, and in 1831 to China, where he remained as his intercourse with the members of his Bible-class at Arbirlot, how much an illustration did to assist the understandings and memories of his hearers, he cultivated the pictorial and illustrative in his discourses; and by the charm of his figures, the simplicity of his style, and the dramatic power of his manner, he rose to the front rank of pulpit orators. He wrote his sermons, and committed them to memory so fully, that he could give with ease that which he had prepared with elaboration. His delivery was at first slow and measured; and, though he waxed warmer as he proceeded, he never lost his self-possession. He had nothing of the whirlwind of Chalmers, and rarely became impassioned; but he was always dramatic. Occasionally the drapery of his illustration rather overlaid the truth which he desired to illustrate; but generally "the story, like the feathers of an arrow, made it strike, and, like the barb, made it stick."

Guthrie was eminent also as a philanthropist. His pastorate of St. John's took him down into the dens of the Edinburgh Cowgate, and stirred him up to do his utmost for the elevation of the instance, a commission of three, consisting of Bossuet, Bishop Noailles, and Abbé Tronson, was appointed to examine her writings. Thirty articles were drawn from them, teaching errors, which Madame Guyon recanted, receiving, in return, a certificate from Bossuet of catholic orthodoxy. She continued to hold meetings in Paris for the advancement of the inner life, and was apprehended Dec. 28, 1685, and placed in confinement at Vincennes, and later in the Bastille, from which, by the intercession of Noailles, now Archbishop of Paris, she was removed to Vaugirard. But a letter of La Combe's (who died insane 1699), calling upon her to do penance for their mutual intimacy, falling into the hands of the king, led him to condemn her again to the Bastille. In 1699 Bossuet secured a complete victory over Fénelon by the condemnation of his Maximes des Saintes, as containing dangerous and heretical opinions. He then arranged a meeting between her and Bossuet, the most influential prelate of France at that time. The same year, in consequence of complaints, and at Madame Guyon's
GUYON.

In 1686 La Combe was cited by the general of the order of Barnabites to appear at Paris, and thither Madame Guyon accompanied him. The following year, at the instigation of her brother, she was charged with improper relations with Madame Guyon, and for being a follower of Michael Molinos, and thrown into the Bastille. Thenceforth, Madame Guyon's life was a series of visions, revelations, and trances, and wrote her Moyen court at trés facile de faire oraison ("Short and easy method of prayer"), and Le Cantique des Cantiques ("The Song of Solomon"). Her mysticism, however, awakened the jealousy and severity of a mother-in-law. At this period she observed painful and prolonged ascetic practices, flagellating herself till the blood ran from the wounds, wearing a girdle studded with iron teeth, tearing her skin with thorns, walking with stones in her shoes, and depriving herself of food and sleep. The fashionable society in which her husband mingled she completely renounced.

In 1677 Madame Guyon was left a widow with three children, and, in spite of offers of marriage, remained a widow. A correspondence with Father La Combe, whom she had met in Montpellier, and of which the following are an object of suspicion, and became an object of admiration and reverence. There her first meeting with Fénelon occurred, which led to a cordial friendship. In 1688 she was confined to the convent at Vincennes, and later in the Bastille. In 1699 Bossuet secured a complete victory over Fénelon by the condemnation of his Maximes des Saintes, as containing dangerous and heretical opinions. He then arranged a meeting between her and Bossuet, the most influential prelate of France at that time. The same year, in consequence of complaints, and at Madame Guyon's GYROVAGI is the name generally given to a kind of vagrant monks which was very numerous when monasticism was first introduced in Western Europe. They had no fixed domicile, but wandered from cell to cell, from hermitage to hermitage, from abbey to abbey, living on the hospitality of their brethren, but giving both to them and to the community at large a very bad example. Augustine and Cassianus wrote against them, and several synods in Gaul tried to suppress them; but they did not disappear until the time of Charlemagne and Louis the Pious, when the rules of Benedict became the rules of monasticism in general. Cf. Martene: Commentarii in Regulam S. P. Benedicti, Paris, 1690. Albrecht Vogel.
HAAG ASSOCIATION.

H.

HAAG (HAQUE) ASSOCIATION, for the Defense of the Christian Religion, The, or The Apologetical Society of the Hague, was founded in August, 1785, by a number of distinguished Dutch theologians. The occasion was the appearance, in 1782, of Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity: and the object of the society was to take a firm stand against the anti-Christian tendencies of the age. During the first period of its life (1785-1810) its stand-point was strictly orthodox and supranaturalistic. In its publications the accommodation theory of Semler was absolutely rejected; the doctrines of vicarious atonement, the divinity of Christ, the personality of the Holy Spirit, etc., were strongly emphasized; and the stand-point may be characterized as biblico-evangelical. The biblical angelology, the miracles of Elijah and Elisha, were vindicated; the dogmatics and ethics of the Gospel of John were examined; and the biblical idea of revelation was maintained in opposition to the rationalists. The character of the third period (1835-60) was principally determined by the writings of D. F. Strauss and the Tubingen school. The contest raged around the very fundaments of Christianity; and the principles which the society fought for were strongly conservative, though it carried on the fight in a free, scientific spirit. But, from this critico-historical platform, the society, after 1890, gradually slid into the ethico-religious field; and, in spite of the truth and beauty they contain, its publications on slavery, war, capital punishment, woman's emancipation, and other questions of a similar import, lie far out in the periphery of Christian apologetics.

J. J. VAN OOSTERZEK.

HABAKKUK (ḤABAKKUK), embracing "one of the Minor Prophets of the Old Testament." From the expression (iii. 19), "To the chief singer on my stringed instruments," the inference has with justice been drawn, that he was a Levite; for only Levites and priests could participate in the services of the temple. Nothing further is known of the prophet's life except what has been handed down by unreliable tradition. [The rabbins said he was the son of the Shunammite whom Elisha had restored. A "Habakkuk, son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi," is reported to have been the author of Bel and the Dragon. He carried food to Daniel in the lions' den, etc.]

Book of. The prophecy of Habakkuk contains (1) "The prophet's complaint against the corrupt state of society (i. 2-4); (2) The divine answer, announcing an eruption of the Chaldeans (i. 5-11); (3) The prophet's complaint of the inscrupulous greed and fierceness of the Chaldeans (i. 12-17); (4) The prophet's answer, promising their destruction (ii. 4-20); and (5) The prophet's response to these two divine announcements in a magnificent ode commemorating the majesty of God (iii.).

The time of composition is not indicated by any positive statement in the book itself. De Wette, Ewald, and others refer it to the reign of Jehoiakim, and regard the invasion of the Chaldeans alluded to as beginning with the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.). This view is opposed by ch. i. 5, which represents that invasion as something incredible, and by the fact that Zephaniah (i. 7; comp. Hab. ii. 20) and Jeremiah (iv. 13, v. 6; comp. Hab. i. 8) draw from Habakkuk. Others place the prophet's activity under Manasseh. The third chapter, which presupposes the restoration of the old temple worship, makes against this view, and for a date after the twelfth year of Josiah's reign (680 B.C.), up to which time idolatry lasted. [This view is strongly presented by Delitzsch in his Commentary.] The sentiments of ch. i. 2-4 are in accord with such a transition period to better things. The style of Habakkuk is classic. Expression and description are artistically rounded off, and less dependent upon older models than the other Minor Prophets. The author deserves a place among the greatest of the prophets; and the lyric poem of ch. iii. surpasses every thing of its kind in the Old Testament. It has with justice been said by Umbreit that he resembles Jeremiah in the combination of softness with lofty manliness, and Asaph in his lyric sensitiveness and warmth.

[With reference to the third chapter of Habakkuk, Isaac Taylor says (Hebrew Poetry, American edition, p. 255), "This anthem, unequalled in majesty and splendor of language and imagery, and which, in its closing verses, gives expression in terms the most affecting to an intense feeling, on this ground so fully embodies these religious sentiments as to satisfy Christian piety, even of the loftiest order." Of the same chapter Dean Stanley (Jewish Church, ii. 549) says, "The prophet seems to be transformed into the Psalmist; the ancient poetic fervor of Deborah is rekindled within him." Some of the most frequently quoted passages of Scripture are found in our prophet (i. 13, ii. 14, 15, 20, iii. 2, 18, etc.); and the great truth, "The just shall live by faith" (ii. 4), is used by Paul as the constructive doctrine of two of his Epistles (Rom. i. 17; Gal. iii. 11). Daniel Webster somewhere says that the imagery of Habakkuk is not surpassed in all literature. To be convinced of its grandeur one has only to refer to the description of the invading Chaldeans, whose "horses are swifter than the leopards, and more fierce than the evening wolves" (i. 5-11), and whose greed is as insatiable as death and hell (ii. 5); or to the magnificent description of the power and glory of God (iii. 2-15).

VOLCK.

HABERKORN, Peter, b. at Butzbach, 1804; d. at Giessen, 1876; was first professor at Marburg, then court-preacher at Darmstadt, and finally professor at Glessen. He was one of the lights of Protestant polemics in the seventeenth century, and wrote against Romanism and syncretism: Disputations ante Walenburgicas (1688), Enulatio catholicorum errores (1695), etc.

HABERT, Isaac, d. at Pont de Salors, near Rodez, 1688; b. in Paris; studied at the Sorbonne; was appointed canon at the church of Notre Dame, and became Bishop of Vabres in 1645. He was the first to attack the Jansenists, and is said to have done so at the instigation of Richelieu. His principal writings are, De consentu hierarchiae et monarchiae (1640), De primatu Patriarchorum, etc.

HACKET, John, D.D., Bishop of Lichfield; b. in London, September, 1592; d. at Lichfield, Oct. 21, 1670. He was educated at Cambridge; was chaplain to James I., and made bishop 1661. He was one of the lights of learning: he loved his work even in its dryest and quaintest details. In private life he was simple, modest, and humble, warm in his affections, tender in his sympathies, and unaffected in his piety. He was a member of the New-Testament company of the American Bible Revision Committee, as he had previously been of the American Bible Union. His works are very valuable, and include an edition, with notes, of Plutarch's De Sera Numinis Invectiva (1844); a translation, with improvements, of Winer's Chaldee Grammar (1845); an original Hebrew Grammar, with a Chronology (1847); Commentary on the Acts (1851); revised edition, 1858, and again 1877; Illustrations of Scripture, suggested by a Tour through the Holy Land (1855; revised edition, 1868; new edition, 1882); Philemon, new annotated translation (1860); Christian Memorials of the War (1864); translations, with additions, of Van Oosterzee's Commentary on Philemon (1868), and Braune's on the Philo Scribes of Lange (1870), for the American edition of Lange; edition of Rawlinson's Historical Illustrations of the Old Testament (1873). In connection with Professor Ezra Abbot he edited the American edition of Smith's Bible Dictionary, New York, 1868-70, 4 vols. See G. H. Whitehouse: Memorials of H. B. Hackett, Rochester, 1876.

HADAD (חָדָד, also Ἡδάδ), a word of doubtful etymology; was the name of a Syrian divinity. It was also the name of two Edomite kings (Gen. xxxv. 35, xxxvi. 39,—a son of Ishmael (1 Chron. i. 30), and a contemporary of Solomon (1 Kings xi. 24-25)), the last-mentioned, who was of royal blood, fled as a child to Egypt at Joab's defeat of the Edomites. He married the daughter of Pharaoh, and at David's death made an attempt to reconquer his native land. The Hebrew text breaks off so suddenly at verse 22, and verse 25 is so evidently out of place, that we prefer to suppose that the conclusion of his history has, by an error of the copyist, been inserted in the wrong place, and to read at verse 25, with the LXX., "This is the evil that Hadad did, and he abhorred Israel, and reigned over Syria." He is not to be confounded with the HADADZEB (or Hadarezer) of 1 Kings xi. 23. The latter was king of Zoba in the time of David, and exercised considerable power, as is evident from the fact that kings are called his servants (2 Sam. x. 19). See the Bible dictionaries of Winzer, Schenkel, Riehm [and Smith].

HADAD-RIM'NON, or HADAR-RIM'NON (Zech. xii. 11), was either a person over whom the "mourning" was made, a locality at which the event bewailed occurred, or, as Hitzig and others hold, the name of a Syrian divinity, in which case the mourning would have been part of the worship offered to him. The best explanation refers the name to a locality which witnessed the death of Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 29 sq.), whose memory was honored by songs of lamentation in this land (2 Chron. xxxv. 25). Although the location has not been identified with certainty, it was probably at the site of the modern Rummane, in the plain of Jeruel, about two miles south of Ledshun (Legio), which is most probably the ancient Megiddo. The name of the town Hadad-Rimmon was, no doubt, originally the name of a deity; Hadad and Rimmon being both the names of that god. See the commentaries on Zechariah, the works on Palestine by Reland and Robinson, and the articles in Winzer, Schenkel, Riehm [and Smith].

HADDAH, Arthur West, b. in England, 1816; d. at Barton-on-Heath in England, Feb. 8, 1873. After a distinguished career in the University of Oxford, where he was a fellow of Trinity, he retired (1857) to his quiet country parsonage at Barton-on-Heath, and passed the remainder of his days in pastoral and literary labor. He was a scholar of tireless industry; and besides a thorough monograph upon Apostolical Succession in the Church of England (1869), and numerous articles in Smith's Dictionaries of Christian Biography and of Antiquities, he edited for the Anglo-Catholic Library the works of Archbishop Bramhall (Oxford, 1842-45, 5 vols.), and also those of Herbert Thorndike (Oxford, 1845-55, 5 vols.), and, in connection with Professor W. M. Stubbbs, the Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland (Oxford, 1869-78). See his Remains, edited by Bishop Forbes, London, 1876.

HADDE (Ἁδῆς, Ἡδῆς, or Ἡδός, or in the older Homeric form 'Hēς, commonly derived from a privative and the verb ἴδω, i.e., the unseen world) is used by Homer as a proper noun for Pluto, the god of the unseen or lower world, next brother to Jesus (hence το or εις ουλος, αεις, or δαίον, "in" or "into the abode of Hades"). In later writers it signifies a place and state; viz., the unseen spirit-world, or the realm of the departed, the abode of the dead. It occurs in the following passages of the Greek Testament: Matt. xi. 23, xvi. 18; Luke x. 15, xv. 29; Acts ii. 27, 31; Rev. i. 18, vi. 8, xx. 14. (b) In the man-Catholic Church, Hades has undergone several modifications. (a) In the ancient church, Hades was the transitory abode of all the departed between death and resurrection, except the martyrs, who pass directly into heaven. So Tertullian, Irenæus, Lactantius, Ambrose. The Gnostics taught a transplantation of the highest order (the pneumatic) into the world of the pleroma.
HADES.

927

HADES.

(b) In the Roman-Catholic Church, Hades has been, since Gregory I., transformed into the purgatory, or the abode of imperfect Christians, till they are pure enough to enter heaven. This purgatory is between heaven and hell, and takes the place of the limbus patrum in the old dispensation, which contained the Jewish saints waiting for Christ, and was emptied when he descended for their deliverance: so purgatory will be finally emptied at the day of judgment. Much pious superstition and fraud collected around this mediæval theory, which explains the radical re-action at the time of the Reformation. See PURGATORY.

(c) The Protestant churches rejected, with purgatory and its abuses, the whole idea of a middle state, and taught simply two states and places,— heaven for believers, and hell for unbelievers. Hades was identified with Gehenna, and hence both terms were translated alike in the Protestant versions. The same confusion gave rise also to misinterpretations of the article of Christ's descent in the Apostles' Creed, which was understood by Calvin (and the Heidelberg Catechism) figuratively, and identified with the sufferings on the cross; by the Westminster Catechism, as meaning simply that he continued in the state of death till he rose; by Luther, as a triumph over hell.

(d) In more recent times the idea of a middle state between death and resurrection, as distinct from the final state of heaven and hell, has been revived among Protestants, especially in Germany, though freed from the superstitions of the Roman purgatory, which has no foundation in the New Testament. To the believer (as to Lazarus in Abraham's bosom) this middle state is a state of beatitude in union with their Lord; to the unbeliever (as to the rich man in the parable) it is a state of punishment; to both a state of preparation for the final consummation at the day of judgment. Some assume a constant progress in that state in opposite directions, the good growing better, the bad worse, and both ripening for the final harvest. So Nitzsch, Lange, Rothe, Martensen, Rink. But all speculations on the future state beyond the limits of revelation are docta ignorantia.

4. In ECCLESIASTICAL THEOLOGY the idea of Hades has undergone several modifications. (a) In the ancient church, Hades was the transitory...
HADRACH.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

HADRACH (הדרך, probably the Pausal of הדריך) is mentioned only in Zech. ix. 1: "Utterance of the word of Jhove concerning the land of Hadrach, and Damascus is its [the word's] place of rest."

The connection seems to indicate that it was the country in which Damascus was situated, or a neighboring locality. The following explanations have been suggested: It is (1) the name of a king (comp. Mic. v. 6; Neh. ix. 22); (2) of a god worshipped there (Ilitzig, Ewald, Reuss); (3) a symbolical designation meaning strong-weak, and refers to God (Jerome, hence Holy Land) or the Medo-Persian kingdom (Hengstenberg); (4) a designation of Cæsarea, the word being taken as an adjective from הדרך (Maurer); (5) the name of a country, and is, on the basis of Assyrian inscriptions, to be identified with Hatarika (a city named in connexion with Damascus which the Assyrians knew but rather, as I think, with Chattracharta, near Ptolemaeus, which Strabo mentions (xvi. 1, 6) as the residence of Darius Hystaspis; and (6) a name of Hauranitis (v. Ortenberg, Olshausen), the word being corrected to הדרך (Ezek. xlvii. 6, 18). See especially A. G. KÖHLER: D. Weisungen Scharara, 1883, for the various older interpretations, and Hadrach, in the Bible Dicata of WINTER, RIEM and SMITH.

WOLP BAUDISIIN.

HADRIAN, P. Ælius, Roman emperor (117-138); was b. in Rome, Jan. 24, 76; of Spanish descent; a relative of Trajan, whom he adopted on his death-bed. He was brilliantly gifted, and most carefully educated, a perfect soldier, ignorant of no art or science, possessed of a wonderful memory and a ready wit, handsome, and good-natured. But the elements of character were only loosely cemented; and, attracted in opposite directions, he finally lost himself in self-contradictions.

He began his reign with abandoning the conquests of Trajan. Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia,—a measure hitherto unheard of in the annals of Rome. But his policy was to consolidate, not to extend, the empire; and the first condition for the success of such a policy was to procure strong natural boundary-lines. The period from 121 to 134 he spent in travelling about, looking after everything himself, restoring what was decaying, and starting new undertakings. The number of buildings erected during his reign was enormous: and his influence on Roman legislation, affecting the state of the slaves, military affairs, the methods of legal procedure, the administration, etc., is very remarkable.

But he returned to Rome stricken by an incurable disease, and haunted by melancholy. He died at Baits, July 10, 138, a burden to him. But he returned to Rome stricken by an incurable disease, and haunted by melancholy. He died at Baits, July 10, 138, a burden to him; and was entombed in the huge mausoleum, Moles Hadriani, the present castle of Angelo, which he had built for himself in Rome.

With respect to his relations to the Jews, see ZAHRAWI, and ISRAEL, Post-biblical History. With respect to his relation to Christianity, some writers describe him as a bitter foe, and speak of a fourth so-called Hadrianic persecution: others consider him a friend, and make him out the originator of the first edict of toleration. Both parties are no doubt wrong. The stories of the martyrdom of Bishop Dionsiussus Areopagita of Athens, of Bishop Alexander, and Bishop Ephraem of Rome, of St. Eustathius, St. Symphosius, St. Cerealis, etc., are, by no means reliable: in several cases the very existence of the person in question is doubtful. On the other hand, his rescript forbidding the execution of Christians on the mere denials of a tumultuous, frenzied Pagans, is very far from being an edict of toleration: it is simply the enforcement of the edict of Trajan, according to which no Christian could be executed except after legally instituted and conducted process. The truth seems to be, that Hadrian was ignorant of Christianity, and indifferent to it. In his letter to Serapis he identifies the Christians with the worshippers of Serapis. The two Christian apologies presented to him by Quadratus and Aristides would, no doubt, have thrown full light on this question if they had come down to us; but they are lost; and the praise which the apologists of the 3d generation lavished on his memory was probably merely intended to impress his successor.

HADRIAN (Popes). See ADRIAN.

HERETICO COMBURENDO was a writ for the burning of heretics by the secular power, abolished by Charles II.

HAETZER (or HETZER), Ludwig, b. about 1500 at Bischofszell, near St. Gall, Switzerland; studied at Freiburg in Breisgau, and acquired good knowledge of Hebrew; was for some time chaplain at Wädenswyl on Lake Zurich; embraced the Reformation, and enjoyed the confidence of Zwingli, Oecolampadius, and other Reformers, but was successively expelled from Zurich, Augsburg, Strassburg, etc., on account of his Anabaptist views, and was finally beheaded for bigamy at Constance, Feb. 3, 1529. In Strassburg he became acquainted with Dench, and published together with him a translation of the Prophets (Worms, 1527), which was often reprinted. See KRIM: Luti. Heter., in Jahrb. Protesche Theol., 1856, pp. 215 sqq.

TH. KRIM.

HAFENREFFER, Matthias, a Lutheran divine, b. at Lorch, Württemberg, June 24, 1561; d. at Tübingen, Oct. 22, 1619; was appointed pastor at Eningen in 1588, court-preacher in Stuttgart 1590, professor of theology at Tubingen 1595. His Loci Theologici (1600) was the generally used text-book in Tübingen during the seventeenth century, and also introduced at other universities, as, for instance, at Upsala. His Tempulum Ecclesiæ was still more celebrated in his own time. His correspondence with Kepler (in K. Opp., VIII., ed. Frisch) is very characteristic, and shows him as a quiet, cautious, but kind man. See THOLUCK: D. akad. Leben, i. 145; GASS: Gesch. d. protest. Dogm., i. 77 sqq.

WAGENMANN.

HA'GAR (‟אגר, "flight"), an Egyptian, and bondwoman of Sarah, whom the latter, being barren, and following an ancient custom, gave to Abraham for a concubine. Her pregnancy aroused the jealousy of her mistress, and became the occasion of such harsh treatment, that she fled into the wilderness of Shur. At the well Beer-lahai-roi (Gen. xvi. 14) she was induced by HAGARITES. HAGGAI.

a theophany to return and submit. Hagar became the mother of Ishmael, but was again cast forth by Sarah, who in the mean time had given birth to Isaac (Gen. xxi. 9–11). She was again supernaturally visited in her distress (Gen. xxi. 11–21). Paul (Gal. iv. 24 sqq.), in an allegory, makes the slave Hagar the representative of the Law of Sinai, on which see Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 190–195.

HAGARITES, or HAGARENES, a people dwelling in Northern Arabia, with whom the trans-Jordanic tribes made war in the reign of Saul (1 Chron. v. 10 sqq.). They appear again in Ps. lxxxiii. 6 as an Arabic tribe hostile to Israel. They were probably descendants of Hagar (perhaps by another child than Ishmael), although they are distinguished from the Ishmaelites (Ps. lxxxiii. 8). See arts. in Smith’s and Winer’s Dictionary.

HAGENAU, Conference of, a politico-religious conference called by Charles V. to Spires, and convened at Hagenau on account of an epidemic raging in the former city; lasted from June 12 to July 16, 1540, but effected nothing with respect to the relation between Romanists and Protestants in Germany. The former were represented by Eck, Faber, and Cochlaeus; the latter by Osiander, Brenz, Capito, Cruciger, and Myconius. Only some preliminary questions were discussed, and a conference, to be held at Worms, was agreed upon.

HAGENBACH, Karl Rudolf, a distinguished theological professor and church historian; b. in Basel, March 4, 1801; d. in the same city, June 7, 1874. After spending a year at the university of Basel, he went to Bonn and Berlin, where Schleiermacher and Neander exerted a large influence upon him in fixing his theological opinions. Returning to Basel in 1823 through the persuasions of De Wette, he taught as docent, and was soon made professor. In 1873 he celebrated the fiftieth jubilee of his connection with the university. During these years, besides his professorial duties, he excelled in the publication of philosophical works. His sermons appeared in nine volumes (Basel, 1858–75). He also published two volumes of poems (2d ed., Basel, 1863), in which his mild and childlike disposition is reflected. Hagenbach’s special department was church history. He represented a school in theology (Vermittlungstheologie) occupying an intermediate position between the old supranaturalists and the rationalists. He gradually departed from the position of Schleiermacher, which he had occupied in his early career, laid an increasing stress upon the independence of objective reality of Christian facts, and emphasized the confessions of the Church. His first important work was the Encyclopädie u. Methodologie d. theol. Wissenschaften, Leipzig, 1833 [10th ed. by Kautzsch, 1880], which still holds its place as the most useful work of its kind. The Lehrbuch d. Dogmengeschichte first appeared in 1840; 5th ed., 1887 (English translation by Buch, Edinburgh, revised and enlarged by Dr. H. B. Smith, New York, 1861, 2 vols.; new edition, with preface by Plumptre, Edinburgh, 1880, 3 vols.). This is still the most popular work in its department. His largest work is the Kirchengesch. von d. alten Zeit bis z. 19ten Jahrhundert, Leipzig, 1850–75, 7 vols. It was in part a reconstruction of three earlier works,—Geschichte d. Reformation (1834–43), Geschichte d. alten Kirche (1853), and Geschichte d. Mittelalters (1860). [The work has appeared in partial translations,—History of the Reformation, by Miss E. Moore, 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1878, and History of the Church in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries, by Dr. Hurst, 2 vols., New York, 1869.] These historical labors are not so much distinguished for originality of treatment, or novelty of discovery, as for their comprehensive views, aniable spirit, and clear and attractive style. Among his other writings are Die Kirchengesch. und Gesch. d. alten Kirche, Leipzig, 1859; Grundzüge d. Homileitik u. Liturgik, Leipzig, 1863. He also edited a Swiss Church Magazine from 1845 to 1868. [He was a prominent contributor to Herzog's Encyclopaedia.] See Erinnerung an K. R. Hagenbach, Basel, 1874, which contains a short autobiographical sketch, and other matter. An extensive Autobiography exists only in manuscript. [EPPLER: Karl Rudolf Hagenbach, Gutersloh, 1875.] R. STAHELIN.

HAGGADAH (anecdote, legend) is a Talmudic and rabbinical term for traditional stories and legends illustrative of Scripture. Many of these stories are amusing, many are beautiful; but their critical value is small. See MIDRASH.

HAGGAI (117], festive), one of the three prophets of the post-exile period. He prophesied at Jerusalem in the second year of the reign of Darius, or 520 B.C. (1:1), and accused the people to complete the second temple (Ez. v. 1, vi. 14). Bleek, Ewald, Stanley, and others have supposed, on the ground of 11. 3, that he had seen Solomon's temple, in which case he lived to a great age.

Book of. The Book of Haggai is an exhortation to complete the temple, work upon which had been begun in 534 B.C., but discontinued by a decree of Cyrus, and a prophecy of the blessing of the Lord which would follow its completion. It consists of four parts: the first (i. 1–15) attributes the curse resting upon the people to their listlessness in leaving the temple unfinished while they dwelt in "panelled houses," and exhorts them to begin work; the second (ii. 1–9) predicts for the new temple a glory greater than that of Solomon; the third prophecy (ii. 10–19) urges them to greater activity in view of the curse to be escaped, and the blessing to ensue; and the fourth (ii. 20–23) promises victory over the heathen, and an abiding glory to Zerubbabel.

Haggai, like Zechariah and Malachi, the other two prophets after the Captivity, does not equal the earlier prophets in language and poetry. He is not, however, deficient in enthusiasm and originality (De Wette). A prophet is not to be measured by his power of description, but by the inherent value of what he utters, and by the purpose he is to subservie. The prophecies of these three prophets are the grand voices of watchmen in the morning watch of the old covenant.

It was Haggai's special office to predict the connection of redemption with the second temple, and of the Davidic dominion with the house of Zerubbabel (ii. 23). God did "give peace in that place" (ii. 9), for Jesus walked and taught in its...
HAGIOGRAPHA.

HALLS. Haggai prophesied of the new dispensation, and his words (ii. 9) are not applicable to a temple of stone. He was not a legalist; and the two legal questions (ii. 11-14) are put to bring out that the temple of stone does not exert any saving influence, and that it was the people that were sluggish in their work who corrupted every thing they touched. The period of Ezra and Nehemiah did not produce law, but did inaugurate the discussion of it, which ultimately issued in the Talmud. The Old-Testament preparation for Christianity was negative, as well as positive. The legalism of the post-exile period was gradually transformed into Pharisiasm, which brought death to Him whose advent the three post-exile prophets announced.

[For complete list of literature see MINOR PROPHETS.]

HAHN, Johann Michael, was b. at Altdorf, in Prussian Saxony, March 27, 1792; d. at Breslau, May 13, 1868; studied theology and Oriental languages at Leipzig and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Königsberg 1819, at Leipzig 1826, at Breslau 1833, and superintendent-general of Silesia 1843. He was one of the last representatives of the old supranaturalism, and an ardent adversary of the reigning rationalism; but his works (Lehrbuch d. christl. Glaubens, 1827, etc.) are distinguished more by their warmth than by their acuteness. He also wrote on the Gnostics, De gnost. Marcionis (1820), Anthees Marcionis (1825), De canone Marcionis (1826), etc.

HAHN, August, was b. at Grossosterhausen, in Prussian Saxony, March 27, 1792; d. at Breslau, May 13, 1868; studied theology and Oriental languages at Leipzig and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Königsberg 1819, at Leipzig 1826, at Breslau 1833, and superintendent-general of Silesia 1843. He was one of the last representatives of the old supranaturalism, and an ardent adversary of the reigning rationalism; but his works (Lehrbuch d. christl. Glaubens, 1827, etc.) are distinguished more by their warmth than by their acuteness. He also wrote on the Gnostics, De gnost. Marcionis (1820), Anthees Marcionis (1825), De canone Marcionis (1826), etc.

HALAÉH Al-l (norm) is the traditional oral law, embodied in sententious form, contained in the Midrash; which see.

HALACHE (norm) is the traditional oral law, embodied in sententious form, contained in the Midrash; which see.

HAILDANE, James Alexander, and Robert, brothers, eminent for Christian zeal. They studied at the High School and University of Edinburgh. — I. James was b. at Dunure, July 14, 1778; d. Feb. 8, 1851. In 1795 he entered the navy, but, becoming serious on the subject of religion, returned to Edinburgh. In 1797 and 1798 he travelled through Scotland and the Orkney Islands, preaching to large audiences, and with good results, and in 1799 was ordained pastor of a newly organized independent church in Edinburgh. In 1801 Robert built for the congregation a fine edifice, afterwards known as the Tabernacle. Here James labored for nearly fifty years with excellent success. In 1808 he made public avowal of his conversion to Baptist views. — II. Robert was b. in London, Feb. 28, 1764; d. in Edinburgh, Dec. 12, 1842. He was in the navy from 1780 to 1783. Having inherited a large property, he settled in 1783 on his estate at Airthrey. From the year 1795, when he became deeply interested on the subject of religion, he was one of the most influential Christian philanthropists and writers of Scotland. Within fifteen years he distributed three hundred and fifty thousand dollars for charitable purposes, and during his life educated three hundred ministers at an expense of a hundred thousand dollars. The years 1816 and 1817 he spent in Geneva and Montauban. At Geneva he opened his parlors in the evening to the theological students of the University, and expounded the Epistle to the Romans. These meetings attracted large audiences of students; and such men as Merle d'Aubigné, Malan, Guissens, were led by them to adopt evangelical views. Mr. Haldane pursued the same course at Montauban. His lectures were embodied in his Com sur l'Épître aux Romains, which appeared in 1819. After his return to Scotland, Mr. Haldane con-

HALE, Matthew, Sir, Lord Chief Justice of England; b. at Alderley, Nov. 1, 1609; d. there Dec. 25, 1676. Graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, he was intending to enter the ministry, when suddenly turned his attention to the study of law. He signed the Solemn League and Covenant, and was a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines (1643). He sat in Parliament several times; was appointed judge by Cromwell, and was knighted immediately after the Restoration (in 1660). He was a man of prodigious industry in the study of law, and an orator of the highest order. His most precisely just, insomuch that I believe he would have lost all he had in the world rather than do an unjust act.” His name has a place here on account of its bearer’s belief in witchcraft. In 1665, at Bury St. Edmund’s, he condemned two prisoners to death on this charge. He was on intimate terms with Baxter, Stillingfleet, and other celebrated divines. His principal religious works are, Contemplations, Moral and Divine; Of the Nature of True Religion, 1684; Brief Abstract of the Christian Religion, 1698. An edition of his Moral and Religious Works, edited by Thirlwall, appeared in London, 1805, 2 vols. (containing Bishop Burnet’s Life). His Life was first written by Bishop Burnet, and since by J. B. Williams (Lond., 1835) and Lord Campbell, in his Lives of the Chief Justices.

HALES, John, “the ever-memorable;” b. at Bath, April 1584; d. at Eton, May 19, 1656. He was Greek professor at Oxford (1612), and canon of Windsor (1639). His works were posthumously published, and are condemned. London, 1659, best ed., 1673, modern ed., 1765, 3 vols. They consist of sermons and miscellanies; but appended to the volume are his Letters from the Synod of Dort, 1618 (which he attended, and as the result of which he became an Arminian), together with the Acts of the Synod; so that the Appendix is of great historical value.

HALES, William, D.D., chronologist; d. as rector of Killeshandra, Ireland, Jan. 30, 1731. His New Analysis of Chronology appeared London, 1606-14, 4 vols., 2d ed., 1630, of which 2 and 3 were occupied with Scripture chronology, in which department he is still an authority.

HALF-COMMUNION, when only the bread is given, as in the Roman-Catholic Church.

HALF-WAY COVENANT, an expedient adopted in New-England Congregational churches, between 1657 and 1892, of allowing baptized persons of moral life and orthodox belief to belong to the church so far as to receive baptism for their children, and all the privileges but that of the Lord’s Supper for themselves. See CONGREGATIONALISM, p. 538.

HALL, Gordon, a Congregationalist, the first American missionary to Bombay; b. at West Granville (now Tolland), Mass., April 8, 1784; d. of cholera, Bombay, March 20, 1826. He was graduated from Williams College 1808, studied theology, was ordained as a missionary to India, and arrived at Bombay 1813. For thirteen years he prosecuted his labor with diligence and success. He had just finished the revision of the Mahratta version of the New Testament when he died. Besides a few pamphlets, he wrote, in connection with Samuel Newell, The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions, Andover, 1818. See his Memoir by H. Bardwell, And., 1854.

HALL, John Vine, b. at Diss, Norfolk, Eng., March 14, 1774; d. at Maidstone, Sept. 92 1860. He was a prominent advocate of total abstinence, and the author of The Sinner’s Friend (1821). He lived to see 290 editions of the tract printed in 23 languages, and comprising 1,298,000 copies. He distributed 60,000 copies. See his Autobiography edited by his son, Rev. Newman Hall of London (New York, 1863).

HALL, Joseph, a learned divine, and eloquent preacher of the Church of England; b. in Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, July 1, 1674; d. at Higham, near Norwich, Sept. 8, 1656. His mother was a pious woman, and dedicated him early to the ministry. Graduating at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, he was for two successive years lecturer on rhetoric, and became rector of Halsted, Suffolk, in 1601, from which he passed in 1612 to Waltham Holy Cross. In 1616 he accompanied the Earl of Carlisle on his mission to France, and in 1617 James I. to Scotland. Upon this monarch he lavished, like many of his contemporaries, the grossest adulation. In the sermon on the anniversary of the king’s inauguration (March 24, 1613, and printed under the title A Holy Panegyric) he exhausted the English language for laudatory epithets. In 1617 he was made Dean of Worcester, and in 1618 was sent by James, as one of his commissioners, to the synod of Dort. The Latin sermon is still preserved which he preached before that body (Nov. 29, 1618). He was a moderate Calvinist, and sought for a mean between Calvinism and Arminianism. In 1622 he published a tract (1622) on the subject Via medii, the way of peace. In 1627 Dr. Hall was promoted to the see of Exeter, having previously (1624) declined that of Gloucester, and in 1641 was transferred to Norwich. Under Laud he was accused of puritanical leanings, and this was so stung by these accusations that he threatened “to cast up his rochet.” He abundantly proved his full attachment to the Church of England in his Episcopacy by Divine Right Asserted (1840). In this work he advocates episcopacy as a form of government recommended by the apostles. Under the Long Parliament he seems to have suffered severely, and was one of the eleven bishops to be imprisoned in the Tower. He was released after a confinement of six months in 1642, but the following year suffered the sequestration of the revenues of his see; an allowance, however, being granted him by Parliament. He has given an account of his trials during this period in his Hard Measure (1647). The latter years of his life he spent in retirement at Higham.

Bishop Hall was a man of broad and tolerant sympathies, much piety, and in the pulpit has Throughout the greater part of his life Hall was a martyr to the severest physical suffering; and the spirit which he manifested under it, together with the work which he forced himself to do in spite of it, entitled him to be ranked among the heroes of his age. In theological opinion he was at first unsettled; but ultimately he became, he says, 'the type of Andrew Fuller, and was one of the ablest assailants of Socinianism. On the subject of communion he was opposed to Fuller, and his treatise on it is among the ablest of his works. He was an earnest supporter of the missionary enterprise; and through the pages of the Eclectic Review, as well as by his published sermons on Modern Infidelity, Popular Ignorance, and Christianity Consistent with a Love of Freedom, he did much to liberalize the opinions of his generation. He was eminent as a conversationalist; and some able men have left accounts of the interviews with him, which remind one of the talk of Johnson as reported by Boswell. But though he had all the quickness, and some of the roughness, of the gruff lexicographer, he had little of his self-sufficiency, and had now and then a pathos that was all his own. His special pre-eminence, however, was in the pulpit. He spoke without notes, but not without preparation; for he admitted that most of his great sermons were first worked out in thought, and then elaborated in the very words in which they were delivered. He could repeat them verbatim after the lapse of years; and though it was affirmed by many that his perorations were impromptu, he declared that they were the most carefully studied parts of his discourses.

In his printed sermons his style is characterized by energy clothed in elegance, and moving on in a certain rhythmic stateliness; in his spoken discourse there was a severer simplicity; but in both there was perfect clearness. His manner was that of one who was entirely absorbed in his subject, and was quite unconscious of his mode of utterance. At first his voice was low as to be scarcely audible, and there seemed to be a little nervousness; but, as he proceeded, that was overborne, and he poured forth with wonderful fluency, and unsurpassed command of language, a continuous stream of eloquence. Now it was description, now it was argument, now it was appeal; but it was always the expression of the preacher's heart, which remind us a little of the talk of John Newton, as reported by Boswell. But though he had all the quickness, and some of the roughness, of the gruff lexicographer, he had little of his self-sufficiency, and had now and then a pathos that was all his own. His special pre-eminence, however, was in the pulpit. He spoke without notes, but not without preparation; for he admitted that most of his great sermons were first worked out in thought, and then elaborated in the very words in which they were delivered. He could repeat them verbatim after the lapse of years; and though it was affirmed by many that his perorations were impromptu, he declared that they were the most carefully studied parts of his discourses.

In his printed sermons his style is characterized by energy clothed in elegance, and moving on in a certain rhythmic stateliness; in his spoken discourse there was a severer simplicity; but in both there was perfect clearness. His manner was that of one who was entirely absorbed in his subject, and was quite unconscious of his mode of utterance. At first his voice was low as to be scarcely audible, and there seemed to be a little nervousness; but, as he proceeded, that was overborne, and he poured forth with wonderful fluency, and unsurpassed command of language, a continuous stream of eloquence. Now it was description, now it was argument, now it was appeal; but it was always the expression of the preacher's heart, which remind us a little of the talk of John Newton, as reported by Boswell. But though he had all the quickness, and some of the roughness, of the gruff lexicographer, he had little of his self-sufficiency, and had now and then a pathos that was all his own. His special pre-eminence, however, was in the pulpit. He spoke without notes, but not without preparation; for he admitted that most of his great sermons were first worked out in thought, and then elaborated in the very words in which they were delivered. He could repeat them verbatim after the lapse of years; and though it was affirmed by many that his perorations were impromptu, he declared that they were the most carefully studied parts of his discourses.

In his printed sermons his style is characterized by energy clothed in elegance, and moving on in a certain rhythmic stateliness; in his spoken discourse there was a severer simplicity; but in both there was perfect clearness. His manner was that of one who was entirely absorbed in his subject, and was quite unconscious of his mode of utterance. At first his voice was low as to be scarcely audible, and there seemed to be a little nervousness; but, as he proceeded, that was overborne, and he poured forth with wonderful fluency, and unsurpassed command of language, a continuous stream of eloquence. Now it was description, now it was argument, now it was appeal; but it was always the expression of the preacher's heart, which remind us a little of the talk of John Newton, as reported by Boswell. But though he had all the quickness, and some of the roughness, of the gruff lexicographer, he had little of his self-sufficiency, and had now and then a pathos that was all his own. His special pre-eminence, however, was in the pulpit. He spoke without notes, but not without preparation; for he admitted that most of his great sermons were first worked out in thought, and then elaborated in the very words in which they were delivered. He could repeat them verbatim after the lapse of years; and though it was affirmed by many that his perorations were impromptu, he declared that they were the most carefully studied parts of his discourses.

In his printed sermons his style is characterized by energy clothed in elegance, and moving on in a certain rhythmic stateliness; in his spoken discourse there was a severer simplicity; but in both there was perfect clearness. His manner was that of one who was entirely absorbed in his subject, and was quite unconscious of his mode of utterance. At first his voice was low as to be scarcely audible, and there seemed to be a little nervousness; but, as he proceeded, that was overborne, and he poured forth with wonderful fluency, and unsurpassed command of language, a continuous stream of eloquence. Now it was description, now it was argument, now it was appeal; but it was always the expression of the preacher's heart, which remind us a little of the talk of John Newton, as reported by Boswell. But though he had all the quickness, and some of the roughness, of the gruff lexicographer, he had little of his self-sufficiency, and had now and then a pathos that was all his own. His special pre-eminence, however, was in the pulpit. He spoke without notes, but not without preparation; for he admitted that most of his great sermons were first worked out in thought, and then elaborated in the very words in which they were delivered. He could repeat them verbatim after the lapse of years; and though it was affirmed by many that his perorations were impromptu, he declared that they were the most carefully studied parts of his discourses.
HALLEL. HALSEY.

HALLEY, Robert, a distinguished preacher and scholar among the Congregationalists of England; on his father's side of Scotch descent; b. at Blackheath, near London, Aug. 13, 1706; d. at Arundel, Surrey, Aug. 18, 1786. He received an excellent classical education at Bere Regis, afterwards at Greenwich, and obtained his theological instruction at Hamerton College, London. He was probably the last nonconformist minister who found it necessary, when preaching as a student, to receive a license from a magistrate under the provisions of the Toleration Act. He was ordained pastor of the church at "The Old Meeting," St. Neots, Huntingdonshire, June 11, 1822. Here he also taught a school. In 1826 he became classical tutor at Highbury College, London. While here he took active part in the antislavery movement and in the Unitarian controversy. His letter to Mr. Yates, entitled The Improved Version Truly Designated a Creed (London, 1834), led to his receiving the degree of D.D. from Princeton. In 1839 he was invited to succeed Dr. McAll as pastor of the Mosley-street Chapel, Manchester, whence, nine years later, he removed to the new building, which became necessary for the growth of the church in Cavendish Street of the same city. In 1843 and 1850 he delivered his two courses of Congregational Lectures on the Sacraments,—a very able, learned, and candid work. In 1847 he published a small volume on Baptism. In 1857 he was invited to the chair of professor of theology, and the position of principal in New College, London, which he occupied for fifteen years. Here he published his History of Puritanism and Nonconformity in Lancashire,—one of the most graphic and interesting pictures of Puritan life. He retired from the college in 1872. He was one of the ablest platform-speakers of his time. Ardent, witty, exceedingly fair to opponents, he produced most wonderful effects upon general audiences. His eulogy upon Abraham Lincoln at a meeting of the Congregational Union of England and Wales was an extraordinary instance of oratorical power and polemical effect.

HALLOCK, William Allen, b. in Plainfield, Mass., June 2, 1794; d. in New-York City, Saturday, Oct. 2, 1880. He was graduated at Williams College 1819, and at Andover Theological Seminary 1822; entered the service of the New-England Tract Society at Boston, and in 1825 took a prominent part in organizing the American Tract Society, of which he was the first secretary, and for forty-five years served the society in this capacity with rare fidelity and ability. Under his fostering care its publications year by year increased in number and usefulness. He edited the American Messenger for many years, and wrote Lives of Rev. Dr. Justin Edwards and Harlan Page, besides several excellent tracts. It has been calculated, that, of his own publications, nearly a million and a half copies have been circulated. See his Memorial, by Mrs. H. C. Knight, New York, 1882.

HALSEY, Luther, D.D., LL.D., b. at Schenectady, N.Y., Jan. 1, 1794; d. at New York, Friday, Oct. 29, 1880. He was professor of theology in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Penn., 1829-37, and in the latter year went to the chair of ecclesiastical history and HAM. See Noah.

HAMAN THE ACCUSER. See Esther.

HAMANN, Johann Georg, b. in Königsberg, Aug. 27, 1730; d. at Münster, June 20, 1781; received a somewhat desultory education; studied ancient literature and languages, philology and belles-lettres, at the university of his native city 1746—51; went to Courland as tutor in a private family; became acquainted with the great mercantile house of Berens in Riga, began to study ancient literature and languages, philology and belles-lettres, at the university of his native city 1746—51; went to Courland as tutor in a private family; became acquainted with the great mercantile house of Berens in Riga, began to study the house and or some mercantile purpose, a journey to England. In London he fell in with bad company, and was cheated of his money. In his destitution he took to the Bible; and a conversion followed, deep and complete. After a short visit to Riga, he settled in Königsberg 1759; held first a small office in the administration, afterwards a better one in the custom-house, and devoted himself to literature. His books (Biblische Betrachtungen, Gedanken u. meinen Lebenslauf, Golgotha, und Scheblimini, etc.) are mostly small pamphlets; but they made a deep impression, and procured for him the name of the "Magus of the North." They are queer, dense obscurity and lightnin -like clearness, full of allusions and powerful thoughts of universal import, alternating with each other; but they are full of stirring suggestiveness. His last years he spent in the circles of Jacobi and the Princess Galitzin. A collected edition of his works, in eight volumes, by F. Roth, appeared in Berlin, 1821—43. Selections from his works were made by A. W. Müller, Münster, 1826. See GILDEMEISTER: Hamanns Leben u. Schriften, 1857—88; 5 vols.; J. Dieselhof: Wegweiser zu J. G. H., Kaiserswerth, 1871; petri: Hamanns Schriften und Briefe, Hanover, 1872—74, 4 vols.; Hugo delwel: Lichterstahl aus Hamanns Schriften, 1873; [G. Föhl: Johann Georg Hamann, Hamburg, 1874—76, 2 parts.] J. P. Lange.

HAMMATH (7527), "fortress," "Epòd, now Hamah" has from the oldest times, and down to our days, been one of the most important cities of Syria. Situated among the northern spurs of the Lebanon (Josh. xiii. 5; Judg. iii. 8), in the narrow but well-watered and exceedingly fertile valley of the Orontes, and having easy connections to the south with Damascus (Zech. ix. 2; Jer. xlix. 22), and the east with Damascus (1 Chron. xvii. 3, 4; 2 Chron. xi. 24), there were thirty-five laymen, sixteen ecclesiastics, and two senators, and elected by the congregations. The ecclesiastical council, consisting of nine members, four laymen, three ecclesiastics, and two senators, and chosen by the synod, has the executive power, and carries on the whole administration.

HAMEL. See Bajus.

HAMELMANN, Hermann, b. at Osnabrück, 1526; d. in Oldenburg, June 20, 1585; was educated in the Roman-Catholic religion, and curate of Camen, but embraced the Reformation 1552, and labored with great success for its progress as superintendent-general in Brunswick 1568—72, and Oldenburg 1575—85. Of his works (forty-five in number) his Opera genealogico-historica de Westphalia et Saxonia inferiori (edited by Wasserbach, Lemgo, 1711) are of great interest. His Life was written by RAUSCHENBUSCH, Schwelm, 1830, and Clemens: D. Einführung d. Ref. zu Lemgo, Lemgo, 1847.

HAMLET, James, D.D., eminent Presbyterian divine; b. at Lonend, Paisley, Scotland, Nov. 27, 1814; came to London, 1841, as pastor of the National Scotch Church, Regent's Square; d. there Nov. 24, 1867. He was an acknowledged master of pulpit oratory, and author of some of the most widely circulated books of his day. Of his Life in Earnest (1844), sixty-four thousand had been sold before 1852, and, of his Twenty thousand had been sold before 1852, and, of his Life in Earnest (1844), sixty-four thousand had been sold before 1852, and, of his...
Hamilton, Patrick, the proto-martyr of the Scottish Reformation; b. about 1503-04, at Stanehouse, Lanark, or Kincavel, Linlithgow; burned at St. Andrew's on Feb. 29, 1528. His father was a natural son of the first Lord Hamilton, nominated for his bravery, and rewarded with the above lands and barony, by his sovereign, James IV. His mother was a daughter of Alexander, Duke of Albany, second son of James II.; so that he was closely connected with some of the highest families in the land. His cousins, John and James Hamilton, before the Reformation, rose to episcopal rank in the old church; and several others of his relatives attained high promotion. Destined himself for such promotion, Patrick was carefully educated, and, according to the corrupt custom of the times, was in his fourteenth year appointed to the abbacy of Ferno in Ross-shire, to enable him to maintain himself in comfort while studying foreign languages and philosophy, but also in the art of music, and, gathering round him, as he did afterwards at St. Andrew's, an ardent band of youthful admirers, who in the end were to advance beyond their preceptor, and to lend the influence of their learning and character to the side of the Reformers. Before the close of 1520 Patrick Hamilton took the degree of M.A. at Paris,
and soon after left that university for Louvain,
to avail himself of the facilities for linguistic study provided there, or to enjoy personal intercourse with Erasmus, the patron of the new learning. At this date he was probably more of an Erasmian than a Lutheran, though of that more earnest school who were ultimately to outgrow their teacher, and find their home in a new church.
We know he made great progress in the languages and philosophy, and was specially drawn towards the system of Plato. With the sophists of Louvain and Paris, who were more with the orthoday, as well as at Paris, whose hearts God had touched, to whom he could not fail to be drawn.
He may even have met with the young Augustinian monks of Antwerp, whom, so soon after his departure, these sophists denounced, and forced to seal their testimony with their blood. In the course of 1522 he returned to Scotland, going first, we can hardly doubt, to visit his widowed mother and his relations, whom he loved so well,
but proceeding soon to prosecute his studies at Paris. But his sympathies were more with the old scholastic; and possibly it was that he might take a place among the teachers of their college of St. Leonards that on Oct. 3, 1524, he was received as a member of the Faculty of Arts. He was a proficient, not only in the languages and philosophy, but also in the art of sacred music, which the canons and the alumni of their college were bound to cultivate. He composed "what the musicians call a mass, arranged in parts for nine voices," and acted himself as preceptor of the choir when it was sung. He is said also to have taken on him the priesthood, that he "might be admitted to preach the word of God;" but Mr. David Laing questions if he was in holy orders at all, as no mention is made of his degradation before his martyrdom. In 1526, while James Beatoun, the primate, disguised as a shepherd, was tending a flock on the hills of Fife, the New Testament of Tyndale's translation was brought over from the Low Countries by the Scottish traders. A large proportion of the copies are said to have been taken to St. Andrew's, and circulated there. Hamilton seized the opportunity to commend the holy book and its long-forgotten truths to those over whom he had influence. His doings could not long escape the notice of the returned archbishop. He was not naturally cruel, or likely, after his recent misfortunes, to desire to embroil himself in a quarrel with the powerful Hamiltons. But he had those about him, particularly his nephew the future knighted for his bravery, and rewarded with the families in the land. His cousins, John and James Hamilton, before the Reformation, rose to episcopal rank in the old church; and several others of his relatives attained high promotion. Destined himself for such promotion, Patrick was carefully
educated, and, according to the corrupt custom
of the times, was in his fourteenth year appointed to the abbacy of Ferno in Ross-shire, to enable him to maintain himself in comfort while studying foreign languages and philosophy, but also in the art of music, and, gathering round him, as he did afterwards at St. Andrew's, an ardent band of youthful admirers, who in the end were to advance
beyond their preceptor, and to lend the influence of their learning and character to the side of the Reformers. Before the close of 1520 Patrick Hamilton took the degree of M.A. at Paris,
and soon after left that university for Louvain,
to avail himself of the facilities for linguistic study provided there, or to enjoy personal intercourse with Erasmus, the patron of the new learning. At this date he was probably more of an Erasmian than a Lutheran, though of that more earnest school who were ultimately to outgrow their teacher, and find their home in a new church.
We know he made great progress in the languages
and philosophy, and was specially drawn towards the system of Plato. With the sophists of Louvain and Paris, who were more with the orthoday, as well as at Paris, whose hearts God had touched, to whom he could not fail to be drawn.
He may even have met with the young Augustinian monks of Antwerp, whom, so soon after his departure, these sophists denounced, and forced to seal their testimony with their blood. In the course of 1522 he returned to Scotland, going first, we can hardly doubt, to visit his widowed mother and his relations, whom he loved so well,
but proceeding soon to prosecute his studies at St. Andrew's. He matriculated there on June 9, 1523, the same day that his old preceptor Major was incorporated into the university and ad-nounced by the archbishop to a conference with the chiefs of the church "on such points as might seem to stand in need of reform." At first all displayed a conciliatory spirit, and ap-ppeared to recognize the evils existing in the church; some even went more points, to share his sentiments, and for nearly a month all possible freedom in making known his views was allowed to him. At length the mask was thrown aside. On Feb. 28 he was seized, and on the 29th brought out for trial in the cathedral. Among the articles with which he was charged and the truth of which he maintained, the more important were, "that a man is not justified by works, but by faith; that faith, hope, and charity are so linked together, that he who hath one of them hath all, and he that lacketh one lacketh all; and that good works make not a good man, but a good man doeth good works." On being challenged by his accuser, he also affirmed it was not lawful to worship images, nor to pray to the saints; and that it was "lawful to all men that have souls to read the word of God; and that they are able to understand the same, and in particular the latter will and testament of Jesus Christ." These truths, which have been the source of life and strength to many, were then to him the cause of condemnation and death; and the same day the sentence was passed, it was remorselessly executed. But, through all his excruciating sufferings, the martyr held fast his confidence in God and in his Saviour; and the faith of many in the truth she taught was only increased by the death of Thomas Brown. He was supported in his candidature by Dugald Stewart, the senior professor in Edinburgh University, and his candidature was announced antagonism to phrenology. For summary of results, see Lects. on Metaphysics, vol. I., Appendix, pp. 404-444. In 1829 appeared his celebrated article on The Philosophy of the Unconditioned (Edinburgh Review, No. 96, Hamilton's Discussions, p. 1). This was the first of a series of important articles which extended over a period of sixteen years. In 1836 he was elected to the chair of logic and metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh, which chair he held till his death, in 1856.

Hamilton was the learned and vigorous expounder of the Scotch philosophy of common sense, or knowledge of first principles common to all men, and incapable of being either proved or doubted. He was conspicuous as the defender and expounder of Thomas Reid, and was the first of the Scotch school who felt the influence of Kant, whose theory of knowledge he critically handled. Hamilton's contributions to philosophy may best be grouped under these heads: 1, His analysis of consciousness and his treatment of external perception in psychology; 2, His philosophy of the unconditioned in metaphysics; and, 3, His analytic of logical forms in pure logic. We must restrict here to a brief account of the two first named.

His treatment of consciousness (Lects. on Metaphysics, XI.-XVI., especially the first and two last) involves a contribution to philosophy of great value. It includes analysis of the act of consciousness, the relation of consciousness to the special faculties, the phenomena of external perception, and the ultimate facts of consciousness essential to its exercise. Excepting the debatable question of external perception, the whole discussion is of the first importance, involving much that is now universally accepted in mental philosophy. Under the last division great service is done for an intuitional theory, while he prepares much critical work for sensationalists. Consciousness, he says, is the "essential element" or "necessary condition" of all experience,—"knowledge that I exist in some determinate state," "the recognition by the thinking subject of its own acts or affections." It is an immediate knowledge, involving discrimination, that is, judgment and memory, as its conditions. This detailed treatment of consciousness was a very decided advance on the work of Reid and Stewart, vindicating the fundamental position of Descartes, giving greater breadth and clearness of exposition to the Scotch philosophy, gaining the assent of the leaders of the experiential school,—such as J. S. Mill (Exam. of Hamilton's Philos., chap. VIII.).
and attributes of the Infinite Being? Here Hamilton is entangled in the perplexity of affirming that to be certain which is yet unknowable. That there is an Absolute Being, source of all finite existence, is, according to him, a certainty; but that we can have any knowledge of the fact is by him denied. Reid had maintained the existence of the Supreme Being as a necessary truth (Intell. Powers, Essay IV. chap. 3); and Hamilton affirms that the divine existence is at least a natural inference (Metaph., Lect. 3); but he nevertheless holds that the Deity cannot be known. This is with him an application of the law of the conditioned,—a conclusion inevitable under admission that all knowledge implies the relative, the antithesis of subject and object. This doctrine of ignorance was developed by Mansel (Limita of Religious Thought), and eagerly embraced by the experientialists, J. S. Mill (Ezam of Hamilton's Philos., chap. IV.) and Herbert Spencer (First Principles, Pt. 1.; The Unknowable, chap. IV.; The Relativity of All Knowledge). This gave an impulse to agnosticism, the influence of which must be largely credited to Kant, who introduced the a priori to a form of mental procedure, and to Hamilton, who rejected Kant's view, yet regarded the absolute as inconceivable. See Agnosticism. For an understanding of Hamilton's position the following references may suffice: Mind rises to its highest dignity when viewed as the object through which, and through which alone, our unassisted reason can ascend to the knowledge of God" (Metaph., Lect. II.). "The notion of a God is not contained in the notion of a mere First Cause," nor is the notion completed by adding "the attribute of omnipotence." Not until the two great attributes of intelligence and virtue are brought in "have we the belief in a veritable Divinity;" to which statement it is added, by way of exposition, "that virtue involves liberty" (lb.). "The assertion of theism is "the assertion that the universe is created by intelligence, and governed not only by physical, but by moral laws" (lb.). From these passages it is obvious, that, when Hamilton is discussing the rational explanation of the universe, he speaks unreservedly of "the knowledge of God," "mediately through his works," interchanging "knowledge" and "belief" in his statements. But when he treats of the limits of knowledge, the law of the conditioned, the inconceivability of the unconditioned, he denies the possibility of knowledge, and makes faith the only possible exercise. "The infinite God cannot by us, in the present limitation of our faculties, be comprehended or conceived" (Metaph., Lect. 38). He adds, however, "We know God according to the finitude of our faculties;" but "faith—belief—is the organ by which we apprehend what is beyond our knowledge." In judging of this, two things are to be noticed: that he reasons from conception to knowledge, not vice versa, "the mind conceives, and consequently can know only the limited" (Discussions, Essay 1.),—and that he makes faith a cognitive power.

Lit. — Hamilton's Works: Discussions (1852), Reid's Works, with Notes and Dissertations (1846), completed, 1853), Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic (1858). See also Memoir of Hamilton, by Professor Veitch; Mansel's Limits of Reli-
HAMMOND. 938

HANDICRAFTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

That the first craftsman mentioned in Scripture, Tubal-Cain (Gen. iv. 22), was a worker in metals, indicates that metal-working was one of the earliest crafts among the Hebrews; and the circumstance becomes so much the more significant, as the general Hebrew expression for an artisan ( כָּפָל) primitively denotes a worker in metals, or, at least, a worker in some hard material. All such kinds of labor as required less strength and skill, and administered only to the necessities of every-day life (baking, weaving, tailoring, house-building, etc.), were in the oldest time performed by the householder, the women, and the slaves, and continued to be performed in that way even after each kind had developed into a specific trade (1 Sam. ii. 19; 2 Sam. xii. 8; Prov. xxxi. 22; Acts ix. 39). Corporations organized in the form of castes, or monopolies belonging exclusively to certain families, did not exist among the Hebrews; and when we hear of a certain place where artisans of the tribe of Judah were working, or of certain occupations, such as building in Jerusalem a bakers' street (Jer. xxxvii. 21), a square near the gate leading into the valley of Ben-Hinnom, where the potters had their shops (Jer. xix. 2), a quarter occupied mainly by the noisy iron-industry and metal-works (Joseph, Bell. Jud., v. 8, 1, etc.), when the development of the mechanical arts seemed to come to a standstill; and during the confusion of the period of the Judges, and under the heavy pressure of enemies, who often carried away as prisoners of war the artisans, especially the metal-workers, in order to weaken the conquered people HANDS.

reading-lessons or paragraphs taken from the prophets for use in the synagogues on the Sabbath and feast-days, in connection with sections from the law. Cf. Acts iii. 15; and PERECOPES.

HA'RAN (the Greek and Latin Καρχαρ, CARRA), a city and territory in Northern Mesopotamia, on the road from Ur of the Chaldees to Canaan. It was probably the fertility of the region which caused Terah and Nahor to stop there while Abraham and Lot pushed forwards to Canaan. To the Assyrians the place was of great importance as a military station when campaigns were made in Cilicia. Ezekiel (xxvii. 23) speaks of it as carrying on a considerable trade with Tyre. In Roman history it is famous as the scene of the defeat of Crassus and the assassination of Caracalla. It flourished also under the Arabs, but Abufl Fedda mentions it as lying in ruins. — Haran (Greek, Ἁρὰρον) is the name of the youngest son of Terah (Gen. xi. 26).

HARBAUGH, Henry, D.D., a genial and scholarly divine of the German Reformed Church, of Swiss descent; b. near Waynesborough, Penn., Oct. 28, 1817; d. in Mercersburg, Penn., Dec. 28, 1867. He worked on his father's farm till his nineteenth year, and then engaged in other employments until 1840, when he entered Franklin and Marshall College, Mercersburg, and, after spending three years there, was successively pastor of the Reformed Church, Lewistown, Penn. (1843), Lancaster (1850), and Lebanon (1860). In 1863 he became the successor of Dr. Wolf in the chair of theology at Mercersburg. Dr. Harbaugh was a prominent representative of the Mercersburg school of theology. He possessed poetical gifts; wrote poems in the so-called "Pennsylvania German," which appeared in the Guardian, and after his death in a volume under the title Harbaugh's Harfe (Philadelphia, 1870), which enjoyed a wide popularity. He also wrote some hymns, one of which, Jesus, I live to thee, has passed into hymnological collections. Of his larger works the more important are, Heaven, or the Sainted Dead, 1848-53, 3 vols. (Heavenly Home, Heavenly Recognition, Future Life); Life of Michael Schlatter (German), 1857; and Fathers of the Reformed Church in Europe and America, Lancaster, 1857, 2 vols. He was for seventeen years editor of the Guardian, and the last year of his life of the Mercersburg Review.

HARDING, Stephen, English Cistercian monk; b. in Sherrborne, Devonshire; abbot at Citeaux 1109; received Bernard there 1113; d. there March 28, 1134. See his life by Mr. Dalgarins, in the Lives of the English Saints; also CISTERCIANS.

HARDWICK, Charles, b. at Slingsby, Yorkshire, Sept. 22, 1821; d. Aug. 18, 1859, while ascending the Pyrenees, near Bagnères de Luchon. He was successively fellow of St. Catherine's Hall, Cambridge, professor of theology in Queen's College, Birmingham (1858), diocesan treasurer at Cambridge (1855), and archdeacon of Ely (1859). He is the author of several valuable works displaying thorough scholarship. These are, A History of the Articles of Religion, Camb., 1851, revised edition, 1859; A History of the Christian Church (I. Middle Age; II. Reformer's Col.), 1855-59, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1861-65, 3d ed., revised by W. Stubbs, Lond., 1872, 1873; and particularly...

HARDOUN, Jean, b. at Quimper, in Brittany, 1646; d. in Paris, Sept. 3, 1729; entered early the order of the Jesuits, and devoted himself to literature. His editions of Themistius (Greek and Latin, Paris, 1864) and of Pliny (1885, in uen Delphini, 1723, complete in 3 vols. folio) are still considered the best ever made of those authors. His Conciliorum Collecta (Paris, 1715, 12 vols.) also enjoys a great reputation. But his own writings are full of whims and fancies. He held that the Æneid, the odes of Horace, etc., were written by some monks in the thirteenth century, that Christ and the apostles spoke Latin etc., and such paradoxes he defended with exorbitant arrogance and coarseness.

HARDY, Robert Spence, English Wesleyan missionary and Buddhist scholar; b. at Preston, Lancashire, July 1, 1803; d. at Headingly, Yorkshire, April 16, 1885. For twenty-three years he was a faithful missionary in Ceylon; and subsequently a preacher at home, but found time to become profoundly read in Pali, and to attain a very wide culture. His books are authoritative. He wrote The British Government and the Idolatry of Ceylon, 1841; Eastern Monachism, an Account of the Origin, Laws, Discipline, Sacred Writings, etc., of the Order of Mendicants, founded by Gotama Buddha, 1850; A Manual of Buddhism in its Modern Development, translated from Singhalese MSS., 1855, 2d ed., 1880; The Legends and Theories of the Buddhists compared with History and Science, 1857, 2d ed., 1881.

HARE, Augustus William, a devoted and model rural clergyman of the Church of England; b. in Rome, Nov. 17, 1792; d. there Feb. 19, 1834. After a distinguished career at New College, Oxford, of which he was a fellow, he became rector of Alton-Barnes, a country parish, where his plain and fervent preaching and consecrated life not only won the hearts of the people, but came to be regarded as a model for a rural pastor's imitation. In company with his brother Julius he edited Guesses at Truth, and published Sermons to a Country Congregation, 6th ed., Lond., 1845, 2 vols. See Memorials of a Quiet Life, by A. C. Hare.

HARE, Julius Charles, one of the most influential of modern English theologians; b. Sept. 13, 1795, at Herstmonceux, Sussex, in the pale of the Episcopal Church; d. there Jan. 23, 1855. He was educated at the Charter House school, with Grote and Thirlwall, the distinguished historians of Greece. A considerable portion of his youth was spent on the Continent. In 1811 he visited the Wartburg, Luther's Patmos, and there, as he playfully remarked, he saw the mark of Luther's ink upon the wall, and there took his first lesson in the art of throwing inkstands at the devil's head." In 1812 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and distinguished himself by thorough classical and general culture. In 1818 he was made fellow and tutor of Trinity, and gathered around him a number of admiring students, among them John Sterling, Archbishop Trench, and Frederick Maurice (subsequently his brother-in-law).

Hare's first introduction to the public was as joint translator, with Bishop Thirlwall, of Niebuhr's Roman history (1828). His love for German scholarship was intensified by his intimacy with Thomas Carlyle, Robert Browning, and with Fosbrooke, also by his study of Coleridge's works, whom he profoundly esteemed as a Christian philosopher. In 1832 he went to the Continent, and spent several months in Rome. This visit forms an epoch in his life. Rome, the seat of archæology, history, and art, had a powerful attraction for him; Rome, the centre of religious life and ecclesiastical institutions, repelled him, and confirmed him in his Protestant convictions, notwithstanding his romantic enthusiasm for the middle ages. In Rome he made the personal acquaintance of Dr. Bunsen, who was then ambassador of Prussia to the Vatican, afterwards to England.

On returning to England in 1834, he was made rector of Herstmonceux, and, later, archdeacon of Lewis in the diocese of Chichester, and chaplain to the Queen. In this village, not far from the southern coast of England, he labored until his death, surrounded by a large circle of friends, and held in universal esteem for his noble character and attainments. His last words were, "Upwards, upwards!" Archdeacon Hare combined thorough scholarship, original thought, noble character, harmless wit, and manly piety. He was as familiar with Luther, Schleiermacher, Neander, Olhausen, Nitzsch, Tholuck, Lücke, etc., as with Cranmer, Hooker, Leighton, Pearson, and Tillotson. He collected one of the most valuable private libraries, of twelve thousand volumes, which completely occupied every wall in the house. He presented it to Trinity College in Cambridge. In the department of philosophy he was an independent disciple of Coleridge. In theology he had most sympathy with Dr. Arnold, but excelled him in the extent of his scholarship. He was one of the few learned men on the English high school, which seeks to liberalize the Anglican communion by keeping it in friendly intercourse with Continental thought and learning. He was a sturdy champion of Protestantism against the encroachments of Romanism and Tractarianism; but he never exposed himself to the charge of disloyalty to the Church, nor forgot the personal regard due to his opponents. He was especially pains at the transition of Archdeacon, now Cardinal, Manning, his former colleague and intimate friend, to Romanism.

As an author, Hare had some peculiarities of spelling (forst for forced, preacht for preached, etc.), and embodied the most valuable part of his works in notes, which occupy a much larger space than the text. His strength lay in his combination of theological attainments with purity of character, and in his talent for stimulating others to further study and investigation.

His ablest theological work is The Mission of the Comforter, with Notes, 3d ed., 1876 (republished in Boston). It contains five sermons preached at Cambridge from the words of our Lord (John xvi. 7—11) on the office of the Holy HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS.

HARE, Thomas, b. in Norwich, Eng., 1715; pastor of the Independent Church at Wattefield, Suffolk, 1735; d. there Nov. 27, 1798. The work of his lifetime was Observations on Various Passages of Scripture, placing them in a new light, and ascertaining the meaning of several not determinable by the methods commonly made use of by the learned, compiled from relations incidentally mentioned in books of voyages and travels into the East, Lond., 1764, 2 vols., in 1787 2 additional vols., 4th ed. by Adam Clarke, LL.D., 1808, 4 vols., with large additions and a life of the author. Mr. Harmer also wrote Outlines of a New Commentary on the Book of Solomon's Song, London, 1798.

HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS. We shall consider in this article the relation of the Gospels to each other, both in point of form and their choice of matter, and whether it is possible to construct a harmony. At the very outset the striking difference between the Gospel of John and the other three Gospels must be noticed, both in respect to the choice of matter (John alone relating the visits of Jesus to the feasts in Jerusalem, and, on the other hand, describing few of the events which happened in Galilee) and in respect to the kind of matter; the discourses of our Lord which John gives having a peculiarly elevated character as compared with those of the other three Gospels. The first three or synoptic Gospels likewise often differ. Mark gives hardly any of our Lord's discourses, and contains an exceedingly small amount of matter not found in Matthew and Luke; while these two Gospels, when compared, are found to have not much which is peculiar to each. Matthew gives sixteen miracles, Luke fifteen (eleven being common), and Mark fifteen, twelve of which are found in Matthew and ten in Luke. Then, again, the concession of the same discourses and events is different in the three synoptists; and while the descriptions of the same events often present remarkable agreements in language, even to striking and unusual words, they also present disagreements, not only in the language, but also in the matter, so as to sometimes even give the appearance of contradictory statements.

1. Choice and Arrangement of the Matter in the Synoptists.—Even if we had no patristic accounts of their origin, the study of the Gospels would convince us that their authors had not the least intention of giving a complete daily journal of the life of Christ. Of the first half of his public activity they confined the record of the Gospels, and the other three Gospels must be noticed, both in respect to the choice of matter (John alone relating the visits of Jesus to the feasts in Jerusalem, and, on the other hand, describing few of the events which happened in Galilee) and in respect to the kind of matter; the discourses of our Lord which John gives having a peculiarly elevated character as compared with those of the other three Gospels. The first three or synoptic Gospels likewise often differ. Mark gives hardly any of our Lord's discourses, and contains an exceedingly small amount of matter not found in Matthew and Luke; while these two Gospels, when compared, are found to have not much which is peculiar to each. Matthew gives sixteen miracles, Luke fifteen (eleven being common), and Mark fifteen, twelve of which are found in Matthew and ten in Luke. Then, again, the concession of the same discourses and events is different in the three synoptists; and while the descriptions of the same events often present remarkable agreements in language, even to striking and unusual words, they also present disagreements, not only in the language, but also in the matter, so as to sometimes even give the appearance of contradictory statements.

LIT.—Two funeral addresses by Rev. H. V. ELLIOT and Rev. T. N. SIMPKINSON; Dr. PLUMP'TRE'S Memoir, prefixed to the last edition of the Gesses at Truth; the essay of Professor FRED. DAWSON MAURICE, in the collected edition of Hare's Charges (1856), and Dean STANLEY's article in the London Quarterly Review for July, 1855 (both reprinted as introductory notices in the 3d ed. of The Victory of Faith, 1874); and especially the Memorials of a Quiet Life (one of the most charming and delicate English biographies) by A. J. C. HARK, a nephew of the archdeacon, London, 1872 sqq. 3 vols.

P. SCHAFF.
son with the sporadic attempts of other Christians, without its being arranged like a journal, but only giving that which was essential and important in systematic arrangement. But each synoptist had a plan of his own. Matthew wrote for Jews, and sought to prove that Jesus fulfilled the Messianic prophecies concerning the seed of Abraham (Matt. i. 1). Luke, who belonged to the Pauline circle, relates, for the most part, those events in the life of our Lord, and those discourses, which go to confirm the principle that all mankind, so far as it thirsts after salvation, shall participate in the benefits of it. For this reason he presents Christ as the second Adam (comp. Luke iii. 23—28). Mark, on the other hand, as John the Presbyter (Euseb., iii. 39) long ago said, follows no particular plan, but wrote down from memory what Peter related to him from time to time. None of the synoptists, then, follow a chronological arrangement. Luke arranges his Gospel according to the matter (x. 25—xiii., discourses; xiv.—xvi., parables; etc.); and so does Matthew (iii., iv., the beginning of his activity; v.—vii., laws of the kingdom; viii., ix., miracles; ix.—xii. the disciples; xiii., xiv., parables; etc.). Notwithstanding this general principle, however, they do often relate events in the order of their occurrence (comp. Matt. ix. 27, 32, xiii. 1, etc.; Mark i. 29, etc.; Luke iv. 38, etc.). The investigation of the extent of the agreements of the synoptists in these cases is one of the tasks of the harmonists.

Such labors were carried on from early times, at first with the purpose of forming a complete narrative of all the events and discourses of our Lord. (See Diatessaron.) In modern times they have been conducted for the purpose of constructing a chronology of Christ's life. Prominent amongst the workers in this department [see below] are Gerson (d. 1429), Calvin (d. 1564), Andreas Osiander (d. 1552), Chemnitz (d. 1588), and Bengel (d. 1751). Osiander (Harmonia Evangelorum, Basel, 1537) is the first to be mentioned. He treated the curious circumstance, that, starting from the most irrational theory of inspiration, he adopted the principle that the evangelists, in order not to write that which was false, dared not depart from the chronological arrangement. To carry the principle out, he was obliged often to suppose that the very same event, occurring under the very same circumstances, was repeated two or three times. Peter's wife's mother, for example, was healed three times! Gerson (Concordia evangelistarum sive monstessorum, Col. c. 1471) proceeds on the theory that the synoptists did not intend to follow a chronological order; and so Calvin (Harmonia evangelistarum tribus composita, Geneva, 1553), and especially Chemnitz (Harmonia evangelicae, Frankfurt, 1593 sqq.), who makes such events and discourses to follow each other which are definitely placed in chronological order by the evangelists. It is as if every attempt in the direction of a harmony must proceed upon this principle. Bengel (Richtige Auffassung der Evang., Tübingen, 1730) marks no progress; but he rightly recognized that Luke did not mean to follow a chronological order in his Chronicae Synopsis [Hamburg, 1841], started from the principle that Luke follows a chronological order; but the writer of this article, in his Kritik d. evang. Geschichte, returned to the principles of Chemnitz, and believes he has proved that the sequence of events, etc., contradicts that of another, and that their statements enable us to restore a chronological harmony of the larger part of Christ's public career. The following case, which we choose because it is the most difficult and complicated, will serve as an illustration of our method. In Matt. ix. it is related, that as Jesus on a certain day sat at meat, the Pharisees asked him why he did not fast. The exact day is not given; but it is definitely stated in ix. 18 that Jairus came to him "while he spake these things;" and in ix. 27, that, as "Jesus passed by from thence," two blind men followed him; and in ix. 32, that, "as they went forth," a dumb man was brought to him. Here the sequence of four events is given. The preceding section definitely gives the sequence of four other events (viii.—ix. 9) — the stilling of the tempest (viii. 23), the healing of the Gadarene (viii. 28), the casting out of the paralytic (ix. 1), and the call of Matthew (ix. 9). Again, we have the following sequence: the healing of the blind and dumb man (xii. 22), the charge of collusion with Beelzebub (xii. 38), the announcement of his mother and brethren (xii. 46); and on the same day that these things occurred he spake many parables (xii. 1). Mark, however, in the most emphatic way says that Jesus spake these parables at the seashore (iv. 1), on the same day stilling the tempest (iv. 35), then healed the Gadarene (v. 1), and, after his return to the western shore, met Jairus (v. 22). Thus the conclusion is forced upon us by Mark that the three groups of events which Matthew places in sections, where they properly belong in point of matter, belong together in point of time. While Jesus was staying at Capernaum, the blind and deaf man is brought, whose cure affords the occasion for the charge of collusion with Beelzebub. During the conversation the Pharisees demand a sign; and, while Jesus is replying, his mother arrives. Towards evening Jesus utters the parables on the seashore; then follows the stilling of the tempest. The following morning the Gadarene was healed. After his return, the question concerning fasting was put; and at the same hour Jairus came. As he left his house, the dumb man is brought, and (perhaps a day or two afterwards) the paralytic is healed. Mark got the events from Peter, an eye-witness of them, and had the sequence impressed upon his memory; but Matthew, who was called after their occurrences, heard them from several of the disciples; and he remembered most distinctly that the healing of Jairus' daughter was a special topic of conversation: hence he put it down immediately after the account of his call.

This example is a crucial test of the Chemnitian theory; for it attempts to find the original place of every sententious utterance of our Lord will fail. A great probability exists that Jesus repeated the same sayings at different times. Matthew has given us an unmistakable illustration of this (vii. 17, xii. 33). He even repeated a parable, in his Chrestuscriptum Synopsa [Hamburg, 1841], started from the principle that Luke follows a chronological order;
accounts of the same events often fully agree in the language, and again differ widely in this regard. (comp. Matt. ix. 15, Mark ii. 20, Luke v. 35). But the points of agreement are far more numerous than the points of disagreement. According to Norton, one-sixth of Matthew's Gospel is in verbal agreement with the other synoptists, and seven-eighths of this are from discourses; one-sixth of Mark's Gospel agrees with the other synoptists, and nearly four-fifths of this are from the discourses; Luke only agrees to the extent of one-tenth with Matthew and Mark, but more than nineteen-twentieths of it is from the discourses. Various theories have been suggested to account for these agreements and disagreements in language, and they are as follows. (1) A primal or germ gospel (\textit{Ureangelium}) from which the evangelists drew. It has been defined as an Aramaic Matthew (Corrodi, Schmidt), a \textit{"Hebrew Gospel"} (Lessing, Niemeyer, Weber), or a record composed by a company of apostles (Eichhorn, Marsh); but all these various forms have been outlawed. Holtzmann has advocated the hypothesis of a primal Mark and an original collection of discourses by Matthew; but that the \textit{köyas} (discourses), which Papias attributes to Matthew, included other matter, even Strauss granted. (2) The theory that one evangelist used the other, there being one original one. But it is comical to observe that each of the possible combinations has its zealous defenders. But why should men who had the best opportunities of getting details from the very eye-witnesses of Christ use each other's works? The theory, on the other hand, begets many difficulties, as, for example, Why did the evangelist who used his predecessor omit so much of his matter, alter the language of the Lord's discourses (often quoting half a verse word for word, and then suddenly breaking off), and alter the chronological sequences? (3) The evangelists drew from a common tradition. This is the theory of Gisseler (\textit{Hist.-krit. Versuch u. d. Entstehung d. schriftl. Evangelien}, Leipzig, 1818), and the only tenable one. In the repeated narration of the events of Christ's life, certain points were always emphasized, and these the evangelists have in common; the very expressions being impressed upon the memories of the hearers. But the individuality of the writers also asserted itself.

3. \textit{John's Gospel} (see \textit{JOHN, GOSPEL OF}) was written (96) at a time when the altered circumstances of the Church, and the first indications of Gnosticism, made a new point of view necessary. For this reason he supplemented the accounts of the synoptists both in respect to the outward details of Christ's life and his personality (in opposition to the false Gnosis). This Gospel differs largely from the others, but not to the prejudice of the harmony. The more elevated style of the Lord's discourses which it records has furnished a difficulty to some; but as the complete with a number of "the holy grace and brilliancy" (as De Wette himself acknowledges), as it is improbable that the disciple should have surpassed the Master, and as the synoptists here and there rise to the same strain (Matt. xi. 25-30, xiii. 16, 17, etc.: Luke x. 21-28), the difficulty completely disappears for those who have an ear for the light-born excellency of Christ's words. The only real difficulty which John's Gospel offers to the harmonist is the date of the Last Supper. The discussion over this extremely complicated and prickly question is not yet closed. The apparent contradictions in the accounts of the resurrection are easily solved; John narrating what Mary Magdalene saw, Gnosticism, or any syncretism, combining in one account her experiences and those of the other women. Mark indicates a difference between the two (xvi. 8, 9).

[Continuous narratives of the life of Christ, combining details of all the evangelists, are called in another and special sense \textit{Harmonies}. The \textit{Diatessaron} of Tatian, the \textit{apocrypha} of Ammonius, the German \textit{Heiland}, and Otfried's \textit{Harmony}, are the most important examples of these. For accounts of them see \textit{DIATESSARON}, \textit{AMMONIUS}, \textit{HEILAND}, etc. Harmonies in addition to those mentioned in the body of the article have been published by STEPHENS (Paris, 1653), G. CALIXTUS (Halsted, 1624), T. CARTWRIGHT (Amsl., 1627, 1647), LIGHTFOOT (Lond., 1644, and in English, Lond., 1655), CLERICUS (Amsl., 1669), MACKNIGHT (Lond., 1756, and often), J. PRIESTLEY (in English, Lond., 1777), NEWCOME (Dublin, 1778, ed. by Dr. ROBINSON, Andover, 1814, 1834). TowSEND (Lond., 1825, Bost., 1837), ROBINSON (Bost., 1845, revised edition, 1851, and often), STRoud (Lond., 1853), STRong (N.Y., 1854), GRESWELL (Oxon., 5th ed., 1856), GARDINER (Andover, 1870); \textit{Harmonies} of the Synoptists by PLANck (Gotting., 1809), De Wette and Lücke (Berol., 1818, 1842), REDiger (Halle, 1829, 1839), ANGER (Leip., 1852). For more complete lists, see ROBINSON'S and GARDINER'S \textit{Harmonies}; and for general literature on the subjects treated in the article, see \textit{Gospels}; also \textit{SchAFF'S Church History}, revised ed., 1882, vol. 1, pp. 575-587.]

\textbf{Harms, Claus}, a powerful champion of the religion of faith in a rationalistic age; b. at Fahrstedt, Schleswig-Holstein, May 25, 1775; d. in Kiel, Feb. 1, 1855. Prevented, at first, by lack of means from securing a higher education, he labored in his father's mill until he was nineteen. After his father's death he entered a classical school, and subsequently passed into the university of Kiel. The teaching at the university was predominantly rationalistic; but, influenced thereto largely by the perusal of Schleiermacher's \textit{Discourses on Religion}, Harms turned away from rationalism as vanity, and gave himself up to faith in Christ as the only hope of the sinner. In 1806 he became assistant pastor in Lunden, and in 1816 was transferred to Kiel, where he remained during the rest of his life, in spite of calls, as Schleiermacher's successor, to Trinity Church, Berlin, in 1834, and to other places. He was obliged in 1849 to give up his positions on account of blindness. In 1878 the hundredth anniversary of his birth was celebrated in Kiel, and a tablet placed on the house which he had occupied.

Harms exercised a very decided influence upon the religious faith of his time. He was the most penetrative of rationalism. As a preacher he was much sought after, the university students flocking to hear him. After Twesten's advent in Kiel as professor, it was said, "Twesten converts his hearers, and Harms baptizes them. He was a man of the people, and his style was no less popular than it was fresh and trenchant. In 1817, at the three hundredth anniversary of the Reformation, Harms took occasion to speak out his mind again against rationalism, and did it by publishing, side by side with Luther's theses, ninety-five of his own. He utters bold words against reason, which he calls the "poop of our time," and the religion of reason, which has "run mad in the Lutheran Church, disrobes Christ from the altar, throws God a card from the pulpit, creates God, whereas God used to be regarded as having created man," etc. These theses went through Germany like a tempest. Rationalists railed against the author; and, as Von Ammon has said, they were indeed a bitter medicine for the then prevailing weakness of faith. They went, however, with his writings in their defence, with healing and converting power to homes throughout the entire land. Harms also wrote hymns, some of which have passed into German hymn-books.

Lit. Among his volumes of sermons are Winterpostille, 1808; Sommernpost., 1811, 6th ed. of both, Leipzig, 1816; Neue Winterpost., 1824; Neue Sommernpost., 1827; D. heil. Passion, 1857; D. Vater Unser, 1838; Bergpredigt, 1841; D. Bibel., 1842; D. Offenb. Johannis, 1844; Tröstpredigten, 1852. He also wrote a Life of Henrik von Züphen den Bloedtätigen für unser Glauben (1817), in Low-German, and Pastoralthologie (Kiel, 1830, 3d ed., 1878), a book which ought to be on every pastor's table. See Autobiography, 2d ed., Kiel, 1852; Dr. M. Baumgarten: Ein Denkmal f. C. Harms, Braunsch., 1855 [and memorials by G. Bachmann, Lüneburg, N. Elsen, all Kiel, 1878, and the volume Die Gedächtnisfeier für Claus Harms an seinem hundertsten Geburtsstag, Kiel, 1878].

HARMS, Georg Ludwig Detlev Theodor (commonly known as LUDWIG HARMS), a most original and successful German Lutheran pastor; b. May 5, 1808, in Walsrode, Lüneburg; d. at Hermannsburg, Nov. 14, 1865. After studying at the university of Göttingen, and spending several years as private tutor, he became in 1844 his father's assistant as pastor of the church at Hermannsburg, a town of thirty-five hundred inhabitants, near Hanover. His father belonged to the rationalistic school, but was a man of strong and robust character. Ludwig, on the other hand, had undergone a thorough conversion at the university. He labored at Hermannsburg as few have done, not only in the pulpit, the services filling up the entire Sabbath, but as a pastor among the people. His popular and winning manners, his sympathy with the poor and the sorrowing, secured for him the love of all. On Sunday afternoons he held a catechetical class, which lasted three hours, and was attended by a thousand people. These labors led to a religious awakening such as North Germany had never witnessed before. Harms's chief source of power was his sermons. He understood as few, if any, since Luther have understood, how to preach to the people. His method was, before everything else, popular. His sermons were simple, and, thought expressed in terse language and clearly. He followed out the advice which he gave to a brother minister in these words: "Call every thing by its right name, so that others may grasp with their minds what you mean, and present truth as concretely as possible, so that it may not pass away over people's heads." [Professor Park, in a very interesting paper on Congregationalism (Feb. 23, 1866), says in this connection, "He preferred the concrete to the abstract, did not speak of holiness so often as of God, nor of sin so often as the devil. He was terrible in his denunciations of popular sins, and exhibited the tenderest concern for his people," etc.] Harms drew his sermons from every-day life, and preached to life. The interest of his immediate hearers, the Lüneburg peasants, was to him matter of supreme concern. He spoke their dialect. His themes were the necessity of a thorough conversion, justification by faith, and the evidence of faith in a consistent life. He denounced sin unsparring, so that there was no back-door left for the sinner, and in vivid reality painted the condemnation of the ungodly and the blessedness of the believer. He dealt not in general delineations and exhortations, but pictured before his hearers each specific step and duty.

But in the mere gifts of body Harms was sadly lacking. His voice was shrill, his manner in the pulpit somewhat stiff; and his bodily strength, which was never great, in his last years seemed hardly sufficient to carry him through a sermon. But with all these defects he riveted the attention of his hearers, and gave the impression of absolute sincerity.

Under these labors the life of the community underwent a radical change. Sunday was strictly observed, and family prayer regularly maintained. Swearing and excessive drinking were given up. No beggar was known in the place; and the yearly contributions of the church to benevolent objects were very large, amounting in 1854 to twenty-four thousand marks for missions alone. [Professor Park relates the following incident: "I met a carpenter going to his day labor. 'How do you do?' I asked. 'I cannot but be well,' he replied, "having so many religious privileges as I enjoy here,' etc."

But these were not the extent of Harms's enterprises. After his return to Lüneburg (in 1849), he organized a seminary for the training of missionaries; and was led to it by the frequent applications by young people who wished to become missionaries. This institution was very successful, and, besides sending out missionaries to different parts of the world, colonized the town of Hermannsburg in Africa. (The funds for erecting the buildings, as well as the funds for other enterprises, were regarded by Harms as direct answers to prayer. In 1854 he established a missionary journal, which became very popular in Germany. As characteristic of his independence, Professor Park relates the following incident: "On one occasion, when Harms was in Hannover, the king despatched one of his officers with the state carriage to bring him to the palace. 'Give my regards to the king,' said Harms; and then added, 'I would obey his order if my duty allowed; but I must go home and put to thoughts expressed in terse language and concretely. He followed out the advice which he gave to a brother minister in these words: "Call every thing by its right name, so that others may grasp with their minds what you mean, and present truth as concretely as possible, so that it may not pass away over people's heads.""

Harms published a number of volumes of sermons, which are among the most widely circulated in Germany. Among these are Evangelienpredigten, Hermannsburg, 8th ed., 1877; Epistlepredigten, 2d ed., 1872; Ausleg., d. Psalmen, 2d ed., 1870. See his Life by his brother, THEODORE HARMS.
Harp. See Music Among the Hebrews.

Harris, Howel, a Welsh revivalist; b. at Trenvalla, 1714; d. there July 21, 1778. He was "the first lay preacher in the great Methodist movement,"—a year and a half ahead of Whitefield and Wesley. He had to encounter great opposition, but persevered. With the Wesleys he held life-long intimacy. He was a layman, and all his repeated efforts to obtain ordination were vain. His success in preaching was wonderful. See Tyerman's Wesley.

Harris, John, independent minister; b. at Ugborough, Devonshire, March 8, 1802; became principal and professor of theology, New College, Cheshunt, 1850; d. there Dec. 21, 1858. He was the author of the widely circulated and able prize essays, Mammon (1836), of which more than a hundred thousand copies have been sold, and The Great Commission (1836), and The Pre-Adamite Earth (1847), Man Primaeval (1849).

Harris, Samuel, the "Apostle of Virginia;" b. in Hanover County, Jan. 12, 1724; date of his death is uncertain. For many years he was a soldier; but after his conversion (in 1758) he devoted more and more time and strength to religious duties, until in 1769 he was ordained, and then left all secular occupations. In 1774 the General Association of Separate Baptists chose him "apostle," and ordained him by the laying-on of the hands of every minister in that body. He was much persecuted.

Harvard, John. See Harvard University.

Harvard University. 1. Constitution.—At present Harvard University comprehends the following departments: Harvard College, the Divinity School, the Law School, the Medical School, the Dental School, the Lawrence Scientific School, the Museum of Comparative Zoology, the Bussey Institution (a school of agriculture), the College Library, and the Astronomical Observatory. The Peabody Museum of American Archeology and Ethnology is a constituent part of the university. The control of the State and the university internal affairs (discipline, studies, degrees) are administered by the faculty of the department (consisting of all its instructors, at whose head is a dean, or director). The control of general university matters, particularly of the degrees of master of arts and doctor of philosophy, is in the hands of the Academic Council, composed of all the professors and assistant professors of the university. The only honorary degrees conferred are doctor of divinity, and doctor of laws. The conferring power in all cases is the corporation, with the consent of the overseers. Officers of instruction are of various classes,—professors, appointed by corporation and overseers, for life; assistant professors, instructors, tutors, appointed for definite periods; instructors and lecturers, appointed annually; and demonstrators and assistants, appointed by the corporation for various terms. During the two last periods the last bonds of union were severed; and the university is now absolutely independent of the college.

2. Instruction.—Beginning as a seminary for theology, Harvard has become a university, in which all branches of science are represented, and the liberas docendit exists in its fullest extent. During its first century the instruction was given by the president and several tutors. The first professorship (one of divinity) was established by Thomas Hollis, an English Baptist layman, in 1721, who also endowed the second chair (of mathematics and natural philosophy) in 1726; and in 1746 was created the first professorship endowed by a native New-Englander— that of Hebrew and other Oriental languages, by Thomas Hancock. The college now advanced rapidly to university proportions. The Medical School was begun in 1783, the Botanic Garden in 1805, the Divinity School in 1815, the Law School in 1817, the Astronomical Observatory in 1846, the Agassiz Museum of Comparative Zoology in 1859, the Peabody Museum in 1866, the Dental School in 1868, and the Bussey Institution in 1871 (to which was added in 1872 the Arnold Arboretum, for the open-air culture of trees, shrubs, and herbaceous plants). During the past thirteen years (administration of President C. W. Eliot) there has been a marked expansion in the instruction, both in the teaching force and in the general apparatus (buildings, etc.). The course for the degree of bachelor of arts extends over four years, in the first of which the students are prescribed studies; in the others, elective. In the three upper classes (in which about a hundred and seventy courses are offered by over fifty instructors) the student may select for his degree any studies in which the class-instruction amounts on an average to not less than twelve hours a week. The elective system, with its specializing tendencies, has grown steadily in favor; and prescribed studies seem likely soon to disappear altogether. Here, as in the discipline, the theory of the college is that the largest possible liberty is to be given to the student, and the appeal made to his sense of responsibility. In the professional schools the courses for degrees are fixed. In all departments, except the Medical School, special students not candidates for degrees are admitted without examination, may take such studies as they choose, receive certificates for what work they do, and are subject to the same regulations as regular students.
HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

Harvest Among Hebrews.

3. Religious Character.—The university is now wholly unsectarian. Sectarian control of its general government had practically ceased by the middle of the last century. In the movement which divided the Congregationalists of Massachusetts in 1815, the college was a member of the stronger party in the faculty favoring the abrogation of all the official religious exercises. All students are required to attend morning prayers, and all but members of the senior class to attend one service Sunday (the place being selected by them). A strong party in the faculty favor the abrogation of this enforced attendance on religious exercises, on the ground that it is not promotive of, but unfavorable to, the growth of religious life. They would have services maintained, if necessary, by the college, but better by voluntary subscriptions of persons interested, and attendance voluntary. Among the students several private organizations devoted to the cultivation of piety are maintained. As might be supposed in so large a body of men, there exists a great variety of philosophical and religious opinions among the instructors. The perfect liberty of thought and utterance that prevails in the school for scholarship, the university cannot be put into any one category or school of thought: it may be said to represent all the philosophical and religious tendencies of the times. In the department of theology and biblical criticism, the publications of instructors have generally been marked by a conservative tone; as, for example, the works of Professors Norton, Hedge, and Abbot; and the same thing may be said of the department of philosophy (publications of Professors Walker, Bowen, and James).

4. Funds and Collections.—The invested funds of the university amount to about four million dollars, and the property in lands, houses, etc., not paying interest, to about two million. The number of books in all the libraries of the university is over two hundred and fifty thousand, and there is about an equal number of pamphlets. The Museum of Comparative Zoology is reckoned among the greatest natural-history collections of the world: it is especially rich in insects. The botanical collection ranks high in some departments, especially the composite. The Museum of American Archeology, though young, has a respectable number of objects from the earlier remains, and the department of Classics is especially well represented. The number of instructors in the university is over a hundred and fifty; the number of students, over thirteen hundred and fifty.

C. H. TOY

(Professor at Harvard.)

HARVEST AMONG THE HEBREWS. The season of gathering grain or fruits generally commenced about the middle of April (John iv. 35). In some parts, as in Jericho, it commenced a little earlier. On the second day of the Passover feast (i.e., on the sixteenth day of the first month, Abib, or Nisan) a sheaf of the first-fruits was brought unto the priest (Lev. xxiii. 10); and thus the harvest season was inaugurated. The beginning was made with barley and with thePassover festival (Lev. xxii. 9-14; 2 Sam. xxi. 9; Ruth i. 22), and with the wheat and the Feast of Ingathering (Exod. xxiii. 16, xxvii. 29) it was concluded. The reapers were mostly hired men, over whom a servant was set (Ruth ii. 5). The maidens generally put the sheaves in bundles; but the owner, together with his children, assisted the reapers, especially in carrying away the sheaves (Gen. xxxvii. 7). The passers-by saluted the reapers (Ruth ii. 4). Refreshments, especially drink, were provided for the reapers (Ruth ii. 9). The harvest was a season of great rejoicing, especially when the crops had been plentiful (Isa. ix. 3; Ps. xxxvi. 6). The corners of the field were not reaped, but left to the poor; and so also any sheaf that was forgotten in the field belonged to the poor and the stranger (Lev. xix. 9, xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 19).

HASENKAMP is the name of three brothers, who, belonging to the same circle as Lavater, Jung-Stilling, Tersteegen, and Kollenbusch, spoke with great energy and impressiveness for the idea of a divine revelation, and against the flat rationalism prevailing in Germany during the latter half of the eighteenth century. — Johann Gerhard, b. July 12, 1736; d. June 10, 1777; was appointed rector at Duisburg in 1766, but was several times, both before and after his appointment, forbidden to preach on account of the mental excitement under which he suffered. His Life, begun by himself, and finished and printed by his son, is an interesting and instructive book, and gives the list of his works, mostly of a polemical and apologetical description. — Friedrich Arnold, b. Jan. 11, 1747; d. 1793; succeeded his brother as rector of Duisburg, and wrote Ueber die verdunkelten Auflösungen, 1789, Briefe über wichtige Wahrheiten der Religion, 1794, 2 vols., etc. — Johann Heinrich, b. Sept. 19, 1750; d. June 17, 1814; was pastor of Dahle, near Altona, from 1779. His Christll. Schriften, 3 vols., were published after his death by his nephew.

HASSE, Friedrich Rudolf, b. at Dresden, June 29, 1809; d. at Bonn, Oct. 14, 1869. He studied at Leipzig and Berlin; was successively privatdozent at the latter university (1834), professor extraordinary of church history at Grieswald (1838) and then at Bonn (1841), and professor ordinary (1843). His fame rests upon his master- piece, Anselm von Canterbury, Leipzig, 1843, 1852, 2 vols. He began his studies upon Anselm as early as 1832, when he chose him as the subject of his dissertation. Up to that time the scholarly period of church history had been very little studied. Hasse developed extraordinary gifts in exploring it. His dissertation was upon the Anselmic conception of the divine image, and proved the presence of a master historian. This impression was confirmed by his lectures on church history. In Bonn he completed (1843) the first volume of his monograph upon Anselm of Canterbury, containing the life. This was the result of the most thorough work and answers every demand of a monograph; for Anselm stands forth in all his individuality, and at the same time in his relation to the movements of his age. In 1852 Hasse issued his second volume, the theology of Anselm, presented in a form at once complete, objective, and clear. One is able to follow the development of the theology step by step to its rounded whole.

Hasse possessed great ability as a teacher, and was held in high esteem for his solidity of character, his childlike piety, and his great modesty, which led him not only to think little of himself, but to rejoice in the success of others. He took an intelligent interest in church matters, and especially in foreign missions. Besides his masterpiece, Anselm von Canterbury, he is the author of the two posthumous volumes of lectures, Geschichte des alten Bundes, Leipzig, 1863, and Kirchengeschichte, Leipzig, 1864, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1872. See W. KRAFFT: Dr. F. R. Hasse, eine Lebensskizze, Bonn, 1885.

HATTEMISTS, a Dutch sect founded by Pieter van Hattem, who was pastor in Zealand, but was deposed in 1583. He was a disciple of Spinoza; and his doctrines rest on a mystical pantheism, in which the moral distinction between good and bad disappears. The sect was never of great consequence, and soon vanished.

HATT, Bishop of Basel; b. in 783; was educated in the monastery of Reinach; became director of its school, and abbott, 806; was made Bishop of Basel in 807, by Charlemagne, and in 811 sent as ambassador to the Emperor Nicephorus; resigned his position as abbott and bishop in 823, and died as simple monk in Reinach 836. Two works by him have come down to us, — Visio Wettini, a description of a walk through heaven, hell, and purgatory, which made a deep impression on his contemporaries, and was put into Latin verses by Walafrid Strabo; and Capitulare Hattonis, twenty-five statutes which he issued as bishop. Both works are found in Migne: Patrolog. Lat., vol. 105.

HATTO, Archbishop of Mayence; b. in the middle of the ninth century, probably in Susbia; d. May 15, 911; was educated at Elwangen, or Fulda; became Abbots of Reinach 888, and of Elwangen 889, and Archbishop of Mayence 891. Twice he accompanied King Arnulph to Italy (894 and 896), and received the pallium from Pope Formosus. After the death of Arnulph, during the reign of Louis the Child (900—911), he and his friend, Bishop Adalbero of Augsburg, the tutor of the young king, actually governed the realm; and his influence did not essentially decrease when Conrad I. ascended the throne. As in that period the unity of the German Empire mainly rested on the Christian episcopacy, in which the kings found their best support against their vassals' revolts, and attempts of independence, it is quite natural that so powerful a representative of this tendency as Hatto should be very variously judged by his contemporaries; and, indeed, while some extolled him as a prudent and patriotic statesman, others told how Satan himself came to fetch him, and threw him down into the crater of Etna. See J. F. BöHRER: Regesta archiepiscoporum Maguntinensium, edited by C. Will, Innsbruck, 1877.

HAUG, Martin, famous Orientalist; b. at Ost- dorf in Württemberg, Jan. 30, 1827; d. at Ragatz, Switzerland, June 8, 1876. He studied at Tubingen, Göttingen, and Bonn, for three years (1856—59); assisted Bunsen on his Bibelwerk: was professor of Sanscrit in Poona college (1859—63); made a successful journey under British appointment through the province of Guzerat, for the purpose of collecting manuscripts of Zend and Sanscrit; returned to Germany in 1866; and from 1868 till his death he was professor of Sanscrit and comparative grammar at the university of Munich. His large collection of Zend, Hebrew, Sanscrit, and Persian manuscripts, was pur-HAUGE, Hans Nielsen, a powerful lay preacher and revivalist in Norway; was b. on the Hauge farm, in the county of Smaalenene, April 3, 1771; and d. on the Bredtvedt farm, in Aker County, March 29, 1824. He received only the common peasant education, but he was from early youth a zealous student of the Bible. In 1796 he began his missionary work, walking from place to place, and often preaching twice or thrice a day. He made a deep impression; but as he spoke rather aloof until finally the rationalistic ice itself began to thaw. See A. Chr. Bang; Hans Nielsen Hauge, Christiana, 1875.

HÄURAN. See Bashan.

HAUSMANN, Nicolaus, one of Luther's dearest friends; b. at Freiburg, 1479; d. there 1538. He introduced the Reformation into Zwickau (1521), and subsequently into the duchy of Anhalt (1532). Luther heard of his death on Nov. 6, 1538, and lamented him greatly. He praised him for his exemplary piety, which did so much to commend the Reformation. "What we teach, he lives," he said of him. See O. G. Schmidt: Nicolaus Hausmann, der Freund Luthers, Leipzig, 1860.

HAVELOCK, Henry, Sir, a distinguished English general and Christian layman; b. April 5, 1795, at Bishop-Wearmouth, Sunderland, where his father was a rich ship-builder; d. Nov. 25, 1857, at Neu-Strelitz, 1846; a learned member of the Royal Library at Munich. His best known work is Essays on the Sacred Language of the Parsees, Bombay, 1862; 2d ed., revised and enlarged, London, 1878.

HAVENICK, Heinrich Andreas Christoph, b. at Kroplin, Mecklenburg, Germany, 1808; d. at Neu-Strelitz, 1849; a learned member of the Royal Library at Munich. His best work is Essays on the Sacred Language of the Parsees, Bombay, 1862; 2d ed., revised and enlarged, London, 1878.

HAYES, Erastus Otis, D.D., L.L.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Boston, Mass., Nov. 1, 1820; d. at Salem, Oregon, Tuesday, Aug. 2, 1881. He was graduated at the Wesleyan University 1842; took up the profession of teaching; was ordained 1848, and, after holding various positions, was professor in the University of Michigan 1853-56; editor of Zion's Herald, Boston, 1856-63; president of the University of Michigan 1863-69, of the North-western University, Evanston, III., 1869-72; corresponding secretary of the board of education of the Methodist-Episcopal Church 1872-74; chancellor of the Syracuse University 1874-77; elected bishop 1880. His best known publication is Rhetoric for Schools, Colleges, and Private Study, New York, 1869.

HAVEN, Gilbert, D.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. near Boston, Sept. 19, 1821; d. at Malden, Mass., Jan. 8, 1880. After graduation at the Wesleyan University (1846), he taught for several years. In 1851 he joined the New-England Conference of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. In 1861 he was appointed chaplain of the Eighth Massachusetts Regiment, the first commissioned chaplain after the breaking-out of hostilities; but he only was one year in service. He was editor of Zion's Herald 1867-72, when he was elected bishop. He was a vigorous advocate of the cause of the colored people, and also of Protestantism. He was quite an extensive traveler; and his journey to Mexico he recorded in an interesting volume, Our Next-Door Neighbor; recent Skies of the New World, 1874.

HAYENQAL, Frances Ridley, a beloved and gifted religious writer; b. at Astley, Worcestershire, Eng., Dec. 14, 1836; d. at Caswell Bay, Swansea, South Wales, June 3, 1879. She was the daughter of a clergyman of the Church of England, and was carefully educated. Her own love of study led her to take up unusual lines; and so she acquired some acquaintance with Greek and Hebrew, in order that she might read the Bible in the original. She was a devoted Christian woman, neglecting no opportunity to speak for the Saviour. She issued many volumes of prose and poetry, which have been blessed to many hearts. Of these perhaps the best known are the three collections of her poetry under the titles, Ministry of Song, Under the Surface, and Under His Shadow; and in prose Morning Bells and Little Pillows (devotions for children, published 1874), My King (1877), Kept for the Master's Use (1879), and Swiss Letters (1882). See her interesting Memorials, by her sister, London and New York, 1880.

HAVERNICK, Heinrich Andreas Christoph, b. at Kroplin, Mecklenburg, Germany, 1808; d. at Neu-Strelitz, 1849; a learned member of the HAWILAM. See Eden.

HAWAIIAN ISLANDS. See Sandwich Islands.

HAWES, Joel, D.D., b. Medway, Mass., Dec. 22, 1759; d. at Gilead, Conn., June 5, 1867. He was graduated from Brown University 1813; studied at Andover; and from 1818 till his death was pastor of the First Congregational Church in Hartford, Conn. He wrote several religious works, of which the best known is Lectures to Young Men on the Formation of Character, Hartford, 1828; repeatedly reprinted, and widely circulated, in the United States and Great Britain.

HAWK, Robert, D.D., an “evangelical;” b. Exeter, Eng., 1735; educated at Oxford; vicar of Charles-the-Martyr in Plymouth for fifty years; d. in that town April 6, 1827. He was a popular divine, and author of The Poor Man’s Commentary, covering the entire Bible (London, 1810—22, 10 vols.), and The Poor Man’s Morning and Evening Portion, which passed through many editions. An edition of his Works, mostly sermons, exclusive of his Commentary, appeared in 10 vols., London, 1831. Rev. Dr. John Williams prefaced the edition by a brief memoir.

HAWKER, Robert Stephen, the grandson of John Williams, and author of commentaries upon Daniel (Hamb, 1832) and upon Ezekiel (Erlangen, 1845), Handbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Alte Testament (Erlangen, Parts I—III, 1838—39 and 1846—50; Part III, edited by Keil, 1849, English translation), A Historico-Critical Introduction to the Pentateuch (Edinburgh, 1850), and A General Historico-Critical Introduction to the Old Testament (1852).

HAVILAH. See Eden.

HEAVEN.

school of Hengstenberg, and author of commentaries upon Daniel (Hamb, 1832) and upon Ezekiel (Erlangen, 1845), Handbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Alte Testament (Erlangen, Parts I—III, 1838—39 and 1846—50; Part III, edited by Keil, 1849, English translation), A Historico-Critical Introduction to the Pentateuch (Edinburgh, 1850), and A General Historico-Critical Introduction to the Old Testament (1852).

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.

HEAVEN.
creation were developed out of the upper waters, just as the solid earth was developed out of the lower waters; and the facts of astronomy seem to favor this view, the density of Jupiter being no greater than that of water, and the density of Saturn being only half as great. But it is opposed by other representations (Gen. vii. 11; Ps. cxlviii. 4), according to which the "waters" still continue to exist above the heavens. We are not, therefore, surprised to be told that the earth, so the created heavens will pass away (Matt. xxiv. 29, 35; Mark xiii. 25, 31; 2 Pet. iii. 10).

(2) Heaven also designates the place where God specially manifests his glory. It is his throne (Isa. lxv. 1). "The heaven of heavens is the Lord's; the earth he has given to the children of men" (Ps. cxv. 16). After the flood, sacrifices ascended to it (Gen. viii. 20). Heaven is in this case supermundane, as well as superterrene, distinct from the earth, and high above all created objects. God has revealed himself from heaven, since the time of Noah, through a covenant of grace, whose ultimate aim is the union of heaven and earth. In time the Hebrew nation was chosen as the representative of God's kingdom on the earth, and the temple erected at Jerusalem which contained the mercy-seat, where the invisible God was always present. But these were only shadows of good things to come (Heb. x. 1). When the fulness of time was come, God revealed himself in Christ, who descended from heaven (John iii. 13), and announced the establishment of the kingdom of heaven amongst men. He made repentance the condition of membership in it, and taught men to pray to the heavenly Father that this kingdom might come, and so God's will be done on earth as in heaven.

(3) The Epistle to the Hebrews gives us a deeper insight into the mystery of heaven. The "holy place" into which Christ entered when he ascended from the earth (Heb. ix. 11, 12) is nothing else than the holy of holies, the place of the glorious presence of God. This is heaven in its fullest, its real sense (Heb. ix. 24, "heaven itself"). There Christ, as the eternal high priest, is always advocating our cause, but in a way that surpasses the world the scene of his saving presence (Eph. i. 23). He himself sits on the throne, whence such language as that "he was made higher than the heavens" (Heb. vii. 25), and "has passed through the heavens" (Heb. iv. 14). "When the departure of Jesus from the world was in question, it was sufficient to say 'into heaven'; but when the idea was to be expressed that all earthly limitation was removed, and every possible barrier between Jesus and God taken away, then the expression is used, 'far above all the heavens' (κοινωνά τοῦ οὐρανοῦ τῶν αἰώνων), or one like it" (Lofmann, Schriftenhefte, ii. 1, p. 535). It is this superpatial heaven, above the cloudy and the stellar heavens, both of which are transient, to which Paul refers when he speaks of the "third heaven" (2 Cor. xii. 2).

Those who partake of the benefits of Christ's death and resurrection have their citizenship in heaven (Phil. iii. 20). But remember those who are already in heaven continue to have an interest in the progress of Christ's kingdom on the earth (Luke xv. 7, etc.). But the created heavens (Gen. i. 1) and earth will pass away, and be replaced by new heavens and a new earth (2 Pet. iii. 10). Upon this new earth the heavenly Jerusalem will be let down (Rev. xxi.), which will be distinguished for holiness, and will be resplendent with glory (Rev. xxi. 11 sqq.).

The doctrine of heaven offers a large field for the fancy; and a spiritualistic tendency is to be avoided, which resolves the heavenly realities into mere ideas of the fancy or realist such as is represented by Swedenborg and Oberlin, and in works like Uranographie oder Beschreibung d. unsichtbaren Welt (Uranography, or a Description of the Invisible World, Ludwigsburg, 1858). It must be admitted that there is something real to correspond to the figures, and the one bears a relation to the other similar to that which exists between the glorified and natural body. [See Baxter: Saints' Everlasting Rest, London, 1649; John Howe: The Blessedness of the Righteous opened, London, 1688; J. P. Lange: D. Land d. Herrlichkeit, Meurs, 1838; Harbaugh: Heaven, or the Everlasting Dead, 3 vols., Philadelphia, 1848–53, and often since, etc.; the works on Theology, especially those of Hodge, Van Oosterzee, and Dorner; also Alger: Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life, 10th ed. Boston, 1873.]

Heber, Reginald, a distinguished bishop and hymn-writer; b. at Malpas, Chester, April 21, 1783; d. at Trichinopoly, India, April 3, 1826. He was delicate in constitution, but precocious in intellect, at an early age writing poems (Ishmael, etc.) which were retained side by side with his maturer compositions. In 1800 he went to Oxford, and three years afterwards produced the prize poem, Palestine, which takes highest rank among productions of its kind, and was set to music by Dr. Crotch. In 1804 he was fellow of All Souls. After travelling through Northern Europe he became rector, in 1807, of Hodnet. His kind and charitable disposition won the affections of his people. In 1815 he delivered the Hampton Lectures on the Personality and Office of the Christian Comforter. In 1817 he was made canon of St. Asaph, and, 1822, preacher at Lincoln's Inn. Soon after, the see of Calcutta was offered to Heber. After much hesitation, he accepted the position, and was consecrated at Lambeth, June 16, 1823. At that time Calcutta was the only diocese in India. Heber threw himself eagerly into the work which had been begun by his predecessor, Dr. Middleton. He sought to build up educational institutions, as well as increase the missionary stations. His excessive and useful labors were brought to a sudden termination by his death, from apoplexy, while taking a bath.

Bishop Heber continues to be known, not only as the laborious and devoted prelate of India, but also as the author of some of our most polished and devout hymns. Among these are "Brightest and best of the sons of the morning," "Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty;" and of all missionary hymns his "From Greenland's icy mountains" is the most inspiring and emotional. Heber was a High-Churchman, and held to the doctrine of the Trinity, and of the eternity of the soul. He carried out these views in India strictly, and yet he was recognized as a man of catholic and liberal spirit. Upon the Thirty-nine Articles he put an Armenian interpretation. He combined learning, and refinement of manners, with humility, and consecration to his work.

HEBREW LANGUAGE. The is the language of the Hebrews, the descendants of Eber, or Heber, the ancestor of Abraham (Gen. xi. 14). In the Old Testament they called themselves "The Children of Israel," "Israel," "The House of Jacob," "Jacob;" and in the New Testament, "the Children of Israel," "Israel," "The House of Jacob," "The House of David." These terms are uniformly used in the New Testament, and are therefore naturally called "Hebrews" (Gen. xxxix. 14, xlix. 12; Exod. i. 6, ii. 6; 1 Sam. iv. 6, xiii. 19), and so they called themselves in contradistinction to non-Israelites (Gen. xv. 15, xliii. 32; Exod. i. 15, 19). Apparent exceptions are 1 Sam. xiii. 5, 7, xiv. 21; but here the text may be corrupt, for the Septuagint reads, "Let the slaves revolt." And those that crossed, crossed the Jordan," in the first two cases respectively. We are therefore naturally led to suppose that the designation "Hebrew" for the speech of the Israelites came from the non-Israelites, or from Greek-speaking Jews, since the expression Ἰσραήλ occurs first in the Apocrypha and in the Prologue to Sirach (i.e., about 190 B.C.), to describe not only the old Hebrew language, but that of the later popular Aramaic of the Jews. The same phrase occurs in the New Testament (John v. 2, xiii. 18, 17; cf. Ἰσραήλ ἄλλωσις Acts xx. 40, xxii. 2, xxvi. 14). The Old Testament never applies the term "Hebrew" to the language: on the contrary, in Isa. xix. 18 it is called the "language of Canaan" when distinguished from that of the Egyptians — an expression which indicates that it was the speech not only of the Israelites, but also of the inhabitants of Canaan. In 2 Kings xviii. 22, 28, Isa. xxxvi. 11, 13, Neh. xiii. 24, the speech of the Judæans is called "Jewish," in distinction to the Aramaic.

As the Hebrews belonged to a family of nations, so their tongue was a member of a widely spread family of languages, usually denominated, since Eichhorn, "Shemitic." It is impossible to describe exactly its boundaries; but suffice it to say, its northern limit was the table-lands of Armenia, its eastern was the Tigris, its southern the Persian Gulf, and its western the Mediterranean Sea. [For the relations of the languages within this Shemitic family, see SHEMITIC LANGUAGES.] The Hebrew occupied a middle position between the Aramaic and the North Arabic, and displayed the linguistic peculiarities of such a position. If it lacked the richness of expressions, the variety of forms, the completer vocalization, and the fine intonations, of the North Arabic, and displayed in many respects the singleness of the Aramaic, it still had, on the other hand, a rich possession which the Aramaic had lost by attrition. At the time when Hebrew comes to our knowledge in literature, it was the oldest of the Shemitic languages, Aramaic was next, and North Arabic last. But this does not imply that the Shemitic family passed through three stages to be so denominated: rather, these three tongues existed side by side. The age of the literature and that of the literary language is not the same as the age of the language. If we follow, from the great age of the Hebrew literature, that the language itself is the provably most original form of the Shemitic; for this conclusion could only be reached when the development of the other languages of this family had proceeded under the same conditions and influences, and, above all, in the same time. But so far is this from the case, that it is certain that Aramaic, in less time than Hebrew, became a more degenerate language; that Hebrew in many respects resembles Aramaic, and more and more as we trace its influence in the successive books of the Old Testament; that Arabic presents really the oldest form of the language in spite of its late literature; and, finally, that Hebrew had already declined when its earliest books were written.

When and where Hebrew arose is unknown. Two conjectures are admissible. — Hebrew was the language of Abraham, brought with him from Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. xi. 31), i.e., Mugheir, south of Babylon, on the right bank of the Euphrates; or it was the language of the original inhabitants of Canaan. In favor of the latter is the distinction between Hebrew and Aramaic, which dates from patriarchal times (Gen. xxxvi. 47).

Since the proper names of the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites are Hebrew, and since Old Testament tradition declares these peoples to be closely related to the Israelites, these must have spoken Hebrew, as is strikingly shown by the Moabite stone, which dates from the first half of the ninth century B.C. (see art.). Differences in pronunciation and expression in different parts of Palestine are proven by the Shibboleth incident (Judg. xii. 6) and by Deborah's ode (Judg. v.). Dialectical differences are alluded to in Neh. xiii. 23, 24, and Matt. xxvi. 53. Well.

It stands to reason that the Hebrew language must have undergone changes during the more than twelve centuries we are acquainted with it by books, inscriptions, and coins; yet the proof of this fact is difficult, and the result of all investigations to this end most meagre, for the following reasons. 1. No one period is fully represented; only fragments of its literature remain, as is proved by allusions in the books themselves: hence what is set down as peculiar to the age may be only a peculiarity of a writer.

2. It follows that it is impossible to decide certainly how old any particular book or other writing is, and therefore there can be no strict chronological arrangement. 3. In one book there may be quotations, more or less altered, from older books. In proof, compare the parallel passages in Kings and Chronicles. 4. From the time of Moses to the seventh century B.C., the Hebrews were not a nation. Even when under tribute to Assyria, the Hebrews were not as a people molested. 5. In linguistic changes the vowels...
HEBREW LANGUAGE.

HEBREW LANGUAGE.

suffer most; but the fact that in Hebrew writing only consonants are employed renders it well-nigh impossible to discover these vowel changes. The present Hebrew points are of comparatively late origin, and, although, as regards the traditional points, are uniformly applied to all portions of the earlier and the later Old Testament alike.

Aramaic exercised a decided influence upon Hebrew from the end of the seventh century B.C. Its presence, therefore, is one note of time. Accordingly, in the history of Hebrew, it is customary to make the exile the dividing line. The first period extends to the exile. Attempts have been made to prove the greater age of the Pentateuch, as compared, e.g., with the other historical books, principally by citing the use in the former of the pronoun מַלְאַךְ for the feminine מַלְיָה (which also occurs in later places in the Pentateuch), the word עַל in the sense of “young one” and “girl,” the word נֶפֶל for נִפְלֵי (found only in the Pentateuch and in Chronicles). But, as these cannot be proven to be archaisms, they do not prove the antiquity of the language of the Pentateuch. Equally indecisive are the so-called antique forms in these books; because it would be easy, from any other number of books having the same number of words, to pick out an equal number of unusual forms, with which equal reason might be called “antique.” As to the words and word-forms which occur only in the Pentateuch, or, if outside, only sporadically, it should be remembered that the Pentateuch constitutes one quarter of the whole Old Testament, and of each other quarter precisely the same thing is true; and, further, that the Pentateuch deals with matters not treated of in the remaining books. In the words peculiar to the Pentateuch there is not such a number of grammatical peculiarities as to prove the words archaic, or from which to argue the age of the writing. So much depends upon the individuality of the writer, upon his methods of work, upon his purpose, that it is impossible to trace a development of the language in this period from age to age by a study of words. Thus, within the books and within sections of the same book, a mere increase in liveliness of tone leads to the introduction of poetic words; e.g., in the Pentateuch are sections which in this way differ from other sections and from other books, yet are they not on that account proven to belong to a different time. The same is the case in the historical books. The historic, the poetic, and the prophetic books have quite distinct purposes, and, in consequence, different vocabularies. The poets, further, were compelled, by their mode of writing by parables, to make use of out-of-the-way expressions, because they needed a larger stock of expressions than, say, the historians, who found the ordinary speech ready to their hand, and ample for their wants. The prophets used longer sentences, and wrote more severely; otherwise, they have linguistically much in common. But, in spite of these differences, the laws of the language remained throughout the same.

The second period extends from the exile to the present day. It is characterized by the introduction of Aramaism. In the time of Hezekiah Aramaic was a foreign tongue (Isa. xxxvi.). In 720 B.C. the Northern Kingdom fell under the Assyrians; and, as the result of its troubles, Aramaic corrupted the language there. The Kingdom under the prophet Isaiah, although in the seventh century, remained linguistically Hebrew; yet Aramaic idioms were found, as Jeremiah and Ezekiel testify. It was not, indeed, until the end of the exile, that Hebrew lost its pristine purity and vigor. Then came a great change. The returned exiles, naturally used Persian names for their rulers; by marrying “strange women,” they further corrupted their speech; and, exposed as they were to inroads of strangers, it is not wonderful that their language was no longer pure Hebrew. Ezra and Nehemiah tried to stem the tide; they ordered that the sacred book of the law should be read in Hebrew (Neh. viii. 8); and Nehemiah was particularly indignant with those Jews who spoke the speech of Ashdod (Neh. xiii. 23 sqq.). These two wrote Hebrew, which does not differ substantially from that of Kings. But by the downfall of the language is meant rather the downfall of the literature; for certain writings of this period, in point of purity, resemble those of the pre-exilian period. These proceeded from the strict Jews, who zealously guarded their diction. The mass of the people quickly came to speak Aramaic. But still Hebrew did not become exactly a dead language, nor one understood only by the learned. On the contrary, the reading of the original holy writings in the synagogues, and their explanation, trained the Jews generally in Hebrew. Hence it came, that, when the learned had occasion to use writing to instruct their fellow-believers, they wrote in Hebrew. In the Mishna (about the second century A.D.) and in other Jewish compositions of a somewhat later date, we find Hebrew which is no servile imitation of the old speech, but a genuine development in the path struck in the later biblical books.

Quite different is the Hebrew written since the eleventh century, generally called the rabbinic. This is pedantic, imitative, a book-language, yet full of words, technical expressions, and particles, which are partly Aramaic and partly borrowed from the language of the country in which the writer lived.

E. BERTHEAU.

History.—The history of the critical study of the Hebrew begins with the Jewish grammarians and scribes, the Talmudists, and Masoretes, who carefully collected all that pertains to the text of the Hebrew Scriptures. The Christian fathers, with the exception of Origen, Epiphanius, and especially Jerome (who learned the language from a Jewish rabbi, and utilized it in his translation of the Vulgate), were ignorant of the Hebrew language, and derived their knowledge of the Old Testament from the Greek Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate. During the middle ages the Hebrew was almost exclusively cultivated by learned Jews, especially those who followed the Moorish rule, such as Eben Ezra (d. 1170), David Kimchi, Moses Maimonides (d. 1204). Even the greatest scholastic divines knew nothing of Hebrew. After the revival of letters, some Christians began to learn it from Jewish rabbis. Reuchlin (d. 1522), the uncle of Melanchthon, is the father of modern Hebrew learning in the
HEBREW LANGUAGE.

Christian Church. He wrote a Hebrew grammar (1506), coined most of the technical terms which have since been in use in Hebrew grammars (*status absolutus, affixum, verba quiescentia, etc.), and in the direction of the Halle school in Germany. The Reformers cultivated and highly recommended the study of Hebrew; and the Protestant translations of the Bible were made directly from the original languages, and not from the Vulgate. During the seventeenth century, Buxtorf (father and son) of Basel, Louis Cappel of Saumur, and Salomon Glausius of Jena, were the most prominent Hebrew and Talmudic scholars. In the present century, Wilhelm Gesenius, professor in Halle (1786-1842), and Heinrich Ewald, professor in Göttingen (1803-79), created a new epoch in the study of Hebrew. Rödiger, Hupfeld, Hitzig, Fiiirst, Delitzsch, and others are prominent in this department of learning. In our own country, Moses Stuart (1773), created a new epoch in the study of Hebrew. Union Seminary, New York (d. 1863), James Rodiger, Hupfeld, Hitzig, Fiiirst, Delitzsch, and others are prominent in this department of learning. In our own country, Moses Stuart of Andover (d. 1852), Edward Robinson of Harvard, New York (d. 1859), Bush, Conant, and Green deserve special mention as Hebrew scholars. (See Schub in Johnson's Cyclopaedia.)

HEBREW POETRY will be considered in this article in three aspects,—the national, biblical, and technical. The first two have to do with the contents, character, and history of Hebrew poetry; the last with its form.

I. National. — As with other peoples, so among the Hebrews, poetry precedes prose. In the Bible we have record of many events which were embodied in popular songs. In this way the national heart was fired by the stories of Samson and the Philistines (Judg. xv. 18) and of David and Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 7). But there were longer poems which described battles and victories, such as Num. xii. 27-30, and, above all, Deborah's ode (Judg. v.), the crown of the patriotic poetry of Israel, and the oldest long Hebrew poem which has come down to us. Domestic histories furnished descriptive poems: so the sad fate of Jephthah's daughter was commemorated by the virgins of Gilgal (Judg. xi.), the rape by the Benjaminites of the virgins of Shiloh (Judg. xxvi.). The finding of a fountain was the occasion of a new song (Num. xxi. 17). Abandoned women used singing to promote their ends (Isa. xxxii. 15). Singing, and playing upon instruments of music, formed prominent parts of public worship (2 Sam. vi. 15; Ps. lxi. 22). The art of poetry was taught in the schools, and the orators and prophets were poets. Thus all times and occasions—love and beauty in peace, skill and daring in war—yielded materials to the poet, and naturally told their tale in verse. When the history of Hebrew literature comes to be written, the many beautiful poems will be properly estimated.

Many attempts have been made to divide Hebrew poetry into varieties, according to its peculiarities; but all such attempts must necessarily be uncertain, because we have but a single species in 'sufficient quantity to be a standard, and the judgment can never be general. Still less successful must ever be the attempt to subject Hebrew poetry to the classifications usual with classic and modern poetry. The chief characteristics of Hebrew (or, more generally, of Semitic) poetry are these. 1. Subjectivity. The Hebrew poet deals only with what concerns him personally: hence there is no epic or drama, because these require objectivity. 2. Sententiousness. There is properly no beginning or end, no progress; so that the stanzas might be arranged differently without affecting the meaning of the poem in any way. 3. Sensuousness. In proof recall the imagery from the animal world,—the symbolism, the personifications, the very anthropomorphisms, which we find at times offensive, but which were innate with the Hebrew. Hebrew poetry was at first, of course, composed and repeated without recourse to writing; but after a time anthologies were compiled. Two such collections must have been very early made; for we find in Num. xxii. 34 and xxiii. 8 allusion to the "Book of the wars of Jehovah." and in Josh. x. 18 one to the "Book of Jaazer." Cf. 2 Sam. i. 18.
HEBREW POETRY.

II. BIBLICAL. — It is grossly wrong to call the Old Testament a "codex of Hebrew national literature," but it is certainly a reading and school book of religion, compiled with this design from the extant literature. In the collection, Jewish scholars name three books as poetical, Job, Psalms, and Proverbs, and have given these a peculiar accentuation. But, besides these, the Song of Solomon and Lamentations should be so designated; and in the other books are frequent passages of poetry, compiled with an eye, and run the gamut of feeling. Joy and sorrow, personal and national events in a mediative rather than lyrical manner, are to be read rather than sung. So, the lines two and two, ab—ccl (Isa. xliii. 4), or far (cf. Ps. xix. 8 sq.) it becomes ions; or it

3. Parallelism, or the regular placing side by side of symmetrically constructed clauses, is not so much a feature of Hebrew poetry as its very nature. The symmetry is, however, ideal rather than external, lying in the relation of the expression to the thought; so that the last furnishes grace, however, they came short.

The word יָדָה, which we translate "didactic poetry," comes from a root meaning "to compare." Hence יָדָה is primarily a comparison of any sort. It designates in the Bible (1) a fable (Judg. ix. 7 sqq.; 2 Kings xiv. 9 sqq.). (2) A parable (2 Sam. xii. 1 sqq.; Isa. v. 1 sqq.), and also an allegory (Ezek. xvii. 2 sqq., xxiv. 8 sqq.). (3) An apothegm, maxim, and proverb, three species which the Hebrews did not clearly distinguish.

In the majority of cases, there are in these real comparisons expressed in parallel clauses: for this phenomenon is recorded even in 1 Sam. x. 12; Ezek. xviii. 2. (4) A riddle which rests upon a comparison. (5) A satire (Isa. xiv. 4 [cf. marg.]; Hab. ii. 6). (6) A didactic poem proper (cf. Ps. xlix. 4, lxviii. 2). To this last classification belong many of the Psalms which the lyric. In Job, didactic, called by the words "N? and in???re treat of personal and national events in a mediative rather than lyrical fashion, and which therefore are to be read rather than sung. So, also, the first part of Proverbs, as well as Job and Ecclesiastes. In regard to Job it should be said, that it is in outline an epic, in form a dialogue (not a drama). In poetic beauty it rivals the best Hebrew lyrics; but in intention it is a didactic poem, wherein a private history is related, whose teachings are brought out. Ecclesiastes has far less claim to be called poetical on account of its proverbial character.

III. TECHNICAL.—Hebrew poetry, as was to be expected, contains many words not found in prose, but is distinguished from the latter chiefly, of course, by its structure. 1. Modern Jewish poetry proves the capacity of Hebrew for rhyme; but there are no rhymes, properly speaking, in the Hebrew Scriptures: what appear to be such (cf. Gen. iv. 28 sqq.; Ps. viii. 5; Isa. xxxiii. 32) are not intentionally so. It is, however, to be remarked in this connection, that assonance is an occasional feature of Hebrew poetry (cf. Ps. cxxiv.; Lam. v.), but no law of the poetry any more than alliteration, which is also found (cf. Isa. vii. 7, xxxix. 6; Jer. xiv. 1 sqq.; Ezek. ii. 11). 2. The text of the poetry is divided into short sections (verses) and longer sections (strophes). The verses are independent parts of speech, and the chief characteristics of Hebrew poetry. They are regularly two lines, occasionally three. Several verses make up the strophe. Homogeneity in form and number of verses is essential to a strophe's construction. Externally it is simply marked by the refrain, or the repetition of the concluding verse (cf. Ps. xlii.—xliii., lxxv.; Ps. vii. 7 sqq.; Amos i., ii); or the alphabetical beginning, which is, however, not exactly technical, so that either verse and strophe fall together (Ps. xxv., xxxiv., cxxiv.; Prov. xxx. 1 sqq.; Lam. i., ii., iv.), or not (Ps. ix.—x., xxxvii.) or inside the strophe the alphabetic order is repeated (Ps. cxxix.), or even within the verse (Ps. cxxi., cxxii.; Lam. iii.). Internally, however, the strophe rounds itself off with a thought, and by means of the mutual reference of the particular parts of the poem (Exod. xv.; Ps. ii., lxviii., civ., cxxiv.).

3. Parallelism, or the regular placing side by side of symmetrically constructed clauses, is not so much a feature of Hebrew poetry as its very nature. The symmetry is, however, ideal rather than external, lying in the relation of the expression to the thought; so that the last furnishes grace, however, they came short.

The word יָדָה, which we translate "didactic poetry," comes from a root meaning "to compare." Hence יָדָה is primarily a comparison of any sort. It designates in the Bible (1) a fable (Judg. ix. 7 sqq.; 2 Kings xiv. 9 sqq.). (2) A parable (2 Sam. xii. 1 sqq.; Isa. v. 1 sqq.), and also an allegory (Ezek. xvii. 2 sqq., xxiv. 8 sqq.). (3) An apothegm, maxim, and proverb, three species which the Hebrews did not clearly distinguish.

In the majority of cases, there are in these real comparisons expressed in parallel clauses: for this phenomenon is recorded even in 1 Sam. x. 12; Ezek. xviii. 2. (4) A riddle which rests upon a comparison. (5) A satire (Isa. xiv. 4 [cf. marg.]; Hab. ii. 6). (6) A didactic poem proper (cf. Ps. xlix. 4, lxviii. 2). To this last classification belong many of the Psalms which the lyric. In Job, didactic, called by the words "N? and in???re treat of personal and national events in a mediative rather than lyrical fashion, and which therefore are to be read rather than sung. So, also, the first part of Proverbs, as well as Job and Ecclesiastes. In regard to Job it should be said, that it is in outline an epic, in form a dialogue (not a drama). In poetic beauty it rivals the best Hebrew lyrics; but in intention it is a didactic poem, wherein a private history is related, whose teachings are brought out. Ecclesiastes has far less claim to be called poetical on account of its proverbial character.

III. TECHNICAL.—Hebrew poetry, as was to be expected, contains many words not found in prose, but is distinguished from the latter chiefly, of course, by its structure. 1. Modern Jewish poetry proves the capacity of Hebrew for rhyme; but there are no rhymes, properly speaking, in the Hebrew Scriptures: what appear to be such (cf. Gen. iv. 28 sqq.; Ps. viii. 5; Isa. xxxiii. 32) are not intentionally so. It is, however, to be remarked in this connection, that assonance is an occasional feature of Hebrew poetry (cf. Ps. cxxiv.; Lam. v.), but no law of the poetry any more than alliteration, which is also found (cf. Isa. vii. 7, xxxix. 6; Jer. xiv. 1 sqq.; Ezek. ii. 11). 2. The text of the poetry is divided into short sections (verses) and longer sections (strophes). The verses are independent parts of speech, and the chief characteristics of Hebrew poetry. They are regularly two lines, occasionally three. Several verses make up the strophe. Homogeneity in form and number of verses is essential to a strophe's construction. Externally it is simply marked by the refrain, or the repetition of the concluding verse (cf. Ps. xlii.—xliii., lxxv.; Ps. vii. 7 sqq.; Amos i., ii); or the alphabetical beginning, which is, however, not exactly technical, so that either verse and strophe fall together (Ps. xxv., xxxiv., cxxiv.; Prov. xxx. 1 sqq.; Lam. i., ii., iv.), or not (Ps. ix.—x., xxxvii.) or inside the strophe the alphabetic order is repeated (Ps. cxxix.), or even within the verse (Ps. cxxi., cxxii.; Lam. iii.). Internally, however, the strophe rounds itself off with a thought, and by means of the mutual reference of the particular parts of the poem (Exod. xv.; Ps. ii., lxviii., civ., cxxiv.).

3. Parallelism, or the regular placing side by side of symmetrically constructed clauses, is not so much a feature of Hebrew poetry as its very nature. The symmetry is, however, ideal rather than external, lying in the relation of the expression to the thought; so that the last furnishes grace, however, they came short.

The word יָדָה, which we translate "didactic poetry," comes from a root meaning "to compare." Hence יָדָה is primarily a comparison of any sort. It designates in the Bible (1) a fable (Judg. ix. 7 sqq.; 2 Kings xiv. 9 sqq.). (2) A parable (2 Sam. xii. 1 sqq.; Isa. v. 1 sqq.), and also an allegory (Ezek. xvii. 2 sqq., xxiv. 8 sqq.). (3) An apothegm, maxim, and proverb, three species which the Hebrews did not clearly distinguish.

In the majority of cases, there are in these real comparisons expressed in parallel clauses: for this phenomenon is recorded even in 1 Sam. x. 12; Ezek. xviii. 2. (4) A riddle which rests upon a comparison. (5) A satire (Isa. xiv. 4 [cf. marg.]; Hab. ii. 6). (6) A didactic poem proper (cf. Ps. xlix. 4, lxviii. 2). To this last classification belong many of the Psalms which the lyric. In Job, didactic, called by the words "N? and in???re treat of personal and national events in a mediative rather than lyrical fashion, and which therefore are to be read rather than sung. So, also, the first part of Proverbs, as well as Job and Ecclesiastes. In regard to Job it should be said, that it is in outline an epic, in form a dialogue (not a drama). In poetic beauty it rivals the best Hebrew lyrics; but in intention it is a didactic poem, wherein a private history is related, whose teachings are brought out. Ecclesiastes has far less claim to be called poetical on account of its proverbial character.
these otherwise infinitely diversified forms are interchanged in most poems, and are arbitrarily mingled, and it is just this mingling which contributes to the poetic gradation. In the first four elegies of Jeremiah's Lamentations, and in many of the later Psalms, the elaborate structure is best seen.

The Hebrew poetry does not admit of scanning, and the assertion of Josephus that it was written in metre was wide of the truth. There was, however, more to it than parallelisms and strophes; viz., rhythm. But, as we have no knowledge of the ancient Hebrew pronunciation, we cannot read Hebrew poetry rhythmically.

HEBREWS, Epistle to the. Title. — This simple name, which does not signify much, must always serve as the designation of one of the most important doctrinal writings of the New Testament. Neither the tradition of the early Church, nor the results of critical investigation, are of such a nature as to justify us in ascribing it with certainty to any definite author. Nor has there come down any notice of the circle of readers for whom it was written, which is worthy of much consideration beyond the superscription and closing designation πρὸς Ἐφεσίας ("to the Hebrews"). This title dates back to the time of its first circulation in connection with the other books of the New Testament; and about the year 200 it was used equally by churches which held different views about its authorship and its relation to the canon; as, for example, by the Alexandrian Church and the African Church (Tertullian, De pudic., 20). The assertion has been made that the Epistle sometimes bore the title πρὸς Λαοδikeias ("to the Laodiceans"). It is based upon the very insufficient ground, that, in the Codex Bærentianus, the text breaks off at the close of Philemon with the words, "Here begins the Epistle to the Laodiceans." Philaster, who states that an Epistle to the Laodiceans was ascribed to Paul, has been appealed to for this view, but wrongly; for he distinctly says that the Church read thirteen epistles by Paul, and that at times the Epistle to the Hebrews, which was regarded as identical with the Epistle to the Laodiceans, is made all the more improbable by the fact that the Western Church did not regard the former as of Pauline origin, and, on the other hand, possessed an Epistle to the Laodiceans, under the name of Paul. It has also been regarded by some as being identical with the Epistle to the Alexandrians, mentioned in the Muratorian canon; but the erroneousness of this view has been fully exposed by Hesse (D. muratori. Fragment, pp. 201—222). The title πρὸς Ἐφεσίας ("to the Hebrews") is therefore to be looked upon as having been associated with the Epistle from the very earliest times.

Readers, and Date of Composition. — The term "Hebrews" does not limit the persons addressed to Hebrew-speaking Jews, in contrast to Hellenists, or the Jews that spoke Greek. The fact that the Epistle was written in Greek is evidence against this view; but the persons addressed were evidently of Hebrew birth. It is probable that it was not directed to the whole body of Jewish Christians, but to a particular congregation living in a definite locality; and the fact that the title refers, not to a place, but to the nationality of the readers, is to be explained by a distinction between the Hebrew and Gentile Christians in the locality where the persons addressed lived.

The opinion that the Epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians does not rest upon such passages as i. 1 (comp. 1 Cor. x. 1) or ii. 10 (comp. Rom. iv. 11—18), but upon the circumstance that the author regards his readers as the successors of pre-Christian Israel (iv. 1—9, vi. 12 sqq., viii. 7 sqq.), and that, while recognizing the universal efficacy of Christ's death (ii. 8, 15), he speaks of it only as its atoning power for the Jews, and left power for the Gentiles who were evidently of Hebrew birth (ix. 5—10). This also follows from the exhortation to the Jews in xiii. 13, and, above all, from the opinions and tendencies which the whole Epistle combats. Its aim is not to present the "advantages of Christianity over Judaism" (Reuss, etc.), but to serve as a practical exhortation (xii. 22). This design becomes apparent in the solemn warning of ii. 1—4, which is based upon the doctrinal discussion of chap. i. Throughout the Epistle the doctrinal treatment is merely made the basis of practical exhortations. The readers who are in danger of a complete apostasy from the Christian faith are warned against the destruction which would follow upon a disregard of the proclamation of salvation (ii. 1—3, xii. 25), and exhorted to hold fast to the profession of their faith (iii. 1, iv. 14) and to the hope of the final glory (iii. 6, etc.). Those Israelites who believed in Jesus gain incomparably more than they lose by giving up Judaism; for Christ does perfectly, by his death and ascension, the work which the high priests of the Old Testament only typified (iv. 14—x. 18). The opinion which regards the readers as still taking part in the ordinances of the temple, and believing these were necessary to the forgiveness of sins (Bleek, Lünemann, Riehm), is at variance with the assertion that they had proved their faith by sufferings and works of charity (xii. 14, vi. 10, x. 22, 32). If this were the case, and their faith was not a proof of the author's having written for the view that the readers were observing the Mosaic ritual, he would not have spoken of the original purity of their faith (xiii. 7), but have emphasized the necessity of a departure from the temple ritual, which he does not do, not even in xiii. 13. There is no trace of evidence in the Epistle for the view that the readers were observing the temple ritual, or were in danger of falling back again into such observance.
HEBREWS.

As regards the locality in which the readers resided, four places have been specially thought of—Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome. The following considerations tell against the first three suppositions, and in favor of the last. The Epistle could not have been written to the Church in Jerusalem, for it had been from the beginning the teacher of others (Acta vii. 4, xi. 19; Rom. xv. 27); but of these "Hebrews" this is particularly deniety (x. 12). Nor did the Christians of Jerusalem "minister unto the saints" by works of charity (vi. 10), but, on the contrary, were the recipients of charity. The "Hebrews," then, of the Epistle, were such as aided the Church of Jerusalem by contributions. The hypothesis of an Alexandrine circle of readers has been vigorously defended by Wieseler, who has attempted to show that the temple at Leontopolis satisfied the descriptions of the temple ritual as given in the Epistle, even in those points where they seem to be inconsistent with the ritual of the temple at Jerusalem. These inconsistencies, such as the high priest's offering up of daily sacrifices (vii. 27), are assumed, but cannot be made out. But the main support of the hypothesis is based upon the assumption that Philo gives an account of the schismatic temple services at Leontopolis. But this is not only at variance with his known reverence for the temple at Jerusalem, but with the fact that he describes in enthusiastic language the ritual of the temple prescribed by the law, as being observed in his day. On the other hand, the Epistle itself (vii. 5, ix. 1—8) speaks of the ritual of Moses, but not of a temple and ritual existing and observed at the time of composition. The Antioch hypothesis has been revived by Hofmann, and is based upon historical coincidences (ii. 3, v. 12, vi. 10; comp. Acts xi. 19 sqq., xii. 25.—Jer. 1). But it cannot be shown that a Hebrew Christian congregation existed there against sixty years after Paul's triumphant conflicts with Jewish assailants, and such as is described in our Epistle. The most probable theory was first proposed by Wetstein, and places the readers of the Epistle in Italy; but there must have been a large number of Hebrew Christians in the Roman Church (comp. Col. iv. 11; Phil. i. 14 sqq.), to whom the title "Hebrews" might properly be applied. The supposition that the Epistle was addressed to this smaller circle explains the double use of the word "Hebrew" (xvi. 6, 11), and diverges against substantially the same tendencies as Heb. xiii. 9; and in Rom. ix. 1-11 views are controverted which might easily develop into such as are brought to our notice in the Epistle to the Hebrews. This theory agrees well with the fact that the oldest Christian authors of Rome, as Clement and Hermas (comp. my Hirt des Hermes, pp. 439 sqq.), were largely influenced by the perusal of our Epistle. The readers themselves are described as having passed through a "great conflict of sufferings" (x. 32); which refers to the persecution of Nero (54-68), and not to that of Domitian (98-117). In the latter case, the composition of the Epistle would fall far down in the second century ("former days," x. 32),—a date utterly inconsistent with the use Clement and Hermas made of it, and with its theological character. But if the letter was written to the Hebrew Christians of Rome, and the persecution of x. 33 is identical with that of the year 64, the date cannot, on account of the expression "former days" (x. 32), be placed before 70, but may with tolerable accuracy be set down in 80. The use of the present tense in referring to the temple ritual (v. 1 sqq., vii. 4, ix. 6, etc.) proves nothing, as it was natural to use this tense for a theoretical description of the temple, based upon the description of the law, and as it is used in the same connection by Josephus, Clement of Rome (ad Cor., 40, 41), and in the Talmud. The consideration which has been frequently urged, that, had the author written after the destruction of Jerusalem, he would have used that event as an argument in viii. 13, would only be of value if it were proved that the readers were in danger of reverting to Judaism.

The Epistle was not written before the destruction of Jerusalem, in the year 70, emphasize, and justly, the constant use of the present tense in referring to the temple (v. 1, viii. 4, ix. 6, etc.) as still standing, and its ritual as being still observed. The past tense is otherwise frequently employed when the context is between the law and Christ (vii. 10, ix. 1, 18, etc.). The date is placed by Lardner, Davidson, and Schaff, in 63; Lange (Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, 1st ed.), Stuart, Tholuck, and Wieseler, in 64; Dr. Kay (Speaker's Commentary), in 65; De Wette, Riehm, and Ewald, in 65-67; Conybeare and Howison, in 68; and Clement of Alexandria attempts to explain... his reasons for not introducing himself to his readers, as was his usual custom. Origen likewise ascribes the Pauline authorship, but he recognizes that only a few churches besides the Alexandrine accepted this view. Ireneæus (Eus., v. 20) and his pupil Hippolytus (Phot. Cod., 232, comp. 121), and the whole Church of the West, until after the beginning of the fourth century, denied the Barnabine authorship. The tradition of the African Church (also reaching back to the second century) was that Barnabas was the author; and this view is expressly advocated by Tertullian (Erat. enim et Barnabæ titulus alius. Hebræos, v. 20), and the whole Church of the West, until after the beginning of the fourth century, favored the names of Barnabas or Paul. Dr. Bleek, and that the names of Paul and Barnabas were mere conjectures. For this reason, Luther, Bleek, Lünemann, Hilgenfeld, and [Alford] have associated Apollos with the Epistle; but the latter is purely conjectural, and has far less in favor than the names of Barnabas or Paul. Of these two Barnabas is to be preferred, and for the following reasons. (1) The hypothesis that Paul was the author was as easy for the Church of Alexandria as that of Barnabas was difficult for the Church of Africa. As the name of Paul had been inserted before the Epistles from ἡμῶν ἐκ τῆς ἑρμηνείας συν αὐτοῖς “to the Romans,” “to the Hebrews”) Clement’s second Epistle to the Corinthians experienced a similar fate. (2) The Barnabas tradition might be more easily lost in the other parts of the Church than in the African, especially in the Alexandrine Church, which possessed a letter of similar import, which wrongly went under the name of Barnabas. This latter fact may easily be explained if we assume that there still remained a dim recollection of, for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen. (3) The style, the statement in ii. 3, 4, where the author speaks of himself as having heard the gospel of salvation from the disciples of Jesus (cf. Gal. i. 7; Rom. xvi. 25), and the absence of the usual salutation, must have been written by the Epistle itself was addressed to Rome, then the Occidental tradition is to be preferred, and the supposition becomes probable that the African Church, always dependent upon the Roman as regards tradition, received the opinion that Barnabas was the author, from Rome itself. It becomes probable that Barnabas visited Rome (comp. Heb. xii. 19), not only from the statement in the Clementine Recognitions (i. 7–11), but especially from the fact that Paul found Mark in Rome (Col. iv. 10), whither Barnabas may have accompanied him from Cyprus (Acts xvi. 39).

HEBREWS, Gospel according to the. See APOCYPHYPA, p. 106.

HEBRON (friendship), a town of Palestine, situated about midway between Jerusalem and Beer-sheba, at an elevation of about three thousand feet above the sea, is one of the oldest cities in the world, built seven years before Tanis in Egypt (Num. xiii. 22). It is often mentioned in Old-Testament history, from the time of Abraham to the period of the Maccabees. By the Romans it was destroyed, but rebuilt during the middle ages, and the seat of a Christian bishop from 1167 to 1187, when it fell into the hands of Saladin. At present it numbers about ten thousand inhabitants, and is a hotbed of Mohammedan fanaticism. Its mosque stands over the cave of Machpeleth, the burial-place of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but it is closed against non-Mohammedans. There is not a Christian family in the town, but about five hundred Jews.

HECKEWELDER, John Gottlieb Ernestus, Moravian missionary; b. in Bedford, Eng., March 12, 1749; d. in Bethlehem, Penn., Jan. 31, 1823. He emigrated to America, 1754, and labored for many years among the Indians in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan, in connection with David Zeisberger (see art.). From 1788 till 1810 he was agent of the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen. From 1810 till his death he lived quietly in Bethlehem, preparing his two books, An Account of the History, Manners, and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania and the Neighbouring States (Phila., 1818), and A Narrative of the United Brethren among the Delaware and Hoscegan Indians (1740-1809) (Philadelphia, 1821). Rondthaler: Life of Heckewelder, Phila., 1847.

HEDIO, Kaspar, b. at Ettingen, in Baden, 1494; d. at Strassburg, Oct. 17, 1553; studied at Freiburg and Basel, and was appointed court-preacher to the elector of Mayence in 1520, and in 1523 preacher at the Cathedral of Strassburg, where he labored assiduously for the introduction of the Reformation. He translated Eusebius and parts of Ambrosius, Augustine, etc.; edited the Chronicon Urupergense, and continued it from 1280 to 1537; and wrote a Chronicon Germanicum till 1545. His proper name was Heid.

HEDWIG, St., the wife of Duke Henry of Silesia and Poland, to whom she bore six children, devoted the last forty years of her life to the severest asceticism, and entered, after the death of her husband (in 1298), the convent of Trebsin, where she died Oct. 15, 1248. She was canonized in 1286, and her festival is celebrated in the Roman Church on Oct. 17. HEERBRAND, Jakob, b. at Giengen, in Suabia, Aug. 12, 1521; d. at Tubingen, May 22, 1600; studied at Ulm and Wittenberg, and was appoint-HEERMANN, Johann, b. at Ranten, Silesia, Oct. 11, 1585; d. at Koben, Feb. 17, 1647; a Protestant pastor, who in 1630 published a volume of hymns (Devoti Musicus Cordis), of which many are still in use in Germany, and some have been translated into English in Miss Winkworth's Lyra Germanica, and Schaff's Christ in Song, New York, 1869.

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, b. at Stuttgart, Aug. 27, 1770; d. in Berlin, Nov. 14, 1831. He studied theology at Tübingen 1788-89; and lived as a private tutor, first at Bern 1789-96, then at Frankfort 1797-1801. In 1801 he settled at Jena as lecturer on philosophy in the university, and Schelling's co-editor of the Kritische Journal der Philosophie. He was at that time fully agreed with Schelling. Their journal, of which he wrote the larger part, was the organ of the system of identity,—a philosophy which attempted to represent matter and mind, nature and spirit, world and God, as identical. But a system of Schelling, this identity was a play of the imagination rather than a logical ratiocination, "shot from a pistol," rather than developed with spontaneous necessity; and when Schelling went to Würzburg in 1803, and the charm of the personal intercourse faded away, Hegel left the track and chose his own way, though the general direction of his thought continued the same. After the battle of Jena (1806), he removed to Bamberg, where for some time he edited the Bamberger Zeitung. The occupation was exceedingly modest, but at the same time he published in his Phänomenologie des Geistes, a book which in wealth of ideas has no equal. From 1808 to 1816 he was a schoolmaster, director of the Agi- dien gymnasium at Nuremberg, and there he married in 1810, and published his Philosophische Grundlage der Logik, which latter work forms the foundation of his whole system, and is as deep and as forbidding as any cellar can be. In 1816 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, and in 1818 he was removed to Berlin; but in Berlin he published only his Phänomenologie des Rechts (his weakest work), and essays in the Jahrbücher für wissenschaftliche Kritik. After his death, his works were edited, in eighteen large volumes, by an association of friends, after his own notes and those of his hearers. Translated into English are The Subjective Logic (by Sibree and Wallou, 1853), Philosophy of History (by Sibree, 1857), the Logic, from the Encyclopædie (1874), large selections from his works in the Journal of Speculative Philosophy (edited by W. T. Harris, L.-V., St. Louis, 1887-71). His masterpieces are Phänomenologie, from the positive, through the negative, to the absolute. But this method is as acceptable to ecstatic mysticism as to radical rationalism. In the dispute which was caused by the split, the style came to play a curious but significant part. Hegel's style is an almost noiseless, almost colorless stream of molten steel, dangerous to touch. Racy expressions, pithy sayings, even bursts of lofty eloquence, occur; but they have no value as quotations. The word which stands for an idea, and not merely runs an errand in the sentence, never means the same in Hegel's writings as it means in other people's writings. Hegel said himself, "If you will understand my ideas, you must first understand my system." In the same sense it may be said, that while in other people's writings the reader begins by understanding the words, and thence reaches to the understanding of the book, in Hegel's writings you must understand the book before you can understand the words. Hence the reason why no amount of interpretation and explanation has been able to decide any thing with respect to what Hegel really meant. The whole dispute between the two factions of his school has been a mere waste, more liable to confound the student than capable of illustrating the author.

The right wing of the Hegelian school is in the theology represented by Daub, Marheineke, Göschel, Martensen; the left, by D. F. Strauss, F. C. Baur, Schlegel. Hegelian religious, Hegel defines as truth, but in the lowest form in which truth can be held by the human mind. In Christianity this form of truth has found its highest, its absolute expression, having passed through the stages of one-sided objectivity and one-sided subjectivity in the ante-Christian religions. On the first stage God is considered an object, at art of nature, a natural being (Lamaism, Buddhism, Branism); on the second he is considered as subject, wholly distinguished from nature (Judaism, Greek and Roman polytheism); but only in Christianity he becomes—true spirit. The Hegelian idea, however, of God as spirit, is some- (for instance, with respect to the question of personality); and the specifically Christian question,
HEGESIPPUS. 950

From a notice in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., 4, 22) it has been inferred that he considered the Mosaic law as an indispensable part of Christianity. From another notice in Photius (Bibl., c. 232) it has been inferred that he did not recognize the apostle Paul; and from these inferences still further and very far-reaching inferences have been drawn by Schwegler and, in a more considerate way, by Hilgenfeld, with respect to the Jewish character of the primitive Christian Church. But these propositions are untenable. The first notice does not speak of the Mosaic law in particular, but of the general unity of the Old and New Testament revelation. The second notice does not speak of the apostle Paul, but of a whole party; viz., the Gnostics. To recognize the congregation of Corinth and the Epistle of Clement in the manner in which Hegesippus recognized them, and then reject the apostle Paul, would be an inexplicable self-contradiction.

HEIDANUS, Abraham, b. at Frankenthal, in the Palatinate, Aug. 10, 1597; d. at Leyden, Oct. 15, 1678; studied at Amsterdam and Leyden, and was appointed pastor in the latter city in 1627, and professor in 1647. He was an adherent of Cartesian philosophy, who, in spite of his great caution and circumspection, escaped the censure of the Reformed Church as little as the papal index. From the appearance of his Meditationes (in 1642) an opposition began to form against him in Leyden, and Heidanus finally became its victim. He was discharged in 1675.

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM. The Reformation was rather slow in penetrating into the Palatinate. In 1546 service was celebrated for the first time according to the Lutheran ritual, in the Church of the Holy Spirit at Heidelberg. But in 1522 Otto Heinrich, who was intimately connected with Melanchthon, issued a decree which at once put an end to all papal superstitions. The confession of Augsburg was established as the norm of faith; but the forms of worship were regulated after the Reformed rather than the Lutheran type. Under his successor, Friedrich III. (1559–76), one of the noblest princes of that period, a complete and consistent reform was carried out; and, as the basis of the new organization, the Heidelberg Catechism was adopted.
Zacharias Ursinus and Caspar Olevianus were charged by the elector with drawing up the catechism. The former was professor of systematic theology at the university, the latter preacher at the electoral court of Heidelberg; but both had lived in Geneva and Zurich, and were strongly influenced by the Swiss reformation. As basis for their work they used the catechisms of Calvin erslautern. It was unanimously adopted, and influenced by the Swiss reformation. As basis convention of superintendents assembled at Kaisberg. On May 4 followed a joint address from the count-palatine, Wolfgang of Zweibriicken, Duke Christof of Wurtemberg, and Margrave Karl II. of Baden, accompanied with a piece of sharp criticism inscribed "Verzeichniss d. Menge.
Meanwhile the elector issued a second edition of the catechism with the addition of the famous eightieth question, "What is the difference between the papal mass and the Lord's Supper as instituted by Christ himself?" And on Sept. 14, 1563, followed his answer, probably written by Bullinger, to the "Verzeichniss d. Menge." The three princes assembled Oct. 4 at Ettlingen, and proposed to Friedrich III. to arrange a theological conference; but he declined. After the appearance, however, of the attacks of Flacius, Heshusen, Laur. Albertus, Fr. Baldwin, Brenz, Andrea, and others, and the answers by Ursinus
"Gründlicher Bericht vom heil. Abendmahl" against Flacius, and "Antwort auf etlicher Theologen Cen-urz against Brenz and Andrea, and by Olevianus (Predigten), the elector decided to accept the invitation; and the conference took place at Maulbronn, April 10–15, 1564. The last attack on the catechism was directed against the elector personally at the diet of Augsburg, 1569. He was even threatened with deposition; but he defended himself with such a nobleness, that the matter was dropped.
Having gone through this ordeal, the success of the book began. It was introduced in Julich, Cleve, Berg, and the Mark, where, from 1568, every ecclesiastical was compelled to take the oath on it. It was also introduced in Hesse, Anhalt, Brandenburg, and Bremen; but its home it found in the Netherlands, where it was formally adopted in 1568. The Reformed Churches of Hungary, Transylvania, and Poland, also adopted it: and in 1579 the synod of Dort officially declared it one of the said church, the Syrian. It was introduced in Germany, and in several places in Germany and Holland.

LIT. — The text of the catechism is found in the collections of symbolical books by Niemeyer (Leipzig, 1840); Hepp (Elberfeld, 1860); and Philip Schaff (New York, 1871). Special additions have been published by Philip Schaff:
D. Heidelberg Katak. nach der ersten Aug. von 1568
(of which only two copies are known to exist), Philadelphia, 1863 (2 ed., 1869), accompanied with critical notes and an historical survey. The Heidelberg Catechism in German, Latin, and English, with an Hist. Introduction (by J. W. Nevin),
New York, 1863; and A. Walters, Bonn, 1864.

For the history and dogmatic exposition of the book, see, besides the works of the two authors, VAN ALPN: Geschichte und Literatur d. K.
Frankfort, 1800, 3 vols.; J. W. NEVIN: History and Genius of the Heidelberg Catechism, Chambersburg, Penn., 1845; H. CHAMPENDAL: Examen critique des cah. de Luther, Calvin, Heidelberg, etc., Geneva, 1858; G. W. BETHUNE: Expository Lectures on the Heidelberg Catechism, New York, 1864, 2 vols.; Tercentenary Monument, Chambersburg and Philadelphia, 1863.

GUDEL.

HEINEMSG. See Gregor von Heimburg.

HEINECIIUS (HEINECK), Johann Michael,
b. at Eisenberg, Dec. 12, 1674; d. at Halle, Sept.
11, 1722; studied at Jena and Giessen, and was appointed lecturer of Gose1 1699, pastor at Halle 1709, and consistorial inspector of the Saalecircle 1720. His work on the history of the Greek Church, old and new (Leipzig, 1711), is based on the great collections of materials made by Petrus Aurelius, Leo Allius, Richard Simon, and others, and is still of value. He also wrote some learned essays on the history of Gose1, the house of Brandenburg, etc.

HELDING, Michael. See Sintonus.

HELENA, St., the wife of Constantius Chlorus, and the mother of Constantine the Great. Very little is known with certainty of her life. Gloucester in England, Naisius in Upper Mosia, and Drepanum on the Gulf of Nicomedia, claim to be her birthplace. A church in Rome, another in Venice, and the monastery of Hautvilliers, near Rheims, claim to possess her remains.
Some say she was a British princess; others, a servant-girl in a wayside inn. She was repudiated for political reasons by her husband, but held in great honor by her son. She was a Christian; and the study of the legends (see Cross, Invention of) which have clustered around her name forms an interesting parallel to the history of the worship of Mary. See Act. Sonet. May

HELENA.
HELIAND, sometimes known as the "Old Saxon Harmony of the Gospels," is a poetical life of Christ, composed in the first half of the ninth century by an Anglo-Saxon Poet. He who desired to effect the peaceful conversion of the Old Saxons by substituting religious poems for the warlike lays previously in vogue. It may be described as a Christian epic, containing nearly six thousand lines, and based on the Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Gospels, compiled by Tatianus, and to a less degree upon the commentaries of Hraban, Bede, and Alcuin. Though the author, whose name is unknown, must have been a man of learning, and in all probability an ecclesiastical, the composition is distinctly popular in tone; and its rendering of the gospel history, while adhering closely to the statements of the evangelists, is strongly colored by the Teutonic imagination. Christ is represented as a beneficent ruler, to whom his apostles stand in the relation of thanes, or earls, to their king; he possesses the titles, and discharges the functions, of the ideal Germanic chieftain; and it is through his person, as the central figure who occupies our attention from the beginning to the close, that the stamp of unity is impressed upon the poem. The style is vigorous, at times picturesque, and always abounding in the formulae and epithets of the older poetry.

The Helian may be but a fragment of a larger whole, comprising extended portions of the Old and New Testaments, paraphrastically rendered into alliterative verse; and indeed Professor Sievers of Jena has advanced strong arguments to prove that vers. 235—851 of the Genesis attributed to Caedmon are nothing but a translation from an old Saxon original by the author of the Helian.

However that may be, the Helian has much in common with the Anglo-Saxon religious poetry. The Anglo-Saxon missionaries who labored on the Continent doubtless disseminated a knowledge of Caedmon's poems among their converts and ecclesiastical brethren; and it would be unavoidable, that, when one of the latter undertook the composition of a religious epic, he should respect not only the poetical traditions of his own country, but those current among his teachers and spiritual guides.

In this connection it is significant that of the two manuscripts, one of which is preserved in the British Museum and the other in the Munich Library, the former is believed to have been copied by an Anglo-Saxon scribe.

This poem was first published by J. A. Schmeller, Munich, 1830; and its edition is still of great value: other editions are by KÖNE (Münster, 1855), HEYNS (2d ed., Paderborn, 1873), RÜCKERT (Leipzig, 1876), and SIEVERS (Halle, 1876). There are translations into German by SIEVERS (2d ed., Berlin, 1876) and GROS, improved ed., Cassel, 1889. Among the essays of most interest may be mentioned the following:

HELIODORUS, minister of the Syrian king, Seleucus IV. Philopator, 187-175 B.C.; was sent to Jerusalem to enforce the surrender of the temple-treasure. In spite of warning given, he entered the temple, but was, according to 2 Macc. iii. 6-40, thrown to the ground by a fearful apparition, and restored only on the intercession of the high priest Onias. 4 Macc. iv. 4, which narrates the same event, mentions Apollonius, Syrian governor of Cœle-syria, instead of Heliodorus.

HELIODORUS, Bishop of Tricca in Thessaly, originated, according to Socrates (Hist. Eccl., 5, 22), the custom, prevailing in Thessaly, of depositing any ecclesiastic, who, after receiving consecration, did not abstain from his wife, in what was also the author of the celebrated Greek romance Æthiopica (comp. E. Rohde: Der griechische Roman, 1876); and Nicephorus adds (in his Hist. Eccl., 12, 34), that a provincial synod, taking offence of this authorship, gave Heliodorus the choice between condemning his book, or resigning his position as a bishop. He preferred the last. It is not certain when he lived; probably before the fifth century.

HELIQABALUS, Roman emperor 218-222; was probably b. in 201; a son of the senator VARIUS MARCELLUS. His true name was Varius Avitus Bassianus. He was educated at Emesa in Syria; and by his mother, Julia Soemnia, and grandmother, Julia Moesia, initiated in all the religious fanaticism of the Orient. Elected high priest of the sun-god of Emesa, he assumed his name (Elagabal, ژلاو ژ); and by his beauty, his magnificence, and his supposed sonship to Caracalla, he made a deep impression in the Roman camp. By the intrigues of his mother he was proclaimed emperor by the soldiery when he entered Rome. But such an accumulation of debauchery, cruelty, fanaticism (every passion having been stimulated into frenzy), Rome had never seen; and in 222 he and his mother were thrown into the Tiber by the Praetorian guard. During his reign the Christian Church had peace: for his idea of establishing a one-god worship, of mingling all the deities of the Roman Empire together in the worship of the one god El-gabal (God the Creator), — an idea very characteristic of the religious condition of the age, — he had not time to carry out. The principal sources to his life are Dio Cassius, Lampridius, and Herodian.

HELL. 1. In the Old Testament.—The Hebrew word for "hell" is sheol (see art.), to which "Hades" (see art.) in the New Testament corresponds. Our modern word "hell" is not the equivalent for sheol; for, while we associate with "hell" endless suffering, the Hebrew associated with sheol merely ideas of terror and repulsiveness, arising mainly from the mystery and uncertainty which attended the life after death (cf. Job xi. 8; Prov. i. 12; Isa. xxxviii. 10).
HELL.

2. In the New Testament.—"Hell" is the translation in the authorized version of three words in Greek,—Hades, Gehenna, and Tartarus. Hades has been already considered. Gehenna was properly the "hell" of Hebrew conception, and is uniformly so rendered in the revised version. The rebellious angels, and the finally impotent of men, are cast into it (Matt. v. 22; Luke xii. 5). Once the word "Tartarus" is employed (2 Pet. ii. 4), and it is noticeable that neither Paul nor John uses either Hades, Gehenna, or Tartarus, and also, that, of the twelve recurrences of Gehenna, eleven are in our Lord's speeches. Scripture mercifully hides the condition of the lost, and by example forbids prurient curiosity. The way of life is luminous from earth to heaven: the way of death is lost in darkness. See GEHENNA; HADES; SHEOL; PUNISHMENT, FUTURE.

HELL, Christ's Descent into (καταβομάσας εις θάνατον), one of the clauses in the Apostles' Creed, was treated of by the councils of the Church in the East as early as Marcion's time, and is found in the formula of the fourth synod of Sirmium (359). Towards the latter part of the fourth century it formed, according to the testimony of Rufinus (Expos. Aquilej.), 16, a part of the baptismal confession of the Church of Aquileia. But, in the great majority of the baptismal formulas until the sixth century, it was wanting. By the eighth, however, it was universally accepted. Its insertion, therefore, into the creed, was a matter of gradual development. The Greek Church regards the descent into hell as a voluntary passage of Christ's human soul into Hades in order to offer through the preaching of the gospel, redemption to such as were held under the dominion of Satan on account of original sin, and to transfer believers to paradise, especially the saints of the Old Testament (Conf. orth., I. 40). The Roman-Catholic Church holds that the whole divine-human personality of Christ descended to the Limbus patrum, or the place where the saints of Israel were detained, in order to elevate them into eternal life. The interval between the crucifixion and that time he had spent in paradise, to the contemporaries of Noah has been explained of two domains,—paradise, or Abraham's bosom, and the place of torment. The second part of the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, which belongs probably to the fourth century, is known also by the title Descent of Christ to the Underworld, and contains a most curious and fantastic account of these persons as being spirits in pri

HELL.

HELL.

HELL, Punishments of. See PUNISHMENT.

HELLENISTIC IDIOM is the prevailing designation of that mode of speech in use among those Jews who lived among the Greeks, or that peculiar form of the Greek language which it took in the thought and mouth of the Semitic Orient when the two spheres of life began to act upon each other. The former of these definitions, though narrow and historically insufficient, suits our purpose since we know of the subject is not purely philological nor psychological. Similar phenomena can be found elsewhere to instruct in these directions. The influence of religious ideas upon a language unprepared for them may be noticed again and again in the history of Christianity. This particular combination of Jewish thought and Greek language created the form in which the gospel has been made known to the world at large. Thus it is connected with the highest and holiest treasures of human knowledge in a manner which gives it a theological significance, and secures it greater attention than is usually accorded to what is in itself so external.

In the next article [Hellenists] it will be shown that the acquaintance of the Jews with the Greek language was not gained through education or literary study, as was the case, e.g., among the Romans, but resulted from immediate contact in practical life, especially trade. The main object of those thus learning is not to know the peculiar spirit of the foreign tongue, but to gather such a vocabulary as serves their practical purpose of making themselves intelligible in conversing about material and social matters. They seek to obtain readiness in speech, and are more concerned to express themselves definitely than to use correctness of form. Nor should it be forgotten that those who have this aim are not likely to be well educated, and hence are quite content with the imperfect form of their means of communication. Two other weighty circumstances must be noticed. Not only did the Jews rapidly learn the new language, but at the same time they, at least in foreign countries, as quickly forgot their own, and ceased to use it even in the home-life. In a few generations at most, the Greek language was learned, not from the Greeks, but in the Jewish families, as if it had been the mother-tongue. Thus the imperfections, to a certain extent, became parts of this form of speech. Hence we should not class these, or some of the Christian authors of the first century, with the representatives of the Hellenistic idiom, properly so called.

A point often misunderstood in this discussion is the state of the Greek language itself at the time when the Jews adopted it. It was, in consequence of the conquests of Alexander and their results, in process of change; so much so, that attention was aroused, and studies fostered, out of which the science of philology arose. The mass of foreign words introduced in consequence of the geographical extension of the language, affected it very little. Such things rarely do. But the new political organizations, which threw into the background the limited forms of Greece, had also the effect of fusing the provincial dialects into one common universal Greek language, which always occurs when national life triumphs over narrower separating tendencies. In Greece itself the common people still used their own dialect, as in Germany to-day; but in the new cities, where the population was not of the same origin, the so-called common (or koiné) dialect prevailed. The basis of this was the Attic. But a common dialect is of necessity a mixed speech, retaining much that is of local origin, and adding much that is new. The old grammarians have collected for us all these phenomena; and the results are given in our better lexicons, especially those of the New Testament. A Macedonian element is also discoverable: at least, we find certain things appearing in the language for the first time during the Macedonian supremacy.

But the influence of Alexandria on this form of the Greek language was most potent. In that city were combined social culture, trade, art, science, literature, so as to found an intellectual supremacy which continued for centuries. Hence we may speak of an Alexandrian dialect, which belonged not only to literature, but to social life in general. This is known to us from the manuscripts of the New Testament, and is held by many of the modern critics to be the very form of speech used by the apostles in composing their writings. From this it would follow that the printed Greek text of modern times is of more recent origin in its forms. But into this discussion we cannot enter.

The chief matter to be considered is what the Greek language became in the hands of these Orientals, especially in its application to religious thought. As is well known, the Pentateuch was translated into Greek at Alexandria, during the reign of the second Ptolemy; that is, at a time when a race of Jews flourished whose fathers had been the first to whom the use of the Greek language became a necessity. Despite the fables which have been attached to the story of this version, we may be confident that it originated in an ecclesiastical necessity which was already felt, and not on the literary whim of a prince as is generally represented. Greek literati would have been engaged upon it, if the latter view were correct. In fact, the fables alluded to point to an origin deemed sacred, rather than to one of interest mainly to learned librarians. The king's name can be regarded as that of the patron saluted by the Jews and Greeks; and a dedication copy was naturally placed in the royal library by these faithful subjects. Be this as it may, the first glance shows how little knowledge of the Greek this translation was attempted. Even the parts made after an interval, the length of which cannot be exactly determined, show in general the same character. Aside from blunders due to faulty hermeneutics or a corrupt text, we find numberless examples of the misuse of Greek terms, of Hebraistic constructions, such as could be fully understood only by those who thought in Hebrew. It is true that adequate Greek expressions were wanting for many ideas of religion and ritual: for others, determined, show in general the same character.

Of course it was intelligible to the Jew. He knew the ideas: the form of speech concerned him little. The particles were almost entirely Hebrew; the oath took the form of an elliptical hypothesis: the "construct state" served its common Hebrew purposes: and the entire complex of Greek syntax was smoothed out into the clear, simple, naïve Old Testament structure of clauses. But, despite all this, such a theory and practice of translation was for Judaism itself an inestimable benefit not yet sufficiently recognized. We affirm that the formation of this Judaistic, not Hellenistic language was the first and most indispensable prerequisite for the maintenance of the religion of the people. The Hebrew spirit so completely dominated the Greek form, that to-day we are often compelled to seek the Hebrew original to understand the Septuagint.

What was done without purpose became an effective agent for important results. The Septuagint had its influence on all Hellenistic literature, which was mainly religious. It was, to a certain extent, for the Hellenists what Luther's Bible has been for the German nation. The new forms and new senses. But the greatest influence in producing this change was that of Christianity itself. It demanded expressions for its new ideas and their manifold applications, and sought them in the Greek vocabulary. Hundreds of significant terms and phrases now naturalized in all modern languages received the stamp of the first disciples who spoke Greek. Among these are some of the most important of our theological terms. To sum up: in the Jewish period the Hellenistic idiom slavishly translated, in the Christian it freely formed, a speech, without, however, denying its cradle.

It is evident that the authors of the New Testament did not choose them for their use of the art of speech. John, for example, does not represent the coarser Hellenism in his choice of words; but how entirely Hebraistic is his syntax! The sentences follow each other, the connection appearing, not from grammatical analysis, but from theological reflection. This recreation of terminology is not Greek. On the other hand, what rhetorical periods are found in the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the preface of Luke, in some of the discourses in the latter part of the Book of the Acts: in Paul's language we plainly see two partially antagonistic tendencies,— that of the Jewish dilettante, with its incomplete syntax and its interpolated quotations, producing obscurity and harshness; and by the side of this that transporting rhetoric of the heart, the true issue of a new fountain of life, representing wealth of feeling in a corresponding wealth of synonyms and figures.

The discussions of the Hellenistic idiom have been confused too much to lexical and grammatical questions, and have failed to recognize the profound connection between it and the mental history of the people who produced it. The hints given in the Introduction to Winer's Grammar of the New Testament furnished the help of the Bible in his own tongue, to understand the matter from a psychological and historical point of view.

The details of grammar and lexicography do not belong to an encyclopedia, but we conclude with some critical and historical remarks on these topics.

At the time of the Reformation, philological learning had not reached an accurate knowledge of the Hellenistic idiom and its history. N. Stephanus and Beza took the right view; but their investigations were too imperfect to give public opinion. In the middle of the seventeenth century there began an interminable squabble over the Hebraisms of the New Testament. The point at issue being a dogmatic one; namely, what kind of a style might be ascribed to the Holy Spirit, whether it could be deemed less pure than the classic Hebrew authors.

The discussion was mechanical and unscientific on both sides, but lasted for more than a century. (See the Introduction to Winer's Grammar of the New Testament). Fortunately during this century a truer method has been adopted; and the lexical and grammatical results are not only
Much remains to be done in two directions: first, in securing for the LXX. proper recognition as the basis of the peculiarities of the Hellenistic diction; secondly, in giving it place in New Testament stylistics and rhetoric. The latter subject has been discussed and reviewed in connection with the questions of the genuineness of the various books of the New Testament; but very little has been done from any point of view other than the polemic one. The rhetoric of the Pauline Epistles deserves more thorough treatment.

The numerous works which have appeared in recent years on the life of Christ, on the history of the New Testament times, have made great use of the material which belongs to a thorough discussion of the Hellenistic diction; and the same remark holds true of the treatises on New Testament hermeneutics. For a general discussion of the language of the Greek Testament and the idiosyncrasies of the evangelists and apostolic writers, we refer to the first chapter of Schaff's Companion to the Study of the Greek Testament, New York, 1882.

Hellenists was the name applied by the Greeks to those foreigners who became like themselves in habits or speech. The term had a special application to those Jews who were brought under Greek influences, and is of importance in connection with the early history of Christianity. The usual view of the word is not incorrect, but too often superficial.

In the time of Alexander the Hellenizing of foreign nations, which until then had been limited, began to be extensive. His successors, the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, advanced it, sometimes by force. Even more than the sword was this influence the defence of the new dynasties.

The tendency to emigrate, and engage in foreign trade, was not, however, confined to the Greeks. About the time of the spread of Hellenic civilization in the East, various political causes fostered among the Jews the same tendency, which has now become, so to speak, the ground tone of their life as a people. The two streams, Hellenic and Hebrew, met at first in the young Macedonian cities. Soon the Jews were found everywhere manifesting the same commercial spirit, the same fondness for portable salable property, which is to-day the most obvious trait of their character. But the two streams did not mix. The Mosaic law had sought to fasten the Jewish people to the soil of Palestine. From this external regulation they now broke away; but the same law had stamped upon them, not only a higher religious and ethical culture, but also a personal abhorrence of foreigners. All that pertained to their religious belief made between them and the Greeks an impassable gulf, thus guarding their religion from every danger and temptation, maintaining their peculiar type of morality, while at the same time the conditions which can divide races were permitted to arise and to operate. We are to inquire, How far, under these conditions, did the Jewish element yield to or withstand the foreign influence it encountered? In other words, What spheres of public and private life, what phases of national character, were affected or unaffected by this Hellenizing tendency?
With household life we need not here concern ourselves. In art and science the foreigners might have furnished a welcome instructor to the Jews, so far as these troubled themselves about such things. The lands and the heart of the Jewish people. Assuring them of material advantage, encouraging their love of money, these rulers succeeded in dulling entirely the conservative national feeling, though without winning any affection in return. Without the mighty restraint of their religion, the Jewish people would at once, and more rapidly than any, have given way to Hellenism. The strongest proof of this, aside from the affection of adopting Greek names, is to be found in the fact that they sacrificed what is most precious and peculiar to a people,—their language, and this with an unexampled readiness and rapidity. This remarkable revolution in speech has been discussed in the preceding article [Hellenistic Idiom].

But, though the language of their fathers was forgotten, their religious faith remained, as it still remains. This preserved their nationality; and one cannot fail to admire not only the reorganization after the return from Babylon, with its effect upon the people, but also the Pharisaism, which, with its separatism, contributed so largely to the maintenance of the undying national feeling. An edifice that has lasted for thousands of years, that proved stronger than the Roman Empire, itself praises the builders. However far removed from home, among the Jews apostasy was a rare exception. Wherever they went, they soon established synagogues (now Grecian) as fortresses of the national spirit, and targets of foreign antipathy,—in both directions the upholders of Judaism in its peculiar position.

Here is that phase of our subject which is of most importance for the history of Christianity; here the providential ordering of the relations of peoples is most evident. The transformation of Hebrew Jews into Hellenists is of more than statistical and philological interest: its results were far-reaching. It was more than the acceptance of the Greek language and customs on the part of the Jews: it brought the Jewish faith and life close to the Greek population, and that, too, at the very time when heathenism was moving toward a remorseless catastrophe. Its power was broken: in some cases a tasteless, unpoetic, foreign superstition had taken its place. Here and there were individual souls that could not find satisfaction, either in the intoxication of sense, the abstractions of philosophy, or the prevalent mysteries and occult sciences. These often found their way to the synagogue, and learned to know the God of Israel, and to join in the worship of him. Especially this was true of the women. No one was hindered from sharing these privileges. The relations of commercial and social life favored the custom. Certain general rules of a religious and domestic character were observed in the introduction of these proselytes [see Prostitute]: otherwise the fellowship was without an exception. But an important counter-influence was thus exerted upon the Hellenistic Jews. It could not be otherwise. The Greek-speaking Jews were brought into the closest contact with the Greeks, and inevitably they learned to judge the aliens less unfavourably, to recognize what was common to humanity, and, while holding fast to their monotheism as their most precious possession, to cease to identify it with all the details of their religious forms. Their worship, it should be remembered, was, insensibly to them, less and less associated in their thoughts with the temple at Jerusalem and its sacrificial rites. The Hellenist, without wishing or knowing it, was more and more released from the bonds of the Levitical-Pharisaical institutions. He had preachers, but no priest. This change was not caused by antagonsism or indifference, but was the natural result of the culturing Greek names, of the Jews did not become less exclusive; the Book of the Acts furnishes proof to the contrary: but the same history shows how greatly the circumstances sketched above prepared the way for the gospel. Those things made prominent by the gospel, that, too, by Jesus himself,—the distinction between what was essential and unessential in religion, the recognition of true faith outside of Israel, and of salvation designed for all nations,—these things, to say the least, were intelligible to the Hellenistic ear, if not at once acceptable. In Palestine, where the Jew wished to be master, the foreigner was doubly unwelcome, was called sinner, godless, unrighteous, because he was a foreigner. These national prejudices helped to create antagonism to the gospel. But elsewhere the Jew was the foreigner. He soon felt that there was room in the world for many kinds of people, and that his influence within the sphere of Christianity. In Jerusalem many would not hear of a gospel that they should have in common with the uncircumcised. In Antioch, not only the market, but the synagogue, to a certain extent, had been occupied together with the latter class. The depth of the gulf between these two elements of the Jewish people at the time of the establishment of the Church may be learned from the first mention of them in the Book of the Acts (chap. vi.). The unfriendly collision was occasioned, it is true, by a trivial external matter; but the true cause was the national division. The further application of the positions here taken belongs more properly to exegesis.

ED. REUSS (M. B. RIDDLE).

HELVETIC CONFESSIONS. I. First Helvetic Confession (Confessio Helvetica Prior, also called Second Confession of Basel, Confessio Basiliensis Posterior). Though in the fourth decade of the sixteenth century the Reformed churches of Switzerland could point to the writings of Zwingli and the first confession of Basel (1534) as expressions of their beliefs, a common confession, formally adopted, was still lacking. For the purpose of drawing up such an instrument, the national division. The further application of the positions here taken belongs more properly to exegesis.
HELVETIC CONFESSIONS. 967

HELVETIUS.

at Basel, Jan. 30, 1536. Bullinger and Leo Judae from Zürich were present, Megander from Bern, Myconius and Grynaeus from Basel, and others. Soon after, Butzer and Capito from Strasburg arrived over these. The moment was considered favorable for the effecting of a union between the Reformed and the Lutheran churches, and such a union was the great idea of Butzer's life. Nor was the council called by Paul III. to Mantua left out of view. It was the intention of the Swiss Reformed churches to lay their confession before that council. The instrument was first drawn up in Latin, and then translated by Leo Judae into German.

The German version was immediately adopted by all the delegates; but the Latin encountered some difficulties from the side of the Zürich delegates, who found the phraseology approaching the Lutheran too closely. It was revised and altered by Myconius and Grynaeus; and both versions, the German and the Latin, were then formally adopted on Feb. 26, 1536.

II. The Second Helvetic Confession (Confession Helvetica Posterior) is the work of Bullinger, the Swiss theologian of the Reformed Church, was afraid, that, for this very reason, he should be put under the ban of the realm, he addressed himself to Bullinger (after the death of Martyr and Calvin, unquestionably the first theologian of the Reformed Church), and asked him to draw up a confession showing that the Reformed Church in no point differed from the true apostolical doctrine. Bullinger sent him the above-mentioned memoir; and it pleased him so much that he asked permission to have it translated into German, and published. The interest which Bullinger's work thus awakened naturally attracted the attention of the Swiss to it. They had for some time felt the need of such a confession, as a bond of union. The first Helvetic confession was too short, and was suspected of having yielded somewhat to a Lutheran influence. Bullinger's, on the contrary, seemed satisfactory in every respect; and in the course of 1536 it was adopted by Zürich, Geneva, Bern, Schaffhausen, Mülhausen, Biel, St. Gallen, the Grisons, Glarus, Appenzell, Thurgau, and elsewhere. In the same year it was adopted in Scotland, in 1567 in Hungary, in 1571 in France, in 1578 in France, in 1571 in France, in 1579 in Poland. It is also the creed of the Reformed Church in Bohemia. The first edition of the Latin text appeared at Zürich in 1566; at the same time appeared also a German translation by Bullinger, and a French by Beza. It is, next to the Reformed and the schismatical, the generally recognized confession of the Reformed Church.

E. SUDHOFF.

HELVETIUS, Claude Adrien, b. at Paris, January 1715; d. there Dec. 26, 1771; was the son of a farmer-general; a farmer-general himself, a rich man, and an idle one, occupied the idea of making a sensation. He succeeded. His HELVICUS, Christoph, b. at Sprendlingen, Hesse, Dec. 26, 1581; d. at Giessen, Sept. 10, 1617; studied at Marburg; and was appointed professor of Hebrew at Giessen in 1605, and of theology in 1610. He held a disputation in Hebrew with the rabbis of Francfort, and wrote Chronologia Systema Novum, 1610, which was translated into English.

HELVICUS, a layman, living in Rome in the time of Bishop Damasus, 360–364; published about 380 a book against the spreading Manichaeism, and the Cyprians and the Arians. Jerome wrote against him Adversus Helviciun (comp. his letters to Pammachius, to Eustochium, and Contra Jocin., I. 405), but in an excited tone, and with forced sophistical argumentation. Genadius, who recognizes his piety and good intention, but criticizes his lack of erudition, states that Helvidius was a pupil of the Arian Auxentius from Milan, and an imitator of the Pagan rhetor Symmachus. Of his book nothing is left but quotations in Jerome.

HELYOT, Pierre, b. in Paris, 1660; entered the third Franciscan order (1683) in the convent of Picpus, Paris, under the name of I'ere Hippolyte, and d. there Jan. 5, 1716. He immortalized himself by writing a Histoire des ordres monastiques, religieux, et militaires, et des congregations seculieres de l'un et de l'autre sexe, Paris, 1714–19, 8 vols. The idea of the work occurred to him while in Rome on business of his order. In its composition he was assisted by such eminent scholars as Hardouin, Mabillon, and Ruinart: the last three volumes were edited by Maximilien Bullot. This great work has been repeatedly reprinted, notably with large additions, as part of Migne's Encyclopaedia theologica, in 5 vols., Paris, 1847.

HE'MAN. See Psalms.

HEMMERLIN, Felix, b. at Zürich, 1389; d. in the dungeon of the Franciscan monastery at Lucerne, 1157; studied at Bologna; was present at the Council of Constance; visited Rome, and was appointed provost of St. Ursus at Soleure 1421, and cantor at the cathedral of Zürich 1427. He was a bright and learned man; and his writings, numbering thirty-nine, most of which, however, are only pamphlets, give a very vivid picture of ecclesiastical affairs in his time. But he was a critic only, not a reformer, and his criticism made him many enemies. By his Denobilitate he became mixed up with politics, was imprisoned (1434), and never released. He is not, however, to be classed among the martyrs to the cause of the Reformation. See B. Riezen: Felix Hemmerlin, Zürich, 1849.

HEMNINGSSEN, Niels (Nicholaus Hennin- gius), b. in the Danish island of Lolland, 1513; d. at Helsingore, 1600; studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed professor of theology in Copenhagen, but was dismissed in 1579, on suspicion of Crypto-Calvinism. His works, Opuscula, Geneva, (1583), have of late attracted considerable attention both in Denmark and Germany, especially his book against J. Andreæ, on the doctrine of ubiquity, not published until after his death, 1615.

HENDERSON, Alexander, b. in the parish of Cricht, Fife-shire, in 1583; d. in Edinburgh, Aug. 19, 1646. He entered St. Salvador's College, St. Andrew's, in December, 1599, and took the degree of M.A. in 1603. He taught philosophy in St. Andrew's University till early in 1612, when he was presented to the church of Leuchars. So unpopular was his settlement there, that the people fastened the church-doors on the day of his ordination, and he had literally to enter by the window. A year or two afterwards he went, perhaps out of curiosity, to hear Robert Bruce preach in the adjoining parish of Forgan. In order to be heard, he sat in a dark corner of the church; but the sharp arrows of the King pierced his heart as Bruce read for his text, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber." Soon after this he gave up Episcopacy for Presbytery, and in 1618 opposed "the five articles" in Perth Assembly. Next year he was summoned, with other two ministers, before the High Commission; but they answered for themselves so wisely, that they were dismissed with threatenings. He seems to have spent the next eighteen years in Leuchars in comparative peace, storing his mind with useful knowledge, doing good work among his people, and educating young men boarding with him. Many of those in the neighborhood who loved "the good old way" resorted to his ministry; and the Presbyterial meetings he attended were precious and refreshing, and helped to unite the faithful ministers. He bought a house and some land, which, with a thousand pounds Scots, he gave as an educational endowment to the parish. To the school of his native parish he bequeathed two thousand marks.

Instigated by Laud, Charles I. sent down to Scotland in 1636 a book of ordination, and a book of ordination, which were followed by the Book of Common Prayer for the Church of Scotland. The arbitrary manner in which it was sought to impose these on the Scottish Church was perhaps even more offensive than their matter. Most of the bishops raised letters of horning, charging the ministers in their diocese to buy two copies of the Book of Common Prayer for the use of their parishes within fifteen days; but the ministers supplicated the Privy Council to suspend the charge. Henderson's petition was much esteemed by the people. Soon the body of the nation was embarded in the cause; and four committees were appointed to represent the noblemen, gentlemen, burgesses, and ministers. These committees, each of which contained four members, were called "The Tables," and met in the Parliament House. On their meetings being prohibited by royal proclamation, they determined to renew the National Covenant. Henderson wrote the bond, adapting it to the time; and Warriston prepared the portion known as "the legal warrant." On the 28th of February, 1638, it was HENDERSON.

HENDERSON.

sworn and subscribed by thousands in the Greyfriars Church and Churchyard, Edinburgh. This was a day, as Hopenstall, in which people offered themselves in multitudes to the service of Heaven, like the dewdrops in the morning, wherein the arm of the Lord was revealed, and the princes of the people assembled to swear allegiance to the King of kings. Copies were circulated through the country; and almost everywhere it was sworn with zeal and alacrity by all ranks and classes. All the shires subscribed by their commissioners, and all the towns but Aberdeen, St. Andrew's, and Crail. Henderson preached at St. Andrew's, and gained it, not a burgess refusing to sign, except of the deserved judgment of God, nor force, except the force of reason. Henderson, Dickson, and Cant were sent to the north, and preached to great crowds in the open air at Aberdeen, securing several hundreds of subscriptions. But with the doctors of divinity they had only a fruitless controversy. The king having come to Scotland to preside in Parliament, Henderson was unanimously chosen moderator of the former, which met on the 21st of November, 1638, in the High Church or Cathedral of Glasgow. Though the royal commissioner dissolved it in the king's name, it continued its sittings, condemned the spurious assemblies from 1606 to 1618, as well as the Book oficom, excommunicated eight of the bishops, deposed the other six, and prohibited episcopacy and the articles of Perth. Despite his arduous duties by day, Henderson spent the greater part of the night in prayer and conference. At its close, on the 29th of December, he said, "We have now cast down the walls of Jericho: let him that rebuildeth them beware of the curse of Hiel the Bethelite." Though anxious to remain in Leuchars, Henderson was translated b this assembly to Edinburgh, and was inducted into the Greyfriars Church on the 10th of January, 1639.

The Remonstrance of the Nobility, etc., which Henderson drafted, strongly impressed the English with the justice of the covenanted cause. He accompanied the Scotch army to Dunse Law, and took part in the treaty at Birks in June 1639. Next year he was appointed rector of Edinburgh University. On the king refusing to carry out the stipulations of the pacification, denouncing the Covenanters as rebels, and preparing again to invade the country, the Scotch army entered England in August, 1640, and the king was fain to treat a second time. For this treaty Henderson was appointed a commissioner. While in London, he wrote several pamphlets, held service according to the Scottish form, and preached in St. Antholme's Church to crowded audiences, and heartily concurred with William Castell's petition to the English Parliament for propagating the gospel in America as "most pious, Christian, and charitable." Toward the end of July, 1641, he returned to Edinburgh, and was chosen moderator of the assembly then sitting. The king having come to Scotland to preside in Parliament, Henderson was appointed royal chaplain, and dean of the Chapel Royal. By his exertions the crown was held in universal honour, and was secured for the university of that city, and probably he helped to secure for the university of St. Andrew's a grant of a thousand pounds per annum from the revenues of the archbishopric. In January, 1642, he was translated to the East Kirk, and the same year gave "willingly and of his own accord a thousand pounds Scots for perfecting the house appointed for the library" of St. Andrew's university. As he was anxious to reconcile the king and the English Parliament, he was sent with the Scotch commissioners to Oxford. There he perceived that there was no hope of accommodation consistent with the liberties of England. On his return he had a conference with Montrose, and, seeing that he was determined to support the king, cautioned his friends against him. He was moderator of the General Assembly in 1643, when commissioners were present from the English Parliament; and he drafted the Solemn League and Covenant, which was cordially adopted by the Assembly and Convention of Estates. The assembly renewed the commission's appointment of members to assist at the Westminster Assembly. Henderson accordingly sailed from Leith for London on the 26th of August, and addressed the English House of Commons and the Westminster Assembly, when met in St. Margaret's Church to swear the Solemn League and Covenant on the 25th of September. He was of great service in Westminster Assembly, and often took a leading part in its debates. Early in 1645 he was appointed to assist the commissioners of both Parliaments in their treaty with the king at Uxbridge. On this treaty being broken off without success, he returned to his duties at Westminster, though his health was now failing him.

In the spring of 1646 the king threw himself into the Scotch army, who retired with him to Newcastle. The Independents were now supreme in the English army, which had crushed his forces; and his only hope lay in speedily coming to terms with the Presbyterians. He sent for Henderson as the fittest man to remove the difficulties of his mind. Though unfit for the journey, he complied, and reached Newcastle in May. But he soon found that there was little hope of Charles agreeing to abolish prelacy in England. It was arranged that the conscientious scruples of Charles should be discussed in a series of papers between him and Henderson. Of these there are eight, five being by the king. Henderson prepared four; but, perhaps to let the king have the last word, only three have been printed. The object of Charles seems to have been to gain time; and, as the discussion lasted fully six weeks, he was not altogether unsuccessful. As Henderson's health had grown much worse, he returned to Scotland, arriving in Edinburgh on the 11th of August, sick and exhausted. To Sir James Stewart, provost of Edinburgh, he said, "I am near the end of my race: in a few days I am going home, and I am as glad of it as a schoolboy when sent home from the school to his father's house." Eight days after his arrival he entered into his rest. When dying, he opened his eyes, and looked up with a pleasant smile. The company were amazed, for his eyes shone and sparkled like stars; and immediately he expired. He was undoubtedly, after Knox, the greatest of Scottish ecclesiastics, and has been held in universal honour, as one that statedship, and patriotism, as well as for his attachment to the faith and polity of the Reformed Church.
LIT. — Life, in McCrie's Miscellaneous Writings, and Life and Times by Aiton, Edin., 1866. Most of the principal public papers of the Presbyterians from 1837 to 1849 were drafted or polished by Henderson. In 1841 he published The Order and Government of the Church of Scotland, 4to, preface of 5 leaves, and 98 pp. The Platforme of the Presbyterian Government, published by authority in 1644, is substantially the same without the preface. He seems to have published a pamphlet against Episcopacy and another against Independency. Several of his sermons have been printed separately; and a volume of Sermons, Prayers, and Pulpit Addresses, from the notes of a hearer, was issued in 1827, 8vo, 529 pp. His speech before the Solemn League and Covenant was sworn at Westminster in the Appendix to Reid's Memoirs of the Westminster Divines. The papers which passed between him and the king are in Arron's Appendix, and are printed with Charles's Works. D. HAY FLEMING (of St. Andrew's, Scotland).

HENDERSON, Ebenezer, D.D., b. Nov. 17, 1784; d. May 16, 1858; an eminent linguist and biblical scholar, and a devoted Christian missionary, whose labors in this capacity were carried on chiefly in connection with the British and Foreign Bible Society. He was the son of humble parents; and his birth took place, as his youth was passed, in the landward part of the parish of Dunfermline, in Fifeshire, Scotland, where, owing to distance from schools, he had few educational advantages; most of his scholarship, which, besides the classical languages, is said to have included Hebrew, Syriac, Ethiopic, Russian, Arabic, Tartar, Persian, Turkish, Armenian, Manchou, Mongolian, and Coptic, having been acquired in the midst of the engaging duties of a singularly active professional life. He was originally intended for a mechanical trade, and apprenticed to a watchmaker; but more suitable prospects opened up for him. Though his parents were members of the Scottish Secession Church, which had indeed found its birthplace in the immediate neighborhood of his native parish, its connection with that dissenting body, but with the communion which numbered among its members James and Robert Haldane,—names well known in the religious annals of Scotland in the beginning of the nineteenth century,—that young Henderson received those decided religious impressions which led to his choice of the ministry as a profession; and it was in the seminary in Edinburgh, instituted and supported by one of these brothers, that he received his theological training. The course extended over only two years, and appears to have been very inadequate. Before he had completed his studies at this theological seminary, his future work was determined; and in the year 1806 he left Scotland in company with the Rev. John Patterson, with whom he continued to be associated in missionary labor and in friendship for a great part of his life. His original destination was the East Indies; but difficulties connected with the then existing policy of the East India Company led Mr. Henderson, who with his colleague Mr. Patterson had gone to Denmark with the view of a passage to India in a Danish ship, to alter his plans, and confine his future labors to the northern countries of Europe, including Denmark, Sweden, and portions of the Empire of Russia, Iceland and Finland, where, for various reasons, Christianity, or at all events the Bible, had almost ceased to exist, especially engaged his attention. His linguistic powers were of great use to him in his work, both in the publication of new versions of the Bible, and also in missions among men whose languages were scarcely known, even by name, outside their own territories.

Mr. Henderson was led, chiefly by family reasons, to return to England in the year 1823, from which time he exchanged directly missionary labor for the less important duty of training missionaries for the same work in which he had himself so long engaged, and in which he never ceased to take a lively interest. Thirty years of usefulness in academic labors at home followed his twenty years of foreign service. His first home employment was the theological tutorship in the seminary for the training of missionaries at Hoxton, which he held for five years with much acceptance. In 1830 he was appointed to the theological lectureship at Highbury. In 1850 he practically retired from public life, though still discharging occasional duties in connection with his profession as a minister of the gospel, till his powers failed him, and the end came. In addition to a number of popular reprints which appeared under his editorship, the works of Mr. Henderson (who in 1840 had received the degree of D.D. from the University of Copenhagen) comprise the following: Translation of Ross on the Prophecies of Daniel, Edin., 1811; Two Dissertations on Hans Mikkelsen's (Danoic) Translation of the New Testament, Copenhagen, 1818; Iceland, or the Journal of a Residence in that Isle in 1814, 1815, Edin., 1819; Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia, Lond., 1826; The Great Mystery of Godliness, 1813; An Appeal to the Members of the British and Foreign Bible Society, 1824; The Turkish New Testament Incapable of Defence, 1825; Divine Inspiration, 1838; Translation of Isaiah, with Commentary, 1840; Translation of Ezekiel, 1853; it was not in preaching the gospel among men whose prospects opened up for him. Though his parents were members of the Scottish Seccession Church, which had indeed found its birthplace in the immediate neighborhood of his native parish, its connection with that dissenting body, but with the communion which numbered among its members James and Robert Haldane,—names well known in the religious annals of Scotland in the beginning of the nineteenth century,—that young Henderson received those decided religious impressions which led to his choice of the ministry as a profession; and it was in the seminary in Edinburgh, instituted and supported by one of these brothers, that he received his theological training. The course extended over only two years, and appears to have been very inadequate. Before he had completed his studies at this theological seminary, his future work was determined; and in the year 1806 he left Scotland in company with the Rev. John Patterson, with whom he continued to be associated in missionary labor and in friendship for a great part of his life. His original destination was the East Indies; but difficulties connected with the then existing policy of the East India Company led Mr. Henderson, who with his colleague Mr. Patterson had gone to Denmark with the view of a passage to India in a Danish ship, to alter his plans, and confine his future labors to the northern countries of Europe, including Denmark, Sweden, and portions of the Empire of Russia, Iceland and Finland, where, for various reasons, Christianity, or at all events the Bible, had almost ceased to exist, especially engaged his attention. His linguistic powers were of great use to him in his work, both in the publication of new versions of the Bible, and also in missions among men whose languages were scarcely known, even by name, outside their own territories.

Mr. Henderson was led, chiefly by family reasons, to return to England in the year 1823, from which time he exchanged directly missionary labor for the less important duty of training missionaries for the same work in which he had himself so long engaged, and in which he never ceased to take a lively interest. Thirty years of usefulness in academic labors at home followed his twenty years of foreign service. His first home employment was the theological tutorship in the seminary for the training of missionaries at Hoxton, which he held for five years with much acceptance. In 1830 he was appointed to the theological lectureship at Highbury. In 1850 he practically retired from public life, though still discharging occasional duties in connection with his profession as a minister of the gospel, till his powers failed him, and the end came. In addition to a number of popular reprints which appeared under his editorship, the works of Mr. Henderson (who in 1840 had received the degree of D.D. from the University of Copenhagen) comprise the following: Translation of Ross on the Prophecies of Daniel, Edin., 1811; Two Dissertations on Hans Mikkelsen's (Danoic) Translation of the New Testament, Copenhagen, 1818; Iceland, or the Journal of a Residence in that Isle in 1814, 1815, Edin., 1819; Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia, Lond., 1826; The Great Mystery of Godliness, 1813; An Appeal to the Members of the British and Foreign Bible Society, 1824; The Turkish New Testament Incapable of Defence, 1825; Divine Inspiration, 1838; Translation of Isaiah, with Commentary, 1840; Translation of Ezekiel, 1853; it was not in preaching the gospel among men whose

HENGSTENBERG, Ernst Wilhelm, a distinguished German theologian; b. Oct. 20, 1802, at Froendenberg, where his father was pastor of the Young Ladies' Institute; d. in Berlin, May 28, 1869. He was of delicate constitution, and educated in his father's house till 1819, when he entered the University of Bonn. He there devoted himself more particularly to the study of Aristotle under Brandis, and Arabic under Freytag. Fruits of these studies were an edition of the Arabic Moallakah of Amru'l'Kais (Amrukasii Moallakah cum scholiis, etc.), Bonn, 1823, which won the prize in philosophy, and a German translation of Aristotle's Metaphysics, Bonn, 1824. Lack of means preventing him from carrying out a desire to sit under Neander and Tholuck, he went to Basel in the capacity of tutor to J. J. Stähelin, afterwards professor of Oriental languages at the University of Basel. The death of his mother, and the comfort which he received from the Scripture in his bodily sufferings and mental gloom, awoke in him a strong faith in the gospel, and determined him to study theology, an intention which he once had, but subsequently, at least in part, relinquished. He belonged to the Reformed Church; but, finding in the Augsburg Confession the best expression of his own views, he united with the Lutheran Church.

In 1824 he was teaching as privat-doctor at the University of Berlin. From the very start he advocated the truth of the Old and New Testaments, and entered a protest against rationalism, especially in its attitude toward the Old Testament. These views brought him into disfavor with the ministry of worship, which endeavored, in vain, to tempt him away from Berlin with offers of extraordinary professorships at Königsberg (1826) and Bonn (1828). In 1828 he became ordinary professor in Berlin; and his influence for nearly half a century over his students, as teacher and adviser, was exceeded only by that of Tholuck. Hengstenberg's next most important exegetical work was his Commentary on the Psalms, 4 vols., 1842-47, 2d ed., 1849-52 (English translation, Edinburgh, 1844-45). In this department he also published Gesch. Bileams u. s. Weissagungen (History of Balaam and his Prophecies), Edinburgh, 1848, Berlin, 1842; D. Hoheit Salomonis ("Song of Songs"), Berlin, 1855; D. Prediger Salomo ("Ecclesiastes"), English translation, Philadelphia, 1890, Berlin, 1859; Weissagungen d. P. Eschel ("Ezekiel"), 2 parts, Berlin, 1867, 1868; D. Buch Ho ("Job") in Berlin and Leipzig 2 parts, 1870-75; Offenb. Johannis ("Revelation") 2 vols., 1849-51, 2d ed., 1862; Evang. Joh. ("Gospel of John"), 3 vols., 1851-58, 2d ed., 1867; Vorleistungen u. d. Leidengesch. ("Lectures on the Passion"), Leipzig, 1876. His historical-critical works are Beitrag z. Einf. ins A. T. ("Contributions to the Introduction of the Old Testament," English translation, Edinburgh, 1847, 1848), 3 vols., Berlin, 1831-59, in which he vindicates the Messianic character of Daniel's and Zechariah's prophecies, and the authenticity of the Pentateuch; Gesch. d. Reichen Gottes u. d. A. B. ("History of the Kingdom of God under the Old Covenant"), Berlin, 1859-71; D. Bücher Moses u. Aegypten ("The Books of Moses and Egypt"), Berlin, 1841, which Diestel calls his most meritorious work. He also published a number of smaller treatises (Freimaurerei, 1854; Duelling, 1856, etc.), some of which had before appeared in the Church Journal. See BACHMANN: Hengstenberg n. s. Leben u. Wirken, 2 vols., Göttingen, 1878-79.

HENOHER, Alyo, b. at Völkersbach, Baden, July 11, 1788; d. at Spöck, near Carlsruhe, Dec. 5, 1862; was educated in the school of Rasch, studied in the university of Freiburg in the seminary of Meersburg; received the lower orders by Dalberg, the higher by Hohenlohe; and was appointed pastor at Mühlhausen in 1818. Suspected of heresy, he was tried, convicted, and excommunicated from the Roman-Catholic Church in 1829: but the larger part of his congregation entered with him the evangelical church; and in 1823 he was appointed minister at Spöck, where he labored for the rest of his life with great effect. Of his numerous works, polemical against Romanism and rationalism, the principal are Christliches Glaubenbekennnis und Der Kampf des Unglaubens mit Aberglauben und Glauben. His life was written by K. F. Ledderhose (Heidelberg, 1863) and by E. Frommel (Karlsruhe, 1865).

HENKE, Heinrich Philipp Konrad, b. at Hehlen in Brunswick, July 3, 1752; d. at Helmstädt, May 2, 1806; studied at Helmstädt; and was appointed professor there in 1777 and in theology (1780). He was a pupil and representative of the rationalism of his time; and even his best work (Allgemeine Geschichte der christlichen Kirche, Brunswick, 1789-1806, 6 vols.)
HENOTIKON.

HENRY IV.

HENOTIKON, The, a "decree of union" or "instrument of union," probably drawn up by Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and issued by the Emperor Zeno (482), for the purpose of reconciling the Monophysite and Orthodox divisions of the Church. Neither party was satisfied with it, however. The Monophysites demanded a more explicit condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon, while the Orthodox considered it at the least shadow of disapproval. In the East, however, the Henotikon was made obligatory on all bishops and teachers. In the West it was anathematized by Felix II., and a schism of forty years followed, until the death of Anastasius (518); his successor, Justin, belonging to the Orthodox side, and suffering the Heuotikon to be observed, however, as it was anathematized by Felix I., and a schism of forty years followed, until the death of Anastasius (518); his successor, Justin, belonging to the Orthodox side, and suffering the Henotikon to be observed, however, as it had lost its interest. His life was written by his son, Ernest Ludwig Theodor Henke, b. at Helmstedt, Feb. 22, 1804; d. at Marburg, Dec. 1, 1872; studied at Göttingen and Jena; was professor of theology at Marburg from 1839 to his death; wrote Georg Calixtus und seine Zeit, Halle, 1853-60, 2 vols., and published, together with Linden- kohl, the first complete edition of Abaelard's Sic et Non, Marburg, 1851. His Neurehe Kirschen- geschichte (1874, 1878, and 1880, 3 vols.) and Nach- gelassene Vorlesungen über Liturgie u. Homile tik (1876) were published in Halle. See Mangold: Ernst Ludwig Henke, Marburg, 1879. Mangold.

HENOTIKON, The, a "decree of union" or "instrument of union," probably drawn up by Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and issued by the Emperor Zeno (482), for the purpose of reconciling the Monophysite and Orthodox divisions of the Church. Neither party was satisfied with it, however. The Monophysites demanded a more explicit condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon, while the Orthodox considered it at the least shadow of disapproval. In the East, however, the Henotikon was made obligatory on all bishops and teachers. In the West it was anathematized by Felix II., and a schism of forty years followed, until the death of Anastasius (518); his successor, Justin, belonging to the Orthodox side, and suffering the Henotikon to fall into disuse without formally repealing it. See Mangold: Ernst Ludwig Henke, Marburg, 1879. Mangold.

HENRY OF CLUONY. See Henry of Lausanne.

HENRY OF GHENT (Henricus de Gandavo), b. at Maydon, a suburb of Ghent, 1217; d. as archdeacon of Tournay, June 29, 1293; was a pupil of Albertus Magnus; taught philosophy and theology in Paris; obtained the surname of doctor solenmis, but formed no school, as he followed Plato in a time completely ruled by Aristotel. His principal works are Summa qustionum ordinariarum and Quodlibeta theologica, a commentary on the metaphysics of Aristotle. See K. Werner: Heinrich von Gent als Repräsentant des christlichen Platonismus im 15. Jahrhunderte, Berlin, 1878.

HENRY OF ORCUM (Henricus Qorcomius), b. at Orcum, Holland, in the beginning of the fifteenth century; was vice-chancellor of Cologne; and wrote De ceremoniis ecclesiasticis, Commentaries on Aristotle, Thomas Aquinas, etc., besides several works (Contra Hussitas, etc.) which still remain in manuscript.

HENRY OF KETTENBACH. See Kett Pub.

HENRY OF LANGENSTEIN (Honricus dai Langensteini), b. in Hesse, 1325; d. in Vienna as rector of the newly founded universi-
HENRY VIII. OF ENGLAND.

The conversion of Henry IV. was sincere, it is impossible to believe: he was one of the clearest heads of his age, and he was educated a Protestant. It was simply a political measure, an act of shrewdness, a stage-trick set in scene with all the circumstantiality which the intended effect demanded. More than once he confessed, with his usual incurable open-mouthedness, that he had joined Rome only to make sure of the French crown. But, even if his words had been silent, his acts would have told the truth. His internal policy was conciliatory, tolerably impartial, though rather in favor of the Roman Catholics. But his foreign policy was from the first to the last moment, in its highest aims and in its smallest details, so invariably, so steadily, so decidedly, set against Rome, Spain, the Catholic League in Germany, and for England, the Netherlands, the Protestant Union of Germany, that it soon became evident to the opposite party that there was only one means of preventing France from placing herself at the head of Protestant Europe against the Pope; namely, the death of the king. Consequently he was assassinated in his carriage in the streets of Paris, May 14, 1610, by Francis Ravaillac, a former Jesuit.

Effect demanded. More than once he confessed, with his usual incurable open-mouthedness, that there was only one means of preventing France from placing herself at the head of Protestant Europe against the Pope; namely, the death of the king. Consequently he was assassinated in his carriage in the streets of Paris, May 14, 1610, by Francis Ravaillac, a former Jesuit.

It is commendation enough for Henry's Commentary, to remember that three of the greatest preachers have used it incessantly, and commenced it heartily, — Robert Hall, Whitefield, and Mr. Spurgeon. Whitefield read it through four times, the last time on his knees. Mr. Spurgeon says (Commenting and Commentaries, p. 3), "Every minister ought to read it entirely and carefully through once at least." The work has been republished many times since its author's death. The most accessible editions are Carter's, New York, in five and nine volumes, with Prefatory Remarks by Archibald Alexander and Rev. Edward Bickersteth.

Mr. Henry published other works, such as a Life of Rev. Philip Henry (1890), Catechism for Children, and Scripture Catechism in the Method of the Assembly's (1702), etc. These are published in two volumes, under the title Miscellaneous Works of M. Henry, New York, 1855. His life has been written by Tong, London, 1716, Sir John B. Williams, London, 1850. See also Memoir in Carter's edition.

HENRY VIII. OF ENGLAND. See England, Church of.

HENRY, Matthew, a distinguished nonconformist divine and biblical commentator; b. Oct. 28, 1662, at Broad Oak, Flintshire; d. June 22, 1714, at Nantwich. He received his education under his father's (Rev. Philip Henry) roof, and in an academy at Lichfield. On account of the severe laws against the nonconformists, he was ordained, and became pastor at Chester. In 1712 he accepted a call to Hackney, near London. The first Sunday of his settlement he expounded in the morning Gen. i., and in the afternoon Matt. i., intending to take up the whole Bible, chapter by chapter. On the return journey from a visit to Chester, he was seized with apoplexy, and died.

Mr. Henry is said to have been a good preacher; but his reputation rests upon his celebrated commentary. The Exposition of the Old and New Testaments. It was begun in 1704, and the Pentateuch was published by 1750. He lived to complete it only as far as to the end of the Acts. This work is justly celebrated as the best of the English com-
Antwerp, 1861. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1619; in 1635, Bolland, whose pupil he had been, summoned him to his aid; and upon the Act of Union he spent the rest of his life.

The present scope of the work was his idea, for Bolland had contemplated one much less elaborate. See the art. BölJLANDISTS; also, in Wetzer u. Welter (ed. 1., vol. xii. 554, 555), art. Henschen, Gottfried.

HERACLAS, Bishop of Alexandria (232-247); was a Pagan by birth; studied philosophy under Ammonius Saccas; was converted to Christianity by Origen, whom he succeeded as director of the catechetical school. His stand-point was probably identical with that of Origen; but he was adroit enough to avoid giving offence, and after the death of Demetrius he was chosen bishop. He left no literary monuments.

HERACLEON. See GNOSTICISM.

HERBERGER, Valerius, b. at Fraustadt, Prussian Poland, April 15, 1652; d. there May 18, 1672; was school-teacher in his native city since 1584, and pastor of the evangelical church since 1598, and acquired a great name as a preacher. He published several collections of sermons, and his Postille is still read. See S. F. Lauterbach: Vita, Fama et Fato V. H., 1708.

HERBELOT, Barthélemy d', Orientalist; b. in Paris, Dec. 4, 1623; d. there Dec. 8, 1695. His life was devoted to the composition of his invaluable thesaurus of Oriental learning.—Bibliothèque orientale, ou dictionnaire universel contenant généralement tout ce qui regarde la connaissance de peuples de l'Orient, edited by A. Galland, Paris, 1697. It is mainly an abridged translation of the immense biographical and bibliographical cyclopaedia of Hajji Khalifa, but enlarged from various sources. In spite of its occasional inaccuracies and inconsistencies, it is “the one available source for much information to others than Oriental scholars; and as such it retains its importance.” It was reprinted in Maastricht, 1776, and, with additions by Galand, The Hague, 1777-79, 4 vols.; reprinted in Maastricht, 1780; German translation, IJtelle, 1785-90, 4 vols.

HERBERT, Edward. See DEISM.

HERBERT, George, one of the quaintest but holiest poets of England; b. at Montgomery, Wales, April 3, 1593; d. at Kemerton, Eng., February, 1633. He was a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge (1610), and public orator of the university (1619-27), in which capacity he came in contact with King James, and was for a time or more or less a courtier; but in 1625 he took holy orders, and was in 1630 made rector of the deanery of St. Paul's, where he continued so industrious, so exemplary and so devoted, that he was called "Holy George Herbert." His fame rests upon his poems, The Temple, Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations, Cambridge, 1631. They abound in oddities of expression, but breathe so pure and holy a spirit that they are religious classics, and give Herbert claim to be, with Keble, the poet of Anglican theology. Herbert's prose-work, The Priest to the Temple, or the Character of a Country Parson, is an excellent treatise upon pastoral theology. It has doubtless helped Herbert's reputation that Izaak Walton was his biographer (1670). There are many editions of Herbert. Perhaps the best is that by Professor Nichol, London, 1803. Coleridge edited his complete works, London, 1846.

HERDER, Johann Gottfried, b. Aug. 25, 1744, at Mohrungen, East Prussia; d. at Weimar, Dec. 18, 1803; studied theology, philosophy, languages and literature, at Königsberg, where he acquired the friendship of Kant and Hamann, and was in 1764 appointed teacher in the cathedral-school of Riga, and in 1767 afternoon-preacher in one of the suburban churches. In Riga he first distinguished himself as a pulpit-orator, drawing larger and larger audiences; and at the same time he also attracted the attention of literary Germany by his Fragmente über die deutsche Literatur and Kritische Wälder. In 1771 he left Riga, accompanied the Prince of Holstein-Eutin for some time, made in Strassburg the acquaintance of Goethe and Jung-Stilling, and was in 1771 appointed court-preacher and superintendent at Bückeburg. To this period of his life belongs, of his theological writings, the Provinzialblätter, Älteste Urkunde des Menschengeschlechts, Erlauterungen aus einer neueröffneten morgenländischen Quelle, and Briefe zweier Brüder Jesu, which made a deep impression, and established the grammatical axiom in biblical exegesis, that the Bible is not simply a doctrinal code, a dogmatical system, but a whole literature, which must be viewed in the light of its time, its place, and its historical surroundings, in order to be fully understood.

In 1778 he moved to Weimar as court-preacher and superintendent-general, and there published...
HEREFORD.

HERESY.

The apostles treated very seriously all departures from their doctrine. We need only think of such expressions as “grievous wolves” (Acts xx. 29), “dogs” (Phil. iii. 2), and the terms in which Paul speaks of the Judaizing teachers in the Galatian Church, and of the Gnostic teachers referred to in the Epistle to the Colossians and the Pastoral Letters. With no less severity did the fathers of the Church condemn departures from the catholic doctrine. Polycarp regarded Marcion as the first-born of the Devil. Ignatius sees in heretics poisonous plants, or animals in human form. Justin and Tertullian condemn their errors as insiprations of the Evil One; Theophilus compares them to barren and rocky islands on which ships are wrecked; and Origen says, that as pirates place lights on cliffs to allure and destroy vessels in quest of refuge, so the Prince of this world lights the fires of false knowledge in order to destroy men. [Jerome calls the congregations of the heretics synagogues of Satan (Ep. 129), and says their communion is to be avoided like that of vipers and scorpions (Ep. 130).] They included under heresy all dissent from the fundamental doctrines of salvation, attributed it to insubordination to the apostolic faith, and regarded pride and ambition as its ultimate causes.

The apostles and fathers could not have tolerated all possible construction of its doctrine without being guilty of treason toward the Church of Christ. The same is true, in a smaller measure, of the Reformation period. Luther could not have tolerated the Zwinglian view of the Lord’s Supper without doing violence to his own convictions of the meaning of Scripture [?]. But, while the fathers were justified in insisting upon the fundamental truths of Christianity, it ought not to be overlooked that they knew how to distinguish between doctrines subversive of Christianity (such as Ebionism, Gnosticism, and Manicheism) and dissent in unessentials (as in the case of the Montanists, Novatians, Donatists, etc.). The baptism of Novatians, Donatists, Arians, etc., was recognized as valid (Augustine, De Bapt., I. 13, etc.). Heresy disturbed the unity of doctrine and of fellowship in the early Church. The Church was, therefore, forced to exclude heretics from its communion. Once excluded, they formed societies of their own. This was the case with the Novatians, Gnostics, Manicheans, Donatists, Nestorians, etc. But, relatively justified as the Donatists and others were, all these heretical organizations lacked vital power, and soon succumbed to disintegration, or dragged out a lingering existence. On the other hand, the Church was represented by such figures as “the pillar of truth,” “the body of Christ.” “No one can have God as a father, who does not accept of Christ as his mother,” says Cyprian; or “Christ for head, who does not belong to the Church as the body,” says Augustine. Notwithstanding this sharp distinction, Augustine and the early Church generally regarded only such false doctrine heresy which is persistent, and prompted by animosity to the Church (pertinacia animositate).

In the middle ages the Latin Church pronounced the Eastern Church schismatic, and itself the catholic or universal Church. The procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son (Pilipoue), adopted as a doctrine at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), has never been accepted by the Eastern Communion. But the Latin Church has never pronounced the Greek doctrine heretical. The dualistic errors of the Cathari, however, it did; and, when the Reformation came, it pursued the new sects with fire and sword. If the visible Church be the body of those who confess Christ, then the Latin, Eastern, and Protestant churches are parts of the one Church. The Latin Church, however, appropriating to itself the appellation “catholic,” calls the Greeks “schismatics,” and the Protestants “heretics.” If it be the Church, then the congregations outside of its pale do not belong to the Church, or participate in salvation; for the Church is the channel of salvation. Roman-Catholic theologians have avoided this conclusion by distinguishing between two kinds of heretics,—material heretics, or those who hold to error in ignorance, and are free from guilt, and formal heretics, or those who willingly and resolutely put themselves in antagonism to the Church (Perrone, Praelectiones, § 265). The Protestant Church does not pretend to be the Church, but only a part of it. Its confessions never declared either the Roman or the Eastern Church heretical, nor did the Lutheran Church call the Reformed doctrine of the Lord's Supper a heresy.

What, then, is the fundamental idea of heresy? Heresy is erroneous doctrine which has grown up in the Church, but denies its essential teachings as they were formulated by early Christianity. If that which is peculiar to and essential in Christianity is the confession in the Apostles' Creed of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,—three persons in a unity of essence,—then Trinitism, Ebionism, Monarchianism, and Arianism are heresies. If Christ is the God-Man, then Docetists, Samosaitians, Monophysites, and Nestorians are heretics; and if it be the office of the Holy Spirit alone to apply the benefits of redemption, and to regenerate, then the Pelagians belong in the same category.

Among the mistakes of the visible Church, which for many centuries disturbed the spiritual vision of Christians, and led to horrible crimes in the name of religion, must be counted the delusion that heresy ought to be punished by the civil power. While Luther raised his voice in indignation at the blood of the first heretic, in the name of religion, must be counted the holocausts of the Inquisition, and the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre. If the Bible says that he did not desire that heretics should be put to death, he shows the excellency of Christian wisdom above that of worldly policy and moral prudence. He also delivered several sermons before Parliament, of which we would mention A Pair of Companions for Church and State, November, 1642, and David's Song, June, 1643. For further information see Wood: Athenae Ozonienis, III. 477; and Krid: Memoirs of Westminster Divines, Paisley, 1811.

HEREMANN CONTRACTUS. See HERMANN.

HERLE, Charles, b. at Prideaux Herle, Cornwall, Eng., 1598; d. Winwick, Lancashire, September, 1659. He entered Exeter College, Oxford, in 1612, and took his master's degree in 1618. He settled as a minister, at first in Devonshire, but soon after became rector of Winwick in Lancashire, where he remained until his death. He was appointed one of the Westminster Assembly of Divines in 1643, and, after the death of Dr. Twisse, as prolocutor of the same; in which position he continued to the close. He was a generous-minded Puritan and Presbyterian, with an irenic spirit, and took an active part in the organization of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire, and in providing a learned and faithful ministry for the churches, and excluding the scandalous and ignorant, for which he received much ill-deserved reproach. His principal works are of a practical character: Contemplations and Devotions, 44, London, 1643 (irenic towards the Independents); Wisdom's Tripos, London, 1655, in which he shows the excellency of Christian wisdom; and A Defence of the Orthodox Faith. See Valchin: Annales O. S. B., 1740, 178.

HERINO, b. in Flanders, in the first half of the tenth century; came in 965 to Lobbes or Lobach, a monastery situated on the Sambre in Hainault, and at that period the seat of a famous school; became teacher in the school, and in 990 abbot of the monastery, and died there Oct. 31, 1007. Besides some historical works (Regula episcoporum Tongrenensium, etc.), and a mathematical work (Regula de abaco), he wrote a work in defence of Paschaisius Radbertus, from which it appears that the doctrine of transubstantiation had not yet become generally adopted by the Church. See Mabillon: Annales O. S. B., IV. 178.
K. F. Ledderhoene, Halle, 1855, and by E. Pfeiffer, Berlin, 1858.

HERMANN or HERIMANN CONTRACTUS
(the same), b., of noble descent, July 18, 1013; entered, when he was only seven years old, the monastery of Reichenau, situated on an island in Lake Constance; took the vows when he was thirty; and d. in 1054. He was a man of vast learning and varied authorship; but his principal work is his chronicle, from the birth of Christ till 1054, and specially valuable for the time of Henry III. It was first printed at Basel, 1529, afterwards often. See PERTZ: Monum., V.; HANS JACOB: Herman der Lahme, Mainz, 1875.

HERMANN OF FRITZLAR, a mystic from the middle of the fourteenth century; was probably a rich layman, who, after travelling in France, Italy, and Germany, retired from the world, and devoted himself to study and authorship. His Die Blume der Schauung in lost; but his Heiligentothem, a compilation from sources now mostly lost, is printed in PFEIFFER: Deutsche Mystiker d. 14. Jahrhunderts, 1

HERMANN VON DER HARDT, b. at Melle, Westphalia, Nov. 15, 1660; d. at Helmstadt, Feb. 28, 1746; studied at Jena; became in 1686 a member of the Collegium Philobiblicum in Leipzig; staid for some time in Dresden in the house of Spener; and was in 1690 appointed professor of Oriental languages at Helmstatt. There he devoted himself to study and authorship. His Hervis Luthen', or a compilation from sources now mostly lost, is printed in PFEIFFER: Deutsche Mystiker d. 14. Jahrhunderts, 1

HERMANN VON WIED, or HERMANN V., b. Jan. 15, 1477; d. Aug. 15, 1552; was elected Archbishop of Cologne by the chapter in 1515, and confirmed by Leo X. In 1536 he convened a provincial synod, and introduced a number of reforms in his diocese, though without causing any conflict with Rome. But in 1542 he invited Butzer from Strasburg to preach the Reformed faith in the cathedral of Bonn; and at once began the attacks of the Roman curia and the opposition of his own chapter. When the contest became critical, the emperor, Charles V., stepped in; and, as the Protestant princes were unwilling to interpose, the archbishop was deposed, and retired to his estates at Wied. See C. VARRENTRAPP: Hermann v. Wied u. sein Reformationsversuch in Köln, Leipzig, 1878.

HERMAS ["the Pilgrim's Progress of the Church of the second century," Dean Stanley], a name given by "John" to the book he composed to us, called the Shepherd (Lamb, St. Paul's), and held in high esteem by the early Church [quoted by Ireneus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, etc.] The title Shepherd evidently was derived from the first words of the angel to the author, "I am the shepherd" (Ew1 e1p 5 1f19ap1).

Text. — We are now in possession of two Greek copies,—the one in the Sinaic manuscript, discovered 1859 (not complete); the other in the Leipzig manuscript, together with three pages found on Mount Athos. Editions appeared at Leipzig by RUD. ANGER (1836), by RUD. ANGER (1850), and DRESSEL (1863), HILGENFELD (1860), [2d ed. 1881]. There are two Latin translations,—the Vulgata and the Palatina (in the Vatican Library). The Vulgata was first edited by Faber Stapulensis, Paris, 1513; since then many times. Hilgenfeld's edition (Leipzig, 1879) is critical. D'Abbadie issued an Ethiopic translation, Leipzig, 1890. Its probable date is 543. The edition of Gebhardt and Harnack (Patres Apost., Leipzig, 1877), based upon the Sinaic manuscript, is the best.

Contents. — The book contains a number of visions accorded to Hermas. Their intent is to arouse Hermas, and the Church through him, to repentance. The time of repentance is limited, and will soon be at an end. The uniformity of style stamps the whole as one composition. The author divides the book into two parts; an aged woman explaining the visions of the first part, an angel those of the second. The visions contain revelations, commandments (to believe in the one God, practise alms, avoid falsehood and fornication, etc.), and similitudes. Hermas was neither a Judaizing Christian (Schwegler, Lipsius), nor an intense Paulinian, but a member of the orthodox church of his day.

Authorship. — The opinions may be reduced to four: (1) Relying upon the testimony of the Muratorian canon, a real Hermas, the brother of Bishop Pius (139-154), was author (Heyne, Gebhardt, Harnack); (2) Relying upon the statement in the book itself (Vis. II. 4, 3), that Hermas delivered the book to Clement, assumed to be Clement of Rome, the author is regarded as having been his contemporary (Gaab, Caspari, Alzog, Zahn); (3) Hermas wrote his book under Pius, but gave himself out for a contemporary of Clement, or for the Hermas of Rom. xvi. 14 (Behm, Ewald, Credner, Ritschl, Hefele, Dorner, Chiersch); (4) an unknown author of the second century who simulated the old Hermas (Schwegler, Lechler, Hilgenfeld, Lange, Donaldson). We hold to the first view, on the ground of the explicit statement in the Muratorian canon. The Clement referred to in the book is not necessarily Clement of Rome. The condition of the Church represented is that of the first half of the second century, with its Gnostic errors and its hypocrites. The work was probably written about 130, for we are not shut up to the period between 139-154, which, according to Lipsius, was the term of Pius' administration. Pius was not bishop in our sense, but a prominent presbyter. The book of Hermas speaks only of presbyters in the Roman Church (comp. Vis. II. 2, 6; III. 8, etc.).

HERMENEUTICS.

HERMENEUTICS, Biblical. I. DEFINITION.

The term "hermeneutics" is derived from ἴρμηνευτός (from ἴρμην, the messenger of the gods), and allied with ἰπω ("to inquire"), and has the broader meaning of explaining the thoughts of another (Xen., Mem., I. 2, 52; Thuc., II. 60), and the narrower meaning of translation (John i. 38, etc.). Hermeneutics differs from exegesis as the theory differs from practice, and has for its object the definition of the laws by which the meaning of the Scriptures is to be ascertained and communicated. Augustine spoke long ago of two qualifications of an interpreter of Scripture,—the capacity to find out the author's meaning, and the capacity to express it ("Modus inveniendi qua intelligenda sunt et modus preferendii, qua intellecta sunt,"—De Doct. Chr., I. 1); and Ernesti speaks in the same way ("Subtilitas intelligendi et explicandi").

II. PLACE.—There was an exegesis of the Bible before there was a science of exegesis; and hermeneutics cannot make an exegete, any more than homiletics may be called a preacher, or rhetoric an orator. Notwithstanding this, however, hermeneutics has its own place, and trains up the natural talent, and lays down laws for its exercise. "The same considerations," as Landerer has said, "which make theology, or the science of the true religion, necessary, make also hermeneutics necessary as a special theological discipline." It is a branch of historical theology, or more especially of exegetical theology, which investigates the historical origin of Christianity, and expounds its records. It regards the canon as fixed, and rests upon the shoulders of the science of biblical introduction, as well as upon those of biblical criticism, which is concerned with the integrity of the text. But on the other side, without the aid of hermeneutics, the occasion of the biblical writings and their design cannot be fully known; and even textual criticism depends to some extent upon the exposition of the text. The relation of hermeneutics, therefore, and biblical criticism and introduction, is one of mutual dependence.

III. METHOD.—The method which hermeneutics pursues is twofold,—the ascertainment of the meaning of Scripture; and its communication. The ascertainment of the author's thoughts is conditioned upon the accurate study of the language in which he has clothed them. The laws of grammar are to be strictly followed, and all the results of lexicographical learning to be applied. But it must not be forgotten that the man himself is the style, and that the thoughts of the author regulate the language; so that the letter of the grammar is by no means an infallible guide. In the interpretation of the Psalms and the Epistle to the Philippians, for example, it is necessary that the mood of the writer, and his peculiar environments, should be taken into consideration. Schleiermacher well says, "No bibli- cal book can be perfectly understood, except as it is studied with reference to the whole environment out of which it grew, and in connection with the position of author and readers" (Kurze Doctr., § 140). In this the interpreter is also to enter into the thoughts of the author, and is willing to do it. Experience teaches that only kindred souls can understand each other; or, as Luther says, "He only understands Virgil's Eclogues who has lived with the shepherds; and he who will understand a poet must travel to the poet's country." The interpreter must have religious feeling, but under no circumstances approach his work with dogmatic prepossessions.

Bengel says, "A living faith is the first qualification of an interpreter;" and Landerer says, "The interpreter must be led by the spirit of truth which rules in the Bible." Absolute freedom from prepossessions is as impossible as it is uncaled for. Indifferent to the truth of the Scripture he can not and ought not to be.

The communication of the meaning of the biblical writer may be effected in three ways,—by simple translation, by paraphrase, and by commentary. Paraphrases have their justification in the pregnancy and fulness of Scripture. As for the commentator, he should not merely give grammatical criticisms, but give a clear insight into the organism and aim of the book upon which he is commenting.

IV. PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION.—Departures from the true method of interpretation result from a failure to appreciate all the requirements of the exegete, and from a purpose, voluntary or involuntary, to put into the author's words a meaning which is not there. The first in point of historical origin is the allegorical method. The word comes from ἀληθευτής, which means to say something else than is expressed in the language. The allegorist therefore seeks to uncover a meaning which is not apparent on the surface; the presumption being, that the Spirit has concealed a sense behind the words, of which the human writers were not even conscious. According to this principle, there is a simple meaning, but also another, which the interpreter is to detect. This method was carried to ridiculous extremes in the ancient church and during the middle ages; and Luther says, "When I was a monk, I allegorized everything; but now I have given up allegorizing, and my first and best art is to explain the Scriptures according to the simple sense (simplici sensu); for it is in the literal sense that power, doctrine, and art reside." The so-called dogmatic method was also a mistake of the allegorical. The interpreter approaches the Bible with a rule of faith which is the norm of interpretation. In a special sense is this true of Roman-Catholic interpreters, who may not depart from the ecclesiastical tradition and the decrees of councils. Lohnis well expresses it, when he says (p. 151), "As a diplomat must explain and look at everything in the spirit, and with an eye to the interest, of his prince . . . so must the Catholic expositor follow the instructions, and interpret in the spirit, of the Catholic Church." Interpretation is thus made in a true sense of the word imposition of the word imposition of thought. The so-called rational method, according to which the interpreter is to approach the Bible with a mind absolutely devoid of prepossessions, did the very thing which its advocates professed to deprecate. The last method is the so-called philological, by which meaning is given to every special word is emphasized, and, as far as possible, enlarged.

V. HISTORY.—The interpretation of Scripture flourished long before hermeneutics was... reduced to a science, just as preaching was practiced before there was a science of homiletics. Not only the rabbins, but also Christ and the apostles, interpreted the Old Testament; the only difference being that the latter now gave a religious and ethical principle which is false reduced to a science, just as preaching was practiced as a bridge to the ceremonial laws and false Messianic hopes which we meet in Christ's time; the latter, to Neo-Platonism. The apostles, interpreted the Old Testament; the only difference being that the latter nowhere rove a real home of this method was Alexandria. Clement, who spoke of all Scripture as being uttered, as 'it were, in a parable (Strom., V. 575), was followed by Origen, who vigorously pursued this method, and found three senses in Scripture, corresponding to the three divisions of man's nature,—body, soul, and spirit. Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) carried allegorizing to a great excess in his commentaries on the Old Testament. The contemporary exegetical productions of the Western Church were neither as extensive nor as important as those of the East. Jerome (d. 420) deserves the first mention, on account of his philosophical acumen. He not only advocated the triple sense of Origen, but even spoke of a "forest of senses" (silva sensuum, Ep. 64). Augustine (d. 430), in his rules for the treatment of the Scriptures (De Doctr. Christ., III.), gives some valuable hints, and emphasizes the importance of the literal sense. Gregory the Great (d. 604), in his exposition of Job, does almost everything else but explain the literal meaning of the text. Isidore of Seville (d. 636) only made a collection from the works of his predecessors. Walafred Strabo's (d. 489) Glosses (Glossa ordinaria in biblia) continued to be used for a long time, and were cited by Petrus Lombardus (d. 1164) as the authority (uctoritas dicti). More valuable contributions were offered in the Orient by Ecumenius (tenth century), Theophylact (d. 1107), and Eutychius Zigabenus (twelfth century). Nicolaus of Lyra in Normandy (d. 1164) dealt more honestly with the text in his Psalms and Romans. He was strongly opposed to allegorizing, and sought to reproduce the author's train of thought. Heretics was first treated as a special science in the Lutheran Church by Flacius, in his Clavis Sac. Script. (Basel, 1567), and especially by Glassius, Philol. Sacra (Jena, 1628, ed. Buddeus, 1727). The intense dogmatism which followed in the Lutheran Church was opposed by the historical method which the Arminian Grotius (d. 1645) pursued in his Annotationes on the whole Bible. But of more influence upon exegesis was the Pietism of the latter part of the seventeenth century, which regarded it more as an exercise of worship than as a work of science. Spener (d. 1705) interpreted several of the New Testament writings under the influence of this theory; but Bengel (d. 1752) followed with the keen and suggestive notes of his Gnomen (Tüb., 1742); and a few years later Ernesti (d. 1781) became the eloquent champion of a strictly philosophical and grammatical exegesis in his Instituto interpretis N. T. (Lips., 1761, 5th ed., 1809, Eng. trans. by Terrot, 1843). Without denying its divine character, he held that the Bible should be interpreted by the same rules as any other book. Semler (d. 1791), on the other hand, advocated the so-called historical method, according to which the interpreter places himself in the environment of the writers. Ernesti's principles were followed by Beck (Monogrammata hrm. libr. N. T., Lips., 1803) and Keil (Lehrb. d. Herm. d. N. T., Leip., 1810); Semler's, by Bretschneider (Hist.-dogm. Ausleg. d. N. T., Leip., 1809), and, to a greater or less extent, by the exegesis of the rationalistic period,—Paulus (d. 1851), and others. In this century criticism has seen itself forced by the works of Strauss, and the historical investigations of the Tubingen school, to pursue a strictly historical method. But in the mean time Winer, by his Grammar (Leip., 1822), had laid the "sure foundation of New-Testament exegesis." Thus the exegesis of the last two generations has been built up on a grammatical-historical foundation. See EXEGESIS and INTRODUCTION.

HEREMES.

980

HEROD.

WOLDEMAR SCHMIDT.

HERMES and the HERMESIANS. Georg Hermes, b. at Dreyerwalde, Westphalia, April 22, 1775; d. at Bonn, May 26, 1831; studied theology and philosophy in the academy of Münster; was ordained priest in 1799, and in 1818 appointed professor of theology at Bonn. His writings are few (Ueber die innere Wahrheit des Christenthums, 1805; Einleitung in die christkatholische Theologie, 1. 1819, II. 1829; Christkatholische Dogmatik, edited after his death by his pupil, J. H. Achterfeld, 1834); but the influence he exercised personally and as a teacher was both wide and deep. Not only the theological faculty of Bonn—Achterfeld, professor in morals and practical theology; Braun, in church history and exegesis; Vogelsang, in dogmatics; and Müller, in exegesis—was wholly devoted to his ideas, but also the episcopal seminaries throughout the whole Rhine region; and in many places, as, for instance, in the diocese of Cologne, as long as Spiegel was archbishop, his pupils were openly and avowedly preferred. Nevertheless, as his power and influence increased, his relation to the Roman-Catholic Church was questioned. There was no dogma which he did not accept fully and without qualification; but his assertion, that, even if the dogmas of the Roman-Catholic Church had no other authority, reason would, when rightly applied, be compelled by itself to accept them, indicated a principle of speculation incompatible with the maxims of the Roman-Catholic Church; and the bold application of this principle to the development of their dogmatic system naturally appeared very dangerous in the eyes of the hierarchy. In September, 1835, a papal brief suddenly and unexpectedly met the movement with a detailed and unconditional condemnation. The Hermesians tried to avoid the blow by declaring that the views condemned by the papal brief were indeed abominable, but they were not theirs, nor were they to be found in the writings of Hermes; and two of the most prominent pupils of Hermes—Braun of Bonn, and Elvenich of Breslau—repaired to Rome to urge a new investigation. In this they failed, however; and at home a strong reaction set in against the Hermesians, especially in the diocese of Cologne, where Droste-Vischering had succeeded Spiegel. In a short time the movement died out, or was suppressed.

LIT. — NIETZSCHE: Philosophie H. Explicatio, Leipzig, 1839; PERRONE: Zur Geschichte d. II., Ratisbon, 1839; ELVENICH: Pius IX. und die Hermesianer Breslau, 1848. H. SCHMID.

HERMIAS, the author of a satire on Greek philosophy (λογος των Ιω ϕιλοσοφων), written from a Christian standpoint, now widely read, despite its wit and adroitness, though without scientific interest, and probably belonging to the close of the second or the beginning of the third century. Neither the book nor the author is mentioned in ancient literature. The book was edited by Seiler (Zurich, 1853), Dommerich (Halle, 1794), and Otto in Corpus Apocryphorum. V. E. BURGER: Handwörterbuch der lateinischen Literatur, vol. IX. (Dens, 1869) has published an excellent introduction.

HERMOCENES, an African heretic, a painter by profession, and probably a resident of Carthage, against whom Tertullian wrote his Adversus Hermogenem, between 186 and 207 (cf. BONWETSCH: Die Schriften Tertullians, Bonn, 1878). His principal tenet, the root of all his errors, was the eternity of matter. He seems to have written books, and he had pupils; but he formed no school. Theodoret, Origen, and Theophilus of Antioch, also wrote against him; but the notices of him found outside of Tertullian are often difficult to reconcile with each other. G. UHLMANN.

HERMON (peak), the present Jebel-esh-Sheikh (the chief mountain), the highest point of Anti-Lebanon, situated forty miles north-east of the Sea of Galilee, and thirty miles south-west of Damascus; rises 9,053 feet above the Mediterranean, and about 11,000 feet above the valley of the Jordan. It consists of three distinct peaks, and is covered with ice and snow all the year round, though in summer time only in the ravines. It formed the north-eastern boundary of Israel (Deut. iii. 8; Josh. xii. 1), and is often mentioned in the Old Testament. In the New Testament it is not mentioned, unless it be the scene of the transfiguration (Matt. xvi.; Mark ix.). In many points it fits the narrative of the Gospels better than Tabor.

HEROD.—[1. The Herodian Family, a family which for a century played a most conspicuous part in Jewish history, and witnessed the birth and career of Jesus of Nazareth, and the progress of the Apostolic Church, came in conflict with, used, intermarried with, and finally exterminated, the once noble Amosene family (see MACCABEES); catered at any cost to the Roman power, and in more than one instance won the warmest friendship of its emperors; ascended the throne of Judea, rebuilt the temple, and gave to the kingdom an external glory and importance which were never excelled, except in the reigns of David and Solomon. It gave birth to men of fine intellects, strong wills, and unusual talent for ruling, — a talent, which, as exhibited in Herod the Great, has been well said, might, with other environments, have won for him a name amongst the great rulers of nations. But, with these natural endowments of intellect, they combined an unscrupulousness in securing the ends of their ambition, and a licentiousness, which have seldom been equalled in history, and adroitness, though without scientific interest, and probably belonging to the close of the second or the beginning of the third century. Neither the book nor the author is mentioned in ancient literature. The book was edited by Seiler (Zurich, 1853), Dommerich (Halle, 1794), and Otto in Corpus Apocryphorum. V. E. BURGER: Handwörterbuch der lateinischen Literatur, vol. IX. (Dens, 1869) has published an excellent introduction.

The founder of the family was Antipas, an Idumean (Joseph., Antiq., XIV. 1, 3), who was made governor (σταραγμός) of Idumea by Alexander Janneus (d. 78). He was succeeded in this position by his son Antipater (d. 43), the father of Herod the Great. He was an ambitious man, and saw in the weak will of the Asmonean prince, Hyrcanus II., growing melanchooly, fit plans. When the latter was forced by his brother Aristobulus (in 69) to renounce his royal claims and high priestly office, Antipater's artifice succeeded in inducing him to escape from Jerusalem, and assert his rights. The close friendship between them continued. They together espoused Pompey's cause (64 B.C.), and, after the battle of Pharsalus, Caesar's (48 B.C.). Caesar rewarded both, confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, but made the wily Idumean procurator of Judea (47). The object of his ambition was probably gratified. It remained for his son to win the name and dignities of the royal office.

2. Herod the Great, king of Judea from 37 to 4 B.C.; of Idumean descent, and second son of Antipater. He was a man of restless ambition, strong will, and keen intellect, but cruel and unscrupulous. When, in 47 B.C., Antipater was rewarded for his services to Caesar with Roman citizenship and the procuratorship of Judea, Herod, who was then twenty-five (the νέα χάλεος of Josephus, Antiq., XIV. 9, 2 is probably a mistake of the copyist), was intrusted with the governorship of Galilee, and soon afterwards with the procuratorship of Cæsarea. He soon displayed his ability by riddling the territory of dangerous bands of robbers, and winning, by a rapid collection of tribute-money, the favor of Cassius (after Caesar's assassination 44 B.C.). In order to secure the confidence of his Jewish subjects, he put away his wife Doris, and married Mariamne, the grand-daughter of the high priest Hyrcanus. In 41 B.C. he was appointed tetrarch by Anthony, whose favor he had purchased with rich gifts. Forced the following year, by an irrigation of the Parthians, to abandon Jerusalem, he fled to Rome. By a generous use of money he secured the favor of Antony and Augustus, and through their influence was named king of Judea by the Senate. In 28 Mariamne was accused by Herod of infidelity, and executed.

The First Period (37-28 B.C.).—With great shrewdness and boldness Herod proceeded to remove the influences hostile to his power. Antigonus was executed, and forty-five of his more eminent supporters. Hyrcanus, who was living at Babylon, was recalled, that he might be under his eye. A Jewish priest of Babylon was appointed high priest; but, to appease his stepmother Alexandra, Herod soon after substituted in his stead her son Aristobulus, then seventeen years old. His Maccabean descent and popularity aroused the king's suspicion, and paid the forfeit of a violent death by drowning. Herod simulated sorrow before the Jewish people, but, being summoned to answer for the crime before Antony, was acquitted. Before setting out to meet Anthony, he provided that Mariamne should be killed, in case of his being found guilty. He was, that she might not come into the embraces of Anthony. But her love for her husband was from thenceforth changed into hatred. Another of Herod's enemies was Cleopatra. Antony, whom she was then ruling by her charms, compelled Herod to surrender the territory of Jericho into her hands, and to institute a campaign against the Arabian king to compel him to pay the tribute he owed her. In 31 B.C. he ordered the execution of Hyrcanus, and, after Antony's defeat at Actium, went to meet the victor Augustus at Rhodes, and had his royal title confirmed.

The Second Period (28-14 B.C.).—Once firmly established on his throne, Herod inaugurated a period of architectural splendor and munificence. He erected a theatre in Jerusalem, and an amphitheatre outside of its walls, introducing the Greek games in honor of Augustus. He built fortresses in Galilee and Perea, and also in Jerusalem. The old city of Samaria he reconstructed, calling it Sebaste, and erected the new city of Cæsarea on the site of Straton's tower. Twelve years were consumed in this last work: a theatre and an amphitheatre, with a temple dedicated to Augustus, and overlooking the city, were among its more magnificent buildings. The introduction of heathen games, and the conversion of heathen temples, enraged the Jews to the highest pitch. They plotted the king's death; but the plot was betrayed, and the guilty parties, executed. Herod endeavored to win their affection by munificent charities and by politic accommodation to their religious prejudices. In the year 25 B.C. his generous gifts alleviated the misery of a widespread famine; and five years afterwards he began the reconstruction of the temple. It was built with a lavish outlay; and, in deference to Jewish scruples, a thousand priests were employed as workmen upon the temple proper.

In the mean time Herod was growing more and more favor with the Roman emperor by timely aid to the army of the proconsul of Egypt in 24 B.C., and other evidences of loyalty. He sent his sons Alexander and Aristobulus to Rome to be educated. Augustus invited them to his palace, added to the king's dominion Trachonitis, Batanes, and Auranitis, and regarded Herod as his best friend after Agrippa.

The Third Period (14-4 B.C.).—The last years of Herod's life were darkened by suspicion, and made wretched by domestic troubles. His activity in building extends over into this period. He built Antipatris on the site of the Kapharsaba, the fortresses of Cypros and Phasaelis near Jericho, and beyond the confines of Palestine he adorned Ascalon, Tyre, Sidon, Damascus, Tripoli, Ptolemais, and other cities, and even Athens and Lacedaemon. The activity, however, which made him famous outside of his kingdom, im-bittered his own subjects, the Jews, against him.

Herod's court, with his many wives and eunuchs and haters, was a scene of jealousy and plots. The first to be struck by the tempest were Herod's two sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus, whom he sentenced to be executed 7 B.C. It was their murder which drew from Augustus the remark that he would rather be Herod's hog than his son. Then followed suspicion against Antipater, Herod's son by Doris, whom his father recalled from Rome, and executed. The restless discontent of the Jews, breaking out in continual acts of violence, added to the unhappiness of the monarch. A loathsome disease set in, his feet swelling, and his bowels being afflicted with ulcers. He went to the baths of Callirrhoe, at Jericho, for relief; and there he died, suffering great pains, but not before he had ordered the elders of the chief cities of the land to be confined in the amphitheatre, and to be executed at his death, that there might be some tears over his grave. This order the officers dared to disobey.

Herod was a man of fine physical powers, rare force of intellect and will, keen insight, calm presence of mind in the midst of difficulties, and daring courage. The combination of these qualities fitted him to be a general and a ruler. Nor did he lack generosity and noble magnanimity. But a bad environment and a passionate nature turned him into a heartless, despotic, and suspicious tyrant.

[It was in Herod's reign that Christ was born. The adroit invitation to the Wise Men from the East to return to Jerusalem and tell about the whereabouts of the child Jesus, under the plea of desiring to adore and worship him, is in exact accord with Herod's shrewd cunning, as the destruction of the children of Bethlehem was in harmony with the otherwise suspicious and cruel policy of his last years.]

3. Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (Luke iii.1) from 4 B.C. to 39 A.D., and son of Herod the Great, by his fourth wife, Malthace. Like his father, he was ambitious, and lavished large sums on public buildings. He built Tiberias, which he named in honor of the emperor. His first wife was the daughter of King Aretas; but he put her away, in order to marry Herodias, the wife of Herod Philip, his brother (not the tetrarch Philip, who married Salome). Instigated by Herodias, he went to Rome, to secure the title of king. Her ambition was his ruin. He was charged with crimes by the emissaries of Agrippa, and banished by Caligula to Lyons. Antipas is mentioned several times in the New Testament. He was openly rebuked by John the Baptist for adultery, and, at the instigation of his enraged wife Herodias, put the prophet to death (Mark vi.16-29). Jesus was sent to Antipas by Pilate, at his trial, on the ground that he belonged to his jurisdiction.
The king had been desirous of seeing Jesus (Luke xxi. 7-12). The Gospels represent him as superstitious, cunning, and depraved.

For Archelaus, ethnarch (4 B.C.-6 A.D.). See Archelaus.

5. Philip, tetrarch of Gaulonitis, Auranitis, etc. (4 B.C.-34 A.D.), and son of Herod the Great, by his fifth wife, Cleopatra. Unlike the rest of the Herodian family, he was distinguished for moderation and justice, and seems to have kept aloof from the intrigues of his house. He married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip. He is mentioned Luke iii. 1.

6. Herod Philip, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, daughter of Simon. He occupied a private station. His wife was Herodias, whom Antipas seduced. In Mark vi. 17 he is called simply Philip.

7, 8. Herod Agrippa I. and Herod Agrippa II. See Agrippa.

Herodians are mentioned in association with the Phariases as enemies of Jesus (Matt. xxii. 18; Mark iii. 6, xii. 13), and were probably followers of Herod Antipas, or the Herodian family generally. As such, they favored the Roman Government, and opposed the Jews, who were hostile to the Roman Government. Some of the fathers represent them as a separate Jewish sect (the fourth), whose peculiarity consisted in this, that they regarded Herod the Great as the Messiah (Epiphanius, Hier., XX.; Tertull., De praescr. Append.). But, as neither Josephus nor Philo mentions such a sect, we are justified in regarding this view as based upon a misunderstanding of the name, which confused a school of political opinion with a religious sect. See Steuch: Dissert. de Herodianis, Lund., 1706; Leuschner: De secta Herod., Hirschberg, 1751; and [Schürer: N. T. Zeitgesch., Westcott in Smith's Bible Dict.].

Herodias, the grand-daughter of Herod the Great, through his son Aristobulus and Berenice, the daughter of Herod's sister, Salome. Following the wish of her grandfather, she married his private man. Herod Antipas, on a visit to her husband and his brother at Rome, was enamoured of her, and seduced her to become his wife, putting away his former wife, the daughter of King Aretas. This relation was denounced by John the Baptist as adultery; and the latter was put to death by the offended jealousy of Herodias (Mark vi. 25). Her ambition precipitated her husband's deposition, but it seems to have kept aloof from the intrigues of his house. He married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip. He is mentioned Luke iii. 1.

Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, daughter of Simon. He occupied a private station. His wife was Herodias, whom Antipas seduced. In Mark vi. 17 he is called simply Philip.

Herod Agrippa I. and Herod Agrippa II. See Agrippa.

Lit.—The chief source of the history of the Herodian family is Josephus, also notices in the New Testament, Strabo, and Dio Cassius. Modern works. —The histories of Ewald (iv.), Milman (ii.), Anstius, and Cassius.

Herodians are mentioned in association with the Pharisees as enemies of Jesus (Matt. xxii. 18; Mark iii. 6, xii. 13), and were probably followers of Herod Antipas, or the Herodian family generally. As such, they favored the Roman Government, and opposed the Jews, who were hostile to the Roman Government. Some of the fathers represent them as a separate Jewish sect (the fourth), whose peculiarity consisted in this, that they regarded Herod the Great as the Messiah (Epiphanius, Hier., XX.; Tertull., De praescr. Append.). But, as neither Josephus nor Philo mentions such a sect, we are justified in regarding this view as based upon a misunderstanding of the name, which confused a school of political opinion with a religious sect. See Steuch: Dissert. de Herodianis, Lund., 1706; Leuschner: De secta Herod., Hirschberg, 1751; and [Schürer: N. T. Zeitgesch., Westcott in Smith's Bible Dict.].

Herodias, the grand-daughter of Herod the Great, through his son Aristobulus and Berenice, the daughter of Herod's sister, Salome. Following the wish of her grandfather, she married his private man. Herod Antipas, on a visit to her husband and his brother at Rome, was enamoured of her, and seduced her to become his wife, putting away his former wife, the daughter of King Aretas. This relation was denounced by John the Baptist as adultery; and the latter was put to death by the offended jealousy of Herodias (Mark vi. 25). Her ambition precipitated her husband's deposition, but it seems to have kept aloof from the intrigues of his house. He married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip. He is mentioned Luke iii. 1.

Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, daughter of Simon. He occupied a private station. His wife was Herodias, whom Antipas seduced. In Mark vi. 17 he is called simply Philip.

Herod Agrippa I. and Herod Agrippa II. See Agrippa.

Lit.—The chief source of the history of the Herodian family is Josephus, also notices in the New Testament, Strabo, and Dio Cassius. Modern works. —The histories of Ewald (iv.), Milman (ii.), Anstius, and Cassius.

Herodians are mentioned in association with the Pharisees as enemies of Jesus (Matt. xxii. 18; Mark iii. 6, xii. 13), and were probably followers of Herod Antipas, or the Herodian family generally. As such, they favored the Roman Government, and opposed the Jews, who were hostile to the Roman Government. Some of the fathers represent them as a separate Jewish sect (the fourth), whose peculiarity consisted in this, that they regarded Herod the Great as the Messiah (Epiphanius, Hier., XX.; Tertull., De praescr. Append.). But, as neither Josephus nor Philo mentions such a sect, we are justified in regarding this view as based upon a misunderstanding of the name, which confused a school of political opinion with a religious sect. See Steuch: Dissert. de Herodianis, Lund., 1706; Leuschner: De secta Herod., Hirschberg, 1751; and [Schürer: N. T. Zeitgesch., Westcott in Smith's Bible Dict.].

Herodias, the grand-daughter of Herod the Great, through his son Aristobulus and Berenice, the daughter of Herod's sister, Salome. Following the wish of her grandfather, she married his private man. Herod Antipas, on a visit to her husband and his brother at Rome, was enamoured of her, and seduced her to become his wife, putting away his former wife, the daughter of King Aretas. This relation was denounced by John the Baptist as adultery; and the latter was put to death by the offended jealousy of Herodias (Mark vi. 25). Her ambition precipitated her husband's deposition, but it seems to have kept aloof from the intrigues of his house. He married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip. He is mentioned Luke iii. 1.

Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, daughter of Simon. He occupied a private station. His wife was Herodias, whom Antipas seduced. In Mark vi. 17 he is called simply Philip.

Herod Agrippa I. and Herod Agrippa II. See Agrippa.

Lit.—The chief source of the history of the Herodian family is Josephus, also notices in the New Testament, Strabo, and Dio Cassius. Modern works. —The histories of Ewald (iv.), Milman (ii.), Anstius, and Cassius.

Herodians are mentioned in association with the Pharisees as enemies of Jesus (Matt. xxii. 18; Mark iii. 6, xii. 13), and were probably followers of Herod Antipas, or the Herodian family generally. As such, they favored the Roman Government, and opposed the Jews, who were hostile to the Roman Government. Some of the fathers represent them as a separate Jewish sect (the fourth), whose peculiarity consisted in this, that they regarded Herod the Great as the Messiah (Epiphanius, Hier., XX.; Tertull., De praescr. Append.). But, as neither Josephus nor Philo mentions such a sect, we are justified in regarding this view as based upon a misunderstanding of the name, which confused a school of political opinion with a religious sect. See Steuch: Dissert. de Herodianis, Lund., 1706; Leuschner: De secta Herod., Hirschberg, 1751; and [Schürer: N. T. Zeitgesch., Westcott in Smith's Bible Dict.].

Herodias, the grand-daughter of Herod the Great, through his son Aristobulus and Berenice, the daughter of Herod's sister, Salome. Following the wish of her grandfather, she married his private man. Herod Antipas, on a visit to her husband and his brother at Rome, was enamoured of her, and seduced her to become his wife, putting away his former wife, the daughter of King Aretas. This relation was denounced by John the Baptist as adultery; and the latter was put to death by the offended jealousy of Herodias (Mark vi. 25). Her ambition precipitated her husband's deposition, but it seems to have kept aloof from the intrigues of his house. He married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip. He is mentioned Luke iii. 1.

Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, daughter of Simon. He occupied a private station. His wife was Herodias, whom Antipas seduced. In Mark vi. 17 he is called simply Philip.

Herod Agrippa I. and Herod Agrippa II. See Agrippa.
and the Hessian government was established by the bulls Provinca soleresque (1821) and Ad dominici gregis custodiam (1827), and the edicts of Oct. 2, 1829 and Jan. 30, 1830, but proved unsatisfactory to both parties. A secret convention was made in 1854 with Bishop Ketteler of Mayence, but repudiated by the curia. Since 1868 all ecclesiastical relations have been estranged by secret legislation, to which the Roman curia, of course, has opposed its Non possumus. See MÜNSCHER: Geschichte d. hess. ref. Kirche, Cassel, 1850; VILMAR: Geschichte d. Confessions-bestandes in Hessen, Marburg, 1860. [H. HEFFE: Kircheng. beider Hessen, Marburg, 1870.] K. KOEHLER.

HESSHUSSN. Tilemann, b. at Wesel, in the duchy of Cleve, Nov. 3, 1527; d. at Helmstedt, Sept. 25, 1588; studied theology at Wittenberg; travelled in England and France; and was in 1553 appointed superintendent and pastor primarius at Goslar. That office he resigned in 1556. 1557 he was expelled from Rostock, where he had become professor in the university, and pastor of the Church of St. James. 1559 he was discharged as professor at Heidelberg, and superintendent-general of the Palatinate. 1562 he was by an armed force driven out of Magdeburg, where he had been appointed first preacher at the Church of St. John. 1569 he resigned his position as court-preacher at Neuburg. 1573 he fled from Jena, where he had become professor of theology. 1577 he was deposed as bishop of Samland. Fate had overtaken him. He who triumphantly had represented Flacius as teaching that the Devil was a creator as well as God, was now proved to teach that there were two divine beings, both omnipotent. Defending himself, the old gladiator retreated from the episcopal see of Samland to a professor's chair at Helmstedt; and, though wounded, he succeeded in raising new whirlwinds of strife. He could hold peace with none. Censure, condemnation, excommunication, persecution, were, if not his heart's desire, his conception of duty; and in his will he accuses himself of having been too lenient in denunciation, too slow to attack. Nevertheless, Hepe's judgment of him is too hard, calling him "one of the most odious Lutheran popes of the time," a man who had become "a zealot and a weather-cock." He was a consistent representative of that stand-point which makes no distinction between Christianity and theology, between the purity of faith and denominational loyalty, between church discipline and police discipline.

LIT. — J. G. LEUCKFELD: Historia Hessiwnana, Quedlinburg, 1718, containing a list of Heshusan's writings (not complete, however); HELMOLT: T. H. und seine 7 exilid, Leipzig, 1869; WILKENS: T. H., ein Streittheke der Lutherischen Kirche, Leipzig, 1857; BIEBER; K. HÄCKENSCHMIDT.

HESYCHASTS, The, a mystic and quietistic sect which originated in the Greek Church, among the monks of Mount Athos, in the fourteenth century, and caused the last great doctrinal controversy, within the Byzantine period, of that church. At the time when Mount Athos had reached the very acme of its fame and influence during the reign of Andronicus the Younger, when Symeon was abbot, the monks began to speak of a divine light, uncreated, and yet capable of being communicated, — the same as surround-in manuscript. (3) The otherwise unknown grammarian of Alexandria, who, probably in the fourth century, wrote the famous Greek dictionary, invaluable to the philologists, and also of some use to theologians, though the biblical glosses are mostly later interpolations. Last and best edition by Schmidt, Jena, 1858-68, 5 vols. quarto. See WACHSMUTH: De fontibus Suica, Leipzig, 1863.

HETERIÆ denotes, in the terminology of the Roman jurisprudence from the time of the emperors, any association or assembly for purposes not recognized by law; and it was as heteria that the Christian assemblies were first interfered with by the Roman authorities. See PLINIUS: Epist. X.

HETHERINGTON, William M., D.D., LL.D., b. near Dumfries, Scotland, June 4, 1808; d. at Glasgow, May 23, 1865. Educated at Edinburgh, ordained in the Church of Scotland, he joined the Free Church, and died as professor of apologetics and systematic theology in the Free Church College, Glasgow. He is favorably known by his Lectures, and prefaced it with a biographical sketch. Apologetics of the Christian Faith, Edinburgh, 1867.

HEUSSER, Mrs. Meta, the best female song writer and hymnist in the German language; b. April 6, 1797; d. Jan. 2, 1876. She was the fourth daughter of pastor Diethelm Schweizer, a relative and friend of Lavater, and spent her quiet life in Hirzel, a beautiful Swiss mountain village, in sight of Mount Rigi and the Lake of Luzerne. She married Dr. Heusser, an eminent physician, and became the mother of a large family. But her household duties did not prevent her from singing; “as the bird sings among the branches,” to express her love of Nature and Nature’s God, and the joys and sorrows of her heart. She never dreamed that her lays would be given to the world; but her friends, after many vain efforts, obtained her consent to publish anonymously some of them in Albert Knapp’s Christliche Gesäng, a collection of hymns, and passed into many collections and German hymn-books of Europe and America, especially the Easter hymn, Lamm das eliten, and Lüche der siegreich gerungen, and the Jesus hymn, O Jesus Christ, mein Leben. In 1857 Albert Knapp edited a volume of her poems, under the title Lieder einer Verborgenen. It was followed by a second series (Leipzig, 1867), under her real name, which at last became generally known. A selection from both volumes was translated into English by Miss Jane Northwick of Scotland (well known as the translator of Hymns from the Land of Luther), under the title Alpine Lyrics (Edinburgh and London, 1875). Mrs. Heusser was a woman of rare genius, piety, and loveliness of character. Her memory was stored with the choicest poetry, secular and religious. Knapp says that her “tender, spiritual lays far surpass those of former German poetesses;” and Koch, in his History of German Hymnology (3d ed.), calls her “the most eminent and noble among all the female poets of the whole Evangelical Church. Her poems flow freely from the fresh fountain of a heart in constant, holy communion with God.” Mrs. Heusser wrote, at the request of her children, a chronicle of her family, but strictly forbade its publication. PHILIP SCHAFF.

HEWIT, Nathaniel, b. at New London, Conn., Aug. 28, 1788; d. at Bridgeport, Conn., Feb. 3, 1867. He was graduated at Yale College 1808, and pastor of the Old School (Presbyterian) Church, Bridgeport, 1853-67. He took a leading part in the early temperance agitation.

HEYLYN, Peter, church historian; b. at Burford, near Oxford, Nov. 29, 1600; d. in London, May 8, 1692, and buried in Westminster Abbey. He graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and lectured there on geography. These lectures were published in 1621, passed through eight editions, and appeared in an enlarged form, under the title Cosmography, 1692. He was appointed chaplain to the king in 1626, at the recommendation of Laud; and in 1631 prebend of Westminster, and afterwards subdean; and was presented with several other livings. In 1631 appeared his History of St. George. He was a high Anglican, and very bitter against the Puritans. At the accusation of Prynne, whose Histriomastix he had analyzed for Charles, he was deprived by the Long Parliament of his livings, worth eight hundred pounds. He afterwards sold out several of his library, and obliged to go about in disguise to save himself from further hardships. At the restoration he preached a jubilant sermon to a large audience in Westminster Abbey. Heylyn was a patient investigator of history, and his learning was held in high esteem by Charles I.; but his writings display violent prejudices and controversial rancor. The Presbyterians were the special objects of his spleen; but even the witty churchman, Thomas Fuller, at the publication of his Church History of Britain (1655), did not escape his attacks. The latter, in an elegant epistle, however, quaintly asked, “Why should Peter fall out with Thomas, both being disciples of the same Lord and Master?” The Aërius Redivivus, or History of the Presbyterians, containing the Beginnings and Sucesses of that Active Sect, their Opposition to Monarchical and Episcopal Government, etc. (from 1558 to 1617), 2d ed., 1672, is a violent arraignment of the Presbyterians for being actuated with the spirit of the Devil, and the promoters of sedition, murder, and other crimes. In 1690 appeared his Historia Quinquagintarum, or a Historical Declaration of the Judgment of Western Churches, and more particularly of the Church of England, in the Five Controversial Points reproached with the Name of Arminianism, reprinted (1681) in the work named below. Of his many other writings, the best is Eccles. Restaurata, The History of the Reformation of the Church of England (from Edward VI. to 1566), 1681, reprinted in 2 vols. by the Ecclesiastical History Society, Cambridge, 1849. This work is written in a good style, and, in spite of Bishop Burnet's disparaging criticisms (Preface to Hist. of the Reformation), is in the main reliable, although strongly biased in the direction of High Anglicanism. In London, 1681, there appeared a reprint of several of his Historical and Miscellaneous Tracts. To this volume was prefixed his Life, written by his son-in-law, Dr. Barnard, London, 1881, reprinted in the Cambridge edition, 1849,—a quaint and bombastic work. The alleged mistakes of this Life led to the preparation of another by Vernon, 1882. On pp. cviii sqq. of the Cambridge edition will be found a list of Heylyn's writings.
HEZEKIAH.

HEYLN IN DE LAPIDE, Johannes, one of the last eminent representatives of scholasticism; a native of Germany; studied at Leipzig, Basel, and Paris, and settled in 1473 at Basel, as teacher of philosophy and theology. He was a decided realist, and caused, first in Basel, afterwards at Tubingen, whither he moved in 1477, so violent a contest between realism and nominalism, that he finally determined to retire altogether from the world. From 1477 till his death in 1486 he lived in a Carthusian monastery in Basel. His commentary on Aristotle was written during his stay in Paris, but not published until many years later, by his pupil, Aimerbach. See his Life, by F. Fischer, Basel, 1881.

HEZEKIAH (םְחֵיקָא), or abbreviated הָצְקִי, הָצְקִי, “Jehovah strengthens”), son of Ahaz, and at the age of twenty-five his successor on the throne of Judah; reigned twenty-nine years, or, according to the usual chronology, from 725 to 696 B.C. But he seems to have begun his reign before 725; for the fall of Samaria (in 722) occurred in its sixth year (2 Kings xviii. 10). The biblical sources of his life are 2 Kings xviii.—xx., Isa. xxxiv.—xxxix., 2 Chron. xxix.—xxxii., and the contemporary utterances of Isaiah, and the Book of Micah, which was written in the first six years of Hezekiah's reign. He had no sooner ascended the throne than he entered upon a twofold policy; on the one side seeking to elevate the interests of his subjects by abolishing idolatry, and restoring the theocratic worship, and on the other to re-establish the independence of the kingdom by shaking off the yoke of Syria. He began his reformatory activity by cleansing the temple, destroying the high places, and breaking in pieces the brazen serpent "that Moses had made" (2 Kings xviii. 4). Then followed the restoration of the worship of Jehovah. A great passover, celebrated, to which all the members of the reformed party in Judah were invited. It was celebrated at an unusual but not illegal time (Num. ix. 10—14), and lasted fourteen days. Idolatry continued to be prevalent in Judah during the first year of the reign, and was never wholly abolished by Hezekiah (2 Kings xxii. 13; Isa. xxx. 22, xxxi. 7); but, by the irresistible testimony of Isaiah (xxvi. 7; comp. 2 Chron. xxx. 14, xxxi. 1), it was he, and not Josiah, who centralised the worship at Jerusalem, and destroyed the high places.

A great injury to the state was done by the aristocratic party, which perniciously the unhealthy policy of Ahaz, and instead of bearing with resignation the Assyrian yoke, as Isaiah advised (x. 24, 27, xxx. 15 sqq.), clamoured for an Egyptian alliance, which would enable them to shake off the Assyrian power. It was formerly thought that an alliance with Egypt was made soon after the beginning of Sennacherib's reign; and it would seem, from Isa. xxxvi. 1, that he combined with his campaign against Egypt one against Judah in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign. But monumental records have shown that Sennacherib did not ascend the throne till 705 B.C.; so that his campaign against Egypt and Judah did not occur till the last period of Hezekiah's reign; and the false date of Isa. xxxvi. 1 is to be attributed to a wrong arrangement of the four incidents in Isa. xxxvi.—xxxix.

Hezekiah purchased, as he thought, a permanent peace by the payment of an immense tribute to Sennacherib; he received the money, broke his word, and continued his march against Jerusalem. The city seemed to be hopelessly doomed (Isa. xxxix. 1—3); but Isaiah predicted supernatural succor, which came in the descent of "the angel of the Lord, who smote the camp of the Assyrians" (Isa. xxxvii. 36). In the monumental records of Sennacherib's campaign against Hezekiah, this terrible calamity is not referred to; but a striking gap occurs in the account. After stating, "I shut him up in Jerusalem, the place of his residence, like a bird in a cage. I raised up walls against him, and closed up the exits of his city door," it suddenly breaks off, and does not speak of the city's having been taken. Herodotus (ii. 141) relates the remarkable story, that, when Sennacherib advanced upon Egypt, armies of mice, in answer to the prayer of the Egyptian king, Sethon, invaded the Assyrian camp by night, gnawed through the quivers, bows, and the handles of the shields of the Assyrians, so that they fled the next morning in terror. He also mentions a stone statue of Sethon holding a mouse in his hand, which was preserved in the temple of Hephestos. Ewald refers these two records to two different calamities, and supposes, with Josephus, that the angel of the Lord spread a virulent plague in the Assyrian army. However, the account of Herodotus points to this very thing (for mice were symbolical of plagues: 1 Sam. vi. 4), and is to be regarded as based on the production of the causes of Sennacherib's disaster in Judah. The profound impression which this calamity made is seen in Ps. lxi., lxxv., lxxvi., and in the honor in which Hezekiah was held by surrounding nations (2 Chron. xxxvi. 23). The miraculous deliverance is also referred to in 1 Macc. vii. 41; 2 Macc. viii. 31 (3 Macc. i. 33).

Hezekiah was taken ill after this event; but fifteen years were added to his life in answer to prayer (Isa. xxxviii. 5). The meaning of the sign on the sun-dial, which vouched for Hezekiah's recovery, is clear (Isa. xxviii. 8). The life of the king, which was regarded as being at an end, was, as it were, put back fifteen years. As it was, the sun standing still over Gibeon, there was, in this instance, no change of the usual relations of the sun and the earth. As at Gibeon the reference is only to an extraordinary continuance of the daylight, so here the reference is to a remarkable shining of the sun's rays, which stood in a relation of cause and effect to the prophet's knowledge of the sun's standing still.

Hezekiah was one of the restorers of the "TWW" (that is, the instrumental and vocal music of the Levites), and revived the use of David's and Asaph's psalms. He also appointed a commission to edit the second collection of the Solomonic proverbs. [See the Histories of Israel by Ewald (vol. iii.) and Stanley, who devotes a whole chapter (xxxviii.) to Hezekiah, and the art. Hezekiah in Smith's Bible Dictionary by Canon Farrar.]

OHRLER (DELITZSCH).

HICKS, ELIAS. A prominent minister of the society of Friends; b. at Hempstead, L.I., March 19, 1748; d. at Jericho, L.I., Feb. 27, 1830. He was a mechanic in the early part of his life, but later devoted himself to agriculture. When he was twenty-seven, to use his own words, he began to have "openings leading to the ministry," and subsequently became a noted preacher, and travelled extensively among the Yearly Meetings of American Friends preaching. When the more liberal element of the society of Friends, in the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia in 1827, broke off from the more conservative wing, they were called Hicksites. They became Unitarians; but, although Mr. Hicks used ambiguous language concerning the Trinity, it can hardly be made out that he promulged views subversive of the doctrine. He published Observations on Slavery, (N.Y., 1825), Extemporaneous Discourses (Phila., 1825), Journal of Religious Life and Labors (N.Y., 5th ed., 1832). See art. Friends, etc.

HICKSITES. See Hicks & Friends.

HID'DEKEL. See Tigris.

HIERAPOLIS (τηράπωλος, "holy city"), a city of Phrygia, situated a few miles north of Laodicea, in the basin of Maeander, owed its name to its thermal springs. It received Christianity at the same time as Laodicea and Colossus, and is mentioned by Paul (Col. iv. 13). A council was held there in 173, under presidency of Apollinaris, its bishop; and the Cataphryges, a Montanist sect, were condemned.

HIERARCHY (from ἱεραρχία, "sacred," and ἄρχων, "ruler") denotes a form of government in which the governing body claims to hold its power by divine injunction, and to transmit it through a sacramental act. The Roman Church probably presents the most perfect instance of a hierarchy which history ever saw, organized monarchical, the whole power centring in the Pope, and most minutely graded, both with respect to orders,—bishops, priests, deacons, exarchs, patriarchs, deans, vicars, cardinals, legates, etc. In the Greek Church the hierarchy is also divided into several patriarchs there is no pope. In the evangelical churches, where the State rules the Church, more or less of the hierarchical apparatus may be retained, as may be noticed by comparing the Church of England and the Protestant Church; while, when the Church is established on the principle of universal priesthood, and the congregation rules itself, as in the American churches and many free churches in Europe, all hierarchy disappears. See Church, Clergy, Jurisdiction.

HIERACAS, or HIERAX, was born about 275 A.D.; lived at Leontopolis in Egypt; wrote a vast knowledge of Greek and Egyptian lore, medicine, the exact sciences, philosophy, literature, etc.; wrote commentaries on the Old and New Testaments in Greek and Egyptian, and a work on the creation in six days; formed an association of pupils or friends, which combined study with ascetic exercises, and seclusion from the world, and exercised thereby a considerable influence on the development of monasticism. He is known, however, only from Epiphanius: Hær., 67. ADOLF HARNACK.

HIEROCLES, governor of Bithynia 306, of Alexandria 306, and afterwards of Syria and Phoenicia; took an active part in Diocletian's persecution of the Christians, and wrote a work against Christianity, which has become lost, but is tolerably known to us through Eusebius' answer, Contra Hieroclem. According to Eusebius, the only thing new and original in the book was a parallel drawn between Christ and Apollonius of Tyana; else the work was only an imitation of Celsus and Porphyry. Not to be confounded with this Hierocles is the Neo-Platonist philosopher of the same name, but of a much later date.

HIEROGLYPHICS (from the Greek ἱερογλύφος, "sacred," and γλύφω, "to carve") are pictures of animate or inanimate objects which are intended to convey ideas and words. They are found in all parts of the world, but the term usually relates to the Egyptian variety. For many years these latter hieroglyphics were a puzzle to the curious, but now they are perfectly intelligible. The key to them was the Rosetta Stone, now in the British Museum. One of Napoleon's officers discovered it in 1798 among the ruins of Fort St. Julien, near the mouth of the Rosetta branch of the Nile; but by the treaty of Alexandria it was given up to the English (1829). It is written in honor of Ptolemy V. (B.C. 195), written in Greek, hieroglyphic and demotic. The first clue was the discovery, that the name Ptolemy occurred in the Greek, and that, in a corresponding part of the hieroglyphics, there were characters enclosed in a ring, and these, it was conjectured, might be the hieroglyphics for Ptolemy. De Sacy announced the phonetic character of the name; Young and Champollion simultaneously (1817) announced the union in the characters of ideographic and phonetic elements. The Egyptian hieroglyphics are for the most part engraved: in old temples they are found in high relief. They are generally written from right to left, but are read either vertically or horizontally. They ceased to be written about 300 A.D. See for their decipherment, etc., the elaborate article by R. S. Poole, in the ninth edition of Encyc. Brit., vol. xi. 794-809.

The great dictionary of Egyptian hieroglyphics is the Hercynische DEMOTISCHE WÖRTERBUCH, Leipzig, 1867-82, 7 vols.

HIERONYMITES, or HERMITS OF ST. JE-ROME, is the name of several independent orders
HIGH PLACES.

Hieronymus. See Jerome.

High Church is the designation of a school in the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, which la s stress upon the apostolic origin of ministerial orders, and the propriety of an elaborate ritual in worship. These views were not represented among the Reformers of England, and did not show themselves among the theologians of the Anglican Church until after the controversy with the Puritans in the mid part of Elizabeth's reign. Their highest representative was Archbishop Laud (1633–45). The distinction became more sharp and definite in the early part of the present century. The tendency culminated in the so-called Tractarian movement, which carried Dr. Newman and a number of the best spirits of the Anglican communion over to the Church of Rome. Keble and Dr. Pusey (d. Sept. 16, 1882) were among the leaders of this movement. A wing of the High-Church party is known as the Ritualists. While High-Churchmen differ among themselves, they hold, in general, to baptismal regeneration, a real sacramental though not necessarily a corporal presence in the Eucharist, and to the apostolic succession of the bishops, and the sole validity of episcopal ordination. They practise an elaborate ritual, and often introduce into the service articles (as candles and crucifixes) and practices (as the confessional) which the majority of the Reformers of the Elizabethan period condemned.

The High-Church party in England includes at the present time much piety, and has displayed an extraordinary amount of zeal in introducing daily services, building churches and charitable institutions. The late Dr. Pusey, Regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford, was long their leader. In the U. S. the party has grown rapidly within the last twenty years. The late eloquent Dr. De Koven of Racine College was its most advanced advocate.

See Blunt: Dict. of Sects, etc., and Low Church.

High Places is the usual translation in the Old Testament of the Hebrew bamah (7729) see Ezek. xx. 29). I. Meaning. — Bamah was at first a designation of any eminence, and is used of the "waves of the sea" (Isa. xiv. 14), the "waves of the sea" (Job ix. 8, see margin), but especially of hills and mountains (Deut. xxxii. 13; 2 Sam. i. 19, 25; Ps. xviii. 33; Isa. lviii. 14, etc.). The term came to be applied in a technical and limited sense to eminences on which worship and sacrifices were offered both to idols (Num. xxii. 41, etc.) and to Jehovah (1 Sam. ix. 12, etc.). This was still another expression of the progress of the meaning of the term. It became the specific designation of a sanctuary, or any place where sacrifice was offered. The idea of elevation was perhaps still retained, but attached to the altar rather than the ground. Altars of sacrifice in the valley, as those of Baal in the Valley of Hinnom, were called "High Places" (Jer. vii. 31, xix. 5, 6, xxxii. 35, etc.), as also altars in cities (2 Kings xvii. 9; 2 Chron. xiv. 5, etc.). The high places were of the nature of buildings, and are described as having been built (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3), removed (2 Kings xvii. 4), thrown down (2 Chron. xxxi. 1), broken down (2 Kings xxxiii. 8), and burned (2 Kings xxxiii. 15). These activities point to elaborate structures; and express mention is made of the "houses," on the high places (1 Kings xii. 31, xiii. 52; 2 Kings xxiii. 19). From the isolated notice in Ezek. xvi. 16, it is which late stress upon the apostolic origin of ministerial orders, and the propriety of an elaborate ritual in worship. These views were not represented among the Reformers of England, and did not show themselves among the theologians of the Anglican Church until after the controversy with the Puritans in the mid part of Elizabeth's reign. Their highest representative was Archbishop Laud (1633–45). The distinction became more sharp and definite in the early part of the present century. The tendency culminated in the so-called Tractarian movement, which carried Dr. Newman and a number of the best spirits of the Anglican communion over to the Church of Rome. The Greeks placed the habitation of the gods on Mount Olympus, and the Persians on Alborad. The custom prevailed to a large extent among the neighbors of Israel,—the Moabites (Isa. xvi. 12, etc.) and the Canaanites (Deut. x. 2, etc.). The Moabites set apart special hills or mountains for the worship of Baal. To these high places of Baal, Balak conducted Balaam (Num. xxii. 41). Baal-Peor was a mountain sacred to him (Num. xxxii. 28, 29). Nebo was probably also sacred to the divinity of that name (Isa. xvi. 1). The patriarchs built altars wherever they pitched their tents (Gen. xxxvi. 12, xxxviii. 18), but they seem also to have frequently chosen eminences. Abraham went to a mountain in the land of Moriah to sacrifice Isaac (Gen. xxxvi. 2), and Jacob offered sacrifice on Mount Gilead (Gen. xxxi. 54). At a later period Mount Sinai was regarded as especially sacred; and Moses invested Eleazar with the garments of the high priesthood on Mount Hor (Num. xx. 25). It is altogether likely that the Hebrews were strongly influenced by the example of the Moabites and Canaanites, and adopted some of the sites of their religious observances (comp. Judg. vi. 25); but they were commanded to "pluck up" the high places of these peoples, as they were seats of idolatry (Num. xxxii. 52; Deut. xii. 2, xxxiii. 29). At the entrance to the Holy Land an altar was erected on Mount Ebal (Deut. xxvii. 5; Josh. vii. 30). Of the period prior to Samuel, the term "bamah" is only used three times of high places where worship was idolatrous (1 Kings xvii. 24; xxiii. 4; 2 Chron. xvii. 11), and how far it was rendered to Jehovah. The notices refer now to the one, now to the other, but leave the impression that the high places were regarded (after the construction of the temple) as illegitimate (1 Kings iii. 4—5), and the result of foreign and heathenish innovation (2 Kings xvii. 11; xxiii. 13, etc.).
HIGH PLACES. 989

3. From Hezekiah to Ezra.—With Hezekiah a new period begins in the history of the worship on high places. This king, so zealous in the cause of ecclesiastical reformation, sought to centralize the sacrifices of Israel at one altar. He declared war against the local shrines on high places (2 Kings xvii. 4, 22; 2 Chron. xxxii. 30). Of the period prior to Samuel, the term "bamah" is only used three times of high places (1 Sam. ix. 12; 19, 25). It is to be particularly noticed that only a single high place is referred to, and also that the prophets, as it would seem, had their dwelling-place there (1 Sam. x. 5). Of the reign of David, nothing is known; but we know that David worshipped on Mount Olivet (2 Sam. vi. 6, vii. 26, xiii. 19): the more primitive custom of the patriarchs still prevailed. It was a period of transition; and, although the tabernacle was no doubt held in honor, the tribes were isolated from it by the constant warfare of the times.

In the time of Samuel one high place is made prominent as a place of sacrifice (1 Sam. x. 12, 19, 25). It is to be particularly noticed that only a single high place is referred to, and also that the prophets, as it would seem, had their dwelling-place there (1 Sam. x. 5). Of the reign of David, nothing is known; but we know that David worshipped on Mount Olivet (2 Sam. vi. 6, vii. 26, xiii. 19). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18).

Both Ass (1 Kings xv. 14) and Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxi. 13) allowed some of the high places to remain (presumably those on which sacrifice was offered to Jehovah), but destroyed the low places (1 Kings xxi. 17, comp. xvi. 4; xx. 33, comp. xvii. 6). Under Jehoshaphah (2 Kings xii. 2), Amaziah (2 Kings xiv. 4), Azariah (2 Kings xiv. 5), and Jotham (2 Kings xv. 35) it is also stated that they were allowed to remain untouched; but in each of these cases the fact is stated as derogating from their religious reputation. In that period of anarchy, sacrifices were not confined to the tabernacle (Judg. ii. 5, vi. 26, xiii. 19): the more primitive custom of the patriarchs still prevailed. It was a period of transition; and, although the tabernacle was no doubt held in honor, the tribes were isolated from it by the constant warfare of the times.

In the time of Samuel one high place is made prominent as a place of sacrifice (1 Sam. x. 12, 19, 25). It is to be particularly noticed that only a single high place is referred to, and also that the prophets, as it would seem, had their dwelling-place there (1 Sam. x. 5). Of the reign of David, nothing is known; but we know that David worshipped on Mount Olivet (2 Sam. vi. 6, vii. 26, xiii. 19). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xix. 18). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings x989 HIGH PLACES.
HIGH PLACES.

It has been urged that the worship at the local altars was practised in ignorance of the commandment in Deut. xii. 1-11, enjoining one central altar, or in deliberate disobedience of it, or out of a misunderstanding of its meaning. The rabbis supposed that the rule was superseded by a special divine intimation. But none of these considerations sufficiently preclude the case as it existed before the erection of the temple; and none of them are necessary for the explanation of the apparent anomaly.

1. It is quite doubtful whether the Mosaic ordinance (Deut. xii. 10, etc.) was meant to absolutely exclude all other places of worship (De Wette, Rieth, etc.). In Exod. xx. 24 a plurality of altars is presupposed, and the mode of erecting them definitely defined by Moses. These altars, so far as they were erected to Jehovah, were not necessarily a breach of the Mosaic law (Professor Smith, chap. ix.) before the erection of the temple (1 Kings iii. 2).

2. The necessities of the case demanded local shrines. The history of the times, as well as special events, is in favor of this view. The anarchy of the period of the Judges, the rivalries between the tribes, and the constant instability of affairs to the time of Solomon, made it impossible for the tribes to go up regularly to the tabernacle. An altar was erected on Ebal by Joshua (Josh. viii. 30), while the tabernacle was close by at Gilgal, and it was not felt to be an anomaly. Local shrines were a necessity of the case, and as natural to the instincts of the people as they were consistent with the Jehovah-worship. The whole land was the sanctuary of Jehovah (Riehm).

3. The commandment centralizing worship and sacrifice at one altar was prospective (Lev. xvii. 3-9; Deut. xii. 10), and not to be enforced till a later date (Farrar, Rieth, etc.). The law was proleptic; and the menace of Lev. xxvi. 30 had an eye to the Moabitid idolatries, as is evident from the connection. The people were to be trained up to that idea, and principally by the subsequent construction of the temple, made it impossible for the tribes to go up regularly to the tabernacle. An altar was erected on Ebal by Joshua (Josh. viii. 30), while the tabernacle was close by at Gilgal, and it was not felt to be an anomaly. Local shrines were a necessity of the case, and as natural to the instincts of the people as they were consistent with the Jehovah-worship. The whole land was the sanctuary of Jehovah (Riehm).

4. It is hard at this time to distinguish how far the sacrifices at local altars were genuine Jehovah-worship, and how far the practices followed the fashions of the surrounding nations. The people not only did not fully obey the command of Moses and Joshua to destroy the altars of the Canaanites (Judg. ii. 2, etc.), but adopted the idolatries of their neighbors (Judg. ii. 11, 12, etc.).

5. The principle of the local worship of Jehovah was preserved, long after the high places were destroyed, in the synagogues.

Of the continuance of the high places and their altars of sacrifice after the construction of the temple, the following is to be said. (1) The worship on high places increased enormously under Solomon, and was largely the result of contact with foreign nations. Solomon increased the shrines in proportion to the diffusion of his influences. The people, always inclined to idolatry, were not slow in following their king's example. (2) Under the worst kings (Rehoboam, Jeroboam, Ahaz) the high places were most numerous. Later and better kings seem to have made a distinction between idolatrous and Jehovahistic shrines; but it is said of at least five of them (see above), to their disparagement, that they allowed them still to stand. (3) It is plain, that, after the temple was built, the worship at the high places was largely idolatrous. In proportion as the temple was forgotten, the sacrifices on local altars were practised in ignorance of the command. (4) It is evident that there must have been some development in the minds of the people in favor of the central temple, and against all high places, before Hezekiah's reign. (5) In general, the ritual and worship at these local altars, after Solomon's accession, must be regarded as having degenerated from the old and better standard. It has been said that the "temple of Solomon never stands contrasted with the popular high places as the seat of the Levitical system" (Professor Smith, chap. ix.). But the very construction and existence of the temple were a protest against the local worship. The statement also ignores the fact that the priests at the local shrines were, for the most part at least, not Levites, and stood in antagonism to the priesthood of the temple (1 Kings xii. 31; 2 Kings xxii. 9; 2 Chron. xi. 16). They seem to have been a distinct order. Moreover, the same books of the Kings and Chronicles give the account of the temple, its building and furniture, which describe the development and flourishing condition of the worship on the high places; so that violent injustice must be done to the narrative, if the work of the temple itself; and, in order to evade the conclusion that the temple was meant to be the central shrine, and that the sacrificial worship at the local altars was thenceforth illegitimate.

As in the case of so many other truths of divine revelation, the people in this one likewise failed for a while to comprehend its spirit, and to obey the letter, but afterwards were led to fall in with the providential design. Not only was the temple ignored by the erection of many local altars, but the very temple itself was despoiled by kings heathen in practice, like Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 24 sq.), and made the receptacle for heathen altars and heathen rites.

Lit.—Gesenius: Thesaurus; Oehler: A. Tliche Theol., I. pp. 393 sq.; Speaker's Commentary, Leviticus, Excursus on chap. xxvii.; the excellent art. Hökendiust, by Riehm, in Riehm's Handwörterbuch; arts. High Places, in Smith's Bibl. Dict. (Canon Farrar) and Schaff's Bible Dict. For views opposite to those expressed above, see Wellhausen: Gesch. Israels, pp. 17–53 (Der Ort d. Gollesdiensls; W. R. Smith: The O. T. in the Jewish Church (chap. ix.); Kuenen: Religion of Israel (London, 1874); the art. Hökendiust, in Herzog, R. E., 3d ed. (by HIGH PRIEST.

WOLF BAUDISSIN; REUS: Gesch. d. h. Schriften A. T. (§ 137); and the HISTORIES of EWALD and others. See also the Commentaries on Lev. xxvi. 30—34; xxvii. 29—34; xxxiv. 1—30.

HIGH PRIEST. The high priest was the spiritual head and representative of the theocratic people before Jehovah. In him was concentrated the mediatorialship between God and people; and in him the people could draw nigh to God. As in his person the people was represented, his sin offerings and that of the congregation, which was to be brought for certain sins, as prescribed Lev. iv., were the same. His sin was the people's sin (Lev. iv. 3), and God's good will towards the high priest also belonged to the people. The high priest was in the midst of a holy people, "the saint of the Lord" (Ps. cxi. 16). In him the own people (xxi. 14). Aaron's consecration to sons and the priestsgenerally Exod. xxix.; Lev. iv., were the same. His sin was concentrated to the priesthood in connection with that of his sons and the priests generally (Exod. xxix.; Lev. viii.). The ritual commenced by washing Aaron and his sons before the tabernacle of the congregation. Aaron was then invested with the sacred garments, and anointed with the holy oil, which was prepared according to Exod. xxx. 22—25. Aaron's successor was not anointed, but received only the high priest's garments. Without these garments, the high priest was only a private person, who could not represent the people, and incurred the penalty of death by appearing before Jehovah without them (Exod. xxviii. 35). His dress was peculiar, and passed to his successor at his death. The articles of his dress consisted of the following parts: (1) The breeches, or drawers, of linen, covering the loins and thighs; (2) The coat, a tunic or long skirt; (3) The girdle, also of linen: these three articles he had in common with the other priests. Over these parts he wore (4) the robe, or the ephod, being all of blue. The skirt of his robe had a remarkable trimming of pomegranates in blue, red, and crimson, with a bell of gold between each pomegranate alternately. The bells were to give a sound when the high priest went in and came out of the holy place (Exod. xxviii. 35). Over the robe came (5) the ephod, one part of which covered the back, and the other the front: upon it was placed (6) the breastplate. The covering of the head was (7) the mitre, or upper turban, which was different from (8) the bonnet. The mitre had a gold plate, engraved with "Holiness to the Lord," fastened to it by a ribbon of blue. For the functions to be performed annually on the day of atonement, dresses were prescribed (Lev. xvi. 4). The office of the Old-Testament priesthood was twofold: the high priest "the face of the Lord" (Mal. ii. 7). The functions of the high priest were the same as those of the common priests. He had oversight over the service of the temple and the temple treasury (2 Kings xxii. 4 sq.). The succession in the high priesthood was regulated in the manner of the right of succession,—that the first son, provided there were no legal difficulties, succeeded his father; and, in case he had died already, his oldest son followed. The number of high priests from Aaron to Phannias was, according to Josephus (Antl., XX. 10) eight: viz., from Aaron to Solomon, thirteen; during the temple of Solomon, eighteen; and fifty-two in the time of the second temple. Aaron was succeeded by Eleazar (Num. xx. 28), who was followed by Phinehas (Judg. xx. 28). Who the successors of Phinehas were till the time of Elea, we do not know. To enter into the different theories of who they were, or were not, is not our object. From Shalumm, the father of Hilkiah, the high priest in Josiah's reign, we can again follow up the succession of high priests. According to Josephus, Hilkiah was followed by Seraiah, who was killed by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (2 Kings xxv. 18 sq.). His son was Jehozadak, who went into the captivity (1 Chron. v. 41; A. V., vi. 15), and who was the father of Jeshua, who opens the series of high priests in Neh. xii., which ends with Jaddua, who was high priest in the time of Alexander the Great. Jaddua was followed by Onias I. his son, and he again by Simon I., the Just; then followed Onias II., Simon II., Onias III. The last high priest was Phannias, who was appointed by lot by the Zealots (Josephus, War, IV. 3, 8). With him the Old-Testament high priesthood ignominiously ended. DRITZSCH.

HILARY OF ARLES (Hiliarius Aralatensis), St., b. at Thbeathar, near Guza, 290; d. in the Island of Cyprus, 371; studied in Alexandria; embraced Christianity; visited St. Anthony; gave away all his wealth to the poor on his return to his native place in 807; retired to the desert near Magum to live as a hermit; gathered a great number of pupils, whom he settled in various places, and became thus the founder of monasticism in Palestine. He also visited Libya, Sicily, and Dalmatia; and, according to legend, he everywhere performed a great number of miracles. His life was written by St. Jerome. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on Oct. 21.

HILARY THE DEACON (Hilarius Diaconus), a deacon of the Church of Rome; lived about 380; partook in the schism of Lucifer of Cagliari, and wrote, according to Jerome, a work in defence of his opinion in the matter of the sacraments. The so-called Ambrosiaster and the Questions V. et N. Test., in the works of Augustine, are also... of Arianism. His persuasions induced a number of the Gallic bishops to refuse communion with him; and his power lay essentially in his thorough naturalization and scientific method. He employed an eloquent Latin style. His parents were Pagans, but of high social standing. Hilary enjoyed the facilities for education. In the introduction to his treatise on the Trinity he describes the stages a Pagan passes through in reaching the knowledge of God, which heathen philosophy reveals dimly. Christianity clearly. This description evidently depicts his own experience. He had reached the years of manhood when he professed Christianity. A statement of uncertain value speaks of his wife and daughter as following him. About the year 350 the popular voice called him to the bishopric of Poitiers.

The times were times of conflict. The Emperor Constantius determined to make Arianism the prevailing creed of the West, as it had become of the East. This end he endeavored to secure by intimidating the bishops. Hilary placed himself in antagonism to the emperor, and devoted all his energies to resist the spread of Arianism. His persuasions induced a number of the Gallic bishops to refuse communion with the Arian bishop of Arles, Saturninus; and in a letter to the emperor (355) he calls upon him to desist from his policy of coercion. At the Council of Beziers (356), presided over by Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 45), he died the following year. Hilary was one of the most conspicuous and original champions of the Nicene Creed,—Athanasius, Basil, and the two Gregories.

HILARY, Bishop of Poitiers (Pictarium), the place of his birth, was b. early in the fourth century; d. 366. He shone like a clear star alongside of the great champions of the Nicene Creed.—Athanasius, Basil, and the two Gregories. Among the teachers of the West of his day he was beyond dispute the first, and bore a strong resemblance to Tertullian, both in disposition and scientific method. He employed an elegant Latin style. His parents were Pagans, but of high social standing. Hilary enjoyed the facilities for education. In the introduction to his treatise on the Trinity he describes the stages a Pagan passes through in reaching the knowledge of God, which heathen philosophy reveals dimly. Christianity clearly. This description evidently depicts his own experience. He had reached the years of manhood when he professed Christianity. A statement of uncertain value speaks of his wife and daughter as following him. About the year 350 the popular voice called him to the bishopric of Poitiers.

The times were times of conflict. The Emperor Constantius determined to make Arianism the prevailing creed of the West, as it had become of the East. This end he endeavored to secure by intimidating the bishops. Hilary placed himself in antagonism to the emperor, and devoted all his energies to resist the spread of Arianism. His persuasions induced a number of the Gallic bishops to refuse communion with the Arian bishop of Arles, Saturninus; and in a letter to the emperor (355) he calls upon him to desist from his policy of coercion. At the Council of Beziers (356), presided over by Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 45), he died the following year. Hilary was one of the most conspicuous and original champions of the Nicene Creed,—Athanasius, Basil, and the two Gregories.
HILDA. 998  HILLEL.

See the Church Histories of Neander, Milman, Schaff, etc., and Dorner's History of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ.

HILDA, St., a grand-niece of Edwin, king of Northumbria; b. about 617; devoted herself to a religious life from her thirteenth year; became abbess of Heorta (now Hartlepool) in 650, and founded the cathedral-school of Le Mans from 1079 to 1092, and was in 1096 or 1098 chosen bishop of that diocese. In this position he encountered much trouble from his own chapter, from William Rufus of England, from the revival preacher Henry of Lausanne, and others. At one time he even went to Rome, demanding to be relieved from his duties; but Paschal II. would not give his consent. In 1125 he was chosen Archbishop of Tours; and there, too, he met with difficulties, though in the mean time he had raised himself to one of the foremost places among the ecclesiastics of his time. His works were first edited by A. Beaugendre (Paris, 1708), and then by J. J. Bourassé, in Migne: J. Intro., 171. They consist of Epistolae to Bernard of Clairvaux, Anselm, William of Champeaux, and others, Diplomata, Sermones (a hundred and forty-three in Aline), Opuscula (among which are Libellus de quatuor virtutibus, strongly influenced by Cicero, and Tractatus theologicos, probably nothing but a fragment of the summa of Hugo of St. Victor), and finally Poemata. His life was written by Hebert-Duperron (1558) and Deservillers (1877). Full information as to the literature is found in C. Chevalier: Repertoire, 1878. WAGENMANN.

HILDEBRAND. See GREGORY VII.

HILDEGARDE, St., b. in the castle of Böckelheim, 1089; was educated in the Benedictine nunneries of Disobodenberg, by Jutta von Sponeheim, whom she succeeded as abbess in 1136; and in 1147 the monastery of Rupertstberg, where she died in 1178. She received prophetic visions; and, as these were recognized by the Church, she came gradually to occupy a very exceptional position, and to exercise a very extraordinary influence, in the German Church. She is commemorated on Sept. 17, but she was never canonized. Her writings, Scivias (first printed in Paris, 1513, and Cologne, 1628), Liber Dictiorum Operum, Explanatio Regula S. Benedictici, Physica (nine books), Letters, etc., are found in Migne: Patroli., T. 197. Her life was written by Stilling, in A. S. Boll. ad 17 Sept., and by Dahn. Majestas, 1852. The complete biographical information is found in Linde: Die Handels, d. Landesbuch, in Wiesbad, Wies., 1877. [See also Richaud: Sainte Hildegarde, Aix, 1876.] BENRATH.

HILL, Rowland, an eccentric and popular English preacher; b. at Hawkestone, Aug. 23, 1744; d. in London, April 11, 1833. In 1764 he entered St. Mary's, Maynooth, and the classical and theological liberal course he came under the influence of Mr. Whitefield and the Methodists. He aroused opposition by preaching without a license, and by following the methods of the Methodists, and only secured ordination after six bishops had refused to perform the service. In 1778 he obtained the parish of Kingston, Somersetshire, but continued to indulge his favorite taste for open-air preaching. In 1783 he built Surrey Chapel, London, having fallen heir to a considerable fortune. He continued to preach almost up to the very day of his death, attracting immense audiences wherever he went. In the summer months he went off on preaching-tours through Great Britain. He was an eccentric man, and gifted with wit, and rare powers of drollery, which he used in the service of religion. Sheridan used to say, "I go to hear Rowland Hill, because his ideas come red-hot from the heart." In the Arminian controversy he espoused the Calvinistic side, and wrote some bitter pamphlets against John Wesley, the tone of which he afterwards regretted. His principal work was the collection of Village Dialogues (1810, 34th ed., 1839), in which he treats of current religious abuses, and general religious topics, in a homely and familiar, but terse and often sarcastic way. See Life, by Strney, London, 1833 (4th ed., 1844); Memoirs, by Rev. W. Jones, London, 2d ed., 1840; and Memoirs, by Shereman, London, 1851.

HILDEL, the most distinguished rabbi of the century just preceding the Christian era, was the son of a poor Jewish family living in Babylon; d. in Jerusalem late in the reign of Herod the Great,—according to Delitzsch, about 4 B.C. Our knowledge of his life is drawn exclusively from the Talmud, which gives an admitting picture of his acuteness of mind, and suavity of disposition. The whole narrative is exaggerated, but, according to Delitzsch, is to be accepted in its general outline. In many cases it is evidently unreliable; and such statements as that Hillel reached the age of Moses (a hundred and twenty), etc., will be received, in spite of the Jewish writer Geiger, with some grains of allowance by a critical age.

At an early age Hillel went to Jerusalem, where he worked as a day-laborer, using half of his wages, a victorius (twelve cents), for the support of his family, and the other half to gain admission to the Betha-Madras, where Shemiah and Abtalion were teaching. On one occasion, unable to pay the admission-fee, he clambered up to a window, where he sat the night through, listening to the discussions, and unmindful of the snow, which was falling, and gradually covered him up. There he was espied the next morning by the teachers within. This incident opened to the day-laborer the way to fame; and he became the founder of a school which was rather more liberal than that of his contemporary, Shammia. Hillel's memory has been only recently rescued from oblivion. He was no doubt a pure moralist; but the little we know of him is wholly inconsistent with the claim which has been made for him as the teacher and peer, and even the superior of Christ. Geiger says, "Hillel presents us with the picture of a genuine reformer. Jesus uttered no new thought." And Renan, in his Life of Christ, calls Hillel a Christianiser, from whose example Christ had learned to bear poverty with patience, and to oppose priests and hypocrites."
It only requires, however, a careful reading of the stories handed down of Hillel’s mental acuteness, to become convinced that he moved in the circle of Pharisaism, and never got beyond the narrow prejudices of his class. He was simply a rabbi (perhaps the best and purest of his order), a man of the school, following precedent; but he was in no sense a reformer for the race, nor do any of his sayings live as sources of power and influence in the world. Over his tomb the words were uttered, “Oh the gentle, the pious, the scholar of Ezra!” They were no doubt appropriate, but it would be preposterous to apply them to Christ. He is the author of the saying, “What is unpleasant to thyself, do not to thy neighbor.” This is the whole law, and all the rest is commentary upon it.” This has been highly praised, and it is no detract from its beauty to say that Jesus gave a better summary of the law when he made a statement of its positive requirements Mark xii. 30). The Talmudic illustrations of Hillel’s intellectual adroitness betray, if not a want of veracity, at least the spirit of rabbinism and hair-splitting casuistry which Jesus so fearlessly rebuked. Of those incidents which place him in an enviable light, the most striking, perhaps, is the one which relates how, at the sacrifices, he passed off an ox for a cow by swinging the animal’s tail to and fro, and so concealing its gender. The centuries have judged both the Jewish rabbi and the world’s Redeemer. Hillel, says Delitzsch, “is dead, and has his place as the representative of the Jewish law in the costum and ceremonial of the past: Jesus lives, and all the progress of civilization is the advancing victory of the light that goes out from him.”

HILLER, Philipp Friedrich, b. at Muhlhausen, Württemberg, Jan. 6, 1869; d. at Steinheim, April 24, 1798; studied at Tübingen 1719-24; and was appointed pastor of Neckargönningen in 1722, afterwards of Muhlhausen, and finally of Steinheim. In 1751 he lost his voice; and, being thus excluded from the pulpit, he devoted himself to hymn-writing. He wrote more than a thousand hymns and religious songs, of which many are still living in the German Church. A complete collection of his works by C. Ehmann, appeared at Reutlingen, 1844. Wagens. Imlyariites. See Arabia.

MIN. See Weights and Measures.

HINCKS, Edward, D.D., b. in Cork, Ireland, Aug. 1792; d. at Killeleagh, County Down, Dec. 5, 1866. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1826 became rector of Killeleagh. His father was T. D. Hincks, L.L.D., professor of Oriental languages in the Belfast Academical Institution, and he inherited a great fondness for languages. He occupies an honored place among the scholars of Egyptology and Assyriology, and to him much of the brilliant progress in these directions is owing. His success is the more remarkable as his strained means precluded the purchase of many books, or residence at the centres of such studies.

HINCMAR OF LAON was made Bishop of Laon in 888 by the aid of his uncle, Hincmar of Rheims; but opposing the king in the most useful manner, a monastic one, to his metropolis, and finally excommunicating his own chapter, he governed his diocese with such an arbitrariness, that he was deposed by the synod of Douai (871), presided over by his own uncle. The king took him prisoner, and had him blinded. Adrian II. interfered in vain, in his behalf. John VIII. gave him permission in 871 to read mass. He died in 882. A few of his letters have come down to us, and are found in Simondon’s edition of the works of Hincmar of Rheims.

HINCMAR OF RHEIMS, b. about 806; d. at Epernay, Dec. 21, 888. He was educated in the monasteries of St. Denis and Corvey; came to the court during the reign of the Emperor Louis, and formed the most intimate relation with his son, King Charles the Bald. At the synod of Verneuil (944), the king recommended him for the archiepiscopal see of Rheims, which he vacated since the deposition of Ebo in 835, and in the following year he was regularly elected and consecrated. He ruled his diocese with great firmness, and was generally successful in maintaining his metropolitan authority over his suffragan bishops, even in the face of the Pope; but, though he actually was the most prominent representative of the French Church, he failed in securing for himself the primacy of France; this dignity being conferred on Archbishop Ansegisus of Sens. Very remarkable is the use which Hincmar made of the pseudo-Isidorean decreals in his administration. He evidently considered them fraudulent, and strongly opposed the introduction of this new law in the church, except in cases in which the law spoke in his favor; then he appealed to it himself. In the theological movements of his time Hincmar also played a conspicuous part, though as a theologian he was without originality. In the predestination controversy with Gottschalk (which article see) he stood alone. Rabanus left him in the lurch. John Scotus Erigena, Ratzennus, Prudentius, Servatus Lupus, and others, declared against him. But he never gave in... In the transubstantiation controversy he sided with Paschasius Radbertus. One of his best literary performances is his Annals of Rheims continued by Flodoard. Shortly before his death he was driven away from Rheims by the Normans.

HINDS, Samuel, b. in the island of Barbadoes, 1791; d. at Netting Hill, London, Feb. 1st, 1877. After graduation at Oxford, he went (1810 as HINTON. 995

HIPPOLYTUS.

missionary to Barbadoes, but returned to England, and became assistant vicar of St. Alban's Hall, Oxford (1827), vicar of Yardley, Hertfordshire (1834), chaplain to Archbishop Whately, and rector and prebendary of Castleknock, Dublin Cathedral (1843), dean of Carlisle (1848), and bishop of Norwich (1849). He resigned his bishopric in 1855. His principal works are History and Topography of the United States (1832, American edition, enlarged, N. Y., 1853). Among his theological works may be mentioned The Harmony of Religious Truth and Human Reason (1832), Treatise on Man's Responsibility (1846). There is a complete edition of his works, in seven volumes. — James Hinton, son of the preceding; b. at Reading, 1822; d. at St. Michael, Dec. 16, 1875. He was the foremost surgical surgeon in London; at the same time he was greatly interested in philosophy, and wrote some remarkable works, Men and his Dwelling-place (1858), Life in Nature (1871, 2d ed., 1875), and on the northern coast of Africa; was the seat of those remarkable works, on and his Dwelling

HINTON, John Howard, b. at Oxford, March 24, 1791; d. at Bristol, Dec. 17, 1873. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh; entered the Baptist ministry, and was for many years one of the most intellectual preachers of London. "He shared with Binney the honor of the designation 'the students' preachers.' His best known work was History and Topography of the United States (1832, American edition, enlarged, N. Y., 1853). Among his theological works may be mentioned The Harmony of Religious Truth and Human Reason (1832), Treatise on Man's Responsibility (1846). There is a complete edition of his works, in seven volumes. — James Hinton, son of the preceding; b. at Reading, 1822; d. at St. Michael, Dec. 16, 1875. He was the foremost surgical surgeon in London; at the same time he was greatly interested in philosophy, and wrote those remarkable works, Men and his Dwelling-place (1858), Life in Nature (1871, 2d ed., 1875), and on the northern coast of Africa; was the seat of those remarkable works, on and his Dwelling HIPPO (the present Bona), a Roman colony on the northern coast of Africa; was the seat of two councils (393 and 426), of which the former is held in the Baptist ministry, and was for many years one of the most intellectual preachers of London. "He shared with Binney the honor of the designation 'the students' preachers.' His best known work was History and Topography of the United States (1832, American edition, enlarged, N. Y., 1853). Among his theological works may be mentioned The Harmony of Religious Truth and Human Reason (1832), Treatise on Man's Responsibility (1846). There is a complete edition of his works, in seven volumes. — James Hinton, son of the preceding; b. at Reading, 1822; d. at St. Michael, Dec. 16, 1875. He was the foremost surgical surgeon in London; at the same time he was greatly interested in philosophy, and wrote those remarkable works, Men and his Dwelling-place (1858), Life in Nature (1871, 2d ed., 1875), and on the northern coast of Africa; was the seat of those remarkable works, on and his Dwelling

HINTON, John Howard, b. at Oxford, March 24, 1791; d. at Bristol, Dec. 17, 1873. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh; entered the Baptist ministry, and was for many years one of the most intellectual preachers of London. "He shared with Binney the honor of the designation 'the students' preachers.' His best known work was History and Topography of the United States (1832, American edition, enlarged, N. Y., 1853). Among his theological works may be mentioned The Harmony of Religious Truth and Human Reason (1832), Treatise on Man's Responsibility (1846). There is a complete edition of his works, in seven volumes. — James Hinton, son of the preceding; b. at Reading, 1822; d. at St. Michael, Dec. 16, 1875. He was the foremost surgical surgeon in London; at the same time he was greatly interested in philosophy, and wrote those remarkable works, Men and his Dwelling-place (1858), Life in Nature (1871, 2d ed., 1875), and on the northern coast of Africa; was the seat of those remarkable works, on and his Dwelling

HIPPOLYTUS. 996

HIPPOLYTUS. 996

HIPPOLYTUS, a distinguished ecclesiastical writer; b. in the second half of the second century; d. about the year 240. Greek was his native tongue; and, although this may point to an Oriental birth, he was in Rome at an early age. He heard Irenaeus lecture (Photius). The vivid minuteness with which he relates the fortunes of Callistus leads to the conclusion that he was in Rome under Victor (189-199). At the beginning of the third century he was a presbyter, conspicuous for learning, eloquence, zeal, and moral earnestness. He dissented, in matters of doctrine, from Victor's successors (Zephyrinus and Callistus), holding the view that heretics should not be received back into the Church, and favoring the subordination theory of the Trinity: while they were inclined to Patripassianism. He sees to refer to himself as bishop, and stood at the head of a schismatic body in Rome (so also Prudentius). Thus much is extracted from the author's own work, the Philosophoumena. The other notices of his life are few. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., vii. 20, 26) calls him bishop, and puts his life in the reign of Alexander Severus (222-235); and Prudentius (400) designates his bishopric as Portus, the port of Rome. Jerome (Cat. Vet. Illust. 61) gives nothing more about him than a few of his writings. An ancient catalogue of Roman bishops, which Mommsen puts in 354, states that Hippolytus prebysiter, with the Roman Bishop Pontianus, was banished by Severus to the unhealthy Island of Sardinia (about 235). It does not say that he died there; and the account given by Prudentius (400) that his death by Prudentius can be harmonized with this statement, but is not corroborated by any other testimony. He says Hippolytus was regarded as a martyr by the Roman Church, and suffered martyrdom at Portus, being torn to pieces by horses. The authenticity of this account is justly denied by Dollinger, on the ground that this mode of punishment was not practised by the Romans. In 1551 a marble statue was exhumed at Portus, which represents Hippolytus in a sitting posture, with beard and high forehead. On the chair are inscribed the titles of his works.

Writings. — In 1842 a learned Greek, Minouides Minas, employed by the French Government, found at Mount Athos, and brought to Paris, a number of manuscripts. Among these was one which E. Miller published at Oxford in 1851, under the title Origines Philo sophorum; or, Refutation of all Heresies. The first book of this work was known before, and was generally ascribed to Origen. Of the original ten books, the second, third, and a part of the fourth, are still wanting. It is almost universally agreed by critics that this work is by the hand of Hippolytus, and not Origen. Baur (Theol. Jahrb., 1858) regarded the presbyter Caius as the author; but he has no followers in this opinion.

Hippolytus displays in this work wise judgment, large information, a wide acquaintance with the writings of philosophers, and acuteness in bringing out the relation of the ancient philosophies to the Christian heresies. He was as harsh and uncompromising a foe of philosophy as Tertullian. The Refutation of all Heresies (κατά παντὸς αἱ Διασκεδαστικὰς ἤλεγχος) is a polemical work whose main object is to refute the doctrines (and especially the secret doctrines) of the Gnostics, and to abash heretics by showing that their views were taken from Pagan philosophy and Oriental theosophy. Book i. gives a summary of the Greek, Druid, and Indian philosophies. Books ii. and iii. are lost. Book iv. begins in the middle of an account of Chaldanian astrology, and gives an account of the magic practised at that time, etc. Books v.—x. contain the account of the heresies. In v. the Ophites (Naeseni, Peratice, Sethites, Justinus) are treated; in vi., the followers of Simon Magnus, and Valentinus and his disciples; in vii., Basilides (whose views appear to us in an altogether new phase) and Marcion; in viii., the Dokia in Arabie, the Quartodecimani, and the Montanists; in ix., Patripassianism, the author giving a valuable picture of the congregation in Rome at that time, and in x. he summarizes the contents of books i. and iv.—ix. It was from this summary that Theodoret drew. From the fact that Hippolytus looks back upon the administration of Callistus (217—222) as belonging to the past, the date of composition may be assigned pretty confidently to the year 234.
HITTITES, The. Sons of Heth, the second son of Canaan. Only scattered references to the Hittites (2796) occur in the Old Testament, from which we could not as later we were able later to see the true situation of them at the time of their power. Generally, it is only scattered families that are mentioned, like those of Ephron, Ahimelech, or Uriah; or small communities, such as may have led to their being included in the lists so often repeated of the Canaanite tribes. But these were the families of Elon and Beer, with whom Esau intermarried. In Judg. i. 26, however, the land of the Hittites is at a distance from Palestine; and the same is the case in the history from the time of David. His census extended as far as the Hittites at Kadesh (if we may so correct "Tahtim-Hodshi," 2 Sam. xxiv. 6, as suggested by the LXX. Alex.). Solomon married Hittite women (1 Kings xi. 1); and the kings of the Hittites are mentioned (1 Kings x. 28; 2 Chron. i. 17; 2 Kings vii. 6) as parallel with the kings of Egypt and of Syria. They are the same as the "kings on this side Euphrates" (1 Kings iv. 24).

From the Hebrew Scriptures we could only gather, then, that the Hittites were of a Hamitic race, and regarded as aliens; that, from the time of Abraham to David, they had communities or families in Palestine; and that, from the time of Solomon, they had kings and territory to the north-east of Palestine. Here the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, with those of the Hittites themselves, discovered within the last few years, greatly add to our knowledge.

The Egyptians called the Hittites "Khita." They appear in the reign of Thothmes III., about 1500 B.C. (Rawlinson), as inhabiting a "great land," but only as one among other peoples. Later they became predominant, and were the chief enemy met by Seti I. and Ramesses II.; the former of whom captured their western capital, Kadesh, and the latter who brought home from them a victory over them at the same place (about 1350 B.C.), entered then into a treaty with them, and married the daughter of Khitassar, their king, as described in the poem of Pentaur. The allies of the Hittites are mentioned by Pentaur; and De Rouge identified them as distant as the extreme west of Asia Minor. This is not now credited; although we do know that their influence and arms must have extended, at least, as far as Smyrna.

The Assyrians knew the Hittites as "Khatti." They appear in the reign of Thothmes III., about 1500 B.C. (Rawlinson), as inhabiting a "great land," but only as one among other peoples. Later they became predominant, and were the chief enemy met by Seti I. and Ramesses II.; the former of whom captured their western capital, Kadesh, and the latter who brought home from them a victory over them at the same place (about 1350 B.C.), entered then into a treaty with them, and married the daughter of Khitassar, their king, as described in the poem of Pentaur. The allies of the Hittites are mentioned by Pentaur; and De Rouge identified them as distant as the extreme west of Asia Minor. This is not now credited; although we do know that their influence and arms must have extended, at least, as far as Smyrna.
teenth century B.C., before the Assyrian Empire had risen. Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1120) found the Hittites inhabiting the region extending westward and southward from Carchemish, and exercising a wide suzerainty north, almost, if not quite, to the Euxine Sea. His successors engaged in constant wars with them, until Sargon extinguished the Hittite power by the capture of Carchemish (717 B.C.), and its incorporation into the Assyrian Empire. The Khatti are mentioned by Sennacherib and Esarhaddon; but their name is merely applied to all the peoples of Syria and Phoenicia.

The monuments of the Hittites themselves have been identified since 1873, chiefly by the labors of Professor A. H. Sayce. The first known were four hieroglyphic inscriptions from Hamath, first faithfully copied in the Second Statement of the American Palestine Exploration Society in 1873. Since that time Hittite monuments with inscriptions have been found at Carchemish on the east, at Aleppo, at Ibreze in Lyconia, at Marash, at Bogaz Keui, and Eyuk in the Valley of the Lycus, and at Hamath as far east as Karabel, between Smyrna and Lake Van. The inscriptions have not yet been deciphered; although a hopeful key has been found in a silver boss, which contains the figure of a king, with his name of "Tarrik-timme, king of Khita and king of Helbon?", with the word "sar" (if it means king; which is a loan word, and not originally Semitic) following its noun, show a non-Semitic construction. It is, besides, difficult to see how a really inflecting language could invent or use syllabic characters. It is probable that the Hittites had their origin in the mountainous region of Central and Eastern Asia Minor, and spoke a Proto-Armenian or Alarodian language.

Of their religion we know little. Ashima is mentioned (2 Kings xvii. 30) as a god of Hamath. At Ibreze we have a figure of the great Hittite god, Sandan,—a god of agriculture. At Bogaz Keui are found nearly twenty figures of male and female deities. The Syrian god Adad, or Hadad, may have been originally Hittite. With the softened aspirate we seem to have the name in Hadram, son of King Toi of Hamath, another form of whose name is given (2 Sam. viii. 10) as Joram; the writer in 1 Chron. xviii. 10 choosing a form meaning Adad is exalted, rather than one meaning Jehovah is exalted. It is remarkable, however, that, on the Assyrian monuments, the element Jehovah enters into the name of the King Saul-bihdi, who is also called Bun-bihdi. This, however, belongs to a late period, when the Syrians were replacing the Hittites.

LIT.—WILLIAM HAYES WARD: The Hamath Inscriptions, in Second Statement of the Palestine Exploration Society, 1873 (this paper is accompanied by careful facsimiles); F. LENORMANT: Sceaux à légendes en écriture hamathénne, in Revue Archéologique, October, 1873 (an acute but futile attempt to find a clue to the character on some seals brought from Koyunjik); A. H. SAYCE: The Hamathite Inscriptions, in Transactions of the Society of Biblical Archaeology, vol. v. pt. 1, 1876; the same: The Monuments of the Hittites, and The Bilingual Hittite and Cuneiform Inscription of Tar-kondemos, ib., vol. vii. pt. 2, 1881; letters in The Academy, Aug. 16 and Nov. 1, 1879, Aug.-21, 1880; also The Decipherment of the Hittite Inscriptions, in The Independent, New York, May 18, 1882. See also E. SCHMIDT: Keinschriften- u. Geschichtsforschung, pp. 221-238; F. DELITZSCH: Wo lag das Paradies, pp. 263-280; T. K. CHEYN: Hittites, in Encyc. Brit., vol. xii. pp. 25-27; W. ST. CHAD BOSCAWEN: Carchemish the Capital of the Hittites, in The Independent, New York, April 29 and May 5, 1881. HITZIG, Ferdinand, a learned and bold exegete and critic of the Old Testament; the son of a rationalistic preacher; was b. at Hauingen in Baden, June 23, 1807; d. at Heidelberg, Jan. 22, 1875. He pursued the study of theology at Heidelberg under Paulus, at Halle under Gesenius, at Göttingen under Ewald, to whom he afterwards dedicated his Isaiah as the "founder of a new science of the Hebrew language and Old-Testament exegesis." In 1830 he became docent at Heidelberg; and in 1832 was called to Zurich, where he remained till 1841, when he was chosen as Umbreit's successor in Heidelberg. His work on the Phoenician and Hebrew neighbors, do not easily yield a Semitic etymology. Such Scripture names as Ephron, Zohar, Joram, Uriah, Elon, Beeri, Judith, and Basemath, are plainly Semitic, and may be either adopted or translated names; but such names as Khita, Helbon, sar (king of Khita and king of Helbon?), with the word "sar" (if it means king; which is a loan investigations. He enjoyed the esteem of his colleagues and friends. We can adopt the words of Kest, in the dedication of his History of Jesus (January, 1875, 2d ed., etc.): "To the memory of F. Hitzig, the honest man without fear, the faithful friend without deceit, the pride of Zurich and Heidelberg, the bold, restless architect of biblical science."

As an exegete and critic Hitzig was distinguished by untiring industry, acute penetration, uncorruptable love of truth, and thorough scholarship. He often succeeded, as in the department of textual criticism; but the number of confident but untenable assertions preponderate. The Commentaries on Isaiah is his best work. We agree with Hupfeld, that the translation shows the hand of a master, but with him must regret the author's failure "to understand the religious spirit of the prophet, and his apparent resolution to detect the most improbable, and to overlook the most natural sense." This is especially true of the second part of The Psalms (Heidelberg, new and enlarged edition, 1863-65), wherein the author, in all earnestness, not only puts the larger number of the psalms in the century just before Christ, but gives the circumstances under which each was written as exactly as though he could hear the grass growing under his feet (Bleek Einl. ins A. T., p. 619). In 1869-70 the History of the People of Israel appeared (Leizig). It comes down to 72 B.C.; but it was not the author's intention to give a history of the religion of Israel. Its assumptions are, as might be expected, numerous and arbitrary. The sojourn in the wilderness, for example, is put down at four years. He hazarded many conjectures where none were needed. In 1855 Ewald espoused in his old pupil a real intellectual brother of Hengstenberg.

It was a want of what the English call common sense which prevented this gifted and truth-loving investigator to such a remarkable degree from becoming an exemplary exegete and a trustworthy historian. Ewald was fully justified when he said against Hitzig: "It arose from a sermon preached by Hoadly in 1717 from John xviii. 36 ("My kingdom is not of this world"); in which he declared for political toleration irrespective of church connection, and asserted, as against the crown and clergy, that Christ was the only authoritative lawyer, etc., in the Church. He deprecated in the strongest language "men's suffering in their temporal rights upon account of any differences in those points in which the reason of mankind permits them to differ." (Preface to The Common Rights of Subjects). This sermon was brought up for consideration in convocation (1717); and its discussion threatened to lead to such disastrous consequences, that the body was prorogued by the crown, and did not sit again till 1802. Hoadly's chief work on this controversy was his Common Rights of Subjects defended, and the Nature of the Sacramental Test considered: an Answer to Dr. Sherlock's Indication of the Corporation and Test Acts, London, 1719. Among his other writings were an Essay on Miracles (1702), A Brief Vindication of the Church divine and controversial writer of the Church of England; b. at Westerham, Kent, Nov. 14, 1675; d. at Auburn, Sept. 10, 1830. He was a student and fellow of Carlin College, Cambridge; became rector of St. Peter-le-Poor, London, 1704, and Streatham, 1710; Bishop of Bangor, 1715; was soon translated to Hereford, to Salisbury (1729), and to Winchester (1734). Hoadly was one of the most able and influential prelates of the eighteenth century, and one of the earliest representatives of the principle of ecclesiastical toleration in the Church of England after the Restoration (1660). He was a typical Broad or Low Churchman. His name is more intimately associated than any other with the so-called "Bangorian Controversy," which engaged the pens of fifty writers, some of them, like Law and Sherlock, among the ablest of their day, and produced an intense excitement among all classes. It arose from a sermon preached by Hoadly in 1717 from John xviii. 36 ("My kingdom is not of this world"); in which he declared for political toleration irrespective of church connection, and asserted, as against the crown and clergy, that Christ was the only authoritative lawyer, etc., in the Church. He deprecated in the strongest language "men's suffering in their temporal rights upon account of any differences in those points in which the reason of mankind permits them to differ." (Preface to The Common Rights of Subjects). This sermon was brought up for consideration in convocation (1717); and its discussion threatened to lead to such disastrous consequences, that the body was prorogued by the crown, and did not sit again till 1802. Hoadly's chief work on this controversy was his Common Rights of Subjects defended, and the Nature of the Sacramental Test considered: an Answer to Dr. Sherlock's Indication of the Corporation and Test Acts, London, 1719. Among his other writings were an Essay on Miracles (1702), A Brief Vindication of the Church divine and controversial writer of the Church of England; b. at Westerham, Kent, Nov. 14, 1675; d. at Auburn, Sept. 10, 1830. He graduated at Princeton 1793, and was tutor there from 1796 to 1798. After holding several parishes, he became assistant minister of Trinity, New York, assistant bishop of the diocese of New York 1811, and bishop in 1816. He took a deep interest in the General Theological Seminary, New-York City, and was made professor of pastoral theology and pulpit eloquence in 1821. In 1828 he traveled in Europe on account of his health, and was one of the first Protestants to preach in Rome. He was a zealous advocate of episcopal ordination, and engaged in a controversy with Dr. John M. Mason (Presbyterian) of New York on that subject. Hoadly College, Geneva, N.Y., bears his name in its name the memory of the bishop. Among Dr. Hoadly's writings were Companion to the Altar, New York, 1804, 13th ed., 1840; Apology for Apost. Order, New York, 1807, new ed., 1844; Sermons vs. Redemption, 2 vols., London and New York, 1824. See Pathamous Works, with a memoir by Dr. Berrian (New York, 1833, 3 vols.), and Memoir of Bishop Hoadly by Schroeder (New York, 1833).
HOBBES, Thomas, b. at Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, April 5, 1588; d. at Hardwick Hall, in Devonshire, Dec. 4, 1679. He was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and spent the first part of his life, up to 1637, as tutor in various noble families, often travelling on the Continent with his pupils, and the last, after 1637, in a comprehensive and vigorous literary activity, first in Paris (1641–32), then in London, or in the country with the Hardwick family. His principal works are Elementa Philosophica de Cine (1642), Human Nature and De Corpore Politico (1650), Leviathan (1651, new ed., Oxford, 1881, London, 1882), Liberty and Necessity (1654), etc. His moral and political works were first collected in 1750; all his works in 1839–45, by Molesworth.

The Vita Hobbiame Auctorium gives full information concerning early editions, translations, etc. The philosophical standpoint of Hobbes may be described as an application to the study of man of the method and principles of the study of nature; and the results of this process were a psychology and a morals utterly antagonistic, not only of the Christian, but to the general philosophy of the time. On account of the merely preliminary stage which the science of nature had reached in the time of Hobbes, his conception is premature; but he carried it out with great vigor; and it happens, not unfrequently, that the materialistic psychology and utilitarian morals of to-day return to his writings, and adopt some modification of his paradoxes. There is no comprehensive monograph on Hobbes. See the art. by G. Croom Robertson, in Encyclopaedia Britannica.

HOCHMANN, Ernst Christof, surnamed Hochennau, b. 1670; d. 1721; studied law at Halle, but was relegated from the university on account of his participation in the extravagances of the Pietists. In 1697 he entered into relation with Arnold and Dippel, and repaired to Francfort with the aim of converting the Jews. But riots arose; and he retired to the estates of Count Wittgenstein, the refuge of all separatists and mystics. From 1700 to 1721 he wandered about, preaching in public, conducting worship in private, denouncing the lukewarmness of the clergy, etc. He was often arrested,—at Detmold 1702, Hanover 1703, Nuremberg 1708–09, Halle 1711, etc.; but he found also man adherents, especially at Crefeld, Duisburg, Mülheim, Wesel, Emmenrich, and other places in the Rhine-region. Full account of his views, influence, writings, etc., is found in M. Göbel: Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rhein-westf. Kirche, Coblenz, 1852, vol. ii.

HOCHSTRATEN. See HOOGSTRATEN.

HODGE, Charles, D.D., LL.D., of Scotch-Irish ancestry on his father's side, and through his mother related to the French Huguenots; b. Dec. 18, 1797, in Philadelphia, where his grandfather, a Christian merchant from the north of Ireland, had settled in 1735, and where his father, a godly physician, died in 1801; age of his offspring was only six months old; d. in Princeton, N.J., June 18, 1878. He matriculated at the College of New Jersey in 1812, and after graduation entered in 1816 the theological seminary in Princeton, having among his classmates his two life-long friends,—John Johns, afterwards bishop of Virginia, and Charles P. McLain, afterwards bishop of Ohio. In 1822 he was appointed by the General Assembly professor of biblical and Oriental literature. In 1822 he married Sarah Bache, great-grand-daughter of Benjamin Franklin. Soon after, he went abroad (1826–28) to prosecute special studies, and in Paris, Halle, and Berlin attended the lectures of De Sacy, Tholuck, Hengstenberg, and Neander. In 1825 he founded the Biblical Repository and Princeton Review, and during forty years was its editor, and the principal contributor to its pages. He received the degree of D.D. from Rutgers College in 1834, and that of LL.D. from Washington College, Pennsylvania, in 1844. In 1840 Dr. Hodge was transferred to the chair of didactic theology, retaining still, however, the department of New Testament exegesis, the duties of which he continued to discharge until his death. He was moderator of the General Assembly in 1846. Fifty years of his professoriate were completed in 1872, and the event was most impressively celebrated on the 23d of April. A large concourse, including four hundred of his own pupils, assembled to do him honor. Representatives from theological institutes, at home and abroad, mingled their congratulations with those of his colleagues; and letters expressing deepest sympathy with the occasion came from distinguished men in all quarters of the land and from across the seas. Dr. Hodge enjoyed what President Woolsey, at the jubilee just referred to, hoped he might enjoy,—"a sweet old age." He lived in the midst of his children and grandchildren; and, when the last moment came, they gathered round him. "Dearest," he said to a beloved daughter, "don't weep. To be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord. To be with the Lord is to see him. To see the Lord is to be like him." Of the children who survive him, three are ministers of the gospel; and two of these succeed him in the faculty of Princeton Theological Seminary, —Dr. C. W. Hodge, in the department of exegetical theology, and Dr. A. A. Hodge, in that of dogmatics. The latter wrote his father's biography (1880).

Dr. Hodge was a voluminous writer, and from the beginning to the end of his theological career his pen was never idle. In 1835 he published his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, his greatest exegetical work, and one of the most masterly commentaries on this Epistle that has ever been written. Other works followed at intervals of longer or shorter duration, —Constitutional History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, 1840; Way of Life, 1841, republished in England, translated into other languages, and circulated to the extent of thirty-five thousand copies in America; Commentary on Ephesians, 1856; on First Corinthians, 1857; on Second Corinthians, 1859. His magnum opus is the Systematic Theology (1871–73), of 3 vols. 8vo, and extending to 2260 pages. His last book, What is Darwinism? appeared in 1874. In addition to all this, it must be remembered that he contributed upwards of one hundred and thirty articles to the Princeton Review, many of which, besides exerting a powerful influence at the time of their publication, have since been gathered into volumes, and as Princeton Essays, Hodge's Essays (1857), and Hodge Contributions in Church Polity (ed. Rev. William Durant, 1878), have taken a permanent place in our theological literature.

This record of Dr. Hodge's literary life is suggestive of the great influence that he exerted. But, if we would properly estimate that influence, we must remember that three thousand ministers of the gospel passed under his instruction, and that to him was accorded the rare privilege, during his course of teaching, of achieving distinction as a teacher, exegete, preacher, controversialist, ecclesiastic, and systematic theologian. As a teacher he had few equals; and, if he did not display popular gifts in the pulpit, he revealed homiletical powers of a high order in the "conferences" on sabbath afternoons, where he spoke with his accustomed clearness and logical precision, but with great spontaneity, and amazing tenderness and unction.

Dr. Hodge's literary powers were seen at their best in his contributions to the Princeton Review, many of which are acknowledged masterpieces of controversial writing. They cover a wide range of topics, from the apologetical questions that concern our common Christianity, to questions of ecclesiastical administration, in which only Presbyterians have been supposed to take interest. But the questions in debate among American theologians during the period covered by Dr. Hodge's life, belonged, for the most part, to the departments of anthropology and soteriology; and it was upon these, accordingly, that his polemical powers were mainly employed.

Though always honorable in debate, we should nevertheless not be likely to have a correct idea of his character, if we judged him only by the polemical relations in which his writings reveal him. Controversy does not emphasize the amiable side of a man's nature. Dr. Hodge was a man of warm affection, of generous impulses, and of John-like piety. Devotion to Christ was the salient characteristic of his experience, and it was the test by which he judged the experiences of others. Hence, though a Presbyterian and a Calvinist, his sympathies went far beyond the Calvinists made him a friend of the Roman Catholics; and he lent a willing hand to the machinations of the Jesuits in Bohemia, simply out of rancor against the Reformed creed. Besides some polemical essays, he wrote Commentar. in Apocalypsin, 1610-40, 2 vols.

HOE VON HOHENEGG, b. at Vienna, 1580; d. at Dresden, 1612. He was appointed the modified and provincial Calvinism of a later day. And it is true that Dr. Hodge must be classed among the great defenders of the faith, rather than among the great constructive minds of the Church. He had no ambition to be epoch-making by marking the era of a new departure. But he has earned a higher title to fame, in that he was the champion of his Church's faith during a long and active life, her trusted leader in times of trial, and for more than a century the most conspicuous teacher of her ministry. The garnered wisdom of his life is given us in his Systematic Theology, the greatest system of dogmatics in our language.

HODY, Humphrey, b. at Odcombe, Somersetshire, Jan. 1, 1659; d. at Oxford, Jan. 20, 1706. He was appointed professor of divinity at Oxford, in 1698 Regius Professor of Greek, and in 1704 archdeacon of Oxford. In reward of his support of the ruling party in their treatment of the bishops, who had been deprived for refusing to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, he life, of achieving distinction as a teacher, exegete, preacher, controversialist, ecclesiastic, and systematic theologian. As a teacher he had few equals; and, if he did not display popular gifts in the pulpit, he revealed homiletical powers of a high order in the "conferences" on sabbath afternoons, where he spoke with his accustomed clearness and logical precision, but with great spontaneity, and amazing tenderness and unction.

Dr. Hodge's literary powers were seen at their best in his contributions to the Princeton Review, many of which are acknowledged masterpieces of controversial writing. They cover a wide range of topics, from the apologetical questions that concern our common Christianity, to questions of ecclesiastical administration, in which only Presbyterians have been supposed to take interest. But the questions in debate among American theologians during the period covered by Dr. Hodge's life, belonged, for the most part, to the departments of anthropology and soteriology; and it was upon these, accordingly, that his polemical powers were mainly employed.

Though always honorable in debate, we should nevertheless not be likely to have a correct idea of his character, if we judged him only by the polemical relations in which his writings reveal him. Controversy does not emphasize the amiable side of a man's nature. Dr. Hodge was a man of warm affection, of generous impulses, and of John-like piety. Devotion to Christ was the salient characteristic of his experience, and it was the test by which he judged the experiences of others. Hence, though a Presbyterian and a Calvinist, his sympathies went far beyond the Calvinists made him a friend of the Roman Catholics; and he lent a willing hand to the machinations of the Jesuits in Bohemia, simply out of rancor against the Reformed creed. Besides some polemical essays, he wrote Commentar. in Apocalypsin, 1610-40, 2 vols.

HOFACKER, Ludwig and Wilhelm, two brothers of rare piety and ministerial usefulness. Their father was pastor and deacon in Stuttgart. Ludwig was b. at Wildbad, April 15, 1798; was vicar in Stuttgart, and d. Nov. 18, 1828, as pastor in Rielingshausen, Württemberg, after a short ministry of four years, and with the words "Saviour, Saviour!" Wilhelm was b. in Göttingen, Feb. 18, 1805; pastor at Waiblingen, 1832, and of St. Leonard's Church, Stuttgart, 1835, where he d. Aug. 10, 1848, "a prince of God, with words of eternal life on his lips." Thousands flocked to hear both the brothers. The former appealed directly to the conscience; destroying the sinner's confidence in the righteousness of works, and presenting the atonement by Christ's blood as the only hope of the soul. He said, "I attack souls as with the approach of a storm." He was a popular orator, who is sometimes startling, but always rugged, positive, and powerful. Wilhelm likewise preached only on the fundamental themes of grace and guilt, but his rhetoric was more artistic and finished than his brother's. The former, those who would prefer who rather drink from a fresh, rushing, forest-brook; the latter, those who would rather kneel at the clear, placid, deep waters of a lovely lake. The Hofackers exerted a lasting influence upon the religious life of Württemberg, and thousands of copies of their sermons have been distributed.

LIT. — Ludwig Hofacker: Predigten (Stuttgart), and Life by A. Knapp (Heidelberg, 27th ed., 1860); Wilhelm Hofacker: Predigten (Stuttgart, 2d ed., 1857), and Life by his son L. Hofacker (Stuttgart, 1872). ROBERT KUBEL.

HOFFMANN, Andreas Gottlieb, b. at Wellbelen, near Magdeburg, April 13, 1798; d. at Jena, March 16, 1864; studied theology at Halle, more especially Oriental languages, under Gesenius, and was appointed professor of theology at Jena in 1821. His principal works are Grammatica Syriaca, Halle, 1827, translated into English by Day and Harris Cowper; and Euteurp d. hebräischen Alterthümer, Weimar, 1832.

HOFFMANN, Ludwig Friedrich Wilhelm, court-preacher in Berlin, and general-superintendent of Brandenburg; b. Oct. 30, 1806, in Leonberg, Württemberg, the birthplace of Schelling and Paul; d. of heart-disease, Aug. 28, 1873, in Berlin. His father was a thoughtful Pietist, and founder of the religious colony of Kornthal (1819). His brother Christoph was the originator of a movement for the colonization of Palestine. After passing through a theological course at Tübingen, where he had David Strauss for a fellow-student, he became vicar of Heumaden, and in 1834 pastor in Stuttgart. In 1838 he was made superintendent of the Institution for Missions in Basel. There he remained for twelve years, giving himself up with great enthusiasm to his duties and the study of the history of missions. During this period he published a number of works on missions, as Missionssstudien u. Vorträge ("Missionary Talks and Discourses"), Stuttgart, 1847, 1851, 1853; D.Epochen d. Kirchengesch. Indien ("Epochs in the Church History of India"), 1853, etc. From Basel he passed to Tübingen as professor; and from there, in 1852, he followed the call of Frederick William IV. as court-preacher to Berlin. He exerted a greater influence over the king of Prussia than any other man, in favor of ecclesiastical union. He was strongly in favor of a union of Lutherans, Calvinists, and the French Church on the basis of the Augsburg Confession, so that there might be "one evangelical Protestant Church with two confessional types." Hoffmann was an indefatigable worker, and exerted a powerful influence as an evangelical preacher who sympathized with the theology of Bengel. But more than anything else, his literary attainments was the frank and magnificent personality of the man. [He was chosen a delegate to the conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York in 1873, but died before it met.] He published a number of volumes of sermons under the titles Ruf zum Herrn (Berlin, 1854—58), D. Postane Deutschlands (1861—63), etc. See Leben u. Wirken d. Dr. Hoffmann, by his son, Berlin, 1878—80, 2 vols. RUDOLF KÖGEL.

HOFFMANN, Melchior, one of the most prominent Anabaptist leaders, a founder, by trade; was b. at Hall in Suabia; worked in Livonia when the Reformation reached those regions; threw himself with the native enthusiasm of his character into the movement; began to preach, met with great opposition; repaired to Wittenberg (1529), and returned with recommendations from Luther; caused great excitement in Dorpat and Reval, and was finally expelled from the country. On his return to Germany he was very coldly received by the Reformers, but obtained, nevertheless, an appointment as preacher at Kiel, in Holstein, 1527. Soon after, however, he began an attack on Luther's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. A commission was formed to investigate matters; and he was convicted of heresy, and expelled from Holstein 1529. His divergence from Luther made him at first well received at Strassburg, but it soon became apparent that he inclined towards the Anabaptists. He began to publish prophecies, and soon placed himself openly at the head of the party. In Emden he caused sore disturbances in 1536; and on his return to Strassburg he was arrested, and kept in prison for the rest of his life. He probably died in 1542. See lives by IERRMANN, Strassb., 1853 [ZUR LINDEN, Leiden, 1885].

HÖFLING, Johann Wilhelm Friedrich, b. at Drossenfeld, near Bayreuth, 1802; d. in Munich, April 5, 1853; studied theology at Erlangen, 1819—23, and was appointed pastor of St. Jobst, near Nuremberg, 1827; professor of theology at Erlangen, 1837; and member of the consistory in Munich, 1822. His principal works are Das Sakrament der Taufe (1846—48, 2 vols.) and Grundzüge evangelisch-lutherischer Kirchenverfassung (1850), occasioned by the movement of 1848, which also called forth a debate of the question of church constitution. His Liturgisches Urkundenbuch (1854) was published after his death, by Thomasius and Harnack. HERZOG.

HOFFMANN, Johann Chr. Karl, afterwards honored by Bavaria with the title von Hofmann; was b. Dec. 21, 1810, in Nürnberg, where, under the tutelage of a poor but pious mother, he was trained up in profound respect for religion; d. Dec. 20, 1877, in Erlangen. In 1837 he went to the university of Erlangen, and in 1829 to Berlin, walking on foot. Hegel, Schleiermacher, Neander, and Hengstenberg were lecturing side by side at the time. But Hofmann gave himself up almost exclusively to historical studies, under the tutelage of Abert, Blanke and Von Raumer. After spending several years at the gymnasium in Erlangen, he became repetent at the university, and in 1835 writes: "The more I occupy myself with Scripture exegesis, the more powerfully am I convinced of the certainty that the divine Word is one single work, and the more am I stimulated with the glad hope that our generation shall witness the victory of the truth of inspiration. . . . It is a sheer impossibility that the prophecies of the prophets and apostles are false, while their doctrines are true; for here form and contents, fact and doctrine, are one; and this is the distinguishing characteristic of revealed truth. . . . I pray God to permit me to see the Christ, now crucified by his enemies, lifted up by Himself, that I may place my hands in the print of the nails, and mark how him, in the glory of his victory, whom I have heretofore loved in the humility of his conflict and suffering." In 1841 he was made professor at Erlangen, exchanging a lecture-room with one hundred hearers, for one with only three; and returned in 1845 to Erlangen, a new period of prosperity for the university dating from that time. While at Rostock he took a deep interest in ecclesiastical matters, laboring zealously with Karsten, Wichern, and others, in the interest of missions. He was also interested in politics; Hoffm., and represented Erlangen and Fürth at several sessions of the Bavarian Parliament.

Among Hofmann's first publications were two historical works, Gesch. d. Aufuhrs in d. Seven nen (1837) and Weltgesch. f. Gymnasiaten (1839, 2d ed., 1853). His first effort in theology was D. 70 Jahre d. Jeremias u. d. Jerahmeel d. Daniel (1838). The 70 weeks of Daniel he counts in the order 62+1+7 (see Daniel). The 62 extend from 695 to 171 B.C.; the single week, from 171 to 164. The other 7 mark the intervening period before Christ's coming. Weissagung u. Erfüllung im A. u. N. Test. (1841-44) appeared at a time when two views of prophecy prevailed. Hengstenberg petrified it into simple prediction; speculative criticism dissipated it into presentiments, and placed the prophecies after events. Hofmann brought prophecy into closest connection with history, and treated it as an organic whole. History itself is prophecy; and each period contains the germ of the future, and prefigures it. The entire scriptural history is a prophecy of the final and eternal relation between God and man. The inauguration marks the beginning of the execution of the plan; for Christ is the new man, the antitype of the old: but it marks only the beginning of this fulfillment; for the head is only the realization of the intended perfect communion with God, when it is joined with the body of believers. Prophecy in the Old Testament becomes ever richer and richer in its forms, but points only to one goal,—the God-man. He is then, in turn, the starting-point for new prophecy and hope; his appearance being the prefiguration of the final glorification of the church of believers. The permanent worth of this work consists in the proof that the Old and New Testaments are parts of a single history of salvation; displaying the gradual realization, by divine interpositions, of redemption for the race.

Hofmann's second great work, D. Schriftbeweis (1852-56, 2 vols.; 2d ed., 1857-60), is an attempt to prove the authenticity and divine origin of Christianity from its records. He tabulated the usual method of doing this from single passages of Scripture; and himself sought to use the biblical record in its entirety, as one organic whole. He started from the idea, that, to understand Christianity, it was not necessary to describe religious experiences, nor rehearse the doctrines of the Scriptures and the Church, but to develop the simple fact that makes us Christians, or the communion of God with man, mediated by Christ. Herein he differs fundamentally from Schleiermacher, who starts out from the sense of absolute dependence in the Christian's experience. Hofmann starts with the new birth. The results at first surprise him, in which the Hebraic and the Greek were different. With Hofmann, all is historical; with Schleiermacher, nothing. This work aroused opposition. The author had denied the doctrine of vicarious atonement, and the charge was made against him of denying the atonement altogether. To this he replied in Schriften (1856-59).

Hofmann's other works were D. heil. Schrifl. N. T.'s (1832-81, 9 parts), Theol. Ethik (1875), Vermischte Aufsätze (Erlangen, 1878), Encyclopädie der Theologie (1879), and Biblische Hennweutik (1880), both published in Nordlingen. [See GRAU: Erinnungen an J.C.K. von Hofmann, Gütersloh, 1879.] ALBERT HAUCK.
duced was enormous; but the police interfered, and the Pope dared not recognize the miracles. In 1826 he quietly retired to a monastery in Grosswärden in Hungary. In 1844 he was made bishop in partibus. In 1848 he was expelled from Hungary by the revolutionists. See his life by A. FEUERBACH and by SCHAROLD, treating at length the question of the miraculous cures, the one pro, the other contra.

HOLBACH.

Paul Heinrich Dietrich, Baron d', b. at Heidelberg, in the Palatinate, 1723; d. at his estate of Grundvald, Jan. 21, 1789; lived mostly in Paris, and acquired a kind of celebrity by gathering around his table the "philosophers" of that time, and by writing, or causing to be written, some of the most characteristic books of the age. As those books were printed in foreign countries, and published anonymously, the authorship is in many cases doubtful. The most remarkable of them is the Système de la nature, and digonch harm by penetrating the lower social classes. Le christianisme dicoit, L'imposture sacerdotale, L'esprit du clerge', etc., are of less importance. WAGENMANN.

HOLINESS. See SANCTIFICATION.

HOLINESS OF GOD is, as Quenstedt substantively defined it, God's perfect and essential purity, and freedom from all defect and blemish (summa omnisque labis expen in Deo puritas). The Hebrew word ושפ ("holy," "to make holy") etymologically referred, not to the moral but the material nature; but there are no instances of its use in the latter sense. It was only used in the department of religion among the Hebrews; and, although the application of the term to the external nature or in history, but matter and motion. Le bon sens (1772) is a popularization of the Système de la nature, and did much harm by penetrating into the lower social classes. Le christianisme dicoit, L'imposture sacerdotale, L'esprit du clerge', etc., are of less importance. WAGENMANN.

HOLLAND.

The inhabitants possess full religious liberty. All the adherents of the different creeds have equal civil and political rights and privileges, and enjoy entire freedom of administration in every thing relating to their religion and its exercise. The various denominations, which were avowed by the constitution of 1815, are subsidized by the State. The total thus expended in 1883 was about eight hundred thousand dollars. In the north-east the Protestants preponderate; in the south, the Roman Catholics; while in the central provinces both are fairly represented. In the last fifty years there has been amid the entire population a slight but steady increase in the proportion of Protestants and Jews, and a corresponding decrease of Roman Catholics.

The census which follows is that of the year 1879; but in some of the following paragraphs, figures of a later date have been obtained, and are so stated.

By the authorities the population is classified thus as regards religion:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Religion</th>
<th>Population</th>
<th>Congregations</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Low-Dutch Reformed</td>
<td>2,186,869</td>
<td>1,345</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Walloons</td>
<td>9,729</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Remonstrants</td>
<td>9,078</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Christian Reformed</td>
<td>139,903</td>
<td>757</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Baptists</td>
<td>50,706</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Evangelical Lutherans</td>
<td>61,825</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Old Lutherans</td>
<td>9,660</td>
<td>90</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Moravians</td>
<td>312</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>English Episcopalans</td>
<td>431</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scotch Church</td>
<td>283</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>English Presbyterianans</td>
<td>283</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total Protestants</td>
<td>2,449,614</td>
<td>1,457</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roman Catholics</td>
<td>1,420,137</td>
<td>1,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Old Catholics</td>
<td>4,621</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Greek Church</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Low-Dutch Jews</td>
<td>78,075</td>
<td>167</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Portuguese Jews</td>
<td>3,018</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unknown</td>
<td>17,761</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>4,012,962</td>
<td>3,144</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

I. THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES. (a) The Netherlandish Reformed. — In 1617 Carleton, the English ambassador, stated, that, in Olden Barne-veldt's opinion, the greater part of the inhabitants of the United Provinces, and especially of the Province of Holland, were Roman Catholics. Yet in 1648, when the eighty-years' war was concluded by the Peace of Westphalia, the Reformed Churches alone were admitted to freedom. Its adherents, therefore, became the State Church, and so continued to be until the revolution of 1795, when all confessions were put on an equality. This relation to the State led to the formation of many Reformed churches, and that even in places where the small number of Protestants forbade the hope of a permanent organization. To this is due the fact, that many of these churches, especially in North Brabant, Zeeland, and Guelderland, ceased to exist when the connection with the State was broken off; and that the number of parishes, notwithstanding an increase in certain places after 1815, on the whole made small progress during the last hundred years. In the year 1784 there were about fifteen hundred congregations. Through the fall of the State Church these were reduced, in 1815, to about fourteen hundred and fifty; while now they have recovered, and numbered about sixteen hundred and eleven. In the places where the almost whole population became Protestant, we observe a pretty regular increase, as, for example, in Friesland, which in 1801 had a hundred and eighty congregations, in 1784 two hundred and ten, and now has two hundred and thirty-six.

When the Church became free from the State, it felt the lack of a proper independent organization; and all efforts to remedy this evil fell through amidst the troubles of the times. In the year 1816 King William I., who went back not only to the traditions of the earlier period, but even beyond them, gave a constitution to the Church just as if it still, even in its inner working, was under governmental direction. In the general joy at the termination of the long period of confusion, this measure met with no opposition except in the classis of Amsterdam; and it is still to-day the basis of the existing church order, since it gave shape to "the general regulations of the Reformed Church," made in 1852. But, while these gave to the body greater independence than it had in 1816 (e.g., in relation to the choice of officers), they obtained the royal sanction, which at that time was indispensable, only under "eleven conditions," which, however, so far as they had not already become invalid, were withdrawn by the royal decree of July 22, 1870.

The body now forms one whole; and instead of being called, as of old, "The Reformed churches," its legal name is "The Reformed Church." It embraces all the reformed in the Netherlands, not only the Low-Dutch, but also the Walloons, the Scotch Presbyterians, and the Scotch. The Walloon or French congregations are mainly composed of the refugees driven by persecution from France and Flanders. As the descendants of these gradually blended with the Netherlanders, their numbers as a distinct body decreased. In 1784 they had more than sixty ministers, in 1815 forty-seven ministers, with thirty-five congregations, but now have only seventeen congregations, with twenty-six ministers. The Presbyterian-English churches were formed only in those places where commercial intercourse, or the presence of an English garrison during the eighty-years' war, gave occasion for them. At present there exist only the one at Amsterdam, and that of the united Middelburg-Vlissingen. The only Scotch Church remaining is that of Rotterdam, founded in 1643.

The Reformed Church (1884) numbers 1,345 congregations, with 1,611 ministers. Twenty years ago there were about two hundred candidates for the ministry at command for vacant charges; while now candidates are lacking for more than 280 vacancies. The congregations are divided into a hundred and thirty-eight smaller circles, or "Ringe," and into forty-four large circles, or "Classes." These classes constitute ten provincial bodies, to which is added an eleventh, called the "Walloon Commission." The organization culminates in the synod, which consists of nineteen members, thirteen ministers, and six elders, who are named by the provincial authorities, who, in turn, are chosen by the classes.

The classical assemblies are the characteristic feature of the organism. They meet yearly for the election of officers and the discussion of such matters as are laid before them by the synod; and while, in the other assemblies, the ministers are twice as many as the elders, the classes are composed of all the ministers in their bounds, and an equal number of elders. The local congregation is governed by the consistory, which consists of an equal number of elders and deacons. Since 1807, in most cases, these, as well as the minister, are chosen by a college of representatives; these representatives being themselves chosen by the whole body of adult members, excepting such as are supported by the poor-funds of the church. This direct participation of the people in elections has in most of the churches, especially in the large cities, placed the power in the hands of the orthodox.

The management of the church property was in like manner directed by decrees of King William I., issued in 1819 and 1823; but these were reversed in October, 1869; and since that time most of the congregations have placed themselves under a general "Committee of Control," while the rest are altogether autonomous, and enjoy a so-called free administration.

From the beginning of the Reformation, the ministers were trained at the State universities, where theological faculties had been formed for this purpose. Although almost all candidates for the ministry took this method of preparation, it was not positively obligatory. The most recent law concerning the universities (in 1877) has released the professors from the duty of teaching the theology of the confessions; while in each university two professors, named by the synod of the Reformed Church, are charged with the duty of lecturing on dogmatic and practical theology. In 1883 the three State universities (Leyden, Utrecht, and Groningen), and that of the city of Amsterdam, together contained two hundred and twenty-eight students of theology.

Neither foreign nor domestic missions are carried on by the Church or its officers as such. And although the work finds little sympathy amid the growing materialism of the people, still, in later years, it has shown considerable activity, notwithstanding the divisions that prevail; which divisions, however, prevent the possibility of complete and accurate statistics. Besides the Moravian Society, which labored in the West Indies, there was until 1859 only the Netherlandish Missionary Society, which was founded in 1797. Now there are ten societies which send missionaries to the heathen and the Mohammedans, and one which confines itself to the Jews. In the year 1883 the receipts of these amounted to three hundred and fifty thousand gulden; and they employed a hundred and fifty-two missionaries, of whom sixty-six belonged to the Moravians, and twenty-five to the Rhenish union. The church-members are about a hundred thousand, and two hundred schools are attended by fourteen thousand scholars.

The public schools are "confessionless;" but there are hundreds of private schools, supported by Roman Catholics and Protestants, which base their teaching on Christianity. There are two considerable associations formed—one in 1860, the other in 1868—for the purpose of supporting and extending these schools.

Evangelistic work is carried on by several associations of believers, who together have forty-five evangelists in the field. Activity in this direction, as well as in work for lost children, fallen women, the blind, etc., is ever on the increase, although confessional differences hinder the desired co-operation among those who are of the same faith.

(3) The Christian Reformed. — In the third and fourth decades of this century there arose a reaction against the tendency to strip off from Christian faith all the peculiarities of the old confessions. This was supported by such men as DaCosta and Groen van Prinsterer, who never cultivated the old church. In 1834 the first departure took place; but it was embarrassed by the law which forbade more than twenty persons to assemble for worship. In 1836 a royal decree, which was renewed in 1841, confirmed the law, but pointed out a way in which new congregations could be formed. The first one thus formed was at Utrecht in 1839. But new decrees in 1849, 1852, and 1868, abrogated all restrictions; and the "Separatist Church" stood before the law like all the others, save that it drew no support from the treasury. In 1869 the synod at Middleburg united this body with certain other scattered congregations of like tendency, who had taken the name of "Churches under the Cross;" and henceforth the whole was known as the "Christian Reformed Church." It adheres in all essential points to the polity of the synod of Dort. Their general synod meets biennially. The ministers are trained at the theological seminary in Kampen, which has seven professors and seventy-nine students (1884). The number of churches rose from two hundred and twenty-six in 1860 to three hundred and seventy-one in 1884. The body has exerted a very happy influence upon the church from which they separated, by developing the power of the old faith, even when deprived of all support from the State.

(c) The Lutheran Church. — The Reformation entered the Netherlands under the form of Lutheranism. But this was soon supplanted, at first by the Baptists, and then by the Reformed; so that, from the middle of the sixteenth century, it has been of subordinate importance. The first congregation was formed at Woerden, and in the year 1566 it adopted the Augsburg Confession; but there was no bond between it and other like assemblies, until in 1603 seven ministers agreed upon a system of faith and worship. This ripened in 1812 into the so-called "Brotherhood," which had a synod which met at first at indefinite intervals, and afterwards every five years. The last one under the republic sat in 1866. In 1818 King William I. gave a new organization to the "Evangelical Lutheran Church," which, however, was modified in 1856 and 1859, so as to render the Church independent of the State. Since 1819 the synod meets yearly, consisting of fifteen members, of whom eight are ministers. The local church is governed by the consistory. During the past century the increase of the body has been slow. In 1874 there were forty-five churches and fifty-seven ministers; in 1815 forty-six churches and sixty ministers; in 1877 fifty churches and nine chapels, with sixty-two ministers. At first, ministers were educated abroad; but in 1816 a seminary was founded at Amsterdam, which now has two professors and six students.

Like all other Protestant bodies, this one felt the influence of rationalism. A re-action against this tendency appeared, in Amsterdam and elsewhere, in 1791, and led ultimately to an open break between the great majority and those who insisted upon maintaining the Augsburg Confession, liturgy, etc. The latter being excluded from the "Brotherhood," formed what was called the "Old Lutheran Church," which obtained legal sanction in 1855, and again in 1866. Its concerns are directed by a General Ecclesiastical Assembly, which consists of seventeen persons, of whom nine are clergymen. Candidates for the ministry were formerly educated at different schools in Amsterdam, but, since 1877, in the university, where one of the Lutheran ministers teaches dogmatics. The Old Lutherans now number eight churches and eleven ministers against four churches and seven ministers in the "Brotherhood." In course of time the sharp differences between the two bodies gradually became modified; and in 1874 the barriers which hindered the call of a minister of one church to a vacant pulpit in the other were done away.

(d) The Baptists. — These are often called "Mennonites," from the famous Menno Simons, who died in 1559. They were distinguished from other Protestants, not only by the rejection of infant baptism, but also by the lack of any central organization. Hence the stringent discipline introduced by Menno led to various divisions, known as "Waterlanders" and "Flandrians," from the districts in which they lived; but these were finally adjusted in 1650. Not long afterwards, doctrinal differences produced a new division, in which the orthodox took the name of "Zonists," and the liberals that of "Lamists;" both being derived from the immoral bearings of their respective localities. In 1801 both bodies were reunited, and the old party names passed out of use. The great peculiarity of the church is its confessional freedom. There is no common standard of doctrine. Whoever makes sincere confession of sin, and engages to lead a holy life, is admitted to membership, without regard to his views of the person and work of Christ. As a rule, only educated persons were from the beginning chosen to the ministry; but, in cases of necessity, men without any theological training were allowed to serve, taking the name of "predicators," or exhorters. This custom was gradually abandoned in later years, and now the instances of its occurrence are rare. In 1811 they all united in forming a general society for the encouragement of theological education and the maintenance of the ministry among the poorer congregations. At the same time they enlarged the support and the curriculum of the theological seminary which had been established at Amsterdam in 1731 by the Lamists. Their members are found chiefly in Friesland, North Holland, Groningen, and Overijssel. In each province there are assemblies, usually called "rings," or circles. The local church is governed by the minister or ministers with the wardens, the latter being chosen by the male members, although in some cases the females have a vote. In few congregations there are also deaconesses. The seminary contains fifteen students, and its two active professors belong to the university of Amsterdam.

(c) The Remonstrants.— This body dates its existence and its name from the early portion of the seventeenth century, when a number of ministers of the Reformed Church, in a paper called a Remonstrance, demanded a revision of the Belgic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism. After long preparation, a national synod was called to consider the matter, which met in 1618, 1619, and 1620, and, in case they refused to subscribe a confession which from that time the direction of affairs was under a papal internuncio at The Hague, and apostolic vicars at Herzogenbusch, Breda, and Limburg. This led to new activity among the Roman Catholics; and the re-establishment of the hierarchy by Pius X in 1833 was followed by a great increase of priests. In 1874 there were 350 parishes with 1,600 priests; in 1884, 1,000 parishes and rectories, with 2,202 priests, including those occupied in schools and in the administration.

In the reconstituted hierarchy the kingdom forms one province, which contains five dioceses; viz., the archbishopric of Utrecht with the suffragans of Haarlem, Herzogenbusch, Breda, and Roermond. Each diocese has a chapter, consisting of a dean and eight canons, who are the bishop's council, and meet monthly. In case of a vacancy they name three persons, from whom the Pope selects the successor. Each diocese has a seminary for priests under the bishop, who names all the professors. The dioceses are divided into deaneries, the presiding officers of which are the connecting link between the bishop and the lower clergy. The temporal affairs of each parish are under the direction of a board named by the bishop. Notwithstanding the relative decline previously noticed, it is evident, that, under the new arrangement of affairs, there has been a considerable increase in the schools and charitable foundations, as well as in the social and political influence of the body.

The Old-Catholic Church.— This body owes its existence to the conviction that the canon law forbade the suspension of the hierarchy at the time of the Reformation; and therefore the apostolic vicars appointed after 1580 were legitimate archbishops of Utrecht, although the state of the times did not allow them to bear the title. The authority of the vicars rested not upon their appointment by the Pope, but upon the choice of the chapter. It is well known what a ferment was produced in the seventeenth century by Jansenism in matters of doctrine, and Gallicanism in relation to the independence of national churches. When this agitation was at its height, the Pope cited to Rome the vicar Petrus Cotte (who was suspected of Jansenism), and of his own motion appointed Theodor de Kock in his place. A great number of the clergy rose in opposition, and as many as three hundred priests ranged themselves on the side of Codde. But the new vicar introduced many new priests, and the opposing party began to weaken. At last the chapter chose another archbishop, Cornelius Steenoven, who was consecrated by Varlet, bishop of Babylon in partibus, and thus preserved the succession. Excommunication followed; but the province maintained its position, and to this day has filled each vacancy made by death with a new election. In 1742 a suffragan bishop for Haarlem was appointed, and 1757 one for Deventer. The Old-Catholic, or, as it is popularly called, Jansenist Church, acknowledges the authority of the general councils and of the Tridentine decrees, but rejects the Vatican Council, with the dogmas of the immaculate conception and the papal infallibility.

But the number largely increased when the close of the eighty-years war made the Netherlands a place of refuge for all victims of persecution. They were of two classes,—one called Portuguese, the other German,—whose mutual relations were not very friendly. The former, though fewer in number, were richer and more cultivated: the latter were, for the most part, poor and ignorant, and there was but little intercourse. But this soon changed; since the Germans steadily grew in property and culture, while the others stood still, if they did not retrograde. Some differences in ceremonial, and especially in the pronunciation of the Hebrew, have prevented a complete fusion of the two; although from 1814 to 1870 they were joined in a common organization, and a rabbinical vacancy in one division could be filled by a person called from the other. The increase of the numbers from 52,000 in 1815 to 82,000 in 1882 shows the effect of this reunion.

(a) German Jews.—These incorporated with themselves their brethren already domiciled in the Netherlands, and subsequently the refugees from Poland and Lithuania, and now form the "Netherlandish-Israelite Society." They began to enter the country about the year 1815; though they were neither so much esteemed, nor enjoyed so many privileges, as the Portuguese. The congregation at Maarsen is considered the oldest, but the date of its origin is unknown. The one organized at Amsterdam in 1836 soon became the central point of all the rest. Permission to build a public synagogue was refused in 1848; but after an influx of Polish refugees in 1854, and an immigration of three thousand Lithuanians in 1868, there came finally in 1871 the erection of the still existing Great Synagogue in Amsterdam, in which all parties gradually united to form one congregation. Political equality was not attained until 1876. The first decree respecting the conduct of their affairs was issued in 1808. This established one supreme consistory for the Hollandish-German Israelites. When the country became a French province in 1813, the Jews were made subordinate to the central consistory in Paris; but the next year King William I. appointed a "General Commission of Advice" for all the Jews in the kingdom. From 1862 a strenuous endeavor was made to attain a definite organization, which, however, did not succeed until 1870; since which time the direction of the Netherlandish-Israelite Society, which is no longer united with the Portuguese, is in the hands of a central board, which meets yearly, while a permanent committee of three, sitting in Amsterdam, attends to the current business of the society. The whole body consists of a hundred and seventy-three congregations, which are divided into various circles and branches. Each local society is autonomous; and its spiritual interests are controlled by rabbis, instructors, and teachers. These are trained in a seminary which was founded for this purpose at Amsterdam in 1741, and was reorganized in 1882.

(b) Portuguese.—In 1492 the Jews were banished from Spain, after they had become wealthy and refined. Many fled to Portugal, where they were again persecuted, especially after the introduction of the Inquisition, in 1532. When Brie le fell into the hands of the Prince of Orange (1572), many of the refugees from Portugal were attracted toward North Netherland, and, becoming esteemed for their activity and success in trade, found little difficulty in settling there. They increased in number in Amsterdam until 1587, when they secured their first synagogue, which was soon followed by many others. In The Hague, also, there was early formed a synagogue of rich and influential Israelites. In 1838 they established at Amsterdam a school, from which proceeded the rabbinical seminary of to-day. Since 1870 affairs are managed by a central board. The society at The Hague has one rabbin, while that at Amsterdam has a college of three associates.

J. A. GERTH VAN WIJK, T. W. CHAMBERS.

HOLLAND. 1007

HOLMES, Robert, D.D., b. in Hampshire, 1749; d. at Oxford, 1806. He was educated at Oxford, took holy orders; became Dean of Winchester 1804. His great service to biblical literature was Vetus Testamentum Graecum cum Varia Lectionibus, Oxford, 1798-27, 5 vols., edited after his HOLFINITE.

HOLSTE, or HOLSTENIUS, Lucas, b. in Hamburg, 1586; d. in Rome, Feb. 2, 1681; studied at Leyden; visited England; settled in Paris, 1624. As librarian to President de Mesmes, was converted to Romanism. He accompanied Cardinal Barberini, in 1627, to Rome, where he was made librarian of the Vatican, member of the Congregation of the Index, etc. Most of his works were left unfinished; but his labors were, nevertheless, of great importance for the Liber pontificalis, Liber diurnus pontif. Rom., the martyrologies, etc. His collection of monastic rules (Codex Regularum) appeared first in Rome, 1681, afterwards, much enlarged, at Augsburg, 1759, 6 vols. folio. His letters were published by J. F. Boissoane, Paris, 1814.

HOLY FIRE, a ceremony symbolizing the resurrection of Christ, of very old date, and still observed in the Greek and Roman churches on Holy Saturday. On Good Friday all the lights and lamps of the church are extinguished, and the following day they are re-lit at a new fire kindled by sparks from a flint. In the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, where a Greek and an Armenian bishop officiate on that day, the priests claim that the new fire is brought miraculously from heaven; and the fraud gives rise to much scandal. See Schaff: Through Bible-Lands, p. 241. The spiritual significance of the pretended miracle is, however, beautiful; for the holy fire, the symbol of the Spirit, proceeds from the sepulchre of Christ, and is carried by disciples to the ends of the earth.

HOLY LEAGUE. I. An alliance concluded between Philip II. of Spain, the Pope, the Guises, and the Parliament of Paris, in 1576, for the purpose of destroying the Reformation in France. II. The Holy League of Nuremberg, concluded between Charles V., the archbishops of Mayence and Salzburg, and the dukes of Bavaria, Saxony, and Brunswick, in 1538, for the purpose of counteracting the League of Smalcald.

HOLY SEPULCHRE. The. According to John (xix. 41) there was a garden close by the spot where our Lord was crucified; and in the garden was a new sepulchre, in which he was laid, because it was nigh at hand, and it was the Jews' preparation-day. Otherwise the locality of the tomb is not indicated in the Gospels; nor is Golgotha, the spot where the crucifixion took place, located with any more definiteness. From Matt. xxvii. 32, John xix. 17, and Mark xv. 29, and more especially from Heb. xiii. 12, it is apparent that it lay outside the city; and from Matt. xxvii. 39, and Mark xv. 29, it may be inferred that a public road ran by it: indeed, the Romans used to select such localities for places of execution in order to make the punishment more impressive to the people. But this is all. The name gives no certain clue. The Hebrew Golgotha has by some—Jerome in old times, Krafft and Hengstenberg in modern times—been translated the "Hill of Death," the name denoting a public place of execution; but both linguistic and archaeological reasons speak against this derivation. The evangelists translate the "place of a skull" (John xix. 17; Matt. xxvii. 33; Mark xv. 22), or simply the "skull" (Luke xxiii. 39), probably referring to some topographical feature—a rock protruding through the soil in the form of a skull, or bare as a skull. Whether Golgotha was a slight elevation, or a hill, or a mountain, they leave undecided, and so does Eusebius. The pillar of Boecchus, however, and Renan, speaks of Monticulam Golgota, or Golgotha Ripet, whence the Mount Calvary of so frequent occurrence in the Roman-Catholic Church; that is, a hill with a chapel on its top, to which leads a pilgrim's path, with stations indicative of the various events of the passion.

In direct contradiction, as it would seem, to the above passages (Matt. xxvii. 32; John xix. 17; Mark xv. 20; and Heb. xiii. 12), the places which tradition points out for the crucifixion and sepulchre of our Lord lie a good distance within the wall of the present city. From the tower of David, at the Jaffa gate, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is descried, situated to the north-north-east, and rising on a hill between two minarets. But as early as in the eighth century, and again in the thirteenth, doubts were felt about the identity of the locality; and in the middle of the eighteenth century the tradition was formally rejected by Korte, Reise nach dem gelobten Lande, Altona, 1741, with three supplements, Halle, 1746. He was followed by Clarke (Travels in Palestine, London, 1811), Robinson (Biblical Researches, Boston, 1841, and Topography of Jerusalem, in Bibliotheca Sacra, 1846), Tobler (Golgotha, St. Gall, 1851), Wilson (The Lands of the Bible, London, 1847), and Schaff (Through Bible Lands, New York, 1879). The tradition has been defended by Chateaubriand (Itinéraire de Paris à Jerusalem, Paris, 1811), Scholz (Comm. de Golgotha siu, Bonn, 1825), Williams (The Holy City, London, 1845; 2d ed., 1849), Schulte (Jerusalem, Berlin, 1845), Kraft (Die Topographie Jerusalem, Bonn, 1846), Lord Nugent (Lands Classical and Sacred, London, 1845), Tischendorf (Reise in den Orient, Leipzig, 1846), George Finlay (On the Site of the Holy Sepulchre, London, 1847), Schaffier (Die echte Lage des heiligen Grabes, Bern, 1847), De Vogüé (Les Ecrits de Saint-Sauveur, Paris, 1860), Seppl (Jerusalem, 2d ed., 1873), Clermont-Ganneau (L'Authenticité du Saint-Sépulcre, Paris, 1877).

It would not be altogether impossible, however, to reconcile the Gospels and the tradition, as the site of the city-wall was so considerably altered by Hadrian that many places formerly out of it came to lie inside of it, and vice versa. I ut new difficulties arise from the circumstance that at the tradition gives no perfect certainty with respect to the identity of the localities it points out. Of course the first Christians knew the places where Christ was crucified and buried; but they evidently did not give much attention, or ascribe much value, to such externalities. Th n, when the Jewish war broke out, towards the close of 67, the Christians left Jerusalem for Pææa; and when they, later on, returned, the city and destruction of the city must have wrought such changes as to make the identification of special localities of no strongly marked external distinction very difficult. Then, again, w m Hadrian rebuilt the city on an entirely new p.
and with the avowed purpose of obliterating the distinctive character of the old city, new changes took place, which have made the tradition less and less reliable. It has been argued that the unbroken list of bishops of Jerusalem which Eusebius gives from James, the brother of the Lord, to Macarius, is a guaranty of the continuity of the tradition living in the congregation; but hearsay. It has also been argued that the frequent pilgrimages to the holy places of Jerusalem, which, according to Cyril (Catech., 17, 16), were made from the time of the apostles, testify in favor of the tradition; but the earliest visitors to Jerusalem—Alexander of Flavia, in Cappadocia, and Origen—do not give the impression that at their time the holy places were specially frequented for the sake of devotion.

The first who thought of architecturally adorning the Holy Sepulchre was Constantine the Great. He erected a rotunda over the grave, and close by, on the spot of the crucifixion, a magnificent basilica, consecrated in 336. Those buildings stood till 614, when, during the invasion of Chosroes II., they were burnt down. Two years later on (616) the abbot Modestus, of the monastery of the Theodosius, began the erection of new buildings. The Patriarch of Alexandria, Johannes Eleeman, supported the undertaking by sending a thousand workmen and a large sum of money to Jerusalem. In 626 the new buildings, consisting of three separate churches, were finished. Modesta's churches were burnt down by the Mohammedans in 936, and not restored until 1048, when the cathedral was built into which the crusaders, in 1099, made their entrance on bare feet, and singing hymns of praise. The buildings were then partly rebuilt, partly extended; and the structures thus reared stood, though often partially disturbed by the Mohammedans, till the great conflagration in 1808. In 1810 the erection of the present buildings was begun. The Greeks and the Armenians gave the money; Komnenos Kalfa, a Greek architect in Constantinople, the plan.

FR. W. SCHULTZ.

HOLY SPIRIT, the third person of the Trinity, is also known in Scripture as the Spirit (Matt. iv. 1), the Spirit of God (1 Sam. x. 10), the Spirit of Christ (1 Pet. i. 11), the Spirit of grace (Heb. x. 20), the Spirit of truth (John xvi. 13), the Paraclete, or Comforter (John xv. 26), etc. The trinitarian relation of the Spirit is discussed under TRINITY, and the Procession of the Spirit under FILIQUO. Here we shall briefly consider the personality and work of the Spirit.

1. Personality. — Although there was some indistinctness in the teachings of Justin Martyr and others of the early fathers concerning the Spirit, his personality has been generally accepted by the orthodox. The Socinians and the Socinians. The Socinians represent the Spirit as an energy or power of God. The personality is proved by the following considerations.

(1) The personal pronoun he is used of him, as in John xvi. 13: "When he (παρασκευή) the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide," etc. (2) He is expressly designated by name, by the Father (John xiv. 26), and "searcheth the deep things of God" (1 Cor. ii. 10).

(3) Acts of will and intelligence are attributed to him, such as belonging only to a personal agent, as guiding into all truth (John xiv. 19), interceding (John xv. 26), convincing (John xvi. 8), interceding (Rom. viii. 26), speaking (Acts xiii. 2), etc. (4) He is directly contrasted with Satan (Acts v. 3), and may be the object of blasphemy (Matt. xii. 31), falsehood (Acts v. 3), and grievance (Eph. iv. 30). (5) The Spirit's action is included in the formula of baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19) and the apostolic benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 14), at the side of the Father and the Son, and is distinguished from them. He is also distinguished from the Son as the "other (τεκνον) Comforter" (John xiv. 16).

2. Office and Work. — The Apostles' Creed contented itself in the doctrine of the Holy Spirit with the article, "I believe in the Holy Ghost;" but the Creed of Constantinople (381) contains the fuller statement, "And [we believe] in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father, and with the Father and the Son is to be adored and glorified, who spake by the holy prophets." As of the Father and the Son, so of the Spirit, we cannot think of a time when he was not active. He appears as the executive of God at all times, but is brought forward prominently in the New Dispensation as the efficient agent in the renewal of the soul and its advancement in holiness. In the Old Testament he seems to have been active from the moment of creation, when the "Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters" (Gen. i. 2), and God said that his "Spirit should not always strive with man" (Gen. vi. 3). He is said to have fallen upon God's agents (1 Sam. x. 10). He was the author of the light which the Old-Testament prophets had of Christ (1 Pet. i. 11), and of their inspiration (2 Pet. i. 21). In many of the cases in the Old Testament, it is doubtful whether a distinct person is meant by the designation "Spirit" or merely the power of God. But in the New Testament the uncertainty vanishes; and not only is his distinct personality made prominent, but a definite work assigned to him. He had a part in the life of Christ, was active in his generation (Luke i. 35), descended upon him at the baptism (Matt. iii. 16), and led him into the desert of temptation (Matt. iv. 1).

In his last discourses our Lord referred repeatedly to him, and made the promise that he should come upon the disciples (John xvi. 7; Acts i. 8, etc.). In these passages the Holy Spirit is declared to be the representative of Christ after his removal from the earth, and the dispenser of the benefits of Christ's life to the souls of believers. He was the "other Comforter" (Paraclete), who should take the place of Christ in leading the disciples into the way of all truth (John xvi. 13). He is the permanent companion and guide of the Church, in contrast to the earthly Christ, who dwelt only temporarily on the earth (John xiv. 16). The Spirit is called the Spirit of Christ (Rom. viii. 9), because he holds the relation of a dispenser to the benefits of Christ's salvation.

As the Son reveals the Father to the world (John HOMER.

i. 18), so the Spirit reveals the grace and meritorious atonement and promises of Christ to the heart of the believer (John xvi. 15).

This special work in the history of redemption was inaugurated ten days after the Lord's ascension, on the Day of Pentecost, when the disciples were endued with power, and spoke in unknown tongues. As the historic birth-night of Christ was celebrated by attendant supernatural phenomena, such as the anathema of the angels, and the heavenly glory, so the historical birthday of the Holy Spirit in the Church was accompanied by strange external manifestations, tongues like as of fire, and a sound from heaven as of the rushing of a mighty wind (Acts ii. 2, 3). Since that time he has been active in the Church, the source of all spiritual enlightenment, and without whose agency man neither knows Christ as his Saviour, nor can call him Lord (1 Cor. xii. 3). He is the originator of convictions of sin, that is, of the sinfulness of refusing to believe in Christ (John xvi. 9), and the author of regeneration (John iii. 5). He promotes the sanctification of the soul (1 Cor. vii. 11), and imparts to the Church his special gifts 1 Cor. xii. 4).

The agency of the Spirit is, however, not completed with this activity, but extends to assuring the believer of his union with Christ, and participation in the promises of eternal life (Rom. viii. 3). He is the originator of convictions of sin, the source of all spiritual enlightenment, and with the Spirit's work is in no sense an atoning work, or manifestation of the grace and merit of a new life and a spiritual energy, and continues to be so. The early apostles and Christians, as of a kind which he did not perform under the old dispensation. But the Spirit's work is in no sense an atoning work, or substitute for that of Christ. It is mediatorial between the Saviour and the saved, and makes concrete in the lives and experiences of individuals the salvation which was achieved through Bethlehem, Golgotha, and the open tomb.

The manifestation of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost was a manifestation of power (Acts i. 8), — the power of a new life and a spiritual energy, and continues to be so. The early apostles and Christians were full "of faith and the Holy Ghost" (Acts iv. 8, vi. 5), and in the power of this endowment spake in council-halls, wrote epistles, and suffered violent deaths, in hope and amidst rejoicing.

There is nothing in the New Testament to indicate that this manifestation of power was to be confined to apostolic times, although it is not unreasonable to suppose that the methods of his manifestation may be different in kind at different epochs.

HOLY SPIRIT.

HOLY SPIRIT, the use of, i.e., water blessed by a priest or bishop for religious purposes, is an old Oriental, more especially Jewish, custom, which was adopted by the Christian Church, and is still retained in the Greek and Roman Church. In the Greek Church pure water is used; in the Roman, a little salt is added, which by the Greek is considered a scandalous and dangerous novelty. In both churches the practice has given rise to much superstition.

HOLY WEEK (Hedomas Mayna, or Sancta, or Nigra), the last week of Lent, commencing at midnight on Palm Sunday, and ending at cock-crow on Easter Day, including, besides Palm Sunday and Holy Saturday, Maundy Thursday, the anniversary of the institution of the Lord's Supper, and Good Friday, the anniversary of the Crucifixion. The earliest mention of the celebration of Holy Week, as generally prevailing throughout the Church, occurs in the Apostolical constitutions, and in the writings of Dionysius of Alexandria, from the middle of the third century. The whole week was kept as a strict fast; that is, the diet was restricted to bread, salt, vegetables, and water, and total abstinence was practiced on Friday and Saturday, or at least on the last day. At the time of Theodosius, all private and public business was suspended, even the courts were closed. Prisoners for debt or minor misdemeanors were released, slaves were unmuzzled, etc. All work was, so far as possible, laid aside; and special opportunities of instruction in the elements of faith were offered. The history of the Passion was recited on successive days, being read, with the narrative of St. Matthew, on Palm Sunday, and ending with that of St. John, on Good Friday. In the Roman-Catholic Church, Holy Week is still celebrated by rigorous penitence (fast and almsgiving), by suspension of work in the family, by increased solemnity of the services (no instrumental music, veiling of the statues and pictures, etc.), and by special services (the consecration of the chrisms, the blessing of the fire by which the paschal light is lighted, etc.). Several Protestant churches, such as the Church of England and the Lutheran churches in Scandinavia, also commemorate Holy Week. See Wiseman: Lectures on the Doctrines and Practices of the Catholic Church, London, 1836, 2 vols.

HOLZHAUSER. See BARTHOLOMITES.

HOMER, William Bradford, b. in Boston, Jan. 31, 1017; d. at South Berwick, Me., March 7, 1841. His father was a merchant, distinguished for Christian philanthropy. His mother was a lineal descendant of William Bradford, a passenger in "The Mayflower," and the second governor of Plymouth Colony. At the age of five years, young Homer began to attend school; and, from that time until six months before his death, he was a constant attendant at schools of different gradations. In 1827 he became a member of the Mount Pleasant Classical Institution at Amherst, Mass. Here he remained three years. Under the instruction of Mr. Gregory Perdicari he acquired such familiarity with the modern Greek that he was able to speak as well as to read it with facility. He passed the year 1831–32 as a member of Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass. He was the youngest member of his class, but was selected to deliver the valedictory addresses at his graduation. He was also, perhaps, the youngest member of his class at Amherst College; and, although his class was noted for scholarship and general excellence, yet at his graduation in 1838 he received the valedictory honors. At the age of four years. An impressive sermon was preached about the rules of classical rhetoric, and cared for the "enticing words of man's wisdom" (1 Cor. ii. 4, 5). But, as preaching became more studied and elaborate, the pulpit could not ignore the rules of Greek and Roman eloquence. The time came when the most prominent pulpit orators—like Basil, the two Gregories, Chrysostom, and Augustine—were those who had themselves been teachers of rhetoric. The result has been, that from that time to this, a greater or less extent, sacred oratory has been regarded as a branch or species of general rhetoric. Erasmus, Melanchthon, Herder, Therenin, Vine, are among those who represent this view. Others, however, like the Pietists of the eighteenth century (Spener, etc.), and Stier in this, demand, the use that divorce of the pulpit from the rules of rhetoric, opposing all union with "the strange woman that speaks smooth words," and all accommodation to aesthetic prejudices. No such divorce can be admitted; and yet the higher sphere to which the pulpit belongs, and the nature of the topics discussed, make it necessary for homiletics to treat of the preparation and delivery of the sermon as subjects peculiar to itself. There is much that sacred and forensic eloquence have in common. A mind charged with the subject, dialectic training, lucid arrangement, fine and keen psychological perception, lively imagination, such qualities as these all constitute the spring.
HOMILETICS.

from which both kinds of eloquence alike flow, as is proved from the lives of sacred orators from Basil and Chrysostom down to Krummacher and Spurgeon. Likewise, in the structure of the discourse, the same logical and aesthetic rules of grouping, the use of oratorical figures, etc., apply to both. But the features in which they differ are many more than those in which they agree. Sacred eloquence is distinguished by its subject-matter, its definite moral and religious purpose, and the means proper to be used to secure conviction. Forensic rhetoric seeks to secure objects confined to this life, whether personal or disinterested. The aim of preaching reaches out beyond the confines of this world, and concerns the soul’s eternal blessedness and God’s glory. Again: the sacred orator may never resort to artificial devices; nor may he place reliance, in his efforts to convince the soul, upon his manner, or diction, or argumentation. He must depend upon the vitalizing over of the truth (Isa. lv. 11; John vi. 63; Heb. iv. 12, etc.) and the direct influence of the Holy Spirit; for, as Luther says, “the speaker convinces no man to believe aught: it is the word of God itself that must lead him to accept the truth to be the word of God” (Op., xiii.). Rhetoric has, therefore, no place in preaching as an end in itself. It may only be used as a means for the effective presentation of the gospel which is laid upon the preacher. And all artistic structure of the sermon is to be discarded which prejudices the simplicity and power of the Word. In this connection it is well to remember that preachers, as they grow in experience of the truth, discard the rhetorical arts which they practised when they began to preach, and use a more direct and plain mode of utterance.

III. DESIGN OF PREACHING. — The most important designations in the New Testament for preaching determine its character as the joyous proclamation of salvation through Christ. In ἐκφώνον ("to preach," Matt. iv. 23, etc.) the emphasis is upon the novelty of the message; in ἐκφώνεσθαι ("to preach the gospel," Matt. xi. 5, etc.), upon its joyous contents; and in δικαίωσις ("to teach," Matt. xi. 1, etc.), the reference is to its lucid explanation. All these elements are combined in μαρτυρέω ("to bear witness," Acts i. 8, etc.), where the emphasis is upon the vouching for the truth on the ground of personal experience. The object of preaching, then, is none other than to direct the world to the way of blessedness, to call the unconverted to repentance, and to confirm believers in their faith. To secure this result, the most essential thing is the energizing power of the word of God itself. The next, and not less important, factor is the power of a personal witness filled with the Holy Ghost. The matter of preaching everywhere and at all times must be salvation through faith in Christ. But, while this is true, the distinction must not be overlooked between the preaching addressed to believing congregations on the one hand, and apocalyptic and missionary preaching on the other. The apostles limited themselves to the demonstration that prophecy had been fulfilled in Christ. Missionary preaching is designed to convince and convert alone. Preaching addressed to congregations of believers, however, analyzes and explains passages of Scripture, and seeks in this way to edify and enlarge the experience of divine things. This is its main object. However, in the present mixed condition of our congregations, the preacher must combine with the edificatory element the effort to reach unbelievers.

There have been other theories of preaching. The rhetorical theory of Theremin and others treats the preacher as an orator. The didactic theory (Nitzsch, etc.) lays an undue stress upon the preacher’s relation as a public teacher, who instructs the intellect, but has little to do with the affections and wills, of his hearers. The theory of mere awakening (Stier) treats all listeners, even believers, as mere sinners, and addresses its message to the natural man exclusively. Then there is the edification theory, which, making a sharp distinction between evangelistic preaching and preaching addressed to congregations in Christian communities, regards preaching as designed exclusively to edify. According to it, the sermon should be a finished production, presenting a delineation of Christian truth, but designed, in the first instance, neither to instruct nor to convert. All these theories are one-sided: neither of them presents more than one aspect of the ideal preacher. The design of preaching is at once awakening and edificatory, and becomes so by being didactic, and in some cases rhetorical. The most efficient preachers have always aimed to arouse as well as edify, and, never satisfied with merely presenting the truth, have sought to enforce it, that it might become a living, energizing force in the lives of their hearers. If Germany wishes to avert the catastrophe which befell the Anglican Church a hundred years ago, in the loss of so many of its members to the Methodists, it must hasten to realize this ideal of preaching. [Dr. Christlieb has here in mind the evangelistic efforts of the Methodists and of other foreign denominations in Germany.]

IV. HISTORY OF HOMILETICS. 1. The Fathers. — A few scattered directions for preaching are given by Origen, Cyprian, Lactantius, and Arnobius. Chrysostom and Augustine were the first to go elaborately into the subject. Both drew upon their own personal experiences as rhetoricians and preachers. In his work the Priesthood (De Sacerdotio, books iv., v.), Chrysostom defines as some of the personal qualifications of the preacher, eloquence, dialectic skill in the use of Scripture, readiness in the defence of the faith, diligence in preparation, and regard for the praise of God rather than man. For similar rules, see also Basil (Sermo Asceticus de Fide) and Gregory of Nazianzus (Carmen de Episcopio). Augustine, in his Christian Truth (De Doct. Christ., iv.), which might almost be called a treatise on homiletics, makes a sharp distinction between the preaching addressed to the faithful and that addressed to unbelievers. In the fourth book of this work he discusses the subject under two heads, — the matter of preaching, and the manner of its presentation. He does not deny that eloquence may be used to advantage, but insists that the preacher that had been fulfilled in Christ and the very form of his utterance, from the Scriptures. He urges Cicero’s threefold purpose of public speech, — to instruct (docere), to please (delectare), and to persuade (flectere), laying, however, special emphasis upon the last. He also urges the necessity of an accord between the preacher’s life and words, of prayer as a preparation for the sermon, etc.

2. The Middle Ages magnified liturgical forms and ordinances as constituent parts of worship, to the prejudice of the sermon, which in time was almost entirely neglected. In the first half of this period there are three writers on the general subject. Rhabanus Maurus (De Clericorum Institutione) directs attention again to Augustine’s rules. Guibert of Nogent (d. 1124; Liber quo ordinis sermo fieri debet) insists that no more should be put into a sermon than can be carried away in the memory; that the pulpit should practise the textual method rather than the allegorical method of interpretation, and seek to lift men up to better lives, rather than indulge in the refinements of theological discussion. The third, Alauus of Ryssel (twelfth century), wrote a work entitled Summa de Arte Pradicatoria. In the second half of this period we meet first with Bonaventura’s work Art Concionandi. He was followed by Humbert de Romanis (d. 1277; Tract. de Erudit. Concionatorium). But the period furnishes nothing of importance till near its close, when Reuchlin (Liber Congestorum de Arte Pradicandi, 1534) seeks to revive pulpit oratory, which had fallen into almost total neglect, by insisting upon the presentation of proper and practical subjects, and the rules of rhetoric.

3. The Period since the Reformation.—During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries homiletics was built up into a science, but placed in the closest relations to the rhetoric of antiquity. The revival of preaching by the Reformers led to the prejudice of the sermon, which in time had fallen into almost total neglect, by insisting upon the presentation of proper and practical subjects, and the rules of rhetoric.

A new period (1700-1830) opens in the eighteenth century, when, under the influence of the Pietistic movement, homiletics began to be emancipated from rhetoric and the tyranny of artificial refinements. This was, however, followed by a philosophical reaction. Spener introduced the revolt against the artificial method, and insisted that the pulpit should present the verities of faith, and present them in direct and simple statement. Other writers, like Rambach, in his Præcepta Homiletica, a work which deserves still to be used, followed Spener’s leadership, and insist upon spiritual preparation for the sermon, prayer, the union of the spirit, the simple delineation of the truth, etc. Contemporary authors in other lands—Gaussen, professor at Saumur (De Ratione Concionandi, 1678); Claude (Traité de la Composition d’un sermen, 1688), and Vitrépine (L’animalité du Method. homil. Eccles., 1712)—emphasized the personal qualifications of the preacher, the independence of sacred rhetoric, and the analytic over against the synthetic method. But, by the middle of the eighteenth century, philosophy arose in revolt against the exclusive treatment of such themes as regeneration and repentance, and asserted a place for itself in the pulpit. Mosheim’s work, Anweis., erbaulich zu predigen (1768), marks the transition. He shows the influence of English and French infidelity by insisting upon the use in the pulpit of the historical evidences for Christianity. Preaching was from this on to be addressed more particularly to the understanding; and even the spiritually minded Fénelon, in his Dialogues sur l’Eloquence (1718), defines the most essential quality of a sermon to be that it should “give instruction” (d’être instruef). The new philosophizing method endeavored to introduce more biblical matter from sermons. The pulpit ceased its efforts to convert: it sought alone to instruct. It resorted no longer to Scripture for proofs: it found them in “rational ideas.” The things of eternity gave way to the things of time. Spalding (Die Nutzbarkeit d. Predigtaums, 1772) and other writers excluded from preaching that did not contribute to immediate well being... in this world; and Marezoll (Bestimmung d. Konzfullers, 1798) lays down the proposition that the pulpit should dwell not on what Christ taught, but what he would teach if he were now on earth. The protests of believing theologians like Bengel and Oetinger against this intellectual assumption found only a small audience. At the close of the century the Kantian philosophy reclaimed the pulpit from the bald utilitarianism into which it was fast sinking. Schuleroff (Kritik d. Homileutik, 1797) again demanded for the sermon the character of a discourse on religion, but not necessarily on the Christian religion. A new tendency appeared early in this century, and the old question of the relation of preaching to rhetoric again came into the foreground. Among the many treatises, those of Theremin (D. Beredtsamkeit, eine Tugend, 1814) and Schott (Theorie d. Beredtsamkeit, etc., 1828—32) are the most important. But all agreed in making preaching a branch of general rhetoric. The very term “homiletics” was in danger of being discarded for “pulpit eloquence.” With Schleiermacher and Claus Harns a new period begins, which is marked by the treatment of homiletics as a department of practical theology. Marheinecke’s work on homiletics (1811) contends for the introduction of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity into the pulpit, and, with Schleiermacher, insists upon edification as the aim of preaching. Claus Harns followed with his essay on Speaking with Tongues, which fell like a bombshell under the lamps of those students who were seeking to copy after strictly logical and rhetorical models. With great freshness and originality he declared war against the artificial pulpit productions of the schools. Stier, in his Keryktik (1830), and to some extent Sickel (Halicritik, 1829), insist upon the biblical character of preaching. The most important works since then are Palmer: Homileutik, 1842, 5th ed., 1887; G. Baer: Grundzlige d. Homileutik, 1848; Gaup: Homileutik, 1852; Harnack: Prakt. Theol., 1878. All these writers agree in presenting the evangelical view, that the “sermon is God’s word to the Church.” See also Nesselmann: Uberblick tib. d. Entwicklungs gesch. d. christ. Predigt, 1882; Schenk: Geschichte d. deutsch-protest. Kanzelberedtsamkeit, 1841. — French writers. Gaussen, Claude (see above); Fehéron: Dialogues sur l’eloquence, 1718; Vinet: Homilique, Paris, 1853 [Eng. trans. by Skinner, New York, 1853]; Maury (cardinal): Essai sur l’Eloquence de la chair, 1789; A. Couquard, 1860; Bautain; Basser mann: Emb. d. geistl. Beredsamkeit, 1885, and many others. — English works by Perkins (1613), Baxter (The Reformed Pastor, 1656), Cotton Mather (1710), Dorrbridge (1775), Thomas Coke (1810), Porter (1839), J. Angell James (An Earnest Ministry, 1844), Stevens (1855); Alexander (Thoughts on Preaching, 1881), Begg (1863), Kiddier (Treatise on Homilistic, 1884), Shedd (Homilistics, 1872, 10th ed.), Hoppin (new ed., 1881), Spurgeon (Lectures to My Students, 2 vols., 1875—77). The Yale Lectures on Preaching by H. W. Brecher (1874—75, 3 vols.), John Hall (1875), W. H. Taylor (1876) [Philips Brooks (1877), R. W. Dale (1878), Howard Crosby (1879), Bishop Simpson (1880)].
cautions are observed, it is exceedingly apt to become a hindrance, rather than an assistance. 1. It should be so thoroughly mastered before entering upon the practical work of the pulpit, that its rules shall be unconsciously observed. What takes the attention of the preacher away from the main purpose of his sermon to some technical detail does thereby inevitably mar the sermon itself. Hence all such things as style and structure must be acquired so thoroughly, that no attention is abstracted by them from the thought. In like manner, every thing that in the pulpit draws the mind of the preacher away from that which he is saying, and the object which he has in view in saying it, to the manner in which he says it, takes just so much away from the force of his utterance. It does not follow, however, that no attention should be given to these things. It is not necessary that he should have so mastered them, that he can use them without thinking of them, just as one has so mastered spelling, that he is not conscious of any such act when he is writing. The moment one hesitates in spelling, and becomes conscious that he has to spell, he is very apt to make a mistake; and that simple illustration may help to show the importance of the caution which we are now giving. Rules are valuable; but their highest value is when we have ceased to be conscious that they are rules, and act upon them spontaneously. To do that, however, we must give early attention to them, and master them fully, before we need to practise them in public. The place of homiletics in learning to preach is thus analogous to that of spelling in learning to write. It should come at the very beginning, and it should be mastered so completely, that we act upon its maxims without thinking of them. 2. The preacher must never let himself be tempted to make the sermon an end in itself. It must be confessed, that, after one has studied the rules of homiletics, he is strongly tempted to think that his work is to consist in making good sermons that shall stand the test of the strictest homiletic scrutiny. But the object of the preacher is to convert sinners, to edify believers, and in general to help his fellow-men to live lives of faith and joy in Christ. The sermon ought to be designed for that. By all means let it be according to rule; but let the observance of the rules be made subservient, and kept subservient, to the main purpose. The surgeon seeks to save the patient; and, if he put the brilliancy of the operation above all, he is no surgeon. In like manner, the preacher's task is the secret, next to the agency of the Holy Ghost, of pulpit-power; and no homiletic rules, however faithfully observed, will compensate for its absence. But if that be in him, and he has mastered the rules of this science so that he can obey them automatically, he will be the ideal preacher, and men will gladly listen to his words.

Lit.—In recent years there has been increased attention given to homiletics, owing to the formation of such lecturehips as the “Lyman Beecher” course at Yale; and many valuable works have appeared upon the subject. In addition to those named by Dr. Christlieb, the following works are all of value, and deserve mention. WILLIAM G. BLAIKIE: For the Work of the Ministry, London, 1873; WILLIAM S. PLUMER: Hints and Helps in Pastoral Theology, New York, 1874; PATRICK FAIRBAIRN: Pastoral Theology, Edinburgh, 1875; WILLIAM ARTHUR: The Tongue of Fire, New York, 1880; JOHN A. BROADUS: The Preparation and Delivery of Sermons, last edition, Philadelphia, 1880. Lectures on the History of Preaching, New York, 1878; E. Paxton Hood: Lamps, Pitchers, and Trumpets, new edition, New York, 1872; ROBERT T. Danhey: Sacred Rhetoric, New York, 1870; Stephen H. Tyng, sen.: The Office and Jacobus Christian Pastor, New York, 1874; Samuel McAll: Deliveries, Lecture-Room Hints, London, 1875; STORRS: Conditions of Success in Preaching without Notes, New York, 1875; Charles J. Brown: Preaching, its Properties, Place, and Power, 1870; John C. Miller: Letters to a Young Clergyman, New York, 1878; Bishop Bedell: The Pastor, Philadelphia, 1880; Bishop Ellicott: Homiletical and Pastoral Lectures, 1880; J. J. Van Oosterze: Practical Theology, New York, 1880; Austin Phelps: Theory of Preaching, 1861; Fire: Manual of Preaching, 1884. For an account of the appendices in the works of Blaikie and Kidder. Attention should be given to The Preacher's Lantern (4 vols.), and such periodicals as The Homiletic Quarterly, The Preacher's Monthly, and the biographies of such preachers as Robert Hall, Thomas Chalmers, John Leifchild, Summerfield, the Alexanders, etc., and especially Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit. See also J. M. Neale: Medieval Preachers and Medieval Preaching, London, 1873. WM. M. TAYLOR.

HOMILARIUM denoted, from the beginning of the middle ages, collections of homilies and sermons for the whole ecclesiastical year, from the works of the fathers, made by private persons for reading in the church on Sundays and holidays, or introduced by official authority among the clergy as models of the art of preaching. Such collections existed before the time of Charlemagne, both in the Gallican and in the Anglo-Saxon Church; but the most celebrated and the most widely used collection of the kind was the homiliarium of Charlemagne. The unsuitableness of many of the selections from the fathers, and, still more, the frequent mistakes and corruptions which occurred in the common collection, caused Charlemagne to charge Paulus Diaconus with the collection of a new homiliarium, under the superintendence of Alcuin. Between 776 and 784 the work was finished. Manuscript copies of it are found in the libraries of Heidelberg, Darmstadt, Frankfort, Giesen, Cassel, Fulda, etc. The first printed edition, without title, date, or place, was probably made at Cologne, 1470. A comparison between the various editions shows that the contents of the book increased with the increasing number of festivals and saints' days. New sermons by later teachers—Alcuin, Haimo, Andbertus, Hericus, Bernard, and others—were added. The bulk, however, of the contents, as well as the original plan of the arrangement, was retained. On the development of the art of preaching, and on the final establishment of the system of pericopes, this collection has exercised a great influence; and it was, no doubt, instrumental in carrying the Roman views in two letters, still extant, to the Patriarch of Constantinople. The Book of Homilies of the Church of England is the nearest approach in the Protestant Church to the homiliarium. CHRISTIANS.

HOMILY. See Homiletics.

HOMOLOGOUENA (generally accepted) and ANTILEGOMENA (disputed) are the two terms which Eusebius applies to the authorship of the books of the New Testament, placing the four Gospels, the Acts, the fourteen Epistles of Paul, the first Epistle of Peter, and the first Epistle of John, under the former, and the Epistle of James, the second Epistle of Peter, the second and third Epistles of John, and the Epistle of Jude, under the latter. The Apocalypse he gives a place by itself, though, according to his own definition, it belonged to the Antilegomena. See CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

HOMOIOUSIAN (of similar substance) and HOMOIOUSIAN (of the same substance) are the two terms on which the whole Arian controversy turned; the former representing the semi-Arian view; the latter, the orthodox. The term of Arian was heteroousian ("of different substance"). See ARIANISM.

HONEY. See Bee-Culture among the Hebrews.

HONORIUS, Roman emperor from 385 to 423; was only ten years old, when, under the tutelage of Stilicho, he succeeded his father, Theodosius I., in the Western Empire, while his brother Arcadius inherited the Eastern. Honorius was a weak character. He made the laws of Theodosius against Paganism still harder. In 399 he ordered all Pagan temples to be destroyed at once; but he was unable to enforce such a law. In North Africa, where, in many places, the Pagans outnumbered the Christians, the Christians were made to suffer for the laws against Paganism. In 408 the emperor suddenly changed his mind, and a decree placed the Pagans on an equal footing with the Christians, but again excluded them from all offices in the army and in the administration. Somewhat more consistent he showed himself in his relations with the Donatists, whom he pursued with steadily increasing severity. But he never succeeded in suppressing the heresy; he only drove the heretics into the wildest fanaticism. See DONATISTS.

HONORIUS is the name of four popes and an antipope.—Honorius I. (625-638) sided, in the monothelitic controversy, with the emperor and the patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria, that is, with the Monothelites, and set forth his views in two letters, still extant, to the Patriarch of Constantinople. In consequence he was anathematized by the sixth ecumenical council (Constantinople, 680), together with the other leaders of the Monothelites; and the verdict, which was given with the assent of the papal lea tes, was confirmed by his successor, Leo II. This grim fact, that the papal infallibility has once been of it by the Greek Church, the most audacious doctrine. When, in 1870, the papal infallibility was established by the definition of the Church, the literature on the question swelled into a library. See Hypele: Causa Honorii Papa, Naples, 1870; Margerie: Le pape Honor: Paris, 1870; J. Pennachi: De Honorii I. c. 1869, Rome, 1870; Ruckaber: Die Irrihre d. H.: Stuttgart, 1871; [E. F. Willis: Pope Honorius and the New Roman Dogma, London, 1879].—Honorius II. (Cadulus, antipope 1081-84) was Bishop of Parma when Nicholas II. died, and was elected Pope by the Lombard bishops (Basel, 1061), under the influence of the Empress Agnes, in opposition to Alexander II. The German bishops, however, sided, not with the empress and her candidate, but with Hildebrand.
and Alexander II.; and May 31, 1044, a council was convened at Milan to decide upon the double election. Alexander II. appeared before the council, but not Honorius II., who was formally deposed. He did not give up, however, his claim upon the papal crown, though it was recognized only by the Lombard bishops. He died 1073. See HONORII.

Honorius II. (Dec. 16, 1124–Feb. 14, 1130) concluded, while still Cardinal-Bishop Lambert of Ostia, the concordat of Worms with Henry V., and was raised to the papal throne chiefly by the influence of the Frangipani, on account of his peaceable character. He failed in his policy towards Duke Roger of Sicily, to whom he was compelled to give Apulia as a fief. See JAPPE: Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 540; WATTERICH: Pont. Rom. Vite, T. II. p. 157. — Honorius III. (July 18, 1216–March 18, 1227) confirmed the order of the Dominicans in 1216, and that of the Franciscans in 1223, and crowned Henry of Courtenay emperor of Constantinople, and Frederick II. emperor of Rome. In his relations with the latter he was very yielding and obliging, while he showed himself extraordinarily hard against Count Raymond of Toulouse. His Opera omnia are found in HOROY: Med. Ev. Bibl. Patr. (Paris, 1879, T. I.), and his letters in Bouguet, Recueil des Historiens de Gaules et de la France, XIX. p. 610. See the works on Friedrich II. by KESTNER (Göttingen, 1873) and O. LORENZ (Berlin, 1876). — Honorius IV. (April 2, 1285–April 3, 1287) showed himself, in spite of his age and bodily debility, very energetic, both in internal administration and in foreign policy. See MURATORI: Rer. Ital. Script., III. p. 811.

HONTER. Johann, b. at Cronstadt, Transylvania, 1498; d. there Jan. 23, 1549; studied at Vienna; was a teacher at Cracow and Basel, and returned to his native city in 1539, bringing with him the Renaissance and the Reformation. From the printing-press which he established in his house, he issued a number of books of education, and was instrumental in the foundation of the gymnasium of Cronstadt. But of still greater importance were his Formula reformatioan ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, and Hermeneuticarum Institutiones, 1543. In 1545 he became the minister of an evangelical congregation in Cronstadt. See G. D. TEUTSCH: Ueber Honterus und Cronstädter zu seiner Zeit, Hermannstadt, 1876.

HONTHEIM. Johann Nicolaus von, b. at Treves, Jan. 27, 1701; d. there Sept. 2, 1790; studied history and canon law in his native city, at Louvain, and Leyden; visited Rome 1726; entered the Dominican order; was made prior of the Dominican convent in Treves, and became noted for his attacks on Erasmus, Reuchlin, and Luther. He was a full-blooded specimen of the monkish obscurantism and fanaticism of his time. When he lost his case against Reuchlin, the Pope himself could not compel him to keep silent. His works appeared at Cologne, 1526. See REUCHLIN.

HOOK, Walter Farquhar, D.D., F.R.S., b. in London, March 13, 1798; d. at Chichester, Wednesday, Oct. 20, 1875. He was educated at Oxford; took holy orders; was vicar of Leeds from 1837 to 1859, when he was appointed dean of Chichester. He was a sober High-Churchman. His long service in Leeds was singularly successful; for he was instrumental in erecting twenty-one churches, thirty-two parsonages, sixty schools, besides rebuilding the parish church at a cost of twenty-eight thousand pounds. In the midst of engaging labors he found time to prepare a number of volumes, of which may be mentioned A Church Dictionary (18th ed., 1872), An Ecclesiastical Biography (1845–52, 8 vols.), Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury (1860–76, 12 vols.).

HOOQSTREITEN, Jacob van, b. at Hoogstraten, near Antwerp, 1454; d. at Cologne, Jan. 21, 1527; studied at Louvain; entered the Dominican order; was made prior of the Dominican convent of Cologne, and inquisitor of the provinces of Mayence, Treves, and Cologne, and became noted for his attacks on Erasmus, Reuchlin, and Luther. He was a full-blooded specimen of the monkish obscurantism and fanaticism of his time. When he lost his case against Reuchlin, the Pope himself could not compel him to keep silent. His works appeared at Cologne, 1526. See REUCHLIN.

HOOQSTREITEN, Jacob van, b. at Hoogstraten, near Antwerp, 1454; d. at Cologne, Jan. 21, 1527; studied at Louvain; entered the Dominican order; was made prior of the Dominican convent of Cologne, and inquisitor of the provinces of Mayence, Treves, and Cologne, and became noted for his attacks on Erasmus, Reuchlin, and Luther. He was a full-blooded specimen of the monkish obscurantism and fanaticism of his time. When he lost his case against Reuchlin, the Pope himself could not compel him to keep silent. His works appeared at Cologne, 1526. See REUCHLIN.

HOOKER, Richard, an eminent divine of the Church of England, and its most distinguished writer on ecclesiastical polity; b. near Exeter, about 1553; d. at Bishopsborne, Nov. 2, 1600. He was the son of poor parents, was educated by an uncle, and while at Oxford received aid from Bishop Jewel. An interesting incident in his life is his last meeting with the bishop. The latter lent Hooker his horse to carry him to Exeter, and gave him money for the journey. He acted as tutor at his university, in 1579 was appointed to deliver the Hebrew lecture, and in 1581 took orders. In his marriage, which occurred about this time, he was unfortunate. With characteristic lack of worldly wisdom, he confided to a Mrs. Churchman of London the care, which she had solicited, of selecting for him a wife. "I gave her such a power as Eleazer was trusted with (you may read it in the Book of Genesis) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac," etc. We may not blame Mrs. Churchman for hitting upon her daughter Joan; but we shall pity Hooker none the less for that. He was the son of poor parents, was educated by an uncle, and while at Oxford received aid from Bishop Jewel. An interesting incident in his life is his last meeting with the bishop. The latter lent Hooker his horse to carry him to Exeter, and gave him money for the journey. He acted as tutor at his university, in 1579 was appointed to deliver the Hebrew lecture, and in 1581 took orders. In his marriage, which occurred about this time, he was unfortunate. With characteristic lack of worldly wisdom, he confided to a Mrs. Churchman of London the care, which she had solicited, of selecting for him a wife. "I gave her such a power as Eleazer was trusted with (you may read it in the Book of Genesis) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac," etc. We may not blame Mrs. Churchman for hitting upon her daughter Joan; but we shall pity Hooker none the less for that. He was the son of poor parents, was educated by an uncle, and while at Oxford received aid from Bishop Jewel. An interesting incident in his life is his last meeting with the bishop. The latter lent Hooker his horse to carry him to Exeter, and gave him money for the journey. He acted as tutor at his university, in 1579 was appointed to deliver the Hebrew lecture, and in 1581 took orders. In his marriage, which occurred about this time, he was unfortunate. With characteristic lack of worldly wisdom, he confided to a Mrs. Churchman of London the care, which she had solicited, of selecting for him a wife. "I gave her such a power as Eleazer was trusted with (you may read it in the Book of Genesis) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac," etc. We may not blame Mrs. Churchman for hitting upon her daughter Joan; but we shall pity Hooker none the less for that. He was the son of poor parents, was educated by an uncle, and while at Oxford received aid from Bishop Jewel. An interesting incident in his life is his last meeting with the bishop. The latter lent Hooker his horse to carry him to Exeter, and gave him money for the journey. He acted as tutor at his university, in 1579 was appointed to deliver the Hebrew lecture, and in 1581 took orders. In his marriage, which occurred about this time, he was unfortunate. With characteristic lack of worldly wisdom, he confided to a Mrs. Churchman of London the care, which she had solicited, of selecting for him a wife. "I gave her such a power as Eleazer was trusted with (you may read it in the Book of Genesis) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac," etc. We may not blame Mrs. Churchman for hitting upon her daughter Joan; but we shall pity Hooker none the less for that. He was the son of poor parents, was educated by an uncle, and while at Oxford received aid from Bishop Jewel. An interesting incident in his life is his last meeting with the bishop. The latter lent Hooker his horse to carry him to Exeter, and gave him money for the journey. He acted as tutor at his university, in 1579 was appointed to deliver the Hebrew lecture, and in 1581 took orders. In his marriage, which occurred about this time, he was unfortunate. With characteristic lack of worldly wisdom, he confided to a Mrs. Churchman of London the care, which she had solicited, of selecting for him a wife. "I gave her such a power as Eleazer was trusted with (you may read it in the Book of Genesis) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac," etc. We may not blame Mrs. Churchman for hitting upon her daughter Joan; but we shall pity Hooker none the less for that.
HOOKER.

1018

had acted as tutor at Oxford, master of the Temple, London. He shared the pulpit with Travers, a Genevan divine. Of the preaching of the two, Fuller says, “The congregation at the Temple ebbed in the forenoon, when Hooker preached, and flowed in the afternoon.” He, however, suggests that Mr. Hooker “was too wise to take exception at such trifles.” In 1591 Hooker went to Boscombe, and was made a minor prebend of Salisbury, and in 1595 was transferred to Bishopeborne, three miles from Canterbury, where he died.

Hooker was rather a tedious preacher, having an embarrassed manner, and his sentences being too prolix, and sometimes involved, for the pulpit. Yet Fuller quaintly says, “He may be said to have made good music with his fiddle and stick alone, without any rosin, having neither pronunciation nor gesture to grace his matter.”

Hooker’s great reputation rests upon his Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. It consists of eight books, four of which were written in Boscombe, and published 1594, and the fifth in 1597. The last three books have an interesting history, which is given in full by Keble (pp. xii—xxv). Hooker’s widow was accused of having burned the manuscript; but, whether justly or not, it was irrecoverably gone (Keble). The rough draughts, however, were preserved. The sixth and eighth were published in 1648, and the seventh in 1692. Of these the sixth is, according to Keble, probably not genuine. The other two contain the substance of what Hooker wrote. The immediate occasion of the Ecclesiastical Polity seems to have been an attack of Travers upon Hooker for extending salvation to Roman Catholics, and his lack of sympathy with Calvinism. With Jewel’s Apology it is the most important original contribution to English ecclesiastical literature of the sixteenth century, and the first great ecclesiastical work written in English. Its style has been highly praised; and Green (History English People, iii. 80) speaks of “its grandeur and stateliness, which raised its author to the highest rank among English prose writers.” Written in a tense and fast pace, and with a vigorous thought, it is free from the multitudinous and often unthought quotations which deface the pages of the theological works of the period; e.g., Jewel’s Apology.

The contents are rather more philosophical than theological, and the work more valuable for its broad and fundamental principles than for exactness of definition, or clearness of argument. It is in effect an answer to Puritanism, which had been bitterly attacking the episcopal system through a generation. Conceived in an admirable temper, and free from the heat and vituperation which characterized many of the earlier Polemic writings, it is a direct installation of the Presbyterian system. Its object is to assert the right of a broad liberty on the basis of Scripture and reason. He expressly denies that the practice of the apostles is a rule to be invariably followed, but that change of circumstances warrants a departure from the governmental policy and discipline of the early church. He seeks to prove that things not commanded in Scripture may still be lawful, and he does it by appealing to the practice of the Puritans themselves (as in the case of the wafer which they used in common with the Roman Catholics, etc.). The assertion of this fundamental prerogative of reason is one of the most valuable contributions of the work. Hooker has been claimed as a champion of the High-Anglican doctrine of episcopacy, and hardly less confidently, by the other side as the advocate of the view that church government is a matter “too wise to take exception at such trifles.”

In 1591 Hooker went to Boscombe, and was made a minor prebend of Salisbury, and in 1595 was transferred to Bishopeborne, three miles from Canterbury, where he died.

Hooker was rather a tedious preacher, having an embarrassed manner, and his sentences being too prolix, and sometimes involved, for the pulpit. Yet Fuller quaintly says, “He may be said to have made good music with his fiddle and stick alone, without any rosin, having neither pronunciation nor gesture to grace his matter.”

Hooker’s great reputation rests upon his Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. It consists of eight books, four of which were written in Boscombe, and published 1594, and the fifth in 1597. The last three books have an interesting history, which is given in full by Keble (pp. xii—xxv). Hooker’s widow was accused of having burned the manuscript; but, whether justly or not, it was irrecoverably gone (Keble). The rough draughts, however, were preserved. The sixth and eighth were published in 1648, and the seventh in 1692. Of these the sixth is, according to Keble, probably not genuine. The other two contain the substance of what Hooker wrote. The immediate occasion of the Ecclesiastical Polity seems to have been an attack of Travers upon Hooker for extending salvation to Roman Catholics, and his lack of sympathy with Calvinism. With Jewel’s Apology it is the most important original contribution to English ecclesiastical literature of the sixteenth century, and the first great ecclesiastical work written in English. Its style has been highly praised; and Green (History English People, iii. 80) speaks of “its grandeur and stateliness, which raised its author to the highest rank among English prose writers.” Written in a tense and fast pace, and with a vigorous thought, it is free from the multitudinous and often unthought quotations which deface the pages of the theological works of the period; e.g., Jewel’s Apology.

The contents are rather more philosophical than theological, and the work more valuable for its broad and fundamental principles than for exactness of definition, or clearness of argument. It is in effect an answer to Puritanism, which had been bitterly attacking the episcopal system through a generation. Conceived in an admirable temper, and free from the heat and vituperation which characterized many of the earlier Polemic writings, it is a direct installation of the Presbyterian system. Its object is to assert the right of a broad liberty on the basis of Scripture and reason. He expressly denies that the practice of the apostles is a rule to be invariably followed, but that change of circumstances warrants a departure from the governmental policy and discipline of the early church. He seeks to prove that things not commanded in Scripture may still be lawful, and he does it by appealing to the practice of the Puritans themselves (as in the case of the wafer which they used in common with the Roman Catholics, etc.). The assertion of this fundamental prerogative of reason is one of the most valuable contributions of the work. Hooker has been claimed as a champion of the High-Anglican doctrine of episcopacy, and hardly less confidently, by the other side as the advocate of the view that church government is a matter “too wise to take exception at such trifles.”

In 1591 Hooker went to Boscombe, and was made a minor prebend of Salisbury, and in 1595 was transferred to Bishopeborne, three miles from Canterbury, where he died.

Hooker was rather a tedious preacher, having an embarrassed manner, and his sentences being too prolix, and sometimes involved, for the pulpit. Yet Fuller quaintly says, “He may be said to have made good music with his fiddle and stick alone, without any rosin, having neither pronunciation nor gesture to grace his matter.”

Hooker’s great reputation rests upon his Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. It consists of eight books, four of which were written in Boscombe, and published 1594, and the fifth in 1597. The last three books have an interesting history, which is given in full by Keble (pp. xii—xxv). Hooker’s widow was accused of having burned the manuscript; but, whether justly or not, it was irrecoverably gone (Keble). The rough draughts, however, were preserved. The sixth and eighth were published in 1648, and the seventh in 1692. Of these the sixth is, according to Keble, probably not genuine. The other two contain the substance of what Hooker wrote. The immediate occasion of the Ecclesiastical Polity seems to have been an attack of Travers upon Hooker for extending salvation to Roman Catholics, and his lack of sympathy with Calvinism. With Jewel’s Apology it is the most important original contribution to English ecclesiastical literature of the sixteenth century, and the first great ecclesiastical work written in English. Its style has been highly praised; and Green (History English People, iii. 80) speaks of “its grandeur and stateliness, which raised its author to the highest rank among English prose writers.” Written in a tense and fast pace, and with a vigorous thought, it is free from the multitudinous and often unthought quotations which deface the pages of the theological works of the period; e.g., Jewel’s Apology.

The contents are rather more philosophical than theological, and the work more valuable for its broad and fundamental principles than for exactness of definition, or clearness of argument. It is in effect an answer to Puritanism, which had been bitterly attacking the episcopal system through a generation. Conceived in an admirable temper, and free from the heat and vituperation which characterized many of the earlier Polemic writings, it is a direct installation of the Presbyterian system. Its object is to assert the right of a broad liberty on the basis of Scripture and reason. He expressly denies that the practice of the apostles is a rule to be invariably followed, but that change of circumstances warrants a departure from the governmental policy and discipline of the early church. He seeks to prove that things not commanded in Scripture may still be lawful, and he does it by appealing to the practice of the Puritans themselves (as in the case of the wafer which they used in common with the Roman Catholics, etc.). The assertion of this fundamental prerogative of reason is one of the most valuable contributions of the work. Hooker has been claimed as a champion of the High-Anglican doctrine of episcopacy, and hardly less confidently, by the other side as the advocate of the view that church government is a matter “too wise to take exception at such trifles.”

In 1591 Hooker went to Boscombe, and was made a minor prebend of Salisbury, and in 1595 was transferred to Bishopeborne, three miles from Canterbury, where he died.
refused to take the oath of consecration, in which his own hand the obnoxious clause. The former gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. But the controversy became so heated, and Hooper's denunciatory from the pulpit gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. The candidate had to swear by the saints. The king removed the latter obstacle by erasing with his own hand the obnoxious clause. The former gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. But the controversy became so heated, and Hooper's denunciatory from the pulpit gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. The candidate had to swear by the saints. The king removed the latter obstacle by erasing with his own hand the obnoxious clause. The former gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. But the controversy became so heated, and Hooper's denunciatory from the pulpit gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. The candidate had to swear by the saints. The king removed the latter obstacle by erasing with his own hand the obnoxious clause. The former gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. But the controversy became so heated, and Hooper's denunciatory from the pulpit gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. The candidate had to swear by the saints. The king removed the latter obstacle by erasing with his own hand the obnoxious clause. The former gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. But the controversy became so heated, and Hooper's denunciatory from the pulpit gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. The candidate had to swear by the saints. The king removed the latter obstacle by erasing with his own hand the obnoxious clause. The former gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. But the controversy became so heated, and Hooper's denunciatory from the pulpit gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. The candidate had to swear by the saints. The king removed the latter obstacle by erasing with his own hand the obnoxious clause. The former gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. But the controversy became so heated, and Hooper's denunciatory from the pulpit gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. The candidate had to swear by the saints.

In the administration of his episcopal office, Hooper was so indefatigable in preaching and visitation as to call forth the friendly council of Bullinger and other friends to practice a prudent moderation. Foxe calls him "a spectacle (pattern) to all bishops." In 1552 he was appointed Bishop of Worcester in commendam.

Hooper and Rogers were the first to be cited under Mary. On Aug. 29, 1553, the former was thrown into prison, where he received harsh treatment, and contracted scurvy. In January, 1556, he was condemned on three charges,—for maintaining the lawfulness of clerical marriage, for defending divorce, and for denying transubstantiation. He called the mass "the iniquity of the Devil." He was sentenced to die at the stake in Gloucester, whither he was conveyed. He met his death firmly and cheerfully. To a friend bewailing his lot, the martyr replied in the oft-quoted words, "Death is bitter, and life is sweet, and alas! consider that death to come is more bitter, and life to come is more sweet." In another conversation, he said, "I am well, thank God; and death to me for Christ's sake is welcome." His martyrdom was witnessed by a large throng of people. The martyr was forbidden to address the crowd. A real or pretended pardon being promised if he would recant, he spurned it away, saying, "If you love my soul, away with it." His agony was great. The stake, which was inserted to the slow progress of the fire on account of the green fagots, which had to be rekindled three times before they did their work.

Lit. — Hooper's works have been edited by the Parker Society (with a biography) in two volumes, Cambridge, 1845-52, and by the Religious Tract Society in one volume. The more important are A Brief and Clear Confession of the Christian Faith; A Declaration of Christ and his Office; A Declaration of the Ten Commandments; Seven Sermons on Jonah; and An Answer to Bishop Gardiner, being a Detection of the Devil's Sophistry where with he robs the unlearned people of the true belief in the most blessed Sacrament of the Altar. Foxe, in the Book of Martyrs, gives a minute and impressive account of Hooper's life, and dwells at length upon the events of his life were of a wholly ordinary grade, and leave no record behind them. His character only was extraordinary. In 1582 he established in college a noon prayer-meeting of a half hour, held on four days of the week; and he maintained it for forty years. Although licensed to preach the gospel in 1588, and preaching frequently since, it was not until Dec. 26, 1689, that he was formally ordained. His last days were largely devoted to pastoral work, but not to the neglect of his college duties. His monument is the Church of Christ in the White Oaks (a district in the north-east part of Williamstown), which was the result of his efforts, and which was organized Dec. 20, 1868; but previously he had led the way to, and efficiently aided in, the erection of a chapel there, which was dedicated Oct. 25, 1866. Acquaintance with Professor Hopkins was a means of grace. He was pre-eminent a man of faith, and impressed all he met by his unworldly life. At the same time he was an excellent teacher, and a man of enterprise and push! See his Life by ALBERT C. SEWALL, New York (1879).
Historical of the Confessioons (New York, 1850), Refutation of Milner’s End of Con receives, in a Series of Letters to the Roman Archbishop of Baltimore (Kenrick), 2 vols., 1854.

HOPKINS, Samuel, D.D., b. in Waterbury, Conn., Sept. 17, 1721; d. in Newport, R.I., Dec. 20, 1808, in the eighty-third year of his life, and the thirty-second of his ministry. As a child he was remarkable for his purity and ingenuousness. He entered Yale College in September, 1737. Here he devoted himself specially to logic and mathematics. Here he began his Christian life, during the religious interest attending the services of Whitefield and Gilbert Tennent at New Haven. In 1741 he commenced his theological studies, under the care and in the family of President Edwards, then of Northampton, Mass. He was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Great Barrington, Mass., Dec. 28, 1743. When he was ordained, the church consisted of only five members: a hundred and sixteen joined it during his pastorate. After a ministry of twenty-five years, he was dismissed Jan. 15, 1760. His ministry was sometimes interrupted by the French and Indian wars, which compelled him to leave his family to other towns for safety. He preached often to the Housatonic Indians in his neighborhood. His hundred and sixtieth sermon to them is still preserved in manuscript. He was so successful in his ministry among them, that he was invited to become their missionary. With all his fondness for study, he was never happier than when preaching to the poor. While at Great Barrington, he remained intimate with President Edwards so long as Edwards was at Northampton, and became still more intimate with him when Edwards removed to Stockbridge. At this time he was better acquainted than any other man with the peculiar views of Edwards. He also held frequent and fraternal intercourse with Dr. Bellamy of Bethlehem, Conn. He exerted a marked influence on several men who afterwards became eminent; as on Dr. Jonathan Edwards, the son of the president, and on Dr. Stephen West of Stockbridge, Mass. He spent commonly fourteen, and occasionally eighteen, hours a day at his study-table. So thorough was his theological training that he was named as a candidate for a professorship of divinity in Princeton College, and afterward for the presidency of the college.

He was installed pastor of the First Congregational Church in Newport, R.I., April 11, 1770, and continued in this pastorate thirty-three years. Soon after his installation he was gratified with a visit from his friend, George Whitefield. As the French and Indian wars had interfered with his parochial success in Great Barrington, so the Revolutionary War interfered with it in Newport. The town was captured by the British in 1776, and remained in their possession more than three years. During these years the church of Dr. Hopkins was impoverished, the church edifice was nearly ruined, and he himself was compelled to seek refuge in other towns. He spent the years of this banishment in supplying destitute churches in Connecticut, and in assisting his friend and pupil, Dr. Samuel Spring in Newport. Here he gained a noticeable influence over Moses Brown, Esq., and Hon. William Bartlett, parishioners of Dr. Spring. He made frequent visits to his brother, Dr. Daniel Hopkins of Salem, Mass.; and here he gained a noticeable influence over Hon. John Norris, a parishioner of that brother. These three laymen cherished through life a deep reverence for Dr. Samuel Hopkins; and it is interesting to reflect that they became founders, as Dr. Spring became a father, of the Andover Theological Seminary. (See ANDOVER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.) On returning to Newport in 1780, Dr. Hopkins resumed a work which had already exposed him to severe persecution. Newport had been a principal slave-mart of North America. As early as 1770 Hopkins began to preach against the slave system. He afterward published numerous essays against it in the newspapers of Newport, Providence, Boston, Hartford. From 1780 onward he wrote elaborate letters on the wars which might be expected from an original thinker, with just those faults which might be expected from a positive thinker. His faults were a want of completeness and symmetry, also a bold and positivestyle where caution and reserve were more appropriate. His system was essentially Calvinistic, but was distinguished by the epithet “Hopkisinian.” (See HOPKISINIANISM.)

He is said to have spent six years in studying the writings of President Edwards, all of whose manuscripts, by the president’s request, were committed to the care of Hopkins. He superintended the publication of Edwards’s Treatise on Original Sin, 1758. He edited and published... seventeen of Edwards’s Sermons (1764), the two dissertations on The End for which God created the World and on The Nature of True Virtue (1765); and he prepared for the press several other of the president’s works. The theological writings of Hopkins himself were (titles abbreviated),
The Wisdom of God in the Permission of Sin (1758), An Inquiry concerning the Promises of the Gospel (1765), The True State and Character of the Unregenerate (1769), Animadversions on Mr. Hart’s late Dialogue, which was in opposition to Dr. Hopkins’s writings (1770), An Inquiry into the Nature of True Holiness (1773), An Inquiry concerning the Future State of those who die in their Sins (1785), A System of Doctrines contained in Divine Revelation (2 vols. 8vo, 1793), A Dialogue between a Calvinist and a Semi-Calvinist (1805), published after the author’s death. Among his printed sermons were one on The Divinity of Christ (1768), two on Law and Regeneration (1768), a Volume of Twenty-one Sermons, edited by Dr. Daniel Hopkins (1805). The biographies published by Hopkins were The Life and Character of President Edwards, prefixed to Edwards’s seventeen sermons (1764), The Life and Character of Miss Sarah Osborn (1785), Memoirs of the Life of Mrs. Sarah Osborn (1789). His political writings were chiefly anonymous. In 1786 he published his noted Dialogue concerning the Slavery of the Africans, together with his Address to Slawhold-ers. It is estimated, that if his essays and letters on African emancipation, and his elaborate letters to Andrew Fuller, John Ryland, Drs.
Davies and Bellamy on religious themes, were printed, they would form a large volume. Many of his printed works were re-published in 1854 by the Religious Tract and Book Society (now Congregational Board of Publication) at Boston, in three octavo volumes, containing over two thousand pages. In 1805 appeared the Autobiography of Dr. Hopkins with an Introduction by Dr. Stephen West; in 1830, a Memoir of Dr. Hopkins by Rev.
John Foote; in 1845, a Memoir of Dr. Daniel Hopkins by Rev. Dr. William Patten; in 1854, a Memoir, containing 266 pages, 8vo, by the undersigned.

EDWARDS A. PARK.

HOPKINSIANISM. The roots of this theoretical system lie embedded in the published and unpublished writings of the elder Jonathan Edwards: hence it has been called the “Edwardean Divinity.” The main principles of it are either taught or implied in the writings of Dr. Samuel Hopkins of Newport, R.I., the earliest of whose publications were sanctioned by the elder Edwards and Dr. Bellamy. Those principles which are merely implied in his system have been unfolded and somewhat modified by his three friends, Dr. Stephen West, Dr. Nathanael Emmons, and Dr. Samuel Spring. As logically connected with each other, and as understood by the majority of his advocates, the system contains the following principles. (1) Every moral agent choosing right has the power to choose right, and choosing wrong has the natural power to choose right. (2) He is under no obligation to perform an act, unless he has the natural ability to perform it.
(3) Although in the act of choosing, every man is as free as any moral agent can be, yet he is acted upon while he acts freely, and the divine providence, as well as decree, extends to all his wrong as really as to his right volitions. (4) All sin is so overruled by God as to become the occasion of good to the universe. (5) The holiness and the sinfulness of every moral agent belong to him personally and exclusively, and cannot be imputed in a literal sense to any other agent. (6) As the holiness and the sin of man are exercises of his will, there is neither holiness nor sin in his nature viewed as distinct from these exercises.
(7) As all his moral acts before regeneration are certain to be entirely sinful, no promise of regenating grace is made to any of them. (8) The impatient sinner is obligated, and should be exhorted, to cease from all impotent acts, and to begin a holy life at once. His moral inability to obey this exhortation is not a literal inability, but a mere certainty, that, while left to himself, he will sin; and this certainty is no reason for his not being required and urged to abstain immediately from all sin. (9) Every impotent sinner should be willing to suffer the punishment which God wills to inflict upon him. In whatever sense he should submit to the divine justice punishing other sinners, in that sense he should submit to the divine justice punishing himself. In whatever sense the punishment of the finally obdurate promotes the highest good of the universe, in that sense he should be submissive to the divine will in punishing himself, if finally obdurate. This principle is founded mainly on the two following. (10) All holiness consists in the elective preference of the greater above the smaller, and all sin consists in the elective preference of the smaller above the greater, good of sentient beings.
(11) All the moral attributes of God are comprehended in general benevolence, which is essentially the same with general justice, and includes simple, complacent, and composite benevoence; legislative, retributive, and public justice. (12) The atonement of Christ consists not in his enduring the punishment threatened by the law, nor in his performing the duties required by the law, but in his manifesting and honoring by his pains, and especially by his death, all the divine attributes which would have been manifested in the same and no higher degree by the punishment of the redeemed. (13) The atonement was made for all men, the non-elect as really as the elect.

The epithet “Hopkinsian” was invented in 1769 or 1770 by Rev. William Hart of Saybrook, Conn., and was applied, not to the whole system of Dr. Hopkins, but to the principles marked 7 and 8 above. As a whole, Hopkinsianism has been distinguished by the prominence which it gives to the sternest class of truths; as the decrees and sovereignty of God, the eternity of future punishment, etc. It has prepared the way for giving this prominence by introducing a differ-et class of principles; as the equity of God in adapting his law to the natural ability of men, his infinite worthiness in making benevolence the sum of all his moral stult, the beauty of his holiness as consisting in the choice of the greater above the smaller good of the universe, etc. On account of the prominence which it gives to the former class of principles, it has been criticised as Hyper-Calvinism: on account of its adopting the latter class, it has been criticised since 1772 as Arminian and Pelagian. By combining the two classes, and developing their consistency with each other and with the uses of the pulpit, it has claimed the title of "Consistent Calvinism." The substance of it has been now incorporated with what is termed "New-England Theology" (see art.).

EDWARDS A. PARK.

HORE, Mount (the mountain). There are two mountains of this name in Scripture. The first, called by the Arabs Jebel Nebi Harun ("the mountain of the prophet Aaron"), is on the boundary-line of Edom (Num. xx. 23), midway between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah, and is forty-eight hundred feet high. It has two peaks; and on one of these, or, as some suppose, on the level space between them, from whence he could be seen by all the people, Aaron died (Num. xx. 27, 28). The tomb (Kabr Harun) now shown to travellers as his is a small building twenty-eight by thirty-three feet, surmounted by a white dome,—the usual mark of a saint's resting-place. The interior of the tomb consists of two rooms, one above the other. The upper one has in it a stone sarcophagus: the ceiling is supported by four pillars. The lower room is reached by a flight of steps, and is perfectly dark. At one end, through a grating, is shown what purports to be the real tomb. The second Mount Hor (Num. xxxiv. 7, 8) was between the Mediterranean and the "entrance of Hamath," but has not been further identified.

HORBE, Johann Heinrich, b. at Colmar, in Alsace, June 11, 1645; d. at Steinbeck, near Hamburg, Jan. 29, 1695; studied theology at Strassburg, where, among others, he also had Spener for his teacher; visited afterwards the universities of Jena, Leipzig, Wittenberg, Helmstädt, and Kiel; travelled in Holland, England, and France, and was in 1671 appointed pastor at Trarbach on the Mosel. The boldness with which he expounded and carried out into practice his Pietistic views brought him into collision with his colleagues, and in 1678 he was dismissed. In the following year he was appointed pastor of Windsheim in Franconia, and in 1684 pastor of St. Nicholas in Hamburg. In the last place he found but few adherents, but also many adversaries; and the distribution of Die Klugheilder Gerechten, a translation of a pamphlet by the French mystic Pierre Poiret, raised such a storm against him that he was dismissed November, 1689. He retired to Steinbeck, where he died. A list of his writings is found in J. MÜLLER: Cimbria litterata, II., pp. 355-372. See also J. GEFCKEN: Johann Winckler und die Hamburgische Kirche, Hamburg, 1861.

HORCHE, Heinrich, b. at Eschwege, Dec. 12, 1652; d. at Kirchhain, Aug. 5, 1729; studied at Marburg, and was appointed court-preacher at Kreuznach 1685, and pastor of Herborn 1690, from which latter position he was dismissed in 1698. Gradually his pietism developed into separatism, his enthusiasm into insanity. The last part of his life he spent wandering about, preaching in public, and holding conventicles. He was several times arrested, and twice detained in a lunatic-asylum. But his relations with all the separatists and enthusiasts of his time continued to the last. See H. HOCHEHUTH: H. H. und die philadelphiaischen Gemeinden in Hesse, Göttingen, 1877, 878.

HO'REB. See SINAI.

HORMISDAS (Pope July 20, 514—Aug. 6, 523) demanded, as a condition of the re-establishment of union between the Eastern and Western churches, the formal acknowledgment of the anathema spoken by the Bishop of Rome over Anasius. The Emperor Anastasius refused the demand, but his successor, Justin I., complied with it; and in 516 Ekthesis, which had lasted for thirty-five years, was healed. Hormisdas' letters are found in Migne, Patrology, L. 63; his life, in Jaffé, Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 65.

HORNE, George, an eminent English divine and commentator; b. at Otham, Kent, Nov. 1, 1730; d. at Bath, Jan. 17, 1792. He was educated at University College, Oxford, and made fellow of Magdalen, 1749. He rose to very high distinction as a scholar, became president of Magdalen in 1768, vice-chancellor of the university 1776, dean of Canterbury 1781, and was consecrated Bishop of Norwicke 1785. He enjoyed the friendship and esteem of Dr. Johnson. Bishop Horne was an evangelical divine, a polished preacher, and a genial writer. He early entered into a controversy with Dr. Kennicott, who proposed to make a collation of Hebrew manuscripts, fearing the results, or at least denying the claims, of a scientific criticism of the Bible. His Commentary on the Psalms (2 vols., 1776) has passed through many editions, and is his best work. It is characterized by unction and fertility of devotional counsel. Editions have appeared with an excellent Introductory Essay by Edwards Stevengraph. Among his other works was a volume of Letters on Infidelity (1784), in which he criticises Hume's arguments. See The Works of B. Horne, with his Life, by William Jones, London, 1795-96, 6 vols., and 1831, 4 vols.

HORNE, Thomas Hartwell, b. in London, Oct. 30, 1780; d. there Jan. 27, 1862. He was educated at Christ's Hospital (1798-95), and then was a barrister's clerk; but in 1808 he became sub-librarian to the Surrery Institution, in 1814 librarian; was admitted to holy orders 1819; was senior assistant librarian in the British Museum 1824-60, made B.D. by Cambridge 1829, prebendary of St. Paul's 1831, and in 1833 was appointed rector of the united parishes of St. Edmund the King, and St. Nicholas Acona, in London. He gave early evidence of his literary ability in his Brief View of the Necessity and Truth of the Christian Religion (1802. 2d ed., 1806) and wrote very many pamphlets and volumes; but the work by which he is remembered is An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, London, 1818, 3 vols., and 1831, 4 vols. But Dr. Davidson's "rationalism" led to the rejection of his work, and the substitution of the revision of vol. 2 by Rev. John Ayre. The fourteenth edition of the work appeared 1877: there is also an American reprint of a former edition. Horne's Introduction is the most famous book of its class. It covers the entire field of biblical learning,—not only general and special introduction proper, but hermeneutics, apologetics, biblical geography, natural history, etc. It has been of incalculable value in the Church, and the means of turning many persons unto profound Bible study. The Bibliographical HORSELY, of Hornebus, Conrad, b. at Brunswick, Nov. 25, 1660; d. at Helmstadt, Sept. 26, 1699; studied philosophy and theology, first in his native place, afterwards at Helmstadt, where he was professor of philosophy in 1619, and of theology in 1628. His Compendium diaelecticae (1623), Philosophia moralis (1624), Theologia, and Hist. Eccles. (the two last published after his death), were much used as text-books, not only at Helmstadt, but also in other universities.

HOROLEIUM (ὁρολεῖον, "a dial"), an office-book of the Greek Church, corresponding to the Latin breviary, and containing the office for the day and night hours of the Church, from matins to compline, with the variable antiphons and hymns, and various short offices, prayers, and canons, for occasional use.

HORSLEY, Samuel, a learned and eloquent prelate of the Church of England; b. in London, 1733; d. at Brighton, Oct. 4, 1806. His father was a minister, and personally supervised his education till he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated L.L.B. in 1758. His first charge in the ministry was Newington in Surrey. In 1767 he was elected to the Royal Society, and was secretary of that body from 1773 to 1784, when he resigned his membership, on account of difficulties with the president. He was an able classical scholar and mathematician, published works in both departments, and edited the Works of Sir Isaac Newton, in 5 vols., 1779.

His ministerial career was a brilliant one. After filling other positions, he was appointed in 1781 archdeacon of St. Alban's. Whilst holding this position, he entered Parliament, 1767, and became a supporter of Mr. Pitt. In 1793 he was an energetic supporter of Mr. Pitt. In 1793 he was a minister, and personally supervised his education till he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated L.L.B. in 1758. His first charge in the ministry was Newington in Surrey. In 1767 he was elected to the Royal Society, and was secretary of that body from 1773 to 1784, when he resigned his membership, on account of difficulties with the president. He was an able classical scholar and mathematician, published works in both departments, and edited the Works of Sir Isaac Newton, in 5 vols., 1779-85. His ministerial career was a brilliant one. After filling other positions, he was appointed in 1781 archdeacon of St. Alban's. Whilst holding this position, he entered Parliament, 1767, and became a supporter of Mr. Pitt. In 1793 he was an energetic supporter of Mr. Pitt. In 1793 he was a minister, and personally supervised his education till he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated L.L.B. in 1758. His first charge in the ministry was Newington in Surrey. In 1767 he was elected to the Royal Society, and was secretary of that body from 1773 to 1784, when he resigned his membership, on account of difficulties with the president. He was an able classical scholar and mathematician, published works in both departments, and edited the Works of Sir Isaac Newton, in 5 vols., 1779-85.
king of Israel, into the reign of Hosea; so that there is no good reason for denying the genuineness of the superscription (i. 1), as some have done [or from about 784 to 726 B.C.]. That the prophecies of Hosea have been handed down to us in their integrity, has with reason been emphasized by Ewald.

Hosea is closely related to Amos, his older contemporary, as is evident by a comparison of Hos. iv. 3, and Amos viii. 8; Hos. iv. 15, and Amos v. 3; Hos. v. 7, and Amos vii. 4, etc. But, closely related as the prophets are, the differences in their language and manner of representation are marked. Hosea's style is full of rare words (ii. 4, 12, viii. 6, etc.), verbal forms and expressions (iv. 4, ix. 1, etc.). In other respects, also, they differ. Amos is more gentle, Hosea more robust. His mind, as Umbreit as says, “moves, profoundly agitated, under the burden, divinely imposed, of preaching against the sins of his people, and announcing their fall. Hence the abruptness of his discourse, the disconnectedness of the sentences, and the peculiar character of the figures, which follow each other rapidly, and without being rounded out; so that Jerome was right when he said Hosea was concise, and spoke, as it were, in detached, unconnected sentences (commutatus est et quas peri sententias loquens).” Notwithstanding, however, the dark flood of ire which the book reveals to our gaze, it also unveils a light of reconciling love of surpassing beauty, which ever and anon shines un on the adulterous people. And in this combination lies the peculiar splendor of our prophet.”

Hosea is referred to three times in the New Testament,—Rom. ix. 25, 26, 1 Cor. xv. 55, and Matt. ii. 15.

HOSHE’A (God is help), the son of Elah, and the last and best of the kings of Israel, headed a conspiracy against Pekah, slew him, and seized the throne (2 Kings xv. 30). But he was unable to stay the fall of his kingdom. At the very beginning of his reign he was compelled to pay tribute to Assyria (2 Kings xvii. 3); and in his ninth year he was invaded by the Assyrian king, because he had attempted an alliance with Egypt. Samaria was taken, after a three-years’ siege, and a large part of the people carried away to Assyria (xvii. 6), and the land was newly peopled (xvii. 24, cf. Hos. xiii. 16, Mic. i. 6). It would seem that the king who began the siege of Samaria was Shalmaneser; the king who took it was Sargon; the Egyptian king, who is called So, was Sevechus, the second king of the twenty-fifth Egyptian dynasty.

HOSIUS, generally called Osius by Latin writers; b. 256; d. 358; was Bishop of Corduba (Cordova), in Spain, for over fifty years. He was present at the synod of Elvira (305 or 306), and agreed in its severe canons concerning the lapse, the marriage of ecclesiastics, and other points of discipline. Some years later on he appears at the court of Constantine the Great as a man of great influence. He brought personally the emperor’s letter to Bishop Alexander of Alexandria, and Arius, exhorting them to refrain from disturbing the Church by their disputes; and he was, no doubt, instrumental in the convention of the first ecumenical council of Nicaea (325), where he played a prominent part. In the details of his administration of his diocese, nothing is known: but he remained the firm friend of Athanasius and his cause in the Western Church; and when Constantius, in 353, endeavored to establish peace in the Church by openly favoring the arians, he then banished to Sirmium, and, by a synod held there in 357, he was induced to subscribe the second Sirmian formula, involving communion with the Arians, but not the condemnation of Athanasius. After his return to Corduba, he retracted, however. Of his writings, only the above-mentioned letter has come down to us. ATHANASIUS: Ad Monach.; DAIK: Sondel d. Elvira. 1882; W. MÖLLER.

HOSIUS, Stanislavus, b. in Cracow, May 5, 1504; d. at Capranica, near Rome, Aug. 5, 1579; studied law at Padua and Bologna; entered the service of the Church, and was made Bishop of Culm 1549, Bishop of Ermeland, 1551, and cardinal 1561. He was a most decided and energetic enemy of the Reformation, intimately connected with the Jesusites, rejoicing over the murder of Coligny, and anxious that Poland also should have its Massacre of St. Bartholomew. He drew up the Concordat of Petrakus 1651, and founded in 1658 the college and seminary of Braunsberg, which for centuries formed the centre of the Roman-Catholic mission among the Protestants. He was not a great theologian. The Bible he considered the property of the Roman Church; though one quality left out of view, it had, he thought, no more worth than the tables of Essex. His writings, passionately polemical, are full of theological blunders. But he was a great administrator and a great diplomatist, and successfully carried through many very difficult negotiations. A collected edition of his works appeared at Cologne, 1584. See KRASINSKI: The Reform. in Poland, Lond., 1838-40, 2 vols.; and his life written by RESCUT AND A. EICHORN, Mains, 1855, 2 vols. SUDROFF.

HOSPINIAN, Rudolph, b. at Altorf, Nov. 7, 1547; was made Bishop of Ermeland and Mellenburg, and was appointed, first director of the gymnasium, then pastor at Zurich, where he died March 11, 1626. He was a very prolific writer, mostly polemical. The principal of his works are De or-HOSPITALITY.

HOSSBACH.

gine et progressu rituum (1585), De templis (1587), De monachis (1588), Historia sacramentaria (1608), Concordia discors (1617), which was vehemently attacked by Hutter, Historia Jesuica (1619). A collected edition of his works appeared at Geneva, 167 vol., folio, with life by J. H. Heidinger.

HOSPITALITY AMONG THE HEBREWS.

This virtue was practised and held in the highest esteem among Israel and throughout the East. When a stranger appeared, he was invited into the house or tent. As soon as he arrived, he was furnished with water to wash his feet, received a supply of needful food for himself and his beast, and enjoyed courtesy and protection from his host (Gen. xviii. 2 sq., xix. 1 sq., xxiv. 25, 31 sq.; Exod. ii. 20; Judg. xiii. 15, xiv. 20 sq., 23). To leave a stranger outside in the street was a disgrace to the whole community (Judg. ix. 15). And to refuse him admittance was considered discreditable (Job xxxi. 32). The religious hatred existing between Jews and Samaritans destroyed the mutual relations of hospitality (Luke ix. 53; John iv. 9); and only in the greatest extremity would the Jew partake of Samaritan food, and if possible he avoided passing through Samaria on his journey. On his departure he would make it evident that he was not allowed to go alone or empty handed (Gen. xviii. 16). Where modern tourists have not spoiled the East, this custom of hospitality is still prevailing.

RUETSCHI.

HOSPITALLERS, or HOSPITAL BRETHREN, is the common name of all those associations of laymen, monks, canons, and knights, which devoted themselves to nursing the sick and the poor in the hospitals, while at the same time observing certain monastic practices, generally according to the rule of Augustine. Most of those brotherhoods were connected with some regular monastic order, and stood under the authority of the bishop. When they were large, they had a general or superior, and a steward to take care of the finances. Some of them, as, for instance, the Knights Hospitaller, had a general or major, and stood under the authority of the bishop. When they were many, they had a general of their own; but even the smaller ones had their superior or major, and a steward to take care of the finances. Some of them, as, for instance, the Hospitallers of St. Jean de Dieux in France, were connected with a regular monastery, and stood immediately under the Pope. Only a few of them took the regular monastic vows.

The first of this kind of brotherhood was founded in Italy in the ninth century. The crusaders their number increased immensely, and they spread over all Europe. The religious orders of knights, as, for instance, the Knights of St. John and the Teutonic Knights, originated from the same movement. One of the oldest associations bearing the name of Hospitallers was that of the Hospital Brethren of the Holy Spirit, founded in 1190 at Montpellier, by Count Guido, and confirmed in 1198 by Innocent III.; it had its mother-house in the Hospital S. Spiritus in Saxia in Rome. There followed the Hospitallers of Burgos (1212), the Frères de la Charité de la bienheureuse Marie (founded at Boucheraumont in the diocese of Chalons 1280, and having its mother-house in the hospital Les Billets in Paris), the Hospitallers of Tournai, the Hospitallers of Poitiers, etc.

There were also hospital sisters; and the female associations originating in the twelfth century achieved a still greater success than the male ones. They united to the duty of nursing the sick and the poor, also that of educating young girls, especially orphans, and rescuing fallen women. The principal sisterhoods were those of St. Gervais (1171), St. Catharine in Paris (1229), St. Martha of Pontarlier (1867), etc. See HELYOT: Histoire d. ord. mon., Paris, 1714–18, 6 vols. ZÖCKLER.

HOSPITAL, Michel de L. See HOPITAL.

HOSPITALS. The idea of honoring and serving Christ in the person of the unfortunate and diseased has manifestly deeply impressed the Church. From the beginning, Christians have been proverbial for the care they have displayed for the sick. The deacons and deaconesses of the early Church visited the sick in their homes, but not then alone; and, even in times of persecution and of pestilence, all Christians joined in such pious duties. Care of the sick was unremittent. When the ban of the State was lifted from the Church, then buildings for the reception of the sick, the needy, and the stranger, began to be erected in all parts of the empire. And these came directly under the care of the bishops, who, of course, employed others to manage the details. Indeed, the Code of Justinian made their employment of superintendents obligatory. Basil the Great (330–379) seems to have built the most complete institution of the kind. In it there were accommodations even for lepers. The Emperor Julian was stirred up by the example of the Christians to provide on a generous scale for the sick. Later Placilla, the wife of Theodosius the Great, is mentioned by Theodoret (Hist. Eccl., v. 19) as devoting much time to hospital service, doing even manual duties. The first person to build a hospital in Rome was Fabiola, one of Jerome's converts, who, out of penitenice for a constructive sin (a second marriage after divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery, which was contrary to church law), gave all her property to charitable uses. Jerome himself had previously built a hospital in Bethlehem. There is notice of hospitals in Gaul in the fifth century; in Germany in the eighth or ninth century. The Irish missions of the latter period built them in different parts of Northern Europe in connection with their monasteries: hence they were called “Hospitalia Scotiae.” i.e., Irish Hospitals.

It is a striking fact, mentioned by Martigny, that hospitals were in ancient times commonly dedicated to the Holy Spirit, which was represented under the form of a dove, either on the facade, or on some other conspicuous part of the building.” The principal hospital in Rome bears this designation, and has borne it from a very remote period.

See the arts. Hôpitaux, in Martigny's Dict. des antiqu. chrét., and in Lichtenberger's Encyclopédie des sciences religieuses, and Hospitals, in Smith and Cheetham's Dict. of Christian Antiquities.

HOSPITAL SISTERS. See HOSPITALLERS.

HOSSBACH, Peter Wilhelm, b. at Wusterhausen, in the province of Prussia, Feb. 20, 1784; studied theology at Halle and Franfort-on-the-Oder, and was appointed pastor, first of Planitz, near his native town, then at the military academy, and finally at the Church of Jerusalem in Berlin, where he died April 7, 1846. Besides several collections of sermons (1822–48), he published Das Leben J. V. Andreas (1819) and Spener und seine Zeit (1828), both of which hold a high rank among historical monographs.
HOST. See Mass.

HOTTENTOTS, Christian Missions among the, were begun by George Schmidt, a Moravian missionary, who arrived at Cape Town in 1737. Although he spoke through an interpreter, his success was great, and therefore the colonial government interfered. In 1744 he returned to Europe in order to have his grievances removed; but in this he was not only unsuccessful, but the Dutch East India Company, which governed the colony, did not even allow him to return. It was not until 1792 that the mission was resumed by three other Moravian missionaries, and, until 1796, carried on amid formidable opposition on the part of the colonists. Since 1806 the colony has been under British government; and the mission has not been disturbed, and is now in a flourishing condition. But the Moravians have not been alone upon the field. The London Missionary Society, in 1798, sent thither two missionaries,—Dr. Vanderkemp and Mr. Edmonds. The Wesleyan Missionary Society began operations in 1814; and other societies have since come in. The success of their work refutes the Portuguese notion that the Hottentots were a race of apes, incapable of Christianization. Low as they are in the scale of civilization, they are still soft for the gospel-seed, and bear precious increase. The gospel of Christ makes of the Hottentot a hero and a saint. For a full account of the language, history, and geographic and ethnographic relations of the Hottentots, see art. in Encyclopedia Britannica, 9th ed., vol. xii. 309-313. For their religion, see T. HAHN: Tracts for the Khoi-Khoi, London, 1882.

HOTTINGER is the name of a Swiss family which has produced several notable theologians.

— Johann Heinrich Hottinger, b. in Zurich, March 10, 1620; d. there June 5, 1667; studied theology and Oriental languages in Geneva, Groningen, and Leyden; was appointed professor of theology in his native city 1641; and wrote, among other works, Exercitationes Anti-Morinae de Pentateuco Samaritanis (1644), and Historia Eccles. Novi Test. (1651-67, 9 vols.)—Johann Jacob Hottinger, son of the preceding; b. in Zurich, Dec. 1, 1652; d. there Dec. 18, 1735; studied in Basel and Geneva; was appointed professor of theology in his native city 1691; and wrote Hebræische Kirchengesch. (1688-1729, 4 vols. quarto).—Johann Jakob Hottinger, a relative of the preceding; b. in Zurich, May 18, 1758; was professor of history there, and died there May 18, 1800. He continued Johann von Müller's work on the history of Switzerland, and gave a valuable representation of the introduction of the Reformation in Switzerland.

HOUBIGANT, Charles François, b. in Paris, 1680; d. there 1783; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1701; served as teacher in various colleges, but retired in 1723 on account of complete deafness, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. His principal works are Racines Hebraïques (1732), in mnemonic verses, and Biblique Hebraïque, with a Latin translation and critical notes (1765, 4 vols.), published at the expense of the Oratory.

HOUSAS, Canonical. See Canonical Hours.

HOUSE AMONG THE HEBREWS. See Architecture, Hebrew.
the criminal, not only in Great Britain, but, to some extent, throughout a large part of Europe. Of the animating principle of his career, Dr. Stoughton has said that "religion principle developed in simple and unostentatious, almost puritanical, forms, constituted the strength and inspiration of Howard's world-known character."

Mr. Howard's Life has been written by Aikin (London, 1792), Brown (London, 1818), Herdworth Dixon (London, 5th ed., 1836), Taylor (London, 1836), John Field (London, 1850), Stoughton (London, 1853), and his Correspondence edited by Field (London, 1855).

Howe, John, an eminent Puritan divine and author; b. May 17, 1630, at Loughborough, Leicestershire, where his father was minister; d. April 2, 1706, in London. The elder Howe was thrust out of his position by Laud for espousing the cause of the Puritans, and went to Ireland when the subject of this sketch was five years old. He afterwards returned to England, and settled in Lancaster. John Howe was educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and made fellow of Magdalen College in the latter university, of which Dr. Thomas Goodwin was at the time the president. About 1652 he became pastor at Great Torrington in Devonshire. In this place, according to his own statement, the order of his services on fast-days was as follows: Beginning at nine in the morning, he made an invocation a quarter of an hour in length, spent three-quarters of an hour in expounding a chapter, prayed for an hour, preached for an hour, then prayed again for half an hour. Here followed a recess, in which Mr. Howe took some refreshment. Returning in a quarter of an hour (the people singing all the while), the services were resumed with a prayer of an hour, continued with a sermon of another hour, and concluded at four in the afternoon with a final prayer "of about a half an hour or more."

Mr. Howe was a successful pastor; but his biographer, Edmund Calamy, without doubt has the sympathy of the present age when he closes this description by exclaiming, "A sort of service that few could have gone through without inexpressible weariness, both to themselves and their auditories."

In 1654 Howe went on a visit to London, and was an auditor in the chapel at Whitehall, when he was espied, and recognized from his garb, by Cromwell, to be a country minister. Attracted by his fine appearance, the Protector despatched a messenger after him at the conclusion of the services, and pressed him so hard to remain over the following Sabbath and preach before him, that in vain he pleaded one excuse after another. The result was that Howe, much against his private preferences, became one of Cromwell's chaplains. Elevated to this position, he showed a tolerant spirit, and helped more than one of the Episcopalian clergymen, as, notably, Thomas Fuller and Dr. Ward, afterwards Bishop of Exeter. Upon Richard's deposition, he returned to his former parish at Torrington. When the Act of Uniformity was passed, he quitted his church, but continued for some time in the neighborhood, preaching in private houses. He was called to Exeter to see the bishop, who proposed to him to be re-ordained. Howe answered, "The thought is shocking, my lord: it hurts my understanding. It is an absurdity, for nothing can have two beginnings. I am sure I am a minister of Christ, and I can't begin again to be a minister." In common with Dr. Bates and others, he accepted the Five-Mile Act, which was passed in 1663, with the limiting clause, "so far as the laws of man are agreeable to the Word of God." In 1671, having preached privately at houses in London. From this time till his death he took an active interest in the theological discussions of the day (as that on the Trinity), and preserved the respect of all parties.

Mr. Howe is described as tall in person, graceful in manner, and of a piercing but pleasant eye. He was a ready offhand preacher, and never used notes. He was conciliatory in disposition, catholic in spirit, anxious to promote Christian unity, and more than once put his opponents in controversy to the blush by his moderation and fairness.

Howe's works, in spite of being somewhat prolix and tedious, are among the most suggestive and profound of the Puritan writings. "I have learned more from John Howe than from any author I ever read," said Robert Hall. "There is an astonishing magnificence about his conceptions" (edition of his works, Lond., 1853, vi. 120). His principal works are the treatise, Delighting in God, 1671; The Living Temple, 1st part, 1678, 2d part, 1702, in which he discusses the questions naturally suggested by the idea that man is the temple of God; The Redeemer's Tears over Lost Souls, 1684. His Complete Works were first issued in 1791.

HOWIE, John, a Scotch Presbyterian layman; b. at Lochgoil, Nov. 14, 1733; d. there, September, 1791. He wrote that famous book, The Scots Worthies, or, as the full title reads, Bibliotheca Scotica; or a brief historical account of the most eminent Scots worthies, etc., 1748-1749, Glasgow, 1734 and often; new ed., revised, corrected, and enlarged, with a preface and notes by William McGavin, Edinburgh and New York, 1853. The book is still in print and read.

HOYLE, Joseph, D.D., b. at Sorby, near Halifax, Yorkshire, Eng.; d. Dec. 6, 1664. He was educated in Magdalen Hall, Oxford, but became fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, and took his degrees of divinity, and became professor of divinity, in that university. He devoted himself to biblical studies and the Reformed Church controversy, and was a friend and warm admirer of Archbishop Ussher. He fled from the Irish massacre and returned to England, and became vicar of Stepney near London. In 1643 he was appointed a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. He labored on the committee on the Confession of Faith. In 1648 he was appointed master of University College, Oxford, and Kings Professor of Divinity in the university. His two published works are, A rejoinder to Mr. Malone, Jesus, his reply concerning Real Presence (4to, pp. 66, Dublin, 1841), and Justice against Maitan, Bai's Priest, a sermon (London, 1645). C. A. BRIGGS.

HUBERINUS, Caspar, b. at Wilspach, Bavaria, Dec. 21, 1500; d. at Oeiringen, Oct. 6, 1553; was a monk, when in 1525 he began to preach the Reformed Church in Augsburg, and became an evangelical pastor there in 1528, and in 1544 superintendent at Oeiringen. He published several collections of sermons.

HUBERT, St., son of Bertrand, Duke of Gui...
HÜMAI_ER, or, as he used to write the name himself, HÜMBR, Balthasar, b. at Friedberg, near Augsburg, 1499; d. in Vienna (buried at the stake) March 10, 1526; studied theology and philosophy at Freiburg under Eck, and was appointed professor of theology at Ingolstadt in 1512, and preacher at the cathedral of Ratisbon in 1510. From the latter position he was removed in 1522, suspected of favoring the Reformation; and, as soon as he had become settled as preacher of Walduf, he entered into communication with Zwingli, and openly embraced the reformed faith. At the same time he made the acquaintance of Th. Münzer; and when, in 1525, he published his Von dem christlichen Tauf der Glaubigen, it became apparent that he had adopted the Anabaptist views. Compelled to leave Austria by the Austrians, he fled to Zürich, but was imprisoned there, and compelled to recant April 6, 1526. He afterwards retracted the recantation, and settled in Moravia, where he found many adherents, and developed a great activity, preaching and writing; but when, after the death of King Lewis of Hungary, Moravia fell to Ferdinand of Austria, Hübmaier was dragged to Vienna, and executed. Calvary, in his Mitt. aus dem Antiquitaire (vol. i., Berlin, 1870), gives a picture of the man and a complete list of his works. CUNITZ.

HUBBAD, b. in the middle of the ninth century; d. 930; was director first of the cloister-school of St. Amand in Flanders, then of the cathedral-school of Rheims. He wrote two treatises on music, which occupy a prominent place in the history of music, some biographies of saints, which are of historical value, and a poem. See G. Nisard: Hubbad, Paris, 1867.

HUGET, François, b. at Villeau, in the department of Eure-et-Loir, Dec. 26, 1814; d. in Paris, July 1, 1889; was for several years professor of philosophy at Ghent, but lost that position by the persecutions of the Ultramontanists; became tutor to Prince Milan of Servia, and published Recherches sur la vie et les ouvrages de Henri de Goul, 1858; Le Cartésianisme, 1843, 2 vols.; Le rationalisme, 1864, translated into English, New York, 1866; and La Révolution religieuse au 19ème siècle, 1896.

HUGET, Pierre Daniel, b. at Caen, Feb. 8, 1830; d. in Paris, Jan. 26, 1721; was one of the teachers of the young dauphin, and was in 1689 made bishop of Avranches, but resigned in 1699, and devoted himself for the rest of his life exclusively to literature. He published a celebrated edition of Origen, 2 vols. folio, 1688. Of his original works, the principal are Demonstratio evangelica, 1791; Censura philosophica cartesianae, 1690; Questions Althaeae, 1690; etc. See BARTHELMESS: Huet, ou le scepticisme théologique, 1850.

HUG, Johann Leonard, Roman-Catholic biblical scholar; b. at Constance, June 1, 1765; d. at Freiburg, South Germany, March 11, 1846. After a brilliant career in the university of Freiburg, he became (1787) superintendent of the studies in the seminary for the training of priests in connection with the university, and in 1791 professor of the Oriental languages of the Old Testament, and (1792) of the New Testament. The remainder of his life was laboriously spent in the service of his beloved university; although his great reputation induced calls to Breslau, Cologne, Tübingen, and Bonn (three times). It was Hug's great service to oppose the Semler school of New Testament, particularly of gospel, interpretation. Hug held firmly to the historicity of the New Testament writings, and on this basis vigorously defended them. He is chiefly remembered by his Einleitung in die Schriften des neuen Testaments, Stuttgart u. Tübingen, 1808, 2 vols., later editions, 1821, 1828, 1847, French (partial) translation by J. E. Cellerier, Geneva, 1823, English translation by Ward, London, 1827, and by Fosdick, with notes by Moses Stuart, Andover, 1839. In this work he advocates the theory, that up to the middle of the third century the New Testament text existed only in a common edition (codex kudius), which was subsequently revised by Hexychins, Lucian of Antioch, and by Origen. (See the discussion of this theory by Tregelles, in Horne's Introduction, 14th ed., vol. iv. pp. 75—87, and by Scrivener, Introduction, 2d ed., pp. 465—460.) Among other noteworthy writings by Hug is his new interpretation of the Canticles, given in Das hohe Lied in einer noch unversuchten Deutung (Freiburg, 1813) and Schützschrift für seine Deutung des hohen Liedes und derselben weitere Erläuterung (Freiburg, 1818). According to him, the bride is of the kingdom of the ten tribes; the bridegroom is King Hezekiah; the brothers of Shulamith are a party in the house of Judah; the whole is "a representation, clothed in idyllic form, of the longing felt by the kingdom of the ten tribes for re-union with Judah, but which those 'brothers' opposed." (See Zöckler, in Lange's Commentary, American edition, Introduction to the Song of Solomon, p. 32.) For a full account of Hug, see AD. MAIER: Gedächtnissrede auf Hug, Freiburg, 1847.

HUGHES, John, first archbishop of New York; b. at Annaloughan, Ireland, June 24, 1797; d. in New-York City, Jan. 3, 1864. He emigrated in 1817; entered the Mount St. Mary's Catholic College at Emmitsburg, Frederick County, Md., 1820; ordained priest 1826, and settled in Philadelphia, where he remained until 1829. In 1828 he was appointed co-adjutor bishop of New York, and consecrated Jan. 7, 1838. In 1842, on the death of Bishop Dubois, he became titular bishop; in 1850 the see of New York was raised to metropolitan rank, and he went to Rome to receive the pallium at the hands of the Pope. In 1847 he delivered before both houses of Congress, and at HUGHES.

1030 HUGO OF ST. VICTOR.

their request, a discourse upon Christianity, the only source of moral, social, and political regeneration. On Aug. 5, 1835, he laid the corner-stone of the cathedral on Fifth Avenue, which was dedicated May 25, 1879. In November, 1861, in company with Mr. Thurlow Weed, he made a semi-official journey to Europe, at the request of Secretary Seward, in order to secure the friendly neutrality of the nation especially of France. In July, 1863, he addressed, as he supposed, the rioters, from the balcony of his house, Madison Avenue, corner 36th Street; but the great crowd which had collected, although Roman Catholic and Irish, was probably not riotous. Bishop Hughes played a more prominent part in America than any other Roman Catholic of his day, and enjoyed a great deal of general respect and popularity. He was, however, a determined Romanist, bent upon securing the destruction of the public schools and the support by the public money of the Catholic schools. Whether they had a right to be supported or not, he was ready to defend himself and his church. He had memorable encounters with Dr. John Breckinridge in 1833 and 1835 (subsequently published, Philadelphia, 1833 and 1836), before the Common Council of New-York City (1839), in 1847-48 with Dr. Nicolaus Murray (Kirwan), whose letters were published and widely circulated in several languages, and with Erastus Brooks, editor of the New York Express, 1855. One of his acts as bishop was to remove the lay trustees of church property, and to secure the titles in his own name. In this way he stopped litigation, which had brought Romanists into disrepute.

HUGO OF AMIENS, b. at Amiens, towards the close of the eleventh century; was elected Archbishop of Rouen in 1129; was made a cardinal by Innocent IV. in 1245; and d. at Orvieto in 1263. He was a learned man, took an active part in the controversy between William of St. Amour and the mendicant orders, and was a member of the committee formed to examine the Introductorius in Evangelium externum by Gerhard. His own works, however, are those of a collector rather than of a disposer. His auctrix universa Biblia gives short explanations — literal, allegorical, mystical, and moral — of the single words, and contains many curious things. But his Sacrorum Bibliorum Concordantiw, also called Concordantiae S. Jacobi (because he was aided by monks from the Dominican monastery of St. Jacob), or Concordantiae Anglicana (because the quotations were afterwards written out by English monks residing in Paris), became the model for all following works of the kind. Many works bearing his name are still extant in manuscript; but it is uncertain whether they belong to him.

See QUÉZÉT ET ÉCHARD: Scriptores ordinis pra-dicatorum, i. 194 sq.

C. SCHMIDT.

HUGO OF ST. VICTOR, with his contemporaries Abelard and Bernard, one of the most influential theologians of the twelfth century; was b. about 1087; d. Feb. 11, 1141. He gave himself up to a contemplative conventual life, and shone in consequence of pietist and speculative thought, rather than of active participation in the ecclesiastical affairs of his day. He must be regarded as the real founder of the medieval mysticism of France, for Bernard of Clairvaux is dependent upon him for the essential features of his mysti-cical speculations. The same may be affirmed of Peter Lombard. After-generations gave him the title of Didascalus ("teacher"), or Alter Augustinus ("the second Augustine"). Two localities claim the honor of being Hugo's birthplace,—the vicinities of Ypres in Flanders, and Saxony. The Benedictines, in vol. xii. of the Hist. lit. de la France, bring forward three testimonies from old authors in favor of the former. But there are weightier testimonies for Saxony. His tombstone declared Hugo to be of Saxon birth (origines Saxonum). Two Saxons were the first to place him in the cloister school of Hamersleben in 1115. To these must be added the testimonies of early Saxons who speak of Hugo as belonging to the families of Von Blankenburg and Regenstein in the Hartz Mountains. After passing through the school at Hamersleben, he went with his uncle, archdeacon Hugo of Halberstadt, to France, and entered the famous cloister institution of St. Victor, near Paris. Fifteen years afterward he was made preceptor of the school.

— a position which he continued to fill for eight years. Among his scholars were the after-celebrated Adam and Richard of St. Victor. Hugo stood in intimate relations with Bernard, but took no prominent part in the public affairs of Church and State. He was of delicate and sickly constitution.

Hugo's writings are quite numerous. Those of a more mystical tendency belong to his earlier period. Among these are the three tracts, — De Arca Morali, De Arca Mystica, and De Vanitate Mundi,— in which he compares Noah's ark with the church, the soul in this world with the soul at peace with God, etc. His exegetical works are com-fined to no single period of his life. They have only a homiletical interest, and are the least original of his writings. They include a short Introduction to the Scriptures, Commentaries on the Pentateuch, and the other historical books of the Old Testament, on the Psalms and Lamentations, and nineteen Homilies on Ecclesiastes. The other commentaries ascribed to him (Luke, John, etc.) are of very doubtful authenticity. To the last period of Hugo's life belong three of his most valuable works. The Erudito Didascalia is encyclopedic, and treats in three books of the natural sciences, and in an equal number gives a sort of introduction to church history and the Scriptures. Leaning upon the authority of Jerome, he distinguishes in this second section sharply between the canon and the Apocrypha, but nevertheless seems to give to the writings of the church fathers an equal authority with the canonical books.

The other two works of the last period (the Summa Sententiarum and the De Sacramentis Christ. Fidei) give the outline of Hugo's theological "system" and his interpretation of such works as Abelard, to whom, and Anselm, he is under obligations for some of his speculations. The works of God he treats under Works of Creation, and Works of Restoration. He discusses the Trinity and the three fundamental divine attributes—power, wisdom, and love. In the treatment of the origin of evil, he is far from the superfluous subtleties of the scholastics of a later period. Original sin he agrees with Melanchthon, to consist in ignorance and concupiscence. He mentions five sacraments,—baptism, the Eucharist, confession, extreme unction, and marriage. They confer grace. In the three sections on eschatology he commends prayers to the saints.

HUGUENOTS, a designation given to the Reformed, or Calvinists, of France. The origin of the word is involved in great obscurity. The French Protestants received at different times a variety of names, applied, for the most part, in derision; such as Lutherans, Sacramentarians, Chrestaudoins, Parpailots, "those of the pretended reformed religion," or simply "those of the religion," "religionnaires," etc. It was not until the time of the Tumult of Amboise, 1560, that the term "Huguenot" came into general use. Among the many explanations of the word that have been offered, only three need be mentioned. It has been derived from the German Eidgenossen ("confederates"),—a designation borne by the patriotic party in Geneva a quarter of a century earlier. This view was naturally a favorite one with those writers who represented the Huguenots as secret conspirators against the crown. Against it may be urged the difficulty of accounting for the transfer of the name from Geneva to the Valley of the Loire, the length of time that elapsed before the alleged reappearance of the word, and the preference given by Beza, in the history written by him, or under his supervision, in Geneva, for another derivation. Less plausible is the explanation offered by some of the Reformed themselves, who maintained that they were called Huguenots because they loudly advocated the cause of the descendants of Hugh (Hugues) Capet, as against the pretensions of the Guises, who claimed descent from Charlemagne. A sufficient answer to this is that the word "Huguenot" was unquestionably, in its origin, a term of reproach, the application of which was resented as a gross insult, and that the king was petitioned to forbid its use. A third explanation is given by Etienne Pasquier, in one of whose letters the word first occurs, and who may be regarded as our best authority. It arose, he says, in Tours, from a popular superstition that a hobgoblin, known as le roy Hugon, or Hugon, nightly roamed the streets of the city; whence the Protestants, who, from fear of persecution, dared not to meet save under cover of the darkness, came to be called Huguenots. It is an additional point in favor of this interpretation, that Pasquier affirms that he heard the Protestants called Huguenots, by certain friends of his living at Tours, eight or nine years before the Tumult of Amboise.

The history of the Huguenots in the kingdom of France may be considered under five periods: the period of persecution under the forms of law until the first recognition of the Reformed religion in the edict of January (1502); the civil wars under Charles IX., culminating in the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day (1572); the struggle to secure full toleration in the reigns of Henry III. and Henry IV., down to the proclamation of the Edict of Nantes (1598); the period that closes with the disastrous revocation of that edict by Louis XIV. (1685); and the period of the entire proscription of Protestantism, ending with the publication of the Edict of Toleration by Louis XVI. (1787), just before the first French Revolution.

I. THE PERIOD OF PERSECUTION UNDER THE FORMS OF LAW (1512-1562).—The Reformation in France may be regarded as dating from 1512, when a professor in the University of Paris, the learned Jacques Lefèvre d'Etaples, in a Latin commentary upon the Epistles of St. Paul, clearly enunciated the doctrine of justification by faith. In 1516 William Briçonnet, a patron of letters and an advocate of a moderate reformation, was appointed Bishop of Meaux. He soon gathered about him a group of scholars, including Lefèvre and his pupil William Farel, Martial Mazurier, Gérard Roussel, and others, by whom the gospel was preached with much fervor in the churches of his diocese. In 1533 Lefèvre published a French translation of the New Testament, and in 1528 a translation of the Old Testament. This version, made from the Latin Vulgate, served as a basis of the subsequent version of Olivetanus, the first French translation from the original Greek and Hebrew. The resolution of Bishop Briçonnet having given way before threats of persecution, the open reformatory movement of Meaux was brought to an end by the dispersion of the teachers whom he had invited, although... the seeds of truth they had scattered lost none of their vitality.

At first, under the influence of his sister, the cultivated Margaret, Duchess of Angoulême, Francis I. showed a disposition to favor the latter's books from Geneva. This arose, however, rather from a taste for learning, and ambition to earn distinction as a patron of the revival of letters, than from any hearty sympathy with the doctrinal views of the reformers. Moreover, the immense ecclesiastical patronage which he secured by means of the concordat entered into with Leo X., made it important to his material interests that he should remain on good terms with the Papacy.
The active participation of Francis I. in the persecution of the Protestants dates from the "affair of the placards" (1534), when a violent handbill against the papal mass was posted upon the door of the king's bed-chamber in the Castle of Amboise. In connection with the great expia-tory procession, soon after instituted (January, 1555), six Protestants were burned alive before the king's eyes, and Francis declared his purpose to extirpate hereby from his dominions. He would, he said, cut off his own arm were it infected with this poison.

The executions that followed for some months were the first serious attempt at persecution; although some distinguished victims, such as the learned and noble Louis de Berquin, had suffered earlier. Legislation became more systematically severe. In 1545 took place the Massacre of Merin of Piedmont, were destroyed by an armed expedition fitted out at Aix with the sanction of the Parliament of Provence. The next year witnessed the martyrdom of the "Fourteen of Meaux."

During the reign of Henry II., the bigoted and licentious son of Francis (1547-59), Protestantism grew steadily, despite the most earnest attempts to destroy it. The centre of the reformatory movement was Geneva, whence John Calvin ex-er ted, by means of his books and his immense influence, that was almost incredible. Stringent laws against the importation
In 1555 an attempt to introduce the Spanish Inquisition failed in consequence of the enlightened and determined resistance of the Parliament of Paris, with President Séguier at its head. In the same year an expedition, under the patronage of Admiral Coligny, set sail for Brazil, where it was hoped that a home for the persecuted might be found; but the scheme failed through the treachery of Villegagnon.

The Protestants increased greatly in numbers during the last years of Henry's life. Of this fact a proof was given in the public psalm-singing by great crowds in Paris itself. One of the chief motives of the king in concluding a disgraceful peace with Spain was avowedly that he might have leisure to devote himself to the extermination of the Protestants. Six weeks before the fatal tournament in which the monarch lost his life, the first national synod on the French Reformed churches met secretly in Paris (May 26, 1559). It adopted a confession of faith which was thereafter the standard of the Protestant French-speaking communities. It also established, in its "ecclesiastical discipline," a representative form of church government, with its courts, consistory, provincial colloquy or synod, and its "ecclesiastical discipline," a re-synod. During the succeeding hundred years twenty-eight more national synods were held. After 1659, the government refused to permit any further national synods to be convened.

The brief reign of Francis II., a youth of only sixteen years of age (1559-60), was eventful.
The execution of Anne de Bourg, a councillor of Parliament, distinguished for ability and for singular purity of character, contributed more to advance Protestantism in France, and to exasperate liberal-minded men with the prevailing tyran-ny, than any previous acts of cruelty. Through the pusillanimity of Antoine of Bourbon, King of Navarre, the first prince of the blood, the entire control of affairs had been suffered to fall into the hands of the two uncles of the young Queen of France, Mary of Scots,—Charles, Cardinal of Lorraine; and Francis, Duke of Guise. The Protestants had borne persecution with exemplary patience, so long as it was inflicted by their legitimate sovereign. They were less inclined to submit to the usurped power of the Guises, who abused the authority of a king as immature in mind as he was feeble in body. Their impatience was shared by a large number of patriotic Frenchmen, not Protestants, who refused to bear the rule of a family regarded by them as foreign. The Tumult of Amboise (1560) was the result of an attempt to seize the obnoxious ministers, and to give the king more constitutional advisers. The Prince of Condé, youngest brother of the King of Navarre, was the secret head of the movement, which, though unsuccessful, led the Guises, in the terror of the moment, to consent (March, 1560) to an edict of amnesty for the past, with no provision for the toleration of Protestantism in future. At the assembly of notables at Fontainebleau (November, 1560), Admiral Coligny presented, in behalf of the Huguenots, petitions for liberty of worship; and two prelates, Archbishop Marillac and Bishop Montluç, openly advocated the assembling of a national council to heal the malady of the church.

The death of Francis II. (December, 1560) not only saved the life of the Prince of Condé, whom the Guises had succeeded in enticing to Orleans, and who had been tried by a commission, and sentenced to be beheaded, but frustrated a larger plot for the extermination of the Huguenots. Under Charles IX., a boy of ten, the tolerant policy of Chancellor L'Hôpital for a time prevailed. The Colloquy of Poissy was held (September, 1561), at which the Huguenots for the first time enjoyed the opportunity of vindicating their religious views in the presence of the king. Theodore Beza and Peter Martyr were the chief Protestant spokesmen, and the Cardinal of Lorraine was the most prominent advocate of the Roman Catholics. On the 17th of January, 1562, the famous edict known as the "Edict of January" was published. It embodied the first formal recognition of the Proestant religion, and provided for liberty to meet for worship, without arms, in all places outside of the walled towns.
The Edict of January was the Magna Charta of Huguenot rights. Its violation was the fruitful source of a long period of civil commotion: for a whole generation the exertions of the Huguenots were directed almost solely to the maintenance or recovery of its provisions.

II. THE CIVIL WARS UNDER CHARLES IX., AND THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY (1562-74). — Scarcely had the edict been signed, when the unprovoked Massacre of Vassy, perpetrated by the Duke of Guise upon an assembly of Protestant worshippers, gave the signal for the first civil war (1562-63). Admiral Coligny and the Prince of Condé were the Huguenot leaders: Constable Montmorency, the Duke of Guise, and Marshal Saint André were the principal Roman-Catholic generals. The war raged over a great part of France, with various successes on both sides. Both Montmorency and Condé were taken prisoners; and St. André was killed at the battle of Dreux, where the Huguenots met with defeat. The murder of Duke Francis of Guise, by a fanatic named Poltrot, was closely followed by the conclusion of the Peace of Amboise. Instead of unrestricted worship outside of town-walls throughout France, the Huguenots were now allowed to meet in the suburbs of a single town in every bailiwick, and in certain cities that remained in their possession at the conclusion of the peace. A few noblemen had the right to have service in their own castles.

In 1565 the Conference of Bayonne was held between Catharine de’Medici, and the king her son, on the one side, and the Duke of Alva on the other. At this meeting it has been generally, but erroneously, supposed that the plan of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew’s Day, executed seven years later, was traced or even agreed upon. A second civil war (1567-68) soon broke out, but it was of short duration. The third civil war (1568-70) was a more sanguinary struggle. The Huguenots were defeated in the two pitched battles of Jarnac and Moncontour, in the former of which, Louis, Prince of Condé, was killed. But the admirable generalship of Coligny not only saved the Huguenots from destruction, but enabled them to secure favorable terms of peace.

Two years of quiet followed, and there seemed to be a fair prospect that the wounds inflicted by the interminable contest might soon heal. Henry, King of Navarre, was married to Margaret of Valois, youngest sister of Charles IX. In the midst of the festivities attending the occasion, Coligny was wounded by an assassin. This event was followed within forty-eight hours by the Massacre of St. Bartholomew’s Day (Sunday, Aug. 24, 1572). By this blow the attempt was made to annihilate the Huguenots, whom their enemies had expected to liquidate in honorable combat. Coligny and many of the most distinguished leaders, together with multitudes of their brethren in the faith, were mercilessly butchered. The number of victims in Paris and throughout the rest of the kingdom has been estimated variously at from twenty thousand to one hundred thousand. (See BARTHOLOMEW’S DAY, MASSACRE OF ST.)

The Huguenots were not, however, exterminated. In a fourth war (1572-73) they not only defended La Rochelle with success against the king, but obtained honorable terms of peace.

III. THE STRUGGLE TO SECURE FULL TOLERATION, IN THE REIGNS OF HENRY III. AND HENRY IV., TO THE EDICT OF NANTES (1574-98). — A fifth civil war, begun a few weeks before the accession of Henry III., lasted until the new king became convinced that it was hopeless undertaking to reduce his Protestant subjects, re-enforced as they were by a strong German auxiliary army. The peace now conceded, commonly known as “La Paix de Monsieur” (Edict of Beaullieu, May, 1576), was ostensibly more advantageous than any previously granted to the Huguenots; since it authorized the celebration of their worship everywhere in France outside of Paris, without exception as to time or place, unless the nobleman upon whose lands it was proposed to hold it should object.

The very liberality of the new pacification led to its speedy overthrow. At the instigation of the Roman-Catholic clergy and of the Guises, the Holy and Christian League sprang up in various parts of France, having for its avowed object the extermination of heresy. At the meeting of the States-General at Blois, the king was induced to proclaim himself head of the league. Hence arose the sixth civil war, which lasted only a few months, since the king found the states unwilling to supply him the means of carrying on hostilities. The new peace (Edict of Poitiers, September, 1577) re-introduced discriminations as to the cities wherein Protestant worship might be held, and the noblemen entitled to have services in their castles. As in the previous peace, eight cities were placed in Protestant hands as pledges of its faithful execution, and mixed courts were instituted to adjudicate cases in which the parties belonged to different religions.

For eight years, with the exception of a few months covered by the unimportant seventh civil war, otherwise known as “La Guerre des Amoureuex” (1580), the peace was unbroken; although there was no lack of surprises of cities and other infractions of the treaty.

In 1584 the king’s only brother died. As He...III. was childless, Henry of Bourbon, the Huguenot King of Navarre, became heir to the throne of France. The prospect that a “heretic” might succeed gave new life to the league. The Guises, with the support of Philip II., made war upon Henry III., and after a struggle, in which the Huguenots took no part, compelled the reluctant monarch to proscribe the Protestant religion by the Edict of Nemours (July, 1586).

The eighth civil war followed (1585-89). The most noted action was the battle of Coutras (1587), in which the Roman Catholics, under the Duke of Joyeuse, were defeated by the Huguenot troops of Henry of Navarre; the duke himself being killed in the engagement. This was the first pitched battle ever won by the Huguenots; and it made so deep an impression upon their enemies, that the very sight of the Protestant soldiers kneeling before joining battle, as they had done at Coutras, struck terror into the hearts of the Roman-Catholic soldiers. The murder of Henry, Duke of Guise, and of his brother, the Cardinal of Guise, at the second States of Blois (December, 1585),... was followed, a few months subsequently, by a truce between Henry III. and Henry of Navarre. The assassination of Henry III. (August, 1589) brought Henry of Navarre, a Protestant prince, to the throne of France, under the title of Henry IV.

In the wars in which this king was engaged for years against the League, backed by the money and troops of Philip II., he enjoyed the hearty support of the Huguenots. After his insincere abjuration in 1593 (see Henry IV.), their position was in some respects less favorable than it had been under the Valois kings; since they had lost their nominal leader and the "protector" of their churches. After a long and vexatious delay, the king fulfilled his promise, and undertook to determine the civil status of the Protestants by a law which was declared to be "perpetual and irrevocable." The Edict of Nantes (April, 1598) secured freedom of conscience throughout the kingdom, and recognized the right of the Protestants to meet for worship on the lands of noble estates to which they had been confined by the edict of 1577 and subsequent interpretative declarations. These and other concessions respecting the admission of the Reformed to civil offices, and to universities and schools, on equal terms with the Roman Catholics, the establishment of mixed courts, etc., made the edict the most important bulwark of Protestant rights.

IV. THE PERIOD FROM THE PUBLICATION TO THE REVOCATION OF THE EDICT OF NANTES (1598-1685). — The edict of Henry IV. was, after his assassination (1610), solemnly confirmed by the successive declarations of the regent, Marie de' Medici, of Louis XIII. and Louis XIV. None of the less had the Huguenots soon reason to complain of infractions of a vexatious character, for which no satisfaction could be obtained. The ruin of the Protestant churches of Bearne (1629), whither Louis XIII. proceeded in person, and presently re-established the supremacy of the Roman-Catholic hierarchy, led to a Huguenot uprising. This was of brief duration; but in 1625 hostilities were renewed. The Protestants being no match for the forces of the king, the fall of La Rochelle (1628), after a vigorous siege conducted by Cardinal Richelieu, marked the close of the war and the end of the political importance of the Huguenots as a power in the State.

Meantime never were the Huguenots intellectually more active. Their worship in the neighborhood of Paris, after having been fixed at the village of Ablon, a spot both distant, and difficult of access (see ABLON), had been brought to the nearer and more convenient Charenton. This place became the centre of a powerful religious and philosophical influence that made itself felt in the capital of the kingdom and at the royal court. The number of eminent writers and preachers was great. In different parts of the kingdom, not less than six theological seminaries, or "academies," had been instituted, of which those of Saumur, Montauban, and Sedan, were the most important.

Although the violations of the spirit and even the letter of the Edict of Nantes had been frequent, it was not until after the death of Cardinal Mazarin (1661), that the process of restriction, whose logical conclusion could only be the complete repeal of Henry IV.'s ordinance, may be said distinctly to have been. From this time forward, the Huguenots, although they had been highly praised by the monarch himself more than once for their loyalty to the crown at the time of the troubles of the "Fronde," were allowed little rest. Vexatious regulations successively deprived them of their places of worship, excluded them from one employment after another, and, under the forms of law, robbed them of their property, and even the possession of their children. As the time for the last act approached, the terrible dragomannes were set on foot to compel the abjuration of those whose constancy rational persuasion had been powerless to shake. At length (October, 1685), on the pretense that his measures had proved successful, and that the reformed religion no longer existed in his dominions, Louis XIV. signed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. No exercise of the Protestant religion was to be tolerated in France. All ministers of the gospel were to be arrested, and in less places, where Protestant worship had been conceded by the edict of 1577 and subsequent interpretative declarations. These and other concessions respecting the admission of the Reformed to civil offices, and to universities and schools, on equal terms with the Roman Catholics, the establishment of mixed courts, etc., made the edict the most important bulwark of Protestant rights.

V. FROM THE REVOCATION TO THE EDICT OF TOLERATION (1685-1787). — In spite of the prohibition contained in the Edict of Revocation, the immediate effect was a great increase in the number of French Protestants that fled into foreign lands. The total number cannot be definitely ascertained. It has been estimated as high as eight hundred thousand; but this figure is undoubtedly excessive, the number probably not being over three hundred thousand to four hundred thousand. The exodus included the most industrious and thrifty part of the population. For a hundred years the Protestants that remained in France enjoyed only such rare and precarious means of edification as were afforded by the so-called "Assemblies of the Desert," — meetings in secluded spots remote from the towns, or in the bleak region of the Cevennes Mountains. Attendance on these gatherings was a grave offense; and the venturesome minister incurred, if apprehended, the punishment of being broken upon the wheel. So late as Feb. 19, 1762, a minister named Rochette was beheaded, by authority of the Parliament of Toulouse, for the sole crime of having preached, performed marriages, and administered the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. In 1767, for the same offence, another minister, Berenger, was condemned to death, and executed in effigy.

The episode of the war of the Camisards, which lasted from 1702-5, has been treated elsewhere. (See CAMISARD.)

The Edict of Toleration. This document still declared that "the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion alone shall continue to enjoy public worship." But it authorized the registry of Protestant births, marriages, and deaths, and forbade that the Protestants should in any way be disturbed because of their faith.

The National Assembly, in 1790, took steps for the restoration of the confiscated property of Protestant refugees. The law of the eighteenth Germinal Year (1802) organized the Reformed and Lutheran churches, whose pastors were henceforth paid by the State.

The Huguenot Refugees. The Huguenots, driven from France by persecution, were welcomed by all the countries to which they turned their steps. All the Protestant lands of Europe were glad to enrich their trade and manufactures by the accession of the most intelligent and industrious class of the French population. The very name “Huguenot,” having acquired an honorable association, became a passport to favor.

Switzerland, “destined by Providence to be a land of refuge,” had been the resort of persecuted Frenchmen from the beginning of the Reformation. The Huguenot fugitives increased greatly after the Massacre of St. Bartholomew’s Day, while the persecution culminating in the Revocation brought in so large a number, that the resources of the hospitable cantons were taxed to the utmost to provide for their sustenance. Many of the fugitives from the earlier persecutions returned to France when the storm had partially spent its fury; others, particularly after the Revocation, made Switzerland only the first stage in their retreat. These passed on, after a time, to Wurttemberg, Hesse, Brandenburg, and other parts of Germany, whose rulers saw in the Huguenot peasants and artisans the very persons whom they needed for the regions depopulated by the Thirty Years’ War.

In the very month in which Louis XIV. signed at Fontainebleau the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the elector, Frederick William of Brandenburg, signed at Potsdam an edict by which not only was warm sympathy expressed, but great inducements were held forth to all Huguenots that might desire to settle in his dominions. Provision was made both for the safety and for the expenses of the refugees in reaching their destination. Despite strenuous efforts on the part of the French Government to suppress or discredit it, copies of the Potsdam edict were circulated in every part of France, and crowds of Huguenot refugees found their way to Frankfurt-on-the-Main. Here they were met by agents of the elector, and were generously helped on their way. An important French colony sprang up in Berlin, which still maintains a distinctive existence. Many families of Huguenot origin have, however, become thoroughly German in character, even the names having been translated or modified to suit the German ear. It has been remarked, that, in the Franco-German war of 1870-71, many of the officers of the victorious army of invasion were descendants of those whom the intolerant policy of Louis XIV. compelled to expatriate themselves.

In Holland the Huguenot refugees were treated with great kindness. Not only was a public fast instituted when the tidings of the Revocation came, but valuable political concessions were made. The credit of the refugees was restored, the freedom of the city, and exemption from import duties for twelve years. Middleburg in Zealand relieved them of the burden of taxation for ten years. General collections were made for their relief, in which Lutherans, Anabaptists, and even Roman Catholics, took part. Eight hundred and fifty in number, were specially cared for. Military men secured positions in the army, with ample pay, and promise of promotion. But all the fugitives were not poor. Some brought to their adopted country large fortunes; for as early as the last months of 1566 it was reported that twenty million livres had been carried out of France by those who were regarded as among the wealthiest merchants of the land. Holland was greatly enriched intellectually, as well as in a material point of view. Bannage, Benoit, DuBois, and Martin were among the scholars she gained from France. The refugees settling on Dutch soil alone were estimated by Caveyreac at fifty-five thousand, and another Roman-Catholic source places them at seventy-five thousand, in the first year after the Revocation. In 1709, the same year that Queen Anne gave letters of naturalization to all the refugees in England, the States of Holland and West Friesland took the same step. Other provinces followed the example, and in 1715 the States-General extended the same blessing to all the republic.

Northern Europe opened its doors to the fugitives. Despite the strong Lutheran sentiments of Denmark, the king, on hearing of the cruel dragonnades, in 1681 published a declaration offering the French refugees an asylum, the right to build churches, exemption from taxation for eight years, etc. In 1855 a new edict conferred upon French noble refugees the same distinctions that they had enjoyed at home, to officers a corresponding rank, and great inducements to manufacturers. Several flourishing colonies were established at different points. Sweden was less hospitable; but in Russia a ukase, signed by Peter and Ivan (1688), opened to the refugees all the provinces of the empire, and gave to officers employment in the army. Voltaire maintains that one-third of the regiment of twelve thousand formed by the Genevese Lefort for Peter was composed of French refugees.

While all the countries mentioned received a great accession of wealth from the industries brought with them by the fugitive Huguenots, it was England that profited most by the ill-judged act of Louis XIV. From the time of the pious Edward VI., the monarchs of that country, with the single exception of Mary, had been their allies and protectors. The French Church of London owed its origin (1550) to the kind offices of the Duke of Somerset and Archbishop Cranmer. In 1601, under Queen Elizabeth, a French church was founded at Canterbury for the Walloons, meeting in the crypts of the cathedral, as it continues to do to the present day. In 1670 it had a membership of twenty-five hundred communicants. Soon after, the French refugees proper went off and formed a new church. Before the Revocation, there had also arisen French churches at Sandwich, Norwich, Southampton, Glastonbury, Rye, and six or seven other places; while the old French church at the capital had been re-enforced by the Savoy, Marybone, and Castle-street churches.

On the outbreak of the dragonnades, Charles II. issued (July 28, 1681) the proclamation of Hampton Court, welcoming the Huguenot refugees, issued letters of naturalization and privileges for carrying on trade and manufactures. After the Revocation, James II. extended to them a similar invitation. M. Weis estimates the number of Huguenots that fled to England, during the decade in which the Revocation fell, at eighty thousand persons, of whom about one-third settled in London. To the five earlier French churches of the metropolis there were added twenty-six new churches, almost all during the reigns of William and Mary, of Anne, and of George I. Eleven or twelve more sprang up in other parts of England. An order of council enjoined a general collection in favor of the refugees, from which a fund of about two hundred thousand pounds resulted. Nor were the services rendered by the Huguenots slight. In the army of William of Orange, when he marched against his father-in-law, there were three regiments of foot and a squadron of horse, composed exclusively of French Protestant refugees. To these troops, and to a strong element of French officers, —veterans of Condé and Turenne, seven hundred and thirty-six in number,—scattered through the rest of the army, the overthrow of the last Stuart king was in great part due. Schomberg, Ruvigny, and others distinguished themselves in the fresh warfare to which they were called, and both honored and benefited their adopted country. More important and lasting was the service done by the introduction of a number of new manufactures, until then but little known in England. For the first time, thanks to the Huguenots, the finer kinds of paper, of hats, and of glass, were made on British soil. Silks and satins were produced north of the Channel such as had previously come only from the looms of Lyons: in a word, the manufactures of England were built up at the expense of France. Even in an intellectual point of view, the influence of the refugees was great. We need only mention the names of Denis Papin, the first investigator of the principles of steam, and Rapin-Thoryas, whose History of England was without a rival until the appearance of the work of David Hume. Although, with the lapse of time, the refugees have become thoroughly merged in the population of the United Kingdom, there remain many historic traces of interest; such as the Hospital for Poor French Protestants and their Descendants residing in Great Britain, whose new and elegant building attracts the eye of the visitor.

The Huguenot in the United States. — The unfortunate attempt at colonization in Brazil has already been referred to. Equally fruitless was the undertaking, under the patronage of Admiral Coligny, to found a French Protestant settlement in Florida (1562). Greater success attended the subsequent emigration of the Huguenots, which, if it did not lead to the acquisition by France of an American empire, added much to the prosperity of the English colonial system. The Dutch in America were the first to profit by it. Long before the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the stream of Huguenot emigration set in toward New Netherland. The first band of settlers sent over (1623) by the Dutch West India Company consisted of thirty families, chiefly Walloons. The first churches that were erected were in the city of New Amsterdam (New York), where French was spoken, and the Huguenot faith was professed from the outset. Other Walloons and French settled at an early day on Long Island and Staten Island, and upon the banks of the Delaware, and in 1660 founded New Paltz on the Hudson. As the severities visited upon the Protestants in France increased, large numbers of refugees came to this country, establishing themselves in New York, in Boston, in Maryland, and Virginia, and in Charleston, S.C. Detachments from these bodies of immigrants settled in Oxford, Mass., Kingston, R.I., New Rochelle, N.Y., and on the Cooper and Sautee Rivers, South Carolina. In all these places churches were organized, and ministers of the French Reformed Church officiated. The French settlements in Oxford, Mass., and Kingston, R.I., were soon broken up: the others continued for several generations to maintain a distinct character. The French church in Boston lasted until the year 1748, having for its pastors Pierre Dailé (1689-1715) and André Le Mercier (1716-45). The French congregation in New York, long flourishing and influential, had a succession of Reformed pastors, the last of whom submitted to Episcopal ordination in 1806, when the church adopted the Episcopal rite, and took the name of "L'Eglise du Saint Esprit." In New Rochelle, N.Y., two churches were maintained almost until the outbreak of the American Revolution,—the French Reformed Church, founded in 1688, and a French Episcopal Church, organized in 1709. In the Dutch language language superseded the French in public worship about the year 1735. Three of the four Huguenot congregations of South Carolina went out of existence, or became merged with neighboring English-speaking churches: the French church in Charleston alone survives to the present day, and uses an excellent liturgy.

No precise statement can be ventured as to the numbers of Huguenots that came to America; but it is certain that they must have reached several thousands. The influence of this element in moulding the character of the American people has been considerable, and out of all proportion to the extent of the immigration; and the prominence of Huguenot names in the roll of patriots, statesmen, philanthropists, ministers of the gospel, men of note in every calling in the United States, is a noticeable and significant fact.

Sources. — Theodore de Bèze: Histoire ecclesi. des églises réformées de France, Antwerp, 1580 (a very correct re-impression, with notes, Toulouse, 1852, 2 vols.). It covers the period from 1517 to 1583. Jean de Serres: Commentarii de statu, et religiis et republicis in Gallia, Geneva, 1570-80, 5 vols., each containing 3 books. This very accurate history covers the years 1557-76. [Simon Goulard, or Jean de Serres]: Recueil des choses memorables avenus en France sous le règne de Henri II, François II, Charles IX., Henri III., et Henri IV. (Known also as Histoire des cing rois), Dort, 1598. Covers the years 1547-96. F. de la Place, Commentaires de l'estat de la rel. et repub., and Regnier de la Planché, Hist. de l'estat de France (both reprinted in Panthéon Littéraire). The former covers the years 1558-61; the latter, 1580-90. Theodore Aribert d'Aubigné: Histoire universelle, Maillé, 1818-20.

HULSE, John, Rev., b. at Middlewich, Chesh.-
and the humanists, though it could not be long concealed that their greatest philological achievements—the Complutianus polyglot, the printing of the Greek text of the New Testament, etc. — were seized upon by the adversaries of Rome, and used as weapons against her. But after the language followed the authors, and after the authors their ideas. Gradually the humanist grew from a philologist into a historian, and from an historian into a philosopher. He studied not only classical language and literature, but also classical life and spirit. He claimed to know what belongs to man by nature (his faculties and his failings) and what concerns man by nature (his rights and his duties). His criticism of words became criticism of facts; and Laurentius Valla laughed at the donation of Constantine. His knowledge of history became political demands, and he claimed to know what his rights and his duties were.

Not to overrate, however, the influence which the humanists have exercised on the history of the Church, it must be noticed, that though they furnished the Reformers with arms, and seemed personally very favorably disposed to the Reformation, only few of them actually took part in the work. Erasmus retreated before the task; and, even with Melancthon in full sight, it is safe to say that the humanists would never have made the Reformation.

LIT.—Recent books upon humanism are: Gershuny: Die Wiederbelebung des klassischen Alterthums, oder das erste Jahrhundert des Humanismus, Berlin, 1859, 2d ed., 1880, 1881, 2 vols.; Krafft u. Reuchlin: Beiträge zur Geschichte des Humanismus, Elberfeld, 1870-75; A. Horawitz: Analekten zur Geschichte des Humanismus in Schwenen, Wien, 1878. See Literature under Erasmus, Hutten, Renaissance, and Reuchlin. Clemen Petersen: Humanitarians, a name applied both to that school of Unitarians, or those anti-Trinitarians in general, who consider Christ a mere man (homo), and to such parties as profess the "religion of humanity," whose fundamental dogma is the spontaneous perfectibility of the human race without any superhuman aid. Hume, David, b. at Edinburgh, April 26, 1711; d. there Aug. 26, 1776. He was the son of a member of the Faculty of Advocates, who passed his life as a country gentleman at the family-seat of Ninewells in the border country of Scotland. He entered Edinburgh University before he was two years of age, and was made a member of the University beyond the powers of one so young. He tells us, "I was seized very early with a passion for literature, which has been the ruling passion of my life." We have admirable accounts of his life; the one, My Own Life, calm as philosophy itself; the other by Mr. Hill Burton, who had access to the papers collected by Baron Hume, and deposited with the Royal Society of Edinburgh. The latter has published a remarkable letter written to an eminent physician by the young man at the very crisis of his being. It appears, that, for a time, he labored to find security and peace in philosophy. "Having read many books of morality, such as Cicero, Seneca, and Plutarch, and being smitten with their beautiful representations of virtue and philosophy, I undertook the improvement of my temper and will, along with my reason and understanding. I was continually fortifying myself with reflections against death and its inevitable concomitants."

Hume, the skeptic or atheist, had the word been coined in his day, he would have been called an agnostic. He does not avow so much as deny any thing; he simply shows that we have no proof of its existence. It will be necessary to give a compend of his whole philosophy, as his pessimism can be met only by the humanists would never have made the Reformation.
tions exerted by the present discourse, excepting only the immediate pleasure or uneasiness they may occasion." In assuming these impressions, he does not assume a perceiving mind, or a thing perceived in toto, but met as Reid met him at this early stage. "I never observed myself at any time without a perception, and never can observe anything but the perception." This very language implies more. He speaks of "mind" and "soul," and of the perceptions "striking on the mind," and of catching himself. What is this self which he catches? We never do observe a perception alone; we always observe it as perceiving. We should maintain that we are cognizant of a self perceiving and a thing perceived. He next treats of memory, in which the impressions come forth in their original order and position, and are now ideas. But in memory we have more than a mere reproduction of a sensation: we recognize it as having been before us in time past, and have thus a knowledge of ourselves in the past and the present, and an idea of time as a reality. He has a subtle discussion as to our ideas of space and time, and of points, lines, and surfaces, and argues that we have no objective reality. There follows a criticism of existence and knowledge; and he maintains that it is "impossible for us so much as to conceive or form an idea of any thing specifically different from ideas or impressions." He reaches the conclusion that we know nothing but phenomena or appearances, a conclusion unfortunately allowed by Kant. He is to be met by showing that we know not mere appearances, but things appearing.

He has an admirable sevenfold classification of relations, which he says may be divided into two classes,—into such as depend entirely on the ideas which we compare, and such as may be changed without any change in the ideas. In the first he places resemblance, contrariety, degree, quantity, which can never go beyond our impressions. The other three, identity, space and time, cause and effect, may seem to carry us farther; but this is an illusion. In identity, and in time and space, we can never go beyond what is immediately present to the senses, and so can never discover the real existence of the relation of objects; and so "tis only causation which produces such a connection as to give us assurance from the existence or action of one object that was followed or preceded by any other existence or action." He devotes the whole energy of his mind to showing that we know nothing of the relation of cause and effect; that we know their conjunction and not their connection. The relation is merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence within our experience, and might have no place in other worlds, or in regard to world-making, of which we have no experience. In this way he undermine the proof of the existence of God. He is to be met by showing that, looking at the nature of things, we are led to believe that every effect must have a cause, and that the object acting as the cause to produce the effect.

In these discussions he started the questions which have ever since been agitated as to belief, which he says "joins no new ideas to those which compose the idea of the object;" and argues that the difference between belief and incredulity consists in the liveness of belief which constitutes its essence. But surely we have at times imaginations as lively as our beliefs; and in all cases of belief we have a conviction, whether right or wrong, to be determined by evidence of the existence of an object. He uses this theory to account for our belief in the existence of God and matter. "What we call mind is nothing but a heap or collection of different impressions, united together by certain relations, and supposed, though falsely, to be endowed with a perfect simplicity and identity. Again: as to matter we can never, on the mere ground of a conjunction which we have witnessed, argue from our perceptions to the existence of external continued objects." He thus undermines the usual arguments for the immateriality and immortality of the soul. "Identity is merely a quality which we ascribe to perceptions, because of ideas in the imagination; and the identity which we ascribe to the mind is merely a fictitious one." He is to be answered by showing that I know myself to be the same person to-day that I was at any other time remembered by me.

In his Essays on Miracles he assails supernatural revelation,—not its possibility, but the evidence of it. He shows that there has been an invariable experience in favor of the uniformity of nature; and that a miracle, being "a violation of the laws of nature," cannot be established by as strong proof as that which can be advanced against it. He exerts his ingenuity in disparaging the evidence usually advanced in favor of miraculous occurrences, by showing how apt mankind are to be swayed on these subjects by fear, wonder, fancy, and the like. I allow, that, in the present advanced state of science, there is ample proof that there is a uniformity in nature; but let us place alongside of this the counterpart fact, that there is sufficient evidence of there being a supernatural system. Let the cumulative proofs, external and internal, in behalf of Christianity, be added,—those derived from testimony and from prophecy; those drawn from the adaptation of the revelation to our nature, from the character of Jesus and from the unity of the doctrine and morality,—and we shall find in their consistency and congruity evidence of equal value to that which establishes the existence of system in nature.

People commonly shrink from Hume's negations on the subject of natural religion; but he has had a large following in his utilitarian theory of morals. He holds that the mind has an original instinct, which tends to unite itself with the good and the evil. He maintains that virtue consists in the agreeable and the useful: "Vice and virtue may be compared to sound, color, heat, which, according to modern philosophy, are not qualities of objects, but perceptions of the mind." Virtue is distinguished by the pleasure, and vice by the pain, that any action, sentiment, or character gives us by the mere view and contemplation. He is to be opposed by showing, first, that the moral power in man is not instinct, that it is a cognitive power, and it perceives and knows the distinction between good and evil; and, secondly, that the good, say piety, or justice, or benevolence, is perceived to be good in itself. It is to be shown specially that the conscience claims supremacy over all our voluntary states, and that the good implies obligation to perform it.
HUME'S Treatise of Human Nature contains the substance of all his philosophy. The publication of it (1738–39) constitutes an era in the history of philosophy. He tore down the old and venerable edifice, and henceforth men have had to build anew, and from the foundation. His earliest opponents were Thomas Reid (1783–84) and Immanuel Kant (1781). As his principles undermined all religion, natural and revealed, theologians have to examine them.

There is an edition of Hume's Philosophical Works, in 4 vols., Edinburgh, 1828 (A. Black), and an edition of his Treatise of Human Nature, by T. H. Green and T. H. Grose, with Dissertations and Notes on the principles of Hegel, London, 1878. I may be permitted to add that I have an article on Hume in my Social Philosophy.

JAMES MCCOSH.

HUMERALE. See VESTMENTS.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST. See CHRISTOLOGY.

HUMILITY, a virtue opposed to pride and self-conceit, by reason of which a man thinks of himself no more highly than he ought to think (Rom. xii. 3), and places himself in subjection to him whom he owes subjection. This person is primarily God; so that humility is, first of all, the sense of absolute dependence upon him. In the strict sense of the term, humility is proper only in man's relations to God, and modesty in man's relations to man (De Wette). It is not merely the sense of God's infinitude over against human limitation, but of God's holiness over against man's moral deficiency and guilt. Sophocles came nearest to the true conception of humility in classical antiquity. It runs like a thread through all the piety of the Old Testament (Gen. xvi. 8) down to John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 2), and made it a condition of entrance into the kingdom of heaven (Matt. v. 3, xviii. 2). It must actuate the Christian at all times, and remind him to work out his salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. ii. 12). Love, which is the pulse-beat of the Christian life, is influenced by it, and held back from the errors of mysticism and quietism, and converts it into a being reverence for God, trust in and obedience to him, even in sufferings (1 Pet. v. 6). A sham humility betrays itself in its behavior to mankind (Luke xvii. 13 sqq.). It is free from all vain self-conceit, but at the same time is conscious of man's dignity in the sight of God, and may be said to ascend upwards on the six steps of patience, meekness, kindness, friendliness, peaceableness, and placability (Arnold),—virtues which the apostles so urgently insist upon. See the various works on Christian ethics.

E. SCHWARZ.

HUMPHREY, Heman, D.D., b. in West Simsbury, Conn., March 26, 1779; d. at Pittsfield in 1859. He graduated at Yale College in 1805; was a Congregational pastor at Fairfield, Conn., at Pittsfield, Mass.; then president of Amherst College for twenty-three years (1823–45). He was one of the best and weightiest men of his day, and exerted a wide influence in shaping its religious movements, especially in the Congregational and Presbyterian churches. He contributed largely to the religious press, wrote able pamphlets against intemperance and slavery, and was the author of a number of books, among them a Tour in France, Great Britain, and Belgium, in two volumes. (See TYLER's History of Amherst College.) Zephaniah Moore, D.D., son of the preceding; b. here, and were relieved by d. in Cincinnati, Nov. 18, 1881; graduated at Amherst College and at Andover Theological Seminary; pastor of churches at Racine and Milwaukee, Wis., 1850–58, of First Presbyterian Church, Chicago, 1853–68, of Calvary Church, Philadelphia, 1868–75; professor of ecclesiastical history and church polity in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, 1876–81; and moderator of the General Assembly at Chicago in 1871. He was a gifted preacher, and a faithful servant of Christ.

G. L. PRENTISS.

HUNDESHAQEN, Karl Bernhard, b. in Friedewald, Hesse, Jan. 10, 1810; d. in Bonn, June 2, 1873; was one of the most prominent and original theologians which the Reformed Church of Germany has given in this century to the service of the Evangelical Church. His peculiar importance consisted in this, that in his own way he showed how certain features of the Reformed Church might be advantageously applied to the living Christianity of the day. He emphasized the ethical principle in Protestantism over against a mere dogmatic or critical intellectualism, and laid stress upon the social element in the Church, which was languishing because of its amalgamation with the State. He entered the University of Giessen at fifteen, and passed from there to Halle, where he became a favorite pupil of Ullmann. In 1830 he went back to Giessen as rector, and in 1834 accepted a call to a professorship in the newly founded university of Bonn. In 1846 his anonymous work, D. deutsche Protestantismus, s. Vergangenheit u. s. heuti en Lebensfragen, etc., appeared, and fell like a flash of lightning in that troubled period. Two more editions were called for in 1847 and 1850. With an intense earnestness of thought, he was inspired by flashes of humor, the author showed the intimate connection of the religious and national condition of Germany, and held up the central act of the Reformation as an act, not of science, but of conscience, and as calling for imitation. From this he passed over to the ecclesiastical questions of the day. This work made Hunde-shagen's reputation, and he was at once called to the chair of New-Testament exegesis and church history at Heidelberg, where he continued to labor for twenty years (1847–67). In 1864 he published his great contribution to the literature of the relations of the State to the Church,—Beiträge zur Kirchenverfassung u. Kirchenpolitik, insbesondere d. Protestantismus. But the last years of his stay in Heidelberg were interrupted by the relations of the Church to the government of Baden, which were entirely at discord with his own views, and by the isolated position of the faculty in which Umbreit’s death left him. He gladly accepted a call to Bonn in 1867, where he spent his last years in peaceful and friendly relations with his colleagues, although a great sufferer in body. He rejoiced in the restoration of the German Empire in 1870, and greeted the hour of his departure with Christian fortitude and joyfulness. A collection of his shorter writings was edited in 2 vols. by Dr. Christlieb, Gotha, 1874. See Christlieb: K. B. Hundseugen, Eine Lebensskizze, Gotha, 1873.
HUNGARY. 1041

WILLIBALD BEYSECHLAG.

HUNGARY, The Kingdom of, consists of Hungary Proper, the principality of Transylvania, the provinces of Croatia, Slavonia, and the Military Frontier, and comprises an area of 124,234 square miles. 15,500,625 inhabitants, of whom 7,558,538 are Roman Catholics; 1,583,153, Armenian Catholics; 2,589,819 belong to the Greek Church; 1,113,508 are Lutherans; 2,031,243, Calvinists; 54,822, Unitarians; 553,641, Jews, etc.

When the Magyars first crossed the Carpathian range, and settled in the plains of the Danube and the Theiss, they were still heathens. They believed in a single god, who had created heaven and earth, and whom they worshipped in groves under the open sky. They had no idols, no temples, no priests. Sacrifices, especially of horses, were presented at certain occasions. The oath was sacred to them, and marriage was accomplished with religious ceremonies. A century later (972) they became acquainted with Christianity, when their duke, Geyza, married a Christian princess, Sarolta, a daughter of the Hungarian prince Géza, afterwards known as St. Stephen. Stephen, afterwards known as St. Stephen of Hungary, changed the constitution from a tribal union to a kingdom, and accomplished the christianization of the people, travelling from one end of the country to the other, preaching, baptizing, building churches and monasteries, founding schools, organizing governments, and establishing authorities. From Pope Sylvester II. he received a golden crown and the title of apostolic king; and in 1000 he was solemnly crowned by the Archbishop of Gran. At a diet held shortly after, he made a pact by the following article: "When the state of the people, gave the bishops rich donations, introduced the tithe, enforced the celebration of Sunday, the Friday fast, etc. In no other country the Roman Church attained such a power and such a wealth as in Hungary. A curious testimony of her influence is found in the circumstance that the Latin language became the official language, not only of the church, the university, and the school, but also of the government, the administration, and the court, and continued so till the beginning of the present century.

When the Reformation arose in Germany, and became known in Hungary through the writings of the Reformers, the Hungarian Church seemed to be singularly well prepared for the encounter. A diet of 1523 decreed that Protestantism should be stamped out; that all Lutherans, and even their abettors, should be seized and burnt, etc. But Aug. 29, 1526, the battle of Mohacz was fought. The King, Louis II., fell, the last scion of the native dynasty, and around him most of the chiefs of the great families. The Turks occupied one part of the country; and two pretenders, Zapolya, and Ferdinand of Austria, fought about the other. Under such circumstances the religious affairs were for some time entirely lost sight of; and the Reformation was allowed to spread, as it caused no disturbance. It quietly took possession of the ground, priest and congregation compromising with each other; and when, in 1540, Leonhard von Stoeckel drew up the new confession, King Ferdinand accepted it, and confirmed it. The first forebodings of coming troubles appeared within the Protestant camp itself. The Lutherans and Calvinists hated each other worse than they hated the Romanists; and when Rudolph I. ascended the throne in 1577, and the Jesuits were recalled, and formally installed at Thurcza, intrigues, violence, and soon actual persecution, began. The Protestants rose in revolt, led by Prince Bocskaj of Transylvania, and compelled the king to the so-called "peace of Vienna" (1566), which granted freedom of conscience, and liberty of worship. The articles of this treaty were incorporated with the laws of the land by the Diet of Pressburg (1808), in spite of the protest of the Roman-Catholic bishops; and, when Rudolph made an attempt at cancelling the whole treaty, he was deposed, and his brother Matthias raised on the throne. Peter Patai, however, who, though born of Protestant parents, entered the order of the Jesuits, and finally became Archbishop of Gran, the Roman-Catholic Church found the right tool to work with. More than fifty noble families he succeeded in bringing back to the Roman faith; and with the magnates followed their whole retinues. Thus re-enforced, and strongly supported by the court, the Roman Church began a warfare of open attack. The Protestants were deprived of their church-buildings, prevented from making complaints at the diets, compelled to pay for the support of the Roman clergy, forced to participate in processions in honor of the Virgin and the saints, accused of the most horrible crimes,—conspiracy with the Turks, seditions against the king, etc. Twice they rose in open rebellion, under the lead of the Rákócziys, father and son; and both times they were successful. By the peace of Lins (1645), and by that of Szatmár (1711), the rights which they had obtained by the peace of Vienna were recognized and confirmed. But the treaties were made only to be broken; and the state of the evangelical churches in Hungary was very precarious, when the Edict of Toleration of Joseph II.
(Oct. 29, 1781) at once effected a radical change. The Protestants were in all essential points placed on an equal footing with the Roman Catholics; and in this arrangement the legislation of Joseph’s successor, Leopold, especially the law of 1791, made no material alterations.

At present the Roman-Catholic Church has seventeen bishops in Hungary, and four archbishops.—Zagrab (Agram), Eger (Erlau), Kalocsa, and Esztergom (Gran), of whom the last is the primate of the whole Church, and bears the title of prince. The Greek Catholic Church (Greek in confession and rite, but under Roman jurisdiction) has six bishops; the Armenian Catholic Church two. The Greek Church has a metropolitan at Carlowitz with five suffragan bishops, and an archbishop at Nagyzezen (Hermannstadt) with two. In the evangelical churches each congregation elects its own eldership, which appoints the pastor, and governs all the affairs of the congregation. Several congregations form a seniorate; several seniorates, a superintendency. There are five Lutheran and five Calvinist superintendencies. Of the forty-five theological institutions, which in 1878 labored with 284 professors and 1,534 students, twenty-five belonged to the Roman-Catholic Church, four to the Greek Catholic, three to the Greek Church, seven to the Lutheran, and five to the Calvinist.

See Geschichte d. evang. Kirche in Ungarn, Berlin, 1854.

HUNNIUS, Agidius, b. at Winnenden, Württemberg, Dec. 21, 1590; d. at Wittenberg, April 4, 1609; studied at Tubingen, and was appointed professor of theology at Marburg 1576, and at Wittenberg 1592. He was a stanch champion of Lutheran orthodoxy. During his stay in Marburg he opposed, in preaching and writing, the reigning Calvinistic tendency, and succeeded in forming a party which finally effected an ecclesiastical split between Upper and Lower Hesse. In Wittenberg he was a member of the Committee on Visitation, and contributed much to suppress all Philistian traditions. A collected edition of his Latin works, among which are De persona Christi, Calvinismi Judicium, etc., appeared at Wittenberg, 1607-09, in 8 vols. fol.

HUNNIUS, Nicolas, b. at Marburg, July 11, 1565; d. at Lübeck, April 12, 1643; studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed superintendent of Illenburg 1612, professor of theology at Wittenberg 1617, and pastor of the Hunting of St. Mary in Lübeck 1622. He followed the same theological direction as his father, inherited his temper and talent as a polemist, and was, like him, possessed of great learning. He wrote against the Roman Church, Demonstratio Ministerii Lutherani a Corinthiis Dei paratum, etc., 1617; against the Photinians, Examini errorum Photinianorum, 1620; and, against the enthusiasts of his time, Christliche Betrachtung, 1622; Ausführlicher Bericht von der neuen Propheten, 1634; etc. In Lübeck he revived the Ministerium tripartitum, an association between the clergy of Lübeck, Hamburg, and Lüneburg; and by his Consultatio (1632) he gave the idea of a Collegium irenicum, or Collegium Hunniunum, which was intended to form a kind of supreme court for all theological controversies. His biography was written by Heller, Lübeck, 1843.

HUNTING AMONG THE HEBREWS. In the Bible we find hunting connected with royalty as early as in the days of Nimrod, who “was a mighty hunter before the Lord” (Gen. x. 9). The patriarchs were rather herdsmen than hunters: only Ishmael was an archer (Gen. xxi. 20), and Esau a cunning hunter (Gen. xxv. 27). That beasts of the chase were plentiful in the land of promise we see from Exod. xxiii. 29. From the provision made in Lev. xvii. 13, it is manifest that hunting was practised after the settlement in Canaan, and was pursued with the view of obtaining food (Deut. xii. 22). That birds were also shot we may infer from 1 Sam. xxvii. 20; but the law provided for their protection (Deut. xxii. 6 sq.). Quiver and bow (Gen. xxvii. 3) were generally used as hunting utensils. Various missiles, pitfalls, snares, and gins were made use of in hunting (2 Sam. xxix. 20; Ps. xc. 3; Amos iii. 5). That hunting continued to be followed till towards the end of the Jewish commonwealth, we see from Josephus, War, I. 21, 13.

LETTER.

HUNTINGDON, Selina, Countess of, a distinguished supporter of evangelical piety and the Methodist movement; b. Aug. 24, 1707, at Stanton Harold in Leicestershire; d. June 17, 1761, at Washington Shirley, Earl of Ferrers, and in 1728 married the Earl of Huntingdon. Under the influence of the earl’s sisters and a severe illness, she became deeply interested in religion, and with her husband attended the meetings of the Methodist Society in Petterlane, London, from its organization, in 1738. She lost all her children, and in 1746 the earl died. From this time on, Lady Huntingdon devoted herself uninteruptedly to the advancement of religion. Among her friends in the ministry were Doddridge, John Wesley, and Fletcher; and Whitefield and Rome in acted as her chaplains. Her house in Park Street, London, she opened for preaching-services, to which her social connections, and the estimation in which she was held, drew many persons of high rank, among whom were Bolingbroke and Chesterfield. She built numerous chapels,—the expenses of the first, at Brighton (1761), being met by the sale of her jewels, amounting to seven hundred pounds,—and in 1768 founded the theological seminary of Trevecca in Southern Wales, which, after her death, was removed to Chestnut Herts. When the breach occurred between Wesley and Whitefield, the latter, and at his death (1777) became sole trustee of his institutions in Georgia. But she did not leave the Church of England till 1779. and then she was forced to it in order to avoid the injunction against her chaplains’ preaching in the Diocese of Salisbury. According to Whitaker’s Almanac for 1882, the “connexion” not only has thirty-four chapels. See Life and Times of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon, London, 1840, 2 vols.; A. H. New: The Coronet and the Cross, or Memorials of Selina Countess of Huntingdon, London, 1867.

HUPFELD, Hermann (Christian Karl Friedrich),

1042 HUPFELD.
a scholar of the first rank among the exegetes of the Old Testament, and son of an evangelical pastor; b. March 31, 1796, at Marburg; d. April 24, 1866, at Ilalle. He studied theology at Marburg, and, soon after completing his course, became assistant to one of the pastors in that city. After a brief service in this capacity, he was appointed teacher in the gymnasium at Hanau, where he remained three years. Returning to his home with the intention of devoting his life to the ministry, his feelings suddenly underwent a change, and determined him in favor of an academic career. In 1824 he placed himself under Gesenius at Halle, habilitated in philosophy, and began lecturing on Hebrew. In 1825 he was appointed professor of theology in Marburg, and published his Exercitationes Ethipicae (Leipzig), which placed him at the side of the ablest investigators of the day. In 1843 he became Gesenius’ successor at Halle. As a teacher, Hupfeld’s manner was not attractive; but he interested his hearers deeply by clearness of presentation, thoroughness of treatment, and his love of truth. In 1865 he was accused by certain theologians, before the minister of worship, of disparaging the divine element in the Old Testament. But he easily disproved the charge; and all his colleagues, Julius Müller and Tholuck included, rose up in his defense. He did not belong to the strict evangelical school (Vermittlungs-theologie): but he was the friend of a living biblical Christianity, the foe of all impiety, and a strict lover of truth and justice. Tholuck pronounced his funeral oration.

Hupfeld once said of himself, that his literary activity had diffused itself over too wide a range, and lacked a well-defined plan. His writings are very valuable, but appeared, for the most part, in periodicals and religious journals. His greatest work was the translation and Commentary on the Psalms, Gotha, 1855-61, 4 vols.; 2d ed. by Riehm, 1867-71. The translation is prosaic, but in textual criticism it is unsurpassed among the works on that portion of Scripture. Die Quellen d. Genesis u. d. Art Ihrer Zusammensetzung, von neuem untersucht (Berlin, 1853) has also a permanent value, [and analyzes Genesis into an original Elohistic document amended by a young or Elohist and a young or Jehovistic editor]. Hupfeld began in 1828 the publication of an Ausführliche Hebr. Grammatik, which he never completed. His contributions to periodicals were frequent and valuable; nor did he confine himself to theology, but took also a deep interest in the political agitations of his day, which often exercised his pen. This pious scholar could well say of himself, "To be true, that has always been my endeavor; and to remain an honorable man in the face of the grimaces of this world, that has seemed to me to be the highest praise. For further particulars of Hupfeld’s life, and an admirable criticism of his professorial and literary activity, see the justly appreciative biography by Riehm, Halle, 1867. KAMPHAUSEN.

HURD, Richard, Bishop of Worcester; b. of humble parents at Congreve, Staffordshire, Jan. 13, 1720; d. May 28, 1786; in 1739 graduated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; was ordained fellow 1742. He became rector of Thurstaston 1757, preacher of Lincoln’s Inn 1768, archdeacon of Gloucester 1767, and bishop of Lichfield and Coventry 1774, from which he was translated in 1781 to the see of Worcester. In 1783 he offered the see of Canterbury, which he declined on the ground of its being a “charge not suited to his temper and talents, and much too heavy for him to sustain, especially at this time.” Bishop Hurd was a man of much polish and elegance of manner, and was pronounced by George III. “the most naturally polite man he had ever known.”

He kept up a sumptuous retinue, but with these tastes combined literary ambitions. Among his other works are a Commentary on Horace’s Ars Poetica, 1749, 4th ed., 1783; a volume of Moral and Political Dialogues (sincerity, retirement, etc.), 1759; 3 vols. of Sermons, 1776-80. He edited the Works of Warburton, 7 vols., 1788. His most ambitious theological work was Introduction to the Study of the Prophecies, 1772 (1778, 2 vols.). His collected Works with an Autobiography appeared in 8 vols., 1811. See Kilvert: Life and Writings of Bishop Hurd, London, 1860.

HURTER, Friedrich Emanuel von, b. at Schaffhausen, Switzerland, of Protestant parents, March 19, 1787; d. at Graz, Aug. 27, 1865. He studied theology in Göttingen; in 1824 was chief pastor in Schaffhausen, and in 1835 dean of the synod, but was converted to Roman Catholicism through his historical studies, and in 1844 entered that church. He was called to Vienna in 1845 as imperial counselor and historiographer, and in 1851 ennobled under the title Von Amann. Besides controversial writings, he was the author of the famous Geschicthe d. Papstes Innocenz III. u. seiner Zeitgenossen, Hamburg, 1834-42, 4 vols., and an account of his conversion, which is said to be one of the best books of its class: Geburt u. Wiedergebur, Erinnerung aus meinem Leben u. Blücke auf die Kirche, Schaffhausen, 1845, 4 vols., 4th ed., 1867, 2 vols. His life was written by one of his sons, Graz, 1870, 2 vols. Two of his sons have taken prominent places in the Roman Church.

HUS, John, Bohemian reformer and martyr; b. in 1369 [according to Gillett, July 6, 1373], at Hussinetz, Bohemia, not far from the Bavarian line; d. at the stake, in Constance, Germany, July 6, 1415. Hus is an abbreviation of Hussinetz, and was used by him from 1396. His parents were Czechs, in comfortable circumstances. John studied at Prague, taking the degree of Bachelor of Theology in 1394, and Master of Arts in 1396. In 1398 he delivered his first lectures, in 1401 was made dean of the philosophical faculty, and in 1403 rector of the university. He was a constant student of Wiclif’s works; and it is altogether likely, that in following the rule that a bachelor might only lecture upon the treatises of a Prague, Parisian, or Oxford master, Hus took up Wiclif. It is, at any rate, a noticeable coincidence that a manuscript containing five of Wiclif’s philosophical writings, preserved at Stockholm, was written by Hus in 1398.

In 1402 Hus was made pastor of the Bethlehem Church, which was founded (1391) to afford preaching for the Czechs. This position brought him into close contact with the common people, and stimulated him to a closer study of Scripture, as well as to the study of Wiclif’s writings. In the period from 1402 to 1410 Hus hoped to effect a religious reformation, with the aid of his ecclesiastical superiors. A disputation of the year 1403 led the authorities to forbid the prounciation of forty-five theses of Wiclif at the university; but, five years later, the interdiction was confirmed only to the extent that no one should give to them an heretical construction.
Hus had the full confidence of the archbishop,
Lucas Slivnoky, and was appointed synodical preacher by him. At the opening of the provincial synod, he repeatedly took occasion to lay bare the errors, and denounce the sins, of the clergy.
With two others, he was appointed by the archbishop to investigate the alleged miracles performed by the blood of Christ in the church at Wilsnack. They were pronounced a deception, and formed the occasion of Hus's pamphlet, All the Blood of Christ is Glorified. He here bids Christians seek, not should've to them an heretical construction.
the mulgation of forty-five theses of Wiclif at the university, openly defended Wiclif's writings at the univer-ity; but, five years later, the interdiction was confirmed only to the extent that no one should give to them an heretical construction.

In 1409 the University of Prague lost all its foreign students in consequence of a royal decree giving the Bohemian students three votes, the others only one. Leipzig University was founded; but in Prague an intense national spirit henceforth prevailed, which demanded ecclesiastical reforms.
Hus was made rector, and was very popular, not only among the students, but at court. This freedom of inquiry excited the apprehension of the archbishop, who accused Hus to the Pope, appr"ising him, at the same time, of the wide prevalence 22, 1409, prohibited the use of the English Reformer's writings, and forbade preaching at places where the practice was not an ancient one. When the bull was announced March 9, 1410, it aroused much opposition; but the archbishop executed it, burning on July 16 two hundred volumes of Wic-lif, in spite of the adverse decision of the university. But Hus continued to preach, and the opposition increased. Verses lampooning the archbishop were sung on the streets, and even the lives of the priests menaced. Hus and his friends were pronounced a deception, and formed the occasion of Hus's pamphlet, All the Blood of Christ is Glorified. He here bids Christians seek, not should've to them an heretical construction.

Hus continued to preach, and the opposition increased. Verses lampooning the archbishop were sung on the streets, and even the lives of the priests menaced. Hus and his friends were pronounced a deception, and formed the occasion of Hus's pamphlet, All the Blood of Christ is Glorified. He here bids Christians seek, not should've to them an heretical construction.

In 1410 the king's request he left the city (December, 1412), but not until he had written a work (the Appellatio), in which he appeals from the Roman curia to Christ the righteous Judge. He passed his exile at Kozihrad and Krakowetz, near Prague, preaching to large congregations of people, and writing his principal work, De Ecclesia, which only reproduced Wiclif's De Ecclesia.

The religious agitation of Bohemia had become matter of European notoriety, and King Sigismund (of Hungary) decided that the case ought to be brought before the General Council about be assembled at Constance. Hus cheerfully agreed to appear: three of the Bohemian nobility attained the advantage of attending, and two personal friends attended him, starting on their journey Oct. 11, 1414. The party was well received on the way, and arrived Nov. 3 at Constance. Four weeks afterwards the cardinals trumped up a charge of attempts to flight, and placed him in confinement in a Dominican convent. A commission of three bishops made the preliminary investigation; the accused being denied a hearing. The articles of accusation were concerned principally with Hus's errors about the Church. Only later was the distribution of both the elements at communion added.

The flight of John XXIII. rendered the work of his commission invalid; and the council appointed another, of four members, including d'Ailly. They were to sit in judgment upon Wiclif's doctrines, as well as upon those of the Bohemian reformer, for both were set in the same key. On May 4, 1415, the council adopted their report so far as it concerned Wiclif, damning his person, his writeings, and his doctrines.

On the 5th of June, Hus had his first public hearing in the Franciscan convent. The heretical articles extracted from his writings were read;
but his attempt to vindicate them was interrupted by tumultuous cries. The second public hearing occurred on June 7. Sigismund himself was present. The question was his relation to Wiclif and his book on the Church. He boldly affirmed his esteem for the English Reformer as a pious man, but denied that he had adopted his views against transubstantiation. At the third session (June 5) he defended some of the articles drawn from his work on the Church.

The condemnation of Hus to the stake was a foregone conclusion. He himself knew it. His letters bear the stamp of approaching death. During the four weeks that followed, efforts were made to induce him to retract, but in vain. On Saturday, July 2, the council was pronounced in the cathedral, condemning him as a heretic, and condemning his books to be burned. Hus fell on his knees, and, lifting up his hands, appealed to Heaven, and prayed for his enemies. Thereupon followed his degradation from the priestly office, and all cried out together, "Thy soul we deliver up to the Devil." Hus answered, "And I commend it to the holy Lord Jesus." Then a paper cap a yard high was placed on his head, with the writing, "heretical." He was then led forth to the judgment-square, his neck bound by a chain to a stake. As the flames rose around him, he refused again to recant, and died singing, "Christ, thou Son of the living God, have mercy upon me." His ashes were thrown into the Rhine.

Valid ground for the sentence of condemnation, even according to the canons of that day, there was none. Hus denied holding to Wiclif's views against transubstantiation, and his views upon conscience and Scripture, and not upon ecclesiastical authority. Judged by the canons of law then prevailing, Hus's death was a judicial murder.

Hus regarded the Scriptures as an infallible authority and the supreme standard of conduct. The other main subject of his teaching was the nature of the true Church, which, with Wiclif, he defined to be the body of the elect. Church-membership or ecclesiastical dignities were no infallible sign of election. Hus approved the doctrines of Hus. On the 5th they formed a league for mutual aid in religious concerns, binding themselves to protect the free preaching of God's Word on their estates, and to recognize the edicts of prelates only so far as they accorded with the Scriptures.

The ecclesiastical party entered into a counter league; and the Council of Constance cited the nobles to appear before it, and even threatened (Feb. 24, 1410) Bohemia with a crusade. But the Hussites could not be so easily intimidated. Pope Martin V. inaugurated more energetic measures, and, after dissolving the council (April 22, 1418), determined to destroy the Bohemian heresy root and branch. Wenceslaus was persuaded in 1419 to move against it, and the Hussites at court were obliged to leave. On Aug. 16 the king died, but civil war had already begun.

What was the character of this Bohemian movement? First of all we are struck with the intense vehemence for Hus. His followers, however, disavowed the name "Hussites," and wanted to be known as Catholic Christians. They were unanimous in regarding the Scriptures as the supreme authority in doctrine and life, but they split into two parties in the application of this principle. The radical wing, accepting only that which was expressly commanded in Scripture, rejected the doctrines of purgatory, the worship of saints, the use of a foreign tongue in public services, etc.

The moderate wing accepted all ecclesiastical customs the Scriptures did not expressly forbid. They put forth the famous Four Prague Articles in Latin, Czech, and German, in July, 1420. These called for (1) the free preaching of God's Word, (2) the distribution of the sacrament under two kinds, (3) the deprivation of the clergy of secular power and possessions which they used to the injury of their office and the state, and (4) the repression of mortal sins and public scandals. The moderate party was called the Praguers, and, later, Calixtines (from calix, "cup"), or Utraquists.

They had at their head Baron Czenko of Wartenberg. The radicals acknowledged Nicholas of Psten and John Zizka as leaders, and were called Taborites, from the fortress of Tabor, sixty miles south of Prague, which they occupied.

From 1420 to 1425, Catholic Germany marched in crusades against the Hussites; but the latter were victorious, and, from 1427 onwards, took the offensive against their enemies under the generalship of Procopius the Great. Cardinal Julian Cerini, after the ignominious defeat of the last crusade, which he led Aug. 14, 1431, concluded, as president of the Basel Council, that the only way to put down the heresy was by conciliatory treatment.

In October the council invited the Bohemians to appear before it. But the delegates had conceded their main conditions at Eger. This was the first instance in the whole history of the Church for a council to treat upon an equal footing with a party demanding reforms. On Nov. 30, 1435, articles were agreed upon fully granting the administration of the communion in both kinds, and conceding the other points of the Prague Articles, but in a somewhat illusory manner.

The moderate party was satisfied, the Taborites not. Civil war broke out afresh; and the army of the latter was crushed at the decisive battle of Muhlberg, Nov. 30, 1434. The Taborites gradually disappeared, or were lost, a generation or two later, in the Bohemian Brethren.

The articles of the Basel Council were confirmed by the National Bohemian Assembly at Iglau, July 3, 1436. But Pope Pius II., on March 31, 1462, declared them void, threatening with excommunication all who administered the cup to the laity. The Utraquist party was not intimidated. In 1485 the king signed an agreement with the Prague Articles, but in a somewhat illusory manner. Schlesier, 1422-35; Breslau, 1872; [BEZOLDZ.

The articles of the Basel Council were confirmed by the National Bohemian Assembly at Iglau, July 3, 1436. But Pope Pius II., on March 31, 1462, declared them void, threatening with excommunication all who administered the cup to the laity. The Utraquist party was not intimidated. In 1485 the king signed an agreement with the Prague Articles, but in a somewhat illusory manner. Schlesier, 1422-35; Breslau, 1872; [BEZOLDZ.

Schlesier, 1422-35; Breslau, 1872; [BEZOLDZ.

The articles of the Basel Council were confirmed by the National Bohemian Assembly at Iglau, July 3, 1436. But Pope Pius II., on March 31, 1462, declared them void, threatening with excommunication all who administered the cup to the laity. The Utraquist party was not intimidated. In 1485 the king signed an agreement with the Prague Articles, but in a somewhat illusory manner. Schlesier, 1422-35; Breslau, 1872; [BEZOLDZ.

The Utraquists sent words of cheer to Luther (July 16, 1519), and with them Hus's works, in which he was surprised to find his own doctrines taught. A portion only of the party fell in with the Reformation. In 1575 the Bohemian Parliament passed the Confessio Bohemica on the basis of the Augsburg Confession.

HUTCHINSON, John, a layman who represented peculiar views concerning biblical interpretation; b. in Spennithorne, Yorkshire, 1674; d. Aug. 28, 1727. He was Stewart in several families, and last to the Duke of Somerset, who procured for him a sinecure appointment worth two hundred pounds. In 1724 he published part i., and in 1727 part ii., of his Moses' Principia,—a work in which he attacked Newton's theory of gravitation. He held that the Hebrew Scriptures contained the elements of all rational philosophy, natural history, and true religion. He laid great stress upon the typical texts, and held that all parts of our Saviour's character and work are symbolized in the Old Testament. His views were adopted by such men as Bishop Horne, Jones of Nayland, etc. His collected works were edited in 12 vols. by Spearman and Bate, 1748: An Abstract from the Works of J. Hutchinson, containing a Summary of His Discoveries in Philosophy and Divinity, London, 1753. See Life by Spearman in the edition of 1785.

HUTTEN, Ulrich von, b. at Steckelberg, in Hesse-Cassel, April 22, 1498; d. in the Island of Ufernau, in the Lake of Zurich, Aug. 19, 1523; descended from a noble Franconian family, and was, when eleven years old, placed in the monastery of Fulda. But monastic life was very much against his nature. In his sixteenth year he fled from Fulda, and began, aided by some friends of his family, to study humaniores at Erfurt, scholasticism at Cologne, and philosophy at Paris, 1878. See IIlus. o. v. LECHLER.

HUTTEN was not a Reformer himself: he was only used as the instrument of a movement. The Duke of Württemberg, stirred up by an adulterous passion, assassinated Hans von Hutten, his equerry, and the head of the Hutten family; and Ulrich then stepped forth as the avenger of the family, and depicted in a number of satirical pamphlets the duke as a monster of a tyrant. The satires were good. The educated world became attantive; and as the books contained numerous social and political allusions, all pointing in the direction of freedom and nationality, the author became at once very popular. The great aim of Hutten's life was to free Germany from the yoke under which it was held by Rome, by the Pope and the curia: and he lived, wrote, and fought with great valor. The Epistola obscurationum virorum are, at least in part, his work. His Römische Dreifaltigkeit (1519) contains a more direct attack. At the diet of Augsburg (1518) and the crowning of Charles V. (1520) he spoke openly of a union between the German princes against the Pope. But the motive-power in this plan was political, and social, rather than religious. Though often working in unison with the Reformers, Ulrich von Hutten was not a Reformer himself: he was only a humorist and a knight-errant. When it proved impossible to bring about such a union between the German princes against the Pope, and an idea of uniting the German nobility and free cities against the princes, calculating that the emperor hardly would oppose such a movement with any great vigor. He joined Franz von Sickingen, and the latter began a feud against the elector of Treves. But the undertaking miscarried completely. Hutten fled to Switzerland, suffering frightfully from a disease he had contracted in his early youth. Erasmus refused to see him. The magistrates of Zurich forbade him the city. Only by Zwingli's mediation he was
HYMNOLOGY.

Definition.—A hymn is a spiritual meditation in rhythmical prose or verse. Its chief constituents are praise and prayer to God. The definition of Augustine is too narrow for our modern conception, when he says a "hymn must contain praise, must praise God, and be sung" (opert, ut sit hymnus, habeat hic tria, laudem et Dei et canticum: Ps. lxix.). On the other hand, the definition of the Greek and Latin churches is too comprehensive when it includes praises to saints among hymns. The writers of the New Testament use three terms (Eph. v. 19, etc.) for Christian songs,—psalm (psalmos), hymn (hymnos), and spiritual ode (ode πνευματική). The word "hymn" was a common one among the Greeks, who with the Romans sang songs to their divinities and in honor of famous men. Such "hymns" are found in the poems of Homer, and Hesiód begins his Works and Days by invoking the Muses to sing "hymns" to Zeus, and speaks of them in his Theogony as singing "hymns to all the gods." Pindar expressly calls his odes "hymns." Paul, in his sermon on Mars Hill, quotes the words (Acts xvii. 28), "For we are his offspring," from the "hymn" of Aratus of Cilicia (third century B.C.). The Christian hymn differs from the hymns of heathen antiquity in their spirit and the object of worship, but not necessarily in form. It is addressed to God, or one of the three persons in the Trinity, and admits nothing unholier. It is the communion of the soul with God.

Hymns have from the earliest times entered as an important element into the services of the sanctuary, and have contributed at all periods to the piety of the Church. At the creation "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy" (Job xxxviii. 7). Heaven itself is choral with anthems; and the angelic host sings, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory" (Isa. vi. 3). The best periods of Hebrew history were vocal with sacred song; and the fresh fervor of the early Christians found vent in singing. From the sixth century to this day, in the Greek and Latin churches, with some recent exceptions, the singing of hymns in the church has been restricted to the choir and clergy. The Flagellants of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries on the Continent (hymnos in latina vel vulgari lingua, "they sung hymns in the Latin or vulgar tongue," Summa ust., Antoninus Florentinus (d. 1495) and the Lollards of the fourteenth in England, and also the Hussites of Bohemia in the fifteenth, vived the use of sacred songs amongst the people. The Protestant Reformation, under the lead of Luther, himself a devoted singer and vigorous hymnist, vindicated the right of the people to the use of hymns, and again identified congregational song with the exercises of worship. The sevenfold Reformation in England in the last century was marked by great fertility in the production of hymns, in which the members of the Establishment (Toplady, Newton, etc.) vied with the leaders of the Methodistic movement. Hymns, as Bishop Nicetius of Treves (c. 563) said (De Psalmodia bono), “have consoled the sad, checked the joyous, subdued the enraged, refreshed the poor.” They have been on the tongues of believers in the first ardor of their faith, and have ascended as the last fervid utterances of martyrs at the stake, from Polycarp (Martyr, Polyc., § 14) to Hus, and Jerome of Prague, and are chanted by the church triumphant in the presence of the Redeemer (Rev. v. 9, xiv. 3, etc.). They are the common heritage of all believers, and bind together all ages. In them denominational distinctions are lost sight of; and it is made plain that Christian faith, hope, and love exist, in their purity, in all communions of the Church. The hymns of Ambrose, and John of Damascus, Luther and Tersteegen, Wesley and Toplady, Muhlenberg and John Henry Newman, stand side by side in our hymn-books, and are consentient in praise to the one God, and love for the one Saviour.

Hebrew Hymns. — From very early times the Hebrews sang hymns commemorating the might and excellency of Jehovah. The songs of Miriam (Exod. xv. 21), Moses (Exod. xv. 1–19; Deut. xxxii. 1–43), Deborah (Judg. v. 1 sqq.), and Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1–9), are sacred hymns, full of sublime imagery, and inflamed with a fervid devotion to Jehovah. The Book of Psalms is the oldest hymn-book in existence. Although sung by the shepherd of Bethlehem and other Psalmists, many centuries before Christ, it has been in all ages of the Christian Church, and continues to be, a fresh and living fountain of devotion and praise. Even in captivity the Hebrew people did not forget to sing, but mingled praises with their laments, although it was hard to sing “the Lord’s song in a strange land” (Ps. cxxxvii. 4). The Psalms were sung to musical accompaniment (1 Chron. vi. 31; 2 Chron. xx. 21, etc.). Under David, and subsequently, the Jews had organized choirs; and there returned with Zerubbabel more than two hundred “singing-men and singing-women” (Ez. ii. 65; Neh. vii. 67). See art. PSALMS.

Early Christian Hymns. — At the threshold of the Christian dispensation we have the sublime songs of Mary, called the Magnificat, from the first word of the Latin translation (Luke i. 46–55); of Zacharias, called the Benedictus, likewise from the Latin translation of the first word “blessed” (Luke i. 68–79); of the angels, called the Gloria in Excelsis, “Glory in the highest” (Luke ii. 15); and of Simon, called the Nunc Dimit- tis, “Now lettest” (Luke ii. 29–32). The hymns of the New Testament have so much the form of hymns as to give the impression that they are actually fragments of hymns (Acts iv. 24–30; Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16, vi. 16; Jas. i. 17; Rev. xv. 3, etc.). The Saviour, at the conclusion of the last passover, sang a hymn (a part of the Hallelujah, Ps. cxxv.–cxxxviii.) with his disciples (Matt. xxvi. 30). The early Christians used hymns as a means of edification (1 Cor. xiv. 26; Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16), and interrupted the reading of the epistles with hymns. They sang the decease of the imprisonment by alternating prayer with song (Acts xvi. 25). It seems probable that the hymn in the public assembly was, like the prophecy and the discourse, sometimes the spontaneous product of the moment (1 Cor. xiv. 26).

There is evidence from heathen as well as Christian sources, that singing formed an important part of the Christian services in the post-apostolic age. Early in the second century, Pliny writes to Trajan that the Christians were in the habit of meeting before daylight, and of singing songs to Christ as God among themselves alternately (stato ante lucem), and checked the deposition of impiety by alternating prayer with song. There is evidence from heathen as well as Christian sources, that singing formed an important part of the Christian services in the post-apostolic age. Early in the second century, Pliny writes to Trajan that the Christians were in the habit of meeting before daylight, and of singing songs to Christ as God among themselves alternately (stato ante lucem), and checked the deposition of impiety by alternating prayer with song. There is evidence from heathen as well as Christian sources, that singing formed an important part of the Christian services in the post-apostolic age. Early in the second century, Pliny writes to Trajan that the Christians were in the habit of meeting before daylight, and of singing songs to Christ as God among themselves alternately (stato ante lucem), and checked the deposition of impiety by alternating prayer with song. There is evidence from heathen as well as Christian sources, that singing formed an important part of the Christian services in the post-apostolic age. Early in the second century, Pliny writes to Trajan that the Christians were in the habit of meeting before daylight, and of singing songs to Christ as God among themselves alternately (stato ante lucem), and checked the deposition of impiety by alternating prayer with song.
HYMNOLOGY.

Gregory Nazianzen (d. 389) and Aniostius (d. 458) are the two greatest hymn-writers of the period of formation (as Dr. Neale calls it) in Greek sacred poetry. From the latter we have the solemn hymn of the resurrection, the stanzas being taken from larger poems. The best hymns of the Eastern Church were produced in the next period, which Dr. Neale dates from 726 to 820. Among its hymn-writers were Romanus (d. about 720), to whom Cardinal Pitra ascribes twenty-five hymns, which excel in originality and vigor of expression; Cosmas (d. 780), surmounted the "Melodist;" John of Damascus (d. before 787), the great theologian of the Eastern Church, whose "The Day of Resurrection" (ἀναστάσεως ἡμέρα) has passed into many English hymn-books; and Stephen of St. Sabas (d. 784), a convent in Palestine, near the Dead Sea, whose Art thou weary, art thou languid (ὁσόν τε εἰσὶ κάμποσον) is the most simple and restful lyric in any language upon the words of Christ, "Come unto me, all ye that labor," etc. Still later than these are three other writers, whose names have made the convent of the Studium in Constantinople famous for all time. Theodore of the Studium (d. about 890), is best known by the hymn, Jesus, Name all Names above (Ἰησοῦ γενόμενος), is the most finished and chaste on that event; and the hymn in three stanzas, beginning, Be the Cross our Theme and Story (Laudes crucis). Two other mediæval convents will always be prominent: they are set in the key of the Gregorian. The recitative was introduced, and public song in the church restricted to the choir of priests, the congregation being limited to the responses. The two best hymns of Fortunatus are, The Royal Banner is unfurled (Verilla regis), and Sing, my Tongue, the Saviour's Battle (Pange, lingua).

The hymns of the middle ages have their own peculiar characteristics. The joyful, jubilant tone of the Ambrosian and Prudentian hymns is no longer so prominent: they are set in the key of mystic fervor. Begotten in the cloister, they ring with the soft and subdued but ardent tones of contemplative devotion. The singers linger near the cross, and gaze upon the suffering agonies of its scene, rather than breathe the clear air of the resurrection morning, or celebrate the triumphant exaltation and reign of Christ. Some of these hymns were by the most subtle theologians and devout saints, and, with some of the great theological ideas of Anselm, are the most precious legacies of the mediæval Church. Some of them have never been surpassed.

Amongst others we pass by, with simple mention, the Venerable Bede, the monk of Yarrow (d. 735), who was not only the father of English learning, but the first English hymn-writer; and Notker of St. Gall (d. 912), who was led by the sound of a mill-wheel to compose a new kind of hymns known as "sequences." One of the sweetest hymns of this period is ascribed to Robert, king of France (d. 1031), and has been appropriated by all hymn-books, — Come, Holy Ghost, in Love (Veni, Sancte Spiritus). Adam of St. Victor (d. 1172), whom Archbishop Trench and Dr. Neale agree in pronouncing "the greatest of mediæval poets," made the monastery of St. Victor, just outside the city of Paris, no less famous by his hymns, than his teachings. Hugo of St. Victor (d. 1138), had done by his writings, which founded the mysticism of mediæval France. In the judgment of Dr. Neale, his best hymn is Be the Cross our Theme and Story (Laudes crucis). Two other mediæval convents will always be associated with church hymnody. Clairvaux, through Bernard (d. 1153), the greatest man of his age, and one of the purest saints of any age, gave to the Church the hymn Hail, thou Head, so bruised and wounded (Salve, Caput cruentatum), and a poem of two hundred lines, from which have been taken the three hymns, — Jesus, the very Thought of thee (Jesus, dulcissimi memoriae), and Joy of Loving Hearts (Jesus, dulcedo cordium), and...
O Jesus, King most Wonderful (Jesu, res adorabilis). Cluny, through another Bernard, gave to the Church a long poem of three thousand lines, from which have been extracted several hymns breathing an ardent longing for the heavenly country, of which martyrs are the first, the Golden (Urbe Syon aurea) is the most familiar.

The grandest hymn of the middle ages, and perhaps of all ages, is the Dies Irae of Thomas of Celano (d. about 1250), the friend and biographer of Francis d’Assisi. It has never been equalled as a sublime and reverential description of the awe and terror of the last judgment, and has exercised the skill of many translators. Walter Scott, without translating the letter, has preserved the spirit, of the original in the three verses beginning,—

“Day of wrath, that dreadful day,
When heaven and earth shall pass away!”

Dr. Schaff says (Christ in Song, p. 290), “This marvellous hymn is the acknowledged masterpiece of Latin poetry, and the most sublime of all uninspired hymns. It is one of those rare productions which can never die, but which increase in value as the ages advance. The secret of its irresistible power lies in the awful grandeur of the theme, the intense earnestness and pathos of the poet, the simple majesty and solemn music of its language,” etc. If the Dies Irae excels all other hymns in grandeur, then another hymn of the middle ages—The Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow arms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages—the Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow arms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages—The Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow arms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages—the Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow arms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages—the Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow arms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages—the Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow arms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages—the Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow arms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages—the Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow arms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages—the Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow arms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages—...
HYMNOLOGY.

1051. Hymnology.

art (d. 1849), which is so popular in Germany, "Nun danket alle Gott ("Now thank we all our God"), and has been called the national Te Deum. Among the most fertile hymn-writers of this period was Johann Heermann (d. 1647), a pastor who hardly knew what it was to have a day free from pain, and whose hymns are the products of a painful Christian experience. The hymns of Scheffler (d. 1677), better known as Angelus Silesius, from his native province, Silesia, are full of pathos, and devotion to the Master, which his transition to the Catholic Church (in 1661) did not change. One of his sweetest hymns is Ich will dich lieben, meine Stärke ("Thee will I love, my Strength, my Tower").

German hymnology reached its culminating point in Paul Gerhardt, a Lutheran pastor (d. 1679). Knapp calls him "beyond dispute, the first of German church poets." More than thirty of his hundred and twenty-three hymns are classical. Among his best are: O Haupt voll Blut ("O sacred Head now wounded"), Wie soll ich dich empfangen ("Oh! how shall I receive Thee"), and Befehl du deine Wege ("Give the winds thy fears"); but it is difficult to make a selection where so many are so uniformly excellent.

The first hymn-writer of the Reformed Church was Joachim Neander (d. 1680), who died, as pastor in Bremen, at the early age of thirty. He came under the influence of Spener. His hymns are "full of spiritual depth andunction." His Lobe den Herren den mächtigen König der Ehren ("Praise to Jehovah! the Almighty King of Creation") is a jubilant song of thanksgiving, and one of the most popular in Germany. The school of Pietists, of the latter part of this and the beginning of the eighteenth century, was fertile in the production of hymns; Spener (d. 1705), Franke (1727), and Freylinghausen (d. 1739) were the most prominent. Schmolke (d. 1737), a pastor in Silesia, was a copious author of hymns. They are pervaded with Christian warmth and devotion, and some of them are of perpetual value. His Mein Jesu wie du willst has passed into many English hymnals in the finest form, as Thou wilt." One of the most voluminous writers of hymns in this century was Hiller (d. 1769), a pastor in Württemberg. Albert Knapp, who gives twice as many (two hundred and sixty-four) of his hymns as of any other author, speaks with enthusiasm of the powerful influence which they have exercised upon the spiritual life of Southern Germany.

Allied in devotional, almost mystical fervor, are the hymns of Count Zinzendorf (d. 1760) and Tersteegen (d. 1700). The former was the founder of the Moravian community at Herrnhut, and publisher of its famous hymn, two hundred and five of which have passed into the Moravian hymnbook in the English language. Wesley translated and freely transposed some of them. Christi Blut und Gerechtigkeit ("Jesus, thy Blood and Righteousness") is a good example of his style. Tersteegen was a hymn in the Reformed Church, and published a book of eleven hymns, seven of which are very fine and very popular. Gott ist gegenwärtig, lasset uns anbeten ("Lo, God is here, let us adore") is one of the best. Novallis, whose real name was Hardenberg, died prematurely, at the age of twenty-nine (1801), but left behind him some glowing hymns, of which the best are Ich sage jemals dass er lebt ("I say to all men far and near"), and Wenn ich ihm nur habe ("If I only have Thee"). Lavater, who died the same year, also left behind some excellent hymns, of which Jesus Christ, escha du in mir ("Jesus Christ, grow thou in me") is most beautiful.

The early part of the present century witnessed a great revival of interest in church hymnody in Germany. It was led by Schleiemacher, Claus Harms, Arndt (v. Wort u. Kirchenlied, 1819), and others, and was contemporary with, if not a product of, the great national Luther tri-centennial of 1817. The hymns of the old writers had been subjected to ruthless treatment at the hands of the rationalists and literati of the eighteenth century. Even such a man as Schlegel felt justified, in order to avoid the elision, to alter the first line of Luther's great hymn to Ein starker Schatz. This movement was inaugurated by Justin Gesevius in his hymnological collection (1847). The better taste of the early part of the present century demanded the restoration of hymns to their original form. In this direction Bunsen, Stier, Daniel, Knapp, and others did good service by their hymnological collections.

Many fine hymns have been added during the present century to the already rich and well-filled stores of Germany. Arndt (d. 1860), Friedrich Rückert (d. 1867), Meta Hauser (d. 1876), a Swiss poetess, and others, have made their offerings. But the two most copious contributors have been Spitta (d. 1859) and Albert Knapp (d. 1864). The former's Psalter und Harfe ("Psalter and Harp"), a collection of sacred lyrics, had a very wide circulation, and contains some very fine hymns. One of his best is Alles schwimmt; Herzen brechen ("All is dying, hearts are breaking"). The second of Knapp's is Eines wünsch ich mir vor allem andern ("More than all, one thing my heart is craving"). The first living hymnist of Germany is Prätlat Karl Gerok, formerly preacher to the king of Württemberg, and author of some choice collections of sacred lyrics.

HYMNOLOGY.

1052

HYMNOLOGY.

the (Miss BORTHWICK and Mrs. FINDLATHER), Edinburgh, 1862; MASSEY: Lyra Domestica, London, 1866; SHERRY: Christ in Song, New York and London, 1870.

French Hymns. — Calvin, like Luther, advocated congregational singing; and quite recently a hymn by him was found in an old Genevese prayer-book. It was printed in 1868. The opening line is Je Te salue, mon certain Rédsmpteur (“I greet Thee, who my sure Redeemer art.”) See Christ in Song, p. 549. While Calvin was at Strassburg he came into possession of some of Clement Marot’s versions of the Psalms without knowing they were his, and had them set to music. These with five original versions of Ps. XXV., XXXVI., XLVI., CXC., CXXXVIII., the Apostles’ Creed, and the Song of Simeon, and the Decalogue in verse (by his own hand), he published at Strassburg, 1539, under the title Aulcum Psalmeset Cantiquesmys en chant. This book, consisting of twenty-one pieces, with the tune at the beginning of each psalm, but without preface or the name of the author, was the first collection of psalms in the French Reformed Church. Marot (d. at Turin, 1544) in 1541 received permission to publish the Trente Psalms (“Thirty Psalms”), which appeared the following year with a dedication to Charles V. In 1543 he published Cinquante Psalmes (“Fifty Psalms”). After Marot’s death, Beza added translations of other psalms; but it was not till 1562 that a complete collection of the whole Psalter appeared. Marot’s versions are felicitous, and with few changes continue to be sung to the present day in the French churches. Claude Goudin set them to music.

The hymnology of the French churches is meagre. To César Malan (d. 1864), according to Vinet, belongs the honor of restoring the hymn to them. In connection with Bost (d. 1674) he published in 1629 a collection of French hymns, under the title Chants de Sion, which appeared in an improved form in 1841, under the title Chants Chrétiens. Malan wrote more than a thousand hymns. The hymn for the dying, Non, ce n’est pas mourir (“No, no, it is not dying”), is familiar to English ears. The Chants chrétiens has incorporated some hymns from Roman-Catholic writers, as Bishop Godeau (d. 1672), who published a collection of elegant translations of the Psalms (Les psaumes de David traduits en vers français), Corneille (d. 1684), Racine (d. 1699), Madame Guyon (d. 1717), and others. Madame Guyon’s hymns are distinguished by graceful composition and devotional fervor. A number of them were translated by Cowper, who could fully sympathize with the mystical temper of their author, and some are found in English hymn-books.

HYMNOLOGY, English and American. Notwithstanding the great antiquity of religious poetry, English hymnology is one of the latest fruits of the English mind. A hymn is defined in John Mason, grandf- of the author of the Treatise on Self-knowledge, published thirty-three Songs of Praise, which obtained some popularity, and were, perhaps, the first hymns actually used in public worship. That none of these writers had succeeded in firmly establishing this use of hymns is evident from the fact, that, when Isaac Watts, who wrote a long preface, argument, as a "bold and determined innovator," in favor of the right to found hymns on "any portion" of Scripture. The practice of doing this was, however, an ancient one. The old Latin and Greek hymns, largely produced during the so-called "dark ages," were used in public worship. Still, it was the attachment of the people to psalmody, that they were unwilling to countenance the use of words, though expressive of the Jewish temple.

greatly produced during the so-called "dark ages," were used in public worship. Still, it was the attachment of the people to psalmody, that they were unwilling to countenance the use of words, though expressive of the Jewish temple.

strong was the attachment of the people to psalmody, that they were unwilling to countenance the use of words, though expressive of the Jewish temple.

The practice of this was, however, an ancient one. The old Latin and Greek hymns, largely produced during the so-called "dark ages," were used in public worship. Still, it was the attachment of the people to psalmody, that they were unwilling to countenance the use of words, though expressive of the Jewish temple.

great enrichment of our collections; and they, we know, were used in public worship. Still, so strong was the attachment of the people to psalmody, that they were unwilling to countenance the use of words, though expressive of the Jewish temple.

The practice of doing this was, however, an ancient one. The old Latin and Greek hymns, largely produced during the so-called "dark ages," were used in public worship. Still, it was the attachment of the people to psalmody, that they were unwilling to countenance the use of words, though expressive of the Jewish temple.

Among the hymn-writers who followed, before the present century, were William Hammond (Awake, and sing the Song of Moses and the Lamb), Joseph Hart (Come, ye Sinners, Poor and Wretched), William Cowper (What various Hindrances we meet), Samuel Medley (Morsus, awoke, with Angels join), William Williams (Guide me, O thou Great Jehovah), John Ryland (Sovereign Ruler of the Skies), Joseph Griggs (Behold! a Stranger's at the Door), Edward Perronet (All have the Power of Jesus' Name), Robert Seagrave (Rise, my Soul, and stretch thy Wings), and Robert Robinson (Come, thou Fount of every Blessing). Philip Doddridge was one of the most successful hymn-writers of the period. He was a warm friend of Dr. Watts, though much his junior. He wrote nearly four hundred hymns, among which were To-morrow, Lord, is Thine; Do not I love thee, O my Lord! Ye Servants of the Lord; Hark! the Glad Sound, the Savour comes; Grace, 'tis a Charmy Sound; and Ascaye, my Soul, stretch every Nerve.

Two women who lived in the latter half of the last century — Mrs. Barbauld and Anne Steele — mark the beginning of the line of hymn-writers of the gentler sex that has so greatly enriched English hymnology during the present century. Mrs. Barbauld is known as a writer of considerable repute beyond her hymns, but Miss Steele was a hymn-writer only. She wrote from experience gained in a life of suffering and bereavement; and it has been said that no woman, and but few men, have written so many hymns that have had general acceptance in the Church. Of her productions (a hundred and forty-four in number) the following are familiar: Father, what'er of Earthly Bliss; He lives, the Great Redeemer lives; Father of Mercies, in thy Word; and Far from these Narrow Scenes of Night. Among the hymns of Mrs. Barbauld are: The Sacred Voice; Praise to God, Immortal Praise; and How blest the Righteous when he dies!

To this period belongs Henry Kirke White, the youthful genius in whom Southey was so much interested. His When marshalled on the Nightly Plain, Off in Danger, off in Foe, Two words and The Night Sorrow's Night and Danger's Path reflect his personal experience, and hold a prominent place in many hymn-books. The last to be mentioned in this period is John Newton, whose remarkable experience was much more phenomenal than that of White, and has left its mark on his hymns. Among his productions that are well known are,

By Faith in Christ I walk with God; One there is above all Others; Hymn Sweet the Name of Jesus sounds! Safely through another Week; Amazing Grace, how Sweet the Sound! Come, my Soul, thy Suit prepare; Approach, my Soul, the Mercy-seat; and Glorious Things of thee are spoken, Zion, City of our God. Few hymns are more explicitly records of experience (and the writer said plainly that they were such) than those of Newton.

English hymnology has been enriched during the present century from two chief sources besides natural growth. The so-called "Oxford" movement, and the contributions of writers belonging, like Edward Caswall, J. H. Newman, and Frederick W. Faber, to the Roman-Catholic communion, have given us many hymns that are accepted by Christians of every name as true outpourings of the pious heart. John Keble, the poetical leader in the Oxford movement, published in 1827 the most extensively circulated book of religious poetry of modern times,—The Christian Year. J. H. Newman wrote, Lead, kindly Light. John Mason Neale, a practical communion, have both given us many hymns that are accepted by Christians of every name as true outpourings of the pious heart. John Keble, the poetical leader in the Oxford movement, published in 1827 the most extensively circulated book of religious poetry of modern times,—The Christian Year. J. H. Newman wrote, Lead, kindly Light. John Mason Neale, a practical philanthropist, as well as a scholar and a poet, opened to modern Christians the wealth of medieval Greek and Latin hymnology, and enriched our collections with such translations as Fierce Kindly Light. John Mason Neale, a practical leader in the Oxford movement, has in England, chiefly, perhaps, because we have had the riches of the mother-country to make choice from, and needed only such lyrics as a few different circumstances rendered necessary; still, American poets have made considerable contributions to this department of letters. Timothy Dwight (1772-1817), president of Yale College from 1775 to 1818, wrote I heard the Voice of Jesus say, and The Saints in Glory; Horatio May (1793-1868), who wrote Jesus, I my Cross have taken, and that which the latter had derived from the Latin of St. Bernard, O Sacred Eventide. Sir John Bowring (1792-1872) was a friend of Montgomery and Thomas Hornblower Gill, b. 1819 (Father, my heart is blest), Horatius Bonar, b. 1808 (I heard the Voice of Jesus say), Joseph Anstice, 1808-36 (When wounded sore, the Stricken Soul), and Frances Ridley Havergal (I gave my Life, the Cross I bear). Among the later writers of this century are Josiah Conder (1780-1855), a friend of Montgomery and Chalmers (The Lord is King, lift up thy Voice), James Edmiston, 1791-1867 (Surely, a Voice from an Evergreen Tree), and Thomas Toke Lynch, 1818-71 (Gracious Spirit, dwell with me), Joseph Anstice, 1808-36 (When came in Flesh the Incarnate Word), Horatius Bonar, b. 1808 (I heard the Voice of Jesus say), and Thomas Hornblower Gill, b. 1819 (Father, my heart is blest), Horatius

May (1793-1868) wrote The Spirit in our Hearts, and When, Lord, to this our Western Land. The saintly William Augustus Muhlenberg (1796-1877) wrote Like Noah's Weary Dove, and I would not live alway. The poets, William Cullen Bryant (1794-1879), John Pierpoint (1785-1886), and Phoebe Cary (1824-71) wrote respectively, Oh, does not they are blest alone; The Winds are hushed, the Peaceful Moon; and One Sweetly Solemn Thought. Samuel Davies (1724-61) wrote at an earlier period, Lord, I am Thine, entirely Thine; and Edward Hamilton Sears (1810-76), Calm on the Listening Ear of Night, and It came upon the Midnight Clear, that Glorious Song of Old. Among the latest American hymn-writers are Bishop Arthur Cleveland Coxe, b. 1818 (Oh! where are Kings and Empires now?), Ray Palmer, b. 1808 (My Faith looks up to Thee), and Oliver Wendell Holmes, b. 1809, who wrote O Love Divine, that stooped to share, and Lord of all Being, throned on high.

The progress of English hymnology has been from rugged style and gross conceptions to elegance and strength of style, and spirituality of conception. The hymns of the present day are...
HYPOSTASIS (imédflwlt', substantia, or subsistencia), a term occurring in the Trinitarian controversies, and used in various dialectical combinations with the words persona (person) and hypostasis. The Council of Alexandria, however (362), finally defined hypostasis as synonymous with person.

HYPSISTARIANS, a religious sect living in Cappadocia in the fourth century. It was a singular mixture of Paganism and Judaism. It retained the worship of images and light, but rejected all image-worship. It retained the Sabbath, the regulations of diet, etc., but rejected the circumcision. All we know of this sect is derived from Gregory Nazianzen (Orat., xviii. 5), who belonged to it before his conversion to Christianity, and Gregory of Nyssa (Adv. Nyssæon, 2, 2). See ULLMANN: De Hyp., Heidelberg, 1838; and BÜHMER: De Hyp., Berlin, 1834.

HYRCANUS II, John, a member of the Asmonean family; king and high priest of the Jews; d. 103 B.C. He was a son of Simon Maccabeus, and, at the murder of his father and two brothers, fell heir to the two highest dignities of his name (135 B.C.). The same Ptolemy who had murdered his father intended to put him out of the way likewise; but Hyrcanus escaped, and afterwards established himself firmly in the possession of his power by arms against Ptolemy, and by a tribute of five hundred talents to Antiochus VII. After the latter's death (128 B.C.) he extended his kingdom over Samaria and Idumæa, and strengthened his throne by a treaty with the Romans. In the latter part of his reign the antagonism between the Pharisees and Sadducees began to assert itself. Hyrcanus followed the traditions of his house, and favored the former party (Joseph., Antiq., xiii. 10, 5), until they clamored for his resignation of the high priestly office, when he went over to the Sadducees. Schürer says of his reign, that "it was the most glorious Israel had seen since the days of Solomon." See WERNER: Johann Hyrkan, Wernigerode, 1877; SCHÜLER: N. Tische Zeitgeschichte, pp. 107—117, Leipzig, 1874; EWALD: History of Israel, vol. iv.; STANLEY: History of the Jewish Church, iii.
HYSTASPES, or HYDASPES. Among the Christians of the first century, there circulated a prophetico-apocalyptic book, pretending to be the work of the Persian or Median wise man and king, Hystaspes, and to contain prophecies of Christ and his kingdom. It was one of those pseudepigraphous compositions which at that time were made in great number, and of various forms, for apologetic purposes. Generally they were ascribed to some person of the old covenant; but, as soon as Christianity penetrated into the Pagan world, the attempt was made, not only to interpret real dicta of elder Pagan seers and poets with a Christian intention, but also to manufacture heathen prophecies of Christianity. The most remarkable productions of this kind were the so-called "Sibylline books," much used by the apologists and fathers from the second to the fourth century; and they found their Oriental counterpart in the Vaticinia Hystaspis.

The book is spoken of by three of the fathers, Justin (Apolog., i. 20 and 44), Clement of Alexandria (Strom., v. 6, § 48), and Lactantius (Instit. div., vii. 15, 18; Epitom., T. ii. p. 69). Of the author, Justin and Clement say nothing; but Lactantius adds that he was an ancient Median king, living before the Trojan war. In spite of the chronological confusion, it is probable that Lactantius here thinks of the father of King Darius I., of whom Ammianus Marcellinus (xxii. 6) tells us that he had learnt much wisdom and many secret arts from the Brahmans of India, and again taught them to the magians. Cythius, a Byzantine historian from the sixth century, speaks (Hist., ii. 24) of a Hystaspes, a contemporary of Zoroaster, without deciding whether or not he was identical with the father of Darius. It is evident that we here meet with traces of the Persian myths about the Bactrian king Vistaspa, or Gustasp, a contemporary of Zoroaster; and we may safely assume that the Vaticinia Hystaspis were founded on Persian reminiscences, though the scanty notices of the book which have come down to us do not allow us to form any explicit opinion of its form, contents, or tendency.

IBAS succeeded Rabulas as bishop of Edessa in 435, though he had previously opposed him very strenuously in his endeavors to have the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia condemned as heretical. But when he undertook, in connection with two other residents of Edessa (Cumas and Probus), to translate these writings into Syriac, he was accused, before the patriarch Proclus and Emperor Theodosius II., of propagating the Nestorian heresies, and was deposed by the Robber Synod of Ephesus, Aug. 22, 449. He was reinstated, however, by the synod of Chalcedon (451), and died Oct. 28, 457. Parts of his epistle to Mares of Beth-Hardashir (Seleucia) on the Tigris, of great interest as an authentic document from the very time of the Nestorian controversy, have been preserved in a Greek translation among the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, and are found in Mansi: Concil., VII. He is not recognized by the Jacobites. See Assemani: Bib. Orient., I. p. 290.

IBN EZRA. See ABEN EZRA.

ICELAND, an island belonging to Denmark, situated in the North Atlantic Ocean, just south of the polar circle, 130 miles south-east of Greenland, and 550 miles west of Norway, comprises an area of 39,200 square miles, with about 70,000 inhabitants. In the latter part of the eighth century the country was visited by Celtic monks. The settlers were Pagans; but, through their intercourse with the mother-country, they became acquainted with Christianity during the tenth century, and in 1000 Christianity was officially established as the religion of the country. In 1055 an episcopal see was founded at Skalholt, and in 1106 another at Holar. The tithe was introduced in 1090, and an ecclesiastical code promulgated in 1125. The country belonged first to the archiepiscopal see of Hamburg-Bremen, then to that of Lund (1106), and finally to that of Nidaros (1237); but the connection was rather loose, as the bishops were elected by the people. In 1550 the Reformation was introduced with armed force by the Danish king, though without effecting any great change in the religious state of the people. In 1801 the bishopric of Holar was abolished, and in 1825 the whole island was placed under the authority of the episcopal see of Rejkjavick. See G. J. Thorø: Jus ecclesiasticum, etc., Copenhagen, 1778; Harlow: Om Reformationen I Island, Copenhagen, 1843.

ICHTHYS (Greek ἵχθυς, "a fish"); the acrostic of the sentence Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεός Τύπος, Σωτήρ, "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Saviour") forms one of the earliest and most frequently used Christian symbols. The name "ichthus," or the picture of a fish, is often found on rings, gems, utensils, tombstones, etc.; and numerous metaphorical expressions or elaborate allegories in the writings of the Fathers were occasioned by this acrostic. Clement of Alexandria (Pudag., III. 11) mentions the fish as one of the Christian symbols, though without making any allusion to its origin. The first who, in speaking of the symbol, also thinks of the acrostic, is Tertullian (De Baptismo, 1). See F. Becker: D. Darstellung J. C. unter d. Blüte d. Fisches, Leipzig, 1866, 2d ed., 1876.

ICONOCLAST, "image-breaker," and ICONODULIST, "image-server" (from εἰκών, "an image," and κλώνω, "to break," or δολέω, "to serve"), are the Greek names of the two opposite parties in the great controversy concerning Image-Worship; which article see. In modern usage, the word "iconoclast" is applied to one who destroys shams or impositions of any kind.

ICONOSTASIS, a piece of furniture in the Eastern Church, corresponding, not to our rood-screen, which separates the choir from the nave, but to our altar-rails, forming a holiest of the service in the Greek Church assumed the present form in the eighth century.

IDIOL and IDOLATRY. In classical Greek the word ἴδιος is used of any kind of representation, bodily or ideal, pictorial, sculptural, or mimical; and it has no reference at all to the question whether the representation is to be recognized as an object of worship, or simply looked at as a product of art. The idea of an idol did not exist in the Greek civilization. It originated among the Jews, under the first covenant: and, though the Septuagint uses ἴδιος to translate no less than sixteen different Hebrew words, it applies it, nevertheless, exclusively to such representations as are destined for worship, leaving entirely out of consideration whether the subject of the representation be the true God or a false one; as, according to the Second Commandment, any bodily representation of any deity, when worshipped, is an idol.

The word εἰδουλοποιία is of Christian origin, and occurs for the first time in the writings of the New Testament (1 Cor. x. 14; Gal. v. 20; 1 Pet. iv. 3; Col. iii. 5). As at the time of Christ the Jews had ceased long ago to use any bodily representation of God in their service, while all the usual representations were found within the boundaries of the Roman Empire worshipped their gods under some kind of bodily representation, it was quite natural that the apostolic writers, and after them the Fathers, should apply the word in a general way as meaning simply the worship of false gods. But in course of time, when the worship of false gods had been stamped out (a law of 392 declared sacrifice and divination treason, and punishable with death), it was discovered that idolatry might be found also in the worship of the true God, as it really means the worship of any bodily representation of any deity. See IMAGE-WORSHIP.

IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH.

IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH. See IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH.

IGNATIUS EPISCOPES. See IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH.

IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH. The only sources from which any information can be drawn about this celebrated person are the epistles circulating under his name. Eusebius knows nothing more of him than what can be extracted from the epistles, with the exception of a few short notices by Ireneus (Adv. Hares., V. 28, 4) and by Origen (prologue to the Canticles, and in Hom. 6, on Luke), which he also knows. But the list he gives of the bishops of Antioch is doubtful with respect to its chronology. Compare A. Harnack: Die Zeit des Ignatius, Leipzig, 1878. He places Ignatius as the second bishop after Peter. As nobody knew anything about the intervening Euodius, he gradually dropped out of attention, and a new tradition formed, placing Ignatius immediately after Peter (Chrysostom, the Paschal Chronicle, Theodoret). Between these two traditions the Const. Ap. (VII. 46) tries to mediate by making Peter consecrate, first Euodius, and then Ignatius. What tradition else has preserved concerning Ignatius—the story that he was the child spoken of in Matt. xviii. 5, and other fictions by Simeon Metaphrastes and Vincentius—is completely worthless. Nor are the various Acta Martyrum of any historical value. We have two which are completely independent of each other. I. Martyrium Colomertinum, first published by Ussher, 1647, in a barbarous but literal translation, then in a Greek version by Ruinart, in Act. Mart., 1689, and finally in a Syriac translation by Mosinger, in Supplem. Corp. Ign., Innsbruck, 1872. II. Martyrium Vaticanum, edited by Dressel, in Patr. Apost., p. 308. The Latin Vita Ignatii, in Act. Sanct. Feb., 1, 29, the Armenian Martyrium, edited by Petermann, and the Vita, by Symeon Metaphrastes, may be considered as mere compilations from the two first mentioned. This whole literature has been collected and edited by Zahn, in Patr. Ap. Oper., Leipzig, 1870 [F. X. Funk, Op. Patr. Ap., Tubingen, 1881, and J. B. Lightfoot, London, 1885]. But all these Acta Martyrum are spurious; they contradict the epistles; they swarm with unhistorical statements; they were not known to any old writer, not even to Eusebius; they date, probably, from the fifth century. Thus the epistles are the only source of information left to us. They are referred to him by Ignatius in his journey from Antioch (where he had been condemned to death) to Rome, where he was to suffer the punishment of being torn to pieces by wild beasts.

The total number of epistles bearing the name of Ignatius is fifteen, but they are of very different date and worth. Seven of them, namely, those Ad Ephesios, Magnesios, Trallianos, Romanos, Philadelphenos, Smyrneos, and Polycarpum, are extant in a double Greek version,—a shorter and a longer. The latter consists of five epistles: namely, those Ad Ephesios, Magnesios, Trallianos, Romanos, Antiocenos, Heronem, and Philippenses. And finally we have three more epistles, but only in a Latin translation; namely, two Ad S. Joannem, and one Ad S. Mariam Virginem, to which is added a Responsio B. Mariae V. ad Ignatium. The three last-mentioned letters were probably originally written in Latin, as their only Greek versions are worthless. They are found in Zahn l. c. of the shorter Greek version, G 1, we have two manuscripts,—Codex Medico-Laurentianus, and Codex Casanatensis, of which, however, the latter is a transcription of the former. There also exist a Latin translation, first published by Ussher, 1644, a Syriac translation, extant only in fragments, and a complete Armenian translation of the Syriac translation, published by the Armenian Bishop Menas of Constantinople, 1783. The epistle Ad Romanos is also found in the Codex Colbertinus, and has been published by Mössinger in Corpus Ignatianum, c. The whole shorter version was first published by Ussher in Latin, 1644, and then in Greek by Isaac Vossius. Later editions are very numerous, the best by Zahn l. c. Of the longer Greek version, G 3, containing twelve epistles, there exist nine manuscripts, and a Latin translation. The above-mentioned Armenian translation also contains the five additional epistles of the longer version. The whole longer version was first edited by Pacensis, 1557, then by And. Gessner, 1559, and afterwards often, best by Zahn l. c. Lately the three epistles Ad Ephesios, Smyrneos, and Polycarpum, have been discovered in a version still shorter than G 3. This version, however, exists only in a Syriac translation. It has been published by Cureton, The Ancient Syriac Version of the Epistles of S. Ignatius, London, 1845, and still better in Corpus Ignatianum, Berlin, 1849. A very rich collection of materials belonging to the subject, especially of Oriental versions, is found in Petermann: S. Ignatii Epistolas, Leipzig, 1849.

On account of the great importance which the epistles of Ignatius have for the older church history, the question about their genuineness gave rise to a very lively debate, the more as a preliminary question about the authenticity of the versions had to be settled in advance. The history of the debate falls into three periods. The first period ends with the discovery of the shorter version, G 1; and its principal result was the general recognition of the spuriousness of those three epistles Ad S. Joannem and S. Mariam Virginem, which exist only in a Latin translation: even Baronius gave them up. With respect to the remaining twelve epistles, most Roman-Catholic theologians (Hartung, Baronius, Bellarmine) accepted them; while most Protestant theologians (the Magdeburg Centuries, Calvin) rejected them. Among the former, however, Martialis Mastraus acknowledged that the text was interpolated; and among the latter Nic. Vedelius recognized the only seven epistles mentioned by Eusebius. With the publication of the shorter version, G 1, the second period opens. The version G 1 was soon generally admitted, and the version G 2 rejected as interpolated; and lately Zahn has fixed the date of this inter-
The question of the authenticity of the text thus settled, the case of the authentic epistles was taken up. The five epistles not mentioned by Eusebius, and not contained in the shorter version (Ad Mariam Cassobolilam, Tarsenses, Antiochenos, Heroenem, and Philippienses), were immediately excluded as spurious. With respect to the remaining seven epistles, the question was answered in the affirmative by Rothe, Huther, Diesterdieck, and others; in the negative, especially by Baur, who fixes their date at the middle of the second century. The third period begins with the discovery of the shortest Syrian version, S, of the three epistles Ad Romanos, Epheisios, and Polycarpum. Cureton, who first edited this version, asserted without hesitation that the original and genuine epistles of Ignatius had now been found; that the versions G I and G 2 were nothing but interpolations and expansions in support of a later state of ecclesiastical development; that the four epistles Ad Magnesios, Smyrnenses, Philadelphos, and Trallianos, were fictitious compositions, etc. Bunsen exerted himself much to introduce these views in Germany (Drei echten u. vier unechten Briefe d. Ignatius, Hamburg, 1847, and Ignatius von Antiochien u. s. Zeit, Hamburg, 1847). They found also many adherents (Ritschl, Weiss, Bühlinger, and Lipsius); but they met with still stronger opposition, both among those who rejected the Ignatian epistles in any version, such as Baur (Die ignatianischen Briefe und ihr neuester Kritiker, Tubingen, 1849), and among those who accepted them in version G 1, such as Denzinger (Über d. Aechtheit d. bisherigen Textes d. ignatianischen Briefe, Würzburg, 1849), Uhlenhuth (Zeitschrift f. d. hist. Theol., 1865, L. 11.), Petermann, Merx (Meletenmata Ignatiana, 1861), and Zahn. In the course of the debate, conclusive evidence was produced, partly from a logical analysis of the contents of the epistles, partly from a comparison of the various Syrian translations, that S is nothing more than an extract from G 1. Some of the stanchest champions of S, as, for instance, Lipsius and Lightfoot, fell off; and the whole period passed off as an episode, leaving the debate at the old dilemma: either we have the genuine epistles of Ignatius in the version G 1, or we have no epistles at all by Ignatius, but only spurious compositions bearing his name.

A decision in the matter has not yet been reached, though it may not be so very far off. The objections to the genuineness of the epistles are: (1) That the fact on which they rest is un-historical. When, however, the fact is read out of the epistles themselves, and not, as Baur did, out of the spurious Acta Martyrum, it fits in very well with the actual state of affairs. That Christians suffered martyrdom under Trajan is well known; and it need cause no hesitation that Ignatius was one of them. It was not the governor of Antioch, as instances of such condemnations occur even in Hermas, and soon after become very frequent. Nor is it strange that he should be brought to Rome to be executed. The law forbidding the governor to send convicts from one province to another can be enforced in favor of the emperor himself; theSentences of Severus and Antoninus; and the law regulating the transferrence of such prisoners to Rome is still later. The route of the journey has nothing improbable about it, as little as the circumstance, that, on the road, Ignatius was at liberty to converse with the congregations, and write letters. Similar instances occur in Lucian (De morte peregrini), and in the acts of Perpetua and Felicitas. The whole situation, finally, presupposed by the Epistle Ad Romanos, the anxiety of Ignatius that the Romans might take some step in order to secure his liberation, is easily explained by the legal right which any one concerned had to appeal in behalf of another, even against his will. (2) When next it has been said (by Baur) that the character of Ignatius, such as it appears in the epistles, looks more like a fiction than a reality, that his forced humility and strained heroism are downright offensive, etc., the mere subjectivity of this objection, and consequently its insufficiency as an argument, is proved by the circumstance that others (e.g., Rothe) find a strong evidence of the genuineness of the epistles in the picture they give of the character of Ignatius. (3) Of much more weight is the objection that the theologies attacked in the epistles belong to a later period than the beginning of the second century. It has been doubted whether the epistles speak of two distinct heresies,—a gnostico-docetic and a judaizing,—or only of one, combining both these elements; and it has been asserted that such a combination would be an impossibility. But we know too little of the earlier stages of Gnosticism to make such an assertion; and a cautious criticism must, no doubt, arrive at the conclusion that the epistles were written before Gnosticism reached that form under which it presents itself between 130 and 140. A decision with respect to the genuineness of the epistles cannot be reached from this point; and, should from some other point an irreproachable evidence of their genuineness be produced, we would have to change our views of the historical development of Gnosticism. (4) It has also been alleged that the church constitution mirrored by the epistles, especially the episcopacy, belongs to a later time. It is true that the epistles distinguish sharply between the bishop, the presbyter, and the deacon; that they represent the episcopate as superior to the presbyter; that they never weary of extolling the bishop, and exhorting the faithful to rally around him as the visible representative of the unity of the congregation, etc. But, though the epistles doubtless show an advance beyond Clemens Romanus and Hermes, they certainly fall behind Irenæus. Ignatius knows nothing about an apostolic establishment of the episcopate, nor does he connect with it those ideas of a priesthood which afterwards were borrowed from the Old Testament. The episcopate is to him an office in the congregation, not an office in the church. The bishop is to him not the successor of the apostles, nor is he the bearer of the doctrinal deposit; but he upholds the whole, though not every difficulty presented by the above objections can be said to have been successfully solved, the collective mass of internal evidence against the genuineness of the epistles would, nevertheless, be insufficient to counterbalance the testimony of the epistles in favor of the single external witness; and there is such a testimony in the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians. He who will prove the epistles of Ignatius to be spurious must begin by proving the Epistle of Polycarp to be spurious, or at least very heavily interpolated; but such an undertaking will hardly ever succeed. [Besides the works already mentioned, see J. Nirschl: Die Theologie des heiligen Ignatius, Mainz, 1880.] G. Ulhorn.

IGNATIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, b. in 700 or 790; a son of the emperor Michael I.; was seized, mutilated, and shut up in a monastery by the usurper, Leo V., the Armenian, but rose gradually in the service of the Church, and was made Patriarch of Constantinople in 847. He could not agree, however, with the emperor, Michael III.; and by the intrigues of his uncle, Caesar Bardas, he was deposed in 858, and banished to the Island of Terebinthus. Photius was put in his place. But Ignatius could not be made to give up his claims, and thus a schism arose. The Pope, Nicholas I., was called in as a mediator; but he came as a judge, and his verdict went against Photius. Photius, however, succeeded in vindicating himself in the patriarchal chair until 867, when Michael III. was dethroned and murdered by Basilius Macedo. Basilius recalled Ignatius; the successor of Nicholas I., there arose a vehement controversy concerning Bulgaria, which each bishop demanded as belonging to his diocese. See Mansi: Concil. Coll, xvii., p. 62. Besides his letters, also a Vita Tarasii by Ignatius has come down to us. See Photius.

IGNATIUS LOYOLA (Don Inigo Lopez de Recalde), b. in the Castle of Loyola, Guipuzcoa, Spain, 1491; d. in Rome, July 31, 1556; was educated at the court of Ferdinand the Catholic,—a knight in the full romantic sense of the word. In 1521, while defending the fortress of Pamplona against the French, he received an extremely painful wound in the foot, and was brought to the paternal castle to be nursed. While on his sick-bed, he asked for books; and as his favorite reading, the fantastic and voluptuous romances of chivalry, could not be procured, he plunged himself into the lives of the saints. The effect was most wonderful,—a complete conversion, an unquenchable passion. From the sick-bed he immediately repaired to the monastery of Montserrat, hung up his armor before the image of the Virgin, exchanged his gay and splendid attire for the rags of a beggar, and retired to a cavern at Manresa, where he spent some time practising the severest ascetic exercises, but also visited and comforted by glorious visions. At Manresa he drew up the first sketch of his famous Exercitia Spiritualia, which, by the members of the order he founded, is still the groundwork of their spiritual exercises.

In 1523 he made a pilgrimage to Palestine; and on his return he began to study, first grammar at Barcelona, and then philosophy at Alcala. While studying, he lived on alms; and at the same time he devoted himself to the nursing of the sick. But as he also appeared among the students and in the hospitals, he became suspected of belonging to the Alombrados. Though acquitted when placed before the Inquisition, he was continually watched; and when, at Salamanca, he was condemned to keep silent for four years on all topics of theology, he left Spain (1528), and went to Paris. In Paris he succeeded, by his innate power of attracting and commanding men, and by the instrumentality of his Exercitia Spiritualia, in gathering a small circle around himself, consisting of Pierre Favre the Savoyard, Simon Rodriguez the Portuguese, and the Spaniards, Francis Xavier, Albons Salmeron, Jacob Lainez, and Nicolas Bobadilla. Aug. 15, 1534, these men met in the Church of Montmartre, formed an association, took the vows of chastity and poverty, and promised furthermore, that, after finishing their studies, they would either go to Jerusalem and devote themselves to missionary work, and work in the hospitals, or place themselves unconditionally at the disposal of the Pope,—a characteristic alternative.

In 1537 the association, increased by three new members, met in Venice; but the war between the republic and the Turks prevented them from continuing the journey to Jerusalem. While laboring in the hospitals, they met with the Theatines, and the meeting was pregnant with great consequences to them. They were all ordained priests, and started for Rome, preaching along the road, in the public squares, in the universities, in the hospitals, etc., and preaching with great effect, though they could speak only broken Italian. In Rome they soon acquired the confidence of the Pope, and were intrusted with important missions to Parma, Piacenza, Calabria, and other places. Ignatius had new visions; and on March 14, 1543, Paul III. confirmed the association under the name of Societas Jesu. Ignatius was unanimously elected general of the new order; and, when he died, the order counted thirteen provinces,—seven in Spain and Portugal, three in Italy, two in Germany, and one in France. Only a short time elapsed before the eminent usefulness of the new instrument became quite apparent; and on March 13, 1523, Gregory XV. canonized its founder, together with Francis Xavier.

For its external organization the order is, in some respects, as deeply indebted to its second as to its first general; the spirit found a most characteristic expression. The book may be described as the personal experience of the author transformed into rules, which the reader must follow in order to reach the same goal as he reached. And what is that goal? To be able, through prayers and fasts, through ascetic and spiritual exercises of the severest description, through absolute seclusion from the world and concentrated meditation, to take an irrevocable vow of obedience,—the obedience of the dead body, which has no will and no motion of its own,—the obedience of the members to the general, and from the general to the Pope; and when the Pope says that black is white, and white black, it is the great moral glory of the order that it is able to repeat the lie (Regula ad sentendum cum ecclesia). Lbr. — Besides the lives of Ignatius found in Act. Sancti., July 31, larger biographies of him have been written by Ribadeneira, Maffei, IGNORANTINES. 1061  IMAGE OF GOD.

Orlandini; also by Isaac Taylor, Lond. and N.Y., 1840. See also SPULLER: Ignace de Loyola, Paris, 1756; G. C. RIESENFELD: Loyola und Loyola, Wittemberg, 1879; A. V. DRÜSSL: Ignatius von Loyla auf der römisichen Curie, München, 1879; H. BAUMGARTEN: Ignatius von Loyola, Strassburg, 1880. G. E. STEITZ.

IGNORANTINES (Frères Ignorantins, Frères ignoranzien, Frères des écoles chrétiennes) is the name of a number of members of the Society of Jesus. The most probable explanation of the name is that which derives the inscription In Hoc Signo, scilicet, vince(s) ("with this token thou shalt be victorious"), the words accompanying the vision of the radiant cross appearing to Constantine and his army: others, as Jesus omnium Salvator ("Jesus, Men's Saviour"), the motto of the Jesuits. The most probable explanation; however, is that which derives the inscription simply from the Greek ΙΗΣΟΥΣ ("Jesus"), as the transformation of the Ι into the Latin S presents no difficulties. See Anhang zur Votok Initirn, published by the Cambridge Camden Society, London, 1841.

ILDEFONSIUS, St. b. at Toledo, 607; d. there Jan. 23, 667; was a pupil of Isidore of Seville; entered the monastery of Agli, against his father's will; became a monk, and afterwards abbott; founded a nunnery near Toledo, and was made archbishop of his native city in 657. According to the testimony of Julian, his successor, he was a prolific writer, though he left most of his works in an unfinished state. Still extant are Libellus de virginitate S. Maria, first edited by Carranza, 1556, and found in Migne, Bib. Paix., 96, the first impulse to that enthusiastic worship of the Virgin which characterized the early Spanish Church; Annotationes de cognitione baptismi et de iterine deserti (Migne l. c.), a complete dogmatic and moral system, but probably only an imitation of an older Spanish work; two letters (Migne l. c.); and his continuation of Isidore's work, the De viris illustribus, often published, with an appendix by Julian, Vita IId. Tolet. (Migne l. c.), and containing the lives of Gregory the Great and fourteen Spanish churchmen. The Adoptionists of the eighth century claimed him as one of their forerunners. His life was written by Carranza (15th), Salazar de Mendoza (1810), Mazarzans y Siscar (1727). See also Act. Sac., Jan. 23;

MABILON: A. S. Ben., ii., iii.; and FLOREZ: España Sagrada, v., 426. WAGENMANN.

ILLGEN, Christian Friedrich, b. at Chemnitz, Sept. 16, 1776; d. at Leipzig, May 1806. He studied in the University of Leipzig, and was appointed professor there of philosophy in 1818, and of theology in 1823. Besides other works, he wrote Lulius Socinus' Leben, Leipzig, 1814, and founded the Historisch-Theol. Gesellschaft in 1814, and the Zeitschrift f. Kirchen- und Histor. In 1832, he afterwards continued by Niedner and by Kahnis, and contains many valuable contributions to the clearing up of obscure points of church history. ILLUMINATI was the name adopted by the members of a secret society of half-political and half-religious character, which was founded May 1, 1776, at Ingolstadt, by Adam Weishaupt, professor in the university. The founder's object was simply to form a tool for the gratification of his own ambition; and the model after which he worked was the Society of Jesu. Aided by the singular passion for secret societies which characterized the rationalism of the eighteenth century, he succeeded in forming classes of novices in Ingolstadt, Freising, Munich, in Tyrol, Westphalia, Saxony; and by means of an inexhaustible talent for charlataney, and a well-organized system of espionage, he also succeeded in keeping his novices in due submission. But what about the further development and final organization of the society? Weishaupt was near his wit's end, and confessed that he really did not know what to do with his novices, when Baron Adolf von Knigge entered the society in 1780, and brought speed and order in its development. A firm connection was established with the Freemasons of Munich, Freising, Francfort, etc. Three classes were formed,—one of novices or minervals, one of Freemasons or Scotch Knights, and one of the pupils of the small and great Mysteries; and the society spread so widely that even the greatest names in Germany were mentioned as members. But in 1784 Weishaupt and Knigge fell out with each other, both wanting to become the Magus or Rex of the society; and in the same year a decree was issued in Bavaria, forbidding all secret societies. The Illuminati felt safe, possessed as they were of a considerable political, social, and moral power; but they overlooked that the manner in which they wielded that power had already made them many enemies; and in 1785 began a sharp persecution, which, within a year or two, brought the whole institution to collapse. [They do not appear ever to have numbered more than two thousand.] The literature of the affair is enormous. As the principal documents may be considered the writings of WEISHAUP: Gesch. d. Verfolgung d. Illuminaten, 1780; Apologie der Illuminaten, 1787; D. verbesserte System, 1787, Kurze Rechtsfestigkeit, 1787, etc. KLUCKHOHN.

IMAGE OF GOD. The concept of the Image of God is a fundamental one in the department of Christian anthropology. Man is declared (Gen. i. 26) to have been created in God's image (Cf. tselem) and after his likeness (d'mulh). There is no other difference between these two terms than the difference between a concrete and abstract designation (comp. Gen. v. 3, ix. 6). The use of different prepositions, however, indicates that the former was inalienable: the latter might be lost. The dominion over the creatures which is ascribed to man in Gen. i. 28 is not to be regarded as of the essence of the image of God, but as a consequence of it. In the New Testament, sinful man is on the one hand recognized as still possessing the image of God, as in Luke iii. 38 (where Adam, as the founder of the race, is called the son of God); 1 Cor. xi. 7; Jas. iii. 9, etc.: on the other, he is urged to put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge (Col. iii. 10), righteousness, and holiness (Eph. iv. 24), after the divine image. Christ is the perfect image of God (2 Cor. iv. 4; Col. F. 15) and we become renewed after the image of God when we become conformed to the image of Christ (Rom. viii. 29).

We find a variety of utterances in the fathers on this subject. They agree, however, in ascribing the divine image to qualities differentiating man from the rest of the creation, and define them as reason and freedom (Greg. Nyssa, De hom. opif., iv., v.). Ireneus, Tertullian, and Melito of Sardis included under it a physical similarity to God, which the Alexandrians and Augustine denied. The fathers also referred it to the moral nature, and the latter moral righteousness, which was lost at the Fall. This distinction is preserved by the theologians of the Roman-Catholic Church, who declare man's original righteousness (justitia orig.) to have been a superadded gift. The Protestant Church, ignoring this distinction, places the image of God in the religious and moral nature, and defines it as the original righteousness with which man was created. Socinianism defined it as man's dominion over the animal creation.

In order to rightly understand the meaning of the divine image, we must start from the nature of God, who created man for communion with Himself, and the world for man's well-being. Man alone received the spirit of life, and is a spiritual being, a personal soul. Man as a person is the image of God, and in the totality of his being (body and soul). This may be termed the essential element in the image of God in man, and is indestructible. To it corresponds the habitual element. Man as the creature of God is designed for a life of love, which manifests itself in the intellect as knowledge and wisdom, and in the will as freedom and holiness. The likeness to God further shows itself in the immortality of the body and the dominion over nature. The essential element was lost at the Fall, when love for God was displaced by selfishness. The Son of God in the flesh was the concrete personal restoration of the divine image; and through his vicarious death and victorious resurrection we become partakers of his righteousness, and by the Holy Spirit poured out in our hearts are restored to the divine image.

IMAGE-WORSHIP. I. IN THE EASTERN CHURCH.—The greatest difficulties which the Emperor Leo III., the Isaurian (717-741), experienced in his endeavors to make the Church co-extensive with the Empire, was the question whether the image-worship which arose from the image-worship, which, since the fifth century, had become general among the Christians. Especially the Mohammedans hated the practice as a Pagan abomination; and Leo himself looked upon it as idolatry. From regard, however, for the Patriarch Germanus, the emperor proceeded with caution in his attempt to destroy it. The edict of 726 simply forbade profanation before the images, and ordered them to be hung so high on the walls that people could not reach and kiss them. But to some bishops this manner of proceeding was too slow: on their own account they removed the images from the churches. A great fermentation immediately took place, and dangerous riots occurred in various places. Pope Gregory II. and John of Damascus, the most celebrated theologian of the Greek Church, declared against the emperor, and in favor of the edict; but the emperor, however, continued to encourage the image-worship. Pope Adrian I. (772-795) opposed the image-worship of the monks. Leo IV. Chazarus (780), was made regent during his minority, and was opposed by the emperor; but Leo proceeded with caution. Leo V. Chazarus (780), made regent during the minority of her son (Constantine VI.), a change took place in the policy of the imperial government. Images were tolerated. The monks, iconodulists by profession, again stepped forward; and their zeal and influence increased rapidly, as did their number. An ecclesiastical the council was thought of as the proper means of carrying out a reversal of the legislation of 754. But the Oriental patriarchs refused to be present, from a regard to the Saracens; and Pope Adrian I. demanded, as a conditio sine qua non, the immediate surrender of the images. Leo III. had deposed him. A common council was then resorted to, convened in Constantinople 786. But the number of iconoclastic bishops was too great, and the attitude of the army (the soldiers being iconoclasts by training since the days of Leo III.) was too dangerous: nothing could be done. Next year, however, a well-managed Council of Nicea (787) proved successful. A shrewd distinction was made between the full worship (ἀγάπη και λατρεία), which ought to be offered to God alone, and the tokens of honor and veneration (δέος εἰς τοπικήν ἀπειθήσεις) which are due to the holy images; and on the basis of this distinction the iconoclasts were condemned. In the West the decisions of 787 were refuted by the Liber Carolinu; and rejected by the Council of Frankfurt (794); but in the East they were enforced without causing any disturbance, as, indeed, they represented the views of the great mass of the people. But when, in 813, Leo V., the Armenian, ascended the throne, the soldiers again got the ascendency over the monks; and on their peremptory demand the emperor issued a decree against image-worship in 814. The patriarch and the monks, who labored secretly and openly against the emperor, were punished. A new patriarch, presiding over a council in Constantinople (815), cancelled the canons of 787; and Theodore, abbot of the monastery of Studium in Constantinople, and the head of the iconodules, was banished. Leo’s successor, however, Michael II., Balbus (820-829), again yielded to the iconodules, and allowed image-worship in private; and though his son (Theophilus, 829-842) forbade people to have images in their houses, and persecuted the monks with cruelty, his wife Theodora got the ascendency over the monks; and on their peremptory demand the emperor issued a decree against image-worship in 814. The patriarch and the monks, who labored secretly and openly against the emperor, were punished. A new patriarch, presiding over a council in Constantinople (815), cancelled the canons of 787; and Theodore, abbot of the monastery of Studium in Constantinople, and the head of the iconodules, was banished. Leo’s successor(624,111),(991,870)...
IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

HERZOG.

IMAM, the priest who leads the prayers of a Mohammedan congregation, and in Turkey also performs the rites of circumcision, marriage, and burial. The name comes from the Koran (Sura IV., "The Cow"), v. 118: "When his Lord made trial of Abraham, by commanding him to sacrifice his son, he said, 'I am about to make thee an Imam (priest) to mankind.'" The title "Imam" is borne by the caliphs, or successors of Mohammed, and thus has the secondary meaning of "the head of the faith." The present Osmanli dynasty of Turkish sultans arrogates the title on the ground that the last legitimate caliph, El Selim I., the first sultan, and his heirs. But the Shiites, or Shias, the so-called heretical Mohammedans, deny the right of the sultan to this title, and limit it to twelve persons. Eleven imamas have already appeared; the twelfth is announced. Indeed, they look for his appearance at any time.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION OF THE VIRGIN MARY, a modern dogma of the Roman Church, which exempts the Virgin Mary from all personal contact with sin, and in this respect puts her above all other descendants of Adam, and on the same scale of sinless purity as Christ. It was proclaimed by Pope Pius IX., on the Feast of the Conception, Dec. 8, 1854, in the Church of St. Peter and in the presence of more than two hundred cardinals, bishops, and other dignitaries, in these words: "That the most blessed Virgin Mary, in the first moment of her conception, by a special grace and privilege of Almighty God, in virtue of the merits of Christ, was preserved immaculate from all stain of original sin." (ab omni originalis culpa late preservata immune.)

This the papal bull Ineffabilis Deus declares to be a divinely revealed fact and dogma, which must hereafter be constantly believed by all Catholics, on pain of excommunication. The dogma was not sanctioned by any ecumenical council; but since the Vatican Council of 1870 declared the Pope infallible, independent of a council, the decree of 1854 must be received as an infallible utterance, and cannot be changed. Pius IX. had previously, by an encyclical of Feb. 2, 1849, invited the opinion of the Catholic bishops on the subject, and received more than six hundred affirmative answers. Only four dissented from the Pope's view; and fifty-two, while agreeing with him in the dogma itself, deemed it inoppor-IMMANUEL. IMMORTALITY.

Apocryphal Gospels, which substituted mythology for real history, and nourished superstition rather than rational faith.

The doctrine crept into theology through the door of worship. The first clear trace of it is found in the twelfth century, in the south of France: when the canons of Lyons introduced the festival of the conception of Mary, Dec. 8, 1139. This proves that the belief then existed as a pious opinion, but by no means as a dogma. On the contrary, St. Bernard, the greatest doctor and saint of his age, opposed the new festival as an unauthorized innovation, degradatory to the dignity of Christ, the only sinless being in the world. He asked the canons of Lyons whence they discovered such a hidden fact. On the same ground they might appoint festivals for the conception of the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of Mary, and so back to the beginning. The same ground is taken essentially by the greatest schoolmen, as Anselm, Bonaventura, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas. But during the fourteenth century, through the influence chiefly of Duns Scotus, "the subtle doctor," the doctrine of the immaculate conception became a part of the theology of the Franciscans or Scotists, and was a bone of contention between them and the Dominicans or Thomists. They charged each other with heresy, for holding the one view or the other. The Council of Trent did not settle the question, but rather leaned towards the Franciscan side. Soon afterwards the Jesuits took up the same side, and defended it against the Jansenists. To their zeal and perseverance, and their influence over Pope Pius IX., the recent triumph of the dogma is chiefly due. The whole Roman-Catholic world quietly acquiesced until the Vatican Council roused the "Old Catholic" opposition against papal infallibility, which extended also to the dogma of the immaculate conception.

LIT._—The papal bull Ineffabilis Deus (Dec. 8, 1854); Perrone: On the Immaculate Conception (Latin, German, etc., 1849); Passaglia: De immac. Deipara semper Virg. conc. (1854 sq., 3 vols.); Preus: The Roman Doctrine of the Immaculate Conception German and English, 1865; recalled by the author when he seceded from the Lutheran to the Roman Church in St. Louis, Mo.; Pusey: Eirenikon (part ii. 1867); H. B. Smith, in the Method. Quarterly Rev. for 1855; Hase: Handbook of Protestant Polemics (1871); Schaff, in Johnson's Cyclopaedia. Of older Catholic works we mention J. Turncrematas: De veritate conceptionis beat. Virginis (1547; republished by Pusey, 1869); and J. de launoy, a Jansenist: Prescriptions de Conceptu B. Mariae Virg. (1677), —both against the immaculate conception.

IMMANUEL, a Hebrew word meaning "God with us," occurring in the prophecy spoken by Isaiah to Ahaz concerning the speedy downfall of Syria (Isa. vii. 14). But the Holy Spirit has taught us (in Matt. i. 23) to see, in the "virgin" who bore Immanuel in the days of Ahaz, the type of the Virgin Mary, whom Philip Schaff, in his Life of Jesus the Messiah, the Son of God. See the commentaries upon Isa. vii. 14 and Matt. i. 23.

IMMERSON. See BAPTISM.

IMMORTALITY. The motives for belief in immortality, which are to be found in men's hopes and fears, are of a subjective nature; and there lies in such motives doubt of the truth of immortality: hence, from of old, men have sought for purely objective grounds for this belief. Christian faith finds them in the resurrection of Christ. But this belief possesses objective worth only in those who stand in the Christian faith. Moreover, belief in immortality is a great help and support to, if not one of the conditions of, Christian faith: hence not only ancient, but also Christian, philosophy searches for objective grounds for belief in immortality without the religious province. Such ground is sometimes supposed to be found in the nature of the soul, in the difference between psychical and physical appearances, in the opposition of body and soul as two distinct substances. But this would only show that the soul may continue in existence, not that it must. To prove from the nature of the soul its necessary existence, it must be assumed that the soul is a simple substance, immaterial and indivisible, and therefore not to be dissolved, like the body, into its elements. But Kant objected, that, even though the soul appears to be one and simple, it cannot, therefore, be assumed that it is so. No psychology, at least, has succeeded in reducing the different activities of the soul to one simple power. The soul may be a unity; but it cannot be conceived as a simple substance which should exclude all inherent manifoldness of powers. The separation between the material and the immaterial should not in our conceptions be carried so far as to threaten to bear body and soul apart, and to make their union an incomprehensible miracle. Nothing is gained by referring to the self-conscious activity of the soul as evidence of an indestructible power. Self-consciousness may be lost through disturbances of the brain, and perhaps; but the reason, according to its nature and idea, may be thought to require its own continuance and lordship. It is unreasonable to suppose the loss of reason, its dissolution in unreason. But the continued existence of the individual is not secured by the dominion of reason alone generally. Finally, it has been held that the soul could not form the ideas of eternity and infinity, the idea of truth, and the true ideas (axioms, etc.), which it holds to be eternally true, absolutely unchangeable, if the soul did not carry eternity within itself; for the temporal cannot possibly conceive the eternal, the finite the infinite. We must, alas! deny to this argument all validity; for these ideas are, upon their part, controverted conceptions. And, moreover, all conscious conception involves the distinction of the object from the subject, and by no means involves the possession by the soul of all that it can conceive. We see, then, that the question concerning the relation of soul and body in respect to self-consciousness presses into the foreground of the examination, and must be answered before we can come to any result. Besides, it is the whole man, the whole being of man only, from which objective reasons for belief in immortality can be derived. It stands psychically and psychologically fast, that, until now at least, it seems impossible to derive psychological phenomena from the general physical and chemical powers of nature. But every power appears.
UNITED to some substance. Upon what substance, then, is the psychical power bound?—upon the body, or some special substance? Nothing prevents us from supposing that the soul is a centre of those particular powers which lie at the ground of psychical appearances; i.e., that these powers are not bound up with the atoms of the body, but form a centre for themselves; and they are united with the substances and powers of the body only in an intimate relation of action and reaction. The unity of consciousness is the pledge of the unity of the soul; i.e., the unity of psychical powers in one centre. The hypothesis that this centre of the soul is a single atom is contradicted by the facts, and is no longer tenable. There is no trace in the brain of that centralization of elements and activities which is the indisputable characteristic of the soul; and it follows, therefore, from the science of the human body, that the soul is not a simple function of the brain, but a centre of the soul is a single atom is contradicted by physical or psychical facts: on the contrary, it seems to be required even by them. Consequently natural science must suppose, that, for the soul also, there shall be preserved room, not only for the temporary and passing play of its powers, but also for their enduring activity; that the force of consciousness, although temporarily robbed of its power of manifestation, is destined to make itself availing again in re-union with a body corresponding to it. According to natural sciences this process may be regarded as constantly repeating itself, and, with that, natural science may stop. But it cannot deny the possibility that this process may come to an end in a last act through the union of the soul with a body no more separable from it; and reason demands such a conclusion, because an endless, aimless circling is unreasonable.

Therefore real science cannot conflict with the belief in immortality; but, in consistency, it must allow it, and affirm, if not its truth, at least its probability. Now, after we have won such objective grounds for this belief, it receives higher importance from religious, natural, and moral motives. It is a postulate of the ethical belief in God as love. Reason leads to the same result; for reason which obtains throughout the creation requires the conception of the highest end, and, therefore, the passing from temporal becoming into eternal being. So, also, the ethical ideas of the true, good, and beautiful, lead to the same conclusion. These are ideals whose perfect realization involves immortality.

[The scientific argument for the probability of immortality has recently been presented with much force by Professors Tait and Balfour Stewart, in a volume entitled the Unseen Universe, published in London in 1875. They argue that immortality is the natural consequence of modern ideas of the conservation of force and the principle of continuity. The moral argument receives additional force when immortality is conceived of as the necessary perfection of society. All the reasons for the continued life of the individual are enhanced when taken up into the hope of social immortality, or the perfection of the kingdom of God.]
conditions, than secular property; finally, the principle of immunity was declared a divine ordination, and acknowledged as such, for instance, by the emperor Frederic II. in his Authentica (Pertz: Alm. 243). Some advantages were not gained, however, without contest with the secular powers; and the whole church organization began to weaken in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The victories of former days were sorely reversed. It was in vain that the Council of Trent (Sess. 25, c. 20) undertook to defend the principle of immunity, that the bull In censum Domini excommunicated any one who should infringe upon the immunities of the church, that Urban VIII. in 1626 established a special department of the curia as Congregatio Jurisdictionis et Ecclesiasticat. The absolute State was by its own principle compelled to destroy such privileges and particular rights, and the constitutional State followed in its track. While the syllabus of Dec. 8, 1684, still clings to the principle of ecclesiastical immunity as a divine ordination, the military laws of Germany and France (1871-73) grant only a partial exemption from military service to the clergy. [Sen. F. Chapelet, The immunitat ecclesiastique et monastique, Paris, 1878.] MEIJER.

IMPANATIO (from in and panis, "bread") denotes one of the many modifications of the doctrine of the real presence of the flesh and blood of Christ in the Eucharist, which arose in opposition to the doctrine of transubstantiation. Ruprecht of Deutz, who died in 1135, is the father of this idea. In his Comm. in Eoz., ii. 10 (Opera, i. p. 267, Cologne, 1602) he explains how God connects the real flesh and blood of Christ with the real bread and wine in the Eucharist, without disturbing the substance of either, just as in the womb of the Virgin, he connected the Word and the human nature without changing the character of the latter. The word impanatio, however, is first used by a contemporary of his, Alger of Liege, who died in 1131, and wrote against him, in defence of transubstantiation. In pane Christum impanatum, sicut Deum in carne personaliter incarnatum. In the period of the Reformation Carstadt accused Oslander of holding the view of impantation; and the same accusation was preferred by the Romanists in general against Luther, who denied it.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS (imposito manuum, χιτωνοια). This custom is as old as the race, and rests upon the significance of the human hand in the bodily organism and in social life. Thus we speak of the hand of peace, the hand of war, the helping, protecting, needy, cruel hand, and distinguish between laying hands on, laying hands upon, raising hands over, raising hands to a person. The biblical custom of laying on of hands rests upon the conception of the hand as the organ of mediation and of transference. So the priest laid his hand upon the head of the bullock or the goat to indicate that he had transferred him or the guilt of the partaker to the Lord (Lev. i. 4, iii. 2, viii. 14, xvi. 21, 24). The Old Testament imposition of hands can be divided into three stages,— the patriarchal (typical and beneficent), the prophecy of the continuance of the hereditary blessing (cf. Gen. xlviii. 14); the legal (symbolical and ordainable consecrating), an investiture of the authority of office, and promissive of the blessing attached (cf. Exod. xxix. 10; Num. xxvii. 18); and the prophetic (dynamic and healing), a miraculous power to heal and to restore life (cf. 2 Kings iv. 34). The New-Testament instances do not gainsay the Old Testament ones do only typically, and admit of a similar classification into the spiritual-patriarchal laying-on of hands by Christ and his apostles, the spiritual-legal and official by the Church, and the prophetical-healing, a New-Testament charisma, of a mysterious character. Our Lord healed at first by laying on of hands (Mark vi. 5; Luke iv. 41), but gradually passed over to the exclusive use of the word of power in order that he might not encourage the popular idea that there was a necessary connection between the laying-on of hands and the cure. He transferred his spirit to his disciples, when he raised his hands in blessing over them as he ascended (Luke xxiv. 50). This act, in connection with the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, is the source of the apostolic laying-on of hands. With the withdrawal of the miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost, ordination was developed as a legal and symbolical form out of the apostolic- official laying-on of hands. But in the Roman Church the latter continues as a practice, in connection with the consecrating of catechumens, the preparation for baptism, confirmation, and particularly ordination, where the laying-on of hands constitutes the specific visible sign of the sacrament. See Ordination. J. P. Lange.

IMPOSTORIBUS, De Tribus. In his encyclical (May 21-July 1, 1239) Gregory IX. accused Frederic II. of having said that the world had been deceived by three impostors, — Jesus, Moses, and Mohammed; that he who thought that God, the Creator of the world, could be born of a woman, was a fool; that nothing ought to be believed but that which is self-evident, or can be proved, etc. The emperor peremptorily denied ever to have used such expressions; but when we remember how well he liked to be called the precursor of the Antichrist, how infatuated he was by Arab philosophy, and how anticlerical was he by his whole atmosphere of the Hohenstaufen court, it seems not improbable that he may have entertained very sceptical views, though there is no direct proof. So much for the origin of the phrase. With respect to the book having this or a similar phrase for its title, there circulated in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the most singular and contradictory rumors concerning its date and author, and even concerning its contents; for the book itself seemed to have disappeared. See Gentile: De impostura religionum, Leipzig, 1833. The text edited by E. Weller in 1846, and again in 1876, is derived from a copy found in the Royal Library of Dresden, and dated 1598. But there must have been earlier editions, as the book is mentioned by Wilhelm Postel in 1568; and Campanella, who was accused of being its author, says that it was published thirty years before he was born, consequently in 1538. The contents of the book are sceptical throughout: even the ideas of the existence of God and the necessity of worshipping him are undermined. But the argumentation shows often a glaring lack of religious sense and theological knowledge, and has probably never led any one astray.

W. MöLLER.
IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION. 1068

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.

IMPUTATION.
and Eve merited guilt and depravity for their posterity, and in this trial they represented the whole human race."

This view was generally adopted among all the churches, Arminian as well as Reformed, and has prevailed almost universally until the appearance of the modern school of German speculative theologians. The "federal theology," as a method of exhibiting the whole plan of God's dealings with men in creation and redemption, under the forms of the two covenants of works and of grace, is generally attributed to Coccejus, professor in Leyden (d. 1669); but it is certain that this conception had taken hold of the British Reformed churches from the first. This is proved from the Method of the Christian Religion, compiled by Ussher in the second decade of the seventeenth century; from N. Bye's Principles, or the Pattern of Wholesome Words, first edition, 1618; from Treatise of the Covenant of Grace, by J. Ball, published 1645, after his death; and from the Mysterium et Medulla of Francis Roberts, London, 1657, a complete system of divinity on the method of covenants.

III. THE DOCTRINE OF THE IMPUTATION OF CHRIST'S RIGHTEOUSNESS TO HIS PEOPLE.

—As Adam's apostatizing act is the guilty ground of the condemnation, alienation, and consequent depravity of the race, so the obedience and sufferings of Christ in their stead is the meritorious ground of the justification, reconciliation, and consequent regeneration of the beneficiaries of his redemption. This has virtually been the faith of the historical church from the beginning; although, from the prevalent confusion of the ideas of justification and sanctification, the ground of justification in imputed righteousness was not explicitly set forth before the Reformation, yet it was in essence involved in what the better schoolmen (as Anselm and Thomas Aquinas, etc.) taught as to the nature of the atonement, as to the headship of Christ, and as to the distinction between satisfaction and merit (Summa, pt. iii. quæs. 48, 49). While the thought of Luther is fully expressed in the language of St. Bernard (Tract. c. err. Absalom, cap. vi. 15), the most evangelical of the schoolmen, "ut videlicet satisfactio unius omnibus imputetur, sicut omnium peccata unus illæ portavit." This doctrine, in its strictest definition, was the characteristic of all the Reformers, and of the confessions and classical theology which has proceeded from them (Cal. Soc. Aug. Conf. art. iii., iii. vi., etc.), the Council of Trent (Form. Concord. art. ii. 9, 17; Calvin's Institutes, bk. iii. chap. xi. § 2; Heidelberg Catechism, quaæ. 60; Westminster Confession, chap. xi.).

LIT.—In addition to the sources above cited, SCHAPP'S Credif of Christendom, and Doctrinal and Historical Exercitæ, in his edition of Lange's Commentary on Romans (pp. 191—197), Decretum Syn. Nation. Eccl. Ref. Gal. (1645), de imputatione, etc. (RIVET: Opp., tom. iii.); essays of Dr. C. Hodge, in the Biblical Repertory, July, 1836, July, 1837, and October, 1839; BERNHARD'S Commentary on Romans, caput xv.; De Pecato Hominum, Dr. GEORGE P. FISHER'S article on Imputation, in New-Englander, July, 1868; DR. WILLIAM CUN-
IN CENA DOMINI.

The burning of incense entered, as a symbolical act, very largely into the religious rituals of Judaism and Graeco-Roman Paganism. The Christian Church at first rejected the custom. See Tertullian: Apolog., 30; De cor. milit., 10; Athenagoras: Legat. pro Christ., 13; Arnobius: Adv. Gent., 7, 25. Later on, however, the Church adopted it. In the very minute descriptions of the administration of the Lord's Supper, in the Catecheses of Cyril and the Apostolical Constitutions, it is not mentioned. It occurs for the first time in the middle ages of the Frankish Church. See Capitul. i., 6, in Harduin: Conc. Coll., v. In the evangelical churches the custom was never adopted. See Frankincense. G. E. STRITZ.

INCEST means carnal intercourse between persons within the degrees of relationship forbidden by law. Canon law followed in this field in the track of the Roman law, though with various modifications. Thus it distinguishes between incestus juris divini and incestus juris humani; the former being an offence against the precepts of Lev. xvii. and xx., the latter an offence against the precepts of some other law. It furthermore distinguishes between the relation of kindred as to that of consanguinity, and it establishes an entirely new description of relationship by the so-called spiritual affinity, the effect of having been baptized or confirmed together. The incesta conjuctiones are specially treated by Concilium Aurelianense, iii. (539) c. 10, and Taurinum, ii. (567), c. 20. See also the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals (c. 4, C. III. q. 4; c. 2, C. XXXV. q. 2: c. 12, C. VI. q. 1). During the middle ages incest was cognizable only in the ecclesiastical courts, which had the power to annul incestuous marriages, and compel the offender to do penance.

MEITER.

INCHOER, Melchior, b. 1584, in Vienna, or, according to others, at Güns in Hungary; d. at Milan, Sept. 28, 1648; entered the Society of Jesus in 1607; taught philosophy and theology at Messina till 1636; lived for ten years in Rome. An intimate friend of Leo Allatius, and member of the Congregation of the Index; and was in 1646 appointed professor of the college of Mace- rata. Of his Epistola B. Mariae V. ad Messanenses veritas vindicata (1629), the first edition was put on the Index, and suppressed. In his Historia sacrae latinitatis (1635) he makes Latin the language of the blessed in the kingdom of heaven. In his Annales ecclesiastici regni Hungariae (1644) he has invented a bull to prove the dependence of Hungary on Rome. He was at one time considered the author of the remarkable satire on the Jesuits, Monarchia Solipsorum, which, however, Audin has proved to belong to some other.

IN CENA DOMINI, the famous bull fulminating curses and excommunications, not only over all heretics and those who in any way support them, but also over all who oppose or wrong the church by taxing the clergy, appealing to a general council, etc., contained in several copies, and was, with various modification, published every year on Holy Thursday or Easter Monday, from the fourteenth century till 1770, when Clement XIV. discontinued the publication from a regard to the temporal powers, which could not help feeling offended by the tone and spirit of that document.
INTEGRATION of ecclesiastical benefice means that some ecclesiastical corporation, for instance, a monastery, takes possession of the revenues, endeavoring to increase their revenues. But, as the Church was always connected with more or less glaring abuses, the councils tried to regulate the proceedings (see Conc. Trid. sess., 7, c. 7); and, when the monasteries and other ecclesiastical institutions were secularized, they ceased altogether.

INDEPENDENTS. See Congregationalism.

INDEX LIBRORUM PROHIBITORUM is a list of books which the Roman-Catholic Church forbids its members to read, under penalty of excommunication. As a formally established institution, the Index dates back only to the sixteenth century; but the practice of forbidding the reading of books antagonistic to the interests of the Church is very old. The books of Arius were condemned and burnt; and, in the course of the fifth century, condemnations, with accompanying conflagrations of books deemed heretical, became very common. A Council of Carthage (400) even went so far as to forbid the reading of pagan books. It was, however, not so much the purity of the doctrines which the Roman Church meant to defend by these proceedings, as her position as a power in the world. Consequently, when, by reading the Bible, people became aware of the huge discrepancy between the ideal and the actual church, the Bible itself was made a forbidden book; translations into the vernacular tongues were prohibited; and a Council of Toledo (1229) forbade laymen to have in their possession any of the books of the Old or New Testament. With the Reformation and the invention of the printing-press, the number of dangerous books attacking the Church, both her doctrines and her practices, increased in such a degree that a systematicatization of the old measures of prohibiting and forbidding became necessary; and in 1557 Paul IV. published in Rome the first official Index. In its eighteenth session the Council of Trent (1564) issued a new Index, generally known as Index Tridentinus. Sixtus V. finally organized a special congregation of the Index, which is still in operation, and which, besides the Index librorum prohibitorum, also prepares an Index librorum expurgandrorum; that is, a list of books which may be read after being expurgated, and freed from certain offensive passages. See Index librorum prohibitorum Rome, 1876; Reusch: Index d. verbotenen Bücher, Bonn, 1883–85, 2 vols.

INDEX OF RELIGIONS. See Brahmanism, Buddhism.

INDIA, or Hindustan, is one of the most extensive empires of the world, possesses an august history, and has given birth to the most prevalent religions of mankind, has preserved venerable works of literature and art, and for the last two generations has furnished the most violent opposition to, as well as enjoyed the most earnest labors of, Christian missionary endeavor.

COUNTRY. — India comprises an area of 1,474,000 square miles. Lying between the Himalayas on the north — the most sublime mountain peaks in the world, rising, at their highest elevation (Mount Everest), twenty-nine thousand feet above the sea — and the Bay of Bengal and the Indian Ocean on the south, it possesses a great variety of climate and scenery. The country, for the most part, is poorly watered; but the Brahmaputra and Ganges are two mighty rivers, the latter more than thirteen hundred miles in length. The present population is two hundred and forty millions, of whom a hundred and twenty thousand are Europeans. There are eighteen cities with a population of over one hundred thousand; and of these Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, and Lucknow are the largest.

PEOPLE. — The people are of mixed descent. The old aboriginal races, which inhabited the country before the time of Alexander the Great, still preserve their identity. The most ancient is the so-called Dravidian stock, which includes those speaking the Tamil, Telugu, Malayalam, etc. These natives are dusky in complexion. With them have been intermingled the conquering races from the north, the more noble Aryans (who have imposed their literature upon the country), and the Mahometans, coming from Persia, Arabia, and other Asiatic countries. The most recent intermixture has come from Europe, and more especially through the English, who approached India from the sea, and are now the dominant factor in Indian society, although insignificant in point of numbers. The population is divided, as to religion, amongst various forms of worship. Brahmanism, or Hinduism, is the most venerable in point of age, and goes back several centuries before the advent of Christ. Buddhism came next in point of time, threatened to efface the Brahman worship, but was itself almost exterminated by the revolt of the Brahmans. Then came Mahometanism, and finally Christianity, which is the youngest and last. See Buddhism and Brahmanism.

The people are divided as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Religion</th>
<th>Population</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Hindus</td>
<td>129,000,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mahometans</td>
<td>40,000,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Buddhists</td>
<td>15,000,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sikhs</td>
<td>1,000,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Christians</td>
<td>200,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The people speak nearly a hundred languages, of which the principal are the Hindustani (and Hindi, which is, strictly speaking, the proper term for the modern dialect), Bengali, Maharatta, Telugu, Tapi, Punjabi.

HISTORY. — The history of India reaches far back into dim antiquity, and has its chief interest to us as a history of invasions and the domination, in turn, of the foreign invaders over the native populations. Alexander the Great crossed the Indus in 327 B.C., but was forced, by the discontent of his troops, to forego the ambition of waving his victorious sword over the peninsula. In 604 the first invasion of the followers of Mahomet occurred. They were repelled, but returned in greater force in 711, and subdued the Hindus of Sindh, but were driven back again. The great Mahometan invasion is connected with the famous name of Sultan Mahmud of Ghazni (997-1030), fourteen of whose descendants sat on the throne of India. The name of that fierce warrior Timur (Tamerlane) also has a place in Indian history. He was crowned at Delhi in 1398. Of Indian sovereigns, the greatest has been Akbar the Great, whose reign lasted from 1556 to 1605. He ruled over a large part of India, and his name is famous as that of a conqueror and an administrator.

The connection of modern Europe with India dates from the latter part of the fifteenth century. The history of the land is closely connected with the Portuguese, Dutch, and English, and also, to some extent, with the French. Columbus, when he set sail from Europe in 1492, steered his vessels, as he thought, towards India, or the East Indies as the country was then called. In 1498 Vasco da Gama cast anchor off the Indian city of Calicut, and the Portuguese at once began to establish trading-posts, and continued to have a monopoly of the trade during the whole of the sixteenth century. In 1509 the Portuguese governor, Albuquerque, seized Goa, which has ever since been the capital of the Portuguese possessions in India. The avowed object of the Portuguese was to promote the spread of Christianity, and conquer the land. They retain control of only a thousand and eighty-six square miles, with a population of four hundred thousand. In 1602 the Dutch East India Company was organized. The Dutch were the first to disturb the undisputed possession of the Portuguese. During the sixteenth century, vessels from Holland had traded with Indian ports; and, in the first half of the seventeenth, the Dutch rapidly extended their possessions, expelling the Portuguese before them.

The first foundation of British empire in India was laid by the English East-India Company, which received a charter in 1600 from Queen Elizabeth. Its capital stock amounted then only to the modest sum of seventy thousand pounds. The wealth of this corporation was with its wealth. Lord Clive and Warren Hastings may be said to have been the architects of the British empire in India, which is usually dated from the battle of Plassey (June 23, 1757), in which Clive won a decisive victory. The influence of the Portuguese, Dutch, and French, henceforth waned before the dominant power of the English. He was appointed, in 1758, first governor of all the company's settlements in Bengal; and, after a visit to England, he filled the office for a second time,—from 1695 to 1697. Warren Hastings arrived in India in 1772, and organized the administrative government of the empire which Clive had founded. From that time on, till the present, the British dominions in India have been extending, until, at the present time, there are eight provinces under the administration of England, stretching from the waters of Cape Comorin to the shadows of the Himalayas. From British possessions in India were seriously threatened only once (in 1857), by the Indian mutiny, which, spreading from an apparently insignificant cause, but really rooted in the aversion to the rulers, spread rapidly among the people, and entailed a series of quick and thrilling horrors upon the English residents. Until 1858 the East India Company, under various restrictions, exercised supreme sway over India, its power culminating in the “governor-general in council.” In this year it was abolished, and India was placed under the immediate administration of the English Government. Its principal officer is called “viceroy,” and a secretary for India sits in the cabinet. The Earl of Ripon has been viceroy since 1880. On Jan. 1, 1877, the Queen of England was proclaimed Empress of India.

During the century great changes have been effected in the condition of the population of India. It is not possible to separate these reforms from the direct influence of the missionaries. But there have been distinguished Christian governors-general of India, such as Lord Bentinck (1828-35), the Earl of Dalhousie (1846-56), and others, whose enlightened statesmanship has effected permanent and most salutary reforms in the administration of the courts, the abolition of revolting social customs, the promotion of education, and the extension of commercial benefits, such as the construction of railways, of which there were 8,215 miles in operation in 1873. To Lord Bentinck is due the honor of having suppressed the sullies, or the practice of burning widows alive on the graves of their husbands. In 1817 no less than seven hundred widows were committed to the flames in Bengal alone. By the decree of 1829 all who abetted sullies were declared guilty of “culpable homicide.” It was this same enlightened administrator who suppressed the Thugs, a large and secret association of assassins, who spread terror through the land. To the government are also due measures for the suppression of infanticide, which once was practised to an enormous extent; female infants being particularly chosen as the victims.

Christian Missions. — India has been the chief seat of missionary endeavor for the last two generations. Nearly all the missionary organizations of Europe and America have made it a basis of operations; and with it will always be associated some of the most illustrious pages of modern missions,—Ziegelnabl, Schwartz, Henry Martyn, Carey, Marshman, Reginald Heber, and others. There Christianity was struggling through trials and discouragements, while the islands of the South Seas were rapidly emerging from darkness into the light. But, although the results were slow in showing themselves, the recent current towards Christianity has been strong, and has surpassed the most sanguine expectations. Although the proportion of Christians to the whole population is still small (one-half of one per cent), it must be remembered that the influence of the gospel cannot be accurately measured by numbers. Christian influences are, by the testimony of all parties, gradually undermining superstitious practices, and working a reform in the social life. "Missions," said Lord Lawrence, "have done more to benefit India than all other agencies combined." Sir Bartle Frere said, "Missions have worked changes more extraordinary for India than any thing witnessed in modern Europe." Other testimonies from civilians, to same import, might be added if necessary. An ancient tradition represents that St. Thomas planted Christianity in India. We come to solid ground when Francis Xavier (d. 1552) was sent out as a missionary by the king of Portugal. In 1545, Goa was made the first (Catholic) bishopric of India. One of the professed objects of the Portuguese occupation of India was the spread of the gospel. After various vicissitudes, Roman Catholicism continues to flourish; but its influence in elevating the tone of the moral and social life of the people is hardly perceptible. The earliest Protestant mission to India was founded by Frederick IV. of Denmark in 1705; and in 1708 Ziegenbalg arrived at Tranquebar, and began his devoted labors. The translation of the Scriptures into Tamil was begun by him. This Danish mission passed, in 1804, over to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. In 1751 Christian Friedrich Schwartz (venerabiliter praelaturn nomen), having been ordained at Copenhagen, arrived at the mission. He died in 1798, but had lived long enough to win the confidence of the people, and to secure for his name an undying fame. At the present time, thirty-five Protestant societies have missionaries in India. There are six hundred and eighty-nine ordained European and American ministers, two hundred and forty-four of whom are from England. It will be possible here only to give a brief account of the labors of the principal of these societies, and we shall arrange them according to the date of their beginning operations.

The English Baptist Missionary Society began its work in India in 1793, when William Carey arrived (Nov. 7) in Bengal. He established himself thirty miles from Calcutta; then at Mudahatty, two hundred and sixty miles north of Calcutta, where he opened a school (1798), and put up a printing-press; and finally at Serampore, which became a distinguished centre of light for all India, and from whose printing-presses issued translations of the Scriptures into many of the languages of the land. In 1799 this mission was re-enforced by those devoted laborers, Ward and Marshman. In 1800 the first part of the New Testament had been translated into Bengalee; and on Feb. 7, 1801, the entire New Testament was completed. Carey died June 9, 1834. His example, heroism, and missionary devotion will ever stamp him as one of the apostles of India. Statistics of 1881: English missionaries, 37; evangelists, 121; native communicants, 3,467; day schools, 104; scholars, 2,225.

The London Missionary Society sent three missionaries to India in 1804, who established themselves at Vizagapatam, five hundred and fifty miles south-west of Calcutta. In 1819 its agents had translated the whole New Testament into the Telugu language. In 1809 the first printing-press in Bombay, and at once set to work to translate and print the New Testament. In 1818 there were eleven schools under the care of the Board, with an attendance of six hundred scholars. On May 12, 1823, the chapel was dedicated in Madras, the first Christian temple on the western side of the Indian peninsula. In 1821 Newell died, Hall following him in 1826. In 1831 occurred the first Christian marriage of a Brahman. The missionaries established a native temperance society in 1822, binding its members to abstain from strong drink, opium, and tobacco. In 1899 there was strong opposition against the missionaries on account of their success; and a legal process was instituted to force them to abstain from the work of making converts, but in vain. In 1843 the opposition took the form of printing native books and papers at Bombay, and refuting Christianity from the writings of Paine, Voltaire, and other infidels and authors. The translation of the entire Scriptures into Maratthu was completed in 1847, the New Testament having been finished in 1826. The American Board has two centres of missions in India Proper,—Maratha in Western India, and Madura in Southern India; and in 1881 employed 52 missionaries and assistant missionaries, and 583 native helpers. Its churches had 3,981 members, and 5,699 scholars in its schools. In Ceylon it employs 18 missionaries, 172 native helpers, and has 972 church-members, and 8,898 scholars.

The Church Missionary Society (English) began its labors in India at Agra in 1813, and at Madras in 1815. It had encouraged the Danish missions before. It directed its efforts at the first mainly to Tranquebar and Tinnevelly. In 1853 it had 5,815 communicants, and 17,000 scholars in its schools. Statistics of 1882: 103 European and 121 native missionaries, 2840 communicants, 1,157 schools with 32,853 boys and 11,452 girl scholars. In Ceylon it employs 18 European and 14 native missionaries, and has 1,836 communicants.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (English) began its Indian mission in 1818, at Calcutta. In 1823 it had 48 missions, with 166 assistants, 4,629 communicants, and 5,500 scholars. Its missions in the Punjab and Sind in Northern India are making rapid progress. Since 1877 the accessions of this society in Tinnevelly alone amount to 20,000, and it has 90,000 adherents in that district. These two societies of the Church of England have the largest number of adherents in India. The Church of England has at present four Indian episcopal sees,—Calcutta (Metropolitan), Bombay, Madras, and Lahore, with six bishops. Drs. Sargent and Caldwell being the metropolitan.

The Wesleyan Missionary Society (English) began its work, through the Rev. Mr. Lynch, in Madras, in 1817. In 1830 the number of missionaries was nine, and of schools twenty-five. Mysore and Calcutta have been their two most important strategic centres. In the latter place their schools are in a very prosperous condition. The society in 1881 had 100 missionaries in India, INDIA.

129 schools, 9,148 scholars, 1,497 communicants, and 3,851 communicants in Ceylon.

The Church of Scotland sent out its first missionary to India in 1829, in the person of Dr. Duff, who arrived in Calcutta in 1830. During his long and eminently useful career he secured the respect of all classes; and his eloquent voice on his visits to Scotland and the United States aroused the deepest interest in the cause of missions. He established a collegiate institute in Calcutta, which has been attended by hundreds of Hindus. Dr. John Wilson, about the same time, inaugurated the work of the Church of Scotland at Bombay. The disruption of 1843 in the Scotch Church led to a division of the work in India; and both the Established and Free churches support their own missionary force. Narayan Sheshadri, the converted Brahman who translated, in 1840, into the Punjabi, the language of the Sikhs. The mission has been very successful. In 1842 three presbyteries were constituted,—Lodiana, Furrukhabad, and Allahabad; and in 1845 the first meeting of the synod of Northern India convened at Futteghur. Kola-poor is now a fourth centre of missionary operations. According to the report of 1882, the mission has 5,870 boys and 2,312 girls in its schools, and carries on its work through 50 American, 15 native preachers, and 2 American female, and 171 native lay missionaries. The number of communicants connected with the mission is 1,019, and its annual expenditure $102,982.

The Basel Missionary Society opened a mission on the west coast of India in 1834. In 1850 it had 28 missionaries and the same number of native assistants, with 49 communicants. It now has 1,100 communicants.

The American Baptist Mission was begun in 1835; is interested more especially in the Telugus, of whom there are 15,000,000, whose district lies on the eastern coast, and stretches nearly eight hundred miles, between the northern borders of the Carnatic to Orissa. In 1854 this society had one station, two missionaries, nine communicants, and two schools, with sixty-three pupils. The history of this mission is one of the most inspiring single episodes in recent church history. Twenty-seven years ago it was proposed, at the anniversary meeting of the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society in Albany, to abandon the mission among the Telugus as a hopeless enterprise. It was called the "Lone Star Mission." After a protracted discussion, it was decided to continue the work; and a hymn which Dr. F. S. Smith had written to compose was read, containing the verse which now seems like a prophecy:

"Shine on, 'Lone Star!' the day draws near
When none shall shine more fair than thou:
With glitter on Immanuel's brow."

In 1879 a remarkable movement took place among the people, which would have justified even more patently the mission's persevering efforts. 8,691 were baptized in Nellore in two months, and 2,222 in a single day. Statistics of 1882: American missionaries, 29; native, 94; communicants, 18,992.

The Missionary Society of the Methodists-Episcopal Church (American) began operations in Northern India in 1836, in South India in 1872. The North India Conference was organized in 1866, and consists of the Rohilkund, Oudh, and Kumaon districts. According to the report of 1882, the Conference employs 21 foreign missionaries and 16 assistants, has 19 ordained native preachers and 69 unordained native preachers, with 1,918 church-members and 1,307 probationers. Its day schools number 242, with an attendance of 8,500 scholars. The Conference of South India was organized in 1876, and is composed of four districts,—Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, and Allahabad. In 1881 it employed 27 foreign missionaries and 38 native preachers. The total number of communicants was 1,253, and of probationers 726. It carries on 14 day schools, with an attendance of 600.

The Gossner (1838), Berlin (1843), and Leipzig (1835) societies also carry on an important work in India. The Quakers (four missions), General Baptists (1827), Freewill Baptists (1836), Irish Presbyterians (1841), American Lutherans, Moravians, Scotch and American United Presbyterians, the Reformed Church in America, and other denominations, have also maintained missions in India. Turning away from the missionary agencies, it remains to present a general view of the difficulties of missionary effort in India, and the results which have been secured.

The first missionaries to India not only had the opposition from the native population to contend against, but also the hostility of the East-India Company, which at one time absolutely forbade all missionary effort, prohibited Judson and other missionaries from laboring at Calcutta, and for many years greatly restricted the freedom of the missionaries. But in 1813 a resolution by the English Parliament was passed, by which the Company was forced to accord to all British subjects the right to establish schools and missions in India; and in 1833, at the renewal of its charter, full liberty of missionary operations was granted, and the privilege accorded to foreigners to settle in India. These privileges were immediately taken advantage of by several American societies. For the character of the religions which the natives of India profess, it must suffice to refer the reader to the arts. BRAHMANISM, BUDDHISM, and MOHAMMEDANISM.

One of the peculiar obstacles, as well as one of the most serious ones, to the success of missions in India, has been the system of caste. By it the people are divided into classes, of which the Brahman is the highest. These classes are fixed; and the dignity of the one, and the degradation of the other, pass down from generation to generation unalterably. Opposed to one of the fundamental ideas of the New Testament, that "God is no respecter of persons," the missionaries have almost unanimously and uniformly refused to acknowledge any such distinction among the converts. But this principle is deeply rooted in the Brahman's mind. "It is difficult for us Europeans," said Professor Monier Williams of Oxford, in 1879, "to understand how the pride of caste as a divine ordinance interpenetrates the whole being of a Hindu. He looks upon caste as his veritable god; and those caste-rules which we believe to be a hindrance to his adoption of the true religion, are to him the very essence of his religious life and conduct." Henry Martyn said, "If I ever see a Hindu Brahman converted to Jesus Christ, I shall see something more nearly approaching the resurrection of a dead body than any thing I have ever yet seen." Up to the year 1849 converts were subjected, not only to exclusion from the society of the caste, but to confiscations of property. But in that year a law was established, giving equal rights to all subjects, and protecting converts against confiscations. Not a few Brahmins are active and influential Christians; but the great mass of the converts have been, as was to be expected, from the lower castes. The other obstacles to missionary progress have been of the same general character as those met with in other lands.

The progress of the gospel in India for the first fifty years was slow, when we look at the number of native baptisms; but within the whole period remarkable changes have been effected in the habits of thought and social condition of the people; and, within the last few years, evidence has been furnished, in the large accessions to the churches, that the patient and faithful labors of the missionaries had been laying deep and permanent foundations. In 1851 there were 17,000 baptized and 128,000 native nominal Christians in India, with 357 foreign missionaries. In 1861 the number had increased to 48,000 baptized and 213,000 nominal Christians; in 1871, to 78,000 baptized and 318,000 nominal Christians. In 1892 there were not less than 600,000 or 800,000 nominal Christians, with 689 foreign missionaries, and many self-supporting native churches. The additions to the churches within the last twenty-five years have been exceedingly numerous. The great famine which prevailed in 1879, and which, according to the London Times, carried off 3,000,000 in the province of Madras alone, afforded an occasion for the display of Christian charity. The bountiful distributions of aid won the hearts of the natives, who flocked to the churches; and 16,000 were added in Tinnevelly alone. In this period (1877-79) the number of converts under the care of the five Lutheran societies rose from 3,000 to 42,000. The ten Presbyterian missions of Scotland, Ireland, America, and England, from 1850 to 1878, increased their native constituency from 800 to 10,000; the London Missionary Society, from 20,000 to 48,000; and the Church Missionary Society and Propagation Society, from 81,000 to 164,000 (Christlieb: Foreign Missions, p. 155). The early progress was amidst discouragements, but the recent accretions more than atone for them. In 1850 there were four baptized converts among the Kohls; and for five years six German missionaries (Gossner Society) had labored among them with only one convert, and five of their own number falling at their post. There are now at least 4,000 baptized converts under the care of the English and German societies. The London and Propagation Societies labored for three years at Cuddapah in the Telugu district, with only 200 converts; and now they have 11,000. These, with the case of the American Telugu mission above referred to, are but illustrations of the discouragements and encouragements of the work.

The benedict influence of missions is apparent in the abolition of superstitious and cruel customs, the increase of intelligence, the diffusion of a literature in almost all the native languages, and in a general leavening process, which has affected a large part of the Indian society of the upper classes. In the work of suppressing superstitious and cruel customs, the government has done much; but even this activity can be clearly traced to the influence of missions in India. The abolition of the sutee by Lord Bentinck has already been referred to; and to this same class of reforms belong the suppression of the annual holocausts under Juggernaut's car, and the practice of infanticide, and the throwing of infants into the Ganges, as a religious service. On the other hand, the change which is slowly taking place in the position of women is due entirely to the missionaries, especially to the efforts of female missionaries. These gain admittance to the seclusion of the zenanas, and give instruction to the superstitious and unfortunate women of India. The government does not directly give the weight of its influence on the side of missions; but, rather, on the contrary, it impedes the progress of the gospel by the rigid exclusion of religious instruction from the government schools. The printing-press has been introduced by missionary enterprise into almost every large centre of influence. The first newspaper established was the Sambodchar Durpun at Serampore, in 1818, by the Baptist mission. Not only have the papers under the control of the missionaries and the English multiplied greatly, but a native periodical literature has been grown up, which owes its origin to a feeling of the necessity of combating Christianity in this way. The Bible has been translated entire into many of the languages, and ponderous libraries have already been printed in them.

The promotion of education as a means of reaching the people has been vigorously pushed. It may be a fair question whether the missionaries have not devoted relatively too much time to the schoolroom. Be that as it may, however, there is to-day a cordon of schools in the cities and larger towns of the Indian Empire. The government now conducts an extensive plan of education; but it got the impetus from the large advantages which it was apparent were accruing from the mission schools (art. India in Encyc. Britan.). In 1854 it established universities in Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay. The government schools are divorced from religion. The mission schools directly or indirectly teach the gospel. The education of women has progressed slowly. In 1861 there were 60,600 boys and 16,088 girls in the mission schools of India. In 1871 the numbers had risen to 95,500 boys and 26,600 girls. The writer in the Encyclopaedia Britannica (p. 775), above referred to, says, "In a few exceptional places, e.g. Tinnevelly, Madras, and the hills of Assam, female education has a real existence; for in these places the missionaries have
INDULGENCES

The power of Christian missions in India has been further demonstrated by the new religious movements which have been begun to check its progress, or at any rate to find a mean between the superstitious of the native religions and the supernatural element of Christianity. The Brahmo Somaj (see art.) inaugurated by Keshub Chunder Sen is the principal of this class. These movements betray the unrest of the people, their growing discontent with their native religions, and longing for something purer and more rational to supply their place, and to counteract the advance of Christianity. But as Dr. Christlieb (p. 183) says, "The Hindus themselves feel and know that they entail on their faith an inevitable dissolution. The dissolution of the Brahmo Somaj has already begun; and Keshub Chunder Sen was obliged long ago to acknowledge that 'native society is being roused, enlightened, and reformed under the influence of Christianity.'" In a public speech at Calcutta he has said, "Our hearts are touched, conquered, overcome, by a higher power; and this power is Christ. Christ, not the British Government, rules India. No one but Christ has deserved the precious diadem of the Indian crown, and he will have it." These words of this remarkable man may be regarded as prophetic of the issue of the movement which was begun by Schwartz, Carey, and Martyn. Christianity—which rings the death-knell to caste, suppresses infanticide, abolishes child-marriages, takes woman out of the degrading seclusion of the zenana, promotes culture, and builds up homes—has commenced itself as the power for the regeneration of the land by the testimony of English civilians and native scholars, as well as in its fruits in the changed lives of its converts, and will prevail.

Lit.—See reports of the various missionary societies now in India. Among works illustrative of the subject may be mentioned Elphinstone: History of India, fifth edition, 1866; Heber: Journey through India, 2 vols., 1828; Sherring: Hindu Tribes and Castes, Protestant Missions in India from 1706 to 1871, London, 1875; Anderson: History of the Missions of the A. B. C. F. M. in India, Boston, 1874; Mullen: London and Calcutta compared in their Heathenism, Privileges, and Prospects, Lond., 1869; Miss Britton: A Woman's Talks about India, Phila., 1880; Bainbridge: Around the World Tour of Christian Missions, Boston, 1882; Godfrey: England on India Subjects, 2 vols., London, 1880; Williams: Religious Life and Thought in India, Lond., 1882; and the Lives of Schwartz, Martyn, Carey, Heber, Marshman, Duff, and Lit. under Brahmanism, Buddhism. D. S. Schaff:

INDIANS. North-American. See Appendix.

INDUCTION, See Appendix.

INDUCTION denotes, as the term is used in the Church of England, the formal installation, in accordance with the mandate of the bishop, of a cleric, already instituted, in possession of a benefice. The act is generally performed by the deacon, who accompanies the cleric to the church, places his hand on the key of the ring of the church-door, and says to him, "By virtue of this mandate I do induct you into the real, actual, and corporal possessions of this church of Christ, with all the rights, profits, and appurtenances thereto belonging." The clerk then opens the door, enters the church, and tolls a bell, to make his induction known to the parishioners, after which the indorser inducts the certificate of induction on the mandate of the bishop.

INDULGENCES (Indulgentia), an institution peculiar to the Roman Church, originated from confession. In order to make the absolution effective, the sacrament of confession must comprise, besides contritio cordis and confessio oris, also satisfacio: and this satisfaction consists chiefly in so-called good works,—penances, by which the wrongs done are paid for. In the old church the amount of satisfacio was measured by the time alone during which the state of penitence should last. But gradually the custom grew up of substituting specific good works. See Alexander Hale: Summa, p. 4, Quest. 23, Art. 2, Number 5; and Thomas Aquinas: Summa Supplementum, p. 3, Quest. 25, C. 28 X.

As a reminiscence of the discipline of the ancient Church, indulgences are still granted for days, months, and years. They are either complete (indulgentia plenaria) or partial (indulgentia minuta plena): either general, for the whole church; or particular, for a special dioceae. The most general indulgence granted by the Roman Church is that of her jubilee. The whole department of indulgence has been subjected to a special congregation of cardinals; but the Questions Elencticorum, or travelling agents, have been abolished.
INFALLIBILITIES.

The sale of indulgences in Germany, by Tetzel, which first roused the indignation of Luther, opened the Reformation. See Luther, Tetzel, 1521. The day before the vote was taken, in a secret session (July 18, 1870), six hundred and one members being present, four hundred and fifty-one bishops voted in the affirmative (placet), eighty-eight in the negative (non placet), sixty-two voted with a qualification (placet juxta modum), and over eighty, though present in Rome, abstained from voting. On the evening of the same day the majority, which included the ablest and most influential prelates (as Darboy of Paris, Schwarzberg of Prague, Rauscher of Vienna, Dulanlou of Orleans, Forster of Breslau, Ketteler of Mayence, Strossmayer of Bosnia, Hefele of Rottenburg, Kenrick of St. Louis), sent a deputation to the Pope, and begged him on their knees to modify the proposed decree, and to make some concession for the peace and unity of the Church. But Pius IX. surprised the deputation with the assurance that the Church had always believed in the unconditional infallibility of the Pope ("I am the tradition"). In the secret session of July 18, on motion of some Spanish bishop, an addition was inserted, declaring the Pope infallible before and without the consent of the Church (non autem ex consensu ecclesiae). On the 17th of July, fifty-six bishops, opposed to the dogma, sent a written protest to the Pope, declaring their firm adherence to their conviction, but also their reluctance to vote against him on a matter affecting him personally, and asking leave to return home. On the evening of the same day, the signers of this protest, and sixty additional members of the opposition, left Rome (taking advantage of the rumors of war), and thus saved the day to the majority. In the public session, held July 18, there were but five hundred and thirty-five members present, and all voted placet except two (Bishop Riccio of Sicily, and Bishop Fitzgerald of Little Rock, Ark., who dared to protest against the Big Rock of Rome); but these two changed their vote before the close of the session. After the vote, the Pope, amidst a fearful thunderstorm and flashes of lightning, read by candlelight, in St. Peter's Cathedral, the decree of his own infallibility. The day after, Napoleon III., his chief political support, declared war against Germany. This war in a few weeks swept away both his throne and that of the Pope, and resulted in the unification of Italy, with Rome for its capital, and the establishment of the German Empire under the lead of Protestant Prussia. The proclamation of this new dogma is the cause of the separation of the "Old Catholics," who upheld the primacy of the See of Dillingen (heretofore the pride of the Roman Church in Germany) and other eminent Catholic scholars. It is also the cause of the renewal of the serious conflict between the Pope and the Emperor (the Culturkampf, the Palk Laws, Bismarck's refusal to go to Canossa), and of a similar conflict between the Pope and the French Republic, which arose on the ruins of the empire.
The Vatican dogma is the apex of the pyramid of the Roman hierarchy. Logically it is more consistent than the Gallican theory, as an absolute monarchy is more consistent than a constitutional monarchy. It teaches an unbroken and ever-active infallibility; while Gallicanism secures only a periodical and intermittent infallibility, which never reveals itself except in an ecumenical council. But neither theory can stand the test of history, and is a mere pretension. The sixth ecumenical council (held in Constantinople 680) condemned and excommunicated Pope Honorius I. (625-638) "as a heretic (Monothelete), who, with the help of the old serpent, had scattered deadly error." This anathema was solemnly repeated by the seventh and by the eighth ecumenical councils (787 and 869), and even by the popes themselves, who, down to the eleventh century, in a solemn oath at their accession, in- dorsed the sixth ecumenical council, and pronounced "an eternal anathema" on the authors of the Monothelite heresy, together with Pope Honorius, "because he had given aid and comfort to the perverse doctrines of the heretics." This papal oath was probably prescribed by Gregory II. at the beginning of the eighth century, and was found in the Liber diurnus and Liber pontificalis down to the eleventh century. Even the editions of the Roman Breviary, before the sixteenth century, reiterated the charge of heresy against Honorius. Pope Leo II. strongly confirmed the decree of his predecessor Honorius, and denounced him as one who "endeavored by profane treason to overthrow the immaculate faith of the Roman Church" (qui hanc apostolicum ecclesiam non apostolice traditionis doctrina lustravit, sed profana proditione immaculatam fidelis subvertere conatus est). See Mansi, Concilia, Tom. XI. p. 731. Now, either the council, or the Pope, or both, must have erred. The stubborn case of Honorius, which alone is sufficient to upset the dogma (for si falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus), was strongly urged before the passage of the decree by learned members of the council, as Bishop Hefele and Kenrick; and their arguments have never been refuted. But a dogma triumphed over history. If facts are against opinion (it was said by the infallibilists), all the worse for the facts. History knows of other heretical popes. Zephyrinus (201-219) and Callistas (219-226) were Patiripassians; Liberius (358) signed an Arian creed, and condemned Athanasius, "the father of orthodoxy," who mentions the fact with indignation; Felix II. was a decided Arian; Zosimus (417) at first indorsed the heresy of Pelagius and Caeslius, whom his predecessor, Innocent I., had condemned; Vigiliius (538-555) vacillated between two opposite decisions during the Three Chapter Controversy, and thereby produced a long schism in the West; John XXII. (d 1334) denounced a certain opinion of Nicholas III. and Clement V. as heretical; several popes taught the universal depravity of men in a manner that clearly includes the Virgin Mary, and is irreconcilable with the recent dogma of the immaculate conception; Sixtus V. issued an edition of the Latin Bible with innumerable blunders, partly of his own making, and declared it "the only true authentic text." Bellarmin, the great Roman controversialist, and infallibilist, could not deny the facts, and advised the printing of a new edition with the bold statement in the preface, charging the errors of the infallible Pope upon the fallible printer, though the Pope had himself corrected the proofs. Pius IX., who proclaimed his own infallibility, started out as a political reformer, and advocate of Italian unity, but afterwards detested and condemned it as the worst enemy of Christianity. But since 1870 Gallicanism is dead, and the Roman Church must sink or swim with an infallible pope.

INFANT BAPTISM. See Baptism of Infants.

INFANT COMMUNION, or the dispensing of the elements to actual babes and to very young children. The first trace of this custom is found in Cyprian (third century), who, in his treatise On the Lapsed, represents infants as saying, on the day of judgment, "We have not forsaken the Lord's bread and cup" (De lapsis, c. i.). In the same book he tells a striking story, how an infant refused the cup, and, when the deacon forced it down her throat, she was seized with vomiting. The explanation was, that the child, unknown to her parents, had previously, while under the care of her nurse, eaten bread soaked in wine which had been poured out at an idolatrous ceremony (De lapsis, c. xxv.). The custom of infant communion was indeed assimilated universal at that time; communion followed baptism. The so-called Liturgy of St. Clement, in the Constit. Apost., viii. 18, prescribes, in the order of communicants, the place of the little children (μωροί). Augustine (fifth century) uses this language: “They are infants; but they are most earnestly required that they may have life in themselves (Serm. 74, § 7). Again: he argues, that, if infants were not born in sin, Christ’s words, “Except ye eat the flesh,” etc. (John vi. 63), would not be true of them (Contra duas epp. Pelag. i. xxii. § 40). The practice is also proved by regulations respecting its execution: e.g. Geminus of Marseilles (495), in his De Eccl. dogm., c. 22. The sixth canon of the Council of Macon (585) decrees that the remainders of the consecrated bread, moistened with wine, be distributed every Wednesday or Friday to innocent children, who must receive it fasting. If the bishop be not present, let him be communicated by the presbyter” (Liturgia Rom. Vel., Murat., Tom. ii. col. 158).

One of the most striking proofs is in can. 14 of the Council of Toledo (675), which, “after men received free instruction in some useful arts, and shortly after transformed into a regular order of the Church by Pope Clement X. The novitiate lasts three years; and the novice, when entering the order, takes the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. They wear a dark-brown dress with a white hood.

INFANT SALVATION, or the salvation of those who die in infancy. The doctrines of infant damnation and of non-elect infants were unknown to the early Church. The fact that the baptism of infants was so commonly postponed to Easter Week proves that it was even not considered any loss to the child to die unbaptized. But, as sacerdotal and ecclesiastical ideas spread in the Church, baptism was more and more emphasized, until Gregory of Nazianzus and Ambrose (fourth century) could say that unbaptized children could not be saved. The first, however, argued, that since they had suffered, and not caused, the loss of baptism, the righteous Judge would not punish them; and Ambrose, while claiming that there could be no exception made for them on account of their infancy, yet thought they would be free from pain. It was left to Augustine to teach the damnation of infants. But their sufferings, though eternal, are bearable, being of the mildest character (De pecc. meriti, i. c. xvi.). He also opposed the idea of an intermediate state in which these infants were. Pelagius, whom Augustine so vigorously opposed, expressed no decided opinion upon this point, but said, “Whither they may not go, I know: whither they may go, I do not know.” Their punishment must, he thought, be of the mildest sort, since they had not committed any actual transgression, and had no original sin: indeed, he was ready to confess it seemed to him doubtful whether they were punished at all. The Roman Church, accepting Augustine’s conceptions of the necessity of baptism to salvation, and of the mildness of the punishment of those infants who died unbaptized, agreed with him that they were sent to hell, and assigned to them a separate place in it, the limbus infantum, or puérorum. (See Thomas Aquinas’s Sum. Thes., Vol. ii. col. lxii. 2; Suppl., q. lxxi. 7; also Dante: Inferno, canto iv.). There is, however, a difference of opinion in this Church as to the character of their sufferings, whether it is actual ( pena sensus), or only a deprivation of the vision of God (perpetua cœsionis Dei). The Council of Trent, in its twenty-first session, declared that infants who died unbaptized, and the Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians, and Maronites, persist in this practice, using generally only the wine, and giving it either by a spoon or by the finger. All Protestant churches unite in rejecting infant communion.

SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

INFANT JESUS, The Congregation of the Daughters of the, was founded in Rome, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, by Anna Moroni, as an institution in which poor girls received free instruction in some useful arts. The order, takes the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. They wear a dark-brown dress with a white hood.

INFANT COMMUNION. INFANT SALVATION.
former held that these lost infants were in a dark subterranean region without fire; the latter, that they were above the earth and in the light. Others spoke yet more cheerfully of their condition, supposing them to be occupied with much happiness as the are capable of. Perrone says,—

"That infants who are to be saved (as, for instance, by baptism) are saved by being held in a condition of pure nature. And, further, Roman-Catholic theologians teach that the desire for baptism, even on the part of unborn children, is accepted for the baptism itself: therefore, there need be no fears for children of Christians who die in infancy."

The first one to enter the lists against the Roman theory of the necessity of baptism to infant salvation was Zwingli. He taught that infants dying in infancy were elect, since theireal death is a token of God's peculiar mercy, and therefore of their salvation. Luther, on the other hand, taught the necessity of baptism to salvation; and, since then, some theol ogians have followed him. Perrone represents, probably, the prevalent view when he says:—

"The grace promised [in baptism] is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred, by the Holy Ghost, to such (whether of age or infants) as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in his appointed time."—First Head of Doctrine, art. XVII.

And the Westminster Confession:—

"As to infants, they seem to perish, not by their own fault, but by the fault of another. But there is a double solution. Though sin does not yet appear in them, yet it is latent; for they bear corruption shut up in the soul, so that before God they are damnable."—Institut., iv., xvi. 17.

We find this doctrine of infant salvation through election expressed in the Calvinistic symbols. The Canons of the Synod of Dort (1619) declare:—

"Since we are to judge of the will of God from his word (which testifies that the children of believers are holy, not by nature, but in virtue of the covenant of grace, in which they, together with the parents, are comprehended), godly parents have no reason to doubt of the election and salvation of their children whom it pleaseth God to call out of this life in their infancy."—First Head of Doctrine, art. XVII.

And the Westminster Confession:—

"The grace promised [in baptism] is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred, by the Holy Ghost, to such (whether of age or infants) as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in his appointed time."—XXVIII., vi.

And

"Elect infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ, through the Spirit, who worketh when and where and how he pleaseth."—X. iii.

But, in the Second Scotch Confession (1850), it says,—

"We abhor and detest the cruel judgment against infants dying without baptism."—See Schaaff: Creeds, vol. iii. p. 482.

Since Calvinists distinguish between elect and non-elect infants, it is not strange that some of their theologians have spoken of elect and reprobate infants. Thus Musculus says,—

"Since, therefore, this discrimination of elect and reprobate, in new-born infants is hidden from our judgment, it is not fitting that we should inquire into it, lest by ignorance we reject vessels of grace."—Loqui Communes, 336.

And the Swiss theologians at the Synod of Dort said,—

"That there is an election and reprobation of infants, no less than of adults, we cannot deny in the face of God, who loves and hates unborn children."—Acta Synod. Dnt. Judic., 40.

A proof of the existence of this stern view in Calvinistic New England in the seventeenth century is the passage in that curious poem, The Day of Doom, written by Rev. Michael Wigglesworth, which was published in 1662, ran through many editions, and was reprinted as a curiosity, New York, 1867. Among the classes of sinners who make their plea for mercy are the "repro bate infants" who died in infancy,

"And never had or good or bad
Affected personally;
But from the womb unto the tomb
Were straightway carried (Or at the least ere they transgress'd)."

But they are answered like the rest. However, in recognition of their innocence, they are allowed the "easiest room in hell." Calvinism, by its doctrine of election, rid itself of the stigma of infant damnation; for surely it is allowable to hope, at least, that the grace of election extends to all who die in infancy.

In the seventeenth century, the Arminians resumed Zwingli's position, and, consistently with their theory that original sin was not punishable apart from actual transgression, taught the general salvation of infants: so do the Methodists and Baptists to-day. On the other hand, the Lutherans, and all others who teach baptismal regeneration, are logically shut up to the view that all who die unbaptized are lost. Also the Rev. John Henry Blunt, in his Dict. Doc. Theol., p. 346, note, speaking, doubtless, for High-churchmen generally says,—

"It can hardly, I think, be doubted that they do sustain a loss, of whatever kind. In the Institutions of a Christian Man, the Church of England declares, 'Inasmuch as infants, and children dying in their infancy, shall undoubtedly be saved thereby (i.e., by baptism), else not.' In the last revision of the Prayer-book we read, 'It is certain, by God's word, that children which are baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved.' In other words, we are certain of the future happiness of the baptized, but have no assurance of the salvation of the unbaptized, infant. The question must thus be left in obscurity, as we have no sufficient warrant to go beyond the cautious statement of our Church."
INFIDELITY.

But the heart is stronger than logic. The tendency is towards milder views; and it may well be questioned if there be a single living Lutheran among his worshippers who can define the grace of salvation to baptized infants. So, also, the Calvinists speak. Thus Dr. Charles Hodge, whose orthodoxy is unquestioned, teaches emphatically the salvation of all infants who die in infancy, and asserts that this is the "common doctrine of evangelical Protestants" (Systematic Theology, i. 20).

It will thus be seen, from this review of opinions upon this subject, that there has been recent progress. We now believe that God's grace has been extended to all lands, and are ready to say that infants of heathens, no less than of Christians, enter heaven through the blood of Christ. Surely, He who said, "Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven," shuts the kingdom of heaven in no infant's face.

INFanticide, the practice of murdering newborn children, has been known from early times, and amongst cultivated as well as barbarous nations. It has taken the form of a religious custom, as among the worshippers of Moloch, "horrid king," who threw their children as sacrifices into his molten arms, and the Hindus, who cast their children into the Ganges. We first meet with the practice of abnormal or murderous infanticide at Sparta, where it was enjoined by the laws of Lycurgus. Weakly or deformed infants were exposed to die on Mount Taygetos, on the ground that they would be of service to the State. In Rome the practice prevailed to a large degree during the imperial period, when the marriage-vow was not regarded as binding, and Roman ladies counted their years by the number of their divorces (Seneca). Some of the first men of antiquity commended the practice, as Aristotle (Republic, v. 16) and Pliny the elder. Seneca and other Roman satirists bear witness to the wide extent of its prevalence. The custom has also prevailed among the peoples of Hindustan, the Chinese, the Society and other groups of islands in the Pacific, some of the Indian tribes (Alaska), and in other parts of the world. The Mahometans also practise the custom of murdering girls at their birth. The motives which have impelled parents to murder their children have been considerations of civil obligation (Sparta), shame, disinclination to rear children, and poverty.

In some countries of the ancient world, including Constantine, provided statutes looking to the care of children exposed by their parents to death. In the fifth century the custom was in vogue of laying such children at the church-doors (Conc. Arles I. 51, 461). By the eighth century, asylums were in use among the kings, and other princes, for the care and training of deserted children; and the Church granted to them hypothetical baptism (Sic non es baptizatus, etc., "If thou art not baptized," etc.). At a much later period in the seventeenth century, St. Vincent de Paul directed his energies to the relief of this class of persons, with great zeal. The last century and a large part of this have witnessed the establishment of many foundling asylums in the different countries of Europe. In England severe laws have been passed, punishing with penal servitude and other penalties the murder of children after and before their birth. In France a great increase in the number of foundlings is supposed to have followed upon the use of the tour, or revolving box, which was so arranged that the depositor might leave the infant in the box without himself becoming exposed. By a simple turn of the box from within, the child was drawn inside the building. In 1833 this arrangement was abolished, and the number of foundlings decreased from thirty-five thousand in 1832 to twenty-six thousand in 1838. A hospital in Dublin, also, used a box of this description till 1826, when it was ordered removed by Papal sanction. All nations of Southern Europe, except Greece, and including Austria, have permitted the use of the box. According to Von Oettingen (Moralskeistik) the number of foundling asylums in France is a hundred and one, Spain forty-nine, Austria thirty-six, etc. In the United States such asylums are comparatively rare. The principal Roman-Catholic institution of the kind is the New-York Foundling Asylum, at the corner of Lexington Avenue and Sixty-eighth Street, New-York City. There are two Protestant (undenominational) institutions in New-York City, —the New-York Infant Asylum, and the Infants' Home and Day Nursery (established 1854). Both of these institutions give shelter to the mothers during their confinement, and urge them to remain for a period with their children. The results have been satisfactory, both in saving the mothers from a continued life of shame, and in preserving the lives of the children (about eighty per cent).

INFIDELITY. In this article, infidelity is used to denote the denial of the claims of Christianity as a divine revelation. In this sense it is not quite the same with unbelief; for unbelief equally takes in other negative positions, such as atheism: and it is quite the same with scepticism, as this involves the deeper philosophical principle, that nothing is or can be known. Still, unbelief may be used to include infidelity, all the more that negative views as to God's existence, or personality, or character, also tend to cut off faith in a revelation of his will; and in like manner scepticism, having the same result, may with proper distinction be used as a synonym. It must be added that the word "infidelity" carries with it a shade of censure. It is not ignorance, or simple opposition of Christianity, that is asserted, but rejection; which the Christian Church holds to be sinful. As faith is a duty, and as those nominal Christians who come short of it, in not personally accepting Christ as a Saviour, are condemned, so those who carry their repulsion farther, even to denial of his mission and of the authority of his word, must be still more blameworthy.
INFIDELITY.

The causes of infidelity, though manifold and subtle, may be briefly indicated. They are of two kinds,—subjective and objective. The former lies in the prejudices against Christianity that are found within; the latter, in the scandals and hindrances that come from without. Of prejudices, the chief are moral, being found in the lusts and passions which the gospel condemns, or, where these do not rule, in the pride and self-righteousness which cannot be renounced, or in the want of that loving and tender spirit without which Christianity is only a name; so that (and this the better class of unbelievers find uncongenial to them) the lofty devotion to the glory of God, and the humbling sense of sin, in which the very soul of Christianity consists. With these moral prejudices intellectual ones may concur, such as a sceptical temper, or a philosophy that excludes the supernatural, or a bias against some cardinal doctrine of Christianity,—such as the trinity, or the atonement, or the influence of the Holy Spirit. Under the head of scandals fall all the misrepresentations of Christianity which exist in doctrine and life,—the corruptions and divisions of churches, the sins of Christian nations, the slow progress and limited success of the gospel through the fault of its supporters, and even the mistakes of Christians in dealing with infidelity itself. With these causes at work amidst a race, which, as Christians believe, is ungodly and fallen, it is not wonderful, that, as there has been always so much practical unbelief in the world, a church or, where these do not rule, in the pride and self-righteousness of its author, though these are considerable, as from the fulness with which it reflects early hostility to Christ, and from the confirmation which it gives to the early reception of the Christian books, and to the truth of the Christian history. It is not easy to reduce Celsus to any category; but, as the Jewish controversy hardly belongs to infidelity, this exception may also be disregarded. These are Celsus, Porphyry, Hierocles, and Julian. Of these by far the most important is the first, Celsus. He is probably to be placed in the last thirty years of the second century; and his work was entitled The True Word (Graphe Legev). We know it almost entirely from the reply of Origen, the masterpiece of ancient apologetics, which, however, was not written till seventy or eighty years later. The value of the work of Celsus is very great, not so much from the ability and learning of its author, though these are considerable, as from the fulness with which it reflects early hostility to Christianity. He is, however, rooted at home as a Pagan, accepting in the gross the polytheism of his age, without seeking much to spiritualize it, and inculcating adherence to tradition, faith in demons, and worship of images. He has, to begin with, a very low idea of human destiny, as little distinguishable from that of the beasts, which makes him resent the pretensions of Christians, and ridicule their hopes of the resurrection as the "hopes of worms." His philosophical pride makes him recoil from their blind faith; and his self-righteousness leads him to repel a sect that opened the door to "sinners." His greatest stumbling-block is the incarnation of Christ, to which he perpetually returns, with the humiliation of the Son's life and death; and it is curious to see, that, while attacking the Jews, he has all the contempt of the Jew for the absence of signs, and of the Greek for the neglect of wisdom. There is also the offence in Christianity, beyond Judaism, of a larger spirit, averse to national ties, of a more enthusiastic hope, and of a proselytism strong enough to allege childish weakness, to shake the empire, and to turn contempt into anger and fear. The more special doctrines of Christianity, such as the atonement and the new birth, Celsus hardly seems, as before he hardly assails them. It is still to him the excitabilis superstition of Tacitus, brought a good deal nearer, and in proportion more hateful. Still it is wonderful, within his own range, that Celsus sees so much, and has anticipated so much, of the coarser style of attack on Christianity. The contradiction of Scripture, and its plagiarism from Plato and the philosophers; the divisions and strifes of Christians; the want of patriotism and public spirit, with a general ridiculous narrowness and fanaticism,—these are his characteristic contribution to the reproaches of ages.

Nor has he made one single concession, or written one redeeming sentence; so that his great services to Christian apologists, in his admissions as to the dates of sacred books, and other facts, are wholly involuntary. It has been the function of Christianity to train even its opponents to seize something of its own point of view. But to this Celsus is the ideal opponent; and the contrast is most complete in his great antagonist Origen, who, in meeting Celsus, has met the best who have followed him, and has made this first still the most fruitful and suggestive of all apologetic controversies.

Porphyry, though a much able man than Celsus, and a more voluminous writer against Christianity, exists in much scantier fragments; so that little is added from him to the stock of argument. He was a native of Tyre, born about 233 A.D., and was the companion, biographer, and a more voluminous writer against Christianity. The contradictory spirit in him and in his party this system of mystic idealism, opposed to Christianity by its radical exclusion of the incarnation, was further bent into hostility by its effort to spiritualize the current Paganism, and maintain its influence. This, doubtless, lent a color to the elaborate work of Porphyry against the Christians (six books, written in about the year 270). But as the lengthened replies to this work, including that of Eusebius the church historian, have perished, we cannot trace its sequence, or even its characteristic features. He seems more than Celsus to have gone into detailed criticism of the Old and New Testament Scriptures; and hence the attacks on the prophecies of Daniel, as written after the event, which are replied to by Jerome and other writers; and also on Paul, whom Celsus does not notice. As an example of his more philosophical manner, there is the question, why the gospel was not sent earlier to nations like the Britons, that so greatly needed it. But altogether the materials for an account of Porphyry's polemic against the Christians are disappointingly meagre; and the difficulties are increased by his work on The Philosophy of Oracles, though generally accepted, there is much not easy to reconcile with the more spiritualizing strain of his philosophy; e.g., in the oracle on Christ, as eminent in piety, and admitted to heaven, which is not such as would have been expected from an author who is described as one of the most strenuous opponents of Christianity.

Hierocles was Governor of Bithynia during the last persecution, which began under Diocletian, in 303. In a work addressed to Christians, with other attacks he drew a parallel, to the disadvantage of Christ, between his life and miracles from those of Apollonius of Tyana. This Pagan hero, half philosopher, half magician, had lived from the days of Nero to those of Domitian, and wandered over much of the world. His life had been written a century after his death by Philostratus, a rhetorician of Lemnos; and Porphyry took this biography into a weapon of invidious contrast. Eusebius, in a very able reply, shows how loose the historical foundation was, how ludicrous or ill-attested the miracles were (professedly wrought in Ephesus, Rome, and elsewhere), and how void the whole career was of moral greatness and significance. The attempt of Hierocles is only interesting as a type of similar efforts, even to our own day, to meet the claims of Christ by a general naturalist theory of hero-worship or of founders in religion; but the modern theories, though far more refined and extended, are even more helpless, as they wholly deny the supernatural, and so reduce the possible dimensions of the hero, that Christ, if at all drawn after the Gospels, still leaves every parallel behind.

The last name, Julian, is more important as a figure in history than as a writer against Christianity. His public career does not need to be noticed here. The admirable sketch of Gibbon, supplemented on its religious side by that of Neander, meets all necessities. It is only requisite to notice his work against the Christians, written in the winter of 362, in Antioch. Of this we have numerous fragments preserved in the interesting reply of Cyril of Alexandria, in ten books, who, though inferior to Origen, meets Julian with a Greek learning and dialectical skill worthy of his cause and his opponent. Of this work of Julian a large part was occupied with charges against the Old Testament, which he endeavored to show that Christians had no authority for relaxing in any of its ordinances, while at the same time he took the side of the Jews against them; and similar attacks were made on the New Testament, as, for example, that John alone had asserted the Saviour's deity. None of the concessions which Julian had practically made to Christianity in borrowing from it are hinted at in this treatise; but the whole strain is satirical and derisive, as towards a religion which boasted such great things, and yet shut itself up in a corner of the world.

From the fall of Paganism to the Reformation, the conflict with infidelity ceases, or is only prolonged by other weapons than those of controversy. Mohammedanism comes on the scene, retorting on its opponents the reproach of being infidels; but this leads to no collision of argument, but of stern combat. At length the Reformation in the Western Church appears, and this, from a Roman-Catholic point of view, might be regarded as unbelief; but Protestantism disowns the name, and though cut off from the Christian pale, yet, by its witness for the Bible and for the authority of Christ, hinders even Rome from branding its career as the same with that of infidelity. It is not till the Reformation, that in lands professedly Christian, whether Catholic or Protestant, a phenomenon truly entitled to the name of infidelity arises, and that with such new features as to stand distinct from the Pagan unbelief of the early centuries. Of this, as already stated, the marked feature, though it comes slowly and hesitatingly to light, is the denial of all revelation, and the confinement of whatever religion is still retained, be it much or little, to reason and its origin and sovereignty. This accordingly, the modern infidelity from the seventeenth century to our own days, has now to be sketched.

In its earlier shapes this unbelief is less national; afterwards it concentrates itself in different lands, and passes through successive national phases. To the earliest period belong Herbert and Hobbes, who, though English, have by education and character a cosmopolitan element; Spinoza, who as a Jew belongs to all literature; and Bayle, whose wandering life, and studies in universal criticism, abate his otherwise French individuality. It is only in the nineteenth century that unbelief, and the national phases of the eighteenth,—deism, encyclopedism, rationalism, — has returned to its earlier type.

Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1581-1648), whose life as that of a soldier-philosopher is a kind of reduced image of Descartes, holds, like him, to spiritualism, and, though unhappily never recovered to the faith of his brother George the poet, still retains many Christian elements, and in his five principles—God, worship, virtue, repentance, rewards and punishments—advances nothing hostile to Christianity, though he ignores it. His De Veritate (1674) was followed after his death by his De Religione Gentilium (1663), which fails to establish these principles as the sum of Paganism, though it begins, amid much awkwardness, modern inquiries into comparative religion in a spirit out of sympathy with Christianity.

Hobbes (1609-1677) is even less an avowed unbeliever than Herbert; and his scheme might in strictness be called heresy rather than infidelity. He seeks in his other works, and especially in the Leviathan, to build up a system that may support his political philosophy as one of despotism, from the Bible. But the foundations of materialism, selfishness, on which the whole rests, are such that the walls of the structure are pressed out of their place, even had the style of Bible interpretation not been so arbitrary and paradoxical as to forfeit identity in the structure with all ordinary Christianity. A Christ whose other offices are subordinated to his kingly, and whose kingly office is practically absorbed in that of the civil magistrate, is about all of Christianity that Hobbes, with his elaborate deductions and expositions, retains.

Spinoza (1632-77) departs entirely from Herbert in renouncing theism, and resting on a pantheistic basis (Ethica, 1677); but, so long as he professed theism (Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, 1670), he recalls Hobbes at least in his founding of right on power, and in his free and rationalizing strain of Scripture criticism. Many of Spinoza's hypotheses in excluding the miraculous are as arborescent as those of Hobbes; and it was certain, un candid for him to argue against miracles as a theist, while keeping his pantheism in reserve; but his schemes and theories have been still more influential, and are to this day widely current. His pantheism does not require to be here noticed, as lying beyond our definition of infidelity. It is important, however, to consider how much there is of lingering sympathy with the Christian view of the exalted character of Christ, all the more remarkable as coming from a Jew, though the radical pantheism and anti-supernaturalism of his system bar the just influence of this real deep.

The sceptical side of this early period is represented by Bayle (1647-1706), whose Huguenot extraction, and temporary conversion to Romanism, so far determine the type of his hostility to Christian faith. A professor in Protestant seminaries like Sedan and Rotterdam, void of all sympathy with the Reformed creed, save on the side of culture and liberty, his life becomes one long critical process without earnestness or fruit, save only as the debates of all systems with each other are recorded. This is the work of his Dictionary, published in 1697, and for the next century a storehouse of negative criticism and a forerunner of the French Encyclopédie; only that Bayle is more fair in dealing out doubts and difficulties all round, so that orthodoxy merely shares in the general weakness of the human mind.

It is apparent that this earliest period of modern doubt contained all the internal conflicts and discords that were afterwards to be developed, and which have made it strong for attack on Christianity, but feeble in supplying its place. All comes more to light in the next century, when infidelity gains more full expression and power. This brings with it the three national and mutually related movements in England, France, and Germany.

English deism springs up on the soil of religious decay and latitude and of political freedom, not without help from the Socinian tendency which had clung as a shade to the Reformation, and with its waning light gained in influence. The deistic movement stands out as the first combined protest of educated thought in Europe against Christianity; and therefore its history is all the more instructive, and its failure confirmatory of faith. It fills up the space from the Revolution to the rise of Methodism and the awakening of religious life in England. Its earlier struggles are more desultory and miscellaneous; its later, more concentrated and definite.

To the former belongs Charles Blount, whose Oracles of Reason, published in 1685, after his death, discloses the fact that the name "Deists" had been taken by the party which traced itself to Herbert, and who, in an earlier work (1680) on Apollonius of Tyana, heard, apparently without knowing it, renewed the effort of Hierocles to account on natural principles for the career of Jesus Christ. Another miscellaneous writer, of Irish birth, is Toland (1670-1722), who, in his Christianity not Mysterious, too long as an avowed theist, maintains in his Aemytor the looseness of the canon, drawing forth the masterly work of Lardner, and after other fugitive pieces, still professing something of Christianity, ends in 1720 by publishing anonymously the Confessions of Pantheism. His work was counselled though balanced by another work of a contrary tenor in the same year. We may perhaps include here also Lord Shaftesbury, whose Characteristics (1711) contain strictures on the moral aspects of Christianity hardly consistent with his profession.
of belief, and certainly Anthony Collins (1676–1729), whose first appearance in connection with this controversy, in his Discourse on Freethinking (1713), is little more than a clever burlesque, designed, without any scientific method, to put Christians on the same ground of ultimate dependence on reason with the rising sect of free-thinkers, though this manifesto more than met its match in the learning, argument, and wit of Bentley.

The most important period in the deistic movement, that which deals more with definite topics, falls under the Hanoverian dynasty; and this is led in by Collins, whose work on prophecy, The Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion (1724), is more solid and serious than his first, though marked also by a one-sidedness and controversial art above which he never rose. The aim of this treatise was to show that prophecy had only been meant, and only fulfilled, allegorically, that is, not at all; and his conflict between him and Bishop Chandler and his many other opponents turned on the criticism of texts, and the evidence of their accomplishment. He replied to the bishop in his Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered (1727), but somewhat changed his ground without acknowledging it. He has anticipated modern criticism as to Daniel, but is out of harmony with it in denying all early Messianic hopes and traditions.

The discussion on prophecy gave birth to that on miracles, which was conducted by Thomas Woolston, an ex-fellow of Sidney College, Cambridge (1667–1733). As Collins had reduced prophecy, so Woolston reduced miracle, to allegory, and denied the literal facts. His Discourses on the Miracles of our Saviour (1727–30), though reaching a sale of thirty thousand copies, are now generally discarded for their violent and uncritical spirit, which may be judged of by his asserting a compact between the disciples and Jewish rulers, which the former violated by stealing the Saviour's body. It would have been well had Woolston been replied to only in works like Bishop Sherlock's Trial of the Witnesses, but, unhappily, he was fined and imprisoned, and died in prison.

The central passage of this controversy was the debate on the possibility and credibility of revelation. This arose with Matthew Tindal (1656–1733), an ex-fellow of All Souls', Oxford, who had in his youth gone over to Popery, and then recollected to a different extreme. His work, Christianity as Old as the Creation (1730), was mainly designed to set aside revelation by building on the law of nature, or equal relation of God to his creatures at all times. This was answered best of all by Conybeare (1732), that the law of nature left room for the progressive light of nature, and that, when that light is taken in the best reply to Hume,—that by Campbell, On Miracles (1762); and Hume has not been generally followed, except by those who deny miracles, not merely as inconceivable, but as impossible. With Hume, though lying outside of the deistic controversy, we may rank his great adversary, the fallen historian, Gibbon (1737–94). Gibbon, like Bayle, loses all the earnestness of belief with his return from Romanism; and his Decline and Fall shows how deeply insensible he was to the divine power of Christianity. Yet the work is an involuntary tribute to its greatness; and the attempt, far beyond any thing in deism, to account for it by secondary causes, is an anticipation of more recent efforts, while recognizing its world-historical importance, to bring it within the law of natural development. The way had been prepared by the immense belief in the bosom of Rome, and by the absence of Bible and to the character of Christ, however unhappy the tenor of his life, separated himself from every writer of that school. As it was, the encyclopedic movement was only powerful for destruction; and infidelity, in submitting to the return even of Romanism to fresh ascendency, had openly to confess its own weakness.

The movement in Germany called rationalism was largely derived from English and French sources, but probably as much from the decay of Christian faith and life among the German people. The revival, under Spener and Francke, in the beginning of the century, had failed to arrest the downward course of all the old churches of the Reformation; and a cold and scholastic orthodoxy gave way to doubt and negation, as carrying with them apparently more of freshness and interest. A threefold tendency has been here remarked: First, The popular philosophy movement, which, no longer met by the speculative element (as in Leibnitz and Lessing strictly in Wolff), reduced philosophy to empiricism, and religion to naturalism. Of this school an exaggerated example was C. F. Bahrdt (1741-92). Secondly, The critical school, which, developing the concessions of Baumgarten, Ernst, and J. D. Michaelis, passed—in the hands of Semler in Halle, Eichhorn in Göttingen, and Paulus in Heidelberg, with many others—to a denial of all distinctive inspiration in the sacred books, and of all special Christian doctrine in their contents, while still exalting Christ as a great Example and Teacher. In one who belonged partly and grappled partly and partly to the critical school—Reimarus (1694-1768), teacher in the Gymnasium of Hamburg—this minimum of doctrine was not retained; and in his work, published after his death by Lessing as Fragments from the Library of Wolfenbüttel (1774-78), the Saviour, though without excellent morality, is treated as a political enthusiast who failed in setting up by his triumphal entry a temporal kingdom, and his disciples as schemers who adapted their theology to the altered circumstances, and stole the body of Jesus to countenance the fraud of a resurrection. Lessing, in publishing these fragments, disclaimed all sympathy with them, as, indeed, his Education of the Human Race (1777-80) is based upon a different principle; but in his replies to Pastor Goetz of Hamburg, and others, who resented his act, he showed himself so much an apologist of Reimarus, and an assailant of the letter of the gospel history, while professing to uphold its spirit, that his relation to Christianity is rendered uncertain. The third school is that of ethical rationalism, represented by Kant and his followers, which finds expression in that philosopher’s Religion within the Limits of Mere Reason (1792). Here the weakness of Kant’s philosophy, in making the infinite and absolute mere regulative ideas that could not come within the grasp of the finite, is seen; for the incarnation, the keystone of Christianity, is misunderstood, and the historical Christ becomes the mere ultimate of ethical teaching, whose so-called offices are to be idealized into subjective processes in the heart of the individual, while also connected with a society in which moral results can alone be achieved, but who stands upon the footing of reason and moral law, rather than of redemption and grace in the ordinary Christian sense of these terms. Hence, while Kant is the highest summit of rationalism, and even so far the prophet of a return to faith, including in a sinless Christ miracle and the basis of incarnation, it remained for another century, under Schleiermacher and his followers, not without their own inconsistencies, to escape from mere nature, and to restore an historical Christianity to its true place.

Such was unbelief at the end of the last century; and, as the present advanced, the demonstr ated failure of Spence and Francke, with the re-action in favor of belief, compelled it to assume a more respectful attitude towards Christianity, and at the same time to attempt more earnestly, on naturalist principles, to solve its origin and history. To this latter task the movement in philosophy and science also urged; and hence unbelief has grappled with this problem under one or other of the reigning tendencies that have divided the century: first, speculative pantheism, and, secondly, materialistic or evolutionist agnosticism. These types appear successively in the most prominent unbeliever of the nineteenth century, David Friedrich Strauss: in others they are more or less traceable. Strauss passes through three periods, publishing the first edition of his Leben Jesu in 1835, in which he gathers up the hints of earlier critics, like Eichhorn and Gabler, as to a mythical element in the life of Jesus, and explains the facts as stated in the Gospels as unhistorical reflections of the disciples’ love and admiration, fashioning their Christ after Messianic traditions and their own fancies, the only truth being the Hegelian idea that God and man are one; then, in his recast of this work in 1864, dropping altogether the Hegelian frame, and in the old deistic way treating Jesus as a great personality who realizes the fatherhood of God, while from the school of Baur tendency is called in to help out the myth; then, lastly, in his Old and New Faith of 1873, not long before his death, going over to the theory of evolutionism in its atheistic shape, and striking out many of his concessions to the character of Jesus; for which, indeed, the way was prepared by his admiring biographies of Helmarus (in 1862) and of Voltaire (in 1872). Such a career refutes itself, notwithstanding the great acuteness of the criticism of this author; for the only thing common to its successive philosophic schemes is the unbounded confidence with which each is upheld.

Similar is the failure of Ernest Renan, whose Vie de Jésus (1863) reveals less of a philosophic and theological basis; the chief thing of this kind being an immoral deism, which builds the universe upon the mixture of good and evil, and makes the spurious miracles of Jesus necessary to his success. Here there are less of the critical discussion of Strauss, and most of pictorial effort, to give the career of Jesus a lifelike reality, which, however, break down through the moral incongruities blended in the character, and the deviation of the history from its professed sources. Renan, in conformity with the tendency of recent criticism, even that of the Tübingen school, has in his work on the origin of Christianity, of which the life of Jesus is the first part, carried up the date of the gospels, much higher than Strauss, believing as he does that time was not needed for the transformation of history; and, though this must be denied, the admission as to these dates and facts of authorship is valuable on the side of Christian faith.

These works probably exhaust the struggles of Continental unbelief to deal with the Christian problem; the schemes of Schenkel in his Charakterbild (1869), and of Keim in his Jesus von Nazareth (1864), belong more to the history of science than of infidelity. Nor in England has much been added; the work of Mr. W. R. Greg (Creed of Christendom, 1850, new ed., 1877) relying largely on dates of Strauss and others, which have now been abandoned, and presenting no coherent image of Christ’s life and death; Supernatural Religion (1877, 7th ed.) being mainly a reproduction of Tübingen criticism as to the late reception of the Gospels, with arguments against the supernatural, rather than any positive system of the life of Jesus; and Mill’s posthumous The Essays on Religion, while bearing strong marks from the supernatural as a possibility and a hope, not going fully into the question of the origin of Christ’s character and greatness, though granting him a transcendent place in history, and allowing that “religion cannot be said to have made a bad choice in pitching on this man as the ideal representative and guide of humanity.” Even the evolutionist philosophy has not in England openly flung itself, in any of its representatives, into the same abyss with Strauss. The agnosticism of Herbert Spencer has not led him to any attempted solution of Christ’s development in history; and the work of Huxley on Hume (1779), while reproducing his argument on miracles, does not go beyond his (Hume’s) own silence on the difficulty thus arising as to the career and influence of the Founder of Christianity.

It is remarkable that American literature has not produced any material addition to European unbelief, but either imported or slightly recast it. The Age of Reason of Thomas Paine, written in Paris in 1793, under the aegis of American citizenship, and addressed to the protection of the United States, was but the repetition of English deism in its lowest form, which he had brought from his own country, and exalted by the boastful strain of France, which now contrasts with the oblivion into which the work has fallen. The extremes of Theodore Parker and other writers from the left side of Unitarianism are but the exaggerations of German criticism and negative theory. America has been more productive on the side of excesses of faith than of denials of it; and the progress of Christianity, from the formation of the republic onward, in an age, when, as everywhere, unbelief was so wide-spread, to the present day, when, however still existing and active, it is comparatively less restrained, is a hopeful augury, that, on the Western Continent, the time will come, when, through the preventive and healing influence of the gospel, the struggles of the Old World against infidelity may be less and less reproduced. John Cairns.

INFERALAPSARIANISM (from infra, “after,” and lapsus, “a fall”) is the doctrine, that God for his own glory determined (1) to create the world, (2) to permit the fall of man, (3) to elect from the mass of fallen men an innumerable multitude as “vessels of mercy,” (4) to send his Son for their redemption, (5) to leave the residue of mankind to suffer the just punishment of their sins. This is the common doctrine of Augustinians, and is taught in the Calvinistic symbolical books. It is to be distinguished from supralapsarianism, the theory of some Calvinists, and is the same as sublapsarianism: which articles see.

INFULA means in classical Latin, the band of red and white stripes which the priest and the victim wore around the brow at a pagan sacrifice: hence it was quite early introduced into Christian usage, and applied to the priest’s head-dress, afterwards to that of the bishop.
INGATHERING. Feast of. See Tabernacles. Feast of.

INGHAM, Benjamin ("the Yorkshire Evangelist"). b. at Ossett, in Yorkshire, Eng., June 11, 1712; d. at Aberford in 1772. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he was one of the "Holy Club." On June 1, 1735, he was ordained by Bishop Potter, and soon after went on a sort of ecclesiastical itinerancy of great usefulness among the villages about London, and then settled down as curate in Matching, Essex; but scarcely three months elapsed (Oct. 14) before he was induced to accompany John Wesley and others on his expedition to Georgia. He landed there Feb. 5, 1736; re-embarked for England, Feb. 26, 1737, in order to obtain help for the colonists, having accomplished almost nothing, except the composition, in Dr. Byrom's shorthand, of a list of half the words in an Indian language.

On his outward voyage he had been brought in contact with Moravian bishops, and thus his life was affected. He and Wesley joined their London Society in Fetter Lane; and in 1738 he accompanied Wesley on his journey of inspection to Herrnhut, and was freely admitted to communion. On his return he preached in Yorkshire with singular effect; and, when prohibited (June 6, 1739) from the pulpits of the Established Church, he imitated John Wesley, and preached in the fields, barns, anywhere he could, and so successfułly, that in 1740 he could say that fifty societies had been formed, and that he had two thousand hearers.

In 1740 Wesley was expelled from the Fetter Lane Moravian Society; but Ingham remained in it, and thus virtually seceded from the Church of England, and became the head of the Yorkshire Moravians. On Nov. 12, 1741, he married in London, Lady Margaret Hastings, sister of the Earl of Huntingdon. On July 30, 1742, he formally transferred his Yorkshire and Lancashire societies to the Moravians, and immediately began forming others; for his special work was that of an evangelist at large. In 1744 he gave up open-air preaching. In 1753, owing to the state of the Moravians in England, he withdrew from them, and established a sect of his own. Members were required by laying on hands. There were elders, deacons, and the love-feast and the Lord's Supper monthly. The chief governing power was in the hands of the general overseer, who was chosen and appointed by the trustees, with the consent of the societies. In 1755 Ingham was admitted to Wesley's conference at Leeds, although there is no clear evidence that he wished to unite his societies with Wesley's. After Ingham had been made general overseer, or, as Lady Huntingdon used to call him, "bishop," of his own sect, he ordained two of his fellow-laborers. In 1759 Ingham became in theology a Sandemanian (see art.) by reading Sandeman's Letters on Theron and Aspasio (Edinburgh, 1757). — a reply to the work of that name by James Hervey (London, 1755, 3 vols.), — and also Glas's The Testimony of the King of Martyrs concerning His Kingdom (Perth, 1727). He sent two of his assistants to Scotland to see the leaders, and the result of their mission was their conversion to the Sandemanian tenets. A split in the Ingham sect followed. Out of the eighty societies so energetically gathered and ruled, only thirteen remained faithful to him. Many of them became Wesleyans, or dissenters; others joined the Daleites, or Scotch Independents,—a small sect established in Glasgow by David Dale, a wealthy cotton manufacturer, whose views, in general, were Sandemanian, only they were not so strict upon the question of intercourse with other denominations, and laid more stress upon practical holiness. The Inghamites never recovered the ground they lost. — Sorow over the defection probably hastened Ingham's death. The only publication of his known to Tyerman is A Discourse on the Faith and Hope of the Gospel, Leeds, 1783, which contains his doctrinal views. His sect still survives, but in 1873 numbered only six societies. See Tyerman: The Oxford Methodists, New York, 1873, pp. 57-154.

INGLIS, David, D.D., LL.D., b. at Greenlaw, Berwickshire, Scotland, June 8, 1824; d. in Brooklyn, N.Y., Dec. 15, 1877. He was graduated from the university of Edinburgh 1841; entered the Presbyterian ministry; emigrated to America 1846, and was pastor of several churches in the United States; called to Montreal 1852, and thence to Hamilton, Ont., 1855. From 1871 to 1872 he was professor of systematic theology in Knox College, Toronto. In the latter year he became pastor of the Reformed (Dutch) Church on the Heights, Brooklyn, L.I. Dr. Inglis was of commanding presence, and a remarkably fine preacher, riveting the attention, notwithstanding the monotony of his delivery, and his incessant pacing back and forth in the pulpit.

INGULPHUS, or INQULFI, abbot of Crowland, or Croyland; b. in London, 1030 (?); d. at Crowland, Lincolnshire, Eng., Dec. 16, 1109. In 1051 he became secretary to William of Normandy; in 1064 he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and on his return entered the monastery of Fontenelle in Normandy; but in 1076 was made abbot of Crowland by his former patron, who had meanwhile become king of England, and through whom he secured many privileges for the abbey, besides the enlargement and adornment of the building itself. His name has long been famous for his supposed authorship of the Historia monasterii corvandensi, from the reign of Penda (d. 655) to 1091. A continuation of the History to 1117 was issued by Peter of Blois, archdeacon of Bath, who died 1220; and by three other continuations it was brought down to 1486. Fulman printed the work, as continued by Peter of Blois, in the first volume of Rerum anglicarum scriptores veteres, Oxford, 1894. But the History is now pronounced by competent judges, especially since Sir Francis Palgrave attacked it in the Quarterly Review, September, 1826, to be so largely interpolated, that it is without much historical authority. The Charters in it are plainly forgeries of a later date than Inqulf. The continuations have more value. The original work was probably of monkish origin, and dates from the thirteenth or fourteenth century. A translation of it by H. T. Riley forms a volume of Bohn's Antiquarian Library. See Hardy's Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, vol. ii. (1863).

INHERITANCE AMONG THE HEBREWS. Jehovah was acknowledged to be the owner of the land of Israel; and therefore, although it was formally divided among the twelve tribes, it was understood that the right to dispose finally of the property was vested in him (Lev. xxv. 23). Accordingly, there could be no irrevocable parting with the birthright. The Year of Jubilee restored all property to its original owner or his heirs (Lev. xxv. 10). This fact explains Na-both's refusal to part with his vineyard, even to the king (1 Kings xxi. 8 sq.). Along with real estate, other things, such as slaves, came, at the death of the father, to his sons by his wife or wives. The sons by concubines received only presents (Gen. xv. 5 sq.), while the sons of harlots got nothing (Judg. xi. 2). The first-born son received a double portion of the entire inheritance, even in cases where a son of a favorite wife had the father's preference (Deut. xxxi. 15-17). The cases of Exan and Reuben show that this right of primogeniture might be forfeited (Gen. xxv. 13 sq.). Daughters inherited only when there were no sons; and in these cases they must marry in their own tribe, lest the patrimony be alienated (Num. xxvii. 1-11, xxxvi.1). In cases where there were no children, the brother, the paternal uncle, or the nearest kinsman was inserted (Num. xxvii. 9 sq.). Sometimes a faithful slave inherited his master's property in cases where he had married the daughter (1 Chron. ii. 34, 35), or had been adopted (Gen. xv, 2, 3), or was guardian of an imbecile son (Prov. xvii. 2), or even in case of misconduct of the heir (2 Sam. xvi. 4). The Mosaic law so exactly defined the deposition of estates, that wills, in our sense of the term, were wholly superfluous; and so the word does not occur in the Hebrew Bible. The phrase "to set one's house in order" (2 Sam. xvi. 23 and Isa. xxxvii. 1) refers to household affairs merely. But wills necessarily became common among the Jews of the Dispersion, and they are referred to in the New Testament (Gal. iii. 15; Heb. ix. 17). The Hebrew word for them was commonly "מָלֶא", a transliteration of "mēūēn"; but the rabbis used instead the non-biblical "נים", from נְה, "to command." Occasionally there was a partial ante mortem distribution of property (cf. Luke xvi. 12); and sometimes, at least, as might be expected, property occasioned disputes (cf. Luke xii. 13 sq.).

INNER MISSION. The, an agency for promoting the spiritual and bodily welfare of the destitute and spiritually indifferent in Germany. Its ultimate object is to evangelize the classes that have fallen away from Christian truth and faith. The movement developed out of the conviction that the Protestant Church of Germany was not accomplishing all it might. Fliedner was the first to embody this conviction in practical institutions; and the various charities he organized and carried out into successful operation at Kaiserswerth have done much towards the revival of Christian benevolence throughout the land. But it remained for Wichern to determine the character, and secure the success, of the work of the Inner Mission. The very name is due to him, although Dr. Lücke of Göttingen had previously used it in a publication printed in Hamburg, 1845. It occurred to Dr. Wichern, that a movement was necessary, within the limits of Germany, as well as among the heathen, to stem the tide of irreligion, and to build up the kingdom of God. It was this conviction which led him to refuse the appeal of some friends to turn the Rauhe Haus at Hamburg [which he had founded in 1833] into an institution for training missionaries for the heathen. There was a sufficiently large field at home, and the two agencies were of sufficient importance to be kept separate. The term "Inner Mission" became the universal designation for this peculiar domestic work after Wichern's stirring appeal to the Protestant Church at the Kirchentag [a voluntary ecclesiastical synod: see art.], held in Wittenberg, 1848.

The Inner Mission directs itself to those classes which have become indifferent to Christ, or, out of ignorance, have remained far from him. [The term and work of the Inner Mission are more comprehensive than Home Missions, and include, not only efforts to spread the gospel by preaching, but also various other agencies for the spiritual, as well as physical, welfare of the destitute.] It employs as its means the preaching of the gospel and efforts to relieve the victims of disease, and those who have been led astray. The Inner Mission is not a combination of a variety of associations and institutions devoted to different forms of benevolent Christian work. It uses such agencies, but is itself a force behind them, which also works through the instrumentality of individuals. Nor is it a mere philanthropic agency, but a distinctly evangelistic agency, whose ultimate aim is to win men to the gospel.

Since the organization of the movement at the Wittenberg Kirchentag, in 1848, the necessity for its existence has been made more apparent by the socialism, nihilism, humanitarian culture, and other evils, of the land. At that conference was formed the Central Committee of the Inner Mission of the German-Protestant Church. Its design was not to control the work, but to give suggestions and impulses for the organization of efforts in different parts of the land. It originated a conference which had twenty-two meetings, the last being held at Bremen, in September, 1881. The movement passed through a period of much opposition, but gradually won the sympathies of a large constituency from all schools of Christian thought and activity. Since 1848 the sphere of effort has become more comprehensive, and now includes schools for children and cripples, houses of refuge, the care of the sick and poor, the conduct of Sunday schools, the organization of Young Men's Christian Associations, the training of servants, the various forms of city missionary activity, the promotion of sabbath observance, and other forms of Christian work. There are central committees in different parts of the land, and under their influence a body of specially trained evangelists, colportors, and other officers, has been educated. To these specific agencies of the Inner Mission must be added the Institution of Deaconesses [which was founded by Theodore Fliedner, in Kaiserswerth, 1836], which now numbers nearly four thousand sisters. [The work of the Inner Mission is not dependent upon State control. It is not an organization, but an impulse or movement, which, working itself out in various parts of the land, seeks to advance the cause of true religion. The various institutions representing the idea are supported by voluntary contributions. There is no central power upon which they depend.

Lit. — Wichern: D. innere Mission d. deutsch. evang. Kirche, e. Denkschrift an d. deutsche Nation, second edition, Hamburg, 1849; Beck: D. innere Mission, Leipzig, 1850; Wichern: D. innere Mission, etc., Berlin, 1857; Zeisswitz: Innere Mission, etc., Frankfurt, 1864; Beck: D. innere Mission, Augsburg, 1874. The periodical Fliegende Blätter, founded by Wichern in 1844, is published at Hamburg, and is devoted to the objects of the Inner Mission. The Reports of the Proceedings (22 vols.) of all the church conferences have been published, and contain a vast amount of information on the subject. [For an extensive list of literature, covering four pages, see the German article.]

INNOCENT I. Pope A.D. 402-417. According to Jerome, he was the son of his predecessor, Anastasius I., on whose death he was elected to the papal chair (in 402). A fundamental principle it was with him never to neglect an opportunity for extending the authority of the Roman see. On sending to Victorius, Bishop of Rouen, rules of discipline for use throughout Gaul, he inserts the injunction, "Si majores cause in medium fuerint devolue, ad sedem apostolicam, sicut synodus statuit, et beata consuetudo exigit; post judiciurn episcopalis referantur." If the reference here is to the edict of the Council of Sardica (344) on the subject, he certainly goes far beyond the somewhat general concessions here made; since he insists that all bishops in all weightier matters should report to Rome. Exuperius, Bishop of Toulouse, he highly compliments (406) for referring his inquiries to the Roman chair, without first attempting to decide them for himself. The Macedonian bishops he severely rebukes (414) for daring to consult the second time on a point on which he had already given a decision. To Alexander of Antioch he explains (415) that the prerogatives yielded to his see were not on account of the greatness of Antioch, but simply because that city had been, though for but a brief while, the first seat of Peter; while at Rome, on the contrary, Peter had dwelt until his death. Yearly his claims for power grew more and more exorbitant. In 416 he writes to Bishop Decianus, "I do not know what has been handed down to the Roman Church by Peter, the prince of the apostles, must be held fast by all, especially since all the churches throughout Gaul, Spain, Italy, and Africa, owe their existence to priests ordained by Peter and his successors?"

A particularly favorable occasion presented itself for the pope's exerting on the plenary authority of Rome, when in 417 he confirmed by letter the resolutions against the Pelagian heresy, adopted and sent to him the course which Chrysostom's case had taken, and seeking to enlist him on his own side, though it was only to be coolly told that the Pope would continue to recognize Chrysostom as bishop until convicted by a regular tribunal. Failing, however, in his efforts to have the pope's decree communicated before him in a council composed of Eastern and Western bishops, the Pope renounced fellowship with Theophilus and his associates. To the afflicted Chrysostom in his exile, the conduct of the Pope was full of consolation and support, as he gratefully testifies.

Tryino days befell Innocent when Alaric besieged Rome. Pending the negotiations with this invader, he went, by order of the senate, to Honorius, at Ravenna, to induce him to accept the proposals of the Goth. By this journey he was spared the sight of the cruelties inflicted on Rome. In 410 Alaric sacked the city.

Among the dogmatic decisions of Innocent I. must be mentioned his condemnation of Pelagius, and his order to the synod of Mileve (417), that Pelagius and Celestius be excommunicated until they delivered themselves from the snare of Satan. Inasmuch as these men had grossly misused the authority of the Church, the Pope had to take energetic steps to prevent the spread of a doctrine so pernicious to the Church. The Pope encouraged Jerome in his labors for carrying on the work of Leonatus, and John, Bishop of Jerusalem, had taken no steps against the criminals. Innocent sent Jerome a consoling letter, but to John a vigorous remonstrance. Especially strenuous was his in enforcing the ordinance of Siricius, forbidding the married clergy all marital intercourse, and deposing such as should beget children as unworthy of the sacred office.

INNOCENT II. Gregorio de' Papi, or Papareschi, Pope 1130—3. Having taken orders from Guibert of Ravenna, and afterwards filled important positions under Popes Paschal II., Gelasius II., and Calixtus II., we find him in 1128, in company with his after-opponent, Cardinal Peter Pierleoni, as papal legate in France.

While Pope Honorius lay dying, Gregory's practical tact, his friendly relation to the emperial court, and his high rank in the Church, gave him the favorable notice of those of the cardinals who were under the lead of the chancellor, Haimericus; and these, at most fifteen in number, ere yet the Pope had been interred, and without information of his decease having been sent to the absent cardinals, in person elected to him the favor of the synod of Carthage.

It was in accordance with these lofty conceptions of papal prerogative, that Innocent conducted himself in the case of Chrysostom, when the famous man was persecuted by Theophilus of Alexandria. After his deposition, Chrysostom appealed to the Bishop of Rome (for his words addressed to Innocent can be understood in no other light), and invoked the papal interference as that of a higher court. And even Theophilus showed his deference to the Pope, who showed him the course which Chrysostom's case had taken, and seeking to enlist him on his own side, though it was only to be coolly told that the Pope would continue to recognize Chrysostom as bishop until convicted by a regular tribunal. Failing, however, in his efforts to have the pope's decree communicated before him in a council composed of Eastern and Western bishops, the Pope renounced fellowship with Theophilus and his associates. To the afflicted Chrysostom in his exile, the conduct of the Pope was full of consolation and support, as he gratefully testifies.

For an extensive list of literature, covering four pages, see the German article. — Oldenberg: Ludovici Innocentii I., in, Liber Pontificalis; Muratori: Rer. Ital. scrib., tom. III., p. 115 sq.; the letters of Innocent I., in Constant: Epistola Romanorum Pontificorum, Paris, 1721, p. 738 sq.; and Migne: Patrologia cursus completus, series prima, tom. XX., p. 463 sq.; Zosimus: Historia Romana, lib. v. c. 41 and 45; Sozomenus: Histor. eccles., lib. viii. c. 28, lib. vi. c. 37, and Rhegium sancti Basili episcorum, lib. viii. adversus panegos, lib. vii. c. 39 et al.

Lit. (on all the Innocents). — Milman: Lat. Christ.; Greenwood: *Cath. Pet.

INNOCENT II. Gregorio de' Papi, or Papareschi, Pope 1130—3. Having taken orders from Guibert of Ravenna, and afterwards filled important positions under Popes Paschal II., Gelasius II., and Calixtus II., we find him in 1128, in company with his after-opponent, Cardinal Peter Pierleoni, as papal legate in France.

While Pope Honorius lay dying, Gregory's practical tact, his friendly relation to the emperial court, and his high rank in the Church, gave him the favorable notice of those of the cardinals who were under the lead of the chancellor, Haimericus; and these, at most fifteen in number, ere yet the Pope had been interred, and without information of his decease having been sent to the absent cardinals, in person elected to him the favor of the synod of Carthage. (Feb. 14, 1130.) But his dread of the Roman court, and his pure life, attracted to him especially all the saints of the Catholic Church.
his chief friends in the city. Meanwhile Peter Pierleoni was chosen as his rival in an orderly election by a majority of the cardinals who were entitled to be elected and to sit in the name of Anacletus II. (see art.). Impelled now by fear, Innocent II. fled to Pisa, and thence to Genoa, where Bernard had prepared for his reception by influencing the French court and clergy in his favor. Also, at the synod of Etampes, that same day, which concurred in the deposition of Anacletus and the formal recognition of Innocent II. Then followed a long conflict between the partisans on both sides. In October, 1180, a synod held at Wurzburg declared for Innocent; and a stately embassy was sent to inform him of his recognition by the German sovereign, Lothair, and the German bishops. In January, 1181, Henry of England, at a personal interview, presented him with a thousand marks of silver. Encouraged by this support, Innocent demanded of Lothair that he march to Rome in force, expel his rival, and put him in his seat. In return, Lothair sealed the surrender of those privileges which had been extorted by the Concordat of Worms, and was only dissuaded from insisting on his request by the eloquent appeal of Bernard. In August, 1133, Lothair marched to Italy; and, after some futile attempts at negotiation by Anacletus, he compelled the latter to shut himself in St. Peter's Church, and had himself crowned emperor in June, at the Lateran, by his chosen pope. As a requital for such success, Lothair once more pressed on the Pope his former request, but was again dissuaded from it, this time by Norbert; and he was obliged to content himself with some small concessions. During the festivities of the coronation, the Pope invested the emperor with the goods of Mathilda of Tuscany, on condition of an annuity of a hundred marks of silver. Encouraged by this support, Innocent demanded of Lothair that he march to Rome in force, expel his rival, and put him in his seat. In return, Lothair sealed the surrender of those privileges which had been extorted by the Concordat of Worms, and was only dissuaded from insisting on his request by the eloquent appeal of Bernard. In August, 1133, Lothair marched to Italy; and, after some futile attempts at negotiation by Anacletus, he compelled the latter to shut himself in St. Peter's Church, and had himself crowned emperor in June, at the Lateran, by his chosen pope. As a requital for such success, Lothair once more pressed on the Pope his former request, but was again dissuaded from it, this time by Norbert; and he was obliged to content himself with some small concessions. During the festivities of the coronation, the Pope invested the emperor with the goods of Mathilda of Tuscany, on condition of an annuity of a hundred marks of silver. From this act it was afterwards deduced the right of regarding the emperor as the vassal of the Roman see. On leaving Rome, Lothair committed to the care of the俺 the care of the Frangipani: but, distrusting his guardians, Innocent removed (1138) to Pisa; and there (in 1135) assembling a numerous council, he hurled excommunication afresh against Anacletus and his party. Though inclined at first to scorn the impotent decree, the latter soon learned his full danger when Bernard went to Milan, and in a few days drew over to Innocent's side the whole population of the city, which had been hitherto devoted to him. His last prop was removed when Roger of Sicily was expelled from Italy by Lothair, who died, however, on his return from the expedition, without completing the fullestablishment of his ward in St. Peter's chair. But Innocent still possessed in Bernard an ally mightier than the emperor's sword. Then, just as this support, too, seemed likely to fail, Anacletus died, leaving him master of the situation. The peace of Fulda was concluded in that year (1139), and Roger of Sicily put under the ban. Thereupon Innocent led an army in person against the king, but, falling into an ambush, was captured. The result was the purchase of his freedom by recognizing Roger as king. On his return to Rome, he undertook to heap upon the Church and people, and to restore the authority of Rome over the smaller states which had formerly been under its rule. The result was a long war with Tiroli, concluded by a peace favorable, indeed, to the Church, but exasperating to the Romans, who desired the utter demolition of the city. In consequence, the Romans renounced obedience to the Pope, chose their own rulers, and called into life again the old republican senate. In addition to this disaster, the good understanding which had existed between Louis of France was ruptured, because of the king's refusal to accept a candidate whom the Pope had recommended to the bishopric of Brouges. The strife proceeded so far, that the Pope is said to have suspended an interdict over the kingdom. In the midst of these contentions Innocent died (Sept. 23, 1143). The most notable of his dogmatic decisions was his condemnation of the doctrines of Abelard and of Arnold of Brescia (see those arts.).

INNOCENT III., Antipope to Alexander III. from 1179 to 1180; by name Landus of Sezza; from one of the oldest Lombard families, and not from the Frangipani. He was chosen pope by the Roman nobles, and those of the clergy who were hostile to Alexander, on Sept. 29, 1179 (not 1178). The relatives of Octavian (Victor IV.), the first antipope, supported him; and Octavian's brother received him into a stronghold between Palombara and Rome. By bribery Alexander succeeded in getting him into his hands, and sent him to the convent of La Caonile, near Bologna. By bribery Alexander succeeded in getting him into his hands, and sent him to the convent of La Caonile, near Bologna. Retuming to Rome, he was made canon of St. Peter, and, by the aid of his relatives, among the cardinals, rapidly mounted the ecclesiastical stairs. Appointed a sub-deacon by Gregory VIII., he in 1180 exchanged this position for that of cardinal-deacon at the wish of his uncle, Clement III., in order, that, as the Pope's nephew, he might act a distinguished part among the cardinals, while as yet not thirty years old. Owing, probably, to family jealousies, he was, under Celestine III., seldom called to the business of the curia. The leisure thus afforded he employed in composing various treatises,—one in three books (De contemptu mundi, De vita humanae conditionis), another in six books (Mysteriorum evangeliaca leges ac sacramenti eucharistiae), another, on ecclesiastical law (De quadrupartita specie nuptiarum). The first two only are extant.

At the death of Celestine III. (Jan. 8, 1198) Lothair was elected pope, in the thirty-seventh year of his life; then, rapidly passing his life, he was crowned
Feb. 22. Before entering on the world-wide problems of his position, it devolved on him to restore the papal seat to Rome, secure the respect of the Italians, induce the city prefect to recognize his superiority, and secure the resignation of the senator chosen by the people, and hitherto independent of papal authority. He then stepped forth as the deliverer of Italy from the domain of the German princes appointed by Henry VI. He plundered Spoleto, subjected Perugia, took a commanding position in Tuscany, placed his rectors in patrimonies, and soon became the acknowledged defender of national independence. Sicily, too, contributed to his good fortune. Here ruled the oath of allegiance to Innocent as his feudal family long devoted to the Roman see, and a superior claims of Otto as descended from a Norman ruler in relation to the Church, and took the oath of allegiance to Innocent as his feudal superior. Dying in 1198, she by will named Innocent regent of the kingdom, and protector of her son. At once the Pope entered with zeal upon his new duties, subjecting the German princes to his young ward, and taking care of his education. In Germany affairs were most favorable for the extension of the papal power there. Two claimants were contesting for the imperial crown,—Philip of Swabia, and Otto IV. The latter at once sought the favor of Innocent by renouncing the Hohenstaufen, yet, in a letter of reply to the Pope, Philip's son-in-law, should be made Duke of Tuscany. Whether the tribunal was ever held, is uncertain. Even the great Innocent could not withstand the temptation to nepotism. Just at this juncture, Philip was assassinated by Otto of Wittenbach (June 21, 1208), and Otto became the undisputed sovereign of Germany. Innocent again dexterously shifted his tactics. He held up before Otto the imperial crown, and wrote him, "We demand of thee, dearest son, the thing which thou canst not but grant, because it accords with thy view, and serves for thy soul's salvation." Otto replied, "Outdoing all his former pledges. He acknowledged the bounds of the States of the Church as drawn by Innocent, promised help in rooting out heresy, renounced interference in church elections, and, in short, surrendered every thing which had been secured to the empire by the Concordat of Worms. At such a price did Otto purchase his coronation as emperor. In the summer of 1208 he began his march over the Alps with a mighty host, and met the Pope at Viterbo. The interview was one which hardly sustained the Pope's first greeting. "This is my beloved son, in whom my soul is well pleased." Yet he deemed it not prudent to postpone the coronation, which took place at St. Peter's, Oct. 4, 1209. Once crowned, Otto ignored all his promises and obligations, and proceeded to deal as best he could for his own and the empire's advantage. He declared war against the Pope's protégé, Frederic of Sicily, and seized a part of the patrimony of Peter, and for these acts of violence was put under the papal ban. Nor was Innocent content with anathema alone. He proceeded to stir up against his quondam pet the Italian nobles and German princes, and treated with the king of France for his dethronement. In these measures he was so far successful that it now held from which it may yet hold, and to assist in obtaining those which it does not now occupy." The significance of this document is evident, furnishing as it did a foundation for the wider extension of the Church state. In the fortune of arms Otto was at first successful; and Philip was induced to try negotiations with the Pope, but on terms which could not be granted. In 1204-05, however, affairs took a decided turn. Several of the strongest partisans of Otto deserted to Philip.
INNOCENT III.

In 1215, at Rome, he was duly proclaimed emperor elect. His rival was anathemized. Death spared the Pope the discovery of the enormous blunders, which, from an ecclesiastical point of view, he had committed in thus exalting Frederick II. to the throne.

A worthier triumph was achieved by Innocent, over Philip (II.) Augustus of France, in forcing him to renounce his marriage relations. Under the pretext of a too close connection in blood, but really on the ground of a conceived aversion, this prince had obtained from his bishop a divorce from his wife Ingeburga, and had married Agnes, daughter of Duke Berthold III. Against such proceedings Celestine III. had already entered his protest, and now Innocent took up the cause of the rejected queen. His remonstrance being unheeded, he put the whole of France under interdict, stirred up against the king a large portion of the clergy, the nobles, and the common people, and at last, on Sept. 7, 1213, he compelled the king to pledge the restoration of Ingeburga to her position as queen and wife. It was, however, to little purpose. The separation which the king could not effect by law, he sought to accomplish by subjecting his wife to constant vexations and humiliations, which might eventually compel her to leave him of her own accord. In all these trials the Pope remained her friend; and though he relaxed somewhat in the energy of his measures for her relief, when the aid of the king was needed in some of his projects, yet he persevered in refusing his consent to the divorce, and had the satisfaction of knowing at last that the queen, who for seventeen years had been watched and harassed as a prisoner, was received back into full honor by her penitent husband. With like success the Pope interfered in the domestic affairs of Alphonso IX. of Leon, whose wife he constrained to depart from him by the force of an interdict, because of a too close consanguinity; and also in those of Peter of Aragon, whose contemplated espousal of Bianca of Aragon he prevented for the same reason; and then, when, after Peter’s marriage with Maria of Montpellier, the royal libertine wished to put her aside and take the papal position of the act, Innocent, by ecclesiastical weapons alone, soon brought the offender to terms, and humbled him even to the surrender of his kingdom, which he accepted back as a papal feof. King Sancho of Portugal, also, he compelled to pay the tribute promised to the pope see by his father, though much against his will; and Ladislaus of Poland, when guilty of robbing the church and bishops of goods and rights, he soon subjected to his requirements. The extent to which Innocent asserted to himself the sole right of putting princes under ban, and of releasing them from it, may be seen in his dealings with John Lackland. When this king, upon atonement made for his father’s wrongs, was released from the ban which had been put on the kingdom by Archbishop Eric, the Pope wrote to Eric that he had imitated him ape-fashion, and reminded him that such release was valid only when granted by the vicar of St. Peter. With this Choice, when he went away at the demand of the Bulgarians, who formerly belonged to the Greek Church, with the Church of Rome by consenting to Prince John’s request for coronation, who desired it for the sake of papal protection against foreign and domestic foes.

But it was in his treatment of John Lackland, the king of England, that Innocent’s assumption of universal power as the “vicar of Christ” fully culminated. The quarrel was occasioned by the king’s interference in the election of a superior over the monks of Canterbury. The Pope, refusing to sanction his choice, made a countermove by convening some members of the convent, who happened to be at Rome, and secur ing, through them, election of Stephen Langton, a cardinal priest, to the contested position. This step enraged the king. When threatened with an interdict, he swore, “by God’s teeth,” that he would hunt every ecclesiastic who dared to proclaim it, out of the land. The interdict fell, and John sought to make good his oath. A ban followed; and, in spite of all John’s efforts to hinder its publication, it became known. The nobles, who hated his tyranny, rose against him; and fierce the conflict grew, until at last Innocent declared the throne vacant, and instigated Philip Augustus of France to take possession of it, promising to all who engaged in the attempt the title and privilege of crusaders. This extreme measure frightened the king into abject submission; and on May 13, 1213, he concluded a convention with ten papal plenipotentiaries at Dover, pledging the acknowledgment of Stephen Langton as archbishop, and the restoration to the church of all its property which had been seized, and also of all exiles to their homes. Nor was this humiliation sufficient. To secure himself against the threatened invasion of Philip, although under the pretext of atoning for his sins, on May 18 John surrendered his realms “to God and the Pope,” and received them back as a papal feudatory, bound to an annual payment of seven hundred marks for England, and three hundred for Ireland. Then it was, when prostrate in the dust at the feet of the archbishop as a suppliant for mercy, that he was released from the ban. The interdict was not lifted until July 2, 1214, on the fulfilment of the conditions pledged. But, though now reconciled with the Pope, the quarrel with the barons went on, until by force of arms they extorted from the king the famous Magna Charta, and thus laid the foundation of the English political constitution. No sooner did Innocent learn of these transactions than he pronounced the terms of the charter null and void. It touched too closely upon the royal prerogatives, and indirectly upon the feudal sovereignty of the Pope. But neither declaration nor excommunication had any effect on the nation. One only who took part in the uprising of the barons fell a sacrifice under the power of the Pope: this was Langton. By reason of his refusal to put the insurgents under the ban, he wasdeposed as archbishop of Canterbury, suspended from his archbishopric. But nothing so damaged the papal cause in England as this opposition of Innocent to the Magna Charta. Here it was where the Pope had at last fully realized his ideal of the true relations between Church and State, and here it was where the papacy began to encounter its most effective opposition.

What Innocent’s ideal was may be learned from what he wrote to King John: “Jesus Christ wils that the kingdom should be priestly, and the priesthood kingly. Over all, he has set me as his vicar upon earth, so that, as before Jesus ‘every knee shall bow,’ in like manner to his vicar all shall be obedient, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd. Raising this truth, then, and the secular prince, hast subjected thy realm to Him to whom all is spiritually subject.” Accordingly, in entertaining this view of his position, Innocent naturally felt, when defending the rights of the Roman chair before princes and peoples, that whatsoever he did was wrought in and through the influence of Him whose vicar he was. Moreover, he applied to himself the word of Jesus: “All power is given unto me in heaven and earth.”

Peter’s miraculous walk upon the sea was to him a sign of how the nations of the earth were to be subdued under the feet of himself and his successors. Like Melchizedek, the Pope, he conceived, united in one person the offices of king and high priest. And as, in the ark of the covenant, the rod was placed beside the tables of the law, so he considered, that, in the heart of the Pope, there resided together both the fearful power of destruction and the right to bestowed as a vehicle of pardon. The parable already drawn by Gregory VII., comparing the Church and State to the sun and moon severally, Innocent expanded into an illustration for showing how the State was actually dependent on the Church for its true lustre and glory. A frequent declaration of his was it, that the priesthood alone (i.e., the Church) sprang from the divine appointment, while the State originated “from human extortions.” Hence, in all cases where a heinous sin was in question, he claimed the right to test the decisions of the secular tribunals, and if necessary to quash them. Both the secular and the spiritual swords, he affirmed, belonged to the Pope; and, while he reserved to himself the latter, the former he gave over to the princes.

In discharging his duty as the vicar of Christ, Innocent now, as at the beginning of his pontificate, felt it obligatory on him to summon the kings and peoples of the earth to a holy war for the recovery of Palestine. In this movement he was largely aided by the rare eloquence of two men.—Fulk of Neulliy, who wrought effectively among the French nobles, and Abbot Martin, who was no less influential with those of South Germany. But the crusading host encamping near Venice was early turned aside from its undertaking by the craft of the Doge Dandolo, who employed it for the recovery of Zara from the king of Hungary. In vain did Innocent use warning and threatening to divert them from this attempt. The doge’s work was done. Hardly was this difficulty adjusted, when the crusaders engaged in another enterprise, equally foreign to their original purpose, and no less contrary to the will of the Pope. Influenced by the persuasions of Philip of Germany, they lent their assistance to his brother-in-law, Alexius Angelus, in his project of regaining from his uncle the empire of the eastern Roman world. Constantiopolis was captured. But by this event the relations between the Greeks and Latins became so disturbed, that, in a popular insurrection, Alexius was caught, imprisoned, and finally strangled. Thereupon the crusaders took possession of the city, and set up there a Latin empire. On May 16, 1204, Baldwin of Flanders was crowned emperor. This event, opening as it did to the Pope a prospect of uniting the Greek and Latin churches, recalled him to the course pursued by the crusaders, and in a letter to them he expressed the joyful hope that he could be but one fold and one shepherd. And now was vouchsafed to him that which his predecessors had sighed for in vain; viz., the nomination of a Catholic patriarch for Constantinople.

On Oct. 12, 1204, Innocent issued a bull for raising a crusading expedition into Livonia. The leader of the several enterprises which followed was Albert, Bishop of Livonia, who succeeded in baptizing the Livonians in 1206, and also the neighboring Lotti in 1208, and subjecting both to the chair of Peter. In reward for this, Albert was released from the control of his metropolitan at Bremen, and made, in a measure, independent.

But, on his becoming involved in a conflict with the “Knighthood of Christ in Livonia,” Innocent sought to adjust the difficulty by a compromise, the conflicting terms of which soon made it evident how impracticable it was for a church power to be centralized at Rome to manage wisely the conditions and relations of remote ecclesiastical provinces.

It is not so creditable to Innocent, that he first employed the crusades for the extermination of heresy. In 1207 he enjoined on the French king the duty of annihilating the heretics of Toulouse. The cruelties inflicted on the Albigenses, in consequence, are not to be charged so much on Innocent himself as on his system, which may be traced back to Augustine (see art. Cathari). The orders of the Pope against heretics were approved at the twelfth general synod (1215), and incorporated in the canon law. They were, in substance, that all rulers should be exhorted to tolerate no heretics in their domains: if a ruler refused to clear his land of heretics at the demand of the Church, and should persist in his refusal, he should be deprived of his authority, and even ejected from it by force; to every one who joined in the expeditions against heretics, like favors should be granted as were granted to crusaders. At the same council the severest enactments were issued against the Jews. Rulers were forbidden to trust them with public offices. In order to be known as Jews, they were to clothe themselves with a peculiar garb. During Holy Week they were not to appear on the streets, lest, in that season of sorrow, Christians should be scandalized by their decorated attire. At this council, also, condemnation was pronounced upon the doctrine of Amalrich of Bena (see art.); and on a treason against Peter Lombard by Joachim of Florence (see art.). Moreover, the formation of new monastic orders was discouraged; and alike on Dominic and on Francis, both of whom prayed to have their orders confirmed, was the command of the council imposed, that they should subject their societies to distinguishing rules. The last deliverance of the council was to summon Christendom to a new crusade to the Holy Land, in 1217. At this council, held near the close of Innocent’s pontificate, the Pope showed himself as the unlimited ruler of the great ones of the world and of the church. Emperors, kings, and princes had sent to it their plenipotentiaries; and fifteen hundred... archbishops, bishops, and abbots took part in its transactions, or, rather, were present to listen to and record the decrees of Innocent. Deliberations, properly speaking, were none. Consent followed at once on the reading of the Pope's decree. But, while the ecclesiastics thus exalted their Superior, they virtually voted their own abdication. None of Innocent's successors had so cut down the privileges of bishops and metropolitans as he had done, and none had so largely assumed the right of patronage belonging to local church officers. He was the first to assert the Pope's right to grant benefices; and he issued a decree. But, while the ecclesiastics thus exalted their Superior, they virtually voted their own assent. And he did this at the cost of the country clergy, and to the disparagement of the Romish clergy, and even to his own relatives and intimates. And he did this at the cost of the Romish clergy, and even to his own relatives and intimates.

Even during his reign, his bulls and decretals were collected and published at three several times; and a fourth collection, comprising those of the last six years, was issued shortly after his death. But, though thus crowded with work, this Pope found leisure for literary labors. We have from his pen an exposition of the seven penitential Psalms, evincing a tone of sincere piety. Moreover, he preached frequently, not only at Rome, but all upon his journeys; and those of his sermons which have come down to us bear testimony to his earnest piety and deep humility. Once and again did he utter a sigh for rest from occupations which wore out body and soul. And this rest he found in death (July 10, 1216) at Pisa, where so many disputes had been settled. And this rest he found in death (July 10, 1726) at Pisa, where so many disputes had been settled.

The new pontiff was an eminent jurist belonging to one of the first families of Genoa: and it was hoped that his election would terminate the long strife which had been waged between the Church and the emperor, inasmuch as the new Pope, while cardinal, had been the constant friend of the latter. To this end a settlement was proposed, highly advantageous to the Pope, but which failed of success by reason of the mutual distrust entertained by the parties. The Pope, pending negotiations, fled suddenly to Lyons, whither he called a general council, for the ostensible purpose of correcting abuses in the Church, of carrying aid to the Eastern Christians, and of settling the difficulties between the Church and the empire. The emperor, on the other hand, issued, in his own interest, a letter to the princes of Christendom, unveiling the real purpose of the Pope, and promising to organize a crusade, provided Innocent would remove the ban that had been put on him, and would quiet the rebellion in Lombardy. But, at the third session of the papal council, Frederick II. was deposed and excommunicated, and the electoral princes called upon to choose a new emperor. Notwithstanding the mediation of Louis IX., and the orthodox confession made by the emperor before the Bishop of Palermo, the Pope remained obdurate, and the strife waxed bitter. Innocent fomented rebellion in Sicily, and had Henry Raspe, landgrave of Turingia, proclaimed emperor of Germany. The princes of the empire, however, for the most part remained true to Frederick; and his rival soon made allies among the imperial forces, led by Conrad, son of Frederick. His death left Frederick's influence in Germany paramount. The Pope could find no one willing to accept the gift of the crown, save Count William of Holland, whose supporters had to be bought with gold. Frederick died Dec. 13, 1247, transmitting his feud with the Pope to his son Conrad, whose hereditary crown of Sicily Innocent had bestowed upon the English prince.

Innocent had bestowed upon the English prince. His death left Frederick's influence in Germany paramount. The Pope could find no one willing to accept the gift of the crown, save Count William of Holland, whose supporters had to be bought with gold. Frederick died Dec. 13, 1247, transmitting his feud with the Pope to his son Conrad, whose hereditary crown of Sicily Innocent had bestowed upon the English prince.
INNOCENT V. (Pietro de Tarantasia), Pope 1276, was chosen to succeed Gregory X. Jan. 21, 1276. He had been Archbishop of Lyons, Cardinal Bishop of Ostia, and grand confessor. His first aim was to reconcile the warring factions of the Guelphs and Ghibellines, which had embroiled the Italian states; and he succeeded so far as to bring Lucca and Pisa into friendly relation, and give peace to Tuscany. Whilst preparing to send a numerous embassy to the Greek emperor, Michael Paleologus, in the interest of the union of the two churches east and west (to which the Greek ambassadors at Lyons had previously consented), Innocent died (June 22), after a brief pontificate of five months. He was a voluminous writer. Besides his postils and quodlibets, he composed a number of philosophic and other works, most noteworthy of which were commentaries on the Pauline Epistles and on the “Sentences” of Peter Lombard. A hundred propositions drawn from his writings, and condemned by learned contemporaries, were defended by Thomas Aquinas.

INNOCENT VI. (Etienne d'Albert), Pope 1352-62. On the death of Clement VI. the cardinals assembled, and, before making choice of his successor, proceeded to limit the prerogatives of the papal chair as follows: (1) The Pope shall appoint no new cardinals until the existing number shall have been reduced to sixteen. The whole number shall never exceed twenty, and none shall be appointed without the consent of at least two-thirds of the cardinals. (2) The Pope shall not imprison, depose, place under the ban, or suspend a cardinal, without the consent of all his peers. (3) The Pope shall neither alienate the lands of the Church, nor invest anyone with the same, without the consent of two-thirds of the cardinals. (4) The revenues of the Church shall be equally divided; one half going to the Church and the other to the city. (5) No relative of the Pope shall be appointed governor of any of the provinces of the Church. (6) The Pope shall not receive tithes of ecclesiastical livings, nor any subsidies, without consent of two-thirds of the cardinals. These propositions the cardinals were compelled to subscribe under oath, some doing so with the reservation “Si jure niterentur.” Thereupon the votes were taken; and the choice fell upon Stephen Albert, Bishop of Ostia, Dec. 18, 1352. He took the title of Innocent VI., and his first act was to declare the propositions which he subscribed with the reservation above specified null and void. Deeply versed in canon law, and severe in morals, he died at Naples, Dec. 7, 1254.

INNOCENT VII. Cosimo de Migliorati, Pope 1404-06. On the death of Boniface IX., the cardinals bound themselves by oath to do their utmost to secure the healing of the great Western schism, mutually pledging their willingness to resign even the papal chair, in case such a step should be deemed necessary to the furtherance of an end so desirable. The new Pope (elected Oct. 17, 1404) was distinguished alike for the purity of his character and the extent of his learning, particularly in the provinces of civil and canon law. He had been previously appointed to several responsible positions, and employed in a number of delicate missions, by Urban VI.; nominated also chamberlain of the Church and legate in Bohemia. He was sixty-five years old when elected Pope. He assumed the title of Innocent VII. Shortly after his accession, a tumult broke out in Rome between the Guelphs and Ghibellines; a nephew of Innocent heading the former. In it a number of citizens were slain, and the Pope was compelled to flee the city. His exile, however, was brief. The people, as soon as they were convinced of his freedom from all complicity in the murderous act, restored him in triumph. Since the party opposed to the Pope was openly encouraged by Ladislaus, king of Naples, and Neapolitan troops were employed by it in attacks upon the city, and raids into the country, Innocent was compelled to put the king under the ban, and declare his kingdom forfeited. The king, however, fearing an attack from his rival, the Duke of Anjou, soon submitted to the conditions of the Pope. About this time the war between France and England, which had lasted as far as Genoa, desiring safe conduct from Innocent to Rome, under the pretext of holding con-
INNOCENT VIII. (Giovanni Battista Gibo), Pope 1484-92; chosen Aug. 29, 1484. He sprang from a Genoese family of Greek origin. We find him first as a youth at the Neapolitan court, then at Rome, in the service of Cardinal Philip of Bologna. After having held successively the bishoprics of Savona and Melfi, he was made cardinal 1473: on his accession he vainly sought to unite the princes of Christendom in a crusade against the Turks. He became involved in the French band of Naples whose crown he offered to Ferdinand, Duke of Lorraine. A peace favorable to the Pope was effected Aug. 12, 1486. It was, however, shortly after violated by Ferdinand, who was excommunicated, and kept under the ban until peace was declared (1492). While urging the princes and people to arm against the Turk, the Pope shamelessly entered into treaty with the Sultan Bajazet, according to which he agreed—for the sum of forty thousand ducats per year, and the gift of the sacred spear which was said to have pierced our Saviour's side—to keep Zezim, a brother of the sultan, and a pretender to his throne, who had fallen into his hands, a close prisoner. Thus he thriftily turned to advantage his relations to both Christian and Pagan. The reputed wizards, witches, and soothsayers with which Germany was at this time filled, were by him prosecuted with great severity. The processes which his judges employed against these wretched creatures have been preserved in a book, which is remarkable alike for its learning, superstition, and vulgarity (see Witches and Processes against Witches). He strove also to arrest the progress of the Husites in Bohemia, canonized the Margrave Leopold of Austria, and passed the closing years of his reign in creating new places, that by their sale he might enrich his treasury. Innocent died July 25, 1492. His sixteen children bear witness to the fidelity with which he kept his vow of chastity. These he was constantly and shamelessly seeking to enrich and advance. One of the eight cardinals he created was the son of Lorenzo de Medici, whom he elevated to the office before he had passed his thirteenth year.

INNOCENT X. (Giovanni Battista Pamphili), Pope 1644-55; was chosen Pope (Sept. 15, 1644) in his seventy-second year, chiefly because he had said little and accomplished less. He owed alike his ill fortune and ill fame to Donna Olimpia Maidalchino, his brother's widow, with whom, even during the life of her husband, he held questionable relations. On the sudden death of the husband, she became the absolute mistress of the prelate, and the inspiration of his whole life; so that caricaturists were in the habit of representing the viceroy of Christ as arrayed in a frock, styling him another Johanna, with the keys of St. Peter. Though he owed his elevation to the family of the Barberini, he was no sooner seated than he called upon them to give an account of their stewardship, in hopes of transferring their vast wealth into his own keeping. Fleeing to France, they succeeded in enlisting the French king in their cause, which led to a rupture with the Pope, and a seizure, by the French, of Piombino and Portolongano. The result was a restoration of the Barberini to their offices and estates. The Duke of Parma, having, in defiance of the Pope, invested a certain infamous Theatine monk with the bishopric of Castro, the papal authorities took possession of the bishopric and earldom, and razed the fortifications of the city. The Peace of Westphalia, concluded in opposition to the vigorous and repeated protests of the papal nuncio (October, 1648), seriously impaired the papal prerogative. In anticipation of the Pope's bull, declaring the articles of peace null and void, it was stipulated that no spiritual or secular rights, nor decree of council, privilege or indulgence, edict or inhibition, no papal concordat, dispensation, absolution, or remonstrance, made in contravention of the treaty, or of any of its separate provisions, would either be heard or entertained. The papal protest, however, was not to be without its significance in the future. For the present, its only influence was to damage the prestige of the Pope. The papal nuncio, having boldly published the pontiff's bull at Vienna, was expelled from the city with a scurrilous message to his Holiness. Innocent's zeal for the purity of doctrine was shown in his formal condemnation (1653) of five propositions taken from the works of Jansenius. Guided by the counsel of Donna Olimpia, he succeeded in devising means for enriching the papal coffers, which he had found burdened with a debt of eight million scudi. The most shameful system of bribery and corruption prevailed in every rank of the papal hierarchy: offices were openly bought and sold. Two thousand of the smaller cloisters were closed, and their revenues sequestered. Among the more extraordinary measures taken to bring money to Rome was the Pope's letter, Universales maximique jubilati, 1650. The most injurious was the monopoly of the corn-trade by the papal exchequer, by means of which flour was retailed to the baker at an increase of one-third in price, and a reduction of one-third in measure, resulting, as... is alleged, in the ruin of agriculture in Italy. Innocent died Jan. 5, 1655. His pontificate covers a period of deep degeneracy in the Church, marked by a conningling of things profane and sacred, and by the domination of parasites and mistresses, the Church all the while contending for her ancient privileges in all their fulness. See Rossencher: "Hist. Innoc. X.", Wittenberg, 1874; and Ranke: "Hist. of the Popes."

INNOCENT XI. (Benedetto Odescalchi), Pope 1676—89. He was b. at Como, May 16, 1611; educated by the Jesuits, and studied law at Genoa, Naples, and Rome. After having distinguished himself for his integrity and ability in various high positions, he was created cardinal (1647) through the influence of Donna Olimpia, and subsequently nominated legate of Ferrara, and Bishop of Novara. He owed his elevation, Sept. 21, 1676, to the French party in the College of Cardinals. On his accession, he set about the furtherance of a stricter morality in Church and State. He rebuked by his example the prevailing extravagance, rigidly limiting his own expenses, and abolishing all cardinalships and benefices whose services could be dispensed with; revived the stringent laws regulating the examination of candidates for consecration; enjoined upon the clergy the leading of holy lives, the catechising of the children, and the opening of schools for their instruction; forbade the use of dialectic sophistries and fables in the pulpit, bidding the priest proclaim only the crucified Christ; dismissed the nunnels from the papal chapel; interdicted the luxurious habits of dress prevalent amongst the women, forbidding them the study of music; condemned the morals of the Jesuits in his bull March 2, 1679; and came into collision with France on account of the so-called "Privilege of Asylum" claimed by foreign ambassadors for criminals, not only within their palaces, but also in the precincts adjacent. This privilege Louis XIV. would not consent to have abrogated; and his ambassador De Lavardin, who entered Rome with a retinue of a thousand soldiers and servants, was accordingly put under the ban. Neither party would yield, and the "Regal Right" remained open until after the death of the Pope. It was finally settled in his favor. The so-called "Regal Right" was another apple of discord between the Pope and the French king. Louis had insisted upon appropriating the revenues of certain vacant churches and benefices, even in cases where they had not been planted by the crown. This attempt was resisted by the bishops; and the Pope sustained them, even to the extent of threatening the king with the extreme censure of the Church. As a countermove, the latter called a council of the French clergy (Nov. 9, 1681), who not only confirmed the disputed claims of the throne, but made a solemn deliverance consisting of four fundamental propositions (quattuor propositions Cleri Gallicani). A copy of these, by order of the Pope, was openly burnt at the hands of the public executioner, and confirmation refused to all such as were nominated to livings. In consequence, at his death, the bishops of no less than thirty dioceses were without papal consecration. Though the cruel persecution of the Jesuits, and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, by the French king, subsequently drew from the Pope the very highest commendation of the king, he never, to the day of his death, halted in his opposition to the so-called "Regal Right, or Freedom of Quarter." Innocent died Aug. 12, 1689. The French king and the Jesuits alike sought to blacken his memory after death; and his canonization, urged by Philip II., encountered opposition chiefly from these quarters. Without doubt he was an ecclesiastical prince of pure and noble virtues, and one of the most illustrious men that had ever filled the chair of St. Peter. He was compelled by the Inquisition, and whereas by a bull, the writings of Molinos (Nov. 20, 1687), although he was very friendly to Molinos. The efforts of James II. to convert England to Catholicism were, by Innocent, not only considered rash, but as calculated to increase the power of the king and lead to an alliance with France, rather than to advance the Church. The fall of James was therefore not mourned; and his plea for the papal help was answered by a cool rejection, on the ground of the Pope's absorption in his struggle with France. See Ullmann: "Le pape Innocent XI. et la révolution anglaise de 1688," Paris, 1876; also Bigelow: "Molinos the Quietist," N.Y., 1882, which gives, pp. 113-127, a translation of Innocent's bull, and Molinos."

INNOCENT XII. (Antonio Pignatelli), Pope 1691-1700, was chosen Feb. 12, 1691, after a five-months' conclave. Born March 13, 1615, he was in his seventy-seventh year when elected. He entered public life early. After holding many important offices, was made cardinal bishop of Faenza, and archbishop of Naples by Innocent XI., whose title he took, and whose example he strove to imitate. He had no sooner taken his seat than he set his face sternly against nepotism. The poor were his beneficiaries; the Lateran, his hospital. He declared it unlawful for any pope in the future to invest his relatives with any of the offices or revenues of the Church. He sought to reform cloister discipline and the lives of the secular clergy; interdicted the lottery; brought to a close the controversy with the French king, on the condition of limiting the exercise of "Regal Right" to vacant benefices lying within the territory of Old France. The Pope was several times involved in controversy with Leopold I. of Germany in reference to questions of precedence; but, through mutual concessions, these, as they arose, were amicably settled. Friendly relations with Charles II. of Spain were interrupted by a question concerning the Inquisition in Naples. Pending its solution, both king and pope died; the latter Sept. 27, 1700. In the controversy between Bossuet and Fénelon, the Pope decided for the former, condemning some twenty-three propositions, which he affected to find in Fénelon's writings, as contrary to good morals and sound doctrine. He bequeathed a large sum of money to a hospital which he had founded, and ordered that the money accruing from the sale of his personal effects should be given to the poor. His reputation is that of a just, charitable, unselfish, and beneficent man. INNOCENT XIII. (Michel Angelo Conti), Pope 1721-24. He was born May 13, 1665. Alexander VIII. had made him a member of his court family, and Clement XI., cardinal. He was elected May 8, 1721, after a stormy session of the council, during which the cardinals came to blows, and inquests were hurled. His accession was hailed as promising rest to the Church, and peace to Christendom. His nomination of his brother as cardinal aroused fears of nepotism, which, happily, proved groundless. Italy prospered under his reign. Like his predecessor, he espoused the cause of the Pretender to the British throne under the title of James III. Charles VI. of Germany he invested with the kingdom of Naples. He also wrested Castel Polo, on the Mediterraean, from its unwilling proprietor, and, under French influence, clothed a contemptible profligate with the office of cardinal. These two last acts are spots on a character otherwise fair. When Malta was invested by the Turks, after issuing a call to Christendom, he himself hastened to the rescue with men and money. He had serious thoughts of abolishing the order of the Jesuits on account of their opposition to the Chinese mission, and took under his protection the so-called “Constituto Unigenitum,” which had been wrung from his predecessor. His death occurred March 7, 1724.
INNOCENTS' DAY. 1099

INQUISITION.

R. ZÖPPFEL (trans. by D. W. Poor).

INNOCENTS' DAY, a church festival in honor of the children slain by Herod in Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 16), and who thus were in a sense the first Christian martyrs. It was very early celebrated; for it is mentioned by Irenaeus and Cyprian, at first, in connection with Epiphany. Later, in the Western Church, Innocents’ Day came on Dec. 28; in the Eastern Church, on Dec. 29. It is not known when the festivals were given different days. Peter of Ravenus (Chrysologus), a bishop of the fifth century, has left two sermons upon the Massacre of the Innocents, considered quite apart from the Epiphany; and the fact would seem to indicate that the separation was made in his day. At present, in the Roman, Anglican, and Episcopal churches, Innocents’ Day is Dec. 28. The Roman priest celebrates the mass on this day in a blue gown. The Armeno-Gregorian calendar gives the number of infants slain by Herod at fourteen thousand; the true number was probably less than this.

INNS AMONG THE HEBREWS. In one sense of the term, inns did not exist in antiquity; but there were enclosures which afforded some protection, and in which there was a fountain. In later times there were built “kangs,” or “caravanserais,” which are large square buildings containing rooms enclosing an open court (Jer. ix. 2). But no food for man or beast was provided, as the traveller was expected to carry it with him. In the parable of the Good Samaritan, mention is made (Luke x. 34) of another sort of caravanserai, which had a keeper, and where personal care, besides food, a was afforded. The “inn” to which Joseph and Mary went (Luke ii. 7) was probably a caravanserai.

INQUISITION (Inquisition hereticarum pravitatise), or the “Holy Office” (Sanctum Officium), is the name of the spiritual court of the Roman-Catholic Church, the detection and punishment of heretics, and those who sheltered them. Heresy was to be punished with the loss of property, and the house in which a heretic was found was to be burned. Heretics who repented were to wear two crosses, one on their back, and one on their chest. But if the repentance seemed to be a result of the fear of death, the guilty person was to be shut up in a convent. Every two years, males from fourteen years upwards, and females from twelve years upwards, were obligated to repeat an oath to inform against heretics. The neglect of the annual confession was a sufficient ground of suspicion, as also the possession of the Scriptural laymen of the Scriptures, especially in translations. In spite of these measures and the rigorous execution of them, especially in Southern France, the desired result was not secured. The bishops were accused of apathy, and were themselves made subject to the Inquisition, as also the possession of the laymen of the Scriptures, especially in translations. In 1232 and 1233 Gregory IX. appointed the Dominicans a standing commission of inquisitors in Austria, Germany, Aragon, Lombardy, and Southern France. At the same period was organized the so-called "soldiery of Jesus Christ against heretics." Louis the Pious, in his famous edict of 1228 (ad cives Narbonnae) made it the special duty of the civil power to root out heresy, and to punish without delay those who were condemned. The suspicion of heresy was made a sufficient ground for apprehension; and, by a bull of Innocent IV. in 1252 (ad exorcista), repentance was to be had, if necessary, to torture, to extract a confession.

The notion of heresy was enlarged so as to comprehend not only the slightest deviation from the creed of the Church, but also usury, sorcery, contempt of the cross and clergy, dealings with Jews, etc. (The case of Galileo Galilei shows how heresy was understood. This distinguished astronomer (b. Pisa, Feb. 18, 1564; d. in the Villa Martellini, at Arceti, near Florence, Jan. 8, 1642) was tried by the Inquisition in Rome (June 21, 1633). The charge against him was, that he had held the Copernican theory, and had written in advocacy of its doctrines condemned in the decree of 1616; viz., that the sun is fixed in the centre of the world, and that the earth rotates. In reply, he said, that, since the Congregation of the Index had condemned it, he had not held the Copernican theory. The published documents of the Inquisition were in some respects less cruel than those of the criminal courts of the day; but he fails to prove that the Spanish Inquisition originated with the State rather than with the Church. The one to give complete organization to the movement in Spain was the bloody Domingo de Torquemada, who [in 1483] was appointed inquisitor-general. His associates received the most definite instructions, and surrounded themselves with spies, the so-called "Familiars of the Holy Office." The most noble in the land offered themselves for this service in order to secure their own persons. The terror which the horrible punishments of the Inquisition produced was the occasion of revolts and occasional assassinations of the inquisitors; but it continued to rage, the king himself using it to extend his authority, and fill his treasury. In 1492 all the Jews who refused to become Christians were compelled to emigrate; and a similar edict was passed against the Moors under Torquemada's successor, Diego Deza (1499-1506). Under the third inquisitor-general, Ximenes (1507-17), according to Llorente, 2,538 were put to death, 1,568 burned in effigy, and 47,263 punished in other ways. Each tribunal consisted of three inquisitors, besides assessors, secretaries, familiars, and other officers. The place of meeting was called the "holy house" (casa santa). If the accused appeared, he was carefully examined, and placed in a dark prison. His head was shorn; his property, especially his books, inventoried; his income usually confiscated; and so terrible was the fear the tribunal inspired, that not even the accused's nearest friends dared to appear in his defence. Immediate avowal and renunciation of heresy secured to the party immunity from the sentence of death, but seldom averted the loss of property and confinement. In spite of his renunciation, the accused was obliged, for a certain period, to wear the San benito (a shirt without sleeves, and bearing a red St. Andrew's cross on the back and on the breast). On the other hand, the denial of the charge of heresy seldom saved the release of the prisoner; and extreme tortures were applied to extort a confession. If these failed, artifice was used to entrap the accused; and, where all means were exhausted, the victim was put to death at once, or condemned to a miserable life in prison. The sentence of death was enforced by the civil arm, and the accused was usually burnt alive. He was taken, in a solemn procession, to the public square, where the Auto da fé (act of faith) was consummated.

Under Charles I. the Cortes sought for a modification of the laws of the Inquisition; but under Philip II. the flames burned brightly again, at first in Seville and Valladolid (1559 sq.). But by degrees the powers of the Inquisition were effaced, and the activity of the Inquisition became limited to the destruction of prohibited books, of which an Index had been prepared in 1558. Under Charles III., in 1770, an edict was passed, securing an accused party from arbitrary imprisonment; and other regulations were passed, curtailing the powers of the Inquisition, until, in 1808, Joseph Napoleon abolished it entirely. In 1814 Ferdinand VII. restored it; but the popular rage in 1820 destroyed the Inquisition, until, in 1808, Joseph Napoleon abolished it. In 1816 (against Llorente); ORTI y LARA: La Inquisicion, Madr., 1877; RODRIGO: Hist. verdadera de la Inquisicion, Madr. (1879?); ALBANESE: L'Inquis. relig. nella Repubb. di Venezia, Venice, 1878; MCCrie: History of the Reformation in Italy new edition, Edinb., 1836, and in Spain. [See also LIMBROCH: Histor Inquisitionis, Amtb., 1892; RULE: The History of the Inquisition, London, 1874, 2 vols.; MOLINIER: L'Inquisition dans le midi de la France au 18me et 19me siecles, Paris, 1880; the same: De fratre Guillemo Peliaso veterrimo inquisitionis historico, Paris, 1880; J. DE MAISTRE: Lettre à un gentilhomme russe sur l'inquisition espagnole, Lyons, 1880; V. DE FÉRÉAL: Les Mystères de l'inquisition, Paris, 1880; the same: Storia della tremenda Inquisizione di Spagna, Firenze, 1851; C. R. v. HÖPFER: Monumenta Hispanica; I. Correspondencia d. Gobernadores von Castilien, Grossinquisitores in Spanien, Frag. 1881; OCHSNER: D. Inquisitionsprozess wider d. Waldenser zu Freiburg i. U. im J. 1430, Bern, 1881; Practica inquisitionis heretic pravitatis, auctore BERNARDO GUIDONIS. Document publié pour la première fois par C. DOUALIS, Paris, 1856?; NEUBÜCKER (BENRATH).]

The fortunes of the Inquisition in Portugal were similar to those which it had in Spain. In the reign of John VI. (1818-26) it was finally abolished. The last relics of the Italian Inquisition disappeared at the unification of the nation. The Congregation of the Inquisition at Rome, appointed by Sixtus V. in 1587, is all that remains of it. In 1640 it was abandoned by the civil arm, and the accused was usually burnt alive. He was taken, in a solemn procession, to the public square, where the Auto da fé (act of faith) was consummated.

The Inquisition was first introduced in the sixteenth century, it became a terrible weapon in the time of the Reformation. In 1521 Charles V. passed a rigorous edict against heretics, and appointed Franz van der Hulst inquisitor-general. In 1525 three inquisitors-general were appointed, in 1537 the number was increased to four, and in 1545 one was appointed for each of the provinces. According to Grotius, a hundred thousand victims died under Charles V.; according to the Princes of Orange, fifty thousand. Both computations are safe. The inquisitors developed the most zeal; and the Duke of Alva, in 1567, appointed the bloody Council, which proceeded with unheard-of cruelty against those whose wealth excited their avarice, or whose heresy aroused their suspicion. In 1573 Alva was recalled; and three years later the provinces concluded the League of Ghent, whose fifth article abolished the edicts against heresy.

INSPIRATION designates the influence of the Holy Ghost upon the writers of the Scriptures, by which they have become the expression of God's will to us. The term comes from the Vulgate translation of 2 Tim. iii. 16: Omnis scriptura divinitus inspirata (“All scripture divinely inspired”). The Greek word diarwbavos, of which the passive meaning is “endowed with God's Spirit,” is “inspired” is the translation, does not occur in classical or profane Greek,—its occurrence in Plutarch (De placit. phil. 5, 2) being in all probability an error of the copyist,—but seems to have been used for the first time, in writing, in 2 Tim. iii. 16. The word sometimes had the passive meaning of “endowed with God's Spirit” (Sibyl. 5, 406; Vita Sab. 16); but here, after the analogy of πνευματος (“breathing ill”), etc., the meaning seems to be “breathing the divine Spirit,” and not, with the Vulgate, “given by the divine Spirit.” The latter interpretation has in its favor the word that has that meaning when joined with αναψυχα (“man”); but the former suits better with the context “profitable for instruction,” etc. (v. 15), and the usual mode of speaking of the Scripture as the word of the Holy Ghost (Acts xxvi. 25, etc.). Origen seems to have understood it in this sense when he said the “holy Spirit of the Bible” (sacra volumina spiritus plenitudinem spirantis, Hom. 21 in Jerem.). The Feshito, on the other hand, and the Ethiopic versions, understand it as meaning “inspired by God,” the former translating it: “Every scripture which is written in the Spirit” (av oqetaw). A well-defined doctrine of inspiration cannot be said to have existed until after the Reforma-
INSPIRATION.

The earliest views on inspiration in the Church leaned upon the Alexandrian theology much more than upon the Jewish. The Talmudic and Alexandrian Judaism agreed in ascribing a peculiar authority to the Old Testament. The former held that the Torah, or Law, was of immediate divine origin. God wrote it with his own hand, or dictated it to Moses as his amanuensis. Although some teachers were inclined to regard Joshua as the author of the account of Moses' death (Deut. xxxiv. 5), others held that Moses was the author, and wrote it with tears. The other writers of the Old Testament were not inspired in the same degree; and the Jewish theologians of the middle ages taught that the prophetical books were written by the spirit of prophecy, and the Hagiographa by the spirit of holiness, and that the writers of the latter exercised their individuality to a larger extent than the former. Josephus held that the canonical books were all written before the close of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, 425 B.C. (c. Ap. 1, 8); but both he and Philo speak of a continuance of the gift of prophecy, the latter ascribing it to every pious and wise man. All the writers of the Old Testament were prophets, and, as such, interpreters of the divine will, unconscious of what they spoke. They were in an ecstatic condition, or trance (θεωρία μανία), both when they spoke and wrote, and were simply the passive organs of the Spirit of God.

The Scriptures recognize an ecstatic condition; but it is something different from the ecstasy of Philo, except, perhaps, in the case of Balaam, who prophesied against his will. It is not, as Augustine has rightly said, a suspension of the mental faculties (alienatio mentis), but an “alienation of the mind from physical sense-perception” (alienatio mentis a sensibus corporis). The Hellenistic or Philonic theory, therefore, was not derived either from Scripture or from Jewish theology proper, but rather from heathen sources. Hellenism alone knew of an ecstasy (θεωρία μανία), as Philo defined it. He got it, undoubtedly, from Plato, who regarded a divine enthusiasm (ευθυμία) or ecstasy as the primal fount of philosophy where the inspiration was drawn, but differed from Plato in holding that the individual consciousness was entirely lost.

These are the views we meet with in the writings of the early Church. The apostolic fathers supposed the fact of inspiration; but the apologetic writers of the second century, such as Justin Martyr (Coh. ad Graec. 8, 10; Apol. I. 36) and Athenagoras (Leg. 9, 42), emphasized the divine origin of the Scriptures, and give the impression that they were more wedded to the mechanical, but not the mystical theory. This view was advocated by the Montanists; and it is to the opposition of the Church to them that we are indebted for the prevalence of sounder views of inspiration. Mitians, an apologetic writer, wrote a work against Montanism, opposing the view that the prophets spoke in an ecstatic condition, or trance (τοις τοῖς δεινο προφητῶν ἐν καταστασι λαλεὶς, Euseb., H. E., 5, 17); and Clement of Alexandria regarded such a condition as an evidence of false prophets and an evil spirit (Strom. 1, 311). After Origen, the Church teachers emphatically denied that the prophets were in a state of unconsciousness when they spoke. They did not limit the influence of the Holy Spirit upon the biblical authors, but admitted their independence, to which more than form and style are attributed. But they did not attempt to reconcile the divine and human factors; and both Ireneus (Ad. her. III. 16, 2) and Augustine (De cons. ev. II., 13), while speaking of the apostles as writing down what they remembered, at the same time compared them to the hands which wrote down what Christ dictated. Jerome discovers solemnia in Scripture (Ep. ad. Eph. II. ad 3, 1); and Origen goes farther, when he distinguishes between the contents of Scripture, which are not true and its language, in which the writers, who carefully elaborated their style, sometimes made mistakes. Origen gave more attention to the discussion of the nature of inspiration than any of the other fathers; and, according to him, it included an elevated activity of the human mind, and the Spirit calling the former forth. In the Church of Antioch the human side was made prominent; and Theodore of Mopsuestia held that Job was a poem which had sprung up on heathen soil: but in the Western Church the councils, as well as the Church itself, came to regard all the doing in a certain sense inspired. At a later period, when Agobard of Lyons (d. 840) affirmed that the biblical writers did not always observe the laws of grammar, the abbot Frederic of Tours went so far in his reply as to say that the Holy Ghost formed the very words themselves in the mouths of the apostles (etiam ipsa corporalia verba extrinsecus in ore apostolorum).

Scholasticism manifested no special interest in the doctrine of inspiration, although Anselm laid awake many nights, meditating how the prophets could look upon the future as though it were the present; and Thomas of Aquinas made a distinction between revelation and inspiration. The latter recognized different grades of inspiration among the prophets of the Old Testament; so that David knew more than Moses. The principle was, that the nearer they lived to the advent of Christ, the greater was their illumination. The Holy Spirit used the tongue of the speaker, but did not destroy his independent activity. The authority of the Scriptures was universally acknowledged; and only Abelard thought of asserting that the prophets and apostles were not always free from error, quoting Gal. ii. 11 sqq. in support of the assertion.

The Reformation emphasized the authority, and encouraged the use, of the Scriptures. No one thought of denying their authority. The only question was as to their meaning and application. This explains the absence of any discussion of the nature of inspiration by the Reformers.

Luther, on the one hand, regarded the Bible as a book on “a letter or title of which more hung than upon heaven and earth,” but, on the other hand, speaks of it as containing hay, straw, and stubble, of an insufficiency in Paul’s argument (Gal. iv. 22 sqq.), etc. He regarded the Holy Spirit as the author of Scripture, but recognized the writers by their peculiar characteristics, and asserts that they poured out their whole heart into their words. Calvin held the same views.

In the Scriptures we hear, as it were, the very voice of God; but he does not shrink from speak-
Confessions emphasized the supreme authority of Scripture, but did not investigate the nature of inspiration; nor did Gerhard (d. 1637), even in his richly-filled script, go beyond the author of the theory which is usually denominated the Orthodox Protestant theory. According to him, inspiration is the form which revelation assumes, and nothing exists in the Scriptures which was not divinely suggested and inspired ("dicitur sugeticus et inspiratus"). Quenstedt, Baier, Hollaz, and others followed, affirming that the writers were dependent upon the Spirit for their very words, and denying that there were any solecisms in the New Testament. The Buxtorfs extended inspiration to the vowel-ints of the Old Testament, but did not investigate the nature of the Old Testament. This view was adopted in the eighteenth century, it is Schleiermacher's merit to have emphasized the human element—a receptivity and an activity—awakened by Christ. It therefore extends, not only to the writings, but to the entire activity, of the prophets. The Old Testament proceeded from the Spirit; the latter defined inspiration as the form which revelation took, in contrast to the New Testament, where the principal stress upon the human factors in the composition, who are, by reason of their relation to Christ, the accredited and trustworthy witnesses of Christian truth. The spirit which controls them is not the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity. Far as he departed from the theory of inspiration which prevailed in the seventeenth century, it is Schleiermacher's merit to have emphasized the human element in the composition of the Scriptures. Twesten renewed the supernatural theory of the seventeenth century, without its exaggerations; and Beck regarded it as an essential element in the "organization of Revelation," and not to be confounded with revelation. Both he and Philippi conceived of it as illumination; the latter defining it as "that influence of the Spirit by which the mind is wholly transferred into the sphere of revelation, and is fitted to report the special subject exactly, or as that conversation with the human mind of the Spirit by which the revelation of the latter becomes, without adulteration, the thought of the former." Roth defined inspiration as the momentary condition of the soul by which it is enabled to understand and to infallibly interpret revelation. The inspiration of the apostles was only the increased measure of the Spirit indwelling in them, and the Scriptures are simply the outflowing of the divine life of their authors.

As we said at the beginning, inspiration means something different from the Greek ideas,

"breathing the divine Spirit." It refers to the origination, the latter to the contents, of the Bible. But, if the Bible breathes the Spirit of God, then it must have received this characteristic from God. If it breathes his Spirit in a peculiar manner, then it must have received it in a peculiar way. We are therefore justified in speaking of a special influence of the Spirit upon the authors of the Scriptures. For this idea the Church has coined the term "inspiration." The first question is, whether the Scriptures do really breathe the Holy Spirit in a peculiar manner. This is a matter of experience (an experience of faith), just as God's nature is a matter of experience; but this experience must be of the nature of a universal one for all religiously disposed persons, and such we find it to be. It is and has been the experience of the Church with reference to the Scriptures as a whole; and the Church has regarded them as the infallible standard of religious life, and the absolutely pure spring of all religious convictions derived from them. The Scriptures, however, contain the revelation of salvation: their authors, therefore, must have stood in peculiar relations to the Holy Spirit. Of what nature this relation was can only be ascertained from the history of salvation as it is found in the Scriptures themselves. This relation varies at different times, and is modified by the relative nearness of the parties to God. The distinction between the inspiration of the Old and New Testaments is brought out by the words used in the two cases. It is uniformly said of the prophets, that the "word of the Lord came to," or the "word of the Lord which . . . saw" (Isa. ii. 1; Amos i. 1, etc.). In the New Testament the word of the Lord was revealed through Christ (Acts x. 38; Rom. x. 5-8; Tit. i. 3, etc.). Here, in order to apprehend the revelation of God in Christ, only a relation of faith to Christ is necessary (Luke x. 24; 1 Pet. i. 10; Matt. xii. 17). The preparation to be a witness for Christ is a fruit of a personal relation to him (Matt. x. 27; John xv. 15).

The attestation of the gospel is conditioned upon the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the witness; but it is a special calling, and, like every ecclesiastical service, requires a special preparation by the Holy Spirit. Every one who is regenerated is not inspired, but every one who is inspired is regenerated. Inspiration, therefore, is the charism which fitted the apostles, in spite of their personal imperfections (comp. Gal. ii. with 1 Cor. ix. 16 sqq.), to announce authoritatively, and for all time, the facts of salvation and their meaning. If a special preparation was necessary under the new dispensation, much more so was it under the old. Here the influence of inspiration might be exerted upon persons in whom the Spirit did not dwell as a vital and constant principle. Again: the inspiration, at least of the prophets, was a temporary endowment; that of the apostles, an abiding one; and the former suffered from the same defects of spiritual experience as their contemporaries (Acts viii. 24; 1 Pet. i. 10, 11). Under the old covenant the writers had to be prepared to interpret the meaning of history with reference to salvation. The knowledge of historical facts they got in the usual way; and if it be true that the preparation of the Spirit extended only to the interpretation, and not to the acquisition, of historical facts, then we can easily explain their divergences in matters of chronological sequence, the attendant circumstances, etc.

The activity of the Holy Spirit is, therefore, neither limited nor made impossible by the independence and peculiarities of the biblical writers, as was thought in the seventeenth century, but made possible and advanced by it. Inspiration is the very opposite of a suspension of human independence. It rather confirms and sanctifies it. The gift of inspiration does not stand out of relation to the circumstances, etc. The activity of the Holy Spirit is, therefore, inseparable from the circumstances, etc. (CHARLES HODGE: Theology, i. p. 163). "They were preserved from error of fact, doctrine, and judgement," (PATTON: Inspiration, p. 92). In the seventeenth century this view was held in such a way, that inspiration became synonymous with dictation, and the writers were compared to pens (calami Spiritus S. dictantis), or to a flute (Carpso, Quenstedt, etc.). Others, while denying the literal dictation, held to the plenary verbal inspiration theory (Gaussen, Dr. Charles Hodge, Shedd, Patton, Given, etc.). The very words are the words of the Spirit, because "the thoughts are in the words, and the two are inseparable" (HODGE: Theol., i. p. 164). Inspiration has also been described as an influence of superintendence. This word, first used by Doddridge in this connection, has recently been made prominent by Drs. Hodge and Warfield (Presb. Rev.), who say, "The essence of inspiration was superintendence" (p. 229). "The Holy Spirit elevated and directed the faculties of the writers, when need be, and thus secured the errorless expression in language of the thought designed by God" (p. 231). They admit, however, that there may be errors in Scripture as we now possess it, and assert infallibility "only for the original autographic text" (p. 245). This class of views has in its favor (1) the difficulty of conceiving how the thought could be suggested by the Spirit without the language; and (2) the support it gives to the authority of the Scripture as a system of truth and a guide of action. Against this class of views the following objections are urged: (1) It is hard, on this general theory, to account for the individual peculiarities of the writings. The style of Milton in Paradise Lost is the same, whether he dictates to one daughter or to another. But in the Scriptures there is a marked difference between the style of Hosea and Isaiah, John and Paul, although the same Spirit suggested the language of each. It is urged, however, that the Spirit accommodated himself to the peculiarities of the writers. (2) There are differences of statement in the Scriptures concerning the same facts. To instance a single case, Paul says twenty-four thousand died in the plague (1 Cor. x. 8) in which Moses reports twenty-four thousand to have died (Num. xxv. 9). (3) It is hard to explain the divergences (not contradictions) in the Gospels when the narratives refer to the same facts or to the same discourses of our Lord. Consider, for example, the four forms in which the superscription on the cross is given, or the words of our Lord to the disciples on the lake. Matthew (viii. 25-27) reports the latter...
INSPIRATION.

as, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith!" Mark (iv. 30-41), "Why are ye fearful? have ye not yet faith!" The force of this consideration led Osiander (Harm. Evv., Basel, 1537), who held a high theory of inspiration, to assume that Peter's wife's mother was healed of the fever three times! (4) It is very difficult to understand why the New Testament we have an ever increasing number of variations (now amounting to a hundred thousand), which, indeed, do not affect any doctrine or precept, yet seem to be inconsistent with this theory; for, if a literal inspiration were necessary for the Church, God (so we should expect) would have provided for the errorless preservation of the original text. Moreover, the great mass of Christians has to depend upon vernacular translations, for none of which infallible accuracy is claimed.

2. The second general theory of inspiration is, that the writers of Scripture enjoyed the influence of the Spirit to such an extent, that it is the Word, and contains the will of God. This view is the prevailing view to-day, and has been held by Luther, Calvin, Baxter, Doddridge, Wm. Lowth, Baumgarten, Neander, Tholuck, Stier, Lange, Hare, Alford, Van Oosterzee, Plumptre (Com. on Acts, ch. vii.), F. W. Farrar, Dorner, etc. It admits mistakes (or at least the possibility of mistakes) in historical and geographical statements, but denies any error in matters of faith or morals. Baxter said, "We may doubt some of the words of the Old Testament and circumstances of the New, and yet have no reason to doubt the Christian religion." Our conviction of the truth of Scripture is "not bettered, if the holy men could err in things about which it was not necessary to receive certainty, and certainty in regard to which is unimportant from a religious point of view. It is sufficient that they received unadulterated, and present without error, the infallible spiritual truth, to witness which they were appointed," etc. (Dörner: Glaubenslehre, i. 635). This view lays stress upon the sense of Scripture as a revelation of God's will, and leaves room for the full play of human agency in the composition. It preserves the spiritual meaning, and does not imperil the whole by an appeal to our ignorance to explain unessential variations.

This theory (1) admits of the highest respect for the Scriptures as the Word of God. Luther accused Paul in one instance of false logic, and spoke disparagingly of Esther; but no one has ever held the letters of the apostles to more than the force of the New Testament, and does not imperil the whole by an appeal to our ignorance to explain unessential variations.

This theory (1) admits of the highest respect for the Scriptures as the Word of God. Luther accused Paul in one instance of false logic, and spoke disparagingly of Esther; but no one has ever held the letters of the apostles to more than the force of the New Testament, and does not imperil the whole by an appeal to our ignorance to explain unessential variations. (2) It helps us to understand the divergences in the accounts of our Lord's life, and the inconsistencies in historical statement of different parts of the Bible. An instance is found, in the report of Stephen's speech, where it is stated that "Abraham purchased the field from the sons of Hamor in Shechem" (Acts vii. 16). In Genesis, Jacob is reported to have purchased the field. (3) This theory is more in accordance with the method of the Spirit's working in general. The apostles were not perfect in their conduct and judgment as rulers and teachers of the Church (Acts xv. 39; xxiii. 3; Gal. ii. 12; 1 Cor. xiii. 12; Phil. iii. 12). The grace of God was in them as earth vessels. The same may be said of the Scriptures. They are a human vase in which the divine revelation is contained. They are God's book, and yet man's composition; and the true inter-relation of the human and divine elements is as difficult of explanation as that of God and man in the work of salvation (Phil. ii. 15, 19), or that of the soul and the body. (4) It removes a hindrance out of the way of many who would gladly believe the Bible to contain the word of God, if it were not necessary to give their assent to all its historical statements. (See excellent remarks by Morell, p. 169.) Many can believe the discourses of our Lord in John (xii. sqq.) to be divine who cannot so regard the list of the Dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 15-43), or all the tables of the Books of Chronicles, or the exact number killed for looking into the ark,—50,070 (1 Sam. vi. 19). It may be said that we would thus be embarrassed to know what is and what is not inspired. The objection is to some extent well founded; but in this case, as in men's individual relations to Christ, they are left to exercise their judgment, guided by the Holy Spirit. (5) This view makes the absence of an absolutely pure text intelligible. The autographs of the apostles do not exist; and we may speak reverently in saying that this might have been expected, if the letter of Scripture were the work of the Spirit.

III. Proofs of Inspiration.—The passage "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" (2 Tim. iii. 16) is often quoted as a proof of the inspiration of all the canonical books. The meaning of the term ἐπιγραφόμενον has been discussed above. Here it is sufficient to say that the passage has reference to the books of the Old Testament, and that the translation making it a dogmatic statement is probably incorrect. The Revised Version gives the true rendering: "Every scripture inspired of God," etc. The proofs of inspiration are as follows: (1) The statements of Scripture itself. In the Old Testament the authors testify to the divine origin of their message by such expressions as the "word of the Lord came," or the " Lord spake by his servant." The prophets were specially called (Jer. i. 8, etc.). The inspiration of the writer of the Old Testament is also proved by the terms applied to their writings in the New Testament (Rom. i. 2; 2 Tim. iii. 16, etc.), the explicit statements of our Lord (Matt. iv. 4, xxii. 29; Luke x. 26) and his apostles (Heb. i. 2), their frequent quotations from it, and our Lord's proof of its infallibility of its utterances (John v. 39; Luke xxiv. 27, etc.). The inspiration of the New Testament is likewise proved by its own testimony, the apostles insisting upon the infallibility of their words (1 Cor. ii. 1105 INSPIRATION.
INSPIRED.

1106

INTERCESSION.

13; 1 Thess. ii. 13; 2 Thess. ii. 13), and by the Lord's promise to them of a special endowment of the Spirit (John xiv. 26; xvi. 13; comp. 1 Cor. vii. 40, etc.), and a supernatural supply of wisdom and words (Matt. x. 20; Luke xxi. 13). Christ, it is true, did not appoint scribes; but he appointed ministers, and promised to them his miraculous presence and power. (2) The nature of the contents. The inherent excellences of Scripture (as in the case of the person of Christ) are sufficient witnesses to its heavenly origin. The unity of the book, unfolding a single purpose; its elevated tone; the faultless character of Christ; the nature of the facts revealed of God, the soul, and the future,—all stamp it as a work of more than ordinary human genius or insight. This testimony is, for most minds, the strongest of all. It is the testimony of the Holy Spirit in the experience. The more familiar," says Doddridge, "one becomes with these books, the more will one be struck with this evidence;" and Van Oosterzee well says, "He who will acknowledge in Scripture no higher than a purely human character comes into collision, not only with our Lord's word and that of his witnesses, but also with the Christian consciousness of all ages," etc. (Dogmatics, p. 199). (3) The a priori proof. This argument is hardly less strong than the previous ones, for minds which hold that God has given to man a revelation of his will. If God has made such a revelation, he would make special provision for its infallible communication.

INSPIRED, The, is the name of a sect which was formed in Germany about 1700, under the influence of the prophets of the Caenisards. Driven out of France, those enthusiasts went first to England, then to the Netherlands, and finally to Germany, where they found many adherents, not only among the French refugees, but soon also among the natives. Congregations were formed in Halle and Berlin (1714); and a number of German prophets arose, the most prominent among whom were E. L. Gruber and J. F. Rock. Especially in the neighborhood of Wetterau, Wittgenstein, and Wied, where the country swarmed with separatists of all kinds, the movement gained strength; and in the second decade of the eighteenth century congregations of the Inspired were found in Hesse, the Palatinate, Württemberg, and Saxony. In doctrine they differed not so very much from the evangelical churches, though they believed in continuous inspiration; but their ideas of discipline and organization separated them from any established church. In their congregations there was no office of teacher or preacher. Their service consisted of free prayers, singing, and recital of Gruber's Die 24 Regeln der wahren Gottheit und heiligen Wandels, and prophecies, if any were given. Rock was the last medium of inspiration among them; and after his death, in 1740, the movement gained strength; and in the second decade of the present century, when new prophets arose among them. The Hessian and Prussian governments, however, saw fit to interfere with the prophets; and in 1841 a considerable emigration (about eight hundred souls) took place. The emigrants went to America, where they formed a flourishing colony at Ebenezer, in the State of New York. They afterwards left that place, and settled in Iowa. See M. GOEBEL: Gesch. d. wahren Inspirationsgemeinden, in Zeitscr. f. hist. Theol., 1854, 11, III.; 1855, 1, III.

INSTALLATION denotes generally the ceremonial act by which a person ordained and appointed is formally put into possession of an ecclesiastical benefice, but is in the English Church sometimes applied specially to the office of a canon or prebendary, or the enrothronization of a bishop. When a bishopric is nominated by the government, is appointed by the proper authority to an ecclesiastical benefice, more especially a bishopric.

INTERCESSION, the act of one who endeavors to reconcile persons at variance, or of one who pleads for another. The act is often performed among men, and constitutes one of the good traits of our fallen humanity. But theologically it is used of the work of Christ, and improperly of deceased saints. Christ is set forth in Scripture as our intercessor. It is his function as high priest; and therefore, in his wondrous prayer before his death, he remembers us all (John xviii. 11, 20). He appears in the presence of God for us (Heb. ix. 24), and makes intercession for us (Rom. viii. 24). He is therefore denominated of righteousness on the ground of his intercession is his atoning work. He pleads the shedding of his blood, and thus obtains the pardon of our sins. His intercession is "authoritative (he intercedes not without right: John xvii. 24), wise (he understands the nature of his work and the wants of his people: John ii. 25), righteous (for it is founded upon justice and truth), 1 John i. 2, 17 (v. 8), unique (he is the only intercessor: 1 Tim. ii. 5), perpetual (Heb. vii. 25), efficacious (1 John i. 1, 2). It follows, from the above, that there is no such thing as the supposed intercession of saints. The arguments against such erroneous teaching may be thus stated: (1) It supposes the existence of a class of beings who do not exist,—canonized departed spirits, who have been officially declared to be such by the Church. (2) It leads to practical idolatry. The saints, and particularly the Virgin Mary, are prayed to, instead of God. (3) It is derogatory to Christ. It makes him share the work of intercession with others, as if he were incompetent to do it alone. (4) It supposes that some have merit of their own to have a claim upon God. (5) It is superstitious, because there is no evidence in Scripture of any such intercession; and degrading, because it calls the attention of the worshipper from God to a creature, and teaches him to lean upon an arm of flesh. See Hodge, Systematic Theology, ii. 592—595. See MEDIATOR.

INTERDICT, a punishment which the Roman-Catholic Church inflicts upon its members, forbidding the celebration of service, the administration of the sacraments, the performance of ecclesiastical burial, etc., developed from the excommunication, and occurs under a triple form, personal, local, and mixed. The first traces of it are met with in the times of Gregory of Tours; but it did not develop into a well-defined institution in the practice of the Church until the eleventh century. During the middle ages it was often used with great effect. Innocent III., in 1208, pronounced an interdict upon the diocese of Posen-Gnesen in 1839. The right of pronouncing an interdict devolves upon the Pope, the councils, and the bishops: the right of enforcing it devolves upon him who has pronounced it, or his superior. See Kober, in Archiv f. kath. Kirchen, vol. xxii. SCHEUHL.

INTERIM, a provisional establishment, or modus vivendi, imposed upon the German reformers by Charles V., until a general council should have decided between them and the Pope. There were three such interims, named after the places where they were issued; namely, Ratisbon, Augsburg, and Leipzig, which see.

INTERPRETATION. See EXEGESIS, HERMENUTICS.

INTERSTITIA TEMPORUM. Canon 13 of the Council of Sardica (347) demands that a clerk shall remain for some time in each order; so that a certain interstitium temporis elapses before he is promoted from a lower to a higher order. As long as the lower orders were still connected with clerical functions, the above maxim was applied also to them; but when, in course of time, they became merely preparatory steps towards the higher orders, it became customary to confer them all in one day. The Council of Trent (Sess. 23, can. 17) attempted to correct this practice, but in vain. For the higher orders it decided that the interstitium should comprise a whole year. The excommunication of bishops obtained, however, a certain power of dispensation. WASSERSCHLEBEN.

INTINTION denotes the peculiar mode in which, in the Greek Church, the Eucharist is administered to the laity; the consecrated bread being broken into the consecrated wine, and both elements given together in a spoon. Greek writers on liturgy claim that this custom dates back to the time of Chrysostom. In the Western Church it never gained foothold. It was forbidden by Julius I. (337-352) as unscriptural.

INTONATION, the modulation of the voice, in the act of reading a liturgical service, so as to produce a musical accentuation and tone. It is practised in the Greek and Roman churches, and in some Episcopal churches. It adds to the impressiveness of the service, if it be really finely done; but it mars its intelligibility.

INTRODUCTION. I. Old Testament.—Widely different opinions exist respecting the idea and treatment of this branch of theological study. On the one hand, J. G. Carpzov (Introductio, Leipzig, 1721), and at a much later date De Wette, even in the last edition of his Introduction, which he edited (7th edition, Berlin, 1852), maintained that it properly concerned all that helped to make the Scriptures intelligible. On the other hand, Reusch (R. C.) includes under the term only the origin of the several books, their collection (canon), inspiration, and preservation; and Keil defines Old-Testament Introduction as the knowledge of those underlying historicocritical principles of the Old-Testament canon which explain and justify its theological use by Jew and Christian. Franz Kaulen (R. C.), in the logical wake of Keil, assigns Introduction to dogmatic theology as a branch of apologetics. Richard Simon expressed the right idea in his Histoire critique du texte de l'ancien testament (Paris, 1678), that it was an historical science, and accordingly he treats of the history of the text, etc.; but unhappily he was not faithful to his own principles. Hupfeld (1844) suggested making Introduction a history of the Old-Testament writings. Such a history would not necessarily be the same as a biblical Hebrew literary history, although Hupfeld, J. J. Stähelin, and Delitzsch would so consider it; for the latter properly is a history of the literary development of the old Hebrews, as displayed in their literature, while the former has to do with the origin and history of that collection of books we style the "Old Testament."

The idea, of course, directly affects the treatment. When Old-Testament Introduction is considered as a collection of important facts bearing upon the interpretation and estimation of the Old Testament, it is divided into two parts, general and special. General Introduction treats of the original languages of the Old Testament, the versions, the history and criticism of the text, the history of the canon; special Introduction, of the contents, origin, and credibility of the separate books. But if Old-Testament Introduction be looked at as a history of the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament, then it comprises the origin of the single writings, the history of their collection, of their canonicity, and, finally, of their transmission and spread with a canonical authority. A historico-critical treatment of the matter is throughout obligatory.
INTRODUCTION.

As an independent discipline, Old-Testament Introduction is comparatively recent; for the ancient Church had no interest in merely scientific questions respecting the Scriptures. Jerome gives some valuable materials, and Adrianus' tract, de extr. sacrae legendae, fifth century, published first by Höschel, 1602, and in Critici sacri, London, probably gave the name to the science; but hermeneutics, rather than introduction, was served.

The nearest approach in this period was made by Cassiodorus (sixth century), in his Institutiones divinarum literarum, in which he enumerates the different books, and mentions the most important commentaries upon them, gives hermeneutical rules, and then passes on to speak of the biblical divisions, canon and criticism. The only work on Introduction produced in the middle ages was that of Nicholas of Lyra (d. 1309), Postilla per diversis commentatoribus in universa biblia, published in Antwerp, 1634. But the revival of learning, and the mighty impetus given by the new art of printing, prepared the way for independent investigations of the Bible; although at first the Protestants were more interested in dogmatic than in critical questions. The Roman-Catholic Church has the honor of producing the first work in Introduction proper: it was by Santus Pagninus Lucenaisi (Sante Pagnino of Lucca, d. 1541), and entitled Isagogae ad sacras literas, liber unicus (Lyons, 1530). Then came Sicutus of Sienna (d. 1580), Bibliotheca sacros ex praeputius catholico ecclesiae auctoribus collecta, et in octo libros digesta (Venice, 1566, and often; last edition, Naples, 1742). The contest between Buxtorf and Caprelus (see those arts.) over the vowel-points called forth quite a literature from the Protestants, who have since kept the field. In biblical criticism two works of this period deserve especial mention. — Brian Walton, In Biblia polyglotta Prolegomena, London, 1657 (ed. Heidegger, Zürich, 1673; by J. A. Dathe, Leipzig, 1777; and by F. W. Wrangham, Cambridge, 1822, 2 vols.;) and Humprhy Hody, De bibliorum textibus originalibus, veritatis praecepta ex literis hebraica et graeca collocata, Londini, 1705. General Introductions were written by Andr. Rivetus (Leiden, 1627), Abr. Calov (Wittenberg, 1643), J. H. Heidegger (Zürich, 1681 and often), J. Leusden (Utrecht, 1650). The scepticism which from England and France spread all over Europe, naturally laid violent hands upon the Bible, as was done by Hobbes, in his Leviathan (London, 1651; modern edition, London, 1882), and particularly by Spinoza (Tractatus theologico-politicus, Hamburg, 1670 [ed. by van Vloten an Land, The Hague, 1883, vol. i., 1836-39; 2d ed. of Part I., by C. F. Keil, Frankfurt, 1864-65; Part III. ed. by Keil, 1849 [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1852]), and C. F. Keil (Frankfurt, 1863; 3d ed. 1873 [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1869, 2 vols.]). (Recent works. — F. W. WEBER: Kurzgefasste Einleitung in die heiligen Schriften Alten und Neuen Testaments, Nördlingen, 1863 (6th ed., 1881); UBALDI: Introductio in sac. script., Rome, 1877, vol. iii., 1882; P. KLEINERT: Abriss d. Einleitung zum A.T. in Tabellenform, Berlin, 1878; Böhl: V. V. (Koln, 1879, 3 parts), E. W. Hengstenberg (Berlin, 1831-39, 3 vols.), H. A. HAHN (Berlin, 1881; Part III. ed. by Keil, 1849 [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1852]), and C. F. Keil (Frankfurt, 1863; 3d ed., 1873 [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1869, 2 vols.]). [Recent works. — F. W. WEBER: Kurzgefasste Einleitung in die heiligen Schriften Alten u. Neuen Testaments, Nördlingen, 1863 (6th ed., 1881); UBALDI: Introductio in sac. script., Rome, 1877, vol. iii., 1882; P. KLEINERT: Abriss d. Einleitung zum A.T. in Tabellenform, Berlin, 1878; Böhl: V. V. (Koln, 1879, 3 parts), E. W. Hengstenberg (Berlin, 1831-39, 3 vols.), H. A. HAHN (Berlin, 1881; Part III. ed. by Keil, 1849 [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1852]), and C. F. Keil (Frankfurt, 1863; 3d ed., 1873 [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1869, 2 vols.]).]

II. New Testament. — What we mean by Introduction was not studied in the Early Church. There was no felt necessity to learn about the origin, the inducing causes, the immediate data, and the history of the New-Testament books. Even the presence of the apocryphal books, and of the heretics who had composed them, or who had departed from the canon, while it increased the reverence of the Church for those books known to be the genuine writings of the apostles and their near followers, and which were set down in this department in the first two centuries. Dionysius of Alexandria (third century) may be called the father of New-Testament historical criticism; for he contested the claim of John the apostle to be the author of the Revelation, while...
Introduction.

formally granting its canonicity. The incitement to critical consideration of the books of the New Testament had, however, been previously given by the discovery, when the Church came into more active intercourse, that some of these books had experienced different treatment in different places. For instance, the Epistle to the Hebrews, which the Alexandrian Church had accepted as Pauline, was found to be little known in other equally orthodox churches, and, indeed, in most was considered un-Pauline and even uncanonical; and the Shepherd of Hermas, it was found, was greatly valued in some churches, while in others it was little esteemed. Local tradition was thus robbed of its value; and the necessity of a critical comparison of these ecclesiastical traditions was felt by the Palestinian branch of the school of Origen. Eusebius' study of the primitive Christian literature was displayed in a comprehensive collection of the older witnesses for and against the not uncontroverted portions of the New Testament; and by so doing he rendered a valuable service, although his intention to substantiate certain prejudices respecting the limits of the canon destroys the objectivity of his information. From him, however, we have received pretty much all we know of the older tradition concerning the origin of the universally accepted books. Jerome followed in his steps, but added nothing, except a little about the difference between the Oriental and Occidental canons and the Gospel of the Hebrews. The dogmatic controversies of the fourth and following centuries diverted attention from critical questions; and what had been previously gained was merely repeated in the introductions to commentaries, catenas, and similar works.

But from the Revival of Learning began a better day for New-Testament Introduction. The works of Santes Pagninus (1536), Sixtus of Siena (1566), and A. Rivetus (1627), contained much information in this department, along with dogmatical considerations, and the new study of textual criticism gave great impetus. Richard Simon (1630–1712) published his three works upon the critical history of the New Testament (Histoire critique du N. T., Rotterdam, 1859–53), and thus won his place as the father of New-Testament Introduction. By critique he understood the investigations for the establishment of the original text; and, by his history from the sources, he disproved not only the Protestant claim of "a witness of the Spirit," but also the scholastic treatment, which, resting upon imperfect acquaintance with antiquity, could not prove that Christianity was a religion based on facts, and that the Bible was the record of those facts. Simon thus won his place as the father of New-Testament Introduction. He at once asked himself, first the history of the text, and then the history of the sources; and by so doing he rendered a valuable service to his Introduction; Eichhorn started his "original gospel" theory; Hug, in an unexcelled manner, investigated the relations of the synoptists. Schleiermacher (1811) called attention to the need of a reconstruction of this branch of study, declaring that its object was a history of the New Testament, so that its present readers might be, in their knowledge of the origin of the books and their text, on a level with the first. This idea—to write a history of the New Testament—has been carried out by Credner (1836), Reuss (1842), and Hupfeld (1844); so also by Davidson (1868) and Hilgenfeld (1875), under the old name "Introduction."

Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792–1860) has had by far the most influence upon New-Testament studies of any man of modern times. He attempted nothing less than a reconstruction of all apostolic and post-apostolic history and literature, in the face of all ecclesiastical and scholarly tradition, from the four Pauline Epistles (Galatians, and Romans), which alone he considered genuine. Starting with the idea that the difference between Paul and the rest of the apostles was fundamental, he declared that those New-Testament writings which either put the relations of the apostles in a more favorable light, or seemed to ignore their difference in the church, were either forgeries, or the products of a later time. But his historical considerations were derived from Hegel's philosophy, and his criticism rested upon dogmatic convictions. These four points may be made against him: (1) He reasoned in a circle; for he examined critically, first the sources of the history, and then the history of the sources. The reasoning which reduced the genuine Pauline Epistles to four reduces the four to none; so that Paul is robbed of his title to have produced any writing which lasted. (2) Baur certainly was extraordinarily familiar with the old Christian literature; but he read it with prejudices, and not...
INTRODUCTION.

with a desire to learn any thing different from his preconceptions. (8) He was lacking in the sense of the concrete and the value of the individual, and therefore could not grasp complicated relations and their results. (4) If it is self-evident that one must understand what he criticises, and that his criticism must rest upon thorough exegesis, then Baur surely was unfitted for this labor; for he was any thing rather than an exegete, and his school has done nothing in exegesis. It should, however, be added, that these defects in Baur's method of work were supplied by others; and the result of the operations of friend and foe is a much better understanding of the New Testament.

INTROIT. The Introd. the name, in the Roman Church, for the anthem sung at the beginning of the communion service. Its origin is obscure. According to the Liber Pontificalis, it was introduced by Celestine in 425. See the art. by W. E. Scudamore, in Smith and Cheetham, Dict. of Chr. Antig., vol. 1, pp. 855-857.

INVESTITURE. In the Frankish monarchy the idea gradually became prevalent, that the ruler of the realm had the right to appoint bishops; and in Germany the kings clung so much more tenaciously to this idea, as, in course of time, the bishoprics and abbacies there entirely changed their original character of being merely ecclesiastical organizations, and became, to all intents and purposes, political divisions, with rights of coinage, toll, jurisdiction, etc., and with corresponding duties, especially of a military description. When a bishop died, his staff and ring were brought from his residence to the king; and, when the king had made up his mind with respect to the choice of a successor, he put the new bishop or abbot into possession of the temporalities of the see by investing him with the staff and the ring, and receiving his homage, or oath of fealty. After the Investiture was followed as the last act in the installation, the consecration by the metropolitan; but that the latter should exercise more than an advisory influence on the whole transaction was out of the question.

Meanwhile, during the first half of the eleventh century, the ideas of the reform party in the Roman curia, concerning the perfect freedom of the Church from any secular power, began to assume definite shape. As the bishops and abbots used to offer great presents to the king on the occasion of their investiture, it was easy to throw a shadow of simony over the whole transaction; and the statutes of the ecclesiastical law concerning simony were very severe. As yet, however, no direct application was made. The curia spoke only in general terms when it forbade ecclesiastics to accept their offices from the hands of laymen; but in 1068 it came to an actual clash. The king appointed a bishop of Milan in the usual way,—by investiture; while the people, instigated by the curia, demanded a bishop canonically elected and instituted. As the king would not yield, a Roman synod of 1074 aggravated the severity of the laws concerning simony; and the next year Gregory VII. officially denied the king's right of investiture, and admonished the people to oppose, in all their ecclesiastical functions, such bishops and abbots as had abused their office in an uncanonical, simoniacal manner.

This meant for Germany the complete overthrow of its constitution. The bishops and abbots were princes of the empire, holding the larger mass of the imperial fees; and, as no dynamical claims could be put forward with respect to these fees, the king wielded an immense power through his right to give them to whom he pleased. It was evident that he would immediately break down before the Pope if he lost this right,—if the bishops and abbots of his realm should be canonically elected, that is, elected by a clergy, which, by the law of celibacy, was completely severed from the interests of the State, and transformed into mere tools of the Church.

The contest was long, extremely bitter, and at times doubtful with respect to its issue. The first attempt, which by the Concordat of Worms (1122), was in favor of the Pope. The emperor gave up altogether his right of investiture with ring and staff; and though he retained a certain influence on the elections, and the right of investiture with the so-called regalia, in its golden days the Church knew very well how to elude these latter obligations. The Concordat of Worms continued in active operation until the dissolution of the German Empire in 1806.

In no other country did the controversy concerning the right of investiture reach such a pitch of intensity as in Germany,—partly because the popes knew that victory on one point would be victory all along the whole line, and were too shrewd to engage in an unnecessary warfare with the whole world at once; partly because the question nowhere else affected the political constitution so deeply. In France, where the bishops and abbots, though large fief-holders, were not princes of the empire, the kings renounced their right of investiture with ring and staff towards the close of the eleventh century; but no elections could take place without their permission, nor was it valid until it received their confirmation,—two points which secured to them a certain influence. In England it came to a compromise between Paschal II. and Henry I. (1107), by which the king retained his right of nomination and of demanding an oath of fealty. Stephen, however, Henry's successor (1135—94), gave up his right of nomination: and in 1215 John repeated the renunciation. Nevertheless, practically the English chapters never obtained freedom in their elections.

INVOCATION OF SAINTS. See IMAGE-WORSHIP.

IONA. It was once a small, but fertile island, lying north-east and south-west, and separated from the Ross, or south-western promontory of the island of Mull, by a shallow channel about a mile in breadth. It is about three miles and a half in length, and one and a half in breadth; the rocks of igneous formation; the surface generally low, but rising into a number of irregular cones or knolls, not usually exceeding a hundred feet in height; the highest of them, which bears the name of Dun-i, or Dun-ii, and is situate on the north of the island, being about three hundred and thirty feet above the level of the sea. It has been variously estimated as containing from sixteen hundred to two thousand acres, much less than half of which are arable, and not more than six hundred actually under cultivation. The pastures on the sides of the knolls and ravines afford sustenance to about six hundred sheep, and from two to three hundred larger cattle. The population, according to the latest census, was two thousand and forty-three, and maintains itself partly by agriculture, and partly by fishing; the large founders in the neighboring seas being accounted unusually fine. The coast is diversified by a number of small rocky bays and headlands, and three or four landing-places,—Port-na-Currach, on the south-west, where Columba is supposed to have first landed; Port-na-Muintir on the south-east, the usual starting-point in crossing from Iona to Mull; and Port-na-Marbh, at which the bodies brought for burial in the island were landed.

The island at the time of the Reformation appears to have constituted a distinct parish, but afterwards to have been united to the parish of Kilfinnichen in Mull, and only in our own day to have been re-erected into a parish quoad sacra. Besides the parish church and the school, there is also a Free Church.

That which for ages has attracted visitors from all quarters to this little island, and still holds them captive by a spell more powerful than the neighboring Staffa does by its grander scenery and greater scientific interest, is that it was once "the luminary of the Caledonian regions, whence," as Dr. Johnson says, "savage clans and roving barbarians derived the benefits of civilization and the blessings of religion." But though its attractions arise chiefly from its history, and it must yield to its neighbor in respect of the grandeur of its scenery and the marvels of its geological structure, it is by no means destitute of physical attractions as Montalembert has represented it to be. Mr. Skene, who knows it far better, has said, "No one who pays merely a flying visit to Iona in an excursion steamer, and is hurried by his guide over the nights, that he may return by the steamer the same day, can form any conception of the hidden beauties,—its retired coves, its long reaches of sand on shores indented with quiet bays, its little coves between bare and striking rocks, and the bolder rocky scenery of its north-western and south-western shores, where it opposes wild barren cliffs and high rocky islets to the sweep of the Atlantic waves." The Duke of Argyll fully concurs in the views of Mr. Skene. Even he who is most impressed with its higher claims, and feels most the force of Dr. Johnson's noble words, need not fail to own that Columba could hardly have found a spot combining more of the natural beauty he loved with the security he sought, and in all respects so well adapted for an island monastery designed "to form the centre of a great missionary work, and to exhibit the Christian life in contrast with the surrounding Paganism." These beauties seem to have been felt by him, especially those of the south-western corner, which Mr. Skene pronounces to be "the very perfection of rocky scenery," where was the Culainn Erin. From its summit the saint could look out on the wide ocean without catching a glimpse of the land of his birth, and might have suggested to his mind the glowing imagery of the poem in which he revels on the delight of gazing from a pinnacle of rock on the face of ocean, with its heaving waves chanting music to their father, or more hoarsely thundering on the rocks.

It was in 563 that the island became the home of the saint, being given to him either by the king of the Dalriad Scots, or by the Picts, its more ancient possessors. It was well suited for a Celtic monastery, no less by its own limited size than by its proximity to larger islands and to the mainland, and it became not only the usual abode of Columba, but the head of all his monasteries and missions. From it as a centre he went out on many evangelistic tours, both to the island and the mainland, and it became not on the usual "pagan Italian" island monastery designed "to form the centre of a great missionary work, and to exhibit the Christian life in contrast with the surrounding Paganism." These beauties seem to have been felt by him, especially those of the south-western corner, which Mr. Skene pronounces to be "the very perfection of rocky scenery," where was the Culainn Erin. From its summit the saint could look out on the wide ocean without catching a glimpse of the land of his birth, and might have suggested to his mind the glowing imagery of the poem in which he revels on the delight of gazing from a pinnacle of rock on the face of ocean, with its heaving waves chanting music to their father, or more hoarsely thundering on the rocks.

It was in 563 that the island became the home of the saint, being given to him either by the king of the Dalriad Scots, or by the Picts, its more ancient possessors. It was well suited for a Celtic monastery, no less by its own limited size than by its proximity to larger islands and to the mainland, and it became not only the usual abode of Columba, but the head of all his monasteries and missions. From it as a centre he went out on many evangelistic tours, both to the island and the mainland, and it became not on the usual "pagan Italian" island monastery designed "to form the centre of a great missionary work, and to exhibit the Christian life in contrast with the surrounding Paganism." These beauties seem to have been felt by him, especially those of the south-western corner, which Mr. Skene pronounces to be "the very perfection of rocky scenery," where was the Culainn Erin. From its summit the saint could look out on the wide ocean without catching a glimpse of the land of his birth, and might have suggested to his mind the glowing imagery of the poem in which he revels on the delight of gazing from a pinnacle of rock on the face of ocean, with its heaving waves chanting music to their father, or more hoarsely thundering on the rocks.

It was in 563 that the island became the home of the saint, being given to him either by the king of the Dalriad Scots, or by the Picts, its more ancient possessors. It was well suited for a Celtic monastery, no less by its own limited size than by its proximity to larger islands and to the mainland, and it became not only the usual abode of Columba, but the head of all his monasteries and missions. From it as a centre he went out on many evangelistic tours, both to the island and the mainland, and it became not on the usual "pagan Italian" island monastery designed "to form the centre of a great missionary work, and to exhibit the Christian life in contrast with the surrounding Paganism." These beauties seem to have been felt by him, especially those of the south-western corner, which Mr. Skene pronounces to be "the very perfection of rocky scenery," where was the Culainn Erin. From its summit the saint could look out on the wide ocean without catching a glimpse of the land of his birth, and might have suggested to his mind the glowing imagery of the poem in which he revels on the delight of gazing from a pinnacle of rock on the face of ocean, with its heaving waves chanting music to their father, or more hoarsely thundering on the rocks.
thirty-two counties, comprising 316 baronies, with 2,532 parishes.

II. History. 1. To the Union of the Irish Church with Rome. — Ireland was at an early date settled by Celtic tribes, differing considerably among themselves, and maintaining constant warfare among themselves by the introduction of Irish colonies formed in Wales and Cornwall on the decadence of the Roman power in Britain; but the founding of an organized church is usually admitted to be due to St. Patrick. The Patrician Church was independent of Rome, and, although agreeing in doctrine with the Western Church of that time, differing widely in organization. At first we find no diocesan bishops with definite territory, and clergy under them, much less metropolitanas in their turn overseeing the bishops. The early Irish Church was essentially monastic, and adapted to the state of society then existing among the Irish Celts. The former religion was what is vaguely known as "Druidism;" and the so-called "schools of the Druids" may have accustomed the Irish to the monastic idea. The tribal system was in full force; and, owing to this, a chief could not make an absolute gift of land to the Church: he could only make over his own rights, the clansmen retaining theirs. Such religious communities were called "monasteries," though only a few members may have taken vows of celibacy. The heads of such bodies were the real ecclesiastical rulers of Ireland; and we find presbyters, laymen, and (in one famous instance, that of St. Brigit) a woman, filling such positions, and in authority over bishops. That the bishops were not territorial in early times is shown by the fact that St. Patrick himself is traditionally reported to have ordained between three hundred and four hundred bishops for a population of probably not half a million persons, and that St. Mocha is said to have had one hundred bishops in his monastery. The history of the Irish Church for the next six centuries is the history of its gradual conformity to the rule, the higher and more educated of the clergy, impressed by the greatness and splendor of the Roman Church, were in favor of such changes as looked towards the establishment of the Roman graded hierarchy. In 380 part of the Church adopted the Roman method of reckoning Easter: in 716 the rest followed. The stricter Benedictine rule was introduced into the monasteries; and the tribe bishops approximated in time to diocesan. An apparent exception to the non-hierarchical constitution was the archbishop of Armagh, who bore this title and the dignity of the see; and the title of archbishop was accorded to Armagh. In 1169 and 1170 the Norman knights landed in Ireland, and succeeded in firmly establishing themselves. In 1172 Henry visited Ireland, and received the country from Strongbow. A synod assembled at Cashel formally united the Church of Ireland to the Church of Rome; and so the last of the western national churches surrendered. And from this time until the Reformation, the history of the Irish Church is the history of the Roman-Catholic Church in Ireland.

2. From the Union of the Irish Church with that of Rome to the Reformation. — At first the advancement of the Norman rulers was an unmixed benefit. To the tillers of the soil any change for the better was better than subjection to the exaction of every captain of banditti who could muster twenty men. But the Normans rapidly assimilated themselves to the Irish; and in a short time the only difference between the old and the new state of affairs was, that some of the clansmen now fought under Norman instead of Celtic leaders. In 1367, less than two hundred years from the landing of Strongbow, the Anglo-Irish Parliament assembled at Kilkenny passed a statute treating the old English settlers with almost as much severity as the Irish. Near the beginning of the fifteenth century considerable bodies of Anglo-Scottish invaders invaded Ulster. Like other invaders of Ireland, they found allies, and made permanent settlements. During the wars of the Roses in England, Ireland was left almost to herself; and on the accession of Henry VII., although the most powerful families were of Anglo-Norman name, the authority of the king extended only to the country immediately surrounding Dublin. Henry, an able and astute monarch, sent over Sir Edward Poynings. A Parliament assembled by him in 1486 made all English statutes law in Ireland, and subjected the Irish Parliament to the English privy council,—an arrangement which remained in force until within eighteen years of the union of the two countries.
IRELAND.

Under the strong rule of Henry's deputy, the Earl of Kildare,—the head of the great family of the Geraldines,—the English authority was extended, and the turbulence of the barons and native chiefs was checked, and the unhappy country enjoyed probably a greater degree of quiet than at any time since her history opened. This state of things continued through the early part of the reign of Henry VIII., broken only by the mad rebellion of "Silken Thomas," which ended in the ruin of the Kildare family.

3. From the Reformation to the Period of Protestant Ascendancy, and of the Penal Laws.—A new and all-important factor is now introduced into Irish history. Henry VIII. extended his reformation to Ireland. Up to this time the Irish Church had been directly under the control of Rome. The Pope appointed the archbishops, and the king of England was seldom able to enforce his claim to any authority in ecclesiastical matters. At the time of the Reformation the Irish Church was as corrupt as any in Europe. Simony, lawlessness, and sexual immorality characterized the clergy. Nowhere was reform more needed; but unfortunately the worst side of the Reformation was turned to Ireland, and it could scarcely have happened otherwise than that it should be rejected by the mass of the people. The Irish were now beginning to realize that the power of England was real, and was to be exerted to crush out their tribal institutions, and substitute the common law of England for that of the Brehon lawyers. Northmen and Danes, Norman barons and Celtic Scotch, had all been welcomed as allies by some Irish power, and had been absorbed till they became "more Irish than the Irish." But under Henry VII. the Celt was made to feel that there was a force he could not mould or bend,—a force that must either bend or break him, and would, if possible, compel him to order. Hence the Reformation appeared to the Irish as an arbitrary act of the power they had learned to hate. Henry VIII. called a Parliament, which passed whatever acts he wished. Most of the bishops and clergy acquiesced in the supremacy of the king; but so unpopular was the change, that O'Neil was able to raise an insurrection in Ulster to oppose it, which was vigorously suppressed. It was not, however, until 1651, that Protestantism was formally established by law. Queen Mary restored the old order, of course; but her power in Ireland was so weak, that the country gave asylum to Protestant refugees. In 1550, after the accession of Elizabeth, a Parliament was held, in which sat three archbishops and seventeen bishops. This Parliament restored the ecclesiastical order of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., but it is not certain how many of the bishops actually conformed. The Reformation made no real progress among the people. At the beginning of the reign of James I. the condition of the established Church was deplorable. The clergy were largely illiterate, and drawn from the lowest orders, and, although often pluralists, were almost beggars; the revenues being absorbed, under corrupt agreements, by those in authority. During the reigns of Queens Mary and Elizabeth the civil history presents a succession of rebellions and ferocious internal feuds. Exhausation brought peace, and King James I. took advantage of the desolation of Ulster to introduce Scotch settlers. These settlers were strongly opposed to prelacy, and had formed a basis for the Presbyterian Church of Ireland.

Charles I. tried the ruinous policy of using Ireland as a power against his Parliament. The Protestants were systematically disarmed, and the frightful outbreak of 1641 was the result. The Parliament sent some Scotch troops to Carrickfergus, attended by chaplains; and among them, in 1642, was organized the first presbytery of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. The misery of the country for the next few years was such as can hardly be equalled, even in her dismal annals. When Cromwell came, he found five hostile armies ranged against him, and all crying for prelacy. Marquis of Ormonde had banished his priests; his sharp and decisive treatment is well known. He proceeded to parcel out the forfeited and almost depopulated lands among English settlers, mostly Baptists and Independents. For a few years Ireland enjoyed prosperity, but the policy of the Restoration undid much of the work. Cromwell's settlers were disposed, and many of them emigrated to the New World. Up to this time it does not appear that the penal laws against Roman Catholics had been seriously enforced; although Cromwell refused liberty to celebrate the mass. The effect of Protestantism showed itself in a marked way on the Roman-Catholic clergy. From this time we hear no more of illegitimate children of bishops, nor of scandalous lives among the priests. Those who see most clearly the mischief the Roman-Catholic Church does in Ireland admit, that, with regard to purity of life, the Irish priesthood stands pre-eminent among the Roman-Catholic clergy of Europe.

When the Revolution of 1688 took place, and James II. landed in Ireland, the Protestants of Ulster large districts which had been forfeited were bestowed on owners who leased them for terms of thirty years to Scotch Presbyterian settlers.

4. From the Protestant Ascendancy to the Union of Ireland to Great Britain.—The government now fell entirely into the hands of a few great Protestant-Episcopal land-holders. The Established Church had gained no hold on the people, and Ireland became the worst governed country in Europe. During the reign of Queen Anne, penal laws which bore almst as heavily on Presbyterians as on Roman Catholics were vigorously enforced. The state of religion was disgraceful. The Established Church had gained no hold on the people, and, indeed, had made no adequate effort to do so. The richer bishoprics and deaneries were occupied by men who were chosen for quite other reasons than spiritual fitness. Most of the clergy were poorly paid, and were content to perform mechanically the duties required of them. The Roman-Catholic priests were, for the most part, very uneducated; and the penal laws were enforced with such severity, that in many places the sacraments were left unadministered. Cromwell's Baptists and Independents, who at one time were forming one-half of the Protestant population, had almost disappeared, in a way hard to account for. The Presbyterian Church presented a brighter aspect. It was felt that the strong Presbyterians were needed; and even the bigoted Irish Parliament had to provide for their admission to the army, and in 1719 passed an act of toleration in spite of the hysterical protests of the bishops.

In 1727 the Presbyterian Church was weakened by the secession of the synod of Antrim, a body sympathizing so much with latitudinarian views as to the divinity of Christ, as to make a subscription to the Westminster standards distasteful, and still further by the emigration of her members to America. As the leases granted under William III. fell in, the landlords raised the rents, charging the tenants for their own improvements. The enterprising Ulster farmers would not submit; and this, with the policy towards dissenters from the Established Church which England had sanctioned, sent many of the race which had obtained in 1782 the independence of the Irish ministry.

The rest of the eighteenth century may be passed over rapidly. 'The penal laws with regard to the Roman-Catholic Church are under the four-archbishops of Armagh, Cashel, Dublin, and Tuam, and eight bishoprics, were to be left unfulfilled on their becoming vacant. This measure was vigorously opposed by the bishops and clergy of the Established Church, and there were dismal prophecies of the results. The actual loss of spiritual light due to the extinction of these ecclesiastical stars was, however, less than was expected. In fact, we have entered on a period of progress and success in both the Established and Presbyterian churches. The clergy of the former showed an earnest and faithful interest in the spiritual and temporal welfare of their charges, in strong contrast to their predecessors of the eighteenth century; while among the Presbyterians new congregations were rapidly organized, and increased life shown in those already existing.

In 1840 a union was effected between the synod of Ulster and the secession synod. The 292 congregations of the synod of Ulster united with 141 seceding congregations to form the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

In 1849 important reforms were carried out in the administration of the Roman-Catholic Church, in particular with regard to the appointment of bishops. In 1853 the anti-tithe demonstrations led to a reform of the Established Church, which it was arranged that the archbishops of Cashel and Tuam, and eight bishoprics, were to be left unfilled on their becoming vacant. This measure was vigorously opposed by the bishops and clergy of the Established Church, and there were dismal prophecies of the results. The actual loss of spiritual light due to the extinction of these ecclesiastical stars was, however, less than was expected. In fact, we have entered on a period of progress and success in both the Established and Presbyterian churches. The clergy of the former showed an earnest and faithful interest in the spiritual and temporal welfare of their charges, in strong contrast to their predecessors of the eighteenth century; while among the Presbyterians new congregations were rapidly organized, and increased life shown in those already existing.

In 1840 a union was effected between the synod of Ulster and the secession synod. The 292 congregations of the synod of Ulster united with 141 seceding congregations to form the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

In 1849 important reforms were carried out in the administration of the Roman-Catholic Church, in particular with regard to the appointment of bishops. In 1853 the anti-tithe demonstrations led to a reform of the Established Church, which it was arranged that the archbishops of Cashel and Tuam, and eight bishoprics, were to be left unfilled on their becoming vacant. This measure was vigorously opposed by the bishops and clergy of the Established Church, and there were dismal prophecies of the results. The actual loss of spiritual light due to the extinction of these ecclesiastical stars was, however, less than was expected. In fact, we have entered on a period of progress and success in both the Established and Presbyterian churches. The clergy of the former showed an earnest and faithful interest in the spiritual and temporal welfare of their charges, in strong contrast to their predecessors of the eighteenth century; while among the Presbyterians new congregations were rapidly organized, and increased life shown in those already existing.

In 1849 important reforms were carried out in the administration of the Roman-Catholic Church, in particular with regard to the appointment of bishops.
IRELAND.

The oldest Irish university is that of Dublin, established 1591. The Queen's University, soon to be superseded by the Royal University, has colleges in Belfast, Cork, and Galway.

In 1880 the national school system maintained 7,590 schools, having on their rolls 1,083,020 pupils. In 1841, 53 per cent of the population could neither read nor write. In 1871 this percentage was reduced to 38 for the whole country, and to 27 for Ulster.

Compare the general histories of Ireland by MACGEOGHAN, GORDON, LELAND, MSNOASVRZ, and others, also art. Ireland, in Encyclopaedia Britannica. For present condition and statistics, see Statistian's Year Book, Lond., 1888; THOM's Official Directory, 1886.

IRELAND, John b. at Ashburton, Devonshire, Eng., Sept. 8, 1761; d. in London, Sept. 1, 1842. He was graduated at Oriel College, Oxford, 1780; took orders, and was made dean of Westminster 1816. He was the author of Five Discourses: containing certain arguments for and against the reception of Christianity by the ancient Jews and Greeks, London, 1796; Nuptia sacra, or An Inquiry into the Scriptural Doctrine of Marriage and Divorce, London, 1821; The Plague of Marseilles in the Year 1720, London, 1834. Besides other benefactions, he left ten thousand pounds to establish at Oxford a professorship of biblical exegesis. This professorship has been held by Canon H. P. Liddon, D.D., since 1870.

IRENEUS, Bishop of Lyons (Lugdunum), one of the most distinguished authors and theologians of the early Church; was b., probably in Asia Minor, about 115; d. in Lyons about 190 (usual date 202). As the facts of his life are common, we will begin with a survey of the latter.

1. Writings.—The only work of Irenæus which has come down to us entire is his treatise against Gnosticism, Ἀκολούθια καὶ άντιφασία τῆς φησιδεῖαν γνώσεως ("Disproof and Refutation of the False and Gnostic Doctrine," "Disproof and Refutation of the Gnostic false so called"). It was written in Greek, but is preserved only in a Latin translation and some fragments of a Syriac version. A portion of the original Greek text has, however, been preserved by Epiphanius, who transcribed verbally the first book, to 21, 4, in his work on Heresies (vi. 31, 9–34), and quotes largely in other places without, however, mentioning the source. Hippolytus likewise drew from the Greek original of Irenæus in his Refutation of all Heresies (vi. 38, 42–52, vii. 32–
This work of Irenaeus was usually quoted by the shorter titles, πρὸς τὸν ἀιώνα, or κατὰ ἁιώναν ("Against Heretics") and Adv. haereses or Adv. haereticos ("Against Heretics"). Irenaeus may have found occasion, in the prevalence of Gnostic errors in his own diocese, for composing this work, as some of the disciples of the Gnostic Marcus had come to that vicinity (i. 13, 7), and the writings of Florinus, an apostate to Valentinianism, were circulated in the congregations along the Rhone. But the primary occasion of the work was the request of a friend to be supplied with more definite information in regard to the doctrines of Valentinus. See Gnosticism.

The work itself consists of five books. In the first the author gives a description of the Gnostic heresies, and in the remaining four a refutation of them by summarizing the teachings of the evangelists and the Pauline Epistles. The work shows clearness of thought, but is somewhat discursive. He makes no pretension to literary finish, or elegance of Greek diction (i. Pref.), but eagerly pursues the one object in view. While it is his primary purpose to analyze and refute the Valentinian heresy, he takes in all heresies, inasmuch as it is only a "recapitulation of all heresies," and has its roots back in Simon Magus. He was acquainted with older treatises against heresies (iv. Pref.), but draws largely upon the writings of Valentinus and his personal contact with that Gnostic's disciples. The third book (iii. 21, 1) was written while Eleutherus was bishop of Rome (175—189). The Latin translation must have been made soon after the original was written, as Tertullian, in his treatise against the Valentinians (about 202—207), speaks of Irenaeus as one of his authorities, and as the most "studious explorer of all doctrines" (omnia doctrinarum curiosissimae explorator).

Irenaeus wrote at least two other works on the heresies, both addressed to Florinus,—᾽Ιππολύτων περὶ μαθησιας ἢ περὶ τῶν τόπων τώντας καθὼς ("A Letter concerning the Divine Sovereignty, or whether God is not the Creator of Evils"), and σπουδάσμα περὶ ἀγαθοῦς ("Zeal concerning the Ogdoad"). Both these works are quoted by Eusebius. The latter is preserved in a Syriac translation. Irenaeus took an active interest in the Easter controversies of his day (see EASTER), and wrote on this subject a letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, and probably his treatise addressed to the Roman Blastus, περὶ σχισματος ("The Schism"). Eusebius (v. 26) and Jerome refer to a Book of Various Discussions, which was probably a collection of homilies; and Eusebius (v. 28), to an apologetic work (πρὸς Ἐλλήνας, etc.), probably on the rule of faith. Other works attributed to him, as a Commentary on the Canticles, are of doubtful authenticity.

2. Life. — Irenaeus spent the earlier years of his life in Asia Minor, and was probably born there early in the second century. He speaks (v. 30, 8) of the Apocalypse of John as "having been seen almost in our own generation at (or near) the close of Domitian's reign" (96). Irenaeus' painstaking accuracy leaves no ground for extending this period to fifty years, and putting the date of his birth so late as 140 (see auresset) or 147 (Zingerl). These late dates are also incompatible with other positive testimonies in regard to his relations to Polycarp and other disciples of the apostles in Asia Minor; although it is doubtful whether Papias was among them, as Jerome states (Ep., 75, 3 ad Theodoret). He speaks in such a way of those "who had seen John face to face," and "of some who had not only seen John, but others of the apostles" (v. 22 5; v. 5, 1; 30, 1; 33, 3; 36, 2), as to leave no doubt that he had been the recipient of verbal communications from them. Polycarp suffered martyrdom Feb. 23, 155. Of his relations to him he says (iii. 3, 4), ὁμαδία ἀκριβεῖαν ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ ἐπαναλήφθη ἑκάστῳ πολλοί γὰρ παρέμειναν καὶ πάντες γεραλέσανεν ἐνότοις καὶ ἑποίησε τὰ μαρτυρήματα μαρτυρίους, etc. ("whom we also saw in our early years, for he remained a very long time, and at a great age was put to death, testifying most gloriously," etc.). The period expressed by "early years" must evidently be used in the usual sense among the Greeks, for the years of early manhood, eighteen to thirty-five, especially in Irenaeus himself reckons the thirtieth year to the "first period of life" (prima estas), and extends it to the fortieth year (ii. 22, 5). As Polycarp was about a hundred years old when he suffered martyrdom at Smyrna, he would have been an aged man in 130, when we may think of Irenaeus as having first seen him. Another evidence that Irenaeus was born about 115, and lived in or near Smyrna between 130 and 140, is his acquaintance with Florinus. He refers to Florinus, in his letter to him, of having met him in Asia Minor, in συναντία with Polycarp, while he (Ireneus) was still a boy (παιδός). Florinus was a court official. Lightfoot (Contemp. Rev., 1875) ventures the doubtful explanation that this does not mean that he was at the court of the then ruling emperor, but belonged to the household of Antoninus Pius, who afterwards became emperor, and was proconsul of Asia about 135. Rather must we think of one of the two visits of the Emperor Hadrian to Asia Minor, and of these the second, when he tarried for some time. Both visits occurred between 122 and 130, and the second about 129. Our assumption, then, of the year 115 as the date of Irenaeus' birth fails in well with the description that he was still a boy (παιδός) at the time of his meeting with Florinus (129). The term παιδίον ("boy"), however, is sometimes extended to an older period of life. Eusebius, for example, calls Origen a boy when he was a theological teacher, and certainly above eighteen (H. E., vi. 3, 3; 8, 1—5); and Constantine speaks of himself in the same way at the outbreak of the Diocletian persecution, when he was almost thirty (Euseb. : Vita Const., ii. 61, 1; comp. i. 19, 1).

Another evidence for the year 115 as the date of Irenaeus' birth is the fact that he was resident in Rome as a teacher at the time of Polycarp's death (155). The account of Polycarp's martyrdom (Martyrion Polyg.), written, at the latest, before the close of the fourth century, is our most credible authority on this point. The bishop of Rome draws from one of Irenaeus' own works; and, as, in other cases where it draws from Irenaeus' great work, it is accurate, so we may expect it to be in this. This residence in Rome explains the lively interest Irenaeus afterwards took in the Roman Church, and his accurate acquaintance with its traditions, as the short sojourn in 177 scarcely can. He speaks of details of the pontificates of IRENĂEUS OF TYRE.

Anicetus (d. 160) and his immediate predecessors (i. 25; 6; iii. 4; 9); and his double account of Polycarp's visit to Rome, therefore, he went to Rome (Euseb.: H. E., v. 3, 4). At his return he was elected bishop, to succeed the martyred Pothinus. He took an active part in the Quarto-deciman, or Easter controversies of the day, and wrote to Victor, bishop of Rome, in the interests of peace and liberty. Jerome (Com. in Ev., xvii.) mentions cursorily that he died a martyr. Ziegler and Harvey (ii. 464) have mentioned other authorities on this point, but they are of little value. Hippolytus, Eusebius, and others do not speak of it. Irenæus occupies a prominent position as a theologian, and "is the first of all the church teachers to give a careful analysis of the work of redemption, and his view is far the deepest, most clearly presented of all the great church fathers. An account of Irenæus is in CLARK's Ante-Nicene Christian Library, Edinburg, 1868—69, 2 vols. See two articles on Irenæus, in Bibliotheca Hagiographica, 1877, by Professor C. J. H. Roper.

IRENÆUS OF TYRE represented the Emperor Theodosius II. at the Council of Ephesus, 431, and espoused the cause of Nestorius, but was, for that very reason, banished from the court; and, when the Oriental bishops made him bishop of Tyre (445), he was deposed and banished by an imperial decree. Of his Greek work on the Nestorian controversy, only some fragments of a Latin translation remain: "Contra Epistola ad Concilium Ephes. pertinentes," ed. Christian Lupus, Louvain, 1862.

IRENĂÜS, Christoph, b. at Schweinitz, Saxony, d. at Horn, Austria, at unknown dates; was appointed pastor at Eiselen in 1562, and afterward was expelled at Weimar, but was discharged and banished in 1572, as one of the noisiest champions of Flacius; emigrated to Austria, and published a pamphlet against the first article of the Formula Concordiae, 1581; and another, "De Bide Gottes," 1585.

IRENE, b. at Athens, 752, in very humble circumstances; d. in destitution, in the Isle of Lesbos, 803; was married in 769 to the Emperor Leo IV., and ruled over the Eastern Empire with great vigor and adroitness, from his death in 780 to her banishment in 802. Her passion was power; and for its gratification she dared anything, from the most ridiculous absurdities. She had her own son, Constantine VI., blinded in order to make him unfit to reign; and she proposed marriage to Charlemagne in order to unite the Eastern and Western empires. But, in spite of all her crimes and cruelties, she is a saint of the Greek Church; for she overthrew the iconoclasts, and re-established image-worship; which article see. At last, however, she was over-reached by her own treasurer, Nicephorus, deposed, and banished to the Isle of Lesbos, where she earned her living by spinning.

IRENICAL THEOLOGY, or IRENICS (from irenē, "peace"), presents the points of agreement among Christians with a view to the ultimate unity, if not organic union, of Christendom. It is the opposite of polemics, yet its legitimate successor, heir by divine right to its territory. It seeks to show how large is the common ground, and how comparatively unimportant are the points in dispute. In every age of the Church there have been peace-loving spirits; such as Gregory of Nazianzus and Chrysostom in the Nicene age; Melanchthon and Bützer in the sixteenth century; Calvin and Baxter, Dury, Spener, Zinzendorf, and Neander in later times. The union of the various denominations in Christian worship proves the existence of the irenic temper, and, so far as it is the result of a recognition of the common Christianity, it is to be applauded; but there is a sort of irenics which results from indifference, and such a temper is reprehensible.

The noble sentence of Rupertus Meldenius (often falsely attributed to Augustine) — "In necessary things, unity; in unnecessary things, liberty; in all things, charity" — has probably contributed as much as any treatise to bring about brotherhood among Christians. But there is quite a literature on the subject, of which we may mention ERASMUS: De amore ecclesiae concordia; JOHN DURY: Irenicerca tractatum Prodomus, Amsterdam, 1682; J. C. KÜCHER: Bibliotheca theologica irenica, Jena, 1794. Die Irenik in the fourth part of LANGE'S Dogmatik (Heidelberg, 1852); but the word is used in a broad sense, and applied to the common ground between Christian and Pagan religious thought. The existence of the Evangelical Alliance, of the Kirchentag in Germany (see art.), and the family gatherings among those holding the same polity,—such as the Pan-Protestant, Pan-Austrian, and Pan-Methodist councils,—are so many indications that the days of fiery debate among Protestants are over. But whether there can be peaceful, self-respecting intercourse between Protestants and Roman and Greek Catholics is a different matter.

In these latter discussions, the common danger is often, to use the words of Professor Schiller, "to be deeply buried under sad and destructive errors: nevertheless it is sincerely to be desired that there might be more kindly feeling than now
IRREGULARITIES. 1119

IRREGULARITIES denote, in canon law, such defects as prevent a person from receiving ecclesiastical orders. The statutes are based on 1 Tim. iii. 2 sqq.; Lev. xvi.; and comprise irregularities of two kinds,—irregularitates ex defectu et irregularitates ex delicto. To the first class belong illegitimate birth, bodily deformity, uncanonical age, lack of education, certain cases, also the bishop's, have the right not to make a person instrumental to the death of his fellow-men (soldiers, judges, though not physicians), etc. To the second class belong all crimes which have become public, and also some crimes, such as heresy and apostasy, though they have not become public. The Pope, however, and, in his testament, the freest, brotherliest, bravest human soul mine eyes from which he looked forth somewhat straightforward, honest; and that "style of speaking with tongues which had occurred among the masses, but he at once immediately fell under the influence of Edward Irving, London (3d ed., 1865); Enn. OLiPHANT: The Life of Edward Irving, London (2d ed., 1865); Edw. Miller: History and Doctrine of Irvingism, London, 1878, 2 vols.; [G. SIEBEMANN: Die Lehren der Irvingianer, nach ihren Schriften dargelegt u. n. d. A. Schrift geprüft, Mitau, 1881; CARLYLE'S Essay on the Death of Irving, in his Miscellanies, and the chapter on his life, in Carlyle's Reminiscences, IRVINGITES. See Catholic Apostolic Church.

ISAIAH (יְשֵׁיָהוּ, יְשׁוֹעַ). The question whether there was one or several Syriac church-writers of the name Isaiah, the Monophysite, Jacob of Edessa, of the seventh century, answers by mentioning three (Wright: Catalogue ii., 608 sq.), — two "orthodox," and one "a Chalcedonian heretic;" namely (I.) Isaac of Amid, who was a pupil of Ephraem Syrus, and went to Rome during the reign of Arcadius, to see the Capitol, but was imprisoned for a long time in Constantinople, while on his return; (II.) Isaac of Edessa, who in the reign of the Emperor Zeno, and during the patriarchate of Petrus Fullo, came to Antioch, and preached against the Nestorians, deriving his text from a parrot, which could screech the trisagion, with the addition, ἐ σταυρωθεὶς καὶ νεκρός; and (III.) Isaac of Edessa, who was orthodox in the time of Bishop Paul (612), but a Nestorian in the time of Bishop Asclepius (522).

Gennadius knows two Syriac church-writers of the name Isaac. The latter of them he calls a "presbyter of the Church of Antioch," and ascribes to him a very long life, during which he wrote much in Syriac, and finally, during the reign of Leo and Majoranus, a great elegiac poem lamenting the destruction of Antioch (469).

Bickell identifies the two first Isaccs of Jacob of Edessa with the second Isaac of Gennadius, and considers him to be orthodox; though his sermons contain no direct recognition of the synod of Chalcedon, but, on the contrary, a number of passages of rank Monophysitism, which Bickell can explain away only by assuming very large interpolations. One point, however, may be considered as settled: the book De contemplu mundi (Magna Bibl., VI., 2, 688, Col. 1618; Lugd.-XII. 1019; Gallandi XII. 2) does not belong to Isaac of Antioch, but to Isaac Ninivius, who lived a century later on, and to whom it is ascribed both by the Greek edition of Nicephorus Theotokius, Leipzig, 1770, and by the Syriac and Arabic manuscripts.

LIT. — BICKELL : Ausgewählte Gedichte d. syrischen Kirchenväter, Kempten, 1872; and Isaiah Antiocheni Opera Omnia, edited G. Bickell, Giessen, i. 1873, ii. 1877. E. NEFF: ISAAC LEVITA, b. at Wetzlar 1515; studied rabbinical lore, and filled for several years the office of a rabbi, but was by the study of the Messianic prophecies led to embrace Christianity; assumed the name of Johann Isaac Levi; and was appointed professor of Hebrew and Chaldee languages at Louvain 1546, and at Cologne 1551. He wrote several works on Hebrew grammar, which were much valued in their time, also a defence of the trustworthiness of the Old Testament: Defensio Veritatis H. Sac. Script., Cologne, 1559.

ISA'IAH (יְשֵׁיָהוּ, יְשׁוֹעַ) was the greatest of the Hebrew prophets. His name has been derived from ישוע [in which case it means "Salvation of Jehovah"]. But I prefer the derivation from ישע ("to look"), and the pronunciation ישוע ("Yishayahu"), or ישע ("Yishaya"). There are only two names of Isaiah in the Bible, outside of the prophecy itself and 2 Kings xviii. sqq. In 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22 it is said, "The rest of the acts of Uzziah did Isaiah the son of Amoz write." This may refer to a special work of Isaiah not preserved, or to a portion of the Book of the Kings, or to the first six chapters of the prophecy. It has afforded ground for some to maintain that the first five chapters date, in whole or in part, from the early years of Uzziah's reign. But it is evident that nothing definite can be ISAIAH. ISAIAH.

1121

drawn from the words. The second notice (2 Chron. xxxii. 32) reads, "The rest of the acts of Hezekiah . . . are written in the vision of Isaiah," etc. This undoubtedly refers to the prophecy of Isaiah, which is called the "vision of Isaiah" (i. 1). But from very ancient times many have found here a trace of another work of Isaiah. An attempt to imitate or restore such a work has come down to us in the so-called Vision of Isaiah, which is combined with an account of the prophet's martyrdom. This work was cited by Origen, and has been edited from Ethiopic manuscripts by Laurence (1819) and Dillmann (1877), under the title Ascensus Isaiz. A Christian was undoubtedly its author (Dillmann); but the matter was a subject of Jewish tradition, and we meet with it in other places. It states that Isaiah suffered a violent death in the reign of Manasseh, being sawn asunder with a wooden saw (see Justin: Dial. Tryph., ed. Otto, p. 490), after an iron one had been tried in vain (see v. Gebhardt's edition of the Greek account of the martyrdom in Hilgenfeld's Zeiturhr., 1878, p. 341). Origen says the condemnation was based upon the prophet's blasphemous utterances concerning God and Jerusalem (iii. 6—12). The Gemara also says that Manasseh put Isaiah to death, but goes on to narrate that he was encompassed by a cedar, which they sawed through until Isaiah's blood flowed out like water (see also Targum in Cod. Reuchlin, at Isa. lxvi. 1). The Roman Church celebrates his martyrdom July 6; the Greek, May 9. One fact, at least, may with certainty be derived from these traditions: namely, that Isaiah died in the reign of Manasseh. Combining this fact with the statement that Isaiah prophesied "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah" (i. 1), we conclude that his public life began some time in Uzziah's reign, and extended into that of Manasseh. More definitely (according to vi. 1) it began in the fifty-second year of Uzziah's reign, which was the year of his death. Uzziah died 758 B.C.; and, if we suppose that Isaiah was twenty years old at that time, he would have been eighty-one at the beginning of Manasseh's reign (680 B.C.); so that it is not necessary at all to assume that Isaiah lived to an unusually great age.

These years of Isaiah's prophetic activity (758—690 B.C.) were years of the most varied events and decisive changes. Here belong the protracted attempts of the Assyrian kings to become masters of Palestine and Syria. In the realization of this design they were hampered by the Medes and the repeated attempts of the Babylonians to throw off the Assyrian yoke, as well as by the Egyptians, whose foreign policy had begun to be aggressive. The Jews of Jerusalem were kept informed of the events in the north by communications from their exiled brethren in Assyria, and by the various expeditions which passed through the land; so that it is not to be wondered at that the prophet's vision took in, not only the small neighboring peoples, but also tribes like the Armenians in the north. The northern kingdom was torn by tribal jealousy, and sought an alliance, now with Assyria, and now with Egypt. Uzziah, king of Judah, and his successor Jotham, seem to have essayed to hold the kingdom aloof from political complications by strengthening the defences, and accumulating war materials. But Ahaz pursued a different policy, and depended more upon the Assyrian monarch than upon Jehovah. Hezekiah, however, felt that he held his kingdom only in trust, and that Jehovah exercised supernatural agency to preserve it. The lesson these circumstances were meant to teach the people of Israel was, that they should not renounce the old faith; that Jehovah, as the God of Israel, was working out his purpose, which was to be honored everywhere on the earth, and to establish a kingdom which should not be limited to Jerusalem or Israel. The carnal hopes of those who looked for external glory for the kingdom, in spite of their sins and unrighteousness, were declared to be fallacious. The Jerusalem which opened its doors to heathen luxury, and ignored mercy, was not the Jerusalem from which the light of the knowledge of God was to beam forth to all peoples. God could, without denying his promise to Abraham, lead the people into foreign bondage, and desolate the land of Israel. The national catastrophe meant disappointment for such carnal hopes; but a remnant was to be preserved, which should be animated by a new life, and enjoy an undying glory. The house of David, which had disappeared in the darkness, was to revive again in the royal son of a virgin; and the tree of Jesse, which had been cut down, to flourish again in a new scion. To this remnant belong only those who in humble faith recognized the hand of God in the calamities of the nation, and obeyed his will. It was the invisible church, known only to God, and pervaded by moral life. The prophet himself, the supreme idea was the separation of a congregation of the Spirit, of faith and righteousness of life.

Isaiah was led to this train of thought by his own experiences and the events narrated in his prophecy. He was a citizen of Jerusalem, had at least two sons (vii. 3, viii. 1), treated his wife and children as living pictures, and emblems of what he announced, and looked back to the vision of vi. 1 as the turning-point of his thought and religion, which had disappeared, to flourish again firm without distrust or fear, where all was unstable and dark (viii. 11 sqq.). He regarded it as his duty to train up a body of disciples to retain their trust in God, but with resignation looked forward to the destruction of Jerusalem as an unavoidable event, and counselled unreserved submission to the Assyrian power. It becomes a matter of no surprise that a prophet who identified himself so closely with public affairs should have gathered about him a body of disciples. For these disciples, as well as for future generations, he wrote down his utterances; and there can be no doubt that he wrote much. The only question which arises is, whether the book which goes by his name has come down in its original form. In the consideration of this question, it will help us little to trace out evidences of the style and spirit of Isaiah in different parts of the book (for what was written at different times, and at different periods?); or to fall back upon certain prepossessions of what God is able to reveal through prophecy concerning the future.

All historical investigation about the authenticity of the prophecy must start from the account of Isaiah in chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix. It was placed by the editor between two series of anonymous prophecies, of which the preceding one relates the transformation of the Assyrian, and the succeeding one the transformation of the Babylonian, oppression into salvation for Judah. It is unscholarly and arbitrary to make a break at the end of chap. xxxv. and at chap. xxxix., as though one had reached, in chap. xl. 1, the coast of an unknown land. These portions all belong together. He who has read chap. xxxv. 3, 4, finds nothing strange in xl. 1; and only he who has read chaps. xxxviii.-xxxix. understands xlvii. 8-11, and appreciates that one and the same prophet (xlvi. 10) distinguishes two periods in his prophetic activity, whose utterances run along parallel lines, and who, on the basis of their fulfillment in the first period, can demand obedience in the second. He who consents to recognize chaps. xxxviii.-xxxv., as a whole, as Isaiah's, has no scientific ground for denying that chaps. xl.-lxvi. are essentially his also. The main difficulties have been, that Cyrus is predicted by name, the overthrow of the Babylonian power, and the liberation of the Jews. But if the description of the servant of Jehovah, which suits Jesus of Nazareth best, was fulfilled, why not the prediction concerning Cyrus? The freer from prejudices the student is, the more certainly will he conclude that chaps. xl.-lxvi. contain prophecies of Isaiah, although arranged in their present form by another hand than his.
ISHBOSHETH

In the narrative of chaps. xxxvi.-xxxix. we learn, that from the thirteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, until after Sennacherib's campaign, Isaiah stood in high esteem at court, and his word was accepted as authority. In the six prophecies of chaps. xxxviii.-xxxix. the author takes the same position that the author of chaps. xxxvi.-xxxix. does concerning the invasion of Sennacherib. Chaps. xxxiv. and xxxv. have been denied to Isaiah, and been referred to the time of the exile; but this certainly would never have been done if the wilderness (xxxv.) had not been arbitrarily distinguished from the invasion lying between Babylon and Judah, and the Book of Jehovah (xiv. 18-20) been explained to be the Book of Isaiah. The other two portions of Isaiah (ix. xii and xiii.-xxxvii.) bear Isaiah's name. Here we find many parallels with chaps. xxviii.-xxxix. (comp. xxxvii. 20 with xxxviii. 22, iii. 8-iv. 1 with xxxvii. 1-20, etc.); but the plan of chaps. i.-xii. agrees remarkably with the plan of chaps. xxviii.-xxxv. We may, it seems to me, confidently assert that all of this section belongs to Isaiah, although parts of it (v.-xii.) may not be preserved in the order in which they belong. The prophetic utterances of the second portion (xiii.-xxxvii.) are distinguished by being the expression of the mind immediately under the influence of its ecstatic emotion. In the first part, the ruling thought is the preservation of David's throne and city by Jehovah, and their restoration to a position of glorious prosperity. In the second, the ruling thought is the universal kingdom of Jehovah and his judgments upon the peoples, and the humiliation of all human greatness. The whole consists of prophecies of Isaiah with older fragments.

KLOSTERMANN

ISH'BO'SHET (יהשָׁבַת), "man of shame") was the son of Saul who survived the ruin of his father's family in the battle of Gilboa. His real name was Esh-baal (1 Chron. ix. 99), which a later generation gave up in order to avoid the use of the name Baal. Abner, Saul's captain, espoused the claims of Ishboseth after the death of his father and three brothers, and he was proclaimed king of the trans-Jordanic tribes and all Israel, the house of Judah alone remaining true to David (2 Sam. ii. 8-10). He was about forty years old at the time. He was a timid man, and depended very largely upon Abner. The latter was called to account for his intimate relations with the king's concubine, Rizpah, but in turn reproached the king for his ingratitude, and declared he would espouse the cause of David. Ishboseth gave up his crippled hope to the end, in his request. Abner now plotted to deliver up the northern tribes to David, but was murdered by Joab (2 Sam. iii. 23). Ishboseth himself was murdered by two of his officers. They cut off his head, and carried it to David. But David ISHMAEL (יוֹסֵע, "God hears") was the son of Abraham and Hagar (an Egyptian slave). He was circumcised at the age of thirteen (Gen. xxv. 26), but was sent away with his mother, reluctantly, by Abraham, to satisfy Sarah, who had become jealous of the playful (wrongly translated mocking) lad (Gen. xxi. 9). The rabbins falsely explained the word, of malicious bantering treatment of Isaac. In the desert of Beersheba, Hagar received a revelation, when she and her son seemed to be destined to die for want of water. The narrative (Gen. xxi. 9 sqq.), which represents Ishmael as a tender lad, seems to be inconsistent with Gen. xvii. 25, according to which he was circumcised at thirteen, and must have been at least fifteen when he was sent away. Abraham repeatedly declared (Gen. xxv. 14, 15, 18), do not imply that he was carried on his mother's arm, which is the popular idea. Ishmael united with Isaac in burying his father (xxv. 9), and died at the age of a hundred and thirty-seven (xxv. 17). The descendants of Ishmael were not heirs of the covenant promise, but became very numerous. Twelve Arab tribes looked back to him as their ancestor (xxv. 12-18). The general character of these descendants was indicated in the words spoken of Ishmael: "He will be a man like a wild ass, his hand against every man, and every man against him" (xvi. 12). This is a masterly characterization, to which the wandering life of those tribes, shunning every place of civilization, accurately corresponds. They have ever since lived by their flocks and their bow, in the use of which they became skilful, like their ancestor (Gen. xxi. 26; Isa. xxii. 17). They inhabited the desert east of Palestine, and stretched in a southerly direction to the Persian Gulf and over Northern Arabia. The Moslem Arabs, who speak with pride of their descent from Ishmael, say that he and his mother, Hagar, lie buried in the Caaba at Mecca. v. Orelli.

ISIDORE MERCATOR, a fictitious person, a master of several languages, was put into circulation by a mistake in the introductory matter to the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, there occur a quotation from Isidore of Seville, and another from Marius Mercator. By a combination of those two quotations, an Isidore Mercator was made up; but he never existed. See Hinschius: Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianae, Leipzig, 1863.

ISIDORE OF MOSCOW, d. in Rome, April 27, 1462; was a native of Thessalonica; entered the Church at Constantinople, and was in 1437 made metropolitan of the Russian Church. As such he attended the Council of Florence, and labored, together with Beasario, zealously for the union of the Eastern and Western churches. The czar, however, was dissatisfied with the result of the negotiations, imprisoned him, and condemned him to be burnt alive. But he escaped, sought refuge in Rome, and was afterwards employed by Nicholas V. as ambassador to Constantinople.

ISIDORE OF FELSIUM, b. not after 370; d. not before 431; was a native of Alexandria, and spent most of his life as presbyter and abbot of a monastery at Pelsum. He left about two thousand letters, which represent him as one of the noblest religious characters of the age, in intimate connection with all the most prominent men of his time. In dogmatics he is orthodox, so far as an orthodoxy was established in the Greek Church at that period. But he is much more interesting as an exegete than as a dogmatist. Many of his letters are devoted to the exposition of Scriptures; and, though he does not altogether abstain from allegory, principally he places homiliae far beyond homilia. The greatest interest, however, he yields as a practical moralist. Monastic life he represents as the true ideal of Christian life; but he is by no means blind to the many peculiar dangers, illusions, and vices which may be engendered in a monastery. Collected editions of these letters appeared in Paris, 1638, 5 vols., folio, and in Migne: Patrol. Graecq, vol. 58. See P. G. Gluck: Isidori F. Summa Decretalium Moralis, Wiirzburg, 1848. W. Möller.

ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (Isidorus Hispalensis, also called Isidorus Junior, in contradistinction to Isidore of Cordova), b. 560, at Cartagena, or Seville; d. in the latter city April 4, 636; descended from a noble Roman (not Gothic) family, and was, after the early death of his parents, educated by his elder brother, Leander, Bishop of Seville, whom he succeeded in 600. For thirty-six years he governed his diocese with unflagging vigor and great dignity, presided over the synods of Seville (619) and Toledo (635), founded several institutions for the better education of the clergy, and exercised a lasting influence on Spanish legislation, civil as well as ecclesiastical. But it was as an author that he achieved his greatest fame. He wrote on nearly every branch of science then known; and, though his books are distinguished by industry and learning rather than by genius and originality, they are far from being mere compilations, and in the dark ages they were almost the only light shining. We have two old lists of his works,—one by his friend and colleague, Bishop Braulio of Saragossa; and another by his pupil, Idefonseus of Toledo; and all the works enumerated in these lists are still extant. The principal ones are: Officiorum Libri II., a kind of ecclesiastical arch档, the first treating of the institutions and their working-materials, the second of the officers and their functions, the whole dedicated to his younger brother Fulgentius, Bishop of Astigi; De Natura Rerum, a compendium of natural philosophy, specially edited by G. Becker, Berlin, 1857; Sententiarum sive de Summo Bono Libri III., his most important theological work, the first book treating of dogmatics, the two last of ethics; De Viris Illustribus, a continuation of Jerome and Gennadius, containing biographies of forty-six authors,—fourteen Spaniards between Hosius of Cordova and his own time, and thirty-two foreigners between Pope Xystus and Gregory the Great; Etymologiae sive Origines, his most famous work, a kind of theological encyclopedia, and still of great value. Besides the works mentioned in the above lists, several of his letters have come down to us, and others circulate under his name. Between a large number of spurious works, even poems; thus the so-called Isidorian Decretals have no connection whatever with him. The best collected edition of his works is that by Faustinus Arevalus, Rome, 1707—1803.
ISLAM.

Israel's history begins with the call of Abraham, who, as the rock whence Israel was hewn (Isa. li. 1), was not only at the head of the people of the old covenant, but also of the people of the new covenant in consequence of the organic connection (Gal. iii. 29).

Whilst the nations of the earth went their own ways, in which they developed their natural characteristics, in the seed of Abraham a people were to be raised, which, in their particular formation, were to be, not the result of natural development, but the product of the creative power and grace of God (Deut. xxxii. 6); thus not only forming a contrast to the nations of the world, but also containing the germ of removing this contrast, since all nations of the earth were to be blessed in the seed of Abraham (Gen. xi. 18, xviii. 17, xxi. 2 sq., xxii. 14, xxiv. 11 sq.; Exod. iii. 8, 15).

The patriarchal period closes with the migration of Jacob and his family into Egypt, where Israel was to become a people. Here, it seems, the people were ruled by elders and other officers, who, again, were under Egyptian masters. The great mass was given to idolatry (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 7 sq., xxxii. 3, 8, 19); and the remembrance of the God of the fathers, and of the promises given to them by God, who calls himself the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob (Gen. xii. 2-7, xiii. 15 sq., xv. 5, xvii. 6 sq., xviii. 18, xxi. 17, xxxii. 2 sq., xxiii. 14, xxiv. 11 sq.; Exod. iii. 8, 15). The character and future of the people of God are depicted in the life of his patriarchs and in the promises given to them by God, who calls himself the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob (Gen. xii. 2-7, xiii. 15 sq., xv. 5, xvii. 6 sq., xviii. 18, xxi. 17, xxxii. 2 sq., xxiii. 14, xxiv. 11 sq.; Exod. iii. 8, 15).

The patriarchal period closes with the migration of Jacob and his family into Egypt, where Israel was to become a people. Here, it seems, the people were ruled by elders and other officers, who, again, were under Egyptian masters. The great mass was given to idolatry (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 7 sq., xxxii. 3, 8, 19); and the remembrance of the God of the fathers, and of the promises given to them by God, who calls himself the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob (Gen. xii. 2-7, xiii. 15 sq., xv. 5, xvii. 6 sq., xviii. 18, xxi. 17, xxxii. 2 sq., xxiii. 14, xxiv. 11 sq.; Exod. iii. 8, 15).

The patriarchal period closes with the migration of Jacob and his family into Egypt, where Israel was to become a people. Here, it seems, the people were ruled by elders and other officers, who, again, were under Egyptian masters. The great mass was given to idolatry (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 7 sq., xxxii. 3, 8, 19); and the remembrance of the God of the fathers, and of the promises given to them by God, who calls himself the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob (Gen. xii. 2-7, xiii. 15 sq., xv. 5, xvii. 6 sq., xviii. 18, xxi. 17, xxxii. 2 sq., xxiii. 14, xxiv. 11 sq.; Exod. iii. 8, 15).
the theocratic principle was preserved; the Lord being now, as before, the real king of the people, while the king as his anointed was subject to him. Saul was succeeded by David, who endeavored also to emancipate the kingdom from the prophetic superintendence, and hence from the subjection under the theocratic principle, succumbs in this endeavor. David, being fully alive to the idea of a theocratic king, gave his nation a capital and a religious centre, Jerusalem, the city of God (Ps. lxi. 4), the city of the great King (Ps. lxii. 2), which, with her mountains round about, was itself a symbol of the divine kingdom (Ps. cxxvii. 2 sq.). The institutions of the theocracy were especially developed by David by his instituting the order of the Levites and priests. As David was a type of the theocratic kingdom, he was also destined to be its bearer by means of the divine promise given to him by the prophet Nathan, according to 2 Sam. vii., which forms one of the most important turning-points in the history of the theocracy. David was succeeded by Solomon, who was destined to build the temple, from which the knowledge of the true God was to go to all nations (1 Kings viii. 2 sq.). During his absence of many years, affairs fell into disorder; but on his return, after a long residence in Persia, Nehemiah reformed all these disorders, and even expelled a grandson of the high priest, Eliashib, on account of his unlawful marriage with the daughter of Sanballat (Neh. xii. 26). This expelled priest is undoubtedly one and the same person with Manasseh, who built a rival temple on the mountain of Gerizim. Before or during the second absence of Nehemiah, the prophet Malachi lived and labored.

From the administration of Nehemiah to the time of Alexander the Great, one atrocious crime, committed in the family of the high priest, appears as the only memorable transaction in the uneventful annals of Judaea. Eliashib was succeeded in the high priesthood by Judas; Judas, by John. The latter, jealous of the influence of his brother Jesus with Bagoses, the Persian governor, and suspecting him of designs on the high priesthood, murdered him within the precincts of the sanctuary. The Persian came in great indignation to Jerusalem; and, when the Jews would have prevented his entrance into the temple, he exclaimed, "Am I not purer than the one who has been murdered in the temple?" Bagoses laid a heavy mulct on the people,—fifty drachmas for every lamb offered in daily sacrifice.

At length the peace of this favored district was interrupted by the invasion of Alexander. While he was at the siege of Tyre, he sent to demand the surrender of Jerusalem. The high priest answered that he had sworn fealty to Darius, and was bound to maintain his allegiance to that monarch. After the taking of Gaza, the conqueror advanced against Jerusalem, and was met by the high priest Judas, himself clad in his pontifical robes, the priests in their ceremonial attire, the people in white garments. No sooner had Alexander beheld the high priest, than he was reminded of a vision he once had, and in which he saw a figure, in that very dress, exhorting him to pass over into Asia, and achieve the conquest of Persia. Alexander even worshipped the God of the Jews, entered the temple, and offered a sacrifice in the temple, whilst the high priest communicated the prophecies of Daniel concerning the Greeks. Whatever truth there is in that story, certain it is, that the Jews enjoyed great liberties and privileges in Palestine, that many of them were subject to the Macedonian rule. On the death of Alexander, Judaea came into the possession of Laomedon. After the defeat of Laomedon (B.C. 320), Ptolemy, the king of Egypt, attempted to seize the whole of Syria. He advanced against Jerusalem, but was defeated by the Maccabees, under John Hyrcanus, being offended by the Pharisees, broke with them, and prepared great troubles for his descendants. His eldest son's (Aristobulus) reign was but short; but, when his second son (Alexander Janneus), ascended the throne, he was so annoyed by the popular party of the Pharisees, that, before his death, he felt obliged to advise his wife Alexandra to join the Pharisees, and abandon the Sadducees entirely. Through this policy, peace was restored, and Hyrcanus II. was made high priest while Alexandra occupied the throne. After Alexander's death (10 B.C.), a deadly strife began between the two sons (Hyrcanus and Aristobulus) for the sovereignty. In the course of this struggle both parties appealed to Pompey, who at once invaded Palestine, and, after having taken Jerusalem and its temple, appointed Hyrcanus high priest, limiting his dominion, however, to Judea alone, and taking his brother Aristobulus, with his two sons, as captives to Rome. Alexander, one of the sons of Aristobulus, managed to escape, and tried to raise the standard of revolt against Hyrcanus, but with no success. Hyrcanus was recognized as high priest; and Antipater, for services rendered to Julius Caesar, was appointed procurator over Judea. Caesar also granted the Jews many privileges, and at his death they were among the first to mourn for him (Suetonius: Caesar, c. 84.). Antipater made his son Phasael governor of Jerusalem, while he placed his son Herod over Galilee. The latter soon succeeded, by the help of the Romans, in becoming king of the Jews (39 B.C.). Under him Aristobulus, the last of the Maccabees, acted as high priest; but he was put to death. Herod was succeeded by his son Archelaus, who, after a few years' reign, was deposed (6 A.D.), and Judea became part of a Roman province with Syria, but with its own procurator residing at Cesarea. When Quirinius took the census, he succeeded in quelling a general revolt; but the fiercer spirits found a leader in Judas the Galilean, who, fighting for the theocratic principle (according to the notions of the Pharisees) against the Roman yoke, kindled a fire in the people, which, though often quenched, was not extinguished. Side by side with the deeds of God, who now sent to his people the promised Messiah to build up the messianic kingdom, we now see, as if caricaturing God's word and promise, a wild, demagogical power, which leads the people, after having rejected the invitation of the Good Shepherd, to utter destruction. In quick succession the Roman governors follow each other. In quicker succession followed the high priests, with the exception of Caiaphas, who retained his office during the long reign of Pontius Pilate (26-36 A.D.). The principle of interfering as little as possible with the religious liberty of the Jews was rudely assailed by the Emperor Caligula, who gave orders that his image should be set up

The plan of Alexander, to imbue the nations of the East with Greek culture, was continued under his successors, and by degrees Grecian influence was felt in Palestine. Thus Antigonus of Socho, who claims to have had a Greek name, is said to have been a student of Greek literature. In opposition to these Hellenists, whose Judaism was of a very lax nature, there developed itself, in a quiet manner, the party of the pious, or Chasidim, which rigidly adhered to the laws of the fathers, and openly showed itself afterwards in the struggle of the Maccabees. Under Seleucus IV., as has been stated, the Jews had come under the Syrian sway. The people were governed by the high priest, and thus their condition was tolerable. When, however, the effort was made to hasten the process of Hellenizing the people, and to destroy altogether the Jewish nationality, new troubles began which resulted in the rise of the Maccabees. Seleucus was succeeded by Antiochus (IV.) Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.). When he ascended the throne, there were at Jerusalem two parties,—a national one, adhering to the laws of the fathers; and the Greek, which endeavored to introduce Grecian manners, vices, and idolatry. Joshua, or Jason, the brother of Onias III., the high priest, by the offer of four hundred and forty talents annually as tribute, and a hundred and fifty more for perquisites, and at his death they were among the first to mourn for him (Suetonius: Caesar, c. 84.). Antipater made his son Phasael governor of Jerusalem, while he placed his son Herod over Galilee. The latter soon succeeded, by the help of the Romans, in becoming king of the Jews (39 B.C.). Under him Aristobulus, the last of the Maccabees, acted as high priest; but he was put to death. Herod was succeeded by his son Archelaus, who, after a few years' reign, was deposed (6 A.D.), and Judea became part of a Roman province with Syria, but with its own procurator residing at Cesarea. When Quirinius took the census, he succeeded in quelling a general revolt; but the fiercer spirits found a leader in Judas the Galilean, who, fighting for the theocratic principle (according to the notions of the Pharisees) against the Roman yoke, kindled a fire in the people, which, though often quenched, was not extinguished. Side by side with the deeds of God, who now sent to his people the promised Messiah to build up the messianic kingdom, we now see, as if caricaturing God's word and promise, a wild, demagogical power, which leads the people, after having rejected the invitation of the Good Shepherd, to utter destruction. In quick succession the Roman governors follow each other. In quicker succession followed the high priests, with the exception of Caiaphas, who retained his office during the long reign of Pontius Pilate (26-36 A.D.). The principle of interfering as little as possible with the religious liberty of the Jews was rudely assailed by the Emperor Caligula, who gave orders that his image should be set up in the temple of Jerusalem, as in others else where. It was entirely destroyed by Titus, who was the direct successor of the Syrian governor Petronius, that the execution of these orders was temporarily postponed until the emperor was induced by Agrippa I. to withdraw them. Caligula soon afterwards died; and under the rule of Agrippa I., to whom the government of the entire kingdom of his grandfather Herod was committed by Claudius, the Jews enjoyed much prosperity. In every respect the king was all they could wish. At the time of his death (in 44 A.D.: compare also Acts xii. 23), his son Agrippa being too young, Judea was again ruled by Roman governors; viz., Cuspius Fadus (from 44, under whom Theudas played his part: Joseph., Ant. XX. 5, 1), Tiberius Alexander (the nephew of Philo, till 48), Cumanus (48-52), and Felix (52-60). Felix, followed by Festus (60-63). At the death of the latter, the high priest Ananus, a cruel Sadducee, caused the death of James the Just, and of other martyrs, as had been the case under Tiberius Alexander (the nephew of Philo, till 48), Cumanus (48-52), and Felix (52-60). Felix, followed by Festus (60-63). At the death of the latter, the high priest Ananus, a cruel Sadducee, caused the death of James the Just, and of other Christians. Festus's successor, Albinus (64), caused great dissatisfaction; and, under Florus, disturbances in the streets of Jerusalem and Caesarea were of frequent occurrence, and massacre followed upon massacre, until Cestius Gallus, the prefect of Syria, moved his troops towards Jerusalem. In Jerusalem a war party, called "Zealots," prepared for the defence of the temple. The peace party tried in vain to pacify the insurgents, and in vain also were all attempts at pacemaking on the part of Agrippa II. Judea was at open war with the Emperor Nero, who sent the first general of the empire, Vespasian, to subjugate Palestine. Into all parts of Palestine prominent men were sent to manage the affairs; and thus Josephus, the Jewish historian, was intrusted with the defence of Galilee. While Galilee and other provinces fell into the hands of Vespasian, Jerusalem awaited the enemy, but not with the whole united strength, but torn up into three factions, under John of Gioras, Eleazar, and Simon, son of Gioras. At length, however, Vespasian, who in the mean time had become emperor, sent his son Titus to reduce Jerusalem. Itus besieged Jerusalem, took the temple, and burned it to the ground Aug. 10, 70 A.D. The history of the world knows of no other catastrophe so mortal as was the combat of the Jewish people with the Roman power. The presentiment of the heathen Titus, that a special divine judgment had taken place, was but the fulfilment of the word of the Lord. Jerusalem fell, because it knew not the time of her visitation (Luke xix. 44). Since these last words were spoken by her rejected Messiah (Matt. xxiii. 37 sq.), Jerusalem and the defiled temple are dedicated to destruction: the king of kings, that shall come out of the Jewish people, and given to the heathen (Matt. xxi. 43). From that time on, till the final ruin, the elected residue is gathered from the ancient covenant people, which is to form the root of the new congregation of salvation, the branch into which the believing Gentiles are grafted, and into which the ancient Israel of the Lord is now the Israel of God, which assumes all the prerogatives of the latter, becoming "the chosen generation, the royal priesthood, the holy nation, the peculiar people" (1 Pet. ii. 9), to which belong the divine promises. And yet Israel according to the flesh, in which God has shown, before all nations, how he loves and how he punishes, is not yet excluded from the realm of promise. Concerning the same, the old law remains in force, that it cannot perish, even in the banishment and dispersion, but is spared rather to an induction into the new covenant. Hence Israel's captivity and Jerusalem's destruction shall last until the times of the nations of the earth are full. And when the fulness of the Gentiles has come in (Rom. xi. 25), Israel as a whole shall receive the gospel, and see his Messiah (Matt. xxiii. 39); "for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. xi. 29).

At the beginning of the seventh century, with the rise of Mahomet, better times were ushered in for the Jews, notwithstanding the fact that they were expelled from Arabia by Omar; but outside of Arabia, in Mauritania and Spain, they thrived especially well. In the latter country their prosperous condition lasted so long as the Catholic Church did not dominate the State. In the Germanic states which arose upon the ruins of the Roman Empire, the Jews fared well on the whole, especially under the Frankish monarchy. The Carolingians helped them in every possible way, making no account of the complaints of the bishops.

Meanwhile the Church was not remiss in seeking constantly repeated re-enactments of the old laws which she enacted in former years. Gradually she succeeded. The feudal system, and the crusading spirit of the middle ages, only tended to lower the position of the Jews in Christian society. Not only was intercourse with them shunned: they were also obliged to wear a little wheel upon their dress as a mark. Outbreaks against the Jews were of repeated occurrence; and though popes and other prelates set them against such persecutions, yet the popular aversion against the Jew was too strong. It was not only religious hate, which was accompanied without scruple, and thus made themselves still more repugnant to the Christians than they previously were by means of their religion. Thus it came about, that, where the spirit of toleration was exhausted, the Jews had to leave the country. England was the first kingdom in which this occurred, under Edward I. in 1290; France followed in 1394; Spain and Portugal, in 1492 and 1495. In this way it happened that Germany, Italy, and adjoining districts became the chief abode of the Jews. In the German Empire the Jews, as Kameralrechte, or servants of the imperial chamber, enjoyed protection of person and property for a tax paid to the emperor. In some respects they maintained a kind of autonomy, and settled civil affairs among themselves by the dicta of their rabbins. And though they had frequently to suffer from the popular rage, which often marked its course by bloodshed and desolation, yet the Jews maintained their ground on account of the political confusion then prevailing in Germany; and, if they were expelled from one locality, they readily found refuge in some other.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, Western Europe was almost depopulated of Jews. Most of them lived in Germany, Italy, Poland, and in the Ottoman and African states. In small numbers they were found in India, Malabar, Cochinchina, Bokhara, China, and Abyssinia. Very exact statistics are wanting, but it is certain that the number of the European exiles sought refuge, especially from Spain, on account of persecution under Ferdinand and Isabella. Very large congregations were soon formed at Constantinople, Smyrna, Damascus, and other places.

The Reform movement opened a new and better era to the Jews. Not that the Reformers personally were more tolerant towards them than the Roman-Catholic hierarchy; but the very fact that the boasted unity of the Church had received a serious blow made people more inclined to toleration. The fury of persecution, formerly directed against the Jews, was now directed against heretics in the bosom of Christianity itself; and whilst the Jews were left alone, yet the anathema of public contempt, humiliation, and exclusion from every public or private connection, still lay heavily upon them. The period which intervened between the Reformation and the French Revolution was of a monotonous character to the Jews, with the exception of a few instances which attracted public attention. Thus in 1677 rose the pseudo-Messiah, Sabbatai Zevi, born at Smyrna in 1625, and died at Belgrade, as a Mohammedan. Notwithstanding the apostacy of this pretender, there were some who upheld his claims even after his death, and asserted that he was still the true Messiah, and that he was to return from the dead. A few years later, this heresy appeared under a new form, and under the guidance of two Polish rabbis, who travelled extensively to propagate Sabbataism, which had its followers from Smyrna to Amsterdam, and even in Poland. In 1722 the whole sect was solemnly execrated in all the synagogues of Europe. In 1750 Jacob Frank, a native of Poland, made his appearance, and caused a schism in the synagogues of his native country. But all these imitations bring them not nearer to the Church, the founder of which they regard as an Essene, and not as the Christ, the promised Messiah. Whatever the destinies of this people in the hands of Providence may be, certain it is that God has great things in store for the Jews, for whose conversion the Church has to pray till Jesus is all in all.

According to calculations published in 1881, there are 5,106,326 Jews in Europe, 402,996 in Africa, 182,847 in Asia, 307,963 in America, and 20,000 in Australia; or 6,080,132 Jews in the world, exclusive of 200,000 Falashas (Appletons' Annual Cyclopedia for 1881, p. 458). See Jews, Missions among.

ITALY, Ecclesiastical Statistics of. The kingdom of Italy comprises an area of 113,000 square miles, with a population of 28,000,000, of which 100,000 are Greek Catholics, 96,000 Evangelical Christians, 36,000 Jews, and 23,000 Mohammedans, while all the rest belong to the Roman-Catholic Church.

The Roman-Catholic Church.—Sept. 20, 1870, the temporal power of the Pope glided quietly out of existence; but May 13, 1871, the legislative assembly of the kingdom, while it passed a law guaranteeing the independence of the Pope and the holy see. The person of the Pope is sacred and inviolable, like that of the king. The honors of sovereignty are due to him, and he is allowed to keep a body-guard. The State pays him annually a pension of 3,225,000 lires, which, however, he has hitherto declined to receive and the palaces of the Vatican and the Lateran, and the villa of Castle Gandolfo, with their libraries and collections, are declared to be the property of the holy see, inalienable, free of taxation, and exempted from expropriation. The Italian Government guarantees the independence of the Pope and the holy see.

The Roman-Catholic Church in Italy numbers 265 dioceses (of which eleven archbishops and sixty-three bishops are independent of any metropolitan authority, and stand immediately under the Pope); and 24,980 parishes, which vary very much in size, from fourteen thousand to one hundred souls. The parish priest is always landholder, and derives his principal income from his patronage; but the State spends yearly about one million lire in augmentation of the annual revenue of 30,969,465 lire.

Another question presenting nearly as great difficulties as that of abolishing the temporal power of the Pope, though preserving his spiritual sovereignty, arose from the monastic orders. In the kingdom of Sardinia the law of May 29, 1855, dissolved all religious orders not engaged in preaching, teaching, or nursing the sick, abrogated all chapters of collegiate churches having no cure of souls, and abolished all private benefices for which the holders paid no service; and thus 274 monasteries with 3,733 monks, and 61 convents with 1,756 nuns, were closed, and 2,722 chapters and private benefices were dissolved.

As the union of Italy progressed, the same principles were applied in Umbria, the Marchese, Naples, and Rome, by the laws of July 7, 1866, Aug. 15, 1867, and June 19, 1875. When the census of 1866 was taken, there still existed in Italy, outside of the city and province of Rome, 32 orders of monks, with 3,874 brethren in 625 monasteries, and an annual income of 6,714,371 lires; 31 orders of nuns, with 8,264 sisters in 537 convents, and an annual income of 7,008,624 lires; 10 mendicant orders, with 10,848 brethren in 1,209 monasteries; and 3 orders of mendicant nuns, with 576 sisters in 43 convents. When the census of 1871 was taken, there were in the province and city of Rome 474 monasteries (311 for monks and 163 for nuns), with 8,151 inmates (4,329 male and 3,825 female), and an annual income of 4,780,891 lires. An idea of the benefit which the State or the people derived from these institutions may be formed by observing, that of the thirty-two monastic orders having an independent fortune, ten were devoted to teaching, one to nursing the sick, and the rest to a contemplative life; but of the annual revenue of 6,714,371 lires, only 451,732 lires were spent for educational purposes, and 151,401 lires on the sick, while the rest was eaten up by contemplation.

The legislation since 1855 has disestablished about fifty thousand ecclesiastical foundations, which rendered no other service than supporting idleness, ignorance, and vice. From the closed monasteries the monks and nuns returned into society with the full rights and duties of citizens; but each of them received a pension varying from one hundred to six hundred lires, according to age and other circumstances. The confiscated estates became State domains, but were gathered into a special fund, from which the ecclesiastical pensions, the expenses of public education, etc., are paid. The capital value of the property which has thus accrued to the domain since 1855 is estimated at 838,776,076 lires, yielding an annual revenue of 30,969,465 lire.
parochial stipends. The rite employed is the ordinary Latin rite, though other rites are recognized. Thus the Albanians in the southern provinces use the Greek rite and the Greek language in their worship, and their priests are allowed to marry. Other differences of rite occur among the Armenians in Venice and in the church of Milan.

The Evangelical Church is represented in Italy by the old and celebrated Church of the Waldensians, the Free Italian Church, and various more or less successful endeavors by the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians, and other denominations.

By a decree of Feb. 17, 1848, religious liberty was established in the kingdom of Sardinia. The Church of the Waldensians consisted at that time of fifteen congregations up among the mountains, and one in Turin. But it immediately took on a considerable missionary activity, and afterwards formed 39 new congregations in various parts of Italy, with 34 ordained pastors, 23 evangelists, 44 teachers, 2,513 communicants, and about 400 catechumens, 1,684 pupils in the primary schools, and 1,698 in the Sunday school. It contains also a theological school with four professors and ten students in Rome. [Gavazzi is one of the leading spirits in this church.] The Methodists have in their northern missionary district 28 congregations, and 15 in their southern district, and in all 22 ordained preachers. [The American Methodists who began missionary efforts in Italy in 1873, have 15 Italian preachers, one American missionary (Dr. Vernon), 708 church-members, and 311 probationers. The Presbyterians work in Italy through the Waldensian and Free churches. The Church of England has three congregations in Rome. Dr. Robert Nevin is rector of the American Episcopal Church in Rome, which has the largest Protestant house of worship, built by his own exertions. The American Baptists have had an Italian mission since 1870, and now have nine preachers, and 175 communicants, with congregations at Milan, Rome, Naples, Venice, etc. The English Baptists have eleven preachers, and began their mission in 1871.] K. RÖNNERK.

ITALY. Protestantism in. Every now and then the noblest and loftiest spirits produced by the Italian people—Dante, Petrarcha, Laurencius Valla, Savonarola, Egidius of Viterbo, Picus de Miranda—burst out in protest against the corruption of the Church of Rome, and demanded reforms. Councils, such as those of Pisa and Constance, supported the movement; and popes, such as Adrian VI. and Paul III., took the lead of it, or at least made people believe that they did. The reforms demanded were purely moral, however, not doctrinal: it was a reform of the clergy, rather than a reform of the Church, which was intended. Thus the order of the Theatines was founded in 1524 by Cajetan of Thiene and Bishop Caraffa of Theate (afterwards Paul IV.), for the express purpose of reforming the clergy; but at the same time the Theatines were the bitterest enemies, the most furious persecutors, of the Reformation; and, as soon as it became apparent that a moral reform could not be accomplished, unless on the basis of a doctrinal reform, the council and the Pope, the monks and the prelate, at once agreed in calling in the Inquisition for the purpose of stamping out "heresy." In Italy all the necessary materials for a moral reform were absolutely lacking. The revival of letters, which had been more vigorous there than in any other country, turned out to be essentially a revival of Paganism, and resulted in a religious indifferentism and cynical scepticism, which might have a great talent for railing at vices, but certainly showed very little power to correct them. But, where such a spirit is reigning, no moral reform is possible: there the reform must begin with the spirit, the idea, the doctrine. In the case of Italy, evidences were plenty and striking. The consilium novemviral, consisting of Contarini, Pole, Caraffa, Sadolet, Fregoso, Giberti, Badia, Cortese, and Aléandre, which Paul III. organized in 1536 for the purpose of reforming the chancelry, the episcopacy, the morals of the clergy, the penitential, the administration of the rota, etc., barely escaped having its report put on the Index; for it was, indeed, impossible to explain the causes of the reigning evils, and indicate remedies against them, without touching upon questions of doctrine. But a doctrinal reform the Church of Rome neither would nor could consent to; for it surely meant a revision and consequent alteration of her whole social and political position. As soon, therefore, as Paul III. came to understand that this cry for reform, which had arisen spontaneously in Italy, and earlier there than in any other country, was in principle identical with the Reformation in Germany, he handed over the whole case to the Inquisition (established by a bull of June 21, 1842); and, two generations later on, every trace of Protestantism was wiped off from the face of Italy.

In Northern Italy the transition from a moral to a doctrinal reform took place under the influence of the Reformation in Germany. The works of the reformers—Luther, Melanchthon, Zwingli, and Butzer—were early introduced into Venice, often under fictitious names. Thus the Loci communes of Melanchthon circulated under the name of Hippophilus de Terra Negra. In 1520 the writings of Luther were seized and burnt by the Patriarch Contarini, which, however, did not prevent them from being clandestinely reprinted, and widely read. In 1543 Luther was in actual correspondence with the Venetian Govern- ment through Baldassari Alitteri, secretary to the English embassy in Venice. The rapid spread of Protestantism in the territory of the Republic during the period 1520–42 was, to a great extent, due to the indefatigable exertions of Alitteri, supported by the fervent preachings of a number of monks, and the translation of the Bible by Bruciol, a disciple of Savonarola. Of course the Roman curia protested in the most vehement manner. But the Venetian ambassador, Tiepolo, had the cynical frankness to tell Pius V. to his face, that toleration or intoleration with respect to heretics was to the Republic merely a question of policy. And so it was. As soon as the Republic needed the friendship of the Pope, the Inquisition was established. Altieri was banished, fifteen hundred and forty-five processes were instituted against Protestants of the higher classes, while those of the lower were tracked like game on the Lido. The archives of the Inquisition contain the acts of two hundred and forty-three processes instituted between 1541 and 1592, some against members of the first families,—the Giustiniani, Dandola, Falieri, etc.,—twenty-six against ecclesiastics; but thousands of persons were quietly burnt, drowned, decapitated, tortured, or exiled. The same proceedings were enacted throughout the whole territory of the Republic, in Vicentia, Padua, Bergamo, Treviso, Undino, etc. Into Lombardy—bounded north by Switzerland, and west by Piedmont—Protestantism penetrated in a double stream; and in the beginning of the sixteenth century several of the Lombard cities maintained connections with Geneva, Zürich, and Wittenberg. In 1541 verses were composed and sung in Milan in honor of Luther; and Gerdes tells us, that in 1524 the Reformation was preached there with great success. In 1530 Curio fled from Piedmont, and found refuge in Milan, though he had openly embraced the Reformation; and in 1555 Paleario could still write his Actio in Pontifices Romanos undisturbed in Milan. The year previous, Archbishop Arcimboldi forbade the reading of the Scriptures in his diocese, and stipulated that a part of the confiscated property of heretics should be given to the informers and spies of the Inquisition. But Arcimboldi was a contemptible person: he could be cruel, but he could also be cowed. Quite otherwise with his successor, Carlo Borromeo (1559-84). He was as sincere as he was passionate. His merciful severity has something noble in its motives, which commands respect. He was able, chiefly by the aid of the Inquisition and the Jesuits, not only to cleanse Milan thoroughly from heresy, but also to make it a barrier against all influence from Germany. In Piedmont there existed at the beginning of the sixteenth century numerous evangelical congregations founded by missionaries of the Waldensian Church (which see). But also the influence from Geneva and Wittenberg was considerable. When Calvin, in 1538, passed through the valley of Aosta, he found many adherents; and in 1560 it was said, even of the Princess Margaretta, that she was a secret Calvinist. But in Piedmont, as in Venice, political regards compelled the government to yield to the Pope's demands. The Inquisition was established; and in cases in which it was found impossible to apply this instrument,—namely, when the question was not about individual persons, but about whole families, towns, districts,—the children were by force taken from the parents, and placed in convents, to be educated in the Roman-Catholic faith.

In Southern and Central Italy the movement was started by the circle of eminent men which formed in Naples (1535-40) around the Spaniard Valdez; but it was in many ways nourished, both through direct communication with the German reformers, and by the existence of evangelical congregations founded by Waldensian missionaries. Valdez fled from Spain when, in the course of a satirical dialogue he wrote against the clergy. In Naples he lived very quietly, and he died before the persecutions began. But he exercised a considerable influence, both by his writings, and still more through his friends,—Bernardino Ochino from Siena, general of the Capuchins, a celebrated preacher, who formed congregations at Venice, Florence, Siena, and Perugia, but fled to Geneva, Aug. 23, 1542; Peter Martyr Vermigli, professor of theology, first at Naples, afterwards at Lucca, strongly influenced by the reformers of Geneva, whither he fled a few days later than Ochino; Carmenechi, who had been secretary to Clement VII., and twice escaped from the grip of the Inquisition (1546 and 1559), but finally fell a victim to the unconquerable hatred of Pius V. and the loose policy of Cosmus of Medicis (1567); Flaminius, author of the beautiful book, Del Beneficio di Gerusalemme, and the Inquisition hunted after with nearly as much appetite as after the Bible; and Caracciolo, who became the founder of the Italian congregation at Geneva. When the Inquisition began its work, it found large congregations formed by these men in nearly all the great cities of Central and Southern Italy; and, what was still worse, in many cases it found the very officers of the Church most strongly affected by the disease it was sent to extirpate. In the environs of Naples the bishops of Chironia, Sorrente, Isola, Caiazzo, Mola, Civita di Pena, Polichasto, Reggio, etc., read the works of Luther, and were more or less infected with Lutheranism. Most of them reco.unted immediately; but some of them it was necessary to punish. Yes, at some places the Inquisition had to supplement itself with laymen in order to be sure of having no heretics among its own members. With the chiefs, however, the Inquisition had comparatively easy work. They often succeeded in escaping to foreign countries. Geneva, London, and Cracow swarmed with Italian Protestants. In such cases the Inquisition had only to burn their books,—Florence was especially prominent by its exiled 40% of that kind, and to prohibit all further communication with the mother-country, in which respect Lucca proved herself most sagacious. But the task became rather difficult when the question was about whole congregations. In Calabria the Waldensians had occupied the villages of Guardia, San Sisto, Vacci. carizzo, Rosa, Argentina, San Vincenzo, and Montalto since 1315. What to be done in such a case? Well, the villages were razed to the ground, and sixteen hundred persons were carried into the donjons of Naples, whence some of them were exported to the Saracen slave-markets, while others were removed to the remotest parts of the Spanish galleys (1558-60). In Rome new prisons had to be built; but the attendance which the Pope could spare for the inmates was not sufficient to prevent them from being occasionally starved to death. No day passed away without its sacrifice of human flesh. One occasion, eighty-eight victims were despatched in one day by one executioner and with one knife. After ITINERANCY. Our Lord had no settled place of abode and no fixed congregation. The apostles similarly went from place to place, at least during a portion of their ministry. Methodists thus find Scripture precedent for their peculiar system of ministerial appointments. The ministers of this denomination, in the settled parts of this country, are assigned to churches by the bishop, but are not allowed to hold the same charge more than three consecutive years; then they are put over another church in the same conference. In this way they move from place to place in the conference. In England and upon our frontiers, the circuit-system prevails; i.e., a number of churches or preaching-places are served by the same set of preachers in rotation. There can be no question of the immense value of this itinerant system in the past history of the Methodist Church. It was started by John Wesley, who, as early as his third conference (May, 1746), assigned the lay-preaching to certain fields of labor called then and now "circuits." But, owing to the altered circumstances of the church, the question of abolishing the system, or greatly modifying it, has been of late very earnestly debated. The weight of opinion seems to be against any essential change. See METHODISM.

ITURÆA, the country of the Iturians, was at one time identified with Auranitis, or Trachonitis (Eusebius, Jerome, and others), in direct contradiction of Luke iii. 1. Modern archaeologists have placed it in the plains of north-eastern Arabia, or on the eastern spurs of the Hauran Mountains; but neither of these locations agrees with the notes of ancient writers. As the Iturans were a nomadic tribe, they may have lived at various places in various times. They descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31), and, together with other Arabian tribes, they fought with the Israelites settled east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 18–22). Aristobulus I. conquered them (105 B.C.); but Pompey was the first who really succeeded in subduing them. Afterwards they are often mentioned as excellent soldiers, serving as archers in the Roman army. Their country often changed dominion until Claudius definitively incorporated it with Syria. See FRIEDRICH MÜNTER: De rebus Ituratorum, Copenhagen, 1824. — RÜETSCHI.

IVER, Rt. Rev. Levi Silliman, D.D., LL.D., b. at Meriden, Conn., Sept. 16, 1795; d. at Manhattanville, New-York City, Oct. 13, 1867. He came of Presbyterian stock; but in 1819 he became an Episcopalian, and in 1823 he was ordained priest, and settled over Trinity Church, Philadelphia. In 1831 he was consecrated bishop of North Carolina, and displayed zeal and ability in the religious education of the slaves. He was a High Churchman, and sided with the Oxford Tractarians. In December, 1852, he visited Rome, and there joined the Roman Church. His friend and confessor, Dr. Forbes, went with him, but returned again to the Episcopal Church. Ives was deposed from his bishopric (Oct. 14, 1853), but made professor of rhetoric in St. Joseph's (R.C.) Theological Seminary at Fordham, N.Y. Among his last labors was the founding of the Protectory for Roman-Catholic children at Westchester, N.Y., and of the Manhattanville College, where he taught. He published an apology for his secession, The Trial of a Mind in its Progress to Catholicism, London and Boston, 1854.

IVO OF CHARTRES (Yvo Carnotensis), b. about 1040 in the diocese of Beauvais; d. at Chartres, Dec. 23, 1116; studied humaniora and philosophy in Paris, and theology in the monastery of Bec, where he had Lanfranc for teacher, and Anselm for a schoolmate, and was appointed director of the monastery of St. Quentin in 1075, and bishop of Chartres in 1090. He was implicated in grave controversies, first with his predecessor, Gannfried, who had been deposed by the Pope on account of simony, but still found many adherents in France, and afterward with Philippe I., who had repudiated his legitimate spouse, Bertha, and entered into an adulterous connexion with Bertrade of Anjou. But the most interesting point in his life is the stand-point he occupied in the great contest concerning the right of investiture (see his letters 63, 232, 296, and Baronius ad ann. 1106 and 1111). He denounced with great frankness the faults and failings of the Roman curia, and is often represented as one of the principal champions of Gallicanism. On the other hand, when the extreme hierarchical party, indignant at the concessions which Paschal III. had made to the emperor, tried to have these concessions condemned by a general council as heretical, Ivo interfered, and defended Paschal. — Moderation and a deep sense of equity distinguished his views, and governed all his actions. Of his works the two most important are his collections of canons: Decretum or Decretorum Opus in seventeen books, and Pannormia in eight books. His letters, numbering two hundred and eighty-seven, have also great interest for the history of his time. Whether the Breve chronicon de rebus Francorum is by him is uncertain; but the Historia ecclesiastica was written by Hubert of Fleury. A collected edition of his works (except the Pannormia), Paris, 1647, has been reprinted by Migne, Patr. Lat., tom. 157, 161. Biographies of him were written by I. Fronteau (Hamburg, 1720), Abry (Strassburg, 1841), and Ritzau (Brussels, 1869). — WAGENMANN.
JACOB.

JAB'BOK, the present Zurks, a stream which rises in the plateau east of Gilead, cuts through Gilead in a narrow defile, and empties itself into the Jordan, about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. It formed the northern boundary of Ammon, and separated the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Num. xxi. 24; Deut. iii. 37, iii. 16; Josh. xii. 2; Judg. xi. 13, 22). On the south bank of the Jabbok the interview took place between Jacob and Esau (Gen. xxxii. 22).

JABLONSKI, Daniel Ernst, b. at Nassenhuben, near Danzig, Nov. 20, 1680; d. in Berlin, May 25, 1741; studied theology and Oriental languages at Frankfort-on-the-Oder and Oxford, and was appointed pastor of the Reformed congregation in Magdeburg in 1683, pastor of the Polish congregation in Lissa in 1688, court-preacher at Köningberg in 1671, and court-preacher at Berlin in 1697. He sprang originally from the Bohemian diaspora, and was consecrated bishop in 1699. In 1737 he consecrated Count Zinzendorf bishop, and thus he formed the transition from the old stock of the Moravian Brethren to the younger branch of the Hennhuters. In the church-history of Prussia he distinguished himself by his exertions to bring about a union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches. But his long negotiations with Leibnitz, who represented a similar tendency in Hanover, came to a sudden end in 1706, chiefly on account of the general despair to buy it from him for a mess of potage (xxxv. 29); (3) His old age (xxxvii. 1—xl.x. 33).

JACOB, or ISRAEL (prince of God, or warrior of God), the son of Isaac and the direct ancestor of the Israelites. His life is plainly divisible into three parts,—

1) His birth, youth, and early manhood (Gen. xxv. 22—xxviii. 22); (2) His maturity years (xxxi. 1—xxx. 29); (3) His old age (xxxvii. 1—xl.x. 33).

1) The characteristic feature of his early years was his desire to get the birthright from Esau. He began the struggle before he was born (xxv. 22), took advantage of his twin-brother's momentary despair to buy it from him for a mess of potage (xxxv. 33), and finally got the blessing by fraud (xxvii.). For this act of perfidy he had to flee, and went to Haran, where his uncle (Laban) lived. On his way thither he had a vision at Luz, in consequence of which he called the place Bethel. (2) Kindly received by his uncle, he fell in love with Rachel, and served seven years for her, only to be cheated by the substitution of the older daughter, Leah, for Rachel, on the wedding-night,—a proceeding which the Eastern marriage-customs render comparatively easy. He had therefore to serve another seven years for his chosen wife. Leah bore him four sons successively,—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah; while Rachel remained childless. By Rachel's maid, Bilhah, Jacob had Dan and Naphtali; by Leah's maid, Zilpah, Gad and Asher; by Leah herself, Issaacar, Zebulun, and his only daughter, Dinah. At length God remembered Rachel, and she bore Joseph. Not only in children, but in all his possessions, manifestly favored, it is no wonder Laban desired him to stay; but Jacob had become weary of the long subordination and the frequent trickery (xxxvii. 7), and, knowing that Laban would not willingly let him go, he departed secretly, was pursued, overtaken, came to an understanding with Laban, and so in peace started once more for Canaan. The news of the approach of his brother with his band alarmed him. But, ere he met his brother, a change was wrought in him. He wrestled at the Jabbbok with...
God all night, until the breaking of the day, and, in accord of his persistence, he received the blessing he so earnestly desired, and a new name,—Israel. But, ere granting his request, the "man" touched the sinew of Jacob's thigh, and it shrank, putting his thigh out of joint. To his surprise, Esau was very friendly; and the brothers separated peaceably, to meet once more at the funeral of Jacob. Jacob settled first at Shechem, but was compelled to leave in consequence of Simeon's and Levi's conduct, and went to Bethel, and thence to Hebron. On this latter journey, Rachel died at Bethlehem, shortly after bearing Benoni, or Benjamin. (3) In Hebron the patriarch lived quietly, passed through heavy sorrows in the supposed death of Joseph, the pressure of famine, and the reluctant separation from Benjamin. But the night of weeping was followed by the morning of joy. He left Hebron at the summons of Joseph, was personally honored by the Pharaoh, and in prosperity and tranquility passed his last days in the land of Goshen. When he felt the hand of death upon him, he gathered his sons about him, prophesied the fortunes of their respective descendants, and died at the age of a hundred and forty-seven years. His funeral was attended with royal pomp.

The character of this remarkable man is best expressed by his double name. Jacob was he; for he was naturally adroit and sly, and thus got the better of the physically stronger, more warlike Esau, and the egoistical, calculating Laban. Yet he was not sordid in his aims. He sought something higher than mere earthly possessions, and so he was Israel: for he wrestled for the divine blessing as the most valuable thing one could have; to win it, he summoned all his energy, and underwent every deprivation. It was the ambition of his life. He began the struggle in his mother's womb, and kept this end steadily in view, until, in the maturity of his powers, he received it. It is true he was far from being perfect. In him the lower nature was in conflict with the higher, and often victorious; but, in the course of a life much more troubled than that of his father's, he was purified. He was punished by a personal experience of the treatment he had given others. The deceiver of his father was deceived by Laban and by his own sons. The forgiving God of Jacob was by no means blind to the faults of his favorite, but approved his humble, hearty, undaunted desire after salvation.

JACOB'S WELL. — In John iv. 5 as a well near the city of Sychar, in Samaria, on the potamon græcum with the patriarch Jacob gave to his son Joseph (compare Gen. xxxix. 19; Josh. xxxiv. 32). There the Lord sat down once while travelling from Judea to Galilee, weared from the journey, and then occurred the wonderful conversation related in John iv. 7-28. The place can still be identified with certainty, as situated one mile and a half to the south-east of the town of Nablus, the ancient Shechem, close by the highway from Jerusalem to Galilee, at the eastern base of Mount Gerizim. The well, which is lined with masonry, is now only seventy-five feet deep, and mostly dry, it having been filled up with debris of the adjacent ruined buildings; but in 1838, when Robinson visited it, it was a hundred and five feet deep. Jerome, in his Onomasticon, tells us that at his time a church built over the well occupied the site. That church was destroyed during the crusades; but in the twelfth century it was replaced by a chapel, which now also has fallen into ruins. See Condor: Sychar and Shechem, in Statesments, 1877, p. 149; [SCHAF: Through Bible Lands, 1879, p. 312.] RÜETSCHI.

JACOB BARADEUS, b. at Tella; was educated in the monastery of Phasila, near Nisibis, and lived for fifteen years in Constantinople as a monk, when, in the year 543, he was consecrated bishop of Nisibis by Theodosius, the Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, who was held a prisoner in Constantinople. In this position he labored with great energy and success for the reorganization and consolidation of the scattered Monophysite party in the East. "Light-footed as Aneas" (2 Sam. ii. 18), and clad in rags (whence Baradat, "a coarse horse-blanket"), he wandered from the boundary of Egypt to the banks of the Euphrates, preaching during the day, and often walking thirty or forty miles in the night, thus escaping his persecutors. He consecrated two patriarchs, twenty-seven (according to another reading, eighty-seven) bishops, and a hundred thousand priests and deacons. No wonder, therefore, that the whole party was called, after him, the Jacobites. Of written monuments he left very little. An anaphora, translated into Latin by Renaudot (Lit. Or. Coll., ii. 303) is ascribed to him; also a Confession, of which an Ethiopian version is extant in several manuscripts, edited and translated by Cornill, in Zeitschrift d. Deut. Morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1876. A number of his ecclesiastical letters are in a Syrian manuscript in the British Museum. D. July 30, 571. — See the appropriate sections in Josephus, the Commentaries, Bible Dictionaries, in KUERTZ: History of the Old Covenant; Ewald: History of Israel; HENGBSTEN: Kingdom of God under the Old Testament; BERNSTEIN: Ursprung d. Sagen von Abraham, Isak, und Jacob, Berlin, 1871; A. KÜHLER: Biblische Geschichte A. T., Erlangen, 1866; J. HÜTTNER: Vossches Handbuch der Geschichte, Göttingen, 1876. See also the art. in HAMBURGER: Real-Encyclopädie des Judenthums for the Talmudic fancies respecting Jacob. v. Orelli.

JACOB OF EDESSA. — (Syriac, Orhoenous), b. in the middle of the seventh century, at 'Indaba, near Antioch; studied in Alexandria, and was in 687 appointed bishop of Edessa, but resigned in 688, on account of disputes with his clergy, and lived eleven years in the monastery of Eusebion, then nine years in the great monastery of Tell 'Eda. When his successor in the see of Edessa, Habib, died, in 708, he was invited to resume office. He consented, but died while on the journey to Edessa, June 5. He wrote on theology, history, philosophy, and grammar. He was master of three languages,—Syriac, Greek, and Hebrew. He corrected the Syriac version of the Old Testament, and translated books of Aristotle, Porphyry, the two Gregories, and others, into Syriac; his literary accomplishments were, indeed, of the very highest order. Of his works much has come down to us, and is found in the libraries of London, Paris, Florence, and Rome. See the respective catalogues of Syriac manuscripts. Something has also been published: his Syriac grammar, edited by Wright, London, 1871; several of his letters in Assemani: Bibliotheca Orientalis, i. 488-494; and by Wright: Journal of Sacred Literature, 1887. See also Barbebræus: Chronicon Ecclesiast. (1873, i. 289).

JACOB OF JÜTERBOGK, b. at Jüterbogk, in the Prussian province of Brandenburg, 1381; d. at Erfurt, 1465 or 1466; entered the Polish monastery, the Paradise, and was by his abbot sent to Cracow to study; found the rules of the Cistercian order too lax, and adopted those of the Carthusian order, 1441; removed to the monastery, ad montem St. Salvatoris, in Erfurt, and labored in the university there as professor of canon law. He has a special interest on account of his reformatory zeal. Not that he in any way felt himself at variance with the doctrines of the Church; but he fully realized the corruption of her morals, and spoke with great frankness of the morals, and spoke with great frankness of the necessary reforms in Petitiones religiosorum pro helthimself at variance with the doctrines of the Church; but he fully realized the corruption of her morals, and spoke with great frankness of the necessary reforms in Petitiones religiosorum pro

JACOB (Aphraatos) OF MAR MATTAI. See Aphraates.

JACOB OF MISA, also called Jacobellus, from his small stature; b. at Misa, in Bohemia, in the latter half of the fourteenth century; studied theology at Prague, and was appointed pastor, first at Tina, afterwards of the Church of St. Michael in Prague, where he d. Aug. 9, 1429. His study of Scripture and the Fathers showed him that the withholding of the cup in the ad

JACOB OF NISIBIS, also called Jacob the Great, lived for some time, together with Eugenius, the founder of Persian monachism, as a hermit in the Kurdian Mountains, but was in 309 chosen bishop of Nisibis (Zola); built the famous church there of which ruins are still extant; was present, together with his disciple, Ephraem Syrus, at the Council of Nicea, 325; and d. 338. None of his writings have come down to us. See art. Aphraates, and Ephraem: Carmina Nisibena, ed. Bickell, 1890.

JACOB OF SARO, b. at Curtamum, on the Euphrates, 1180; went to study in Cracow to study; found the rules of the Cistercian order too lax, and adopted those of the Cistercian order, 1441; removed to the monastery, ad montem St. Salvatoris, in Erfurt, and labored in the university there as professor of canon law. He has a special interest on account of his reformatory zeal. Not that he in any way felt himself at variance with the doctrines of the Church; but he fully realized the corruption of her morals, and spoke with great frankness of the necessary reforms in Petitiones religiosorum pro JACOB OF VITRY (Jacobus de Jüterbock, or de Jutirbock, de Paradiso, de Polonia, Cisterciensis, Carthusiensis, de Erfordia, etc. See Ullmann: Reformatoren vor d. Ref., 1866, vol. i. Paul Tschackert.

JACOB (Aphraates) OF MAR MATTAI. See Aphraates.

JACOB OF VITRY-sur-Seine, 1170; d. in Rome, April 30, 1240; was appointed presbyter parochialis, at Argenteuil, near Paris, 1200, but gave up this position in 1210, and removed to the monastery of Oignies, in the diocese of Liège, attracted by the sanctity of the Belgian nun Mary, whose life he wrote (ed. by Fr. Moschus, Arras, 1080, and in Act. Sanct., June 23). At the instance of the Pope he began in 1213 preaching a crusade against the Albigenses; and so great was the impression his eloquence produced (Sermones, Antwerp, 1575; compare Le Cöy de la Marche: La Chaire francaise au moyen âge, 1888), that in 1217 he was elected bishop of Polemais. In Palestine, where he remained for ten years, he made himself well approved, especially by the care he bestowed upon the children of the Saracen captives. But, shortly before the death of Honorius III., he seems to have returned to Oignies. Gregory IX., however, used him in many important diplomatical missions, and made him bishop of Frascati, and a cardinal. His principal work, Historia oriental, et occidentalis, was first edited by Fr. Moschus, Douay, 1597; then by Martine and Durand, in Thes. Nov. Anecd., iii., Paris, 1717. His letters have also great interest; Martene, i.e., and Bongarsius: Gesa Dei per Francos, i. See Matzner: De J. Vit., Münster, 1864. Wagenmann.

JACOBI, Friedrich Heinrich, b. at Dusseldorf, Jan. 25, 1743; d. at Pempelfort, an estate he possessed near his native city, March 10, 1819; was educated, at Francfort and Geneva, for a commercial career, but showed from early youth great inclination to dwell on literature and theology. In 1768 he took the lead of the mercantile concern his father had established at Dusseldorf; and in 1770 he made a member of the council for the duchies of Jaliers and Berg. In 1779 he was invited to Munich to take a similar position; but, not finding circumstances there as suited to his taste, he retired to Cracow. He remained until the war drove him away, 1798. He went to Holstein, and stayed there for ten years. In 1804 he was again invited to Munich, as president of the academy; and he remained there till 1812. His first literary productions were Allcieli's Brief-Sammlung (1774) and Waldemar (1779), two philosophical novels, of which especially the latter gives an easy outline of his philosophical speculations. In 1785 his Brief über die Lehre Spinozas implicated him in a controversy with Moses Mendelssohn and the Berlin philosophers; and in 1787 a similar conflict with Kant and the critical school ensued from his David Hume über den Glauben. In 1801 he published one of his most important works, Über das Unlernehmen des Kriticius die Vernunft zu Verstande bringen, and in 1811 his last great book, Von den göttlichen Dingen, which called forth a very bitter rejoinder from Schelling. Jacobi's philosophy is not a system: on the contrary, his fundamental principle—the limitation of thought, its incapability to explain the existence of facts, to do any thing more than connect them with each other—gave him an exact opposition to any purely demonstrative system. All thought, when applied alone, and carried resolutely to its last consequences, ends in atheism and fatalism. It needs to be supplemented with faith, which is the only organ of objective truth. Nevertheless, though Jacobi, as the "philosopher of faith," rested his speculations on intuition as their proper foundation, he is very far from the romantic fancifulness of Schelling. He was a sharp critic; and Schelling, as well as Kant, felt the penetrating power of his searching eye. In this point, as in many others, he resembles Sir William Hamilton, who, indeed, owed not a little to him. His works were collected by himself, and provided with very instructive prefaces and appendixes. His letters were edited by Roth, 1825-27, 2 vols. His life was written by KOHN: Jacobi und die Philosophie seiner Zeit, 1834, and ZIERNGIEBEL: Jacobis Leben, Dichten, und Denken, 1867.

JACOBITES was, from the middle of the sixth century, the name of the Syrian, and sometimes also that of the Egyptian Monophysites. Originating in the middle of the fifth century, Monophysitism spread among the Syrians, Copts, Abyssinians, and Persians, and it is the exception of some minor modifications, these four churches agree in all fundamental doctrines. The name, however, derived from Jacob Baradaeus, and not from the apostle or the patriarch, is generally confined to the Syrian Monophysites. The Egyptian Monophysites called themselves, in olden times, Thacodians, or Severians, or Dioscorians.

Most of the Byzantine emperors were hostile to the Monophysites. Only Zeno and Anastasius favored them. Justinian's attempt at reconciling them with the Catholic Church failed. From the latter part of the Syrian Jacobites suffered very much, while their Egyptian brethren seemed to get along tolerably well with the Mohammedans. In the time of Gregory XIII. (1572-85) the number of Jacobites in Syria appears to have decreased. It was estimated, that in 1560, there were only two hundred Jacobite monasteries. In 1572, the number of Jacobites in all the districts of Syria, such as Edessa, Girsar, Gargara, Tagrit, and Damasc, the Dutchman, Rootwyk (Itiner. Hierosol. et Syriamen, Antwerp, 1619), describes them as very poor. Richard Pococke (Descriptions of the East, London, 1743-45) estimated, that, out of twenty thousand Christians in Damascus, there were only two hundred Jacobites. Niebuhr (Reisebeschreibungen, Copenhagen, 1770) found a small congregation at Nisibis, and tells us that at Mardin they had three churches; at Orfa, a hundred and fifty houses; in Jerusalem, a small monastery, etc.; while they occupied the whole district of Tor, where they also had an independent patriarch besides the one residing at Caramit. Buckingham, who travelled in Mesopotamia in 1816, estimated the number of Jacobites in Mardin at two thousand out of a population of twenty thousand; and in the neighborhood of the city he found two Jacobite monasteries. In Diábekr he counted four hundred, and described three hundred families. In these figures no considerable change seems to have taken place later on. See E. ROBINSON: Biblical Researches in Palestine, Boston, 1841; J. L. PORTER: Five Years in Damascus, London, 1855. Sadad, where they number about six thousand souls, is now the headquarters of the Jacobites in Syria.

The peculiar doctrines and institutions which distinguish the Jacobites are, the conception of one nature in Christ, resulting from a perfect blending of the divine and human in him, according to the formula, ex duabus naturis, non in duabus; the rejection of the canons of the council of Chalcedon, while those of the second council of Ephesus, the so-called "Robber Synod," are accepted; the veneration of Jacob of Sarug, Jacob of Edessa, Dioscorus, Severus, Petrus Fullo, and Jacob Baradaeus as teachers and saints, while Eutyches is condemned; the use of leavened bread in the Lord's Supper; the making of the sign of the cross with one finger; the frequent application of the lot at elections of bishops and patriarchs. The Jacobite patriarch is styled "Patriarch of Antioch;" but the Greeks, who consider the Jacobites as heretics, have never allowed him to reside there. In the latter part of the ninth century it became customary for the patriarch to change his name on his election; and in the fourteenth Ignatius became the fixed name of the Jacobite patriarch, as Peter is that of the Maronite, Joseph that of the Chaldean, and Simon or Elijah, that of the Nestorian patriarchs. The Jacobite Church has produced quite a number of distinguished men, scholars, authors, etc. See Assemani: Bibli. Orient., ii. The various attempts of the Roman-Catholic Church to bring about a reconciliation with the Jacobites have not led to any remarkable results.

JACOBUS DE VORAGINE. b. at Viraggio, 1290; d. in Genoa, 1298; entered the order of the Preaching Friars in 1244, and was made archbishop of Genoa in 1292. His great fame he owes to his collection of legends.—Legenda Sanctorum, Legenda Aurea, also called Historia Longobardica, from the short Lombard chronicle attached. to the life of Pope Pelagius. The materials of which the book is composed were derived partly from apocryphal gospels, acts of apostles, acts of martyrs, and partly from medieval traditions of the wildest description; but just this made it acceptable to the time. It was translated into all European languages [into English by William Caxton, in the fifteenth century], and reprinted over and over again. He also wrote a number of sermons (Sermons de Sanclis, Lyons, 1494; Mariale, Venice, 1497, etc.) and a book in defence of the Dominican order. His Chronicle of Genoa is found in Muratori: Scriptorum Rerum Italicarum, ix.

C. SCHMIDT.

JACOBUS. Melancthon Williams, D.D., LL.D., b. at Newark, N.J., Sept. 19, 1816; d. at Allegeny, Penn., Oct. 28, 1876. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1834, and at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1838; taught in the Hebrew department for a year; was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, 1839-50; and from 1851 till his death was professor of Oriental and biblical literature in the theological seminary at Allegheny, Penn. In 1869 he was moderator of the General Assembly (Old School), the last assembly before the re-union. He was the author of a popular series of Notes on the New Testament, of which there appeared Matthew, with Harmony (New York, 1848), Mark and Luke (1853), John (1856), Acts (1859), and in 1864-65 Notes on the Book of Genesis, 2 vols. His Notes on the New Testament were republished in Edinburgh, 1862. See sketch of his life in Presbyterian Re-union Memorial Volume, pp. 50-52.

JACOMBO, Thomas, b. at Burton Lazars, Leicestershire, 1622; educated at Cambridge; pastor in London; ejected in 1662 for nonconformity; d. at Exeter, March 27, 1687. He was one of the continuators of Poole's Annotations; but his fame rests upon his Several Sermons preached on the whole Eighth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans: Eighteen of which, on the 1st, 2d, 8th, and 15th verses, are here published [all published], London, 1672, republished, Edinburgh, 1688.

JACOPONE DA TODI, the author of the Stabat mater, b. at Todici, Italy, about 1245; d. at Collazone, Nov. 13, 1306, in the convent of Collazone. His real name was Jacopo da Benedetti, or Jacobus de Benedictis (the Latin form), Benedetti being the family name. He spent the years of early manhood in revelry and carousing. His talents, however, won him both degrees of the law at Bologna. He gave himself up with enthusiasm to the practice of law, when the whole tenor of his life was suddenly changed by the violent death of his wife, from the falling of a gallery in a theatre. He decided to become a monk, and one morning appeared in the market-place, on his hands and knees, harnessed like a beast of burden. He submitted to painful asceticism for ten years, when he was admitted, in 1278, to the Franciscan order of Minorites. He was led by the corruption of the Church to compose poems arraigning Pope Boniface VIII. (1294-1303), and in 1297 entered into a confederacy of Roman nobles to compass his deposition. For this he was placed in close confinement, and limited to bread and water, until the death of Boniface, in 1303. He spent his last days at Collazone, and lies buried at Todi, where the following inscription was placed over his remains in 1569: "Omn Beati Jacoponii de Benedictis Tode巾ini Praetris ordinis Minorum, qui sub prosper Christum nova mundum arte deluit et caelum rapuit" ("The remains of the blessed J. d. B. T., a brother of the order of Minorites, who, becoming a fool for Christ's sake, deluded the world by a new art, and carried off heaven"). The expression "fool" refers to the tradition that he was partially insane. His last hours were spent by his own hymn, Giusv nostra fidanza ("Jesus our confidence"); and his last words are reported to have been, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit."

Jacopone wrote poems in Latin and Italian. The Florentine edition of 1490 contains a hundred Italian pieces; and the Venetian of 1614, two hundred and eleven. These poems consist of odes, satires, penitential psalms, etc. He wrote for the people, and reached the heart of his nation. His two most important Latin hymns are the Stabat mater dolorosa ("At the cross her station keeping"); and its companion-piece, recently discovered, Stabat mater speciosa ("Stood the glad and beauteous mother"). The former hymn depicts the sorrows of the mother of Jesus at the foot of the cross (John xix. 25); the latter, her joys at the manger. The Stabat mater has been attributed to Gregory the Great (d. 606), Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), and Innocent III. It is anonymous in the copies of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but the uniform tradition attributes it to Jacopone, and there is no sufficient reason why we should not hold to it. The Flagellants, who marched through Italy in 1398, sang it [Summa historialis, by Antoninus Florentinus (d. 1450); Annales of Detmar of Lübeck and Georg Stella (d. 1420)].

The Stabat mater is the most pathetic hymn of the middle ages or any other age. It is defaced from Mariolatry, but its soft melody and tender pathos will always delight and soothe the ear. It has frequently been set to music; first by Nanini (about 1620), and since by Astorga (about 1700), Palestrina, Perqolese (about 1736), Haydn, Rossini, and others. It is sung to Palestrina's music on Palm Sunday, at Rome. Lisco gives fifty-three German translations of the Stabat mater; and it has often been translated into English by Lord Lindsay, Caswall, Coles, Benedict, etc. The Mater speciosa has been translated by Dr. Neale, Coles, Benedict, etc.

LAUXMANN.

JAEL ('jēl), "wild goat"), the wife of Heber, the chief of a nomadic Arab tribe, was a heroine whose patriotic deed Deborah magnified in her triumphant songs of the Canaanites.

In the precipitate flight of the Canaanites, after their defeat by Barak and Deborah, Sisera was induced, by the invitation of Jaal, to stop in at her tent, whose seclusion might be expected to effectually conceal him. After refreshing himself with buttermilk, he fell asleep. While in this condition, Jael took a tent-pin, and drove it through his temples. The impassioned eulogy of Deborah expressed the gratitude of the nation for its deliverance from its enemy. Jael's deed was the "white-robed." Vardhamana and his immetreacherly and disregard of the laws of hospitality. The best treatment of the general subject of the jains will be found in Mozley's Ruling Ideas in Early Ages.
JAMES.

JAFFÉ, Philipp, b. at Schwerzenz, Posen, Feb. 17, 1819; d. in Berlin, April, 1870. He studied first medicine, but afterwards devoted himself to literature and history; was the collaborator of Pertz in the publication of the Monumenta Germaniae, 1854-63, and was in 1862 appointed protor of history in the University of Berlin. His principal works are, History of the Empire under Lothair the Saxon; History of the Empire under Conrad III.: Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, 1861 (2d ed., 1881 sq.); and Bibliotheca Rerum Germanorum, 1861-69.

JAHN, Johann, b. at Tassowitz, Moravia, June 18, 1750; d. in Vienna, Aug. 16, 1816; entered the Premonstratensian order in 1774, and was in 1862 appointed professor of oriental languages and exegesis at the gymnasiums of Olmutz in 1784, and in the University of Vienna in 1790; but, as on several points of exegesis his views deviated from those maintained by the theologians of the curia, he was removed from his chair in 1805, and made canon of St. Stephen. His Introduction to the Old Testament and Arch. Biblicae were even put on the Index. His grammars and text-

JAINDHUIS. The name of a very numerous and wealthy sect among the Hindus, founded in the fifth or sixth century B.C., by Vardhamana (commonly called Maha-vira), a contemporary of Gautama, the Buddha. Their belief resembles Buddhism in some particulars, as in their reverence for life in all its forms, which leads them to scrupulously avoid destroying even insects. They are, too, accounted heretics by the orthodox Brahman. But in most respects they differ from Buddhists: as (a) in the use of the word "nirvana," by which they mean immortality, and the delivery of the soul from the bondage of transmigration, in consequence of the "practice of the four virtues," —liberality, gentleness, piety, and remorse for failings,—by goodness in thought, word, and deed, and by kindness to the mute creation, and even to the forms of vegetable life; (b) in their theism, indeed almost monotheism; and (c) in the constant "sky-clad," i.e., naked, and thence, as it is supposed, to their own sacred books, called Agamas, which are now written in Sanscrit, though formerly in Prakrit. They worship twenty-four immortal saints, and deny the sacredness of caste. They are divided into two parties,—the Digambaras, the "sky-clad," i.e., naked, and those to whom the "white-robed." Vardhamana and his immediate followers went naked; but the custom is now abandoned, although the idols in the Jain temples are still always naked. Their priests are celibates, and their widows are not allowed to remarry. The Jain temples and shrines are remarkable. The series of temples and shrines on Mount Abu is "one of the seven wonders of India," and presents most striking evidence of the wealth and importance of the sect. Some of their idols are enormous in height.

JAMES, the name of three important characters of the New Testament.

I. JAMES THE SON OF ZEBEDEE.—His mother, Salome, was a follower of Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xvi. 41). He was the brother of John, and older than he, as is very probable from the fact that his name is almost always mentioned before John's (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 17, etc.). It is likely, though not certain, that he became a follower of Christ immediately after the baptism in the Jordan (John i. 32 sqq.). He and his brother were surnamed Boanerges, i.e., "sons of thunder" by Christ (Mark iii. 17). The reason for giving this designation is not recorded. He certainly did not intend an allusion to their eloquence, as the fathers supposed. The more probable view is, that the surname had reference to their passionate and vehement nature, both in thought and emotion, which sometimes showed itself in ambitious aspirations (Mark x. 35 sqq.) for a place of honor in the Messianic kingdom, but also in an ardent attachment to the person of Christ. James belonged, with John and Peter, to the narrower circle of Christ's more intimate disciples, was admitted into the chamber of Jairus' daughter (Mark v. 37), to the vision of the transfiguration (Mark ix. 2), and to the scene of the agony in Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 37). In the history of the early apostolic church nothing further is recorded of him than his death by the sword, under Herod Agrippa I. (Acts xii. 2). He was the first of the apostles to suffer martyrdom; and thus, in a more pronounced measure than in the case of John, the prediction of Christ was fulfilled in his experience, that the brothers should indeed drink of his cup, and be baptized with his baptism (Mark x. 39); and, at least in point of time, he received the second place of honor in the kingdom of heaven. Ecclesiastical tradition says that the accuser of James confessed Christ, and, after receiving the apostle's pardon, himself suffered martyrdom (Clem. Alex., in Euseb., H. E., ii. 9). The Church of Spain boasts that he shared in its foundation, but its fables are in conflict with the statements of the New Testament.

II. JAMES THE SON OF ALPHÉUS, one of the twelve disciples of Jesus. He is so designated in four places.—Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13. No other passage can with certainty be regarded as referring to him or his family, and nothing further is known of his life. The alleged blood relationship of his family with the house of Jesus lacks all evidence. This hypothesis identifies his father Alphæus with Clopas, and makes "Mary the wife of Clopas" (John xxi. 25) a sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, or Clopas a brother of Joseph (Hegesippus). These suggestions are pure assumptions; for it is not at all certain that Μαρία η γυνή Κλωπᾶ means the wife of Clopas. It may mean the mother, or the daughter, of Clopas. Nor has the identification of the name Alphæus with Clopas anything in its favor. A further objection is, that if the name Clopas would not be apt to have the same name, Mary. It is possible that he is the James whose mother is called Mary (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xvi. 1), and who is styled "James the Less," and the brother of Joses (Mark xv. 40). The title "the Less" contained an allusion to his stature, and was not given to distinguish him from James the son of Zebedee (Meyer). But it is possible that another James is here mentioned, as we would rather expect the expression, "James the son of Alphæus." Of his further experiences we know nothing, except that, according to tradition, he labored in Egypt, where he suffered martyrdom by crucifixion, in the city of Ostrakine (Nicolph., ii. 40).

III. JAMES THE JUST, THE BROTHER OF THE LORD, the head of the Church at Jerusalem, is distinguished from the two apostles of the same name in Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 7; Gal. i. 10, ii. 9, 12; Jas. i. 1; Jude 1; and is mentioned by Josephus (Ant., XX. 9, ii. Hegegippus (Eusebius: H. E., ii. 53), and the Church fathers. In the early Church the existence of our James as a distinct person was denied by some; he being identified with one of the two apostles of that name, and more generally with James the son of Alphæus. The fraternal relation reported to have existed between James and Jesus was explained as a relation between cousins. But Tertullian is a witness to the fact that the distinction between James and the apostles was still held in his day. He speaks of the consummation of Mary's marriage with Joseph after the birth of Jesus, and of the brothers of Jesus (De carne Christi 7, adv. Itiarc. 19), to prove the reality of the incorporation over against the objection. At a somewhat later date the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 55, vii. 12, 13) declare for the same view, when they mention as the representatives of Catholic doctrine the twelve apostles, Paul, and James the brother of the Lord, who is also placed among the seventy disciples. That a fraternal relation in some extent is vouched for by another passage (xii. 48): "I James, a brother of the Lord according to the flesh." The testimony of Eusebius is also very important. He clearly distinguishes James, the brother of the Lord, from the twelve apostles, places him among the seventy disciples, and counts fourteen apostles in all, Paul being the thirteenth, and James the fourteenth (Com. Jes. xvii. 5; H. E., i. 12, ii. 1, vii. 19); and the passage (H. E., ii. 1) in which he speaks of him as the "so-called" brother of the Lord does not refer to a more distant relationship, for he prepares the way for this expression by saying that Jesus was "the son of James the son of Alphaeus." It is possible that he is the James whose mother is called Mary (Matt. xvi. 56; Mark xvi. 1), and who is styled "James the Less," and the brother of Joses (Mark xv. 40). The title "the Less" contained an allusion to his stature, and was not given to distinguish him from James the son of Zebedee (Meyer). But it is possible that another James is here mentioned, as we would rather expect the expression, "James the son of Alphæus." Of his further experiences we know nothing, except that, according to tradition, he labored in Egypt, where he suffered martyrdom by crucifixion, in the city of Ostrakine (Nicolph., ii. 40).

From this hypothesis, which was entirely wanting in historical confirmation, it was natural to proceed farther, and resolve the fraternal relation into that of cousin. He speaks of the theory that James was a son of Joseph by a former marriage as an ungrounded fancy taken from the Apocrypha, and tries to prove that our James was the same as James the son of Alphæus by identifying Mary of John xix. 25 ("Mary the wife of Clopas"), the sister of Jesus' mother, with the wife of Alphæus. He seems afterwards to have renounced this theory; for in his Commentary on Isaiah (xvii. 6) he mentions fourteen apostles, the twelve, James the brother of the Lord, and Paul. Augustine spoke of James as the son of Joseph by a former marriage, or as a relation of Mary. To the latter view he gave the preference.

These various views have all had their advocates among modern divines. The theory that James the Just was a son of Mary and Joseph, and is to be distinguished from the apostles, has been held by Herder, Stier, Credner, de Wette, Wieseler, Neander, Schaff, Lechler, Rues, Huther, B. Weiss, Bleek, and some others (e.g., Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Alexandria, Ecumenius, Hilary, and others).

The statements of the New Testament emphatically favor the first view. The expressions in Matt. 25 and Luke ii. 7 most naturally imply that the marriage between Joseph and Mary was consummated after Christ's birth; and the expression "first-born" is the same as in the other cases in the New Testament (Rom. viii. 29; Col. i. 15, 18; Heb. xi. 28; Rev. i. 5), indicates that other children were born to Mary. The subsequent close relation in which the so-called brothers of our Lord stand to Mary (Matt. xii. 47...
James.

JAMES. The Epistle of, was written by James, a servant of Jesus Christ, and addressed to the Jews of the Dispersion (Jas. i. 1). The readers are the Jewish people as a whole, not in the foreign country of this world (Holmann), but outside of Palestine, only in so far, however, as they recognize the authority of a servant of Jesus (comp. i. 18; ii. 1; v. 7). They are not all classes of Jews, Christian and non-Christian (Grotius, Credner, etc.), nor Christians without reference to birth and nationality (De Wette, Schwelger, Hilgenfeld), nor Jews both in and out of Palestine (Thiersch, Hofmann), but Jewish Christians of the Diaspora. They belonged not to a single district, but to foreign lands generally. There are no references to any personal relations between the writer and his readers; no greetings or requests, as in the Epistle to the Galatians, for example, which was addressed to a particular Assembly. The Epistle of James is a circular-letter designed for a general class of readers. That which he finds as a universal characteristic of the condition of the Jewish Christians at that time, was the secularization of Christian truth, and its reduction to a system of external observances. Influenced by exposure to trial (i. 2), and the delay of the Second Coming (v. 7, 8), men had begun to lose patience, and to divide their hearts between God and the world (i. 8). The "friendship of the world" (iv. 4) displays itself in the disregard of the poor, and the preference given to the rich (ii. 1 sqq.), in petitions to God for means to gratify lusts (iv. 3), or in the temporary forgetfulness of God (iv. 13 sqq.). They were also attempting to substitute external professions and ceremonies for piety of heart, and appealed to their creed (ii. 14) rather than to their deeds.

The object of the Epistle is to check these tendencies by warnings and exhortations; and for this reason the contents are, for the most part, of a parenetic and practical character. The exhortation (1) to steadfastness under temptation (i. 2—12) is followed by (2) the teaching that temptation originates with the heart, and not with God (i. 13—18), and the exhortation (3) to be obedient to the word of the divine truth (i. 19—27). Hereupon follow special exhortations against partisan preference for the rich (ii. 1—13), dead faith (ii. 14—26), pride of wisdom (iii. 1—18), and the pursuit of worldly gain and security, etc. (iv. 1—v. 11). The Epistle is brought to a close by some briefer exhortations (v. 12—19).

The ethical nature of the Epistle is due not merely to the tendency towards laxness and worldliness which called it forth, but to the general conception of the gospel in the mind of the writer. It is characteristic that he calls the gospel the "law of liberty" (i. 25). He, however, recognizes the distinction between it and the law of the Old Testament, that it is not a servile yoke on the neck of man, but implanted inwardly, so much stress on the discourses of Christ which developed the idea of the righteousness of the kingdom of heaven as he (comp. i. 2, 4, 5, 9, 20; ii. 13, 14; iii. 17, 18; iv. 4; v. 10, 12, etc.). For this reason he stands farthest away, of all the apostolic laborers, from Paul. Some have asserted that these two writers expressly contradict... one another (Baur, Schwengler, Holtzmann, etc.); others, that there is a contrast between them which cannot be reconciled (Luther, Kern); while there are others still who hold that there is no direct antithesis between the two men, for James was writing for those who held the works of faith to be unnecessary. Paul, on the other hand, wrote to show the incompetency of the works of the natural man to justify. James agrees with Paul in his main point, that faith without corresponding works is insufficient (comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 2; 2 Cor. v. 10).

There are indications that the Epistle was written at a comparatively late date in the apostolic period. Schneckenburger, Thiersch, Hofmann, Schaff, B. Weiss, Bleek, Beyschlag, [Alford, Plumptre, Lumby], and others hold to an earlier origin; and some regard it as the first of the New Testament writings. Their reasons do not seem to us sufficient. The Hebraistic style, as has been shown, is not a Jewish synagogue, but a place of Christian worship, controlled by Christians (ii. 3). The expectation of the second coming is also appealed to (v. 8 sqq.); but this expectation prevailed during the whole of the apostolic period. As the First Epistle of Peter seems to have made use of James, and itself was written in the year 65 or 66, we conclude that James was written a few years before.

The author designates himself as "James a servant of Jesus Christ." This was the brother of the Lord, who stood at the head of the Church at Jerusalem, and took such a prominent part in the council of Jerusalem (Acts xv.). Notices confirming the genuineness of the Epistle are not found till the close of the second century, and Origen is the first to quote it by name; but he did not regard the work as authentic. Eusebius also placed it amongst the antilegomena. In the Syrian Church, however, the Peshito version received it, and Epheasm quoted it. In the Latin Church, Jerome accepted it as canonical, and so likewise, Augustine. This difference of opinion is to be regarded as due to the fact that James the brother of the Lord was not an apostle. (See preceding article.) But the whole tone, as well as the special injunctions, of the book, are in exact accord with the character of James as it is brought out in the New Testament and by Hegesippus. He looked at the gospel in its legal aspect, and insisted upon righteousness of life. Both these features are prominent in the Epistle.

The comparatively good Greek style of the composition is no argument against its genuineness; for Galilee in the first century was completely hellenized.

Lit. — The principal Commentaries on the Epistle of James are by Calvin, Beza [Rich-ard Turnbull (London, 1869)], Herder [Briefe zweener Bruder Jesu in unserm Kanon, 1775], Semler (1781), Rosenmüller (1787), Hottinger (1813), Schneckenburger (1832), Theile (Leipzig, 1838), Kern (Tubingen, 1880), Celler-ter (Geneva, 1854), De Waard-Wirimingen (Konigsberg, 1854), [Alford (London, 3d ed., 1865)], Lange and van Roostervoodt (Bielefeld, 1866) [English translation by Mombert, New York, 1867], Huther, in Meyer's Commentary (Gottingen, 3d ed., 1870), Delam (Dort, 1869), Ewald (Gottingen, 1870), [J.C. von Hofmann (Dordrecht, 1876), Bassett (London, 1876), Parchand, in Elliott's Commentary (London, 1878), D. Erdmann (Berlin, 1881), Dean Scott in the Bible (Speaker's) Commentary (London and New York, 1882), Beyschlag, in the last edition of Meyer (Gottingen, 1882), Glaag, in Schaff's Commentary (New York and Edinburgh, 1883). See also Histories of the Apostolic Church, of Neander and Schaff, and art. of Lumby, in the Encyclopedia Britannica]. SIEFFERT.

JAMES, John Angell, an English Congregational pastor; b. at Blandford, June 6, 1785; d. at Birmingham, Oct. 1, 1859; educated in the theological academy conducted by Rev. David Bogue, D.D., at Gosporn; ordained pastor of Carr's Lane Chapel at Birmingham, May 8, 1806, when barely twenty-one, and continued in that office till his death, over fifty years, Rev. R. W. Dale becoming his co-pastor in later years. He has been translated into several languages. But a collected edition of his works numbers fifteen volumes. They consist of sermons and addresses on practical subjects,—the ministry, the family, revivals, Christian graces, duties of young men, young women, and church-members. Mr. James cultivated a warm friendship with American ministers,—Dr. W. B. Sprague, Dr. S. H. Cox, Dr. C. G. Finney, and others,—and was a chief promoter of the formation of the Evangelical Alliance in 1844. See Dale: Life and Letters of John Angell James, London, 1802. F. H. MARLING.

JAMESON (Anna Murphy), Mrs., b. in Dublin, May 19, 1797; married Robert Jameson, 1823, but soon after ceased to live with him; d. at Ealing, London, March 17, 1860. She is mentioned here because of her familiar Sacred and Legendary Art (London, 1848, 2 vols.), Legends of the Monastic Orders (1850), Legends of the Madonna (1852), History of our Lord and of his Precursor as represented in Art (vol. i. 1860, vol. ii. finished by Lady Eastlake, 1884). These works have all been republished in America.

JANES, Edmund Storer, D.D., LL.D., b. at Sheffield, Mass., April 27, 1807; d. in New-York City, Sept. 18, 1876. From 1824 to 1830 he taught school in New-York State and New Jersey, when he entered the Methodist ministry; in May, 1840, he was elected financial secretary of the American Bible Society, and in 1844 resigned to accept the episcopate, having already impressed the whole church with his piety, eloquence, and wisdom. Henceforth for thirty-two years he was to be a wanderer over the earth, travelling longer distances, enduring longer absences from home, and performing more official work, than any of his colleagues. There was hardly a single successful measure of his denomination which did not bear the trace of his wisdom in council, and the vigor of his hand in execution. He greatly excelled as a preacher. See his Life by Henry B. Ridgeway, D.D., New York, 1862.
JANENWAT.

JANENWAT, Matthias von, D.D., a Presbyterian divine; was b. in New-York City, 1776; d. at New Brunswick, N.J., June 27, 1858. He graduated at Columbia College, 1794; became co-pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, in 1799; was chosen professor of theology in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny in 1828; and spent the last years of his life at New Brunswick, where he acted as pastor of a Dutch Reformed Church from 1830 to 1832, and as vice-president of Rutgers College from 1833 to 1839.

He was one of the founders of Princeton Seminary, and took an active part in the theological controversies of the day. He wrote Commentaries on Romans and Hebrews (Philadelphia, Internal Evidence of the Bible (1815). Review of Schaff on Protestantism, etc. See his Life, 1861.

JANESIUS AND JAMBRES, spoken of in 2 Tim. iii. 8 as opposing Moses, are often referred to in Jewish tradition under different spellings. The names are evidently phonetically paired. They are Hebrew, not Egyptian, names. (Hebrew, also written עָבְרִי, and עַבְרִי, also called עָבְרִי, comes from the root עָבְרִי ("to seduce") 'יעָבְרִי, with the Greek ending ἀβραίος, and with β inserted (written in the Targum עָבְרִי, but in the Talmud עבְרְי, עָבְרִי, עבְרְי or עבְרְי, comes from the root עָבְרִי ("to be obstinate") in Hiphil, "to rebel"). So the names mean "the seducer" and "the inciter" respectively.

Jewish tradition has much to say about them. They two evidently stand opposite the two leaders, Moses and Aaron, whose miracles they imitated in the presence of Pharaoh. They were sons of Balaam, killed the Israelish children on Pharaoh's order, opposed that people, carried on debates with Moses (whose teachers they had previously been), prepared a model of the golden calf, and finally accompanied Balaam. There is nothing to mention of them: their names must have been often heard in Gamaliel's school, and they were current among the heathen. Pliny apparently borrowed (Hist. nat. xxx. 2) from an apocryphal writing upon them mentioned by Origen (Tract. xxx. in Math.) and Ambrose (on 2 Tim.). The Pythagorean Numenius in the second century knew of them (Origen: c. Celsum., iv. 51, and Eusebius: Prep. evang., ix. 8), as did Apuleius (Apol. Il.) and the author of the Gospel of Nicodemus (c. 5). The comparison between them and the teachers described in the context (2 Tim. iii. 8 sq.) rests upon the similarity of their wilful resistance to the heralds of the divine truth and their lack of genuine faith-power. For the original passages concerning them, see Fabricius: Codex Pseudepigraphus, ed. 2, I, 813-825.

JANESIUS, Cornelius, b. in the village of Acquoy, North Holland, Oct. 28, 1688; d. in Ypres, May 6, 1658. After completing his preliminary studies at Leerdam and Utrecht, he went to Louvain in 1602, and studied for a short time at the Jesuit college; but, becoming dissatisfied with the doctrines taught there, he removed to the College of Adrian VI., and came under the influence of Jacobus Jansenius, a follower of Michael Baius, and a disciple of Augustine.

Here he made the acquaintance of M. du Vergier de Hauranne, afterwards Abbé de St. Cyran. Having graduated in philosophy at Louvain in 1604, he went to Paris, and subsequently accompanied Du Vergier to Bayonne, where they remained together for six years, devoting themselves to the study of Augustine's writings. Returning to Louvain in 1617, he declined the offer of a chair of philosophy, and was made director of the newly founded College of St. Pothier, which was completed, and its regulations instituted by him. He did not long retain this position, desiring to devote himself to theology. In 1619 he became doctor in that faculty. By incessant study of Augustine he became convinced that Catholic theologians had departed from the doctrine of the ancient Church. On a visit of St. Cyran to Louvain, in 1621, they divided their work for the reformation of the Church, Jansen taking the department of teaching, and St. Cyran that of organization. Intimate relations were formed with distinguished priests in Ireland. In 1623, and again in 1627, Jansen, deputed by the university, travelled to Spain in order to oppose the Jesuits, who had attempted to establish professorships of their own at Louvain. He was successful, the Jesuits in the Low Countries being ordered to continue to observe the restrictions which had been laid upon them in 1612. Notwithstanding their hostility, he was appointed in 1630 to the Regius Professorship of biblical exegesis at Louvain.

In the same year he engaged in a controversy about Protestantism with Voetius, in which he was worsted. He secured the favor of the Spanish court by his opposition to France and its recent alliance with the Protestant Gustavus Adolphus. He also attacked the pretensions of France, in his pseudonymous work entitled Alexandri Patricii Armaceni, Theologiarum pars Gesta seu de Justitia Armorum et Federum Regis Galliae Libri Duo. For this service to Spain he was rewarded with the bishopric of Ypres in 1636. Here he died of the plague two years after, just as he had completed his great work, the Augustinus, embodying the results of twenty-two years'
Jansenism.

The writings of Augustine. These writings he declared that he had read through ten times, pen in hand, and the portions relating to human nature in its primitive and fallen states. The third part, in ten books, expounds Augustine's ideas concerning grace, and also the predestination of men and angels. The fundamental proposition of the work is, that, since Adam's fall, free agency no longer exists in man, pure works are a mere gratuitous gift of God, and the predestination of the elect is an effect of his presence of our works, but of his free volition. The Augustinus struck at the Jesuits, who wished to conciliate the doctrine of salvation by grace with a certain amount of free agency; and its sting lay mainly in the epilogue, which draws a parallel between the errors of the Massilians and those recentiorum quorundam, the Jesuits being referred to.

Other works of Jansen. — Oratio de Interiori Hominis Reformatione (1627); Alexipharmacum pro Civibus Silvae Ducensibus, adversus Ministram Suorum Fascinum, sive Responsio Brevis ad Libellum Eorum Provocatorium (Louvain, 1630); Spongia Notarum, qui ibit Alexipharmacos asperrimi Gisbertus Voetius (Louvain, 1631); Tetrateuchus, sive Commentarius in Quatuor Evangelia (Louvain, 1630); Pentateuchus, sive Commentarius in Quinque Libros Mosis (Louvain, 1641); Analecta in Proverbio, Ecclesiastico, Sophista, Habacum et Sophonias (Louvain, 1644).

Jansenism. — See Jansen.

The printing of the Augustinus was completed in 1640, notwithstanding the efforts of the Jesuits to suppress it. In 1641 the reading of it was prohibited by the Inquisition, and in 1643 by the bull In Eminenti of Urban VIII. Though opposed in France and Belgium, the bull was finally accepted in 1661, subscription not being insisted on. Jansen's friends urged that the bull specified no particular doctrines as heretical; accordingly eight heretical propositions, afterwards reduced to five, were submitted to the Pope as contained in the Augustinus. (1) There are some commandments of God, which, unless, although willing and anxious to obey them, are unable with the strength they have to fulfil, and the grace by which they might fulfil them is also wanting to them. (2) In the state of fallen nature, inward grace is never resisted. (3) In the fallen state, merit and demerit do not depend on a liberty which excludes constraint. (4) The Semi-Pelagians admitted the necessity of an inward prevenient grace for the performance of each particular act, and also for the first act of faith, and yet were heretical, since they maintained that this grace was of such a nature that the will of man was able either to resist or obey it. (5) It is Semi-Pelagian to say that Christ died, or shed his blood, for all men without exception.

In 1653 Innocent X., in the bull Cum Occasione Impressions Libri, pronounced the five propositions as heretical. The Jansenists declared their readiness to condemn the propositions in the heretical sense, but not as the sense of Jansen. Therefore, in 1654, the Pope declared the condemned propositions to be in the Augustinus, and that their condemnation as the teaching of Jansen must be subscribed to. The Port Royalists refused (see Port Royal), maintaining that the Pope's infallibility extended only to the doctrine of the faith, and not to a question of fact. He was expelled from the Sorbonne, and eighty others withdrew with him. The same year a general assembly of the clergy adopted a formula condemning the five propositions as contained in the Augustinus, and declaring that Jansen had perverted Augustine's meaning. A bull of Alexander VII., Oct. 16, indorsed the decision of the assembly. This document was sanctioned by the king in 1661; and the clergy, and all inmates of conventual establishments, were required to sign it on penalty of being treated as heretics. The leading Jansenists went into hiding, and the Port Royal nuns were imprisoned and cruelly treated. (See Port Royal.) Four bishops refused to subscribe to more than the promise of a "respectful silence" concerning the question of fact. At the solicitation of the king, the Pope named two archbishops and seven bishops as a tribunal to try the four, and with authority to suspend or excommunicate. Before they met, Alexander VII. died, and was succeeded by Clement IX. Nineteen bishops who had subscribed the condemnation now addressed the Pope on behalf of the four, asserting their orthodoxy. This they followed by a letter to the king, declaring that the sentence of the four would be an invasion of the liberties of the Church, and would make the bishops no more than vicars of the Pope. In September, 1665, instructions came from Rome to make up with the four on any terms which would save the credit of the holy see. The result was the compromise known as "The Peace of Clement IX.," by which assent was not required to the declaration that Jansen had taught the five propositions in a purely heretical sense. This was a virtual defeat of the holy see. The conditions of the peace were kept secret.

The quiet was of short duration. Louis XIV. was won over by the Jesuits. The old question of subscription was revived by M. Eustace, confessor of Port Royal, who threw into the form of a Case of Conscience the question whether one who condemned the inculcated doctrine of Jansen, yet maintained a respectful silence as to the question of fact, could sign the formulæ with a good conscience. A violent controversy ensued, resulting in the bull of Clement XI. (1705), Vineam Domini, confirming and renewing all preceding condemnations of the five propositions. The refusal of the Port Royal nuns to subscribe this bull was punished by the suppression of the convent in 1709, and the complete destruction of the buildings in 1710. The demand for a new edition of Quellet’s Reflections Morales sur le Nouveau Testament stimulated the Jesuits to secure its condemnation by the papal see. They obtained an edict of Clement XI. in 1712, condemning it as a text-book of undisguised Jansenism. This was followed, in 1713, by the bull Unigenitus, in which a hundred and one propositions from Quellet’s New Testament were condemned as Jansenistic. Upon this bull the French Church divided into two parties. The king finally decided that the bull should be binding on Church and State. On the death of Louis XIV. the Jansenists appealed to a general council, claiming that the bull Unigenitus was an attack upon the Catholic faith and morals. They were called, therefore, Appellants; their opponents, Acceptants. The Appellants were at last forced to submit. The bull was formally registered in 1729 as the law of the kingdom, with a reservation in favor of the liberties of the Gallic Church. From this time forward the Jansenists were rigorously repressed, and during the eighteenth century Jansenism degenerated in France. A temporary revival was stimulated by the reported miracles wrought in the cemetery of St. Medard, in Paris, at the grave of François de Paris, a Jansenist deacon of St. Medard, and afterwards a reclus, who died in 1727. The spot became a shrine of pilgrimage, and a scene of fanatical excesses, which weakened the cause of Jansenism in intelligent minds. The grave of François became the grave of Jansenism. After the middle of the eighteenth century the Jansenists of France ceased to attract public attention. Driven from France, they took refuge in Holland, in Utrecht, and Haarlem, which remained faithful to Rome when the rest of the United Provinces embraced Calvinism on their liberation from the Spanish yoke. In 1702 Peter Codde, vicar of the chapter of Utrecht, was suspended by Clement XI. for holding Jansenistic principles, and was detained at Rome for three years, while Theodore de Cock, a Jesuit, was appointed in his stead. The chapter of Utrecht refused to acknowledge him, and joined themselves with the Appellants. The government of Holland, in 1708, suspended the papal bull, and deposed De Cock. Codde and his friends in 1723 elected an archbishop, Cornelius Steenhoven, for whom episcopal consecration was obtained from Vorlet, a Jansenistic bishop. In 1742 Meindarts, Jansenist bishop of Utrecht, was elected archbishop of that city, and two phials containing his blood are preserved in a chapel of the cathedral of Naples, and exhibited twice a year,—May 1 and Sept. 19. When the phials are brought within sight of the head, the blood becomes liquid, and begins to bubble up; and this miracle, when happening promptly and in a vigorous manner, is considered a good omen for the city and people of Naples. There are no less than thirteen other saints and martyrs of the name Januarius, which at one time was very common in Africa and Southern Italy. See Act. Sanct. Sept. 19.

JAPAN, Christianity in. No seeds of the religion of Jesus are known to have been planted in Nihon until the arrival at Kagoshima, in Satsuma, of Francis Xavier, in 1549. The “black ships” of Europe, visited Japan as early as 1542, when a lucrative commerce at once sprung up with Portugal. Anjiro, a Japanese refugee, assisted by Mendez Pinto, in 1548 reached Goa, north of Calcutta, where he embraced Christianity, was baptized, and educated in the Jesuit College. In July, 1549, Xavier, with Cosmo Torrez his principal assistant, Joan Fernandez a layman, and “Brother Paul of the Holy Faith” (Anjiro), sailed from Goa, reaching Xino (Shima, “the island,” or Kiushiu), and landing at Kagoshima Aug. 12. The first converts were the wife and relatives of Anjirō; and, after a year's stay, one hundred believers were numbered. Obliged to leave on account of the irritation of the daimyō (feudal lord) of Satsuma at the conduct of the Portuguese merchants, the missionaries went to Hirado Island, making a hundred converts in a fortnight, and thence crossing over to Yamaguchi, in Nagato province. Meeting with the same reception there, they set out for Kiōto, the miyako, or capital. Owing to the chronic civil war, amounting almost to anarchy, which afflicted Japan during the middle of the sixteenth century, nothing could be done in Kiōto. So, returning to Yamaguchi, Xavier presented his gifts and credentials, and, in place of a return in kind, received permission to preach in public, and, later, the gift of ground for a church and college. Within two months, five hundred converts were gathered, when Xavier (with his characteristic restless spirit) went to Bungo province, and shortly after left Japan, dying on an island on the coast of China. In 1563 new missionaries arrived, and Bungo became the centre of Christianity in Japan. In 1566 there were two thousand converts at Yamaguchi, when, a feudal revolution having broken out, the church was burned, Torrez fled, and the church was for eighteen years without a pastor. In 1568 Villélia visited Kiōto and Sakai, securing two converts among the feudal nobility,—the holder of the fief of Omura, and one Arima no Kami. The violent excesses and ostentatious destruction of temples and idols practised by the former amused the adherents of the Buddhists, who henceforth became the relentless foes of the new faith. Portugal sent new reinforcements of Jesuit priests in 1560; but the civil war, and the methods of propagation employed. Portugal sent new reinforcements of Jesuit priests in 1560; but the civil war, and the bitter enmity of Mori (then lord of ten provinces), drove them from Kiōto and Omura, and finally to Nagasaki. At this stage there were already many thousands of Christians.

We may here glance at the condition of Japan and the methods of propagation employed. Politically it was that period known in Japanese history as the epoch of civil war, when learning and the arts of peace were at a low ebb, and fighting was the chief pastime. The power of the mikado, or emperor, was a mere shadow. The family of the Ashikaga shōguns, or military regents (1335–1578), had so decayed that their promise made to the Japanese ruler, not to interfere with the protection of the Christian princes, pursued their work in private. Organtin and Rodriguez returned to Kiōto; and in 1591 Martizen, the first bishop of Japan, arrived. Three thousand Japanese were baptized between 1587 and 1590, and the literary activity in the interest of the propaganda went on. Hitherto the only foreigners in Japan were Portuguese, and the only phase of Christianity Jesusitism. In 1580, in an embassy sent from the governor of the Philippine Islands, were four Franciscan friars, who trespassed on the Jesuits' ground, on the plea that they came as attachés to the embassy. By the bull of Pope Gregory XIII., dated Jan. 28, 1585 (confirmed by Clement III. in 1600), Japan had been assigned exclusively to the Jesuits. The Franciscans, violating their promise made to the Japanese ruler, not to preach, began to do that very thing, thereby rousing the wrath of a man who was never trifled with.

Religiously, Japan was ripe for a new faith. Shintō, the indigenous cult, had been so overlaid by Buddhism, that it had fallen away into a mere matter of archaeology for the scholar, and mythology for the people.

On the other hand, the peasantry, reduced to poverty and misery by centuries of war, found little comfort in the faith of India. The simple tenets of Shaka Shinto had swelled to a sensuous system of worship and of commercial prayers and masses. Except the gorgeous magnificence of altars and temples, and the plethora of monasteries and hostes, there was little to show of vitality in Buddhism. Further, the monks were really a clerical militia, capable of equipping and leading to battle whole armies of adherents, both In tonsure and topknot, and were thus an organized and dangerous political power.

At such a time, and among such an imaginative people as the Japanese, the portents of Jesus landed. With crucifix and painting, medal and cross, vestment, incense, lights, altars, and abundant gold, they outdazzled the scenic displays of the Buddhists. With eloquence, fervor, and devotion, with their new doctrines and morality, they won thousands of enthusiastic converts.

In Nobunaga, the bolder and crushing persecutor of the Buddhists, who had also deposed Ashikaga, and wished to unify all Japan for the mikado, missionaries found a friend who needed a counterpoise to the bonzes. Organtin, under his protection, labored in Kiōto from 1568 to 1576. In 1582 the three Christian nobles sent a mission to the Holy See. In company with Valignani, they reached Rome, making a lengthened stay in Europe; but in the year of their return, in 1585, Nobunaga their friend was assassinated. Hidéyoshi (Faxiba), his successor, though from the first opposed to Christianity, masked his policy, since his prime necessity was to win the friendship of the southern daimyōs, among whom were the Christian nobles and gentry, in order to bring them to his side and under his control. Colleges were planted at Osaka and Sakai; churches were built in many provinces; and the illustrious converts, Kuroda ("Kondera") and Konishi ("Don Austin") professed their faith.

In 1587 Hidéyoshi, unmasking his purpose, ordered all the foreign priests to proceed to Hirado, and leave the country. The measure not being urged, they left Hirado, and, under the protection of the Christian princes, pursued their work in private. Organtin and Rodriguez returned to Kiōto; and in 1591 Martizen, the first bishop of Japan, arrived. Three thousand Japanese were baptized between 1587 and 1590, and the literary activity in the interest of the propagandists went on. Hitherto the only foreigners in Japan were Portuguese, and the only phase of Christianity Jesusitism. In 1580, in an embassy sent from the governor of the Philippine Islands, were four Franciscan friars, who trespassed on the Jesuits' ground, on the plea that they came as attachés to the embassy. By the bull of Pope Gregory XIII., dated Jan. 28, 1585 (confirmed by Clement III. in 1600), Japan had been assigned exclusively to the Jesuits. The Franciscans, violating their promise made to the Japanese ruler, not to preach, began to do that very thing, thereby rousing the wrath of a man who was never trifled with.

Hidéyoshi having reduced all Japan to unity, and been made kampaku, or regent, had now to face the double problem of finding employment for a host of warriors bred to arms from infancy, and of ridding Japan of a foreign priesthood whom he suspected of political designs. On a frivolous pretext he declared war against Rome, and in 1592 sent an army of a hundred and fifty thousand men, composed largely of converts, led Baptiste Sidotti, an Italian priest, reached Japan except some gray-headed prisoners. In 1709 Jean by way of Manila, but was at once seized, and caused many of the Japanese poor people to sell themselves to the Portuguese slave-traders, who also bought Corean captives, and sold them in China and the Philippines. Even the Malay and negro servants speculated in human flesh. Hideyoshi died Sept. 19, 1598; the Christian leaders came back from Corea; and in 1600 one hundred Jesuit priests arrived to stimulate the propagation of the faith. The hopes of the Christians now gathered around Hideyori, the son of Hideyoshi; but in the battle of Sekigahara (October, 1600), the southern army, in which the Christian generals fought against Iyeyasu, was defeated. Iyeyasu became master of the country, and from 1602 until 1616 Japan was declared a place of refuge for the foreign priests. In 1602 large numbers of new missionaries of various orders arrived; and although Organtin, Kuroda, and Konishi were dead, the Christians were said to number a million eight hundred thousand. In 1608 Japan was declared a missionary field, open to all missionaries of the Roman-Catholic Church by the bull of Pope Paul V.; while in 1611 Dutch, Spanish, and Portuguese embassies came to Japan, and in 1613 the English established a factory at Hirado. To the intrigues of the English and Dutch traders, the Jesuit writers attribute the open hostility manifested by Iyeyasu. In 1614 Christianity was declared a religion dangerous to the State; and this the decrees were rigidly enforced. The churches were destroyed; and a hundred and thirty-nine Franciscans, Dominicans, and Jesuits, with several hundred Japanese priests and helpers, were arrested, put on board three large junks at Nagasaki, and sent out of the country. When many of these secretly returned, they were ferreted out, and put to death. The Christians, mostly of the peasantry, were thus wholly deprived of teachers and leaders. In 1617 all foreign commerce was confined to Nagasaki; in 1621 Japanese were forbidden to leave the country; and in 1624 the empire was closed to all aliens, except Dutch and Chinese. Fire and sword were used to annihilate Christianity, and to paganize the people. Trampling on the crucifix became the sign and proof of apostasy. Thousands of native Christians fled to China, Formosa, and the Philippines; and in 1637 thousands more rose in armed rebellion, and seizing an old castle at Shimabara in Kiushu, resisted for two months the assaults of the government troops. Once captured, the thirty-seven thousand Christians were given over to massacre, and drowning in the sea. After this persecution, inquisition, and torture went on so successfully, that, when the eighteenth century opened, there were no known believers in “the Jesus doctrine” in Japan, except some gray-headed prisoners. In 1700 Jean Baptiste Sidotti, an Italian priest, reached Japan by way of Manila, but was at once seized, brought before the Inquisition at Yedo, and imprisoned until his death. In 1829 several Christians were seized at Osaka, and were put on trial on the suspicion of communicating with foreigners. In spite of two centuries and a half of vigilant repression and supposed extermination, the roots of the faith still kept their vitality.

When, after long isolation from the rest of the world, Japan was opened to foreign trade and residence, in 1859, the three great branches of the Christian Church at once sent their missionaries into the field at Nagasaki, Kanagawa, or Hakodate. The Roman Catholics had the advantage of historic continuity in their labors; for, almost as soon as they landed, they found in the villages near Nagasaki thousands of believers, descendants of the martyrs of the seventeenth century, still secretly practising their faith. At intervals, however, until 1872, when the government ceased persecution, many of these Christians were seized, imprisoned, and exiled among the northern provinces. Statistics of Roman Catholicism in Japan are not easily accessible.

“The Holy Orthodox Catholic and Apostolic Church of Russia has a mission whose imposing buildings are in Tokio; and its founder, the archimandrite Nicolai, with his assistants, has trained up a large native ministry, whose following numbers several thousands. Protestant missionary operations were also begun in 1859 by the London Missionary Society and four American churches—Reformed (Dutch), Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Baptist—at Nagasaki and Kanagawa. Owing to the jealous hostility of the government, no disciples, except those who came by night, were made for ten years. Profession of the outlawed religion was at risk of life or limb. Meanwhile the mystery of the language, and the work of healing, teaching, and translation, went on. The first Protestant Christian Church was organized at Yokohama, on the Perry treaty-ground, in 1872, by the Rev. James Ballagh of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America; and the fourth, in Tokio, the capital, in 1873, in which year the anti-Christian edicts were removed. The Reformed churches holding the presbyterian order formed themselves into an alliance for mutual help: other native bodies of believers were organized on an independent basis.

In Great Britain and the United States increasing interest was manifested in this most promising missionary field; and all the important evangelical bodies soon had representatives at one of the open ports, which, since 1868, have been Nagasaki, Yokohama, Hiogo, Hakodate, Niigata, besides Tokio. Since 1874, Christians have organized churches, and worshipped unmolested in many places in the interior; and now every large island has flourishing churches of the Protestant, Roman, and Greek communions. The methods of propagation used by the brethren of the Mission Apostolique of Paris are in the main those of Papal Christianity everywhere, and not differing greatly from those of the sixteenth century in Japan. They claim a following of many thousands. The mission of the Holy Synod of Russia makes liberal use of Protestant versions of the Holy Bible, but is otherwise rigidly faithful to traditional mediaevalism. All Christian bodies make use of the press, secular and reli-AJAN.

The literary opposition is in general not very severe, nor of a character to inspire respect for the Japanese intellect. The vigorous native newspapers may be said to be as friendly as hostile. Buddhist priests and rabid patriots are the chief opponents; and the products of the infidel writers and lecturers of Christendom are diligently translated into Japanese.

The statistics of the work of Protestant evangelicals for the year 1881 are as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>DENOMINATIONS</th>
<th>Date of origin</th>
<th>Members</th>
<th>Students</th>
<th>Baptised or confirmed</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>American Presbyterian Church</td>
<td>1819</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>221</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Reformed Church in America</td>
<td>1820</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>34</td>
<td>403</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>American Protestant Episcopal Church</td>
<td>1820</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>American Baptist Church</td>
<td>1820</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>American Board C. F. M. (Congregationalists)</td>
<td>1820</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>106</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(Japan) Church Missionary Society</td>
<td>1820</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>201</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>American Methodist Episcopal Church</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>40</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>517</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Canada Methodist Church</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>299</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(English) Society for the Propagation of the Gospel</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>208</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>English Mission</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>90</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>United Presbyterian Church of Scotland</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>120</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cumberland Presbyterian Church</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>English Baptist Church</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Reformed Church of the United States</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Independent Native Churches</td>
<td>1870</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roman Catholic</td>
<td>1856</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ruus-Greek</td>
<td>1820</td>
<td>10?</td>
<td></td>
<td>10,000?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total of all Protestant societies and churches</td>
<td></td>
<td>3,811</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The Bible societies—American, National (Scotland), and British and Foreign—have agents, who in 1881 disposed (by sale only) of eighteen million printed pages of the Bible (in whole, or in parts), at sixteen thousand dollars; one society reporting an increase of business, in one year, of a hundred per cent. Two tract societies—the American and London Religious—disposed of a hundred and twenty thousand books and tracts, or two and a half million pages. The Japanese Christian associations and native religious press help in diffusing Christian leaven. A high moral standard of character is insisted upon by all the Protestant churches; and in no other respect, except in the constant use of the Holy Scriptures in the vernacular, does the Reformed Christianity of to-day differ more from that known during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in Japan. The influences of the religion of Jesus are penetrating deeply into the social life of the people, and rooting themselves in heart and intellect alike. Undoubtedly the way has been prepared and made smooth for the rapid success of missionary operations by the wondrous assimilation of modern civilization by the Japanese. By a series of political movements, which began during the century preceding the arrival of Commodore Perry and which culminated in the revolution of 1868 (which destroyed the duarchy of which Yedo with the “tycoon,” and Kioto with the miyako were foci), the nation was prepared to adopt the civilization to which Chrismendom has given birth, and which she has nourished. The government of the miyako, when restored to supreme authority in Tokio, in 1868, at first persecuted, but later, under pressure of diplomacy at home, and of shame in Europe, abandoned coercion in religious matters, suffered Shinto to fall into abeyance, and, nominally at least, granted toleration. Now, in friendly rivalry, the national common school and the missionary educational systems flourish together, male and female in both having equal privileges. There also prevails increasingly among the people of Japan the belief that righteousness exalts a nation, and that pure religion and morals, such as Christianity offers and demands, furnish the surest ground of progress and national longevity. Licentiousness, intemperance, and lying are the moral cancers of the national character; but the ideals of Jesus, once grasped upon the affectionate, filial, loyal, courteous spirit of the Japanese, will heal the scars of sin, and produce one of the noblest types of redeemed humanity.

Not the least tokens of the zeal and consecration which characterize Protestant missionaries in Japan are the fruits of their laborious scholarship. The various translations, grammar, and phrase-book of the Rev. S. R. Brown, D.D., the superb dictionaries of J. C. Hepburn, M.D., the linguistic helps, scholarly and religious works, of Imbrue, Amerman, Stout, Knox, Eby, N. Brown, and others, have not only shed lustre upon American scholarship, but have greatly enriched native and foreign Christian literature, especially the former. The medical, literary, and pedagogic works of others have borne fruit in a mighty harvest of good to the nation at large. Like some of the enormous blocks of stones that form the foundation-wall of their fortresses, defying war, time, and earthquake-shock, are the works of Christian missionaries in the edifice of Japan's new civilization.

JACQUELOT, Isaac, b. at Vassy, Dec. 16, 1647; d. in Berlin, Oct. 20, 1708; was a pastor in his native town, when the revocation of the Edict of Nantes compelled him to leave France; and settled, first at The Hague (1686), afterwards in Berlin (1702), as pastor of French congregations of exiles. Besides two volumes of sermons, and several philosophical treatises, he published Aois sur le tableau du socinisme de M. Jurieu (1692), against the dogmatism of Jurieu, and Conformité de la foi et de la raison (1702), against the scepticism of Bayle, following up both of these tracts with several other polemical works.

JARCHI. See RASHI.
JARVIS, Samuel Farmer, D.D., LL.D., historiographer to the Episcopal Church in the United States of America; b. at Middletown, Conn., Jan. 20, 1786; d. there March 26, 1851. He was graduated at Yale College 1805; entered the ministry of the Episcopal Church 1810; was minister in New-York City until 1819; from 1820 to 1828 was missionary in Canada; from 1828 to 1833 was pastor in Providence, R. I.; from 1833 to 1842 minister in Middletown, Conn.; afterwards, pursued his studies in Europe. On his return, in 1845, he was appointed professor of Oriental literature in Washington (now Trinity) College, Hartford; from 1837 to 1842 minister in Middletown, Conn.; and 1855, historiographer. He published A Chronological Introduction to the History of the Church, London and New York, 1844; The Church of the Redeemed, or the History of the Mediatorial Kingdom, vol. i. (all published), Boston, 1850.

JASHER, Book of. The volume itself has perished; but two allusions to it are found in the Bible,—Josh. x. 13 and 2 Sam. i. 18. The word “Yashar” (Jasher, “upright”; and therefore its title is probably a description of the book’s contents,—a collection of lyrics setting forth the glorious deeds of the nation’s heroes. We have no knowledge when the collection was made, nor how much ground it covered; yet interest in this lost book has been excited by our very ignorance, and conjecture has been rife. There have also been several books written which pretended to be the Book of Jasher, or, at all events, bore this title. Three of these are of Jewish origin. One is a moral treatise, written in A.D. 1394 by Rabbi Shabbatai Carmez Levita, and exists in manuscript in the Vatican Library. Another, by Rabbi Tham (d. 1171), is a treatise on the Jewish ritual. It was published in Hebrew in Italy 1544, at Cracow (1586), and Vienna (1811). The third is a fabulous history of the events of the Hexateuch, probably written by a Spanish Jew of the thirteenth century, and has been published at Venice (1629), Cracow (1629), and Prague (1668), in German, in Frankfurt-on-the-Main (1674), and in English (New York, 1840). A fourth Book of Jasher was a palatable and malicious fraud, perpetrated by Jacob Ilive, an infidel printer and type-founder of Bristol, Eng., who wrote, secreted, and conjecture has been rife. There have also been several books written which pretended to be the Book of Jasher, or, at all events, bore this title. Three of these are of Jewish origin. One is a moral treatise, written in A.D. 1394 by Rabbi Shabbatai Carmez Levita, and exists in manuscript in the Vatican Library. Another, by Rabbi Tham (d. 1171), is a treatise on the Jewish ritual. It was published in Hebrew in Italy 1544, at Cracow (1586), and Vienna (1811). The third is a fabulous history of the events of the Hexateuch, probably written by a Spanish Jew of the thirteenth century, and has been published at Venice (1629), Cracow (1629), and Prague (1668), in German, in Frankfurt-on-the-Main (1674), and in English (New York, 1840). A fourth Book of Jasher was a palatable and malicious fraud, perpetrated by Jacob Ilive, an infidel printer and type-founder of Bristol, Eng., who wrote, secreted, and published in London, 1829 (2d ed., 1833), by Rev. C. R. Bond). The forgery owes its reputation to Home’s demolishing it. The present Second Book of the Maccabees, however, is an extract from it (2 Macc. ii. 10).—III. Jason, brother of the high priest Onias III., who, from sheer personal ambition, forgot his religion and fatherland, so far as to buy the dignity of high priest for a considerable sum of money from Antiochus Epiphanes, and then prostitute the office for the purpose of introducing Hellenism among his countrymen, and despoothing them of their old national liberties (2 Macc. iv. 7; comp. 1 Macc. i. 13). His own name he changed from Jesus into Jason (Josephus: Antiq., XII. 5, 1). Under the castle in Jerusalem he established a gymnasium for the propagation of Hellenic culture. To the games at Tyre in honor of Herakles he sent ambassadors with presents, and Antiochus received in the Holy City with great magnificence (2 Macc. iv. 22). But after the lapse of three years, in 172 or 171 B.C., he was supplanted in the favor of the king by a certain Menelaos, a brother of the Benjamite Simon (2 Macc. iv. 23). Menelaos made a higher bid for the high-priestly office, and Jason was compelled to fly to the Ammonites. Soon after, however, when a rumor arose that Antiochus had perished on an expedition against Egypt, Jason returned, at the head of one thousand men, laid siege to Jerusalem, and conquered the city, with the exception of the castle. He took a bloody revenge on his enemies, but was in the long-run unable to maintain himself. Once more he fled to the Ammonites; and afterwards, pursued by the Arabian King Aretas, he wandered about from place to place, until he finally perished miserably in Sparta (2 Macc. v. 6). Josephus, however, gives quite another account of his life and character (Antiq., XII. 5, 1; XX. 10, 3). According to that report, he succeeded his brother Onias III. in a legitimate way, but was himself expelled by a younger brother, Menelaos; and it was Menelaos, and not Jason, who labored to propagate Hellenism among the Jews. But we have no means of deciding between the two accounts. See SCHÜRER: Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 74.—IV. Jason, a Christian, in whose house Paul lived in Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 5-9). Whether he was identical with the Jason mentioned in Rom. xvi. 21 as a relative of Paul is not known.

JAUFFRET, Gaspard Jean André Joseph; b. at La Roque-Brussane, Provence, Dec. 13, 1759; d. in Paris, May 13, 1823; studied at Toulon, Aix, and Paris; founded in 1791 the Annales de la Religion; became in 1801 attached to Cardinal Fesch as private secretary and vice-general, and was appointed bishop of Metz in 1806, and bishop of Aix in 1811. Many congregations of monks and nuns, both in Paris and in his dioceses, owe their reorganization to him. His principal writings are De la Religion à l’Assemblée Nationale, 1791, and Du Culte Public, 1785.

JAVAN designates in Hebrew, the Romans, and in the other Oriental languages,—Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, and Persian,—the Greeks, and is derived from “Ionia” (Ἰονία). In the table of nations (Gen. x. 2-4) Javan is mentioned as a son of Japheth, and... father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim. The cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria contain the same notices. The Hindoos also call the people of the farthest West Jaana (juenis, "young"), because the Western nations were the youngest branches of the Indo-Aryan races. There was also a city of Javan in Arabia, alluded to in Ezek. xxvii. 18. [See B. Stade: De Populo Jaunav parergon patrio sermoene conscriptum, Gieser, 1880, 20 pp.-]

RAY.

JEANNE D’ALBRET.

The Talmudic tract Sota (i.e., the dissolute wife) adds certain particulars to the Bible account. Before the trial of jealousy, warning must have been given by the husband. This being disregarded, the wife was taken before the local authorities, and then before the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem. By the latter she was kindly but warningly exhorted to confession. If she confessed, then her marriage certificate was destroyed, and she lost all claim upon her husband’s property, but was otherwise unpunished. If she refused to confess, she was taken to the Nicanor Gate of the temple, which was between the Court of Israel and the Court of the Women, and there the solemn rites were performed. Her hair was removed, she was dressed in black garments, given the waters of jealousy to drink, and then the meal was thrown upon the altar. If innocent, she suffered no harm: if guilty, she felt its disastrous effects. These traditional ceremonies were designed to lessen the number of trial-cases, and certain whole classes of women were debarred ever drinking the waters of jealousy; e.g., those who by nature or age were incapable of bearing children. Moreover it was decided, that, if the jealous husband had himself been unchaste, the waters would have no effect; and so in other cases. Again: the good conduct of the woman, especially her zeal in teaching and practising the law, debarred such a trial for a certain length of time, even as long as three years. The school of Hillel abolished it entirely.

[It is important to observe the striking difference between the divine test of conjugal fidelity and human tests. In the former case the innocent woman certainly escaped, since there was really nothing given her but a little pure water and a few pinches of dust. But in the ordeals of the middle age, and among heathen nations, the result of the test was certain to be either death or great suffering, entirely irrespective of the moral status of the suspected wife. See Wagenseil: Sota, hoc est liber Mischnicus de uxor adulterii suspicata, Altdorf, 1674; see also Franz Delitzsch’s art. Eiferprüfer, in Riehm’s Handbuch d. bib. Alterthums.-]

JEANNE D’ALBRET, Queen of Navarre, mother of Henry IV., of France, and the faithful friend of French Protestantism; b. in Pau, Jan. 7, 1528; d. in Paris, June 9, 1572. She was the eldest child of Henry d’Albret, King of Navarre, and Margaret d’Angoulême-Alençon, sister of Francis I. of France. By the death of her only brother she became in 1530 heir-presumptive of the kingdom Navarre-Béarn, which, though small in area, attained a large importance by its strategic location on the boundary between France and Spain. Jeanne was a feeble child, but possessed a clear and discerning mind, strong will, indomitable energy, and an unusual aptitude for diplo-Jehoram. In 1548 she was married to the Duke Antoine de Bourbon Vendome, a man of elegant manners, but profane habits. Their third child, afterwards became Henry IV. of France. In 1555 the kingdom of Navarre, by the death of her father, passed into her hands. This princess played a very prominent part in the Protestant Reformation of France. She had breathed the atmosphere of the new religious convictions of her mother, and, in 1550 publicly renounced Catholicism, and accepted the confession of the Reformed Churches. Her subsequent bold advocacy of Protestantism won for her the title of the "Deborah of the Huguenots." Upon the death of her husband, in 1562, who had assumed an unfavorable attitude towards Protestantism, she began in earnest the introduction of the Reformation in her realm. The New Testament was translated by John de Licarrague de Briscours, and published at Rochelle, 1571, under the title, Jesus Christ Goura Jauaren Testamentsa Berria; and a church Discipline (Discipline ecclés. du pays de Béarn) was drawn up after the model of the Genevan, by Raymond Merlin. In 1568 an army invaded her territory; but, warned beforehand, she made good her escape to La Rochelle, the common refuge of the Huguenots. During the troublous period that followed, down to the time of her death, she manifested the most ardent attachment to the cause of the Reformation. She remained at Rochelle three years; and her name and that of her son appear at the head of the list of those who were present at the third general synod of the Reformed Church held in that city. She died of a fever, at Paris, whither she had gone to make preparations for the marriage of her son with Margaret of Valois.

Jeanne contributed much to the cause of the Protestants in France. She is a representative type of the Huguenot.—full of faith, and animated by lofty purposes and indomitable courage. She will always remain one of the foremost figures of French Protestantism, and one of the noblest queens of the century.

Jebb, John, b. at Drogheda, Ireland, Jan. 27, 1773; d. at Limerick, Dec. 7, 1833. He was graduated at Dublin University, and was made bishop of Limerick 1823. His principal work is Sacred Literature (London, 1820, several editions), which was intended to be a review of Lowth on Hebrew Poetry; but Isaiah, but has in it an independent value as an scholarly contribution to Bible exegesis. See Charles Forster: Life of Bishop Jebb, with a Selection from his Letters, London, 1836, 2 vols., in 1 vol., 1837.

Jeb'sus and Jebusites (dry place, or troglodyte place, i.e., perhaps, for a threshing-floor). The Jebusites were a Canaanitic tribe (Gen. xvi. 13) belonging to the Amoritic branch (Josh. x. 5). They are always mentioned last among the Canaanites (Gen. xv. 21; Josh. ix. 1, xxiv. 11), probably because they formed only a small tribe, but they were brave. When the Israelites entered the promised land, the Jebusites occupied the southern part of the mountains of Judah, and were called, after their chief stronghold, Jebus, the later Jerusalem (Josh. xi. 3, xviii. 28). Their land was allotted to Benjamin; but Jebus, or Jebusi, successfully resisted Joshua and later sieges, and was conquered only by David (2 Sam. v. 6; 1 Chron. xi. 4), who made it his capital, as it had been that of the Canaanites. These Jebusites, probably so early as the time of Abraham, if, as is likely, it was identical with the Salem of Gen. xiv. 18. It was at that time very small, covering only the hill of Zion. It owed its strength simply to its situation. In the division of the land, Jebus fell to Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28).

Jehoiachin (whom Jehovah has appointed), the son and successor of Jehoiakim; king of Judah (2 Kings xxiv. 8-10). He reigned only three months and ten days; for Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, carried him and ten thousand captives, including the nobles and artisans, to Babylon, and he remained in captivity thirty-seven years, until Evil-merodach released him, and put him at the head of all the captive kings (Jer. li. 31-34).

Jeho’vada (whom Jehovah knows), high priest, and husband of Jehosheba, the aunt of Joash, who, alone of the family of Ahaziah escaped the murderous hand of Athaliah (2 Kings xi. 1-xii. 2). Jeho’vada was the guardian of the young king, put him upon the throne, killed Athaliah, and, so long as he lived, so wisely directed Joash that all things went well. In recognition of his eminent services to Church and State he was buried "in the city of David, among the kings" (2 Chron. xxiv. 16). The chronicler states his age at death to have been a hundred and thirty years.

Jehov'akim (whom Jehovah sets up), the eldest son of Josiah, and the brother and successor of Jehoahaz upon the throne of Judah. He reigned wickedly for eleven years, when he was killed or murdered, and "buried with the burial of an ass, drawn, and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem" (Jer. xxii. 19). His original name was Eliakim (2 Kings xxiii. 34); and it was only to elevate in his twenty-fifth year to Pharaoh-nechoh, whose tributary he became. But after four years he was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, and compelled to pay tribute to him. After three years he rebelled, was taken prisoner, but ultimately released, and allowed to reign as a vassal. It was he who murdered the prophet Urijah (Jer. xxvi. 23), and so impiously cut up and burnt Jeremiah's roll of prophecies (Jer. xxxvi. 23). His history is given briefly in 2 Kings xxiv. 34-xxiv. 6 and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4-8; but many details are supplied by Jer. xxii. 13-19, xxiii., xxvi.

Jeh’oram or Jo’ram (whom Jehovah has exalted), the name of two kings. 1. The eldest son of Jehoshaphat, and his successor, as king of Judah, B.C. 892-885. His history is given in 1 Kings xxii. 50, 2 Kings viii. 16-24, 2 Chron. xxi. 8. His wife was Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezabel; and under her baneful influence he slew his brothers on coming to the throne, and led a bad life, full of misfortunes for himself and his kingdom, until a terrible disease of the bowels terminated his career, after two years of bodily suffering. He died unwept, unsung; and, although buried in the city of David, it was not in the sepulcthes of the kings. To him Elijah sent a warning letter, foretelling his end. Under him the Edomites and Libnah successfully revolted.

II. The son of Ahab and Jezebel, and therefore brother-in-law to the preceding; king of Israel, B.C. 896-884. His history is given in 2 Kings xii.—xiv., vii. 8—xviii. 24. He was weak, rather than positively bad; although he followed the traditions of his house in the Baal worship. With Jehoshaphat he contracted friendship, and seems also to have been liked by Elisha. For his union with the former in war upon Moab, see JEHOVAH. Elisha acted as his councillor in his war with Syria, revealing prophetically the plans of the foe; but subsequently, when Benhadad besieged Samaria, and produced a grievous famine in the city, Jehoram laid the blame upon Elisha, and sought to kill him. The prophet, however, foretold the plenty which would follow, and the king's friendship returned. When Hazael revolted in Damascus, in consequence of Elisha's prediction (2 Kings viii. 12), Jehoram attempted, by the help of Ahaziah, king of Judah (his nephew), to take Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians, thinking to profit by the confusion of that kingdom. The project failed, and Jehoram went to Jezreel to recover from his wounds. When thus invalided, Jehu rebelled against him, in obedience to the Lord's order through Elisha (2 Kings ix. 6), attacked him in Jezreel, met him in his chariot, and shot him through the heart with an arrow on the plait of ground which Ahab had wrested from Naboth the Jezreelite. And thus Elijah's prophecy was literally fulfilled (1 Kings xxii. 17-29). Jehoram was the last king of the dynasty of Omri.

JEHO'VAPHTH. (Jehovah does justice), the son and successor of Asa; King of Judah for twenty-five years, — 914-888 B.C., according to the common reckoning. The sources of his history are 1 Kings xxii. 41-50; 2 Chron. xvi.-xviii. 1. He succeeded in raising Judah to a position it had not occupied since Solomon, and thus made it seem very desirable to Ahab to take it from him as an ally against Syria. The proposition was received with only too great readiness on Jehoshaphat's part; and the brother-kings fought against Syria at Ramoth-gilead, notwithstanding the solemn warning of the Jehovah prophet Micaiah. For this conduct he was reproved by Jehu on his return home, some time after this, the Ammonites and Moabites attacked Judah. The intelligence was received with great apprehension, but laid before the Lord in prayer by the king. In answer, Jahaziel, a Levite, was inspired to announce that the Lord would fight for them on the morrow: so upon that day Judah went out preceded by singers, and found that their enemies had turned their swords against one another, and fled in great confusion. Again: still later, Jehoshaphat showed his weakness by joining Jehoram, the son of Ahab, in an expedition against Moab. Elisha accompanied them, and by his interposition averted a water-famine (2 Kings iii. 16-20). He told them to dig trenches, which, when filled with the water which Jehovah sent, seemed to run with blood when the sun shone upon them. Thus the Moabites were deceived to their destruction as they came up to the camp of Israel, supposing that they had smitten one another, and were themselves slain. The king of Moab, Mesha, straitly besieged in Kir-haraseth, offered up his eldest son upon the wall. “And there was great indignation against Israel; and they departed from him, and returned to their own land.” These mysterious words imply some sort of a panic. A third co-operation with Israel was with Ahab on an unfortunate commercial enterprise.

But the greatness of Jehoshaphat was certainly not displayed in his wars, but in his government. He was a pious king, and ruled in the fear of the Lord; yet the high places were not removed, and the amount of permanent good he did was small, not through any fault of his, however. In his zeal he sent five of his princes—nine Levites and two priests—to teach in all the cities of Judah the law of the Lord (2 Chron. xvi. 7-9). He also arranged a system of appellate jurisdiction, culminating in Jerusalem (2 Chron. xix. 6—11). A priest judged in spiritual, and a prince in temporal affairs. It was no wonder that Jehoshaphat waxed great exceedingly, and that the land rejoiced in its prosperity (2 Chron. xvii. 12 sqq.). But Jehoram, the son of this pious and prosperous king, married the daughter of Ahab, and reigned wickedly; so that the kingdom rapidly lost position.

Lit. — Besides the Commentaries, see especially the Bible Histories of Ewald and Hitzig; upon Mesha, see the art. MOAB. V. ORELLI.

JEHOVAH, יְהוָה [Jhv], is the name of God which is characteristic of and peculiar to the Old Testament, and for that reason called by the Jews the peculiar name (יְהוָה יָד), and the name which does not express an attribute of God, like Elohim, but his whole being.

I. Pronunciation and Etymology. — The tetragrammaton יְהוָה was not pronounced by the Jews, and the Masorites gave to it the vowel-points of another divine name, יֶהוָ' (Adonai); but, where these two names occur side by side, they gave to it the vowels of Elohim (Inipwg'). Josephus always translates it by Lord (Inipwg'). The Jews based their pronunciation of the name on Lev. xxiv. 16, where the translation “blaspheme” is proper; but the LXX. translated it “naming the name of the Lord” (וֹנָם לְנָבָא). The first trace of the feeling which shunned the pronunciation of the name is found in some of the later books of the Old Testament, which use the name Jhv comparatively seldom; and in the LXX., which always translates it by Lord (יוֹנָם). Josephus says he was not allowed to utter the name (Ant. II. 12, 4), and Philo relates that it was heard and uttered in the Holy of holies (Vita. Meg., iii. 11). The Mishna Barachoth (ix. 5) says, in commenting upon Ruth ii. 4, Judg. ii. 16, that its use was permitted in greetings. Abba Schaul (Sanhedrin x. 1), on the other hand, includes amongst those who have no part in the future life all who pronounce the divine name as it is written. According to Maimonides (More, i. 61), the name might only be uttered in the temple by the priests in pronouncing the blessing, and by the high priest on the day of atonement; but even this privilege was taken away after the death of Simeon. Among the Jews the opinion prevailed, that the knowledge of how the name was pronounced was lost at the destruction of Jerusalem; but many Christian theologians (Gataker, Leusden, etc.) have held that Jehovah (יהוה) is the original pronunciation. The data for the determination of the pronunciation and the etymology are found in Exod. iii. 14. There the name of God is revealed to Moses as יהוה. This makes it clear that יהוה (Yahweh) is formed from the third person of the imperfect of יהוה (Ḥavah), an older form of יהוה, and is to be pronounced either יהו (Yahu) or יהוה (Joshua), from יהוה, which is the more natural and rhythmical. According to Theodorot, the Samaritans read the name, יהוה; the Jews, ‘Al’dAia; according to Clement of Alexandria, ‘lafié; the first and the last, perhaps, point to the use of יהוה (Jahu) as a name for God in common conversation.

11. Meaning. — According to Exod. iii. 14, the meaning of יהוה is He, that is who he is. But, as the verb originally signifies to become, the name signifies that the being of God has a progressive manifestation or development. It points to God's relations to man in history. The heathen regarded the revelation of their gods almost exclusively as a thing of the past; but this name shows that God was revealing himself constantly and progressively: in other words, it witnessed to the Hebrew people that their God was a God of the future. The word distinctly expresses the two ideas, (1) of the divine free will and self-determination, and (2) of God's absolute self-consistency and unchangeableness (Mal. iii. 6), remaining and revealing himself through all eternity as one and the same. But the name (Exod. xxxiii. 19; 2 Kings viii. 1; Ezek. xii. 25) means more. It means the all-powerful one, who is determined by nothing else than his own will, and rules in history, — the Lord of the future, the God of the plan of salvation. (See Deut. xxxii. 39; Ps. cxlvii. 8 sqq.) Compared with Elohim and El, Jehovah brings out the historical revelation of God, and his reign in his kingdom on the earth. Elohim refers to God's transcendence above the world, and his activity in its creation (Gen. i. 1). The difference is brought out in Ps. xix., where God is called El when his revelation in nature is referred to (1), but Jehovah when the reference is to his revelation in the Law (8 sqq.). Jehovah is the living God, who does all that he pleases (Ps. cxv. 3), — hears prayer, etc., in contrast with the gods of the heathen. For this reason there is no stronger oath than "Jehovah lives:" "Elohim lives" never being used. And, as it is Jehovah who reveals himself to men, anthropomorphisms (hands, eyes, mouth, etc.) are usually ascribed to Jehovah, and not to Elohim. Very striking is the juxtaposition in Gen. vii. 16.

III. Origin. — The origin of the proper name "Jehovah," at least in the meaning above given, is to be looked for only in the Old Testament. Some have urged an Egyptian or Indian derivation; but these derivations have all been proved to be without foundation. (See especially Thom: Vcrm. Schriften.) But it is possible, as some proper names seem to indicate, that the word existed in another form, J-hu, amongst Semitic peoples, before it became current in Israel, although Baudisius says that this fact is due to the adoption of the God of the Hebrews as one of their gods by other peoples. The principal question is when the name was first revealed. Josephus explained Exod. vi. 3 ("by my name Jehovah was I not known to them") to mean that the patriarchs were not acquainted with it; but this view flatly contradicts Gen. iv. 26, xiii. 8, and other passages. Another and the better explanation of the passage is, that the patriarchs did not fully understand its import (comp. Exod. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 6). The name is, then, to be regarded as having been known before the time of Moses, as is also plain from the fact that the name of Moses' mother [Jochebed, to Jehovah is the glory] contains it (Exod. vi. 20). See Reland: Decas exercit. phil. de vera pronunt. nominis Jehovah, 1707; Troluck: Verm. Schriften, i. 377-405; [Ewald: D. Compos. d. Genesis, Braunsch., 1823; the excellent art. Jehovah, by W. Aldis Wright, in Smith's Bible Dictionary, and the Commentaries on Exod.-iii. 14; also Baudisius: Jahve et Moloch, Leipzig, 1871]. Oehl. nnu'rzsch.}

JEBHUK (ニ-'11, "Jehovah is he"), King of Israel, exterminated the house of Ahab, and executed the priests of Baal, whom Jezebel had introduced into the kingdom. He was anointed king of Israel (2 Kings ix. 6) by a messenger of Elisha, in accordance with previous directions of Elijah to Elisha. He must have been a man of influence, and perhaps known as a foe of the reigning dynasty (2 Kings ix. 20). Shutting off all communication between Ramoth-gilead and Jezreel, he set out in his chariot for Jezreel, the capital city. Joram, the reigning king, and Ahaziah, the king of Judah, who was on a visit in Jezreel, after some delay went out in their chariots to meet him, and inquire his mission. Arrows from Jehu's bow killed them both. On entering the city, he gave the word to some officers of the royal palace, who threw Jezebel out of the window at which she was sitting (2 Kings x. 31). His kingdom was harassed and diminished by the armies of Hazael. He was buried in Samaria, after a reign of twenty-eight years. An inscription has been found reading, "Jahua habal Hu-umri, which has been translated, "Jehu, son (or successor) of Omri." The reference to the king of Israel, however, has been questioned.

JEBHUDAH (HA-LEVI) BEN SAMUEL, called by Arabic writers Abul Hasan, the greatest Jewish poet of the middle age, and father-in-law to the greatest Jewish grammarian of that age, Aben Ezra; b. in Castile, Spain; at his prime, 1140 A.D.; d. at Jerusalem about 1150; according to tradition, trampled to death by a Mohammedan horseman, because he lamented so loudly over the desolation of the city. At once poet, philosopher, grammarian, scholar, he taught the faith of Judaism, to the wondering delight of his nation. To later ages he is known as the author of The Book of Cosari, or, in full, The Book of Evidence and Argument in Apology for the Disputed Religion (i.e., Judaism), written in Arabic, first published in Hebrew translation at Fano, 1604, and at Venice, 1547; with an Introduction and Commentary by Muscato, Venice, 1594; with Latin translation by the younger Johannes Buxtorf. Basel, 1660; with a German translation by David Cassel, Leipzig, 1853. It is considered the ablest presentation of the superiority of Judaism to Heathenism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. In it rhetorical learning and poetic beauty unite. See D. Kaufmann: Jethuad Halevu, Breslau, 1877, and art. Koari, in Herzog, ed. i., viii. 32-36.

JENKS, Benjamin, b. in Shropshire, 1646; d. at Harley, May 10, 1724; wrote a book which is still valued, Prayers and Offices of Devotion for Families, and for Particular Persons upon most Occasions, London, 1697; 27th edition by Rev. Charles Simeon, London, 1810, reprinted, 1866.

JENKS, William, nonconformist divine and scholar; b. at Sudbury, Suffolk, Eng., 1612; d. in Newgate Prison, whither he had been sent for holding a conventicle, Jan. 10, 1655. He was educated at Cambridge, and possessed great ability. He is remembered for his excellent Exposition of the Epistle of Jude, London, 1652-54, 2 vols. 4to; reprinted by Rev. James Sherman, with memoir, London, 1839, and, in connection with Daille on Philippians and Colossians, Edinburgh, 1805.

JENKYN, William, nonconformist divine and scholar; b. at Kibworth, Leicestershire, 1691; d. in London, Sept. 16, 1762, where he had been pastor for forty-four years. He is remembered for his Jewish Antiquities; or A Course of Lectures on the First Three Books of Godwin's Moses and Aaron, to which is annexed an Exposition on the Hebrew Language, London, 1706, 2 vols.; 10th ed., 1839.

JEPHTHAH, a judge and towering tragic hero of Israel, the illegitimate son of a man of Gilead. His history is told in Judg. xi., xii. He was driven out of his father's house by the legitimate children, and went to the land of Tob, in Eastern Haaran, where he gathered about him a band of men. When the Ammonites invaded Israel, the chiefs of Gilead had recourse to Jephthah, who, complying with their appeal, undertook the office in the fear of God. He was not merely a fierce warrior, for he sent a delegation to the Ammonites in the interest of peace; but when they demanded a large tract of territory bounded by the Arnon, Jabbok, and Jordan, on the ground of possession prior to the Israelitish conquest, Jephthah sent back a gallant reply, to the effect that the territory was God's gift, and had been the lawful possession of Israel for three hundred years. The war broke out; but the Gileadite leader made a vow to dedicate to God, in case of victory, whatever he met, on his return, first coming towards him from his house. Jephthah, in his vow, did not think of his daughter, for daughters remained in the inner part of the houses, but of the triumphal procession that would be prepared for him on his return, with its presents to the victor, and the spoils of gold, weapons, etc., of the war.

As he returned from his triumph, the first to meet him was his own and only daughter with timbrels. His heart from the beginning of his journey was his own and only daughter with timbrels. His heart breaks, but a veritable offer is made. It will cost a pan to give up what is dearest to him. And e does not hesitate, or seek for excuses in the letter of his vow; for a person was not included in the “whatever cometh forth” (Judg. xi. 31). It is a tragedy solitary in its pathos and contrasts. All is jubilation; only the author of it is not jubilant! The trumpets ring with the joyous strains of victory; and only the victor, crowned with glory, has a broken heart! He came to place the crown of the first citizen on his daughter's head, and he must offer her up! But how great a faith does he not his words presuppose (Judg. xi. 35), and how grand does he not appear beside that Roman who offers up his son, only out of respect for military discipline! He was not right in thinking that God would be well pleased with such an offering; but he did not want to appear before the people as only willing to keep his vow when it demanded anything else but his child.

The spirit of the daughter is not beneath that of her father, and she is ready to be the sacrifice. This sacrifice did not consist, as some have urged, in the death of his daughter. The Jewish commentators have done well in insisting upon the meaning of or for “she knew no man,” and “let me bewail my virginity” (xi. 39) indicate the very nature of the sacrifice; and the daughters of Israel in after-years did not lament her death, but her virginity. It was in this that the offering consisted, and the virginity only has a meaning on the supposition that she continued to live. It is interesting to remember that the maidens of the virgin Greek goddess Artemis celebrated a festival like that which the maidens of Israel celebrated over Jephthah's daughter.

Jephthah's last soldierly deed was the defeat... of the Ephraimites (Judg. xii.),— a tribe which on several occasions raises claims after the danger was over. He judged Israel six years. His name, only means of escaping total destruction would which does not occur in connection with any other person, may be connected with ʼaš ("mighty"), or with ʼăšē ("beautiful"), with which word many Greek female names— Iphegenia, Iphigene, etc.—seem to have a connection. The older exposition regarded him as "a man of the Lord," but this was said, "Not my will but thine be done." [See the Commentaries on Judges by Bertheau, Keil, Professor Cassell (in Lange), Canon Cook (in Speaker's Com.), and the art. Jephthah, in Smith's Dict. of the Bible.] PAULUS CASSELL.

JEREMIAH (יְרֵמְיָה, or יְרֵמִי), one of the great Hebrew prophets. I. Life.—Jeremiah was the son of Hilkiah, a priest of Anathoth of the tribe of Benjamin (i. 1, etc.), who, however, is not to be identified with the high priest (2 Kings xxii. 4) of that name (Clem. Alex., Jerome, Eichhorn, Umbreit), as the high priest belonged to the house of Eleazar and the time of the death of Hilkiah was at Anathoth (2 Kings ii. 28; 1 Chron. xxiv. 8). He was called at an early age to the prophetic office (i. 6), and in the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign (i. 2, xxv. 3)—629 or 627. Josiah had already begun his reformatory activity (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3); but the prophet was not deceived by the auspicious outlook. It is probable that he prophesied for a time at Anathoth (xi. 21), but then in Jerusalem. The first twenty-two years of his prophetic career seem to have passed without any notable personal incident, and probably only the quintessence of his prophecies during this period are preserved (iii.—x.). The year 605 B.C., in which the battle of Carcassina was fought, marks a turning-point in his life. Before this event, he had prophesied the downfall of the theocracy; but now for the first time (in chap. xxv.) he announces the name of the people (the Egyptians) by whom it was to be effected. Four years after Carcassina, Nebuchadnezzar made Judaea tributary to his kingdom (2 Kings xxiv. 1). Jeremiah laid out a definite sketch of the immediate future (seventy years), not only of the theocracy, but also of the Chaldean monarchy, and the nations to be conquered by it,—Egypt, Uz, Edom, etc. (xxv. 19-20). All resistance would be in vain (xxvii. 8), and the only means of escaping total destruction would be voluntary submission (xxvii. 11). At the end of seventy years the land was to be delivered. Immediately after the victory of Carcassina, he regards Nebuchadnezzar's supremacy over Judaea and the nations mentioned in xxv. 11 seq. as not only assured, but a matter of divine right. This period of seventy years begins with 605 B.C., and closes with 536 B.C.,—the last year of the exile. Another fact marking the progress of Jeremiah after the turning-point just mentioned is, that, in obedience to a divine command, he commenced the composition of his prophecies to writing in the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign (xxvi. 6). What we read in the twenty-fifth chapter and the chapters belonging with it is the kernel and heart of the prophecy. Jehoiakim, after being subject to Nebuchadnezzer, rebelled against him: he perished, and his death was foretold (2 Kings xxiv. 1-6), and succeeded by his son Jehoiachin, who reigned only three months (Jer. lii. 31-34). Then Nebuchadnezzar deported a large portion of the people. Zedekiah followed Jehoiachin (xxvii. 1), but the prophecy of the prophet was a very painful one in consequence of the callousness of the people and stolid indifference of its leaders (xxi.—xxiv.). The king broke his oath promising fealty to Nebuchadnezzar, in the expectation of aid from Egypt. The Chaldeans besieged Jerusalem; but their expedition against the Egyptians excited hopes which Jeremiah showed to be fallacious (xxvii. 6—11). From this time dates the period of the prophet's severe afflictions. He was thrown into prison (xxvii. 11—18). The king had recourse to him for counsel; but the prophet, persisting in prophesying the downfall of the city, was cast into a "dungeon where there was no water, but mire" (xxviii. 6), from which he was only rescued by the intercession of a royal eunuch (xxviii. 1—13). This was the culmination of his sufferings; but it is noticeable, that, just at this time of personal suffering, the prophet utters his most glowing prophecies as that of the Lord our Righteousness (xxxiii. 16). In the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign, Jerusalem was taken. The prophet was released, and betook himself to Mizpeh, the residence of Gedaliah, the Chaldean governor (xi. 1—6). The latter soon afterwards murdered, and Jeremiah was forced by the people to accompany them to Egypt, although he had advised against the expedition, as displeasing to God (xii. 17—xiii.). At Tahpanhes, where the Jews encamped, he again lifted up his prophetic voice against Egypt (xiii.—xiv.); and this is the last we hear of him in the Bible. Jerome (Adv. Joann., ii. 37), Tertullian, and others relate that he was stoned to death in Egypt. His grave is shown at Cairo. The estimation in which Jeremiah was held by his people after his death was as great as his persecution had been severe during his lifetime. His prophecies were diligently studied by the Jews in exile (Dan. ix. 2; 2 Chron. xxxvii. 1; Ez. i. 1). He was turned into an ideal hero (2 Macc. ii. 1, xv. 14, etc.), and he gradually came to be regarded as the prophet (σημίτης) who should re-appear again (Deut. xviii. 15); and in the New Testament there are references to this expectation (Matt. xvi. 14; John i. 21).

II. Character and Style.—Jeremiah had the most painful and difficult task of any of the prophets. By nature timid and sensitive, resembling John the Evangelist, rather than John the Baptist, in temperament, he was, nevertheless, called upon to carry on a life-and-death struggle with powerful and imbittered enemies. And not only had he to utter warning words against his own nation, but also against other nations. He was in constant danger of his life (xi. 21, xx. 10 sqq., etc.). Like a second Job, he cursed the day of his birth (xx. 14), and longed to be free of his office (xx. 8). The recollection, however, of his official responsibilities was "in his heart as the pain of a broken bone."

From this time dates the period of the prophet's severe afflictions. He was thrown into prison (xxvii. 11—18). The king had recourse to him for counsel; but the prophet, persisting in prophesying the downfall of the city, was cast into a "dungeon where there was no water, but mire" (xxviii. 6), from which he was only rescued by the intercession of a royal eunuch (xxviii. 1—13). This was the culmination of his sufferings; but it is noticeable, that, just at this time of personal suffering, the prophet utters his most glowing prophecies as that of the Lord our Righteousness (xxxiii. 16). In the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign, Jerusalem was taken. The prophet was released, and betook himself to Mizpeh, the residence of Gedaliah, the Chaldean governor (xi. 1—6). The latter soon afterwards murdered, and Jeremiah was forced by the people to accompany them to Egypt, although he had advised against the expedition, as displeasing to God (xii. 17—xiii.). At Tahpanhes, where the Jews encamped, he again lifted up his prophetic voice against Egypt (xiii.—xiv.); and this is the last we hear of him in the Bible. Jerome (Adv. Joann., ii. 37), Tertullian, and others relate that he was stoned to death in Egypt. His grave is shown at Cairo. The estimation in which Jeremiah was held by his people after his death was as great as his persecution had been severe during his lifetime. His prophecies were diligently studied by the Jews in exile (Dan. ix. 2; 2 Chron. xxxvii. 1; Ez. i. 1). He was turned into an ideal hero (2 Macc. ii. 1, xv. 14, etc.), and he gradually came to be regarded as the prophet (σημίτης) who should re-appear again (Deut. xviii. 15); and in the New Testament there are references to this expectation (Matt. xvi. 14; John i. 21).
represents in his own personal life and attitude the servant of God, the highest stage of his development in the history of the Old Testament. He was a type, not of John the Baptist, as Hengstenberg holds, but of Christ himself. The first destruction of Jerusalem corresponds to the second; and, as Jeremiah was the prophet of the former, so Christ was the prophet of the latter (Matt. xxiii. 29-32; Luke xiii. 34, etc.). And, as the former was despised and persecuted for telling unwelcome tidings, so was Christ; and in his crucifixion the people filled up the measure of their fathers' hatred (Matt. xxvii. 32), which culminated upon Jeremiah. If Jeremiah be the author of Ps. xxxii. (a view I would unconditionally adopt, but for the heading), then the comparison becomes even more striking.

When we come to Jeremiah as an author, we may apply the saying: Le style c'est l'homme ("the style is the man"). As a writer he is like a brazen wall, with no influence of another's. The fundamental tone of his prophecy, and like soft wax, for his mighty words come forth from a tender and broken heart. His sentences are long rather than sententious; and often the contents of the prophecy seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronome. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes the prophecy as a whole to the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. As for the contents of the prophecy, they seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disreg...
ambassador, and brought with him letters of recommendation to the patriarch from Jacob Andrea, chancellor of the university of Tübingen, and Martin Crusius, the celebrated Hellenist and historian. The letters were well received; and the Tübingen professors, at that moment the chief representatives of Lutheranism, were not slow to avail themselves of the proffered opportunity of establishing an intercommunication between the Greek Church and the Reformation. They sent a second letter, dated Sept. 15, 1574, and accompanied with a Greek translation of the Confessio Augustana, and a third letter, dated March 20, 1575, and accompanied with a Greek translation of two sermons by Andrea. The patriarch's answer, dated May 15, 1576, consists of an elaborate treatise, in which he goes through the whole confession part by part. Now and then he praises, as, for instance, the articles on the church, the ecclesiastical office, the marriage of priests, etc.; but generally he censures, especially the introduction of Púloque in the creed, the depreciation of good works, etc. The treatise, however, induced the Tübingen theologians to give a systematical representation of the principles on which their confession rested; and a new letter was sent, dated June 18, 1577, and written by Lucas Osian and Crusius. But it took two years before the patriarch's answer was received (May, 1579), and it read more like a rebuke than an answer. Nevertheless, Andrea, Schnepf, Bidelbach, and Heerbrand determined to try once more, and sent, in the spring, 1580, a defence to Constantinople; but the patriarch's answer arrived (May, 1579), and it was once more restored by the Crusaders, though not exactly on the same site. New Jericho occupied the same place as the present village of Richa, or er-Riha. The creation, however, of the Crusaders, did not prosper. At present the palm-trees have disappeared; the roses, the grapes, the balsam, have gone; and of the splendid old city nothing is left but a heap of ruins. The site is now inhabited by a degraded race, scattered about in some miserable huts. For pertinent literature, see Palestine.

FR. W. SCHULTZ.

JEROBOAM (whose people is many), the name of two kings of Israel. I. (1 Kings xi. 26—89, xii. 1—xiv. 20; cf. 2 Chr. x.—xiii.) The son of Nebat, an Ephraimite, raised by Solomon, on account of his superior capacity, to be superintendent of the levies furnished by the house of Joseph. Some time after this the prophet Ahijah met him in a field near Jerusalem, and, tearing his mantle into twelve pieces, gave him ten, to indicate that he was to rule ten tribes. Perhaps Solomon heard of this prophecy; but at all events Jeroboam thought it prudent to flee to Egypt, where he remained until Solomon's death. On his return he headed the disaffected ten tribes in their revolt, and was chosen their king. (See REHOBOAM.) In order to strengthen his hold, he revived the ancient calf-worship at Bethel and Dan, the southern and northern limits of his territory respectively, and with his sons officiated at the altars. While thus engaged at Bethel, a nameless prophet from Judah predicted in his presence the birth of King Josiah, who should destroy that altar, and sacrifice its priests upon it. Jeroboam stretched forth his hand to order the prophet's arrest, when he found it so stiff he could not move it: meanwhile the altar was miraculously rent, in confirmation of the prophet's authority, and he had to implore the prophet's prayer for his restoration. The king, however, persisted in his calf-worship; and since the Levites had refused to obey him, and gone to Judah, he made a new priesthood, irrespective of tribal ancestry. He reigned for twenty-seven years, and waged unremitting warfare with Judah.

II. (2 Kings xiv. 23—29.) The son of Joash, and great-grandson of Jehu; was king of Israel for forty-one years, and enjoyed a reign of extraordinary splendor and success. He recovered the full extent of the northern kingdom, having reduced all the revolted countries on the east of the Jordan. Yet Hosea and Amos (lii. 6—16, v. 3) show plainly that during his long reign vice was rampant.

JEROME (HIERONYMUS) SOPHRONIUS
EUSEBIUS, the most erudite and scholarly among the Fathers of the Latin Church; b., as we gather from his letters, at Stridon, on the border-line separating Dalmatia and Pannonia, between 340 and 342; d. at Bethlehem, Sept. 30, 420. After studying with his father Eusebius, a Christian, he went to Rome, where he was introduced into Greek philosophy and Roman literature. His exegetical labors also deserve respectful notice as indicative of their author's acquaintance with Oriental languages. One healthy product of his critical method was the distinction between the Canon and the Apocrypha; which latter he says the "Church reads for the edification of the people, not for confirming the authority of the Scriptures." (Prolog. Galeatus.) His writings on geography and antiquities (De Nominiibus Hbreeor. and De Situ et Nominib. Locorum hebraic.) laid the foundation of the Science of Biblical Antiquities. His work, De Viris illustribus s. de Scriptoribus eccles., was the first attempt in the department of Patrology. Jerome's Letters are also very important: they answer questions of conscience, commend monastic life, comfort the sorrowing, flatter friends, condemn the vices and follies of the day, etc. They were extravagantly admired in the ancient church; but Luther, with characteristic penetration, in his Table-Talk said in regard to them, "I know no teacher to whom I am so hostile as Hieronymus; for he writes only of fasting, meats, virginity, etc. If he had only insisted upon the works of faith, and performed them! But he teaches nothing either about faith, or love, or hope, or the works of faith."

Jerome of Prague, Bohemian reformer and martyr; of a noble family of Prague; b. about 1365; d. at the stake, in Constance, May 30, 1415. He studied at Oxford and returned to Prague with Wiclif's theological writings. In 1398 he took the degree of bachelor of arts at Prague, and subsequently that of master in Paris. He did not return to Prague till 1407, when he entered into hearty sympathy with the plans of Hus. In 1410 he went, on the invitation of the king of Poland, to assist in putting the university of Cracow on a secure basis, and from there to Osten to preach before Sigismund, king of Hungary. He was suspected of heretical doctrines, however, and fled to Vienna, but was put in prison, from which he was released on the requisition of the university of Prague.

When, in October, 1414, Hus was about to leave for Constance, Jerome encouraged him to fortitude, and promised to go to his assistance if necessary. On April 4, 1415, he fulfilled his promise, but, on the advice of the Bohemian nobles, fled.
from Constance the day after his arrival. He was recognized at Hirsau by his denunciations of the council, taken prisoner, and sent back in chains. Constance' death, the council attempted to induce Jerome to retract, and succeeded Sept. 10; but the day following he withdrew his retraction. The council instituted a second trial, but not until the following May (1419) was he granted a public hearing. All attempts to move him again were unavailing. On May 30 he was condemned by the council as a heretic. As the flames crept about him, he sang the Easter hymn, Salve festa dies, etc. ("Hail, festival day"), and repeated the three articles of the Apostolick Creed concerning God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Compared with Hus, Jerome was, perhaps, his superior in intellectual endowments and learning, but his inferior in nobility of soul, and strength of will. The unallo wed joyfulness and heroism with which he died attested for the weakness he had before shown in retracting.

JERUSALEM (abode of peace). I. Situation and Present Condition. — The city is built upon high ground in the midst of a semi-desert. It is thirty-two miles east of the Mediterranean Sea, and eighteen miles north of the Dead Sea. Above it tower the surrounding hills, and around it lies the dry, rough country. The atmosphere is wonderfully clear. The temperature in summer is sometimes as high as 102° Fahr., and in winter as low as 28°; but on the average the highest mean temperature, according to observations extending over five years, is 77° in July, and the lowest 42°.8 in January. Snow often falls in January and February, even to the depth of a foot; but the ground never freezes. On the east and west parts of the city, but to the south ever later been a citadel; (b) Micah (iii. 12) very clearly distinguishes Zion from the temple hill; (c) Too much building is spoken of in Neh. iii. for Zion to be part of the temple hill; (d) Although Zion and the temple hill are identical in the mouths of psalmists and prophets, uniform tradition identifies the city of David with the hill in the south-west part of the city; cf. 1 Macc. i. 33, Josephus (War, V. 4, 1; Antiq., VII. 3, 2), Eusebius, and Jerome.

David materially enlarged Jebus, and made it the political and religious capital of the nation; but to Solomon it owed most. Besides the temple upon Mount Moriah, he built his great palace upon Ophel, as is proven by (a) the circumstances that the daughter of Pharaoh was "carried up" to the "mount Zion" or south-east, or the southern part of the temple hill, but the south-west part of the city, extending to the Jaffa Gate. Reasons for this view are: (a) Neither in the north-west nor in the south-east has there ever later been a citadel; (b) Micah (iii. 12) very clearly distinguishes Zion from the temple hill; (c) Too much building is spoken of in Neh. iii. for Zion to be part of the temple hill; (d) Although Zion and the temple hill are identical in the mouths of psalmists and prophets, uniform tradition identifies the city of David with the hill in the south-west part of the city; cf. 1 Macc. i. 33, Josephus (War, V. 4, 1; Antiq., VII. 3, 2), Eusebius, and Jerome.

David materially enlarged Jebus, and made it the political and religious capital of the nation; but to Solomon it owed most. Besides the temple upon Mount Moriah, he built his great palace upon Ophel, as is proven by (a) the circumstances that the daughter of Pharaoh was "carried up" to the "mount Zion" or south-east, or the southern part of the temple hill, but the south-west part of the city, extending to the Jaffa Gate. Reasons for this view are: (a) Neither in the north-west nor in the south-east has there ever later been a citadel; (b) Micah (iii. 12) very clearly distinguishes Zion from the temple hill; (c) Too much building is spoken of in Neh. iii. for Zion to be part of the temple hill; (d) Although Zion and the temple hill are identical in the mouths of psalmists and prophets, uniform tradition identifies the city of David with the hill in the south-west part of the city; cf. 1 Macc. i. 33, Josephus (War, V. 4, 1; Antiq., VII. 3, 2), Eusebius, and Jerome.

David materially enlarged Jebus, and made it the political and religious capital of the nation; but to Solomon it owed most. Besides the temple upon Mount Moriah, he built his great palace upon Ophel, as is proven by (a) the circumstances that the daughter of Pharaoh was "carried up" to the "mount Zion" or south-east, or the southern part of the temple hill, but the south-west part of the city, extending to the Jaffa Gate. Reasons for this view are: (a) Neither in the north-west nor in the south-east has there ever later been a citadel; (b) Micah (iii. 12) very clearly distinguishes Zion from the temple hill; (c) Too much building is spoken of in Neh. iii. for Zion to be part of the temple hill; (d) Although Zion and the temple hill are identical in the mouths of psalmists and prophets, uniform tradition identifies the city of David with the hill in the south-west part of the city; cf. 1 Macc. i. 33, Josephus (War, V. 4, 1; Antiq., VII. 3, 2), Eusebius, and Jerome.

David materially enlarged Jebus, and made it the political and religious capital of the nation; but to Solomon it owed most. Besides the temple upon Mount Moriah, he built his great palace upon Ophel, as is proven by (a) the circumstances that the daughter of Pharaoh was "carried up" to the "mount Zion" or south-east, or the southern part of the temple hill, but the south-west part of the city, extending to the Jaffa Gate. Reasons for this view are: (a) Neither in the north-west nor in the south-east has there ever later been a citadel; (b) Micah (iii. 12) very clearly distinguishes Zion from the temple hill; (c) Too much building is spoken of in Neh. iii. for Zion to be part of the temple hill; (d) Although Zion and the temple hill are identical in the mouths of psalmists and prophets, uniform tradition identifies the city of David with the hill in the south-west part of the city; cf. 1 Macc. i. 33, Josephus (War, V. 4, 1; Antiq., VII. 3, 2), Eusebius, and Jerome.

David materially enlarged Jebus, and made it the political and religious capital of the nation; but to Solomon it owed most. Besides the temple upon Mount Moriah, he built his great palace upon Ophel, as is proven by (a) the circumstances that the daughter of Pharaoh was "carried up" to the "mount Zion" or south-east, or the southern part of the temple hill, but the south-west part of the city, extending to the Jaffa Gate. Reasons for this view are: (a) Neither in the north-west nor in the south-east has there ever later been a citadel; (b) Micah (iii. 12) very clearly distinguishes Zion from the temple hill; (c) Too much building is spoken of in Neh. iii. for Zion to be part of the temple hill; (d) Although Zion and the temple hill are identical in the mouths of psalmists and prophets, uniform tradition identifies the city of David with the hill in the south-west part of the city; cf. 1 Macc. i. 33, Josephus (War, V. 4, 1; Antiq., VII. 3, 2), Eusebius, and Jerome.
which he probably means the same tower of the palace; (d) the entire narrative in Neh. iii.; and (e) especially the mention of the Horse Gate in verse 11, which shows that the King's palace and its tower were south of the temple. The temple, with its courts, did not nearly cover the present Haram enclosure; and there were about it many private houses. A third important building of Solomon was Millo (1 Kings ix. 15, 24), not to be confounded with the Millo mentioned in 2 Sam. v. 9, which had probably fallen down, but a new fortress on the north-west corner of Zion.

In the post-Solomonic time the city grew in the neighborhood of the temple, as was quite natural, inasmuch as it was the centre of so much life. Isaiah (vii. 3) speaks of Fuller's-field Street, running north from Zion, and Jeremiah (xxix. 21), of Bakers' Street, in the same locality, where were also, in after-time, the quarters of the smiths and the cheesemakers, the fish and the sheep markets. The lower city was in the same direction, and particularly inhabited by merchants and capitalists (Zeph. i. 10). "The city of David" extended, probably, as far as Siloah; and upon Ophel also the dwellings (Neh. vii. 4). Eventually, how it is meant that he built higher and stronger, and the second not joined to it [i.e., to the outermost wall, so that a part of the New City was enclosed by it]; the builders neglecting to build the wall strong when the New City was not much inhabited. Here, also, was an easy passage to the third wall, through which he (Titus) thought to take the upper city, and, through the tower of Antonia, the temple itself" (War, V. 6, 2). (c) When Titus had carried the second wall, and torn down its northern part, he erected two banks for the capture of the upper city, and two for that of Antonia. The first two were along the east wall, by John's monument; the second two, by the Pool Amygdaion, which was also outside the second wall. The second wall may be considered to have started at the present bazaar, and run, first northwards, then eastwards, from the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, gradually bending towards the east, and then somewhere upon the ridge, which is visible to the east from the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, extending to the Antonia Tower. The Third Wall (Josephus: War, V. 4, 2), which took in the New City in the north-west and north, was begun by Herod Agrippa I. about A.D. 42; but, out of fear of Claudius Caesar, he stopped with the foundations, and it was finished after a lighter pattern by later Jews. Its entire height was twenty-five cubits, with battlements of two cubits, and turrets of three cubits. It was defended by ninety towers, of which the strongest was Psephinos, about a light angle, west from the Latin convent, upwards of a hundred feet high, and upon the highest ground of the city (twenty-five hundred and ninety feet above the sea). The course of this third wall was probably, in general, that of the present walls.

The Gates. - There were four gates to the temple enclosure. On the north, the Upper Gate of the House of Jehovah, also called the Upper Gate of Benjamin (Jer. xxxvii. 7), or the New Gate (xxvi. 10); on the east, the King's Gate (1 Chron. ix. 18), called the Gate of the Inner Court (Ezek. xliv. 3), and the East Gate (Neh. iii. 29); on the west, the Gate Shallecheth (1 Chron. xxvi. 18); on the south, the Gate Miphkad (Neh. iii. 31); and, besides these, the Gate Sur (2 Kings xi. 6), or Gate of Foundation (2 Chron. xxiii. 5), and the Gate behind the Guard (2 Kings xi. 6). City gates mentioned are the Corner Gate (2 Chron. xxvi. 9), probably the second city; the Valley Gate (ibid.), on the north-west corner of Zion, the site of the present Jaffa Gate. The following gates are not spoken of after the pre-exilian period: (1) the Gate of Joshua, the governor of the city (2 Kings xxii. 19); then on either side, the Gate of the Kidron, apparently to Antonia, or east to the Kerdon. This put the Church of the Holy Sepulchre entirely inside the walls, and destroys its claim to be the true site. But against this view may be urged, (a) When Cestius, in the year 66, had broken through the third wall, he burnt Bezetha and the wood-market, and without being hindered by the second wall, pressed upon the upper city, — i.e., to the north-west, — and opposite to it pitched his tent (Josephus: War, II. 19, 4). (b) In explanation of the determination of Titus to open his attack at the monument of John the high priest, which stood in the north-western New City, Josephus expressly states, that there "the first fortification was lower, and the second not joined to it [i.e., to the outermost wall, so that a part of the New City was enclosed by it]; the builders neglecting to build the wall strong when the New City was not much inhabited. Here, also, was an easy passage to the third wall, through which he (Titus) thought to take the upper city, and, through the tower of Antonia, the temple itself" (War, V. 6, 2).
the Valley of Hinnom; (3) the Middle Gate (Jer. xxxix. 3), in the royal palace, leading to the middle city; (4) the gate between the two walls (2 Kings xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4), in the south end of Ophel, where the west and east walls of these hills meet. For learning the gates of the post-exilian period, Nehemiah (particularly chap. iii.) is the best guide. Beginning with the Sheep Gate in the east, north from the then temple area, and south of the present St. Stephen's Gate, and going west, there came in order the Fish Gate, where the Tyrian fish-market was held; the Old Gate; the Gate of Ephraim or of Benjamin; the Valley Gate, on the north-west corner of Zion; southward, the Dung Gate, near the present Birket es Sultan; the Fountain Gate, close to the Pool of Siloam; then came the Stairs that go down from the city of David. The next gate mentioned is the Water Gate, on the south end of Ophel, through which the water used for libations in the feast of tabernacles was drawn. Next and last came the Horse Gate, through which the king's horses were taken to their stalls in the substruction of the temple area.

The gates are spoken of: (1) the Tower of Meah, (2) the Tower of Hanneel,—both near together, between the Sheep Gate and the Fish Gate, (3) the Tower of the Furnaces, between the Gate of Ephraim and the Valley Gate.

The walls were almost entirely destroyed, along with the city, by Titus, A.D. 70, but rebuilt by Hadrian, A.D. 129-132, who probably restored the old citadel built by Herod; for in 1099 the crusaders found at the spot a fortress which long resisted their attacks. They called it the Tower of David, and this name it has retained until the present day. It is now the most prominent object as one enters the Jaffa Gate, and consists of five square towers originally surrounded by a ditch. The foundations of the towers are manifestly ancient. It is probably the Tower of Phasaelus. The present walls are of Arabic construction, and date from Sultan Soleyman I. (1536-39). Both these and those of Hadrian, in unintentional but apparent literal fulfilment of Mic. iii. 12 ("therefore shall Zion for your sake be ploughed as a field"), do not circumvent the southern part of Zion, thus shutting it off from the city. But in general the new walls rest upon the old foundations.

IV. THE MOST IMPORTANT BUILDINGS AND SITES. — Akra was situated near the temple. It is called by Josephus, our only informer, "the Lower City," and corresponds to the present Christian quarter upon the rocky ridge between the Tyropoeon and the "broad" valley. It took its name from the fortress Akra, built by Antiochus. (See Joseph.: Antiq., XII. 5, 4.)

Baris, or Antonia as Herod called it, was a citadel belonging to the temple, and on its north-west corner, mentioned by Nehemiah (ii. 8, cf. vii. 2 [A. V. "palace" = fortress, in Hebrew Bitot, which corresponds to the Greek Basileion]), called by Joseph the Antonia, called by the Ammonites Akra, fortified by Simon (1 Macc. xii. 32), but especially by Herod (War. I. 8, 3). It commanded the temple, and interiorly was fitted up like a palace.

The Palace of the Ammonaeans was on the north-east side of Zion, opposite the south-west corner of the temple (Antiq., XX. 8, 11).

The Palace of Herod was upon the site of the old tower of David (War. V. 4, 4). The Palace of the High Priest, built by Herod, was in the Upper City.

The Theatre was also built by Herod (Antiq., XV. 8, 1); perhaps it was identical with the Hippodrome on the southerly part of the Upper City. His Amphitheatre was north of the city (Antiq., XV. 8, 1). The Xystus, for gymnastic exercises, and a place for popular assemblages, was on the extreme north-east corner of Zion (War. V. 4, 2; VI. 8, 2; 6, 2; 8, 1). The Tower-hall was between the Xystus and the temple, probably by the side of the western hall of the temple.

The Connection between the City and the Temple.

According to Antiq. XV. 11, 5, there were in the west side of the temple enclosure four gates, of which one led to the king's palace, and went to a passage over the intermediate valley; two led to the suburbs of the city; and the fourth led to the Lower City, where the road descended into the valley by a great number of steps. The first evidently led to the bridge between the temple and Xystus (War. II. 10, 3). The "suburbs" were called Akra. Many traces of old gates and bridges have been discovered on the west side of the Haram; but these can scarcely be identified with those mentioned by Josephus. For instance, the Bab es Silseleh, or Gate of the Chain, the principal entrance to the Haram on the west, stands upon an arch discovered by Capt. Wilson; but the road over this bridge apparently did not lead to the Upper City, but to the suburb lying immediately to the north. About midway between the Bab es Silseleh and the south-west corner of the Haram, somewhat south of the Jews' Wailing Place, Barclay discovered the so-called "Gate of the Prophet." Robinson's Arch, so called because discovered by him, is thirty-nine feet north of the south-west end of the Haram. It consists of three courses of huge stones projecting from the wall, forming the segment of an arch, which extends fifty feet along the wall.

Places connected with the Passion and Ascension of our Lord. — The house in which the Last Supper was eaten, and, later, the miraculous tongues of fire of Pentecost were seen, is traditionally placed on the southern brow of Zion, not now within the walls. It is the Cenaculum of the present day, the "upper room" of the Evangelists, and was probably the Church of the Apostles spoken of by Cyril of Jerusalem in the fourth century. It is in the group of buildings over the pretended tomb of David, and is fifty feet long by thirty wide. The Palace of Caiaphas, between the Cenaculum and the Zion Gate, is an Armenian cloister. The Presbyterium, or Judgment-hall of Pilate, was probably in Antonia. (See GABBA THA.) The Via Dolorosa proper, along which Jesus is supposed to have been led, bearing his cross, runs from Antonia to the Church of the Sepulchre, passing the Ecce Homo Arch near the Church of the Flagellation. The name is, however, now given to the whole street leading from St. Stephen's Gate to the street of the Gate of the Column, of which the traditional Via Dolorosa is part. At the foot of the Mount of Olives, opposite St. Stephen's Gate, was Gethsemane. The present site so called is a little garden, with eight olive-trees of great age, though scarcely as old as Christianity, in charge of Franciscan monks. It is probably rightly placed. About a hundred paces distant is the Grotto of the Agony (antrum agonie), a dark, irregular cave, hewn in the rock. The place of the ascension is fixed by Luke xxiv. 50 to a garden near Bethany (which see), and not as described by John xxi. 19 (cf. War, II. 8. 4). That in a rocky limestone region, it is to be expected that it would be institute of its rights: but this natural l 폐 was formerly supplied by an extensive system of aqueducts, pools, and cisterns; so that in no one of her numerous sieges do we read of any suffering for water on the part of the inhabitants, while the besiegers have often suffered severely. At the present day rain-water is exclusively used; and the better class of houses have three or four cisterns, from five to thirty feet long by the same in breadth, and ten to twenty feet deep, generally vaulted, with a small opening on top, surrounded by stone-work, and provided with bucket and wheel. But formerly there were aqueducts from north, west, and especially from the south. That from the north can be identified with the subterranean canal which has an opening under the Convent of the Sisters of Zion, and flows thence southwards to the west side of the Haram. Tha... explained by the movement of a dragon, flowing when he awakes, and stopping while he sleeps—has been found to be due to the intermittent character of its source, as was noticed by Jerome in regard to the Pool of Siloam, but not now visible in it, owing to the slower and smaller flow of water. The water in the Fountain of the Virgin is now unpleasant to the taste. In June, 1880, one of the pupils of Herr Schick, German architect, long resident in Jerusalem, accidentally fell into the Pool of Siloam, and thus discovered some letters in the wall of the conduit from the Fountain of the Virgin. By the united efforts of Herr Schick, Professor A. H. Sayce, Dr. Guthe, and others, the inscription has been almost entirely copied. It consists of six lines in a space twenty-eight inches long by eight inches in height. It is thus translated upon page 403 of The Presbyterian Review, April number, 1882: “The excavation. Now this is the story of the excavation. While . . . the pick, one toward the other. While three cubits . . . the voice of one called to the other that there was an overflow (?) in the rock, water . . . the diggers struck each to meet the other, pick over against pick, and the waters flowed from their outlet in the pool 1,200 cubits, and 100 cubits was the height of the rock over the head of the excavators.” Various dates have been assigned to the inscription, from Solomon to Hezekiah. Its archeological importance is slight. But its discovery will be a stimulus, and many far more important inscriptions will doubtless be found. Another aqueduct, two or more feet deep by three feet and a half wide, leading down the Kidron from the Pool of Siloam, in the direction of, and probably to, Bir Eyub (En Rogel), was discovered in the spring of 1882. The channel is rock cut, and roofed over with slabs. En Rogel is a well of living water below the city, in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, famous as the site of Adoniah’s feast (1 Kings i. 9), now called by the Arabs Bir Eyub (the Well of Jacob), and by the Franks “the Well of Nehemiah,” because Nehemiah there found the holy fire (2 Macc. i. 19, 22). It is a hundred and twenty-five feet deep, with fifty feet of sweet water.

Besides these fountains, there are several pools. The Lower Pool (Isa. xxii. 9) is identified with the Birket as Sultan (sc. Soleymen), in the Gihon Valley, below the southeast angle of the city’s wall. The Old Pool (Isa. xxii. 11; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 30, “upper watercourse of Gihon,” and 2 Kings xvii. 17; Isa. vii. 3, “Upper Pool, in the highway of the Fuller’s Field”) is identified with the Birket el-Manila (so called from St. Mamm’s Church), in the upper end of Gihon. It is filled with rain-water in winter, but empty and dry in summer and autumn. The water of this pool is conducted into the Pool of Hezekiah, or of the Patriarchs (Birket Hammam el-Batrak), inside the city, near the Jaffa Gate. For the Pool of Bethsaida, see BETHESAID.

VI. THE TOMBS. It is doubtful whether any one of the tombs pointed out around the city is really very old. David was buried in the city of David (1 Kings ii. 10), and his tomb was well known in Christ’s day (Acts ii. 29). Hymenaeus (Joseph: Antip., VII. 15, 3) and Herod (Antip., XVI. 7, 1) robbed it of its treasures. The tombs of the kings were on the southeast corner of Zion (Neh. iii. 16); and there lay almost all the Judaic kings, as well as the high priest Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv. 18). But the Tombs of the Kings were now shown to the traveller lie ten minutes north from the Damascus Gate, and probably were constructed by Helena, queen of Adiabene, for herself, son, and his twenty-four children. It is properly a catacomb, and contains a remarkable contrivance,—an inner door, made of a massive slab of stone, fitting over and around the opening, and so hung upon pivots that it yielded to pressure from without, but immediately fell back into its place on the pressure being removed. Should any one be so unfortunate as to enter, and leave the door for an instant, his fate was sealed; for it fitted so closely that he had no means of pulling it open again.”—Porter.) South of it, and only two or three minutes from the Damascus Gate, is the so-called Grotto of Jeremiah, where the Lamentations are said to have been composed, and the prophet buried; but it really is a section of an old quarry. The Tombs of the Judges, also called the “Tombs of the Prophets” and “of the Sanhedrin,” are fifteen minutes north-east from the Tombs of the Kings, and elaborately finished. On the opposite side, south-east from Jerusalem, is the little labyrinth called the Tombs of the Prophets,—certainly very old. Farther down is the Tomb of Zacharias (cf. 2 Chron. xxiv. 21, Jewish reference; or Matt. xxiii. 35, Christian), and somewhat to the north the Tomb of Absalom. The first of the two last-mentioned is a monolith throughout; the second, only so below, its upper part being of masonry. Between them is the Tomb of St. James, so called because in it the apostle James hid himself after our Lord’s capture, and fasted there until his resurrection. North of the Tomb of Absalom is the Tomb of Jehoshaphat, whose principal chamber was used as a Christian chapel. North of Gethsemane is the Tomb of Mary, where also her parents and husband are said to be buried.

Jerusalem is fairly surrounded by graves. The oldest necropolis is in the Valley of Hinnom, by the Hill of Evil Counsel. Lately the Christians have buried upon Zion, from Zion Gate southward; the Mohammedans, in the Kidron by St. Stephen’s Gate; and the Jews, principally upon the west slopes of Olivet.

VII. THE CHURCHES, MOSQUES, AND ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS.—Hadrian (117-138) profaned the holy city, and called it Æolia Capitolina; forbade the Jews, a few of whom had returned after its destruction by Titus (70), to enter it, on pain of death; and built upon the ruins of the temple to Jehovah a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, ornamented with statues of the god and of himself (cf. MÜNTER: Der jüd. Krieg unter Trajan u. Hadrian, Altona, 1821). Upon the site of the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre stood a temple to Venus. But this triumph of heathenism was short lived. Constantine (308-357) allowed the Jews to return once a year, and to enter the sites of their holy places. Julian (361-363) ordered them to rebuild the temple; but the work was stopped by an earthquake.

There seem always to have been Christians in Jerusalem, who had a church on Zion (the Conseculum, or Church of the Apostles); and from Constantine and his mother Helena they received substantial support. The former built the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; the latter, the Church of the Ascension, on the Mount of Olives. The patriarchate of Jerusalem (see art.) was erected in 451. Justinian built the Church of the Virgin, or Theotokos ("mother of God"), upon the southwestern part of the temple area, and ten or eleven convents, besides a hospice, in the city; for from the third century pilgrimages were made thither. In 637 the Mohammedans, under Omar, took the city, which had already been venerated by Mohammed, called El Kuds ("the Sanctuary"), and considered by his followers second only to Mecca in holiness. Omar took the Church of the Virgin, which was a basilica, and transformed it into the Mosque El-Aksa. Later caliphs restored and remodelled it to its present condition. But the whole temple area has been altered by the Mohammedans. It is now called the Haram esh Sherif, and is an irregular parallelogram, on the west 1,601 feet, on the east 1,530, on the north 1,042, and on the south 922. In the middle stands the Kabet es-Sakhr (the Dome of the Rock), also called the Mosque of Omar, built by Abd el-Melek (A.D. 880),—a large, stately octagonal building, sixty-seven feet each side. The interior is a hundred and forty-eight feet in diameter; entrance is by four doors. Under the dome is the famous rock, rising above the floor, surrounded by a railing. The Mohammedans suppose it to be suspended in the air, but it is merely the top of a cave. Many hold that the great altar of burnt-offering was built upon it. It is not mentioned in the Bible.

Jerusalem is ruled by the Turks, and is the seat of a patriarchate under the wuly of Syria. Its present population consists of about twenty-four thousand, thus divided: Mohammedans, thirteen thousand; Christians, seven thousand; Jews, four thousand. The latter are supported by the charity of their co-religionists. Baron Rothschild's hospital, near the south wall, built in 1855, and Moses Montefiore's almshouses, west of the Birket es-Sultan, are their principal institutions. Every Friday at four p.m., and on festivals, many of the Jews gather to mourn the fall of the city, and to pray for its restoration, at the Wailing-Place, just outside the enclosure of the Mosque El-Aksa, and near Robinson's Arch, where a portion of the old temple wall is still uncovered.

The Christians belong to the Greek, old Armenian, and Latin, and a few to Protestant churches. The Greeks are the most numerous and powerful. They have over them a patriarch. The Russian caravans have done much for them. There is a Russian colony outside the walls, near the Jaffa Gate, with a cathedral, hospital, and accommodations for a thousand pilgrims. The Armenians have a large convent inside the Jaffa Gate, where their patriarch and a hundred and eighty monks and brothers live; adjoining is the largest and finest garden in Jerusalem. They have also a printing-press and a photographic establishment. The Latins have only been numerous there since 1847. They number now fifteen hundred, have churches, convents, schools, and a printing-press, whence issue the Armenian school-books. They are very few. Besides the church and school, which belong to the bishopric of Jerusalem (see next art. and GORBAT), there are German hospitals and an orphanage. There is also a lazaret-house.

JERUSALEM, THE EPISCOPAL SEE OF ST. JAMES. In 1818 the American Board of Foreign Missions sent two missionaries to Palestine to work among the Palestinian Jews, who, in the course of time, had sunk into spiritual degradation. After the occupation of the country by Mehemet Ali, in 1832, the London Association for Missionary Work among the Jews also entered the field; and in 1833 the celebrated Orientalist Nicolayson permanently settled in Jerusalem. Yet while the Greek, the Latin, and the Armenian churches had legally established organizations in Jerusalem, the Protestant churches were still without any official representation, until, by the joint expedition of the European grand powers in 1840, Friedrich Wilhelm IV. of Prussia opened negotiations with Queen Victoria for the establishment of a Protestant episcopal see in Jerusalem under the patronage of the two Protestant states, England and Prussia. The Prussian propositions were most cordially accepted by the prelates of the Anglican Church, who spoke of the establishment as a great advantage for the missions among the Jews, and by James, archbishop of Canterbury. The right of appointment... was to be alternative between the two states, though the Archbishop of Canterbury retained a veto also in case of a Prussian appointment. The first bishop, Michael Sal. Alexander (b. in 1799 at Schönlanke in Posen), a converted Jew, professor of Hebrew in King's College in London, was appointed by England, and entered Jerusalem Jan. 21, 1842, but died Nov. 23, 1845, near Cairo. The second bishop, Samuel Holt (see art.), was appointed by Prussia. He occupied the see until his death, May 11, 1879, and founded twelve minor Protestant congregations in Palestine, with churches in Jerusalem, Nazareth, Jaffa, Bethlehem, and Nablus, and with thirty-seven schools frequented by fifteen hundred children. The third bishop, Joseph Barclay, was appointed by England, and died Oct. 22, 1881. The fourth, G. F. P. Blyth, the present bishop, was appointed in 1887.

Chevalier Bunsen was the chief adviser of King William IV. in the scheme of founding the bishopric of St. James. The High-Church party in England was opposed to it on the ground that it interfered with the jurisdiction of the Greek Patriarch. The bishopric has disappointed the sanguine scheme of its founders, but is doing a good missionary work, especially in the education of youth, and in Christian charity to the poor and sick. Protestant services are held in English, German, and Hebrew. The English Church is near the Jaffa Gate and the Mediterranean Hotel, and is well filled during the Easter season.

JERUSALEM. The Patriarchate of, owes its interest to the memories connected with the name and the place, rather than to the influence it has actually exercised on the history of the Church. Eusebius gives a list of the "bishops" from the origin of the congregation to his own time; but it contains only a few names of prominence. During the reigne of Constantine the Great, the city began to attract the general attention of Christendom, especially by its relics. Magnificent churches were built within its precincts, and the Council of Nicea (can. 7) conferred on it a precedence of honor as the true cradle of Christianity. The see remained, nevertheless, under the metropolitan authority of Caesarea until Theodosius II. elevated it into a patriarchate. Some difficulties arose with the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria concerning the boundaries of the new diocese; but they were solved by the Council of Chalcedon. The see until his death, lay 11, 1879, and was founded in 1887. Of the bishops, who, as archbishop of Pisa, had accompanied Urban II. on his voyage through France in 1095, tried to give a thoroughly hierarchical character to the constitution of the new kingdom; but the relation between the patriarch and the king in 1138 the Patriarch William thought of separating from Rome altogether, and in 1187 the Patriarch Heraclius surrendered the city of Jerusalem to Saladin. Saladin expelled the Latin patriarchs: only some members of the Franciscan order were allowed to settle in a monastery on Mount Zion. In the negotiations concerning a union between the Greek and Latin churches, the patriarchs of Jerusalem played only a very small part.

The second of the synods held at the Council of Florence (1439) was represented; but in 1443 the agreement arrived at there was rejected in Jerusalem, as well as in Alexandria and Antioch. The relations with the Russian Church were very friendly: the Russian confession of 1643 was signed by Paisius of Jerusalem. The most conspicuous point in the later history of the patriarchate is the synod of Jerusalem, 1672 (which see). After that time it gradually dwindled down into insignificance. It once comprised sixty-eight episcopal dioceses, with twenty-five suffragans: it now comprises only fourteen,—Caesarea, Palestine, Scythopolis, Petra, Ptolermais, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Lydda, Gaza, Sinai, Joppa, Nablus, Sebaste, and Philadelphia; and these fourteen dioceses number only seventeen thousand souls. The last patriarch, Athanasius, resided in Constantinople, and administered the patriarchate by a synod. The present one resides in Jerusalem, in a newly built magnificent palace. See George Williams: The Holy City, London, 1845, 2d ed., 1849, 2 vols., i. 195 sq.; Wilson: The Lands of the Bible, Edinburgh, 1847, 2 vols., ii. 509 sq.; [Schaff: Through Bible Lands, New York, 1880, chapter xxiv.]

JERUSALEM. Synod of, 1672. The doctrines of Cyril Lucar were condemned by his successor at the Council of Constantinople, 1688, and again by the synod of Jassy, 1642. The metropolitan of Kiew, Petrus Moglias, also found it necessary to protest against those doctrines; and his confession was sanctioned, 1643, by the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Moscow. Thus an effective barrier seemed to be raised against the Calvinistic invasions of the Orthodoxy of the Eastern Church. Nevertheless, both the Reformers and the Catholic theologians continued to hint that the Greek Church had given up its insulated attitude, and was leaning respectively either this or that way. In the controversy between the Reformers, Jean Claude, and the Jansenists Nicole and Arnauld, concerning the Eucharist and transubstantiation, the former alleged, in support of his views, the dogma of the Eastern Church such as it appeared in its oldest form, and such as it had been revived by Cyril Lucar; while the latter appealed to the dogma of the Eastern Church in its ecumenical form. In 1660 the Patriarch of Jerusalem, Nectarius, published the so-called Shield of Orthodoxy (L'ecusson d'or), on Claude; and in 1672 his successor, Dositheus, convened a synod at Jerusalem for the purpose of still further defending the Orthodoxy of the Eastern Church. The synod was frequented by sixty-eight representatives, and resulted in the so-called Shield of Orthodoxy (Shield of Orthodoxy), Marat 20, 1672. — One of the most important confessional works of the Eastern Church. The first part is historico-critical, and contains a strong condemnation of the views ascribed to Cyril Lucar, JESUITS.

1. CONSTITUTION AND CHARACTER. - The Society of Jesus consists of four classes, — novices, scholastics, coadjutors, and professed. Novices are admitted only after a minute and searching examination of their character and social circumstances. The novitiate lasts for two years, which are spent in houses established for the special purpose. Time is there regulated from hour to hour. Reading, meditation, prayer, and devotional exercises, alternate with nursing in the hospitals, travels as beggars, menial services, and ascetic practices. A course of training is gone through which enables the novice to completely break his individual will, and prepares him to be a fit instrument for the will of the society. The term of probation ended, the novice takes the three monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and enters one of the colleges of the society as a scholastic. There he studies grammar, rhetoric, and literature for two years, and philosophy, physics, and mathematics for three; teaches three years in the classes of the college for five or six years; studies theology for five or six years, and finally completes his education by going through another novitate of spiritual exercises. The whole course of studies is very minutely prescribed. The oldest ratio studiorum dates from 1566. That agreed upon by the fifth congregation, and published in 1599, was in use until Roothaan, in 1832, introduced a new and reformed plan. After the second novitiate, the scholastic is ordained a priest, and becomes an active member of the society, either as coadjutor or professed, adding to the three common monastic vows the same other vow that of zealous devotion to the education of the young, in the latter, that of undertaking any task which the Pope might see fit to confide to him. There are, however, besides the regular professi quatuor vocatorum, also some professi trium ratorum; though it is not clear what thereby is meant, unless the expression refers to the so-called secret Jesuits.

At the head of the society stands a general (propositus generalis), who is represented in each province by a provincial (propositus provincialis), and in each individual establishment by a superior (propositus, or magister novitiorum, or rector).

The general is elected for lifetime by the congregation; that is, the assembly of the professed, which meets ordinarily only for the purpose of electing the general. He holds in his hands the whole administration, jurisdiction, and government. He appoints the provincials and all other officials, generally only for a term of three years; he decides about admission to or expulsion from the order; he receives at fixed times reports from all the provincials and superiors; and he investigates the state of the various establishments by special inspectors: he can give dispensation from the rules just as he sees fit, etc. His power is absolute. He is to the order what the Pope is to the Church, — the representative of God. Indeed, the cemem which holds the whole fabric together is implicit obedience. To the inferior his superior is the Christ, before whose commandment he must cancel his own will, his own intellect, his own natural mode of feeling. Every trace of individuality must be obliterated, unless the expression refers to the so-called secret Jesuits.

At the head of the society stands a general (propositus generalis), who is represented in each province by a provincial (propositus provincialis), and in each individual establishment by a superior (propositus, or magister novitiorum, or rector).

The general is elected for lifetime by the congregation; that is, the assembly of the professed, which meets ordinarily only for the purpose of electing the general. He holds in his hands the whole administration, jurisdiction, and government. He appoints the provincials and all other officials, generally only for a term of three years; he decides about admission to or expulsion from the order; he receives at fixed times reports from all the provincials and superiors; and he investigates the state of the various establishments by special inspectors: he can give dispensation from the rules just as he sees fit, etc. His power is absolute. He is to the order what the Pope is to the Church, — the representative of God. Indeed, the cemem which holds the whole fabric together is implicit obedience. To the inferior his superior is the Christ, before whose commandment he must cancel his own will, his own intellect, his own natural mode of feeling. Every trace of individuality must be obliterated, unless the expression refers to the so-called secret Jesuits.

At the head of the society stands a general (propositus generalis), who is represented in each province by a provincial (propositus provincialis), and in each individual establishment by a superior (propositus, or magister novitiorum, or rector).

The general is elected for lifetime by the congregation; that is, the assembly of the professed, which meets ordinarily only for the purpose of electing the general. He holds in his hands the whole administration, jurisdiction, and government. He appoints the provincials and all other officials, generally only for a term of three years; he decides about admission to or expulsion from the order; he receives at fixed times reports from all the provincials and superiors; and he investigates the state of the various establishments by special inspectors: he can give dispensation from the rules just as he sees fit, etc. His power is absolute. He is to the order what the Pope is to the Church, — the representative of God. Indeed, the cemem which holds the whole fabric together is implicit obedience. To the inferior his superior is the Christ, before whose commandment he must cancel his own will, his own intellect, his own natural mode of feeling. Every trace of individuality must be obliterated, unless the expression refers to the so-called secret Jesuits.
of its members and the elevation of their souls is done merely with an eye to some practical end. Science and art, religion and morals, are considered as tools or weapons for the rehabilitation of medieval Catholicism and the establishment of the reign of the Church over the State. The order has produced quite a number of reputed scientists, though hardly any of first, or even second rank. Science has an aim of its own, and so has the Jesuit. Whenever these two aims do not coincide, the Jesuit is compelled to leave science alone. He has succeeded best in those sciences which are most foreign to his own purpose, such as mathematics, chronology, interpretation of classical authors and ancient inscriptions; though in this last field he has been far surpassed by the Benedictines. On theology the order has exercised considerable influence. Mediaval dogmatists developed in different directions: not only scholasticism and mysticism presented sharply opposed views, but also, within the pale of the former, various schools were formed. With the Reformation arose quite a number of expositions concerning the great question,—justification by faith, or justification by good works, forming a transition between Protestantism and Romanism. All these stand-points had their representatives at the Council of Trent; but it was the Jesuits Lainez and Salmeron who finally succeeded in deciding the debate, and driving the dogmatists of the Roman Church back into the stiffest and most barren scholasticism. The dogmatical stand-point of the order may be characterized as that most directly opposed to Protestantism. The general outlines are derived from Thomas Aquinas; but the details are evidently treated with the conscious aim of producing a contrast to Protestantism. An inclination towards Pelagianism is apparent, and everywhere prevailing. Luis Molina went even so far as to ascribe to the natural will of man the power of fitting itself for actions which all were used to consider as the effects of divine grace; and justification he defined as the result of the equal co-operation of grace and free will. Still more characteristic is the Jesuitical system of morals. By its audacious unscrupulousness it finally beseem the rock on which the fortunes of the order were wrecked; and very early its limitation of si to conscious and voluntary transgressions; its doctrines of probabilism; of methodus dirigenda intentionis, which leads directly to the maxim, the end justifies the means; of reseratio mentalis, which destroys all faith between man and man; of amphibology, which may be made to cover any kind of falsehood, —made its adepts suspected, and even hated.

II. EARLY HISTORY, AND ACTIVITY DURING THE PERIOD OF RELIGIOUS RE-ACTION. — According to the ideas of the founder (see Ignatius Loyola), missions should be the true field of activity for the order,—foreign missions among the heathens, domestic missions within the pale of the Roman-Catholic Church, and missions for the conversion of the Protestants. The functions to which the members of the order had to adapt themselves were consequently preaching, teaching, and in all cases except those mentioned in the bull In caena Domini. By a bull of 1545 they were exempted from keeping the canonical hours, and afterwards, also, from participating in processions, and from other regulations infringing upon their time. Great obstacles, however, were also thrown in their way.

In Portugal they rapidly took root during the reign of John III. At Coimbra they founded their first college (1542), and Simon Rodriguez became its rector. The second they founded at Goa; and Francis Xavier made the Indian mission a great exploit. Under Sebastian, Rodriguez and the Jesuits actually governed the country. But in Spain they met with decided opposition from Melchior Canus, from the royal chaplain and librarian, Arias Montanus, and from others. Even Philip II. declared that the Society of Jesus was the only ecclesiastical institution he did not understand; and he continued maintaining a servile attitude towards them, even after seeing them at work in Belgium. The country was half Protestant when they entered it in 1542: it was exclusively Roman Catholic, when, half a century later on (in 1592), they pushed their outposts farther on into the United Netherlands.

Still greater difficulties they encountered in France, where for a long time they were looked upon with suspicion and antipathy. In 1540 Ignatius sent some young men to Paris to study; but in 1542, when the war with Spain broke out, they were compelled to leave the country. In the Cardinal of Lorraine the order found an energetic patron, but all his exertions in its behalf were baffled by the decided opposition of the Parliament of Paris and the Sorbonne. At the convention of Poissy, where he was present in person (1561), Lainez succeeded in getting admission for the order, but only on very precarious conditions. Thus it had to change its name, and call itself, after its residency in Paris, Collège Clermont. Its first stable and flourishing establishment in France it founded at Lyons. One of its priests, Edmond Angier, produced by his preaching such an excitement in that vicinity, that all Reformed ministers were expelled, all Reformed churches destroyed, and all Reformed books burned. As a monument of this great victory, the Roman-Catholic population built the order a magnificent college in the city. As the great task of the Jesuits in France was to stamp out the Reformation there, and rid the country of the Huguenots, they were naturally opposed to Henry IV., and intrigued against him, even after his conversion to Romanism. The result was, that they were expelled by the Parliament of Paris. They succeeded, however, in maintaining themselves in the circuits of the two southern parliaments, and they soon came to understand that they could do nothing, unless in alliance with the king. From that moment they labored zealously for a reconciliation between the king and the Pope; and afterwards, during the embroilments with Spain, they even espoused the interests of France. As a reward, Henry IV., gave to the Jesuits the residence of the university, the Collège Clermont permission to teach, not only theology, but also the... other sciences (1610), and he chose a Jesuit, Father Cotton, for his confessor. This was a great victory. At the same time, however, they suffered a great loss in a neighboring country. In Venice they were bitterly opposed by Fra Paolo Sarpi; and when, in 1608, Paul V., placed the republic under the interdict, they left the territory, together with the Theatines and Capuchins. But, when a reconciliation was brought about between the Pope and the republic, the latter made it a condition that the Jesuits should not be allowed to return, and even the Spanish ambassador had not a word to say in their favor.

The two countries, however, in which they achieved their greatest successes, and suffered their greatest losses, were England and Germany. The biographies of William Allen, Perron, Campan, and others, give an idea of their exertions in England. The country, together with James II. they were invited all to a magnificent college at the Savoy, London, and Father Edward Petre was made the private secretary of the king. But the result was the loss of the crown of England to the House of Stuart. In Germany, on the contrary, they really succeeded in producing a reaction which actually turned back the current of the Reformation. The first Jesuit, Le Jay, appeared in Germany in 1550, at the diet of Augsburg. He obtained permission from King Ferdinand to found a college in Vienna, and in 1551 fifteen Jesuits entered the Austrian capital. In 1552 Ignatius founded the Collegium Germanicum, for the education of German youths as missionaries, and in 1556 similar establishments were founded at Cologne and Ingolstadt, together with a school for young noblemen at Prague, to which the king sent his pages. In 1559 the Jesuits arrived at Munich, which city they soon transformed into a "German Rome;" and during the next years they spread rapidly along the Rhine and the Main.—Treves, Mayence, Spires, Aschaffenburg, Würzburg, etc.

The influence of their universities began to be felt as a counterpoise to that of the universities of Wittenberg and Geneva, and their schools were greatly admired on account of the consistent method of the teachers and the sure progress of the pupils. Even Protestants sent their children thither; and through his pupils the teacher noiselessly penetrated into the Protestant family, with fasting, rosaries, prayers to the Virgin, etc., following in his step. Very soon the order felt prepared to use force as a means of conversion, and consequently force was used. Duke Albert V. of Bavaria gave his Protestant subject the choice between returning to the Church of Rome, or leaving the country; as a ward of the Margrave of Baden, a minor, he extended the measure also to that country. Thus supported, the Jesuits accomplished the "reformation" of the two countries in 1570 and 1571. The example was followed in Cologne, Münster, Illidesham, Paderborn, Würzburg, and other places. In Austria the counter-reformation began in 1578. Consecration, exile, torture, etc., were the instruments. In 1603 the task was completed, and the workmen went to Bohemia and Hungary. The former country was entirely lost to Protestantism; in the latter, the progress of the Reformation was stopped.

III. DECAY AND DISSOLUTION. — After Ignatius Loyola, followed, as generals of the order, Jacob Lainez (1558–65), Francis Borgia (1565–72), Eberhard Mercurian (1572–81), Claudius Aquaviva (1581–1615), etc. During this period various attempts were made by the popes to alter the constitution. The monarchical organization of the society gave to the general a tremendous and, as it would seem, even dangerous power. Paul IV. demanded that the general should be elected, not for life, but only for three years; and Pius V., that the number of professed should be increased; and a steady influence on the government consented to the congregation. Foreign monarchs, the kings of Spain and France, had the same misgivings with respect to the order, and remonstrated with the Pope for an alteration of its constitution. Yes, denunciations of tyranny arose even from among its own members. (See MARIANA.) It required all the power, wealth, cunning, and discipline of which the order was possessed, to escape from these dangers. But, what the Pope had not been able to effect came gradually by itself. After Aquaviva, followed a number of incompetent generals. Unable to wield the tremendous power they held, they lived in comfort and splendor; and gradually the weakness of the centre transfused itself through the whole body. The professed followed the example of the general. From a phalanx of heroes, ready at any time to sacrifice, they changed into a swarm of intriguing diplomats, beset with all the vices of ambition and deceit. The ecclesiastical and educational functions of the order were left to the performance of young and inexperienced people; and the schools, once admired as model institutions of their kind, became dens of disorder and vice. Novices were admitted without due discrimination, mostly with an eye to their fortune; and when dotations grew scarce, while at the same time the needs and expenses of the order greatly increased, the order decided to engage in business. Commercial houses were established, and factories built, in all the most productive regions of the earth. Every college was transformed into a kind of banking-house, and undertakings of unparalleled magnitude were begun.

Thus the order changed character, and so did the world around it, but on the opposite principle; so that, the less the order was ready to give, the more the world insisted upon having. In their controversy with the Jansenists, in the middle of the seventeenth century, though the Jesuits succeeded in silencing their adversaries, they nevertheless suffered a severe defeat; for it was the ideas of the Jansenists which kept the ground when the battle was ended: and the odium and ridicule which had been thrown upon the Jesuits went on increasing, though fed by no visible hand. In the Chinese mission affair their moral reputation was much damaged. It seemed doubtful whether it was the Jesuits who had converted the Chinese, or the Chinese who had converted the Jesuits, to such an extent and the mission thus modified Christianity, and amalgamated it with heathen elements. Europe stood scandalized, and it came to an open breach with the Pope. Still worse fared their intellectual fame under the attacks of the Encyclopaedists. They were represented as the true type of obscurantism, and condemned as the most dangerous and most contemptible remnants of an entirely antiquated and inadequate state of affairs; and they had nothing to say in defence. Under such circumstances, they were at once implicated in the most vehement contests with the governments of Portugal, France, Spain, and Italy.

In 1750 Portugal and Spain made an exchange of certain territories in South America; but the inhabitants, who were known to walk blindly by the strings of their Jesuit priests and teachers, offered resistance, and met in the field, provided with European arms. It took eight years to put down the rebellion. Moreover, the great mercantile privileges and monopolies which the Jesuits held in Portugal caused continuous disturbances and losses to the commerce of the country; and as the complaints of Marquis Pombal in Rome had no effect, but were answered with an assault on the life of the king, the order was expelled Sept. 3, 1759. Its property was confiscated, and its members were shipped to the States of the Church. In 1760 Father Lavallette, procurator of the order, directed the Jesuits to sell the Jesuit establishments in the Island of Martinique, and a resident of France, made a heavy failure, of two million four hundred thousand livres; and the order refused to pay the debt, laying all responsibility on the shoulders of its procurator. The case was brought before the Parliament of Paris; and the examination of the constitution of the order, thereby occasioned, showed, that, in many points, it came in conflict with the constitution of France. For this reason the Parliament declared the order dissolved Aug. 6, 1762; and, after some haggling between the king and the Parliament, a royal decree of December, 1764, enforced the dissolution. On account of participation in conspiracies against the Spanish Government, all Jesuits, not only in Spain, but also in the Spanish colonies, were arrested during the night of March 31, 1767, and sent to Italy. Neither the Pope nor the general would receive them. After wandering about for several days on the open sea in overcrowded vessels, they were allowed to land in Corsica. Similar measures were introduced in Naples, Nov. 5, 1767, and Parma, Feb. 7, 1768; and when Pope Clement XIII. tried to come to the rescue of the order, and launched a bull of excommunication against its weakest enemy, the Duke of Parma, the French ambassador in Rome declared, Dec. 10, 1768, in the name of France, Spain, Portugal, Naples, and Parma, that, if the Pope did not retract, war would immediately be waged against him. This declaration literally killed Clement XIII.; but his successor, Clement XIV., dissolved the society by the bull Dominus ac Redemptor noster, July 21, 1773. The general, Lorenzo Ricci, was imprisoned in the Castle of St. Angelo, where he died in 1775. Clement XIV. died in 1774 from poison. Under the Pope the number of the Jesuits in Russia and Poland continued to increase, and the effect of their deeds of property in Russia, and in 1782 they chose a Pole to be their vicar-general. In 1800 they received the Roman-Catholic cathedral in St. Petersburg, and permission to found a college there; and by a brief of March 7, 1801, Pius VII. officially recognized the restitution of the order in Russia, and conferred the dignity of general on its chief. In 1804 King Ferdinand IV. of the Two Sicilies asked the Pope for the restoration of the order in his kingdom, and Pius VII. was only too glad to grant the request; but, as Naples was occupied by the French from 1806 to 1815, only the Island of Sicily could avail itself of the advantage. Finally, when, after the fall of Napoleon, Pius VII. returned to Rome, he summoned back the Jesuits, opened the Church of Gesù to them, and completely restored the order, "in accordance with the unanimous wishes of Christendom," as he said in the bull Solicitudo omniem ecclesiarum, of Aug. 7, 1814. This "unanimity," however, proved a mistake. In Russia, where Alexander I., in 1812, gave their college at Polotzk the rank of a university, and bestowed other great privileges on them, the Jesuits began to make proselytes among the members of the Russian Church, and to intrigue against the Bible Society, one of the emperor's favorite institutions. As a warning, they were banished from St. Petersburg and Moscow, Jan. 1, 1815. But they heeded not the warning: on the contrary, they tried their proselytizing talent even on the Russian army; and March 25, 1820, they were banished from the country "forever." Into Spain they were admitted by Ferdinand VII.; but when, in the civil war which broke out after his death (1833), they sided with Don Carlos, their college in Madrid was stormed by the people, July 17, 1834; and they were expelled by the regent, Queen Christina, July 4, 1835. In Portugal they sided with Dom Miguel, and were expelled (May 24, 1834) by Dom Pedro. In France they never obtained a legal position; but they were tolerated and even favored by Louis XVIII. and Charles X. At Lyons they founded a very flourishing college. They made their influence strongly felt on the whole middle stage of education,—that is, the stage between the elementary and the scientific education; and their number rose to four hundred and thirty-six, when the revolution of 1830 suddenly swept them out of the country. Under Louis Philippe they returned, as they did in France. Father Piagnan became the most fashionable preacher in Paris; but the popular animosity against them—brought to its highest pitch by É. Sue's romance, The Wandering Jew—compelled, in 1845, their own general, Roothaan, to recall them. Indeed, the only country which they really succeeded in bringing under their sway was Belgium. They were among the most prominent agents in the revolution which separated Belgium from Holland; and, when the former was constituted an independent kingdom, they took possession of it as a conquered province, and dominated for some time, not only in the Church and the school, but even in the civil administration and the court.
JESUITS.

One of the ideas of the revolution of 1848 proved very favorable to the Jesuits,—the separation of the Church from the State; and they were not slow in availing themselves of the circumstance. In 1849 the Roman-Catholic bishops of Prussia demanded, in the name of the revolution, free communication with Rome, full power of discipline within their Church, right of appointing priests and other ecclesiastical officers, unconditional power over the administration of the property of the Church, superintendence of all religious instruction in the schools, the seminaries, and the universities, etc. Friedrich Wilhelm IV. yielded in nearly all the points, and through the breach thus opened the Jesuits stepped into the country. By the concordat of Aug. 18, 1855, between Austria and the Pope, the order came into possession of the colleges of Linz, Leitmeritz, and Innsbruck, and in 1857 also of the academy and university of Vienna, whose students and professors were forced to hear sermons by the Jesuits every Sunday. In 1858 they directed a hundred and seventy-two out of the two hundred and fifty-six gymnasiums in Austria. But in these great successes the declaration of the dogma of papal infallibility made a fearful havoc. July 31, 1870, Austria cancelled the concordat; and the Papal demands of Prussia were made in the name of the revolution which separated Belgium from Holland, and domineered for some time in the country. By the concordat of Aug. 18, 1872, the Jesuits were banished. Austria, in 1849, had gained a foothold in the United States, whither they first came with Lord Byron, in 1799, they have several establishments, and are only valuable for the contrast they present to the canonical Gospels.

II. DOCUMENTARY SOURCES.—The sources of the history of Jesus are usually distinguished into biblical and extra-biblical, but in truth we can only speak of biblical sources. The notices of Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny, and of the later authors, Lampridius, Lucian, and Celsus; afford little matter, and hardly deserve a place in this category; and the Syriac letter of the Pagan Mara to his son Serapiam, written about 73 A.D. (ed. by Cureton, in Speculum Oramae, Lond., 1855), is at best an interesting witness to the spiritual power of Christianity at the end of the apostolic age. The letters of Abgar of Edessa, and the reply of Jesus, preserved by Eusebius (H. E., I. 13), would be exceedingly valuable, were they not unguenuine. Turning to the extra-biblical documents of Jewish origin, we have the apocryphal Gospels. The oldest and best of these, the so-called Hebrew Gospel, is very deficient in originality, compared with Matthew, and contains a profusion of historical inventions (Keim). The apocryphal Gospels were written between the second and seventh centuries, and were fantastic attempts to fill up the gaps in the life of our Lord, especially in the periods of his infancy, childhood, and passion, and are only valuable for the contrast they present to the canonical Gospels. The attempts of Lentulus to describe the appearance of Christ, the brass statue of Christ and the woman with the issues of blood at Panas, described by Eusebius, belong to a still lower plane. Of more value are the descriptions some of the Fathers of the first two centuries give of Christ's experiences and words; in particular the account which the Epistle of Barnabas gives of the battles (5), the resurrection and ascension (15), etc. Extra-biblical accounts of Jewish origin might be expected in the writings of Philo and Josephus. The former, an Alexandrian Jew, completely ig-
The celebrated passage of Josephus (Antiq., XIII, 3, 3) hardly deserves to be regarded as genuine, although it is found in all the manuscripts, and is noticed by Eusebius (H. E., II. 11). At all events, it is not genuine as it now stands. The references to Christ's superhuman nature, resurrection, etc., betray the hand of an early Christian interpolator. Paulus, Olshausen, Gieseler, Hase, Reuss, Ewald, and others, hold this view,—that the passage has been tampered with, but is in part from the hand of Josephus. After the middle of the second century, the Jewish writings took notice of Jesus, but only to malign his character. Celcus and Porphyry both drew from these sources. He was described as the child of an adulterous connection of his mother with the soldier Panthera, as having been trained by Egyptian sorcerers in all kinds of magical arts, etc. These malicious falsehoods were collected in the Talmud and in the Book of the Origins of Jesus Hannozi.

The student of the life of Jesus of Nazareth is, therefore, almost exclusively shut up to the New Testament, especially the Gospels. In spite of the attacks of modern criticism, these four biographies are generally acknowledged to be genuine, the first three dating from the period preceding the destruction of Jerusalem (70). Each has its own characteristics. Matthew depicts Christ as the promised Messiah and the son of David. Mark portrays him as the Son of God, who established his Messianic mission by miraculous deeds. Luke describes him as the Saviour and revealer of truth, sent from God to save and enlighten all peoples. John differs very materially from the other evangelists, by exhibiting more of the inner life and thoughts of Christ. The other writings of the New Testament are as valuable as witnesses to the truth of the gospel narratives and their picture of Christ which they presuppose. They corroborate many individual traits, the Acts giving an account of the ascension (i. 6-11) and an otherwise unrecorded saying of our Lord (xx. 35); while Paul makes a valuable addition to the New Testament Scriptures. When he began his ministry, he was able to teach with authority, and not as the scribes (Matt. vi. 47). His baptism by John also contributed to prepare him to inaugurate his public activity in the spirit of a divine consciousness. He who was without sin submitted to the water-baptism of repentance (Matt. iii. 11), in humble obedience to the law (Matt. iii. 15) and voluntary condensation. But it was not till after this conflict with the prince of this world that he inaugurated his public activity in the world, for the purpose of establishing his kingdom in it. From this time forth he manifested forth his higher gifts and powers, and in the first instance with the design of establishing the nucleus of the Church.

3. Plan and Methods of the Messianic Activity of Jesus. — The hypothesis that Jesus had a definite plan before his mind when he began his public activity has been given up by some modern theologians (Schleiermacher, Ullmann, Kahnis, etc.); but it is evident that Jesus in no wise became identified with them, or their instructions, or he could not have subsequently directed so many scathing rebukes against the "Pharisees and scribes." But he must have studied the Old-Testament Scriptures. When he began his ministry, he was able to teach with authority, and not as the scribes (Matt. vii. 29). His baptism by John also contributed to prepare him to inaugurate his public activity in the spirit of a divine consciousness. He who was without sin submitted to the water-baptism of repentance (Matt. iii. 11), in humble obedience to the law (Matt. iii. 15) and voluntary condensation. But it was not till after this conflict with the prince of this world that he inaugurated his public activity in the world, for the purpose of establishing his kingdom in it. From this time forth he manifested forth his higher gifts and powers, and in the first instance with the design of establishing the nucleus of the Church.
JESUS CHRIST.

had a definite Messianic plan. Our Lord himself seems to declare this, in an indirect way, in parables (Luke xiv. 28-33), and in discourses to his disciples of his hour, which had not yet come (John ii. 4), of the bread of life (John vi. 51), etc. The majority of the parables about the kingdom of heaven show a progress of ideas, and indicate the same thing. The main periods of his public activity are the Galilean ministry, lasting more than two years; a ministry of four months, beginning with the mission of the seventy, and spent between Galilee and Judaea; and the last, lasting from the beginning of the passion-week to the ascension. The methods which Jesus used during these three periods were substantially the same. A distinction is justly made between his miraculous and teaching activity; but it must not be overlooked that many of the miracles had a deep symbolical meaning (as the restoration of the blind to sight), and that Jesus frequently followed the working of a miracle with words of instruction. The miracles must be regarded as sustaining an intimate connection with his divine-human personality. They were not mere evidences for overcoming unbelief, but were signs of the higher Messianic life of Christ, and prophetic pledges of the glorious future of the kingdom of heaven. From this point of view the miraculous activity was a necessary accompaniment of all the three periods of his life. The form and contents of the teaching of Jesus changed to this extent, that, in the earlier part of the Galilean ministry, there was more of legal precept, but later more of prophecy and promise. The discourses preserved by the synoptists are predominantly parabolic and gnomic; those preserved by John, allegorical and symbolic. The synoptists contain more of teaching about Christ (doctrina de Christo); John, more of the teaching of Christ (doctrina Christi).

4. The Galilean Ministry.—(a) Cooperation with John the Baptist. The ministry of Jesus was not yet concentrated in Galilee. John alone gives an account of the incidents of this period before the imprisonment of the Baptist, which Mark (i.14) and Matthew (iv.12) mention as the occasion for his going to Galilee. The main incidents belonging here are the choice of some disciples from the body of John's followers (John i. 35-51), the purification of the temple, in which he for the first time manifested his opposition to the leaders of the Jewish people (John ii. 13-25), and the conversation with Nicodemus. Here, also, belongs the first exhibition of his miraculous power at Cana of Galilee (John ii. 1-11), and a short visit to Capernaum (John ii. 12). At the end of this period he turned again to Galilee, holding on the way the conversation at Jacob's well with the Samaritan woman (John iv. 4-42). Harmonists differ as to whether this conversation precedes or follows the miracle at the pool of Bethesda (John v. 1-17), as well as John's imprisonment. In the former case, Jesus must have returned yet once again to Judea before John's imprisonment.

(b) To the Death of John and the Mission of the Twelve.—The characteristic of this period, which includes the most of the Galilean miracles, consists in the gradual selection of the twelve disciples, and the large masses of people who gathered him at the Lake of Galilee. The length of this period cannot be determined with certainty, on account of the difficulty of deciding whether the miracles of John iv. 47-54 and v. 1 sqq. belong here, and because it is somewhat doubtful whether the passover of John vi. 4 is the only one that fell in this period. The main incidents were as follows: after being re-elected at Nazareth (Luke iv. 16 sqq.; Matt. iv. 13), where he formed a number of miracles. Here belongs the choice of the disciples in the stricter sense (Matt. iv. 18-22, etc.), followed by the solemn instructions of Matt. v.-vii. (Mark iii. 13; Luke vi. 17 sqq.). Between this Sermon on the Mount and the mission of the twelve (Matt. x. 1 sqq.) occurred many remarkable cures, such as the centurion's servant (Matt. viii. 5-13; Luke vii. 1-10), and other miracles, such as the stilling of the storm on Lake Galilee. Here, also, belongs the raising of Jairus' daughter (Matt. ix. 19-25), and that of the widow of Nain's son (Luke vii. 11-17), which must have occurred soon afterwards. Matthew places at this time the discourses and parables of chaps. xii., xiii., which Mark and Luke break up into parts, and give in other connections. But the three synoptists agree again in their accounts of the miracle of the five loaves, and the walking on the lake, which they put in connection with the news of the Baptist's decapitation. John also joins in with the synoptists at this point. (c) The Last Summer in Galilee. — This period is marked by a growing conflict with the unbelieving Galileans, who have forgotten their once enthusiasm, and especially with the Pharisees. This opposition obliges Jesus to retire frequently to desert-places, and even to pass at times beyond the confines of Galilee. The period lasts from the passover of John vi. 4 to the feast of tabernacles (John vii. 2); that is, through the summer and fall. Among the main incidents were the condemnation of the Pharisees (Matt. xv. 1-20), the visits to the regions of Tyre and Sidon and Caesarea Philippi, the confession of Peter, the first definite announcement of the crucifixion (Matt. xvi. 13-23), the transfiguration, the journey to the feast of tabernacles (John vii. 8-10), and the procession of the child as an illustration of fitness for the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xviii. 1 sqq.).

5. The Extra-Galilean Ministry.—During the winter months previous to the passion. Luke (ix. 51—xviii. 30) gives the most elaborate account of this period; but all three synoptists (Mark x. 1, 32; Matt. xix. 1) agree in describing the last departure of Christ from Galilee as a particularly important and solemn event. Jesus set his face towards Jerusalem, but first touched upon Samaria (Luke ix. 52-59), and labored in Peræa (Matt. ix. 1; Mark x. 1). The mission of the seventy belongs here (Luke x. 1-20). Much that Luke narrates in these chapters may not be put in chronological order; but it is likely that Jesus repeated some of his discourses, as the model prayer (Luke xi. 1 sqq.). John mentions some of the journeys of Jesus to Jerusalem at this period, to the feast of tabernacles (x. 22-29), to Bethany at the death of Lazarus (xi. 7 sqq.), and to the last passover (xi. 54). We do not pretend to be able to arrange in more definite chronological sequence the incidents and discourses of Luke ix.—xviii. Besides running parallel with Luke at this point, in some cases Matthew and Mark add, towards the close of the period, the reply of the Master to the question about divorce (Matt. xix. 1-12; Mark x. 2-12), the parable of the laborers in the vineyard (Matt. xx. 1-10), and the conversation with the mother of John and James (Matt. xx. 20; Mark x. 35). On the other hand, John narrates the raising of Lazarus from the dead (xi. 1 sqq.), and the retirement of Jesus to Ephraim to escape the murderous plans of the rulers of the people (xi. 34 sqq.).

6. The Passion and the Resurrection.—The Pharisees and chief priests, who had been enraged, by the resurrection of Lazarus, against the Galilean prophet, now witnessed a growing enthusiasm on the part of the people in his favor. In Jericho he healed Bartimaeus, and was the guest of Zaccheus. At Bethany he was anointed by Mary with costly nard, which was the occasion for Judas to murmur, and for our Lord to predict his speedy death (John xii. 1-11, etc.). On the following day, Sunday, he entered Jerusalem, amidst the hosannas of the people, who hailed him as the Messianic king (John xii. 12-19, etc.). He spent the following nights at Bethany, and the days in teaching at the temple or by the way-side, or in disputing with the representatives of Pharisaism and Sadduceism. After spending Wednesday at Bethany, he despatched Peter and John to Jerusalem to prepare the passover, which he partook of with his disciples on Thursday (see below). In the account of this general scene, the synoptists linger upon the institution of the Lord's Supper, while John dwells upon the introductory act of the foot-washing and the consolatory discourses and prayer which followed the institution. All four evangelists detail the recognition and departure of the traitor, and the prediction of Peter's denial. Then followed the departure to Gethsemane and the agony (narrated only by the synoptists), the approach of the priests, and the arrest of Jesus. Meanwhile Pilate hoped to escape the necessity of so doing by sending him to Herod Antipas (Matt. xxvii. 12-14, etc.), but on his return yielded, though reluctantly, to the demand of high priests and people for his crucifixion. Jesus was then scourged, and nailed to a cross outside the walls of Jerusalem, on which he hung for six hours, giving up the ghost at three in the afternoon, amidst a darkening of the sky, the rending of the veil of the temple, and the confession by the centurion that he was the Son of God. After his death he was laid in a new tomb by Joseph of Arimathea, from which he rose in the early morning of the third day. He appeared first to Mary Magdalene, then to Peter, and during the afternoon to two disciples on their way to Emmaus, and in the evening to ten of his disciples. Eight days later, on the first day of the week, he appeared again to the disciples. Then he directed them to make a remarkable confession of his faith in the risen Lord and his divinity (John xx. 24-29). Four other appearances are narrated (the appearance of 1 Cor. xv. 7 being, as is probable, the same as that described in Matt. xxvii. 51; Mark xvi. 19), at the last of which, on the Mount of Olives, near Jerusalem, he was received up into heaven (Acts i. 9—10; compare Luke xxiv. 51; Mark xvi. 19).

III. Chronology of the Life of Christ. 1. Day and Year of Birth.—There are six dates in the Gospels which are of greater or lesser value in fixing the time of Jesus' birth. (a) The visitation of the Baptist, the occasion of Joseph's journey to Jerusalem. (b) The notice of John ii. 20, that the temple had been forty-six years in building, has also been used, but does not give any exact results. (c) The same may be said concerning the enrolment under Quirinius (Luke ii. 2), which was the occasion of Joseph's journey to Jerusalem (d) We get a better datum from the service of the priestly course of Abijah, to which Zacharias belonged (Luke i. 5). This was the eighth of the twenty-four courses which served in the temple a week at a time. We know that the evening before the destruction of Jerusalem (9th Ab, 823 of the city of Rome), the first course began its service. This would give us the 17th to the 29th of April, or the 3d to the 9th of October, of 745 as the time when Zacharias had the vision of the angel. Jesus' birth, occurring fifteen months thereafter, would have happened in 749, or five years before the beginning of our present era. This calculation is based upon the supposition that there had been an interruption in the priestly sequence and ministration of the priestly courses from the time of Judas Maccabeus to the destruction of Jerusalem. (e) Of most value is the calculation which starts out with the date of Herod's death in 750 of Rome (Josephus). The king died soon after the command to destroy the children of Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 16). This would give us 749, or 4—5 B.C., as the year of Christ's birth. (f) Another calculation has been based upon astronomical facts compared with the star of the magi. Kepler, in his De Jesu Christi vero anno natalliio (1600), took up this method, and found that a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in Ophiuchus, which he rose in the early morning of the 4th of April, or the 9th of October, of 745, or 4—5 B.C., was the time of the year in which the magi appeared. This configuration would also give us 4 or 5 B.C. as the year of Christ's birth. The date cannot be fixed with absolute definiteness; but it may be regarded as reasonably certain that it fell about halfway between 747 and 753 of the city of Rome.

2. Duration of the Public Ministry.—John expressly mentions two passovers as occurring during Christ's life. The first (John ii. 20) happened in 750 of Rome, Jesus having begun his ministry the autumn before. The second passover is mentioned in connection with the feeding of the five thousand (John vi. 4). The synoptists speak of only one passover for the whole period of the ministry, and would seem, for this reason, to regard it as having lasted only one year. This was the view of many of the early Fathers, who adduced in confirmation the expression, "the acceptable year of the Lord" (Isa. lxi. 2; Luke iv. 19). Keim has recently revived this theory; but it is inconsistent with some expressions in the synoptists themselves, as the last words over Jerusalem (Mark xi. 11 sq.), etc. Two passovers, then, occurred during the Lord's public ministry, and a third at its close, which therefore lasted from two years and a half to three years. This conclusion rests upon the view that the feast of John v. 1 was not a passover, as Irenæus, Luther, Grotius, Tholuck, etc., held, but one of the other Jewish feasts. Jesus began his ministry in the summer or fall of 28 A.D. (779 R.), and was crucified in the spring of 29 A.D. (762 R.).

3. Day of the Crucifixion.—The evangelists agree in describing the crucifixion as having occurred on Friday. The universal tradition of the ancient Church followed this view. The synoptists seem to indicate that this Friday was the first day of the passover, or the 14th of Nisan, and clearly distinguishes the Lord's Supper from the usual paschal meal which took place on the evening of the 14th (xiii. 34), the intimate relations with the family at Bethany, which seem to call for frequent visits to it (compare Luke x. 38 sqq. with Mark xi. 11 sq.), etc. Two passovers, then, occurred during the Lord's public ministry, and a third at its close, which therefore lasted from two years and a half to three years. This conclusion rests upon the view that the feast of John v. 1 was not a passover, as Irenæus, Luther, Grotius, Tholuck, etc., held, but one of the other Jewish feasts. Jesus began his ministry in the summer or fall of 28 A.D. (779 R.), and was crucified in the spring of 29 A.D. (762 R.).

4. The Period after the Resurrection.—Neither the arrangement of Paul in 1 Cor. xv. 3—8, nor those of the evangelists, are to be regarded as decisive. Jesus had intercourse with his disciples for forty days after the resurrection (Acts i. 3). At first sight we might conclude, from Luke xxiv. 50 sqq., that Jesus ascended on the evening of the day of the resurrection. The whole passage, however, is to be regarded as a summary statement of the history of the resurrection and ascension. But on the basis of it and other passages (John xx. 17), an early Church tradition (Ep. of Barnabas, c. 15), Kinkel, Greve (D. Himmelfuhr unseres Herrn, etc., Hanover, 1868), and others, have assumed that there were repeated ascensions.

Lit.—(Compare especially the extensive treatment of Hase, in his Geschichie Jesu, pp. 110—174).

1. The early Church did not attempt an historical treatment of Christ's life in the real sense, but contented itself with poetic representations and labors on the Harmony of the Gospels. The oldest Harmonies are those of Tatian (about 170), Ammonius of Alexandria (about 220), and the later imitations of Bishop Victor of Capua (about 550). The poetic representations are either lyrical, as the Apotheosis of Prudentius, and the Hymnus acrostichus, etc., of Sedulius; dramatic, as the libellus paschalis of Gregory Nazianzen; or epic, as the Hist. evangelica of the Spanish presbyter C. Vettius Aquilinus Victorinus (about 880), the Greek paraphrase of the Gospel of John by the Egyptian Nonius (fifth century), and the heroic poem of the miracles (Mirabilium divinorum... Carmen paschale) of Claudius Sedulius (about 450).

2. The middle ages produced harmonies of the Gospels, in the old High German rendering of the Harmony of Victor of Capua in the ninth century (ed. Schimmel, Vienna, 1841), and the Monotessaron of Gerson (Augsburg, 1471), which was based upon thorough investigations, and almost inspired by a critical spirit. They also produced poetical treatments at the beginning of the period in epic verse, like that of the Saxon Cadmon (about 680), the Heliand (about 820), and the one by Otfried (in rhyme), and, towards the close, in dramatic verse, the passion plays. The middle ages gave birth to the first Lives of Christ for practical purposes, and enriched with legendary matter, the book of the passion, which was first printed about 1480 (English translation by Hutchings, London, 1881); Ludolphus de Saxonia (a Carthusian in Strassburg about 1380): Vita J. Chr. e qua tor Ev. et scriptoribus orthodoxis concinna, Strassburg, 1470, last edition, Brussels, 1870; Simon de Cabria (an Augustinian in Florence): De genti Domini, Italian, Florence, 1496, Latin, Basel, 1517; Xavier (nephew of Francis Xavier): Hist. Christi, first written in Portuguese, then translated into Persian for missionary purposes, Latin translation, Lugd., Batavia, 1639.

3. Modern Times (down to the beginning of this century).—The Literature of the Gospels [see HARMONY] and of poetic representations continues. Of the latter we mention here Hugo Grotius: Christus patiens, last edition, Tübingen, 1712; Klofstock: Messias, 1748; Latatzer: Jesus Christus [1783—86], and Fontius Pilatus [1792—96, 4 vols.], for purposes of edification were published in the pale of the Roman-Catholic Church by Martin v. Cochem (3d ed., Regensburg, 1862), and the Pud Catharine Emmerich (d. 1824), D. butte Leiden una. Herrn J. Christi, new edition, Regensburg, 1858; and within the Protestant Church, in English, by JEREMY TAYLOR (London, 1635), READING (London, 1718; new ed., 1852), [JOHN FLEETWOOD (about 1770)]; and in German by CRUEZBERG (1714), BOGATZKY (1754), etc. A large number of works of this class in the latter part of the century by SCHULER, NÖSSEL, MARBEINCKE, v. AMMON (the last two in the form of Commentaries), were first used in the interest of sheernegation of the historical creditibility of the first part of the Gospel history by the Deists of England,—Woolston, Chubb, and others. Introduced into Germany, it was applied by REIMARIUS (d. 1708): Fragmenta eines Ungenannten (edited by Lessing, 1777; BAHRT: Briefe u. d. Bibel, etc., Halle, 1782, and Ausführung d. Planes Jesu, 12 vols., Berlin, 1784 sqq. (less hostile to Christianity); VENTURINI: Natürliche Gesch. d. grossen Propheten o. Nazaren, Copenhagen, 1790–92. Bahr and Venturini to some extent anticipated the so-called naturalistic method of explaining the miracles; but it afterwards found its chief representative in PAULUS (d. 1851), in his Commentaries on the Gospels, and in his Life of Jesus, Heidelberg, 1829. 2 vols. These hostile tendencies were opposed by LARDNER, STACKHOUSE, P ALEY, etc., in England, and DÖRSDER (Nürnberg, 1778, 2 vols.). SEMLER (Beantwortung d. Fragmente u. Ungenannten, Halle, 1780), REINHARD (Wittenberg, 1781, 5th ed., 1830), HERDER (Vom Erlöser, etc., and Von Gottes Son, etc., 5 vols., Riga, 1796 sqq.). JACOB HESS (Lebensges. Jesu, Leipzig, 1788; 7th ed., Zürich, 1823, 3 vols.).

4. Recent Times. — The studies of the life of Christ of the last fifty years, both on the part of the negative (denying Christ’s divinity) and the positive and believing schools, have been conducted upon critical principles, and with freedom from doctrinal prepossessions. This period may be denominated the critical and scientific period. SCHLIEERMACHER’S Lectures, delivered in Berlin for the first time in 1819 (published 1861), and K. HASE’S Lectures, delivered for the first time at Tübingen, 1833 (published 1829; 5th ed., 1885; and, under the title Geschichtliche Darstellung d. christl. Leben Jesu, Regensburg, 1843 sqq., 4 vols. [2d ed., 1865]; BUCHER: D. Leben J. C., Stuttg, 1859; Bishop DUFANLOUT: Histoire de notre Sauveur Jésus Christ, Paris, 1870. Against the criticism of the Tübingen school (Tendenzkritik) have appeared EWALD: Gesch. Jesu u. seiner Zeit (vol. v. of his History of Israel), 2d ed., 1857 [English translation, Camb., 1865]; RIGGENBACH: Vorlesungen über d. Leben Jesu, Basel, 1858. Against Renan, Schenkel, Keim, etc., have appeared LÜHRDT: D. modernen Darstellungen d. Lebens Jesu, Leipzig, 1884; WEIZÄCKER: Untersuchungen über d. evang. Gesichte, etc., Gotha, 1884; FRESSENSÉ: Jésus Christ, son temps, sa vie, son œuvre, Paris, 1865 [English translation, Lond., 1866; 7th ed., 1879]; WIESELTIER: Beiträge zur richtigen Würdigung der Evangelien, Gotha, 1889. See also ELLICOTT: Historical Lectures on the Life of our Lord Jesus Christ, Lond., 1860 (5th ed., 1889); [S. J. ANDERSON: Life of our Lord, N. Y., 1884; English translation, Edinburgh, 1885]; B. WEISS, Berlin, 1882; and SCHAFER (Schweinfurt, 1884; English translation, Edinburgh, 1883–84), 3 vols.; A. EDERSHEIM, London, 1883, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1886; W. BEYSCHLAG, Halle, 1885 sqq. Popular Lives, rather than scientific, by JEREMY TAYLOR...
JESUS CHRIST. 1176 JESUS CHRIST.

For the works upon the theological and moral aspects of Christ's life, see C. ULLMANN: Die Sterndeutung Jesu, Hamb., 1826 (?ed. 1863; translated into German, French, and Dutch); Professor J. R. SEELEY: Ecce Homo, Lond., 1866 [English trans. from 7th ed., The Sinnlosigkeit Jesus, Edinb., 1870; GESS: Christi Person u. Werk, Basel, 1870-79, 2 parts; SCHAFF: The Person of Christ, Bost. and N.Y., 1865 (12th ed. rev., N.Y., 1882; translated into German, French, and Dutch); Professor J. R. Seeley: Ecce Homo, Lond., 1866 (vol.i, 1871), CROSBY (N.Y., 1871), DEEMS (N.Y., 1872).

As recent works upon the theological and moral aspects of Christ's life, see C. ULLMANN: Die Sterndeutung Jesu, Hamb., 1826 (?ed. 1863; translated into German, French, and Dutch); Professor J. R. Seeley: Ecce Homo, Lond., 1866 (vol.i, 1871), CROSBY (N.Y., 1871), DEEMS (N.Y., 1872).

life was a holy and spotless sacrifice, and, on the other, that he submitted himself to death, which was the punishment of sin. He, therefore, was the substitute for our guilt and punishment; for the future, as for the past, the atoning sacrifices of the Old Testament was that of vicarious substitution. Christ's death had not a whit of the nature of a suicide. It was his priestly and holy life which caused his death. His sacrifice was a priestly one, just because he remained faithful where fidelity led him into the jaws of death.

But from Christ's death the crown of thorns is inseparable, and from the crown of thorns his royal dignity. He did not refuse, in the day of his humiliation, the title of "Son of David" (Matt. ix. 27, xxii. 9 etc.); for he was really so, and he declared himself to be such (John iv. 26; Matt. xxii. 42 sqq.). He did not exercise his royalty as the masses wanted him to do, but he manifested it in his acts. As a reward for the royalty of his priestly self-abnegation, he was crowned with the crown of glory (Phil. ii. 9, 10; Heb. ii. 9), and has a right, as king, to his people (1 Sam. xii. 13); for the lands due to him are given to him (John xvii. 6), and shall partake of his glory (John xvii. 22, 24, 26).

From the above considerations it will be seen that the threefold division of Christ's work is essential to the scriptural representations of him. But, apart from the fall and redemption, this threefold office develops out of the very idea of a mediator. If man had not sinned, there would have been a development. In this case, would there not have been an incarnation? To deny this would mean nothing more nor less than that the fall was an absolutely indispensable stage in the development towards perfection, which could not have happened without sin. If the proposition be true,—no apostasy, no Christ,—then sin is an advantage, a conclusion which would be the grave of all the first principles of Christian ethics. God would have revealed himself to the race, even if there had been no apostasy. He would have then revealed himself through a prophet to lead men to higher stages of knowledge, through a priest who would offer himself up a living offering to the good of every individual, and through a king as the leader of men.

Christ combined these three offices, and, as the Word, led sinful man out of his error, darkness, and falsehood, and revealed to him the law and the grace of God. As the holy, priestly offering, he removed the curse of sin from the world by himself bearing it in our stead. As the king, he reigns in heaven. The exercise of these three offices was not confined to any special periods in Christ's public life on earth, nor is it limited to any special period in his glory; for he continues at all times to be the exponent of the Father to the world, the world's intercessor with the Father, and the head of his Church.

G. E. STEITZ.

JETER, Jeremiah B., D.D., b. in Bedford County, Va., July 18, 1802; d. in Richmond, Feb. 25, 1880. He entered the Baptist ministry in 1822, and occupied a very prominent position. He was, perhaps, more widely known in the United States than any other Baptist minister; but the greater part of his ministry was spent in Richmond.

JE'ETHO. See Moses.

JEW, The Wandering. The legend of the Wandering Jew appeared for the first time in German literature in a small pamphlet, Kurze Beschreibung und Erzählung von einem Juden mit Namen Ahasuerus, 1602. Before that time no trace can be found of it in Germany; and it is quite evident, that, for instance, neither Luther nor Hans Sachs knew any thing about it. The pamphlet pretends to be a report of an interview between Paulus von Eitzen, bishop of Sleswick, and the Wandering Jew, which took place in Hamburg, 1542. According to Von Eitzen's report, Ahasuerus is the name of the Wandering Jew; and he was a shoemaker in Jerusalem at the time of Christ. When Jesus, on his way to Golgotha, passed by his house, he stopped for a moment, and leaned against the door-post; and when Ahasuerus pushed him aside, and bade him to move on, Jesus said to him, "I will stand here and rest, but thou shalt go on until the last day." From that moment Ahasuerus found rest nowhere. Wandering about from place to place, he has been seen in Spain, Germany, and other places, as later editions of the Kurze Beschreibung report.

In the English and French literatures the legend appeared about four centuries earlier, though in a somewhat different shape. Matthew Paris, an English monk who lived in the monastery of St. Alban in Paris, and died 1259, tells a story about a certain Cartaphilus, which he claims to have heard from an Armenian bishop who visited London. According to this story, Cartaphilus was a door-keeper in the palace of Ptolomey; and, when Jesus was led out to be crucified, he struck him, and said to him, "Go, Jesus: go on faster." To which Jesus replied, "I go, but thou shalt wait till I return." Afterwards Carthaphilus was baptized by Ananias, assumed the name of Joseph, and settled in Armenia, where he was still living when Matthew Paris wrote his Historia Major. The same story is repeated in the Chronique Rime'e, by Philippe de Thaon, who was bishop of Tournay, and died in 1283.
JEWEL. 1178

Against the identity of these two representations, it has been argued that Carthophilus was not a Jew, but a Christian, and probably, before baptism, a Pagan; that he was not perpetually wandering, but comfortably fixed in Armenia, etc. [But transitions as comprehensive and vital as this, from the door-keeper of the thirteenth, to the shoemaker of the sixteenth century, are often met with in legends and popular tales, in their wanderings through several centuries and from one people to another; and the explanations which Karl Blind has given of several features of the transition (Gentleman's Magazine, July, 1880) are at least suggestive. He derives the name Ahaseurus from the Teutonic As-Vidar, the only god who should survive the destruction of the world, and who should avenge the fall of the Asses by thrusting his foot, well beshod, down into the throat of the wolf Fenris.]

LIT. — F. BASSLER: Vom ewigen Juden, Berlin, 1870; F. HELBIO: Von ewigen Juden, Berlin, 1874; CHARLES SCHOEBEL: La légende du Juif-errant, Paris, 1877; P. LAVAYSSE: La légende du Juif-errant, Limoges, 1878; GASTON PARIS:
Le Juif-errant, Paris, 1880; M. D. CONWAY: The Wandering Jew, Lond., 1881.) CARL BERTHEAU.

JEWEL, John, Bishop of Salisbury; the fore-mest apologiical writer of the English Church, and its literary representative in the first years of Elizabeth's reign; was b. in Buden, Devonshire, May 22 [24], 1522; d. at Monkton Farleigh, in his diocese, Sept. 23, 1571. He entered Merton College, Oxford, at the age of thirteen, and was placed under the tuition of Parkhurst, afterwards bishop of Norwich, from whom he received the principles of the Reformation [and who directed him to compare Tyndale's translation with the version of Coverdale]. He was an excellent Greek scholar, and in 1540 graduated from Corpus Christi College. [He was in the habit, as a student, of rising at four in the morning, but suffered, during his university career, from a rheumatic affection, which left him lame for life.] He acted as Reader in Humanity and Rhetoric [and after 1551 cared for the cure of Sunningwell, near Oxford]. In 1549 he heard Peter Martyr, and became an advocate of the Reformation. When Mary ascended the throne in 1553, he was expelled from his college as a diligent hearer of Peter Martyr, as having taken orders according to the liturgy of Edward, and preaching heretical doctrines.
In spite of this, however, he was chosen university orator, and in this capacity had to pen a letter congratulating Mary on her accession. In a mo-moment of weakness he gave his consent to Romish articles, but, repenting, fled to the Continent in 1555. Arriving at Frankfurt, he made a public recantation on the first Sunday after his arrival ["so far was this saint of God from accounting sophistry any part of the science of salvation, or justifying any equivocating shifts which are daily hatched in the school of antichrist." — FEATLEY, Life of Jewel, 1609]. Most of his time on the Continent, Jewel spent at Strassburg and Zürich, in the most intimate intercourse with his old teacher and friend, Peter Martyr.

On the death of Mary, in 1558, Jewel returned to England [in January, 1559, was appointed preacher at St. Paul's Cross]; and in March we find him at Westminster, where he was a representative of the new views, engaged in debate with eight representatives of the old views. He was afterwards appointed to visit the churches in the western part of England, and on Jan. 21, 1560, was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury. He was at first reluctant to assume the canonical vestments, which he called "theatrical" and "ludicra ineptiae," but overcame his scruples at the advice of Bullinger and Peter Martyr.

Soon after returning from the Continent, he issued a challenge from the pulpit of St. Paul's Cross, in which he asserted that any of the papal errors could be found in the writings of the Fathers.
This precipitated controversies with Dr. Cole and Mr. Harding, to which we owe his distinguished apologetical work, Apologia Ecclesiae anglicanae, which appeared in 1562 ["to the abundant establishment of this Reformed Church upon an antiquity." — STRYPE]. This work, which was one of the most learned and important contributions of the sixteenth century to theology, was soon diffused throughout Europe, and translated into Italian, Spanish, French, German, Dutch, Greek, and Welsh. The English translation (1564) was made by Lady Anna Bacon, the wife of Sir Nicholas. It was considered of such importance, that the Council of Trent appointed two bishops to answer it. The most able of Jewel's opponents in controversy was Thomas Harding, who had been professor of Hebrew at Oxford, under Henry VIII. Jewel replied to his attacks in several writings, the principal of which appeared in 1567, under the title Defence of the Apology [which appeared in an enlarged form in 1570]. Harding found in it a number of errors, falsehoods, evasions, etc., and replied in the Detection of sundry foul errors.... He also addresses a treatise on the fifth of his year; [and Thomas Fuller, speaking of the event, quaintly says, "It is hard to say whether his soul or his ejaculations arrived first in heaven, seeing he prayed dyeing, and died praying)].

Jewel's Apology is the most perfect expression of the peculiar position of the English Church.
It is divided into six parts, and refutes the charges of heresy, godlessness, libertinism, apostasy from the Church, etc. In the doctrinal treatment he shows the influence of Calvin and Peter Martyr; and in the articles on the Person of Christ, the Power of the Keys, and the Sacraments, he is in perfect agreement with them. On the other hand, the doctrine of predestination is wanting; and in regard to justification, he says that our salvation depends entirely upon Christ, and not upon works. He makes no distinction between the visible and invisible Church. He teaches that there are three orders, but defines their functions in a Calvinistic sense, and grants to laymen the exercise of ministerial duties in cases of necessity.
The statement is repeated again and again, that the English Reformation was only a return to the old true Catholic Church of the first centuries; and the change of innovation he repels by affirming it of the Roman-Catholic Church, which had forsaken Christ and the Apostles and Fathers. The Scriptures are the ultimate rule of faith; and the Fathers are not our spiritual "lords, but our leaders" (non sunt domini, sed duces nostri).

Among Jew's old works, were A Vision of the souls sent into Exile by Pius V. in 1569 [excommunicating the queen, 1582], Sermons, an Exposition upon the Two Epistles to the Thessalonians [1833], and many Letters to Peter Martyr. [Jewel had, perhaps, no superior in the realm of patriotic scholarship among the English clergy of the Elizabathan period. His works are a thesaurus of quotation, "his margin being painted for his second coming in glory. In these books, however, we may see progress. James most exactly represents the Jewish-Christian stand-point; Jude forms the transition to Peter; Peter to Paul; and the Revelation is the connecting link between the Jewish-Christian and the Johannine types of doctrine.

The whole position of Jewish Christianity at this time was provisional. The council had not settled its relation to Christianity in general. It was plain that it must either enter the stream, and lose its individuality, or else narrow into a mere sect; for, even in Paul's lifetime, the supposition that the Gentile Christians would gradually accept the Mosaic law became untenable. Two causes hastened the decisive change,—the increasing speed of conversions among the Gentiles, and the increasing hardness of the Israelites against the gospel. But exactly when the Jewish Christians were forbidden the temple was not determinable: they would scarcely be tolerated in it down to the destruction of the city. It must have been a trying time for the converts, and many, doubtless, chose to give up the Messiah rather than their people and the old religion. The Epistle to the Hebrews, written at this period, gives us a hint of this perplexity. The final separation between Jewish Christianity and Israel may be set down as taking place when Hadrian ordered all Jews to leave Jerusalem; for, after the destruction of the city by Titus (A.D. 70), many had returned, and a Jewish-Christian episcopacy had been established. For the after-history of these believers see Ebionites. See also Jerusalem and the cognate articles. Uilhorn.

Jews. See Israel.

Jews, Missions amongst the. Although the kingdom of God was designed, according to the predictions of the prophets, to be co-extensive with the whole earth, nevertheless, Jesus confined his activity to Israel, and enjoined on his disciples not to go in the way of the Gentiles (Matt. x. 5). It was not till he was about to depart from the earth that he commanded them to go into all the world (Matt. xxviii.19). The Twelve, however, directed their efforts, in the first instance, to the Jews; and the earliest Christian congregations were composed entirely of Jews, and proselytes to Judaism. Apostolic missions among the Jews were so successful, that Paul could speak [about 58 A.D.] of myriads of converted Jews (Acts xxii. 20); and we are safe in computing their number at twenty-five thousand at least. A large number of priests were also obedient to the faith (Acts vi. 7); and in the congregations which Paul founded in Asia Minor and Greece the nucleus was Israelites. Wherever he went, whether to Cyprus, Macedonia, or Corinth, he proclaimed the gospel first in the synagogues.

The conversion of the Jews was not last sight of in the second or third century, as is proved by the dialogue of Justin Martyr with the Jew Trypho, and Tertullian’s work Adversus Judaeos. But the spirit of the Christian Church had long since followed a heretical tendency by insisting upon Jewish peculiarities of religion and nationality, and by submitting to the rankest Gnosticism. Deprived of their political power and national autonomy, the Jews concentrated their whole spiritual life upon the study of the law, and produced the Talmud. As long as the temple stood, Judaism still preserved much of its Mosaic cast, although leavened by Pharisaism. But the transition from Mosaic to Talmudism opened a chasm between Jews and Christians, which made an impartial examination of Christianity on the part of the Jews impossible. From the very beginning, the spirit of the Talmud drew a veil over their eyes (2 Cor. iii. 13–16), and will continue to hold it there until it itself disappears. The whole history of Jewish missions confirms this. They are successful only among the sect to whom they preach with the Talmud.
JEWS.

I. ROMAN-CATHOLIC MISSIONS AMONG THE JEWS. — The ancient Church did not institute special measures for the conversion of the Jews, although it was always inspired by a wish to win them for Christianity. The love of Christ, and other motives, led to this activity. Cassiodorus, when he became a monk, felt called upon to urge the Jews to repent in his Exposition to the Psalms (comp. Ps. lxxxi. 13–16), and will continue to hold it there until it itself disappears. The whole history of Jewish missions confirms this. They are successful only among the sect to whom they preach with the Talmud.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300–40), born a Christian, but the descent of a Jew, and of a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.
itself with the general subject; and the proselyte Theobald, professor of theology, delivered in 1416 a discourse before it. The Council of Basel (1431) and Milan (1563) all took up the subject. Very numerous have been the proselytes, learned noble and rich, who since the sixteenth century, in Italy, have accepted the faith, and held high offices in the Church.

The history of missions among the Jews in England is singular. It happened, that, under William Rufus, the Jews complained because so many of the brethren became Christians. The king wanted to force them to return to Judaism, but the fidelity of the proselytes withstood him. About 1290 Richard, prior of Bermondsey, built a hospital of converts. The Dominicans in Oxford opened a similar institution. The last two, priests in the diocese of Lyons, were commissioned by Pius IX., and have since labored in France among the Jews. The most extensive work, however, is carried on in Christian lands,—a consequence, in part, of the expectation of the near end of the world. It was Lewis Way, a rich clergyman of England, who was the first to give his time and means for the promotion of this object. With Professor Simon of Cambridge, Leigh Richmond, the proselyte Fry, and others, he founded, in 1808, the London Society for the Promotion of Christianity among the Jews. In 1815 it came exclusively under the patronage of the Church of England. Way travelled through Holland, Germany, and Russia, to improve the social, political, and religious condition of the Jews; and he was successful in inducing the czar, Alexander I., to promise, in 1817, his special protection, as well as lands, to baptized Jews. In 1814 the Duke of Kent laid the corner-stone of a church for the Jews, with which was afterwards associated a school for the children of proselytes, a college for the training of missionaries, etc., which gave the block the name of Palestine Block. In London and other places there were many baptisms; so that some proselytes were in 1832 seriously thinking of a Hebrew Christian Church, which, fortunately, was not founded. In 1880 this society had twenty-eight stations in England, 695 adults and 729 children have been baptized. At all English stations, in seventy-two years, 3,350 Jews have been baptized.
Among the other missionary societies for the conversion of the Jews are the following:

1. The Church of Scotland, established in 1840, with twenty-six laborers, amongst whom are seven proselytes, laboring at six stations in Turkey and Egypt. (2) The British Society, established in 1842, and made up principally of dissenters. All its laborers are proselytes. One twenty-seven in number, working at nineteen stations in England, Hungary, Russia, Turkey, etc. Its organ is the Jewish Herald. In 1879 fifteen Jews were baptized. (3) The Mission of the Jews, establishe

4. The Presbyterian Church of Ireland (twelve workers), the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland (in Spain and in Algiers), and the Presbyterians in England (two stations in London), carry on missions. (5) The London Missionary Society, established in 1804, employs four missionaries, and in 1879 six Jews were baptized. The Presbyterian Church of Ireland, established at Leipzig, 1849, has one missionary. Professor Delitzsch is the soul of this society, and has done much for its work by his masterly translation of the New Testament into Hebrew. The Vestphalian Society, established in 1879, trained three missionaries for the prosecution of missions among the Jews. It is connected with the Episcopal Church, with Rev. C. Ellis Stevens (32 Bible House) as its secretary, was organized in 1878, and has an income of seven thousand dollars. There are, however, some independent workers among the Jews, as Rev. Jacob Freshman, himself a convert, who holds weekly services in New York (1882). These societies, which number in all more than twenty, employ about 270 workers, of whom about one-half are of Jewish extraction. The average yearly number of baptisms is 626, of which 65 occur in the Protestant Church, and 461 in the Greek. A hundred thousand is a fair estimate of the number of Jews who have accepted Christianity since the beginning of the century.

JEZEBEL.

1. JEZEBEL (נְשֵׁי אֵלֶּה, "chaste"), a daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians (1 Kings xvi. 31), was the wife of Ahab, king of Israel, and one of the most unscrupulous, and at the same time energetic, queens of history. She espoused the cause of Adonijah. Solomon, however, ascended the throne. He at first spared Joab, but subsequently was led to change his mind, and, when he fled to the altar of the sanctuary, had him murdered (1 Kings ii. 28-34).
JOACHIM OF FLORIS.

JOACHIM OF FLORIS. Very little is known with certainty of the life of this remarkable man. The biography which Jacobus Grecus Sylvanæus, a monk of the monastery of Flore, published in 1612, is very little reliable, in spite of the author's appeal to elder documents; and the notes of his friend and secretary Jacobus have not come down to us in their original form. He is said to have been born at Calicium, a village near Cosenza, in 1145, and to have been brought to the court of Roger II. of Sicily when he was fourteen years old (Roger II., however, died in 1154). After a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, he became monk, and afterwards abbot, of the Cistercian monastery of Corace in Calabria. (See Janauscheck: Origin. Cisterc., Vienna, 1877, i. p. 168.) But he afterwards left that place, and retired, with his friend Rainerus, to the mountain solitudes of Sylye, near Cosenza. There he built a new monastery (St. Joannis en Flori), of which he became abbot, and into which he introduced a set of rules more severe than those of the Cistercians. The monastery was confirmed as an independent institution by Celestine III., and became the mother of several other similar establishments. Three popes — Lucius III., Urban III., and Clement III. — took an interest in his prophetico-apocalyptical studies; and in a document drawn up in 1200, and containing the names of his works,— Concordia utriusque testamenti; Expositiones in Apocal.; Pсалterium; Contra Judæos; Contra Cathol. Fid. Adversaria, of which the two last have perished,— he admonished his brother-abbotts to lay his works before the Pope, and obtain his sanction. He died between September, 1201, and June, 1202.

The first point in which Joachim drew down upon himself the censure of the Church, though not until after his death, was his polemics against the scholastic exposition of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity by Petrus Lombardus. The Lombard's definition of the divine essence seemed to him to lead to a quaternity; but, in his attempt to escape from this error, he himself fell into a kind of tritheism, which was severely censured by the Fourth Council of the Lateran, 1215 (Mansi: Concil. xxii. 981). Of still graver import were those speculations which developed from his eschatological views, and which finally assumed a decidedly anti-Roman and anti-churchly tendency. Joachim taught that there had been a reign of the Father from the creation to the birth of Christ, and a reign of the Son, which should come to an end in 1290, and be followed by a reign of the Holy Spirit. These views were adopted by certain groups of the Franciscan order, and gave rise to the idea of an everlasting gospel, which should supersede both the Old and the New Testament. The Introductiorius in Evangelium Eternun, written by Ghehardinus de Burgo Sancti Domini, and published in Paris, 1254, made an immense sensation, and caused a still further development of the apocalyptical ideas of Joachim. See GHEOBA: Histoire de l'Abbe Joachim, Paris, 1745, 2 vols; RENAN: Joachim de Flore et l'Evangile éternel, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, 1866; and PREGER: Evangelium Eternum, 1874. W. MOLLER.

JOAN, Pope, a fable in which hardly anybody now believes, and whose whole interest consists in its origin. It is first mentioned by Stephen of Bourbon, a French Dominican, who died in 1261; but it did not spread among people until it became inserted (for in the oldest manuscripts it is not found) in the Chronicle of Martinus Polonus, a much used text-book. According to this interpolation, she resigned for more than two years, and died in 855, from bearing a child while walking in a procession through the streets. See Ditzinger: Die Pabsfabeln des Mittelalters, Munich, 1863; English translation, Fables respecting the Popes in the Middle Ages, New York, 1872, pp. 3-74.

JOAN OF ARC, "the Maid of Orleans" [whose name was properly Joanneta Darc, or d'Arc; but probably "d" did not at that time imply nobility]; b. at Domremy, which was then partly in Champagne, and partly in Lorraine (now part of Germany, and called, in honor of its illustrious daughter, Domremy-la-Pucelle). France invaded by Burgundy, she was burned at the stake, in Rouen, May 30, 1431. Her life may be divided into three periods: (1) her development, and call to her departure for Vaucouleurs in her eighteenth year; (2) her career of fighting and defeat, until her death. In all these periods she is one of the greatest heroines in history; in the second a recognized seer, unmistakably called of God; in the third an enthusiast, but genuinely pious and noble, whose exit constitutes a tragedy most thrilling and elevated.

In order to understand her work, a word must be spoken upon the then state of the country now called France. By the help of Philip of Burgundy, the English had overrun all the country north of the Loire, as well as Guienne. France had fallen to pieces. The queen-mother Isabella had the Duke of Burgundy upon her side, and the two had taken Paris. She had disinherited her son (1422), his brother, the Duke of Bedford, came over to France as English champion, was received by the Parisians, and besieged Orleans (1428). Meanwhile Charles VII., who had been crowned at Poitiers, was idly looking at the destruction of his kingdom; but, unknown to him, God was preparing a deliverer.

1. In the little village on the Maas, amid beautiful scenery and under favorable parental auspices, a girl was growing up. She learned from her mother the traditional creed, and forms of prayer. She drank in the tales of fairies and saints and devils which the simple folk so often told. One saying, attributed to Merlin, made quite an impression upon her: France shall one day be destroyed by a woman, and be saved by a virgin from the borders of Lorraine. The people about her had decided that the destroyer was the queen-mother Isabella, and at last she believed herself to be the restorer. She grew up to womanhood skilful in woman's work, especially in needlework, shy, shunning, indeed, all amorous looks and words, ignorant of reading and writing, but wise in divine things, loving the
JOAN OF ARC.

Church and its services, tender toward the poor and toward children,—a maiden pious, brave, obedient. It should be remarked that her village was for the dauphin, while the neighboring village was for Burgundy. One day, in her thirteenth year, she was fasting in her father's garden (it was about noon), when suddenly she heard a voice which she learned was that of St. Michael. She then saw him and the angels who attended him. At a subsequent time she heard the voice of the archangel Gabriel and the saints Catherine and Margaret. These all urged upon her one duty,—to help the king to save France. She shrank in terror from their command. For five years she was visited almost daily, and often more than once a day. At last the news came of the siege of Orleans. She could no longer refuse obedience. Impelled by an overmastering sense of duty, she broke through the lines of paternal authority, left Domremy, and repaired to Vaucouleurs. Thus ended the first period of her existence.

2. Then followed the epic of her life. By persistence she secured from Robert de Baudricourt, the governor of Vaucouleurs, an introduction to the dauphin, at Chinon. The journey thither was perilous; and, for safety's sake, Joan wore male attire. But the hardest part of her work remained for her to do. She grandly succeeded, however, overcame the doubts of the king, removed all prejudices, filled the troops with her courage, and started the king and his army towards Orleans. She rode by the king, clad in armor, carrying an ancient sword, which she had found by revelation hidden near the altar in the Church of St. Catherine de Fierbois, and a banner of her own design, under the guidance of St. Catherine, on one side of which was a representation of God seated upon his throne, and holding the world in his hand; on the other side a picture of the annunciation. Arrived at Orleans, she was able to enter it April 29, 1429; and the siege was raised May 8. Other victories followed. The English were driven beyond the Loire. Then the king was induced by her to go to Rheims, and there be crowned. On the way thither, Troyes was captured. Rheims was entered July 16, and the coronation took place the next day. The maid's work was now accomplished. The heavenly voices ceased to speak to her, and well had it been if she had gone quietly back to her father's flocks. But it could not be. She was now the idol of the army, the savior of her country; and king and council would not hear of her going.

3. Thus, amid shouts of victory, the final period of her life was ushered in. But she was altered. Her head was turned. She had become an enthusiast. The court and the army had also changed respecting her. They obeyed no longer her guiding voice. They defied her. She was not now a leader, but a god,—sure sign that her mission was over. She went with enthusiasm on martial expeditions; but she was no longer personally invulnerable, nor a synonyme of victory. On the contrary, she fell, wounded in the thigh, while unworthily attacking Paris, Sept. 8; later she was wounded again before Orleans, and the army sustained another defeat. On Dec. 29, 1429, she and her family were ennobled with the surname of Du Lis. About this time she wrote a threatening letter to the Hussites to repent of their heresy, or else she would draw sword against them. She also announced her ambitious dreams of releasing the Duke of Orleans, freeing the Holy Land from its usurpers, ending the papal schism, and giving the Papacy to its rightful claimant. But, while such visions floated before her eyes, her "voices" told her that she would be taken prisoner. In her distracted frame of mind she mistrusted the voices. She went in March, 1430, to defend Compiègne against the Duke of Burgundy. On May 24 she was captured on a sortie. Great was the triumph of the English, and Paris broke out in rejoicing. The sorceress had been caught. Joan was taken to the fortress of Jean de Luxembourg. Contrary to the warning of St. Catherine she learned was that of St. Michael. She was sentenced to be burnt as a witch. Terrified at the prospect of such a frightful death, she recanted, saying, that since the churchmen had found that she had not received visits from saints, as she had previously asserted, she would not make the assertion any more. It is said that she smiled when uttering the sentence of recantation, and signed the formula with a naught, but then, under guidance, the English both of her and her companions were considered suspicious. In consequence of the recantation, her sentence was mitigated to imprisonment for life. The English were furious, but were consoled by the assurance that she would yet be burnt. A trap was cunningly laid for her destruction. A suit of iron over the coat was hung in her cell. She put it on, thinking thus to be better protected from the soldiers' insults. But the action was interpreted as a relapse into her former sinful disobedience to divine command, and she was again tried and condemned. This time she could not escape. The sentence of death, after the first outcry, was patiently borne. She appealed from the bishop (Pierre Cauchon) to God; stood at the stake, the heretic's cap upon her head, pressing to her heart a rude wooden cross which a pitiful Englishman had made for her; spoke a word of sympathy for Rouen; cleared the king of all responsibility for her destruction; called upon her saints and her Saviour; and perished amid the flames. Her ashes were thrown into the Seine.

The king whom she had crowned made no effort to help the king to save France. She shrank in terror from their command.
to free her, thinking, perhaps, he was well rid of her. But it was not long, before her death, under sentence of the Inquisition, was considered a veritable martyrdom.

In 1149, the king ordered a revision of her trial. Proceeding examined by the bishops and the inquisitor Calixtus III., on demand of France, had the pretended impostor examined and interrogated. But it was not long before her death, under sentence of the Inquisition, was considered a veritable martyrdom.

The persons beheld are proof but what it was needed to restore France to her great mission. In them and in the general tenor of her life we see the providence of God. Since God had chosen her to be the savior of France, he chose also the means of inducing her to play the part. The persons beheld are proof of this. Why did she not see the Virgin Mary, St. Dionysius, and St. Mary Magdalen, the guardian of France? And whom did she see? The arch angel Michael, who was the victorious angel of the covenant, the guardian of the people of Christian nationality; St. Margaret, the dragon conqueress, who was the guardian of Christian virginity; and St. Catherine, who was the guardian of the university of Paris, and had been successful in converting learned people and rulers generally. Now, nationality, purity, and power to convert royal persons, scholars, and soldiers, were exactly what was needed to restore France to honor. Joan resembled, somewhat, Swedenborg and other seers. But her saints punished her, and she did penance. They came back after her recantation, and then she no longer resisted them, but died in testimony of their reality.

A curious phenomenon, which proved the reversal of feeling in favor of Joan, was the appearance, in 1436, of a false Joan, who told the story that some other woman had been burnt for her. Many believed the impostor. She married Robert des Armoises about 1439, and died about 1444, having previously confessed her imposture.

Joan of Arc is thus described: "She was of medium height, stoutly built, but finely proportioned; and her frame was capable of enduring great fatigue. The most authentic testimonies represent her as less comely than many in her own station. Her features expressed rustic honesty and innocence rather than mental power; but her eyes were large, melancholy, and lit up with her enthusiasm, indescribably charming. Her voice was powerful, but sweet; and her manner possessed a fine natural dignity and grace, which, while it recalled familiarity, impressed and subdued even the rudest of the soldiers."

The Book of Job is a product of the Chochuma literature of the ancient Hebrews. All the features which distinguish the Proverbs, Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes, from the prophetic books, are found in it. It is the product of an age of reflection and of art, and does not lay claim to being a historical work. It contains, however, an historical tradition which the author worked over. The proper names do not contain a trace of a symbolic purpose; and pure invention of stories was not a custom of antiquity.

Luther said, "I hold the Book of Job to be a record of facts; but, that every thing happened just as it is recorded, I do not believe," etc. The author does not once refer, even indirectly, to the law, religion, or history of Israel; but he does not ignore his Hebrew standpoint. In the narrative portion, God is called Jehovah; but in the rest of the book he is, for the most part, called Eloah, or by the patriarchal designation Shaddai. It is noticeable, that only the most ancient form of heathen worship, the worship of the stars, is referred to (xxxi. 26-28), and that he intentionally avoids the divine name, Lord of Hosts, which was characteristic of the period of the kings.

The book discusses a theme which has interest for the race without regard to nationality, and is the Melchizedek among the books of the Old Testament.

Job lived in the land of Uz (probably the Hauran); but the time is not indicated. The high age (a hundred and forty years) to which the patriarch attained (xlii. 16) points to a very early period; and this explains why only one kind of money (xlii. 11; comp. Gen. xxxiii. 19), and only the three most ancient musical instruments are mentioned (xxi. 22, xxx. 31; comp. Gen. iv. 21, xxxi. 27). A hero of pre-Mosaic times suited the author's purposes best, as ignorance of the God of Israel after the possession of the land by Joshua, would have been regarded as a sad deficiency. Job was a just man, who was plunged from great prosperity into the depths of suffering. He was himself unable to solve the mystery of this sudden change. The attempt was made by his friends, who only increased his trials. They sought to console him by insisting that suffering is invariably the punishment of transgression; but he continued to assert his innocence, which Jehovah himself finally confirmed (xlii. 8). The mistake of the comforters was, that they failed to distinguish between different kinds of suffering and its cause. Job's sufferings were not punitive, but a trial which he was called upon, as the instrument of Jehovah, to endure. His friends cannot think of suffering without sin, and, instead of offering words of sympathy, heap up exhortations to repentance. But there is a kind of suffering which does not proceed from God's anger, but from his love, and has the design to test and perfect the piety of a righteous man. This is the lesson the Book of Job is meant to teach.

After Job's conversation with his three friends, and the renewed protestation of his innocence, Jehovah himself appears on the scene to solve the problem. But, before this occurs, a certain Elihu, the husband, appears, and interjects four wise speeches (xxxii.—xxxvii.): He was a young man, who had up to this time been restrained by considerations of modesty from entering into the conversation. He now censures Job for justifying himself at the expense of God, and the three friends for having had such an influence on the mind of Job. Elihu does not get beyond the thoughts of these friends, and regards Job's sufferings as a divine course of discipline, which will issue in his destruction unless he repents. The thought is the same as that which Eliphaz had before expressed (v. 17). Instead of treating Job as a righteous man, he treats him as one who deserved his sufferings, and whom only blasphemous pride and ignorance deterred from repentance. He has no word of sympathy. He does not make any reference to Job's patience. His answer is no less frigid and formal than that of the three friends. Jerome and Gregory Hutt (De Deo) ed. Leime v., refute the impression of Elihu's speeches. The former saw in him a representative of a false and irreligious philosophy; the latter, a self-confident and vain babbler. Herder shared the same view when he said, "Elihu, a young prophet, assuming, audacious, wise in his own conceit, he heaps up figures without meaning, and appears as an empty shadow. For this reason no one replies to him." These discourses did not originate with the author of the rest of the work. Their diction, and method of thought, are against this supposition. Every reader of aesthetic sensibility must feel, when he comes to chap. xxxii., that he has entered a different atmosphere. There is a striking contrast between the assumed paths of this portion of the book and the massive strength of the rest. The language affords no proof that it belongs to a later period of composition than the book as a whole; but there is a fundamental difference in the style, and the impression cannot be avoided that the poet is far behind the writer of the rest of the book in ability. We miss the bold and sublime figures and the ideal thoughts which well up in the reader of aestheticsenibilit must feel, when he gets beyond the thought, are against this supposition. Every every time the poet was a false and irreligious philosopher. In the dedication of his Commentary on Job, calls it a tragedy, and justifies the designation from the fact that persons are represented in it as talking, that their speeches are characterized by outbursts of passion, and accusations, of longing for death, and justification before God. The poet of the Hebrew poet is, in fact, no less a tragic hero than the Edipus of Sophocles. Here Jehovah takes the place of immutable fate. The hero is overwhelmed with mysterious afflictions. He contends with God like a Titan; though, to be sure, all is only the ghostly creation of his mind. The true God finally declares his innocence. But in the mean time his friends prove merciless judges; and nature and grace, fancy and faith, defiance and humility, fill Job's heart. The book does not end with the destruction of the hero by fate, but the end of the hero forever destroys the notion of fate. In the development of this train of thought, the author uses the most elevated style possible. Figure follows figure: all that nature and man can present of the sublime and the massive here passes before us. The contents are draped in the garments of the night, yet flash forth with glorious light. "The diction of the Book of Job is the work of one author," says Luther, "is magnificent and sublime as no other book of Scripture." The greatest poets of all times, especially Shakespeare and Goethe, have drawn from it. Jacobi well said, that, whether the work be history or invention, the poet was a seer of God. [Thomas Carlyle in his chapter on Mahomet in his Heroes and Hero-Worship, says, "I call the Book of Job one of the grandest things ever written with pen. One feels, indeed, as if it were not Hebrew, such a noble universality, different from noble patriotism or sectarianism, reigns in it. A noble book, almen's book! It is our first, oldest statement of the never-ending Problem,—man's destiny, and God's ways with him here in this earth. . . There is nothing written, I think, in the Bible or out of it, of equal literary merit." Mr. Froude calls it a "book which will one day, perhaps, when it is allowed to stand on its own merits, be seen towering up alone, far above all the poetry of the world."]

This masterly composition cannot be placed before the reign of Solomon. Oehler, Riehm, Dillman, and others, put it after the reign of Solomon. But I cannot agree with them; for no work belonging to the Chochmah literature can compare with Job in classical style, except the Song of Songs, and this is Solomonico. The abundant references to natural history and scientific knowledge in general in Job are explained by the broad, extensive relations of Judaea to other parts of the world under Solomon, to Phoenicia, Egypt, Chaldea, and Babylonia. The relation to the other books of the canon also points to this date. The utterances concerning the future are not only the same in tenor, but also often identical in form, with those of the psalms of David's and Solomon's reigns. (Compare Ps. xvii. 15, lxxviii. 10 sq.) In the telling language of Friedrich von Schlegel, Job belongs to the Old Testament books of longest after the future. The doctrine about wisdom in Proverbs (i. 9, 18) declares for the priority of the treatment of the subject in Job (xxviii.). Both authors speak in form, with those of the psalms of David's reigns. (Compare Ps. lxxxviii. 10 sq.) In the telling language of Solomon in Job, in Short Studies on Great Subjects; W. B. Hiob, translated by Professor L. J. Evans, in Lange's Commentary, with a rhetorical version by Professor Tayler Lewis, 1874; Canon Cook, in Speaker's Commentary, Lond. and N.Y., 1874; C. F. Robinson: Homiletical Commentary on the Book of Job, London, 1876; ROGGE: Hiob, der Gemeinde dargeeboten, Erlangen, 1877; J. K. Burr: The Book of Job (intended for popular use), New York, 1879 (incorporated in Whedon's Commentary, New York, 1881); D. Thomas: Problematica mundi: the Book of Job practically and exegetically considered, London, 1878 (2d ed., 1879); Samuel Cox: The Book of Job, London, 1880; H. Clarke: Job, London, 1880; G. L. Studer: Das Buch Hiob, Bremen, 1881; Bishop Wordsworth (new edition, London, 1881). See also Ewald: D. Richter d. A. B. (his Job was translated London, 1882); Hupfeld: Com. in quosdam Jobedos locos, Halle, 1883; J. A. Proude: The Book of Job, in Short Studies on Great Subjects, W. H. Green: The Argument of the Book of Job unfolded, New York, 1874; Budds: Beiträge z. Kritik d. B. Hiob, Bonn, 1876; Barth: Zur Erklärung des B. Hiob, Leipzig, 1876; Ancisi: Job et l'Egypte, Paris, 1877; Raymond: The Book of Job: essays and a metrical paraphrase, New York, 1879; Ginsbrecht: Der Wendepunkt des B. Hiob, cap. 27 u. 28, Berlin, 1879; Commentaries on Job by G. H. B. Wright, London, 1883; A. B. Davidson, 1884. For further literature, see Delitzsch and Lange.)

Jobson, Frederick James, D.D., b. at Lincoln, 1812; d. in London, Jan. 3, 1881. He was articled to an architect, but subsequently ordained to the Wesleyan ministry in 1834; rose to eminence, and became president of the conference in 1889. He was a man of great usefulness, and wrote, besides some devotional books, Chapel and School Architecture as appropriate to the Buildings of Non-conformists, London, 1850; America and American Methodism, 1857; Australia, with Notes by the Way on Egypt, Ceylon, Bombay, and the Holy Land, 1862. Joéel (יהוה, Jehovah is God), the second of the Minor Prophets. From the contents of his prophecy we are led to conclude that he belonged to the kingdom of Judah, and was in Jerusalem at the time of his prophetic activity. He prophesied in the first thirty years of the reign of Josiah (877–847 B.C.). The usual reasons given for this view are the following: (1) Amos had Joel's prophecy before him (comp. Amos i. 2 with Joel iii. 16); (2) Joel had the hard fate of Jerusalem and Judah under Joram fresh before his mind, and makes no mention of the Syrians, which he certainly would have done, had he lived after Hazael's campaign against Jerusalem at the end of the reign of Josiah (2 Kings xii. 18 sq.); and (3) he refers to the temple services and priests (i. 9, 13, ii. 14, 17), which points to the worship of Jehovah, which was restored under Josiah, and retained for thirty years of his reign. This is the view of
JOHN THE APOSTLE.

Hitzig, Erdal, Keil, Delitzsch, and others. Hengstenberg, Knobel, and others place his activity under the reigns of Jeroboam II. and Uzziah (when Amos prophesied). Merx regards the prophecy as a Midrash written after 445 B.C.; [and Professor W. Robertson Smith, in the Encyclopædia Britannica, puts it in the period after Ezra, and adds a confirmation of this view in Joel's reference to the walls of Jerusalem, chap. ii. 7, 9]. The pre-exile date rests, above all, on the "freshness and originality of Joel's description," "the classical form of the prophecy," the fact that it was in the hands of Amos, and the general character of its contents, which not only do not refer to the Syrarians, but presuppose a healthful religious condition for Judah.

The occasion of Joel's prophecy was a terrible locust scourge, which combined with a drought to completely devastate the land. In the first part (i.-ii. 17) the prophet describes the devastation and the calamities, and the people are exhorted to repent and fast. This call must have been heeded (ii 18, 19). In the second part (ii. 19-iii. 21) he predicts prosperity and blessing. This prediction refers to the near future in the destruction of the enemy, etc., and to the far future in the outpouring of the Spirit of Jehovah and the judgment of the world. At the time of the latter, all nations will be gathered to the Valley of Jehoshaphat. The scourge of locusts is to be interpreted literally, and not allegorically, as Jerome, Hengstenberg, Haverick, [Lowth, Pusey] do. The main argument for the allegorical interpretation is the name which is given to the army of locusts (ii. 20). It is designated as the "northerner." The locusts usually start from the deserts of Asia and Africa, and pursue a northerly course; and it might seem at first more accurate and natural to explain it of nations. But locusts are also found in the Syrian desert, and might well be blown in a southerly direction without passing over Mount Lebanon. However this may be, the remainder of the description militates against the allegorical interpretation, and also the fact that not a trace of a reference can be found to a hostile invasion before or afterwards in the book. There is no ground for calling in question the Joelicness and originality of Joel's description, "the classical form of the prophecy," the fact that it was in the hands of Amos, and the general character of its contents, which not only do not refer to the Syrarians, but presuppose a healthful religious condition for Judah.

The vision of the day of the Lord in Rev. xix. 1 is robable that he was a disciple of the Baptist for he knew the high priest (John xviii. 15). It had some means (John xix. 27), and seems to have been of better connection than the other disciples, although some speak with confidence on this point. He was the first to receive the Spirit when he saw the Holy Ghost descending upon Jesus, who was John's nearest friend and chief disciple. The question of his mission seems to have been decided in favor of Peter, but he was afterwards called the "apostle of love," because love is a controlling conception in his system.

I. LIFE AND CHARACTER OF JOHN. — Among the apostles, by far the most prominent are John, Peter, and Paul. Compared with Peter, impulsive and quick of action, John was of a quiet, thoughtful, and receptive temperament. He treasured up the words of the Lord in his heart, and lost himself in the contemplation of his glory. When Jesus speaks, he does not ask, "What shall I do? Shall I draw the sword against Malchus? Shall I build three tabernacles?" but rather, "What does He do? What does He speak?" It is due to this attitude that his memory, like a mirror, reflected the inner life of the Lord, and retained whole discourses entire. The peculiar majesty and glory of Christ was certainly not hidden from the eyes of the other disciples; but John alone was competent to reproduce them in a vivid description. The other evangelists preserve those discourses and acts of Jesus which produced greater visible effects at the time,—the miracles, the Sermon on the Mount, which brought together a large throng. John preserves incidents, which, though equally important, were not accompanied with so much display,—the conversations with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman, and the discussions in the temple. There is more resemblance between John and Paul. They are both of thoughtful, reflective disposition; but Paul's mind assumes a logical and dialectic form. John is contemplative only. Paul dwells upon the sinner's appropriation of salvation, John upon its author; Paul upon conversion, John upon the fulness of life in Christ.

John has been called the "Apostle of Love," because love is a controlling conception in his system. This word, however, occurs as frequently in Paul's writings, only he uses it in connection with faith. John employs it as the opposite of hatred and iniquity. From Luke ix. 54, where he would punish the Samaritan villagers, the opposite conclusion might be drawn, that he was a man of violent temperament. Neither of these views may be held in isolation. He was a man of mild disposition, but of strong, ardent convictions.

John received a religious training. His mother, Salome (Mark xvi. 1; Matt. xx. 20), was a true Israelite, and afterwards a devoted follower of Christ (Mark xv. 40). Tradition points to Bethsaida as the place of his birth. Chrysostom and others speak with confidence on this point. He had some means (John xix. 27), and seems to have been of better connection than the other disciples, for he knew the high priest (John xviii. 15). It is probable that he was a disciple of the Baptist before he was called of Christ. He apprehended the spirit and meaning of that prophet's preaching better than any of the other disciples (John i. 26-36). As a disciple of Christ, he leaned upon Christ's bosom, and is called "the disciple whom Jesus loved." He gave himself up unreservedly to him.

This decision, which marked his attachment to Christ, likewise distinguishes his conception of Christ's work. Paul depicts the believer in appropriating salvation; John portrays salvation as a victory of the light already won over darkness. Paul treats of sin largely as weakness: John treats of it as iniquity. It was not possible for John to do the work which Paul did; but it was his high mission to keep the Church, already established, pure, and to purify it. It was not his mission to extend the Church, but to supplement the activity of the other apostles by contending against the corruption within its pale and the rising Gnosticism.

John's apostolical activity for the first thirty years after the resurrection was in harmony with his nature, — a quiet and retiring one. After the death of Paul and the destruction of Jerusalem, by contending against the corruption within its pale and the rising Gnosticism.

In the earliest period of apostolic activity he is found in company with Peter. But the latter is always the spokesman; and even in the year 50, at the council in Jerusalem (Acts xvi.) it is Peter and James, not John, who are in the foreground. In the year 58 James and the presbyters alone are left in the city (Acts xxii. 18).

In the interval the other apostles seem to have been scattered. An old tradition has it (Clement Alex.: Strom., vi. 5) that John left Jerusalem twelve years after the resurrection. He spent the latter part of his life in Ephesus; but he could not have gone there long before Paul's death (A.D. 64), or there would have been some reference to him in the Epistle to the Ephesians, or at the leave-taking with the elders of Miletus. The testimony of the Fathers agrees that he presided over the churches of Asia Minor from Ephesus as a centre. Irenaeus states that he lived there till the times of Trajan. His testimony is of peculiar value, for his teacher Polycarp had been a pupil of John.

It is unanimously agreed that he was banished to Patmos. Irenaeus says that this occurred under Domitian; and Jerome gives the more particular date as the fourteenth year of his reign (94—95). [But another tradition assigns the exile to the reign of Nero (68).] He was permitted by Nerva to return the year following. These are all the data we have of John's life. The exact date of his death is unknown.

II. The Writings of John divide themselves into two parts. The first includes the Gospel and the Epistles; the second, the Apocalypse.

1. The Gospel of John is seen at first sight to differ from the first three Gospels. He omits very much that they contain, and adds much new and characteristic matter. It is obvious that he supplements the narratives of the synoptists; and there can hardly be a doubt that it was his design to do so. But in a deeper sense does he supplement their narratives. He delineates with special care the divine nature of Christ, opening his Gospel with a narrative of his divine antecedents, and reporting frequent discourses in which Christ speaks of his eternal relation to the Father. He also portrays the vital union of Christ with believers (John iii. 8, xiv. 16 sqq., xvii. 21-23).

John's individuality was not the sole factor leading him to give to his Gospel its supplemental character. Rome was led to do this by the special needs of the Church, and the dangers to which it was exposed.

He awoke to the realization of his special mission in the last years of the first century. At the death of Paul and the destruction of Jerusalem, the Church entered upon a new stage. The Hebrew nation, rejecting the witness of the apostles, had become the Diaspora. Christianity now had to do only with Heathen Rome and with individual Jews as they opposed the Christians in the Roman Empire. The period was past in which Paul was called upon to contend against Judaizing tendencies in Christian congregations. The destruction of Jerusalem had sealed his teaching.

But, in spite of this event, the Jews in the party in the Church, which so little understood its meaning, that they continued to cling to the forms of the old dispensation. They were called the sect of the Nazarenes, and in its ultimate form their system was known as Ebionitism. They saw in Christ only a lawgiver and a man. This tendency did not reach its full development in John's time; but his keen foresight discerned it in the future, and he was aroused by it to give his testimony to the eternal Sonship of Christ.

Contemporary with this, the first indications of Gnosticism began to make themselves felt. At the bottom a Heathen philosophy, it incorporated some of the doctrines of Christianity, but ignored faith and the atonement. Cerinthus, the first important expounder of this school, taught that the world was not created by God, but by a power distinct from him; that Jesus was the son of Mary and Joseph; that at his baptism he received the aion Christ into union with himself, and, enlightened by it, taught more exalted doctrines concerning God than had ever been taught before. This aion withdrew from Jesus before the passion, so that only the man Jesus suffered on the cross. According to Polycarp, John met Cerinthus in the baths, and it is quite probable that he was obliged to contend against his errors. We are thus led to the conclusion that the Cerinthish Gnosis was the principal cause which induced John to believe that the time had come for him to make known his peculiar gift, which he had hitherto kept concealed. It was his mission, by testifying more emphatically than had been done to the incarnation and divinity of Christ, to lay the last stone in the structure of apostolical teaching. He emphasizes faith in Jesus the Son of God (xx. 31) over against a bare gnosis. To the false speculations which denied now the divinity, now the humanity, of Christ, he opposed his utterances about his eternal relation with the Father, and the revelation of the Father through him. To the mere intellectual striving after knowledge without holiness, he opposes the mystical life of the union with Christ. The best evidence that this is the design of the Gospel is found in the statement of chap. xx. 31: “These are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, believing, ye may have life in his name.” No sharper antithesis to Cerinthish speculations could be conceived.

2. A further proof that this was the purpose of the evangelist is found in his First Epistle. This work resembles the Gospel in language, style, tone, and ideas. In chap. ii. 12-14 the writer speaks six times of the object for which he had written, and was then writing. Must not these statements, then, beyond a doubt, refer to something else than the Epistle, — to the Gospel itself? If this point be well taken, then the Epistle assumes the character of an accompanying document, as J. P. Lange and Hug have held in common with myself. Be this granted or not, it may with certainty be deduced from 1 John iv. 2 sqq.
that the apostle had to contend with such as denied that Jesus was the Christ. It was for the purpose of convincing of this that he wrote his Gospel (John xx. 31).

(3) The Apocalypse is the second division of John's literary labors. Here is revealed to the mind the contrast between light and darkness, truth and falsehood, which is the underlying theme of the Gospel, to its final consummation. John alone, whose mind had been occupied with these contacts, was capable of receiving these revelations.
In chap. 1 he declares himself definitely as the author of the book. Polycrates pronounces him who leaned on the Saviour's bosom to have received the revelation, like a priest of the Old-Testament dispensation, by means of the Urim and Thummim. [Dr. Ebrard assigns Revelation to the traditional date A.D. 98; but most critics now assign it to A.D. 95-70.]

(4) The Genuine of the Fourth Gospel and the First Epistle is established by incontrovertible proofs. There can be only the choice between genuineness and designed fraud; for the writer announces himself to have been an eye-witness of Christ's life (John i. 14, xix. 35; 1 John i. 1).
Undesigned evidence in favor of the Johannine authorship is to be found in the Gospel itself, in the evident determination to avoid the mention of the sons of Zebedee (John i. 35, xiiii. 28, xviii. 15, xii. 26, xx. 2), in constantly referring to himself as the "disciple whom Jesus loved," in giving to Thomas his cognomen (xi. 18), etc. But to this indirect testimony comes a strong and unbroken chain of external testimonies. In the early part of the second century we find a number of remisnences and echoes of John which cannot fail to be recognized. Ignatius must have reference to the tradition about the apostle (Philad. 9; Rom. 7) of Christ as the "door of the Father," and the "bread of heaven." It was at that time acknowledged in the Church to be genuine and canonical (Tertul.: Adv. Marc., iV.
3). Valentinus, no longer questioning its genuineness, sought to establish his Gnosticism by an allegorical exposition of it; and his pupil Heracleon, from this stand-point, wrote a Commentary upon it, of which Origen has preserved numerous fragments. Basilides (125) cited John i. 9, with the words, "That is what is said in the Gospels."
Theodore cites John i. 9, vi. 51, etc.; and Ptolemeus (Ad Floram), John i. 3. Tatian (about 170) composed a Harmony of the four Gospels, and The-ophillus of Antioch (about 199) a Commentary upon the four Gospels, which Jerome himself had read. Theophillus (Ad Autol., II. 22) designates it by name. Here begins Irenaeus (b. about 115), who cites the Gospel at length. Hippolytus, Apolinarius, and Papias, all three are to be added as witnesses to the genuineness. These testimonies and other facts cannot be explained on the supposition that the Gospel is not apostolic. Fifty or sixty years after John's death we find it generally received, and held in highest esteem. The concurrence of evidence is so strong, that it was not till late in the history of rationalism, that its genuinen-eness was attacked. It remained for the Tubingen school to do this, who hold that the author of the Gospel cannot be John. A number of learned men oppose this Apology. But, whatever differences of idiom there may be, the spirit that pervades the two writings is the same; and the variations of language are explained by the difference of the theme and the time of their composition.

The Appendix (chap. xxi.) of the Gospel is also to be taken into account as evidence for its genuineness. This chapter bears marks of being written by the apostle himself (ver. 24). It was written by him after the first composition, and added to the Gospel, not by his own hand, but by the hand of another, perhaps by the presbyter John (vers. 24, 25). He bore witness to the authorship; and this Appendix must have been added very soon after the composition of the Gospel, as it is not wanting in a single manuscript.

[1. Biographical and Critical.—F. Trench: Life and Character of St. John the Evangelist (London, 1850); Dean Stanley: Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age (3d ed., 1874, pp. 234-281); Krenkel: D. Apostel Johannes (Leipzig, 1871);
J. Catrargian: Ecclesia Ephesina de obitu Joannis apostoli narratio, ex versione Joannis secuti V., latine (Wien, 1877); Macdonald: The Life and Writings of St. John (New York, 1877); Niekel: Das Leben des
D. Johannes (Berlin, 1878); Luce: John, whom Jesus loved (New York, 1878). Compare the biographical sketches in the Introductions to the Commentaries of Lücke, Lange, Luthardt, Godet, etc.

II. Doctrinal.—The Johannine type of doctrine is expounded by Neander (1847); From-mann (D. Johann. Lehrbegriff, Leipzig, 1839), C. Reinh. Köstlin (1843), Reuss (La Théol. johannique, Paris 1879); Schmid, Baer, Hilgenfeld (1849 and 1863); B. Weis (D. Johann.
Lehrbegriff, 1882, and in Bibl. Theol. des N. T.,

11. Commentaries on the Gospel.—Lampe (1724, 3 vols.), Lücke (1820; 3d ed., 1843), Tho-luck (1827; 7th ed., 1857), Hengstenberg (1863; 2d ed., 1867; English translation, 1865), Luthardt (1852; 2d ed., entirely rewritten, 1875, 1878; translated by Gregory); de Wette-Brückner (5th ed., 1883), and Luecke, revised ed.
by Weiss, 1880; Ewald (1861); Godet (1865; 2d ed., 1877; 3d ed., 1881-85, 3 vols.; translated and edited by Prof. Timothy Dwight, N.Y., 1886, 2 vols.), Lange (as translated and enlarged by Schaff,
New York and Edinburgh, 1871). Westcott
JOHN THE BAPTIST.

John the Baptist, son of the priest Zacharias and Elisabeth (born six months before Jesus), according to a Jewish tradition, was probably in the early part of the second half of the year 749 B.C. (B.C. 5), in a city of Judah, according to a Jewish tradition, Hebron or Jutta. His birth was announced by an angel of the Lord (Luke i.13), who prophesied that he should be anointed with the spirit and power of Elijah. For thirty years they heard nothing of him, except that he was in the deserts (Luke i.80).

JOHN THE BAPTIST.

1191

His appearance was that of an ascetic. His clothing consisted of a garment of camel's hair bound by a leathern girdle; his food, locusts and wild honey (Matt. iii.4, etc.).

The angelic announcement that he should drink neither wine nor strong drink seems to indicate that he took the vows of a Nazarite. John stands out in sharp contrast to the manners of his age; and his message, to its ways of thinking. The central doctrine of his preaching was in opposition to the righteousness of works,—repentance in view of the near approach of the kingdom of God. With his preaching he associated a baptism of repentance looking to the forgiveness of sins (Matt. iii.11; Luke iii.3; Acts xii.24).

It was a confession of personal guilt (Matt. iii.6), and an invitation into the circle of those who were expecting the kingdom of heaven. It was, however, a baptism only of water, as opposed to the baptism of the Spirit and fire, which was introduced by Christ (Matt. iii.11; John i.26, etc.).

John's fame extended far and wide through the land, and spread among all classes. Throngs came to his baptism at Bethabara, of publicans and soldiers, as well as Pharisees and Sadducees (Matt. iii.7, xi.7, etc.). There was a prevalent expectation that he might prove to be the Messiah; and the Sanhedrin sent out a delegation to question him about it (Luke iii.15; John i.20; Acts xiii.23). His influence over the masses was very great; and it was dangerous, in their presence, to deny that he was a prophet (Matt. xxii.26, etc.).

John was more than reformer: he was the forerunner of Christ. He represented himself, in accordance with Isa. xi.3, as a "voice crying in the wilderness," etc. (John i.23).

With ingenuous humility he rejected all claims of Messianic dignity, and pointed to the Greater One, whose shoes' latchet he was not worthy to unloose (Matt. iii.11; John i.27; Acts xiii.25). He designated Christ more particularly as pre-existent to himself, though his junior in birth (John i.15, 30), as the Son of God (John i.34), and, with reference to Isa. lii.7, as the "Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i.29, 36). His public activity did not last more than two years at the most. He was cast into the prison of Machærus for his bold arraignment of Herod Antipas for his amorous connection with Herodias (John ii.24, etc.), and was subsequently beheaded, in obedience to an oath the king, in a moment of voluptuous festivity, made to Salome, Herodias' daughter (Matt. xv.3 sqq., etc.). According to Josephus, the reason for the beheading was jealousy at John's preponderant influence with the people (Antiq., XVIII.5, 2). The mission of the deposition to Christ from his prison is not to be attributed to any doubt that he was the Messiah, but to a feeling of discontent with his slow and unexpected method of procedure (Matt. xi.2; Luke vii.19, etc.).

Christ pronounced John the Baptist to be the greatest among the prophets, although less than the least in the kingdom of heaven (Luke vii.28). He was a "burning and shining light" (John v.33, 35), and the Eliphætine of the Apocalypse, seeing Revelation.

JOHN THE BAPTIST.
JOHN. 1192

represents the completion of the old dispensation, which, like the morning star, was paling before the rising of the new, or, as John says (John iii. 18),

Lit. — See the various Commentaries and Lives of Christ [HOLMES: John the Baptist, Bampton Lecture, London, 1783; REYNOLDS: John the Baptist, London, 1874; SYMINGTON: Fox Claman-tis, Life and Ministry of John the Baptist, London, 1927.] ODER.

JOHN is the name of twenty-three popes.

John I., Saint, b. in Siena, and made Bishop of Rome, Aug. 13, 523. He was sent by Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, to Byzantium, to represent the cause of the Arians, against whom the emperor, Justin I., had issued an edict. Tradition says he was received with much honor at the Eastern capital.

Returning to Ravenna, he was thrown into prison, where he died May 18, 526.

— John II. (Dec. 31, 532-May 27, 535) had to make many queer shifts between the dogmatical precepts of the Emperor Justinian and the dog-matical decisions of his predecessor, Hormisdas.

— John III. (July 14, 560-July 13, 573). — John IV., b. in Dalmatia, and consecrated Pope, Dec. 25, 640; d. Oct. 12, 642. He was zealous in establishing monasteries. In the debate on the Mono-othetic confession of the Patriarch Sergius, he placed himself at the head of the opposite party, and defended the orthodoxy of his predecessor, Honorius. His synod in Rome of 641 condemned Monothelitism. — John V. (May or July, 685-Aug. 2, 686) was a Syrian by birth, and spent most of the time of his reign in bed. His alleged letters are probably spurious. — John VI. (Oct. 30, 701-Jan. 10, 705). — John VII. (March 1, 705-Oct. 18, 707) received from Justinian II. the canons of the Council of Trnlla, but dared not pronounce upon them. — John VIII., a Roman by birth, and made Bishop of Rome, Dec. 14, 872. He was a bold spirit, of restless ambition, and skilled in statecraft. He conceived large plans of extending the territory of the Pope over all of Central and Southern Italy, and of using the emperors in the interest of the papal power in Italy. They were all shattered. He crowned King Charles the Bald as Emperor, 875. The king made him large benefactions of territory. In 881 he crowned his successor, Charles the Fat, expecting to get aid against the Saracens. In this he failed. He recognized Photius as Patriarch Constantinople in his desire of securing the aid of the Byzantine emperor to further his schemes in Italy. Finding himself disappointed, he retracted the recognition. He confirmed Methodius as bishop among the Slavs. He was murdered with a hammer, Dec. 15, 882. Three hundred and eight of John's letters are extant. See MANN: Concil. T. xvii.

— John IX. (June, 895-July, 900) held two synods, one in Rome, which gave Formosus redress, and another at Ravenna, against robbery of church property. MANN: Concil. xviii. — John X., raised, by the influence of the profligate Theodora, to the sees of Bologna and Ravenna, and in 914 to the bishop of Rome. He gave himself up to worldly amusements, and was the first of the popes to enter armed into the camp. He led a successful campaign against the marauding Saracens. He was suffocated in prison in 929.

— John XI. (March, 931-January, 936) was a son of Marozia and Sergius III., was at one time impre-sed by his half-brother, Alberic. — John XII. (Octavian) followed his father as Prince (Patriarch) of Rome, and held a position of some importance, called, in his sixteenth or eighteenth year, to the papal office, Dec. 16, 955. Like his predecessors, he was ambitious to secure the supposed temporal rights of the Pope, and called in Otto I. across the Alps to his aid against King Berengar and the Greeks. Although Otto promised to support the person of John, and continuance in the inheritance of Peter, yet the struggle between the Papacy and the emperors began with him. He secured from John an oath never to conclude a treaty with Berengar and the Greeks. John forgot his pledge, and in 963 was forced to flee before Otto as he returned in triumph to the city. The Romans were compelled to take an oath never to elect or consecrate a pope without the consent of the emperor or his son. John led a wanton life, and the Lateran rang with sounds of impure revelry and Pagan oaths over games of chance. He was convicted, by a synod held in St. Peter's in 963, of various crimes, — such as murder, fornication, perjury, — and deposed. After the departure of Otto, he returned to the city, was re-instated by a second synod, but died suddenly, on May 14, 964, in an adulterous bed, of apoplexy. See GIESEBRECHT: Gesch. d. deutsch. Kaiserzeit, and DIETERICH: Otto d. Grose, Leipzig, 1876. — John XIII. (Oct. 1, 965—Sept. 6, 972) was expelled from Rome by the nobility, but was restored and upheld by the Emperor Otto, who, at a synod of Ravenna, guaranteed to the Roman see the possession, not only of the city and circle of Ravenna, but every estate which it had ever held. Lives of him in MURATORI: Script. rerum Ital., T. iii. pt. ii. — John XIV. (November or December, 983—Aug. 13, 984) perished in a dungeon of the Castle of St. Angelo, where he had been confined by Boniface VII. — John XV. (September, 985—April, 996) was expelled from Rome by John Crescentius, but managed to return, and to fill his private coffers with the wealth of the Church. — John XVI. (May, 997—March, 998), a Greek by birth, was made Pope by John Crescenti-us, but John, the king made him large benefactions of territory. In 1003 he crowned his successor, Benedict VIII., and received on one day all the ecclesiastical orders.

— John XVII. (June 13—Dec. 7, 1003). — John XVIII. (Dec. 25, 1003—June, 1009) was, like his predecessor, a mere tool in the hands of the Roman Patrician, the son of John Crescenti-us. — John XIX. (July, 1024—January, 1033) was a layman when he grasped the tiara, by force and by bribery, after the death of his brother, Benedict VIII., and received on one day all the ecclesiastical orders.

— John XXI. (Sept. 8, 1278—May 20, 1277) ought to be counted as John XX., but called himself John XLI. The confusion begins with John XIX., who is also called John XVIII., some antipope of the name John being counted John XVII. It is not altogether certain whether John XIX. is identical with Petrus Hispanus, the noted author of several medical and philosophical treatises. FOTTHAST: Reg. Pontif. Rom., b. in Cahors, of humble parentage, and elected, by the conclave, Pope at Lyons, Aug. 7, 1316. He had his residence at Avignon. In 1324 he showed himself the slave of the French king by the excommunication of Louis of Bavaria, who, in turn, called a general council, declared JOHN.

1193

JOHN OF DAMASCUS.

JOHN, a heretic, secured, through a synod in Rome, his deposition and the election of Nicolaus V. to his place. John sanctioned the custom of saluting the Virgin with three Ave Maria in honor of the Trinity, deprived the towns of the right of electing their bishops, and left behind an immense sum of money, which he had secured by annats, and otherwise. He died Dec. 4, 1334. — John XXIII., a Neapolitan of fine talents, but corrupt morals; d. Dec. 22, 1410. He secured, by bribes and threats, his election, on May 17, 1410, to the papal throne. He was deposed, and imprisoned in Heidelberg; but, escaping, he fell at the feet of Martin V., and was made cardinal-bishop of Tusculum. G. VOIGT.

JOHN, Pope. See JOAN, POPE.

JOHN IV., Jejunator (the Faster), Patriarch of Constantinople 582–593; had a high reputation for piety. He became involved in difficulties with Popes Pelagius II. and Gregory I., by following the precedent of some of his predecessors in assuming the title of Eccumenical Patriarch. Gregory was intensely aroused by this assumption, declaring it to be a suggestion of Satan, and an indication of the near advent of Antichrist. John soon died, and the Greek Church placed his name on the calendar of the saints. A later and untrustworthy tradition states that Gregory had excommunicated him before his death.

The writings attributed to John (Libellus paenitentialis and Tractatus de Confessione et paenitentia) are of very doubtful authenticity. See Life of John, by Patriarch NICERON, and the Church History of SCHRÖCK. WAGENMANN.

JOHN X., Patriarch of Constantinople, known for his connection with the measures of the Emperor Michael Paleologus, looking to the union of Christendom. He at first refused his aid, and declared the Latin heretics, for which he was thrown into prison. He there had leisure to investigate the history of the dissensions of the Greek and Latin churches, and to change his mind. He was released, and made patriarch, but, after the death of the emperor, retired to a cloister in 1283. He was again restored, and again exiled, dying 1298. The Greek Church excludes his name from the number, and also the author of the work called The German Theology.

JOHN OF CHUR (Coire), surnamed Rüberg.

The term "Friends of God" is applied to the mystics and pietists in the latter part of the fourteenth century, who yearned for a more vital type of religion than they found in the Church. Here and there they formed brotherhoods, and not infrequently laymen were their leaders. They flourished especially in the Rhineland, Cologne, Strassburg, and the Netherlands. Eckart (d. about 1329) and Tauler (1290–1361) belonged to their number, and also the author of the work.

JOHN OF DAMASCUS, surnamed Chrysorhoas (gold-pouring) on account of his eloquence, and called, among the Arabs, Mansur, is the last of the Greek Fathers, and the most authoritative theologian in the Oriental Church. The main
JOHN OF DAMASCUS.

JOHN OF MONTE CORVINO, THE APOSTLE OF THE MONGOLS; B. IN MONTE CORVINO, SOUTHERN ITALY, ABOUT 1230; D. 1332. HE WENT INTO PERSIA, AND PROVED VERY SUCCESSFUL IN WINNING THE MONGOLS TO CHRISTIANITY. HE RETURNED TO CHRISTIAN ITALY IN 1288, TO REPORT IN PERSON ABOUT THE GREAT WORK. IN 1291 HE WAS COMMISSIONED TO ABOR....
JOHN OF SALISBURY. 1195

JOHN OF SALISBURY. (called also Parvus, the Little), b. of Saxon parentage, between 1110 and 1120, in Salisbury (Sarum); d. in France, Oct. 25, 1180. He went to France, as the custom then was, and studied under Abelard and other teachers. He became eminent for his attainments in philosophy and theology. In 1148 he returned to England, with letters of recommendation from Bernard of Clairvaux, and Peter the Cistercian abbot. Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, appointed him his chaplain and secretary. The responsibility of the ecclesiastical concerns of Great Britain largely devolved upon him. He stood in relations of close intimacy with popes Eugenius III. and Alexander III., and with popes Innocent, and Adrian IV. By his influence, the claims of Alexander III. were recognized in England as against those of Victor IV. He was the intimate adviser of Thomas à Becket, and shared his misfortunes, going into exile with him to France. After that prelate's murder, he zealously interested himself in his canonization. He was elected the intimate adviser of Thomas a Becket, and shared his misfortunes, going into exile with him to France. After the prelate's murder, he zealously interested himself in his canonization. In 1176 he was chosen bishop of Chartres, and lived to administer its affairs four years. One of the last acts of his life was a speech at the Lateran Council (1179), in which he warned against ecclesiastical assumption, and urged the gospel as the rule of life.

John's writings consist of many Letters to popes and other dignitaries, a work on ancient and Christian philosophy, entitled Enthelicus, and two works on ecclesiastical and political ethics, designed for princes and statesmen, and entitled Politicatus and Mentalogius. He also wrote Lives of Anselm and Thomas à Becket, whose latter sufferings he does not hesitate to compare with his own. His complete works were edited, in 5 vols., by GILES (Oxford, 1848), and Migne (Patrol. Lat., vol. xcix.). See H. WAGENMANN: Joh. v. Salisbury, Berlin, 1842; Schaarschmidt: Joh. Salisbury nach Leutz, in Studien Leipzig, 1862.

JOHN, Patriarch of Thessalonica at the close of the seventh and the beginning of the eighth centuries; was noted as a defender of image-worship; and wrote on that subject a dialogue between a Jew and a Christian, of which an extract was read aloud at the second council of Nicaea. See MANSI: Conc. XIII. p. 156.

JOHN (Elesmosynarius, the Almsgiver), so called because of his extraordinary benevolence; Patriarch of Constantinople from 606 to 616, when he died in the island of Cyprus. By his influence, before the persecution of the Persians. It is pleasing to add that benevolence was not his only virtue. He was a great lover of peace, forgiving towards his enemies, and willing to bear patiently his own ills, while he helped others to bear theirs. He is commemorated upon Jan. 28, and under that date the Bollandists tell many edifying tales about him.

JOHN FREDERICK, son of John the Constant, and elector of Saxony 1532-1547; b. at Torgau, June 30, 1503; d. March 3, 1554. Brought up in the lap of the Reformation, he became its unwavering advocate. Like his father, he was one of most intimate friendship with Luther, with whom he carried on an uninterrupted corre-

JOHN NEPOMUK, the most popular national saint of Bohemia; canonized by Benedict XIII. in 1729; b. between 1330 and 1340, in Pomuk; suffered martyrdom at Prague, March 20 (?), 1393. The facts of his life are involved in obscurity. According to the Jesuit Bohuslav Balbinus (1670), he studied at the university of Prague, and afterwards became preacher at the cathedral. He was the confessor of Queen Joanna. His husband, King Wenzel, sought in vain, by tempting promises, to induce him to reveal the matter of her
JOHN PHILOPONUS. 1196

JOHN THE LITTLE.

confessions. He subsequently resorted to imprisonment and torture to gain his end. Finding himself still unsuccessful, and incensed by a sermon which John preached in the cathedral, and in which he applied to himself the words, “In a little while ye shall not see me,” the king ordered him to be apprehended, under cover of the night,
and thrown from the bridge into the Moldau (1383).
According to the same authority, miracles were performed in connection with his body. Thousands of lights appeared on the river, and his corpse was thrown upon a sand-bar. A heavenly odor issued from it, and the sick were cured
at his shrine. Much of this account must be regarded as legendary. The facts are probably these: a John of Omuk did live in the fourteenth century, was raised to hig ecclesiastical dignity, and afterwards thrown, by command of the king, into the Moldau. But the most authentic sources put the date ten years later, in 1393 (March 20th), and know nothing of his being the confessor of the queen. They give conflicting reasons for the violent treatment of the king.
These differences led, as early as 1541, to the supposition, and fully developed the legendary details. But an able investigator, John Dabrowsky (1787), refuted the hypothesis, and has finally settled it that there was only one. The tradition that John was the queen’s confessor can be traced back to the year 1471, and no farther.

Lit.—Bosnian baldinius: life of John
Nepomuk, Acta Sancorum, Maii, ill. 56; Otto
Abel: D. Legende v. h. Jubi. Nepomuk, Berlin,
1855; P. Anton Frind: D. geschichl. h. Jubi.
Nepomuk, Eger, 1861. [See Palacky: History
of Bohemia.]

JOHN PHILOPONUS (called also Alexandra and Grammaticus), who lived in the latter part of the fifth, and first part of the sixth century, won a place among the philosophical and theological writers of his age. The chronology of his life is very uncertain, and no details are known. He was an Aristotelian in philosophy, and, in the Christologial controversy of the time, allied himself to the reformers of his age. The chronology of his life is very uncertain, and no details are known. He was an Aristotelian in philosophy, and, in the Christoloicics, was raised to his hig ecclesiastical position, and afterwards thrown, by command of the king, into the Moldau. But the most authentic sources put the date ten years later, in 1393 (March 20th), and know nothing of his being the confessor of the queen. They give conflicting reasons for the violent treatment of the king.
These differences led, as early as 1541, to the supposition, and fully developed the legendary details. But an able investigator, John Dabrowsky (1787), refuted the hypothesis, and has finally settled it that there was only one. The tradition that John was the queen’s confessor can be traced back to the year 1471, and no farther.

Lit.—Bosnian baldinius: life of John
Nepomuk, Acta Sancorum, Maii, ill. 56; Otto
Abel: D. Legende v. h. Jubi. Nepomuk, Berlin,
1855; P. Anton Frind: D. geschichl. h. Jubi.
Nepomuk, Eger, 1861. [See Palacky: History
of Bohemia.]

JOHN PHILOPONUS. 1196

JOHN THE LITTLE.

confessions. He subsequently resorted to imprisonment and torture to gain his end. Finding himself still unsuccessful, and incensed by a sermon which John preached in the cathedral, and in which he applied to himself the words, “In a little while ye shall not see me,” the king ordered him to be apprehended, under cover of the night,
and thrown from the bridge into the Moldau (1383).
According to the same authority, miracles
were performed in connection with his body. Thousands of lights appeared on the river, and his corpse was thrown upon a sand-bar. A heavenly odor issued from it, and the sick were cured
at his shrine. Much of this account must be regarded as legendary. The facts are probably these: a John of Omuk did live in the fourteenth century, was raised to hig ecclesiastical dignity, and afterwards thrown, by command of the king, into the Moldau. But the most authentic sources put the date ten years later, in 1393 (March 20th), and know nothing of his being the confessor of the queen. They give conflicting reasons for the violent treatment of the king.
These differences led, as early as 1541, to the supposition, and fully developed the legendary details. But an able investigator, John Dabrowsky (1787), refuted the hypothesis, and has finally settled it that there was only one. The tradition that John was the queen’s confessor can be traced back to the year 1471, and no farther.

Lit.—Bosnian baldinius: life of John
Nepomuk, Acta Sancorum, Maii, ill. 56; Otto
Abel: D. Legende v. h. Jubi. Nepomuk, Berlin,
1855; P. Anton Frind: D. geschichl. h. Jubi.
Nepomuk, Eger, 1861. [See Palacky: History
of Bohemia.]

JOHN PHILOPONUS. 1196

JOHN THE LITTLE.

confessions. He subsequently resorted to imprisonment and torture to gain his end. Finding himself still unsuccessful, and incensed by a sermon which John preached in the cathedral, and in which he applied to himself the words, “In a little while ye shall not see me,” the king ordered him to be apprehended, under cover of the night,
and thrown from the bridge into the Moldau (1383).
According to the same authority, miracles
were performed in connection with his body. Thousands of lights appeared on the river, and his corpse was thrown upon a sand-bar. A heavenly odor issued from it, and the sick were cured
at his shrine. Much of this account must be regarded as legendary. The facts are probably these: a John of Omuk did live in the fourteenth century, was raised to hig ecclesiastical dignity, and afterwards thrown, by command of the king, into the Moldau. But the most authentic sources put the date ten years later, in 1393 (March 20th), and know nothing of his being the confessor of the queen. They give conflicting reasons for the violent treatment of the king.
These differences led, as early as 1541, to the supposition, and fully developed the legendary details. But an able investigator, John Dabrowsky (1787), refuted the hypothesis, and has finally settled it that there was only one. The tradition that John was the queen’s confessor can be traced back to the year 1471, and no farther.

Lit.—Bosnian baldinius: life of John
Nepomuk, Acta Sancorum, Maii, ill. 56; Otto
Abel: D. Legende v. h. Jubi. Nepomuk, Berlin,
1855; P. Anton Frind: D. geschichl. h. Jubi.
Nepomuk, Eger, 1861. [See Palacky: History
of Bohemia.]

JOHN PHILOPONUS. 1196

JOHN THE LITTLE.

confessions. He subsequently resorted to imprisonment and torture to gain his end. Finding himself still unsuccessful, and incensed by a sermon which John preached in the cathedral, and in which he applied to himself the words, “In a little while ye shall not see me,” the king ordered him to be apprehended, under cover of the night,
and thrown from the bridge into the Moldau (1383).
According to the same authority, miracles
were performed in connection with his body. Thousands of lights appeared on the river, and his corpse was thrown upon a sand-bar. A heavenly odor issued from it, and the sick were cured
at his shrine. Much of this account must be regarded as legendary. The facts are probably these: a John of Omuk did live in the fourteenth century, was raised to hig ecclesiastical dignity, and afterwards thrown, by command of the king, into the Moldau. But the most authentic sources put the date ten years later, in 1393 (March 20th), and know nothing of his being the confessor of the queen. They give conflicting reasons for the violent treatment of the king.
These differences led, as early as 1541, to the supposition, and fully developed the legendary details. But an able investigator, John Dabrowsky (1787), refuted the hypothesis, and has finally settled it that there was only one. The tradition that John was the queen’s confessor can be traced back to the year 1471, and no farther.

Lit.—Bosnian baldinius: life of John
Nepomuk, Acta Sancorum, Maii, ill. 56; Otto
Abel: D. Legende v. h. Jubi. Nepomuk, Berlin,
1855; P. Anton Frind: D. geschichl. h. Jubi.
Nepomuk, Eger, 1861. [See Palacky: History
of Bohemia.]

JOHN PHILOPONUS. 1196

JOHN THE LITTLE.
orator was expelled from the university; but he was munificently rewarded by the duke. Compare Barante: Histoire des delcs de Bourgogne, 1824, tom. iv. pp. 108 sqq. TH. FRESEL.

JOHN THE PRESBYTER, a half-mythical character of the twelve century, whose fame spread through Europe, that, beyond Persia and Armenia, a powerful Christian was ruling, who had routed the Mohammedans in a great battle. He combined with his royal functions the consecration of a priest. Pope Alexander III. sent his physician, Philip, as legate, with letters addressed to John as the "King of the Indies, and most holy of priests" (Indiorum regi, sacerdotum sanctissimo). A second epoch in the reports and fables concerning him begins in 1245, with the mission of the Franciscans and Dominicans for the evangelization of Eastern Asia. They carried instructions from Innocent IV. to search for the kingdom of the Presbyter John. Rubruquis, one of their number, reported that John was dead, but that "he had been a Nestorian, lived as a shepherd, and, after the death of Cerkhan, was made king." A third epoch in this legendary history begins with the account of Marco Polo, who reported the existence of a powerful Christian kingdom in Middle India which was named Abasce. The similarity of the names soon led to the inference that he referred to Abyssinia. The Catholic bishop, Jordanus of Quilon, in Southern India, called its king John. He was identified with the Presbyter; and this continued to be the universally received view of scholars till the seventeenth century. The present phase of the question is, that a certain King John did rule in Central Asia. The name had been corrupted from Jorkhan, which, in turn, was a corruption of Coirkhan. He was a Buddhist himself, but had Nestorians among his subjects. His daughter became a Christian, as did some of his descendants. Hone John, a copperplate engraving of Johannes Capelan, in Sage and Geschichte, Berlin, 2d ed., 1870; [G. Brunet: La légende du prêtre Jean, Bordeaux, 1877; F. Zäncke: Der Priester Johannes, Leipzig, 1879.]

JOHN, St., Eve of, was, like Christmas Eve, formerly celebrated among all Germanic nations with merry-making of various descriptions,—lighting of bonfires on the hilltops, dancing around the fires with garlands and songs, jumping through the fires, partly as sport, and partly as a protection against witchcraft, etc. It is of Pagan origin, and refers to the summer solstice, falling on June 24. Longfellow, A Book of Hymns (Boston, 1846); in 1868 The Worship of Jesus; and for many years before his death he had been at work upon a series, Oriental Religions, and their Relations to Universal Religion, of which India (Boston, 1872) and China (1877) have appeared. Although these two books are compilations, and not drawn from the sources, they have won a high place for their reliable and interesting contents, and appreciative spirit.

JOK'TAN was the son of Eber, the brother of Peleg, and father of thirteen sons (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chron. i. 19). According to the genealogical table of Genesis, the Semitic race was, long before the emigration of the Abrahmites, divided into a northern branch (Peleg) and a southern (Joktan). The names of the thirteen sons of Joktan point towards Southern Arabia. Several of them have been identified with those of existing tribes, and the rest are probably identifiable in the same manner. The distinction which Genesis makes between the old Joktanite Arabs and the younger Ishmaelite Arabs is, indeed, an ethnographical fact well understood also by the Arabic ethnographers. KAUTZSCH.

JO'NAH (йъвъ, ["dove"], one of the Minor Prophets, was the son of Amittai, who, according to 2 Kings xiv. 25, uttered a prophecy concerning Jeroboam II. The Book of Jonah is distinguished from the other prophetic books by the fact that it is not the prophecy, but the personal experiences of the man, in which the interest centres. In order to escape the divine summons to preach repentance to Nineveh, he embarked from Joppa for Tarshish, but during a storm was, at his own advice and by the issue of a lot, thrown overboard, and swallowed by a great fish (i. 17). Three days afterwards he was thrown up upon the land, and, after a second summons, began preaching to the Ninevites. When both king and people began to repent, Jonah became indignant at the divine compassion, but was convinced by JOHANNE JOHN, Knights of St. See MILITARY ORDERS.

JOHNSON, Samuel, B.D., first president of King's (now Columbia) College, New York; b. in Guilford, Conn., Oct. 14, 1698; d. in Stratford, Conn., June 6, 1772. He was graduated at Yale College 1714; in 1720 was ordained a Congregational minister, but in 1723 was re-ordained in the Church of England; returned to America as missionary of the S. P. G., he settled in Stratford, Conn. In 1758 he was chosen first president of King's College, but resigned 1768. He was the author of "Elementa Philosophica and Elementa Ethica," Philadelphia, 1752 (both anonymous, and printed by Benjamin Franklin), a Hebrew Grammar, 1767, besides minor theological works. Dr. Johnson was the most prominent American influenced by Bishop Berkeley while in America. See his Life by Beardsley, N.Y., 1874; and Ueberweg's History of Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 450.

JOHNSON, Samuel, b. in Salem, Mass., Oct. 10, 1822; d. at North Andover, Mass., Sunday, Feb. 19, 1882. He was graduated at Harvard College 1842, and at the Divinity School 1843, but never associated himself with any religious denomination, although his views were more nearly Unitarian than any other. In 1853 he became pastor of a Free Church of Lynn, Mass., and held the position for some twenty years. He was prominent in the antislavery agitation, but rather as a sympathizer and pulpit advocate than as platform speaker. He was a man of very lovable disposition, of great modesty, industry, and kindliness. He issued, in connection with Rev. Samuel Longfellow, A Book of Hymns (Boston, 1840); in 1868 The Worship of Jesus; and for many years before his death he had been at work upon a series, Oriental Religions, and their Relations to Universal Religion, of which India (Boston, 1872) and China (1877) have appeared. Although these two books are compilations, and not drawn from the sources, they have won a high place for their reliable and interesting contents, and appreciative spirit.

In order to escape the divine summons to preach repentance to Nineveh, he embarked from Joppa for Tarshish, but during a storm was, at his own advice and by the issue of a lot, thrown overboard, and swallowed by a great fish (i. 17). Three days afterwards he was thrown up upon the land, and, after a second summons, began preaching to the Ninevites. When both king and people began to repent, Jonah became indignant at the divine compassion, but was convinced by God of his foolishness by a gourd (iv.). Such are the contents of the book; and many have regarded it as an allegorical poetic myth. The prevailing view at present among the representatives of modern criticism is, that it was a national prophetic tradition designed to serve a didactic aim, and with some elements of historic truth. The historical view appeals to the geographical and historical notices in the prophecy; as, for example, the evident accuracy of the description of Nineveh, the fitness of Jonah's mission at that particular period, when Israel was for the first time coming into contact with Assyria, etc. Those who deny the credibility make much of the miraculous story of the great fish; but this very incident is attested by our Lord's use of it (Matt. xii. 39, xvi. 4; Luke xii. 20). He here, in the most emphatic manner, compares himself with Jonah, whose deliverance by the whale typified his burial. But Christ was greater than Jonah. The latter escaped only from the peril of death: the former overcame death. If this be the right interpretation of our Lord's words, then the miraculous preservation of Jonah gets its significance from the fact that it happened to him as a prophet. The central purpose of the book is not that repentance was preached to the heathen, but that the prophet of God must do whatever the Lord commands, that not even death can frustrate his calling, and that the prophet must leave the fulfilment to God. Following the line of these three thoughts, the book details historical facts which were a prophecy of Him in whom the prophetic calling culminated. As for the prophet's prayer (i. 3-10), we may say, with Luther, that his thoughts of his heart were while he was engaged in such a fearful contest with death.

It cannot be proved that the prophet left his work in its present form. The abruptness of the record leads us to suppose that it was originally of a series of similar accounts. An old Haggadah calls Jonah a prophet of Elisha's school, and it is possible that it originated in one of these sources. Opinion has been divided about the date, some putting it as late as the period of the Maccabees. This view is entirely ruled out by the fact of its reception into the prophetic canon, and there can be no doubt that it was written before the Babylonian captivity. Jonah's tomb is still shown near the site of ancient Nineveh.

JONAS, bishop of Orleans 821-844, played an important part in the controversy concerning image-worship. In his work De cultu imagini, he assumes a position intermediate between the rationalistic argumentation of the iconoclasts and the superstitious instincts of the multitude. His De institutione laicata has considerable interest for the history of Christian ethics. The former work is found in Bibliotheca Maxima, xiv.; the latter, in D'ACHERY: Spicilegium, i, pp. 238 sqq.; MIGNON, CVI. HAGENBACH.

JONAS, Justus, b. at Nordhausen, June 5, 1493; d. at Eisfeld, Oct. 9, 1555; studied canon law at Erfurt, and took his degree, but devoted himself after 1519 to theology, led to do so by Luther's proceedings in 1517, and entered the monastery. In 1521 he was appointed provost of Wittenberg, and became one of Luther's principal co-workers and one of his most intimate friends. In 1541 he removed to Halle; but in 1546 he was expelled from that place by Duke Maurice; and, though in 1548 he was allowed to return, he was not allowed to preach, and left again. After participating in the foundation of the university of Jena, he was made court-preacher at Coburg in 1551, and pastor of Eisfeld-on-the-Werra in 1553. His original writings are mostly polemical: De conjygio sacrotutali, 1523; Wicht die rechte Kirch, etc., 1537. A great number of Luther's and Melanchthon's works he translated from Latin into German, or from German into Latin. His friendship with Luther is the most interesting fact concerning Jonas. He was one of the witnesses of Luther's marriage, carried on an intimate correspondence with him for twenty-five years, accompanied him on his last journey to Eisleben and stood at his bedside, and, an hour later, wrote a particular account of his decease to the elector, and finally had the melancholy privilege of preaching the funeral sermon upon the great Reformer, both at Eisleben and Halle. Jonas was rather a fiery character, but enjoyed the fullest confidence of friends and foes. His letters, of great interest for the history of the Reformation, have been collected and edited by Gustav Kawerau, Halle, 1884-85, 2 parts, cf. Corp. Ref. His life was written by REINHARD WEIMAR, 1731; KNAFF (Halle, 1814), HASSE, Meurer: Leben d. Altdorfer d. Luth. Kirche, 1864. OSWALD SCHMIDT.

JONCOURT, Pierre de, b. at Clermont in the middle of the seventeenth century; was appointed pastor of Middelbourg in 1678, and in 1686 at The Hague, where he died in 1701. In his work De la virginité dans les différentes méthodes d'expliquer l'Écriture (Amsterdam, 1707) he violently attacked the allegorical method, and happened to use some expressions about Cocceius, who had carried this method to its extreme limits, which the synod of Nineguen, 1708, compelled him to retract. He also published a revision of the translation of the Psalms by Clement Marot and Theodore Beza, Amsterdarn, 1716. JONES, Jeremiah, b. in the north of England, about 1738; minister of a dissenting congregation at Forest Green, Gloucestershire, where he d. 1724. Author of 4 volumes of A Full and Authentic Account of all the Various Attempts and Attempts and Methods of Attacking the Canonical Authority of the New Testament, London, 1726-27, 3 vols.; 3d ed., 1827.

JOPPA, sometimes called Japho (Josh. xix. 46), the present Yafo, or Jaffa, is a very old city, standing on a promontory jutting out into the Mediterranean, thirty-five miles north-west of Jerusalem. Originally a Phoenician colony, it was allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 46); and under the reign of Solomon it became the port of Jerusalem (2 Chron. ii. 19). Several times taken and lost by the Maccabees, the city was a Roman possession in the time of the New Testament, when it was the scene of the raising of Tabitha to life by Peter (Acts ix. 36-43), and of Peter's vision on the housetop (Acts x. 11). In the fifth and sixth centuries it was the seat of a bishop.

In the period of the Crusades it was several times destroyed. At present it has eighteen thousand inhabitants, and a Greek, a Latin, and an Armenian convent.

The Jordan (Hebrew, Yarden, from a root signifying “to descend”), called by the Arabs Esch-Sheriah, rises among the mountains of Anti-Lebanon, from four different sources; descends 1,494 feet, and forms the lake El-Huleh; descends again 897 feet in a course of nine miles, and enters the Sea of Galilee 682 feet below the Mediterranean; forms the “upper” and the “lower” plain; and finally empties itself into the Dead Sea, 1,292 feet below the Mediterranean, having descended 2,098 feet in a distance of 138 miles. It is mentioned a hundred and eighty times in the Old Testament, the first time in Gen. xiii. 10, where Lot beheld the plain of the Jordan as the garden of the Lord,—and fifteen times in the New Testament,—the first time in Matt. iii. 6, where John baptized the multitudes. As two and a half tribes of Israel were settled on the promised land (Josh. iii. 14), by Gideon purified (Judg. vi. 17), by Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. vii. 18), by the Ammonites invading Judah (Judg. x. 9), by Abner (2 Sam. ii. 29), by David (2 Sam. xvi. 22 and xix. 15), by Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 24), by Elijah and Elisha (2 Kings ii. 6-14), etc. The Jordan is not, and never was, a navigable stream. It has, however, been traversed in modern times by Costigan (1835), Molyneaux (1847), Lynch (1848), and McGregor (1869). See art. on PALESTINE.

Joris, Johann David, one of the most curious characters among the Anabaptist fanatics of the period of the Reformation; was b. at Bruges, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and educated at Delft, where he married in 1524, and settled as a merchant. Having become acquainted with the Reformation, he adopted its ideas; but the contentious and expositing manner in which he professed his faith caused him to be put in the pillory, and expelled from the city, with his tongue pierced by a red-hot iron. While roving about homeless, he fell in with the Anabaptists, was solemnly recognized as the anointed of the Lord by one of their party, received visions and divine revelations, etc. After returning to Delft, he began to form an Anabaptist-Chiliasm-Adamic sect, whose messiah he was. The government tried in vain to stop this nuisance by catching the author. He always escaped, and sometimes in a manner so surprising, that people were led to believe that he could make himself invisible. One of the characteristics of the sect was the absolute confidence which the members put in the head. For this messiah they were willing to sacrifice every thing, even life. Many of them were burnt at the stake or imprisoned in the dungeon. This confidence Joris used to gather a considerable fortune; and, with his family and his money, he removed, in 1544, to Basel, where he settled, under the name of Johann of Bruges, no one suspecting that the new, rich, and pious citizen had anything to do with the notorious David Joris, whose pamphlets—peculiar mixtures of unintelligible mysticism and the coarsest sensuality, of which he published half a dozen every year—continued to cause grave disturbances. The truth oozed out, however, after his death (Aug. 25, 1556); and the magistrate of Basel instituted an investigation, after which his body, portrait, and books were burnt by the hangman, in the presence of an immense crowd, and all the survivors of his household were compelled to make public penance, June 6, 1556, in the cathedral. His sect did not die out till more than a century afterwards. See his Life, by Nipphold, in Zeitschrift f. hist. Theologie, 1863, i., and 1864, iv.

Jorin, David, one of the most curious characters among the Anabaptist fanatics of the period of the Reformation; was b. at Bruges, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and educated at Delft, where he married in 1524, and settled as a merchant. Having become acquainted with the Reformation, he adopted its ideas; but the contentious and expositing manner in which he professed his faith caused him to be put in the pillory, and expelled from the city, with his tongue pierced by a red-hot iron. While roving about homeless, he fell in with the Anabaptists, was solemnly recognized as the anointed of the Lord by one of their party, received visions and divine revelations, etc. After returning to Delft, he began to form an Anabaptist-Chiliasm-Adamic sect, whose messiah he was. The government tried in vain to stop this nuisance by catching the author. He always escaped, and sometimes in a manner so surprising, that people
JOSEPH.

Joseph's character justified Jacob's warm affection. He displayed throughout his entire life a profound fear of God and the marked influence of the divine Spirit. He won all hearts. As a statesman, he developed an exceedingly comprehensive, wise, and energetic activity, but always remaining true to his own convictions. In his life divine providences are very prominent. God's wisdom used and overruled the base projects of men (Gen. I. 20). Joseph's sale was the occasion of the transplanting of Israel to Egypt, the best administered state of the ancient world. God did not send them in vain to that school, where they adopted much of its better culture, and likewise suffered the enmity of the world, that they might be taught the saving deeds of Jehovah.

The references to Egyptian customs and manners are of great importance in their bearing upon the authenticity of the story of Joseph's life. There was a time when scholars (von Bohlen, Knobel, etc.) adduced many contradictions to Egyptian customs; but the researches of modern Egyptologists (Ebers, Brugsch, etc.) have confirmed in a remarkable manner the notices of Genesis. Commerce by caravans has been carried on between Syria and Palestine and Egypt from time immemorial; and the three spices mentioned in Gen xxxvii. 25 have always been amongst the principal objects of commerce. The name Potipherah ("dedicated to Phara," or Ra, the god of the sun) is a real Egyptian name. Great stress was laid upon dreams in Egypt. The title "chief of the baker" (Gen. xi. 2) has been found on monuments by Ebers. Wine, the use of which at this time in Egypt has been denied, has been proved to have been in use; and a baker carrying a board with loaves of bread on his head has been discovered on the monuments. Even the title "father to Pharaoh" (Gen. xiv. 8) has been found in several places on the rolls, in the sense of counsel or minister. These, and many other details, have been abundantly corroborated; and the impression cannot well be avoided which Ebers and again by them to the pastors, who had to make them known to their flocks from the pulpit. Papal bulls and briefs, on the contrary, whether referring to dogmatics or jurisdiction, could not be published in the country without an imperial placet. Petitions to Rome for indulgences, for the establishment of new festivals, etc., were absolutely forbidden; and all rights of absolution or dispensation were vested in the bishops. The oath of obedience to the Pope, and the profession fidei Trinitatis, usual at the distribution of degrees, were abrogated. The bulls In cana Domini and Unigenitus were torn out of the books of liturgy. All relations were broken off between the religious orders and their brethren in foreign countries, or even their generals, unless resident in Austria. The theological students were forbidden to visit the Collegium Germanico Hungarion in Rome, which institution was replaced by a Collegium Germanicum et Hungarum in Pavia. The philological and theological schools in the monasteries were closed, and diocesan seminaries were opened under the superintendence of an imperial committee, etc.

No less comprehensive, and evincing the same character, were the reforms relating to the internal life of the Church. The Latin language was abolished, and the German introduced into the services. Pilgrimages outside of the country were forbidden. Rules were given with respect to the luxuriant ornamentation of the churches, the magnificent processions, the brilliant illuminations, etc. All religious orders not engaged in preaching, teaching, or nursing the sick, were dissolved. Between 1780 and 1786 the number of monasteries sank from 2,136 to 1,425, and of that of monks and nuns from 64,890 to 44,280. An edict of Oct. 13, 1781, established religious toleration. The evangelical churches obtained a limited freedom of worship. Civil disqualifications arising from denominational differences were abolished. Even the position of the Jews was improved. The Roman curia became, of course, very alarmed at these proceedings; and in 1782 Pius VI. determined to go himself to Vienna, and pay the emperor a visit. But he was received with cold politeness, and returned, after a month's stay, humiliated and in despair. The early death of the emperor, however, prevented his reforms from succeeding much was again reversed. See the Biographies by Geissler, Halle, 1783; Meusel, Leipzig, 1790; Perzl, Vienna, 1790; F. X. Huber, Vienna, 1792; Cornova, Prague, 1801; Gross-Hoffinger, Stuttgart, 1836–37, 4 vols.; Heyne, Leipzig, 1843–45 vols.; Rambgen, Leipzig, 1801; Meynert, Vienna, 1832; [Riehl u. Reinöh: Kaiser Josef II. als Reform. auf kirchlich. Gebiete, Wien, 1881; G. Frank: Das Toleranz-Patent Kaiser Joseph II., Wien, 1882].
JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA.

Josephus.

CARL MÜLLER.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA, a rich and pious Jew, who acceded burial to the body of Jesus in a tomb of his own. He was probably a member of the Sanhedrin (Luke xxiii. 50), and refused his consent to the sentence of Jesus to death. All the four evangelists (Matt. xxvii. 57–60; Mark xv. 45–46; Luke xxiii. 50–54: John xix. 38–42) refer to the part he took in the burial of Jesus. He asked the body of Pilate, and, in conjunction with Nicodemus, wound it in linen clothes, with spices, and deposited it in a rock-hewn tomb, in a garden, which had never been used. A wholly untrustworthy tradition makes him the apostle of England; and guides still show a thorn-bush at Glastonbury which purports to have sprung from a staff he stuck in the ground. See Graal.

JOSEPHINISM. See Joseph II.

JOSEPHUS, Flavius, b. in Jerusalem 37 or 38 A.D.; belonged to a rich and distinguished family; received a careful education, and joined, after living three years with a hermit, Banus, the sect of the Pharisees, when he was nineteen years old. In 64 he made a journey to Rome in order to effect the release of some Jewish priests who had been imprisoned; and through theinstrumentality of Ahyrus, a Jewish actor, he obtained access to the Empress Poppaea, and successfully fulfilled the mission. Shortly after his return to Palestine, the Jewish revolt against the Romans broke out (66). Like most of the wealthy men among the Jews, he was opposed to the revolt; but he was compelled to participate in it, and was chosen governor of Galilee. Besieged in the fortress of Jotapata by the army of Vespasian, he surrendered, after the lapse of a month and a half, and was taken prisoner; but when, two years later on (69), Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the Syrian and Egyptian legions, he not only obtained his liberty, but accompanied the emperor to Alexandria, and received donations and an annual pension. Living in Rome, he devoted himself to studies and literary pursuits, continuing to enjoy the imperial favor as long as the Flavian dynasty reigned. During the reign of Trajan he died, but the exact date of his death is not known. See Howell: Commentation de F. J. vita, Traj.-ad-Rh., 1836; Tercwijn: Het leven van den joodschen geschiedschrijver, F. J., Utrecht, 1883; Baerwald: Josephus in Galiläa, Breslau, 1877.

Josephus wrote in Greek. I. His first work, however, History of the Jewish War, was originally written in Latin. It was translated into Greek by the author himself. It was sent to Vespasian, Titus, Agrippa II., and other distinguished persons, and received many compliments. It is written with care; and, though it bears the marks of the taste of the time in its fictitious speeches and other rhetorical ornaments, it is generally worthy. Less careful is II., his Jewish Antiquities, finished in 93 or 94, and containing a history of the Jews from the beginning to 66. For the biblical part, the Bible is, of course, the principal authority of the author, though he does not hesitate to modify details which he fears might give offence. He also incorporates various elements of traditions, and extracts from earlier Greek treatments of Jewish history (Demetrius and Artapanus). Concerning his whole method of treating biblical history, and more especially his method of using the Septuagint and the original text, see Ernesti: Exercit. Flam., in Opuscul. ; Spittler: De usus versionis Alexandrinae apud Josephum, Göttengen, 1779; Scharfenberg: De Josephi et versionis Alexandrinae consentu, Leipzig, 1779; Burger: Essai sur l'usage que F. J. a fait des livres canonicum de l'A. T., Straasburg, 1836; Gerlach: Die Weissagungen d. A. T. in den Schriften d. F. J., 1863; Duschk: J. F. und die Tradition, Vienna, 1864; Plaut: F. J. und die Bibel, Berlin, 1867; Tachauer: Das Verhältniss d. F. J. zur Bibel und zur Tradition, Erlangen, 1871. The post-biblical part is treated with great unevenness. The period between Alexander the Great and the Maccabees is nearly a blank, only filled out by a lengthy extract from Pseudo-Aristeus. For the history of the Maccabees the author had an excellent authority in the First Book of the Maccabees, but he has not taken great pains in utilizing it. The later history of the Asmoneans and of Herod is extracted from Strabo and Nicholaus of Damascus. The relations of the Jews to foreign nations form the principal part of the narrative, and the representation of the inner history of the people has a rather legendary character. See Nussbaum: Observationes in Flavii Josephi Antiquitates, Göttingen, 1875; Bloch: Die Quellen d. F. J. in seiner Archäologie, Leipzig, 1879. The eighteenth book of the work contains (3, 3) a short report of Christ, in which the author openly confesses that he believes in Jesus as the Messiah; but, though this famous testimony has been quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 11), it is evidently spurious. See Eckstaedt: Pseudo-Aristei authentisches, Jena, 1841; Question. super F., Jena, 1845; Gerlach: Die Weissagungen d. A. T. in den Schriften d. F. J., Berlin, 1863.

A curious work is III., his so-called Autobiography, written after the death of Agrippa II.; that is, after 100. It is not so much a biography as a plea for his activity in Galilee in the winter of 66–67, or a polemic against Justus of Tiberias. The latter had written a work in which he represented himself as the decided opponent of the rebellion, and Josephus as the true instigator of it. Of course, the former revolutionary leader, now living as a pensioner at the imperial court, could not let such an accusation pass by unnoticed. But Josephus seems to have become very much excited, and his book swarms with patent perversion of facts. IV. Quite otherwise with his apology of Judaism, generally known under the title Contra Apionem, and written in Greek by the author himself. It is a conscientious work. See the monographs by Zircher (Vienna, 1871) and J. G. Müller (Basel, JOSHUA.

1877), the latter containing both the text and explanations. Besides these four works, about whose authenticity there can be no doubt, the so-called Fourth Book of the Maccabees is ascribed to Josephus, but by a mistake. See the monograph by Froebenthal, Basel, 1869. Another book, On the War of the Jews (xxvii. 18; Deut. xxxiv. 9). The first printed edition of Josephus's works, by Frobenius and Episcopius, appeared at Basel, 1541. Much improved texts were published by Hudson (Oxford, 1720) and Havercamp (Amsterdam, 1726). More recent editions have been published by Oertel (Leipzig, 1782–85), Richter (Leipzig, 1826–27), Dindorf (Paris, 1845–47), Bekker (pocket edition, Leipzig, 1855–56), best by B. Nieze (Berlin, 1855 sq.). The Jewish War, ed. by Cardwell, Oxford, 1837; and the Life, ed. by Henke, Brunswick, 1786. Several English translations have appeared: the most commonly known is that by Whiston, London, 1737 (many editions). The Jewish War was translated by R. Traill, London, 1862. See also Bottiger: Topographisch-historisches Lexicon zu den Schriften des Flavius Josephus, Leipzig, 1879; J. v. Destynion: Die Chronologie d. Josephus, Kiel, 1880 (35 pages); the same: Die Quellen d. Flavius Josephus, I. Die Quellen d. Archäologie Buch zii.–xxvi. Jud. Krieg B. i., Kiel, 1882. [E. Schürer]

JOSHUA (yw'in, "God, his help"), a brave and God-fearing Hebrew warrior of the tribe of Ephraim, who led the armies of Israel across the Jordan, conquered the promised land, and distributed the territory among the tribes. He was neither a prophet nor law-giver, like Moses, but completed the work which he had begun, of turning a people of slaves into a nation with a country. The Lord appeared to him appropriately in the form of a soldier with drawn sword (Josh. v. 13). Joshua makes his first appearance in the battle of the Amalekites, when he routed the enemy (Exod. xvi. 9). We next find him among the twelve spies sent to spy out the land (Num. xiii. 8). It was at this time that Moses changed his name from Osha ("help") to Joshua, which, in King James's version, is written in two places Jesus (Acta vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8). He was consecrated by Moses as his successor just before the close of the wilderness period (Num. xxvii. 18; Deut. xxxiv. 9).

The second period of Joshua's career began at the death of the great law-giver, which marked the termination of the wanderings in the wilderness. With the freshness of spring life the people prepared, under their new leader, to fight for the possession of the land promised to Abraham. Joshua won at first to have the advantage of the Lord, who had promised the land to Israel, to him, as to Abraham, as a work of Josephus; but it probably belongs to Hippolytus.

The dates of Joshua's life may be assigned to 1202; JOSHUA.

1202

JOSHUA (yw'in, "God, his help"), a brave and God-fearing Hebrew warrior of the tribe of Ephraim, who led the armies of Israel across the Jordan, conquered the promised land, and distributed the territory among the tribes. He was neither a prophet nor law-giver, like Moses, but completed the work which he had begun, of turning a people of slaves into a nation with a country. The Lord appeared to him appropriately in the form of a soldier with drawn sword (Josh. v. 13). Joshua makes his first appearance in the battle of the Amalekites, when he routed the enemy (Exod. xvi. 9). We next find him among the twelve spies sent to spy out the land (Num. xiii. 8). It was at this time that Moses changed his name from Osha ("help") to Joshua, which, in King James's version, is written in two places Jesus (Acta vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8). He was consecrated by Moses as his successor just before the close of the wilderness period (Num. xxvii. 18; Deut. xxxiv. 9).

The second period of Joshua's career began at the death of the great law-giver, which marked the termination of the wanderings in the wilderness. With the freshness of spring life the people prepared, under their new leader, to fight for the possession of the land promised to Abraham. Joshua won at first to have the advantage of the Lord, who had promised the land to Israel, to him, as to Abraham, as a work of Josephus; but it probably belongs to Hippolytus.

JOSHUA (yw'in, "God, his help"), a brave and God-fearing Hebrew warrior of the tribe of Ephraim, who led the armies of Israel across the Jordan, conquered the promised land, and distributed the territory among the tribes. He was neither a prophet nor law-giver, like Moses, but completed the work which he had begun, of turning a people of slaves into a nation with a country. The Lord appeared to him appropriately in the form of a soldier with drawn sword (Josh. v. 13). Joshua makes his first appearance in the battle of the Amalekites, when he routed the enemy (Exod. xvi. 9). We next find him among the twelve spies sent to spy out the land (Num. xiii. 8). It was at this time that Moses changed his name from Osha ("help") to Joshua, which, in King James's version, is written in two places Jesus (Acta vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8). He was consecrated by Moses as his successor just before the close of the wilderness period (Num. xxvii. 18; Deut. xxxiv. 9).

The second period of Joshua's career began at the death of the great law-giver, which marked the termination of the wanderings in the wilderness. With the freshness of spring life the people prepared, under their new leader, to fight for the possession of the land promised to Abraham. Joshua won at first to have the advantage of the Lord, who had promised the land to Israel, to him, as to Abraham, as a work of Josephus; but it probably belongs to Hippolytus.

The dates of Joshua's life may be assigned to 1202; JOSHUA.

1202

Jesus(Actvii.45; Heb. iv.8). He was consecrated by Moses as his successor just before the close of the wilderness period (Num. xxvii. 18; Deut. xxxiv. 9).

The second period of Joshua's career began at the death of the great law-giver, which marked the termination of the wanderings in the wilderness. With the freshness of spring life the people prepared, under their new leader, to fight for the possession of the land promised to Abraham. Joshua won at first to have the advantage of the Lord, who had promised the land to Israel, to him, as to Abraham, as a work of Josephus; but it probably belongs to Hippolytus.

The dates of Joshua's life may be assigned to 1202; JOSHUA.

1202

Jesus(Actvii.45; Heb. iv.8). He was consecrated by Moses as his successor just before the close of the wilderness period (Num. xxvii. 18; Deut. xxxiv. 9).
seventy-nine at the time of the crossing of Jordan. This would give five or six years for the duration of the war. Supposing that Joshua was about the same age as Caleb, and regarding 1480 as the date of the exodus, then he crossed the Jordan (1450) at the age of seventy-eight, and concluded the war (1445) at the age of eighty-three. This would leave twenty-seven years until his death at one hundred and ten,—a period corresponding well to what is called a "long time" in Josh. This would give five or six years for the duration at one hundred and ten,—a period corresponding to the age of seventy-eight, and concluded

S'rasu-zr, etc., and, for his typical significance, Psansos: On the Creed (art. ii.).

in the Old Testament (Josh.-2 Kings) which re hero of it, begins the list of those historical books partition of the country among the tribes (chaps. xiii.-xxi.). 3 (historical). The dismission of the transjordanic tribes, Joshua's exhortation to the assembled tribes, their renewal of the covenant, deaths of Joshua and Eleazar (chaps. xxii.-xxiv.).

Joshua is by modern critics declared of composite origin, because the same peculiarity in the use of two names for the Divine Being (Jehovah and Elohim), which occurs in the Pentateuch, is found in it, and is considered to prove difference of authorship between the portions in which one or the other is uniformly used, and also the literary unity of Joshua with the Pentateuch, of which it is indeed a veritable and avowed continuation, or the existence of a Hexateuch, as the sixfold book is called. The writers were probably contemporaries, or else had access to contemporary documents; for the narrative is fresh and vivid, and the information throughout is that most likely to proceed from eye-witnesses. The very defects of the book in its geographical portion—e.g., no lists of the towns of Ephraim and Manasseh, imperfect lists for Zebulon and Asher—indicate the composition of these sections before the final settlement of the country, a "state of the e.

accounts of events which took place after Joshua's death, as the capture of Hebron by Caleb, of Debor by Othniel (xv. 13-20), and of Lehem by the Danites (xix. 47); such phrases as that the Jebusites dwelt with the children of Judah at Jerusalem (xv. 63), and the oft-repeated "unto this day" (e.g., iv. 8, v. 9); the mention of Rahab as still living when the author wrote (vi. 25); and other literary phenomena, seem to show that the book, as a whole, is later than Joshua. That Joshua himself furnished materials for it is probable: indeed, he may have written large portions of it. Although our present book is stated to be a reproduction of Joshua's historical poem, a portion of more than one hand in its materials, it has been unified and revised by some unknown editor; so that, as it comes before us to-day, it is a consistent narrative.

The two difficulties often urged against the book, on the grounds of its science and materials, are of little importance. The first relates to the still being staid upon Gibeon (x. 13). But this passage is avowedly poetical, and no such violent change in the universe as the supposed miracle would involve was dreamed of by the writer, who merely incorporated in his narrative a few lines from a justly celebrated historical poem. The second difficulty relates to the extermination of the Canaanites. It is sufficient to say, that the hopeless corruption of the Canaanites, and the religious interests of Israel and of humanity, demanded it. And as much of the later trouble of Israel came from their disobedience in stopping before the conquest was really concluded, and in allowing the idolatrous and licentious Canaanites to remain in any portion of the promised land, the wisdom of the divine command is manifest. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Besides, the Israelites under Joshua were hardy warriors, and carnage to their eyes was not shocking, and they rightly considered the Canaanites as foes to Jehovah, and unworthy to live.

LIT.—Among modern commentators may be mentioned Maurer (Stuttgart, 1831), Keil (Elangen, 1847; English translation, Edinburgh, 1847); abridged, Leipzig, 1863; 2d ed., 1874); Knobel (Leipzig, 1861), Fay (in Lange, Bielefeld, 1870; English translation, New York, 1872); Crosby (New York, 1875); G. A. McLeod (Cambridge, 1878); Colenso: The Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua (London, 1879), The Pulpit Commentary (London, 1881); J. J. Lias (Cambridge, 1882). See also Miss Smiley: The Fruits of Blessing (New York, 1876), an allegorical commentary on Joshua, but very edifying and impressive.

JOSUA, Spurious Book of, a collection of stories about the Samaritans, but not recognized by them. It relates the history of Joshua, with numerous departures from the Hebrew text, mere Samaritan fables, and continues the Jewish history down to Alexander Severus. The only manuscript copy of it in existence belonged to Jos. Scaliger, and is now in the Leyden Library. It was reprinted by T. G. J. Juynboll: Liber Jotawm Chronicum Samaritanum, Lud. Batav. [Leyden], 1848. It is written in Arabic in Samaritan characters. Another reproduction of Joshua's history is the Samaritan Chronicle of Abul Phetach. See Abulfath Annales Samaritani, edited by Ed. Vilmar, Gothia, 1860 (with Latin translation).

JOSIAH (whom Jehovah heaps), king of Judah, son and successor of the murdered Amon; was put on the throne, at the age of eight years, by the people, who frustrated the designs of his father's murderers, and reigned thirty-one years (B.C. 641—609). The account of his reign is given in 2 Kings xxii.—xxiii. 30, 2 Chron. xxxiv.—xxxv. Nothing is told us, however, about the early history of the king, nor of the influences under which he grew up. The narrative in Kings begins with his repair of the temple in the eighteenth year of his reign; and that in Chronicles, with the beginning of his destruction of idolatry in the twelfth. But that these acts were not the first evidences of his pious character, which made him one of the best of Judah's kings, is manifest from the high praise of 2 Kings xxii. 2, xxiii. 25. The great event in his reign occurred in his eighteenth year, referred to above. During the repairs, which apparently had been begun since Jehoiada's day (2 Kings xii. 11 sq.), the book of the law was found in the house of the JOSIAH. 1204 JOVINIAN.

Lord by Hilkiah the priest. Hilkiah gave it to Shaphan the scribe, who read it before the king. (The "book" was probably Deuteronomy: if it was the whole Pentateuch, then it must have taken at least ten hours to read it through aloud.) The king was so much terrified by the "book," that he rent his clothes, and immediately sent Shaphan and three others to Huldah the prophetess to learn the will of the Lord. She replied, that the Lord intended to punish the people for their long-continued disobedience, according to the warnings of the book; but, in consequence of Josiah's ready and sincere humiliation, the strokes were to be delayed until after his death. The king gathered together all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem, the priests and the prophets, and all the people, and read to them the "book of the law," and with them entered into a solemn covenant to keep all its words. Then it must have crossed near the lower portion of Judah. Jeremiah and Zephaniah were the prophets of Josiah's reign.

JOST, Isaac Marcus, b. at Bernburg, Feb. 22, 1793: d. at Francfort-on-the-Main, Nov. 20, 1860; was educated in a Jewish orphan-asylum at Wolfenbüttel; studied at Göttingen and Berlin; and was director of a Jewish school, first at Berlin, afterwards at Francfort-on-the-Main. He was a prolific writer; but his principal work is his Geschichte der Israeliten (1820–28, 9 vols.), of which a continuation, a tenth volume, appeared 1846–47.

JOTHAM (Jehovah is upright).—1. The youngest son of Gideon, and the only one of his family who escaped the massacre of Abimelech, at Ophrah. He is chiefly remembered for his famous parable of the trees, by which he rebuked the Shechemites for their treachery. After he had delivered his warning, he disappeared from history. (See Judg. ix. 5–21.)—2. The son and successor of Uzziah, or Azariah, king of Judah (2 Kings xvi. 32–38). The date and length of his reign cannot be exactly determined. It was, however, prosperous; and he showed his piety by building, or rebuilding, "the higher gate" of the temple (2 Kings xv. 35), called in Jer. xx. 2 the "Benjamin Gate," and described by Ezek. viii. 3 as the gate towards the north, near the great altar; and the chronicler (2 Chron. xxvii. 3, 4) relates, that, "on the wall of Ophel he built much. Moreover, he built cities in the mountains of Judah, and in the forests he built castles and towers." He led a successful campaign against the Ammonites (2 Chron. xxvii. 5). Isaiah prophesied under him.

KAUTZSCH.

JOVINIAN, Flavius Claudius, was commander of the imperial life-guard when Julian died (June 27, 363), and was proclaimed emperor by the army the following day. He was a kind and prudent man, but neither a perfectly pure character. A Christian himself, he immediately cancelled the laws of Julian against Christianity, revived the monogram of Christ on the imperial standards, and restored to the Christian clergy their privileges and revenues. But at the same time he showed perfect toleration with respect to Paganism, defended the Neo-Platonic philosophers against Christian fanatics, re-opened those temples which had been shut on the death of Julian, etc. He was a decided adherent of Athanasius, and invited him to Antioch to confer with him; but he showed himself perfectly impartial in his dealings with the Christians. He might have exercised a beneficial influence on the turbulent development of the Church; but he died suddenly, after a reign of only eight months, at Dadastana, on the road from Antioch to Constantinople, Feb. 17, 364. (See De la Bléterie, Histoire de l'empereur Jovien, 1846.)

WAGENMANN.

JOVINIAN, a Roman monk and "heretic," from the second half of the fourth century; d. probably before 406. Of his life very little is known. About 388 he lived in Rome, dressed poorly, went barefoot, ate nothing but bread and water, and remained unmarried. He knew the Scriptures well, and wrote several pamphlets which attracted attention. His "heresy" consisted principally in his opposition to the asceticondensation of the enduring virtues of the soul. Between virginity, widowhood, and the married state, there is no moral difference, he said: between abstinence from food, and eating it properly, there is no difference. He especially protested against the establishment of a scale of virtue and a corresponding scale of blessedness, asserting that the divine element in human life is one and the same under all external circumstances; that all who are baptized to Christ, and are born anew, have morally the same calling, the same dignity, the same grace, and the same blessedness. How deep an impression he made may be inferred from the fact, that in 380 Pope Siricius found it necessary to convene a synod in Rome, and have him condemned. This decision was communicated to other bishops, more especially to Ambrosius of Milan, in whose diocese Jovinian and his adherents had sought refuge; and in 381 Ambrosius convened a synod in Milan, where the condemnation was repeated. Augustine wrote against Jovinian (1840, "De Bono Conjugali; De Virginitate), especially against his denial of the perpetua virginits Mariae, and his doctrine of the equality of all sins. But it is more specially Jerome's "Adversus Jovinianum" which throws light on this whole subject, though it is written with so much acrimony that it cannot be used without great caution. By modern church-historians—Flavius, Banasse, Mosheim, Walch, Neander, Baur, and others—Jovinian has generally been recognized as a representative of the true principle of Protestantism. See G. B. Lindner: "De Joviniano et Vigilantio," Leipzig, 1840. WAGENMANN.

JUBILEE, Year of, among the Hebrews. See SABBATICAL YEAR.

JUBILEE, or JUBILEE YEAR, one of the meanest institutions of the Roman-Catholic Church; has no connection whatever, either historically or typically, with the jubilee-year of the Old Testament. It originated incidentally. In the last days of 1299 a rumor sprang up in Rome that every one who visited the Church of St. Peter on Jan. 1, 1300, would receive full absolution. As, in consequence of this rumor, immense crowds thronged the church on that day,—not only citizens of Rome, but also foreign pilgrims,—the attention of the Pope was aroused, and investigations were made in the papal archives concerning any probable foundation for the rumor. Nothing was found. Nevertheless, when an old peasant of one hundred and seven years told the Pope that, one hundred years ago, his father had gone to Rome to obtain the jubilee absolution, and that an indulgence valid for a whole century was to be had in Rome at any day during that year, Boniface VIII. issued a bull (April 22, 1300) inducing all to come to Rome and receive absolution. The influx of pilgrims was enormous, swelling the power of the Pope and the pockets of the citizens. In 1343 the latter petitioned Clement VI. to shorten the term between each two jubilees, and celebrate the festival every fifth year. The Pope was merciful, and granted the petition. Other popes were still more merciful. Urban VI. shortened the term to thirty-three years, April 8, 1389; Paul II., to twenty-five years, 1470. It was even determined that a pilgrimage to Rome should not be necessary in order to obtain the jubilee indulgence: it could be had in the nearest church by paying a sum of money equal to the expenses of the pilgrimage. After the Reformation, however, the institution lost its dignity, even in the eyes of the Roman Catholics themselves. Nevertheless it has not been abrogated. G. PLITT.

JUBILEES, Book of. See PSEUDEPIGRAPHHS, OLD TESTAMENT.

JUD (pronounced Yude), Leo (Latin, Leo Judae), in every-day life called Meister Leu, which name his descendants adopted; b. at Gernar in Alsace, 1482; d. at Zürich, June 19, 1542; studied at Basel, 1498-1506 (first medicine, afterwards, on the instance of Zwingli, theology), and was appointed pastor of Einsiedeln in 1518, and of the Church of St. Peter in Zürich in 1522. He was an intimate friend of Zwingli, and his true and steady assistant in the carrying-out of the Reformation in Zürich. In literary respects he was most active as translator. Of the so-called Zürich Bible he did the Old Testament. He also translated the New Testament into Latin. His Life was written by C. Pestalozzi, Elberfeld, 1860. His was the German Bible used by Coverdale. See WESTCOTT'S "History of the English Bible," pp. 218, 214.

JUDEA was the name given to the lowermost of the three divisions of the Holy Land in the Saviour's time. It lay south of Samaria, and west of the Jordan. It was occupied, after the exile, by the captives from Assyria and Babylonia, but was made a portion of the Roman province of Syria A.D. 6, after Archelaus was deposed, and was ruled by a procurator under the governor of Syria, and whose residence was in Caesarea, not in Jerusalem. The word first occurs in Dan. v. 13 (A. V., "Jewry"); and the "province" of Judea is first mentioned in Ez. v. 8, and alluded to in Neh. xi. 3 (Hebrew and A. V., "Judah"). In the Apocrypha, Judæa and "country of Judea" frequently occur. In New-Testament times the term was loosely used to include the transjordanic provinces (Matt. xix. 1, etc.). The hill country of Judea (Luke i. 65) was the central ridge of mountains stretching from north to south through Palestine. The wilderness of Judea is a wild, desolate, uninhabited region, extending from the hill country, near Jerusalem, south-east to the Dead Sea, with an average width of fifteen miles (Matt. iii. 1). Here John preached, and our Lord was tempted.

JUDAH (praise; Greek form, Judas), a common name among the later Jews, particularly the Levites. Judah, the son of Jacob and Leah, although in age the fourth, virtually supplanted Reuben, the first-born, and enjoyed the respect of all his brothers by his energy of character. It was he who advised the selling of Joseph to Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 26, 27), and who became surety for Benjamin (xliii. 9), and made that touching speech before Joseph (xliiv. 18-34). In the matter of Tamar (xxxviii.) he does not appear in a favorable light; but even then his sense of justice and his inherent nobility came out. These traits characterized his descendants; and the prophecy of Jacob was fulfilled according to which the right of primogeniture was given to him by his brethren; and he held the sceptre until Shiloh came (xlix. 8-12).

V. Orelli.

JUDAH, Kingdom of. See ISRAEL.

JUDAH, Tribe of. See TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

JUDAS, one of the twelve apostles, carefully distinguished by the evangelists from Judas Iscariot; called also Lebbeus and Thaddæus (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 16; John xiv. 22; Acts i. 13). His surnames Lebbeus and Thaddeus mean the same thing. The first comes from ἱδρινον ("heart"), and the second from γνήσιος ("a mother's breast"): hence they mean beloved child. We know nothing about his history before or after his connection with Jesus. Tradition is also late and contradictory. According to Abdias he preached for a period in Palestine, Syria, and Arabia. The Syrian Church first distinguishes him from Thaddeus the missionary of Syria, then confounds him with the latter, and puts his martyrdom in Phoenicia.

SIEFFERT.

JUDAS ISCARIOT, one of the twelve disciples, and the betrayer of Jesus; was the son of a certain Simon. The name Iscariot, it is now generally agreed, is a derivative of Kerioth, a town in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 25). If it be true that this was the native place of Judas, then he was the solitary Judan among the disciples, who otherwise were from Galilee. The reference to the infamy, which, ever after his last in the lists of the disciples, and probably the hypocritical plea of a "thief" (John xii. 6) who might do good to the poor. John represents this as the hypocritical plea of a "thief" (xii. 6) who had no sympathy with the poor.

1. Tan Amnssros or JUDAS To run Cou

Two questions force themselves upon the attention in the study of the character of Judas: What was Christ's purpose in admitting him to the number of the twelve disciples? and what motives had Judas in betraying Christ?

I. THE ADMISSION OF JUDAS TO THE COMPANY OF THE DISCIPLES. — The difficulty of arriving at satisfactory results in the discussion of this question arises from theanthropocentric personality of Christ, and the meeting in him of a divine and human knowledge. Different theories have been urged to account for Christ's admission of Judas. (1) Christ made the choice with the prevision that Judas would betray him. He knew that he was a thoroughly depraved man. He selected Judas because he knew he would betray him (Calvin, Hengstenberg, Plumptre, and others), or in obedience to the Father (Luther, Godet, etc.). If the words of John, "Jesus knew from the beginning . . . who it was that should betray him" (vi. 44), admit only of the interpretation that he knew it from the very first choice of the disciples, then this view is the only tenable one. (2) Jesus admitted Judas into the college of the disciples, recognizing his good qualities, and hoping to train him into a devoted follower, as he did Peter. He did not foresee his treason, just as he did not know the day of judgment. Judas was led by his Messianic hopes, and a certain admiration of Jesus, to join himself to his followers. Jesus gradually became familiar with the inveterate depravity of his nature, as it expressed itself in hypocrisy, an inordinate love of money, etc. This is the view of Neander, Lange, Ebrard, Weiss (Com. on John, Note on chap. vi.), and others. In Christ's presence, men became either better or worse. Judas might have become better; but in reality he became worse.

II. MOTIVES OF THE BETRAYAL. — The treachery of Judas stands out in the sharpest contrast to the goodness of Christ. It perhaps represents the culmination of human ingratitude, as the cross represents the culmination of divine love. Luke and John both ascribe Judas' deed to treason (Acts xxviii. 3; John xiii. 2, 27). The evangelists do not give us an exhaustive analysis of the motives of his deed. (1) The immediate motive advanced by them was avarice. Thirty pieces of silver was not much, but great crimes have been committed for sums more paltry. There were, no doubt, other motives mixed up with this. A grave crime is often the resultant of many motives. (2) He desired to save himself. He felt that Christ could not go on much longer as he had been going. The bitter enmity of the Jews would cross the pathway of Christ. He recognized the purity of the Master, and in the presence of it he felt himself condemned. He shrank from that pure and benevolent eye. Such words as "Ye are clean, but not all," the commendation of Mary (John xii.), and the reproach of miserliness, festered in his bosom. Vice, as it often does, in his case became vindictive, and, in the hope of exciting itself, struck at virtue. Other motives have been assigned for Judas' action. (1) He betrayed Christ from motives of patriotism. (2) He was carrying out a subtle plan by which he expected to force Christ to manifest his Messianic power, and realize the triumph of the Messianic kingdom. This, the view of Archbishop Whately, supposes that Judas had confidence in Christ, and believed he would not suffer himself to be put to death. Both these views are at variance with the accounts in the Gospels.

The crime of Judas some have attempted to extenuate on the ground that he was the executive of a divine and irresistible purpose to bring about Christ's death, which was necessary to the salvation of the race. The Perate and Cainites, two Gnostic sects of the second century, went so far as to represent him as the true apostle, whose deed liberated Christ from the bondage of man. All rest of Christ in the New Testament, and the teaching of the words of Christ, "Woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! It had been good for that man if he had not been born" (Matt. xxvi. 24). Dante places Judas, together with Brutus and Cassius, in the lowest apartment of hell. The last words of Judas, "I have sinned in that I betrayed innocent blood," were not words of repentance, but of remorse and despair. They were uttered in the spirit of Macbeth after he had murdered Duncan,

"I am afraid to think what I have done.

Look not again, I dare not." Peter's denial differed from Judas' crime by being a sin of "sudden lapse." Judas was deliberate in his planning, and malevolent in his intent.

LIT. — ZANDT: Comment. de Judae proditore, Lips., 1769; DAB: Judas Ischarioth, Heidelberg, 1816-18; the Commentaries on Matthew and John, and an excellent article in Smith's Bible Dictionary by Dean Plumptre, and the addition in the American edition by Professor Edwards A. PARK.

D. S. SCHAFF.

JUDE. See Macabees.

JUDE, THE EPISTLE OF, one of the seven Catholic Epistles of the New Testament; was written by "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James" (ver. 1). The author does not call himself an apostle, nor does any thing in the Epistle indicate that he was known by that title. The distinctive indication is that he was not an apostle in verse 17, where he speaks of the "apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ." For this reason it is more than probable that the author was a different person from Judas Lebbeus, one of the Twelve. This is made certain by his fraternal relation to James (ver. 1), who can be none other than the brother of our Lord, and the head of the Church in Jerusalem. (See James, THE BROTHER or OUR LORD.) Jude was, therefore, one of the Lord's brothers (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3), and the son of Mary. Jude addressed his letter, not to any local congregation, but to the Church at large. Its circle of readers was even larger than that addressed by James, including not only the believers within and outside of Palestine, but all believers, without distinction of birth or locality. It is true, however, that certain local perversions of the truth, and moral decay, formed the occasion of the Epistle. It contains references and warnings to those that had given themselves up to fornication (ver. 8), and were walking after their own lusts (ver. 19). But they were not simply practical libertinism (De Wette), but combined with their moral laxness errors of doctrine. They were, in fact, false teachers (Dorner, Doctr. of the Person of Christ, i. p. 104), as is evident from verse 4, which speaks of "certain men who had crept in, perverting the teaching of the "common salvation" (ver. 3). These teachers were still in communion with the Church (ver. 12); but their doctrines tended... to derogate from the honor of Christ. They engaged in dreamy speculations (ver. 8), and from them proceeded their imputed ignorance, and the depreciation of Christ and the angels.

These teachers, however, are not to be identified with the Gnostics of the second century. The descriptions in the Epistle are too general in their character to warrant this view. Nevertheless, the false teaching described in the Epistle of Jude belongs to the germ-period of Gnosticism. Hegesippus (Euseb., H.E., IV. 22) was not without authority for saying, that, after the death of James, difficulties manifested themselves in the Church, which he associates very closely with the Gnosticism of a later period. The errorists of Jude resemble the Nicolaitans of the Apocalypse; and Thiersch, Ewald, and Huther find the resemblance so strong as to regard their errors as a later form of the Nicolaitan heresy. Whether these tendencies were really prevalent over the whole Christian Church, or not, the disciples as though they were, and exhorts the believers to hold fast to the teaching of the Apostles (vers. 3, 17).

The date at which Jude wrote his Epistle cannot be determined with definiteness from the use it made of other writings, and the use they made of it. The Book of Enoch is not only referred to in verse 6, but is also quoted (ver. 14 sq.). This work in its original form was certainly written in the time of the early Maccabean princes (Lücke, Ewald, Dillmann, Hilgenfeld, Langen), and probably in the reign of Jonathan (Sieffert, De Apocryphi libri Henochi origine et argumento, 1867). The Assumptio Moris, which seems to be referred to in verse 9, was probably written between 44 A.D. and the end of the period, uniting in the leading tribe (i. 1, 2), and to her belonged Othniel, the first judge; then the leadership passed to Ephraim, first under Deborah, until Jephthah had his break with the tribe. After him no tribe gained especial ascendency. It was not, indeed, until Eli, at the end of the period, uniting in himself the priestly and the judicial elements, drew the people together, that a nation was evolved. In consequence of this lack of unity, we read in Judges of individual undertakings only and conquests. Twice, indeed, under Othniel and Ehud, “all Israel” joined in the struggle: but Deborah seems to have collected only Ephraim, Benjamin, Manasseh, Zebulon, Issachar, and Naphtali; Gideon ruled over only Manasseh, Asher, Zebulon, and Naphtali; Jephthah fought the Ammonites with the assistance of only Gilead and Manasseh; and Samson ruled only Judah and Dan. Thus a brotherhood of civil and religious union is strikingly true: “In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did what was right in his own eyes” (Judg. xvii. 6, xxii. 25). Of course from such a state of things one would expect no security for life or property; and for proof that there was none see Deborah’s statement, v. 6. Nor would religion prosper. Israel was a theocracy, and the holy place was where the tabernacle was. Accordingly there the people assembled to learn Jehovah’s will, so that they might follow his direction (x. 18, xx. 2; cf. i. 1, x. 10). But the book plainly shows, that, after the influence of the tabernacle was slight. It is a striking fact, that from Philo of Alexandria to the beginning of the period, to Eli, at its close, not a single high priest is named,—a sure proof of their small importance. On the other hand, the repeated apostasies, and such unions of idolatry and the Jehovah worship as in the case of Gideon, God of Israel, and Micah’s house of gods (xvii. 5), speak volumes on the real state of religion. The ark itself was an object of superstitious reverence (1 Sam. iv. 3).
The third characteristic was the change in the divine revelations (cf. 1 Sam. iii. 1). In the beginning, God dealt personally with men, then through angels, then through prophets, until finally even these ceased after Malachi. The period of the judges marks the transition from the second to the third species of divine revelations. The angel of the Lord appeared at the beginning of the period like a human being (Judg. ii. 1–3); but, besides the passing allusion in Deborah’s song, only two important actions are done or announced by angels,—the call of Gideon (vi. 11 sqq.) and the birth of Samuel (xiii. 3). In 1 Sam. no angel is mentioned; in 2 Sam., only one (xxiv. 16 sqq.). In the days of the judges, on the other hand, the prophetic office was developed. Deborah was a prophetess (Judg. ii. 1–5); but, besides the passing allusion in Deborah’s song, only two important actions are done or announced by angels,—the call of Gideon (vi. 11 sqq.) and the birth of Samuel (xiii. 3). In 1 Sam. no angel is mentioned; in 2 Sam., only one (xxiv. 16 sqq.). In the days of the judges, on the other hand, the prophetic office was developed. Deborah was a prophetess (Judg. iv. 4); two unnamed prophets are spoken of (vi. 8; 1 Sam. ii. 27 sqq.); and at the close of the period appears Samuel, a prophet in the full sense of the word, whose schools of the prophets, or, more correctly, unions of prophets, were established (1 Sam. x. 5; 10).

In general, the period of the judges was both a close and a beginning. It closed the nomadic, unsettled life of the wandering and the conquest: it prepared the way for the orderly and regulated life of the monarchy. In Egypt, Israel had become a people without a country: in the period of the judges the people took root in the territory God gave them. It was a time of personal heroism; but these heroes of Israel are not to be confounded with the heroes of mythology, as some would do. It was a time of noble works, as well as deeds. Deborah’s ode is a masterpiece, and a model for all time; Jotham’s fable (Judg. ix. 7 sqq.) equals any, although it is the oldest of all; the speeches of Gideon and Jephthah are fine specimens of rugged eloquence; and, finally, Samuel was a teacher sent from God, faithful, fearless, fertile, with the heroes of mythology, as some would do. It was a time of noble works, as well as deeds. Deborah’s ode is a masterpiece, and a model for all time; Jotham’s fable (Judg. ix. 7 sqq.) equals any, although it is the oldest of all; the speeches of Gideon and Jephthah are fine specimens of rugged eloquence; and, finally, Samuel was a teacher sent from God, faithful, fearless, fertile, from whose lips dropped pearls of wisdom. It was the time of the strongest theocracy in form, but the weakest in power; for only while the accepted representative of Jehovah, the judge, lived, did the people worship Jehovah.

The name Judge (בָּרֵךְ) implies chiefly, but not only, judicial activity in the strict sense. Some of them, e.g., Samuel, were probably not judges at all; but, on the other hand, others were, e.g., Deborah (Judg. iv. 5), Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 15–17), and his sons (viii. 1–3). Again: the “judge” was not hereditary ruler, not king (hence Abimelech, who, on the strength of his father’s [Gideon’s] authority, claimed kingship, cannot be reckoned among the Judges); but he was divinely appointed ruler, and had the piety of the people in charge. But the “judge” was always the savior of his country.

The following was the order of the judges:

1. Othniel, who delivered Israel from the Canaanites, and won which arose after Joshua, and the eldersthat their gods as a snare (ii. 1–5). The author explains the failure, in part, on the idea that the generation which arose after Joshua, and the elders that outlived him, “knew not the Lord, neither the works which he had done for Israel” (ii. 10). In order to set forth this point clearly, the author recurst again to the last official act of Joshua recorded in Josh. xxiv. 28, and retells the success sive deaths of the fathers, and then summarizes the history of the period of the judges. Chap. iii. contains these two ground thoughts of the book, gives a list of the nations left to prove Israel, and adds the new ideas that these nations taught the Israelites how to war (iii. 2), and that they lived peaceably together, even to the extent of intermarriage.

This division, the main part of the book, contains the six great periods of the history, with their subdivisions: (1) Othniel (iii. 7-11); (2) Ehud (iii. 12-30), with allusion to Shamgar (iii. 31), a contemporary judge; (3) Deborah and Barak (iv. and v.); (4) Gideon (vi. 1-xxiv. 33), with the history of Abimelech (ix.), and allusion to Tola and Jair (x. 1-5), contemporary judges; (5) Jephthah (x. 6-xii. 7), and allusion to Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (xii. 8-15), contemporary judges; (6) Samuel (xiii.-xv.); (7) Saul, Samuel with Saul, Saul and David (xv. 1-xxvii. 28), with the history of David, who is the favorite king, and the temple, which he built, and the history of Solomon, the last king of the united kingdom; (8) Rehoboam, Abijam, and Asa (xxviii. 1-xxix. 20), with the history of Rehoboam, the first of the divided kings; (9); and for the second, cf. xx. 27 sq. with Josh. xxii. 13, xxiv. 33.

The Book of Judges is of single authorship, although the materials may have been derived from various sources. The only note of time of composition is given in xviii. 30. "Jonathan ... and his sons were priests to the tribe of Dan until the day of the captivity of the land." This doubtless refers to the Assyrian captivity, either under Manasseh, or Sargon (2 Kings xvii. 6), B.C. 721; or Manasseh, or Sargon (2 Kings xvii. 6), B.C. 721; and therefore the book was written after that occurrence.

LIT.—Modern commentaries are by STUDER (Bern, 1835; 5d (title) ed., 1842); BENTHEAU (Lausanne, 1845); KIRCH (English translation, Edinburgh, 1865); CASKEL, in LANE'S (English translation, New York, 1872); HERVEY, in Speaker's Commentary (New York, 1875); DOUGLAS (Edinburgh, 1881); cf. WELLHAUSEN-BLEEK (Einführung, Berlin, 1879), and WELLHAUSEN (Ge schichte, ii. vii.). See also BALDEweg: Das Zeul alter d. Richter, Zittau, 1877.

JUDGMENT, The Divine. The word "judgment" is in the Bible used in three senses: 1st, Pictorially as the place of judgment, inclusive, however, of the act (Ps. i. 5, cxxix. 64, cxlii. 2; Ezek. xlvi. 21); 2d, the local history (Mark iii. 29; John v. 29; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6); 3d, the single acts of judgment upon individuals or nations, particularly punishments (Ps. x. 5, cxxix. 76). Such judgments are as executed upon earth through miracles, or in the ordinary course of God's providences, are not only relative, and look forward to a future absolutely right and absolutely complete divine judgment which is appointed to every soul after death (Eccl. xi. 9; Heb. ix. 27), and to the whole race at some future definitely fixed time called "The [judgment] day of Jehovah," or "the day of judgment" (2 Pet. ii. 8, iii. 7; 1 John iv. 17; cf. Rev. xiv. 7). So the prophets declare. Thus Joel, after describing the plague of locusts which passed over Judah, passes on to speak of the judgment which was to come upon all nations (iii. 1 sqq.); and so Amos (v. 18 sqq.); and from that time Isaiah speaks of the exile as an imminent judgment upon Israel (xi. 14), after which there would be a deliverance through the Messiah, and finally Jehovah would come to judge all those who had not accepted the Messiah (xxxiv. 1 sqq., lxvi. 16 sqq.; Dan. vii. 22 sqq.).

Thus it is shown that the idea of a world's judgment was familiar to the Old Testament; but its aim was not to show how God would separate the sinners from the righteous, and thus render it possible to have his will done on earth as it is in heaven. The main idea to this operation is simply the saving and perfection of the Church upon the earth.

The doctrine of the divine judgment is completed in the New Testament. That it is by no means the idea a manifestation of abstract distributive justice is proved by the person chosen to be the judge, who is none other than the Son (John v. 22), and who judges, as the Son of man, the head and redeemer of his Church, and for his Church's sake. He judges his Church, in the first place, in order that it may be holy, calling upon it to suffer persecution and trial so that its virtues may increase. But when the world threatens to destroy his Church, then he comes to avenge her (Luke xviii. 7, xxxi. 22; Rev. vi. 10, xix. 2). Hence it follows that the persons who are to be judged on the last day are those who do not belong to Christ's Church, those who are his living or dead enemies (John v. 24). Those who have fallen asleep in Christ live with him in heaven (1 Thess. v. 10), and are awakened in the first resurrection (Rev. xx. 1 sqq.), and are in heaven (Rev. xxii. 1 sqq.), and are now in heaven (Matt. xxvii. 57; cf. John viii. 50).

The judgment falls naturally into two parts, — that of the living and that of the dead; or those upon the earth and those in Sheol. The first part is in two acts: First, immediately upon Christ's second coming he will "cast alive into the lake of fire" the antichrist and the false prophet (Rev. xix. 20; cf. Isa. lxvi. 24): the rest of the people, will be allowed to live under favorable spiritual influences, and to be the children of God among them (Rev. xx. 1 sqq.). After an son has passed, the wicked will be destroyed by fire from heaven (xx. 9): there thus will be no more living. Then the second act begins the judgment of the dead. Sheol gives
Mr. Judson was a man of medium height and slender person. He was endowed with strong intelectual powers, and sought in his Christian life, by the perusal of the works of Mme. Guyon and others, a fervent type of piety. His confidence in the success of missionary effort was peculiarly strong. Being asked, on his visit to America, whether the prospects were bright for the conversion of the world, he immediately replied, "As bright, Sir, as the promises of God." Adoniram Judson was one of the most heroic and devoted, as well as one of the earliest, missionaries which America sent forth to heathen lands. His name will ever continue to shine amongst the galaxy of apostolic laborers. He has merited, and will ever continue to be known by the proud title of the Apostle of Burmah. See J. D. Knowles: Life of Mrs. Ann H. Judson, 3d ed., Boston, 1839; Stuart: Lives of Mrs. Ann H. and Sarah B. Judson, with a Biographical Sketch of Mrs. Emily C. Judson, 1853; Francis Wayland: Life and Labors of Judson, D.D., Boston and London, 1853.

JUGGERNAUT (more correctly Jagannatha), a town on the seacoast of Orissa, in Bengal, India, famous for its temple with its idol, and formerly for disgusting human sacrifices. It is the holiest of Hindu shrines, and annually visited, it is said, by upwards of a million pilgrims. The temple may be described as a city of temples; for most of the Hindoo divinities have temples within the enclosure. Krishna (one of the incarnations of Vishnu) is, however, honored by the principal idol, bearing the epithet Jagannatha, "the lord of the world," whence the name Juggernaut; and with it are Siva and Sudhadra, each a block of wood, six feet high, surmounted by a hideous representation of a human face. Krishna is painted dark blue, Siva white, and Sudhadra yellow. Each idol has a special chariot; but Krishna's is the largest, forty-three feet and a half high, thirty-four feet and a half square, rolling on sixteen wheels, each six feet and a half in diameter. Every March the great festival of Juggernaut is celebrated. On this occasion the famous idols are drawn one mile and a half out of the city, to their sanctuary, and are towed by ropes pulled by thousands of pilgrims. It is said that formerly many of these threw themselves beneath the wheels, voluntary sacrifices to the great Jagannatha. But nothing of the kind happens now. The worship of the idol is characterized by obscenity; yet the British, who took the town in 1803, down to 1855, actually supported it; at first by a tax upon the pilgrims, and then by direct grant. But this disgrace is now no more.

JULIAN (Flavius Claudius Julianus), Roman Emperor 331-363; was a son of Constantius, the younger half-brother of Constantine the Great. When Constantine's sons succeeded their father (in 337), Constantius was put to death, and Julian and his older half-brother were spared only because they were considered harmless. Julian was educated in the Christian faith. Eusebius of Nicomedia was his tutor, then, after the death of the great bishop (in 342) he was removed from Constantinople to Macellum in Cappadocia, his every-day company were the Christian clerks of the place. He copied religious books, built a chapel, and participated, as a lector, in conducting the service, though he was probably not baptized. Nevertheless, that one of his teachers, who, according to his own words, exercised the deepest influence on him, was Mardonius, a man whose whole mental development was based on the ideas of Greek Paganism, though externally he was a Christian. The grammarian Niconae and the rhetorician Theophilus, who from whom he studied when (in 350) he was recalled from Macellum to Constantinople, were Christians of the same description: hence the explanation of his so-called apostasy. In 351 he was again banished from Constantinople. While sojourning in Nicomedia, Pergamum, and Ephesus, he became acquainted, through Libanius and Maximus, with the highest form of Pagan civilization,—Neo-Platonism; and on the instance of Maximus he formally abandoned Christianity, and embraced Paganism. But his cousin, the emperor, was a fanatic adversary of Paganism. He had closed the temples, forbidden the sacrifices, and all but destroyed the whole worship. Julian was consequently compelled to conceal the change which had taken place within him, and this compulsory hypocrisy made the young enthusiast passionate and bitter. In 355 he was again called to the court, made Caesar, and in 356 he destroyed the whole temple. Julian and his older half-brother were spared only because they were considered harmless. Julian and his older half-brother were spared only because they were considered harmless. Julian and his older half-brother were spared only because they were considered harmless.
establishment. It must be noticed, however, that the restoration thus attempted was not simply a reaction against Christianity, but much more—a fundamental reform of Paganism itself. It was not the old, naive, popular worship which Julian wished to revive: it was a new, subtle, theological system, based on the philosophy of the Neo-Platonists, which he wanted to establish. All the practical lines of his plans run back to the mysteries as the model. The Paganism which Julian labored to restore was the mystery transformed from an esoteric science into a popular education, from an exclusive institution to a general social function. The return to Paganism was to be made dependent upon a kind of inauguration, with peculiar ceremonies. A priesthood was to be created, not only hierarchically organized, with the emperor at the head as pontifex maximus, but also socially distinguished from the mass of the people. A priest should be a man of philosophy and asceticism, shunning the inns and the theatres, and occupied in praying and caring for the poor, for Julian was not afraid of borrowing from Christianity itself. Charity is a specifically Christian virtue, entirely unknown to antique civilization; and Julian admired the relations which Christianity had created between rich and poor. He consequently wanted to inculcate the new principle on his restored Paganism; but this character of his work—its being a reform, rather than a restoration, of Paganism—explains the singular coldness with which it was met by the Pagans themselves. While residing in Antioch, he must have noticed many indications, not only of lack of sympathy with his plans, but of direct aversion to them; and he must have received some impression from them, coming as they did from those among his subjects to whom he wanted to appear as a liberator.

The question, what Julian finally meant to do with Christianity, is not easy to answer. He despaired, perhaps he hated it: at all events his hand fell heavily upon it. Not only were the Christians excluded from all public offices, but the Church lost all its privileges. It was bereft of the support from the State, and in some cases even compelled to a back what it had received in earlier times. It lost its right of jurisdiction, of legalizing wills, of receiving donations, etc. The clergy was again made subject to taxation and conscription. The hardest blow, however, was the school law of June 17, 302. It ordered that all candidates for positions as teachers should obtain the confirmation of the secular authorities, that is, indirectly from the emperor himself; and such a law could not fail, in the course of time, practically to exclude the Christians from the schools and from all higher education. In 1438 and 1439 he was active in Florence and Ferrara, and used in many difficult affairs. The Hussite question was confided to him, and he entered Bohemia at the head of a crusading army; but the army was defeated, and the cardinal fled (1431). From 1431 to 1438 he presided over the Council of Basel with great distinction. In 1440 he went to Hungary to stir up a war against the Turks. He succeeded; but in 1444 the Hungarians were defeated at Vama, and the cardinal perished on the flight, probably assassinated.
JULIUS.

1214

JUMPERS.

Bishops who had been deposed by a provincial synod. His letters are found in Migne: Patro.

Latin, viii.; his life, in Muratori: Rer. Ital.

Script., iii. 1. See Friedrich: Geschichte des Primates, Bonn, 1879.—Julius II. (Oct. 31, 1503—

Feb. 20, 1513), b. at Albizola, near Savona, 1443, in humble circumstances; was educated to be come a merchant, but entered the service of the Church, when his uncle, Francesco Rovere, became a cardinal; and was made a cardinal himself (1471) when the uncle ascended the papal throne. Under Sextus IV., however, he was not much used. Under Innocent VIII. he exercised more influence. Alexander VI. was his deadly enemy. He fled to France; and, though he afterwards condescended to conduct the negotiations for the marriage of Cesar Borgia, a reconciliation never was effected. During the last year of the reign of Alexander VI. he was compelled to keep himself concealed in order to escape the dagger and the poison of the Pope. After the short reign of Pius III., he himself ascended the papal throne. His great object was the aggrandizement of the States of the Church, the formation of an independent state of military and political consequence in Central Italy under the Pope; and he partially succeeded. But the means he employed — the most unscrupulous diplomacy, the fiercest and bloodiest wars — were such that people turned away from him with horror. To wrench the Romagna from the Venetian, he formed the League of Cambray with Germany,

France, and Spain; but, when he had reached his goal, he wheeled around, and formed the Holy

League with Venice and Spain against France, and for the purpose of obtaining Ferrara. At one moment his position was very dangerous. Lewis

XII. stood in Italy; Maximilian thought of making himself pope; even the cardinals abandoned his cause. But he succeeded in drawing, first

England, afterwards even Germany, into the Holy

League; the result of which was that the French left Italy; and Ferrara, Parma, and Piacenza were incorporated with the Papal States. In the fields of science and art he was as ardent and energetic as in those of politics and war. He built the largest part of the Church of St. Peter, when he died, he left a treasure worth half a million of ducats. His bulls are found in Che-nus: Magnum Bullarium, Lyons, 1655, tom.

i. See M. Brosch: Papst Julius II., Gotha, 1878.

—Julius III. (Feb. 7, 1550—March 23, 1555), b. in Rome, 1497; was made a cardinal in 1536, and acted as papal legate at the opening of the COUNcil of Trent, 1545. In this position he did everything in his power to thwart and frustrate the plans of Charles V. Nevertheless, as soon as he had ascended the papal throne, he became the emperor's willing follower almost in every case.

He lacked power of will, and capacity for action.

In the events then occurring, both in Germany and England, he took very little part. His bulls are found in CHERUBINUS: Magnum Bullarium, (1463. i. See H. Gelzer: Sextus Julius Africani u.

d. byzantinische Chronographie, I.: Die Chronogra-phie, Leipzig, 1880, 11., 885i. ADOLF HARNACK.

JUMPERS, a designation applied to some

Welsh religionists of the last century, who introduced into their worship the practice of dancing and jumping. Under date of June 27, 1763, John Wesley wrote from Wales, "There is here [at Lancroyes] what some call a great reformation in religion among the Methodists; but the case is really this: they have a sort of rustic dance in their public worship, which they call religious dancing, in imitation of David's dancing before the ark." This practice started with the Welsh

Methodists, and was confined to a small circle.

It was at first simply one of the bodily manifestations which followed the fervent preaching of the Methodists. In favor of the more formal practice two passages were quoted, "David danced before the Lord with all his might... and saw David leaping and dancing before the Lord" (2 Sam. vi.

14—16), and "Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy"

(Luke vi. 23). William Williams, the famous Welsh hymn-writer, and for many years a devoted pastor in Wales, advocated and adopted the practice. The jumping followed the sermon, and was preceded by the singing of a verse of some hymn, which was repeated again and again, sometimes forty or even more times. The jumping was accompanied with all kinds of gestures, and often lasted for hours. Mr. Wesley regarded this practice since the days of the early brethren, with the love of God in their heart; but "they have little experience of the ways of God or the devices of Satan" (Tyerman, Life of John Wesley, ii. pp. 480, 481). It is doubtful whether this practice has any followers now in Wales. In the middle ages the sect called the Dancers (see art.) indulged in the same odd religious rite; and the Shakers (see art.) still perpetuate it. See Evans: Denominations of the Christian World, London, 1811; and Tyerman: Life of John Wesley, vol. ii. pp. 480, 481.

JUNIUS, a native of Africa, a contemporary of Cassiodorus; lived in Constantinople, where he held a high position in the civil administration under Justinian. In 551 he published a book (Instituta regularia divinae legis) generally but erroneously called De partibus divini legis, after the heading of the first chapter. The work, which is one of the first attempts in the field of biblical introduction, is dedicated to Bishop Primus; and in the dedication the author states that he has derived the contents of his work from a certain Paulus, a native of Persia, and a pupil of the famous school of Nisibis. The work is found in Migne, Patr. Lat., lxviii., and has recently been edited by Kihn, Freiburg, 1880. See G. A. Beecher: Das System des Kirchenwalters, i., Lübeck, 1787; Kihn: Theodor von Mopswetia und Junilius Africanus, Freiburg, 1879. W. Möller.

JUNIUS, Franciscus (Du Jon), b. at Bourges 1545; d. at Leyden 1602; studied theology in Geneva; was appointed pastor of the Walloon congregation in Antwerp 1565; accompanied the Prince of Orange as camp-preacher in the campaign of 1568; settled in 1573 at Heidelberg, on the invitation of the elector, and worked with Tremellius on the translation of the Old Testament; and was in 1582 made professor of theology at Leyden. Besides his translation of the Old Testament, he wrote exegetical, philological, and polemical treatises, which have been collected in two volumes folio, also containing his biography, Geneva, 1618, republished under the editorship of Abraham Kuyper, Amsterdam, 1882 sqq.

JUNKIN, George, D.D., LL.D., a prominent Presbyterian clergyman and educator; b. near Kingston, N.Y., Nov. 1, 1790; d. in Philadelphia, May 20, 1868. He graduated at Jefferson College; studied theology under Dr. John M. Mason in New York; was pastor of the churches at Milton and McEwensville, Penn.; and in 1832 became president of Lafayette College. He occupied this position till 1841, when he accepted the presidency of Miami University, which he resigned in 1844 to return to his old place at Lafayette, which he filled till 1848, when he became president of Washington College at Lexington, Va. Here he remained till 1861, when his loyalty to the Union forced him to return to the North. Dr. Junkin exercised a large influence upon the Presbyterian Church; was a keen and logical debater, and one of the leaders andwarmest adherents of the Old School branch after the division. He was moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in 1844. Among his works are Treatise on Justification, Philadelphia, 1839, The Little Stone and the Great Image, or Lectures on the Prophecies, etc. (delivered before Lafayette College, 1838-39), Philadelphia, 1844, Commentary on the Hebrews, Philadelphia, 1873, etc.

JURIEU, Pierre, b. at Mer, Dec. 24, 1637; d. at Rotterdam, Jan. 11, 1713; studied theology at Saumur and Sedan; travelled in Holland and England; and was appointed professor of theology at Sedan, 1765, and, after the suppression of that institution in 1681, at Rotterdam. Even his first works, Examen du livre de la réunion du Chrétianisme, 1671, Traité de la Dévotion, 1674 (translated into English), etc., as well as his lectures at Sedan, gave him a prominent position in the Reformed Church; and his fame and authority were greatly enhanced by his Apologie pour la morale des Réformés, 1675 (against Bossuet), Lettres Pastorales, 1680-87, etc., as well as by his zeal and disinterestedness in aiding his persecuted brethren of the Reformed Church. But the miseries and calamities he witnessed after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes led him, as so many others, to seek for consolation in the apocalyptic prophecies of Scripture (Accomplissement des Propéthies, 1688); and this circumstance, in connection with the great vehemence which he exhibited in his controversies with Bayle and others, made him many enemies; and at one time even his own orthodoxy was impugned. His Histoire critique des Dogmes et des Cultes, 1704, translated into English (London, 1715, 2 vols.), was his last great work.

A. Schwizer.

JURISDICTION, Ecclesiastical. Occasioned by the admonition of Paul, that Christians should not bring their cases of litigation before unbelieving judges (1 Cor. vi. 1 sqq.), and modelled after the practice of the synagogue, which had received the sanction of the State (Jos. Antiq., 14, 10), there early developed among the Christians a form of ecclesiastical jurisdiction devolving upon the head of the congregation, and comprising not only ecclesiastical, but also civil affairs. As, no doubt, most, if not all, of the judges of the State, were Pagans at the time when Christianity was publicly recognized by the government as the reigning religion, it was simply a measure of due protection, when, by a decree of Constantine formally legalized the institution, and extended its compass so far that the ecclesiastical court became competent, even in cases in which only one of the litigant parties chose to go before it. Half a century later, when the judges of the State had become Christians themselves, it was found undesirable, because unnecessary, to give the ecclesiastical jurisdiction so wide a scope; and, by a decree of Arcadius and Honorius (398), the competence of the ecclesiastical court was made dependent upon the agreement of both parties. The general definition by the Roman law may be summed up in this way. With respect to the laity,—all common crimes were to be punished by the civil courts, the Church simply following after with the sentence; but all infractions of the order of the Church, doctrinal or disciplinary, were to be punished by the Church herself (Cod. Theod. de episc. et clericis, XVI. 2; and c. 1, Cod. Theod. de relig., XVI. 11). With respect to the clergy, — originally all common crimes committed by the clergy were reported to the bishop, who then deposed the culprit, and surrendered him to the civil courts for punishment; but by Justinian (Nov., L.XXIX., LXXXIII. princ. CXXIII. cap. 8, 21, 22) the clergy was made amenable, even in civil cases, to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction only.

As Christianity became established in the Frankish Empire and Germany, the principle of ecclesiastical jurisdiction was introduced; but the institution developed very slowly. With respect to civil suits, the State, or rather the ruler, granted, first, that no clerk should be bound to appear before a secular court, either as plaintiff or as defendant, without the consent of his bishop (Concil. Aurelian., III. a. 538, can. 32; IV. a. 541, can. 20); second, that, when both parties belonged to the clergy, the case should always be decided in an ecclesiastical court (Concil. Matrit., Oct. 29, can. 3); third, that, whenever a clerk was implicated in a case, a mixed court should be formed, of which his bishop was a member (Capit. Francofurt., a. 794, c. 50; Caroli Magni leges Langobard., c. 89); and, finally, that the clergy could be cited only before the ecclesiastical courts (the principle of Justinian recognized by the Constit. Frederici II. a. 1220, c. 4). With respect to criminal cases, all jurisdiction belonged originally to the State, both among the Franks and the Germans. For all common crimes, not ecclesiastical, such as murder, theft, adultery, etc., the clergy were punished by the secular courts. Only the bishops formed an exception: they were judged by the synods, though the State had a right to take part in the prosecution. But in 614 an edict of Clotaire II. (Pertz: Monument. German., iii. 14) granted that only the lower clergy, inclusive of the subdeacon, and only the minor and patent crimes, were amenable to the secular jurisdiction, while under other circumstances a mixed court should be formed, with the bishop for its president. Finally, towards the close of the eighth century, the clergy was completely exempted from the secular jurisdiction, so that, as in the case of the Gallican Church, several edicts were issued during the fourteenth century, circumscribing the competency of the ecclesiastical courts; and the parliaments were not slow in enforcing those edicts against the refractory clergy. By the edict of 1530 the Church was practically deprived of all jurisdiction over lay people, except in purely spiritual cases, such as vows, oaths, etc.; and the fundamental maxim from which the whole French process developed during the seventeenth century. Toute justice émane du roi, was in direct opposition to that on which canon law was founded. During the Revolution, finally, by the Civil Constitution of the clergy, Aug. 24, 1790, all ecclesiastical courts were suppressed; and the bishop retained a kind of jurisdiction only over the inferior clergy of his diocese and in purely ecclesiastical affairs. The legislation of the first empire and the Restoration did not materially alter this state of affairs, though the Code Napoleon laid matrimonial cases under ecclesiastical jurisdiction. In 1820, however, the Bishop of Metz established, on his own account, a court, to which which fall entirely outside of the competency of a civil court; while others — as, for instance, marriage cases — contain one or more elements, which, being defined as of sacramental nature, — such as prohibited degrees of kinship, divorce, etc., — necessarily bring them before the ecclesiastical court; II. Caussa ex pure spiritualibus dependentes, extrinsecus spiritualibus, such as engagements to marriage, patronage, ecclesiastical benefices, burial, tithes, etc.; and, finally, III. Caussa civiles ecclesiasticis accessorius mixtus, such as pecuniary questions arising from marriage, inheritance, legitimate birth, etc. But, as canon law includes under the last head all that can be brought under ecclesiastical jurisdiction by the so-called denunciation evangelica, there is, indeed, no case imaginable which the ecclesiastical court is incompetent to decide. The persons, who, according to canon law, are subject to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, are ecclesiastics of all degrees and orders, any one who by the tonsure is designated as belonging to the clerical state, monks and nuns, ecclesiastical institutions of all descriptions, schools and universities, with their teachers and pupils, pilgrims and crusaders, and, as it is the duty of the Church to take care of all persons miserable, also poor people, widows, orphans, and penitents. Of course, all persons not belonging under "this head" have a right to prefer a secular court in all secular affairs; but if a question should arise, whether or not a certain person belongs under "this head," it is the ecclesiastical court which gives the answer.

As above mentioned, this idea of an ecclesiastical jurisdiction superseding or absorbing the jurisdiction of the State was nowhere fully realized. But, on the other hand, the Church of Rome never ceased to fight for its realization; and, when the modern State began to develop, sharp conflicts arose. Already, during the first half of the nineteenth century, the encroachments of the ecclesiastical courts called forth determined protests in France; and in that country they never attained competency in cases about real estate, even though there were many in the case. As the continental case went, Philip V. of Spain and Portugal, Boniface VIII. ended favorably to the liberty of the Gallican Church, several edicts were issued during the fourteenth century, circumscribing the competency of the ecclesiastical courts; and the parliaments were not slow in enforcing those edicts against the refractory clergy. By the edict of 1530 the Church was practically deprived of all jurisdiction over lay people, except in purely spiritual cases, such as vows, oaths, etc.; and the fundamental maxim from which the whole French process developed during the seventeenth century. Toute justice émane du roi, was in direct opposition to that on which canon law was founded. During the Revolution, finally, by the Civil Constitution of the clergy, Aug. 24, 1790, all ecclesiastical courts were suppressed; and the bishop retained a kind of jurisdiction only over the inferior clergy of his diocese and in purely ecclesiastical affairs. The legislation of the first empire and the Restoration did not materially alter this state of affairs, though the Code Napoleon laid matrimonial cases under ecclesiastical jurisdiction. In 1820, however, the Bishop of Metz established, on his own account, a court, to which he invited his flock to resort for advice and judgment. The example was followed in other dioceses; and such courts still exist in France, neither forbidden nor recognized by the State.

In Germany the opposition to the jurisdiction usurped by the Church also began in the thirteenth century. Laymen were forbidden, under severe penalties, to cite other laymen before an ecclesiastical court (Sachen schied Landrecht, titl. 1, art. 69); and in real actions ecclesiastics were demanded to appear before the secular judge (Sächsisches Landrecht, art. 95). Nevertheless, the principle of denuncio niatio evangelica continued in active operation till the middle of the thirteenth century, and a well-marked boundary-line was not drawn between the jurisdiction of the Church and that of the State until the middle of the sixteenth century. In consequence of the Hundert Bescheiden der deutschen Nation, 1522, all causa misiae and a great number of causa extrinsece spiritualis were referred to the courts of the State, and since that time a re-action against the right of ecclesiastical jurisdiction has been steadily at work in Germany. In Austria the ecclesiastical courts are, at present, competent only in cases concerning faith, sacraments, and discipline. Even marriage cases belong exclusively under the civil courts. In Prussia, where, according to the reigning idea of the State, all jurisdiction ought to belong to the State, it is only a regard to the conscience of the Roman-Catholic part of the population which has prevented the government from abolishing the ecclesiastical jurisdiction altogether. Even in purely disciplinary affairs, the so-called "Falk Laws" have confined the ecclesiastical authority within very narrow bounds.

In the various countries in which the Reformation took root, various lines of policy were pursued, though the general principle seems to be nearly the same. With respect to all civil affairs, Luther said, "With the burgomaster's business I will not meddle;" and he consequently surrendered this whole field of ecclesiastical jurisdiction to the State. Nevertheless, when a consistorial constitution was established, the consistory stepped adroitly into the shoes of the bishop, and the forum ecclesiasticum personarum et rerum again flourished in many Lutheran countries until the replacement of the principle of territorialism by that of toleration, and still more the separation of the Church from the State, gradually caused it to disappear. The development was very unequal, however, in the various countries. In Prussia all marriage cases were referred to the civil courts in 1748; in Hanover, not until 1869. The Presbyterian churches also exercised some kind of jurisdiction in civil affairs through their synods, but only in some countries (as, for instance, Holland) and for a short time. In England the ecclesiastical court is still competent in marriage cases, will cases, etc. With respect to purely spiritual and ecclesiastical affairs, the Lutheran churches were often so closely united with the states to which they belonged, that the minister of worship and public education could choose their candidates and proceed according to his ideas; while a police-officer counted the persons present at service in the church, and fined the absent. But by degrees, as the idea of separating the Church from the State gains ground, they have succeeded in regaining control over their own affairs, — a point in which the Presbyterian churches always have excelled them.

JUSTIFICATION.

The doctrine of justification by faith, and by faith alone, was the one in which the churches of the Reformation, especially the Lutheran Church, recognized their essential and central teaching. It was known as the article of the standing or falling church (articulus stantis vel cadentis ecclesiae), the one upon which hung the very existence of evangelical Christianity. This was expressed by one of the German princes, a most faithful confessor of the gospel, when he told one of his theologians just starting out for a disputation with the Catholics, that that which lay nearest to his heart was that they should return with the little word sola, referring to the proposition, "Man is justified by faith alone" (sola fide justificari hominem). It is not surprising, that, in the development of this doctrine over against the attacks of the opposing party, various shades of distinction should have manifested themselves. We shall first direct our attention to the teaching of the Scriptures, and to the conception of that teaching in the Church prior to the Reformation.

The classic and biblical use of the Greek word Ἰσχαρίωτα ("to justify") differs in a remarkable manner. In the first case it designates the re-action of offended justice upon the offender, — to make righteous; i.e., to remove the offence against justice from the offender, by his condemnation or punishment (Herodotus, Thucydides, Plato). In the second it means the very opposite; namely, to exculpate, to declare righteous, be it that the individual himself is blameless, or that, having offended justice, he is exculpated, made free of guilt, by the divine goodness, and thereby is declared and treated as having satisfied the divine demands, and as being righteous. The Old-Testament use of the term prevails in Matthew (xi. 19, xii. 37) and Luke (vi. 29, x. 29, xvi. 15). Its first use in the strict New-Testament sense occurs in the account of the penitent publican (Luke xviii. 14), who is said to have been regarded as just by God (σωτήριος). It is, however, in the Pauline writings, especially the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, that the word occurs in the specific sense. After describing, in the Epistle to the Romans, the law and its works as incapable of justifying, or making righteous, inasmuch as the law only serves to give a knowledge of sin (iii. 20, vii. 7 sqq.), the apostle takes up a righteousness of God with which the law has nothing to do, and which is mediated by faith in Christ, and extends to all believers. This righteousness is described as passing over to offending humanity by reason of grace on God's part, and of the redemption of Christ, on account of whose atoning death God had determined that there should be no contradiction between his own justice and the justification of believers (iii. 28). Then, after having established the proposition of justification by faith in chap. iii., Paul passes over, in the next chapter, to show that this idea does not contradict Christ's revelation in the Old Testament, and that the object of justification, and becomes so, not on account of his own deeds, or in the way of a debt, but on account of grace, he renouncing all trust in meritorious works of his own, and putting his confidence alone in God. To justify is also termed to reckon for righteousness (iv. 22, λαόν θεοσσώμενον). Faith is joined with this conception as that which is reckoned for righteousness. The faith which is attributed to Abraham is described as trust in the divine power and purpose to perfect the divine promises. While here a comparison is instituted between Abraham and his spiritual children, the usual New-Testament expression is, that it is faith in Christ which is reckoned for righteousness. Christ is represented as the one who makes this possible (Gal. ii. 16). He is also represented as being made by God righteous unto us (1 Cor. i. 30), and as having been made sin on our behalf, that we might become the righteousness of God in him (2 Cor. v. 21). We are righteous by reason of communion with Christ. He died and rose; so that we are regarded as having died and risen with him (Rom. vi. 11; 2 Cor. v. 14; Col. ii. 11 sqq.). This communion is acquired on our part by faith in Christ, or the faith of Jesus. The divine act of justification, which is upon the divine purpose (ἐνδύναμος), which excludes absolutely all condemnation (Rom. viii. 28-33). Hereby the righteousness of God (Rom. i. 17, iii. 21) is made manifest. From this justification, which marks the entrance of the sinner into the condition of salvation, that active justification is to be distinguished which constitutes the conclusion of the entire work of salvation, and which is the object of Christian hope (Gal. v. 5). Here belong such passages as Rom. ii. 13, 16; 1 Cor. iv. 5; 2 Cor. v. 10. At this point we are brought in contact with the activity of faith in love and constancy and the works of faith (Gal. v. 6, etc.). The simplest solution of the apparent contradiction between Paul and James ( Jas. ii. 21 sqq.) is, that James does not refer to the entrance into the state of salvation, as Paul so frequently does (Rom. iii. 4; Gal. iii.), but has in view the conduct of the believer after entering this state.
JUSTIFICATION.

Turning, now, to the post-apostolic conception, we find the Greek expositors explaining δικαιοσύνη, as δίκαιος ἀπόταται, so that the New-Testament use of the term is understood; but the distinction of declaring "righteous" as the foundation and as the consummation of the state of grace is not sufficiently indicated. In the Latin Church the term justificare is used, now in a narrower sense, and now in a broader, the imputation of "righteousness" including an impartation of it. Augustine gives the norm for the doctrine of the middle ages when he says, "God justifies the ungodly, not only by remitting the evil he has done, but also by imparting love, which rejects the evil, and does the good," and "the ungodly is justified by the grace of God; i.e., from being ungodly, is made righteous."

Here begins the confusion of justification with sanctification, which is apparent in the teachings of the scholastics and mystics. It remained for the Reformers to make a sharp distinction between them; justification being defined simply as the gracious act of God, who for the sake of Christ, and by the imputation of his righteousness, declares the sinner justified. Man only receives, and does not give; is passive, and not active, according to the Reformers. The Roman Church, on the other hand, regards justifying faith as fides formata, i.e., faith which is inspired by love; so that this love, active in faith, is really that whereby and on account of which man is justified, or whereby man renders himself worthy of forgiveness and sanctifying grace. Love is an act of free will. The evangelical doctrine of justification, on the other hand, which has its roots in the sense of sin as guilt, regards such a feeling of love in the heart for God as being a consequence of God's act, removing guilt, and drawing him to himself. This justifying activity of God presupposes nothing in man except a sense of sin, which is a product of divine grace, or the divine Spirit operating upon man's conscience, and implanting a knowledge of God's holiness and of his own violation of that holiness in his conduct. This frame of heart is a receptive condition for justifying grace: hence arises faith, which proceeds from knowledge implanted by the Holy Spirit (notitia), and passes on to assent (assensus) and trust (fiducia). Here love for God is for the first time felt (1 John iv. 10, 19); and from it proceeds sanctification, or the fruits of righteousness. Thus faith works through love (Gal. v. 6). Thus the Scripture distinctly renders to God all the glory, depriving man of all meritousness. Man, like an empty vessel, is filled more and more by God, and assumes likeness with Christ.

There was a danger of regarding faith more as a theoretical assent, and unduly emphasizing justification by putting sanctification in the background. The imputation of Christ's merit was made prominent in such a way that vital union with Christ was more or less lost sight of. There was a peril of the old man, with its sinful lusts, being lulled to sleep without having been sanctified. To resist this evil, Andreas Osiander appeared against the school of Melanchthon, which was inclined to modify the Lutheran view. He substituted a real impartation of Christ's righteousness for the judicial imputation. Christ is righteous so far as he is the righteousness of God; and man is made righteous by laying hold of it by faith, and thereby receiving the divine nature of Christ to reside in him. God regards him as righteous, therefore, because he sustained the relation to Christ of the branch to the vine. But in this view the humanity of Christ and his ethical mediation are not properly brought out. The Formula of Concord, on the other hand, emphasizes that Christ is our righteousness in his entire divine-human personality, and redeems us by his perfect obedience.

The distinction between the Lutheran and Reformed doctrines of justification becomes apparent from another standpoint. Schneckenburger brought out this difference with great acuteness. It arises, in part, from a difference of view about man's natural state and the relation of the divine decree of predestining to human freedom. The theologians of the Reformed Church regard the natural condition of fallen man from the standpoint of misery and want, and consequently look upon salvation as that which effects their removal, and imparts a positive benefit. The divine election is the one sovereign principle in this process, and reveals itself in the call which excites faith. By this faith the sinner apprehends Christ, and is made one with him, a new man (Eph. iv. 21). He thus becomes conscious of justification as a divine decision. In the Lutheran system, on the other hand, the justification of the sinner as sinful is the principle, the first step, from which all else proceeds. It is the divine decision, based upon the satisfaction of Christ for sin, by which God declares the sinner righteous, justifies him as his child. In this case the divine decision of justification is the efficient force which engenders faith in the heart of the subject. This work is completed by the participation in the sacraments. Justification does not insure the permanent continuance of the subject in the state of grace; he may fall away from it. A renewal of repentance on his part insures the renewal of justification. This is the doctrine of the Lutheran Church. According to the Reformed doctrine, however, the sinner cannot fall away from this state.

It is apparent that the difference in the two conceptions is owing to the different place which the doctrine of election has in the two systems, it being the all-determining principle in the Reformed system.

The doctrine of the Reformed Church is logically the more perfect, as it starts from the divine decree of election, and passes on, by logical necessity, to the absolute efficiency of the act of justification, which nothing can overthrow. For this reason, some Lutheran theologians, as Nitzsch, Von Hofmann, Philippi, and Dorner, have shown a leaning to the Reformed view. But it may be questioned whether the freedom of man's will is not cramped by the Reformed doctrine. In the Lutheran system it has more room to exert itself. And this relation of man to God in justification admits, to a greater extent, of the voluntary activity of the soul. In this respect the Lutheran view seems also to be more in accordance with Christian experience.

From Justin's own mouth we learn the following details (Ap., i. 1): He was born in Neapolis (the ancient Shechem), in Palestine, of heathen (Greek?) parentage. He grew up as a "disciple of Plato" (Ap., ii. 12). His attention was drawn to Christianity by the pious conduct of the Christians and the steadfastness of their martyrs. In the Introduction to the Dialogue he relates the stages through which he passed before becoming a Christian. He was successively a Stoic, a Peripatetic, a Pythagorean, and a follower of Plato, and hoped to have finally reached the goal of intellectual contentment in the Platonic system. His delusion was laid bare by an aged Christian, who showed him that human investigation could at best reach the true idea of God, but not the living God himself. He must be heard and seen of the living God himself. He must be convinced, and at once consecrated his life to the service of Christ for Christ's sake. For before the ages of the world, before we were born, yes, before the foundation of the world was laid, when we, indeed, could do nothing good, we were, according to God's purpose, chosen, out of grace in Christ, to salvation (Rom. ix. 11; 2 Tim. i. 9). All opinions and erroneous doctrines concerning the powers of our natural will are thereby overthrown; because God, in his counsel before the ages of the world, decided and ordained that he himself, by the power of his Holy Spirit, would produce and work in us, through the Word, every thing that pleased him. Justin especially devotes his attention to the difference which exists between the views of the Lutheran Church as embodied in its symbols, and the views which were subsequently developed, for which see SCHWEIZER: Centraldoxmen, and JULIUS MÜLLER: D. evangelische Union, 1854.] KLING. JUSTIN MARTYR, the first Christian apologist, whose works have come down to us; suffered martyrdom under Marcus Aurelius, as we gather from the Acts of his Martyrdom, preserved by Metaphrastes (tenth century), which seem to be reliable. The Chron. paschale places the martyrdom in 165. He is mentioned for the first time by Tertian as the "most wonderful Justin" (Or. c. Gr., 18), and quoted by Tertullian as the "philosopher and martyr" (Adv. Val., 5), and by Hippolytus as "the martyr" (Philos., viii. 16), and is the first Christian after the apostles, the notices of whose life are sufficiently numerous, and enough of whose writings are preserved to enable us to form a clear picture of the man and his system, both of which are of unusual value for church history. Ireneus mentions a work against Marcion (Invirium caro Massaliae) as by Justin; and Eusebius (H. E., IV. 17, 26) ascribes quite a number of writings to him. Justin's extant works are the Regius Parisinus 1864 and Claromontanus, in England (1541), both of which contain eleven of Justin's writings, arranged in the same order. The only genuine works are the two Apologies, the Dialogue with Trypho (all of which are mentioned by Eusebius), and a few fragments. The exact date of these works cannot be determined. Eusebius ascribed the larger Apology to the year 140-141, and the smaller one to the reign of Aurelius. Recently the former has been put between 144 and 160; but it seems to have been written in the reign of Antoninus, and before 147. The Dialogue with Trypho also belongs to the reign of Antoninus (183-161). Those who favor a later date are influenced by the presumption that Marcion's activity in Rome occurred in the last years of Anicetus (150-155, Keim, Gesch. Jena).
Justinian’s failure to understand how God could make known his will and its freedom. Reason and freewill are not only of divine origin, but the reason is a part, or seed, of the creative reason. All men, like Socrates, are free to choose between the evil and the good. This notion determines his conception of the faith and its presentation. Baptism cleanses from previous sins, but it is only offered to the penitent. In the Eucharist we “receive a nourishment which is the flesh and blood of the Christ, who became flesh; and by it our flesh and blood by a change (εστημησα) are fed” (Ap. i. 86). This is the earliest notice of the doctrine of the eucharist.

In the doctrine of the Logos, Justin has been represented as the author of new views; but he was not altogether original. It was customary before his day to call the Son of God the Logos. He used the idea to prove that Jesus was the Son of God, who became flesh, and placed the material in the hands of the Church to formulate that doctrine clearly. But he also gave the occasion, by his use of the doctrine, for the subordinationism of a later period. This is clear when we remember that he did not use it to prove the equality of the Son with the Father, but only to justify faith in the Son of God, who alone was fitted to assume human nature. The deity of Christ, and the propriety of prayer to him, he proved from the Old Testament alone.

Justinian I. (Roman emperor, Aug. 1, 527—Nov. 14, 565), b. at Tauresium in Illyrium, May 11, 483; was a Slav by descent; his original name was Uprauda. The good fortunes of his uncle, Justin I., —a Dacian peasant who served in the Imperial Guard, owed his advancement to the size of his body and the strength of his limbs, and in 512 he was raised to the imperial throne.

The most brilliant feature of the reign of Justinian I. was his legislation, or rather his codification of the already existing Roman law, executed by several committees, of which Trebonius was the inspiring soul, and resulting in the so-called Corpus Juris Justinian. By this work he conferred a great and lasting benefit, not only on the Roman
JUSTINIAN I. 1221

Empire, but on civilization at large. Of a questionable value, however, were his conquests of Africa, Southern Spain, and Italy, by his two famous generals, Belisarius and Narses. He was unable to preserve these conquests; and, what was still worse, he was unable to give the conquered countries a better government than that they had enjoyed under their barbarian rulers. Altogether objectionable, finally, was his ecclesiastical policy, — that part of his activity on which he bestowed the greatest amount of industry and care.

Justinian I. was a Christian, orthodox, full of zeal for the purity of the faith, and waging a perpetual war against Paganism and heresy. The lower classes of the population were still Pagan in many places, as, for instance, in Peloponnesus and the interior of Asia Minor; and in the upper strata of society there reigned a wide-spread religious indifference. The latter, Justinian I. compelled to conform, at least externally, to Christianity; and with respect to the former he boasted of conversions by the thousands. The philosophical schools of Athens he closed in 529, and banished the teachers. They went to Persia; but, by the intercession of Chosroes, they were afterwards allowed to return. Less leniently he treated the Christian heretics,—the Montanists, Nestorians, Eutychians, and others; and the marvellous success of the Mohammedan invasion of Egypt and Syria half a century later is generally ascribed to the total disaffection of the population, which resulted from the ecclesiastical policy of Justinian.

The inhabitants of Egypt, Syria, and parts of Asia Minor, were Monophysites, and rejected the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon (451) as tainted with Nestorianism. Between orthodoxy and Monophysitism a compromise was brought about by Zeno's Henotikon (482); but that document, which the bishops of the Eastern Church had been compelled to subscribe to, was absolutely rejected by the Western Church, and formally anathematized by Felix II. In order to heal the schism thus established between the Eastern and the Western Church, Justinian repealed the Henotikon immediately after his accession. But then something had to be done with the Monophysites in order to prevent a schism within the Eastern Church. The empress Theodora, who was a secret Monophysite, persuaded her husband that the true reason why the Monophysites refused to accept the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, was that the writings of Theodores of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and Ibas, had not been condemned; and that non-condemnation the Monophysites considered as implying a positive confirmation. The emperor then issued a decree condemning the above writings, and the condemnation was repeated by the fifth ecumenical Council of Constantinople (553). The Monophysites were satisfied; but what was won in the East was lost in the West by the breaking-out of the Three Chapter controversy, so called because, in Justinian's decree of condemnation, there were three parts, or "chapters," relating to Theodore's writings and person, to Theodoret's treatise, and to Ibas' letter respectively. See art. Three Chapters.

At last the old emperor himself lapsed into heresy. He adopted the Aphthartodocetic views of the incorruptibility of the human body of Christ, and issued a decree to force them upon the Church. But Aphthartodocetism is simply Monophysitism, and thus his principal dogmatical labors met with a somewhat similar fate to that which has overtaken his chief architectural monument. He built the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople; and this church, once the most magnificent cathedral of Christendom, is now a Turkish mosque.

Juvenicus, Caius Vettius Aquilius, a Spaniard by birth, and presbyter of his native church; wrote, about 330, a Historia evangelica, or Versus de quatuor Evangeliiis, a poetical transcription of the gospel history, in 3,233 Latin hexameters. The text which he used, and to which he kept very closely, was partly the Greek original, partly the oldest Latin translation, the so-called Itala. The contents thus derived, he moulded in forms borrowed principally from Virgil, but also from Lucan, Lucretius, and Ovid, and generally arranged with adroitness. The result has, at all events, interest, as the first Christian epic: in its own time, and during the middle ages, it enjoyed a great reputation. It was first printed at Deventer, 1490; afterwards often, as, for instance, in Migne: Patr. Lat., vol. xix. Several other poems, especially, the Liber in Genesin, have been ascribed to Juvenicus, but erroneously, as it would seem.

See A. R. Geber: Diss. de J. Vita et Scripta, Jena, 1827.

Wagemann.

JUVENCUS.
KAABA (square house), the sacred shrine of the Mohammedans, in which is the Black Stone. It stands within the court of the great mosque at Mecca; is oblong in shape; built of large, irregular, and unpolished blocks of stone; is about forty feet in height; has no windows, and only one door, which is raised seven feet above the ground. The (reddish-) Black Stone is a fragment of volcanic basalt, sprinkled with colored crystals. According to Mohammedan tradition, it was originally white, but was blackened by the kisses of sinful mortals. It is inserted in the north-east corner of the building, some five feet above the floor; is an irregular oval, and about seven inches in diameter. It has a band of silver around it. The Kaaba may be called the centre of the Mohammedan world. All Moslems turn toward it in prayer. It is, however, far older than Mohammed; the worship of the Black Stone being well-nigh primitive with the Arabs, who came to kiss it, and make seven circuits of the Kaaba. The keep of the sacred stone was in Mohammed's family long before his birth; and it was to his uncle, Abu Talib, the guardian of the Kaaba, that he owed his protection for years. Arab tradition attributes the Kaaba's first erection to Adam and Eve, and its second to Abraham and Ishmael, to whom Gabriel brought from heaven the Black Stone. Its actual age is unknown; but it was rebuilt in Mohammed's thirty-fifth year (605 A.D.), and he is said to have put the Black Stone in its place. For an interesting description of the Kaaba, see Richard F. Burton's Pilgrimage to El Me'dinah and Mecca, London, 1855, 3 vols. (vol. iii.).

KA'DESH (En-mish'pat, Ka'desh-bar'nea, Me'libah-Ka'desh). Scarcely any biblical site has proved a more vexed question than this. Some have unnecessarily inclined to look for two sites to meet the conditions of the text. Later investigations have freed the question of many difficulties, and tended to fix the location at an oasis about ninety miles southerly from Hebron, bearing the name Qadls, the Arabic equivalent of the Hebrew Kadesh. Kadesh is the first mentioned (Gen. xiv. 7) as on the route of Chedorlaomer, from the wilderness of Paran northward; again as a boundary limit eastward for locating the homes of Hagar (Gen. xvi. 14) and of Abraham (Gen. xx. 1). Later it appears as a city in the southern boundary of the Negeb, or south-country, southward of the hill-country of the Amorites, northward of the Wilderness of Paran, in the Wilderness of Zin, westward of the territory of Edom. (Cf. Num. xiii. 17, 26, xx. 14, 18, xxxii. 14, xxxiii. 30, xxxiv. 4; Deut. i. 19, 20.) A notable fountain, called the "Well of Judgement," was at Kadesh (Gen. xiv. 7), proceeding from a cliff (Num. xx. 8). A wilderness about it bore its name (Ps. xxxix. 8). It was a suitable abode for the host of Israel (Deut. i. 46). A mountain was just north of it toward Canaan (Num. xiii. 17; Deut. i. 20, 24). It was distant from Mount Sinai an eleven-days' journey (Deut. i. 2).

Kadesh was an objective point of the Israelites when they left Sinai for the borders of the promised land (Deut. i. 6, 7, 19—21). Thence the spies were sent into Canaan (Num. xiii. 17, 26). There the people rebelled, through fear and a lack of faith, and were sentenced to a forty-years' stay in the wilderness (Num. xiv.). Kadesh seems to have been the headquarters or rallying-place of the Israelites during their wanderings (Deut. i. 40). They re-assembled there for a final move toward Canaan (Num. xx. 1). There Miriam died and was buried; the people murmured for lack of water; the rock gave forth water miraculously. Moses, having sinned in spirit and act at this time, was sentenced to die without entering Canaan (Num. xx. 1—18). Thence Moses sent messengers to the kings of Edom and Moab requesting permission to pass through their territory (Num. xx. 14—21; Judg. xi. 16, 17). Being refused this permission, the Israelites journeyed to Mount Hor, and thence made a circuit around Edom and Moab toward the Jordan (Num. xxx. 4; Deut. ii. 1—8). Kadesh is named prominently as a landmark in the southern boundary-line of the promised land (Num. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xx. 3; Ezek. xlvii. 18, xlviii. 28). Its location is admitted to be a key to both the wanderings of the Israelites and the boundary of their domain.

All the conditions of the Bible-text are met in Qadls, as in no other suggested site. A Wady Qadls, a Jebel Qadls, and an 'Ain Qadls are there. Wady Qadls is an extensive hill-encircled region of sufficient extent to encamp and guard a host like Israel's. Large portions of it are arable. Extensive primitive ruins are about it. Springs of rare abundance and sweetness flow from under a high cliff. By name and by tradition it is the site of Kadesh. Just north of it is a lofty mountain, on which is a camel-pass toward Hebron. It lies just off the only feasible route for an invading army from the direction of Sinai, or from east of Akabah, and is well adapted for a protected strategic point of rendezvous prior to an immediate move northward. It is at that central position of the southern boundary-line of Canaan which is given to Kadesh in its later mentions in the Bible-text. Its relations to the probable limits of Edom and to all the well-identified sites of Southern Canaan, and its distance from Mount Sinai, conform to the Bible record.

Rowlands, in 1842, was the first modern traveler to visit 'Ain Qadls, and identify it with Kadesh. His identification has been accepted by Ritter, Winer, Kurtz, Tuch, Keil, Delitzsch, Fries, Käliach, Knobel, Bunsen, Menke, Hamburger, Muhlau and Volek, Wilton, Palmer, Wilson, Alford, Wordsworth, Tristram, Eidersheim, Geikie, Bartlett, Lowrie, and many others. Trumbull visited this site in 1881, and added confirmatory evidence of its identity with Kadesh.

Dean Stanley, resting onambiguous references in the Talmud, Josephus, Eusebius, and Jerome, advocated Petra as the site of Kadesh; but that, being in the heart of hostile Edom, is clearly others. For this site are urged its proximity to enemies; that it is not on the route otherwise indicated as taken by them toward Canaan; that it would be counted on the eastern, rather than the southern, border-line of Canaan, according to the description of that boundary; that it occupies no such central position in the southern border as the text indicates as against Ain Qadls; that in no such cliff as the narrative indicates; that in no such central position in the southern border line as the text "leads to Kadesh; that is shows no trace of its conformity with the requirements of the text: moreover, that the arguments employed in its favor as against Ain Qadls by Robinson and his followers are largely based on the strangely erroneous assumption that 'Ain Qadls is located in Wady el-Ain.

KADI, Georg, b. at Tyrmnau, Hungary, 1570; d. in Presburg, 1834; entered the Society of Jesus; taught theology at Olmütz, and was finally appointed director of the College of Presburg. He translated the Bible into Hungarian (Vienna, 1826), in opposition to the translation by the Reformed Caspar Karoly, 1569. A volume of his sermons appeared at Presburg, 1861.

KALTEISCH, Heinrich, b. at Ehrenbreitstein; d. at Coblenz 1465; was educated in the Dominican convent of Coblenz; studied in Vienna and Cologne; and was successively lieutenant-general of Germany, magister sacri palatii (1443), and bishop of Tronheim (1492). He owed most of his reputation to his dispute with the Hussites at Basel (1433). The speech he delivered on that occasion lasted three days, and is found in H. CANISIUS: Lect. antiqu. He was a prolific writer, but most of his works have remained unprinted.

KANT, Immanuel, b. at Königsberg, April 22, 1724; lectured in Königsberg from 1755 till his death; and d. in Königsberg Feb. 12, 1804. He never travelled away from the centre of his activity, where he had been introduced into life, and did his life's work; but he reads books of travel, and conversed with travellers, thereby obtaining exact acquaintance with the features of many parts of the world. He lived the life of the philosophic recluse, concentrating his attention on abstract study; and yet he gathered around his table men of all classes, so keeping up a large degree of intercourse with the society of Königsberg. There is no more marked example of concentrated philosophic thought than is afforded by this even-going life spent in this town in Northern Prussia. The thinker was the greatest of abstract thinkers the world has yet seen. Kant was of Scotch descent, his grandfather having emigrated from Scotland at the end of the seventeenth century. The family name was written "Cant," and is still common in Scotland; but German pronunciation turned it into "Sant," and that was certain to become "Zant," to guard against which calumny the philosopher changed the spelling to "Kant." He was the child of honest, industrious, religious parents; his mother having been a woman of lofty ability and character, whose influence for good over him Kant acknowledged in the most explicit terms. In early years Kant was devoted to the study of classics and mathematics. He entered upon study for the ministry, and completed his theological course, and occasionally preached, but did not give himself to the professional career. His first efforts in preparation for the press were concerned with the structure of the universe; and in 1783 he published A General Theory of the Heavens, a fact which may be noted by those who recall the enthusiasm with which he spoke of the starry heavens and the conception of duty as the two things which most overawed his spirit. This work he described as an Essay on the Mechanical Origin of the Structure of the Universe, in which he seeks to explain the origin of worlds by the forces of attraction and repulsion. So much was he addicted to physical research, that he afterwards lectured on physical geography and fortification, and for a time gained a considerable part of his support by teaching the latter subject.

In the same year he published, in Latin, A New Elucidation of the First Principles of Metaphysical Knowledge. This he publicly defended as his thesis when supporting his application to be allowed to teach in the university in the rank of privat-docent, or non-professorial teacher. This essay contains the ground of his theory, afterwards elaborated in the Critique of Pure Reason. From this time onwards, he taught in the university, lecturing on a great variety of subjects, including, besides the named philosophies, natural theology, and anthropology. In 1770 he was appointed professor of philosophy in his own university, and this fixed his sphere for life. As a lecturer he was very attractive, clear in style, varied in the range of illustration, exceedingly suggestive and stimulating. The most important autobiographic remark he made—and it has found general currency in consequence—was, that by Hume he was waked from dogmatic slumber. He was by natural bias a metaphysician, and had been deeply pondering metaphysical questions from his early years; but the sceptical assault of Hume on the experiential philosophy convinced him that something more was required than a dogmatic scheme, if philosophy was to maintain its position. In this way he entered upon the critical method with the view of distinguishing the products of experience from the elements in consciousness which are given by the mind. His aim was a thorough-going discrimination between the a posteriori and the a priori elements in knowledge. It thus became a search for the transcendental in consciousness, or the forms of the sensory native to mind; but we have not thereby any knowledge of God, or certainty of his existence. The argument which was all in all to Descartes was nothing to Kant. The error appearing in Kant's theory at the outset clings to it throughout, leaving us still to seek an adequate theory of knowledge. Kant leads to a sceptical result, if we are content to treat his intellectual scheme, developed in the Critique of Pure Reason, as a complete theory, and do not advance to his moral philosophy or practical reason as a necessary part of it. The direct historical result of his Critique has been the development of a succession of transcendental theories in Germany which have rapidly worked themselves out of favor, and of a theory of Agnosticism which has been eagerly embraced and defended by the experiential school. See AGNOSTICISM.

The ethical scheme of Kant may, however, be taken as part of his theory of knowledge, and in strict justice ought to be so regarded; in which case it appears that the requirements of practical life give us certainty as to the divine existence and government, under which liberty is the birth right of the moral agent. From pure reason he passes over to treat of practical reason, which is given “for the government of will, to constitute it good.” Here we become familiar with the categorical imperative, whose formula is, “Act from a maxim at all times fit for law universal.” This makes universality the test of moral law; and though the formula is too abstract, and needs to have its application expounded, it concentrates on an essential characteristic of moral law, and makes the destruction of the self-seeking spirit essential to the moral life. This implies an ideal of moral excellence in the human mind, to which, indeed, Kant had made reference in the Critique of Pure Reason (Transcendental Dialectic, bk. 1., sect. 1), and which is treated as a grand certainty in human knowledge, as it is the imperative requirement of the phenomenal in this world. He seems only to help Hume, instead of refuting him. Kant does not, however, affirm that external things do not exist, or that there can be any rational ground for such an affirmation: he maintains only that our knowledge through the senses is knowledge of appearances under recognized mental conditions,—an unsatisfactory theory of external perception, however true in what it affirms. With this beginning, the lines of development for the theory are fixed. When the understanding or reasoning power proceeds to work up into systematized order the multifarious facts recognized through the senses, the categories or pure conceptions of the understanding—unity, plurality, totality, etc.—“prescribe laws a priori to phenomena.” In this higher region, also, all that is known is determined by phenomena and the forms which the understanding imposes. When we rise still higher, to contemplate the universe as a whole, there cannot be any thing but a further illustration of our subject to the forms which the mind imposes. The reason gives us the ideas of God, the universe, and self. These are the forms prescribed by the highest faculty we possess; but we are not able to say more of them than that they are forms of the reason regulative of intellectual procedure, but not criteria of the named philosophy.

Is knowledge of appearances under recognized mental conditions,—an unsatisfactory theory of external perception, however true in what it affirms. With this beginning, the lines of development for the theory are fixed. When the understanding or reasoning power proceeds to work up into systematized order the multifarious facts recognized through the senses, the categories or pure conceptions of the understanding—unity, plurality, totality, etc.—prescribe laws a priori to phenomena.” In this higher region, also, all that is known is determined by phenomena and the forms which the understanding imposes. When we rise still higher, to contemplate the universe as a whole, there cannot be any thing but a further illustration of our subject to the forms which the mind imposes. The reason gives us the ideas of God, the universe, and self. These are the forms prescribed by the highest faculty we possess; but we are not able to say more of them than that they are forms of the reason regulative of intellectual procedure, but not criteria of the named philosophy.
in which he is free from the dominion of physical law. Thus the ethical scheme is the completion of the theory of Kant, and in some sense a rectification of the whole, even while it must be admitted that a reconstruction of the intellectual side is needful, if a true harmony is to be made out.

After every deduction has been made which rigid criticism seems to require, Kant's name stands out as the most noted in the roll of modern philosophy. He is decidedly the most powerful and rigid thinker, whose work must influence the whole future of mental philosophy. Enthusiastic admirers have claimed for Hegel precedence; but all the signs of recent years are against the claim, showing that Hegel is abandoned, and that the return is upon Kant for a new start. Whatever judgment men may incline to form of the comparative merits of Kant and Hegel, moral conceptions cannot be left out of account in judging of a theory of knowledge.

For biography of Kant, see De Quinney's translation of Wasiński's Last Days of Kant, Abbott's Memoir, prefixed to enlarged edition of the Theory of Ethics (1879), and J. H. W. STUCKENBERG: A Life of Kant, London, 1882. An abridgment of the Critique of Pure Reason, with notes and introduction by G. S. MORRIS, was published, Chicago, 1882.—Works upon the religious views of Kant are, Pünjer: Die Religionslehre Kant's, Jena, 1874; E. BRIDEL: La phi. de la relig. de Kant, Paris, 1870.

KAPFF, Sixt Karl, the most perfect representative of the type of pietist prevailing in Württemberg in the last generation; the son of a minister; b. in Göglingen, Württemberg, Oct. 22, 1806; d. in Stuttgart, Sept. 1, 1879. From earliest childhood he was religiously disposed; and at the university of Tübingen he engaged in daily prayer with his intimate friend William Hofacker. After filling the positions of vicar at Tuttlingen teacher at Hofwyl, and Repenent in Tubingen, he became, in 1838, pastor of the colony of Pietists at Kornthal, seven miles from Stuttgart. In 1843 he made Dekan at Miinsingen, and in 1847 at Herrenberg; in 1850 was transferred to Reutlingen, and two years afterwards to Stuttgart, where, for the remainder of his life, he was Prätlat and the greatly beloved and influential pastor of the Stiftskirche.

Kapff was a genuine Suabian, and combined the genial manners, truthfulness, and sympathetic warmth of the Suabian character. He was a friend to ministers all over Württemberg, and attracted all classes to him who had an interest in religion. As a preacher, he did not represent any sharply-defined theological or ecclesiastical tendency. His sermons had much in them of the supernaturalism of the old Tübingen school, but more warmth and sympathy than belonged to it. He had an eye to the domestic and social wants of his people, and drew largely upon his everyday intercourse with them for his subjects. He was not eloquent, but spoke in an earnest, conversational tone, that won the heart. His influence as pastor was very great, his annual pastoral calls amounting to three thousand. He also took the warmest interest in the ecclesiastical affairs of Württemberg, and in foreign missions as advanced by the missionary institution in Basel. Thus, for more than a quarter of a century, he was the centre of the pious circles of the land.

He published quite a number of collections of sermons and smaller works. Of these the principal are, 83 Predigten u. d. alten Evangelien, Stuttgart, 3d ed., 1875 [10,000 copies]; 80 Predigten u. d. alten Episteln, 8th ed., 1880 [14,000 copies]; Communiochunch, 19th ed., 1880 [70,000 copies]; posthumously published, Casuarinen, Stuttgart, 1880, etc. See his Lebensbild, by his son CARL KAPFF, Stuttgart, 1881.

KARAITE JEWS. The name "Karaite" is from the Hebrew karâ ("to read" or "recite"), and denotes the radical difference of the Karaites from the Rabbinites. While the latter adhered to tradition, the former rejected the same, and strictly adhered to the letter of the Bible; hence they were called also "Textualists." The founder of Karaism was Anan, the son of David. His uncle Solomon, who was patriarch of the exiled Jews, died childless in 761 or 762 A.D.; and thus Anan was the legitimate successor to the patriarchate. He was, however, prevented from obtaining the dignity on account of his rejecting the traditions of the fathers; and his younger brother, Chanasia, was elected in his stead. Anan, not being willing to submit to such a slight, appealed to the caliph, Abujafar Almansar, who was at first disposed to favor his claim; but the rabbinc party succeeded at last, and Anan was obliged to flee. He retired to Jerusalem, where he built a synagogue, and where he soon was recognized as the legitimate prince of the captivity. The schism became formal, and anathemas and counter-anathemas followed. Anan's works are unfortunately lost, and his doctrinal system is only known from statements and allusions in the works of Arabic historians. His advice to his followers was to "search the Scriptures deeply." Of Christ as the founder of Christianity Anan spoke in the terms... of the highest respect. He declared Jesus of Nazareth was a very wise, just, holy, and God-fearing man, who did not at all wish to be recognized as a prophet, nor to promulgate a new religion or objection to Judaism, but simply desired to uphold the law of Moses, and do away with the commandments of men. And Anan therefore condemns the Jews for having treated Jesus as an impostor, and for having put him to death without weighing the justice of his pretensions. (Comp. De Sacy: Christomathie Arabe, i. 326; Wolf: Bibl. Hebraea, i. p. 1086.) Anan's death is commemorated in a prayer, which his followers offer up for him every sabbath to the present day. After his death (765-780) his son Saul was elected, who was succeeded by Benjamin ben Moses Nahavendi (about 800-820), the greatest luminary among the Karaites. He introduced many reforms amongst his co-religionists, which were so highly appreciated by the followers of Anan, that they deserted the name Ananites, and henceforth called themselves Karaites, i.e., Scripture-worshippers, or Ezra and Bala Milra, followers of the Bible, in contradistinction to Balaite Ho-Kabala, or followers of tradition.

After Nahavendi, the next conspicuous Karaite was Daniel ben Moses el-Kumassi (820-860). We may also mention Eldad ha-Dani (about 880-890), the famous traveler; Chawi-el-Balchi, the Karaite freethinker and first rationalistic critic of the Bible, who flourished after 880. About the year 900, Karaism was finally fixed, both in its opposition to Rabbinism and in the fundamental articles of faith by which its followers demand to be judged. These articles are thus expressed in their confession of faith as translated by Rule:

1. That all this bodily (or material) existence, that is to say, the spheres and all that is in them, is created; 2. That they have a Creator, and the Creator has his own soul (or spirit); 3. That he has no similitude, and he is one, separate from all; 4. That he sent Moses, our master (upon whom be peace!); 5. That he sent with Moses, our master, his law, which is perfect; 6. For the instruction of the faithful, the language of our law, and the interpreter, or, that is the reading (or text) and the division (or vowel-pointing); 7. That the blessed God sent forth the other prophets; 8. That God (blessed be his name) will raise the sons of men to the division of the year 900, Karaism was finally fixed, both in its opposition to Rabbinism and in the fundamental articles of faith by which its followers demand to be judged. These articles are thus expressed in their confession of faith as translated by Rule:

The British Museum acquired in the summer of 1882 a large number of Oriental manuscripts, some containing Arabic commentaries on the Bible, with the Hebrew text written by Karaite Jews. One of these is dated 959 A.D. The Hebrew is not written in the square character, as the Talmud requires, and as has hitherto been supposed to have been the case among the later Hebrews. The commentaries are in Arabic, but contain large quotations from Anan's commentaries in Aramaic, thus proving that Anan, the founder of the Karaites, wrote in Aramaic.

The number of Karaites was not very large at present. We find them in the Crimea (where they number six thousand), Constantinople, Damascus, Jerusalem (where they number only ten families). They have a printing establishment at Eupatoria. Everywhere their morality is unexceptionable; their honesty and general probity are proverbial.

KARENS, a race of people widely scattered over Burmah, and dwelling in temporary villages. Their origin has been a subject of much discussion; some regarding them as the aborigines of the land; others, as immigrants from Tibet. Up to the time of their conversion, they were severely oppressed by their Burman masters. They afford an interesting study to the student of foreign missions. About the year 1828-30, Drs. Boardman and Judson for the first time came in contact with the Karens, found them a shy and wild people, but very susceptible to the influences of the gospel. This susceptibility was, perhaps, due in some measure to the absence of any very definite forms of religion, and any priesthood among them. Dr. Boardman's attention was attracted to them more especially by his acquaintance with a Karen slave, Kho-Thah-byu, whose freedom had been purchased by the missionaries. He had been a man of flagitious life, and had committed no less than twenty-four murders. But, converted to the Christian faith, he became a veritable apostle to his countrymen, and for many years was indefatigable in his efforts to win them to Christ. In 1875 the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the mission was celebrated by the dedication of a beautiful hall to this noble man's memory. Schools were at once planted; and the preaching of the gospel has met with wonderful success amongst this people, completely transforming their modes of life. In 1882 Mr. Wade made an alphabet of the Karen language, which differs from the Burmese. Portions of the Scripture, and tracts, were soon printed. A writer in the Madras Observer, in October, 1888, states, that, on a journey through the Karen districts, on foot, "he found himself, for seventeen successive nights, at the end of his day's journey through the forest, in a native Christian village." There were, in 1882, 21,800 native church-members, and 432 Karen Baptist churches, with 91 ordained and 293 unordained preachers. There is a Karen theological seminary at Rangoon with 31 students. See King: Life of Boardman; Wayland: Life of Judson; P. Mason: The Karen Apostle, Boston; and the Reports of the American Baptist Missionary Society.

KARO, GEORGE (Parsimonius), b. at Heroldingen in Saxony, 1512; d. at Ansbach, 1576; studied theology at Wittenberg, but fell in with some Anabaptists, and was for a short time even incarcerated. Nevertheless, in 1536 he was appointed pastor to the congregation of Luther. Expelled from that place in 1547 by the Interim, he found refuge in Brandenburg, and was in 1551 made pastor of Schwabach, whence, in 1556, he was removed to Ansbach as pastor and superintendent-general. Once more, however, he fell into error. He set forth some curious speculation with respect to the value of the obedience which Christ had rendered to the law during his life on earth, and these views caused much confusion and strife. He was suspended, but retracted, and was restored. He wrote a catechism, which was in use in Ansbach in the beginning of the 17th century. The first volume appeared in 1601; the second in 1618 (the first book was written by Thomas Delaune), reprinted 1833 and 1856; Travels of True Godliness, 1833 (reprinted, with Memoir, by Dr. H. Malcom, New York, 1831, and in London, 1846 and 1849); Progress of Sin, or the Travels of Ungodliness, last edition, London, 1815; and Travels, London, 1816. These books are in the Bunyan manner, and were once popular; A Golden Mine opened, 1894 (contains portrait of Keach); Gospel Mysteries unveiled, or an Exposition of all the Parables, and many Express Similitudes contained in the Four Evangelists, 1701; 2 vols. folio, best reprint, 1856; War with the Devil, 1776. For Memoir, see above.

KEBLE, John, M.A., a saintly divine and poet of the Church of England; was b. April 25, 1792, at Fairford, Gloucester; d. March 29, 1866, at Bournmouth. He has been called the George Herbert of the century. His father, who was a clergyman, conducted his education until he entered Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1806. After a brilliant collegiate career, he was made, in 1811, fellow of Oriel, at that time the “centre of all the finest ability in Oxford” (including Whately, Arnold, Pusey, Newman, etc.); was ordained priest in 1816; became curate of East Leach and Burford (near Fairford), and tutor at Oriel, 1818. In 1823 he gave up his tutorship, and retired to his curacy, from which he removed in 1825, to assume the curacy of Hurley, Hampshire, where he remained during the remainder of his life, becoming vicar in 1835. He held the lectorship of poetry in Oxford from 1831 to 1841.

Keble’s reputation rests upon his contributions to devotional poetry, and the share he took in the spread of sacramentarian views in the Church of England, and the development of the Oxford, or Tractarian, movement. In 1827 he published his Christian Year (Oxford, 2 vols.), a collection of sacred lyrics, which appeared at first anonymously. This work, which has been very widely used, is imbued with a spirit of rare spiritual fervor,—a characteristic which has been sufficient to render of little effect the not unjust criticisms, that the author is frequently careless of the form of poetry, and not always felicitous in diction. “Some of the poems,” says Principal Sharpe, “are faultless after their kind, flowing from the first verse to the last, lucid in thought, vivid in diction, harmonious in their pensive melody.” Many of the originals of the poems were written on the backs and edges of letters, in old account-books and pocket-books. The first edition was five hundred copies. Between 1827 and 1873, when the copyright expired, a hundred and forty editions appeared, and 305,500 copies were sold. During the following five years the original publishers alone sold 70,000 copies of the metre of the Psalter, and in 1846 another volume of sacred lyrics entitled Lyra Innocentium, a collection of poems for childhood, its weaknesses, troubles, temptations, religious privileges. Mr. Keble’s most important literary work was the edition of the Words of Richard Hooker, which he prepared at the request of the University Press, and which, after six years of labor, appeared at Oxford in 1836. It is justly considered the best edition of Hooker. Several of Keble's hymns have been introduced into English hymn-books, of which the best are "O God of mercy, God of might," and the devout and restful evening song, "Sun of my soul, thou Saviour dear," taken from the second poem in the Christian Year, entitled "Evening."

Keble adopted very high views on the sacraments and the apostolical constitution of the Church. He held to the doctrine of the apostolical succession, the high sacramental view of the Lord's Supper, and the usefulness of the confessional, which he regretted that circumstances did not justify him in introducing into his own church. At Oxford he was a close and intimate friend of Newman, Pusey, and Hurrell Froude, who had once been his pupil. With him and several others, the notion started of issuing brief and pointed tracts promulgating High-Church principles, and raising the standard of piety in the Church. The result was the so-called Tracts for the Times, which reached the number of ninety, created a profound impression in England, and the studies spent in the preparation of which, or the stimulus of them, led to the defection to the Roman-Catholic communion of Newman, and others of the best spirits of the Church of England. Keble himself wrote eight of the series, Nos. 4, 13, 40, 52, 54, 67, 80, 89; the first (No. 4) being on apostolical succession. On July 14, 1833, he preached a sermon, in Oxford, on National Apostasy, the occasion of which was the suppression of ten Irish bishoprics, and which Cardinal Newman heard with the deepest interest, and has characterized as the starting-point for the Romendown tendency. Mr. Keble saw Dr. Newman's famous tract, No. 90, before it was published, and approved of it; but, though much dissatisfied with the state of the English Church, he did not leave its communion, and regarded the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception (1854) as an insuperable barrier to ecclesiastical union. He was not eloquent as a preacher, but scriptural and impressive. He had a wonderful magnetic power of attracting very closely to himself both the old and the young. It is characteristic of the genial type of his piety, and of his simple spirit, that for thirty years he was scrupulous in his attendance upon the sabbath school twice a day. Although he took such a deep interest in children, he was himself childless. Shortly after his decease, his friends and admirers raised a large fund, and erected to his memory the beautiful structure of Keble College at Oxford.

In addition to the works above mentioned, Keble contributed to the Lyra Apostolica, and published his Oxford Lectures on Poetry, under the title, Praelectiones Academicae (2 vols., Oxford, 1848), and a Life of John Keble, M. A. (2 vols., Oxford, 1868, and since), and art. Keble in Encyclopaedia Britannica by Principal Sharp.

KECKERMANN, Bartholomäus, b. in Danzig, 1571; d. there Aug. 25, 1609; studied at Wittenberg; was a teacher in the paedagogium; afterwards professor of Hebrew in the university of Heidelberg, and accepted in 1602 a call as rector of the gymnasion in his native city. Though he was only thirty-eight years old when he died, his Opera Omnia, which appeared at Geneva, 1614, touch almost every important point of philosophy and theology, and have exercised considerable influence on the internal organization of these two sciences. In their common aversion to scholasticism, the Reformers pursued ideas of their own. Some of them (such as Luther) rejected, together with the scholastic theology, also the scholastically developed philosophy of Aristotle; while others (such as Melanchthon) retained philosophy as a great science, but distinct from theology. It could not fail, however, that, after a little while, also the former party came to feel the need of a philosophy; and they gradually adopted the method and ideas of Petrus Ramus, or, in general, of the new philosophical school of Paris. In direct opposition to this movement, Keckermann urged the indispensability of the works of Aristotle and Plato; but at the same time he established a sharp and decisive distinction between philosophy and Christian theology. Especially in the field of ethics this distinction became of paramount importance. Ethics, together with politics, he treated as the practical division of philosophy, though without denying that there might be a Christian ethics, just as there was a philosophical ethics; since theology, like philosophy, fell into two great divisions,—theoretical and practical theology.

KEIL, Karl August Gottlieb, b. at Grossenheim, Saxony, April 23, 1815; d. in Leipzig, April 22, 1818; studied theology at Leipzig, and was appointed professor there, of philosophy, in 1855, and of theology in 1875. As an exegete he tried to combine the historical principle of Semler with the grammatical principle of Ernesti. His views he has set forth in his Hermeneutik des Neuen Testament (Leipzig, 1810), translated into Latin by Emmering (1812). His minor treatises, relating to the exegesis of the New Testament, appeared at Leipzig, 1820, under the title Opuscula Academica. W. SCHMIDT.

KEIM, Carl Theodor, D.D., b. at Stuttgart, Dec. 17, 1825; d. at Giessen, Nov. 17, 1878. He studied at Maulbronn and at the universities of Tübingen (where he came under Baur's influence) and Bonn (1843—47); was tutor of Count Sontheim (1848—50); Repetent at Tübingen (1851—55); pastor in Esslingen, Württemberg, from 1856 to 1859; from 1860 to 1873 he was ordinary professor of historical theology at the university of Zürich; from 1873 until shortly before his death, when ill health compelled his resignation, in the corresponding position at Giessen. Keim's life was, on the whole, sad. He was an invalid; and he chafed under the comparative obscurity of his academic position, for he felt himself fitted for a higher post. His theological stand-point may have hindered his promotion; for, while a rationalist, he was singularly candid and moderate, so that he pleased neither the orthodox nor the radicals. From 1851 he studied, with cat zeal, Oriental languages under Ewald, and then philosophy under Reiff. When he turned from Reformations studies to early church history, he turned completely. Theologically he belonged to the school of Baur: but he was no blind follower of the great master; rather a fearless, independent student. Therefore he gave up such positions as he had satisfied himself were untenable. In his great book upon the life of Christ, he put opposite to Paul, upon whom the Tubingen school dwelt so forcibly, the majestic figure of Christ; and, while agreeing in the main with their conclusions, he emphasized the paramount importance of the Master. He unfortunately rejected the fourth Gospel, and minimized the miraculous element: but he refuted the hypothesis of a vision, and assumed revelations of the glorified Lord to his disciples to explain the story of the resurrection; and, compelled by his fairness, admitted the superhuman character of Christ, saying, "The person of Jesus is not only a phenomenon among the many phenomena of God, it is a special work of God, the crown of all the divine revelations." He calls Jesus "the sinless one, the Son of God," and says he "makes the impression of a superhuman miracle."

Keim never married. His sister kept house for him, and he had a canary bird and a cat to keep him company. His style of composition is a frequent subject of complaint. He endeavored to say too much in a single sentence. His handwriting was almost illegible. (See the sketch of his life by H. Ziegler, prefixed to Rom und das Christentum, from which this article is mainly taken.)

KEITH, Alexander, D.D., author of several works on prophecy, b. at Keith Hall, Aberdeen-shire, Scotland, 1791; d. in Buxton, Feb. 7, 1880;
and ordained minister of the parish of St. Cyrus, Kincardineshire, in 1816. In 1824 he published in Edinburgh, where his subsequent books also appeared, his first work, Evidence of the Truth of the Christian Religion, derived from the Literal Fulfilment of Prophecy. The book had a great run, nearly forty editions having been printed in the author's lifetime. Its most original feature was the use it made of the testimony of modern travellers as to the present condition of Palestine and other Bible countries, the truth of the prophecies being unconsciously attested by them. At various times Dr. Keith followed up this work by The Signs of the Times (1839, 2 vols., 5th ed. 1847,—an exposition of symbolic prophecies in Daniel and Revelation), Demonstration of the Truth of Christianity (1838), The Land of Israel (1843), The Harmony of Prophecy (1851), History and Destiny of the World and of the Church (1861), Reply to Elliot's Home Apocalypice, Reply to Stanley's Remarks on Prophecy, etc., on the Times and Palestine. In 1838 Dr. Keith, with Dr. Black of Aberdeen, Rev. R. M. McCheyne, and Rev. Andrew Bonar, went out to Palestine, Eastern Europe, etc., by appointment of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, on a mission of inquiry as to the state of the Jews preparatory to the establishment of a mission among them. In 1843, on the occurrence of the disruption, he gave up his connection with the Establishment, and helped to found the Free Church of Scotland. For a number of years he was convener of the committee for the conversion of the Jews. Though he lived to a great age, he was always somewhat of an invalid, and at a comparatively early period he retired from active service in the ministry, and devoted himself to literary work.

W. G. BLAIKIE.

KEITH, George, a distinguished Quaker, who, in the latter period of his life, joined the Church of England; b. in Aberdeen, Scotland, about 1640; d. in Ediburton, Sussex, about 1714. He was designed for the Presbyterian ministry, but adopted the principles of the Quakers about 1664. He suffered imprisonment for preaching in England, and emigrated to America, where he was surveyor-general in New Jersey, 1685-88, and taught a school in Philadelphia, 1880. He travelled in New England, and defended the principles of the Quakers against Increase and Cotton Mather. Returning to Philadelphia, he became involved in a controversy with his own sect, chiefly upon the atonement. He also assisted the Friends of being infected with deistic notions. Returning to England, he met Penn himself, who, on hearing one of his sermons on the atonement, rose in his seat, and pronounced him an apostate. Keith was condemned by the Annual Meeting, but formed a body of his own, known as the "Christian Quakers," or "Keithians." Still restless, he united with the Church of England, and was sent out to America as a missionary. In 1706 he returned to England, and was settled at Ediburton, where he died. Burnet, in his History of our own Times, says that Keith "was esteemed the most learned man that ever was in that sect, and was well versed in the Oriental tongues, philosophy, and mathematics." He engaged in a controversy with Robert Barclay, against whom he wrote his principal work, The Standard of the Quakers Examined; or, an Answer to the Apology of Robert Barclay, London, 1702. In this work he tries to prove the seemingly "impregnable bulwark" of Barclay "defective, unsound, and erroneous," and considers a variety of subjects, from immediate revelation and man's fall, to recreations, oaths, and defensive war. See Janney's History of the Friends, Philadelphia, 1867.

KELLS, the, the ancient city in Ireland, in 1152, by Cardinal Paparo, the legate of Eugenius III., for the purpose of re-organizing the Church of Ireland after the Roman model. Only the southwestern part of the country, inhabited by Danish settlers who had received Christianity from their kinsmen in England, stood in active communication with Rome, through the archbishop of Canterbury. In the rest of the country the old Keltic Church was still living, though insulated, and now rapidly falling into decay. The synod effected the ecclesiastical division of the country into the four archbishoprics of Armagh, Cashel, Dublin, and Tuam, the establishment of a church with the introduction of the Peter's-pence, the acknowledgment of the papal supremacy, etc.

KELLY, Thomas, author of some excellent hymns; b. near Athy, in Queen's County, Ireland, 1708; d. May 14, 1855. Graduating with honor at Dublin University, he devoted himself to the study of law, in London, until, his mind being aroused on the subject of religion, he consecrated himself to the ministry, and was ordained in the Established Church in 1792. His preaching was more fervid and evangelistic in character than was usual at that day. He was encouraged by the visit of Rowland Hill to Ireland, in 1793, to preserve this style, but was, after a time, inhibited, by the archbishop of Dublin, from preaching in the diocese. He then began preaching in dissenting chapels in Dublin, soon became a dissentier himself, and from his ample means built a number of Congregational churches at Athy, Wexford, Waterford, etc.

In 1804 Mr. Kelly published a volume of ninety-six Hymns on Various Passages of Scripture. In subsequent editions (7th ed., Dublin, 1853) the number was greatly increased. Mr. Kelly's best hymn is "On the mountain-tops appearing," and "We sing the praise of Him who died," which is distinguished by fervor and strong Christian confidence.

KELTIC CHURCH. This title may be said to apply primarily to the early Christian communities among the aboriginal tribes of Great Britain and Ireland,—the Britons, the Picts, and the Scotti, or Irish,—as well as among the kindred tribes of Brittany and Gallicia. Notwithstanding many feuds, they were bound together by affinities of race and language, and by certain customs and peculiarities of church organization to which they tenaciously clung long after they had been abandoned elsewhere. Secondly the term may be held to embrace those missions among other nationalities—Saxon, Frank, Burgundian, German, Swiss, and Lombard—which originated in the zealous and self-denying labors of Keltic missionaries from Ireland or Iona, in the fifth century.

The history of the Keltic Church has been appropriately divided into three periods: (1) The period of its rise and growth in the countries which were its home, extending from the third to the fifth century, (2) That of its full maturity... of Christian life and culture at home, and of missionary activity abroad, extending from the sixth to the eighth century; (3) that of its gradual decay or violent suppression from the ninth to the twelfth century. It will be evident, that, in the compass of this article, we can give only the briefest account of the doctrine, ritual, and organization, of the Keltic Church.

A. History. 1. Period of Rise and Growth in the Countries which were its Home.

1. South Britain.—When and how Christianity was first introduced into Britain is a question we cannot fail to ask, and one to which as yet we must be content without a very definite answer. But the little we know of British Christianity in pre-Saxon times—of the doctrine, rites, and constitution of the Church—seems rather to favor the idea of its origin from, and close connection with, the half-Oriental, half-Keltic churches of Gaul than more directly with the Church of Rome, or, as was once supposed, that of Asia Minor. It is only at the close of the second century, or, beginning of the third, that we reach firm standing-ground in the brief but significant statement of Tertullian: “Britannorum inaccessa Romanis loca Christovero subdita.” This is a very significant testimony, even if we translate, as we probably should, not THE places, but only indefinitely aces, i.e., some places of the Britons inaccessible to the Romans, but subdued to Christ; and shows that the soldiers of the cross, even at that early date, had succeeded in extending the Master’s sway beyond the limits which the Roman legions had reached, or at least had been able to hold in permanent subjection. Hardly less significant is the testimony of Origen, that there were those in Britain who believed in the one God, and in our Lord; and its significance is not diminished by his further statement, that there were still in Britains and other distant lands, who had not yet heard the word of the gospel. The triumphs of the cross were still very limited in those regions; but there were certainly Christians who believed in the one God, and in our Lord Jesus Christ, and, perhaps, meetings of Christians who worshipped with joy the Father and the Son. True, they may have continued for a time but a “feebly folk,” not many wise, not many noble, may have been called, whose names would have been blazoned while they lived, or graven in brass or stone when they died. But, through the whole of the third century, there were those in Britain who in truth gave themselves to Christ, and did not dishonor his name, and who, when the day of trial came, proved faithful unto death. This was in the Diocletian persecution, the longest and bloodiest the Christian Church had to endure, during which Gildas, the native historian, speaking somewhat vaguely, tells us, “The whole Church seemed under execution, and charging bravely through an ill-natured and inhospitable world, marched, as it were, in whole troops to heaven.” Some maintain that he should have excepted his own country and Gaul from the range of the persecution; but the latter part of his statement shows that he shield over the earliest, and shows that he was neither so ignorant nor so credulous as some have imagined him to be. “Some doubt,” says Mr. Mason, in his historical essay on the Diocletian persecution, “has been entertained on the question whether Constantius did not hinder the persecution from being universal by refusing to take any part in the work at all. It is difficult to discover how far Constantius really participated in the persecution; but that he did so is plain, not only from the fact that the edicts were now the law of the empire, to which he must needs conform, but also because some positive statements in the Acts of St. Crispina . . . prove, that, in Maximinian’s part of the empire, the name of the Caesar, Constantius, was officially quoted as countenancing the promulgation of the edict. Even the second edict, ordering the arrest of the clergy, must have been promulgated by Constantius; for that, at least, is needed to explain the one circumstantially related martyrdom of that time to which the British Church can lay claim.” This is that of Alban, commonly accounted the proto-martyr of Britain. Required to make his choice between sacrificing to the gods, and submitting to the punishment which would have been allotted to the presbyter whose escape he had aided, he adhered to his confession, and, after being scourged, was ordered to be beheaded. The same evening the sentence was executed on the hill outside the Roman town of Verulamium, where the city now stands which commemorates the martyr’s name and fame.

From the cessation of the persecution we may date a more flourishing era of the British Church. It increased considerably in numbers, and was more fully organized; though it was yet far from fulfilling its mission, and gathering into its fold the majority of the British tribes. Three of its bishops (those of London, York, and Colonia Londinensis, which some identify with Colchester, others with Lincoln or Caerleon) are registered among those who attended the synod of Arles held in 314, and are held as assenting to certain canons not in harmony with the later usages of the Keltic Church. It is possible that some of them were present at the Council of Sardica in 347; it is certain that some were at the synod of Ariminum in 358, and that three of them were so poor as to be obliged to accept the allowance offered by the emperor to defray their expenses. They were as yet, in all probability, like the Gallic and African bishops,—but the pastors of single congregations, or of a small circle of congregations.

The British churches and their bishops, like most of those in the West, sided, with Athanasius and the Council of Nicea, against Arius; though, like many others, they were more concerned about the substance of the faith than about the particular terms used to express it. This gave occasion to Hilary to say, as well as their brethren in Gaul and Germany, to take care, not only that they were orthodox in the substance of their belief, but also that they were in agreement with the Council of Nicea as to the terms in which they expressed it. But, though the general orthodoxy of the British churches and their pastors is unquestionably established by the statements of Athanasius and Hilary, it seems to me that they push these statements too far who seek, on the ground of them, to cast discredit on the testimony of the native historians. In some measure, Bede tells us, Arianism did to some extent, make its presence known, and its power felt. The two sets of statements are not inconsistent. The churches, as a whole, may have been steadfast in the faith, while individuals here and there were carried away for a time by Arian or semi-Arian speculations.

From Pelagianism, in the beginning of the fifth century, the British churches confessedly suffered far more severely than they had done from any previous heresy. Indeed, Pelagius, from whom it took its name, is supposed, on good grounds, to have been a native of Britain. It was not in Britain, however, that he first promulgated his errors; but after he had vented them in the chief centres of Christian thought, and they had been refuted and condemned there, some of his partisans, perhaps his fellow-countrymen, Aegidius, Agricola, son of Severinus, to whom Bede ascribes the Pelagians' opening up courage to accept the challenge of the orthodox, found their way into Britain, and promulgated their views there, at least with temporary success. The British bishops, being unable to cope with the intruders, sought an antidote from the same quarter from which, probably, the poison had come. At their request, Germanus of Auxerre, and Lupus of Poictiers, were, in 429, deputed by a Gallic synod (and, as Prosper has it, 'in directio of Pope Celestine') to give the assistance desired. Received with joy, they preached in the churches and in the fields; and so enthusiastically was the re-action they stirred up, that for a time the teachers of the new opinions hesitated to confront them in public. At length they summoned up courage to accept the challenge of the foreign bishops. A great meeting was held near Verulamium to hear the questions in dispute discussed. According to Bede, the Pelagians came forward in all the pride of wealth, and advocated their cause with the most inflated rhetoric. But Germanus and Lupus, when it came to their turn to reply, so overwhelmed them with arguments and authorities in support of their dogmas, that the Pelagian theory was silenced for the time, and the whole assembly triumphed in their discomfiture. Having thus, to all appearance, fulfilled their mission, Germanus and Lupus returned to Gaul. The Pelagians, freed from the presence of their foreign antagonists, speedily set to work to seduce once more the inconstant Britons; and with such success did they work, that in 447 Germanus was again entreated to come over and oppose them. He came, attended by Severus of Treves, and once more he conquered; but, not again content with refuting his opponents, he procured the banishment of their leaders from the island. On the final withdrawal of the Romans from the island, the feeble Britons, harassed first by the Picts and Scots, and then by the Saxons, whose help they had invited against the other, were in the end dispossessed by them of the larger part of their country, and enslaved or massacred without mercy, till the historian of their troubles could find no words adequate to express the extremity of their misery, or those of the Hebrew Psalmist in the time of his people's sorest distress.

2. Britain between the Roman walls, i.e., the British kingdom of Cumbria or Strathclyde. Here some would place St. Ninian, and as his father was a deacon, and his grandfather a presbyter, we seem warranted to infer that Christianity, and some organization of Christians, was not unknown in the district before the close of the previous century. The various dedications of churches, etc., to Patrick in the district, seem, according to Keltic usage, to show that he had labored there, as well as in Ireland. Two who did much for the continuance or revival of his work in Ireland are said to have been born in Cumbria; viz., Mochta, or Machutus, and Gildas.

The district before the close of the previous century was the home of the British Christians, allowed by some to have been of Scotic, i.e., Irish origin, said to be of noble birth) from the surrounding tribes, and from Ireland were trained in Christian living, and stimulated to active Christian work, and in due time largely helped on the revival of religion in Ireland, as in Scotland.

3. Ireland. This was the earliest home of the Scotti, and is, undoubtedly, the Scotti of the earlier middle ages. Christianity is supposed to have come to it from France, with which there was pretty close intercourse during the third and fourth centuries; but, if it met with any success, it must have been of a very limited kind. Celestius, the companion of Pelagius, is said by some to have been of Scotic, i.e., Irish origin, and is said to have kept up correspondence with the land of his birth after he left it. Under the year 451—the year of the famous Council of Ephesus—we read in the Chronicon of Prosper of Aquitaine, "Ad Scottos in Christiana credentis" ordinatur a Papa Celestino Palladius et primus episcopus mittitur. " There were, then, already Scots who believed in Christ; and, according to the Irish legends, Palladius was not sworn greatly to enlarge their number, and after a short time he left the country, and died in the land of the Picts. The Scottish legend is, that he lived there for many years, and carried on his mission with more success than in Ireland. The truth of the second is that Patricius to the Irish legends, Palladius was not honored.

There were, then, already whom we have already referred as born near Dumbarston, in the kingdom of Strathclyde, who, being carried captive in his youth to Ireland, served there for six years as a slave, and who, after a second and very brief captivity, felt an inward call to devote himself to the work of converting the barbarous tribes among whom his lot, when a slave, had been cast. Some suppose that he had begun his missionary work before Palladius was first ordained. It is said that he ended it after Palladius had retired from it in despair. If there is much that is legendary and untrustworthy in the accounts that have come down to us regarding him, there can be little doubt that he began his work about that time, and that he prosecuted it with great perseverance, and with a large amount of success. According to the old Irish tradition, the saints of the first order were all bishops. St. Patrick is said to have ordained three hundred and fifty or three hundred and sixty-five of them, and to have founded as many churches. They were, therefore, of a very humble grade, such village or tribal bishops as were to found in Keltic Britain, and such they appear to have continued to from a comparatively late date in Ireland. Two writings attributed to St. Patrick have been preserved,—his Confessio and his Epistola ad Coroticum; the former of which is certainly, and the latter is probably, genuine. Both exhibit him as a humble, simple-minded, self-denying, and devoted Christian missionary, holding by the great truths generally held by the worthies of the ancient church, and apparently unacquainted with, or averse to, several erroneous opinions which were coming into favor elsewhere. The hymn attributed to him, and translated in Dr. Todd's Life of the saint, shows that, to some extent, superstitious notions still mingled with his simple faith. Neither the style nor the contents of his confessio are in harmony with the opinion that he spent several years in Rome, or sought or got any confirmation of his mission from there.

II. Period of Revived Christian Life at Home, and of Missionary Activity Abroad.

The clergy of the earlier period, even in Ireland, seem to have been mainly a secular clergy, and had to deal with people scattered among their heathen kindred, and in strict subjection to their secular chiefs. Monastic institutions, so far as they were present at all, formed but a subordinate feature in the Church of that time. But in this second period, and under the second order of saints, these institutions held a more important place in Wales and Ireland, and in Scotland became the most distinctive feature of the Church. The monasteries, with their dependent missionary colonies, may be said to have constituted the Church. These houses, however, were rather missionary institutes, like those of the Moravians, for the conversion of surrounding tribes, and the training and protection of the converts, than monasteries in the later sense. Whence the new life and organization came,—whether from the magnum monasterium of Ninian at Whithorn, or from the source from which the founder of that monastery had got it,—the monastery at Tours, or from some affiliated institution in Brittany, or whether, as Gildas says, it was the deep penitence of the Britons under the terrible chastisements they suffered at the hands of the Saxon invaders—it were not easy now to determine. All we know with certainty is, that, in the sixth century, it specially manifested itself in the monastic schools of Wales, was conveyed from them to Ireland through Finniann of Clonard, and from Ireland was brought back in intensified form to Scotland. This century, Bishop Forbes tells us, in his Introduction to the Life of St. Kentigern, was, in Wales, a century of national life, of religious and mental activity. It was the age of Sts. David, Iltus, Samson, and Teilo; it sent missionaries to Ireland and to Brittany. Indeed, Brittany, which had suffered from various invaders almost as severely as England itself, was to a large extent repeopled from Britain. It was at this epoch that the celebrated monastic college of Bangor—founded on the Dee—was founded. It was from the Welsh saints, especially David, Gildas, and Cadoc, that the impulse to the new movement in Ireland came. The traditions as to the second order of Irish saints, almost all of whom were presbyters and monks, point to a great revival and spread of religion through a new and living agency based on monastic institutions, in which the population which gathered round the more strictly ecclesiastical nucleus, separated from heathen relations, and freed from the arbitrary control of secular chiefs, could be more fully instructed in Christian truth, more carefully trained in Christian living, and guarded from contamination with the pollutions of heathenism. In these institutions attention was given to various departments of learning and culture, as well as to more simple instruction in Christian truth and the practices of Christian devotion. That and the two succeeding centuries are spoken of as the "golden age of Ireland," when, within these monastic sanctuaries at least, there was contentment, prosperity, zealous study, and earnest Christian life; when they were the resort of students from Britain and the continent of Europe; and when the land was known as the "home of learning," as well as of the "island of saints." This mission-work was especially carried on by twelve of Finnian's disciples, who covered their native land with such institutions, and became known as the "twelve apostles of Ireland." Two of the band were, like their master, descended from the Irish Picts; and one of them, at least, found scope for his missionary activity among the Picts of Scotland, as well as among their brethren in Ireland. But the chief of all the twelve was Columba, who united in himself the training of both the great monastic schools, having been the pupil of Finnian of Moville, who had the training of the Welsh school. The details of his romantic career and marvellous success are given in the article on Columba (vol. i. pp. 515, 546), and need not be here repeated. The work begun by him and his twelve companions at Iona was carried on by their successors till all Pictland and the Scottic kingdom of Dalriada, as well as part of their native country, were covered with institutions subject to the mother-house of Iona and its presbyter abbot, the coarb of Columba;
KELTIC CHURCH.

and evangelists were sent out thence to many of the outlying islands, and to the great Anglic kingdom of Northumbria.

It is said to have been but a few years before the death of Columba, that the last of the British bishops in England abandoned their sees, and, with the remnant of their flocks, sought refuge from the cruel oppression of their heathen invaders in the mountain fastnesses of the west and south, which yet remained in the hands of heathen and south, which yet remained in the hands of usages, and aid their work. Their labors, at first,
and evangelists were sent out thence to many of the outlying islands, and to the great Anglic
kingdom of Northumbria.

The king assigned to Aidan, as his residence, and his companions preached the gospel zealously, travelling from place to place, and pressing their message on the acceptance of all. The king often acted as their interpreter till they became familiar with the language of his subjects. All commended their doctrine by their holy, humble, self-denying lives. Oswin, the brother of Oswald, and the ruler of Southern Northumberland, or Deira, also welcomed the Scottish missionaries, who thus had free course, as evangelists from the Pagan kingdom of Humber.
Aidan died in 651, and Finan, or Finnian, was sent from Iona as his successor. He was honored, not only to carry forward the work which Aidan had so nobly begun in Northumbria, but also to extend it to the south, gaining an entrance for the faith into the Pagan kingdom of Mercia, and also recalling to it the East Saxons, formerly won over partially by one of the Roman mis-ionaries. An Irish missionary also is said to have been the first to preach the gospel to the East Angles. Thus, from Keltic Iona and Ireland "the gospel was carried among the Pagan tribes from the Forth to the Thames; and the Jutes and Angles of Northumbria, the Middle Angles of Mercia, the East Angles and the East Saxons, were won over to the Christian faith." In 661 Finan was succeeded by Colman. In his time occurred the famous synod, or conference, at Streaneshalch, or Whitby, at which it was determined by Oswy that the Saxon churches should conform to the Roman, in the time of observing Easter, and in the form of the clerical tonsure. Colman, who could not bring himself to abandon the customs of the Church of Iona, thereupon retired from England; but several of his and of Aidan's pupils remained, and, while conforming in these external things to the new régime, continued with vigor their evangelistic work. In the course of the sixth century many earnest and able men went forth from the Scoto-Irish monasteries to labor as missionaries on the continent of Europe, and win over to Christianity, or the trinitarian form of it, the Teutonic tribes who had broken up and over-spread the western part of the Roman Empire.

Chief among these, towards the close of the century, was Columbanus, or Columba, jun., the pupil of Colmán and Finian of Clonard.
Setting out, like his elder namesake, with twelve companions, he attempted to carry the gospel to some of the heathen tribes in England.
Meeting with no success among them, he passed on to the Continent, and settled first in Burgundy, then at Luxovium, or Luxeuil. There, amidst the forests, he constructed a monastery in Scotic form, which soon became famous as a nursery of piety, a centre of Nicene orthodoxy, and a school for the training of Christian youth. Two other institutions of a similar character were set up in the surroundings, and occupied by the disciples, remaining, according to the custom of his native land, subject to his jurisdiction.
He and his disciples soon succeeded in gaining the confidence of the people among whom they had settled; but their popularity at length roused the jealousy of the native clergy who had resumed in that part of Gaul after it passed into the hands of the Burgundians. In particular, their adherence to the custom of the Irish Church, as to the time of observing the Easter festival, and their claim to a separate organization, exposed them to much trouble. Columbanus wrote boldly in defence of his views, both to Gregory I. and to one of his successors. He wrote in similar terms to a French synod, assembled to determine the matter in dispute, resolutely contending for the custom of his own church, and earnestly pleading to be allowed "to live quietly in those woods, beside the bones of his seventeen departed brethren," as hitherto. By his stern faithfulness in rebuking the shameless excesses of Theodoric, or Thierry, he also incurred the displeasure of that Burgundian monarch, and was ordered to leave the kingdom. After laboring for a short time in various German cities on the banks of the Rhine, he made his way into Switzerland, where he was successful in reclaiming many who had relapsed into Paganism. He preached the gospel on the shores of Lake Constance and in the Rhetian territory; and leaving behind him Gallus, the disciple whose name has been permanently associated with the district, to complete his work, he passed over the Alps into Italy. By permission of the king of the Lombards, he settled in his dominions, and raised at Bobbio that monastery which was to preserve to future generations his name and fame, and many of his writings. It is to these writings that Dr. Ebrard has mainly indebted for the account he has given of the teaching of the Columban missionaries, and they certainly present it in its most favorable aspect. Columbanus died in 615.

Under Theodoric's successor, the monastery of Luxovium revived, and became the mother of a considerable number of similar institutions in various parts of France. Eustasius, who presided over it, also carried the gospel to Bavaria; Kilian, to Thuringia; Fiacre, Fursey, Uitan, and others, to various parts of France, Belgium, etc. Less known Irish missionaries in the eighth century introduced Christianity into the Faroe Islands, and even into Iceland. "Thus, between the fifth and eighth centuries, the Keltic Church extended, with intermissions, north and south from Iceland to Spain, east and west from the Atlantic to the Danube, from westernmost Ireland to the Italian Babbio and the German Salzburg, —catholic in doctrine and practice, and yet with its claims to catholicity ignored or impugned; with a long roll of saints, every name of note on which is either that of one, like Columbanus, taking a line wholly independent of Rome, or, like Colman at the synod of Whitby, directly in collision with her; having its own liturgy, its own translation of the Bible, its own mode of chanting, its own monastic rule, its own cycle for the calculation of Easter, and presenting both internal and external evidence of a complete autonomy. "It brought religion straight home to men's hearts by sheer power of love and self-sacrifice. It held up before them, in the unconscious goodness and nobleness of its representatives, the moral evidence of Christianity, and made them feel what it was to be taught and cared for in the life spiritual by pastors, who, before all things, were the disciples and ministers of Christ" (like Aidan, Columbanus, and Gallus).

III. Periods of Gradual Decay or Violent Suppression. — As already stated, the Columban Church of Northumbria was required by Oswy, in 664, to conform to certain customs of the Roman Church. Bishop Colman and some of his clergy, who refused to do so, returned to their native country. Others, who complied, were allowed to remain; and Columbanus, by the statement of Galfrid, a ceremony which implied that their Scotic ordination was imperfect. Wilfrid, who had been the chief advocate of Roman usages at Whitby, was promoted to the vacant bishopric; and, declining to own the mission of the Scotic prelates, he sought and obtained consecration on the Continent. The British churches in Wales did not conform to the Roman rule for determining the Easter festival till a century after the synod of Whitby, nor were they brought fully under the English metropolitan see till the twelfth century. The churches of Devonshire and Cornwall conformed to the Roman Easter about the beginning of the eighth century, but were not completely brought under the archbishop of Canterbury till the Normans times. The see of St. Ninian at Whithorn was revived by the Saxons when masters of that part of North Britain, and continued for several centuries to be subject to the archepiscopal see of York. The see of St. Kentigern, by persuasion of Adamnan, conformed to the Roman usages in 688, and for a time also was brought into subjection to the see of York. Nectan, the imperious king of the Picts, who turned the tide of Saxon conquest in Scotland, on the suggestion of Saxon or Irish emissaries, required his clergy to conform to the Roman customs. But part of them, if they yielded for a time, did so against their convictions: and in 717 he took the strong step of expelling from his dominions the Scotch monks, or "family of Hii, or Hy." They were not restored to their old foundations till the time of Kenneth MacAlpin; and immigrants were brought from various quarters to supply their places, — some from Saxon England, more from the south of Ireland. These were disciples of the third order of Irish saints, and are supposed to have been mainly Culdees. (See art. on CULDEES, vol. i pp. 579—581.) The Church of South Ireland accepted the Roman reckoning of the Easter festival in 634, that of North Ireland about 710; but no doubt there continued for a time, in several of the smaller monasteries, adherents of the older custom. Iona is said to have conformed in 717: but in 729 Mr. Skene tells us but one festival is mentioned on which the new custom had been observed; and till 771 it is said there was a schism in the island, — rival abbots, and probably rival celebrations of the festival. The final extinction of the old Keltic Church, both in Scotland and Ireland, was due, in part at least, to internal decay, and was not completed till the close of the eleventh century, under St. Margaret in Scotland and St. Malachy in Ireland. The Keltic bishopric in Gallicia seems to have been brought into conformity with the Church of Spain in the seventh century. The peculiar usages of the Church in Brittany were not abandoned till the ninth century, nor was it till the close of the twelfth century that it was finally brought under the archbishopric of Tours. The suppression of the Keltic Church in Germany was brought about mainly through the labors of the Anglo-Saxon Wulfred, or St. Boniface, and in the first half of the eighth century. The Keltic bishopric in Gallicia seems to have been brought into conformity with the Church of Spain in the seventh century. The peculiar usages of the Church in Brittany were not abandoned till the ninth century, nor was it till the close of the twelfth century that it was finally brought under the archbishopric of Tours. The suppression of the Keltic Church in Germany was brought about mainly through the labors of the Anglo-Saxon Wulfred, or St. Boniface, and in the first half of the eighth century.

B. Doctrine, Ritual, and Constitution. 1. Doctrine of Keltic Church. — The general orthodoxy of its great teachers is shown by the professions of faith contained in the writings of St. Patrick and Columbanus, by the statement of Galfrid, Bede, and others in early times, and the acknowledgments of Montalembert and other Roman "Catholics" in our own time. In the controversy as to the "Tria Capitula" in connection with the fifth general council, Baronius admits that the Irish Church took a different view from that of Rome. But what mainly separated it and the British churches, in the second period of their history, from the Church of Rome, was the difference of their usages and ceremonies. The Easter festival, the tonsure, etc., their claim to independence in their own lands, and assertion of the right to send missionaries elsewhere without authority from Rome. Ebrard and some others seem still to regard them as a sort of premature protestation. We think it would be nearer the truth to say, that, as the twilight last so much longer in these northern regions, so also the afterglow of the primitive day was lengthened out there, when darkness was coming on apace elsewhere, and that the great teachers there retained a singularly living hold of the central doctrines of the gospel, and above all, of the evangelical character. There were from the first persons bearing the title of head of the church, and of the supremacy of his Holy Word. We doubt if, anywhere in the early literature of the Christian Church, more emphatic reference will be found to that commission than in the confession of St. Patrick, or a more touching and heartily vindication of the supremacy of Scripture than in Columbanus's letters to Gregory the Great and Boniface IV. Even Adamnan says that they were wont to support their doctrines "by referring to the testimony of Holy Scripture;" and the Saxon Bede testifies that they "only observed those works of piety and chastity which they could learn in the prophetical, evangelical, and apostolical writings." The teaching of their great doctors, from Patrick to Columbanus, concentrated itself round the person and work of our divine-human Redeemer, —"Christ before, Christ behind, Christ above, Christ beneath, Christ in the heart, Christ in the eye, Christ at home, Christ abroad."

2. Rituall. No fragment of a liturgy or missal in any ancient Keltic dialect has yet been brought to light. Mr. Skene, however, the most careful and impartial investigator in our day, does not hesitate to affirm, that, according to the ancient tradition, they were wont to support their doctrines"by referring to the testimony of Holy Scripture;" and the Saxon Bede testifies that they "only observed those works of piety and chastity which they could learn in the prophetical, evangelical, and apostolical writings." The teaching of their great doctors, from Patrick to Columbanus, concentrated itself round the person and work of our divine-human Redeemer, —"Christ before, Christ behind, Christ above, Christ beneath, Christ in the heart, Christ in the eye, Christ at home, Christ abroad."
admitted by Bede, and in harmony with many others recently brought to light by Ritschl, Lightfoot, and Hatch, is capable of explanation on the hypothesis that bishop and presbyter were originally but different names for one office, and that the Church of Keltica had an entirely different type of human arrangement, and that the superiority of the former over the latter was developed after the days of the apostles "by little and little," and in some countries more slowly than in others. But on the hypothesis that the bishop, under that name or any other, was by divine appointment distinct from the presbyter, and superior to him, the facts now admitted as to the constitution of the old Irish and Scottish monastic Church seem to me all but inexplicable. The analogy sometimes drawn between the position of such a bishop and that in which a bishop may sometimes find himself in a college or university still,—under a presbyter or vice-chancellor,—fails in a most important respect; for neither the college nor university is the church in which quæ bishop he is to discharge his function. But in the second period of the Keltic Church the monastery and the Church were one; and the special sphere in which the bishop as bishop had to work was the mother-house, or its affiliated institutions. In all he did he was directed by the abbot and his council, and that even in the act of ordination. If the word ordinare, which Bede (in Book iii. 5) uses of the presbyter-abbot and his seniors at Iona, is not to be taken in its natural sense of an act done by themselves, then it can only be taken causatively, i.e., of an act ordered or caused to be done by them. That interpretation is hardly less fatal to any claim of the bishop to an office jure divino higher than the presbyter's.

KEMPIS, Thomas, the author of the De Imitatione Christi ("The Imitation of Christ"); b. in 1379, or 1380, in Kempen, a town forty miles north of Cologne; d. July 26, 1471, at Zwolle, in the Netherlands. His paternal name was Hämmerken, or, Latinized, Malleolus. He was brought up with care by his parents, and sent in 1386 to a famous school in Deventer, then under the charge of Florentius Radewijns and the Brothers of Common Life. In 1400 he was admitted to the Augustiniane convent at Mount St. Agnes, near Zwolle, received priest's orders in 1413, and was chosen subprior in 1429. In consequence of a papal interdict, he left the convent for a season, sejournng at Arnheim. On his return he was again, in 1418, made subprior.

The life of Thomas was an uneventful one, and he seems to have taken no prominent part in the public movements of his day. It was while he still lived that the papal schism, the condemnation of Hus and Jerome, and other important ecclesiastical events, transpired. His piety was of a mystical type, and his contemplative nature delighted (so we gather from his ascetic and devotional writings) in analyzing the motives and feelings of the soul, and directing the gaze of the soul to Christ. He confined himself to the retirement of the convent, where he sometimes preached, and devoted much time to making copies of manuscripts, amongst which was the Bible. Underneath an old portrait of him are the words, which no doubt fitly characterize his life, "Everywhere I sought quiet, and found it nowhere else than in solitude and amongst books." He left behind him a number of works, all written in Latin, most of which are of a devotional character. Some of the titles of these are, The Garden of the Roses (Hortulus rosarum), The Valley of the Lilies (Valis italicorum), The Soliloquy of the Soul (Soliloquium animae), The Three Tabernacles (De tribus tabernaculis); i.e., the virtues, humility, and patience. Sermons to Novices, Sermons and Meditations (Conciones et meditations) on the life and death of our Lord, and a biography of Florentius Radewijns. These works, however, would not of themselves have made their author famous, and given to his name a title of the interest which attaches to it. The immortality of his name is derived from the De Imitatione Christi. This work, consisting of four books, derive its name from the heading of the first chapter of the first book. It contains meditations upon the spiritual estate of the soul, and the ways of drawing into a closer and more personal union with Christ, and overcoming the evil tendencies of the natural man. It would be superfluous to say any thing in praise of this book, although it must be confessed that its quietistic instructions need to be supplemented by counsels for active work amongst men to make it fully effective in the life of the wants of Christians. It is calculated to promote personal piety in retirement, rather than to fit men for engaging in the public battles and work of life. Next to the Bible it has perhaps been the most extensively used manual of devotion in Christian lands. The first printed edition appeared at Augsburg, in 1488; and there were at least twenty editions before the close of the century. Since then it has been translated into many languages, including the Hebrew (Frankfurt, 1887). A polyglot edition appeared at Sulzbach in 1837, comprising the Latin, Italian, Spanish, French, German, English, and Greek translations. Some conception of the number of editions which have since appeared may be secured from the Büllingen collection of editions, which was donated in 1838, to the Cologne municipal library, and contained at that time four hundred copies.
KEMPIS.

The authorship of the Imitation of Christ, although now pretty generally ascribed to Thomas a Kempis, has been the subject of one of the most heated discussions in the history of literature, and one in which not only individuals took part, but also two celebrated monastic orders,—the Augustinians and Benedictines. Even the honor of whole nations was deemed wrapped up in the settlement of the dispute. This discussion was introduced in 1804 by Pedro Manriquez, who, asserting, on the basis of an alleged quotation of the Imitation of Christ by Bonaventura, in his Collationes, that the author must have lived before Bonaventura. About the same time, Rossignoli, superior of the Jesuit College at Arona, near Milan, found a manuscript which was undated, but bore the title Incipitum capitula primiti libri Abbatis Joh. Gersen or Gesen. As the establishment had originally belonged to the Benedictines, it was supposed the manuscript was very old; but it was proved to have been brought from Genoa in 1579. It was natural to suppose that the famous chancellor of Paris, John Gerson, was here intended. But the Benedictine Cajetan, secretary of Paul V., sought to turn the discovery to the advantage of the Benedictine order, and had an edition printed in Rome, in which the work was ascribed to the “venerable man John Gersen, abbot of the order of St. Benedict.” About the same time he announced the discovery of a Venice edition, in which the statement occurred, “Not John Gerson, but John, abbot of Vercelli, wrote this book.” Advocates now arose defending the view that the work was written by Thomas a Kempis, who had been the most current view up to the beginning of the century. In 1638 Cajetan won a victory to be printed under the name of Gersen. But the weight of argument is decidedly on the side of Thomas a Kempis. Leaving out of view the evidence drawn from the contents of the De Imitatione, and the alleged Germanisms in the style, we may state the most tenable theory is, that the name was a misprint for Thomas. This is the third book of the De Imitatione. It adds a catalogue of thirty-eight of Thomas’s writings, among which are the four books of the De Imitatione. Buschius (Adrien de But) of Windesheim, in his Chronicles of Windesheim, written six years before Thomas’s death (1494), and Hermann Rute (b. 1408), expressly attribute it to Thomas, the latter speaking of him as a brother at Mount St. Agnes. Further: Peter Schott, who in 1488 edited Gerson’s works, does not include it amongst them, but expressly ascribes it to Thomas. (2) By far the larger number of manuscripts before 1500 bear his name, as well as of the printed editions.

There are no contemporary witnesses to the view that Gerson was the author; on the contrary, the lists of Gerson’s writings given by John, prior at Lyons, in 1428, and by Casesius in 1429, do not mention the De Imitatione.

gives a long list of the writers on this subject:)

Giovanni Gersen, sein Leben un dess Werk de Initiatione Christi, Augsburg, 1880; Spitzer: Th. d Kempis als Schryger d. Nauhinken von Christ, Utrecht, 1881.

KEN, Thomas, a devout poet and bishop of the Church of England; b. at Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, July, 1637; d. at Longleat, Somersetshire, March 10, 1711. He studied at Winchester School, Oxford, 1651-53, and at Winchester College in 1666, and prebendary of the cathedral in 1669. In 1675 he visited Rome, and on his return was accused of leanings towards the Roman-Catholic Church, but falsely. In 1679 he was made chaplain to Mary, at the court of William of Orange, at The Hague, but soon returned to England. In 1683, when he was again residing at Winchester, he showed the metal he was made of by refusing to give up his apartment to Nell Gwynn, the mistress of Charles II., who was visiting the city. When called upon to vacate his room, he replied, "Not for the king's kingdom!" Charles responded with a refusal, and soon afterwards, when the sea of Bath and Wells became vacant, made him bishop, exclaiming, "Odds fish! who shall have Bath and Wells but the little fellow who would not give poor Nelly a lodging?" He was with the king during his last visit in the city. When called upon to vacate his room, he replied, "Not for the king's kingdom!"

Bishop Ken was a man of rare piety and sweetness of spirit, and of fearless independence. He was a Non-juror from conscientious convictions. Macaulay speaks of his "moral character, when impartially reviewed, as sustaining a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and as approaching, as near as human infirmity permits, to the ideal perfection of Christian virtue." Of his ability in the pulpit, no testimony remains, except that of Evelyn, who speaks of "the wonderful eloquence of this admirable preacher." His sermons are no longer read. Ken has a conspicuous place in our church hymnology as the author of the Morning and Evening Hymns; and, according to Bowles, many of them (including the Morning and Evening Hymns) were written for the boys of Winchester College, and during his incumbency as fellow. During the last years of his life this devout man carried his absurd in his portmanteau, and was accustomed to say that "it might be as soon wanted as any other of his habiliments." He was buried at Frome, near Longleat, and, at his request, just as the sun was rising,—a circumstance appropriate to the first line of his morning hymn, which he composed after the journey to Palestine. Their encampment, apart from the latter, was noticed by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 21, 22). At a later period some of them were living in the northern part of Canaan (Judg. iv. 11), and some in the extreme south, near Judah (Judg. i. 16); and there they were in Saul's time (1 Sam. xv. 6). The kindness they had showed to Israel in the wilderness was gratefully remembered; and so they were not only spared by Saul, but David allowed them to share in the spoil he took from the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 6, xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). They then lived in cities.

KENNICOTT, Benjamin, Hebraist, b. at Totnes, Devonshire, April 4, 1718; d. at Oxford, Sept. 18, 1783. He studied at Oxford, and was elected fellow of Exeter College, 1747, in consequence of his application for the printing of Hebrew manuscripts. He was a Non-juror from conscientious convictions. Macaulay speaks of his "moral character, when impartially reviewed, as sustaining a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and as approaching, as near as human infirmity permits, to the ideal perfection of Christian virtue." Of his ability in the pulpit, no testimony remains, except that of Evelyn, who speaks of "the wonderful eloquence of this admirable preacher." His sermons are no longer read. Ken has a conspicuous place in our church hymnology as the author of the Morning and Evening Hymns; and, according to Bowles, many of them (including the Morning and Evening Hymns) were written for the boys of Winchester College, and during his incumbency as fellow. During the last years of his life this devout man carried his absurd in his portmanteau, and was accustomed to say that "it might be as soon wanted as any other of his habiliments." He was buried at Frome, near Longleat, and, at his request, just as the sun was rising,—a circumstance appropriate to the first line of his morning hymn, which he composed after the journey to Palestine. Their encampment, apart from the latter, was noticed by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 21, 22). At a later period some of them were living in the northern part of Canaan (Judg. iv. 11), and some in the extreme south, near Judah (Judg. i. 16); and there they were in Saul's time (1 Sam. xv. 6). The kindness they had showed to Israel in the wilderness was gratefully remembered; and so they were not only spared by Saul, but David allowed them to share in the spoil he took from the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 6, xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). They then lived in cities.

KENNET, White, antiquary, b. at Dover, 1660; d. at Westminster, Dec. 19, 1728. He was graduated from Oxford, where he was, a few years later, tutor and vice-principal of St. Edmund's Hall, and excited great interest in antiquities. He was made dean of Peterborough, 1707, and then bishop of the diocese of that name, 1718. His most valuable work is Parochial Antiquities of Oxford and Bucksire, Oxford, 1695. He was a vigorous upholder of the Low Church party.

KENNICOTT, Benjamin, Hebraist, b. at Totnes, Devonshire, April 4, 1718; d. at Oxford, Sept. 18, 1783. He studied at Oxford, and was elected fellow of Exeter College, 1747, in consequence of his application for the printing of Hebrew manuscripts. He was a Non-juror from conscientious convictions. Macaulay speaks of his "moral character, when impartially reviewed, as sustaining a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and as approaching, as near as human infirmity permits, to the ideal perfection of Christian virtue." Of his ability in the pulpit, no testimony remains, except that of Evelyn, who speaks of "the wonderful eloquence of this admirable preacher." His sermons are no longer read. Ken has a conspicuous place in our church hymnology as the author of the Morning and Evening Hymns; and, according to Bowles, many of them (including the Morning and Evening Hymns) were written for the boys of Winchester College, and during his incumbency as fellow. During the last years of his life this devout man carried his absurd in his portmanteau, and was accustomed to say that "it might be as soon wanted as any other of his habiliments." He was buried at Frome, near Longleat, and, at his request, just as the sun was rising,—a circumstance appropriate to the first line of his morning hymn, which he composed after the journey to Palestine. Their encampment, apart from the latter, was noticed by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 21, 22). At a later period some of them were living in the northern part of Canaan (Judg. iv. 11), and some in the extreme south, near Judah (Judg. i. 16); and there they were in Saul's time (1 Sam. xv. 6). The kindness they had showed to Israel in the wilderness was gratefully remembered; and so they were not only spared by Saul, but David allowed them to share in the spoil he took from the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 6, xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). They then lived in cities.

KENNICOTT, Benjamin, Hebraist, b. at Totnes, Devonshire, April 4, 1718; d. at Oxford, Sept. 18, 1783. He studied at Oxford, and was elected fellow of Exeter College, 1747, in consequence of his application for the printing of Hebrew manuscripts. He was a Non-juror from conscientious convictions. Macaulay speaks of his "moral character, when impartially reviewed, as sustaining a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and as approaching, as near as human infirmity permits, to the ideal perfection of Christian virtue." Of his ability in the pulpit, no testimony remains, except that of Evelyn, who speaks of "the wonderful eloquence of this admirable preacher." His sermons are no longer read. Ken has a conspicuous place in our church hymnology as the author of the Morning and Evening Hymns; and, according to Bowles, many of them (including the Morning and Evening Hymns) were written for the boys of Winchester College, and during his incumbency as fellow. During the last years of his life this devout man carried his absurd in his portmanteau, and was accustomed to say that "it might be as soon wanted as any other of his habiliments." He was buried at Frome, near Longleat, and, at his request, just as the sun was rising,—a circumstance appropriate to the first line of his morning hymn, which he composed after the journey to Palestine. Their encampment, apart from the latter, was noticed by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 21, 22). At a later period some of them were living in the northern part of Canaan (Judg. iv. 11), and some in the extreme south, near Judah (Judg. i. 16); and there they were in Saul's time (1 Sam. xv. 6). The kindness they had showed to Israel in the wilderness was gratefully remembered; and so they were not only spared by Saul, but David allowed them to share in the spoil he took from the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 6, xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). They then lived in cities.

KENNICOTT, Benjamin, Hebraist, b. at Totnes, Devonshire, April 4, 1718; d. at Oxford, Sept. 18, 1783. He studied at Oxford, and was elected fellow of Exeter College, 1747, in consequence of his application for the printing of Hebrew manuscripts. He was a Non-juror from conscientious convictions. Macaulay speaks of his "moral character, when impartially reviewed, as sustaining a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and as approaching, as near as human infirmity permits, to the ideal perfection of Christian virtue." Of his ability in the pulpit, no testimony remains, except that of Evelyn, who speaks of "the wonderful eloquence of this admirable preacher." His sermons are no longer read. Ken has a conspicuous place in our church hymnology as the author of the Morning and Evening Hymns; and, according to Bowles, many of them (including the Morning and Evening Hymns) were written for the boys of Winchester College, and during his incumbency as fellow. During the last years of his life this devout man carried his absurd in his portmanteau, and was accustomed to say that "it might be as soon wanted as any other of his habiliments." He was buried at Frome, near Longleat, and, at his request, just as the sun was rising,—a circumstance appropriate to the first line of his morning hymn, which he composed after the journey to Palestine. Their encampment, apart from the latter, was noticed by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 21, 22). At a later period some of them were living in the northern part of Canaan (Judg. iv. 11), and some in the extreme south, near Judah (Judg. i. 16); and there they were in Saul's time (1 Sam. xv. 6). The kindness they had showed to Israel in the wilderness was gratefully remembered; and so they were not only spared by Saul, but David allowed them to share in the spoil he took from the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 6, xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). They then lived in cities.
he published his Hebrew Bible, Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum et graecum Lectionibus, Oxford, 1776–80, 2 vols. Meanwhile, in 1761, he took his doctor's degree; in 1767 he was made Radcliffe librarian; and in October, 1770, canon of Christ Church, and rector of Culham, Oxfordshire.

The various readings noticed in his Hebrew Bible, and which were printed at the foot of the pages, and at the end of some parts only, are compared in a Dissertatio generalis in V. T. Hebraicum (separately published by Bruns, Brunswick, 1733), in which he described and justified his undertaking, and gave a history of the Hebrew text from the Babylonian captivity. De Rossi supplemented the later of Kennicott in his Variae lectiones V. T., etc. (Parma, 1784–88, 4 vols.; supplement, 1798). The whole number of manuscripts collated by these two was thirteen hundred and forty-six. Kennicott's work was affected adversely by his preference for the Samaritan Pentateuch, his deliberate neglect of the Massorah, and disregard of the vowel-points, his lack of uniformity, and occasionally of accuracy, and his defective judgment. But, on the other hand, his service to textual criticism was immense, and he deserves the highest praise. See Horne: Introduction, 14th ed., p. iv. 674; Davidson: Biblical Criticism.

KENESIS. See Christology, pp. 461 sqq.

KENRICK, Francis Patrick, American Roman-Catholic prelate; b. in Dublin, Dec. 3, 1797; d. in Baltimore, July 8, 1863. He was educated at the Propaganda, Rome; came to America 1821; was consecrated coadjutor-bishop at Bardstown, Ky., June 6, 1830; became full bishop 1842; made Catholic prelate; b. in Dublin, Dec. 3, 1797; d. in Baltimore, July 8, 1863. He was educated at the Catholic seminaries of America. He issued an annotated and revised translation of the complete New Testament (New York, 1849–51, 2 vols.), of the Old Testament, the Psalms, Book of Wisdom, and Canticles (Baltimore, 1857), Job and the Prophets (1859), and the Pentateuch (1860), Historical Books (1862). This revised translation ranks with the best of the Roman-Catholic versions, and is far superior to that in ordinary use.

KENTIGERN (head master), St., a Scottish saint, "the apostle of Strathclyde, and the restorer of Christianity among the Cumbrians;" b. at Culuscross about 516; d. at Glasgow 603. He is supposed to have been the child of a nun; but little certain is known respecting his life. Tradition makes him the foster-child of a man who lived two hundred years after him, and to have wrought many miracles. According to the stories told about him, which may have elements of truth in them, his early home was Culcross (Culross). His popular name, Munghar, or Mungeo (dearest friend), was a proof of his amiability. The jealousy of his fellow-pupils drove him to Cathures (Glasgow): there he lived with two brothers, ever increasing in fame on account of his sanctity and miracles. He attracted the notice of the king of Cumbria, whose name was Naranbant, was consecrated coadjutor-bishop at Bardstown, Ky., 1830; became full bishop 1842; made Catholic prelate; b. in Dublin, Dec. 3, 1797; d. in Baltimore, July 8, 1863. He was educated at the Catholic seminaries of America. He issued an annotated and revised translation of the complete New Testament (New York, 1849–51, 2 vols.), of the Old Testament, the Psalms, Book of Wisdom, and Canticles (Baltimore, 1857), Job and the Prophets (1859), and the Pentateuch (1860), Historical Books (1862). This revised translation ranks with the best of the Roman-Catholic versions, and is far superior to that in ordinary use.

KERO, said to have been a monk of St. Gall in the time of Abbot Othmar, 720–759. Melchior Goldast (d. 1635) and Jodocus Metzler (d. 1639) ascribe to him the oldest German translation of the rules of the Benedictines, the Glossarium Kronis, and several other works. But the only Kerio we know of as monk in St. Gall during the eighth century, is mentioned in a document dated Oct. 28, 789; and internal reasons forbid to consider him the author of the above works. Kero seems, indeed, to be a purely fictitious name under which a number of works were gathered in the catalogues. See Scherker: Verzeichniss d. Handschriften d. Stiftsbibliothek von St. Gallen, 340–343.

KESSLER, Johannes (Chesselius, Ahenarius), b. at St. Gall; d. there March 15, 1574; studied theology at Basle, at Leipzig, and at Wittenberg, but determined, on his return, in 1528, to go into business, and not to take orders. He became a saddler. Nevertheless, he soon after began to preach, and hold meetings in private houses; and the impression he made was so strong, that the magistrate became alarmed, and interfered. After a short interruption, he was again heard, and in 1533 he became, with the consent of the magistrate, the regular preacher to the evangelical congregation of St. Margaret. In 1537 he was appointed teacher of classical languages in the school, and in 1542 regular pastor of St. Gall. He wrote a great deal, and, in spite of his modesty, he was, as also that he wrote more than what has come down to us. See KEIM: Reform. d. Reichsstadt Ulm. BERNHARD RIJGENBACH.

KEYS, The Power of the, a symbolical term, which in a more extended sense denotes the whole range of the power of the Church, while in a narrower sense it simply means the power of granting or refusing absolution. In the history of the Church the meaning of the term has undergone a most significant development, and it still forms one of the chief sources of difference between the different parts of Christendom.

I. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. — The expression “the keys of the house of David” (Isa. xxii. 22) refers to the power which the steward of the king exercised in the royal household; and, by a somewhat extended symbolism, the expression “the key of David” (Rev. iii. 7) refers to the power which Christ exercises in his own kingdom, especially with regard to admission and exclusion. When Jesus solemnly gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven to Peter (Matt. xvi. 19), he thereby simply introduced him into the apostolic office, authorizing him to found the Christian Church; and the commission to the apostles in general (John xx. 23) must be understood in the same sense. At all events, there is in the New Testament no trace of an apostle forgiving sins in the same personal, categorical manner as Jesus did it (Matt. ix. 2); and, even if there were, it would still be doubtful whether such a power — by its very nature a personal charisma, and not by any means an attribute of an office — ever was transferred to the later Church.

From this power of the keys, signifying the general apostolic authority, must be distinguished the power to bind and to loose, which Jesus conferred first on Peter (Matt. xvi. 19), and then (Matt. xviii. 18), not only on the other apostles, but on the whole congregation. The expression “to bind and to loose,” which, according to New-Testament usage, requires an impersonal and not a personal object for its completion, means in rabbinical language simply to allow and forbid, to confirm and abolish (LIGHTFOOT: Hora Hebraica in ev. Math., xvi. 19; VITRINGA: De sym. vet., 754; BOEHMER: Diss. jur. eccl., p. 83; RITSCHL: Alltag. Kirche, 2d ed., p. 372); and refers in the above passages of the New Testament exclusively to the social sphere of the life of the Christian Church. The apostolical writings know no other power of forgiving sins as active in the congregation, but the preaching of the gospel (2 Cor. v. 18) and the prayers of the faithful (1 John v. 16; Jas. v. 16); and, when the later Church undertook to rear a different opinion on the basis of 1 Cor. v. 3-5, it erred, as is shown by RITSCtl, l. c., p. 387.

II. AMONG THE FATHERS. — Misconceptions of the power to bind and to loose arose very early. The Clementine Homilies, representing a pseudo-Christian standpoint, already deviate from the original meaning of the two verbs, “to bind” and “to loose,” and correctly supplement them with impersonal objects; but at the same time they extend the sense so as to encompass the whole power of the episcopal office as a continuation of the apostolic office (iii. 72). On the other hand, the Gentile-Christian churches of the second century interpreted the power to bind and to loose as an authority to retain and remit sin, and supplement the two verbs with personal objects. But while this idea of the power of the keys, and the to bind and to loose, making no other distinction between them than that between the more general and the more special expression, the Gentile-Christian churches did not consider the bishop the bearer of this power: it rested with the congregation as a totality.
It is not to be wondered that, however, that some vagueness and confusion should prevail in the ancient Church concerning these ideas. In the further development, Montanism forms an important link. Tertullian teaches that the power to forgive sins belongs to the Church; but, as it belongs to the Church only so far as she is identical with the Holy Spirit, the right to exercise the power belongs exclusively to her truly spiritual members, — the homo spiritualia. In his work De pudicitia he sets forth this idea in opposition to the bishop of Rome, who taught that the power to forgive sins was vested in the whole episcopate (numerus episcoporum). The latter view was then taken up and carried farther by Cyprian. As the bishop, he says, is the heir of the apostolical power, and the seat and organ of the Holy Spirit, — that is, not the whole episcopate, but every single bishop — has the power to forgive sins.
Optatus of Mileve finally formulates the argument in this way: Christ gave the keys to Peter, and it was Peter who then gave them to the other apostles.
In the works of Cyprian, the phrase "to bind and to loose" always means to retain and to permit sin. Excommunication and reconciliation are identical with anathema and absolution, only that the words have not yet that fulness and excitement of meaning which they attained during the middle ages. The atoning power of penance still depends upon the activity of the penitent, rather than upon the activity of the Church. All the Church can do is to prescribe the medicine for the wounds which sin has made; and wound and sin, medicines and penance, physician and priests, are ever recurring similitudes. Nevertheless, the Church is not altogether without some kind of a mediating office. Extra ecciesiam nullus salus ("outside of the Church no salvation"), says Cyprian; and he repeats it with great emphasis. The nature of this office begins to show in the writings of Augustine. The similitudes change. Sin does not make a wound any more: it kills. The sinner is not a sick man who needs to be cured, but a dead man, who needs to be restored to life. The resurrection of Lazarus is woven into the whole argument. This restoration to life the Church, of course, cannot perform; but Augustine asserts (Serm., 99, 9) that it is done through the Church, by means of the Church. In the writings of Leo the Great, finally, the Roman-Catholic idea of the priesthood as a mediating power mediating between God and man, and without whose medication no divine grace can take effect, becomes definitely formed: without the intercession of the priest, sin cannot be forgiven, — ut indulgentia Dei nisi supplicationibus sacerdotum nequeat obtinere (Ep. 108, ad Theod., cap. ii.).

DURING THE MIDDLE AGES, AND IN THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC DOGMATICS. — The primitive Church distinguished between three classes of members, — the faithful, the catechumens, and the penitent. The power of the keys was established chiefly and best in the last three centuries.
Some churches, however, used not only the two keys in the penance service for the whole Church, but also for the local congregation. At last, however, it was clearly recognized that the power turned upon the activity of the Church, even not before partaking of the Lord's Supper. Early in the middle ages, however, and among the newly converted German peoples, a tendency arose to make the absolution, which in the primitive Church was an act of the bishop, into an act of the priest.
This practice was, however, only for special occasions, a general characteristic of the Church, and to establish the power of the keys, which originally dealt with the penitents only, as a general court of judicature above all the faithful. The first germ of that tendency may be discovered in the circumstance, that through the monastic discipline, sins in thought gradually became subject to the power of the keys, which in the primitive Church they were not.
(See Wasserschleben: Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche.) In the monasteries it was considered a rule of discipline to confess to the abbot the slightest occurrence of sinful emotions. The penitential of Vinnian, an Irishman who flourished in the old Briton Church towards the close of the fifth century, prescribes for sins in thought a rigid fast for half a year, and abstinence from wine and meat for a whole year.
The Anglo-Saxon penitential, which bears the name of Theodore of Canterbury, prescribes from twenty to forty days' fast for feeling lust. Coduman (d. 610) brought this whole system to the Continent; and so rapidly did it take root there, that Abbot Othmar of St. Gall (d. 781) sets it forth as a maxim, — no confession, no forgiveness of sin; and Regino of Prûm (d. 915) demands that every member of the congregation shall confess at least once a year. The first provincial synod which makes confession a general duty is that of Aenham, 1109. Innocent III. (1198—1216) finally introduced confession throughout the Church in spite of the opposition which the penitentials produced, especially in France.

With regard to the theological definition of absolution, and the part belonging to the priest in its administration, two different views run almost parallel with each other during the first part of the middle ages. According to the one view represented by Jerome and Gregory the Great, the priest is simply judge in foro ecclesiae:
he declares that forgiveness has taken place, but takes no part himself in the act of forgiving.
The divine forgiveness takes place before the absolution by the priest, even before the confession by the sinner, in the very moment the heart repents. How prominent this view was, even in the twelfth century, may be seen from the manner in which Gratian treats the subject (caus. xxxii.
qu. iii.). He raises the question whether or not a sinner can satisfy God by repentance only, and secret penance without confession; and after the arguments and opinions of both sides, but finally leaves the reader to decide the question for himself. Petrus Lombardus, the contemporary of Gratian, defines (lib. iv. dist. 17) the priest's power to bind and to loose as a power merely of declaration, just as the disciples could not free Lazarus from his bond, but only revivified him. Still more explicit are Cardinal Robert Pulleyn (d. 1150) and Peter of Poitiers, chancellor of the university of Paris (d. about
A true and indispensable mediator between God and the penitent. It found its full development in the De vera et falsa paenitentia, a work belonging to the eleventh or twelfth century, but ascribed to the thirteenth century, especially by Thomas Aquinas. He appears as the representative of God, or as a kind of God himself; and, in his De potestate ligandi et solvendi, Richard of St. Victor explains how God transforms the eternal punishment into a transitory one, and how the priest transforms the transitory punishment into a penance.

These views were dialectically reconciled, and combined with each other, by the great schoolmen of the thirteenth century, especially by Thomas Aquinas. He starts from the propositions on which the first of the above-mentioned views is based, — that it is the priest alone who can forgive sins, and that he does so solely for the sake of the sinner's repentance. But he considerably modifies the bearing of these propositions by adding that no repentance can be full, or fully effective, unless it involves a desire for the sacramental confession and absolution. And he finally reaches the second, the opposite view, by defining the part belonging to the priest in the sacrament of penance in analogy with that belonging to the water in the sacrament of baptism: the priest is the instrumentum animatum, as the water is the instrumentum numinatum. He consequently defends with great ardor the formula, Ego te absolve, etc. (Opusc., xxii.). The view of Thomas was dogmatically fixed, and officially adopted as the doctrine of the Roman-Catholic Church by the Council of Trent in its fourteenth session, Nov. 25, 1551.

IV. DURING THE REFORMATION, AND IN THE PROTESTANT DOGMATICS. — With the Reformation, all those ideas which are covered by the expression, "the power of the keys," entered a new stage of development. From the Roman-Catholic Church, Luther retained confession and absolution, but treated them in the light of the primitive Church. Confession he considered an institution valid throughout Christendom, and the sacramental character of absolution he never entirely abandoned. But, pervaded by the spirit of the Reformation, these ideas assumed new forms and new significations. To Luther, absolution is not a verdict based on the conviction that the sinner has repented and is in a state of grace, but simply a means by which to strengthen his faith, analogous to the sermon, and, indeed, a mode of preaching the gospel. It has no sacramental character whatever. It can be refused to no one; and it can be given by every one, layman or priest, with the only difference, that in the former case it is private, while in the latter it may be public. Only when the sinner places himself in open opposition to God, the Church assumes the office of a judge, and excommunicates him. Thus, to Luther, the form of the character of preaching, jurisdiction, and sacrament.

Calvin refers the power of the keys partly to the preaching of the gospel, partly to the maintenance of church discipline; but he entirely excludes the idea of its being a sacrament. His views may be summed up in the following propositions: (1) There is a double absolution, serving the faith, the other belonging to church discipline; (2) Absolution is by itself nothing else but the promise of forgiveness of sin such as is contained in the Gospels; (3) Absolution is conditional, and its conditions are penance and faith; (4) Whether or not these conditions have been fulfilled, no human being can know; one consequently the certainty of the binding and loosing can never depend upon the verdict of a human court; (5) That absolution, which forms part of church discipline, has nothing to do with secret sins, — it deals only with open scandals; but, in censoring such acts, the Church simply follows the unerring rules of the Scriptures, pronouncing that adulterers, thieves, murderers, and misers have no part in the kingdom of heaven.

It was the views of Calvin which finally conquered the Protestant world. In the Lutheran churches the threefold signification of the power of the keys underwent a number of violent changes. Chemnitz was the first who denied that absolution is a sacrament in the same sense as the word as baptism and the Lord's Supper; but he found many followers. When the fresh and vivid spirit of the Reformation gradually lost its vigor, the private confession and absolution became empty forms, more apt to foster a false self-sufficiency than to strengthen the faith. The church-ban was early taken out of the hands of the clergy, on account of the misuses they made of it; but, in the hands of the consistory, it entirely lost its religious character, and became an appendix to the police-institution. The first powerful attack on the reigning state of affairs was made by the Pietists, but it was renewed by the Rationalists. And when, in the contest, the orthodoxy of the old Lutheran school attempted to represent the power of the keys as a divinely established institution, they not only failed utterly, but had to look on in idleness while the institution was crumbling into pieces. In Protestant theology the power of the keys has been neglected as a merely symbolical expression, and the various ideas comprised by the term have been treated, in dogmatics, under the head of grace and justification; in practical theology, among the preparations to the Lord's Supper; and in canon law, under discipline.

LIT. — STEITZ: D. römische Bussessacrament, Frankfort, 1854, and Privatbeichte, the Church simply

Khan. See inn.

Khlesl, Melchior, b. in Vienna, 1553; d. there Sept. 18, 1610. His parents were Lutherans, and he was educated in the Protestant faith; but in 1569 he embraced Romanism, studied under the Jesuits, and was ordained priest in 1579. His ambition, however, forbade him to enter the order; but he was made administrator of Neustadt 1688, bishop of Vienna 1566, and cardinal in 1616. Though his own faith has been treated in dogmatics, under the head of grace and justification; in practical theology, among the preparations to the Lord's Supper; and in canon law, under discipline.

Lit. — Steitz: D. römische Bussessacrament, Frankfort, 1854, and Privatbeichte, the Church simply Khan. See inn.

KIDRON. 1244

Matthias, the crown. Under Matthias he was president of the privy council; but under Ferdinand he was imprisoned, 1618, and not released until 1627, through the intervention of the Pope. See HAMMER-PURGSTALL: Leben des Cardinal K., Vienna, 1847-51, 4 vols.

KIEF, one of the oldest cities of Russia, stands on the western bank of the Dnieper, and contains about sixty thousand inhabitants. It was the cradle of the Russian Church. In 988 Vladimir, who had recently been baptized himself, and espoused a Byzantine princess, ordered the whole population of the city—men and women, young and old—to descend into the Dnieper, while some Byzantine priests, standing on the cliffs of the bank, read aloud the baptismal formula. Thus the city was Christianized. A metropolitan see was founded there, and it was the seat of two presidents of the privy council; but under Ferdi

KIEL, Alexander, founder of the "New Connection of Wesleyan Methodists," frequently called the "Kilhamites;" b. at Epworth, Eng., July 10, 1732; d. in 1798. In 1753 he was admitted by Wesley into the regular itinerant ministry; rose to prominence; was, even before Wesley's death, an outspoken advocate of separation of the Methodists from the Church of England. After Wesley's death he was expelled from the London Conference (1790). This action resulted in the formation of the "New Connection of Wesleyan Methodists." See METHODISM IN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

KILIAN, St. Rabanus Maurus (from the middle of the ninth century) tells us, in his Martyrologium, that Kilian and his companions, Coloman and Totnan, all natives of Hesse, came to Franconia in the middle of the seventh century, preached Christianity in the country, more especially in Wurzburg, and were put to death by an unjust judge of the name Gozbert. Notker Balbulus of St. Gall (from the end of the ninth century) knows much more of Kilian, and tells us, in his Martyrologium, that Kilian was the first bishop of Wurzburg, and preached on a license from the Pope; that Gozbert was Duke of Franconia, and was by Kilian compelled to divorce his wife Geila, because she was the widow of his brother; that Geila, from revenge, had Kilian and his companions assassinated, but afterwards became insane; that heavy punishments for the murder of the saint were inflicted upon all his descendants of Gozbert, etc. In the biographies of the tenth and eleventh centuries the legend develops still further, until it finally loses all historical elements in the legends. See CANISIUS: Lexikon für die Deutsche Geschichte II, 4, 303 sq.; EINHOLD: Die kirchliche Geschichte Deutschlands, Gottingen, 1846, ii. 303 sqq.; ALDBRECHT VOGEL: Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, Göttingen, 1846, ii. 303 sqq.

KIMCHI (or KIMHI) is the name of a Jewish family which flourished at Narbonne, Southern France, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and produced several learned rabbis. The most celebrated member of the family was David Kimchi, b. in 1160; d. about 1240. Of his personal life nothing is known; but it must once have enjoyed a great reputation among his co-religionists, as he was chosen arbiter in the controversy which the doctrines of Maimonides caused between the Spanish and the French Jews. He was a prolific writer; and his principal works are, a Commentary on the Psalms (first printed in 1777, at Bologna, and translated into Latin by Janvier, Constance, 1544), a Hebrew grammar (generally called Miklute, perfection, edited, with notes, by Elias Levi, Venice, 1545, and by M. Hechim, Furth, 1793, and translated into Latin by Guidoetti, Paris, 1549), and a Hebrew dictionary, The Book of Roots, Naples, 1493, edited

KIMCHI or KIMHI is the name of a Jewish family which flourished at Narbonne, Southern France, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and produced several learned rabbis. The most celebrated member of the family was David Kimchi, b. in 1160; d. about 1240. Of his personal life nothing is known; but it must once have enjoyed a great reputation among his co-religionists, as he was chosen arbiter in the controversy which the doctrines of Maimonides caused between the Spanish and the French Jews. He was a prolific writer; and his principal works are, a Commentary on the Psalms (first printed in 1777, at Bologna, and translated into Latin by Janvier, Constance, 1544), a Hebrew grammar (generally called Miklute, perfection, edited, with notes, by Elias Levi, Venice, 1545, and by M. Hechim, Furth, 1793, and translated into Latin by Guidoetti, Paris, 1549), and a Hebrew dictionary, The Book of Roots, Naples, 1493, edited by Elias Levi (Venice, 1540) and Bissenthal and Lebrecht (Berlin, 1847), and translated into Latin in 1535. The Hebrew Grammar of F. E. König (1st part, Leipzig, 1881) is professedly based upon Kimchi; and all Hebrew grammarians have drawn more or less from him. For six hundred and fifty years he has been the acknowledged greatest Jewish grammarian, lexicographer, and biblical commentator. Besides the Commentary on the Psalms mentioned above, he wrote upon Genesis and all the prophets. His work upon Zechariah was translated by McCaul, London, 1837. See art. Kimhi, in Encyclopedia Britannica, 9th ed., vol. xiv.

KING, John, D.D., b. at Wornall, Buckinghamshire, about 1559; d. in London, March 30, 1621. He was graduated at Oxford, and was successively chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, archdeacon of Nottingham (1580), dean of Christ Church (1586), and bishop of London (1811). James I. called him the “king of preachers; others, “the bishop with the royal name.” His fame rests upon his Lectures upon Jonas, delivered at York, 1594, Oxford; 1597, 5th ed., 1618; reprinted in Nichol's Series of Puritan Commentaries, London, 1864. It was in its day the book upon which Job. There are forty-eight lectures in all.

KING, Jonas, D.D., b. at Hawley, Mass., July 29, 1792; d. at Athens, Greece, May 22, 1869. He was graduated at Williams College, 1816, and at Andover Seminary, 1819; entered the Congregational ministry; labored as missionary in Syria (1823—26), and in Greece from July, 1826, to his death. He published there several volumes of translations, and original works in modern Greek. His work in Athens was at all times disliked by the ecclesiastical authorities; and in 1844 efforts were made to induce him to leave. He was brought into controversy, in one of the principal newspapers, upon the subject of Mariolatry, and published a book upon it, made up principally of extracts from Greek saints who taught as Dr. King did. In 1845 this book was condemned by the Greek synod; “every orthodox Christian” was prohibited from reading it; and Dr. King's views and principles were anathematized in the Oriental Church. The request was granted. The case was carried up to the Areopagus. But at last Dr. King was cited to appear at Syra on a criminal charge; but the trial was postponed, and he returned to Athens, and, under the protection of the British and American representatives, he resumed his work. In the spring of 1850 he was again prosecuted for proselytizing, but his work was not seriously affected until 1851. On Sept. 7 of that year he was informed that the Council of Judges in the Criminal Court of Athens had directed him to be tried for preaching, in his own lands, his principles, and opinions contrary to the basis of the religion of the Oriental Church.” Appeal was taken to the Areopagus, which decided that the penal law forbidding the expression of sentiments and opinions contrary to the basis of religion and morals did not apply to the case of Dr. King. The trial began March 5, 1852, and lasted six hours. He was condemned on the very count which the Areopagus had declared had no bearing upon his case, sentenced to imprisonment for fifteen days in the city prison, to pay the expenses of the trial, and then to banishment from the kingdom. On the 9th of March he went to the prison in Athens, a vile place; so that he was glad to be removed the next day to the police-office, where he was kindly treated. On March 13 he fell ill, and was taken home, where he was guarded. The Areopagus decided adversely to him, but reduced his imprisonment to fourteen days and to banishment. But he was, in reality, imprisoned only the one day mentioned above; and the latter part of the sentence was never executed; indeed, in 1854 he was officially informed that it had been revoked. As might have been expected, the case excited great interest, and the Protestant world demanded his protection. He was never free from petty persecution; was anathematized in 1863 by the Holy Synod of Athens; but his liberty was not taken away. See the reports of the American Board for the years cited; also the Missionary Herald, June, 1852, for the trial.

KING, Thomas Starr, a Unitarian clergyman, son of a Universalist clergyman; b. in New-York City, Dec. 17, 1824; d. in San Francisco, Cal., March 4, 1864. His education was desultory, but he made the most of his advantages, and acquired a knowledge of many literatures. When fifteen, his father's death compelled his earning his own living, and he was in business for some six years. But the call to preach was his, and in 1845 he began his life-work. In 1846 he settled in Charlestown, over a Universalist Church; from 1848 to 1860, in Boston, over the Hollis-street Unitarian Church; from 1860 to his death, in San Francisco, in the same denomination. By his eloquence and energy he did more than any other man to save the State of California to the Union; for in the early days of the civil war there seemed to be some danger that it would secede. He also was the prime mover in the branch of the United States Sanitary Commission organized there. His reputation was national, for his popularity as a lecturer had carried him everywhere. Personally he was most lovable: intellectually he was one of the most brilliant speakers America has produced. One peculiarity in his preparation for the pulpit was, that he dictated his discourses to an amanuensis as he walked up and down his room. He published only one book, The White Hills, their legends, landscape, and poetry (Boston, 1851); but there have been several collections of his lectures and sermons published in Boston since his death: Patriotism, and other papers (1864), Christianity and Humanity (sermons) (1877), Substance and Show, and other lectures (1878). See A Tribute to Thomas Starr King, by Richard Frothingham, Boston, 1864; and the Memoir, by E. P. Whipple, prefixed to Christianity and Humanity, pp. vii—lxxx.

KING, William, Archbishop of Dublin; b. in Antrim, May 1, 1850; d. at Dublin, May 8, 1729. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, 1677—73; ordained, 1674; became dean of St. Patrick's, 1688, as a reward for his staunch Protestantism; which very fact led to his dual imprisonment that same year, in Dublin Castle, by James II. In 1691 he was made Bishop of Derry, and in 1702 Archbishop of Dublin. He was a profound metaphysicist and theologian. He wrote The State of the Prot-
KINGDOM OF GOD.

KINGDOM OF GOD. The idea of the kingdom of God is the central idea of the whole dispensation of revelation. The kingdom of God is the end and motive of all divine revelations and institutions of the old and new covenants; yes, of the creation and promise from the beginning. The general foundation of this idea is the all-inclusive power and dominion of God (1 Chron. xxii. 11; Ps. civ. 10; Dan. iv. 34). But the main aim and centre of revelation is the moral kingdom of God, which is called the kingdom of grace, and, with reference to its consummation, the kingdom of glory. This kingdom (Eph. i. 10) includes the heavenly angels, who do God's will (Ps. civ. 20), and mankind. The latter come especially under the cognizance of the Scriptures. At the fall, man defaced the divine image, became disobedient to the divine will, and passed outside of the kingdom of God. His restoration begins with self-humiliation. In Paganism the light of God in man became more and more darkened, and the faith which gives God all the glory, more and more indestructible. God chose to establish his kingdom by the separation of a peculiar nation, and of an individual (Gen. ix. 26), who should become the recipient of a promise for all nations. God revealed himself as the one, who, in human impotency, can do all that he wills. Weak, and nothing in themselves, but strong and mighty in God, such is the progressive experience of the people of God, from the patriarchs down. This people was chosen to be God's kingdom, his property above all the peoples of the earth,—a kingdom of priests (Exod. xix. 6). On account of its sinful incompetency, it was only the servant, but the representative of God, which, however, was to some extent realized in believing individuals, pious kings, and prophets. The idea of this kingdom came out more fully in Jacob's prophecy of the prince out of Judah. It became more distinct in David's prophecy of the everlasting kingdom, and of a king of righteousness and peace (Ps. xxii., lxvii., ex.). In Daniel the eternity of this kingdom, and its superiority over the kingdoms of the world, are strongly brought out.

To this kingdom of promise and prophecy the people of Israel looked forward with ardent longing. In contrast with the pomp and ostentation of the world, its beginning was inconspicuous. The promised One came into the world in circumstances of poverty. He, the eternal Son, to whom the kingdom belongs, because all things are made by him and consist by him, desired to come into the actual possession in God, by the complete emptying of his Godhead in order that he might abide for man's original guilt through his own self-dominion. Seeking nothing but God's glory, manifesting and imparting absolute love, taking upon his own pure consciousness the guilty feeling of the race, and bearing its due and severe punishment in patience, he has been elevated above all things with supreme power in heaven and on earth (Phil. ii. 5 sqq.; Matt. xvi. 18). His sacrifice of love was the basis of the new covenant, or kingdom of God, in which the redeemed submit to the divine will, as did the Redeemer himself. The kingdom is righteousness, peace, and joy (Rom. xiv. 17).

In an earlier period this kingdom was identified with the Church. The Roman Catholics regarded it as the visible Church, ruled by a visible representative of Christ (the Pope). The Protestants, looking upon its ideal side, regarded it as the Christian institution of salvation. But the more recent theology has given to the idea a broader significance; namely, that it designates redeemed humanity with its divinely revealed destiny manifesting itself in a religious communion or the Church, a social communion or the State, and an aesthetic communion, expressing itself in forms of knowledge and art.

According to Scripture, the kingdom of God in its real and ultimate constitution does not belong to the present age, is not the result of a simple, natural, process of cosmic development. It is a kingdom from heaven, manifesting itself in a world of sin,—a fountain of life gushing out into the desolation of death; and its object is to shape human life according to the divine image in Christ. It develops itself in conflict with a false kingdom and religion, whose head is the prince of this world. Before Christianity or Christ finally overcomes the false and opposing elements, a consummation of the kingdom of God cannot be said to have taken place. This will happen in consequence of a great crisis,—the destruction of the false church, the anti-Christian power of this world. Then a kingdom of righteousness and peace shall be established, all the powers of darkness being dispelled, and Satan bound; and the millennial kingdom (see MILLENNIUM) will begin, which is only the prelude of the absolute consummation of the kingdom of God, when God shall be all in all (1 Cor. xv. 28).

Everywhere the Scripture points to the kingdom of God as a thing of the future (Dan. vii. 27; Matt. xix. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 9; Gal. v. 21; 2 Thess. i. 5; Rev. xx. sqq.). The kingdom of God is already here (Luke xi. 20, xvi. 21), and is in a process of evolution or development, as some of the parables of Matt. xiii. teach. In the Old Testament we have merely the shadow of this kingdom, a preparative economy. In the New Testament it is embodied, in its very essence, in the divine-human king, who shows perfect subjection to the divine will, and establishes the kingdom amongst men, first by his redeeming activity, and then by the establishment of the kingdom in the church. Jesus is the embodiment of the kingdom of God, the ideal of human life; and religion, state, and culture must be governed by his law. It is the task of this evangelical period of Christianity to restore the right relation between the Church on the one hand, and the State on the other, and to establish the freedom of the Church and the primacy of religion as a moral force with the right to control the life of the State and the department of culture, as well as individual conduct. The complete con-
KINGLY OFFICE OF CHRIST.

KINGDOM OF GOD. The kingdom of God can only be realized here in part, and presupposes the emancipation of the Church from all admixture with the spirit of the world. Then it will appear in its power and glory. Its consummation belongs to the hereafter, and will be the product of the life-giving energy concentrated in the divine-human person of Christ, who, in the midst of the natural development of this world, is separating for himself a distinct kingdom of God, and, after his decisive victory over the satanic power which is concentrated in anti-Christ and his kingdom, will establish it in its visible and complete perfection. [Maurice: The Kingdom of Christ, London, 1838; Hengstenberg: History of the Kingdom of God under the Old Testament, Edinburgh, 1872; 2 vols.; H. Brockmann: Geschichte und Lehre d. Reichs Gottes, 2d ed., Hanover, 1877.]

KINGLY OFFICE OF CHRIST. See Jesus Christ, Three Offices of.

KINGO, Thomas, b. at Slaugerup, in the Island of Sealand, 1844; d. at Odense, in the Island of Funen, 1703; studied theology in Copenhagen, 1877. Klings.}

KINGS OF ISRAEL. The Israelites had theocracy; i.e., God was the real ruler. The king was only God's vicegerent (1 Sam. x. 1; Judges viii. 23), and from God proceeded all authority (Isa. xxxiii. 22). As this idea was conceived by the Israelites, it was limited to the chosen people. God was present in it as an all-sufficing sense, the king of the whole world; he would only become so when he came in his final kingdom: and the nations of the Gentiles bowed to him as the God of Israel (Exod. xv. 18; Ps. x. 16, lxxix. 19, xcli., xcvii., xcli.; Isa. xxiv. 23, xliii. 13; Obad., 21; Zech. xiv. 9). The Mosaic legislation did not provide for any one central earthly organ for the divine authority: still it plainly declared the eventual rise of a king, and therefore laid down rules for the contingency (Deut. xvii. 14-20). Some critics have pronounced this section a composition of Samuel's; but the mention of horses and of a possible return to Egypt in verse 16 is a weighty argument against the opinion.

The rise of the Israelitish kingdom is related in 1 Sam. viii. The reason given was a desire to be like the nations round, but the occasion of the vigorous expression of the wish was the unfitness of Samuel's sons to rule. Once before in the history of Israel had there been a "king;" for Abimelech, the son of Gideon by a concubine, was proclaimed king by the Shechemites, and ruled for three years; but his power was local. The way in which the elders asked for a king was really his abhorrence of theocratic idea, and so the Lord regarded it (1 Sam. viii. 7). Notwithstanding, the Lord told Samuel to heed the request. To show the utter independence of the divine action, the king chosen (Saul) by the Lord was a member of the least family of the least tribe (Benjamin); and his meeting with Samuel was unexpected (ix. x.). The consecration was by solemn anointing (x. 1). Since anointing is only spoken of in the cases of David, Absalom, Solomon, Joash, and Jehoahaz of Judah, and only of Jehu of the northern kingdom, the rabbins maintained that it was not employed, except upon the foundation of a new dynasty, or when there was some exceptional circumstance attending the succession. [This conclusion is poorly supported. It is far more probable that anointing, both in Judah and Israel, was invariable, and only the mention of it occasional.] The oil used on these occasions was "holy oil" (1 Kings i. 39), and it was poured by the high priest. It made its recipient "Jehovah's anointed," and this was the ordinary designation of the theocratic king (Ps. xx. 6, xxviii. 8, etc.). The anointing was the symbol, partly of the divine consecration, and partly of the divine equality, for the one anointed, through gifts and graces. After it, the person of the king was sacred; and it was sacrilegious to kill him, even at his own request (1 Sam. xxiv. 6, 10, xxxv. 9, 16; 2 Sam. 1. 14). Among the other ceremonies connected with an anointing was the coronation with the crown-diadem, in sign of kingly dignity (2 Kings x. 12). This diadem was worn by the king as part of his uniform (2 Sam. 1. 10). In the case of Saul some little time elapsed between his consecration and his establishment over the kingdom. The latter was the direct act of Samuel, who assembled the people at Mizpeh, showed them the chosen king, and then told them the "manner of the kingdom, and then wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord" (1 Sam. x. 29). This writing was not, however, a constitution in the modern sense, but a covenant between king and people. Like David's (2 Sam. v. 2, 3), and such as Jehoiada subsequently composed in the case of Joash (2 Kings xi. 17). That this covenant should not become a dead letter, but really check the action of the king, was the care of the prophets. The idea of theocracy was nearest realized in the reigns of David and Solomon.

The theocratic king was declared to be the "son of God," the first-born among all the kings of the earth (2 Sam. vii. 14; Ps. lxxix. 27, 28; cf. ii. 7). Since his divine sonship and election were correlative terms, there was, on God's part, an expression of the tenderest love for the king as the prince of the chosen people. And, because the king stood in this relation, his glory was a reflection of the divine; his judgship, also, was a divine act: he was, in short, the earthly representative of the heavenly king, and sat upon the throne of Jehovah (1 Chron. xxix. 23). David's psalms sufficiently show how thoroughly he entered into the theocratic idea (cf. Ps. xxiv. 7-10, xlvi. 2, xx. 8, cx. 2). The theocratic kingdom was to last forever (2 Sam. vii. 10). The kingship, under David and Solomon, took on a priestly character, for the king prayed in the name of the people (1 Kings viii.); yet there was no infringement of priestly rights and privileges, for KINGS OF ISRAEL.

Kings of Israel.

No king of Judah offered sacrifices by his own hand. Notwithstanding all this, the government had a popular character. There was no worship of the king, as among other Oriental peoples: on the contrary, he was directly and at any time accessible, administered justice personally, and moved freely among the people. (Compare the life of an Egyptian king, bound by etiquette.) Like Orientals, however, the king had his harem, and it fell to his successor as part of his possessions; so that taking it was equivalent to succession, and a request for any member of it treasonable: hence Ahithophel's advice (2 Sam. xvi. 21; cf. also 2 Sam. xii. 8, xii. 7; 1 Kings ii. 17 sqq.). The succession was usually given to the first-born son (2 Chron. xxi. 3), yet there were exceptions, as Jehoahaz (2 Kings xxiii. 30). During a minority, the kingdom was under a regent (2 Kings xii. 2). As a rule, the mother of the king (the queen-mother) exercised considerable authority, and her name is always given in the official record of an accession (1 Kings xiv. 21, xv. 2, etc.). The king bowed himself unto her (1 Kings ii. 10), while the king's wives bowed themselves to him (1 Kings i. 16).

The disruption destroyed the theocratic government, as far as the northern kingdom was concerned, but it was continued respecting the house of David; and it was to the restoration of the splendor of the Davidic kingdom that the prophets looked (cf. Hos. iii. 5). The Herodian dynasty was a mere caricature.

The court officers under David (2 Sam. viii. 16—18), not counting the princes (1 Kings iv. 2), who were also the king's councillors, were as follows: (1) The general of the army; (2) The captain of the Cherethites and Pelethites, the king's body-guard; (3) The chancellor, who was

KINGS OF ISRAEL AND JUDAH.

Showing their order, relative length of reigns, contemporary kings of Judah and Israel after the division, etc.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>KINGS OF ISRAEL BEFORE THE DIVISION</th>
<th>R.C.</th>
<th>OTHER KINGDOMS</th>
<th>KINGS OF JUDAH AND ISRAEL AFTER THE DIVISION</th>
<th>R.C.</th>
<th>OTHER KINGDOMS</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Saul 40 years.</td>
<td>1006</td>
<td></td>
<td>Uzziah 52.</td>
<td>52</td>
<td>Pol of Nineveh</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>David 40.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Anarchy 11. [Anarchy.] 52.</td>
<td>52</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solomon 40.</td>
<td>1000</td>
<td></td>
<td>Shishak of Egypt 29.</td>
<td>791</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kingdom divided 975 B.C.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Judah</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nebuchadnezzar II. 11.</td>
<td>1100</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jehoahaz 25.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jehoiakim 12.</td>
<td>1600</td>
<td>Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon 11.</td>
<td>600</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jehoiachin 8.</td>
<td>1608</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zedekiah 11.</td>
<td>800</td>
<td>Babylonian captivity. End of kingdom of Judah.</td>
<td>600</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Diagram of the Kings.—The design of the foregoing table of the kings of Israel and Judah is to represent the order in which they reigned, and the dates and relative duration of their reigns. The period of Jewish history covered by the table is from B.C. 1096 to B.C. 586, or about 500 years. Where the reigns were very short (one month or six months), it was necessary to make the "steps" representing their reigns somewhat out of the exact proportion. Frequently parts of years are counted in round numbers, as if full years. For example, Nadab's reign is given as "2 years" though it was not proper to regard them. This will explain several of the figures given. Jehoahaz associated Jehoram with him during the last two years of his reign; so Jehoahaz's "25 years" and Jehoram's "6 years" overlap each other.

Reprinted (by permission of the Am. S. B. Union) from Schaff's Bible Dictionary.
not simply the chronicler [as the authorized version, 2 Sam. viii. 16, see margin], but president of the council, and first minister of the crown; (4) the "officer," i.e., who had charge of the levies; (6) priests; (7) courtiers. To these Solomon (1 Kings iv. 5, 6) added; (8) the officer over the twelve officers who in turn for a month provided victuals for the king and his household; (9) the officer over the household. In addition, there were the usual subordinate court servants. "Eunuchs" appear first to have been employed in the northern kingdom (1 Kings xxv. 9 marg.), but later in Judah (2 Kings xxii. 11 marg.). By the term, perhaps often only an office is meant.

The royal revenue seems at first to have been derived from the spoils of war (2 Sam. viii. 11 sqq., xii. 30), and from presents more or less voluntary (1 Sam. x. 37, xvi. 20, etc.), not only by his subjects, but by strangers; and these, in the case of Solomon, amounted to a good deal, and were regularly given (1 Kings x. 25). The king also had private property (cf. 1 Chron. xxvii. 25-31). He also exerted the right to levy a tribute of bond-service, not only from the remnant of the conquered peoples (1 Kings ix. 20, 21), but also from the Israelites (1 Kings v. 13, xii. 4), and on two occasions collected a sort of tax from the men of wealth in order to buy off an invader (1 Par. xxv. 20; Pharaoh-neco, xxvii. 35).

Oehler (von Orelli.)

KINGS. First and Second Book of. The two books were originally one. The separation was first made by the LXX. (followed by the Vulgate, and so in modern versions), which joined them with First and Second Samuel under the general caption Kings; so that the four together constituted four books of Kings Daniel Bomberg transferred this nomenclature into our Hebrew Bibles.

Our Kings may be divided into three parts:

1. The history of Solomon (1 Kings i.-ix.), with the subdivisions; (i) his ascent of the throne; (ii.) his reign (i. 1-ix. 9), under which come (a) his marriage, prayer, and judicial wisdom (iii.), (b) his court and officers, might splendor, and wisdom (iv.-v. 16), (c) his building operations with help of Hiram, king of Tyre, and consecration of the temple (v. 17-ix. 9); (d) his foreign affairs, great reputation and revenue, his degeneracy through polygamy and idolatry, its consequences, and his death (ix. 10-xi. 43).

2. The synchronous history of the divided kingdoms of Israel and Judah (1 Kings xii. 1-2 Kings xxiv. 41), with the subdivisions; (a) the history of the separation, and the hostile position of the kingdoms until Ahab's reign (xii. 1-xxvi. 28); (b) the history of the Ahab, the sub-division of the two royal houses, to the slaying of Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah by Jehu (xvi. 29-2 Kings x. 30); (c) the history of the historical overthow of Israel (xi. 1-xxvii. 41). The ascription to Jeremiah of the book of the kings after Solomon, it refers to the "book of the acts of Solomon," xi. 41; for that of the kings after Solomon, it refers fourteen times to the "book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah," and seventeen times to a similar "book" for Israel. Such references are lacking only in the cases of Ahaziah, Amaziah, and Jehoahaz of the southern, and in that of Jehoram of the northern kingdom. The books were doubtless official records. Of a quite different character was the "commentary of the book of the kings," referred to in 2 Chron. xxiv. 27. The histories of Elijah and Elisha rest upon an independent, prophetic, Ephraimitish source.

The age and authorship of the Book of Kings cannot be exactly determined. While throughout the book the kingdom of Judah and the temple are spoken of as standing (to which period, and not to the exile, the recurrent formula, "unto this day," refers), the closing verses (2 Kings xxv. 27-30) set us in the middle of the exile; and so, while the book as a whole was written before the exile, it was revised and brought down to date by some one of the exiles. The Talmud ascribes the book to Jeremiah (Baba batra 19b), and surely the verbal and mental relationship between it and his writings is striking (2 Kings xxiv. 18-xxv. 30, and Jer. lii. are almost word for word identical); but the first arises from their being written at the same time, and from the familiarity of the author of Kings with Jeremiah's writings; while the second relationship merely shows the dependence of one upon the other, not their common origin. All that can be said upon the matter is, that the Book of the Kings was substantially written in the days of Jeremiah, and the redaction took place after B.C. 561, and before B.C. 536, the close of the exile.

The historicity of the book is universally recognized. The acknowledged difficulties in chronology result from textual errors and corruptions.

Ltr.—Modern commentators are Klein (Manchester), 1845; new ed., Leipzig, 1849; new ed. (Leipzig, 1849; 2d ed., 1873). Bahr (Bielefeld, KING'S EVIL.

1250

KINGSLEY.

1868 [trans. in the Lange series, N.Y., 1872, Rawlinson (in Speaker's Commentary, Lond., 1878), Hammond (in Pulpit Commentary, 1882), Barlow (in Preacher's Commentary, 1885). VOLOCK.

KING'S EVIL, as scrofula was called, from the belief, which prevailed for many centuries in France and England, that scrofula could be cured by touch of the King, and the miracle being "part of the religion attached to the person of the king." In the English Prayer-Book down to 1719, there was a special service (part of the Liturgy) to give due solemnity to the act. (See Hook's Church Dictionary.) Edward the Confessor (1042-66) was the first English sovereign, and Anne (1702-14) the last, to "touch" for the disease. It is said that the famous Dr. Samuel Johnson was the last child "touched." Charles II. (1660-84) "touched" more persons than any other monarch, averaging four thousand a year. Prince Charles Edward, the Young Pretender, reputedly projected by "touching" at Holyrood Palace. Among the French kings who practised the art may be mention Louis XI. (1461-83) in 1460, Charles VIII. (1483-98) at Rome and Naples in 1495, Francis I. (1515-47) in 1527, and Louis XVI. (1774-93) at Reims in 1775.

KINGSLEY, Calvin, D.D., LL.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Annsville, Oneida County, N.Y., Sept. 8, 1812; d. at Beirut, Syria, April 6, 1870. After graduation at Alleghany College, Meadville, Penn. (1841), he entered its faculty as professor of mathematics, and, with the exception of two years of pastoral labor, continued in it until 1856, when he was elected editor of the Western Christian Advocate. In 1864 he was elected a bishop; in May, 1869, started upon an episcopal tour around the world, visited the conferences on the Pacific coast, those at Foochow, China, at Bareilly, India, and was passing through Syria when he died. Besides controversial works, he published Resurrection of the Human Body, Cincinnati, 1845; Round the World, Cincinnati, 1870, 2 vols.

KINGSLEY, Charles, b. at Holne Vicarage, Devonport, Eng., June 12, 1819; d. at Eversley, Jan. 23, 1875. He entered Magdalen College, Cambridge, in 1840, where he distinguished himself as a classical and mathematical student. Eversley in Hampshire was his first and last charge; originally as curate, finally as rector. It was a spot which above all others he loved, and in the providence of God its rustic beauty bound the two ends of his life together. He no sooner began to preach than he began to publish; and his village sermons, which at once made a mark on English homiletic literature, appeared in 1844. Poet as well as preacher, he wrote, four years afterwards, The Saint's Tale, or The Story of Elizabeth of Hungary, in which, with a keen appreciation of medieval life and sentiment, he brought out the idea of true wedded love in its simple purity, contrasted with the falsities of a superstitious asceticism. His own wedded life furnished one of the most charming instances of the kind on record. Not, however, in practical sentiment, nor in domestic felicity, did he allow his time to be absorbed; but looking on the state of society in England, especially amongst men of the working-class, he steadfastly set before himself the task of a social reformer, in company with his friend Mr. Maurice, and other like-minded persons. He laid a foundation for manifold improvements in the condition of working-men, intellectually, morally, and religiously: classes for mental instruction, and unions for pecuniary benefit, sprung out of his efforts at a period when such efforts were but the power to work the condition of people in London workshops and in rural districts, and, after revolving in his mind the problem of their elevation, wrought out his ideas on the subject by composing two memorable works of fiction, Alton Locke, Tailor and Poet, published in 1849, and Yeast, a Problem, published in 1851. Letters on university reform speedily followed, with Lectures on Agriculture, and at the same time he found himself involved in a controversy on social doctrines, occasioned by the novels he had written, especially the last. Hypatia, or New Foes with an Old Face, appeared in 1853, in which he drew the liveliest picture ever seen of the social condition of Alexandria in the fourth century, as Greek philosophy and Gothic Paganism came into conflict with the advancement of Christianity, already deteriorated by asceticism and superstition. In all those works, under a clothing of fiction he sought to exhibit lessons of the greatest importance in their bearing on his own age, and the evils which surrounded him in Church and State. With this work may be coupled Alexandria and her Schools; and within the historical class of his productions we must not overlook his lectures on The Roman and the Teuton; but it is only just to say that his philosophy and his imagination too much influenced his reading of facts. He was fond of North Devon, and pitched his tent there for a time, and, amidst the inspiring scenes and traditions of the neighborhood, sat down to write Westminster Hall painting in vivid colors the adventures of the grand old sea-kings of Elizabeth's times, when they made their daring expeditions to the New World. This book, issued in 1856, touched a chord in English hearts which has never ceased to vibrate; and men and women, boys and girls, found in it still find enchantments in these brilliant pages. The same year saw his Heroes, or Greek Fairy Tales, relating the story of the Golden Fleece and other classical legends with exquisite simplicity and skill. The Water Babies, a wild fairy-tale, full of incredible dreams; Glauces, or the Wonders of the Seashore, Hereward the Wake, last of the English, Prose Epics, New and Old,—these are all full of imagination, wrought around facts in nature and facts in history. Kingsley had a keen eye for scientific inquiry, as well as a poet's taste for beauty everywhere; or, to use the language of his loving friend Dean Stanley, "that listening ear, like that of the hero in the fairy-tale, seem[ed] almost to catch the growing of the ass, and the opening of the shell." He published a number of sermons, The Good News of God, Sermons for the Times, Discipline, The Water of Life, and All Saints' Day; and though he was at home in poetry and fiction, he found a more desired home in the Christian pulpit, and when the work of a Hebrew prophet, he rebuked the sins of the nation, and called on high and low to live lives of righteousness in the fear and love of God and Christ. He was much more of a practical than a KIPPIS, Andrew, D.D., F.R.S., F.A.S.; b. at Nottingham, March 28, 1725; d. in London, Oct.
8, 1795. He was educated for the Presbyterian ministry by Dr. Doddridge, but from 1758 was a Unitarian pastor in London, and teacher in Unitarian theological institutions. His reputation rests upon his editorial work, upon five volumes of a revised edition of the Biographia Britanni-ca, London, 1778-93 (down to “Fastolf”): a part of vol. vi. — Festley-Foster — was printed; but Dibdin says only two copies of this part are known), upon the Works of Dr. Nathaniel Larder (London, 1788, 11 vols.; last edition in 1827, 10 vols.), and upon the Lectures of Dr. Philip Doddridge. He also wrote Lives of Lardner, Copyright (1798), and others.
KIR, mentioned 2 Chron. ii. 9; Amos. i. 5, ix.
7) as the place whence the Syrians came before they settled in the regions north of Palestine, and to which Tiglath-pileser sent the prisoners after the conquest of Damascus. It has not yet been possible to identify the place.
KIRCHENLAG (church diet) is the German name of a periodical convention of delegates from the various evangelical churches of Germany,— the Lutheran Church, the Reformed, the United, and the Moravian (Unitas Fratrum), — on the basis of the common evangelical principle of their confessions, and for the purpose of establishing a common organization of their denominations. The conventions took their beginning in 1848. It was quite natural that the passionate demand for political unity which at that moment swayed most men’s minds in Germany should call forth the idea of ecclesiastical unity. Moreover, in 1848, the abdication of the Emperor by the Emperor to dissolve its old connection with the Church, and leave her to take care of her own organization; not to speak of the danger which threatened the Church from the peculiar coloring of infidelity with which the political movement was tainted.
In April 1848, Kirschhofer was appointed a law in the university of Bonn, published a Vorsc schlag einer evangelischen Kirchenversammlung im laufenden Jahre 1848, proposing that representative men of the various evangelical churches in Germany should meet together, and discuss the situation. In May, same year, at the annual conference of Sandhof, near Frankfort, the idea obtained a more definite form by the efforts of Philipp Wackernagel of Wiesbaden. A committee was appointed, and charged with inviting representative men of the various evangelical denominations to meet at Sandhof, June 21, and discuss the question how the various evangelical State churches could be organized into one common confession church. Eighty-eight men were present, among whom were Bethmann-Hollwe der Dorner from Bonn, Ullmann and Hundesha-gen from Heidelberg, Zimmermann and Palmer from Darmstadt; and the first Kirchentag was convened at Wittenberg, Sept. 21, 1848. More than five hundred delegates met, and the assembly agreed, (1) That the evangelical church commu-nicities of Germany should form a unity; (2) That the unity should not have the form of a union, abolishing the differences of confession, but only the form of a confederacy; (3) That the confederacy based on the common evangelical principle of the confessions, should leave to each Church to arrange its relations to the State, its constitution, its ritual, and doctrinal system, as it pleased; while
(4) The confederacy as such should represent the unity, bear witness against the non-evangelical churches, administer advice and support, defend the rights and liberties which belong to every ecumenical church, etc. The confederacy was never established, and no Kirchentag has been convened since 1871. Nevertheless, the movement exercised a great and beneficial influence, both spiritual and material. From it sprang the Kongress für innere Mission, which holds its annual meetings at various places in Germany, and has greatly extended its activity during the last ten years. Its leading genius was Dr. Wichern till his death (1881). See the transactions of the several sessions of the Kirchentag at Wittenberg, Berlin, Stuttgart, etc., published by Hertz, Berlin.
WILHELM BAUR.
KIRCHER, Athanasius, b. at Geysa, near Ful-da, 1601; d. in Rome, 1680; was one of the most learned and most prolific writers of his time. In 1618 he entered the order of the Jesuits, and taught mathematics at Würzburg (whence he was expelled by the Swedes), and afterwards in Rome.
Among his works, most of which treat mathematcal and physical subjects, are Ars magna lucis et umbrae, Mundus subterraneus, Arca Noé, Turris Babel, etc. He founded the first museum of natural history (in Rome). His autobiography and letters were edited by Lougenmahtel, Augsburg, 1864.
KIRCHHOFER, Melchior, b. Jan. 3, 1775, at Schaffhausen; d. Feb. 13, 1853, at Stein, in the canton of Schaffhausen, where he was appointed minister in 1808, after studying at Marburg, 1794—[193]96. He is one of the ablest of the historians of Switzerland has produced, wrote monographs on
S. Hofmeister (1810), Oswald Myconius (1813), Werner Steiner (1818), Berthold Haller (1828), Guillaume Farel (1831), and continued Hottinger’s Hetelische Kirchengeschichte. [He is not to be confounded with Johann Christian Kirchhofer, who composed the able book, Quellensammlung zur Geschichte des Neutestamentlichen Canons bis auf
KIRK, Edward Norris, D.D., b. in New York Aug. 18, 1802; d. in Boston, Mass., Nov. 14, 1874. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1820, and, after a brief study of law, at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1825. From 1829 to 1837 he was pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church in Albany, N.Y.; the years from 1837 to 1842 were spent in Europe, and in travelling in the United States, in the interest of the Foreign Evangelical Society, of which he was secretary. From 1842 to 1871 he was pastor of the Mount Vernon Church (Congregational), Boston, Mass. During his last years he was almost entirely blind. Dr. Kirk was one of the first members of the Evangelical Alliance, and a vigorous advocate of the evangelization of the Roman-Catholic countries of Europe. He published Memorial of Rev. John Chester, D.D. (Albany, 1829). Lectures on Christ's Parables (New York, 1856), two volumes of Sermons (New York, 1840, and Boston, 1840); translations of Gassner's Theology (New York, 1842), and Canon of the Holy Scriptures (abridged, Boston, 1862), and of J. F. Astle's Louis Fourteenth, and the Writers of his Age (Boston, 1855). His Lectures on Revivals, edited by Rev. D. O. Mears, appeared Boston, 1874. See D. O. Mears: Life of Edward Norris Kirk, D.D., Boston, 1877.

KIRKLAND, Samuel, b. at Norwich, Conn., Dec. 1, 1744; d. at Clinton, N.Y., Feb. 28, 1808. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1765; ordained in the Congregational ministry, 1766; was a famous missionary among the Six Nations, and, after serving as an army chaplain in the Revolutionary War, returned to his work among the Indians. He founded at Whitestown, N.Y., in 1793, the Hamilton Oneida Academy, from which sprang Hamilton College. See his Memoir in Sparks's American Biography. — John Thornton, D.D., LL.D., son of the preceding; b. at Little Falls, N.Y., Aug. 17, 1770; d. at Boston, April 26, 1840. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1789; pastor of the Summer-street (Congregational) Church, Boston, 1794-1810; and president of Harvard College, 1810-26. His presidency marks a brilliant period in the history of the college. He wrote a life of Fisher Ames, and edited his works, Boston, 1809.

KIRK-SESSION is the lowest court in the Presbyterian churches of Scotland, the same that is called the "session" in America, consisting of the minister and elders.

KITTO, John, b. at Plymouth, Eng., Dec. 4, 1804; d. at Cannstadt, Wurttemberg, Germany, Nov. 25, 1854. His father was a poor mason and a drunkard, who could afford him only three years' schooling; and so, in his twelfth year, he began to earn his own living as a barber's apprentice, but was dismissed for supposed connivance at theft. On Feb. 13, 1817, he was assisting his father at his trade; but, "when in the act of stepping from the top of the ladder to the roof of the house, he lost his footing, and fell, a distance of thirty-five feet, into the court beneath." By this fall he was severely injured bodily, and totally and permanently deprived of the sense of hearing. On recovering his strength, he repaired to various expedients to gain a few pence whereby he might buy books: for reading was his passion. His pitiable condition—"pinched with hunger, shivering in rags, crawling about with exposed and bleeding feet"—led to his being put in the Plymouth workhouse; Nov. 15, 1817. He remained until July 17, 1828, with the exception of a few months (1821-22) of indentureship, to a shoemaker in the place, who cruelly treated him. In 1823 he attracted the attention of the famous scientist Harvey, and to a number of educated persons who were interested in the articles he wrote for the Plymouth Weekly Journal; and he obtained through them the post of sub-librarian of the Plymouth Public Library. The tide had turned with him. From this position he passed, in 1824, into the service of a Mr. Groves's mediation, he was engaged by the Church Committee did not deal properly with his sensitive nature, never supposing that the man whom they hired as a mere printer had such lofty pretensions to authorship, a rupture was inevitable. He repented of the step he had taken; and, by the solicitation of friends, he was restored a few months afterwards, and sent to Malta, where he lived for eighteen months. But, owing to the same absorption in literary matters, he broke his rash pledge to abstain from literary pursuits, and so was supposed by the society to be unable to do as much printing as was required. Nothing remained but for him to leave his employ. Arrived in London, he met with Mr. Groves, and engaged to go with him as tutor to his family upon his missionary journey to the East. The party sailed from Gravesend, June 12, 1829, and arrived at Bagdad, Sunday, Dec. 6, 1829. On Sept. 19, 1832, he left that city for England, having practically exhausted his usefulness to Mr. Groves, and arrived at Gravesend in June, 1833. He obtained employment, as a literary hack, with Charles Knight, and wrote industriously for the Penny Magazine and the Penny Cyclopedia. On Sept. 21, 1833, he married. In 1835 he began, and in May, 1838, he finished, for Mr. Knight, the Pictorial Bible, which had an immense and long-enduring popularity. The first edition was in three large octavo volumes, and was reprinted the first year. The standard edition was begun in 1847, and finished in 1849 (4 vols., imperial 8vo). The work appeared at first anonymously; but the real author was soon known. He had at last found his place, and produced in succession the following works: Uncle Oliver's Travels in Persia, 1838, 2 vols.; Pictorial History of Palestine and the Holy Land, including a Complete History of the Jews, 1841, 2 vols.; Gallery of Sacred Portraits; History of Palestine from the Patriarchal Age to the Present Time, Edinburgh, 1843; Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature (which he edited and largely wrote), Edinburgh, 1843-45, 2 vols. (3d ed. greatly enlarged by W. L. Alexander, D.D., London, 1868, 3 vols.); The Pictorial Sunday Book; London, 1845; The Lord's Saviour's Day, London, 1846, 2 vols.; Ancient Jerusalem, 1846; Modern Jerusalem, 1847; The Court of Persia, 1849; The People of Persia, 1849; The Tabernacle and its Furniture, 1849; The Bible History of the Holy Land, 1849 (9th ed., 1867); Daily Bible Illustrations, Morning Readings, 1849-51, 4 vols., and Evening Readings, 1851-53, 4 vols. (new edition by J. L. Porter, D.D., Edinburgh, 1866, 8 vols.).—his most popular, and, next to his Cyclopædia, his most valuable production. On Jan. 1, 1848, he began the issue of the Journal of Sacred Literature, and was by far the most voluminous contributor; but the Journal had not a sufficient pecuniary basis, and involved him in heavy loss; so that at last, in 1853, after eleven volumes had been issued, he abandoned it to the hands of Dr. Burgess. By these works he won a distinguished position among the popularizers of Bible science. In 1844 the university of Giessen, Germany, made him a doctor of divinity. In 1845 he became a fellow of the Royal Society of Antiquaries. On Dec. 17, 1850, he was put upon the civil list, and received a grant of a hundred pounds a year "on account of his useful and meritorious works." He had been all his life subject to severe headaches; but in 1851 he manifested decided indications of cerebral debility, and was more or less of an invalid from that time on. In February, 1854, he was forced to stop work. Generous friends raised eighteen hundred pounds for his support. On the 5th of August he left for Germany, and there he died. Kitto was a layman, although a doctor of divinity. His life was full of vicissitudes, but steadily progressive. The contrast between its beginning and its close was remarkable: in fact, in the entire range of religious biography there is scarcely a parallel case. The totally deaf boy, who in poverty and misery, in cold and nakedness, wandered upon the streets of Plymouth, won for himself a name honored in thousands of homes. The secret of his success, apart from his literary gifts, lay in his indomitable perseverance, buoyed up by his great self-confidence. He never put a low estimate upon himself. His ultimate position was only the realization of the expectations of his boyhood. Much of his success may be explained on the score of his deafness; for, as he was totally cut off from ordinary society, he gave all his time to study. It is a curious fact in this connection, that for some years he scarcely spoke a word; but, by the kindly strategem of friends upon his voyage to Malta, he was compelled to speak, and recovered the use of his vocal organs. His voice and pronunciation were peculiar, but he ever afterwards was intelligible. Having been all his life a voracious and multifarious reader, and a student whose day was sixteen hours long, it is no wonder that he acquired much learning; yet, owing to his irregular education, it would be perhaps wrong to call him a scholar. "He had as much knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and the modern tongues, as sufficed for his purpose." Dr. Kitto was a member of the Church of England, and very catholic and liberal. Every Christian was considered by him a brother. His piety was genuine and genial, permanent and pervasive. His life reads like a romance; but his influence was real and most helpful in his day, and is likely to be in some way permanent. He consecrated his energies to the better understanding of the Bible, and under his directions a multitude explored the mine of divine truth.
KLARENBACH, Adolf, b. at a farm near Lenne, in the duchy of Berg, towards the close of the fifteenth century; was educated at Munster; studied at Cologne; embraced the Reformation, and participated in the reformatory movements at Wurzburg; at Hamburg he worked together with the minister, Johann Klopreis), at Osnabruck, and in his native place. In 1528 Klopreis was arrested at Cologne, and summoned before the Inquisition. Klarenbach immediately went to the city to aid him in his defence, but was also arrested. Cologne was at that moment the principal outpost of Rome in Germany. Reformatory tendencies had shown themselves in the city; but the clergy, the university, the magistrates, and the majority of the burghers, were zealous Romanists. Klopreis escaped; but Klarenbach was kept in prison for eighteen months, in spite of the remonstrances of his friends and his native city. Together with Peter Fliesteden, he was finally convicted of heresy by the Inquisition, and delivered over for punishment to the secular authorities. Sept. 28, 1539, he was burnt in the square outside the gate. In 1528 the third centennial of his martyrdom was celebrated throughout his native country, and a monument erected in his honor.

C. KRAFFT.

KLEE, Heinrich, b. at Coblenz, April 20, 1800; d. in Munich, July 28, 1841. He was educated in the Roman-Catholic seminary of Mayence, and was appointed professor of theology there in 1825, at Bonn in 1830, and in Munich in 1839, having been ordained priest in 1823. At Bonn his position was in the beginning somewhat difficult, as he was a decided adversary of Hermes and the Heresians school. He represented the old traditional stand-point of the Church of Rome. To him revelation, Christianity, and the Church formed the one undivided fact of objective reason, which presents no other problems to subjective reason but those of its historical development. But he was an able representative of this standpoint, and after the appearance of the three first songs of his Messias, published in Bremische Beiträge, 1748. (See D. F. Strauss: Kloprets Jugendgeschichte, in Kleine Schriften, Berlin, 1886.) After staying for two years as a private tutor in the house of a relative at Langen salza, he went in 1750 to Zurich to visit Bodmer. (See Moerikofer: Kloprets Jugends, Zürich, 1750-51, Zurich, 1851.) In 1751 he went to Copenhagen, where he lived, somewhat retired, but highly honored, at the court of Frederick V., who gave him a pension of four hundred thalers. After the death of the king (in 1766) he removed to Hamburg, but he retained the pension. In Hamburg he lived in the same style as in Copenhagen. His hollycus Augus to the archiepiscopal throne, the lecture-rooms of the Heresians soon became empty. Klee's principal works are, System d. Kathol. Dogmatik, 1831; Die Ehe, 1833; Die Kathol. Dogmatik, 1834-35, 3 vols.; Dogmengesch., 1835-37, 2 vols. LANGE.

KLING, Christian Friedrich, b. at Altdorf, Württemberg, Nov. 4, 1800; d. at Marbach-on-the-Neckar, Schiller's birthplace, in April, 1861. He studied at Tübingen and Berlin, and was appointed pastor at Wiblingen, 1826; professor of theology at Marburg, 1832, and at Bonn, 1842; pastor at Ebersbach in Württemberg, 1849; and dean of Marbach, 1851. He was a pupil of Schieriemacher and Neander. In his writings, as in his lectures, instructive, sound, and winning; a man of fine discrimination and independent judgment. In 1831 his Theologie der Religionen, in which he argued for the identity of the spirit of revelation and the Church, was published. In 1833 his Der Vertrag über die Schriften des Neuen Testaments was published, and in 1834 his Theologische Vorlesungen. His Theologie der Religionen, was translated into English by Mrs. D. W. Poor and Conway P. Wing, in Schaff's edition of Lange's Bible. His Lehrsätzen are contained in the ' aggressive works, translated into English by W. W. and D. B. Home, New York, 1868. He also contributed numerous minor essays to the leading theological reviews of Germany, and articles for Herzog's Enzyklopädie.

KLOPSTOCK, Friedrich Gottlieb, b. at Quedlinburg, Saxony, July 2, 1742, d. at Hamburg, March 14, 1803. He was educated at Schulpforte. When he left that institution (in 1765), he wrote an epic, and to use Christ for his hero. (See Freybe: Kloprets Abhandlungen, Halle, 1868.) He studied first at Jena: but the mode of life which prevailed there among the students displeased him; and in 1748 he removed to Leipzig, where he remained until after the appearance of the three first songs of his Messias, published in Bremische Beiträge, 1748. (See D. F. Strauss: Kloprets Jugendgeschichte, in Kleine Schriften, Berlin, 1886.) After staying for two years as a private tutor in the house of a relative at Langen salza, he went in 1750 to Zurich to visit Bodmer. (See Moerikofer: Kloprets Jugends, Zürich, 1750-51, Zurich, 1851.) In 1751 he went to Copenhagen, where he lived, somewhat retired, but highly honored, at the court of Frederick V., who gave him a pension of four hundred thalers. After the death of the king (in 1766) he removed to Hamburg, but he retained the pension. In Hamburg he lived in the same style as in Copenhagen. His hollycus Augus to the archiepiscopal throne, the lecture-rooms of the Heresians soon became empty. Klee's principal works are, System d. Kathol. Dogmatik, 1831; Die Ehe, 1833; Die Kathol. Dogmatik, 1834-35, 3 vols.; Dogmengesch., 1835-37, 2 vols. LANGE.

KLING, Christian Friedrich, b. at Altdorf, Württemberg, Nov. 4, 1800; d. at Marbach-on-the-Neckar, Schiller's birthplace, in April, 1861. He studied at Tübingen and Berlin, and was appointed pastor at Wiblingen, 1826; professor of theology at Marburg, 1832, and at Bonn, 1842; pastor at Ebersbach in Württemberg, 1849; and dean of Marbach, 1851. He was a pupil of Schieriemacher and Neander. In his writings, as in his lectures, instructive, sound, and winning; a man of fine discrimination and independent judgment. In 1831 his Theologie der Religionen, in which he argued for the identity of the spirit of revelation and the Church, was published. In 1833 his Der Vertrag über die Schriften des Neuen Testaments was published, and in 1834 his Theologische Vorlesungen. His Theologie der Religionen, was translated into English by W. W. and D. B. Home, New York, 1868. He also contributed numerous minor essays to the leading theological reviews of Germany, and articles for Herzog's Enzyklopädie.
lished the first edition of the Nibelungen. Klopstock was, so to speak, awakened by Bodmer. He fully adopted his ideas; and the great work of his life was the Messias, an epic poem, written in hexameters, published in parts between 1748 and 1780, and translated into English by W. Nind, 1847. The first collected edition of his works appeared at Leipzig, 1798-1810, in seven volumes. The most complete is that of Leipzig, 1844-45, with letters and biographical supplements by Herman Schmidlin.

The two fundamental ideas on which Klopstock's poetry is based are nationality and religion; and though his Germanenadum is somewhat affected, and his Christenthum somewhat sentimental, the power with which he forced these two ideas into the spiritual life of his time made him a turning-point in the history of German literature. Modern German poetry begins with him. His Works are enormous, decisive; and, besides this, he exercised, both by his Messias and by his Oden and Geistliche Lieder, a purely religious influence. In a time in which Lutheran orthodoxy had transformed religion into a mere system of doctrines, Klopstock made people feel that Christianity is something more,—that it speaks as well to the imagination and the sentiment as to the intellect. More especially he was the singer of the resurrection and the coming of the kingdom of heaven; and numerous proofs of the deep impression he produced can be found in the German literature. See C. F. CRAMER: Er und über ähn, Hamburg, 1780; and DURING: Klopstocks Leben, Weimar, 1825.

KLÜPFEL, Engelbert, b. at Wipfelda, Lower Franconia, Jan. 18, 1733; d. at Freiburg, in Breisgau, July 8, 1811. In 1750 he entered the order of the Augustinians at Würzburg; studied philosophy at Erfurt, theology at Freiburg, and was ordained priest at Constance in 1756; taught philosophy in the gymnasiums of Mannheim and Oberndorf, theology at Mayence and Constance; and was in 1761 made professor of theology at Freiburg. This appointment roused the jealousy of the Jesuits, who had hitherto held the chair; but Klüpfel was supported by the Austrian court, and allowed to continue his activity unmolested. With the Protestant rationalists, especially Semler, he also carried on a hot controversy in his Nova Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica,—a periodical which he founded in 1775, and continued to 1790 (Fr. Krummacher said, that he laid all his talents into his Institutiones theologicae dogmatisca (1789), which was used as text-book in many universities, but has been materially altered in its fourth edition by Ziegler. His De vita et scriptis Conradi Celtis, containing some autobiographical notes, was published after his death. See JOHANN L. HUG: Elogium Klüpfel. KLOSE.

KNAPP, Albert, the most distinguished writer of spiritual songs in Germany in the first half of this century; was b. in Tübingen, July 25, 1798; d. in Stuttgart, June 18, 1844. In his second year his parents removed to Alpirbach in the Black Forest, where they remained till 1809. The beauties of the scenery exercised a lasting influence upon the fresh imagination of the young poet. He studied at the theological seminary in Tübingen; but the years were fuller of poetry than of theology. In 1820 he became vicar at Feuerbach, and afterwards at Gaisburg—two villages near Stuttgart. His intercourse at this period with Wilhelm Hofacker gave to him a new insight "into his own corruption and into Christ's grace and majesty, which became the beginning of an entirely new life, and conception of the world."

After passing to Sulz (1825) and to Kirchheim (1831), he was transferred to Stuttgart in 1836, and in 1845 was made pastor of St. Leonard's Church. He endeared himself to his people; and although he was not fitted, like Ludwig Hofacker, by an impressive emphasis of sin and grace, to become a pattern as an awakening preacher, his sermons were noted for a remarkable richness of spiritual thought. He was a man of decided evangelical sentiments, and clung to the Divine Word. "Then is the soul joyful," he says, "when it passes from the confusion of a capricious, dry, and limited human wisdom, into the clear light of the Divine Word."

Knapp's claim to permanent fame rests upon his peculiar gift of spiritual poetry. He was an original poet and a hymnologist. His first efforts appeared in two volumes, under the title Christliche Gedichte ("Christian Poems"), and were published, by the generosity of some friends, at Basel, in 1829. Most of Knapp's hymns, which were afterwards incorporated in hymn-books, appeared in this edition. Other volumes of poems appeared under the titles, Neuerer Gedichte ("New Poems"), 1834, 2 vols.; Christenlieder ("Songs for Christians"), 1841; Gedichte ("Poems"), 1854, 1868; and Herbstblüthen ("Autumn Flowers"), 1859. These volumes contain more than twelve hundred original hymns and poems. Although they are not always classic in form, they are rich in thought. The subjects are drawn from every department. Men of war, poets, musicians, as well as the beauties of nature and the praises of Christ, are sung for, as he says, "the whole world belongs to the Christian; and his mind and heart may tarry everywhere except in the domain of sin and vanity, and everywhere seek the vestiges of his God."

But he always returned with joy to the Word of God. "Here there is an endless store. Though one may have composed a hundred poems on it with careful labor, yet he has done no more than does a fly when it has walked over the keys of a piano full of music. Especially do I look upon the Old Testament as a real gold-mine of the highest style of poetry. It was his glory, as Fr. Krummacher said, that he laid all his talents at the feet of Christ; and some of his hymns will always continue to be fountains of blessing; as, An dein Blulien und Erbleichen; Eines wünsch ich mir vor allem andern ["More than all, one thing my heart is craving," Schafl's Christ in Song, p. 497]; Einer ist's, an dem wir hangen; Hallelujah, meine lieblich stehn."

Knapp also did a great work by editing a collection of hymns, Evangelischer Liederschatz für Kirche und Haus ("Treasury of Hymns for the Church and Home"), Stuttgart, 1837; 3d ed., 1865. He here gives an admirable selection of 3,580 out of the 86,000 German hymns. In the first edition he made many corrections in the hymns, but afterwards confessed he had gone too far in this direction. [Its notices of the hymn-writers are written with skill, and are very valuable.] This work contains many very valuable and satisfying the taste for good hymns. Knapp also edited the Christolthepe from 1833 to 1833, a Christian almanac, and published some biographies. See Lebensbild v. A. Knapp (memoirs begun by himself, and completed by his son, Joseph Knapp) [and a lecture of thirty-seven pages by Karl Gerok: Albert Knapp: Der schwäbische Dichter, Stuttgart, 1879].

KNAPP, Georg Christian, b. at Glaucha, 1753; d. at Halle, Oct. 14, 1825. He studied at Halle and Göttingen, and was appointed professor of theology at Halle in 1777, and director of the Francke Institution in 1783. Surrounded on all sides by the prevailing rationalism, he represented the influence of Spener; and the impression he made was both deep and wide, though a natural timidity, which made him shrink from any direct conflict, prevented him from forming a school. He published a valuable edition of the New Testament (3d ed., 1824); and his Scripta variò argomenti (2 vols.; 2d ed., 1823) contains several excellent essays. After his death, his Lectures on Christian Theology was published by Thilo (1827–28, 2 vols.), [and translated into English by Leonard Woods (Andover, 1831–39, 2 vols.)]; and his Bibliotheca Glaubenslehre zum praktischen Gebrauch, by Guericke, 1840. See Niemeyer: Epistelen zum Andenken auf Knapp, 1825.

THOLUCK.

KNATCHBUL, Sir Norton, b. in Kent, 1601; d. 1604. He wrote Annotations upon some Difficult Texts in all the Books of the New Testament (Cambridge, 1603), a translation, with improvements of his own,—Animadversiones in libros N. T. paradoxæ orthodoxæ (London, 1659). It was once highly esteemed, and frequently reprinted.

KNIELAND, Abner, b. 1774; d. at Farmington, Io., Aug. 27, 1844. He was first a Baptist, and then a Universalist minister, but ultimately became a deist. In 1836 he tried for blasphemy before the Supreme Court at Boston. He published The Deist (1822, 2 vols.), Lectures on the Doctrine of Universal Salvation (Philadelphia, 1824). Review of the Evidence of Christianity (1829). But his most notable publication was a translation of the New Testament, with a Greek text, Philadelphia, 1822, 2 vols.

KNELING (Genuflexion, Prostration). The Jews prayed standing or kneeling (Neh. ix. 2–4; Matt. vi. 5; Luke xvii. 11, 13; 2 Chron. vi. 13; Dan. vi. 10; Ez. ix. 5, etc.). Among the Christians, however, the kneeling posture very early became the most common. Compare Acts vii. 60, ix. 40, xx. 36, xxii. 5; Eph. iii. 14, not to speak of frequent allusions by Clemens Romanus, St. Ignatius, Hermas, and others. See art. Genuflexion in Smith and Cheetham, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, i. 725 sq.

KNIPPERDOLLING, Bernard. See MINSTER.

KNIPSTRO (not Knipstrow, though in Latin Knipstrovius), Johann, b. at Sandow-in-the-Mark, May 1, 1497; d. at Wolgast, Oct. 4, 1556. He early entered the Franciscan order, and was, on account of his mental brightness, sent to study in the university of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, where he greatly distinguished himself by defending the theses of Luther against Tetzel in a public disputation, Jan. 20, 1518. In order to prevent his embracing the Reformation, he was by his superiors sent to the Franciscan monastery at Fyritz in Pomerania, but a short time after left all the monks to Protestantism. The bishop of Cammin interfered; and Knipstro fled to Stettin, where he married, and thence to Stralsund, where he was made assistant preacher at St. Mary, and afterwards superintendent. At the synod of Trepтов, 1534, the dukes of Pomerania agreed to introduce the Reformation in their possessions; and Knipstro was made superintendent-general over the Wolgast dominions. His activity was, on the whole, more practical than theoretical. His writings (Epistola ad Melanchthonem, Werterung der Bekenntnisses A. Osiandri, etc.) are not many. His life is found in J. H. Balthasar: Sammlungen, Greifswald, 1723, 1725, 2 vols., i. 93, and ii. 317–386.

G. Flitt.

KNOBEL, Karl August, one of the greatest Hebrew exegetes of our age; b. at Tschecchin, in Lower Lusatia, Aug. 7, 1807; d. at Giessen, May 25, 1863. Having studied at Halle, and at Breslau; was appointed professor extraordinary of theology there in 1835, and, after the publication of his Prophethsis der Hebräer (Breslau, 1837, 2 vols.), ordinary professor of theology at Giessen, 1839. To Hirzel's Kurzgefasste exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament he contributed the Commentaries on Isaiah (which involved him in a controversy with Ewald, and occasioned him to write his Exegetisches Vademecum für Herrn Ewald in Tübingen, Giessen, 1844), 1843, 3d edition, 1861; Genesis, 1852, 2d edition, 1860; Exodus and Leviticus, 1857; and Numbers, Deuteronomy, and Joshua, 1861; and his contributions are distinguished by their learning and acuteness, originality of view, and solid argumentation, though the decidedly rationalistic bent of his mind prevented him from thoroughly appreciating the poetical and theological value of the works commented upon. He translated the Bible into the German language, and published some biographies. See Lebensberichte von A. Osiandri, etc. (Stuttgart, 1867). PALMER. (LIAUXMANN.)

KNOVELS, Hanserd, an eminent English Baptist minister; b. in Chalkwell, Lincolnshire, 1598; d. in London, Sept. 19, 1691. He was educated at Cambridge University, and ordained priest by the bishop of Peterborough. Changing his views on infant baptism, he was recognized as a non-conformist, and subjected to much persecution for preaching. In 1688 he left the country, and sailed for America. Arriving in Boston, he became involved in a controversy with the authorities. Cotton Mather called him "Mr. Absurd Knowless." He was the first minister of Dover, N.H. He returned to England in 1641, where the remainder of his life was spent in varying vicissitudes, a part of the time as a fugitive on the Continent. Mr. Knollys was a learned scholar and an able preacher, and, before his departure for America, is said to have had in his conversation the presence of one thousand persons when he preached in London. He published Flaming Fire in Zion (1641), Rudiments of the Hebrew Grammar (1648), and his Autobiography (1672). The last work was continued by Kiffin, 1802, and reprinted 1813. See also Kline, 3d ed. vol. iii. The Hanserd Knollys (Baptist) Society was or organized in England in 1845 to republish early Baptist writings.

KNOWN-MEN is a designation for Lollards, and, later, for Puritans, in Henry VIII.'s time; used among themselves to mark the fact of their acquaintance with the New Testament. They considered themselves to be "known men" of God, because they knew God's Book.

KNOX, John, the Scottish reformer; b. 1505; d. Nov. 24, 1572; was the son of William Knox, a small landed proprietor of fair though not distinguished descent, in the county of Lanark. His mother's name was Sinclair; and his birthplace (Works, edited by D. Laing, vol. vi. p. 16) appears to have been, not Gifford village, as usually represented, but a suburb of the town of Haddington, known as Giffordgate. It was likewise in Haddington that he received the elements of a liberal education. Haddington early enjoyed the advantage of possessing an excellent grammar-school—one of those schools originating in the county of Lanark, and destined itself, by the public spirit, which, at least as regards education, animated the Scottish Church even antecedently to the Reformation. In these schools, if not, except in rare instances, Greek, at least the Latin language was taught, alongside with the more ordinary branches of popular instruction. The schools of Aberdeen, Perth, Stirling, Dumbarton, Killearn, and Haddington, are particularly mentioned in contemporary writings, as, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, celebrated for the skill of their masters, and the attainments of the often numerous pupils—including sons of the principal nobility and gentry—who were educated within their walls.

From Haddington school he appears to have proceeded to the University of Glasgow, then not so well equipped as it has since become, being, in the words of its distinguished principal, John Major, "perum dotatum, parumpaque celebrum," and chiefly adorned by the presidency of a man who was one of the greatest scholars of his times. How long Knox remained at college is uncertain. His name occurs among the Incorporate in the Annals of Glasgow College for 1522. It is not to be found in any subsequent year, either in the Glasgow registers, or in those of the other Scottish universities. He may have been a student, however, without matriculating. Knox certainly never made any pretense to be such a scholar as his contemporaries George Buchanan or Alesius; nor is there evidence that he even graduated. That he was a fair Latinist, and accustomed to study, appears, however, from the fact, which seems to be well attested, of his familiarity with the writings of Augustine and Jerome. He acquired the Greek and Hebrew languages after middle life, probably when on the Continent. Knox is said to have been ordained to the priesthood before the year 1530. The fact of his ordination is admitted both by friends and foes; but neither for the date of this event, nor for almost any other incident in the reformer's career, between his matriculation in Glasgow in 1522 and the time when he denounced the errors of Romanism, and espoused the Reformed order of public worship, have we authentic evidence. The principal authority for the facts of his life at this period is an article in Beza's Icones Vitrorum Illustratum (1550); but the details given in this curious series of contemporary biographies are not by any means always reliable. One fact, however, its value, is ascertained. It appears, from evidence adduced by Mr. Laing, that in the year 1544 Knox had not yet divested himself of Romish orders; in so far, that, in his character of a priest, he signed a notarial instrument dated March 27 of that year, the original of which is still to be found in the Charter-room at Tantallon Castle. Up to this time, however, he seems to have employed himself in private tuition, rather than in parochial duties; and, at the moment when he last signed his name as a priest, he was probably already engaged in the office—which he held for several years—as tutor or pedagogue in the family of Hugh Douglas of Longniddry, in East Lothian, with the further charge of the son of a neighboring gentleman, John Cockburn of Ormiston: both of them persons, who, like himself, had even at this time a leaning to the new doctrines.

Knox was forty years of age when he first publicly professed the Protestant faith. His mind had in all probability been directed to that faith for some time before the change was avowed. According to Calderwood, Thomas Guillaume, a native of East Lothian, and provincial of the order of Blackfriars, was the first "to give Mr. Knox a taste of the truth." Beza attributes his original change of opinion to the study in St. Andrews, in early manhood, of the writings of Augustine and Jerome. But the immediate instrument of his actual conversion was the equally learned and amiable George Wishart, who, after a period of banishment, returned to his native country in 1544, to perish, in the following year, at the stake, as the last and most illustrious of the victims of Cardinal Beaton. Among other places where he preached the Reformed doctrines in these years, Wishart had come to East Lothian, and there made Knox's acquaintance. The attachment which the latter formed for the person as for the doctrine of Wishart, must, notwithstanding his mature years, be described as of the nature of a youthful enthusiasm. He followed him everywhere, and constituted himself his body-guard, in the fear that he might be seized by the papal emissaries, known to be seeking Wishart's life. And, on the night of the martyr's apprehension, he was hardly restrained from sharing his captivity, and consequently, in all probability, his fate. The terms of Wishart's remonstrance are well known: "Nay, return to your bairns (pupils). One is sufficient for a sacrifice."

His first call to the Protestant ministry took place at St. Andrews, a picturesque city, rich in ecclesiastical traditions from the Cumbri period, which was throughout his life intimately associated with the reformer's career. There appears to have been no regular ordination. Of course, he was already ordained as a priest in the Church of Rome. But imposition of hands, and other forms in constituting the ministerial character, were (as appears from the law of the new Church of Scotland, which he afterwards assisted to draw up, and at all events sanctioned) not regarded by Knox as at most of more than secondary importance. A graphic account of the whole proceedings connected with his call to the ministry, together with a report of his first sermon in St. Andrews, will be found in Knox's History of the Reformation.

At this time he was residing in the Castle of St. Andrews. After Beaton's death, this stronghold became a place of refuge for many of the Protestants. Along with his pupils, the sons of the lairds of Longdvrier and Orlinston, already mentioned, he passed there some comparatively peaceful months. His reposal was rudely interrupted by the investiture and capitulation of the castle in the end of July, 1547, succeeded, as regarded Knox and some of the rest of the refugees, by imprisonment in the French galleys. He now spent no less than nineteen months as a galley-slave, amongst hardships and miseries which are said to have permanently injured his health, and which he never cared to refer to, so painful was the recollection. "How long I continued prisoner," he said in a sermon preached in St. Andrews, in 1569, "what torments I sustained in the galleys, and what were the sores of my heart, is now no time to recite." He adds, however, that he always continued to hope for a return to his native country. In the History (vol. i. p. 228), the same confidence of a return is referred to as never having forsaken him; and he gives a curious testimony to the fact, by mentioning how, on one occasion, "lying buttwixt Dundee and St. Andrews, the second time that the galleys returned to Scotland, the said John [Knox] being so extremely sick that few hoped his life, Maister [afterwards Sir] James [Balfour, one of his fellow-prisoners] willed him to look to the land, and asked if he knew it. Who answered, 'Yes, I know it well; for I see the steeple of that place where God first in public opened my mouth to his glory; and I am fully persuaded, how weak soever I now appear, that I shall not depart this life, till that my tongue shall glorify his godly name in the same place.'"

On his release, which took place early in 1549, through (as is supposed) the mediation of Edward VI, Knox found, that, in the existing state of the country, he could be of little use in his beloved Scotland. For nearly ten years we accordingly find him submitting to voluntary exile, like so many of the worthiest of his countrymen in those troublous times. All these years, however, he devoted himself to ministerial labors in connection with the Reformed Church. His first sphere of duty was provided for him in England, as a minister of the English Church. For a full account of this period (extending over about five years) of the life of Knox, the reader must be referred to Dr. Lorimer's work, mentioned below. That the father of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland should have been from 1549 to 1554 a minister of the Church of England will appear less remarkable, when it is remembered, that, during the whole reign of Edward VI, the Church of England was in a transition state; some of its most marked peculiarities (which Knox himself, and others in Scotland, afterwards objected to) being then in abeyance, or at least not insisted upon as terms of communion. Thus, the Prayer-Book was not obligatory, neither was kneeling at the communion. Episcopal government was of course acknowledged; but Knox, when himself offered, in the year 1559, the bishopric of Rochester, declined the preferment, on the same grounds on which he afterwards objected to the re-introduction of Episcopacy into Scotland. The offices he held in the Church of England are roughly indicated in the History, which says, "He was first appointed preacher to Berwick, then to Newcastle, and last he was called to London; and to the southern parts of England, where he remained till the death of Edward VI." (Works, I. p. 280). From other sources it appears that in 1551 he was appointed one of the six chaplains in ordinary to the king; and that in this capacity he had submitted to him, and, after reviving, joined the other chaplains in sanctioning, "The Articles concerning an Uniformity in Religion" of 1552, which became the basis of the "Thirty-nine Articles" of the Church of England.

From England, at the death of Edward, Knox proceeded to the Continent, travelling for a time from place to place with some uncertainty. In September, 1554, having reached Geneva, where he saw Calvin, he accepted a call to the English Church at Frankfurt. At Frankfurt controversies in connection with vestments, ceremonies, and the use of the English Prayer-Book, met him, and, notwithstanding the great moderation which he showed from first to last, led, in March, 1555, to his resignation of his charge. On this subject the reader is referred to his treatise, reprinted in Laing's edition of Knox's works, entitled A Briefe Narrative of the Troubles which arose at Frankfurt (1554). From Frankfurt, Knox passed a second time to Geneva, where he was at once invited to become minister of the English Church; and to that charge he was formally elected in December, 1556, on his return from a visit which he paid to Scotland on the occasion of his first marriage. The church in which he preached at Geneva was called the "Temple de Notre Dame la Neuve," and had been granted, at Calvin's solicitation, for the use of the English and Italian congregations, by the municipal authorities of that city. Knox continued to officiate in Geneva till January, 1558, when he finally left for Scotland.

He arrived in Edinburgh on the 2d of May of that year. The time was a critical one; but the life of Knox from this period belongs to the history of his country, and only those particulars need be noticed which have a strictly personal interest.

When the Reformed religion was, in 1560, formally ratified by law in Scotland, Knox was appointed minister of the Church of St. Giles, then the great parish church of Edinburgh: He was at this time a man of fifty-five years, and in the full vigor of his powers, as appears abundantly in the style of his History of the Reformation, _a_ work which appears to have been begun about 1559, and completed in the course of the next five or six years. The History, if sometimes rough and even coarse in language, and not always defensible in temper and spirit, is written with a force and vigor not surpassed by any of his other writings; and, although afterwards objected to being then in abeyance, or at least not insisted upon as terms of communion. Thus, the Prayer-Book was not obligatory, neither was kneeling at the communion. Episcopal government was of course acknowledged; but Knox, misfortune to lose his much-loved wife, Marjory Bowes, then only in her twenty-eighth year. She was the daughter of Richard Bowes, captain of Norham Castle, and a scion of a family of distinction in Northumberland. He had secured her affections during his early ministry at Berwick, and had returned from Geneva in 1555 to marry her. In 1563 Knox made a second marriage, which was greatly admired at the time, not so much for the difference of rank, as the disparity in age, between the parties, but which, notwithstanding these circumstances, appears to have been a happy one. The young lady was Margaret Stewart, daughter of Andrew Lord Stewart of Ochiltree. At this time our reformer lived not only a very laborious life,—being much engrossed with the public affairs of the nascent church, and at the same time devoted to his work as a parish minister, to say nothing of his continual, and perhaps, in his position, unavoidable controversies, more or less personal, with the ecclesiastical and political factions of the day, whom he regarded as his own and his country's enemies,—but a life not without its social and family enjoyments. He had a fair stipend of four hundred merks Scots, equal to about forty-four pounds of English money of that day, and the value of which may be computed when it is stated that the amount was considerably higher than that of the salaries of the judges of the Court of Session in Scotland, and not much lower than those of the English judges of the same time. Then he had a good house, which was provided and kept in repair by the municipality,—a house previously occupied by the abbot of Dunfermline. The house is still preserved, with little change, and forms a memorial,—hitherto the only memorial,—of the great reformer in the scene of so many of his labors. From his will, too, it appears that he had sometimes as much as a hogshead of wine in his cellar. Nor was he, with all his severity and even fierceness of temper, a man indisposed in those days to exchange friendly and kindly relations with his neighbors, many of whom, in every rank, were among his intimate friends, or to give way, when the occasion, even sometimes when it was not fit, to mirth and humor, of which, as of other traits of his character, his writings furnish abundant evidence.

An interesting description of Knox's appearance, and especially of his style as a preacher, in his later years, is furnished in the Diary of James Melville (Bannatyne Club, 1829, pp. 26, 33). Melville was at the time a student in St. Andrews, and the period he refers to is the year 1571, when Knox, for his personal security, had, not for the first time in his life, taken refuge in that city.

"Of all the benefits I had that year" (writes Melville) "was the coming of that most notable prophet and apostle of our nation, Mr. John Knox, to St. Andrews, who, by the faction of the queen occupying the castle and town of Edinburgh, was compelled to remove therefrom, with a number of the best, and chose to come to St. Andrews. Knox had a servant, Richard Ballantyne, who, was greatly admired at his first entry; but or he had done with his sermon, he was so active and vigorous that he was like to dash that pulpit in blads and fly out of it."

John Knox died on Monday, the 24th of November, 1572, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. He died as he had lived,—full of faith, but always ready for conflict. He found a devoted nurse in his young wife; and all the noblest and best men of Scotland hung about his house for tidings of the progress of his malady, in the vain hope of his being longer spared. Two brief estimates of his character, both of them contemporary, may be here added. One is found in the account of his last illness and death by his servant, Richard Ballantyne, who, after detailing the incidents of his last hours, says, "Of this manner departeth this man of God, the lyght of Scotland, the comfort of the Kirke within the same, the mirrour of Godliness, and patrone and exemplo to all trew ministeris, in puritie of lyfe, soundness in doctrine, and in bauldness in re-proving of wicketness, and one that caired not the favore of men (how great soever they were) to reprove their abuses and synges. . . ."

But the highest testimony to the worth of a man not without fault was that pronounced at his grave in the churchyard of St. Giles by the Earl of Mortoun, the regent of Scotland, in the presence of an immense concourse, who had followed him to his last resting-place: "Here lyeth a man who in his life never feared the face of man, who hath been often threatened with dagge and dagger, but yet hath ended his dayes in peace and honor."

LIT.—The Works of John Knox, collected and edited by David Laing in 6 vols., Edinburgh, printed for the Bannatyne Club, 1894 (a most learned, elaborate, and every way admirable edition, the labor of love of a man more competent than any other person to undertake such a national memorial). Thomas McCrie, D.D.: Life of John Knox, Edinburgh, 1841; F. Brandes: John Knox, Elberfeld, 1862; Lorimer: John Knox and the Church of England, Lond., 1875; [Taylor: John Knox, N.Y., 1885]. William Lee, John Knox, Vicesimus, b. at Newington Green, Middlesex, Dec. 8, 1752; d. in Tunbridge, Kent, Sept. 6, 1681. He was educated at St. John's College, Oxford; succeeded his father as master of Tunbridge School, and held the position with honor for thirty-three years. He is well known as the author of Essays (London, 1777; more than twenty editions published); and as the editor of Elegant Extracts in Prose (1783), Elegant Extracts in Verse (1790), Elegant Epistles (1782) (the three volumes reprinted, Boston, Mass., 6 vols.), and of Family Lectures, 1791. He was an admired KOHATH (assembly), second son of Levi (Gen. xlii. 11), founder of the Kohathites (1 Chron. xxii. 12), who were Levites of the highest rank. According to the account in Num. iii. 29-31, iv. 2 sq., the Kohathites pitched the tents on the south side of the tabernacle while in the wilderness, and had charge of "the ark and the table, and the candlestick, and the altars, and the vessels of the sanctuary wherewith they minister, and the hanging, and the service thereof." In later times they helped to bring the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv. 5). They had twenty-three cities assigned to them at the conquest (Josh. xxii. 4, 5).

They occupied the proudest positions in the land, being judges and officers (1 Chron. xxvi. 20-28), also temple-singers (2 Chron. xx. 19). See LEVITES.

KOLLENBUSCH, Samuel, b. at Wichlinghausen, near Barmen, Sept. 1, 1724; d. at Barmen, Sept. 1, 1803. He studied medicine at Duisburg and Strassburg, and practised as a physician, first at Duisburg, afterwards in his native city. As a mystic, he stands between Tersteegen and Jung-Stilling. But he was a biblical realist, believing in the literal truth of every word of the Bible, and a zealous churchman; and this same character the circle of adherents retained, which gradually formed around him, and which afterwards was considerably widened by the exertions of G. Menken at Bremen. For his peculiar doctrines, see Erklärung biblischer Wahrheiten (Elberfeld, 1807), and Goldene Apfel in silbernen Schalen (Barmen, 1854) for his life, see Mitleidungen aus d. Leben u. Wirken S. Kollenbuschs in Barmen, 1853. See also W. Krug: Die Lehre d. Dr. Kollenbusch (Elberfeld, 1846) and Kritische Geschichte d. protest-relig. Schüchternerei im Grossherz. Berg (Elberfeld, 1861), and M. Goebel: Gesch. d. christ. Lebens d. rhein-Westphal. evang. Kirche, Coblenz, 1849-1860, 3 vols. (1st vol. Introduction). M. GOEBEL.

KOL NIDR ("tie vow"), a formula uttered three times, with increasing loudness, by the official leader of worship in the Jewish synagogues, upon the evening of the Day of Atonement, as part of the service. Each time it is pronounced, the congregation repeat it softly. It is to this effect: "All vows, renunciations, prohibitions, and obligations of every kind, which we have made, sworn, and bound upon us, from this Day of Atonement to the next, we now repent of, and pronounce them broken, and of no efficacy. Our vows are no vows; our oaths are no oaths." As might be supposed, this liturgical formula has been turned against the Jews, as if by it they absolved themselves from all obligations, and therefore could not be bound by an oath. But the charge is unjust; for the Kol Nidré applies only to vows,—i.e., what the speaker binds upon himself,—and not to oaths, which would bind him to others. The latter are regarded by them as inviolable, except by the personal consent of the individual who had received the oath. A general release from future vows can be made on New Year, or between New Year's and the Day of Konrad of Marburg

Konrad of Marburg, one of the most notorious names in German church history; was b. at Marburg in the second half of the twelfth century; and killed there July 30, 1233. Of his personal life very little is known. It is doubtful whether he ever studied in any university, though he bore the title of magister, and it cannot be ascertained whether he was a secular priest, or belonged to one of the religious orders. When he first appeared in history, at the court of Landgrave Ludwig IV. of Thuringia and Hesse, during the reign of Pope Honorius III., he was highly praised for his zeal and disinterestedness. But during the latter part of his life, after the death of Ludwig IV. and Honorius III., when the widowed landgravine Elizabeth made him her spiritual guardian, and Gregory IX. appointed him inquisitor-general of Germany, his virtues, if ever he had any, turned into so many vices. The treatment to which he subjected the landgravine, in order to produce a confession, is utterly disgusting and revolting. He succeeded, however. She died in 1231, twenty-four years old, and was canonized in 1235. Equally revolting, and utterly detestable, were the methods he employed as inquisitor-general, — espionage and denunciations, no procedure and no appeal, immediate execution by the aid of the secular power, or by his own tools, generally chosen among robbers and incendiaries. None escaped him, neither priest nor knight, neither bishop nor king. On July 25, 1233, King Henry convened a great assembly of princes and bishops at Mayence; and the assembly insisted upon the organization of a regular procedure. Konrad refused, and the bishops addressed themselves to the Pope. On his return to Marburg, Konrad was killed; and the Pope fulminated. But so great was the hatred which Konrad had produced, that at the diet of Frankfort, in February, 1234, none dared to take his cause or that of the Pope; and though heavy penances were imposed upon his murderers, and his remains were buried beside those of St. Elizabeth, the papal inquisition was not re-established.
KOOLHAAS.

KOORNTHAL.

in Germany any more. The punishment of heretics was again laid under the jurisdiction of the bishops. See ELIZABETH, St., and INQUISTION.

Lit.—The life of Konrad of Marburg has been written by STÄDTLER (Aschen, 1857), PARKIN (Marburg, 1861), Harms (Marburg, 1861), BECK (1871), CUNO (1877), and KALTNER (Prag, 1882). See also the literature under ST. ELIZABETH.

KOOLHAAS, Kasper, b. at Cologne, 1536; d. at Leyden, 1815. He studied at Dusseldorf, but embraced the Reformation in 1566, and was in 1574 made professor of theology at Leyden; from which position, however, he afterwards retired. His De jure Christiani magistratus circa disciplinam et regimen ecclesiae gave great offence; and the synod of Mittelburg (1584) demanded that he should retract, and subscribe to the Belgian Confession. When he refused, and appealed to the states-general, the provincial synod of Holland excommunicated him, 1582; but the magistrate of Leyden supported him, and he lived undisturbed in the city as a private teacher. He held with respect to church government, predestination, etc., nearly the same views as afterwards ARMINIUS.

A. SCHWEIZER.

KOPPE, Johann Benjamin, b. at Danzig, Aug. 19, 1750; d. at Hanover, Feb. 12, 1791. He studied theology and philology at Leipzig and Göttingen, and was appointed professor of theology at Göttingen in 1776, superintendent-general of Gotha in 1784, and court-preacher at Hanover in 1788. As a pupil of Ernesti and Heyne, and transferring their grammatico-historical principle to the exegesis of the New Testament, he began the publication of his Novum Testamentum Gr. perpet. annotat. illustr. in 1778, but he finished only the Epistles to the Galatians, Thessalonians, and Ephesians. The work was continued by Tychsen, Ammon, Heinrichs, and POTT.

G. H. KLIPPEL.

KO'RAH, a son of Izhar (Exod. vi. 15, 21, 24), and leader of the rebellion against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi. xxvi. 9, xxvii. 3). See Moses. Jude (11) couples Korah with Cain and Balaam in his warnings against false and self-seeking teachers.

KO'RAHITES, sons, i.e., descendants, of Korah; princes of the Kohathite family of the priests, the descendants of Kohath, a son of Levi (Exod. vi. 16, 18, 21). Some of them were noted singers (2 Chron. xx. 19). Eleven of the psalms (xlvi., xlix., xxxv., xxxvi., xxxvii., lxxxi., lxxvii., lxxviii.) are headed, "For the sons of Korah;" so that probably the "sons of Korah" became, in course of time, a descriptive term for the temple-singers. Others of the Korahites were door-keepers (1 Chron. ix. 17-19); while one, Mattithiah, "had the set office over the things that were made in the temple" (ix. 11), i.e., the minchah, or meat-offering of the temple, offered daily in the morning and evening (cf. Lev. ii. 5, 6, vi. 14).

KORAN. See MOHAMMED.

KORNTHAL, a religious community in Württemberg, seven miles from Stuttgart, was founded by, and became the rallying-point of, Württemberg Pietism in the early part of this century. The Pietism of Württemberg, which had among its principal advocates J. A. Bengel (d. 1752) and Oetinger (d. 1782), developed, and was in turn affected by, the original and energetic mind of a peasant, Michael Hahn. The latter had a following [of at least fifteen thousand people]; and when, in 1810, the government determined to introduce a new hymn-book and a rationalizing liturgy into the Pietistic communities such as Hoffmann himself, a year before, had proposed, in a document addressed to his Majesty. The king fell in with the general idea, and on Sept. 8, 1818, published an edict granting toleration to a colony such as was proposed. The following year a number of families, taking advantage of the edict, purchased the Görlitz estate of Kornthal (a thousand acres for a hundred and thirteen thousand gulden, or fifty thousand dollars); and on Nov. 7, 1819, the church was dedicated. Michael Hahn was chosen as the first president (Vorsteher), but died a few days after his election, and was succeeded by Hoffmann, who, after a very successful administration, died in 1846. It soon called a pastor.

Friedrich von Winterhausen, who was succeeded in 1833 by Dr. v. Kapff, who subsequently became one of the most eminent preachers of the land, and pastor of the Stiftskirche in Stuttgart. He was succeeded by Pfarrer Staudt, who is still active. The colony sought to realize the ideal of a corporation of Christians; and Hoffmann, who was largely influenced by the institutions of the Moravians, determined to make it also a model of agricultural and mechanical thrift and educational institutions. It did not become schismatic, but adopted the Augsburg Confession, with only a few omissions. However, it was stipulated, in the royal act of incorporation, that it should be independent of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Württemberg, and enjoy the absolute right to manage its own church-matters. In 1816, the government determined to institute a college, and the two servants on the sabbath are always crowded. The church then presents a singularly interesting appearance. The pastor sits in the centre of the bench, behind the pulpit, with the elders of the town on each side of him. The little children all sit at the steps of the pulpit, facing the congregation,—the young women on the right of the pulpit, and the young men on the left. Each, from the smallest child up to the young men, has a paper and pencil in hand, with which they make notes of the sermon, and on which they are examined during the week by the pastor. The young people are obliged to attend the services; and, after the sermon, the pastor passes down on one side, and the chief magistrate on the other, and call out the roll of the young men and women. Absences must be accounted for during the week.

A beautiful Easter custom is in vogue among the Kornthals, by which the most of the Sunday is spent in the graveyard, and, after music from trumpets, a hymn is sung, and engage in prayer. Nothing to jar the repose of the community occurs. Even petty crimes are unknown, and the whole atmosphere is freighted with the calm of a serious and devout religiousness. There is only one inn in the place; and that is patronized but very seldom by the people, who constitute one of the ideal temperance societies in the world. The contrast which Kornthal presents to the neighboring communities is very marked, both in point of piety and intelligence of the people and their general intelligence.

Kornthal was for several years a private tutor in Cleve; and in 1817 he was appointed pastor of the Reformed congregation at Travert, and, in the following year, professor of theology in the university. His works consist of several collections of sermons, an essay, De servo et libero arbitrio (Nuremberg, 1818), and Chronologic und Harmonie der vier Evangelien, edited, after his death by Dr. Burger, Erlangen, 1848. The great influence, however, which he exercised, was due less to his writings than to his lectures; and, again, less to his teaching than to his person. He was "a truly apostolical character," his very appearance, as a silent sermon on the strength of God within him. He imparted new life to the Protestant Church in Bavaria, which had sunk into insipid rationalism; and, long before the name of "inner missions" ever was heard of, he performed the work far and wide. He was the first German professor who delivered a course of lectures on the history of missions. See Thomasius: D. Widerwechsel, d. evang. Lebens in d. Luth. Kirche Bayerns, Erlangen, 1807.

KRALIZ, a castle in Moravia, celebrated as the place where the first Bohemian translation of the Bible was made from the original text, the preceding ones having been made from the Vulgate. This translation (the Bible of Kraliz) was issued in six volumes in folio, 1579–83, and is still reprinted by foreign Bible societies. But specimens of the original work are very scarce; as, during the counter-reformation in Bohemia, the Jesuits destroyed every copy they could lay their hands on.

KRANTZ, Albert, b. at Hamburg about 1445; d. there Dec. 7, 1517. He studied theology, philosophy, and history at Rostock and Cologne; travelled in Germany and Italy; lectured on philosophy and canon law in the university of Rostock, whose rector he was in 1492; and settled in 1499 in his native city, first as lecturer, afterwards as professor of marius theologice at the cathedral, then as dean of the chapter. He was often employed by the magistrate of Hamburg in diplomatical negotiations, and in 1500 he was chosen arbitrator between King Hans of Denmark and Duke Frederick of Holstein. During his lifetime he published several theological works,— Ordo missae secundum ritum ecclesiae Hamburghensis (Strassburg, 1509), and Spirantissimum opusculum in officium missae (edited, after his lectures, by Bertold Moller, 1509); but his literary fame he owes to his historical works,— Vandalia (1518), Saxonia (1520), Dania (1546), and Metropolis (1548), published after his death, and containing many precious materials to the church history of his time. When, on his death-bed, he read the theses of Luther, he exclaimed, "Alas! my good brother, you had better go back to your cell, and sing a misereur. The thing is too big. It cannot be done." Clement VIII. put his historical works on the Index. See Leben d. Albert Krantz, Hamburg, 1722, 2d ed., 1729; Johannes Moller: Cimbria Literata, iii. pp. 376–391. CARL BERTHEAU.

KRAUTH, Charles Philip, D.D., American Lutheran divine; b. in Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, May 7, 1797; d. in Gettysburg, May 30, 1867; entered the ministry in 1827, was called to Philadelphia 1827, and elected professor of biblical and Oriental literature in the theological seminary at Gettysburg 1833, and president of Pennsylvania College, in the same place, the next year; discharged the duties of these two positions simultaneously until 1850, when he gave up the presidency. He edited the Evangelical Quarterly Review from 1853 to 1861.

KREBS, John Michael, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at Hagerstown, Md., May 6, 1804; d. in New York City, Sept. 30, 1867. He was graduated at Dickinson College 1827, and at Princeton Theological Seminary 1830, from which year till his death he was pastor of the Rutgers-street Presbyterian Church, New-York City. From 1837 to 1845 he was permanent clerk of the General Assembly (O. S.), and in 1845 moderator. He was a director of the Princeton Theological Seminary from 1842, and president of the board in 1850, also an original member, and for some time president, of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church.

Krell, or Crell, Nikolaus, b. at Leipzig in the middle of the sixteenth century, between 1550 and 1553; beheaded at Dresden, Oct. 8, 1801. He was educated at Grimma, studied jurisprudence at Lebing, entered the civil service in 1580, and in 1589 made chancellor by the young elector, Christian I. Saxony was at that moment strictly Lutheran. The attempt of the professors of Wittenberg to smuggle into the country the Calvinistic Philippism (as it was called, after Philip Melanchthon), under the covering of genuine Lutheranism, was successfully baffled in 1674; and all who had supported it — such as the chancellor Cracau, the body-physician Peucer, the court-preacher Schütz, and the superintendent Stössel — were discharged and imprisoned. Krell, however, who, on his travels in France and Switzerland, had often enjoyed the intercourse of Beza, was much in favor of the so-called Crypto-Calvinism; and, as soon as he came into power, he began to prepare the way for it. Subscription to the Formula Concordiae was not demanded any more. The preachers were requested to abstain from all polemics in the pulpit. The superintendent Selnecker of Leipzig, an intractable champion of Lutheranism, was replaced by the Calvinistic Wolfgang Harder. The court-preachers Salsmith and Steinbach were busy in writing and speaking against Calvinism; the new edition of the German Bible, with Calvinistic notes on the margin, the so-called "Krell's Bible;" the latter drawing up a new catechism of the same character. The supreme consistory at Dresden was abolished, and a severe censorship of theological books was established. Finally, July 4, 1591, the exorcism was erased from the baptismal formula, but thereby the popular conscience was touched; and a citizen of Dresden, a butcher, met at the baptismal font, and demanded, with the axe raised over against the neck of the minister, to have his child baptized with exorcism. The chancellor's religious predilections also made themselves felt in his foreign policy. He supported the Huguenots in France, but the campaign was disastrous; and when, in the summer of 1691, the troops returned, he had no money to pay them. At that moment the elector died (Sept. 25, 1591); and the chancellor's religious predictions immediately dismissed by Duke Friedrich Wilhelm of Saxe-Altenburg, guardian of the infant heir, and imprisoned in the Königstein. A process was instituted against him, which lasted for ten years, but which has no religious interest. Many of its details are very obscure. It ended with his condemnation; and, long before that time, every vestige of his propaganda for Crypto-Calvinism had been completely obliterated. See Richard: Dr. Nicholas Krell, Dresden, 1859, 2 vols.; Robert Calinich: Zwei sächsische Kantzer, Chemnitz, 1838.

Krebs, John Michael, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at Riga, Nov. 21, 1744; d. at Karas-Bazar, Dec. 25, 1824. A daughter of a Russian statesman (von Wietinghoff), she was married to another Russian statesman (von Krüdener) when she was fourteen years old. The marriage proved unhappy, and in 1792 she separated from her husband. She settled in Paris, and led a very frivolous life, which she has described in a novel, Valerie. An accident, the sudden death of one of her lovers, converted her. She became religious. She was no doubt sincere, but an enthusiast without self-control. In 1815 she became acquainted with the Emperor, Alexander I., and their intercourse in Paris was very intimate. She exercised great influence on him. She gave the Holy Alliance its name. During the two years of famine, 1816-17, she was a great support to many poor people in Switzerland and Southern Germany. But even her charity showed so peculiar and so eccentric a character, that it gave offence, and in 1818 she was actually transported home to Russia by the police. Meanwhile the friendship of Alexander I. had grown rather cold; and, when she openly denounced his lukewarmness in the affairs of Greece, he ordered her to leave St. Petersburg. She was on her way to the Crimea, with the Princess Gallitzen and a number of German colonists, when she died. See Ch. Eynard: Vie de Mme. de Krüdener, Paris, 1849, 2 vols.; Sternberg: Leben d. Frau von Krüdener, Leipzig, 1856; M. Zirze: Juliane von Krüdener, New York, 1857. See also Sainte-Beuve: Portraits de femmes et Derniers Portraits.

Kreu, Wilhelm Traugott, b. at Radis, near Wittenberg, June 22, 1770; d. at Leipzig, Jan. 13, 1842. He studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed professor of philosophy there in 1794, at Francfort-on-Oder in 1800, at Königsberg in 1805, and at Leipzig in 1806. He was a very prolific writer on philosophy and theology. His principal theological works are Ueber d. Perfectibilität d. geoffenbarten Religion, Leipzig, 1795; Pisologe oder Glaube, Abergläube, u. Unglaube, 1805; Rational in Paris, Rationalismus, Leipzig, 1826. See Meine Lebensreise in sechs Stationen, an autobiography.

Krummacher, Friedrich Adolf, the eldest of a celebrated group of Reformed pastors of this name; b. at Tecklenburg, July 13, 1767; d. in Bremen, April 4, 1845. After studying theology at Halle, he taught school until 1800, when he was called, as professor of theology and rhetoric, to the seminary at Berg, whose star had already begun to descend to its setting. While here, he published, in 1805, his Parabeln (Parables), 8th ed., 1848 — a work which won for him a permanent place in German chancelorship. [Ed. — Thrice translated; London, 1844 and often]. In 1807 he exchanged his professorial chair for the pulpit of Kettwig, and in 1812 accepted a call to Bernberg as general superintendent and pastor. During these years he was a fertile writer; and some of his books for children, especially his catechisms,

Bibelkate

chismus (1810, 12th ed., 1843), had a wide ciru lation. In 1820 he refused a call to the university of Bonn, but in 1824 went to Bremen as the pas tor of the Ansgar Church. Although he could not compete with his colleague Drseke in the pulpit, he was highly esteemed as a Christian counsellor, and was revered by a large circle as a father (Väterchen). Krummacher was also a poet, and wrote some good hymns. See A. W.

Müller: F. A. Krummacher u. seine Freunde.,

KRUUMMACHER, Friedrich Wilhelm, a son of the former; one of the most eloquent and influential preachers of Germany in this century; was

b. Jan. 28, 1796, at Mörs on the Rhine, the birthplace of the fervid German hymn-writer, Tersteene ging; d. Dec. 10, 1868, at Potsdam. He studied at the university of Halle from 1815 to 1817 (where he heard the lectures of the extreme rationalist, Wegscheider, and the modest but devout Knapp), and at Jena. In 1819 he became the assistant pastor of the Reformed congregation at Frankfurt, where he remained till 1823, when he acted a call from the village of Ruhort. Two years subsequently, in 1825, he removed to Bar-men in the Wupperthal. It was here, at a week-day evening service, that he delivered his lectures on Elijah and Elisha. Crowded congregations listened to them, large numbers coming from the neighboring city of Elberfeld. In 1834 he was called for the second time to Elberfeld, and acted. During his residence in this city, he received a delegation from the synod of Pennsylvania, of the German Reformed Church, consisting of Dr. Hoffeditz and the Rev. Dr. Schneck, excepted. During his residence in this city, he was appointed court-chaplain at Potsdam. He he was appointed court-chaplain at Potsdam. He sustained a relation of great intimacy with the Queen Victoria, as one of the ministers to preach in their own language at the London Exposition.

Dr. Krummacher was a fervid and bold preacher of the gospel, and takes his place among the most faithful and powerful witnesses of the truth

Christians by loud laughing, and other demonstrations of ridicule or dissent. Krummacher

Knapp, the fervent evangelical preachers of Southern Germany, as well as with the pious men in the pulpits and at the universities of Northern Germany; had a broad interest in the cause of evangelical religion in other lands; and numbered among his friends Adolphe Monod and others of the best spirits of France and Great Britain. Dr. Schaff, in a letter to The New- York

Observer (Feb. 4, 1869), says, "Krummacher was edowed with every gift that constitutes an orator,

— a most fertile and brilliant imagination, a vigorou and original mind, a glowing heart, an extraordinary facility and felicity of diction, perfect familiarity with the Scriptures, an athletic and commanding presence, and a powerful and melodious voice, which, however, in latter years, underwent a great change, and sounded like the rolling of the distant thunder. . . . He will always shine as one of the brightest stars in the galaxy of those great and good men, who, in the present century, have fought the good fight of the evangelical faith against prevailing rationalism and infidelity, and have entitled themselves to the gratitude of the resent and future generations." Thorwaldsen, the great sculptor, meeting Krummacher in Frankfurt at the seventieth anniversary of Goethe's birth, was attracted by his noble forehead and appearance, and asked, "Are you an artist?"—"No, a theologian," was the reply. To which the sculptor answered, "How can one be only a theologian!"

Krummacher is better known in England and America than any other German preacher: in fact, is the only one who is well known. He published a number of volumes of sermons, some of which have been translated into the English, and widely read. Of these volumes the principal are, Salomo und Sulamith, 1827, 9th ed., 1875;

Elijah the Tishbite ("itself baptized with the fire of Elijah," as Heubner characterized this work),

Elberfeld, 1828, 6th ed., 1874 (English translation,

London, and New York, 1838, and many editions); The Prophet Elisha, Elberfeld, 1835 (English translation, London): Das Passionsbuch, der leidende Christus, Bielefeld, 1854, 3d ed., 1878 (English translation, The Suffering Saviour, Edinburgh and Boston, 1870); David, the King of Israel, Berlin, 1887 (English translation, Edinburgh and New York, 1870). See Autobiography edited by his daughter (English translation by M. G. Easton, 2d ed., Edinburgh, 1871), and art.
in Herzog by Rud. Kögel.

KRUUMMACHER, Gottfried Daniel, a younger brother of Friedrich Adolf; b. in Tecklenburg,

April 1, 1774; d., as pastor of the Reformed Church, in Elberfeld, Jan. 30, 1837. After studying theology at Duisburg, he was successively pastor in Baerl (1798), Wülfrath (1801), and Elberfeld (1810). He was a man of some eccentricities, but a strong and robust Christian character and preacher. He was the most powerful champion of the theology of the synod of Dort.

His removal to Elberfeld occurred at a time of the universal awakening of religious thought in Germany, and aroused new life in his congregation. He drew the extreme conclusions from the doctrine of predestination; and some of his ardent followers disturbed the meetings of other Christians by loud laughing, and other demonstrations of ridicule or dissent. Krummacher for a while upheld this course of his followers, but gradually retreated from this position. However, under his influence, a strong Pietistic party was formed in Elberfeld and the Wupperthal. He was strongly opposed to the efforts at church union, and in this was out of sympathy with the spirit of the Reformed Church. Among his printed volumes of sermons the most celebrated is a volume about the names of the camping-places of the Israelites in the desert: D. Wanderungen Israels durch d. Wüste nach Kanaan, 1834.

Kuinöl (Kühnöl), Christian, one of the most widely learned of the rationalistic super-natural school of the closing part of the eighteenth century; b. at Artern, Prussian Saxony, Aug. 4, 1744; d. at New York, July 24, 1807. Having finished his education as a student of theology at Leipzig, he was for three years employed as teacher of the higher branches in the reputed school at Cluster-Bergen, near Magdeburg, and for one year as inspector of the Orphans-Home at Graiz, when, through the Rev. Dr. J. G. Knapp, superintendent of the Francke Institution at Halle, a call came to him from the Lutheran St. Michael's and Zion's congregations at Philadelphia, Penn. Setting sail for the New World, June 29, 1770, he entered his office as the third collegiate pastor of that congregation, Sept. 27 of the same year, and married, July 23, 1771, Margaret Henrietta, daughter of Rev. H. M. Mühlenberg, D.D., rector of the congregation, patriarch of the Lutheran Church in this country, whose successor in the office of rector he became A.D. 1779. Conscientious in the performance of his pastoral duties, he had an eye to the wants of the Church at large, opened a theological seminary, which the War of Independence brought to an untimely end, influenced the board of trustees of the College (before 1765 Academy, since 1779 University of Pennsylvania) in behalf of the special interests of the German language and students, and took a lively interest in the German Benevolent Society. A.D. 1784 he followed a call to the Lutheran congregation at New York, assisted in establishing the New-York University, served as one of the regents, and as professor of Oriental languages and literature. He belonged to the later Pietists, leaning to the so-called Supernaturalistic School. He was of very studious habits, and continually gathering solid information, whereof his diaries give ample evidence. He excelled in Arabic and Hebrew and in higher philology in his native city, and was appointed professor of philosophy there in 1790, and professor of theology at Giessen in 1799. His Commentaries on the Old Testament, Hosea, the Psalms, etc., are now antiquated: but his Commentarius in libros Novi Testamenti historicos (Leipzig, 1807-18, 4 vols.) is, in spite of the somewhat dry and pedantic method, still a valuable work. [It was reprinted, along with the Greek text, in London, 1835, 3 vols.] ZÖCKLER.

Kunze, John Christopher, D.D. one of the most learned among Lutheran theologians of this country; b. at Artern, Prussian Saxony, Aug. 4, 1744; d. at Philadelphia, Penn., July 24, 1807. Having finished his education as a student of theology at Leipzig, he was for three years employed as teacher of the higher branches in the reputed school at Cluster-Bergen, near Magdeburg, and for one year as inspector of the Orphans-Home at Graz, when, through the Rev. Dr. J. G. Knapp, superintendent of the Francke Institution at Halle, a call came to him from the Lutheran St. Michael's and Zion's congregations at Philadelphia, Penn. Setting sail for the New World, June 29, 1770, he entered his office as the third collegiate pastor of that congregation, Sept. 27 of the same year, and married, July 23, 1771, Margaret Henrietta, daughter of Rev. H. M. Mühlenberg, D.D., rector of the congregation, patriarch of the Lutheran Church in this country, whose successor in the office of rector he became A.D. 1779. Conscientious in the performance of his pastoral duties, he had an eye to the wants of the Church at large, opened a theological seminary, which the War of Independence brought to an untimely end, influenced the board of trustees of the College (before 1765 Academy, since 1779 University of Pennsylvania) in behalf of the special interests of the German language and students, and took a lively interest in the German Benevolent Society. A.D. 1784 he followed a call to the Lutheran congregation at New York, assisted in establishing the New-York University, served as one of the regents, and as professor of Oriental languages and literature. He belonged to the later Pietists, leaning to the so-called Supernaturalistic School. He was of very studious habits, and continually gathering solid information, whereof his diaries give ample evidence. He excelled in Arabic and Hebrew and in higher philology in his native city, and was appointed professor of philosophy there in 1790, and professor of theology at Giessen in 1799. His Commentaries on the Old Testament, Hosea, the Psalms, etc., are now antiquated: but his Commentarius in libros Novi Testamenti historicos (Leipzig, 1807-18, 4 vols.) is, in spite of the somewhat dry and pedantic method, still a valuable work. [It was reprinted, along with the Greek text, in London, 1835, 3 vols.] ZÖCKLER.

Kurze, John Christopher, D.D. one of the most learned among Lutheran theologians of this country; b. at Artern, Prussian Saxony, Aug. 4, 1744; d. at Philadelphia, Penn., July 24, 1807. Having finished his education as a student of theology at Leipzig, he was for three years employed as teacher of the higher branches in the reputed school at Cluster-Bergen, near Magdeburg, and for one year as inspector of the Orphans-Home at Graz, when, through the Rev. Dr. J. G. Knapp, superintendent of the Francke Institution at Halle, a call came to him from the Lutheran St. Michael's and Zion's congregations at Philadelphia, Penn. Setting sail for the New World, June 29, 1770, he entered his office as the third collegiate pastor of that congregation, Sept. 27 of the same year, and married, July 23, 1771, Margaret Henrietta, daughter of Rev. H. M. Mühlenberg, D.D., rector of the congregation, patriarch of the Lutheran Church in this country, whose successor in the office of rector he became A.D. 1779. Conscientious in the performance of his pastoral duties, he had an eye to the wants of the Church at large, opened a theological seminary, which the War of Independence brought to an untimely end, influenced the board of trustees of the College (before 1765 Academy, since 1779 University of Pennsylvania) in behalf of the special interests of the German language and students, and took a lively interest in the German Benevolent Society. A.D. 1784 he followed a call to the Lutheran congregation at New York, assisted in establishing the New-York University, served as one of the regents, and as professor of Oriental languages and literature. He belonged to the later Pietists, leaning to the so-called Supernaturalistic School. He was of very studious habits, and continually gathering solid information, whereof his diaries give ample evidence. He excelled in Arabic and Hebrew and in higher philology in his native city, and was appointed professor of philosophy there in 1790, and professor of theology at Giessen in 1799. His Commentaries on the Old Testament, Hosea, the Psalms, etc., are now antiquated: but his Commentarius in libros Novi Testamenti historicos (Leipzig, 1807-18, 4 vols.) is, in spite of the somewhat dry and pedantic method, still a valuable work. [It was reprinted, along with the Greek text, in London, 1835, 3 vols.] ZÖCKLER.
LABADIE.

LABADIE, Jean de, b. Feb. 13, 1610, at Bourg, near Bordeaux; d. Feb. 13, 1674, at Altona. He was educated in the Jesuit college at Bordeaux; studied theology and philosophy, the Bible and the mystics, especially Augustine and St. Bernard; entered the order, but left it again in 1639, and began his practical career as a popular preacher in Bordeaux, Paris, and Amiens, where he was made a canon, and teacher of theology, in 1640. He made a deep impression by his preaching; but his passionate demands of reform, his sermons on freewill and predestination, on grace and good works, and his administration of the Lord's Supper in both forms, roused the hatred and persecutions of the Jesuits. Richelieu, however, protected him; but under Mazarin he was expelled from Amiens, and retired to the Carmelite hermitage at Graville. While there, he read Calvin's Institutiones; and in 1650—what has been told of his joining the Brethren of the Oratory, and afterwards the Jansenists, is unhistorical—he embraced the Reformed faith, and was appointed preacher, and professor of theology, at Montauban. He carried, however, his vivid reformatory instincts with him from the old into the new church; and though as pastor in Geneva, and afterwards at Middleburg, he contributed very much to the spiritual purification and moral elevation of the Reformed congregations, a separatist tendency became more and more apparent in his activity. Like all separatists, he dreamed of forming a congregation of saints. In 1666, when moving from Geneva to Middelburg, he formed a secret union with Pierre Yvon, Pierre Dulignon, and Francois Menuret, which was separatistic in its very character, and became the nucleus of the later Labadist sect. In Middelburg he refused to subscribe to the Belgian Confession, and recognize the authority of the synod. He was suspended from his office in 1668, and shortly after expelled from the city. On the invitation of the countess palatine, Elizabeth, he settled at Herford with his followers, who already formed a completely organized body, separate from Church, with doctrines and a disciplinary system of their own, practising community of property, etc. At Herford a peculiar outburst of enthusiasm took place in the congregation; and, in spite of the intercession of Maurice of Orange and the elector of Brandenburg, the alarmed magistrate banished them from the city 1672. They removed to Altona, where they lived in peace for some time, and where Labadie died. Of his writings, many of which were translated into German, and much read among the Pietists and the Moravian Brethren, the principal are, La Prophe'tie (1668), Manuel de piété (1689), Protestation de bonne foi et saîne doctrine (1670), Brèvice déclaration de nos sentiments touchant l’Église (1670).

Shortly after the death of their leader (1674) the war between Denmark and Sweden induced the Labadists to leave Altona. They settled at Wiewert in West-Friesland, and while there they achieved their greatest success, in spite of the ill-will and chicaneries of the Frisian clergy. Their number increased from a hundred and fifty to about four hundred between 1675 and 1690. In 1680 they received an invitation from Cornelia van Sommelsdyk, the governor of Surinam, to found a colony in his dominions. The invitation was accepted with great enthusiasm. But in 1688 the governor was assassinated; and the colony, which had already been founded, soon died out. A similar attempt at New Bohemia, on the Hudson River, New-York State, U. S. A., also failed. It was, however, not so much these misfortunes as internal difficulties arising from the abolition of community of property, which brought the sect to fall into decay. In 1703 only about thirty persons remained at Wiewert under the rigid discipline of Yvon.

LABADISTS. See above.

LABARUM (probably from the Basque, labarva, "a standard") is the name given to Constantine’s modification of the ordinary cavalry standard (exzillum). The latter was a square piece of cloth stretched on top by a cross-bar, and suspended from a gilt spear surmounted by an eagle of victory. Before his victorious battle with Maxentius (312), in consequence of his vision of the cross, Constantine adopted the exzillum as the standard for the entire army; and he attributed his success to the fact that the battle was fought under this sign. In place of the eagle he put the monogram of Christ (see CHRIST, MONOGRAM OF), and on the banner, Christian emblems. He also appointed fifty of the “ stoutest and most religious” of his soldiers to carry it by turns, and together constitute its special guard. It was a very happy inspiration on Constantine’s part to take as the imperial ensign the labarum, — whose cruciform framework the Christians already regarded as emblematic of the cross of Christ, and which at the same time was greatly revered in its Pagan form by the soldiery, — and transform it into a religious symbol, “the saving sign of the Roman Empire;” for by this means he united enthusiastically the Christian and the Pagan elements in his army. Constantine’s successors, except of course, Julian, likewise adopted the labarum as their ensign. The word “labarum” was subsequently applied to the monogram, and even to the cross by itself. It is interesting to know that neither the word nor the thing dates from Constantine. See SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, s. v.

LABAT, Jean Baptiste, a French Dominican missionary and historian; b. in Paris 1663; d. there Jan. 6, 1738. He passed ten years in the...
LABBÉ, John Power, ... of French parents, ...
LACTANTIUS FIRMIANUS. 1269

LAINÉZ.

LACTANTIUS FIRMIANUS (to which names some old manuscripts add those of Lucius Cacilius, or Calvis) was probably a native of Italy, and, according to Jerome (De vir. ill., 80), a disciple of Arnobius. By Dummers he was called to Nicomedia as teacher of Latin rhetoric; but, as the city was entirely Greek, he found very few pupils, and devoted most of his time to authorship. Having embraced Christianity, he resigned his professorship when the persecution of Diocletian broke out; and he seems to have lived in very humble circumstances until Constantine the Great called him to his court in Gaul as tutor of his son Crispus. The date of his death, like that of his birth, is unknown.

The most important and most celebrated of the Christian works of Lactantius is his Divinarum Institutionum Libri Septem, written during the persecution of Diocletian (between 307 and 310), and afterwards, in a second edition, dedicated to Constantine the Great, between 318 and 323. It is an apology of Christianity, containing an attack on heathen religion and philosophy, and the Christian works of Lactantius is his Divinarum Institutionum Libri Septem, written during the persecution of Diocletian (between 307 and 310), and afterwards, in a second edition, dedicated to Constantine the Great, between 318 and 323. It is an apology of Christianity, containing an attack on heathen religion and philosophy, and the Christian morality, and an exposition of the truths of Christianity. It was intended for people of education; and the author took special pains to satisfy even the most fastidious taste with respect to style and composition, in which he also succeeded so well, that he is generally called the "Christian Cicero." According to Jerome, he himself made an abridgment of the work, of which a complete copy was found in the library of Turin, and published in 1712 by Pfaff. In close connection with the Institutiones stands the book De ira Dei, in which Lactantius attacks the various philosophical schools, especially the Epicureans and Stoics, because they represent God as incapable of anger, as without affection. An earlier work by him, De opificio Dei, was meant to form a supplement to the fourth book of Cicero's De Republica. Among his other works are De moribus persecutorum (with a preface by J. Du Buisson), De morte Ignatii, Paris, 1879; latest edition by Dibner, Paris, 1879), and De ave Phanice, a poem consisting of eighty-five distichs, and treating the fabulous bird as a symbol of the immortality of the soul.

LACTICINIA (literally "milk-dishes") denotes all those kinds of food which are derived from the mammalia in a more or less indirect way: such as milk, butter, cheese, etc.; eggs are placed in the same class of food. The Council of Laodicea, 351, and the Trullan Council of 692 ordered complete abstinence from all lacticinia during fasting; and such is still the custom in most Eastern churches. In the Western Church the abstinence from lacticinia was generally confined to the quadragesimal fast before Easter, and dispensations were not difficult to procure.

LÉTARE SUNDAY, the fourth Sunday of Lent, thus called from the first word of the introit of the mass, lætere, "to rejoice," is also called Dominica de rose, because being the third Sunday selected by the Pope for the blessing of the golden rose.

LAFITEAU, Joseph François, a French Jesuit and missionary; b. at Bordeaux, 1670; d. there July 3, 1746. He labored in the Iroquois Indian Mission at Sault St. Louis, Can., from 1712 to 1717. He published Moeurs des sauvages américains comprises aux mœurs des premiers temps (Paris, 1723—24, 2 vols.), in which he maintained, from a study of Indian character, that they are descendants of the "barbarians" who inhabited Greece at an early period.

LAIDLIE, Archibald, D.D., b. in Kelso, Scotland, Dec. 4, 1727; d. at Red Hook, N.Y., Nov. 14, 1779. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh; ordained 1759, and settled over the Scotch Church at Flushing, Holland; thence he was called in 1769 to New-York City to preach in the English in the Collegiate Church — the first English preacher in the denomination. He was eminently successful as preacher and pastor, although at first called upon to endure great opposition from many of the Dutch denomination.

LAINÉZ, lago, the second general of the order of the Jesuits; b. at Almancaris, Castile, in 1512; d. in Rome, Jan. 19, 1565. He studied at Alcalá; joined Ignatius Loyola in Paris; was one of the six who made the vow of the "Christian Cicero." According to Jerome, he himself made an abridgment of the work, of which a complete copy was found in the library of Turin, and published in 1712 by Pfaff. In close connection with the Institutiones stands the book De ira Dei, in which Lactantius attacks the various philosophical schools, especially the Epicureans and Stoics, because they represent God as incapable of anger, as without affection. An earlier work by him, De opificio Dei, was meant to form a supplement to the fourth book of Cicero's De Republica. Among his other works are De moribus persecutorum (with a preface by J. Du Buisson), De morte Ignatii, Paris, 1879; latest edition by Dibner, Paris, 1879), and De ave Phanice, a poem consisting of eighty-five distichs, and treating the fabulous bird as a symbol of the immortality of the soul.

LACTICINIA (literally "milk-dishes") denotes all those kinds of food which are derived from the mammalia in a more or less indirect way: such as milk, butter, cheese, etc.; eggs are placed in the same class of food. The Council of Laodicea, 351, and the Trullan Council of 692 ordered complete abstinence from all lacticinia during fasting; and such is still the custom in most Eastern churches. In the Western Church the abstinence from lacticinia was generally confined to the quadragesimal fast before Easter, and dispensations were not difficult to procure.

LÉTARE SUNDAY, the fourth Sunday of Lent, thus called from the first word of the introit of the mass, lætere, "to rejoice," is also called Dominica de rose, because being the third Sunday selected by the Pope for the blessing of the golden rose.

LAFITEAU, Joseph François, a French Jesuit and missionary; b. at Bordeaux, 1670; d. there July 3, 1746. He labored in the Iroquois Indian Mission at Sault St. Louis, Can., from 1712 to 1717. He published Moeurs des sauvages américains comprises aux mœurs des premiers temps (Paris, 1723—24, 2 vols.), in which he maintained, from a study of Indian character, that they are descendants of the "barbarians" who inhabited Greece at an early period.

LAIDLIE, Archibald, D.D., b. in Kelso, Scotland, Dec. 4, 1727; d. at Red Hook, N.Y., Nov. 14, 1779. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh; ordained 1759, and settled over the Scotch Church at Flushing, Holland; thence he was called in 1769 to New-York City to preach in the English in the Collegiate Church — the first English preacher in the denomination. He was eminently successful as preacher and pastor, although at first called upon to endure great opposition from many of the Dutch denomination.

LAINÉZ, lago, the second general of the order of the Jesuits; b. at Almancaris, Castile, in 1512; d. in Rome, Jan. 19, 1565. He studied at Alcalá; joined Ignatius Loyola in Paris; was one of the six who made the vow of a spiritual crusade in the Church of Montmartre, Aug. 13, 1534; and succeeded Loyola as general, June 19, 1557. He completed and consolidated the despotic constitution of the order, awakened and developed its great faculty for education, initiated and trained its wonderful talent for intrigue, and made it that frightful instrument of ambition which it afterwards proved to be. He exercised, also, a direct influence on the history of the Roman Catholic Church by the activity he developed at the Council of Trent. He actually suppressed every attempt to modify the old doctrine of justification in favor of the ideas of the Reformation; and his violent assertions of the supremacy of the papal power in its relation to the bishops, the Councils, etc., had at all events the effect of embarrassing his opponents. See L. M. D'Ésse: Vie de Lainéz, Douai, 1597; Ribadeneyra: Life of Lainez, Madrid, 1592; translated into Latin by A. Schott, Antwerp, 1598.

LAITY. In the Primitive Christian Church there was theoretical and practical parity of all believers. It was not only taught (1 Pet. ii. 9, 10, v. 3), but acted upon. Laymen had the right to speak and preach, baptise and administer the Lord's Supper, and exercise discipline. The distinction between clergy and laity was not sharply drawn. The former were chosen by the people to be their governors and leaders in worship, because they had the requisite gifts: but they formed no priestly caste, nor did they pretend to impose laws upon the churches. As Hatch says, "Church officers were originally regarded as existing for the good government of the community and for the general management of its affairs: the difference between [them] and other baptized persons was one of status and degree. Respecting the spiritual life, the two classes tended the same footpath; and the functions which the officers performed were such as, apart from the question of order, might be performed by any member of the community." These functions were, however, open only to the male members (1 Cor. xiv. 34 sq.); except prophesying, which was the privilege of either sex (1 Cor. xi. 5). How long this parity of members lasted, it is impossible to say. The growth of the Church pushed the officers into greater prominence, for their offices increased in importance; and gradually those who did not hold office were excluded from the performance of almost all ecclesiastical functions." The enforced celibacy of the clergy kept them aloof from the common interests of the laity. They were at last considered priests in a peculiar sense. The Lord's Supper became the mass, and the cup was withdrawn from the laity. Portions of the churches, and entire houses, were set apart for clerical use. The breach widened; and so, in spite of an occasional protest, the Christian world was divided into two camps,—one lay, the other clerical. Priestly arrogance and corruption wrought their own cure. The heart of Europe became sick of priests. The Thirty Years' Reformation broke out. Then the laity recovered, in a measure, their lost rights. To-day in Protestant churches, specially the non-Episcopal, the laity have every fitting privilege granted them, and theoretically the priesthood of all believers is granted. Nevertheless, lay administration of the sacraments is probably very rarely practised, and would not in many instances be allowed. For further information, see arts. Baptism, Clergy, Dress of the Early Christians, Lay Communion, Lay Preaching, Lay Representation. See also Schaff: History of the Apostolic Church, bk. iii. § 128, pp. 506 sq.; Lightfoot: Commentary on Philippians, excursus, The Christian Ministry, pp. 179 sq.; E. Hatch: The Organization of the Early Church, pp. 111 sq.; E. Mellor: Priesthood in the Light of the New Testament, London, 1876; J. B. Paton: The Origin of the Priesthood in the Christian Church, London [1876], pp. 55 and P. Madsen: Das geistliche Priesterthum der Christen, Gutersloh, 1882.

LAMAISM is a peculiar development, half religious and half political, of Buddhism. It took place in Tibet, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and presents the most extreme form of a hierarchy, the realization of the very ideal for which the medieval popes fought. From Thibet it spread both into India and China; but Lhassa is still its Rome, and Thibet its patriarchum Petri.

In the primitive Buddhism, such as was taught in India by Gautama in the sixth century B.C., the two principles were the highest, but the only, power in the country. Under him is arranged a graduated series of ecclesiastical offices, ending with the monks, whose number is almost incredible. In Lhassa there are eighteen thousand: in Thibet, in general, every seventh man is a monk. The large bulk of the annual revenue is used to sustain the monasteries, though the monks are the most obstinate beggars in the world, and the priests exceedingly shrewd in extracting money from their flocks. The office of Dalai Lama is not hereditary. When he dies, another incarnation Buddha is established by election; and the Chinese Government is said to exercise not small influence on the election. See Schott: Uber d. Buddhismus in Hoch-Asien [n.d.].

LAMB OF GOD. See Agnus Dei.
return he visited the monasteries of Siegburg and Saalfeld, to make himself acquainted with the severer rules there introduced. He came, however, to the conclusion that the rules of St. Benedict would suffice, if rigidly held. His literary career opened with a poem on the history of Giesebrecht supposes it to be identical with the Gesta Heinrici imperatoris metrice, edited by Witz, in Abhandlungen der Göttingen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, 1870. His second effort was a history of the monastery of Hersfeld: Libellus de inslilu lione Hersfeldemis ecclesiw, of which only a few fragments have come down to us. His principal work is his Annales. and it has been preserved in and education; and, though he cannot be said to be impartial, his views are not without elevation, and his judgment is always moderate. The book was edited by Hesse, 1843 and 1874, and several times translated into German. See the dissertations by Lefard (1873), and H. Delbruck (1873).

LAMBERT, François, b. at Avignon, 1486; d. at Marburg, April 18, 1580. In his fifteenth year he entered the Franciscan order, and worked, later on, with great success, though without fully satisfying himself, as an Itinerant preacher. Luther's writings made a deep impression upon him; and when they were taken from him, anathematized, and burnt, he made up his mind to leave his monastery and his native country. Over Geneva and Zürich he went to Wittenberg, where he arrived in 1523, stayed a whole year, married, lectured on the prophets, and translated several of the Reformers' books into French and Italian. In 1524 he went to Strassburg, where he published his Commentaries on the Prophecies, and several treatises, — De arbitrio hominis veri captio (against Erasmus), De causis excationis malorum sacrorum, J. Gregor auana, Gorum BOOKS, etc. But in Strassburg he also gradually turned away from the strict Lutheranism, and adopted the views of the Swiss Reformers. In 1528 he was appointed professor of theology in the university of Marburg; and, enjoying the confidence of Landgrave Philipp of Hesse, he took a prominent part in the establishment of the Reformation in that country. He drew up the famous Reformation ecclesiaraun Hasmie, which, though never carried out, forms one of the most interesting documents of its kind from the period of the Reformation (printed in C. Schminter: Monumenta Hassiaca, ii.). See his biographies by J. W. Baum (German, Strassburg, 1840), F. St. Steve (Latin, Breslau, 1867), and Louis Ruffet (French, Paris, 1873).

LAMBERT, Charles. See ARTICLES, LAMBERT.

LAMBERCHINI, Luigi, b. at Genoa, May 6, 1776; d. in Rome, May 8, 1854. He entered the order of the Barmates; was made Archbishop of Genoa in 1819; and was in 1823 sent as papal nuncio to Paris, where, by the advice he gave Charles X., he is said to have contributed not a little to the fall of the Bourbons. Made cardinal in 1831, and secretary of state in 1836, he was the true father of that policy which characterized the reign of Gregory XVI., and which finally conjured up the revolution in the very dominions of the Pope. With the death of Gregory XVI. his public career was ended; but he was so hated, that, when the Revolution broke out in 1848, he was compelled to flee, disguised as a groom. His Opere spirituali were published in Rome, 1836. His celebrated memoir in the Droste-Vischering affair was translated into German, Ratisbon, 1838.

LA'MECH. See CAIN.

LAMENNAIS, Hugues Félicité Robert de, b. at St. Malo, July 19, 1782; d. in Paris, Feb. 27, 1854. He entered the seminary of St. Malo in 1811, was ordained a priest in 1816, and published in 1817 the first volume of his Essai sur l'Indif+erence en matiere de Religion, of which the fourth and last volume appeared in 1824. The book made a great sensation. It at once rallied and consolidated the Ultramontanist party, and in the Church in general it produced a kind of revival. The bishops, the Sorbonne, and the Jesuits were strongly opposed to it; but Leo XII. offered the author a cardinal's hat, which, however, he declined. With Gallicanism he broke still more decidedly in his De la religion considérée dans ses rapports avec l'ordre politique et civil (1826); and soon after he abandoned the Bourbons, whose fall he predicted in his Des progres de la revolution (1829). In order to make the Church perfectly free, he demanded to have it separated from the State, and rebuilt on completely democratic principles; but these ideas, which he propagated in his paper, L'Avenir, — founded in 1830, when the revolution had established the liberty of the press, — did not find favor with the Pope. By an encyclical of Aug. 15, 1832, Gregory XVI. condemned them, L'Avenir ceased to come out, and Lamennais retired from public life. He did not submit, however. By his Paroles d'un Croyant (1836) he definitely broke with Rome, and pursued his course independently, showing more and more of the social radicalism which he combined with his religious radicalism: Livre du peuple (1837), L'Esclavage moderne, Le pays et le gouvernement, etc. His last great works were his Esquisse d'une philosophie (1841—46), and a translation, with notes, of the Gospels (1849). In 1848 he was elected a member of the National Assembly, but was unable to carry through any of his plans, and, after the coup d'etat of 1852, he retired altogether from public life, deeply disappointed. See LACODAIRE: Considerations sur le systeme philosoph. de M. de L., Paris, 1834; A. BLAIZE: Essai biog. sur Lamennais, Paris, 1835; EMILe FORGUES: Correspondance, Paris, 1858, 2 vols. C. PFENDER.

LAMENTATIONS is the name of five elegies, in which is bewailed the mournful lot that came upon Jerusalem in the Chaldaean invasion of 588 B.C. The name in the Hebrew text is Echah (חָא, " How"), — the word with which the first, second, and fourth chapters open; but the Jews, according to Jerome, also used the designation "Lamentations" (Kinoth, צוֹת), which was likewise employed in the LXX. (Συναγωγας) and the Vulgate (Threni). It was counted in the LXX. as one book with Jeremiah's Prophecy, just as Ruth was counted as a part of Judges; but in the Hebrew Bible it was placed among the "Hagiographa." So far as the structure of the elegies is concerned, four of them are acrostic [the twenty-two verses in the Authorized Version corresponding to the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet]. In chap. iii., which represents the culmination of the author's feelings, each letter is repeated three times. In chap. v. the acrostic arrangement is ignored. A striking fact meets us in chaps. ii., iii., iv., where \( \gamma \) follows \( \alpha \); whereas in chap. i. the usual order of the alphabet is followed. The contents of the five poems concern the national sorrow, but each brings out a distinct phase of the calamity. Chap. i. depicts Zion weeping, — the once rich and happy, but now desolate city. Chap. ii. is more vivacious, and describes the destruction as the deed of the Lord. In chap. iii. an individual relates his own personal sufferings, though not exclusively. In chap. iv. the mournful condition of the people is brought under view, who, during the siege and after it, suffered so fearfully from the ravages of the sword and famine. Chap. v. portrays the present miserable condition of the people. If there is no reappearance in the thought that this will be attributed to the acrostic method.

That the five pieces were cast in the same mould is psychologically improbable, but the unity of style points to a single hand. The scene is throughout the same, and was vividly before the mind of the writer, who wrote after the siege.

Who is the author of these songs? Tradition with unbroken uniformity speaks of Jeremiah; and the LXX. distinctly declares for the same view, and introduces the first chapter with the words: "And it came to pass, that after Israel was carried into captivity, and Jerusalem was laid waste, Jeremiah sat weeping, and made this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said." Jerome wrongly identifies our book with the elegies sung by Jeremiah at Josiah's death (2 Chron. xxxiv. 25). But this passage shows how well fitted Jeremiah was to write the Lamentations (comp. Jer. viii. 18—22, xiv. 17 sq.). They also have much in common with the Prophecy, both in language, and line of thought. It is only in quite recent times that the Jeremianic authorship has been denied in whole (Ewald, Noldeke, Schrader, Nägelsbach [Professor W. R. Smith; etc.]) or in part (Thenius, etc.). The lexicographical differences in the Prophecy and Lamentations have been urged (Nägelsbach), but the difference of contents of the compositions is in this connection to be taken into account. No striking difference in the spiritual tone can be made out. In general, we must remember that Jeremiah here appears exclusively as the patriot, and not at all as the divinely-sent advocate, as in the Prophecy. Chap. iii. strongly favors the current and traditional view. We cannot get rid of the impression that it is Jeremiah who is relating his own personal experiences. In later times the Lamentations were sung by the Jews on the 9th of Ab, the anniversary of the burning of the temple; and in the Catholic Church they are incorporated in the liturgical service of Passion Week.

Lit. — PARKAU: Threni Jer. philolog. et crit. illustrati, Lugd. Bat., 1780; also the Commentaries of Thenius (Leipzig, 1855), [HENDERSON (Lond., 1851, Andovet, 1868)], ENGELHARDT (Leipzig, 1867), Nägelsbach (Bielefeld, 1869), [Eng. trans. in Lange, New York, 1871], KEIL, Leipzig, 1872 [Eng. trans., 1874], Dean R. Payne Smith, in Speaker's Commentary (New York, 1875), SCHNEIDER (Prague, 1876). See also Ewald: Dichter u. E. B. H. (Halle, 1877); in his Introductions to the Old Testament of De Wette, BLEEK, [and REUSSE; the excellent article of Dr. PLUMPTRE, in Smith's Bible Dictionary; and Professor W. R. Smith, in Encyclopedia Britannica. See also Dr. Wünsche's translation of Echa Rabba, the Midrash upon Lamentations, Leipzig, 1882. For full list of Literature, see Lange's Commentary].

VON ORELLI.

LAMAL, Bernard, b. at Mans, June, 1640; d. at Rouen, Jan. 29, 1718. In 1658 he entered the Congregation of the Oratory, and taught philosophy and mathematics at various places; but his enthusiasm for the Cartesian philosophy made him many enemies among the Aristotelians, and in 1676 he was banished to Grenoble. Recalled to Paris in 1686, he was banished once more, and finally settled at Rouen. His Apparatus Bibliicus (Lyons, 1806) was twice translated into French under the title, Introduction à l'Écriture sainte, by Bellegarde and by Boyer, and also into English by R. Bundy (London, 1723). Among his other works are Harmonia sive Concordia quatuor Evangelistarum (1869) and De Tabernaculo fidei, etc. (1720), on which he is said to have worked for thirty years.

LAMMAS-DAY, or LAMMAS-TIDE, Aug. 1, celebrated by the Roman Catholics in memory of St. Peter's imprisonment, is probably an old Pagan festival dating back to the days of Druidism. The derivation of the name (whether from lamb-mass or from loaf-mass) is uncertain, though the latter seems preferable, as it was an old Saxon custom to make sacrifices of grain on the 1st of August.

LAMPE, Friedrich Adolf, one of the most distinguished Calvinistic divines of the eighteenth century; b. Feb. 18, 1683, at Detmold; d. at Bremen, Dec. 6, 1726. He was educated in the academy of Bremen, 1698—1702; studied theology at Franeker; was professor of dogmatics at the university of Utrecht, 1720—27, and finally pastor of St. Ansgar, and professor at the academy of Bremen. The revival of the federal theology, and the advancement of Bible study in the Reformed Church, are his great merits. His principal works are, Geheimmniss des Gnadenbundes (6 vols.); Milch der Warheit, an exposition of the Heidelberg Catechism; Theologia acteae seu practica, a very full commentary on the Gospel of John (3 vols.); and a number of excellent hymns, etc. See O. THELEMANN: Friedrich Adolf Lampe, 1868.

O. THELEMANN.

LAMPETIANS. See MESSALIANS.

LANCE, The Holy, was, according to the report of Bishop Luiprand of Cremona, presented by King Rudolph of Burgundy to King Henry I. of Germany. According to the original tradition, it was made from the nails with which Jesus was fastened to the cross; but a later tradition identified it with the spear with which the Roman soldier pierced the side of Jesus. Under Charles IV. it was brought to Prague, and in 1354 Innocent VI. established a festival (de lanceo) in its honor. Another holy lance was discovered by the Empress Helena, and preserved in the portico of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. It was afterwards brought to Antioch, where it was discovered, in 1063, by the French monk Peter Bartholomew, who exhibited it to the crusaders, and thereby fired their courage in their great battles with the Saracens. Afterwards it travelled from Antioch to Constantinople, from Constantinople to Venice, from Venice to France, and thence back to Constantinople. The iron with which it was inlaid was brought to Rome under Innocent VIII., and is preserved in the basilica of the Vatican.

[In the Greek Church the "holy lance" is the name given to the knife with which the officiating priest pierces the bread of the Eucharist, in symbol of the piercing of the side of Jesus by the Roman soldier when upon his cross. See Lord's Supper, Forms of Celebration.]

Landauer, Maximilian Albert von, one of the most learned and able, though not one of the best known, representatives of the school of theology occupying an intermediate position between the old supranaturalism and modern rationalism (Vermittlungstheologie); b. Jan. 14, 1810, in Maulbronn; d. April 13, 1878, in Tubingen. He was a man who shunned the public gaze; and his literary activity was carried on in quiet, unostentatious retirement. After studying at Tubingen, where Dorner was his fellow-student, he became his father's assistant in the pastorate of Waldorf, then tutor at Maulbronn, and repetent at Tubingen. In 1839 he became pastor in Göppingen; but a growing deafness and a poor address made him ill fitted for the pastoral office, and in 1841 he returned to Tubingen as professor. Here he continued during the remainder of his life, engaged in his great battles with the Hebraic principle of absolute knowledge, and absolute sinlessness.

His name is especially coupled with the Hegelian principle of absolute knowledge, he emphasized the religious experience in the department of systematic theology. He did not, however, forcibly separate it from the revelation of the Scriptures. The central doctrine in systematic theology he regarded under the aspect of God and man in Jesus of Nazareth; and he laid special emphasis on the humanity of Christ, insisting, however, upon his supernatural birth and absolute sinlessness.

He was a faithful lecturer, but had a decided Suabian accent, which sometimes made it hard for students from other parts of Germany to understand him. He was not as imposing in presence as Baur or Beck, and yet, as we have said, he was one of the most influential of the theologians of his school; and the student learned to respect him more highly, the more intimately he came in contact with him. Yet we look almost in vain for any fruits of his literary activity in published works. In fact, these were confined, during his lifetime, to thirteen articles in the first edition of Herzog, and an article on the relation of grace to the freedom of the will in the application of salvation, in the Jahrbiicher f. d. Theol. The articles in Herzog, especially that on Melanchthon, were excellent. The small number of his publications was the result of a conscientious disinclination to neglect the utmost elaboration of his lectures, and a want of self-confidence. He shrank from appearing before the public with his lectures on theology; and he was, in fact, unusually sensitive to all criticism. But he combined all the best qualities of the Suabian character, was strictly honest, and despaired sham.

Since his death there have been edited from his manuscripts Zur Dogmatik. Zwei akad. Reden (by Buder and Weise), with his Gedächtnissrede auf F. C. Baur, Tubingen, 1879; a volume of Sermons (by Lang), Heilbronn, 1880; and Neueste Dogmengesch. (by Paul Zeller), Heilbronn, 1881, which takes up the period from Semler to the present time. See Worte d. Erinnerung an Dr. M. A. Landauer, Tubingen, 1878. B. Schmidt, A. Landerer, Tiibingen, 1878. Lando Pope, from November 9, 113, to May 914 succeeded Anastasius III., and was succeeded by John X. Nothing is known of his personal life or his reign.

LANE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Cincinnati, O., was founded in 1829. Its original endowment consisted of four thousand dollars donated by Ebenezer Lane and brother, and of sixty acres of land on Walnut Hills, given by members of the Kemper family. It was at first proposed to establish an academic and collegiate as well as theological institution; and a preparatory school was first opened Nov. 18, 1829. After an experiment of five years, the academic and collegiate departments were finally closed. The theological department went into operation in December, 1832, when Drs. Lyman Beecher and T. J. Biggs were formally inducted into office. Professor Calvin E. Stowe, D.D., entered upon his duties in the following July, and Baxter Dickinson, D.D., in October, 1835.

Among those who have served the seminary since its organization, next to Dr. Beecher, the name of D. Howe Allen, D.D., is especially conspicuous. He was professor of sacred rhetoric from 1840 to 1861, and from that date till 1867

LANE.
LANFRANC, thirty-fourth Archbishop of Canterbury, one of the most prominent instruments in the revival of church and theology in France and England in the eleventh century; the defender of the doctrine of transubstantiation against Berengar of Tours; and the assistant of William the Conqueror in the conquest of England. It was because he was indispensable to the organization of the English Church, and had an understanding with William (Freeman, vol. iv. p. 95), that he refused the archbishopric of Rouen in 1067, and three years later accepted the archbishopric of Canterbury. With this view his reluctance to assume the latter office is quite compatible; the rudeness of the clergy, and especially the revolt of the Anglo-Saxons against the dominion of the Church, offering not incon siderable difficulties. He contributed much to the establishment of the Norman dominion by the concentration of the hierarchy in Canterbury; the metropolitan of York being made, by the synods of Winchester and Windsor (1072), subject to Canterbury. With diplomatic skill he gradually displaced the native prelates and abbots; so that at last Wulfstan was the only Anglo-Saxon occupying a bishopric. Otherwise he was an enlightened prelate, insisting upon the reformation of conventional life, and the pursuit of literature.

In his relation to Rome, Lanfranc advocated the reforms of Hildebrand, to whom he offered, upon the whole, loyal obedience; but he insisted upon the king's independence, even in ecclesiastical affairs. The decision of Lanfranc was enforced by him (at the synod of Winchester, 1078) for the higher clergy; the parochial clergy being allowed to retain their wives, but all clergymen being forbidden to marry in the future. In some instances he espoused the side of his sovereign against the Pope, and even refused to answer at Rome when (1081) the Pope demanded his presence, with the threat of suspension if he did not comply. He outlived the Conqueror (d. 1087), and reluctantly acquiesced in his request to crown William Rufus king.

Lanfranc was more prominent as an ecclesiastical administrator than as a writer. But the succeeding generations were loud in their praises of his literary achievements; and we cannot doubt, that, so long as he remained in Normandy, he took a prominent place as a teacher and author. Milo Crispinus says that Athens appeared again at Bec under his influence: and William of Malmesbury describes the convent there as a great and famous literary gymnasion, and calls him the most learned man of his time (De Gest. reg. Angl., i., iii.). It is not necessary to give other testimonies of a like intent. To him we must, at any rate, accord a foremost place among those who contributed to the revival of learning in the eleventh century. He was a skilled dialectician, and proposed an emendation of the Vulgate, which probably was meant to extend only to the correction of the copies. But there are no evidences of speculative ability in his writings.

The most important of Lanfranc's works is the Liber de corpore et sanguine Domini ("The Body and Blood of Christ"), which is composed of twenty-three chapters, written in an epistolar form. It teaches the doctrine of transubstantiation, and was meant to be a defence of it against such as the impossibility of Christ's body being in the eleventh century. He was a skilled diamoral, as well as on the ecclesiastical, history of the countrymen. he published several works, the chief of which is the History of New South Wales. He took an active interest in the union of the Presbyterian churches, and in establishing the Presbyterian college. The large place he filled in Church and State was evinced by the presence of seventy thousand people at his funeral, including the most distinguished men in the community of different denominations.

LANG, Joachim, b. at Gardelegen in Altmark, Oct. 26, 1670; d. at Halle, May 7, 1744. He was educated at Quedlinburg and Magdeburg, and studied theology at Leipzig, where he became intimately acquainted with A. H. Francke, whom he followed to Erfurt (1690) and Halle (1691). In 1693 he settled in Berlin, first as private tutor, afterwards as rector of the Friederichswerdersches college. In Berlin he conversed much with Spener; and when, in 1703, he was appointed professor of theology at Halle, he became the literary representative of the Pietists. He was an exceedingly prolific writer. In his controversy with the orthodox, represented by Löscher, he wrote Idea theologica pseudorthodoxae (1706), Aufrichtige Nachricht (1707—14, 5 vols.), Antithese-ortho dixia (1709—11), Richtigere Mittelstrasse (1712—14, 4 vols., etc.). In his controversy with C. Wolff, the philosopher, he wrote Causa Dei (1723), Mo deser disquisition, Nova anatome (1726), etc. Though he succeeded in having Wolff expelled from Halle, he could not prevent him from returning triumphantly, while he himself was ordered to stop writing against him. He also published a number of historical, dogmatical, and exegetical works, and an autobiography (incomplete), Leipzig, 1744.

WAGENMANN.
LANIGAN, John, Irish Roman-Catholic priest; b. in Cashel, 1758; d. at Finglas, near Dublin, July 7, 1828. He was educated at the Irish college at Rome, where he took a doctor's degree. Subsequently he was professor of "Hebrew, divinity, and the Scriptures" in Pavia, but in 1786 appointed to a position in the record tower, Dublin, to the original duties of which, in 1796, were added those of librarian, editor, and translator for the Dublin Society. In 1821 he had to be removed to a private insane-asylum at Finglas. He was the author of the valuable works, Institutionum biblicarum (Pavia, 1794), Protestant's Apology for the Roman-Catholic Church (Dublin, 1809), Ecclesiastical History of Ireland to the Thirteenth Century (Dublin, 1822, 4 vols.; 2d ed., 1829). He also published an Irish translation of the Roman Breviary.

LANGRES, Synod of (Concilium Lingonense). Early in June, 1236, a council was held at Langres, a city of Burgundy. Sixteen canones (referring to dogmatics, church polity, and discipline) were agreed upon. Annual provincial and biennial general synods were established. The right of the people, still existing in some places, to elect generalsynods were agreed upon. There is no doubt, that, unlike many of his predecessors, he was born in England. He was educated at the university of Paris, and seems to have held a position of influence in connection with it. He there contracted a friendship with Luther. Afterward Langton went to Rome, and was made cardinal-priest of St. Chrysogonus. At the death of Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, Reginald appeared before the Pope with some monks claiming to have been a man of statesmanlike energy and abilities. He left a number of writings; e.g., a Commentary on most of the books of the Old Testament, a Hexameron on the six days of the creation, and is said to have written a Life of Richard I., etc. Stephen Langton, was also a man of much influence in his day, and was chosen archbishop of York, but not permitted by John to occupy the see. The principal authority for the events of Stephen Langton's life, but the little that we do know shows him to have been a man of statesmanlike energy and abilities. He left a number of writings; e.g., a Commentary on most of the books of the Old Testament, a Hexameron on the six days of the creation, and is said to have written a Life of Richard I., etc. Stephen's brother, Simon Langton, was also a man of much influence in his day, and was chosen archbishop of York, but not permitted by John to occupy the see. The principal authority for the events of Stephen Langton's life is the Chronicle of Roger of Wendover. See Hooker, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, ii. 657-761; the various histories of England and the Church of England, and art. INNOCENT III.

LANQUET, Hubert, b. at Viteaux, near Autun, in 1518; d. in Antwerp, Sept. 30, 1561. He studied theology, canon law, history, and natural science, in Poitiers, Padua, and Bologna; visited also Spain, and was, by the reading of Melanchthon's Loci Theologici, induced to go to Wittenberg, where he lived in Melanchthon's house from 1549 to 1560, making frequent journeys in Germany and Scandinavia. At what period he definitely embraced the Reformation is not known. In 1560 he entered the service of the elector of Saxony, and as his diplomatic agent till 1577, in Paris, Vienna, and other places. The last years of his life he spent in the Netherlands, in intimate connection with William the Silent. His letters, which are of the greatest interest for the history of his time, have been published in several collections; but the work which gives him a place in ecclesiastical history is his Vindiciae contra tyrannos, published pseudonymously in 1578, and treating in an elaborate manner the question of whether subjects (for instance, Protestants) have a right to revolt, when suppressed for their reli gion's sake by their princes. The book made a great sensation, and was translated into all European languages by Philostratus, Tyrannus, and Theodoret. It is widely known prior to the close of the fourth century, condemned emphatically by Jerome, Theodoret of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret, yet read in the eighth century; for the second Council of Nicea (787) warned against it. It was in the Latin translation that it attained circulation and, in the Latin Church, Gregory alluded to it as genuine, not by name, however, and subsequent writers followed it. It is found in Pauline manuscripts from the sixth to the fifteenth centuries, in one of the two most ancient copies of the Vulgate, and frequently in the versions, even in English, in the fifteenth century, though Wiclif and Purvey excluded it. At the revival of learning dealt its death-blow to this, as to so many other spurious pretensions. See Anger: Uber den Laodiceencenterbrief, Leipzig, 1843; and Lightfoot: St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians and to Philemon, London, 1873.

LAODICEA. 1277 LAO-TSZE.

LAODICEA was the name of several cities in Syria and Asia Minor, of which one—generally called Laodicea on the Lycus—would seem to indicate the boundary-line between Phrygia and Lydia, on the Lycus—is mentioned in the New Testament. During the latter part of the republic of Rome and the first period of the empire, the city was the capital of Greater Phrygia, and a flourishing commercial place; and an important Christian congregation was early formed there. Having suffered much at various times from earthquakes (e.g., A.D. 84), it was finally destroyed by the Turks, and is now only a heap of ruins. A council was held there between 343 and 381; and the sixty canones agreed upon there are still extant. They are exclusively of disciplinary interest. In the enumeration of the books contained in the Bible, the Apocrypha of the Old Testament and the Book of Revelation of the New Testament are left out. See HARDUIN, I.; MANSI, ii.; HEFZE, I. pp. 721-731; and LIGHTFOOT, On Colossians, pp. 1-72.

LAODICEA, the Epistle from. The allusion of Paul to an epistle from Laodicea (Col. iv. 16) has given rise to much speculation. Bishop Lightfoot, in his Commentary on the Colossians (pp. 340-360), presents an exhaustive excursion upon the subject. He thus tabulates the various theories. The epistle in question was: (1) An epistle written by the Laodiceans to (a) Paul, (b) Ephesians; (2) An epistle written by Paul from Laodicea, identical with (a) 1 Timothy, (b) 1 Thessalonians, (c) 2 Thessalonians, (d) Galatians; (3) An epistle addressed to the Laodiceans by (a) John, (b) some companion of Paul, (c) Epaphras or Luke, (d) Paul himself, (e) a lost epistle; (ii) one of the canonical epistles, (c) Hebrews, (d) Philemon, (e) Ephesians; (iii) the apocryphal epistle. Lightfoot discusses briefly but sufficiently these theories, and decides for the identification of the epistle with the canonical Ephesians. This is doubtless the true solution of the problem. The other views are either contradicted by the Greek, or actuated by a desire to withdraw from the apocryphal epistle, or else mere speculation. But, for the identification with the Epistle to the Ephesians, there are the tenable arguments that the words ἐν Ἑφεσῳ ("in Ephesus") (Eph. i. 1) are wanting in some of the best manuscripts, and are bracketed by Westcott and Hort; but, if they were omitted by the apostle, then he meant to make the epistle an encyclical; in which case it might be sent to Laodicea, and by the Laodiceans forwarded to Colossae. Against this view explains the absence of personal allusions in Ephesians, and obviates the supposition that an epistle, to which particular attention was called, has been lost.

As for the apocryphal Epistle to the Laodiceans, it is "a cento of Pauline phrases strung together without any definite connection or any clear object . . . taken chiefly from the Epistle to the Philippians. It is quite harmless, so far as falsity and stupidity combined can ever be regarded as harmless." It was probably originally written, or rather compiled, in Greek, and translated into Latin at a very early period. It is certainly a very old fragment, and is condemned emphatically by Jerome, Theodoret of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret, yet read in the Latin Church, Gregory alluded to it as genuine, not by name, however, and subsequent writers followed it. It is found in Pauline manuscripts from the sixth to the fifteenth centuries, in one of the two most ancient copies of the Vulgate, and frequently in the versions, even in English, in the fifteenth century, though Wiclif and Purvey excluded it. At length the revival of learning dealt its death-blow to this, as to so many other spurious pretensions. See Anger: Uber den Laodiceencenterbrief, Leipzig, 1843; and Lightfoot: St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians and to Philemon, London, 1873.

LAOS, an Asiatic people inhabiting the eastern portion of Siam. They have all the characteristics of the Siamese, by whom their country, which up to that time had been independent, was subjugated in 1828. They number about one million five hundred thousand. The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church (United States) established a mission among the Laos in 1867. The chief station is Chiang-Mai, five hundred miles north of Bangkok. There were in 1882 two clerical, one medical, and one female missionary connected with the mission, with a hundred and twenty-seven native communicants, fifty of whom were added in 1881.

LÄO-TSZE, the reputed founder of the Chinese religion called "Taoism." He was born about 604 B.C., near the present Kwei-te, in Ho-nan province, China; d. at an unknown place and time, probably at a great age. In 475 B.C. he met Kung-fu-tsze (Confucius), and the brief account of their interview is the only fact of interest concerning him. He was keeper of the archives at the court of Chuan, and it was to learn something about the ancient rites and ceremonies of Chuan that Confucius came to him. Foreseeing the downfall of Chuan, Lao retired to a far country, stopping, however, long enough with Yin Hsé to write for him the remarkable volume, in five thousand characters, on the subject of Tao (the Way) and Teh (Virtue), called Téo Teh King. Lao was a philosopher, as his name ("the Old Philosopher") implies. His great work, Tío Teh King, is translated in Legge's Chinese Classics, and in Chalmers' The Speculations of the "Old Philosopher" Lau-tsze. It is, however, not throughout intelligible even to native Chinese scholars, much less to other readers. It may be briefly described as an ethical treatise, in which the duties of the individual and the State are set forth. Lao lays great stress upon humility and upon gentleness, and, in one sentence at least, approaches Christian ethics. "It is the way of Tao not to act from any personal motive, to conduct affairs without feeling the trouble of them, to taste without being aware of the flavor, to account the great as small, and the small as great, to recompense injury with kindness." Lao was LAPSED. 1278

LAPLACE, a theist, although he is not explicit on this point. "There is hardly a word in his treatise which savors either of superstition or religion." It is now agreed that the word "Jehovah" does not occur in it, as was fancied; and so the supposition that Lao was inspired, or else had contact with the true religion in some shape, is baseless.

Taoism is to-day one of the Chinese religions, ranking with Confucianism and Buddhism; but it is only in small measure based upon Lao's teachings, and is so vastly inferior in its conceptions, that Dr. Legge says "he ought not to bear the obloquy" of being its founder. Taoism did not come up until five hundred years after Lao's death. At first it was little more than a belief in magic. In the first century before Christ, the head of the sect was a wonderful magician; and the present acknowledged "pope" of Taoism is one of this magician's descendants. In the first Christian century, Taoism took on more of the outward semblance of a religion, borrowing from Buddhism, the true religion in some shape, is baseless. It is to occur in it, as was fancied; and so the supposition that Lao was inspired, or else had contact with the true religion in some shape, is baseless.

In the present form it is a system of the "wildest polytheism," and of base and dangerous superstitions, — alchemy, geomancy, and spiritualism. The morals of its priests and nuns are notoriously low. Professor Douglas says, "Every trace of philosophy and truth has disappeared from it; and in place of the keen search after the infinite, to which Lao-tze devoted himself, the highest ambition of his priestly followers is to learn how best to impose on their countrymen by the vainest of superstitions, and to practise on their credulity by tricks of legerdemain." See TAOISM.

LAPLACE, Josué de. See PLACERIS.

LAPLAND, See Sweden, Thomas of Western.

LAPSE, the slip or omission of a patron to present a clergyman to a benefice within six months after it becomes void.

Lapsed, The (lapsi), were those baptized and catholic Christians (under certain circumstances, also catechumens) who, in periods of persecution, either disavowed their faith publicly and explicitly, or, by means not recognized by Christian morals, eluded their duty of profession. There were, however, in the ancient Church, different opinions, both with respect to the definition of the fact itself, and with respect to its disciplinary treatment. The question ran through a long development, and did not arrive at a final answer until long after the time of Diecletian. Nevertheless, in the third century, and more especially in the years of the Decian and Valerian persecutions, the controversy reached its point of culmination.

Open profession is demanded in the Gospels, and a verdict of condemnation pronounced against such as dissavow their faith (Matt. x. 33; Mark viii. 38; Luke ix. 25, xii. 9). The Epistle to the Hebrews and the First Epistle of Peter exhort to constancy under the sufferings of persecution. During the first century, however, the general state of affairs was quite favorable to the young congregations. The danger of relapses into Paganism or Judaism was not great; and, when it first showed itself, the congregations were to have courage to brave it. In the time of Trajan, the Roman officials knew very well that the true Christian could not be forced to participate in the Pagan sacrifices. (See the Letter of Pliny to Trajan.) The Christian apologists after Justin say, that, in general, the Christians continued faithful; and Roman and Greek writers of the second century — such as Marcus Aurelius, Lucian, Celsus, and others — speak often of the fanatical contempt of death evinced by the Christians.

Indeed, a passion for martyrdom grew up in the congregations, looked upon with dissatisfaction by the more sober and self-controlled members. That martyrdom could become a duty was generally accepted throughout the Church: people only differed with respect to the point at which the duty entered. Some considered it legitimate to flee from persecution and martyrdom, while the Montanists declared that every true Christian should seek martyrdom. Nevertheless, it must not be overlooked, that, during the second and third centuries, the danger of relapse was really great. Many fell away, and their number increased with every new persecution. Pastor Hermas contains many striking illustrations of the effect which the persecutions of Trajan and Hadrian had on the congregation of Rome. He enumerates the various motives of apostasy, and notices that relapses occurred also in perfectly quiet times. What a disorganizing and almost dissolving influence the Decian and Valerian persecutions exercised is apparent from the letters of Cyprian, and his treatise, De lapsis. Eusebius throws a veil over the whole affair; but that which can be seen through the veil is sufficient to show that the number of apostates was fearful, and yet the amount of open apostasy was probably small in comparison with that of defection more or less concealed.

After 250, different classes of lapsi were distinguished, — sacrificati, who had sacrificed; thruficati, who had burned incense before the images of the gods; libellaci, who by bribery had procured a passport, or ticket, or letters-patent, exempting them from any further interference from the side of the officials; and traditores, who had delivered up their sacred books. At the same time a change took place in the disciplinary treatment of the lapsi. In the second century it was generally accepted throughout the Church that a Christian who had relapsed into idolatry could under no circumstances be re-admitted to the congregation. Repentance and penitence were not sufficient: only open profession under a new trial, and martyrdom, could blot out the guilt. But in the middle of the third century, milder views were adopted. In 250 Cyprian and the Roman clergy still felt uncertain about the question; but gradually the milder practice prevailed in the churches of Carthage, Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, and between 321 and 325 a complete system of penitential rules was elaborated by the bishops. Not only was a distinction made between sacrificati and libellatici, etc., but regard was paid to the individual circumstances of each case, thus gradually transforming the penitential into a system of casuistry. The oldest and most important of such penitential decisions are the Liber de paenitentia by Petrus Alexandrinus, the canones, 1-4 of the synod of Elvira (306), 1-9 of the synod of Ancyra (314), and 10-14 of the synod of Nicara (325). See Morinus: De disciplina, 1651; Steitz: Das römische Buessensament, 1854; Frank: Die Buessens diesel der Kirche bis zum 7. Jahrhunder, 1809.

ADOLF HARNACK.

LARDNER, Nathaniel, b. at Hawkhurst, Kent, June 6, 1684; d. there July 24, 1768. He was educated at an academy in Hoxton Square, and at Utrecht, where, in 1699, he continued his studies. He then removed to Leyden for six months, and returned to London in 1703. He devoted himself for six years longer to those studies which made him so eminently learned. He was for a time chaplain to Lady Treby; and under her roof, after travelling in the Netherlands, he resided until the time of her death. Here he had ample opportunities for pursuing those researches which qualified him for the work he afterwards accomplished. No orator (indeed, very defective in elocution), he was unfitted to make an impression in the pulpit; and consequently the only charge he had in early life was an assistantship to his father, Mr. Richard Lardner. That still further incapacitated him for ministerial work was his extreme deafness; for he said, "When I sit in the pulpit, and the congregation is singing, I can hardly tell whether they are singing or not." His learning, however, eminently qualified him for lecturing; and in this important employment we find him engaged in 1728, when a course of lectures was "set on foot, on a Tuesday evening, for the purpose of sitting and defending the evidences of natural and revealed religion." These lectures no doubt contained the germs of his great work on The Credibility of the Gospel History, which he published by degrees in two unequal volumes, the first part in 1733; the second volume of the second part, in 1735; the third volume of that part, in 1738; the fourth, in 1740; the fifth, in 1743; the sixth, in 1745; the seventh, in 1748; the eighth, in 1750; the ninth, in 1752; the tenth, in 1753; the eleventh, in 1754; and the twelfth, in 1755. The dates are interesting. Oaks do not grow like larches; and such a work as Lardner's was the work of a lifetime. There can be no doubt that the treasures of learning in reference to Christianity contained in these volumes have supplied capital not only for Paley, but a good many more. Indeed, Gibbon owed much to this author. Lardner published many other books besides his magnum opus, and particularly unfolded his views of the person of Christ in his True Doctrine of the New Testament on that subject, in which he says that the Logos who is "manfully dwelt in the humanity of Jesus; that he was miraculously conceived, and possessed "divine qualities or perfections." We have not space to enumerate all which Lardner published; but it will be found in the handsome edition of his works in ten volumes, edited by Kippis in 1829. The history of his books is the history of his life; but it should be added that they attracted toward him learned men of all sorts, who, provided with pen and ink and paper, laborediously communicated with the poor deaf scholar. As to ecclesiastical government, he ranks with English Presbyterians. A life of him is prefixed to his works.

JOHN SToughton.

LA SALLE, Jean Baptiste de, founder of the Ignorantines (see art.); b. at Rheims, 1651; d. at Rouen, 1719. He entered holy orders, took the degree of doctor of theology from the university of Paris, and became a canon at Rheims. In 1831 he began his free schools for youth; and so great was the success of his rules, that he founded a teaching order of religions. Benedict XII. approved his design; and the order adopted the name Freres des Ecoles cireliennes, otherwise known as Ignorantines. La Salle was canonized in 1852 by Pius IX. See his Life by Abbe Ayma, Aix, 1858.

LA SAUSSAYE, Daniel Chantepie de, Dutch theologian, b. at The Hague, Dec. 10, 1816; d. in Groningen, Feb. 13, 1874. He was educated at the university of Leyden. He was pastor at Leeuwardes (1842-48), at Leyden (1848-52), at Rotterdam (1862-72), and in the latter year was appointed professor of biblical and dogmatical theology at Groningen. He received the degree of D.D. from Bonn, in 1858. His fame rests upon his distinguished services in combating the negative and rationalistic views of the Leyden school, especially its founder, J. H. Scholten. He was a fervent orator, impressed with the supernatural origin of Christianity, and eager in its defence. His works are not, however, of permanent value. See list in Lichtenberger's Encyclopedie des sciences religieuses, vol. xii. p. 692.

LASCO, Johannes a, or Jan Lasiczky, b. in 1534; d. about 1600. Of his personal life very little is known. Several years he spent in foreign countries,—as a student at the universities of Basel, Bern, and Zürich; as a tutor to young noblemen; and as a diplomatical agent. During his youth the Reformation reached Poland; and, though not a theologian, he devoted his life to the cause. He took a special interest in the Bohemian Brethren, settled since 1518 in Poland. He wrote an outline of their history,—De origine et institutio fratrum cibrist., etc. (1587-89),—and, afterwards, an elaborate work on the subject, De origine et rebus gestis Frat. Bohem., which, however, has never been published complete. Only a part of it has been printed by Amos Comenius, 1640.

LASCIO, Johannes a, or Jan Lasaki, b. in Warsaw, 1499; d. on his estate, near Kricic, Jan. 13, 1560. Descending from one of the oldest, richest, and most distinguished families of the Polish nobility, but a younger son, he was educated for the Church, and went, when twenty-five years old, abroad, to finish his education. He visited Louvain, Zürich (where he made the "manifestance of Zwingli), and Basel, where he lived in the house of Erasmus. Returning home in 1528, he was rapidly promoted; but when the king, in 1533, offered him the episcopal see of Cujavien, he declined, proclaimed his adoption of the Reformation, and left his native country. Frisia became his first field of labor in the cause of his new faith. In 1542 he was appointed pastor of Emden, and superintendent of the whole country. The situation was difficult: on the one side, the Roman Catholics with their intrigues; on the other, the sectarians with their violence. But A Lasco was possessed of a great talent for administration and organization; and in the course of a few years he succeeded in founding and consolidating the Protestant Church on Reformed principles, and with a strongly marked system of discipline. In 1549 the Interim drove him away, and he went to London, where he founded the Foreign Protestant Congregation, whose constitution—Forma ac ratio tota ecclesiastici Ministerii, etc., London, 1550—is an exact and interesting document. After the death of Edward VI. (in 1553) and the accession of Mary, that congregation was not allowed to live in London any longer. A Lasco hoped to find a safe refuge for his flock in Denmark; but having arrived at Elsinor in October, 1556, he learned that his congregation was not permitted to stay in the country during the winter. Under unspeakable sufferings, they were ordered to proceed farther; and when they finally, at Christmas, landed at Rostock and Lubeck, new and still harder persecutions were raised against them from the side of the Lutheran clergy and magistrates. Not until Easter, 1554, A Lasco succeeded in bringing his flock in haven at Emden. While preparing himself to spend the rest of his life at Emden, an invitation arrived from Poland, calling him home. King Sigismund August was favorably inclined towards the Reformation, and in 1556 A Lasco was settled at Krotice as superintendent of the Reformed congregations of Little Poland. The principal fruit of his labors during those years was the Polish translation of the Bible, undertaken by a number of scholars under his supervision.

LTA.-The collected works of A Lasco were edited by A. Kuyper, Amsterdam, 1866, 2 vols. His life was written by Bortels (Elberfeld, 1861) (and Dalton (Gotha, 1881). See also KRASINSKI: Sketch of the Reformation in Poland, London, 1838, 2 vols. and F. NITZSCH.

LATERAN CHURCH. The term "Lateran Councils" denotes generally all synods convened in the Lateran basilica in Rome, but refers more especially to those five which are recognized by the Church of Rome as ecumenical,—1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, and 1512. The name of the place points back to old Rome, one of whose most magnificent palaces was the Domus Faustina, after whose name the basilica was dedicated. It was originally dedicated to Christ the Saviour (Salvator), but came in the sixth century to bear the name of St. John the Baptist. It was also called "Basilica Constantina," after its founder; or "Basilica aurea" on account of its magnificence. It burnt down in the tenth century, and was rebuilt by Sergius III. The present structure dates from the middle of the seventeenth century. The Church of the Lateran is considered the mother-church of Christendom (Omnium Urbi et Orbis Ecclesiarum Matre et Caput). It is the Papal cathedral, and every new Pope takes possession of it with great solemnity.

The first Lateran council (in the narrower sense of the words) took place in 1123, under Calixtus III. (Mansi: Concil. Collect., xxii. 49). It was convened by Urban II., the papal legates, and the bishops of Rome. The council was summoned to depose the antipope Anacletus II., and to put down the heresy of Simon of Freising. The council elected Urban II., who was consecrated by Calixtus III. The council was adjourned to Rome, where it met again in 1125, and dissolved itself under the influence of the presence of the new Pope. The council was called "Basilica Constantina," after its founder; or "Basilica aurea" on account of its magnificence. It burnt down in the tenth century, and was rebuilt by Sergius III. The present structure dates from the middle of the seventeenth century. The Church of the Lateran is considered the mother-church of Christendom (Omnium Urbi et Orbis Ecclesiarum Matre et Caput). It is the Papal cathedral, and every new Pope takes possession of it with great solemnity.

The first Lateran council (in the narrower sense of the words) took place in 1123, under Calixtus III. (Mansi: Concil. Collect., xxii. 49). It was convened by Urban II., the papal legates, and the bishops of Rome. The council was summoned to depose the antipope Anacletus II., and to put down the heresy of Simon of Freising. The council elected Urban II., who was consecrated by Calixtus III. The council was adjourned to Rome, where it met again in 1125, and dissolved itself under the influence of the presence of the new Pope. The council was called "Basilica Constantina," after its founder; or "Basilica aurea" on account of its magnificence. It burnt down in the tenth century, and was rebuilt by Sergius III. The present structure dates from the middle of the seventeenth century. The Church of the Lateran is considered the mother-church of Christendom (Omnium Urbi et Orbis Ecclesiarum Matre et Caput). It is the Papal cathedral, and every new Pope takes possession of it with great solemnity.

The first Lateran council (in the narrower sense of the words) took place in 1123, under Calixtus III. (Mansi: Concil. Collect., xxii. 49). It was convened by Urban II., the papal legates, and the bishops of Rome. The council was summoned to depose the antipope Anacletus II., and to put down the heresy of Simon of Freising. The council elected Urban II., who was consecrated by Calixtus III. The council was adjourned to Rome, where it met again in 1125, and dissolved itself under the influence of the presence of the new Pope. The council was called "Basilica Constantina," after its founder; or "Basilica aurea" on account of its magnificence. It burnt down in the tenth century, and was rebuilt by Sergius III. The present structure dates from the middle of the seventeenth century. The Church of the Lateran is considered the mother-church of Christendom (Omnium Urbi et Orbis Ecclesiarum Matre et Caput). It is the Papal cathedral, and every new Pope takes possession of it with great solemnity.

The first Lateran council (in the narrower sense of the words) took place in 1123, under Calixtus III. (Mansi: Concil. Collect., xxii. 49). It was convened by Urban II., the papal legates, and the bishops of Rome. The council was summoned to depose the antipope Anacletus II., and to put down the heresy of Simon of Freising. The council elected Urban II., who was consecrated by Calixtus III. The council was adjourned to Rome, where it met again in 1125, and dissolved itself under the influence of the presence of the new Pope. The council was called "Basilica Constantina," after its founder; or "Basilica aurea" on account of its magnificence. It burnt down in the tenth century, and was rebuilt by Sergius III. The present structure dates from the middle of the seventeenth century. The Church of the Lateran is considered the mother-church of Christendom (Omnium Urbi et Orbis Ecclesiarum Matre et Caput). It is the Papal cathedral, and every new Pope takes possession of it with great solemnity.

The first Lateran council (in the narrower sense of the words) took place in 1123, under Calixtus III. (Mansi: Concil. Collect., xxii. 49). It was convened by Urban II., the papal legates, and the bishops of Rome. The council was summoned to depose the antipope Anacletus II., and to put down the heresy of Simon of Freising. The council elected Urban II., who was consecrated by Calixtus III. The council was adjourned to Rome, where it met again in 1125, and dissolved itself under the influence of the presence of the new Pope. The council was called "Basilica Constantina," after its founder; or "Basilica aurea" on account of its magnificence. It burnt down in the tenth century, and was rebuilt by Sergius III. The present structure dates from the middle of the seventeenth century. The Church of the Lateran is considered the mother-church of Christendom (Omnium Urbi et Orbis Ecclesiarum Matre et Caput). It is the Papal cathedral, and every new Pope takes possession of it with great solemnity.
of Clare Hall in 1509. According to Strype, he was remarkable during his university career for the "sanctimony of his life." He was at that time a bitter opponent of the Reformation, and his bachelor's oration was directed against the views of Melancthon. Of the period he at a later time said from the pulpit, "I was as obstinate a Papist as any in England." Coming in contact, however, with Bilney, who heard his bachelor's oration, he was impressed with his confession of the faith of the Reformers, and finally accepted their views himself. As soon as his change of opinion became known, whole "swarms of friars and doctors," as Foxe puts it, "flocked against Master Latimer on every side." At Christmas, 1529, he delivered his famous sermons On the Card, in which he represents himself and congregation as playing at triumph,—a game of cards something like whist. These and other sermons attracted so much attention, and so full of keen hits against the then state of the clergy in England, that the Bishop of Ely forbade him preaching in his diocese; but the Augustine friars opened their church to him, which was exempt from episcopal authority. The Papists appealed to Wolsey, who held a court at York to decide the case, but acquitted the accused. He was appointed by his university one of its representatives to examine into the lawfulness of the king's divorce, and was in favor of it. In 1539 (Dec. 1) he wrote to the king, pleading "for the restoring again of the free liberty of reading" the Scriptures. He was made a royal chaplain, and preached often in London, but was soon offered his rectory of West Kington, Wiltshire. While incumbent of this parish, he was cited to London, where he submitted to convocation. But Stokesley, the bishop of London, was so little satisfied, that he forbade his preaching in his diocese. In 1535 he was raised, through the influence of Anne Boleyn and Cromwell, to the see of Worcester, which he, however, administered only for four years. When the Six Articles were passed (in 1539), he begged for leave to confer with his countrymen. With Hooper he was one of the most powerful preachers of his day in England. This power was derived from his bold temper, directness of statement, fearless denunciation of the extravagances of doctrine and immoralities of life of the clergy, and his sense of humor. Perhaps he approaches nearer than any of the English Reformers to Luther in the earnestness of his manner, the bluntness of his style, and the keen tone of his practical exhortations. "He spake nothing, but it left, as it were, certain pricks and stings in the hearts of his hearers, which moved them to consent to his doctrine. None but the stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart went away from his sermons without being affected with high detestation of sin," etc. (Bacon: Jewel of joy). He was plain of speech, and spared not the abuses of the Church of his day. He held, in general, to all the fundamental views of the Reformation,—the distinction of the Roman and the Catholic Church, the use of the vulgar tongue in worship, the abolition of the confessional, the spiritual conception of the sacraments, etc. One of the elements of his character upon which Dr. Tulloch lays just stress is his cheerfulness of temper. Mr. Froude, in an animated sketch of his trial and martyrdom, takes occasion to exclaim, "So stood the greatest man, perhaps, then living in the world, a prisoner on his trial, waiting to be condemned to death," etc.

LIT. — Latimer wrote no treatises, but has left behind some sermons, which are valuable as giving us an insight into his character. A complete edition of his works has been published by G. E. Corrie, in 2 vols., Cambridge, 1844, 1845. For his life, see the vivid sketch of Foxe: Book of Martyrs, Strype: Memorials (vol. iii.); William Gilpin: Life of Latimer, London, 1755; Burnet: History of the Reformation, Tulloch: Leaders of the Reformation; Demaus: Life of H. Latimer, 1899 (new edition, 1891); FroUDE: History of England (especially vol. vi.).

LATIN LANGUAGE, Use of the, in the Christian Church. Because it is the universal religion, Christianity cannot, like Judaism and Mohammedanism, confine itself to one language. In the East, the Greek, Coptic, Armenian, Arabic, Slavonic languages are used. In the West, the Roman-Catholic Church resisted against the introduction of the vernacular tongues in the service as a danger and a profanation. The Council of Trent (Sess. IV.) recognizes only the Vulgate, the Latin translation of the Bible, as the authentic text of Holy Writ in questions of doctrine, in cases of canon law, and in every-day use for devotional purposes and the cure of souls. Less exclusively the council expresses itself with respect to the use of the Latin language in the administration of the sacraments. It says, "Although the mass contains great instruction for the faithful people, nevertheless, it has not seemed expedient to the Fathers that it should be everywhere celebrated in the vulgar tongue." It enjoins, however, the explanation of the mysteries to the people, but anathematizes those who say "that the mass ought to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue only." (Sess. XXII. c. VIII. and can. ix. Compare Schaff, Creeds, ii. 183, 186.)

It was quite natural that the Church of Rome should adopt the Latin language, and carry it with her wherever she went. And during the early middle ages, when the modern European languages did not exist, but had barely entered into the process of formation, it was, no doubt, a great boon to European civilization, that there was a common language in which all public business could be transacted. Into the dark and chaotic fermentation, Latin brought the necessary light and cohesion. But there came a change. The languages gradually ripened into maturity, and the nations began to demand to have their most sacred interests served in the most effectual way. At first the popes seemed willing to assent. No objection was made to the use of the vernacular tongue when Cyrilillus and Methodius converted Bohemia. But it was soon discovered, that, in the exclusive use of the Latin language, the Church of Rome possessed one of her most effective means of consolidation, and consequently she immediately became very imperious in its defence. The reasons with which she vindicated her protest are often curious, sometimes cynical, seldom just: they have been aptly summed up by Bellarmin: Oper. iii. 119.

With the Reformation, the popular demand for the vernacular tongue in divine service became more general, and was heard in regions where theretofore the Reformation had not penetrated. In the Church of England the abrogation of the Latin language in the administration of the Lord's Supper was one of the first acts of the Reformers (see art. 24 in the Thirty-nine Articles). In the Lutheran churchs, Latinus, Lutheran, and Melanchthon, and Tyndal. A collected edition of his works was published by his nephew, Jacobus Latomus, Louvain, 1550.—Bartholomaeus Latomus, b. at Arlon, Luxemburg, in 1485; d. at Louvain, May 29, 1544. He taught Latin at Treves; was in 1514 appointed teacher of theology in the university of Louvain, and dean of St. Peter's. He was a zealous champion of scholasticism, especially of the theology of Thomas, and attacked both the Humanists (especially Erasmus) and the Reformers,—Luther, Ecolampadius, Melanchthon, and Tyndal. A collected edition of his works was published by his nephew, Jacobus Latomus, Louvain, 1550. —Bartholomaeus Latomus, b. at Arlon, Luxemburg, in 1485; d. at Coblenz in 1566. He taught Latin at Treves; rhetoric at Cologne, Freiburg, and Paris; visited Italy in 1539; and was in 1541 appointed counsellor at the electoral court of Treves, residing at Coblenz. He was a philologist, but took also part in the theological controversies of the day, and wrote against Bucer, Andrea, and others: Briefe an J. Sturm uber Kirchenpalung und Kirchen einigung, etc. WAGENMANN.

LATIN VERSIONS. See Bible Versions.

LATITUDINARIANS, the designation of a school of opinion within the Church of England, which arose in the seventeenth century. It is applied somewhat indefinitely, to men who differed quite widely in their theological opinions, and yet agreed in manifesting a spirit of toleration towards the Dissenters, and were willing to admit liberty in the use of the forms of the Episcopal Church, and even a revision of the Liturgy, in the hope of winning the Dissenters. They were thus at the opposite extreme from the High-Churchmen. In the doctrinal part of religion they laid em-phasis upon the fundamentals. Hales and Chillingworth, Cudworth, Theophilus Gale, Whitchew, Tillotson, and perhaps Stillingside, are among those who were classed as prominent representatives of this school. After the Restoration (1660) the school gained influence; some of its representatives being raised to high positions in the Church. The spiritual apathy and indifference in the Church of England in the eighteenth century has been pronounced as due to the influence of the Latitudinarians by Canon Perry (History of the English Church, student's edition, vol. ii. 514 sq.) and others, but without good reason, unless it is fair to class in the same school with Archbishop Tillotson and Cudworth men who approached very close to the Socinians and Deists. The modern representative of the Latitudinarians is the so-called "Broad Church" party in the Church of England. Those who are classed in this school are regarded as laying great stress upon the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and the Christian temper of the daily life, as opposed to that view which emphasizes unduly a rigid conformity to a ritual, and are consequently tolerant towards members of other communions. S. T. Coleridge, Dr. Arnold, Jul. Ch. Hare, F. W. Maurice, Charles Kingsley, and Dean Stanley have been among the distinguished representatives of the Broad Church party. See TULLOCH: Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in England in the Seventeenth Century. Edinburgh, 1872, 2 vols., vol. ii. pp. 6 sqq.; CHURTON: Latitudinarians from 1671 to 1787, London, 1881; and arts. CHILLINGWORTH, CUDWORTH, PLATONISTS, CAMBRIDGE, HIGH CHURCH, LOW CHURCH.

LATOMUS is a name of frequent occurrence among the scholars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Two have special theological interest. — Jacobus Latomus (Jacques Masson), b. at Cambres, Hainault, in 1475; d. at Louvain, May 29, 1544. He studied theology in Paris, and was in 1514 appointed teacher of theology in the university of Louvain, and dean of St. Peter's. He was a zealous champion of scholasticism, especially of the theology of Thomas, and attacked both the Humanists (especially Erasmus) and the Reformers,—Luther, Ecolampadius, Melanchthon, and Tyndal. A collected edition of his works was published by his nephew, Jacobus Latomus, Louvain, 1550. —Bartholomaeus Latomus, b. at Arlon, Luxemburg, in 1485; d. at Coblenz in 1566. He taught Latin at Treves; rhetoric at Cologne, Freiburg, and Paris; visited Italy in 1539; and was in 1541 appointed councillor at the electoral court of Treves, residing at Coblenz. He was a philologist, but took also part in the theological controversies of the day, and wrote against Bucer, Andrea, and others: Briefe an J. Sturm über Kirchenpalung u. Kirchen einigung, etc. WAGENMANN.

LATTER-DAY SAINTS. See Mormonism.

LAUD, William, Archbishop of Canterbury, and chief minister of state, in the reign of Charles I.; was b. Oct. 7, 1573, and d. (by the hands of the public executioner, under a bill of attainder, for high treason) Jan. 10, 1644. He was a native of Reading, Berkshire, and from a poor cloth-worker in good circumstances. His mother (by name, Lucy Webb) belonged to the same social class; and he could boast of an uncle, on the Laund. 1283

William Laud, the well-known Puritan who early became a victim of Laud's implacable persecution, was used to say that he was born of "obscure parents,"—a charge, which, strangely enough, seems to have been peculiarly obnoxious to his feelings. Heylin, his chaplain and biographer, tells us, that, after Laud had attained to the primacy, he one day was told by him that the cause was a printed sheet, which he had just received, reproaching him with "so base a parentage as if he had been raked out of a dunghill." The archbishop "added, withal, that, though he had not the good fortune to be born a gentleman, yet he thanked God he had been born of honest parents, who lived in a good condition, employed many poor people in their way, and left a good report behind them." (Cyprian Anglicus, p. 43.)

It was, however, chiefly to himself, rather than to any adventitious circumstances like those of birth, that William Laud owed the splendid success, no less than, it must be added, the grievous errors and terrible disasters, both personal and public, of one of the most remarkable careers in the history of England.

He received the elements of his education in the free grammar-school of his native town, under a "very severe schoolmaster," who, however, already found in him the promise of future distinction. At the age of sixteen he was entered as a commoner at St. John's College, Oxford, at which same college he obtained a scholarship in 1590 and a fellowship in 1594.

At college he was not only remarked for his ability, combined, it is said, with not a little self-confidence, but, under the most unfavorable circumstances, assumed the position in church policy which characterized his whole after-history. In no part of England had Puritanism, at the period, as at Oxford, in 1611; and in 1628 he was appointed to the high office of chancellor of the university, in which latter capacity it was his duty and his pride to entertain, in 1636, the king and queen as his guests during a royal visit to Oxford. In the Church, as appears from entries in his diary, he must have early enjoyed large revenues from numerous benefices, many of them held in commendam, and retained even after he had been raised to the episcopal bench. But his principal preferments included the deanery of Gloucester (1616), the bishopric of St. David's (1621), the bishopric of Bath and Wells (1628), the deanery of the Chapel Royal (1626), the bishopric of London (1629), the deanery of Westminster, and the archbishopric of Canterbury and primacy of all England (1633). He was a statesman no less than a churchman, and in the State his advancement was equally signal. He became a privy counsellor in 1627, and from that time held various high appointments in the administration of civil affairs, culminating in his selection, in the year 1628, for the office of chief minister of the state; the death of the famous Duke of Buckingham by the hands of the assassin Felton having paved the way for an elevation unprecedented in the case of any English ecclesiastic since the fall of Wolsey.

At the height of his fortune, the position of the son of the clothier of Reading must have transcended the most daring aspirations of his youth. As primate he was the first peer of the realm, being next in dignity to royalty; and in his case the high honors always appertaining to the chief minister of the Church were greatly augmented by the secular offices, hardly less lofty, which he sustained at court. "English nobles and foreign ambassadors," says Dean Hook, "paid their court to him at Lambeth. The interior courts of his palace were filled with men-at-arms and horsemen; and while holding a levee, or granting an interview, the archbishop himself held a court second only in grandeur to that of the king. Above all, Laud reached an eminence, as regards power and influence, which could not fail to be peculiarly dear to him. It does not anywhere appear, that as far as he was for place, wealth, and honors, and indefatigable (perhaps not always very scrupulous) in their pursuit, he ever cared for men for their own sakes. It seems to have been altogether free from the sordid ambition of vulgar place-hunters. He spent most of his large revenues during his life in splendid benefactions to the Church and his own university. It is to his honor that he died comparatively a poor man, and that, as appears from his will, such money or lands as remained to him at his death bequeathed, not for the enrichment of his own family, but chiefly for the encouragement of religion and learning. He sought honors and high place as the means of accomplishing public benefits, and more especially for the accomplishment of what he regarded as the true interests and welfare of the Church. In a great degree he gained the power of realizing, at least for a time, the dream of his college days. It is true that the results were disastrous, on the whole, at the moment at least, if not (for this is disputed) even in relation to the future; but, full of a great idea, he contrived to reach a place in the Church and in the State which enabled him for a time to make his will law.

What was his great aim throughout life can only be briefly indicated. He had various projects apart from that predominating design, and many of these he accomplished. Among them was the erection of new buildings at St. John's College, Oxford; the repair of St. Paul's Cathedral Church, London; the annexing, in perpetuity, some commendams to ill-endowed bishoprics; the increase of the income of poor curates; the setting-up a Greek Arabic lection at Oxford. But it is for the means he employed to carry it out, much more than for the aim he set before him, which was in itself, from an English Churchman's point of view, legitimate enough, that Laud will be generally condemned. The attempt to restore the Church by silencing Puritans and all nonconformists, as the indispensable condition of such a restoration, was the first principle of the Laudian policy. "The holy Church," wrote Wren, bishop of Norwich, "subsists not without the communion of saints. No communion with them, without union among ourselves. That union impossible, unless we preserve a uniformity for doctrine and a uniformity for discipline." (See Gardiner: Full of the Monarchy, vol. i. p. 2.) The fact now referred to is of itself sufficient; and it is hardly necessary to go into the question, how, under Laud's rule, the repression of the nonconformists was carried out. He is said to have preferred persuasion to force; but it is not denied, that, when necessary, the most horrible severities were employed under his sanction to enforce conformity. The execrable Acts of Uniformity, of Titus Oates, were well known, with hundreds of cases of dissenters, who, if not shocking themselves mutilated, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment, were silenced, and compelled to seek liberty of conscience beyond seas, or, worse than all, to violate their own sense of duty, and lose their spiritual, in seeking to save their bodily, life and well-being. Nor is it disputed, that on the Star Chamber and Court of High Commission, by which the man was found guilty in the case of Laud was the moving spirit; nay, that if, in these courts, any voice was for more than ordinarily severe measures, it was sure to be his (Gardiner: Personal History, i. 6). But perhaps the worst charge against Laud in this connection is the alleged fact, that to gain the power of suppressing the non-conformists, and otherwise securing the restoration of a pure and catholic church according to his own ideal, Laud did not hesitate to encourage in the king those absolute principles, which, if he had prevailed, instead of the Parliament, would have been fatal to the liberties of the English people.

It need only be here further noted, that Laud's prudence and sagacity were not by any means equal to his zeal as a statesman. Good intentions and bad management were said to be his characteristics. His whole life's dream as to a united church in England was visionary and impracticable. He regarded the way in which they were introduced, as having been in many respects a good man. As has already appeared, he was often rash and precipitate in public affairs; though otherwise his capacity for high office, whether in Church or State, was very great. How far he deserved well of his Church and country as regards, if not the results, at least the intentions, of his policy, is a question on which there will always be difference of opinion.

His principal writings are: a Conference with Fisher, a Jesuit, published in 1628; Answer to the Speech of Lord Saye and Seale touching the Liturgy, 1635; Seven Sermons preached on Public Occasions, 1651; A Summarie of Devotions, compiled and used by Dr. William Laud, now published according to the Copy written with his own Hand, 1667; History of the Troubles and Tryal of the most Revered Father in God and Blessed Martyr William Laud, written by Himself, 1683; several Speeches, and his Letters [very important, especially those to Lord Strafford].

LAUNAY.

LAUNAY, Pierre de, b. at Blois in 1573; d. in Paris, June 29, 1631. He held an important position in the civil service of his country, but retired in 1613 into private life, and devoted his whole time to the study of the Bible. He wrote paraphrases of the Epistles of Paul, the prophetic books, etc.; carried on a long controversy with Amyraut concerning Chiliasm, of which he was an ardent adherent; and partook with great zeal in the general life of the Reformed Church in France. His principal work, however, was not published until after his death,—Remarques sur le texte de la Bible, Geneva, 1667. This work cost him twenty years of labor. It is intended to explain the difficult words, phrases, and figures of the Bible by grouping them together under appropriate heads, and translating them with their context, without making any attempt at giving grammatical explanations. It has its uses still, although, of course, largely superseded.

LAUNOFI, Jean de, b. at Valognes, in Normandy, Dec. 21, 1603; d. in Paris, March 10, 1675. He was ordained a priest in 1633, and took his degree as doctor of divinity in 1636; but he never held a benefice. He lived in retirement, and devoted himself exclusively to literature. His principal works treat of historical subjects, and were written partly in defence of the liberties of the Gallican Church, partly in pursuit of general critical principles, attacking titles to saintship, apostolical foundation, etc. His method he defended in his De autoritate negantis argumentis, 1633. A list of his works is found in E. Du Pin: Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques, xviii, p. 58. H. F. Jacobson.

LAURA, like cenobium, denotes a monastic community, but with the difference, that, in the laura, the cells are separate structures, and the inmates live in solitude, meeting each other only on the first and last days of the week for common services in the chapel. Thus the laura, which was found only in Egypt, Syria, and Palestine, forms a transition between the hermitage and the cenobium, or monastery. The etymology of the word is uncertain. The most probable derivation is from labra (λαβρα), a term frequently used in Alexandria for an alley or small court.

LAURENTIUS, St., a pupil of Sixtus II., deacon of the Church of Rome, was martyred in the Valerian persecution (258) a few days after his master. The Roman prefect, having heard that the Christian Church was in possession of great treasures, demanded that Laurentius should surrender them. Laurentius seemed willing to comply with the demand; was released, and remaining with a host of old, poor, and sick people, paupers and cripples, said, "There are our treasures." The prefect felt insulted, and sentenced Laurentius to be roasted to death over a slow fire; and the Christians of Rome actually saw and heard how "lauding limbs were used over the coals." The festival is celebrated on Aug. 10. See AMBROSE: De offic. ministr., i. 41, ii. 28; and PRUDENTIUS: Hymn. in Laur. TH. Pressel.

LAURENTIUS, antipope to Symmachus (498). He was an arch-priest in Rome, and the choice of the imperial party, and was actually ordained by the Bishop of Rome (Nov. 22, 498) as successor of Anastasius II. The Roman party chose Symmachus, and Laurentius was made bishop of Nocera (498); but, principally in consequence of his machinations against Symmachus, although the charge of Eutychianism was brought against him, he was deposed (501), and died in exile about 520.

LAURENTIUS VALLA (Lorenzo della Valle), humanist, philologist, exegete, and critic; b. in Rome, 1406 or 1407; d. there Aug. 1, 1457. He received a very careful education; was ordained priest in 1431; published in 1433 a dissertation on the first and last days of the week for common services in the Inquisition. The king saved him. No process was instituted; and Laurentius went on increasing the scandal by furnishing a list of errors found in the Vulgate, of mistakes made by St. Jerome, and of the style employed in literature. The professors became furious, not only the theologians, but also the philosophers and the jurists. Valla left Pavia, and for some time he led a rather erratic life in Milan, Genoa, and Florence, until, in 1436, he entered the service of King Alfonso V. of Aragon, as his secretary. As the king sided with the Council of Basel against Pope Eugenius IV., Laurentiussaw fit to publish his book, Declamatio de falso credita et eminente Constantini donatione. In 1442 Alfonso took possession of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, and Laurentius took up his abode in Naples. But his denial of the genuineness of the correspondence between Christ and King Abgarus, and of the Epistola Lenticuli, and his further denial of the apological authorship of the Symbolum apostolicum, and of the identity of Dionysius of Athens with the author of the "areopagitical" writings, exasperated the monks and priests and professors to such a degree, that he was summoned before the Inquisition. The king saved him. No process was instituted; and Laurentius went on increasing the scandal by furnishing a list of errors found in the Vulgate, of mistakes made by St. Jerome, of heresies picked from the writings of St. Augustine. Nevertheless, he wished to quit Naples, and live in Rome. The first attempt he made of settling there, in 1444, when Eugenius and Alfonso had been reconciled, failed, as the lower clergy inclined the mob against him; and he was the first book, Dialogi III. de voluptate, which attracted much attention; and was appointed professor eloquentissimi at the university of Pavia, where he published the two famous books, Quaestiones dialecticae and De elegantia Latini sermonis,—open denunciations of the logic taught in the schools and of the style employed in literature. The professors became furious, not only the theologians, but also the philosophers and the jurists.

Among the Italian humanists, Laurentius Valla was one of those who most earnestly desired to clean the entire at the university of Avignon, where he published the two famous books, Quaestiones dialecticae and De elegantia Latini sermonis,—open denunciations of the logic taught in the schools and of the style employed in literature. The professors became furious, not only the theologians, but also the philosophers and the jurists.

Among the Italian humanists, Laurentius Valla was one of those who most earnestly desired to clean the entire library of the university of Avignon, where he published the two famous books, Quaestiones dialecticae and De elegantia Latini sermonis,—open denunciations of the logic taught in the schools and of the style employed in literature. The professors became furious, not only the theologians, but also the philosophers and the jurists.

Among the Italian humanists, Laurentius Valla was one of those who most earnestly desired to clean the entire library of the university of Avignon, where he published the two famous books, Quaestiones dialecticae and De elegantia Latini sermonis,—open denunciations of the logic taught in the schools and of the style employed in literature. The professors became furious, not only the theologians, but also the philosophers and the jurists.

Among the Italian humanists, Laurentius Valla was one of those who most earnestly desired to clean the entire library of the university of Avignon, where he published the two famous books, Quaestiones dialecticae and De elegantia Latini sermonis,—open denunciations of the logic taught in the schools and of the style employed in literature. The professors became furious, not only the theologians, but also the philosophers and the jurists.

Among the Italian humanists, Laurentius Valla was one of those who most earnestly desired to clean the entire library of the university of Avignon, where he published the two famous books, Quaestiones dialecticae and De elegantia Latini sermonis,—open denunciations of the logic taught in the schools and of the style employed in literature. The professors became furious, not only the theologians, but also the philosophers and the jurists.
spread over the world. His Declamatio was first printed without date or place, and then, in 1517, by Hutten, with a dedication to Leo X. Erasmus edited his Annotationes in N. T., Paris, 1505. Collected editions of his works (though not complete) appeared at Basel, 1540-49, and Venice, 1592.

Lit. — See TIRABOSCHI: Storia della lett. ital. vi. 3. Independent monographs have been written by CHRISTOP. FOGGIALI (Piacenza, 1790), J. WILDSCHEUT (Leyden, 1830), JOH. CLAUSEN (Copenhagen, 1861), and D. G. MONRAD (Gottha, 1861).

LAVATER, Johann Kaspar, a distinguished Swiss divine, poet, physiognomist, and philanthropist; the twelfth child of a physician; b. in Zürich, Nov. 15, 1741; d. in Zürich, Jan. 2, 1801. As a child he was awkward, dreamy, and misunderstood. He early displayed a decided religious nature, and devoted much time to the study of the Bible. After studying theology in Zürich, he became widely known by his spirited denunciation of the landvegt, Felix Grebel, formalver of the church at the Orphian-house at Zürich. In 1763 he went, in company with two friends, to Germany, and studied with Spalding in Pomerania, — the best representative of the Pietistic revival. It was not till 1768 that he received his first appointment as deacon of the church at the Orphan-house at Zürich. In 1786 he became pastor of the great St. Peter's Church. He was very popular as a preacher, effective as a pastor, and beloved as a man; so that no induction — not even the flattering call that no inducement — not even the flattering call to the Ansgar Church, Bremen, 1786 — was strong enough to lure him away from Zürich. His sermons, many of which were published, are not models, but are characterized by earnestness, biblical solemnity, and clear testimony to Jesus Christ. He attracted a large circle of friends, both at home and abroad. Not to speak of others, we mention Goethe, Herder, Hamann, Fr. Stolberg, Oberlin, and Hasencamp, with whom he maintained a regular correspondence, and that with Goethe, Herder, and Hasencamp, has been published. Goethe once said of him, "He is the best, greatest, wisest, and sincerest of all the men that I know." But after Lavater's visit to him in Weimar, in 1786, their friendship cooled.

Lavater was a voluminous writer, but his greatness does not depend upon his literary achievements. He wrote far too much and too superficially. He is himself guilty of the gossipy, "night-gown style" (Schlafrockmanier) which he condemned in others. Nevertheless, many a rich gold vein glitters from the dull quartz of his composition. He made his début as a poet, and continued to write poetry till his dying hour. He composed many hymns; the best-known collection of which appeared under the title, 200 christl. Lieder ("Two Hundred Christian Hymns"). (One of his best, which is very popular where German congregations are, is, in his own words, "the hymn to the King of Kings, which I composed when I was a virgin, and which in God's service I can now sing.") With Klopotock for a master, he composed the Apocalypse (1780), and paraphrases of the Gospels and Epistles in epigrammatic verse [Jesus Messias, oder d. Evangelien u. Apostelgesch. in Gestungen, 1783-86]. He was engaged for a long time over a philosophical poem on the future life, but published in its stead four volumes under the title Aussichten in d. Ewigkeit ("Outlooks into Eternity"), in which he gives his imagination the rein, and pictures a good many things about which the Bible is silent. He excelled most, however, as a composer of brief proverbial lines, and published several volumes of this kind, — Solomon (or doctrines of wisdom), 1785, and Vermischte unphysiognomische Regeln zur Menschkenntniss, 1787-88 ("Miscellaneous Unphysiognomic Rules for judging of Men"), which have not been surpassed. Lavater wrote extensively in the department of the practical philosophy of life. In this connection it is interesting to note his relations with Mendelssohn the philosopher. Lavater had translated Bonnet's Palingenesis, and, regarding his arguments for God's existence irrefutable, he dedicated the book to Mendelssohn, with the demand that he should either refute the arguments, or hopefully acknowledge the truth, and become a Christian. To this the philosopher very coolly replied, that his religion, philosophy, and civil relations, alike obliged him to avoid controversies about the merits of particular religions. His greatest work, and the one by which his name is best known to the world, was the Physiognomische Fragmente z. Beförderung d. Menschenkenntniss u. Menschenliebe ("Physiognomic Fragments to advance the Knowledge of Men and Love amongst Men"), which appeared in four large volumes (1775-78), enriched with innumerable pictures and silhouettes. The author here seeks to build up a science of physiognomy from the judgments which men form from the lineaments of the face. He started from the principle that these correspond to the feelings of the heart. The manuscript was sent to Goethe, who added some sections; as, for example, the one on the physiognomies of animals. Lavater was confident that his work would contribute to the welfare of mankind, and spent not only much labor, but much of his income, upon it, and in gathering a collection of engravings, silhouettes, etc., of celebrated men, which is said to be preserved to this day in Vienna. Of his other writings, Pönitus Pilatus (1782-85, 4 vols.) and Nathanael (1786) are to be mentioned. Both are apologetic. The former answered Pilate's question, "What is truth?" from the teachings of Christ about God, the Devil, the Son of God, the forgiveness of sins, etc.: the latter, directed to persons of honest hearts, adduces those who believed in Christ as the witnesses for the power of his gospel. Besides these works, he wrote a great number of smaller works of a devotional character, some of which are used to this day.

Lavater was a strictly evangelical divine, and became the object of ridicule from some quarters by his strict views of inspiration and the gifts of the Spirit, the value of prayer, etc. He avoided dogmatic forms of expression, and laid far more stress on biblical than on theological orthodoxy. He was also an ardent patriot, and, during the French Revolution and the subsequent wars, took a bold course against the rule of the French in Switzerland. He was taken prisoner, for a patriotic sermon, to Basel. His return to Zürich, on the 16th of August, 1799, was hailed by a general jubilation; but, after the battle with Massens in Zürich (Sept. 26), he was shot through the breast by a French grenadier, without provocation and while engaged on an errand of mercy. He lin-
LAY PREACHING.

Law was a fearless non-juror, and, in consequence, a man of strong individuality, strong will, and undaunted courage, and, as a living embodiment of Christian truth and temper, the most important man of his century. Lives of Law have been written by Gessner (Zurich, 1802, 3 vols.), Herbst (Ausbach, 1832), Bodemann (Gotha, 1836; 2d ed., 1877 sq.), and especially Möriken, in his Schweizerische Literatur d. 18. Jahrhunderts, pp. 822-400, Leipzig, 1881. Von Orelli edited a selection from his works in eight small volumes, Zurich, 1845.

JUSTUS HEER.

LAY PREACHING. See Lay Preaching.
probably did not receive an apostolic visit until it had been several years in existence (Acts xi. 19–26). The same, in all probability, was true of the church at Rome and at many other places. Doubtless, the greater simplicity of primitive church worship encouraged unofficial effort in their assemblies, which resembled our prayer meetings more than our Lord's Day worship; and the energy of their faith and the fervor of their love sent them forth to preach the Saviour. Hatch says, "It is clear, from both the Acts of the Apostles and St. Paul's Epistles, that 'liberty of prophesying' prevailed in the apostolic age. It is equally clear that [it] existed after the apostolic age. In the first place, one of the most interesting monuments of the second century consists of a sermon or homily (the so-called Second Epistle of Clement) which was preached, probably, by a layman at Rome. In the second place, the Apostolical Constitutions [8, 31], which are of even later date, expressly contemplate the existence of preaching by laymen. 'Even if a teacher be a layman, still if he be skilled in the word, and reverence in habit, let him be allowed,' says the author."

In quite usual consequence was, that Methodism marvellously increased. Lay preaching has the ampler scriptural warrant; and he has several manifest advantages over the regular minister, as that the reproach of being paid to uphold a certain doctrine does not lie against him, and that he will naturally be more in sympathy with those whom he addresses, for he will more or less practically acquainted with their businesses or occupations. But to offset these advantages are certain disadvantages, such as an uncritical, and therefore probably defective, knowledge of the Bible, causing him to trust implicitly to the letter of his vernacular Scriptures, even when the translation is confessedly inaccurate; a lack of systematic training in logic and rhetoric, leading to undue emphasis upon popular, and yet, it may be, flimsy arguments in defence of Christianity; a lack of appreciation of scholarship, followed, probably, by resentment at views differing from the traditional. The lay preacher is, of course, beset by the same temptations as the ordinary minister. If he is successful in attracting attention, he is tempted to attribute too little to God, and to be puffied up by his success. On the other hand, if he is not successful, he is tempted to attribute the failure to malevolent influences, rather than to his lack of ability.

Lay preaching is an adjunct to clerical preaching, not a substitute for it. In the hands of wise and devout ministers, the lay preacher can be a powerful agent for God; but, if ill directed, he becomes a power for the spread of bigotry, fanaticism, and cant.

LAY REPRESENTATION. The right of the laity to a voice in the government of the church was recognized in apostolic times; for lay elders and deacons were chosen in and by each congregation, subject to the approval of the apostles. In the apostolic council of Jerusalem the entire church participated. But, with the rise of sacerdotalism, the laity declined in power, until they were entirely ignored in the church councils: indeed, the Council of Trent anathematizes the Scriptural idea of the priesthood of all believers. Luther broke the string which tied the tongue of the laity, and introduced the novelty of lay representation. It is not yet realized in all denominations; although all, or at least nearly all, the churches in America provide for it. In Germany and other Lutheran countries, the Lutheran Church is governed by boards (consistories), composed of clergy and laymen. In England, the Church is governed by laymen, so far as its affairs are controlled by the Crown and Parliament. In Ireland, laymen are regularly sent to the church convocations. In the Episcopal Church of the United States, three lay delegates are sent from each parish to the annual diocesan convention. In the general convention, which meets every three years, there is, in the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, an equal number of clerical and lay delegates, elected by the diocesan conventions.

In the Presbyterian churches throughout the world, the laity have representation in, (1) the Session, composed of the pastor and the elders, each elected by the congregation; (2) in Presbytery, composed of the ministers, and one elder from each congregation in a certain district; (3) in Synod, composed of all the ministers and one elder from each congregation, embracing several presbyteries; (4) in General Assembly, composed of ministers and elders in equal numbers, elected by Presbytery. In the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America, similar courts exist; but they are named differently, being called Consociations, Particular Synod, and General Synod respectively. The constitution of the first two is similar to that just described. The two last are delegate bodies, and so the laity have less numerous representatives; but, as the number of ministers and elders is equal, they have more equable representation.

In churches of the Congregational order (Congregationalists, Baptists, Universalists, Unitarians) the laity have full representation. In the Wesleyan-Methodist Church of England there is no lay representation; but in the Methodist-Episcopal Church in the United States there are one or two lay delegates for each annual conference, chosen by an electoral conference of laymen, composed of one layman from each circuit or station within the bounds of the annual conference; such laymen being chosen by the preceding quarterly conference. The lay and ministerial delegates sit together, but may vote separately.

LAYING ON OF HANDS. See IMPPOSITION OF HANDS.

LAZARISTS, a congregation of the Roman-Catholic Church, founded in 1624 by St. Vincent de Paul, authorized to reside and labor in France in 1627, and confirmed as an independent religious order by Urban VIII. Their original name was "Priests of the Mission." The name of "Lazarists" originated from the house in Paris, Collège de St. Lazare, which they obtained in 1632. Their objects were to do mission-work among the rural population and in foreign countries, especially Barbary, and to educate young priests. At the time of the outbreak of the revolution, the congregation numbered eleven hundred and ninety-five members, and had sixty-three establishments in France, and as many in foreign countries, especially in Poland. Dissolved by the Convention during the revolution, the congregation was restored by Napoleon in 1804; again dissolved in 1808, it was again restored in 1816.

LEADE, Jane, founder of the Philadelphia Society; b. in Norfolk, Eng., 1828; d. in London, Aug. 19, 1704. Her maiden name was Ward; but she married William Leade, her first cousin, in 1644. Her conversion took place in her sixteenth year; and she at once gave herself up to a life of prayer and meditation. Her married life was happy and blessed. But in 1670 her husband died, her fortune was lost to her by treachery, and thus her mystical tendency was confirmed by poverty and loneliness. She joined a congregation of mystics in London (among whom was Dr. Pordage), in obedience to visions, as she claimed, and became their leader. In 1670 she founded the Philadelphia Society (see art.); and in 1680 she began to publish her revelations, and interesting visions of Scripture and history, which, as she believed, were the proceedings of Christ and his apostles, and were kept secret from the representatives of the ordinary daily bread (Lev. xxiii. 17). During the Passover no leaven-must be found in any house (Exod. xii. 15, 19; cf. 1 Cor. v. 7). The explanation of these enactments is easy. The bread of Passover is the bread of opposition, a reminder of their suffering, the bread of the house of bondage, and also of the truth that the old leaven of wickedness must be put out of the heart of those who would serve God in newness of spirit: there must not be left the least trace of the old, lest it should lead to a return to the old bondage. The etymology of the word in Hebrew and Greek favors the idea that, symbolically speaking, the primary idea of leaven was its intense, permeating, and transforming power, while that of wickedness is secondary. In our Lord’s use of the figure in the parable (Luke xiii. 21) the primary significance is that seized upon. LEYRER.

LEAVITT, Joshua, b. in Heath, Mass., Sept. 8, 1794; d. in Brooklyn, N.Y., Jan. 18, 1873. He was graduated at Yale College, 1810; studied law; after two years’ practice, abandoned it for theology in Yale Divinity School, 1823, and was ordained in the Congregational ministry; was pastor in Stratford, Conn., 1825-28; secretary of the Seamen’s Friend Society, New-York City, 1828-31; editor of the New-York Anti-Slavery Society. In 1837 he edited the Emancipator; removed to Boston 1841, and there started the Daily Chronicle,— the first daily antislavery paper. In 1848 he became managing editor of The Independent, and wrote for it until his death. “He was the first lecturer sent out by the American Temperance Society. He edited the Christian Lyre, the first hymn-book published in America with the notes attached.”

LEBANON probably received its name, “the white mountain,” from the circumstance that several of its peaks are covered with snow for the larger part of the year (Jer. xviii. 14), though Robinson derives the name from the whitish or gray color of the Jurassic limestone, which forms the bulk of its mass. The system consists of two ranges,—Lebanon proper and Anti-Lebanon,—enclosing the plateau of Culexrya, the present El-Bukhá’a. Lebanon proper, the western range, begins in the south at the River Litáni, the ancient Lebanon, and ends in the north at the River Nahrizel-Kebir, the ancient Lebrixa. Gradually rising in terraces from the shore of the Mediterranean, it reaches an average height of from six thousand to eight thousand feet. Its highest peak, Jebel Mkhmel, is ten thousand two hundred feet; Sannin, nine thousand feet. The line of cultivation runs at an elevation of about six thousand feet. The descent towards El-Bukhá’a is abrupt. Anti-Lebanon, the eastern range, begins in the south at Mount Hermon, and runs north-east, nearly parallel with Lebanon, gradually losing itself east in the plains of Palmyra, north in the steppes of Homs. Anti-Lebanon is barren and forestless. The Lebanon is exceedingly fertile and fascinating.

The country covered by these mountains never belonged to the Israelites, though it is mentioned (Josh. xiii. 5) as a territory which should be conquered, and though parts of Southern Lebanon really seem to have been subjugated during the reign of Solomon (1 Kings ix. 19; Cant. iv. 8). It is generally mentioned simply as the northern boundary of Judea (Deut. i. 7, xi. 24; Josh. i. 4, ix. 1); but Lebanon proper is often spoken of with admiration as a fertile land with thick forests (Ps. lxxii. 16; Isa. x. 34), charming by its fresh fragrance (Cant. iv. 11), its wine (Hos. xiv. 7), its abundance of water (Cant. iv. 15), and rich in game (2 Kings ix. 9; Isa. xi. 16). Its beauty evidently made a deep impression on the imagination of the Israelites. To the mind of the prophets, it presented itself as a symbol of the sublime (Isa. xxxvi. 9) and of the firm and steady (Ps. xxix. 6; Hos. xiv. 5). They praise its “glory” (Isa. xxxv. 2), and to their eyes its desolation depicts the desolation of the days of evil (Isa. xxxvi. 9) and the restoration at the coming of the Messiah (Isa. xxix. 17). In the oldest times these regions were inhabited by the Hivites and the Gibeles (Josh. xi. 3, 6; Judg. iii. 3). Lebanon belonged to Phoenicia; Anti-Lebanon, to Damascus. In the fourth century before Christ the whole country was incorporated with the kingdom of the Seleucids, and later on it ran the gauntlet through the Roman, Saracen, and Turkish rule. At present Lebanon is inhabited by Christians (Maronites and Druses); Anti-Lebanon, by Mohammedans. A list of the whole literature pertaining to the subject is given in Ritte: Erdenzahlungen, vol. 17. See especially Robison: Biblical Researches, Boston, 1841; Porter: Five Years in Damascus, London, 1853; Fraas: Drei Monate im Libanon, Stuttgart, 1876, 2d ed., 1877.

LEBŒUS. See Judas.

LEBRIA, Elius Antonius de, generally called Nabriensis, from Lebriza, or Lebrjia, the old Nebriensis on the Gaudalquiver; b. 1442 or 1444; d. July 2, 1522. Allured to Italy by the revival of classical studies, he staid for ten years. After his return to his native country, he was teacher, first at Salamanca, afterwards at Alcala, fighting for the cause of the humanists against the schoolmen, and even against the Inquisition, from whose grasp Cardinal Ximenez tried to rescue him. He wrote a Latin grammar and dictionary, a historical work on the reign of Ferdinand the Catholic, etc., and was one of the principal contributors to the Complutensian Polyglot. See J. B. Mozoz, in Memorias de la real academia de la historia, 3, 1-30.

LEBUIN, or LIAFWIN (Latin, Livius, not to be confounded with another Livius, who, a century earlier, preached Christianity in Flanders, and is the patron saint of Ghent), was a missionary among the Frisians and Saxons during the first years of the reign of Charlemagne. He was an Anglo-Saxon by birth, but left his English home, and offered his services to Gregory of Utrecht. Gregory sent him, together with Marchelm, or Marcellin, into Friesland, where he built two churches,— one in Wulpen, on the western shore of the Yssel, and another in Deventer, on the eastern. He also penetrated into the land of the Saxons. The church of Deventer was twice burned down, the last time, as it seems, by the Saxons (776). Lebuin is the patron saint of Deventer, and he is commemorated on Nov. 12 or July 25. See Surius: Vita Sanctoruni, vi. 277; and Tabillon: Acta Sanctorum, v. 21 and 96.

LECENE, Charles, b. at Caen, 1847; d. in LE CLERC, Jean. See Clericus.

LECTERN, or LECTUR, the reading-desk in the choir of a church. The commonest form at present is that of an eagle with outstretched wings. They are commonly made of brass, though primarily of wood. In Scotland, a generation ago, the preacher's desk was so named; but the word was pronounced letter.

LECTIONARIES. In its liturgical sense, lection (ἀνάγνωσις, or ἀνάδεικνυμα) denotes the reading, which, besides singing, prayers, preaching, and the administration of the sacraments, forms part of the divine service. The custom dates back to the first days of the Church (Justin: Apol., i. 67; Tertullian: Apol., 59), and was borrowed from the synagogue. In the oldest time the lessons were, of course, taken from the Old Testament alone, afterwards also from the New Testament. And at one time it was quite common to use sermons by celebrated preachers; the Acta Martyrum and other writings not belonging to the canon (as shown both by the very existence of the so-called Libri ecclesiastici, that is, uncanonical books used in divine service, and by the decree of several councils, Laodicea, 360, can. 59; Hippo, 393, can. 38; Carthage, 387, etc.) forbidding the use of such books. The number of lessons varied. The Greek Church of thenth and eighth century had that, that is, before the introduction of the Roman ritual, had three lessons, and so had the Spanish,—one from the Old Testament, one from the Gospels, and one from the Epistles. The Greek and Roman churches, which the Lutheran and Anglican churches follow, have only two lessons, of which the second is always taken from the Gospels, while the first may be taken from the Epistles, the Acts, or the Old Testament. Originally the lessons were continuous (lectio continua); that is, one began where the other had stopped. But soon it became customary to appoint certain lessons for certain days (as, for instance, to the narrative of the resurrection for Easter Day); and from this custom gradually developed a complete system of lessons for the whole ecclesiastical year. (See the art. Pericope.) Such a list of lessons was called Lectionaria (sc. volumina), or Lectionary (sc. breve), or Lectionarium (sc. albo), and thus the head of all women, as he was the head of all men. From that time forth, she has been called by her followers, "Mother Ann," and believed with reference to it, that she separated herself from her husband. Henceforth she claimed to be directed by revelations and visions. In 1774 she came with her followers to America, and finally settled, in the spring of 1776, at Watervliet, near Albany, N.Y. — During the Revolutionary War she was accused of treasonable correspondence with the British, and cast into prison, but was released by Gov. Clinton, 1777. At a later period (1780) she again imprisoned for refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the State of New York, which she could not conscientiously do, but was released without trial by the same governor. persecution had the usual effect,—of increasing the numbers of the persecuted. Taking advantage of a revival of religion (1779), she gathered many converts, and in 1780 removed the community to New Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y. From 1781 to 1783 she went through New England on a missionary tour. Her influence is still felt by the Shakers, who revere her memory, and she is entitled to fame as a remarkable woman. See Shakers.

LEE, Jesse, "the apostle of Methodism in New England;" b. in Prince George County, Va., March 12, 1758; d. in Baltimore, Md., Sept. 12, 1816. He was received into the conference, 1783. After three years’ labor in North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, and New Jersey, he was sent to New England, where, in Stratfield, Conn., Sept. 26, 1787, he formed the first Methodist "class" (consisting of three women); and the first in Boston, Mass., July 13, 1789 (his first sermon there was preached on the Common, July 9, 1789). In 1796 he became assistant to Asbury. After 1800 he returned to the South, leaving behind him in New England fifty Methodist preachers and six thousand members, as the fruit of his toil. In 1807, 1812, and 1818, he was chaplain of the United-States House of Representatives, and from 1814 until his death, chaplain of the United-States Senate. He was a fearless, plain, and successful preacher. As an organizer and founder, he ranks next to Asbury. In the field of denominational reform, in which he was greatly interested, he distinguished himself by suggesting, in 1792, the delegated general conference of the Methodist Church; but the idea was not carried out until 1808. He published a valuable History of Methodism in America, Baltimore, 1807. See LEROY M. LEE: Life and Times of Jesse Lee, Richmond, Va., 1848.

LEE, Samuel, D.D., Orientalist, b. at Longnor, Shropshire, Eng., May 14, 1783; d. at Barley, Hertfordshire, Dec. 16, 1852. The rudiments of his education were received at a charity school; but he was apprenticed to a carpenter at the age of twelve. While working at his trade, he studied especially languages; and before he was twenty-five he had acquired, without a teacher, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Samaritan, and Syriac, to which he subsequently added Arabic, Persian, Hindustanee, French, and German. In 1810 he became master of Bowdler’s School, Shrewsbury. In 1813 he entered Queen’s College, Cambridge; took his degree of B.A., 1817; entered the ministry; was made professor of Arabic in his university, 1819, and regius professor of Hebrew, 1831; at his death he was also rector of Barley. He received the degree of D.D. from Halle in 1822, and from Cambridge, 1833. His publications evidence learning and ability of a high order. They include: Professor’s Prize Essay in Biblical Polyglot, Lond. Minor. (London, 1828); Travers of Ibn Batuta, translated from the Arabic (1829); Grammar of the Hebrew Language, compiled from the Best Authorities, principally from Oriental Sources (1830, new ed., 1844); The Book of the Patriarch Job translated, with Introduction and Commentary (1837); A Lexicon, Hebrew, Chaldee, and English (1840). See FABER Stapelensis.

LEGATES. See ARCHBISHOPS. LEGATES AND NUNCIOS IN THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH. At first, legati, nunci, missi, were synonymous expressions designating the papal representatives at the eight first councils held in the Orient. The position which these representatives occupied varied according to circumstances; and general canonical regulations concerning their office there were not. In the latter part of the fourth century, and in connection with the papal jurisdiction in the so-called cause majores, we meet both with missi, or legati apostolici, appointed for the investigation of some special case of the kind, and with vicarii apostolici, generally exercising the papal authority in a certain territory. The latter were generally archbishops, who entered into a closer connection with Rome, giving up something of their independence, and thereby acquiring a higher rank. Their authority often extended over a whole country, and was then generally connected with the title of primae; but real, practical importance the institution never attained. As the Papacy developed, especially during the reign of Gregory VII., the institution of legati and nunci also developed. See Peter de Marca: De concord. sacerdoti et imperii, l. 5, c. 10; and Thomasin: l’evet ac nova discipl. eccl. T. 1, l. 2, c. 107.

In a thoroughly systematized form the institution presents itself in the decretales, more especially in the collections of Gregory IX. (v. 1, 80) and Boniface VIII. (vi. 1, 15), where it is treated under the head De officio legati. A distinction is made between two kinds of legates,—nati and datus, or missi. The former, the legati nati, whose office was once for all connected with an episcopal see, had originally the same rights as the other kind of legates. But in the sixteenth century their power became much circumscribed. Their jurisdiction was completely suspended by the presence of a legatus a latere: they were not allowed to have the cross carried before them in public; they retained, indeed, not much more than the title and its rank. See Schon. Bar. a Bar. Berg, 1788; and Sartori: Geistliches und weltliches katholisches Staatswirth, Nuremberg, 1788.

The second kind of legates consisted of Delegati (Legati missi, properly speaking) and Legati a latere. The Legati missi, afterwards generally called Nunci apostolici, appeared in red robes, on white horses, with gold spurs on, etc. But their power, defined by a mandatum speciali, was limited to that special case for which they were sent. The Legatus a latere, "from the side," of the Pope, always a cardinal, is in the full sense of the word the representative of the Pope. His power is subject only to a very few limitations. He cannot remand a bishop; he cannot divide a bishopric, or unite two, etc. He is allowed to have a cross carried before him through the street, and to sit on a throne, under a canopy. See P. A. Gambaro: Tractatus de officio leg. a latere, Venice, 1571; S. F. de la Torre: De auctoritate legati a latere, Rome, 1656; G. Wagencknitz: Dis. de legato a latere, Altdorf, 1806.

As the legates often misused their power, and the secular governments complained, and in many special cases compelled the Pope to make concessions to theæmatists. In many cases there were slight changes during the reign of Leo X. But of much greater importance were the alterations which resulted from the German Reformation. By the peace of Augsburg (1555) the German Empire declared that its army should not be used for the suppression of Protestantism. In Northern and Western Germany, however, as also in the Spanish Netherlands, there were evangelical territories in which the Roman-Catholic bishops and archbishops could not be maintained. In order not to abandon those territories altogether, it became necessary to establish fixed nunciatures. Such fixed nunciatures already existed, — one in Vienna, and another in Warsaw,— but both those nunciatures were of political origin and of preeminently political character. The three new ones — established at Cologne, 1582, Lucern, 1586, and Brussels, 1589 — had none of that object to do missionary work in the evangelical territories. It soon became apparent, however, that the institution was unable to work in unison with the episcopacy; and great troubles ensued. See the art. EMS, CONGRESS OF, and J. MEIER.

LEGEND. In medieval language Legenda, or Legendarii (sc. liber) denotes such collections of extracts from the lives of saints and martyrs as were authorized to be used as lessons in divine service on their memorial days. A more exact expression distinguishes between Passionarii and Legendarii, referring the former specially to the martyrs, and the latter to the saints in general. The custom, however, of reading the lives of martyrs and saints in the divine service on their memorial days is much older than the medieval name indicates. The thirty-sixth canon of the synod of Hippo (369) allows the passions of the martyrs to be read on their anniversaries; and from Augustine's sermons (Nos. 273 and 315) it appears, that at his time, the custom was general in the North African churches. The Lectionarium Gallicanum contains lessons from the Acta Martyrum, and Avitus of Vienne states that the passion of the holy martyrs of Agannum was read ex suetudinis debito. The Gelasian decree, De libris recipiens, forbade the use of the Acta Martyrum as lessons, because their authors were unknown; but Adrian I. again allowed it.

The liturgical use, however, which was made of the legends, by no means exhausts their theological significance. They originated without reference to liturgy; they would also have developed without connection with it. A congregation could never fail to take an interest in its own saints and martyrs, nor could it ever fail to find edification in the reading of their lives. Thus legends became a literature. In the first century this literature had a historical character. Legends form a historical source, though a source which must be used with caution. The Acta Martyrum and Acta Sanctorum (following the Calendariarum, Diplicarum, and Martiniana), the Vita Patrum and Passionalia of the old Church, were not mere story-books. Eusebius' book on the martyrs of Palestine, Palladius' Historia Lausiacae, even Theodoret's Historiae syriacae, and J. Moschus' Getica, contained true historical information, as well as the De Viris Illustribus by Jerome, Collationes Patrum by Cassianus, Vita Patrum by Gregory of Tours, etc.

But there came a time, about the ninth century, when a regard to edification, an inclination towards fantasticalness, and even less excusable motives, got the better of the historical sense, and transformed the legends into a maze of fiction. This tendency is represented in the Greek Church by the lives of Saints, by Simeon Metaphrastes, and in the Latin Church by the Legenda Aurea of Jacobus a Voragine. The exaggerations, however, and, in many cases, the frauds, were so palpable, that no amount of credulity was sufficient to bear them for a long time. Even in the fifteenth century the historical conscience stirred up Monbritius; and in the seventeenth century the whole mass of legendary matter was subjected to an often very acute criticism by the Bollandists. In the eighteenth century, on the instance of Herder, the legends were once more taken up, but from a merely literary point of view. See MAURY: Les Legendes pieuses du Moyen Age, Paris, 1813; HORSTMANN: Allengische Legenden, Paderborn, 1875.

LEGENDARY THEORY. See MYTHICAL.

LEGENDARY THEORIES. See MYTHICAL.

LEGER, Jean, b. at Villa Sana, in Piedmont, Feb. 2, 1615; studied at Geneva; was appointed pastor of the churches of Prali and Rodoretto in 1639, and in 1643 of the Church of St. Giovanni among the Waldenses; fled in 1655, on account of the barbarous persecutions instituted by the Duke of Savoy, and sought aid for his flock from Louis XIV. and Cromwell, on whose recommendation the Patentes de grâce were granted, but became afterwards the subject of a special persecution; fled once more, and found rescue at Leyden. The exact date of his death is unknown. His Histoire générale des Églises ecclésiastiques de Piedmont, one of the principal sources of information concerning the Waldenses, appeared at Leyden, 1689, 2 vols. EMILIO COMBA.

LEGIO FULMINATRIX. See Lamox, Tnux.

LEGION, The Theban. According to the legend,—such it occurs, in its oldest and simplest form, in the Passio ascribed to Bishop Eucharius of Lyons,— a legion consisting of sixty-six hundred men, and called the "Theban," was sent from the Orient to Northern Italy to re-enforce the army of Maximian. He intended to use his army to persecute the Christians; but the soldiers of the Theban Legion, being Christians themselves, refused to obey his orders. Exasperated at the refusal, he had the legion twice decimated; and as the soldiers, exhorited by their commander Mauritius, continued firm, he had the whole legion massacred. In later versions this legend undergoes so much alteration, and is adorned with many more or less fabulous features.

The Magdeburg Centuries declared Mauritius, though he is the patron saint of Magdeburg, an idol, and the whole legend a fiction. Its untenableness was still more elaborately demonstrated by J. A. du Bordien (Disserlalion critiquesur Ie Legion Theb'enne, Amsterdam, 1705) and Hottinger (Helvetische Kirchengeschichte, Zürich, 1708). On the other hand, its historical significance was defended by De l'Isle, canon of St. Maurice ("Défense de la vérité de la légion Thèb.", Nancy, 1741), by the Bollandists (who gave a very careful collection of all pertaining materials), and De Rivaz (Éclaircissements sur le Martyre de la légion Thébédienne, 1779). Among modern authors, Reutberg rejects the legend, and Friedrich supported his respective works on the church history of Germany.

Between the alleged event and the first report, about a hundred and fifty years passed away, — time enough for such a legend to grow up. Still worse, none of the contemporary authors, or of those nearest to the event (Eusebius, Lactantius, Orosius, Sulpicius Severus), speak of it; and it would, at least for Lactantius, seem very singular to say nothing, if he knew any thing about it. The worst of all is, that it has not been possible to place the event properly, or even probably, in history: neither time nor place will fit. Generally, therefore, the legend must be declared unhistorical, which, however, does not forbid to assume that some kind of real fact underlies the fiction.

LEGION, The Thundering (Legio Fulminatrix). The event — a Roman legion shut up in a dismal valley among the Alps, surrounded on all sides by heathen enemies, and almost suffocated by thirst, but saved at the culminating moment of the danger by a timely shower of rain — is recorded both to the prayers of the Christians, and to the prayers of the Emperor (Capitolinus: Vita Marci Aurelii, 24), or to the art of an Egyptian sorcerer, as, for instance, Dio Cassius does. The Pagan authors are inclined to view the event in the same light, but ascribe it either to the prayers of the emperor (Vita Capito- linii, 5, 5) or in this event a miraculous interference of Providence, and ascribe it to the prayers of the Christian soldiers. The events a miraculous interference of Providence, and ascribe it to the prayers of the Christian soldiers. The events a miraculous interference of Providence, and ascribe it to the prayers of the Christian soldiers.

The Christian authors Tertullian (Apologiæ, 3) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., 5, 5) recognize in this event a miraculous interference of Providence, and ascribe it to the prayers of the Christian soldiers. The Pagan authors are inclined to view the event in the same light, but ascribe it either to the prayers of the emperor (Capitolinus: Vita Marci Aurelii, 24), or to the art of an Egyptian sorcerer, as, for instance, Dio Cassius does. The reliefs on the imperial column represent the fact, but attempt no explanation. The letter from Marcus Aurelius to the Senate, printed in the appendix to Justin’s Apology, is a forgery.

LEIBNITZ, Gottfried Wilhelm, b. at Leipzi, July 3, 1646; d. at Hanover, Nov. 14, 1716. He studied jurisprudence, mathematics, and philosophy at Leipzig and Jena, and entered in 1666, through the recommendation of Baron von Boineburg (a Protestant convert to Romanism), the service of the Elector of Mayence, in which he held various positions, and was chiefly occupied with jurisprudence: Methodus nova discendæ docendi quy jurisprudentiae (1687); though his Confessio natural contra atheistas (1669) and Defensione Trinitatis (1689) show a much wider range of studies. In 1672 he went to Paris as tutor to Boineburg’s sons, visited London, returned to Paris, and stayed there till 1676, principally engaged in the study of natural science and mathematics. His great mathematical discovery, the differential calculus, dates back to 1676, though it was not published until 1694. As, in the mean time, the Elector of Mayence had died, he accepted in 1676 an offer from the Elector of Brandenburg (1677–11). Charged with writing the history of the house of Brunswick, he made various journeys in Germany and Italy, and gathered together an immense amount of materials. — Codex juris gentium diplomaticus (1689–1700) and Scriptores rerum Brunsviclerum (1700)=2700 were never completed, and not published until a century and a half later on, by Pertz. Along with those historical studies he wrote, however, a great number of mathematical, philosophical, and theological treatises, mostly published in Acta eruditorum Lips. and Miscellanea curiosarum rerum. But a complete systematic representation of his philosophical doctrines he never gave. But a complete systematic representation of his philosophical doctrines he never gave. His Esquisse du théodote sur la bonté de Dieu, la liberté de l’homme et l’origine du mal, 1710. It originated as a polemic against the dictionary of Bayle, and was occasioned by the request of Queen Sophia Charlotte. In many ways his metaphysical doctrines, his optimism, his determinism, etc., mirror himself in the book. His doctrine, that this world is the best world which could possibly exist, leads him to a conception of the evil which is essentially different from that held by the religious consciousness. Evil is to his mind the simple and natural result of the necessary condition of every thing created: it is consequently something metaphysical, and not ethical. In a similar way, his doctrine of the pre-established harmony leads him into a kind of determinism, in which the freedom of the will becomes lost in the metaphysical necessity, or at least loses its true ethical point. In general he considers Christianity only as the purest and noblest of all religions, as the religion of the wise made by Christ the religion of all, as the natural religion raised by Christ into a law. Nevertheless the book is written with great vigor and warmth, nor did it fail to make a wide and deep impression.

Another interesting side of Leibnitz’s theological activity is his participation in the endeavors then made for the purpose of uniting the different Christian denominations. The general feeling prevalent after the end of the Thirty-Years’ War was favorable to such plans; and the subject was ably broached by Bossuet’s Exposition de la foi de l’eglise catholique,—a defence of the Church of Rome, but conciliatory in its spirit, and very guarded in its expressions. Rojas de Spinoza, a Franciscan monk of Spanish descent, and confessor to the Emperor Leopold, was a zealous champion of the project. He visited Hanover several times, on the instance of the emperor; and, as Duke Ernst August was willing to enter into negotiations, a conference was arranged between Rojas de Spinoza on the one side, and Molanus and Leibnitz on the other. The results of the conference were received with great hopes, both in Hanover and in Vienna and Rome. A couple of years later on appeared Leibnitz’s Systema theologicum, which has made the truth of his Protestant faith suspected by many. Again a couple of years passed on, and in 1681 the correspondence began between Bossuet and Leibnitz. But the authority of the Council of Trent, absolutely insisted upon by Bossuet, and absolutely rejected by Leibnitz, proved the rock on which all the plans and negotiations for a union between Romanism and Protestantism were wrecked. In the attempts of uniting the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches, carried out by the courts of Berlin and Hanover, Leibnitz also took part. A conference was held, in Hanover between the Prussian court-preacher, Jablonski, on the one side, and Molanus and Leibnitz on the other. A Collegium irenicum was established in Berlin 1703; but the only result of the negotiations seems to have been the term "evangelical" as the common designation of the different Reformed churches, in contradistinction to the Church of Rome.
LEIGHTON.

1296

LEIGHTON.

Lit. — The philosophical works of Leibnitz have been edited by Erdmann (Berlin, 1839—40), Jacques (Paris, 1842), Janet (Paris, 1860). Complete editions have been published by Pertz (Hanover, 1843) and Foucher de Careil (Paris, 1890). His German works were edited by Guhraner (Berlin, 1838—40), who also wrote his Life (Breslau, 1842, 2 vol.). See also Class: D. metaphysischen Voraussetzungen des Leibnitz. Determinismus, 1874; Tischler: Die Theologie des Leibnitz, 1899.

R. Eucken.

LEIGH, Edward. Puritan writer; b. at Shrewsbury, Shropshire, March 24, 1600; d. in Middle Temple, London, June 25, 1661. He proceeded M.A. at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, 1623, and entered the Middle Temple. In 1636 he sat in Parliament as member for Stafford, and was expelled with his brother Presbyterians in 1648. He gave much attention to theology and biblical studies, and published several useful works, among which may be mentioned Critica sacra, containing Observations on all the Radices of the Hebrew Words of the Old, and the Greek of the New Testament, London, 1636, 4th and best edition, 1662, Latin translation, Amsterdam, 1696 (formerly much used, now supplanted); A Body of Divinity in Ten Books, 1654; Treatise of Religion and Learning, and of Religious and Learned Men, 1658; and a compilation, Annotations upon the New Testament, 1656 (Latin translation, Leipzig, 1792).

LEIGHTON, Robert, successively minister of Newbattle, principal of the university of Edinburgh, bishop of Dunblane, and archbishop of Glasgow; b. (place unknown) 1611; d. in London, June 25, 1661. He was graduated from the university of Edinburgh, 1631, and then spent several years on the continent, especially in Douay, France. His father, Alexander Leighton, was a Presbyterian clergyman and physician, who was cruelly handled by the Star Chamber, and imprisoned ten years in London for "sedition," because he had defended Presbyterianism. The son was licensed by the presbytery of Edinburgh, July, 1641, and settled in the parish of Newbattle (formerly Newbotle, "botle" meaning hamlet), four miles long by two wide, in the presbytery of Dalkeith, Dec. 18, 1641. Leighton was then in his thirtieth year, with a mind enlarged by years of study and travel, thoroughly disciplined for thinking clearly, and expressing his ideas with persuasive force and beauty. He was a ripe scholar; a theologian who had a firm grasp of the gospel verities, in which his own heart found repose; a Christian man, whose inner life breathed the air of habitual fellowship with God. As a preacher, he eschewed the habit of his time in multiplicitious divisions of his subject; and Burnet testifies to the "impressiveness, majesty, and beauty," of his sermons. The current account of his life, after Burnet, is singularly inaccurate, as if for eleven years he had worn an Anglican cassock under his Genevan gown. The records of the session of Newbattle and of the presbytery of Dalkeith, in memory of his incumbency, preserved by the Rev. Dr. Gordon, the present minister of the parish, dispel many hitherto accepted opinions concerning him. Instead of "scarcely ever going to the meetings of presbytery," he was one of the most faithful and regular in his attendance, taking his share in all the business, preaching often before the presbytery, the synod, the assembly, and sometimes before the Scottish Parliament. If he "disliked their covenant, particularly the imposing it," he nevertheless signed it himself in 1645, along with his heritors and parishioners, and so late as 1650 administered it to a parishioner who had been twelve years in Germany. He was a member of the assembly which met at St. Andrews on July 28, 1642, and was one of the commission which met on Oct. 18 of that year, when the commissioners were nominated for the Westminster Assembly. So far from being estranged from his brethren, "living in great retirement, minding only the care of his own parish," no minister seems more active or trusted. In 1651 he was unanimously selected by the synod of Lothian to repair to London "for negotiating the freedom of brethren imprisoned there." He was one of a commission appointed by the synod, in November, 1648, "for trying of any Members of the Assembly that had been active promoters of the last sinfull ingagdgement, or had accession theirto." And he often comes prominently forward on the side of the prevailing party. The true principle he was applying to a question in the synod, "whether he preached to the times," by asking another, "Who does so?" and, when he got the rejoinder "that all the brethren did so," his saying "that they might permit one poor brother to preach Jesus Christ and eternity," may be set opposite a statement in the minutes of his presbytery, under date April, 1652, regarding "the union and harmony wherein this presbytery are so singularly happy in this distracted time." But he became weary of the increasing contentions and "anxious to be left to his own continuance," especially in Douay, France.

On Dec. 10, 1652, he offered to demit his charge, and the presbytery refused to accept of the demission. The reasons Leighton gave for his request were "the greatness of the congregation far exceeding his strength for discharging the duties thereof, especially the extreme weakness of his voice, not being able to reach the half of them when they are convened, which had long pressed him very sore, which he formerly had often expressed to us [the presbytery]." But in January, 1653, the town council of Edinburgh having elected him to be principal of the college there, the presbytery, on the 3d of February, "transporting

1 Burnet speaks of his low voice in preaching. The communicants of his parish, in 1646, were nine hundred (the number in 1811 was four hundred and thirty). Leighton was of small stature, and was familiarly called, at an after day, "the little bishop." He was never robust in health. The occasional of his absence from the presbytery were either sickness, "by which he was not able to extend his voice," or chest affections. His last illness was a sudden stroke of pleurisy, to which he succumbed in a few days.
ed him to that charge." Leighton held this high office till the Restoration.

As principal and primarius professor of divinity he gave a lecture in theology to the students once a week, and preached in the college church every third sabbath. His "Prerogatives and Meditations Ethico-Critica in Psalms," written in Latin of Ciceronian purity, were read in the college, and are given with his published works. According to Dr. Tulloch, "they are the most interesting of his works;" though that which has chiefly endeared him to earnest Christians is his Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter. Of his writings, Bishop Jebb has said, "His commentary is a treasury of devotion; his theological lectures are the very philosophy of the New Testament; and his meditations on some of the psalms raise us to those purer and sublimier heights where it was his delight and privilege habitually to dwell."

All were composed while he was a minister or professor in the Covenanting Church; and that he was able to continue in it till it was overthrown, while it was allowed, or felt constrained, to resign his place in that which succeeded, is the best proof, that, with all superficial differences there were deeper and more essential harmonies between him and the best of his Puritan contemporaries than have been yet acknowledged.

Many of his finest gems have a genuine Puritan ring.

He succeeded in obtaining from Cromwell's government a better revenue for the university; and, in order to elevate academical training, he recommended, as Knox had done, the establishment of grammar-schools in various parts of Scotland. In the recess of the college session he made visits to the Continent, and kept up correspondence with some of the Jansenists, which gave rise to a suspicion of his becoming a Catholic, and probably, along with the contents of his time, developed his quickness and indifference to externals, which prepared the way for his change in his ecclesiastical relations. This change occurred in 1661, on the establishment of episcopacy in Scotland. He decided to remain in the reconstituted church, became bishop of Dunblane, and was consecrated to that see, along with Sharp and other two, in Westminster Abbey, Dec. 15, 1661.

It was an immense gain to the new order to have a bishop with the endowments, learning, and eminent piety of Leighton, in their ranks. The purity and sincerity of his motives in making the transition are above all question. Dr. Flint has said, "A purer, humbler, holier spirit than that of Robert Leighton never tarbeneclad in Scottish clay;" and he might have added, "nor in any other clay." "He was accounted a saint from his youth," and his days were "linked each to each by natural piety." That gentle, loving, and devout student, as he comes before us in his letters to his parents, gradually increased in learning, in culture, in spiritual insight and practical devotion, till he became the "angelical man" whom Burnet so lovingly portrayed,—"that true Father of the Church of Christ," whose noble thoughts Coleridge has delighted to unfold. He was, as Bishop Jebb says, "a human search, uniting the solar warmth with the solar light, unde artet unde lucet." He was, in fact, the Scottish Hooker and Howe in one, and "will not suffer by comparison with any divine in any age." Even Scotchmen, who thank God for the noble men who "preached to the times," and sacrificed life and all they held dear to carry on the struggle in which Leighton's father suffered so cruelly, will not fail to thank God that there was one noble man in those quiet days who kept so much apart from the strife of tongues, fixed his gaze so steadily beyond passing controversies, preached and lived for eternity, and whose voice is still "a continual reminder that . . . the celestial mountains are before us, and thither lies our true destiny."

Very soon after his alliance with Sharp he began to discover how hard a task he had undertaken; and, as Burnet says, "he quickly lost all heart and hope, observing such cross characters of an angry Providence as seemed to say that God was against them." He entered his see in 1662, and discharged its duties in a loving and tender spirit till 1672. His diocese consisted of the two presbyteries of Dunblane and Auchterarder, comprising more than thirty parishes in the western part of Perthshire. These presbyteries continued their meetings as before; and the synod over which Leighton presided, as its record published by Dr. John Wilson in 1877 fully show, met twice a year, and each member had "full liberty of voting, and debating their assent and dissent, as ever they had in former times."

There were only three or four nonconformist ministers. The ritual of the church was unchanged, neither liturgy nor surplice being used. Externally the frame-work was the same, but a new motive-power had been introduced into the machinery. As Sharp's and other bishops' views were not in accordance with his, Leighton's modified episcopacy, and the spirit of conciliation he tried to infuse into the counsels of the king and his ministers, were thwarted. Leighton, both in Parliament and in presence of Charles II., pleaded for milder measures, and got the "indulgence." Archbishop Burnet, being proposed this clemency, was superseded, and Leighton was appointed commissary of Glasgow in 1670, and archbishop of Glasgow in 1672. In the wider sphere in which he was thus placed, he launched a scheme of "Accommodation," so as to bridge over the gulf that yawned between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians; and along with Dr. Gilbert Burnet, then professor of divinity in Glasgow University, and afterwards bishop of Salisbury, he labored hard to gain his object. The bridge broke down. He was disheartened with the remorseless measures of the government against the Covenanters, and the stern resolution of the anti-prelatists to admit of no surrender. He accordingly went to London, and tendered his resignation, as, indeed, he had done more than once when in Dunblane. Charles II. persuaded him to continue one year longer; and he was permitted to retire in September, 1674. For a short time he lived within the college of Edinburgh, and afterwards found a home of peace under the roof-tree of his sister, Mrs. Lightmaker, at Broadhurst in Sussex. In 1679 he was invited by the king to go down to Scotland, after Sharp's assassination, to pour oil on the troubled waves; but he remained in his loved retreat. He went up to London to meet the Earl of Perth in 1684; and...
LEIGHTON.

Burnet, who met him, congratulated him on his healthy looks. He in reply stated "that he was near his end, and his journey almost done." Next day he was seized with pleurisy, and in two days more, on the 28th of June, 1854, died at the Bell Inn, Warwick Lane, thus realizing a fond wish of his life, that, like a pilgrim, he might die in an inn. He was buried in the south chancel of the Church of Horsted Keynes, Sussex, the parish in which he had resided for some years. He bequeathed his library to the diocese of Dunblane, where it still continues. His works consist of Sermons and Charges to the Clergy, Prelections Theologica et Parenenses, and Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter. Coleridge has based his work, Aids to Reflection, on some of the choicest pieces of Leighton's rich mind, and has brought them as near his own age as they had long been among humble, earnest Christians.

LIT.—Leighton is said to have published nothing during his lifetime, and before his death to have signified to his relatives his wish that his papers should be destroyed. 1 (Sermons Preached by Dr. Robert Leighton, late Archbishop of Glasgow. Published, at the desire of his friends, after his death, from his papers, written with his own hand, etc.) London, 1892, 8vo. (2) A Practical Commentary upon the Two First Chapters of the First Epistle General of St. Peter, by the Most Rev. Dr. Robert Leighton, sometime Archbishop of Glasgow. Published after his death at the request of his friends. York, 1693, 4to. (3) Prelections Theologica, etc. 4to. London, 1693. (4) Practical Commentary upon the First Epistle General of St. Peter. Part ii., London, 1694. The principal subsequent editors of Leighton's works are those by J. Wilson (Edinburgh, 1748-63), of Middleton (London, c. 1750), of Foster (London, 1777), of Jerment (London, 1808 and 1814), of Baynes (London, 1829 and 1829), of Pearson (London, 1825, and again in 1855), and, above all, that begun in 1859, and still proceeding with such learned pains and loving care, but yet with such strong High-Church bias, by the Rev. W. West, B.A., and published by the Longmans, London. The volume which is to contain the life and letters of the archbishop is expected to be published soon, and cannot fail to be much fresh, if not always quite uncolored, light on his history and that of his father. In Wilson's edition (vol. i) we have the first attempt at a biography, and also a preface by Dr. Doddridge. The former was appropriated by Middleton, and the latter by most subsequent editors. The life by Jerment is a decided advance on Wilson's; and Pearson's, no less decided advance on his. The following are the other materials for illustrating his biography: Life of Archbishop Leighton, Edinburgh [n.d. by Dr. Thomas Murray]; the same, in Irving's Lives of Scottish Writers, Edinburgh, 1840; by the same, Dr. Thomas Murray, the same, by George Manning, in The Wisdom of our Fathers, Tract Society, London; Life of Archbishop Leighton, with Brief Extracts from his Writings, New York, 1840; Extracts from the Presbytery Records of Dalkeith, relating to the Parish of Newbattle during the Incumbency of Mr. Robert Leighton, 1651-1658. Communicated by the Rev. Thomas Gordon, Minister of Newbattle. With some Introductory Remarks by David Laing, Esq., V.P., of the Society of Antiquaries, Edinburgh. Printed in Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, 1862, pp. 459-469, and substance of them embodied in letter to editor of Notes and Queries (vol. i., 1862, pp. 441-445). Several letters of Leighton, recovered from State-paper office, or drawn from the Lauderdale correspondence now in the British Museum, will be found in same volume of Notes and Queries, pp. 106, 121, 143, 165, 244. Three papers entitled Archbishop Leighton are to be found in The United Free Church Magazine (Edinburgh, 1865, pp. 387, 493, and 1866, p. 15, by the present writer; also Four papers in the same serial by the same writer, 1869, entitled The Bishop of Dunblane, pp. 304, 355, 400, 448; Two papers, by the writer of this article, in the British and Foreign Evangelical Review, London, 1869,—the first, The Presbyterian and Reformed theologians in 1631, was decided advance on Wilson's; and Pearson's, no less advance, by Dr. Doddridge; The former was soon arrived at with respect to articles 1-2, 5-9, 11-28; and the tone of the colloquy was for the purpose of protesting against the Edict of Restitution. The elector of Brandenburg was accompanied by his court-preacher, Johann Bergius; and the landgrave of Hesse, by his court-preacher, Theophilus Neu von Hohenegg, court-preacher to the elector of Saxony) to a colloquy on the various points of difference between them. The colloquy began March 3, and continued till March 23. As basis, was chosen the Confessio Augustana. An agreement was soon arrived at with respect to articles 1-2, 5-9, 11-28; and the tone of the colloquy was for the purpose of attaining as the colloquy was private, only four copies of the protocol were taken,—one for each of the princes, and one for the faculty of Leipzig; but general reports were soon after published in Germany, Holland, France, and England. The protocol may be found printed in Augusti: Corpus libri, symbol., Elberfeldt, 1827, and in Niemeyer: Collectio conf. in ecc. reform., Leipzig, 1840.

LEIPZIG DISPUTATION. See Eck, Carlstadt, Luther.

LEIPZIG INTERIM. The, was drawn up by Melanchthon, Paul Eber, Bugenhagen, Hieronymus Weller, Antonius Lauterbach, Georg Major, and Joachim Camerarius, and was issued at Leipzig, Dec. 22, 1548. It made great concessions to the Roman-Catholic Church with respect to baptism, penance, ordination, mass, etc., and met with great opposition from the Lutherans, especially Flacius. In 1552 it was revoked.

LELAND, John, b. at Wigan, Lancashire, Oct. 1539, d. at Dublin, Ireland, Jan. 16, 1506. He was educated at the University of Dublin, and from 1716 to his death was pastor of a Presbyterian church in that city. He wrote in 1733 A Defence of Christianity, in reply to Tindal's Christianity as Old as the Creation.; in 1738, The Divine Authority of the Old and New Testaments asserted, in reply to Morgan's Moral Philosophers; and in 1706, The Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Religion. After his death, his Discourses on Various Subjects (1768-69, 4 vols.) was published, with his life. All these works are now forgotten. But one of his books still lives, A View of the Principal Deistical Writers that have appeared in England in the Last and Present Century, London, 1754-56, 2 vols.; best edition, London, 1837, 1 vol. This work is valuable for its industrious collection of facts about the deistic writers, but its arguments are not adapted for present use.

LELONG, Jacques, b. in Paris, April 19, 1665; d. there Aug. 17, 1721. He entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1686, and was appointed librarian at the Oratoire St. Honore in Paris. His principal work is his Bibliotheca Sacra, (Paris, 1709), of which enlarged editions were published by C. F. Bornier, Leipzig, 1769, and by A. G. Masch, Halle, 1778-90. He also published Discours historiques sur les principales editions des Bibies Polyglottes (1713), Supplement a l'histoire des dictionnaires Hebreux de Wolfsius, 1707; and Nouvelle méthode des langues Hébraïque et Chaldaïque, 1712.

LE MAITRE, Louis Isaac, better known under the name DE SACY, b. in Paris, March 29, 1613; d. at Pomponne, Jan. 4, 1684. After studying theology, he entered the service of the Church; was ordained a priest in 1649; and was appointed director of Port-Royal. As a decided Jansenist, he could not escape the hatred of the Jesuits. In 1666 he was imprisoned in the Bastille, and not released until 1668. Though he returned to Port-Royal in 1675, he was in 1679 compelled to give up his position, and retire to Pomponne. He was a very prolific writer, especially on industrious, and successful translator. His principal work is his translation of the Bible, of which Les Psalms de David appeared in 1666, Le Nouveau Testament, at Amsterdam, printed by Elzevir in 1687; while the larger part of the Old Testament was done in the Bastille.

LENFANT, Jacques, b. at Bazoches-in-the Beauce, April 13, 1661; d. in Berlin, Aug. 7, 1728. He studied theology at Saumur and Geneva, and was appointed preacher to the French congregation at Heidelberg, 1684, and at Berlin, 1688. He was a prolific writer, especially on church history. — Hist. du Concile de Constance, Amsterdam, 1714; Hist. du Concile de Trent, Amsterdam, 1721; Hist. de la papesse Jeanne, etc. He translated the New Testament, and wrote a commentary to it. Noticeable is also his polemical work, Préservatif contre la réunion avec le Siège de Rome, 1739. C. Pfennder.

LENT, from the Anglo-Saxon lencen ("spring"). The German Lent denotes the fast preparatory to the celebration of Easter. Through Ireneus and Tertullian, the existence of such a fast can be traced back to a very early date in the history of the Church; but it also appears that great uncertainty and arbitrariness prevailed, both with respect to its duration and its strictness. Originally it seems to have lasted only forty hours, referring to the time between the crucifixion and the resurrection, during which Christ was under the power of death. But gradually those forty hours became forty days, referring to the forty-days' fast of Moses, Elijah, and our Lord. Gregory the Great speaks of Lent as lasting six weeks; that is, thirty-six days, as the Sundays were not fast days. When the four days were added (by Gregory the Great or by Gregory II.) is not known; but from the number of forty is the Latin name derived, — quadragesima (French, carême). The fast consisted, in some places and at some times, in total abstinence from all kinds of food until evening on all days except Sundays; in other places and at other times, in abstinence from flesh and wine. But generally the fast was accompanied with the cessation of every thing having a festal character, such as public games, theatrical shows, etc. Even the courts were closed. At the same time the service in the churches assumed a more sombre character. The pictures were veiled, the organ grew silent, etc. In the English Church the celebration of Lent was introduced in the latter part of the eighth century, by Ercambert, king of Kent. Lent, when observed to-day, retains its ancient features.

LENTULUS, Epistle of. See Christ, Pictures of.

LEO is the name of thirteen Popes; namely, Leo I., the Great (440-461). Very little is known of his earlier life; though, for some years previous to his election, he occupied a prominent position in Rome. It was to him that Cyril of Alexandria, in his controversy with Juvenal of Jerusalem, addressed himself in 431; and in the moment of his election he was absent in Gaul, sent thither by the emperor as mediator between Attilius and Albinus. Singularly enough, also, his death is uncertain; the date varying between April 11, June 28, Oct. 30, and Nov. 10: while otherwise his reign stands out in full light, both with respect to its general bearing, and with respect to its details. It denotes the foundation of the Papacy; Leo I. is the true inventor of the theory of an ecclesiastical monarchy under the headship of the Pope. The two propositions on which that whole...
More complicated proved the affairs of the African Church in Africa needed support from without, and was consequently easily made subject to the authority of the supporter. Leo sent Bishop Polentius to investigate the state of affairs; and when Polentius reported, that, through intrigues and riots, many unworthy persons had been installed into the first offices of the Church, there followed a very severe rebuke from the Pope. Appeals to Rome, which, a decade before, had been absolutely forbidden by an African synod, were now regularly instituted, and the Pope demanded that all synodal decisions should be sent to Rome for confirmation (Ep. 12). More complicated proved the affairs of Illyria and Gaul. In Illyria the contest was standing between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Bishop of Rome. Innocent I. had conferred a kind of apostolical vicariate on the metropolitan of Thessalonica; but the Illyrian bishops continued, nevertheless, to be drawn towards Constantinople, as if by a natural force. Leo I. conferred the vicariate on the metropolitan Anastasius (Ep. 6), and was in the beginning very much pleased with his behavior (Ep. 13), but found occasion afterwards to administer some sharp rebukes (Ep. 15). The issue, however, of the affair is not known. In Gaul, Pope Zosimus had conferred the primacy on Bishop Patroclus of Arles in 417; and on which the relation of the Gallican Church, the weakness of the Roman power, the establishment of Arian kingdoms in the country, and the general confusion caused by the intermittent invasion of barbarous nations, such a measure of centralization seemed quite expedient. But the successor of Patroclus, Hilaris, came into conflict with Celidonius, metropolitan of Besançon; and when Celidonius was deposed by a Gallican synod, he appealed to the Pope, and repaired to Rome. Hilaris also went to Rome, but fled in haste from the city, fearing the worst. It was, indeed, the policy of the Roman bishops to favor the appellant, in order to encourage appeals; and this policy was followed also in the present case. A Roman synod of 445 restored Celidonius, and strictly confined the power of Hilaris to his own diocese; and, in order to secure the enforcement of these decisions, Leo I. sought and obtained the support of the secular government. June 6, 445, Valentinian III. issued the famous law, which, from regard to the merits of the apostle Peter, the dignity of the city of Rome, and the decisions of the Council of Nicea (the spurious sixth canon), recognized the Bishop of Rome as the head of the Christian Church, by which the ordinances as general laws, defined opposition to them as a kind of crimen lanceae majestatis, and ordered all secular authorities to arrest and surrender any person, who, summoned by the Pope, neglected to appear. Less effective was his interference in the affairs of the Church of Alexandria. In the fourth year he accused the Alexandrian Church (Ep. 9) concerning certain ritual and liturgical differences. The Church of Rome, he argues, is built exclusively on Peter, the prince of the apostles; but how is it possible that his disciple Mark should have deviated from his master in founding the Alexandrian Church? The Alexandrian Church, however, seems to have had too lofty a self-consciousness to heed the anxious questions of the Pope.

The most brilliant part of the reign of Leo I. is his relation to the Eastern Church and the christological controversy then taking place there. Eutyches first addressed him, complaining of the re-appearance of Nestorianism; and after his condemnation by Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, he wholly threw himself upon Leo, protesting his willingness to acquiesce in any decision he might make in the case. As the entreaties of Eutyches were supported by the Emperor Theodosius, Leo was at once drawn into the very midst of the controversy; and, as was natural, he at first assumed a very cold attitude towards Flavian. Nevertheless, after receiving the acts of the synod which had condemned Eutyches, together with all other materials pertinent, he confirmed the condemnation, and accompanied the confirmation with a positive exposition of the doctrine of the two natures united in Christ, —the celebrated Letter to Flavian of June 13, 449 (Ep. 29). In consequence, the synod of Ephesus (449) excommunicated him; but the only result of the excommunication was, that the ill-used and maltreated minority of the Eastern Church rallied so much the more closely around him. A synod of Rome of the same year rejected all the canons of the synod of Ephesus, which it characterized as a usurpation of the peculiar position of the Gallican Church; but the weakness of the Roman power, the establishment of Arian kingdoms in the country, and the general confusion caused by the intermittent invasion of barbarous nations, such a measure of centralization seemed quite expedient. But the successor of Patroclus, Hilaris, came into conflict with Celidonius, metropolitan of Besançon; and, when Celidonius was deposed by a Gallican synod, he appealed to the Pope, and repaired to Rome. Hilaris also went to Rome, but fled in haste from the city, fearing the worst. It was, indeed, the policy of the Roman bishops to favor the appellant, in order to encourage appeals; and this policy was followed also in the present case. A Roman synod of 445 restored Celidonius, and strictly confined the power of Hilaris to his own diocese; and, in order to secure the enforcement of these decisions, Leo I. sought and obtained the support of the secular government. June 6, 445, Valentinian III. issued the famous law, which, from regard to the merits of the apostle Peter, the dignity of the city of Rome, and the decisions of the Council of Nicea (the spurious sixth canon), recognized the Bishop of Rome as the head of the Christian Church by which the ordinances as general laws, defined opposition to them as a kind of crimen lanceae majestatis, and ordered all secular authorities to arrest and surrender any person, who, summoned by the Pope, neglected to appear. Less effective was his interference in the affairs of the Church of Alexandria. In the fourth year he accused the Alexandrian Church (Ep. 9) concerning certain ritual and liturgical differences. The Church of Rome, he argues, is built exclusively on Peter, the prince of the apostles; but how is it possible that his disciple Mark should have deviated from his master in founding the Alexandrian Church? The Alexandrian Church, however, seems to have had too lofty a self-consciousness to heed the anxious questions of the Pope.
Constantine exercised jurisdiction in Asia, Pontus, and Thrace after the Council of Chalcedon, just as he had done before.

The meeting between Leo I. and Attila, the king of the Huns, has been the subject of much legendary embellishment. After the battle of the Catalaunian fields (496), Attila broke into Italy, and Rome lay as a helpless prey between his claws, when, according to the report of Prosper of Aquitania, a contemporary of the event (see Roesler: Chronica medii aevi, p. 325), on the instance of the emperor, Leo went to meet him, and made such an impression upon him, that he concluded peace, and retreated behind the Danube.

According to the Historia miscell. (from the tenth century, edited by Eyssenhardt, 1869), Leo I. was not alone when he approached Attila, but was preceded by St. Peter himself, who, with sword in hand, compelled the Huns to submit to the demands of the bishop.

There is, however, an entirely different version of what took place. According to an ordinance issued by Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, and found in Cassiodorus' Variae, i. 4 (Opera, edit. Garettius, 1679), it was the elder Cassiodorus who went as ambassador to Attila, and induced him to retreat in peace.

Which of these two reports is the true one, it is impossible to decide; probably they contain some truths, both of them. As Attila's position in Italy was very precarious, and we know the price he was paid for his retreat,—the sister of Valentinian III. and her dowry,—the event seems to have taken place in a very simple and natural way: most probably there were many embassies, and very various negotiations. Under somewhat similar circumstances Leo I. had to meet Genseric, the king of the Vandals, in 456; but at this occasion, at which history speaks of no other mediator, the result was, that the city was given up to plunder for two weeks, and many thousands of the inhabitants were carried away, and sold as slaves.

Lit. — The works of Leo I., consisting of letters and sermons, were collected and edited by Querzel (Lyons, 1700), B. Ballerini (Venice, 1755-57), and Moreau: Patrologia, 54-56. His life was written by the emperor himself, Rome is mentioned as one of the metropolitan sees of his realm, besides Ravenna, Milano, etc. The imperial Missus in Rome held court in the name of the emperor, and was the sole administrator of criminal justice. He had, also, a kind of superintendence over the papal officials, and received appeals from them. After the death of Charlemagne, a conflict immediately arose between his successor, Louis the Pious, and the Pope. As soon as the report of the death of the emperor reached Rome, the opposition party renewed its attack on Leo III.; but the high-handed manner in which he put down this rising caused much displeasure at the Frankish court, and an investigation was instituted, whose proceedings, however, were stopped by the death of the Pope. For the part which Leo took in the Adoptionist and the Filioque controversies, see those articles.

Lit. — The letters of Leo III. are found in Jaffé: Reg. Pontif.; his correspondence with Charlemagne, in Monumenta Carolina in Jaffé: Bibl. rer. Germanic, tom. iv.; his life, in the Liber Pontificalis, ii. (though much distorted).
LEO IV.

LEO IV. (April 10, 847—July 17, 855) restored and extended the fortifications of Rome, admonished by the frightful invasion of the Saracens in 846, by which the Church of St. Peter (at that time situated outside of the wall) was plundered, and immense treasures carried away by the enemy. By the extension of the wall originated the so-called Civitas Leonina." He also improved the fortifications of it, where he settled a number of Corsicans; but Leopolis, which he founded, instead of the destroyed Circumcellies some miles inland, did not thrive. Though the dependence of the Pope on the emperor still is strikingly illustrated by many events of the reign of Leo IV., a tendency towards independence now becomes noticeable. He begins his bulls with his own name, not with that of the person addressed. He gives the title of Dominus to no one, even not to the emperor. The acts of the synod of 863 are dated, not only from the year of the emperor, but also from that of the Pope, etc. His letters are found in JAFFE: Reg. Pontif.; his life, in Liber Pontificalis. iii. — Leo V. (908) reigned only between thirty and fifty days. He was imprisoned, and compelled to abdicate by his prebyster, Christopherus. The few notices of him still extant are found in WATTERICH: Vita Pontificum, i. 32. — Leo VI. (928—929) reigned for seven months, and five or fifteen days; but nothing is known of him. See WATTERICH, i. 33. — Leo VII. (January, 939—July, 939), a quiet and pious man, who left the government of Rome to Alberic II., the son of Marozia. He was very partial towards the monastery of Cluny, and made Archbishop Friedrich of Mayence papal vicar, and legate and primate of Germany. See his life by FLODOARDUS, in Muratori: Script. rer. Ital., III, 324; sources by JAFFE and WATTERICH. — Leo VIII. (963—965) was elected by the synod which deposed John XII. (Dec. 4, 963) under the influence of Otho I., but met with such an opposition from the Roman people, that he fled from Rome, and was deposed by a synod convened by John XII. (February, 964). John XII., however, had some scruples with respect to the tonsure when he was seven years old, and was deposed by a synod, but the Romans elected Benedict V. Pope. Otho I. once more re-instated Leo VIII. by armed force; but between February and April, 965, he died. Two bulls are ascribed to him,—the one returning the donations of Charlemagne, Pepin, Justinius, etc., to the emperor; and the other surrendering to the emperor the right of appointing popes, archbishops, and bishops. But both bulls are evidently spurious, belonging to the period of the investiture-contest. The sources are found in JAFFE (Reg. Pontif.) and WATTERICH (Vita Pontifici). — Leo IX. (Feb. 12, 1049—April 19, 1054) descended from a noble family in Alsace: his father was a cousin to the emperor, Conrad II. He was bishop of Toul, when, in December, 1048, the emperor, Henry III., and the emissaries of the Roman people, at a meeting at Worms, agreed to the emperors right of appointing prelates,—the one returning the clergy and people of Rome; and in February, 1049, he entered the city in a plain pilgrims garb, accompanied by the young monk Hildebrand. His reign had great importance for the internal organization of the church. The reform which was started at Cluny, and then spread widely among the monks, reached, through him, the church in general. The means he employed was the synod. With the exception of the period between 325 and 381, that vital organ of the church never was in greater activity than during the reign of Leo IV., the palace of which was the road,—travelling from southern Italy to northern Germany, from the centre of France to the centre of Hungary,—he everywhere convened the clergy into synods, discussing the affairs of the church; and by consecrations, ordinations, etc., he everywhere knew how to awaken in the mass of the people an interest in what was going on in the church. The abolition of simony and the establishment of celibacy were his great aims. At one time he thought of deposing every clergyman who had obtained his benefice by simony; but he had to abandon this as too sweeping a measure, as it would strike more than two-thirds of the officers of the church. The celibacy he extended to the orders of deacon; and people already began to speak of unchaste priests, thereby meaning priests who were married. In his external policy he was not so successful. The Normans had taken possession of Benevent; and, as the emperor proved unwilling to come to the defence of the holy see, the Pope himself marched against the intruders, at the head of an army of Italian mercenaries and Suabian volunteers. But he lost the battle at Astagunne, was taken prisoner, and held in captivity at Benevent, from June 23, 1053, to March 12, 1054. He was treated with the utmost respect by his Norman conquerors, but he was not released until he left them what they had taken in the form of papal fiefs. See the articles on BERENGAR OF TOURS AND CURRAULUS, and his biographies by HUNCKLER, 1851 (German) and SPACH, 1864 (French).

LEO X.

LEO X. (April 11, 1513—Dec. 1, 1521), b. at Florence, Dec. 11, 1475; the second son of Lorenzo the Magnificent and Clarissa Orsini; received the tonsure when he was seven years old, and was in the novitiate of the Black Friars in the church of S. Maria in Dominica; and the only reservation he ever made during his papacy was that he should not put on the insignia of his dignity, nor take part in the business of his office, until he was sixteen years old. Meanwhile, his education was carried on without the least regard to the position he was going to occupy in the church. Politian was his teacher in Latin; Johannes Argyrophilius, in Greek; Marsilius Ficinus, and Picus of Mirandola, in philosophy. The Humanists, with their refined Paganism, were his daily converse: the Renaissance, with its elegant sensuality, was his only food. In 1492 he was solemnly introduced into the College of Cardinals, and intrusted with the government of Tuscany as papal legate. During the reign of Alexander VI. he was in the eclipse. The Mediceans were expelled from Florence, and he himself found it advisable to keep aloof from Rome, journeying in Germany, Flanders, and France. But under Julius II. he was again in favor; and his luxurious residence in Rome swarmed with poets, philosophers, artists, and litterateurs of all descriptions. In the battle at Ravenna he held the supreme command, but was defeated. Then he was transported to France; but in Milan he escaped, and returned to Florence. While there, he heard of the death of Julius II. (Feb. 21, 1513). He was sick from a disease which cannot be spoken of, and which was never cured (Gregorovius: Geschichte der Stadt Rom, viii. 197). Nevertheless, he hastened to Rome, and arrived in time to make a bargain with a party of the cardinals (Höfler: Zur Kritik und Quellenkunde, etc., in the Memoirs of the Imperial Academy of Vienna, Philos.-Hist. Classe, vol. xxviii.). He was elected and enthroned under the loud applause of the people.
LEO X.

His foreign policy, always ambiguous, and often false, had in reality no other aim than the aggrandizement of the house of Medici,—the throne of Naples for his brother Julian, and Tuscany, with Ferrara and Urbino, for his nephew Lorenzo. For this purpose he connived at the French plans against Milan, and formed a secret alliance with Louis XII. On the accession of Francis I. he offered to renew the alliance, on the condition of the surrender of the crown of Naples to Julian; and, when Francis declined, he immediately joined the anti-French league. But the brilliant victory at Marignano (Sept. 13, 1515) compelled him to throw himself on the mercy of Francis I.; and at their meeting at Bologna, in December, he had to consent to the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction and the establishment of a concordat, which gave the king, within his realm, the right of ecclesiastical jurisdiction (except in a few cases) and the right of ecclesiastical appointment, only that the annates were paid into the papal treasury. The crown of Naples should go to the house of Valois; and compensation to the house of Medici was spoken of only in very vague terms.

For this purpose he connived at the French plans against Milan, and formed a secret alliance with Louis XII. On the accession of Francis I. he offered to renew the alliance, on the condition of the surrender of the crown of Naples to Julian; and, when Francis declined, he immediately joined the anti-French league. But the brilliant victory at Marignano (Sept. 13, 1515) compelled him to throw himself on the mercy of Francis I.; and at their meeting at Bologna, in December, he had to consent to the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction and the establishment of a concordat, which gave the king, within his realm, the right of ecclesiastical jurisdiction (except in a few cases) and the right of ecclesiastical appointment, only that the annates were paid into the papal treasury. The crown of Naples should go to the house of Valois; and compensation to the house of Medici was spoken of only in very vague terms.

The sale of indulgences seemed to be a good, but it stirred up Luther in Germany. Leo instituted a process against him, though probably without understanding the whole, etc. —— to the despair of his creditors —— there was no money enough in the treasury to pay for the funeral candles.

LEO XII. (elected April 1, consecrated April 10, d. April 27, 1805) belonged to the family of Medici. See Petruccielli della Gattina: Hist. diplom. des conclaves, ii. 404-432.

Leo XII. (Sept. 28, 1824—Feb. 10, 1829), Annibale della Genga; b. Aug. 22, 1770; descended from a noble family in the Romagna; was ordained priest in 1783, and made archbishop of Tyre in 1793, and cardinal in 1816. After the death of Pius VII., he carried the conclave, principally because he was a decided adversary of Consalvi. Nevertheless, all the principal acts of his reign —— the close approach to France, the strict measures against the Carbonari, the jubilee of 1825, the organization of the church in the South-American republics, the assertions for the emancipation of the Roman Catholics in England, and the direct influence of Consalvi. In spite of his enecyclical of May 3, 1824, which condemned the maxim of tolerance as identical with indifferentism, and contained some very harsh invectives against the Bible societies, the general character of his reign was moderation. See Tarteaud de Montal, Memoires du pape Leo XII. (Paris, 1843, 2 vols.), of which Scherer's Leo XII. (Schaffhausen, 1844) is only a miserable compilation. Köberle: Leo XII. und der Geist der röm. Hierarchie, Leipzig, 1846; Wiseman: Recollections of the Four Last Popes, Lon-LEPROSY.

This disease—one of the most fearful of ancient and modern times—is insidious in its onset, but generally keeping steadily on its destructive course, in spite of all the skill of medical art—has existed from times preceding the ages which history takes cognizance of in its backward sweep, has spread widely over the civilized and barbarous world, and still exists endemic in some regions. The Hebrews were sorely afflicted with it before leaving Egypt (indeed, the banks of the Nile, with their humid atmosphere, seem to have been a cradle of the disease); so much so, that, according to the historian Manetho (Josephus: Cont. Ap., I, 20), the Egyptians drove them out on account of this disease of leprosy. It probably existed in Syria before the Hebrews came, bringing it with them into that country. From Egypt and Palestine it spread to Greece and Italy, and other countries bordering upon the Mediterranean. It appears to have been introduced into Central and Western Europe somewhere between the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, probably through the agency of the returning crusaders, and spread with alarming rapidity. Towards the end of the fifteenth century, it had almost disappeared from those sections of Europe, and somewhat curiously, as it disappeared, syphilis appeared, thus giving ground for the opinion of some authors, that syphilis is a debased form of leprosy; but this view is no longer held.

At present, leprosy, or Elephantiasis Grecorum, is found on the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean, Black, and Caspian Seas, in Norway, Asia Minor, Syria, and Palestine, on the coasts of the Indian and China Seas, in the islands of the Australian Archipelago, in South and Central America, and in Iceland.

By almost all peoples and races, leprosy has been regarded as a visitation of God on account of some sin, and the lepers have been kept apart, or into whatsoever house they entered, gogue reserved for them: and any thing the lepers have touched, or into whatsoever house they entered, was declared unclean. Amongst the Jews, not only was leprosy considered unclean (Lev. xii. 44-46), but to render certain garments and houses, and vessels (Lev. xiv. 47-50 and xiv. 38-39); and ceremonial were prescribed for their cleansing. The exact nature of this leprosy of garments and houses is not known. Its distinctive signs were, in a garment, greenish or reddish spots, which spread; in a house, greenish or reddish streaks lower than the surface of the wall, which spread. This was, probably, in either case, a species of mildew, or else indicated the presence of some fungus, which, by drying, would make the ground by some, the disease. The Targum of Palestine regarded it as a visitation on a house built with unjust gains.

The Persians went even farther than the Jews, and excluded foreign lepers from their country. The Greek writers thought leprosy was a punishment for some sin against Phebus. The Arabs will never sleep near, eat with, lepers, nor marry into families known to be leprous. By the Church of Rome in early ages, lepers were regarded as dead, and the last rites of the church were said over them. In 757 A.D. it was declared a ground for divorce, and the sound party could marry again. In France, at different times, laws were passed forbidding lepers to marry. The leper lost all control of his property, and could not inherit any: he could not act as a witness, nor challenge to a duel. Oddy enough, while, in general, leprosy was regarded as a punishment, in some parts of Europe it was held to be a sign of divine preference. In modern times, it was thought to preserve her chastity. They were regarded as saints, and rendered much honor and alms. All over Europe the lepers had to live apart, and had special churches, priests, etc. In the sixteenth century a special dress was prescribed for them. The houses in which these unfortunate ones lived were called “lazar-houses.” They were generally located just outside the gates of the cities, in close proximity to some body of water; so that the inmates could bathe. They were usually religious in character. The inmates had to be silent, and attend morning prayer and mass; and in some of the houses they had to say so many prayers each day, that they had very little time for anything else. No woman was allowed to enter the male lazars-houses, excepting the washerwoman; and she had to be of sober age and good manners, and must enter the house at a fixed time of day, when she could be seen of all. A female relative had to obtain special permission before she could speak to a male leper. These houses were supported largely by begging, entirely by alms.

Frequently leprosy is hereditary, the disease lying dormant in the system for a number of years, to break out at or after the age of puberty. By proper hygiene the outbreak may be prevented. Often the etiology is obscure, and various conjectures have been formed as to it. Doubtless it is due to some poison in the blood. It is seen mostly in localities where air and earth are humid, as upon the coasts of seas, banks of rivers, and on islands; and the climatic is probably the largest factor in its production. Thus, during the forty-years’ wandering of the Jews in the desert, with its dry atmosphere, it is likely that fewer cases occurred than when in the land of Egypt. That food may have any great influence upon the disease, wound of the development of the disease is questionable; though it would seem that bad water, salt or decaying fish, salt meat, etc., aggravate the disease. It has been thought by some commentators that the Jews were forbidden to eat pork on account of its tendency to produce leprosy. Violent outbreaks of passion have been assigned as a cause, as in the case of Uzziah, who, in a fit of passion, performed a priestly office (2 Chron. xxvi. 21). By the ancients it was thought to be contagious, but this theory has recently lost ground. By some, the disease is regarded as of nervous origin. As to sex, more males are attacked than females. Neither rich nor poor are exempt. Some authorities now claim to have found a parasite peculiar to leprosy.

Between what is called “leprosy” in our version of the Bible, and the leprosy as described by the best authorities on skin diseases, there is very little correspondence: indeed, the writer is inclined to adopt the theory advanced in the article on leprosy in Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible (American edition, vol. ii. p. 1630), that the leprosy of the Mosaic dispensation (Lepra Mosaiica) is not one disease, but an enumeration of certain symptoms, which, on account of their frightful character, and tendency to spread, would render the individual an object of aversion, and demand his separation. It is certainly but in few points akin to Elephantiasis Gregorum, the modern leprosy.

The symptoms of leprosy, as in Lev. xxiii., and the expression used there—“the leper lost all his property”—lead one to conjecture that the Lepra Mosaiica is analogous to the Lepra vulgaris, more commonly called Psoriasis. For the sake of clearness we will give briefly the biblical leprosy, and then the modern form. It must be remembered that diseases have a tendency to change their form as they move from land to land, and this may account somewhat for the marked difference in the diseases now presented.

Lepra Mosaiica (Heb. Tzara'ath), leprosy of Lev. xiii. and xiv. Its most marked symptoms were “a rising, a scab, or a bright spot,” “in the skin of the flesh,” (Lev. xiii. 2), with a hair turned white in the rising, scab, or bright spot, these being deeper than the scar-skin (xiii. 3), and spreading of the scab, etc. (xii. 7, 8). As a more advanced case we have “quick raw flesh in the rising” (xiii. 10). In verse 18 we find that the disease may take its origin in a boil, with the same symptoms. In verse 20 we have the disease appearing in the beard, or hair of the head,—a great calamity to the Jew, who was so proud of his beard; and here it comes in the form of a scall, with thin yellow hairs in the patches. These are all the symptoms we have; and they are probably given merely as initial symptoms, so that the priest should recognize the onslaught of different diseases in their earliest stages. The “rising” may correspond to the tubercles of Lepra tuberculosa, or the bullae of Lepra anaesthetica of the most recent authors. The scall of the head may be the Morphae alpéricata, or Fœrmange, placed by Kapossi (Hautkrankheiten, Wien, 1880) as a subdivision of the second form of leprosy,—the Lepra maculosa. In verses 12-17 we read, that, if the patient is white all over, he is clean, no doubt because the disease had then run its course. In this case it is probably a general Psoriasis.

Modern leprosy, the Elephantiasis Gregorum, is divided into three varieties: (1) Lepra tuberculosa, the tubercular form; (2) Lepra maculosa, the spotted or streaked form; (3) Lepra anaesthetica, the anaesthetic form. For months or years before the outbreak of the disease, the patient may have vague prodromal symptoms, as weakness, loss... of appetite, sleeplessness, lassitude, slight fever, diarrhoea, and sometimes pemphigus bleo (little blisters). In the Lepra tuberosa the disease begins with the outbreak, on the general surface of the body, of irregular or round shaped spots, in size from a finger-nail to the palm of the hand; at first red, and disappearing under pressure; soon becoming gray to sepiá brown or bronze color. Over the spots the skin is smooth and glistening (as if painted with oil), or bronzed and thickened, or slightly prominent, and painful on pressure. The spots are distributed over the trunk and extremities,—face, hands, and feet. In some situations they become confluent; in some disappear; in others disappear in the centre, while the peripheries extend, thus forming ring shapes. The tubercles, the distinctive type of this form, appear later after the disease has lasted months, or may be years; are of various sizes, up to that of a hazel-nut at the surface of the skin, or somewhat protruding; dirty-brown-red and glistening; hard, elastic to soft to the touch, covered with epidermis scales; diffuse, or closely pressed together, and forming, either irregular uneven plaques, or regular tubercles of the eye sets in. The face becomes pale, and sometimes anaesthesia of the eye sets in. The extremities also become excavated; and finally opening joints, and self destruction give him the greatest pain. The anesthesia is complete, the patient not feeling a needle thrust deep into the muscles. The chief nerve-trunks become swollen, and painful to pressure. Sometimes hyperesthesia precedes anesthesia to such a degree, that the patient is not able to sit or lie for any length of time in one place, cannot take anything in his mouth, nor walk, nor stand, nor sitting give him the greatest pain. The anesthesia is followed by atrophy of muscles, and wrinkling; the sphincter muscle of the eye becomes lamed; the under eyelid and the under-lip hang down; the tears flow over the cheeks; and the saliva runs dribbling out of the mouth; and thus the face oftentimes, already swollen and out of shape by the presence of the tubercles, assumes a peculiar, old, idiotic, foolish expression. The flexor muscles of the hand not being atrophied so much as the extensor, the fingers become half bent, the hollow of the hand becomes convex and pressed forward, the back of the hand bent in; the finger ends becomes clubbed; finger-nails thinned; the hair falls out. Ulceration finally sets in in the anaesthetic places, or the tissues gradually atrophy away till the skin, fasciae, tendons, disappear, one or another joint is laid bare, when suddenly a whole foot, hand, or extremity falls off. Patient grows foolish and apathetic, and dies after a lapse of eighteen to nineteen years.

The tubercles are composed of a granulation membrane rich in cells, which follows the walls of the vessels, and spreads out from them through the whole thickness of the skin, settling up, by the pressure caused by its presence, a disturbance of circulation and function of the skin; and, extending into the deeper parts, gives rise to a painless suppuration of the joints. The tubercles are also deposited in the main nerve-trunks, at first only in their sheaths, but ultimately pressing in between the fibrilla.

Treatment is only symptomatic. The best is to remove the patient from leprous regions.

The lepers whom our Lord healed were probably not afflicted with Elephantiasis Grecorum, but with Elephantiasis vulgaris (Fesoriais). Outside of the case mentioned the lepers, managed by a Moravian couple, who, in a truly Christ-like spirit, care for these wretched and disgusting sufferers.

Leprosy is biblically regarded as an emblem of sin, because of its loathsome nature, its affecting every part, and its incurability, save upon divine intervention. Again, as leprosy excluded one LERINS, Convent of. When, in the latter part of the fourth century, the enthusiasm of asceticism, after the model of the Egyptian anchorites and monks, began to spread in Western Europe, the islands strewn along the coasts of Dalmatia, Italy, and Southern France became the favorite abodes of the votaries of an apostolic spirit. The two islands in front of Cannes — Lerin, the larger, the present Saint Marguerite, and Lerinum, the minor, the present Saint Honorat — were also peopled with anchorites; and about 400 St. Honorat settled with his followers on the latter. A cenobium was formed, a monastery was built; and from the middle of the fifth century the convent of Lerins exercised for several centuries a decisive influence on the church of Southern France. In course of time, the discipline became weakened. At the close of the sixth century, Gregory the Great (Ep., V. 56, IX. 8) admonished the abbot Bonon, or Conon, to introduce reform. A little later Attala left Lerins, and joined Columbanus at Luxovium (Jonas Bobb: Vita Attala, in Mabillon: Act. Sanct., ii. 123). In the middle of the seventh century, the attempt of A guit to introduce the rules of St. Benedict resulted in his assassination (Alberti Adalaidi: Vita Aigulf., in Mabillon: Acta Sanct., ii. 629). Nevertheless the moral standing of the institution was generally commendable; and though the monastery was plundered in the eighth century by the Arabs, in the tenth by the Saracens, and after wards by the Normans, it still preserved its independence, though immensely rich. In the fourteenth century the monks refused to be called fraters, and demanded to be called dominii; and a chapter-general of 1319 decided that the monks should be allowed to hold private property, and do with it as they liked. But the real decay of the institution began with the removal of the papal residence to Avignon. After discovering how wealthy the abbey was, John XXII., Clement VI., Innocent VI., in order to get hold of a part of that wealth, gave away the abbey in commendam, that is, sold it. In the second half of the fifteenth century the institution partially lost its independence, and was united to the Benedictine Congregation of St. Justina of Cassino. Hence resulted a great deal of haggling over the monastic materials for his De origine moribus et gestis Saxonum, a history of Scotland, in ten books, down to 1513, published at Rome, 1578; reprinted in Holland, 1675. Upon this work his fame rests; but he also wrote much in defense of Mary, and for her benefit composed De afflicti animi consolatione et tranquilli animi munimentum, Paris, 1674. He was released in 1573, went to the Continent, endeavored to enlist foreign princes in behalf of Mary. In 1593 he was made Bishop of Ross. He shared the misfortunes of the royal cause, and participated in, indeed originated, some of the innumerable intrigues Mary connived at. For this conduct he suffered imprisonment. But he made good use of his enforced leisure by gathering materials for his De orijine moribus et gestis Saxonum, a history of Scotland, in ten books, down to 1561, published at Rome, 1578; reprinted in Holland, 1675. Upon this work his fame rests; but he also wrote much in defense of Mary, and for her benefit composed De afflicti animi consolatione et tranquilli animi munimentum, Paris, 1674. He was released in 1573, went to the Continent, endeavored to enlist foreign princes in behalf of Mary. In 1593 he was made Bishop of Coutances in Normandy, but soon after, wearied with life, retired to a monastery. See his Life, London, 1885.

LESLIE, Charles, author of A Short and Easy Method with the Deists; b. at Raphoe, County Donegal, Ireland, 1650; d. at Glasgow, Monaghan, April 13, 1722. His father (d. 1671) had been bishop of the Orkneys, of Raphoe, and of Clogher successively. Charles was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1671; removed to England, and studied law at the Temple, but in 1680 took orders in the Church of England. He returned to Ireland in 1687; became chancellor of the Cathedral of Connor, but lost his position in consequence of his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. In this he was true to his family traditions; for his father had previously declined to be a privy councillor to Charles I.) and to his declared preferences. In 1688 he went to England, and for twenty years lived un molested, carrying vigorously on his controversies against Quakers, Socinians, Roman Catholics, Jews, and, above all, Deists. In 1710 he published The Good Old Cause; or, lying in Truth, — a pamphlet against Bishop Burnet, with whom he had had previously a controversy on the doctrine of passive obedience, to which he as a non-juror held; and soon after fled to the Pretender, at Bar-le-Duc. He staid faithfully in the Pretender's service, tried to win the latter to Protestantism, shared his hopes and misfortunes; but in 1721 he obtained permission to return home, where he soon after died.

Leslie is now remembered principally by one book, A Short and Easy Method with the Deists, wherein the Certainty of the Christian Religion is demonstrated by Infallible Proof from Four Rules, which are Incompatible to any Imposture that ever has been, or that can possibly be, London, 1897 (often reprinted, e.g., in Bohn's Christian Evidences, Lon-Even his dogmatical works, Handbuch d. christl. Religionstheorie, etc., have a decidedly practical and apologetic character. See his biography by Holseher. Hanover, 1797.

LESSING, Gotttheil Ephraim, b. at Kamenz in Upper Lusatia, Jan. 22, 1729; d. at Brunswick, Feb. 16, 1781. His father, a Lutheran minister, took him out of the school of Kamenz, because the rector, in an opening address, had called the theatre a scene of sin. And even when in 1746 young Lessing was sent to the university of Leipzig to study theology, it was the stage, where just at that moment the famous actress Neuber shone her brightest, which occupied the larger portion of his attention. He studied theology, philosophy, and philology; and in each of these departments of science he, in course of time, not only accumulated a vast amount of knowledge, but acquired real insight. Nevertheless, aesthetics, literature, and more especially the drama, formed the true field of his genius. In 1748 Lessing brought out a libretto for a puppet play (Der junge Gelehrte) on the stage; and in the same year Lessing removed to Berlin, where, with various incidental interruptions, he resided till 1760. In Berlin he exclusively occupied himself with literary work; though for some time he still wore the title of Studens medicin. He made the acquaintance of Voltaire, whose pleas in the notorious suit against Hirsch he translated into German. He also made the acquaintance of Mendelssohn and Nicolai, with whom he edited the Briefe, die neueste Literatur betręfend. Many of his criticisms attracted attention. His new drama, Miss Sara Sampson (1755), produced a sensation. He began to make a name for himself. In 1760 he accepted a position as secretary to Gen. von Tauntzen at Breslau, and there he remained till 1765. The life in the barracks did not displease him; and he found time to continue his studies, and write Laokoon and Minna von Barnhelm. The prospect of a position as librarian in Berlin allured him away from Breslau, but deceived him. In 1767 he went to Hamburg as a kind of artistic director of the theatre of the city; and the afterwards twitted him to belong his Dramaturgie and his archaeological controversy with Kotz. In 1770 he was appointed librarian at Wolfenbüttel; and while there he published Emile Galotti (1772) and Nathan der Weise (1779), translated into English by Ellen Frothingham, New York, 1871), Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (1780), and the Fragmente eines Ungenannten (1774–78) (partially translated into English, Fragmente aus Reimarus, London, 1879), together with the whole Goeze controversy.

The influence which Lessing exercised on German literature, through his criticism and through his dramas, was decisive, and is unmistakable, with respect to its character. More obscure is his relation to theology. If those who still make a distinction between the religion of Christ and the Christian religion are right, then they may point to Lessing as their predecessor and the founder of a new theological school. If, indeed, this so-called religion of Christ is the true Christianity, then Lessing was certainly a true Christian, a Protestant in the full sense of the word; and he has carried farther the work of Luther. But if, on the other side, those are right, who, on the instance of Schleiermacher, consider the personal relation to the person of the Saviour, and not the doctrinal system, as the essence of Christianity, less Lessius was in spirit of the doctrine which he always nourished for Jesus of Nazareth, not a Christian man. His theological stand-point is very difficult to define. First, as he confesses himself, he often spoke as a learner, not as a teacher. Next, he evidently went through no important development during the latter part of his life, for he remained pretty much as he was before. F. H. Jacobi has published a conversation which he held with Lessius at Woblenbüttel, July 6 and 7, 1780; but it does not show that Lessing ended a confirmed Spino- zist; while Wackernagel, Stirm, and others think that they have discovered in his Erzie- hung des Menschenlebens a decided progress towards Christianity. Both these opinions are probably somewhat exaggerated. The truth seems to be, that, even at the end of his life, Lessing's theological stand-point was still in the process of formation; that is, unfinished, unsettled.

Lit. — Collected editions of Lessing's works are very numerous, that by Hempel the most complete. His life was written by Th. W. Dan- zel (vol. i., 1850) and G. E. Gührauer (vol. ii., 1853-54), new edition by Malzahn and Box- berger, Berlin, 1880; [By J. Claasz and Gutern- loch, 1881, 2 vols., and by A. Dünster, Leipzig, 1882]. See H. Ritter: Ueber L. philosoph. und religiöse Grundätze, Göttingen, 1847; Schwarz: Lessing als Theolog, Halle, 1854; Beyerhald: Nathan der Weise und das positive Christenthum, Berlin, 1863.

Lessius, Leonhard, b. at Brecht-in-Brabant, Oct. 1, 1554; d. at Louvain, Jan. 5, 1623. He was a member of the Society of Jesus, and teacher of philosophy and theology at Louvain. He owed his reputation principally to his work on morals, Libri IV. de Justinia, 1668 (afterwards often re- printed), though it shows the same marks of sophistry as most works on morals by Jesuits. At present he is remembered chiefly on account of the part he took in the Augustinian controversies. The Pope having condemned seventy-six propositions in the writings of Bajus (1567), Lessius went so far in his polemics that the facul- ty of Louvain, in 1587, found occasion to con- demn as Pelagian thirty-four propositions drawn from his works and those of Hamel, another Jesuit. See AEGAMNE: Bibl. Script. Societatis Jesu, p. 501.

Levites, Synod of. At Lifinnae, or Léstines, a royal villa near Binche in Hainault, the second Austrasian synod during the reign of Caroloman was held, probably in 743. The acts of that synod are in many respects nothing but a confirmation of the acts of the first Austrasian synod of 742. At some points, however, the tendency of model- ling the Austrasian synod on the Carolingian, after that of the primitive Church stands out quite prominently, and with respect to immense seculariza- tion, under the Carolingians, of the estates of the Church, which almost amounted to a formal divisio between Church and State, the acts are of great interest. See Paul Roth: D. Sakular- tation des Kirchenguts unter den Karolinger, nearest kinsman who resigned the right or duty (being neither the brother-in-law of Ruth nor Mahlon's brother) drew off his shoe. This plucking of the shoe was a symbol of ceding a property. The widow was not to marry another man so long as she thought it possible that her brother-in-law would fulfill his duty: if she did, such a connection was regarded as adultery, and the offender was burnt (Gen. xxxviii. 24). High priests (Lev. xxii. 14) were not bound to adhere to this law. That this law was yet in full power in the time of Jesus, we see from Matt. xxii. 24 sq.

LEVITES. The Levites are the descendants of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxix. 34, xxxv. 25). This name was given to him by his mother, with the assurance, "This time will my husband be joined unto me." One fact only is recorded of him, the deed of which is treated for this cause the curse resting upon them is of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxvii. 34, xxxv. 23). This name was given to him by his mother, with the assurance, "This time will my husband be joined unto me." One fact only is recorded of him, the deed of which is treated for this cause the curse resting upon them is of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxvii. 34, xxxv. 23). This name was given to him by his mother, with the assurance, "This time will my husband be joined unto me." One fact only is recorded of him, the deed of which is treated for this cause the curse resting upon them is of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxvii. 34, xxxv. 23). This name was given to him by his mother, with the assurance, "This time will my husband be joined unto me." One fact only is recorded of him, the deed of which is treated for this cause the curse resting upon them is of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxvii. 34, xxxv. 23). This name was given to him by his mother, with the assurance, "This time will my husband be joined unto me." One fact only is recorded of him, the deed of which is treated for this cause the curse resting upon them is of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxvii. 34, xxxv. 23). This name was given to him by his mother, with the assurance, "This time will my husband be joined unto me." One fact only is recorded of him, the deed of which is treated for this cause the curse resting upon them is of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxvii. 34, xxxv. 23). This name was given to him by his mother, with the assurance, "This time will my husband be joined unto me." One fact only is recorded of him, the deed of which is treated for this cause the curse resting upon them is of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxvii. 34, xxxv. 23). This name was given to him by his mother, with the assurance, "This time will my husband be joined unto me." One fact only is recorded of him, the deed of which is treated for this cause the curse resting upon them is of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxv-seven years; left three sons, Gerson, Kohath, and Merari (Gen. xvi. 11; Exod. vi. 19), from whom went forth eight branches (Exod. vi. 17-19; Num. iii. 17-39 [comp. 1 Chron. vi. 1 sq., and xxiii.]).—two from Gerson, Libni (for which 1 Chron. xii. 7 reads Ladan) and Shimai; four from Kohath, Amram (to whom belonged Moses and Aaron), Ishar, Hebron, and Uzziel; and two from Merari, Mahali and Mushi. When, after the making of the golden calf, Moses called upon those who were on the Lord's side, the Levites gathered themselves together unto him, and slew those who had sinned (Exod. xxxii. 26 sq.). In them was the zeal of their progenitor revived, but not for their own, but for God's honor; and for this cause the curse resting upon them is changed into a blessing.

From this time they occupy a prominent position: they become consecrated unto the Lord. According to Exod. xiii. every first-born of man or cattle is dedicated unto Jehovah since the exodus from Egypt. In place of the first-born of all the children of Israel, Jehovah now takes the Levites (Num. viii. 16), and, instead of their cattle, that of the Levites (iii. 45). Since, according to verse 43, all the first-born males were 22,273, the number of the Levites, however, only was 22,000, the surplus is equalized by a redemption money of five shekels apiece, to be paid to Aaron and his sons (iii. 46-51). As to the significance of the representation of the first-born by the Levites, the following is to be borne in mind: As the Egyptians, on account of their sinfulness, were judged in their first-born sons, who thus became vicariously a sacrifice for the whole, which was to be destroyed; so, likewise, Israel, on the contrary, whom Jehovah has elected and redeemed from human slavery, in testimony thereof that its very existence and possession was owing entirely to the divine grace, was to bring vicariously the first-born of his domestic blessing for the whole, as a payment to God. But the offering of men is not effected by killing, but by their dedication to a continual service in the sanctuary (1 Sam. i. 22, 28). Since, however, the people, on account of its impurity, cannot approach God in the holy place, and consequently cannot appoint its priest for a perpetual service, in place of the first-born, one tribe is by divine election permanently taken away from its usual avocation, and is placed in a near relationship to Jehovah, to perform the service in the holy place, thus mediating to the people the communion of the sanctuary. The Levites are thus, in the first place, the living sacrifice with which the people pays Jehovah what it owes unto him; in the second place, they are the substitute for the first-born. In their first relation the Levites are given as a gift to the priests (Num. xviii. 6): they were, with reference to their name, to join themselves to the priest, and serve him. In their second relation the Levites take part of the mediatorial position which belongs to the priesthood. The tribe of Levi forms the basis of a gradually advancing representation of the people before God. As Israel as a whole has a priestly character over and against the nations of the earth (Exod. xix. 4-6), so is this character in higher degree stamped upon the tribe of Levi (Num. xvi. 9). As to the functionary duties of the Levites, they are to keep the charge of the sanctuary with the priests in general, yet distinctively separated from the latter. The priests shall keep their office for every thing of the altar and within the veil (Num. xviii. 7); but the service of the Levites is called service of the tabernacle of the Lord (comp. Num. i. 53, xvi. 9, xviii. 4). In the journey through the wilderness the Levites had to bear the tabernacle and all the vessels thereof (Num. i. 50 sq.), especially, also, the ark of the covenant (Deut. xxxi. 26): the latter had to be first covered by the priests (Num. iv. 5 sq.); but the Levites were strictly forbidden to look at it (Num. iv. 17 sq.). The different duties were assigned to the three tribes (Num. iii. 23-37, and iv.). The Gershonites had charge of the coverings and curtains; the Kohathites, of the holy vessels; the Merarites, of the boards, bars, pillars. The latter and the first were under the charge of Ithamar; the Kohathites, under that of Eleazar. The age required for such service was, according to Num. iv. 3, 23, 30, from thirty to fifty, whilst in Num. viii. 24, 25, it is said to commence at twenty-five. This contradiction is easily solved by the assumption that the former passages refer to the service at the transport of the tabernacle; the latter, to the Levitical service in general.

The act of consecration of the Levites is recorded Num. viii. 5-22. The first act was to sprinkle them with the water of purifying: They had, in the next place, to shave off all the hair from their body, and then wash their garments. After this, they were brought before the door of the tabernacle, along with two bullocks, two rams, and seven lambs mingled with oil, when the whole congregation, through their elders who represented them, laid their hands upon the heads of the Levites, and set them apart for the service of the sanctuary, to occupy the place of the first-born of the whole congregation; whereupon the priests waved them before the Lord. Thus the Levites, who, as the first-born of the Lord, it was necessary that the tribe of Levi should be relieved from the temporal pur-suites of the rest of the people to enable them to give themselves wholly to their spiritual functions. For this reason they were to have no territorial possessions, but Jehovah was to be their inheritance (Num. xviii. 20; Deut. x. 9). Therefore it was ordained that they should receive from the productivity of the land, from which the Levites, in their turn, had to offer a tithe to the priests (Num. xviii. 21-24 sq.). The Levites could eat the tithes everywhere. As if to provide for the contingency of failing crops, or the like, and the consequent inadequacy of the tithes thus assigned to them, the Levite, no less than the widow and the orphan, was commended to the special kindness of the people (Deut. xii. 19, xiv. 27, 29).

As an above, the Levites, according to Num. xxxv. 6, received forty-eight cities, together with their suburbs, six of which were to be cities of refuge. This provision also the priest, Afterwards, however, thirteen of the forty-eight cities were assigned to the priests (Josh. xxi. 4 sq.) in the territories of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon. Of the remaining thirty-five cities belonging to the Levites, ten were in the territories of Ephraim, Dan, and Half Manasseh (West); thirteen in Half Manasseh (East), Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali; and twelve in Zebulon, Reuben, and Gad. But the Levites were by no means the sole occupants or proprietors: they were simply to have other cities, not in the possession of the Israelites. This provision includes also the priests. This provision included also the priests. This provision includes also the priests.

The Levites were allowed to sell their houses: unless it is resumed at other Israelites lived in them those houses which they required as dwellings, and the fields necessary for the pasture of their cattle. This is evident from the fact that the Levites were allowed to sell their houses: otherwise Lev. xxi. 32 sq. would have no meaning, unless it is presumed that other Israelites lived together with the Levites.

That the Levites in the time of the Judges did not occupy all the cities allotted to them, may be seen from the fact that Aijalon (Josh. xxi. 24; Judg. i. 35) and Geriz (Josh. xxi. 21) were, like many other cities, not in the possession of the Israelites. The very fact that not all Canaanites were driven out from the land made it impossible to carry out the provisions for the Levites; and thus many of the cities allotted to the Levites were not occupied by those allotted to the Levites (comp. Judg. xvi. 7, xix. 1). That, in spite of these troublesome times, the office of the Levites was known among the people, may be seen from Judg. xvi. xvi.: otherwise we could not understand why Micah (Judg. xvii. 13) should rejoice for having a Levite to his priest.

The activity of David in behalf of the cultus included also the re-organization of the Levitical order. When the ark was carried up to Jerusalem, their claim to be the bearers of it was publicly acknowledged (1 Chron. xvi. 2). The Levites engaged in conveying the ark were divided into six father's houses, headed by six chiefs, four belonging to Kohath, one to Gershom, and one to Merari (1 Chron. xxv. 5 sq.). Of special importance is the Levites being employed for the first time in choral service (1 Chron. xvi. 5 sq.), others, again, were appointed as doorkeepers (1 Chron. xvi. 39 sq.). Still the thorough re-organization of the whole tribe was effected by David in the last days of his life, when he thought of building the temple. The Levites, from thirty years of age and upward, were, first of all, numbered, when it was found that they were thirty-eight thousand (1 Chron. xxiv. 2-3). Of these, twenty-four thousand were appointed to assist the priests in the work of the sanctuary, six thousand as judges and scribes, four thousand as gate-keepers, and four thousand as musicians. Like the priests, the first class, or gate-keepers, too, were subdivided into twenty-four choirs, each headed by a chief (1 Chron. xxiv.); and assisted by eleven masters belonging to the same family. Four of the chiefs were sons of Asaph, a descendant of Gershom (1 Chron. xxv. 2); six were sons of Jeduthun, also called Ethan, a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. xxv. 3); and fourteen were sons of Hoshah, a descendant of Kohath (1 Chron. xxvi. 4). The third class, or the musicians, were subdivided into twenty-four choirs, and were headed by twenty-four chiefs from the three great families of Levi: seven were sons of Meheleemiah, a descendant of Kohath; thirteen were from Obed-edom, a descendant of Gershom; and four were sons of Hoshah, a descendant of Merari. These families had to supply the temple daily with twenty-four sentinel-posts. For the fourth class, or judges and scribes, see 1 Chron. xxvi. 29 sq. This re-organization effected by David was adopted by his son Solomon when the temple was completed (2 Chron. viii. 14 sq.).

Different from the Levites were the Nethinim, who performed the menial work for the Levites: hence they are mentioned along with the Levites (1 Chron. ix. 2; Ez. vii. 24 sq.). The original stock of the Nethinim were probably the Gibeonites, whom Joshua made "hewers of wood, and drawers of water" (Josh. ix. 27). The Nethinim of 1 Chron. ix. 2, Ez. ii. 43, were probably sprung from captives taken by David in the later wars, who were assigned to the service of the tabernacle, replacing possibly the Gibeonites, who had been slain by Saul (2 Sam. xxvi. 1). Undoubtedly these Nethinim were obliged to keep the Mosaic law. From Neh. x. 29 sq. we know that such was the case in the pontificate of Nehemiah.

But to return to the Levites. The revolt of the ten tribes, and the policy pursued by Jeroboam, obliged the Levites to leave the cities assigned to them in the territory of Israel, and gather round the metropolis of Judah (2 Chron. ii. 19 sq.). In the Bible history of Judah the Levites are scarcely mentioned; yet when they are, it is in a way which presupposes the existence of Levitical institutions. They are sent out by Jehoshaphat to instruct and judge the people (2 Chron. xix. 8-10). Prophets of their order encourage the king in his war against Moab and Ammon, and go before his army with their loud hallelujahs (2 Chron. xx. 21). They became especially prominent under Hezekiah, as consecrating themselves to the special work of cleansing and repairing the temple (2 Chron. xxxix. 12-15); and the hymns of David and of Asaph were again restored. Their old privileges were restored, and the payment of tithes was renewed (2 Chron. xxxi. 4). The prominence into which they had been brought by Hezekiah and Josiah had apparently tempted the Levites to think that they might encroach permanently on the special functions of the priesthood; and thus... the sin of Korah was renewed (Ezek. xlv. 10-14, xlviii. 11). After the Captivity, the first body of returning exiles had but few Levites (Ez. ii. 36-40). They who did come took their old parts at the foundation and dedication of the second temple (Ez. iii. 10, vi. 18). In the next movement under Ezra their reluctance was even more strongly marked. None of them presented themselves at the first great gathering (Ez. viii. 13). According to a Jewish tradition (Mishna, Sota, IX. 10), Ezra is said to have punished the backwardness of the Levites by depriving them of their tithes, and transferring the right to the priest; but Neh. x. 38, xiii. 10, is against this tradition. Under Nehemiah the number of the Levites had greatly increased.

Among those who returned from the exile were the Nethinim also. Their number was six hundred and twelve, of whom three hundred and ninety-two returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. ii. 58, Neh. vii. 90), and two hundred and twenty with Ezra (Ez. viii. 20), under the leadership of Ziza and God (Neh. xi. 11). Some of them lived in the proximity of the temple (Neh. iii. 26); others dwelt with the Levites in their own cities (Ez. ii. 70). They were exempted from taxation by the Persian satrap (Ez. vii. 24), because of belonging to the temple. With the destruction of the temple, the order of the Levites, as well as of the priests, lost its significance: the synagogue is not the Nethinim also. Their number was six hundred and twelve, of whom three hundred and ninety-two returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. ii. 58, Neh. vii. 90), and two hundred and twenty with Ezra (Ez. viii. 20), under the leadership of Ziza and God (Neh. xi. 11). Some of them lived in the proximity of the temple (Neh. iii. 26); others dwelt with the Levites in their own cities (Ez. vii. 70). They were exempted from taxation by the Persian satrap (Ez. vii. 24), because of belonging to the temple. With the destruction of the temple, the order of the Levites, as well as of the priests, lost its significance: the synagogue is not

DUTCH CHURCH, and so continued till the last. He was an eager and lifelong student, and of such versatility, that no subject repelled him. He delighted to work out problems in the higher mathematics, and was enthusiastic in the study of astronomy and music. But his preference was for linguistics and philosophy. He was at home not only in Latin and Greek literature, but in the Semitic languages, being more familiar with Arabic than any other scholar in America.

Being early accustomed to the use of the pen, he poured forth during forty years a constant stream of articles in newspapers, magazines, and reviews, touching every theme which interests the Christian, the patriot, or the scholar; and in no case could the treatment be said to be careless or superficial. Although he wrote so much, he wrote nothing that was not worth reading. His larger publications were Plato contra Atheos (in Greek, being the tenth book of the Dialogue on Laws, with luminous notes and discussions), New York, 1844; The Six Days of Creation, Schenectady, 1855; New and Old, of the Bible and Science, Schenectady, 1856; The Divine Human in the Scriptures, New York, 1860; State Rights, a Photograph from the Ruins of Ancient Greece, 1862; additions to the Notes on Genesis in Lange's Bible-Werk, edited by Dr. Schaff, New York, 1868; Metrical Version of Ecclesiastes, with Notes, in Schaff's Lange, 1870; Metrical Version of Job, with Notes, in same, 1874; The Light by which we see Light; or, Nature and the Scriptures (Vedder Lectures), 1875. Dr. Lewis had nearly every quality requisite for the successful handling of the subjects he took up. He had a keen and subtle intellect, a fertile imagination, and a quick perception of recondite relations. His style was fresh, incisive, and eloquent. His vast learning never overpowered his native force, but simply furnished the materials for comparison and illustration. He had a profound reverence for God and his word, and a supreme devotion to truth. And although, by conviction and lifelong experience, a humble believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, he would never advocate his cause by an argument which he thought unsound or even doubtful. He did nothing by halves. His whole soul entered into every discussion; and his words were stimulating, even when not conclusive. His chief if not only defect was the lack of a lucidus ordo. There are several of his volumes in which the chapters might be largely transposed without injuring the general effect. Notwithstanding this disaggregable fact, his writing must long preserve his name and influence as a profound and brilliant Christian scholar, and be a source of instruction and of helpful suggestions to succeeding generations. His ruling principles of action are well expressed in the motto in Hebrew and Latin, given by him to be placed upon the dome of Memorial Hall at Schenectady:—

DIES BREVIS, OPUS MULTUM, MERCES MAGNA, MAGISTER DOMUS URGIT.

T. W. CHAMBERS.

LEYDECKER, Melchior, b. at Middelburg, 1842; was appointed professor of theology at Utrecht, 1879; and died there in 1721. He was an ardent champion of the Reformed system of LEYDEN.

1313 LIBER PONTIFICALIS.

doctrines in its traditional form. — De certitate fidei Romana (1694). — De commercio trium pontificum, etc. (1682), Historia ecclesiae Africana (1690); and from that stand-point he wrote polemically against Balthasar Becker, the Coccejans, the Cartesian philosophy, Herman Witsius, and others. His works against the Coccejans — Faxe veritatis (1677), Vis veritatis (1679), and Synopsis controversiarum (1680) — are still of interest to students of those times.

A. SCHWIZER.

LEYDEN, John of. See Bockhold.

LEYSEY, Polycarp, b. at Winnenden, Wurttemberg, March 18, 1552; d. at Dresden, Feb. 22, 1610. He studied theology at Tubingen; and was appointed pastor at Gellersdorf in Lower Austria in 1578. In 1577 he was called, as superintendent and professor of theology, to Wittenberg, where the Crypto-Calvinists had been overthrown in 1574. They gained the ascendancy again; however, and in 1587 Leyser removed as superintendent, as the book, besides other disagreeable things, contained the confession of faith, which the Pope had to subscribe at his accession; and that confession, accepting the canons of the sixth Ecumenical council, contemplates the Pope as a heretic. Meanwhile the attention had been drawn to the curious book, and in 1680 the Jesuit Garnier published it in Paris. Other editions were made by Mabillon, in his Museum italicum, by G. Hackmann, in his Nova collectio scriptorum et monumentorum. (Leipzig, 1739), by Prieber (Vienna, 1782), and finally, fully satisfactory in scientific respect, by Rozier (Liber diurnus, ou recueil des formules usites par la chancellerie pontificale du V. au XI. siècle, Paris, 1869). Later collections, from the period between John XXII. and Gregory XIII., and collections of formulas for the use of bishops and abbots, exist in manuscript.

LIBER PONTIFICALIS (in the older manuscripts also called Gesta Pontificum Romanorum, or Gesta Summorum Pontificum, or Liber Gestorum Pontificum) is a history of the bishops of Rome from the apostle Peter down to the second half of the ninth century. Following Osmont, the first editors considered Anastasius (abbot of a monastery in Rome, librarian to the Church of Rome during the reign of Nicholas I., 858-867, and translator of several Greek works on church history) to be the author of the whole book; but later investigations have proved this supposition untenable. Differences, both formal and material, between the various biographies, show that the book must be the work of more than one writer; and this view is still further corroborated by the circumstance that passages of the Liber pontificalis are found quoted before the time of Anastasius. A more correct conception of the origin of the work was developed in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and set forth by E. von Scheidt, librarian of the Vatican, in his Dissertatio de antiquis Romanorum Pontificum catalogis (Rome, 1692), by Joannes Ciampani (Magister Breviarum Conciliorum veterum) Liber pontificalis (Rome, 1888), and by Fr. Bianchini, in the preface to his edition of the Liber pontificalis. (See Muratori: Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, iii. 1, 83, 55.) Further results were gained, partly by the examination of manuscripts which were made in behalf of the new edition of the book in Pertz: Monumenta Germaniae (comp. Lipsius: Chronologia der römischen Bischöfe bis zur Mitte des 4 Jahrhunderts, Kiel, 1869), partly by the studies of L. Duchesne, also preparatory to a new edition (Étude sur le Liber pontificalis, Paris, 1877). (See G. Watz: Ueber die verschiedenen Texte des Liber pontificalis, in Revue des questions historiques, 1879; and Duchesne: La date et les recensions du L. p., in Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie, 1879.)

The oldest of the sources still extant from which the Liber pontificalis has drawn its contents is a catalogue of popes collected during the pontificate of Liberius, and probably made up during his reign (352-366), since it does not mention his death. The original manuscript of this catalogue is lost; but there exist three transcriptions of it, which have been published in Origines de l'église Romaine, par les membres de la communauté de Solaesmes, Paris, 1826, 1. (Comp. MOMMSEN: Ueber den Chronographen vom Jahre 354, in the Memoirs of the Royal Scientific Society of Saxony, Philolog.--Hist., Class I.) A second catalogue (Catalogus Felicianus) reaches down to Felix IV., who died in 530. It was first published, as far as Sylvester, by Henschen and Papelbroch, in the Prolegomena to the first volume of Acta Sanctorum April., not after the original manuscript, which is lost, but after a transcript presented by Queen Christine of Sweden to the Vatican Library. It is also found in the above-mentioned Origines de l'église Romaine. A third catalogue, finally (Catalogus Cononianus), reaches down to Conon, 697. It was first discovered in the archives of the cathedral of Lucca, and published by Bianchini, i. e., vol. iv. But, beyond the latter part of the seventh century, none of the existing catalogues reaches; and it is evident, from a comparison of the manuscripts, that those earlier catalogues which form the basis of the Liber pontificalis have not come down to us in their original form, but have been subjected to many kinds of additions and alterations.
LIBERIUS.

The notices which the Liber pontificalis gives of each pope are at first very sparse; but, after Sylvester, they become more ample, and give much information concerning the single churches of Rome and their property, liturgy, archaeology, etc.; drawing materials, not only from the catalogues, but also from the ecclesiastical archives, the acts of those popes who were venerated as martyrs, lists of papal decrees, buildings, grants, etc. From the close of the Catalogus Cononianus, the various manuscripts—that of Lucca, that of Milan, etc.—continue with various modifications; and it is evident that Anastasius Bibliothecarius is simply one of the continuators. Schelstraele even thinks that only the biography of Nicholas I. can with certainty be ascribed to him. As the first edition of the Liber pontificalis, Schelstraele designates the Concilia, by F. Crabbe, Cologne, 1538; but that work gives only extracts. The real editio princeps is that by Buseus, Mayence, 1602. Continuations beyond the second half of the ninth century also exist, though not as parts of the Liber pontificalis. One stops at Gregory VI.; another (Codex Vaticanus) gives notices about the popes of the eleventh and twelfth centuries; a third treats the period from Leo IX. to Honorius II.; a fourth (Acta Vaticanse) stops at Alexander III.

LIBER SEXTUS. See Canon Law.

LIBERIA, a negro republic in Western Africa, founded in 1820 by the American Colonization Society, declared independent Aug. 24, 1847, and at present in treaty relations with all the great powers of the world. It has a coast-line of nearly six hundred miles, and extends inland towards the heart of the continent to an average distance of three hundred miles. The territory has been secured at different times by purchase. The colony owes its origin to the philanthropic impulses of the American Colonization Society to provide a home in their native country for American negroes. The idea of sending negro missionaires to Africa, and associating a colony with them, occurred first to Dr. Samuel Hopkins of Newport in 1773. He agitated the subject, and secured funds for the education of two negroes in Yale College. In 1815 Dr. Robert Finley, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Basking Ridge, N.J., Rev. Samuel J. Mills, and others, combined in the thought of establishing a society for African colonization. The issue was the American Colonization Society, which was finally organized, with regularly elected officers, on Jan. 1, 1817. The same year it despatched the Rev. Samuel J. Mills and Rev. Mr. Burgess to explore the western coast of Africa and Sierra Leone, with reference to securing a tract suitable for the society's purposes. Mr. Mills died at sea on his return journey; but Mr. Burgess made a report, the first result of which were seen in the despatch of a colony to Liberia, May 21, 1820, from New York. It purchased Cape Mesurado, near the present city of Monrovia. In 1822 the colony numbered eighteen thousand civilized Africans, mostly of American origin, and an indefinite number, of a million or more, of half-barbarous natives. The government of Liberia is a republic, electing a President and Vice-President every two years, and a Legislature of two houses. The capital is Monrovia. A system of public schools is in vogue, with a central university, of which Dr. Blyden is now the president.

Missions to Liberia began in 1821, with the arrival of Lot Cary and Colin Teage, and their families, who were sent out by the African Missionary Society, established in Richmond in 1815, and largely through the efforts of Cary. This man had purchased his own freedom from slavery, and, at the time of his departure for Africa, was pastor of a Baptist Church in Richmond of eight hundred members. The mission of the Methodist-Episcopal Church of the United States was commenced in 1833. In 1836 a conference was organized, which in 1839 was divided into four districts, with one foreign missionary, 21 native ordained preachers, 24 native local preachers, 1,383 communicants, and 20 Sunday schools. The Episcopal Church of the United States supports a mission, which in 1882 included one bishop (Dr. Penick), two white and six colored presbyters, six deacons and other helpers, 336 communicants, and ten day, five boarding, and seven Sunday schools. The mission of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, established in 1842, employed in 1882 three American missionaries and six helpers, and had 276 communicants, and 114 children in its day schools. In close connection with this mission are the churches of Gaboon and Corisco, with their seven American and five native preachers, and 374 communicants. See Stockwell: The Republic of Liberia, New York, 1865; and the Reports and Documents of the American Colonization Society.

LIBERIUS, Bishop of Rome from May 22, 355, to Sept. 24, 366. As the successor of Julius, the stanch ally of Athanasius, he became for a moment the centre of the Arian controversy. Constantius, after his victory over Magnentius in 353, also possessed of the Western Empire, sided with the Eusebians, and sought to establish peace in the Church by sacrificing Athanasius, and abandon the confession of Nicaea. Liberius, however, took a firm stand against him, and sent Bishop Vincentius of Capua, and Marcellus, to the imperial court at Arles, asking for an ecumenical council convened at Aquileia. But the emperor preferred to hold the council at his own residence, under the direct influence of the court; and at the synod of Arles the whole orthodox party, with the exception of Paulinus of Trèves, gave its approval to the sentence against Athanasius. Paulinus was banished. A second time Liberius addressed the emperor, and sent Bishop Vincentius of Capua, and Marcellus, to the council convened at Aquileia. But the emperor preferred to hold the council at his own residence, asking for an ecumenical council convened at Arles, but being secretly arrested, and then banished to Berœa in Thrace. The deacon Felix was appointed bishop in his stead, and installed in spite of violent opposition. Two years later on, however, when Constantius visited Rome, and the Roman ladies petitioned him for the return of Liberius, he graciously granted the petition, adding that the bishop would return "a better man." And, indeed, a great change had taken place with Liberius during his exile. "Better instructed by the Oriental bishops," he laid a declaration before the emperor, that he now agreed in the condemnation of Athanasius; he supplicated the court theologically, Ursacius, Valens, and Germinius, as Roman ladies petitioned him for the return of Liberius during his exile. "Better instructed by the Oriental bishops," he laid a declaration before the emperor, that he now agreed in the condemnation of Athanasius; he supplicated the court theologians, Ursacius, Valens, and Germinius, as men of peace; he renewed communion with Epictetus and Auxentius, the most decided enemies of Athanasius, and asserted that the latter had long ago been excluded from communion with the Church of Rome, as the Roman presbytery could testify. Summoned before the synod of Sirmium (356), he entirely abandoned the cause of Athanasius, condemned the expression "Macedonians" as true brethren, because of their descendant, represented by Damasus, and established the independence of the city, inviting Butzer; but when, in Geneva, the reformed church of the city, first arose against the rule of Butzer, and the adherents. They were at home at the court of Marguerite of Valois at Nérac. In Strassburg they obtained a cordial acknowledgment of communion from Butzer; but when, in Geneva, they solicited a similar favor from Calvin, they suddenly struck a rock. In 1534 Calvin met with Quintin in Paris at a public disputation, and pursued him hotly. Later on he became thoroughly acquainted with Poquès in Geneva; and in 1545 he completely unmasked the party by his Contre la Secte phantastique et furieuse des Libertins, which in 1547 was followed by the Épitre contre un certain cordelier supposé de la secte des Libertins.

III. Libertines is the name of the party in Geneva, which, mostly consisting of native burghers of the city, first arose against the rule of the bishop and the Duke of Savoy, and, having established the independence of the city, invited Calvin to consolidate their new constitution by introducing the Reformation, but the Ordinances Ecclesiastiques came into operation, and the moral reforms were carried through with great severity, turned around against Calvin, bit-liberally complaining of the new tyranny. It is possible, though it cannot be proved, that they were directly influenced by the Libertines. See Stahelin: Caleb, i. pp. 382 sqq. Trecsei.
LIBERTY.

1316

LIBERTY.

LIBERTY, Religious. Religious liberty consists in the right guaranteed by the laws of a community to each one of the citizens to maintain and propagate any religious opinion, and to celebrate any form of worship, he may think proper, provided those opinions and that worship do not conflict with the fundamental ideas upon which the civil community is based. It includes protection of worship, and of property devoted to religious purposes, and recognizes the principle of religious association. It has been called a natural right, but a man can have no natural rights in opposition to his social duties. In its principle it is only an extension of the maxim of the Roman Code, Sic utere tuo ut non alienum ladas.

The latest authority on this subject, that of the Supreme Court of the United States (Reynolds v. the United States, 98 Sup. Co. Rep., the Mormon marriage case), thus lays down the general principle: "Laws are made for the government of actions; and, while they cannot interfere with mere religious belief and opinions, they may with the practices. Suppose one religiously believed that human sacrifices were a necessary part of religious worship, would it be seriously contended that the civil government under which he lived could not interfere to prevent a sacrifice? To permit this would be to make the professed doctrines of religious importance, and against the State, whose independence that worship was supposed to secure. In this worship the minute observance of the ritual was the important thing. The expression of religious opinion, so long as there was outward conformity, was in many respects unchecked. A man might speak with contempt of the gods of a neighboring city; as to those of a more general jurisdiction, such as Jupiter, Juno, or Cybele, he might believe in them or not, as he thought proper; but it was dangerous to treat disrespectfully the city gods, such as Athene, or Erechtheus, or Cecrops. For such an offence, indeed, it is well known Socrates was condemned to death: and a law existed at Athens, punishing severely any one who did not observe with the prescribed forms the national festivals; for such an act was an offence not only against religion, but against the State, whose safety and independence were supposed to be dependent upon it. The Romans and the Greeks, in their early conquests at least, always measured the power of resistance of an invaded district by the supposed power of its city gods: hence, when they conquered, they destruth the gods, and by that means destroyed the political existence of the city. As in these cases the central religious opinions, especially among the educated classes, became more rational and comprehensive, yet the old beliefs in regard to the power of the divinities, both of the household and of the city, and the necessity of propitiating them by means of the ancient ritual, remained among the masses a very active principle of action, not only to the time of Christ, but for three hundred years afterwards. Whatever, during this time, may have been the private opinions of the governing class, all ancient writers show, that, in their conduct of affairs, it was found necessary to respect the popular superstitions in regard to the close relation between the observance of the rites of the primitive religion and the safety of the State. This must be borne in mind, so that we may understand why Christianity alone, of all the innumerable forms of religious belief and worship introduced into the not bound to rediversity of the ancient ritual, remained among the masses of our era, was persecuted by the State, and especially why the best emperors in the Roman sense—the Antonines, Decius, and even Diocletian—appear in history as the most bitter persecutors, while the worst, Thracian peasants... and Oriental sun-worshippers, are not found among its most active enemies, simply because the Roman traditions formed no part of their religious belief.

Christianity brought into the Roman world totally different ideas. It was not the domestic religion of any one family, nor the national religion of any city or race. The other religions had taught the existence of a great but unknown God, the unit of the human race: justice, and even kindness towards both strangers and enemies, formed the very basis of its system. Christianity was a universal religion, satisfying not only supreme, but exclusive sway; and therefore the barriers between different peoples were broken down, and the pomerium disappeared. These principles were so novel and unexpected, that we are not surprised to find those whose conceptions of religion were wholly limited to the exclusive tribal or ethnic form shocked when it was proposed to give up deities with whose worship the prosperity and safety of the State were inseparably associated in the minds of the Romans. Hence the Ten Persecutions (so called) under the Roman rule were probably due as much to the novel claims of a religion which aimed to destroy the old gods, as to the revolt against the pure morality and lofty self-denial taught by the Christians.

The conflict between the two systems was inevitable; and it was not brought to a close, so far as the legal sanction of persecution was concerned, until A.D. 313, when the celebrated Edict of Tolerance was issued at Milan by Constantine and Licinius. This has been called the "Magna Charta" of the liberties of Christianity; but, strictly, it gave only toleration to the worship of the Christians, and not exclusive domination, or even liberty. The Arian disputes, the meeting of the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325), and the adoption of the creed at that council, since known as the "Nicean Creed," form an epoch in the history of religious liberty. At this time were introduced into the Church two principles, which, whatever other results they may have produced, were the prolific sources, for many centuries, of persecution and intolerance of the religious opinions of those who differed from the dogmas of the Church as by law established. These were the union of Church and State, as witnessed by the participation of the emperor as president of a council which settled fundamental Christian dogmas; and the other, the punishment by the civil power of those convicted of the ecclesiastical crime of heresy. Heretics are defined in the Theodosian Code to be those "Qui a Catholice religiosis dogmate deviare contendunt." Their punishment was intended to enforce uniformity of belief; mere disbelief having previously been, under the pagans, the ground of punishment in the first civil proceeding against heretics began with Constantine's edict against the Donatists (A.D. 316); and, before the close of the fourth century, the edicts against heresy formed an important part of the jurisprudence of the empire. By these enactments, the penalties of all offices of profit or dignity in the State; they could neither receive nor bequeath property; no contract with them was binding; and they were fined, banished, and even sentenced to death. See Theodosian Code, published Feb. 15, 438, bk. xvi. tit. 5, De Heret. From the time of Constantine to a period long after the Reformation, the principle that heresy was a crime to be punished by the civil magistrate, as well as an ecclesiastical offence to be visited by church discipline, is found embodied in the codes of all the nations of Western Europe. During the middle ages, it was the policy of Louis XIV. during the seventeenth century, to exterminate heresy within their dominions. Persecution of heresy rested on the same principle as crusades against the infidel, and these grew out of the one common impulse which moved Europe in those days. The civil disabilities attaching to heresy being inflicted, as time went on, upon vast masses of people in different parts of Europe. The great anti-sacerdotal movement of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, in which the actors were variously called Albigenses, Waldenses, Cathari, Lollards, Hussites, etc., was repressed, for the most part, by an armed force, whose proceedings were characterized by the most savage cruelties and wholesale confiscations. Such, indeed, was the horror of heresy felt by Innocent III., and his zeal to extirpate it, that, supported doubtless by the church opinion of Europe at the time, he established during the Albigensian crusade an order of monks (the Dominicans), whose twofold duty it was to instruct the people in the true doctrine, and to seek out and punish heretics by means of a tribunal called the "Inquisition," of which these monks were the judges, to the exclusion of the ancient and ordinary jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese. (See Inquisition.)

Vast as were the changes made by the Reformation, it did not introduce into any Protestant country in Europe the principle of religious liberty, or even of toleration. Dissenters from the religion established by law suffered from grievous civil disabilities in England and Scotland, in Germany, Holland, and Switzerland; while in Spain the Inquisition was established during the civil wars of the sixteenth century and the policy of Louis XIV. during the seventeenth, were directed to the advancement of the orthodox belief by exterminating in those countries obstinate heretics. In England heresy was an offence punishable by death before the Reformation, and it continued to be so for one hundred and thirty-five years afterwards. It was not until 1677 that an act was passed (29 Car. ii.) abolishing the use of the writ De heretico comburendo by the civil authority. Two things, however, are to be noted: 1st. That, as time went on, penalties for heresy were not so strictly enforced as they had been; and, 2d. That penal laws against dissenters in England were maintained, not so much from zeal for orthodoxy as from a fear lest the Catholics should gain the control of the government. This is admirably illustrated by the terms of the "Act of Toleration," so called, passed in 1689, from which it clearly appears, that, in the persecution of dissenters, political objects and motives had at that time usurped the place held by blind zeal for the Church in the midle age. (See Macaulay's History of England, chap. xi., for an excellent illustration of this change.)

In Germany the Reformation was followed by wars between the Imperial Catholic authority and that of many of the rulers of different portions of the country who had long been practically independent of the emperor, and had become Lutheran Protestants. In these wars the principle contended for on both sides was cujus regio, illius religio. The question was, to which regio the people of Germany, for the purposes of religious legislation, belonged. This principle was settled at the Peace of Augsburg (1555), by giving to each prince the power of establishing within his own dominions his own religion. The Protestant dissenters from Lutheranism—that is, the Calvinists, Zwinglians, and Anabaptists—were not included in this peace, because no sovereign in Germany then held to the form of belief. By the Peace of Westphalia (1648), which closed the terrible Thirty-Years' War, free exercise of their religion, and civil rights, were accorded in each of the states of Germany to Catholics, as well as to Protestants, both Lutherans and Calvinists, but to no others.

Up to the period of the French Revolution, the principle established by the Peace of Westphalia, although it was never formally adopted by the other powers, gradually acquired throughout Europe almost the force of an international code. There were no more religious wars, and very little of the old forms of persecution of heresy; yet the civil disabilities of dissenters, Catholic or Protestant, as they happened to be, consisting generally in exclusion from public office and employment, were everywhere jealously maintained.

Since the French Revolution there has been throughout Europe a vast change in opinion, not only as to the true relation of religion to government, but also as to the policy of the exclusion of any one from public employment in consequence of his religious belief. In England, one after another of the old strongholds of intolerance has fallen, until the Catholic, the Protestant dissenters, and even the Jew, now stand upon a footing of perfect equality with the members of the Established Church, so far as their political and civil rights, and their admission to public office, are concerned. In France, this principle of equality has been carried so far, that each form of what is called a "recognized religion" is supported from the funds of the State. Even in Spain and in Italy, Protestant sects are now permitted to worship publicly, and their church property is secured to them. Denmark and Sweden still require that all public officers shall conform to the established Lutheran religion. The general tendency at present is towards the absolute separation of the exercise of religious liberty from the restraint of State legislation. The ideal seems now to be "a free Church in a free State;" the two spheres being kept as wholly distinct from each other as the general well being will permit. The present attitude of Germany towards the Catholic Church is thought by many not to be in the direction of modern thought and modern practice in this matter. Shocked by the decree of the Vatican Council of 1870, declaring the infallibility of the Pope, and by the condemnation of the most deeply cherished principles of modern society as errors, by the syllabus of 1894, the Prussian Government adopted in 1873 a series of laws known as the "Falk Laws." By these laws it is provided, among other things, that no man shall be allowed to become a minister of worship in Prussia, unless he shall receive his education in a public school and state university. Ecclesiastical discipline, where it involves fine, imprisonment, or corporal punishment, is made subject, also, to revision on an appeal to judges appointed by the State.

The English sectaries who founded colonies on this continent brought with them a no larger spirit of toleration than they had professed at home. They came, as Bancroft says, "to plant a church in the wilderness." Dissent from the doctrines and worship of that church was punished, in all but one of the New-England Colonies, as hereby: while in Pennsylvania no man could hold office who did not acknowledge the divinity of Christ; and in Maryland, as early as 1659, Quakers were fined, and otherwise punished, because they conscientiously refused to bear arms in the service of the Colony. But the principle of perfect toleration grew rapidly in this country, side by side, strange to say, with a practice, which had become almost universal at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, of encouraging, in various ways, the maintenance of Christianity, so far as it was possible to do so without infringing the rights of conscience and the freedom of religious worship. The Constitution provides that "no religious test shall be required as a qualification for office;" and the very first amendment to that instrument which was demanded by public opinion in order to set at rest forever the relations of the national government to religion, was in these words: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This is one of the very few provisions of the Constitution which no one has ever sought to change; and its adoption forms, not only an epoch in the history of religious liberty, but an example, also, which, during the last two centuries, all civilized nations have striven to imitate.

LIBRI CAROLINI. See Caroline Books.

LICENSE, applied to preaching, means the right to preach, given by a regularly constituted body, such as a presbytery, a conference, or a council. The candidate is examined upon his theological studies, and, if thought worthy, is licensed to preach as an accredited teacher of the denomination. But many ministers have no practice to dispense the sacraments, nor to sit as member of an ecclesiastical court: these are consequent upon ordination. In the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, the word "license" is applied to the permission to preach given by a bishop to a deacon, or to read sermons given to a candidate.
LICHFIELD.

1819

LIGHTFOOT.

LICHFIELD, the seat of the episcopal see of that name, is a city of 8,390 inhabitants (1851), sixteen miles north of Birmingham, Staffordshire, Eng. The name is taken to mean "field of the dead," and to have been given to the locality in consequence of the massacre there, in the reign of Diocletian (A.D. 303), of several hundred Christians. Lichfield Cathedral is in the early English style, is five hundred and three feet long, dates from the twelfth century, and has recently been extensively restored. The see dates from 689. St. Chad was its first bishop. From 705, in the reign of Offa, to 799, it was made an archbishopric; in 1075 the see was removed to Chester, and again to Coventry in 1102, but restored to Lichfield in 1129.

Lichfield was made a city by Edward VI. in 1549. The famous Dr. Samuel Johnson was born there Sept. 18, 1709. The episcopal stipend is forty-five hundred pounds. See W. BERESFORD: Lichfield, London, 1882.

LIEBNER, the Theodor Albert, a distinguished evangelical theologian, and preacher of the Lutheran Church of Germany; b. March 3, 1806, in Schkolien, near Naumburg; d. June 24, 1871, in apoplexy, in Switzerland. He entered the university of Leipzig, where he spent four years, then passed to Berlin, and from there to the seminary at Wittenberg, and was appointed by the Prussian minister of education to arrange the Wittenberg library, and during his residence in that city put forth his first important work, on Hugo de St. Victor and the theological tendencies of his day (Hugo von St. Victor und d. theol. Richtungen seiner Zeit, 1831). This work was received very kindly by the theological public; and its author was called in 1832 to the church in Kreiseifel, near Eisleben. In 1835 he accepted an invitation from Göttingen to become the successor of Julius Muller, as professor of theology, and university preacher. Two of the results of his study there were a volume of sermons (1841, 3d ed., 1855), which Palmer, Baur, and others characterized as models, and another on Richard de St. Victor (Rich. a St. Victor et de contemplatione doctrina). Refusing a call to Marburg, he became Dorner's successor in the chair of historical theology, and published his system of theology (D. christl. Dogmatik aus dem christologischen Prinzip dargestellt, 1849). Mücke, in his Dogmatik des 19. Jahrhunderts, places this work at the side of Dorner's.

The calls to Heidelberg and other universities, which this volume secured for him, Liebner declined in favor of an invitation to a professorship in Leipzig in 1851, where he soon added the duties of university preacher to those of professor. In 1855 he made his last change, going to Dresden in the capacity of first court-preacher, and vice-president of the Supreme Church Council, where he continued to labor, in spite of calls to Berlin (1861) and Göttingen (1862). Amongst his other published works were two volumes of sermons (Dresden, 1864). MICHAEL.

LIGHTFOOT, John, one of the greatest Hebrew scholars in history; b. at Stoke-upon-Trent, Staffordshire, Eng, Dec. 11 (29), 1662; d. June 6, 1675. He was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he greatly distinguished himself by his oratory and classical attainments, but where he learned no Hebrew. On taking his bachelor's degree (1621), he became assistant master at Repton, Derbyshire. Two years afterwards he was ordained, and obtained the curacy at Norton-under-Hales, Shropshire. There Sir Rowland Cotton heard him preach, and thus he became a domestic chaplain at Bellaport, Sir Rowland's home. His patron was an amateur Hebraist of some attainments; while he, the chaplain, knew nothing of the language. Shame at this state of things fairly drove him to study Hebrew; and so zealous was his toil, and so great an aptitude did he evince, that he quickly made himself the greatest Hebraist in England, and was only excelled in Europe by the younger Buxtorf. For some reason he ultimately left his patron, and was for two years in a charge at Stone in Staffordshire; then, for the sake of nearness to Sion College, London, he removed to Horsley, and in 1629 published his first work. In 1630 Sir Rowland Cotton presented him to the rectory of Ashley, Staffordshire. In 1642 he left it for London, where he became minister of St. Bartholomew's. He sat at the Savoy Conference, and at Crockford, with the Presbyterian commissioners at the Savoy Conference, 1661, but confirmed, 1662. In 1675 he was made master of Catherine's Hall, Cambridge, and rector of Much Munden, Hertfordshire. In 1652 he took his degree of doctor of divinity; in 1655 he was chosen vice-chancellor of the university of Cambridge, retaining, however, his other positions, and living at Much Munden. The Restoration did not affect his official relations. He was one of the Christian scholars now study the Talmud; and all are satisfied that Lightfoot, Selden, and the other Presbyterians, at the Savoy Conference, have ransacked that great garret, and brought all its valuables to light. Lightfoot's repute as a scholar has overshadowed his other titles to fame; so that his contemporary reputation for eloquence, fidelity, and spirituality, for his ardent defence of Protestantism, and for his many admirable qualities in private life, which rendered him a beloved pastor and friend, has been well-nigh forgotten.

His principal works appeared in the following order, Erubbin, or Miscellanies, Christian and Judaical, and others; penned for recreation at vacant hours, London, 1639; A few and many Observations upon the Book of Genesis; he published twenty of them, certain; the rest, probable; all, harmless, strange, and rarely heard of before, 1642; A Handful of Gleanings out of the Book of Exodus, 1643; The Harmony of the
but a reminiscence from the catacombs? And the same may be said of the paschal lights, the baptismal lights, etc.; only that, in each individual case, the custom was associated with a legend and an explanation of its own. Especially at funerals, lights of all kinds were profusely used throughout Christendom. Innumerable candles on golden stands were lighted all around the body of Constantine when it lay in state. When the remains of Chrysostom were brought to Constantinople from Comana, the waters of the Bosphorus were covered with the lamps of the faithful. When Queen Radegund was buried at Poictiers, all the free-women of the country stood around the grave with lighted tapers in their hands. From such customs the transition was very easy to keeping the lights always lighted in the sepulchre, or before the relic and the image, and to presenting them as a sacrifice to the saint. But, with the Reformation, the whole custom, in all its various forms, was completely broken up; only one small remnant of it, the Eucharistic light, still remaining in the Lutheran churches and in the Church of England. The injunction of Edward VI. of 1547, allowed two lights to be lighted on the high altar during the celebration of the Lord's Supper, to signify that Christ is the true light of the world.

LIGUORI, Alfonso Maria da, the most popular and influential author of devotional works and ethical theologian in the Roman-Catholic Church of the last century; was b. Sept. 27, 1696, at Marianella, a suburb of Naples; d. at Nocera, Aug. 1, 1787. His parents were of noble antecedents and pious inclinations; his father, an officer in the Neapolitan army. He was educated by the priests of the oratory of Philip Neri; studied law, and took his doctor's degree in his seventeenth year. The loss of a case determined him to enter the church, and he was consecrated priest in 1726. He became an earnest preacher, and devoted much time to the relief of the poor. In 1731, while in Poggia, Apulia, he had the first of his visions. As he was kneeling before a picture of the Virgin, she appeared to him in all her beauty. During a sojourn at Scala, where he was holding religious services with the nuns, one of the sisters, Maria Celeste Costarossa, revealed to him at the confessional that the Saviour had chosen him to organize a new ecclesiastical order. Following this revelation, he founded in 1732 the Congregation of our Most Blessed Redeemer. (See Redemptorists.) The Cardinal Archbishop of Naples disapproved of the movement, which also met with opposition from other quarters. But the order grew; and in 1742 Liguori was chosen general superior (rector major) for life, and the order was approved in 1749 by a papal brief. In 1762 Liguori was elevated, against his will, by Clement XIII., to the bishopric of St. Agatha of the Goths in Naples, from which, in 1775, he was allowed to retire, at his own request, by Pius VI. He retired to a house of the Redemptorists at Nocera. His latter years were imblittered by physical sufferings, and a division in his order in consequence of a breach between the Pope and the Neapolitan administration. Nine years after his death, he was pronounced Venerable by Pius VI.; was beatified, and two of his visions taken up their position beside the ambo, while the gospel is read aloud,—what are those lights honors the dignity of Doctor of the Church; thus placed among the saints Thomas Aquinas, Bernard of Clairvaux, etc. The decree was based upon the "scholarly and devotional character" of his works, and especially the circumstance that they "teach in the most excellent manner the truths relating to the immaculate conception of the blessed mother of God, and the infallibility of the Roman bishop speaking from his throne." It ordained that "his works should be cited as of equal authority with those of the other doctors of the church, and should be used in schools, colleges, controversies, sermons, etc., as well as in private."

No complete edition of Liguori's writings has been published. The most of them appeared in Italian, at Naples and Bassano, and have been translated into Latin, French, German, and other languages. His more important works are,
Theologia Morals, Naples, 1753, 2 vols., with additions, Bologna, 1765, 3 vols.; History and Refutation of the Heretics, Venice, 1752; The Truth of the Faith, or Refutation of the Materialists, Deists, and Sectaries, Venice, 1751, 2 vols.: La vera sposa di Gesi Cristo, Venice, 1781, 2 vols., last ed., Naples, 1876; Le glorie di Maria, Venice, 1784, 2 vols., last ed.,
Rome, 1878; Eng. trans., The Glories of Mary,
New York, 3d ed., 1852. The last is the best known of Liuori's works. It breathes an intense devotion to Mary, and indulges in the most exaggerated praises of her beauty, moral innocency, power of representing the sinner's cause to the Saviour, if not directly of saving him. "Mary is truly our mother, not according to the flesh, but the spiritual mother of our souls and of our salvation" (i. 2). "She is omnipotent ... because she obtains in her prayers whatever she wishes" (vi. 1). "I invoke thy aid, O my great advocate, my refuge, my hope, my mother Mary! To thy hands I commit the cause of my eternal salvation.
To thee I consign my soul. It was lost, but thou must save it," etc. (vi. 3). These passages fairly represent the exaggerated Mariolatry of the work, and the distance to which the sinner is removed from Christ. Mary is addressed as the "refuge dsinner," "our life and hope," "queen of angels," "queen of heaven," "queen of the whole world," "queen of mercy, as Christ is King of justice," etc. Well might Kehle exclaim, when the decree of the Immaculate Conception was promulgated in 1854, that it made the ecclesiastical union of Christendom impossible so long as it continued to be enforced. Liguori appeals to ecclesiastical writers, especially John of Damascus, Peter Damiani, and Abelard. His quotations from Scripture are confined almost entirely to the Song of Solomon, the Shulamite of which he looks upon as the type of Mary, and the apocryphal book Ecclesiasticus.

LIT.—Lives of Liguori by GIANI, Rome,
1815; JEANGARD (French), Louvain, 1859; RIS, POLI, Naples, 1834. [English biographies, edited by F. W. Faber, London, 1848-49, 4 vols., and by one of the Redemptorist Fathers, Baltimore, 1855. English translation of his Reflections on Spiritual Subjects and on the Passion of Jesus Christ, London, 1848, and of his Novem in Honor of St.
Theresa, Baltimore, 1882. A second edition of his Theologia Morals, edited by J. Ninzatti, appeared in Vienna, 1882, in 2 vols. See also MAYER:
Moral and Devotional Theology of the Church of Rome, according to the Teaching of S. Alfonso da Liguori. London, 1857.]

ZOELLKER.

LIGURE, one of the stones in the breastplate of the high priest (Exod. xxviii. 19), perhaps the red tourmaline or rubellite; but the rendering is very uncertain.

LILLIE, John, D.D., b. at Kelso, Scotland, Dec.
16, 1812; d. at Kingston, N.Y., Feb. 23, 1887.
He was graduated with the first honors at the University of Edinburgh, 1831; studied theology, and taught, until 1834, when he emigrated to America. He then finished his theological studies at New Brunswick, and was ordained, and installed minister of the Reformed Dutch Church at Kingston, N.Y., where he labored ably and faithfully until August, 1841, when he accepted the presidency of the grammar-school of the University of the City of New York. From 1843 to 1848 he had charge of the Broadway, afterward Stanton-street, Dutch Church, and, in addition, edited the Jewish Church on behalf of missions among the Jews from 1844 to 1848. From 1851 to 1857 he labored upon the Revised Version of the American Bible Union; but in the latter year he re-entered the pastorate, being installed over the Presbyterian Church of Kingston, N.Y., and in that relation he died after a four-days' illness.

Dr. Lillie was acknowledged to be one of the best biblical scholars in the United States. He has left permanent evidence of his learning, not only in his individual publications, but in the new versions and philological commentaries upon Thessalonians, John's Epistles, 2 Peter, Jude, and the Revelation (also on 1 Peter and James; but these were never printed), prepared for the American Bible Union. He was a spiritually minded and edifying preacher and a faithful pastor. His works, all printed in New York, were, Perpetuity of the Earth (1842), Lectures on the Epistles to the Thessalonians (1860), Translation, with additions, of Auberlen and Riggenbach upon Thessalonians (in the Lange Series, 1868), also posthumous Lectures on the First and Second Epistles of Peter, with a Biographical Sketch by Dr. Schaff and James Inglis (1869).

LILY. The only true lily now found in Pale-stable is the scarlet martagon; but it is likely, that by the term in Scripture is meant the scarlet amenone, which in color and abundance fills the requirements (Cant. v. 13; Matt. vi. 28-30).

But, as the Arabs now use the word of many flowers, it may be that in Scripture similar laxity prevails.

LIMBORCH, Philipp van, b. in Amsterdam, June 10, 1833; d. there April 13, 1712. He studied theology, philosophy, philology, and mathematics in his native city, Leyden, and Utrecht, and was appointed pastor at Gouda in 1657, pastor in Amsterdam in 1667, and in the next year professor of theology at the Remonstrant college in Amsterdam. What Episcopius began, and Currellus continued, he completed. His Institutiones Theologiae Christianae (1688) was trans-Prominent among his other works are De Veritate Religions Christianae, De Divina Logica, and Historiaissionum (1692), translated into English by Samuel
Chandler, London, 1731. See A. DES ARMORIE
VAN DER HOREN: De J. Clerico et P. a Limborch, LINBUS. 1822

LINBUS, or LIMBO. The Roman-Catholic Church fixes the eternal end of human life in a double existence in heaven and hell, and so far she is in full accord with the Greek and Protestant churches; but, in her farther development of these fundamental ideas, she pursues a course of her own. The Roman Church teaches that there are a hell, in which infidels and such as die in a state of reprobation are shut up forever under unspeakable sufferings, a purgatory, in which the souls of the faithful go through a certain amount of pain in order to be thoroughly purified from sin; and, finally, a third place,—the bosom of Abraham, or, as it is generally called in common ecclesiastical parlance, the limbus patrum,—in which the pre-Christian saints, the saints of the Old Testament, were retained in an intermediate state between blessedness and punishment until the descent of Christ into Hades. To these three aditita receptacula taught by the symbolical books of the Church, her theologians, the schoolmen, have added a fourth one for children who die without baptism,—the limbus infantum. The chorography of the infernal region then becomes as follows: in the centre of the earth, hell; in the sphere around hell, purgatory; in the sphere around purgatory, limbus infantum, and then, somewhere between heaven and hell, the bosom of Abraham. With respect to the detailed description of these localities, most poets and theologians agree as to the first, second, and fourth; while the third, the limbus infantum, has given rise to very diverse opinions. [See the art. on INFANT SALVATION.] The word limbus is Latin, means "border," and was probably first employed by Thomas Aquinas, who rapidly brought it into common use.

LINCOLN (Lindum, "hill fort by the pool," and Colonia), the capital of the county of the same name, is situated on the Witham, a hundred and thirty-two miles north-west from London, and is one of the oldest and most interesting of English cities: present population, 37,312. The glory of the place is the minster, of which Mr. C. H. Coote, in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, says, "As a study to the architect and antiquary, it stands unrivalled, not only as the earliest purely Gothic building in Europe, but as containing within its compass every variety of style, from the simple massive Norman of the west front to the Late Decorated of the east portion. The building material is the volite and calcareous stone of Lincoln Heath and Haydor, which has the peculiarity of becoming hardened on the surface when tooled. In former days the cathedral had three spires, all of wood, or leaded timber. The spire on the central tower was blown down in 1547. Those on the western towers were removed in 1818. The ground plan of the first church was laid by Bishop Remigius in 1086, and the church was consecrated May 2, 1092." The cathedral, as at present standing, dates from 1450. The see of Lincoln is said to have been established in 1078. The dimensions of the cathedral internally are: nave, 179 x 60 feet; main transept, 229 x 63 x 74 feet; choir transept, 168 x 44 x 72 feet. From the central tower comes the new "Great Tom of Lincoln," which weighs five tons, eight hundred-weight. Among the famous bishops of Lincoln are St. Hugob (d. 1200); Grosseteste (d. 1253); William Wake, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1787); and Edmund Gibson (d. 1748). The present incumbent is Christopher Wordsworth, D.D., LL.D., who was consecrated in 1809; and the yearly income is five thousand pounds.

LINDSLEY, Philip, D.D., b. at Morristown, N.J., Dec. 21, 1786; d. at Nashville, Tenn., May 25, 1855. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1804; was tutor there, 1807-09, 1812; professor, 1813; vice-president, 1817; declined the presidency, 1828; in 1824 became president of the University of Nashville; resigned, 1850; for the next two years professor of ecclesiastical polity and biblical archeology in the New Albany Seminary, Indiana. He was moderator of the General Assembly, 1834. His Works were edited, with a memoir, Philadelphia, 1865, 3 vols.

LINDSLEY, Philip, D.D., b. at Morristown, N.J., Dec. 21, 1786; d. at Nashville, Tenn., May 25, 1855. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1804; was tutor there, 1807-09, 1812; professor, 1813; vice-president, 1817; declined the presidency, 1828; in 1824 became president of the University of Nashville; resigned, 1850; for the next two years professor of ecclesiastical polity and biblical archeology in the New Albany Seminary, Indiana. He was moderator of the General Assembly, 1834. His Works were edited, with a memoir, Philadelphia, 1865, 3 vols.

LINEN. As the finest flax was grown in Egypt, the finest linen of antiquity came from there; and linen was there the material of which the priestly and state robes were made (Gen. xii. 42), and in which mummies were wrapped. Among the Hebrews, linen was similarly used; thus the veil of the temple and the curtain for the entrance were made of it (Exod. xxvi. 31, 36), and priestly and royal persons wore it (Exod. xxviii. 6, 8, 15, 39, xxxix. 27; 1 Chron. xv. 27). Several Hebrew words are interpreted "linen." See SMITH’S Dictionary of the Bible, sub voce.

LINGARD, John, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Roman-Catholic historian, b. at Winchester, Feb. 5, 1771; d. at Hornby, near Lancaster, July 13, 1851. He studied at the English College, Douai, France, from 1782 to 1793; but, anticipating the breaking-up of the college in the spring of that year, went to England as tutor in the family of Lord Stourton, and remained in this capacity until, in October, 1794, he went to Crook Hall, near Durham, where some of those driven from Douai had gathered, and completed his theological studies. He was ordained priest in 1795; and, having declined a flattering call to London, taught natural and moral philosophy in Crook Hall, and was vice-president and tutor. In 1808 the college was removed to Ushaw, Durham, and he accompanied it, and in 1810 was chosen president; but in 1811 he retired to Hornby, a very small charge, in order that he might give himself up to historical studies undistracted. He spent 156 life in this pursuit. In 1817 he visited Rome, partly on business connected with the English college, and partly to study in the Vatican Library; again, he was there... in 1821, and was received with great distinction. The Pope, Pius VII., conferred upon him the degrees of doctor of divinity and doctor of laws. In 1824 he joined the Royal Society. In 1825 Leo XII. offered him a cardinal's hat; but he declined, preferring, characteristically, quiet and study, to cares and authority. For some little time prior to his death he received a pension from the government, of three hundred pounds. Lingard was an "able and intense" Roman Catholic, ever ready to defend his church. His principal controversial writings will be found collected under the title, A Collection of Tracts, or Several Subjects connected with the Civil and Religious Principles of Catholics (London, 1820); besides these may be mentioned his oft-published Catechetical Instructions on the Doctrines and Worship of the Catholic Church (1840), and his scholarly New Version of the Four Gospels (1836). But it is as an historical writer that he lives. He wrote, The Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, 1806 (3d ed. greatly enlarged, under the title, The History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, 1845), and the truly great History of England, from the First Invasion by the Romans to the Commencement of the Reign of William III., London, 1819-30, 8 vols.; 5th and best ed., revised thoroughly by the author, 1849, 10 vols.; 6th ed. (reprint), 1854-55. It has been translated into German, French, and Italian. It should always be consulted for the Roman-Catholic view of its period, but cannot be relied upon implicitly; for the author keeps back, sometimes, part of the truth. (Compare Adams: Manual of Historical Literature, pp. 440, 441.) A Life of Lingard is prefixed to the sixth edition of his History.

LINUS is, by all lists of Roman bishops, placed as the immediate successor of St. Peter (RENEUS). Adv. omn. haer., III, 3, 8; Catalogus Liberii, ed. Mommsen, in his Uber den Chronographen von 354, Eusebius: Hist. Ecle., III, 2, 13, and Chronicl., p. 186, ed. Schone; Augustin: Epist. 53; Orat. 56: De schiz. Deut. 11. 3. The length of his reign is differently determined. Eusebius counts twelve years in his church history, but fourteen in his chronicle; the Catalogus Liberii counts twelve years, four months, and twelve days; Jerome, eleven years. The date of the beginning of his reign is also differently fixed according to the different calculations of the death of St. Peter. As the Roman congregation knew nothing about an episcopal constitution in the beginning of the second century, Linus was consequently simply a presbyter of the church; but when it afterwards became of interest to present a continuous succession of bishops from the apostle Peter, he was made a bishop, and identified with the Linus of 2 Tim. iv. 21. His alleged epitaph has no interest whatever (comp. Kraus: Roma soteranea, 2d ed., p. 69). See Lipsius: Chronologie d. römischen Bischöfe, Kiel, 1889, p. 116.

LITANY. See LITURGIES.

LITANY (Lat. LITANIA). The term originally meant a prayer for protection (comp. λογομοημα), but later was used of the processions in which such prayers were offered (comp. Sophokles, Glossary of Later and Byzantine Greek, in Memoirs of the American Academy, vii, 407), or of the Kyrie Eleison. Since the Reformation, it is usually employed to designate a special form of prayer in which the minister announces the objects of petition, and the congregation responds with an appropriate supplicatory ejaculation. From old the ministerial announcement has been called the proophenos, There are proofs, that, at a very early period, the congregation at public service not only gave the response "Amen" to the eucharistic prayers (Justin: Ap., i. 65; comp. Apost. Constit., vii, 12), but also other responses in the general prayer of the church. When, for example, the proophenos for the emperor was recited, all responded, "Christ, help!" (Christ, kome). The length of his reign is determined differently. Eusebius counts twelve years in his church history, but fourteen in his chronicle; the Catalogus Liberii counts twelve years, four months, and twelve days; Jerome, eleven years. The date of the beginning of his reign is also differently fixed according to the different calculations of the death of St. Peter. As the Roman congregation knew nothing about an episcopal constitution in the beginning of the second century, Linus was consequently simply a presbyter of the church; but when it afterwards became of interest to present a continuous succession of bishops from the apostle Peter, he was made a bishop, and identified with the Linus of 2 Tim. iv. 21. His alleged epitaph has no interest whatever (comp. Kraus: Roma soteranea, 2d ed., p. 69). See Lipsius: Chronologie d. römischen Bischöfe, Kiel, 1889, p. 116.

LINZ, The Peace of, was concluded Dec. 13, 1645, between Georg Rakoczy, Prince of Transylvania, and the Emperor Ferdinand III. as King of Hungary, and forms the foundation of the constitution of the evangelical church in Hungary. The Protestants obtained freedom of worship in Hungary in a homily. Leo III. (thrice) had taken from them were restored to them; and a punishment was fixed for any one who interfered with their service, or annoyed them on account of their religion. LIONS of the Asiatic species, smaller, with a shorter mane, and less formidable, than the can species, were found in Palestine down to the twelfth century, but have disappeared, together with the forests. Towns derived their names from the lion, e.g., Arieh and Laish; while Lebonah means "lionsess." The lion's favorite abode seems to have been in the jungles of the Jordan (Deut. xiii. 19, 1. 44). It was sometimes attacked by the shepherds single-handed (1 Sam. xvii. 36); but generally it was itself the attacking party, devoted men, and even ravaged villages. How deep an impression the Hebrews had received from this animal, the "king of beasts," may be judged, not only from the characteristic descriptions which the Bible contains of its habits and appearance, its roar and movements, but also from the innumerable symbolical and metaphorical expressions derived from it (Gen. xlix. 9; 1 Chron. xii. 8; Isa. xxix. 1, marg.; Rev. v. 6).

LINZER. See LITURGIES.

LITANY. See LITURGIES.
processionals go back no farther than Mamertinus; but it is related that Pelagius I. in 555, after the litany was said in a certain church in Rome, had a procession from there to St. Peter's (Muratori: Rer. Ital. script., iii. 1323). This was probably a development of the usual processionals at Easter, at which the litany was repeated thrice. The prayers of the litany were already at this time concluded with the words, "Lamb of God, have mercy upon us" (Muratori, i. 564). In addition to these processionals, the 25th of April was fixed in Rome as the day for a public procession with the litany. This—the so-called litania major—Gregory the Great found in use. In its observance, it was the custom to march from one of the churches to St. Peter's in order to say the "litany which is called by all the 'larger'" (comp. Martene: De antiqu. eccles. rit., i. 514 sq.). The litania septiformis,—so called because it was performed by seven years' Old Gregory established, was not to be confounded with this one. It was occasioned by a desolating pestilence which followed upon an inundation of the Tiber in 590, and became the model of the Gallic rogationes, which were called litanees minores.

The "larger litanies" as it is found in the Gregorian Missal, appealed to the saints; but such petitions had grown very much by 887, at which time the Paris form was certainly in use. After the Kyrie Eleison and "Christ, hear us" had been repeated three times, a hundred petitions were offered, containing appeals to Mary, the angels, and the apostles. These were closed with the petition, "All ye saints, pray for us." In the middle ages, litanies were also said at the dedication of churches, the coronation of the Roman emperors, etc.

By the rule of Benedict, the litany came to be frequently used in the convents; and a short litany was said every Saturday at the celebration of the mass. The frequent use of the Kyrie in song and on all festal occasions, by the Germans in the middle ages, is a proof of the frequent use of the litany by the priests.

The number of litanies increased to such an extent, that Clement VIII. saw fit to limit it. Of those originating in the latter part of the middle ages he chose only the Litany of Our Lady of Loreto. It belongs to the thirteenth or fourteenth century, and praises Mary with every conceivable title of honor. By papal decree in 1448, the Litany of the Name of Jesus was also sanctioned. This does not date, even by the confession of Roman-Catholic scholars, beyond the fifteenth century. It is, however, the Litany of All the Saints which ranks highest in the Roman-Catholic Church. The text of the prayer against the Turks and the Pope (Wider des Türk en und des Papstes Mord u. Lesturung), inserted in 1548. Luther declared this congregational form of prayer to be "most useful and salutary." The Moravians, also, use the litany with some special petitions.

[Augustine and the monks that were with him, according to Bede, entered Canterbury chanting a litany. The litany of the English Book of Common Prayer was originally intended to be a distinct office. A rubric in the first prayer-book (1549) ordered it to be said on Wednesdays and Fridays, before the communion-office. It was then placed after the communion-office, and in 1552 put in the place it now occupies, with the direction that it was to be "used upon Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and at other times when it shall be commanded by the ordinary." The clause in Edward's Prayer-Book, "From the tyranny of the Bishop of Rome and all his destructive grievances," was omitted in the copy printed by royal sanction, 1550. See Bingham: Antiquities; Martene: De Antiquis ritibus, etc.; Blunt: Annotated Prayer-Book, 6th ed., London, 1875; Proctor: History of the Book of Common Prayer, pp. 249 sqq., 11th ed., Lond., 1874; Stanesby: The Book of Common Prayer, with an Annotated, London, 1875; Röckinger: Über Formelbücher, Munich, 1855; E. de Rozière: Recueil général d'formules, etc., ii. p. 909.

LITURGICS. The science of worship. See Worship.
prayest, enter into thy closet," he also said, "After this manner pray ye, Our Father who art in heav-
ен. The last as clearly implies a social act as the first implies a solitary act; and, in enjoining that, it is also implied that prayer is a right and a duty made use of. The liberty which is often usurped, of interpreting this as merely or chiefly the model on which prayer is to be formed, and discarding the use of the very form itself in social prayer, must be regarded as due to a purely subjective interest. The command, "Go ye and teach all nations," is not more peremptory than the com-mmand, "When ye pray, say, Our Father who art in heaven." The last as clearly implies a social act as the same prayers, for example, again and again, voices blended together in that kivme oration which in all ages since has been found equally suited to express the adoring sentiment of the people, who thus learned when to ejaculate the worship the Lord's Prayer as the Legitimalordi of the first or genuine first Clement, discovered by Bryning in the language before the vocabulary is arranged and defined; and a liturgy exists as soon, as forms of prayer are employed, whether they are written down or not. The two great families of the early liturgies are the Eastern and the Western. In general it will be admitted that the Oriental Church has taken the lead in everything relating to worship, possessed forms of prayer sooner than the Latin, and that some of the Greek liturgies date back, in their elements, to a very early period. The most primitive of these, by the universal consent of critics, is that body of prayer found in the eighth book of the pseudo-Clementine Apostolical Constitutions. It does not, indeed, amount, in the strict sense, to a liturgy; since its forms are designed, not so much for the people as for the officiating minister.
They were never used in any church. Probably they were never "published," but only privately circulated; but, viewed even in this light, they possess, for their character and the indications in them of a high antiquity, a marked value of their own.

The clumsy device by which the various parts of the diaitaes ("Constitutions") are ascribed to the several apostles is not to be understood as seriously meant to deceive. It was merely a rhetorical contrivance for giving authority and emphases to the instructions, like the speeches in Thucydides and Sallust. But this apparent fraud, and the pseudo-epigraphic title, have thrown, upon the eighth book at least, an unmerited degree of discredit. It is the oldest body of prayer we have inherited from the primitive church, and exhibits the simplicity, the tenderness, the adoring reverence, with which believers in the earliest ages drew near the mercy-seat of God.

A few characteristic features of this liturgy may here be mentioned:

1. The prayers extend continuously to a great length. They are not broken up into parts, with an intermediate "amen;" and there is no appearance yet of the "collect."

2. The length of the prayers consists mostly in their taking the character of historical reviews of God's providence towards his church under the old dispensations. From this is drawn an argument for his continued watchful care over his people in all times.

3. Whoever may have been the author or authors of these prayers, they include passages of great sublimity and beauty as have ever entered into public devotion in any later times.

4. The fact of an elaborate hierarchy being implied, with ascertained rules for their ordination, the appointment of tithes for their support, the use of a certain apparatus in the sacramental service, the lighting of candles on the altar, prayers for the pious dead, etc., are no disproof of the ante-Nicene origin of these Constitutions. Contrariwise they only illustrate the early period at which such usages found their way into Christian worship. Two hundred years are a long period in human history, and afford room for great changes in human institutions, for the better or the worse; and there is evidence enough that changes of various kinds went on somewhat rap-Idly in the obscure twilight of the first centuries.

5. This early origin of the "Constitutions" is

[1 [The oldest post-apostolic prayer is found in the portion of the first or genuine Epistle of Clement, discovered by Bryning, and published in Constantinople 1673. It is quite elaborate, and extends over three long pages (14v. 143v. It would appear that it was in general such a prayer as Clement was in the habit of offering up in the church at Rome where he was chief pastor. It is, therefore, in its prominent features, a form of prayer, and as such was used in the composition of the liturgy in the Apostolical Constitutions. See Bishop Lichfield: S. Clement of Rome, Appendix, London, 1877, pp. 262, 276. — Kn.]
have to take our choice between admitting that such place or state occurs in the early liturgies. A considerable relief, however, in discovering that derived from the earliest times, before they were separated from each other. The Protestant finds the practice is so in harmony with his resemblance appears in the following particulars: viz., 1. They are all "sacramentaries." The Christian sacrifice is the central object about which all the parts of the service are gathered. In this respect the Protestant liturgies differ from them, since these may be said rather to be gathered about the sermon, and to relate to the whole worship of God, both regular and special; while the early liturgies neither include any forms for special occasions, nor make any reference to the preaching of the gospel. 2. They all include the element of prayer for the dead. This practice is so irreconcilable with the Protestant doctrine of probation as to be generally classed among the characteristic corruptions of the Church of Rome. It must therefore be with a certain sensation of surprise that the Protestant finds this usage, not merely in a few of the early liturgies, but in all of them without exception; from which it would follow that we have to take our choice between admitting that the practice is so in harmony with the yearnings of our nature as to spring up sporadically wherever there were Christian worshippers, or else that it was the common inheritance of the churches derived from the earliest times, before they were separated from each other. The Protestant finds a considerable relief, however, in discovering that these prayers imply no belief in the existence of a purgatory. Not the faintest allusion to any such place or state occurs in the early liturgies. The prayers "for the whole Catholic Church" include the departed souls as being in a state not of purgatorial suffering, but of incomplete happiness; as being in paradise, and not yet in heaven. 3. There are many minor features, not requiring to be particularly dwelt upon, found alike in all these liturgies; such as the division of the service into two parts,—that preceding the consecration of the elements (pre-anaphora) and the anaphora, or sacramental service,—the use of the Lord's Prayer, the secret prayer of the minister (oratio veil), the mingling of water with the wine, the invocation of the Holy Spirit, and various rubrical directions, everywhere substantially the same. 4. It remains to be added that these were all true liturgies: they were adapted to the use of the congregation. The service is not all performed by the minister, but the people have their vocal share. The worship was uniform throughout: the people reply at all the appropriate places. — Habemus ad Dominum, Domine Missere, Missere Nostri, Deus Salvator Noster, etc. They repeat aloud the oratio dominica (the Lord's Prayer), they resound the creed and the doxology, and, at the end of all the prayers, swell the chorus of "the Amen." This made a true service for the people (a λητεσσορία), and justified the concluding prayer of thanksgiving, "O God, who hast given us grace with one accord to make these our common supplications unto thee," etc. These remarks premised as to the harmony of the whole body of the liturgies, we proceed to a more particular description of the details of the service. We suppose ourselves to be writing, not for professional scholars, who will go to the original sources themselves, but for the benefit of popular readers. We shall take, therefore, a single representative Oriental liturgy to furnish a brief sketch of the mode in which the church of the fifth and sixth centuries conducted its sacramental service. Leaving out the Clementine Liturgy,—improperly so called, which, as already observed, was never employed in any church,—there were three principal and most venerable forms in use in the Syrian and Egyptian churches; viz., those of Basil of Caesarea, Gregory "Theologus," and Cyril of Alexandria. Of these we may take the first as a pattern liturgy, an analysis of which will set the whole sacramental worship of the early Eastern Church before us. Under it we include the Basilian Liturgy of the Alexandrian Church, and the liturgy of Chrysostom, which are only variations of it. It was the original type on which the others were formed, and was more widely in use throughout the East than any other; everywhere, indeed, except in Jerusalem, where the so-called "Liturgy of St. James" was used, and in Alexandria, which naturally clung to the pretended liturgy of St. Mark. At this day, after the lapse of near fifteen hundred years, the liturgy of Basil prevails, without any substantial variety, from the northern shore of Russia to the extremities of Abyssinia, and from the Adriatic and Baltic Seas to the farthest coast of Asia. Basil was Bishop of Caesarea from A.D. 370 to A.D. 379,—the time of his death. His title of "The Great" indicates the admiration of his own age, and explains the readiness with which the Eastern churches in subsequent times all adopted a form of worship which, in was belatedly adopted. Following, then, the order of Basil's liturgy, we find, first, that the priest begins with the apostolic benediction, to which the people respond, "And with thy spirit," followed by other responsive sentences. Second, then follows a prayer of praise and adoration to God as Creator, Ruler, Saviour, and Sustainer of all things, from the trisagion. "For all things do serve thee,—angels, archangels, thrones, dominions, principal ties, powers, the many-eyed cherubim and seraphim, crying, one to another incessantly and with uninterrupted praises, saying, "Here the people all jizo the acclaim." "Holy, holy, holy Lord God of Sabaoth, heaven and earth are full of the glory of the Lord!" "Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord!"

The deacon then arranges the sacramental vessels; and the minister proceeds with a prayer adoring the justice of God as illustrated in the creation and the fall of man, and his mercy as shown in the incarnation, life, ministry, atoning death, resurrection, ascension, mediatorial reign, and second coming, of the Lord Jesus Christ. This constitutes the pre-anaphoral service. The prayer ends with the words, "But he has left us a memorial of his saving passion; for when he was just going out to his voluntary, glorious, and life-giving death, in the same night wherein he gave himself up for the life of the world, taking bread into his holy and immaculate hands, and presenting it to thee, his God and Father, he gave thanks, blessed, sanctified, and brake it, and gave it to his holy apostles, saying" "Somebody begins the anaphora of Basil's own time, "Take this for you for the remission of sins." The consecration of the cup immediately follows in the same scriptural terms, concluding with "For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show forth my death, and confess my resurrection." To the various parts of this service the people respond, "Amen. We praise thee, we bless thee, we give thanks to thee, O Lord, we make our supplications unto thee, O our God." An invocation to the Holy Spirit follows, and then a commemoration of the pious dead. A full prayer is then offered for all sorts and conditions of men,—for "our most religious emperors;" for "enemies and persecutors;" for the "afflicted and persecuted in deserts, mountains, dens, and caves of the earth;" for "our brethren in court and camp;" for "those absent on just occasions;" and a great number of other classes of persons. This long prayer is followed by a brief litany, in which the people continually respond to the various suffrages, "Lord, have mercy upon us," etc. At the close of all this, the sacramental emblems, the bread and the wine, are distributed at once to the people without further words. It is to be remembered that all this was the sacramental part of the service, at which none but the initiated or believers were permitted to attend, and that the missa catechumenorum, including the reading of the Scriptures and the bishop's sermon, at which all might be present, had preceded it.

The question now recurs as to the age to which this form of prayer belongs. Was it the composition of the great bishop of Cesarea? or was it merely compiled by him from earlier sources? Or, again, was it the production, as some of its contents might seem to indicate, of a considerably later time, sought to be passed off under so illustrious a name? We begin with the testimony of Basil himself. He was the most illustrious light among the constellation of brilliant men that adorned the church of the fourth century, eminent alike as theologian, pulpit orator, church leader, and saint. No one could have known better than he the history and usages of the church. In the twenty-seventh chapter of his work De Spiritu Sancto, he is arguing, in defence of a certain form of trinitarian confession, against the objection that no such precise form was found in the Scriptures. Many things are lawfully practised in the church, he goes on to write, no written authority can be found in the "saints;" such as making the sign of the cross, worshipping towards the east, standing in prayer on Sundays, trine immersion, etc. But these are all warranted by tradition. So, he adds, the method of consecrating the elements at the Eucharist is nowhere found set down in the writings of the "saints," but is regulated in accordance with the traditional doctrine of the church. This implies that there was a well-known and fixed form of sacramental liturgy sanctioned by long usage. It was not new, any more than the practice of making the sign of the cross, which we know was universal in the time of Tertullian, nearly two hundred years earlier, and therefore presumptively had been in use for a long period before him.

But it has been generally argued from the phrase employed in this passage, "the saints," that no forms for the sacramental service had ever been reduced to writing beds before Basil's own time, involving "saints" as equivalent to "fathers." Bingham and others of the earlier writers, and even so careful a scholar as the author of the article Liturgie, in the new Herzog's Real Encyclopædie (von Zeisschitz), have too hastily admitted this; whereas the whole extent of Basil's dictum is, that no such forms are found in the writings of the apostles. The context shows that he is referring only to the absence of scriptural authority for certain usages, which he maintains were notwithstanding lawful, anticipating in this the argument of Richard Hooker in his Ecclesiastical Polity. For aught that appears in this passage, therefore, there may have been already extant various less perfect sacramental liturgies, differing in different churches. What Basil effected was to reduce them all to one common form, to which his great name gave a currency that enabled it soon to swallow up the rest.

This is the meaning of a passage in the funeral oration of Gregory Nazianzen for his illustrious friend (In laudem Basilii, Orat. 43). Recounting the manifold activities of the Bishop of Cesarea, he says, that besides the erection and care of his almshouse and hospital, his unsleeping vigilance over his flock, his codes for the government of convents and monasteries, and his general regulation of the lives and duties of the clergy, he had also effected a compilation of the prayers of the church into a regular service (descriptiones precum). This descriptio precum ("order of prayer") was merely a new and improved edition of the sacramental service already in use, just as the symbool Romanum was not an original creed, but only an accurate and perfected summary of the various regular fidei current among the churches. In both cases a competent authority sanctioned the new form, to which the others soon gave place. That this Basilian Liturgy was afterwards successively enlarged, modified, "interpolated," etc., is unquestionable; but these later "interpolations" are merely signs of its greater relative antiquity. They are not properly interpolations at all, since they merely record the successive changes in the doctrinal or the devotional system of the church.

Beginning, then, from this work of Basil's, and following the footprints backward, we may find some ground for an opinion as to the period from which a liturgy was actually in use in the church.

About the year 347, Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem, preached at the Easter festival those discourses which are known under the name of Catecheses mystagogicae, or instructions to candidates preparatory to communion. The fifth of these lectures inculcates a commentary on the Lord's Prayer. It is directed to explaining to the catechumens the reasons for the various parts of the service,—the washing of hands, the kiss of peace, the prayers, the responses of the people, and the administration of the Eucharist.

Now, it is to be observed here that Cyril is not proposing any new forms or rites, but takes the whole routine of the service for granted, and is merely giving to the catechumens, in a plain and simple way suited to the stage of their religious education, the reasons for the various parts. It is not different from a short sermon to Sunday-school children at the present day, explaining the nature of the church service. It may be safely assumed, then, that the forms thus expounded had been in use for a length of time; that they were the same in which Cyril himself had been trained in his childhood before the Council of Nice, and the same in which his parents and teachers had been educated during the long peace preceding the last persecution.

When we have reached this point, we come upon the trail of the pseudo-Clementine Liturgy; and this, in the same way, may be believed to exhibit the worship of the church as it was in the first half of the third century, reaching back, quite probably, to the time of Tertullian. That the worship of the church in his day was, to a considerable degree, simple and spontaneous, may be easily admitted; but that it may not have been, to some extent, conducted according to an ascertained ritual, is far from being decided, as is often assumed by his well-known phrase sine monitore quia de pectoro (Apologeticus, 29). If the prayer was extemporaneous, the people certainly did not pray sine monitore, since the minister went before them, and dictated the words they were to adopt; and if an accustomed form was used, as would seem far the most likely in regular prayer for magistrates, it might still be equally de pectoro. The natural meaning of this much-buffed phrase would seem to be that Christians prayed for their rulers, as for others, without needing any command or summons, because they prayed cheerfully, and from the impulses of their own hearts.

We are not concerned to attempt tracing the growth of liturgical forms amid the dim twilight of the second century. The conclusion will be, that in the simple worship described by Justin Martyr, in which nothing more appears of a liturgical nature than a certain order of service, with common prayers, the regular administration of the Lord's Supper on “the day called Sunday,” the kiss of charity, the vocal amen, etc., we have drawn from all experience, that no great change in the religious usages of a people is made in a day, or by the authority of any individual. Religious usages are above all others persistent, and while admitting, without serious difficulty, of immaterial modifications of a period from the same from generation to generation. We infer, therefore, that, when Basil compiled his descriptions precum, he presented nothing to startle the church of his time as new, but only an arrangement of their old familiar liturgy, with such new prayers as any bishop was at liberty to add. We may infer the same from the Irenaeus of A.D. 180, which was promulgated in the church of Rome, and was of the form illustrated by Cyril, and of the Clementine Liturgy.

When we have reached that far, we have no doubt got back among the origines liturgiae of the Christian Church, and may well be excused from groping any farther in the dark.

The other great family of liturgies, though much smaller in numbers, is the Western. In tracing the process of their development, the baseline from which to work backward would be the Gregorian rite of the year 600 A.D. In the same way as before, it might be shown that this was only a new and improved edition of the sacramentary of Gelasius of A.D. 492, as that was of the Leonian Liturgy of A.D. 451; and that the descriptions left us by Innocent I. (A.D. 404) and other of the Fathers, imply regular forms of prayer in the Church of Rome at still earlier periods. This deduction, as well as a particular account of the Roman service, our limits oblige us to dispense with.

We only add, that, omitting certain superstitious usages which had grown up in the church, these liturgies, containing as they do all the elements of the evangelical doctrine, and embodying a large part of the divine word, were admirably adapted to nurse the sentiment of religion among the people, and prove the vehicle for Christ's promise that the gates of hell should never prevail against his church. It must be regarded as unfortunate that their prejudice against popery and prelacy should have led Presbyterians so generally to cut themselves off from these rich sources of devotional culture, which have no necessary connection with either the one system or the other.

Protestant Liturgies. Luther, Calvin, and the other Protestant leaders, who eliminated out of the worship of God the corrupt usages of the Church of Rome, found nothing objectionable in the mere fact of a regular form of prayer. They lost no time in providing suitable liturgies for the various countries that embraced the Reformation, each having its own national service. In 1523 Luther published his Lateinische Messe, and in 1526 the same, with improvements, in German. In 1538 Calvin issued his liturgy for the church of Strassburg, and in 1541 that for the church in Geneva, containing both ordinary and special services. In 1554 John Knox published a form of worship for the Scottish kirk, modelled on that of Geneva. These liturgies all left room, in some part of the service, for the exercise of free prayer. The English Book of Common Prayer was compiled in 1549, by Cranmer and Ridley, from several Roman missals in use in various parts of England, portions of it being adopted from Butler's liturgy, particularly the forms of confession and absolution: no great change of this service is due to its having been compiled, to a great extent, from the Latin sacramentaries of Leo and Gelasius, with additions made in the devout spirit and refined taste of Cranmer. A hundred years later, the growing alienation between the adherents of episcopacy and of presbyterianism in England caused the latter to discard liturgical services altogether, and to depend on the gift of extemporaneous prayer in their ministers. Eventually the two usages came to be characteristic of the two forms of church government; the Episcopalians all worshipping by means of an agreed form of service; the Presbyterians by means of free prayer, though there is no reason in the nature of things why they might not both worship in the one way or the other; or, better still, why both methods should not be united in all public worship.

In the progress of the nineteenth century a general liturgical revival took place in various non-Episcopal churches in Germany, where a new form of service — the Agenda — was drawn for the Evangelical Union, under the patronage of the king of Prussia. In 1838 a committee of the General Assembly of the Scottish kirk reported a collection of forms of worship for the use of soldiers, sailors, etc., which received the unanimous sanction of the Assembly. A few years since, the Church Service Society issued their Εσχατολόγιον, or Book of Common Order, which has reached a fourth edition, and is working a marked but silent change in the public Presbyterian worship of Scotland. The Liturgy of the Catholic Apostolic Church (Irvingite), based on the Anglican Book of Common Prayer, is of a highly rich and elaborate character, corresponding with the hierarchical development in that enthusiastic communion. The daily prayer offered in every Irvingite Church gives thanks for the restoration of the order of the apostles, and for the warning, announced through them, of the nearness of the day of Christ's appearing. It contains, also, in the sense of the early liturgies, an intercession for the pious dead.

In the United States, except in the Episcopal, Lutheran, German and Dutch Reformed, and Moravian churches, liturgical prayer has been almost wholly disused; but from the middle of the present century a marked tendency has developed itself in favor of increased dignity and variety in Presbyterian public worship. In 1855 Dr. Baird published anonymously his Eutaxia, or the Presbyterian liturgies. The Presbyterian Book of Common Prayer, by Professor Shields of Princeton, is merely a republication of the Anglican Prayer-Book, with the exceptions offered by the Presbyterians at the Savoy Conference. The litany and the ancient prayers are freely but judiciously altered, and many excellent new prayers are added. In 1857 the German Reformed Church issued a new Order of Worship, which is based upon a careful study of the liturgies of the ancient Church and the Reformation period, and resembles in many respects the Anglican liturgy. It is used with the agreement of ministers and congregations. The Dutch Reformed Church follows the old Palatinate Liturgy. The Lutherans in America use partly the German Lutheran Agenda, or new church books based upon them. The Moravians have a very rich evangelical liturgy in German and English, with responses and congregational singing. The Congregationalists are largely dependent on responses, and on hymns by eminent members of both liturgical and non-liturgical churches.

We are led naturally, in conclusion, to a brief view of the respective advantages of liturgical and of free prayer. In favor of the latter it is claimed that this is the natural method, and alone corresponds to the impulse of the devout mind; that prayer by means of prescribed forms cramps the free expression of the desires to God, and tends to spiritual torpor and poverty. To this it is replied, that the objection is urged only by such as are unaccustomed to liturgical worship; that those familiar with it find it promotes attention and devotion in prayer; that it preserves the sentiment of the communion of saints in all times and all ages, since the church, from a very early period till now, and throughout the larger part of Christendom, has worshipped, and continues to worship, by means of the same forms; that it would be as reasonable to insist that the minister should make his own hymns as his own prayers; and that, if a prayer-book in the hands of a worshipper is unfavorable to spirituality of worship, a hymn-book should be equally so; that David's written prayers are used with eminent profit by Christians as the expression of their religious sentiments; that worship, being the common act of the whole congregation, may properly be conducted by forms common to all; while preaching, being the work of the minister for the instruction of the people, is necessarily the act of one; and other similar arguments. On the other hand, it is admitted that occasions may frequently arise in the history of every congregation, calling for mention in public prayer, — as dangers, afflictions, spiritual prosperity, or decay, — for which a liturgy cannot provide. The conclusion reached by eminent members of both liturgical and non-liturgical churches is, that a system which should unite the propriety and dignity of venerable forms with the flexibility and adaptation to occasions of free prayer, would be superior to any existing method.

Lit. — The authorities chiefly consulted during the preparation of this article have been the original liturgies in the Abbé Migne's Patrologia, with the learned historical essays of Mabillon, Muratori, Mone, and others; the Liturgiarum Orientalium Collectio, by Renaudot; Brett: Eastern Liturgies; Pamelius: Liturgicon; Neale: Liturgies of the Holy Eastern Church; Palmer: Origines Liturgiae; Hammond: Antient Liturgies, and many other modern sources. For the English Prayer-Book see especially Proctor, Blunt, Butler, and Luckock. See Lee: Glossary of Liturgical Terms, London, 1876; also art. Liturgy, in Encyclopaedia Britannica, 9th ed., vol. xiv. See Prayer-Book. — S. M. Hopkins.

LIUDGERUS, or LIUDGERUS, St., b. about 744; d. March 26, 809. He descended from a Frisian but Christian family; was educated in Italy; ascended the See of Utrecht; studied at York, under Alcuin; labored for seven years as a missionary among the Frisians; visited Rome, and was by Charlemagne, to whom he was recommended by Alcuin, first sent as missionary among the Frisians; and then, after the subjugation of the Saxons, bishop of the newly founded see of Münster. Of his activity as bishop very little is known. He founded the monastery of Werden, and wrote a life of Gregory, his teacher at Utrecht. The sources for his life have been edited by Dr. Diekamp, in the fourth volume of his Geschichtsquellen d. Bisiums Münster (Münster, 1881), who has separately published, in the same place and year, Die Vita sancti Liudgeri. His biography has been written by himself. Liudprandus obit. 1484; [HUSING, Münster, 1878]; and Pingsmann, Freiburg, 1879.
LIUDPRAND. 1830 LIVINGSTONE.

LIUDPRAND, or LIUTPRAND, whose works form one of the principal sources for the history of the tenth century, was born in Italy, of a distinguished Lombard family, and was educated at the court of Pavia. He served first King Berengar, and then Otho I., who made him bishop of Cremona. His works are, Antapodosis (887—949), Liber de rebus gestis Ottonis (960—964), and Relatio de legatione Comitatopolitana (968—969). They were edited by Pertz, in Mon. Germ. iii. 264—308; new ed. by Dünnler, 1877.

LIVERPOOL, the famous commercial city on the Mersey, with a population of 552,425, was made the seat of a bishopric in 1880; and John Charles Ryle, D.D., was made first incumbent. The income of the see is thirty-five hundred pounds; and St. Peter's was constituted the pro-cathedral, pending the construction of a more suitable building.

LIVINGSTON, John Henry, D.D., "the father of the Reformed Dutch Church in America;" b. at Poughkeepsie, N.Y., May 30, 1748; d. in New Brunswick, N.J., Jan. 20, 1825. He was graduated at Yale College, 1762; studied law for two years; was converted, and, on advice of Archibald Laidie (see art.), sailed for Utrecht, Holland, May 12, 1766, there to study theology. He was "the last of the American youth who went thither for education and ordination." He was licensed by the Classis of Amsterdam, 1769; was called by the New-York Consistory, May 30, 1769; took the degree of doctor of divinity the next year; and on Sept. 3, 1770, arrived, and took his place as second English preacher in the Reformed Dutch Church in New York. The Revolution drove him from the city. He served first at Kingston (1776), then at Albany (November, 1776—79), at Livingston Manor (1779—81), Poughkeepsie (1781—83). But on the close of hostilities (1783) he returned to the city. In 1784 he was appointed by the general synod professor of didactic and polemic theology; and in 1810 the synod called him to New Brunswick to open a theological seminary there, and at the same time he was elected president of Queen's (now Rutgers) College. These two offices he held until his death. It is said that his reason in entering the Dutch Church ministry was his desire to heal its sad dissensions. (See Reformed (Dutch) Church.) Ably he fulfilled his design. By his education, his learning, his piety, and his dignity, he won the respect of both parties in the church; and under his skilful management "the Congregatie" and "the Coetus" were united (1771); and thus the credit of forming the independent organization of the Reformed Church in America must be given to him. It was he, also, who principally shaped the constitution of this church, and prepared its first psalm and hymn book (1787). As a preacher he was much admired. Notice is particularly taken of his animation and of his coloquial style. "His gesticulation would have been extravagant in any one but himself." *His theological lectures still form the basis of didactic and polemic instruction in the theological semi-

mary of which he was the founder and father. They are preserved in manuscript in the Sage Library, New Brunswick; an abstract of them was published in 1832. See Gunn's Memoirs of Rev. John H. Livingston, D.D., S.T.P. New York, 1826, condensed by Dr. T. W. Chambers, New York, 1856; also Sprague's Annals, vol. ix.

LIVINGSTONE, David, LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.S., F.R.G.S., was born in South and Central Africa; b. at Blantyre, court of Blantyre from Glasgow, in Scotland, March 19, 1813; d. April 30, 1873, in Iala, Africa. His father and mother were of the working-class; but of the highest moral and Christian worth. The father was a great reader, and deeply interested in the cause of Christian missions, then just beginning to attract attention. After a very short time at school, David was sent, at the age of ten, to a cotton-mill, where he spent the next twelve years of his life. The reading of Dick's Philosophy of a Future State led to his conversion; and an appeal from Gutzlaff, for missionaries to China, determined him to be a medical missionary. After attending theological and medical classes for two sessions at Glasgow, he offered his services to the London Missionary Society; and, being provisionally approved, he spent a further period in study at Ongar in Essex, and at London. In 1840 he passed at Glasgow as Licentiate of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons, and in November of the same year was ordained a missionary, under the London Missionary Society. His desire had been to go to China; but the opium war, in which, unhappily, England was then engaged, put a stop to that project. In London he had met with the Rev. Robert Moffat, who was then on furlough in England; and, having become greatly interested in what he told him of Africa, he received an appointment as a missionary there.

For a time he was occupied in work at Kuruman (Dr. Moffat's station) and in missionary tours to the north, undertaken to gain knowledge of the state of the people, and to find out a suitable locality for a new station. Already Livingstone had shown a fixed determination not to labor in the more accessible regions, but to strike out beyond. He early acquired a great liking for the plan of native agency; and his ambition was to scatter native agents far and near. He was remarkable for the influence he obtained from the very first,—partly through medical practice, and partly by his tact, and the charm of his manner over both chiefs and people. He also, from the first, took a lively interest in the natural productions of the country and in its structure and scientific history. After a time he settled at Mabotea (in 1843) among the Bakhatla. While there, he had a wonderful escape from being killed by a lion; and while there, likewise, he married Mary Moffat, the daughter of Dr. Moffat. From Mabotea, circumstances led him to remove to Chonuane, and from that again to Kolobeng, where he lived till 1852. His people were a tribe of Bakwains, whose chief, Sechéle, became a convert to Christianity. In his desire to plant native missionaries, he had made an excursion into the Transvaal Republic,—a large territory that had been taken possession of by Boer emigrants from the Cape of Good Hope; but the Boers were no friends of missions, and, instead of encouraging him, did their utmost to thwart his plans.

Baffled in this direction, Livingstone determined to make explorations on the north; but a serious obstacle was the great Kalahari Desert, which at times could not be traversed for want of water. Three times Livingstone got to the north of it, and tried to cross it, but was hindered in every way. The loss of his attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way, was very unwholesome from the prevalence of fever. It seemed to Livingstone that it would be of great importance for Sebituane's people to have a way to the sea, by which means legitimate commerce and Christianity would both be greatly advanced.

Livingstone sent his wife and four children home to England, and prepared for a great journey in fulfillment of this object. Before he set out, his house at Kolobeng was attacked by the Boers, and, along with all his property, utterly destroyed. Livingstone set out from Linyanti toward the western coast, with twenty-seven attendants, and after incredible hardships, including twenty-seven attacks of fever, at length reached the abodes of civilization at Loanda. Instead of making for Britain, Livingstone resolved to go back with his attendants to Linyanti, and then cross to the opposite shore of the continent. After a long time of labor and difficulty, in which his tact, his patience, and his faith were exposed to the severest strain, he reached Quilimane on May 26, 1856; the whole time of his journey since he left the Cape, in 1852, being almost four years.

Livingstone made many important discoveries during these years; the most important being the existence of a tabeland in Central Africa, depressed in the centre, with two ridges flanking it, which were free from the unhealthy influences prevalent in the lower-lying localities. The discovery of water. Three times Liv ingstone got to the north of it, and tried to cross it, but was hindered in every way. The loss of his attendants. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart. For a long time he was unheard of, and the utmost anxiety was felt concerning him.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.

In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important; Lakes Moero and Bangweelo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart.
...Amid all the vicissitudes of his career, Livingstone remained faithful to his missionary character. His warmth and purity of heart, his intense devotion to his Master and to the African people for his Master's sake, his patience, endurance, trustfulness, and prayerfulness, his love of science, his wide humanity, his intense charity, have given to his name and memory an undying fragrance. After his death, church after church have given to his name and memory an undying fragrance. After his death, church after church... of knowledge. The name was thus very appropriate, and was retained by the theologians of the Lutheran Church down to the middle of the seventeenth century. He also adopted by some theologians of the Reformed faith, such as Musculus, Peter Martyr, J. Maccov, and Daniel Chamier.

LOCKE, John, was born at Wrington, Somersetshire, Aug. 29, 1632. His father was a lawyer, possessed of moderate landed property, and a firm adherent of the parliamentary and nonconformist party. His father exacted great respect from him when a child, but, as he grew up, allowed him greater familiarity,—a practice which the son recommends. He was educated at the famous Westminster school; and in 1651 he entered Christ Church, Oxford (in the grounds of which is still shown the mulberry-tree which he planted), where he was a diligent student, and devoted himself specially to the branches requiring thought. He did not follow any profession; but he was particularly addicted to the study of medicine, in which Sydenham declares that he acquired great knowledge of himself. He turned, to politics and philosophy. In 1664, during the Dutch war, he accompanied, as secretary, Sir W. Vane, the king's envoy, to the elector of Brandenburg; and there was much humor in the account he gives of his journey. In 1669 he became acquainted with the statesman Lord Ashley, afterwards Lord Shaftesbury, and became his medical adviser, counsellor, and friend. Henceforth his life is partly in Oxford, and partly with Shaftesbury, who appointed him to various public offices. Though very prudent, he became an object of suspicion to the royal party. Sunderland, by the king's command, ordered his expulsion. He was not expelled from Oxford, but deprived of his studentship by the dean and chapter of the college. He retreated to Holland, and lived in Amsterdam and Utrecht, where he had close intercourse with a number of eminent men, who met in each other's houses for discussion,—with Le Clerc, Guenilon the physician, with Limborch, and with the Remonstrant or Arminian party. The revolution of 1688 enabled him to return to his own country, bringing with him his Essay on Human Understanding, which he had been engaged in writing since 1671, and which he published in 1690. Henceforth his literary activity was very great. He carried on an extensive correspondence (afterwards published) on philosophic subjects with his admirer, William Molyneux of Dublin, who introduced his essay into Dublin university, where it held sway down to the second quarter of this century. He carried on a keen controversy with Stillingfleet, bishop of Worcester, who objected to his doctrine of substance as undermining the doctrine of the Trinity. He wrote three letters on Toleration, on which his views, perhaps derived in part from John Owen at Cambridge, were very liberal for his day, though much behind the opinions then entertained. He would give no toleration to atheists or papists. In a constitution he drew out for the Carolinas, viz., perception, retention, discernment, comparison, composition, abstraction, to which he adds volition. He divides the qualities of matter into primary and secondary; the former being those in all matter, in whatever state it be, and the latter resulting from the operation of the others.
He divides ideas into simple and complex. The former are perceived at once. Among these, the idea of space is given by sight and touch; of time, from the reflection on the succession of our ideas,—as if succession did not imply the idea of time. Complex ideas are divided into modes (such as gratitude), substances, and relations. He thus felt to substance exists as an unknown thing, standing under qualities. From his two sources he derives our idea of infinity, making it simply negative, and our very idea of moral good, deriving it from the sensation of pleasure and pain, with the law of God rewarding certain actions, and punishing others. It was in regard to this latter idea that the defects of his system were first seen by British thinkers.

In the third book he treats of the relation of words to ideas, and has very shrewd but often extreme remarks on the evil influence exercised by language on thought. In the fourth book he treats of knowledge, which he defines as "the perception of the connection, and agreement or disagreement, and repugnancy, of any of our ideas; holding that the mind hath no other immediate objects in all its thoughts and reasonings but its own ideas." Knowledge is usually represented as consisting in the agreement of our ideas with things. Locke's definition keeps us away from things, and issues logically in idealism. In the same book he treats of such subjects as intuitions, faith, and reason. He believes in intuition, but its own ideas. Locke's fundamental and most injurious error is the account which he gives of moral good and evil, which he represents as nothing but pleasure and pain drawn on us as a reward and punishment by the Lawgiver. He was met on this point by the third Lord Shaftesbury, the grandson of his friend and patron. His omissions on these points have been supplied in one way by the Scottish school, who bring in primary reason, common sense, and intuition, and in another by Kant, who calls in a priori principles in the shape of forms of sense, understanding, and reason.

Leibnitz wrote a review of Locke's essay, book by book, and chapter by chapter, in his Sur l'Entendement Humain, which, in consequence of Locke dying when he was writing it, was not published till 1761. Cousin also wrote a criticism in his Système de Locke. Professor Green has a sharply critical examination on Hegelian principles, in his Introduction to Hume's Treatise. See LORDING: Life of Locke; H. R. Fox Bourne: Life of Locke, Lond., 1876, 2 vols. JAMES McCOSH.

LOCUST, an insect belonging to the order Orthoptera, the group Saltatoria, the family Acrididae, and living, in several species, in Egypt, Arabia, Syria, Persia, and other Eastern countries. The common Syrian locust looks very much like the grasshopper. It is two inches and a half long, and grayish-green with black spots. These insects live in immense swarms, and are extremely voracious. Darl fresh by all winds, they suddenly sweep down on the country with a noise as of rain or hail; and in an extremely short time they completely denude it, eating up every flower and fruit, every grass and leaf. As always they move with the wind, they are often carried to the ocean, and drowned by the tempest. In some regions they are gathered, and used for food, being prepared in various ways,—boiled with butter, preserved with salt, dried, and ground to a powder, etc.

The Bible has no less than ten different Hebrew names for locust, which are rendered by "locust," "grasshopper," "palmer-worm," "beetle," etc. It may be that some of these ten names designate various stages in the development of the locust; but it seems more probable that they simply designate various species. As the locusts actually form one of the greatest scourges of the East, they are very graphically described in the Bible. Their multitude, — Exod. xvi. 25; Jer. xlvi. 23; Joel ii. 10; their voracity, — Joel i. 4, 7, 12; Ps. lxviii. 40; Isa. xxxiii. 4; the noise of their flight, — Joel ii. 5; Rev. ix. 9. Their being used as food is also mentioned: Lev. xi. 22; Matt. iii. 4; Mark i. 6.
LODENSTEIN, Jodokus von, b. at Delft, in Holland, 1629; d. at Utrecht, 1877. He was appointed master of a school, in Utrecht, 1644, and in Flushing, in 1654, and at Utrecht, 1652; and he occupies in the church history of the Netherlands a position somewhat similar to that which Spener occupies in the church history of Germany: he was a reformer of practical life, not of doctrine. The Netherlands had at that time reached the culminating point of its prosperity, and the popular mind seemed to be entirely absorbed by secular pursuits. Lodestein, however, made a deep and widespread impression, both by his preaching, by his writings (Verfallenes Christenthum, Reformationsspiegel, etc.), and by his beautiful spiritual songs.

LOEN, Johann Michael von, b. at Francfort, Dec. 21, 1694; d. July 26, 1776. He studied law at Marburg and Halle; travelled in Holland, France, Switzerland, and Italy; and lived for many years as a private gentleman in his native city, until, in 1758, he accepted a position in the Prussian civil service as president of the countyship of Lingen and Teklenburg. The reconciliation of all the various denominations into which Christendom is split up, and the establishment of a united Christian Church, one and undivided, was the great idea of his life, in behalf of which he wrote, Evangeliacher Friedensstempel, 1724; Hochst bedeckende Ursachen, etc., 1727; Bedenken von Separatisten, 1737; Vereinigung der Protestant- ten, 1748. His principal work, Die einzige wohle Religion (1750), has the same tendency. It is a singular blending of rationalism and pietism, reducing Christianity to a religion among other religions, and its essential truth to that which it has in common with all religions. It made a great sensation, however, and was translated into foreign languages.

LOGAN, John, b. at Soutra, East Lothian, Scot- land, 1748; d. in London, Dec. 28, 1788. He was educated at Edinburgh University, licensed in 1770, and ordained and installed in South Leith, in 1773. He had already evinced considerable poeti- cal talent by the publication of original poems in connection with those of Michael Bruce, whose poems he edited 1770. In 1775 he served on the committee of the general assembly to revise the Translations and Paraphrases, and adapt them for public worship. The collection is still in use. Eleven of the paraphrases are his. In 1781 he published a collected edition of his poems, and a tragedy (Runnamede) in 1783. In 1786 he resigned in consequence of his theatrical labors, and went to London, where he led a literary life. His View of Ancient History (1788), attributed to a Dr. Rutherford, and two volumes of his Sermons (1790–91), which are much admired, were posthu- mously published. A complete edition of his poems, and a memoir, appeared in 1812. His most famous poem was Ode to the Cuckoo.

LOGOS (from the Greek λόγος, rich means of "reason" and "word," ratio and oratio; both being intimately connected) has a peculiar significance in Philo, St. John, and the early Greek Fathers, and is an important term in the history of Chris- tology.

I. THE DOCTRINE OF PHILO. — Philo, a Jewish philosopher of Alexandria (d. about A.D. 40), who endeavored to harmonize the Mosaic religion with Platonism, derived his Logos view from the Solomonic and later Jewish doctrine of the per- sonified Wisdom and Word of God, and combined it with the Platonistic idea of Nous. The Logos is to him the embodiment of all divine powers and ideas, — the γνώση of the Old Testament, the δόξα and idea of Plato. He distinguished be- tween the Logos inherent in God (λόγος ευθείας), corresponding to reason in man, and the Logos emanating from God (σωφρονίσμα), cor- respondent to the spoken word which reveals the thought. The former contains the ideal world (the κόσμος νοστηρός): the latter is the first-begotten Son of God, the image of God, the Creator and Preserver, the Giver of light and life, the Mediator between God and the world, also the Messiah (though only in an ideal sense, as a theophany, not as a concrete historical person). Philo wavers between a personal and an impersonal conception of the Logos, but leans more to the impersonal conception. He has no room for an incarnation of the Logos and his real union with humanity. Nevertheless, his view has a striking resemblance to the Logos doc- trine of John, and preceded it, as a shadow pre- ceeded the substance. It was a prophetic dream of the coming reality. It prepared the minds of many for the reception of the truth, but misled others into Gnostic errors.

II. THE DOCTRINE OF ST. JOH—John uses Logos (translated "word") six times as a desig- nation of the divine pre-existent person of Christ, through whom the world was made, and who be- came incarnate for our salvation, John i. 1, 14; 1 John i. 1 (v. 7 is spurious); Rev. xix. 13; but he never puts it into the mouth of Christ. Philo may possibly have suggested the use of the term (although there is no evidence of John's having read a single line of Philo); but the idea was derived from the teaching of Christ and from the Old Testament, which makes a distinction be- tween the hidden and the revealed being of God, which personifies the wisdom of God and the word of God, and ascribes the creation of the world to the same (Ps. xxxiii. 6, Sept.). There is an inherent propriety of this usage in the Greek language, where Logos is masculine, and has an double meaning of thought and speech. Christ as to his divine nature bears the same relation to God as the word does to the idea. The word gives form and shape to the idea, and idea to others. The word is thought expressed (λόγος...
LOGOS. 1336

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.

LOGOS. 1336

LÖHE.
LÖHÉ.

LOLLARDS, a title applied to the followers of Wiclif in England, though the term was previously used of sectaries in Germany. Hoessen of Liege (1548) speaks of "quidam hypocrita gyrovagi qui Lollardis dixit Deum laudantes vocantur." His derivation, which would connect the word with the root which we have in lullaby, and makes the term equivalent to canters, is probably correct. Wiclif during his lifetime sent out itinerant preachers, who met with considerable acceptance among the people. The chief centre of Wiclif's teaching was the University of Oxford; and, after the condemnation of Wiclif's doctrine of the sacraments in 1382, Archbishop Courtenay proceeded to silence the Wiclifite teachers in the university. A strong academical party resisted the archbishop's interference, but the crown supported the archbishop. The chancellor of the university was forced to submit to the publication by the archbishop's commissary of the condemnation of Wiclif's doctrines. The chief Lollard teachers—Lawrence Bedeman, Philip Repington, and John Astor—were driven to recant. The more famous Nicholas Hereford, who worked with Wiclif in the translation of the Bible, made his escape from England. Archbishop Courtenay in the space of five months reduced to silence the Lollard party in Oxford, and secured the orthodoxy of the university.

This result was largely due to the re-action against novelties which was produced by the Peasants' Rising, under Wat Tyler, in 1381. Wiclif's political opinions were expressed somewhat crudely, and lent themselves to a socialistic interpretation, though Wiclif himself had no such views. Moreover, John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, patronized Wiclif through political antagonism to William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, and other prelates who acted as ministers of Edward III. Hence the Lollard movement wore at the beginning a political aspect, which it never lost, and which weakened its religious significance. After Wiclif's death, Hereford resumed his office, as it was allowed to continue, and was assisted by Astor and John Purvey. The party of the Lollards grew in numbers and in boldness. In 1387 one Peter Pateshall, an Augustinian monk, abandoned his order, joined the Lollards, and openly preached in London against monasticism.

Still the Lollard party owed much of its strength to powerful courtiers who were willing to use it as a means of striking at the political power of the prelates; and during the absence of Richard II. in Ireland, in 1394, a petition of the Lollards, attacking the Church, was presented to Parliament. This document must be regarded as the exposition of their opinions (cf. Fasciculi Zizaniorum, 360-369). Its twelve articles set forth that the Church of England, following its stepmother, the Church of Rome, was eaten up by temporal pride; that its clergy had deviated from the example of Christ and the apostles; that the celibacy of the clergy occasioned more scandal than the belief in transubstantiation caused idolatry. It protested against exorcisms and benedictions of lifeless objects, against the holding of secular office by priests, against special prayers for the dead, pilgrimages, auricular confession, and vows of chastity. To these points concerning ecclesiastical polity were added a protest against war as contrary to the gospel, and against unnecessary trades which were exercised only for the satisfaction of luxury. There is in these proposals a crude scheme for the reform of Church and State; but no definite basis is laid down, and the points insisted on are arbitrarily chosen. Richard II. considered the petition as dangerous: he returned from Ireland, and exacted from the ecclesiastical authorities, who had been so liberal at the beginning of his reign, the satisfaction of luxury. There is in these proposals an oath of abjuration of their opinions. Again there was no basis of belief strong enough to resist, and the movement collapsed as suddenly as it began.

This was the highest point of Lollardism in England; and its influence is seen in such literary productions as The Plowman’s Tale, and Pierce the Plowman’s Crede, both of which were written about this time. It was, however, only natural that the ecclesiastical authorities, who had been so openly menaced by the petition to Parliament, should think of retaliation and repression. Thomas Arundel, who succeeded Courtenay as archbishop of Canterbury in 1396, showed himself a decided opponent of the Lollards. In 1397 he laid before a provincial synod eighteen articles taken out of the writings of Wiclif, and they were all formally condemned. The condemnation of the council and the bishops proceeding with their inquisitions against them. But little results followed; and the growing discontent against Henry IV. gave the Lollards again a political color, and brought their social opinions into greater prominence. In the Parliament of 1406 a petition was presented by the Commons, and was supported by the Prince of Wales. It set forth that the Lollards were threatening the foundations of society by attacking the rights of property, while they stirred up political discontent by spreading stories that Richard II. was still alive: it asked that all officers possessing jurisdiction should arrest Lollards, and present them to Parliament for punishment. The king assented; but, for some unknown reason, the petition never became a statute, probably owing to the jealousy existing between spiritual and secular courts. The bishops do not seem to have exercised their statutory powers with harshness. William Thorpe was arrested by Archbishop Arundel in 1407, and was several times examined by him; but we do not find that he was condemned to death. Thorpe wrote accounts of his examinations; which were collected by his friends, and form an interesting record of this phase of English ecclesiastical history (printed in Foxe’s Acts and Monuments).

In 1409 Archbishop Arundel issued a series of constitutions against the Lollards, with the object of enforcing in detail the provisions of the statute of 1401: still the Lollards seem to have had some influence. In the Parliament of 1410 a petition was presented by the Commons, which, however, they afterwards asked to withdraw, praying for a modification of the statute of 1401, and asking that persons arrested under it should be admitted to bail. In the same Parliament the Lollard party submitted a wild proposal for the confiscation of the lands of bishops and ecclesiastical corporations, and the endowment out of them of new earls, knights, esquires, and hospitals. Whenever the Lollards had an opportunity of raising their voices publicly, they gave their enemies a handle against them by the extravagance of their political proposals.

During the session of this Parliament the first execution of a Lollard, under the statute of 1401, took place. John Badry, a tailor of Evesham, was examined by the Bishop of Worcester for erroneous doctrine concerning the Eucharist. He was brought to London, and was further examined by the archbishop and several suffragans. In spite of all their persuasions, he remained firm in his statement that the bread and wine of the sacrament of the altar remained bread and wine after consecration, though the body and blood of the living God. On March 5, 1410, he was condemned as a heretic, and was led to Smithfield for execution. The Prince of Wales, who was present, tried at the last moment to induce Badby to recant: his efforts were in vain. But it would seem that the first execution under the act was regarded with regret even by those who thought it absolutely necessary.

Meanwhile the triumph of orthodoxy in the University of Oxford was complete. Its theologians exercised their ingenuity by a close examination of Wiclif's writings; and in 1412 no fewer than two hundred and sixty-seven conclusions drawn from his works were condemned as erroneous. This condemnation was important; as it provided materials ready to hand for the theologians of the Council of Constance, who struck at Wiclif as the first step towards striking at Hus.

On the accession of Henry V. (1413), Archbishop Arundel was relieved of his office of chancellor, and had more time to proceed against the Lollards. Before the convocation of 1413 he laid a proposal to root out Lollardy from high places, and it was resolved that measures be taken to reduce to obedience the chief favorers of heresy. As the first victim of this new policy, a Herefordshire knight, Sir John Oldcastle, was selected. Oldcastle had considerable possessions, which he increased by marriage with the heiress of the barony of Cobham, who held large lands in Kent. After his marriage, Oldcastle was summoned to the House of Lords as Lord Cobham. Oldcastle was an earnest Lollard. He sheltered itinerant preachers, attended their services, and openly spoke against some of the church ritual. Oldcastle was formally presented by convocation to the king as a heretic; and Henry V. first tried by personal solicitations to win back Oldcastle to orthodoxy. When this failed, he was summoned to appear before the archbishop. He refused to do so, and fortified his castle of Cowham. After disobeying a second citation, he was taken prisoner, and brought before the archbishop on Sept. 23, 1413. He read a confession of faith, which the archbishop expressed himself well pleased; but he pressed Oldcastle for his opinions on transubstantiation and auricular confession. When Oldcastle declined to be explicit, he was given two days during which he might consider the orthodox opinions, which were given him in writing. In his second audience he refused to sign these declarations, and openly avowed Lollard opinions. He was condemned as a heretic, but was allowed a respite of forty days in hopes of a recantation. During this period he made his escape from the Tower, and thereby caused a panic. It was believed that a hundred thousand Lollards were ready for a rising; and a scheme seems to have been set on foot to seize the king at Eltham during the feast of Christmas. The Bishop of London, and obtaining information of a nocturnal meeting of conspirators, which was to be held on Jan. 12, 1414, resolved to put them down at once. Closing the city gates to prevent the presence of the Londoners, he went to the ground, made many prisoners in the darkness, and crushed the rising. The majority of the conspirators were afterwards executed on the charge of heresy. Oldcastle himself escaped, and was declared an outlaw. He is said to have tried to raise a rebellion in 1415, and his machinations certainly embarrassed Henry V. in his French campaigns. At last, in 1417, Oldcastle was captured on the Welsh marches, was brought to London, tried for treason before Parliament, and condemned to death as a traitor. The history of Oldcastle is somewhat obscure, and his character is the source of much controversy. He seems to have been a man of good intentions, but extravagant in much discretion. His fate is typical of that of the Lollard party. Beginning from high enthusiasm and lofty moral aims, they went astray in the by-paths of political intrigues till the religious significance of the movement is lost in its tendencies towards anarchy. Instead of continuing to struggle for ecclesiastical reform, Lollardy became an expression of the passing phases of political discontent.

The attempt at revolution in which Oldcastle was involved decided Henry V. to take stronger measures against the Lollards. In the Parliament of 1414 an act was passed which went far beyond that of 1401; for it laid down the principle, that heresy was an offence against the common law, as well as an offence against the canon law. Besides re-enacting with greater severity the provisions of the statute of 1401, it ordered all justices to inquire after heretics, and hand them over for trial to the spiritual courts. This was the final statute against the Lollards, and under it the religious persecutions of the next century were carried out. From this time forward, we find the Lollards deprived of any influential leaders. The French war of Henry V. provided occupation for the classes who were willing to use the help of the Lollards in attacking the prelates, and the universities were peaceful. The Lollards could no longer claim to be a party within the English Church: they had become a sect outside it.

The teaching of Wiclif, meanwhile, had taken deeper root in Bohemia than in England; and the sturdy party that gathered round Hus contrasts markedly with the indecision of the English Lollards. From Oxford went Lollards to Bohemia; some bearing a letter which purported to be a defence of Wiclif, signed by the chancellor and an assembly of masters. There can be little doubt that the letter was a forgery. Most famous amongst these Hussite-Lollards was Peter Payne, who also bore many other names. He was the son of a French father, had some reputation in Oxford, and rose to eminence amongst the Bohemians. He was one of the disputants on the Hussite side at the Council of Basel in 1433, and his polemical cleverness often degenerated into sophistry. He died in Prague in 1455.

The statute of 1414 seems to have answered its purpose of checking the open dissemination of Lollard doctrines. The religious prelates no longer preached openly; though conventicles were sometimes held secretly, and Lollard books were circulated. Persecutions were frequent, but executions were rare. Besides the thirty-eight who were put to death after Oldcastle's rising in 1414, we only know the names of twenty-eight others who suffered death. The mere act of the authorities in making a recantation, and submitted to penance. In 1427 Pope Martin V. ordered the Bishop of LOLLARDS.

Lincoln to carry out the decree of the Council of Constance against Wiclif's remains as those of a condemned heretic. They were accordingly dug out of the churchyard at Lutterworth, and thrown into the Avon. In 1431 an attempted rebellion of the political Lollards was made under a leader called Jack Sharp, who revived the petition of 1410 for the confiscation of the temporalities of the Church. Sharp was captured, and put to death at Oxford. This was the last attempt to enforce the Lollard principles in politics, and the disturbed state of England in the dynastic struggle between the rival houses of York and Lancaster diverted political discontent to other objects. After 1431 we hear less of the Lollards, and the prosecutions against them became rarer.

It is not very easy to determine with precision what were the religious tenets of the Lollards. The results of their examinations before the bishops show us a number of men discontented with the existing ecclesiastical system, but the points to which each attached importance tend to differ in individual cases. We find, however, in all of them, a reverence for the Bible as superior to the traditions of the Church and all other authorities. They object to many points in the ritual or practice of the Church as unnecessary or misleading; they deny transubstantiation, protest against the worship of saints, pilgrimages, and other usages; they object to the temporal lordship of the clergy, to the monastic orders, and to the supreme authority of the Pope. Some of them wish to approximate as closely as possible to the church doctrine, laying aside only superstitions: others dream of a plan of reconstituting Church and State alike on a scriptural basis.

The chief polemical writer against the Lollards was Thomas Netter of Walden, a learned divine of the University of Oxford, who was confessor of Henry V., and died in 1430. His chief work (Doctrinae antiquitatum fidei ecclesiae Catholicae) is a storehouse of polemical learning, which was largely used in the next century by Romish writers against the Lutherans. Another controversialist against the Lollards was somewhat unfortunate in his zeal. Reginald Pecock, Bishop of Chichester, distinguished himself in 1447 by a sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross, in which he maintained that the duty of bishops was to rule their sees, to acquaint themselves with the public business: they were not bound to preach, or themselves discharge spiritual functions. This defence of episcopacy was somewhat too sophistical for the ordinary understanding, and Pecock had to soften it by explanations. But a few years later he published a work against the Lollards, called The Repressor of overmuch Blaming of the Clergy. In it he attacked the Lollards for their exclusive attention to the Scriptures, but he did so in a way that created alarm by its rationalistic spirit. He set up "the doom of reason" as supreme; he criticised the Fathers, besides quoting them; he doubted the apostolic origin of the Apostles' Creed, and questioned the article of Christ's descent into hell. Many accused him as setting the law of nature above the law of Scripture, and probably political motives contributed to his overthrow. In 1457 Pecock was degraded from his office, his books were burned, and he retired to a monastery, where he ended his days. He is an example that repressive measures tend to spread on all sides. The reaction against the Lollards created a new standard of orthodoxy, and Pecock is the first man in English history who was persecuted by the clergy for free thought.

The activity of the Lollards during the succeeding period can only be slightly traced in isolated cases of protest. This was the last period of Conventicles of "Bible men" were still held in secret, the Wiclifite translation of the Scriptures was still read by some, and Wiclif's works were circulated. There were still persecutions, and from time to time a victim displayed by his death a testimony of England's orthodoxy. The spirit of Lollardy survived, to some extent, amongst the people; and the spark was readily kindled by the flame of Luther's rising against the Pope. Yet the absence of any definite system amongst the Lollards is clearly seen by the fact that the reformed doctrines took their shape, even in England, from Luther and Calvin, and that there was no recurrence to Wiclif or his followers for a basis of belief. Even the translation of the Scriptures was begun anew; and the version of Tyndale (1536), not that of Wiclif, was the foundation of the English Bible.

Lombards

account from the ecclesiastical side is to be found in Lechler: Johann von Wicif und die Vorgeschichte der Reformation, 2 Bde., Leipzig, 1873. The first volume has been translated, with additional notes by Lorimer: John Wicif and his English Precursors, London, 1878, 2 vols., new edition, 1882, 1 vol. The fullest account from the political side is given by Scrubs: The Constitutional History of England, vols. 2 and 3, Oxford, 1875—80.

(Lombards (Longobardi, or Langobardi, "the long-bearded"), the Teutonic tribe, seem to have come from the northern part of Jutland, and were settled on the left shore of the Lower Elb, when, in 5 A.D., they were attacked by the Romans. They were reputed brave, but the tribe was small. Towards the close of the fourth century they moved through Upper Silesia, Bohemia, and Moravia; and towards the close of the fifth century they were settled on the left bank of the Danube, from the mouth of the Em to Vienna. In 526 they crossed the Danube, and penetrated into Pannonia; and in 568 they entered Italy. The conquest of the country took many years, and was carried out in a most cruel and merciless manner. It was never completed, however. The regions around Rome and Naples, Sicily and the southern part of the peninsula, the Venetian islands, and the coast from the mouth of the Po to Ancona, remained in the possession of the Byzantines. The advance was repeatedly checked by the intrigues of the Pope, whose policy during that period it was to keep Italy weak and divided in order to increase his own power. The Lombard Empire was finally destroyed by Charlemagne in 774, and all its dominions incorporated with the Frankish Empire.

When the Lombards entered Italy, they were, to some extent, Pagans. The Christians among them were Arians. It seems, however, that the Catholic Church did not suffer any thing from them; and very soon her successful exertions for their conversion began. Theodolinda, a Bavarian princess,—married first to King Authalis, and then to King Agilulf,—belonged to the Catholic Church, and maintained an intimate friendship with Gregory the Great. She built the magnificent basilica at Monza, and dedicated it to St. John the Baptist, who afterwards became the patron saint of the Lombards. In 612, still in the reign of Agilulf, the monastery of Bobbio was founded in the Cottian Alps by Columbanus, and munificently endowed by the king and his son Adolwald. Under Gundeberge, the daughter of Theodolinda, and, like her, married successively to two Lombard kings,—Ariowald, who died in 636; and Rothari, who died in 652,—all traces of Paganism and Arianism disappeared from among the people; and the Lombards now showed themselves exponents of that religious faith which was nominally their, but which was more particularly among their, warlike enthusiasm. In the eighth century numerous churches and monasteries were built, and all ecclesiastical institutions were magnificently provided for.

Meanwhile the political relations between the Lombard kings and the Romans became more and more strained. Gregory III. (731—741) addressed himself to Charles Martell, major domus at the Merovingian Court, and asked for aid against Liutprand; but at that moment the relations between the Franks and the Lombards were very friendly. Stephen III. (753—757) went in person to Gaul, anointed Pepin, and deposed Charles and Carloman, kings of the Franks; and in 754 and 755 Pepin made two campaigns in Italy, and compelled Aistulf to surrender his conquests. Under Desiderius an alliance was formed between the Franks and the Lombards, which seemed likely to prove fatal to the plans of the Pope. But when Charlemagne repudiated the daughter of Desiderius, and the latter gave support to Carloman's widow and children, the alliance turned into a bitter feud; and in 773 Adrian I. found a willing ear when he asked Charlemagne for aid. See Monumenta Germaniae hist. scriptores rerum Langobardicarum et Ital. sac. 6—9, Hanover, 1878.

Lombardus, Petrus, called Magister Sententiarum ("Master of Sentences"), from being the author of the Books of Sentences, was b. in the early part of the twelfth century, in Novara, Lombardy; d. in Paris, July 20, 1160. He was of obscure birth. After studying at Bologna, he went to Rheims, where he continued his studies, his maintenance being provided for by Bernard of Clairvaux. From there he went to Paris, with letters from Bernard to the convent of St. Victor. He became a distinguished teacher, and most probably a canon of St. Victor. In 1150 he was elevated to the see of Paris, which he lived to administer only a single year. Of the facts of his life nothing further is known. An incident is told to illustrate his humility, to the effect, that, on the day of his consecration as bishop, his mother was induced by some noblemen to appear, against her wishes, in finer attire than she was accustomed to wear at Novara; but her son refused to recognize her till she had exchanged it for her usual rustic dress.

Peter's fame rests upon his literary works, and more particularly upon his Four Books of Sentences (Libri quattuor sententiarum). In this work he places himself in sympathy with the ruling tendencies of the time,—the ecclesiastical and positive, and the speculative. The former was concerned with the teachings of the Church and the Fathers: the latter—represented by Anselm, Abelard, and others—sought to justify the doctrines of the Church by subtle processes of reasoning, and refinement of argument. Peter wished to represent both tendencies,—to make known the teachings of the Fathers, and to establish their truth against error. He presents a contrast to Abelard, who, in his work Sic et non, placed side by side contradictory statements of the Fathers, not with the purpose of reconciling them, as did Peter, nor of confirming the authority of the Fathers, which was one of the principal objects of Peter's work. Peter's main authority is Augustine. He differs from Abelard, likewise, in seeking to arrange his matter systematically. His was not the first collection of sentences. Hugo of St. Victor (d. 1135), Robert Pulleyn (d. 1150), and others had preceded him in this department, Nor can his work be regarded as the most valuable of its kind.

The first book of the Sentences treats (in forty-eight distinctiones, or chapters) of God. The author's definition of the Trinity exposed him to of 1215; and Lombard was acquitted, it being an act of heresy. Joachim of Fiore (d. 1202) declares he had taught a quaternity. The matter was brought before the Lateran Council of 1215; and Lombard was acquitted, it being shown that he had simply distinguished between the divine essence and the three persons, but had in no wise constituted a fourth person in the God-head. The second book discusses (in forty-four chapters) created things. Of man's origin as state of sin by the love to God which the manifestation of God's love in the death of Christ excites.

In the fourth book (fifty chapters) he takes up eschatological subjects and the sacraments, declaring for seven as the proper number.

The Books of Sentences of Petrus Lombardus belongs to that class of useful writings whose continued circulation depends not so much upon their absolute merit as upon their adaptation to give information in an accessible form, which the reader otherwise would be obliged to search for with much pains. It contains no profound original thoughts, and many difficult problems are suggested which the author does not solve.

A comparison, however, of the Sentences with the works of his successors, as well as predecessors, reveals the fact that Peter is more moderate in his scholastic casuistry than they. The work did not at first meet with a universally favorable reception. Paris were attacked as heretical; and in 1300 the professors of theology at Paris announced sixteen articles derived from which contained error. Notwithstanding this opposition, the work was used for many years as a text-book at the universities, and was extensively commended. Comenius, himself a poet, was one of the first who wrote upon it after the Reformation, especially in Spain.

The most celebrated is by Dominic Soto (d. 1560); the most scholarly, by the Dutch theologian Estius (d. 1613), the distinguished commentator of the Pauline Epistles.

Two other works have been published under the Lombard's name, and are regarded as genuine. — a Commentary on the Psalms (first printed at Paris in 1533, and most recently in Migne), and Commentaries upon All the Pauline Epistles, first printed at Paris, 1535, and by Migne, 1854.

Certainly more than by his genius. The man was quite as much in the interest of his college class. Not long after settling at Cambridge, he purchased the-Craigie house, celebrated as the headquarters of Washington; and here he continued to reside until his death, the centre of a domestic and social circle known far and wide for its virtues, refinement, and literary attractions. In 1854 he resigned his professorship, and in 1858-90 travelled again in Europe, everywhere meeting with friends and admirers.

The University of Oxford conferred upon him at this time the degree of D.C.L.

Longfellow's poetical works have had a very widespread circulation in Great Britain, as well as in America; numerous translations have also been made into other languages. He endeared himself to the public not less by his character than by his genius. The man was quite as much honored and beloved as the poet. Nor is this strange. He touches the chords of human feeling and sympathy with such skill, because he touches them with the hand of a brother. Having himself taken deep lessons in the school of life, — lessons of great sorrow and suffering, as well as of joy, — he knows how to help and cheer others who are learning the same lessons.

"Such songs have power to quiet
The restless pulse of care,
And come like the benediction
Which follows after prayer."

G. L. PRENTIS.
LORD. 1343

LORD'S PRAYER.

ruler of slaves (Gen. xxiv. 14), or a king (Gen. xiv. 8). It is often used with the possessive pronoun, "my lord." (9) "ADONAI" (plural of "Adon"), not usually applied to God in the historical books, for it is used therein only fourteen times alone (e.g., Gen. xviii. 3), and thirteen times in connection with "Jehovah" (e.g., Gen. xv. 4, etc.), nor used at all in Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles. (4) "KURIOS" ("Master"), used only in the Book of Daniel, addressed to a king, but also to God (ii. 47, v. 23). (5) "KURIOS" ("Lord"), is the Septuagint and New Testament translation of Jehovah, also applied to Christ. (6) "DEMETRIUS" ("Despotés"), a master (Luke ii. 29). In regard to these it should be remarked that they differ too widely to admit of one translation in common. Especially should Jehovah be uniformly used of the Supreme Being wherever such term occurs in the original. Mr. Wright (art. Lord, in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible) thus speaks of the typographical arrangement in the English Bible: "The difference between 'Jehovah' and 'Adonai,' and in general in printing the Authorized Version by printing the word in small capitals (LORD) when it represents the former (Gen. xv. 4, etc.), and with an initial capital only when it is the translation of the latter (Ps. cxvii. 5, etc.), except in Exod. xxiii. 17, xxxiv. 23, where the Lord God should be more consistently the Lord Jehovah, as a clear distinction prevails between מַיָּה (the letters of 'Jehovah,' with the vowel-points of 'Elóhim') and דַם (Elóhím); the former being represented in the Authorized Version by 'God' in small capitals (Gen. xv. 2, etc.), while Elóhím is 'God' with an initial capital only. And generally, when the name of the deity is printed in capitals, it indicates that the corresponding Hebrew is שְׂעֵר, which is translated 'Lord,' or 'God,' according to the vowel-points by which it is accompanied."

LORD, Nathan, D.D., LL.D., b. at Berwick, Me., Nov. 26, 1793; d. at Hanover, N.H., Sept. 3, 1870. He was graduated at Bowdoin College, 1809, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1811. He entered the Congregational ministry; and after twelve years of pastoral labor at Amherst, N.H., was president of Dartmouth College from Oct. 25, 1828, to July, 1838. His presidency was able, dignified, and successful. His publications were mostly articles in periodicals. Two published Letters to Ministers of the Gospel of all Denominations, on Slavery (1854-55) deserve mention for their defence of slavery on biblical grounds. They occasioned much debate.

LORD'S DAY, the oldest and best designation of the Christian Sabbath; first used by St. John, Rev. 1. 10 (ἐν ἀκραίᾳ ξύλῳ). See Sabbath, Sun.

LORD'S PRAYER. The. Our Lord, at the request of his disciples, imitated the Baptist, and taught them a prayer, which was to be the pattern of all prayer in his name. This prayer should not be allowed to degenerate into a mere formula, nor be frequently repeated in service, — a practice contradictory to the substance and object of the prayer. The Lord's Prayer is twice given in the New Testament (Matt. vi. 9-13; Luke xi. 2-4), in slightly differing words.

It has frequently been discussed whether Matthew or Luke has the correct form, or whether Jesus did not really teach it twice. The last supposition is improbable. It is, however, likely that Matthew inserted the prayer in his report of the Sermon on the Mount. Equally probable are the discussions relative to the sources of the prayer. John Lightfoot and others maintain that it was extracted, petition for petition, from rabbinical prayers. But the proof adduced reduces itself to this, that, in those latter prayers, God is sometimes called "Father," and sometimes "Jehovah," in the Old Testament: cf. Deut. xxxii. 3, Job xxxvi. 36, marg.; Isa. xliii. 16; Jer. iii. 4, 39; Mal. i. 6. The restoration of the kingdom of Israel is pleaded for; and the petition occurs, "Hallowed be thy name through our works."

The remaining petitions have been found in a prayer-book in use among Portuguese Jews of the middle ages, and in another composed by a rabbi, Klitz, about 1500 A.D. Surely our Lord did not borrow from these. The best refutation of the idea of compilation is the Lord's Prayer itself, so symmetrical in arrangement, so progressive in its thought, and so inexhaustible in its depth.

"Our Father who art in heaven," so the prayer begins. For the first time is God called the Father of particular persons. In the Old-Testament parables he is the Father of the people of Israel; and Eliah alone (Job xxxvi. 36, marg.) calls him "Father" in the personal sense. In the New Testament, God appears as our Father in Christ; for, since he is the Father of Christ, he is the Father of those who are in Christ (John i. 12). "Our Father" is thus the express opposite to the heathen idea of "the father of gods and men," an epithet frequently applied; e.g., by Homer to Zeus. "Heaven" is the residence of God, that part of his creation wherein neither sin nor death is found, wherein his will is perfectly fulfilled: in short, where live the unfallen angels and the perfectly holy, in sight of the uncovered glory of God. The clause "in heaven" reminds us of the holiness of God to whom we pray; the epithet "Father," of his condescending grace.

The first petition is, "Hallowed be thy name." This properly comes first, because to give God the glory which is his due is the first and supreme desire of the Christian. God does not exist for us, but for himself: we are the creatures of his bounty. His "name" is Jehovah, — the sacred name by which he revealed himself. This name expresses his Godhead. To "hallow" it means to declare that he is God from all eternity, that he is holy, and demands holiness in his creatures, and that we are what we are in consequence of his grace. The Christian prays, not only for power himself to glorify God, but that the glory of God may be acknowledged by the whole world.

The second petition is, "Thy kingdom come." The "kingdom" is that which the Lord will set up on his return. The petition is, therefore, not for personal fitness to enter the kingdom, but for the completion of the work of redemption. Implied is, of course, the request that the blessings of this world may not hinder the progress of Messiah's kingdom. It is true they cannot, yet God means that we should pray that they may not.

The third petition is, "Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth." It brings us face to face with the contrast between the perfect obedience of heaven and the repeated rebellion of earth.
That the latter may cease, the Christian desires. In this petition he repents sincerely, first his own disobedience, and then that of the whole earth, and implores God to give strength to him, and grace to his fellows, to do the will of God.

These first three petitions contain a reference to the tritheine nature of God. God, whose name is to be hallowed, is the Father of Jesus Christ, the Lord and Creator of all things. His future kingdom is also the kingdom of the Father, but set up through the instrumentality of the Son. And, that God's will may be done, the Father and Son work together through the Holy Ghost.

Parallel with the first three are the last three petitions. The present is a time of waiting for the children of God, through which they must needs be maintained. The latter petitions recognize this. The fourth is, "Give us this day our daily bread." For, first of all in this present state, we need bodily sustenance. The word ἐποτάζων ("daily") occurs only in this prayer. Three derivations have been proposed, — that from ἐπότις (sc. ἐπισκόπη), or from ἐποτίαν, ἐποτίών, "bread for the coming time or day," which would not necessarily imply impatience, as the request might be made without the forbidden "anxious thought;" yet the words "this day" seem to indicate that the petition refers to the present, and therefore it is better to derive it from ἐπότις, i.e., the "necessary" bread, and give the phrase the meaning, the bread that is necessary for us to live upon. There is here no reference to spiritual sustenance, such as the word of God, or the Lord's Supper, as, e.g., the Fathers maintained. [Compare the elaborate Appendix by Bishop Lightfoot, "On the words ἐποτάζων, ἐποτίων," attached to his treatise, On a Fresh Revision of the English New Testament, London, 1871, reprint by Dr. Schaff, New York, 1873. In the Revised New Testament "our daily bread" is kept in the text; but the English Committee put in the margin "Gr. our bread for the coming day," while the American Committee present, as an alternative reading, "our needful bread."]

The fifth petition is, "And forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors," — another recognition of our condition. As the fourth appealed to God as the Creator, this appeals to him as the Saviour in Jesus Christ. The second referred to the future completion of the kingdom; this to the riches of grace in the kingdom as at present constituted, viz., to the present deliverance from guilt, the forgiveness of sins. What separates us from the kingdom of Christ is our sins; this wall of partition must be daily removed by renewed supplication for the forgiveness once for all effected by Christ. The "as" in the petition is not "because: "our forgiveness of others does not merit God's forgiveness of us; rather it points to the conduct we must show, if we really would enjoy God's grace.

The sixth petition is, "And bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one." Augustine and the Lutheran divines divide this petition into two: Chrysostom and the Reformed divines consider it a unit. The first clause does indeed express positively what the second does negatively; so one is at liberty to consider them separately, but they are closely connected. Οὐ πωτόρος is in Scripture the Evil One, Satan. The adjective πωτόρος never means simple sinfulness as such, much less "evil" generally, but always that wickedness which is Antichrist, working directly against the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. The adjective is therefore always connected with some substantive, or else, if absolute, is the masculine, and specifies a person, namely, Satan (cf. Matt. v. 37). The word "temptation" means both trial, and also actual temptation to sin. But God tempts no one to sin. Yet he does place his children in circumstances of trial; but these trials are wholesome, and no Christian seeks deliverance from them. The temptation in them arises from our sinful hearts. The petition therefore means, from such temptations above that we "are able" may God deliver us. He surely will (1 Cor. x. 13); but he wants to be asked to do so. The petition is a recognition that we contend, not against flesh and blood, but against the Evil One, and therefore stand in dire need of the divine help. We pray to be delivered from all temptations to leave our Saviour, or to decline in our faith and love (in this way the sixth is parallel to the third petition), and also that these trials be finally delivered, and the victory of Christ be made complete.

The doxology is decidedly spurious; yet it is beautiful and fitting; it would even better correspond to the double triadic arrangement of the prayer, if the "power" were made to precede the "kingdom."

Liturgical use of the prayer can be traced as early as the end of the third century, in Tertullian and Cyprian; and then the doxology was in use, giving it a better liturgical close.

LORD'S SUPPER. I. Roman and Greek Catholic View.—See TRANUBSTANTIAIION.

II. The Lutheran View.—The four times repeated accounts of the institution of the Lord's Supper (Matt. xxvi. 26-28; Mark xiv. 22-24; Luke xxi. 19, 20; 1 Cor. xi. 23-25) is the basis of the doctrine; and the Lutheran Church insists that the words shall be taken in their simple, primitive meaning, and not figuratively. Nor must the passage on the bread from heaven (John vi. 35 sq.) be considered explanatory by anticipation; for, although our Lord may well have had in mind the supper he knew he should institute (comp. vi. 53-56), he did not speak of it, and could not have spoken of it, if, as is evident, he desired to present something which faith, if not reason, could grasp.

The four accounts reduce themselves substantially to two; for Matthew's and Mark's stand together opposite to Luke's and Paul's, yet their differences do not affect the doctrine. We take by preference Paul's account, because he received it from Christ (1 Cor. xi. 20): "The Lord Jesus in the night in which he was betrayed said: And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, This is my body, which is for you [i.e., is given to death for you]: this do in remembrance of me. In like manner also [he took] the cup, after supper, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood: This do as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." The first question concerns the words, "in my blood." Do they refer to the "cup," or the "covenant"? Should we read, The new covenant in (by means of) my blood? or, This cup is in my blood the new covenant? Plainly the latter. The cup is the means of the new covenant, and the bread the symbol of Christ's body, as on the evening of the last Supper Christ poured out for us. It is further to be borne in mind, that the cup was given after the Passover meal (so Luke and Paul); so that it was not a part of the Jewish ceremony, but a new institution. It is an open question whether the giving of the bread and that of the wine were separated by an interval: at all events, the two actions are parts of one ordinance. The words, "This do in remembrance of me," do not express the object of the sacrament, but the meaning: it is a memorial of the death of Jesus, as Paul himself says: "For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come." The accounts of Matthew and Mark add little. Peculiar to Matthew is the connection between the shedding of the blood and the forgiveness of sins (xxvi. 28). Matthew and Mark relate that all present drank of the cup; the first, that it was done at the request of Jesus. All four unite in stating, that, through the blood of Christ, a new covenant has been made. This blood was not, however, shed for all, but "for many" (περὶ πολλῶν); although the expression implies that the number thereby blessed is very large.

The decisive question, after all, is, Are the words, "This is my body," "This is my blood," literal, or symbolical? Was there an actual presentation of the body and blood of Christ? or was there only one in simile? The decision rests upon the parallel position of subject and predicate. No emphasis should be put upon "is," for Luke omits it in respect to the cup, without thereby altering the sense; nor is it necessary to state passively the subject in which such a parallelism exists, and where predicate or subject is figurative (e.g., Matt. xiii. 38, 39; John xv. 1, 5); because for the Lord to introduce illustrations and similes into his instruction or discourse is one thing, and quite another to use them in a solemn hour when he established a new ordinance through the presentation of gifts which he named. In the latter case there was no instruction, or explanation of a subject, through an illustration, but a description of what the disciples took from his hand, and should eat and drink. To suppose that our Lord at such a time spoke in metaphor is contrary to the solemnity of the occasion, the meaning of the institution, and the short, precise phrases employed. Problematical and mysterious the words were, doubtless; but the disciples were used to this, and their faith would not be shaken thereby, but rather deepened and strengthened through the expectation of a fresh experience of his might. Nay, our Lord called what he gave them his body and his blood; and no circumstance leads us to suppose they were anything else. The question now arises, whether, upon the utterance of these words, the bread and the wine were changed into the body and blood of Christ. The answer is found in 1 Cor. x. 16: "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ?" Paul expressly says these three things: (1) The bread and wine are not changed into other substances, but they are a veritable communion of the body and blood of Christ; (2) This communion is given with the bread and wine, and is inseparable from it; (3) The means of enjoying this communion is the partaking of the elements. But what does the Lord mean when he says, These are my body and my blood? Does he mean that the act of eating the bread and drinking the wine is the means by which the enjoyment of the communion is obtained? Not so, but he means that the elements themselves are the true communion, and they are to be taken in order to receive the communion. In this respect, the Lord's Supper is transferable into any form that may be agreed upon. The distinction between the elements and the communion is clear. The Lord's Supper is transferable into any form that may be agreed upon. The distinction between the elements and the communion is clear.
of the sacrament, it means that no one can enjoy in this sacrament the bread and wine unless he does at the same time actually receive them by his mouth. But the meaning is not that the body and blood of Christ are corporeally present (impanation) in the bread and wine, nor in such a manner connected with them that they are part of the earthy food; but that they are present, and entered the system. On the contrary, the Lutheran Church asserts the spiritual partaking of the heavenly elements, but not as if this spiritual partaking were something different and distinct from the oral partaking, rather as proceeding at the same time, the two being supernaturally and spiritually connected. Nothing depends upon the spiritual condition of the recipient. He may receive the body and blood unworthily; and then he eats them to his own judgment (1 Cor. xi. 29), for he becomes "guilty of the body and blood of the Lord" (xi. 27), not discerning the Lord's body; i.e., not considering that it is with the elements, he is at the same time receiving the body of the Lord. But this effect would not happen if the unworthy recipient partook only of bread and wine. The unworthies are all those who do not believe, who go to this sacrament without any repentance of their past sins, and sincere desire to improve their lives (Form. Conc., Epit., § 18; Sol. decl., vii. §§ 69—71).

In regard to the blessing attached to the right use of the sacrament, the Confession says, in brief, "These words, 'Given and shed for you for the forgiveness of sins,' show, that in the sacrament, forgiveness of sins, life, and salvation are given; for, were forgiveness of sin is, there is also life and salvation."

What has been previously said may be embraced in the following propositions. (1) The words of institution are to be understood in their ordinary acceptation. Since our Lord said, "Take, eat, this is my body, this is my blood," his body and blood are really and truly present, and are distributed and received. (2) This reception is by the mouth, agreeably to the words of institution, because the Lord has determined no other way, but at the same time spiritually, because the body and blood of Christ are not assimilated by the body, as earthly food would be. (3) Because the reception of the body and blood of Christ in the Lord's Supper is joined to the earthly signs, so both are received by all those who participate in the sacrament, held agreeably to the words of institution, irrespective of their worthiness or unworthiness, but to the blessing of the worthy, and to the judgment of the unworthy.

It remains now to answer certain questions. First, Is not the Roman Church right in giving the laity the bread only, inasmuch as the bread (i.e., the body) is the blush of the Lord's Supper? In regard to this it is sufficient to remark, that such action is plainly in flat contradiction to the words of institution, "Drink ye all of it," and also to the action of our Lord in giving the cup. But next it may be asked, What kind of body and blood is that which is partake of in the Lord's Supper? The glorified. To this it may be objected, that the primary reference must have been to the mortal body. True; and it is the same body, but it is differently conditioned. It is not now mortal, but immortal, glorified. But, if that is the case, one may further object: Then those who received the bread and wine directly from the Lord's hands did not receive the sacrament as we do, for Christ was not yet glorified. The objection is aimed at the power of Christ. The Lord, who had power to lay down his life, and power to take it again (John x. 18), in no respect loses his human nature. When he said, "Take, eat, this is my body," he had perfect ability to give his body to the disciples. Wonderful, surely, mysterious, supernatural, but not impossible, is this proceeding. The power thus to be present wherever the Lord's Supper is administered, comes from the union in him of the human nature with the divine or divine-human person (communicatio idiomatum).

III. The Reformed View. — This, like the Catholic and the Lutheran, underwent certain changes ere it reached its present form, and is even now differently expressed, as the opposition to the Lutheran view is more or less strongly put. The battle was, at the outbreak of the Reformation, over the question whether the words of institution were to be taken literally or figuratively. Zwingli laid the stress upon "is," in the sense of "means;" (Ecolampadius, upon "body and blood," which he declared means "represents body and blood," —a more correct point to emphasize, since the copulative fails in Aramaic, the speech our Lord employed. This, however, Zwingli knew. Lutheran theologians are now not so much inclined to oppose the tropical interpretation, bearing in mind that it was accepted by such men as Augustine and Athanasius, and, moreover, that figurative expressions occur too frequently in the Bible to make it impossible for our Lord to have used such in the institution of the Last Supper. But the advocates of the literal interpretation insist that he would not speak figuratively at so solemn and momentous a time. In reply, it should be said, it is not for us to say so. We know he did speak so on other occasions, and from misunderstanding him, standing him on a literal and material food, which he declared means "represents body and blood," —a more correct point to emphasize, since the copulative fails in Aramaic, the speech our Lord employed. (John x. 18). We dare not prescribe how Christ must speak. But the opponents say, it cannot be supposed he would give his disciples a mere figure, since the words he used imply that he gave them something real. This argument is, of course, not to be so understood as begging the question: what he did give them being the very thing to be determined; for, if he really did give them his veritable body, then it would be an emptying of the sacrament to understand the word "body" figuratively. Lutheran theologians do not so insist upon the strictly literal meaning of the words of institution, that there is contained, subject and predicate is established. Luther saw that such an interpretation led directly to the Roman view: therefore, for a time, he also inclined to the figurative interpretation. The Lutherans avoid the dilemma, Rome, or the Reformed Church, by saying, In, with, and under the bread, the body of Christ is given. But this expression shows that the Lutherans are not yet completely emancipated from Romanism. At the same time, it is freely granted that the Zwinglian theologians, valid. One can, for example, commit an offence against a country while not in the country, as by insulting the flag of that country. Again: the Lutherans call attention to the clause, “not discerning the body,” as if it implied the actual presence of the body. But it does not at all necessarily do this. Another proof passage with the Lutherans is 1 Cor. x. 18-22. Here Paul parallels the communion of the body and blood of Christ with that between the participants in the Jewish sacrifices, and with that between idolatrous sacrificers. But the communion in all three cases is, after all, not based upon the material contact, but upon the common frame of mind. So there is communion in the body and blood of Christ, because there is common belief in Christ as the Saviour from sin and guilt through death, of which the pledge has been given us in the Last Supper.

We are now in condition to take a comprehensive view of the Lord's Supper. The feet-washing which preceded its institution was a fitting prelude. It revealed the ministering love of the Lord; the supper, his yielding, sacrificing love. Love is the secret of the supper. The Lord is about to give up his life into the hands of sinners, but in truth he gives himself up into the hands of his own; for them he dies in order that they may live. Love is the motive in the sacrifice. Of this the supper is the pledge and the confirmation. It is in itself a condescension of the divine love to our human nature, spirit and body. To this fact the Fathers, the Schoolmen, and the Reformers alike call attention. On former occasions the Lord had likened participation in the kingdom of God to a meal to which they were invited: here is a meal, and one, too, in which the host offers himself as food and drink.

Thus the Lord's Supper stands upon the same plane with baptism. Both are symbolical. The latter symbolizes the grace needful to reception into the covenant of grace; the former, that for maintenance and progress in the covenant. The supper offers us nothing else than what is already offered us in the Word,—confirmation in communion with Christ, with its fruit, strengthening of faith, forgiveness of sin, and power of sanctification. But in the supper these are tenderly pressed upon us. By the eating and drinking we are admonished that he gave his body for us, for us shed his blood. Without the supper, we can surely have our strength increased, and obtain forgiveness of sin; but in the supper we receive the most solemn assurances that these mercies are ours. And the supper gives us also direct encouragement to continue in grace, and the strength so to do; so that Zwingli expressed the exact truth when he said that the supper was given to us in order that we might have heart to overcome the world, through faith in Him who overcame the world for us. The supper is, therefore, no empty, meaningless sign; although it does not in itself confer grace.

But it is one thing to say that Christ is present in the supper, and another to say that he is present in the bread. There is in it a true and real presence of Christ; but it is a sacramental presence, not local and corporeal, but it is this presence which makes the celebration of the Lord's Supper the crown of Christian worship. In it God meets men, and comes laden with richest gifts. See what a part faith plays in the supper. "Christ is with the mouth of faith received." Without faith the sign is empty, meaningless: there is no spiritual presence, only the presence of a symbol. In the faithful the supper has a blessed effect. But no miracle is necessary, simply a working of grace according to the measure out, however, giving up the Reformed idea. He that gives to his own body and blood, i.e., himself, in order that he may live in them through faith, and they in him. Calvin advances beyond Zwingli, and approaches the Lutheran view, without, however, giving up the Reformed idea. He teaches that the flesh of Christ has a perpetual life-giving power; and in the Lord's Supper the believers, through the Holy Spirit, share in this power through their participation in the substance of the glorified body of Christ. This idea was expressed in the Genevan Catechism, and in the French, Belgian, and First Scotch Confessions. Here we see a tinge of the Roman-Catholic doctrine: yet the underlying idea is correct; we must hold fast upon the human in Christ, if we would come to the divine. In the flesh of Christ lies the power of life, — in the Word made flesh, as it is embodied and lives in the word of the everlasting gospel. And in the Lord's Supper we are, besides, pointed to the death of Christ and its saving power; and thus by it, as Paul says, we show forth the Lord's death until he come. This is the doctrine of the Heidelberg Catechism, and the Second Helvetic Confession, and wherever else it is taught, that, in the Supper, the body of Christ is through faith spiritually received.

To conclude: the participation in the supper in faith strengthens our unity of life with Christ and with our fellow-believers, since this union is founded upon Christ. The Lutheran and Reformed Confessions, in spite of their differences, have much and essential matter in common, not only in the rejection of Roman-Catholic errors, but in the conception of the supper as a true means of grace, assuring our salvation, strengthening our faith, and increasing our union with Christ.

[The High Anglican View is, that "the bread and wine become by consecration really and sacramentally (though in an inconceivable manner, which cannot be explained by earthly similitudes or illustrations) the body and blood of our Lord." This doctrine of the virtual presence, in contrast to that of the figurative presence, according to which the bread and wine are "only memorials of Christ's body and blood," and to that of the virtual presence, "as if our Lord only bestowed in the Eucharist the graces and blessings derived from his suffering and sacrifice." In proof are quoted our Lord's address at Capernaum (John vi.), his intercessory prayer (John xvii.), the words of institution in the Synoptists and Paul, the Fathers, and the ancient liturgies. The Eucharist is a sacrifice; for when our Lord said, "Do this in remembrance of me," he meant, "offer it; remember it." Hence the Eucharist is called the "unbloody sacrifice" by the Fathers and the ancient liturgies. See J. H. BLUNT: Dict. of Doctr. and Hist. Theology, arts. "Eucharist," "Real Presence." The original view of the Church of England, as expressed in the Thirty-Nine Articles, Art. XXVIII., is the Reformed or Calvinistic view. See below.

IV. THE CONFESSIONAL STATEMENTS RESPECTING THE LORD'S SUPPER.

The Roman-Catholic doctrine is officially given in the Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent, Sess. XIII., Oct. 11, 1561. See Creeds, ii. 129—139. The principal points are: —

1. "In the Eucharist are contained truly, really and substantially, the body and blood, soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and consequently the whole Christ." — Can. 1.

2. "The whole substance of the bread [is converted] into the body," and, "the whole substance of the wine into the blood." — Can. 2.

3. "The whole Christ is contained under each species, and under every part of each species, when separated." — Can. 3.

4. "The principal fruit of the most holy Eucharist is the remission of sins." — Can. 8.

5. "In the Eucharist, Christ is to be adored." — Can. 6.

6. "All and each of Christ's faithful are bound to communicate every year." — Can. 9.

7. "Sacramental confession is to be made beforehand, by those whose conscience is burdened with mortal sin." — Can. 11.

The same view is taught, though less distinctly, in the Greek Church in the Orthodox Confession of the Eastern Church, Ques. CVII., CVII. (ii. 380—385); in the Confession of Doctrinae (ii. 427—432); in the Longer Catechism of the Eastern Church, qu. 315: —

8. "What is the Communion? A sacrament, in which the believer, under the forms of bread and wine, partakes of the very Body and Blood of Christ, to everlasting life" (ii. 428).

9. The authoritative teaching of the Lutheran Church is thus given, Augsburg Confession (A.D. 1530), Art. X.: —

10. "The true body and blood of Christ are truly present under the form of bread and wine, and are there communicated to and received by those that eat in the Lord's Supper" (iii. 13).

Afterwards Melanchthon changed this article in the edition of 1540, substituting for distributantur ("communicated") exibeatur ("shown"). This departure occasioned much controversy. The Lutheran doctrine is thus given in the Formula of Concord (A.D. 1570), Art. VII., Affirmation: —

11. "We believe, teach, and confess that in the Lord's Supper the body and blood of Christ are truly and substantially present, and that they are truly distributed and taken together with the bread and wine" (iii. 137).

The authoritative teaching of the Reformed

1 The references in parentheses are to Schaff's Creeds.
LORD’S SUPPER.

CHURCHES is thus given: First Helvetic Confession (A.D. 1536), XXIII.:—

“The bread and wine (of the Supper) are holy, true symbols, through which the Lord offers and presents to us, his true body and blood of Christ for the feeding and nourishing of the spiritual and eternal life” (iii. 238).

So also in the Second Helvetic Confession, Cap. XXXVII., Art. XXVI. 1536.

The French Confession of Faith (A.D. 1559), XXXVI., XXXVII.:—

“The Lord’s Supper is a witness of the union which we have with Christ, inasmuch as he not only died and rose again for us once, but also feeds and nourishes us truly with his flesh and blood, so that we may be one in him, and that our life may be in common.”

“The bread and wine in the sacrament serve to our spiritual nourishment, in as much as they show, as to our sight, that the body of Christ is our meat, and his blood our drink” (iii. 380, 381).

The Scotch Confession of Faith (A.D. 1560), Art. XXI.:—

“The faithful in the right use of the Lord’s Table do so eat the body and drink the blood of the Lord Jesus that he remains in them and they in him” (iii. 467-474).

The Belgic Confession (A.D. 1561), Art. XXXV.:—

“Christ that he might represent unto us his spiritual and heavenly bread hath instituted an earthly and visible bread as a Sacrament of his body, and wine as a Sacrament of his blood, to testify by them unto us, that, as certainly as we receive and hold this Sacrament in our hands, and eat and drink the same with faith, by which our life is afterwards nourished, we also do as certainly receive by faith (which is the hand and mouth of our soul) the true body and blood of Christ our only Saviour in our souls, for the support of our spiritual life” (iii. 428-431).

The Heidelberg Catechism (A.D. 1568), qu. 76:—

“What is it to eat of the crucified body and drink the shed blood of Christ? It is not only to embrace with a believing heart all the sufferings and death of Christ, and thereby to obtain the forgiveness of sins and life eternal, but moreover, also, to be so united more and more to his sacrificial body by the Holy Ghost, who dwells both in Christ and in us, that although he is in heaven, and we are upon the earth, nevertheless his flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones, live and are governed forever by one Spirit, as members of the same body are by the one soul” (iii. 322, 323).

The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England (A.D. 1562), Art. XXVIII.:—

“The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another; but rather it is a Sacrament of our Redemption by Christ’s death: insomuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith, receive the same, the Bread which we break is a [heavenly and spiritual] partaking of the Body of Christ; and likewise the Cup of Blessing is a partaking of the Blood of Christ” (iii. 500).

So the Irish Articles of Religion (A.D. 1615, iii. 542, 543).

The Westminster Confession of Faith (A.D. 1647), Chap. XXIX.:—

“The Lord’s Supper [is] to be observed for the perpetual remembrance of the sacrifice of himself in his death, the sealing of all benefits thereof with true believers, their spiritual nourishment and growth in him, their further engagement in, and to all duties which they owe unto him; and to be a bond and pledge of their communion with him, and with each other, as members of his mystical body.”

“Worthy believers do inwardly by faith, really and indeed, yet not carnally and corporally, but spiritually receive and feed upon Christ crucified, and all the benefits of his death” (iii. 683-687).

The Westminster Shorter Catechism (A.D. 1647), qu. 96:—

“What is the Lord’s Supper? A sacrament wherein by the giving and receiving bread and wine, according to Christ’s appointment, his death is showed forth, and the worthy receivers are, not after a corporal and carnal manner, but by faith, made partakers of his body and blood with all its benefits, to their spiritual nourishment and growth in grace” (iii. 687).

The Confession of the Society of Friends (A.D. 1689), Thirteenth Proposition:—

“The communion of the body and blood of Christ is inward and spiritual, which is the participation of his flesh and blood, by which the inward man is daily nourished in the hearts of those in whom Christ dwells; of which things the breaking of bread by Christ with his disciples was a figure, which they even used in the Church for a time, who had received the substance, for the cause of the Sacrament; even as ‘abstaining from things strangled, and from blood;’ the washing one another’s feet, and the anointing of the sick with oil; all which are figures and types of the less authority and solemnity than the former; yet seeing they are but the shadow of better things, they choose in such as have obtained the substance” (iii. 797).

Reformed Episcopal Articles of Religion (A.D. 1875), Art. XXVII.:—

“The Supper of the Lord is a memorial of our Redemption by Christ’s death, for thereby we do show forth the Lord’s death till he come. It is also his Supper of the Lord is a memorial of our Redemption by Christ’s death, for thereby we do show forth the Lord’s death till he come. It is also the symbol of the soul’s feeding upon Christ. And it was the large upper room of Jerusalem house. The company consisted of our Lord and eleven of his disciples; for, although Judas Iscariot was present at the Supper, he was not one of the number: it is undoubtedly present at the Paschal Supper, it is unlikely that he staid to the after-celebration. (Compare John xiii. 30.) The so-called “Lord’s Supper” directly followed the ordinary paschal meal. The articles used were the bread and wine upon the table at the time. The position of the first communicant was reclining, according to custom (John xiii. 23, 25, and art. MEAL).

From the New Testament it appears, that in the first Christian congregations, more especially in that of Jerusalem, the Lord’s Supper was celebrated with exactly the same plainness and simplicity which characterized its institution. Between worship and any other act of daily life, no distinction had as yet developed; no ceremonies, no ritual, existed. The members of the congregation lived with each other like members of one large family, but a family of a new and higher type. Every day they gathered in the houses of the church for the sake of common devotion. They ate together; and, when the meal was finished, one of them would arise, take the bread and break it, and pass the pieces around, together with the cup, in exactly the way in which the Lord had ordered it to be done. There was a danger, however, in administering the communion in this way. It might happen that the sacrament would gradu-
It is difficult to determine in detail the relation between the Lord's Supper and the agape: it was, no doubt, different in the different countries. Thus, while, according to the descriptions of divine service given by Justin (in his Apology, 1, 65) and by Pionius in his famous letter to Trajan, X. 90), the agape and the communion were treated in Asia Minor, in the beginning of the second century, as two distinct acts, other Christian writers, and especially a number of canonical decrees, show that in the West, and also in Africa, they were at the same time celebrated in connection with each other; and from Socrates (Hist. Eccl., v. 22) and Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., vii. 19) it is evident, that, in Egypt, the connection was continued even down to the fourth century. The steadily increasing danger, however, of the desecration of the sacrament, made a separation necessary. First it was ordered that the celebration of the Eucharist should take place, not at the end, but at the beginning, of the meal. Only on one day, the anniversary of the institution, the celebration was allowed by the Council of Carthage (362) to take place at the end of the meal, in order to make the imitation of the last meeting between Christ and the apostles as close as possible. Next it was decided that the agape should be celebrated in the evening, while the communion should be administered in the morning, before sunrise; and finally the councils of Laodicea (381), Carthage (392), and Orleans (533), forbad altogether to celebrate the agape in the churches; while the church, of course, continued to be the usual place for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Thus the separation was completed. The first description of a communion administered independently of the agape is that above mentioned by Justin. "After a prayer," he says, "we greet each other with a kiss. Then the leader of the meeting brings forwards bread and wine, and makes a prayer, to which the whole congregation answer, Amen. Finally the deacon, the cup, with the words, "The body of Christ;" the deacon, the cup, with the words, "The blood of Christ;" to which the communicant answered with a loud "Amen."

How the celebration of the Lord's Supper further developed in the Western Church, until, in the course of the sixth century, it assumed the form of the Roman-Catholic mass, will be told in the article Mass. There are some details, however, which need mentioning in order to complete the picture. As above mentioned, in early times the celebration generally took place early in the morning. Only the Easter and Christmas communion continued, down to the twelfth or thirteenth century, to be administered at midnight. As a reminiscence of the midnight celebration, the candles on the communion-table were lighted, even in a celebration by day. Originally the communion was administered every day, then every Sunday; but from the fifth century it was restricted to the three great festivals, Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost. In the earliest times, only the bishop or the leader of the congregation administered the bread and wine, during the Eucharist. The presbyter could consecrate the elements only on his authority, and the deacons served only in the mechanical part of the act. During the middle ages, however, when the bishops became great lords, who had many other things to do besides caring for the churches, the administration of the sacrament came to devolve entirely upon the priests, not as a right, but as a duty. The communicants prepared themselves by fasting, by ablation, by dressing in clean clothes (the women wearing a peculiar head-dress of white linen), and then the communicant kissed the priest, and, by the kiss of peace. In earlier times they approached the altar two and two, and received the elements standing (Const. Apostol., 8, 12). Afterwards the laity, first the women, were excluded from the altar and the choir; and the elements were handed to them over the rails which separated the choir from the people. Doubt as it was worth coming during the third and fourth centuries. After the common service was finished, the deacon began the "mass of the faithful," with the words, "Let no one go away who is allowed to stay! During a silent prayer, the deacon and his assistants gathered the bread and wine which the congregation had brought along for the celebration; and when all was collected, and one single loaf, the "hostia," the sacrificial lamb, selected, the celebration proper began. The faithful gave each other the kiss; the profane, the catechumens, etc., were admonished to retire; the clergy washed their hands; the bread and wine were placed on the altar, at whose two ends two subdeacons took their stand, with fans in their hands to keep off the flies; while from behind, the bishop approached the table, clad in a magnificent robe, and accompanied by the priests. Then followed a general prayer, lasting half an hour, and winding up with special prayers for the clergy and the emigrants and exiles, travellers, etc. The sacrifice thus blessed, the Thirty-fourth Psalm, the usual communion-hymn, was sung; after which first the altar and Christ, then the congregation, kissed the Eucharist. The bishop presented the bread to the communicants with the words, "The body of Christ;" the deacon, the cup, with the words, "The blood of Christ;" to which the communicant answered with a loud "Amen."

The celebration of the Lord's Supper differs from other things which we have to do besides caring for the churches, the administration of the sacrament came to devolve entirely upon the priests, not as a right, but as a duty. The communicants prepared themselves by fasting, by ablation, by dressing in clean clothes (the women wearing a peculiar head-dress of white linen), and then the communicant kissed the priest, and, by the kiss of peace. In earlier times they approached the altar two and two, and received the elements standing (Const. Apostol., 8, 12). Afterwards the laity, first the women, were excluded from the altar and the choir; and the elements were handed to them over the rails which separated the choir from the people. Doubt as it was worth coming during the third and fourth centuries. After the common service was finished, the deacon began the "mass of the faithful," with the words, "Let no one go away who is allowed to stay! During twelfth or thirteenth century, though it was an old custom to receive the blessing with which the community was then in a sleeping position. With respect to the elements, the Eastern Church was continued to use leavened bread; while in the ninth century unleavened bread came into use in the Western Church, from a regard to the circumstance that the institution of the sacrament had taken place on the "day of unleavened bread." The question, however, was left standing, as an adiaphoron. The bread was in round, thin cakes stamped with some figure,—the cross, or Α and Ω, etc.; or some word,—Jesus, Deus, etc. The Syrian Jacobites added salt and oil to the bread; the Antiochites (a Montanist sect of the second century), even cheese. The wine was in antiquity always mixed with water, and no distinction was made between red and white wine. By heretical sects, various substitutes were used for wine; such as water, milk, honey, unfermented grape-juice, etc. The breaking of the bread, referring to the breaking of the body of Christ, was the general custom in antiquity, and has been retained by all churches except the Lutheran. With this feature of the administration was connected another, of blending the bread and the wine together, referring to the close union between the body and the blood; and the Greek lay so strong an emphasis on this blending, that they drop the pieces of the broken bread into the wine, and present them to the communicants by means of a spoon. The formula of distribution was, up to the time of Gregory the Great, the above-mentioned: ὅμως χρωσί ("body of Christ"); ὅμως χροσί ("blood of Christ"); ἀπορρόφω λίκανος ("cup of life"). But after that time more elaborate formulas occur; such as, Corpus (sanguis) Domini nostri Jesui Christi consecrat animam tuam ("May the body [blood] of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve thy soul"); or, Corpus ... custodiat te in vitam aeternam ("body ... preserve thee unto eternal life"); or, Corpus et sanguis Agni Dei, quod tibi datum in remissionem peccatorum ("body and blood of the Lamb of God, which was given for thee to the remission of sins"); or, Corpus ... sit tibi salus animae et corporis ("May the body ... be to thee salvation in body and soul"); or, in the Orient, Corpus sanctum, pretiosum, verum, Immanuelis fillius Dei loc est vere ("This is truly the holy, precious, true body of Immanuel, the Son of God"); Sanguis pretiosus, verus, Immanuelis fillius Dei loc est vere ("This is truly the precious, true blood of Immanuel, the Son of God").

The form which the Greek Church developed for the celebration of the Lord's Supper is entirely different from that developed by the Roman-Catholic Church. It is symbolical throughout. Not only does one of the antiphonal choirs which perform during the act represent in some mystic way the cherubim, but the whole act is, in its every feature, a symbolical representation of the passion. Five loaves are laid on the altar, each stamped with the sign of the cross and the inscription, Ἰησοῦς χριστὸς θεός. The officiating priest selects one of them for the sacrificial lamb; and with a symbolical reference to the soldier who pierced the side of Jesus with a spear, so that blood and water flowed from the wound, he cuts the lamb into a piece, which he gives to the deacon in the form of a lance—into it, while at the same time the deacon pours the wine and the water into the cup. Under sombre dirges the elements are then carried in a solemn procession, headed with many lighted candles and much incense-burning, through the church, down the aisle, and back again to the altar, where they are deposited, like the body of Christ in the tomb. A curtained is lowered before the altar; and, unseen by the congregation, the elements are consecrated by the bishop while the choir is chanting the Lord's Prayer. When the curtain is drawn, the altar represents the tomb from which Christ has risen; and, while the choir sings a hymn of praise, the elements are presented to the communicants without any special formula of distribution.

All the various forms under which the Lord's Supper is celebrated in the various Protestant churches may be referred to two types,—the one established by Luther, and the other by Calvin. Luther issued two liturgies,—one of 1523, in which the whole Latin mass, even the language, is retained, so far as it does not openly contradict Scripture; and one of 1526, the so-called Deutsche Messe. It is the latter, which, with various modifications, has been adopted by all Lutheran churches. Its principal characteristics are, the consecration of the elements by the sign of the cross; the use of the wafer, that is, of unleavened bread which is not broken; the use of white instead of red wine; and the kneeling position of the communicants, who receive the elements in the mouth, and not in the hand. The Calvinist type has generally retained the character of a common meal; the whole arrangement is frurer and more simple; the solemn ceremonies are reduced to the least possible; while the holy earnest of the act itself is emphasized as strongly as possible. In the French Reformed Church the elements are placed,—the bread in two silver dishes, and the wine in two silver cups,—on a table spread with a white linen cloth. From twenty-five to thirty communicants approach the table at a time. The officiating minister makes a free prayer, and then, while repeating the words of institution, presents the elements to his neighbors on the left and on the right, after which the dish and the cup pass from hand to hand. With various modifications this type has been adopted by all the Reformed churches. In no church, however, is the imitation of the ancient form of the communion so close as in the Church of England. In the United Church of Prussia the form adopted is a combination of the Lutheran and the Calvinistic type. The Quakers do not celebrate the Lord's Supper at all.
of the bread and the wine. As in the Church of England, so in her daughter the Episcopal Church in America, in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, and also in many Lutheran churches, the communicants kneel at the chancel-railing in little companies; and to each one, in turn, a certain formula is spoken, as first the bread, and then the wine, is dispensed. In the German Reformed Church they stand. The Friends spiritualize both baptism and the Lord's Supper, and therefore have no such outward ordinances. Various terms are used to designate the Lord's Supper, such as Eucharist, Communion, Holy Communion, Blessed Sacrament, etc.

LORETO, or LÛRETTO (Lauretum), a town to the south-east of Ancona, the chief seat of the Italian Mary-worship, and not inappropriately called the 'Mecca of medieval Christendom.' The legend referred to below seems to have originated towards the close of the period of the crusades, and in close connection with the final destruction of the kingdom of Jerusalem by the Turks. It first occurs in Italia illustrata, by Flavius Blundus, papal secretary (d. in 1464); but in its fully developed form it is not found until about a century later on, in Baptista Mantuanus: Redemptoris mundi: Memoriae sanctae Mara historia, in his Op. omnia, Antwerp, 1576, iv. 216. Properly speaking, the casa santa is not the whole house of Mary, but only that room in the house in Nazareth in which she was born herself, and in which Jesus was educated. By the apostles the room was transformed into a church, and St. Luke adorned it with a wooden statue representing the Virgin with the child. As long as the kingdom of Jerusalem existed, service was regularly cele-
LOT.

LOT.

LOT (a covering), the son of Haran, and nephew of Abraham; accompanied his uncle from Ur to Canaan and Egypt, and back to Canaan. There the size of their respective flocks and herds gave rise to constant strife among their herdsmen; and so Abraham and Lot, on the suggestion of the former, peacefully parted. Lot went forth in the Jordan valley, attracted by the apparent richness of the region. He lived in Sodom, there brought up his family, and allowed his daughters to marry among the inhabitants. On one occasion the city was attacked by Chedorlaomer; and Lot was carried away captive, but rescued and restored by Abraham. The moral status of the Sodomites is amply illustrated by the story of the visit of the angels thither, and our word "Sodomy." Lot was personally pure (2 Pet. ii. 8). At length the wrath of God against the cities of the plain could no longer be repressed. Abraham, on being warned of the approaching disaster, pleaded with God for them; but they did not contain the requisite ten righteous persons (Gen. xviii. 32). Two angels warned Lot also, who obeyed, but was unable to induce his sons-in-law to flee. The Lord rained brimstone and fire upon Sodom and Gomorrah and all the cities of the plain. Lot's wife, on looking back, contrary to the express command of the angels, became "a pillar of salt." (No faith is to be put in the identifications.) From Sodom, Lot fled to Zoar, and thence to a cave in "the mountain." Anxiety to preserve seed of their father was the excuse for the incest which his two daughters committed with Lot while overcome by wine. In this way the ancestors of the Moabites and Ammonites respectively were born.

In the narrative we have not legend, but family tradition. The picture presented is true to life and to the times. The destruction of the cities of the plain was due to natural causes, and made so profound an impression, that not only do the Bible writers often allude to it (Deut. xxiv. 23; Isa. i. 9; Jer. xx. 10; Lam. iv. 6; Hos. xi. 8; Amos iv. 11), but also Strabo and Tacitus (Hist., v. 7). The Dead Sea is called by the Arabs do-day Bahr Lut ("the Sea of Lot"). For further particulars of the event and the region, see PALESTINE, SALT SEA, SODOM.

LOT, The Use of the, among the Hebrews. The name for "lot" is הָעֵץ, which literally means "little stone," in reference to the different colored stones one used to throw to obtain the divine decision of the question. Faith in a special providence underlay the practice. The decision of the lot was ordered of God. The following classes of cases in which it was resorted to are recorded in the Bible: 1. Partitions. — (a) That of the land of Israel (Num. xxvi. 55; Josh. xviii. 10). According to Jewish tradition, the process was carried on by means of two urns, in one of which were the names of the different families of the Israelites, in the other the lots, upon which the portions of territory were described. Presiding over the drawing was the high priest, with urim and thummim. (b) That of the cities for the Levites (Josh. xxi. 4 sqq.). (c) That of the families returned from the exile, so that one in ten might dwell in Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 1). (d) That of the spoil, also of the prisoners, and of the clothing of condemned persons among the executioners (Joel iii. 3; Obad. 11; Nah. iii. 10; Matt. xxvii. 35; John xix. 23). 2. Selection of Persons. — (a) The choice of men for an invading force (Judg. xx. 5). (b) The choice of a person to fill an office. — Saul (1 Sam. vii. 13) and David (Acts i. 26); but these were quite exceptional cases. (c) The choice of priests to fill the twenty-four courses, and perform various duties (1 Chron. xxiv. 5; Luke i. 9; Neh. x. 34 sqq.). (d) The choice of the scapegoat on the Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 8). In the Hebrew version, Doubtful Questions (Josh. vii. 14 sqq.; 1 Sam. xiv. 41 sq.; Prov. xvi. 38, xviii. 18). The lot was either thrown from an urn, or from the bosom of the outer world.

The Bible also records the use of the lot among non-Jewish persons; e.g., Haman, to decide the best day for the destruction of the Jews (Esth. iii. 7), and the sailors of Jonah's vessel, to determine who was responsible for the storm (Jon. i. 7).

LOUIS, St., Louis IX., King of France (Nov. 15, 1226—Aug. 26, 1270), was only eleven years old when his father died. During his minority, his mother, Blanche of Castile, governed the realm. When he was twenty years old, he assumed the government himself; and as he opened his reign with a crusade,—the unfortunate campaign in Egypt, where he was taken prisoner,—so he also closed it with a crusade,—the still more unfortunate campaign in Tunis, where he died of the plague. He was a man of genuine piety; though his piety was of a strongly pronounced medieval type, ascetic and intolerant. His daily devotions were frequent, long, and strictly observed: on the days of the great Christian festivals he wore hair-cloth, and went barefooted; Wednesday and Friday he refrained from laughing; when he adored the cross, he prostrated himself on the ground before it, etc., but he looked on with composure while the Cathari were tortured. In the Établissements de St. Louis he acknowledged that heretics ought to be punished with death. By an ordinance he cancelled one-third of the debt which his Christian subjects owed to the Jews, etc. He was also cedulous and superstitious. At one time he bought the crown of thorns for a million and a half francs; at another, he bought the true cross, and placed it, with many singular ceremonies, in the Church of Notre Dame, in Paris. Nevertheless, he was not the slave of the Pope or of the clergy. The authenticity of the famous Pragmatic Sanction of 1269 is questionable; but, whether or not he ever formulated those articles, he certainly carried them out in practice. The liberties and privileges of the Gallican Church he vindicated against the encroachments of the Pope with great vigor and unswerving decision; and he forbade the Roman curia to levy money in France, under penalty, without legitimate authority. In the same spirit he defended the laity against the clergy. He wholly exempted laymen from ecclesiastical jurisdiction in civil affairs; and such ecclesiastical judges as attempted, by means of excommunication, to compel laymen to bring also their civil suits before the ecclesiastical court, he compelled to cancel the excommunication by confiscating their revenues. A petition from the French bishop, to give their excommunications more effect by confiscating the property of the excommunicated, he may be said, that, however narrow and unsound his piety was in many of its more personal utterances, its influence on his policy was, in all its great traits, most beneficent; and he is one of the very few truly Christian characters who have ever sat on a throne. He was canonized by Boniface VIII. in 1297. See Le Nain de Tillemont: Histoire de St. Louis, which also gives a list of the very rich contemporary sources to his life; and Guizot: Histoire des quatre grands Chrétiens Français, Paris, 1873, 2 vols.; Verdière: La monarchie chrétienne de St. Louis entre la papauté et le cénacle, Lyon, 1876; H. Wallon: St. Louis, Tours, 1878; V. Verlaque: St. Louis, Paris, 1885.

LOVE, one of the most weighty, comprehensive, and universal of conceptions, having basal value in philosophy, ethics, and theology, and extending through all lands and times. It is a relation between persons, in which the personality of the one is lost in the other, in which each esteems the other better than himself (Phil. ii. 3), and all selfishness vanishes. Love is, therefore, much more than inclination or liking: it is, however, rarely found in completion. In this article we consider:

1. Love as the Essence of God.—John says, "God is love" (1 John iv. 16), a sentence which is not a definition of the essence of God, but a statement of his feelings toward us. At the same time, the words open a profitable field of speculation in regard to the part love holds in the divine constitution. Augustine first, Richard of St. Victor next, and, after him, others, have endeavored to reconstruct the Trinity by the principle of love: thus, the Father loves the Son, and the Son loves the Father (redemando); both loves are united in love for an object of common affection (commune amorem). But the attempt has been unsuccessful; for the Holy Spirit is more than a product, it is a factor of the divine love; and besides, in the proposed scheme, the persons of the Godhead are not sufficiently distinguished. But it is undoubtedly true that love is a large element of the divine essence; and the later theologians, as, for instance, Dorner, in discussing the problem of the Trinity, give it much space.

2. Love as Principle in Creation.—God created the world in order that he might have a field for the exercise of his love; not that the world was necessary for that is, in the Holy Spirit, he desired him to make the world, and fill it with creatures whom he could love.

3. Love as Principle in Redemption.—God so loved the world, that he sent his Son to die for it (John iii. 18). The Son, out of his free, divine love, redeemed his creatures for our salvation (Matt. xx. 28). God willed in Christ, redeeming the world unto himself (2 Cor. v. 19); and this love of God in Christ is the only and exclusive ground of our salvation and of our sanctification (Acts iv. 12).

4. Love as Principle in Virtue.—Love is the source and centre of the development of the new life in Christ. Our Lord set his approval upon the Mosaic summary of the law in the form of love to God and man (Matt. xxii. 37 sq.; comp. Deut. vi. 5; Lev. xix. 18), and gave his followers the "new commandment," that they should love one another (John xiii. 34). Paul calls love the fulfilling of the law (Rom. xiii. 10), and "the end of the commandment" (1 Tim. i. 5); Peter exhorts to love as the fruit of the holy living (1 Pet. i. 22; 2 Pet. i. 8); John is particularly full upon love (1 John ii. 5, iv. 7, 8); and James calls love of our neighbors "the royal law" (ii. 5, 8).

5. Phenomena of Love. Love manifests itself in the two great directions,—toward God and toward our neighbor, or in the contemplative and in the practical form; the former seen in Mary of Bethany, the latter in her sister Martha (Luke x. 38-42). Our Lord gave his preference to the former. It shows itself in prayer, meditation, worship, and in the communion. The practical, on the other hand, shows itself in all works of benevolence and beneficence, far and near. It is incumbent upon the Christian to unite the two. The hardest burden our Lord lays upon his disciples is to love their enemies (Matt. v. 44). Among human relationships controlled by love, marriage occupies the first place (Eph. v. 21 sqq.). It is noticeable that the apostle who put conjugal love in the closest parallel to the "great mystery" of the love between Christ and the Church spoke slightingly of conjugal love (1 Cor. xvii. 1, 40).

6. Mockeries of Love. —True love can only exist between human beings: therefore, to speak of love for animals, or of love for a thing, is to use improper language. Self-love is an inaccurate but indispensable term. To love ourselves somewhat is indeed necessary: it is the measure of our love for our neighbors. What passes for love in literature, novels, and on the stage, is too commonly mere sexual longing. Even in religious talk and pictures do we find this debasement of the word in the really sensual expressions of affection for Jesus, and in those representations which are so derogatory to the Saviour of the World]. That so-called "love" which leads a parent or guardian to refrain from punishing a child because it would give pain, and all such like indulgences, does not deserve the name. Love for gold, and love for the world, are perversions of love, to its destruction. KARL BURGER.

LOVE, Family of. See FAMILISTS.

LOVE-FEASTS. See AGAPE.

LOVE, Christopher, b. Cardiff, in Glamorgan-shire, 1618; educated at New Inn Hall, Oxford, 1635. After taking the master's degree he was obliged to leave Oxford for refusing to subscribe to Archbishop Laud's canons. He went to London, and became domestic chaplain to the sheriff, and took a bold stand against the errors of the Book of Common Prayer and the religious tyranny of the times. He was cast into prison on account of an aggressive sermon at Newcastle, and in various ways persecuted in the breaking of the civil war he was made preacher to the garrison of Windsor Castle, where he gave great offence to the prelatical party by his pointed utterances. He was one of the first to receive presbyteral ordination under the new organization in Jan 23, 1644, at Aldermanbury, London; and became pastor of St. Lawrence Jewry in London, where he was highly esteemed for the eloquence and vigor of his preaching. He was a strong Presbyterian, the leader of the younger men of that party. In this way he became involved in reasonable correspondence with the Presbyterians of Scotland to restore Charles II., and, with many others, was arrested May 7, 1651, and chosen to make an example of, to check the Presbyterian agitation against Cromwell and in favor of Charles II. He was condemned, and beheaded on Tower Hill, Aug. 22, 1651. This excited the indignation and wrath of the entire Presbyterian party, which had petitioned, by ministerial bodies and parishes, in vain for his pardon. He went to his death as their hero and martyr. His funeral sermon was preached by Thomas Manton to an immense sympathizing audience, published, after his death, under the auspices of the leading Presbyterians of London. The most important of his works are Grace, the Truth and Growth, and different Degrees thereof, 226 pp., London, 1652; Heaven's Glory, Hell's Terror, 350 pp., 1653; Combat between the Flesh and the Spirit, 292 pp., 1654; Treatise of Effectual Calling, 218 pp., 1658; The Natural Man's Case stated, 8vo, 280 pp., 1858; Select Works, 8vo, Glasgow, 1806-07. 2 vols. C. A. BRIGGS.

LOW CHURCH is a designation of a school and party in the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, which in the departments of the sacraments, church government, and ecclesiastical ritual, clings firmly to the principles for which the English Reformers contended. In contrast to the school known as the "High Church," it emphasizes justification by faith, denies the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, and holds the Calvinistic (or Zwinglian) doctrine of the Lord's Supper, deprecating all approach to the so-called "Catholic," or high sacramentarian view. In the department of ecclesiastical polity it disdains apostolical succession, and, while it insists upon the Episcopal as the best form of government, denies that episcopacy is necessary to the being of the Church. In matters of ritual it is more moderate, and excludes as innovations those advanced by the ritualists for which the English Reformers contended. In this way he became in the Episcopal Church of the United States the relative influence of the Low-Church party has declined since the death of Bishops Johns of Virginia, McIlvaine of Ohio, and other prominent leaders. See High Church, Latitudinarians, and BLUNT: Dictionary of Sects, etc.

LOWDER, Charles Fuge, vicar of St. Peter's, London Docks; b. at Bath, June 22, 1820; d. at Zell-am-See, Austria, Sept. 9, 1880. He was educated at King's College, London, and at Oxford, where he took his degree, 1848. He was ordained deacon, April 13, 1843, and became a curate at Walton-cum-Street, near Glastonbury; was ordained priest, Dec. 22, 1844; resigned his curacy, and became chaplain to the Axbridge Workhouse; then moved to Tethbury as senior curate, autumn of 1845. In 1851 he came to London as curate at St. Barnabas. There he was called upon to fight in behalf of certain ritualistic changes. In 1856 he began, not only the most important work of his life, for which all his previous experiences were preparatory,—he headed the mission to St. George's-in-the-East. On June 30, 1866, St. Peter's Church, London Docks, was consecrated; and he became first vicar of the new parish of St. Peter's-in-the-East, constructed out of his former one, and until his death he labored faithfully at this post.

The scene of Mr. Lowder's labors was in East London, in the neighborhood of the Great Docks. The people living there were the worst imaginable. He deliberately put himself in direct contact with their far worse than heathen darkness and degradation; for he yearned over those poor, desolate souls, who, unless he could reach them, during forty and twenty years, to carry to them the pure and elevating gospel of Jesus Christ. The measures he adopted were severely criticized. The very people for whom he would have gladly died, rose in rebellion against the "popery," as they called it, of his ritualistic services. It is true he was a ritualist. He called himself a "priest of the Catholic Church." He conducted services with ritualistic additions of crosses, colored vestments, lights, etc.; he heard confessions, granted absolution, and was generally addressed and spoken of as "Father Lowder." In dress, mode of living, general style of theologian thought, he resembled a Roman-Catholic priest. He had bound himself by vows of celibacy and poverty. He centred his attention upon the church; but he was not a Roman Catholic, for he yielded no allegiance to the Pope, nor adored the Virgin Mary. He strained every nerve to benefit his parishioners, to educate them, to cure them of their vices; and he succeeded. Like the river in Ezekiel's vision, everywhere his influence went, life sprang up. He lived among blackguards of every description,—thieves, drunkards, prostitutes, and the very scum of London, the most debased population in the world. But he was there to do them... good, to teach them the way to God; and the numbers whom he reclaimed, and the even greater numbers, probably, whom he restrained from sin, testify to the power of his influence. His "ritualism" becomes a matter of small consequence in view of the results of his work, for he saved a multitude of souls. When his remains were brought to London, they were received with extraordinary marks of respect. His funeral was attended by three thousand persons who mourned him as a faithful and beloved friend. "No such funeral has been seen in London in modern times."—See Charles Lowder: a Biography (anonymous), Lond., 1882; 3d ed., same year. SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

LOWELL, John, founder of the Lowell Institute; b. in Boston, May 11, 1799; d. in Bombay, India, March 4, 1838. He studied for two years at Harvard College; but ill health prevented his graduation, and the greater part of his mature life was spent in travel. He left two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the maintenance in Boston of annual courses of free public lectures upon religion, science, literature, and the arts. The Lowell Institute, as it is called, went into operation in the winter of 1838-40.

LOWMAN, Moses, a dissenting divine; b. in London, 1680; d. there (in Clapham, Surrey) May 3, 1759. He published several estimable works,—An Argument from Prophecy in Proof that Jesus is the Messiah, 1733; A Paraphrase and Notes on the Revelation of St. John, 1737, 2d ed., 1745, new edition, 1807 (this work is now incorporated with Patrick, Lowth, and Whiby's Commentary); A Dissertation on the Civil Government of the Hebrews, 1740; A Rational of the Ritual of the Hebrew Worship, 1748 (new edition, 1818).

LOW-SUNDAY, the first Sunday after Easter, so called because formerly some portion of the great festival of Easter was repeated upon it; hence it was a feast of a lower degree than Easter.

LOWTH, Robert, D.D., father of the preceding;
b. at London, Sept. 11, 1661; d. at Buriton, Hampshire, May 17, 1732. He was graduated at Oxford, 1683; and became chaplain to Dr. Mew, bishop of Winchester, who made him a prebendary of Winchester, 1686, and rector of Buriton and Petersfield, 1769. His own works were few in number, but weighty in value. 1. An Authentic History of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testament, in Answer to (Le Clerc's) Five Letters, Oxford, 1892, 3d ed., 1821 (this brought him into notice); Directions for the Profitable Reading of the Holy Scriptures, London, 1708, 7th ed., 1796; but his principal work was a Commentary on the Prophets, London, 1714-23, 4 vols., afterwards collected in one folio volume, and incorporated with Bishop Patrick's Commentary, and frequently reprinted, in that connection, under the caption, Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby's Commentary. Dr. Lowth was the efficient assistant upon several works which pass under other names, such as Dr. Potter's edition of Clemens Alexandrinus, Oxford, 1715, 2 vols., enlarged edition, Venice, 1757, 2 vols.; Hudson's Josephus, Oxford, 1720, 2 vols.; Reading's Historie Ecclesiastica, Cambridge, 1720, 3 vols. (reprinted Turin, 1749). A Life of Dr. Lowth will be found in the seventh edition of his Directions, etc.

LOYOLA. See Ignatius Loyola.

LUCIAN THE MARTYR was born at Samosata about the middle of the third century, and educated at Edessa, whose school, next to that of Alexandria, was the most flourishing one in Christendom, and numbered such men as Macarius and Bardessanes among its teachers. He afterwards settled at Antioch, and became the founder of a celebrated school of exegetes. Eusebius of Nicomedias, Maris of Chalcedon, Theognis of Nicea, Leontius of Antioch, Antonius of Tarsus, Asterius of Rome, and other Fathers of Cappadocia, and Arius, his countryman, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (with the principal notes of Michaelis), London, 1787, 2d ed., 1816, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1835, 1 vol., 5th ed., 1847; American edition by Calvin E. Stowe, Andover, 1829; French translations, Les de la poésie sacrée des Hébreux, Lyons, 1812, 2 vols.; Cours de poésie sacrée (abridged), Paris, 1812, 2 vols. These bibliographical details suffice to show the popularity of the work. It is, indeed, the most complete work upon the subject. The most damaging criticism brought against it is that Lowth attempts the impossible,—to bring Hebrew poetry under the categories of the classical variety. (See art. Hebræan Poetry.) (2) Isaiah: A New [metrical] Translation, with a Preliminary Dissertation, Notes, Critical, Philological, and Explanatory, London, 1778, 13th ed., 1842; American edition from tenth English edition, Boston, 1834; German translation by Professor J. B. Koppe, Leipzig, 1779. Lowth's translation is generally much admired, but in the judgment of some critics he alters the Hebrew text unduly. Besides these two great works, he wrote a Life of William of Wykeham (London, 1765, 2d ed., 1778), and several pamphlets. His Sermons and other writings collected in one folio volume, and incorporated with Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby's Commentary; Directions for the Profitable Reading of the Holy Scriptures, London, 1708, 7th ed., 1796; but his principal work was a Commentary on the Prophets, London, 1714-23, 4 vols., afterwards collected in one folio volume, and incorporated with Bishop Patrick's Commentary, and frequently reprinted, in that connection, under the caption, Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby's Commentary. Dr. Lowth was the efficient assistant upon several works which pass under other names, such as Dr. Potter's edition of Clemens Alexandrinus, Oxford, 1715, 2 vols., enlarged edition, Venice, 1757, 2 vols.; Hudson's Josephus, Oxford, 1720, 2 vols.; Reading's Historie Ecclesiastica, Cambridge, 1720, 3 vols. (reprinted Turin, 1749). A Life of Dr. Lowth will be found in the seventh edition of his Directions, etc.
A martyr during the persecution of Maximinus. Of his works, Eusebius mentions none; but his peculiar position as father of Arianaism was, of course, sufficient reason for Eusebius to throw a veil of obscurity around him. Jerome mentions his recension of the Bible-text, his De Fide, and some letters, to which must be added the apologetic oration communicated by Rufinus. His recension of the Bible-text was used in the whole western part of the Byzantine Empire, from Antioch to Constantinople; while that of Hesychius was used in Alexandria and Egypt; and that of Origen, in Syria and Palestine. Of his recension of the New-Testament text, Jerome speaks disparagingly, and it was forbidden by the Decretum Gelasianum. Of that of the Septuagint, Jerome speaks in better terms; and a tolerably distinct idea may be formed of its character and method.

Of the De Fide and the letters, some very slight mention is made, but no thing of importance. In the apologetic oration the doctrinal system of Arianaism is visible.

Lucifer (light-giver), a term applied by Isaiah to the king of Babylon (Isa. xiv. 12), and not occurring elsewhere in the Bible. It indicates the king's glory as that of "a sun of the morning; a morning-star." Tertullian and others have, it would seem without sufficient warrant, applied the term to Satan; and this is now the common acceptance.

Lucifer and the Luciferians. When Constantius, at the synod of Aries (353), succeeded in carrying through the condemnation of Athanasius, Bishop Lucifer of Sardis (Caralis, or Caralianus, or Calaris), one of the most ardent champions of the Confession of Nicea and the cause of Athanasius, immediately repaired to Rome, and was thence sent to the imperial court at Aries, together with the presbyter Pancratius and the deacon Hilarius, in order to demand the convention of an impartial council. But the Council of Milan (355) was far from being impartial. The condemnation of Athanasius was confirmed, and Lucifer was banished. He lived first at Germania in Commagene, then at Eleutheropolis in Palestine, and finally at Thebes; and during those years of exile (355-361) he wrote a number of books full of the most violent invectives against the emperor,—De non parciendo in deum delinquentibus; De regibus apostaticis; Pro Athanasia; De non conveniendo cum heret.; Mortendum esse pro dei filio. After the death of Constantius and the accession of Julian, he was allowed to return to his see. He did not adopt, however, those milder views which the Council of Alexandria, under the presidency of Athanasius, decided upon, and according to which the bishops who had not openly sided with the Arians, but only yielded under the pressure of Constantius, should be forgiven and re-admitted. On the contrary, he demanded that all such bishops should be deposed and excommunicated, and all ecclesiastical acts performed by them,—ordinations, consecrations, baptism, etc.—should be declared null and void. He found many adherents, not only in his own diocese, but everywhere in the church. Bishop Gregory of Elvira in Spain, the presbyter Bonosus in Treves, the schismatic Bishop Epiphnus in Rome, Bishop Heracleides of Oxyrhynchus in Egypt, and others. As the Luciferians considered themselves the true and pure church, they utterly repudiated the name of a sect; but they separated from the general church, and in some places, as, for instance, in Rome, they caused considerable trouble. They disappeared, however, in the course of half a century. Lucifer died at Cagliari, in 371. His works were first edited by J. Tilius, Paris, 1586, and afterwards often.
LUCEUS. 1359

LUCIUS. 1359

LUCIUS is the name of three popes.—Lucius I. (March 5, 264; March 12, 1144—Feb. 16, 1145). His short reign was much disturbed. A revolt took place in Rome under the leadership of Giordano Pierione, who was declared patricius. A new senate was elected; and the Pope was asked to renounce all power and rights and privileges, except those belonging to a bishop of the primitive church. Lucius addressed himself to Conrad III. for aid, but in vain. He succeeded, however, in enlisting the Frangipani, the bitter enemies of the Pieriones, on his side; but he died before the issue of the contest was arrived at. See Wat-terich:Vita Pont. Rom., ii. 278—281; Jaffé: Regest. Pont., 610—615.—Lucius III. (Sept. 1, 1184—Nov. 23, 1185). He inherited from his predecessor, Alexander III., the bitter controversy with the Emperor Frederic I. concerning the estates of the Countess Mathilde. A compromise was proposed by the emperor, who offered to pay ten per cent of the revenues of the kingdom of Italy to the Pope, and other ten per cent to the cardinals, if the curia would renounce its claim on the estates. But the offer was not accepted. On the contrary, the Pope demanded the immediate surrender of the estates; which the emperor could not comply with, without endangering the position of the empire in Central Italy. A personal interview was finally arranged, in 1184, between the emperor and the Pope, at Verona, where Lucius generally resided. But nothing came out of the interview, except a deeper irritation on both sides. Shortly before he died, Lucius solemnly forbade his successor ever to crown Frederic’s son, Henry VI. See Watte-terich l. c., ii. 650—682; Jaffé l. c., 833—854; SchefFer-Borchorst: Kaiser Friedrich I. and d. Kurie, 1896. Karl Muller.

LUCKE, Gottfried Christian Friedrich, b. at Egeln, near Magdeburg, Aug. 24, 1791; b. at Gottingen, Feb. 14, 1855. He studied theology at Halle and Gottingen, began to lecture in the university of Berlin in 1818, and was appointed professor of theology at Bonn in 1818, and at Gottingen in 1827. He was a pupil and friend of Schleiermacher, and one of the ablest commentators. He tried to occupy a middle position, avoiding all extremes; and, though he did not escape the difficulty inherent in his very position,—that of dissatisfying all extremists, radical as well as orthodox,—he vindicated himself with great personal gifts, and exercised considerable influence on the theology of his time. His principal work is his Commentary on the writings of St. John (Gospel, Epistles, and Apocalypse), 4 vols., 1840—56; [partly translated into English, Edin-burgh, 1837]. He also wrote, Grundris der neuext. Hermeneutik, Gottingen, 1816; Über d. neuext. Kanon d. Eusebios, Berlin, 1817; besides a number of valuable monographs in theological periodicals. Wagensmann.

LUD appears in the genealogical table of Gen. x. 22, as the fourth son of Shem, and was already (by Josephus: Arch. 1, 6, 4) identified with the ancestor of the Lydians of Asia Minor. Though the Lydian language did not belong to the Semitic group, it must be remembered that language is not the principle on which the genealogical table of Genesis proceeds; and from other sides it appears probable that there originally existed a close connection between the Lydians and the Assyrians, as Herodotus tells us (1. 7) that the first king of the Lydians was Agros, a son of Ninus, a son of Belus.

Different from the Semitic Lud is the African Lud, who, in Gen. x. 13, appears as the first son of Mizraim. With this account agree the prophets. The Ludim are spoken of in Jer. xiv. 9, as Egyptian mercenaries, together with Cush and Put; in Ezek. xxvii. 10, as mercenaries before Tyre, together with the Persians and Put; and in Isa. lxvi. 19, as archers from the most distant country. Kürtsch.

LUGDINUS. See Lugdinus.

LUDLOW, John, D.D., LL.D., b. at Aquacasa-noneck (now Passaic), N.J., Dec. 13, 1783; d. at Philadelphia, Sept. 8, 1857. He entered the ministry of the Reformed Dutch Church in 1817; to 1823 he was pastor in New Brunswick, N.J., and professor in the theological seminary there; from 1823 to 1834, pastor in Albany; from 1834 to 1852, provost of the University of Pennsylvania; from 1852 to his death, he was professor in the New Brunswick Seminary, and professor of philosophy in Rutgers College. Ludolf, Hiob, b. at Erfurt, June 15, 1624; d. at Frankfurt-am-Main, April 8, 1704. He is noted as an Ethiopian scholar, and author of an Ethiopian grammar, Commentaries on Ethiopian history, and particularly of the great Ethiopian Lexicon (1661). He was aulic councillor to the Duke of Saxe-Gotha, and president of the Academy of History in Frankfurt. See C. Juncker: Commentarius de vita J. Ludolf (Nürnberg, 1710), and Nouvelle biographie générale. Luitprand. See Liutprand.

LUKAS OF TUY (Tudensis), b. at Leon in Spain; was educated for the church; made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in 1227; and was in 1239 appointed bishop of Tuy in Galicia, where he died in 1250. He wrote a Chronicle of Spain from 670 to 1236, edited by Schott (Hisp. Ill., Francfort, 1603, 4 vols. folio), and a Vita et Historia Translationis S. Isidori, of which the first part, treating the life of the saint, is found in Act. Sanet., April 4; and the second, containing polemics against the Cathari, was separately edited by Mariana (Libri tres contra Albigenianos errores, Ingolstadt, 1613), and is found in Bib. Patr. Max., xxv. The polemics is passionate and supercilious, but not without historical and archæological interest. C. Schmidt.

LUKE the evangelist, and author of the Acts of the Apostles, was the "THE MAN." The name Luke occurs only three times in the New Testament; and its bearer is spoken of by Paul as his
The sources from which Luke drew for the Acts were, without doubt, (1) the personal reminiscences he got from Paul, Mark (Col. iv. 10, 14), Philip (Acts xxii. 8), and others (xxi. 17 sqq.), (2) personal observation of his own (the latter portion of the Acts), and (3) documents.

In the concluding chapter of the Acts, Luke records that Paul continued to labor for two years as a prisoner in Rome. This book, therefore, or, at least, it is not made so prominent. Commonsness a negative argument in confirmation of this the early Church, that Luke was the author of the hypotheses have furnished by their inconclusive special coincidences (e.g., Luke xxii.19,20; 1 Cor. xi.19 sqq.)

The Acts has not such a decided Pauline cast, or, at least, it is not made so prominent. Comparatively few of the characteristic ideas of Christianity are brought out. The ever-recurring ideas are the necessity of repentance, faith in Christ as the crucified (according to God’s plan) and risen Saviour, and baptism in his name. Nowhere do we find the author directly combating the views of the Judaic party, as Paul does in his Epistles (Galatians, etc.). The work appears as an historical commentary upon Paul’s fundamental principle,— the gospel for the Jews first, but none the less for the Gentiles. In general, it refutes, by the succession of events it details, the Judaistic attacks upon Paul.

It may be said to be generally acknowledged that Luke follows a definite method. He is the first of the evangelists who proceeds on an historical plan. The words of the prologue of the Gospel (Luke i. 3), “It seemed good to me . . . to write unto thee in order,” at first make the impression that Luke followed a chronological arrangement; but a perusal of the Gospel shows that he was as much influenced by considerations of the matter as of time. After detailing the events of the infancy of Jesus, he divides his healing activity into three periods: (1) Galilean ministry (iv. 14—ix. 50); (2) Journeying towards Jerusalem (ix. 51—xix. 27, or xviii. 30?); a section which, for the most part, is peculiar to Luke; (3) Arrival, activity, and death in Jerusalem, and the resurrection (xix. 28—xxiv. 53).

The arrangement of the Acts surprises us by its correspondence with the arrangement of the Gospel. We may look upon it as an historical demonstration of the fulfilment of the Lord’s command to his disciples (Acts i. 8) to be his witnesses (1) in Jerusalem, (2) in all Judea and Samaria, and (3) to the uttermost part of the earth. The current division into two parts: (1) i.—xiii., in which Peter is the central figure, and (2) xiii.—xxviii., in which Paul is the central figure—must be given up. As in the Gospel, so here, we find an introduction (Acts i.), giving an account of the ascension, and completion of the number of the apostles. The rest of the book falls into three periods: (1) Narrative of the church at Jerusalem (ii.—vi. 7); (2) Transition to labors among the Gentiles (vi. 8—xii.); (3) Founding and confirmation of the churches in Asia and Europe, and the last labors of Paul (xiii.—xxviii.).

LUKE OF PRAGUE.

LUCKWITZ: Über die Schriften des Lukas, Berlin, 1817 (Eng. trans. by Bishop Thirlwall, London, 1825); SCHRÖDER: Vorlesungen über die missionary Geschich he der östlichen Christenheit, Berlin, 1869; SCHÖNHERR: Geschichte der evangelischen Mission in ihrer Entwickelung, Halle, 1862; and his successor in the see of Mayence. His ambi tion of missionary work, however, remained unfulfilled, though it would seem, implicated him in a long series of disputes with the Council of Vienne (1311) and the Council of Constance (1335), which, by its pronouncement, would convince even the hostile of the truth of Chris tianity; and with inexhaustible energy he con vinced the whole world of the truth of Chris

LUKE OF PRAGUE, about 1460; d. at Zungbunzlau, Dec. 11, 1528; studied at the uni versity of Prague; joined the Moravian Brethren (which article see) in 1480; was elected bishop in 1500; and became in 1518 president of their ecclesiastical council. In 1491 he was sent by the Unitas Fratrum on a mission to Greece and the Orient, in order to discover some body of Christianity, and provided with sufficient knowledge, of the Oriental languages, in order to apply it according to its chief purpose.

From the church and the popes, whom he never grew tired of soliciting, he received no aid. At the Council of Vienne (1311) he barely succeeded in having chairs of Oriental languages established at Paris, Oxford, and Salamanca. A little more encouragement he obtained from the kings of France and Aragon, and from the universities; he having taught his science at various times and places with great success. What he did he had to do unaide. He learned Arabic, and made three missionary tours himself among the Saracens.
The first time, he went from Genoa to Bugia, the capital of Tunis (1292); challenged the Arab scholars to a formal disputation; made, as it would seem, considerable impression, but was, for that very reason, ordered to leave the country. The second time, he went from Spain to Boua (1308); visited Algiers and Tunis, but was in Bugia rescued from the fury of the mob only by the aid of an Arab philosopher, Homer.
The third time, he went again directly to Bugia (1314), and kept, for some time, quiet among the Christian merchants; but, when he began to preach publicly against Islam, he was stoned out of the city, and left dying on the seashore. A Christian sea-captain found him, and brought him on board his vessel; but he expired shortly after (June 30, 1315), thus sealing by his death the great idea of his life,— to conquer Islam, not for his own gain, but for the glory of God.

The writings of Lullus, in Latin, Arabic, and Spanish, are very numerous. A catalogue in the Library of the Escorial enumerates four hundred and thirty, and the number agrees with that given by Wadding (Scriptores Min.); N. Antonio Biblioth. Hap. Vet., ii. 129). Most of these writings, however, remain unpublished in Spanish, French, and German libraries. Published are those of his works which pertain to his new scicence, Opera qua ad artem universalem pertinent, Strassburg, 1598, and often afterwards. His Mosca ars is a curious development of scholasticism; indeed, a kind of sensation in its time, and exercises still a kind of fascination on the student. Of great interest are also his works against Averroes and the Averroists, Duodecim principia philosophiae contra Averroios; De reporbatione Averrois; Liber contradictionum inter R. et Averroitam, etc. His Opera were published at Palma, 1859. A collected edition of his works, by Ivo Salzinger (Mayence, 1721—42, in 10 vols.), was never completed.
LUNA.

LUTHER.

The church long hesitated, not knowing whether she should recognize Lulius as a martyr and saint, or condemn him as a heretic. In the fourteenth century the inquisitor of Aragon formally accused him of heresy; and some of his works were actually forbidden by Pope Gregory XI. Afterwards the Jesuits proved very hostile to him; but he was warmly defended by the Franciscans, Antonio Wadding, and others, and, among Protestant church historians, by Neander. See Ferbusquet: Vie de R. L., Vendome, 1657; Lüthy: De vita R. L., Halle, 1830; Helfferich: R. L., Berlin, 1856.

LUNA, Peter de. See Benedict XIII.

LUPUS, Servatus, b. about 803; was educated in the monastery of Ferrières, in the diocese of Sens; studied afterwards at Fulda, under Rabanus Maurus, 827-837; lived for some time at the court of Louis the Pious; and was by Charles the Bald made abbot of Ferrières, instead of Odo, 842. He died after 862, but the exact date is unknown. From his letters it appears that he was well acquainted with all the more prominent ecclesiastical corruptions which came under his observation did not at the time occasion any revolt in his mind. At a later period he voluntarily became the assistant of the city preachers of Wittenberg, and professed strong views in favor of ecclesiastical reform. His mind turning away from philosophy, he earnestly sought for the kernel of the truth and the marrow of the bones (nucleum nucis, medullam ossium, Ep. i. 6). He sought to present to his hearers the saving truth, especially from the Epistle to the Romans and the Psalms; and it was in the study of these books, that, as Melanchthon has said, the light of the gospel first dawned on him. We possess a manuscript of his lectures upon the Psalms, delivered between 1513 and 1516. Amongst the human instruments who influenced his opinions, Augustine was the chief. And at this period Luther taught of the righteousness which is God-given; and he even had a deeper understanding of the meaning of faith, the "short way" to that righteousness, than Augustine himself. In 1516 he became acquainted with, and was strongly influenced by, the mysticism of Tauler and the German Theology, of which he published editions in 1516 and 1518. Although he had not yet broken with the Catholic Church, he had already come substantially to his later views on the plan of salvation. In agreement with the teaching of the mystics, he regarded as fundamental the personal relation of the individual to Christ by faith. Faith he identified with pure and unselfish devotion. It requires the renunciation of the selfish will, which comes from the devil, and is the fundamental sin. Faith and hope go out to Christ, who alone has fulfilled the law, and was crucified for us; so that we can say, "Thou art my righteousness, but I am thy sin" (es justitia mea, ego autem sum peccatum tuum).

Luther was not aware that his beliefs were in conflict with the opinions which at that time prevailed in the Church. In opposition to the then custom, he called upon the bishops to recognize preaching as the principal duty of their office; and held that the sermon ought to be free from expressions of human opinion, legendary stories, and the like, and should go beyond the department of morals and works, to that of faith and imputed righteousness. The thought never occurred to him that his views were in accord with those of the Church; and the idea had not yet crossed his mind of doubting its supreme authority. Nothing is more striking than his utter failure to observe that he was holding views contrary to those of the Church, and even of Augustine and the mystics. This fact is a sort of evidence that it was not a spirit of negation and simple critical reflection, but a spirit of positive and private thought, which produced his views.
LUTHER.

Luther's writings of this period, in which these views are expressed, are a volume of Sermons (1516), which the author wrote down in Latin, an Introduction to the German Theology (1518), an Exposition of the Seven Penitential Psalms (his first German work), the Our Father (1517), and Sermons on the Decalogue (1518). His letters also admit us into the state of his mind. Compare Hering: D. Mystik Luthers, 1876.

It was the sale of indulgences in the vicinity of Wittenberg, by Tetzel, under the commission of the Archbishop of Mainz, which formed the occasion for Luther's first conflict with the Church; not, as he thought, against the Church, but for its honor. He began by warning against the abuse of indulgences, at the confessional and from the pulpit. He next embodied his opposition in Letters to the Magnates of the Church, at least to the Bishop of Brandenburg and the Archbishop of Mainz. With the letter to the latter, he sent the ninety-five theses with which he opened the battle with Tetzel, nailing them, on Oct. 31, 1517, to the door of the Schloßkirche (Castle Church) at Wittenberg. They contained what his sermons had already taught; namely, that Jesus' call to repentance demands that the whole life shall be an act of repentance, and that the Pope's indulgence cannot remove the guilt of the smallest transgression: it can only pardon for the time being, to bring him into an introversion in the state of his mind. Compare Hering: D. Mystik Luthers, 1876.

What Luther was led by an irrepressible conviction to speak out, met with a favor in Germany of which he had not had the slightest presumption. The theses went through the entire land in fourteen days, for everybody complained about the indulgences; and while all the bishops and doctors were silent, and no one was found to bell the cat, it was noise about that one Luther had at last attempted the task." Luther was driven to further utterances by the attacks of Tetzel, the Dominican Priester, the Ingolstadt chancellor John Eck, and Hoogstraten. He answered all four tracts, of which the most celebrated is the one against Eck, — Asterisci advers. obelisc. Ecci. His most important work on the question of the indulgences was his Resoluciones disputationum de indulgentiarum virtute, 1518. Two new questions were suggested to him in this controversy; namely, that the efficacy of the invocation of saints and purgatory, he boldly asserts that he cannot believe that an indulgence affects the condition of the soul in purgatory. He, however, felt no longer bound by his promise of silence, when Eck challenged his colleague, Karlstadt, to a disputation to be held in Leipzig. Exposing part of his theology, he wrote against Eck from June 27 to July 18, 1519. (Compare Seidelmann: D. Leipziger Disputation, 1845, art. Eck.) Eck sought to prove, from Luther's own confession, that he had fallen away from the church. Luther, on the other hand, expressed himself with boldness, denying the divine right of the Pope as primate, and affirming that the power of the keys was intrusted, not to an individual, but to the Church; that is, the body of believers. Hus's, or rather Augustine's, words were true, that there is one holy and universal Church, which is the totality of the elect (pseudestinatum universalis): hence the Greek Church was not heretical. Further: he affirmed, that among the clauses which the Council of Constance at the trial of Hus condemned as heretical were those that were genuinely evangelical. Thus he denied the infallibility of general councils.

The Reformer is described at this time as having been very limpid, on account of study, fertile in words and illustrations in his sermons, and cheerful and friendly in his intercourse. In debate he displayed a wonderful freshness and vigor, fearless, and also a rude vehemence, which he did not succeed in suppressing. In 1519 he published his university lectures on Galatians, in his smaller Commentary, and a work on the Psalms (Operationes in Psalmos).

His fame had grown wonderfully, and multitudes of students flocked to Wittenberg to hear him. He entered into correspondence with, and received deputations from, the Utraquists of Bohemia, and from Italy. The Humanists, too, began to show him their sympathy. Melanchthon, a young representative of this tendency, stood at his side from 1518 on. Luther wrote to Reuchlin; and in a letter to Erasmus, under date of March 28, 1516, he expressed his esteem for that scholar. Primarily upon the Utraquists he had to seek their protection; and Franz of Sickingen and Silvester of Schauenberg offered him a place of safety in their castles. In this condition of affairs Luther sent forth an appeal to the Christian noblemen of Germany, August, 1520 (An den christl. Adel deutscher Nation), urging them... as laymen to take up the work of ecclesiastical reformation, which the Pope had refused, and advocating the suppression of conventual establishments for nuns, the abolition of the interdict and the ban, the recognition of the independency of the Pope, the doctrine of transubstantiation, etc. The tract De Captivitate Babylon. (“The Babylonish Captivity,” that is, under the Papacy), which appeared about this time, expressed the Reformer’s views on the sacraments, only three of which he retained,—the Lord’s Supper, baptism, and repentance,—and in the strict sense only two. He denied transubstantiation, and the sacrifice of the mass, and baptismal regeneration. The prominent features of the plan of salvation and the Christian life were brought out in the work, Von der Freiheit e. Christenmannes (“The Freedom of a Christian Man”). He emphasized personal union with Christ, in whom we are justified by the instrumentality of the Word and faith. These three works may be fitly denominated as the most important ones for the progress of the Reformation, from his pen.

On Sept. 21 Eck appeared in Meissen, with the papal bull; but Luther retorted by burning (Dec. 12) the papal bull and decreetals at Wittenberg. He justified this action in the tracts, Warum den Papstes u. seiner Jünger Bücher verbrannt sind (“Why the Books of the Pope and his Disciples were burned”), and Assertio omnium articulorum, etc. The ban was the last resort of the papal court; but the emperor (Charles V.) did not feel free to execute it, and Luther was invited to appear before the princes of the empire at Worms. He awaited the result of the diet with composure of mind, carrying on in the interval controversies with Emser [“the scribbler of Dresden”] and others. He journeyed towards the city, trusting in God, and defying the Devil. The only matter which concerned him was the victory of the truth, refusing any compromise with the princes, who would gladly have taken this occasion to get redress for some of their grievances against the Pope. The first (April 17, 1521) and last question put to him was whether he was willing to renounce his writings. After a day’s consideration, he answered in the negative, but expressed his willingness to renounce them if they were shown to contain errors. His final answer to their reiterated demands was, “I shall not be convinced, except by the TESTIMONY OF THE SCRIPTURES, or plain reason; for I believe neither the pope nor councils alone, as it is manifest that they have often erred and contradicted themselves. . . . I am not able to recall, nor do I wish to recall, any thing; for it is neither safe nor honest to do anything against conscience. Here I stand, I cannot do otherwise. God help me. Amen!” (Hier stehe ich, ich kann nicht anders; Gott helf mir, Amen.) In vain were all endeavors, in public and by a private commission of the Archbishop of Treves, to move him; and his insistence upon the article condemned by the council was, “I shall not be moved, nor shall I yield my conscience.”

Luther left the Wartburg in March, unable longer to bear the retirement. Arriving at Wittenberg on the 7th, he preached eight sermons in succession on the duties of love, order, and moderation; and the Zwickauer prophets shook the dust from their feet as they left the city. Luther made public in 1523 a new order of service (Formula missae et communiones), in which he took notice of the scruples of the weaker brethren. A subject in which he took a great interest was the revival of German devotional song; and in 1524 the first Wittenberg hymn-book appeared, with four hymns by Luther himself. About this time Duke George of Saxony forbade the circulation of Luther’s writings. This formed the occasion for the Reformer’s work upon the extent to which obedience is due to the civil authorities (Schrift über d. weltliche Obrigkeit, wie weit man ihr Gehorsam schuldig sei). He admits their supreme jurisdiction over the temporal affairs of men, and, as it is necessary to be ruled by civil laws, the punishment of the laws forbidding the circulation of evangelical writings, but to disobey them. He denied to them the right of making laws for the spiritual concerns of man, or to compel conformity in matters of faith. At a later period he advocated the protection of the reformed Church by the civil power. He also entered into a controversy with Henry VIII. of England, who had answered his book on the sacraments (De Capitatio Babylon.), and wrote a work (Contra Henricum Regem) in which he displays all his rudeness of temper. But in 1525 he showed his kindness of disposition by a request to the king for forgiveness, which was as humble as it was unsuccessful.

The most important event in Luther's conflict with Catholicism, his difference with Erasmus, now occurred. They had been on intimate terms; but Erasmus had long since taken offence at Luther's bluntness, as Luther had taken offence at his ignorance of the method of divine grace, and lack of positiveness and courage. In 1525 Erasmus put forward against Luther a work advocating the freedom of the will (De libero arbitrio), which, after long delay, Luther answered (1525) in his De servo arbitrio, in which he insists upon the impotence of the will. He teaches that God, who knows all things, has predestinated all things, and those who are lost are lost in conformity with his predestination. If it be objected that he is able to, and yet does not, change the will of the wicked, it must be answered that what he does is right, and the reasons for his acting or not acting belong to the mysteries of his Majesty. This is the highest stage of faith, to believe that he is clement who saves so few, and just, who makes us damnable (capable of condemnation) of his own will (sua voluntas nos damnabiles facit). Free-will can be predicated of God alone, and man's will is in all things subject to and ruled by the will of God. Luther desired to have these hard-sounding doctrines made public, but warned against attempts to scrutinize the hidden will of God, and urged implicit trust in his revealed Word.

Luther now had to contend principally against the spirit of false freedom, a foe which was making itself felt more and more in the Church. Karlstadt represented this spirit, and denied the presence of Christ's body in the Lord's Supper, and departed, refusing the right to the sacrament of baptism is noticed in the Taufbiichlein (1523, 1527). The first evangelical ordination occurred at Wittenberg, in May, 1525. The discipline of the church was now perfected, and the rights and duties of the church authorities defined. They were not to compel any one to accept the faith, or frequent the services of religion, but to put down external offences. He advocated a spiritual supervision or episcopacy, which was to reside in a higher class of officers. The princes were to appoint them, and they were to institute a system of visitation for the churches. Such visitation was made between 1527 and 1529; and, as one of the results of Luther's personal observation, he wrote his two catechisms (1529).

The meaning and nature of the Lord's Supper had become the occasion of much discussion and extensive differences between the Reformers and their followers. Luther had already written against Karlstadt; and he now discovered that Zwingli, Leo Jude, and Ecolampadius also denied the real presence of the body of Christ. He hastily identified the views of the latter with those of the former, and opposed them with passionate warmth, which rose to vehemence; and imagined he detected in these "sacramentarian fanatics" the revolutionary spirit of Munzer. In 1526 he wrote against Ecolampadius, in his Preface to the Syngnma Suevicum, and also put forth a sermon against the fanatics, a larger work, in 1527 (Dass diese Worte... noch feststehen), and, in answer to the friendly letters of Zwingli and Ecolampadius, another in 1528 (Vom Abendmahl Christi, Bekennniss). He met Zwingli and Ecolampadius at Marburg, at the suggestion of Philip of Hesse, Oct. 1-3, 1529, came to an unexpected agreement with them on all points except the Lord's Supper, and departed, refusing the right hand of fellowship, although he promised them love and peace. He held, that, although the bread and wine were not changed into the body and blood of Christ, Christ's body was literally present; and he appealed to the simple words of institutions. "This is my body." He, however, constantly affirmed that the mere bread had no virtue, and that it is only by faith that we get a blessing.
LUTHER.

1367.

LUTHER.

This disagreement with the two Swiss Reformers was permanent, and endangered the future of the whole movement of the Reformation. It was in this anxious condition of affairs that the princes met the emperor in 1530 at Augsburg. This conference was to define finally the attitude of the empire to Protestantism. Luther, left behind by his elector, watched the progress of the assembly from Coburg. The Confession, however, which was presented at Augsburg, was written out by Melanchthon, but was the result of previous labors, in which Luther took part. Its articles, however, were not strong and positive enough to suit him; and, when the purpose of the moderate party (Melanchthon) was defeated, he could not suppress the remark that Satan felt that his apostasy, Leizetoriam (verum optimum), the articles on purgatory, the worship of saints, and, especially Antichrist the Pope." He suspected Melanchthon of the spirit of over-compromise, and became impatient at his delays to write, but did not obtrude his own opinions. On the other hand, he gave up all hope and desire of a reconciliation, which was impossible "unless the Pope was willing that the Papacy should be abolished." In this whole matter of the doctrinal dissent of the Reformation and the Papacy, Luther saw far deeper than Melanchthon. The emperor, threatened by the Turks from without, and for other reasons, did not proceed against the Protestants, who had entered, for mutual protection, into the Smalcald League. It had been Luther's principle that all disobedience to the imperial power in civil concerns was unjustifiable. From this position he did not, even in this emergency, retreat, but had recourse to the jurists, who held that the emperor was to be obeyed only as he followed the precedent of law, or, as they expressed it, the "emperor in his laws" was to be obeyed. This satisfied Luther's mind; and in 1531 he preached and published a sermon (Warnung an die lieben Deutschen) advanced on certain circumstances and appealing to the authorities in the department of jurisprudence.

The Pope still expressed himself as willing to convene a general council, and despatched the legate Vergerius, who met with Luther at Wittenberg. The Reformer doubted the Pope's sincerity; but, commissioned by the elector, he wrote out articles for the council, affirming that the Pope was the "veritable Endchirst (Endchrist), or Antichrist," and demanding that he should renounce his pretensions. The council was, of course, never held. Luther expressed his general judgment of councils in his Commentaries on Genesis (1523—24) and Leviticus, Lectures on Deuteronomy (1529), Commentary on the Psalmus, Lectures on Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Nahum, Malachi, Isaiah (1527), all in Latin; and on Habakkuk, Jonah (1528), Zechariah (1528), Ezekiel xxxviii., xxxix., and Daniel (1530), in German; again on Hosea, Micah, and Joel (after 1530), in Latin; and on Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon (1526—27). In the department of the New Testament we may mention his Sermons on 1 Peter (1528), 2 Peter and Jude (1524), Acts xv., xvi (1528); Lectures on 1 John, Titus, and 1 Timothy and 2 Timothy (1527); Sermons on John xvii. sq. (1528, 1529); again on 1 John (1530), on Matthew v.—vii. and John vi.—viii. (1529—32); Latin Lectures on Galatians (1531); and large Commentary (1585), etc. Luther continued to preach in the city church at Wittenberg, even after Bugenhagen had become pastor.

We would be mistaken if we were to imagine, that, as Luther's end drew near, he looked back with complete satisfaction upon the previous years of his life as a period which had witnessed the restoration of a perfect church fabric. On the contrary, while he thanked God for grace in the past, he felt very deeply the inutterable hostility of the world to the gospel, and looked forward, in anticipation, to severe trials and judgments for the church. The state of the world seemed to him to resemble its condition before the flood, or just before the fall of Jerusalem. He was indignant at the immorality of Wittenberg; and while on a journey, in the summer of 1545, he threatened not to return to circumstances for the world wanted to have the Devil for its god. Here we may mention his attitude towards the second marriage of Philip of Hesse. This prince, loving another woman than his wife, secured the marriage through the intervention of the emperor, and in 1537 wrote a friendly letter to the mayor of Basel, expressing the hope that the disturbed waters might settle themselves. In a letter (1538) to Bullinger he affirmed, that, ever since the Marburg Conference, he had looked upon Zwingli as a most excellent man (virum optimum). Luther showed his conciliatory temper more conspicuously in his recognition of the Bohemian Brethren, writing a Preface for the Defence of their faith, which they presented to George of Brandenburg in 1538, and another Preface, in 1538, for the Confession which they presented to King Ferdinand.

Within the limits of his own church, Luther's chief activity never lay in organization, but in the preaching and exposition of the Word. Under the head of expository writings we may mention his Sermons on Genesis (1529—34) and Leviticus, Lectures on Deuteronomy (1529), Commentary on the Psalmus, Lectures on Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Nahum, Malachi, Isaiah (1527), all in Latin; and on Habakkuk, Jonah (1528), Zechariah (1528), Ezekiel xxxviii., xxxix., and Daniel (1530), in German; again on Hosea, Micah, and Joel (after 1530), in Latin; and on Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon (1526—27). In the department of the New Testament we may mention his Sermons on 1 Peter (1528), 2 Peter and Jude (1524), Acts xv., xvi (1528); Lectures on 1 John, Titus, and 1 Timothy and 2 Timothy (1527); Sermons on John xvii. sq. (1528, 1529); again on 1 John (1530), on Matthew v.—vii. and John vi.—viii. (1529—32); Latin Lectures on Galatians (1531); and large Commentary (1585), etc. Luther continued to preach in the city church at Wittenberg, even after Bugenhagen had become pastor.

We would be mistaken if we were to imagine, that, as Luther's end drew near, he looked back with complete satisfaction upon the previous years of his life as a period which had witnessed the restoration of a perfect church fabric. On the contrary, while he thanked God for grace in the past, he felt very deeply the inutterable hostility of the world to the gospel, and looked forward, in anticipation, to severe trials and judgments for the church. The state of the world seemed to him to resemble its condition before the flood, or just before the fall of Jerusalem. He was indignant at the immorality of Wittenberg; and while on a journey, in the summer of 1545, he threatened not to return to circumstances for the world wanted to have the Devil for its god. Here we may mention his attitude towards the second marriage of Philip of Hesse. This prince, loving another woman than his wife, secured the marriage through the intervention of the emperor, and in 1537 wrote a friendly letter to the mayor of Basel, expressing the hope that the disturbed waters might settle themselves. In a letter (1538) to Bullinger he affirmed, that, ever since the Marburg Conference, he had looked upon Zwingli as a most excellent man (virum optimum). Luther showed his conciliatory temper more conspicuously in his recognition of the Bohemian Brethren, writing a Preface for the Defence of their faith, which they presented to George of Brandenburg in 1538, and another Preface, in 1538, for the Confession which they presented to King Ferdinand.

Within the limits of his own church, Luther's chief activity never lay in organization, but in the preaching and exposition of the Word. Under the head of expository writings we may mention his Sermons on Genesis (1529—34) and Leviticus, Lectures on Deuteronomy (1529), Commentary on the Psalmus, Lectures on Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Nahum, Malachi, Isaiah (1527), all in Latin; and on Habakkuk, Jonah (1528), Zechariah (1528), Ezekiel xxxviii., xxxix., and Daniel (1530), in German; again on Hosea, Micah, and Joel (after 1530), in Latin; and on Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon (1526—27). In the department of the New Testament we may mention his Sermons on 1 Peter (1528), 2 Peter and Jude (1524), Acts xv., xvi (1528); Lectures on 1 John, Titus, and 1 Timothy and 2 Timothy (1527); Sermons on John xvii. sq. (1528, 1529); again on 1 John (1530), on Matthew v.—vii. and John vi.—viii. (1529—32); Latin Lectures on Galatians (1531); and large Commentary (1585), etc. Luther continued to preach in the city church at Wittenberg, even after Bugenhagen had become pastor.

We would be mistaken if we were to imagine, that, as Luther's end drew near, he looked back with complete satisfaction upon the previous years of his life as a period which had witnessed the restoration of a perfect church fabric. On the contrary, while he thanked God for grace in the past, he felt very deeply the inutterable hostility of the world to the gospel, and looked forward, in anticipation, to severe trials and judgments for the church. The state of the world seemed to him to resemble its condition before the flood, or just before the fall of Jerusalem. He was indignant at the immorality of Wittenberg; and while on a journey, in the summer of 1545, he threatened not to return to circumstances for the world wanted to have the Devil for its god. Here we may mention his attitude towards the second marriage of Philip of Hesse. This prince, loving another woman than his wife, secured the marriage through the intervention of the emperor, and in 1537 wrote a friendly letter to the mayor of Basel, expressing the hope that the disturbed waters might settle themselves. In a letter (1538)
Catholic and Protestant churches in 1540. But Luther doubted whether they enjoyed the favor of God; nor could he sympathize with Melanchthon in his endeavors to unite the different Protestant churches by a skilful tempering of words, and he never ceased to warn against the doctrines of Zwingli in his writings, by what he considered compromises of the truth, to speak out in a Short Confession of the Sacrament (1544), in which he utters himself more warmly than ever before against the “sacramentarian fanatics.” Notwithstanding this vehemence, he did have the feeling of the unity of Christian brotherhood.

On Jan. 23, 1546, he went by invitation to his birthplace, Eisleben, to arbitrate a dispute between some counts. His mission was successful; but as he retired, on Feb. 17, he felt a pressure on his chest. Surrounding by friends, he repeated the words of Ps. xxx. 5 (“Into thy hand I commit my spirit”), and died quietly. His remains were interred in the Schlosskirche at Wittenberg.

Luther's doctrinal views have already been indicated. But it must not be forgotten that he does not write as a theologian, in the strict sense, although he utters himself more warmly than ever before against the “sacramentarian fanatics.” Notwithstanding this vehemence, he did have the feeling of the unity of Christian brotherhood.

On Jan. 23, 1546, he went by invitation to his birthplace, Eisleben, to arbitrate a dispute between some counts. His mission was successful; but as he retired, on Feb. 17, he felt a pressure on his chest. Surrounding by friends, he repeated the words of Ps. xxx. 5 (“Into thy hand I commit my spirit”), and died quietly. His remains were interred in the Schlosskirche at Wittenberg.

Luther's doctrinal views have already been indicated. But it must not be forgotten that he does not write as a theologian, in the strict sense, although he utters himself more warmly than ever before against the “sacramentarian fanatics.” Notwithstanding this vehemence, he did have the feeling of the unity of Christian brotherhood.

On Jan. 23, 1546, he went by invitation to his birthplace, Eisleben, to arbitrate a dispute between some counts. His mission was successful; but as he retired, on Feb. 17, he felt a pressure on his chest. Surrounding by friends, he repeated the words of Ps. xxx. 5 (“Into thy hand I commit my spirit”), and died quietly. His remains were interred in the Schlosskirche at Wittenberg.

Luther's doctrinal views have already been indicated. But it must not be forgotten that he does not write as a theologian, in the strict sense, although he utters himself more warmly than ever before against the “sacramentarian fanatics.” Notwithstanding this vehemence, he did have the feeling of the unity of Christian brotherhood.

On Jan. 23, 1546, he went by invitation to his birthplace, Eisleben, to arbitrate a dispute between some counts. His mission was successful; but as he retired, on Feb. 17, he felt a pressure on his chest. Surrounding by friends, he repeated the words of Ps. xxx. 5 (“Into thy hand I commit my spirit”), and died quietly. His remains were interred in the Schlosskirche at Wittenberg.

Luther's doctrinal views have already been indicated. But it must not be forgotten that he does not write as a theologian, in the strict sense, although he utters himself more warmly than ever before against the “sacramentarian fanatics.” Notwithstanding this vehemence, he did have the feeling of the unity of Christian brotherhood.
nature and fact, for whom these centuries, and many that are to come yet, will be thankful to Heaven.”

Luther’s hymns deserve a special mention. He not only restored sacred song to the church, but was himself a hymn-writer. The greatest of his hymns is Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, written in 1529, upon the basis of Psalm CXLVI. Miss Catherine Winkworth, Carlyle, and others, have rendered it into English. Carlyle’s translation—“A safe stronghold our God is still”—has succeeded best in retaining the tone of the original. This hymn is Luther in song. It is pitched in the very key of the man. Rugged and majestic, trustful in God, and confident, it was the defiant trumpet-blast of the Reformation, speaking out, to the powers in the earth and under the earth, an all-conquering conviction of divine vocation and empowerment. The world has many sacred songs of exquisite tenderness and unalterable trust, and also some bold and awe-inspiring lyrics, like Dies irae; but this one of Luther’s is matchless for its warlike tone, its rugged strength, and martial-inspiring ring.

Luther’s Collected Works have appeared in six editions,—at Wittenberg (1558), in 12 German and 8 Latin vols.; Jena (1555—58), in 8 German and 5 Latin vols. (2 additional vols. appearing in Eisleben, 1564—65); Altenburg (1661—64), in 10 German vols. (1 additional vol., Halle, 1702); Leipzig (1729—40), in 23 German vols.; Halle (1740—53), in 24 German vols.; Erlangen and Erfurt (1826—73), in 67 German (complete) and 35 Latin vols. In this edition the oldest texts have been consulted. It is the best. De Wette and Seidelmann have edited Luther’s Letters, in 6 vols. (1825—56); Forstemann and Bindseil, his Table-Talk, in 4 vols. (1844—45); and Bindseil, his Colloquia, in 3 vols. (1805—08). A worthy edition of Luther’s complete works has just been made possible by the munificent liberality of the Prussian Government. For the rich literature on Luther’s life, see Vogel: Biblioth. biograph. Lutherana, 1851. Amongst the many biographies, that of Meurer (3d ed., Dresden, 1870) has the advantage that it draws directly from Luther’s letter-books. That of J. Köstlin, published down to 1517 (3 vols., Leipzig, 1846—47), is very rich and full, but lacks definiteness and point. The work of J. Köstlin—Martin Luther’s Leben. u. s. Schriften, Elberfeld, 1875, 2 vols. (and by the same, Luther’s Leben, Leipzig, 1892, 1 vol.)—may be termed the first attempt to use the existing material [and is the best biography]. See also Köstlin: Luther’s Theologe, etc., Stuttgart, 1863, 2 vols.; Lommatzsch: Luther’s Lehre v. ethisch religiösem Standpunkte aus, Berlin, 1879. [Other lives of Luther, by Melanchthon (Latin, 1546), Matthaei (Latin, 1713), Schlösser (1737), Keil (1740), Ubert (1817), Stange (1835), Peters (1836; Eng. trans., London, 1840), König and GELZER (1853; Eng. trans. by Hare and Miss Winkworth, New York, 1857), AUDIN (Paris, 1888. 3 vols.; Eng. trans., 1841), BARNAS SEARS (ed., 1850), TULLOCH (in his Leaders of the Reformation, 1836), BALDWIN (1883). See also CARLYLE: Martin Luther, in Heroes and Hero Worship; FOUREC: Erasmus and Luther, in Short Essays on Great Subjects; AUGUST BAUR: M. Luther, Tubingen, 1878; HERRING: D. Mystik Luthers, Leipzig, 1879; RIESCH: M. Luther u. Ignatius v. Loyola, Wittenberg, 1879; FASTENRATH: Luther im Spiegel spanischer Poesie, Leipzig, 2d edition, 1881; HASACK: Dr. M. Luther u. d. religiöse Literatur seiner Zeit bis zum J., 1850, Regensburg, 1881. The best vindication of Luther in the English language is by Archdeacon HARE, in a long note to his MPS. and SERMONS, New York, 1829; Commentary on Galatians, London, 1838; Select Treatises (by BARNAS SEARS), Andover, 1846, Table-Talk (by WILLIAM HAZLITT), London, 1837; The Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude (by E. H. GILLETTE), New York, 1859.]

LUTHER’S TWO CATECHISMS—The Catechisms of Luther, however, are not the first attempts of the kind. On the contrary, they had many predecessors,—by Brenz, Althammer, Lachmann, and others; but they soon took the lead. They were immediately translated into Latin (the large, by Lonicer in May, and by Obobopus in July; the small, by Sauromann in September); and the latter soon became an almost symbolical book in the Lutheran churches. It was written after the large one, and is, indeed, the ripe fruit of many exertions, the full expression after many trials. It is said to be, next to the Bible, the most extensively used book ever written. It consists of (I.) The Ten Commandments, (II.) The Creed, (III.) The Lord’s Prayer, (IV.) The Sacrament of Holy Baptism, and (V.) The Sacrament of the Altar, translated in the editions since 1564, a sixth part, Confession and Absolution, or the Power of the Keys, whose precise authorship is a little uncertain, though substantially it dates from Luther himself, and is LUTHERAN CHURCH. In Europe. It is the oldest, and probably the largest also, of the evangelical denominations which sprang from the Ref-oration of the sixteenth century. It was called after the great leader of the German Reformation (first, in derision, by Roman Catholics, then by the followers of Luther, although he himself protested against a sectarian use of his name).
Its usual title is "Evangelical Lutheran Church;"
"evangelical" being the name; "Lutheran," the surname. In Prussia, and other countries of Germany where the union between Lutherans and Reformed has been introduced (since 1817), the name "Lutheran" has been abandoned, as a church title, for "Evangelical," or "Evangelical United" (evangelisch-uniter). It has its home in Germany (where it outnumbers all other Protestant denominations), and in Scandinavia (Denmark, Sweden, Norway), where it is the established, or national church: it extends to the Baltic Prov-ces of Russia, and follows the German emigration and the German language to other countries, especially to the United States, where it is now one of the most numerous denominations. (See next article.) Its total (nominal) membership, including the Lutherans in the union churches, is variously put down at thirty millions (by Holtz-mann and Zopfie, in Lexikon für Theol. und Kirchenwesen, 1882, p. 458) and at forty millions
(by Dr. Krauth, in Johnson's Cyclopedia, iii. 158).

I. HISTORY. — It may be divided into five periods. (1) The pentecostal or formative period of the Reformation, from the promulgation of Luther's ninety-five theses, in 1517, to the publication of the Book of Concord, 1580. (2) The period of polemical orthodoxy, in which the doctrinal system of the church was scholastically defined and analyzed, and Calvinism, and the milder and more liberal Mel-anchthonian type of Lutheranism (as represented by Calixtus), from 1580 to about 1700. (3) The period of Pietism (Spener, d. 1705; and Francke,
d. 1727), or a revival of practical piety in conflict with dead orthodoxy, from 1689 (when Francke began his Collegia philolobica in Halle) to the middle of the eighteenth century. The Pietistic movement is analogous to the Methodist revival in the Church of England, but kept within the limits of the Lutheran state churches, and did not result in a secession. (4) The period of rationalism, which gradually invaded the universities, pulpits, and highest judicatures, and affected a complete revolution in theology and church life, to such an extent that the few Mo-ranian communities were for some time almost the only places of refuge for genuine piety in Germany. (5) The period of ecclesiastical recontion of the Thirty Years' War (1648), which began in the Holy Roman Empire, and spread to the Baltic Provinces of Russia, and the United States. The Lutheran Church acknowledges the three ecumenical creeds (the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian), which it holds in common with other orthodox churches, and, besides, six specific confessions, which separate it from other churches; notably: (1) The Augsburg Confession, drawn up by Melanchthon, and presented to the Augsburg Diet in 1530 (afterwards altered by the author in the tenth article, on the Lord's Supper, 1540). This is the fundamental and most widely accepted confession of that church, some branches acknowledge no other as binding. (2) The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, also by Melanchthon (1530). (3) and (4) Two Catechisms of Luther (1529), larger and smaller, the latter, for children and catechumens, is, next to Luther's German version of the Bible, his most useful and best known book. (5) The Articles of Smalcal, by Luther, 1537 (strongly anti-papal). (6) The Formula of Concord, prepared by six Lutheran divines (1577) for the settlement of the Melanch-thonian or synergistic, the Crypto-Calvinistic or sacramentarian, and other doctrinal controversies which agitated the Lutheran Church after the death of Luther and Melanchthon. These nine symbolical books, known as the three confessional creedswere officially published by order of Elector Augustus of Saxony, in Latin and German, at Leipzig and Dresden, in 1580, under the title Concordia, usually called The Book of Concord.
The best editions, next to the edict princeps, are by J. G. Walch (1756), J. F. Miller (1847, 3d ed.
1890); and the best English translation by Professor Henry E. Jacobs (of Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, Penn.), under the title The Book of Concord; or, the Symbolical Books of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Translated from the Orignal Languages, with Notes. Philadelphia (G. W.
Frederick), 1882 (571 pages).

Compare, on the Lutheran symbols, J. B. CAR-ZOV: Isagoge in libros Eccl. Luth. symb., Lips., 1695, etc.; J. G. WALCH: Introductio in l. Eccl.
Luth. symb., Jena, 1782; KÖLLNER: Symbolik der evangel. luth. Kirche, Hamburg, 1857; CH. P.
KRAUTH: The Symbolical Books of the Evangical church, as represented in the Augsburg Concord, etc., Philadelphia, 1871; SAMUEL SPRECHER (of the General Synod) : The Ground-work of a System of Evangelical Luth. Theology, Philadelphia, 1879 (pp. 29-46); also SCHAFF: Creeds of
LUTHERAN CHURCH.

On the three different branches of the Lutheran Church in the United States, as regards the binding authority of the symbolical books, see next article.

III. RELATION TO THE REFORMED CHURCH.—There have always been two tendencies in the Lutheran Church in its relation to the Reformed or Calvinistic churches,—one rigid and exclusive, which is represented by the Formula Concordiae, the Lutheran scholastics of the seventeenth century, and the “new Lutheran” school in Germany; the other moderate and conciliatory, represented by the altered Augsburg Confession of 1540, by Melanchthon (in his later period, after the death of Luther), Calixtus, John Arndt, Spener, Francke, Arnold, Mosheim, Bengel, the Suabian Lutherans, and those modern Lutheran divines who sympathize with the Union, and regard the differences between the two confessions as unessential, and insufficient to justify separation, and exclusion from communion at the Lord’s table. The Lutheran Church is, next to the Church of England, the most conservative of the Protestant denominations, and retained many usages and ceremonies of the middle ages which the more radical zeal of Zwingli, Calvin, and Knox threw overboard as unscriptural corruptions.

The strict Lutheran creed differs from the Reformed, or Calvinistic, in four points (as detailed in the semi-symbolical Saxon Visitations Articles of 1592); namely, (1) Baptismal regeneration, and the ordinary necessity of baptism for salvation; (2) The real presence of Christ’s body and blood “in, with, and under,” the bread and wine (during the sacramental fruition), usually called by English writers “consubstantiation,” in distinction from the Roman-Catholic “transubstantiation;” but the term is not used in the Lutheran symbols, and is rejected by the Lutheran divines, as well as the term “impanation;” body and blood are not mixed with, nor locally included in, but sacramentally and mysteriously united with the elements; (3) The communicatio idiomatum in the doctrine of Christ’s person, whereby the attributes of the divine nature are attributed to his human nature, so that ubiquity (a conditional omnipresence) is ascribed to the body of Christ, enabling it to be really and truly (though not locally and carnally) present wherever the communion is celebrated; (4) The universal vocation of all men to salvation, with the possibility of a total and final fall from grace; yet the Formula Concordiae teaches at the same time, with Luther (De servo arbitrio) the total depravity and slavery of the human will, and an unconditional predestination of the elect to everlasting life. It is, therefore, a great mistake to identify the Lutheran system with the later Arminian theory. Melanchthon’s synergism may be said to have anticipated Arminianism, but it was condemned by the Formula of Concord.

Compare also, for a merely historical statement of the system of Lutheran orthodoxy, HASE’S Hutterus Redivivus (Leipzig, 1829, 11th ed., 1868), an excellent compendium for students. Hase himself is a moderate rationalist, and gives his own views in his Lehrbuch der ev. Dogmatik, 1826, 6th ed., 1870.

The great dogmatic works of Rothe, Jul. Müller (on the doctrine of sin), and Dorner, are not confessional. The Lutheran Church of the present century is exceedingly fertile in all departments of theological science, but only a small number of modern divines adhere to the old Lutheran system.

(3) On the general difference between the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions, see GÜBEL: Die religiöse Eigen tümlichkeit der luth. und reform. Kirche, 1837; SCHNECKENBURGER: Vergleichende Darstellung des luther. und reform. Theologie (very acute and discriminating), 1855; JUL. MÜLLER: Lutherti et Calvinit sententiae de Sacra Cena inter se comparata, 1870, and other works quoted in Schäff’s Creeds of Christendom, i. 211.

IV. RITUAL AND WORSHIP.—The foundation of the ritual of the Lutheran Church was laid in the work of Luther’s reform, who at Wittenberg, 1523, and his Latin (Formula missae, 1523) and German missals (1528). It was his intention to retain all that was good in the service of the Catholic Church, while discarding all unevangelical doctrines and practices. Thus, in his Latin and German litanies (Latina litaniae correcta; Die verdeutschte Litanie), which were in use in 1529 at Wittenberg, he made certain corrections and additions. The Lutheran Church uses a liturgy. The first complete form, or Agenda, was that of the Duchy of Prussia, 1528. There is no authoritative form for the whole church. A movement was set on foot in 1817, by Frederick William III. of Prussia, to introduce a uniform Agenda; but it created intense excitement, and caused the Old Lutheran secession. The various states of Germany have their own Agenden, which differ, however, only in minor particulars. Luther introduced the use of the vernacular into the public services, restored preaching to its proper place, and insisted upon the participation of the congregation in the services, declaring “common prayer exceedingly useful and healthful” (vaide utile et salutarius). He rejected auricular confession, as practised and required in the Catholic Church, but advocated private and voluntary confession. This practice has been mostly given up. The rite of exorcism, which the Reformed churches abandoned, was retained and recommended by Luther and Melancthon. Lutheran, in 1583, was the first to propose its omission; and it has since fallen into oblivion in the Lutheran Church. The popular use of hymns was introduced by Luther, who was himself an enthusiastic singer, and by his own hymns became the father of German church hymnody, which is richer than any other. (See Hymnology.) Congregational singing continues to form one of the principal features in the public services. The great festivals of the church year—such as Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, the Days of the Twelve Apostles, etc.—are observed with religious observance. The efficient organization is continued on the 31st of October. Pictures are admitted into the churches.

V. Government. — The doctrinal development of the Lutheran Church was matured much sooner than its organization and polity. Luther was not an organizer, like Calvin, or, at a later time, John Wesley. The necessity of organization, however, was deeply felt; and in 1529 a visitation of the churches of Saxony was prosecuted, and "superintendents" appointed for the oversight of the congregations and schools. The Order of Discipline of the church in Saxony became the model for other books of discipline. The priesthood of all believers is a fundamental doctrine, and the parity of the clergy is recognized. In Sweden, when the whole country passed over to the Lutheran communion, the Catholic bishops retained their titles (including that of archbishop). The validity of the Swedish orders, from the stand-point of the Church of England, is a matter in dispute. The Danish Church likewise retains the title of "bishops." They have no claim, however, to apostolical succession. The first bishops under the new Danish regime were called "superintendents" (1530), and were consecrated by Bugenhagen. In Germany, church government is executed by consistories (composed of ministers and laymen) and superintendents. These officers are appointed by the government, examine candidates for the ministry, appoint and remove pastors, fix salaries, etc. In Germany, as in Denmark and Sweden, the Lutheran Church is under the governmental patronage of the various states; and the support of the congregations, and the construction of church edifices, are provided for out of the national revenues. The support of the clergy is by assessment, which has been composed, in part of Lutheran, and in part of Reformed members. See Richter: D. evang. Kirchenordnungen des 16ten Jahrhunderts, 2 vols., Weimar, 1846; Gesch. d. evang. Kirchenverfassung in Deutschland, Leipzig, 1851; Lehrbuch d. kathol. u. evang. Kirchenrechts (revised by Dove), Leipzig, 8th ed., 1877; LECLER: Gesch. d. protest. u. synodal. Verfassung, Leiden, 1854; HINSCHBUSCH: Kirchenrecht d. Katholiken und Protestanten in Deutschland, 3 vols., Berlin, 1868–89; THUMM: Deutsches Kirchenrecht, 2 vols., Leipzig, 1877–78; FRICK: Geschichte d. kathol. und evangel. Kirchenrechts, Leipzig, 1879. — On the general subject, see the arts. Lutheran Church by C. P. Krauth, in Johnson's Cyclopaedia, and in McClintock and Strong, v. 573 sqq.}

LUTHERAN CHURCH (the Evangelical). In the United States. — Early History. Lutherans were among the first European settlers on this continent. They multiplied in a remarkable ratio for two centuries; but for the last fifty years the progress of this church has been remarkably rapid, being promoted both by the ordinary and natural growth, and by the large and constant influx of Lutherans from Germany and Scandinavia. It now ranks third or fourth in numbers among the Protestant communities, although in national position and public influence it has not attained the eminence occupied by other denominations which in numerical strength fall much below it. This fact is due, among other causes, to the want of efficient organization and to the eminence occupied by other denominations which in numerical strength fall much below it. This fact is due, among other causes, to the want of efficient organization and to the eminence occupied by other denominations which in numerical strength fall much below it.

The earliest representatives of Lutheranism in this country came from Holland. They formed a portion of the first Dutch colony, which in 1621 took possession of the territory now comprised in the city of New York. Holding to a confession that was at variance with that of the Netherlands Reformed Church (although never sympathizing with the Arminians), these Lutherans suffered persecution from religious intolerance, which was inflicted by the local colonial government, but instigated by the ecclesiastical authorities of Amsterdam. They never enjoyed the liberty of having their own worship, or a pastor of their faith, until the establishment of British authority in 1664. The first clergyman permitted to serve them was the Rev. Jacobus Fabricius, who arrived in 1669. Their first house of worship was erected in 1671, a rude structure, which was subsequently replaced by a more substantial edifice at the corner of Broadway and Rector Streets, where worship was for a long time conducted "exclusively in the Holland and English languages," although in course of time there were considerable accessions of German and French Lutheran colonists.

The second distinct body of Lutherans arrived upon these shores from Sweden, in 1636, the result of a project long and earnestly contemplated by that illustrious Lutheran sovereign, Gustavus Adolphus. The colony settled along the Delaware. It was accompanied by a preacher named Neoror Torkillus. He was succeeded by Rev. John Campanius, who was the first Protestant missionary among the American aborigines, and who translated Luther's Catechism into their language. It was printed in Stockholm, 1696–98, and was the first publication in an Indian tongue, except John Eliot's Indian Bible, 1661–83.

Somewhat later in the same century an considerable wave of emigration came from Lutheran Germany, and gradually spread over the fertile agricultural districts of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Central New York, and afterwards as far as North Carolina. These German Lutherans proved to be but "pioneer of the nations" that soon rolled in after them." In the year 1710, thousands, whom the devastations of war and the religious oppressions under Louis XIV. compelled to flee from the Palatinate, and to seek refuge in Protestant England, were immediately, through the beneficent patronage of Queen Anne, forwarded to America, and settled along the Hudson, some sixty miles north of New York. Large tracts of land were allotted to them for the support of Lutheran ministers and parish schools, — princeely domains, from which they were subsequently cruelly defrauded by another denomination.

The Colonial Records of Pennsylvania in 1717 contain an official statement, that “great numbers of foreigners from Germany, strangers to our language and constitution, have lately been imported into the province.” Most of these were Lutherans; and the same province received in 1727 another large accession of these people from Wurtemberg, the Palatinate, Hesse-Darmstadt, and other German principalities. Another considerable colony of Lutherans, driven by remorseless persecution from Salzburg, crossed the Atlantic in 1734, and, through the liberality of the British Parliament and the friendly interest of the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge, established themselves in Georgia just after the first English settlers had taken possession there under Gen. Oglethorpe. Their first resting-place in the New World they piously named “Ebenezer.” Their descendants constitute chiefly the Evangelical Lutheran churches of Georgia and South Carolina.

The great mass of Lutherans who emigrated hither from Germany were, for the most part, unattended by clergymen. They remained, for years, destitute of the ministrations of the word and the sacraments, and the church could for a long time assume no organic form. The people, however, continued devoted to the religious principles under which they had been reared; and having brought with them their Bibles, hymn-books, and other popular manuals of devotion, and having among their number school-teachers and others who were capable of conducting religious meetings, they were wont to assemble in private houses and in barns to celebrate the worship of their church, and to nourish themselves in the faith of their fathers by observations on the Catechism, or by reading from Arndt’s True Christianity, or some other deeply spiritual work of Lutheran authorship. The pastors of the Swedish churches likewise gave them some assistance, instructing the young, and administering confirmation and the sacraments. Thus Lutheranism in this country was for a century, if not “void,” yet “without form,” and “darkness” brooded over its chaotic state. The people being widely scattered, woefully straitened in their circumstances, without houses of worship, pastoral oversight, or any church order, with no bond of union among themselves, nor any ecclesiastical connection with the fatherland, surrounded by fierce Indians and by more inhuman savages from Europe, preyed upon by crafty impostors, worthless adventurers, deposed clergymen, and other false brethren and fanatics, the Lutheran Church can hardly be regarded as having a proper history till near the middle of the eighteenth century. There was no organism. Lutherans were here, but hardly a Lutheran Church. They were like scattered sheep surrounded by wolves,—a church in the wilderness. Yet so far from losing their ancestral faith, or being alienated from the religion of their youth, these people were animated with earnest longings for “the order and fellowship of their own church.” They bewailed the moral devastation in the midst of which they were dwelling, and “sent implying letters to Holland and to Germany” for spiritual guides, for teachers to instruct their children, for books, and pecuniary contributions toward the erection of houses of worship and the maintenance of churches and schools,—appeals which were not without avail. At length those Lutherans who had organized congregations in Philadelphia, New Hanover, and New Providence (the Trappe), sent a delegation of their brethren to Europe to represent their spiritual distress, to collect funds, and especially to secure proper men for the pastoral office. They were most cordially received in London by Rev. Dr. Ziegenhagen, the Lutheran chaplain of the English court; and in Germany, then aglow with the fervor of the earlier pietism, “they met with warm hearts, and fervent prayers, and material aid everywhere.” This was in 1738. Earnest and judicious search was made for a man who combined the peculiar qualifications of spirit, mind, and body, indispensable for the arduous work and the appalling obstacles that must be encountered in planting the Lutheran Church on American soil. After the efforts of years, the very man was found whom Providence had singled out and fitted for this great undertaking; and in the year 1742 he came to this country,—an answer to the supplications long sent up to Heaven, as well as to those carried beyond the sea. This was Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, a man of marvellous intellectual and moral power, a born leader and apostle, a heaven-ordained bishop. His arrival on these shores marks an epoch in the Lutheran Church. His herculean and far-seeing labors constitute the era of its foundation. His immortal services merit for him the title of “Patriarch of the American Lutheran Church.”

Contemporaneous with Wesley, Whitefield, and Edwards, and imbued with the spirit of churchly pietism which he had imbibed at the university of Halle, Muhlenberg entered upon the stupendous task providentially assigned to him. His whole course was marked by apostolical wisdom and zeal, and by an almost superhuman resolution and fortitude. He fought his great battle for several years absolutely alone, without a colleague, without a friend, indefatigably occupied on the Lord’s Day in preaching, and during the week in teaching school, catechising publicly and in families, visiting from house to house, anxiously solicitous for the spiritual condition of all his parishioners, and exercising a paternal supervision and a powerful influence over the whole Lutheran population in this country. His labors were followed by genuine and extraordinary success. A worthy colleague and two assistants from the fatherland in a little while joined him, and there prevailed a general awakening through all the region surrounding their labors. Men were everywhere hungering for the gospel in their native tongue. Importunate and availing entreaties were sent abroad for more ministers of the Word; new congregations were organized, churches and schoolhouses erected; strict ecclesiastical discipline was enforced; and the earnestness and abounding prayer of pious and learned people was reflected in the church which had been raised. The first association of Lutheran ministers and churches was organized in Philadelphia, in the year 1748, under the title of the "German Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania." It consisted of six ordained ministers, and an almost equal number of lay representatives from the congregations. Its meetings were annual, and "were attended with the most beneficial results." Similar bodies were subsequently formed, — the Ministerium of New York in 1785, the Synod of North Carolina in 1803, the Synod of Ohio and Adjacent States in 1803, and the Synod of Maryland and Virginia in 1819. These associations, which greatly promoted ecclesiastical prosperity in their respective territories, were geographically remote from each other, destitute of any bond of union or fellowship connecting them together, and without that mutual consultation, co-operation, and intercourse, so necessary to the general vocation and work of the church.

LUTHERAN CHURCH.

At length a spirit of enlightened activity was awakened; and an agitation for bringing these disconnected bodies into closer fellowship and greater efficiency resulted, in 1820, in the establishment of the General Synod, — an association with which all the synods, except that of Ohio, united, and which represented at the time a hundred and thirty-five preachers and thirty-three thousand communicants. The formation of the General Synod marks a second epoch in the Lutheran Church. Although but advisory in its functions, and purely negative on doctrinal tests, it became at once a rallying and a radiating centre, and gave a powerful impulse to ecclesiastical enterprise, organization, and development, not only among the Lutherans embraced within its bounds, but also among those who declined to unite with it. From this time, dates the successful establishment of theological seminaries, the founding of colleges, the formation of missionary societies and other benevolent agencies for the extension of Christ's kingdom. Remarkable prosperity and growth succeeded; so that the denomination, which in 1820 numbered less than 150 ministers, reached in 1893 a total of 1,365 ministers, 2,575 congregations, and about 300,000 communicants. At the time of its organization the constitution of the General Synod was absolutely silent on confessional subscription. It subsequently adopted a substantial recognition of the Augsburg Confession by requiring of the synods applying for admission subscription to the "fundamental doctrines of Scripture as taught, in a manner substantially correct, in the doctrinal articles of the Augsburg Confession," "with acknowledged deviation in minor or non-fundamental points." At the session of the General Synod at York, Penn., in 1854, this was made the basis of recognition of "the Augsburg Confession as a correct exhibition of the fundamental doctrines of the divine word, and of the faith of our church founded upon that word." The earlier attitude of this body towards the symbols of the Lutheran Church was also regarded by some as too indefinite, and as altogether inadequate for a Lutheran association. It proved one of the main causes which kept a number of synods aloof from the General Synod, and inspired their assaults upon it for disloyalty to the distinguishing doctrines of the church; and it confessedly tolerated teachings and practices which were at variance with historic Lutheranism, and which assimilated the church of the Synod to denominations against which it had contended for centuries.

With a growing conservatisn in the heart of the General Synod, a strong re-action against measures and worship not deemed in accordance with the confessions of the Church, and a fuller acquaintance among the English portion with its history and doctrines, there gradually arose a decided tendency to a stricter avowal of the Lutheran faith, and a fuller conformity to Lutheran principles and usages. A spirit of restless agitation and ecclesiastical discussion nurtured by personal and partisan contentions and by national jealousies, united to develop this tendency into a party, many of whose representatives were animated with the hope, that, by the pronounced adoption of all the Lutheran symbols, all those jealousies, helped to develop this tendency into a decided tendency to a stricter avowal of the one large, homogeneous, and powerful organiza party, many of whose representatives were ani mated with the hope, that, by the pronounced adoption of all the Lutheran symbols, all those independent synods whose one common trait was the cry for pure Lutheranism and the condemnation of the General Synod, might be gathered into one large, homogeneous, and powerful organization, which should realize the prospects, and fulfill the mission, of the Lutheran Church in America. A crisis arrived in 1864, when the Franckean Synod of New York, a body charged with grave unsoundness in Lutheran doctrine, was admitted into the General Synod, then assembled at York, Penn. A protest was presented against this action. The delegation of the Pennsylvania Ministerium withdrew. Violent controversies ensued. Other synods seceded from the general body, and several more were dismembered when the issue came before them of adhering to or separating from it.

This partial disruption of the General Synod, which, however, did not alienate from it all who heartily held the doctrines peculiar to the Lutheran Church, was followed by the organization of constitutions for congregations, and especial the question of pulpit and altar fellowship with those outside the bounds of true Lutheranism; while missionary and educational agencies have been left mostly to the individual synods connected with the council.

By this time, having the absolute declaration of its Lutheran faith by the General Council, several of the largest synods, composed almost entirely of Europeans, refused an alliance with it; and four synods which took part in its formation withdrew from it at an early period. This unfriendly atti
WORSHIP. — In cultus the Lutheran Church of the United States, as throughout the world, holds it to be unnecessary "that the same human traditions— that is, rites and ceremonies instituted by men—should be everywhere observed;" and entire liberty is allowed in the ordering of public worship. The earlier congregations continued the usage, universal in the European Lutheran churches, of a moderate liturgical service combined with extemporaneous prayers. At a later period, and especially within the yale of the General Synod, the use of prescribed forms disappeared almost entirely; and for a long time the services in the Lutheran Church conformed to the prevalent extemporaneous practices of the dominant churches around it. But, with the growing tendency toward a Lutheran self-consciousness, there has likewise arisen a wide-spread and increasing desire for the inspiring formulas of prayer and praise which are interwoven with the best period of Lutheran church-life, and which conduces to the highest spiritual worship of the congregation. The sacred forms of the ancient liturgies are regularly employed at the services of the General Synod; and the latter body recently adopted, along with the other general bodies, a common order of English service, arranged according to the consensus of the pure Lutheran liturgies of the 16th century. The general prayer is, as a rule, extemporaneous; and the sermon, in all Lutheran churches, holds the central place.

POLITY. — The American Lutherans claim, in accordance with Apol. Conf., art. XIV., that the Scriptures prescribe "no specific form of government and discipline for Christ's Church." Organization has never been a distinguishing glory of Lutheranism. The government that has generally prevailed in this country is a blending of certain principles adopted by the Congregationalists, with others that are recognized as Presbyterian. Three judicatories are acknowledged,—the council of each individual congregation; the district synod, composed of all the ministers, and one lay representative from each congregation within its bounds; and the general body, whose powers are mostly of an advisory nature, the final decision resting in all cases with the congregation. In the Synodical Conference the government is, on the one hand, strictly congregational in theory, on the other hand, really despotic in fact. When the congregation has chosen its pastor, he wields solely in his own hands the power of the keys.

Statistics for 1885.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>District Synod</th>
<th>Men's</th>
<th>Church's</th>
<th>Community's</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>General Synod</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>866</td>
<td>1,424</td>
<td>135,110</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>General Synod, South</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>139</td>
<td>233</td>
<td>18,280</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Synodical Conference</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>975</td>
<td>1,481</td>
<td>273,259</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Independent Synods</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>768</td>
<td>1,791</td>
<td>213,339</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Independent Pastors and Churches</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>3,752</td>
<td>7,077</td>
<td>903,392</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

those Lutherans who had remained in the State Church was often very unpleasant, and bitter controversies arose. Finally dissensions broke out, even within the party itself. In 1538 Diedrich, pastor of Jabel, suddenly directed a violent attack against Huschke; and in July, 1532, his partisans convened a synod at Magdeburg (the so-called Immanuel Synod), which condemned the synod of Breslau, and would have no community with its members. A similar split was caused in Saxony by the Missouri Synod. In 1847 Professor Walther from Saxony formed the synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, which proved very successful, in the United States of America. Some churches." Dr. WANGEMANN (Berlin).

congregations of Separate Lutherans, holding no ecclesiastical positions; and in every relation of communion with each other, besides several 'Free churches.' Dr. WANGEMANN (Berlin).

LY'CIA, a region of Asia Minor, stretching west to Pamphylia in the east, opposite the Island of Rhodes. After the fall of the Seleucids, it made itself independent, became very prosperous (as the ruins of its cities, Patara and Myra, testify), and exercised no small influence on Eastern politics (1 Mac. xiv. 23). Under the reign of Claudius it was conquered by the Romans, and was a Roman province when Paul visited it (Acts xxii. 1, xxvii. 5).

LY'DA, the Greek name of the Hebrew Lod, a town belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, and situated in the plain of Sharon, on the road from Joppa to Jerusalem. It is mentioned in the New Testament (Acts ix. 22) as the place in which St. Peter healed the paralytic Âneas. Under Vespasian its name was changed to Diospolis (the "city of Zeus"), but the old name seems to have prevailed. Among the bishops present at Nicea was also one from Lydda or Diospolis. But in the beginning of the sixth century the see seems to have been removed or abolished. According to legend, it was the birthplace of St. George; and Justinian built a church there in his honor. The church was afterwards burnt by the Moslems, then rebuilt by the crusaders, and finally destroyed by Saladin in 1196.

LYDIA. See LU'D.

LYDIUS is the name of a Dutch family, which, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, produced several prominent theologians. — Martin Lydius, b. in Leyden, 1530 or 1540; d. at Franeker, June 27, 1601; studied at Tubingen, and obtained the accession of the strictly Lutheran Ludwig VI., 1576, and was appointed pastor in Amsterdam in 1580, and professor at Franeker in 1585. He wrote Apologia pro Erasm. several orations, and poems. — Baithasar Lydius, b. at Umstadt, Hesse, 1576 or 1577; d. at Dort, Jan. 20, 1629; studied at Leyden, and was appointed pastor of Streetkerk in 1602, and of Dort in 1606. He wrote, besides other works, a book on the Waldenses (Waldensia), of which the first volume appeared at Rotterdam, 1616, and the second at Dort, 1617. See BAYLE: Dict., iii. 114.

LYON, Mary, founder of Mount Holyoke Female Seminary; b. in Buckland, Franklin County, Mass., Feb. 28, 1797; d. at South Hadley, Mass., March 5, 1849. After her education at Ashfield, she joined Miss Z. P. Grant (afterwards Mrs. Banister) in the Adams Female Academy at Londonderry (now Derry), N.H., 1824–28, and of Dort in 1606. He wrote, besides other works, a book on the Waldenses (Waldensia), of which the first volume appeared at Rotterdam, 1616, and the second at Dort, 1617. See BAYLE: Dict., iii. 114.

LYO'DA, the Greek name of the Hebrew Lod, a town belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, and situated in the plain of Sharon, on the road from Joppa to Jerusalem. It is mentioned in the New Testament (Acts ix. 22) as the place in which St. Peter healed the paralytic Âneas. Under Vespasian its name was changed to Diospolis (the "city of Zeus"), but the old name seems to have prevailed. Among the bishops present at Nicea was also one from Lydda or Diospolis. But in the beginning of the sixth century the see seems to have been removed or abolished. According to legend, it was the birthplace of St. George; and Justinian built a church there in his honor. The church was afterwards burnt by the Moslems, then rebuilt by the crusaders, and finally destroyed by Saladin in 1196.

LYDIA. See LU'D.

LYDIUS is the name of a Dutch family, which, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, produced several prominent theologians. — Martin Lydius, b. in Leyden, 1530 or 1540; d. at Franeker, June 27, 1601; studied at Tubingen, and obtained the accession of the strictly Lutheran Ludwig VI., 1576, and was appointed pastor in Amsterdam in 1580, and professor at Franeker in 1585. He wrote Apologia pro Erasm. several orations, and poems. — Baithasar Lydius, b. at Umstadt, Hesse, 1576 or 1577; d. at Dort, Jan. 20, 1629; studied at Leyden, and was appointed pastor of Streetkerk in 1602, and of Dort in 1606. He wrote, besides other works, a book on the Waldenses (Waldensia), of which the first volume appeared at Rotterdam, 1616, and the second at Dort, 1617. See BAYLE: Dict., iii. 114.

LYON, Mary, founder of Mount Holyoke Female Seminary; b. in Buckland, Franklin County, Mass., Feb. 28, 1797; d. at South Hadley, Mass., March 5, 1849. After her education at Ashfield, she joined Miss Z. P. Grant (afterwards Mrs. Banister) in the Adams Female Academy at Londonderry (now Derry), N.H., 1824–28, and went with her when she removed to Ipswich in the latter year, and remained with her until 1834, when she seriously set out upon the establishment of a female seminary of high standard, decidedly and professedly Christian in character, and with such charges that those of moderate means could avail themselves of its advantages. The scheme seemed chimerical to many, particularly since one element of it was, that the domestic work was to be done by the pupils themselves, and another, that the teachers were to be paid very low salaries, and were to consider their work as essentially missionary. Enough money was finally collected to insure the work. On Oct. 5, 1836, the cornerstone of the building was laid at South Hadley; and Nov. 8, 1837, although the building
LYTTLETON.

1838

LYTTLETON, George, Baron; b. at Hagley, Worcestershire, Jan. 17, 1709; d. there Aug. 22, 1773. He was educated at Eton and Oxford; in 1744 was a lord-commissioner of the treasury; in 1754, a member of the privy council; in 1758, chancellor of the exchequer; raised to the peerage Nov. 19, 1756, as Baron Lyttleton of Frankley. He is well known as the author of Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul (London, 1747, frequently reprinted) and Dialogues of the Dead (1760). The first treatise is called by Leland (Debatical Writers) "a demonstration sufficient to prove Christianity to be a divine revelation;" and by Johnson, "a treatise to which infidelity has never been able to fabricate a specious answer." It is based upon the proposition that the conversion and apostleship of Paul, alone, duly considered, is of itself a demonstration sufficient to prove the truth of Christianity." The proof of it is derived "from the history, circumstances, station, and hopes of Paul as a Jew, an enemy, a persecutor. No motives can seriously be assigned for his conversion to a despised faith, save an irresistible conviction of the truth of the miraculous history which he has recorded." He published a History of Henry II., 1764-71. His Memoirs and Correspondence appeared London, 1845, 2 vols.
RETURN TO CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT 202 Main Library

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>LOAN PERIOD</th>
<th>1</th>
<th>2</th>
<th>3</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>HOME USE</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

ALL BOOKS MAY BE RECALLED AFTER 7 DAYS
Renewals and Recharges may be made 4 days prior to the due date.
Books may be Renewed by calling 642-3405.

DUE AS STAMPED BELOW

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY

FORM NO. DD6.