THIS volume concludes the Religious Encyclopædia in advance of the German original. The revised edition of Herzog has so far reached only the thirteenth volume, to article "Ring;" but, by the kindness of the German editor and publisher, I had the benefit of several advanced sheets of letters. For the remaining titles the editors used the last seven volumes of the first edition (XIV.-XXI., published 1861-66, to which was added an Index volume in 1868). The best articles, which will be retained in the new edition, have been reproduced, condensed and supplemented to date by competent hands. But fully one-half of the volume is made up of original matter, with the aid of a large number of English and American scholars who are known to be familiar with the topics assigned to them. For their kind and hearty co-operation we again return our sincere thanks.

The three volumes of this work are equivalent in size to about seven or eight volumes of the German work on which it is based. Our aim has been to put the reader in possession of the substance of Herzog, with such additional information as the English reader needs, and cannot expect from a German work written exclusively for German readers. It is simply impossible to make an encyclopaedia of one country and people answer the wants of another, without serious changes and modifications. Moreover, an encyclopaedia ought to be reconstructed every ten years; and it is hoped that this work will renew its youth and usefulness as soon as the present edition is out of date.

With the reception of the work I have every reason to be satisfied. It has met with a hearty welcome, and secured a permanent place in the reference-library of ministers, students, and intelligent laymen of all denominations. Competent judges acknowledge its impartiality and catholicity, as well as the ability of the leading articles, which are written and signed by conscientious scholars of established reputation. The plan of condensation has been generally approved, as the only feasible way by which such a vast thesaurus of German learning could be made accessible and useful to the English reader. Errors and defects in a work which embraces many thousands of facts and dates are unavoidable; but pains have been taken to secure strict accuracy, and mistakes are corrected in the plates as soon as discovered.

The completed work is now committed to the favor of the public with the prayer that God may bless its use for the promotion of sound Christian learning.

SAADIA HA GAON. Ben Joseph, Jewish rabbi; b. at Fayyum, Upper Egypt, 892; d. at Sura, Babylonia, 941 or 942. He was educated by the Karaites, yet he became their vigorous opponent. He is distinguished for his Arabic translation of the Pentateuch, Job, Psalms, Canticles, and other books (each of which he accompanied by brief annotations), his grammatical and lexical works, and, above all, for his treatise in defence of Judaism, Religion and Doctrines, written in Arabic, but now known only by the Hebrew translation of Judah ben-Tibbon, German translations by Fürst (Die jüdischen Religionsphilosophen des Mittelalters, i. Bnd., Enumat We-Deot oder Glaubenslehre und Philosophie von Saadja Fajjumi, Leipzig, 1848), and by Ph. Bloch, in Jüdisches Literaturblatt, Magdeburg, 1878. By his translations, made between 915 and 926, he acquired such fame that in the latter year he was called to Sura in Babylon to be gaon (head teacher) of the famous Jewish school there, and held the office until his death, with the exception of four years (933-937), when he was kept from his office and forced in Bagadash. It was in this period that he wrote his Religion and Doctrines. His position in the history of exegesis is thus indicated by Professor C. A. Briggs: "The Peskhet, or literal interpretation, is used in the Targum of Onkelos and the Greek version of Aquila, with reference to the law, but found little expression among the ancient Jews. The Qarites [Karaites] were the first to emphasize it in the eighth century. Before this time there is no trace of Hebrew grammar or Hebrew dictionary. The Qarites threw off the yoke of rabbinical Halacha, and devoted themselves to the literal sense, and became extreme literalists. Influenced by them, Saadia introduced the literal method into the rabbinical schools, and used it as the most potent weapon to overcome the Qarites. He became the father of Jewish exegesis in the middle ages, and was followed by a large number of distinguished scholars, who have left monuments of Jewish leaming. SAALBCHUTZ, Joseph Levin, German rabbi; b. at Königsberg, March 15, 1801; d. there Aug. 23, 1863. He studied in the university of Königsberg; became Ph.D. in 1824, and in 1849 privat-dozent in philosophy, and afterwards professor extraordinary,—the first Jew who ever received the appointment. From 1825 to 1829 he taught in the Berlin Jewish public school; from 1829 to 1835 was rabbi in Vienna; from 1835 to his death was rabbi in Königsberg. His principal works are Das Mosaische Recht (1848-48, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1863), and Archdieogene der Hebräter (1856, 2 vols.).

SABA'OTH [NNQL 0060M, "hosts:" the translation is used], "host:" the translation is used, except in Rom. ix. 29, cited from Isa. i. 9, and Jas. v. 4; elsewhere the translation is used. The designation of God as "Jehovah Sabaoth" is not found in all the Old Testament. It is lacking in the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges; is used from 1 Chronicles, Second Samuel (1 Sam. i. 3, 11, iv. 4, xv. 2, xvii. 45; 2 Sam. v. 10, vi. 2, 18, vii. 8, 26, 27), then in Kings, but very seldom, and only by Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings xviii. 16, xix. 10, 14; 2 Kings iii. 14). In the prophetic books of Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, it frequently occurs; but in the others seldom, and in Ezekiel and Daniel not at all. It is missing in Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, generally in the Psalms, entirely in the post-exilian books, except in 1 Chronicles, in direct relation to David (xi. 9, xvii. 7, 24). The original meaning of the expression "Jehovah Sabaoth" does not imply, as many maintain, that Jehovah was a god of war; for it is precisely in that way when he was fighting in a wondrous way for his people that the appellation is unknown. In 1 Sam. xvii. 46 its juxtaposition with "God of the armies of Israel" shows that it did not mean the same as the latter. So also Ps. xxiv. 8 (cf. with 10) proves that "the Lord mighty in battle" was a different and lower conception to "the Lord of hosts." Nor are the "hosts" to be understood of the creation generally. The appellation comes from the "heavenly hosts," including both the stars and the angels, and calls attention to the position of Jehovah above both classes: hence the folly of star-worship, so common in the countries surrounding Israel. The stars are mere lights (Gen. i. 14), created for a definite purpose (Ps. civ. 19), although in their way eloquent of Jehovah's praise (Ps. viii. 3, xix. 1). Above them far is Jehovah, who made them, and rules them. Similar is the case respecting angels. They constitute the upper congregation of worshippers (Ps. cxlviii. 2, cl. 1), who praise God for his wonders of providence and grace (Ps. xxix. 9, xxxix. 6 sqq.). They also are the messengers of God and the witnesses of his mighty acts. When God is styled "Jehovah Sabaoth," his superiority to angels is set forth: hence the epithet rebukes star-worship, and other forms of idolatry; represents him as the absolute ruler of the world, and at the same time as ready to put down every opposition to the people of his choice.

SABAS, St., b. at Mutalasa, or Mutala, a village in Cappadocia, 439; d. near Jerusalem, about 531. When he was only eight years old, he gave up all his wealth, and retired into a monastery, whence he ten years afterwards went to Palestine, and settled as a hermit, and pupil of Euthymius, in the desert near Jerusalem. As his fame for sanctity increased, many Christians joined him, and a laura was formed under the rule of St. Basil. In 484 Bishop Sallustius of Jerusalem ordained him a priest, and made him abbot of an order of monks he had founded, and which was called, after him, the Sabaites. He introduced a very rigid rule, and was a skillful defender of the synod of Chalcedon, founded several monasteries, and enjoyed the confidence and SABBATH (Heb. shabbath; Gr., to sabbaton, or ta sabbata), the seventh day, regarded among the Israelites as holy, and a day of rest. It is of divine origin, its type being the seventh day, on which God rested from all his work. Moses introduced the sabbath first in connection with the manna (Exod. xvi. 6, 22-30), in such a manner as indicated that the sabbath was as yet unknown to the people. The people by observing this day were reminded of the blessing God had received then the commandment concerning that day on Sinai. The expression in Exod. xx. 8, "Remember the sabbath day," is not intended to remind of the sabbath as an ancient institution, but it rather means that the people should always remember the new existing order of the sabbath.

The signification of the sabbath can only be known from the Old Testament (cf. Gen. ii. 3; Exod. xx. 11, xxxvi. 13-17), which is as follows: God created the world in six days, and rested on the seventh day: he therefore blessed and sanctified this day of completing his work. In like manner, the people which he had sanctified unto himself, and which acknowledged the Creator and Lord of the world as their God, was to sanctify, after every six days of labor, the seventh day as a day of rest; and this was to be a sign of the covenant between God and his people. These sentences convey the following ideas. (1) Like God, so shall man rest and not work. The law of man is to become a likeness of the divine: especially are the people, called to be the organ of establishing a divine order of life upon earth, to be known as the people of the living God by the change of labor and rest, corresponding to the rhythm of the divine life. (2) In blessed rest the divine work is finished: because the creating God rests satisfied in the contemplation of his works, his creation itself is finished. In short, "the seventh day is not the negation of hexahemeron, but the blessing and sanctification of the same." Therefore, also, the work of men is not to be of a negative nature, but it was to finish itself in a blessed harmony of existence. In the same manner, also, the whole history of men was to complete itself in an harmonious order of God, as is already guaranteed in the sabbath of the creation, and prefigured in the sabbath seasons. The rest of God on the seventh day of creation, which is without an ending, must be, in a more over of the world to receive it at last in itself. The whole fourth chapter in the Epistle to the Hebrews bears upon this; viz., that the rest in God is to become also a rest for men.

But we get the full object of the sabbath idea by combining it with the dominion of sin and death which have entered into the development of the human society. After the divine curse had been pronounced upon the earth, and man had been destined to work for his food, the desire after the rest of God becomes a craving after redemption (Gen. v. 29). Israel, also, whilst in Egyptian bondage without any refreshing intermission, has to sigh for relief. When God, at the deliverance from bondage, gave him the seasons of rest resting regularly, a thanksgiving feast in commemoration of the deliverance which he had experienced. Therefore it is said (Deut. v. 15), "And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt," etc. But there is yet another point. The sabbath has only its significance as the seventh day, which is preceded by six work-days. The first part of the commandment concerning the sabbath, which is a commandment itself (Exod. xx. 9), reads, "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God." Only in consequence of preceding labor the sabbath is to follow, as work and creation of their finishing God. In short, the word in Gen. iii. 19 retains its force, only that the sabbath becomes "a corrective for the injuries inflicted on men living under the curse of sin, by the heavy and oppressing work, and at the same time detracting from God. We need not dwell here on the humane character of the Mosaic law, which in its enactments provides also for the rest of the servant and stranger as well as for the cattle (Exod. xx. 19, xxiii. 12). From what has been said, we see that the sabbath is a divine institution, a divine gift sanctifying the people (Exek. xx. 12). The day was celebrated by rest from labor (Exod. xxxiv. 21; Num. xxv. 32), and by a special burnt offering presented in the temple in addition to the usual daily offering, which was doubled on this day (Num. xxviii. 9). In the holy place of the temple the show-bread was renewed (Lev. xiv. 8). Deliberate profanation of this day was punished with death (Exod. xxxiv. 14 sqq., xxv. 2), which was inflicted by stoning (Num. xv. 32 sq.). The Israelites had to bake and cook their food for the sabbath on the preceding day (Exod. xvi. 23), to which undoubtedly refers the injunction in xxxv. 3. They were also forbidden to leave the camp on the sabbath day (Exod. xvi. 29), and, with reference to this, travelling on the sabbath was afterwards also forbidden. Marketing and public trade ceased on the sabbath (Neh. x. 31, xiii. 15, 16), and it was merely an auxiliary police regulation of Nehemiah to close the gates on that day (Neh. xiii. 19). But the passages in Nehemiah, especially x. 31, show that at that time a strict observance of the sabbath had not yet been customary among the people. The measures, however, which Nehemiah took for the sake of a more quiet sabbath contain nothing of that micrological casuistry which prevailed in later times; and when the Chasidim suffered their enemies to cut off their hand to arm on the sabbath (1 Macc. ii. 32 sq.; 2 Macc. vi. 11), Mattathias, apprehending the great danger which would accrue to the Jews, laid down the injunction that it was permitted to take defensive measures against the enemy, and to abstain from offensive operations (1 Macc. ii. 41; 2 Macc. viii.
SABBATICAL YEAR.

26). This principle prevailed afterwards (Jos., Ant. XIV. 4, 2), but not always (Jos., War, II. 10, 2). The inventive spirit of later times laid down the minute and strictest Sabbath regulations, which are contained in the Talmud, and a whole Talmud treatise is devoted to this subject. That this micrology had already been developed in the time of Christ, we know from such passages as Matt. xii. 2, John v. 10 sq. In spite of these minute injunctions which were hedged about the Sabbath, this day was to be regarded as a day of joy. The meals for the Sabbath were prescribed, every one was to eat three meals; and the Talmud Shabbath (fol. 118, col. 1) says, "Whoever observes the three meals on the Sabbath will be saved from the birth-pains of Messiah, the judgment of hell, and the war of Gog and Magog." SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY (Acts i. 12).

From the injunction in Exod. xvi. 29 the scribes laid down the rule that an Israelite must not go two thousand yards beyond the limits of his abode. The permitted distance seems to have been grounded on the space to be kept between the ark and the people (Josh. iii. 4) in the wilderness, which tradition said was that between the ark and the tents. Whilst the rabbis on the one hand regulated the walking on the Sabbath days by allowing only a certain space, yet on the other hand they also contrived certain means whereby the Sabbath-day's walk could be exceeded, without transgressing the law, by the so-called "mixtio terminorum, or connection of distances." They ordained that all those who wished to join their social gatherings on the Sabbath were to deposit on Friday afternoon some article of food in a certain place at the end of the Sabbath-day's journey, and thus another Sabbath-day's journey could be undertaken from the first terminus.

Not only does an entire Talmudic treatise (Erubin) treat on this "connection of distances," but rabbinism has also invented a prayer for that purpose, "Blessed art thou, Jehovah, who hast commanded (1) us the erub" (i.e., connection of distances). SABBATHARIANS, or NEW ISRAELITES, is the name of a religious sect founded by Joanna Southcott (b. about 1750, at Gittisham in Devonshire), who regarded herself as the bride of the Lamb, and declared herself, when sixty-four years of age, pregnant with the true Messiah, the "Second Shiloh," whom she would bear Oct. 19, 1814. She surrounded herself with prophets, and in order to prepare the way for the new dispensation ordered the strictest observance of the Jewish law and Sabbath. A costly cradle was kept in readiness for the reception of the Messiah, and for a long time she waited for his birth. At last a suppositional child was declared to be he. But the fraud was detected, and those who participated in it were led around with the picture of Southcott in the public street. Joanna died in her self-delusion, Dec. 27, 1814; but her followers, who at one time numbered a hundred thousand, continued till 1831 to observe the Jewish Sabbath and the ceremonial of the law in order to receive the hoped-for Messiah in a worthy manner. Her writings number sixty separate publications, of which the best known is the Book of Wonders, London, 1813-14, 5 parts. Comp. Blunt: Dictionary of Sects, s.v. "Southcottians;" Matthias: J. Southcott's Prophecies and Case stated, London, 1832.

SABBATICAL YEAR AND YEAR OF JUBILEE. (1) The Sabbatical Year. The laws respecting the sabbatical year embrace three main enactments, —rest for the soil, care for the poor and for animals, and remission of debts. The first enactment (which is comprised in Exod. xxiii. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 2-5) enjoins that the soil, the vineyards and the oliveyards, are to have perfect rest: there is to be no tillage or cultivation of any sort. The second enactment (which is contained in Exod. xxxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 5-7) enjoins that the spontaneous growth of the fields or of trees is to be for the free use of the poor, hirelings, strangers, servants, and cattle. The third enactment (which is contained in Deut. xv. 1-5) enjoins the remission of debts in the sabbatical year. It has been questioned whether the release of the seventh year was final, or merely lasted through the year. The former is in general the Jewish view (cf. Mishna Shebiith, x. 1), and was also Luther's view. Seven such sabbatical years from the jubilee year (Lev. xxv. 8-11), which is to follow immediately upon the sabbatical year. It was to be proclaimed by the blast of a trumpet on the tenth day of the seventh month. Like the sabbatical year, it was to be celebrated by (1) giving rest to the soil (Lev. xxv. 11, 12). While the law enjoins, that, as on the sabbatical year, the land should be fallow, and that there be no tillage nor harvest during the jubilee year, yet the Israelites were permitted to gather the spontaneous produce of the field for their immediate wants, but not to lay it up in their storehouses. Another law connected with this festival was (2) manumission of those Israelites who had become slaves (Lev. xxv. 39-54), and (3) reversion of landed property (Lev. xxv. 13-34, xxvii. 16-24). Houses which were not surrounded by walls were treated like landed property, and were subject to the law of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 31), whilst such as were built in walled cities, if not redeemed within a year after the sale, became the absolute property of the purchaser (Lev. xxv. 29, 30), and the jubilee year had no influence upon it. The houses of the Levites in the forty-eight cities given to them (Num. xxxv. 1-8) were exempt from this general law of house-property. The only exceptions to the general rule were the houses and the fields consecrated to the Lord. If these were not redeemed before the ensuing jubilee, instead of reverting to their original proprietors, they at the jubilee became forever the property of the priests (Lev. xxvii. 20, 21).

As to the design of the sabbatical and jubilee year, we may say that the spirit of this law is the same as that of the sabbath year; but has its special signification from the bondage of corruption (Rom. viii. 21). This is the main idea. Man, by withdrawing his hand from the cultivation of the soil, and putting it at the disposal of Jehovah’s blessing, hereby actually acknowledges the exclusively divine right of possession. At the same time, the land pays a debt to Jehovah (cf. Lev. xxvi. 34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21), and thus returns, in a certain sense, to that condition which it had before the words of Gen. iii. 17 were pronounced: yea, more, the sabbatical year points typically to that time when the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption (Rom. viii. 21). The jubilee year, in which the sabbath cycle completes itself, takes up in itself the idea of the redeeming restitution, and of bringing back the theocracy to the original divine order, where all are free as servants of God, and where every one enjoys the fruits of his inalienable possession. God, who once redeemed his people from Egypt’s bondage, appears here again as their Redeemer, by giving liberty not only to the slave, but also by providing for the poor a certain portion of the heritage of his people, since there was to be no poor among the covenant people (Deut. xv. 4). To bring about such a year of grace, sins had to be forgiven: therefore the jubilee was proclaimed on the day of atonement. As the year in which the restitution of all things will take place, the year of jubilee in the prophecy of Isa. xxxi. 6-9 (fulfilled in Christ, Luke iv. 21) is taken as a type for the messianic time of salvation, in which, after all the battles of the kingdom of man have been victoriously fought, the dissonances of the history of mankind will be lost in the harmony of the divine life, and, with the rest that remaineth for the people of God (Heb. iv. 9), the acts of history will be closed.

As to the practicability of the system of these institutions, it was possible, provided the people were willing to sacrifice all selfish interest to the divine will. In how far this order was executed in the post-Mosaic period, we know not; but that the sabbatical year was not celebrated in the last centuries before the exile, we know from 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21. After the exile, the people took it for granted that the jubilee year would be observed; and thus it continues to the present day. The rabbinic laws concerning the sabbatical year are contained in the Mishna treatise Shebith; but these laws had only reference to Palestine itself, because it is said (Lev. xxi. 2), “When ye come into the land.” Outside of Palestine there was no sabbatical year. SABBATIUS, a converted Jew, who was ordained priest by the Novatian bishop of Constantinople, Marcian, but afterwards, in the last years of the fourth century, caused the death of the Novatian sect. By the synod of Paz in Phrygia, it was decreed that Easter should be celebrated at the same time as the Jewish passover; and this decree was accepted by Sabbatius, who at the same time commenced to aspire to the episcopal dignity, and to form a party in Constantinople. Meanwhile the Novatian bishops of Constantinople, Nice, Nicomedia, etc., convened a synod at Sangarum in Bithynia, by which the difference as to the celebration of Easter was declared an adiaphoron; but Sabbatius was by oaths compelled to renounce his aspirations of episcopal consecration. He, nevertheless, continued his intrigues, and was actually consecrated by some country bishops, but was then banished to Rhodes, where he died. His bones were afterwards brought to Constantinople; and by his followers, the Sabbatians (see NOVATIANS), he was honored as a martyr.

SABELLIUS is the most pronounced and most influential representative of the Jewish monothelitism within the pale of the Christian Church. He knows only one divine substance; and he also knows only one divine person, or one hypostasis. The two ideas of substance and person, or substance and hypostasis, are to him identical; and he designates them with the same name,—the monad. This monad, he acknowledges, does not remain a mute unity. It develops into a triad; but the triad is not the unity of three persons, such as is the teaching of the orthodox church, but simply three different manners in which the one uniform substance is revealed, three different points of view from which it may be looked upon, three different relations in which God places himself to the world. As an illustration, Sabellius reminds his pupils of the round globe of the sun (the Father), his power of light (the Son), and his power of heat (the Spirit). The three links of his triads appear in other places to be merely three stages in the divine self-evolution; and, as soon as the whole course of that self-evolution has been perfected, the triad returns to, and becomes fully absorbed by, the monad. The writings of Sabellius, only a few fragments have come down to us in HIPPOLYTUS (Philos., IX., 11), EPHRAIMUS (Harr., 62), and ATHANA-SABIANs.

SACHS.

SACS (Contra Arian oratio), [collected in Routh: Reliquia Sacra]. Of his life very little is known. He was a presbyter, and seems to have been a Libyan by birth, from the Pentapolis. He spent some time in Rome in the beginning of the 5th century, and his doctrine found adherents both in Rome and in his native country, and in 260 or 261 he was excommunicated by Bishop Dionysius of Alexandria. But his influence, or rather the influence of the view he represented, reached down to Schleiermacher [and Bushnell.

SABIANs. The name occurs for the first time in the Koran (Sur. 2, 69; 5, 78; 22, 17). Its place in the enumeration — Moelms, Jews, SABiANS, Christians, Magians, and Polytheists — shows that it there denotes a monotheistic people: it, no doubt, refers to the Mandeans; which article see. How it afterwards came to be applied to a Pagan people settled in Northern Mesopotamia, has been told us by an Arabic writer from the ninth century, — en-Nedim. The caliph el-Mamfm (813—833) passed through that region on one of his expeditions against the Byzantine emperor, and all the people, of whom he says, he asked them whether they were Jews, or Christians, or Magians. As they could give no satisfactory answer, he allowed them to consider the matter until his return, when they would have to conform to one of the religions recognized by the Koran. They were thrown into great consternation by this resolution. Some of them adopted Islam, others Judaism, others, again, Christianity; but most of them clung to their old Paganism, concealing the fact by assuming the name of the Sabians.

The caliph, however, never returned, and the question was dropped. But the name was continued.

Those Sabians of Harran were Sabians by descent alone, since the time of Alexander the Great, numerous Greek colonists had lived among them; and, through its close contact with Greek mythology and philosophy, their Syrian Paganism had gradually assumed a Greek coloring. Greek names were used in their mythology, not as representing the true Greek gods, but simply as applied to similar Syrian deities; and in the same manner they had also introduced various biblical names, no doubt in order to propitiate the Mohammedans. Some of them called Hermes, others Buddha, and others again, Abraham, the founder of their religion. It was essentially a star-worship. To the sun, the moon, and the five planets — Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, and Saturn — temples of angular shape were erected, and suitable sacrifices (in pre-Mohammedan times also of human beings) were offered. To each of these heavenly bodies a pecuicular metal was ascribed, — gold to the sun, silver to the moon, etc. — and the cult of the day, the hour, the month, and the year was conducted after it. But, besides those angular star-temples, round-shaped temples were built for the worship of certain deities representing abstract ideas. — the first cause, necessity, the soul, etc. — and finally, also, genii and demons were worshipped. See Chrrol.

SABINUS, Pope (Sept. 13, 604—Feb. 22, 605); succeeded Gregory the Great, as whose apocrisarius he had acted in Constantinople, and is said to have introduced the announcement of the canonical hours by bells. He was succeeded by Boniface III.

SACHEVERELL, Henry, b. in Wilts, about 1672; d. in London, June 5, 1724; was graduated at Oxford, 1696, and appointed preacher at St. Saviour's, Southwark, in 1705. In 1709 he was made a Whig by the House of Commons; and in 1710 he was convicted by the peers, and suspended for three years from the ministry. He was ardently supported, however, by the Tories, the clergy, and the country squires; and the excitement caused by his trial contributed much to the defeat of the Whigs. He was impeached for libel by the House of Commons; and in 1710 he was convicted by the peers, and suspended for three years from the ministry. He was ardently supported, however, by the Tories, the clergy, and the country squires; and the excitement caused by his trial contributed much to the defeat of the Whigs in the general election of 1710 and the downfall of Godolphin and his colleagues. In 1718 he was made rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn, in which position he died. See The Life of Dr. H. Sacheverell, London, 1711.

SACHS, Hans, b. in Nuremberg, Nov. 5, 1494; d. there Jan. 20, 1576; was the son of a tailor, but frequented, from 1501 to 1509, the Latin school of his native city, in which he learned "Puerilia, Grammatica, und Musica, auch Rhetorica, Arithmetica, Astronomie, Poeterey, — Manns". He complains, however, that he soon forgot all that he had learned; and, in spite of the comprehensive and varied reading which his writings evince, he calls himself an "unlearned man, who understood neither Greek nor Latin." In 1509 he was apprenticed to a shoemaker, and in 1511 he commenced the professional wanderings which formed an important element of the education of a thorough mechanic. He visited all the principal cities of Germany, and in the guilds of his trade he studied at the same time the craft of his profession and the art of poetry. The mastersingers were mechanics, and every Sunday or holyday they assembled in the afternoon in the church or in the guild-hall. A "singing" —match took place; and he whose poem won the prize received a wreath of silken flowers, or a woollen string with a silver coin bearing the image of King David. Hans Sachs felt that only among the master-singers could he find what he considered enjoyment and amusement; and in 1514, in Munich, he appeared for the first time among them as a "singer" with the poem, Gloria Patri Lob und Ehr. In 1518 he returned to Nuremberg, settled there as a shoemaker, married, and, while he sustained a numerous family with the proceeds of his professional labor, he developed a literary activity which soon made him the "prince and patriarch of the master-singers." Nuremberg was at that time a free imperial city, and at the height of its prosperity. Charles V. often visited it; Luther praised it highly; among its citizens were Albrecht Dürer (d. 1528), Peter Vischer (d. 1552), Andreas Osianer (d. 1524—49), Peter Henlein (d. 1540), Lazarus Spengler (d. 1554), and others. Among these men,—known all over Germany, some of them all over the world,—Hans Sachs took rank. He became the representative poet of his age, and by the outspoken tendency of his poetry he occupied a place in the history of the German Reformation. It was the first rule of the Nuremberger master-singers, that nothing should be written against Luther's Bible; and, when the competing poems were tested, one of the judges had the task of comparing their ideas and their language with that book.

Hans Sachs was an exceedingly prolific author, and in this respect surpassed only by the Spanish poet, Lope de Vega. His works consist of thirty-four large volumes in folio, written with his own hand, and containing 6,636 pieces, of which several hundreds are dramas, the rest epics and lyrics. The poetical tone of these pieces is very various,—tragi-cal and comic, humorous and sentimental, sarcastic and enthusiastic; but the aesthetic character is always the same, always didactic: the ideal contents is some moral proposition and the tendency of this proposition points directly towards the Reformation. Among his poems, which generally were printed on fly-leaves, and in that form scattered through all Germany, some of the most celebrated are his transcriptions of Luther's translation of the Psalms: Die Wittembergisch Nachahgul in seven hundred verses, and giving an explanation of the difference between "divine truth and human lies;" Eyn wunderliche weysnussung, in thirty strophes, and with a preface by Osianer, giving thirty pictures of the Pope in glory and in distress. It was forbidden in the early years of the sixteenth century. For the first time, Vertheidigre Glauben der Christen, of which a second edition appeared in 1773; and from 1735 to 1764 he published six volumes of sermons, several of which were translated into Dutch, French, and English. His biography (Berlin, 1758, 2 vols.) was written by his son, Friedrich Samuel Gottfried Sack (b. in Magdeburg, Sept. 4, 1758; d. in Berlin, Oct. 2, 1817), and his successor as court-preacher in the consistory, with the title of bishop. SACK, Karl Heinrich, b. in Berlin, Oct. 17, 1780; d. in Poppelsdorf, Oct. 16, 1854. His work was done as a court-preacher and in the consistory, with the title of bishop.
His writings are numerous. The chief are Christliche Apologetik, Hamburg, 1829, 2d ed., 1841; Christliche Polemik, 1838; Die Kirche von Scottland, Heidelberg, 1844-45, 2 parts; Die evangelische Kirche u. d. SACK, Brethren of the (Saccati, Saccitate, or Saccophori), often, like the monks of Grammont, the Minims, the Cathari, and Waldenses, styled boni homines, formed an ecclesiastical order somewhat similar to that of the Augustines. It was founded in France about 1200, and confirmed by the Pope in 1219. It received its name from the sack which its members used as a garment, and spread rapidly, not only in France, but also in England. In 1275, however, it was dissolved by the Council of Leyden; and in 1293 the remaining members were incorporated with other orders. In his Entwurf einer vollständigen Historie der Ketzerreien, i. p. 437, Walch places the Brethren of the Sack among the Encratites. They abstained from flesh and wine, held no property, went about barelegged with no sandals on their feet, etc.; but it was no doubt, however, the early dissolution of the order. Besides these fraters saccati, there was also an order of sack-bearing nuns, founded in 1261 by King Louis IX. of France, on the suggestion of his mother, Blanca. They called themselves Penitent Daughters of Jesus, or, with reference to their garment, Sac-carie, and lived in nunneries near St. Andrew’s in Paris. But also this order was soon abolished, even while its founder was still living; though there was in London, as late as 1357, a nunnery whose inmates wore sacks of hemp, and walked barefooted.

PEROR and the gods (sacrificati et thrificati). Many Christians who shrank from actually sacrificing escaped, through the avarice of the Roman officials, by buying certificates that they had complied with the law (libellatio). But even this was severely reprimed by the Church; and, at least as long as the persecutions lasted and the Church had to guard against apostasy, rigid measures were enforced against the sacrificati. See LAMPI.

SACRIFICES. See Offerings.

SACRILEGIE (sacrilegium) corresponds to blasphemy, as an act to words, and denotes a crime against God. Canon law, or, more especially, the Roman casuists, distinguish between sacrilegium immediatum (a crime committed against that which by itself is holy, such as unworthy participation in the Lord's Supper, robbery of a monstrance containing the consecrated wafer, etc.), and sacrilegium mediatum (a crime committed against that which is sacred because it is devoted to God, such as church-robery, molesting or boring a clergyman in the performance of his office, etc.). Sacrilegium mediatum is further subdivided into personale, reale, and locale, but none of these distinctions have any significance in modern legislation.

Between the Mosaic law and the Roman, there is a striking difference with respect to their conceptions of sacrilege. According to the Mosaic law, sacrilege could be committed by a Jew only; and the punishment which he incurred comprised complete restitution or compensation, a fine of one-fifth of his income, and an expiatory sacrifice (Lev. v. 15, 16, xxii. 14, 16). When the crime was committed by a non-Jew, the Lord himself was expected to avenge the deed (see 1 Sam. v. 6; the Philistines having taken the ark of the Lord, and brought it to Ashdod; Jer. i. 28, ii. 11, and elsewhere). With the Romans the crime of sacrilege became only so much the more aggravated by having been committed by a foreigner, and death was always the punishment. In the older Roman law sacrilegium comprised not only the appropriation of res sacræ to secular uses, but also the appropriation of objects not more which had been deposited in the temple, or in other ways placed under the guardianship of the gods. (See Canon. ro: De legibus, i. 16.) Afterwards, by decrees of Severus and Antoninus, a distinction was made between the stealing of res sacræ in a sacred place and the stealing either of res sacræ in a profane place or of objects not sacred in a sacred place: only the first case was defined as sacrilegium; the two last, as simple theft (furtum). In the Christian Church the crime appeared very early; and complaints occur that clergy and laymen took away from the churches wax, oil, etc. The decrees of the Mosaic law were applied, and excommunication was added (Can. Apost., c. 72, comp. c. 73). But the crime spread, and is more and more frequently mentioned in the decrees of the synods, the writings of the Fathers, the penitentials, etc., though at the same time the penalties became heavier and heavier (Regimo: De synodalibus causis, lib. ii. c. 276 sq.). By degrees, as the Germanic element became prominent in the legislation of the nations of Central and Western Europe, the Germanic conception of sacrilege as violation of the sacredness of the church prevailed, and the Roman distinction between res sacræ and non sacræ was abolished (Lex Ribara, tit. Ix. cap. 8; Lex Alamannorum, tit. v., vii.; Lex Bajuvariorum, tit. i. cap. 3, 6; Capitulare Paderbornense, a. 785, c. 3, in FERTZ: Monum. Germaniae, t. iii. fol. 48). In Lex Frisonum we even find an old law concerning the sacredness of the Pagan temples applied directly to the Christian churches. Of great interest is the legislation of Charles V. on this point (1532). Here is a return to the distinctions of the Roman law, though in such a way that the appropriation of res sacræ or of res non-sacræ, deposited in a sacred place, never becomes a simple theft; and this aggravation of the crime, when it becomes sacrilegious, is adopted by all modern legislations.

SACRISTY and SACRISTAN. The sacristy is sometimes a separate building belonging to a church or convenl, sometimes only an apartment in the main structure, in which the sacred vessels are kept, and in which the ecclesiastics who are to take part in the service assemble. The person who has charge of that room or building is the sacristan.

SACY, Louis Isaac Le Maître de, b. in Paris, March 29, 1613; d. Jan. 4, 1684; studied at Beauvais together with Antoine Arnauld; was ordained priest in 1648, and became in 1650 confessor and spiritual director of the recluses of Port-Royal. During the persecution of the Jansenists he lived concealed in the suburb of St. Antoine; but, as he continued to correspond with the nuns, his residence was discovered, and May 13, 1666, he was imprisoned in the Bastille. Oct. 31, 1668, he was released, and returned to Port-Royal: but in 1679 he was once more compelled to leave the monastery; and the last days of his life he spent in the house of his cousin, the Marquis of Pomponne. He is principally known by his translations of the Bible. In 1667 appeared his Le Nouveau Testament, traduit en Français, generally called Nouveau Testament de Mont, though it was printed in Amsterdam by the Elzevir. It was vehemently attacked by several bishops, condemned by Pope Clement IX. (April 20, 1668), defended by Arnauld and Nicole, and caused a controversy which lasted twenty years. La Sainte Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments, was published in 1679. See SAINTE-BEUVE: Port-Royal, vol. ii. SADDUCEES. All sources agree in putting Sadducees in opposition to Pharisaism. It is not the name of a sect, but of a party which refused to adopt the exaggerations of ritualistic and ascetic formalism of Pharisaism. In a certain sense the Pharisees were the innovators. Their peculiar teachings were additions to the law, which the Sadducees regarded as sole authority; and thus only can we understand the reluctance of the latter against the traditional system, and its religious and ascetical requirements, as well as the rejection of the doctrine of the resurrection. Being forced by the natural course of things to make an opposition in the field of public and social life, the Sadducees were finally entangled in political matters: they thus became the opponents of the Pharisees in matters of which they had not thought at the beginning. Less favored by the people, they easily accommodated...
special purposes; whereas the Sadducees regarded it as something dangerous, because exaggerated, if not demagogical.

Jesus, had degenerated into sheer Pharisaism? In its something which they could utilize for their and this it shared with the Pharisees, who beheld naturally brought it into conflict with the Pharidian studiously avoided giving his readers an exercise of virtue without any view of reward. And whereas we will not deny that there were some speculating spirits among the Sadducees, yet we must bear this in mind, that Josephus only mentions what serves his purposes, since he is an inexperienced and inconsiderate reader. And the scorn which we find in the Talmud also lead us to the supposition that both Pharisees and Sadducees were nothing but parties; that in the main they both stood on the ground of the same Judaism as far as the inner relations were concerned, and that in this sphere there were no oppositions which had to lead to a rupture; for evidently both parties were represented in the Sanhedrin, where they could defend their different ideas, but always with a view of gaining a victory which would need endanger the State.

More confused are the notices which we find in the writings of the Jewish Fathers, and especially in those of mediæval Judaism. The Sadducees, as we have seen, were friends of the foreigners; and, as they mostly belonged to the aristocracy, it cannot be remarkable, that, by their aversion to asceticism, they gave offence by their luxury and immorality. But this did not necessarily belong to the party, and was also not the cause why later Jews called them Epicureans: for the latter name in rabbinic writings denotes all kinds of heresy; and we can easily perceive, how, with the increasing narrowness of the ecclesiastical horizon, such imputations could be made, and it is also very characteristic that Christian writers should have taken this up, and made the rabbinic-Pharisaic mode of intuition their own. To this source belongs the myth concerning the origin of the Sadducees. Of a renowned teacher of the third century before Christ, Antigonus of Socho, we are told in the Mishna (Pirke Aboth, 1, 3), that he recommended to his disciples the exercise of virtue without any view of reward. In the Gemara, and later by other authorities, we are told Antigonus had two disciples, Zadok and Baithos, who, be it advertently or inadvertently, drew the inference from their teacher's maxim that there is no reward and no future life. This is the origin of Sadduceeism. Whether and how the Sadducees and Baithoseans were the same or not, no one could rightly understand any more. Yet there are still some scholars who believe in the existence of Zadok and Baithos; whereas the highest antiquity is silent concerning them, and prefers the etymological explanation of the name "Sadducees" [i.e., from Heb. for "just"]. Often the Sadducees have been identified with the Karaites, but the only relation between the two consists in the rejection of the Pharisaic-rabbinic system of tradition.

In the New Testament the Sadducees are mentioned in Matt. iii. 7, xvi. 1, 9, xxii. 23, 34; Mark xii. 18; Luke xx. 27; Acts iv. 1, v. 17, xxiii. 6–8. From the Gospel narrative it seems to be evident that at that time these parties opposed each other on political grounds; and this seems to be clear from the narrative in the Acts of the Apostles where the Sadducees always opposed the Christians, while the Pharisees favored them in many respects (Acts v. 17, 34). How are we to explain this phenomenon? or are we to believe that Christianity, after the death of Jesus, had degenerated into sheer Pharisaism?

The fact, however, seems to be this: the preaching of Jesus which concerned the inner life naturally brought it into conflict with the Pharisees. But the moving power and vitality of the first Christian Church was the messianic hope; and this it shared with the Pharisees, who beheld in it something which they could utilize for their special purposes; whereas the Sadducees regarded it as something dangerous, because exaggerated, if not demagogical.

Occasionally we also hear (Acts xxiii. 8) that the Sadducees believed neither in angels nor spirits, whereas the Pharisees believed in both; and this we explain best by bearing in mind, that, as political parties, one affirmed what the other denied. Passing over from the New Testament to Josephus, who has always been regarded as the main authority in this respect, we are led to the supposition that the Sadducees were a school of philosophers; and for Greek readers every thing that concerned the future life belonged to the sphere of speculations. But the Jewish historian studiously avoided giving his readers an inside view of the political party-machinery; and that the Sadducees were philosophers was the more believed, since Josephus asserted that they denied the doctrine of fatalism, but contended for the freedom of the will. And whereas we will not deny that there were some speculating spirits among the Sadducees, yet we must bear this in mind, that Josephus only mentions what serves his purposes, since he is an inexperienced and inconsiderate reader. And the scorn which we find in the Talmud also lead us to the supposition that both Pharisees and Sadducees were nothing but parties; that in the main they both stood on the ground of the same Judaism as far as the inner relations were concerned, and that in this sphere there were no oppositions which had to lead to a rupture; for evidently both parties were represented in the Sanhedrin, where they could defend their different ideas, but always with a view of gaining a victory which would need endanger the State.

in Rome, Oct. 18, 1547; studied philosophy and ritoric at Pisa, Ferrara, and Rome, and became secretary to Leo X. in 1514, and bishop of Carpentras in 1517. During the reign of Adrian VI., who had no taste for literature, Sadoleto, who was best known for the elegance of his style, and as author of some poems, lived at Carpentras; and, although Clement VII. called him to Rome as his secretary, he soon again returned to his episco-cal see. During the next ten years he wrote — besides De liberis recte instituendis libel, Interpretatio in Psalmum, Miserere mei Deus, etc.—his chief work, In Pauli epistolam ad Romanos Commentatio-rum libri tres. It gave offence in Rome on account of its Semi-Pelagian views, and Sadoleto undertook to alter it. In 1536 Paul III. again called him to Rome, made him a cardinal, and employed him in diplomatical negotiations with Francis I. and Charles V. He was very active, and successful. Meanwhile his works—Briefe

undseinememoiren, was commenced in 1820, but not completed until after the dissolution of the order, in 1773, he studied theology and philosophy at the university of Ingolstadt. In 1777 he was ordained priest, and appointed repetit or publicus in theology and philosophy. In 1780 he was made professor of dogmatics, and in 1784 he moved to Dillingen as professor of pastoral theology. But on Nov. 4, 1784, he was suddenly dismissed, accused of participation in secret political intrigues, and of connection with the Illuminati; and for many years he lived in retirement in Munich or at Ebersberg, developing, however, a great literary activity. His orthodoxy had long been suspected by the Ultramontanists, but the suspicion was entirely without ground. However much he at times was harassed by doubts (see his book, Der Friede, 1821), he never swerved from that which forms the essential and vital points of the Roman-Catholic faith; and his opposition to the rationalism and indifference of the age was energetic and successful. Meanwhile his works— Briefe

number of disciples around him. Without forming a theological school, he wielded a great religious influence, and acquired a large following from abroad. In 1815 the king of Prussia offered him the archiepiscopal see of Cologne. But he declined: he would not leave Bavaria. In 1821
he was made capitular at Regensburg; in 1822, coadjutor to the bishop; in 1829, bishop. A collected edition of his works, consisting of forty vol-

institution, studied law, entered afterwards the army, and became, while a young officer in the garrison of Bordeaux, an enthusiastic adherent of Dom Martinez de Pasquiais. The pupil, however, soon separated from the master, entered into connection with Cagliostro, studied Swedenborg, resigned his position in the army, wrote books which attracted much attention,—Des erreurs et de la société (1817), and Tablois naturels des rapports entre Dieu, l'homme, et l'univers (1782),—and travelled extensively in France, Italy, and Germany, making everywhere intimate acquaintance with the mystical spirits of the age, William Law, Beer, the Galatzin family, and others. From 1788 to 1791 he lived in Strassburg, his "paradise;" and while there he studied Jacob Boehme, and wrote L'homme de désir (1790), Ecce homo (1792), and Le nouvel homme (1792). The French Revolution he hailed with great enthusiasm: but he soon discovered the utter lack of moral responsibility which characterized its movements, and the consummation of the Revolutionizing society; but he declined the offer. And from that moment till his death in despair, he attempted to commit suicide. In consequence, he was fortunate prevented. On his bed of suffering he wrote two best books: Catholique politique, 1823-24; and Nouveaux Christianisme, 1825. In many respects he was far in advance of his time. He had not the prejudices of many of his contemporaries. He was aware of the part Christianity has played in the history of civilization, and he spoke with respect of the labor of the lower clergy. But his knowledge was utterly incomplete, and his political views. He considered the Reformation a retrograde movement. Most influence he has exercised through his disciples, Olinde Rodrigues, Bazard, Enfantin, and others. His life was written by G. Hubbard, Paris, 1857.

SAINT'S, Worship of the. The apostolic designation of Christians as "saints" (Rom. i.7; 1 Cor. i. 2) was used down to the days of Irenaeus and Tertullian. The inclination early developed itself to apply the term in a peculiar sense to such Christians as had lived exemplary lives, and had witnessed a steady and unbroken progress in life and death, often of a martyr's death. As early as the second part of the second century, congregations were celebrating the memory of martyrs. The day of their martyrdom was called the day of their birth (genesis du martyre), and set apart for special services; and the place where the remains of a martyr were interred was regarded as consecrated. The story of his sufferings and death was related once a year, and the Lord's Supper celebrated in token of the communion of saints. Eusebius (IV.15) states that the Church of Smyrna honored the bones of Polycarp above silver and gold. In the fourth century a yearly festival of all saints and martyrs was appointed by the Eastern Church. One of Chrysostom's homilies (De mortuis in totius orbis) was delivered on this festival. The Western Church did not appoint an all saints' day till the seventh century.

The respect for the memory of the saints gradually degenerated into a worship of saints and their relics. The monkish system, which began in the third century, was the occasion of exaggerated accounts of the piety and power of men who spent their lives in caves, devoting themselves to the most severe ascetic practices. Miracles were associated with their names. Cyprian, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, Augustine, and others exalted their memories in treatises and sermons on the saints called Panegyrics), and attributed to them a part in the judgment and power, by their intercessions, to become protectors of men on earth. It was taught that they not only interceded for the pardon of sins, but for relief of physical infirmities (Ambrose: De Viduis 9). Chapels and churches were erected over their bones, and relics were carried as amulets. Their aid was sought at the inception of journeys, for ships at sea, etc. Special saints were associated with their names. Cyprian, Gregory of Tours, of France; Luke, of painters; John and Augustine, of theologians; Ivo, of jurists; Crispin, of shoemakers, etc. Vigilantius of Barcelona, who protected vigorously in the fifth century against such worship, was justified, but Jerome defended the practice with vigor.

The worship of saints was fixed in the Oriental Church by the Second Nicene Council (787), John of Damascus having before argued for the practice. The theologians of the West took up the subject, and Saint Ambrose, in his De sanctis, directed against the abuses of saintworship, condemned all who denied the efficacy of the intercession of the saints. Modern Roman-Catholic ecclesiastical law, which is full of fancies and falsehoods, distinguishes between the worshhip of saints and the worship of God, and the worship of the saints having before argued for the practice. The increasing host of the saints was divided into six classes; and the Roman Breviary ordains that they shall be addressed ("Apostles, martyrs, etc., pray for us") at all other times than the high festivals. The art of the middle ages was likewise devoted to bring out the emblems and peculiarities of the saints. Peter was pictured with the keys, John with a lamb upon his arm, Paul with a sword, Bartholomew with a knife, etc. On account of the smuggling-in of martyrs, the Pope was called upon to declare who were saints; and in 993 John XV. canonized the first saint in the person of Bishop Ulrich of Augsburg.

In the eleventh century Guibert, abbot of Nogent, raised his voice against the abuses of saintworship in his work, De pignoribus Sanctorum. Violent ridicule was shown by those who sought the intercession of any other than Jesus Christ. Nicolaus of Clemanges, in his De novis celebratibus non instituendis, advocated a return to the practice of the early ages, when the worship of the saints did not prevail to the exclusion of the worship of God. The Reformers lifted up their voices in sternest protest against the practice of the church, and the confessions deny all scriptural warrant for it. The Council of Trent (XXV.) established it, condemning all who denied the efficacy of the intercession of the saints. Modern Roman-Catholic divines endeavor in vain to find a scriptural warrant for it in Rev. v. 8, viii. 8, xx. 4; and, if they appeal to the Disciplina Arcana of the first centuries, Protestants reply by giving a different explanation of that scriptural discipline. The legends of the saints form a large literature, which is full of fancies and falsehoods. Calendars and Martyrologies dating back to the eighth century are in existence. The collection most highly prized in the East is that of Simon Metaphrastes of the twelfth century. The Legenda Aurea of Jacob de Voragine is highly prized in the West. The most important of the later works is the Acta Sanctorum, edited by the Bollandists, [Antwerp, 1643 sqq., Paris, 1673; Mrs. Jamieson: Sacred and Legendary Art, London, 1848, 2 vols.; Legends of the Monastic Orders, 1850; Barinon-Gould: Lives of the Saints, London, 1873-77, 15 vols.]. SALAMIS, the largest and most important city of the Island of Cyprus; situated on the eastern shore of the island, near Magdeburg, April 6, 1892; d. at Wolfenbittel, Oct. 3, 1738. He studied at Halle and Jena, and published, besides other works, a Vollständige Historie der Augsburgischen Konfession (Halle, 1737—35, 3 vols.), a Vollständige Geschichte des Tridentinischen Conciliums, which, however, did not appear until after his death (1741-45, 3 vols.). His biography was written in Latin by Ballenstedt, Helmstadt, 1738.

SALMANTICENSES. Towards the close of the sixteenth and in the beginning of the seventeenth century the hostility between the Dominicans and the Jesuits became very intense in Spain. Pope Paul V. commanded the conflicting parties to keep silence: but the controversy continued; and at Salamanca, the headquarters of the Dominican camp, the professors took an oath to give a pure representation of the views of Augustinian and Thomas Aquinas, without any Semi-Pelagian coloring. For this purpose the celebrated Collegii Salamancenses curcus theologicus was published, Salamanca, 1631 sqq., 9 vols.; Lyons, 1679, 12 vols.; new ed., Paris, 1871 sqq., 20 vols. It was directed against Molinos. The principal authors were Antonius de Olivero, Dominicus a Theresia, and Johannes ab Annunciatione Zöckeler.

SALMASIUS, Claudius, b. at Semur in Burgundy, April 15, 1588; d. at the baths of Sp authorize, Sept. 3, 1653; one of the greatest scholars of his age, and famous for his Defensio regia pro Carolo I. (1649), which called forth the sharp answer of Milton. He studied at Paris and Heidelberg; was in 1632 appointed professor of classical literature and language at Leyden; and went in 1650 to Sweden, on the invitation of Queen Christine. Among his works several—De primatu papae, De episcopatibus et presbyteris, De transsubstantiatio, Super Herodote, etc.—have theological interest.

SALMON, Alphonso, b. at Toledo on Oct. 8, 1515; d. at Naples, Feb. 13, 1585. He studied at Alcala and Paris; joined Ignatius Loyola, and became one of the founders and most active members of the Society of Jesus. Fanatical in his resistance to the Reformation, he visited almost every country in Europe, was present at the Council of Trent as papal theologian, and wrote commentaries on most of the books of the New Testament.

SALT (טַלָּן) plays in the Bible an important part: in the Old Testament through its use in all sacrifices (Lev. ii. 13; Mark ix. 40), and in the New Testament through its symbolical application to the circulation of Christians in the world (Matt. v. 13). The Mosaic injunction rests upon the Oriental custom of eating salt, on the ratification of a covenant, as the pledge of perpetual and mutual friendship between the contracting parties, because of its property of preservation. Hence a lasting covenant was called "a covenant of salt" (Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chron. 20:8, 12; 2 Kgs. 8:11).

SALEM WITCHCRAFT. See Witchcraft.
The salt thus used was obtained principally from the valley of salt (2 Sam. viii. 13), south of the Dead Sea, where the soil is entirely covered with salt, left there every year on the recession of the waters; from Jebel Udom, two or three miles south of the Dead Sea, substantially a mountain of rock-salt, about seven miles long, from one mile and a half to three miles wide, and several hundred feet high, and by evaporating Dead Sea water. According to Josephus, only "sodomitisht salt" could be used in the temple [cf. CARPOZ: Appar., p. 718]. The reasons of this regulation were, (1) that this salt was a witness to the terrible consequences of God's wrath, and a constant exhortation to repentance, and (2) it was a product of the Holy Land itself. But since Oriental salt contains many mineral impurities, by exposure to rain or dampness it may lose its savor: hence our Lord's expression (Matt. v. 13; Mark ix. 50; Luke xiv. 34). Christians lose their savor by undue exposure to the sinful world. (By "salt-pits" (Zeph ii. 9) hence "a salt land" was a barren land (Job xxxix. 6; Jer. xvii. 6). The necessity of employing "true salt," in contrast, is expressed in Job vi. 6. Josephus (Antiq. XII. 3, 3) states, what of course would be understood, that in the temple there was always a great quantity of salt. It was also for sale in the temple-marts (Matt. de usu saltis, Giessen, 1802).

SALTZMANN, Friedrich Rudolph, b. at Strassburg, March 9, 1749; studied jurisprudence and history; travelled as tutor to Baron von Stein, afterwards Prussian minister of state; settled in 1776 in his native city, and began publishing a political paper, but was suspected of aristocratic tendency, and compelled to flee in 1783. After the fall of Robespierre he returned, and resumed his activity as an editor. But in the mean time a great change had taken place in his inner religious life. He had become acquainted with the French and German mystics; and though he kept aloof from the so-called spiritists, Messner, Cagliostro, etc., he became himself a pronounced mystic. Of his religious writings, Es wird alles neu werden (1802-10), Das christl. Erbauungsblatt (appearing from 1805 for several years), Blicke in das Geheimnis des Rathschlusses Gottes (1810), Religion der Bibel (1811), found many readers on both sides of the Rhine, and even in Northern Germany. He died after 1820. MATTER.

SALVATION. See REDEMPTION.

SALVATION ARMY, THE, is a body of men and women, joined together after the fashion of an army, with a general, colonels, majors, captains, and lower officers, under whom are the privates, bent, as they claim, upon presenting the gospel in a manner to attract the attention of the lowest classes. Its organizer and leader is William Booth, by baptism a member of the Church of England, but by conviction a Wesleyan, and afterwards a minister of the Methodist New Connection. In this latter capacity he had great success; but in 1861 he withdrew from the regular ministry, and devoted himself to independent evangelistic work. In 1865 he came to the east of London, and there began the movement which resulted in the organization of the "Salvation Army in 1876. The name comes from the methods adopted and the object aimed at. The army studiously avoids, as far as may be, religious phraseology, calling its places of meeting "Salvation Warehouses" and "Salvation Stores," puts its notices in military or startling terms, and deliberately adopts peculiar posters and window placards to announce its presence and work. Its object is everywhere to make a sensation. The expenses of the army are borne by collections. Care is taken to have its pecuniary affairs as public as possible, and its expenses low. In doctrine it is broadly evangelical. It does not teach sinless perfection, but the possibility of "a heart from which the blood of Christ has cleansed all unrighteousness." It does not seek to draw persons from existing churches; but it desires to make converts among the most abandoned classes, who lie outside of religious influences. Much noise and confusion attend its operations, but these it considers necessary accomplishments. The members of the army wear a peculiar though plain uniform, parade the streets with martial drumming, banners, and singing, are obligated to go anywhere they may be sent, and exhibit courage bordering upon recklessness. In November, 1853, according to report of the army’s commission for the United States of America,” the army had 500 stations, 1,400 officers wholly paid by the work in England. It had spread all over Great Britain, the North of Ireland, the United States of America, and had entered Sweden, France, India, Africa, and New Zealand. In the United States it had 50 stations, including 3 in California, 99 permanently engaged officers, and during 1852 and 1853 had purchased, by contributions of those blessed through the work of the army, nine properties valued at $83,000. The War Cry, the army’s organ, had a circulation of twenty thousand weekly. See All about the Salvation Army, London, 1883, 28 pp.

In 1853 the army was expelled from several cantons of Switzerland (Geneva, Bern, and Neuchatel) as disturbers of the peace.

Salve, a salutatory formula of great solemnity, is used as the opening word in many celebrated Latin hymns, of which we mention, Salve, caput cruæntatum, one of the seven passion-hymns by St. Bernard, translated by Mrs. Charles (Christian Life in Song), "Hail, thou Head! so bruised and wounded;" by Alford (Year of Praise), "Hail! that Head with sorrows bowing;" by Baker (Hymns, Ancient and Modern), "O sacred Head, surrounded." — Salve, flamma, translated into English (l.c.), “Hail, festal day! ever exalted in heaven;” and by Kynaston (Lyra Messianica), “Jesus hail! the world’s salvation.”

Salve, festa dies, toto venerabile, a resurrection-hymn by Venantius Fortunatus, translated into English by Mrs. Charles (l.c.), “Hail, festal day! over exalted high;” in Lyra Eucharistica, “Hail, festal day! forever more adored;” in Schaff’s Christ in Song, “Hail, day of days, in peals of praise.” — Salve, festa dies, tota venerabile, a resurrection-hymn by Venantius Fortunatus, translated into English by Mrs. Charles (l.c.), “Hail, festal day! over exalted high;” in Lyra Eucharistica, “Hail, festal day! forever more adored;” in Schaff’s Christ in Song, “Hail, day of days, in peals of praise.” — Salve, flores martyrum, by Prudentius, translated into English by Chandler (Hymns of the Primitive Church), “Hail, infant martyrs;” by Caswall (Hymns and Poems), “Flowers of martyrdom;” — Salve, flores martyrum, a passion-hymn, translated into English by Mrs. Charles (l.c.), “All the world’s salvation, hail;” and by Kynaston (Lyra Messianica), “Jesus hail! the world’s salvation.”

Salvianus, b. in Gaul, probably at Cologne [Treves], in the beginning of the fifth century; d. as presbyter, in Marseilles, after 495; was an elegant and prolific writer. Of his works are still extant, De acarvita, written about 440, first edited by Richardson, Basel, 1528, a denunciation of the avarice of the laity, in favor of the church; De gubernatione Dei, often called De providentia, written about 451, first edited by Brascicanus, Basel, 1530, a defence of divine Providence, somewhat resembling the De civitate Dei by Augustine; nine letters to different persons. Collected editions of his works were published by Pithecous (Paris, 1580), Baluzius (Paris, 1669), [C. Halm (Berlin, 1878), F. Pauly (Wien, 1883). There is a French translation by Grégoire and Colombet, Paris, 1834. See also F. Pauly: Die handschriftliche Überlieferung des Salutianus, Wien, 1881 (41 pp.)].

Salzburg. From Bohemia, the Hussite movement penetrated into the diocese of Salzburg; and in 1420 Archbishop Eberhard III. was compelled to suppress the heresy. The imperial court was determined to suppress that heresy in his countries. Apparently he succeeded. Nevertheless, the very first writings of Luther caused a singular commotion throughout the whole population; and when Stauditz, Paul Speratus, Stephan Agricola, and Georg Scharer had successively preached the views of the Reformation in the country, the archbishop, Wolfgang Dietrich, found it necessary not only to silence and expel a number of preachers, but to cleanse the whole body. In 1423 he issued a decree ordering the inhabitants of the city of Salzburg either to return to the Roman-Catholic faith, or to leave the country within a month; and in 1614 the edict was extended to the whole country, and enforced by means of a swarm of Capuchins and a troop of soldiers. Again, for some time, the country seemed on the right path, until in 1656 a priest in the Tesserenger valley discovered a whole congregation of secret Lutherans. They used the Bible, Luther’s Catechisms, Spangenberg’s psalms, and Urban Rhein’s Seele und Leben (medicine for the soul) for their edification and instruction; and they assembled often in the dead of night for prayer and singing. The archbishop, Maximilian Gandulphe, ordered them to present their confession of faith: but, the confession being a very simple statement of purely biblical views, it was found utterly heretical; and, in spite of the interference of the elector of Brandenburg and the diet of Ratibon, the archbishop gave his subjects the option between recantation and exile. The next year, however, Gandulphe died; and the question was dropped by his successor. But in 1728 Leopold Anton ascended the episcopal chair, and his principal object was to amass power and wealth for himself and his family. The heresy question seemed to him a suitable point of operation; and he declared that he would have the heretics out of the country, even though all the field should be covered with thorns and thistles. The Jesuits were let loose on the population, and chicaneries were very rapidly hurrying on actual persecutions. The old conditions were revived, — recantation, or exile; and, in order to suit the purposes of the archbishop, exile was made to mean confiscation of property, and renunciation of family. As such measures were utterly at variance with the stipulations of the peace of Westphalia, complaints were made both to the emperor in Vienna, and to the diet at Ratisbon; and Prussia, Denmark, Holland, and England interfered. The archbishop charged a committee with investigating the whole matter, and placing it on a legal footing. The committee travelled from county to county to register the names of the Protestants, and hear their complaints; and as it gained promises of religious freedom, and justice in every respect, the Protestants were not slow in coming forward. But, when the archiepiscopal government discovered that no less than 20,075 persons wished to separate from the Roman-Catholic Church, measures were taken to suppress the movement. Austrian troops were sent for, and quartered upon the Protestant households; and a kind of dragonades was introduced. Only with great difficulty could the Protestants obtain permission to leave the country, and their children and property were retained. In this great emergency the King of Prussia disregarded the imperial policy. He threatened to adopt a similar policy towards his Roman-Catholic subjects, and formally invited the Salzburg Protestants to come and settle under his sceptre. The archbishop was compelled to yield, and a regular emigration was arranged. No less than 18,000 people were removed to Prussia, and Leopold Anton lived to see thorns and thistles cover large tracts of his country. See Glück: Emigrationsgeschichte der Salzb. Luth. Kirche, Leipzig, 1794; Funk: Geschichte des Auswander unsvon den Salzburgern, Leipzig, 1827; [CLARUS: Die Ausw. d. prot. gesinnt. SAMARIA AND THE SAMARITANS. Samaria is the name of a city of the province. 1. City. It was, according to 1 Kings xvi. 23, 24, built by Omri, the sixth king of Israel, who, after the burning-down of his palace at Tirzah, bought a hill from a certain Shemer, on which he built a city which he called Shomron, after the former possessor. Samaria continued to be the metropolis of Israel for the remaining centuries of that kingdom, existing as a fortified city; for Josephus describes it as a very strong city (Ant., XIII. 10, 2). John Hyrcanus took it after a year's siege, and razed it (Josephus, Wars, I. 2, 7, Ant., XIII. 10, 2). By directions of Gabinius, Samaria and other demolished cities were rebuilt (Ibid., XIV. 5. 3); but its more effectual rebuilding was undertaken by Herod the Great, who called it Sebaste, in honor of the Emperor Augustus. It was colonized by six thousand veterans and others, for whose support a district surrounding the city was appropriated. Sebaste is to-day a poor village.

2. Province. As such, Samaria is first mentioned 1 Mac. x. 30, then in the New Testament (Luke xvii. 11; John iv. 4 sq.; Acts i. 8, viii. 1, 5, ix. 31, xv. 3), and by Josephus (War, III. 3, 4). Two hours from Samaria, towards the south-east, lies Nablus, the ancient Sechem, the seat of Samaritan cult, where, for a very long time, the Samaritans, or, as they call themselves, the Shomerim, i.e., custodians of the law, lived.

3. Samaritans. When Cyrus permitted the Jews to rebuild the temple, the colonists of Samaria asked to be permitted to take part in the work of building (Ez. iv. 2). On being refused to do so, the Samaritans succeeded in preventing the erection of the temple for twenty years, and offered the same unrelenting opposition to Nehemiah, when in 445 he set about rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, which till now had lain in ruins. They welcomed with open arms any refugees from Jerusalem, who for crime, or to escape the strict Mosaic rule there established, might wish to leave their country (Jos.: Ant., XI. 8, 7). No doubt the stern reforms introduced by Nehemiah on his second visit (Neh. x. 2) were partly due to the complaints of the Samaritans against the laxity which had crept in during his absence, and to these an asylum was always open at Shechem. The alienation between the two nations was finally completed when the Samaritans at last succeeded in erecting a rival temple on Gerizim, and endeavored to transfer thither the prestige of the older one of Jerusalem. The immediate occasion of the undertaking was the refusal of Manasseh, brother of Jaddua the high priest, and son-in-law to Samballat the Samaritan, to dissolve his irregular marriage in obedience to the admonition of Nehemiah, who was his father-in-law; for his constancy, Samballat excited himself to erect a rival sanctuary, and there established him in the high priesthood. With this the separation between the Jews and Samaritans became final, and up to this day they have perpetuated their mutual hatred. On the troubled scene of politics which opened after the death of Alexander the Great the Samaritans suffered equally with the Jews. Under Ptolemy Lagi, a colony of Jews and Samaritans was deported into Egypt. Under John Hyrcanus, their temple was destroyed about 130 B.C.; and many Samaritans emigrated to Damascus, where they settled as a body. Under the Romans, they first enjoyed many liberties; but their unquiet spirit caused them often great troubles. Under Vespasian, a revolt was quelled with the loss of 11,600 persons, and Sichem received a garrison and the name Flavia Neapolis. The rest of which they enjoyed under the rule of the Antonines was interrupted under Commodus, Septimius Severus, Constantine, and Constantius. Quieter times fell to their lot under Julian, Valentinian, and Valens: their fortunes varied under the later emperors. Laws unfavorably affecting their position were passed by Honorius and Theodosius II. The latter even forbade them to erect new synagogues. The hatred with which they had formerly regarded their Jewish rivals began to concentrate itself upon the Christians, now that the new faith had become that of the empire. In the year 484, while under the rule of Zeno, they attacked the church at Nablus, maimed the bishop, and murdered many of the worshipers, committing the like atrocities at Cesarea also. Under Anastasius and Justinian, fresh troubles broke out. In 529 a general revolt of the Samaritans took place against the Christians. The severity with which this was put down by Justinian, followed by the enactment of severe laws against them, completely crushed the Samaritan people. Many fled to Persia; many became Christians. In 636 they fell under Mohammedan rule. During the time of the crusades they came, in 1099, into the power of the crusaders; and, with the exception of some temporary occupations by the Saracens, remained under the Christians till 1244, when they again became subject to Mohammedan rule. Since 1517 they have been under Turkish rule. Brief notices of the Samaritans and their country appear in the works of Benjamin of Tudela (twelfth century). But little was known of them till the close of the sixteenth century, when Joseph Scaliger first visited them, and opened communications with them, addressing a letter to the congregations at Nablus and Cairo. Answers arrived in 1580, but not till after Scaliger's death. In 1671 Robert Huntington, bishop of Raphoe, chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, paid a visit to Nablus, provided himself with papers, and in conjunction with Thomas Marshall, rector of Lincoln's College, Oxford, carried on a correspondence with the Samaritans, which lasted, with
The Samaritans have two more days of assembly, though they do not count them as holidays, termed Summōth, on which the number of the congregation is taken; and, in return, every male over twenty years of age presents the priest with half a shekel, in accordance with Exod. xxx. 12-14, receiving from him a calendar for the coming six months, prepared from a table in his possession. From these offerings the priest gains his living. He may consecrate any of his family that he pleases to the priesthood, provided the candidate be twenty-five years of age, and never have suffered his hair to be cut. Like other Oriental, he never removes his turban, and thus is not easily to be distinguished from the rest of the congregation; but, in accordance with Lev. x. 6, he does not "rend his clothes" by wearing a slit on his sleeve, as other Samaritans; and, when the roll of the law is taken from the ark, he, like his assistants, places a cloth, which they call talith, around his head. They wear white turbans; ordinarily they are compelled, by way of distinction from Mohammedans, to wear them of a pale-red color. They may cut their hair, or not, as they please, but not their beards, this being forbidden in Lev. x. 15. Women must let their hair grow, and wear no ear-rings, because of them the golden calf was made. For fear of scandalizing the Mohammedans, none but the old ones venture to attend the synagogue. When a boy is born, great rejoicing is held: his circumcision always takes place on the eighth day after birth, even though it be a sabbath. Boys marry as early as fifteen or sixteen, girls at twelve. The Samaritans may marry Christian or Jewish girls, provided they become Samaritans. When a man has a childless wife, he may take a second, but, if she also be barren, not a third. Divorces, though permitted, are uncommon. The dead are prepared for burial by their own friends: the whole body is washed, but especially the hands and feet. The burial takes place, if possible, before sunset the same day, accompanied with the recitation of a litany for the dead. The following is a part of a litany for the dead:

"Lord Jehovah, Elohim, for thy mercy and for thine own sake, and for thy name, and for thy glory, and for the sake of our lords Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and our lords Moses and Aaron and Eleazar and Ittamar and Phinehas and Joshua and Caleb, and our lords the holy angels, and the seventy elders, and the holy mountain of Gerizim, Beth El. If thou acceptest this prayer, may there go forth from before thee holy countenance a gift sent to protect the spirit of thy servant N., the son of N., the son of N., . . . daughter from the sons of Israel who flock to Mount Gerizim, Beth El. Amen. Through Moses the trustee. Amen. Amen."}

These readings are continued every day to the next sabbath, the women of the family watching near the grave. On the sabbath it is visited by the whole congregation, except the women who eat there together, reciting part of the law, and singing hymns, finishing the recitation later in the day with the relations.

passages from the present Hebrew text, often agreeing with the Septuagint. It is reprinted in the London Polyglot. [The whole Pentateuch is divided into nine hundred and sixty-four paragraphs, or συγγραφά, and is halved in Lev. vii. 15 (Authorized Version).] As to its critical character, there has always been a difference of opinion; and for nearly two hundred years one of the most extraordinary controversies on record was kept up. The leader in this controversy was J. Morin, who placed the Samaritan Pentateuch far above the received text; and in this opinion he was followed by men like Capellus and others. Others, as De Dieu, Hottinger, Buxtorf, took the opposite view; and while they maintained the superiority of the Hebrew text, yet in doubtful cases, when the Samaritan had an "unquestionably clearer" reading, they would adopt it. Here the matter rested until 1815, when Gesenius abolished the remnant of the authority of the Samaritan Pentateuch by publishing his De Pent. Sam. Origine, Indole et Auctorialie. The subject was taken up again by Kirchheim, and of late by Kohn. As to their pronunciation of the Hebrew, they differ somewhat from the usual. [According to Petermann's transcription, the first verse in Genesis would read thus: "Barašet bara eluwem it asšanemit ašre." ] Besides the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch, the Samaritans have also versions of the same. The most important is the Samaritan Version [published by A. Brüll, in Hebrew characters, in 1875].

The Samaritan, in Greek (Ἐὐαγγελία), probably the same which is mentioned in the Hexaplia of Origen.

The Arabic version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, made by Abu Said in Egypt, on the basis of the Arabic translation of Saadia. An edition of this version was commenced by Kuenen at Leyden. Genesis was published in 1851; Exodus and Leviticus, in 1854.

The other literature of the Samaritans is very unimportant. They have ten prayer-books for the synagogue, and besides a collection of hymns, which they call Darrin ("string of pearls") and Deftor ("book"). Of their chronicles, we mention the Samaritan Chronicle, or Book of Joshua (sent to Scaliger by the Samaritans of Cairo in 1584: it was edited by Juynboll, Leyden, 1848), the Chronicle of Abul-Fath, full of fables, and containing little useful matter [published recently by Vilmar, with the title Abulfatkā Annales Samaritani, etc., Gotha, 1865].

Sects.—Concerning the sects, Abul-Fath's statement is as follows: A sect appeared calling themselves "Dostān," or "The Friends," which varied in many respects from the traditions of their fathers respecting many religious matters. Thus they held for impure a fountain into which a dead insect had fallen, altered the time for reckoning the purification of women and commencement of feasts, forbade the eating of eggs which had been laid, allowing only to be eaten which were found inside a slain bird; and the raising of snakes and cemeteries as unclean, and held any one whose shadow fell upon a grave as impure for seven days. They rejected the words "Blessed be our God forever," and substituted Elohim for Jehovah; denied that Gerizim had been the first sanctuary of God; upset the Samaritan reckoning for the feasts, giving thirty days to each month, rejecting the feasts and order of fasts, and the portions due to the Levites. They counted the fifty days to Pentecost from the sabbath, the day after the first day of the feast of the tabernacles, not from the Sunday like the other Samaritans. Their priests, without becoming impure, could enter a house suspected of infection, as long as they did not speak. When a pure and a doubtful house stood side by side, the condition of the latter was decided by watching whether a clean or unclean bird first settled upon it. On the sabbath they might only eat and drink from earthen vessels, which, if defiled, could not be purified: they might give no food or water to their cattle; this was done on the day previous. Their high priest was a certain Zārā, who had been turned out of his own community for immorality.

At a later period lived Dūsūs. Being condemned to death for adultery, he was respite on the promise of sowing disension among the Samaritans by founding a new sect. He went to Akser (near Nablūs), and formed a friendship with a Samaritan distinguished for his learning and piety. Compelled, however, to fly for his life on account of a false accusation which he had brought against his friend, he took shelter at Shueike with a widow-woman named Amentiu, in whose house he composed many writings; but, finding that a hot pursuit after him was still maintained, he retired to a cave, where he perished of hunger, and his body was eaten by dogs. Before his departure, however, he left his books with his hostess, enjoining her to let no one read them unless he first bathed in the tank hard by. Accordingly, when Levi, the high priest's nephew, arrived with seven others in search of him, they all bathed, one after the other, in the tank; and each, as he emerged from the water, exclaimed, "I believe in thee, Jehovah, and in Dūsūs thy servant, and his sons and daughters:" Levi adding, when his turn came, "Woe to us if we deny Dūsūs, the prophet of God." They then took the writings of Dūsūs, and found that they differed from the received law, more even than Ezra. They concealed them, and on their return to Nablūs reported that Dūsūs had disappeared before they arrived, they knew not whither. At the next passover, Levi had to read out Exod. xii. 22 in the synagogue; but for "byssop" he substituted "thyme." Corrected by the congregation, he still persevered, crying, "This is right, as God hath said by his prophet Dūsūs, on whom be peace! Ye are all worthy of death for denying the prophetic office of his servant Dūsūs, altering the feasts, falsifying the great name of Jehovah, and persecuting the second prophet of God, whom he hath revealed from Sinai. Woe unto you that you have rejected and do not follow him!" Levi was stoned. His friends dipped a palm-leaf in his blood, and ordained that whoever would read Dūsūs' writings, and see the leaf, must first fast seven days and nights. They cut off their hair, shaved their beards, and at their funerals performed strange ceremonies. On the sabbath they would not move from their place, and kept their feasts only on this day, during which they would not remove their hands from their sleeves. When one of their friends died, they would gird him with a girdle, put a stick in his hand, and shoes on his feet, saying, “If we rise, he will at once get up;” believing that the dead man, as soon as he was laid in the grave, would rise and go to paradise. As to the age in which Dusis lived, it must have been long before Origen; for this latter, in his Commentary, on John xiii. 27 (ed. Lommatzsch, ii. 49), tells us that a “certain Dositheus arose, and claimed to be the Messiah.” His followers are called Dositheans, who have his books, and tell wonderful stories of him, as if he had not died, and is still alive somewhere. This agrees with the statement of Abulfath concerning Dusis. According to Origen, Dositheus must have lived long before him, probably in the first, or at least in the second century of the Christian era. That he was the teacher or pupil of Simon Magnus, as some have asserted, is an untenable conjecture.

SAMSON, i.e., the destroyer, was an Israelite of the tribe of Dan (Judg. xii. 2). His birth was announced to his mother, who had long been barren. He was to be a Nazarite from his birth. The mother was directed, accordingly, to conform her own regimen to the tenor of the Nazaritish law, and strictly abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquor, and from every species of impure food. Samson was born at Zorah (Josh. xv. 33, xix. 41). When he was grown up, he sat at the camp of the Danites (Judg. xii. 25), between Zorah and Eshtaol, where “the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times.” From this time his career commences, and his deeds may be divided into six parts.

1. Samson’s Wedding. — Samson goes to Timnah, where he met one of the daughters of the Philistines: “it was of Jehovah.” The parents object to such a union at first, but at last yield to their son’s wish. On his first visit to his future bride, he slew a lion without a weapon; and on his second visit, to espouse her, he found the skeleton, denuded of the flesh by the birds and jackals, occupied by a swarm of bees (Judg. xiv. 1–8). At his wedding-feast he propounded a riddle, the solution of which referred to his obtaining a quantity of honey from the carcass of a slain lion; and the clandestine manner in which his guests got possession of the ewe to the enigma cost thirty Philistines their lives (Judg. xiv. 10–20).

2. Samson’s Enmity against the Philistines. — The ill treatment which he had received at the hands of his father-in-law, who, upon a frivolous pretext, had given away his daughter in marriage to another man, prompted Samson to a vindictive deed, which was executed by securing a multitude of jackals, and, by tying firebrands to their tails, setting fire to the cornfields of his enemies. The indignation of the Philistines, on discovering the author of the outrage, vented itself on the thirty Philistines who had been the remote occasion of it, in the burning of their house, in which both father and daughter perished. This cruelty provoked such indignation, and he swore them “hip and thigh with a great slaughter.”

3. The Battle Râmath-lehi, i.e., at the lifting-up of the Jawbone. — Having taken his residence at Étam, he was thence dislodged by consenting to a pusillanimous arrangement on the part of his own countrymen, by which he agreed to surrender himself in bonds, providing he would not himselfs fall upon him and kill him. Being brought, in this apparently helpless condition, to a place called, from the event, Levi ("a jaw"), his preternatural potency suddenly put itself forth, and snapping the cords asunder, and snapping up the jawbone of an ass, he dealt so effectually about him, that a thousand men were slain on the spot. Weary with his exertions, Samson became faint from thirst. God heard his prayer; and, carrying a stream to gush from a hollow rock hard by; and Samson gave it the name of En-hak-kore (i.e., the well of him that heareth).

4. The Gates of Gaza at Hebron (Judg. xvi. 1-3).

—Samson suffered himself weakly to be drawn into the company of a woman of loose character at Gaza. The inhabitants attempt to detain him at Gaza by closing the gates of the city, and making them fast; but Samson, apprised of it, rose in the night, and, breaking away the bolts, bars, and hinges, departed, carrying the gates to a hilltop near Hebron.

5. The Attempted Outwitting in the Valley of Sorek (Judg. xvi. 4-14).

—Here he lived with Delilah. Tempted by the bribe of the Philistines, she employs all her arts to worm from him the secret of his strength. Three times he deceived her, abasing at the same time the Philistines lying in wait.

—At last, in a moment of weakness, Samson disclosed to Delilah the fact that his strength lay in his hair, —not that it really lay in his hair, but in the fact that it arose from his relation to God as a Nazarite. The Philistines, having deprived him of sight, at first immured him in a dungeon, and made him grind at a mill like a slave. In the process of time his hair recovered its growth, and Samson experienced the help of Jehovah (Judg. xvi. 28). A feast was celebrated in honor of Dagon, and Samson was ordered to be brought out to be made a laughing-stock for the immense multitude. He grasped the massive pillars; and, bowing with resistless force, the whole building fell upon the lords and upon all the people that were therein. "So the death which he slew at his death were more than which he slew in his life." His brethren buried him near Ramah, where they lived in habitations paved the way for his judicial administration; and, besides his death (xxv. 1), only his apparition at Endor is recorded (xxviii.). Samuel's prophetic activity was not confined to a mere receiving and communicating the divine word, but he also founded and guided those societies which are known as the schools of the prophets. The spirit of prophecy, it seems, had in the time of Samuel gained possession of many. In order to keep away all impure elements, it was necessary to conserve and purify those of whom the Spirit had thus taken a hold by teaching and discipline; and to achieve this Samuel formed them into one congregation near Ramah, where they lived in habitations (Heb. Naiath, xix. 19 sq.). Samuel "standing appointed over them" (xix. 20), ruling and leading them by the power of his spirit.

Samuel's judicial activity was not only the outgrowth of the prophetic office, but was also constantly guided by it. We must not only suppose that he dispensed judgment with prophetic wisdom, but that he also pleaded the cause of the people as a man who had the spirit of God. Although Samuel had never drawn the sword, except in one case (1 Sam. xv. 33), yet he was a hero. He was the first who gained such a decisive victory over the Philistines, that all the days of Samuel they never again attacked the Israelites (vii. 13); and the Eben-ezer stone was the sign of victory which Samuel put up. As to the manner in which Samuel exercised his judicial office, we know that he annually visited, in discharge... of his duties as ruler, the three chief sanctuaries, — Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpeh (vii. 16). At other times he lived at Ramah, and exercised his functions there (vii. 17). When he became old, he appointed his sons Joel and Abiah as judges, not to take his place, but to relieve him. They were judges at Beersheba (viii. 2). But these sons possessed not their father's integrity of spirit, but "turned aside after lue, took bribes, and perverted judgment" (viii. 3); so the elders of the people came to him and said, "Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king" (viii. 5). Although the Lord fulfilled the desire of the people, yet the people sinned in preferring the splendor of an outward, visible kingdom to the glory of the invisible kingdom of Jehovah (vii. 7, x. 19, xii. 12, 10 sq.). At the command of God, Samuel anointed and made Saul king, and then retired from public office (xii.). Saul proved himself incapable of leading the people. Samuel's help was often needed. When after the rejection of Saul, and David's anointing to the throne, Samuel felt assured that David was the man after God's heart, able to build up the kingdom of Israel, he retired entirely from public life. Only once again he came forward before his death to defend the anointed of the Lord against the rejected by the Lord (xix. 18-24). It may be that in his retirement Samuel put in writing what is called (1 Chron. xxix. 29) the "Book of Samuel."

Samuel's Priesthood. — In this direction Samuel only filled a gap out of necessity. Eli was dead, and his two sons also. The ark was taken, Shiloh was desolated. In this time of need Samuel restored the orphaned priesthood by building an altar at Ramah (1 Sam. vii. 17). Here, as well as at Mizpeh (vii. 6), Gilgal (x. 15), and Bethlehem (xvi. 2 sq.), he offered sacrifices. His priestly function, however, consisted not merely in sacrificing, but more especially in praying for the people (vii. 5, 8, viii. 6, xii. 16-23); and the efficacy of the power of his prayer is often mentioned (1 x. 6; Jer. xiv. 1.).

In reviewing the whole career of Samuel, we notice that he forms a transition period. He is the last judge, and mediates the reconstruction of the theocracy by founding the royal and prophetic offices, which again were of the greatest influence for the formation of the priestly office. Some regard Samuel as a type of John the Baptist. It cannot be denied that there are many striking parallels between both, but the Baptist's activity was not as comprehensive as Samuel's. John was nothing but a voice of one crying in the wilderness, whilst Samuel had to reform and to guide the whole religious and political life of the nation. Samuel died at Ramah (1 Sam. xxxv. 1, xxxviii. 3). All Israel lamented him. He was buried in his house at Ramah. See the works of Knobel: Prophet h. Debr., ii. 28 sq.; Köster: Die Propheten des A. u. E. NAEGELSHEIM.

SAMUEL, Books of, so called because he is the prominent figure in their history, not because he was their author. They originally formed one book, as the Massoretic note to 1 Sam. xxviii. 24, which states that this verse is the middle of the book, incontestably proves. In the Septuagint they are called "The First and Second Book of the Kings." Daniel Bomberg was the first to introduce the division into the printed Hebrew text (Venice, 1517). The Book of Samuel links itself directly to Judges, which presents the confusion of that period by showing how the monarchy arose, and reached its height, and divides itself into three principal parts: (A) The history of Samuel, the last judge and the prophetic founder of the monarchy (1 Sam. i.-xii.); (B) The history of Saul, the first king of Israel (xiii.-xxxi.); (C) The history of David (2 Sam. 1.-xxiv.).

The death of David is given in 1 Kings. The book is a unit, but flows not from one source, but from several, which the author combines, without, however, being able always to disguise the fact. But the modern critics overdo the matter when they find everywhere contradictions. And they do not agree in tracing the sources. For instance, M. Duncker, Seinecke, and Reuss try to make out that the second part rests upon three different and mutually exclusive accounts: (1) xi., which they say is the original historical account; (2) ix. 1.-x. 16; (3) viii., x. 17-27. Dillmann and Wellhausen trace it to two sources: (1) ix. 1-10, 16, x. 27-xi. 11, 15; (2) xii. 10, 17-27, x. 12-14. Wellhausen considers the second account as unhistorical, and of exilian or post-exilian origin. Dillmann maintains that one or the other must be false. But since the editor of the book, if he did really make up his history out of two different sources, evidently considered them of equal value, and mutually supplementary, the first question to be answered is, Was he not right? Of course, if there is no living God who regulates the future in its smallest details, and can reveal it, then both accounts are equally unhistorical. But, if there be such a God, then there is no difficulty in accepting both accounts as true, and fitting together.

It is true that in First Samuel there are told several similar stories. — Saul's inspiration (x. 10-12 and xix. 22-24), his rejection as king (xiii. 8-14 and xv. 12 sqq.), his madness (xviii. 10 sq. and xix. 9 sq.), David's anointing to the throne, Samuel felt assured that the Lord against the rejected by the Lord (xix. 18-24). It may be that in his retirement Samuel put in writing what is called (1 Chron. xxix. 29) the "Book of Samuel."
be supplied from 1 Chron. xx. 5. But the attempts (Theniis and Wellhausen) to make up deficiencies by the aid of the LXX. are conjectural, and more or less arbitrary.

While the author of Kings regularly names his sources, the author of Samuel does this only once (2 Sam. i. 18). But it is probable that the author had recourse to the official records spoken of in 1 Chron. xxix. 20. The book contains Ps. xviii. and the "last words of David" (2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7). The time of composition was after David's death (2 Sam. v. 5), after the separation of the kingdom, but before the downfall of Judah (1 Sam. xxvii. 6). Many rabbis make Jeremiah to be the author. But in truth, neither author nor definite date can be assigned to it. The author is, however, no mere compiler, but one, who, in the true prophetic spirit, made thorough use of the sources. The book takes high rank in literary and historical respects. The style is classic and graphic. The author comes out in his statement of many things which were in plain contradiction to the Mosaic law, and in his faithful and unvarnished account of David's failings, notwithstanding his prejudice in his favor.

SANBALLAT (Heb., סנבלת, or סנבלת, so Baer and Delitzsch; LXX., Σανβαλλάτις; a name, probably, of Assyro-Babylonian origin, i.e., Sin-baalatti, "Sin [moon-god] bestowed life") is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible, all in the Book of Nehemiah: Neh. ii. 10, 19; iv. 1 sq. (Heb. iii. 33 sqq.), iv. 7 sqq., cf. 15 (Heb. iv. 1 sqq., cf. 9), v. 1-5 sqq., 12-14, xii. 28. He headed the opposition which Nehemiah encountered in carrying out the plan of rebuilding Jerusalem, and re-establishing there a Hebrew national life. See NEHEMIAH.

We are told that Sanballat, and Tobiah "the servant, the Ammonite," were greatly displeased at the news of Nehemiah's coming, because of his interest in "the welfare of the children of Israel" (Neh. ii. 10). On learning of the determination formed by the Hebrews to build the walls of the city, these two, with "Geshem the Arabian," laughed scornfully, and contemptuously accused them of a rebellious purpose against the king, Artaxerxes (ii. 1); i.e., Artaxerxes Longimanus. When in spite of this, Sanballat found the work actually in progress, although still contemptuous, he grew very angry, and roused the hostility of "his brethren and the army of Samaria" (iv. 1 sq. = Heb. iii. 33 sqq.). At length he conspired with Tobiah "the Arabians and the Ammonites and the Ashdodites"—hostile peoples on various sides of Jerusalem—to go up and hinder the work by force (iv. 7 sqq. = Heb. iv. 1 sqq.). The plot, however, became known to Nehemiah, and was abandoned (iv. 15 = Heb. iv. 9). After the wall was finished, Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem endeavored to secure the person of Nehemiah by inviting him to a conference. Four messengers in succession, followed by a letter, in which Sanballat mentioned rumors that charged Nehemiah with treason, failed to entice the latter (vi. 1-5 sqq.); and even the expedient of bribing a man to prophesy danger, and so to induce Nehemiah to shut himself up in the temple, was fruitless (vi. 12-14). After this we hear nothing more of Sanballat, except that a son of "Joia, the son of Eliashib the high priest," was his son-in-law. This alliance seems to have taken place during an absence of Nehemiah from Jerusalem (cf. xiii. 8), and probably betokens a scheme of Sanballat to gain influence among the Hebrews, since he could not successfully oppose them by force (cf. xiii. 7, 8).

It remains to inquire who Sanballat was. He is called "the Horonite" (Heb., דנונא; LXX., Δηοιςκιν; Neh. vi. 10, 19, xiii. 26). We cannot be sure whether this appellation is derived from Horonaim, a city of Moab (Isa. xv. 5, etc., and Mesha-stone), or Beth-horon, in Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3, 5, etc.). In favor of Horonaim is the association of Sanballat with Tobiah the Ammonite and Geshem the Arabian, and more particularly the fact that his daughter's marriage with the high priest's grandson is classed with the marrying of "wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab" (Neh. xiii. 28, cf. 23, 29). Against Horonaim is the lack of the term "Moabite" in connection with Sanballat, although this may be due to the fact (see below) that he did not properly belong to that people. In favor of Beth-horon is Sanballat's apparent residence in the territory of Samaria, and particularly his endeavor to have a meeting with Nehemiah at Ono in Benjamin (see vi. 2 and cf. xli. 35, 35), which cannot have been very far from Beth-horon. In any case his name points to Assyria or Babylonia as the original home of his family. They may have been among the colonists transported to the "western country" by Sargon or Esarhaddon (see those arts.). There is no evidence that Sanballat held any official position in Samaria under the Persian king, but it is reasonable to believe him to be a Persian official, who would hardly have ventured to oppose so persistently one who, like Nehemiah, brought a commission from the king. We know nothing definite about his brethren and the army of Samaria (iv. 2 = Heb. iii. 34); but it seems to have been personal influence, and not official authority, which he exercised over them.

The Sanballat (Σανβαλλάτης) whom Josephus (Ant., XI. 2, 2 sq.) names as satrap of Samaria was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. It is interesting to notice, however, that Josephus calls him a Cuthian (cf. Cuthah, Cuth, a Babylonian city; 2 Kings xxvii. 24, 30), and says he gave his daughter in marriage to Manasses, brother of Jaddus, the high priest, that he might conciliate the favor of the Jewish nation. There may be here some confusion with the earlier biblical Sanballat. FRANCIS BRUNO.

Granada, and acquired great fame as a moral philosopher by his De sacramento matrimonii (Geneva, 1592), though it was severely attacked by some on account of its cynicism and rudeness. His collected works appeared in Venice, 1740, in seven volumes.

SANCHUNIATHON, an old Phoenician scholar living before the Trojan war, is mentioned by Atheneus, Porphyry, and Suidas; and Eusebius adds that Philo translated one of his works into Greek (pουσανιαν). Neither the original nor the translation is extant, but Eusebius gives some extracts, which have been collected and edited by Orelli (Leipzig, 1828) and by C. Mueller, in his Fragmenta historiarum graecorum (Paris, 1849, iii. pp. 590-593). The trustworthiness of these fragments, even the very existence of the author, has been much debated. (See Lobeck: Agapophamus, ii. 1278.) It is now generally agreed, however, that they really contain true historical materials. See Ewald, in Abhandlungen d. Göttinger Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, 1851, vol. v.; and Renan: Mémoire sur Sanchunianthus, Paris, 1858.

Sancroft, William, D.D., English prelate; b. at Freshfield, Suffolk, Jan. 13, 1616; d. there Nov. 24, 1693. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1632, which, however, he lost in 1640 for refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant. On leaving Cambridge he retired to the Continent; returned at the Restoration; became successively chaplain to Cosin, bishop of Durham (1660), university preacher, D.D. and master of his college (1662), dean of York (1663), dean of St. Paul's (1664), archdeacon of Canterbury (1668), and archbishop of Canterbury (1677). He attended Charles II. on his death-bed (February, 1685), and crowned James II. (May 3, 1685). He would not act on James's ecclesiastical commission, and was one of the famous seven bishops (Sancroft of Canterbury, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, White of Peterborough, White of Bath and Wells, and Lloyd of St. Asaph) who refused to read James's Declaration of Indulgence, and in consequence were confined in the Tower, and tried, but were triumphantly acquitted. (See Noughton: Religion in England, new ed. vol. iv. 188-196.) Sancroft also refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, 1688, and was deprived February, 1691. He retired to his native place. His Predestinated Thief (Latin, 1651, Eng. trans., 1814), Sermons (1694), Occasional Sermons (1703), and Nineteen Familiar Letters (1757), have been published. See his life by George D'Ovly (London, 1829, 2 vols.) and by Miss Agnes Strickland, in Lives of the Seven Bishops (1866, pp. 1-103).

SANCTIFICATION is, according to the Scriptures, the fundamental principle of religious morality. Its roots strike down into the holiness of God, and is the main element in the Old Testament conception of God. Jehovah is the Holy One (Isa. vi.), who not only is free from all sin and impurity, but institutes a holy people, and develops it through the Holy Spirit. Christ addressed God as the Holy Father (John xvii. 11); and it is because God is holy that we are urged to sanctify ourselves, or become holy (Lev. xi. 44, 45: 1 Pet. i. 16). This vocation to become holy was symbolized in the arrangements and furniture of the temple, which was altogether holy, and consecrated to the Lord. Sanification consists in withdrawal from the world, and purification to God. Christ, who was holy from his birth, also sanctified himself for the world (John xvii. 19), completing the work by his self-sacrifice on the cross. Christians are designated "saints" (holy ones, Acts ix. 32; Rom. xv. 20), not only because they are called to become holy, but because they receive with their faith in Christ his holiness or righteousness as their own. Christ is made unto believers sanctification (1 Cor. i. 30). Sanification is treated of, now as an act of God, or Christ, or the Holy Spirit, now as an act of man. God sanctifies (John xvii. 17), and man enters into the redeeming, justifying, sanctifying economy of God (Eph. i. 4; 1 Pet. i. 15).

The Roman-Catholic Church confounds sanctification with justification. The Council of Trent (VI. 7) says that justification is not only forgiveness of sin, but the sanctification and renewal of the inner man. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, on the other hand, defines justification as a forensic act, a declaration that a person is righteous. But inasmuch as this forensic act is an actual forgiveness of sins, and a reception into the new life, it is also a creative act. What the Protestant confessions insist on is the clear distinction between the instantaneous act of justification on the part of God and the continued and gradual process of sanctification. By the act of God's justification the believer is made a creature of God: in sanctification he carries on what God has begun, and realizes the Christ in his own life. Justification is the germ of our new life, a single act: sanctification is a gradual process, the development of this new life.

SANCTION, Pragmatic (Pragmatica sanctio, or simply pragmatica), was in the later Roman imperial times a rescript of the emperor, couched in formal language, particularly one respecting the public law. The Tironian symbol, magister of the public church (Cod. Justin., 1-1, § 1 de saec. eccles., i. 2). It was called "pragmatic" because it was issued after consultation and treaty concerning the matter (πράγματα). The term through the middle ages, and down to modern times, has been especially used of laws respecting weighty matters. Of pragmatic sanctions affecting the church, the chief are,—

1. That of Louis IX. of France (1268), which was the first ordinance of the thirteenth century designed as a check to the undue extension of Papal power and to the misuses of the curia, particularly to the excessive demands for tithes, and to the enlargement of Papal reservations respecting benefices. It consists of six articles. It allows all prelates, patrons, and ordinary collators of benefices, the fullest exercise and unhindered preservation of their jurisdiction, and forbids simony. This sanction was the first important law on the subject in the thirteenth century. The elements of Gallicanism have, therefore, always been devoted to show that it is a forgery (comp. R. Rosen: Die pragmatische Sanction, welche unter dem Namen Ludwigs IX., etc., München, 1858); but, after Soldan's exhaustive essay (Zeitschr.-

for hist. Theol., 1856, pp. 371–150), the attempt must be given up. See the text of the edict in Mansi, 23, 1230.

2. That of Charles VII. of France (La pragmatique de Bourges), issued July 7, 1438, in consequence of a national council which endorsed the reform edicts of the Council of Basel, but offered certain modifications respecting the French Church. The edict consists of twenty-three articles, and enforces the decrees of the council. It asserts the superiority of ecclesiastical councils to the Pope, and confirms the admired usages, observances, and statutes of the French Church. It forbids papal encroachments. It was, however, an invasion of the ecclesiastical by the civil power. No account was taken of the Pope in the issuing of the edict. Accordingly, Pius II. (1458–94) declared it to be an infringement of the papal prerogatives, and demanded of the French bishops to bring about its repeal. Charles VII. replied by an appeal to the Council of Basel. It was, indeed, repealed by Louis XI. in 1461, to get the papal assistance in making good his claims upon Naples; but the Parliament of Paris refused to assent to the king's action; and, as he did not get the desired papal help, he let the matter drop. In 1499 Louis XI. renewed the sanction, and it has not been since really withdrawn. See the text in De Vilerault: Ordonances, 13, 267 sqq.; and comp. Hefele: Concilien geschichte, vii. 762; P. Hinschius: Kirchenrecht, 3, 409 sqq.

3. The so-called German Pragmatic Sanction of the diet of Frankfort in 1439. The designation is misleading. It is not a law; since it was not approved by the kings present, and never proclaimed as a law of the empire: it is rather a Compact: Die kurzfristiche Neutraltät während des Baseler Concils, Leipzig, 1858.

SANDEMAN and the SANDEMANIANS. Robert Sandeman—b. at Perth, Scotland, 1718; d. at Danbury, Conn., Sept. 29, 1819, Rev. Hemau Humphrey preached from Josh. xiii. 1, "There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed." The Sandwich Islands had been before the eyes of the Christian public before this. A native, Obookiah by name (b. 1795), was brought to New Haven in 1808. He there met Samuel Mills, and became the first pupil at the Missionary Institute at Cornwall, to whose opening his presence had contributed. Obookiah died a Christian in 1818. Nine Hawaiians were educated in the school before its discontinuance in 1826, and some of them returned to their native land as teachers. Much to their surprise, Bingham and Thurston found that the idols had been destroyed, the priesthood abolished, and human sacrifices discontinued. They had ready access to the people, and by 1822 had reduced the language to writing. That year a printing-press was set up. Mr. Ellis, the devoted Polynesian missionary, visited the islands, and rendered the American missionaries valuable assistance in acquiring the native tongue. In 1823 the missionaries Bishop, Stewart, Richards, Ely, and Goodrich arrived from the United States. The queen-dowager, Keopuhi, died, of measles, on a visit to England in 1824. The first Roman-Catholic missionaries arrived in 1827, were banished at a later time, but reinstated.

in 1839 by the French guns. By 1830 twenty books had been printed in the Hawaiian language. In 1834 there were 50,000 learners in the schools. The translation of the Bible was completed on Feb. 25, 1839. Revivals have swept through the island at various times. In 1833 the natives sent missionaries to the Marquesas. In 1839 the Hawaiian Evangelical Association was formed; the churches being declared independent, so far as government was concerned, of the American Board. The entire expense of the mission up to 1839, when the aid of the American churches was declared no longer necessary, was $1,220,000. The total number admitted to communion up to 1870 was 55,300. At the present time the entire population is Christian. The Roman Catholics have made some headway. The Church of England has a bishop of Honolulu and a handful of converts. The Congregational Church is still dominant. On June 15, 1870, a jubilee celebration was held in the large stone church of Honolulu; three thousand crowding into the building, and as many more unable to get admission. The eloquent Rev. Mr. Kuaea preached in Hawaiian, the king being present. Leprosy prevails upon the islands. The Island of Molokai has been set apart for them, and has a population of 500 lepers.

SANDYS, Edwin, archbishop of York; b. near Hawkhurst, Lancashire, 1516; d. at York, July 10, 1588. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; was converted to Protestantism; elected master of Catherine Hall (1547); was imprisoned in the Tower for espousing the cause of Lady Jane Grey, and then went into voluntary exile. There he was the vice-president of the English college at Worcester (1559), of London (1570), and archbishop of York (1576). He took part in the preparation of the Bishops’ Bible, and in the revision of the Liturgy. See T. D. WHITAKER: Life of Edwin Sandys, prefixed to an edition of the Archbishop's Sermons, London, 1812; also the Sketch by John Ayre, in his edition of the Sermons for the Parker Society, Cambridge, 1841.

SANDYS, George, son of an archbishop of York; b. at the palace there in 1577; d. at Bexley Abbey, Kent, March, 1644; was educated at Oxford; travelled in the East, 1610-12; was in Virginia, 1621-24, as colonial treasurer, building Virginia, 1621-24, as colonial treasurer, building Virginia, 1621-24, as colonial treasurer, building Virginia, 1621-24, as colonial treasurer, building there “the first water-mill, the first iron-works, and the first ship;” and was for some years an attendant of Charles I., and ended life in scholarly retirement. He published a much-valued Relation of his Oriental journey, 1615; translated Ovid's Metamorphoses, partly at Jamestown, Va., and partly at Gravesend, N.Y.; and paraphrased the Psalms (1836), Job, Ecclesiastes, etc. (1838), and the Song of Solomon (1841). These were nearly inaccessible till H. J. Todd issued in 1839 a Selection from them, with prefatory Life: a complete edition was prepared 1872 by R. HOOPER. In James Montgomery's opinion "his psalms are incomparably the most poetical in the English language, and yet they are scarcely known. Charles I., when a prisoner in Carisbrooke Castle, "vastly delighted to read" them. Fragments of one or two of them may be found in some of the hymn-books. Dryden called Sandys "the best versifier of the former age," and Pope thought English poetry much indebted to his translations.

F. M. BIRD.

SANHEDRIN (Matt. v. 22, xxi. 59; Mark xiv. 55, xvi. 1; Luke xxii. 66; John xi. 47; Acts iv. 15, v. 21, 27, 34, vi. 12, 15, xxi. 30, xxiii. 1, 6, 15, 20, 28, xxiv. 20) was the supreme council of the Jewish nation [in and before the time of Christ]. There were two kinds of Synedria, viz., the supreme or metropolitan Sanhedrin, called the Great Sanhedrin, and provincial councils called the Small Sanhedrin, of which we shall speak farther on.

We begin with

1. Number of Members, and their Classification in the Sanhedrin. It consisted of seventy-one members; hence it is also called the Sanhedrin of seventy-one, to distinguish it from the provincial Sanhedrin, which consisted of twenty-three. The members were in part priests (Matt. xxvii. 1; John v. 22, xi. 47, xii. 10), in part laymen, the elders of the people, and in part scribes (Matt. xxvi. 3, 57, 59, xxvii. 41; Mark viii. 31, xi. 27, xiv. 43, 53, xv. 1; Luke ix. 22, xx. 1, xxii. 66; Acts v. 21, vi. 12, xxii. 30, xxxv. 18). The members belonged either to the Pharisees or Sadducees. The former were the scribes probably belonging to the former (Acts v. 17, 34, xxiii. 8). Included in the seventy-one was the president, the Nasi, but not the notaries. The king was not to be president; but the high priest could be, as may be seen from Acts v. 21, 27, xxii. 2; not, however, because of his dignity as priest. On the right hand of the president sat the abbet din [i.e., the father of the house of judgment, probably the vice-president]; on the left, the hakham, the sage [referee]. Without the assent of the vice-president, the president could not ordain. The other members of the Sanhedrin sat to the right, and the two notaries stood before them, one to the right, and the other to the left. Before them sat three rows of disciples, in places appropriate to their respective attainments. The president assembled the council through his messengers; and, when he entered with his assistants he was received with special ceremony. Qualifications for membership were, that the applicant had already been a member of the smaller council, and that he was morally and physically blameless. He had to be a father of children, good-looking, and learned.

2. Times of Sessions. The Sanhedrin sat every day, from the termination of the daily morning sacrifice till the daily evening sacrifice, with the exception of the sabbath and festivals.

3. Place of Session. They generally met in the Hall of Squares, which was built by Simon ben-Shetach. It was a basilica twenty-two ells long and eleven ells wide. Forty years before the destruction of the temple, the sessions of the Sanhedrin were removed from the Hall of Squares to the Halls of Purchase (Aboda Sara, fol. 8, col. 2). After the destruction, the Sanhedrin was removed...

to Jammiah or Jabneh: it was then transferred to Usba [under the presidency of Gamaliel II., ben-Simon II., A.D. 140-183], to Beth-shearim and Sepphoris, under the presidency of Judah I., the Ilyo (A.D. 163-193), and finally to Tiberias, under the presidency of Judah II., ben-Simon III. (A.D. 220-270), where it became more of a consistory, [but still retaining, under the presidency of Judah II., ben-Simon III. (A.D. 220-270), the power of excommunication]: while under the presidency of Gamaliel IV., ben-Judah II., it dropped the appellation Sanhedrin, and the authoritative decisions were issued under the name of Beth Ham-Midrash. Gamaliel V. (A.D. 400-425) was the last president. With the death of this patriarch, who was executed by Theodosius II., for erecting new synagogues contrary to the imperial inhibition, the title Nasi, the last remains of the ancient provincial Sanhedrin, or courts of justice, and regular permission to do so.

6. Mode of Conducting Trials, Punishments, etc. — Occasional intimations in the Gospels (Matt. xxvi. 62 sq., Mark xiv. 60 sq., Luke xxii. 67; John xviii. 19 sq., Acts iv. 7 sq., v. 27 sq., xxii. 1), and the canons laid down in the Talmudic treatise Sanhedrin, chaps. iii.—v., give us an idea of the mode of procedure of the Sanhedrin. In capital offences, it required a majority of at least two to condemn the accused, and the verdict of acquittal had to be reserved for the following day. The verdict of acquittal could be given on the same day.

7. The Small Sanhedrin. — Any town or village which had no less than a hundred and twenty representative men had a provincial court, which consisted of twenty-three members. In Jerusalem there were two such courts. They had the power to judge such capital offences as came not within the jurisdiction of the supreme court. They sat every Monday and Thursday, being market-days, in a room adjoining the synagogue. Before the exile, these courts of justice were held in the market-place. There was no appeal to the Great Sanhedrin against the decision of this lesser Sanhedrin. Only when the opinion of the judges was divided did they themselves consult with the supreme court. The stripes to which offenders were sentenced were given in the synagogue by these sextons (cf. Mark xiii. 9 with Matt. x. 17, xxii. 34). Besides these two courts, there was also one consisting of three judges. There were in Jerusalem alone three hundred and ninety such Sanhedrins. Within the jurisdiction of this court came suits for debts, robbery, bodily injuries, compensation for damages, thefts which involved a twofold, fourfold, or fivefold value to the proprietor.

SARGON.

In the reign of Shalmaneser IV. during the siege of Samaria, and it was in the first year of his reign (B.C. 722) that the city fell. (See 2 Kings xvii. 6, where nothing indicates that "the king of Assyria" is different from the one mentioned in v. 7. See Shalmaneser.) His inscriptions mention this conquest repeatedly; and in one account there seems to be a reference to the establishment of foreign colonies in the territory of Samaria, in place of the Israelites who were carried away captive (cf. 2 Kings xvii. 24). A confirmation of this appears in the Annals of Sargon, according to which, in B.C. 721 he transported inhabitants of Babylonia to the land of Jattî (properly Hitities, but under Sargon of wider application). Another inscription speaks of his sending colonists from other places to "the land of the House of Omri" (Samaria); and the Annals are authority for the further statement that still other colonists were transported "to the city of Samaria" in B.C. 715. It was in the year 721 that Sargon conquered for the first time Mero- dach-baladan of Babylon (see the art.). 720 was a famous year for Sargon. He conquered Ja-u-b'ilî of Hamath in a battle near Karkar, he overthrew Humbanigas of Elam, he defeated Seveh (So), king of Egypt, at Raphia, and took prisoner Hanno of Gaza. The years 719 and 718 were employed in successful campaigns against little known princes,—"Mitatti of Zirkitu" and "Kiaaku of Sinuhîta." In 717 occurred a cam- paign against Pisiri of Gargamis (Karkemish). 716 was spent in subduing a revolt of tributary princes in Armenia. In 715 the king's attention was divided between Armenia, where disturb- ances continued, and Media; and in this year occurred one of the transportation of colonists, that to Samaria, referred to above. In this year, also, Sargon came for the second time in contact with the Egyptian kingdom, which in the person of its Pharaoh paid him tribute. The Arabian prince Samsieh and the Sabean It'amar did the same. B.C. 714 found Armenia again in revolt, but the result was not successful. In 713 and 712 there were less important campaigns in the East and the West, followed in 711 by the ex- pedition against Azurî, king of Ashdod, resulting in the fall of the city, to which Isaiah refers in the passage cited above (xx. 1). Sargon dwells on this at some length, and it was doubtless a critical campaign for his dominion in south-west- ern Asia. The occasion of it was the refusal of Azurî to pay tribute to Assyria, backed by a league with neighboring princes. This dangerous move- ment called down the speedy vengeance of the Assyrian king. Azurî was dethroned, and his brother, Ahimit, made king in his place. "The men of Jattî" (the term used here also in a wide sense, see above) rejected this new ruler, and made a certain Jaman their king. Forthwith the Assyrian army came. Jaman fled to Egypt, and Ashdod was captured. We are told further that the king of Ethiopia was terrified at this success of the Assyrians so near the Egyptian frontier, and that he not only commissioned am- bassadors to sue for peace for himself, but also gave up to the Assyrians his beloved granddaughter, a branch of the royal family. An ancient Baby- lonian king bore the same name, so that the Assyrian Sargon is often called Sargon II. He

SARGON (Heb., סֵרֵג, better סַרְגּוֹן—so Baer and Delitzsch; LXX, Σαργόν, corrupt form, cf. Ἀσσυρίας, Can. Ptol.; Assy., Sar-akhn, "He [a god] established the king"); a powerful Assyrian king, successor of Shalmaneser IV., and father of Sennacherib, who reigned B.C. 722-705, is men- tioned only once in the Bible (Isa. xx. 1): "In the year of [the] Tartan's coming to Ashdod, when Sargon, king of Assyria, sent him, and he fought against Ashdod and took it," etc. In con- trast with this solitary and incidental notice, the Assyrian inscriptions dating from Sargon's reign are numerous, and our knowledge of his achieve- ments fairly complete.

From the facts that he never calls his prede- cessor his father, and yet that he, his son Sen- nacherib, and his grandson Esarhaddon, all speak of royal ancestors, it is probable, that, while not in the direct line of descent, he belonged to a branch of the royal family. An ancient Baby- lonian king bore the same name, so that the Assyrian Sargon is often called Sargon II. He

He was a very prolific writer. His principal works are, Conciones sanmuz (1541, 4 vols.), Loci communes Theologia, Von einer Dis- ciplin (1555), Pastoral(1659), etc.

SARDIS, the magnificent capital of Lydia, stood in the rich and fertile plain watered by the Pactolos, with its acropolis built on an almost inaccessible rock, a spur of the Tmolos, and was, in the Lydian and Persian period, one of the principal cities of Western Asia in military, com- mercial, and industrial respects. After the conquest by Alexander the Great, it lost its prominent position, and under the Romans it began to fall into decay. During the reign of Tiberius it was the seat of a Christian congrega- tion (Rev. i. 11, iii. 1). the Tartan, or general, who commanded the army before Ashdod, and narrates this conquest in the first person. But at all events his record gives us a welcome light on the relation of the fall of Ashdod to the prophecy contained in Isa. xx. 2–6. It intimates a close connection between the Philistines and Egypt at the time of the revolt of the former. It was doubtless in dependence upon help from Egypt that the revolt had been undertaken. It is probable that Ashdod had attempted to draw Jerusalem into the conspiracy, and Isaiah's prophetic act and word were designed to show the reckless folly of any such combination in view of the overwhelming power of Assyria.

The Egyptian party at Jerusalem had always an uncompromising opponent in the prophet. In the years 710, 709, Sargon's attention was called to Babylonia again by the hostilities of the indefatigable Merodach-baladan. The result was the second overthrow of the latter, and Sargon's assumption of the title "King of Babylon" in 709. From this year and the three years following, clay tablets are in existence bearing a double date,—"13th (14th, 15th, or 16th) year of Sargon, king of Assyria, and 1st (2d, 3d, or 4th) year (as) king of Babylon." This is very important, because the Canon of Ptolemy also gives the first year of "Ἀραχων," king of Babylon, as 709; and we thus have one point in the Assyrian chronology fixed with absolute definiteness. Sargon's name continued to inspire terror far and wide; and we have especial record of a Cyriote embassy which waited upon him this year in Babylon, and brought him tribute. He graciously replied by the present of an inscribed block of stone, which has been discovered in the Island of Cyprus.

In B.C. 708 a campaign against Kummuch (Comagene) took place, and this was followed by military expeditions of less consequence. The later years of Sargon's reign, beginning even as early as 712, were largely occupied with the building of a great city, Dür-Sarrukin ("Fortress of Sargon"), modern Khorsabad, about fifteen miles north-east from Mosul. The chief building in this city was his own magnificent palace, where most of the famous tablets are in existence, bearing a double date. By this splendid work he raised a monument to the enduring memory of the conqueror of Babylon.

After a reign of seventeen years he died—perhaps by violence, but we do not certainly know—in B.C. 705, and was succeeded by his son Sennacherib. (See the art.)

FRANCIS BROWN.

SARPI, Paolo, generally known as Fra Paolo, or Padre Paolo; b. at Venice, Aug. 14, 1552; d. at Naples, Jan. 16, 1598. He entered the order of the Servites in 1566, and was ordained a priest in 1574, and in 1579 elected provincial of his order. In the controversy between Venice and Pope Paul V. he took a prominent part. He excited the ire of the curia by his views of the secular government as divinely instituted, of ecclesiastical exemption as a privilege granted by the king, of papal excommunication as depending for its validity upon its justice, etc., which he developed in his Considerazioni sopra le censure di P. Paolo V. (Venezia, 1609). Storia particolare delle cose passate fra Paolo V. e la republica di Venezia (Lyons, 1624), De interim di Veneti historia (Eng. trans. by Bedell, 1626). He was summoned before the Inquisition of Rome, but refused to come. He was excommunicated, but freed from the ban by the peace between the Pope and the Republic in 1607. He was, nevertheless, persecuted as long as he lived, and attacked by assassins even in his own monastery. His most celebrated work, however, is his History of the Council of Trent, which first appeared at Geneva, 1619, and was translated into English (1670), French, and German. It is written with pronounced opposition to the Roman system, and, if not Protestant, is at least reformatory in its fundamental principles. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice, 1677 and often, Geneva, 1857, Naples, 1790. His life was written by BIANCHI GIOVIN (Zurich, 1859), CORNER (Vienna, 1858), A. CAMPBELL (Florence, 1875), and GAETANO CAPASSO, in Rivista Europea, 1879–80. Besides the works mentioned above, there is an English translation of his History of the quarrels of Pope Pius V. with the state of Venice (London, 1626), History of the Inquisition (1655), and of his History of ecclesiastical benefits and revenues (Westminster, 1727).

SARTORIUS, Ernst Wilhelm Christian, an able and learned theologian of the Lutheran Church; b. at Darmstadt, May 10, 1797; d. at Königsberg, June 13, 1859. He studied theology at Gottingen, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1821, and at Dorpat in 1824, and superintendent-general of the province of Prussia in 1835. His principal writings are Beiträge zur evangelischen Rechtgläubigkeit (1825), Lehrte von Christi Person (1831), Die Lehre von der heiligen Liebe (1840–46), Soli deo gloria, posthumously published in 1860. He was also a steady contributor to Hengstelberg's Evangelische Kirchenzeitungen. See F. PROCTOR and Ch. WORDSWORTH: Sarum Breviary, Cambridge, 1882; PROCTOR: Hist. SAUL, the first king of Israel, was a son of Kish the Benjamite (1 Sam. ix. 1), of Gibeah. Saul, i.e., the "desired," is described as "a choice young man, and a goodly: and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people" (ix. 2). At the desire of the people for a king, Samuel is illumined by the Spirit of the Lord as to whom he was to anoint. Saul, who had gone out to seek the asses of his father, is advised by his servant to consult the "seer" at Ramah as to the fate of the asses. At the gate they met the seer for the first time. It was Samuel. A divine intimation was confirmed by the incidents, which, according to Samuel's prediction, awaited him (x. 9, 10). As only Samuel and Saul knew of what had taken place among themselves, Samuel convened an assembly at Mizpeh, and lots were cast as to who was to be king. Saul was named, and by a divine intimation found hidden in the circle of baggage around the encampment (x. 17-24). His stature at once conciliated the public feeling; and the people shouted, "God save the king!" (x. 29, 24.) The murmurs of the worthless part of the nation, who refused to ratify the choice of Samuel, was filled with the Spirit of God, which departed from Saul to make room for an evil spirit (xvi. 14). David, who was a cunning player on the harp, was brought before the king in order to divert his melancholy. David's music had such an soothing effect upon the king that he loved him greatly. When, however, after the victory which David had gained over Goliath, the people shouted, "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands," Saul's love towards him was a thousand, under the command of his son Jonathan, at Gibeah. Israel's old foe, the Philistines, had again lifted up his head, and tried to regain the former supremacy. Even a Philistine officer had been stationed in Saul's own land (x. 5, xiii. 9). This officer was slain by Jonathan; and the Philistines now marched against Israel, and encamped at Michmash. The people panic-stricken fled to rocks and caverns for safety. Saul called the people together at Gilgal, and waited there for Samuel. When the seventh day had come, Saul at last ordered sacrifices to be offered. Just after the sacrifice was completed, Samuel arrived, and pronounced the first curse on his impetuous zeal (xiii. 5-14). Samuel, having announced the displeasure of Jehovah and its consequences, left him, and Saul returned to Gibeah. Meanwhile the adventurous exploit of his son brought on the crisis which ultimately drove the Philistines back to their own territory. Jonathan having assaulted a garrison of the Philistines, Saul, aided by a panic of the enemy, effected a great slaughter; but by a rash and foolish denunciation he impeded his success, and, unless prevented by the more enlightened conscience of the people, would have ended with putting Jonathan to death for an act, which, being done in total ignorance, could involve no guilt. The expulsion of the Philistines at once placed Saul in a position higher than that of any previous ruler of Israel. Saul was at the zenith of his glory. He was now able not merely to act on the defensive, but to attack the neighboring tribes of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Zobah, and finally Amalek (xv. 47). The war with Amalek is twice related,—first briefly (xiv. 49), and then at length (xv. 1-9). Its chief connection with Saul's history lies in the disobedience to the prophetic command of Samuel, shown in the sparing of the king and the retention of the spoils. This rebellion against the directions of Jehovah was now visited by that final rejection of his family from succeeding him on the throne which had before been threatened (xiii. 13, 14, xv. 23). Samuel, after having slain Agag, withdraws to Ramah, mourning for Saul (xv. 35). David, whom Samuel had secretly anointed as his successor, now makes his advent. "The Spirit of the Lord came upon Saul," and in this emergency he had recourse to the expedient of the earlier days. He sent throughout Israel as a message the bones of two of the oxen which he was driving. All the people "came out with one consent" (xv. 7) to Bezek; and Saul, at the head of a vast multitude, totally routed the Ammonites, and obtained a higher glory by exhibiting a new instance of clemency, which those experienced who had formerly despised him. Under the direction of Samuel, Saul and the people betook themselves to Gilgal, where with solemn sacrifices the victorious leader was reinstalled in his kingdom (xvi.). At Gilgal Samuel resigned his office as judge, and the people were filled with the intercession of his son Jonathan, the intimate friend of David. Indeed, Jonathan succeeded for a time in bringing about a friendly relation between his father and his friend; but this was of but a short duration. David was compelled to assume the position of an outlaw. A portion of the people were afraid of him enough to urge the Philistines to wage war against Saul (xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1); and others, perhaps, might color their fear by the presence of conscience (xxiii. 12). But his sparing Saul's life twice, when... he was completely in his power, must have destroyed all color of right in Saul's conduct in the minds of the people, as it also did in his own conscience (xxiv. 3-7, xxvi.). At last the monarchy itself which he had raised up broke down under the weakness of its head. The Philistines reentered the country. Saul, forsaken of God, who gave him no guidance, but mercy and divination, although he had formerly executed the penalty of the law on all those who practised these things (xxviii. 9). He consults a woman living at Endor, who conjures up the spirit of Samuel. From Samuel he hears that his doom is sealed. In the battle which took place on Gilboa, Saul, after his three sons had been killed, perished by his own sword (xxx. 4). The body, on being found by the Philistines, was stripped and decapitated. The armor was deposited in the temple of Astarite; the head was deposited in the temple of Dagon (1 Chron. x. 10). The corpse was removed from Beth-shan by the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, who carried off the bodies, burned them, and buried them (1 Sam. xxxi. 13). After the lapse of several years, his ashes and those of Jonathan were removed by David to their ancestral sepulchre at Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xx. 14). The Old Testament says nothing about the length of Saul's reign, but Acts xiii. 21 states it as forty years. Comp. SCHLIER: Die Könige in Israel (Stuttgart, 1855), p. 35; Ewald: Geschichte d. SAUMUR, a town of France, on the Loire, in the department of Maine-et-Loire, now famous for its manufactures of rosaries; was the seat of the celebrated Protestant academy founded in 1598 by the national synod of Montpellier, and suppressed by a royal edict of Jan. 8, 1685. The academy, which developed the first fertile school of the Reformation, acted a little hastily, and refused to carry out its decree. Of still greater importance were the researches of Louis Cappel concerning the integrity of the various documents of the Old Testament. The strict Calvinists were fully aware, that, if the results of these researches were to be accepted, the doctrine of the literal inspiration of Scripture had to be given up, and a hot contest ensued. After the death of Amyraut, Placeus, and Cappel, it was apparent that the fame of the academy of Saumur had passed its zenith: still men like Etienne Gaussen, Claude Pajon (the father of Pajonism), and Etienne de Brais, continued to throw lustre over the academy, and attract great numbers of students. He studied theology at Die, Nîmes, and Geneva, and was appointed pastor of Delft in 1665, and of Utrecht in 1670. He is best known on account of his controversy with Jurieu, which grew so hot that the synod of Leuwarden (1695) forbade both parties, though in vain, to write any more on the matter. His principal works are Études de la théologie du M. SAURIN, Jacques, the greatest orator of the French-Reformed Church; b. at Nîmes, Jan. 6, 1677; d. at The Hague, Dec. 30, 1738. He was educated at Geneva, served four years in a regiment of volunteers in the coalition against Louis XIV. (1694-97), studied theology at Geneva, and was appointed pastor to the French-Reformed Congregation in London (1700) and at The Hague (1705), where he gathered immense audiences by the earnestness, energy, and eloquence with which he preached the gospel. Besides his Discours (Amsterdam, 1720), whose second volume (Amsterdam, 1728) gave occasion to some disagreeable misunderstandings, he published five volumes of Sermons (1707-25), and after his death seven more volumes were published by his son. Collected editions were several times issued. The best is that of The Hague, 1749; the latest, that of Paris, 1829-35. One volume of an English translation of his Discours appeared in London, 1723. The best English translation of his sermons is edited by BURDER, London, 1824, 6 vols., New York, 1896, 2 vols. SAVONAROLA, Hieronymus, often called Fra Girolamo, b. at Ferrara, Sept. 21, 1452; d. at Florence, May 23, 1498. He was the victim of an ecclesiastico-political reform movement, sometimes wrongly represented as an inspired prophet, and wonder-working saint, but

Sometimes, also, as an ambitious demagogue and deluded fanatic. He was by his parents destined to study medicine; but a steadily deepening impression of the corruption of the world in general, and the church especially, concentrated the whole force of his character on the one point, the salvation of his soul; and in 1475, in the twenty-third year of his age, he left the parental home, and sought refuge in a Dominican monastery at Bologna. The conversion was in strict harmony with the mediaval ideas of monasticism, and involved no reformatory impulse at all. He simply wanted to become a lay-brother, and do the mean work of the house; but his superiors determined that he should study theology, and in course of time he became thoroughly conversant with the Bible, — which he knew almost entirely by heart, and of which especially the Old Testament and the Revelation inspired him with passionate sympathy, — and also with the writings of Thomas Aquinas, the great Dominican doctor, of St. Augustine, and others. He also began to preach, but at first without any success. Suddenly, however, at Brescia, his powerful eloquence broke forth in all its wealth; and in 1490 he was sent as lecturer to the Dominican monastery of San Marco in Florence.

He taught first in his cell, then in the garden of the cloister, finally in the cathedral; and immense audiences thronged to hear him expound the Revelation. “Your sins make me a prophet,” he said to them; and from the depths of that stirring, brilliant, half-pagan life which the Mediciis, trinal reform, however, as was achieved by Luther and Calvin, Savonarola never dreamed of: in all essentials he agreed with the traditional system of the Church of Rome. What he wanted was simply a moral regeneration of the church, hand in hand with a political regeneration of Italy, more especially of Florence. In 1491 he was elected prior of San Marco, and Lorenzo the Magnificent soon became aware of the strong fascination the prior exercised upon the people. But Lorenzo, however, April 6, 1492, April 8, 1492, April 17, 1492, April 17, 1492, April 23, 1492, had neither his sagacity nor his self-control. When in August, 1494, Charles VIII. of France crossed the Alps and entered the Holy City, the Medici grasped the opportunity of securing the self-control of the people; and, though he afterwards retracted, he was by the Papal commissioners condemned as a heretic, and surrendered to the civil authorities for punishment. He was burned at the stake, — erected in the form of a cross, — together with two of his most zealous adherents. The Dominican order, however, has since taken great pains to have him canonized. He left several works, written in Latin and Italian. These were published by Luther in 1523. Of special interest for his own life is his Compendium Revelationum, written in 1495. His principal theological work is his Trionfo della Croce, a defence of Christianity against the sceptical tendencies of the Medicean epoch, written in 1497 (English Translation, Triumph of the Cross, London, 1868). In 1882 a bust of Savonarola was placed in the Hall of the Five Hundred at Florence.

SCALLER, Joseph Justus, b. at Agen, on the Garonne, Aug. 4, 1540; d. at Leyden, Jan. 21, 1609. He studied in Paris, and was in 1592 appointed professor at Leyden. He was the most learned man of his age, understood thirteen languages, and was well versed not only in philology and history, but also in philosophy, theology, jurisprudence, mathematics, etc. Most of his writings are philological; but his "Thesaurus temporum" (Amsterdam, 1658), the first system of chronology ever formed, and his "Expositio numerumatis Constantini" (Leyden, 1694), have considerable interest to the church historian.

SCAPEGOAT. See Atonement, Day of.

SCAPULARY (from the Latin scapula, the "shoulder-blade") means a narrow shoulder-band, of various colors, and adorned with a picture of the Virgin, or a cross, which is worn by several monastic orders and religious fraternities of the Roman-Catholic Church. As a piece of dress it has no particular purpose, but it is believed to be a preservative against death by water and fire. According to the bull "Sabbatina" the Virgin has personally promised Pope John XXI. that any one who wears a scapulary with her image shall be delivered from purgatory on the first Saturday after death.

SCHADE, Georg, b. at Apenrade in Sleswick, May 8, 1711; d. at Kiel in Holstein, April 10, 1795. He was practising as an advocate at Kiel. See J. A. BOLten: "Historische Kirchen-Nachrichten von der Stadt Altona," which also contains a full list of Schade's other writings.

SCHADE, Johann Caspar, b. at Kühndorf in Holstein, May 8, 1711; d. in Berlin, July 25, 1795. He studied at Leipzig, where he became an intimate friend of Francke; and was in 1790 appointed preacher at the Church of St. Nicholas, in Berlin, where Spener was provost. In 1797 he published Prazis des Bischöftuhs und Abendmauls, which occasioned a rescript from the government, according to which, private confession ceased to be obligatory in the Prussian Church.

SCHAEFFER, Charles Frederick, D.D., b. Sept. 3, 1807; d. Nov. 28, 1880; an eminent theologian of the Lutheran Church, son of Frederick David Schaeffer, D.D., pastor in Philadelphia; was a graduate of Pennsylvania College, where he formed his theological studies under his father and the Rev. Dr. Demme; served, 1832 to 1855, congregations at Carlisle, Hagerstown, Red Hook (N.Y.), Easton (Penn.). From 1840 to 1845 he had charge of a professorship in the theological seminary, Columbus, O.; was in 1856 called to the German professorship in Pennsylvania College, and in the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Penn., and in 1864 to the chair of dogmatic theology in the newly established theological Lutheran seminary at Philadelphia, where he conscientiously performed his duties until 1879. He was a representative of the strictly conservative tendency, adhering to the symbols of the Lutheran Church according to their original meaning. Of his solid scholarship his publications bear witness,—historical, homiletical, and doctrinal articles in the Gettysburg Evangelical Review; translation of Lechler's "Commentary on the Acts," in Schaff's edition of Lange's Bible-work; translations of John Arndt's "True Christianity," and of H. Kurtz's "Sacred History." W. J. MANN.

SCHALL, Johann Adam, b. at Cologne, 1591; d. in China, Aug. 15, 1666. He was educated in the Colloquium Germanum in Rome; entered the order of the Jesuits, and was in 1628 sent as a missionary to China, where he remained to his death. He acquired the confidence of the Chinese Government (which proved of great advantage to the mission), and translated into Chinese many mathematical treatises, interlarded with religious and Christian discussions. He also wrote "Historica missionis Societatis Jesu apud Chineses." Vienna, 1655, and Ratisbon, 1672. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SCHAUFLER, William Gottlieb, D.D., LL.D., missionary and Bible-translator; b. at Stuttgart, Württemberg, Germany, Aug. 22, 1798; d. in New-York City, Friday, Jan. 26, 1883. In 1804 his father removed to Odessa, South Russia. At fifteen he was confirmed in the Lutheran Church; at twenty-two, converted. He then determined to be a missionary. But his educational advantages had been small, though diligently improved, and the way seemed hedged up. But in 1829 he met the famous missionary, Joseph Bell, who took him to Constantinople, there to be fitted for whose dominion Holstein at that time belonged, did not relish the joke, however, but put the author in Christianso’s, the Danish Bastille, from which he was not released until 1775, under Christian VII., when he was allowed to be an advocate at Kiel. missionary labors; and from there he went to Smyrna, where Jonas King induced him to go to America. For five years he studied at Andover, became an American citizen, and then, under the care of the American Board, went to Constantinople (1831), where, with the exception of a few years spent elsewhere, he resided and labored. He was particularly interested in the conversion of the Jews, and for these benefit revised and supervised the intended publication of the Old Testament, in Hebrew-Spanish, at Vienna, 1839-42. But his great work was the translation of the whole Bible into Osmanli-Turkish, the language of the educated Turks. This occupied him eighteen years. In 1867 Halle gave him the degree of D.D., in express acknowledgment of this work. In 1861 his peace-making between two high dignitaries at Constantinople was acknowledged by a decoration sent him by King William of Prussia. In 1877 he was made a doctor of laws by Princeton College. He was a remarkable linguist, being familiar with some nineteen languages, and able to preach extemporaneously in six (German, Italian, French, English, Spanish, and Turkish). He published Meditations on the Last Days of Christ (Boston, 1837, several editions).

SCHELLING, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von. B. at Breslau in 1824; d. there July 2, 1877. He studied medicine at Strassburg, Leyden (where he first became acquainted with Jacob Boehme's writings), and Padua (where he took his degree), and was in 1849 appointed body-physician to the Duke of Württemberg; but he remained only three years at the court of Oels. In 1853 he returned to Breslau, and embraced Romanism. In 1861 he published his two most celebrated works: Cherubinische Wanderscharm (a collection of minor poems, almost of the character of proverbs), and Geistliche Hirtenleiter (a collection of hymns), both characterized by a peculiarly deep and sweet mysticism. His polemical writings show quite a different character. In 1861 he was ordained a priest: and from that time he spent the rest of his life in a series of violent, sometimes almost unseemly, attacks on the Reformers and the Reformed churches; which (thirty-nine treatises) were collected under the title Ecclesiolagia, and appeared at Glatz, 1677, 1 vol. fol. SCHELHORN, Johann Georg; b. at Memmingen, Dec. 8, 1894; d. there March 31, 1773. He studied at Jena, and settled then in his native city as preacher and librarian. Of his writings the following have great interest to the church historian: A materiales historice eccl. (Leip., 1737-46, 3 vols.), Acta hist.-eccl. Sac. XV. et XVI. (Ulm, 1762-64, 4 vols.), De vita Camerarii (1740, etc.).

SCHELLING, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von. I. LIFE AND WRITINGS. — He was b. Jan. 27, 1775, at Leonberg, near Stuttgart, where his father was pastor; d. in Ragatz, Switzerland, Aug. 20, 1854. In his sixteenth year he entered the university of Tubingen to study theology, together with Hegel and the unfortunate poet Hölderlin. Lessing, Herder, and Kant were the leaders of their thought; and especially the influence of Herder is seen in Schelling's academic dissertation, Anti quisimini de prima malorum origine philosophi matis explicandi Gen. iii. tentamen criticum (1792), as well as in the essay on Myths, Historical Lethe absolute spirit, which has the freedom of existing outside of itself, reveals himself, according to his three potencies, in the world, as causa materialis, causa efficax, and causa finalis of nature, which found its bloom in Greek religion and poetry; the period of fate, at the end of the ancient world; and the period of providence, which entered with Christianity. God became objective for the first time in Christ. This incarnation is not a temporal, but an eternal act. Christ sacrifices in his person the finite, to enable by this the coming of the Spirit as the light of a new world. By speculative knowledge alone, Schelling expects a regeneration of esoteric Christianity and the proclamation of the absolute gospel.

Thoughts similar to these are expressed in the essay on Philosophy and Religion (1804). And his Philosophical Inquiries concerning Human Freedom show us,

4. Schelling in the Transition to his Later Doctrine, which is characterized by his inclination to theosophic speculation and the influence of Christian mysticism, especially of Jacob Bohme.

Kant-Fichte's idealism had, according to Schelling, not given a sufficient notion of freedom, because it lacked the basis of realism. Such a realism is contained in his philosophy; because he distinguishes in God a basis, the nature in God, in which all beings, and therefore man also, have their cause. This nature in God, a dark, blind will, is an eternal yearning to produce itself, and rests also at the ground of our existence. But God produces in himself a perception of himself, which is understanding, the expression of that yearning. Both together, eternal yearning and understanding, are then in God that loving, almighty will which creates all things. In man we find both principles united, the principle of nature, and the principle of light and understanding. As a part of that dark will, he has a will of his own: as gifted with understanding, he is an organ of the universal will. The separation of both principles is the possibility of good and evil, which presupposes human freedom. The predominance of man's particular will is the evil. The decision of man for the evil is an act, but an eternal act, because it was done before time. Only through God can the particular and the universal will be united again. And it is done by revelation, or by God's adopting of man's nature.

The philosophy of religion, which Schelling has given here in broad outlines, is finally completed in

5. Schelling's Later Doctrine. — Schelling begins with a distinction of negative and positive philosophy. As negative philosophy he describes the philosophy of Hegel, which is unable to give us a full knowledge of reality. Because it is the desire of human reason, as well as the object of true philosophy, to find the absolute Being, and because Schelling wants to obtain the notion of an absolute Spirit, he distinguishes three potencies in the divine essence, — the possibility of being (Sein-Kinnesse), the impossibility (reines Sein) without the possibility of being (actus purus), and absolute free being, which is neither of the two, but their unity, i.e., subject-object. Yet these three forms of being are not being (Sein) itself; they are only attributes of the general being, which is neither the absolute Spirit.

This absolute Spirit, which has the freedom of existing outside of himself, reveals himself, according to his three potencies, in the world, as causa materialis, causa efficax, and causa finalis of the world. Only through creation, which is an act of his will, not of his nature, God comes to a full knowledge of himself.

Schelling believes that his notion of God is also the original notion of monothelitism; and, based upon his theory of the three potencies in God, he develops also the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The three persons of the Trinity, who proceed from the potencies by a theogonic process, are, the Father as the creator, who gives matter to the creatures; the Son, begotten of the Father, who contributes the forms; and the Spirit, who is the completion of creation. But only at the end of creation Son and Spirit become perfect personalities, yet both are in God, so that we have only one God in three personalities.

In man, as the image of God, we have the same three potencies and a similar freedom, which may separate the harmony of the potencies. The separation of the potencies has become actual in the fall of man. In order to restore the harmony, and bring the fallen world and man back to the Father, the Son himself must become man.

But the Son can at first realize this only as a natural potency, which is done in the mythological process. After having overcome here the antithetical principle, he can act also according to his will, as the ideal potency; and this free personal acting is revelation.

It is impossible to follow Schelling here into his elaborate construction of mythology, which is rich in deep and grand thoughts.

Revelation finally broke through mythology, as it appears even in the Old Testament, by Christ's incarnation. The person of Christ is the centre of Christianity. Here the second potency divests itself of the "form of God," which it had in the mythologic consciousness (Phil. ii. 6-8), and becomes man, suffers and dies, not only to bring freedom to men, but to become by obedience one with the Father (1 Cor. xv. 28).

It is necessary for us to give Schelling a glimpse at the history of the church. He distinguishes three great periods, and names them after the characters and names of the three apostles,—The Petrine Period, or Catholicism; The Pauline Period, or Protestantism; and The Johannine Period, or the "church of the future."

While Schelling stands, on one side, in the most intimate connection with the great poetic and philosophic movements of the last century; while especially his earlier philosophy is but a philosophic expression of that yearning to comprehend the absolute as it appears above all in Goethe's Faust; and while his system is the highest glorification of genius as celebrated by the romantic school,—we have on the other side, in Schelling's later philosophy, the greatest endeavor of modern philosophy to construct the system of Christian doctrine. His thoughts have had great influence upon modern German theology (and upon Cole-ridge), especially his idea of the three ages of church history. His philosophy is an illustration of his own saying, "The German nation strives with her whole nature after religion, but, according to her peculiarity, after a religion which is connected with knowledge, and based upon science."

made on the soldiers. When the Reformation broke out in Switzerland, he seemed to be in perfect harmony with the movement. He offered Luther a place of refuge and support in 1618, and continued for a long time to befriend Zwingli.
But his close connection with the Church of Rome, and worldly regards, at last got the better of him, and he turned against the Reformation.
Without the support of his former friends, he gave himself up to the Reformation. Unfortunately, in the effort to enlist sympathy, the picture of German destitution was greatly overdrawn, and the Germans were represented in a manner that could not fail to be painful to a high-spirited people. In 1755 Schlatter was induced to resign his church in Philadelphia, and to become superintendent of the proposed "charity schools." This was a mistake; for by this time the movement had to some extent become politial. An attempt was made to use the "charity" as a means of breaking the tacit alliance which had hitherto subsisted between the Quakers and the Germans, and it is probable that the latter support the favorite measures of the government party. Christopher Sauer, the celebrated German printer, exerted his influence in opposition to the "charity schools," which, he claimed, were intended to prepare the way for an established church. The Lutheran and Reformed ministers for a while supported Schlatter in his work; but at last the popular feeling of opposition became irresistible, and the undertaking proved an utter failure. The manner in which the charity was offered had caused it to be regarded as an in-sult. Seidensticker says, "Schlatter's failure was due to his connection with the cause after it had assumed this unfortunate complexion. If the affair had remained on the basis on which he had with honest zeal and decided success originally placed it, the history of these schools would have been very different."
On the failure of the school-movement, Schlatter, in 1757, accompanied an expedition to Nova Scotia against the French, as chaplain of the Royal American regiment, and was present at the taking of Louisburg. He subsequently lived in retirement at Chestnut Hill, near Philadelphia.
During the American Revolution he was an earnest patriot, and was for some time imprisoned for refusing to resume his position of chaplain in the British army.

SCHISM. from the Greek exixia, has, according to canon law, a double sense: one, more general, simply denoting a deviation from the orthodox church, with respect to organization or discipline, such as the schisms caused by Pelagianism, Naova-tian, Meletius, and others; and one more special, denoting a split in the highest authority of the curch, such as the great Papal schism, 1378-1429. See Urban VI., Boniface IX., Benedict
XIII., etc., and the Council of Constance.
Schlatter, Richard, missionary, founder of the synod of the German-Reformed Church in the United States; was b. of a respectable family in St. Gall, Switzerland, July 14, 1716; d. near Philadelphia, October, 1790. He studied in the gymnasia of his native town, and probably also at Helmstadt; was for some time a teacher in Holland, where he was ordained to the ministry; and in 1745 was assistant minister at Wigoedingen, his native country. In 1746 he was commissioned by the deputies of the synod of North and South Holland a missionary to the destitute Germans in Pennsylvania, with special directions to visit the scattered settlements, to organize pastoral charges and, if possible, to form a coetus, or synod.
Schlatter arrived in America on the 1st of August, 1746. Before the end of the year he was called to the pastorate of the Reformed Church of Philadelphia. Though he accepted the call, he continued to prosecute his special mission with extraordinary energy. From the year 1747 to the beginning of 1751 he travelled, as he informs us in his Journal, a distance of not less than eight thousand miles,— not reckoning his passage across the ocean,— and preached six hundred and thirty-five times. According to his own estimate, there were at this time thirty thousand German Reformed people in Pennsylvania, with fifty-three small churches, and only four settled pastors.
Schlatter formed the congregations into pastoral charges and on the 29th of September, 1747, the pastors and delegated elders met at his instance, in Philadelphia, and organized the German-Reformed coetus, or synod.
In 1751 Schlatter went to Europe, at the request of the coetus, to solicit aid for the destitute Germans in America. He was very successful, especially in Holland, where a fund was raised from which much assistance was received. In 1752 he returned to Americas, accompanied by six young ministers. He brought with him seven hundred large Bibles for distribution to churches and families.
While Schlatter was in Europe, he published, in Dutch, a Journal of his missionary labors, containing a history of the movement. It was translated into German, and published in Freeenii Pastoral Nachrichten, and of a teacher who first inspired him with enthusiasm for classical literature. At that time he had already commenced the struggle against a "strange scepticism," which he calls a "peculiar thorn in the flesh," and which made him doubt the genuineness of all the ancient writings. In 1783 his parents sent him, his brother, and sister, to an excellent Moravian school at Niesky in Upper Lusatia. Two years afterward he entered the Moravian college at Barby. The childlike piety, the wise mixture of instruction and amusement, and the rural quietness of these institutions, made a deep and lasting impression on his mind. He ever remembered that time with gratitude, and kept up a familiar intercourse with the society through his sister Charlotte (who had become one of its regular members), and through his intimate friend and classmate, Von Albertini, of the Grisons, subsequently bishop of the fraternity, and himself a former pupil. This type of Moravian Christianity can be clearly traced in his enthusiastic personal devotion to the Saviour, and in the strongly christological character of his dogmatic system. In his Weihnachtsfeier, 1803 (an imitation of the Platonic Symposium), Christ appears as the living centre of all faith and true religion. But his constitutional scepticism seriously tormented him, and led to a temporary rupture with his teachers, and even with his father. The correspondence between them is highly honorable to both. With all his filial reverence and affection, the son refused to yield to mere authority, and insisted on his right of private judgment and personal investigation. The father learned to respect the manly independence and earnest mental struggles of the son. Both were at last fully reconciled. With the consent of his father, he left Barby, and entered the university of Halle in 1787. His studies were rather fragmentary. He attended the lectures of Semler, the father of German neology, and of Wolff, the celebrated Greek scholar, studied modern languages and mathematics, and read the philosophical works of Spinoza, Kant, Fichte, and Jacobi. His mind was so independent that he could not follow any one teacher or system. The age was thoroughly rationalistic, and German theology was then undergoing a revolution as radical as the political revolution of France. He left the university, after a two-years' course, without a fixed system of religious opinions, yet with the hope of "attaining, by earnest research, and patient examination of all the witnesses, to a reasonable degree of certainty, and to a knowledge of the boundaries of human science and learning." In 1790 he passed the examination for licensure, and accepted a situation as private tutor in the family of Count Dohna, where he spent three years. In 1793 he was ordained to the ministry, and became assistant to his uncle, a superannuated clergyman at Landsberg on the Warta. In 1796 he was appointed chaplain at the Charité (hospital) in Berlin, and continued in this position till 1802. During these six years he made many inquirings and writings, and identified himself temporarily with the newly founded romantic school of poetry as represented by Friedrich and Wilhelm Schlegel, Tieck, and Novalis. In 1799 he published his first important work, the Discourses on Religion. It had a stirring effect upon the rising generation of theologians (as Neander and Harms from different stand-points testified from their own experience), and marks the transition of German theology from an age of cold speculation to the restoration of positive faith. He appears here as an eloquent high priest of natural religion in the outer court of Christian revelation, to convince educated unbelievers that religion, far from being incompatible with intellectual culture, as they thought, was the deepest and the most universal element in man, different from knowledge and from practice,—a sacred feeling of relation to the Infinite, which purifies and ennobles all the faculties. Beyond this he did not go at that time. His piety was strongly tinged with the pantheism of Spinoza. His Monologues followed in 1800, a self-contemplation in the face of the world, and a description of the ethical ideal which floated before his mind, and was influenced by the subjective idealism of Fichte. In 1802 he broke loose from his aesthetic and literary connections, much to his own benefit, and removed for two years to Stolpe in Pomerania, as court-preacher. There he commenced his translation of Plato, which he had projected with Friedrich Schlegel in Berlin. The completion of this great undertaking in six volumes (1804–26) gave him a place among the best Greek scholars in Germany. His searching Criticism of all Former Systems of Moral Philosophy, which opened a new path in this science, belongs to the same period (1803).

In 1804 he was elected extraordinary professor of philosophy and theology in Halle. After the temporary suspension of this university in 1806, he spent some time on the Island of Rügen, then returned to Berlin as minister of Trinity Church, and married the widow of his intimate clerical friend Willich (1809), with whom, notwithstanding the great disparity of age (he might have been her father), he lived happily to the close of his life.

He took an active part in the organization of the university of Berlin, which was founded in 1810. He was elected professor of philosophical theology, and also pastor of Trinity Church. In this double office he continued to the close of his life, and unfolded his greatest activity to an ever-widening circle of pupils and admirers. For a quarter of a century he and his colleague and former pupil, Neander, were the most influential teachers of theology, and the chief attraction in the university of the literary metropolis of Germany. At the same time he felt a lively interest in public affairs. He roused from the pulpit the sense of national independence during the deepest humiliation of Prussia, and urged the people to the war of liberation against Napoleon. He advocated liberal political opinions after the Congress of Vienna (1815), and ran the risk of sharing exile with his friends De Wette and Moritz Arndt. He was no favorite with Frederic William III.; but a few years before his death he received from the king the order of the red eagle, which he never wore. They agreed, however, in zeal for the literary and political opinion of Soemmerring. After the Congress of Vienna, which was inaugurated in 1817, at the third tercentenary celebration of the Reformation. Schleiermacher did all he could to promote it.
He was free from all sectarian bigotry. "Christ," he said, "is the quickening centre of the church. From him comes all: to him all returns. Of him should, therefore, not call ourselves Lutherans, or Reformed (Calvinists), but Evangelical Christians, after his name and his holy gospel." He favored the introduction of the Presbyterian form of government. He was one of the compilers of the new Moravian hymn-book (1829), which, with all its defects, remained the work for a hymnological reform. Notwithstanding this extraordinary activity, he mingled freely in society, and was the centre of a large number of friends at his fireside. Many of his witty sayings and charades, in verse and prose, were transmitted by oral tradition in Berlin, and are still remembered.

In the beginning of February, 1834, he was seized by a severe cold, which fell on his lungs, and in a few days terminated in death. In his last hours he summoned his family around his bed, and with clear consciousness and calm serenity celebrated the holy communion. He himself distributed the elements, and solemnly confessed his implicit faith in Christ his Saviour, and in the atoning efficacy of his death. It was a worthy close of his religious career, which began in the bosom of Moravian piety. It was felt throughout all Germany that a truly representative man, and one of the brightest luminaries of the age, had departed. The funeral-oration of Steffens (a classical philologist, a philosopher, and a theologian of the Hegelian school, and his antagonist), gave public expression to the universal esteem and respect. His remains were intrusted to his friend and pupil, Dr. Jonas. He lost his only son, Nathanael, in his early youth; and the funeral-address which he himself delivered at the grave is one of his most remarkable and touching compositions. He bases there his faith of immortality solely on Christ as the resurrection and the life.

Schleiermacher was small of stature, and slightly deformed by a humpback; but his face was noble, earnest, sharply defined, and expressive of intelligence and kind sympathy; his eye keen, piercing, and full of fire; his movements quick and animated. In his later years his white hair made him appear like a venerable sage of olden times, yet his mind retained its youthful vitality and freshness to the close. He had perfect command over his temper, and never lost his calm composure. His philosophy and theology were violently assailed by orthodox and rationalists; but he kept aloof from personal controversy, and secured the esteem even of those who widely differed from his views. He was the Plato and Origen of Germany in the nineteenth century.

II. His Character and Works. — Schleiermacher was a many-sided man, and a master in several departments of intellectual and moral activity. He was a public teacher and writer, a preacher, a classical philologist, a philosopher, and a theologian. As academic teacher he had that rare personal magnetism which drew the students at once into an irresistible current of thought, and roused all the intellectual audiences of students, professors, officers, and persons of the higher ranks of society. Wilhelm von Humboldt says that Schleiermacher's speaking far exceeded his power in writing, and that his strength consisted in the "deeply penetrative character of his words, which were free from art, and the persuasive effusion of feeling which moved in perfect unison with one of the rarest intellects." He never wrote his sermons, except the text, theme, and a few heads, but allowed them to be taken down by friends during delivery, and to be published after some revision by his pen.

As a theologian he ranks among the greatest of all ages. His influence is seen among writers of different schools; and will long continue, at least in Germany, as a suggestive and stimulating force. He was a unique combination of mysticism and criticism, of religious feeling and sceptical understanding. He believed in his heart from him comes all; to him all returns. Of him should, therefore, not call ourselves Lutherans, or Reformed (Calvinists), but Evangelical Christians, after his name and his holy gospel." He favored the introduction of the Presbyterian form of government. II. His Character and Works. — Schleiermacher was a many-sided man, and a master in several departments of intellectual and moral activity. He was a public teacher and writer, a preacher, a classical philologist, a philosopher, and a theologian. As academic teacher he had that rare personal magnetism which drew the students at once into an irresistible current of thought, and roused all the departments of intellectual activity — ethics, dialectics, psychology, politics, aesthetics, pedagogics, dogmatics, Christian ethics, hermeneutics, biblical criticism, life of Jesus (posthumous lectures, exceedingly unsatisfactory), church history (likewise posthumous, and almost worthless), and a large number of philosophical, exegetical, and critical essays, and sermons. But the books which he published himself are by far the most finished and complete, especially his masterly outline sketch of the course of theological study as an organic whole (1811), and his Christian Dogmatics (1821, 3d ed., 1835), which stands next to Calvin's Institutes as a masterpiece of theological genius. It is an original reconstruction of the evangelical system of faith on the basis of practical experience and the consciousness of absolute dependence on God: it is in matter independent of all philosophy, yet profoundly philosophical in dialectical method and conclusive reasoning. But more of this in the next section. We only add, that it is Protestant to the backbone, yet remarkably conciliatory in spirit and tone towards diverging types of Christianity. It reduces the differences between Catholicism and Protestantism to this formula: "Catholicism makes the relation of the believer to Christ to depend on his relation to the church; Protestantism makes the relation of the believer to the church to depend on his relation to Christ." PHILIP SCHAF.

III. Theology.—Schleiermacher's Reden über die Religion was a strong word spoken to his time, and it suited the moment. At every point except one the German spirit was rallying from that debility and barrenness into which it had sunk; in every direction except one the German mind was stirring with new issues: only religion seemed to have been entirely abandoned by the educated portion of the nation as a kind of self-contradiction. But the contradiction, the book said to its readers, between piety and culture, is a lie fabricated by people who know neither the one nor the other. That which they reverence as education is not education, but simply school-pedantry; and that which they despise as religion is not religion, but its shadow, its caricature. They consider religion as a means of maintaining social order and good government; they consider morals, an expression of a trite and vulgar view of nature and history. But religion is no such thing. Religion is that feeling of the universe in which man discovers his own destination, that feeling of the infinite in which man discovers the existence of God, though he may still shrink from ascribing the forms of the human personality to that being. Religion is a part of human nature. Every one has religion, whether he knows it or not; and every one is compelled to recognize the truth of his religion, whether he will or not. So far the book is admirable. By its exposition of the true nature of religion it forces the reader out of his religious indifference. But then it undertakes an exposition of religion considered as an historical fact; for, although it admits that not every one may feel called upon to join one of the historically developed religious communities as a positive form is, nevertheless, an inherent demand in the religious feeling. And here the question arises: Does this book really point in the direction of Christianity and the Christian church? It does, though not in the common sense of those words, nor in that in which the author later on came to use them, but when compared with the stand-point of the readers whom it addressed. When Schleiermacher wrote the preface to the third edition of the book, in 1821, he observed that there was at that moment more reason for addressing the bigoted than the indifferent.

To the Reden correspond the Monologen as their ethical complement. They are written in a more lyrical style, giving freer scope to a merely subjective pathos; and they have a somewhat lighter character, in spite of the profound researches they contain concerning human freedom.

From Schleiermacher's philosophy of religion, as developed in his Reden and Monologen, to his systematic representation of the positive doctrines of Christianity, a transition is formed by his critical-exegetical writings, and more especially by his famous little book, Kurze Darstellung des Theologischen Studiums, 1811. It was not any remarkable grasp of historical and antiquarian materials which distinguished him as an exegete: but he was a good philologist and an excellent translator; and his marvellous power of understanding, and, so to speak, reproducing the whole mental process by which a literary monument has been produced, makes his criticism in the highest degree suggestive. For the Old Testament he had very little sympathy, and its close connection with the New Testament he did not understand.

But his Sendschreiben an J. Chr. Gass, 1807, concerning the First Epistle to Timothy, is the first thorough-going examination of that remarkable document, and has led the exegetes to appreciate the intimate relation between the pastoral epistles, — a relation so intimate, indeed, that they must be accepted or rejected together. Of still greater importance was his Kritische Versuch über die Schriften des Lukas, 1821, though only the first volume of the work on the Gospel of Luke ever appeared. Not that Schleiermacher here really achieved what he intended, viz., to represent the Gospel of Luke as a mosaic of a great number of different, but related, historical narratives; but he contributed much to concentrate the interest of biblical scholars on the questions of the origin and formation of the Gospels. More successful was his hypothesis concerning the testimony of Papias (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., iii. 39). It has been used by many, accepted by more, and hardly neglected by any.

In the Kurze Darstellung des theologischen Studiums, the theological stand-point of Schleiermacher is clearly defined. The fundamental facts of the Christian faith he accepts, not because he feels compelled by any philosophical demonstration, but simply because he finds them as facts in the consciousness of the Christian congregation. He then goes on to give an encyclopedic survey of those facts and their reciprocal relations, dividing the theological science into philosophical (apologetics-polemics), historical (exegesis-dogmatics), and practical theology. And when he draws his conclusion, he pays the feeble and undeveloped picture: it is a drawing executed with consummate skill, and rich in illustration and suggestion. The ripest fruit of Schleiermacher's genius is Der christliche Glaube nach den Grundsatzen der evangelischen Kirche im Zusammenkange dargestellt, ever, that, when he thus declinesto bow before the existence of evil, but rather make it more at least in the sense of a breach upon natural law; supposed as given in the very feeling of absolute salvation. In no way bound up with the church, system stands Christ and that which he has done Christian piety. It must not be understood, how because, as he protests, it is not demanded by true feeling—not the demonstrations of a dialectical truth, but the demonstration of a metaphysical reasoning which has no equal in the theological literature, after Calvin's Institutionen. It consists of a series of small paragraphs connected with each other by intervening explications of a more elaborate character. The feeling from which religion springs is here further defined as a feeling of absolute dependence on God; and that feeling—not the demonstrations of a dialectical reasoning, nor the letter of a scriptural text—is made the touchstone on which the dogma must be tried. He rejects the doctrine of the Devil and the doctrine of the fall of the angels; because, as he alleges, they do not aid in solving the problem of the existence of evil, but rather make it more difficult. He also rejects the doctrine of miracles, at least in the sense of a breach upon natural law; because, as he protests, it is not demanded by true Christian piety. It must not be understood, however, that, when he thus declines to bow before the literal evidence of Scripture, he in any way gives in to the dictates of non-religious science. By no means! Few theologians have been so successful as he in keeping the doctrines of Christian faith separate from the propositions of natural science, without either bringing them into conflict with each other, or mixing them together in an incomplete harmony. In the centre of the whole system stands Christ and that which he has done for the salvation of man. The development runs between a double christological (Ebonianism and Docetism) and a double anthropological heresy (Pelagianism and Manicheism): but the power of salvation is in no way bound up with the church, which by itself is nothing but the community of the faithful; it resides solely and fully in the intimate union between the faithful and the Saviour. Thus while the idea of God is, so to speak, presupposed as given in the very feeling of absolute dependence on him, and no special regard is paid to its aberrations into deism or pantheism, the idea of Christ is developed with a completeness and minuteness which testifies to the inner passion from which it sprang. Generally the work may be characterized as a combination of syncretism and pietism. Syncretism means the overthrow of all ecclesiastical exclusiveness by a deeper conception of the doctrines in question; pietism means the careful cultivation of the religious organ in which faith manifests itself, and by which it works. Originally these two tendencies, as represented by Calixtus and Spener, touched each other but slightly; but later times came to understand that an actual combination of them was necessary, and it was accomplished by Schleiermacher: hence his practical stand-point.—though belonging to the Reformed Church, he labored for its union with the Lutheran Church; and hence his scientific character. Syncretism developed into rationalism, and pietism into supernaturalism. But Schleiermacher is neither a rationalist nor a supernaturalist: he is a union of both. The original form of the League, and the form which was intended to have been found in a number of exquisite minor treatises on duty, on virtue, on the highest good, etc., shadowed by his Kritik alter bisherigen Sittenlehre, 1803, [abridged from the first edition of Herzog, vol. xiii. 741—784].

SCHLEUSNER, Johann Friedrich, b. at Leipzig, Jan. 15, 1759; d. at Wittenberg, Feb. 21, 1811. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor at Göttingen in 1794, and at Wittenberg in 1795. His principal works are lexicographical — Lexicon Gr.—Lal. in Nov. Test., 1792 (now superseded), and Thesaurus syn. lexicum in LXX., 1821 (still in use).

SCHMALKALD, League and Articles of. The League of Schmalkald was formed on Feb. 27, 1531, by nine princes and eleven imperial cities of Germany, under the leadership of the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse, for the purpose of defending Protestantism. It was soon after joined by five other princes and ten imperial cities, and comprised, indeed, the whole of Northern Germany and a large part of Central and Southern Germany. The immediate effect of the formation of the league was the religious peace of Nuremberg in 1532; but it was evident to all that the emperor, Charles V., yielded, only because he was too occupied at that moment with France and the Turks to carry through his own views. The league acted in the beginning with considerable vigor. At a meeting on Dec. 24, 1535, it was determined to raise and maintain a standing army of ten thousand foot and two thousand cavalry; and at another meeting, on Feb. 13, 1537, a common confession, the so-called Articles of Schmalkald, was signed by all the members of the league. It was occasioned by the work which had been begun and not the work which had been begun and not by Luther, and became after wards one of the symbolical books of the Lutheran Church. But soon internal jealousy between the princes began to weaken the actions of the league, and at Mühlberg its army was completely routed, April 24, 1547. It was Maurice of Saxony, and not the league of Schmalkald, which finally secured the victory by a treaty of peace on July 31, 1552. See HORTLEDER: Kaiser Karl V. wider die Schmal. Bundesverwandten, Francfort, 1817, 2 vols.

SCHMID, Christian Friedrich, b. at Bickelsberg in Württemberg, 1794; d. at Tübingen, March 28, 1852. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed rector there 1818, extraordinary professor in 1821, and ordinary in 1826, and given the degree of D.D. He lectured on exegesis and practical theology. He was a very modest scholar, and published very little. The two books by which he is widely known, his Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testamentes (ed. C. Weisäcker, Stuttgart, 1858 [4th ed. by A. Heller, 1868, Eng. trans., Biblical Theology of the New Testament, Edinburgh, 1870]), and Christliche Moral (ed. by A. Heller, Stuttgart, 1861, 2d ed., 1867), were published after his death. But he exercised a great and powerful influence on the side of positive Christianity, and as a counterpoise to his colleague, F. C. Baur; and through his pupils, especially Oehler and Dorner, he wielded it still. Schmid's work upon the biblical theology of the New Testament is distinguished by his union of the historic sense and the thoughts of organic development with the most decided faith in the absolute revelation in Christ. It will long maintain its present high position. For further information respecting Schmid, and for a list of his own publications (only essays), see the preface to his Biblical Theology.

SCHMID, Konrad, b. at Rüssach, in the canton of Zürich, 1476; was educated in the house of the Johannites in his native city, and became an inmate there, 1519, after studying theology at Basel. Soon after, he became acquainted with Zwingli. In 1522 he began to preach in German, and against the Pope. In 1525 he presided at the disputation at that of Bern, and throughout his life, he proved himself the true friend and co-worker of Zwingli. Like him, he fell in the second Capelle war, October, 1531.

HAGENBACH

SCHMIDT, Oswald Gottlob, D.D., Lutheran divine, b. at Kaditz, near Dresden, Jan. 2, 1821; d. at Werdau, Saxony, Dec. 26, 1882. He studied at Leipzig; in 1845 was licensed to preach; taught in private families until 1845, when he became pastor, first at Schönfeld, then, in 1856, at Greifenhain; and in 1860 he was elected pastor and superintendent at Werdau. He wrote, besides numerous articles in newspapers and reviews, Nikolaus Hausmann, der Freund Luthers, Leipzig, 1860; Caspar Cruciger (ii. 2) and Georg der Gottseliger, Fürst zu Anhalt (iv. 2), in Leben der Altestor der lutherischen Kirche, 1861 sqq.; Petrus Moselmann. Ein Beitr. zur Geschichte des Humanismus in Sachsen, 1868; and the lecture, Blüte in die Kirche, dengedacht im 50. Jahrg. des Zeitschr. der Reformation, 1879; Luther's Bekänntschaft mit den alten Classtern, 1883 (ed. W. Schmidt). For his contributions to this Encyclopædia, see Analysis.

SCHMOLKE, Benjamin (more accurately SCHMOLCK), one of the sweetest and most productive of the German hymn-writers; was b. in Brauchitschdorf, Liegnitz, Dec. 21, 1672; d. at Schweidnitz, Feb. 12, 1737. In 1693 he entered the university of Leipzig; four years later became his father's assistant as pastor; and in 1702 became co-pastor at Schweidnitz, and pastor principal in 1714. The two books by which he is widely known, his hymns were published in small collections during his lifetime, and soon found a permanent place in German hymn-books. They are pervaded by Christian piety and fervor, and are written in a simple and dignified style. They breathe a warm, personal love to Christ, and were written without effort. (The one best known in English is Mein Jesus, wie du willst, translated by Miss Jane Borthwick, "My Jesus, as thou wilt." She has also translated his fine lyric, "My God, I know that I must die." His Was Jesus that dost at vohgegenan has been rendered by Sir H. W. Baker (1863), "What our Father does is well." Schmolke's works appeared at Tübingen, 1740-44, in 2 vols. A selection from his hymns and prayers has been published by Grote (2d ed., Leipzig, 1880), to which is prefixed a good memoir.

SCHMUCKER, Samuel Simon, D.D., an American Lutheran divine, son of Rev. J. G. Schmucker, D.D.; b. at Hagerstown, Md., Feb. 26, 1799; d. at Gettysburg, Penn., July 26, 1873. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1817, and at the Princeton theological seminary, and was admitted into the ministry by the Lutheran ministerium of Pennsylvania in 1820. He was pastor at New Market, Va., 1820-26. He took a leading part in the organization of the General Synod and of the theological seminary at Gettysburg, in 1826. He was chosen its first professor, and continued to be chairman of its faculty till 1864, when he retired from official activity. The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him in 1830, simultaneously by Rutgers College, New Jersey, and the University of Pennsylvania. In 1846 he visited Germany, in company with Dr. B. Curtz and J. G. Morris, with the double purpose of establishing, if possible, some communication between the church there and the Lutherans in the United States, and of obtaining books for the library of the seminary.

His doctrinal teaching was marked by indifference to the distinctive features of symbolical Lutheranism, which he held to be non-fundamental, and by laying stress on the common doctrines and principles of Protestantism, which he called fundamental. He accepted substantially the Augsburg Confession, but disliked the Formula of Concord. His mind was strongly impressed with the importance of mutual recognition and cooperative union among the various Protestant denominations, and in 1838, he published in the American churches, first published in 1838, and circulated in England as well as here, he aided in preparing the way for the organization of the Evangelical Alliance, and attended its first meeting in London, 1846.
Dr. Schmucker was for many years the theological champion of Low-Church American Lutheranism, and one of the most active and influential ministers of the General Synod of his church. He was better known outside of his denomination than any other Lutheran minister. He prepared in all more than four hundred young men for the ministry, and was highly esteemed for his personal character, self-denying labors, and Christian spirit. But some of his ablest pupils forsook his theological stand-point, and adopted a stricter type of Lutheranism, which is represented in the General Council. When he entered upon public life, he found the Lutheran Church almost exclusively German, and in a comparatively stagnant condition. He helped to revive, educate, and to Anglicize it, and prepared the way for its present advanced position.

Among his numerous publications, the following are the most important: Biblical Theology of Storr and Flatt, trans. from the German, Andover, 1826, vols. (reprinted in England in 1845); Elements of Popular Theology, Andover, 1834; Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches on Christian Union, New York, 1838; Psychology, or Elements of a New System of Mental Philosophy, New York, 1842; Dissertation on Capital Punishment, Philadelphia, 1845; The American Lutheran Church historically, doctrinally, and practically delineated, Philadelphia, 1851; The Lutheran Manual on Scriptural Principles, or the Augsburg Confession illustrated and sustained by Scripture and Lutheran Theologians, Phila., 1853; The Lutheran Symbola, or Vindication of American Lutheranism, Baltimore, 1856; The Church of the Reformer as developed within the General Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Baltimore, 1867; True Unity of Christ's Church, New York, 1870. W. J. MANN.

SCHNECKEBURGER, Matthias, b. at Thalheim in Württemberg, Jan. 17, 1804; d. at Bern in Switzerland, June 13, 1848. He studied theology at Tubingen, and was appointed preacher at Herrenberg in 1831, and professor of theology at Bern in 1834. His principal work are, Über den Zweck d. Apostelgeschichte, Bern, 1841; Vergleichende Darstellung des lutherischen und reformierten Lehrbegriffs, edited by Güder, Stuttgart, 1855, 2 vols.; Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte, edited by Lohlein, Frankfurt-am-M., 1862; Die Lehrbegriffe der kleineren prot. Kirchenpartien, edited by Hundeshagen, 1863. The reason why his works appeared so long after his death was the eccentricity of his widow, who kept his papers under lock and key. His chief merit lies in his historical criticism, and comparative dogmatics or symbolics. He most ably set forth the difference between the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions. See, for further information, the full art. by Hundeshagen, in the first edition of Herzog, xiii. 609–618.

SCHÖBERLEIN, Ludwig Friedrich, b. at Kolnberg, near Ansbach, Sept. 6, 1813; d. at Göttingen, July 8, 1881. He was successively repetent (1841), praeventor (1843), and ordinary professor of theology in 1845, in the University of Göttingen; but from 1850 to 1855 he was extraordinary professor at Heidelberg. In 1862 he was appointed Consistorialrat, and in 1878 abbot of Bursfeld. He was an orthodox Lutheran, but with a mystical tendency. His principal writings relate to liturgics; but he also produced D. Grund-lehren d. Heils, entwickelt aus dem Prinzip der Liebe (1849), Die Geheimnisse des Glaubens (1872), Das Prinzip u. System der Dogmatik (1881).

SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY is often identified with medieval theology, and placed over against patristic theology, as the theology of the primitive church. It is undeniable, that, with the close of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century, Christian theology changed character; and it is perfectly correct to designate the period from that time, and down to the Reformation, as the theology of the middle ages. But it is, nevertheless, inadmissible to use the terms “scholasticism” and “medieval theology” as synonymous; for there is a most important difference between Isidore of Seville, Beda, Alcuin, Rhabanus Maurus, Paschasius Radbertus, and Scotus Erigena on the one side, and Anselm, Abelard, Peter the Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus on the other. Scholasticism forms only one period of the theology of the middle ages,—from the close of the eleventh century to the Reformation.

The teachers of the primitive church are justly called the Fathers (paiores). They produced the dogmas. Through their manifold doctrinal controversies and discussions they unfolded and developed the whole contents of the Christian faith, and by the decisions of their great ecumenical councils they formulated and fixed the dogmas. But with the close of the sixth century the theological productivity ceased. The work was done. All the materials for the formation of a doctrinal system of Christianity were present. No essential element of Christian faith was left undefined. Then there came a time,—the attempt at building up new state organizations on the ruin of the Roman Empire, the exertions of the Germanic Barbarians to adopt and assimilate the Romano-Christian civilization,—a time of confusion and chaos,—national, social, political,—during which it was the task of the theologian to gather together the doctrinal materials acquired, to sift them, to preserve them. The theologians of that time, the Scholastics of that time, the theologians from the seventh to the eleventh century,—a Cassiodorus, an Isidore of Seville, a Beda, an Alcuin,—are not men of creative genius, but of encyclopedic knowledge, compilers, though compilers of enormous industry and deep conscientiousness. But of course the materials could not be gathered and kept together in a merely mechanical way, without any trace of individual treatment; and towards the close of the period complaints are heard, that people put more faith in Boethius,—that is, in dialectics, in philosophy,—than in Holy Writ. Indeed, Scotus Erigena is often mentioned as the father of scholasticism; though he was a philosopher rather than a theologian, and though he lacks one of the essential characteristics of scholasticism,—recognition of the tradition of the church as absolute authority. In reality scholasticism begins with the controversy between Berengar of Tours and Lambrech, and Anselm is the first who fully represents its principles.

Scholastic theology is something more than a mere preservation, or arrangement, or application of the dogmas: it is an actual treatment. But the treatment is merely formal. New dogmas were not added. Even those which received a farther development under the hands of the schoolmen—such as the doctrine of the offices of Christ, or the doctrine of the sacraments—had been fully defined by the preceding ages, at least with reference to their formal outlines. So were the dogmas altered with respect to their essential contents. The problem which the schoolmen undertook to solve was simply to give each dogma a rational substructure sufficient to elevate it from a mere matter of faith to a matter of science, and to form the whole mass of dogmas into a consistent and harmonious totality, a system. They were not patres: they were only doctores et magistri. The very name “scholasticism” shows the character of the movement. The dogma was transferred from the church to the school: the university became the hearth of the dogma. The treatment of the dogmas, because they were again fettered by the tradition, beyond the precedence, but it is only theoretically, not practically. A fine and harmonious union between the mystical contemplation, which, with its ecstasy, is an anticipation of the life to come, Abelard, on the other hand, was very far from being a rationalist in the modern sense of the word. A pupil both of the nominalist Roscelin and the realist William of Champeaux, he was also an adversary of both, and tried to form his own philosophical principle, the so-called “conceptualism.” But though he complained very much of people who despised the dialectico-philosophical treatment of the dogmas, because they were liable to fall into superstition and fanaticism, and though his famous book, Sic et non, seems intended to undermine the authority of tradition, the submitters of Abelard, both the church and the church, and that both theoretically and practically. A fine and harmonious union between the mysticism of Bernard and the dialectics of Abelard was effected by the Victorines,—Hugo of St. Victor (1097—1141), and his disciple, Richard of St. Victor. The stand-point of Anselm is still retained so far as the church and the tradition are accepted as rules of faith, and the necessity is recognized of progressing from faith to reason in order to reach certainty. But Hugo of St. Victor differs from Anselm by his distinction between necessaria, probabilia, mirabilia, and inrreliabilia, of which he placed the first and the last group entirely without any relation to faith: while of the two middle groups, the real domain of faith, only the probabilia, that is, the truths of the so-called natural religion, can receive any affirmation from reason; the mirabilia, or auta supra rationem, are removed from the field of theology. This, the first departure of scholasticism, reached its point of culmination with Peter the Lombard, the magister sententiarum (d. in 1180). He united the positive and the dialectical tendencies which he found combing each other on the theological arena, and employed dialectics as a means by which to solve such contradictions as might occur in the positive statements of the authorities. His book recommended itself by its ecclesiastical correctness and its dialectical adroitness, and it became the most used and most admired scholastic text-book ever produced. But a true reconciliation between reason and revelation, philosophy and the church, was never achieved by the Scotists, and it seems as if the author studiously tried to avoid touching the point. The doctrines of Scripture, tradition, and the church, he does not treat at all; he presupposes their absolute authority as an incontrovertible axiom.

Down to this time, only some of the logical writings of Aristotle were known to the West in Latin translations, but none of his works on physics and metaphysics. The more intimate intercourse, however, which sprang up between the East and the West on account of the crusades, and more especially between the establishment of a Latin empire in Constantinople in 1204, and the introduction of the Arabian philosophy to the Christian world, soon put the schoolmen in possession of the whole of Aristotle. The Arabs had not only translated and commented on all his works, but they had even developed a philosophy of their own on the basis of Aristotle and the Neo-Platonists; and, towards the end of the twelfth and in the beginning of the thirteenth century, the Christian scholars of Western Europe became acquainted with this Arabian philosophy through the Spanish Jews. At first the Aristotelian writings were looked upon with some suspicion. The heretical eccentricities of an Amalric of Bena or a David of Dinanto were referred back to them as their true source, and the Pope repeatedly forbade the study of them (1209, 1215, 1231). But the inner affinity between scholasticism and Aristotle conquered all opposition; and the influence of the renewed study of his works soon became visible on scholastic theology. The old questions of the true relation between reason and revelation, science and faith, philosophy and theology, were deeper put, and better answered; and new questions arose,—of the true nature of Christianity in comparison with the natural, of the true character of theology,—whether a science or not, whether a theoretical or a practical science, etc. Not only ethics, but also physics, was incorporated with the doctrinal system, so that the materials gradually swelled into immensity. The form was generally that of a commentary on the Sentences, though sometimes, also, that of an independent summa, but in both cases the dialectical method was carried out in the minutest details, with its thesis et antithesis, its pro et contra, its resolutio et conclusio, etc.

The first great representative of this the second departure of scholastic theology was Alexander of Hales (d. 1245); but he was completely eclipsed by Albert the Great (1193-1280), in whose works all the principal characteristics of the age are palpably present. By his enormous erudition, encompassing all sciences, he impressed people in general as a kind of magician; on account of his close study of all contradictions, he was by scholars often called simia Aristotelis (“the ape of Aristotle”). But, though he certainly lacked critical power, he was by no means without speculative ideas; and his definition of theology as a practical science, the science of God and his works, elaborated, not for the sake of knowledge, but for the sake of salvation, exercised a lasting influence.

A complete theological system, however, he did not produce; but his fundamental ideas were taken up and developed by his pupil, Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274), the greatest of the schoolmen, [and recommended by Pope Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274), the greatest of the schoolmen, [and recommended by Pope Leo XIII. as the greatest of all the doctors of the church]. The contemplation of God, he teaches, is the highest good which can fall to the lot of man, the very acme of blessedness; but, on account of the incommensurability of the divine and the created, man can never reach that goal by his own natural reason. By reason man can only acquire an indirect knowledge of God, such as can be demonstrated from his works. In order to obtain any direct knowledge of God, man needs a supernatural aid, a revelation; and just as philosophy starts from the natural and proceeds towards knowledge of God by the light of reason, so theology starts from the revealed fact, and proceeds towards knowledge of God by the light of faith.

Theology and philosophy have the same method and the same goal, only the starting-points and the spheres are different. Bonaventura (1221-1274), a friend of Thomas Aquinas, added, perhaps, nothing to the common stock of ideas; but the calm repose of his character and the sweet mysticism of his mind procured for his teaching a great influence; while the fantastic formalism of Raimundus Lullus (1255–1316) had no other effect than the formation of a small school, which soon died out. With Duns Scotus (1260–1308) the great controversy between Thomists and Scotists broke out. Thomas Aquinas belonged to the Dominican order, Duns Scotus, to the Franciscan; and more than once the whole controversy between their adherents has been described as caused by mere jealousy and rivalry between their orders. It is true that it contributed nothing to the further development of scholastic theology; but the scientific dissension between Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus is, nevertheless, fundamental and decisive. Duns Scotus dissolved that unity between faith and science, between theology and philosophy, which was the pride of scholasticism; and in its stead he placed a positivism which has only to take one step in order to reach scepticism, —a step which Duns Scotus himself can justly be said to have taken by his peculiar quodlibet method, placing the pro and the contra over against each other without any mediation, and leaving the reader to make the decision for himself.

After Duns Scotus the decay of scholasticism begins, soon to end in complete dissolution. One of the reasons was the adoption of nominalism. Even Duns Scotus gave up the reigning realism, turning it into nominalism. This was by scholars, de Sancto Porciano (d. 1334) abandoned it altogether, and adopted nominalism; and with Occam (1280–1347) the effects of this change of principle become visible. Realism — the doctrine that the general ideas were really present in the individual things, universalia in re— was indeed the bond between theology and philosophy, and elaborated by it; but forms of reasoning, voces, nomina — became prevalent, and was actually carried through in the system, the band snapped, and theology and philosophy separated. From that time theology reigned alone, but it ceased to be a science: it became a mere commandment. The change is painfully apparent in the writings of Oecumen. When he undermines the Christian dogmas from end to end by his logic, and then contemplates them and retires to the faith of the church; when from the doctrines of the church he draws logical inferences which directly run out into absurdity, or indirectly lead into self-contradictions; when he connects the most sublime ideas with scurrilous problems or ludicrous problems,—what is that all but frivolity? The invention of a double truth, or the axiom that something can be true in philosophy though it is false in religion, and vice versa, cannot be fastened on Occam, nor on any of the schoolmen in particular. Nevertheless, when Roman-Catholic historians and critics ascribe it to the anti-scholastic philosophy of the fifteenth century, and quote its condemnation by the Fifth Council of the Lateran (1513) as an argument, they are certainly mistaken: it was openly avowed to the are certainly mistaken: it was openly avowed and violently attacked already in the fourteenth century. At all events, it became the stumbling-block of scholasticism: for, however firmly and decided repudiated, it is a simple and natural consequence of nominalism; and, after Occam, nominalism reigned uninterruptedly in scholastic theology. It was the principle of Gabriel Biel or regenerating scholasticism by Raymond of Sabunde, Nicholas of Cusa, and Gerson, see the respective articles in this work; for more detailed representation of the history, character, and significance of mediaeval scholasticism, see R. SCHOLIUM. The, occupies a middle position between the gloss or marginal note on a single passage and the commentary, or the full interpretation of the whole work. It may be defined as a string of notes made for the use of the school, and it occurs in that sense in the works of Cicero. As instances of scholia may be mentioned the commentaries of Nicholas of Lyra, the notes of Hugo Grotius, and more especially the Gnomon of J. A. Bengel (6th ed., Tubingen, 1835, 2 vols.).

SCHÖNHERR, Johann Heinrich, b. Nov. 30, 1770, at Merel; was the son of a Prussian sergeant; in his fifteenth year he was apprenticed with a merchant at Königberg, but soon abandoned commerce, and, after preparatory studies, entered the university of that city as student of theology, 1792; turned from theology to metaphysics, and finding the views of Kant unpalatable, and unable to satisfy his searching thirst for light on the momentous themes of immortality and the destiny of men, made independent inquiries designed to harmonize nature and reason with the declarations of Holy Scripture, and published the results of his investigations in two pamphlets (Sieg der Göttlichen Offenbarung, Sack, 1794) and (Novum Testamentum als die göttliche Offenbarung, Sack, 1795). He was wont to unfold his views to a small circle of friends: and the attempt to suppress their meetings as seditious to the teachings of the church, and sectarian, proved unsuccessful; for the Ministerium for Cultus declared (1814) that his notions, being clearly meant to sustain the doctrines of the Bible, were ethically not only not dangerous, but beneficial. The presentation of his unsystematic system in different German universities had but little encouragement; and after six years spent as a private tutor he returned (1800) to Königsberg, and settled there, lecturing in private on his favorite themes, and died in Spittelhof, Oct. 15, 1826. He and his philosophy were soon forgotten; but, in consequence of the Religious Suit (1835-42), the whole subject came up again, and gave rise to numerous publications, of which a fuller account is given in Ebel (q.v.). The whole literature, with full particulars of the cosmogony and peculiar teaching of this theosophist, may be seen in Faith Victorious, being an Account of the Life and Labors, and of the Times, of the Venerable Dr. Johann Ebel, etc., N. Y., 1882, by the present writer. See art. by ERBKM, in the first edition of HEBT, and of HERZOG, and of HKB, and of HERZOG, and of HKB. SCHOOLMEN. See SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY.

SCHOTT, Heinrich August, b. at Leipzig. Dec. 5, 1780; d. at Jena, Dec. 29, 1835. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor there in 1805, at Wittenberg in 1808, and at Jena in 1812. His principal work is his Theorie der Bereitsamkeit, Leipzig, 1815-25, 3 vols.

1808. In 1751 he entered the university of Göttingen, where he came under the moulding influence of Mosheim and Michaelis. After spending several years in literary labors in connection with his uncle, Professor Karl Andreas Bell, at Leipzig, and in lecturing as docent until he was appointed professor in 1761, he left Leipzig to accept a call to the professorship of poetry at Wittenberg, from which he was transferred to the chair of Oriental languages at the academy in Franeker. In 1729 he entered the order of the Holy Spirit, and was ordained a priest in 1514, but emigrated to the Netherlands, where he came under the moulding influence of Mosheim and Michaelis. The first fruit of these studies was a combined study of Chaldee, Syriac, and Rabbinic languages at the academy in Franeker. In 1729 he entered the order of the Holy Spirit, and was ordained a priest in 1514, but emigrated to the Netherlands, where he came under the moulding influence of Mosheim and Michaelis. The first fruit of these studies was a combined study of Chaldee, Syriac, and Rabbinic.

His great work, a monument of immense industry (Leipzig, 1769-1812), was his Ausführliche Gesch. d. christl. Kirche (Complete History of the Christian Church), in 45 vols. The last two volumes of the ten upon the period since the Reformation were completed by Tschirner. They cover the history of eighteen centuries. Other church historians have written in a better style, and have understood certain periods and movements more fully; but up to this time we have no other work covering such a long period, combining so many excellences.

A handbook of church history (Historia relig. et eccles. Christi ab urbe Romana in usum lectionum) appeared in Berlin, 1777, passed through five editions (fifth, 1808) during the author's lifetime, and was issued by Marheinecke for the seventh time, 1828. He also prepared the Allgemeine Biographie, 1767-91, 8 vols. See K. L. NITZSCH: Ueber Johannes M. Schröck's Leben, Karakter, und Schriften, Leipzig, 1812.

SCHULTENS, Albert, the father of modern Hebrew grammar; was b. at Gröningen, in 1886, and early destined to a theological career. He studied the original languages of the Bible, Hebrew and Greek, with which he afterwards combined the study of Chaldee, Syriac, and Babylonic. The first-fruit of these studies was a public disputation, which he held with Gussclius when only eighteen years of age, and in which he was called to the theological seminary at Leyden, and died there Jan. 26, 1750.

The services which Schultens rendered to philosophy are of great value. He was the first to overturn the notion that Hebrew is the original language of the Fustian languages, that Arabic was an indispensable means for the understanding of the Hebrew. Thus he opened a new field in Hebrew grammar and biblical exegesis, advancing at the same time the study of Oriental languages. Of his works which pertain to Hebrew grammar and biblical literature, we mention, Origines Hebraeae, etc., Franeker, 1724-38, 2 vols., and a preliminary work, De Defectibus Hodierne Lingue Hebraeae., Franeker 1731 (new edition of both works, Leyden, 1761); Institutiones ad fundamenta lingue Hebraeic, etc., Leyden, 1737, 1756; &c. A hand k of church history (Leonia relig. et eccles. devoted himself especially to the study of church history; was for nearly a year pastor at Heidenhaus; became docent in philosophy at Tubingen 1814, professor of Roman literature and antiquities in 1818, and shortly before his death professor of ancient history. He distinguished himself greatly at the university, and studied with zeal the ancient philosophy which appeared in 1841 as his Montanism and the Christian Church in the Second Century (Der Montanismus u. d. christliche Kirche d. 2. Jahrhund.). Through Strauss' Leben Jesu and other studies he found himself at variance with the teachings of the church, and in 1846 published (at Tubingen) his Post-Apocalyptic Age (D. nachapost. Zeitalter). It was written in six months, and exaggerates the Baur hypothesis of the early church, and dislocates the origin of the writings of the New Testament. The work asserts that early Christianity was pure Ebionism, and builds up the history of the early church on this foundation. The author already declares himself for this theory in his work on Montanism. In 1847 Schwengler edited The Clementine Homilies, and in 1852 Eusebius, and published a translation and exposition of Aristotle's Metaphysics (Uebersetzung und Erluterung der aristotel. Metaphysik), 1817; A History of Philosophy, 1848, [11th ed., 1882, Eng. trans. by J. H. Seeley, New York, and Stirling, London, 1872, etc.]; and a History of Rome, 3 vols., 1853-58.

He studied medicine at Leyden and Utrecht, and began to practise at Rotterdam, but was drawn to the study of theology, and became in 1688 preacher to the Mennonites in Rotterdam, and in 1690 to the Doopsgezenden in Amsterdam. It was written in six months, and exaggerates the Baur hypothesis of the early church, and dislocates the origin of the writings of the New Testament. SCOTCH, Elizabeth, the author of many once popular and useful hymns; b. at Norwich, SCOTT, Thomas, brother of Elizabeth Scott, not to be confounded with his namesake the commentator; was a dissenting minister at Lowestoft in Suffolk, Ipswich (1771—74), and Lowestoft in Norfolk, where he d. 1775. Apart from some sermons, all his publications were poetical: the chief of them are, The Book of Job in English Verse (1737), and the meritorious and interesting volume of Lyric Poems, Devotional and lyrical (1773). These are designed "to form a kind of little poetical system of piety and morals," and cover in careful order the whole ground of what he considered most important in natural and revealed religion. His opinions seem to have been semi-Arian; and his hymns have been chiefly, though by no means not to be confounded with his namesake the composer.

SCOTT, Levi, D.D., senior bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; b. near Canwell's Bridge (now Odessa), Del., Oct. 11, 1802; d. there Thurs., July 12, 1882. He was licensed, 1825, and received into the Philadelphia Conference, 1826. From 1840 to 1843 he was principal of Dickinson Grammar-School, Carlisle, Penn.; was a member of every General Conference from 1837 to 1852; in the latter year he was elected bishop, and served the church with great ability and faithfulness.

SCOTT, Thomas, Church of England; b. at Braytoft, Lincolnshire, Feb. 16, 1747; d. at Astor Sandford, Buckinghamshire, April 16, 1821. He was ordained priest in 1773; and in 1781 he succeeded John Newton, who had converted him to Calvinism, as curate of Olney. In 1785 he became chaplain of the Lock Hospital, London, and in 1801 vicar of Astor Sandford. His first publication was The Force of Truth: a Marvellous Narrative of Human Life, London, 1779 (10th ed., Edinburgh, 1818), an account of his religious conversion and mission, and that he in which he is so celebrated, is A Family Bible with Notes, 1788-92, 5 vols., repeatedly re-issued and reprinted, several American editions. This has long been considered a model family Bible, and has been read more widely, perhaps, than any other. It spans volumes for Scott's industry and skill, that nothing impeded his work, and that he was oppressed by poverty, and compelled for years before his ordination to earn his living as a farm-laborer, he yet was able to acquire considerable learning, and to present it in so popular a way.

SCOTTISH PHILOSOPHY has several very marked features, determined by the bones rather than by the flesh. First, It professes to proceed by the method of induction, that is, by the observation of facts. In this respect it is like the physical sciences, and differs entirely from the ancient and mediaval systems, which sought to discover truth by analysis and deduction, from the joint dogmatic and deductive method of Descartes and his school, from the critical method of Kant, and the dialectic of Hegel. Second, It observes its facts, not by the external senses, but by self-consciousness. In this respect it differs from the physical sciences, but is in many respects the physical and physiological schools of our day. It does look at the brain and nerves (Reid and Brown, and, in our day, Calderwood, looked at these), but it is merely to aid it in investigating purely mental phenomena falling under the eye of consciousness. Third, By the observations of consciousness it discovers principles working in the mind prior to and independent of our observation of them or of our experience; these it calls reason in the first degree as distinguished from reasoning, intuition, common sense (Reid), fundamental laws of thought (Stewart). This is its important characteristic, distinguishing it from Locke, and from empiricists who discover nothing higher than the generalization of a gathered experience; whereas the Scottish school discover principles above experience, and regulating experience. Mental philosophy is in a sense inductive, as it is by induction we discover fundamental laws and their mode of operation; but these laws exist prior to induction, and guide to and guarantee primitive truth.

The influential philosophy, when the Scottish school arose, was that of Locke, whose Essay on Human Understanding was published in 1690. The early Scotchmen felt they had great obligations to Locke, and never differ from him without expressing a regret that they are obliged to do so. But, in order to keep his experiential philosophy from drifting into scepticism, they call in certain primitive principles.

Francis Hutcheson (1694—1746), an Irishman of Scottish descent, and professor of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow, is entitled to be regarded as the founder of the school. In his Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue (1725), and in An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions and Affections, with Illustrations of the Moral Sense (1728), he calls in a moral sense, after the manner of Shaftesbury, to oppose the defective ethical theory of Locke.

David Hume appeared in the mean time (1711—76). As Berkeley had denied the existence of matter as a substance, so Hume denies the existence of mind as a substance, and nothing but sensations are objects; and it is the business of early education to impress on the mind the idea of the soul that is made up of sensations, and is separate and immaterial. In An Inquiry concerning the Principles of

Scholasticism had now to defend truth from the scepticism of their countryman.

Thomas Reid (1710-96) may be regarded as the fittest representative of the school. He was a professor, first in Aberdeen, and then in Glasgow, where he published An Inquiry into the Human Mind on the Principles of Common Sense, in 1764; followed by Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, in 1785, and Essays on the Active Powers, in 1788. In these works he opposes vigorously Locke's views as to idea, which had culminated in the idealism of Berkeley, and shows that there is in the mind a reason in the first degree, or a common sense, which gives us a foundation of truth and morality. A number of other writers appeared in Scotland about the same time, such as James Beattie (1735-1802), author of Essay on Style, he recommended the Scottish metaphysics to the English people. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, the philosophy of Reid and Stewart had a powerful influence in France, where it was used to check the sensationalism of Condillac, and in the United States of America, where it was taught in nearly every college, and was employed to defend the great truths of natural religion, and so to supply evidence in favor of revealed religion.

Dugald Stewart (1753-1828) was the most illustrious disciple of Reid, and sought to establish what he called the fundamental laws of human belief. By his clear exposition and his elegant style he recommended the Scottish metaphysics to the English people. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, the philosophy of Reid and Stewart had a powerful influence in France, where it was used to check the sensationalism of Condillac, and in the United States of America, where it was taught in nearly every college, and was employed to defend the great truths of natural religion, and so to supply evidence in favor of revealed religion.

Thomas Brown (1778-1820) rebelled against the authority of Reid and Stewart, who were charged by him with introducing too many first principles. He was influenced to some extent by Destutt de Tracy, and the ideologists of France. He allowed to Hume that the relation of cause and effect was merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence, but argued, in opposition to Reid, that the former was the more intuitive. He thus kept up his relationship to the genuine Scottish school, and defended the great truths of natural religion. In his lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind, published posthumously, he discoursed brilliantly on suggestion and on the emotions.

Thomas Chalmers was a devoted adherent of the philosophy of his country. He expounded with great eloquence the views of Butler as to the nature and supremacy of conscience. None of the Scottish metaphysicians opposed religion — Hume did not belong to the school; but Chalmers was the first who brought the philosophy of Scotland into harmony with the evangelical faith of the nation. He argued from the moral power in man, as Kant did, the existence of God and of man's responsibility and immortality, and, from the nature of the moral law, the corruption of man's nature and the need of an atonement. Sir William Hamilton, who was the most noted philosopher of the Scottish school, as Reid was distinguished for his observation and shrewd sense, Hamilton was for his erudition and his logical power. While he belongs to the Scottish school, he sought to combine with it some of the principles of the philosophy of Kant. In Note A, a dissertation appended to Reid's Collected Works, he shows that common sense, by which he means our primary beliefs, has been held by all the most profound thinkers of ancient and modern times. In his Logic he sought to restore the old religion, and make an exponent of Kant, to improve it, especially by insisting on the universal quantification of the predicate. In his Metaphysics he has a good classification of the faculties of the mind. Some members of the school do not approve of his doctrine of the relativity of knowledge and the negative doctrines of causation and infinity expounded in his Discourses.

The Scottish school has several excellent qualities in its relation to religion. All its members seek to unfold with care the properties and laws of the mind, and thus furnish the best antidotes against materialism. They discern in the mind itself grand laws or principles which guarantee truth, such as the necessary principle of cause and effect, implying the existence of God, and the moral power implying an indelible distinction between right and wrong. While thus furnishing an introduction to religion, and aiding it, it does not seek to absorb it, as do the idealism of Schelling and the dialectic of Hegel. The Scottish metaphysicians have always been somewhat suspicious of the higher speculations of certain German philosophers. Hamilton, in his Discourses, cuts down the idea of the absolute as defended by Schelling and Cousin, by showing that it involves contradictions. (For accounts and criticisms, see Dissertations on the Progress of Metaphysical and Ethical Philosophy by Dugald Stewart, École Écosaise by Cousin, and especially The Scottish Philosophy Biographical, Expository, Critical, from Hutcheson to Hamilton, by James McCosh.)

SCOTUS ERIGENA. John. The date and place of his birth cannot be made out with certainty, but it is probable that he was born in Ireland between 800 and 815. He came to the court of Charles the Bald; Prudentius, in his De Predicatione; the synod of Langres (859), etc., — yields no argument against his being a native of that country, as its original Latin name was Scotia Major. His other surname, first occurring in the oldest manuscripts of his translation of Dionysius Areopagita, points directly to Ireland in both of its derivations. — Ieru gena, from the Greek isòpō ("born in the island of the saints"), and Erigena, from "Eriu," the old native name of the country.

Similar uncertainty prevails with respect to the place, date, and circumstances of his death. Inglis, in his Historia Abbatum Croylandensis, tells us that he was invited to England by Alfred the Great, probably shortly after the death of Charles the Bald, about 883; that he was appointed teacher at the school of Oxford; and afterwards abbot of Malmesbury; and that he finally, probably about 891, was killed by his own pupils, and in the church. Mabillon, in Act. Sacnt. Ord. S. Bened., Natalis Alexander, in his Hist. Ecclei. S. Basili. et Cels., x. 3, the Historia Lit. de la Francia,' and others, reject this report as fabulous; because it seems impossible to them that a man who had been condemned by a pope and a synod for holding heretical opinions should afterwards be made an abbot; but the argument is not of any great weight.

At the court of Charles the Bald he was received with great honor. He enjoyed the particular favor of the king, was made director of the palatinal school, and became intimately acquainted with all the scholars of the court,—a Hincmar, a Lupus, an Usuard, a Ratramnus, and others. He appears to have held no ecclesiastical office in France; nor is it probable that he belonged to any of the monastic orders, though he may have received priestly ordination. In France he wrote most, perhaps all, of his works. The translation of Dionysius Areopagita, which became the bridge across which Neo-Platonism penetrated into Western Europe, he undertook on the express request of the king. It gave him a great fame for learning among people in general, but it also made him suspected in the eyes of the Pope. His principal work is his De Divisione Nature, a kind of natural philosophy or speculative theology, which, starting from the supposition of the unity of philosophy and theology, ends as a system of idealistic pantheism; philosophy having, in the course of the development, entirely absorbed theology.

It cannot be made out with certainty what part Erigena took in the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper which had broken out between Paschasius Radbertus, Rabanus Maurus, Ratramnus, and others, before his arrival in France. It is certain that the book De Eucharistia, which for u.

In 851, or between the first and the second synod of Chiersy (853), partially indorsed the views of Erigena; but the synod of Valence (859) absolutely condemned them, and the condemnation was confirmed by the synod of Langres (859) and Pope Nicholas. It is not known, however, that the audacious philosopher was subjected to any direct persecution.

LIT.—The collected works of Erigena are found in Migne: Patrol. Lat., vol. 122. Monographs on his life and system have been written by Pederus Hipt (Copenhagen, 1823), Stauber (Frankf., 1834), Talandier, Paris, 1843), N. Müller (Mayence, 1844), Christi Der (Gotha, 1860; [R. He left Ireland in 1052, studied in Cologne and Fulda, and was ordained a priest at Wurzburg in 1059, but was in the same year shut up in the monastery of Fulda to do penance for sins committed. In 1069 he was released, and removed to Mayence, but was again imprisoned for the same reason. He wrote a Chronicle in three books,—I. The World's History till the Birth of Christ; II. The History of Christ and the Apostles; III. The History of the Church till 1082. Edited by G. Waitz, in Pertz: Mon. Germ., v. NEUDECKER.

SCIBES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The name "scribe," which already occurs in Jer. viii. 8, Ez. vii. 6, 11, is mentioned very often in the New Testament, either in a good, ideal sense (Matt. xiii. 32, xxi. 34), or, what is more frequently the case, in a bad one (John v. 39, x. 38, etc.), and designates those scribes who at the time of Christ, having themselves lost the true knowledge of the law and the prophets, became blind leaders of the people (Luke xi. 52; Matt. xv. 14). The scribes (scribes, or scribes, or scribes) were originally merely writers or copyists of the law; but eventually they became the doctors of the law, and interpreters of the scriptures. According to the Talmud, these teachers were called "sopherim," because they counted every letter, and classified every precept of the law.

The period of the scribes begins with the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. Though there were popular teachers of the law during the Babylonian captivity, as is evident from Ez. viii. 16, yet the altered state after the return required new enactments, and demanded that an authoritative body of teachers should so regulate the religious life as to adapt it to present circumstances. Hence Ezra, who reorganized the tribal state, also organized such a body of interpreters, of which he was the chief. It is for this reason, that besides the appellation "the priest," he is also called "the scribe" (Ez. vii. 6, 11, 12). The skilled in the law, both from among the tribe of Aaron and the laity, who with Ezra and after his death, thus interpreted and fixed the law, were denominated "soferim," or "scribes." In synagogues, which probably at this time were built here and there, they expounded the law, either on festival and sabbath days, or on Monday and Thursday, the market-days. The most famous teachers were not only members of the Sanhedrin, but formed also a kind of spiritual college, the so-called "Great Synagogue," the last member of which was Simeon the Just. It is characteristic of the scribes of the earlier period, that, with the exception of Ezra and Zadok (Neh. xii. 13), and of Simeon, we have no record of their names; and Jost is probably correct in ascribing this silence to the fact that the one aim of these early scribes was to promote reverence for the law, to make it the groundwork of the people's life. They would write nothing of their own, lest less worthy words should be raised to a level with those of the oracles of God (Judænum und s. Sehent, i. 42). They devoted themselves to the exposition and careful study of the law; and, when interpretation was needed, their teaching was orally only. As these decisions, or halachoth, could not be traced to any certain author, they were called "precepts of the scribes, also of the elders, or sages (paraschew tòv prōsetrían, Matt. xii. 5, xv. 3 sqq.; Mark vii. 2 sq.; also parṣew ṭārābhōq, Gal. i. 14). The scribes of this period probably fixed the canon of the Old Testament and the textus receptus. Thus they became the bearers of the theocratic tradition, as were the prophets in the pre-exile period, but with this difference, that the former, perhaps with the exception of Ezra and those who were with him, represented the letter, which killeth; while the latter were organs of the spirit, which maketh alive. The recorded principle of the men of the Great Synagogue is given in the treatise Abodh,
i. 1: "Let us be cautious in judging, train many disciples, and set a fence about the law." They wished to make the law of Moses the rule of life. But, as the infinite variety of life presents cases which the law has not contemplated, expansions of the canon of the Mosaic law, which was especially represented in the Chasidim (Jastaurus, 1 Macc.
i., 62, ii. 29, 42, vii. 12 sq.; 2 Macc. xiv. 6). To the Chasidim belonged two scribes,—Jose ben-Jozer of Zeruda and Jose ben-Jochanan,—both disciples of Antigonus of Sabo (about 180 B.C.), himself a disciple of Simeon the Just (Pirke Abodh, i. 1). These two are the first of the five pairs of teachers of the law, who, as propagators of the orthodox tradition, distinguished themselves in the last centuries before Christ. They were succeeded by the two contemporaries of John Hyrcanus,—Joshua ben-Perachia and Nithai of Arbela (between 140 and 110 B.C.), in whose doctrinal views the opposition to Sadduceism first shows itself. To them they succeeded, in the time of Alexander Jannæus and Alexander, Simon ben-Shetach, a hero of Pharisism, who twice broke the influence of the Sadducees in the Sanhedrin, and Judah ben-Tabai. In the time of the last Maccabæans, and in the first years of the Idumean rule, the two great doctors of the law were the two sons of proselytes, Shemaja Sameas, Joseph, Ant., XIV.
8, 4) and Abtalion (Pulio, Joseph., Ant., XV. 1, 10, 4), the two magnates of their day. The last pair was presented by Hillel and Shammah. The most famous scribes at the time of Christ and the apostles were, besides Nicodemus (John iii.), Simon, the son of Hillel; Gamaliel, the grandson of Hillel; Jochanan ben-Zaceai; and Jonathan, the son of Uzziel, the Chaldee paraphrast. From Mark iii. 29, we learn that in the school of the celebrated high school of the scribes existed at Jerusalem in the time of Christ. The questions which often brought about a conflict between Christ and the scribes and Pharisees, such as concerning divorce, oath, the sabbath, etc., were the same which occupied the scribes, more especially the license to teach and the introduction of new academical degrees. The scribe, who already occupied a high position over and against the un-learned, and even the priests, now rose to greater prominence since the introduction of the ordination, or promotion as teacher of the law, and member of the court. The candidate, having passed through a certain curriculum in the school of fa-famous teachers, was licensed and set apart by ordination; the presiding rabbi giving to him as the symbol of his work tablets on which he was to note down the sayings of the wise, and the "key of knowledge" (comp. Luke xi. 52), with which he was given to esoteric and the treasures of wise-dom. So admitted, he took his place as a cha-iber, or member of the fraternity. This state of things created not only a fondness for titles (Matt. xxiii. 7), but, above all, a spiritual hierarchy, to which the people had to succumb. The scribes gave the people a new spiritual country, a kingdom of heaven, which was not limited by space. But to give them a kingdom of heaven in which Moses and the prophets are fulfilled was beyond their powers; and, because they did not enter therein themselves, they prevented the people also from entering therein (Matt. xxii. 13). The influence of the teacher was so convincing. They were found in the court-room, in the colleges, but more especially in the synagogues. In the latter places they occupied the uppermost seats (Matt. xxii. 6), read and explained the law. They were also not wanting in the feasts (ibid.): in short, they were everywhere; and it was a very easy thing to influence by their own opposition the people against Jesus. For a long time they tried in vain to get hold of him (Matt. ix. 3, xii. 38, xxii. 35; Luke v. 30, vi. 25, xi. 54, xv. 2, xx. 19 sq.); but they accomplished at last his condemnation and crucifixion (Matt. xxvi. 27, xxvii. 41). The essence and character of rabbinism were such that it necessarily came in conflict with Jesus. The scribes could not bear to hear the truth out of his mouth, and thus was fulfilled what is written in Isa. xxxii. 10-14. That there were also exceptional cases among the scribes, we see in "Zenas the lawyer" (Tit. iii. 13). The essence and character of rabbinism was stricken down by apoplexy.

Dr. Scudder fixed his residence at Chintadrepettah, near Madras, and thus, under his surveillance, there grew up the Arctot mission, which was received under the care of the American Board in 1852, and of the Reformed Dutch Church the next year. From 1842 to 1846 Dr. Scudder was in America, busily engaged, however, in arousing interest in foreign missions. In 1849 he was in the Madura mission; but with this exception he gave his energies to the Arctot mission, and after the death of his wife and son Samuel (1849), wrought with redoubled zeal, as it called upon to make good their loss. Under this pressure his health gave way in 1854, and by medical advice he went to the Cape of Good Hope. Much benefited by the voyage, he was upon the point of returning to India when he was stricken down by apoplexy. Then, in 1855, he was graduated at the College of New Jersey, and at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New-York City, 1815; and practised medicine until 1819, being meanwhile a most earnest and devoted Christian. In the latter year, while in professional attendance upon a lady, he took up in the anteroom a tract entitled The Converters of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions, and the Ability and Duty of the Churches respecting Them. His thoughts were turned more strongly than ever upon his personal duty toward the heathen, and as the result of his deliberations he gave his life to missionary labor. After licensure by the classis of New York, he sailed, June 8, 1819; went first to Ceylon, where he arrived February, 1820; was ordained there May 15, 1821, by clergymen of the Congregational, Baptist, and Methodist denominations; established a hospital at Jaffnapatam; in 1823 was foremost in organizing a college there, and in 1834 was blessed by an extensive revival. In 1836 he and Miron Winslow were transferred to Madras, India, in order that there he might print Scriptures and tracts in Tamil. In the first year they printed six million pages.

Dr. Scudder was one of the heroes of foreign missions. He was tall, strong, and well-proportioned; slender in youth, he became portly in later years; original in his views, though without bigotry. Endowed with great perseverance, he carried through his project at whatever cost. Convinced that he was doing Christ's work, he cared nothing for the opposition of men. He endured hardships, and even severe pain, without complaint. His piety was characteristically; every Friday till noon he spent in fasting and prayer. The Bible constituted well-nigh his sole reading. He went about doing good to body and soul, like his Master. He preached in almost every large town in south-eastern Hindostan. It was his ambition "to be one of the inner circle around Jesus in heaven."

SCULPTURE, Christian. A marked decline in art, both technically and with respect to its subject-matter, made itself manifest in the ancient world long before the conquest of Corinth by

stitution of art from the noble ends of patriotism and religious faith to those of ostentation and personal egotism. The degrading of its inspirations seems to have gone hand in hand with its technical development; and when Greece, which in the Periclean age was the mistress of the world in art and all other cultures, came under the Roman yoke, the spirit of creative genius had perished, and the great masterpieces, which in their extant relics have taught the world through all subsequent centuries, became almost forgotten monuments of the past.

In considering, then, the almost puerile achievements of art in the departments both of sculpture and painting in the early Christian age, its long antecedent decline must not be left out of the account. Irrespective of other causes, presently to be specified, a form of these relics, which had its cradle-life (we can scarcely say its birthplace), lacked both masters and models fitted to cultivate it on a high plane.

Two other causes combined to render the Christian Church in the primitive age, not only indiffer-et, but absolutely antagonistic, to art-culture.

The first of these, and the most important, was the prostitution of the art of ancient Paganism to idolatry. The Mosaic institutes and traditions, however modified by the early church with respect to many of the elements of a cumbrous ceremonialism, were literally interpreted in their relation to art, especially, it may be added, with respect to sculpture. Graven images contemplating religious ends had ever been the abhorrence of the Jewish, and were scarcely less so of the ear-est Christian Church. The substitution, then, of materialism for the spiritual worship of the one invisible God was the one thing which primitive sculpture, to be the invention of the Christian Church, art in any form could have come to be regarded as a possible auxiliary to a pure spiritual faith and worship. Tertullian (d. A.D.
220) went so far as to declare the fine arts, more especially sculpture, to be the invention of the Devil. While this extreme judgment cannot be regarded literally expressing the universal sentiment of the early church, it nevertheless represented a very prevalent antipathy.

The earliest decided concession is found in the memorials of the dead, sarcophagi, and sepulchral slabs and monuments, on which were carved in relief the simple emblems of Christian faith and the scenes of biblical history, many of which were intentionally employed as symbols of Christian doctrine, especially that of the resurrection of the body.

Of single extant statues representing sacred personages Dr. Urici specifies but four important ones in the whole range of early Christian art down to the tenth century. These are the statue of Bishop Hippolytus, who suffered martyrdom in the first half of the third century, the total upper portion of which is a modern restorating; the famous bronze image of St. Peter, in the great Roman basilica named after him, a work probably executed in Constantinople in the fifth century; and two marble statues representing Christ as the Good Shepherd, whose date he places in the fifth or sixth century. A certain school of modern German criticism has sought to prove that the Good Shepherd, a large number of which doubtless existed in the primititive church, were original and deliberate endeav-ors to give a visible paraphrase of the Twenty-third Psalm, the parable of the lost sheep, and the tenth chapter of John's Gospel.

Of the sepulchral relics of early Christian art which have been conserved to the present time, the most important is the famous sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (prefect of Rome, d. A.D. 359), now in the crypt of St. Peter's Church in Rome.
It was probably executed in the fourth century, and contains five subjects from the Old and New Testaments. Other examples of kindred character are found in the Christian Museum of the Vatican, in the Campo Santo at Pisa, and in the crypt of the Cathedral of Ancona. Many ancient altar-tablets are found in the churches of Italy, especially at Ravenna (Cathedral, S. Apollinari in Classe, S. Vitale, S. Francesco, etc.).

A remarkable sarcophagus, though of much ruader workmanship than that of Junius Bassus, is in the Church of St. Ambrose in Milan; its principal relief representing Christ teaching, surrounded by his disciples.

In the representation of the scenes of biblical history by means of sepulchral relics, the Roman Crypts furnished the most numerous exa-amples. Most of these have been removed to the Lateran Museum. Both the Old and the New Testaments contributed the materials for these subterranean galleries of early Christian art; and many of the scenes, for example, those having for their subjects the histories of Noah and Jonah, are so puerile as artistic performances to border on the grotesque.

with this was regarded with jealousy, and any concession to its demands excited the bitterest intolerance.

We have only to consider, in the second place, the prostitution of contemporaneous Roman art to the purposes of human nature—cerchasing itself with the most loathsome details in the relics both of painting and sculpture in Herculanum and Pompeii— in order to find another powerful influence in the same direction. It is not surprising, that in the welfare of the soul for the subjugation of the body, with its lusts and appetites—the primal end of life according to the teachings of Christ—the early disciples could find little or nothing in contemporary Pagan art which they could contemplate with complacency; and it seems, in the circumstances, only strange, that, by a early period in the history of the Chris-

All, however, have a high and noble moral significance, and were doubtless intended to symof this age was simply an accessory of architecture. In Northern Europe the earnest spirit of the Romanesque period still prevailed, though the names of no great masters have come down to us through their works. The noblest remains in the Strasbourg Cathedral, representing the death and coronation of the Virgin, with the allegorical figures of the Christian Church, are worthy of especial mention as being ascribed to Giovanni Pisano, the reputed daughter of the architect of this magnificent Gothic temple. In Italy the spirit of Nicola Pisano, the great master of the Romanesque age, was conserved in his son Giovanni (circa 1240-1321) and his pupil Andrea Pisano (1273-1349).

The names of Giotto and Orcagna, among the sculptors of this period, must not be omitted, although painting was the art in which both excelled, and in connection with which their fame has been perpetuated. The high-altar at Arezzo, and the façade of the cathedral at Orvieto, may be cited as the chief works of Giovanni Pisano. On the southern door of the baptistery at Florence there is a series of panels representing the life of John the Baptist, which show Andrea Pisano to have been a worthy scholar of the great Nicola. The figure of Apollo, on the bell-tower of the Florence Cathedral, is a curiosity, from the fact of its having originated with Giotto, the father of painting in the Gothic age.

It is customary with historians to divide the golden age of art, which in general terms may be said to include the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, into the Early and the High Renaissance. For the purposes of the present article, however, we may include both of these—the quattrocento and the cinquecento—in the third great period of Christian sculpture. As applied both to literature and art, the term "renaissance" signifies the revival of the antique; and Italy was the grand theatre of its development. At the beginning of the fifteenth century but few of the sculptures of antiquity had been unearthed in Rome: but the good work, which was carried to full activity under Julius the Second and Leo the Tenth, and which has exercised such a mighty moulding influence on all subsequent art, even down to the present day, had already commenced; and it is manifest, even in the early masters of this wonderful age, a loyalty to nature and truth, as distinguished from tradition and conventionalism, which sets them utterly apart from the sculptors of the middle ages.

The great master of what may be called the Early Renaissance was Lorenzo Ghiberti of Florence (1378-1455), who between the years 1403 and 1427 was employed on the north bronze doors of the Florence Baptistery, whose reliefs plainly evidence some of the medieval spirit yet lingering in art. The eastern doors of the same edifice, which he completed in 1532, whose panels contain representations of biblical history, form one of the greatest masterpieces of sculpture which any age has produced. It has been, perhaps, justly criticised as intruding too much upon the province of painting in attempting perspective effects.

Other eminent masters in this period were Donatello of Florence (1386-1466), his disciple Andrea Verrocchio (1432-88), and Luca della Robbia (1400-82), whose terracotta reliefs, representing biblical scenes chiefly, are found in the museums and in several of the churches of Florence. Luca della Robbia wrought likewise in marble and bronze; and his famous marble frieze, representing singing and dancing children, originally executed for the organ-gallery of the Florence Cathedral, and now preserved in the Uffizi Collection, is pronounced by Burchhardt to be one of the finest works of sculpture produced in the fifteenth century.

Among the sculptors of Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century, the names of Sansovino (Baptism of Christ, in the Florence Baptistery), Lombardi, and Leonardo da Vinci, deserve mention, albeit no work of sculpture by the latter has been preserved.

It need scarcely be said that the one name which glorifies the history of Christian sculpture in the sixteenth century is Michel Angelo Buonarrotti, who was born on the 6th of March, 1475, in the vicinity of Arezzo, and died in Rome on the 17th of February, 1564. His earliest important sculptural work was the well-known Pietà, now in St. Peter's Church in Rome, which he executed at the age of twenty-five. Then followed the colossal statue of David, and lastly the statues which were designed for the magnificent mausoleum of Pope Julius the Second, a project of vast dimensions, but which was never fully carried out. This stupendous task occupied the reat master during a period of forty years, with occasional interruptions, but which was never fully carried out.

Besides the two figures of the Captives, now in the museum of the Louvre in Paris, the colossal Moses, in the Church of S. Pietro in Vincoli in Rome, is the one great feature of this famous sculptural work, and is, without doubt, the grandest creation of modern sculpture. The Medici monuments in Florence are among the noblest works of memorial sculpture in the world. His statue of Christ, in the Church of S. Maria sopra Minerva, executed about 1527, is perhaps the least successful of all the sculptural works of this Titan of art. The sculptures contemporary with Michel Angelo, of whom Giovanni da Bologna (1524—1089) and Benvenuto Cellini (1500—70) were the most eminent, occupied themselves more with mythological than with Christian themes. Christian sculpture in Germany during the sixteenth century bears an interesting rivalry and worthy comparison with that of Italy, chiefly through the name and works of Peter Vischer (d. 1529). The great work which has immortalized him is the noble group of bronze statues and reliefs on the monument of St. Sebalb in Nuremberg.

Adam Kraft, famous for his reliefs in Nuremberg, representing the sufferings of Christ, and Veit Stoss, the father of wood-carving in the Renaissance age, deserve mention as German masters of only secondary rank.

Various names have been employed to designate that widespread degradation of sculpture in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, from truth to mannerism and ostentation, of which Lorenzo Bernini (1598—1680) was the pioneer and the foremost representative. It is not necessary to specify these names in technical language. Let it suffice to observe, that the same thing which we often witness in the history of literature and oratory, when a numerous horde of feeble aspirants set themselves to the task of imitating a great writer or speaker with extravagant expletives, startling metaphors, and wild gesticulation, came to pass in the domain of art, particularly of sculpture, through the influence of Michel Angelo, when a whole generation of copyists, with large convent and small faculty, ordained themselves apostles of a new age of pomp and sensationalism.

Chieflly through this, among other causes, we look almost in vain, either in the seventeenth or the eighteenth century, for any really great work of Christian sculpture.

The nineteenth century has witnessed, both in Italy and Northern Europe, a revival of Christian sculpture with somewhat of the spirit of its golden age; and the names of Antonio Canova (1779—1822), Bertel Thorvaldsen (1770—1844), and Christian Rauch (1777—1857), representing both extremes of the European Continent, are the glory of modern sculpture, both secular and Christian. With this illustrious trio the name of Ernst Rietschel, the designer of the great Luther Monument at Worms, deserves to be associated, as well as that of his most gifted pupil, Professor Adolf Donndorf of Stuttgart, still living, who, after the death of his master, completed some of the most important figures of the Luther memorial; e.g., Savonarola, Peter Waldo, and the Mourning Magdeburg. Professor Donndorf has executed some of the finest sepulchral memorials in Germany, and has likewise won an enviable fame in America by the beautiful bronze drinking-fountain in Union Square, New York, which he finished about two years since, to the order of Mr. D. Willis James, who presented it to the city of his adoption.

SCUTETUS, Abraham, b. at Grüneberg, Silesia, Aug. 24, 1656; d. at Emden, Oct. 24, 1624. He studied at Görlitz, Wittenberg, and Heidelberg, and was appointed court-preacher in Heidelberg in 1598, and professor of theology in 1618. Entangled in the misfortunes of the Elector Friedrich V., he lost his position after the battle on the White Mountain, 1620, but was appointed preacher at Emden in 1622. He was one of the most distinguished theologians of his time in the Reformed Church. His principal works are, Medulla theologica patrum, 1605—13, 4 vols.; a history of the Reformation, of which, however, only the two first decades (1516—36) appeared, Heidelberg, 1618—20; and De curriculo vitae, etc., a kind of self-defence, published after his death, Emden, 1625.

MALLET.

SEABURY, Samuel, b. in Groton, Conn., Nov. 30, 1729; d. at New London, Feb. 25, 1786. He was a graduate of Yale College before he was nineteen years of age, and soon after began the study of medicine. In 1752, though he had already devoted himself to the clerical calling, he went to Edinburgh to complete his medical studies, and there became acquainted with a remnant of the ancient Church of Scotland, which, though interdicted by the law, continued to maintain its worship in garrets and out-of-the-way nooks and corners. He was ordained deacon by Bishop
Thomas of Lincoln, ministering on behalf of the aged Sherlock of London, to whose jurisdiction the colonial missions pertained; and two days afterwards the Bishop of Carlisle (Osbaldiston) advanced him to the priesthood (Dec. 23, 1753). He was appointed missionary to New Brunswick, N.J., and arrived there May 25, 1754. In 1757 he removed to Jamaica, L.I., influenced partly by a desire to be near his father, who was rector of St. George's, at Hempstead. But shortly after this, his father dying, he became rector of St. Peter's, Westchester. And now, the spirit of the Colonies being roused by the policy of the king's ministers and the provincial governors, the clergy of the Anglican Church were placed in a very trying situation. Seabury and most of his brethren were missionaries deriving their support from England. They had also, at their ordinations and inductions repeatedly taken the oath of allegiance to the sovereign, and the oath now could they obligations be slighted without perjury? There was room for honest difference of opinion, in view of the constitutional revolution of 1688 and the conditional character which was thereby imparted to that oath, in the judgment of many jurists and learned men. But Seabury's habits of thought inclined him to a different opinion; and the rebellions of 1715 and 1745 were yet fresh in the memory of all, as a practical warning. He ardently resisted, therefore, what he considered a rebellion against lawful authority; and he was not the man to adopt such views so fast as in him lay, those restorations of the (Eucharistic) Liturgy, which have accordingly become the characteristic feature of the American Prayer-Book as compared with that of the Church of England.

It has been necessary to give with some detail so much of Seabury's history as is essential to an explanation of his position and influence in the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church; but, referring our reader to the lately published memoir (by Dr. Beardsley, 1881) for a full account of his life and labors, it is sufficient to add a brief outline of his episcopate. After a voyage of three months he reached his diocese June 27, 1786, and on the 2d of August following, at Middletown, was received by his clergy with due solemnity. He held his first ordination on the following day. The subsequent consecration of three bishops in England, and the formation of a constitution for the church thus rendered independent and autonomous, occasioned much negotiation and correspondence, before the diocese of Connecticut became duly incorporated under this constitution, with the dioceses south of New England; and in all these agitating preliminaries the Jacobean prophet, Seabury, always manifested a deep respect for his character upon all his brethren, with the exception of a few whose political prejudices had survived the conflicts of the war. The Johnnian qualities of Bishop White were precisely such as were requisite as a complement to the Petrine spirit of Seabury, and to their sincere mutual regard and wise cooperation was largely due the good understanding that soon followed. The episcopate of Bishop Seabury was cordially recognized, and he united with his three brother-bishops of the Anglican line in consecrating the first bishop of Maryland (Dr. Cragget); and consequently no bishop has ever been consecrated in this church without deriving his commission in part through the Scottish line of ecclesiastical ancestry. The bishop's life and labors in Connecticut have left a deep mark on the religious history of the State, and not less deeply has his influence been felt in the entire communion in which he was engaged. He was an organizer and doctor. Two volumes of his sermons have been collected and published, and others have appeared in a fragmentary shape; but valuable manuscripts remain as yet unedited. They evince a vigorous mind, and intrepid devotion to the doctrinal standards of ancient catholicity.

The writer of this brief notice was active in promoting the final deposit of Bishop Seabury's remains, in 1849, under the new and substantial church in New London, where they now rest; and on that occasion he had the solemn office, in connection with Bishop Williams, now the successor of Seabury, of laying his venerable relics in the place of their ultimate repose. A physician who attended to identify these relics when disinterred remarked on the massive proportions of the skull; and the well-worn mitre preserved in Trinity College, Hartford, corresponds with these proportions so remarkably as to furnish in itself a striking evidence of the fidelity of the half-length portrait of the bishop, from the pencil of Duché, which adorns the library of that college, and from which many popular engravings have been derived.

Having vainly endeavored to bring the Church of England to his position, he left her, or at least worked outside her pale. Besides sundry sermons and pamphlets, he published in 1742 fifty hymns, which were reprinted by D. Sedgwick, 1800. The best of them is, "Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings." He was living as late as 1750.

The need for Christian exertion among sailors was urgent. Destitute, as a class, of any access to the Bible, to preaching, or to any service, instruction, or consolations of the church, their lives passed, for the most part, without access to the gospel of Christ. "It would be difficult," says a well-informed writer, "to conceive of a deeper moral night than that which for centuries had settled upon the British navy."

Early efforts made in England to furnish sailors with the gospel, however, met with serious opposition from Christian people, as well as from unchristian officers in the royal navy. So late as 1828 the king was petitioned to abrogate an order, then recently issued by the lord high admiral, prohibiting the free circulation of tracts in the navy. But in 1814 the pioneers of the movement for this end, Rev. George Charles Smith, a dissenting clergyman, once a sailor, and Zebulon Rogers, a shoemaker of the Methodist persuasion, established prayer-meetings for seamen, on the Thames, at London; the first being held on the brig "Friendship," June 22 of that year, by Mr. Rogers. These were multiplied and sustained upon the shipping in the river. March 23, 1817, the first bethel flag was unfurled on the "Zephyr," Capt. Hindulph of South Shields, Eng. The Protector of London Society was organized March 18, 1818, to provide for the continuous preaching of the gospel to seamen in London, upon a floating chapel (ship) of three hundred tons' burden, and Rev. Mr. Smith ministered upon it with success during the ensuing year. Nov. 12, 1819, The Bethel Union Society was formed at London, which, in addition of religious meetings on the Thames, established correspondence with local societies that had been started by Mr. Smith's exertions in various parts of the kingdom. These two societies were subsequently united to form what is now known as The British and Foreign Sailors' Society.

The Sailor's Magazine (London) merged, after publication for seven years by Rev. Mr. Smith, into the New Sailor's Magazine, also issued by him, was established in 1826. The monthly magazine now issued by The British and Foreign Sailors' Society is Chart and Compass (pp. 32), established in January, 1879. It has presented a series of religious facts, and discussed questions connected with the evangelization of seamen, with fervency and force. Up to April, 1883, Chart and Compass had circulated 128,000 copies.

In 1825 The London Mariner's Church and Rivermen's Bethel Union was organized to provide a church for seamen on shore. The first meeting was held under Mr. Smith's direction, and Augustus N. Smith became the coming pastor. This church was for years the centre of an extensive system of labor, including a sabbath school, bethel prayer-meetings, tract and book distribution, magazine publishing, and... open-air preaching to seamen on the wharves. Rev. Mr. Smith died at Penzance, Cornwall, Eng., in January, 1883.

Existing seamen's missionary societies in the empire of Great Britain, distinct from local organizations which limit the prosecution of work to their own ports, are, (1) The British and Foreign Seamen's Society (St. George's, Shadwell, London, E.), with receipts from April 1, 1851, to April 1, 1882, of £10,123 18s. 6d., and expenditures for the same period of £9,510 3s. 7d.), which in its sixty-fifth annual report (1882-83) names the ports of Rotterdam, Hamburg, Antwerp, Genoa, Naples, and Malta, outside England, and London, Milford-Haven, Falmouth, and Barnow-in-Furness (English), as occupied more or less effectively by persons having entire or partial support from its treasury, and devoting themselves to the spiritual and temporal welfare of seamen. (2) The London Missions to Seamen (Established English Church), whose operations are, for the most part, carried on afloat. Its chaplains are at twenty English and three foreign, its Scripture-reading at twenty-nine English and four foreign seaports. Local English societies for seamen are at Liverpool (formed in 1821), Glasgow, and other ports.

Evangelical Lutheran missions to seamen are prosecuted with vigor by societies with headquarters in the Scandinavian countries, whence come, in our day, the larger number of sailors for the world's mercantile marine. The Norwegian society—Forsamlingen til Evangeliet Forskylde for Skandinaviske Sjøfolk i fremmede Havne, or, in English, The Society for the Gospel's Preaching to Scandinavian Seamen in Foreign Harbors—was organized at Bergen, Norway, Aug. 31, 1864, and now (1883) has stations at Leith, Scotland; North Shields, London, Cardiff, Eng.; at Antwerp, Belgium; Havre, France; Amsterdam, Holland; New York, U.S.A.; Quebec, Can.; and at Pensacola, Fla., U.S.A.

Mission-work for seamen is also carried on by this society at Montrose, Scotland. Its aggregate working force consists of eleven ordained pastors, with five or six assistant missionaries, unordained. The society owns churches at all its stations, and publishes a monthly paper, Bud og Hilsen, now in its eighteenth year of issue. Receipts in 1881-82 were 103,555 kroner; expenditures, 58,297 kroner. The Danish society's mission work—Dansk Forbund til Evangelets Forskylde for Skandinaviske Sjøfolk i fremmede Havne, or, in English, The Danish Society for the Gospel's Preaching to Scandinavian Seamen in Foreign Ports—has its stations at Hull and Grimsby, London, Newcastle, and Hartlepool (Eng.), and at New York City, U.S.A., with an aggregate of four ordained pastors. Three other ordained pastors perform some labor for sailors at Frederickstadt and Christianstadt (St. Croix, W.I.), and at St. Thomas and St. Jan., W.I. The same society supports a seamen's pastor at Madras, India; and at Brisbane, Australia, an ordained pastor gives a portion of his time to the interests of Scandinavian sailors. Its bi-monthly paper is Havnen, published at Copenhagen, Denmark. Receipts in 1882, 22,034 kroner; expenditures, 10,421 kroner.

The Swedish society for home and foreign missions—Förerlundsstifelse—has sustained missionary work for seamen since 1869, and has the following stations where such labor is performed by its agents,—Constantinople, Turkey; Alexandria, Egypt; Liverpool, Grimsby, and Gloucester, Eng.; Boston, Mass., U.S.A.; Marseilles, France; St. Ubes, Portugal; and Rotterdam, Holland, as occupied more or less effectively by persons having entire or partial support from its treasury, and devoting themselves to the spiritual and temporal welfare of seamen. The State Church in Denmark has three ordained pastors laboring for seamen, at London and Hartlepool (Eng.), and at Kiel in Prussia. The Finnish seamen's mission society, Foreningen for Berefadande af Sjöfolk at Finska Sjöman i Ulundska Hamnar, organized in 1889, has a station at London, Eng., with one ordained pastor in charge, and is about to establish another at Grimsby and Hull, Eng. The Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Augustana Synod in America has a station for Scandinavian seamen, with one ordained pastor, at Philadelphia, Penn., U.S.A. The synod for the Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Church in America has a mission in Australia, with one ordained pastor. The total of stations occupied by the Scandinavian (Lutheran) societies is thirty-three, with twenty-nine ordained pastors and six unordained pastors as laborers.

No organizations exist in North or South America, outside the United States, for the sole purpose of prosecuting religious labor among seamen. At Boston, Mass., the first society for this object was formed in May, 1812, but soon suspended operations. The first religious meeting on behalf of sailors in New-York City (N.Y.) is believed to have been held in the summer of 1818, at the corner of Front Street and Old Slip. The Marine Bible Society of New-York City was organized March 14, 1817, to furnish sailors with the Holy Scriptures. The Society for promoting the Gospel among Seamen in the Port of New York, commonly known as The New-York Port Society, a local organization, was formed June 5, 1818. This society laid the foundations of the first mariner's church ever erected, in Roosevelt Street, near the East River, which was dedicated June 4, 1820, Rev. Ward Stafford preacher and pastor. In 1823 The New-York Port Society set up a work in that city the first missionary to seamen, Rev. Henry Chase. This society now sustains a church at Madison and Catharine Streets in New York, and a reading-room for sailors in the same edifice, employing in the year ending Dec. 31, 1882, nine missionaries. Receipts for 1882 were $11,067.04; expenditures, $10,692.07. The New-York Bethel Union, for the establishment and maintenance of religious meetings on vessels in the port (organized June 3, 1821), had but a brief existence.

The movements noted—that at Boston, Mass., issuing in the formation of the earliest society of its kind in the world — led to similar action for the performance of local work for seamen at Charleston, S.C. (1819), New Orleans, La. (1821), Portland, Me., and New Orleans, La. (1823), at New Bedford, Mass. (1825), and elsewhere. In the latter year there were in the United States seventy bethel unions, thirty-three marine Bible societies, fifteen churches and floating chapels for seamen. There has been, among sailors, and their evangelization was recognized as among the most prominent and important of Christian enterprises.
SEAMEN.

Accordingly, after its formal establishment in the city of New York (Jan. 11, 1826), succeeded by a new organization in its board of trustees (May 5, 1826, from which time its birth is dated). The American Seamen's Friend Society (80 Wall Street, New York, N.Y.), unquestionably the most widely operative and efficient of existing missionary societies for seamen, came into being. Its first President was Hon. Smith Thompson, then secretary of the United States navy; Rev. C. P. McIlvaine, afterwards Protestant-Episcopal bishop of Ohio, was its Corresponding Secretary; and Rev. Joshua Leavitt its General Agent. Article II. of its constitution provides:

"The object of this society shall be to improve the social and moral condition of seamen by uniting the efforts of the wise and good in their behalf, by promoting in every port boarding-houses of good character, savings-banks, register-offices, libraries, museums, reading-rooms, and schools, and also the ministration of the gospel, and other religious blessings."

Its first foreign chaplain was Rev. David Abeel, who reached his field of labor at Whampoa, the anchorage for ships trading at Canton, China, Feb. 16, 1830. In its forty-first year (1868), its laborers (chaplains and sailor missionaries) were stationed at twenty-four foreign, and thirteen domestic, seaports, as follows: at Caribou Island on the Labrador coast, N.A.; at St. John, N.B.; in Norway, at Christiansand, Kragero, and Fosgrund; in Denmark, at Copenhagen and Odense; in Sweden, at Göteborg, Varberg and Vedinge, Wernersberg, and Stockholm; in Belgium, at Antwerp; in France, at Havre and Marseilles; in the Hawaiian Islands, at Honolulu and Hilo; at the Chincina Islands in Peru, at Valparaiso and at Buenos Ayres, S.A.; and in the United States, at the following seaports: San Francisco, Cal., Norfolk and Richmond, Va., Charleston, S.C., Mobile, Ala., Boston and Gloucester, Mass., and at New York, N.Y. Its missionary work was prosecuted in 1882-83 on the Labrador coast of North America, in the countries of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, at Hamburg in Germany, at Antwerp and at Havre, in France, and at Genoa and Naples in Italy, at Yokohama in Japan, in the Sandwich and Madeira Islands, at Valparaiso, S.A., and, in the United States, at Portland, Ore., and on the waters of Puget Sound; also in the ports of Galveston, Tex., New Orleans, La., Pensacola, Fla., Savannah, Ga., Charleston, S.C., Wilmington, N.C., Norfolk, Va., and at Boston, Mass., as well as in the cities and vicinities of New York, Jersey City (N.J.), and Brooklyn (N.Y.), including the United-States Navy-Yard, numbering forty-two laborers at thirty-one seaports (eighteen foreign and thirteen domestic) supported in whole or in part by the society.

Its receipts in the first decade of its existence were, in round numbers, $61,000; in the second, $165,000; in the third, $229,000; in the fourth, $357,000; in the fifth, $635,000. Receipts for the year ending March 31, 1883, with small balance from previous year, $80,762.60; expenditures for same, $70,455.56 inclusive of an investment of a legacy for permanent fund.

The Church Missionary Society for Seamen in the City of New York (Protestant-Episcopal), in its Thirty-Ninth Annual Report (18-92-93), states that the society sustains, as heretofore, two chapels, three mission-houses, with reading and lecture rooms, overnight being in the hands of three clerks, with the assistance of a colportor at each station. Its total services for the year were 628: visits to reading-rooms, 5,622; seamen supplied with Bibles, 204, with Testaments, 613, with the Book of Common Prayer, 621. The bishop of the diocese is its president.

Besides the employment of chaplains, residents at seaports, and serving as Christian ministers, of Bible and tract distributors, Scripture-readers, colportors, and helpers, whose titles declare their functions, the missionary societies for seamen have usually wrought for their welfare by establishing, and in part sustaining (temporarily), Sailors' Homes in various ports. In them are resident missionaries, who, besides their services in religious meetings, devote portions of their time to spiritual and charitable visitation among sailors on shipboard and shore, at sailor boarding-houses, and in hospitals, and, in some cases, to such service for the families of seamen. The Wells Street Sailors' Home at London (Eng.) Docks was established by Mr. George Greene in 1830, opened in 1835, enlarged in 1865. In one year it admitted 5,444 boarders, who, besides a home, had evening instruction, the use of a savings-bank, etc. The Liverpool (Eng.) Sailors' Homes were opened in 1844. The Sailors' Home at 190 Cherry Street, New York, is the property and is under the direction of the American Seamen's Friend Society. It was opened in 1842, reconstructed, refurnished, and re-opened in 1880, and is now unsurpassed by any sailors' home in the world. During the year 1882-83 it accommodated 2,963 boarders. The whole number of boarders since the Home was established is 102,713, and the amount saved by it to seamen and their relatives during the forty-one years since its establishment has been more than $1,500,000. The systematic supply of carefully selected libraries, to be loaned to vessels for use at sea, by their officers and crews, is now largely carried on by these organizations, especially the American Seamen's Friend Society. Its shipments of such libraries from 1858-59 to March 31, 1888, were 7,704, and the re-shipments of the same, 8,100; the total shipments aggregating 15,864. The number of volumes was 419,420, accessible by original shipment to 301,425 seamen. Of the whole number sent out, 943 libraries with 33,945 volumes were placed upon United States naval vessels and in naval hospitals, and have been accessible to 107,995 men: 106 libraries were in 106 stations of the United States Life-saving Service, containing 3,816 volumes, accessible to 742 keepers and surfmen.

The Sailors' Magazine (32 pp., monthly), organ of the American Seamen's Friend Society, is now the oldest of the periodicals issued on behalf of seamen. It was established in September, 1828, is in its fifty-fifth volume; and of its issues for 1882-83, 81,000 copies were printed and distributed. The whole number of the twelve-month 13,000 copies of The Seamen's Friend (4 pp., annually), established in 1858, were issued by this society, for sailors; and 145,000 copies of the Life-Boat (4 pp., monthly) for the use of sabbath schools.
Varied help is habitually extended to shipwrecked and destitute sailors by all these organizations. The establishment of savings-banks for seamen has ordinarily been due to their influence. The Seamen's Savings-Bank in New-York City (78 Wall Street) went into operation May 11, 1829. Sailors' asylums, orphanages, and "Rest" (houses of entertainment compliance upon temperance principles) are open in many seaports as the fruit of their existence. Miss Agnes Weston, from her "Rest" at Devonport, Eng., was distributing, gratis, by voluntary contribution, in 1882, 15,900 monthly Blue Books (8 pp. temperance and religious tracts) in the English tongue; and these were regularly translated into Dutch and German for the navies of Holland and Germany.

It is impracticable to present detailed statistics as to results of Christian labor for seamen: the best general estimate fixes the number of Christianized sailors at near from thirty thousand. But to say that during the last half-century these men have been gathered into the church of Christ by thousands, that as a class sailors are now manifestly being lifted out of the ignorance and degradation in which they lived at the opening of the nineteenth century, and to attribute these changes, realized and still progressing, to the exertions of these societies, is to speak with truthful moderation. The corporate and individual efforts of persons connected with them have often originated and made effective beneficent public legislation, in the interest of sailors, in Great Britain and in the United States. It is in place to add, that, with few exceptions, all seamen's missionary societies are administered upon a non-denominational basis.

SEARS, Edmund Hamilton, D.D., b. at Sandisfield, Berkshire County, Mass., 1810; d. at Weston, Mass., Jan. 14, 1876; graduated at Union College, 1834, and at Cambridge Divinity School, 1837; was pastor at Wayland, Mass., 1838-40 and 1847-65, at Lancaster, Mass., 1840-47, and at Weston, 1865-76. Though connected with the Unitarian body, he held Swedenborgian opinions, and often professed his belief in the absolute divinity of our Lord. He edited "Monthly Religious Magazine," and with Rufus Ellis edited it, 1859-71. He published "Regeneration (1854), Pictures of the Olden Time (1857), Athanasia, or Foregleams of Immortality (1858), The Fourth Gospel theearl of Christ (1872), and Sermons and Songs of the Christian Life (1875). His writings are noted for their great spiritual power and beauty; and his two exquisite Christmas-hymns, "Calm on the listening ear of night," and "It came upon the midnight clear" (1834 and 1849 or 1850), are universally known. The ecclesiastical vows. Secularization of the first kind has sometimes occurred from time to time—in the last days of the reign of the Merovingian dynasty in France, under Henry II. in Germany, during the Reformation in various countries, etc.—though always under the protest of the Church. The first instance of a secularization of the second kind was probably the transference of the Duchy of Prussia from the possession of the Knights of the Teutonic Order to the dominion of a prince of the German Empire (1525). But on a still greater scale secularization of this kind was carried on during the Napoleonic wars, especially by the Peace of Campo Formio (1797) and that of Luneville (1801). The word was first used by the French delegates during the negotiations preceding the Peace of Westphalia (1648). Secularization of the third kind is a Papal prerogative.

SECDUS, a gnostic of the school of Valentinus; differed (by teaching, besides the thirty eons, a double tetrad, — one to the right, and one to the left; one of light, and one of darkness) so materially from his master, that he formed a school of his own, — the Secondians. But the notices of him which have come down to us through Ireneus (Hær., i. 11. 2), Hippolytus (Ref., vi. 38), Tertullian (Prescript., 40), Epiphanius (Hær., 82), and others, do not enable us to form any complete idea of his system.

SEDGWICK, Daniel, the father of English hymnology; b. in London, 1815; d. there March 10, 1879; was educated at a private school, and received his early education at the New School for Boys in Sun Street, Bishopsgate. He was the son of Daniel Sedgwick, bookseller, and was intended for the church. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1837; was ordained priest, 1843; rector of Houghton-le-Skarpe, 1844; and held high positions in the service, including that of chaplain to the queen, 1855; editor of the Book of Common Prayer, 1861; and finally to the cathedral chapter, 1879. He was the author of many works on the Church and the Scriptures, and was a member of the Royal Society of Literature. He was a strong opponent of the Established Church, and was a leader in the movement for the separation of church and state. He was a conservative in politics, and was a member of the Conservative Party. He was a married man, and had children. He was a man of great learning, and was a master of English literature and the classics. He was a man of great energy and ability, and was a man of great influence.

SEDULIUS, Caius Carilius, or Cassioli, a Christian poet and priest of the fifth century; lived during the reign of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. Of his life nothing is known with certainty; but his Carmen paschale, written in hexameters, was printed in 1473, and again in 1499 and 1502. There are also later editions by Gallandi, 1773, and Arevalo, 1794.

SEEING GOD. It belongs to the deepest endeavors of all religions to make sure of the nearness of the Deity: hence those places are especially sacred where he is said to have revealed himself, and the persons are holy who are found worthy of that nearness, or have that higher faculty to bring others in a near relationship to the Deity. The highest degree of that desire is to see the Deity in essential reality. In the Bible also we find such a desire expressed, which is one of the most deeply rooted instincts of the religious man. This instinct is satisfied (even the sensual part of man may partake of it), but the mode of seeing changes itself in the same degree as the manner in which God appears. In this respect we find, especially in the Old Testament, the prevalence of popular views. Thus the main idea is this, that the common man (i.e., one whom no special holiness protects) must die when he sees God, the seer (i.e., the man who speaks with Jehovah as a man speaketh unto his friend (Exod. xxxiii. 12—xxxiv. 7). For God must have some kind of similitude, otherwise he could not be seen with the eye,—a similitude different from the manner in which he appears in the storm and fire. This representation is popular (1 Kings xxii. 19 sq.); but it excludes every corporeity, and in its unreflected form it is rather the concrete expression, in part of the reality, in part of the personality, of God, and forms the necessary basis for the possibility of that seeing. But already in the history of Moses we meet with a peculiar narrative (Exod. xxxiii. 12—xxxiv. 7) which opposes that view which has thus far been advanced. In the first instance we are told that no man shall live who sees God (Exod. xxxiii. 20): in the second instance we are told that God's face cannot be seen at all (Exod. xxxiii. 20, 23). Instead of this, Moses hears an explanation concerning his goodness and his name, his volition full of mercy and grace. With this, the visible seeing of God is made impossible. And thus we find it in the psalms and prophets; and the seeing of God is nothing else than the experience of his helpful presence, which takes the habitation of Jehovah, the temple, for its starting-point (Ps. xlii. 3). Hence, also, the hope of Job (xix. 26), "I shall see God," i.e., I will experience his presence. This fact shows itself at first in the fiery appearances in heaven. Lot's wife dies, because she curiously sees the fiery judgment of Jehovah (Gen. xix. 28). Gideon and Manoah expect death, because they have seen the angel of the Lord in the fire (Judg. vi. 23, xiii. 22). For the same reason the people removed from Mount Sinai when they saw God in the cloud, smoke, and lightning (Exod. xx. 18, 19; Deut. xviii. 16). The explanation of that incapacity which makes it impossible for man to behold God where he appears in his glory, lies in the fact of man's frail strength: he is flesh (Deut. v. 26). But the deeper knowledge of the divine will overcome this hindrance. God will give blessing and grace. His appearances become by degrees the sign of this heavenly grace. The transition is made in the examples of Gideon, Manoah, and Hagar; since that God who promises blessing and salvation cannot let the guiltless die. Yea, it is one of the strongest proofs of the grace of God in the theocratic covenant, that Jehovah himself leads his people in the pillar of fire and smoke: it is a clear proof of Israel's religious superiority above other nations, that it saw God in his peculiar glory, without dying (Deut. iv. 33, v. 24), or, as it is so emphatically expressed by Moses, "The Lord talked with you face to face" (Deut. v. 4). But the behavior of the people caused a limitation in the seeing of God. The stranger, or unclean, who approached the holy place, must die, as well as the Israelite who entered the sanctuary. Only God's elected, like those seventy elders who saw God (Exod. xix. 9, 10), may see God. But the circle becomes smaller still: only the patriarch Israel has seen God face to face (Gen. xxv. 90); only Moses, the mediator and man of God, speaks with Jehovah as a man speaketh unto his friend (Exod. xxxiii. 11). And, because none else has experienced such fullness of grace, Moses is also the highest prophet. Whereas others see God in visions and dreams, he sees God from face to face, and sees the similitude of the Lord (Num. xii. 8). For God must have some kind of similitude, otherwise he could not be seen with the eye,—a similitude different from the manner in which he appears in the storm and fire. This representation is popular (1 Kings xxii. 19 sq.); but it excludes every corporeity, and in its unreflected form it is rather the concrete expression, in part of the reality, in part of the personality, of God, and forms the necessary basis for the possibility of that seeing. But already in the history of Moses we meet with a peculiar narrative (Exod. xxxiii. 12—xxxiv. 7) which opposes that view which has thus far been advanced. In the first instance we are told that no man shall live who sees God (Exod. xxxiii. 20): in the second instance we are told that God's face cannot be seen at all (Exod. xxxiii. 20, 23). Instead of this, Moses hears an explanation concerning his goodness and his name, his volition full of mercy and grace. With this, the visible seeing of God is made impossible. And thus we find it in the psalms and prophets; and the seeing of God is nothing else than the experience of his helpful presence, which takes the habitation of Jehovah, the temple, for its starting-point (Ps. xlii. 3). Hence, also, the hope of Job (xix. 26), "I shall see God," i.e., I will experience his presence. This fact shows itself at first in the other life, but in this life: thus, also, Hezekiah (Isa. xxxviii. 11). The highest fulfilment of all religious wishes involves Ps. xi. 7: "His countenance doth behold the upright." Especially interesting and much disputed is the passage Ps. xvii. 15: "I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." Here, as in Num. xii. 8, the similitude of God appears as the object of the seeing of God, but only in so far as the state and wearing out of the image makes it necessary, because it concerns here the real communion with the highest source of blessing. The awakening has no reference to the sleep of death, but is the symbol of the grace of God, which is new every morning. Among the prophets the seeing of God is already so much divested of its externality, that in a free manner it is used to express prophetic vision. In Ps. xvin. the theophany is the meditation for the sinner's salvation; but in Isa. vi., Ezek. i. 26, Dan. vii. 9, it connects itself with the illumination of the prophet and his call. The image of the sovereign occupies the foreground; but in Isaiah and Ezekiel it is surrounded by the similitude of the theophany in cloud, smoke, fire, etc. In Isaiah also we perceive the old fear of death because of the presence of Jehovah: he acknowledges he is "a man of unclean lips, and dwelling in the midst of a people of unclean lips." Human unworthiness is here reduced, not to the fact that man is flesh, but to the idea of uncleanness, which, however, by that addition, receives another signification. The lips mediate the word which comes out of the heart: hence it refers to the sins of the heart and to sins committed by word; they make the presence of Jehovah sitting on his throne, so long intolerable to men, until holy fire has purged him.

By combining this idea with Ps. xi. 7 we approach the word of Christ, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (Matt. v. 8): with this the hope of the fulfillment of the highest religious desire, the deepest knowledge of God with the richest enjoyment of grace and blessedness, is given to them, only these goods receive a fuller and more particular meaning in the kingdom of Christ. With this corresponds what John regarded as the highest Christian goal: "For we shall see him as he is" (1 John iii. 2), for only perceives like (1 Cor. ii. 11). Therefore, also, 1 John iv. 12, 20 makes the real seeing of God impossible: it is a seeing mediated through love; the seeing refers to the Son whom God hath sent. In him we see the Father (John xiv. 9), because in him grace and glory have been personified (John i. 18). Yes, the Son himself is on the Father's throne, so long intolerable to men, until the holy fire has purged him.

Moreover, he says that the Son shall see him as he is, because he is "a man of unclean lips, and dwelling in the midst of a people of unclean lips."

In the midst of a people of unclean lips, he is surrounded by the similitude of the theophany in cloud, smoke, fire, etc. In Isaiah also we perceive the old fear of death because of the presence of Jehovah: he acknowledges he is "a man of unclean lips, and dwelling in the midst of a people of unclean lips." SEEKERS, a small Puritan sect of the seventeenth century, who professed to be seeking the true church, ministry, and sacraments, but who at the same time comprised, according to Baxter (Babur, Life and Times, pp. 362 sqq.) and True Church and True Ministers, 1664, Roman Catholics and infidels, as well as Puritans.

SEGNERI, Paolo, Italian Jesuit; b. at Nettuno in the Campagna di Roma, March 21, 1624: d. at Rome, Dec. 6, 1694. He entered the Society of Jesus in his thirteenth (1638), was ordained priest in his twenty-ninth year; and from then until 1665 he taught in a Jesuit school at Pestoa. From 1665 to 1692 he spent half the year in retirement, and the rest in travelling as a missionary throughout Northern Italy. He became the foremost preacher among the Jesuits in Italy: and in power over the multitudes who thronged about him, and who fairly worshipped him, he was like Savonarola. In the spiritual direction of the Jesuits, and as a restorer of Italian eloquence, his sermons were modelled upon Chrysostom's, but without servility. They are, however, frequently marred by trivial remarks and stories. When the Jesuits at Rome conceived that Quietism (see art. Molinos) was slowly undermining Romanism, and particularly Jesuitism, they sent him "a bundle of Quietistic books with directions to prepare an antidote to them." So in 1680 he published at Florence a small volume with the title, Concordia tra la fatica e la Quiete ("harmony between effort and Quiet") in which, without naming Molinos, or deprecating the contemplative life, he endeavored to show that the successful prosecution of Quietism was possible only to a few. "He insists that the state of contemplation can never be a fixed or permanent state, and objects therefore to closing the middle way;" i.e., now meditation, now contemplation. His book raised, however, a storm of opposition from the then powerful Quietists, and was put into the Index. He prudently remained away from Rome. In 1692 Pope Innocent XII. called him to Rome as his preacher-in-ordinary, and theologian of the penitentiary.

John Selden (1584-1654), an erudite writer on law and Hebrew antiquities; was b. at Salisbury, Dec. 16, 1584; d. at White Friars, Nov. 30, 1654. At the age of fourteen he entered Hart College Oxford, where he took his degree in 1602 and entered Clifford's Inn, and in 1604 the Inner Temple for the study of law. He attained singular learning in this department, and published several scholarly works upon legal subjects, as England's Epitome and Epinomins and Jani Anlorum iqies allera (both with additions by Le Dieu and Heinsius). 1627, and De Dis Syria, which established his reputation on the Continent, and was republished at Leyden (with additions by Le Dieu and Heinsius). 1627.
and Leipzig, 1662, 1680. In 1615 appeared the History of Titus, which denied the divine right of the system, and called forth the wrath of the king, so that the author was obliged to revoke his positions. Selden sustained an intimate relation with the political movements for thirty years. In 1621 he was called by the House of Commons to give his opinion concerning the dispute between it and the Crown, and strongly advised the Commons to insist on his opinion, to the consequent displeasure of the Commons. In this advice he was imprisoned by the king. In 1624 he represented Lancaster in Parliament; 1625, Great Bedwin; and, after that, Lancaster in several Parliaments. He was active in the popular cause, signed the remonstrance for the removal of the Duke of Buckingham, and was a prominent supporter of the Petition of Right. In 1629 he was committed to the Tower, from which he was released in 1631 on bail, and in 1634 without surety. He succeeded in allaying the king's suspicions. In 1640 he represented the university of Oxford in the Long Parliament. In 1643 he was called by the House of Commons to give his advice concerning the dispute between it and the Earl of Stafford. In 1640 he represented the university of Oxford in the Long Parliament. In 1643 he was chosen one of the members of the Westminster Assembly, and the following year subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant, and was made master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. His funeral sermon was at his request preached by his old friend, Archbishop Ussher.

Selden was a man of immense learning and a prolific author. A tablet at Oxford calls him the coryphaeus in antiquarian studies (antiquariorum coryphaeus). Two of his greatest works were written during the years of his imprisonment (1629-34).—De jure naturali et Gentium justa disciplinam Hebraeorum, in seven books, and De successione in Pontificatum Hebraeorum. His last work was De synedriis et prefecturis juridicis veterum Hebraeorum, in three books. Among Selden's other works were Dux, or Six Discourses (1610), Titles of Honor (1614), an elaborate account of the political movements for thirty years. He was a prolific writer; but only a few of his works have any interest now,—his Commentary on the Psalms (Nuremberg, 1594, 2 vols.), and his Christliche Psalmen (Leipzig, 1587). See MÜZELL: Geistliche Lieder aus dem 16. Jahrhundert, Berlin, 1853, 3 vols.

conception from creation, and affirming that the Son resembled the Father in his essence (ἀρπαγμόν, αὐτότικον). In essential particulars this was the view which Eusebius of Cesarea had represented at Nicea. The Logos is God of god, and Light of light, but at the same time only the brightness of the first light, the image of the first substance, and different from it. The Son was not absolutely as well as relatively, for his existence presupposes the existence of the Father. In fact, the conception of Eusebius was a re-announcement of the subordination view of Origen. After the Council of Nicea this mediate view prevailed in the East, which refused to accept either Arianism or the Nicolean definition. Attempts were made by this party to formulate the doctrine of the sonship of Christ in such a way as to unite all the parties. The statement of the synods of Antioch (340), Philippopolis, and the first synod of Sirmium (351), condemn, on the one hand, the Nicolean definition as leading to Sabellianism, and, on the other, the Arian doctrine of the creation of the Son as unscriptural. According to the synod of Antioch, God the Father alone has absolute being, and the Son, though begotten before all time, was begotten by the free will of the Father, and not by virtue of necessity, and is subordinate to him. At the second synod of Sirmium, Ursacius and Valens sought — by the suppression of the words in dispute (σύνεσις, ἀρπαγμόν, αὐτότικον), the definition that the Son is like the Father, and the statement that the manner of his conception is inexplicable — to put a stop to the controversy. Eudoxius at a synod in Antioch explained this decree in an Arian sense, but all the more positively did the Semi-Arian synod of Ancyra (358) oppose Eudoxius. Constantius wished to settle the dispute by summoning a general council. Dissuaded from this plan, the two synods of Ariminum in Italy, and Seleucia in Isauria, were held, in which the Orientals and Occidentals were kept apart. It was hoped both synods would agree to the so-called third Sirmian formula, which had been agreed to in 358 by Ursacius and Valens on the one hand, and Basil of Ancyra, and Georgius of Laodicea on the other, at the court at Sirmium. Both councils were ready to declare in favor of the Nicolean formula, the Seleucian synod, however, excepting the word ἄρπαγμον (of the same substance). But they finally gave way to the court party, and accepted the Sirmian formula. The court influence understood how to render the Semi-Arians harmless, and Eudoxius was raised to the see of Constantinople. The Semi-Arians gradually approached the advocates of the Nicolean doctrine; and Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Gregory of Nyssa, contributed very much towards the currency of the Nicolean views. At the Second Council of Constantinople (381), the Nicolean theology was adopted, and Semi-Arians as well as Arian views were condemned. See ARIANISM, MACEDONIUS, etc. W. MÖLLER.

SEMINARIES, Theological, Continental, are divided into four classes: (1) The Roman-Catholic, according to the plan of the Council of Trent, in which boys of twelve years are received, trained in theological and secular studies apart from all worship of the church, and permitted to ordain priests; (2) The evangelical seminaries in the kingdom of Württemberg, which receive boys of fourteen years, train them until they are eighteen, then send them to the university of Tubingen for further theological study, whence they issue as assistant pastors; (3) Institutions which receive the candidates for the ministry after they have finished their theological studies at the universities, and train them in practical ministerial duties; (4) Institutions which give training in homiletics and catechetics, and partly laity. Their number is great, since every priest has the right to send his sons thither; and, as there are not enough churches for the priests thus educated, many of the scholars go into other callings.

SEMI–PELAGIANISM, a term invented by the schoolmen, denotes a view which was developed within the time of the Fathers, and which tries to follow a middle course between Augustine and Pelagius. In the West the powerful personality of Augustine, the vigorous proceedings of the African Church, the assent of the see of Rome, and the effective aid of imperial rescript, procured the victory for the views of Augustine; but in the East the Greek Church continued its course, unconcerned by what took place in the West, even after the condemnation of the Nestorians, and implicitly also of the Pelagians, by the synod of Ephesus. Soon, however, it became apparent, that, even in the West, there were many people who took offence at the rigorism of Augustine, and still more who believed that they were following him, though they had really no idea of the consequences which his doctrine involved.

The discrepancy became patent before Augustine died. His two pupils and friends, Prosper of Aquitaine, and Hilary, informed him by letters (Aug. Ep. 225 and 226) that the monks of Massilia accused him of having, in his controversy with Pelagius, set forth positions which contradicted the doctrines of the Fathers and the church in general. In the letters the Massilian baptism an one can be saved, if he only will; Massilia accused him of having, in his controversy with Pelagius, set forth to sitions which of Aquitaine, and fills, informed him better (Aug. Ep. 225 and 226) that the monks of glowing with monkish fervor, s or marks of in nature, or lead into fatalism, etc. It is evident that those monks simply wanted to find a middle way between the Augustinian doctrine of predestination and the Pelagian doctrine of the free will of man. At their head stood John Cassianus, a pupil of Chrysostom, and for some time an inmate of an Egyptian desert monastery, whose writings, glowing with monkish fervor, show marks of influence from the Greek theology. The report of Hilary and Hilary's letter, which opened forth the two treatises of Augustine, De praedestinatu sanctorum and De dono perseverantia; but they did not succeed in convincing the Massilian monks. Shortly after (430), Augustine died, and Prosper found himself the chief opponent of the Semi-Pelagian movement. He repaired to Rome, and induced Pope Celestine to address a letter to Caesarius of Arles (Mansi: Coll. Conc., iv. p. 454). The letter is unconditional in its defence of Augustine, and full of reproaches against those bishops of Gaul who introduced novelties, and put forward indiscriminate and useless questions. But it is strikingly silent about the real point at issue. Nor did Sixtus, the successor of Celestine, find it suitable to be more explicit on the matter. Meanwhile Prosper wrote his various books against the Semi-Pelagians (see the respective articles), and others came to his aid. The De ractione gentium, generally, though hardly on sufficient grounds, ascribed to Leo the Great, and found among his works, is an attempt at reconciliation. The expressions are very much mitigated; but, as nothing of the principle has been given up, it exercised no influence.

On the contrary, the Augustinian doctrine of predestination now began to be attacked, even with great harshness, by people who did not belong to the Semi-Pelagians. Those Scythian monks, who, during the reign of Justin I. and Justinian, preached theopaschitism in Constantinople, were naturally opponents of Pelagius. Having tried, in vain to introduce themselves to Pope Hormidas, they sent a confession of faith to the African bishops who lived in exile in Sardinia. It is found in Bibl. Max. Patr., Lyons, ix., and ends up with a condemnation, not only of Pelagius, but also of Faustus. Fulgentius of Ruspe, the most prominent of the African bishops, responded with his De incarnatione et gratia, in which he completely rejected Semi-Pelagianism, though without mentioning the name of Faustus. The case attracted the attention of the emperor Justinian, and he asked Hormidas to pronounce his opinion on it. The answer of the Pope (520) is very diplomatic (Mansi: Coll. Conc., viii.). It defends Augustine, it defends Faustus, it defends every thing; but it is addressed to a Cortice, as is admitted by Johannes Maxentius, the leader of the monks, in his Responsio ad epistolam Hormide (Bibl. Max. Patr., Lyons, ix.), who demonstrated, that, if Augustine is right, Faustus must be wrong. The tide was now turning. Even in Gaul, Semi-Pelagianism found influential adversaries; an Avitus of Vienne, a Caesarius of Arles, and the synod of Orange (Arausio), actually condemned it (Mansi: Coll., viii.). The decrees of the synod of Orange were afterwards confirmed, by Pope Boniface II. and the synod of Valence, and officially Semi-Pelagianism was denounced. This must not be understood, however, as if it had been really extinguished. By the decrees of the synod of Orange, the expressions of Augustine were accepted; but how far people were from really embracing his principles is shown by the controversies of Gottschalk, of the schoolmen and the monastics, of the reformers, of the Jesuits and the Jansenists, etc.

SEMITIC LANGUAGES. I. NAME. — Up to the latter part of the last century, before Sanskrit was known to Europe, or attention had been directed to the Central and Eastern Asiatic tongues, or those of Africa (except Coptic), the title "Oriental languages" signified only Hebrew and its sister dialects: these alone, with the exception of Coptic, had been the object of the table of nations in Gen. x. The credit, if such it be, of having originated the name "Semitic" (from Noah's son Sem, or Shem), for the Hebrew group, is to be given either to Schlozer or to Eichhorn, to which of the two is doubtful. The first known use of the term is in Schlozer's article on the Chaldeans, in Eichhorn's Repertorium, 8, 161 (1781), and he seems to claim the honor of its invention; but a similar claim is made by Eichhorn himself, without mention of Schlozer, in his Allgemeine Bibliothek, 6, 772 (1794). Eichhorn, however, appears to have been accepted as the author of the name: he is so said to be by Adelung (Mithridates, I. 300; 1806), from whose manner of speaking of it we may infer that it had not then come into general use. In a short while, however, it was everywhere adopted, and is now the recognized name of this group of languages. In Germany and France, and to some extent at least in England (so Coleridge, Table-Talk, 1827), the form "Semitic" was employed (after Septuagint and Latin Vulgate, and Luther's "Sem," instead of Hebrew "Shem"), while some English and American writers prefer the form "Shemitic," after the more accurate transliteration of the Hebrew. Between the two there is little to choose. The shorter form, now the more common one, is preferable to the other, because it is shorter, and in so far as it is farther removed from genealogical misconception. The once popular but unscientific threefold division of all the languages of the world into Japhetic, Semitic, and Hamitic, is now abandoned by scholars. "Semitic" is misleading, in so far as it appears to restrict itself to the languages spoken by the peoples mentioned in the table of nations in Gen. x, to the descendants of Siem; while it in fact includes dialects, as the Phoenician and Philistine, which are assigned in the table to Ham. The form "Semitic" (in English, but not in German and French), as farther removed than "Shemitic" from the Hebrew, is more commonly treated as in itself meaningless, and made to accept such meaning as science may give it. On the other hand, as meaningless, it is felt by some to be objectionable; and other names, expressing a geographical, or ethnical, or linguistic differentiation of the languages in question, have been sought, e.g., Western Asiatic, Arabian, Syro-Arabian: but none proposed have been definite and euphonic enough to gain general approbation, and it is likely that "Semitic" will retain its place for the present. If a new name is to be adopted, some such term as "Triliteral" would be the most appropriate; since triliterality of stems is the most striking characteristic of this family of languages, and is found in no other family.

II. TERRITORY. — In ancient times (c. B.C. 1000) the Semites occupied as their proper territory the south-western corner of the earth; their boundaries, generally stated, being, — on the east, the mountain range (modern Kurdistan) running about forty niles east of the Tigris River, and the Persian Gulf; on the south, the Indian Ocean; on the west, the Red Sea, Egypt, the Mediterranean Sea, and Cilicia; and, on the north, the Taurus or the Musius Mountains. The north and east lines are uncertain, from the absence of full data in the early Assyrian records. Not long before the beginning of our era, Semitic emigrants from Southern Arabia crossed the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, and occupied the part of Africa lying just south of the Egyptian deserts. Our knowledge about that of the modern Absenia: these were the Geez ("emigrants," "freemen"), or Semitic Ethiopians. The main Semitic region thus lay between the tenth and thirty-eighth degrees of north latitude and the forty-fourth and sixtieth degrees of east longitude, with an area of over a million square miles. Semitic colonies established themselves early in Egypt (Phoenicians in the Delta, and perhaps the Hyksos), and on the north coast of Africa (Carthage and other cities) and the south coast of France (Marseilles) and Spain, but probably not in Asia Minor or in Greece. In modern times, Syrian Semites are found in Kurdistan, as far east as the western shore of Lake Urmia (lat. 37° 30' N.; long. 46° 30' E.); but it is doubtful whether this region was Semitic before the beginning of our era. A large part of the Semitic territory was desert. Only those portions which skirt the larger rivers and the shores of seas were occupied by settled populations; the desert was traversed by tribes of nomads, whose life was largely predatory. Semitic speech is interesting, not from the size of the territory and population it represents, but from the controlling influence it has exerted on human history through its religious ideas.

The original seat of the Semites is unknown. There must have been a primitive Semitic race and a primitive Semitic language, which existed before the historical Semitic peoples and dialects had taken shape; but of this primitive race we can say no more than that it goes back to a remote antiquity; since one of its daughters, the Babylonian people, there are traces in the fourth millennium B.C. It has been attempted to determine the habitat of the Semites, before they broke up into separate nations, from their traditions, and from the vocabulary of the primitive tongue made out of the confusion of the existing dialects; but no trustworthy result has been reached. The oldest accounts say nothing definite. In Gen. xi, 2, for example, we have the statement that the whole body of the descendants of Noah journeyed "eastward" (so מָזרָה is to be rendered), that is, toward the Tigris-Euphrates region; but we are not told from what point they come, nor is there here any thing of a separate Semitic people. Again: in the same chapter, the assembled human race is said to have been scattered from the city Babel, without, however, any indication of the points to which the descendants of Noah’s three sons severally went. At most, we may see here a dim feeling that the Semites had once lived together in the Tigris-Euphrates valley; but this might be referred to the fact that the Hebrews knew that they themselves had come from that region to Canaan. No other Semitic people has, so far as we know, any ancient tradition on this point. The evidence from the primitive Semitic vocabulary is equally vague. Its terms for land, mountains, rivers, seas, metals, grains, fruits, and animals, do not allow us to fix on any particular spot in Western Asia as the locality where such terms must have originated. We are obliged, therefore, to reject the hypotheses which made the mountains of Armenia, or the lower Tigris-Euphrates valley, or the Arabian Desert, the cradle of the Semitic race, and to leave the question at present unsolved.

The Semitic territory was enclosed by that of great rival peoples, Indo-Europeans (Persians and Greeks) on the east, and the west, and Egypt on the south. In ancient times, however, the language was very little affected by foreign influence, except at one point. According to the view now held by most Assyriologists, the Babylonian-Assyrians, conquering the non-Semitic Accadian-Sumerians, who preceded them as occupants of the Tigris-Euphrates valley, in adopting the civilization of the conquered, adopted a number of their words, some of which are found in Hebrew also, and in others of the dialects. Hebrew made a few loans in early times from the Egyptian, and at a later period, possibly from the Indian, and then from the Persian, Greek, and Latin; and the ecclesiastical Aramaic was naturally greatly affected by Greek and Latin. The loan-words are easily recognized, except those which come from the Accadian-Sumerian.

All the Semitic nationalities, except the Arabian and the Geez (Ethiopia), died out before the second century of our era. The Babylonian-Assyrian, from history in the sixth century B.C., and their language survived only a few centuries. The Phoenicians lingered in Asia till the time of the Antonines, and their language in Africa (Carthage) till toward the fifth century of our era (mentioned by Augustine and Jerome). The Syrian Aramaeans lost their independence in the eighth century B.C., but continued to exist, and their dialect revived in the second century A.D. as a Christian language; and the Jewish Aramaic continued for some centuries (up to the eleventh century A.D.) to be the spoken and literary tongue of the Palestinian and Babylonian Jews. The Jewish people, broken up by the Romans in the first century A.D., and scattered over the world, have carried Hebrew with them as a learned, artificial tongue. The Arameans did not appear as a nation till the sixth century. Geez proper died out about the sixth century A.D. on remaining, however, as the ecclesiastical and learned language; and the nationality is still in existence.

III. DIVISIONS.—The various Semitic dialects closely resemble one another, there being, for example, between no two of them such dissimilarity as exists between Greek and Latin; but the family is divided into two well-defined groups and several sub-groups, the difference between which, in vocabulary and forms, is considerably greater than that between any two members of the same group or sub-group. The relations of the dialects may be seen from the following table, which is designed to include all Semitic forms of speech that can lay claim to linguistic individuality, except a few modern jargons mentioned below.

I. NORTH SEMITIC.
1. Eastern.
   a. Babylonian.
   b. Assyrian.
2. Northern.
   a. East Aramaic.
   b. Syrian (Dialect of Edessa).
   c. Mandaean.
   d. Nabataean.
   e. West Aramaic.
   f. Amharic.
   g. Jewish Aramaic (Daniel, Ezra, Targums, Talmud).
   h. Palmyrene.
   i. Egyptian Aramaic.

II. SOUTH SEMITIC.
1. Northern.
   a. Phoenician.
   b. Old Phoenician.
   c. Later Phoenician (Punic).
   d. Hebrew.
   e. Mos医护 and other Canaanitish dialects.

Of these the following are now spoken: (1) Aramaic, by the Nestorian and Jacobite Christians in Upper Mesopotamia, near Mosul, thence eastward to the western shore of Lake Urmia (northeastward in the Kurdish Mountains (Noldeke. : Neusyr. Gram. Einleitung); and by the remnant of the Mandaeans in Lower Mesopotamia (Noldeke, Mand. Gram. Einleitung). (2) Arabic is the only Semitic dialect that has now any real life. It is spoken in various sub-dialects, — by the Bedawin of the Arabian Desert; in Egypt, and, as ecclesiastical language, in Turkey; in the Magreb (north coast of Africa); in Syria (ancient Babylonia), where the vernacular is a strange mixture, with Arabic as its basis, but many Italian and other words; on the coast of Malabar (the Mapulji jargon). The Mosarabic, a Spanish-Arabic jargon formerly spoken in the south of Spain, became extinct in the last century. (3) Geez: the four dialects, Tigre, Tigrida, Amharic, Harari, are still spoken in Abyssinia. (4) Hebrew is studied by the Jews as a sacred language, and by a few of them, chiefly the older orthodox bodies in Germany and Austria, is to some extent written and spoken. This spoken language contains a large admixture of modern European terms. The literary Hebrew of to-day, among the same position among the Jews as Latin among us.

Of languages which have been strongly affected by Semitic tongues may be mentioned the Iranian Huzvara, or Pahlavi (the language of the Bundeheesh), which is greatly Aramaized; the Iranian Persian, whose vocabulary is largely Arabic, and even its syntax appears to have been somewhat Semitized; the Indian Hindustani, which, developed under Moslem influence, also contains a large number of Arabic words; and the Turkish. especially the literary and learned language of Canaanite, which in like manner, for the same reason, has a large infusion of Arabic.

IV. Characteristics. — These may be divided into formal (grammar), material (vocabulary), and stylistic (rhetoric and thought). (1) Grammar. The Semitic phonetic system has a marked individuality. It is probable that the original Semitic speech had fewer uvulars and spirants, with that of the classical Arabic, containing six gutturals (Alef, Ha, Ha, Ha, Ayin, Gayin), five uvulars (Kaf, Ta, Sa, Sad, Dad), two palatales (Kaf, Gam), two linguo-dentals (Ta, Dal), two labials (Pa, Ba), six liquids (Ra, Ya, Lam, Waw, and the nasals Mim, Nun), three sibilants (Sin, Sin, Zayin), and perhaps six spirants (Kaf, Gam, Ta, Dal, Pa, Ba). No existing dialect has all these letters, but there are traces of most of them in all. Thus, comparison of Assyrian and Arabic makes it probable that the former contained all these h-sounds (ha, ha, ha), though only one of them (ha) is now found in it. Hebrew (Septuagint transliteration) seems to have possessed Gayin, as well as Ayin; the South Semitic group shows all the uvulars, and the Hebrew all the spirants. It may be, however, that the parent Semitic speech had fewer uvulars and spirants, and that the Southern group developed the former, and the Northern the latter. It is doubtful whether Hebrew Samek and Sin represent two different sounds. It is likely, also, that not all the sounds above mentioned are original, i.e., some of them may be merely modifications of earlier and simpler sounds; but we are concerned here only with the consonantal material possessed by the primitive Semitic tongue, and not with the material out of which its alphabet may have been formed. The Semitic alphabet is thus seen to be characterized by fullness of guttural, uvular, and spirant consonants. In the several dialects, the movement has been towards a diminution of the number of gutturals and uvulars; namely, by changing these into similar letters pronounced farther forward in the mouth. Assyrian, Galilean Jewish Aramaic, and Mandaean threw off the most of the gutturals; modern Arabic has diminished the number of its uvulars; and Geez, of its uvulars and gutturals. This is a tendency, observable in all languages, to bring forward the consonants, and thus facilitate their pronunciation. — The vowel material of the primitive Semitic was simple, consisting, probably, of the three vowels, a, i, u, with the corresponding long A, I, U. These have been variously modified in the different dialects. Assyrian has é: Aramaic, é, o; Hebrew, á, é, ó, o; modern Arabic, é, é, ã (aw); ó: Geez, é, ó, ó. — Morphologically, the Semitic language belongs to the class called inflecting, standing in this respect alongside of the Indo-European. Their most marked peculiarity is their trilliteration: most stems consist of three consonants, on which, by prefixes, affixes, and internal vowel-changes, all derived forms are made. The noun has gender (masculine and feminine), number, case, which has a gender, number, person, but properly no distinction of tense (in the sense of time), instead of which there are two forms which denote respectively completeness and ingressiveness of action. The notions of reflection, intensity, causation, are expressed by derived verbal stems made by prefixes and infixes.

— The Semitic syntax is marked by great simplicity of articulation. The different clauses of the sentence are, for the most part, connected by the most general word “and”; there is little or no inversion and transposition for rhetorical effect; and there is a lack of infinitive structure commonly and properly described as monumental or lapidary. The most striking special peculiarity of the syntax is the phonetic abridgment of the noun (status constructus) to show that it is defined by the following word or clause. The absence of compounds (except in proper names) is another marked feature, an illustration of the isolating character of the thought. The whole conception of the sentence is detached, isolated, and picturesque. Of these general Semitic characteristics, the Hebrew and Assyrian, which first produced literatures, show the most, and the Aramaic and Arabic, whose literary life began late, the least. (2) Vocabulary. The Semitic word-material differs greatly according to the periods and the circumstances of the various peoples. The pre-Christian literary remains are very scanty. From the Israelites we have only a few prophetical discourses, historical books, and sacred hymns, and ethical works, together with several law-books, — no secular productions (unless the Song of Songs be so regarded); from the Assyrians, somewhat more, — royal and commercial inscriptions, geographical, astronomical, grammatical, and religious works, and fragments of epic and other poems; from the Phœnicians, a few short inscriptions; and from the others, nothing. The Hebrew literature is full in terms relating to religious feelings and acts, scarcity in philosophical and artistic terms and in names of things pertaining to common life: the Assyrian has more of the last, but is equally deficient in the first. In later times, however, the Aramaic (classical and Jewish), and the Arabic under Greek influence, created larger vocabularies, and developed some power of philosophical expression. From the nature of the national culture, these languages, though their vocabularies are sometimes (the Arabic especially) very large, do not satisfy the needs of western life. They multiply words for objects and acts which we do not care to articularize, and are deficient in terms for those which we wish to express with precision. — The above description of the vocabulary and syntax will suffice to characterize the style and thought of the Semitic tongues. The highest artistic shape they have not, either in prose or in poetry. They do not readily lend themselves to philosophy proper or to art. But in the simple expression of emotion, and the condensation of practical wisdom into household words, they are not surpassed by the more highly developed European languages: in these respects the Bible has an acknowledged pre-eminence.

V. Literary Products. — It will be sufficient here to mention briefly the general characteristics of the literature of the Semitic languages: for more particular account see the articles on the different languages. Of the different forms of poetry, the Semites have produced only the lyric; such as the Old-Testament Psalms, the
SEMITIC LANGUAGES.

Syrian hymns, and the Arabian Kasidas. What has sometimes been described as Semitic epics and dramas is either not Semitic (as the Assyrian Izdubar epics, which was derived from a non-Semitic people; and the drama of the Jewish poet Ezekiel, which is an isolated imitation of the Greek), or not epics or dramas (as the Book of Job, which is not a drama, but a religious argument carried on in the form of alternate speeches; and the Arabian romance of Antar, which is a string of loosely connected stories). The subjective character of the poetic thought is obvious: no action or phenomenon in outward nature or in human life is described for its own sake, but always as a part of the feeling of the writer. As poetry it takes high rank. The Hebrew lyrics are sonorous and rhythmical; the Arabian are ingenious and lively; the Syrian, however, are tame. The historical writing of the Semites has never attained a scientific or artistic form. It is either baldly annalistic (as parts of the Old Testament Book of Kings, the Assyrian royal inscriptions, and the Arabic histories), or, when it attempts more connected presentation of the facts, it is subjective and pragmatic, arranging the historical facts so as to point a moral, or support a theory. In one department, prophetic discourse, the Semitic literature is unrivelled; there is nothing in any other family of languages like the prophetic oratory of the Old Testament, or the declaration of the Kuran. In other departments, as fiction and philosophy, the Semites have never been original, but always imitators (Thousand and One Nights, the Arabian philosophy. The Persian Arabic is, of course, not to be considered here.)

VI. RELATIONS TO OTHER FAMILIES OF LANGUAGES. - So far as our present knowledge goes, it is doubtful whether the Semitic family is genetically connected with any other in the world. Various attempts have been made to show a relationship between it and its neighbors, especially the Indo-European and the Egyptian. In respect to the former, the attempt may be said to be wholly unsuccessful. The case is somewhat different with the Egyptian, between whose personal pronouns and the Semitic there is a remarkable resemblance; though this isolated point of contact, considering the very great differences between the two families in other respects, gives an insecure basis for comparison. There is a similar resemblance between the structure of the Semitic verb and that of the Cushite group of languages (the Galla, Saho, and others, near Abeinia), but nothing definite. At most, we may conjecture an original Semitic-Hamitic family, out of which these two have grown; but in that case their separation took place so long ago, and their paths since that time have been so different, and the traces of kinship have been so far obliterated, that it is hard to see how any valuable results can be drawn from a comparison between them. One main obstacle in the comparison of Semitic words with others is the triliteralism of stems of the former; and it has therefore been attempted to reduce these to biniterals, but hitherto with indifferent success. It need not be denied that this problem may hereafter be solved, and comparisons instituted between Semitic and other families, that may be of service to all.
of history at Altdorf, and six months later professor of theology at Halle, becoming Baumgarten’s successor in 1774. In the same year he freed the students from the attacks of outside criticism, and not according to any fixed theory. He asserted the right to free thought and investigation, and drew down upon himself the keenest criticism from orthodox circles. The Nova bibliotheca ecclesiasatica called him an “impious man, and worse than the Jews” (homo impius et Judaeus pejor). He was the principal author of the Abhandlung vom freien Gebrauch (1787), introducing new views upon the canon. The opinion which had prevailed up to that time was, that the books of the Bible constituted one “homogeneous whole,” all parts of which are equally inspired. To refute this opinion is the purpose of the Abhandlung von freien Gebrauch der Kanons, 1771—75, 4 vols. He tried to prove that the books of the canon were brought together by accidental considerations, and not according to any fixed plan. He also showed that the text had many variations. The Scriptures were not even designed to be a norm of faith for all men. Was not the Old Testament written for the Jews? Did not Matthew write for Jews outside of Palestine? etc. Paul alone taught that Judaism was the universal religion, and the catholic epistles were intended to harmonize the Jewish and Pauline types of Christianity. Here was the germ of the fruitful principle of the later Tubingen critics. Semler is never done stating the thought that Christ and the apostles accommodated themselves in their language to the popular notions of their day and the ideas of the Old Testament. In his commentaries on Romans, John’s Gospel, the Epistles to the Corinthians, etc., he attempted to found his exposition upon the Jewish notions of that day. Of course, those things in which the New-Testament writers accommodated themselves to the opinions of their day are not to be believed by us. Nevertheless, Semler, with all his faults, is the author of the present method, in explaining a biblical author, of taking into consideration his purpose in writing and the historical environment. He reduced the difference between Christianity and natural religion to a minimum, but his Christian consciousness always insisted upon this difference. He sang Christian hymns, prayed with his wife, and they pledged one another to follow God only, and his commandments. “No one knows,” he said, “what I feel when I think of God’s goodness to me.” In the department of church history Semler did not do as much as in that of biblical criticism. But he became the father of the history of Christianity by his Christianae ecclesiae, Commentarium hist. de antiquo christianorum statu, etc. He issued in all a hundred and seventy-one publications, only two of which reached a second edition. Baur, after acknowledging the value of Semler’s investigations, complains that he had no power of grouping or elaborating his theories. His work consisted only in a variety of disconnected results and truths. But, as Reuss says, it belonged to Semler to speak the magic word which emanated from the spirit of tradition. Though piously inclined, he gave the traditional views a deadly wound. But he was neither the head of a school nor the prophet of the future. See Semler: Autobiography, 1751; Eichhorn: Leben Semler’s, in his Bibliothek, vol. 2; Schmid: D. Theologie Semlers, 1856; Tholuck: Vermischte Schriften, ii. 30.

SENECA, Lucius Annaeus, a distinguished philosopher and author of the first century of our era; [the son of a rhetorician; was b. in Corduba, Spain, about 8 B.C.; d. by suicide 65 A.D. Young Seneca was trained in his father’s art, but subsequently forsokd rhetoric for philosophy. After travelling in Greece, he began to practise as an orator at Rome, and achieved forensic success. On a charge of adulterous connection with Julia, daughter of Germanicus, he was banished to Corsica, where he lived for eight years, composing the De consolatione ad Helviam liber and De consolatione ad Polybium liber. On the marriage of Agrippina to Claudius, he was recalled, and made tutor of the future emperor, Nero. During his incumbency he amassed great wealth, which became the occasion of his ruin. Looked upon with suspicion by Nero, he retired from the court; and, being accused with having had a share in the conspiracy of Piso, he received an order from the emperor to commit suicide. He at once obeyed the order by opening his veins, and bleeding to death in a hot bath.] Seneca’s relation to Christianity has excited much interest, and awakened much discussion. Jerome (De script. eccl., 12) speaks of letters which passed between Paul and Seneca, and says they were read by many (leguntur a pluribus). Augustine (Ep. ad Maccod.) also refers to this correspondence. These are the only allusions to it during the first eight centuries, except the notice of Jerome is referred to in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Peter, which go under the name of Linus of Rome. Seneca’s name, however, is mentioned with respect, and his philosophical and religious opinions are occasionally referred to, as by Tertullian, Laetzantius, and Beda, who look upon him as a heathen. The notice of Jerome is referred to for the first time in the Chronicle of Freculph of Lisieux (d. 850), and frequently, after the twelfth century, by Honorius of Autun, Peter of Cluny, John of Salisbury, etc. These writers unanimously express the opinion that Seneca was a Christian, and that his correspondence with Paul is genuine. The critical spirit of the period of the Reformation called these judgments into question, especially Erasmus; and the correspondence was declared apocryphal. It would be difficult to find any one now who would deny this conclusion. Many collectors of pseudepigraphic writings which seem to be Christian in tone. Among the latest and most elaborate is that of Amédée Fleury, in his monograph, S. Paul et Sénèque, sur les rapports du philosophe avec SENNACHERIB (Heb., סֵנַנְכֶּרֶב; LXX., Σεννακέρις; Ezra, Sin-ahé-ériba, = "Sin [the moon-god] multiplied brothers"), king of Assyria B.C. 705–681, is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible: 2 Kings xviii. 13–xxv. 37 = Isa. xxxvi. 1–xxxvii. 38; 2 Chron. xxxii. 1–22. From the Assyrian monuments we have tolerably full accounts of his reign. He was the son and successor of Sargon (see the art.), and ascended the throne on the 12th of Ab (i.e., July), B.C. 705. His first military expedition was directed against Babylonia and the irrepressible Merodach-baladan (see the art.). This enterprising prince, whom Sargon had vanquished in 710–708, seized the opportunity of Sargon's death to re-assert his claims to Babylon. But Sennacherib's campaign of 704 resulted in driving him into the remote parts of Southern Babylonia. The years immediately following were occupied by the Assyrian king in composing the affairs of Babylonia, where he established a ruler named Belibus (703), and in chastising various allies of Merodach-baladan. In B.C. 701 fell his great western campaign, which is related from the Hebrew standpoint in the passages named above. The death of Sargon had seemed to the Phoenician, Judean, and Philistian cities, also, to offer an opportunity for throwing off the hated Assyrian yoke. That Merodach-baladan sought to make alliances in the West, his embassy to Hezekiah proves; but his own defeat was so speedy, that the revolt of the western cities was useless for him. Sennacherib merely waited until his work of re-conquest in Babylonia seemed sufficiently assured, and then, as his third campaign, marched to the West. Following the usual route of the Assyrian armies, he appeared first before Sidon, whose king, Elia-bius, ventured no opposition, but fled to Cyrus. The Phoenician cities, those of Philistia as far as Ashdod, and the kings of Ammon, Moab, and Edom, submitted to Sennacherib forthwith. Gaza also seems to have been friendly to him. Ascalon and Ekron were more obstinate. The king of Ascalon was therefore seized, and with his family carried away prisoner. The case of Ekron was peculiar. Padi, its king, was favorable to Sennacherib; but the aristocracy and people had determined on revolt from Assyria, and, having overpowered Padi, sent him in chains to Hezekiah for safe-keeping. It may have been the report of this act, reaching Sennacherib on his southward march, which induced him to send off a detachment of troops into the land of Judah. This detachment devastated Judah, and captured forty-six Judean cities (2 Kings xviii. 13 = Isa. xxxvi. 1; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 1). As a result of this, Hezekiah sent tribute to Sennacherib, who in turn sent an officer to Lebanon and took possession of that city (cf. 2 Kings xviii. 14–16). Probably it was at the same time that Hezekiah surrendered Padi, as the
declare that he did. But Sennacherib demanded more than this from the Judean king. He had taken up his position at Lachish with the expectation of forming an alliance with the enemy, namely, Egypt, which had joined the league against Assyria, and whose army, although too late to protect most of its allies, was on the way to meet Sennacherib. It was most important, therefore, to the Assyrian king that he should be secure in the region he had just entered. The Rab-shakeh (Assyr., rub-sat, "chief captain"), acting, no doubt, under orders from his superior, used every means of persuasion and threat, by word of mouth and by letter, to gain possession of the city (2 Kings xvii. 22, 26, 30-35 = Isa. xxxvii. 22-35; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 20-22; 2 Kings xix. 13-16; Isa. xxxvi. 9, 13). This demand, so formidable, produced a great effect upon people and king (cf. 2 Kings xvii. 22-30, 37-39 = Isa. xxxvii. 22-35; 2 Chron. xxxii. 1-19), but faith in Jehovah, stimulated by the assertions of Isaiah, who had been a sturdy opponent of the Egyptian alliance (see, e.g., Isa. xxx. 18-23), and yet believed in the certitude of a deliverance from the enemy at their doors, sustained the hearts of those within the city, and they did not yield (2 Kings xvii. 5, 14-34 = Isa. xxxvii. 5-14, 36-38; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 20-23). With rebellious Ekron on one flank, and obstinate Jerusalem on the other, Sennacherib felt that he was too far south to fight the Egyptians with safety; and he withdrew to the neighborhood of Eltekeh, where the expected battle took place. The Assyrian inscriptions claim the victory for Sennacherib; but the success was, at all events, not decisive enough to encourage him to follow it up. He contented himself with taking possession of the neighboring cities of Eltekeh and Tinnath, and visiting the unfortunate Ekronites with condign punishment. He put to death the leaders of the revolt against Padi, and took many of the citizens to swell his train of prisoners. Padi himself he re-instated as vassal-prince upon the throne of Ekron.

Sennacherib's return to Assyria was immediately brought about, according to the biblical account, by the sending of his host in a night at the hands of the angel of Jehovah (2 Kings xix. 35, 36 = Isa. xxxvii. 36, 37; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 31). The probable interpretation of this is, that a pestilence broke out in the Assyrian camp, and led to the abandonment of further operations in the West. The Egyptians told Herodotus (Herod. ii. 111) a story, improbable enough, according to which the god Hephæstus (Ital. Hephaestus) sent field-mice into Sennacherib's camp; and these devoured the quivers and the bows and the shield-handles of his warriors, so that the next morning they fled without weapons. This story, as well as other events, that the Egyptians had a tradition of, to the effect that Sennacherib's host departed suddenly, and in consequence of a great misfortune in their camp, and to this extent confirms the biblical account.

One or two apparent discrepancies between the biblical narrative and Sennacherib's own account of his Palestinian expedition admit of explanation. The Bible speaks of Hezekiah's tribute as consisting of three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold (2 Kings xviii. 14). The inscriptions, which likewise give thirty talents of gold, say eight hundred talents of silver. This is probably due to a difference in the standard used, the Babylonian talent being to the Palestinian as three to eight. Further: the inscriptions represent the tribute of Hezekiah as sent after the battle at Eltekeh, with the obvious design of obscuring the partial lack of success which had attended the Assyrians both in that battle and before Jerusalem, and of closing their account with the mention of material tokens of victory. That the inscriptions say nothing of any failure to reduce Jerusalem, and nothing of the destructive providence which caused the return to Assyria, is in keeping with the boastful tone which characterizes the records of Assyrian kings.

After this campaign we have no mention of Sennacherib's presence in the West (cf. "and dwelt at Nineveh," 2 Kings xix. 36; Isa. xxxvii. 37). He reigned twenty years longer, and was engaged in important campaigns and great public works. The fourth, sixth, and eighth campaigns were against Babylonia, where a new pretender, Suzub, divided his attention with Merodach-baladan, whose frequent failure did not daunt him. As a result of the fourth campaign, Sennacherib established his son Assurnadin-nun (the Ashur-marduk, whom Ptolemy assigns to B.C. 699) as viceroy of Babylonia. In the sixth campaign Suzub was again defeated, and brought captive to Nineveh; and in the eighth, which was evidently the fiercest struggle of all, Suzub again appeared in freedom, and in league with Nebosumiskun, son of Merodach-baladan, made a renewed attempt to throw off the Assyrian yoke, but finally succumbed. Other expeditions of Sennacherib took him to the eastward; and one of these was not a very successful campaign against Elam, whose king repeatedly appears as an ally of Merodach-baladan and Suzub.

But Sennacherib distinguished himself by his building as much as by his fighting. Early in his reign he pulled down the royal palace on the northern mound of Nineveh (modern Kuyunjik), and replaced it by a magnificent structure, even in its ruins the largest of the Assyrian palaces yet discovered. It is now known as the South Palace of Kuyunjik. He erected a second palace on the southern mound of Nineveh (modern Nebi Yunus). He made a broad and splendid street through the city, and erected a bridge over the waters which protected the eastern gate, — the chief gate of the city, — through which the Assyrian kings and their armies often passed. He supplied the city with water by cutting at immense cost a canal from the high land near the city Kisir, north-east from Nineveh, through which the waters of the Khoser were conducted to his capital, and provided for a constant supply by a system of feeders. In all these enterprises he employed vast numbers of captives as laborers. The quarries of the neighboring mountains furnished the stone that was needed, and timber and all costly things for the adornment of the palaces were brought from various conquered lands.

But Sennacherib was not permitted to end his days in peace. The prediction which Isaiah had uttered concerning him while he was still in Philiastia (cf. 2 Kings xix. 7 with Isa. xxxvii. 7) came true after twenty years. He was murdered by two of his sons, whose names the Bible has preserved to us as Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Kings xix. 37 = Isa. xxxvii. 37). Alydenus (Euseb. Chron. I. 9) and Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb. Chron. I. 5) also mention the murder of Sennacherib, but no account of it has yet been found in the Assyrian inscriptions. He was succeeded by his son, Esarhaddon.

SEPARATES.

American Calvinistic Methodist sect, composed of Whitefield's followers, which sprung up in 1750 under the name of "New Lights." They were, however, subsequently organized into separate societies by Rev. Shubal Stearns, and then they took the name "Separates." Stearns became a Baptist in 1751, and many of the Separates followed him into that church; and the sect died out. "The distinctive doctrine of the sect was, that believers are guided by the immediate teachings of the Holy Spirit, such supernatural indications of the divine will being regarded by them as partaking of the nature of inspiration, and above, though not contrary to, reason." (See Blunt: Dictionary of Sects, s.v.; Gardner: Faiths of the World, s.v.)

SEPARIATION, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, means the spirit of separation in matters of faith: therefore Separatists are those who separate themselves from the State Church in order to seek in conventicles and prayer-meetings the edification they do not derive from the public religious services. They are very numerous in Russia and Württemberg. See INSPIRED, PENTICTISM, RUSSIAN SECTS.

SEPRAVAIM (Heb. סֵפְרַו, LXX., Σεφαραί; Assy., Sippara, Sippara; Akkad., Zimbir, meaning unknown), a city of Northern Babylonia, is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible: 2 Kings xvii. 24, 31, xviii. 84 (Isa. xxxvi. 19), xix. 13 (Isa. xxxvii. 13). The last four passages name Sepharvaim among the cities conquered by the king of Assyria: the first two speak of it as one of the places from which colonists were transplanted into Sardis (see BEIRUT). Shaphira, also Sippar, is repeatedly called "the river of Sippara," once flowed near it; but the present river-bed is several miles to the west. Sippara was an ancient and highly venerated seat of power and worship. It was sometimes called "Sippa of the Sun" (see Refs. in Euseb., Chron. p. 9, 12, and Chron. I. 7). It appears to have been a double city, with two separate parts: this follows not only from the dual form of the Hebrew Sepharvaim, but also from the distinction which the inscriptions make between "Sippara of the Sun" and "Sippa of (the goddess) Anunit." One of these twin parts was perhaps identical with the old city Agade (Akkad (?), so George Smith), which was undoubtedly in the immediate neighborhood.

Sippara was connected with Babylonian mythology; for, according to Berossus (see Euseb., loc. cit.), Xisuthros, the Babylonian Noah, was directed by a god, before the flood, to deposit in Sippara the records of antiquity, and after the flood his companions were ordered by a heavenly voice to dig up the tablets deposited by Xisuthros at Sippa, which they accordingly did. The temple of the sun-god discovered by Rassam is of unknown antiquity. It was already venerable when it was restored by Sagadulti-Darius, a king who is believed to have lived about B.C. 1050. Tradition carried its origin many centuries farther back; and, indeed, an inscription of Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king, who reigned B.C. 555-538, makes the surprising statement, that, in exploring its walls and foundations, he came upon "the cylinder of Naram-Sin, son of Sargon, which for thirty-two hundred years no king going before me had seen." (See T. G. Pinches: Proceedings Soc. Bib. Arch., Nov. 7, 1882.) If this statement is accurate, then we have a Semitic civilization (Naram-Sin is a Semitic name) in Northern Babylonia nearly four thousand years before Christ. There is no reason to doubt that Nabonidus gave these figures in good faith, but there are several grounds for questioning their correctness. (1) It cannot be proved, and is not probable, that the chronological records, which in later times, it is true, were preserved with minuteness and care (cf. the Assyrian Eponym Canon), extended back to so remote an antiquity. (2) "Thirty-two hundred" looks like an approximate, not an exact statement. (3) This statement throws back Sargon I. and Naram-Sin (from both of whom we have inscriptions) so far as to leave an immense gap between them and the later Babylonian kings, — a gap which no materials at our disposal enable us to fill. (4) Berossus, although he assigns many thousands of years to the prehistoric kings, does not trace the actual history of Babylonia beyond about B.C. 2500. It seems, then, probable that Sippara, though a very ancient city, has at present no claim to be regarded as a sacred place. Noticeable ruins were continued in their new land (see below).

The site of Sepharvaim (Sippara) was discovered in 1881 by Hormuzd Rassam, who unearthed in the mounds now called Abu-Habba the ruins of its famous sun-temple, with a bas-relief of the sun-god himself, and valuable inscriptions. Sippara lay a little to the west of a north and south line joining Babylon with Bagdad, and somewhat nearer the latter place, in lat. about 33° 4' 20" N.; long. about 44° 16' east from Greenwich. The Sepharvaim city which in the inscriptions is repeatedly called "the river of Sippara," once flowed near it; but the present river-bed is several miles to the west. Sippara was an ancient and highly venerated seat of power and worship. It was sometimes called "Sippa of the Sun."

SEPULCHRE, Holy. See Holy Sepulchre.

SEQUENCE, The, or sequentia (from sequor, "I follow"), was so called because it formerly followed the Epistle, and preceded the Gospel, in the church service. At this point the deacon, in the desire to cover his transit; and the last syllable (u) was therefore protracted into "thirty, forty, fifty, or even a hundred notes." This was known as a "run," "cadence," or neuma. It continued in this shape for about three hundred years. In 851 the abbey of Jumièges in Normandy was sacked by the barbarian Normans; and the monks fled, carrying their service-books with them. One arrived at the abbey of St. Gall, where a celebrated school for church music, and brought thither a Gregorian antiphony in which words had been set to these otherwise meaningless notes of the neuma. The improvement was adopted at St. Gall. This is Dr. Pearson's version. But for the Alleluialic Sequence of Gospel, see DANIEL, tom. ii.; and for the Alleluialic Sequence of Godescalc, see DANIEL, tom. v.; MARCH: Latin Hymns, New York, 1875, pp. 88, 265. For the originals of the Notkerian and Godescalcian sequentiae, see DANIEL, tom. v.; and for Hartmann of St. Gall. MOREL'S Lat. Hymn. des Mittelalters (Einsiedeln, 1867, 2 vols.) is the richest collection.

SERAPHIM (plural of Heb. saraph, "to burn"), beings seen by Isaiah, who alone mentions them (vi. 2-6), on either side of the throne of God. They each had six wings; two were spread, in token that instantly they were ready to go upon any errand; two covered the face, to indicate how unworthy they were to look upon their Lord; and two covered the feet,—an Oriental custom in the presence of royalty. They sang an antiphonal chant. One of them cleansed the prophet of his sins by touching his lips with a live coal from the altar before the Lord. The seraphim were manifestly quite different from the cherubim, for the latter had four wings and four faces; and from the angels, who have no wings. SERGIUS PAULUS. See Paul.

SERGIUS is the name of several saints and martyrs of the Roman-Catholic Church. One of them, a native of Rome, was martyred at Rosaph in Syria, 290; and in his honor the Emperor Justinian I. built the city of Rosaph Sergiopolis. His day of commemoration is Oct. 7.

SERGIUS with the surname Confessor was a native of Constantinople, and lived in the first half of the ninth century. His book, De rebus in publica et ecclesiasticis,—a history of the image-controversies from Constantine Copronymus to Michael II. Balbus,—is lost: but under Leo Isauricus, or under Theophilus, he was imprisoned and exiled as an image-worshipper; and for that reason he is styled a confessor by the Greek Church, and often a presbyter.

SERGIUS is the name of four popes.—Sergius I. (687-701), b. at Antiochia, but educated at Palermo; refused to recognize the decrees of the
Trullan Council, though his delegates had signed them. The emperor, Justinian II., proposed to compel obedience, and had already ordered the Pope to depose Constanze and return to Rome, when he was himself deposed. Thus the Papal rejection of the Trullan Council remained unshaken, and became the starting-point of that contest between the Greek and the Latin churches which ended with their complete separation. — Sergius IV. (844-847) was the first pope who had the courage to ask for no confirmation of his election and consecration by the emperor; and he succeeded in vindicating himself, though the Emperor Lothair, through his son Lewis and Bishop Drago, presented a formal protest in Rome. — Sergius III. (904—911), one of the basest characters ever placed on the Papal throne. He lived in open adultery with Marozia, who, besides other children, bore to him the later Pope John XI. See Luitprand: *Antapodosis, in PETZ: Mon. Germ. Hist., v. — Sergius IV. (1009—12). His true name was Bocca di Porco ("Swine-snout"); but he was ashamed of the Trullan Council remained unshaken, and compel obedience, and had already ordered the Greek and the Latin churches which ended in the fortieth year of their journey through the wilderness, after they had overcome and banished the Canaanites, turned again to the Red Sea to compass the land of Edom, they murmured against God and against Moses for want of water. To punish the people, God sent fiery serpents; and by their bite many died. This punishment leads the people not only to acknowledge their sin, but also to ask Moses to pray unto the Lord that he take away the serpents. Moses, therefore, at the divine command, makes a brazen serpent, hangs it on a pole, so that by looking toward it every one that had been bitten was cured (Num. xxi.5 sq.). These fiery serpents are not to be understood as flying serpents; but they were serpents which were called fiery either on account of their red, shining, fiery-like color, or on account of their inflammatory bite. Very striking indeed is the remedy which Jehovah gives here against the consequences of the serpents' bites, and different explanations have been tried. But we must bear this in mind, that not the way in which the brazen serpent was hung up, but the very fact that it was a serpent, and nothing else, which was made visible in a far distance, is of the utmost importance. The brazen serpent was to the Israelite a symbol of the punishment with which his sin, his murmuring, was visited by Jehovah. Since he that was bitten, in order to be cured, had to look toward the brazen image of the death-bringing serpent, he was cured only under the condition that he became conscious of that punishment which he had incurred by his sin, part of which he had already suffered in the bite of the serpent, and that he wished to be spared the last consequences, the death. By looking toward the brazen serpent, the Israelite was to be cured, but only on condition that he was reminded of his deserved punishment, and took it to heart. Remission and forgiveness of sin were only to follow after true repentance had been effected. This brazen serpent was still, in the time of Hezekiah, an object of idolatrous reverence among the Israelites (2 Kings xviii.4), and the pious king had it destroyed with other images.

In the New Testament the brazen serpent is mentioned (John iii. 14, 15), where Jesus shows unto Nicodemus the necessary elements for seeing the kingdom of God,—first the subjective condition, the new birth (3—13); then the objective condition, through which the faith in the Son of man, as effected by the new birth, can bring life eternal (14 sq.). This latter condition consists in that the Son of man is lifted up like the serpent in the wilderness. Like the brazen serpent, he becomes an image of those punishments which man has incurred, and from which he asks to be delivered. Jesus had therefore to suffer the death of the cursed, which we had incurred, in order to relieve us from the curse. By looking toward him in faith, we are cured and saved, but not without being reminded at the same time of our own sins, for which he was crucified, and of the punishment which we have deserved. This is only one, and nothing else but one, side of the great work by which Jesus has effected our redemption.

SERIVETUS. Michael (Miguel Serveto), b. at [Tudela in Spain, Sept. 29, 1511; burnt at the stake in Geneva, Oct. 27, 1553. He studied jurisprudence at Toulouse; entered the service of Father Quintana, the confessor of Charles the Fifth, and accompanied him in 1528 to Italy and Germany. The minute circumstances, however, of his earlier life, cannot be made out with certainty, as the explanations he gave before the court of Vienne often contradict those he gave before the court of Geneva. In 1530 he was at all events in Basel, and in the following year he published his *De Trinitatis erroribus. While in Toulouse he began to study the Bible, and received a deep impression from it; but he had always remained a self-taught man in the field of theology, without any true scientific training. He had, however, some talent for abstract speculation, and threw himself with ardent zeal on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, sure that the development which the doctrine had found in the church was utterly wrong, and eager to turn the course of the Reformation in the direction of his own speculation. He addressed himself to Ecolampadius; and Ecolampadius was unable to convince him that his speculations, directed against the eternal divinity of Christ, and leaving the Holy Spirit almost entirely out of consideration, were obscure contradictions to the Bible, and blasphemous. When the book appeared, it made a great sensation; but all the Reformers denounced it, and Butzer even declared from the pulpit that the author ought to be punished with death. On his return to Basel, Servetus was cast into prison. His bouts of repentance had been, he was released only on condition of retracting; and indeed his next book (*Dialogorum de Trinitate libri ii., 1532) opens with a recantation; but he retracts only because he understands that what he formerly wrote on the subject was unripe and unintelligible; and after that kind of recantation he begins afresh. This second book, however, fell flat from the press.

Soon after, he left Basel and repaired, under the protection of De Villeneuve, to Vienne, where he studied mathematics and medicine. In 1540 he settled as a physician at Vienne, on the invitation of Archbishop Paulmier; and he staid there for twelve years, enjoying the favor of his patron and the esteem of his co-citizens, engaged in various literary pursuits of a highly creditable character, and seemingly in perfect harmony with the Roman-Catholic Church around him. But he had not given up his antitrinitarian speculations, nor abandoned his hope of exercising a decisive influence on the course of the Reformation. Probably in order to ascertain how far he could hope to find a co-worker in the French-Reformed Church, he opened a correspondence with Calvin. At first Calvin answered calmly and with great composure: but, as the correspondence developed he felt deeply provoked; and, when Servetus asked him to procure him a safeguard for a visit to Geneva, Calvin refused, remarking in a letter to Farel, dated Feb. 13, 1549, "Si veneratori modo valeat mea auctoritas, vivum erirenam quern palmar" ("If ever he enters the city, he shall not leave it living, if I can prevent it"). Servetus himself was aware of the danger of his enterprise; but in the excited state of mind in which he lived he was drawn onwards with irresistible force, and in the beginning of 1553 he published anonymously his principal work, Christianismi Restitutio. All the old objections to the doctrine of the Trinity are here repeated; and it is urged that the Bible and the ante-Nicene Fathers know nothing of such a doctrine, and that it is the principal reason why the Jews and Mohammedans have not been converted. The author of the book was soon found out, and his identity proved by means of papers delivered up by Calvin. Servetus was imprisoned at Vienne, and a process was instituted against him; but on April 7 he succeeded in escaping from his prison, and a good physician, he would not find it difficult to live. But he tarried for nearly a month at Gardanne, and a co-worker in the French-Reformed Church, in verse and prose, representing his character and conduct in the most odious light, came pouring down upon him, that he found it necessary to publicly defend himself. His Declaration appeared in the beginning of 1554 in French, and shortly after in Latin: Refutatio. It was very severely criticised by one Vaticanus (Contra Vaticanum Calvin), who, however, was no adherent of Servetus. A remarkable book on the question is the De haereticis, an sint perseverendi . . . sententia (Magdeburg, 1554), probably by Castellio. It is a collection of all the most noteworthy opinions pronounced upon the question.

SERVIA. Modern Servia, which on March 6, 1882, resumed her place among the kingdoms of Europe, has an area of 20,850 square miles, and a population of about a million and three-fourths. Ancient Servia had a much greater area; and the number of the Servian-speaking people, including those living under Austrian rule, and in the provinces formerly subject to Turkey, is stated to be over seven millions. The Servian tribes received Christianity from the Eastern Church, early in their history; but it was only towards the end of the twelfth century that the energetic Grand Shupane, Nemanja, abolished the partly Romanized ritual which had come into use, and brought the Servian Church into full accord with that of the Eastern Empire.

The Latins having taken Constantinople, St. Sava, son of Nemanja, in 1217, crowned as king his brother Stephen, and in 1224 induced the humbled emperor and patriarch to make the Servian Church autocephalous, as a means of preserving it from Rome; St. Sava himself being the first independent archbishop. The key to the earlier church history of Servia is found in the attachment of the formule of the Eastern Church, joined to jealousy of the political power of the Eastern Empire. In 1347, when the great Stephen Dushan declared himself czar, the archbishop, as was natural in the Greek Church, where the spiritual and secular powers are so closely united, was declared patriarch, and his seat fixed at Ipek. The fatal battle of Kossova, in 1389, and the trampling of Servia under the Turks, did not interfere with the succession of the patriarchs of Ipek until near the middle of the seventeenth century; then the Porte, finding the patriarchate a centre of national feeling, interfered; and finally, in 1673, abolished it, and Andrew of Zata, a Greek bishop from Constantinople, who were as much hated by the people as were the Turkish rulers. As the erection of the patriarchate under Stephen Dushan marks the highest point of Servian history, so its suppression marks the lowest. In 1810, when Kara George freed his country from the Turks, the archbishopric of Carlovitz, in Hungary, which represents the patriarchate of Ipek, was acknowledged as the head of the Servian Church. The Turks reconquered the country; and when Milosh Obrenovics by his efforts, from 1807 to 1818, in imitation of the Hatti-scher, from the Porte, which erected Servia into an autonomous principality, paying tribute to the Porte, the Church was also allowed to elect its own bishops and metropolitan, paying tribute to the Patriarch at Constantinople. In 1838, when the seat of government was removed to Belgrade, the metropolitan of that city was acknowledged as the head of the Servian Church, although the Archbishop of Carlovitz urged his claims. The treaty of Berlin, in 1878, made the princi-pality of Servia wholly independent, and the con-nection of the church with that of Constantinople ceased. The Liturgy of the Servian Church is in ancient Slavonic, which is said not to differ more from modern Servian than does the English of Chaucer from that of the present day. Servia has a good public system of education. The parish numbered in 1874 less than seven thousand. The dan population of seventy-five thousand.

She married William Seton in her twentieth year. After his death (1803) she left the Roman-Catholic Church, March 14, 1805. In order to support herself she taught school at Baltimore, 1806–08; but with her sisters-in-law, Harriet and Cecilia Seton, on the inheritance of eight thousand dollars from the Rev. Samuel Cooper, she opened a conventual establishment of the Sisters of Charity—they having taken the veal Jan. 1, 1806—at Emmittsburg, July 30, 1809. In 1812 the order had increased to twenty members, with Mother Seton as superior-general. At her death it numbered fifty. In 1814 the order took charge of an orphan-asylum in Philadelphia, and in 1817 was incorporated by the Legislature of Maryland. See her biography by White, New York, 1853, and by Robert Seton, New York, 1836, 2 vols.

SEVEN, The Sacred Number. Among ancient nations, especially in the East, in India, China, Chaldea, Egypt, Greece, we find that a symbolical significance is attached to the number seven as a pre-eminently sacred number. According to the Indian doctrines, “man is the representative of the great seven-stringed world-lyre,” the “symbol of cosmic harmony,” the “macro-cosmic hepta-chord” (v. Bohlen: Das alte Indien, ii. 247). The Chinese distinguished seven material souls m an, together with the spirit, formed in the spine of Florence, on the day of the festival of the ascension of the Virgin (Aug. 15), by seven distinguished citizens, who retired to a secluded place (Villa Camartia) for the purpose of devoting themselves entirely to the worship of Mary. In 1230 they removed to Monte Senario; and in 1239 they adopted the rules of St. Augustine, and began to receive novices. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX. and Alexander IV.; and from Martin V. it obtained all the privileges of the mendicant orders, 1424. Among the celebrated men who have belonged to the order is Paolo Sarpi. There are also female Servites. See A. GIANIUSSI: Annales Ordinis Fraorum Servorum, Lucca, 1719; and PAULUS FLORENTINUS: Dialogus de origine Ordinis Servorum, in J. LAMBUS: Delicia Eruditorum, Florence, 1780; SCHÖCH: Christlichen Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxvii., pp. 590 sqq.

SERVUS SERVORUM DEI (“Servant of the Servants of God”) is the official formula with which the Pope signs his name. It was brought into technical official use by Gregory the Great (q. v.) in imitation of Augustine, yet as a rebuke to the Patriarch John of Constantinople, who had the audacity to style himself “Ecumenical Patriarch.”

According to the Indian doctrines, “man is the representative of the great seven-stringed world-lyre,” the “symbol of cosmic harmony,” the “macro-cosmic hepta-chord” (v. Bohlen: Das alte Indien, ii. 247). The Chinese distinguished seven material souls in man, together with the spirit, formed in the spine of Florence, on the day of the festival of the ascension of the Virgin (Aug. 15), by seven distinguished citizens, who retired to a secluded place (Villa Camartia) for the purpose of devoting themselves entirely to the worship of Mary. In 1230 they removed to Monte Senario; and in 1239 they adopted the rules of St. Augustine, and began to receive novices. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX. and Alexander IV.; and from Martin V. it obtained all the privileges of the mendicant orders, 1424. Among the celebrated men who have belonged to the order is Paolo Sarpi. There are also female Servites. See A. GIANIUSSI: Annales Ordinis Fraorum Servorum, Lucca, 1719; and PAULUS FLORENTINUS: Dialogus de origine Ordinis Servorum, in J. LAMBUS: Delicia Eruditorum, Florence, 1780; SCHÖCH: Christlichen Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxvii., pp. 590 sqq.

SERVUS SERVORUM DEI (“Servant of the Servants of God”) is the official formula with which the Pope signs his name. It was brought into technical official use by Gregory the Great (q. v.) in imitation of Augustine, yet as a rebuke to the Patriarch John of Constantinople, who had the audacity to style himself “Ecumenical Pa- triarch.”

SESSION, the lowest court in the Presbyterian Church, composed of the pastor and his elders. Before it, all candidates for admission to full communion come for examination, and by it all business relating to the government and practice of the congregation is transacted.

SESSION OF CHRIST, a theological term derived from the phrase that Christ is “seated at the right hand of God,” setting forth the perpetual presence of the human nature in heaven.

value of this number is not to be sought for, with Winer (Reaumur-wörterbuch, ii. 715), in the ideas attached by the ancients to the seven planets, but in the seven days during which creation arose from chaos [and was pronounced to be “very good”]. When God rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had done, he blessed it and sanctified it as a day of rest for the creation also. With reference to this starting-point or sacred number—seven, or seven multiplied by seven—all the legal festivals were ordered. Thus the great festivals lasted seven days, the passover [Exod. xii. 15], the feast of tabernacles [Deut. xvi. 13]. Pentecost was seven weeks after the passover [Lev. xxiii. 15, 16]; each seventh year was “a sabbath of rest unto the land” [Lev. xxv. 4], and the jubilee year was the year after “seven sabbatical years,” the seventh sabbatical year a sabbatical year, the seventh sabbatical year a sabbatical year, the seventh sabbatical year a jubilee]. Not only the legal festivals, but also other enactments, had reference to the sacred number seven. Thus seven days were required for the ceremonies of the consecration of priests; seven days for the interval to elapse between the aspersion either of the blood of the victim (Lev. iv. 11, xvi. 14), or of the water of purification in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh,” etc. [Deut. xvi. 21], and after contact with a corpse, etc.; seven times appointed for aspersion either of the blood of the victim (Lev. iv. 6, xvi. 14), or of the water of purification (xvi. 14); cf. 2 Kings v. 10, 14, “[go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh,” etc.], and Gen. vii. 2, 3). Seven things were to be offered in sacrifice,—oxen, sheep, goats, pigeons, wheat, oil, wine; seven victims to be offered on any special occasion (Num. xxiii. 1, [14], 29; 2 Chron. xv. 11, xvii. 11, xxix. 21; [Job xii. 6]); cf. also Gen. xxxiii. 3, where Jacob bowed seven times, and 2 Kings xv. 38, concerning Solomon’s temple, which was seven years in building); and especially at the ratification of a treaty, the notion of seven being embodied in the very term שלוחa, signifying “to swear,” literally meaning to “do seven times” (Gen. xxii. 28; Deut. iv. 31; cf. Herod. iii. 8 for a similar custom among the Arabian). The same idea is farther carried out in the vessels, adjuncts, measurements, and arrangements of the tabernacle, in the seven arms of the candlestick [and its seven lamps (Exod. xxv. 31-37); the length of each curtain of the tabernacle, which was seven by four (Exod. xxvi. 2); the number of the pillars of the tabernacle court, which was seven by four by two (Exod. xxvii. 10-15). The number seven also appears in cases where the notion of satisfaction is required, as in reference to punishment for wrongs (Gen. iv. 15; Lev. xxvi. 18-28; Prov. vi. 3), or to forgiveness of them (Matt. xviii. 21). It is again mentioned, in a variety of passages (Isa. iv. 1, xi. 15, xxx. 26; Jer. xv. 9; Job v. 19; Matt. xxi. 45, etc.), in a sense analogous to that of a “round number,” but with the additional idea of sufficiency and completeness. It may also be added the numerous instances in which persons or things are mentioned by sevens;
tians generally during the apostolic period. It had no rival day in the Church until about the middle of the second century, when Sunday began to be observed as a festival day in honor of the resurrection, along with Wednesday, Friday, and numerous other festal days of the Latin Church, then beginning to drift upon the first great wave of its apostasy. This church made the sabbath day a fast-day, not without sinister motives looking to its suppression in favor of the festival Sunday; while the Greek or Eastern Church steadfastly observed it as a day of holy delight in the Lord. Controversy upon this subject began about the middle of the second century, and was kept up with a zeal amounting to bitterness for several centuries. In the Western Church the seventh day continued to be observed quite generally till the fifth century, and traces of it were noticeable in some parts of Europe much later. In Scotland and Ireland, as well as in England, the seventh day was regarded and observed as the sabbath in the eleventh century and later. In Skene's Celtic Scotland, p. 436, vol. 2, there is this statement: "There was no want of the veneratio of Sunday, though they held that Saturday was properly the sabbath, on which they abstained from work." In the Oriental or Greek branch of the church the seventh day continues to be observed to this day.

There is not wanting evidence that an unbroken chain of observers of the seventh day was preserved, in the face of detraction and persecution, all through the dark ages, and that they appeared in the dawn of the Protestant Reformation, and were represented in that movement by a number of its prominent actors.

In the Abyssinian, Armenian, and Nestorian churches the sabbath day has not yet been supplanted by the first day of the week. Consult Geddes: History of the Church of Ethiopia, London, 1894; Gobat: Three Years in Abyssinia, London, 2d ed., 1847; Stanley: History of the Eastern Church, London, 1861.

As these sabbath-keepers were pressed by persecutions, they were compacted into several centres. Most prominent among these were societies in Bohemia, Transylvania, and Holland. From among these, under the lead of prominent and able dissenters from the Church of England, were gathered the "Sabbatarian Baptists" of England. This movement was accelerated as a reaction against the theory, that, while the Sinaitic sabbath law was still in full force, the first day of the week had been put in place of the seventh day by divine authority. This theory was first set forth by Nicolas Bowne, in his Sabbatum veteris et novi testamenti: or the true doctrine of the Sabbath, held and practiced of the Church of God, both before, and under the Law; and in the time of the Gospel, London, 1690, 2d ed. ("perused an enlarged").

During the English Reformation, several able and distinguished men came out of the Established Church, and took up the defence of the sabbath in the face of severe persecution, amounting, in a number of instances, to martyrdom, characterized by all the circumstances which had marked the dark ages. In 1630 Theophilus Brabourn wrote a able defence of the views of the Sabbatarian Baptists; and he was followed by James Ockford, the Stennets, Robert Coruthwait, and others.

Out of such agitation, and from such elements, were the Seventh-Day Baptist churches of England, organized during the latter part of the sixteenth century, and for part of the seventeenth. During that period eleven churches were formed in England. Three of these were in London.

The Mill-yard Church is still active, with a church-edifice, parsonage, and considerable money endowment. This church was gathered by John James, at a date not well settled, in consequence of loss of records by fire. This first pastor fell a victim to the wild spirit of intolerance abroad in the politico-ecclesiastical counsels of England, and was by authoritative mandate dragged from his pulpit during sabbath service, imprisoned, and at length beheaded, drawn, and quartered, and his head was set upon a pole opposite his chapel. There are now two churches in England, two in Holland, and one (missionary church) in Shanghai, China.

II. Seventh-Day Baptist Churches in America.

In 1684 Stephen Mumford came from one of the English churches, and organized the first Seventh-Day Baptist Church in America, in Newport, R.I., in 1671. From this church others soon grew up, and were pushed out into Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, and farther west. Another centre was established, about 1700, near Philadelphia, Penn., by Rev. Abel Noble, a minister of large ability, from England. Five churches were formed there, drawing largely for adherents from the Kelthian Baptists. From these, other churches were formed, in South Carolina, Georgia, and in the western part of Pennsylvania, and still farther west. A third centre was established at Fisca-taway, N.J., in 1705, where there is still a flourishing church. From these three radial points the churches have spread westward with the general tide of emigration, until there are now flourishing churches in no less than sixteen States, with an aggregate membership of about nine thousand.

Church Polity. — This is strictly congregational. The annual conference has simply the power of an advisory council, and is composed of two delegates from each church, with an additional delegate for every twenty-five members. There are five associations, which sustain the same relation to the churches composing them as the conference does to all the churches. The associations may be represented by delegates in the conference, but with no power to vote as association in that body.

Doctrines. — The Seventh-Day Baptists believe in the general doctrines of salvation held by the evangelical churches, and differ from the tenets of the Baptists generally only in regard to the sabbath.

They believe, and conscientiously regulate their practice accordingly, that the seventh day of the week is the sabbath of the Lord, and that this, at its institution in Eden, and promulgation as part of the Sinaitic code, was made binding upon all men in all times; that, in the nature of its relations to God and to man, it is irrepealable.

In the terms of its constitution and in the reasons for its enactment it is inseparably connected with the seventh or last day of the week, and

That any attempt to connect the sabbath law and sabbath obligation with any one of the other days of the week is illogical, and in its tendency destructive of the whole sabbatic institution.

That the change of the day of the sabbath to Sunday has no warrant in the Scriptures, is only a human device brought about by such questionable and unjustifiable means as to give it no claim either to the respect or acceptance of Christendom.

That the only stay to the wave of no-sabbathism now sweeping from Europe to America is in the impregnable bulwark of the true sabbath of the Fourth Commandment.

Education and Publication.—The Seventh-Day Baptists have two flourishing institutions of college grade,—one at Milton, Wis.; the other at Alfred Centre, N.Y. This latter has a university charter, and is vigorously carrying on business, mechanical, and theological departments, in addition to its normal and associate courses. Both sexes are admitted on equal terms to these colleges, and over seven hundred students were in attendance in them the last year.

The publishing-house of the denomination is also at Alfred Centre, from which, besides a large number of tracts and books, it issues its weekly organ, the Sabbath Recorder, an eight-page paper of good size, ably edited, and executed in the best style of the art. A monthly, The Outlook, has an issue of over fifty thousand copies; and a finely illustrated Sabbath-school paper, Our Sabbath Visitor, is issued weekly.

Missions.—For many years the denomination has had a mission in Shanghai, China, where it has accumulated considerable property, which it is now enlarging; and the mission force is to be enlarged at once by the addition of a female medical missionary.

General Reform.—Upon the questions of reform which have agitated the public mind, such as antislavery, temperance, religious liberty, sabbath-observance, etc., this people have always maintained a consistent and radical position, favorable to the reforms sought.

General Repute.—Baird, in his Religion in Asia (New York, 1886), says of them, “The population under their instruction and influence is reckoned at forty thousand. Their churches are widely scattered through the States, and altogether they are a very worthy people.”

Arnold’s History of Rhode Island, vol. ii. p. 96, has the following: “The Rev. Mr. Price, missionary at Westerly, expresses his astonishment at the kind treatment he received at their hands, and that he found them most charitable and catholic, whom he thought to have found the most stiff and prejudiced.” With “charity for all, and malice towards none,” they claim their place and (in) equal rights among other religious societies, nor do they find occasion to “spurn the badges their fathers have worn. Nor beg the world’s pardon for having been born.”

SEVERUS, Alexander, b. at Arce, Oct. 1, 205; made Roman emperor March 11, 222; murdered at Mayence, March 19, 235. During his reign the Christians dared worship openly. He was a pan-theistic hero-worshipper, and had busts of Abraham and Christian in his private chapel, with those of Orpheus and others.

SEVERUS, Septimius, b. at Lepta in Africa, April 11, 146; d. at York, Feb. 4, 211; became Roman emperor after the assassination of Pertinax in 193. He was a just but somewhat sombre character, not destitute of true religious feeling, but a mystic easily captivated by the fantastic practices of the Pagan religions. He had Christian servants in his household, defended the Christian senators against the fury of the Pagan mob, and allowed his eldest son to converse freely with the boys of Christian families. But during his campaigns in the East a great change took pace in his feelings towards the Christians. The reason is not known; but he issued laws, which, by very severe penalties, prohibited conversions to Judaism and Christianity. From these laws the Pagan authorities took occasion to revive and enforce again older laws against the Christians, which, though not revoked, had fallen into oblivion; and persecutions broke out, especially in Africa and some parts of Asia Minor. The Christians seem, however, generally to have been of the opinion that those persecutions were not really intended by the emperor. See TEXTULARIAN: Apolog. 37. O. H. KIPPEL.

SEVERUS, Sulpicius, b. 363 in Gaul; d. at Marseille in 410; was a distinguished rhetorician, and successful as a lawyer, but adopted a monastic life after the death of his wife, in 392, and settled with a few companions in some secluded place in Aquitaine. He was a great admirer of St. Martin of Tours, whom he visited several times, and whose life he wrote. He also wrote a Historia secura, three dialogues on the monastic life, and some letters, which, however, are of no interest. His collected works were edited by Hieronymus de Pratana, 1741, and reprinted in GALEN: Eile. Paci, viii.

SEWALL, Samuel, jurist, b. at Bishopstoke, Eng., March 26, 1652; d. in Boston, Mass., Jan. 1, 1730. He was graduated at Harvard, 1671; studied divinity, and preached for a while, until by his marriage (Feb. 28, 1679) with Hannah Hull he got great wealth. He then turned his attention to law, was made judge (1692), and eventually (1718), chief justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. He at first shared in the popular delusion concerning witchcraft (1692), and concurred in the condemnations; but on Jan. 14, 1697, his minister, Rev. Samuel Willard, read "a bill" before the congregation of the Old South Church, in which he acknowledged his own guilt, asked the pardon both of God and man, and deprecated the divine judgments for his sin. He contributed liberally to the spread of the gospel among the Indians, and in 1689 was chosen one of the missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England, and, soon after, their secretary and treasurer. His sympathy for African slaves prompted him, in 1700 to publish a tract entitled The selling of Joseph, in which he advocated their rights; it being his opinion that would "be no progress in gospelling" until slavery was abolished. His benevolence and charity were great, and his house was a seat of hospitality." He wrote Phenomena, etc., a description of the New Heaven, Boston, 1697, 3d ed., 1727; and Prospects touching the accomplishment of prophecies, Boston, 1713. His Diary (1674-1720) was published by the Massachusetts Historical Society, 1878, 2 vols. See DRAKE: Dictionary of American Biography.

SEWELL, William, Friend; b. at Amsterdam, 1650; d. about 1725. His father was a surgeon, and he served his time as a weaver, yet acquired Greek, Latin, English, French, and High Dutch. He is known as the author of Hist. van de Opkomste, Aanwas, en Voortgang der Christenen, bekend by den naam van Quakers), ondermengd met de voorname Staatsgeschiedenissen van dien tyd in England voorgevallen, en met authentile Stukken voorzien ("The history of the rise, increase, and progress, of the Christian people called Quakers"), Amsterdam, 1717, and then translated itself into English, London, 1722, folio; 3d ed., 1765, 2 vols.; Philadelphia, 1855. One of his objects was to correct the "misrepresentations" in GERARD CARRIUS: Historia Quakeriana, Amst., 1695-1704, 3 books.

SEXASEBIMA, "the sixtieth," means the second Sunday before Lent, the next to Shrove Tuesday, as being about sixty days before Easter.

SEXTON, a contraction of "sacristan," a subordinate officer of the church, taking care of its vessels and vestment, attending the officiating clergy, etc.

SFONDRAI is the name of an Italian family of which several members have been intimately connected with the Church. — Francis Sfondra, b. at Cremona, 1498; d. there July 31, 1550. He taught law in the universities of Padua, Pavia, Bologna, Rome, and Turin, and was much used in diplomatic negotiations by Duke Francis Sforza and Charles V. After the death of his wife he entered the service of the Church, and was by Paul III. made Bishop of Cremona, and a cardinal. He acted as mediator between the Pope and the emperor on the occasion of the Westphalian Interim. — Nicholas Sfondra, son of the preceding, became Pope under the name of Gregory XIV.; which art. see. — Celestine Sfondra, b. in Milan, 1649; d. in Rome, Sept. 4, 1696. He was educated in the abbey of St. Gall; taught theology, philosophy, and canon law in various places; and was elected prince-abbot of St. Gall in 1689, and made a cardinal in 1695. In the controversy between the papal see and the Gallican Church he wrote, in defence of the absolute supremacy of the Pope, Regale Sacerdotium (1684). Gallia vindicata (1687, often reprinted), Legatio Marchionis Laurentini (1688), etc. His Nodus predestinationum, published in Rome, 1697, made a great sensation, as in many points it stood in open contradiction to the official system of doctrine recognized by the Church. The French bishops tried to have the book put on the Index, but did not succeed. See NEUDCKER.

SHAKERS. See DERM, NEUDCKER.

SHAKERS.

The Shakers' first house of worship was built at New Lebanon afreshed in 1785. The first gathering into a community analogous to the primitive church was the first written covenant of a full consecration to God of life, services, and treasure, was signed by the members in 1795.

Organization and Theory. Their societies are organized into families of both sexes and all ages, varying in numbers from a very few to a hundred and fifty or more. Their organization, formulas, and by-laws are anti-monastic, anti-Mormon, anti-Oneidant, anti-Nicolaitan. Each sex, including those once married, occupy separate apartments. Both sexes congregate for meals and meetings at the same time, and in one and the same hall. At table, except small parties, each sex is grouped by itself; the same order in meetings. They kneel in prayer before, and in thanks after, each meal, also on retiring to rest, and rising in the morning.

Worship-Meetings are generally held three or four times per week. Worship consists in singing, in solo and harmony, hymns, anthems, and improvised songs, called "gift songs." quick and slow marches, two abreast, in ranks and circles, sometimes timing with the hands to the measure, sometimes in solemn dances in ranks or circles, and occasionally interchangeably, but always each sex grouped by itself; also prayers, exhortations, and sermons by both sexes. Meetings are held for mental discipline, as reading and speaking; others, for learning new songs, and training in singing; also for social converse, called "Union Meetings."

Theology, Synopsis of. — 1st, God, a Spirit Being, a heavenly Father and heavenly Mother. 2d, Mediatorial intelligences reveal God's character and his truths to man. 3d, Jesus Christ was one of these; was not God, but the Son of God. 4th, By birth of Mary, Jesus was simply highly organized man. 5th, By baptism of the Christ-spirit he became the Christ. 6th, Of this Christ-spirit, not of Jesus, there was to be a second appearing. 7th, This was to be manifest in his glory—woman, the glory of man. 8th, In each of these dispensations its church, while in union with and in obedience to the Christ-spirit, represents the Christ of that dispensation: the former, the Bride-room; the latter, the Bride. 9th, The Head of Christ's church is never in the same genitive sense, but the Christ-spirit, and, possessed of this, either man or woman may teach and lead. 10th, Thus Jesus Christ (Jesus baptized) in the Son of God par excellence, the "Elder Brother" (Patr) of other sons of God,—his true followers. In like manner we have daughters of God, females, baptized with the Christ-spirit, "Elder Sisters," exercised in the manifestations, orders of humanity,—the old, instituted by generation through Adam, the sowing dispensation; the new, instituted by regeneration through Christ, the reaping, harvesting of the world; virgin celibacy, its via vita; Christ, "the Lord from heaven," "the quickening Spirit in both male and female, its organic media; and, so far as light now revealed, these may run forever for all time. In the Redeemed man and woman, by baptism and in obedience to the Christ-spirit, constitute the subjects of the new creation, the heavenly kingdom of God. "18th, Reject carnal resurrection. The Christian resurrection is of the soul, from death by sin, to a life of righteousness. 15th, The day of judgment comes to any soul, when such soul, by confession and repentance of sin, comes to the Christ-life: or, having an offer, refuses the Christ-life. "Of myself [as Jesus], I judge no man." "As I [Jesus] Christ] bear, I judge: and my judgment is just" (John v. 30). 16th, Election to salvation is of man's free will, when offered. "Whosoever will, let him come and partake of the waters of life freely" (Rev. xxii. 17). Election, choice of instruments for some specific part of the work in God's vineyard, because of constituted fitness, is preferred by superiors in the order of Heaven's anointing and choosing. Thus Jesus says, "I have chosen you." 17th, Probation extends to the spirit-world. Thus only can God be just. 18th, Physical death is not the gate to heaven nor hell: heaven is opened by good deeds; hell, by deeds evil. 19th, Heaven and hell are states of the soul, the reward and the conduct and the reward of judgment comes to any soul, when such soul, by confession, etc. (pamphlet), by SETH Y. SHALMANE/SER. (Heb., שָלָם, נאם; LXX., Σαλμανασάδος; Assyr., शालमानuşir, "Shalman, be gracious") was the name of several Assyrian kings, of whom only two are important for biblical history: (Shaker of Mt. Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y.).

tory. — Shalmaneser II. (reigned B.C. 880-825) is not mentioned in the Bible, but was a contemporary of Ahab and Jehu of Israel, and Ben-hadad II. and Hazael of Syria, all of whom are named in the numerous Assyrian inscriptions. From these we learn that Shalmaneser defeated Ben-hadad II. (whom he calls Dad'-idri; i.e., Hadadezer) and about a dozen allied princes, at Karkar, between Halman (Ialale-Aleppo) and Hamath, B.C. 854. Among these princes was "Ahab the Israelite;" and in the danger from Assyria which was here realized we have one explanation of the "covenant" which Ahab made with Ben-hadad after he had conquered him (1 Kings xx. 31-34). Shalmaneser records again, that, urinating on the remains of his father, he received tribute from "Jehn, son of Omri." This designation of the king of Israel, who had destroyed the house of Omri, is one of the most striking tokens of the might of Assyria, as we learn from the inscriptions of Shalmaneser IV., who reigned over Assyria from B.C. 709, his first year as king of Babylon, with the date given by Lema's Canon for the first year of Sargon compared with the Eponym canon, no date [1875]; and E. Schrader: Die Keilinschriften u. die Geschichtsforschung, 1878, pp. 299-356.)

Shalmaneser IV., who reigned over Assyria B.C. 727-722, is twice mentioned in the Bible,—2 Kings xvii. 3-5, xviii. 9. The former passage tells us that Shalmaneser came up against Hoshea, king of Israel, and that Hoshea submitted to him, and gave him tribute; that Hoshea entered into conspiracy with So (better, Seveh, Sabako), king of Egypt, as a punishment for which Shalmaneser bound him, and put him in prison; some interval doubtless occurring between the acts of verse 2 and those of verse 4. Finally, we are told that Shalmaneser "came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years." This took place, according to 2 Kings xviii. 9, in the seventh year of Hoshea's reign. Just before the fall of Samaria, Shalmaneser died, as we learn from the inscriptions of Sargon, his successor, who brought the siege to an end. (See Sargon.) Whether his death was natural or violent, we do not know. The only inscriptions concerned with his reign are an inscribed weight and two Eponym lists, which give us hardly more than the dates of his reign. With the expedition against Samaria was, perhaps, connected that against Tyre, which Josephus (Antiq., IX. 14, 2) mentions on the authority of Menander. The hostilities against Tyre lasted five years, and cannot have been concluded before Shalmaneser's death. [1888]

SHARP, James, a Scottish prelate; b. in the castle of Banff, May, 1618; assassinated on Magus fest, 1679. He was educated at Aberdeen; in 1640 was professor of philosophy in St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews; in 1650 was chosen to plead the Presbyterian cause before the Protector; in 1660 he represented the same party when Monk marched upon London, and in that capacity was sent over to Charles II. at Breda. He took a strong part in the preparation and preservation of "the government of the Church of Scotland, as it is settled by law, without violation." This, of course, was understood in the Presbyterian sense; but in 1681 the Scottish Parliament annulled all the Parliaments held since 1633, with all their proceedings, and thus totally abolished all the laws made in favor of the Presbyterian Church. The "Church of Scotland" thus became the old Episcopal Church; and Sharp, in Dec. 12, 1661, was in London consecrated Archbishop of St. Andrews. With the zeal of a convert he persecuted his former allies. He re-erected the Court of High Commission in 1684, which severely punished, some even with death, all those who in any way interfered with the prelatical designs, and executed nine persons after the king had required the persecutions to cease. For his perfidy and cruelty Sharp was thoroughly detested; yet the assassins who despatched him were really on the lookout for one of his underlings, Carmichael, and had no intention at first of killing him. See Hetherington, History of the Church of Scotland, pp. 205 sq., 290 sq.

SHARPE, Samuel, Unitarian layman; b. in London, March 8, 1799; d. there (Highbury) July 28, 1881. The last twenty years of his life were passed in retirement from business and assiduous study. Although he had not the advantage of a university education, but was from early life a London banker, he yet acquired much solid information upon recondite subjects. He early became interested in Egyptology, and published Egyptian Inscriptions (London, 1836-41, 7 parts, 2d series, 1836, 4 parts), History of Egypt from the Earliest Times till A.D. 640 (1846, 6th ed., 1876, 2 vols.). To biblical literature he contributed a translation of the New Testament from Griesbach's text with notes (1840, 5th ed., 1862), a revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Testament (1865, 3 vols.), and History of the Hebrew Nation and Literature (1869, 4th ed., 1892). These works, and others of less importance, abundantly attest the industry and learning of their author. See his biography by P. W. Clydem, London, 1883.

SHECHEM (shoulder), a town nineteen hundred and fifty feet above sea-level, thirty-four miles north of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. xvii. 7), later in Samaria. It lies in the narrow valley between Mounts Ebal on the north, and Gerizim on the south; called also Sichem (Gen. xii. 6), Sychem (Acts vii. 18), and Sychar (John iv. 5). It was destroyed in the Jewish war, but rebuilt, and, in honor of the Emperor Vespasian, called Flavia Neapolis (new city). Hence in early Christian times it was called Neapolis only, as in the Talmud. From this name comes its present one, Nablus or Nablusus. Shechem, under its various designations, is mentioned forty-eight times in the Bible, first in connection with Abraham, who halted there (Gen. xii. 6). There occurred the massacre of all its males by Simeon and Levi, in revenge for Shechem's insult to their sister Dinah (Gen. xxxiv.). There the Israelites solemnly erected the Temple. Gerizim, on the south of Gerizim, was the site of Shechem's altar. Joseph was buried (Josh. xxiv.). Abimelech set up an independent kingdom there, but after three years was expelled, and the city was destroyed, and sown with salt (Judg. ix.). Jeroboam made the rebuilt city the capital of the northern kingdom (1 Kings xii. 1-19, 25). After the captivity, Shechem became the centre of the Samaritan worship. There Jesus first definitely announced himself the Messiah (John iv. 5, 26). Neapolis became the seat of a bishopric, and there Justin Martyr was born. It was captured by the crusaders, and Baldwin II. held a great diet there (1120). It has repeatedly suffered from earthquakes, particularly in 1292 and 1837. It was destroyed by Ibrahim Pacha in 1584; but its natural advantages, being in the midst of a most fertile country, have always caused its speedy resurrection.

The present town numbers thirteen hundred inhabitants, among whom are a hundred and thirty Samaritans, six hundred Greek Christians, and a few Jews, Latins, and Protestants. It is abundantly supplied with water, there being no less than eighty springs and fountains in its immediate neighborhood, and presents a picture of great beauty. Its principal buildings are the great mosque Jama el-Kebir, which is the Church of St. John, built by the crusaders (1187), and the little Samaritan synagogue (Keniset es-Simri) in which is the famous Samaritan Codex of the Pentateuch. SHECH'NAN (residence, i.e., of God, his visible presence). It is the most biblical Chaldee, but adopted into Christian common use from the later Jews. The idea is, however, found in the Bible expression "the glory of the Lord." This "glory," the Jews say, was wanting in the second temple.

SHEM HAMMEPHORASH (Heb., peculiar name, i.e., Jehovah), a cabalistic word among the rabbinical Jews; the representative of a wonderful combination of twelve, forty-two, or seventy-two letters, whose pronunciation has astonishing results. Absurd stories are told by the rabbins respecting it,—how Moses spent forty days on Mount Sinai in learning it from the preternatural -how its right utterance would enable the speaker to create a world; how Jesus wrought his miracles by its use; how two letters of it inscribed on a tablet, and cast into the sea, raised the storm which destroyed the fleet of Charles V. (1542). See Baring-Gould: Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, p. 291.

SHE'OL, the Hebrew word (the equivalent of the Greek Hades) for the under-world, the place of the shades. It comes from a word meaning "to penetrate," "to go down deep;" hence Sheol is literally what is sunk deep, bent in. The Hebrews thought that the dead went down into deep fosses. See Hades, and Hebrew lexicon under נקק.

SHEPARD, Thomas, Puritan, b. at Towcester, near Northampton, Eng., Nov. 5, 1606; d. at Cambridge, Mass., Aug 25, 1649. He was graduated M.A. at Emmanuel College, Oxford, 1627; "lecturer" at Earl's Coli three years and a half; became a preacher; was silenced for nonconformity by Laud, Dec. 16, 1630; employed as chaplain to Sir Richard Darly, Butcherbank, Yorkshire, for a year; pastor at Heddon, Northumberland, another year; sailed for America, November 1634, but was compelled by a storm to put back, had to hide himself lest he should be taken, but finally got off, July, 1635, and landed on Oct. 3 at Boston, and became minister to the church at Cambridge in February, 1636. He played a prominent part in the synod at Cambridge which ended the Antinomian controversy. He "was characterized by great humility, spirituality, soundness in the faith, and decision." In learning, piety, and spiritual insight he takes a first rank among Puritan divines; especially is he held in perpetual remembrance by that "rich fund of experimental and practical divinity," his treatise, The parable of the ten virgins opened and applied, first published by Jonathan Mitchell, from the author's notes, Boston, 1650, 2d ed., 1660; reprinted in London, 1695, in Aberdeen, 1838, and again, 1858, with biographical preface by James Foote. In all he is said to have written 382 books and pamphlets. Among them may be mentioned New Englands lamentation for Old Englands present errors and decisions, Boston, 1644, 2d ed., 1645; Certain select cases resolved, 1648; The clear sunshine of the Gospel breaking forth upon the Indians in New England, 1648; reprinted, New York, 1805; These saucatious, 1649, 2d ed., 1655. A collective edition of his works, with memoir, was published, Boston, 1853, 3 vols. His Autobiography was published in Alexander Young's Chronicles of the First Planters of Massachusetts Bay, Bost., 1846. See Cotton Mather: Magnalia (ed. SHEPHERD, Thomas, b. 1665; d. at Booking in Essex, Jan. 29, 1739; a seceder from the Church of England; published sundry sermons, and thirty Penitential Cries (1692), which were used at London with John Mason's Bank of Princes, and with them reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1859. F. M. Bird.

SHERLOCK. There are four literary divines of this name, who require different degrees of notice.—I. Richard Sherlock, b. at Oxton in Cheshire, 1613, and educated at Oxford and Dublin; became rector of Winwick; and d. in 1659. He fell into controversy with the Friends, and wrote an Answer to the Quakers objections to Ministers (1656), and the same year, Quakers wild objections answered. The practical Christian (1673), by the same author, was valued by Wilson, bishop of Sodor and Man, who enlarged and corrected and republished it in 1713.—II. William Sherlock, b. in London, about 1614; d. at Hampstead, June 19, 1707; educated at Cambridge University, where he went in 1637; and was successively rector of St. George's, Botolph Lane, London, prebendary of Christ's College, Master of the Temple, and bishop of Norwich, 1719; and bishop of Bath and Wells, 1727. In 1725 he published in London, 1678; was graduated M.A. at Cambridge, 1701; became master of the Temple, 1704; prebendary of St. Paul's, 1713; master of Catherine Hall (where he had been fellow), 1714; dean of Chichester, 1715; prebendary of Norwich, 1719; and master of the Temple, 1727. By posterity. His principal works were, Discourses in the Temple Church, Discourses on Prophecy, and the Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus. This last, published in 1729, is the best known, and for a long time held a distinguished place in the literature of Christian evidence.—IV. Martin Sherlock, an Irish divine of no great reputation, wrote Counsel to a Young Poet (1779), in Italian. Horace Walpole said that his Italian was ten times worse than his French, in which language he published, the same year, Letters of an English Traveller. F. M. Bird.

SHI'NAR (Heb. 'UJU; LXIX., Zeveoép; almost certainly, Assyro-Babylonish Sumér, of Akkadian-Shumerian origin, written in the probable form Sunér), the name of a country or district, is found in the following passages of the Bible: Gen. x. 10, xi. 2, xiv. 1; Isa. xi. 11; Dan. i. 2; Zech. v. 11. In Gen. x. 10 it seems to be a general name for Babylonia; for it includes, besides...
Babylon, cities lying as far apart as Erech (Babyl., Uruk; modern Warka), lat. about 31° 40' N., and Accad (Agade, part of Sippara; see SEPHERVAYIM), lat. about 33° 44' N. The same meaning is suitable for Gen. xi. 2, Isa. xi. 11, Dan. i. 2, Zech. v. 11. The language of Gen. xiv. 1, which speaks of Elasar (Larsa; modern Senkerah), in nearly the same latitude with Erech, but farther east, as if it were not in Shinar, admits of explanation. It may be that "Arioch, king of Elasar," (Babyl., Eriaku, king of Larsa?) was tributary to "Amraphel, king of Shinar:" in that case there is really no opposition here to what was said above.

In the form Sumér (Shumér) the name occurs very frequently in the Assyrian inscriptions, but is there applied only to a part of Babylonia. "Sumér and Akkad" is a frequent designation of the entire region extending between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris (occasionally overstepping these limits), from Mesopotamia to the Persian Gulf. "Akkad" was a name for the northern part of this region; "Shumér," probably, for the southern part. The northern boundary of Akkad is not exactly fixed with precision, but it probably lay at lat. 34° N., between the points where the Lower Zab and the Tigris flowed into the Tigris. Neither can we draw an exact line between Akkad and Shumer; but the inscriptions represent Erech as in Akkad, and Ur (modern Mugheir, probably Ur Casdim of Genesis), lat. about 30° 54' N., as outside of it. If, then, the Hebrews came from the district of Shumér, it is not strange that they should use this name in a general sense for Babylonia, especially in view of the wide sovereignty exercised by the kings of Shumér, which seems implied in Gen. xiv. 1. It is believed that Maluqeq and Magon are other designations of Akkad and Shumér respectively.

The significance of these divisions dates from a time when both Shumer and Akkad were inhabited by a highly cultivated, non-Semitic people, to whom the Semitic Babylonians and Assyrians were indebted for the larger part of their civilization. These non-Semitic influences have been confined to the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris. It was this people who invented the system of cuneiform characters: they had literature, art, and science. (Cf. CUNEIFORM INScriptions.) It is quite likely that their earliest settlements were in Shumér: and Ur, Eridu, and the city whose names have been found at Tell Lob, must have been centres of political and religious influence at a very ancient time; no dates, however, can be now given with confidence. It is certain that the later Babylonian tradition attributed a high antiquity (about B.C. 4000) to the Semitic civilization of Akkad, and the non-Semitic culture must have been much earlier than the Semitic; but it is not wise to repose full confidence in this tradition. See SEPHERVAYIM.

The distinction between Akkad and Shumér appears to have been not merely geographical, but also linguistic: the language used in one had certain characteristics peculiarities, which were not found in the other. These peculiarities are few, and of limited application: they are such as the appearance of m or n in the dialect, for g in the normal language, and of e in the former, for u in the latter. The number of texts composed in the dialect is, as far as is now known, comparatively small. It is still disputed, whether the name "Akkadian" belongs to the normal language, and "Shumerian" to the dialect, or the reverse; i.e., which of the two was the language of Northern Babylonia, and which of Southern Babylonia. In favor of the view that the normal language was that of Akkad, and the dialect peculiar to Shumér, it is claimed, that, while the dialect is sometimes called émé-sal ("women's language") the reason for this name is in doubt, it is also called émé ku ("language of the master"); and, since "Land émé ku" is a name for Shumér, the desired inference is plain. Akkad is called, on the other hand, "Land émé lú" ("land of slaves' language"). It is further claimed that the name Shumér itself, and the name Kingé, another designation of the same district, show characteristics of the dialect; that Tiirst and Kadingirra, on the other hand, names of Babylon, which was in Northern Babylonia, belong by their form to the normal language; that one inscription which contains dialectic peculiarities contains the colophon "Tablet of Shumér;" another argument is drawn from the fact that many loan-words in the Shumérian language were borrowed from the normal language, it being held that Semitic contact with the pre-Semitic civilization must have been chiefly in Akkad, etc.

To these arguments it is replied, that the émé sal is identical, not with the émé ku, but with the émé lú, that the dialect belongs therefore to Akkad; that Shumér was a North Babylonian form of the normal Shumér, this latter lying at the foundation of the Hebrew יִשְׂרָאֵל, Shinar, and that Kingé is not a dialectic form at all; that Kadingirra may have been pronounced Kadumirra (dialectic form); and that Tiirst, although the normal form, may simply indicate that people from Shumér founded the city, and is therefore consistent with the view that the normal language belonged to Shumér; that in the inscription with the colophon "Tablet of Shumér," the dialectic peculiarities occur only in citations, the body of the text being neither Akkadian nor Shumerian, but pure Semitic; that Akkadian was probably a mixture of Shumérian, and another Semitic language, and those such as belong to the common speech of everyday life, are derived from the dialectic, and not from the normal language. It is further urged, on this side, that the names of places mentioned in the texts of the dialect denote cities in Northern Babylonia, or Akkad, and that the converse, though the instances are fewer, is also true; i.e., that Shumerian cities are mentioned in texts of the normal language; that the sea (Persian Gulf) is mentioned frequently, and as something familiar, in the texts of the normal language; that texts of the old Shumerian king Guda, discovered at Tel Lob, show no dialectic peculiarities; that the Hebrews coming from Ur (in Southern Babylonia) carried the name יִשְׂרָאֵל with them; this name corresponding to the normal, not the dialectic, form of the word (see above), etc. The problem cannot yet be regarded as fully solved: but the weight of evidence seems to favor this view (see above), for it may be concluded that the normal language is entitled to the name Shumerian, and the dialect to the name Akkadian. The comparative age of the normal language and the dialect is also in dispute, with arguments too technical to be given here. Fur-the doctrine of Nirvana fails to satisfy this want that the fiction of the 'peaceful Land in the West' was framed. A Buddha was imagined distinct from the Buddha of history, Gautama, or Shakymuni. He was called Amitābha, 'boundless age.' See BUDDHISM.

SHINTO§Sinloism) is the cult of the primitive Japanese. Japan is now classified among Buddhist countries; since the vast majority of her thirty-three millions of people worship according to the doctrines, greatly modified, of Shakya Muni. (See SHIN-SHU.) Since 552 A.D., when the first images and sutras were imported from Corea by missionaries of the India faith, Buddhism has been steadily propagated in Japan. Conquest was not made in a day or century, but it required fully a thousand years to convert the Japanese from their indigenous faith. Nor was the victory secured by overthrow or extirpation of the primitive belief, but rather by absorption of it. This will account partly for the fact that Japanese Buddhism, so different from that of Siam or China, is distinct by itself. By its corrupting or over-laying Shintō, several sects or systems now repudiated by pure Shintoists were formed, such as Rōbu ("twofold," i.e., of Shintō and Buddhism mixed), Yuiitsu (Buddhism with a Shinto basis), Déguchi (Shintō explained by the Chinese Book of Changes), and Suiga, a combination of Déguchi and the tenets of the Chinese rationalist Chiū-hi, whose system of thought has, since the seventeenth century, prevailed among the educated classes in Japan. To describe these later developments, we shall outline the characteristics of pure Shintō, which is interesting as "a natural religion in a very early stage of development, which perhaps originated quite independently of any natural religion known to us;" that is, "neither by revelation, nor by introduction from without." The native term Kami no michi ("way or doctrine of the gods") is rendered by two Chinese characters, Shin ("god") and iō ("way"), equivalent to bogisyog. Its scriptures are the Kojiki ("Record of Antiquities"), a collection oforal traditions reduced to writing A.D. 712, in pure Japanese, uncensored by any but native ideas; the Nihongi ("Chronicles of Japan"), composed 720 A.D., containing, in the main, similar narratives to those in the Kojiki, but cast in the mould of Chinese philosophical thought and expression; and the Engishiki ("Book of Ceremonial Law"), promulgated in A.D. 927, in which are found many of the dreams and visions of the deities, as well as many instances of Shinto magic. According to the sacred books, the universe comes into existence prior to the gods who after ward populated it. "Of old, when heaven and earth were not yet separated, chaos, enveloping all things like a fowl's egg, contained within it a germ. The clear and ethereal substance, expanding, became heaven: the heavy and thick, precipitating, became earth. Subsequently deity was born. The first kami sprouted upward like a rush. After successive evolution of several pairs of gods in imperfection, sex or differentiation was reached by the perfect manifestation of the creative principle in Izanagi and Izanami, who proceeded to make and furnish the earth. Standing in the floating region of heaven, Izanagi plunged his jewelled spear into the plain of the green sea beneath, and, stirring it round, withdrew the point, from which the drops, trickling, consolidated, and formed an island, to which the creator and creatrix descended to make other islands, and populate and furnish them with kami (gods), rocks, trees, sea-fowl, and animals. Gradually the earth and sun separated; though, before they did so, the brilliant daughter of the first pair ascended to reign over the luminary of day, while a less fortunate son became ruler of the moon. Japanese mythology is full of the adventures of Izanagi and Izanami, not only on earth, but in the nether world. With the reign of Amaterasu, the sun-goddess in heaven, a new epoch begins. This heaven-illuminator, dissatisfied with the anarchy that reigned among the earthly kami, or gods, sent her agents to earth to restore order, and abolish feuds. None was able to do this work, until she despatched her grandson, Ninigi no Mikoto, who descended to the earth; and, after a series of violent struggles between the heavenly and the earthly powers, the grandson of Ninigi no Mikoto established his throne near Kioto, and became the first emperor of Japan. The mikado is thus the personal centre of Shinto, and the vicar of the heavenly gods on earth, the pope, who claims both spiritual and temporal power over his subjects. In the primitive government of Japan the Jin-gi Kuan, or Council of the Gods of Heaven and Earth, was the highest lawgiver next to the mikado. In the Japanese scriptures the earth is Japan, and the mikado's palace the most sacred of all places. The nobility claim their descent from inferior deities; the mikado, directly from the sun-goddess. The common people are the progeny of the earthly kami, though all claim Izanagi and Izanami as their creators.

In its essence, Shintō is ancestor-worship. In the earlier mythology the kami seem to be but the deified forces of nature, but the later traditions and the liturgy show that the gods addressed are hero-ancestors. After the division of the country by its first conquerors into feudal divisions, the chieftain and his kin, selecting one of the "heavenly gods," made him, as their ancestor, their tutelary deity, and erected a shrine to his honor. A remarkable fact in Shintō is that the mino, or temples, are austerely simple, containing no idols, rings, or sacred images, except theurnal offerings, or their permanent substitude. The goheki, which are strips of notched paper suspended from unpainted wands; nor can this absence of effigies of the gods worshipped be explained by the rudimentary condition of art in early Japan, since figures, in terra cotta or carved wood, of men, horses, and birds, were known and employed in the interment of the dead, —a merciful substitute for the human beings anciently buried alive with their departed master. Living animals were dedicated to the gods, but were not slaughtered. In front of the shrine was the bird-rest (torii), on which the cocks perched to give notice of dawn and the time for morning-prayers. This "sacred gateway," now so called, is still a striking feature in the landscape of Japan. Prayers were offered for protection, health, freedom from evil, for offspring, and for harvests; and thanksgivings were especially profuse at festival time, when offerings of silk, cloth, rice, weapons, horses, and equipments, were made. The root idea of sin was pollution, and, of righteousness, purity. Actions were good or bad according as they were concerned with purification or defilement. Lustrations, vegetative, were frequent; and twice a year the festival of general purification took place, both at the imperial palace and at each one of the chief local shrines. Polluted persons were washed in the waters of running streams, and their clothing was destroyed. Later, paper figures representing the people, and an iron image of the mikado, dressed so as to do vicarious duty for his clothes, were cast into the river, which was supposed to deposit the offences in the nether world beneath the sea. "And when they have thus been got rid of, there shall from this day onwards be no offence that is called offence with regard to the men of the offices who serve in the court of the Sovereign, nor in the four quarters of the region under heaven." All offences were divided into "earthly" and "heavenly," —a division which is based either on mythical incident, according to which the wicked brother of the sun-goddess committed a series of destructive and defiling tricks upon his sister and her companions, house, looms, and rice-fields, or, as a writer (Ernest Satow) in the Westminster Review suggests, upon the division of the early inhabitants of Japan into agriculturists (the invaders or conquerors) and hunters and fishermen (the aborigines). Between these two classes there would at first be continual trouble. "The so-called heavenly offences are chiefly such as would be possible only in an agricultural community, or to agriculturists living in a population of hunters and fishermen." It is nearly certain that the invaders of primitive Japan were warriors from Corea or the Asian mainland, who, after coming across the sea, gave out that their ancestors had come down from heaven. They were thus the descendants of the heavenly gods, while the aborigines whom they conquered were but the progeny of the earthly kami, or gods. It was by this combination of superior theology with superior weapons and prowess, that the overseas invaders finally secured supremacy. In the first rude ages, when government was partly patriarchal and partly feudal, private property was scarcely known; and hence trespass and defilement, revenge and avarice, were no part of the offences common than the sins usually catalogued in codes of more complex or modern society. Left by itself, however, Shintō might have developed codes of ethics, systems of dogma, and even a body of criminal and civil law, had not the more perfect materialistic ethics of Confucius, and the more sensuous ritual of Buddhism, by their overwhelming superiority, paralyzed all further growth of the original cultus: still there might have been a reaction, and the old faith have re-assumed its power, had not an Euhemerus appeared, who resolved Japanese mythology into Buddhist history.

A learned priest named Kukai (A.D. 774–855), called. Baptized with Buddhist names, were henceforth worshipped according to the new and more sensuous ritual. Under this new teaching, Shintō as it was sunk out of popular sight, and its remembrance was carried on by obscure scholars. After the long wars of the middle ages, and the establishment of profound peace by Ieyasu and the Tokugawa rulers, a school of writers arose in the eighteenth century whose enthusiasm led them to recover, decipher, and edit the scriptures of Shintō, and to enrich the native literature by a very creditable body of antiquarian and polemical writings, which helped greatly to prepare the way for the revolutions of 1868 and later, which have so surprised the world. Yet after the restoration of monarchy in Tōkō, and the temporary revival of Shintō as manifested in propaganda, and purging of some old temples, the Jin-gi kuan, instead of being restored to ancient power, was degraded to a department, and finally abolished. The shrines and priests (of the latter, in 1880, 14,215) are now maintained partly by government appropriations, and partly by popular subscriptions. Shintō is still a living power among millions of the people, who oppose Christianity with patriotic animus rather than with martyr's convictions. It is also the source of occasional polemic literature. Japanese Christians, in whom the sense of patriotism is very strong, hold to the narratives of the Kojiki in a rationalizing way, explaining the occurrences by popular tales, historical or decay, or according to similar reasoning. Mr. Takahashi Gorō, a Christian writer, in his Shintō Discussed A fresh, follows this plan. Two English scholars, Mr. Ernest Satow and Mr. Basil Hall Chamberlain (to whose labors the writer of this article is greatly indebted), are now engaged in translating portions of the original literature of Shintō, as seen below.

SHOWBREAD is the rendering of the Hebrew lechem hap-panim (lit., "bread of the face," because placed before the face of Jehovah): it is also called "bread of the ordering" (1 Chron. ix. 32, xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. xiii. 11; Neh. x. 33); once it is called the "continual bread" (Num. iv. 7), and "holy bread" (1 Sam. xxi. 5). According to the number of the twelve tribes of Israel, twelve loaves were placed on the table, which stood within the holy place, near the curtain of the Holy of Holies. The loaves, which, according to Jewish tradition, were unleavened, were placed in two rows, of six loaves each. An addition to the showbread was the frankincense (Lev. xxiv. 7). It was to be "on the bread for a memorial, an offering, made by fire unto the Lord," the two golden pots containing it being (according to Josephus: Ant., III. 10, 7) taken out along with the bread, and the frankincense burned on the altar of burnt offering before the bread was given to the priests to be eaten. On each sabbath this took place; twelve new loaves, which had been prepared the evening before, were placed on the table; the frankincense, (1 Chron. ix. 32), being made every returning sabbath to replace the old, and fresh frankincense put in the golden vessels in the room of that which had been burned (Lev. xxiv. 8, 9).

The signification of the showbread is expressed in the words "from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant: they are a sign of covenant made by Israel,—a sign whereby they continually prove their connection with the Lord. The loaves are a symbol and type of the spiritual bread, which the people of God presents as a visible, practical proof before the Lord, an emblem of Israel's spiritual inheritance in the kingdom of God. That the priests alone were permitted to eat them, and this only within the sanctuary, would indicate, Be diligent in good works, and you shall live in the house of God as a priestly people, and shall receive from his communion such blessings as that burnt incense which was burned on the altar of burnt offering before the bread was eaten was an offering made unto the Lord, whereby Israel was symbolically reminded, and at the same time con-
SHOWBREAD.

Table of the. According to the description given in Exod. xxv. 29-30 this table was two cubits long, a cubit in breadth, and a cubit and a half in height, made of shittimwood, overlaid with pure gold, and having a golden crown to the border thereof round about. This table, which is called “the table of the face” (Num. iv. 7) and “the pure table” (Lev. xxiv. 6; 2 Chron. xiii. 11), stood on the north side of the sanctuary, and was adorned with dishes, spoons, bowls, etc., which were of pure gold (Exod. xxv. 29). When it was transported, it was covered, with every thing that was thereon, with a cloth of blue (Num. iv. 7). In 2 Chron. iv. 10 we have mention of “the tables whereon the showbread was set,” and at verse 8 we read of Solomon making ten tables. This is probably explained by the statement of Josephus (Ant., VIII. 3, 7), that the king made a number of tables, and one great golden one on which they placed the showbread. The table of the second temple was made by Antiochus Euphrates (1 Macc. i. 22), and a new one made (1 Macc. iv. 49). Since the table was made only for the person, Shrines were often made of the most splendid and costly materials, and enriched with jewels. The movable shrines were carried in processions in days of great festivity to confess sin: hence Shrove-tide, the day before Ash-Wednesday, which was spent merry-making, and so, in England, came to be called “Pancake-Tuesday,” from the fritters and pancakes eaten on that day.

SHUBBLE, William. b. at Sheerness, Kent, Nov. 21, 1730; d. at Highbury, Aug. 25, 1829; a devout and active layman; was an officer of the Bank of England, of the London Missionary Society, and of the Religious Tract Society. He wrote two much used missionary hymns (1795), and that beginning “When streaming from the eastern skies” (1810), often attributed to Sir Robert Grant. F. M. BIRD.

SHUCKFORD, Samuel, D.D., Church of England; d. in London, July 14, 1754. He was graduated M. A. at Caius College, Cambridge (1720); was successively curate of Shelton, Norfolk, prebendary of Canterbury (1738), and rector of All-hallows, Lombard Street, London. He is the author of the famous Connection, intended to supplement Prideaux’s work, but only finished to the death of Joshua. The full title is, The sacred and profane history of the world connected with the creation of the world to the dissolution of the Assyrian Empire at the death of Sardanapalus, and to the des- cension of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel under the reigns of Ahaz and Pekah, London, 1727, 4 vols., 3d ed., 1743; rev. ed. by J. Talboys Wheeler, 1858, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1865.

SHU'SHAN (Heb., שושן; LXX., Σοσσαν, Susius, Susias, Susias, Σοσσας, Σοσίας; Elamit., Susiān, Assyr., Susān, etymology unknown), generally known as Susa, the capital of Elam or Susiana, is mentioned in the Bible as follows: Neh. i. 1; Esth. i. 2, 5, ii. 3, 5, 8, iii. 15 (l.), iv. 16, viii. 14, 15, ix. 9, 11—15, 18; Dan. viii. 2; cf. “Shushanites,” i.e., “men of Shushan” (Est. iv. 9). It was situated on the river Eulaeus (so Dan. viii. 2, and Assyr. inscriptions and sculptures), which formerly emptied into the Persian Gulf, and must, at all events in its lower part, have been identical with the Pacteiris and the modern river Karun. The ruins of the place are considerable, and the mounds of Shush near about 32° 10' N.; long about 49° 48' E. from Greenwich: but these mounds lie forty miles distant from the present course of the Karun at its nearest point, and this might at first seem to favor the statement of some classical writers, that Susa was on (or near) the Choo- ses (modern Khorab), which flows to the west of Shush. Loftus, however, who visited the spot, was told that the Khorab was once connected with the Karun, and found the ancient river-bed, through which the water must have flowed, about two miles east of Shush. It is, then, quite possible that this was regarded as the Eulaeus, which in its lower part was certainly the same with the Karun, and which, it is thus natural to suppose, may sometimes in its upper part have passed under the name of the Chooeses.

Elam was repeatedly invaded by the Assyrians in their campaigns; but Susa is not mentioned until the time of Asurbanipal, the last Assyrian king (B.C. 688—629), who captured it about B.C. 655. After the fall of Assyria and Babylon, and the accession of the Achemenid kings, Susa became the winter and spring residence of these monarchs, and was greatly improved and adorned by them. According to the Book of Esther, there were great numbers of Jews in it. Alexander found great wealth there, and even after his time it preserved a reputation for riches. Under the Parthian Arsacide (B.C. 250—A.D. 226) it continued to be a chief city, but thereafter declined; and after its capture by the Mohammedans, A.D. 640, it is heard of only from time to time, e.g., in the eighth and twelfth centuries. Its site has been even yet but very imperfectly explored, owing to the extreme difficulties which attend excavations, arising in large part from the bigotry and fierceness of the present inhabitants of the region.

SIBYLLINE BOOKS. The sibyl is "the half divine prophetess of the arrangements and decisions of the gods in reference to the fate of cities and countries" (Lücke: Versuch einer vollständ Einleitung in die Offenb. Joh., 1852, pp. 66 sqq.). Etymologically it is probably the same as ἱεροφών, the Eolic form for ἱερόφαν. Hieronymus (Adv. Jov. i. 14) derives it from θεόφων. Earlier classical writers recognize but one sibyl, who was first localized at Erythrae, or Cumae: later many sibyls are spoken of. (Cf. Suidas' Lexicon, s. v., and the classical dictionaries, especially Lücker, 6th ed., p. 927.) The idea thus originated among the heathens. When, after the conquests of Alexander, the period of religious syncretism was introduced, and the Jews of the dispersion became acquainted with the pseudo-prophetess of the Gentiles, they made use of her influence to make their peculiarities of religion and life palatable to the Greeks. Still more did the early Christians endeavor to make propagandas of their views in this manner; so that there were Gentile, Jewish, and Christian sibylline oracles. In the earlier centuries they enjoyed a high authority in the church, being quoted as evidences of the truth of Christianity by such apologists as Athenagoras, Justinus, Theophilus, Clemens Alexandria, and especially Lactantius. (Cf. Besançon: De l'emploi que les Pères de l'église ont fait des oracles sibyllins, Paris, 1851.) These different oracles, as many as have been preserved, originating at different places, in different times, and by authors of various tendencies, are now united in twelve books and some fragments, written in Homeric hexameters and language. In former times but eight books were known, which were published first by Xystus Betuloejus, Basel, 1645. Angelo Mai in 1817 discovered the twelfth book, and in 1828 the ninth to twelfth books. C. Alexandre (1844–56) published the first complete edition in Paris (2d ed., 1867), and Friedlieb, in 1852, published a critical edition, together with a metrical translation into German. The contents are most varied. After two fragments of a general character, book i. (985 lines) exults in the destruction of all the wicked; book ii. (190 lines) contains three sections of prophecies concerning the good and the evil; book iv. (190 lines), prophecies of various kinds and the tenth generation; book v. (531 lines), the fate of various nations and the better future for the Jews; book vi. (25 lines), Christian prophecy concerning the Messiah; book vii. (162 lines), the Messiah and his time, and an expansion upon the first chapter of second Corinthians (ed. by T. Manton, 1655). See his Complete Works, with memoir by A. B. Grosart, Edinb., 1863, 7 vols.

SIBEL, Caspar, b. near Elberfeld, June 9, 1560; d. at Deventer, Jan. 1, 1568. He was educated at Herborn; studied theology at Leyden; and was appointed pastor at Randerath in 1609, at Juliers in 1611, and at Deventer in 1617. He was a very prolific writer, and left a number of sermons, homilies, catechetical and devotional works, besides an autobiography (unfinished). Of his Opera Theologica, a collected edition appeared at Deventer in 1644, and the Jews of the dispersion became acquainted but one sibyl, who was first localized at Erythrae, or Cumae: later many sibyls are spoken of. (Cf. Suidas' Lexicon, s. v., and the classical dictionaries, especially Lücker, 6th ed., p. 927.) The idea thus originated among the heathens. CYRUS, and the view that of 775 should be 765 (cf. SCHURER: N. T. Zygocki., p. 567), these two passages are not messianic. But the whole section (623-739) is messianic. God will send a king from the rising of the sun (ἦν ἐν οὐρανῷ), who will put an end to all war on earth. The Gentile rulers will rise up against him, and the temple may be destroyed, but they will be destroyed around Jerusalem. God will then establish an eternal kingdom over all nations. Peace will reign over the whole earth, and the laws of God will be recognized and obeyed everywhere. The main stress lies on the establishment of this everlasting kingdom, the person of the Messiah as the medium of its establishment being of minor importance. The later and younger section (lines 36-72) finds its historical background in the career of Anthony and Cleopatra in Egypt. Vv. 40-50 read, "But when Rome will rule also over Egypt, then the greatest of kingsdoms, that of the immortall king, will appear among men, and there will come a holy king (ἅγιος ὁ βασιλεύς), who will rule all the lands of the earth for all times as long as time continues." This king is naturally God or the Messiah. Cf., in addition to the works mentioned, HILGENFELD: Die jüd. Apokalypse in ihrer geschichte. Entstehung, 1857, pp. 51-90; Ztschrift f. weiss. SICARIi (assassins), a set of Jewish fanatics which did much to hasten the war which terminated so disastrously, and on the downfall of Masada went to Egypt, where they continued to resist the Roman power (Josephus: Antiq., XX. 8, 5, 6; H. H. IV. VII. 10, 1). See JUDAS or GALLILEE, ZELATOT.

SICKINGEN, Franz von, b. in the castle of Ebernburg, near Kreuznach, May 1, 1481; d. in the castle of Landsthal, near Zweibrücken, May 7, 1523; one of the heroes of feudalism, always at war with the powerful and arrogant, always defending the suppressed and meek, but specially famous for the great services he rendered to the Reformation. He enjoyed the confidence of Maximilian, and, in the beginning, also that of Charles V.; but in 1522, when he attacked the Archbishop of Treves, he openly declared in favor of the Lutheraus. The undertaking proved too great for his means; and he was, in his turn, besieged in his own castle by the archbishop, and compelled to surrender the day before his death. Reuchlin, Ulrich von Hutten, Butzer, Ecolampadius, and numerous others, found at various times a refuge at Ebernburg; and his castles were justly styled the "Asylm of the German nation." His life was written by F. MÜNCH, Stuttgart, 1827, 2 vols. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SIDNEY, Sir Philip, b. at Penshurst in Kent, Nov. 9, 1554; d. at Arnhem in the Netherlands, Oct. 7, 1580; was educated at Shrewsbury, Oxford, and Cambridgewent abroad in 1572, and narrowly escaped the Massacre of St. Bartholomew; became a courtier and diplomatist; was married and knighted, 1583; wished to join Drake's second expedition in 1585, but was forbidden by Elizabeth, who feared to lose the jewel of her court, the "Beau of the Country." He was governor of Flushing, and general of horse; and was mortally wounded at Zutphen, Sept. 22, 1586, marking the event by an illustrious act of humane magnanimity. This model gentleman did not omit religion from the list of his accomplishments, as may be seen by his noble sonnet, "Leave me, O love which reachest but to dust," and by the version of Psalms made in conjunction with his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. His poetic talent, if not lofty, was more than respectable. His Works appeared in 3 vols., 1728, 1739, etc. His Poems were edited by Mr. Grosart in 1878. His Arcadia and Defence of Poets, once popular, are still famous. F. M. BIRD.

SIDONIUS, Michael, b. at Easington in Baden, 1506; d. in Vienna, Sept. 30, 1561. He studied theology at Tubingen, entered the service of the Archbishop of Mayence, and was by Paul II. made bishop of Sidon in partibus infidelium, whence his surname Sidonius: his family name was Helding. He represented for some time the Archbishop of Mayence at the Council of Trent, and the emperor in the negotiations of Ulm. By the latter he was made bishop of Merseburg in 1550, and in the collogy of Worma (1557) he took a prominent part. He was very active, though without exercising any influence, and the mediating position he tried to occupy between Romanism and the Reformation he had not strength enough to vindicate. He wrote the Catechismus Magnutinus. NEUDECKER.

SIENA, Council of. The Council of Constance ended in a general confession of incompetence to deal with the question of the reformation of the church. It strove to keep the matter open, by providing for the recurrence of general councils, and fixed Pavia for the meeting-place of the next, in five years' time. Accordingly, in 1423, Martin V summoned a council at Siena; but scarcely had it met, when the outbreak of a plague gave the Pope a pretext for transferring it to Siena, where it would be nearer Rome, and more under the Pope's influence. On July 2, 1428, the council assembled at Siena. It was scantily attended; for European politics were disturbed, and few hoped that anything would be done by a council held in Italy. The council began by a contest with Martin V. about the wording of his safe conduct, and negotiated with the citizens for greater security. Martin V. complained of this conduct as seditious, and the Papal party used personal pressure to intimidate the Reformers. The council agreed in condemning the heresies of Wiclif and Hus, and approving of negotiations for union with the Greek Church. The French then pressed for a consideration of the reforms projected at Constance. The Papal party made advantage of the small numbers present to throw the machinery of the council, which was organized by nations, into confusion. They contrived to have a disputed election to the office of president in the French nation, and urged the appointment of deputies to Fix the meeting-place of the next council. This question awakened national animosities, as the French wished to secure the choice of some place in France. Finally, on Feb. 10, 1429, Basel was chosen as the meeting-place of the next council, to be held in seven years. After this, the dissolution of the council was felt to be imminent. The citizens of Siena vainly offered their aid to any who would stay, and brave the Pope. The council slowly dwindled, till on March 7 the Papal legates, taking advantage of the solitude produced by the festivities of the Carnival, posted on the door of the cathedral a decree of its dissolution, and rode away from Siena. A few zealous Reformers still wished to stay; but on March 8 they agreed, that to avoid scandal to the church, and danger to themselves, it was better to disperse quietly. The council came to an end without any results. Really, it followed too soon on the Council of Constance. The position of affairs had not changed since then; the Pope had not recovered his possessions in Italy; those who had been at Constance were not prepared to renew their labors when there was no hope of success. The only achievement of the Council of Siena was that it fixed the meeting-place of the Council of Basel.

Lit. — The chief authority is John of Ragusa: Initium et Praeceptio Basilienses Concilii, in vol. i. of Monumenta Conciliorum Generantium Seculi XV, Vienna, 1857: he is supplemented by the documents in Raynaldus (Annales Ecclesiastici, sub annis 1428—24; latest ed., Bois-le-Duc, 1874) and Manzi (Concilia, Florence, 1757, vol. xxvii.). From the point of view of the Sienese citizens we have the chronicle of Francesco di Tommaso, in Muratori: Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, Milan, 1731, vol. xx. Sieveking, Amalie, a distinguished philanthropist of noble birth; was b. in Hamburg, July 25, 1794; d. in Hamburg, April 1, 1859. Left an orphan at an early age, she took up her home with an elder relative, and began at a tender age works of charity, by instructing a girl living in the house. From this beginning there grew a school, which enjoyed an enviable reputation in Hamburg. Her mind was deeply interested in the organization of a Protestant sisterhood, but was diverted from the realization of her plans, for a time, by the aversion of her relative. At the outbreak of the cholera in 1833 she offered her services to the hospital at Hamburg, and remained in attendance upon the sick for eight weeks, when the plague had abated, winning for herself general esteem by her courage and devotion. The year following, 1832, she realized her design, and formed the female society for the care of the sick and the poor. The society grew rapidly, and became the mother-institution of similar organizations in other parts of Germany. A careful record was kept of each case: those with whom poverty was a chronic disease were not aided. Money was never distributed: orders on the butcher, grocer, etc., were given instead. While the primary object of the society was to alleviate physical ills, it did not overlook the needs of the soul. See Verpflichtungen aus d. Leben von A. Sieveking, in deren Auftrage von einer Freundin derselben verfaßt, etc., Hamburg, 1860.

Siegbert of Gemblours, a distinguished ecclesiastical writer; was b. in Belgium about 1650; was educated at the convent of Gemblours; became monk; in 1648 went to Metz as master of the school at St. Vincent's Convent; returned to Gemblours, 1670, and, after laboring there as teacher for forty years, died Oct. 5, 1112. He was a man of simple piety and integrity, as well as of distinguished scholarship. Although he was himself devoted to the monastic life, he opposed the view that the masses of married priests were invalid, and wrote against Gregory's celebrated letter to Hermann of Metz, claiming for the Pope the right to pronounce the ban upon the emperor. Siegbert gives a list of his writings in his book De viris illustribus, a work of not much value. His most famous and last work is the Chronicon, which appeared for the first time before 1106, and for the second time, with the author's corrections and additions to 1111. It is a rather dry chronicle, after the model of Eusebius and Bede. It was the author's aim to give a chronological survey of the world's history, and to gather together the legends of the saints. Taking up his work at 381, where Jerome and Prosper had left off, he gives no matter of any value till 1028; but the history from 1024 to 1111 is to be regarded as original and important. Siegbert never wittingly misrepresented facts. For a long time his work was the principal textbook of church history in the convents of Belgium and Northern France. See Monumenta Germ., SS. vi. 268—374, iv. 461—485, etc.; Hirsch: De vita et scriptis Siegeriti, Berol., 1841.

Sigungmund, Johann, Elector of Brandenburg, 1608—19; was educated in the Lutheran faith, but converted to the Reformed, and partook for the first time, together with his brother and the English ambassador, in the Lord's Supper, administered according to the Reformed rule, in the Cathedral of Berlin, on Christmas Day, 1613. Shortly after, he published his confession of faith, which accepted the Heidelberg Catechism and the Confessio Augustana, but rejected the Formula Concordia, and various later Lutheran additions, such as the passion of the divine nature of Christ, and the omnipotence of his human nature, the ubiquity of Christ's body, etc. In a country which was strictly Lutheran, among whose inhabitants it was quite common to call a dog "Calvin," and whose theologians had at their fingers' ends no less than thirty wondrous arguments to prove that the Reformed doctrine was worse than any which could have been invented by the Devil, the step which the elector made was not without danger. Nevertheless, he succeeded in gradually alloying the communion, and placing the Reformed denomination on equal terms in the state with the Lutheran. Before his death, Reformed theologians were appointed professors in the university of Francfort-on-the-Oder. [Reiser: Reformation d. Sigmund, ed. Böhm, Leipzig, 1876.]

married a merchant of Hartford. She began to write verse at seven, and published in 1815 her first collection, Poems, Religious and Elegiac, a selection from former books, appeared in London, 1841, during or after her visit there. In all, she published fifty-nine volumes, largely poetical, and chiefly on sacred or moral themes. She was long counted the father of American female poetry; and many hymns that are popular with her, some of them from Nettleton's Village Hymns (1824), may be found in the various collections; but none is of the first merit or the highest popularity. Her autobiography appeared as Letters of Life in 1866. She was a Baptist.

SIHÖR, i.e., "the dark," is a name common to three rivers. (1) The Nile (Isa. xxiii. 3; Jer. ii. 18), called by Greeks and Romans, "the black," from the black mud which it carries along during the time of the inundation. (2) The river of Egypt (Num. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xiv. 4, 47; 1 Kings viii. 69; 2 Kings xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. vii. 8; Isa. xxvii. 12), the "Shihor which is before Egypt." (Josh. xiii. 5), "Shihor of Egypt" (1 Chron. xii. 5), "the river to the great sea" (Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28), which, formed through the confluence of many wadys, falls into the Mediterranean at the Wady el-Arish, between Pelusium and Gaza. During the summer it is almost dried up. Gesenius (Thesaurus, iii. 1393) thinks that this also refers to the Nile. (3) The Sikor-libnath, i.e., "black of whiteness," mentioned only Josh. xix. 14. During the summer it is almost dried up. Eusebius (Onomasticon) mentions in the difference of opinion which prevailed about it before and afterwards.

SIMI, the Just (Joseph: Antiq., XII. 2, 5), son and successor of the high priest Onias I., grandson of Judas Jaddua. He held his office in the first decades after 300 B.C. In the Talmud he is really glorified. In his person the high priesthood and hierarchical authority were combined. The eulogy in Ecclus. i. 1 sq. refers, according to Hady, John, Winer, to our Simeon.

I. THE NAMES OF SIMEON IN THE FIRST POST-EXILE PERIOD. —1. Simeon the Just (Joseph: Antiq., XII. 2, 5), son and successor of the high priest Onias I., grandson of Judas Jaddua. He held his office in the first decades after 300 B.C. In the Talmud he is greatly glorified. In his person the high priesthood and hierarchical authority were combined. The eulogy in Ecclus. i. 1 sq. refers, according to Hady, John, Winer, to our Simeon.

2. Simeon II., son of Onias II., lived in the time of Ptolemy Philopator (221 B.C.), and is said to have prevented the king from entering the temple and Holy of holies.
II. The Names of Simeon in the Maccabean Period.—1. Simeon, the grandfather of Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 13). 2. Simeon, the Benjamite, a governor of the temple, who informed the Syrians, in the time of Seleucus Philopator (186 B.C.) and Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C., 2 Macc. iii.), concerning the treasures of the temple. Having quarrelled with the high priest, Onias III., he went to the Syrian Antiochus, who informed him of the treasures of the temple, and caused the sending of Heliodor to rob the temple. 3. Simeon, surnamed "Thassi," second son of Mattathias, and last survivor of the Maccabean brothers. He deserved well of his people, which acknowledged his merits by appointing him prince and high priest. The document which mentions this fact throws a remarkable, though a little heeded, light upon the messianic hope of the people during the entire post-prophetic period, when it reads: "And it hath pleased well the Jews and the priests that Simon should be their prince and high priest forever, until there arise a trustworthy prophet" (1 Macc. xiv. 41). In the reserve at the end of the clause the theocratic conscience of the people and priests has evidently reserved the right of the Messiah, but with a disheartened expression; for to say that the advent of the Messiah was near at hand meant at that time to do away with the Maccabean dynasty. In accordance with this supposition of an exclusive opposition between the advent of the Messiah and the political dynasty, the Idumean Herod had all the children killed at Bethlehem. John the Baptist, however, preached the advent of the messianic kingdom mostly under the protection of the Roman Government.

III. The Names of Simon in the Gospel History.—(1) Simon Zelotes, see below; (2) Simon Peter (q.v.); (3) Simon, father of Judas Iscariot (John vi. 71, xii. 4, xiii. 2, 26); (4) Simon the Pharisee, in whose house the penitent woman anointed the head and feet of Jesus (Luke vii. 36 sq.); (5) Simon the leper of Bethany, in whose house Mary of Bethany anointed Jesus (Matt. xxvi. 6 sq.; Mark xiv. 3 sq.; John xii. 1 sq.); (6) Simon of Cyrene (Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxii. 28). Mark describes him as the father of Alexander and Rufus. Besides these names, other Simeons are mentioned: (1) Simeon in the genealogy of Jesus (Luke iii. 30); (2) Old Simeon, who took the child Jesus upon his arms (Luke ii. 25); (3) Simeon usually designated Simon Peter; and (4) a Simeon the father of Gamaliel.

IV. The Names of Simon in the Apostolic History. (1) Simon Nigero (Acts xiii. 1); (2) Simon Magus (q.v.), the counterpart of Simon Peter; (3) Simon, the tanner of Joppa, in whose house Peter tarried many days (Acts ix. 43). The counterpart of Simon, the apostle and brother of the Lord, is Simon of Gerasa, who plays a remarkable part in the Johannine narrative (John xvii. 22; John xiv. 31). It is worthy of notice that the blind Jewish people at Jerusalem rather followed a certain Simon and John in order to be destroyed, than the apostles John and Simon, who offered them the salvation in Christ, and who had to leave the city with the Christians.

V. Simon single (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13), otherwise called "the Canaanite" (Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 18). The term "zelotes," which is peculiar to Luke, is the Greek equivalent for the Hebrew term, present in Matthew and Mark. As the surnames of the apostles express their characteristics, we see that this Simon already had the right name as Simon, inasmuch as the same reminded of the theocratic spirit of zealotry of olden times. It is characteristic that the zealot Simon is the brother of Judas Leb-basus or Thaddaeus; and that he, together with the children killed at Bethlehem, was meant that the highest divine power was vouched for by the title they gave him, ἡ ἐνένομος τοῦ τεωσ τοῦ κοίλου τοῦ μεγάλου ("The Power of God, which is called Great"), by which was meant that the highest divine potency was revealed in him. Under the influence of Philip's preaching and miracles he offered himself for baptism. But his request of Peter, to purchase the miraculous power of the apostles with money, abundantly proves that he wished to pervert his authority over the people. Condemned by Peter for his audacious and ungodly request, he craved the apostle's intercession; but, as most of the contemporary documents of the time bear witness, the apostate Simon never obtained the power which he wished to possess, and not repentance. Turning to the ecclesiastical tradition, which represents Simon as the father of all those heresies with which men endeavored to corrupt the church, we must believe, that, in his subsequent history, he opposed Peter, sought to fan the opposition of the Samaritans to the Jews, and perhaps gave himself out as the...

Messiah. We shall now give a survey of the accounts current amongst the Fathers concerning his personal fortunes and his system.

1. Simon's Personal Fortunes.—The first post-biblical author to mention Simon is Hegesippus (Euseb.: H. E., iv. 22), who states that he belonged to the Jewish sects with which the heretical corruption of the church originated, the Samaritans being counted among such sects. Justin Martyr, himself born in Samaria, has more to say about him; and his account, with that of the Acts, forms the firm foundation of all subsequent accounts. According to him, Simon was born at Gittin, Samaria, and was revered by the majority of the Samaritans as the most high God; and his attendant, Helena, whom he had found in a brothel at Tyre, was his israea. He visited Rome under Claudius, and created such an impression by his magical arts, that the Senate and people worshipped him as a god, and erected to him a statue bearing the inscription to the "Holy God Simon" (Simon Deo Sancto). Hilgenfeld and others have supposed that Justin confounded a Samaritan village with Kittium in Cyprus, but without sufficient reason. The strange statue was explained by a discovery, in 1584, of a marble pedestal bearing the inscription, Semoni sancio Deo ficio sacrum Sex. Pompejus . . . donum dedit. Justin, without doubt, was misled by this inscription.

The Clementine Homilies speak of Simon's parents, and his education in Greek and magic at Alexandria, and represent him as originally one of the thirty disciples of John the Baptist. He travelled about with Helena, giving himself out as the highest power, superior to the Creator of the world, and representing Helena as having descended from the highest heaven, and being the mother of all and of wisdom. Many magical tricks are attributed to him. He commanded statues to walk, walked without injury in the fire, transformed himself into a serpent or goat, opened locked doors, etc. The relations between him and Peter are especially dwelt upon and elaborated. They held a disputation in the area Strato, and Peter are especially dwelt upon and elaborated. The relations between him and Peter, but ever pursued by the apostle, until finally, at Antioch, Simon was compelled by the apostle's right to the claim of a true apostle of Christ. Another series of traditions cluster around Simon's sojourn at Rome. Grimm's statement, that the entire early church connected Peter with Rome, which he visited to oppose Simon, is not true of the first two centuries. Tertullian follows closely Justin and Ireneus, who do not connect Peter with Simon's sojourn there. The case is different in the third century, when Hippolytus speaks of Simon's controversy at Rome, with the apostles Peter and Paul. The magician, seeing his influence waning, ordered himself to be buried alive, alleging he would rise again the third day. His disciples did as he desired, but found him dead on opening the grave. Here Simon was a son of God; in the reign of Nero, while Justin puts it in the reign of Claudius. Henceforth the story of the Roman meeting between Peter and Simon is associated with the Clementine descriptions. Thither the magician fled, pursued by the apostle. His death is differently related. According to some, he promised to fly to heaven, and in fact did succeed in flying, until, stopped by the prayer of Peter, he fell dead to the earth. According to others, overcome with shame and chagrin, he threw himself from a rock (Const. Ap. v. 8 sqq.; Origen: Adv. gentes, ii. 12; Cyril.: Hieros., vi, 15, etc.).

2. Simon's System.—The Fathers agree in representing Simon as the coryphaeus of the heretics, from whom came the devilish poison of heresy. From Justin on, a communion or sect is spoken of who recognized him as leader, or worshipped him as God. Justin expressly speaks of the "Simonian system" (Apol., ii. 14). Ireneus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian (De an., 57), Origen, and even Celsus, speak of the sect of the Simonians. Epiphanius and Eusebius speak of its gradual disappearance, and Theodoret, of its extinction. The Simonian teachings gradually take on the form of an elaborate gnostic system. Simon is the highest power, the father over all. Helena is the prolific mother from whom he gets the idea of creating angels and archangels. She brings them forth; and they, in turn, create the world. These angels, which do not know their father, out of jealousy detain their mother in captivity. Confined for centuries, she passes from one female body to another, until she last is found in a brothel at Tyre. Simon descended from heaven, and freed his lost sheep, and emancipated those who believed in him from the world and the service of the angels who created it. This is in general the view of Tertullian (De an., 34), Hippolytus (v. 19 sqq.), Epiphanius, and, in part, Theodoret. Hippolytus (v. 7 sqq.), however, speaks of another and quite different Simonian system, and mentions a writing by Simon, the apophasis muqda (the Great Denial). Simon, as the great power above all, is called the loric, a designation which the Clementines and Clemens Alexandrinus also mention. Jerome (Com. in Matth., xxiv.) preserves Simon's words to this effect: "I am the word of God, I am the light, the paraclete, the all of God."

The following may be said concerning the growth and development of the Simonian sect. Simon was originally the false Messiah. A sect of Samaritans sprung up who worshipped him as the most high God. Around him was formed a gnostic system compounded of mythological and Christian elements. Baur (Manich. Syst., 468 sqq.) was the first to show that the myth of Simon and Helena was a modification of the Phoenician mythology; the sun-god (Melquarth, Baal) representing the male, and the moon-god (Astarte) representing the female principle. These two principles are represented as a syzygy from which all things that exist have been developed. The fall is connected with the woman, and redemption with Simon, who descends from heaven, and makes the highest revelation. See Mosheim: Institut. h. eccl. mai. sect., i. 389 sqq.; Simon: Leben u. Lehre Simon's d. Mag., in Illgen's Zeitschrift, 1841; the different works upon Gnosticism; and the reign of the regius. Halle, 1850, pp. 284 sqq.; [Lipsius: Simon d. W. MÜLLER.
SIMON, Richard, the founder of biblical isagoge; b. at Dieppe, May 13, 1638; d. there April 11, 1712. He early became a novice of the Oratorians; but, as the prescribed ascetical practices embarrassed his studies, he left the order, and studied with private support in Paris. His connection, however, with the Oratorians, was not altogether dissolved. In 1668, he engaged in the order as novice, having obtained permission to continue his studies; but he never felt at home in the order. The Oratorians were at that time rarer successful competitors of the Jesuits in the field of education, and this circumstance drew them nearer towards the Jansenists. But Simon, so to speak, a rationalist by nature, felt averse to the Jansenists; and these conflicting tendencies made his position in the order somewhat difficult. It was first sent to Juilly to teach philosophy, but afterwards appointed at the library of the order in Paris to catalogue its Oriental manuscripts — a task which bore fully congenial to him, and of great advantage in his biblical studies. After the publication, however, of his great work on isagogy, he was again compelled to leave the order; and the latter part of his life he spent mostly in his native city, in literary retirement.

The earlier works of Simon have no special interest. — Fides ecclesia orientalis (1671), a translation from the Italian of Gaudini's "Travels among the Maronites" (1675), Comparaison des ceremonies des Juifs avec la discipline de l'Eglise (1681), Histoire de l'origine des religions (1684), etc. But in 1686 appeared his Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, and it was followed by his Histoire critique des versions du N. T. (1689), and Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du N. T. (1693). The first part of the work was done in 1678. It was passed by the censor, and printed; but its publication was retarded on account of the dedication to the king. Meanwhile, some stray copies began to circulate, and attracted attention; and Bossuet, on this occasion acting in unison with the Jansenists, succeeded in having the work suppressed. The whole edition was destroyed; and only a few copies, in the possession of Simon, were saved. From one of these copies the Amsterdam bookseller, Elsevir, made a very incorrect edition in 1681; and from that edition Noël Aubert de Versé made his Latin translation, 1681. Finally, the author himself, who in the mean time had left the order of the Oratorians, published an authentic edition at Rotterdam, 1685. It was anonymous, but the other parts of the work bear the name of the author.

The work in its totality is the first scientific attempt at writing the history of the Bible considered as a literary product; and, in view of the immense mass of materials since that time has been bestowed on the subject, the idea of such an undertaking commands respect, both on account of its originality and on account of the courage it presupposes. The execution bears, of course, the marks of its time, of the scantiness of the materials and the insufficiency of the tools, but it cannot be denied that it also bears the marks of its narrowness and peculiarity, his hobbies, and his antipathies. The amount of criticism which the work called forth was enormous; and as Simon was a somewhat ticklish person, of a not altogether lovely temper, he could overlook nothing. The first attacks, by Weil, a converted Jew from Metz, and Spanheim, Prussian ambassador in London, with the responses of Simon, are added as an appendix to the Rotterdam edition of the first part. But more vehement and more protracted controversies ensued within the circle of the Vieil Testament (Clericus), and others. Generally speaking, the literary history of the work is very interesting, as most of the questions brought forward in the controversies were new; but it is also difficult, as Simon published most of his answers pseudonymously.

Having criticised so many other translations of the Bible, Simon at last undertook to make one himself. The works appeared in 1702, in four volumes, printed at Trévoux, without the name of the author. It was soon discovered, however; and Bossuet took pains to gather from the translation a sufficient number of heresies, especially of a Socinian color. The book was forbidden, first by episcopal authority in some single dioceses, then by royal authority in the whole kingdom. Simon did his utmost to avoid the verdict, but in vain. Among his later works are Les histoires de M. Simon (1700-05, 3 vols.), and Bibliotheque critique (1708, 3 vols.), both of which contained striking evidences of the immense learning of the author, and valuable contributions to the literary history of the time. His papers and his excellent library he bequeathed to the cathedral of Rouen, but during the Revolution most of them disappeared. See the elaborate and reliable biography of Richard Simon by K. H. Graf, in Strassburger theolog. Beiträge, 1847, pp. 158—242; [also G. Masson: Richard Simon, London, 1867; and A. Bernus: Richard Simon et son Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, Lausanne, 1898; the same: Notice bibliographique sur Richard Simon, Basel, 1882, 48 pp.].

ED. REUSS.

SIMON OF TOURNAI lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century as teacher of philosophy and theology in the university of Paris. He was the first who applied the Aristotelian philosophy to theology, which circumstance filled his lectures with so much learning, but also seems to have made him crazy from vanity. Matthew Paris tells us that one day he exclaimed, "O Jesus! what have I not done for the consolidation of thy doctrine, though I could have done so very much more for its destruction!" after which he lost the powers of speech and memory, and had to learn his letters over again; but he never reached farther than spelling the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. Thomas Cantipratus ascribes the famous saying about the three impostors — Moses, Christ, and Mohammed — to him. But Henry of Ghent, who was a canon of Tournai, and doctor of the Sorbonne in 1290, and who, consequently, ought to know, says nothing of those stories in speaking of Simon. None of his works have been printed, but they are said to be in perfect harmony with the doctrinal system of the church. C. SCHMIDT.

SIMONY is, according to canon law, the heaviest of all ecclesiastical crimes (delictum grave seu simoniacum), and has found its most pregnant description in c. 21, § 1; c. 1, qu. 1. The name is derived from Simon Magus (Acts viii. 18); and by degrees, as the view developed of ordination by the laying-SIMPPLICIUS, Pope 468-483, was a friend of Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, and took part in the Monophysite controversy by condemning Timotheus Allurus, Petrus Mongus, John of Apamea, Paul of Ephesus, and Peter the fuller. He is commemorated by the church on March 2. NEUDECKER.

SIN. 1. A city of Egypt, which is mentioned only in Ezek. xxx. 15, 16, in connection with Thebes and Memphis, and is described as "the strength of Egypt." It is identified in the Vulgate with Pelusium, "the clayey or muddy" town, and is also marked on the map of the ancient Egyptians as "Elusium," the clayey or muddy town. Pelusium is famous for the many battles fought there. Here Sesostris drove back the army of Sennacherib, and here Cambyses defeated Psammenitus (Herod., I. 141, III. 10 sq.). The Persians defeated here also Nectanebos (Diod., 16, 42 sq.).

2. A wilderness between Elim and Rephidim, where the Israelites arrived on the fifteenth day of the second month after their departure out of the land of Egypt, and where they received quails and manna. It is generally held to be the region near the source of Murkha, south of Ras Zelima, the northern part of the plain el kaa, which reaches from the south end of the Hecropolitan Gulf to the mouth of the Wady Taiyibeh in the north. Its desolate aspect appears to have produced a most depressing effect upon the Israelites. [Cf. Exod. xvi. 3.]

LEYRER.

SIN. Though Scripture gives no definition of the name, it leaves no element of the doctrine of sin unnoticed, but gives a full account of how sin penetrated into human nature by the fall of man, how it develops into special acts through the self-determination of man, and how its power is finally broken by the atoning sacrifice of God. This account is the basis of the whole historical development of the Christian dogma of sin; the impulses which pushed on the development it derived from the steadily increasing clearness and depth with which the ideas of freedom and necessity, and their reciprocal relation, were conceived.

The older Fathers, the apologists, Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athanasius, and Theophilus of Antioch, as well as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Athanasius, the two Gregories, Chrysostom, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Methodius, defined sin as opposition to the holy will of God, and affirmed that such an iniquity involved death as its necessary consequence. But, though they were well aware that sin has spread the whole human race without leaving one single human being as an exception, they did not put that universal state of iniquity in any necessary connection with the fall of Adam. Every single sin, they taught, is an act of free will, and, in its relation to the sin of Adam, only a repetition; and consequently an infant is as incapable of committing a sin as unable to do anything good. Even Tertullian, though he taught that the sinfulness of a human nature, with death as its consequence, is propagated by generation (corpus tradunt unum), asserted that man in his natural state had still the power to do good, that the natural state of man was not one of sin and guilt. It was first during the controversy between Pelagius and Augustine that people became conscious of the contradiction between sin as an act of individual freedom and sin as the result of organic necessity. Pelagius and his adherents, Celestius, Julian of Eclanum, and others, held that the propagation of sin by generation is unthinkable; that good and evil are not born with us, but done by us; that man has now the same nature as Adam had when he was created; that sin is an act of free will, etc. Thus the concupiscientia, or that sensual movement from which, when not governed by man, sin originates, is not an effect of the sin of Adam, but, like death itself, an element of the very nature of man; and between the sins of Adam and those of his offspring there is no connection, and so the example and imitation; the power which sin exercises over man is simply the power of habit. Augustine, who in his earlier writings spoke with marked compulsion about Manicheism, but who afterwards absolutely submitted to the idea of a total change of human nature, spiritual and physical, as the result of the first sin, placed against that of the Pelagian the following propositions: that the sin of self-vindication and disobedience which Adam committed with free self-determination completely corrupted his whole nature; that the corruption consists in concupiscientia, or the domination of the lower sensual instincts over the spirit, which unifies man for good, and makes it impossible for him to escape sin by his own power; that the corruption and its consequence, death, are propagated by generation, which means that sin is hereditary sin (viuum originis, pecatum originale), and the offspring of Adam massa perditionis; that the natural state of the human race is not only one of sin, but one of guilt and punishment, as sin and guilt are correlative ideas, etc. Between these two extremes Semi-Pelagianism reared its system, according to which man, though the victim of hereditary sin, and subject to death, has still a desire for good. His powers have been weakened; he is neither completely dead nor fully alive; he is sick. But the liberum arbitrium has not been lost. In vindicating the freedom of the will, however, Semi-Pelagianism actually oversteps the dividing-line between Pelagianism and Augustinianism, and sides with the former; and it continued to incline that way, even in the milder forms which it developed after its condemnation.

In the East, John of Damascus, the systematizer of the theology of the Greek Church, taught that death, and the loss of communion with God and converse with the angels, are the necessary consequences of the first sin, and are propagated by generation. He knew nothing of an unfitness for good and an hereditary guilt propagated in the same manner: on the contrary, according to him, man is still as free as Adam was on the day of his creation; and the image of God, in which man was created, and which consists in reason and a free will, has not been lost.

The later Greek theologians, Theodorus, Studita, Theophylact, Euthymius Zigabenus, and others, followed in the same track. In the West the subject received a very peculiar treatment by John Scotus Erigena. In his system of Platonizing philosophy, he ascribed to sin, not as Augustine of Hippo, as a mere defection, but as something negative, the mere negation of good, and has no positive existence, as little as sin. Erigena, however, exercised very little influence on this point; and, generally speaking, mediaeval theology may be said to have left the subject nearly in the same state in which it received it. Of the schoolmen, Anselm of Canterbury, Peter the Lomard, and Thomas Aquinas expounded the dogma on the basis of the category of necessity; Abelard, Duns Scotus, and the Scotists generally, on the basis of the category of freedom. According to the former, sin is disobedience to God, caused by pride, and the sinfulness of the race is the effect of the fall of Adam. In Adam, the person corrupted nature (peccatum originale originans): in his offspring, nature corrupts the person (peccatum originale originatum). Consequently, although the senses are, by themselves not of the character of sin, and only enter as an element into the single, actual sin, hereditary sin is, nevertheless, true sin, and the unbaptized infant is justly damned. In this sense of the word, neither Abelard nor Duns Scotus recognized the existence of hereditary sin. That which was lost by the fall of Adam was, according to Duns Scotus, the justitia originalis; and the Scotists in general laid great emphasis on the free activity of man, a circumstance which aided them considerably in the defence of the doctrine of immaculate conception. In all essential points of the doctrine of sin the mystics of the middle ages agreed with the schoolmen. To them, too, sin had its root in the innermost core of the human personality, the self, the latter as a loss of the original perfection, entailing a lack of true knowledge, love, and fear of God; as a faulty concupiscencia rising from a complete corruption of the body in all its qualities, so that the capacity for salvation is reduced to a mere possibility; as a reatus (guilt) which brings man, on account of the evil which is propagated in him, under the wrath and judgment of God. Calvin, although, on account of his supralapsarian views, he experienced some difficulties in isolating the charge that he made against the Scotists, nevertheless, that hereditary sin is connected with guilt; and the later Reformed theologians, Polanus, Alsted, van Til, and others, defined the fall as a breach of the satus nature, and sin as a defectus nature. A transition to a stronger emphasizing and a more minute elaboration of the second element of the doctrine, the freedom of the will, became visible in Calixtus (who rejected the idea of hereditary sin as a guilt) and the syncretists in general; and during the period of rationalism and supernaturalism the movement was completed. The rationalists, who generally liked better to speak of the dignity of man than of his sin, argued that a transference of the guilt of Adam to his offspring contradicted the goodness, wisdom, and justice of God; and instead of hereditary sin, which term they hated, they spoke of a certain weakness of the will, a certain inclination towards the sensuous side of existence, a certain instinct for pleasure, etc., which was propagated by example, or perhaps by generation, but which formed part and parcel of human nature as created by God, and presented no insuperable obstacle to the absolute exercise of the freedom of the will. The principal representatives of these views were Henke, Steinbort, Eberhard, Wegscheider, and De Wette. The supernaturalists were, of course, very far from going this length. Nevertheless, Reusch explained the transference of guilt from Adam to his offspring by an imputatio metaphysica; God knowing that in Adam's place any and every man would have sinned like him. Reinhard explained the fall as a kind of poisoning, and hereditary sin as the inheritance of a poisoned constitution. Indeed, most of the supernaturalists, such as Michaelis, G. F. Seiler, Brethischer, and others, taught that no man is declared guilty, and surrendered to punishment, on account of the sin of Adam and the hereditary sin, but only from Adam, but only on account of those actual sins in which, with free self-determination, he allows his sinful disposition to realize itself. It is apparent, that, in the whole process of development as above described, each onward step has been accomplished by a more or less one-sided emphasis on one of the two elements of the dogma, the organic necessity, or the individual freedom. It is the characteristic of the theology of our age, that a perfect mediation between the two opposites is now demanded. Daub's attempt, in his Judas Iscarioth, at explaining the origin of evil as having its source in a discrepancy between the model of man, found no favor; but, under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy, Marheineke, in his Grundlinien der theolog. Moral, defined sin as a contradiction between the finite and the infinite spirit, necessarily arising from the abstract, unconscious unity of God and man, and as necessarily resulting in the division of the two opposite elements of the organic necessity; and this idea did not prove altogether sterile. By Vatke, Romany, and others, sin was represented as a necessary transition through evil.
without which man can neither fully know nor fully do that which is good; and generally the Hegelian school of theology taught the absolute necessity of sin as a condition of the development of the human spirit. Schleiermacher, however, abandoned this track. He sought to establish the theory that freedom is a double fact — a free deed of the subject on the one side, and a necessary result of the objective development on the other, — and the sinful state of man as a disturbance of his nature, not necessary to it; so that we become conscious of our sins, partly as something which we ourselves have done, and partly as something which has its cause outside of our being. Later theologians generally show an influence either from Hegel or from Schleiermacher, and their treatment of the doctrine of sin is generally shaped after one of those two models. But hardly any of them can be said to have established a perfect balance between freedom and necessity in their solutions of the problem. Nitzsch, Marthasen, and Rothe incline towards the absolute freedom of the will; Lange, Thomasius, and Philippi towards the absolute necessity of organic nature.

F. DÖRTENBACH.

SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT (Matt. xii. 31, 32). This must be carefully distinguished from blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. The latter is unforgivable: the former is not. As Matthew Henry well says, “It is not all speaking against the person or essence of the Holy Spirit, or some of his private operations, or merely the resisting of his internal working in the sinner himself, that is here meant; for who, then, should be saved?” But blasphemy against the Holy Spirit implies complete deadness to spiritual things; so that holiness is hated and hated. Wherever there is apprehension felt that the “unpardonable sin” has been committed, there has been no commission of it; for he who really sins in this way feels no contrition. And the latter fact is the reason why it is never forgiven. The sinner continues obstinate and malignant till his death. It is therefore equivalent to final impenitence. Cf. Lange on Matthew (Am. ed., p. 227); PHILIP SCHAFIT: Die Sünde wider den heiligen Geist, Halle, 1841; A. VON OETTINGEN: De peccato in spiritum sanctum, Dorpat, 1856; LEMME: Die Sünde wider d. heiligen Geist, Breslau, 1858; and art. by HERMANN WEISS, in HERZOG, vol. i, 190, 190.

SIN-OFFERINGS. See OFFERINGS.

SINS. The Forgiveness of is the negative effect of justification, which in conception precedes the positive, adoption, and rests as the subjective interpretation of the work of Christ upon the atonement as the objective fact. The doctrine is found in the Old Testament (Num. iv. 14, xviii. 19; 2 Chron. vii. 14; Ps. cii. 10, 12, 13, cxxx. 4; Isa. lii.; Mic. vii. 18, 19, etc.), where, however, it rests upon sacrifices (see OFFERINGS); but in the New Testament it is frequently represented as the immediate result of Christ’s death (Matt. xxvii. 28; Rom. iv. 25; 2 Cor. v. 19, 21; Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 13; cf. Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. i. 18, 19), and again as the result of the acceptance of the atonement on the part of the individual (Matt. vi. 12, ix. 2; Luke vii. 47; Acts ii. 38, xii. 38; Rom. iii. 25; Col. ii. 13). Man, renouncing all works and all merits, is forgiven out of God’s grace, for the sake of Christ’s merits, through faith (Matt. ix. 2; Rom. iii. 25, iv. 4, 5). Righteousness is, however, reckoned as the condition of faith (Acts xiii. 39; Gal. ii. 16). Forgiveness, which removes guilt and its attendant punishment (Rom. v. 19), and sin itself (Rom. vii. 25) is granted to all believers (cf. Rom. v. 12-21; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22). See SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT.

In the historical development of the doctrine, there was at first no clear understanding of the relations of God and man in the act of forgiveness; and so the apostolic Fathers represented it simply as the result of the atonement, and conditioned it upon a better life. Clement of Rome conditions it upon “faith,” i.e., in the conception of the time, mere reception of the truths of Christianity, and obedience to the divine commands; the Shepherd of Hermas, upon “faith” and repentance, only once possible; Justin Martyr, upon “faith,” baptism, and a righteous life; Clement of Alexandria, upon “faith” and good works; Origen, in his commentary upon Romans, upon “faith,” but in other places adds good works, which he enumerates,—baptism, martyrdom, repentance, virtue, alms, forgiveness of sins against us, conversion of a sinner, brotherly love. The Latin Fathers — Ireneaus, Tertullian, and Cyprian — attribute forgiving efficacy to baptism and to good works, as alms, and lay great stress upon penance. So the Greek Fathers — Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, Theodoret, Chrysostom — condition forgiveness upon “faith,” baptism, and a righteous life; Clement of Alexandria, upon “faith” and good works. Augustine made an advance in the development of the doctrine, in that he represented forgiveness as a declarative act of God. He maintained that the works which justify follow, not precede, justification. But Pelagian teaching, that forgiveness was only a work of the general divine grace, and Catholic teaching respecting works of supererogation, prevented any immediate use from Augustine’s advance. John of Damascus, it is true, distinguished two kinds of faith,—one mere acceptance of truth, the other firm confidence upon God’s promises, but did not attain to a perception of the connection between the latter and forgiveness. Scotus Erigena denied forgiveness, since all that man needed to be reconciled with God was intellectual perception of the evil. The scholastic theologians were Semi-Pelagians. They taught that penance, which atoned for actual sin, consisted in confession of the heart, confession of the mouth, and works of satisfaction, which were such as fasting, prayers, alms, flagellation, pilgrimming. They taught also, in favor of the doctrine of purgatory, that, although guilt could be forgiven, punishment followed sin until the soul was cleansed by the purgatorial fire. They emphasized auricular confession and indulgences, the equivalent for penance, and thus perverted the doctrine of forgiveness. The mystics of the middle ages emphasized the inward connection between God and the heart. The Roman-Catholic doctrine, since the Council of Trent, is that forgiveness is received by man along with faith, hope, and love through Christ, in whom he is planted. It designates baptism as the only instrumental cause of justification, and hence of forgiveness. Roman-Catholic theologians, like Bellarmin, eliminate yet more decidedly from their systems the doctrine of forgiveness as removal of guilt.

The Lutheran theologians first lay the emphasis upon God's side, in that they teach that sin is atoned for by the vicarious death of Jesus Christ. The removal of guilt is the first effect of the declaratory and forensic act of justification. Faith (assent) in connection with baptism is the only condition of participation in the work of Christ. Among Reformed theologians Zwingli and Calvin present forgiveness as an act of the doctrine of forgiveness, that, although sinfulness of the declaratory and forensic act of justification. Faith (assent) in connection with baptism is the only condition of participation in the work of Christ. Among Reformed theologians Zwingli and Calvin present forgiveness as an act of Christ's death and forgiveness, but weakened their doctrine respecting the latter by representing that its principal effect was removal of punishment.

The speculative theologians have endeavored to find how correctly to unite the human and divine factors in the work of forgiveness. Schleiermacher finds the unity thus: forgiveness (1) is an effect of faith, without which it is necessary to partake of repentance and faith enters into fellowship with Christ, and (2) is no result of a divine decree; but every act of conversion which includes the consciousness of deliverance from guilt, and desert of punishment, is only a declaration of the general decree to justify for Christ's sake. Marien and Rothe deny that forgiveness is possible out of Christ. Nitzsch considers forgiveness as a direct act of God, resultant upon faith in the atoning death of Christ. Lange also holds fast to the objectivity of the act, which, according to him, is judicial.

SINAI, i.e., "sharp-pointed," "toothed," or "notched" (Exod. xvi. 1; Deut. xxxiii. 2), also Mount Sinai (Exod. xiv. 17, 18, 20, 23, xxiv. 16, xxxi. 18, xxxiv. 2, 4, 9, 32; Lev. vi. 38, xxv. 1, xxxvi. 26, xxxvii. 34; Num. xxvii. 36), also Horeb, i.e., "dry," "dried up." (Exod. iii. 1, vii. 6, xxxvi. 6 to "Mount Horeb," "The Mountain of the Lord." (Exod. iii. 1, iv. 27, xviii. 5; Num. x. 33), denote, in the narrower sense, a single mountain, the historic mountain on which God revealed the law unto Moses, but, in a wider sense, the mountain range in the peninsula formed by the Gulfs of Suez and Akabah. On the north it is bounded by the upland plain of Er-Râbah, and on the south by the Um-Shaumer mount. A distinction has been made between Sinai and Horeb; and Hengstenberg (Authentise des Pentateuch, ii. pp. 300 sq.), with whom Robinson (Researches in Palestine) agrees, explains the change in the names, in that his mountain may be a ridge, and Sinai the individual summit from which the Ten Commandments were given. Gesenius suggested that Sinai might be the more general name, and Horeb a particular peak; and in this conjecture he was followed by Rosenmüller. Ewald sees not a local, but a temporal, difference in the use of both names (Geschichte, ii. 89, note). According to Ewald, Sinai is the older name, therefore it occurs in the ancient song of Deborah (Judg. v. 5); whereas Horeb is not discoverable before the time of the fourth narrator, in whose time, however, it became quite prevalent. But there really seems to be no local difference between Horeb and Sinai; but it rather belongs to the peculiarity of the author using the name. Josephus and the New Testament (Acts vii. 36, 38; Gal. iv. 24 sq.) only speak of Sinai; and modern Arabs call the whole mountain range in the peninsula Jebel-et-Tor, sometimes with the addition of Sina, though Robinson says extremely rarely.

As to the locality, it is very difficult to designate a certain spot. Some, as Burckhardt and Lepsius, have claimed that the mountain on which the law was given was the Jebel Serbal. But the nature of the country around Serbal is against this hypothesis (comp. Dieterici: Reisebilder, ii. 54 sq.). A second hypothesis is the one which claims the Ras es-Sulsaféh to be the Sinai of the Bible. This hypothesis was advocated by no less an authority than Robinson, who was followed by all writers and travellers till Léon de Laborde in his Commentaire sur l'Exode Append., pp. 1, 41 sq.), who advocated the old tradition in favor of Jebel Mûsa, and was followed by Krafft, Strauss, Graul, Ritter, and in part, also, by Tischendorf. Above all things, it should be noted that the Bible, according to Exod. xii. 2 sq., the Israelites, after their departure from Rephidim, came into the wilderness of Sinai, and encamped before the mount. God sends his message by Moses unto the people of the mount, to tell them how he will receive them as his covenant people. Barriers are put up, to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. "On the third day there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud, so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire. . . . And the Lord came down upon Mount Sinai, on the top of the mount; and the Lord called Moses unto the top of the mount, and Moses went up." And in Exod. xx. 18 sq. we read, "And all the people saw the thunders, and the lightnings, and the voice of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they removed, and stood afar off. . . . And
Moses said unto the people, Fear not; for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye sin not. And the people stood afar off, and Moses drew near unto the thick darkness, where God was: and in Exod. xxiv. 1 sq. Moses is called up into the mountain with Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel. Moses alone was to come near to the Lord: the rest were to worship afar off. Moses does according to God's commandment, and then continues alone on the mountain forty days and forty nights. In the mean time Aaron makes the golden calf. On going down from the mount Moses hears the rejoicing of the people; and as he came nigh unto the camp, and saw the calf and the dancing, his anger waxed hot, and he cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount. From this description we must infer that immediately at the base of the mountain there was a large plain, where the camp of the Israelites was, and from which the mountain ascended immediately, because barriers were put up to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. Robinson and those who follow him find this plain in the plain Er-Rahah, from which the granite wall of Sinai rises with the three-toothed peak Ras es-Sufafeh, asserting at the same time that no such plain is found on the south side. Others, who are in favor of the Jebel Musa, claim the Wady Sebatelyah to be that plain, which has been overlooked by Robinson, and from which also, the cone of Sinai immediately rises like a gigantic altar of God. The plain Er-Rahah they claim as that spot of the camp from which Moses brought forth the people to meet with God, through the Wady Sebatelyah, and through which the people fled back into the camp.

It is remarkable that Sinai never became a place of Jewish pilgrimage. Elijah went there to escape the vengeance of Jezebel (1 Kings xix. 3—8). It appears that refugees from persecution in Egypt first sought an asylum amid the mountains. Anchoreta consequently flocked to it, and converted a wilderness into a monastery. In the early part of the sixth century the Emperor Justinian caused a church to be erected, and a fortified convent (the present Convent of St. Catharine) to be built round it. The number of resident monks is now usually about twenty-four. They are ruled by a prior (Waldl), but there is an archbishop who always resides at Cairo. The library of the convent contains some fifteen hundred (according to Lepsius sixteen hundred) printed books, and about seven hundred manuscripts. Among them Tischendorf discovered, in the year 1838, the celebrated Codex Sinaiticus.

SIX ARTICLES. The, passed by the English Parliament, June 28, 1539, mark the retrograde movement of Henry VIII. from the principles of Church.

SIXTUS.

The Reformation. They imposed upon the English people the doctrines of transubstantiation, the usefulness of private masses, auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the communion in one kind. They were popularly called the "Bloody Articles" and the "Whip with six strings." See Article on Roman Church.

SIX-PRINCIPLE BAPTISTS, so called from their six doctrines, contained in Heb. iv. 1, 2; viz., (1) repentance from dead works, (2) faith toward God, (3) the doctrine of baptisms, (4) the laying-on of hands, (5) the resurrection of the dead, (6) eternal judgment. Their "laying-on of hands" is similar to episcopal confirmation. They refuse to fellowship with those who do not practise it. Their general type of theology is Arminian. They claim to date, as an organization, from 1639, and have always been, for the most part, confined to Rhode Island. In 1700 they were almost all in New England, all but two in Rhode Island. They have no periodical organ, and no institutions or societies. See CATHCART's Baptist Encyclopedia, s. v., for the name of five Popes. — Sixtus I., the successor of Alexander I., ascended the Papal throne either 116 or 119, and died a martyr's death, by decapitation, 128 or 139. He introduced the doctrine of the divine right of the Pope, and died a martyr's death, by decapitation, 128 or 139. He introduced the law prohibiting women touching the vessels on the altar. — Sixtus II. (Pope 237-238) was executed in the reign of Valerian. — Sixtus III. (432-440) was appealed to by the metropolitans of Tyana and Tarsus, who were afraid of being deposed. The election of several cardinals is ascribed to him, especially the Basilica of St. Maria Maggiore. — Sixtus IV. (1471-1484), whose family name was Francois d'Albescola della Rovere, a man of humble origin, was b. July 22, 1414, at Celle, near Savona; d. Aug. 14, 1484, at Rome. Entering the Franciscan order, he became a general, was elevated to the cardinalate by Paul III., and chosen pope, Aug. 9, 1471. He was one of those popes who showed a deep interest in art and church architecture, and promoted the interests of the conventual orders, but who, incited by ambition and lust, filled Italy with blood, wrought confusion in the church, and secured the contempt of their own generation. He studied to raise the fortunes of his family, [and made five of his nephews cardinals.], Peter Riario, who was looked upon as the pope's son, an immoral and extravagant fellow, was made cardinal; and for another supposed son, Hieronymus, he sought to secure a princely inheritance. In order to accomplish this, and out of jealousy and hatred for the house of Medici, he was an accessory to the plot of the Pazzi to murder Julian and Lorenzo Medici in the St. Reparata Church at Florence. Julius was killed; Lorenzo escaped with a harmless wound. The Florentines fell upon the murderers, and put to death some priests who had participated in the plot. Sixtus hurled the ban at all who had taken part in the plot. He appointed himself vicar-general of the Franciscan order. His success won for him the bishopric of Agatha de Goti, which he administered well, attempting to reform the morals of the clergy. Honored with a cardinal's hat in 1570, he retired to Montalto. Felix Peretti, who later became Sixtus V., was b. Dec. 18, 1521, at Grotte-a-Mare, a village near Fermo; d. Aug. 24, 1590, at Rome. He visited the universities of Ferrara and Bologna, and was made professor of canon law at Rimini in 1544, and at Siena in 1546. He was a Franciscan. From Siena he went to Rome, became noted as a preacher, secured the friendship of men in power, but, on account of complications, went to Venice (1556), where he held high positions in the Franciscan order. Paul IV. showed him favor; and in 1565 he accompanied the Papal legate to Spain, where he secured the confidence of Philip II. by his preaching. Paul V. also showed him favor, and appointed him vicar-general of the Franciscan order. His success won for him the bishopric of Agatha de Goti, which he administered well, attempting to reform the morals of the clergy. Honored with a cardinal's hat in 1570, he retired to Montalto, lived a solitary life, expended his means in deeds of charity, engaged in the preparation of an edition of the Bible (1580), and in the appearance of disinterested and saintly humility. This policy disarmed the cardinals, who, at the death of Gregory XIII., elected him pope (April 24, 1585). An unreliable tradition states, SLAVERY AMONG THE HEBREWS.

According to the Old Testament, which ascribes to man the inalienable trait of his nature, because of his being created in the image of God, and which presents the brotherhood of mankind, because originating from one blood, slavery as it appears presents the brotherhood of mankind, because originating from one blood, slavery as it appears in the Old Testament presupposes slavery, according to which servants, like other possessions, formed a part of property (Gen. xxiv. 35, xxvi. 14; Job i. 3); and also the sale of slaves, as something which was customary in the patriarchal age. The servants of the patriarchs were of two kinds, — those “born in the house” (Gen. xiv. 14), and those “bought with money” (Gen. xvii. 13). Abraham appears to have had a large number of servants. At one time he armed three hundred and eighteen young men “born in his house.” The servants born in the house were, perhaps, entitled to greater privileges than the others, and were honored with the most intimate confidence of the masters, as may be seen in the case of Eliezer (Gen. xiv. 1 sq.), who would have been entitled to greater privileges than the others, and were honored with the most intimate confidence of the masters, as may be seen in the case of Eliezer (Gen. xiv. 1 sq.), who would have been Abraham’s heir, should the latter have died without issue (Gen. xv. 2 sq.). The servants of Abraham were admitted to the same religious privileges with their master, and received the seal of the covenant (Gen. xvii. 9, 14, 24, 27). Slavery, as far as it was allowed by the Mosaic law, was regulated by laws, which, on account of their humane character, form a contrast to that degradation of human nature which was so prominent in heathenism. The laws regulating slavery may be divided into two classes, — such as relate to the Hebrew slaves, and such as relate to non-Hebrew slaves.

I. Hebrew Slaves. — The circumstances under which a Hebrew might be reduced to servitude were, (a) poverty (Lev. xxv. 39, 47), (b) the commission of theft (Exod. xxii. 1, 3 — in that case the thief could not be sold to a foreigner, Jos. : xxv. 27), (c) the exercise of parental authority (Exod. xxi. 1 — in that case the authority was only limited to the sale of a daughter). The servitude of a Hebrew might be terminated in three ways, (a) by the satisfaction for the remission of all claims against him, (b) by the recurrence of the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 40), which might arrive at any period of his servitude, and, (c) failing either of these, by expiration of six years from the time that his servitude commenced (Exod. xxi. 2; Deut. xv. 12). There can be no doubt that this last regulation applied equally to the cases of poverty and theft. The period of seven years has reference to the sabbatical principle in general, but not to the sabbatical year. We have a single instance, indeed, of the sabbatical year being celebrated by a general manumission of Hebrew slaves (Jer. xxxiv. 14).

If a servant did not desire to avail himself of the opportunity of leaving his service, he was to signify his intention in a formal manner before the judges; and then the master was to take him to the door-post, and to bore his ear through with an awl, thus establishing a connection between the servant and the house in which he was to serve. A servant could be released to the only master for the first time (Exod. xxi. 20), because he is his master's "money" (Exod. xxii. 21). A minor personal injury, such as the loss of an eye or a tooth, was to be compensated by giving the servant his liberty (Exod. xxi. 26, 27).

The condition of a Hebrew servant was by no means intolerable. His master was admonished not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming one of his master's "strangers" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), he was to be treated as a hired servant and as a sojourner; and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming one of his master's "strangers" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), he was to be treated as a hired servant and as a sojourner; and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14).

The position of the slave in regard to religious privileges was favorable. He was to be circumcised, and hence partakes of the paschal sacrifice (Exod. xii. 44), as well as of the other religious festivals (Deut. xii. 12, 18, xvi. 11, 14). He was to rest on the sabbath-day (Deut. v. 14); and, in case the master had no male issue, he could give him his daughter in marriage (1 Chron. ii. 35). As to the treatment of female slaves, see Deut. xxi. 10 sq. The master had no power over the life of a slave (Exod. xxi. 20).

Wilful murder of a slave entailed the same punishment as in the case of a freeman (Lev. xxiv. 17, 22); but no punishment at all was imposed if the slave survived the punishment for a day or two (Exod. xxi. 21). The operation of the servitude could be terminated only by the recurrence of the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming one of his master's "strangers" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), he was to be treated as a hired servant and as a sojourner; and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming one of his master's "strangers" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), he was to be treated as a hired servant and as a sojourner; and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming one of his master's "strangers" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), he was to be treated as a hired servant and as a sojourner; and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming one of his master's "strangers" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), he was to be treated as a hired servant and as a sojourner; and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming one of his master's "strangers" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), he was to be treated as a hired servant and as a sojourner; and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14).

The essence of this enactment in Deut. xxiii. 18 sq.; and after the return from Babylon the Jews had only 7,837 slaves, or about one to six of the free population (Ex. ii. 65).

The New Testament teaches that with Christ, liberty in general had come to all mankind equal sharers in salvation (Tit. ii. 11; 1 Tim. ii. 4); and this principle was in itself sufficient to determine the view concerning slavery (Gal. iii. 28; Col. iii. 11), and to bring about its extinction. Since Christ's (theological) compassion does not point to the welfare of people, but with individuals, whom it severally invites, exhorts, and receives into its communion, by setting forth faith as an inward, liberating life-principle (John viii. 36) through which the individual lays hold on Christ, and becomes united with him, it recognizes the rights of the inner man (Acts ii. 41, xiii. 46; Gal. iii. 19-21), which the heathen nations never apprehended, and which were veiled in the Old Testament, but which, in their progress and complete realization under Protestantism, must ultimately bring about the utter extirpation of slavery from the earth. Christ postulated the law of liberty, and made freedom the privilege of believers (John viii. 32; Isa. i. 25, ii. 12; Rom. viii. 2), thereby accomplishing the predictions of the Old Testament (Luke iv. 18-21; Isa. li xi. 1 sq.); and, though the proclamation of liberty by the apostles had primary reference to the inward states of the soul (1 Cor. vii. 23; Gal. iii. 26-28; 1 Pet. ii. 13-17; Rom. xiii. 13 sq.), it necessarily led to the great principle, that, with Christ, liberty in general had come to all (Luke i. 79; 2 Cor. iii. 17), which, like a leaven, was to permeate all relations of life.
SLAVERY IN NEW TESTAMENT. 2194 SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY.

With regard to slavery, the passage in 1 Cor. vii. 21 is of especial importance; and, whatever explanation may be given, certainly it is that Paul did not intend to subvert by force the then existing condition, however adverse to the spirit of Christianity, but that first the inner freedom was to be implanted in the human heart, from which, in the course of time, the outer freedom was to proceed. It is evident from Rom. xiii. 1 sq., that a disposition to refuse obedience to government existed, in some extent, in apostolic times, and, from the case of Onesimus, that bondmen sometimes broke away from their masters' rule. In the latter instance Paul succeeded in effecting the voluntary return of the fugitive Christian slave by imparting to him a deeper and more correct knowledge of the nature and aims of Christianity (Phil. 10-16).

Similar tendencies we find among the slaves at Corinth, where many had no doubt become converts to Christianity (1 Cor. i. 20, 26-28). The apostle, therefore, laid it down as a rule, that converts to Christianity were to continue in the station and condition of life to which the providence of God had assigned them (1 Cor. vii. 17, 20). The argument by which that rule is enforced—that the present is a time of distress, in which it becomes prudent for the unmarried to retain their virgin state, and the slave to remain contentedly in his bondage—indicates its primary reference to the Corinthian Christians of that day; but the further considerations adduced—that the time is short, and the grand catastrophe through which the world's conditions shall be changed is drawing near—have universal force, and adapt the rule to the conditions of all Christians. It is, however, evident that the apostle does not strike at the right to liberty and personal independence in these instructions. 1 Cor. vii. 23 asserts that right most forcibly, and shows that the saving grace of the Lord involves a setting-aside of all human bondage. A denial of that right would bring him into conflict with his own claim to freedom (1 Cor. ix. 1) and with his fundamental statement of his mission in Christ (1 Cor. ix. 15); and, further, that the Master never commanded that slaves be set free, as Philo in 44 sq., 82 sq.; PHILIP SCHAFF: Slavery and the Bible, Mercersburg, 1860; and his "Christianity and Slavery," in History of the Christian Church, rev. ed., 1882 sqq., vol. i. pp. 444 sq., vol. ii. pp. 444 sq.; OZANAM: La civilisation au cinqième siécle, 1862, i. pp. 200 sq.; A. SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY. Christianity and slavery seem to the present generation, with its settled opinions concerning natural rights and the teachings of the New Testament, to form the opposite poles of the moral sphere; and yet it is certain that society in antiquity was based on slavery, and that at no period of history was the slave system more completely organized than in the Roman Empire during the life of Christ in his world. It must be admitted that the Master never commanded that slavery as it then existed should be abolished, like other evils, — idolatry, for instance,—by the direct act of his followers; and further, that, for three hundred years after his advent, no writer among either the defenders or the enemies of Christianity ever spoke of the abolition of slavery as a consequence of the new doctrine (Biot, 126). It seems, however, equally clear that the total change which has since taken place in the opinion of the civilized world in regard to slavery has been mainly due to the gradual outgrowth of Christian doctrine, morals, and example. This inconsistency can only be explained by a view of the history of the opinion of the church on this subject.

1. Relations of Christianity towards Slavery to the Reign of Constantine. — Among the early converts there were, of course, masters and slaves. The apostle Paul preaches liberty to the individual; because the gospel is a revelation of the falsity of human distinctions in a race which had a common Father, and were the subjects of a common redemption. He insisted, also, that in the new kingdom all men were equal in the sight of God, who was no respecter of persons, whatever they might be as subjects of the Roman emperor: nevertheless, he maintained the duty of obedience on the part of the slave, and the claim of authority on the part of the master, as not only sanctioned, but commanded, by the new doctrine. The apostle, and his followers during the first three centuries, accepted slavery as a fact, a settled condition of Roman society which they were as powerless to change, had they so desired, as to change the imperial government itself. The object, the only object which was then practicable, was to remedy moral evils under existing institutions. The apostles and fathers addressed their exhortations to the heart rather than to the intellect of the down-trodden classes. They taught meekness and humility, and consecrated for the first time in history the servile virtues. They seem to have regarded the service of God by slaves as conferring upon them, in an important sense, a moral sense of the early Christians, quite as much as slavery ought, we think, to have done; but all these evils the Christians met with submission and resignation and by their own example of good works and virtues. When the Roman law came in conflict with their Christian duties, they made no futile attempts at change by revolutionary force and violence. An illustration of their position is found in the history of the Quakers, who gained all their early strength by contrasting voice and example against the inequalities of society in the reign of Charles II.; and yet they remained loyal subjects of the king.

Opinion of the Fathers in Regard to Slavery. — It cannot be doubted that the opinions of many of the Fathers on this subject were derived from the moral philosophy of the stoics of the empire. "Liberty," says Epictetus, "does not consist in the enjoyment of the things we desire, but in our having no desires." Marcus Aurelius made the question of true liberty dependent upon the mind and the will of the individual. The Fathers taught, after the example of St. Paul, that the true slavery was the slavery of sin. St. Jerome insists that there is no true freedom except in the knowledge of the truth. St. Ambrose says above, all conception of liberty a more noble servitude, in which freemen and slaves may unite, and where both may work together for the good of others. According to St. Augustine, the inferior position of woman relatively to man, as well as slavery, was introduced into the world at the same time and by the same means, the sin of Adam. Chrysostom, on the other hand, did not recommend the suppression of slavery, lest men should lose an opportunity of seeing how nobly liberty of soul could be preserved in the body of the slave. And yet, with these opinions of the advantages of the existing system, the Fathers speak of the original equality of mankind, of the fraternal love which should bind all men together, of that great human family of which tyranny, and not nature, had made two races, of the dignity of man created in the image of God, and, above all, of that great work which, while he became a slave through the sin of Adam, becomes a freeman through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. (See Wallon: Histoire de l’Esclavage dans l’Antiquite, vol. iii., for full details on this point.)

While Christianity did not attack what may be called the principle of slavery in the Roman Empire, it did not content itself with preaching merely moderation to the masters, and resignation to the slaves: it favored the manumission of slaves (Constant. apol., iv. q. t. I. p. 297), and strove to suppress or mitigate those features of slavery which made men forget that they were all children of the same Father, on a footing of equality with their masters in the new "City of God." In this city all, slaves and free, worshipped the same Father; they were bound together, in the offices of the church and the administration of its charities, members of the same college in the old Roman sense, with equal rights as such, and, above all, with the same hope of a common reward in the life to come.

Doubtless there were many evils in Roman society, established by law or usage, which shocked the moral sense of the early Christians, quite as much as slavery ought, we think, to have done; but all these evils the Christians met with submission and resignation and by their own example of good works and virtues. When the Roman law came in conflict with their Christian duties, they made no futile attempts at change by revolutionary force and violence. An illustration of their position is found in the history of the Quakers, who gained all their early strength by contrasting voice and example against the inequalities of society in the reign of Charles II.; and yet they remained loyal subjects of the king.

But in our having no desires. Marcus Aurelius made the question of true liberty dependent upon the mind and the will of the individual. The Fathers taught, after the example of St. Paul, that the true slavery was the slavery of sin. St. Jerome insists that there is no true freedom except in the knowledge of the truth. St. Ambrose says above, all conception of liberty a more noble servitude, in which freemen and slaves may unite, and where both may work together for the good of others. (See Wallon: Histoire de l’Esclavage dans l’Antiquite, vol. iii., for full details on this point.)

Doubtless there were many evils in Roman society, established by law or usage, which shocked the moral sense of the early Christians quite as much as slavery ought, we think, to have done; but all these evils the Christians met with submission and resignation and by their own example of good works and virtues. When the Roman law came in conflict with their Christian duties, they made no futile attempts at change by revolutionary force and violence. An illustration of their position is found in the history of the Quakers, who gained all their early strength by contrasting voice and example against the inequalities of society in the reign of Charles II.; and yet they remained loyal subjects of the king.

Opinion of the Fathers in Regard to Slavery. — It cannot be doubted that the opinions of many of the Fathers on this subject were derived from the moral philosophy of the stoics of the empire. "Liberty," says Epictetus, "does not consist in the enjoyment of the things we desire, but in our having no desires." Marcus Aurelius made the question of true liberty dependent upon the mind and the will of the individual. The Fathers taught, after the example of St. Paul, that the true slavery was the slavery of sin. St. Jerome insists that there is no true freedom except in the knowledge of the truth. St. Ambrose says above, all conception of liberty a more noble servitude, in which freemen and slaves may unite, and where both may work together for the good of others. According to St. Augustine, the inferior position of woman relatively to man, as well as slavery, was introduced into the world at the same time and by the same means, the sin of Adam. Chrysostom, on the other hand, did not recommend the suppression of slavery, lest men should lose an opportunity of seeing how nobly liberty of soul could be preserved in the body of the slave. And yet, with these opinions of the advantages of the existing system, the Fathers speak of the original equality of mankind, of the fraternal love which should bind all men together, of that great human family of which tyranny, and not nature, had made two races, of the dignity of man created in the image of God, and, above all, of that great work which, while he became a slave through the sin of Adam, becomes a freeman through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. (See Wallon: Histoire de l’Esclavage dans l’Antiquite, vol. iii., for full details on this point.)

From the time of Constantine to that of Alexis Comnenus (1095), there was, it is now apparent, in the Eastern Empire, a secret conflict of opinion between the Christian authorities and the imperial government concerning the slave-trade. A striking illustration of the nature of this conflict is found in the general opinion that the marriage of a slave in the church made him ipso facto a freeman. Up to the time of Basil the Macedonian, no such marriage was permitted to take place; the union of male and female slaves being still regarded as contubernalium, not having the sanction of theconnubium, essential to the valid, legal marriage of the Romans. Basil (867–880) directed that the priestly benediction should hallow the marriage of slaves. This enactment met with violent opposition from the deeply rooted prejudices of centuries, and was often evaded. Alexis Comnenus renewed the edict, invoking for its support the Christian maxim, “one God, one faith, one baptism,” and directed that all slaves whose masters forbade that they should be married in the church should be freed. See Waldo, iii. 462, and Milman's History of Latin Christianity, i. p. 49.

In the Western Empire, after it was conquered by the Teutonic tribes, domestic slaves were still to be found; although the vast majority of the bondmen were serfs, who, like the Roman coloni, were adscripti globem, and could not be sold apart from the land, of which they formed, in legal phrase, an incident. Many of the harshest features of the slave-code of the empire and of the Barbarians were kept up for the government of these serfs. The tendency, under the feudal system during the middle age, was to replace slavery by serfage; and this last form of servitude died out gradually in Europe, when the employers of labor, from a variety of motives, chiefly economic and selfish, found it to their advantage to pay wages, and to agree with their serfs that they should hold their lands on condition of rendering services thereon, certain in kind, and fixed in amount.

We are not to suppose that either the church or the clergy (who were all, in the earlier period, of the conquered races) were unmindful of the treatment of the serfs and bond-laborers during this age. The church did not attack mere slave-holding,—indeed, under the operation of the feudal system, churches and monasteries became, by the gifts of the faithful, among the largest slaveholders and proprietors of serfs,—but it constantly protested against abuses of the system, and in favor of humane measures. Charles L. Brace (Gesta Christi, p. 229) says that thirty-seven church councils passed favorable to slaves. In the middle age no Christian captives were permitted to be sold into slavery; the right of asylum in the churches was offered to fugitive slaves; large sums were spent for their ransom; manumissions were frequent, and were encouraged by the church as acts inspired by the love of God for the benefit of the soul of the master. Still, the noble declaration of Pope Gregory the Great, towards the close of the sixth century, “that slaves should be freed because Christ became man in order to redeem us,” does not seem to have been the guide if the church’s policy during the middle age. Larroque (L’Esclavage, p. 65–118), indeed, gives a list of fifteen councils of the church, whose decrees, he claims, were unfavorable to the freedom of the slave.

Personal slavery having disappeared in Europe in the fourteenth century, it was revived upon a gigantic scale on this continent shortly after the discovery of America. The scarcity of labor in the New World, and the necessity for it, seem to have overcome all objections to the system, whether founded upon motives of Christian duty, or upon economic considerations. All the European nations, Catholic and Protestant, who had colonies in America, engaged in transporting slaves from the coast of Africa to this continent. The result was, that, according to the calculation of Sir Arthur Helps, there were carried between the years 1579 and 1807 more than five millions of human beings from Africa to America, where they and their descendants became slaves. For more than two centuries and a half no voice, either in the church or out of it, was publicly heard against the slave-trade and its consequences. About the middle of the eighteenth century, however, two distinct movements became apparent. They are distinct; because one was based on philosophical, and the other on Christian grounds. The first was confined to France, and the other to England. Upon one or the other of them, modern opinion and legislation in regard to negro slavery have been based. The philosophical basis is found in that portion of the celebrated work of Rousseau, Emile, called Profession de foi d’un Vicaire Savoyard. The views there laid down made a profound impression upon all writers on theories of government during the remainder of the century, and formed the element of strength in the French Revolution. According to Rousseau, man is a being by nature good, loving justice and order. In an ideal state of society each member would be free, and the equal of every other,—equal, because no person, or family, or class, would seek for any rights or privileges of which any other was deprived; and free, because each one would have his share in determining the rule common to all.

These doctrines, and the vast system which grew out of them, were, for various reasons, embraced with the utmost enthusiasm in France. People looked for the millennium as a consequence of their adoption to an age, when, according to Condorcet, “the sun shall shine only on freemen, when tyrants and slaves and priests shall survive only in history and on the stage.” It is curious that the first public official document in which these opinions are clearly set forth should be our own Declaration of Independence; for it is there proclaimed that all men are “equal,” and that “they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.” So in France, the first article of “The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen,” adopted in 1789 at the beginning of the Revolution, asserts, “Men are born free and equal, and have the same rights.” And as a logical result of this declaration, based upon the teaching of Rousseau, the French Convention (Feb. 4, 1794) decreed that negro slavery should be abolished in all the French Colonies, and that all men therein should have the rights of French citizens. Two things are worthy of remark concerning this decree: (1) That it was the first act by which any nation in Europe decreed the abolition of slavery; and, (2) That the men and the nation adopting it were so far from being Christians, that they had, only three months before its date, enthroned and worshipped a woman as the goddess of reason in the Cathedral of Notre Dame at Paris.

In the tide of these attacks of the French philosophers on slavery as a violation of natural rights, there began a movement about the same time, chiefly in England and in this country, having the same object in view, but founded wholly upon convictions of Christian duty. Conscience was here substituted for mere sentiment, as the impulse to action; and the result was that earnest, persistent, and personal work which is prompted by deep, conscientious conviction of duty. The African slave-trade was made at first the main point of attack by the abolitionists. In 1772 Granville Sharp urged its suppression on religious grounds. Just before the Revolution, Virginia petitioned that no more African slave-trade should be sent into the Colony; a few years later, Clarkson, a man of deeply religious nature, gave up his whole life to efforts to convince his countrymen that they should prohibit the slave-trade by law, as violating every principle of Christian humanity. The only religious denomination which as a body took an active part in this work was the Quakers, who presented to the House of Commons a petition for the abolition of the slave-trade in 1784. By incessant work, and constant agitation of the subject in the press and at public meetings, the little band of abolitionists gained the support of many prominent public men in England, Wilberforce, Pitt, Fox, and Burke among the rest. Such was the feeling roused by the discussion of the subject, and especially the general conviction of the violation of Christian duty in maintaining the traffic, that, forced at last by the pressure of public sentiment, Parliament abolished the slave-trade in 1807. This movement in England may be considered as directed wholly by Christian sentiment.

In the United States the foreign slave-trade was prohibited in 1808 by virtue of a power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Shortly afterwards, all the maritime nations of Europe followed the example of England and of this country; and the work was fittingly crowned by the declaration of the European Congress of Vienna in 1815, engaging all the powers to discourage the traffic, that, forced at last by the pressure of public sentiment, Parliament abolished the slave-trade in 1807. This movement in England may be considered as directed wholly by Christian sentiment.

In this country the testimony of the Quakers, as a religious body, against slavery has been uniform from the beginning. In 1688 the German Friends residing in Germantown, now a part of Philadelphia, petitioned the Yearly Meeting to take measures against slaveholding. From 1696 to 1776, the society was not made a subject of discipline, and the formation of two Methodist-Episcopal churches in this country,—one at the North, and the other at the South.

It must be remembered that there were, before the war, in the Northern States, vast multitudes of Christians of thoroughly antislavery sentiments who took no active part in the abolition movement, because they were restrained by conscientious convictions as to their duty as citizens; but when slavery was made the pretext of rebellion, and war against the government, and an attempt was made to found an empire the corner-stone of which was slavery, and especially when the National Government had decreed the emancipation of the slaves, every motive for its further toleration was removed.

SLEIDAN (originally PHILIPSOHN), Johannes, b. at Sleiden, near Aix-la-Chapelle, 1506; d. at Strassburg, Oct. 31, 1556. He studied ancient languages and literatures at Liege and Cologne, and afterwards jurisprudence and history in Paris; embraced the Reformation; settled at Strassburg, and was much used by the Protestant princes of Germany in diplomatic missions to England, the Council of Trent, etc. His celebrated work on the history of the Reformation in Germany (De statu religionis et reipublica Carola Quinta Cesare commentarii, Strassburg, 1553-56) he wrote at the instance of the leaders of the Schmalcaldian League, in Dutch, Italian, English (with his life, London, 1680), and Swedish, and appeared in eight editions before 1780. His De quatro summis imperii libri tres (1557) was very much read. On the Roman-Catholic side, Fontaine, Gennep, Surius, and Maimbourg wrote against him. See Baumgarten: Uber St's Leben u. Briefeocchel (Strassburg, 1787), and Briefeocchel (1881).

SMALLEY, John, D.D., b. in Columbia, Conn., June 4, 1754; d. in New Britain, Conn., June 1, 1820, within three days of being eighty-six years old. He was prepared for Yale College by his pastor, Eleazer Wheelock, afterward president of Dartmouth; was befriended while at Yale by Ezra Stiles, afterward president of the college; was graduated in 1736. He was thought by Dr. Wheelock to have been converted in early childhood. At the age of six years he had been deeply affected by the preaching of Whitefield. In college, however, he began to doubt the genuineness of his conversion, became painfully despondent, and at length ascribed what he sometimes called his actual, and sometimes his second, conversion, to the reading of Edwards on the Will. This was followed by the facts which led him in a long life to oppose all religious excitements which did not spring from the influence of religious doctrine. It led him to become a leader in the contest against the fanaticism of the Separatists, against the Half-way Covenant,—a leader in defence of the New-England theology.

Having pursued his theological studies with Dr. Joseph Bellamy, he was ordained April 19, 1758, over the Congregational Church in New Britain, Conn. He remained in this pastorate more than fifty-five years — without a colleague, more than fifty-one years. In the pulpit he fixed his eyes on his manuscript, read it with a harsh and nasal voice, with few, and those awkward, gestures; yet he enchanted the attention of his hearers by his exhibition of naked doctrines,—often the distinguishing doctrines of Calvinism. The marked success of his pastorate is a matter of historical interest. His success as a theological instructor was yet more remarkable. Twenty of his pupils can now be remembered. One of them was an eminent revivalist, and was accustomed to read in the pulpit a printed sermon of Smalley, and to read it with such impressive elocution that the reports of its influence are well-nigh fabulous. Two of Smalley's pupils were Nathanael Emmons of Franklin, and Ebenezer Porter, who, as a professor at Andover, exerted a formative influence on the seminary. Two other theological pupils of Smalley turned their attention afterward from the ministerial to the legal profession. One of these was Oliver Ellsworth, who became chief justice of the United States: the other was Jeremiah Mason, to whom Daniel Webster ascribed much of his own success at the bar. The pupils of Smalley were charmed with his wit, but often awed by the severity of his criticisms. He studied fourteen hours a day, yet made no parade of learning. He was confident in his opinions, and impatient of contradiction, but was venerated for his profound and simple-hearted piety.

Four of his sermons had an epochal influence. Two of the four were on Natural and Moral Inability, published in 1788, republished in England. Two were entitled Justification through Christ an Act of Free Grace, and None but Believers sat-ed, published in 1803 a volume of Discourses, and in 1814, when he was eighty years old, a second volume.

SMART, Christopher, b. at Shipbourne, Kent, 1722; d. in the King's Bench prison, 1771; fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge, 1743; followed literary pursuits in London, and led a disorderly and dissipated life, which did not quench his religious feeling. Among his works are The Parables of Christ done into Verse, 1765; On the Divine Attributes; and A Translation of the Psalms of David attempted in the Spirit of Christianity, with Hymns for the Fasts and Festivals, 4to, 1765. These are piously intended, and curious, but met with no success. More memorable is his Song to David, written on the wall of a madhouse, or, according to the old tradition, indented with a key on the wainscot, he being debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper.

SMARAGDUS, abbot of the monastery of St. Michael, situated on the Meuse, in the diocese of Verdun, was one of the most learned theologians of the Carolingian age, and held in great esteem both by Charlemagne and Lewis the Pious. His writings, however, consisting of commentaries on the New Testament, on the rules of St. Benedict, etc., are mere compilations, altogether without originality. They are found in Migne: Patro. Lat., vol. 102. — Another Smaragdus, whose true name was Ardo, was a friend of Benedict of Aniane, and wrote his life. See Act. Sanct., and Migne: Patro. Lat., vol. 103.

The remonstrance from the unjust imputations of frivolousness and falsehood: wherein the cause of liturgy and episcopacy is further debated. The debate was upon these two heads: (1) of the antiquity of liturgies, or forms of prayer; (2) of the apostolical institution of diocesan episcopacy. See Neale: Hist. Puritans, vol. 1. pt. ii. c. viii. See also Smith's Researches. In 1846 he began his translation of the Bible into Arabic, having the assistance of Dr. Edward Robinson on a journey in 1852, and contributed materially to the accuracy and discoveries of Robinson's Researches. In 1838 Dr. Smith accompanied Dr. Edward Robinson on a journey from Suez through the Sinaitic peninsula and up the Jordan. He accompanied the same scholar on his journey in 1832, and contributed materially to the accuracy and discoveries of Robinson's Researches. In 1846 he began his translation of the Bible into Arabic, having the assistance of Butrus el-Bistany and Nasif el-Yaacbee. By August, 1853, he had completed the translation of the four Gospels. Before his death he succeeded in translating the entire New Testament, and the Pentateuch, historical books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other portions of the Old Testament. His labors have been supplemented by the scholarship of Dr. Van Dyke. Dr. Smith possessed eminent attainments in Arabic, and will always have a distinguished place in the annals of the American mission at Beyrout. For a good account of his life, see Missionary Herald, 1857, pp. 224-226.

SMITH, George, b. in England about 1825; d. at Aleppo, Aug. 19, 1876. He began life as bank-note, copper and steel plate engraver; taught himself the Oriental languages, and first came into prominence in 1866 by a contribution to The London Athenaeum, upon the Tribute of Jeth, which revealed his studies, amissually carried on at leisure moments, of the Ninevite sculptures in the British Museum. In 1867 he was appointed a senior assistant of the Lower Section in the department of Egyptian and Oriental Antiquities in the British Museum, and from thence's a爱吃 in Liverpool before he entered the field of Assyrian scholars. He made expeditions to Nineveh in 1873 at the expense of the London Daily Telegraph (newspaper), and in 1874 and 1875 on behalf of the British Museum, and obtained immense treasure in cuneiform inscriptions, etc. His most important works are the Assyrian Manuscripts (1873), History of Assyria from the Monuments (1875), The Assyrian Eponym Canon (1875), Chaldean Account of Genesis (1876, new ed. by Sayce, 1880), History of Sennacherib. See Cooper: Biographical Dictionary, supplement, s.v.; art. Cuneiform Inscriptions.

SMITH, Henry Boynton, D.D., LL.D., an eminent American scholar and divine; b. in Portland, Me., Nov. 21, 1815; d. in New York, Feb. 7, 1877. He was graduated at Bowdoin College in the class of 1834; studied theology at Andover and Bangor, mission before he entered the Episcopal Church, and librarian, at Bowdoin. Late in 1837 he went abroad on account of ill-health, and passed the winter in Paris, hearing lectures at the Sorbonne, at the Institute, and at the Royal Academy. The next two years were spent chiefly at Halle and Berlin, in enriching his mind with the treasures of German thought and culture. The friendships formed at this time with Tholuck, Ulrici, Neander, Twesten, Baron von Kottwitz, Kahnis, Besser, Godet, and others, eminent then or since as theologians and men of faith, he counted among the greatest blessings of his life abroad. After a short visit to England, he returned home in the summer of 1840, and was at once licensed to preach the gospel. But his health again gave way, delaying his settlement until the close of 1842, when he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church at West Amherst, Mass. Here he labored four years with zeal and success, supplying also during two winters the chair of Hebrew at Andover. In 1847 he became professor of mental and moral philosophy in Amherst College. In 1850 he accepted a call to the chair of church history in the Union Theological Seminary of New York City. Three years later he was transferred to the chair of systematic theology. In both departments he wrought with the hand of a master, and, alike by his teaching and his writings, won a commanding position as one of the foremost scholars and divines of the country. His influence was soon felt throughout the Presbyterian Church, and was especially powerful in shaping opinion in the New School branch of it to which he belonged. He wrote a good deal for the editorial columns of The New-York Evangelist, on religious and ecclesiastical topics of the day; while in The American Theological Review, in The Presbyterian Quarterly and Princeton Review, he discussed the leading philosophical and theological questions of the age. Of the first-named review he was the sole editor, and of the other two he was joint editor. He contributed articles on Schelling, Hegel, Calvin, Pantheism, the Reformed Churches, and other subjects, to Appletons' Cyclopaedia. In 1859 he published Tables of Church History, a work embodying the results of vast labor. In 1863 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly at Philadelphia, and the next year, at Dayton, preached a sermon before the Union and Ecclesiastical Re-union, which did much to bring together again the two severed branches of the Presbyterian Church. He took a leading part in the memorable Union Convention at Philadelphia in 1867. During the war he wrote very ably in support of the national cause. In 1859 he revisited Europe, also in 1866, and again in 1869. The latter visit, which was caused by overwork and the breaking-down of his system, lasted a year and a half, and included a journey...

to the East. After his return he resumed his labors in the seminary, but with health so greatly enfeebled, that early in 1874 he resigned his chair, and was made professor emeritus. After long struggles with disease, and severe suffering, he entered into rest.

Whether regarded as a theologian, as a philosophical thinker, or as a general scholar and critic, Dr. Smith was one of the most gifted and accomplished men of his time. Such was the opinion of him often expressed by those best qualified to judge, both at home and abroad. Unfortunately, with the exception of his invaluable History of the Church of Christ, in Chronological Tables, his writings consist chiefly of occasional discourses, essays, and reviews. But, although occasional, they discuss many of the most important and vital questions of the age; and they do it with such exhaustive power, that in several instances the discourse or essay might readily be enlarged into a book, with no other change than that of greater fulness of statement and illustration. His address at Andover in 1849, on The Relations of Faith and Philosophy, may serve as an example. The strong points are so vividly presented, the principles involved are set forth with such distinctness, the discussion is so luminous and complete, that a whole treatise on the subject could hardly add to the force of the argument. This address was greatly admired, and at once attracted to its author general attention. It was reprinted in Edinburgh, and elicited the highest praise from such men as Sir William Hamilton and Rev. Dr. John Millar. Referring to this address, and to the inaugural discourse on Church History, Mr. Bancroft, the eminent historian, wrote to Dr. Smith, "I know no one in the country but yourself who could have written them." It is not too much to say that the United States has produced no theologian who combined in a higher degree than Dr. Smith, great learning, the best literary and philosophical culture, wise, discriminating thought, and absolute devotion to Christ and his kingdom. It is deeply to be regretted that he was not spared to give to the public his theological system. It had been elaborated with the utmost care, contained the ripe fruit of his genius, as well as of his faith and his lifelong studies, and would have been a lasting boon to the world. Its informing idea is happily expressed in his early address at Andover; as, e.g., in the passage, "Christianity is not only an historic revelation and an internal experience, but also an organic, diffusive, plastic, and triumphant force in human history; and in this history, as in the revelation and as in the experience, the centre around which all revolves is the person of Jesus Christ." Professor Smith was specially gifted as a theological teacher, arousing enthusiasm in his students, inspiring them with reverence for the Holy Scriptures, fostering in them a devout, earnest, catholic spirit, dealing gently and wisely with their doubts; and impressing upon them continually, alike by example and instruction, the sovereign claims of their Redeemer, the glory of his kingdom, and the blessedness of a life consecrated to him. His services to the Union Theological Seminary were varied and inestimable. The Presbyterian Church in the United States also owes him a lasting debt of gratitude. He has been called "the hero of re-union," and certainly no man better merited the praise. His genial influence as a teacher of divine truth was equally wide and strong, and, wherever felt, it was an ennobling and irreligion influence, tending to exalt the faith once delivered to the saints, and to draw closer together all sincere disciples of Jesus. Nor did his influence cease with his death. His name continues to be spoken with love and reverence; his opinions are still full of vital force; and all schools of Christian thought appeal to him as to a master in Israel. A very full and admirable account of him will be found in Henry Boynton Smith: His Life and Work, edited by his wife, New York, 1881. See also Faith and Philosophy, Discourses and Essays by Henry B. SMITH, John, the Cambridge Platonist; b. at Achurch, near Oundle, in Northamptonshire, 1618; entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, April, 1638; chosen fellow of Queen's, 1644; d. there Aug. 7, 1652. His fame rests upon his posthumous Select Discourses (London, 1660, 4th ed., Cambridge, 1859), which "show an uncommon reach of understanding, and penetration, as well as an immense treasure of learning in their author." See his biography in the Discourses; JOHN TULLOCH: Rational Theology, vol. ii.; art. PLATONISTS (CANTABRIDGE).

SMITH, John Cotton, D.D., Protestant-Episcopalian; b. at Andover, Mass., Aug. 4, 1826; d. in New-York City, Monday, Jan. 9, 1882. He was a descendant of John Cotton and Cotton Mather, and a grandson of Dr. Leonard Woods; graduated at Bowdoin College in 1847; was from 1850 to 1852 rectors of St. John's Church, New-York City, and a son of Dr. Leonard Woods; graduated at Bowdoin College in 1847; was from 1850 to 1852 rector of St. John's Church, New-York City, and from 1852 to 1859, assistant minister in Trinity Church, Boston; and from 1860 till his death, rector of the Church of the Ascension, New-York City. He was an able scholar, an eloquent preacher, a most influential leader of thought in his church, and one of the originators of the "Church Congress;" while in his public relations he was a large-hearted philanthropist, ready to do all in his power for the general good; prominently connected with the Bible Society, the Evangelical Alliance, the Board of Missions, and particularly interested in tenement-house reform. He edited Church and State, was a frequent contributor to the press, and published Misellania, Old and New (New York, 1878), and Brier Hill Lectures on Present Aspects of the Church, New York, 1881. By his writings, sermons, and addresses, and by the attractive influence of his personal character, he did more, perhaps, than any one person of his time to develop a generous spirit of mutual intercourse between various schools of thought, and that state of harmony which now prevails in the Episcopal Church.

SMITH, John Pye, D.D., L.L.D., b. at Sheffield, May 25, 1774; d. at Guilford, Surrey (London), Feb. 5, 1851; an English Congregational divine and author; studied theology at Rotherham College, under Rev. Dr. Edward Williams; was professor of theology at Homerton College from 1805 to 1850. A man of unusual learning, and of most admirable Christian spirit. He was one of the earliest professors to recognize the value of the contributions to theology made by German scholars, and to essay a reconciliation between modern science and divine revelation, bringing on himself thereby no small suspicion on the part of less enlightened brethren. His Scripture Testimony to the Messiah (London, 1816-21, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1898) is an elaborate exegetical study of all the passages of Scripture referring to Christ. In Four Discourses on the Sacrifice and Priesthood of Jesus Christ (London, 1828, 5th ed., Edinb., 1898) he defends the Evangelical against the Socinian doctrine. Scripture and Geology (London, 1859, 5th ed., 1868) was the Congregational Lecture for 1839. His First Lines of Christian Theology was published after his death (1854, 2d ed., 1860), and contains his lectures to his classes, in syllabus form. See J. SMITH, Samuel Stanhope, D.D., L.L.D., Presbyteriant; b. at Pequea, Penna., March 16, 1750; d. at Princeton, N.J., Aug. 21, 1819. He was graduated from Princeton College, 1776; tutor there, 1770-73; first president of Hampden Sidney College, 1777; professor of moral philosophy, 1779; and president, 1794-1812. In 1798 he was a member of the committee which drew up the Form of Government of the Presbyterian Church. He had a high reputation as a pulpit orator and a college president. He published Sermons, New York, 1790; Evidence of a Christian Religion, Phila., 1809; Moral and Political Philosophy, Trenton, N.J., 1812; Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, New Brunswick, N.J., 1815; (posthumous) Sermons, with Memoir, Philadelphia, 1821, 2 vols. See Sprague: Annals, iii. 335-345.

SMITH, Sydney, Church of England; b. at Woodford, Essex, June 3, 1777; d. in London, Feb. 22, 1845. He was graduated at Oxford, 1792; took holy orders, 1794; was minister of Charlotte Episcopal chapel, Edinburgh, 1797-1802; canon of Bristol, 1828; and canon residentiary of St. Paul's, 1831. He is one of the most famous of English wits; but he was also a forcible, earnest preacher, and a sagacious critic and reviewer. He was the first editor of The Edinburgh Review. Besides numerous Sermons, he published Letters on the Subject of the Catholics by Peter Plymley, London, 1808, which did much to promote Catholic emancipation, and Elementary Sketches of Moral Philosophy, 1830. See his Memoir by his daughter, Lady Holland, London and New York, 1865, 2 vols., and the art. in Allibone.

SMITH, William Andrew, D.D., a leading minister of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. at Fredericksburg, Va., Nov. 28, 1802; d. at Richmond, Va., March 1, 1870. His parents dying while he was yet a child, he was cared for and brought up in the family of Mr. Hill, a worthy merchant of Petersburg, Va. He professed religion at seventeen years of age, prepared for the ministry, and was admitted into the Virginia Conference in 1825. He rose rapidly to eminence in the conference. In 1838 he was appointed agent for Randolph-Macon College, then in its infancy. In September of that year, by a painful accident, he was made a cripple for life. He continued to fill many of the most important stations in his conference until 1846, when he was elected to the presidency of Randolph-Macon College, and while here he raised, largely by his own personal efforts, an endowment of one hundred thousand dollars. This position, as well as that of professor of mental and moral philosophy, he filled with great acceptability and efficiency until 1866, when he moved to St. Louis, Mo. After serving here as pastor of Centenary Church for two years, he became president of Central College, located at Fayette in that State, and raised for the institution at once, by his personal exertion, about a hundred thousand dollars. About this time he became the victim of a fatal malady, which two years later, while on a visit to Richmond, Va., terminated in his death. He was a member of every general conference from 1832 till his death. At the eventful general conference of 1844 he took a specially prominent part; and in the celebrated appeal of Rev. Francis A. Harding, and in the extra-judicial trial of Bishop James O. Andrew, he won a national reputation for deliberative and forensic eloquence and for rare powers of argument and debate. From that time he became one of the foremost men in Southern Methodism. He was a hard student and an earnest thinker. His sermons were clear, forcible, and instructive, being able discussions of the cardinal doctrines of the gospel. He was more of a logician than of an orator, yet his logic was not cold and dry, but steeped in emotion, and aglow with zeal. His ministry was blessed with powerful revival. He was always bold to avow and defend his sentiments, regardless of consequences. The vigor and clearness of his intellect, his candor, independence, energy, and unquestioned ability, caused him to stand in the front rank of the leading minds in the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. (See biographical sketch by Bishop J. C. Granberry, in the General Minutes for 1870.) His Philosophy and Practice of Slavery (Nashville, 1857) attracted wide attention, and was universally recognized as one of the ablest presentations of the Southern side of the slavery question ever published. SMYRNA, situated on the Hermean Gulf on the coast of Lydia, became very prosperous after the time of Alexander the Great, and was, during the first two centuries of the Christian era, one of the principal commercial centres of the world, and the richest and most beautiful city of Asia Minor. It contained a Jewish and a Christian congregation, and the latter had occasion to prove its faith under persecutions instituted by the former (Rev. i. 11, ii. 8). Its venerable bishop, Polycarp, suffered martyrdom under Marcus Aurelius in 169. The city was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake in 178. It has now a mixed population of about 150,000. Cambridge man; matriculated as a prizeman of Christ's College, 1571, where John Milton afterwards studied; took his B.A. 1575-76; was elected a fellow, and commenced his M.A. 1579; afterwards he was lecturer at Lincoln, and then became vicar of Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, Eng. Seized by the bishops, he was restless, irreverent, and thoroughgoing. At the university he was cited before the vice-chancellor for defending Sunday, and at Gainsborough he battled against the separatists in defence of the English Church. But his persistent pursuit of truth precluded content with Puritanism. For "nine months he was perplexed about the "separation," and disputed with the chief Puritan leaders, but only to become pastor of a church of the separatist or independent type in the year 1602. How he became a Baptist is not clear. An old church book at Crowle, Lincolnshire, whose authentic character Dr. Dexter vehemently denies, says he was baptized in 1606, at midnight, in the River Don, by Elder John Morton. But his adversaries charged him with baptizing himself. Be that as it may, it is clear that he emigrated, along with his little flock, to Amsterdam, where he was sometimes pastor to a company of honest and godly men, forming "the Second English Church at Amsterdam," and sustaining himself by practicing physic. Since 1591 James Arminius had been setting forth his theological theses in opposition to Gomarus; and the "First English Church," a Barrowist or separatist Church, of which Francis Johnson was pastor, and Henry Ainsworth, teacher, was vigorously discussing the burning question of the hour—the nature of a visible church. In these circumstances Smyth accepted Arminian doctrine, took an anti-Pedobaptist view of baptism, and, along with Thomas Helwys, published a "Confession of Faith," in twenty-six articles, of the General-Baptist pattern. Smyth died; but Helwys and some of his comrades came to London, and founded the General-Baptist Church of England. Smyth was a man of incorruptible sincerity, beautiful humility, glowing charity, a fair scholar, and a good preacher.

General Baptists, also called Arminian, Free-will, and Free Baptists. I. Origin.—Traces of churches of the General-Baptist type are found in the reign of Henry VIII., at Eythorne, Kent, Eng., and Bocking, or Braintree, in Essex. But the organized life of the General Baptists dates from 1611 (that of the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists from 1633), and becomes a distinct historical and continuous force under the leadership of John Smyth (q.v.), Thomas Helwys, John Morton, Leonard Brushe, Henry Denne, and Dr. Du Veil.

II. Their Doctrinal Basis embraced, (1) the universality of redemption, hence the name of "General," (2) the obligation of baptism on all believers in Christ, (3) the essentially spiritual character of the church, and (4) the principle of absolute religious liberty, along with other doctrines common to the Reformed Faith of the opening years of the seventeenth century. Professor Masson, in his Life of Milton, vol. iii., states that the General Baptists were the first to pronounce with energy and distinctiveness in favor of the great modern idea of absolute liberty of conscience. Cf. Busher's book quoted at end.

III. Their organization embraced, (1) "assemblies," for the transaction of business common to the welfare of all the churches, not annual at first, but as occasion required; (2) "messengers," or "apostles," who visited the churches to "stir them up," and were also sent out to preach, not only in different parts of England, but also to Ireland, and even to Virginia and South Carolina (MSS. Proceedings of General Baptist Assembly, vol. ii. 32); (3) "elders," or pastors of churches; (4) "deacons," or helps in government. The churches were not fixed to any one building, but consisted of members scattered over wide areas, meeting in several buildings, and sometimes having two or three "elders." The discipline was not very rigid, and extended to speech and dress. In this and other matters they were closely akin to the early Friends, or Quakers.

IV. Growth.—The General Baptists spread rapidly in the first quarter of a century of their existence. In 1649 there were forty churches in London. During the Commonwealth they were planted in most of the midland and southern counties of England, and had grown so extensively that Thomas Grantham (1634-92), author of Christianismus Primitivus (published 1678, London), describes a petition presented to Charles II. in 1692, representing 30,000 General Baptists. Increased to 30,000 in 1692, they must have been one of the most numerus, as they were one of the most vigorous, of the English religious bodies. V. Decay.—Several causes contributed to the rapid decline which followed. (1) They lacked organizers, like George Fox and John Wesley, and not a few General-Baptist churches passed over to the Quakers. (2) Men of culture and ability were rare in the ministry. An educated pastorate was slighted. (3) They made their centre rural, and not metropolitan. (4) But chiefly they fell under the blight of that negative and critical spirit which nearly destroyed English Presbyterianism, enervated the Particular Baptists, Independents, and Episcopalians, and made the eighteenth century one of feeble convictions and sharp debate, of acute reasoning and practical godlessness. Matthew Caffyn, one of the "messengers," and elder of Horsham Church, in Surrey, was charged with Arianism. Discussion concerning the person of Christ became heated and hurtful; and in 1696 a rupture took place, and a fresh body, called "The General Association," was formed, in repudiation of Arianism. Three years afterwards a reconciliation was effected on a seemingly orthoodox basis; but it was not enduring, and in 1709 the friends of comprehension withdrew, and reorganized themselves on the "Six Principles" of Heb. vi. 1, 2, and the declarations of the Assembly of 1663. This division lasted till 1731, when they came together again on the understanding that difference of opinion concerning the Trinity and the person of Christ should be allowed.

VII. The New Connexion.—For the next forty years Arianism was quietly gaining sway, when in 1770 the New Connection of General Baptists was formed in Whitechapel, London, out of (1) ten churches, containing 659 members, belonging to the assembly, and located in the south; (2) five churches, embracing 876 members, in Leicester, Wiltshire, and other districts, that had formed themselves on the General Baptist type solely by the study of the Scriptures; and (3) a community of 69 members, which arose in a similar fashion in Yorkshire under the Methodist Dan Taylor (q.v.), who afterwards became the leader of the New Connection. The object of this new federation was "to revive experimental religion or primitive Christianity in faith and practice;" and the basis of agreement added to the principles above named (§11) the declaration that "our Lord Jesus is God and man united in one person, or possessed of divine perfection unity of God firmly to believe." The 1,600 members in 1870, and is affiliated for classical and scientific 21,066 in 1870, and 26,621 in 1888. A college of Persuasive to Early Pietists, etc., and were greatly 3,178 in 1795, 7,673 in 1820, 17,913 in 1845, sprang in 1816 from the impact of the earnest 21,068 in 1870, and 26,621 in 1883. A college (now at Nottingham, Rev. Thomas Gosdby, B.A., principal) was started in 1797 by Dan Taylor. It has two scholarships (value, £30 each), a large library, thirteen students, an income of £800 per annum, and is affiliated for classical and scientific tuition with the Nottingham University. Home-mission work was started in 1811, and last year received over £2,000. Missions to Orissa, India, sprang in 1816 from the impact of the earnest spirit of the Rev. J. G. Pike (1784–1854), author of Persuasives to Early Piety, etc., and were greatly promoted by Francis Sutton, D.D. (1802–54), author of the hymn "Hail, sweetest, earliest tie that binds," and originator of the missions of the Free Baptists of America to Northern Orissa, and of the Baptist mission to the Telugus. The society also works in Rome, Italy. Income, £8,000 per annum. The Building Fund, established in 1865, has a capital of £6,000. Four thousand pounds were spent on Sunday-school work in 1892. The Magazine, started in 1798, has a large circulation (Rev. John Clifford, M.A., D.D., editor). There are 191 churches in England, with 25,431 members, and 143 ministers; in Orissa, 9 churches, 16 mission-stations, 16 missionaries, 22 native ministers, 5 ministerial students, 1,175 church-members, and a native Christian community of 3,964; in Rome there is one church of 16 members, two mission-rooms, a missionary, and an evangelical.

VII. In the original body an unaggressive Arianism has gradually gained the ascendant; and for more than a century there has been a steady decline in numbers, interest, and power. Some of the churches have joined the new body; others have united with the Free Baptists; but more have become defunct. In 1801 there were 115 churches and 1,300 members; in 1830 there is not half a score of churches, nor 500 members; and the only two churches that are thriving have pastors from the New Connection, who have been accepted without any surrender of belief.

SNETHEN, Nicholas, Methodist-Protestant, was born at Fresh Pond (Glen Cove), Long Island, N.Y., Nov. 15, 1796; d. at Princeton, Ind., May 30, 1845. From 1794 until 1830 he was a minister of the Methodist–Episcopal Church; but in 1830 he joined in the organization of the Methodist–Protestant Church, and took thenceforth a prominent position in it. He preached in all parts of the country, and was much admired for his eloquence. He published Reply to O'Kelly's Apology, 1800; Lectures on preaching the Gospel, 1822; Sermons (posthumous edition, W. G. Snethen), 1846. See ALLISON, a. M., DRAKE, a. M.

SOCIALISM. This word, of modern origin, does not explain itself fully. By its connection with social, socialize, it ought to denote a doctrine or system which aims to make men social, or, more exactly, to bring about the ends involved in the social nature of man; or, if we give prominence to the supposed abuses of society, the system of equity and equality by which the abuses which are found in society, especially in old, established societies, may be removed. Giving to it some such definition, we find it to be a broader term than communism, which, by rules freely adopted, or by public force, aims at a common life on principles of equity, as far as their application is possible amid the natural differences of human beings. But communicative experiments, although numerous if we glean them carefully out of the history of mankind, are all on the small scale, and, for the most part, are tried for particular purposes, such as for the pursuit of a religious life; or they are mere rhetorical speculations, which seldom are put into practice. They are temporary, like the early Christian community at Jerusalem, where the exceptional poverty of many believers led to an equality of goods; or they are sanctioned by political communities, owing to a pervading opinion, of their religious character, or for some other use, like monastic brotherhoods:

or, whatever be the principle of their unions, they need the consent of the government and society to their existence, and thus depend on the general will of the great community around them, as well as on the permanent will of a succession of members, to keep up the same forms of common life. Thus, unless the society which surrounds them, although constructed on wholly different principles, defends and protects them, they will dwindle away, or will disband of themselves. Where they have been tolerably successful, their success seems to be partly due to an abridgment of the rights of the families of which they are composed, and to a mode of life, which, if adopted by all, would be far from promoting the ends of human brotherhood.

Communism, then, is no cure, on any theory, for the evils or corruptions of society. If it had a cure within itself, it could be of little avail, inasmuch as it withdraws its healing influences from society, and yet depends on society for protection. All separate communities, therefore, contain an anti-social principle. They are in spirit unlike families, and to a certain extent there is an opposition between their feeling and that of families. The family is so small a society, that it is obliged to look for the supply of a multitude of wants to the outside world, and feels the protection of society in all things and continually. "The union of family life and communal life," as we have elsewhere remarked, "is not fitted to make the community system flourish. The two are different, and, to an extent, hostile principles. The family must draw off the interests of its members from the larger or communistic body which encloses it, and concentrate them on itself." "The family implies a sort of privacy and seclusion from the world, without separation: the community implies separation from the world, and a new unity, inconsistent with, or controlling, the family union." Plato, in his republic, would not let the citizens of the warrior class know who their own children were, because they would thus have separate and personal interests. The communist spirit, as distinguished from the socialist, is indifferent to the good of the family, or hostile to it, and makes use of the interests of society for its own protection, without doing anything for society itself. If a whole nation were divided up into communities, the national strength and the family tie both would be weakened. A state so constituted would resemble, in important respects, one consisting of small brotherhoods, or gentes, or septs, but with much less of the family tie than is found in the latter when general society is as yet undeveloped.

We now come to consider the essence and genius of socialism: and here at the outset we labor under a serious difficulty; it has never been tried, and remains as yet a theory. Communist systems have been tried, and one system learns from the failures and follies of an earlier system, without doing any great harm to society and the state; or it may remain untried, a beautiful vision, serving to show the distance of society at present from the perfect idea of a commonwealth. But a socialist theory cannot be put to the test without becoming part of the public law, or, rather, without having an effect on government, by which the state exercises control over labor and capital, and over every thing in which they enter. And, in order to do this, the existing capital must be prevented from doing what it does now: hence as capital, through the rights of testament and inheritance, now presents a firm front to sweeping changes of laws, and has continued to do this for ages, there must be a sudden or a gradual crumbling of these rights, and a destruction of capital on a scale such as the world has never seen. No conquest of civilized lands by barbarians ever swept from a land its motives to industry, its landowners, its manufacturers. Its capital in general, to such an extent as such a system of reform. A revolution in industry, in property, in ownership, more thorough than has ever been known, must be the preface of this new social system: and the principles on which the revolution would be begun would prevent the system of free competition, free movement and choice of work, free use of capital, from appearing again, except by a similar revolution long afterwards, begun on the ruins of vast social experiment.

It is evident, that, in order to bring about such a revolution in the relations of capital to labor, the government itself must be invested with new power, such as no constitutional government has ever had, and no people has ever favored. The necessity of absolute power in the state has been acknowledged by socialists to be indispensable, as a means of overthrowing the existing relations of capital to labor. And, indeed, the necessity is too apparent to be doubted. If the state itself is to take the office of being sole capitalist, all other proprietors must be sooner or later "exploited." If it is to be the sole producer, through its capital invested in machinery and land, it can have, of course, no competitor. If, for instance, it decides what kinds of stuffs for wear shall be made, of course no others from abroad can be imported and sold in the land. It must determine the quality and quantity of things made. It must own the manufacturers, it must put an end to all money-lending by private persons. Its power is shown to be tremendous by the single consideration that it must be authorized to remove laborers en masse from place to place, and to decide practically what objects shall be made in all the employments of life.

The experiment of modern times which comes nearest to socialism is that initiated by Louis Blanc, who has recently died, after winning distinction by his historical writings, and who was so prominent in his party at the downfall of Louis Philippe, in 1848, as to be chosen a member of the Provisional Government in France. He had, however, but a brief opportunity to put his plan of organizing labor into practice. Being compromised in the disturbances of May, 1848, he fled to England, where he lived many years. His social starting-point is not a new one.

"It is not the man who is responsible for his wrong-doings, but society which is strong, and settled on a good basis, will make the individual good. The evils of slavery flow from inequality, and that from property. Property, then (i.e., personal or family property), is the great scourge of society: it is the veritable public crime.

"Government should be the supreme regulator of production, land to be invested in the great workshop of society, and to accomplish its task. It should raise money, which should be appropriated without payment of interest, for the creation of social workshops (ateliers) in the most important branches of national industry. In these workshops there should be the same wages for all. They should form a solidarity among themselves, and thus, when united with agricultural labor, would constitute one whole industry of the country. The funds necessary for this organization of labor could be in part derived from lapsed collateral inheritance. The affect of this, united ateliers would obviously be to render it impossible for private undertakers to compete with the national shops. Thus concurrence would cease, and private work would yield the state, or socialistic system.

"In 1848 this system of Louis Blanc was so far put to the test that public ateliers were opened; and in Paris a hundred and fifty thousand workmen were employed in them at a daily expense of fifty thousand dollars. National ruin was near, if the system should continue. The workmen proved to be a dangerous element in the population. The enemt of May and that of June, in which many of the workmen in these national ateliers took part, furnished a pretext for putting an end to the experiment."—See COMMUNISM AND SOCIALISM, pp. 123, 124, by the writer of this article.

The importance of what Louis Blanc projected lay, not in the novelty of his suggestions, but in his bringing the minds of men to a practical point, where the transformation of society could begin without any preparatory overturning. It was also instructive in showing what could be easily foretold—that the difficulties of a transition from a condition of individual property and free acquisition to the abolition of individual property is no easy one. In fact, a change like this could not be accomplished without a struggle of classes and interests such as has seldom, if ever, been known in the world; and, if it should succeed in a single country, every contiguous country, every civilized country, would feel the necessity of resisting it to preserve its own prosperity, its commerce, its safety against the strife of classes, its good hopes for the future. Yet the danger in a number of European states from socialistic doctrines was soon shown to be serious. A class of society, which was now called the proletariat, or the laboring-class, began to take an attitude of hostility to the bourgeoisie, or class of employers, in many parts of Europe, and a division of society began to arise which had been unknown in the world; and, if it should succeed in a single country, every contiguous country, every civilized country, would feel the necessity of resisting it to preserve its own prosperity, its commerce, its safety against the strife of classes, its good hopes for the future. The Workingmen's Union, founded by Lassalle, had prooccupied the field. Our limits forbid us to speak of the proceedings of this union at any length. At the congress of Lausanne, in 1867, it was maintained that "modern production on a great scale renders co-operative industry a necessity," and "that the state ought to be made the holder of the means of transport and circulation in order to annihilate the powerful monopoly of great companies." At the congresses of 1868 and 1869 a report on property revealed a difference of opinion, proving that the extreme theorists had not yet got complete ascendency. In 1868 it was decided that the ways of communication, and forests, soil, mines, coal-pits, and railroads ought to be common property. Dupont, general secretary of the International, used at this congress the following language: "We want no governments any longer, for governments oppress us by taxes; we want no armies any more, for armies butcher and murder us; we want no religion any longer, for religion stifles the understanding." At the congress of Basel in 1869, it was moved and carried that society may abolish individual property, putting collective property in its place in the soil. On the same occasion a motion that the right of inheritance ought to be completely and "radically" abolished did not meet with entire acceptance. In consequence of the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, no congress of this union was held in 1870; and the horrors during the siege of Paris in 1871, which were, without due cause, ascribed to the members of the International as originators, put the International under the ban of Europe. Socialism could not stand under the crimes of those with whom it sympathized.

The Workingmen's Union was founded a little after the International, by a brilliant and accomplished man, Ferdinand Lassalle, whose early death was followed by the division of his adherents. Universal suffrage adopted by the North German Confederation weakened it again by satisfying the more modern and the more preachers among the socialists. In 1869 Liebknecht, an old socialist, founded the Social Democratic Workingmen's Party; and this was succeeded by the Socialistic Workingmen's Party, at Gotha, in 1875. The extreme principles of the International prevailed in this new organization, as they have done in Germany ever since, over the more moderate form of socialism that was in vogue before.

Meanwhile, in 1871, the new empire was established; and, in the Reichstag, socialist representatives, few, yet in increasing numbers, have had an opportunity to ventilate their opinions. Outside of the political arena, several professors of political economy have some leaning toward socialist doctrines, although disagreeing among themselves. Such are Brentano, Schmoller, Schaeffle, F. A. Lange. The socialist party is also extremely active in propagating its opinions through the press. Its strength at the polls has been estimated as being in 1877 from six to eight hundred thousand.

We close our sketch of socialism with considering some of the results to society from the system, if it should ever become predominant.

1. At present the instruments of work belong to the class of the capitalists. The dependence of the working-class, due to this fact, is held to be a cause of misery, and of competition, which are at present reduced to their minimum. To liberate work, the means of production must be converted into the common property of society. Thus all land and instruments must cease to belong to private persons. All capitalists must be stripped of their possessions, however small in extent. The incomes of the present owners may be converted into terminable annuities, if states are able to take on them such a burden. The reward of work, or wages, is, according to the doctrine of Marx, to be measured by time spent in work. Whether this principle would not ruin the whole plan is doubtful; for a sense of injustice on the part of the faithful would be roused against the idle, and thus some other measure of comparative wages would be demanded.

Whether this principle would not ruin the whole plan is doubtful; for a sense of injustice on the part of the faithful would be roused against the idle, and thus some other measure of comparative wages would be demanded.

3. Tickets of work are to be given to each workman, which will entitle him to the value of his day's work, estimated in the productions which he needs. As all production is for the state, and as all production must be supplied by those who have taken upon themselves the work of supply into its own hands, when there is so much uncertainty in the action of causes under new conditions. We turn to another side of the subject,—to its relation to the family, the state, to individual character and the progress of society. Here, whatever side we take, we find there is an infinite complication in the process, when the government takes the work of supply into its own hands.

4. By this process all money is superseded, except so far as dealings with foreign lands, where barter cannot be made use of, are concerned. Drafts must be issued by the government, and be payable in so many tickets of work.

5. The government, being the only employer, is free from all competition. But what is to prevent over-production, which is checked at present by want of sale? What is to prevent comparative over-production of articles in great use; for instance if too little food were produced to meet the amount of things manufactured?

6. The government, being the only transporter and distributor, will be liable to an infinity of mistakes, which are at present reduced to their minimum by individual caution. Wants of one thing, or in one place, cannot be supplied in another place in vogue. The prevention, by competition; for competition is excluded by the system. Every change must be provided for by the government, and new wants be met by new supplies, according to its judgment. The present rapid movements of industry would be retarded by the clogs and breaks necessary in the action of central power.

7. International exchanges would add to the difficulties of a socialist state. It must own vessels, collect things produced elsewhere, and pay for them by barter of productions not needed at home, or by purchasing gold and silver. Here, again, the stimulus of competition being necessarily absent, the agents of a government would be brought into straits which might be of most serious injury.

8. It must not be supposed that all the final results of labor will accrue to the laborer. The certificates of work will amount to an immense sum; but the deductions from them must be immense also. The expenses of governments, the support of all transports, of education, of the poor, the sick, the disabled, the police, of legislation, official salaries,—which in such a state would include the payment to all who buy, sell, or carry,—the prevention, trial, and punishment of crime, the care of roads, protection of every kind of sort, workman, in all its fortune. The incomes of the present owners may be converted into terminable annuities, if states are able to take on them such a burden. Thus all land and instruments must cease to belong to private persons. All capitalists must be stripped of their possessions, however small in extent. Could so vast a city as London, or even as New York, be sure of not being exposed to famines on the plan of destroying private capital?

SOCIALISM. 33—III

of Socialism, that it is "through and through irreligious, and hostile to the church." But perhaps this may be owing to the fact that the religious institutions of society have hitherto been bulwarks against revolutionary causes like socialism, and that religious feeling involves a spirit of subordination to existing order, except when such order strikes at the roots of religion itself. In the social state it would be wholly uncertain whether a nation of laborers could or would restore religious brotherhood on the foundation of the New Testament, when once state churches should be overthrown.

And again: how would socialism affect individual character? Here we notice, first, that mere equality, with no power to rise above the condition of birth, —a form of life where competition, and advantage from special energy or ability are cut off,— would deaden nearly all the motives by which human nature is at present carried for war.

entire equality, the government's absolute control, would deaden nearly all the motives by which human nature is at present carried for war. Do we not thus come back again to a state of servitude? And, if all have an equal voice in the choice of the governors of society, are not all equally under a government most absolute? The monopoly, listlessness, and want of hope, of such a state of things, are not likely to improve human nature, or become a remedy for evils handed down from the past.

But we may ask whether the system of socialism in which the destruction of private capital, entire equality, the government's absolute control, are essential features, can ever become a reality. Certainly not, we should say, unless it can be shown that society on its present basis is incapable of becoming better, or unless there is an inevitable tendency in every change, toward the point aimed at by socialism; for otherwise, society as at present constituted would rise en masse against the movement. The spirit of the household, the spirit of capital, all that is interested in the present, every landholder down to the smallest farmer, every one who has property, would resist to the death. And all governments would form a mutual insurance against the theorists who should demand universal change. If freedom of opinion is preserved, objects become explosive, it would be met everywhere by common resistance; for all have a common interest to shield each other from ruin. In such a case, there would be no middle ground between the ruin of socialists and the ruin of society.

SOCIÉTÉ ÉVANGÉLIQUE DE GENÈVE (the Evangelical Society of Geneva), the oldest of the Continental evangelical societies, was founded in 1831 for the spread of sound apostolic doctrine throughout Switzerland and France. It has a theological school at Geneva, supports numerous missionaries, pastors, and colportors, and is entirely dependent upon the funds yearly collected, not only in Switzerland, but in different parts of Europe, and from the United States of America. It is undenominational, having as its confession of faith substantially the creed of the Evangelical Alliance. It is the product of the revival of gospel truth which attended the labors of Robert Haldane (see art.). In the society's theological school, Gaussen, Malan, Pronier, and Merle D'Aubigné have taught. In the year from March, 1881 to March, 1882, the receipts were, from gifts and sales, 254,187 francs. In 1881 it celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, and issued a memorial volume, Récits et Souvenirs de quelques-uns de ses ouvriers. See its Annual Reports.

SOCIÉTÉ CENTRALE PROTESTANTE D'ÉVANGÉLISATION. This society, connected with the Reformed Church of France, was founded in 1852. Its centre is Paris, but it operates in all parts of France. Its object is to develop the faith of Protestants, and in every way advance the Protestant cause. It supports theological schools at Tournon and Batignolles, and numerous churches, pastors, and colportors. It has also fostered forty-two churches, that now they are independent of its help. During 1882 its receipts were 281,029 francs.

SOCINUS (Faustus) and THE SOCINIANS. Faustus Socinus, or Fausto Sozzini, was b. at Siena, 1539; d. at Lucalwice in Poland, 1604. Left an orphan at a tender age, his early education was neglected. Following the example of his ancestors, he at first devoted himself to the study of law, but corresponded with his uncle Lelio Sozzini about religious questions. In 1559 the misfortunes of his family forced him to leave Italy; and he went to Lyons, and then to Zürich, where he spent three years examining the manuscripts of his uncle. It was from there, as he himself says, that Socinus got the suggestion of some of the characteristic features of his later system. His literary activity was inaugurated with an exposition of the first part of the first chapter of John (1562), which appeared anonymously. From 1562 to 1574 he was again in Italy, and at the court of Francesco de Medici in Florence, who heaped honors and offices upon him. The most of the time between 1574 and 1578 he spent... in Basel, occupied with the elaboration of his system and disputations. The latter were the occasion of two of his principal writings. — De Jesus Christo, in qua sola potestas, against the Nestorians; and De statu primi hominis ante lapsum, against the Florentine Pucci. In 1579 he went to Poland, where the name of his uncle was still held in honor, and remained there till his death. At Cracow, Socinus applied for admission to the society of Unitarians, but was refused, except on condition of his being baptized, the Unitarians being leavened with Anabaptist notions. Socinus, not accepting admission on these grounds, employed his powers and influence to have the law changed in this regard. He was active with his pen and at synods, and he lived to see his view accepted at the synod of Rakow in 1603. In 1588, he married into a Polish family of noble birth. He was not free from abuse and persecutions, and in 1598, while ill, was taken out of his bed by Cracow students who had been incited by Roman-Catholic priests, dragged half naked through the city, and scourged, but was rescued by a university professor, M. Mangius. On this occasion, all of his books, papers, and manuscripts were burned in the market-place.

In 1605, immediately after Socinus' death, the so-called Rakow or Socinian Catechism appeared in the Polish language, for which he had made preparations. It was completed, upon the basis of these and his writings, by Moscorovius, Schlichting, Schmoller, and Völkel. A German translation was made in 1608, and a Latin one in 1609, of which a second, third, and fourth edition appeared at Amsterdam in 1665, 1680, 1684. This catechism is a very good compendium of the Socinian theology. At Socinus' death there were a number of Unitarian congregations in Poland, made up largely of noblemen. Good schools were connected with them. The city of Rakow was the chief citadel of Unitarianism, and the excellent institution of learning was attended at one time by nearly a thousand students, three hundred of whom were of noble birth. The general synod of the Socinians met there every year. Many of their theologians and preachers were celebrated. Among these were Schmalz (d. 1622), who wrote fifty-two works in defence of Socinianism; Völkel (d. 1618), a student of Wittenberg, and for a time amanuensis of Socinus, whose work, De vera religione, is a systematic presentation of the Socinian theology; Ostorodt (d. 1611), who advocated the specific Anabaptist principles of refusing to do military duty, serve in public offices, etc. and Moscorovius (d. 1595), who, amongst other things, wrote the Defence of the Socinians, which he sent to the king. Among the more distinguished men of the succeeding generation were Crell (d. 1631), a very prolific author, whose biblical commentaries, two books De uno Deo patre (the keenest Socinian attack upon the doctrine of the Trinity), and other works, fill vols. iii. and iv. of the Bibliorum Polonorum; Schlichting (d. 1681), the author of a companion volume, the Irenicum Irenicum (1584), a full literary history of his sect, and Felbinger (b. 1616), and (d. at Amsterdam, 1680), who wrote the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (1684), a full literary history of his sect, and Zwickert, the author of the Antitrinitarian System and disputations. The latter were the occasion of these harsh measures being the blasphemy of some of the students in Stoning a wooden crucifix outside of the precincts of the city. Rakow, forsaken of the Socinians, is now a poverty-stricken village. John Casimir, who ascended the Polish throne in 1648, treated the remaining Socinians who dared to show their faces at the approach of the king of Sweden as traitors; and at the diet of Warsaw (1658) it was decreed that the confession and promotion of Socinianism should be punished with death. Two years were allowed to intervene before the execution of the edict, and during that time many Socinians emigrated. A fresh edict in 1661 confirmed the preceding one. In Germany, Socinian doctrines were first taught by Ernst Soner, professor of medicine and physics at Aldorf, and about 1661 he published a Catechism of Socinianism, with success, till his death, in 1612. His principal writing is a treatise upon the eternal duration of future punishment. Aldorf became the heartstone of Socinianism, but the Council of Nürnberg forbade the publication of Socinian views there. Socinian synods were held in Kreuzburg in 1651 and 1656. In spite of the Polish exiles were permitted to remain for a while at Mannheim. In Germany the movement was always very weak and insignificant. In Holland it was more successful; and, in spite of persecutions, the Socinians increased. In 1585 the States-General demanded a pledge of the University of Leyden that it would not tolerate Socinian teaching. Some of the Polish exiles found their way to Holland. Among them three especially deserve mention: Felbinger (b. 1618), Sand (d. at Amsterdam, 1680), who wrote the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (1684), a full literary history of his sect, and Zwickert, the author of the Antitrinitarian System and disputations, the former, Irenicum Irenicum, produced a great excitement. The Socinians finally were identified with the Remonstrants. For the history of the movement in England and the United States, see art. Unitarians.

The doctrines of Socinianism are not to be regarded as identical with the doctrines of modern Unitarianism, and are laid down in the writings of Socinus, the Rakow Catechism, and the works of the principal Socinian writers down to the middle of the seventeenth century. The genuine Socinians held firmly to the authority of the Scriptures and to a very positive supranaturalism. The Rakow Catechism begins with the question: "What is the Christian religion?" Answer. "The Christian religion is the way revealed by God for securing eternal life." Christianity is a special revelation. It is made known in the Scriptures, which, clothed with divine authority, is the only source of religious knowledge. The authority of the Old Testament is not to be measured by the same value, rests upon the testimony of the New Testament. Both the Testaments are inspired documents. The sacred writers wrote under the impulse and dictation of the Divine Spirit (divino Spiritu impulse coque dictante). The Socinians, however, taught that only the essential parts, those pertaining to doctrine, were of immediate divine inspiration. The views concerning the relation of reason to revelation differ somewhat from those of orthodox Protestants. Reason is man’s spiritual eye; and, in all controverted matters, it is judge, and not the Pope or the believing Christian. The truths of revelation are above reason, but never contrary to it. Miracles are above reason, and credible. The doctrines of the trinity and divinity of Christ are contrary to reason, and therefore incredible. Wisowatry, in his Religio rationalis, went so far as to teach the agreement between the true philosophy and religion. Thus the latent rationalism in genuine Socinianism became more and more prominent.

In the department of theology, proper the usual attributes are attributed to God. His omniscience is defined in such a way that it does not conflict with the contingency of events and the freedom of the will. God does not know in such a way that whatsoever he knows will surely come to pass. If God’s knowledge, says Crell, were to make every thing necessary, then there would be no real sin, or guilt of sin. In the doctrine of the mode of the divine existence, it is taught that God is one. This proposition is based upon such passages as Deut vi. 4, Mark xii. 29, Gal. iii. 20, Eph. iv. 6, etc. The antithesis to the threefold personality of God forms the centre of the Socinian opposition to historical Christianity, and it is the special and single aim of many Socinian works to prove the doctrine of the Trinity irrational and unscriptural. The plural Elohim, Socinus explained, with Beza, as the plural of majesty. The thrice-repeated “holy” (Isa. vi. 3) is properly explained to be used for the sake of emphasis. In the case of the three men who appeared to Abraham (Gen. xviii. 2), it is shown that only one of them was called “Lord.” To the argument from passages in the New Testament in which the Son and Holy Spirit seem to be placed on an equality with the Father, as in the formula of baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19), it is replied that he in whose name believers are baptized is not necessarily God, but appears as a mediator; but the view that salvation was secured by his sufferings and death is declared as a mediator; but the view that salvation was secured by his sufferings and death is declared. The phrase “in the beginning” is declared to mean “in the beginning of the gospel,” or the Christian dispensation. The statement that “all things” were made by Christ (John i. 3; Col. i. 16) refers simply to absolute power, all things being made subject unto him.

Christ’s work is treated in the Catechism under his threefold office of prophet, priest, and king. As prophet, Christ ordained the Lord’s Supper, which is simply a memorial feast, a declaration of that which we already possess by faith. He also promised the Holy Ghost, who is not a person, but a power or activity of God, and eternal life. Looking at the priestly office, Christ is regarded as a mediator; but the view that salvation was secured by his sufferings and death is declared to be false and pernicious. The Scripture teaches very often that God forgives sins gratefully (2 Cor. v. 19, etc.), and the idea of satisfaction at complete variance with a free gift (Eph. ii. 8, 9). It is the resurrection upon which the stress is laid; and Socinus expressly declares, that it is the head and ground of all our faith and salvation in the person of Christ (caput et tanquam fundamentum totius fidei et salutis nostrae in Christi persona). The obedience Christ rendered to the law was due from him, for God had commanded him to obey. But the guilt and punishment of one cannot be borne by another. Christ had to obey for himself, and could not obey or suffer for others. The word "redemption" in the New Testament does not contain the notion of satisfaction, but simply means emancipation. The reconciliation accomplished by Christ consists simply in this, that to us who were enemies of God he showed the way to become converted, and return to God. The meaning of the atonement is, that God in Christ has shown himself to be above measure gracious (propitius). Christ's high-priestly office consists in the help he gives us. He delivers us from the punishments by reason of the absolute power which he received from the Father, and which protects us. He delivers us from the bondage of sin by keeping us from all manner of sin. This he does by presenting to our thought his own person, which remained sinless in temptation. Predestination is nothing more than the divine decree to give eternal life to as many as one cannot be borne by another. Christ had to obey. But the guilt and punishment of one cannot be borne by another. Christ had to obey for himself, and could not obey or suffer for others. The word "redemption" in the New Testament does not contain the notion of satisfaction, but simply means emancipation. Predestination is nothing more than the divine decree to give eternal life to as many as his life and death, teaching and influence of, Socinus, were so remarkable, that although he was known as "the moral philosopher of Athens," and has always been known as "the parent of philosophy," he is also entitled to a prominent Divinity, the Creator and Disposer of the universe; not div-vxia, but rtrrpafia and rtdalpavia; not the pleasure which springs from the possession of riches, honor, power, and the gifts of fortune, but that well being which results from well doing in obedience to the will of God and with the blessing of Heaven. The true, the beautiful, and the good are all essentially identical with each other, since they all consist in the intellectual and the fitting; and that which is good for nothing is neither good nor beautiful nor true. Xenophon and Plato agree in making Socrates teach that he who knows justice is just, and the man who understands virtue is virtuous: in other words, he resolves all virtue into knowledge. But it is plain from both these writers that he used knowledge in a high and comprehensive sense unusual in ethical treatises, but strikingly analogous to that in which it is used in the Scriptures. He makes knowledge identical with wisdom, and ignorance with folly and sin, just as in the Biblical wisdom is wisdom, and sin is folly: the wicked have no knowledge, while the righteous know all things. He who is truly master of the science or profession of virtue will be truly virtuous. In this high sense, knowledge is virtue, since really to know is certainly to do, and to do is the only real or true virtue. The chief good, our being's end and aim, according to the Socratic ethics, is happiness; not, however, that which most men call happiness; not erectia, but etipaia, not the pleasure which springs from the possession of riches, honor, power, and the gifts of fortune, but that well being which results from well doing in obedience to the will of God and with the blessing of Heaven. universe, the Maker and Father of mankind, the Ruler and Governor among the nations, invisible, all-powerful, omniscient, and omnipresent, perfectly wise and just and good. His method of demonstrating the existence of such a being was strictly Baconian, the same argument which Paley uses in his Natural Theology: indeed, we almost seem to be reading Paley when we read the chapters in which Xenophon records his master's arguments in proof of the divine existence and benevolence, and of the same author, of those unwritten laws in the soul of man which execute themselves, and make it impossible for any man to be unjust, or impure, or licentious, without paying the penalty (which proves a greater and better than any human lawgiver), we seem to be sitting at the feet of Bishop Butler himself.

The doctrine of Socrates touching the inferior deities, whose existence he admits, and whose agency he recognizes, particularly in the providential care of human affairs, probably did not differ essentially from the Christian doctrine of the angels; though it marks the greater elevation of the Christian revelation and the Christian consciousness, that what the most enlightened heathen called gods, and worshipped, Christians consider as only ministers of God, whom to worship were idolatry.

We have not space to enlarge upon the teaching of Socrates respecting providence and prayer. He believed himself to be under the constant guidance of a divine voice, which always warned him when he was in danger of going or doing wrong, and thus, indirectly, always led him in the right way; and he taught that every man might have the same divine guidance; and he could not but wonder at the folly and madness of men who preferred a blind and ignorant guide to one who was unerring, and perfectly acquainted with the way in which they should go. Hence his one only and constant prayer was, that God would guide him, and give him not riches, pleasure, honor, power, which were as likely to prove a bane as a blessing, but what was best for him; since God only knew what was for his true and highest good.

Socrates held the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the future life as strenuously as Plato did, but without those dreams and chimeras of its pre-existence and successive transmigrations by which the creed of the latter was disfigured; and, with these exceptions, he doubtless relied on the same arguments in proof of the doctrine which have been stated in the article on Plato and Christianity: and — what has been usually wanting in heathen philosophers, and too often in the lives of Christians also — it was the beauty and glory of Socrates' character, that his doctrine of providence and prayer and a future state was the controlling principle of his life. And so he died a martyr's death with a cheerful composure, in the full consciousness that it was God's will and the accomplishment of his mission, and that it was better for him to die than to live; not in the certainty, but in the belief, that death was not an evil, but the highest good and the richest blessing. "Bury my body as you please," he said to his friends, "but do not mourn as if you were burying Socrates. Think of me, rather, as gone to be with the wise and the good, and with God, the fountain of wisdom and goodness, in that world where alone wisdom is to be found." Such teachings, illustrated by a contentious, unselfish, heroic, missionary life, and sealed by a martyr's death — these are the main secret of his power, and these exhibit him in his true relation to Christianity. It would not be difficult, on the one hand, to point out defects in his teaching, and imperfections in his life, nor, on the other, to magnify the points of resemblance to, and encompass the founder of our holy religion. Such comparisons have been elaborately made by Priestley, for example, in his tract, Socrates and Jesus Compared, and by Baur, in his Sokrates und Christus, the second of those three treatises (Drei Abhandlungen), which were re-edited by Zeller in 1876. But the disparity is so great as to forbid comparison. The intimations of Rousseau, sceptic as he was, taught him this: "What prejudice," he says (Emile, bk. iv.), "what blindness, must it be to compare the son of Sophronius to the son of Mary! . . . If the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus Christ, those of a prophet; Socrates himself would have aspired to no higher honor than that of being a forerunner of Christ among the Greeks. That honor justly belongs to him; and his prophetic influence can easily be traced, like that of Plato, and largely through him and his followers, in the history and philosophy of the Greeks and Romans before and after Christ, while the power of his teaching and his life is still felt in the literature, the philosophy, and the religion of all Christian nations.

SOCRATES, the Greek church historian, was born in Constantinople about 380, and lived there as scholasticus. His work is a continuation of that of Eusebius, and encompasses the period from 306 to 439. It is a simple and natural report of facts, supported by rich extracts from the sources, and marred by comparatively few mistakes; but it is not distinguished by an artistic form, nor is the author above his time with respect to a critical spirit. It has been edited (Greek and Latin) by Valesius, Paris, 1659, together with the histories of Eusebius and Sozomen; by R. Hussey, Oxford, 1853, 3 vols., Greek text separately, with Introduction by W. Bright, Oxford, 1878. See DUPIN, in his Nouvelle Bibliothèque, iv., HOLZHAUSEN: De fontibus quibus S. et . . . usui sunt, Gottingen, 1825; and BAUR.
SOD'OM, the most important of four cities (Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Sodom) in the vale of Siddim, which were consumed by “brimstone and fire” out of heaven, on account of the great wickedness of their inhabitants (Gen. xix. 24). Lot lived there (Gen. xiii. 12, xix. 2), and there his daughters married (Gen. xix. 14). Chedorlaomer and his allies plundered the cities, but the captives and spoil were recovered by Abraham (Gen. xiv.). The fate of Sodom and the other cities of the plain is held up in the Bible as a warning (Deut. xxix. 23; Isa. i. 9, 10; Amos iv. 11; Matt. x. 15; 2 Pet. ii. 8–8; Rev. xi. 8), and so deeply impressed itself upon the neighboring peoples, that Strabo, in his description of the Dead Sea, (16, 2), which he erroneously calls the Sirbonian Sea, and Tacitus (Hist. 5, 7), relate, that, according to tradition, there once were cities and fruitful plains where then there was death. The question, whether these cities of the plain were upon the southern or northern end of the Dead Sea,—for the old opinion, that the sea covers the site of the cities, is given up as contradicted by geology,—is one of the most vexed in biblical geography. For the southern end the arguments are: (1) Tradition from the time of Josephus (Antiq. i., 11, 4; War, iv., 8, 4), Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.), and Jerome (Ep. cviii. 11; Comm. in Esa., xx. 8); (2) The mountain of salt at that end is called Jebel Ustum, apparently an echo of Sodom; (3) Pillars of salt detached from the great salt cliffs at that end have been called “Lot’s Wife”; (4) Abraham, standing near Hebron, saw the smoke of their burning (Gen. xix. 27, 28); (5) Numerous slime-pits, i.e., bitumen (Gen. xiv. 10) are found at that end; (6) The portion of the sea south of the Lisan Peninsula is very shallow, as if it were beyond its original limits. If the sea now covered the site of the cities, this would be the case. This view has been advocated by Robinson, Lynch, Porter, Baedecker, Schaff, and many others. For the northern end, the arguments are: (1) Lot chose the Plain of Jordan (Gen. xiii. 11), which must have been at the northern end, for in that case only could Abraham and Lot have seen it from Bethel; (2) Since the hill near Hebron was midway between the two ends of the sea, Abraham could just as well have seen the burning if it was at the northern end as if it was at the southern; (3) The presence of numerous slime-pits in the vale of Siddim, at the northern end; (4) The account of Chedorlaomer’s attack fits best with the northern site for Sodom. Prominent advocates for the northern site are Grove, Tristram, and Merrill.

The destruction of the cities of the plain was probably the result of natural causes under divine control. The explosion of gas would easily account for it all. The soil, soaked with bitumen, would easily convey the fire until all the cities were destroyed. SODOR AND MAN, an English bishopric (Sodor comes from Sorduregar, Southern Isles, corresponding to Norduregar, Northern Isles), is the name applied to the western islands of Scotland, especially to those contiguous to the Isle of Man; and hence the name of the bishopric. The income of the bishop is £2,000. SOHN, Georg, b. at Rossbach, Dec. 31, 1551; d. at Heidelberg, April 23, 1589. He studied theology at Marburg and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1574, and at Heidelberg in 1579, where he was a principal member and teacher of the Reformed Church. His works,—the principal of which are Synopsis corporis doctrinae Phil. Melanchthonis, De verbo Dei, Methodus theologica, etc.—appeared in a collected edition at Heidelberg, in 4 vols., 1581.

SOISSONS, a town of France in the department of Aisne, was the seat of a number of important synods.—I. The synod of 743 was convened by Pepin the Short, and presided over by Boniface, Archbishop of Mayence. Besides a number of secular lords, twenty-three bishops were present; and the canons issued by Caribon in 742 were confirmed, forbidding the clergy to hunt, to marry, etc., prohibiting unknown persons from performing ecclesiastical duties, enjoining the counts to suppress Paganism, etc.—II. The synod of 852 numbered twenty-six bishops, and Charles the Bald, who at that time was Archbishop of Rheims, Ebbo, had some time previously been deposed for participation in a revolt against the king,—a quite frequent accusation against the Frankish bishops,—and Hinemar had been made his successor. As Ebbo, however, shortly after, was appointed bishop of Hildesheim by Lewis the German, and confirmed by the Pope, he continued to ordain priests. But there was a canon forbidding the transference of a bishop from one diocese to another, unless with the consent of his brother-bishops; and the validity of Ebbo’s ordinances was now impeached on account of that canon. The synod declared them invalid.—III., IV., and V. The synods of 861, 862, and 866 treated the same subject.—VI. The synod of 1092 was convened to decide in the controversy between Anselm of Canterbury and Roscelin. The former accused the latter of tritheism, and the latter was compelled to recant. VII. The synod of 1121 was convened by the Papal legate, Bishop Conon of Prænestæ, to examine the writings of Abelard. As Abelard refused to attempt any defense of what he had written, he was compelled to throw his works into the fire with his own hands.—VIII. The synod of 1201 was convened by the Papal legate, Octavian, for the purpose of compelling the permission to a second marriage which the French bishop had given King Philip August, and compelling the king to take back his first wife, the Danish princess Ingeborg, whom he had repudiated.—IX. The synod of 1449, finally, was convened by the Archbishop of Rheims, John Juvenal Ursinus. It adopted the decrees of the Council of Basel concerning liturgy, and treated a number of misuses which had crept into the church. See Chr. W. Fr. SOLITARIUS, Philip, a Greek monk who lived in the latter part of the eleventh century in Constantinople, wrote a work in verse and in the form of a dialogue, under the title diáμερα, “the mirror.” It is a representation of the ascetic views of the Greek mysticism of the time. It found

SOLOMON, second son of David by Bathsheba, his successor upon the throne, and third king over Israel, who reigned forty years (1015-973 B.C.; according to Ewald, 1025-866). Compare 1 Kings i.-xi.; 2 Chron. i.-ix.; Joseph., Antt., VIII. 1-7. His early education was intrusted to the prophet Nathan, who called him Jedidiah, i.e., the beloved of Jehovah (2 Sam. xii.22,25). Through the influence of his mother, Nathan, and Zadok the priest, Solomon, at the age of twenty, was made king while his father was yet alive. Riding on the mule, attended by Nathan and Zadok, and by the king's special company of the thirty mighty men, and the body-guard under the command of Benaiah, he went down to Gihon, and was proclaimed and anointed king. Egypt at acts, showing moderation, prudence, and energy, were well adapted to gain for him the esteem and confidence of his people. The death of Joab, who had insidiously killed Abner and Amasa, and who had openly sided with Adonijah, combined justice with prudence, fulfilling at the same time David's dying counsels. Shimei also is killed at David's wish; Adonijah is put to death; Abiathar is deposed and exiled, sent to a life of poverty and shame, and the high-priesthood transferred to another family, that of Zadok. To the descendants of Barzillai he shows kindness. Such a firm and circumpect appearance secured to the new king general obedience. Soon he displayed signs of wisdom which made him known throughout the country; and, as it was the king's intention to walk in all the ways of Jehovah, the God of his father granted his desire, and endowed him with true royal wisdom. His name and his deeds made Solomon a prince of peace, under whose sceptre the people and the country prospered. But at the beginning and towards the end of his reign, in the south, north, and west some princes rose. Hadad the Edomite, who had fled into Egypt, when he had heard that David and Joab were dead, returned into his country, of which he takes possession (1 Kings xi.21,22,25). Rezon, also, gathered some men unto him, and took Damascus; but he had at last to yield to Solomon. The little kingdom of Gazer, or Geshur, between Israel and Philistia, rose also, but fell into the hands of the king of Egypt, who gave it to Solomon when he married his daughter. Solomon's success against the usurpers was sufficient to secure his authority, even beyond the confines of his own country; and for a long time peace reigned throughout his kingdom. In the beginning of his reign he married the daughter of King Bauchennes of Egypt. Many structures which Solomon had erected made his name very famous in the east and in the west. Like his father, he secured builders from Hiram, king of Tyre. For the lower menial work he used at first the "strangers," the remnant of the Canaanitish races; afterwars he used his own people, too, had to help in the work. The first great building was the magnificent temple, built after the pattern of the tabernacle, but executed in accordance with the plans which David had received from the hand of the Lord (2 Sam. xxviii.11, 19). After seven years and a half the work on the temple was completed. About the time of the feast of tabernacles, the temple was dedicated with great solemnities: the king himself addressed the assembly (1 Kings viii.). As the temple, like the Holy of holies, was intended to be the habitation of God, the "cloud," "the glory of the Lord," filled the house of the Lord. With the building of the temple a new organization of the order of the priests and Levites, which was made by David, undoubtedly took place. He appointed twenty-four orders for the service at the temple, and one same number for the choir of the temple-music. The second great building was his palace, which was built south of the temple (Neh. iii. 25). It consisted of many divisions, which served partly as magazines, partly as rooms for the king and his queens. The main building was a hundred cubits long, fifty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high. In the porch stood a great throne of ivory, and overlaid with the best gold. It stood on six steps, and twelve lions stood on each side of the same, while two lions stood beside the stays (1 Kings x.18-20; 2 Chron. ix. 17-19). The palace was connected with the temple by steps. A special seat was reserved for the king. That he also erected many other buildings, etc., we infer from 1 Kings ix. 1, 19; Eccles. ii. 4-6; Song of Songs viii. 11. He also fortified the capital, and many fortresses were built. In the organization of his army he imitated the Egyptians. He had a thousand and four hundred chariots and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, or put them in small cities. The inner administration of the kingdom was also regulated. The highest officer was the chancellor; next to him was the "scribe," who also regulated the finances. Besides he had a captain over his body-guard. The king's enormous household was supplied with provisions by the provinces of his domain.

Trade and commerce became also very flourishing under Solomon, and the revenues from these commercial enterprises by land and by sea enriched the royal treasury. Besides these direct revenues, the kings and princes of the subject provinces paid tribute in the form of gift, in money and in kind, "at a fixed rate year by year" (1 Kings x. 25).

Thus Solomon's reign marks the entrance of Israel on a nearer intercourse with the Asiatic peoples. That such an intercourse was not without an influence upon the intellect of the Jewish people, is certain. A special wisdom, whose most prominent representative Solomon himself was, was cultivated. The Queen of Sheba, attracted by his wisdom, came to his court to hear him. He also cultivated poetry (he himself is said to have composed a thousand and five hymns, besides three thousand proverbs); and historiography, no doubt, found in him a great patron.

In spite of his greatnesses, Solomon had his blemishes. Nathan his teacher was dead, without leaving another person in his stead to protect and guard him. Solomon, by his own endeavors, had to have fulfilled the duties of the theocratic ruler, without exactly needing such a support as David...

SOPHONIUS, a native of Greece; made the acquaintance of Jerome in Palestine, and is mentioned in De viris illustribus (cap. 134). He translated parts of the Old Testament, and some of Jerome's works, from Latin into Greek. His name has excited most interest, however, in connection with the translation of De viris illustribus, which Erasmus and Fabricius ascribed to him, while Vossius simply considered it a Greek exercise of Erasmus. The translation is men tioned by Suidas, however, but can hardly be the work of Sophronius. See Vallarsiis, in his edition of the works of Jerome, vol. ii. part 2, p. 818. — Another Sophronius, a monk from Damascus, is known from the Monothelite controversies as a violent adversary of the mediating attempts of the Emperor Leon VI. For a time he yielded to the admonitions of Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople; but when, in 834, he was elected patriarch of Jerusalem, he issued an Epistola encyclica (see Harduin: Acta Conc., iii.), in which he rejected all concessions to the Monophysites, and caused thereby the emperor to promulgate the edict. Other writings by him exist in manuscript. GASS.

SORBONNE, The, was originally simply a college for poor students, connected with an elementary school for the philological and philosophical education of ecclesiastics, but succeeded so well, developed so great an energy, and exercised so decisive an influence, that in course of time it came to be quite generally identified, not only with the theological faculty, but even with the university itself.

The origin of the university of Paris may be dated back to the time of Charlemagne; but a real Corpus Universitatis, with distinct faculties and nations, and a sufficient number of colleges, was not in active operation until the twelfth century. When John of Salisbury arrived in Paris (1136), he found two flourishing faculties in the university, — artes (rhetoric and philosophy, or rather dialectics) and theologia (Scripture, the Fathers, the councils, and canon law). After Gratian's compilation of decretals had been accepted and confirmed by Eugenius III., in 1151, a faculty of law was established; and its professors, though theologians, lectured not only on canon law, but also on civil law, especially after the discovery of the pandects of Justinian by the Saracens. The oldest college was founded by Robert de Dreux, a son of Louis the Fat, under the name of S. Thomas of Almain, founded a suitably site in the Coupe-gorge ("Cutthroat" Street), — a rather significant name; and there he built a magnificent college for his Con-gregatio pauperum magistrorum studentium in theologica facultate, which congregation was confirmed by Clement IV. in 1268.

After the example of the Franciscan and Dominican orders, a teacher of theology was also appointed at the Sorbonne; and the happy choice of the first teachers — William of Saint-Amour, Eudes of Douai, and Laurent l'Anglois — contributed much to increase the reputation of the establishment. Afterwards a considerable number of great doctors took up their abode in the college; and, when the regular lectures of the faculty were removed from the archiepiscopal palace to the Sorbonne, it was quite natural that people in general should identify the college with the faculty; so much the more natural as its theology really determined the character of the theology of the faculty. The general tendency of that theology was that which must underlie all true theology, — a perfect medium between faith and knowledge, religion and science, theology and philosophy; but, in pursuing that tendency, the Sorbonne always kept its doctrines pure, that is, in harmony with the teachings of the church, though without submitting in a slavish manner to ecclesiastical misuses or sacerdotal eccentricities. It was the Sorbonne which drove the scandalous Feast of the Fools out of the church; and it was also the Sorbonne which successfully opposed the introduction of the Peter's-pence and of the Inquisition into France. Among its other merits may also be mentioned, that it established the first printing-press in Paris, 1470; and, as an indication of the high rank it held in the world's estimation, it may be added that it represented the university of Paris at the councils.

The decadence of the Sorbonne began when it fell into the hands of the Guises, and became the handmaid of Ultramontanism; and the public soon discovered the antiquated and re-actionary tendencies of its activity. In 1624 it obtained an edict of the Parliament forbidding, under penalty of corporal punishment, and even death, to teach any thing against the accepted authorities. The edict was directed against Descartes; and the Sorbonne was so far from learning anything from Malebranche, Fénelon, or Leibnitz, that it wanted to have the edict renewed in 1671. The president of the Parliament, Lamoignon, found it difficult to refuse, until, one day, he found on his table Boileau's burlesque, Arrêt donné en la Grande Chambre du Parnasse. That decided the case. In 1751 appeared Voltaire's Le tombeau de la Sorbonne; and no voice was raised in its defence, when, in 1790, the state seized all its property, as belonging to the nation, and disposed of it for other purposes.

SOTER (pope 168-176 or 177), a native of Campania, is said to have written a work against the Montanists, which was refuted by Tertullian; but the work is lost, as is also his exposition of the Cen-thians, which was not uncommonly read in the congregations at Sunday service. The decrees bearing his name are spurious. NEUDECKER.

SOTERIOLOGY (ςθεριολογία, ουτάρης) is that branch of Christian theology which treats of the
The doctrine of salvation, so far as such salvation has been wrought out by the second person in the Holy Trinity. It is to be carefully distinguished from soteriology, or christology (v. Christology), which treats solely of the person of the Redeemer,—his incarnation, his divinity, and his humanity, and the combination of these two elements in his single and perfect personality. Yet it should be borne in mind always, that any adequate conception of his soteriological work must be based on right views, antecedently obtained and established, respecting the Christ as he is in himself,—the appointed and qualified Saviour of men.

Soteriology does not include the concurrent work of the Son of God in other spheres, such as creation, or providence, or moral administration. Nor does it include those aspects of salvation which involve, on the one side, the elective purpose and love of the Father, or, on the other, the interior ministry of the Spirit in the application of saving grace. While the Son is concerned with the Father in the original plan of redemption and in the selection of those in whom that plan becomes effective (v. Holy Spirit), his specific work lies rather in the execution of that plan, and in the actual securing of redemption to all who believe. While, again, the Son is concerned with the Holy Spirit in the conviction of sinners, and in bringing them, through regeneration and sanctification, into the full enjoyment of the salvation provided (v. Holy Spirit), his primary work is rather the provision itself on which, as a divine foundation, this subsequent work of spiritual restoration must be based. The Father creates, preserves, governs, plans, elects, as introductory; the Spirit enlightens, educates, sanctifies, and completes the saving process in the individual soul; the Son, acting as intermediate, represents, reveals, instructs, atones for sin, placates law, and lays a foundation in justice, whereby, under an economy of grace, every one who believes in him, the Father and the Spirit concursing, may be saved.

The most general conception of this specific work of the Son of God is expressed in the term mediation (v. Mediator, Mediation). His peculiar mission is to interpose, in the temner of grace and for the purpose of both forensic and spiritual reconciliation, between man as a sinner, and the Deity against whom man has offended, and with whom he is morally at variance. As a mediator, the Son of God, who was also the Son of man, was amply qualified, both by inherent endowment and through official appointment; and in his work of mediation he is actually successful in removing alienation, in restoring the lost harmony between God and the sinner, and in securing to man a complete and blessed and eternal at-one-ment with his heavenly Father. This generic work of mediation is generally described by Calvinistic theologians under the three specific forms indicated in the terms prophet, priest, and king (v. Jesus Christ, Three Offices of). It has been objected whether this distribution is in all respects desirable; whether, by the division of the one work into these three parts or offices, our sense of the essential unity of that work is not impaired; and whether the underlying idea of mediation is not weakened by such multiplicity of particular functions and relations. (Van Oosterzee: Christian Dogmatics, see cviii.) Is this central idea adequately expressed in these three forms? Do they contain neither more nor less than the underlying conception? And, where the distribution is made, are these three offices always kept in their proportionate place, and severally invested with their proper dignity and value in the one mediatorial work? Whatever answer may be given to these questions on exegetical or speculative grounds, there is no adequate reason for rejecting an analytic presentation which has gained such definite expression in current evangelical creeds (Heidelberg Catechism, Ans. 31; Westminster Confession, chap. viii.), and which has been so extensively adopted as a regulative guide in modern theology.

Studying soteriology in this triple aspect, we may first note the prophetical function of the Saviour, as including that entire revelation of saving truth which he, as the divine Logos, came among men to make (v. Prophet, Prophecy). All religious, and especially all inspired, teachers who were prior to him as revealers of sacred doctrine and duty, were 'prophets' (v. Prophets), in the sense before him; and all who followed after had it as their mission simply to elucidate and expand what he taught. Christ was the one perfect Logos, in virtue both of his eternal relationship within the Trinity (v. Trinity) and of his specific appointment as the Word of the Godhead to man. In him resided all the qualifications requisite to the complete fulfillment of this prophetic work, and from him came in highest form, and with most commanding power, all the truth which man needs to know in order to his salvation. This prophetical function may be subdivided into direct and indirect,—direct teaching through the formal enunciation of saving truths, and indirect teaching through the superadded power of example and personality. Christ, as teacher and prophet, becomes an enduring pattern also. In himself, as well as in his message, was light; and the light was the life of men. It may be interpreted, moreover, in consequence of the inclination of evangelical Protestantism to exalt the priestly work of our Lord as central, this prophetical mission has not been relatively too much ignored, and, more specifically, whether the biblical view of him as the true norm and example of our humanity has not been surrendered too much to the uses of those who altogether reject his priestly character and mission.

Concerning this priestly function, it is needless to repeat what has been said elsewhere (v. Atonement, Justification, Jesus Christ, Three Offices of). Priests, Priesthood, Offerings in the Old Testament, etc.). The essential fact in the case is the voluntary and vicarious surrender of himself by our Lord as a sacrifice before God for sinners, on account of their sin, and in order to expiate sin, and to render possible the reconciliation and restoration of man as sinful. As a sacrifice, Christ was inherently and judicially persons dedicated whether he remained without spot: as a priest, he was in every way qualified for the sacrificial work in which he was thus engaged; and his administration of the priestly office was voluntary, official, and acceptable. In him both the Aaronic priesthood and the peculiar

The priesthood of Melchisedec were singularly blended. He was, in his own person, the absolute culmination of the priestly as well as the prophetic order and idea. As priest and as sacrifice he was perfect.

That this vicarious intervention and offering of himself in behalf of sinners and for sin was an essential part of the mediatorial work of our Saviour, is too clearly revealed in Scripture to be questioned by any who receive its testimony in the case as conclusive. It was not a merely arbitrary scheme, resting on no recognizable necessity: it was rather a scheme imperatively demanded by the ethical nature of both God and man, and by the character of the salvation which man as sinful needed. The exigencies of that moral government against which the sinner had rebelled, the requisitions of justice as an eternal principle in the Deity, and the needs of the soul itself in order to its spiritual recovery, alike required — as the Bible in multiplied ways asserts — such a sacrifice of himself, even unto death, on the part of our Redeemer. Without this, mediation would have been both inadmissible and ineffectual.

Whatever may be the precise method or methods in which that sacrifice in the divine economy becomes efficacious in satisfying justice, in placating law, in revealing grace, and making that grace potent, there can be no question in believing minds as to the fact. It must needs be that Christ to this end must suffer; and it must needs be that through his suffering, vicarious and substitutional, we are saved.

The nature and the extent of the atonement, as thus exhibited specifically in the priestly work of Christ, are matters respecting which wide differences of opinion have long existed within evangelical circles. Whether he personally assumed our guilt, and became, by the direct imputation of that guilt, a transgressor, deserving the infliction of actual penalty, or simply took our sin upon him as a weight to be carried and removed, meanwhile himself remaining sinless, alike in person and before the law; whether he endured the active and passive sufferings of that guilt literally made in his representative relation a curse for us, or simply suffered what might be equitably regarded as an equivalent for penalty remitted, and a sufficient ground for the bestowal of pardon and all other spiritual blessings; whether his work was an actual and special provision for the redemption of the elect only, or was rather a generic arrangement of which all men may, through grace, alike avail themselves, a salvation offered implying in the fullest sense a salvation provided; — these are questions respecting which evangelical minds have differed, and which need no discussion here. Whatever may be the views of believers as to either the nature, or the extent and scope, of this sacrificial work of Christ, all are agreed in regarding the fact itself as both unquestionable and vital. That our Lord suffered as well as taught, and that he suffered on account of our sin and in order to save us from it, and that through his suffering we are saved from both the condemnation and the power of evil, and that this salvation is immediate and certain, and will be complete at last, — these are the great facts of grace which lie at the basis of the evangelical system, and which constitute the foundation of all evangelical hope.

Justification is the divine act of pardoning sin, and accepting sinners as if they were righteous, on the ground generically of all that Christ has done in the Munus Triplex of mediation, and specifically on the ground of what he has suffered as well as done in our behalf as the High priest and sacrifice. The unconditional pardon of sin, with no appropriate regard for the nature of moral government and the claims of justice, would be an act unworthy of God. To accept the sinner as if he were righteous, and to adopt him (v. Adoption) into the family of God, and to make him an heir of spiritual privileges and blessings, without requiring from him repentance, and return to loyalty, as conditions, and with no provision for his deliverance from the legal penalties incurred by his sin, would be a transaction still more unworthy. And the only adequate warrant for such pardon, acceptance, and adoption, must be found, not in any worthiness inherent in the nature of man or any merit seen in his life, nor even in his faith and repentance viewed as concomitants or consequences, but simply in the mediatorial, and especially in the sacrificial, work of Christ only. Our justification is in him, and in him alone.

The kingly office of the Saviour is a necessary element in his broad work of mediation. He is king because he has been prophet and priest; he is also king inherently, as divine. His kingdom commences in the believing heart, and is essentially spiritual: it is an authority exercised in love, and for the purpose of salvation. His church, as composed of those who have thus submitted to him personally, is his gracious empire; and over that empire he is the supreme head, everywhere and always. Within that church there can be no authority to supersede, or even, in the papal sense, to represent him: all its laws, officers, administration, activities, are subject entirely to him. This kingdom was founded by him before his earthly advent; it has been extended through many lands and centuries by his grace and power; it will continue to increase its kingdom now incorporated in it, until it has filled the earth. The notion, that, as a kingdom of love, it will ere long be supplanted by a kingdom of power, in which Christ will visibly appear as an earthly monarch, subduing his enemies by irresistible strength, and exalting his saints with him to a species of temporal domination (v. Millenarianism), is at variance with the view here presented. Beyond this earthly empire of our Lord as already defined, we discern his princely exaltation even now, at the right hand of the Father, to be advocate and intercessor for his people. This advocacy and intercession are to continue until all who are his are finally brought together with him into what is literally the kingdom of heaven.

Returning from this survey of the specific functions or offices of Christ to the underlying idea of mediation, we are able to comprehend in one view the full doctrine of salvation as wrought out by him of mediatorial work and by his mediatorial agency of the forms of a subjective soteriology, which includes especially the work wrought within the soul of man by our Saviour through his spirit, and which is expressed in the terms regeneration and sanctification. But objective soteriology, such as we are considering, is summed up rather in the triple phrase of Aquinas,—Christus Legislator, Sacerdos, Rex. To the soteriologist, such as we are considering, the Saviour is pictured as having gained by the last judgment. The idea of soul-sleep originated among the Arabian and Armenian sects, but found some favor in the west; traces of it occur in the writings of the Fathers. It was condemned by the councils of Lyons (1274), Ferrara (1439), Florence (1439), and Trent (1545—68); though Pope John XXII. (d. 1334) accepted it and openly advocated it. In the period of the Reformation it was revived by the Socinians and Arminians, and fully developed by the Anabaptists. Calvin wrote against it, but in his Tractatuum theopannychia, 1534, and in his Tract. var., vol. ii. See C. F. SOULE, Joshua, D.D., a bishop of the Methodoist-Episcopal Church South; b. at Bristol, Penock County, Me., Aug. 1, 1781; d. at Nashville, Tenn., March 6, 1867. He was converted in June, 1797, was licensed to preach the following year, and in 1799 was admitted into the New-England Conference. In 1804 he was appointed presiding elder, and served as such, with one year's exception, until 1816, when he was appointed Book Agent in New-York City. He was the author of the plan for a delegated general conference of the church, which was accepted at Baltimore in 1808. He was editor of the Methodist Magazine from 1816 to 1819. In 1820 he was elected to the episcopacy, but declined to accept the office on the ground that it had not been made, by the General Conference of that year, elective, rather than subject to the appointment of the presiding bishop. In 1820—22 he preached in New-York City, and in 1822—24 in Baltimore. In 1824 he was again elected bishop, and accepted, as the office of presiding elder had now been made again subject to episcopal appointment. After his election to the episcopacy, he resided for some time at Lebanon, O. In 1842 he went as a fraternal delegate to the British Wesleyan Conference. At the division of the church in 1844, he adhered to the Methodist-Episcopal Church South, and thereupon moved to Nashville, Tenn. He continued active in the discharge of his episcopal duties until about ten years before his death, which occurred in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was a presiding officer of great executive ability. In the graver and more important councils of the church he had no superior for discreet judgment, and prudence in counsel. He was eminently fitted in mind and character for controlling wisely and successfully measures and men. As a preacher he was slow and deliberate, but always sound in doctrine, strong in argument, and vigorous in style. His discourses evinced both breadth and depth, and are said to have been at times overwhelmingly impressive. He was a man of remarkable strength, both of character and of intellect. W. F. TILLET.

SOUTH, Robert, b. at Hackney, a suburb of London, in 1638; d. in London, July 5, 1716. His father was a wealthy London merchant, who afforded his son every advantage for a thorough education. His preparatory studies were pursued in the Westminster School, where he became a king's scholar, under the famous master, Dr. Busby. South is said to have read the Latin prayers in the school on the day of the execution of Charles I., and is pictured for him by name; thus early showing that attachment to the established government and religion which ever afterwards distinguished him. In 1651 he was admitted as a student of Christ Church, Oxford, at the same time with John Locke. In 1655 he took the degree of bachelor of arts. During this year he composed a Latin poem congratulating Oliver Cromwell on the peace which he had concluded between England and Holland. As this was a prescribed university exercise, it is not necessary to infer that South was ever a Cromwellian at heart. Indeed, he appears to have been unpopular, even at that early day, with the Puritan party there as power for when in 1657, he obtained the degree of master of arts, John Owen, then dean of Christ Church, opposed his application. South was ordained in 1658 by one of the bishops who had been deprived of his bishopric during the Protectorate. In 1660, the year of the restoration of the monarchy, South was elected orator to the university of Oxford, and preached before the royal commission a sermon entitled the Scribe instructed, which immediately placed him in the front rank of English preachers. He delivered the university oration when Clarendon was installed Chancellor of Oxford,—a discourse which so impressed Clarendon, that he appointed him his domestic chaplain. This led to his installation, in 1663, as the Prebendary of St. Peter's, Westminster. In the same year he took the degree of doctor in divinity; and in 1670 he was made a canon of Christ Church, Oxford. In 1677 South accompanied the son of the Earl of Clarendon, Lawrence Hyde, on an embassy to congratulate John Sobieski upon his election to the crown of Poland. He gave an interesting account of what he saw abroad in a letter to Pococke, the professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and a fellow-canon. Soon after his return to England, in 1678, he was presented to the rectory of Islip in Oxfordshire, the revenue of which, some two hundred pounds, he applied, half to the payment of his curate, and half to educating and apprenticing the poorer children of the parish. South soon became one of the king's chaplains, and preached a sermon before Charles II., marked by invective against Cromwell, and, what is not very common with South, violation of good taste. This recommended him to the monarch, who suggested his appointment to the next vacant bishopric. But South declined all such offers, both in this reign and in that of James II. While he was a strenuous opponent of the Equinoctial, he was a determined enemy of the Roman-Catholic. The concealed Popery of Charles and the open Popery of James met with no support, but with determined opposition, from South. His stiff loyalty led him to refuse to sign the invitation, drawn up by the archbishop and bishops, to the Prince of Orange to assume the throne, saying, that "his religion taught him to bear all things; and, however it should please God that he should suffer, he would, by the divine assistance, continue to abide by his allegiance, and use no other weapons but his prayers and tears for the recovery of his sovereign from the wicked and unadvised councils wherewith he was entangled." But subsequently, when James had formally abdicated the throne, and the crown was settled upon William and Mary, South gave in his allegiance to the new government. He would, however, accept no bishopric from the Episcopal with none of its ceremonial. In 1693 he had a controversy with Dr. William Sherlock, a fellow-churchman, and dean of St. Paul's, who, in his construction of the doctrine of the Trinity, fell into tritheism. South advocated the Nicene view with "great power of argument, and infinite wit and humor; more, indeed, than suited the solemnity of the subject."

The last part of South's life was clouded with sickness and debility which laid him aside from the active duties of his calling. His life was prolonged; and Dean Swift, it is said, waited impatiently, with other aspirants, for his decease, that he might claim his place and rectory. South died at the age of eighty-three, and was buried beside his old master, Dr. Busby, in Westminster Abbey.

South's distinction is that of a preacher, and he is second to none in any language. No one has combined and blended logic and rhetoric in more perfect proportions. Every sermon is founded upon a clear and clean plan that can be analyzed, and presented in its parts; and yet every sermon moves forward, from beginning to end, like a flowing stream, without break. He argues closely and rigorously; but the argument never interchanges with the fluency and impetuosity of the discourse. The fire of his intellect kindles into a flame all his materials, however heavy and unwieldy. Even such subjects as predestination and the Trinity are made popular and interesting by his powerful grasp and handling. And all this is heightened by his remarkable style. His mastery of English is almost unrivaled. The closeness and intimacy of the connection between the thought and the word is hardly excelled even by Shakespeare himself.

South was a Calvinist at a time when the drift of the High-Church Episcopacy, which he favored, was strongly towards the Establishment. Though a Puritan, and bitterly so, in regard to polity, both civil and ecclesiastical, he was a Puritan in theology. John Owen was not a higher predestinationist than he, and Richard Baxter was a lower one. It must have been from an intense conviction of the truth of this type of doctrine, that South, in the face of all his prejudices and of his ecclesiastical and courtly connections, defended it with might and main. For this reason, the great anti-Puritan has had, and always will have, warm admirers among Puritans and Nonconformists.

South's Sermons have often been reprinted; e.g., Oxford (1823, 7 vols.), Boston (1867-71, 5 vols.), London (1875, 2 vols.); and in these editions memoirs will be found. A volume of selections, with a memoir entitled The Wisdom of the Fathers, appeared in London, 1867. W. G. T. SHELD.

SOUTHWELL, Robert, poet and martyr; was b. at Horsham, St. Faith's, Norfolk, about 1562; and hanged at Tyburn, Feb. 22, 1595. He was educated at Paris, Douay, Tournay, and Rome; received into the Society of Jesus, Oct. 17, 1576, SPAIN.

When not yet seventeen; ordained, 1584, and made prefect of the English college at Rome; sent as a missionary to England, 1586; chaplain to the Countess of Arundel; betrayed to the government, 1592, imprisoned for three years in the Tower, found guilty of "constructive treason," and executed. According to Cecil, he, though "thirteen times most cruelly tortured, cannot be induced to confess anything, not even the color of the horse wherein, on a certain day, he rode, lest" thereby his friends might fall into the same trouble. His poems were published shortly after his death, and a complete edition appeared 1586, edited by W. B. Turnbull. Some of them, since then widely copied, are of a very high order, and no less philosophic than Christian.

F. M. BIRD.

SOZOMENOS, Salamanes Hermias, a contemporary of Socrates; lived, like him, as a scholasticus in Constantinople, and wrote, like him, a history of the church from 328 to 439, edited by Valesius (1658), together with the histories of Eusebius and Socrates, and found in Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque. He seems to have known and used the work by Socrates. What he adds of his own authorship is a modern invention, but his style is better than Socrates'.

SPAIN. Christianity penetrated into Spain from North Africa. It is uncertain whether St. Paul carried out his intention to visit Spain. The first Christians were found in Andalusia. The story of the martyrdom of the apostle James at Compostella dates from the ninth century. Towards the end of the fourth century the whole country was Christianized, and divided into ecclesiastical provinces. The Council of Elvira (306) was attended by nineteen bishops and twenty-six presbyters, under the lead of Hosius. The councils and synods were presided over by the oldest bishop, afterwards by the metropolitan, of the province. Communications with Rome began during the Priscillianist controversy, and became more frequent and intimate after the conquest of Spain by the Visigoths, in 456. The Goths were Arians, and adopted the Catholic faith, at the Third Council of Toledo in 589, the Spanish Church at once assumed a proud and reserved attitude with respect to Rome. The pallium was not asked for in Rome; but, when Gregory the Great sent it to Leander, the reason was simply that the latter was an intimate friend of his.

Towards the end of the seventh century Spain numbered sixty-six bishops. They were originally elected by the congregations, but afterwards appointed by the king on the presentation of the churches of the diocese, and finally by the king alone with the concurrence of the Archbishop of Toledo. They could be deposed only by a council, just as a minister could be deposed only by a synod. The oldest monasteries date from the sixth century. They had rules of their own, and multiplied rapidly after the victory of the Catholic Church. They stood at first under the absolute control of the bishop, but, on account of the frequent complaints, the episcopal authority was afterwards limited. The clergy were subject to the secular jurisdiction in all cases but the ecclesiastical ones, which were decided in the bishop's court. The general standard of the Spanish clergy seems to have been rather low; though several brilliant names occur, such as Orosius, Leander and Isidore of Hispalis, Idefons, and Julian of Toledo, and others.

During the rule of the Visigoth kings (456-711) the Jews were kept under strict ecclesiastical supervision, on account of their dangerous connections with their co-religionists in Africa; and, under the Arabian dominion (711-1492), all spiritual and political pressure was removed, and they prospered very much. They produced men of consequence in almost every department of life; and by their wealth and commercial talent they exercised great influence, even in the Christian states of the country, though they generally excited the hatred of the people by their avarice. As soon, however, as the Christians gained the ascendancy, persecutions were instituted; and in 1492, the year of the conquest of Granada, all Jews were expelled from Spain. Many were converted to Christianity, and remained in the country: but their conversion was generally nothing but a mask; and, whenever the Inquisition detected the fraud, it was cruelly punished.

Under the Roman domination, the Christians were allowed to retain their faith; though very heavy taxes were levied on them,—one-tenth of their revenue on those who submitted without resistance, and one-fifth on those who were subjugated by armed force. They were commanded not to speak disparagingly of the Koran and the Prophet, not to marry a Mohammedan woman, not to try to convert a Moaslem to Christianity, not to make alliances with the enemies of Islam, etc. They were requested not to wear the same dress as the Mohammedans, not to build their houses higher than the Moelem, not to let their bells be heard, nor their crosses be seen, in the street, not to drink wine or eat pork in public, etc. In the north-eastern part of the country, which, since the days of Charlemagne, stood under Christian rule, a peculiar liturgy, the so-called Mozarabic, was in use, until the Roman Liturgy was introduced in Aragonia in 1071, and in Castile in 1086. Between the first Council of Toledo, when the Goths adopted the Catholic faith, and the Third Council of Toledo (589), the Spanish Church at once assumed a proud and reserved attitude with respect to Rome. The pallium was not asked for in Rome; and, when Gregory the Great sent it to Leander, the reason was simply that the latter was an intimate friend of his.

The revival of letters in Italy in the fifteenth century was soon transplanted to Spain; and there, as everywhere, it effectively prepared the way for the Reformation. The Protestant doctrines found from the very first many adherents among the Spaniards, especially among the higher classes; and several Spanish translations of the Bible were published,—by Francisco Enzinas (Dryander) in 1548, Juan Perez in 1555, Cassiodoro de Leyva in 1568, and Cypriano de Valera in 1596. King Philip II., however, and Pope Paul IV., supported by the Inquisition and the Jesuits, finally succeeded in completely suppressing the movement. But the means they employed are among the greatest horrors history ever heard of. The first auto-da-fé took place at Aragonia in 1563, May 16, 1565; when Charles II. celebrated his marriage with Louise of Orleans in 1679, an auto-da-fé formed part of the solemnities, and for fourteen hours the young couple sat looking at the burning of twenty-three heretics. During the latter part of the eighteenth and the first part of the nineteenth century, various moves were made in a more liberal direction. In 1780 the Inquisition performed the last auto-da-fe, and its office was reduced to the mere censorship of books. In 1835 the Jesuits were expelled, and all monasteries numbering less than twelve monks were closed. But with the concordat of 1851 a heavy re-action set in. The Virgin was made the national patron of the Spanish army in 1854; and in 1861 a number of persons engaged in the Protestant propaganda, which had its seat in Gibraltar, were seized, and condemned to the galleys. It proved impossible, however, for Queen Isabella to carry out the concordat: it finally cost her the throne. [The new constitution of 1876 grants toleration, and makes all civil and political rights independent of denomination. The number of Protestants is hardly 60,000, of a population of nearly 17,000,000.]

SPALATIN, Georg, b. at Spalt in the diocese of Eichstätt, 1484; d. at Altenburg Jan. 16, 1545. He studied at Erfurt and Wittenberg; was ordained a priest in 1507, and appointed librarian, secretary, and chaplain to the Elector Frederick the Wise in 1512, and superintendent of Altenburg in 1525. As he was an intimate friend of Luther and the other Reformers, and enjoyed the full confidence of Frederick the Wise and his successors, he exercised a very great influence on the course of the Reformation. See his life by Ch. SCHLEIEL, Jena, 1893 (Latin), and by J. Wagner, Altenburg, 1830 (German).

SPALDING, Johann Joachim, b. at Tribsees in Pommerania, Nov. 1, 1714; d. in Berlin, May 26, 1794. He studied theology at Bostock and Halle, and, at the age of 21, in 1737, he opened a school in Berlin in 1737, and of the Church of St. Nicholas in Berlin in 1744, from which last office he retired in 1788, after the promulgation of the Wölner edict. He early abandoned the old-fashioned, scholastically developed Lutheran orthodoxy of his time, and occupied a position between the Protestant and the Wolffian philosophy and the sentimentalism of the Pietists, from which standpoint he fought with vigor and success against the deism and atheism, which, from France and England, penetrated into Germany. His principal work, and the most characteristic expression of his school in the eighteenth century, was Über die Bestimmung des Menschen (1748), Über den Werth der Gefühle im Christenthum (1764), Über die Nutzbarkeit des Predigtans (1773), Vertrauten Briefe, die Religion betreffend (1784), etc., most of which were several times reprinted, and translated into French. He also left an interesting autobiography, published by his son, Berlin, 1804.

SPANGENBERG, Augustus Gottlieb, b. July 15, 1704, at Klettenberg, Prussia; d. Sept. 18, 1792, in the eighty-ninth year of his age, at Berthelsdorf, Saxony; was a bishop of the Moravian Church, and, next to Count Zinzendorf (q.v.), its most illustrious leader. He attended the grammar-school at Ilefeld, and the university of Jena, where an exegetical lecture of Buddeus, at which he happened to be present, induced him to give up the study of law, and devote himself to theology. He graduated in 1728 as master of arts, and soon after began to lecture in the university, and occasionally to preach. The free schools in the suburbs of Jena, established by a circle of pious students to which he belonged, enlisted his ardent support; and he was particularly active in training teachers for this work. In 1727 he met Zinzendorf, who made a deep impression upon him. Their acquaintance soon ripened into a warm friendship; and, on the occasion of a visit to Herrnhut (1730), Spangenberg formed a very close fellowship with the Brethren. His labors at Jena continued to be crowned with great success. After having declined various advantageous offers, he was induced, in 1732, to accept the position of adjunct of the theological faculty of the university of Halle, and superintendent of the schools connected with Francke's Orphan-House. But it soon became evident that he was not in sympathy with his colleagues. They took offence at some of his doctrinal views, at his association with separatists, and especially at the intimate connection which he persisted in keeping up with the Brethren. Complaints were lodged against him, and in 1733 he was dismissed from the university by a royal mandate. He immediately went to Herrnhut, and entered the service of the Moravian Church, laboring in various parts of Germany, in America, in the West Indies, and in England, where he organized (1741) the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen; which association still exists. His work in America was particularly distinguished. After having been consecrated a bishop in 1744, he stood at the head of the Moravian Church in this country, with occasional interruptions, until 1792. He showed himself to be a wise ruler, a faithful pastor, an ardent evangelist. So prudent was the forethought with which he cared for his brethren, both in temporal and spiritual things, that they gave him the name of "Joseph," which he adopted, often signing official documents in this way. Nor was his work confined to his own church. The settlers in various Colonies, and especially the Indians, learned to know and revere him as a faithful messenger of the gospel. In 1762 he returned to Europe, took an active part in framing the new constitution of the Brethren's Church, and became the most prominent member of its governing board. The enthusiasm of Zinzendorf, which sometimes led him beyond bounds, was supplemented by the prudence and wisdom of Spangenberg. Among his numerous writings the most important are Idea Fidei Fratrum, oder Kurzer Begriff der christl. Lehre in den evangel. Brüdergemeinen, Barby, 1762, translated into English by J. C. Tiele, and entitled Exposition of Christian Doctrine, London, 1774; and Leben der Grafen von Zinzendorf, 1775, in 3 vols., abridged English translation by Jackson, London, 1838.

Spangenberg composed many hymns, some of which are known and used wherever the German tongue is spoken; for instance, Die Kirche Christi die Er geschicht (Eng. trans., Moravian Hymnal, No. 612, "The Church of Christ, that he hath hallowed here"), and Heil'ge Einfall, Gnadenwunder (Eng. trans., abridged, Moravian Hymnal, No. 432, "When simplicity we cherish"). The two most important biographies of him are, Leben Spangenberg's, Heidelberg, 1846, Eng. trans., London, 1855.

BISHOP E. DE SCHWENKNEITZ.

SPANGENBERG, Cyriacus, b. at Nordhausen, June 7, 1528; d. at Strassburg, Feb. 10, 1604. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was in 1563 appointed court-preacher to the Count of Mansfeld. As a passionate adherent of Flacius, he became implicated in the controversy concerning hereditary sin, and was in 1575 compelled to flee from Mansfeld, disguised as a midwife. Appointed pastor of Schützsee-on-the- Fulda shortly after, his stubborn advocacy of the Flacian views once more disturbed the peace of the congregation, and again drove him into exile, in 1590. He found refuge at Vacha in Hesse, but only for a time, finally returning to Strassburg. His writings are devotional, polemical, and historical.

See his life by J. G. LEUCKFELD, Quedlinburg, 1712.

SPANHEIM is the name of a family which has produced several noticeable theologians. — Friedrich Spanheim, b. at Amberg in the Upper Palatinate, Jan. 1, 1600; d. at Leyden, April 30, 1648. He studied at Heidelberg and Geneva, visited Paris and England, and was in 1631 appointed professor of theology at Geneva, and in 1641 at Leyden. He was a very prolific writer, and wrote in the controversy with Amyraut, Disputatio de gratia universalis, 1644; Exercitationes de gratia universalis, 1646; Epistola ad Matthaeum Cotterium, 1648; Vindicia exercitationum, 1649. — Friedrich Spanheim, son of the preceding; b. at Geneva, May 1, 1632; d. at Leyden, May 18, 1701. He studied theology and philosophy at Leyden, and was appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg in 1655 and at Leyden in 1670. He wrote in defense of Calvin against Descartes and Cocceius. His collected works appeared at Leyden, 1701-08, 8 vols.

SPARROW, William, an eminent theologian of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, United States; descended from a highly respectable Irish family; b. in Massachusetts, March 12, 1801. His parents returning to Ireland in 1805, he attended boarding-schools in the Vale of Avoca. Returned to America, 1817. In his seventeenth year was appointed principal of Utica Academy; student at Columbia College, New York, 1819-21; professor of Latin and Greek at Miami University, 1824-25; ordained in 1826; colaborer with Bishop Chase in founding Kenyon College; eleven years Milnor professor at Gambier; professor of systematic divinity and Christian evidences in the Theological Seminary of Virginia, 1840-74; for thirty years delegate to General Convention from Virginia, and chairman of standing committee. Died at Alexandria, Va., Jan. 17, 1874.

During the civil war (1861-64) he carried on the work of the seminary in the interior of Virginia. At its close his unique relations to both sections enabled him to exert important influence in restoring the church in Virginia to its former ecclesiastical relations. As he had by the fame of his powers raised the Virginia seminary to an important position, so now his hand was chiefly concerned in its restoration.

Dr. Sparrow was recognized as the ablest theologian and the most original thinker of the evangelical school in the Protestant Episcopal Church. His acute and powerful intellect, enriched by accurate learning, and strengthened by patient thought, moved with freedom among the profoundest questions of metaphysics and of theology. He bowed with unquestioning faith to the supremacy of Scripture, yet he welcomed modern criticism as an ally; and all his thinking proceeded on the conviction of the ultimate harmony of revelation and science. An earnest evangelical and a zealous Protestant, he was usually classed as Arminian in theology; yet he abhorred the narrowness of theological systems, and led his pupils up into the pure atmosphere of independent thought and rational inquiry. By the hundreds of young men who sat at his feet at Gambier and at Alexandria he was looked up to as a great teacher; and many of the best minds in the church have acknowledged their indebtedness to his suggestive and stimulating instruction.

He was an earnest Episcopalian, but he put doctrine before order: hence he felt himself at one with Protestant Christendom, and rejoined in the Evangelical Alliance as an expression of Protestant unity. He earnestly maintained the scriptural character of the Prayer-Book, but desired a revision, to remove ambiguities, and to relieve weak consciences. Accordingly, he sympathized with the difficulties of Bishop Cummins, he deprecated his secession, and remained firm in his adhesion to the church. Perhaps no man of his time in America did more to check the spread of the trasciantary theology.

He was also an earnest antagonist of the dogma of a tacit apostolical succession, holding it to be essentially unscriptural and anti-Protestant. To his great intellectual powers he added the influence of exalted piety, a character of great modesty and humanity, and a life of simplicity and self-denial. He sealed his deep interest in Christian missions by the cheerful surrender to the Chinese mission of a daughter of remarkable talents. His lifelong feebleness of health, combined with an almost morbid aversion to appearing in print, unhappily prevented his entering the field of authorship; but a number of his occasional sermons and addresses saw the light, and a posthumous volume of Sermons appeared in 1876, New York (T. Whittaker).

The spirit of his teaching and of his life is well summed up in words of his own, graven on his tomb: "SEEK THE TRUTH, COME WHENCE IT MAY, COST WHAT IT WILL." See his Life and Correspondence, by Rev. W. W. New, D.D.; New York, 1876.

SPERE, Friedrich von, b. at Kaiserswerth in 1691; d. at Treves, Aug. 7, 1635. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1610; taught grammar, philosophy, and morals in the Jesuit college in Cologne; was there several years engaged in the persecution of witches, and led more than two hundred of them to the stake; and worked during the last years of his life as a missionary among the Protestants of Northern Germany. He published a book, Cautio criminalis, against the common method of trying witches, but is chiefly known as a religious poet.—Trutz Nachtigal, Cologne, 1849 (edited by Godecke and Tittmann, 1879), and Gulden Tugendbuch, probably published in the same year (last ed., Coblenz, 1850). Selections from those two collections of poems have been made by W. Smet and Karl Fürster. See Diel: Spec, Esquisse biographique et litteraire, 1873.

SPENCER, John, D.D.; Church of England; b. at Boston-under-Blean, Kent, 1630; d. at Cambridge, May 27, 1695. He was graduated M.A. at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, 1652, and elected fellow 1655. Ten years later he became D.D.; on Aug. 8, 1667, master of his college, and in the same year archdeacon of Sudbury. In 1672 he was made prebendary of Ely, and dean of Ely 1677. His fame rests upon his De legibus Hebraorum ritualibus et earum rationibus, Cambridge, 1655, 2 vols. fol.; reprinted, The Hague (1686), Leipzig (1705), Cambridge (1727), edited by L. Chappelow; reprinted, Tübingen, 1732, ed. C. M. Pfaff. In the two editions last-mentioned the fourth book, left in manuscript by the author, for the first time appears. The object of this very learned book is to show that Jewish law and ritual are in origin independent of those of surrounding nations, and expressly designed to fix a gulf between the Jews and their neighbors. Yet Spencer has been accused by Witsius, in his Egyptiaca, and by Archbishop Magee, in his Atomen, of maintaining the hypothesis of the Egyptian origin of the Jewish ritual. Besides this famous work, Spencer wrote A discourse concerning prodigies, London, 1663, 2d ed. with Discourse concerning vulgar prodigies, 1665; Dissertatio de Urim et Thummim, Cambridge, 1669 (a comprehensive work upon several obscure Bible matters, e.g., Hebrew lustrations and purifications, circumcision, music, dancing, and burials).

SPENER, Philipp Jakob. Among the theologians of the Lutheran Church of the seventeenth century, Spener was the purest and most spotless in character, and the most successful in his work. He was born Jan. 13, 1635, in Rappoltstein, in Upper Alsace, and d. at Berlin, Feb. 5, 1705. But as both father and mother came from Strassburg, and he was educated in that city, Spener usually called himself a Strassburger. With justice he is counted among those who retained their baptismal grace, and in it harmoniously continued to develop their Christian life. This natural piety was nourished by congenial family associations, by his relations to the noble widow of the Count of Rappoltstein, and by his study of the ascetic productions of Armit, as also of Sonthhom, Bayly, Dykes, Baxter, and other English writers at that time much read along the Rhine. His principal instructor, and the spiritual forerunner of the Reformed Church as there represented, was the preacher at Rappoltstein, Joachim Stoll, who in 1645 became his brother-in-law. "I owe to him among men the first sparks of Christianity," says Spener. On Stoll, cf. Rohrich: Mittheilungen aus der evang. Kirche des Elsaesses, 1855, iii. p. 321.

After being thus prepared for the life of a pious youth in 1651 entered the university of Strassburg. According to his own statements, he lived a very retired life, devoting himself entirely to his books. His theological leaders were Dorsche, Dannhauer, Johann Schmid, Sebastian Schmid. The first-named, a strict Lutheran theologian, Spener called his "preceptor." The last-named was the most famous exegete of his day; and in Johann Schmid Spener saw his "father in Christ." In accordance with the custom of the day, a peregrinatio academica completed his course of studies. He first went to Basel to sit at the feet of the younger Buxtorf, at that time the most celebrated teacher of Hebrew. Then he spent a year in Geneva, which long stay tended to widen the mental horizon of the young Lutheran theologian; and he found much to praise in the organization of the Reformed Church as there represented. Labadie's fiery eloquence so influenced him, that he translated his Manuel de prière into German.

In 1661, in company with his pupil, the young Count of Rappoltstein, he paid a visit to Württemberg, and remained there five months. His qualities of mind and heart gained him many friendships in Stuttgart and Tübingen; and his permanent employment in Württemberg was only frustrated by a call to become pastor in Strassburg in 1665. He secured a situation which gave him leisure as a master to deliver various courses of lectures at the university on history and philosophy.

In 1668 he received a call to become pastor and senior in Frankfurt-am-Main; and, after consultation with his political and ecclesiastical superiors, he accepted this vocation, so honorable for a man but thirty-one years of age. He endeavored to awaken a consistent and live Christianity in the Frankfurt churches, but was prevented to a great extent by the senate and city government. Cf. Bedenken, iii. pp. 105, 215, iv. 66. He first attempted to revive a thorough system of catechetical instructions, which had badly fallen into decay. Mechanical memorizing was the first object of his attack; and, to effect his reformation in this regard, he published his Einfaltige Erklärung der christl. Lehre, 1677, and his Tabula catechetica, in 108 tablets, in 1683. In his sermons his chief object was to inculcate purity of doctrine; but he no longer considered himself bound to confine himself to the pericopes, his endeavors being to make his congregation acquainted with the contents of the whole Scriptures. Thence he brought about a more thorough preparation for the first reception of the Lord's Supper in connection with confirmation. He was successful, however, only in the country congregations. Cf. Bedenken, iii. 395. For a reformation of church discipline he could do little or nothing. His sermons, always warm and pious, though chiefly of a didactic character, yet they were marked by experience, and a deep knowledge of Scriptures; and his influence began to extend far beyond the boundaries of Frankfurt. Even his polemics against mechanical Christianity were not aggressive or challenging. Yet in 1669 a sermon on the false righteousness of the Pharisees caused a division between the earnest and the careless members of his flock, and in 1670 the former effected a closer union among themselves. The result was an organization, at first only of a few, for practical religious purposes. It met at first in Spener's study, and read different ascetic works, considered the last sermon, and the like. Soon assemblies were held in other houses also. In 1682 Spener succeeded in receiving permission to hold these meetings in the church, which somewhat changed their character.

Spener's days in Frankfurt were pleasant. He says, "In the honorable ministerium of Frankfurt, during the twenty years of his senior, the peace of peace kept us in brotherly harmony." His own character and nature contributed most to bring about this state of affairs. He continued to abide by his strict theological views, and thus did not as yet give any offence. In 1675 he published his famous Pia Desideria. In them he lamented the corruption of the Evangelical Church, and recommends six different remedies. His Desideria were an earnest word to his church, and found an echo in many hearts in Germany. Only in Strausburg did they meet with a cool reception. More injurious to Spener's reputation were his collegia pietatis. In them he propagated a religious purpose had before this already found favor, even with the heads of orthodoxy; but after their multiplication they also developed peculiarities looking toward a separation from the church, and thus "Pietists" gradually was regarded as the name of a sect. Among others, Spener's former friend, Menzter, the court-preacher in Darmstadt, now also became his enemy. Dilfeld, in Nordhausen, in 1679, published his Theosoplia Horbio-Speneriana, in which he maintained that regeneration was not necessary for true theology. Spener answers in his Gotteslehre, etc., and thus this ended it. He opposed the separatistic tendency among his followers, especially in his Die Klagen über das verdorbene Christenthum, Missbrauch und rechter Gebrauch, 1684.

Spener had thus labored with great success in Frankfurt for twenty years, when in 1689 a call to become court-preacher, and member of the consistory at Dresden, usually regarded at that time as the highest ecclesiastical position in Germany, was extended to him. This was done at the especial request of the elector, George III., who had seen and heard Spener in Frankfurt, and learned his upright character through personal experience. The latter modestly put a low estimate on his Frankfurt work, and had no great plans for his labors at the Saxon court. His departure from Frankfurt on the 10th of July, 1688, was a day of sorrow for the whole city.

The new position indeed offered the possibility of entering a collegium and at the same time as a stranger, and had obtained a situation which was the object of high ambition; and he had induced the consistory to censure the theological faculty for neglecting exegetical studies. When, then, the collegium philobiblicum, commenced in Leipzig in the purpose of studying the Scriptures in the original tongues, through Francke, Anton, Schade, and others, developed into German collegia biblica, in which laymen also took part, and which entered into closer relationship with Spener, Carpzov began to preach against the "Pietists." He was seconded by Alberti, formerly Spener's good friend; and when Spener's relative, Thomasius, published satires on the clergy, and especially on Carpzov, Alberti, and Pfeiffer,—Spener was accused of being responsible for these. In Dresden itself, Spener's zeal and conscientious firmness as confessor of the wild elector caused him trouble, and finally brought about his removal to Berlin. He attempted to reintroduce catechetical instructions extensively, instructed the children himself, and for this reaped ridicule and abuse. The elector soon lost his interest in his court-preacher, seldom listened to his sermons, and avoided confession. When Spener, in his concern for his prince's spiritual welfare, wrote a letter to him, the displeasure of the sovereign fell upon him. The prince declared that "he could not longer endure the sight of Spener, and would have to change his residence on his account." The sudden death of George III. soon after opened the way for Spener's acceptance of a call to Berlin to become a member of the consistory of Brandenburg, and probst of St. Nicolai. When the displeasure of the elector first became known, the opposition to Spener began to assume large proportions, especially under the leadership of the Leipzig Carpzov, who assisted himself to itself by an abusive pamphlet Imago pietismi. Spener's position in Berlin was in some respects more pleasant than that in Dresden. The Elector Frederick III. indeed showed no interest in his work; and his wife, Sophia Charlotte of Hanover, was an acknowledged sceptic, and hostile to him: but Spener's congregation was larger; and among the councillors of the throne he found at least one sympathetic person, Herr von Schweinitz,—vir pietate nulli secundus, as Spener says. Schade, his Leipzig friend, also soon came to Berlin; and in him he found a congenial soul. Here again, as in Frankfurt and Dresden, Spener immediately began his work with catechetical instructions, and the establishment of a collegium philobiblicum. He sought also to secure appointments for earnest pastors; and, chiefly through his influence, Breithaupt, Francke, and Anton, the later leaders of the pietistic movement, were made members of the theological faculty. In all his labors, troubles not only at Berlin, but also elsewhere, his voice was ever in favor of peace. His colleague Schade, through his inability to distinguish between use and abuse, had in blind zeal Spener did in a thorough manner in his Der evangel. described by the eye-witness v. Canstein. Blank years later, however, Spener experienced the grief of seeing his former pupil, Frederick August ofenburg, his former assistant, was appointed his successor.

Righteousness, himself entered into his final rest, in conjunction with two other prominent theologians, to defend the Evangelica Church against the accusations of this new movement. This he answered in a becoming spirit. His principal work in this department is his Aufrichtige Über-einstimning mit der Augsburgischen Confession, directed against the Wittenberg faculty. These answers show learning, research, and a deep piety.

In an indirect way he was drawn into another controversy of the church. The movement inaugurated by Calixtus had assumed a Romeward tendency; and several prominent teachers in Kö nigseberg, and others, were strongly inclining in that direction. The elector authorized Spener, in conjunction with two other prominent theologians, to defend the Evangelical Church against the accusations of this new movement. This he did in a thorough manner in his Der evang. Kirche Rettung vor falschen Beschuldigungen, 1695; which work produced a marked effect. Two years later, however, Spener experienced the grief of seeing his former pupil, Frederick August of Saxony, join the Roman Church.

Spener did not live to see the victory in Berlin of the movement he represented. This took place when the king of Prussia in 1705 took as his third wife Sophia Louisa von Mecklenburg. Under the leadership of the court-preacher, Forst, prayer-meetings were held in the royal castle, in which the king at times would participate. Just after having finished his work on dogmatics, entitled Von der ewigen Gotttheit Christi, the noble teacher, who had been the guide for so many unto righteousness, himself entered into his final rest, Feb. 5, 1705. His death-bed scene and end are described by the eye-witness v. Canstein. Blankenburg, his former assistant, was appointed his successor.

Spener's wife, a lady from Strassburg, was one with him in mind and soul. Of his eleven children, eight survived him; but not all of these caused him joy.

In theological culture Spener was equal to any of his contemporaries. His sermons and polemical works show that he was a thorough exegete. In systematic theology he railed the best of his day, but did not depart from the formalistic and logical method of treating the dogmas, in common with all of his contemporaries, at that time. Of the defects in his style and rhetoric, he himself was conscious. It was his principle to submit to the confessions of the church. Calovius himself acknowledged that he had found nothing heterodox in Spener; and, in fact, such is the case: he is in perfect harmony with the great Lutheran theologians, Gerhard, Meissner, Meyfort, V. Andreas, etc., whom he constantly cites. Only the abuses in the church, such as confidence in the opus operatum, the misuse of the confessional, the one-sided doctrine of faith and justification, in contrast with the thorough theological discussions of previous decades, was entirely of a personal and rancorous character: no means were too low for the purpose. The masterpiece among these libels is the Christlutherische Vorstellung ... etc., published by the entire Wittenberg faculty in 1806. No less than two hundred and eighty-three heterodox views are here catalogued against Spener. This document, the production of the mentally weak senior of the faculty, Deutschmann, proved harmless fabrication; which fact Spener attributes to the influence of a kind Providence. This and the many other polemical writings, Spener answered in a becoming spirit. His principal work in this department is his Aufrichtige Über-einstimnung mit der Augsburgischen Confession, directed against the Wittenberg faculty. These answers show learning, research, and a deep piety.

of Milton's "great argument." He graduated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, 1573; issued The Shepherd's Calendar, 1579; was intimate with Sidney and Raleigh; held offices, and received an estate in Ireland; was expelled and ruined by the insurgents in Tyrone's rebellion, 1598, and ended his life miserably in London. His works, whether read or not, continue to be printed and praised; and his rank among the poets of that great age is next to Shakespere. F. M. BIRD.

SPERATUS, Paulus, an active Reformer and much esteemed hymn-writer; b. at Rottweil, Franconia (whence the surname a Rubilis), Dec. 13, 1484; d. at Marienwerder, Aug. 12, 1551. He studied theology in Paris and Italy, but embraced the Reformation, and preached its ideas at Dinkelsbühl, Wurzburg, Salzburg, and Vienna, whence he was compelled to flee, in 1521, on account of a sermon against the monastic vows: Von dem hohen Gelübde der Tauff, Königsberg, 1524. Appointed preacher at Iglaug, he became middle-man between Luther and the Moravian Brethren, and made so deep an impression on the inhabitants, that he was arrested by Bishop Thurzo of Olmütz, and imprisoned of bail at the instance of Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg. He went to Wittenberg, where he aided Luther in his collection of German hymns, and was in 1525 made court-preacher to Duke Albrecht of Prussia.

To this period belong most of his own hymns, original and translated; and in 1529 he was made bishop of Pomerania, in which position he was very zealous for the consolidation of the Protestant Church in Prussia. His life has been written by Cosacx (1881), [PRESSEL (1862), and Trautenberger (1869)]. D. SEDDMANN.

SPICE AMONG THE HEBREWS. By spice, especially aromatics are meant, which the Israelites used in common life. The common word for these aromatics is besamim: another term seems to be neshet (1 Kings x. 23). The terms rokach, rikuchim, merkachah, mirkachath, signify more especially salves prepared from aromatics; whilst merkach seems to be the general term for aromatic plants. In the garden of the Pislacial incense-liscus. It is extensively used in the East in the preparation of spirits, as a sweetmeat, as a masticatory for preserving the gums and teeth, as an anti-spasmodic in medicine. To the spices we may also add the cypress-branch (kopher, A. V., camphlre, but in the margin cypress, ant. iv. 14, iv. 13), carried by the Mohammedan women of Cairo to the markets. The perfume of the Himalayan Mountains. The Phcenicians imported this perfume to the West, and thus it came also to Palestine. Less precious than the Indian was the Syrian (especially well prepared at Tarsus), which was composed of oils, most of which also belonged to aromatic plants of the valeriana family. It was sold in small alabaster boxes (Mark xiv. 3), and was carried in smelling-bottles. It was used not only as salve, but also for seasoning the wine.

With such precious nard, Mary of Bethany anointed the Saviour six days before the passover (John xii. 1). This oil was also used for the purpose of preserving the dead. The name "nard" is of Sasanid origin, and points to the home of the plant: it denotes "giving an odor." Besides these different species, the Bible also mentions the following spices: Aloes (Num. xxiv. 6; Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14; Ps. xiv. 8; John xix. 38), a fragrant wood (hence aloes-wood) growing in India, where it is called agkhi. The Europeans call it ligum aquila [i.e., eagle-wood]. The wood is resinous, of a dark color, heavy. The Indians regard the aloes-trees as holy. Another aromatic wood is the algum, from Ophir (1 Kings x. 11 sq.; Cant. iv. 14; ii. 8, ix. 10); also almu, not "pearls," as the rabbis explain, but probably sandal-wood. Besides the wood we must also mention the bark of different trees growing in India, and which the Hebrews at a very early period counted among the spices; thus especially the cinnamon (Exod. xxx. 23, where it is enumerated as one of the ingredients employed for the preparation of the holy anointing oil). It also occurs Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14; Rev. xviii. 13. The home of the cinnamon is Ceylon. According to Nees von Esenbeck (Disp. de cinnamono, Bonn, 1829), the cassia was not a distinct species, but only a wild or original form of the Cinnamomum Ceylonicum. There are two Hebrew words rendered "cassia," — kiddah and ketisah, — which were among the ingredients of the holy incense, according to the rabbis. To these ingredients the Talmud adds also the koshet, the costus-root. Another ingredient was the "spikenard," also kaneh ha-tob; Exod. xxx. 23; Jer. vi. 20; Isa. xiii. 24), and karkom, or saffron, only mentioned in Cant. iv. 14. To the resinous and balmy spices already mentioned we may perhaps add the nekosa (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11), some kind of gum; the ilmekh, or poplar (Gen. xxxvii. 25), by some regarded as the storax-tree; the mastic (Susan. v. 54), a tree growing in Greece, Asia Minor, and Palestine, — the Pistacia tientiscus. It is extensively used in the East in the preparation of spirits, as a sweetmeat, as a masticatory for preserving the gums and teeth, as an anti-spasmodic in medicine. To the spices we may also add the cypress-branch (kopher, A. V., campfire, but in the margin cypress, Cant. i. 14, iv. 13), carried by the Mohammedan women in the bosom. The powdered leaves, which are mixed with the juice of citrons, are used to stain therewith the hair and nails. The sirpad, in Isa. xv. 19, translated "bitter," is, according to Eichhorn, Ewald, the white mustard. Finally, we mention the gourd (kikayan, Jon. iv. 6-10), whose growth was miraculous: it is the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant. In the Talmud the kit-oil is mentioned, prepared from the seed of the ricinus.
SPIERA, Francesco, the unfortunate man, who, for worldly considerations, denied his Protestant profession, for which he consequently died in a condition of sudden despair and remorse; was b. at Citadella, near Padua, Italy, about 1498; d. there December, 1548. A lawyer and public official in his native city, greatly honored, rich, and ardently devoted to the pursuit of wealth, he accepted the message of the Reformation; and experiencing peace, comfort, and joy in a remarkable degree, according to his own account, he preached everywhere, on the streets and in private, to his fellow-townsmen. He studied the Scriptures carefully. His change of life produced a great excitement. He was accused by the priest of the town at Rome. When Spiera learned that he was about to be summoned to appear before the papal authorities, he lost courage, and went of his own free will, but only after a terrible struggle with his conscience, to Venice, to confess repentance to the papal legate, delia Casa. He subscribed a penitential document which the legate drew up, and read a similar document, denouncing the doctrines of the Reformation, in the church of Citadella, before two thousand people. No sooner, however, had he arrived at his own home than he was overcome by the most terrible fears of the judgment and eternal condemnation. He could not leave his bed, lost his appetite, attempted several times to take his own life, was carried to Padua, but brought back to Citadella, and died a few days afterwards in despair. These experiences, and the manner of Spiera's death, produced an intense excitement. Spiera believed he had committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and refused all remission of it. He held he belonged to the Church of Rome. He was accused by the priest of the town at Rome. In his assurance that God had forsaken him, he had the most painful visions. Devils surrounded him, stuck needles into his pillow; a fly buzzed about his head, which was sent by Bethelzebub; and, in his terrible consciousness of sin, he often roared like a lion, causing those about him to tremble. He was accused by the priest of the town at Rome. In his assurance that God had forsaken him, he had the most painful visions. Devils surrounded him, stuck needles into his pillow; a fly buzzed about his head, which was sent by Bethelzebub; and, in his terrible consciousness of sin, he often roared like a lion, causing those about him to tremble.

Critiquing the history of Spiera, we come to the conclusion, that in spite of his preaching the gospel, and laying claim to the finest Christian virtues, he was never truly penitent for his profession, and laying claim to the finest Christian virtue, but did not accompany his profession by a forsaking of sin. Calvin and the other reformers took a deep interest in the case; and Calvin, who wrote a preface (December, 1549) to the account of Henricus Scotus, regarded his remembrance, as Henry IV., was not the son of Anton of Bourg, but of Merlin; and on his return to Geneva, where he embraced the Reformation. One of the reasons for this move was his relation to Catherine de' Gasperne, a married woman whom he had seduced, and who lived with him after the death of her husband. At Geneva they were married; and Spifame was ordained a minister of the Reformed Church, and appointed pastor of Issoudun. In 1562 he went to France as an agent of the Queen of Navarre, Jeanne d'Albret. But he made the queen his irreconcilable enemy by saying that her son, Henry IV., was not the son of Anton of Bourg, but of Merlin; and on his return to Geneva he was arrested. During the investigation, some forgery with respect to his own marriage was proved against him; and he was sentenced to death, and beheaded.

SPINOLA, Cristoval Rojas de, a Roman-Catholic apologist at Jewish descent; lived in Spain in the fifteenth century; entered the Franciscan order after his conversion; was for some time rector of the school of Salamanca, and became finally bishop of Orense in Galicia. His celebrated work, Foritudine fidei et concordia Judaeos, Saracenos, etc., was written in 1484, but not printed until 1484; especially the part against the Mohammedans is of great historical interest.

H. MALLET.

SPINOLA, Cristoval Rojas de, a Roman-Catholic unionist; d. March 12, 1695; a native of Spain, and general of the Franciscan order in Madrid; came to Vienna as confessor to the wife of Leopold I., a Spanish princess, and was made bishop of Wienersch-Neustadt in 1855. A peaceable union between the Protestant churches and the Church of Rome was the great idea of his life; and the religious indifference of the Protestant courts in Germany, the disgust of the higher classes at confessional controversies, the mild character of the school of Helmistadt, etc., made, for a time his exertions look successful. A conference took place in 1883. Spinola presented his Regula circa Christianorum omnium ecclesiasticum reunionem, and the Helmistadt theologians, their Methodus reformatam in annis, having both Emperor and the Pope in favor of the scheme, serious Roman Catholics considered Spinola a a number of attributes to substance. Spinoza, however, considers substance only under the attributes of thought and extension. The cause of these two attributes is not in God, but in the human mind, which finds both thought and extension in itself. The attributes are independent of each other, and determine substance as the notion of attributes is not dependent on the notion of substance, which excludes every determination. Res cogitans and res extensa are the same thing, i.e., considered from different stand-points; but it is indifferent to substance how it is considered.

The notion of substance, being but one, seems to imply that substance = every thing existing, i.e., the world. But how can the finite proceed from the infinite? This question is senseless according to Spinoza, because the finite, as the finite, does not exist; for all determination is non esse, and the finite is only as being composed of single objects. Single objects do, therefore, not exist as such, but only as modifications and accidents of substance.

There is a threefold mode of considering things.

The first kind of cognition, which he calls opinio or imaginatio, is cognition through unregulated experience or signs, by which we connect certain ideas. The second kind of cognition, ratio, is cognition through the peculiarities of things, and notiones communes. The third kind of cognition is the intuitive knowledge of the mind, or true knowledge. Looking at the world through imagination, it appears to us as existing outside of God, and it would be absurd to say that God was composed of modes. It is false, therefore, to say of Spinoza that he taught God and the world were identical, because we can conceive of the world only as being composed of single objects. Single objects do, therefore, not exist as such, but only as modifications and accidents of substance.

As will is but a mode, it is self-evident that God cannot act with free will; everything follows from his necessity, i.e., his nature being his power. It is foolish to assume that God acts according to aims, for this means to subject him to something else. The basis of his being is the basis of his acting. The law of causality rules, however, in the natura naturata.

In like manner by a substantia conceived under the modes of thought and extension, single objects must be conceived, because they are modes of thought and extension. The world is either a material world, or a world of ideas. Being modes of the same substance, they must stand in SPINOZA, Baruch de, b. at Amsterdam, Nov. 24, 1632; d. at The Hague, Feb. 21, 1677. His parents were Jews who had been driven from Portugal by religious persecution. His teacher in Hebrew was the celebrated rabbi, Saul Levi Marteira, who introduced him to the study of the Bible and the Talmud; besides, he studied Latin under the celebrated physician, Franz van der Ende. Differences between his views and the Jewish doctrine were soon noticed, and so he was expelled from the Jewish communion on account of "frightful heresies." He left Amsterdam, and lived in the vicinity from 1656 to 1660, then at Rynsberg and Voorburg, near The Hague. Finally he settled at The Hague; residing there to the end of his life, and supporting himself by grinding lenses. In 1673 he refused to take a call as professor of philosophy to Heidelberg, saying that he might be hindered there in his liberty of philosophizing.

Cleanliness and calmness are the main features of his character. He was never seen laughing, nor very sad, but kind and gentle to all. Free from hypocrisy, a man of few wants, he was the image of a true sage.

His writings are, Renati Descartes Principiorum philosophia, pars i. et ii., etc., Amsterdam apud Joh. Rieuwertsz, 1660; Tractatus theologico-politicus, Hamburgi apud Henricum Kranhart, 1670; Baruch de Spinoza's Opera posthuma, Amsterdam, apud Joh. Rieuwertsz, 1677, containing Ethica ordine geometrico demonstrata, etc., Tractatus politicus, Tractus de intellectus emendatione, Epistola; Baruch de Spinoza tract. de Deo et homine ejusque felicitate (recently discovered); The unfinished Essays of Spinoza, ed. Hugo Ginsberg, Heidelberg, 1882. We shall only consider here the Ethics and the Tractatus theologico-politicus as the most important works for philosophy and theology.

Spinoza, the second great philosopher in the course of the purely rationalistic development of modern philosophy, stands in very close connection to his great predecessor, Descartes. The fundamental notion of Spinoza's system is the notion of substance, which is thus defined: "By substance I understand that which is in itself, and which is conceived by itself; i.e., the conception of which does not need the conception of another thing in order to be formed. There is but one substance, which is identical with God. We cannot predicate any thing of it, as omnis determinatio est negatio, and the infinite cannot contain any negation, because it is the absolute affirmation of existence." All predicates used by Spinoza to define its nature are therefore but a circumlocution of the first definition.

In order to comprehend something of the infinite substance, we must look to the second important notion in the system,—the notion of the attributes. Substance cannot be comprehended by its mere existence, but only by attributes which are what reason perceives as constituting the essence of substance. The attributes, therefore, belong only to our mind, not to substance itself, which cannot admit any determination, i.e., negation. Our mind may therefore ascribe... accordance, so that the order and connection of ideas is identical with the order and connection of things; for it is not a thing and an idea by an idea; not a thing by an idea, or an idea by a thing. This is true of all single modes, which are things or ideas according to the way they are considered. All things are therefore animated, but they differ in the grade of their animation. Body and idea, as contained in his Ethics, the principal work of Spinoza, which involve sadness, like compassion, meekness, or repentance. A passion ceases to be a passion, i.e., a state of suffering, as soon as we have a clear idea of it. Every man may thus free himself of his passions, because he is able to have a clear idea of the passions of his body. This is possible by looking at things as being necessary. He who knows his passions rejoices, and has at the same time the idea of God; i.e., he loves God. The highest good is the idea of God, results from the third kind of cognition—the cognition sub specie aeternitatis, by which we know God as an eternal being. God, being superior to all passions, can, strictly taken, neither love nor hate; and whosoever wishes to be loved by God wishes that God should cease to be God.

But, as our ideas are really thoughts of God, we may say that our love to God is a part of God's infinite love to himself. Our blessedness and freedom consist in this eternal love of God, and in this sense we may say that man is eternal (immortal). The idea of eternity has nothing to do with time or duration. Knowing things under the third forms of cognition, man will be free of his passions, and will not fear death, because his spirit is eternal. This eternal part of the spirit is the reason; the part disappearing, his imagination. Even if we knew nothing of our eternity, virtue and piety would be our aim, for blessedness is not the reward of virtue, but virtue in itself is blessedness.

These are the outlines of Spinoza's philosophy as contained in his Ethics, the principal work of his life.

The Tractatus theologicopoliticus, one of his earlier essays, was probably caused by his personal experience, and is very important as a defence of liberty of thought.

The difference of men is nowhere more distinctly shown than in their opinions, especially their religious opinions. It must be left, therefore, to the judgment of every individual to believe whatever he wants, as long as his belief produces good works; for the State has not to care for the opinions of men, but for their actions. Faith, religion, and theology have no theoretical importance or truth: their object is an entirely practical one, i.e., to bring those men who are not ruled by reason to obedience, virtue, and blessedness. It is the object of philosophy to give truth. Philosophy and theology have nothing in common. The reason for their difference is the following: God as the object of religion is a human being, i.e., he is represented in his relation to man; while God as the object of philosophy is not a human being, i.e., he is considered in relation to himself. Holy Scripture does not give a definition of God: it only reveals to us the attributes of justice and love. This is a clear proof that philosophical knowledge of God cannot serve as a model for human life. God is represented in Scripture to the imagination, or, every man will be gracious, etc. Philosophy, which deals with clear notions, cannot make use of these attributes. Theology has, therefore, no right to rule over philosophy, as the result of such a dominion will be fanaticism without peace. That will of course, undermine the foundations of the State, and the State should not allow the encroachments of theology.

of Christ, contained in this essay, are also of great interest.

The logical fallacies and other defects in the system of Spinoza have been frequently pointed out. The principal objections to be made are the following: The idea of substance is notionless, and insufficient for an explanation of growth and life: the modes stand, therefore, in hardly any connection with substance, and thus do not fulfil what they are intended for. The practical philosophy, although grandly drawn, does not cover the whole realm of the social, artistic, and ethical life of man: nevertheless, the system, and especially the sublime idea of substance, has had the greatest influence upon modern philosophy.

Many others, owe very much to Spinoza. And the whole realm of the social, artistic, and ethical life of man: nevertheless, the system, and especially the sublime idea of substance, has had the greatest influence upon modern philosophy.

The old-roach of atheism and pantheism, so often made y ignorance, will drop the religious question altogether, and left to the states to manage it as they could best defend before God, until a council, ecclesiatical or national, should finally settle it. — II. The second diet was opened March 15, 1529, under very different circumstances. Francis I. was for peace, and the Turkish hordes had retired. The Roman-Catholic majority consequently decreed that the mass should be restored wherever it had been abolished, that a rigid censorship of books should be established, and that every preacher who did not recognize the real presence in the sacrament should be excluded from the pulpit. Against these decrees the evangelical minority entered a formal protest, whence their name, Protessants. — III. The third diet was opened Feb. 9, 1542; and the emperor confirmed the peace of Ratisbon (1541) in order to get the necessary subsidies against the Turks. — IV. The fourth diet was opened by the emperor in person, Feb. 20, 1544; and again the Turkish affairs compelled the emperor to concede toleration in religious matters. SPIRIT, the Human, in the Biblical Sense.

The biblical terms for "soul" are גוח, פן; and for "spirit," נפש, נפש. We owe the conception of the human spirit, as, indeed, of spirit in general, to the Sacred Scriptures, to the religion of revelation. It is peculiar to these to speak of the human existence, particularly of his personal life. Where the Scriptures speak of the spirit of man in its widest acceptance, that is, of life (as in Job x. 12, xvii. 1; Ezek. xxxvii. 8; Zech. xii. 1), and ascribe to men and animals the same spirit of the human spirit. See SLEIDANZ De statu religii, etc., Frankfort, 1786, xv. pp. 328-350; [C. JAGER: Die Protestation zu Speyer, 19 April, 1529, Strassburg, 1879 (28 pp.); J. N. SPIRES, a city of Bavaria on the Rhine, is noticeable in church history as the seat of four diets concerning the Reformation. — I. The first diet was opened June 26, 1526. The situation was very trying to the emperor. Francis I. had just broken the peace of Madrid with the consent of the Pope, and the Turks were threatening in the East. Under those circumstances the emperor dropped the religious question altogether, and left to the states to manage it as they could best defend before God, until a council, ecclesiastical or national, should finally settle it. — II. The second diet was opened March 15, 1529, under very different circumstances. Francis I. was for peace, and the Turkish hordes had retired. The Roman-Catholic majority consequently decreed that the mass should be restored wherever it had been abolished, that a rigid censorship of books should be established, and that every preacher who did not recognize the real presence in the sacrament should be excluded from the pulpit. Against these decrees the evangelical minority entered a formal protest, whence their name, Protessants. — III. The third diet was opened Feb. 9, 1542; and the emperor confirmed the peace of Ratisbon (1541) in order to get the necessary subsidies against the Turks. — IV. The fourth diet was opened by the emperor in person, Feb. 20, 1544; and again the Turkish affairs compelled the emperor to concede toleration in religious matters. See SULIDAN: De stato religios, etc., Frankfort, 1786, xv. pp. 328-350; [C. JAGER: Die Protestation zu Speyer, 19 April, 1529, Strassburg, 1879 (28 pp.); J. N. it is never said that the spirit dies, but that the soul dies (Num. xxxii. 19; Judges. xvi. 30; Matthew. x. 28; Mark iii. 4). Only the soul is the subject of will and desire, inclination and aversion, pleasure and disgust (cf. Deut. xii. 20, xiv. 26; 1 Samuel. ii. 16; Job xxii. 13; Ps. xlii. 2, xliii. 1; Proverbs. xxii. 10; Isaiah. xxvi. 8; Micah. vii. 1, etc.); but soul and spirit are alike the subject of perception, self-consciousness. It must not, however, be overlooked, that consciousness, perception, willing, are attributed to the heart; and soul and spirit are spoken of only as they concern the hidden state to which these functions and phenomena belong, and because some weight would be laid upon it.

Again: the dead are spoken of as spirits (Luke xxi. 37, 39; Acts xxiii. 8 sq.; Hebrews xii. 1; 1 Peter. iii. 19), but the living as souls, for the soul as such outlasts death. Finally, and this is the nothing is farther from it than such a trichotomy.

SPIRITUALISM is a term, which, in its wider sense, is often applied to various forms of mysticism and quietism, as represented by Jacob Boehme, De Molinos, Mme. Guyon, and others; while in its narrower, but now more common, sense, it simply denotes a belief in a natural communication between this and the other world. A leading Spiritualist paper, Spiritual Magazine, established in London in 1860, defines Spiritualism as “based on the cardinal fact of spirit communication and influx;” as an “effort to discover all truth relating to man's spiritual nature, capacities, relations, duties, welfare, and destiny;” as aiming, “through a careful, reverent study of facts, at a knowledge of the laws and principles which govern the occult forces of the universe, of the relations of spirit to matter, and of man to God and the spiritual world.” In this sense of the term the phenomenon has attracted more physiological than theological interest; though its devotees pronounce it an indispensable weapon in the contest with the religious indifference, materialism, and atheism of our age.

Spiritualism, or, as it is sometimes called, Spiritism, dates back only to 1848. In that year it was discovered by Madame Hydes in Hydeville, Wayne County, N. Y., and which could not be accounted for in any ordinary way, conveyed intelligently in communications. In 1850 the two girls Margaret and Kate Fox came to New York; and soon "spirit-rapping," the moving of heavy bodies without any mechanical agency, involuntary writing, etc., were phenomena which everybody had witnessed, or heard discussed by witnesses. Still more powerful mediums — that is, persons of such sensitive organization that the spirits can act upon them or through them — appeared. One of the most remarkable of these was Daniel Douglas Home, a lad of seventeen years, who gave sittings before Napoleon III. in Paris, and Alexander II. in St. Petersburg. Greater things were now accomplished, — speaking in foreign languages; lighting of a phosphorescent light in the dark; producing of drawings, pictures, and photographs; and, finally, the complete embodiment of the spiritual, at least so far as to make him recognizable to friends and relatives. Numerous books were written for and against, and a multitude of prose-SPITTA, Karl Johann Philipp, a distinguished German hymn-writer; was b. in Hanover, Aug. 1, 1801; d. in Burgdorf, Sept. 28, 1859. His mother, a converted Jewess, was left a widow in 1805. Sent to school, Spitta's studies were interrupted by the perusal of the works of Tholuck and De Spette.

From 1824 to 1828 he acted as private tutor at Lune, near Luneburg, and then continued his study of Latin and Greek in private, he again entered school in 1818, and in 1821 was enrolled in the University of Gottingen, where he studied theology. His faith wavered for a time, and he associated with the circle to which Heinrich Heine belonged. It was re-assured by the perusal of the works of Tholuck and De Wette. From 1824 to 1828 he acted as private tutor at Lune, near Luneburg, and then became co-pastor at Sudwald; and after holding pastores at Hameln (1830) and Wechholt (1837), he was made superintendent at Wittringen, Luneburg (1838), and at Burgdorf (1839). His success as a pastor and preacher brought him calls in 1844 and 1846 to Bremen, Barmen, and Elberfeld. In 1855 he was made doctor of divinity by the university of Gottingen.

The Lalstelists generally reject the doctrine of the Trinity, considering Christ simply as one of the great teachers of mankind, not in any essential point different from the founders of the other great historical religions. They also generally reject the doctrine of a personal devil, though they believe in evil spirits, ascribing to them a power over man which may amount to possession. But they all believe in a future life, and in a natural, not miraculous, communication between that life and life on earth. The idea of miracles they have completely discarded, and the miracles of Scripture they accept as natural though unexplained facts. Life on earth they consider as a preparation for the life to come; though ey believein evilspirits, ascribing to them a power over man which may amount to possession. But they all believe in a future life, and in a natural, not miraculous, communication between that life and life on earth. The idea of miracles they have completely discarded, and the miracles of Scripture they accept as natural though unexplained facts. Life on earth they consider as a preparation for the life to come; though under certain conditions of which we as yet have only very slight knowledge; but the motives which bring the spirits to reveal themselves to us are simply love and mercy, a desire to convince man of the existence of a future life.

Spitta was a man of deep piety, and earnestness of faith. He excelled as a pastor. His father refused, upon his return, to write a letter of introduction to his eldest son, who was b. at Mid-Calder, near Edinburgh, 1565; d. in London, Dec. 26, 1839. He was educated at Glasgow University, and succeeded his father as parson at Calder, in 1593, when only eighteen. In 1801 he accompanied the Duke of Lennox as chaplain in his embassy to France, and in 1603 James VI. to England. In 1603 he was made archbishop of Glasgow, and privy-councillor for Scotland. In 1615 he was transferred to St. Andrews, so that he became primate and metropolitan. On June 13, 1635, he crowned Charles I. at Holyrood. In 1635 he was made chancellor of Scotland. He was the leader in the movement to introduce the Liturgy into the Church of Scotland, which occasioned the rebellion (1637). When the Covenant was signed (1638), he retired in disappointment to London. He wrote The History of the Church and State of Scotland (203—1625), London, 1655; best ed. in Edinburgh, 1847-51, 3 vols., with life of the author.

SPRING, William Buell, D.D., LL.D., b. in Andover, Conn., Oct. 10, 1795; d. at Flushing, L.I., N.Y., May 7, 1876. He was graduated with honor from Yale College in 1813; was tutor for about a year in the family of Major Lewis (whose wife was the adopted daughter of Washington), at Woodlawn, near Mount Vernon; entered the Princeton Theological Seminary in the fall of 1816; was graduated in 1819, and immediately settled over the Congregational Church in West Springfield, Mass., as colleague with the Rev. Dr. Joseph Lathrop, who was in his sixty-eighth year of age, and had spent his whole professional life of sixty-three years in that parish. Dr. Lathrop died in the following year, and Mr. Sprague was left sole pastor. In 1829 he accepted the call of the Second Presbyterian Church of Albany to become its pastor; and here he passed the succeeding forty years of his life, and closed the period of active labor by resignation of his charge in 1869. He then removed his residence from Albany to Flushing, L.I., where he died in the eighty-first year of his age. In 1828 Columbia College conferred upon him the degree of D.D. from Princeton in 1869.

Among the preachers and public speakers of this country, Dr. Sprague attained very high eminence. In 1848 he delivered the oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvard, in 1850 the annual address to the Yale alumni, and in 1862 the discourse to the alumni of the Princeton Seminary upon the semi-centennial anniversary of that institution. More than one hundred and fifty of his sermons and occasional discourses were published by request. He was a voluminous author. He published more than a dozen separate works, among which may be mentioned Letters from Europe (1828), Lectures on Revivals (1832), Life of Rev. Dr. E. D. Griffin (1838), Aids to Early Religion (1847), Words to a Young Man's Conscience (1848), Visits to European Celebrities (1853), Memoirs of the Rev. Drs. John and William A. McDowell (1854), Life of Rev. Dr. Jedidiah Morse (1874).

The great literary work of his life, however, which earned for him the title of "biographer of the church," was the Annals of the American Pulpit; begun in 1832, when he was fifty-seven years of age, of which nine large octavo volumes were published, from 1832 to 1842; and the concluding volume completed for publication, before his death. Vols. i. and ii. are devoted to the Trinitarian Congregationalists; vols. iii. and iv., to the Presbyterians; vol. v., to the Episcopalians; vol. vi., to the Baptists; vol. vii., to the Methodists; vol. viii., to the Unitarians; vol. ix., to the Lutheran, Reformed, Associate, Associate Reformed, and Reformed Presbyterian; and the unpublished volume includes Quakers, German Reformed, Moravians, Cumberland Presbyterian, Freewill Baptist, Swedenborgian, and Universalist.

The volumes are made up of biographical sketches of the leading characters of each denomination, from the earliest settlement of the country to the close of the year 1855. The work contains about fifteen hundred of these sketches; and to each sketch are appended, as far as practicable, letters of personal recollections contributed by writers who had intimately known the clergyman or layman of each denomination, and probably had a more extended acquaintance throughout the churches of this country than any other man of his time. His successor at Albany, Rev. Dr. A. J. Upson, in his commemorative discourse, referred to the Annals as follows:

"This book of our venerated friend is successful. It may have yielded no adequate pecuniary compensation; it may not be sold from the large existing libraries, nor sold at the book-stalls; but it is so peculiar, it fills its own sphere so completely, it can never be supplanted. It is a treasury of Christian examples. It is the testimony of a cloud of witnesses. It is a chronicle of the everlasting church. Its author has identified himself with God as his agent in fulfilling his promise, that 'the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.'"

Dr. Sprague was thus described by an old and intimate friend, Rev. Dr. Ray Palmer, in the Congregationalist of May 24, 1876:

"In his personal appearance Dr. Sprague was a very notable man. More than six feet in stature, with a straight, large-framed body, well proportioned, with a grand head and dark-brown hair (which was unchanged to the day of his death, in his eighty-second year), he was such as could be observed from the distance of a mile with ease. His bearing was natural, as of one entirely self-possessed, and the expression of his countenance pleasing; so that, while he impressed by his dignity, he yet attracted by a certain kindness and simplicity of manner which at once set even a stranger entirely at ease with him. In conversation one was sure to find him amiable, cheerful, rich in material derived from reading, travel, and intercourse with men, yet as ready to listen as to talk, and chiefly intent on imparting the utmost possible pleasure to his friend or visitor. He had come into personal contact with many distinguished men, both at home and abroad; and he liked to describe them, to relate anecdotes of their peculiarities, and to repeat what they had finely said, or eloquent passages from their writings. He did this with great felicity. No one could spend an hour with him, and not be conscious of having enjoyed a rare pleasure. Of all that makes a Christian gentleman he was certainly a rare example."

of machinery. During this period he took part in the formation of the American Bible Society (1816), American Tract Society (1825), and American Home Missionary Society (1820). From 1834 to the close of his ministry, there were no revivals; but his steady growth of influence in his power as a preacher. It was then that he used the press to extend his usefulness, and published a number of volumes of connected discourses. His congregation first met in Beeckman Street, but in 1836 removed to their present church, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-sixth Street. After 1861 he had a colleague. His ministry, both for length and power, is remarkable. His principal publications are Essays on the Distinguishing Traits of Christian Character, New York, 1813; Fragments from the Study of a Pastor, 1838; Obligations of the World to the Bible, 1839; The Attraction of the Cross, 1846; The Bible not of Man, 1847; The Power of the Pulpit, 1848; The Mercy-Seat, 1850; First Things, 1851, 2 vols.; The Glory of Christ, 1852, 2 vols.; The Contrast between Good and Bad Men, 1855, 2 vols.; Pulpit Ministration, 1864, 2 vols.; and Personal Reminiscences of the Life and Times of Gardner Spring, 1866, 2 vols.

SPRING, Samuel, D.D., b. in Norbridge, Mass., Feb. 27, 1746; d. in Newburyport, Mass., March 4, 1819, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. A graduate of Princeton College in 1771; a classmate and room-mate there with President James Madison. The friendship between these two men remained uninterrupted through life; although Spring was an ardent Federalist, and a determined opposer of Madison's administration. He began the study of theology with his particular friend, Dr. John Witherspoon, president of Nassau Hall. He continued the study with Dr. Joseph Bellamy, Dr. Samuel Hopkins, and Dr. Stephen West. With the three divines last named he became very intimate, as likewise with Dr. Jonathan Edwards, who had been Spring's tutor at Nassau Hall. He coincided, however, in his theological opinions, with his brother-in-law, Nathanael Emmons, more nearly than with any other man.

In 1775 he connected himself, as a chaplain of the Continental army, with a volunteer corps of eleven hundred men under the command of Benedict Arnold. With this corps he marched through the wilderness to Quebec. He stood with Col. Burr on the Plains of Abram when Gen. Montgomery fell. At Nassau Hall he had become interested in his college-mate, Aaron Burr. This interest was deepened as he became more intimate with Burr during the disastrous expedition to Canada. After the death of Hamilton, in 1804, Dr. Spring, although a distant relative of Burr, did not spare either the murderer or the murdered. Dr. Spring was pastor of the Second Congregational Church in Newburyport, Mass., for forty-one years and seven months. He was ordained Aug. 6, 1777; was a distinguished patriot during the war of the Revolution and that of 1812. He was eminently a doctrinal preacher, vigorous, dignified, commanding, subduing. He deserves the gratitude of the churches for the impulse which he gave to the cause of theological education between the years 1777 and 1819. To him, as much as to any one man, may be traced the origin of at least four important institutions of learning. To him and Eliphalet Pearson may be ascribed the idea of forming the American Theological Seminary. To him, more than to any one man, is due the formation of the Massachusetts Missionary Society,—a society which trained the principal men by whom the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was first conducted. To Dr. Spring or Dr. Worcester, or both united, is due the honor of having first suggested the idea of forming the American Board.

Twenty-six of Dr. Spring's published sermons are, some doctrinal, some political, some addressed to charitable societies, some to children. His most memorable theological treatises are his Dialogue on the Nature of Duty, 1784; his Moral Disquisitions and Strictures on the Rev. [Professor] David Tappan's Letters [in reply to the Dialogue], 2d ed., 1815. He also published The Youth's Assistant, or a Series of Theological Questions and Answers, 1818, and a large number of essays in The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, of which he was an editor.

STABAT MATER are the first words of the famous hymn of Jacopone da Todi (d. 1306), and mean "The mother was standing." It is the most pathetic hymn of the middle ages, and, in spite of its adornment of the Virgin, is one of the softest, sweetest, and chastest lyrics in Christian literature. Suggested by the scene depicted in John xix. 25, it describes with tender feeling the piercing agony of Mary at the cross. It has furnished a theme for musical composition to Nanini (about 1620), Palestrina (whose music is the best, and is sung at Rome on Palm-Sunday), Astorga (about 1700), Pergolesi (about 1736), Haydn, and Rossini (whose composition, according to Palmer, may be compared to a mater dolorosa painted standing under the cross, and clad in a Parisian court-dress). The original is in ten stanzas (Wackernagel, i. 136, 142; More, ii. 147-154; Daniel, iii. 149-150; Warriner, iv. 143-154). It gives fifty-three German and several Dutch translations. It has been translated into English by Lord Lindsay, Caswall, Mant, Coles, Benedict, etc. One of the best translations, "At the cross her station keeping," is found in Schaff's Christ in Song, p. 169. Dr. Colles's translation, beginning "Stood the afflicted mother weeping," is also very excellent. See Jacopone da Todi and the literature there given.

Another Stabat Mater celebrates the joy of the Virgin Mary at the birth of Christ, as the former celebrates her grief at the cross, and may be called the "Mater speciosa" as distinct from the "Mater dolorosa." It was published in the edition of the Italian poems of Jacopone at Brescia, 1495, but attracted no attention till Ozanam published a French translation in his work on the Franciscan poets (Paris, 1832), and John Mason Neale, an English translator of that death (1860). It is not equal to the Mater dolorosa, and seems to be an imitation by another hand. It was discussed by P. Schaff in Hours at Home (a monthly magazine), New York, May, 1887, and translated again by Erastus C. Benedict, Hymn of Hildebert, etc., New York, 1856, p. 39.
STACKHOUSE, Thomas, Church of England, b. 1680; became vicar of Beenham, Berkshire, where he died, Oct. 11, 1732. He is remembered for his New History of the Holy Bible, from the beginning of the world to the establishment of Christianity (London, 1732, 2 vols. folio; frequently re-published and reprinted; best ed. by G. Gieig and Dewar, 1830), and his Complete body of divinity (1754, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1846). His other works are Der christliche Staat und sein Ferdims, an intimate friend of Hengstenberg, to a searching examination, published in the Henfenberg controversy in 1845.

STAHN, Friedrich Julius, b. at Munich, Jan. 16, 1802; d. at Brückenau, Aug. 10, 1861. He was of Jewish parentage, but embraced Christianity in his seventeenth year: four years afterwards, his whole family followed his example. He studied jurisprudence at Würzburg, Heidelberg, and Erlangen; and was appointed professor at Erlangen in 1832, and in Berlin in 1840. In Berlin he gathered crowds of students, not only of juridical students, but also, of educated people in general: as, for instance, in 1850, when he lectured on The Present Party-Position in Church and State; which lectures were published after his death by W. Hertz, Berlin, 1863. He also held the highest positions in the state-government of the church, and took a very active part in Prussian politics. His brilliant parliamen\ntary talent soon made him one of the most prominent leaders of the conservative party, both in political and ecclesiastical affairs. Democracy and free-thinking he understood, and was not afraid of; but he hated liberalism and rationalism. The former is revolution, he said; but the latter is dissolution. His ideas are clearly defined in his Die Pholosophie des Rechts, 1850, thoroughly revised in 1847, vol. 1., under the title, Geschichte der Rechtsphilosophie, vol. ii., Rechts- und Staatslehre. Of the fundamental problems of human life, he considered two solutions as possible, both philosophically and juridically, one on the basis of pantheism, and one on the basis of faith in a personal God who has revealed himself to man; one giving the absolute power to the mass of the people, the majority, and one organizing the State after the idea of the highest personality, as a sphere of ethical action. What lay between those two extremes he despised as destitute of character. But he did not consider the two possible solutions as equally good: on the contrary, from the depth of his conviction he cried out, "No majority, but authority!" Nowhere, perhaps, has he set forth his ideas more forcibly and more pointedly than in the two Sendeschreiben he published in the Hugenborg controversy in 1845.

In 1840 appeared his Die Kirchenverfassung nach Lehre und Recht der Protestanten, in which he subjects the three systems prevailing in the Lutheran Church—the episcopal, the territorial, and the collegial system—to a searching examination, recommending the first. The constitution of the Reformed Church has not found an equal treatment. He was an able defender of Lutheranism; and an intimate friend of Hengstenberg. In his Die Lutherische Kirche und die Union (1860) he went so far in his opposition to the union of the two Protestant churches as to declare that Luther at Marburg, refusing to join hands with Zwingli, was as great as Luther at Worms. Among his other works are Der Christliche Staat und sein Ferdims, an intimate friend of Hengstenberg, to a searching examination, published in the Henfenberg controversy in 1845.

STANHOPE, Lady Hester Lucy, daughter of Earl Stanhope, and niece of William Pitt, the great Earl of Chatham. She was born in London, March 12, 1776; d. at Jun in the Lebanon, June 23, 1839. She was the private secretary and confidante of her distinguished uncle, and a member of his family from her twentieth year until his death, 1806, when, unable to live in her accustomed style upon the twelve hundred pounds yearly stipend granted her as the ward of the nation, she retired to a fortress on the island of Mar Elias, near Jun, and eight miles from Sidon, where she lived until her death, exercising a remarkable influence upon the Arabs around. Her servants were Albanians; her house, a fortress which afforded shelter to the persecuted. She dressed like an emir, ruled despotsitically, practised astrology, and preached a creed compounded of Bible and Koran. She was eccentric to the verge of insanity. See her Memoirs, London, 1845, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1846; The Seven Years' Travels of Lady Hester Stanhope, 1846, 3 vols.

STANISLAUS, Bishop of Cracow, the patron-saint of Poland; was b. near Cracow, July 26, 1030, and, after studying canonical law at Gnesen and Paris, entered the clerical profession. He was a stern ascetic, distributed his property amongst the poor, and boldly denounced the cruelty and licentiousness of Boleslas II., king of Poland, whom he finally excommunicated. In revenge, the king had Stanislaus murdered while he was celebrating mass near Cracow, May 8, 1079. Miracles are ascribed to the bishop, both alive and dead. His death is celebrated May 8, and the day is called Stanislaus Day. He was canonized by Alexander III. in 1196, by Innocent III. in 1209, and, by Clement V. in 1311. His cultus was celebrated in the court of Rome in 1275, and in the council of Lyons in 1274. His feast is celebrated throughout Poland, and in various Roman Catholic countries. He is remembered in Poland by the town of Stanislaus, which is in the province of Posen. His day is May 8. See his life, which is celebrated by his many miracles, and by his love of the poor. In 1254 Innocent IV. placed him among the saints of Poland. His day is May 7. See her Memoirs, London, 1845, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1846; The Seven Years' Travels of Lady Hester Stanhope, 1846, 3 vols.

STANISLAUS, St., b. Oct. 20, 1550, at Kostcou, Poland; d. in Rome, Aug. 15, 1568. In his fourteenth year he went to Vienna; had a vision of two angels and the Virgin Mary, who admired his good character; he was embalmed in a volume of family memoirs. Their influence on him for good was very great, and to this is to be added the effect of intercourse with the Leycesters, and with their influence on him for good was very great, and to this is to be added the effect of intercourse with the Leycesters, and with his birthplace, he spent his childhood under the patronage of several authors. Rugby became to him a schoolboy at Rugby; and there he exhibited the amiableness and decision so well described in "Tom Brown," and under the formative power of Dr. Thomas Arnold, prince of schoolmasters, to whom he owed much of the mental and moral strength which distinguished him in the whole of his subsequent career. He early showed a fondness for history, and, as he records, "got through all Mitford and all Gibbon, and several smaller authors. Rugby became to Stanley a second home; and, when he had received the last of five prizes, his master said to him, "Think you, Stanley: we have nothing more to give."

He was elected a scholar of Balliol at Oxford in 1833, and signalized his undergraduate life by a prize-poem entitled The Gipsies. His father was made Bishop of Norwich in 1837; and there, of course, he was wont to spend his vacations; in no other way did he become connected with the old East-Anglican city. He undertook a tour in Greece in 1840-41, and there, as was his wont, studied nature on its poetical side and in its historical relations, and returned to the university full of knowledge and inspiration derived from the acquaintance he formed with the classic scenery amidst which he wandered. He soon commenced as college-tutor, and the attachment he inspired in the hearts of his pupils foretold what was to be the result of his social intercourse in after-years. His lectures on history and divinity awakened much attention, and gave promise of what he subsequently accomplished as a popular lecturer and author. Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, in which he broke up new ground by dwelling on the individual peculiarities of the apostles, were published in 1846; but before that, in 1844, he made a mark on biographical literature by his Life of Arnold, a book said at the time to set everybody talking about the hero, rather than the author,—a sign of the wonderful success he had achieved. He was appointed secretary to the first Oxford Commission, which resulted in considerable improvements of university education; and, watching the progress of theological controversy, he wrote in 1850 an article on the Gorham Judgment, the harbinger of several successive criticisms on ecclesiastical questions, which he afterwards published.

He entered on the second stage of his public life. There he wrote his Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians and his Memorials of Canterbury; and, having already travelled in the East, he added to these his Sinai and Palestine. A tour in Russia was taken by him whilst he was a Canterbury canon, and this awakened in him a deep interest respecting the Eastern Church. Of this he availed himself in lectures on its history, after he entered upon the Regius professorship of ecclesiastical history at Oxford, in 1858. These lectures were published in 1861. It should further be recorded of his work at Canterbury, that there his influence was deeply felt by both clergy and laity; for he succeeded in breaking down walls of partition surrounding the intercourse of cathedral dignitaries, and brought together persons who had before stood aloof from each other.

In 1862 he accompanied the Prince of Wales during his tour in the East, and, after his return to England, published a volume of sermons preached to the royal party, from time to time, as they travelled over never-to-be-forgotten Bible lands. The death of Stanley's mother, to whom he was tenderly attached, occurred while he was absent from England. In 1863, soon after his return, he was appointed Dean of Westminster. That appointment was speedily followed by his marriage with Lady Augusta Bruce, who was "the light of his dwelling" to the day of her death. The fascination of her society, and the perfect sympathy she manifested in all his literary, religious, and social enterprises, contributed to the gatherings in the deanery which will ever live in the recollection of those who were privileged to enjoy them; and she also strengthened her husband to perform those illustrious labors which rendered him most distinguished among all the Westminster deans of ancient or modern times. This brings us to the third and last stage of Stanley's public life.

His residence in Westminster, which opened up to him a new and wide sphere of exertion, he employed for the purpose of improving and popularizing the abbey, of promoting objects connected with the welfare of the neighbourhood, and of advancing the interests of literature, charity, and religion in general. He really loved that ancient edifice, so grand and picturesque in itself, and so rich in its historical associations; and, when he had familiarized himself with its details, it was no common treat to wander through its aisles and chapels in the company of the first dispenser of munificence. The charity which he bequeathed to fill for the gratification of the poor as well as the rich. The hospital at Westminster and other local institutions found in him.
A warm supporter; whilst his garden-parties, in connection with the encouragement of floral cultivation amongst the humbler classes, were attractive, not only to the gentry and nobility around, but to many living at a distance. As a lecturer, an advocate at public meetings, and especially as an abbey-preacher, he commanded large audiences, and delighted those who listened to his original remarks. A Broad-Churchman, and too often throwing into the background truths which evangelical Christians love to hear, he interested all classes by his earnest devoutness, his catholic spirit, and his abstinence from all factious combinations. He was a zealous son of the Church of England; and, making no secret of his strong attachment to the principle of an Establishment, he nevertheless conciliated Nonconformists, and delighted to cultivate among them some intimate friendships. He was busy with his pen throughout the whole period of his residence in the deanery. His Lectures on the Jewish Church appeared in three successive volumes under the dates of 1863, 1865, and 1870. Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey was published in 1868; Essays on Church and State followed in 1870. The History of the Church of Scotland, delivered as lectures in Edinburgh, issued from the press in 1872. A number of minor works, including controversial letters, sermons, and lectures, were the product of his pen in this last and most important period of his life; and the publication of his final volume, a rather large one, on Christian Institutes, occurred in 1881. The death of his beloved wife in 1875 was a bereavement from the effect of which he never fully recovered. For a short time he could accomplish but little; but, gradually recovering his energy, he devoted himself anew to works of charity, and occupied a conspicuous position in religious circles in France. His salon was the meeting-place of great men, as Guizot, Cousin, and others. He also endeavored to introduce Kant to the knowledge of the French. He was president of a number of religious societies. Among his works, most of which were written in French, are De vita immortalis sap., etc., Bern, 1857; La mission divine et la nature sublime de Jesus Christ, dediee de son caractere, Lausanne, 1790. A volume containing some of his writings, and introduced by a biography from the pen of Vinet, appeared in 1841 under the title Mélanges philosophiques, litteraires, historiques et religieux.

STAPHYLUS, a well-known Crypto-Catholic; b. at Osnabruck, Aug. 17, 1512; d. at Ingolstadt, March 5, 1564. He studied theology at Wittenberg; became an intimate friend of Melanchthon, and was, on his recommendation, appointed professor at Konigsberg, in 1546. As he felt unable to carry through the controversy which he had begun with Osiander, he resigned his position, went to Breslau, embraced Romanism, and entered the service of the Duke of Bavaria. The duke gave him a fief; the emperor, the title of nobility; the pope, a purse with one hundred gold crowns; and he was very active for the restoration of Romanism in Bavaria and Austria. Among his more political writings, the most noticeable are Epitome Martini Lutheri theologiae trimembria; Defensio pro trimembri M. L. theologiae, etc. He also wrote a life of Charles V., and published a Latin translation of Diodorus Siculus.

STARK, Johann August, a well-known Crypto-Catholic; was b. at Schwerin in 1741; studied at Göttingen; became an enthusiastic Freemason; was made professor of Oriental languages (1769) and theology (1770) at Königsberg; and died as court-preacher and councillor, in Darmstadt, in 1791. Johann Friedrich was b. at Brugg in 1708; d. in 1775 at Diesbach, near Thun, where he settled in 1750. He studied at Bern and Marburg, and became a devoted Wollian. He was a zealous and successful pastor. He wrote, amongst other works, Institutiones theologicae, polemicae, universae, Zürich, 1743, 5 vols. (4th ed. of vol. 1., 1757); Grundlegung zur wahren Reformation, 1746, 12 vols.; Sittenlehre, 1756-66, 6 vols. The first-named work is widely known as a most reliable compend. It is characterized by learning, insight, and a kindly spirit. Stasper is careful always to state the opponent's views correctly.—I. Johannes, brother of the preceding, was b. 1719; d. 1801; is more especially remembered by his version of the Psalms. Of the seventy-one psalms introduced into the Bern Hymn-Book of 1853, forty-one are his. He published Theolog. Analytica (Bern, 1763), seven volumes of sermons, etc.—Phipp Albert, one of the most distinguished ornaments of French Protestantism, was b. at Brest, Sept. 29, 1760; d. in Paris, March 27, 1840. In 1792 he was appointed professor of the fine arts, and subsequently professor of philosophy and theology. In 1788 he was appointed minister of education of Switzerland. His generosity enabled Pestalozzi to give his method a fair trial in the castle at Burgdorf. After conspicuous services for his country, he retired to private life in 1804, and soon after went to Paris to reside. In a time of religious indifference he retained his evangelical fervor, and occupied a conspicuous position in religious circles in France. His salon was the meeting-place of great men, as Guizot, Cousin, and others. He also endeavored to introduce Kant to the knowledge of the French. He was president of a number of religious societies. Among his works, most of which were written in French, are De vita immortalis sap., etc., Bern, 1857; La mission divine et la nature sublime de Jesus Christ, dediee de son caractere, Lausanne, 1790. A volume containing some of his writings, and introduced by a biography from the pen of Vinet, appeared in 1841 under the title Mélanges philosophiques, litteraires, historiques et religieux.
1816. Among his works are _Heilpforten_ (1775) and _Gesch. d. Arianius_ (1783—84). Accused of being a Crypto-Catholic, he defended himself in a work, _Über Kryptokatholicismus_, etc. (Frankfort and Leipzig, 1757), and was protected and honored by the court. His anonymous book, _Theologie_ (2d ed., 1759), was the occasion for renewed attacks, which the discovery, after his death, of a room in his house arranged for the celebration of the mass, and his order to be buried in cowl and in the Catholic churchyard, proved to be justified.

H. MALLIT.

STEDINGERS, The, a heroic German family living on the banks of the Weser, near its mouth, which offered a strong opposition to the Reformation, and was the beginning of the thirteenth century. The conflict originated with the indignity of a priest to the wife of a nobleman, who, at the communion, instead of the host, put into her mouth a frog which she had given him at the confectional. Her husband, taking up the case, and only receiving denunciation from the priest, murdered him. The deed stirred up the priesthood; and Hartwig II., archbishop of Bremen, demanded not only the delivery of the murderer, but a large indemnity. Being refused both, he put the district under the ban, and in 1207 led an army against the refractory Stedingers, who were supported by the powerful Duke Otto of Lüneburg, the bitter enemy of Bremen. The war lasted for a number of years, until, the Stedingers being victorious, the case was brought before Pope Gregory IX. The Stedingers were accused of being not only heretics, but in league with Satan, whom they worshipped under the image of an idol of Ammon, to whom they offered their children. When a candidate for admission to their mysteries appeared before them, a large frog entered the room, which the members kissed, a shudder passing through their system with the kiss; and with the shudder the memory of the Christian faith completely disappeared. These and other calumnies were taken up by the Papal inquisitor-general, Konrad of Marburg, who persuaded the Pope in 1233 to issue the ban against the Stedingers as cursed heretics. A crusade was preached against them. They raised an army of eleven thousand, and successfully resisted the Archbishop of Bremen and his allies till May 27, 1234, when the battle of Altenesch completely broke their resistance. Half the army was destroyed, and many of the survivors fled to Friesland. The defeat was celebrated in the archiepiscopal church of Bremen by a yearly festival on the fifth Sunday after Easter. All the writers of the middle ages speak disparagingly of the Stedingers as heretics. It remained for the impartial historian since the Reformation to honor their resistance as a just opposition to the oppression of a presumptuous priesthood. See SCHMIDT: De expeditione cruciata in Stedingos, Marburg, 1723; RITTER: De pago Steding et Stedingia sac. XIII. heretici, Viteb, 1751; HELLER, R.: vom Kreuzzuge gegen die Stedinger, Stadt, 1755, etc.

G. H. KLIPPEL.

STEIELE, Anne, author of many popular and useful hymns; was the daughter of a Baptist minister at Broughton in Hampshire, where she was b. 1716, and d. November, 1785. She was always an invalid; her family appealed on her condition before the wedding-day. Her Poems on Subjects chiefly Devotional, by Theodosia, appeared in two volumes in 1760, and were reprinted, 1780, with a third volume of Miscellaneous Pieces in Verse and Prose: the profits in each case being devoted to benevolent uses. The whole were re-issued at Boston in two volumes, 1848, and most of them in one volume by D. Sedgwick, 1888. Her hymns, to the number of sixty-five, were included in Ash and Evans's Collection, 1769, and were found to be accordant with the best taste of that period, and remarkably adapted to public worship. Dr. Rippon (1757) used fifty-six of them, and Dobell (1806), forty-five. To probably a majority of the hymn-books published in England and America she is the largest contributor after Watts, Doddridge, and C. Wesley, often preceding the latter, and sometimes standing next to Watts, though occasionally outnumbered by Newton. This implies an amount of influence in leading devotion, in moulding thought and character, and in assuaging sorrow, which any one might be proud to gain, and which can be attained by very few. On the other hand, James Montgomery, a discerning critic, cataloguing her to the tenth rank in his Christian Psalmist (1825), and said nothing about her in the Introductory Essay. She certainly had more elegance than force, and was less adapted to stand the test of time than her masculine rivals. Her hymns are a transcript of a deeply sensitive, humane, and pious mind, with little intellectual variety or strength; but they have a free and graceful lyrical flow, and no positive faults beyond a tendency to repetition and too many endearing epithets. A fragment of one of them, "Father, what'er of earthly bliss," may last as long as any thing of Watts or Doddridge.

STIEHOFER, Maximilian Friedrich Christoph, b. at Owen in Württemberg, Jan. 16, 1706; d. at Weinsberg, Feb. 11, 1761. He studied theology at Tubingen; entered into connection with the congregation of Herrnhut; became court preacher at Ebersdorf early in 1734; joined the Moravian Brethren in 1748, but returned in 1749 to Württemberg, and held various minor pastoral charges, finally that of Weinsberg. He wrote a number of sermons and devotional books,—Tägliche Nahrung des Glaubens, 1743 (last edition, Ludwigsburg, 1858, with his autobiography); a commentary on Psalms; a collection of sermons on the life of Jesus, Francfort, 1764.

STEITZ, Georg Eduard, D.D., b. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, July 26, 1810; was pastor and d. there Jan. 19, 1879. He wrote Die Privatbeichte u. Privatabsolution d. luther. Kirche aus den Quellen des 16ten Jahrhunderts, Frankfort, 1854; Das römische Buss sacrament, 1854; and forty-one articles for the first edition of Herzog, most of which have been re-issued in the second edition, besides numerous contributions to the Studien u. Kritiken and elsewhere. He was a man of rare and accurate learning, and sound judgment. His articles on Herzog are among the most valuable. See JUNG U. DECHERT: Zur Erinnerung an Herrn Senior Dr. theol. G. E. Steit, Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1879.

STENNETT, Joseph, an English hymn-writer; was b. at Abingdon, Berks, 1806; d. at Knaphill, Bucks, July 11, 1755. He was pastor of a Baptist congregation in Devonshire Square, London, which he served till his death. He was the author of a reply to Russen's Fundamentals without a Foundation, or a True Picture of STENNETT, Samuel, an English hymnist, and grandson of the preceding; was b. 1727, in Exeter, where his father was pastor of the Baptist Church; d. in London, Aug. 24, 1795. He assisted his father as pastor of the Baptist Church in Little Wild Street, London, and in 1758 became his successor, remaining with the church till his death. He was a fine scholar, and was made D.D. by Aberdeen University, 1763. He was a man of influence among the dissenters, enjoyed the confidence of George III., and had John Howard for a frequent hearer. Writing from Smyrna under date of Aug. 11, 1768, the great prison-reformer speaks of the pleasure he experienced in reviewing his notes of Stennett's sermons. Stennett's works (On Personal Religion, 1769, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1801, being the most extensive) were published with a memoir in 1824, 3 vols. Thirty-four of his hymns are given at the end. Five others have been found in Rippon's Selection. His best hymns are "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand," "Majestic sweetness sits enthroned," "Tis finished! so the Saviour cried."

STEPHAN, Martin, and the Stephanists. Martin Stephan (b. at Strasbourg, Moravia, Aug. 13, 1777; d. in Randolph County in the State of Illinois, Feb. 21, 1840) was of humble parentage, and early apprenticed to a weaver. In 1798 he went to Breslau, where he soon became intimate with the pietist circles, and finally contrived to enter the gymnasium. From 1804 to 1809 he studied theology at Halle and Leipzig in a peculiarly narrow way, but not without energy; and in 1810 he was appointed pastor of the congregation of Moravians in Amsterdam, which was the most strict type of orthodoxy. His success as a preacher and an organizer was very extraordinary. Though he severed his connection with the Moravian Brethren, and though the revival movement he started bore a decidedly separatistic character, his congregation grew rapidly, and gifted and serious men became exceedingly devoted to him. He maintained stations all through the valley of the Mulde; he sent out young missionaries whom he had educated; and he found followers, even in Wurtemberg and Baden. The separatistic tendency, however, of his work, and perhaps, also, the very success of his labor, brought him in manifold conflicts with the regular clergy of Dresden; and certain peculiarities in his personal habits and in his arrangements finally brought him into collision with the police. In the spring of 1838 the congregation for which he originally had been appointed pastor formally accused him of unchastity and fraud, and the mayor and city council ordered him to leave the city for Bremen. In Bremen he was joined by no less than seven hundred followers; and at the head of this congregation, "the Stephanists," he sailed for America on Nov. 18. But, if there previously had been something wrong in his conduct, it now became apparent that the root of the evil lay deep in his character. Before the vessel arrived at New Orleans, he had himself elected bishop, and made master of the emigration-fund; and at St. Louis, where the colony stopped for two months, he gave himself up entirely to a life of pleasure. A tract of land was finally bought at Wittenberg, Perry County, Mo.; and in April, 1839, the larger portion of the congregation, and the bishop, removed thither. Hardly one month elapsed, however, before the accusations from Dresden were renewed, but by other members of his congregation, and referring to later times; and, as the statements made were found to be correct, he was deprived of his dignity, and excommunicated. But the congregation, after passing through various vicissitudes and troubles, prospered, and became the nucleus of the "Missouri" type of High-Church Lutheranism, which adheres most closely to the symbolical books, and has its headquarters in the Concordia College at St. Louis. Among the writings of Martin Stephan the most important are Der christliche Glaube (a collection of sermons, Dresden, 1827) and Gaben für unsere Zeit (Nuremberg, 1834). See Von Polenz: Die öffentliche Meinung und der Pastor Stephan, Dresden, 1840; Veitse: Die Stephan'sche Auswanderung nach America, Dresden, 1840; and the elaborate art. by Kummer, in Herzog: Real-Encyclopädie, 1st ed. vol. xv. pp. 41-61.

STEPHEN, deacon of the congregation at Jerusalem, and first martyr of the Christian Church. It is only in our day that his influence upon the development of Christianity has been adequately brought out. All that we know of him is found in Acts vi., vii. He was chosen in an emergency deacon of the church; and no one doubts any more that he was a Hebrew, although this is not definitely stated. He did not confine himself to the duties of the diaconate, but devoted himself to preaching, and was especially successful in those synagogues of Jerusalem where the Greek language was used. In connection with him, we for the first time hear of discussions in the synagogues (Acts vi. 10). He was a Lutherman of the strictest type of orthodoxy. His success as a preacher and an organizer was extraordinary. Though he severed his connection with the Moravian Brethren, and though the revival movement he started bore a decidedly separatistic character, his congregation grew rapidly, and gifted and serious men became exceedingly devoted to him. He maintained stations all through the valley of the Mulde; he sent out young missionaries whom he had educated; and he found followers, even in Wurtemberg and Baden. ing of the kind had ever been brought out by the apostles before. Stephen was not merely the protomartyr of the church. He was the first Christian preacher who fully understood the distinction which Christ taught between Judaism and Christianity, a forerunner of Paul; yes, perhaps, even more. Stephen was anointed to resistance. The Eastern Church, and not the planned work of the elder apostles. Stephen suffered a martyr's death for refusing to sacrifice to the heathen gods. His feast is August 2.

Tradition did not forget Stephen. The Fathers put him among the seventy disciples. The Apocalypse of Stephen will be found in Fabricius: Cod. Apocr.

STEPHEN, the name of ten popes.—Stephen I. (253–257), a Roman by birth, is of importance on account of his relation to the controversy concerning heretical baptism. The majority of the churches in Asia Minor and Africa had declared in favor of the view that heretics baptized by heretics should be rebaptized on their entrance into the orthodox church. The Roman practice, however, had been to admit them without the repetition of the rite, and with a simple exhortation to repentance. The Eastern Church, and especially Cyprian, strongly opposed this practice; and the councils of Carthage (255, 267) again sanctioned the opposite view. A synodal letter informed Stephen of this action, and a heated controversy was opened between him and Cyprian. He finally broke off communion with the African Church. Tradition relates that Stephen suffered a martyr's death for refusing to sacrifice to the heathen gods. His feast is August 2.

Stephen II. (II.), Pope from 752 to 757. Pushed by Athalaric, king of the Longobards, he called in the aid of Pepin the Little, who defeated the enemy in two campaigns (754, 755), and raised the Pope to the dignity of patricius, and possessor of the aequum and donis Spiritus Sancti, of which manuscripts are found in France, England, and Spain, has been printed only so far as it relates to the Cathari and Waldenses. (See Quenouille and Chajard: Scriptores ordinis predicatorum, i. pp. 190 sq.) In his youth he preached against the Cathari at Valence, and later became inquisitor. His account is one of the most reliable authorities on the heretics mentioned.

STEPHEN DE VELLAVILLA, Dominican at Lyons; d. 1261. His greatest work, De septem donis Spiritus Sancti, of which manuscripts are found in France, England, and Spain, has been printed only so far as it relates to the Cathari and Waldenses. (See Quenouille and Chajard: Scriptores ordinis predicatorum, i. pp. 190 sq.) In his youth he preached against the Cathari at Valence, and later became inquisitor. His account is one of the most reliable authorities on the heretics mentioned.

STEPHEN OF TOURNAY, b. 1135, at Orleans; d. as Bishop of Tournay, in 1203; sought to secure a decree from Rome requiring greater uniformity of doctrinal teaching. His principal work is said to have been the Summa de decreta, of which only the preface remains. Two addresses and a number of letters are preserved. Best edition by Molinet, Paris, 1874.

STEPHENS (French, Estienne; Lat., Stephanus) is the name of a distinguished Parisian family of printers, which had a profound interest in the establishment of his own in Paris from 1268 to 1520. He was on friendly terms with some of the most learned men of the day, — Budé, Briconnet, Le Fève d'Epates, etc., — and had among his proofreaders Beatus Rhenanus. Among his publications were Le Fève's editions of Aristotle, the Psalterium quinquevocum, and his Commentary on the Pauline Epistles. A. Henry left behind him three sons, — Francois, Robert, and Charles. François published a number of works between 1537 and 1648, which had no bearing upon theology. Charles studied medicine; wrote some works on natural history; in 1561 assumed control of the Paris printing-establishment, on Robert's departure to Geneva, and published a number of works till 1581, using the title "royal typographer" (typographus regius). He published a number of smaller editions of Hebrew texts and targums, which were edited by J. Mercier.

STERCORANISTS. (from the Latin stercora, "excrementa"), a term first used in 1654, by Cardinal Humbert against Nicetas Petoratus, and referring to a grossly sensualistic conception of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to which the body of our Lord is eaten, digested, and evacuated, like any other food. The conception has been falsely ascribed to Origen, and also to Rhabanus Maurus; but it no doubt existed in the time of the latter. ZSCRÖLLER.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, b. probably at Hayfield, near Blakeney, Gloucestershire (or, according to another account, in Hampshire), about 1560; d. August, 1599; was groom of the chambers to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He is said to have translated fifty-one psalms, of which nineteen appeared 1548, and thirty-seven the next year, immediately after his death. The work was continued by John Hopkins of the Woodend, Aure, Gloucestershire (B.A., Oxford, 1544; said to have held a living in Suffolk). The Whole Books of Psalms Collected into English Metre appeared 1582, and was bound up with innumerable editions of the Prayer-Book; making for two centuries or more the only or chief metrical provision of the Church of England. Since 1700 or so, it has been called the "Old Version," in distinction from its rival, Tate and Brady. Of its contents about forty-one psalms bear the initials of Sternhold (the only notable sample of his skill being a few stanzas of Psalm cxxxvi.), and sixty-four, those of Hopkins. The rest are by Thomas Norton, a lawyer who translated Calvin's Institutes, etc., and about 1600; William Whittingham, b. at Chester, 1524; d. at Oxford, 1565; and Robert Estlin, archdeacon of Ely. Kethe is memorable as the sister, and was from 1563 dean of Durham; and William Kethe, who was an exile with Knox at Geneva 1555, chaplain to the English forces at Brest and Paris, where he began to lecture upon systematic theology and the study of Persia; returning to Germany, was pastor in Canstatt and Tubingen, and became professor of theology at Tubingen in 1815. His department was the Old Testament till 1826, when he began to lecture upon systematic theology and apologetics. His Lectures on the Theology of the Old Testament were edited by Oehler after his death (Berlin, 1840). He wrote a number of articles for periodicals. He was an independent man, and thoroughly evangelical. "I will serve no other master than Christ," he said, "and I wish to belong to him more and more exclusively and fully." His style was involved and heavy, and obscured the matter. He attacked Strauss's Life of Christ, a few weeks after the appearance of vol. i., in a little tract (1835), which stirred up the wrath of Strauss to appear in the polemic, Herr Dr. Steudel oder d. Selbstäusserungen des verstandigen Superstitions. The whole argument is set forth in the full article on Steudel by Oehler (his son-in-law), in Herzog's Encyclopedia, first edition, vol. xv. pp. 75-81. 1

He studied at the Tübingen seminary; became vicar at Obereslingen; in 1806 rector at Tübingen; in 1808 went to Paris, where he continued his studies in the study of Persian; returning to Germany, was pastor in Canstatt and Tübingen, and became professor of theology at Tübingen in 1815. His department was the Old Testament till 1826, when he began to lecture upon systematic theology and apologetics. STEWART, Dugald, Professor of moral philosophy, University of Edinburgh; was b. in Edinburgh, Nov. 22, 1733. He was the son of the professor of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh. The boy spent his winters in Edinburgh, his summers in Catrine, Ayrshire, where his father had a house. Dugald Stewart was educated at the high school of Edinburgh and at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow. From 1765 to 1789 he was a student in Edinburgh University, and was greatly influenced by Adam Ferguson, professor of moral philosophy, whose teaching completely swayed his philosophic thought throughout his after-career. When Dugald Stewart returned to Edinburgh, he began immediately his course as a public teacher in the university, on account of his father requiring his assistance with the duties of the chair of mathematics. He continued assistant from 1772, and was elected professor, in succession to his father, in 1775. In 1778 he lectured for Adam Ferguson while the latter was acting as secretary to the commission sent to America to negotiate as to pending disputes. The chair of moral philosophy was the one for which Dugald Stewart was eminently qualified; and to that chair he was elected on the resignation of Ferguson, in 1785, holding it till 1820, though during the last ten years of this period the duties of the chair were performed by Thomas Brown, who had been appointed his colleague in 1810, and who died before Stewart's. After Brown's death, Stewart resigned the chair, and John Wilson ("Christopher North") was elected. Dugald Stewart was the strenuous supporter, and elegant expounder, of Reid's philosophy, known as the "Scotch philosophy" and "the philosophy of common sense," being a defence of the certainty of human knowledge and belief against the scepticism of Hume. For an exposition of the philosophy of common sense, see article on Thomas Reid. Stewart's contributions to philosophic literature are numerous. His collected works, edited by Hamilton, were published in Edinburgh and Boston, in eleven octavo volumes. His Outline of Moral Philosophy, first published in 1793, containing a sketch of psychology and ethics, was long in circulation as a handbook for beginners in ethical science. An edition of it was prepared by Dr. McCosh of Princeton. Besides this, his works are the following: Dissertation on the Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Philosophy (first published in Encyclopaedia Britannica); Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind, of which an edition was published in Boston; Philosophical Essays; Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers; and Lectures on Political Economy. As a professor he was very highly esteemed by his students. Lord Cockburn, who writes enthusiastically of him as a teacher, describes his lecturing as "gentlemanlike, calm, and expository." On account of his careful treatment of political economy, as a theory and science, he attracted from England many who were destined for political life, including Lord Brougham, Lord Palmerston, and Earl Russell. Many who afterwards rose to eminence in public life acknowledged special indebtedness to him. The shrewd, sagacious, but somewhat cumbrous argumentation of Reid was thrown into a pleasing and attractive form by Stewart, through whose clearness of logic, literary taste, and power of eloquence, it secured a greatly extended influence. These two were the representatives of a philosophy which has largely governed the philosophic thought of Scotland since, and for a time exercised considerable influence in France through the teaching of Cousin and Jouffroy. Stewart, like Reid, was hesitating and unsatisfactory in his mode of stating the evidence for personal existence, making it matter of belief, rather than of direct knowledge. Thus he says, "We cannot properly be said to be conscious of our own existence; our knowledge of this fact being necessarily posterior, in the order of time, to the consciousness of those sensations by which it is suggested." In this way, he spoke of the knowledge of self rather as an acquired notion than as a fact of present consciousness. Stewart treated, with special fulness, of "conception" as a power of mind by which we are able to represent past sensations and perceptions. In his treatment of this subject his analysis was so careful as to recognize dependence on physical organism for this mental representation, in strict harmony with more recent physiological teaching. As the follower and expounder of Reid, Stewart was the resolute opponent of the theory that all knowledge comes from experience; maintaining, on the contrary, that intelligence itself is the source of all that is fundamental to intelligent procedure in dealing with the confused mass of our sensations and perceptions. Like Reid, he devoted special attention to the doctrine of external perception; making it his special aim to ascertain the amount of direct and certain knowledge we have of existence external to self. On account of growing infirmity, and in the midst of general regret, Dugald Stewart withdrew from active professional duty in 1810, and thereafter lived in comparative retirement at Kinneil House, Linlithgowshire, a residence placed at his command by the Duke of Hamilton. He died in Edinburgh, when visiting a friend, on the 11th of June, 1829. His body lies in a covered and completely enclosed massive tomb in the lower portion of the Canongate Burying-ground, Edinburgh, the same cemetery in which is the grave of Adam Smith, professor of moral philosophy in Glasgow, and author of the Wealth of Nations. So profound and widespread was the admiration of Dugald Stewart that, shortly after his death, a meeting was held in Edinburgh at which it was resolved to erect a monument to his memory. The result was the classic monument now standing on the Calton hill in the Scotch metropolis. H. CALDERWOOD.

STICHOMETRY. The data of stichometry consist chiefly of subscriptions at the close of manuscripts, expressing the number of lines which are contained in the book that has been copied; of marginal annotations from point to point, expressing the extent of the previous text; or of quotations and allusions which abound in various writers, which indicate either the locality of some passage in a quoted work, or the compass of the whole or part of the works of a given author.
For example, at the close of Isocrates, Busiris, in Codex Urbina, we have in the Archaic character the number 2; while on the margin of the same work, in the more recent character, we have on fol.
22, 10 (§ 25), before τοις ἀποδοσις, the number 2 (β); and on 25, 12 (§ 38), before γεγονος δ' των, the number 3 (Γ); and these numbers represent the second and third hundreds of lines measured on some exemplar, either actual or ideal; Diogenes Laëritius quotes a passage from Chrysippus, cατα των χάλιων στίχοις; and Galen estimates the extent of a certain portion of the works of Hippocrates at two hundred and forty verses; τοῦτο τοῦ μεθαλώτου τὸ μέγα τὸ εἰς τὸ γράμμα μέρος τὸ πρῶτο αυτ' ἐν σ' στιχών ἔτιδε (Galen, in Hippocratem de nat.
com., xvi. p. 9).

Full collections of such data may be found in Ritschl: Opusc. Philol., vol. i. pp. 74 sqq.; and Birt: Das Antike Buchweesen, c. 4.

Every thing in these data suggests that the numeration has reference to standard lines or copies; and since the actual number of lines in the manuscripts never tallies with the stichometric record, and we are unable to point to any copies which do furnish an agreement, it is evident that there is somewhere a common unit of measurement upon which these subscriptions and quotations are based: in other words, the στίχος must have an element of fixity in it, even if it be not absolutely fixed.

It is important, therefore, to determine in what direction the meaning of the στίχος departs from its normal indefinite sense of line, row, and verse.

The term στίχος is of itself extremely vague.
It may be nothing more than row or line; as, e.g., the LXX. use it for the rows of stones in the high priest's breastplate; or, in a military sense, it may represent the number of men in a rank or file of soldiers, especially the latter; and so in other cases.
But in literature it is easy to demonstrate that the στίχος is deflected in meaning in the direction of a hexameter line. In the first place, such a unit is convenient for the comparison of prose-works with poetry; in the next place, we have actual instances of prose-passages reduced to their equiva-tent verse-lengths; in the third place, we may actually find the term στίχος used of hexameter poetry, in distinction from any other; and, finally, we may actually divide any given work into hex-ameter rhythms, and compare our results with the transmitted numerical data. If we take these points in order, we may say that the prose-unit is more likely to be taken from poetry than the unit of measurement for poetry is likely to be adopted from prose; for this unit of poetry is usually measured in a strictly constant, and no such constant exists for a change of that unit. The only question that would arise here is whether we ought not to expect a variety of units of measurement; as, for instance, an iambic unit in distinction from a hexameter unit. It is sufficient to observe that points; that such vagaries of measurement, if they exist, are extremely rare.

In regard to the actual reduction of a prose-passage to its equivalent verse-length, we have an important case in Galen (v. 688. ed. Kuhn), where, having quoted a sentence from Hippocrates, he continues: —

εἰ μὲν οὖσα ὁ λόγος ἐνεάνων τῷ μὲν λόγῳ δεκαέων ἦσαν ἐν οἷς δὲ ἑξάβολων κτλ.

If Galen then reckon thirty-nine syllables as being equivalent to two hexameters and a half, or, as he continues, eighty-two syllables to five hexameters, the hexameter can hardly be different from a sixteen-syllabled rhythm. We are invited, therefore, to the assumption that stichometric measurement is made by preference in syllables of which sixteen go to the hexameter, or unit-verse. The number 16 invites attention as being the number of syllables in the first line of the Iliad, and as being a square number, a peculiarity which always had a certain attractiveness for early calculators.

That the term στίχος deflects in the direction of hexameter verse as against any other line of poetry which might have been chosen for a proper unit of measurement, will appear from Montfaucon (Bibl. Cousin, p. 697), where there is quoted from a tenth-century manuscript the following catalogue of poets:

πέρι ποιητῶν
δοκεῖ δὲ στίχων καὶ λόγων ἑρασαν,
"Ομηρος στίχων, Ἀπολλώνιος στίχων, Θεόκριτος ἡμών,
"Αριστος ἡμών, Νικαιάνδρος ἡμών, Μενάνδρος ἡμών κτλ.

This broad division of poets into writers by στίχος and writers of iambics can only have resulted from a specialization of the meaning of the term στίχος by constant use in a particular sense.

In the demonstration of the same point by actual measurement, the most important researches are those published by the late Ch. Graux, in the Revue de Philologie, April, 1878, in which he demonstrated, by an actual estimation of the number of letters in certain works, that the στίχος represented not a clause, nor a number of words, but a fixed quantity of writing. The average number of letters to the verse he found to vary between narrow limits, generally thirty-four to thirty-eight letters; and an enumeration of the letters in fifty lines of the Iliad opened at random supplied him with an average of 37.7 letters to the verse. This very important identification of the στίχος with the hexameter is the starting-point for a great many new critical investigations as to the integrity of transmitted texts, their early form, etc. Whether the unit of measurement is a certain number of syllables, or a certain number of letters, is not easy to decide. We may be tolerably certain that the measured line is, as above stated, a space-line, and not a sense-line; but to discriminate between a letter-line and a syllable-line is a more delicate matter. If we adopt the former, we must probably fix the unit at thirty-six letters, because this is the nearest symmetrical number to the average hex-ameter. We have very few instances, however, in which the actual letters of a line are found to be numbered; while we can readily trace the custom of limiting a line by the division of the syllables, in the earliest manuscripts. Moreover, we have the actual measurement in the passage quoted from Galen; and Pliny seems to allude to the custom of syllable-counting, when, in one of his epis-articles, he demands an equally long reply from his correspondent, and threatens to count, not only the pages, but the syllables of each verse ("Ego non paginas tantum, sed versus etiam syllabasque numerabo."— Pliny, iv. 11). The preference must, therefore, be given to the syllable-line, though, perhaps, not entirely to the exclusion of the other. It is comparatively easy to reduce the average number of syllables per verse to thirty-six, but a toilsome enough process to estimate with equal accuracy the number of thirty-six-letter lines.

It is interesting to compare the relative sizes of the two line-units. M. Graux deduces 57.7 as the average hexameter in letters, and Diels (Hermes, xvii. Bd.) makes the average of the first fifty lines in Homer to be 15.6 syllables. A verse of sixteen syllables is then equivalent to about 1.074 verses of thirty-six letter each. In precisely the same way as M. Graux determined the average number of letters to the verse from the total stichometry in the manuscripts of Herodotus, Demosthenes, Eusebius, Gregory of Nazianzus, etc., we may proceed to examine the partial stichometry. This has been done for Isocrates by Fuhr (Rhein. Mus., Bd. 37, p. 468); for the Plato manuscripts, by Schanz (Hermes, xvi. p. 308); and for the Demosthenes manuscripts, by W. v. Christ, in a very able discussion entitled Die Atticusausgabe des Demosthenes, München, 1882.

The partial stichometry is of the highest value for the study of texts; and in every case the data which it supplies are found to accord very closely with our fundamental statements as to the palaeographical meaning of the word στίχος.

Some degree of confusion is introduced by the existence, apparently, in early times, of an alternative iambic verse of twelve syllables, as well as by the introduction of writing by Cola and Commata. The latter of these points has been an especial ground of combat, in consequence of the countenance which the custom seemed to lend to the theory of sense-lines in opposition to space-lines. The explanation of the matter seems to be as follows: when the earlier uncial form of writing was deserted for one more convenient for purposes of reading and recitation, the text was broken up into short sentences, named, according to their lengths, Cola and Commata; and in some instances an attempt was made, not only to number these Cola, so as to form a colometry similar to stichometry, and sharing the advantages which it offered for reference and book-measuring, but even to accommodate the arrangement of these Cola so as to reproduce the original number of verses. Thus we find the rhetorician Castor (Walz. Rhet. Gr., iii. 721) discussing the papyrology of Demosthenes against Philip as follows: τοῦτον τόν λόγον στίχον κατὰ κόλα καταστράτευσεν των πασιν τῶν κόλῶν χρόνου οὐκ ὑπάρχων τῶν ἐγχειρίων τῶν ἄρχων βέβαιος, ὡς ἠμέτρητος αὐτός ἡ δημιουργής τῶν λόγων. It seems also that this change of form took place first for those books which were publicly recited, or which had a semi-poetical structure; so that the oldest Bible manuscripts desert the continuous uncial writing in the Psalms, in the Prophets, in the Catholic Epistles, etc.; and St. Jerome proposed to imitate this peculiarly divided text in the prophets:

"Sei quod in Demosthene et Tullio solo fieri, ut per cola scribatur et commata, qui utique prosa et non versibus conscripserunt... non quoque utilissimum legentium providentia, inter alia etiam scribendi generis distinctum" (preface to Isaiah).

We shall now turn to the stichometry of the New Testament, and in particular to the Epistles: here we shall show that the theory already advanced is completely confirmed, and that we have here a very powerful critical implement for the restoration of early New-Testament texts in the traditional data. As before, we have both total and partial stichometry. There is, however, a good deal of variation between the transmitted data, arising from various causes, such as variation in the text, variation in the unit employed in the measurement, difference in versions measured, and difference in the abbreviations employed. The greatest authority, however, for New-Testament stichometry, is found in the work of Euthalius, edited by Zacagni, Collect. Mon. Antiq. Eccles. Graec., Rome, 1899; Migne, Patr., Græc., tom. 55. Euthalius was a deacon of the Church of Alexandria, and afterwards bishop of Sulca, supposed to be a small city in Upper Egypt. He has frequently but erroneously been credited with the introduction of stichometry to the New Testament, and these verses which he measured have been by many persons identified with the colon-writing previously described. There is very little ground for any such ideas; and we shall find that the στίχοι mentioned by Euthalius are hexameters of sixteen syllables, a very slight allowance being made for certain common abbreviations. The work of Euthalius consisted in editing the Acts and Catholic Epistles, with a complete system of prologues, prefaces, and quotations: every book was divided into lections, and to every lection, as well as to the greater part of the prefaces, was appended its numerical extent. The verses were also marked on the margin from fifty to fifty.

We have thus a mine of stichometric information sufficient to test any theory in the closest manner. Moreover, the work has this importance, that Euthalius professes to have measured his verses accurately, and to have employed the best manuscripts; viz., those preserved in the Pamphilian Library at Cassarea. It thus appears that we have the right to set a high value on the measurements made, on the ground of antiquity as well as of accuracy.

We shall now test these results given by Euthalius for the lections of the Acts of the Apostles; and, taking no account of the abbreviations which might have been found in the text, we shall divide the text of the Acts in Westcott and Hort's New Testament into sixteen-syllabled rhythms. If we had allowed for abbreviation, the results would have been somewhat less, as we might subtract a syllable at every occurrence of the words έδωκα and έχρισα, and two syllables for each occurrence of εἰσῆλθε and έκβαινει, with perhaps a few other rarely recurring words, as various. Our data for Euthalius are taken from Cod. Escorial, ψ. iii. 6, as there are some errors in Zacagni's figures.

Allowing for one or two obvious corruptions, such as the dropping of the figure ρ in section 6, the agreement is very complete.

The lines in the table are nearly hexameters, so that the table affords a picture of the arrangement of an early bioluminar Codex:

Still more remarkable is the harmony between the measured text of Westcott and Hort and the Euthalian figures, when we allow for the abbreviations previously mentioned. We give the results for the Epistles in a form suitable for comparison. The first column represents the stichometric number supplied by Euthalius and Hort into sixteen-syllabled verses: and the second gives the result of the actual subdivision of the text of Westcott and Hort into sixteen-syllabled verses: and the third expresses the same result with the proper deduction made for four leading abbreviations.

From this it appears that the number of ꝲ好象 is sometimes in excess, and sometimes in defect, of the number of verses. What these ꝲ好象 are is a hard question. Some persons have identified them with the ꝲสอบ; — a supposition that will scarcely be acceptable. It is doubtful, moreover, whether the verses of the Gospels are measured by the same unit as we found employed in the Acts and Epistles. A fifteen-syllabled hexameter seems to agree best with the traditional figure. The Gospel of John, in the text of Westcott and Hort, is 2,025 abbreviated fifteen-syllabled hexameters, an almost absolute agreement with the result given above (2,024). For the other Gospels the matter must be left for more extended investigation.

STIEFEL (STIFEL), Michael, a distinguished arithmetician of the Reformation; was b. at Eisleben, April 19, 1486; entered the Augustinian convent there, left it for Wittenberg in 1520; stood on friendly terms with Luther; after holding several pastorate, was appointed in 1558 professor of mathematics at Jena, with a salary of forty florins (afterwards increased to sixty florins); d. in Jena, April 19, 1567. In 1506 he published Ein Rechenbiichlein rom End Christi, in which, upon the basis of the figures in Daniel, he set the day of judgment at eight o'clock in the morning of Oct. 19, 1533. His arithmetical studies and works (Rechenbuch von d. welschen and deutschen Fruechtkick, 1546, etc.) did much to promote the study of mathematics in Germany. Luther called Stiefel a "pious, learned, moral, and industrious man." C. Schwarz.

STIEKNA (or DE STEKEN), Conrad, also called Conradus ab Austria, one of the forerunners of John Hus; d. at Prague, 1386. Balbinus speaks of him as preacher in the Tein church, Prague. He zealously condemned the hypocrisy, simony, and licentiousness of the priests, which he described in dark colors. In his larger work, Accusationes Mendicanitum, he attacked with great heat the orders of begging friars, and did not spare the bishops. See Borns Balbinus: Epitome historiae rerum Bohemicae, Prag. 1677; Zütt: Lebensbeschreibungen d. drey ausgezeichneten Vorläufers d. berühmten M. J. Hus, Prag, 1786 (to be used with caution); Jordán: D. Vorläufer d. Hussenthum in Böhmen, Leipzig, 1846. Neudecke.
STIER, Rudolf Ewald, a distinguished German exegete; was b. at Fraustadt, March 17, 1800; d. at Eisleben, Dec. 16, 1882. Set apart for the study of law, he entered the university of Jena in 1816, but the year following enrolled himself among the students of theology. His ideals at this time were Jahn and Jean Paul, with the latter of whom he became close friends. In 1818 he went to Halle, where he was chosen president of the Halle Burschenschaft. It was not till 1819 that he truly gave himself up to Christ, and began the study of theology from the proper motive. The occasion of this change was the death of a young lady whom he loved. He then went to Berlin, and after completing his studies, successively held the position of teacher at Wittenberg, Karalene, and in the missionary institute of Basel. In 1829 he became pastor at Frankleben. The writer of this, at an inn, got the following answer to a question about Stier: "He is a mystic." On asking what that meant, he received the reply, "They are the preachers who live as they preach." In 1838 Stier was called to Wicthinghausen in the Wupperthal, from which he retired in 1846, and passed three years in literary activity at Wittenberg. He was then appointed superintendent at Schkeuditz, and in 1859 at Eisleben. If an Y theologist, from which he retired in 1846, and passed many changes were introduced. His principal work was the Words of the Lord Jesus (Reden d. Herrn, 1st ed., 1843, 3 vols.), [3d ed. 1865—74, 7 vols.; Eng. trans. by Pope, Edinb., 9 vols.; revised by Dr. Strong and H. B. Smith, N.Y., 1869, 3 vols.]. It is a storehouse of information and practical suggestion for ministers, among whom Stier has had a wide circulation. Stier bases his exegesis upon a firm faith in inspiration, and is dogmatic and mystical rather than historic and critical. I wrote to him, "You are a Christian cabalist;" to which he replied, "You are a pietistic rationalist." The Words of the Lord Jesus, like all his works, lacks in conciseness and point. Among his other exegetical writings are: Auslegung von 70 ausgewählten Psalmen, 1834—36; [Jesus nicht Pseudo-Isaias, 1851; D. Reden d. Apostel, trans. by Venables (The Words of the Apostles), Edinb., 1899; D. Reden d. Engel, 1890, English. trans., The Words of Angels, Lond., 1862]; Among Stier's other writings are a treatise on homiletics, Grundriss d. Kerygik, 1830, 2d ed., 1844; Formenlehre d. hebräischen Sprache, 1833, Berlin, 1849; Luther's Katechismus, etc., 6th ed., 1855. [See his Life, by his sons, Wittenberg, 1868, 2d ed., 1871.]

He was graduated at Yale College, 1746; tutor there, 1749 to 1755; studied theology, then called to the bar, 1758, but began preaching in 1755; was pastor in Newport, R.I., from 1755 to May, 1777, when the place was occupied by Indian war and dispersed. STYLES, Ezra, D.D., LL.D., Congregational; b. at North Haven, Conn., Dec. 15, 1727; d. in New Haven, May 12, 1796. He was graduated at Yale College, 1746; tutor there, 1749 to 1755; studied theology, then called to the bar, 1758, but began preaching in 1755; was pastor in Newport, R.I., from 1755 to May, 1777, when the place was occupied by Indian war and dispersed. In September, 1777, he was elected president of Yale College, and shortly after professor of ecclesiastical history, and in 1780 professor of divinity. He published An Account of
Edward, b. at Cranborne in Dorsetshire, April 17, 1635; d. at Westminster, March 27, 1696. He was educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1653. Just after the Restoration, he published his Irenicum, a weapon salve for the Churches wounds (1661), a moderate and healing treatise, very appropriate in that age of fierce ecclesiastical strife, and reflecting honor on the courage and catholicity of the author at that particular crisis. The following year appeared his Origines Sacrae, or Rational Account of the Christian Faith as to the Truth and Divine Authority of the Scriptures. In this work he criticised the history and chronology of heathen writers, undermining their credibility, and contrasting them with the authors of the Bible records. He dwelt upon the knowledge, fidelity, and integrity of Moses, and the inspiration of the prophets, as inferred from the fulfilment of their prophecies. Afterwards he treated of the being of God, the origin of the universe, the nations of mankind, and Pagan mythology; and it is interesting to find that he appears in harmony with modern geologists, by maintaining, not the universal deluge, but the partial extent, of the Deluge. Of course, in many points, the work is superseded by later productions; yet it remains a storehouse of learning, and displays much logical ability and lawyer-like habits of thought. This volume was followed, in 1665, by A Rational account of the grounds of the Protestant Religion, a timely publication, when Popery was favored by the court and by personages in the upper circles. Other attacks upon Romanism, from the same pen, were made in publications we have not room to specify: it is sufficient to say that Stillingfleet was perhaps the most learned and effective champion of Protestantism just before the Revolution. The Mischiefs of Separation, a sermon which he preached in 1680, and which was immediately published, gave unmistakable proof that he had abandoned the moderate opinions, and dropped the conciliatory temper, expressed in his Irenicum. This brought on him answers in the way of defence, written by Owen, Baxter, and other nonconformists. But he candidly acknowledged his mistake, being perfectly subdued by what John Howe wrote on the subject, "more like a gentleman," he said, "than a divine, without any mixture of rancor."

In 1695 a violent dispute went on among certain nonconformists, respecting Antinomianism; and some of the disputants appealed to Stillingfleet as a sort of arbitrator, a circumstance which showed that by this time he had recovered his reputation as a healer of strife. An active mind like his would not much dado with such questions and he could not refrain from taking part in the great doctrinal controversy of the age. A Discourse in Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, by Stillingfleet, was published in 1697. He was a metaphysician, as well as a divine, and criticized Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding the same year, following that up soon afterwards by a rejoinder to Locke's reply. He wrote also on other subjects, and gave "the best account," says Bishop Nicholson, "of the present state of our Bishopric." A collected edition of this author's works, with his life and character, was published after his death in 1869.

As bishop of Worcester, which he became in 1859, he took part in the commission for revising the Prayer-Book; and in his episcopal capacity he procured a stall in Worcester Cathedral for Bentley, the great classical scholar, who was the prelate's chaplain.

STOCKER, John, of Honiton, Devonshire, published in the Gospel Magazine (1776-77) nine hymns, which were reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1861. Two of them, "Gracious Spirit, Dove divine," and "Thy mercy, my God," have been widely used.

STOCKTON, Thomas Hewlings, D.D., Methodist-Protestant; b. at Mount Holly, N.J., June 4, 1808; d. in Philadelphia, Oct. 9, 1868. Converted in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, he joined the Methodist-Protestant Church on its organization, and in 1829 was placed upon a circuit. He was stationed in Baltimore, 1830; chaplain to the House of Representatives, 1833-35, 1859-61, and of the Senate, 1862. He preached in Philadelphia, 1839-47; in Cincinnati until 1850, in Baltimore until 1856, in Philadelphia, over an independent church, until his death. He was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. He compiled a hymn-book for his denomination (1837), and published some original poetry, and several volumes in prose. See his biography by A. Clark, New York, 1869, and by J. G. Wilson, Philadelphia, 1869.

STODDARD, David Tappan, Congregational missionary; b. at Northampton, Mass., Dec. 2, 1818; d. at Tabriz, Persia, Jan. 22, 1857. He was graduated at Yale, 1838, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1841; sailed as missionary to Persia, 1843, and arrived there in 1845. He was a model missionary. His Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language was published in the Journal of the American Oriental Society, New Haven, Conn., 1853. See J. P. Thompson: Memoir of D. T. Stoddard, New York, 1858.

STODDARD, Solomon, Congregationalist; b. in Boston, Mass., 1643; d. at Northampton, Mass., Feb. 11, 1692. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1662; was chaplain in the Barbadoes for two years; preached at Northampton from 1669 until his death, when he was succeeded by his grandson, and colleague from 1727, Jonathan Edwards. From 1667 to 1674 he was first librarian to Cambridge. He is remembered for his theory that God's Spirit is the "means of regeneration," and that persons may and ought to come to it, though they know themselves to be in a "natural condition." He wrote The Safety of appearing at the day of Judgement in the righteousness of Christ, Boston, 1857 (2d ed., 1729; republished, Edinburgh, 1792, with Preface by Dr. John Erskine); The doctrine of instituted churches explained and proved from the Word of God, Boston, 1700, 34 pp., 4to; a reply to Increase Mather's The order of the Gospel, professed and practised by the churches of Christ in New England, Boston and London, 1716; An Appeal to the learned, being a vindication of the right of visible saints to the Lord's Supper, though they be destitute of a saving work of God's Spirit in their hearts, 1709; A guide to Christ, or the way of directing souls that are under the work of conversion, 1714; An answer to some cases of conscience, 1722; among other things, it discusses whether men have the right to live at an inconvenient distance from church; when the Lord's Day begins; whether the Indians were wronged in the purchase of their land. See art. CONGREGATIONALISM, p. 588; and DEXTER: Congregationalism as seen in its Literature.

STOICISM, the noblest system of morals developed within the pale of Greek philosophy, received its name from the place in Athens in which its founder, Zeno of Citium (about 308 B.C.) assembled his pupils, the Stoas, or colonnades. The metaphysical foundation of the system involves a final identification of God and nature, submerging both those ideas in that of an inevitable destiny. In its more austere forms, stoicism defines moral perfection as complete indifference to destiny. Man shall do that which is good, independently of surrounding influences and circumstances; and, having done that which is good, he shall feel happy, independently of the sufferings and misery which may result from his acts. In its later and somewhat mitigated forms, stoicism defined that which is good, virtue, as conformity to the all-controlling laws of nature, or even as agreement between the human and the divine will. Always, however, it placed action far above contemplation or enjoyment; and, by so doing, it exercised a great influence on the Roman mind. In Rome it found its most eloquent exponent, Seneca, and its noblest representatives, Marcus Aurelius the emperor, and Epictetus the slave; and by introducing the Stoics into Alexandria, and by establishing the institution of the Mysteries, in which this school of thought was identified with the secrets of the East, it prepared the way for Christianity. The best representation of the whole subject is found in Zeller: Philosophie d. Griechen, iii., Eng. trans., The Stoics, Epicureans, and Skeptics, London, 1869. See also RAYNISSEN: Essai sur le Stoicisme, Paris, 1856; DOURIE: Du Stoicisme et du Christianisme, Paris, 1863; H. A. WINKLER: Der Stoizismus eine Wurzel des Christenthums, Leipzig, 1878; W. W. STRAUSS, David Friedrich, b. at Ludwigsburg

STROWELL, Hugh, an eminent evangelical clergyman; rector of Christ Church, canons of Chester, etc.; was b. at Douglas, Isle of Man, Dec. 3, 1799; and d. at Salford, Oct. 8, 1865. A memoir by Rev. J. B. Marsden appeared 1868. He wrote The Pleasures of Religion, with other Poems (1832), Tractarianism tested (1845, 2 vols.), and A Model for Men of Business; and edited A Selection of Psalms and Hymns, containing the very popular "From every stormy wind that blows." His forty-six hymns were published by his son and successor, 1868. F. M. BIRD.

STRAUB, Walsafried (Walafridus Strabus, "the squinter"), d. July 17, 849; was, according to some writers, a Saxon by birth, according to others an Anglo-Saxon; studied at St. Gall, Reinach, and finally at Fulda, under Rabanus Maurus, and was in 842 made abbot of Reinach. He was a very prolific writer. His principal work is the so-called Glossa ordinaria, a huge exegetical compilation, the oldest printed edition, — without date or place, comprising four volumes in folio, — which for several centuries formed the principal source and the highest authority of biblical science in the Latin Church, and was used down to the seventeenth century. Another work of his, De exordiis et incrementis rerum ecclesiasticarum, printed in Historiae Scriptores officii divini, Cologne, 1568, is also of interest. It is a kind of handbook in ecclesiastical archaeology, treating in thirty-one chapters various ceremonies, altars, bells, images, etc. He also wrote poems and historical works.

ED. REUSS.

STRAPHAN, Joseph, was author of three hymns in Rippon's Selection, 1787. They have been more or less copied, and one, on Sunday-school work, extensively.

STRENS, David Friedrich, b. at Ludwigsburg near Stuttgart, in the kingdom of Wurttemberg, Jan. 27, 1808; d. there Feb. 8, 1874. He studied theology (1825-30) at the university of Tubingen, where he came under the influence of Baur, who had formerly been his teacher in the seminary at Blaubeuren. He took up first with the ideas of Schelling, and then with those of the mystic Jacob Boehme. He became profoundly interested in natural magic in its different forms. But the study of Schleiermacher dissipated his mysticism. Theology had, however, less attractions for him than Hegel's philosophy, which, indeed, combined the two. He passed his final examinations with distinction, and became assistant minister in a little village near Ludwigsburg. His simple discourses were enjoyed by his parishioners, and his pastoral duties were well performed; but after nine months he resigned (1831), since he found himself too much distracted by religious doubts to stay, and was for six months temporary priest at Maulbronn; then went to Berlin to hear Schleiermacher and Hegel. The latter died of cholera shortly after his arrival in 1832; he was called to Tubingen as rector of the seminary. He also lectured upon Hegel's philosophy in the university. His lectures were a brilliant success; but he soon found his position uncomfortable, owing to his opinions. He had planned a life of Jesus upon critical principles, and attacked with such ardor his great task, that in a year he wrote the book which has made him immortal, — Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet.
STRAUSS.

He was removed from his position at Tübingen after the appearance of the first volume (see Wiezisacker, in Jahrz. für deutsche Theologie, 1875, 4th part), and transferred as provisional professor to Leipzig. In 1839 he retired to private life. The action of the authorities was wise, for his book raised a storm of opposition. He applied the mythical theory which had made such havoc with Greek and Roman history, and which De Wette had applied to the Old Testament, to the Gospels, with the result that all miracles were turned into myths (see Mythical Theory): all that remained was a Christ idea. There was no such thing as prophecy, an incarnation, or a miracle; for nothing which is supernatural can be historical. There was no God-man as a person. The Incarnate God is the human race. Humanity is the child of a visible mother, the invisible father. It is the race which works miracles by its use of natural forces. It dies, and lives again, and mounts to heaven, because, raised above personal existence, it is united with the heavenly and eternal spirit. In this work Strauss ignored critical study of the text. He considered the four Gospels as the altered oral tradition. He accepted, however, the synoptical discourses. His theory was confronted by the dilemma so masterfully put by Ullmann in his Historisch oder Mythisch? (Hamburg, 1838) that either the Christ was the invention of the apostle church, or the apostle church was founded by Christ. Neander, Tholuck, Luccie, Lange, and others successfully refuted his theory; and his book is of value only for its purely negative criticism.

In the second and third editions, and in his Streitschriften (Tübingen, 1837–38, 3 vols.), he endeavored to reply to the attacks made upon him, and conceded spiritual authority to the Founder of Christianity. It was his desire to make his peace with the theologians, which led him in 1838 to write the Zwei friedliche Blätter, Altona, 1839. In 1839 the radical party at Zürich nominated him professor of theology in the university, but a popular outbreak prevented his acceptance, although for the rest of his life he continued to draw a thousand francs yearly (half the salary). In 1839 he published at Leipzig Charakteristik u. Kritiken, 2d ed., 1844, embraced essays upon Schleiermacher, Dab, Kerner, animal magnetism, and modern possessions, etc. In the fourth edition of his Leben Jesu (1840), the first one printed in German characters, Strauss withdrew all the concessions of the second and third, and boldly threw down the glove to the theologians. His second chief work was Die christliche Glaubenslehre in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und im Kampf mit der modernen Wissenschaft dargestellt (Tübingen, 1840, 1841, 2 vols.), which has been characterized as resembling a theology in the same way that a cemetery resembles a city. Strauss maintains that the opposition between science and religion is hopeless. The latter is indeed an inferior form of thought, which no longer satisfies cultivated spirits. The first question he answers negatively. Strauss was now definitely relegated to private life, and wandered about through Germany, finding no permanent home. While living at Stuttgart he met the popular opera-singer Agnes Schebest, and married her in 1842. Two children, a son and a daughter, were born of this union; but it proved unhappy, and in 1847 they separated by mutual consent. Strauss then lived at Ludwigsburg. In 1836 he retired to private life. The next work was Der Romantiker auf dem Thron der Cäsaren, oder Julian der Abtrünnige (Mannheim, 1847), an ironical parallel between the restoration of heathenism attempted by the Emperor Julian and the restoration of Protestant orthodoxy by Frederick William IV. of Prussia. He was elected as a liberal to the Württemberg diet in 1848, by the citizens of Ludwigsburg, but disappointed their expectations by advocating anti-liberal sentiments, and resigned soon after, to their great satisfaction. In this connection, see his Sechs theologisch-politische Vorträge, Stuttgart, 1848. In the last years of his life he produced a number of literary works by which his reputation as a critic was enhanced, and four theological works, large and small, in all of which he plainly showed how widely he had departed, not only from tradition, but from the Christian religion. His literary works were Schubarts Leben in seinen Briefen, Berlin, 1849, 2 vols.; Christian Märklin, ein Lebens- und Characterbild aus der Gegenwart, Mannheim, 1851; Leben und Schriften Nikodemus Frischins, Frankfort, 1855; Ulrich von Hutten, Leipzig, 1857, 4th ed., 1878 (English condensed trans., London, 1874); Gesprächsbiiten, übers. u. erw., Leipzig, 1860; Hermann Samuel Reimarus, Leipzig, 1862; Voltaire, sechs Vorträge, Leipzig, 1870, 5th ed., 1878. The theological works were (1) Das Leben Jesu für das deutsche Volk bearbeitet, Leipzig, 1864, 4th ed., 1877 (Eng. trans., London, 1865, 2 vols.); (2) Die Halben und die Ganzen, Leipzig, 1865; (3) Der Christus der Glauben und der Jesus der Geschichte, Berlin, 1865; and (4) Der alte und der neue Glaube, ein Bekenntniss, Leipzig, 1872, 11th ed., Bonn, 1881 (Eng. trans. by Mathilde Blind, London and New York, 1873), with appendix, 1874. In the first of these four books, Strauss supplied the grave defect of his first Leben Jesu by prefacing the text with a critical study of the Gospels, particularly Matthew, to whose discourses he assigned historical importance. He granted that Jesus "stands foremost among those who have given a higher ideal to humanity," and that it was impossible to refrain from admiring and loving him. He also says we cannot do without Christianity, and it cannot be lost. In the second work, Strauss ridiculed Schenkel's liberalism as contrasted with Hengstenberg's whole-souled orthodoxy. In the third, he reviews Schleiermacher's life of Christ, then first published. In his fourth work he sets himself to answer four questions: Are we yet Christians? Have we still a religion? How do we look at the universe? How shall we regulate our life? The first question he answers negatively. He repudiates his former veneration for Christianity, and calls Christ's resurrection a "world-historical humbug." To the second query he replies, "we establish only the absolute dependence upon the universe; an absolute being cannot be conscious or personal." To the third, he says, the universe is "only a development from a blind force or law, without any foreseen end." The fourth question is answered by saying, that we must live for "the good we find here, for science and art." There is no hereafter.

Strigel died of cancer of the stomach, after great sufferings born with stoical patience. The deaconess who nursed him in his last illness relates (according to good authority), that during his agony he repeatedly called out, "Lord, have mercy upon me!" But he was buried, by his own request, without religious rites of any kind.

STRIGEL, Victorinus, a pupil of Melanchthon, and an advocate of exorcism; was b. at Kaufbeuren, Dec. 29, 1514; d. at Heidelberg, June 28, 1569. He studied at Wittenberg, under Melanchthon; was professor at Erfurt, and in 1548 became the first professor and rector of the new school at Jena. Here he came into conflict with Flacius, whom he recommended for a professorship in 1567. It was a conflict between the Melanchthonian theology and strict Lutheranism. A public controversy, lasting fifteen days, between them was developed in 1569, and the result was woven "into the very texture of his mind." The only point discussed was the relation of the human will to divine grace in the work of conversion. In 1563 Strigel became professor at Leipzig; but in 1567 the lecture-room was closed to him on account of his moderate Lutheranism, and he became professor at Heidelberg. His principal work was Hypomnemata in omnibus libros N. T., etc., Leipzig, 1565. See Erdmann: De Strigelianismo, Jena, 1668, Hanover, 1675; Merx: Hist. vita et controvers. V. Strigeili, Tübingen, 1732; Otto: De Strig. libertatis mentis in eccles. luth. vindice, Jena, 1843. C. Schwarz.

STRONG, Nathan, D.D., b. in Coventry, Conn., Oct. 10, 1748; d. in Hartford, Conn., Dec. 25, 1816, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. Having been graduated at Yale College in 1769, he pursued the study of law for a time; was a tutor in Yale College in 1772, 1779; and, after a brief course of theological study, became the second pastor of the First Congregational Church in Hartford, Conn., Jan. 5, 1774. He found the church weak; he left it the strongest in the State. Some of the ablest men in the country belonged to it. He remained in this pastorate nearly forty-two years. During the first part of it, amid our colonial troubles with Great Britain, he published many political papers which exerted a wide and deep influence. He possessed one faculty which gave him great power in political discussions. His wit was woven "into the very texture of his mind." "Notwithstanding all his struggles against it," he could not entirely repress it; and he often let it fly like a javelin against the opponents of the Revolution. He never yielded to it in the pulpit: there he was uniformly and eminently solemn and impressive. In his controversies, however, with the infidels of his day, he did not restrain his instinctive tendency to sarcasm. Their safety lay in letting him alone. Like many other pastors, he suffered in his finances from the influence of the Revolutionary war. His salary became insufficient and uncertain. In order to relieve his failing exchequer, he invested a part of his patrimonial estate in a mercantile establishment, which afterward became bankrupt. Several circumstances connected with this loss, followed as they were by two severe bereavements, had a decisive influence on his ministerial character. During the last twenty years of his pastorate he became eminent as a revival preacher. In the best sense of the term he was a pulpit orator. His person was attractive and imposing, his eloquence was earnest and emphatic, his thoughts were clear, his sympathies ardent, his religious feelings profound. He had a wonderful memory, and a command of appropriate language. He was sometimes thought to be preaching extempore when in fact he was reading his manuscript, and sometimes he was thought to be reading his manuscript when in fact he was preaching extempore. His knowledge of human nature was remarkable. This gave him an exceptional degree of authority among the churches, and a rare degree of skill in conducting religious revivals. He was an indefatigable student; but his learning was developed in his intellectual character, and not in his references to books. His talents were versatile: his attainments were multifarious, and comprehensive. His method of writing was rapid: he did not stop to perfect his style; and accordingly, among the many works which he performed, he left no single one which will endure as a visible monument of his real greatness. He published two volumes of sermons,—one in 1785, and one in 1800. Both of them were designed and adapted to guard the purity of religious revivals. He was a pioneer in the cause of Christian missions. He has been considered the father of the Connecticut Missionary Society, the oldest of the permanent missionary societies in the land. He was the projector of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, the principal editor of it for fifteen years, and the sole editor of it for five of these years. His numerous contributions to it had a memorable influence on the religious welfare of what were then our "new settlements." He was also the projector of the Hartford Selection of Hymns. Several of these hymns were composed by him, as the chief editor of the volume published in 1799. The most elaborate of his productions is entitled The Doctrine of Eternal Misery reconcileable with the Infinite Benevolence of God (1798). The history of this volume is remarkable. In addition to these writings he published fourteen sermons in pamphlet form, the first in 1777, the last in 1818.

JOHN STUYTE. by A. PARK.

STUYTE, John, a distinguished historiographer of the English Reformation; was b. at Stepney, Nov. 1, 1643; d. at Hackney, Dec. 11, 1737. After passing through St. Paul's school, he entered Jesus College, Cambridge (1662), from which he was transferred to Catherine Hall, where he took his degree. He was made a tutor of the Throstone Boys, Essex, in 1669, and of Low Leyton, Essex, the same year. Archbishop Tenison afterwards conferred upon him the sinecure of Tarring, Sussex, and he received the lecturership of Hackney, which he resigned in 1724. His principal writings are an edition of Lightfoot's Works, London, 1684, 2 vols.; Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, 1694, new ed., Oxford, 1845, 3 vols.; Life of Sir Thomas Smith, 1698; Life of Dr. John Aylmer, Bishop of London, 1701; Life of Sir John Cheke, 1705; Annals of the Reformation, 1709-31, 4 vols.; Life and Letters of Archbishop Grindal, 1710; Life and Letters of Archbishop Parker, 1711; Life and Acts of Archbishop Whitgift, 1718; Ecclesiastical Memoirs, 1721, 3 vols. The most important of these works, which have been a storehouse for modern historians of the Elizabethan period, is the Annals of the Reformation, which, as the author says in his dedication to the king, "commences at the happy accession of Queen Elizabeth to the throne, when the great and divine work was taken in hand again of removing the gross superstitions and errors of Rome which had been restored by Queen Mary." Strype was a diligent collector of materials, faithful and minute, but lacked skill of arrangement. The complete works of Strype were issued at Oxford, 1830-40, in 27 vols.

Moses Stuart, b. in Wilton, Conn., March 26, 1780; d. in Andover, Mass., Jan. 4, 1852, aged seventy-one years, nine months, and nine days. When a lad of but twelve years, he became absorbed in the perusal of Edwards on the Will. In his fifteenth year, entering an academy in Norwich, Conn., he learned the whole Latin grammar in three days, and then joined a class who had devoted several months to Latin studies. In May, 1797, having been under the careful tuition of Roger Minot Sherman, he was admitted as a sophomore to Yale College. Here his tastes were pre-eminently for the mathematics. At his graduation, in 1799, he delivered the salutatory oration, at that time the highest appointment awarded to the class. One year after leaving Yale he taught an academy in North Fairfield, Conn., and in the following year was principal of a high school at Danbury, Conn. Having pursued the study of the law, he was admitted to the bar in 1802, at Danbury. His fertile and versatile mind, his enthusiasm and prodigious memory, gave promise of eminent success in the legal profession. From his legal study at this time he derived signal advantages through life. A few weeks before his admission to the bar, he was called to a tutorship in the Latin of Erasmus; 4th ed. in 1842; Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1827-28, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1838, in 1 vol.); Hebrew Christomathy, 1829 (2d ed., 1832); Grammar of the New-Testament Dialect, 2d ed., improved, 1834; Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 1832, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1835, in 1 vol.); Notes to Hugo's Introduction from the Latin of Ernesti, 1836; Hints on the Prophecies, 2d ed., 1842; Commentary on the Apocalypse, 1845, 2 vols., pp. 1008; Critical History and Defence of the Old-Testament Canon, 1845; Translation of Rodiger's Gesenius, 1846; Commentary on Daniel, 1850; Conscience and the Constitution, 1850; Commentary on Ecle-siestes, 1851; Commentary on the Book of Proverbs, 1852.

In addition to the preceding works, he published fourteen pamphlets; thirty-four articles, containing fifteen hundred pages, in the American Biblical Repository; forty articles, containing four hundred and ninety pages, in the Bibliotheca Sacra; thirty-three important articles for other periodicals— in all more than three thousand printed octavo pages. STUDIES, Simeon, is mentioned as a monk in the famous monastery of Studium in Constantinople, and as author of a number of noticeable religious hymns. See MüLLER (Studium com. Const., Leipzig, 1721) and Leo Allatius (De Symeonum scriptis, Paris, 1684), where another Simeon Studies, a theologian, and writer of homilies and hymns, is also mentioned.

STUDIES, Theodore, b. in Constantinople in 759; d. in the Island of Chalceis, Nov. 11, 826. He became a monk in the monastery of Studium in 781, and in 794 its abbot. He was an ardent champion of image-worship; wrote tracts, poems, etc., in its defence, and was four times sent into exile by iconoclastic emperors. See Jacob Simonides, Opera variæ, Venice, 1728, especially part v.

STURM, the first abbot of Fulda; b. in Bavaria in 710; d. at Fulda, Dec. 17, 779. He descended from a rich and distinguished family; joined Boniface on his second missionary tour through Central Germany; studied in the cloister school of Fritzlar, and was ordained a priest there in 733. As he took a prominent part in the foundation of the monastery of Fulda, he was by Boniface made its first abbot, and under his rule the institution became very prosperous. But after the death of Boniface, in 753, conflicts arose between his successor, Lullus, and the abbot of Fulda, first concerning the possession of the remains of St. Boniface, and then concerning the administration of the property of the monastery. As internal troubles were added, Sturm was summoned before King Pepin, and banished to the monastery of Jumincta; but the sympathy for him; and, in order to escape them, he ascended a column seventy-two feet high and four feet in diameter. The inventor of this monstrosity was Simeon, generally called the “Syrian,” or the “Older,” to distinguish him from other Simeons, also Stylites; b. at Sesam, in Northern Syria, in 390 or 391; d. at Telanessa, near Antioch, in 459. He became a monk. He entered first a monastery in the vicinity of his home, where he spent two years, and then the monastery of St. Eusebonas, near Teleda, where he spent ten years. But the asceticism of the monastery was not severe enough for him. He settled as anchoret at Telanessa, and one of the feats to which he trained himself was fasting for forty days in imitation of Moses and Elijah. He first lived in a hut; but the crowds of admirers which thronged around him disturbed him; and, in order to escape them, he ascended a column seventy-two feet high and four feet in diameter. On the top of that column he spent thirty years. From sundown to sunrise he meditated, generally bending forWARDS, in regular alternation, without intermission: from sunrise to sundown he preached to the people assembled at the foot of the pillar, advised them, and gave them what spiritual aid he could. He wrote sharp letters to Theodosius II., Leo I., and the Empress Eudoxia, and his admonitions were followed: and when he died he was buried with all possible ecclesiastical and military pomp at Antioch. There was, indeed, something in his life which though it seems almost monstrous to the eyes of our time, impressed his own time as truly great, and he found many imitators. Stylites are mentioned as far down as the twelfth century. Simeon Fulminatus, who was hurled from his pillar by a thunderbolt, lived from 1143 to 1180. The champion of the whole class was Alypius, who spent seventy years on his pillars. At one time it was almost a fashion among rich people to maintain a stylite on a magnificent pillar: at others, the religious life of the congregations was, no doubt, invigorated and purged by the example of the pillar-saint.

Francis, a learned and indefatigable teacher of the order of the Jesuits; was b. at Grenada, Spain, Jan. 5, 1548; d. in Lisbon, Sept. 25, 1617. Following the desire of his parents, he began the study of law. Deeply impressed in his seventeenth year by a sermon of the Jesuit Borel, he determined to enter the order of the Jesuits, and began the study of philosophy and theology at Salamanca. At the close of his studies he discoursed upon Aristotle at Segovia, taught theology at Valladolid, and acted as professor for eight years in Rome. Obligated by sickness to return to Spain, he taught for eight years at Alcala, and one year at Salamanca, when Philip II. appointed him principal professor of theology at Coimbra. His lectures must have produced an immense sensation, if the half of the reports is to be believed. Some attributed his wisdom to divine inspiration (inspissam ei divinitus esse saptienniam), and called him "the second and another Augustus, the second and last of the apostles of the spirit," etc. In spite of this adulation, Suarez remained humble, flagellated himself daily, fasted three times a week, and never ate more than one pound of food a day. He was on a visit to Lisbon to compose a difficulty between the Papal legate and the royal councillors, when he died. His epistle ran, "The teacher of Europe, as also of the whole world, an Aristotelian in the natural sciences, an angelic Thomas in divinity, a Jerome in style, an Ambrose in the pulpit, an Augustine in polemics, an Athanasius in the explication of the faith, a Bernard in mellifluous piety, a Gregory in the exposition of the Scriptures, and, in a word, the eye of the Christian world, but in his own judgment, nothing (ac vero oculus populi Christiani sed suo solius judicio, nihil)."

The literary activity of Suarez was for the most part concerned with the treatment of the Aristotelian philosophy and the scholastic theology. His works appeared in twenty-three volumes, at Lyons, 1660; in twenty-four volumes, Venice, 1740. The Jesuit Noël made an excerpt from his works in two volumes, Geneva, 1730. The rich invention and casuistry with which Suarez spurs out the discussion of scholastic questions suited the taste of his time and his order. Especially famous was his Defence of the Catholic and Apostolic Faith against the Errors of the Anglican Sect (Defens. Edet Cath. et Apost. ad Anglican. Haereticos, Coimbra, 1618. He wrote the work against James I. of England, and at the suggestion of Paul V. Its main burden is, that the Pope has the right to depose and set up kings in virtue of his authority received from Peter. Applauded by Paul V. in a letter to its author, dated Sept. 8, 1613, it was burnt by the public hangman in front of St. Paul's, London; and by a decree of Parliament it received a like treatment in Paris, June 26, 1614. See Deschamps' Lat. Life of Suarez, Perpignan, 1671; Alemagne: Bibl. Script. S. J., Antw., 1643; Werner: Suarez u. d. Scholastik d. letzten Jahrhunderte, Regensburg, 1861. E. Friedberg.

SUBDINeACON. The primitive church knew only two classes of officers,—leaders (prostigmatn, pomnn, stigmata, episcopos, provetitores) and servants (dicoones); the former for the functions of worship, the latter for the administration of charities. But as the episcopate on one side developed from the diaconate, the functions of the latter were divided into the subdiaconate from the deaconate. The Roman-Catholic Church, however, while vindicating for the episcopal immediate establishment by Christ himself, has never hesitated to concede that the subdeaconate is a merely human institution (adinlotis causa). Its existence in the middle of the third century in the churches of Italy and Antioch is proved by the letter of Pope Cornelius to Bishop Fabius of Antioch (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl. VI. 43) and by the letters of Cyprian (3, 29, 30, etc.). In Spain it is first mentioned by the synod of Elvira 305 (can. 30); in the Orient, by the synod of Laodicea, 361 (can. 21-29). From Amalarius (De divin. offic. 1, 11) it appears, however, that in the middle of the ninth century it was not yet universally established. With respect to dignity it was reckoned among ordinias niores; though all its offices were of a subordinate character,—guarding the tombs of martyrs, correcting the discipline of the faithful, etc. It became more elevated, however, when Gregory the Great extended the law of celibacy to its members, and when Urban II., in 1091, admitted them to competition for the episcopal chair. See Morinus: De sacrac ordinationibus, iii. 12. E. Friedberg.

SUBINTRODUCTÆ is a term of canon law applied to women living in the houses of clerical persons for purposes of unchastity. When the unmarried state became identified with chastity, relations to subintroductory very soon sprang up, and gradually developed into actual concubinage. They were noticed by the councils of Elberich (305), Ancyra (314), Nicea (226), etc., down to the Council of Trent (Sess. 25, cap. 14).

SUBLAPSAriANism, a theory held by moderate Calvinists, according to which the fall of man was not decreed, though it was foreseen, by God; the purpose of that distinction being to avoid ascribing the origin of sin to God. Infra- and Supralapsarianism.

SUBORDINATIONISM. See Trinity.

SUCCESSION, Apostolical, means an unbroken series of ordination from the days of the apostles to our time. It is claimed, in the most absolute sense of the words, by the Roman-Catholic
Chic, which for that reason declares all other churches schismatic or heretic. But it is also claimed, though in a less dogmatic way, by the Greek, the Syrian, the Coptic, and the Armenian churches, and by various Protestant churches, especially the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

SUCCESSION of Pseudo-Dionysius. As there is some resemblance between the theology of Bar Sudaili and that of Pseudo-Dionysius, the former may have borrowed the celebrated work of the latter as an ecclesiastic. After the death of Louis VI., in 1137, he was appointed regent during the minority of Louis VII., and again when the latter, in 1149, made a crusade to the Holy Land; and during his lifetime hardly any thing of consequence took place in French politics without his immediate intervention. His leading idea was the consolidation of the monarchy as a divinely established institution; and he strove to realize that idea, not only in spite of the resistance of the feudal lords, but sometimes, also, in spite of the opposition of the hierarchy. His life was written by Nettlement (1828), Combes (1837), and by a contemporary monk, in Guizot: Coll. des mémores, vol. viii.

SUGER, Abbot of St. Denis; b. probably in 1081, and in the neighborhood of St. Omer; d. at St. Denis, Jan. 12, 1151; the contemporary of St. Bernard and Abelard, and one of the greatest statesmen France produced during the middle ages. He was educated in the monastery of St. Denis, together with Louis VI.; and when the latter ascended the throne, in 1108, he immediately called the monk to his court, and made him his principal counsellor. In 1129 Suger was elected abbot of St. Denis; but he remained at the court, and continued to live as a man of the world, until, in 1127, he suddenly was seized by the reformatory movement of his time. He at once discarded all worldly pomp and vanity, and assumed the habits and practices of severe asceticism. But he also professed the unpopular views of the papacy, both as a statesman and as a churchman. As early as 1136, he had been appointed regent during the minority of Louis VII., and in 1149, he made a crusade to the Holy Land; and during his lifetime hardly any thing of consequence took place in French politics without his immediate intervention. His leading idea was the consolidation of the monarchy as a divinely established institution; and he strove to realize that idea, not only in spite of the resistance of the feudal lords, but sometimes, also, in spite of the opposition of the hierarchy. His life was written by Nettlement (1828), Combes (1837), and by a contemporary monk, in Guizot: Coll. des mémores, vol. viii.

SUGERUS (SCHWEIZER), Johann Caspar, the author of the Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus; b. at Zurich, June 26, 1629; d. there Dec. 29, 1684. After studying at Zurich, he finished his education at Montauban and Saumur. In 1644 he was made teacher in the schools of his native town, and was promoted to a professorship of Hebrew, and later (1660) of Greek. His philological works are valuable. They are, Syllae vocum N. T., Tig., 1648, 1659, edited by Hagenbach in 1744, under the title, N. T. Glossarium Graeco-Latinum, etc.; and especially Thesaurus eccles. e patribus Graciae ordinis alphabeticis exhibens quaeque phraese, ritus, dogmata, hæreses et hujusmodi species, insertas infinitas pone vocibus, logendi generis Graeci hacenius a lexicographis nondum vel obiter saltem tractata, opus viginti annorum labore adornatum, Annt., 1682, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1729; Symbol. Niceno-Constant. exposition et ex antiquitate eccles. illustratum, Utrecht, 1718. A. SCHWEIZER.

SUIDBERT, an Anglo-Saxon monk who in 690 accompanied Willibrord to Friesland as a missionary, and was placed by him in charge of the congregation when Willibrord went to Rome. On the return of the latter, however, Suidbert went into the land of the Bructerians, between the Ems and the Lower Rhine; and, when the congregation which he formed there was disturbed by the invasion of the Saxons, he founded a monastery and missionary school at the present Kaiserswerth, under the protection of Pepin. See Beda: Hist. Ecc., v. 19. The Vita in Act. Sanct. Boll., March 1, is a later and fully unreliable fabrication.

SULZER, Simon, b. at Interlaken, Sept. 22, 1580; d. at Basel, June 22, 1555. He grew up under very humble circumstances, but was enabled by the support of the government of Bern to study at Basel and Strassburg. After he finished his studies, he spent ten years in reconstructing the schools in the canton of Bern, and was in 1549 appointed preacher at Basel, and professor of theology. In the controversy between the Swiss and the German Reformers concerning the Lord's Supper, he occupied a peculiar position, as he held the views of Luther, and openly labored for their introduction in Switzerland. See Hunder-
SUMNER, John Bird, D.D., b. at Kenilworth, Warwickshire, 1780; educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; assistant master at Eaton, rector of Maple Durham, 1820-28; canon of Durham, 1829; bishop of Chester, 1829; archbishop of Canterbury, 1848; d. in London, Sept. 6, 1862. He was the leader of the “evangelical party” in the Church of England, and earnestly opposed to Romanism and the Oxford movement. His primacy covered the restoration of “Catholic hierarchy” to England, the “Essays and Reviews” controversy, and the revival of the synodal power of the convocations. His publications include Apostolic Preaching, considered in an Examination of St. Paul’s Epistles, London, 1815, 9th ed., 1856; Records of the Creation, 1816, 2 vols., 7th ed., 1850; Evidence of Christianity, 1824, 9th ed., 1861; Practical Exposition [of the New Testament], 1838, 4 vols., at which the Methodist-Episcopal Church South was organized.

In 1848 he was appointed by the General Conference to assist the late Bishop (then Dr.) Wightman as editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, published at Charleston, S.C. While here, he started, and edited for four years, the Sunday-School Visitor. At the organization of the Southern Church he was elected general book editor, which office he continued to fill with eminent ability and with great acceptability till his death. In this capacity he edited over three hundred volumes. In 1855 he moved to Nashville, Tenn., where the publishing-house was located, and where he continued to reside until he died. He was chairman of the committee that compiled the hymn-book, which he edited. He was considered an authority in hymnology, having devoted much time to its study. He was for many years editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, and of the Quarterly Review of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. At the organization of Vanderbilt University he was elected professor of systematic theology; which position he retained until he became also dean of the theological faculty. He died, after only two days’ illness, during the quadrennial session, in Nashville, of the General Conference, where for the tenth consecutive time he had been elected and was acting as secretary. Surrounded by his brethren and colleagues, he died, as he had wished, at the post of duty, in the midst of his labors, ceasing at once to work and live. Possessed of encyclopedic knowledge, always abreast of the times, thoroughly Wesleyan and Arminian in his creed, but in hearty sympathy with all evangelical denominations of Christians, simple as a child in faith, consecrated, earnest, outspoken, an uncompromising enemy of sin and error in whatever form, he was an ornament to Christianity and an honor to the church of his choice.

Dr. Summers is the author of the following works: Commentary on the Gospels, Acts, and Romans, in 6 vols.; Commentary on the Ritual of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; Christian Holiness; Baptism; Golden Censer; The Sunday-School Teacher, or the Catechetical Office of the Church; Seasons, Months, and Days; Talks Pleasant and Profitable; Refutation of the Theological Works of Paine; Way of Salvation; and some twenty other books on various religious and practical subjects. with the moon, "to rule the day" (Gen. i. 14; Ps. cxxvi. 8; Jer. xxxi. 55) and the year; i.e., the solar calendar has probably been once created by God (Ps. lxxxii. 16; Gen. i.), but is always under his command. In the end of the earth he hath set a tabernacle for the sun (Ps. xix. 4; Hab. iii. 11); from thence he appoints his way (Ps. civ. 19), or "commandeth, and it riseth not" (Job ix. 7), and at his command the sun stands still (Job xix. 12; 2 Kings xx. 11). He, and not the sun, is the God Sabaoth: before his glory the sun is no more light (Isa. ia. 19; Job xxv. 5). This is especially the case before the judgment of God (Joel ii. 10, 31, iii. 15; Isa. xiii. 31). For "the sun shall be ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Zion, and in Jerusalem goes to the temple (Isa. lxii. 1). The sun is also the image of moral purity (Cant. vi. 10). Thus we read (Matt. xiii. 43) that "the righteous shall shine forth as the sun." But the sun is also the image of destruction (Ps. cxxi. 6; Job xxx. 25, xlix. 10; Rev. vii. 16). Even poetical personifications are found in the Bible. Thus, when the sun praises God (Ps. civ. 19, cxlviii. 3; Job xv. 16, xxv. 5, xxxviii. 7), or when the sun comes out of his chamber like a bridegroom, "and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race" (Ps. xix. 5). But there will be a time when the sun shall be " ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously" (Isa. xxv. 31).

Worship of the Sun among the Hebrew Nations. — The worship of the sun was the most prominent and powerful agent in the kingdom of nature was widely diffused throughout the countries adjacent to Palestine. This worship was either direct, without the intervention of any statue or symbol, or indirect. Among the Egyptians the sun was worshipped under the title of Ra. The chief seat was On (sun, light), the Greek, Heliopolis, and Hebrew, Beth-shemesh, [i.e., the house of the sun] (Jer. xiii. 13). To the temple at On belonged very many learned priests, one of whom became the father-in-law of Joseph (Gen. xii. 45). In Egypt the sacred day was the sun, and it was called Amun-ra, "the king of all the gods," and which belonged Khonsu-Hercules, the god of the pillars of the sun. The sun-god of the third order was Osiris. Among the Phoenicians the sun was worshipped under the title of Baal. At Tyre, Gaza, and Carthage, human sacrifices were offered to him. Among the Chaldeans the sun was worshipped under the title of Tammuz; and that the Arabsians worshipped the sun we know from Theophrastus (De plant., 5, 4, 5) and Strabo (10, 784). Still more propagated was the worship of the sun among the Persians (Aramese). Famous temples were at Ielisopolis, Emessa, Palmyra, Hierapolis. Sun-worship there was very old, and direct from the beginning; and even in later times, sun and moon were worshipped at Hierapolis, without the intervention of any image (Lucian: De Dea Syra, cap. 34, p. 904). Among the pure Semites, or Aryans, direct worship to the sun was paid from the beginning, and still later. Thus among the Assyrians, and afterwards among the Persians, whose sun-worship is one and the same. The idolatrous sun-worship of the Israelites, which first the time of Ahaz is mentioned in connection with the worship of the moon and stars, first originated from the Assyrians. The dedication of chariots and horses to the sun (2 Kings xxiii. 11) we also find among the Persians (Herod., i. 189; Xenoph., Cyrop., 5, 3, 6: Quint. Curtius, 3, 3). Besides that the Persians offered to the sun (Herod., i. 31), they also directed their adoration towards the rising sun with branches in their hands (Zend Avesta, ii. 204; Herod., iv. 15, 1; HYDE: De relig. Persarum, 350). Up to this day the Parsees worship the sun. The Manicheans also adopted the sun-worship from the Persians, referring it, however, to Christ (DUPUIS: Orig. de cultes, v. 244, vi. 267). In later times the sun was worshipped among the Persians under the form of Mithras, which finally became the Sol Deus invictus throughout the West, especially through the Romans.

The Sun in the Christian Church and Art. — The Mithras-worship even exercised its influence upon the fixing of the Christian Christmas-festival in December. As the new birth of the sun-god was celebrated at the end of December, so, likewise, in Christ the new sun in the field of spiritual life was adored. Many Christian writers of older times speak of Christ as the sun of eternal salvation, to which the visible sun, with moon and stars, forms the chorus (CREUZER: Symbolik, ii. 221, iv. 456 [1st ed.]). For the representation of the sun in Christian art, comp. PIPER: Mythologie der christl. Kunst, i. 2, 116.

SUNDAY (Dies solis, of the Roman calendar, "day of the sun," because dedicated to the sun), the first day of the week, was adopted by the early Christians as a day of worship. The "sun" of Latin adoration they interpreted as the "Sun of righteousness." Sunday was emphatically the weekly feast of the resurrection of Christ, as the sun of eternal salvation, to which the visible sun, with moon and stars, forms the chorus. It was called the "Lord's Day," and upon it the primitive church assembled to break bread (Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2). No regulations for its observance are laid down in the New Testament, nor, indeed, is its observance even enjoined; yet there is in Christian feeling a strong tendency to the observance of the day, in imitation of apostolic precedent. In the second century its observance was universal...
SUNDAY LEGISLATION.

The Lord's Day was a time of public worship, with its attendant administration of the Ecclesiastic. Experience abundantly demonstrates the wisdom of such weekly rest, and the blessedness of such a day of worship.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION. The institution of a weekly religious rest-day has existed, and its observance has been the subject of legislation, from very early times. Traces of such laws are found among the remains of Chaldæan antiquity. The Assyrians had laws for the observance of their sabbath similar to those by which the sabbath was maintained among the Jews. Civil legislation in behalf of the observance of Sunday, as distinguished from ecclesiastical or purely religious ordinances, commenced with the famous statute of Constantine (321): "On the venerable day of the sun let all magistrates and people residing in the cities rest, and let all workshops be closed. In the country, however, persons engaged in agriculture may freely and lawfully continue their labor, because it often happens that another day is not so suitable for grain-sowing or for vine-planting, lest, by neglecting the proper moment for such operations, the bounty of Heaven be lost." Constantine subsequently prohibited lawsuits on Sunday, while expressly permitting such legal acts as the manumission of slaves and the visitation of prisoners. Theodosius the Great (386) prohibited the transaction of business on Sunday, as well as the shows or spectacles which had become customary on that day among the heathen Romans; to which succeeding emperors soon added the various other games and entertainments of the theatre and circus. The law of Leo and Anthemius (469) provides that "the Lord's Day be exempt from all compulsory process; let no summons urge any man; let no one be required to give security for the payment of a fund held by him in trust; let the sergeants of the courts be silent; let the pleader cease his labor; let that day be a stranger to trials; be the crier's voice unheard; let the litigants have breathing-time and an interval of truce; let the rival disputants have an opportunity of meeting without fear, of comparing the arrangements made in their various cases, and of arriving at compromise. If any officer of the courts, under pretence of public or private business, dares to despire these enactments, let his patrimony be forfeited."

These Roman laws are important as forming the basis of the English legislation on this subject, and consequently of the American Sunday laws.

The Lord's Day was embodied in the capitulæries, or general statutes, of the Frank emperors; and its observance, as prescribed by canonical authority, was enforced by severe penalties. During the French Revolution of the last century, when the Christian calendar was abolished, and the decade substituted for the week, each tenth day was made a rest-day, and its observance enforced by laws (17 Thermidor, An. vi.) which required the public offices, schools, workshops, stores, etc., to be closed, and prohibited sales except of food and medicine, and public labor except in the country during seed-time and harvest. On the restoration of the Gregorian calendar, Sunday was recognized in the Code Napoleon. A law of 1814 prohibited traffic, ordinary labor, etc., on Sundays and certain church festivals. In 1840 this law was repealed; a provision for the suspension of certain civil and judicial functions on Sunday, and in regard to the employment on that day of young children and minor girls in factories, alone remaining.

In England, Sunday laws have existed from a very early date. Ina, king of the West Saxons (about 608), forbade servile work on Sunday. Alfred (876) prohibited work, traffic, and legal proceedings. His example was followed in subsequent reigns. Edgar (968) prohibited "heathenish songs and diabolical sports," and markets and county courts, and made Sunday to begin at three o'clock on Sunday morning, and end at three o'clock on Monday morning light." The laws of Canute (1028-35) strongly insisted on the observance of the Lord's Day; prohibiting marketing, hunting, and the holding of the local courts, except in case of great necessity. After the Conquest, the tendency to greater strictness in the Sunday laws continued. The statute of 28 Edward III. (1354) forbade the showing of wools at the market-town. The 12 Richard II. (1388) forbade servants and laborers to play at tennis and other games, yet ordered them to have bows and arrows, and use the same on Sundays. The statute of 4 Edward IV. (1464) forbade cordwainers and cobblersto sell shoes on Sunday. Under Henry VI. the holding of fairs and markets on Sunday was prohibited. The laws of 5 and 6 Edward VI., prohibiting "lawful bodily labor" on Sundays, allowed husbandmen, fishermen, and others to work in harvest, or at any other times when necessary required. This act was repealed under Queen Mary, and was formally revived under James I. Subsequently (1614) James I. issued The Book of Sports, allowing after divine service on Sundays certain games.
and recreations, but expressly refusing this liberty to "Papists and Puritans." The issuing of The Book of Sports created intense dissatisfaction, and it soon became a dead letter. Parliament, in the first year of Charles I., passed an act "for the strict observance of Sunday;" and another law of Parliament in 1627 (3 Car. I.) enacted that no carriers, waggoners, or drovers should travel on Sunday. In 1633 Charles I., under the supposed influence of Laud, reissued his father's Book of Sports.

The statute of 29 Charles II. (1676) is the most important of the English laws on this subject, as that which, with some modifications, is still the law of the land, and which, as being in force at the time of the American Revolution, gave more or less color to the laws of the American Colonies and States. It prohibits on Sunday all worldly labor or business except works of necessity or devotion; but it permits the dressing of meats in families, and its sale in inns and eating-shops, and the crying of milk before nine a.m., and after four p.m.

The early American colonists brought with them the observance of Sunday both as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforced this observance by law. The early laws of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Georgia, South Carolina, and Virginia, required attendance at church. The Massachusetts law (1782) provided that such attendance was not required where there was no place of worship which the person could conscientiously attend. But, as the separation between Church and State became better understood, the Sunday laws were modified in conformity with this principle. The legislatures and courts have carefully distinguished between Sunday observance as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforce only the latter. The laws of the several States differ in minor details, but are alike in their main features. They forbid on Sunday common labor and traffic, except in cases of necessity and mercy, the public sale of goods, the travelling of horsemen, magistrates, or officers of any legal process except in case of treason, felony, or breach of peace; but it permits the dressing of meats in families, and its sale in inns and eating-shops, and the crying of milk before nine a.m., and after four p.m.

The spirit of modern Sunday laws is protection, not coercion. The need of civil intervention, especially to secure to the working-classes the seventh-day rest, becomes more and more imperative with the growth of industries and of the desire for rapid wealth. In evidence of this may be mentioned the petition, hitherto ineffectual, of working-men in Germany, for the help of legislation in obtaining a weekly rest-day. The Social-labor party of Germany, at their meeting at Goth in 1873, announced as one of their demands in the present exigencies of society the prohibition of Sunday work.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

A Sunday school is an assembly of persons on the Lord's Day for the study of the Bible, moral and religious instruction, and the worship of the true God. It is a method of training the young and the ignorant in the duties we owe to God and to our neighbor. As the family and the church are institutions of divine appointment, so the Sunday school has been approved by divine blessings.

1. Biblical Authority and Form. — Godly instruction of the young and the ignorant has been in harmony with the divine government from the earliest history of the race. Although the word "school" does not occur in the Bible previous to the Babylonian captivity, instruction after the Babylonian method was clearly known and practised from very early times; and not long after the captivity, no less than eleven different expressions for "school" were current in the Hebrew speech. Glimpses of the essential features of the school method appear in the early era of biblical history. In patriarchal times the school, like the church, was in the family: the father was the teacher and the priest. Omitting a notice of the faithful religious instruction of the young by Abraham, Job, Jacob, Moses, and other patriarchs, and passing over the public training of children indicated by the passover service, by the reading of the law from Gerizim and Ebal in Josiah's time, and by the so-called schools of the prophets in the days from Samuel to Elijah, as well as the royal commission sent out by Jehoshaphat to re-establish religious instruction, and a similar movement in the time of Josiah, it will be sufficient here to notice simply the day school which gathered the people with the children, requiring the priests as teachers to explain the meaning of the law of God, not unlike the instruction in the modern Sunday school (Neh. viii. 7, 8). See also "Allene's Alarm.""

In the New-Testament period, religious schools connected with the synagogue were found in every city and considerable village in the land. These schools were one branch of an extended system of religious instruction. Lightfoot finds four kinds of schools and teaching among the Jews and Christians. (1) The elementary schools or classes, with a teacher for each class, and required four female teachers to receive and instruct the young and ignorant in religious truth, which is precisely the object of the Sunday school. See Catechetics.

2. EARLY CHRISTIAN CATECHETICAL SCHOOLS.

These schools were a continuation and improvement of the Jewish synagogal schools. Mosheim and others place their wide prevalence as early as in the first century, Neander at a later date. These catechetical classes and schools were intended to prepare neophytes, or new converts, for church-membership, and were also used to instruct the young and ignorant in religious truth, which is precisely the object of the Sunday school. See Synagogues.

3. SUNDAY SCHOOLS OF THE REFORMATION PERIOD. — Luther founded regular catechetical instruction on Sundays as early as 1529, and this custom spread wherever the Reformation gained a foothold. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, had a system of schools 1560–84, almost identical in form with the present Sunday school. Children were taught in two great divisions, — boys and girls, subdivided into smaller groups or classes, with a minister for each class, aided by a layman for boys and a matron for girls. These schools were introduced into all the churches of his diocese, and are continued on much the same plan now, but without the Bible. The labors of Spener, Francke, Zinzendorf, and the English Reformers, further prepared the way for the modern Sunday-school system. Legions of persons and places claim to have had Sunday schools previous to those in Gloucester. Among the many worthy of recognition, only the few following can be noted. Sunday schools were founded in Scotland about 1560, by John Knox; in Bath, Eng., 1650–68, by Joseph Alleine, author of "Alleine's Alarm;" in Roxbury, Mass., 1874; Plymouth, Mass., 1850; in England, by Bishop Frampton, about 1693; in Glasgow, Scotland, about 1707; in Bethlehem, Conn., 1749, by Dr. Joseph Bellamy; in Ephrata, Penn., 1739–40, by Ludwig Haecker, a school continuing for thirty years with gratuitous instruction, children's meetings, and having many revivals; at Brechin, Scotland, 1760, by Mr. Blair; at Catterick, 1768, by Rev. Theophilus Lindsey at Bedale, Eng, 1767, by Oberlin; at High Wycombe, 1769, by Hannah Ball; at Bright Pariah, County Down, Ireland, 1770–78, by Dr. Kennedy; at Bohemia, 1775, by Kindermann; at Bolton, Eng., 1775, by James Heyes; at Macclesfield, Eng., by Rev. David Simpson, 1778.

4. MODERN SUNDAY SCHOOLS. — Sunday schools like those just noted were sporadic; there was need for a popular and general movement, bringing them into affiliation with each other, if not into an organized system. Of this great movement, Conrad Haiss is justly regarded as the founder. He was a citizen of Gloucester, Eng., and proprietor of the Gloucester Journal. Business calling him into the suburbs of that city in 1780, where many youth were employed in the pin and other factories, his heart was touched by the groups of ragged, wretched, and cursing children. He encouraged them to attend Sunday schools and to read in the Catechism such children as should be sent to them on Sunday. The children were required to come with clean hands and faces, and hair combed, and with such clothing as they had. They were to stay from ten to twelve, then to go home; to return at one, and after a lesson to be conducted to church; after church to repeat portions of the Catechism; to go home at five quietly, without playing in the streets. Diligent scholars received rewards of books, Testament, bibles, copies of clothes; clothing: the teachers were paid a shilling a day. Raikes published a brief notice of his efforts in the Gloucester Journal, Nov. 3, 1783 (copied into the London papers), and, later, another notice in the Gentleman's Magazine of London, which attracted wide attention. William Fox, already interested in the improvement of the moral condition of London youth, saw the notice, opened a correspondence with Raikes, urged the plan at public meetings, and with the aid of Jonas Hanway, Henry Thornton, and other philanthropists, formed the Society for Promoting Sunday Schools throughout the British Dominions, Sept. 7, 1785. From 1785 to 1800 the society expended about four thousand pounds for teachers' wages. The scheme commended itself to popular esteem. Learned laymen and influential persons became its warm friends. Among them were Mr. (afterwards Bishop) Horne, Bishop Porteus, the Bishops of Salisbury and Llandaff, Rev. Thomas Scott, the poet Cowper, Adam Smith, the Wesleys, and Whitefield. It, however, met with determined opposition from professors of religion, who questioned its usefulness. The then Bishop of Rochester violently attacked the movement, and the Archbishop of Canterbury called the bishops together to see what could be done to stop it. In Scotland, sabbath-school teaching by laymen was declared to be an innovation, and a breach of the Fourth Commandment. Sunday schools continued to multiply, however, in face of opposition, rapidly extending throughout England, Scotland, Ireland, upon the Continent, and in America. Though the Gloucester schools founded by Raikes died out in a few years, they continued to multiply, however, in face of opposition, rapidly extending throughout England, Scotland, Ireland, upon the Continent, and in America.

Though the Gloucester schools founded by Raikes died out in a few years, they were soon followed by others instituted on an improved plan. Following a meeting at Philadelphia, Dec. 10, 1790, attended by Bishop White, Dr. Rush, Robert Morris, and others, the First-Day or Sunday-school Society, was formed Jan. 11, 1791, to give religious instruction to poor children on Sunday. Like the British society, it employed paid teachers. It spent about four thousand dollars in support of schools between 1791 and 1900. As early as 1791 it urged the Legislature of Pennsylvania to establish free schools. This society still continues its usefulness, granting to needy schools in Philadelphia books and other religious publications. It has expended in these donations about thirty-five thousand dollars.

The schools of Raikes, and those of the British society and the First-Day Society of Philadelpia, employed paid teachers. Their chief aim was to reach not the children of church-members, but of the poor and of those who neglected the church. The schools they established were purely mission Sunday schools. But paid teachers made the schools of Raikes, and those of the British society useful. Next to founding these schools, the most important step was the securing of instruction by unpaid teachers. Sir Charles Reed says that Oldham, Eng., claims to have had the first Sunday-school teacher who declined to receive pay, and began the gratuitous instruction. John Wesley in 1787 speaks of Sunday schools at Bolton, Eng., "having eighty masters who received no pay but what they received from the great Master." In the famous Stockport Sunday school in 1794, only six of its thirty teachers were paid.

In 1790 the Methodist Conference at Charleston, S.C., directed that teachers for Sunday schools for whites and blacks, with voluntary teachers. A Sunday school for Indian children was opened in Stockbridge, N.Y., in 1792, by a sister of Occum, the noted Indian preacher. The children working in a cotton-factory. In Passaic County, N.J., were given gratuitous instruction in a Sunday school in 1794; and Samuel Slater had a similar one for his factory-operators in Pawtucket, R.I., 1797. W. B. Gurney introduced gratuitous instruction into several Sunday schools in London, Eng., about 1796. He also used questions on Scripture-texts at Sunday schools, and, with the cooperation of Rev. Rowland Hill and others, formed the London Sunday-school Union at Surrey Chapel, July 13, 1803, to promote Sunday schools having unpaid teachers. A similar meeting at the same place in 1796 had founded the Religious Tract Society of London, which early provided literature for Sunday schools. Gratuitous instruction speedily became a popular feature in the scheme, and in a short time was generally substituted for the earlier plan of paid teachers.

Though the growth of the system had been remarkable before, so that, within five years after the beginning by Raikes, it was estimated that 250,000 scholars were enrolled in the schools then established, yet this new feature of voluntary teachers gave it a fresh impetus by adapting it to the needs of the poorest community in city or country. In America the movement was promoted by the visit of Mrs. Graham and Mrs. Bethune to England, who founded schools in New York on their return in 1803, and by the visit to Philadelphia of the Rev. Robert May, a missionary from London, in 1811, who had specimens of reward tickets, and urged improved methods in a letter to the Evangelical Society of London, which early provided literature for Sunday schools.

The rapid growth of Sunday schools, the American Sunday-school Union estimated that in 1827 the number of scholars enrolled in the Sunday schools of the different countries was 1,350,000. According to the census of 1851 the number attending Sunday schools in England and Wales was 2,407,642; in Scotland, 292,549. The number reported for Ireland in the returns of the Sunday-school Society, and by other authorities, was 272,112; making the total for 1851 in Great Britain and Ireland, including the British Isles, 2,987,980. The total estimated number of schools for England, Wales, and Ireland, for the same year, was 27,498; and of teachers, 325,450. The number of Sunday-school scholars in America at the same period was estimated at about 3,000,000. In 1861-62 the number of Sunday schools in Ireland was 3,235, teachers 25,562, scholars 278,890; while a competent authority estimated that in Roman-Catholic parishes in Ireland at 800,000. In 1862 J. Inglis estimated the Sunday schools in Scotland had 40,000 teachers and 480,000 scholars. A competent Welsh authority in the same year states...

that 26.5 per cent of its population were in Sunday school, which would give a membership for Wales of about 295,000; and W. H. Watson of London claimed that there were nearly 300,000 teachers and 3,000,000 scholars in the Sunday schools of our land. The report of the Inter-Parliamentary Union for 1883 gave a membership for England and Wales of 1,222,222 teachers and 3,800,000 scholars, and, for the world, 7,177,165 scholars. The number reported at the Raikes centenary in 1880 for England and Wales was 422,222 teachers and 3,800,000 scholars, and, for the world, 1,559,823 teachers and 13,063,523 scholars. These statistics were gathered by voluntary organizations, and, though not giving satisfaction as to accuracy and completeness, are the best issued. (See statistics at end of this article.) A government census of Sunday schools was commenced in the United States in 1837, discontinued the effort in England. For the last fifteen or twenty years it has aided in supporting missionaries on the Continent for the establishment of Sunday schools in the various countries of Europe, and has expended in this Continental Mission nearly a thousand dollars annually for the past few years. Its chief work for eighty years has been the improvement of schools, the publication and distribution of juvenile religious literature, and the collection of Sunday-school statistics. It has on its catalogue a large number of books and publications, which it furnishes to schools connected with the society, in special cases, from one-half to one-third regular prices. The amount of its grants for 1883 was £2,974; its affiliated schools numbered 5,286, having 123,399 teachers and 1,182,199 scholars. Over 16,000 scholars from its schools were former scholars in the schools of the American Sunday schools. It maintains a circulating library, a museum, a reading-room, Hebrew and Greek classes, teachers' institutes for meetings, and competitive examinations for teachers and scholars.

A sabbath-school society was formed in Edinburgh in 1797, and one for the support of Gaelic schools to teach the Scriptures, in 1811. These employed paid teachers; later, voluntary teachers were introduced. The labors of Rowe and James Gall brought important improvements in the modes of instruction. The formation of various local sabbath-school unions at Edinburgh and Glasgow, the adoption of schools in the churches, holding conventions, employing missionaries, and the adoption of juvenile services, mark the progress of the work in Scotland. The Sunday-school Society for Ireland was formed in 1809. Among its publications, Hints on Conducting Sunday Schools had a wide sale, and was reprinted in America. The Church of England Sunday-school Union began training classes and institutes for Sunday-school teachers in 1844; and still supplies the one of its kind in the various local societies. The Sunday-school Institute began training classes and institutes for Sunday-school teachers in 1844; and still supplies the one of its kind in the various local societies.

Foreign Societies.—It is impossible, in this brief space to notice the many Sunday-school societies and organizations which have been formed to promote this cause. A brief description of some of the earlier and more important societies will illustrate the work conducted by all. The London Sunday-School Union—which was formed in 1803, for the improvement of teachers, the extension of Sunday schools, and to supply them with suitable literature at reduced prices— is sustained by members of different evangelical denominations, and conducted by a general committee of fifty-four, divided into various sub-committees. The members of the committee render their services gratuitously. It did not in its early history employ missionaries, but aimed to accomplish its object through the formation of local unions in Great Britain, more particularly in England, and also through affiliated schools. Influenced by the example of the American Sunday-school Union, it employed a missionary in the north of England for some years, but at his death, in 1837, discontinued the effort in England. For the last fifteen or twenty years it has aided in supporting missionaries on the Continent for the establishment of Sunday schools in the various countries of Europe, and has expended in this Continental Mission nearly a thousand dollars annually for the past few years. school Society of Philadelphia, formed in 1791, has been noticed. As early as 1808 the Evangelical Society was formed for promoting sabbath-evening schools in Philadelphia with voluntary teachers. The New-York Female Sunday-school Union and the New-York Male Sunday-school Union were formed in 1816, at the suggestion of Eleazar Lord, who had observed the working of the Sunday-school system in Philadelphia. The Sunday and Adult School Union in Philadelphia was formed in 1817, to unite all the Sunday and adult associations in that city and vicinity. In 1821 it employed a missionary, who organized upward of sixty schools. It also issued a large number of Scripture tickets, cards, tracts, and small reward-books. After seven years of marked efficiency and usefulness, it, with other similar unions, was merged in a national society,—the American Sunday-school Union, in 1824. The Adult Union was at that time the largest society of the kind in the country, having auxiliaries in all the States, with over 700 schools and 50,000 scholars. The object of the American Sunday-school Union, as stated at its formation, "is to concentrate the efforts of sabbath-school societies in different sections of our country, to strengthen the hands of friends of pious instruction on the Lord's Day, to disseminate useful information, to circulate moral and religious publications in every part of the land, and to endeavor to plant a Sunday school wherever there is a population."

Twenty-one years later, when its charter was obtained, it states the object: "to establish and maintain Sunday schools, and to publish and circulate moral and religious publications." It is an undenominational society, conducted by representative laymen from different evangelical denominations; employs missionaries, lay and ministerial; and clergymen likewise cooperate in its work as editors, secretaries, and literary contributors. The first year it reported 321 auxiliaries, 1,150 affiliated schools, 11,295 teachers, 82,697 scholars; and it estimated the number of Sunday-school scholars in the world at over 1,000,000. Among the more important measures which have been inaugurated and promoted by this Union are the employment of missionaries to form Sunday schools; a world's concert of prayer (monthly) for Sunday schools; a system of educational question-books; issuing cheap illustrated Sunday-school periodicals for children; providing suitable records and manuals for conducting and improving Sunday schools. Its missionary work is sustained by benevolent contributions; and the extent of it may be indicated by the report for the year ending March 1, 1883, showing 2,252 schools organized, with 406,000 teachers, and upwards of 3,100,000 scholars in these schools; and has expended in missionary work $2,925,000, of which over $800,000 were given in books and papers to needy schools. It has circulated by sale and donation, publications to the value of about $7,500,000.

The Massachusetts Sunday-school Union was formed in 1825 of delegates from different denominations, but disbanded, and the Massachusetts Sabbath-school Society instituted in 1832,—a Congregational organization, which was consolidated with the Congregational Board of Publication in 1868. It employs secretaries and agents, and issues publications to promote Sunday schools among Congregational churches. The Sunday-school Union of the Methodist-Episcopal Church was formed in 1827, and re-organized in 1844, and has been very efficient in publishing and distributing literature through the preachers attached to its denomination. It does not employ Sunday-school missionaries. The Presbyterian and Baptist boards of publication have Sunday-school departments; they employ colporters, who promote the extension of Sunday schools in connection with their churches, and distribute denominational literature. The (Dutch) Reformed Sunday-school Union soon after 1850 was merged in that of its publishing society. The Protestant Episcopal Sunday-school Union, and the Evangelical Knowledge Society, provide a denominational juvenile literature for schools in that church. The Foreign Sunday-school Association of New York, formerly auxiliary to the American Sunday-School Union, was incorporated in 1873, and labors to promote Sunday schools in foreign lands, chiefly on the continent of Europe.

Conventions.—Early in this century local Sunday-school conventions were held, especially from 1820 to 1830, in many of the Eastern and Middle States. In 1833, at the suggestion of the American Sunday-school Union, a national convention was held in New York, comprising two hundred and twenty delegates from twenty-four States, and Territories out of the twenty-four States and four Territories then comprising the United States. A second delegated national convention was held in Philadelphia in 1833, at which full reports and papers were presented as arranged for by the previous convention in New York. The chief work accomplished by these early national meetings was to discover and agree on the principles of a system of religious education. That of 1833 also adopted the recommendation of the American Sunday-school Union, that a systematic and simultaneous canvass of the entire country be made, to obtain scholars, and enlist parents in this work, on the 4th of July following. It also approved of a Uniform Series of lessons already introduced. A third national convention was held in Philadelphia in 1839, "marking a revival of interest in Bible study, and in religious training of the young." A world's convention was held in London in the year 1842, at which prayerfully discussing the methods and progress of the cause were presented. The fourth national convention in America was held at Newark, N. J., in 1869, attended by five hundred and twenty-six delegates representing twenty-eight States and seven countries; the fifth, at Indianapolis in 1872, marked by the adoption of the present International Series of Uniform Lessons, and the appointment of a general statistical secretary; the first international (sixth national) convention, at Baltimore in 1875; the second, at Atlanta in 1878; the third, at Toronto in 1881; and the fourth, at Louisville in 1884. Besides these, there have been State and local conventions in every part of the United States and the Dominion of Canada, which have given added impetus to the movement, and disseminated useful knowledge in regard to the methods of conducting, and teaching in Sunday schools, and imparted more of unity to the cause. Upon the local conventions, which were very prevalent from 1860 to 1870, the "institute" has been widely grafted,—a modification of the convention, aiming to give instruction specially to teachers, rather than simply to create enthusiasm. The wide influence of conventions on the cause may be inferred from the statement that over five thousand were held in the United States in the year 1893. The "institute," exhibiting advanced methods of teaching and conducting Sunday schools, began its career in 1865. This form of meeting had likewise been adopted in England for many years previous to that date. Out of these institutes and conventions have come the "summer assemblies," among the most noted of which is that of Chautauqua, conducted by the Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., which has normal courses of study, lectures on teaching, a "literary and scientific circle" of about sixty thousand members, and classes in Hebrew, Greek, and other languages.

Organization.—The modern Sunday school commonly has three departments, corresponding to three grades of instruction,—the primary or infant, the intermediate, and the advanced. In the intermediate grade the scholars are arranged in classes of from six to ten, with a teacher for each class: in the advanced grade the classes are somewhat larger. In the infant department, until recent years, it was usual to have only one or two teachers for the entire department, even when it consisted of from one hundred to two hundred pupils. The class system is being more widely introduced into the infant or primary grade of the best schools in America. The entire school is in the charge of a superintendent, with an assistant, a secretary, treasurer, and a librarian: the latter gives out the books from the circulating library in connection with the school, charging them to the teacher or scholar, and recording their return at each session. There are church and mission schools. Sunday schools are not intended to be a substitute for, but a supplement to, family and pulpit instruction. Schools in connection with a church are sustained and directed by the church. Mission schools are often established by Christians of different denominations in neglected portions of the country and of large cities. Sunday schools in the United States hold one session each Sabbath; many of them hold two sessions. A few schools in the cities still hold two sessions, and this custom yet prevails widely in England.

Modes of Instruction and Literature.—The schools founded by Raikes were chiefly for the lower classes in the community, who were ignorant, and hence were taught the elementary branches of reading and writing, with oral instruction in the Catechism. Reading, and memorizing texts in the Bible, followed. Cramming the memory with large portions of Scripture and the Catechism seems to have been a hobby in Scotland, England, and America, for some time. Rev. J. Inglis states that children committed and repeated seven hundred texts every week, until limited to two hundred per week; and R. G. Pardee asserts, that, in the opinion of New-York physicians, it developed a brain-disease in children. James Gall, by his End and Essence of Sabbath-school Teaching and his Nature's Normal School, aimed to introduce a more sensible lesson system in Scotland, which was also used in some schools in America as early as 1830. Stowe's training system, giving prominence to pictorial methods of instruction, also aided in reforming this excessive use of the memory. The reform in America was completed by the introduction of the Uniform Limited Lessons, prepared in 1825, and adopted by the American Sunday-school Union and its three hundred or four hundred auxiliaries in 1826. This form of meeting was at once a popular scheme of study for the whole Bible,—one and the same lesson for all, from of seven to fifteen verses, questions and comments in at least three grades, and reviews. It was national in its purpose. In 1829 Mr. Gall urged his lesson system upon teachers in England; and in 1830 regular lessons were furnished, with notes for the use of teachers. Following the wide use of the Uniform Series of Lessons of 1826 to 1832 and the Union Question-Books, in many American schools teachers "appealed to the imagination, and resorted to stories and anecdotes." In 1840 the London Sunday-school Union issued a List of Lessons for general adoption, adding lesson notes in 1842, which it claims to have continued uninterruptedly till the present time, now using the International Series. Mimpiss's Graduated Simultaneous Instruction for Sunday Schools, founded on the gospel history, and issued in 1844, was an attempt to have one lesson for the whole school; but it had only a limited use. In America, previous to 1863, where the series of "Union Questions" were not used, each school selected its own lessons (or had impromptu lessons); a method of instruction not inaptly termed the "Babel series" of lessons. Schemes of lessons for Sunday schools, with notes, were issued in the Sunday-school Teacher of Chicago, in 1865; and in 1867 B. F. Jacobs suggested uniform lessons anew. The desire for such a series increased, until in 1871 a meeting of Sunday-school publishers was held in New York, at the suggestion of the executive committee of the National Sunday-school Convention, which agreed upon a tentative scheme of uniform lessons for 1872. At the Indianapolis convention in that year, a lesson committee was appointed to arrange a course of lessons for seven years, covering the whole Bible, and which was recommended to all Sunday schools throughout the country. This committee was reappointed and enlarged in 1878, to select a second seven-years' course, and again in 1884 to make a third seven-years' course of Bible-lessons. In 1875 the lessons were reported to be in use in the United States of America, Great Britain, most of the countries of Europe, in Syria, Hindostan, India, and China, in Mexico, Australia, and the Sandwich Islands: and in 1841 it was claimed that this system of study had "created a literature of its own., and has quickened thorough and intelligent Bible-study in the whole English-speaking world. Comments on the text of these lessons have multiplied like the leaves of the forest, publishers issuing notes, questions, and lesson-leaves, and even secular papers give regular weekly comments upon the Sunday-school lesson. The most learned pastors, professors in colleges and seminaries, have contributed the results of their ripest study and scholarship in exposition of these lessons; and Christian publishers vie with each other in producing the best and cheapest helps thereon. In England other series of lessons are used concurrently with the International Series; while schools of the Established Church, and of the Episcopal and some other churches in America, adopt different series of lessons.

When the modern Sunday-school movement began, a century ago, juvenile religious literature did not exist. The Pilgrim's Progress, Watte's Divine and Moral Songs, a few catechisms and similar books, comprised the religious works specially prepared for children at that day. The earliest Catechism in the English language was issued in 1420; one by Cranmer, in 1549; and a Short Catechism in Latin and English, in 1553; the Westminster Catechism, in 1647; and Watte's First and Second Catechisms, in 1729-30. Luther also issued his catechisms in 1529. The early books of instruction in Sunday schools in England and Ireland were chiefly spelling-books and reading-books having portions of Scripture. Later, texts of Scripture on small cards, called "red and blue tickets," were given out as rewards to scholars, and also small books. Sometimes, as a reward, the teacher or superintendent would loan books to a scholar to read. Gradually a juvenile religious literature was developed by the desire of Sunday scholars for reading, and the circulating library in connection with each school was introduced, owing largely to the earlier work and issues of the American Sunday-school Union and its successors. It is impossible to state the number of books, lesson-helps, and periodicals, now issued. Dr. John S. Hart in 1870 estimated the number of publishing-houses and religious societies engaged in issuing Sunday-school library books at not less than thirty-six, of current Sunday-school library books at 7,000, and that theretaff rate of issue for several years had exceeded one a day, reaching 434 in 1868. The number of books, periodicals, and lesson-helps for Sunday schools, has vastly increased in the last decade by the introduction of the international lesson system and other improvements, and is so extensive that it would be hopeless to attempt to gather statistics respecting them. Among the representatives journals specially devoted to Sunday schools, the foremost are The Sunday-school Times, in America, edited by H. Clay Trumbull, D.D.; The Sunday-school Chronicle, issued by the London Union; and the English Sunday-school Almanack which are weekly journals. The Sunday-school Journal (Methodist), the Baptist Teacher, the Westminster Teacher, the Sunday-school World (Union), the Church Sunday-school Magazine of London, the Wesleyan Sunday-school Magazine, and the Sabbath-school Magazine of Glasgow, Scotland, are among the prominent monthly teachers' periodicals now issued.

EDWIN W. RICE

(Editor of the American Sunday-school Union).

SUPEREROGATION. The doctrine of works of supererogation (opera supererogatoria) is based on the distinction irreconcilable of meritorious works and works erangelica. The former it is the duty of every man to obey, but the fulfilment of the latter establishes a merit. The former has never been an article of faith in the Roman-Catholic Church; the Council of Trent is silent upon the matter. But in the practice of the church it has played a most disastrous part as the true foundation of the doctrine of indulgences, which art. see.

SUPERSTITION. The derivation of the Latin term superstition is doubtful. Cicero can hardly be right when he says (De nat. deor., ii. 28), "Qui toto dies precabatur et immolabant, ut sui sibi libri superserit estens, superstitiones esse appetebat." Lactantius is also wrong when he says (Inst. div., iv. 28) those are called superstitious who revere the..."
Superstition.

Superstition has assumed as many forms as there have been false conceptions of the Deity, and its relation to the world. It has three phases when regarded as modifying the conception of the Deity. (1) It mixes up imperfect notions with true ones of God and his activity. From this point of view all non-Christian religions are superstitious. Fetishism is crude superstition. The dualistic systems of Asia are more intellectual, but no less superstitions. (2) Superstition has also represented fate as a force above or at the side of God. This idea is found almost everywhere in heathenism, as a monotheistic element in the midst of polytheism. Superstition always involves a supernatural element. It has often happened that men have combined genuine knowledge with superstition, which is also as much incident to unbelief as to an unreasoning belief. Voltaire, a man of much learning and of unbelief, was more than once deterred from following his inclinations by the fear which bad omens inspired. Robespierre, Napoleon, Josephine, Louis Napoleon, and the Emperor Alexander, all alike consulted Marie Lenormand, a French necromancer, who died June 25, 1843. Our cultivated classes, who pride themselves upon their knowledge, have patronized spiritualistic séances more frequently than the masses have.

of God; founded brotherhoods, for which he wrote rules; and called many individual converts back from the world. His collected works, which give no consistent system, most of the materials having been derived from other mystics, consist of three parts,—on the eternal wisdom, on the eternal truth, and a narrative of his own inner history. They appeared at Augsburg in 1182; last ed. by Diepenbrock, Ratisbon, 1829 (2d ed., 1835).

The book, Von den neuen Felsen, often ascribed to Suso, is by Ruhnken Mertswin. C. SCHMIDT.

SUTTON, Christopher, b. in Hampshire, Eng., 1565; entered Hart Hall, Oxford, 1582; soon transferred to Lincoln, of which he proceeded M.A., 1589; held several livings, and was prebendary of Westminster, 1605, and of Lincoln, 1618; d. 1629. He was pious, eloquent, and admired. He wrote Disci morti (Learn to die), Lond., 1600, frequently reprinted in the following condition, with memoir, 1839, Oxford, 1850; Disci vivere (Learn to live), Lond., 1808 (modern edition, 1853); Godly meditations upon the most holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, 1622, 13th ed., 1677 (modern edition, with preface by John Henry Newman, Oxford, 1844, again 1890). See sketch in Wood: Athen. Oxon., Bliss edition, vol. ii. pp. 456 sq.

SWAIN, Joseph, a hymn-writer of marked talent; was b. at Birmingham, 1761; and d. in London, April 14, 1796. He was originally apprenticed to an engraver. Removing to London, he was baptized by Dr. Rippon, 1783, and from June, 1791, was a successful Baptist minister. His Walworth Hymns, 1792, while abrupt and unequal, are strong, fervid, spontaneous, and marked by frequent bursts of a really poetic imagination. They have been most extensively used by extreme Calvinists, but some of them may be found in almost every collection. By F. W. BIRD.

SWEDEN. Christianity was first preached in Sweden by Ansgar. No doubt the Swedes, like the Danes and the Norwegians, had long before that time become acquainted with Christianity on their commercial and piratical expeditions, but only in a vague and indefinite way. Ansgar made several attempts to convert them. In 829, he was consecrated Bishop of Sweden, and went thither with his nephew Nithard. But even Ansgar's authority was not sufficient to keep the irritated heathens within bounds. They broke into Gautbert's house, and murdered Nithard. The chapel was destroyed, the bishop fled, and, when Ansgar soon after died, the cause of Christianity seemed lost in Sweden. On his second visit Ansgar came with letters of recommendation from the emperor, with great pomp and costly presents; and, having won the favor of the king, he succeeded, at a great assembly of all the freemen of the people, in obtaining toleration for the Christian religion. Ansgarf, a Christian Dane, was settled at Birka, the chapel rebuilt, and a congregation formed anew. In Sweden, however, as in Denmark, the real introduction and actual establishment of Christianity was effected from England. It was the Anglo-Saxon Siegfried, and the English and Danish monks in his company, who, in the reign of Oht Skotkonung (d. 1024), began the work of converting the Swedish people. It was completed during the reign of Eric the Saint (1150-60), when the first monasteries—Alvastra, Nydala, and Warnhem—were founded. Originally Sweden belonged to the archiepiscopal see of Hamburg-Bremen; but in 1163 it obtained its own metropolitan (settled at Upsala), with the suffragan sees of Skara, Linköping, Strängnäs, Westerås, Wexio, and Abo.

In Sweden the Roman-Catholic Church struck deeper roots than in either of the other two Scandinavian countries, perhaps because the Swedes are a more imaginative and impulsive people, with ready enthusiasm for anything grand and magnificent. Nevertheless, after the great political revolution in 1623, the Reformation worked its way among the people, without meeting any considerable opposition. Gustavus Vasa found the church in a miserable condition, and addressed himself to Pope Adrian VI. with complaints, and proposals of reform; but he received no answer. He then undertook to reform the church himself; and in the two brothers Olaus and Laurentius Petri, and their friend Lars Anderson, he found the fit instruments by which to work. The Swedish translation of the Bible appeared in 1526. At an assembly at Oeresbro in 1529, all the reforms which had been introduced by the government on the advice of Luther were sanctioned by the Swedish clergy. Laurentius Petri was consecrated the first evangelical bishop of Sweden. Under Eric XIV. (1560-68) the country was opened as an asylum for all persecuted Protestants. Very soon, however, controversies broke out between the Lutherans and the Reformed; and the Roman Catholics were not slow in availing themselves of the opportunities of the situation. Johan III. (1568-92) actually leaned towards Romanism. The Jesuit Antonio Possevino arrived in Sweden under the guise of an imperial ambassador, but in reality as a papal legate; and the king is said to have secretly but formally embraced Romanism. After his death the assembly of Upsala (1589) took the necessary precautions for the preservation of the Evangelical Church; but how long a Roman-Catholic party continued lingering in Sweden may be seen from the fact that Queen Christina, the daughter of Gustavus Adolphus, became a convert to Romanism, 1636.

The protracted though never violent contest with Romanism had a double influence on the Swedish Church: on the one side it retained more of the hierarchical organization of the Church of Rome than either the Danish or the Norwegian Church, and on the other it also became more exclusive and intolerant. But the abolition of the Reformation the clergy did not lose their political power: they continued to form the fourth estate of the diet of the realm until the revision of the constitution in 1865-66. And how this power was used may be inferred from the fact, that, down to 1868, the rejection from Lutheranism to any other denomination was punished with exile, and confiscation of property. Full religious liberty, that is abolition of all connection between civil rights and religious faith, was not introduced until 1877. The consequences are, that, of the 4,578,001 inhabitants of Sweden (in 1879), only an insignificant percentage belongs to other denominations, while the internal state of the Lutheran Church in Sweden by no means can be pronounced healthy. In the present century widespread religious movements (the Read-ers, the followers of Eric Jansen, etc.) have occurred among the lower classes; showing not the least trace of sectarianism, but giving ample evidence that the spiritual wants of the masses are not duly administered to. They wanted no other theology than that developed by Lutheran orthodoxy, but they wanted more practical religion than that offered by the Swedish Church; and it can hardly be doubted that the emigration, which of late has assumed such dimensions as to frighten the government, is caused as much by the barrenness of the Swedish church as by the poverty of the Swedish soil. It is also a significant fact that during the last ten years the number of theological students has decreased so much, that it has not always been possible to provide every parish with a pastor. SWEDENBORG, Emanuel, was b. in Stockholm, Sweden, on the 29th of January, 1688, and d. in London on the twenty-ninth day of March, 1772. His father's name was Jesper Swedberg; his mother's, Sarah Behm. He was well born. He descended from families of successful and opulent miners, and combined in his nature the energy, insight into the qualities of material substances, and the practical good sense, which such an employment, followed from generation to generation, would tend to produce. But little is known of his mother. His father was a clergyman, who gradually rose to be chaplain of the court, professor in the university of Upsala, and superintendent of the Swedish churches in America, London, and Portugal. In 1719 the family of Bishop Swedberg was ennobled by Queen Ulrica Eleonora with the name of Swedenborg, which entitled the family to seats in the Swedish parliaments and to a seat in the cathedral. In 1710 Bishop Swedberg was summoned to assist him in his engineering works and in his mechanical inventions, and to give him a seat and a voice in the Royal Society. Bishop Swedberg was simple in his habits, direct in his action, and courageous to attack evil and error wherever he found it; in king or subject. He was a zealous reformer, a prolific writer, and constantly on the alert to correct abuses, and provide improved methods of instruction. He was a sturdy, devout, wise, practical man. Such was the parentage which had its influence in determining the mental and spiritual qualities of Swedenborg.

He was well educated. But little is known of his early life. The following account, written by himself, gives us a glimpse of the qualities and natural bent of his mind. "From my fourth to my tenth year," he says, "I was constantly occupied in thought upon God, salvation, and the spiritual experiences of men; and sometimes I revealed things at which my father and mother wondered, saying that angels must be speaking through me. From my sixth to my twelfth year I used to delight in conversing with clergymen about faith; saying that the life of faith is love, and that the love which imparts life is love to the neighbor, also that God gives faith to every one, but only those receive it who practise that love." Nurtured by such a love, and penetrated by the influences of a pure home and a cultivated society, by which his native endowment became imbued with pure and true principles of life, he spent his early years. These influences and principles formed the groundwork and best part of his education.

In 1709, at the age of twenty-one years, he graduated from the university of Upsala with the degree of doctor of philosophy. In the following year he set out on his travels, at that time an essential part of a young man's education. His mind had now taken a strong bent towards mathematics and the natural sciences, especially in astronomy and mathematics. But this was not an aimless desire, looking only to the gratification of his thirst for knowledge. He always, even in these early years, regarded knowledge as a means to a practical end. This was a dominant quality of his mind. He even turned his lodgings to use in gaining practical knowledge; living with a watchmaker for a time, afterwards with a cabinet-maker, and then with a mathematical-instrument maker, that he might learn from them arts which would be useful to him and to his country. But he did not let his thirst for knowledge absorb his whole thought and affection. When he found that his intense devotion to study prevented him from being as "sociable as is desirable and useful to him, and as his spirits were somewhat exhausted, he took refuge for a short time in poetry, that he might be somewhat refreshed by it, but with the intention of returning to his mathematical and physical studies. Although he was more discoveries than any one else in his age."

He now spent five years abroad; passing his time in London, Holland, Paris, and Germany. His mind was open to every phase of human life. He examined the customs, habits, and character of the people, and the influence of their institutions and industries upon them. He returned home with his mind enlarged and enriched with knowledge gained by observation, experience, and intercourse with learned men, and teeming with new inventions and plans for giving them a practical test.

In 1716, a year after his return from his travels, he was appointed by Charles XII., king of Sweden, assessor extraordinary in the College of Mines. This office gave him "a seat and a voice in the college, whenever he was present, and especially whenever any business was brought forward pertaining to mechanics;" though he was particularly directed in the royal commission "to attend Pollheimer, the councillor of commerce, and to be of assistance to him in his engineering works and in carrying out his designs." This appointment brought him for a time into personal relations... with the king, who was fond of mathematics, and to whom Swedenborg rendered great service by constructing machines by means of which two galleys, five large boats, and a sloop were conveyed overland a distance of fourteen miles.

Swedenborg now devoted himself entirely to the duties of his office. Though he did not require oversight of the practical workings of the mines so much as inquiry into the nature of the elements the miners dealt with. He began to study the nature of heat and the constitution of matter. In the pursuit of this purpose he made several visits abroad, examined the mines and the methods of working them in other countries, and gained knowledge from every source to which he could get access that would throw light upon the subjects he was investigating, and be of any practical value to his country. He continued in this office for more than thirty years, to the satisfaction of his countrymen and the scientists of his time, and being a welcome guest in the highest social circles; and, though absorbed in the great work which he believed had been committed to his hands, he did not forget the children and those who served with him. He was a sincere and devout Christian. Though living in a sceptical age, there is no evidence that he ever doubted the existence of a Supreme Being, and his direct control of human affairs: even his scientific works contain many devout acknowledgments of his dependence upon him for every faculty and every blessing of life. His nature was large, round, full, and complete. It is a significant fact, that at the present time, more than a century since his decease, his life and works, both scientific and religious, are receiving more attention than ever before. A brief statement of his theology can be found in the article on the New-Jerusalem Church.

Chalucky Gillis (New Church Minister).

Swift, Elisha Pope, O.O., b. at Williams- town, Mass., April 12, 1792; d. at Allegheny, Penn., 1865; grandson of Hon. Heman Swift, Revolutionary colonel, by fifth remove descended from John Eliot, "Apostle to the Indians;" converted at twenty; graduated from Williams Col- lege with a degree in 1813; studied theology at Princeton; licensed by New-Brunswick presbytery in 1816; ordained as foreign missionary, Sept. 3, 1817; preached and lectured for missions; no for- eign field opening, settled as pastor at Dover, Octo- ber, 1818, then at Pittsburgh, in Second Church, in 1819; during this pastorate served gratuitously in 1817-22 as professor in Western Theological Seminary; resigned in 1831 to become corres- ponding secretary of the Western Foreign Mis- sionary Society. From 1835 till his death he was pastor of First Church in Allegheny City.

Dr. Swift was in character consecrate, impres- sively devotional, humble, transparently sincere, careless of man's applause, and sedulous to please God; in mind, powerful, comprehensive, original; in preaching, massive and effective, a "Webster" in the pulpit; in public spirit, eminent; forward in educational zeal as a friend and a founder of the Western University and of the Western Theo- logical Seminary; as a presbyter, always a leader. He had the foresight to see the necessity of distinctive church-organization in giving the gospel to the world, the courage to plead for it in the face of opposition and misunderstanding, the mingled gentleness and force to secure the adoption and success of the principle with the least possible friction. The Western Missionary Society of 1831, an undertaking, under the circumstances, of moral sublimity, became, "as was intended at its very outset" [Dr. Swift], "the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church." Dr. Swift was the originator of the first, and is deservedly considered the father of the second. His compre- hension of missionary principles has never been surpassed; and his writings are standards still for fervor, intelligence, insight, and the glowing confi- dence of faith.

SWIFT, Sylvester F. Scovel. (SWITHWIN, SWITHUM), Bishop and patron of Winchester; d. July 2, 862. He was of noble birth, educated in the Old Monas- tery, Winchester, where, after his ordination (830), he was made provost, or dean. Egbert, king of the West Saxons, committed his son and success- or, Ethelwolf, to his care, and availed himself of his counsel's. Ethelwolf, on his accession, made him his minister, especially in ecclesiastical affairs, and in 852 procured his election to the see of Westminster. St. Swithin's Day is July 15; be- cause on that day, in 904, his relics were moved from the churchyard where he had been buried at his own request, so that his grave might be trodden on by passers by, to the Cathedral of Winchester. There is a saying, demonstrably erroneous, "If it rain on St. Swithin's Day, there will be rain, more or less, for forty succeeding days." See Butler: Lives of the Saints, July 15.

SWITZERLAND. I. Introduction of Chris- tianity, and Outline of Ecclesiastical Affairs to the Beginning of the Sixteenth Century.—In the middle of the third century Christianity was established in Geneva by Bishops Parakodus and Dionysius of Vienne. From Geneva the new reli- gion spread to Wallis, and then to other parts of the land, the way for it, very likely, prepared by Roman Christian soldiers; but its history is en- veloped in great darkness. By the sixth century this wave of Christianity, coming from France, had exhausted itself, and the Swiss church had been established, — Geneva, Sitten, Lausanne, Chur, and Constance. Then came Columban and the monks of St. Gall, and evangelization was given a fresh start. Christianity at length was everywhere embraced. It was, as elsewhere, Orient- al in type. Monasticism was its highest develop- ment. Monasteries kept on multiplying; yet they were, with the exception of St. Gall, so far from being centres of learning, that, in the four-teenth century, no member of the one in Zürich knew how to write. But in 1406 the first Swiss university (Basel) was founded, and at once a change for the better set in. A printing-press was set up, first at Beromünster (1470), and then at Basel and Geneva; and an abbot of Einsiedeln, Albert of Bonstetten, wrote a history of the Bur- gundian War, and described the Confederacy. The number of parishes and the might of the bishops had increased, likewise, very greatly, since in the eighth century, the most deep flight, and therein he accomplished his most remarkable work. He had the foresight to see the necessity of distinctive church-organization in giving the gospel to the world, the courage to plead for it in the face of opposition and misunderstanding, the organizing power to give it actual existence, and the mingled gentleness and force to secure the adoption and success of the principle with the least possible friction. The Western Missionary Society of 1831, an undertaking, under the circumstances, of moral sublimity, became, "as was intended at its very outset" [Dr. Swift], "the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church." Dr. Swift was the originator of the first, and is deservedly considered the father of the second. His compre- hension of missionary principles has never been surpassed; and his writings are standards still for fervor, intelligence, insight, and the glowing confi- dence of faith.
At the end of the fifteenth century there were increasing symptoms of the imminence of relief from the intolerable burden of ecclesiastical criminality. Nevertheless, the church everywhere exercised its wonted power over the majority of the people. The Waldenses had shown themselves in the cantons of Bern and Freiburg in 1509, but had quickly disappeared. The councils of Constance (1414–18) and Basel (1431–43) had only shaken the pillars of the Papacy, not broken them. The Swiss cities of Bern and Zürich received long indulgences in recognition of their fidelity to the Pope. No serious attempts were made by the clergy to stem the tide of wickedness. The pulpit was dumb. But the light of the rising sun of the new and better day was meanwhile gilding the snow-clad peaks of Switzerland.

II. The Period of the Reformation from 1519 till 1566. — In Switzerland as in Germany, the Reformation was carried through in consequence of the capacity of its leaders, the readiness of the people, and the favorable political situation. The Pope, for his own ends, had loosened the Swiss Confederacy; and this state of things wrought against the Papacy. The birthday of the Reformation for Switzerland is April 13, 1525, when in Zürich, under the guidance of Zwingli, who had since 1519 preached Reformed doctrine, the first Reformed Eucharist was celebrated. The next year the canton of Zürich was read out of the Confederacy for its heresy. But this act of arrogance stirred only the deeper the Swiss desire for liberty, and love for independence; and the effort to raise the religious question into a political one aborted. The Reformation before 1529 had carried the day in all the German cantons.

But this happy result had come about in no easy fashion. The Anabaptists had given no end of trouble. The six cantons — Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, Luzern, Freiburg, and Solothurn — were arrayed against the Protestant; and in May, 1529, Jacob Kaiser was for the Reformed faith burnt at the stake in Schwyz. [See R. Stähelin: Die ersten Märtyrer d. evang. Glaubens in der Schweiz, Heidelberg, 1893, 81 pp.] This event made an immense sensa- tion, and was deemed imminent. It was for a time averted; but in 1531 it broke out, and on Oct. 12 Zwingli fell, at the head of the Reformed combatants, in the defeat at Cappel. An humiliating treaty of peace was concluded Nov. 10, 1531; and the future of the Reformatio was black enough. On Nov. 29, 1531, Gcelampadius died. The Reformed cantons fell into mutual recriminations; the Anabaptists renewed their disturbances; the latent sympathy for the old religion dared express itself: but the Reformation did not fail. Bullinger appeared as the worthy successor of Zwingli, and Farel labored for the cause; and on Aug. 27, 1535, Geneva abolished the Papal power. In 1536 appeared John Calvin, whose energy made Geneva the metropolis of the Reformed Church: by his side were Viret and Beza. The first authorit-ative symbol of the Reformed Church of Switzerland was the Second Helvetic Confession (1536), the work of Bullinger; and with its promulgation closes the period of the Swiss Reformation. See arts. Calvin, Farel, Reformation (pp. 2007, 2009), Zwingli, Switzerland.

III. The Period from 1566 to the Present. — The conflict between Protestants and Roman Catholics, which in Germany lasted until 1548 (the Peace of Westphalia), in Switzerland terminated only in 1712 (the second battle of Vilm- ergen). The Catholic re-action in the second half of the sixteenth century found its leader in Carlo Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, who introduced into Switzerland the Capuchins and Jesuits, and founded the two colleges— in the first a nunciature in Switzerland, and in 1558 entered into a plan to overthrow the Reformation there altogether. At length the two Confessions met in a decisive battle at Vilmersen, the result of which was a permanent peace.

The great men on the Protestant side who in this period carried on the Reformation, were such as Bullinger, Peter Martyr Vermigl, Heidegger, the two Hottingers, the Buxtorsk, Wolfgang Mus- culus, Diodati, Spanheim, and Turretin. The Helvetic Consensus Formula of 1575, with its Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, and its Bux- torfian doctrine of the inspiration of vowels and points, is the symbol of the performance of this period; but after 1729 it ceased to have any authority.

The nineteenth century brought an awakening of religious activity. Fresh troubles, however, broke out. In 1839 the call of David Friedrich Strauss to the university of Zürich led to a re- volution. In 1848, on the departure of Switzerland from the Helvetic Union, similar fate because the radicals arose against the call of Jesuits to teach theology in Luzern. It was really, however, a protest of the ungody against the progress of evangelical truth. In November, 1845, the Vaudese clergy left the Established Church, and formed the Free Church of the Vaud canton. (See VAUD, FREE CHURCH OF.) In the Roman-Catholic cantons, Ultramontanism grew up in 1845. It was only after a severe blow from the Vaudese revolution. In 1847–48 the Sonderbund, or union of the Roman-Catholic cantons of Switzerland, vigorously opposed the reorganization of the Diet in the interests of progress; but it was worsted, and the old regulation which forbade the establishment of Reformed congregations in Roman-Catholic cantons, and vice versa, was abrogated. Thus the defeat at Cappel was avenged.

HERZOG.

IV. THE PRESENT RELIGIOUS CONDITION OF SWITZERLAND.—According to the census of Dec. 1, 1880 (reprinted in Appletons' Annual Cyclopaedia for 1881, 2 vols.) the population of Switzerland was 2,846,109, of which 1,667,109 were Protestants (Reformed Church, 1,160,782 Roman Catholics, 10,838 of minor Christian sects, and 7,373 were Jews. Three cantons (Zurich, Vaud, Schaffhausen) and a half-canton (Appenzell Rhotes ext.) are Protestant; six cantons (Zug, Luzern, Schwyz, Uri, Taucino, and three half-cantons (Appenzell Rhotes int., Unterwalden-Obwalden, Unterwalden-Nidwalden) are Roman-Catholic; and ten cantons (Neuchatel, Bern, Glarus, Thurgau, Grisons, Aargau, Geneva, St. Gallen, Freiburg, Solothurn) and two half-cantons (Bale-ville, Balecamp) are mixed. The Protestants belong almost entirely to the National Reformed Church of their canton. There are, however, Free Churches in Geneva, Vaud, and Neuchatel. The Lutheran Church has only a single congregation, at Geneva. Uri is the only canton in which there is no Protestant congregation. In German Switzerland are the three Protestant faculties of Basle, Bern, and Zurich; in French Switzerland, three National and three Free, —in Lausanne, Geneva, and Neuchatel respectively.

The Roman-Catholic Church in Switzerland is divided into five dioceses,—Basel-Solothurn, Coire, St. Gallen, Lausanne-Freiburg, and Sion. The Roman-Catholic clergy are very numerous. Roman-Catholic parishes exist in every canton.

The opponents to ultramontanism, as shown in the infallibility dogma, have since 1871 formed the “Christian Catholic” Church, which has one bishop, whose diocese embraces all Switzerland, and a theological faculty at Bern. They were excommunicated by the Pope. Their first bishop, Dr. Herzog (formerly a priest at Olten) was consecrated by the Old-Catholic bishop of Germany (Dr. Reinken) in 1876. Their number in 1877 amounted to about 70,000. See OLD-CATHOLICS.

The duties of church-life are regulated for each canton by local authority; but the federal constitution of April 18, 1874, lays down certain general principles, to which all the cantons are required to conform. Absolute liberty of conscience is secured to all. Parents and guardians have the sole right of regulating the religious instruction of children less than sixteen years old. No one is required to pay taxes raised for the support of a church to which he does not belong. Free exercise of religion is guaranteed to all, within the limits compatible with order and morality. The cantons are authorized to take measures necessary to maintain peace between the different confessions, or to repress any ecclesiastical or political dissatisfaction, which are absolutely forbidden to enter any canton, on the ground that such orders threaten the peace of the state. The founding of new convents and religious orders is forbidden.

SYLLABUS, the Papal, is an index or catalogue, of all heresies condemned by Pope Pius IX, Dec. 8, 1864, on the basis of several encyclical letters issued by the same pontiff during his long reign. Its full title is, A Syllabus containing the Principal Errors of our Times, which are noted in the Consistorial Allocutions, in the Encyclicals, and in other Apostolical Letters of our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX. It was probably suggested by the work of Epiphanius against the eighty heresies of the first three centuries, which are mostly of a Gnostic character. The Papal document is purely negative, but indirectly it teaches and enjoins the very opposite of what it condemns as error. It is divided into ten sections. The first condemns pantheism, naturalism, and absolute rationalism; the second, moderate rationalism; the third, indifferentism and latitudinarianism; the fourth, socialism, communism, secret societies, Bible societies, and other "pests of this description;" the fifth, errors concerning the Church and her rights; the sixth, errors concerning civil society; the seventh, errors of natural and Christian ethics; the eighth, errors concerning Christian marriage; the ninth, errors concerning the temporal power of the Pope; the tenth, errors of modern liberalism. Among the errors condemned are the principles of civil and religious instruction from Church and State. The Syllabus indirectly asserts the infallibility of the Pope, the exclusive right of Romanism to recognition by the civil government, the unlawfulness of all non-Catholic religions, the complete independence of the Papal hierarchy, the power of the Roman Church to coerce and enforce, and its supreme control over public education, science, and literature.

It will be seen that the Syllabus condemns many errors which are likewise rejected by all good Protestants. At the same time it condemns, also, important truths. It re-asserts all the extravagant claims infallibility and supreme authority of 1870 made in all ex-cathedra or official utterances of the Pope on matters of faith and discipline infallible. It acts backwards as well as forwards: otherwise it would be null and void (Si falsus in mm, falsus in omnibus). The Syllabus is certainly an official document, addressed to all the bishops of the Catholic world, and sent to them with a Papal encyclical. And herein lies its importance and danger. As a personal manifesto of the Pope, it would be comparatively harmless and unheeded outside of the Roman communion; but clothed with infallible authority, and followed by the decrees of the Vatican Council, it provoked and stimulated the so-called "Kulturkampf" in Germany, a pamphlet war in England about its bearing on civil and political allegiance, and led to serious conflicts between Church and State in Italy, Austria, Prussia, France, Belgium, and Brazil. Where Church and State are united, there must be collision when both claim sovereignty, and the one claims infallible authority in addition. Even in the United States, where the government has nothing to do with the Church, the influence of the Syllabus is felt in the legislation on marriage and in public education, both of which have a religious and in some cases a sacred character. The State claims and exercises the right and duty of educating the people for intelligent and useful citizenship; while the Syllabus condemns all public education which is not controlled by the teaching of the Roman Church, and stimulates the efforts of the priesthood to Romanize or to break up the public schools, or, where neither can be done from want of power, to neutralize them by parochial schools in which the doctrines and principles of Trent and the Vatican are inculcated upon the rising generation. Time must show what will be the ultimate issue of this irrepressible conflict.

The three tracts of Gladstone were also published together in one volume under the title, Rome and the Vatican, and it is a declaration of war against modern civilization and progress. It is a glaring anachronism.

What authority attaches to this document? Cardinal Newman, in his defence of the Syllabus against Gladstone's attack, virtually denied its dogmatic force, saying (Letter to the Duke of Norfolk, p. 108), "We can no more accept the Syllabus as de rite, as a dogmatic document, than any other index or table of contents." But the Syllabus is more than a mere index, and contains as many definitions and judgments as titles. Moreover, the Papal infallibility decree of 1870 makes all ex-cathedra or official utterances of the Pope on matters of faith and discipline infallible. SYMBOL (συμβόλον, symbolon, literally, that which is thrown together) is properly a mark, badge, watchword. It was first used in a theological sense by Cyprian, in his Epistle Ad Magnum (Ep. 76 or 69), in the year 250, but since the fourth century very generally. Originally it had reference to the Apostles' Creed as the baptismal confession, as a military watchword, distinguishing Christians from all non-Christians, since they were regarded as soldiers of Christ. Luther and Melanchthon first applied the word to Protestant creeds. Symbolical books are the symbols themselves. For a discussion of the nature of creeds and their distribution, see art. Creed.

SYMBOLICS treats of the origin, history, and contents of the various creeds of Christendom. It is comparative dogmatics. It was formerly known under the name of "Polemics," and "Controversial Theology," but is now treated in a more historical and irenic spirit. In this modern form it may be said to have begun with Marheineke, who in 1810 published his Symbolik. Modern form it may be said to have begun with Marheineke, who in 1810 published his Symbolik. He was followed by Winer, with a comparative presentation of different authorized creeds (1824). Since his day much study has been given to the origin of different creeds, particularly to those of prime importance, e.g., the Apostles', the Nicene, the Athanasian; and much light has been thrown upon the subject. The teachings of the Roman Catholic Moller, in his Symbolik (1833), upon the contrasts between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, were met by Baur, Nitzsch, and other Protestants. Among the most eminent scholars in this department may be mentioned Swainson, Lumby, Caspari, and Schaff. See the Literature in the Creeds (N.Y., 1878, 3 vols.) by the last-named. Recent works in this department of study are G. F. OEHLER: Lehrbuch d. Symbolik, Tubingen, 1876; K. H. G. SCHEELE: Theologisk Symbolik, Upsala, 1879 sqq., German translation, Gotha, 1880-81, 3 vols.; B. WENDT: Symbolik der römisch-katholischen Kirche, Gotha, 1886.

SYMMACHIANS was the name of a sect which lived in Rome, and taught that the human body was created, not by God, but by the Devil, and was consequently to be misused in every way possible. The origin of the sect is doubtful,—whether founded by that Symmachus who translated the Old Testament into Greek, or by some other Symmachus. In the time of Augustine it was rapidly disappearing. See Contra Crescensium, i. 31; see also PHILOSTRIUS: De Haresibus ed. Fabricius, Hamburg, 1721. NEUDECKER.

SYMMACHUS, Pope, 408-514. After the death of Anastatius II., a double election took place; the popular party in Rome electing the deacon Symmachus, the imperial the archpriest Laurentius. Theoderic, the king of the Ostrogoths, was called in as umpire, and decided in favor of Symmachus; but it was several years before Laurentius finally yielded. At the synods of Rome (in 502, 503, and 504), Symmachus introduced various measures, limiting the participation of the laity in the Papal election and in the administration of the property of the Papal see; so, on the whole, his government tended towards the consolidation of the Papal power. NEUDECKER.

SYMPHORIANUS, a Gallic martyr from the reign of Aurelian; d. probably in 250. He was a native of Autun (Augustodunum), and is described as a youth of distinguished appearance and excellent education. Having refused to do homage to the statue of Berecynthia (Cybele), he was carried before the prefect Heraclus; and as he continued repeating, "I am a Christian," and absolutely refused to make any concessions to the demands of the prefect, he was decapitated. He is commemorated on Aug. 22. See Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 22, and RUINART: Acta prim. martyr. GASS.

SYMPHOROSA, a Christian widow, whose husband, a tribune, had suffered martyrdom. She was summoned before the Emperor Hadrian, and commanded to sacrifice, and partake in the Pagan solemnities at the consecration of the new imperial palace at Tibur. As she refused, she and her seven sons were cruelly tortured and killed. They are commemorated on July 18. See Acta Sanctorum, July 18, and RUINART: Acta primorums martyr., who accepts the story as true, though it does not harmonize with what is else known of Hadrian. GASS.

SYNAGOGUE, the Great, according to Jewish tradition, denotes the council first appointed, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, to reorganize the religious life, institutions, and literature of the people. Ezra, if he was not the originator of that council, certainly was its president. [Comp., against this view, Graetz, in Frankel's Monatschrift, Leipzig, 1867, etc., pp. 31 sq., 61 sq.] This council consisted of a hundred and twenty men, who were not contemporaneous, but who are to be regarded as transmitters of tradition from Moses and Joshua down to the time of Simon the Just (q.v.), who, according to Pirke Aboth (i. 1), was the last surviving member. As to the work of the Great Synagogue, see the art. Canon and Bible-Text (of the Old Testament), and Vetus. The existence of the Great Synagogue was first questioned by Richard Simon: Hist. Crit. du Vieux Test., lib. i. cap. viii.; then by Jacob Alting, who was followed by Rau: Diatribe de Synag. Magna [Traj. ad Rhein., 1726], pp. 42 sq.; Aurivillius: De Synag. vulgo dicta Magna [ed. J. D. Michaelis, Göttingen, 1790]. De Wette, and others, who rejected it as one of the inventions of tradition, because it is not mentioned by Josephus, Philo, or the Seder Olam, and because the earliest record of it is in the tract of the Mishna entitled Pirke Aboth, which belongs to the second century of our era. On the other hand, scholars like Eichhorn (Einleitung, i. § 5), Bertholdt (Einleitung, i. p. 66 sqq.), Ewald (Gesch. Israel's, ii. 192), Jost (Geschichte der Israeliten, iii. pp. 43 sq.), Zunz (Gottesdienstl. Vorträge, p. 33), maintain that there is much historical truth underlying the tradition of a body of men, who, between the time when prophecy was about to die out and the Greek period, were leaders among the Jewish people, transmitted tradition, and made such provision for the spiritual welfare of the people, that the law of God again permeated their life. But the name "Great Synagogue" was probably first adopted some centuries later. Whether there were really a hundred and twenty men or not is difficult to say. We must not, however, identify the Great Synagogue with... the Great Sanhedrin (q.v.), or take it as its original form, as does Schickard (De jure reg. Hebr., i. part 2), Witsius (Misc. diss. de synedr., § 29), J. Braun (Sel. Sac., Amst., 1700, p. 505), Sachs, Herzfeld, Heidenheim.

SYNAGOGUES OF THE JEWS. I. NAME, ORIGIN, AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SYNAGOGUE. — Synagogue (Greek, synagoge') is the name of those religious assemblages which, during the post-exilic period, existed first side by side with the sacrificial service in the temple, and which, after its existence, were substituted for it. Metonymically, synagogues denote also "places of assembly." After Israel had lost, not only its national independence, but also its national sanctuary, the Jews were anxious to preserve the unity in faith, doctrine, and life. To achieve this, regular assemblies were inaugurated on certain days, in the different places of Palestine where Jews lived, and where men of learning expounded the law. Thus, in all places where a certain number of Jews lived, synagogues were called into existence, which afterwards became the only bearers and banner of their nationality. According to Jewish law, wherever ten Jews lived, a house of assembly was to be erected. At the time of Jesus, not only each city in Palestine, but also the cities of the diaspora, had each at least one synagogue. Of the many synagogues which were at Jerusalem, the temple synagogue was the most famous.

II. INTERNAL ARRANGEMENT, WORSHIP, ETC., OF THE SYNAGOGUE. I. The Building. — Taking the temple as the prototype, and following the tradition, Prov. i. 22-27; Jer. vi. 26, and Ex. i. 9 ("to set up"), taken to mean that the voice of prayer is to be raised on heights, the Jewish canons decreed that synagogues are to be built upon the most elevated ground in the neighborhood, and that no house is to be allowed to overtop them. Failing of a commanding site, a tall pole rose from the roof to render it conspicuous. The building was commonly erected at the cost of the district: sometimes it was built by a rich Jew, or even, as in Luke vii. 5, by a friendly proselyte. The river-side outside the city was also deemed a suitable spot for building the synagogue. In Jerusalem, on the slope of the city, the people could worship God without distraction, and at the same time have the use of pure water for immersions and other religious exercises. Often synagogues were erected near the tombs of famous rabbins or holy men. The congregation was divided — men on one side, women on the other — six feet high, running between them (Philo: De Vita Contempl., i. 476). In modern synagogues the separation is made more complete by placing the women in low side-galleries, screened off by lattice-work (Leo Mutin: De cerem. Jud., 10, 4). When the building was finished, it was set apart, as the temple had been, by a special prayer of dedication. From that time it had a consecrated character. No one was to pass through it as a short cut. Even if it ceased to be used, the building was not to be turned for any purpose, might not be turned, e.g., into a bath, a laundry, or a tannery. A scraper stood outside the door, that men might rid themselves, before they entered, of any thing that would be defiling.

2. Furniture. — In oldest times the people probably stood in the synagogue (Neh. vii. 5, 7), or sat upon the floor. But there were also armchairs, or seats of honor, for the elders of the synagogue, the doctors of the law, etc. (Matt. xxiii. 2, 6; Mark xvi. 39; Luke xi. 43; Jas. ii. 2, 3). They were placed in front of the ark containing the law, or at the Jerusalem end; and there distinguished persons sat with their faces to the ark while the congregation stood facing both these honorable ones and the ark. Besides the rostrum or platform, capable of containing several persons (Neh. viii. 4, ix. 4), there was a reading-desk, on which the sacred scrolls were laid. These scrolls were wrapped in linen or silk wrappers, often adorned with letters or other ornaments of gold and silver, and were kept in the wooden chest, or ark, or sanctuary. In some synagogues there was also a second chest for the rolls of the prophets, and where damaged rolls were preserved. There were, moreover, a perpetual light, and lamps brought by the people, which were lighted at the beginning of the sabbath, i.e., on Friday evening. To the furniture also belonged alms-boxes at or near the door, also notice-boards, on which were written the names of offenders who had been put out of the synagogue.

3. Times of Worship. — Besides on sabbaths and festivals, the people also met on Monday and Thursday, which were the two market-days in the week.

4. Liturgy, or Order of Service. — (1) The prayers which took the place of the daily sacrifices were offered up also at those hours when the temple sacrifices were made. On sabbath and festival days additional sacrifices were offered besides the usual, so, likewise, additional prayers were added to the regular ones. The main part of the daily service was the Shema and the eighteen benedictions. The prayer was followed on the sabbath and festivals by (2) the reading of the section of the law, which was originally divided in a hundred and fifty-four sections, or parashiyoth. After the section of the law (3), a section from the prophets, or Haftarah, was read; then came (4) the homily, exposition, or derasha. The service closed (5) with the benediction, to which the congregation replied "Amen." III. OFFICERS OF THE SYNAGOGUE. — The synagogues were governed by the elders (Luke vii. 3), who were presided over by the ruler of the synagogue (Matt. ix. 18; Mark v. 35; John vii. 48; Luke vii. 41; Acts xiii. 15), and constituted the local Sanhedrin. To give unity and harmony to the worship of the people, they went up before the ark to conduct divine service. He was called shaliach zibar, i.e., the legate of the congregation. There was also the chazzan, or sexton of the syna.

gogue, who had the care of the furniture, to open the doors, to clean the synagoge, to light the lamps, and to superintend the alter, corresponding to the seven deacons (Acts vi. 1 sq.); and they had to be "men of honesty, wisdom, justice, and have the confidence of the people." We must also mention the Ten Ballatam [or "Men of Leisure"], who were independent of business, being "men of wealth" whom "the congregations are standing to be present at all services, so that there might be no delay in beginning the service at the proper hours.

Syn cellulus (one who shares his cell with another) denotes, generally, the visitant of one of the higher ecclesiastical officers. The Patriarch of Constantinople had several synccellci, of whom the first (protosynccellus) at one time even ranked before the metropolitans. Synccelluli were also known in the West.

Syncretism is a word of Greek origin, though of rare occurrence in ancient literature, referring to a saying about the Cretians, — that they were very much disposed to wage war against each other, but immediately made peace, and joined hands, when attacked by foreigners. It was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see his letter of April 22, 1519, to Melanchthon), and was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see his letter of April 22, 1519, to Melanchthon), and became quite commonly used by the Reformers, denoting, not exactly a compromise between different tenets, but a union on the basis of such tenets as were common to both parties. (See Zwingli: Opp., ed. Schuler and Schultheess, vili. p. 360, and Butzer's letter to Zwingli of Feb. 6, 1581.) At first it was indifferently used, both in a good and in a bad sense; but in the course of the sixteenth century the Roman Catholics, who wished to suppress Protestantism, but not to compromise with it, and who feared more than any thing an agreement between the Lutherans and the Reformers, now giving the word syncretism, "a syncretist," the meaning of a religiu-smonger; and that sense the word afterwards retained. During the seventeenth century its compass became somewhat circumscribed. First, all attempts at union between Roman Catholics and Protestants, then all attempts at union between Lutherans and Reformed, were excluded; and finally the word came to designate simply a principle within the pale of Lutheran theology, the principle of moderation, expansion, development, in opposition to the principle of a stiff and stationary orthodoxy.

Throughout the whole period of the Reformation two opposite tendencies are discernible: one starting from the axiom that all truth is one, and consequently condemning toleration of different opinions as laxity; and the other moving along upon the contrary path, and consequently striving after reconciliation and harmony. In the middle of the seventeenth century those two tendencies clashed against each other; and the result was a sharp and bitter literary contest, known as the "Syncretistic Controversy." The situation is very vividly characterized by the decrees of the synod of Charenton (1631) and the criticism which those decrees called forth. Some French-Reformed congregations asked the synod whether Lutherans living among them could be baptized, married, admitted to the Lord's Supper, etc., in their churches, without first abjuring their specifically Lutheran tenets; and the synod answered in the affirmative. Then the Roman Catholics raised a huge cry, stigmatizing such indifferenceto religious divergences as mere atheism. (See Francis Véron: Méthodes de traiter des controverses de religion, 1638.) The controversy proper, however, began a little later, and was carried on in another field. It broke out at the Colloquy of Thorn (1845), and raged till the death of Calixtus (1656). Renewed by the Colloquies of Cassel and Berlin (1861), it went on till the secular governments commanded silence (1869); and once more it finally burst forth during the last years of Calovius' life (1875-86).

Considering the reciprocal hatred between the Lutherans and the Reformed among his subjects as a national calamity, King Ladislaus IV. of Poland arranged a religious disputation between the two parties at Thorn in 1645. As delegates from the evangelical churches of Germany were also invited, intrigues immediately began. The Saxon theologians, representatives of the strictest orthodoxy, were eager to prevent any theologian of the Helmstädt school, whose tendency was syncretistic, from being sent as a delegate to the colloquy; and they succeeded. So, though Calixtus, the head of the school, was elected for Danzig, they managed to have the election cancelled. He was present, however, at Thorn; and he was seen to converse freely with the Reformed theologians, even to walk along with them in the streets, and to visit them in their lodgings. Such a scandal could not, of course, be tolerated. The colloquy over, and no result arrived at, the Saxon theologians issued a memoir (Dec. 20, 1846), in which they accused the Helmstädt theologians of undermining the Lutheran Church by their novelties. Calixtus answered (Feb. 28, 1847), characterizing the accusation as an infamous calumny. The Saxons again, even the most insignificant, deviation of Calixtus from the traditional Lutheran system, and made the most possible out of it, shrewdly calculating, that, if they could prove him to be unsound, the inference would be irresistible that his moderation towards the Reformed was pernicious. They sent a hail-storm of attacks down upon him, — little tracts, and heavy quartos of sixteen hundred pages, Latin and German (Hülsemann: Dialysis apologetica problemata Calixtini, etc., 1849, Judiciae de Calixtino desiderio, etc., 1650, Calixtini Gewissenswurm, 1654; Calovius: Consideratio nova theologiae Helm, etc., 1649, Syncretismus Calixtini, 1653). But Calixtus was prompt in answering (De questionibus, etc., 1649; Appendix, 1850; Verantwortungen, 1851). Political passions and the controversy of the time were the occasion of the syncretism. Jealous of Brandenburg and the Palatinate, the supports of the Reformed Church in Germany and of syncretism in German theology, the elector of Saxony attempted to deal the Reformed Church in Germany a deadly blow by preventing the Peace of Westphalia from placing it on an equal footing with the Lutheran Church. He failed. As head of the Corpus Evangelicum, he then sent an admonitory letter to the three princes who maintained the university of Helmstadt, but received a very sharp answer. Finally the Saxon theologians summed up their complaints against the syncretists in their great heretical propositions culled from his writings, and a new shower of polemics burst over him. In one year (1655) Calovius published Harmonia Calixtina-haeretica (twelve hundred pages in quarto), Systema locorum (two heavy volumes in octavo), and Fides veterum. The death of Calixtus, however, brought about a kind of armistice.

In order to establish a more satisfactory modus vivendi between the Lutheran and Reformed subjects, the landgrave of Hesse invited two professors from the Reformed faculty of Marburg, and two from the Lutheran faculty of Rinteln, to a colloquy at Cassel, July 1-9, 1661. The colloquy proved a success. The Brevis relatio which was issued at its close, though it nowhere confesses from the Reformed faculty of Marburg, or pseudonymously. His principal work from this period is his Historia syncretistica, which appeared in 1682, without name, or place, or date. It was not confiscated; but its sale was prohibited, and that measure seems to have made a very deep impression on him. HENKE.

SYNERGISM is a sublimated type of Semi-Pelagianism, and had for its representatives Erasmus, and specially Melanchthon and his school. Protestant theologians in its furtherance, and the strictest Augustinianism. Luther taught that salvation is concerned, man is like a pillar of salt, like Lot's wife, yea, like a clod and stone, a dead picture, using neither mouth nor eyes, mind nor heart." Conversion is solely the act of divine grace. Melanchthon held to this view at first. In his Locii of 1621 he speaks of the will as des-

Jena; but a new duke ascended the throne, 1567, and they retired. Wiggand, Coelastin, Hesselius, and Kirchner were substituted for them, all Flacians. The duke had the so-called corpere doctrine. Thuringia put together, abandoned to which not the least spark (ne scintillula quadam) of spiritual power remained to man after the fall. The human will is absolutely incompetent to good, as stone. It only has a passive capacity to be converted by divine grace. Conversion is nothing less than 'resurrection from spiritual death." The Formula of Concord followed, and by its declaration about the will, which pleased the Flacians, closed the controversy. Syneusius, b. about 375, at Cyrene, the capital of the Libyan Pentapolis; studied philosophy and rhetoric in Alexandria, and became a passionate disciple of Stoicism. He died in 407 or 408 before the age of fifty, at the head of an embassy which Cyrene sent to Constantinople, and on that occasion he delivered before the Emperor Arcadius his celebrated speech, On Kingship (edited by Krabinger, Greek and German, Munich, 1825). He stayed two years in Constantinople, but returned home in 406, thoroughly disgusted with the state of affairs, of which he had given a description, Aiy-en (edited by Krabinger, Greek and German, Salzburg, 1835). For several years he staid on his estates, occupied with agriculture and the chase, studying philosophy and writing hymns, Neo-Platonic and pensive; in short, leading a life of ease and refined elegance. In 409 or 410 the people of Ptolemais elected him — the Pagan philosopher, a married man — their bishop; and after some hesitation he accepted. Materials for the explanation of this singular fact are found in a letter he wrote to Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, and became a passionata. He speaks of the Christian priesthood with the greatest reverence. He considers it as something divine; and in order to obtain it he declares himself willing to give up his fields, his garden, the chase, all his amusements. But he will not give up his wife, and he cannot give up his philosophical ideas. Theophilus, though at times a most stubborn and vindictive adherent of strict orthodoxy, gave his consent; and Synesius was consecrated. Very soon, however, after entering upon his office, he came into conflict with the prefect of the province, Andronicus. It seems that the church was liable to misuse its right of asylum; and it seems that Andronicus fell into the opposite extreme, trying to cancel the right altogether. Synesius finally excommunicated him, and the speech he delivered on that occasion is still extant. It gives a very vivid picture of the dreary and unhappy life he led, unable to do anything, and exasperated by his old friends; and new calamities — the invasion of the barbarians, the loss of his children, etc. — made it still worse. He seems to have died in 414, at all events before the cruel death of Hypatia in 415 or 416. His collected works first appeared at Liege, 1612, and again in 1633.
SYRIA.

In the middle of the tenth century it was taken by the Fatimite dynasty of Egypt; and toward the close of the eleventh century, Syria was invaded by the Seljukian Turks, and annexed to their empire.

The period of the Crusades continued from A.D. 1099 until A.D. 1291, when Acre was taken by the Mameluke Selim of Egypt.

For more than two centuries after this period Syria suffered from the fierce wars of the "Shepherd hordes of Tartary," and their brethren the Tartar Slav sovereigns of Egypt. In 1401 Timur the Tartar (Tamerlane) invaded the country, burnt Antioch, Emessa, Baalbek, and Damascus, and either massacred their inhabitants, or sold them into slavery.

In 1517 Syria and Palestine were conquered by the Ottoman Sultan, Selim I., and have continued under Turkish rule to this day, declining in wealth and prosperity until the people of the interior provinces sunk to the lowest point of intellectual and moral degradation.

In 1832 Ibrahim Pacha conquered Syria for his father, Mohammed Ali, but was expelled by the English in 1841, and Syria restored to the Porte.

II. THE LAND. — Syria and Palestine lie along the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, extending from Egypt and the Sinaitic desert on the south to the confines of Asia Minor on the north, and reaching from 31° to 36° 30' north latitude. The length of the country is 360 miles, and its breadth from 60 to 100 miles; its area being about 28,000 square miles.

A mountain chain, under different names, runs through the land from north to south, being intersected at different points, thus forming distinct ranges. From the wilderness north of Beerseba, the foot-hills rise to mountains about Hebron; and the broken, undulating range extends north-west to the headland of Carmel. North of the Carmel range lies the plain of Esdraelon, which extends through to the Jordan. Over this plain a railway route has just been surveyed.

North of Esdraelon the range continues broad and broken, to the deep ravine of the Litany, which runs almost parallel to the sea. Beyond the Litany rises the noble range of Lebanon, which runs a hundred miles to the north, varying in height from four thousand to eleven thousand feet, and breaking down north-east of Tripoli into a broad plain, which sweeps from the sea eastward to the Orontes at Hums and Hamath, forming the "entrance of Hamath," mentioned by Moses as the northern border of the land of Israel (Num. xxxiv. 8). North of this plain rises the Jebel el Ham, the southern spur of the Nusairiyeh range, anciently Barhyus Mons, which extends north, and terminates in the beautiful conical peak of Mount Casius at the mouth of the Orontes.

North of the Orontes the range is known as Gawar Dagh, the Amanus of Ptolemy, which extends north fifty miles to Mount Taurus.

The chain of Anti-Lebanon rises in the plain of Hamath, about twenty miles east of the northern end of Lebanon, and runs parallel to the latter, culminating in Mount Hermon, which has an elevation of about ten thousand feet. From Hermon the ridge breaks down into an irregular and lower range, which runs due south along the eastern bank of the Jordan and the Dead Sea to the mountains of Edom.

The political geography of Syria has changed with every change of dynasty for centuries. At present Syria and Palestine constitute one Welaïet, or pachalic, extending from Antioch to Gaza, which is styled the Pachalic of Damascu.

The province of Mount Lebanon was erected into a distinct pachalic after the massacres of 1860; the pacha being always a Latin Christian, and the next mutserrif was Rustem Pacha, an Italian by birth, a man of enlightened views and liberal education. The present pacha is Wassa Pacha, a Catholic Albanian. Under this régime, Lebanon has become, in proportion to its size, the most prosperous part of the Turkish Empire. Schools are encouraged, roads built, new land cultivated, and everywhere is security to life and property.

III. THE PEOPLE.—The population of Syria in 1881 was estimated at 2,076,500, as follows:

- Mohammedans, Sunnites, and Metawlieh: 1,000,000
- Nusairiyeh: 250,000
- Maronites: 250,000
- Orthodox Greeks: 235,000
- Papal sects: 80,000
- Jews: 30,000
- Ismaïliyeh Gypsies, etc.: 30,000
- Armenians: 20,000
- Jacobites: 15,000
- Druzes: 100,000
- Protestants: 6,300
- Bedawin Arabs: 60,000

Total: 2,076,500

The limits of this article forbid a detailed description of these sects; but of the more obscure it may be said, that the Druzes and Nusairiyeh are semi-Pagan; the Bedawin, nominally Muslim, but really ignorant and superstitious deists; the Maronites, devoted adherents of the Papacy; the Ismaïliyeh and Metawlieh, heretical Musulims: while the Greeks, Armenians, and Jacobites are Oriental Christians.

The bulk of the population in the cities is Mohammedan, excepting Beirut, of whose population of eighty thousand not more than one-third are Mohammedans.

The northern part of Lebanon is almost exclusively Maronite; the southern portion, south of the Damascus road, being chiefly Druze, with scattering villages of Greeks, Maronites, Muslims, and Metawlieh. In Palestine Proper the most of the villagers are Musulins, the Greeks and Papal Greeks being dispersed in Northern Palestine and on the plain of Sharon.

IV. THE NATIVE ORIENTAL CHURCHES are the Orthodox Greek, the Maronite, the Papal Greek, the Jacobite, Armenian, and Papal Armenian.

The Greeks are supposed to number about two hundred and thirty-five thousand. They are Syrians by birth and descent, and speak only the Arabic language. The doctrines and ritual are the same as in Greece and Russia. They differ from the Roman Church in the following points: (1) the calendar, (2) the procession of the Holy Spirit, (3) the use of pictures and the exclusion of images from sacred buildings, (4) the rejection of purgatory, (5) communion in both kinds, (6) the marriage of the secular clergy.

The church is divided into the patriarchates of Antioch and Jerusalem, which, though nominally independent, are really under the control of the Primate of Constantinople.

The Patriarch of Antioch governs the bishoprics of Beirut, Tripoli, Akkar, Ladaktyeh, Hamah, Homs, Saidnaya, and Tyre. The patriarchate of Jerusalem includes Palestine and Persia, and has under it the bishoprics of Nazareth, Akka, Lydda, Gaza, Sebaste, Nablus, Philadelphia, and Petra. Among these the Bishop of Akka is the only one who resides in his diocese: all the others live in the convent at Jerusalem.

The Greek Church allows the reading of the Scriptures by the people, and hence they have become more enlightened than any other of the Syrian sects.

The Syrians, or Jacobites, separated from the Oriental Church on account of the monophysite heresy. The Syrian language is used in the church services, although it is not understood by the people. Their head is the Patriarch of Mar' din. Their number is small, chiefly in Sudud, Kuryeit, Homs, Nebk, Damascus, and Aleppo.

They are poor and industrious, and receive the Scriptures without opposition.

The Maronites originated as monotheists in the seventh century, although Bishop Dibbs of Beirut has written laboriously and vainly to disprove their heretical origin. Their name was derived from a monk, John Maron, who died in 701. In 1150 they renounced monothelitism, and submitted to the Pope. They are devoted Romanists, and call their part of Lebanon the Holy Mountain.

Although adhering to the Pope, they still retain many of their former peculiarities. Their ecclesiastical language is Syriac. Their patron saint, Maron, is not found in the Roman calendar.

They have their own church establishment, and the people regard their Patriarch as not inferior to the Pope. Their secular clergy marry.

Their convents, numbering nearly 100, own the best estates in Lebanon, and support about 2,000 monks and nuns, with a revenue of not less than $350,000.

The people are independent, hardy, and industrious, but are left in gross ignorance, illiteracy, and superstition. Their clergy are educated at Ain Werka; and those trained in Rome are men of fair learning: but the mass of the priests are lamentably ignorant.

The Papal schismatic churches—the Papal Greek, Papal Syrian, and Papal Armenian—have sprung from the missionary efforts of Romish priests and Jesuits during the past two centuries.

The Papal Greeks retain the marriage of the clergy, their Arabic service, Oriental calendar, and communion in both kinds.

The Armenian population is confined to the vicinity of Antioch and Aleppo, speaking the Turkish and Armenian languages.

The Jews of Palestine are foreigners, numbering about fifteen thousand; having come from every country on earth, and living chiefly in Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, and Safed. But the Jews of Damascus, Aleppo, and Beirut, are natives, speaking the Arabic, and many of them possessed of great wealth.

V. MODERN PROTESTANT MISSIONS IN SYRIA.

Jerusalem and Beirut continued for years the two centres of American missionary labor, until 1843, when the American mission was withdrawn from Jerusalem, and confined to Syria Proper, leaving Palestine to the Church Missionary Society.

In 1871 the Syria mission of the American Board was transferred to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions of the United States, owing to the then recent re-union of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church.

The whole number of American missionaries laboring in Syria under these two boards from 1829 to 1883, is as follows: male missionaries, 56; female missionaries, 63; printers, 4; total, 122.

The missionaries were at first directed to attempt the reform of the Oriental churches, leaving the converts within the Oriental communions; but it soon became necessary to organize a distinct Oriental Evangelical Church.

The great work undertaken by the American Syria Mission, however, was not merely for the two millions in Syria, but, through the medium of the Arabic Scriptures and Christian Arabic literature, for the hundred and seventy-five millions of the Mohammedan world. The work of translating the Bible from the original tongues into Arabic was begun in 1848 by Dr. Eli Smith, who labored assiduously until his death, Jan. 11, 1857.

Only Genesis, Exodus, and the first sixteen chapters of Matthew had received his final revision; but he had revised and nearly prepared for publication the whole of the New Testament, and issued from the press in 1865. The entire Bible was completed, and sent forth to the world. Dr. Smith had prepared in 1837, with the aid of Mr. Homan Hallock, the punches of a new font of Arabic type, made from the best specimens of Arabic type, electrotyped in Beirut at the expense of the American Bible Society.

During the year 1882, 21,000,000 pages in Arabic were printed at the Beirut press, making 245,000,000 from the foundation of the press. The demand for the Beirut publications is greater in Egypt than in any other country. The Beirut press has an Arabic type foundery and electrotype apparatus.

Education is a prominent branch of the missionary work in Syria. The first missionaries found the people in a deplorable state of intellectual and moral ignorance. The only schools were the Muslim medresehs, attached to the mosques, and the clerical training-school of the Maronites in Ain Wurka, Mount Lebanon. Books were to be made for readers, and readers for books.

Drs. Thomson and Van Dyck founded a seminary for boys in Abeib in 1846, which was placed under the care of Mr. Calhoun in 1849, and continued in his care until 1876. It was the highest literary institution in Syria for years, until the founding of the Syrian Protestant College in Beirut.

This institution was incorporated by the Legislature of New York in 1863, and is under the control of a board of trustees residing there. The college began with a preparatory class in 1865, and the college proper opened in the fall of 1866. A medical class was formed in 1867. In the autumn of 1873 the present permanent buildings at Ras Beirut were occupied. The departments of the college are three, — preparatory, collegiate, and medical, including pharmaceutical. The language of the preparatory and collegiate departments is English; and, in the future, medical instruction will also be in English. The whole number of students in the college in the year 1882-83 was 168. The total number of graduates in pharmacy to the year 1892 was 9; medical, 70; collegiate, 74; total, 153.

Progress has been made in founding a library and scientific museums.

The mission has also three female seminaries, — in Beirut, Sidon, and Tripoli, — with about 100 boarders and 300 day pupils, and 118 common schools, with about 5,000 pupils. A theological seminary building adjoins the college, in which several members of the mission give instruction to candidates for the Christian ministry.
Fourteen native evangelical churches have been organized, of which four have native ordained pastors; and twenty-seven licensed preachers aid in the work of evangelization. The number of communicants is about 1,000, of whom 400 are women. Each church has Sunday schools containing about 4,000 scholars. The number of Protestant adherents is about 4,000.

Medical mission-work has received especial attention, both in hospital services and in medical practice among the poor in the interior towns and villages.

The American Bible Society and the American and London Religious Tract societies have given substantial aid in the printing and publishing work of the mission.

(b) The Irish Presbyterian Mission in Damascus was founded in 1843. The United Presbyterian Church of the United States soon entered upon the work, and continued to cooperate with it until a few years since, when the latter church concentrated its work upon Egypt. Rev. Messrs. Crawford and Phillips, with a corps of lady-teachers, now carry on the work, with 14 catechists, 7 preaching-stations, 110 communicants, and 430 pupils in their schools. Their work embraces Damascus and vicinity, and the eastern and southern parts of Anti-Lebanon.

(c) The Church of England Missions in Palestine have their center at Jerusalem, and embrace (1) the London Jews Society, with 8 foreign laborers, 8 native teachers, 80 communicants, and 2 schools with 104 pupils; (2) the Church Missionary Society, with 20 European laborers, 4 ordained natives, 37 catechists, 24 female teachers, 25 preaching-stations, 214 communicants, 45 schools with 1,142 pupils.

The Protestant bishopric of Jerusalem, founded by Frederick William IV. of Prussia, is supported half by Prussia and half by England. The first bishop was Dr. Michael S. Alexander; the second, Dr. Samuel Gobat; and the third, Dr. Barclay, who died in 1881. At present there is no incumbent. See JERUSALEM, EPISCOPAL SEE OF ST. JAMES IN.

The Church Missionary Society labor in Palestine proper as far north as Acre, and east of the Jordan.

(d) The German Evangelical Missions embrace (1) the German Deaconesses of Kaiserswerth, whose work comprises orphan-training, higher education, and hospital-nursing (they began labor in Sidon in 1860 after the massacres, then transferred their work to Beirut, where they have spacious premises, and are engaged in a work which is of the greatest value to the people of Syria. They have in Beirut 18 deaconesses, 6 native female assistants, and 240 pupils. They have also the care of nursing the indoor patients to the number of 500 in the Johanniter Hospital in Beirut. In Jerusalem four of the deaconesses act as nurses in the hospital, with about 700 indoor patients annually); (2) German chaplains in Beirut and Jerusalem, who preach to the German and French speaking Protestants; (3) The Jerusalem Verein of Berlin, which supports Dr. Reinieke at Jerusalem, and Mr. Muller at Bethlehem, whose work embraces 185 communicants, 8 schools with 296 pupils.

(e) The British Syrian Schools, founded by the late Mrs. J. Bowen Thompson, and now conducted by her sister, Mrs. A. Mentor Mott, are doing a great work for female education in Syria. They have schools in Beirut, Damascus, Baalbek, Tyre, Hasheiba, Bukfeyla, Mukhtara, Zahleh, and Ain Zeha. The schools contain about 12 catechists, 22 catechists, 75 female teachers, 24 Bible-women, and 30 schools with 2,878 girls and 452 boys; total, 3,330 pupils.

(f) The Free Church of Scotland has a mission in the Metn district of Mount Lebanon, in connection with the Lebanon schools' committee. This mission has 23 catechists, 7 female teachers, 35 communicants, 21 schools, and 882 pupils. Rev. W. Carslaw, M.D., labors in harmony and close connection with the American mission.

(g) The Society of Friends in England and America have a mission in Lebanon at Brummana, and also schools at Ramallah and vicinity in Palestine. Mr. Theophilus Waldemeier of the mission at Brummana was one of the captives in Abyssinia under King Theodore, and has labored industriously in founding the Boys' Industrial School, the Girls' Boarding-school, and the Hospital and Dispensary, together with various village schools. The society have 10 schools with 300 pupils.

Other societies besides those mentioned above are laboring in Syria and Palestine, the chief of which are the Church of Scotland Mission to the Jews, Miss Taylor's Muslim Girls' School, the Society for promoting Female Education in the East, the Reformed Presbyterian Mission in Latakiah, the Chishona Orphan-House Mission, Miss Arnot's School, the Mary Baldwin Memorial School, and Miss Mangan's Medical Mission (the last three at Jaffa).

The whole number of foreign laborers, male and female, in Syria and Palestine in 1881 was 191, with 581 native teachers and catechists, 26 churches, 140 preaching-stations, 1,700 communicants, 6,311 Protestant adherents, 302 schools with 14,624 pupils, of whom 7,475 were boys and 7,149 girls.

The medical missions are 12 in number, with 15 physicians, 24 nurses, 1,806 indoor-patients, and 73,432 outdoor-patients in polyclinique.

In addition to the Protestant educational institutions in Syria and Palestine, numerous schools have been opened by other sects, foreign and native; and the Turkish Government is urging upon the provincial governors the opening of medresehs for the Muslim children.

VI. THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC MISSIONS IN SYRIA AND PALESTINE may be said to date back to the Crusades, when the Latin priests made an attempt to convert the Oriental churches to Rome. But within the past two centuries their efforts, as stated above, have resulted in the founding of various affiliated churches, known as Greek-Catholic, Syrian-Catholic, Armenian-Catholic, etc. More recently the Jesuits, Franciscans, and Lazarists have set themselves to the work of caring for these native Catholic sects proselytizing the Oriental sects, and counteracting the influence of Protestant missions.

The Jesuits have a college in Beirut with 250 pupils, and other schools with 1,000 pupils. They have also a large printing-house, and have made, under Dr. Von Hamm, an Arabic translation of SYRIA.

The Franciscans have a monastery and church, the Capuchins, a church and schools, and the Lazarists, schools, in Beirut. The Lazarists also have a large boys' boarding-school at Ainture in Mount Lebanon.

The French institution of the Sœurs de Charité de St. Vincent de Paul embraces an orphanage of about 600 pupils, and a day-school and boarding-school.

The Dames de Nazareth have also erected a stately building east of the Damascus Road, and have about 180 pupils.

The most important of the native Catholic institutions are the Maronite Bishop Dibbs's college with 250 pupils, and the College Patriarchal de Beyrouth with 250 pupils, and the College Patriarchal of Beirut.

The most remarkable proof of a popular awakening on the subject of education is the opening of boys' and girls' schools by the Mohammedans in Beirut, Damascus, Tripoli, Sidon, Hums, and other places. They have erected neat school-edifices, fitted with seats and desks (the girls' schools with American sewing-machines); and in Beirut they now have 1,150 boys and 420 girls under instruction.

One of the great obstacles to the evangelization of the Mohammedans is the political-religious alliance between Islam and the State. This has increased the fanaticism of the Muslim masses. But contact with European influence, the growth of education, the reading of the Bible, the newspaper press, and the spread of a pure Christianity, are gradually lessening the minds of the Mohammedans. In 1880 the Muslims everywhere sympathized with the massacre of Christians. In 1882 the Muslims of Beirut formed a relief committee to aid the ten thousand Christian refugees who fled from the Muslim fanatical outbreak in Egypt.

Diplomacy can never regenerate the East. The patient work of education, the preaching of the gospel, the distribution of God's word among the masses, and the diffusion of Christian literature, will gradually disarm prejudice, awaken inquiry, promote social harmony, destroy polygamy, reform the Oriental churches, and bring the followers of Islam to the religion of Jesus Christ. Thus will the press, the church, and the school co-operate in hastening the true regeneration of that most interesting, and, until recently, so degraded land.

SYRIAC LITERATURE. The literature of the Syriac tongue is mostly biblical and ecclesiastical; the rest being historical, poetical, legendary, folk-lore, and translations (chiefly) from the Greek classics and Fathers. The extant Syriac literature (proper) begins with the second century A.D., and ends shortly after the Crusades; though works exist, related to the earlier, like the Latin of the middle ages to that of the classic period. The modern Syriac, easily acquired by a reader of ancient Syriac or of Arabic, has a literature of its own, both native, and fostered by the American and the Jesuit missionaries, and current from Mosul to Urml (Oromiah). For an account of this language and literature, see Dr. Justin Perkins's Eight Years in Persia, Andover, 1843; also a partial bibliography in the Introductory Remarks of Rev. D. T. Stoddard's Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language (in Journal of the American Oriental Society, also separately, New Haven, 1855); also Socin's Die Neu-Aramäischen Dialekte von Urml bis Mosul (autolithographic text, with German translation, Tübingen, Laupp, 1882); and Nöldeke's notice of the same in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 96, pp. 608 ff. The words of this dialect are incorporated into R. Payne Smith's Thesaurus Syriacus, vol. i. Oxon., 1879. The chief monument of this dialect is the Bible by Dr. Justin Perkins (Urml, New Testament, 1846; Old Testament, 1852), and, next, a manuscript lexicon, Syriac-English, compiled principally by Deacon Joseph, Dr. Perkins's assistant and translator. (See art. Perkins.) Other works are missionary literature, Protestant and Catholic, with a few native historical, poetical, and moral works.

A great portion of this literature is still extant only in manuscript.

Another dialect, called Turkse, is spoken in the Mesopotamian region of Tūr Ābdīn, a portion of which has been reduced to writing, and published by Eugen Prym and Albert Socin. For an account of this dialect, see Prym and Socin's Der Neu-Aramäische Dialekt von Tūr Ābdīn (Göttingen, Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 1881, 2 vols.), and art. by Socin in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 96, p. 826 ff. Neither the modern Syriac nor the Turkse has yet superseded the ancient Syriac in the church service-books, except among the Protestants.

The ancient Syriac literature might be treated under various divisions, but the most convenient is that of age. There are three distinct periods: I. From the second century to the Mohammedan conquest, A.D., 636; II. From the Mohammedan conquest to the decay of Syriac as a spoken language, A.D. 636-1318; III. From 1318 onward, when Arabic was established as the common vernacular, and writers wrote in other tongues, and some in Greek also. Throughout, the Syriac maintained itself as a beautiful and flexible language; easily receiving accessions from other tongues, abounding always in Grecisms and Greek words, till it even naturalized French and English words in the times of the Crusades, and later.

Period I., Second Century to A.D. 636.—Chiefly worthy of note are the Bible versions. First, doubtless, the Curetonian, dating, probably, from the second century, extant only in fragments of sixth-century manuscripts (found at the convent of Sta. Maria Dei ara, in the Nitrian Desert), named from the discoverer, and published by him (London, 1858); other fragments privately printed by W. Wright [London, 1872]. Second, the Peshitto, a revision of the Curetonian, perhaps, which probably assumed its present shape in the fourth century; a noble version, and the best monument of the ancient language. The New Testament lacks the Epistles, Second Peter, Second and Third John, and Jude, with the Apocalypse. Third, the Philoxenian, made by the chroesicipos Polycarp. A.D. 508, for Philoxenus, Bishop of Hierapolis (or Mabûg). This was based on the Peshitto. It is probably extant in those Epistles which are lacking in the Peshitto, but printed in the common editions of the Syriac New Testament, and in the Gospels it is probably most nearly represented by a manuscript belonging to the Syrian-Protestant College at Beirut, and brought to light by the present writer. (See Notes on the Beireizt Syriac Codex, in Jour. Soc. Bibl. Lit. and Exegezis, 1882, pp. 2 ff.) Fourth, the Harkensian, a recension of the Philoxenian, made by Thomas of Harkel, A.D. 616. The Gospels are extant in several manuscripts. The rest of the New Testament, except the Apocalypse, is extant in one manuscript. Fifth, contemporaneous with the Philoxenian, and almost a part of the same labor, is the Hexaplar version of sundry portions of the Old Testament, made by Paul of Tarsus. Sixth, the Jerusalem version, extant only in portions of an Evangelistary in the Vatican Library (published at Verona, 1861, by Conr. P. Miniscalchi Erizzo), and a few fragments published by Land in his Anecdoa (tom. iv., Lugd. Bat., 1875). A few other versions of portions (at least) of the Bible are extant only in scraps and quotations.

In this connection it is to be mentioned the Diasteaaron of Tatian the Assyrian, which was either originally composed in Syriac, or had its chief circulation in a Syriac version. The work itself is now lost; but a commentary thereon by Ephrem Syrus (fourth century) is extant in an Armenian translation (published with a Latin version at Venice, 1836; Latin version again, revised, Venice, 1876). Tatian's work dates about A.D. 155-170, and is the most important early witness to the general recognition of the four Gospels.

Other works of this early period were translations of: (i) the so-called Book of Revelation, of the Festal Letters of Athanasius (extant in one of the earliest known Syriac manuscripts, discovered by Cureton, and published by him at London, 1849), of portions of Eusebius, of Josephus, etc. The commentaries, and especially the hymns and homilies of Ephrem Syrus (fourth century, deacon of Edessa) have been hitherto as noted as any non-biblical Syriac remains. (The homily, in Syriac, is usually a sermon in verse, heptasyllabic, octosyllabic, or dodecaasyllabic.) Ephrem was inspired to sing by the earlier poetry of Bar Dasebes the Gnostic. Ephrem is the greatest name in early Syriac literature and saintliness, and many works of others have wrongly been attributed to him. His hymns and homilies are beautiful and poetic, but very didactic and dogmatic.

A throng of writers—homilists, chroniclers, and translators—belong to this period, many of whose works are lost, and many others extant only in manuscript, for a catalogue of whom reference is best had to Aug. Friedrich Pfeiffer's condensation of J. S. Assemani's Biblioth. Oriental., Erlangen, 1776. Of especial note are Joshua the Stylite, whose Chronicle (A.D. 507) was first published by W. Wright (Cambridge, 1882); Jacob, or James, of Sarûg, of whose works one of the most curious is the Homily on the Baptism of Constantine, published at Rome, 1892, with Italian translation and notes, by Arthur L. Frothingham, of great value for critical purposes. Then, after a long list of chroniclers followed, until we reach the important name of Dionysius Bar Saith, bishop of Amida (flor. circa A.D. 1154-71), whose Chronicle of Edessa (circa A.D. 550), containing a great wealth of church and secular history, was the literary home of the Syriac tongue, as Antioch of the Syrian Church.

The Syriac hymnology and liturgical literature of this period has been accomplished in great part by the enterprise of scholars of the present generation.

Period II., A.D. 636-1318. — During this period chroniclers and poets were more in fashion, and they have preserved many important matters of history that otherwise would have been lost. Lexicographers and grammarians also, with law-writers, scientific authors, collectors of proverbs and riddles, Palestinian or led in this period; although almost everyone was an ecclesiastical writer of some grade, or a monk.

Prominent is Dionysius of Tell Mahre, a Jacobite bishop and patriarch (flor. A.D. 750-845), established in power by the Caliph Abdallah. His Chronicle was written before he became bishop, or before A.D. 778; and in it he treated of historical subjects from the beginning of the world to about A.D. 755. His Chronicle incorporated, and preserved as well, the Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite above mentioned. A long list of chroniclers followed, until we reach the important name of Dionysius Bar Salibi, bishop of Amida (flor. circa A.D. 1154-71), whose commentaries, theological works, and liturgies are of great value for critical purposes. Then, after another swarm of writers, appears Gregory Bar-Hebraeus, called also Abu-l-Farag (Abulpharagius) (b. A.D. 1226). His Chronicle and commentaries are crowded with subjects of wide interest. He wrote Arabic, as well as Syriac. His works are quite voluminous, and among Syriac authors he ranks among the very first for utility and value, although of so late a date.
SYRIAC LITERATURE. 2287

A long list of writers on other topics might be named as belonging in this period, but we can stop to mention but one for his importance,—Jeshua (Jesus) Bar-Bahlul (circa A.D. 963), who published a lexicon of his tongue that is still extant. Several grammars of the period are extant, both in manuscript and in print.

To this period belong the Nestorian (a word which ought to be replaced by "Chaldean") writer, Ebed-Jesu, metropolitan of Soba and Armenia (d. 1318). His most noted and noteworthy book is his catalogue of the Sacred Scriptures and of patristic writings or writers, including many, if not most, of the known Greek and Syrian Fathers. This work, like that of Gregory Bar Hebræus, is among those indispensable to the biblical critic.

This period was one of great literary activity, as well as of life, throughout the Syriac-speaking peoples. Missions were extended eastward to the Pacific. It was in A.D. 791 that the famous Chinese-Syriac monument was set up, which records the planting of Christianity in China by the Syrian missionaries. Copies of this tablet, in facsimile, are in several of our libraries; and notices and translations appear in a long series of books in many languages, from Kircher (1631) to Doolittle and Williams. (See, e.g., Pfeiffer, ubi supra, pp. 493 ff.)

Period III., from A.D. 1318 onward. — The death of Ebed-Jesu marks the close of the classic period. After him there follows a very long and numerous series of writers of less note, among whom few, if any, could require particular mention. Their works are chiefly valuable to the bibliographer or in special limited investigations. As in earlier times, most of them were ecclesiastics.

Concerning the development of the language, the contrast between the Peshitto and the Har klensian versions appears very strong to one who reads only those specimens of the literature. Such a reader is apt to suppose that the Peshitto represents the pure Syriac, and the Har klensian a strong Greek element; but a more extended reading shows that the Har klensian bears also a later Syriac character, and that the Peshitto was already rather solemn and antiquated before the Philoxenian was made. The idiom of the Har klensian has much in common with the style of the secular writings, both those of earlier and those of later date than itself. As time went on, the Grecisms scarcely decreased, but the Arabicisms became more frequent. The secular language, also, is more flexible, and indulges more in complex syntactical structures.

Of the editions of the Bible in ancient Syriac, a critical edition of the Peshitto is still a desideratum. For the New Testament, the best editions are (for text) the ed. princeps of Widmanstadt (Vienna, 1658, now very rare) and the American editions (Urm, 1846, New York, 1874); of the Old Testament, the Urm edition of 1852. The Ambrosian Codex of the Old Testament, edited by A. M. Ceriani (Milan, 1876, etc.), is the oldest Old-Testament manuscript, and all important. For other editions, and editions of the Apocrypha, see Nestle (ubi supra). A very useful work is the Psalter, the "first labor" of the American press at Urm (1841), printed for the use of the Nestorian (Chaldean) ecclesiastics. It contains parallel Scripture references and the prayers and rubrics used in public service. Much of this accessory matter has found its way into other editions of the Psalter. The older editions of the New Testament give the Nestorian (Chaldean) church-lessons. For further information respecting the Syrian writers mentioned in this article, see respective arts. SYRIAC VERSIONS. See BIBLE VERSIONS.

SYROPULOS, Sylvester, a Greek ecclesiastic of the fifteenth century, author of a valuable history of the Council of Ferrara-Florence (see art.). He was ἀρχιερεύς ("law-officer") and chief sacristan in Constantinople, one of the five dignitaries immediately about the patriarch. He was passionately devoted to his church, and opposed to the Latin. Nevertheless, he was a delegate to the Council of Ferrara-Florence, especially designed to effect a union between the Greek and Latin churches, took part in its deliberations, and by command of his sovereign signed the decrees. This act of weakness he deeply lamented; and by his efforts to defeat the practical effect of the decrees he encountered such opposition, that he was forced to retire to private life. The only edition of his work is the copy of the Paris Codex, which unhappily lacks the first book, issued by Robert Creyghton, Vera hist. unionis, . . . see Conciliorum Florcntinorum exactissima narratio. The Hague, 1690. See Schrotscher: Kirchengesch., vol. xxiv. pp. 411 sqq.
TABERNACLE (ḥōlē moēd, or ḥōlē ha-eduth, or mishkān ha-eduth) denotes the movable sanctuary of the Hebrews prior to the time of Solomon. Other terms are midōlah (Exod. xxv. 8; Lev. xii. 4), mishkān (Exod. xxv. 9), beqōth, i.e., house (Exod. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 26; Josh. vi. 24, ix. 23; Judg. xviii. 31), ḥēlē, i.e., the tent, also ḥēykal, i.e., temple (1 Sam. i. 9, iii. 3), and maōn, i.e., dwelling (1 Sam. ii. 29, 82).

PREPARATION OF THE BUILDING. — As Jehovah went before the people in the pillar of cloud and fire, as it was his intention to show and to reveal his presence unto the people, whether they were on the way or in their tents, therefore he promised unto the people, " in all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee" (Exod. xx. 24). To make this place of blessed meeting a visible reality, not only does God show unto Moses the model pattern of the tabernacle and of all the instruments (Exod. xxv. 9, 40, xxvi. 30, xxvii. 8), but the people are also directed to bring freewill offerings, or rather the material, which is to be used under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab. The sin of the golden calf apparently delays the execution. On the intercession of their leader, a tent is pitched rob and of fire, as it was intended to show and to reveal his presence (Exod. xxxiii. 9). After God has become reconciled again to his people, the work is resumed. The people offer the necessary materials in excess of what was wanted (xxxvi. 5, 6). Other workmen (xxxvi. 2) and workwomen (xxxv. 25) place themselves to his people, the work is resumed. The people offer the necessary materials in excess of what was wanted (xxxvi. 5, 6). Other workmen (xxxvi. 2) and workwomen (xxxv. 25) place themselves under the direction of Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, and Aholiab of the tribe of Dan.

Structure of the Tabernacle and the Court (Exod. xxv.-xxvii., xxxv.-xxxviii.).—1. The Tabernacle formed a rectangle of thirty cubits long, ten wide, and ten high. The outside length was thirty cubits and a half; the outside width, eleven cubits. The walls were built of forty-eight planks of shittim-wood, overlaid with gold on both sides, ten cubits high, and a cubit and a half broad. Of these boards, which were in close contact with each other, twenty were on the north, and twenty on the south side; for the west end were eight boards. From the foot of each plank came out two "tenons" (gālāth), which were thrust into two silver sockets of which two were prepared for each plank, each socket being the weight of a talent of silver (xxxviii. 27). These tenons were to be "coupled together." The walls or planks were bound together by five bars or bolts, thrust into rings attached to each plank. These bars ran along one side: one is said to have gone in the middle. The structure was adorned by four kinds of hangings. The roofing material was canvas, consisting of ten "curtains," each twenty-eight cubits long and four cubits wide. Ten of these were to be "coupled," i.e., sewed together, five in one sheet, and five in another. This was done by means of fifty "loops" and as many taches of "gold." The connecting line run over the curtain of the Holy of holies. This curtain was of byssus, with figures of cherubim stitched upon it apparently with the art of the embroiderer. The second set of curtains, or tent-roof, of goat's hair, called also ḥēlē, consisted of eleven pieces of stuff, each thirty cubits long and four cubits wide. They were sewed into two large cloths, and suspended on fifty knobs, or taches, of brass by means of fifty loops. A coat of "rams' skins dyed red, and tachash (A. V. badgers') skins," was furnished as an additional covering (xxvi. 14, mishlēh, i.e., from upward). The entrance to the tabernacle was towards the east, and closed by a "hanging" of byssus, and embroidered, suspended upon five copperocketed and gilded pillars of acacia-wood by means of golden hooks. A "veil" divided the interior into two apartments, called respectively the "holy place" and the "most holy." This partition-cloth was suspended upon four pillars precisely like those of the door "hanging," except that their sockets were of silver. 2. The Court was a large rectangular enclosure a hundred cubits long and fifty broad. It was composed of a frame of four sides of distinct pillars, with curtains hung upon them. The sixty wooden pillars were five cubits in height. At the bottom they were protected or shod by sockets of brass. At the top these pillars had a capital, which was overlaid with silver. Connected with the head of the pillar were hooks and rods, joining one pillar to another. These rods were laid upon the hooks, and served to attach the hangings to, and suspend from them. The hooks and rods were silver. The hangings of the court were of twined shēkēh, that is, a fabric woven out of twisted yarn of the material called shēkēh (A. V., fine linen).

The Furniture of the Tabernacle.—The only piece of furniture within the inner or most holy place was the ark of the covenant (q. v.). The furniture of the outer room, or holy place, consisted of the altar of incense, the table of shewbread, and the "golden candlestick" (q. v.). In the court was the altar of burnt offering and the laver (q. v.).

3. Provisions for the Transport (Num. iv. 4-33). The Levitical family of Kohath, to which Aaron's family also belonged, had to carry all the vessels of the Holy of holies (Num. iv. 4, 16). Then came the family of Gershon with the tabernacle and its lighter furniture, while the Merarites had charge of its heavier appurtenances. The sons of Aaron prepared for the removal by covering every thing in the Holy of holies with a purple cloth. The Kohathites had to carry every thing on their shoulders: the Merarites had four wagons for their transport.

Significance of the Tabernacle. — As the name indicates, it was to be the dwelling of Jehovah in the midst of his people. As king of his people he dwells in his palace. His throne is over the kophereth ("the mercy-seat").
the cherubim, which, however, must not be taken in an anthropomorphic manner. If there was to be a mutual relation between the holy and living God and his people, which he selected from among the nations of the earth to be the bearer of his name, revelation, and word, it was necessary to have some means of approaching God. This access is made in a mediatorial manner in the court, as the lowest grade, the people meet partly to bring their offerings to Jehovah, partly to hear the revelation of his divine will, and to receive his mercy and blessing. Being sinful, the people do not dare yet to enter the sanctuary: they need human mediators, the priests, who in their stead present themselves to God. But the priests themselves can only approach Jehovah in an immediate manner in their high priest, who only once in the year can enter the Holy of holies, where the throne of Jehovah's glory is. This leads us to the New-Testament idea of the Tabernacle, (cf. Hebrews viii. 5, ix. 1-14 sq., x. 1 sq., 19 sq.; cf. Col. ii. 17; Eph. vii. 14-22; Rev. xxi. 3),—that the entire structure of the tabernacle was nothing but a typical prophecy of the New-Testament economy, according to which, after the eternal high priest had entered the Holy of holies with his own blood, all curtains are removed, and that all who have become Abraham's children by faith have a daily access to the mercy-seat, and that they shall once also enter the Holy of holies of the heaven (Heb. xii. 14 sq., 25 sq.). As to the symbolic significance of the tabernacle, there can be no doubt that the structure of the same was obviously determined by a complex and profound symbolism; but its meaning remains one of the things which will always be guess-work. Jewish rabbis as well as Christian theologians have exercised their ingenuity, with more or less success. Thus the material, not less than the forms, in the Holy of holies, was significant. The metals, colors, and numbers had their signification. Thus three is the numerical "signature" of the Divine Being and of all that stands in any real relation to God (Num. vi. 24-29; Isa. vi. 3). The number three being the "signature" of God, of the Creator, four is the "signature" of the created things of the world; not of the world as "without form, and void," but as a kosmos, as the revelation of God so far as nature can reveal him. Ten is the symbol of completeness and perfection, while five represents one-half of the "signature" of perfection. Seven (i.e., 3 + 4) is the note of union between God and the world, the number of religion, the signature of salvation, blessing, peace, perfection. Twelve denotes by multiplication the combination of the signature of God and the signature of the world (3 × 4).

History of the Tabernacle.—After the same access is completed in a direction of Bezaelel and Aholiah, it was dedicated on the first day of the second year from the exodus, and the ritual appointed for it began (Exod. xi. 2). After the entrance into Canaan, the tabernacle was in the camp of Israel, at Gilgal (Josh. iv. 19, v. 10, vi. 24; ix. 6, x. 8, xiv. 9), and, after the taking and division of the land, its position was in the midst of the camp (Deut. xxiii. 1, xiv. 28, xix. 51). At Shiloh it continued during the whole period of the judges; but, when the ark of God was taken, the sanctuary lost its glory. It probably became once again a movable sanctuary: less honored, as no longer possessing the symbol of the divine presence, yet cherished by the priesthood, and some portions, at least, of its ritual kept up. For a time it seems, under Saul, to have been settled at Nob (1 Sam. xxii. 1-6), which thus became a priestly city. The massacre of the priests provoked a renewal of ritual to Gibeon, where it connected itself with the worship of the high places (1 Kings iii. 4), while the ark remained at Kirjath-jearim. The capture of Jerusalem, and the erection there of a new tabernacle, with the ark, of which the old had been deprived (2 Sam. vi. 17; 1 Chron. xv. 1), left it little more than a traditional, historical sanctuary. The provisional tabernacle erected by David was to make room for the temple which he intended to build. His purpose was fulfilled by Solomon, who had the tabernacle, and the ark, and all the holy vessels, brought to Jerusalem, and put in some place within the temple, to remain there as holy relics (1 Kings viii. 4; 2 Chron. v. 5).

This amby stood either on the altar, or was suspended. From the fourteenth century on, the pyx containing the Eucharist was preserved in a stationary place called tabernacles, built either in the form of a tower, and standing near the wall or a pillar, or made like coffers, which were more or less decorated. In both forms they were on the right side of the altar. They form an indispensable piece of furniture in the Church of Rome. In the gradual development of the ultra-sacramental use of the body of the Lord, they have no liturgical value; yet as works of art there still exist some very fine tabernacles in some evangelical churches, as in Nuremberg and Ulm. Since the sixteenth century, the tabernacles have been connected with the altar, and are more conspicuous. The tabernacle, as well as the pyx, is also termed kiborium, which must not be connected with the Latin cibus (i.e., food), but with the Greek kiborion, meaning the canopy on the altar, supported by columns. The term ciborium was also applied to the pyx, the monstrance, and to the tabernacle itself, because it formed as it was a protecting cover. The monstrance may be regarded as a portable tabernacle.

TABERNACLES. The Feast of (יוֹם הָעֵזֶרֶת), in the LXX., ἡμέρα ἡμέρα ἡμέρες in John vii. 2 and Josephus, ἡμέρας in Philo, ἡμέρασιν in Plutarch, Symp., iv. 6, 2), also called the feast of ingathering (Exod. xxiii. 16), is the last of the three yearly festivals from the Mosaic law ordained to be celebrated at the tabernacle. The account of its institution is given in Exod. xxiii. 14 sq.; Lev. xxiii. 34 sq.; Deut. xvi. 13 sqq. The descriptions of the Old Testament absolutely exclude the hypotheses of some recent writers, who identify the festival with the harvest festivities of heathen peoples. The feast of tabernacles was designed to be a reminder of the time when the Israelites dwelt in booths in the wilderness (Lev. xxiii. 42), and to take the branches of palm trees, and bunches of鸡蛋 trees, and willows of the brook. This festival was emphatically a festival of rejoicing;[and a proverb in Succah says, "He who has never seen the rejoicing at the pouring out of the water of Siloam has never seen rejoicing in his life"]. Burnt, meat, drink, and other offerings were to be made. Deuteronomy alone designates the place of celebrating the feast,—"the place which the Lord shall choose" (xvi. 15). Zechariah (xiv. 16) insists upon its celebration, and Nehemiah (vii. 17) says the feast had not been celebrated since the days of Joshua as it was in his day. This notice cannot exclude, however, all celebration of the festival during the interval (1 Kings viii. 2; 2 Chron. vii. 8-10).

The booths were erected in the streets, outside the walls of Jerusalem, and on the roofs. Joy and mirth prevailed in them. The main features of the public celebration were the sacrifices by day and the illumination at night. Four hundred and twenty-four priests were in attendance, to serve those who brought sacrifices. Once every day the entire congregation encompassed the altar of burnt offerings, waving palm-branches. On the seventh day this was repeated seven times, in memory of Jericho. The branches mentioned in Lev. xxiii. 40 were tied into a bunch, and called lulab. During the sacrifices the great Hallel (Ps. cxiii.-cxviii.) was sung, and at the twenty-fourth verse of Ps. cxviii., every one shook his palm-branch a number of times. After the sacrifices the priestly blessing was conferred. Wine, and water from the brook of Siloam, were used for the drink-offering, both morning and evening. One of the priests carried a cup of the water through the water-gate of the temple, when another priest took it, with the words, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation" (Isa. xii. 3). The priests and people took up the branches and bunches, and waved them about, and {the priest and the people} sang it with wine, and poured it out into a ditch which led to the Kidron. The origin of this custom is unknown; but it is very generally agreed that our Lord had reference to it when he said, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink" (John vii. 37). The words of John viii. 12 ("I am the light of the world") seem to contain an allusion to the great illumination which took place on the evenings of the feast of tabernacles; four golden lamps, or candelabra, were hung in the women, being illuminated. Upon the lighting of these lights, there followed dancing and processions.

The eighth day of the feast, a sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 39), had a special name, yom azera'oth, and marked the dismantling of the booths. The seventh day marked the consummation of the feast, and was undoubtedly "the great day of the feast," referred to in John vii. 37.

TABA (mount). This interesting and remarkable mount in Palestine, at the boundary between Issachar and Zebulun (Josh. xix. 22; Judg. iv. 6, 12, 14), rises abruptly from the northeastern arm of the plain of Esdraelon, and stands entirely insulated, except on the west, where a narrow ridge connects it with the hills of Nazareth. It presents to the eye, as seen from a distance, a beautiful appearance; being so symmetrical in its proportions, and rounded off like a hemisphere, yet varying in shape from different directions, being more conical when seen from the east or west. It is now called Jebel an-Tur. The body of the mountain consists of the peculiar limestone of the country. Mount Tabor lies about six or eight miles almost due east from Nazareth. The ascent is usually made on the west side, and it requires three-quarters of an hour, or an hour, to reach the top. The path is circuitous, and at times steep. The trees and bushes are generally so thick as to intercept the prospect; but now and then the traveller, as he ascends, comes to an open spot which reveals to him a magnificent view of the plain. All round the top are the foundations of a thick wall built of large stones. The chief remains are upon the ledge of rocks on the south of the little basin, and especially towards its eastern end. The walls and traces of a fortress are seen here. Whilst now a little chapel stands here, where the priests from Nazareth perform divine service, in olden times the mountain had cities and a large population. Thus a city of Tabor is mentioned in the lists of 1 Chron. vi. as a city of the Merarite Levites in the tribe of Zebulun (77). Mount Tabor makes a prominent figure in ancient history. Here Barak assembled his forces against Sisera (Judg. iv. 6-15). The brothers of Gideon were murdered here by Zebah and Zalmunna (viii. 18, 19). In the year B.C. 218 Antiochus the Great got possession of Tabor by stratagem, and strengthened its fortifications.

In the monastic ages Tabor, in consequence, partly, of a belief that it was the scene of the Saviour's transfiguration, was crowded with hermits (but there is no foundation for this tradition); partly because, according to Matt. xvii. 1, Mark ix. 2, Luke ix. 28, the transfiguration must have taken place on some high mountain near Cesaarea-Philippi; and partly because a fortified and inhabited place could hardly have been a proper place for such a scene. At the seven-sided tower was again fortified the mount, at whose base the main street runs from Egypt to Damascus. In their time Mount Tabor was an archiepiscopal see belonging to the Patriarch of Jerusalem. Tancred built there a church, and the Cluniacensians a monastery. But all was lost in the battle of Hattin, July 5, 1187.

TAPMOR. The place mentioned only in 2 Chron. viii. 4, is undoubtedly the name of that ancient city which to the Greeks, Romans, and to modern Europe, is known by the name of Palmyra. In the Chronicles the city is mentioned as having been built by Solomon after his conquest of Hamath-zobah, and is named in conjunction with "all the store cities which he built in Hamath." It was probably built with the view of securing an interest in, and command over, the great caravan traffic from the East, similar to that which he had established in respect to the trade between Syria and Egypt. We do not again read of Tadmor in Scripture, nor is it likely that the Hebrews retained possession of it long after the death of Solomon. No other source acquaints us with the subsequent history of the place, till it re-appears in the account of P liny (Hist. Nat., v. 24) as a considerable town, which, along with its territory, formed an independent state between the Roman and Parthian Empires. In the second century it seems to have been beautified by the Emperor Hadrian, as may be inferred from a statement of Stephanus of Byzantium, as to the name of the city having been changed to Hadrianopolis (c. city of Hadrian”). Under Septimius Severus it became a bishopric, and then the town was called Italica; but it had a government of its own, and was ruled by its own laws. The most interesting period in the history of Tadmor is the time of Odenathus and Zenobia. The Emperor Valerian being captured by the Persians, Odenathus, one of the citizens of Palmyra, revenged the wrongs of the fallen emperor, and vindicated the majesty of Rome. He marched against the Persians, took the province of Mesopotamia, and deified Sapor beneath the walls of Ctesiphon (A.D. 290). The services thus rendered to Rome were so great, that Odenathus was associated in the sovereignty with Gallienus (A.D. 291). He enjoyed his dignity but a short time, being murdered only three years afterwards. Zenobia, his widow, succeeded Odenathus as Queen of the East, and ruled the country during a period of five years. In A.D. 271 the Emperor Aurelian turned his arms against her; and after a hard-fought battle near Antioch, and in another at Emesa, he drove her back upon her desert home. He then marched his veterans across the parched plains, and invested Palmyra. Zenobia attempted to escape, but was captured, and brought back to the presence of the conqueror. She was taken to Rome, and there she was led along in front of the triumphant Aurelian. Palmyra, which was taken in A.D. 272, never recovered its former opulence. Twenty years later, under the reign of Diocletian, the walls of the city were rebuilt. It eventually became the seat of a bishopric, but was never recovered any importance. When the successors of Mohammed extended their conquests beyond the confines of Arabia, Palmyra became subject to the caliphs. From this period Palmyra seems to have gradually fallen into decay. Not once is it mentioned in the history of the crusades. In 1173 it was visited by Benjamin of Tudela, who found there a large Jewish population, besides Mohammedans and Christians. It was again visited in 1751 by Wood and Dawkins. In our century many travellers have visited the place, and their descriptions are very valuable. A complete list of all travels till the year 1854 is given by Ritter, Erdkunde von Kleinasien, vol. vii. 2d division, 3d section, pp. 1432 sq.

TAI-PING (great peace), a Chinese religious sect established by Hung-Siu-Tsen, b. in a little village thirty miles from Canton, 1813; d. at Nanking, July 19, 1862. While on a visit to Canton to attend the official examinations, he received from I. J. Roberts, an American missionary, a package of tracts in Chinese. Five years afterwards he fell sick, and had visions, in which an old man with a golden beard commanded him to destroy the demons (i.e., the idol-gods) of his country. He then first read the tracts; and associating the man in his visions with Christ, and catching up several Christian ideas, he abandoned the Chinese cultus, and determined to preach his new faith. He retired to the mountains, and gathered by 1840 many converts, whom he styled "God-worshippers." He carried out his supposed commission, and destroyed some Buddhist idols. This brought him in conflict with the government, so that he again retired to the mountains. In 1850 he started upon a new enterprise. The time was ripe for rebellion; and he shrewdly proclaimed himself as sent by Heaven to drive out the Tartars, and set up a native Chinese dynasty. His standard was pushed victoriously forward. Nanking was captured in 1852. The Tai-ping dynasty was founded, with himself as the first emperor, under the title Teen-Wang ("the heavenly king"). The rebels would probably have been able to carry out their plans, had they not been defeated by the English and French troops, acting in concert with the Chinese. When Nanking was taken, Siu-Tsen burned himself and wives in his palace.

Siu-Tsen's religious views were a mixture of Christian and Chinese elements. He considered Christ the oldest of the sons of God, and himself one of the younger. In his manifestoes he grouped God the Father, Jesus Christ, himself and his son, whom he styled the “Junior Lord,” as the co-equal rulers of the universe. He adopted baptism, but rejected the Lord’s Supper, allowed polygamy (he had himself a hundred and eighteen wives), punished adultery and opium-smoking with death. TAIT, Archibald Campbell, Archbishop of Canterbury; the son of Craufurd Tait, Esq., a Scotch lawyer; was b. in Edinburgh, Dec. 22, 1811; d. at Croydon, Dec. 3, 1882. After passing through the high school and academy of Edinburgh, he went in 1827 to Glasgow University, and in 1830 entered Balliol College, Oxford, graduating B.A. with first-class honors, and becoming fellow and tutor. He took a prominent part in opposing Tractarianism, and was one of the four tutors who entered a protest against Tract No. 90, written to show that a Roman Catholic might sign the Thirty-nine Articles. In 1842 he was appointed Dr. Arnold’s successor at Rugby, administering the college with success. While at Rugby he married daughter of Archdeacon Spooner. Mr. Tait died Dec. 1, 1878. In 1850 Mr. Tait accepted the deanship of Carlisle, and became well known as a hard-working parish clergyman. In 1856 he was appointed Bishop of London, as successor of Dr. Blomfield; the immediate occasion of the appointment being, as it is supposed, the Queen’s sympathy for him in the loss of five daughters by scarlet-fever. Bishop Tait initiated the scheme for raising a million pounds to meet the deficiency of church accommodation in London. In 1866 he was raised to the see of Canterbury, he having before refused the archbishopric of York. Dr. Tait presided over the Pan-Anglican synod at Lambeth, July, 1878. His only son died in 1878. Archbishop Tait was a representative of Low-Church views, and managed with great courtesy and excellent judgment the controversy of the ritualists, and ecclesiastical law of England. He was a man of sound piety and commandments which I have written; that thou mayest teach them.” Of these words we have in the Talmud (Berakhoth, fol. 5 a) this curious exposition: “The tables are the ten commandments. The law is the written law. The commandments is the Mishna. Which I have written means the prophets and Hagiography. To teach them means the Gemara. It teaches us that they were all given to Moses from Sinai.” In this quotation, mention is made of the two parts of which the Talmud is composed,—the Mishna and the Gemara. The former is the text, and the latter the commentary. The name Talmud is often restricted, especially by Jewish writers, to the Gemara. The compiler of the Mishna (from shannah, “to repeat,” also “to learn”) was Rabbi Jehovah, surnamed Hak-kadosh, the Holy, and Hannah, the Prince. He is often called simply rabbi by way of eminence. According to Joel, he died A.D. 219 or 220; according to others, shortly before the close of the second century. He undertook to sift and reduce to order the oral law. Such an attempt had been made before him, but he completed the work. He wrote nothing down, but arranged everything in his mind. He twice subjected his compilation to a revision and correction. The doctors introduced as speaking in the Mishna are called Tanaim, from the Aramaic form of the root of Mishna. The Tanaim profess to be the repeaters of tradition. The teachers of the oral law were first called scribes (Sopherim), next elders (Zekeinim), next the wise teachers (Shochim), next elders again (Shoshannim), next the wise teachers (Shochanim), next the sages (Rabbanim). The law is the written law. The Mishna is divided into six books or orders (sedirim), entitled (1) Zeraim, seeds; (2) Moed, festivals; (3) Nasiim, women; (4) Nezikin, damages; (5) Kodashim, sacred things; (6) Tuhoroth, purifications. Under these six orders there are sixty-three treatises, which are again subdivided into chapters. After the completion of the official Mishna by Rabbi Jehovah, additional laws were collected by his successors: but they were not incorporated in the proper Mishna, but kept distinct from it: and this is indicated by the designation given to these extra-Mishnaic laws, Baraitas, from the word bar or bara, which means without. There are also additions to the Mishna, called Toseftas, collected during the third century. It was not till the year 550 A.D. that the Mishna was committed to writing (comp. Graetz: Geschichte der Juden, iv. p. 494). The scribes, by setting up their oral law, violated the strict injunction not to add to the law of Moses (Deut. iv. 2). Traditional precepts additional to the written law were at an early date current in Israel. Isaiah complains of these human ordinances (Isa. xxix. 13); and our Lord charged the Pharisees with making the word of God of none effect by their traditions. The oral law, instead of securing the observance of the written law, superseded it. And significantly is it said in the Book soberly: "The grace of Moses is the Mishna, and therefore no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." The Sadducees rejected the divine authority of the oral law; and so do the Karaites, who arose in the eighth century, and who, though few in number, still exist as a distinct sect. The Mishna was not sufficient to satisfy the Jewish doctors. On its basis they formed the Gemara, a word meaning complement, or doctrine; for it can bear both these significations. The Gemara exhibits the opinions and discussions of the wise men on the Mishna. There are two Gemaras, the Jerusalemitl and the Babylonian, both expounding the same Mishnaic text. It was in Tiberias, near the close of the fourth century, that the redaction of what is commonly called the Jerusalemitl Talmud was finished. Hence its proper title should be, not the Talmud of Jerusalem, but the Palestinian or Western Talmud. The mass of traditions ascribed falsely to Rabbi Jochanan of Tiberias, who, however, only began the work, being the first of the Amoraim, or doctors of the Gemara.

The Babylonian Talmud had for its chief compiler Rabbi Ashe, head, till 427 A.D., of the school of Sura in Babylon; but its completion was reserved for Rabbi Abina, who died in 498, and who is regarded as the last of the Gemaric doctors. The mass of traditions ascribed falsely to Moses went on increasing from age to age by the addition of the sayings of later doctors; and thus, like a snowball, the longer it rolled, the greater the bulk of the conglomeration.

It should be stated that only a portion of the treatises of the Mishna have their commentary in the Gemara. The Babylonian Talmud is much more highly esteemed by the Jews than the Jerusalemitl, and is about four times as large as the latter. It contains two thousand more pages, or double that number of folio pages. Its paging in the various editions is kept uniform, to facilitate reference. The Mishna is written, for the most part, in Hebrew in its later form, with a mixture of foreign words (Aramaic, Greek, and Latin). It is composed with extreme conciseness; the aim in expression being to use the fewest words possible, so as not to burden the memory, when it was unlawful to write down the oral law. The language of the Gemara is a corrupt Chaldee or Aramaic. The Talmud is without vowel-points, and abounds in abbreviations. Delitzsch specifies brachology as characteristic of its style. Deutsch affirms, that, "in the whole realm of learning, there is scarcely a single branch of study to be compared for its difficulty to the Talmud." Lightfoot, in the preface to his Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae, thus depicts the unattractiveness of the Talmud: "To look on the unapproachable difficulty of the style, the frightful roughness of the language, and the amazing eminence and sophistry of the matters handled, do torture, vex, and tire him that reads them... In no writers is greater or equal trifling." But he adds, "And yet in none is greater or so great benefit." And he maintains that Christians "may render them most usefully serviceable to their studies, and most eminently tending to the interpretation of the New Testament.”

The Talmud treats of a vast variety of subjects. There are separate works on its civil and criminal law, its religious philosophy, its ethics, its psychology, its education, mathematics, medicine, magic, geography, zoology, botany, etc. Dr. Pick, in his article on the Talmud, referred to below, gives the titles of monographs on all these subjects. The Talmud is described by Diirrsei, in his Genius of Judaism, as containing a "prodigious mass of contradictory opinions, an infinite number of casuistical cases, a logic of scholastic theology, some recondite wisdom and much rambling dogmatism, many puerile tales and Oriental fancies, ethics and sophisms, reasonings and unreasonings, involved solutions, and maxims and riddles. Nothing in human life seems to have happened which these doctors have not perplexed or provided against."

It is not necessary to take much trouble to find in the Talmud places illustrating these charges. Wagenseil (Teles Igmen, p. 58) refers to the very first words of the Mishna to show the contradictory opinions which are brought together in the Talmud. It begins with the question regarding the time of evening prayer. The answer of the Mishna and Gemara to this simple question will be found in Pressel's article on the Talmud, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopadie. Those who have the patience to read it will admit that it fully establishes the point for which Wagenseil made the reference. Two distinct currents of teaching may be traced in the Talmud. These are denominated respectively Halakhah and Haggadah. Halakah from halakh, ("to go") means the way which one ought to go, rule, authoritative precept. Haggadah is literally what is said, declared. It is homiletical teaching, intended to edify, console, or even to entertain, and combines instruction with parable and legend. The Talmud commends the study of the oral law above that of the written word, or double to that of the written law, one-third to the Mishna, and one-third to the Gemara. And the man who transgresses the words of the scribes is pronounced worthy of death (Tract. Erubin, 21 b). Such views of the Talmud are now discarded by the more enlightened Jews. But there has been of late a persistent attempt made by Jews, who own its human origin, to glorify the Talmud at the expense of the New Testament. Deutsch's celebrated article, which appeared in The Quarterly Review, London, October, 1867, is the best known essay of this kind in the English language. But there is only one principle in the teachings of the Talmud having the same aim. Deutsch makes Christianity to have appropriated the teaching of the Jewish doctors of the Mishnaic period, and "to have carried those golden germs, hidden in the schools and among the silent community of the learned, into the market of humanity." He would have us to regard even Paul's doctrine concerning faith as genuine Pharisaism! "The faith of the heart - the dogma prominently dwelt upon by the Jews — stood at a much higher with the Pharisees than the outward law. It was a thing, they said, not to be commanded by any ordinance, yet was greater than all. 'Every thing,' is one of their adages, 'is in the hands of Heaven, save the fear of Heaven.'

How any one who had read Paul's writings could make faith in his system of doctrine identical with the simple fear of God may well excite astonishment. The adage which Deutsch quotes, and which is a rabbinical commonplace, is diametrically opposed to the great principle of salvation by grace, which Paul so strongly insisted on (comp. Eph. ii. 1—10), and contradicts the Old Testament, which expressly teaches that it is in the power of God to infuse his fear into the heart of man. "I will put my fear in their hearts," is a promise which the Lord has actually performed (La 1:20, 21; Ps. lxxxvi. 11; Deut. xviii. 6). Deutsch.

It is matter of debate whether or not the Talmud sanctions the doctrine of original sin. Graetz and Deutsch deny that it does. But Jost (Gesch. der Jud., i. 265) expresses the opposite view. Some Christian writers have affirmed that the teaching of the rabbis on this subject does not differ from the orthodox doctrine of the church. But Vitringa (Observ. Sac. L., iii., vii., C. ix.) shows that the difference between them is real and important. According to the Jewish doctors, it is the connection of the soul with the body that produces the etzoter ra, the evil disposition. Borrowing from Platonism or Oriental sources, they make the body the originating cause of the inclination to sin. To adopt the language of Vitringa, the church places the soul of the man as an essential part of his nature, whereas the rabbis place the evil disposition in the body, and regard it as a mere accident.

Among the questions debated by the wise men in Israel was one which is freely discussed in the public press. "Is the cat a full two years and a half the school of Shamai and Hillel contended on the point whether it were better for man to have been created or not. When at last a vote was taken, a majority declared that it would have been better for man not to have been created. To this decision the addition was made, that, since man is in being, he is to be very careful in his actions (Erubin, 2). We are utterly at a loss to understand how Graetz (Gesch., iv. 283), Deutsch, and others could assert that the Mishna, as distinguished from the Gemara, knows nothing of a hell. If this were true, then we might vouch for the New Testament independence of Mishnaic teaching on this point. But that treatise of the Mishna, the Pirke Aboth, from which Deutsch has culled his choicest sentences, contains in its first chapter these words: "The wise have said, Every one who has much with the woman (his own wife, as the context shows) lays it down for himself, and ceases from the words of the law, and his end is — he shall inherit hell (Gehenna)."

Whatever may be stated to the contrary, the Talmud, in opposition to the Old Testament, sanctions astrology. It is true, that in one place it is taught that a majority of the rabbis (not all) maintained that Israel was not under the influence of the stars, as the heathen nations confessedly are (Shabbath, fol. 196). Rashi explains that God changed the names of Abram and Sarai to Abraham and Sarah in order that they might escape the baleful influence of the stars, and have a son. Astrology, as affecting all, without exception, is taught in various places in the Talmud (comp. McCaul: Old Paths, chap. xxiii.).

"Life, children, and a livelihood depend not on merit, but on the influence of the stars. . . . An eclipse of the sun is an evil sign to the nations of the world. An eclipse of the moon is an evil sign to Israel; for Israel reckons by the moon, the nations of the world, by the sun."

The virtue of amulets is recognized both in the Mishna and in the Gemara. The Mishna (Shabbath, fol. 61 a) teaches it is not lawful to go forth on the sabbath with an amulet that is not approved. An approved amulet is one that has cured three men (comp. Buxtorf: Lex. Talmud., p. 2057, under qumia). The charm prepared in the Talmud for the protection of a mad dog has often quoted. It is an extraordinary specimen of profane folly. We give the briefer and less known statement of the way by which we may obtain a sight of the mischievous demons, invisible to ordinary eyes, who wear out the clothes of the rabbis by rubbing against them, cause bruised legs, and want of room at the sermon:

"Whosoever wishes to see them, let him take the interior covering of a black cat, the daughter of a first-born black cat, which is also the daughter of a first-born, and let him burn it in the fire, and pulverize it, and let him then fill his eyes with it, and he will see them," etc. (Berakoth, fol. 6 a).

The little effect, it has been rightly observed, produced on the minds of the scribes and Pharisees by the display of divine power in the miracles wrought by our Lord and his disciples, was largely owing to their faith in charms and magical arts. They fought the teaching of the law of Moses, for the observance of which they could profess such zeal (Deut. xviii. 10—12).

It is idle to quote from the Talmud examples of teaching similar to what we read in the Gospels, and thence to argue the dependence of the latter on the former. The Gospels were, we know, extant in a permanent written form long before the Mishna was compiled, and centuries before it was reduced to writing. And what if authorities for Talmudic sayings analogous to words in the New Testament can be shown to have imbted instruction from Christians? This can be done. The Mishnaic doctor Rabbi Eliezer, to whom a striking saying, very like one uttered by our Lord, is credited, confessed to Rabbi Akiba that he had intercourse with James, a disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, and that he was greatly pleased with instruction which James communicated to him as he had heard it from Jesus (Aboda Zara, fol. 16, 17). So Jonathan ben Joseph, whose teaching (Tract. Joma, 85 b) strikingly resembles that of our Saviour concerning the sabbath, is said to have had much intercourse with Christians (comp. Biesenthal: Zur Geschichte der christl. Kirche, elftes Kap.). Biesenthal calls attention to the fact that the Mishna (Tract. Megillah, cap. 4, 9) prohibits the use of Christian phrases in the public prayers of the synagogue. Expressions recognized as of Christian origin were actually heard, according to the testimony of the Mishna, at the public worship of the Jews. It is admitted, too, that the Talmud contains extraordinary elements from the Babylonian Jews superstitious views, and practices notoriously contrary to the spirit of Judaism (Graetz, iv. p. 410). Why, then, may it not have appropriated Christian sentiments also?

Of the rabbis whose life and teaching are related in the Talmud, none has of late years been so much spoken of as Hillel, who was still alive when our Saviour was born. The attempt has been repeatedly made to represent Jesus as standing in the relation of dependence on Hillel, as having appropriated his doctrines, and given them a wider circulation. To give some plausibility to this attempt, even the few saying of Hillel which can fairly be compared with words of our Lord have been sometimes mistranslated. But Hillel's whole bearing toward the traditions of the elders was the very opposite of Christ's. According to Hillel, the unlearned man, who is not a student of the oral law, cannot be pious (Pirké Aboth, ii. 5: Am haaretz lo chasid). Hillel's famous saying about not doing to others what we should not like to be done to ourselves is, as Joest observes, repeated by him as a rule with which people were familiar. It is not an original thought of his; and, unlike the "Golden Rule" enunciated by Christ, it sets forth only the negative side of our duty to our neighbor. A full and fair statement of what the Talmud contains regarding Hillel is the best answer to the attempt to degrade Jesus from his unique position of having none of the sons of men worthy to be placed on a line with him. Indeed, the account which Joest gives of Hillel is of itself sufficient to show how absurd it is to think of comparing him with our Saviour (comp. Joest's Gesch. des Judent., i. pp. 261—270, and Delitzsch's Jesus und Hillel). The English reader may consult Schaff's History of the Christian Church, i. pp. 159 sq.). The precious sayings and maxims of Hillel which have been extracted from the Talmud, are, to use Da Costa's language, "a few bright pearls found at the bottom of an immense heap of rubbish."

Hillel's disciples, who were the contemporaries of Christ, and leading scribes of his time, must have been extraordinary men. The Talmud tells us of them, that "thirty of them were as worthy as Moses to have the Schenina resting on them. Thirty others were as worthy as Joshua, the son of Nun, that for them the sun should stand still."

The least of all of them knew, among other things, "the language of demons, the language of palm trees, and the language of the ministering angels" (Bava Batra, fol. 134 a). The knowledge of these languages was in order to use enchantments. What is this the Talmud has to say of the Jewish leaders who would not acknowledge the claims of Jesus?

It is interesting to know what the Talmud relates concerning the Founder of Christianity and his church. Those who have investigated this subject (Wagenseil: Tecla Ignea, pp. 57 sq.) allow, that in the Mishna, as distinguished from the Gemara, no word of blasphemy against Christ can be found. There are, however, allusions to Christian practices even in the Mishna (Biesen- thal, ubi supra). The horrid blasphemies against Jesus contained in the Gemara, the older Jews, fearful of persecution, tried to refer to another Jesus than the author of the Christian religion. But modern authors of the Mishna, who have not been afraid to quote the Talmud, are satisfied to say that the Talmud has borrowed from the neighbors of the Jews. The English reader will find the principal blasphemous passages reflecting on the origin and character of our Saviour in Lardner's Collection of Jewish and Heathen Testimonies (chap. v.). He will see there that the rabbis have exhibited the same malicious spirit of foul invention against the Roman general Titus, and he may form his own judgment of the trustworthiness of the Talmud on historical questions. Joest confesses (i. p. 404, note) that the Babylonian rabbis are in error beyond conception in regard to the time of Jesus, making him to have lived a hundred years too early, and that, in regard to the early Christians, the rabbis of the third or fourth century grope entirely in the dark, and have recourse to unjustifiable fables. The unmentionable calumnies fabricated against the mother of Jesus (they call her Stada: see Buxtorf: Lex. Talm., pp. 1456 sq.) are perhaps without a parallel. The account of the trial of Christ's five disciples (given also by Lardner) is one of the strangest specimens of transparent fiction, and of silly trifling with the words of Scripture. In the Basel edition of the Talmud the blasphemies against Christ are omitted.

The Mishna has been translated by Surenhusius, Rabe, and Joest. But, though a translation of the whole Talmud has been promised and begun, there is yet no complete version of it in any language. In an age in which the sacred books of all nations are made accessible to those who cannot study them in the original, those who speak of the inexhaustible mine of wisdom hidden in the Talmud ought not to suffer it to be concealed in a language which few can read. Geiger (Jüdische Zeitschrift, 1869, p. 197) affirms that even Ewald, the celebrated Hebrew grammian, could not accurately understand and translate a single sentence of the Talmud. TAOISM.

DUNLOP MOORE.

TAMMUZ, a sun-god, worshipped with peculiar rites by women among the Chaldeans, and even in Jerusalem (Ezek. viii. 14). In Babylon, and also in the Jewish sacred year, his month was from June 20 to July 20, the time when the days begin to be shorter; in Jerusalem in the autumn, when the nights begin to be longer than the days. His annual festival, which celebrated his supposed death and resurrection, which celebrated his supposed death and resurrection, followed by one of joy. The old (Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome) and the majority of the new commentators connect Tammuz and Adonis, who was similarly mourned for. In the beautiful story of Ishtar's descent to Hades, Lenormant (Premières civilisations, vol. ii. pp. 82-99) sees the Tammuz legend, because Ishtar is the widow of the "Son of Life," Du-mu-zi (D M Z) or Do-zi, which he thinks was changed into T M Z, as might easily be, in view of the frequency with which D and T exchange places. Tammuz was the name of the fourth month of the Jewish sacred year. See W. BAUDISSIN: Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, vol. i. pp. 300 sq.; SCHRADER: Keilinschriften u. das A. T., 2d ed. p. 420.

TANCHELMB, or TANCHELIN, or TANQUELIN, is a characteristic specimen of that peculiar kind of opponents which arose in various places, towards the close of the eleventh and in the beginning of the twelfth century, attacking, sometimes the hypocrisy and corruption of the clergy, but sometimes, also, the whole fabric of the Church of Rome. The Tanchelm is, not only the Pope, the bishops, the clergy, but the whole existing church, which he designated as a lupanaria. The true church comprised only his followers, for he alone had the fulness of the spirit of God. He preached in Holland, and caused great disturbances, as he was generally received by women and persons of the lower classes as an angel from heaven. From Utrecht he was expelled by the Archbishop of Cologne. He afterwards appeared at Bruges and Antwerp; finally he was killed on the Rhine, by a priest, 1124 or 1125. The followers were brought back into the church by St. Norbert. See Epitola Trajectensis, ed. Fridericum Archipiscopum Colonien sium, in TENNAGEL, Collectio veterum monument., Ingolstadt, 1812, and in D'ARGENTRE, Collectio judiciarum, Lib. 1. sect. 8. NEUDECKER.

TANCRED OF BOLOGNA, sometimes but mistakenly designated as Tancredus de Corneto, was one of the most celebrated canons of his time; taught at Bologna since 1210, and was in 1226 made archdeacon at the cathedral. His Summa de matrimonio was written between 1210 and 1213. The first printed edition of it, by Simon Schard (Cologne, 1568), is much interpolated. The best edition is that by Agathon Wunderlich, Göttingen, 1841. Of much greater importance is his Ordo judiciarius, written in 1214, often re-edited, and steadily used for many centuries. Best edition by Bergmann, Göttingen, 1842.

TAOISM is a popular and widespread religion of China, recognized by the government, which, in A.D. 1015, granted large tracts of land as an endowment for its pope, or hereditary chief, whose name is Chang, and title, Heavenly Master, who lives on the Lung-hu mountain, in the department of Kwang-hsin, Chiang-hai. Taoism was originally not an organized religion, but a mass of indigenous Chinese superstitions, a belief in magic and kindred hallucinations. Its priests were necromancers, and its objects of worship were spirits. Under the rivalry of Buddhism, introduced from India A.D. 65, Taoism was developed into a religion with idols, temples, monasteries, and public services. The three great Taoist temples found in Taoist temples are called San Ch'ing ("The Three Holy Ones"); viz., "The Perfect Holy One," "The Highest Holy One" (Lao-tze), and "The Greatest Holy One." But besides this triad, Taoism owns innumerable gods. Confucius unhappily ignored, rather than opposed, the base superstitions out of which Taoism sprang, and so did nothing to destroy their force. The latter now makes common cause with Buddhism; so that the shaven Buddhist and the yellow-topped Taoist "priests" (so called) are seen officiating side by side in the same service. Frequent attempts have been made to unite the sects, but the Taoists have always refused to adopt the celibacy of the Buddhists. One feature of Taoism is its eschatology. It teaches that each one has three souls, one of which remains with the corpse, one with the spirit-tablet, while the third is carried off to purgatory, which consists "of ten courts of justice, situated at the bottom of a great ocean which lies down in the depths of the earth." The soul can pass through endless transmigrations; and, if its punishments do not improve it, it is assigned to an endless hell. Some become "immortals" without passing through purgatory. The offerings of the living, and the services of the priests (either Buddhist or Taoist), deliver souls from purgatory. The two most important functions of a Taoist priest are, (1) to deliver unfortunate persons from the domination of evil spirits, and (2) to choose grave-sites. He does the first by writing charms, and preparing amulets. The head of the religion has uniralled skill in this way.

"It is said, that about his residence on the Lung-hú mountain there are thousands of jars in rows, all tenanted by demons whom the great magician has brought in through his second function; it is very important; for, if a proper spot be not selected, "the spirit of the dead is made unhappy, and avenges itself by causing sickness and other calamities to the relatives who have not taken sufficient care for its repose." The Tóist priest selects the site on geomantic principles.

TAPPAN, David, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Manchester, Mass., April 21, 1752; d. at Cambridge, Aug. 27, 1803. He was graduated at Harvard University, 1771; was pastor of Third Church in Newbury, 1774, until, on Dec. 28, 1792, he became Hollis Professor of Divinity in Harvard University. He held the position at his death. After his death, two volumes of his writings appeared.—Sermons on Important Subjects, Boston, 1807; Lectures on Jewish Antiquities, 1807. See biographical sketch in the first-named volume; also SPRAGUE: Annals, ii. pp. 97-103.

TAPPAN, Henry Philip, D.D., LL.D.; b. at Rhinebeck, N.Y., April 29, 1805; d. at Vevey, Switzerland, November, 1881. He was graduated at Union College, 1825; studied theology at Princeton; was pastor of a Reformed Dutch church in Schenectady, N.Y., and subsequently of a Congregationalist church in Pittsfield, Mass. (1828-33). From 1832 to 1838 he was professor of moral philosophy in the University of the City of New York. After keeping a private school for some years, he was elected chancellor of the University of Michigan in 1852, and held the office until 1853, when he resigned. He spent the rest of his days in Europe. He was an eminent educational and philosophical writer. He was a corresponding member of the Institute of France, 1856. Among his works may be mentioned, A Review of Edwards's On the Will, New York, 1838; Doctrine of the Will determined by an Appeal to Consciousness, 1840; Doctrine of the Will applied to Moral Agency and Responsibility, 1841 (the three volumes were issued in a revised form in Glasgow, 1857, 1 vol.); Elements of Logic, 1844, new ed., 1856.

TAPPAN, William Bingham, b. at Beverly, Mass., Oct. 29, 1794; d. at West Needham, Mass., June 16, 1849; began life as an apprentice in Boston, but removed to Philadelphia, 1815, and was there engaged in business and in teaching. From 1822 he was in the employ of the American Sunday-School Union, and in its service lived a while in Cincinnati, but chiefly in Boston. In 1841 he was licensed as a Congregational preacher. His chief works are:-Poetry of Life, 1819; Poems, 1822; Lyrics, September, 1822; and, after a long interval, Poems and Lyrics, 1842; Poetry of the Heart, 1845; Sacred and Miscellaneous Poems, 1846; Poetry of Life, 1847; The Sunday School, etc., 1848; Late and Earlier Poems, 1849. Some of these are reprints; but Griswold called him "the most industrious and voluminous of our religious poets." Some of his hymns have been extensively used, especially the two beginning "There is an hour," which appeared in his first volume, 1819. F. M. BIRD.

TARASIIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople; d. 808; was secretary of state during the reign of Constantine and Irene; and, when the empress discovered that he was an ardent worshipper of images, she raised him, in 784, to the patriarchal see of Constantinople, though he was a layman. By some adroit manoeuvres he procured the recognition even of Adrian I.; and at the synod first assembled in Constantinople in 785, but broken up by a sudden rebellion in the city, and then re-assembled at Nicaea in 787, the worship of images was once more established in the Greek Church.

TARGUM (i.e., translation) is the name given to a Chaldee version or paraphrase, of the Old Testament. The origin of the Chaldee paraphrase may be traced back to the time of Ezra. After the exile it became the practice to read the law in public to the people, with the addition of an oral paraphrase in the Chaldee dialect. Thus we read in Neh. viii. 8, "So they read in the book of the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense;" which expression the Talmud (Bab. Megillah, fol. 3, col. 1) explains "to give the sense means Targum." At what time these paraphrases were written down, we cannot state; but it must certainly have been at an early period. [In the Talmud Shabbath, fol. 115, col. 1], a written Targum on Job, of the middle of the first century, is mentioned. "Since it is not likely that a beginning should have been made with Job, a still higher antiquity, as very probably belonging to the first renderings of the law, may be assumed" (Zunz, p. 62). The two most important of the Targum of Onkelos on the law, and that of Jonathan ben Uzziel on the earlier and later prophets.

I. As to the person and time of Onkelos, he was, according to tradition, the disciple and friend of the older Gamaliel; and thus the Targum of Onkelos must have originated at least in the first half of the first century of our era.

The language of Onkelos greatly approaches the biblical Chaldee. His translation is, on the whole, very simple and exact. His elucidations of difficult and obscure passages and expressions, perhaps less satisfactory, are commonly those most accredited by internal evidence, and in particular he is worthy of a more careful regard and assent than have usually fallen to his lot. Larger additions, and deviations from the original text, are found mostly in the poetical parts of the Pentateuch (Gen. xlix.; Num. xxiv.; Deut. xxxii. and xxxiii.). In passages relative to the Divine Being we perceive the influence of a bias in certain deviations from the Hebrew text. Anthropomorphic and anthropopathic expressions are avoided, and Elohim and Jehovah are rendered by "the word of God." It is obvious, from the character of the work, that the author was in possession of a richSegoe.

TARGUM.

Editions.—The Targum of Onkelos was first published, with Raashi's commentary on the Pentateuch, Bologna, 1492. It was subsequently reprinted in the rabbinic and polyglot Bibles. [A new and critical edition according to that of Sabionetta (1557) is in course of preparation by Dr. A. Berliner of Berlin, the author of Die Masorah, a Targum (with L. J. Lagrange, 1877). This Targum has been translated into Latin by P. Fagius and by John Merceir, 1568. The translation of Fagius is the best. It was rendered into English by Etheridge, London, 1862—65.]

II. The Targum on the Prophets [i.e., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets] is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uziel, a pupil of Hillel, according to tradition (Baba Batra, 134 a; compare Succah, 28 a, Megillah, 3'), as to his paraphrase, it is simple, and tolerably literal in the historical books; but in the prophetic books the text is more freely handled. Another peculiarity of this Targum is its Haggadical character. As to his paraphrase, it is substantially the same dialect as the Jerusalem or of that day, with which the work is interwoven, and the theological representations, in introducing which a special preference was given to the Book of Daniel. Examples of this are the interpretation of the phrase "stars of God" by "people of God" (Isa. xiv. 19; comp. Dan. viii. 10; 2 Mace. ix. 10), the application of the passage in Dan. xii. 1 to that in Isa. iv. 2, etc. Here and there the author indulges in many perversions. There is little doubt that the text has received several interpolations. This second edition was published at Leipsic, 1949, again in the rabbinic and polyglot Bibles. III. Pseudo-Jonathan and Jerusalmi on the Pentateuch.—Besides the Onkelos Targum, there are still two targumim on the Pentateuch,—one on the whole Pentateuch; the other, on single verses and words. The former is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uziel; the latter goes under the name of Jerusalmi. That Jerusalmi is not the same as the paraphrast on the prophets is acknowledged on all sides. That he wrote at a later period, we see from his mentioning of Constantinople, Mohammed's wives (Chadija and Fatima), and other things which betray the later date,—the second half of the seventh century. That Pseudo-Jonathan had Onkelos before him, a very slight comparison of both shows. Substantially in the same dialect is the Jerusalem or Jerusalmi Targum written. The similarity of both is striking, and there is so much divergence as to prove diversity of authorship. But how is their resemblance to be explained? Only by the fact that both have relation to Onkelos. The author of the Jerusalem Targum worked upon that of Onkelos; his object being to correct it according to certain principles, and to insert in it a selection of Haggadahs current among the people. Pseudo-Jonathan afterwards resumed the same office, and completed what his predecessor had begun. The Jerusalem Targum formed the basis of Jonathan, and its own basis was that of Onkelos. Jonathan used both his predecessors' paraphrases; the former of Jerusalem Targum, that of Onkelos alone.

Editions.—The Pseudo-Jonathan Targum was first published in Venice, 1590; then at Hanau, 1618; Amsterdam, 1640; Prague, 1846. [Berlin, 1705; Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1858]. It is also in the London polyglot, vol. iv. [together with a Latin translation made by Antony Chevalier. It was translated into English by Etheridge, London, 1862—65]. The Jerusalem Targum was first printed by Bomberg, Venice, 1518, [and reprinted in the subsequent rabbinical Bibles issued by him], and in the London polyglot; [also at Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1859; Warsaw, 1875]. Francis Taylor made a Latin version of this Targum (London, 1849); but the more correct one is that of Antony Chevalier, above noticed. There are also commentaries on these Targums.

IV. Targums on the Hagiographa.—These Targums are generally divided into three groups: viz., (a) Job, Psalms, Proverbs; (b) the five Megilloth; (c) Daniel, Chronicles, and Ezra. Tradition ascribes to Rabbi Joseph the Blind the authorship of these Targums; but this is contradicted by writers, even of the thirteenth century. (a) [The Targum on the Book of Job.—A feature of this Targum is its Haggadical character. In many places we find a double Targum. The language is intermixed with Latin and Greek words. It sometimes agrees with the Septuagint or with the Peshito. It was published by John Terentino, Rome, 1618. It was made by Mercier, Francefort, 1683, and Scialai, Rome, 1818. Compare on this Targum, Bacher, in Graetz: Monatschrift, 1871, pp. 202—223; and]

Two or three different versions of the same text occasionally follow extempore without remark, though the introductory notice et al., i.e., another Targum, sometimes precedes. [Comp. Bacher: Das Targum zu den Psalmen, in Graetz's Monatsschrift, 1872, pp. 408-416, 465-473. It was printed in Justiniani's polyglot Psalter (Genoa, 1510) and in the hexagon edition of the Psalter published at Rostock, 1483. It is also printed in the latest rabbinical Bible, Warsaw, 1875. The Antwerp and following polyglots (1572, 1645, 1657) contain the Latin version of Arias Montanus. From the Codex Reuchlin it was published by Lagarde, in his Hagiographa Chaldaica (Leips., 1879), and republished by Neugebauer in his Psalterium Tetraglottum, Tübingen, 1877-79.] (c) The Targum on Proverbs.—This Targum is not Haggadic, and adheres more closely to the original text. Its remarkable agreement with the Syriac version has been noticed,—an agreement which extends even to the choice and position of words; comp. i. 1-8, 9, 10, 12, 13; ii. 3, 9, 10, 13-15; iii. 2-8; iv. 1-3, 20; v. 1, 2, 4, 5; vii. 27; x. 3-5; xxvi. 1; xxvii. 5, 6, 8; xxix. 5, 6; xxx. 1-6; xxxi. 1-3. Comp. Dathe, De Ratione Consensus Versionis Chaldaicae et Syriaca Proverborum Solomonis (Leips., 1764), who endeavors to prove that the Chaldean interpreter was dependent on the Syriac. "Relation of the Syriac Version to the Septuagint and Chaldee," in McClintock and Strong's Cyclop.] (d) The Targum on the Five Megilloth [i.e., on Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, and the Lamentations] is written in an intermediate dialect between the Vulgate, Aramaic, and Proverbs, and the East Arabian of the Babylonian Talmud. The whole, which may perhaps belong to one author, bears the impress of a date considerably posterior to the Talmudic time, and is a Midrashic paraphrase, exceedingly loose and free in character, containing legends, fables, allusions to Jewish history, and many fanciful additions.[1] 1. The Targum on Ruth was published separately, with a Latin translation and scholia by J. Mercier, Paris, 1854. 2. The Targum on Ecclesiastes has been translated by Ginzburg, in his Commentary on Ecclesiastes, London, 1861. 3. The Targum on Canticles is found in the rabbinical Bibles. It has been translated into Latin, and also into English by Gill, at the end of his Commentary on the Song of Solomon, London, 1851. 4. The Targum, rather Targums, on Esther,—One translation of concise form, and adhering closely to the text, occurs in the Antwerp polyglot. It was issued enlarged, with glosses by Tiller, in Targum Prius et Posterus in Esther, studiis F. Tass, London, 1855. This is the Targum Prius, which is contained in the London polyglot. Much more prolix, and amplifying still more the legends of this Targum, is the Targum Posterus, in T eller. [Its final reduction probably belongs to the eleventh century. With a commentary, the second Targum is found in the War saw rabbinical Bible. A separate edition, with notes, etc., was published by Munk. Targum Scheni zu d. Buche Esther, Berlin, 1876. It has been translated into German by P. Cassel, in an appendix to his Das Buch Esther, Berlin, 1878. It has been treated in essay by Reise, Das Targum Scheni zu dem Buche Esther, in Graetz's Monatsschrift, 1876, pp. 161 sq., 276 sq., 398 sq.] 5. The Targum on the Book of Chronicles was published from an Erfurt codex of the year 1343, by Beck (Augsburg, 1860-68), with learned notes and a Latin translation. Another edition was published by Wilkins (Amsterdam, 1715), from a codex belonging to the Cambridge University, with a Latin version. [This latter was lately republished by Rahmer (Thorn, 1866), with the deviations from Beck's edition. The origin of this Targum cannot be put earlier than the eighth century, or the beginning of the ninth. Comp. A geographical or ethnographical idea, to comprehend which it is necessary to examine the different passages in which this word occurs. 1. What is meant by Tarshish in the genealogical table, Gen. x. 4, 5, where it is placed among the sons of Javan,—Elishah and Kittim and Tarshish and Dodanim, (a) the Dorians (Zeller, Lionnet); (b) the Tyreans (or Etruscans, Tus kans), so Knobel; (c) Tarso in Cilicia, so Delitzsch; (d) a famous port or region, so Movers. 2. As for the passages of the Bible, there is no doubt that Tarshish is to be fixed somewhere in or near Spain: so already Eusebius. For Spain we must also look on account of the metals (Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 12) which were brought from thence. There can therefore be no doubt that Tarshish must be fixed near the mouth of the Ebro or the Guadalquivir. In fixing more precisely the locality, Movers, with whom Knobel also seems to agree, has come to the conclusion that Tarshish-Tartessus was not the name of a city, but that it was... the name of a people and country in the south-west of Spain, beyond the Columns of Hercules. With this view of Movers agree not only the biblical notices, but also the older Greek writers. This also will explain the fact, that nowhere the destruction of Tartessus is mentioned. With this fact, that Tarshish is the name of a Spanish people and country, all etymological efforts to derive the word from the Semitic care in vain.

In fine, the two passages of the Book of Chronicles in which Tarshish occurs need to be mentioned. While we read in 1 Kings x. 22, that Solomon had at sea a navy of Tarshish with a navy of Hiram, bringing once in three years gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks, which (with reference to 1 Kii gs ix. 26-28) leads to the supposition that a voyage to Ophir is meant, — Tarsish-ships intended for Ophir were changed into ships going to Tarshish. Keil's efforts to save the correct statement of the chronicle-writer are unsatisfactory; and we can only assume, with Bleek (Eindeitung, pp. 387 sq.), that the writer did not correctly understand the expression, hence his endeavor to fix it more precisely, which he did in an incorrect manner,—a view which is also adopted by Bertheau and Ewald; or, with Movers, that in the course of time the knowledge of the real Tarshish was lost among the Hebrews, and that it came to mean all distant countries in the west or in the south, or, as Movers says, a western and eastern Tarshish.

II. A precious stone, which was probably found in Tarshish, whence it took its name (Exod. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13; Ezek. i. 16, x. 9, xxvii. 13; Cant. v. 14; Dan. x. 6). The Septuagint, followed by Josephus, makes it the "chrysolite" or topaz. Comp. BRAUN; De Vestitu Sacerdol., ii. 17.

III. Proper noun (Esth. i. 14; 1 Chron. vii. 10).

E. OSANDER.

TAR'SUS, the chief town of Cilicia, was in Xenophon's time a city of some considerable consequence (Anab., i, 2, 23). In later times it was renowned as a place of education under the early Roman emperors; and Strabo compares it in this respect to Athens and Alexandria, giving, as regards the zeal for learning shown by the residents, the preference to Tarsus (xiv. 673). In the Christian, Tarshish is of the greatest importance, because it was the birthplace and early residence of the apostle Paul. His rabbinic training he received at Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 3). At Tarsus he prepared himself for his apostolic work; and here, as well as in the neighborhood, he first preached (Acts ix. 11, 30, xi. 24, xxii. 39, xxii. 25 sq., xxiii. 34). At a very early period Tarsus had a Christian church, and at the time of the Council of Nice it had an archiepiscopal see. In the period of the crusades Tarsus had an archiepiscopal see. The learning which was there cultivated exercised also its influence upon the Christians there. We only mention Diodorus of Tarsus, the founder of the school of Antioch, and Theodore of Tarsus, whom Pope Vitalianus sent to England as archbishop of Canterbury in the year 687. The caliph Harun al Rashid fortified the city, especially against the Byzantines; but under the Turkish regime it lost all its former splendor. Many ruins remind of the former magnificence of Tarsus; but the city is dirty, and has about six thousand inhabitants. In modern times the European residents have contributed largely to the amelioration of its affairs. It is remarkable, that up to this day the main industry is the same as in the time of the apostle (Acts xviii. 3).

TAR'TAN (2 Kings xviii. 17; Isa. xx. 1), not a proper name, but an Assyrian title equivalent to our field-marshail, — the commander-in-chief of the army. This officer occupied the highest rank, and is named immediately after the king. A tartan mentioned in the inscriptions as being under Sennacherib was Belemurani, and it was quite likely, that he was the one sent to Jerusalem to solicit the people to revolt from Egypt. TASCODRUGITES (from ταςός, "a wooden nail," and παντος, "a nose"), a nickname applied to an heretical sect which arose in Galatia in the fourth century, because they placed the finger on the nose while praying: Epiphanius (Hær., 48) and Augustine (De Hær., 83). According to Theodoret, they rejected the doctrines of the sacraments, the incarnation, etc.

TASMANIA is a triangular-shaped island, a hundred and twenty miles south of the Australian Continent. It is situated between 40° and 44° south latitude, and between 144° and 149° east longitude. In extent, it is one hundred and seventy miles from north to south, and one hundred and sixty from east to west, with an area of over fifteen millions of acres. It is nearly the size of Scotland. The climate is proverbially one of the most healthy and delightful in the world. The annual rainfall averages twenty-four inches; being higher than on the Australian Continent, and lower than in Britain and America. The mean midwinter temperature is about 46° F.; and that of midsummer, 63° F. There are no extremes of heat or cold. The winter is scarcely severe enough to merit the name. Cattle are turned out in all seasons; and life in the open air may be enjoyed all the year round. The scenery is in harmony with the climate; and the island is a favorite resort for people from neighboring colonies, and travellers from a distance. It was discovered by the Dutch navigator Abel Tasman in 1642, who named it Van Diemen's Land, in honor of Anthony van Diemen, governor of Batavia, whom he had served. The work of the first discoverer remained as he left it till the closing years of the eighteenth century, when Capt. Cook and others gradually opened up what had so long been as a sealed book. The settlement of the colony took place in 1803, when the convict establishment at Botany Bay, near Sydney, which had existed for about fourteen years, being overcrowded, a number of the most dangerous felons had to be dispersed, and were brought to Tasmania. Transportation ceased a quarter of a century ago; and in 1856 the event was signalled by changing the name from "Van Diemen's Land" to "Tasmania," in honor of the rightful discoverer. Practically there is now nothing to remind one that the land was once a convict settlement. The aborigines, who presented, probably, almost the lowest type of savage tribe, numbered somewhere from five thousand to ten thousand in the early part of the century. The last of them died in 1896. Tasmania, like other colonies, has a governor of her own, appointed by the British cabinet, who holds office for six years. The Parliament consists of two chambers, the Legislative Council with sixteen members, and the House of Assembly with thirty-two members, both elective. The system of education is compulsory, secular, and free. "By exhibitions from the schools, a certain number of pupils of both sexes are enabled annually, even in the absence of private resources, to proceed to the best private schools, and thus qualify themselves eventually for examination for the local degree of associate of arts. Two Tasmanian scholarships, of two hundred pounds a year each, tenable for four years at a British university, are awarded annually to associates of arts (male) who pass a prescribed examination." There is no lack of mechanics' institutes, public libraries, and scientific societies. New books, and all leading British and some American periodicals and journals, arrive regularly. The population is now only a hundred and twenty thousand, and composed of English, Irish, and Scotch, without almost any admixture of foreign nationalities. But there are signs of awakening activity and enterprise, giving hope of a successful future. Mineral and other resources are being vigorously developed; and by liberal land-laws such encouragement is given to immigration as affords a reasonable prospect of a quick, though it may not be rapid, increase of population. The chief exports are wool, tin, timber, gold, jam, fruit, hops, grain, bark, stud-sheep, etc. Hobart is the capital, with a population (in 1878) of 22,500. Launceston, the only other considerable town, has 13,000.

As in the rest of Australasia, the usual religious bodies flourish in Tasmania; although it may be noted that the Presbyterian Church has not been quite so prosperous as in the other colonies. There is an Anglican and a Roman-Catholic bishop. The church-buildings throughout the country are suitable, and many as choice as inns, especially St. David's Cathedral and St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Hobart, and St. Andrew's, Launceston. There is no state church. For about fifty years, however, after the settlement of the colony, the ministers of the churches of England, Scotland, and in some cases in the position of colonial chaplains, paid by government, like other civil servants. But the State-aid Abolition Act put an end to this quarter of a century ago; the churches receiving as compensation a certain sum in government debentures. Most of the Presbyterian ministers, and some of the Episcopalian, come from the Old Country or the neighboring colonies; but progress is being made in all the churches towards training a native ministry. According to a recent census, the nominal returns are as under:—

At the time of the above census the ministers of all denominations numbered a hundred and twenty-nine. As in the case in Australasia generally, they are for the most part efficient pastors, and highly respected. E. S. DUFF.

TATE, Nahum, b. in Dublin, 1652; d. Aug. 12, 1715, in the precincts of the Mint in Southwark, being in hiding from his creditors; was a son of Faithful Tate, D.D., a voluminous but long-forgotten versifier; educated at Trinity College, Dublin; went to London; became poet-laureate, 1800; published various poems of no great fame or value. He is remembered by a New Version of the Psalms of David, made in conjunction with Nicholas Brady, D.D., who was born at Brandon, Ireland, 1659, and died 1726; held preferments in London, and at Richmond, Surrey; published some sermons, and a Translation of the Envoi. It is impossible to assign the precise authorship in the case of any of their renderings; but Tate is supposed to have been the better poet, and to have shown it chiefly here. Twenty psalms appeared 1695, and the entire psalter 1696. This first edition is rare; "as, from some objectionable passages, the whole edition was recalled and destroyed." It was soon after (probably by 1698) revised, and in parts rewritten. Having been by the king "allowed and permitted to be used in all such churches, chapels, and congregations shall think fit to receive the same" (Dec. 3, 1698), it was recommended by the Bishop of London, May 23, 1698. Though it may not be entirely in popular acceptance, not entirely driving out Sternhold and Hopkins till the present century was somewhat advanced, and being, in turn, displaced of late by the greatly increased supply and use of hymns in the Church of England. In one section, at least, of this country, it was largely used in preference to the New-England version, or Bay Psalm-Book; many editions appearing in Boston between 1750 and 1800. This extended and long-continued use may be pleaded against the unfavorable opinions of critics. James Montgomery speaks of its "neutral propriety," and found it "nearly as inanimate, though a little more refined," than the old version; and Bishop Wilberforce gave "Tate and Brady" as the definition of a "dry-salter." From the stand-point of modern taste, no one has ever succeeded in verifying the entire psalter. Any close rendering is designed to be sung out of necessity made difficult reading. Of all such attempts, that of Tate and Brady is probably the least disgraceful, and the most useful. It contains some fairly poetical portions, many that are still well adapted to public TATIAN.

TATIAN, one of the most prominent Christian writers of the second century; was a native of Assyria, but thoroughly conversant with Greek-Roman civilization. His education was that of a common sophist, combining a rich and varied store of learned lore with a more or less superficial training of rhetoric; and his life, which, however, is very imperfectly known, seems to have been that of a common travelling teacher of rhetoric. For a time he went to Rome, heard Justin, received a very deep and decisive impression of Christianity, and wrote his Apology, in which he was a chief authority. He discovered in the Nitrian convent, and secured for the British Museum, a splendid collection of ancient Syriac manuscripts. He published, besides a Coptic grammar (1829) and dictionary (in Latin, 1836), Coptic versions of the Minor (1836) and Major Prophets (1832) 2 vols., and the Apostolical Constitution (1849), and other learned works.

TAULER, Johannes, b. at Strassburg about 1290; d. there June 16, 1361; one of the most prominent representatives of medieval German mysticism, and one of the greatest preachers of his time. Of his life very little is known. He entered the Dominican order, and studied theology in Paris, but drew more mental nourishment from the writings of the Areopagite, St. Bernard, and the mysticism of St. Victor, than from the dialectical exercises of the professors. After finishing his studies, he returned to his native city, where he became acquainted with Meister Eckart, and spent the rest of his life; making short voyages to Basel (where he entered into connection with the Friends of God), to Cologne, and other cities. That he continued officiating during an interdict laid upon Strassburg by the Pope for political reasons, is a legend first put into circulation in the sixteenth century by Speckle. It may contain some kernel of historical fact, not now to be discerned with certainty; but all its main features are due to the eagerness of the Reformers to enroll the great and famous preachers among their forerunners. Still more fictitious is the tale of his conversion by Nicholas of Basel. His works consist of sermons, a few minor treatises, and some letters. The first collected edition of his sermons was printed at Leipzig in 1498, and often reprinted, English translation by Miss Winkworth, London, 1857, and New York, 1858 (edited by Dr. Hitchcock). The Nachfolger des armen Leben Christi, Exercitio super vita et passione Christi, and Institutiones divinae (also called Medulla animae), are not by Tauler. The doctrinal views of Tauler often remind the reader very strongly of those of Meister Eckart, though, generally speaking, they evince another character: the speculative element is weaker; the devotional, stronger. Tauler was of a practical turn of mind, a preacher, not a philosopher. The speculative bearing of his ideas is consequently only slightly developed, while their application to real life is emphasized with great energy. It was this practical, and, for that very reason, truly evangelical tendency of his preaching, which gave him a much greater influence on his time than any of the other celebrated mystical teachers. They were either too metaphysical, as was Meister Eckart, or too fantastic, as was Suso, to reach the great majority of the laity; while the words of Taverner near the end of the 15th and beginning of the 16th century were not at liberty to dispose, but will or otherwise, of the property accumulating from the ecclesiastical income. From the end of the fourteenth century such property was considered as belonging to the church.

The first traces of a real taxation of the clergy occur towards the close of the sixteenth century, and that at once under three different forms. First, an annual tax was levied on the clergy to the cathedral. It was called honor cathedral, or cathedraticum, and, as it was paid during the episcopal visitations, synodal censed, synodus, or synodaticum. It is first met with in Spain, where it was paid in money: Conc. Bracara, c. 1 (572).

In the Frankish Empire, where it was paid in kind, it is mentioned in a capitulium of Charles the Bald (544): in Italy it became common under Innocent III. (d. 1216) and Honorius III. (d. 1227).

Next, a fee was paid, by any one appointed to a benefice, to the patriarch, or archbishop, or bishop who ordained him. In the East it is mentioned as a custom in Asia, xii. 3 (548); and it was no small burden, since it was stipulated that it should not exceed one year's income.

In the West a council of Rome (695) declared that voluntary gifts to the ordaining bishop and his chancery were not simony; but a council of Paris (829), as well as the letters of Ivo of Chartres (Ep. 138), complains of the magnitude of those gifts. The money, which, since the ninth century, the metropolitans paid in Rome for their pallium, was a tax of the same kind; and it became a very heavy one. Finally, it was the duty of the clergy to entertain the bishop on his tour of visitation. This duty, which occurs under various names,—procurationis, mansio parata, circuad, circuturm, albergaria, etc.,”—is first met with in Spain: Conc. Toleti, i. c. 20 (589), and vii. c. 4 (644).

It afterwards became customary for the clergy to rid themselves from this duty by the payment of an annual sum of money; but that custom was forbidden by Innocent IV. (d. 1254), and Concil. Lugdum, ii. c. 1 (1274).

As the constitution of the church more and more assumed the form of a feudal monarchy, the ecclesiastical system of taxation developed in the same direction. Secular rulers, such as the kings of Poland, Hungary, England, Norway, Sweden, Naples, Arragonia, and Portugal, paid an annual tribute (census) to the Pope, thereby recognizing that they held their titles and realms as fiefs of the holy see. The Peter's-pence (denarius Si. Petri), which from several of those countries was paid annually to the Pope by every household, had also a feudal character, and so had the protection-money of many monasteries, the exemption-money of many episcopal sees, etc. Most taxes of this character, however, have afterwards been discontinued, though two still remain, — the subsidium charitativum and the jus deportuum. In a moment of great distress the bishop may levy a tax on the whole clergy of his diocese. This extraordinary subsidium charitativum is first mentioned in Concil. Lateran, iii. c. 6 (1187). Allied to it is the Pope's right to appropriate, under circumstances of distress and for ecclesiastical purposes, one-tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues; which right he did not make excessive, for, as, for instance, during the crusades. The jus deportuum, or annafl, or annate, originated under Honorius
TAYLOR, Dan, founder of New Connection of General Baptists (see p. 2203); b. at Northowram, Halifax, York, Eng., Dec. 21, 1778; d. in London, Dec. 2, 1816. Like Luther, a miner’s son, and at five years of age worked in the mine with his father. He was strong, fearless, and eager for learning, and gave promise of the prodigious industry of his manhood by carrying his books into the coal-mine, and converting it into a study. As with all superior lads, religion was his first thought. His sense of sin was acute, and his passionate yearning for pardon and light urged him to travel ten and twenty miles to hear Wesley, Whitefield, and Grimshaw. But he did not rest till he understood and accepted the message of universal love in John iii. 16: that gave the trend to his character and career. He joined the Wesleyans, and became a “local preacher”; but his essentially independent and growing spirit forced him out of the Methodist ranks, and he accepted the pastorate of a few like-minded folk at Nook, Birchencliffe. Further study of the Bible led him to the Baptist idea, and so he came into contact with the General Baptists. Detecting their Unitarian drift, he confronted it, and sought to arrest it. Failing, he, together with the Barton Independent Baptists, formed, in June, 1770, the New Connection of General Baptists. Now he found his true sphere, and he entered as a pastor with conspicuous fidelity, first at Birchencliffe (1773–83), next at Halifax (1783–85), and finally at Church Street, Whitechapel, London (1785–1816). He meanwhile wrote copiously and ably on the theological questions of the day, and also shaped the course of the General Baptist denomination. He was its leading spirit for nearly half a century, founded its college in 1797, started and edited its magazine, 1788, presided at its annual gatherings, and impressed his sturdy, enterprising, progressive, and liberal individuality on its institutions and churches. His chief literary works are, Fundamentals of Religion in Faith and Practice, Dissertations on Singing in Public Worship, Letters on Andrew Fuller’s Scheme.

TAYLOR, Isaac, English theological writer; b. at Lavenham, Suffolk, Aug. 17, 1787; d. at Stanford Rivers, Essex, June 28, 1865. His father was a line engraver, and later a dissenting minister, and author of popular children’s books; but he entered the Established Church. After following for a while the profession of engraver and artist, he turned his attention to literature and inventions. He invented two very ingenious engraving-machines; one for illustrations, and another for patterns upon rollers for calico-printing. As an author he was very prolific and original. Among his religious and theological writings may be mentioned History of Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times, 1827; Natural History of Enthusiasm, 1829 (very popular); Natural History of Fanaticism, 1833; Spiritual Despotism, 1836; Physical Theory of Another Life, 1838 (after this work he dropped his incognito); Ancient Christianity, and the Doctrines of the Oxford Tracts for the Times, 1839–40, 8 parts, 4th ed., with supplement and indexes, 1844, 2 vols. (a reply to those who desired to restore “primitive” doctrine, and magnify the “Primitive” Church, by showing the seamy side of the early church; but it goes too far, and thus really conveys a false impression); Man Responsible for his Dispositions, Opinions, and Conduct, 1840; Loyola and Jesuism, 1849: Wesley and Methodism, 1851; The Restoration of Belief, 1855; Logic in Theology, 1859; Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1861; Contributions on the Penitence of Sin, 1866 (a reply to Bishop Colenso). Almost all his books have been reprinted in New York, and to the reprint of the Spirit of Hebrew Poetry Dr. W. Adams contributed an introduction.

TAYLOR, Jane, was b. in London, Sept. 23, 1778; and d. at Ongar, Essex, April 12, 1824. She learned her father’s profession as an engraver, which was soon deserted for literature. Her life was spent mainly at Lavenham, Colchester, Ongar, and Marazion in Cornwall. Her memoir of her brother Isaac appeared 1888. She was among the best and most successful of writers for youth. Of her many publications (Display, Essays in Rhyme, Contributions of Q. Q., etc.), not the least important were the Original Poems, 1805, and Hymns for Infant Minds, 1809 or 1810 (new ed., London, 1883), written conjointly with her sister Ann (1782–1866), afterwards Mrs. Gilbert. In these it is possible to fix the exact period with certainty. F. M. Bird.

TAYLOR, Jeremy, —the Chrysostom of English theology, but in brilliancy of imagination surpassing his Greek antitype,—was born at Cambridge, Aug. 15, 1013. There he entered Calus
Taylor, John, an English Unitarian; wrote a number of hymns, which appeared mostly in Christ after a sacramental, that is, a real and spiritual manner. Generally it may be said of Jeremy Taylor that he was one of the last men from whom qualified and cautious statements could be expected. He certainly was like a cloud, "which moveth altogether, if it move at all." Upon the doctrine of justification he is very misty, deprecating inquiries respecting it as leading into useless intricacies; in short, cutting away the ground from any definite theological representation of it whatever. In argument he is often defective; in declamation, always unrivalled.

In 1658 Taylor removed to Ireland, and carried on clerical ministrations at Lisburn and Portmore. He returned to London in 1660, and promoted the restoration of Charles II. by signing the Loyal Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry in the April of that year. In 1660 also, he published his elaborate Ductor Dubilantium, or the Rule of Conscience in all her General Measures, pronounced by Hallam to be "the most extensive and learned work on casuistry which has appeared in the English language." Taylor's acuteness, and command of quotations, his insight into human nature, and his pleasing address against it, and advocated a theory of comprehension which he had not the power to put in practice. It was, in fact, an eloquent plea in behalf of deprived Episcopal clergymen, based on principles broader than were sufficient to support their cause alone, but which, when the tables were turned, he was not prepared to apply to Presbyterians. The beautiful Life of Christ followed in 1655; and this was succeeded the same year by his Holy Living, completed in 1651 by his Holy Dying. Some of his Sermons came next, and in 1652 appeared his Discourse on Baptism. More Sermons were issued in 1653, and in 1654 came forth from the press his book on The Real Presence of Christ in the Sacrament. The Golden Grove, a guide of infant devotion, succeeded in 1655; and in 1656 a Collection of Polcmical and liltoral Discourses was given to the world. These are remarkable for the width of their original illustration, multifarious learning, ingenious argument, poetical imagination, and exuberant, florid diction. The rhythm of his sentences flows like music, and captivates the taste, when his reasoning does not satisfy the judgment. His opinions were all struck in the Anglo-Catholic mould; though he practically claimed for himself "a liberty of prophesying," which led him sometimes to break bounds, to wander out of the orthodox enclosure, and to enter fields of Pelagian thought. His Unum Necessarium, or the Doctrine and Practice of Repentance, printed in 1655, especially laid him open to this charge, and involved him in very serious controversy. He was one of those thinkers who cannot endure the trammels of a system, and though faithful, on the whole, to a certain creed, feel compelled by a restlessness of speculation to deviate from it in many particulars. He was decidedly anti-Calvinistic and anti-Blasphemous. Of the Mayhew Tables and the ebony dragon with immense arbor, speaking extravagantly of baptismal regeneration, piling up figures on figures to illustrate its efficacy, and, though less figurative in his exposition of the Lord's Supper, insisting that the symbols of bread and wine become changed into the body and blood of TAYLOR.

Aspland’s Selection, 1810. Some of them possess decided merit, and have been widely used in our churches.

TAYLOR, Nathaniel William, D.D., an eminent Congregationalist preacher, theological teacher, and author; b. at New Milford, Conn., June 20, 1758; d. in New Haven, March 10, 1835; was admitted to the Society of New Haven. He was graduated at Yale College in 1807; studied theology with President Dwight, and became pastor of the First Church in New Haven in 1811, which office he resigned in 1822, to take the chair of Dogmatic Theology in the theological department of Yale College, where he continued to teach until his death. As a preacher he was singularly impressive, combining solidity and clearness of thought with a remarkable eloquence. Unusual results followed upon his sermons, especially in connection with “revivals.” From early youth deeply interested in the problems of theology, and endowed with moral and mental powers of a very high order, he worked out, on the basis of the previous New-England theology, an elaborate system, which gained numerous adherents, and powerfully affected theological thought and preaching in America beyond the circle of its professors and advocates. It was popularly termed “The New-Haven Theology.” Sometimes it was called “Taylorism.” It was one of the most influential of the types of so-called “New-School Divinity.” There were able coadjutors of Dr. Taylor, notably his colleagues,—Rev. Eleazar T. Fitch, D.D. (b. 1791; d. 1871), college preacher at Yale from 1817 to 1852, and professor of homiletics, a man of rare and versatile powers; and Rev. Chauncey A. Goodrich, D.D. (b. 1790; d. 1860), also an influential professor in the college and in the divinity school at Yale, and the principal editor of The Christian Spectator, the review in which many of the controversial essays of “The New-Haven Divinies,” were published. But the peculiarities of “New-Haven Divinity” as it existed in the generation among whom Dr. Taylor was a prominent leader, are mainly and justly associated with his name.

When Dr. Taylor began his investigations, New-England theology asserted, as it had done from the time of Edwards, a doctrine of natural liberty. There must be, on the one hand, a firm foundation for the doctrine of decrees and universal providential government, and for the other side of human responsibility, and thus accommodate the introduction, or divine permission, of sin, from the beginning of responsible agency is one of the fundamental questions of the problem, in Dr. Taylor’s view, is in the union of the doctrine of the previous certainty of every act of the will—a certainty given by its antecedents, collective and particular, and the power of free and voluntary choice. Freedom is exemption from something: it is exemption from the constraining operation of that law of cause and effect which brings events to pass in the material world. If the antecedents of choice produce the consequent according to that law, without qualification, there is no liberty. Yet Dr. Taylor did not hold to the liberty of indifference or of contingence which had been charged upon the Arminians, and had been denied by his New-England predecessors. He held to a connection between choice and its antecedents, of such a character as to give in every case a previous certainty that the former will be what it actually is. The ground or reason of this certainty lies in the constitution of the agent, and the motives under which he acts; that is to say, in the antecedents taken together. The invariable connection of these with the consequent, the Divine Mind perceives, though we may not dogmatize on the exact mode of his perception. The precise nature of the connection between the antecedents and consequent, Dr. Taylor did not profess to explain; but he held that the same antecedents will uniformly be followed by the same consequent. There are causes which do not necessitate their effect, but simply and solely give the certainty of it. Now, all admit that every event is previously certain. It is a true proposition, that what is to occur to-morrow will thus occur. No matter, then, what may be the ground of this certainty, as long as the events in question are not necessitated, there is no interference with moral liberty.

The leading principles of Dr. Taylor’s system may now be stated:—

1. All sin is the voluntary action of the sinner, in disobedience to a known law.

2. Sin, however, is a permanent principle, or state of the nature of natural inability as the condition of responsible agency. It rejected the imputation of Adam’s sin in every form; but, outside of the Hopkinius school, it associated with this denial a vague theory of an hereditary, sinful taint, or a sinful propensity to sin, propagated with the race,—what Dr. Taylor termed “physical depravity”; and it vindicated the introduction, or divine permission, of sin, by affirming that sin is the necessary means of the greatest good, and that the system of things is better with sin than without it.

The aim of Dr. Taylor was to relieve New-England theology of remaining difficulties on the side of human responsibility, and thus accomplish the end which it had always kept in view. The fundamental question was that of liberty and necessity. There must be, on the one hand, a firm foundation for the doctrine of decrees and universal providential government, and for the other side of human responsibility, and thus accommodate the introduction, or divine permission, of sin, from the beginning of responsible agency is one of the greatest good, and that the system of things is better with sin than without it.

nature, since, in all the appropriate circumstances of their being, they sin from the first. The certain of their sin as soon as they are capable of sinning is the consequence of two factors.—the constitution and condition of the soul (subjective), and the situation (objective). These together constitute nature in the statement, “We are sinners by nature.”

2. There is the proximate efficient cause of all his voluntary states and actions. No man is necessitated to choose as he does. There is ever a power to the contrary. A sinner can cease to love the world supremely, and can choose God for his portion.

5. Natural ability being a real power and not an incapable faculty, there must be something in a sinner’s mind to which right motives can appeal, some point of attachment for the influences of the law and the gospel. Hence the importance of the distinction between the sensibility and will, or of the threefold classification of mental powers, which Dr. Taylor was among the first to introduce.

6. Dr. Taylor believed, with a great company of philosophers (from Aristotle to the present time), that the involuntary love or desire of personal happiness is the subjective, psychological spring of all choices. Benevolence is the choice of the highest good of the universe in preference to every thing that can come into competition with it. But one’s own highest happiness can never thus come into competition with it. Virtuous self-love and virtuous benevolence denote one and the same complex power to the contrary. A sinner can cease to love the world supremely, and can choose God for his portion.

7. The author of regeneration is the Holy Spirit. The change that takes place in the soul is due to his influence so exerted as to effect that change in the sense of rendering it infallibly certain. It is a change of character. It is the production of love to God as the supreme object of choice, in the room of love to the world. Now, a sinner is naturally able to make this revolution in the ruling principle of his life. But there is a moral inability which constitutes practically an insuperable obstacle; and this is overcome only by the agency of the Spirit, who moves upon the soul, and induces, without coercing, them to comply with the requirements of the gospel.

8. Dr. Taylor’s doctrine on the relation of the introduction of sin, and its continuance to the divine administration, accords with the general spirit of his theology. Theologians from Calvin to Bellamy had discussed the question, as if there were only this alternative,—the existence of sin, or the prevention of it by the power of God. Dr. Taylor held that we are not shut up to the alternative just stated. There is a third way in which sin might have been prevented, and that is by the free act of the beings who commit it. It is not true, then, that sin is in any case better than holiness in its stead would be, or that sin, all things considered, is a good thing. But it may be true that the non-prevention of sin by the act of God is in certain cases better than its forcible prevention by his act.

Dr. Taylor took up the question in answering sceptical objections to the benevolence of the Creator. The ground that he took in reply was this, that it may be impossible for sin to be excluded by the act of God from the best possible system. The system would be better without sin, if this result were secured by the free action of the creatures comprising it, with no other alteration of its characteristics. It might not be so good if the same result were reached by divine intervention. We are too little acquainted with the relations of divine power to free agency to declare confidently what extent the exertion of such power is beneficial when the universal system is taken into view. It is wiser and more modest to judge of what is best by what we actually see done.

9. Dr. Taylor’s conception of election is conformed to his doctrine respecting the divine permission of sin. Regeneration is the act of God. He has determined to exert such a degree of influence upon a certain part of the race who are sinful by their own act, and justly condemned, as will result with infallible certainty in their conversion. He is not bound to give such influence in equal measure to all; rather does he establish a system of influence which his omniscient mind foresees to be most productive of holiness in his kingdom as a whole. It is not the act or merit of individuals that earns or procures this effectual influence, but that large expediency which has respect to the entire kingdom, and the holiness to be produced within it.

He organizes a plan, not in an arbitrary way, but in order to secure the best results that are attainable consistently with the wise and benevolent laws that underlie his whole administration.

TAYLOR, Thomas Rawson, b. at Otsett, near Wakefield, May 7, 1807; d. at Airedale, March 7, 1835; a Congregational minister at Sheffield, and tutor at Airedale College. He wrote only a few hymns, best known among them is “I’m but a stranger here.” His Memoir and Remains appeared 1836.

TAYLOR, William, D.D., a prominent and venerable minister of the Presbyterian Church in Canada; b. in the parish of Dennie, Scotland, March 18, 1803; d. in Montreal, Can., Sept. 4, 1876. His father was a farmer. After the usual preparation in school and college, he attended the Theological Hall of the Secession Church for five sessions, and was licensed to preach in 1827.
In 1831 he was ordained the pastor of a congregation in Peebles. In 1833, along with two other ministers from Quebec, Dr. Taylor went to Mon-real immediately after the city had suffered severely from the scourge of cholera. He was immediately called as the pastor of a congregation just formed, and was installed July, 1833.
He retained the same pastoral charge till the close of his life,—forty-three years. Dr. Taylor was a thorough scholar, an able theologian, an earnest preacher, and a wise counsellor in all ecclesiastical affairs. He was an acknowledged leader in the church courts, and held a high place in the esteem of his brethren in ministry. He labored for years most indefatigably to secure the union of all the branches of the Presbyterian Church, and had the happiness to see its accomplishment in 1875. He was truly an apostle in the cause of temperance, and an able advocate of every cause of social and moral reform. He was specialiy interested in the evangelization of the French Canadians. His manners were courtey yet affable, his devotion to his work zealous and unflagging, his ministry successful and greatly blessed, his influence great and widely extended, his life pure and eminently useful, his death calm and peaceful; and his memory is cherished, not only by the congregation whom he served so long and so faithfully, and by the city where his labors abounded, but by the whole denomination, which long regarded him as one of her pillars. He published many articles and several able discourses on the topics of the day. WILLIAM ORMSTON.

TELEOLOGY (from τέλος, "an end," and λόγος, of speculative researches concerning the final ends involved in and revealed by the phenomena of nature. Theologcal or physical argument on the existence of God is based on this line of evidence.

TELLER, Wilhelm Abraham, b. at Leipzig, Jan.
9, 1761; d. at Kön-an-der-Spree, Dec. 9, 1864; one of the representatives of the rationalism of the eighteenth century. He was educated, and pursued his theological studies, in his native city, and began to lecture at the university there in 1755.
In 1761 he was appointed professor of theology at Helmstadt, and in 1764 he published his Lehrbuch der Neu-Glaubens. The book created quite a sensation, though it represents rationalism only in its first stage. Irrespective of the time-honored scheme which ruled with almost absolute authority, he arranged all the materials of doctrinal theology under the two heads, the realm of sin and the realm of grace; and all such doctrines as would not fit in that arrangement he omitted.
The doctrine of God he referred to natural religion; the doctrine of the Trinity he did not mention; the expression "hereditary sin" he declared a contradicio in adjudio. It became a little difficult for him to keep his chair; but, just as the situation grew dangerously difficult, he was appointed confessor to Louis XIV. after the death of Pere La Chaise in 1709.
He was fanatical, ambitious, unimpressible, a master of diplomatic trickery; and he had the old king completely in his power. The destruction of Port-Royal, the condemnation of Quenel's writings, the enforcement of the bull Unigenitus, were among his principal exploits. After the death of Louis XIV. he was banished from the court.

TEMPERANCE. Our English word "temperance" is of Latin derivation. Its etymological meaning may perhaps be best understood by observing the analogy of the English word "temper.
substances, mortar for example, are properly tempered when their ingredients are mingled in correct proportions, with the result of making the article exactly fit for the purposes for which it is designed.
A steel tool is tempered to a standard degree of hardness. Temperance as a virtue is a "new religion." The same is, of course, the case with such expressions as law and gospel, sacrifice and atonement, etc. The edict of 1788 again brought him into difficulties; and on account of his vote in the trial of Schulze he was sentenced to suspension for three months, and a fine to the insane asylum. Nevertheless, in 1792 he was able to publish his Die Religion der Volkkommeren, which represents the very perfection of rationalism. Christianity is there explained to have been, from the very day of its birth, in a steady process of development, which will not stop until it has made the Christian religion a religion of morals only. See Fr. NICOLAI:

This is, therefore, a good word by which to translate the Greek "Epimen" of the New Testament. The latter term properly denotes mastery over one's self. A self-controlled character is a well-tempered character, at least in some important respects.

But it is not without good reason that the word has come to be prevailingly restricted to a much narrower meaning. The use of intoxicating drinks is so conspicuously connected with the loss of self-mastery and of proper balance, that we very naturally connect the terms "temperance" and "intemperance" peculiarly and almost exclusively with the drinking-habit.

Intoxicants, in the form of wine and beer at least, have been known from the earliest historical times; and the vice of drunkenness has also been known. This is evident from the familiar bibli cal instances of Noah, Nabal, and others, from the figures on the early Egyptian monuments, from the Greek myths concerning Bacchus, and from many other sources. But the conditions of the problem of drunkenness have been materially changed within the last few centuries by the extent to which the art of distillation has been developed. This art has long been known and practised; but it was not until a comparatively recent period that it came to be the powerful means it now is for increasing and cheapening the world's stock of intoxicating beverages.

According to an article by Professor Theodore W. Dwight, LL.D., published in the Independent of April 27, 1882, the earliest recognition of the existence of distilled liquors to be found in English legislation was in the year 1629; and it was not until much later in the seventeenth century, that these came to be recognized as in general use. As might have been expected, their introduction greatly increased the evils of intemperance. Says the Encyclopaedia Britannica, in its article on "Gin," --

"In the early part of the eighteenth century, gin-shops multiplied with great rapidity in London; and the use of the beverage increased to an extent so demoralizing, that retailers actually exhibited placards in their windows, intimating that there might get drunk by drinking a gill, and that clean bow, in comfortable cellars, would be provided for customers."

Contemporaneously with these changes in the facilities for the practice of drunkenness occurred certain other changes in men's habits of living, which also greatly affected the question of the use of alcoholic drinks. Coffee was known as early as 975 A.D., but it was first brought from Abyssinia into Arabia early in the fifteenth century. Coffee-houses were established in Constantinople about the middle of the sixteenth century, and in London in 1632; and, before the close of the seventeenth century, coffee was a customary beverage in Europe. Chocolate and tea came to be generally used as beverages within a few years of the same time.

In both these directions, throughout Europe and America, and parts of Asia and Africa, the generation of men who were of middle age about the year 1700 witnessed a radical revolution in the conditions of human life. In their childhood, fermented alcoholic drinks were the one resource of men, not only for purposes of intoxication, but for all the purposes for which tea, cocoa, and coffee are now employed. They lived to see the fermented beverages largely superseded, in the one case, by the use of them by the hot drinks which have ever since been on our tables. In their childhood, however, plenty wine and ale may relatively be said to have been, they were yet scarce enough so that habitual drunkenness was beyond the reach of why except those who had access to the cellars of the rich. Before they died nobody could get drunk, at any time, for a penny.

It should be added to this, that the use of tobacco became general during the seventeenth century. And as having a real, though less direct, connection with the temperance problem, we must count all the marvellous discoveries and inventions which have rendered human life in these later centuries so utterly different from what it ever was before.

These radical changes of condition naturally led to corresponding changes in the convictions of men in regard to the use of alcoholic drinks. To trace the development of these convictions is to sketch the history of the modern temperance reform in America and the Old World.

Until the current century, the general opinion of mankind has certainly not condemned the use of intoxicating drinks, nor even occasional drunkenness, provided the drinker kept himself prudently guarded from further bad results. Philo the Jew, contemporary with Jesus, wrote extensive treatises on Drunkenness and Sobriety, which are largely of the nature of allegorical comment on the passages in the Mosaic writings which mention the use of wine. These include a formal discussion of the question, "Whether the wise man will get drunk?" He replies by citing the expressed opinions of men, as well as evidence of other sorts, on both sides of the question. He says that "the sons of physicians and philosophers of high repute . . . have left behind ten thousand treatises on drunkenness," and censures these for the narrowness of their treatment of the subject. He insists on the difference between the drinking of "unmixed wine," which will produce intoxication, and that of lighter or diluted wines. He calls unmixed wine a poison and a medicine. He condemns the drinking contests which were common in his day. He exposes in graphic pictures the wretchedness of drunken orgies and riots, and the deterioration of health and morals which results therefrom. He holds that "the wise man will never of his own accord think fit to enter upon a contest of hard drinking, unless there were great things at stake, such as the safety of his country, or the honor of his parents," etc. But he none the less indorses what he represents to be the current opinion; namely, that a wise man will occasionally get drunk. His helplessness when drunk no more disproves his wisdom than if it resulted from a bilious attack, or from sleep, or from death. Philo intimates that the opposite opinion is quite respectably defended, but proves, to his own complete satisfaction, that it is indefensible. His explanation of the doctrine of the Scriptures in the matter is, that "Moses looks upon an unmixed wine as a symbol, not of one thing only, but of many; namely, of trifling, and of playing the fool, and of all kinds of insensibility and of insatiable greediness, and of a cheerfulness which comprehends many other objects," and the like. Philo's opinion does not seem to be at all that the Scriptures commend drinking but condemn excess, but rather that they either commend or condemn, according to the context in which they look at the case; that is, they commend drinking, and even intoxication, when they associate these with cheerfulness and plenty, and condemn them when they look at them in connection with their bad results or accessories.

Philo's opinions concerning the drinking-habit are certainly those which have been commonly held until our own century. But, as far back as we can trace the matter, we also find a highly reputable line of opinion in favor of total abstinence from intoxicating beverages. Of this, in the eighteenth century, the distinguished Samuel Johnson is an instance. Somewhat earlier in the century, the author of Gil Blas sarcastically admires "the patriotic forecast of those ancient politicians who established places of public resort, where water was dealt out gratis to all customers, and who confined wine to the shops of the apothecaries, that its use might be prohibited, but under the direction of physicians," and the wisdom of those who frequented these resorts, not for "swilling themselves with wine, but...for the decent and economical amusement of drinking warm water." (Adventures of Gil Blas, book ii., chap. 4).

This scurril must have been aimed at opinions held by respectable contemporaries of Le Sage. In 1743 John Wesley, in his General Rules, mentions as sinful, "drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." It is said that in 1738 the trustees of the Colony of Georgia, who were living in London, enacted that "the drink of rum in Georgia be absolutely prohibited, and that all which shall be brought there be staved." In Georgia be absolutely prohibited, and that all which shall be brought there be staved. . . . In 1823 President Nott of Union College published his Temperance, 1818, and the Boston Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, 1813, were not uncommon. In 1818 the Presbyterian General Assembly made a deliverance "not only against actual intemperance, but against all those habits and indulgences which may have a tendency to produce it." In the same year the General Association of Connecticut recommended entire abstinence from ardent spirits; while the Consociation of Fairfield County adopted the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks whatever, especially for "those whose appetite for drink is strong and increasing." The Temperance Society, formed at Moreau, N.Y., 1808, and the Boston Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, 1813, were not total abstainers. In 1818 the Presbyterian Assembly planted itself squarely on the principle that men ought to "abstain from 'even the common use of ardent spirits.'" In 1823 President Nott of Union College published his

"The circumstances affected me not a little, and induced me to write an address to the sober and influential part of the community, inviting them to a serious consideration of the melancholy situation, and the evils and calamitous consequences of intemperance. I insisted that nothing short of the example of that part of society which gives habits to the world, of abstaining altogether from the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes, would correct this alarming evil."

It occurred to Joseph Tallcot to offer his views for the consideration of the members of the Presbyterian synod of Geneva at one of their meetings held in Geneva. In his narrative he says, — "I found my way to the house of Henry Axtell, the Presbyterian clergyman of that place. His brethren from the surrounding country had gone into the village, and call on him for instruction where they might find entertainment among their friends. The master of the house appeared very hospitable, inviting them to partake of his brandy; which they did, with what would be thought moderation. The master of the house propounded the question, whether they would speak against its common use from the pulpit, and use their influence to prevail with others to follow their example."

Joseph Tallcot read his paper, first before a committee, and afterward before the synod, and went his way. The synod, after duly considering it, published it, with resolutions "fully approving it, and solemnly declaring, that from that time they would do the same." When they associatethese with cheerfulness and of a cheerfulness which comprehends many other objects, they either commend or condemn, according to the aspect in which they look at the case; that is, they commend drinking, and even intoxication, when they associate these with cheerfulness and plenty, and condemn them when they look at them in connection with their bad results or accessories.

The revolution in opinion, at least as a great and controlling movement, began in America. A representative incident will indicate its nature. The incident is taken from the Collections of the Cayuga County Historical Society, 1882.
TEMPERANCE.

Sermos on the Evils of Intemperance. In 1826 the American Temperance Society was organized, The National Philanthropist was started, and Dr. Lyman Beecher published his Six Sermons on Intemperance. In the same year Rev. Calvin Chapin, in The Connecticut Observer, advocated abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, and not from distilled spirits merely. From about 1836 this principle came to be generally accepted by the reformers.

The spread of the movement was very rapid in Great Britain, and marvelously rapid in the United States. Societies, local and general, were organized. Temperance books, pamphlets, and newspapers were published in great numbers. Public meetings were held. The pledge was circulated. Total abstainers came to be counted by millions. Lancashire, Eng., contributed the word "teetotal" to characterize the reform. In 1840 six hard drinkers in Baltimore suddenly signed the pledge, and started the "Washingtonian" movement. In a few months, about 1838, the Irish Roman-Catholic priest, Father Mathew, administered the pledge to near a hundred and fifty thousand persons in Cork alone. He was eminently successful in temperance work in different parts of Great Britain, as well as in the United States, which he visited in 1849.

Fuller accounts of the movement in this country may be found in the article on Temperance Reform, in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia, and in the article by Professor J. W. Mears, in the Presbyterian Review for 1881, p. 500; while the temperance article in the Library of Universal Knowledge is pretty full in regard to the movement in Great Britain. To these sources the present article is indebted for a few of its facts and dates.

Many seem to suppose that the effort to secure the legal prohibition of the liquor-traffic is a later and more advanced stage of the temperance reform than the efforts for total abstinence; but this is only true in a modified sense. We have already seen, that there was prohibitory legislation for the Colony of Georgia as early as 1783. Many months before Father Mathew attempted to restrict the use of liquors were accompanied either by demands for the legal restriction of their sale, or by actual legislation for that purpose. Dr. Beecher's Six Sermons emphatically declared the remedy for intemperance to be "the banishment of ardent spirits from the list of lawful articles of commerce," and invoked the interference of legislation to this end, as well as of public sentiment (edition of 1828, p. 64). As the numbers of the temperance men increased, they became more and more pressing in their demands for legislative remedies. During the decade beginning about 1846, they found it easy to carry the elections in most parts of the United States. Rigid prohibitory laws were very generally enacted, and local option laws in a few instances where general prohibition could not be obtained. It proved easier to enact laws, however, than to execute them. In most cases they have either been pronounced unconstitutional, or repealed, or allowed to become a dead letter.

The passage of these laws may, perhaps, be regarded as the culmination of one great movement of temperance reform. The subject has not since been so prominently before the public. This is doubtless to be accounted for, in part by the fact that it has ceased to be a novelty, in part by the fact that the advocates of temperance have unwisely allowed their attention to be too largely diverted from the great issues at stake to the minor points in which they differ among themselves, and in part to the presence of other public questions of absorbing interest, notably those connected with our civil war. Many imagine that the temperance movement is receding, but there is no sufficient evidence that such is the case. The larger part of the increase of our population for forty years past has been of immigrants and their descendants; that is, of classes of people who did not participate in the great reform movement. During the same time there has been a drifting into the large towns, which have always been centres of temptation. Though our population now is ten times the size it was forty years ago, that would probably indicate that the reform had held its own. But doubtless the ratio is at least as large now as it was then, instead of being much smaller; and this indicates, on the whole, a decided and steady progress. Among the Irish members of the Roman Church, in particular, the gain is very marked and gratifying; and it seems to be even more marked in Great Britain and the different parts of Europe.

In the temperance-work of the past thirty years, the Sons of Temperance, the Good Templars, the Rechabites, and other so-called secret temperance organizations, have been quite prominent. The various red-ribbon and blue-ribbon movements are familiar to all. Organizations of women, as well as of men, have made their influence felt in what have been described as praying "crusades" in the places where liquors were sold, in working with voters for better laws, and doubtless yet more effectively in the establishing of temperance schools, and introducing temperance instruction into Sunday schools. Possibly the work now done, though less public than formerly, is not less in amount, nor less effective.

For some years renewed attention has been paid to the legislative aspects of the subject. The laws recently enacted in Michigan, which attempt to restrict the traffic by a high special tax, without the form of a license, seem to many the best available kind of legislation; while prohibitory constitutional amendments such as have lately been approved by the constitutions of Kansas and Iowa are advocated by others. Experiments have been tried in what are known as civil damage laws, by which those who sell intoxicating drinks are held responsible for certain of the evils thereby produced. Such laws were passed in Wisconsin as early as 1849, and in some of the other States at a much later date. In regard to all these, temperance-workers need to keep in mind that they cannot afford to cheapen the sanctity of law by the passage of infeasible or carelessly trampled laws, however just; nor to concede that even a license-law (and much less any other restrictive law) is at all of the nature of a sanction to the traffic; nor in the least to intermit their attempts to save the fallen, or to commit the young to temperance principles and habits, for the sake of giving effort to the securing of legislative changes.

The movement, from the beginning, has been, in the main, earnestly and reverently religious. Here and there, men who dislike the Bible and the churches have contrived to use the new temperance doctrines for venting their dislike; but such instances attract attention principally because they are exceptional. For a generation past, the habitual use of inebriating drinks has been so rare among the members of the distinctively Protestant churches, that the few who use them attract notice to themselves thereby; though this is less the case, perhaps, in the great cities than in the country.

In the earlier stages of the movement, as we have seen, there were several rapid advances, one after the other, in the doctrinal position of temperance men. At first the idea was to secure abstinence from excess in the use of alcoholic beverages, then abstinence from ardent spirits as distinguished from fermented liquors, and finally abstinence from all drinks that would intoxicate. This last stage defines historically the term “total abstinence.” This term properly denotes, not abstinence from every thing which contains alcohol, but from every thing which so contains alcohol that it might possibly produce drunkenness; not abstinence from such liquids for all purposes, but abstinence from them as a beverage or common drink. The abstinence is total in that it is from all common drinking, and not merely from getting drunk; and in that it is from all sorts of inebriating drinks, and not from ardent spirits only. The historical total-abstinence position does not place the very light wines and beers on the same footing with those that will intoxicate; though it disapproves of them as a matter of prudence, on account of their relations to the stronger beverages. For similar reasons, it demands that alcohol shall not be recklessly or unnecessarily used as a medicinal or other purposes; while it sharply distinguishes these from its use as a beverage.

This doctrine is almost universally held by temperance men in America, and is widely held elsewhere. There are some exceptions. A few men who are doing honorable and effective service against drunkenness advocate the propriety of the so-called moderate drinking of alcoholic beverages, as opposed to teetotalism; but the general opinion is against them. There is almost an equal unanimity in basing the duty of total abstinence upon our obligation to deny ourselves for the benefit of others, as presented in 1 Cor. viii. 13 and elsewhere, and generally acknowledged by casuists of all schools. The advocates of total abstinence everywhere would probably agree in affirming the existence of this obligation, and in regarding it as absolutely sufficient to cover the whole case.

But, except in these two points, they differ so radically as greatly to hinder their work. They flatly contradict one another in their teachings as to the grounds of the duty of total abstinence, its limits, and some of the means by which it is to be urged. It is evident that some of them, at least, are seriously mistaken. The cause has now no more pressing need than that its advocates should carefully and candidly sift the arguments they are accustomed to use, throwing away the bad, and retaining only those that will endure testing.

In the physiological argument, for example, it is sometimes held, on the one side, that alcohol is properly a food, and a genuine stimulant, and, on the other hand, that it is merely an irritant poison. But with alcohol, as with other substances, this may depend on the quantity of the alcohol, the presence of other ingredients, and the condition of the body when the alcohol is taken. Joseph Cook asserted, in his lectures in Boston, in 1852, that the tables of certain insurance-companies which insure total abstainers in one class, and moderate drinkers in another, show that there is a distinct and considerable difference of longevity in favor of the former. This and similar facts conclusively prove that alcohol habitually taken in the form of an intoxicating beverage is deleterious, even when it does not lead to drunkenness. Nevertheless, alcohol is commonly believed to have a genuine medicinal use, though it is a dangerous medicine. And while the experience of some graduates of total abstainers proves that it is never necessary as a food, the most trustworthy experiments seem to show, that, in minute quantities, it is sometimes harmless, and even salutary. It would not be easy to determine the percentage of alcohol necessary to render a beverage intoxicating. But, from the considerations just mentioned, it seems clear that the using of dilutions in which alcohol is contained in quantities clearly less than that percentage is a very different thing from using intoxicating drinks. Of war, let us remember, it is not against alcohol, but against intoxicating alcohol. Doubtless the two are so related as to render it prudent to abstain from even the very light wines, beers, and ciders. But we ought to remember that this obligation, unlike that to refuse the stronger beverages, depends on local and temporary conditions. It would have been less weight, for example, in the state of things which existed in the world prior to about the year 1700.

Again: it is argued, on the one hand, that literature, ancient and modern, recognizes two different meanings of the word “wine;” namely, fermented grape-juice, and unfermented. The common reply to this is a sweeping and contemptuous denial that the word is ever used to denote unintoxicating juice of any kind. The facts proved are, that preparations of unfermented grape-juice have been well known among many peoples, that they have sometimes been used in beverages, and that the name “wine” has been frequently applied to them, though certainly not in such a way as to establish this as one of the current and natural meanings of the word. As a rule, both the parties in this discussion studiously ignore any distinction between the terms “fermented” or “alcoholic,” “wine” and “grape-juice.” But the existence of precisely this distinction is the one fact of real importance which the evidence adduced in the discussion abundantly proves. In the history of the grape a very important part is played by wines, sometimes of cheap and ordinary quality and sometimes of exquisite quality, which contained alcohol in such quantities and combinations as to render the wine agreeable, but absolutely unintoxicating. It is these uninebriating wines, which, with some confusion of thought as to their relations to the grape-jellies, have been mistaken by many for the unfermented juice of the grape. Men who are accustomed to recognize the Bible as an inspired rule of conduct have been compelled to try to reconcile its occasional approval of wine, in the example of Jesus at Cana, for example, with its repeated and sweeping denunciations of wine. Those who hold that the word “wine” may equally well mean either the fermented or the unfermented juice of the grape, think that, when the Bible approves of wine, it must be held to refer to that which is unfermented. Their opponents, denying the distinction, commonly assert that the Bible approves of the drinking of intoxicants, but discourses of excess. The opinion thus denied is certainly erroneous; but, as certainly, that substituted for it does not follow from the premises. Philo, as we have seen, held the different theory, that the Scriptures approve wine-drinking in certain aspects of it, but not in others.

It would be easy to construct other theories as plausible as either of these. The discussion of this question properly belongs, not to this article, but to that on wine. It is sufficient here to say, that we must look for a better solution of it than has yet been offered. Meanwhile, whatever solution we may adopt, it will still be true that the specific precepts concerning wine, found in the Scriptures, may not apply in the changed conditions of our modern civilization; while the scriptural principles on which our obligation to total abstinence is based are at all times applicable.

LIT.—The various religious publishing boards and societies, the private houses that publish Sunday-school literature, and the National Temperance Society and Publication House, offer each its own list of temperance stories and of other temperance books and tracts. Many of the secret and other temperance organizations publish each its own paper. At different times, and notably within a few years past, the subject has been discussed in the reviews. To the catalogues and indexes of these publishers and publications the reader is referred. It is impossible particularly to name more than a very few works out of the vast number.

Some of the more celebrated older publications are mentioned in the body of this article. Others are, L. M. SARGENT: Temperance Tales, circ. 1890; Rev. GEORGE B. CHEEVER: Deacon Giles’s Distillery, and Deacon Jones’s Brewery, circ. 1835; Permanent Temperance Documents, 1837-42. No more valuable temperance book exists than the Autobiography of John B. Gough, 1869. Among the more noteworthy of the publications of the National Temperance Society are the Centennial Temperance Volume, 1876 (for the history of the temperance movement, and of organizations and men engaged in it); Moderation, vs. Total Abstinence, 1881 (containing Dr. HOWARD CROSBY’S Calm View, and several replies to the same, and the author’s reply to them all); Dr. HARGREAVES: Our Wasted Resources (giving the economical argument); as apparatus for class instruction, JULIA COLEMAN: The Temperance School, the Lesson Book for Schools, and the Juvenile Temperance Monthly. J. M. VANBUREN: Temperance Sermons, Dr. CUYLER: The Moral Duty of Total Abstinence; WILLIAM E. DODGE: The Church and Temperance; MOODY: Talks on Temperance; J. M. VANBUREN: Gospel Temperance; CAHILL: Talks on Temperance; Dr. HAMMOND: Alcohol as a Food and Medicine; and Dr. E. M. HUNT: Alcohol as a Food and Medicine. For other medical views, see the Tribune lecture of Dr. HAMMOND; and, by index, the two volumes on Physiology, by Drs. J. W. DHAPER and J. C. DHAPER. For additional literature, including that of prohibition, consult any current number of the organs of the National Temperance Society,— the National Temperance Advocate, or the Youth’s Temperance Banner. The theory of unfermented wines, and the view that the churches ought to use unalcoholic grape-juice at the Lord’s Table, are advocated in many of the publications of this society, but in none of them more reasonably than in The Bible Rule of Temperance, published by the Rev. GEORGE DUFFIELD in 1834–55, and republished, 1868. These two doctrines are attacked by Dr. DUNLOP MOORE, in the Presbyterian Review for January, 1881, and January, 1882. In the same Review, for April, 1882, is an article which advocates the using of the unalcoholic juice of the grape in the communion, and maintains generally the positions taken in the present article. Of temperance Sunday-school stories, which are being produced in considerable numbers, We Three, by MISS KATE W. HAMILTON, is a highly creditable specimen. The stories by MARY DWYER CHEL- LIS are favorites with many. W. J. BECKER.

TEMPLE AT JERUSALEM. I. TEMPLE OF SOLOMON.—David, when he was inhabiting his house of cedar, and God had given him rest from all his enemies, meditated the design of building a temple in which the ark of God might be placed, instead of being deposited within curtails (2 Sam. vii. 2; 1 Chron. xvii. 1). In this he was discouraged by the prophet Nathan, on account of his many wars, and the blood which he had shed, but promised at the same time that his son and successor shall build a house unto the Lord. While David was prohibited from building the temple, he nevertheless made preparations for it (1 Kings v. 10; 1 Chron. xxii.); and, as far as the material and ideal of the building is concerned, David was its author, while Solomon merely executed the design. The workmen and the materials employed in the erection of the temple were chiefly procured by Solomon from Hiram, king of Tyre. The building, which was begun four hundred and eighty years after the exodus from Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon’s reign, in the third month of the year 1012 B.C., was finished in the twelfth year of his reign, in the eighth month (1 Kings vi. 38).

In its construction the temple was mainly built after the pattern of the tabernacle; since it was only to be an enlarged and fixed dwelling of the Lord, a palace in place of the movable tent. Of course every thing was on an enlarged scale, and of more substantial materials. The temple itself is a large building, exhibits long, twenty wide, and thirty high. The floor was throughout of cedar, but boarded over with planks of fir

TEMPERANCE.
The temple was surrounded by a court of priests, so that the sanctuary in the wall of the temple cube of twenty cubits. On the eastern extremity of the wall stood the altar of incense, and a table for the shew-bread. The difference of the width arose from the circumstance that the external walls of the temple were so thick that they were made to recede one cubit after an elevation of five feet; so that the值守ment in the wall of the temple gave a firm support to the beams which supported the second story without being inserted into the wall of the sanctuary. The entrance to these stories was from without. The windows, which are mentioned in 1 Kings vi. 4, served chiefly for ventilation; since the light within the temple was obtained from the sacred candelsticks. In the Holy of holies were no windows, because "the Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness" (1 Kings viii. 12). The temple was wainscoted with cedar-wood, which was covered with gold. The boards within the temple were ornamented by beautiful carvings, representing cherubim, palms, and flowers. It appears that the greater house was also ceiled with precious metal; but the doors of the outer temple had posts of olive-tree, and leaves of fir (1 Kings vi. 31 sq.). Both doors, as well that which led into the temple as that which led from the Holy of holies, had folding leaves; the aperture being closed by a suspended curtain. The lintel and side-posts of the oracles seem to have circumscribed a space which contained one-fifth of the whole area of the partition; and the posts of the door of the temple, one-fourth of the area of the whole in which they were placed (1 Kings vi. 31-35).

Within the Holy of holies stood only the ark of the covenant between two cherubim; but within the holy were ten golden candelsticks, and the altar of incense, and a table for the shew-bread. The temple was surrounded by a court of priests (2 Chron. iv. 9). This, again, was surrounded by a wall consisting of cedar-beans placed on a stone foundation (1 Kings viii. 30), and contained the altar of burnt offering, the brazen sea, and ten brazen lavers. From the court of the priests, which is called (1 Kings vi. 36) the inner and (Jer. xxvi. 10) the upper court, a few steps led into the lower court of the people; which is called (Ezek. xi. 17) the outward and (2 Chron. iv. 9) the great court. Both courts were paved. Doors overlaid with brass led into the outer court. On the east was (Ezek. xi. 1) the main gate. According to 1 Kings xv. 5 and 2 Chron. xxvii. 5, Jotham built the outer gate and the house of the Lord. A "gate of foundation" is mentioned (2 Chron. xxiii. 5). Near the eastern gate, inside of the court of priests, probably stood the brazen scaffold which Solomon had built for the dedicatory prayer (2 Chron. vi. 13), and which afterwards probably served as the king's stand (2 Kings xi. 14, xxiii. 3). There was perhaps an ascent by which the king went up into the temple from his own house (1 Kings x. 5, 2 Chron. ix. 11). The covert for the sabbath (2 Kings xvi. 16) probably served as a kind of protection against the sun and wind.

After the temple was finished, it was consecrated by the king. It remained the centre of public worship for all the Israelites, only till the death of Solomon, after which ten tribes forsook this sanctuary. But even in the kingdom of Judah it was from time to time desecrated by altars erected to idols (comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 13). There was a treasury in the temple, in which much precious metal was collected for the maintenance of public worship. The gold and silver of the temple were, however, frequently applied to political purposes (1 Kings xv. 18 sq.; 2 Kings xii. 18, xvi. 8, xviii. 16). The treasury of the temple was repeatedly plundered by foreign invaders; for instance, by Shishak (1 Kings xiv. 26), by Jehoshaphat, king of Israel (2 Kings xiv. 14), by Nebuchadnezzar (xxiv. 10), and, lastly, again by Nebuchadnezzar II. The temple, which could not be used for political purposes (1 Kings xxiv. 13), was burned down (xxv. 9 sq.) four hundred and sixteen years after its dedication.

The restoration of the temple was prophesied; and, fourteen years after the destruction of the Temple of Solomon, Ezekiel saw in a vision a new temple which he describes in chap. vii.-xiii.

II. THE SECOND TEMPLE. — In the year 536 B.C. Cyrus permitted the Jews to return to their country, and rebuild the temple, at the same time commanding that the sacred utensils which had been pillaged in the first temple should be restored, and that, for the restoration of the temple, assistance should be granted (Ez. i., vi. 2). The first colony which returned under Zerubbabel and Joshua, having collected the necessary means, and having also obtained the assistance of Phoenician workmen, commenced, in the second year after their return, the rebuilding of the temple. The Sidonians brought cedar trees from Lebanon to Joppa. The Jews refused the co-operation of the Samaritans, who, being thereby offended, induced the king, Smerdis, to prohibit the building. It was only in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (520 B.C.) that the building was resumed; and was completed 516 B.C. (Ez. iv.-vi.; Hag. i. 15). According to Ez. vi. 3, it was sixty cubits high and wide, thus larger than the Temple of Solomon; while, according to Hag. ii. 3, it was inferior to the first. The inferiority probably consisted in the absence of the ark and precious metals. Antiochus Epiphanes pillaged and desecrated it through idolatry (1 Macc. i. 21, iv. 38; 2 Macc. vi. 2). Judas Maccabaeus repaired, furnished, and cleansed it, 105 B.C. (1 Macc. ix. 40; 2 Macc. i. 18, x. 3), whence the Jewish "feast of dedication" (John x. 22). He also fortified the temple mount (1 Macc. iv. 60, vi. 7). Alexander Jannaeus (about 106 B.C.) separated the court of the priests from the external court by a wooden railing (Joseph., Ant. XIII. 13, 5). In the year 63 B.C. Pompey attacked the temple from the north side, caused a great massacre in its courts, but abstained from plun-during the treasury, although he even entered the Holy of Holies (Ibid. XIV. 4, 2 sq.). Herod the Great, with the assistance of Roman troops, stormed the temple, 37 B.C., on which occasion some halls were destroyed (Ibid. XIV. 16, 2).

III. THE HERODIAN TEMPLE. — Herod, wishing to ingratiate himself with the Jews, undertook to raise a perfectly new temple. The work was commenced in the eighteenth year of his reign (20 or 21 B.C.). Priests and Levites finished the temple in one year and a half, while the courts required eight years. The out-buildings, however, were completed under Agrippa II. and under Albinus the procurator, in the year A.D. 64 (Joseph. Ant. XX. 9, 7). The structure of the temple is described by Josephus (Ant. XX. 11; Jewish War, V. 5), and in the Talmudic treatise Middoth. Already under Archelaus the courts of the temple became the scene of revolt and bloody massacres (Joseph., Ant. XVII. 9, 3; 16, 2). But the most horrid scenes were during the Jewish revolt, A.D. 66 (Joseph. Ant. XIV. 9, 3; War, V. 1, 2, 8). In August of the year 70 the Romans rushed from the Tower of Antonia into the sacred precincts, the halls of which were set on fire by the Jews themselves. It was against the will of Titus that a Roman soldier threw a firebrand into the temple, which caused its total destruction. The Emperor Hadrian (A.D. 118) founded a Roman colony, under the name of Ἑλία Καπιτολίνα, on the ruins of Jerusalem, and dedicated a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus. Under the reign of Constantine the Great the Jews were severely punished for having attempted to restore the temple. In the year 363 the Emperor Julian undertook to rebuild the temple, but he was compelled to desist by flames which burst forth from the foundations.

The temple ground, called by the Turks el Haram, is now occupied by a splendid mosque erected by Omar, es Sakhara, south of which stands the mosque el Aksa (formerly a Christian church).

TEMPUS CLAUSUM ("closed time," also feria sancta or sacramentum) is a canonical term denoting those days on which no noisy festivities are allowed to take place. Regulations of that kind naturally originated from the general conception of how a Christian festival ought to be celebrated; but already among the Israelites it was customary to prepare one's self for the celebration of the sacrifice by prayer and asceticism (Ibid. xxix. 5; 1 Sam. xxix. 4); and, as Paul indorsed the custom (1 Cor. vii. 5), the Church had thus a basis for further development given. The oldest laws relating to the subject date back to the middle of the fourth century. In its can. 61—62 the Council of Laodicea (351) forbade various festivities during the quadragesima; and its ordinances were confirmed by the State. Later on, not only the quadragesima, but also advent and other feast cycles, were put down as tempus clausum; though the observance never became uniform during the middle ages. The Council of Trent (sess. xxiv., Nov. 11, 1563) introduced various mitigations of the rules. The evangelical churches generally adopted the ordinances of a tempus clausum, but the observance varied very much in the different countries. The conference of Eisenach (1567) gave much attention to the subject, and its protocols contain an exhaustive survey of the state of affairs in the different churches. In its general principle it recognized the Tempus clausum Quadragesimae as a wholesome pedagogical institution, and recommended the careful maintenance of such remains of it as might still exist. See KLEIFOTH: Liturgische Abhandlungen, I. pp. 53 sqq.

TEN ARTICLES, The, were brought into Parliament by Bishop Fox, and passed July 11, 1536. Though emanating from the crown, it is probable that Fox and Cranmer helped to prepare them. They mark an advance in the work of the Reforma- tion, but retain the doctrines of baptismal regeneration, transubstantiation, the invocation of saints, and the usefulness (though not the efficacy) of prayers for the dead.

TEN COMMANDMENTS. See Decalogue.

TENISON, Thomas, was born at Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, in 1538; and studied at Benet College, Cambridge University. In the year of his ejectment (1692) he became a fellow, and in 1695 was appointed university preacher. The rectory of Holywell, Huntingdonshire, the living of St. Peter's Mancroft, Norwich, the vicarage of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, London, the archdeaconry of the metropolis, and the bishopric of Lin- coln, successively fell to his lot; and in all these preferments he showed administrative power, for which he was more remarkable than for pupil eloquence. He was an active Churchman, and busy in matters connected with the Revolution of 1688. On the death of Tillotson, he was raised to the priory, in which he made a considerable figure, both as to temporal and spiritual affairs. When William III. was absent from England in 1690, Tenison filled the post of a lord-justice, being first in the commission appointed by the sovereign for that purpose; but his actual power and political influence in that capacity must have been far below what accrued to some of the English archbishops in the middle ages. It was as president of the Upper House of Convocation that he had the most arduous duties to discharge, and the greatest trouble to endure. The Lower House was chiefly composed of High-Churchmen, unfriendly to the Revolution (which Tenison cordially approved), and advocating the independence of the Ecclesiastical Establishment in a way which he condemned. The Upper and Lower Houses of Convocation came into belligerent conflict, and scenes were enacted in the Jerusalem Chamber, the adjoining organ-room, the dean's yard, and Henry VII.'s Chapel, such as were disgraceful to the High-Church clergy, who figured as chief actors in the strife. The archbishop manifested a steadiness of purpose and an invincibility of calm resistance, which won for him the name of the "rock-like" Tenison. He aimed at church reform, and issued circulars to the bishops with that view, but achieved little success. A funeral sermon he preached for Mary, consort of William III., was warmly censured in a letter attributed to Bishop Ken. He was more a man of words than letters, but he founded a library which bore his name. He attended his royal master on his death-bed, and survived Queen Anne, in whose reign he had fresh controversy troubles. He died in 1715.

JOHN STOUGHTON.

TENNENT, a family of ministers illustrious in the history of the American Presbyterian Church.—1. William Tennent, b. in Ireland, 1673; d. at Neshaminy, Bucks County, twenty miles north of Philadelphia, Penn., May 6, 1745. Originally in the Established Church of Ireland, he arrived in Philadelphia, Penn., Sept. 6, 1718, and entered the Synod of Philadelphia, Sept. 12, 1718. In 1720 he settled at Bedford, Westchester County, N.Y., and in 1726 became pastor at Neshaminy, Bucks County, Penn., although he was never formally installed. Impressed by the lack of educational facilities for the young men growing up around him, he erected in 1726 or 1727 a log house, the famous "Log College," wherein he taught three of his four sons and a number of other youth, several of whom afterwards rose to eminence in the church. Log College was the first of the literary and theological institutions of the Presbyterian Church in America, the parent of those in Princeton, N.J., and, indeed, of them all. Mr. Tennent's publications were mostly sermons. Our knowledge of his life and college is in good part derived from Whitefield's journal, which shows his apostolic character.—2. Gilbert Tennent, eldest son of the preceding, and a distinguished Presbyterian divine, b. in County Armagh, Ireland, April 5, 1703; d. in Philadelphia, July 23, 1764. He came to America with his father, 1718; was educated by him; was licensed by the presbytery of Philadelphia, May, 1726; acted as tutor in Log College for a year; was ordained and installed pastor in New Brunswick, N.J., in the autumn of 1727. Like his father, he was an ardent admirer of Whitefield; and, in imitation of the great evangelist, he made a preaching-tour through West Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, and in 1740, at Whitefield's solicitation, through New England, as far as Boston. By his fiery zeal, deep moral earnestness, spirituality, no less than by his logic and argumentative ability, he produced everywhere a profound impression. His popularity was second only to Whitefield's. But he was lacking in tenderness and consideration for those who differed from him. At that time many Presbyterian ministers were conscientiously opposed to the methods adopted by the revival preachers. Tennent had no appreciation of such scruples, but set them down to a lack of vital religion. Moreover, Log College was openly criticised by the synod of Philadelphia, because of a type of piety there fostered, and its educational defects. Tennent naturally resented these attacks, and, under what he deemed sufficient provocation, preached in 1740 his famous "Nottingham sermon," "one of the most severely abusive sermons which was ever penned" (Alexander), in which he lashed his ministerial brethren for their "hypocrisy." Tennent had a large following throughout the country, and able ministers were upon his side. The agitation lasted for many years. The presbytery of New Brunswick seceded from the synod of Philadelphia in 1741 (see art. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES, p. 1907). In May, 1743, Tennent was called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, then just started, made up of the admirers of Whitefield and the friends of the revival. But, although he remained their pastor till his death, he did not repeat in his second charge the triumphs of his first. He was faithful and highly useful; but his preaching was quieter, and not so many souls came under his influence. His delivery was much less impassioned, due very probably to his use of a manuscript. In 1758 he raised in Great Britain some fifteen hundred pounds for the College of New Jersey,—a sum much beyond the Pennsylvania, and he had contributed so largely to the disruption of the Presbyterian Church in 1741, he tooled to effect a reconciliation, and saw with great satisfaction the breach healed in 1758. Besides a memoir of his brother John (Boston, 1735), he published a volume of sermons (Philadelphia, 1743), and occasional sermons and pamphlets. See list in Log College, pp. 65 sq.—3. William Tennent, brother of the preceding; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, June 8, 1705; d. at Freehold, Monmouth County, N.J., March 8, 1777. He studied under his father in Log College, and theology under his brother in New Brunswick; was licensed by the presbytery of New Brunswick; ordained pastor of the church at Freehold, October, 1733, and held the position till death. He is the subject of several highly remarkable stories, of which the two most famous are: (1) that, while preparing for his examination for the ministry, he fell sick, and had a trance which lasted three days, during which time he was, as he believed and declared, in heaven, and heard "utterable things." His friends thought

He was dead, and were upon the point of burying him, notwithstanding the protestations of his physician, when he revived. He regained his health in a year, but had lost all his knowledge of reading and writing, much more, all his previous learning. After a time, however, he experienced that there was a shock in his head; and this knowledge from that moment began rapidly to return, until all was regained. "For three years," he said, "the sense of divine things continued so great, and every thing else appeared so completely vain, when compared to heaven, that, could I have had the world to stooping down for it, I believe I should not have thought of doing it."

No autobiographic record of his experiences during his trance is believed to be extant, although his intention to prepare one is known. See Log College, pp. 112-118, 147.

(2) The second story is, that "one night, when Mr. Tennent was asleep in his own bed, he was waked up by a sharp pain in the region of the toes of one of his feet; and upon getting a light, and examining the foot, it was discovered that several of his toes had been cut entirely off, as if by some sharp instrument.

But, though the wounded part was bleeding, nothing was seen of the excised members, nor any means by which such a dismemberment could have been effected" (Log College, p. 151). Mr. Tennent was a remarkable character, full of resources, indefatigable in Christian labors, wise to win souls and to guide them to heaven. By his earnestness, eloquence, simplicity, and, above all, ardent piety, he made such an impression upon his neighborhood, that he is vividly remembered by his neighbors, that he is vividly remembered.

"His labors were attended with three notable qualities—prudence, diligence, and success."

Two of his sermons, and memoir, were published in a volume by Gilbert Tennent, Boston, 1736. —5. TERMINISM and THE TERMINISTIC CONTROVERSY. Medieval theology, partially supported by Augustine, maintained that the terminus of grace coincided with the terminus of life; so that infants dying without baptism could not possibly escape hell. During the Reformation, this doctrine was modified in various ways. On the one side, the idea of the free, infinite grace of God expanded the terminus beyond life, and gave rise to the doctrine of apokatastasis: on the other side, the conviction that a certain interior, moral-religious state was an absolute condition of grace, narrowed the terminus down almost to a single moment of life, and gave rise to the doctrine of terminism. The Friends are the principal representatives of this doctrine, holding that every person has in his life a moment or period of visitation, but that no second opportunity is granted. The Pietists, with their suspicion against the late repentance, also incline towards this doctrine; and in J. G. Bose, deacon of Sorau, it found a decided and eloquent spokesman. His Terminus perentorius salutis humanae (Francfort, 1698) attracted much attention, and called forth a great number of refutations. The most remarkable among these were J. G. Neumann's Dissertatio de termino salutis humanae peremtorio (Wittenberg, 1700) and Dissertatio de tempore gratiae divinae, etc. (Wittenberg, 1701). As Bose died in 1700, A. Rechenberg, the son-in-law of Spener, took up the defence of his ideas, and a long and bitter controversy ensued with Ittig, professor at Leipzig; but the spreading rationalism finally bereft the question of all interest.

TERRITORIALISM denotes a theory of church government which originated with the Reformation, and according to which the ruler of a country has a natural right to rule also over the ecclesiastical affairs of his people. The theory found its principal supporter in Christian Thomasius, and its principal opponent in J. B. Carpzov.

TERSTEEGEN, Gerhard, b. at Meurs in Rhenish Prussia, Nov. 25, 1697; d. at Mulheim in Westphalia, April 3, 1769; a famous mystical and hymnist of the Reformed Church. He was educated in the Latin school of his native city, and in 1715 apprenticed to a merchant in Mulheim, where he soon after made the acquaintance of Wilhelm Hoffmann, the leader of a pietistic revival movement in those regions. As he found that mercantile business interfered with the development of his religious life, he left that profession in 1718, and learned the trade of a ribbon-maker. Settling in a lonesome little town, but, he led a secluded and ascetic life, dividing his time between work and prayer, and distributing not only his earnings, but also the inheritance from his mother, among the poor. After 1724, his activity in the service of Christ assumed greater dimensions. He began to preach, and he engaged in literature. Travelling from one place to another, he founded societies in Holland and Westphalia, held conventicles, and formed minor communities. He translated numerous books of the French mystics, —Labadie, TERTIARIES.

TERTULLIAN (Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus), b. at Carthage about 150 or 160; d. there between 220 and 240; the first great writer of Latin Christianity, and one of the grandest and most original characters of the ancient church. Of his life very little is known. His father held a high position (centurio, aide-de-camp) in the Roman garrison in Africa; but the Punic blood of his descent is visibly pulsating in his style, with its archaisms or provincialisms, its glowing imagery, its passionate temper. He received an excellent education. He was a scholar. He wrote books in Greek, of which, however, none has come down to us. But his proper study was jurisprudence, and his method of reasoning shows striking marks of his juridical training. It is not known at what time he was converted to Christianity, nor how the conversion came about. But the event must have been sudden, decisive, transforming at once his whole personality; for afterwards he could not imagine a truly Christian life without such a conscious breach, a radical act of conversion: fiunt, non nascentur Christiani. In the Church of Carthage he was ordained a presbyter, though he was married, — a fact which is well established by his two books to his wife, though Roman-Catholic writers have tried to deny it. Rome he visited once or twice; and it may be that the laxity and corruption of morals which at that time (see Calvinus) he found prevailing in the Church of Rome contributed not a little to drive him into Montanism. At all events, a few years after his conversion (about 202) he became the leader, the passionate and brilliant exponent, of that movement (see Montanism), — that is, he became a schismatic; and the story, that before his death he returned to the bosom of the Catholic Church, is very improbable, since his party, the Tertullianists, continued to exist. Nevertheless, in spite of his schism he continued to fight heresy, especially Gnosticism; and by these doctrinal works he is the teacher of Cyprian, the predecessor of Augustine, and the chief founder of Latin theology.

The writings of Tertullian are very numerous, though generally not very large. As they cover the whole field of Christian ethics against Paganism, polemics against heresies, and polity, discipline, morals, or the whole reorganization of human life on a Christian basis, — they give a picture of the religious life of the time which is of the greatest interest to the church historian. Their general character is stern and practical, but not without wit and satire. In his endeavors to make the Latin language a plain vehicle for his somewhat tumultuous ideas, he now and then becomes strained, queer, and obscure; but as a general rule he is quick, precise, and pointed. And he is always powerful, commanding the attention of the reader, not begging it; always rich, lavish with wit and satire, sometimes, also, with sophism and lawyer's tricks; and always original. Though thoroughly conversant with Greek theology, he was entirely independent of it. Indeed, he forms a direct contrast to Origen, just as Montanism forms the opposite extreme of Gnosticism. While Origen pushes his idealism far in the direction of a Gnostic spiritualism, Tertullian carries his realism to the very verge of materialism. Rejecting the Platonic doctrine of pre-existence, and the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis, he adopts the traducianistic view of hereditary sin, teaches that soul and body originate at the same moment, and proves, metaphysically and from the Bible, that the soul has corporeality. Greek philosophy he despised; Gnosticism he considered a crime; and Neander has exactly hit the centre of his spiritual character by calling his monograph upon him, Antignosticus. But it is just this practical bearing of his ideas, even the most abstract ones, which places him at the head of the theology of the Western Church. The direction he thereby gave to all theological speculation has never since been entirely lost sight of, not even by the schoolmen.

The chronology of Tertullian's writings is very uncertain. The principal question, however, — Which of them belong to the Catholic period of his life, and which to the Montanist? — can in many cases be decided by internal criteria. To the Montanist period belong Adversus Marcionem, De anima, De carnis Christi, De resurrectione carnis, Adversus Praecon, De corona militis, De fuga in persecutione, De monogamia, De jejunia, De pugna, etc.; certainly Catholic are his Apologeticus (A.D. 197), De paenitentia, De oratione, De baptismo, Ad uxor, Ad martyres, perhaps also, De prescrptione hæreditarum, etc.; while others, Ad Nationem testimonum Romanum, De paenitentia, Adversus Hermogenem, etc., are of uncertain date. Among his apologetical writings, his Apologeticus, written during the reign of Septimius Severus, and addressed to the Roman magistrates, is the best defence of Christianity and the Christians ever written against the reproaches of the Pagans, and one of the most magnificent monuments of the ancient church, full of enthusiasm, courage, and vigor. It first clearly proclaims the principle of religious liberty as an inalienable right of man. Of his dogmatical works, the most important is his De prescrptione, developing as its fundamental idea, that, in a dispute between the Church and a separating party, the whole burden of the evidence lies with the latter, as the Church, in possession of the unbroken tradition, is by its very existence a guaranty of its truth. His five books Adversus Marci, written in 207 or 208, are the most comprehensive and elaborate of his polemical works, and invaluable for the true understanding of Gnosticism. Of his moral and ascetic treatises, the De patiendia and De spectacula are among the most interesting; the De pugna and De virginibus eelantium, among the most characteristic.

TEST ACT. — An act passed by the English Parliament in 1688, which enacted that all persons holding public offices, civil or military, should receive the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper according to the usage of the Church of England, take the oaths of supremacy and uniformity, and declare their rejection of the doctrine of transubstantiation. It was received with great danger from Popish Recusants, and was in the first instance levelled against the Catholics. The Toleration Act of William (1689), and especially the legislation of the present century (the Relief Act of May 9, 1828, and the Roman-Catholic Relief Bill of April 13, 1829), have abolished the hardships of the Test Act.

TESTAMENT, The Old and New, is the dominant name in the Occidental Church for the collection of Holy Scripture, and the translation of the Greek designation ταυτα εις και και αυτω δωμαι. The term arose in this way: δωμαι means disposition; then the special form, a will; then, so far as the execution of this will depends upon certain conditions, an agreement bordering upon a covenant (συνθήκη), yet differing from it, since in a δωμαι one of the parties takes the initiative, and lays down the terms. It was in obedience to a right instinct that the LXX translated παρθένοι by δωμαι, instead of by συνθήκη; for thereby they expressed the correct idea, that, in the “covenant” between God and man, God appears, not as one of the parties simply, but as the founder, who holds the other strictly to certain terms. It is upon this idea that the argumentation in Gal. iii. 15 sqq. rests. The Italics translates “covenant” also by testamentum (“will”), where Jerome, in the Old Testament, uses fœdus. The Scriptures are τα βιβλία της δωματίας (“the books of the will”), which meant at first the Decalogue, then the whole law. For sake of brevity the phrase was replaced by the single word δωμαι (so 2 Cor. iii. 14). In the Greek Church the expression was used of the whole canon (so Origen: π. ἀρχ., iv. 1). In old ecclesiastical Latin, besides testamentum, instrumentum was used (so Tertullian: Adv. Prax., c. 20). For the contents of the Old and New Testament, see Canon.

TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION (also called Susevica or Argentinensis), the Confession which the four cities of Strassburg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau, presented to the diet of Augsburg (July 11, 1530), and, properly speaking, the first Confession of the Reformed Church. Landgrave Philipp of Hesse in vain exerted himself to bring about a union between the two branches of the reformational movement. But the Saxon princes and theologians obstinately excluded the representatives of the cities of Southern Germany suspected of Zwinglian heresy, from all their political and theological conferences. Under such circumstances, it became necessary for them to present a confession of their own. It was drawn up by Bucer and Capito, who arrived at Augsburg a few days after the presentation, by the Saxons theologians, of the Confessio Augustana, and consists of twenty-three articles. The formal principle of the Reformation — the absolute authority of Scripture in matters of faith, for their edification, for ethical purposes, the Conf. Aug. passes by silently — is stated with great energy; and the whole instrument is distinguished for clearness and precision, with the exception of the representation of the doctrine of the Lord’s Supper, which is held to be somewhat vaguer than the Lutheran formula, but not to make a reconciliation with the Lutherans impossible. The Confession was not read before the diet; though its refutation, drawn up by Eck, Faber, and Cochlaeus, and full of misrepresenta-

lived neither by labor nor by begging, but simply by what Providence bestowed on them. They had convents in Rome, Naples, Venice, Milan, and other Italian cities. They also spread to Poland, Germany, and France; but their number was always small. They made some attempt at misglum opposition by the Jews. It was only one of his many characteristic surmises, when Luther called the Book of Judith a tragedy, and the Book of Tobit a comedy. In all his parables and figurative words, Christ never referred, even in the most remote way, to the theatre. The case was different with Paul, who uses in a figurative sense the term "theatre" (2 Cor. iv. 2), and was also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and refers to the gladiatorial games. It is no wonder that the early Christians looked with horror and disgust upon the amphitheatres, in which many of their own number were given to the wild beasts, and called them the domiciles of the Devil. To these feelings, Tertullian more especially gave expression in his famous work on spectacular displays (De Spectaculis). The dramatic art he regarded as the offspring of hell, and the stage as a part of the Devil's pomp (pompa diaboli), which the candidate for baptism must renounce forever. He was not alone in these opinions among the Church Fathers. Chrysostom courageously opposed the theatrical passion of Antioch and Constantinople, and declared the stage the house of Satan and lies, the consummation of unchastity, the Babylonian furnace, which is heated with combustible material of unchaste words and attitudes.

Our theatre certainly stands in need of a reformation from the base upwards; but the way to reach it is certainly not for Christians to distance the stage as unchristian, and then to withdraw from it all sympathy and solicitude.

Among the early writers of English plays in the sixteenth century were Bishops Bale and Still (Gammer Gurton's Needle, acted at Cambridge, 1586). The public interest in the theatre in Elizabeth's reign met with considerable opposition from the clergy. Archbishop Grindal advised Cecil to suppress players. The first public license granted in England to give theatricals was granted to the servants of the Earl of Leicester in 1571. The Puritans were always opposed to the stage, but on it members of the royal family in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. figured. In 1647 Parliament suppressed the theatres, and forbade actors to exercise their vocation, under penalty of being whipped. After the restoration of the Stuarts, the theatres were again in full blast. The early Methodists shunned the stage, as do, also, the majority of nonconformists. The most recent public discussions of the claims of the stage to the patronage of the Christian public have been carried on by the Bishop of Manchester, in England, who hopes to elevate it by such patronage, and Dr. Herrick Johnson of Chicago, who looks upon it as a school of immorality beyond the reach of reclamation.

with his brother, Die Einführung der erzeugenen Ekhologie bei den christlichen Geistlichen (Altenburg, 1828, 2 vols.), which was put on the Index. Afterwards, however, he made his peace with Rome, entered the Congregation of the Oratory, and was in 1855, by Pius IX., appointed conservator at the papal archives. But during the Council of the Vatican he was by the Jesuits accused of procuring documents from the archives for the bishops in opposition, and removed from his position. He was a very industrious writer; published a new edition of the Annals of Baronius, with continuation, and Geschichte des Pontifikats Clemens XIV., 1852; Vetora Monumenta Polonia et Lithuanica, 1860-64, 3 vols.; Acta genuina Concilii Tridentinii, 1874, 2 vols. THEISM. Theism in its etymological and widest acceptation is a generic term for all systems of belief in the existence of the Divine. Thus understood, it includes pantheism, polytheism, and monotheism, and excludes only atheism; but this acceptation of the term is rare. Common usage has determined that theism must be identified with monotheism, in which God was thought of as one, perfect, supreme, self-existent, omniscient, righteous, and benevolent Being, who is distinct from and independent of what he has created. The articles on Deism, God, and Infidelity, published in previous volumes of this encyclopaedia, treat more or less either of theism or of its history. To these the reader is referred, as the writer of this article wishes to avoid repeating what has already been said.

There has been much discussion as to the historical origin of theism. Herbert of Cherbury, Cudworth, Creuzer, Ebrard, and others have learnedly argued that monotheism was the primitive form of religion. Lubbock, Tylor, and the majority of recent anthropologists, maintain that monotheism can be proved to have been everywhere preceded by polytheism. Schelling and Max Müller have held that the starting-point of religion was henotheism, an imperfect kind of monotheism, in which God was thought of as one, only because others had not yet presented themselves to the mind,—a monotheism of which polytheism was not the contradiction, but the natural development. Pantheism, the belief that all things and beings are but transient phenomena of one divine substance, the only and absolute Reality, has also been frequently represented to be the earliest phase of religion. And, when all that has been adduced in favor of these opinions is examined, there may be seen, perhaps, to be ample room for yet another opinion; namely, that the present state of our knowledge is not sufficient to enable us to determine what the primitive religion was. Science has not yet arrived at certainty as to the primitive condition of men, and until it has done so cannot pronounce with certainty as to the primitive religion of men. The Book of Genesis distinctly informs us of direct manifestations of God to the primitive man Adam, and therefore that Adam knew God; but it does not appear to inform us how much he knew of God, and whether, for example, his knowledge was monotheistic or henotheistic.

The question as to the psychological origin of theism is, perhaps, more important than that as to its historical origin; but the two questions are scarcely separable. Some trace theism to such external agencies and media as revelation, instruction, and tradition: and these have undoubtedly been the sources of much knowledge, and of most important knowledge, regarding God and divine things; but they all imply the mind to have natural powers of knowing God, and a certain kind of affinity to divine things. A revelation in words or signs, relative to religious objects, made to a purely passive and entirely empty mind, would be meaningless. Instruction implies the exertion of powers which can understand and profit by it. Tradition can only carry what has already been originated and is not strictly necessary for any thing to which the mind is constitutionally indifferent and uncongenial. Others refer theism to internal but entirely non-rational sources. Thus it has been traced to mere feelings,—to fear by Lucretius, to desire by Feuerbach, to the sense of dependence by Schleiermacher, etc. It is obvious, however, that all these feelings presuppose apprehensions and judgments, and are valid only in so far as they have the warrant of intelligence. Max Müller, in his Habit Lectures, traces the idea of God to a special faculty of religion,—"a subjective faculty for the apprehension of the infinite," "a mental faculty, which, independent of, nay, in spite of, sense and reason, enables man to apprehend the infinite under different names and under varying disguises." This view will not bear a close scrutiny. The infinite, as an implicit condition of thought, is not more involved in religious than in other thought. We cannot think any thing as finite without implying the infinite. Space cannot be thought of except as extensively, nor time except as protemporously, infinite. As a condition of thought, the infinite is involved in religious knowledge, only so far as it is involved in all knowledge. On the other hand, as an explicit object of thought, it is not present in the lower forms of religion at all, which exist only because the thought of infinity is not associated in the religious consciousness with that of Deity, except where reflection is somewhat highly developed; and, even in the highest stages of religion, it is only apprehended as one aspect of Deity. Infinity is not God, but merely an attribute of the attributes of God, and not even an exclusively divine attribute.

The hypothesis that the idea of God is gained by intuition or vision is proved to be all unnecessary by the fact that the idea of God, and the process by which it is reached, are capable of being analyzed, and therefore not simple; and, likewise, by the variety and discordance of the ideas of God which have been actually formed. The apprehension of God seems to be only possible through a process which involves all that is essential in the human constitution,—will, intelligence, conscience, reason,—and the ideas which they supply,—cause, design, goodness, infinity. These are so connected that they may all be embraced in a single act, and coalesce into one grand issue. The theistic inference, although a complex process, is a thoroughly natural one, similar in char-

... leads to results which seem ultimate to reason, but only to reason because the science does not carry us. The view of the constitution of matter with which chemistry must be content to close its inquiries is no more self-explanatory than the one with which it began them. The laws of development reached by biology are as mysterious as were the facts of which have been reduced under them. Is there reason to affirm that the sciences lead to unreason, or merely that the special methods of each science carry us only so far, and that the conclusions of the sciences are data of philosophy, and also of natural theology?

Fifthly, the relationship of theism to philosophy has to be determined. If there be no philosophy except a phenomenalism or positivism which rests on criticism and agnosticism, there can clearly be no theism, no theology of any kind. The materialism which proclaims itself a monism, and therefore a philosophy, not only transcends the science as much as any theological doctrine, but contravenes the findings of science. A philosophy which rises above such materialism must necessarily be, to some extent, a religious philosophy. It will find that there are only two plausible ways of conceiving the first or ultimate principle,— the monotheistic or the pantheistic. The theist has to show that the only satisfaction of philosophical reason is to be found in the personal God of his religious faith. The philosophical view and the religious view of the universe must harmonize, and even coalesce, in a comprehensive theism.

A history of theism embraces (1) A survey of heathen thought regarding God so far as it has approximated to the theistic idea. Hegel's Philosophy of Religion, Bunsen's God in History, Freeman Clarke's Ten Great Religions, the St. Giles Lectures on the Faiths of the World, still more, the series of Sacred Books of the East, and of ancient texts published under the title of Records of the Past, etc., will be found useful to those wishing to make such a survey. (2) A view of the progress of the idea of God from the beginning to the end of the biblical record of revelation. To attain such a view is an entirely biblico-theological task, with which all treatises of biblical theology are more or less occupied. The second volume of Ewald's Doctrine of the Bible concerning God is entirely devoted to the theme. (3) An account of the development of theistic thought in the Christian world. The best published account is that contained in the last three volumes of R. Bobra's Storia della Filosofia rispetto alla Conoscenza di Dio da Tolete fino ai Giorni Nostri, Lecce, 1873. The literature has been so far indicated in the articles on Deism, God, etc.; and it is so extensive, that a more general view cannot usefully be attempted. [To it is to be added, Robert Flint's Theism, Edinburgh, 1877, 4th ed., 1883; Samuel Harris: The Philosophical Basis of Theism, N.Y., 1883; George P. THEOCRACY, the "rule of God," in contradistinction to monarchy, democracy, aristocracy, etc., was first applied by Josephus in relation to the sciences. It is in close contact and connection with every science. No positive science... the will of God and the civil law of the people, God was, indeed, the ruler of the Jewish state. The name may, however, justly be applied to any people occupying the same stage of political development; that one, namely, at which no distinction has as yet been reached between religious and civil legislation.

THEODORA is the name of two Byzantine empresses who have exercised considerable influence on the history of the Greek Church. — I. Theodora, b. 508; d. June 12, 548; the wife of Justinian I., 527-565. She was a native of Cyprus, but came early in life to Constantinople with her parents. Her father was a bear-trainer. She herself became an actress, and that of the worst possible notoriety. She accompanied Hecebolus as his concubine, when he was made prefect of the African Provinces; but she was soon after dismissed, and she returned to Constantinople in a state of destitution. She profited, however, by the experience, became studious of decent appearances, and having incidentally become acquainted with Justinian, the heir-apparent to the throne, she succeeded in giving Agapetus himself a Monophysite, and considered it one of the most important acts of her policy with respect to the Bulgarians, whose conversion to Christianity was effected in the Three-Chapter controversy of the Council of Chalcedon (451). Nevertheless, Theodora succeeded in having a synod in Constantinople, which restored the images to the churches throughout the empire he made her co-regent. Justinian hated her many social charms, and her real mental superiority, a prey to his own unbridled passions and corrupt caprices; and a conspiracy between him and Bardas compelled her to lay down the sceptre, and retire into private life. She was suspected, however, by her own son, and shut up in a monastery, where she died shortly after, in 545. See the literature under IMAGE-WORSHIP.

THEODES is the name of two popes. — Theodore I. (642-649) was a Greek by birth. As a decided adversary of the Monothelites, he excommunicated Paulus, the Patriarch of Constantinople in 645, and recognized Pyrrhus, who, deposed himself as a Monothelite, had recanted in Rome. When restored to his see, Pyrrhus returned to Monothelitism, and Theodore then also excommunicated him. In 649 he condemned Agapetus, the Patriarch of Rome, which condemned the Typus. He wrote an Epistola synodica ad Paulum, and an Exemplar propositionis . . . adversus Pyrrhum. See the art. MONOTHELITISM.

THEODOR is a pope. — Theodore II. (897) was a Roman by birth. He reigned only twenty days.

THEODOR, St., was, according to Gregory of Nyssa (Opera, Paris, 1615, tom. ii. p. 1062) a Syrian or Armenian by birth, and served in the Roman army when the persecution of Maximin and Galerius began. Discovered, and brought before the Pagan court, he refused to recant, was sentenced to death, and burnt. He is commemorated by the Greek Church on Feb. 17, by the Roman on Nov. 10.

THEODOR, surnamed Graptus, b. in Jerusalem; educated in the monastery of St. Saba, and ordained a presbyter there; was in 816 sent to Constantinople by the Patriarch Thomas of Jerusalem, to negotiate with the patriarchs of Constantinople, to recover the privation of images, and that he did, so regardless of circumstances, that he was thrice scourged and banished, the last time to Apamea in Bithynia, where he died. A Nicephori Disputatión written by him, a Theodore Lector, one of the last of the Old Greek Church historians; was lector in the Constantinopolitan school. He wrote a Historia Tripartita — extracts from Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret; but it has never been published. Of much importance was a second work by him, a continuation down to the time of Justin the Elder; but it has perished. Only fragments of it have been preserved by John of Damascus, Nilus, and Nicephorus Callisti; they have been published in Paris, 1544, and at Canterbury, by G. Reading, 1720.

Theodore of Mopsuestia, b. at Antioch about 350; d. at Mopsuestia, in Cilicia, about 398; one of the chief leaders of the Antiochian school of dogmatics. For a juridical career, he studied philosophy and rhetoric under the famous Libanius, but at the same time he made the acquaintance of Chrysostom; and the religious enthusiasm of the latter induced him to devote his life to Christian philosophy and asceticism. Soon after, however, he repented of the change, and meditated a return to his former occupation; but the reproaches and admonitions of his friend finally decided him (see Chrysostom: Ad Theod. Iapsum). His attitude toward this method of exegesis, Theodore, following the track of Eusebius of Emesa and Diodorus, placed a simple, direct interpretation, based on the given historical conditions; not that he, for instance, denied the idea of prophecy, but he confined its application within very narrow limits, outside of which he ascribed to it only a typical designation. Thus he referred all the messianic Psalms, with the exception of three, to Zerubbabel and Hezekiah, and denied altogether that the Old Testament knew anything of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit as forming the Trinity. Equally free was his treatment of the canon. He distinguished between historical, prophetical, and pedagogical books; and the last group (Job, the Lamentations, Proverbs) he absolutely rejects without reserve. The Canticles he rejected altogether, and spoke of with great contempt.

It took some time before the Pelagian controversy, which originated in the West, reached the East, and at first it made no deep impression there. Nevertheless, there came a moment when Theodore felt compelled to make an open attack on the Augustinian doctrine of hereditary sin; and he wrote his book Against those who say that man falls by nature, and not by sentence. The book itself has perished: but Marius Mercator has preserved some fragments of it in Latin translation; and Photius, who had read it, gives a summary of its contents. It was directed against Augustine, but addressed to Jerome. The latter is very plainly indicated by allusions to his translation of the Bible, his journey to the East, etc.; and the circumstance that he had spread the new heresy in Syria; by writing books in its defence was the very cause of Theodore's interference. Theodore absolutely rejects such propositions as these,—that man, originally created good and immortal, became bad and mortal by Adam's sin; that sin now has its origin in human nature, and not in the will of man; that newly born infants are not tainted by sin as the result of Adam's sin; that baptism, and eating the Lord's Supper; that marriage and generation are the evil results of an evil nature, etc. According to Marius Mercator and Photius, he even went so far as to assert that man was created mortal by God, and that the doctrine of death as a punishment of sin is a mere fiction invented for the purpose of sharpening man's hatred of sin. In his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans he expresses himself very cautiously on this point; and, though he does not directly deviate from the Pauline doctrine of the relation between sin and death, he evidently considered the history of the human race so closely connected with the general development of the world, that death became to his eyes a necessary and indispensable transition in human existence. At a later date, Julian of Eclanum, and other Pelagians who were expelled from Italy, found refuge with him; his teachings were considered as belonging to Theodore; and extracts of his other commentaries have been collected by Wegner, A. Mai, and Fritzschke, from the catena. Under the influence of the Alexandrian school, the mystico-allegorical interpretation of Scripture prevailed throughout the Greek Church, more especially the christological interpretation of the Old Testament, totally neglecting the organical connection and all historical relations. In opposition to this method of exegesis, Theodore, following the track of Eusebius of Emesa and Diodorus, devoted a great part of his life to the interpretation of the human representation, of the human representation, on the Augustinian doctrine of hereditary sin; and he wrote his book Against those who say that man falls by nature, and not by sentence. The book itself has perished: but Marius Mercator has preserved some fragments of it in Latin translation; and Photius, who had read it, gives a summary of its contents. versy, gives a preliminary idea of his christological views. While presbyter of Antioch, he wrote fifteen books on the incarnation, and a special work against Eunomius. Thirty years later on, as bishop of Mopsuestia, he wrote a work against Apollinaris. These books have perished; with the exception of few fragments; but we know that he was the true representative of the speculative theology of the Antiochian school, and that, in contradistinction to the Alexandrian school, he emphasized in his christology the completeness of the human nature of Christ, and its indelible difference from its divine nature. It was, however, not he, but Nestorius, who was destined to carry this view to its last consequences, and fight for it in the world. At the Council of Ephesus (431) no one dared to attack Theodore directly; and, though open attacks were made upon him shortly afterward by Marius Mercator and Rabulas of Edessa, it took more than a century before the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in weaning the Eastern Church from its great teacher, and branding his name with the stamp of heresy. See NESTORIUS AND THREE-CENTER CONTROVERSY.

LIT.—The Greek fragments of Theodore's works were published by W. LEBER, Berlin, 1834; A. MAJ, in Script. vet. nov. Coll., vi.; Rome, 1832, and Nov. Patr. Bibl., vii. Rome, 1854, and FRITZSCHE, Halle, 1847. The Latin remains are found in PITRA: Specie. Solen., i.; Paris, 1832, and SYRIAC Fragments of Theodore's Works, the translation of his Life by Garnier. There are also editions from it. Immediately after his entrance in Constantinople, he deposed the bishop, Demophilus, one of the leaders of the Arians, and banished him from the city; and, in spite of the riots of the Arian populace, he gave all the churches of the capital to the orthodox, and put a heavy penalty on the celebration, even in private, of Arian service. In spring, 381, he convened a synod in Constantinople,—the second ecumenical council, consisting of a hundred and fifty picked bishops. The third synod, which deposed the semi-Arian group, and forming the party of Macedonius, were at once brought to silence; and the council confirmed the Nicene Creed, adding the new clause of the procession of the Holy Spirit. The decrees of the council were followed by a number of imperial edicts deposing Christians who relapsed into Paganism of the right of making a will, or inheriting a bequest, confounding the property of the Manicheans unless they allowed their children to be educated in the Catholic faith, and forbidding the Eunomians and the Arians to build churches, and celebrate service. He also exercised considerable influence on the religious affairs of the West, especially after the overthrow of Maximus in 388, and the establishment of Valentinian II., and still more especially after the crushing of the rebellion of Arbogast in 392, and the establishment of Honorius. He was a friend of Ambrose, and accepted with meekness a very severe rebuke from him. In order to avenge the assassination of Botericus, his governor in Thessalonica, he allowed over seven thousand mostly innocent people to be massacred (April, 380); but, when Ambrose heard of his cruel deed, the emperor ordered him to cease the church until due penance was done. In Alexandria he ordered, and in other places he allowed, the Pagan temples to be destroyed; and certain forms of Pagan worship—sacrifice, investigation of the future, etc. He absolutely forbade, even under penalty of death. See FLICKER: Histoire de Th. le Grand, Paris, 1860; P. ERASMUS MÜLLER: Comment. de Thé., Götttingen, 1797–98; SUFFKEN: De Theod., Lyons, 1828; GÜLDENPENNING U. THEODORUS. See BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 281.

THEODULPH, surnamed Aurelianensis, one of those men whom Charlemagne invited from Italy to France for the advancement of science and art in the latter country. He was probably a Goth by descent. He came to Gaul at the latest in 781, and was made abbott of Fleury, and afterwards bishop of Paris, where he died in 821. His literary character is not unlike that of Alcuin. He was a poet and a theologian. His theological works consist of minor treatises: De ordine baptismi, De spiritu sancto, etc., and capitularia for his priests, which show that he was very anxious for the establishment of schools. His THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION.

Among the ancients the Jews, at the time of Samuel on, there were schools of the prophets, in which young men were trained for the office of public instruction. (See Education among the Hebrews.) The sons of priests were trained in the temple service for their subsequent duties. At a later date the synagogues were the schools of the Jews. The apostles received their special training, first in the school of John the Baptist, and then in that of Christ. Paul alone had a rabbinical education. The necessity of special training was felt early in the Christian Church, not only for the conduct of worship, but the opposition of error, and, above all, the Pagan religion. The first instruction was given, probably, in the local churches, by their bishops; but, at the close of the second century, there existed at Alexandria a theological seminary, the first of its kind, in which students were drilled in Christian apologetics, and guided in the study of the Scriptures. It is known as the school of Origen. Its principal purpose was to prepare catechumens for baptism; but it answered a wider design, and instructed those already Christians. The first known superintendent of this school is Pancratius, but the most famous are Clement and Origen. At first the school had only one teacher, then two or more, but without fixed salary or special buildings. The more wealthy pupils paid for tuition, but the offer was often declined. The teachers gave instructions in their dwellings, generally after the style of the Greek philosophers. Origen established a similar school at Caesarea. The dissensions in the Alexandrian Church put an end to the school at the close of the fourth century.

Next in point of time and importance comes the school of Antioch, which was founded about 296 by the presbyters Dorotheus and Lucian. In opposition to Alexandrian allegorizing, it developed a severe grammatico-historical exegesis. Its most eminent members are Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Nestorius. In Edessa, Ephrem Syrus (d. 378) founded a school, and continued the methods of Antioch. It furnished ministers for Mesopotamia and Persia.

In the West the priests were trained in cloisters and private episcopal schools. The Roman Church has continued to train her clergy in this fashion. Several of the most learned Fathers, such as Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, and Augustine, were educated in heathen schools, and then studied theology, either in ascetic retirement or under some distinguished church-teacher.

In the middle age the cloister schools were the sole centres of learning until the universities arose at Paris, Oxford, Cologne, and elsewhere. In them the theological faculty ranked first, and dominated the others. In England, John Wyclif (d. 1384) had a seminary at Oxford, and later at Lutterworth, in which he trained the "poor priests," who disseminated Lollard doctrine all over the land. The Reformers were university trained men. The ministry of the Protestant churches of most denominations has always been distinguished for its education. On the Continent, theology in all its branches is taught as a department of the university. The theological students are on a par with those of the other faculties. The professors are members of the university corps, but constitute a separate faculty. In the great English universities those who contemplate entering holy orders read with a professor, and are examined by a bishop's chaplain. There is no regular theological faculty, and no theological department, though there are theological professors. Independent of the universities, there are, however, eighteen theological schools connected with the Church of England, under the supervision of bishops. In Scotland the Established Church has regular theological faculties at its four universities,—Glasgow, Edinburgh, St. Andrews, and Aberdeen. The Free Church has three "theological halls," as they are called,—at New College, Edinburgh, with seven professors; at Glasgow, with four; and at Aberdeen, with four. The United Presbyterian Church has its "hall" at Edinburgh, with four professors. The Presbyterians of England have a "theological college" in London; those of Ireland, one in Belfast, and another in Derry. The Wesleyans have the "Bible College" in Great Britain. Its effect on Congregationalists fourteen, the Baptists nine, and the Roman Catholics twenty-six. All these are supported by voluntary subscriptions.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES. 2332 THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES, Sketches of (arranged according to denominations, in alphabetical order, and chronologically under each).

Each sketch is prepared by a professor or secretary of the institution. Some sketches are anticipated in earlier arts.

1. HAMILTON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY is situated in Hamilton, N.Y., a suburban village of rare beauty and healthfulness, distinguished as an educational centre among Baptists, where in one system of schools are trained one-tenth of all ministerial students of that denomination in the United States. The seminary was founded in 1819 by far-sighted pioneers, who were actuated by a profound conviction, then widely felt, of the necessity of higher education for the ministry. It is the oldest Baptist seminary in the country, has sent out the largest number of students, and, by reason of its pronounced religious mission, has been most intimately identified with the history and growth of American Baptists for the past sixty years. Its impress upon alumni is claimed to show the following characteristics,—a biblical theology, an educative pulpit, a missionary spirit, and remarkable adaptation to the varied phases of real life. The course of study embraces six departments under as many regular professors, with series of lectures by other eminent scholars, and covers a period of three years, with abundant provision for special students. The seminary owns a domain of a hundred and thirty acres, on which are several residences, two large four-story school buildings, and a site for another finer structure, which is to be speedily erected. Its financial condition is excellent. Productive funds insure the payment of all salaries and current expenses. Numerous scholarships, and generous contributions from the churches, provide for the needs of indigent students. Carefully selected working libraries are accessible, to the extent of 20,000 volumes. The presidents have been, Rev. Drs. D. Hascall, N. Kendrick, J. S. Maginnis, G. W. Eaton, and E. Dodge, the present head. The chairs of instruction have been occupied by such eminent teachers as Barnas Sears, Thomas J. Weston, A. M. Beebee, H. Harvey, and W. H. Maynard.

H. S. LOYD (Secretary).

(2) NEWTON THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTION. See art. by Dr. Hovey, vol. ii. p. 1042.

(3) ROCHESTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—This institution was established at Rochester, N.Y., in 1855. It is supported and controlled by Baptist churches, and is strictly a professional school for the higher education of candidates for the Christian ministry. The seminary has no organic connection with the University of Rochester, either in management or instruction, though both institutions were founded at about the same time, and largely through the same instrumentalities.

The influence and characteristics of the seminary during the first twenty years of its history are due, more than to any other one man, to Ezekiel G. Robinson, D.D., LL.D., for many years its president. Rauhchenbusch, a pupil of Neander, has had charge of this department.

A peculiarity of the seminary has been the widely separated sections of country from which its students have come, and to which they have gone. During its entire history of thirty-two years, about eight hundred persons have entered the institution, have been trained and become foreign missionaries. Of the six hundred students connected with the English department, nearly four hundred have completed the full course, including the study of the Scriptures in Hebrew and Greek.

For several years the financial resources of the seminary were entirely inadequate, and altogether disproportionate to its usefulness. In 1868 the funds amounted to only $100,000, and there were no permanent buildings. In 1869 Mr. John B. Trevor was the largest donor of Trevor Hall, a spacious dormitory building, which cost $42,000. In 1879 Rockefeller Hall, containing convenient lecture-rooms, a chapel, a fire-proof room used as a library, and costing $385,000, was erected by Mr. John D. Rockefeller. Other prominent benefactors are Messrs. Jacob F. Wyckoff, Joseph B. Hoyt, John H. Deane, Charles Pratt, and James O. Pettengill. At present the invested funds amount to $1,225,000. The land and buildings are valued at $125,000.

The library, numbering nearly 20,000 volumes, is well arranged, and of exceptional value for theological study. It comprises the entire collection of Neander, the church historian; and during the last five years $25,000, the timely gift of Mr. William Rockefeller, has been expended in the purchase of carefully selected works.

Subscription to creeds or to formal statements of doctrine is never required of either students or instructors. Persons of all evangelical denominations who give satisfactory evidence of personal religious experience, and of a call to the Christian ministry, are admitted to the privileges of the institution.

BENJAMIN O. TRUE (Professor).

(4) THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was established in 1859 at Greenville, S.C., and removed in 1877 to Louisville, Ky. Its plan of instruction is quite peculiar, all the studies being in biblical and systematic theology. Among other past instructors, are included Drs. Thomas J. Conant, Horatio B. Hackett, John H. Raymond, Asahel C. Kendrick, and George W. Northrup. There were at first only two professors. There are now, in the English department alone, six active professors; viz., Rev. Augustus Strong, D.D. (since 1872 president), Rev. Howard Osgood, D.D., William A. Stevens, D.D., LL.D., Rev. T. Harwood Patterson, D.D., Rev. Adelbert S. Coats, and Rev. Benjamin O. True.

The German department, altogether distinct from the regular English course, was founded in 1854. It is the only school in America expressly designed to train men for the ministry in German Baptist churches. Since 1858 Rev. Augustus Rauschenbusch, a pupil of Neander, has had charge of this department.

A peculiarity of the seminary has been the widely separated sections of country from which its students have come, and to which they have gone. During its entire history of thirty-two years, about eight hundred persons have entered the institution, have been trained and become foreign missionaries. Of the six hundred students connected with the English department, nearly four hundred have completed the full course, including the study of the Scriptures in Hebrew and Greek.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Theological course to those desiring and prepared for it, and at the same time a good theological course to those studying English and Latin, with the object of being able to select special studies at will. This was considered necessary to meet the wants of the Baptist ministry, which includes men of all grades of education. In addition to these conditions, the whole range of theological study was divided into eight independent schools, some of having two separate departments; as Old-Testament English and Hebrew, New-Testament English and Greek, Systematic Theology English and Latin. Among these schools and departments, each student selects, under the guidance of the professors, according to his preparation and the number of years he can give to theological studies. Some remain only one session (of eight months); others, two, three, four, or even five years. A separate diploma is given in each school to those who have pursued the studies, and have passed very thorough written examinations, intermediate and final. Those who have thus been graduated in all the schools receive at last the diploma of "full graduate;" and those graduated in all except the departments of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Theology, receive the diploma of "English graduate." Some of the students thus pursue an unusually extensive course, such as would not be possible where there is the same curriculum for all. It is noticed that all alike elect to attend the "English" classes in the Bible and theology, the most scholarly finding these highly profitable along with their more erudite studies.

Beginning in 1859 with a good endowment (subscribed by Southern planters) and a large attendance, the seminary was suspended, 1862-65, by the war, and began again in 1865 with seven students and no endowment, the private bonds being then valueless. It has lived, through great exertions and sacrifices, with a steadily increasing attendance, till, in 1882-83, there were a hundred and twenty students from twenty different States. The invested endowment has reached over $300,000, besides $80,000 in real estate. Most of this has been raised at the hands of the most liberal friends in New-York City and elsewhere who have given very generous assistance.

(5) The Baptist Theological Union, located at Chicago, was organized in 1855, its object being to provide a thorough theological seminary. In 1865 W. W. Cook of Whitehall, N.Y., and Lawrence Barnes and Mial Davis of Burlington, Vt., pledged fifteen hundred dollars per year, for five years, for the support of a professor. Instruction was given, under this encouragement, to about one hundred students, in 1866, by Rev. J. C. Colver and Rev. J. C. C. Clark, in the building of the Chicago University.

In September, 1886, Rev. G. W. Northrup, D.D., professor of church history in the Rochester Theological Seminary, was invited to the presidency, and professorship of systematic theology; and Rev. J. B. Jackson, D.D., of Albion, N.Y., was chosen to the chair of church history. They accepted the appointments, and entered on their duties in October, 1867, when the seminary was fully organized, and commenced its work with twenty students. In the early years of its history the seminary had much need of general education. In 1873 a Scandinavian department was organized, under the care of Rev. J. A. Edgren. It began with four students. In 1882-83 the number had increased to twenty-five students.

In 1877 the institution was removed to Morgan Park, a suburb eight miles south of Chicago. Here the seminary has a beautiful site of five acres, and one commodious building. It is proposed eventually to use the present building for dormitories exclusively, and to add three others, one for the Scandinavian department, one for the library, and one for chapel and lecture-rooms.

Dr. G. W. Northrup has been president from the beginning, and conducted the affairs of the seminary with distinguished ability.

Rev. G. S. Bailey, D.D., was financial secretary from 1867 to 1875, and was succeeded by Rev. T. W. Goodspeed, D.D., in 1876.

The growth of the seminary has been rapid from the beginning. The first year there were twenty students; the second year, twenty-five; and, with occasional fluctuation, this rate of increase has continued through sixteen years, the number of students in 1882-83, reaching ninety-four. Being the only Baptist theological seminary in the West, it seems destined to attract increasing numbers of students every year.

The library numbers about 20,000 volumes, and is of great value.

In 1880 the endowment of the seminary was about $50,000. In 1881 E. Nelson Blake of Chicago, long a most liberal friend of the institution, subscribed $50,000, on condition that the amount be increased to $100,000. The effort to do this was successful. In 1883 J. D. Rockefeller of Cleveland subscribed $40,000, on similar conditions. The completion of this subscription gives the seminary a living endowment. T. W. GOODSPEED (Sec'y).

(2) Bangor Theological Seminary was chartered by the Legislature of Massachusetts in February, 1814. It was designed to provide for an evangelical ministry for the State. It is in the District of Maine. It was originally located at Hampden on the Penobscot River, where it began its work in October, 1816. The founders of the seminary had especially in view the needs of stu-

...desirous of entering the ministry without a previous college-training. Accordingly the original course of study occupied four years; the first two chiefly devoted to literary and classical studies, and the last two to the strictly theological branches. In 1849 the institution was removed to Bangor, at the head of navigation on the Penobscot, then a town of two hundred and thirty inhabitants. In 1820 the first class, numbering six students, was graduated. In the same year the District was separated from Massachusetts, and became the State of Maine. It was in territory larger than the rest of New England, and had a population of three hundred thousand, largely of Puritan descent. In 1827 the classical department was given up, the period of study reduced to three years, and the curriculum made similar to that of other theological institutions in this country.

During the sixty-seven years of its existence, the seminary has numbered among its instructors not a few men eminent for piety, scholarship, and influence. Not to speak of any still living, mention may be made of Jehudi Ashmun, afterwards president of Bowdoin College; George Shepard, so widely known and eminent as a pulpit-orator; and Enoch Pond, to whom, more than to any other, the success of the institution was due, and who for fifty years was connected with it as professor and president.

The seminary has sent out more than six hundred graduates, and given a partial theological education to nearly two hundred more. These men have made a faithful and useful body of workers. The majority of them are still living, and are at their posts all over the land, or laboring in foreign countries, in pulpit of many denominations and every grade of eminence.

The seminary has been from the first connected with the Congregational denomination, its board of trustees and faculty being members of Congregational churches. Its aim, however, has always been practically Christian, rather than denominational. Its founders favored the type of theological education known as "New-England theology," and had a congregation in Bangor has never been identified with any particular school or system. At present the seminary draws its students, not only from Maine and other parts of New England, but also from the Dominion of Canada, especially the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The faculty is now constituted numbers five professors. The number of students in attendance has varied from twenty to fifty.

L. F. STEARNS (Professor).

(4) THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE OF CONNECTICUT (now usually known as HARTFORD THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY), the fourth in age, and second in number of students, among Congregational seminaries in the United States. Established in 1834 at East Windsor Hill, Conn.; the laying of the cornerstone of the building, and the inauguration of Dr. Tyler (see art. BENNET TYLER), taking place May 13. Removed to Hartford in 1835, where a commodious building was erected through the munificence of Mr. James B. Hosmer. The cornerstone of Hosmer Hall was laid in May, 1879, and the building occupied early in 1880. The appointments and arrangements of the edifice are admirably adapted for its purpose. The library-building is connected with the main hall; the chapel, recitation-rooms, dormitories, dining-hall, etc., are under the same roof; the well-equipped gymnasium is a detached building. For an account of the origin of the institute, see art. BENNET TYLER. The Pastoral Union of Connecticut chooses ten trustees annually (since 1880 one-third retire each year); the former body elects its own members, who are required to subscribe its creed, to which the professors give their assent annually. The three professors first chosen were Bennet Tyler, D.D., Jonathan Cogswell, D.D., and William Thompson, D.D. The last-named survives, and continued in active service until 1881, when he became professor emeritus. There are at present (1883) five active professors, an in-structor in music and voice-building, and one in gymnastics. A course of lectures on the Carew foundation is given each year.

The number of students in all amounts to 495: at present there are 53 in attendance. Twenty-eight graduates have become foreign missionaries. The theological position of the seminary has from the beginning been Calvinistic, and the creed is in accordance with the accredited formulary New-England Congregationalism. The present faculty recognize, more fully than did the founders of the institute, the exegetical and historical point of view; but the doctrinal result is substantially the same. The views on the predestination of sin are probably more Augustinian than those of Dr. Tyler; and the entire range of theological science is now regarded, in its higher unity, as centring in the person and work of Christ.

The methods of instruction are less formal than in many institutions,—fewer lectures and more constant drill, together with a greater demand for individual labor on the part of the students.

The chief benefactor of the seminary has been Mr. James B. Hosmer, who not only gave the present building, and endowed the chair of New Testament exegesis, but left a considerable sum to the general fund. In the early years of the institute, annual contributions of small sums were made by many persons who were in sympathy with its aims. Recently Mr. Newton Case of Hartford has given largely to increase the library, which now numbers over 35,000 volumes, many of them rare and valuable. It is particularly rich in editions of ancient codices, early printed New Testaments, patristic literature, and works of the sixteenth century. The collection of periodical literature, especially of missionary intelligence, is large and increasing.

M. B. RIDDLE (Professor).

(6) THE CHICAGO THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY dates its existence from the fall of 1854. It was the first of the four denominational seminaries located at Chicago, or in its vicinity, and had its origin in a deep and widespread conviction that the time had come when the churches of the West should more largely provide and educate their own ministers. After several preliminary conferences, it was organized Sept. 26, 1854, by a convention, called for that purpose, of delegates from the Congregational churches of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Missouri. It was made directly responsible to the churches by being placed under the general supervision of triennial conventions, composed of the Congregational ministers, and one delegate from each of the Congregational churches in the States and Territories west of Ohio, and east of the Rocky Mountains. These triennial conventions elect the board of twenty-four directors and the board of twelve visitors, under whose direct control the seminary is placed, and who, by the requirements of its constitution, must be members of some Congregational church within the bounds of its constitution. The members of these boards hold their office for six years, and are eligible for re-election.

The seminary was thus, from the first, under Congregational control; but its privileges were equally open to students from all denominations of Christians. A special and liberal charter, exempting all the property of the seminary from taxation, was secured from the State of Illinois, Feb. 15, 1854.

The institution was formally opened Oct. 6, 1858, with two professors — Professor Joseph Haven, D.D., and Professor Samuel C. Bartlett, D.D. — and twenty-nine students.

Subsequently other chairs were filled; and the present faculty (1883) are:

Rev. F. W. Fisk, D.D., Wisconsin Professor of Sacred Rhetoric.
Rev. G. B. Wilcox, D.D., Stone Professor of Pastoral Theology and Special Studies.
Rev. H. McDonald Scott, B.D., Secretary and Treasurer of the Episcopal Department.
Professor C. B. Anthony, Instructor in Ecclesiastical History.
Professor G. A. Zimmerman, Instructor in German Department.

A special course of study is provided for those, who, though not able to acquire a liberal education, may yet possess both the talents and piety requisite to the Christian ministry. Also a German department is established, giving such instruction and training, additional to the regular studies of the seminary, as will best qualify German students to preach the gospel in their mother-tongue as well as in English.

During the twenty-five years since the opening of the seminary, 496 have been under instruction, and 243 have graduated. The seminary-buildings, Keyes and Carpenter Halls, and Hammond Library, are located fronting Union Park, Chicago, and in addition to lecture-rooms, chapel, and library, furnish study and dormitory rooms for nearly a hundred students.

The library numbers about 7,000 volumes, and with the completion of the new fire-proof library-building, immediate efforts will be made for its enlargement. Seven professorships are established, which are in part or fully endowed; also twenty-five scholarships, yielding an average annual income of a hundred dollars each. From these and other educational funds a hundred and fifty dollars of annual aid is given to the students who need it.

The seminary has had a vigorous growth, and now furnishes to theological students ample privileges and instructions. With its able faculty, its central position, and the large and continually increasing number of churches embraced in its constitution, its future enlargement and usefulness are assured. There is no reason to question, that it will be the peer of the best seminaries in the land.

G. S. F. Savage (Secretary and Treasurer).

III. Episcopal.

The General Theological Seminary in New York was founded May 27, 1817, by the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, to provide a school for the education of its candidates for holy orders, whose plan and situation would meet the wants of the church in all sections of the country. Bishop Bowen of South Carolina, Bishop White of Pennsylvania, and Bishop Hobart of New York, were most active in its behalf. In accordance with this plan, drawn up by the two latter bishops, foreshadowing the institution and its several professorships as they exist to-day, it was opened in a room of St. Paul's Chapel, May 1, 1819. The first professors were the Rev. Samuel H. Turner, D.D., and the Rev. Samuel F. Jarvis, D.D. But notwithstanding the munificent offer by Dr. Clement C. Moore, of the ground on which the buildings now stand, and the efforts of a large committee, subscriptions came in so slowly, that the General Convention, in 1820, removed it to New Haven, where it was thought it might be supported at less expense than in New York. That was an error soon made itself apparent; and the death of Mr. Jacob Sherred of New York, who left a noble legacy of $60,000 to a seminary to be established in New York, gave the Convention an opportunity to bring it back in 1822, and thus correct a mistake which would have proved fatal to its continuing a general institution. It was re-opened in a building belonging to Trinity School, on the corner of Canal and Varick Streets, in February, 1822, with twenty-three students and six professors. The constitution laid the foundation of a widely extended system of theological instruction. It provided not only for the seminary in New York, but for branch schools under its control in different parts of the country. In its board of trustees, which is elected in part by the General Convention and in part by certain dioceses, the church in all parts of the United States is represented. The course of study is to be prescribed by the House of Bishops; and each bishop is not only ex officio a trustee, but a visitor of the institution, with all the powers that that involves. Thus the interest, as well as the rights, of every part of the Episcopal Church in its general seminary, is amply secured and protected.

The cornerstone of the first building, now known as the East Building, was laid July 28, 1825, by Bishop White, in the presence of a large assemblage of clergy and citizens, on the ground given by Dr. Clement C. Moore. At that time the site was an apple-orchard on the banks of the Hudson River, which at that time flowed a little east of the present Tenth Avenue.

In 1834, to accommodate the increasing number of students, a second building, now known as the West Building, was erected.

But it was still the day of small things for the Episcopal Church in this country, as well as for the city. The large fortunes now so common were then unknown; and, in common with all our other collegiate institutions, it had to struggle to do its work with a very small and insufficient endowment, but always with the unimpeachable record, that not a dollar of its trust-funds has ever been lost. More than once in its history, in consequence of the growth of the city, heavy assessments have been laid upon it, which have absorbed all its available income; and had not the professors, at great personal sacrifice, and some of the leading clergy of the city, voluntarily offered their services to the institution without remuneration, its trustees would have been compelled to close its doors. Thus it has gone on steadily with its work, until its graduates, which number more than a thousand, are to be found among the leading clergy of every diocese of the Episcopal Church, as well as for the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country, as well as for the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Far West.

The faculty is composed of a dean and six professors, as follows:

The Rev. Randall C. Hall, D.D., "Clement C. Moore" Professor of the Hebrew and Greek Languages.

The Rev. Andrew Oliphant, D.D., Professor of Biblical Learning, etc.

The Rev. William J. Seabury, D.D., "Charles and Elizabeth Ludlow" Professor of Ecclesiastical Polity and Law.

The Rev. Thomas Rich, D.D., "St. Mark's Church in the Hosierie" Professor of Ecclesiastical History.

The Rev. Francis T. Russell, Instructor in Elocution.

The Rev. Eugene A. Hoffman, D.D., Dean.

The Rev. William E. Eigenbrodt, D.D., "Eugene A. Hoffman" Professor of Pastoral Theology.

3. THE BERKELEY DIVINITY SCHOOL, at Middletown, Conn. — This school takes its name from Dr. George Berkeley, who came to this country in his forty-fourth year, in 1728, with the hope of founding an American college, and who resided some two years at Newport, R.I. It was originally a department of Trinity College, Hartford; but in 1854 it was proposed to erect it into an independent institution. An act of incorporation was obtained for it from the Legislature of Connecticut; and with its own board of trustees it was located at Middletown, where it has since remained. The first class which graduated from it dates from 1856, and the number of its alumni now exceeds two hundred and fifty. Its patrons have so far endowed it, that it now maintains five professors, and has a library amounting to 17,000 volumes. Of course its instruction is Episcopal; but it would not deny its privileges to a sincere student of any denomination who desired to listen to the teaching given, and to enjoy the opportunities of the institution. For religious services, its chapel, which is a very commodious and beautiful building, is open twice daily, — at nine a.m. and five p.m. On Sundays the Holy Communion is administered, and sermons are occasionally delivered by the professors. The parish church is hard by, and on Sunday the students frequently go there. There are professorships of doctrinal theology and the prayer-book, of church history, of the literature and interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures, of the literature and interpretation of the Christian Scriptures, of the Christian evidences and homiletics, of the Hebrew tongue, and of elocution. The students are expected, at regular intervals, to deliver written and extemporaneous sermons. The period of study comprises eight and nine months, with short recesses at Christmas and Easter. The school opens the second Thursday in September. Tuition and room-rent are free. Aid is extended to those who need it, under terms made known on application to the dean.

TANT-EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN PHILADELPHIA.—This school is situated on Woodland Avenue and Fifteenth Street, at the south-west edge of the city, less than three miles from the City Hall and the depot of the Pennsylvania Railroad; which are at Penn Square, in the centre of the city. It is conveniently reached either by the steam-cars, from the Pennsylvania depot, or by horse-cars, from the Church Street depot.

Its present buildings were erected in 1882. They are situated on an elevated plateau, commanding a view of the city and of the country. They occupy a lot of ground with an area of several acres, fronting on the avenue, and having a fine old oak-grove in the rear. They are of three stories, constructed of stone, consisting of a centre building and two wings. They are supplied with gas, and warmed by steam throughout, with grates also in most of the rooms. In one wing is the kitchen department with laundry attached, and a dining-room for the students, also a gymnasium and bowling-alleys. In the other wing there are accommodations for the dean and his family. There are also a reception-room, a reading-room, five or six convenient lecture-rooms, and rooms for forty students. The chapel is not yet built; but funds are already provided for its erection, and in the mean time a large and commodious room is fitted up for a chapel in the present buildings.

An informal training-school for candidates for the ministry had existed for two or three years before 1850, under the direction of the late Bishop Alonzo Potter. Upon the breaking-out of the Rebellion, and the consequent closing of the Episcopalian seminary at Alexandria, Va., it was thought desirable to establish in Philadelphia a fully equipped theological seminary or divinity school. Funds were procured, professors were appointed, and in 1852 the school was incorporated.

There are five professors of as many departments, including the instructor in Hebrew; viz., of biblical learning, Rev. Dr. Hare; of systematic divinity, Rev. Dr. Goodwin; of ecclesiastical history, Rev. D. Butler; of homiletics and pastoral care, Rev. Dr. Meier-Smith; and of the Hebrew language, Rev. Mr. Du Bois.

The school has had students from Canada, the West Indies, Liberia, and from almost all parts of the United States, though very few from the Southern States proper; which is quite natural, as of course none came from them during the war, and at its close the Alexandria seminary was reopened. Out of nearly three hundred students matriculated, its graduated alumni number not quite two hundred; of whom two are bishops, and two others have declined the episcopate. The number of its students, however, cannot be expected to be very large, owing to the multiplication of theological seminaries, in the Episcopal Church, in all quarters of the country; and, had the re-opening of the Alexandria seminary been anticipated, this school might, perhaps, never have been established.

The institution is well endowed. Three of its professorships have independent foundations, and it has already a very valuable library of some 8,000 volumes.

As to its ecclesiastical position, it is that of moderate Episcopacy and conservative Churchmanship. It is liberal and evangelical in its teaching, adhering to the standards of the church's doctrine, but committed to no particular school or party.

(5) THE EPISCOPAL THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL OF MASSACHUSETTS, in Cambridge.—This institution was founded in 1867 by the gift of $100,000, by the late B. T. Reed of Boston. It was the result of an often expressed feeling, that there ought to be an episcopalian seminary in Cambridge, both to exert an influence in behalf of the ministry upon the many young men there, and also to embrace the advantages there offered for study. The school was incorporated at once, with a liberal charter, empowering it to confer degrees, and also prescribing for its government a board of Trustees and a board of Clerical and Lay Visitors. A staff of four professors was secured, with the late Rev. J. S. Stone, D.D., as dean; and the institution entered upon a career which has exceeded the hopes of its friends. So far, there are seventy-five alumni, from all parts of the country; and now at work in equally varied localities. The course of study covers three years, and embraces the branches prescribed by the canons of the church, but it is sought to study them in a more advanced manner than has been usual, and to take advantage of all progress in scholarship. In accordance with this, admission is restricted to bachelors of arts, or those who submit to an equivalent examination; and superior scholarship is rewarded by the degree of bachelor of divinity.

There is no organic connection with Harvard University; but the nearness of that institution brings manifest advantages, and the chapel of the school is the usual place of worship of such Episcopalian students as are in Cambridge on Sunday.

The success of the school has led to the reception of munificent gifts; as follows, St. John's Memorial Chapel, from the late R. M. Mason; Lawrence Hall (the dormitory for forty students), from Amos A. Lawrence; Reed Hall (for library and class-rooms), from the founder; Burnham Hall (the refectory), from J. A. Burnham. Adding to these the original fund and a legacy of R. M. Mason, and also subscriptions for annual expenses, the total value of gifts, hitherto, exceeds $430,000. Besides this, the school has a reverential interest in the estate of the founder, which will render it one of the most amply endowed seminaries in the land.

G. ZABRISKIE GRAY (Professor). IV. LUTHERAN. (1) THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE GENERAL SYND OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES, Gettysburg, Penn.—The foundation of a theological seminary engaged the attention of the General Synod at its first convention in 1820. The realization of this effort was, however, not attained till a few years later, when Rev. S. S. Schmucker of New Market, Va., urged upon the Synod of Maryland and Virginia the enlargement of his private theological school into a general institution for the church. At the meeting of this body in 1825, he and the Revs. Charles P. Krauth and Benjamin Kurtz were appointed a committee to draft a plan for the immediate establishment of such an institution; and the action of this committee was the same year adopted, with some modifications, by the General Synod com-
Theological Seminaries. 2338 THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Vened at Frederick, Md. The General Synod appointed the first board of directors, and elected the first professor, Rev. S. S. Schmucker. The right of electing professors was thenceforth vested exclusively in the board of directors, who are chosen by such synods, in connection with the General Synod, to patronize the seminary, and contribute to its support. An official connection with the General Synod is maintained, and this continues the only theological school sustaining such a relation.

The board at its first meeting selected Gettysburg, Penn., as the location; and Professor Schmucker was inaugurated, and active operations begun, in September, 1826. Although designed for the entire Lutheran Church in the United States, the seminary encountered strong prejudices and open hostility from the Lutherans not connected with the General Synod. It had consequently to struggle for years for formidable difficulties; and, in view of prevailing divisions, it was long isolated from the support of the entire Lutheran community. The doctrinal basis recognizes the Augsburg Confession and the Smaller Catechism of Luther as "a correct exhibition of the fundamental doctrines of the word of God." The spirit of the institution has always been in substantial accord with the general type of American Christianity. Over six hundred students are enrolled among its alumni. The second professor, E. L. Hazelius, D.D., was elected in 1830. Since that time, H. I. Smith, D.D., C. P. Krauth, D.D., C. F. Schaeffer, D.D., J. A. Brown, D.D., LL.D., and M. Valentine, D.D., have been incumbents of the different chairs. The present faculty consists of C. A. Stork, D.D., C. A. Hay, D.D., E. J. Wolf, D.D., and J. G. Morris, D.D., LL.D. The library numbers 11,000 volumes. The endowment amounts to about $100,000, and the real estate is estimated at $50,000.

The Holman Lecture is a foundation, the income of which is devoted to an annual lecture on one of the twenty-one doctrinal articles of the Augsburg Confession. The Rice Lecture is a foundation providing for an annual lecture on "Methods of Ministerial Work." Special provision has always been made for indigent students, and scholarships covering the expenses of the entire course of three years are at the disposal of the faculty. A full History of this seminary, by Dr. J. G. Morris, is contained in vol. vi. of The Quarterly Review of the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

E. J. WOLF (Professor).

(2) Concordia Seminary of St. Louis, Mo., is one of the institutions of the German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, the largest Lutheran body in America. In it young men who have passed through a gymnasium (college), and are acquainted with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, are taught theology according to the Lutheran Confessions (Concordia of 1580). The school was founded toward the end of the year 1839 by a number of Lutheran theologians (among them Rev. C. F. W. Walther), in the midst of a settlement of German Lutherans that had emigrated the same year from Saxony in Germany. At first it comprised a gymnasium and a theological seminary, and in 1840 was removed to St. Louis. In the following year it was granted by the Lutheran congregations of Perry County and St. Louis, that had hitherto supported the same, to the aforesaid synod, which had been organized in 1847. In 1853 it was chartered by the Legislature of the State of Missouri. In 1861 the gymnasium was separated from the theological seminary, and removed to Fort Wayne, Ind., where it still flourishes; and a so-called practical seminary, owned by the synod at Fort Wayne, was removed to St. Louis, and combined with the Concordia Seminary. In 1875, however, the Practical Seminary was removed to Springfield, Ill. Up to the present time, about four hundred Lutheran ministers have in this institution (Concordia Seminary) received a thorough theological education, not including those of the Practical Seminary. The old building, erected during the years between 1856 and 1857, was taken down in 1882, and a new, large, splendid edifice erected, the dedication of which took place Sept. 9 and 10, 1883, in the presence of fifteen thousand people. Addresses were made in German, English, and French, and the services were conducted in those languages. The old building, since its removal, has been the residence of the president of the institution, the Rev. Dr. C. F. Walther, now the pastor of the Fourth Evangelical Lutheran Church in St. Louis, is still its venerable president. The languages used in the lectures are the Latin, German, and English. The regular course, requiring three years, embraces logic, metaphysics, encyclopaedia and methodology, isagogics, Hermeneutics, exegetics and cursory reading of the original text, dogmatics (including ethics and polemics), symbols, church history (including history of doctrines, patristics, and archaeology), catechetical and homiletic studies, pastoral theology, reading of select works of the Fathers, of English classical and recent theological writers, debates in Latin and English. Tuition is free. The institution is entirely sustained by synod: the students also, if poor, are liberally supported by the congregations. The present number of students is 105. The library contains about 9,000 volumes, mostly theological works.

(3) The Theological Seminary of the Evangelical Lutheran Church at Philadelphia.—In consequence of resolutions passed by the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States, at its meeting in Pottstown, Penn., Aug. 26, 1854, and at a special meeting held at Allentown, Penn., July 26 and 27, 1864, this seminary, after the appointment of a board of directors, and the election of the faculty (Rev. Drs. C. F. Schaeffer, W. J. Mann, C. F. Krauth, C. W. Schaeffer, G. F. Krotel), began operations Oct. 5, 1864, which since that time have been regularly continued. In the government of the seminary, other Lutheran synods, uniting with the Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States in the endowment and support of the institution, have a pro rata representation, a right of which the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of the State of New York now avails itself. The seminary has sent to this time more than two hundred graduates; whilst a considerable number of students of various denominations gratuitously received instruction without graduating. The character of this seminary is clearly indicated by the official declaration, "that this institution shall be devoted to the interests of the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

of the United States, and that its doctrinal character shall be unreservedly and unalterably based on all the Confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church." Of like tenor is the firmament of twenty-five thousand dollars demanded of the professors before entering upon their duties. Instruction is imparted through the medium of the English and German languages, the large field of labor providentially intrusted to the care of the Lutheran Church requiring at the present time both those languages in Pennsylvania and Ohio. Instruction is granted a diploma. The school issues a yearly catalogue for the benefit of students, and in 1858 the number of copies distributed was 2,500. Against this there is a mortgage-debt of $25,200. Against this there is a mortgage-debt of $25,200. Against this there is a mortgage-debt of $25,200. V. Methodistic Institute.—This institution is a theological seminary for the purpose of training men for the pulpits of the Episcopalian Church. It is located at Evanston, Ill., ten miles north of Chicago. It was opened provisionally in 1858, but was regularly organized, under a charter from the Legislature of Illinois, in the year following. The term of its charter, its trustees are empowered to accept and hold trust funds of any kind; and the real property of the institute is forever exempt from taxation. The professors elected in 1858 were the Rev. John L. Dempster, D.D., the Rev. Daniel P. Kidder, D.D., and the Rev. Henry Bannister, D.D. They were co-ordinate in rank, the senior in office acting as president of the faculty. Subsequently the Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D., the Rev. Francis D. Hemmingsway, D.D., the Rev. William X. Ninde, D.D., and the Rev. Henry B. Ridgeway, D.D., were added to the faculty. In 1879 Professor William X. Ninde, D.D., was elected president. The course of study is strictly biblical and theological, and continues three years. Instruction is largely by lectures, written and oral; but text-books as syllabus-work are in use. The institute confers the degree of bachelor of divinity upon graduates of colleges who complete its course. Others, who have not enjoyed a collegiate training, are admitted to its classes, and on the completion of the course are granted a diploma. The school is sustained chiefly by income from properties in the city of Chicago, bequeathed as a perpetual foundation by the late Mrs. Eliza Garrett, from whom its name is derived. Their present value is estimated at $50,000, yielding an income in 1883 of $25,200. Against this there is a mortgage-debt of $25,000, which is more than covered by subscriptions. The corporation own a fine educational building in Evanston, containing a chapel, library, lecture-rooms, and dormitories for the accommodation of one hundred students. Since the organization of the school, it has sent forth more than three hundred graduates, while nearly twelve hundred students have fully or partially shared its advantages. Far the larger part of those now surviving continue preaching the gospel, and are held in worthy estimation as alumni of the institution.

Not a few have attained prominence in the church as preachers and pastors, foreign missionaries, and presidents and professors of colleges and seminaries. The catalogue for 1883 shows an attendance of a hundred and three, with a graduating-class of twenty-five. The institution holds a general relation of sympathy with the Methodist colleges of the West, two of which — the North-western University of Evanston, Ill., and Chaddock College of Quinc, Ill., are held in worthy estimation as alumni of the institution.

II. THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. — Both Liberty Hall Academy in Lexington, Rockbridge, Va., and Hampden-Sidney College in Prince Edward, Va., were founded by the Presbyterians of that State, mainly for the purpose of rearing an educated ministry. The former still exists as Washington and Lee University, the latter as a well-endowed college of the Presbyterian Church. It is located at Princeton, N. J., and continues three years. Instruction is largely by lectures, written and oral; but text-books as syllabus-work are in use. The institute confers the degree of bachelor of divinity upon graduates of colleges who complete its course. Others, who have not enjoyed a collegiate training, are admitted to its classes, and on the completion of the course are granted a diploma. required to expound some parts of it from the original.

The seminary is now governed jointly by the synods of Virginia and North Carolina, through a board of twenty-four trustees, but under the superior control of the General Assembly, to whom annual reports must be made, and which exercises a veto-power over the election of professors and over all changes in its constitution and plan. The property of the seminary consists of about forty acres of land, with good buildings for seventy-five students and four professors, a handsome chapel and a superior library-building, and endowments of $250,000 for the support of the institution and twenty-five scholarships. The library, which is unusually select, numbers 12,000 volumes.

In Biblical Literature and New-Testament Interpretation.—Henry C. Alexander, D.D., 1860-.

The seminar was also served in this department by the following gentlemen as tutors: Elisha Ballantine, Benjamin M. Smith, Francis S. Sampson, Danby C. Harrison, and Thomas Wharey. The largest number of students ever collected in the seminar in one session was seventy-four: the number this session (1882-83) is fifty-six.

(5) Columbia Theological Seminary. The Presbyterian Theological Seminary whose seat is at Columbia, the capital of South Carolina, was established in the year 1828, under the corporate title "The Theological Seminary of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia." When, several years later, the synod thus named was divided into the two synods of South Carolina and of Georgia, an equal share in its management was continued to each. In 1867 the synod of Alabama accepted a joint interest in its control, with the same rights and privileges as belonged to either of the others. These three ecclesiastical bodies were empowered to elect a board of directors, that should meet and act in common, under a written constitution similar to that of the seminary at Princeton; the professors being chosen, in the event of a vacancy, by the synods themselves in rotation. In 1863 the seminary was transferred to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America, which body (its legal title altered in 1865 so as to read the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States) still governs it; the single limitation being, that its locality cannot be changed unless by the consent of the transferring synods.

Including the fund for the endowment of professorships, legacies, scholarships, real estate, and library, the property of this institution at the date of the transfer was valued at the nominal sum of $278,000. The civil war, however, which closed in 1865, left the productive funds in a condition so disabled as to render necessary the inauguration of immediate efforts for their rehabilitation. Meanwhile the deficiency was met by an extensive and liberal contributions from the churches. At the present time (1883) this method of supply is discontinued, in view of the fact that an efficient re-endowment agency has succeeded in securing an income, which, being in a condition of constant increase, will serve for a competent support and for an enlarged usefulness. Happily, its fine buildings, and its noble library of about 20,000 volumes, escaped the ravages of war. In 1880 the seminary was closed, and its faculty disbanded, partly owing to a lack of funds, and partly to other causes. But in the fall of 1882, the then Old School Synod of South Carolina and Georgia offered $100,000, to endow four professorships in theology, in order to supply an educated ministry for the evangelization of the rapidly increasing population. In response to this feeling, the New Albany Theological Seminary was founded. It was started first as an adjunct of Hanover College, Indiana, in the year 1850, but in 1850 was removed to New Albany, Ind., and for some years sustained by contiguous synods of the then Old-School branch of the Presbyterian Church. After a time it became apparent that the seminary was cripped by its proximity to similar institutions (though it had accomplished a great work by sending into the ministry of the church many able men); and its friends decided to suspend the enterprise at New Albany, and seek a more favorable location.

At the meeting of the General Assembly at Indianapolis in 1859, the Hon. Cyrus H. McCormick of Chicago offered $100,000, to endow four professorships in theological seminaries, to be located at Chicago. The assembly gratefully accepted the offer, and elected Rev. N. L. Rice, D.D., to the Cyrus H. McCormick chair of didactic and polemic theology. Rev. Willis Lord, D.D., to the chair of biblical and ecclesiastical history. Rev. L. J. Halsey, D.D., to the chair of pastoral...
THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

As of 1859, the Theological Seminary in New York City was established in 1835. It grew out of a desire to provide adequate theological instruction for the rising ministry. The institution has been deeply agitated by theological controversies and ecclesiastical strife. The schools of sacred learning were to some extent committed to partisan views of existing conflicts. It was thought that a theological seminary could be established on an independent basis, not subject to the control of accidental majorities in the General Assembly, committed to no theological school in the church, and to no ecclesiastical party, and occupying ground on which good and faithful men of Presbyterian affinities could meet together, and raise up a sound and thoroughly furnished ministry for the church.

At a meeting of four ministers and five laymen, on the evening of Oct. 10, 1835, at No. 8 Bond Street, New York, it was determined “to attempt to establish a theological seminary in the city of New York.” At a subsequent enlarged meeting, Nov. 9, $310,000 were subscribed. Two months later the subscription had been doubled. A constitution was adopted. Jan. 11, 1836, a large and highly responsible board of directors was chosen (whose first meeting was held a week later), and order was taken for an act of incorporation, which, after much delay, was obtained, March 27, 1839, from the Legislature of the State of New York. The government of the institution was vested in a self-perpetuating board of twenty-eight directors, one-half of whom to be elected every three years. In the charter, that all the advantages of the institution should be allowed to students of every denomination of Christians.

At the same time provision was made irrevocably, by the constitution, that every director should, on his election to office, solemnly promise to maintain while in office the plan and constitution of the seminary, the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Presbyterian form of church government.

Every member of the faculty, it was also provided, should, on entering upon his professorship, and triennially thereafter, or when required by the board, make and subscribe, in the presence of the board, the following declaration:

"I believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the Word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practice; and I do now, in the presence of God and the Directors of this Seminary, solemnly and sincerely receive and adopt the Westminster Confession of Faith as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures. I do also, in like manner, receive and approve of the Presbyterian Form of Government; and I do solemnly promise that I will not teach or inculcate any thing which shall appear to me to be subversive of the said system of doctrine, or of the principles of said Form of Government, so long as I shall continue to be a Professor in the Seminary."

Location.—The lease of a plot of ground, fronting on University Place, between Sixth and Eighth Streets, and extending through the block to Greene Street, one hundred by two hundred feet, belonging to the estate of The Sailor’s Snug Harbor, subject to an annual ground-rent of $800, was purchased for $8,000. Four professors’ houses were erected on Greene Street, and a commodious seminary building on University Place. The latter was completed and dedicated Dec. 12, 1838. Owing to the financial embarrassments of the institution, the houses on Greene Street were sold some four years later. Two of them have since been purchased, together with a house and lot adjoining, on the corner of Greene and Eighth Streets, to accommodate the students with dormitories. The seminary building has been much enlarged by a combination of independent owners.

Measures have now been taken for the removal of the seminary to a more eligible site on the west side of Park Avenue, between Sixty-ninth and...
Seventieth Streets, including the whole front on the avenue, and extending back on each of the streets a hundred and fifty feet. The buildings are now in the process of erection. They will include a fire-proof library edifice, a commodious chapel, and a large structure for lecture-halls, with a dormitory of six stories extending across the rear from street to street. They are to be of brick, with brown-stone trimmings, in the University Gothic style. The cost of the ground and buildings will considerably exceed half a million of dollars. The site is one of the most eligible in the city.

Library.—The nucleus of this unique collection of books was gathered by the Benedictine monks of Paderborn, in Germany, and was the growth of centuries. Large and valuable additions were made to it by the learned Dr. Leander Van Ess, until it numbered more than 13,000 volumes, consisting of the best collections of folio Biblical polyglots, lexicons, concordances, commentaries of Incunabula and Reformation tracts, all of which were purchased in bulk by the seminary in 1838.

Large and useful additions of the best modern theological publications, many of them from the private collections of the late Drs. Robinson, Sprague, Field, Marsh, Gillett, H. B. Smith, Adams, and others, have been made, together with the unique McAlpin collection of rare and interesting books and pamphlets relating to the Puritan divines, and the deistic, Trinitarian, and ecclesiastical controversies of the eighteenth century.

The library comprises not less than 42,000 volumes, 40,000 pamphlets, and 163 manuscripts.

Funds.—For several years the institution was conducted under great embarrassments. The original subscriptions were soon exhausted in providing buildings and the payment of salaries. The treasury at one time was overdrawn to the amount of not less than $18,000. In 1843, $25,000 were obtained for the endowment of the theological chair, the first permanent fund. A further sum of $10,000 was received or six years later, by a bequest of Mr. James Roosevelt. In 1853 a further sum of $100,000 was obtained by a general subscription, a bequest of $20,000 by Mrs. Fassett of Philadelphia in 1854, and a subscription of $25,000 in 1855, to endow the professorship of ecclesiastical history. A further subscription of $100,000 was obtained in 1859, of $150,000 in 1865, and of $300,000 in 1871. In 1873, by the princely gift, by Mr. James Brown, of $300,000, the institution was put upon an admirable foundation, the original corps of professors was increased from three to seven, and the fund of professorships from $25,000 to $90,000 each.

The late Gov. Eoin D. Morgan proved himself a most munificent patron of the seminary by his gifts of $100,000 for the library, and $100,000 towards the new site, together with a noble bequest of $200,000. Large sums have also been contributed by the late John C. Baldwin, William E. Dodge, Anson G. Phelps, jun., Frederick Marquand, and others still in the land of the living; so that now the general endowment-fund exceeds $1,000,000, in addition to specific funds amounting to $157,000, and the buildings, which it is expected, will be completed in 1884, without incumbrance.

Faculty.—The corps of instruction now consists of seven full professors in addition to one instructor. Several courses of lectures are also provided by guest instructors. Among the distinguished men who have filled the professorships are to be named, of those who have departed this life, the Rev. Drs. Henry White, Edward Robinson, Henry B. Smith, Thomas H. Skinner, and William Adams, all of precious memory. The present faculty is thus constituted:

Roswell D. Hitchcock, D.D., LL.D., President, and Professor of Church History.
Philip Schaff, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Sacred Literature.
George S. Prentiss, D.D., Professor of Pastoral Theology.
Charles A. Briggs, D.D., Professor of Hebrew and the Cognate Languages.
Thomas L. Hastings, D.D., Professor of Sacred Rhetoric.
Francis Brown, A.M., Associate Professor of Biblical Philology.

Students.—The seminary has, almost from the start, ranked with the first in the land as to the number under instruction. More than 2,000 students have availed themselves of its privileges, of whom 1,380 have graduated in due course. Not less than 1,750 of the whole number are still serving in the gospel ministry, and 127 are reported as missionaries to the heathen.

Ecclesiastical Control.—The General Assembly, since the re-union in 1870, has an optional veto over the appointment of the professors, and receives from the board an annual exhibit of its condition.

VIII. Reformed (German).—(1) Reformed Church Theological Seminary, at Lancaster, Penn.—Though the need of a theological seminary for the Reformed (German) Church had long been felt, it was not until the year 1817 that a definite act was received of the synod, and not until seven years later, that, after several abortive efforts, the institution was actually founded. At that time Dickinson College, then under the care of the Presbyterian Church, had been resuscitated; and, as its friends deemed it advantageous to bring the contemplated seminary into some connection with the college, liberal offers of accommodation and assistance were made by its trustees to the synod of the Reformed Church in 1824. These were accepted; and the seminary was opened March 11, 1825, with Rev. Lewis Mayer as professor of theology, and five students in attendance. After an experience of four years and a half, Carlisle was felt to be an unsuitable place for the seminary; and in the fall of 1829 the institution was removed to York, Penn. In 1837 it found a new home in Mercersburg, Penn., the seat of Marshall College, which had grown out of the classical department of Massillon College, organized in York with the seminary. Subsequently Marshall College was united with Franklin College, and in the spring of 1855 transferred to Lancaster, Penn.; and in the fall of 1871, after a separation of eighteen years, the theological seminary followed. During the fifty-eight years of its existence the seminary has had in its service thirteen professors and tutors. The chair of systematic theology has had five incumbents,—Rev. Dr. E. V. Gerhart, from 1851 to 1855, and Dr. Moses Kieffer from 1855 to 1861. In 1861 a second professor was called, namely, Dr. Hermann Rust, then of Cincinnati. Since 1861 it has been under the care of two professors. The present incumbents are Rev. Dr. H. Good, president, and professor of dogmatic and practical theology (called in 1889), and Rev. Dr. Hermann Rust, professor of exegetical and historical theology (called in 1861). The plan of the institution includes four professorships. Its productive endowment at present is about $50,000. It has no buildings of its own. The recitations and lectures are held in a hall of the college-building. Both the seminary and the college are named Heidelberg, out of respect to the celebrated Heidelberg Catechism, which is the only creed or confession of this branch of the church.

From 1853 to 1883 this institution has graduated 195 theological students, of whom 132 are still living, and laboring in the ministry. About one-half of these officiate in both the English and German language. They are somewhat widely distributed, as will be seen from the following: in Ohio, 77; in Pennsylvania, 27; in Indiana, 16; in Illinois, 5; in Iowa, 7; in Wisconsin, 4; in New Jersey, 1; in Michigan, 4; in New York, 1; in Kansas, 4; in Nebraska, 2; in Minnesota, 2; in Colorado, 1; and 1 missionary in Japan.

The number of students in attendance each year varies from twelve to twenty. The field of the seminary is somewhat circumscribed. For fuller account of its history, see Sermon before Alumni Association in 1886, by Rev. J. H. Reiter, Dayton, O., 1880.

(3) THE THEOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT OF URNSINUS COLLEGE is an integral part of the institution. It was organized simultaneously with the founding and opening of the college in 1869—70, and is located in the same building, Collegeville P.O., Montgomery County, Penn., thirty miles by railroad north-west from Philadelphia. In its organization it corresponds with that of the theological department of Yale College and similar schools. Ecclesiastically and theologically it is based upon the principles, faith, and polity of the Reformed Church, as symbolically represented by the Heidelberg Catechism and cognate Confessions: indeed, firm adherence to these in their historical sense, and progressive development in true harmony therewith, is a distinctive characteristic of the school. Although under no formal synodical control, it is as amenable in all essential respects to the jurisdiction of the "Reformed Church in the United States" as any other institution of the church, and acknowledges such amenable.

In 1872 it was officially recognized by the General Synod of the church, convened in Cincinnati; and several years after (in 1878), at Easton gave it a vote of recommendation.

The department is under the immediate charge of three professors, and the course of study prescribed conforms to the requirements of the constitution of the church with which it stands connected.
THEOLOGY (from θεολογία, θεολογος). I. In the widest sense, the science of religion, or, more definitely, the science of the Christian religion as taught in the Bible, and carried on in the history of the church. It is usually divided into: (1) Exegetical theology, or biblical learning; (2) Historical theology, or church history; (3) Systematic or speculative theology; (4) Practical theology. See special arts on those topics.

II. In the narrower sense, systematic theology, or, more particularly, dogmatics. This is again divided into: (1) Theology proper ("the doctrine of God"), in which are treated theistic and antitheistic theories, the knowledge, nature, and attributes of God, the Trinity, the divine decrees, providence, and miracles; (2) Anthropology ("the doctrine of man”), in which division are treated the different questions relating to man, his origin, nature, original condition, the fall, and especially the doctrines of sin and free agency; (3) Christology (“the doctrine of the person and work of Christ as the God-man”); (4) Pneumatology (“the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, the third person in the Trinity, and his work”); (5) Soteriology (“the doctrine of salvation”), under which head are treated the plan of salvation, and the way in which his salvation is brought to man, vocation, regeneration, faith, justification, sanctification—some include under this head also the doctrine of the person of Christ and of the atonement; (6) Ecclesiology (“the doctrine of the church, the sacraments, and the means of grace”); (7) Eschatology (“the doctrine of the last things”), which includes the doctrines of the condition of the soul after death, and the second coming of Christ, the resurrection, and the final judgment. See the separate arts. Dogmatics, Election, Eschatology, Justification, Christology, Soteriology, etc.

THEOLOGY, Monumental. See Monumental Theology.

THEOLOGY, Speculative, denotes a certain method of treatment, not a particular part of the system. Its direct opposite is empiricism. The empirical theologian starts from the well-ascertained experiences of conscience and religious life in general, and reaches his general ideas by way of induction, never transgressing the boundaries of fully established facts. All empiricism is rationalistic. The speculative theologian starts from an intuition, and approaches reality by way of deduction, explaining the occurring facts by the theory assumed. All speculation is mystical. Rationalism, however, is not always empirical; nor is mysticism always speculative. In the domain of mysticism, speculative theology has a problem of its own. As Christianity will not content itself with being one of the many religions existing, even not by being the most perfect one of them, but claims to be the absolute religion, the last and complete revelation of God, or as Christianity will not content itself with ruling the will of man, but also demands to rule his intellect, to the exclusion of any foreign or hostile principle, it cannot help coming into conflict with science, which proceeds, and must proceed, on another principle than that of authority. The problem of speculative theology, then, becomes to reconcile knowledge and faith, science and religion, natural civilization and Christianity; and it solves this problem by stripping the facts, scientific or religious, of its crude positivity, uncovering and seizing upon its informing idea, and demonstrating the ideal harmony which results from the discrepancies of reality.

The school of Alexandria presents the first striking instance of a speculative theology. In Alexandria, Christianity met with the Greek philosophy, the spirit of the God-gifted Gaian taught was as at one time as for the other to avoid conflict. But the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation, or, rather, an amalgamation. They taught that besides faith (wirre), the simple confidence in the facts of revelation, there is a deeper insight in the mysteries of revelation (γνωσις), which unfolds the latent working of the λογος in the history of mankind before the incarnation in Christ, and unites Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity into one grand scheme of the Providence. None of those theologians—Clement, Origen, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa—has given a complete speculative system; but speculative views of peculiar grandeur and depth are scattered all through their writings; and by concentrating the interest on such doctrines as the origin of the world, the origin of evil, the Trinity, the personality of Christ, they gave the whole theology of the Eastern Church a decidedly speculative character. At first the Western Church proved hostile to this tendency. Irenæus and Tertullian considered the philosophers the true heresiarchs, and philosophy the fountain-head of all spiritual errors. Augustine was a genius of rare speculative force. He combated the Manicheans with Platonian and Neo-Platonian ideas; Pelagianism, with profound expositions of the experimental doctrines of sin and grace; and he finally crushed Arianism by a speculative development of the doctrine of the Trinity. From him, and directly from the influence of the Greek Church, through the Areopagite and Scotus Eri- gena, a stream of speculation passed into the medieval theology of the Western Church, which, though sometimes feeble enough, never disappeared altogether. Having mastered the logic of Aristotle, scholasticism was almost wholly occupied with the logical demonstration of the doctrines of the church; and, as a general rule, it was rather adverse to speculation. Only the powerful protection of Charles the Bald saved Scotus Eri- gena from actual persecution, and several of his views were formally condemned by the synods of Valence (855) and Langres (859). Nevertheless, some of the greatest and most orthodox schoolmen felt the need of speculation. In his Monologium, Prosologium, and Cur Deus Homo, Anselm goes behind the authority of the doctrines to establish them on an a priori deduction. And in the writings of the mystics, from Meister Eckart and Tauler, speculative ideas are met with as subtle as profound.

Luther's combative restlessness permitted him now and then to borrow from the schoolmen some speculative substraction for his ideas. Thus the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity is based on the nominalism of Occam (see Roger de; Occam, Claus und Kritiken, i. 1339; and Schultz: Luther's Ansicht, etc., in Brieger's Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, iv. 1880). Even Melanchthon, who in the beginning of his career was very hostile to scholasticism and philosophy in general, gave, later on, a profound speculative construction of the doctrine of the Trinity (see Herringer: Die Theologie Melanchthonis, 1879). Some gleams of speculation are also found in the works of Ostian-der, Schwenkfeld, Brenz, and Keckermann: but the successive periods of orthodoxy, pietism, and rationalism, were very unfavorable to speculative theology; and it died out almost completely, until re-awakened in the beginning of the present century by the starting development of philosophy under Kant and Hegel. Schleiermacher, though he-based religion on feeling,—that is, on immediate consciousness as a primal fact of human nature, and thereby hoped to give religion a foundation of its own, independent of philosophy,—was, nevertheless, too much of a philosopher himself to carry on with rigid consistency an empirical principle; and at the same time the right wing of the Hege-lian school—Daub, Marheineke, Goeschel, Rosen-krantz, Erdmann, Schaller, and others—firmly asserted, that, in the formulas of the Hegelian metaphysics, they had found the key of the mys-teries of Christianity, and were able to effect a thorough and final reconciliation between the doctrines of the Christian Church and the spirit of modern civilization. They did not succeed. After the first enthusiasm had gone, the world felt disappointed. But the impulse which specu-lative theology had received was, nevertheless, by no means spent. In Rothe, Martensen, Dorner, Biedermann, and others, it is still working, more cautiously perhaps, but also, it would seem, with a more intense force; and it has become pretty generally recognized, that speculation has become an almost indispensable element of systematic theology. "A theology," says Dorner, "whose last guaranty is the authority of the Church or of Scripture, must always feel embarrassed and anxious when that authority is assailed, even though the points attacked are of slight impor-tance." All authority needs, in order to become truly authoritative to man, to be made part and parcel of his innermost consciousness; and to do this is the proper task of speculative theology.

THEOPHANES, or THEON, Bishop of Marmarica, in the Egyptian province of Cyrenaica, is mentioned in the synodal letter of Bishop Alexander (see Athanasiou: Opera, edit. Montfaucon, i. p. 388) as an adherent of Arians. Indeed, he and his neighbor-bishop, Secundus of Ptolemais, were the only two Egyptian bishops who sided with Arians; and it is probable that their line of con-duct was regulated by political rather than by theological reasons. At all events, they absolutely refused at the Council of Nicaea (325) to con-demn Arians, and were consequently deposed and banished. All notices concerning Theonas are collected in Tillemont: Mémoires, vi.

THEOPARSCHITES (from θεός, "God," and πασχω, "I suffer") is a by-name applied to such as accepted the formula; that, in the passion of Christ, "God had suffered and been crucified." The first traces of it are found in the letters of Isidore of Pelusium, and it played a prominent part in the Monophysite and Monothelite controversies.

THEOPHANES OF BYZANTIUM, the confes-sor; b. about 758; d. 816; not to be confounded with the historian of the same name who lived in the court of Constantine Copronymus, and held vari-ous high offices under Leo IV., but retired during the reign of Irene, and became monk in the mon-astery of Polyechronium, near Sigironia, in Mysia Minor. Afterwards he built a monastery, Ages, in the vicinity, of which he became abbot him- self. He was an ardent image-worshipper, for which reason he was dragged in chains to Constan-tinople by Leo the Armenian (813), and banished to the Island of Samothrace. His Chronographia is a chronicle, not very interesting, nor very reliable, of the events, secular as well as ecclesiastical, from Diocletian to Leo the Arme-nian. The best edition of it is that by Classen, Bonn, 1851.

THEOPHANIES, surnamed Cerameus, flour-ished in the first half of the eleventh century, and was bishop of Tauruménium, situated be-tween Syracuse and Messina. Sixty-two homilies by him—written in Greek, which was still spoken at that time in his diocese, as in other parts of Sicily—were published by Scorsus, Paris, 1644.

THEOPHANY. After the analogy of the Greeks, especially the Platonists, who understood by θεωφανία the appearance of one or more gods, theologians apply the term to the revelations of God in the Old Testament, and to the incarna-tion of Christ as the revelation of God in the flesh, and especially at his birth, his baptism, and his second coming. The biblical conception of theophany may be thus stated. (1) By it is never to be understood an immediate revelation of the supermundane Deity himself (John i.18; 1 Tim. vi. 16); for God reveals himself only in Christ (Matt. xii. 27), and therefore every theophany is really a christophany. (2) The theophany, or christophany, has three great stages of develop-ment, (a) The form of Old-Testament manifesta-tion, (b) The incarnation of Christ, (c) Christ's second coming, which will be the completion of the theophany, the revelation of his "glory" (Tit. ii. 13). (3) The theophany or the christophany of the Old-Testament Scriptures is the epiphany of the future Christ. It was made in the person of the angel of the Lord (Gen. xvi. 7, etc.), or of the presence (Exod. xxxiii. 14), or the covenant (Mal. iii. 1). The pillar of cloud and of fire was the symbol of his presence: the appearance of the "glory" of God, which in rabbinical terminology was called the Shechinah, was his attribute. (4) The manifestation of God in his christological theophany begins with the miracle of hearing, or the voice of God, which is identical with the voice from heaven, but to be distinguished from the Bach Kol, and ends in the miracle of seeing. (5) The theophanic form of reve-lation is always accompanied by a vision, and is thus distinguished from an ordinary historical event (2 Kings vi. 17; John xx. 12; Acts ix. 7, cf. xxii. 9, xii. 11). On the other hand, no vision is without a theophanic element, and is thus dis-tinguished from purely subjective hallucination.
THEOPHILANTHROPISTS.

(1) The different forms of divine manifestation can be distinguished only by comparing the predominantly objective theophanic facts with those facts of the vision which are predominantly subjective. (2) The theophanechristophany in a marvelously manner brings the elements of nature and the life of the soul; is now revealed by the angels, and now by symbols (Gen. iii. 24; Exod. iv. 16; Ps. xlviii. 10; civ. 4; Isa. lxi. 3; Mal. ii. 7), but particularly through the Urim and Thummim of the high priest. (3) In the life of Christ all the pre-Christian modes of theophany find a higher unity. In his personal life God himself was revealed. The whole universe was for him a theophanic environment by which his divine nature was attested; because his whole inner life was spent in a constant subjective vision, in which the contrast between ecstasy and the usual consciousness of worldly things did not exist. J. F. LANGE.

THEOPHILANTHROPISTS. In September, 1796, during the reign of the Directory, a small pamphlet appeared in Paris, under the title Manuel des Theophilanthropes, by Chemin. The divine worship described in that book had originated as a kind of family worship. During the period when all religious service was positively prohibited, five house-fathers used to gather to honor of God, and listen to moral and patriotic articles. As soon, however, as the pamphlet appeared, several men and women of unblemished character asked for admission to the assemblies. The first public meeting took place on Jan. 5, 1797, in a house in Rue St. Denis; and the persons present agreed upon assembling every Sunday, not because they considered that day in any particular respect sacred, but because it was the most convenient day of the week for the purpose. God, virtue, and the immortality of the soul, formed the three articles of the Theophilanthropist creed; and any one who agreed on those three points could become a member of the association, even though he be averse to all kinds of propaganda: for "it is unnecessary to make people Theophilanthropists, since they really are so by nature." But they took much care of the education of their children, and their instruction in good morals.

During the first two years of their existence the Theophilanthropists formed auxiliaries also in the provinces. It was easy to predict, however, that a religion which had no roots in the history of the people, and could give no satisfaction to the deepest cravings of human nature, would not prosper for a long time; and indeed, by degrees, as the Christian feeling became reawakened in the French people, the Theophilanthropist movement died away. "What shall I do to restore my church?" exclaimed Reveillère Lepeaux. "Well, just hang yourself, and rise again the third day," Talleyrand replied. There is a difference between a "religion of rhetoric" and a "religion of facts," which, to his own detriment, he had overlooked. In 1802 the First Consul, Bonaparte, took their churches from the Theophilanthropists, and restored them to the Roman Catholics.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Alexandria (385-412), is known from his participation in the Origenistic controversy. Three letters by him, condemnatory of Origen, are still extant in a Latin translation by Jerome. Galland: Bibl. Patr., vii.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Antioch (176-186), was educated in Paganism, but was converted to Christianity by the study of the Bible. He was a very able and prolific writer. His principal work, and the only one extant, is his Apology of Christianity, written in 180-181, and addressed to a Pagan friend, Autolycus. The first edition of it is that by Otto, Jen., 1861. His Commentary on the Gospels has probably been enlarged by a later hand. See Theodor Zahn: Der Evange- lienkommentar des Theophilus von Antiochen, El- langen, 1883 (in favor of the genuineness); and Ad. Harnack, in Texte und Untersuchungen, i. Heft. 4, pp. 97-175 (against Zahn). See Schaff: History of the Christian Church, rev. ed., New York, 1888, vol. ii. pp. 732 sqq.

THEOPHYLACT, a celebrated Greek exegete who flourished in the eleventh century, during the reign of Johannes Doukas, — not to be confounded with Theophylactus Simocattii, an Egyptian who flourished about 850, and wrote the history of the Emperor Mauricius. The exegete was a native of Eupirus, in the Island of Euboea; lived for some time in Constantinople as tutor to the imperial prince Constantinus Porphyrogenneta; was appointed archbishop of Achrida in Bulgaria, 1078; and died about 1107. He wrote commentaries on most of the books of the Bible, which, though generally keeping very close to the track of the elder Fathers, are still worth examining, and far surpass any thing of the kind produced at the same period in the Latin Church. THEOPHANES.- The name is occasionally met with to designate an angelic being (as in the Gospels of St. John, xiv. 28), but more frequently to denote an ascetic or mystic. The latter is the only meaning with which the expression is connected in the NT. (I Macc. xi. 57), where it is used of an ascetic named Theophanes. See also THERAPEUTES.

THEOPHILUS was the name of two persons mentioned in the NT. (Luke i. 6.)

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Gaza, was an opponent of the disciples of John the Baptist, Acts xvi. 34. He was a Hellenist, Acts xii. 22. He is also mentioned in Acts xxi. 9, 10, 15, and xxii. 28, 29, as Thomas the father of James, the brother of the Lord, and as one who had accompanied the Lamb to Iconium and Lystra. He seems to have been a very learned man, and was instrumental in bringing the Roman, Tertullian, into the church. He was a patron of learning, and was the editor of a number of works of classical authors. See Tertullian's works, and the Life of Theophilus by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 5, 30. See also THEOPHILUS, Bishop, of Alexandria.

THEOPHILUS, bishop of Alexandria, lived in the second century. He was a great man, and seems to have been a convert from Judaism to Christianity. He was the author of a work on the use of the Jewish scriptures, and of a treatise on the miracles of Christ. He was also the author of a work on the history of the Christian church, which is preserved in the work of Eusebius. See EUSEB., Hist. Eccl. iv. 5, 30. See also THEOPHILUS, Bishop, of Gaza.

THEOPHOBOS (θεόφοβος, "God-fearing"), one of the names given to Jesus in the NT. (Lk. iii. 27; Acts i. 25; Acts vi. 14; 1 Tim. v. 25.)

THEOPHYLACTUS (θεοφύλακτος), a title of St. Paul, epistle to the Thessalonians, ii. 13. It means "faithful to God," and is applied to St. Paul by his friends. It is also used of the Thessalonians themselves, who are thus described by St. Paul, ii. 13, "These are our boasting, and our comfort at our coming together of you, being faith in God, and this title, being faithful in our words and works." THEOPHYLACTUS, bishop of Alexandria, lived in the second century. He was a great man, and seems to have been a convert from Judaism to Christianity. He was the author of a work on the use of the Jewish scriptures, and of a treatise on the miracles of Christ. He was also the author of a work on the history of the Christian church, which is preserved in the work of Eusebius. See EUSEB., Hist. Eccl. iv. 5, 30. See also THEOPHILUS, Bishop, of Gaza.

THEUDAS, a popular leader mentioned by Gamaliel in his speech before the Sanhedrin (Acts v. 36). He was not the Theudas mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. XX. 5, 1); because that Theudas rebelled under Cuspius Fadus, in A.D. 44, some ten years after Gamaliel's speech. Nor was he some obscure person, otherwise unknown; since it is unlikely that Gamaliel would, under the circumstances, allude to such a one. But in all likehood he was the man called Matthias by Josephus (Antiq. XVII. 6, 2, and War, I. 33, 2); because Marthias is the transliteration of Μαθαίος, whose Greek translation is Θεοδας, i.e., Θεοδας, i.e., Θεοδας. This Matthias was an eloquent teacher, who headed a band in the days of Herod, and destroyed the Roman eagle set up by the king over the great gate of the temple.

THIETMAR, b. July 25, 1076; d. Dec. 1, 1101; a Saxon of noble descent, related to the imperial house; was educated in the cloister school of Magdeburg, and made bishop of Merseburg in 1000. He wrote a chronicle, of which especially the last four books, comprising the reign of Henry II. (1002-18), are of the greatest importance for the history of Germany. It was edited by Lappenberg, in Mon. Germ. Hist., vol. iii., and translated into German by Laurent, 1849.

THILO, Johann Karl, b. at Langensalza in Thuringia, Nov. 28, 1794; d. at Halle, May 17, 1853. He was educated at Schulpforte, studied at Leipzig, began to lecture at Halle in 1819, and was in 1822 appointed professor of theology there. His Codex Apocryphus N. T. remained incomplete. The first volume, containing the apocryphal Gospels, appeared 1832, and was followed by Acta apostolorum Petri et Pauli in 1838, and Andreae matthiae in 1846. His Bibliotheca patrum Graecorum dogmatica also remained incomplete. Only one volume, containing the dogmatical works of Athanasius, appeared 1835.

THIRLWALL, Connop, a scholarly English bishop; was b. at Stepney, Middlesex, Feb. 11, 1797; d. at Bath, July 27, 1875. He displayed such remarkable precocity, that in 1809 he published, under his father's direction, a volume of essays and poems entitled Primitea. He was educated at the Charter House and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was made a scholar of Pembroke College's medallist, 1818, and became fellow and tutor; studied law, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, 1825. He took orders in 1828; became rector at Kirby-under-Dale, Yorkshire, and bishop of St. David's, 1840. He resigned his see in 1874. He was an active member of the

THIRTY YEARS' WAR.

THIRTY YEARS' WAR. The (1618–48), one of the fiercest and most protracted of wars, was so far forth a religious war, as at that time religion formed one of the principal elements of politics. But of how mixed a character the whole affair was, may be seen from the circumstance, that though Roman Catholics on the one side (headed by Austria, Spain, and Bavaria), and Protestants on the other side, under various leaders (Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden), always formed the groundwork of the party position, Roman-Catholic powers, as, for instance, France, would at times ally themselves with the Protestants, and Protestant princes with the Roman Catholics, as, for instance, the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony.

The war began in Bohemia. In 1517 Ferdinand of Styria, a brother of the Emperor Matthias, a pupil of the Jesuits, and a fanatical enemy of Protestantism, was crowned king of Bohemia; and opposition was immediately instituted against the Protestants. But the Protestants, under the leadership of Count Thurn, penetrated into the castle of Prague, threw the imperial commissioners out of the window (May 23, 1618), organized a general rising throughout the country, entered into alliance with Bethlen Gabor, prince of Transylvania, and the Evangelical Union in Germany; and as Matthias died on March 20, 1619, and Ferdinand shortly after succeeded him as emperor, they declared the Bohemian throne vacant, and offered it to the young elector-palatine, Friedrich V., a son-in-law of James I. of England. He accepted the offer, but was very unfortunate. The Protestant army was completely routed in the battle at the White Mountain, just outside the walls of Prague, Nov. 8, 1620, by Tilly, the commander of the imperial army, which chiefly consisted of the contingent of the Holy League: and Bohemia was speedily reduced to order; that is, more than thirty thousand families belonging to the Lutheran or the Reformed denomination were driven out of the country, and their property, valued at more than forty million crowns, was confiscated. Next year the Palatinate was invaded by a Spanish army under Spinola; and at the diet of Regensburg, March 6, 1623, Friedrich V. was put under the ban of the empire, and the Palatinate was given to Maximilian of Bavaria, James I. looking on as an idiot on a stationary throne. In 1625 the Palatinate was invaded by the troops of Philip of Spain, who with his brother, the Duke of Alba, had formed one of the principal elements of politics. But of how mixed a character the whole affair was, may be seen from the circumstance, that though Roman Catholics on the one side (headed by Austria, Spain, and Bavaria), and Protestants on the other side, under various leaders (Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden), always formed the groundwork of the party position, Roman-Catholic powers, as, for instance, France, would at times ally themselves with the Protestants, and Protestant princes with the Roman Catholics, as, for instance, the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony.

Tholuck, Friedrich August, D.D., an eminent German divine and pulpit orator; b. in Breslau, March 30, 1799; d. in Halle, June 10, 1877. Descended from very humble parentage, he first learned a trade, but by the assistance of friends attended the gymnasium of his native city, and the university of Berlin. When he left college, he delivered an address on The Superiority of the Oriental World over the Christian, which was chiefly a eulogy on Mohammedanism. But during his university course he was thoroughly converted from his pantheistic and scepticising, under the influence of the lectures of Schleiermacher and Neander, and more especially by personal intercourse with Baron Ernst von Kottwitz, a member of the Moravian brotherhood, who combined high social standing and culture with a lovely type of piety. His character is finely described in the unamed “patriarch” in Tholuck’s Werke des Zweisters. (See Jacobi, Erinnerungen an B. v. K., Halle, 1882.) In 1821 he was graduated as licentiate of theology, and began to deliver lectures as privaat-docent. In 1824 he was appointed extraordinary professor of Oriental literature, in the place of Dr. DeWette. In 1825 he made a literary journey to Holland and England, at the expense of the Prussian Government, and in 1826 was called to the university of Halle as ordinary professor of theology, in the place of Dr. Knapp, which he occupied to the time of his death, with the exception of a brief period (1827–28), which he spent in Rome as chaplain of the Prussian embassy on Capitol Hill, in intimate intercourse with Bunsen. In Halle he had at first to suffer a good deal of opposition and reproach from the prevailing rationalism of his colleagues (Gesenius and Wegscheider), but succeeded in effecting a radical change; and the whole theological faculty of Halle has since become decidedly evangelical. In Dec. 2, 1870, his friends prepared a surprise for him by the celebration of the semi-centennial jubilee of his professorship. The university and magistrate of Halle, delegates of several universities and of all schools of theology, took part in it; and his pupils in Europe and America founded a seminary adjoining his own home, for beneficiary students of theology, as a perpetual memorial of his devotion to students. He was always in delicate health, but by strict temperance and great regularity of habits he managed to do an unusual amount of work that was productive in fruit. He was incessant in his lectures, preached regularly as university chaplain, and found time to write many books.

His principal works are as follows: Sin and Redemption, or the True Consecration of the Sceptic (Berlin, 1825, many times reprinted; translated into English by Ryland, with an Introduction by John Pye Smith; republished in Boston, 1854, under the title, Guido and Julius, or Sin and the Propitiation), in opposition to DeWette’s Theorema, or the Consecration of the Sceptic, 1825; Räthke, and simmung aus der morgenlandischen Mystik, 1825 (a collection of translations from the mystic poets of the East); Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (4th ed., 1842; twice translated into English, last by K. Menzies, Edinburgh, 1845, 2 vols.), the first exegetical fruit of the new evangelical theology; Commentary on the Gospel of John, 1828 (7th ed., 1857, translated into English by Kaufmann, 1836, and by Dr. C. P. Krauth, Philadelphia, 1859), less thorough and permanent, but more popular, and better adapted for students, than his other commentaries; Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, 1833 (3d ed., 1844; translated into English by R. L. Brown, Edinburgh, 1860; new ed., 1869), his most learned, elaborate, and valuable exegetical production; Commentary on the Hebrews, 1836 (3d ed., 1850; translated by James Hamilton, Edinburgh, 1852); Commentary on the Psalms, 1843 (translated by Dr. Mombert, Edinburgh and Philadelphia, 1853; 2d ed.); Reliability of the Gospel History, 1837 (2d ed., 1838), a vindication of the Gospels against the mythical theory of Strauss; and Hours of Christian Devotion, 1840, 2 vols. (well translated by Rob. Menzies, Edinburgh and New York, 1875), containing several original hymns. In this book he pours out his fervent evangelical piety with all the charm of fresh enthusiasm. He was one of the most eloquent German preachers in his day, and published a series of university sermons (collected in 6 vols., 3d ed., Gotha, 1863–64, one volume being translated, Light from the Cross, Sermons on the Passion of our Lord, Philadelphia, 1858). He issued also two very interesting volumes of Miscellaneous Essays, 1839. His last works were contributions to German church history since the Reformation, derived in part from manuscript sources; namely, Lutherische Theologen Wittenberga im 17ten Jahrh. (Hamburg, 1852), Das akademische Leben des 17ten Jahrh. (Hamburg, 1852, 1854, in 2 vols.), and Geschichte des Rationalismus (part i. Berlin, 1865, never finished). A complete edition of his works appeared 1863–72, in 11 vols. He also republished the Commentaries of Calvin on the Gospels and Epistles, and his Institutio Christianae Religionis, and made that great divine better known in Germany, although he himself was of Lutheran descent and predisposition. He conducted for several years a literary periodical, and contributed largely to the first edition of the Encyclopaedia of Herzog, whom he recommended as editor to the publisher, having first himself declined the position.

Tholuck was one of the most fruitful and influential German theologians and authors during the second and third quarters of the nineteenth century, and better known in England and America than any other. He was original, fresh, brilliant, suggestive, eloquent, and humorous. He cannot be classified with any school. He was influenced by Pietism, Moravianism, Schleiermacher, Neander, and even Hegel. His elastic mind was ever open to new light; but his heart was always right, and never shaken in faith and love to Christ. He had an extraordinary talent for languages, and could speak English, French, Italian, Greek, Arabic, and several other tongues, ancient and modern, almost like a native. In that line he was scarcely surpassed by Cardinal Mezzofanti, whom he met in Rome. His learning was extensive rather than thorough and exhaustive. He gathered honey from the literature of all ages, from the old Grecian Chrysostom to Goethe, but made it tributary to faith. He is one of the regenerators of German theology, leading it from the barren heath of rationalism to the green pastures of the Scriptures and the literature of the Reformation. His Commentaries broke a new path. His personal influence was as great and good as that exerted by his works, and yields only to that of Neander among his contemporaries. He was gifted with personal magnetism, and brilliant powers of conversation. Having no children, he devoted all his paternal affection to his students, and was nobly assisted by his second wife (a most lovely and refined Christian lady). He loved, as he said, candidates more than ministers, and students more than candidates, because he was more interested in the process of growth than in the result of growth. His life was a life with the young, fruitful in blessings. He was in the habit of taking long walks with two or three students, every day from eleven to twelve, and from four to five; he invited them freely to his house and table, tried experiments on their minds, proposed perplexing questions, set them disputing on high problems, inspired and stimulated them in the pursuit of knowledge, virtue, and piety. He had great regard for individuality, aimed to arouse in every one the sense of his peculiar calling rather than to create a school. Like John the Baptist, he sent all away from him to a higher Master. His chief aim was to lead them to a humble faith in the Saviour, and to infuse into them that love which was the ruling passion of his heart. He adopted, as he says, Zinzendorf's peculiar motto, "I have but one passion, and that is He, and He alone." His lecture-room was truly a school of Christ. And herein lies his chief significance and merit. Thousands of students from different lands owe to him their spiritual life. To America he was especially attached, and he was a most useful guide in the labyrinth of German theology. He was very intimate with Dr. Edward Robinson, Dr. Charles Hodge (who studied at Halle in 1827, and was daily in his company), Dr. Henry B. Smith, Dr. Prentiss (who studied there in 1840), and Dr. Park of Andover. He called them "his American pets." I once met him promenading on the bluest skies, and basking in the light of the sun. "But," asked Tholuck smilingly, "what do you do when it rains?" He told me afterwards that this aggustic was seeking religion, and we must aid him. He often tried the wits of American students by curious questions; e.g., "Why did God make so many Chinese, and so few Yankees?" or, "How is Mr. Erbsenkörper" (Peabody, the philanthropist)? He was invited to the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in 1869, and promised to the writer to come with the honor of your kindness"). But his feeble health prevented him; and he sent one of his favorite pupils as his representative, with a modest sketch of his labors and the condition of theology in Germany. It is the last public document from his pen (except some letters), and gives a faithful idea of this lover of youth for Christ's sake.

The biographical sketch of Tholuck was originally intrusted to his colleague, Professor Martin Kahler, but was written by Professor Leopold Witte, Das Leben D. Friedrich August Gottreu Tholucks, Bielefeld, 1884-86, 2 vols. Cf. THOMAS THE APOSTLE was also known by the Greek equivalent Didymus, meaning twin. In the Gospels he is associated with Matthias (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15); in the Acts, with Philip (Acts i. 13). He was probably a Galilean, as the mention of his name with the other Galilean fishermen among the apostles (John xxii. 2) seems to indicate. According to the oldest tradition, he was born in Syrian Antioch, preached the gospel to the Parthians, and was buried at Edessa (Euseb., III. 1; Socrat., I. 19, etc.). According to later statements, he preached to the Medes and Persians, baptized three kings (the three wise men from the East); and Gregor Nazianzen (Orat. 25) speaks of his labors in India, where a later tradition makes him suffer a martyr's death by being pierced to death by lances at the king's command. The Thomas Christians show his grave at Meliapur, India. His relics, according to the Catholic Church, were removed to Edessa, and thence to Ortona, Italy. The Greek Church commemorates his memory June 3; the Latin Church, Dec. 21. The name "Thomas Christians," by which the old Christians of India were known, seems to confirm the tradition that Thomas labored in India; but this conclusion is denied by Philo and others. [See CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS.]

Two apocryphal works are associated with the name of Thomas, The Gospel according to Thomas [Evang. sec. Thomam, edited by Tischendorf, who gives two Greek texts and a Latin translation, and by Dr. W. Wright in Syriac]; and The Acts of Thomas (Acts of Thomas, edited by Thilo, Leipzig, 1823). Our authority for a characterization of Thomas is three passages in John's Gospel (xi. 18, xiv. 5, xx. 24). They present him as one

[See BUTLER, Lives of the Saints, for the legendary additions to his life. For a translation of the Gospel of Thomas, see B. HARRIS COWPER: The Apocryphal Gospels, London, 1887, pp. 118-170. At the appearance of Thilo's and Finkenstaedt's editions of the Greek Acts of Thomas, only five of the twelve divisions extant in Latin and Syriac versions existed in Greek. But in 1888 Max Bonnet published an edition of the twelve complete, from a Greek manuscript he discovered at the request of the English monks at Antioch, whom a deep earnestness of spirit inclined to melancholy, and a desire of knowledge made a doubter. He is the representative, among the whole school of the Dominicans, of a true and honest doubt and questioning, he arrived at an imperturbable and joyous conviction and faith.

THOMAS OF AQUINO (or Aquinas), the profoundest and keenest defender of the doctrines of the Roman-Catholic Church; was b. in 1225 or 1227, in the castle of Rocca Sicca, near Aquino, a city not far from Naples; d. March 6, 1274, in the Cistercian convent of Fossa Nuova, near Terracina. I. Life.—Thomas, who was of noble birth, was placed in his fifth year under the monks of Monte Casino. In his tenth year he went to Naples; and in his sixteenth year, in spite of his opposition of his family, which was finally overcome by the intervention of Pope Innocent IV., he entered the Dominican order. In 1245 he was sent to Cologne to enjoy the instruction of Albertus Magnus, who directed his attention to Aristotle's philosophy and the writings of Dionysius the Areopagite. In 1248 he was made baccalaureate of Paris. In 1252 he began to lecture on the Sentences of Peter Lombard at Cologne. Returning to Paris, he taught there a large throng of students. Urban IV. repeatedly offered him high ecclesiastical preferment, which he in his humility declined. Under the pontificate of Clement IV. and till 1266, he taught in Rome, Bologna, and Paris. In 1272, in obedience to his order and the wish of King Charles, he made Naples the seat of his activity. The last years of his life were principally occupied with the completion of his great work, Summa theologica. He died on his way to the church council at Lyons. In 1232 he was canonized by John XXII. If any one is entitled to this dignity by his life and works, Aquinas was. His piety, though monkish, was unfeigned; and he prepared himself for his writings, lectures, etc., by prayer. Louis IX. several times consulted him on matters of state. His industry, as his writings show, was intense. [Aquinas was declared a doctor of the church by Pius V. in 1567, and has a place with Augustine, Jerome, and Ambrose, among the most authoritative teachers of the church. Leo XIII., in an encyclical dated Aug. 4, 1879, recommended his works to the Catholic seminaries and theological faculties throughout the world, as a proper foundation of their religious and philosophical teaching, and particularly emphasized his political doctrines as conservative for society. The special title of this great theologian is the "Angelic Doctor," Doctor Angelicus.

II. Theology.—In certain respects, Thomas of Aquino marks the culminating point of scholasticism. He sought to establish for the science of theology a position of superior dignity and importance over the science of philosophy, and, on the other hand, the harmony of the two sciences, by distinguishing by revelation the religious truths which can be excogitated by the use of reason from those which are only known by revelation. The doctrinal creed of the church, Thomas treats as absolute truth; but it is a remarkable fact, that he uses the arguments of the church-teachers only as of probable authority (Summa theolog. i. qu. 1, art. 8). He refers more frequently to biblical texts than the other scholastics; but this practice does not purify his theology, but helps to confirm the church-doctrines. His exegetical principles were good; and he expressly commended the literal interpretation of the Scriptures, omnes sensus scripturas fundatur, super unum esse quod solo potest trahi argumentum, etc. (Summa, i. qu. 1, art. 10), but could not free himself from ecclesiastical authority. Thomas did not grant the ontological argument of Anselm for the existence of God. He gives several forms of the cosmological and teleological arguments, but says, that, while reason can prove that God exists, it cannot discover what his nature is. His fundamental conception of God is that of spiritual and active being. God is intelligence and will (intellectus et voluntas), the first cause. Thinking and willing are inseparable from his being. He is consequently forever returning to the idea of the absolute identity and simplicity of God. He employs all his speculative talent to explain the doctrine of the Trinity; and yet he declares that it is beyond the sphere of reason to discover the distinction of persons in the Godhead, and affirms that he who tries to prove the doctrine by the unaided reason derogates from faith: qui probare nittit Trinitatem personarum naturali ratione, fidei derogat (Summa, i. qu. 32, art. 1). Although Thomas did not, like his teacher Albertus Magnus, regard the world as an emanation from God, he refers its origin to God's active will, which is nothing more than his active intelligence, which, in turn, is only the essence of God working as the first cause. He is again and again forced to regard the world as a necessary product of the Divine Being, and inclines to the thesis of its eternal existence; so that he contents himself with saying, "It is credible that the world had a beginning, but neither demonstrable nor knowable: mundum incepisse credibile est, sed non demonstrabile et scibile (Summa, i. qu. 46, art. 2)." The doctrines of election and reprobation he considers in connection with the doctrine of providence. Every thing occurs under the Divine Providence, and serves a single and final end. Both reprobation and election are matters of divine decree; and the exact number of the reprobate, as well as of the elect, is determined in advance. Reprobation, however, consists not in a positive action on God's part, but in a letting-alone. God is not the cause of sin. He simply withholds his grace, and man falls by his own will. In opposition to the Arabic philo-phers, Thomas insists upon the efficiency of second causes (Summa, i. qu. 105, art. 5), through which God works. He lays emphasis on the ability of the will to choose between two tendencies in the interest of the doctrines of guilt and merit.

Passing over to the creatures of God, Thomas dwells at length upon the subject of the angels, which he discusses with minute care and speculative skill. He teaches, with Augustine, that the original righteousness of Adam was a superadded trine of Christ's work, as when he deniesthe absolute principles of human ignorance and imperfection, and divine omniscience and perfection.

He departs in some details from the Anselmic doctrine of Christ's work, as when he denies the absolute necessity of the incarnation, and affirms that God might have redeemed man in some other way than by his Son. A human judge cannot release from punishment without expiation of guilt; but God, as the Supreme Being, can forgive without expiation, if he so chooses (Summa, ii. qu. 46, art. 5). In the same way he said elsewhere (Summa, iii. qu. 71, art. 10) that God works. He lays emphasis on the ability of the will to choose between two tendencies in the interest of the doctrines of guilt and merit.

Thomas passes directly from the consideration of the work of Christ to the sacraments. The number of the sacraments had already been fixed at seven, but his treatment had a shaping influence upon the discussion of the subject in after-time. He proved the necessity of seven sacraments, and the immanence in them of a supernatural element of grace. His treatment of the Eucharist, penance, and ordination, is characteristic. He held to the change of the elements to the body and blood of Christ, justified the witholding of the cup from the laity with casuistical arguments, and spoke of the sacrifice of the mass, now as a "symbolical picture of the passion" (imago representationis), now as a real sacrifice. It is noticeable, that, in his doctrine of the mass, he does not emphasize, as do his successors, the idea of sacrifice to the detriment of the sacramental idea. The subject of indulgences, Thomas handled at length; teaching that the efficacy of an indulgence does not depend upon the faith of the recipient, but upon the will and authority of the church, and extends to the dead as well as to the living (Summa, iii. qu. 71, art. 10). The discussion of eschatology follows the discussion of the sacraments. Thomas teaches the doctrines of purgatory and the intercession of saints. He treats the doctrines of the resurrection and future blessedness at length, and teaches that the body of the resurrection will in form be identical with the present body, even to the hair and the nails.

Thomas was not less great as a teacher of ethics than as a theologian. Neander has said, that, next to that of Aristotle, his is the most important name in the history of ethics (Wissenschaft. Abhandlungen, ed. Jacoby, p. 46). But both as a moralist and a theologian he was a true son of the church. His system is, as Baur says, only an echo of the doctrinal teaching of the church. In the spirit of the day he discussed many idle and useless questions with casuistical minuteness and far-fetched argumentation. But he was in this respect more moderate than his contemporaries. On the other hand, he discussed many important subjects with a depth and clearness of insight which make his views permanently interesting and valuable.

After the death of Aquinas, a conflict went on over his theology; Duns Scotus being the leader of the other school. The Dominicans were ranged on the side of Aquinas, whose followers were called Thomists; and the Franciscans on the side of Duns Scotus, whose followers were known as Scotists. The difference between the teachers was not in the doctrines they taught, but in their treatment of these doctrines. With Scotus, theology was a practical science; with Aquinas, a speculative science. The controversy lasted down to the eighteenth century; and the Franciscan De Rada mentions in his work, Controversiae inter Thomam et Scotum (Cologne, 1620), no less than eighty-six points of difference between the two schools. The most important points of contro- versy were the cognoscibility of God, the distinction between the divine attributes, original sin, and the merit of the sacrifice of Christ; the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, the two teachers held divergent views; Thomas denying it, Scotus asserting it. The Jesuits opposed Thomism, as Bellarmine's example proves; but it prevailed at the Spanish universities of Salamanca, Coimbra, and Alcalá. The Roman-Catholic Church cannot forget the most profound and penetrating defender of its doctrines until it renounces them; and the Protestant Church will not fail to share in the admiration of Thomas Aquinas so long as it continues to admire literary greatness.

LIT.—The principal works of Thomas on theology are his Commentary on Peter the Lombard's Sentences, a work of his earlier years, in which his own system is worked out; the Compendium theologiae (incomplete); the Summa de veritate fidei catholicae, or Adversus Gensiles, whose purpose was apologetic, to defend the creed of the church; and Summa totius theologiae, the work of his ripe thoughts, which, however, breaks off at the doctrine of penance, and was completed in the fifteenth century, from the Commentary on the Lombard's Sentences. His exegetical works include some commentaries on the Old Testament, a commentary on the Pauline Epistles, and a valuable one on the Gospels (Aurea catena in Evangelista), containing excerpts from eighty church writers. Complete editions of the works of Aquinas have appeared at Rome, 1672, 17 vols. [1882 sqq., ed. Zigliara]; Antwerp, 1812; Paris, 1690, 28 vols.; Venice, 1787, 26 vols.; Parma, 1852-71, 25 vols. [Migne has published an edition of the Summa theologica, Paris, 1841 sqq., in 4 vols. There is another edition by Nicolai, Sylvius, Billuart, and Drioux, Regensburg, 1876, 8 vols. An English translation of the Catena aurea appeared at Oxford, 1845 (7 pts.); a French translation of the Summa theologica, by Darioux, Paris, 1850-54, 8 vols. THOMAS OF CELANO.

THOMAS OF CELANO, a native of Celano in Abruzzo Ulteriore; was appointed custos of the Minorite monasteries of Cologne, Mayence, Worms, and Spire, by Cæsarius of Spire, the first provincial of the Franciscan order in Germany, about 1221. Nothing more is known about him; but the authorship of the oldest biography of St. Francis of Assisi, and of the celebrated hymn, Dies irae, dies illa, is generally ascribed to him. With respect to the biography, there is nothing which positively contradicts his claims; though it is singular that Mark of Lisbon, in enumerating the twenty-five first and most noted pupils of St. Francis, does not mention Thomas, while the biography evidently is written by one who lived familiarly with the saint from an early date. With respect to the hymn, Bartholomew Albizzi of Pisa is the first who mentions him as the author, in Libri conformitatum (1385); and most of the other claimants or pretenders are absolutely impossible. PALMER.

THOMAS OF VILLANOVA, b. at Fuenlana, in the diocese of Leon, 1867; d. at Valencia, Nov. 6, 1555. He studied at Alcala; entered the order of the Augustinian hermits in 1517; became the provincial of his order for Andalusia and Castile; confessor to Charles V., and in 1544 bishop of Valencia. In 1568 he was canonized by Alexander VII., Act. Sanct., Sept. 5. He published some sermons and a Commentary on the Canticus; published at Alcala 1581, Brescia 1618, Cologne 1614, and Augsburg 1577. His life was written by Quevedo, and translated into French by Maunoury, Paris, 1686.

THOMASIN OF ZIRKLARIA, in Tyrol, flourished in the beginning of the thirteenth century, and wrote in 1215 Der weltliche Gast, a didactic poem, so interesting for the moral and religious history of the middle ages. Though it does not mention the Virgin, and says some sharp truths concerning the church, it is not polemical against the pope and the priests. It was first printed at Leiden in 1746, in the writings of Dieterich, in Kleri Allgemein. Monatschrift, August, 1852.

THOMASIN, Gottfried, b. at Egenhausen, Franconia, 1802; d. at Erlangen, Jan. 24, 1875. He studied theology at Erlangen, Halle, and Berlin, and was appointed preacher at Nuremberg in 1829, and professor of systematic theology at Erlangen in 1842. His studies were principally occupied with the history of doctrines, and in that line he published Origenes, Nuremberg, 1837, and Die christliche Dogmengeschichte, 1874-76, 2 vols.

THOMASSIN, Louis, b. at Aix, Aug. 28, 1819; d. in Paris, Dec. 25, 1884. The Congregation of the Oratory in 1832, taught for some time philosophy at Lyons, afterwards theology at Saumur and in the seminary of St. Magloire in Paris, until he in 1868 retired in order to devote his whole time to study. His first work was Dissertationes in concilia generalia et particularia, 1872; but his principal work is his Ancienne et nouvelle discipline de l’église touchant les bénéfices et les bénéficiaires, 1878—79, 3 vols. fol., which he translated into Latin, and which is said to have made a very deep impression on Innocent XI.

THOMPSON, Joseph Parrish, D.D., LL.D., b. in Philadelphia, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, Aug. 7, 1819; was graduated in Yale, 1838; ordained in October, 1840; pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church in New York from 1845 till 1871, when, on account of ill health, he resigned, and went to Germany, and d. in Berlin, Sept. 20, 1879.

In 1843 he became associated with five other gentlemen in establishing and conducting The New-England, In 1848, in connection with Drs. Leonard Bacon, Joshua Leavitt, and Richard S. Storrs, he established The Independent, a weekly newspaper which at once became a leader of public thought on all matters affecting the welfare of the nation and the kingdom of Christ. For fourteen years a large measure of editorial responsibility for the paper devolved upon Dr. Thompson. Apart from this editorial work, he was a prolific writer of books, addresses, occasional pamphlets, and reviews. The list of his separate publications includes more than ninety titles; among them are, The Theology of Christ in his own Words (1870), The United States as a Nation (1877), and Church and State in the United States (1873), a work which was printed in German, French, Italian, and English.

During thirty-one years of pastoral work he recognized the paramount claims of the pulpit upon his best energies; and though he had unusual gifts as a platform speaker, and peculiar facility in adapting himself to his surroundings, he rarely ventured to appear in the pulpit without an elaborate written sermon. This conscientious fidelity in official work was rewarded with large success, and his congregation came to be one of the largest and most intellectual in the metropolis. At the same time he bore a conspicuous part in the missionary work of his denomination and in its local councils, as well as in movements to promote general philanthropy and reform.

No sketch of this period of his life would be complete which did not hold up to view the immense influence which he exerted by pen and voice in the pulpit, on the platform, and in every appropriate way, in the discussions which preceded the overthrow of antislavery by the authorship of antislavery found apologists in Northern pulpitss, when antislavery sentiments were unpopular to the last degree, when criticism of the fugitive-slave law exposed one to obloquy, when an appeal to a higher law was denounced as error by the religious press, he had the nerve to do what many shrank from doing, and the pluck to carry out his convictions in speech and act. In all this he was untrammelled by ecclesiastical or political ties; and it is believed that few men of this generation have exerted a larger influence over thoughtful minds in America by the application of those principles to the life of the nation. During the whole period of the civil war he labored with assiduity for the maintenance of national unity on principles of universal freedom. Unfortunately, these arduous labors, in connection with personal exposure while on a visit to the Union army as an officer of the Sanitary Commission, resulted in such physical prostration, that in 1871 he was compelled to resign his pastoral office, and seek reposes abroad.

A visit to Egypt as long ago as 1859 had led him to take a deep interest in Egyptology, and to make extensive preparations for writing an elaborate work on the Life and Times of Moses. It was his hope that a residence in Berlin would bring him into intimate relations with statesmen and scholars. Year after year he was called upon to make the annual "Thanksgiving" address in the American chapel. In 1873, in the dead of winter, he went to Thorn, on the confines of Germany, to represent the American Geographical Society at the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of Copernicus. In Berlin he made addresses commemorating Agassiz, Bryant, and Bayard Taylor. He regularly attended the meetings of the Association for the reform and codification of the Law of Succession, and contributed papers which were held in high esteem by jurists. Three years in succession he spoke on the Papacy and Protestantism in Glasgow, where the papers styled him "that fiery American from Berlin." Many of his addresses and papers were designed to show that difficulties which threatened the peace of Europe were to be overcome by following the American plan of separating Church and State. During the "centennial" year he vindicated his native land against European prejudices by a course of six philosophical lectures on American political history, which he delivered in Berlin, Edinburgh, and Paris. The papal influence secured the insertion, in the Berlin Treaty of 1878, of a clause favoring religious liberty. Among his last works was the preparation, for the Evangelical Alliance at Baele (1879), of a memorial in behalf of religious liberty in America. The preparatory work was done by Dr. T. J. T. D. A., and the Alliance appointed a deputation of prominent men, of whom he was one, — the sole representative from the United States, — to wait on the Emperor of Austria, and invoke redress. On hearing of this result, he said, looking at his helpless arm, "This old hand has struck one more blow for liberty. Before the deputation could fulfill its mission, he died in Berlin, and was buried in the cemetery of the Jerusalem Church. EDWARD W. GILMAN.

THOMSON, Andrew, D.D., Scotch Presbyterian; b. at Sanquhar, Dumfriesshire, July 11, 1779; d. in Edinburgh, Feb. 8, 1851. He was graduated at the university of Edinburgh, and at his death was pastor of St. George's Church, Edinburgh. He made a memorable attack upon the British and Foreign Bible Society for circulating the Apocrypha. He "opposed the abuses of lay-patronage in the Church of Scotland, effectually denounced British colonial slavery and other evils, and did much to promote education, morality, and evangelical religion in Scotland." (Allibone.) He published several volumes of sermons and lectures: for list, see Allibone's Dictionary, s. v.

The memorial volume of Sermons and Sacred and Exhortatory Readings (Edinburgh, 1831, Boston, 1832) contains his memoir.

THOMSON, Edward, D.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Porte River, Eng., Oct. 12, 1810; d. at Wheeling, Va., March 22, 1870. He with his father came to America in 1818, and settled in Wooster, O., 1820. He was graduated in medicine at the university of Pennsylvania in 1829. Brought up a Baptist, he joined the Methodist Church, December, 1831, and was admitted to the Annual Conference in 1831. From 1838 to 1843 he had charge of the Norwalk Seminary, Ohio; from 1844 to 1848 he was editor of the Ladies' Repository; from 1848 to 1850, president of the Ohio Wesleyan University; and from 1860 to 1864, editor of the New-York Christian Advocate. In 1864 he was elected bishop, and in that capacity made an extensive tour through Europe and the East. Among his publications may be mentioned Educational Essays, new ed., Cincinnati, 1856; Moral and Religious Essays, 1856; Evidences of Revealed Religion; Our Oriental Missions, — India, China, and Bulgaria, 2 vols.

THOMSON, James, b. at Ednam, in Roxburghshire, Sept. 11, 1700; d. at Kew Lane, near Richmond, Aug. 27, 1748; studied at Edinburgh, and was patronized by the Prince of Wales; wrote The Seasons, 1726-30; Liberty, 1735-36; The Castle of Indolence, 1748; several tragedies, etc. Memorable here for A Hymn on the Season and A Paraphrase on the Latter Part of the Sixth Chapter of St. Matthew. TH'ORA (the law). 1. The Feast of the Law. — On the evening of the eighth day, which concludes the feast of tabernacles, commences what is called the "Feast of the Rejoicing of the Law," — which fitsly celebrates the termination of the year, — by reading of the law and the beginning of another cycle. Two of the richest men of the synagogue are chosen to perform the ceremonies connected with the festival. The first, called the "Bridegroom of the Law," after the singing by the cantor of a long Hebrew formula of address, reads Deut. xxxii. 27-xxxiv. 12, the closing verses of the Pentateuch, and the "Bridegroom of Genesis," after a similar introduction, reads Gen. i.—iii. 3. The two "bridegrooms" distribute alms and presents. The festival is of Babylonish origin.

2. The Writing of the Law-scrolls, being an honorable and important work, can only be intrusted to a grown-up and experienced man. The scrolls are made of parchment prepared expressly for the purpose by a Jew from the hide of a clean animal slaughtered by a Jew. It must not be so porous or thin as to allow the writing to show through. The leaves should be joined by gut-string from a clean animal; but milk may, if the Jesuits be allowed, be used. If it be once joined; if it breaks again, it must be thrown aside. The leaves thus fastened together are rolled upon a wooden rod with wooden or silver handles. Each leaf has an upper margin not less than three fingers broad, and a lower not less than four, and a space between every two columns two fingers broad. No column must be wider than half the height of the leaf, nor have less than forty-eight, or more than sixty lines. No line must be longer than three four-syllable words, or have space or more than thirty letters. The leaf is lined before the writing begins. The ink is made of lampblack, oil, or grease, and pounded charcoal, with honey; and the mass is then thoroughly dried. The ink is prepared for use by being moistened with water colored by gall-nuts. The writing-instrument is a stylus. The sample to be copied must be fully correct. No word may be divided. The square character must be the only one used. They must be placed equidistantly. The letters p, t, z, k, v must have each three little strokes; r, little points on the head; d should have in it a double broken line, as if two “p’s” were written one within the other. Where the sign stands, there must be a space left of three, where B, of nine, letters; for these signs marked off the sections. At the close of the book there must be left a space of four lines. With particular care the sacred name “Jehovah” is to be written. Before beginning, the pen must be wiped, then dipped carefully in the ink; so that it may not blot. No word must the scribe speak while writing it and the next three words, not even if the king spoke to him. If in the copy a mistake is made, it must be corrected within thirty days; otherwise the copy can be once joined; if it breaks again, it must be thrown aside. No word must the scribe speak while writing it and the next three words, not even if the king spoke to him. If in the copy a mistake is made, it must be corrected within thirty days: otherwise the copy cannot be used. If there are more than four mistakes on a leaf, it must be discarded. Every Jew must either write a roll, or have one written. If he inherits one, he cannot sell it, except for money to support himself during his studies, or to pay his wedding-expenses, or to buy his freedom. A thoroughly correct law-roll is the object of especial respect. So long as it is open, no one may spit, move out his foot, or turn his back. When it is carried by, every must stand. The bearer must assume the attitude of the profoundest reverence. It is defilement to touch the text with the naked finger: therefore a hand holding a silver stylus is used to trace the words with in the public reading. To pack up the rolls, and carry them upon beasts of burden, is forbidden: they must be carried by riders, and clapped to the hearts.

LEYBEL.

THORN, The Conference of (Colloquium caritatisnum), took place in 1645. In Poland the attempt at reconciling the various Christian denominations was not altogether fruitless. The Bohemian Brethren and the Reformed entered into community with each other in 1556. A consensus was established between those two parties on the one side, and the Lutherans on the other, in 1570; and in 1578 the Pax Dissidantium, a kind of toleration act, became part of the Polish constitution. Nevertheless, the arrogance and intrigues of the Jesuits every now and then produced great irritation, and utterances of jealousy and rancor were by no means wanting. As now, the overwhelming majority of the population of Poland proper was Catholic, while in the two greatest fiefs of the Polish crown (Courland and Prussia) the majority of the population was evangelical, it became to the king of Poland a problem of the greatest political moment to prevent an open and general outburst of discord.

For this purpose, Ladislaus IV. invited twenty-eight representatives of each of the three Christian denominations found in his realm to meet at Thorn, and by a congress of three months’ duration to try to come to some general agreement. The most prominent among the Roman-Catholic representatives were Bishop Georg Tyszkiewicz of Samogitia; the Jesuit, Gregory Schönhof; the Carmelite, Hieronymus Cyrus a St. Hyacintho; the former Protestant, Bartholomew Nigrinus, preacher in Dantzic; among the Reformed, Johann Bergius, court-preacher to the elector of Brandenburg; Fr. Reichel from Francfort-on-the-Oder; Amos Comenius, bishop of the Moravian Brethren; Johann Bythner, superintendent of Great Poland; and Zbignews Gorayski, castellan of Culm: among the Lutherans, Hulemann from Wittenberg; Calovius and Botsack from Dantzic; Georg Calixtus from Helmstadt; Mich. Behm from Königsberg; and Sig. Guldenstern, starost of Sturm. The conference opened Aug. 18, 1645, under the presidency of Prince Georg Ossolinski, chancellor of the Polish crown, and closed Nov. 21, same year. No result was arrived at. The Lutherans showed the same unmitigated hatred to the Reformed as to the Roman Catholics. They began with foul intriguing among themselves, in order to trick the Calixtus, whom they knew to be in favor of a union, from any active participation in the debate. They went on disturbing the business of the assembly with ridiculous questions of etiquette (who should sit on the front seats,—the Lutherans, or the Reformed; who should make the opening prayer,—a Lutheran, or a Reformed, etc.); but they were finally debarked from participating in the debate, as the other representatives chose to speak Polish, which the Lutheran theologians did not understand. The principal points of controversy between the Reformed and the Roman Catholics were the demand of the former to style themselves catholics, and the refusal of the latter to incorporate with the official acts of the conference the Confession which the Reformed had presented to the assembly, and which had been read in a general session, — the so-called Declaratio Thurnensis. The Roman Catholics were, as Schönhof happened to intimate, afraid to introduce the Reformed Confession in the report, should find it too sensible, and lose something of their fanaticism. The assembly separated, however, with many courteous compliments: whence it has been called caritatisnum.

report is given in Calvinus, Historia syncretisatis, though it is full of printing errors. The publication of the acts gave, of course, rise to some bitter controversies. There appeared a Calvinische Relation, of which Hulsemann wrote a Widerlegung: also Calixtus wrote a Widerlegung against Weller, Helmstädt, 1651. See HERING: Liturgie, mit Geschichte der reformirten Kirche in Preussen, Berlin, 1787; Krasinski: History of the Reformation in Poland, Lond., 1842. HENKE.

THORNDIKE, Herbert, is supposed to have been born in 1598, but no satisfactory proof of this date can be found; nor is it known where he was first educated, it being certain, however, that he became a pensioner at Cambridge in 1613, and a Trinity-College scholar the following year. He was made canon of Lincoln in 1636; vicar of Claybrooke, Leicestershire, in 1639; rector of barley in Hertfordshire, 1642; master of Sidney College in 1643. Being a stanch Churchman of the Anglo-Catholic type, he was ejected from his preferments during the civil wars, but restored to them at the Restoration. He, however, resigned them on being appointed a stall at Westminster Abbey in 1661. He published a Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic lexicon in 1635, assisted Walton in the preparation of his Polyglot during the Commonwealth, and designed an edition of Origen, which he did not execute. He also entered into plans for preserving and restoring episcopal institutions in those unsettled times. He assisted at the Savoy Conference in 1661, and had a share in the revision of the Prayer-Book the same year, being then a member of convocation. He resumed his residence at Cambridge, in broken health, in 1662, and afterwards divided his time between the university and the abbey. The plague drove him from Cambridge in 1666; after which he vacated his fellowship, and died at Chiswick in 1672. He is best known by his writings, and must be regarded as the most learned, the most systematic, and the most powerful advocate of Anglo-Catholic theology and High-Church principles in the seventeenth century. His theological works, which include a number of treatises, have been collected in the Oxford edition of six volumes, 1844—57. This edition represents a model of editorship; being enriched with explanatory notes, which form a guide to the study of controversial theology in general, and not only as it appeared in Thorndike's day. The book which most succinctly unfolds his scheme is entitled An Epilogue to the Tragedy of the Church of England (1659), in which he treats of the principles of Christian truth, the covenant of grace, and the laws of the church. The covenant of grace is his central idea. He dwells upon the condition of the covenant as being baptism, the necessity of the covenant as arising out of original sin, the mediator of the covenant as the divine Christ, and the method of the covenant as an economy of grace. In the treatment of this branch, he brings out the Anglican doctrines of salvation as distinguished from those of Puritanism. His trains of thought are prolix and excessive, and his style is crabbed and unreadable. His works could never be popular, but they demand the attention of all lovers of learning and polemic, which the distinguished theological scholars [see STOUGHTON: Religion in England, 1881, 6 vols. THORNTON, Robert H., D.D., an early, earnest, and laborious minister of the Canadian Presbyterian Church; b. in the parish of West Calder, Scotland, April, 1806; d. in Oshawa, Can., Feb. 11, 1873. He was descended from a godly ancestry. His father was an elder in the church, and his mother was a woman of singular piety. At the time of his birth he lived in this world in the midst of sorrow and suffering. He was among the foremost in every good work, a fearless and vigorous advocate of temperance at a time when a man needed the courage of his convictions to withstand the reproaches of his friends and the assaults of the vile. His efforts in the cause of general education were second to few; and every movement for the social, intellectual, and civil improvement of society, found in him a ready and eloquent supporter. He lectured frequently and gratuitously in all sections of the country, and was for a time the able and efficient agent of the Bible Society. He held a prominent place in the esteem of the community, and was fully appreciated by the church, and his brethren in the ministry. He was for many years clerk of his presbytery, and occupied the moderator's chair of the synod. In 1850 the College of Princeton, N.J., conferred on him the honorary title of D.D.—an honor well bestowed. After a most active and widely extended ministry of forty-two years, and a life of varied and valuable services as a citizen, patriot, and philanthropist, Dr. Thornton died of pneumonia, after a few days' illness. Thoroughly devoted to his life-work, happy in his family, revered by his congregation, honored by his brethren, he has left a steadfastness in his work and influence which tied the hearts of his friends and the assaults of the vile. His motto of life, however, was "Prodesse quam conspi ceri." WILLIAM ORMISTON.

THORNWELL, James Henley, D.D., LL.D., one of the most eminent of the divines, educators, and polemists, and the pen of whom has left a standard of criticism and a standard of piety which is sure to live with posterity. He was born in Marlborough District, S.C., Dec. 9, 1812; d. at Charlotte, N.C., Aug. 1, 1862. To his mother, a woman of great intelligence, piety, and strength of character, he acknowledged his indebtedness, when in the zenith of his fame he spoke of her in a public address as one "who had taught him from his cradle the eternal principles of grace" as they were contained in the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church.

Notwithstanding the hindrances of early poverty, he obtained the elements of a good education under the training of an excellent teacher, and soon displayed such original genius and capacity for acquisition as to attract the attention, and secure the patronage, of two noble men, whose honor it was to furnish him with every facility for the prosecution of his studies, and whose reward was in the distinction to which he attained as a scholar, professor, pastor, and theologian. While a student of South-Carolina College, Columbia, before his seventeenth birthday, his dialectic talent, his passionate love for the classics, and his devotion to metaphysical studies, united with an extraordinary power of abstraction and mental concentration, together with a capacity for long-continued application without rest or sleep, gave presage of the distinction he was afterwards to win on every arena to which duty summoned him.

It is a remarkable circumstance in his history, that with the knowledge of the fact fully before him that his generous patrons had destined him to the study of the law, neither of them at the time professed religion, and not yet being a professor himself, he came to the unalterable decision, that, inasmuch as it was the duty of every one to devote his life to the glory of God and the good of man, he could best fulfill the end of his being by becoming a minister of the gospel.

Three years after this he became a member of the church; and then, after spending about two years in the business of teaching, in the prosecution of his great design he went first to the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., but, without constrictuig the train of studies required at Cambridge, where, in the divinity school of Harvard University, he commenced the study of Hebrew and biblical literature. But, finding the climate too cold for his constitution, after a few months' stay he returned to South Carolina.

He was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Harmony in 1834. His first pastorate was in Lancaster, in the presbytery of Bethel.

In 1837 he was elected to a professorship in Columbia College, South Carolina. In 1839 he resigned his chair in that institution to become pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Columbia, but was recalled to the college in 1841, and remained connected with it as professor or president, with a few intervals of service elsewhere, for fifteen years.

At the close of 1855 he was transferred from the college to the theological seminary; and the beginning of 1856 found him, in what was perhaps the beginning of his life, in the chair of didactic and polemic theology, and also editor of the Southern Quarterly Review.

Twice during his life Dr. Thornwell visited Europe. Ten times he represented his presbytery in the General Assembly; and he was moderator of the assembly [Old-School Branch] which met in Richmond, Va., in 1847.

It was at the assembly held in Rochester, N.Y. [1860], that the great debate between himself and the Rev. Charles Hodge, D.D., took place, on the subject of church boards. Dr. Thornwell took a leading part in the organization of the Southern General Assembly in 1851. On the 1st of August, 1862, he died in Charlotte, N.C., where he had gone to meet his wounded son, then a soldier in the Confederate army. He was taken away in the meridian of his fame and usefulness, not yet having completed his fiftieth year, his last words being those of wonder and praise.

The collected writings of Dr. Thornwell, edited by Rev. James B. Adger, D.D., Richmond, 1871-75, are contained in four volumes, the first of which is entitled Theological; the second, Theological and Ethical; the third, Theological and Controversial; and the fourth, Ecclesiastical. See his Life and Letters, by B. M. Palmer, Richmond, 1875.

THREE-CHAPTER CONTROVERSY, The, was intimately connected with the Monophysite Controversy. The emperor issued an edict in 544 condemning the so-called "Three Chapters" which Theodore proposed, (1) the person and writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, (2) the writings of Theodore in defence of Nestorius, and (3) the letter which Ibas was said to have written to the Persian Mari. Theodore had died at peace with the church, and Theodoret and Ibas had been expressly recognized as orthodox by the Council of Chalcedon (451). Thus the support of the "Three Chapters" implied a partial condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon. The Greek bishops yielded assent after a public resistance. Pope Vigilius wavered, but in 554 he concurred in the Three Chapters in the Judicatum, but at the same time insisted on the authority of the Council of Chalcedon. The Latin Church, however, tenaciously resisted the condemnation, and a synod of Carthage excluded Vigilius from church communion. Vigilius subsequently withdrew the Judicatum, refused to be present at the second Council of Constantinople (553), in which the Three-Chapter Controversy was considered, and in a decree of May 14, 553 (Constitutum de tribus capitulis), expressly protested against the condemnation of the "Three Chapters." The Council of Constantinople, however, followed the wishes of the emperor. The Greek churches accepted the decision, confirming the condemnation of the articles. The Roman Church fell in, and in 559 the North African Church gave its assent. But the recognition of the authority of this council by Vigilius and Pelagius was the occasion of the separation of the churches of Africa from the Roman Church, with Aquilea and Milan at their head, from the Roman Church. The schism continued till the pontificate of Gregory the Great. The Latin Church takes very little notice of the fifth Ecumenical Council (Second Council of Constantinople).

successor ascended the Assyrian throne B.C. 727. Ptolemy's Canon gives 726 as the first year of Ptolemaeus' successor in Babylonia, but the discrepancies make the identity of Pul with Tiglath-pileser a matter of the strongest historical probability. The name Pul was not unknown in Assyria, and was probably the private name of this king, who seems not to have been the son of his predecessor. The name Tiglath-pileser would therefore have been assumed on his ascending the throne.

The Bible makes the following statements about this king: (1) That he threatened the northern kingdom (Israel), and that Menahem the king gave him a thousand talents of silver to secure his favor and support (2 Kings xv. 19); (2) That in the days of Pekah, a usurper, the second successor of Menahem, he took Ijon, Abel-bethMaacah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, and Galilee, "all the land of Naphtali," and carried them captive to Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29; cf. 1 Chron. v. 6, 29); (3) That Ahaz, king of Judah, induced him by homage and presents, in order to come to his aid against Syria and Israel; that he captured Damascus, carried the inhabitants away captive, and slew Rezin the king; and that Ahaz went to Damascus to meet him (2 Kings xvi. 7-10; cf. 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, which, however, says, "Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, came unto him [Ahaz], and. pressed him, but strengthened him not"). These statements are partly explained, partly supplemented, by the inscriptions, from which we are enabled to give, with approximate accuracy, a sketch of Tiglath-pileser's reign. In B.C. 745, his first regnal year, he made a successful expedition to Babylonia. In 744 he was occupied in the countries east of Assyria. In 743 his forces were engaged, partly in Armenia, partly before the city of Arpad, in the land Chatti, west of the Euphrates, receiving tribute from the kings of Karkemish, Tyre, etc. The years 742-740 were spent in Assyria, where he made a successful expedition to Babylonia. In 740 Hamath was punished for revolt, the citizenship given to "Azariah of Judah," who was himself not a successor. The years 739-737 were occupied in the siege of Arpad. In 738 Hamath was punished for revolt again to "Azariah of Judah," who was himself not a successor. The years 737-735 were spent in Assyria, where the king received tribute from Rezin of Damascus, Menahem of Israel (cf. 2 Kings xv. 19), Hiram of Tyre, and various rulers of Asia Minor, Phoenicia, and Arabia. The years 735-733 were spent in the East; but in 734 the king marched to Philistia (Philistia), taking in Phoenicia, Israel, Judah, Edom, Moab, and Arabia. Before this expedition, or in the early stages, must be placed the homage, gifts, and entreaties of Ahaz (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8). Tiglath-pileser speaks, in one inscription, of receiving tribute from "Je-u-chal-zí (Ahaz, Wm) of Judah." His account of the campaign of 734 (cf. 2 Kings xvi. 9) is the biblical account; the inscriptions tell us that he plundered the kingdom of Israel ("the land of the house of Omri"), and, killing Pekah the king, set Hoshea on the throne. This shows what power was at work behind the conspiracy and usurpation of Hoshea (mentioned 2 Kings xv. 29). After this the Assyrian king turned toward Damascus, and besieged it for two years, finally capturing it, and putting Rezin to death (cf. 2 Kings xvi. 9). It must have been at this time that Azah visited him at Damascus (2 Kings xvi. 10). In 731 occurred the second expedition to Babylon, with the subjugation of Merodachbaladan (see art.) and Ukinzer (see above). 730-728 were spent in Assyria, where the king's death probably occurred in 727.

The only difficulty occasioned by the comparison of the biblical with the Assyrian account of this king is a chronological one. He reigned, according to the Eponym Canon (which is fixed by its mention of the solar eclipse of B.C. 783, and by its correspondence with Ptolemy's Canon), B.C. 745-727. But the received biblical chronology puts the death of his contemporary, Azariah, in B.C. 758, and that of Menahem B.C. 761. It also gives 739, and not 734, as the date of Pekah's death, putting the invasions of Judah by Pekah and Rezin in 742-741. The discrepancies are in part due to the same causes which we find operating in the previous century, in the times of Ahaz, Jehu, and Shalmaneser II. (see Shalmaneser), but are connected in part with some special inaccuracies in the present text of that section of Kings with which we are here concerned. A solution of the difficulty cannot be attempted here; but it must be sought in the restoration of correct numbers in the Hebrew text, and not in a modification of the Assyrian data, which are here self-consistent and well-attested.

TILLEMONT, Louis Sebastien, Le Nain de, a Roman-Catholic historian; b. in Paris, Nov. 30, 1637; d. there Jan. 10, 1698. He was educated in Port-Royal, shared the views and fortunes of the Jansenists, and was consecrated priest in 1676. He took his name from the town of Tillemont, near Paris, where he was rector. He devoted much time to historical studies, and, after furnishing biographies for editions of several of the Fathers, published the first volume of his larger work, Histoire des Empereurs et des autres princes qui ont regne durant les six premiers siecles de l'Eglise, des persecutions qu'ils ont faites aux chrétiens, etc., 1690. He published three more volumes of this work during his life. Two posthumous volumes were added. His principal work was the Memoires pour servir à l'histoire eccléas. des six premiers siecles. The first three volumes were published at Paris, 1694. Thirteen others followed (till 1712) after the author's death, bringing the history down to 513. This was the first church history based upon conscientious researches published in France up to that time. It consists for the most part of quotations from the Fathers, arranged in chronological order. The author's own remarks are included in brackets, or consigned to the foot of the page as notes. Tillemont's labors do not satisfy the present generation of scholarship, but were valuable for their minute and careful research.

TILLOTSON, John, b. at Sowerby in Yorkshire, October, 1630; son of a clothier, who was a zeal-
When the apostle visited Lystra on his second missionary journey, he heard the best reports of Timothy from lad Francis Hacket, one of the subsequently ejected clergy. But Tillotson did not imbibe Puritan doctrines: he rather leaned in what was called the “Latitudinarian” direction. The Cambridge school of divines, including Budworth, More, Smith, Wilkins, and Hacket, leaned of that kind; but they probably exerted an influence over the future archbishop. Chillingworth, through his writings, is also said to have moulded Tillotson’s opinions. Yet he appeared on the Presbyterian side at the famous Savoy Conference, but was too young to take any important part in that assembly. How, when, or where, he was ordained is a mystery: but he was a preacher in 1661, and was offered the church of St. Mary Aldermanbury in 1662, when Edmund Calamy was deprived of it. After submitting to the Act of Uniformity, he was appointed to the rectory of Keddington, Suffolk, and soon afterwards preacher at Lincoln’s Inn. He began as an author in 1664, by publishing a sermon on The Wisdom of being Religious, and another in 1666, on The Rule of Faith. It was as a preacher, and the author of sermons, that he became most distinguished; his plain, almost colloquial style, free from learned notations, appealed to reason as well as revelation in supersitious Puritan; studied at Clare Hall, Cambridge, and soon afterwards preacher at Lincoln’s Inn. He became most distinguished; his plain, almost colloquial style, free from learned notations, appealing to reason as well as revelation in support of his opinions. He showed a strong Erastian tincture in a book entitled The Protestant Religion vindicated from the Charge of Singularity and Novelty, in which production he curiously said that “no man is at liberty to affirm the establishment of religion of a nation, though it be false.” This brought him into trouble with many of his friends, and he soon retreated from such a strange position. He was a Whig in politics, opposed to the despotism of the Stuarts, and an advocate of ecclesiastical comprehension. He attended Lord William Russell on the scaffold, and hailed with joy the Revolution of 1688: after this he took part in the ecclesiastical commission for revising the Prayer-Book. Not without high preferment before, for he was dean successively of Canterbury and St. Paul’s, he rose to the primacy of all England in 1691, where he endured many insults from the Nonjurors. Stricken with palsy, he died Nov. 22, 1694.

Old as the Creation, or the Gospel a Republican of the Law of Nature,— which appeared in 1789, when the author was seventeen years old, marks the culminating point of the deist controversy. The second volume of this work was withheld by Bishop Gibson, to whom the author had intrusted the manuscript. "It has not the force of style or the weight of thought which could secure a permanence in the consciences of the patriarchs, the wars of extermination, etc. Conyers, James Foster, Leland, and others attacked Tischendorf's work; and it was to it, more than to Tischendorf's first New Testament; and Tischendorf seems, only a short time before his death, to have recovered that impartial balance of mind necessary to do full justice to his great predecessor. Reaching the opening of his academic career with his habilitation as privatdocent, in October, 1840, and issuing his first Greek New Testament with the date 1841, he left in the same month for Paris, where he remained until January, 1843, save a visit to Holland in the autumn of 1841, and to England at the close of the summer of 1842. At Paris, not to mention a Protestant and a Catholic edition of the Greek New Testament, or his collations of Philo and of the sixtieth book of the Basilicas, his chief work was the deciphering the above-mentioned Codex Ephraemi, a biblical manuscript which had been erased, and re-written with the works of Ephraem Syrus. Tischendorf did not spoil the manuscript with chemicals: that was done by the librarians while he was a schoolboy at Plauen. From Paris he sped to Rome, only delaying at Basel to collect Ec°; and he remained in Italy about a year, working diligently at the uncial manuscripts of the Bible. But the first one, the Codex Vatonicus, he dedicated to him, because Mai had an edition under way; and it was only after the personal intervention of the Pope that he received permission to use it for three hours each, on two days, and to make a facsimile. He looked, however, with eagerness towards the East, and was so fortunate as to succeed in his plans for a journey thither.

On March 12, 1844, he sailed from Livorno for Alexandria, whence he proceeded to Cairo; and after examining the manuscripts in the Cairo monastery of Mount Sinai, and visiting the Coptic monasteries of the Libyan Desert, he started for Sinai on May 12, and reached it by the 24th, remaining until June 1. Here he discovered the forty-three leaves of the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, now at Leipzig, which are a part of the famous Codex Sinaiticus: the leaves of it that he was not allowed to bring with him were the incitement to his later Eastern journeys. With a glance at Palestine, Constantinople, and Patmos, he passed through Vienna and Munich, and reached Leipzig in January, 1845, well supplied with treasures. He married Miss Angelika Elene am Strassburg, and then, returning to Leipzig, he began to profit of an edition of the Greek New Testament. It should be distinctly observed, that Tischendorf appears to have made Lachmann his guide for the line of his work, not merely in so far as he followed, to a certain extent, Lachmann's example in discarding the so-called textus receptus, but even in particular points. We need only refer to the first striking success of Tischendorf's publication of the Parisian palimpsest, the Codex Ephraemi, and then to his edition of the Codex Claromontanus, the publication of both of which Lachmann had called for in 1830, declaring that Parisian scholars could win immortal honors by it. The young German did what Paris failed to do. Lachmann, however, spoke most slightly of Tischendorf's first New Testament; and Tischendorf seems, only a short time before his death, to have recovered that impartial balance of mind necessary to do full justice to his great predecessor.
The following years were broken by journeys to England, to Italy, and to St. Petersburg. In 1865 appeared the first edition of his work upon the date of the Gospels: When were our Gospels written? and this was speedily replaced by new editions; while Danish, Dutch, English, French, Italian, Russian, Swedish, and Turkish translations scattered the book abroad. He published in 1878 an edition of the New Testament part of the Codex Vaticanus, and an appendix to the Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, and Alexandrinus. During this time, however, beginning with 1864, he had been issuing the "eighth larger critical edition" of his Greek New Testament; and the last part of the text with the critical apparatus appeared in 1872. He was filled with plans for a new journey to the East, and he had prepared already for a voyage to America to attend the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York; but upon May 31, 1875, he was disabled by a stroke of apoplexy, and never recovered sufficient power to work again. He died on Dec. 7, 1874, and was buried in the new cemetery at Leipzig. Five of his eight children are daughters; the eldest son, Paul Andreas, is second dragoman in the German embassy at Constantinople; the second, Johannes, is a lawyer, at present attached to the Imperial Law Office at Berlin; the third, Immanuel, is a physician, at present assisting a professor at Kiel.

Tischendorf was a man of unusual mental ability and diligence. His services to biblical students cannot easily be over-estimated and will be more and more gratefully acknowledged as the increase of distance in time removes the observer from the influence of that prejudice against him due to his estimate of himself. His editions of the New Testament, culminating in the eighth, are very valuable for the text presented, and still more for the vast amount of material which they place at the disposal of the student of the text; and the comparative agreement of Tregelles and of Westcott and Hort with him shows that his critical judgment was of a high order. A list of his works may be found in the writer's article in Bible. Encyc. (Feb. 1, 1876, pp. 89-102), and in the Prolegomena, ed. VIII. crit. mai., Leipzig, first part, 1884, pp. 7-22.

TITHE. Down to the seventeenth century it was generally held that all tithes, without exception, had been introduced by the Church on the basis of the Mosaic law, and had only been confirmed and extended by the State. The investigations, however, of Selden, Hugo Grotius, and others, proved that tithes (decima) were also known to the Roman law, and had in many cases been introduced from it into the economical organization of the State. The inhabitants of a conquered country paid a tenth of the revenue he derived from it as a rent to the State, and generally he transferred this system of rent to the colonists he settled on the soil. Nevertheless, when speaking of tithes as part of the ecclesiastical organization. The Church chiefly in the Church, which, again, had borrowed the institution from the Synagogue. It was an old custom, older than Moses, to offer up one-tenth of one's income as a sacrifice.

The principal tithal rules are as follows. (1) The tenth part of the fruits of the earth and cattle were given to the Levites, who received it as a compensation for their want of an inheritance, and might eat it at their several places of abode (Num. xviii. 21). (2) The Levites must give one-tenth part of this tithe to the priests (Num. xviii. 29); this latter portion after the exile (Neh. x. 38), and perhaps before (2 Chron. xxxii. 12), had to be delivered at Jerusalem. (3) A second tenth was eaten at the tabernacle, at a joyous feast (Deut. xiv. 22 sq.); the offerers, if they made the transportation of the tenth part inexpedient, it might be converted into money, and the money used again in the purchase of the necessary vegetables and meat for the feast (Deut. xiv. 25, 26). (4) Every third year this tithefestival was celebrated by the people at their homes (Deut. xxvi. 12); the Levites, stranger, fatherless, and widows being invited thereto.

The tithes were considerably neglected after the exile (Neh. xii. 10; Mal. iii. 8, 10); and, at the later period of Roman rule, high priests often laid violent hands on the priestly tithes (Joseph., Ant. XX. 8, 8; 9, 2). The Pharisees, on the other hand, insisted upon the tithal rules as conditions of the consecration of vegetables and meat, and upon the previous and minute application of them. Our Lord refers to their particular care in this regard (Matt. xxii. 23).

Tittmann, Johann August Heinrich, a distinguished German theologian of moderate rationalistic tendencies; was b. in Langensalza, Aug. 1, 1773; d. in Leipzig, Dec. 30, 1851. He studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and was made professor of theology at the latter university. His principal works were, Instituio symbolica ad sententiam eccles., 1811, Ueber Supranaturalismus, Rationalismus u. Atheismus, 1816, and an edition of the Symbola litteraria Boeotiae, 1817.

TITULAR BISHOP, same as Bishop in partibus. See Episcopus in Partibus.

Titus, the "fellow-helper" of Paul; a Gentile (Gal. ii. 3); was probably one of Paul's converts (Titt. i. 4), but was never circumcised (Gal. ii. 3). He is not mentioned in the Acts, and first appears in connection with the apostle on his journey to the Council of Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 1-3). We next find him at Ephesus during Paul's third missionary journey. Paul sent him thence, with a companion, on a mission to Corinth (2 Cor. vii. 14, xii. 19). After meeting Paul in Macedonia (2 Cor. vii. 9), he went on again to Corinth (2 Cor. vii. 6, 18-24). Our next information about Titus is found in Paul's Epistle to him. At the time the apostle wrote, Titus was in Crete (Tit. i. 5), where the apostle had left him after his release from the first Roman imprisonment. Titus was with Paul in the second Roman imprisonment, and it was with Paul he went on his journey from Macedonia to Jerusalem (2 Tim. iv. 19; Acts xx. 4). According to tradition (Euseb., III. 4; Constitutiones Apostolicae, vii. 49; Hieronymus on Tit. li. 7; Theodoret on 1 Tim. iii. 1.), Titus died as Bishop of Crete.

Titus, Bishop of Bostra in Arabia; a distinguished opponent of Manicheism; d., according to Jerome, in the reign of Valens. Nothing further is known of his personal history than that he came into a personal conflict with Julian the Apostate, who in a letter to him accused him of exciting the Christians to acts of violence against the heathen. This letter, which falls in the year 362, was written from Antioch. The great reputation of Titus in the early church rests upon his work against the Manicheans. Jerome mentions it twice, and speaks of its author as one of the most important church-writers of his time (Ep. 70, 4, ed. Villari). Sozomen (iii. 14) likewise speaks of him as one of the most distinguished men of his day. In this work, Titus denies the conceivability of two beginnings, admits the distinction of good and evil only in the moral sphere, denies that death is an evil for the good, and starts from the general proposition of Plato concerning the beauty of the world. The three books which are preserved of this work were originally known only by the Latin translation of Turrianus, but have since been edited from a Greek manuscript at Hamburg, in the Theolagus Canisius, and by Gallandi, in his Bibliotheca, v. 298 sqq. The Commentary on Luke and the Oratio in ramos, edited by Gallandi, and ascribed to him, are probably spurious. See Tilmont: Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclesiastique; Baur: D. Tobler, Titus, b. at Stein in the canton of Appenzell, Switzerland, June 25, 1806; d. Jan. 21, 1871, in Munich. He studied medicine at Zurich and Vienna, and undertook for medical purposes a journey in Palestine (1855-38): Lustreise im Morgenland, Zurich, 1839. Having become interested in the geographical and topographical investigations of the Holy Land, he made three more journeys to Palestine, the first in 1845; and as the literary results of this journey appeared, Bethlehem, St. Gall, 1849; Plan of Jerusalem, 1850; Golgotha, 1851; Die Siloahquelle and der Oelberg, 1852, 1853 (2 ed., 1856); Topographie von Jerusalem und seinen Umgebungen, Berlin, 1853-54, 2 vols. After the second he published Planographie von Jerusalem, Gothu, 1856, and Dritte Wanderung nach Palästina, Gothu, 1853. In 1865 he undertook his last journey to Palestine, and published his Nazareth, Berlin, 1868. See also his Bibliographia Geographica Palestine, Leipzig, 1867, Palestine Descriptions ex Sacco iv. c., et c., Leipzig, 1869, and ex Sacco viii., ix., xii., et x., Leipzig, 1874. His life was written by Heim, Zurich, 1879.

Todd, Henry John, Church of England; b. about 1753; d. at Stettinston, Yorkshire, Dec. 24, 1845. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1786; rector in London; keeper of manuscripts at Lambeth Palace, 1803; rector of Stetston, 1820; prebendary of York, 1830; archdeacon of Cleveland, 1832; and queen's chaplain. He edited Milton (1801), Spenser (1805), Johnson's Dictionary (1806), with that of De la Harpe's Instauratio, 1808; History of Canterbury, Canterbury, 1798; Vindication of our Authorized Translation and Translators of the Bible, London, 1819; Memoirs of Rt. Rev. Brian Walton, 1821, 2 vols.; Life of Archbishop Cranmer, 1831, 2 vols.; Authentic Account of our Authorized Translation of the Bible, 1835.
TODD, James Henthorn, B.D., Irish Church; b. at Dublin, April 23, 1805; d. at Silveracres, Rathfarnham, near Dublin, June 28, 1869. He was graduated B.A. at Trinity College, Dublin, 1821; King's College, London, 1823, where he delivered lectures, 1828 and 1841; regius-professor of Hebrew, 1849; librarian to the University, 1852; preceptor of St. Patrick's, 1864; and president of the Royal Irish Academy for five years. He wrote two courses of Donnellan lectures, viz., On the Prophecies relating to Antichrist in the Writings of Daniel and St. Paul, Dublin, 1840, ditto, in the Apocalypse of St. John, 1846; Historical Memoirs of the Successors of St. Patrick and Archbishops of Armagh, 1861, 2 vols.; Memoir of St. Patrick's Life and Mission, 1863; edited some of Wiclif's writings (see literature under that art.), and greatly distinguished himself as an Irish antiquary.

TODD, John, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Rutland, Vt., Oct. 9, 1800; d. at Pittsfield, Mass., Aug. 24, 1873. He was graduated at Yale College, 1822; studied four years at Andover Theological Seminary; was pastor in Groton, Mass., 1827 to 1829; editor of a magazine, 1836 to 1839; first Congregational Church, Philadelphia, to 1842, and Pittsfield, to 1872. He offered prayer at the driving of the last spike of the Central Pacific Railroad. He was a man of national reputation, and the author of many excellent and widely circulated books, among which may be mentioned Lectures to Children, Northampton, 1834 and 1858, 2 series (translated into French, German, Greek, etc., printed in raised letters for the blind, and used as a school-book for the liberated slaves in Sierra Leone); Student's Manual, 1835, new English edition; London, 1877; Index Rerum, 1835 (prepared for noting books read); Sabbath-school Teacher, 1836; Simple Sketcher, Pittsfield, 1843, 2 vols.; Future Punishment, New York, 1863; Hints and Thoughts for Christians, 1867; Woman's Rights, 1867; The Sunset-land, or the Great Pacific Slope, 1870. A collected edition of his books appeared in London, 1855, later edition, 1879. See John Todd, The Story of his Life told mainly by Himself, New York, 1876.

TOLAND, John, a distinguished English deist; was b. near Londonderry, Ireland, Nov. 30, 1699; d. at Putney, March 11, 1722. He was born of Roman-Catholic parentage (was charged with being the illegitimate son of a priest), changed his original name, Janus Junius, at school, and became a Protestant at the age of sixteen. He studied at the universities of Glasgow, Edinburgh (where he graduated M.A., 1700), and Leyden, where he studied theology with a view to becoming a dissenting minister. He spent several years at Oxford, and in 1706 published his principal work, Christianity not Mysterious (2d ed., Amsterdam, 1702), which made a great sensation. The conclusions of the book are not very distinct; but the author defines that to be "mysterious" which is "above," not "contrary to," reason, and declares that Christianity contains nothing "mysterious" (thus, it is not "contradictory to" reason). He defends himself as a good Christian and a good Churchman. The book was burnt by the hangman at Dublin on Sept. 11, 1697, Toland being in the city at the time. "The Irish Parliament," says South, "to their immortal honor, sent him packing, and, without the help of a fagot, soon made the king too hot for him." From this time on, he led a Bohemian life, flitting between London and the Continent; wrote some political pamphlets favoring the claims of the house of Brunswick; spent some time at Brussels in a semi-official position, and died a pensioner of Lord Molesworth. He defended his Christianity not Mysterious, in an Apology for Mr. Toland, London, 1697, and Vindicius liberiueus, London, 1702. He published an edition of Milton's Works, Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous, with a Life, London, 1697, 1698, 3 vols.; Ammianor, or a Defence of Milton's Life, 1699 (construed into an attack upon the canon); Tetradymus, 1720; Impartial History of Servetus, 1724, etc. An historical account of his life and writings appeared in 1722, and a Life by Hudson, London, 1726, in 2 vols., with a Life by Des Maizeaux. See LELAND: Deut. Writers; LECHLER: Deismus; A. S. FARRAR: Critical History of Free Thought (lect. iv.); STEPHEN: History of English Thought, etc. (i. 101 sqq.).

TOLEDO, Councils of. The old Spanish city of Toledo (Toletum), on the Tagus, (forty-two miles south-west of Madrid, with a population of five thousand, and still the seat of an archbishop), was the seat of a bishopric, and was the scene of numerous church synods. The First Council was called by Bishop Patrons, or Petrusinus, of Toledo, in 400. With eighteen other bishops, he passed twenty canons against the Priscillianists. A second council was probably held there in 447, in obedience to the demand of Pope Leo the Great, that the Spanish bishops should take further measures against the Priscillianists. The bishops of four provinces constructed a creed in Toledo, in which it is to be noticed that the phrase, "proceeding from the Father and the Son" (a patre filioque procedens), occurs. In the eighteen anathemas that are appended to it are found the best materials for the knowledge of the doctrines of the Priscillianists. The Roman dominion in Spain was overthrown in the latter part of the fifth century by the West Goths, who ruled for fifty years from Toulouse as the seat of power. They were zealous Arians, but did not institute severe persecutions against the Catholics. The Second Council of Toledo (symbod. Toletana II.) was held in 531 (or 527), and passed five unimportant canons. In 531 the king of the West Goths took up his residence in Toledo. This change gave to the city great importance as a civil and ecclesiastical centre. In 581 or 582 the Arian King Leuwigild held a synod of the Arian bishops in the city, to take measures for the conversion of the Catholics. But the Goths, instead of converting the Catholics, were themselves converted; the Catholic bishops having full control of the people who were Catholics, and never ceasing to denounce the Gothic rulers as foreigners, barbarians, heretics, etc. King Reccared entered the Gothic Church in 588, and in the same year held the celebrated Third Council of Toledo. After three days of fasting and prayer, the assembly held its first sitting May 8, being opened by the king, who used in his address the phrase, procedit a patre et a filio ("proceedeth from the Father and the Son"). He announced, as the reason for his having convened... the synod, his desire to lay down a confession of his orthodoxy. He pronounced the anathema of Arius, and expressed his acceptance of the creeds of Nicaea, Constantinople (with the addition of the statement, "proceeding from the Father and the Son"), and Chalcedon. The Goths who took part in the synod condemned Arianism in twenty-three articles. The synod also passed twenty-three articles bearing upon the assertion of the bishop of Toledo, who was deposed for hisesy. These were signed by the king, sixty-four bishops, and seven episcopal substitutes. Leader of Seville closed the proceedings with an address.

The Fourth Council of Toledo (two local councils having been held in 597 and 610) was called by King Sisenand, and convened Dec. 5, 635. Sixty-four bishops were present, and Isidore of Seville acted as president. The king, who had dethroned his predecessor Suintila, threw himself prostrate before the bishops, and with tears begged their intercession with God for himself. The synod passed seventy-five articles confirming the rights of the king, pronouncing eternal excommunication upon all who engaged in rebellion against the throne, etc. The Fifth Council of Toledo convened in 636, at the command of the King Chintila, who sought thereby to confirm his power. The Sixth Council of Toledo was summoned by the same king, in 638. Fifty-two bishops were present. All crimes against the king were declared punishable with eternal damnation. The Seventh Council of Toledo was held in 646, under Chindaswinth, who had risen to the throne by violence. In the collection of the acts of the councils, decrees about the offices of archdeacon, presbyter, sacristan, etc., are attributed to Jews and heretics. The Ninth Council of Toledo, consisting of forty-eight bishops, twenenty-seven episcopal substitutes, several abbots, and sixteen knights, was convened May 2, 656, with fifty-nine bishops present. The licentiousness of the priests (sodomy, etc.), and the worship of trees, stones, etc., were condemned; and it was ordered that every day of the year (Good Friday excepted) mass should be celebrated in every church for the king and his family. The Seventeenth Council was assembled on Nov. 2, 675, to take measures against the licentiousness of the priests. The Fifteenth Council, in 684, Monothelitism and Arianism were condemned. The Fifteenth Council, in 684, was held in St. Peter's and St. Paul's Church, London, 1874; PICK, in McCLINTOCK and STRONG, s.v.

TOLEDOTH JEBHU (תַוְלְדֹת יְבֻהֵו, "generations [i.e., history] of Jesus"), a Jewish apocryphon of the middle age, made up of "fragmentary Talmudic legends," which pretends to be a life of Jesus, but is in reality a chummy and stupid fiction. Its author is unknown. Luther shows up the book in his usual vigorous style in his Schem Hamphoras. There are two widely different recensions of it. Wagenseil published a Latin translation of one of his Tela Igena Satane, Altorf, 1838; and Huldreich of Historia Jesuca Saxenazeri a Judaeis blasphemae corrupta, Leyden, 1705. According to the first, Jesus was born B.C. 106-79; according to the second, B.C. 70-4. John, b. at Beaudley, Worcestershire, 1603; d. at Salisbury, May 22, 1676. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1624; entered holy orders; soon became famous for his preaching, especially among the Puritans, and was successively lecturer at St. Martin's, Oxford, preacher at Beaudley, 1630, shortly afterwards at Leominster (Lemster), and 1641 at Bristol; master of the Temple, London, 1647; preacher at Beaudley, 1647. In Beaudley he had for his near neighbor Richard Baxter at Kidderminster. Each had his numerous admirers, many of whom made a long journey each week to hear his favorite. Between Tomes and Baxter there was incessant controversy, especially upon infant baptism and church polity. In 1658 Tomes was appointed one of the triers for the approbation of public ministers, and removed to London. In 1656 he married a rich widow, and retired from pastoral duties. TOMLINE, George, D.D., Church of England; b. at Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, Oct. 9, 1750; d. at Winchester, Nov. 14, 1827. Graduated at Cambridge, he was successively rector of Corwen (1782), prebend of St. Peter's, Westminster (1784), rector of Sudbury-cum-Offord, Suffolk (1785), bishop of Lincoln, with the deanery of St. Paul's (January, 1787), and finally bishop of Winchester (July, 1820). His family name was Pretyman, but he changed his own name to Tomline in order to inherit a considerable fortune. He left two hundred thousand pounds. He is best known by his Elements of Christian Theology, London, 1799, 2 vols. (14th ed., 1843; vol. i. separately printed as Introduction to the Study of the Bible; 2nd ed., 1840); Refutation of the Charge of Calvinism against the Church of England, 1811; Memories of Pitt, 1821.

TONGUES, Gift of, a phenomenon of the apostolic age, technically known as the "glossolalia." It first showed itself in Jerusalem, upon Pentecost (Acts ii. 4), but was repeated in other places (x. 44), and was considered by the apostles as a sign of the end of the world and of the coming of the glory of God (Acts xi. 15, 16). It is more fully described by Paul in 1 Cor. xii. 9-11, "Are all men speakers? Do all men know foreign languages? Are all men prophets? Can all men interpret visions? Can all men speak with tongues?"

TOUNSEUR. The, denotes the practice of the Roman-Catholic and Greek churches, by which a portion of the skull of the priest is shaven. It precedes the consecration to clerical orders, and is a specific mark of distinction between the clergy and the laity (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 4). He who has once received the tonsure must always retain it. It may be conferred upon candidates in their seventh year, but in this case they may not exercise spiritual functions till they are fourteen years old (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 3). The tonsure is regarded as a symbol of Christ's crown of thorns, the regal dignity of the priesthood, and the renunciation of the world, and is sometimes based upon Acts xxii. 24, 26, 1 Cor. xi. 14, 15. It is held that Paul and Peter practised it. It is an historical fact that, in the fourth century, neither monks nor priests practised the tonsure [so also Wetzer and Welte]. The cutting of the beard, and hair of the head, was forbidden by the Council of Carthage (398); and Jerome, in his Commentary on Ezek. xlv., says that the Christian priest was not to appear with shorn head, lest he be confounded with the priests of Isis and Serapis, and other heathen divinities. The custom of cutting the hair at first prevailed... among the penitent, and was taken up by the monks in the fifth century. They shaved the hair down to the chin; and this practice was considered symbolical of penitence. From the sixth century on, the priests followed the practice. Three principal styles of tonsure have prevailed. The Roman tonsure consists of the shaving of the entire skull, except a ring of hair extending all around, behind, and above the ears. The Greek tonsure was of this kind. The synod of Toledo, in 633, decreed this style for Spain. The extent of the shaved part was gradually diminished; but the synod of Placentia (1389) ordered that it should be at least four fingers broad. The Greek tonsure, also called "the tonsure of Paul," consists in shaving the fore-part of the skull entirely bare. The Celtic or British tonsure, called also the tonsure of James or Simon Magnus, consists in shaving the head bare in front of a line drawn across the skull from ear to ear. [The style of the tonsure formed a subject of most violent controversy in England after the arrival of Augustine and his monks, until the final victory of the Roman type of Christianity over the old Celtic Church in the eighth century.]

The tonsure is conferred by the bishops, cardinal priests, and abbots (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 10). The Pope may also vest the right in priests. [See BeDE: Historia Ecclesiastica, iv. 1; MAR-TEN: De antiquo eccl. rit.; art. "Tonsur," in WETZER U. WELTE.]

TOPLADY, Augustus Montague, was b. at Farnham in Surrey, Nov. 4, 1740; and d. in London, Aug. 31, 1788. He was one of the greatest hymn writers of his age. His Psalms and Hymns, of which a new edition, containing but few of his own, appeared in 1776, contained but few of his own. His later hymns add considerably to these but one-third of their bulk, but include his most important compositions. No reliable edition of his entire verses existed prior to that of D. Sedgwick, 1880. His Psalms and Hymns, 1776, contained but few of his own.

As to Toplady's talent and earnestness there are not two opinions. Montgomery's remark, that "he evidently kindled his poetic torch at that of his contemporary, Charles Wesley," means merely that he could not be insensible to Wesley's example and influence. So similar were their gifts, that their hymns can be distinguished only by the tone of the severer doctrinal voice of the other. Agreeing in every thing else, difference of opinion as to the Decrees made and kept them the worst of friends. "Mr. John Wesley," said Toplady in a sermon, "is the only opponent I ever had whom I chastised with a studious disregard to cere- mony and decorum. I only gave him his due, and deserved a scorpion." "They have defended in his Arminian Magazine, "with arguments worthy of Bellian, and language worthy of Billingsgate." Yet Toplady took not half his pleasure in these "blind Arminians," and has frequently received credit for some of their best. His own poetry was better than his polemic, and has often "a peculiarly ethereal spirit." Some of his hymns are heavily weighted with divinity; but his "Rock of Ages," "Amen," and "Assured hope," are among the most popular hymns in any language. For sketch, see Bishop RYLe: Christian Leaders of a Hundred Years Ago, London, 1869.

TORQUEMADA (TURRECREMATA), the name of two distinguished Spanish ecclesiastics. — I. Juan de, b. in Valladolid, 1388, educated there and in Paris; was appointed (1431) by Eugenius IV. "master of the holy palace," sent by him to the Council of Basel, and made cardinal in 1439. He wrote De conceptione dei parci Mariæ, libri viii. (Rome, 1547, ed. with preface and notes, by Dr. E. B. Pusey, Lond., 1869, etc.), and died at Rome, Sept. 1448. See LEBDER: Der spanische Cardinal Johann von Torquemada, sein Leben u. seine Schriften, Freiburg-im-Br., 1879. — II. Thomas de, the famous inquisitor, was b. at Valladolid, 1420; d. at Avila, Sept. 14, 1498. He belonged to the order of St. Dominic, and gave himself up wholly to the organization of the Spanish Inquisition, and overcame the scruples of Isabella. It was at the request of Ferdinand and herself that the "Holy Office" of the Inquisition was created by Sixtus IV., Nov. 1, 1479. When this Pope determined to appoint an inquisitor-general, the appointment fell on Torquemada (1482). The laws and methods of the Spanish Inquisition were his work. The laws appeared in Madrid, 1576, with the title Copilacion de las instrucciones del oficio de la santa inquisicion, hechas por el muy reverendo senor Fray Thomas de Torquemada, etc. It was due largely to him that the large sum offered by the Jews was not accepted by Ferdinand, and that they were expelled from Spain in 1492. Torquemada's name has become synonymous with cold-blooded cruelty. LONGfellow has a fine poem on the subject; and Prescott has given a picture of him in his Ferdinand and Isabel. See INQUISITION.

TÖSSANUS, Petrus (Pierre Toussaint), b. at Saint-Laurent, Lorraine, in 1499; d. at Limpel in Auvergne, 1573. He studied theology at Cologne, and later at Mainz, and became a Dominican. At first he was a zealous inquisitor of heretics, and captured several. But, after some time spent in prison, he was offered the archbishopric of Metz, which he declined, declaring that it was the Pope's power to appoint the cardinal. He was then made a canon at the Cathedral of Metz. But, when the perse-

TOULMIN, Joshua, D.D., English Unitarian; b. in London, May 11, 1740; d. at Birmingham, July 23, 1815. He was a Baptist minister at Taunton, 1763; but, becoming a Unitarian, he was one of Dr. Priestley's successors at Birmingham. He was the author of several books, of which may be mentioned, Memoirs of Faustus Socinus, London, 1777; Review of Life of John Biddle, 1789; History of the Town of Taunton, Taunton, 1781; Biographical Tribute to Dr. Priestley, London, 1809; Historical View of the Protestant Dissenters in England under King William, 1814; and edited, with Life, Neal's History of the Puritans, 1794-97, 5 vols., the basis of all subsequent editions.

TOULOUSE, Synods of. Many ecclesiastical councils have been held in Toulouse, some of which are important. At the suggestion of Louis, a synod was convened in Toulouse, probably in 829. The decrees are lost. One was held in 883 to adjust the complaint which Jews had made to King Carlmann, of being abused by clergy and laity. One in 1056, summoned by Pope Victor II., consisted of eighteen bishops, and passed thirteen canons forbidding simony, insisting upon the rule of celibacy, and placing the age of ordination to priests' orders at thirty, and to deacons' orders at twenty-five. The synod of 1118 was concerned with the inception of a crusade against the Moors in Spain. The synod which Pope Calixtus II. presided over in person reiterated the laws against simony, confirmed the right of the bishops to tithes, etc. The synod of 1161, at which the kings of France and England, and legates of Pope Alexander III. and his rival, Victor III., were present, declared Alexander pope, and pronounced excommunication upon Victor. The synod of 1210 forbade the conferment of offices upon heretics, and forbade all work upon church-festival days which are mentioned by name. The synod of 1220, in the pontificate of Gregory IX., is important. It obliged archbishops and bishops, or priests, and two or three laymen, to bind themselves by oath to search out heretics, and bring them to punishment. A heretic's house was to be destroyed. Penitent heretics were to be obliged to wear a cross on their right and left side, and might not receive an office until the Pope or his legate should at the purity of his faith. All men of fourteen years and over, and all women of twelve years and over, were to be required to deny all connection with heresy and heretics. This oath was to be repeated every two years. Laymen were also forbidden the possession of the Old and New Testament; and the suppression of vernacular translations was.cspe.

TOURS, Synods of. The first synod of Tours of which any account has been preserved convened in 401, passed thirteen canons re-affirming the decrees of former synods, forbidding priests to whom the privilege of marriage was accorded to marry widows, pronouncing excommunication upon priests who renounced their orders, etc. The synod of 567 met with the consent of King Charibert, and passed twenty-seven canons regulating matters of church-discipline. The synod of 818 was convened by the order of Charlemagne, and passed fifty-one canons defining the duties of bishops, putting the ordination of priests in their thirteenth year, regulating the relation of nuns and monks, forbidding markets on Sunday, etc. The canons close with a profession of absolute submission to Charlemagne. Another synod was held at the time the remains of St. Martin were conveyed from Auxerre to Tours,—either in 912 or 887. The synod of 942 is barely mentioned, and that of 1055 was convened with reference to the views of Berengar concerning the Lord's Supper, which had been condemned as heretical. Berengar on that occasion was excommunicated.

In 1090 the cardinal legate Stephen convened a synod at Tours, which concerned itself with the purchase and sale of church-offices, the licentiousness and concubinage of the clergy, etc. The council of 1096 was occupied with the release of King Philip of France from the ban of the church, and with the preparation for the first crusade. In 1163 Pope Alexander III. presided in person over a synod at Toulouse which excommunicated the antipope, Victor IV., and recognized his own claims. The synods of 1236 and 1282 were concerned with matters of church-discipline. The important synod of 1510 took up the great conflict which was then raging between Louis XI. of France and the belligerent Pope, Julius II. The chancellor of Louis opened the council with complaints against the Pope, and in the king's name presented several questions to the assembled dignitaries bearing upon the relations of states to the papal see. The law of concubinage was whether the Pope might carry on war against princes who with their lands acknowledge allegiance to the church. The synod answered that the Pope had no right to begin any such war. A second question con-

TOWIANSKY.

The series consisted of ninety tracts, of which Newman wrote six, of which ten were of a dogmatic character. The movement was essentially a revival of medieval ecclesiasticism and scholasticism, in protest to evangelicalism, and to that political liberalism which abolished the Test Act in 1828, and ten of the Irish bishops in 1833, whose occupants had voted against the Reform Bill. They endeared to the movement by John Keble's 'Christian Year,' 1827. Its real founder was Hugh James Rose. Its start was given by A. P. Peereceal's 'Christian Peace-Offering,' 1828. The object of this book was to show that the Anglican and Roman churches were essentially agreed. Even the Froude, who argued that the existing Roman Church had departed from the primitive faith, and so, in a less degree, had the Anglican Church, but that the teachings of the latter admitted of construction in the sense of the primitive church. He therefore urged the claims of celibacy, fasting, relics, and monasticism, and the tendency of the political movements of their time was directly against such a return of the middle age, the little coterie at Oxford published The Churchman's Manual (1833), in which they made prominent the three points of the idea of the church, the importance of the sacraments, and the significance of the political movements of their time was directly in protest to evangelicalism, and to the indorsers of the sentiments advocated. great pamphlet war was thus opened; but the Tractarians were defeated. In 1837 the Roman tendency of the movement more plainly manifested itself, especially in Isaac Williams’s tract (No. 80), On Resive in Communicating Religious Knowledge. It advocated a revival of the discipline and ceremonies of the Roman Church, i.e., the idea that there were doctrines which should not be publicly taught; and that the Bible should not be promiscuously circulated. Keble’s tracts were in similar strain. The effect of such writing was twofold, the public was dismayed, and certain members of the Tractarian party avowed their intention to become Romanists. In 1838 the Library of the Fathers (see Patristics) was started by the Tractarians, and in 1840 the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, which contained old High-Church writers of theChurch of England who more or less sympathized with the views of the Tractarians. But the deciding issue was the setting of the tide towards Rome, that Newman made a vigorous effort to turn it by his famous tract (No. 90), Remarks on Certain Passages in the Thirty-nine Articles, in which he endeavored to show how it was possible to interpret the Thirty-nine Articles in the interest of Catholicism. He maintained that “the sixth and twentieth articles, on Holy Scripture and the authority of the Church, were not inconsistent with the Anglo-Catholic idea; that the true rule of faith is not in Scripture alone, but in apostolic tradition; that Art. XI., on justification by faith only, did not exclude the doctrine of baptismal justification, and of justification by works as well; that Arts. XIX. and XXI., on the Catholic Church and general councils, did not mean that the true church is not infallible, but that the idea of express supernatural privilege, that councils properly called shall not err, lies beyond the scope of these articles, or at any rate beside their determination; that Art. XXII., on purgatory, pardons, images, relics, and invocation of saints, only condemned the Romanish doctrine concerning them, not any other doctrine on these subjects, consequently not the Anglo-Catholic; that Art. XXV. did not deny the truth of the sacraments of extreme unction, but sacraments, but only that they were not sacraments in the same sense as baptism and the Lord’s Supper; that Art. XXXIII. only condemned gross views of transubstantiation, not the mysterious presence of the body of Christ. The articles on masses and clerical celibacy were in like manner explained away” (Stoughton). The tract appeared in March, 1841: Newman acknowledged on the 16th. The violent controversy which the tract occasioned led to the “discontinuance” of the series.

The tract, although nominally an attempt to dissociate itself, was denounced as in reality leading towards it. Then came a sifting of the party. Those who were content to stay in the Church of England drew all the closer together. They were such men as Pusey, Williams, Keble, and Perceval. But soon the movement swept away from this middle position such leading spirits as Newby of the Anti-Tractarian or Militant Catholic. The unforeseen ending in 1851. Before 1853 not less than four hundred clergymen and laity had become Roman Catholics. They were “chiefly impressive under graduates, young ladies, and young ladies’ cousins” (Blunt). But the action of the Roman Church (October, 1850), in distributing England into twelve bishoprics, while it rendered that church more attractive, at the same time aroused the strong Protestant feeling, and doubtless checked many from going to Rome. For the present state of the tractarian movement, see art. Ritualism.

Tractarian Doctrine.—The fundamental doctrines concern the sacrament of the Eucharist, which is declared to be the means of salvation, and the church with the apostolical succession, which is the divinely appointed channel of saving grace through the Eucharist. Baptism regenerates, yet the baptized can fall from grace. In the Eucharist, the bread and wine truly, but in a heavenly and spiritual manner, become the body and blood of Christ; and the worthy communicant receives the same to his spiritual welfare and salvation, in remission of guilt and judgment. Because of the real presence of Christ, it is right to bow at the consecration of the elements; for one adores, not the elements, but Christ who is present in them. As regards the church as the means of salvation, founded by Christ, and perpetuated by the apostolical succession, she is the only channel of grace in Christ, she is the only dispenser of the means of grace, the only protector and witness to the truth, and the highest authority in matters of faith and life. As channel of the means of salvation, she constitutes the communion of saints. She is one—only, catholic, apostolic in origin and teaching. The three marks of the true church are apostolicity (through apostolic succession securing the validity, the sacraments, and the power of the keys), catholicity (through Scripture and tradition securing truth in doctrine and life), and autonomy (absolute independence of external authority in matters of faith and practice). By apostolic succession was meant that Jesus gave his spirit to the apostles, and they to those upon whom they laid their hands, who, in turn, possessed the power to impart the gift; and so it has come down to our day. With this idea is connected that of the priesthood as the instrumental bodies between Christ and the congregation, and so a sharp line is drawn between clergy and laity. The true church thus constituted is not an ideal, but a reality, an external and visible organization. The true visible church is the communion of saints, in which the Word is preached in its purity, the sacraments administered according to Christ’s ordinance, and discipline rightfully maintained. The invisible church is the household of God, in heaven and earth. The Rule of Faith is the Holy Scriptures and the Catholic tradition together.

As a theological school, Tractarianism is modern scholasticism. The realistic tendency of Tractarianism is plain. Justification, it teaches, is a real impartation of spiritual life through the sacraments; the true church is real, objective; truth is really objectively given; the gift of the Holy Spirit is really transmitted through the apostolical succession, which is present in the Eucharist, so also in worship. The external must have a real meaning: it must express some idea. A change was therefore made in the accessories of worship. Everywhere beauty is TRACT SOCIETIES, Religious. I. Great Britain.

—The maintenance and diffusion of religious opinion by means of pamphlets or tracts is a habit older than the invention of printing; and perhaps John Wyclif was the greatest tract-writer that ever lived. But it has been reserved to modern times to make full use of the same method. For, in the heart. And, further, it is required that the narratives in these tracts should be literally true. Fiction, it is held, has its becoming place in literature; but a tract, to win the highest usefulness, should deal with real personalities and actual experiences. Of the tracts produced under these conditions, there are now about 3,200 on the society's catalogue, from the single-page handbill to the important series of Present-day Tracts, in which some of the foremost scholars andthinkers of the day have employed their pens for the defence of the Christian faith. The tract circulation in the year 1882–83, in the English language alone, amounted to 33,249,800.

But, as has been already intimated, the work of the society now extends far beyond the production of tracts. The publication of Books was very gradually introduced, and the earliest attempts in this direction seem to have been better than the work of the Puritans.

long gave his editorial services to the society, the chief practical and experimental works of the English Reformers, and of their great successors in the seventeenth century, were issued most often in an abridged form. To the writings of Wicliff, Tyndale, Latimer, Becon, and many more who took part in the struggle against papal domination, were added the choicest works of Baxter, Howe, Owen, Flavel, Sibbes, Charnock, and a host of others, mostly abbreviated to suit the taste or the leisure of modern times. These writings had for a while a very large circulation, and contributed not a little to sustain among thoughtful readers the relic for the old English Protestant theology. Other publishers have since taken up the work, and the fashion of abridgments has passed away; so that in a great measure this part of the society's labor has been superseded. Besides preparing these editions, Mr. Stokes also wrote a considerable number of manuals on biblical history and antiquities in a form suited to young people and Sunday-school teachers; entering thus upon a wide field, which has since been largely occupied by the late Mr. J. Gurney, and other writers, and in some measure combining the characteristics of both of the commentators named. To this have from time to time been added other important works of biblical exposition, notably Leighton on St. Peter, and the American commentaries of Hodge on the Epistle to the Romans, and of Barnes on the Gospels (abridged). But the great work of the society in this special direction has been the Annotated Paragraph Bible, which after several years of careful preparation, enlisting the services of many eminent biblical critics of the day, appeared in 1831 under the direction of the late Mr. Joseph Gurney, treasurer of the society, who, besides providing all expenses of editorship, had the stereotype plates prepared at his own cost. This work has stood the test of thirty-two years; and, notwithstanding the more recent appearance of several important commentaries on Scripture, it still holds a high place in the esteem of competent judges. Bible dictionaries and concordances have also been issued by the society for many years, with companions and helps of different kinds, among which may be mentioned the Bible Handbook, by Dr. Angus, and the Handbook to the Grammar of the Greek Testament, by the author of the present article. In modern practical and devotional Christian literature, the work that has achieved the largest circulation, and probably the most extended usefulness, has been James's Anxious Enquirer; the society having circulated no fewer than 850,000 copies of this book in its several editions. Pike's Persuasives to Early Piety may also be mentioned as having formerly been very popular as a gift to the young. In the year 1819 the committee resolved to offer prizes to workmen for the best essays on sabbath observance. There were numerous competitors, and much was thus effected in awakening Christian thoughtfulness in our land in reference to a very important part of practical godliness. Prizes were also offered in 1850 for essays on the condition of the working-classes. The first was The Child's Companion, begun in 1824, and still teaching its attractive lessons to generation after generation of little ones. The Weekly Visitor (commenced in 1833) has sought to combine useful information with Christian teaching; but in 1852 the same work was undertaken by The Leisure Hour, with a higher standard of literary merit. The Sunday at Home attempts for the first time to meet the needs of the home, and to do so it has at its back, so to speak, a vast army of Christian men and women who are voluntarily engaged in circulating its publications, often accompanying the silent message with the living voice, and so in a twofold manner act the part of evangelists. Part of the constant work of the committee is to second and assist their efforts. Tracts are supplied in unstinted numbers to missionary efforts of every kind, for hospital and workhouse visitation, for emigrant numbers for mission work of every kind, for the success of these periodicals has surpassed the highest expectations of their promoters, and English-speaking boys and girls throughout the whole world welcome them as their own magazines. The circulation of the two together now amounts to about 350,000 of each number. The Tract Magazine and The Cottage and Artisan are also published by the society.

There are now in all some 10,000 separate publications on the catalogue of the society; and taking into account the books, tracts, and periodicals with illustrated cards, texts, and the like, the total issue of the society is about 38,583,000 copies, and the largest number in any year of the society's existence.

The Religious Tract Society is also a great Missionary Institution. For the furtherance of its highest purposes, the committee make every week large grants of tracts to distributors at home and abroad, either altogether gratuitously, or at a considerable reduction in price. One circumstance that contributes no little to its usefulness is, that it has at its back, so to speak, a vast army of Christian men and women who are voluntarily engaged in circulating its publications, often accompanying the silent message with the living voice, and so in a twofold manner acting the part of evangelists. Part of the constant work of the committee is to second and assist their efforts. Tracts are supplied in unstinted numbers to missionary efforts of every kind, for hospital and workhouse visitation, for emigrant numbers for mission work of every kind, and for settlers in our colonies all over the world. To a great extent, also, the circulation of the books published by the society is aided by the plans of the committee. Thus all pastors, and missionaries of all denominations, are permitted, in the first year of their ministry, to purchase these publications at a greatly reduced price. School and district libraries are furnished at a large reduction, and great facilities for purchase are allowed to Sunday-school teachers. In the efforts also to diffuse a Christian literature in foreign languages, the society is continually active, having representatives or correspondents in every country of Europe, and in all the chief mission-fields of the East and West. It publishes, or aids the publication of, tracts, books, and periodicals in as many as one hundred and sixty-six languages and dialects, and is, in fact, an auxiliary to every Protestant missionary society. The methods in which it acts are very various. Large money grants are made in aid of the publication-work of many missions. Gifts of printing-paper are voted for periodicals; electrotype illustrations are also freely given, or supplied at a low price; and grants of publications are made for gratuitous distribution. The societies and missions thus aided are naturally, for the most part, English; but those of the United States and of Germany to a large extent share also in the benefit. Important societies at Paris, Toulouse, Basel, Berlin, Hamburg, Gernsbach (Black Forest), Stockholm, Kristiania, and other places, carry on their several plans of publication and distribution; the London Tract Society being in various ways the helper of all.

To meet these varied claims, the society has to rely, first upon its benevolent income; the money it receives from subscriptions, donations, legacies, and collections, being applied, without any deduction whatever, to the missionary work of the society. But these furnish less than half what is actually expended, the remainder being supplied from trade profits after the payment of all expenses. The benevolent income for the year 1882-83 has amounted to £14,824 sterling, to which sum £25,574 have been added from the profits on sales, and £11,403 from the part payments of the individuals and societies receiving grants; making a grand total of £51,801 spent in the missionary work of the society.

These details respecting one institution, the largest of the kind in Great Britain, will illustrate the working of other societies that have a similar end in view, but work either in denominational channels, or in a more restricted way. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, founded in 1698, is wholly connected with the Church of England, and publishes yearly a vast amount of popular literature, reporting an issue, for the year 1881-82, of 8,325,091. The Wesleyans and the Baptists have also special organizations for tract-work. Christian workers connected with Mildmay Park in London, and various sections of Plymouth Brethren, publish many tracts. The Monthly Tract Society (founded 1837), and the Weekly Tract Society (1847), publish and issue each a tract periodically, to subscribers and others, chiefly through the post office. The Pure Literature Society (1854) prepares and circulates lists of books judged suitable for reading and distribution. And, in addition to all these, the private ventures of able tract-writers make no inconsiderable addition to this class of literature; the Rt. Rev. Dr. Ryle, Bishop of Liverpool, and the Rev. F. B. Power, being especially noteworthy.

In Scotland, the Scottish and Book Society devotes itself rather to distribution than to publication, employing a large number of colporters with marked success; while the Stirling Tracts, at first prepared and printed by the private enterprise of the late Mr. Peter Drummond, a wealthy seed-merchant in that town, but now conducted by a committee, and entitled "The Stirling Tract Enterprise," are circulated by millions. A Dublin Tract and Book Repository was, until lately, carried on with a special view to Ireland; but the work for that country is now chiefly in the hands of the London and Scottish societies. Many publishers in Europe and in Scotland find it remunerative to publish "leaflets"—miniature tracts—or single hymns, chiefly for enclosure in letters. A vast circulation is thus secured in the correspondence of relatives and friends, and much good is accomplished in a quiet way, of which no statistics can be given. The power of the press, indeed, only begins to be understood as a means of countering error, of diffusing truth, and, in the largest sense of the phrase, of preaching Christ's gospel.

The Jubilee Manual for the Work of the Religious Tract Society, by Mr. William Jones (London, 8vo, 1850), contains in full detail the history of this institution for the first fifty years of its existence, and abounds in valuable information respecting the methods and results of tract-distribution in the earlier days of the enterprise. It is still the standard volume on the subject. The yearly reports of the various societies mentioned above must be studied to complete the details, and to bring them down to the present time.

[There are also tract societies supported by all branches of the Protestant Church in Paris, Lausanne, Toulouse, Brussels, Geneva, and other Continental cities.]

II. United States.—The word "tract" was used by old English writers as nearly equivalent to "treatise," and was often applied to volumes, as well as to pamphlets of a few pages only, and on any subject,—scientific, political, reformatory, etc. The Scriptures themselves are a series of tracts. In our own time, though the word "tract" may still cover the same extent of meaning, in common parlance it is understood to denote a short religious appeal or pamphlet, and tract-societies are voluntary associations of Christians to publish and circulate religious tracts, volumes included.

The importance of adding to the influence of spoken truth the permanent effectiveness of the printed page was early felt by Christians. What a good book can do, and how its influence may germinate and perpetuate itself, is well shown in the familiar history of Baxter's conversion, aided by reading Dr. Gibb's book, The Bruised Reed, and Baxter's instrumentality in the conversion of Doddridge, by whose Rise and Progress Wilberforce was led to the truth, into which his Practical Piety, in turn, was guided. Legg also, the father of the tracts that have brought multitudes to Christ. It was evident that such good might be wrought by short, condensed, earnest, and striking tracts; and efforts were early made by individuals to furnish these cheaply in such forms and numbers that they could be widely diffused; and the wisdom of associated efforts to this end was soon apparent. Hence sprang up various local tract societies, as in New England, Albany, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. One of the first of these was The Massachusetts Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, Boston, 1808. The Connecticut Religious Tract Society, Hartford, was formed in 1807; The Vermont Religious Tract Society, in 1808. In 1812 The New-York Religious Tract Society arose, and in 1814 The New-England Tract Society, Andover, which was afterwards transferred to Boston, and in 1823 changed its name to The American Tract Society. But the friends of this form of Christian activity were so convinced that it could only be carried on prudently and effectively by a national association centrally located, and securing the confidence and support of evangelical Christians of all denominations. Hence originated, in May, 1825, The American Tract Society, New York; the Christians of this city leading off in the organization, and the society at Boston and the Christian public joining it. A building was provided for the manufacture and sale of its publications, and the tracts of the Boston society were transferred to New York. The movement gained general approval, and rapidly expanded, and took rank with the Bible Society among the chief undenominational Christian charities of the nation.

After two years, volumes began to be published in addition to unbound tracts. Handbills, leaflets, children's tracts, illustrated cards, wall-rolls, etc., followed in quick succession; publications in German, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Swedish, Danish, Welsh, and Dutch; publications for all ages and classes, and treating upon all ordinary phases of truth and duty, to meet every variety of religious want. In 1843 the publication of periodicals commenced, the number increasing at intervals to supply the Sabbath school and the family, in English and in German. Many of these various publications were beautifully illustrated; and in excellence of contents, and attractiveness of style, were unsurpassed by many, and a stimulus and model to many.

For the circulation of its publications, the Society has depositories in Boston, Philadelphia, Rochester, Cincinnati, Chicago, and San Francisco, supplied from the Tract House at New York, and sold at uniform prices. It sells also largely through the trade. So far as its means allow, it furnishes its publications gratuitously, or at reduced prices, in aid of ministers, life-members, missionaries, chaplains, and lay Christians engaged in efforts to reform and save; and these go to soldiers and sailors, to freedmen and immigrants, to hospitals, prisons, and asylums, to poor Sabbath schools, to the destitute and neglected in our cities and on our wide frontiers. In many places it has employed the services of local auxiliaries, for systematic tract-distribution, by voluntary Christians making a monthly visit to each house, or canvassing the whole region, to leave a well-chosen volume, or give a tract. For the vast population outside of church care it has employed numerous colporteurs, going from house to house, supplying some of its publications to all, if possible, by sale or grant, conversing with the families, holding meetings for prayer, and organizing Sabbath schools. This system of union missionary colportage this Society originated for this country, sending godly and faithful men to the destitute wherever found,—on our vast and rapidly-advancing frontiers, to the freedmen and to the immigrants. The wisdom, necessity, and efficiency of the plan, are so evident, that the Christian public recognized it as an essential part of national evangelization. It rapidly expanded, and has accomplished a vast work that could not have been done by any church organization. In its forty-two years it has performed the equivalent of some 5,500 years' labor for one man, has made 12,000,000 family visits, has sold or granted 14,000,000 volumes, and led to the organization of very many Sabbath schools and churches.

For the direction of its operations, the Society has an executive committee composed of a publishing, distributing, and finance committee of six members each; and the undenominational character of its issues and all its work is assured by the election of men representing at least six different denominations, whose action in the publishing committee must be unanimous. There are three secretaries (each at the head of a distinct department), a treasurer, a business-agent, editors, and a depository. The Tract House is furnished with facilities for appraising, stereotyping, printing, binding, and issuing its books, tracts, and papers, including tens of thousands of stereotype-plates and engravings. The whole cost of the manufacture of its issues and of the administration of its business is defrayed by the sales. But for its benevolent work of grants and colportage, it is dependent on its friends; and to this work all gifts and legacies not donated for special purposes are devoted without abatement. These "benevolent" moneys are the voluntary annual gifts of its friends, in many cases coming regularly and unsolicited; in others it is found necessary to call upon them individually, or by public appeals in each church, and subsequent collections,—a service requiring the employment of several district secretaries, or collecting agents, who are also, in some of the fields, superintendents of colportage.

The foreign work of the Society is mainly carried on by the aid of missionaries at seventy different stations in the nominally Christian, Mohammedan, and heathen world. At the principal mission-centres, committees are formed, each member representing one of the several denominations there laboring, and these prepare and recommend the tracts proper for publication by this Society; and to these undenominational and soul-saving books the annual grants of the Society are devoted. These grants are everywhere highly prized. They have amounted in fifty-eight years (1863) to $646,000, besides many thousands in engravings, books, and other helps. Many valuable books also have been printed at the Tract House, for the sole use of foreign missions,—in Armenian, Hawaiian, Zulu, Grebo, etc. The Society has printed more or less, at home and abroad, in 146 languages and dialects, and at foreign stations 4,340 different publications, including 694 volumes,—a work which has borne a very considerable part in conquering heathendom for Christ.

The issues of the Society from its home presses,—numbering 6,071, of which 1,481 are volumes,—have amounted in fifty-eight years to nearly 29,000,000 volumes and 409,000,000 tracts.

Of its periodicals, which are now seven in number,—The Illustrated Christian Weekly and Deutscher Volksfreund, The American Messenger and its companion family monthly in German, and two monthly and one weekly children's papers, finely illustrated,—the total issue for one year is about 4,500,000 copies.

The American Tract Society, Boston, in 1858 resumed for some years its separate organization and work, chiefly for greater freedom of action respecting slavery, but since 1878 again co-operates with the National Society. The Western Tract and Book Society of Cincinnati also co-operates with the Society at New York.

TRADITION. It is a fact, that, for a long time, oral tradition was the only source from which the Christian faith drew its living waters. Congregations were fortified in foreign countries by direct appeal to the Bible, but the same was not the case in the United States, where the Bible was not familiar to the minds of the people; but paper and ink had nothing to do with the affair. Independent of the fragmentary notices from the hands of the apostles, which circulated among the congregations, but made no claims on completeness, either with respect to history or doctrine (John xxi. 20), the fulness of the faith lived on, and in the mouth of the missionary. It was an oral tradition which linked an Ignatius, a Papias, a Polycarp, to the apostolic church; and yet their testimony was accepted without doubt as authoritative. There soon came a time, however, when the state of affairs began to change. When the voices of the apostles and of the disciples of the apostles grew silent, and the proofs of the genuineness of tradition demanded some power of discrimination, while at the same time an idea sprung up of the overwhelming grandeur of the part which Christianity was destined to play on earth, it was quite natural that tradition should retire to the background, and more prominence be given to the written documents from the apostolic age. When, about 200, the canon was fixed, it seemed probable, that, within a short time, the writings of the New Testament should become not only the best guaranteed, but even the sole legitimate, source of Christian knowledge.

But just at that very moment circumstances gave to tradition a new significance. Christianity, not yet politically established, but fighting its way through the antagonism of Paganism, had to encounter first and most formidable rival, Gnosticism. It was the pretensions of the Gnostics which had compelled the Christian Church to fix her canon; and it was now discovered that the apostolic writings, upon which also the Gnostics proposed to take their stand, were insufficient to decide the contest, since they could be interpreted in one way by the catholics and in another by the heretics. In this emergency, tradition was caught at as a saving reed; Tertullian says, "About the single passages of Scripture there can be different opinions, but not about the totality of its contents, that which the apostles have deposited in the church as the fulness of all truth, and which has been preserved in the church by the succession of bishops." Tertullian goes still farther, transferring the idea of prescription from the material to the spiritual, from the legal to the religious sphere. As the heretics, he says, reject some of the books of Scripture, and distort the rest by their false interpretation, the first question is, From whom originated the Scriptures, for whom were they intended, by whom have they been preserved, etc.? The answer must be, From the Christians, for the Christians, by the Christians, etc. Consequently, where we find Christian faith and Christian life, there we may seek for the true Scriptures and their true interpretation; while the heretics, by the very law of prescription, are excluded from forming any legitimate opinion. Thus, in the tradition of the sedes apostolicae, people believed they had found an unconquerable weapon against all heresy, not yet surmising that in reality they had found a magical formula by which any thing could be conjured up from the obscurity of an oral tradition which even though all scriptural testimony were lacking.

It took some time, however, before the idea be...
TRADITION.

However aptly the rules of the Commonitorium were formulated, they were, nevertheless, hardly able to take hold of the course of development, if the idea whose practical organ they were had not happened to find another and more potent agency. But, such as the actual circumstances were, the tradition found in the ecumenical councils, not only a natural ally, but its necessary organ. After the Council of Nicaea (325), all duly convened synods were, in accordance with Acts xvi. 28, considered as standing under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, as inspired: their decrees were infallible. But as the universitas, that is the general acceptance throughout the church, was the only guaranty of their infallibility, they appeared as the true twin-brother of the tradition: indeed, their true object was to manufacture tradition. No wonder, then, that the seventh ecumenical council (Nicaea, 787) laid its anathema on any one who should dare to reject the tradition of the church, be it oral or written tradition; and this obstinacy continued the condemnation. From that moment, tradition, so to speak, flooded the church, carrying along with it every thing,—dogmas, constitutions, etc. Theoretically Scripture and tradition were co-ordinated. But practically it is generally the case, when two principles are placed in competition, that one of them bears the ascendancy; and before long even the most prominent theologians began to argue exclusively from tradition, referring to Scripture only in order to find confirmatory passages. All original productivity ceased, and was supplanted by the compiler's industry, digging in all the corners of the Fathers and the councils, and trusting itself to do nothing above a slight rearrangement of the materials. In the East this whole movement reached its consummation in John of Damascus. In the West it was still continued for several centuries on account of a somewhat different idea of inspiration, according to which, not only the Fathers and the ecumenical councils were inspired, but also the Pope and the great doctors, and the mystics and the monks, in short, the whole church. Abelard's Sic et non fell flat to the ground, with no more effect in the East than the works of Stephanus Gobarus in the West; and as all who felt the need of reform, and were consequently compelled to seek aid from tradition. It was, indeed, by claiming to be possessed of the true ancient interpretation of certain passages of Scripture, that the orthodox succeeded in overthrowing Arius at Nicæa; and doctrinal tradition was thus introduced under the guise of exegetical tradition. But the mask was soon thrown off. In the East the doctrine of a secret apostolical tradition, from which the master theologians drew their wisdom, was first developed by the three Cappadocians. Basil the Great says in a passage, De Spiritu Sancto, 27 (which, however, is much contested), that Christian theology is derived partly from Scripture, and partly from a secret apostolical tradition, both of which have equal authority; and on the basis of this proposition he develops his doctrine of the Holy Spirit. In the West it was Vincentius of Lirinum who gave the final definition of the idea of true tradition. In his Commonitorium occurs the famous passage, Magnopere curandum est, ut id teneamus, quod ubique, quoniam si non securum sit ut sine aliqua dubitatione, fidei norma est. He must be sure that we hold that which has been believed everywhere, always, and by all.

according to the various circumstances of its application. But who was to decide on such a question? The Pope. The universality of tradition, established by the complete representation of the church in the ecumenical councils, was suspended by its tradition and confined by the verdict of the Chair of Peter. This conception, however, did not appear fully developed until after the breach between the Roman-Catholic Church and the Reformation had taken place. Luther's opposition to tradition became one of principle as early as 1520, and in 1522 he declared that tradition could be tolerated only so far as it was in perfect harmony with Scripture. Over against this principle of Scripture being the highest, the absolute authority, which was carried out with still greater rigorosity by the Reformed Church, the Council of Trent placed the declaration (April 8, 1546), that there were two sources of Christian knowledge, Scripture and tradition, and that the interpretation of Scripture had to be regulated by tradition; which, however, simply meant the Pope. The arguments on both sides are fully set forth in Martin Chemnitz (Examen concilii Tridentini, 1545-73), and St. Dei (1581). Within the Protestant camp, however, various movements have been made in favor of tradition,—by Lessing, Delbrück, and Daniel in Germany; by Pusey and the Tractarians in England; and by N. F. S. Grundtvig in Denmark.

TRADUCIANISM. See Creationism.

TRAJAN (Marcus Ulpius Trajanus), emperor of Rome (98-117), was, no doubt, one of the best rulers of the Roman Empire, and a sincere, mild, even benevolent character. Nevertheless, he was the emperor who issued a decree against the Christians. He made persecution of Christianity legal. The occasion was the appointment of the youngest governor of Bithynia. In the East, Christianity numbered many more adherents than in the West. In the great cities, more than one-half of the inhabitants were Christians; and the Pagan temples began to be left empty and almost desolate. Pliny noticed it with alarm, and in lack of any thing better he determined to apply the laws against secret societies to the case. But the accusations were so numerous, and the results of the legal proceedings so unsatisfactory, that he felt obliged to address the emperor himself for instruction. Trajan's answer is very characteristic. It forbids to search after suspected persons, to pay any regard to anonymous accusations, etc., and it grants full forgiveness to those who repent and abjure; but it also authorizes the punishment of such as are convicted and will not retract. As a consequence of this rescript, the general position of the Christians was very insecure, not to say dangerous. Among those who actually suffered under it were Simeon of Jerusalem, and Ignatius of Antioch. See the Epistles of Pliny, book x. (Bohn's ed., Lond., 1875), and his panegyric of Trajan.

TRANSCENDENTALISM IN NEW ENGLAND. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, a strong re-action took place against materialism. As philosophy, it began in Germany. Voltaire brought from London to Paris the ideas of Hume. From Paris they went with him to the court of Frederick, King of Prussia, and then, as a practical reform, subjected them to searching analysis in his famous work, the Kritik of Pure Reason, published in 1771, and became the leader in a great philosophical reform. Materialism took no deep root in the German mind. The great names in German idealism are Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel; and the sequence of their doctrine, so far as it can be conveyed in very few words, is as follows: Kant sounded the depths of the human mind; Fichte imparted reality to the idea of the human person; Schelling combined the inward and the outward by supposing an Absolute, which he called reason; Hegel transformed what was to him the unsubstantial reason into a being, thus completing, as is claimed, the fundamental "categories" of Kant. The word "transcendentalism" is of Kantian origin. It means that which is valid beyond the experience of the senses, though present in the human mind. It describes a form of idealism. In the judgment of Dr. J. H. Stirling, "The transcendental philosophy is a philosophy of the merely speculative pure reason; for all moral practice, so far as it involves motive, refers to feeling, and feeling is always of empirical origin." Again: "I call all cognition transcendent which is occupied not so much with objects as with the process by which we come to know them, in so far as that process has an a priori element. A system of such elements would be a transcendental philosophy."

In France, materialism was represented by Condillac, Cabanis (author of the saying that "brain secretes thought, as the liver secretes bile"), and others; idealism, by Maine de Biran, Destutt de Tracy, Cousin, Jouvrey, and others.

In England, not to mention the poets, who were always idealists, Coleridge reflected Schelling; and Carlyle, Goethe and R. D. Hill. The Age of Reason was eagerly read in America.

In the East, Christianity numbered many more adherents than in the West. In the great cities, more than one-half of the inhabitants were Christians; and the Pagan temples began to be left empty and almost desolate. Pliny noticed it with alarm, and in lack of any thing better he determined to apply the laws against secret societies to the case. But the accusations were so numerous, and the results of the legal proceedings so unsatisfactory, that he felt obliged to address the emperor himself for instruction. Trajan's answer is very characteristic. It forbids to search after suspected persons, to pay any regard to anonymous accusations, etc.; it grants full forgiveness to those who repent and abjure; but it also authorizes the punishment of such as are convicted and will not retract. As a consequence of this rescript, the general position of the Christians was very insecure, not to say dangerous. Among those who actually suffered under it were Simeon of Jerusalem, and Ignatius of Antioch. See the Epistles of Pliny, book x. (Bohn's ed., Lond., 1875), and his panegyric of Trajan.

they had brought with them from the faith they had left; but the new society did not share the orthodoxy of the meeting. A spirit of innovation was in the air, running occasionally into deism and atheism. In 1832 Abner Kenfield founded The Investigator: in 1836 he was prosecuted for blasphemy. There was great interest in clairvoyance, mesmerism, and kindred doctrines. As early as 1833, Theodore Weld of the Newbury reviser (in the Christian Examiner for November) against the materialism implied in phrenology, which even then was getting possession of the public mind. There was a rage for the exhibitions of Gall. The popular lectures of Spurzheim were attended by crowds. Later, Combe's book on the Constitution of Man was hailed as a gospel.

Regeneration by bread was proclaimed in the name of Graham. Every kind of medicament was called in to do the work of the Holy Spirit.

At this juncture, idealism appeared in the shape of a protest against the drift of the time towards animalism and externalism. The soil was prepared by orthodox mystics, who proclaimed "the life of God in the soul of man," by the spiritualism taught by Jonathan Edwards; by the Reformed Quakers, with their doctrine of an all-soul-freedom. Not that the positions taken by these men and women were the same as those of the transcendentalists, not merely took no pains to correct the impression, but rather gave it emphasis; for this term was supposed to carry with it ridicule or opprobrium. The meetings were fitful, and hastily pre-arranged. In ten years there were scarcely more than as many convocations. Some members remained in the church, attempting to combine transcendental ideas with ecclesiastical forms; others left the church for other vocations. Each followed the leading of the individual disposition.

Some of these projects were wild, visionary, and, not unlikely that they owed their origin to the transcendentalists. They were not: they were quite different. Indeed, they were precisely opposite; for these all recognized some supernatural authority, whereas the transcendentalists as a class were pure "naturalists," believers in the inspiration of the individual soul; but they looked only at apparent results, disregarding adjacent beliefs. The leaders were young men, almost without exception, educated for the ministry, Unitarians, members of the best class in society, eloquent speakers and talkers, scholars, men of national culture, outspoken in the declaration of their opinions. Of these Ralph Waldo Emerson was chief, most seraphic and persuasive, most uncompromising, too, in his ecclesiastical action. He resigned his charge in 1832, from scruples in regard to the "communion-service," which he regarded as a spiritual rite, and was willing to continue as such, not as an ordinance imposed by church or Scripture. Later, he was unwilling to offer public prayer, and retired from the pulpit altogether, making the secular platform his sole visible elevation above the multitude,—an elevation not of authority, but of convenience.

A few young men gathered round him. In September of 1836, on the day of the celebration of the foundation of Harvard College, four persons—Emerson, Hedge, Ripley, and Putnam—met together in Cambridge, and, after discussing the theological and ecclesiastical situation, agreed to call a meeting of a few like-minded men, with a view to strengthen each other in their opposition to the old way, and see what could be done to inaugurate a better. At a preliminary meeting at the house of George Ripley, in Boston, there were present Emerson, Hedge, Alcott, Bartol, Brownson, Bartlett (a young tutor at Cambridge). The meeting was attended, with the exception of Emerson, to hold a convention at his house in Concord during that same month of September.

Invitations were sent to as many as were known or supposed to be in sympathy with the objects of the meeting. Among them, W. H. Channing, J. S. Dwight, J. F. Clarke, Ephraim Peabody, Chandler Robbins, George P. Bradford, Mrs. Samuel Ripley, Margaret Fuller, Elizabeth Peabody, perhaps Theodore Parker. Convers Francis and Caleb Stetson were the older generation who took a practical interest in the movement. Dr. Channing was in sympathy with its general aims, but did not show himself. His contemporaries either did not appear, or immediately withdrew. The public got intelligence of the Concord meeting, and gave to the little fellowship the name of the "Transcendental Club," why, it is not easy to discover; for a club it was not in any proper sense of the word. There was no organization, there were no officers, there was no stated time or place of assembling, there were no topics for discussion: in fact, there appears no good reason for calling it "transcendental," unless that term was supposed to carry with it ridicule or opprobrium. The meetings were fitful, and hastily pre-arranged. In ten years there were scarcely more than as many convocations. Some members remained in the church, attempting to combine transcendental ideas with ecclesiastical forms; others left the church for other vocations. Each followed the leading of the individual disposition.

The short lived Dial and the shorter lived Massachusetts Quarterly were results of the "transcendental" spirit.

At the time when the transcendental movement was at its height, the atmosphere of New England was filled with projects of reform. Every kind of innovation on existing social arrangements had its advocate, its newspaper, its meetings, its convention. Temperance, non-resistance, woman's rights, antislavery, peace, claimed attention from those concerned for the progress of mankind.

Some of these projects were wild, visionary, and, in the eyes of cool observers, grotesque. It is not unlikely that they owed their origin to the same impulse which produced transcendentalism, though the historical and logical connection has not been discovered. That a large part of the ridicule which was vented on the transcendentalists was owing to their presumed affiliation with these summary iconoclasts is more than probable. Nor was such a presumption unreasonable; for the transcendentalists not merely took no pains to correct the impression, but rather gave it encouragement. In 1840 The Friends of Universal Progress held conventions in Charlestown. Emerson, who was present, gave an account of the meetings in the Dial. He wrote:—

"The singularity and latitude of the summons drew together from all parts of New England and also from the Middle States, men of every shade of opinion, from the straitest orthodoxy to the wild heresy, and many persons whose church was a church of one member only. A great variety of dialect and of costume was noticed. A great deal of confusion, eccentricity, and fact appeared, as well as of zeal and enthusiasm. . . . Madmen, madwomen, men with beards, Dunkers, Muggletonians, Cone-outers, Groasers, Agrarians, Seventh-day Baptists, Abolitionists, Calvinists, Unitarians, and philosophers, all came successively to the top, and seized their moment, if not their hour, to pray, or preach, or protest. . . . If there was not par-Emerson's lecture on Man the Reformer was an eloquent outburst of society. "One day all men will be lovers, and every calumny will be dissolved in the universal sunshine." In his lecture on The Times, delivered the same year (1841), he says, —

"These reformers are our contemporaries; they are ourselves, our own light and sight and conscience; they only name the relation which subsists between us and the vicious institutions which they go to rectify. . . . The reforms have their high origin in an ideal justice; but they do not retain the purity of an idea. . . . The reforming movement is sacred in its origin; in its management and details, timid and profane. These benefactors hope to raise men by imposing upon their circumstances; by combination of that which is dead, they hope to make something alive. In vain. By new infusions, alone, of the spirit by which he is made and directed, can he be redeemed and re-enforced."

But the general public took no notice of the distinction between regeneration and reform: the great body of transcendentalists did not, as the experiment of Brook Farm bore witness. The interest of the transcendentalists in reformers was, in part at least, due to the principle of sympathy, which made them desirous of extending to others the liberty they claimed for themselves, —a feeling that may have led them to extremes in the direction of promiscuousness of advocacy, but saved them from practical license.

The moral tendencies of transcendentalism were what might have been expected from its individualism. But the theories were bolder than the actions. Mr. Emerson, in his essay on Self-Reliance, said,—

"I would write on the lintels of the doorpost, Whim. I hope it is somewhat better than whim at last, but we cannot spend the day in explanation. . . . The idlest revery, the faintest native emotion, command my curiosity and respect."

Yet no lofter, purer man ever lived than Ralph Waldo Emerson. Certain theoretical implications may have, to vulgar eyes, looked towards "free love;" but their authors were men of cleanest life.

In religion the typical transcendentalist might be a sublimated theist: he was not, in any accepted sense, a Christian. He believed in no devil, in no hell, in no evil, in no dualism of any sort, in no spiritual authority, in no Saviour, in no spiritual life, and can be easily ascended, on foot or on horseback, in an hour. It is often mentioned in the Old Testament (Judg. iv. 6, 14, viii. 18; Ps. lxxix. 12; Jer. xlvi. 18), though nowhere in the New Testament. The tradition that Tabor is the mount of transfiguration is in dispute. Three mountains have been named.

(a) Mount Olivet. This rests on the earliest tradition (in the Itiner. Burdig., A.D. 338), but is inconsistent with the context, as Christ was in Galilee before and after the event, and a journey to Judea in the intervening time could not have been left unnoticed. The mountain must be sought in the province of Galilee.

(b) Mount Tabor (the †Taβωρ of the Septuagint, the Jebel et-Tur of the Arabs), an isolated, beautiful dome-shaped mountain, wholly of limestone, on the southern border of Galilee, on the plain of Esdraelon, about eighteen hundred feet above the sea.1

Incidental extravagances, its influence was noble, and the idealism which was the essence of it is the foundation of all spiritual belief. As one form of the great intuitive school of philosophy, it has, perhaps, seen its best days; but its elements will render vital other faiths, which will endure when it is forgotten. [O. B. Frothingham: Transcendentalism in New England, a History. New York, 1876.] O. B. Frothingham.

TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. xvii. 1—13; Mark ix. 2—13; Luke ix. 28—36). The transfiguration is that extraordinary episode in Christ's earthly life which anticipated his future state of glory just before he entered the path of suffering, according to his own prediction (comp. Matt. xvi. 21—28; Mark viii. 31—38; Luke ix. 21—27). It marks the culminating point in his public ministry, and stands midway between the temptation in the wilderness and the agony in Gethsemane. It is recorded, with slight variations, by all the evangelists except John, who omits this, and many other events and miracles, as being already known from the popular gospel tradition. It is also alluded to long afterwards by Peter, as an eye-witness of the transcendent majesty of the scene (2 Pet. i. 16—18).

1. The place mentioned by the synoptists is "an high mountain" (δύστροφος). Peter calls it "the holy mountain" (?) in Pet. i. 18, from which we may infer that it was well known, and had acquired a halo of glory from the event. The Lord was wont to withdraw to a mountain for prayer (Matt. xiv. 23; Luke xxi. 37; John vi. 15); and several of the greatest events in the history of revelation, from the legislation on Mount Sinai to the ascension from Mount Olivet, took place on mountains. But the particular mount of transfiguration is in dispute.

Yet no loftier, purer man ever lived than Ralph Waldo Emerson. Certain theoretical implications may have, to vulgar eyes, looked towards "free love;" but their authors were men of cleanest life. The moral tendencies of transcendentalism were what might have been expected from its individualism. But the theories were bolder than the actions. Mr. Emerson, in his essay on Self-Reliance, said, —

"I would write on the lintels of the doorpost, Whim. I hope it is somewhat better than whim at last, but we cannot spend the day in explanation. . . . The idlest revery, the faintest native emotion, command my curiosity and respect."

In religion the typical transcendentalist might be a sublimated theist: he was not, in any accepted sense, a Christian. He believed in no devil, in no hell, in no evil, in no dualism of any kind, in no spiritual authority, in no Saviour, in no church. He was humanitarian and optimist. His faith had no backward look: its essence was aspiration, not contrition. His regard was fixed on the individual soul. Very remarkable was his confidence in nature, in natural powers and capabilities, in the results of obedience to natural law, in spontaneity, impulse, unfolding, growth. His love of childhood, flowers, landscape, was proverbial. Emerson called transcendentalism "excess of faith." But the faith was in human nature as a possible realization of the divine.

At present there is a vehement re-action against transcendentalism, partly from the quarter of the materialists, and partly from the quarter of the supernaturalists. But, except for a few local and to build,—one for his Lord, one for Moses, one for Elijah, forgetting himself and the two other disciples, and "not knowing what he said," in his dreamy state of mind. He also gave the name Το Θαυμαστευον to the festival of the transfiguration in the Greek Church. There is a poetic fitness in this tradition. No mountain in Palestine was by nature better suited for the event than Tabor. It lies in the very centre of the country, and commands from its flattened summit one of the finest views in Palestine. The central location and view, it may be called the Rigi of Palestine.

But two arguments may be urged against this view, which make it at least very doubtful. (1) The fact that the summit of Tabor was occupied by a city with suburbs of the same name (1 Chron. vi. 77), and was employed without interruption, between the times of Antiochus the Great (218 B.C.) and the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), as a fortification, and hence unfit for quiet seclusion and meditation. See Polybius, V. 70, 6; Josephus, Ant., XIV. 6, 3; Bell. Jud., I. 8, 7, II. 20, 6, IV. 1, 8. (2) The time of the transfiguration, which occurred only "six days" (Matthew vii. 1), Mark ix. 2; or, more indefinitely, σεξ ἡμέραις ὑπὲρ τοῦ, Luke ii. 28) after the confession of Peter at Cæsarea Philippi. The three favorite disciples were the sole witnesses of the scene, as they were also of the raising of Jairus' daughter, and of the agony of Christ in Gethsemane. Peter alludes to the event in his Second Epistle. John, the bosom-friend of Jesus, probably had in view this, among other manifestations of his glory, when he testified, "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (John i. 14). And his brother James, as the precursor among the apostles, when the first to follow him to the fulfillment of which the transfiguration was a forerunner, and a sure pledge. 4. The event itself. The transfiguration, or transformation, consisted in a visible manifestation and effulgence of the inner glory of Christ's person, accompanied by an audible voice from heaven, declaring him to be the Son of God, with...

whom the Father is well pleased. The expression used by Matthew and Mark is that the Lord was metamorphosēd (μεταμορφωθηκεν). Luke, who wrote for Gentile readers, avoids this expression, and simply states “that the fashion of his countenance was altered.” But it was not only his countenance which shone in supernatural splendor: even “his raiment was white and glistening.” Or as Mark, borrowing one image from nature, and another from man’s art, says, it “became shining, exceeding white as snow, such as no fuller on earth can whiten them.” This is one of those incidental picturesque touches, not infrequent in Mark, which betray the report of an eye-witness, and may be traced to a communication from Peter (comp. 2 Pet. i. 18). We have analogies in Scripture which may be used as illustrations. When Moses returned from the presence of Jehovah on Mount Sinai, the skin of his face shone (Exod. xxxiv. 29-30), which circumstance Hilary calls a figure of the transfiguration. Stephen’s face, in view of his martyrdom, shone like the face of an angel (Acts vii. 54). The human countenance is often lighted up by joy; and the peace and blessedness of the soul, in moments of festive elevation, shine through it as through a mirror.

In the case of Christ, the transfiguration was the manifestation and anticipation of the heavenly estate of glory, which was concealed under the veil of his humanity in the state of humiliation. The cloud which overshadowed him was bright, or light-like, luminous (απέπνευσεν), of the same kind as the cloud at the ascension, or the clouds of heaven at the second advent of Christ (Matt. xxv. 30; Mark xiii. 26; Luke xx. 27), and symbolized the presence of God (Exod. xiv. 19, xix. 16; Isa. xix. 1; Dan. vii. 13).

5. Different Explanations.—The event is described as a vision (σκόπη, Matt. xvii. 9). This does not exclude its objective reality: it only places it above the sphere of sense and ordinary consciousness. It was partly an objective appearance, partly a spiritual vision. The apostles saw the scene “in spirit” (ἐν νοησίᾳ, as distinct from ἐν όψιν; comp. Acts x. 10; 1 Cor. xiv. 15; Rev. i. 10). They were in an ecstatic “state of supernatural trance,” so to speak, “heavy with sleep,” yet “keeping themselves awake throughout.” And Peter did “not know what he said,” being only half conscious, overawed with fear and wonder, delighted so as to hold fast this goodly state, yet “sore afraid.”

(a) The older orthodox commentators and divines describe the transfiguration as an outward, visible manifestation. Some suppose that Moses and Elijah appeared in their own bodies; others, that Moses, not yet having risen, assumed a foreign body resembling his former body (so Aquinas).

(b) The rationalists resolve the transfiguration into a dream, or a meeting of Jesus with two secret disciples.

(c) Strauss presents it as a pure myth, a poetical imitation of the transfiguration of Moses (Exod. xxiv. 1, xxxiv. 29 ff.); similarly Keim, who draws a minute parallel between the two events.

(d) Ewald regards it as an actual occurrence, but with mythical embellishments.

(e) Weiss: a real but spiritual vision of the three disciples.

The circumstantial agreement of the three evangelists who narrate the event, the definite chronological date, the connection with what follows, and the solemn reference to it by Peter, one of its witnesses (2 Pet. i. 16-18), as well as the many peculiar traits to which no parallel can be found in the transfiguration of Moses, refute the mythical hypothesis, and confirm the historical character of the scene. But it is useless to indulge in speculations concerning the precise form and mode of a supernatural event.

6. Significance.—The transfiguration was, as already remarked, a visible revelation of the hidden glory of the person of Christ in anticipation of his future state of exaltation, and at the same time a prophecy of the future glory of his people after the resurrection, when our mortal bodies shall be conformed to his glorious body (Phil. iii. 21). It served as a solemn inauguration of the history of the passion and final consummation of his work on earth; for, according to Luke’s account, the order of Christ’s prayer, especially his death, the great mystery of the atonement for the sins of the world, and the following resurrection, and return to the Father—was the topic of conversation between Jesus and the two visitors from the other world. The event bears a relation to the history of Christ’s suffering similar to that of his baptism in the River Jordan to his active ministry. On both occasions he was brought into contact with representatives of the Old Testament, and strengthened for his course by the solemn approval of the voice from heaven declaring him to be the well-beloved Son of the Father. The transfiguration, no doubt, confirmed the faith of the disciples, and prepared them for the approaching trial. It took away from them, as Leo the Great says (Serm. xciv.), the scandal of the cross. It furnishes also a striking proof for the harmony of the Old and New Testaments, for personal immortality, and the mysterious intercommunication of the visible and invisible worlds. Both meet in Christ: he is the connecting link between the two dispensations, as also between earth and heaven, between the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of glory. It is very significant, that at the end of the scene the disciples saw no man save Jesus alone. Moses and Elijah, the law and the promise, types and shadows, pass away: the gospel, the fulfilment, the substance, Christ, remains, the only one who can relieve the misery of earth, and glorify our nature,—Christ all in all.

7. The transfiguration has given rise to one of the greatest works of art ever conceived by the genius of man. It is the best artistic comment on this supernatural event. The picture under that name was the last work of Raphael, and was carried after his coffin at his burial, in the Pantheon of Rome. He died of this masterpiece, in the prime of early manhood. The original is in Peter’s at Rome, and has been multiplied in innumerable copies. It represents Christ soaring above the earth, in a halo of glory; Moses with the tables of the law on one hand, Elijah on the other; the three disciples, with their characteristic features, at their feet, gazing in a half-dreamy state at the dazzling light; and beneath... this scene of celestial peace the painter represents, in startling contrast, the suffering of the lunatic, whose healing follows in the Gospel narrative. So the Christian must ever descend from the heights of festive joy and the occasional foretaste of heaven to the hard work of daily life, before he can attain to final rest and glory.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

TRANSFIGURATION. souls from one body to another, through the death of the former and the birth of the latter, forms an important element of Buddhist ethics, and was also taught in ancient Egypt; but it never took root in Greek mythology, in spite of Pythagoras and Plato; or in Judaism, though it is found in the Cabala; or in Christianity, though Jerome relates that it was taught by some obscure sects, and reminiscences of it are found, not only among the Fathers, but also in the middle ages.

TRANSFIGURATION, a scholastic term (from trans and substantia, "a change of one substance into another," μεταστασις, Westensverwandlung), introduced in the twelfth century, for the Roman-Catholic theory of the real presence in the Eucharist.

I. THE DOCTRINE is, that the elements of bread and wine in the sacrifice of the mass are, by the consecration of the priest, transubstantiated, i.e., changed as to their essence, into the very body and blood of Christ, while the visible form and the appearance of bread and wine remain to the sight, touch, and taste. The miraculous change is supposed to take place simultaneously all over the world, day after day, wherever the priest pronounces the words of institution,— "This is my body," "this is my blood.

The doctrine was suggested by several Greek and Latin Fathers under different terms, such as μεταβολη, conversio substantiae, transito, transmutatio. It was first clearly set forth (without the term) by Paschasius Radbertus in the ninth century, by Lanfranc in the eleventh, defended by the leading scholastics, and confirmed in 1215 by the Lateran Council under Pope Innocent III., which declared its belief on the subject in these words: "Verum Christi corpus et sanguis in sacramento altaris sub speciebus panis et vini veraciter continentur, transsubstantiatis pane in corpus et vino in sanguinem potestate divina." The doctrine was finally settled for all orthodox Roman Catholics by the Council of Trent (in the thirteenth session, Oct. 11, 1551), in opposition to the Protestant denial, in the following terms:

"This holy Synod doth now declare it anew, that, by the consecration of the bread and of the wine, a conversion is made of the whole substance of the bread into the substance of the body of Christ our Lord, and of the whole substance of the wine into the substance of his blood; which conversion is, by the Holy Catholic Church, suitably and properly called Transubstantiation."

Canons 1-4 of the same session condemn the contrary opinions. The same statement is repeated in the Tridentine Profession, art. vi. (See the Latin and English text in Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, vol. ii. 130, 136, 137, and 208.)

The doctrine as thus stated involves a stupendous miracle, or, rather, a series of miracles and magic transformations. It is not only above reason, but contradicts directly the testimony of three senses. All attempts of Catholic divines to explain it by scholastic distinctions of various kinds of presence, and by speculations about the relation of the substance to the accidents, are failures. Two opposite tendencies meet in this dogma: on the one hand, the divine is materialized; and, on the other hand, the material is spiritualized. Christ's real body and blood are enclosed in the narrow dimensions of the sacramental elements, and yet they are everywhere, by innumerable acts of priestly creation, wherever the mass is celebrated; and they are wholly partaken of by the mouth (yet not digested) by every communicant, good or bad, without division or diminution.

The doctrine of transubstantiation led, with other causes, to the withdrawal of the cup from the laity to avoid possible profanation by spilling the blood of Christ; and both the doctrine and the usage combined greatly to strengthen the power of the priesthood, and to widen the gulf between the priesthood and the laity.

It may be admitted that a great and precious truth underlies this as every other great error; and it is the truth which gives the error such power and tenacity over millions of devout Catholics to this day. This truth is, that Jesus Christ is the bread of life from heaven, and nourishes... his people spiritually by faith, as truly as he fed the five thousand physically by the miracle of the five loaves. The error lies in the carnal, Capernatian misunderstanding; and this is condemned by our Lord at the close of that very discourse which sets forth that great and comforting truth (John vi. 63). The flesh profits nothing, the spirit makes alive.

II. The Arguments which Papal divines produce in defence of this doctrine are:

1. Exegetical. — (a) A literal interpretation of the words of institution,— "This is my body;" "this" [which, however, refers to the preceding "cup," the wine not being mentioned] "is my blood of the covenant" (Matt. xxvi. 26, 27). The Lutheran symbols agree with this exegesis, but nevertheless reject transubstantiation. The Reformed symbolists reject it for the following reasons: (1) the word "is" may indicate a figurative as well as a real relationship between the subject and the predicate. (2) The surrounding circumstances of the institution of the Holy Supper (the living ken, his blood not yet shed, etc.) forbid a strictly literal interpretation, and application to the first celebration; (3) the literal interpretation cannot be carried out, inasmuch as the Lord himself (Matt. xxvii. 26; Luke xiiii. 20) and the apostle Paul, in quoting the words of institution (I Cor. xvi. 25, τρόπος τῆς πάροικες, etc.; x. 18, "the cup of blessing," etc.), substitute the "cup" which contains the wine, for the wine itself; i.e., they use the figure of συγκάθεσθαι continentis pro contento: and yet no Catholic assumes the transubstantiation of the vessel.

(b) The mysterious discourse of our Lord in the synagogue of Capernaum, about eating his flesh, and drinking his blood (John vi. 52—59). To this may be objected, that this discourse is appealed to for the Lutheran, Calvinistic, and Zwinglian theory, as well as for the Roman-Catholic. (Compare on the patristic views the doctrine histories of Münchener, Hagenbach, Baur, Nitzsch, and the writer's Church History, II. 241 sqq.). Nor has any Catholic assumed the transubstantiation of the body and blood of Christ, but really the body and blood. John of Damascus said substantially the same; and the Greek Church has even adopted the Roman dogma, under the name μεταμορφωσις.

But this result was not reached in the Latin Church till a much later period. During the middle ages two controversies on the real presence took place, which prove that transubstantiation was not yet fixed in the mind of the church. The first controversy occurred in the ninth century. Paschasius Radbertus, abbot of the monastery of Corbie, first expounded and defended transubstantiation in a tract, De Sacramentis Corporis et Sanguinis Domini (831, 2d ed., 844), but expressly says that some taught only a spiritual communion of the soul with the Redeemer in the Eucharist. The tract provoked considerable opposition, and Ratramnus (Bertram), also a monk of Corbie, refuted it (without mentioning the name of his abbot) by a tract, De Corpus et Sanguine Domini et Caro/um Caluum. He appealed to the Scriptures (John vi. 63) and to St. Augustine, and taught that bread and wine remain unaltered after consecration, as the water in baptism, but become the significant symbols of a spiritual communion with Christ by faith; so that the body and blood of Christ were present, and partaken of only spiritualiter et secundum potentiam. John Scottus Ereigena, Herigir, Rabanus Maurus, and, in part, Gerbert, likewise wrote against Radbert's view. (See Neander: Church History, Boston ed., iii. 494—502, and Schaff, Ch. History, IV.) The second eucharistic controversy took place in the eleventh century. Henricus de Conventu (between 1040 and 1050) attacked in a work, De Cena Sacra, the doctrine of transubstantiation as contrary to reason, to the Scriptures, and to the older church Fathers, especially St. Augustine. His former friend Lanfranc, prior of Bee in Normandy, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1088), was...

the principal champion of transubstantiation. He first drew the logical inference from the doctrine, namely, that unbelievers as well received the essence of the sacrament (but not its salubris efficacia). Hildebrand, then papal legate in France, after Pope Gregory VII. while protected Berengar; but a Roman synod condemned him as a heretic. Berengar was forced to commit his writings to the flames; but on returning to France he renewed his opposition, was again cited to Rome, and even Pope Gregory VII. could not protect him any longer against the powerful current in favor of transubstantiation: he saved him, however, from a violent end. Berengar was allowed, after a sort of forced recantation, which he afterwards regretted, to retire to a solitary island near Tours, and lived till 1088. (See Neander, iii. 502-530; Schaff, Ch. Hist. IV.)

After this, the doctrine of transubstantiation triumphed completely in the Western Church, and held its sway almost undisputed till the sixteenth century. It fell in with the magic supernaturalism and superstitious piety of mediæval Christianity. Thomas Aquinas has given it poetical expression in his famous hymn, Lauda Sion Salvatorum, for the Corpus Christi Festival. In some respects the best of the Puritan commentaries.

TRAPPISTS, The, are the members of an order in the Roman-Catholic Church which arose out of a Cistercian abbey founded by Count Rotrou of Perche, in 1140. This abbey, called “Notre Dame de la Maison Dien,” lies in a damp, unhealthy valley, reached by a narrow and stony passage: hence the name La Trappe (“the trap”). The monks distinguished themselves by austerity until the fourteenth or fifteenth century, when they became so notorious for revelling, licentiousness, and robbery, as to win the title of the “Bandits of La Trappe.” This state of affairs continued till the middle of the seventeenth century, when the abbey passed into the hands of Dominique Armand Jean le Bouthiller de Rancé, then (1636) a boy of ten years. The young abbot was well endowed with mental gifts, but abandoned himself to a wild carousing to come by feelings of repentance, he went to the opposite extreme of austerity, retired to La Trappe, and, in spite of opposition on the part of the monks, carried through a rigid discipline. In order to do this, he introduced some Benedictine monks to his abbey.

Rancé’s rules obliged the inmates of La Trappe to rise at two o’clock, and retire at seven in winter, eight in summer. They slept on sacks of straw, spent eleven hours daily in spiritual exercises, the rest of the time in hard work. During the hours of work, as in all their relations to one another, the monks observed almost absolute silence, and in greeting one another used the formula, Memento mori (“Remember that we must die”). Their wishes were made known through signs. Their fare was simple, consisting of vegetables, bread, and water. After the evening meal, the monks spent the night praying and meditating on their future graves. Their garb was a long cloak with wide sleeves, of a gray color, and a black cap.

Rancé was opposed to literary pursuits, and expressed his views in the Traite de la saintete et des devoirs de la vie monastique, 1633. He was an-

II. On the Protestant side, transubstantiation is discussed in the works on symbols by Marheineke, Guericke, Hase, Oehler, etc.; in the history of the doctrine of the Lord’s Supper by Ebrard and Kahnis, and in the standard works on dogmatics under the head of “Sacraments” and the “Lord’s Supper.” See also a long and learned art. by Dr. Steitz in the first ed. of Herzog, vol. xvi. 302-305. In 1692 Princess Louise of Condé founded a female branch of the order at Clacet, France; and branches were also established near Florence and Dusseldorf. The Revolution drove the Trappists out of France. They found refuge in Switzerland, where Augustin de Lestrage founded a cloister at Valsainte, canton of Freiburg. In 1798 it was destroyed by the French. Lestrage found a refuge in Warsaw and Cracow, Poland; but the Trappists were expelled from here in 1800, and, after various attempts to get a foothold in Germany and Italy, were put in possession of La Trappe after the restoration of the Bourbons in 1817. Lestrage was very active until his death (1827), and succeeded in establishing various branches of his order. In 1839 a royal order was issued, closing the Trappist houses; but nine remained, several of which, however, were closed in 1870. In 1846 the Trappists opened a house in Algiers, and in 1848 some of them emigrated to the United States. A branch of the order took the name of the "Trappist Preachers," in 1851. He was educated at the Falmouth classical school; was employed in the Neath Abbey Iron-works, Glamorganshire, 1828 to 1834; and in 1836 became private tutor at Falmouth. From early life he took an interest in New Testament textual studies, and in his twenty-fifth year formed the design, to which he gave effect in 1857, of preparing a critical edition of the Greek New Testament, with a text derived from the oldest manuscript versions prior to the seventh century, and citations from early ecclesiastical writers, including Eusebius. In 1838 he issued a first specimen of his plan, and in June, 1844, the first instalment.—The Book of Revelation. He made three visits to the Continent (1845-46, 1849-50, 1862) to collate the ancient manuscripts. In 1845 he spent five months in Rome; but, although permitted to see, he was not allowed to collate, the Codex Vaticanus, where Augustin de Lestrage founded a cloister at Valsainte, canton of Freiburg. TRENT, Council of (Concilium Tridentinum), a city in the southern and Italian part of the Tyrol, where it was called from Trent (Tridentum), a city in the hands of the papal court. Finally, supplemented by the Vatican Council (in 1870). It was convened as an exclusively Roman council, in the contest, but was again and again postponed by the policy of the papal court. In the sixteenth century, it was called forth by the Reformation of the Church of Rome, by diplomacy and intrigue, outwitted all the liberal elements. The council abolished some crying abuses, and introduced or recommended disciplinary reforms as regards the sale of indulgences, the morals of convents, the education of the clergy. In this respect the Reformation produced a salutary effect upon the Roman Church. It continued to its final adjournment, in Dec. 4, 1563. It closed with "Anathema to all heretics, anathema, anathema. " The history of the council is divided into decrees (decreta), which contain the positive statement of the Roman dogmas, and into short canons (canones), which condemn the dissenting Protestant views with the concluding "anathema sit." They are stated with great clearness, precision, and wisdom. The decree on justification betrays special ability and theological circumspection. The Protestant doctrines, however, are almost always exhibited in an exaggerated form, and mixed up with real heresies, which Protestants condemn as emphatically as the Church of Rome.

The following is a list, in chronological order, of the articles of faith which were settled by the council in favor of the views held ever since by the Roman-Catholic Church:—

SESSION III. (Feb. 4, 1546).—Decree on the symbol of faith (the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed as a basis of the following decrees).

SESSION IV. (April 8, 1546).—Decree on the Scriptures (including the Apocrypha) and church tradition, which are declared to be the joint rules of faith. The Latin Vulgate is put on a par with the original text.

SESSION V. (June 17, 1546).—On original sin.

SESSION VI. (Jan. 13, 1547).—On (progressive) justification by faith and good works, in opposition to justification by faith alone.

SESSION VII. (March 3, 1547).—On the seven sacraments in general, and some canons on baptism and confirmation.

SESSION XII. (Oct. 11, 1551).—On the sacrament of the Eucharist.

SESSION XIV. (Nov. 25, 1551).—On the sacraments of penance and extreme unction.

SESSION XV. (Jan. 16, 1552).—On communion under both kinds, and the withdrawal of the cup from the laity.

SESSION XII. (Sept. 17, 1562).—Doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass.

SESSION XXIII. (July 15, 1563).—Sacrament of ordination.

SESSION XXIV. (Nov. 11, 1563).—Sacrament of matrimony.

SESSION XXV. (Dec. 3 and 4, 1563).—Decree approving the scholastic doctrines of purgatory, the invocation, veneration, and the relics of saints and
The council was acknowledged in Italy, Portugal, Spain, France, the Low Countries, Poland, and the Roman-Catholic portion of the German Empire, but mostly with a reservation of the royal prerogatives. In France it was never published in form, and was only recognized in its doctrinal part. No attempt was made to introduce it into England. Pius IV. sent the decrees to Mary, Queen of Scots, with a letter, dated June 13, 1564, requesting her to publish them in Scotland; but she dared not do it in the face of John Knox and the Reformation.

The canons and decrees of the council were first published by Paul Manutius (Rome, 1564), and often since in different languages. Best Latin edition by Le Plat (1779), and by Schnitte and Richter (Tubing., 1844). WESSENBERG, in his Preface to vol. part (1874), and stopped with the Councils of Basel and Florence. TREVES, Holy Coat of. The coat, preserved in the Cathedral of Treves, is said to be the seamless garment mentioned in John xix. 23. There are several traditions about it. In the thirteenth century the story went, that Mary spun the garment out of wool, and that Jesus wore it uninterrupted till the day of his death. Herod then gave it to a Jew, who threw it into the sea. It was thrown up on the shore, and picked up by a pilgrim, who cast it back again into the water. A whale swallowed it; but a fisherman recovered it, and sold it to King Orendel of Treves. This king put it on, and, as long as he wore it, was invincible. Among the other legends is the one that a maiden carried the garment into Treves; and, as she approached the city, all the bells began tolling at once. It is claimed that the mention of the garment occurs in the Gesta Trensorum (467 or 827). But we have no mention of it till 1054. The notice seems to have been inserted in the Gesta Trientina, under the Abbot Thidulf of Echternach, between 1106 and 1124. The coat was first used at the consecration of Archbishop Bruno, Oct. 28, 1121. It was allowed to remain at rest till 1512. Then, and at a later time, it was presented for worship. Luther refers to the matter as a shameful and foolish travesty. It was again displayed for worship from Aug. 18 to Oct. 7, 1844. The bishops of Metz, Cologne, Limburg, and many others, attended the spectacle; and, as she approached the city, all the bells began tolling at once. It was discovered; that twenty other Seamless Coats of Christ. See GILDMEISTER and V. SYBEL: "D. heil. TRIALS, the name given to the examinations and literary exercises required in the Presbyterian Church, of all candidates for the ministry. TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

The Israelitish people, the house of Jacob or Israel, was divided into twelve tribes (Heb. mattoth or sheba'im). The two Hebrew words are thus distinguished: the first denotes the tribes according to their genealogical relation as branches of a people; the second, as connected with the political frame. The tribes are enumerated according to their progenitors. As Joseph received a double portion in Ephraim and Manasseh, there were, strictly speaking, thirteen tribes; but, on account of the peculiar position of the tribe of Levi, the number twelve is preserved, as may already be seen from the order during the wandering in the wilderness (Num. ii. x. 13 sq.). In the midst, round the tabernacle, we find the priests and the three families of Levites, and then, towards the region of the sky, the twelve tribes in four triads, each led by a prince. The triads are formed with reference to the material relationship: (1) Judah, Issachar, Zebulon; (2) Reuben, Simeon, Gad; (3) Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin; (4) Dan, Asher, Naphtali. The number twelve is also regarded as the division of the country, since Levi received no portion. Where, however, as in the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix.) the twelve is also regarded as the division of the country, since Levi received no portion. Where, however, as in the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix.) and of Moses (Deut. xxxiii.), Levi is mentioned only as one tribe,—Joseph; thus Ezek. xlviii., where the future division of the country is spoken of (1-7, 23-28), Ephraim and Manasseh are numbered as two tribes. Where, however, the twelve gates of the new Jerusalem are to be named after the twelve tribes (30-34), Levi is also counted in, and Joseph is only mentioned as one tribe.

The tribes were again divided into families [mishpachot, ñqjw; ñqjw, ñqjw, ñqjw]. In the midst of the tribes stood the princes (Exod. xxxiv. 31; Num. i. 10, 14, vii. 12 sq.), who were also called the heads of the tribes (Num. xxx. 1). Then came the chief of the house of the fathers (Num. iii. 24, 30). This tribal constitution, which developed itself during the stay of the people in Egypt, was not abolished by the stay in the desert; and in the return to the land of Canaan, which see the art. eruvv.), the land of Canaan was divided among the tribes, which almost extinguished the tribe (Judg. v. 15-17).

With the exception of the tribe of Levi (for which see the art. Levites), the land of Canaan was divided among the other tribes as follows:—

1. Asher (i.e., "happy") was the eighth son of Jacob, and his second by Zilpah (Gen. xxxv. 22). He had four sons and one daughter (Gen. xlvii. 17). After the exodus the number of adult males in that tribe was 11,500; but, before entering Canaan, the number was raised to 53,100 (Num. i. 40, xvi. 44). In the reign of David the tribe had become so insignificant, that its name is altogether omitted from the list of the chief rulers (1 Chron. xxvii. 16-22). The territory assigned to the Asherites comprised the fertile plain of Acre, and the coast of Phenicia up to Sidon (Josh. xix. 24-31); but for a long time they were unable to gain possession of the territory actually assigned them, and "dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land" (Judg. i. 32). In the struggle against Sisera, Asher forgot the peril of his fellow tribesmen (Judg. v. 17, 18): he also furnished neither hero nor judge to the nation. One bright name is that of Anna, the daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Aser (Luke ii. 36).

2. Benjamin (i.e., "son of my right hand"), also called Benoni (i.e., "son of my pain"), youngest son of Jacob by Rachel (Gen. xxx. 18); was born on the road between Bethel and Bethlehem, where his mother died. How he was sent into Egypt, and what policy Joseph used to retain him, we read in Gen. xliv., xlv. When the muster was held in the desert, the tribe of Benjamin numbered 35,400 warriors (Num. i. 36, ii. 22), and at the entrance of Israel into Canaan, even as many as 45,000 (Num. xxxvi. 38 sq.). The territory which was occupied by this tribe (Josh. xviii. 11 sq.) was a narrow strip bounded on the east by the Jordan; and it was extended to Kirjath-jearim, about six miles west of Jerusalem; while in other directions it stretched from the valley of Hinnom on the south to Bethel on the north. Thus Dan intervened between this tribe and the Philistines. In this territory lay Jericho, Beth-hogla, Bethel, Gibeon, Ramah, and Jebus, or Jerusalem. In the time of the judges the tribe of Benjamin, whose emblem according to Jacob's blessing was the wolf (Gen. xlix. 27), became involved in a civil war with the other tribes, which almost extinguished the tribe (Judg. xix.-xxi.). But it revived again, and in the time of David it numbered 50,434 able warriors (1 Chron. vii. 6-12); in that of Asa, 280,000 (2 Chron. xiv. 8); and in that of Jehoshaphat, 200,000 (2 Chron. xvii. 17). It furnished a deliverer in the person of Ehud, who killed the king of the Moabites, Eglon (Judg. iii. 12 sq.); and when Aram, king of Damascus, came against Judah, the first king, that people, with Judah (2 Kings xvi. 9, x.), whose dynasty (2 Sam. ii. ii.), as well as that of David (1 Kings xii. 21; 1 Chron. xxix.), it supported. At the division of the kingdom after Solomon's death, it belonged to the southern kingdom. After the exile, together with the tribe of Judah, it constituted the flower of the new Jewish colony in Palestine (Ez. i. 5, iv. 1, x. 9). To the tribe of Benjamin also belonged Mordecai and Esther (Esth. ii. 5), more especially that "Saul who also is called Paul" (Rom. xi. 1; Phil. iii. 5).

3. Dan (i.e. "judge"), fifth son of Jacob, by Bilhah (Gen. xxx. 6). He was the last of the tribes to receive his portion; and that portion, strange as it appears in the face of the numbers, — 62,700 at the first mustering (Num. i. 39), and 64,400 at the second (Num. xxvi. 49), — was the smallest of the twelve. On the north and east it was completely embraced by Ephraim and Benjamin, while on the south-east and south it joined Judah. On the west it was bounded by the Mediterranean. The boldness of the tribe is characterized by the taking of Laish (Judg. xviii.).

4. Ephraim (i.e. "fruitful"), son of Joseph (Gen. xli. 52), whom Jacob preferred to Manasseh (Gen. xlvi. 14). By virtue of the blessing, Jacob adopted Ephraim and his brother Manasseh as his own sons, in the place of their father; the object being to give to Joseph, through his sons, a double portion. At the census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 40,500 (Num. i. 32, 33), but subsequently, however, only 32,500 (Num. xxvi. 37). The territory allotted to Ephraim was bounded on the west by the Mediterranean Sea, and the River Jordan on the east; on the north it had the half-trIBE of Manasseh; and on the south, Benjamin and Dan. This fine country included most of what was afterwards called Samaria, as distinguished from Judaea on the one hand, and from Galilee on the other. Ephraim plays an important part in the history of the Jewish nation. It produced the successor of Moses (Joshua), chastised the Midianites (Judg. vii. 24), quarrelled with Gideon (Judg. viii. 1) and Jephthah (Judg. xii. 4), delivered the house of Joseph from the hands of the tribe of Dan (1 Kings ii. 25; 2 Chron. x. 16), and formed the kingdom of Israel, or, as it is also called, the northern kingdom, in opposition to the kingdom of Judah, or the southern kingdom, to which the tribes of Judah and Benjamin belonged. At last Ephraim was carried into captivity (2 Kings xvii. 5); for prophecies concerning the same, see Isa. vii. 9, xi. 13, xxviii. 1; Jer. xxxi.; Hos. v.-xiv.; Zech. ix. 10, x. 7.

5. Gad (i.e. "fortune"), Jacob's seventh son, the first-born of Zilpah, and brother of Asher; is blessed by Jacob (Gen. xlii. 10) and by Moses (Deut. xxviii. 20). His descendants (Gen. xlii. 10) are twice mentioned (Num. i. 24, xxvi. 15). The territory allotted to Gad was the region between Hebron and the River Jabbok, together with an additional strip along the east bank of the Jordan, extending up to the Sea of Chinnereth (Josh. xiii. 24—28). Gad is commended by Joshua (Josh. xxii. 11 sq.), but accursed of Israel (Josh. xxiii. 12 sq.). The character of the tribe was warlike (Gen. xlii. 19; 1 Chron. xii. 8). It was carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. v. 26). Perhaps that Elijah the Tishbite, "who was of the inhabitants of Gilead," belonged to that tribe.

6. Issachar (i.e. "reward"), the ninth son of Jacob, and the fifth of Leah (Gen. xxx. 15, xxxiv. 23). When the tribe was first numbered, it had 54,400 men (Num. i. 28); at the second mustering, 64,300 (Num. xxvi. 25). In David's time the tribe had 57,000 fighting men (1 Chron. vii. 5). His territory was the noble plain of Edraelon, a territory, however, whose fertility was more than overbalanced by its exposed situation (Josh. xix. 17—23). One among the judges of Israel was from Issachar, — Tola (Judg. i. 1). When Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, had invaded the north of Palestine, and had taken Samaria, Issachar, with the rest of Israel, was carried away to his distant dominions. Allusion is also made to this tribe in Rev. vii. 7.

7. Joseph (i.e. "increase"). See Ephraim and Manasseh.

8. Judah (i.e. "praise"), the fourth son of Jacob by Leah (Gen. xxix. 35). For his character, life, etc., comp. Gen. xxxviii., xliii. 3, xlv. sq. The important position which Judah was to occupy in the future is indicated in his name, which will be found in every list of the twelve tribes, and before the tribe of Levi or Ephraim, and in Joseph's blessing, which was conveyed in lofty language, glancing far into futurity, and strongly indicative of the high destinies which awaited the tribe that was to descend from him (Gen. xlix. 8—12). Judah's sons were five. Of these, three, — Shelah, Pharez, and Zerah, — together with two sons of Pharez, went into Egypt. When the Israelites quitted that country, the tribe of Judah numbered 74,600 adult males (Num. i. 26, 27); at the second mustering, 76,500 (Num. xxvi. 22). Its representative amongst the spies, and also amongst those appointed to partition the land, was the great Caleb (Num. xiii. 4, xxxiv. 19). After Joshua's death this tribe is appointed to attack the Canaanites (Judg. i.).

The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are narrated at great length, and with greater minuteness than the others, in Josh. xx. 46—60. The whole of the extensive region was from a very early date divided into four main divisions: (1) The Mountain, the "hill-country of Judah," with thirty-eight (or, according to the Septuagint, with forty-eight) towns (Josh. iv. 48—50); (2) The Wilderness, the sunken district immediately adjoining the Dead Sea (Josh. xxvi. 61 sq.); (3) The South (Josh. xv. 21 sq.), containing twenty-nine cities with their dependent villages (Josh. xx. 32—35), which, with Ether and Aslan in the mountains, were ceded to Simeon (Josh. xix. 1—9); (4) The Lowland (Josh. xvi. 33 sq.), or the Shephelah, between the Mountain and the Mediterranean Sea, the garden and the granary of the tribe. But this very tract, for the greater part, in the hands of the Philistines. To this tribe belonged Othniel (Judg. iii. 9) and Ibzan (Judg. xii. 9 sq.). It made David king (2 Sam. ii. 4), and adhered to his house (1 Kings xii. 2; 2 Chron. x., xii.); and after the disruption of the kingdom, together with Benjamin, it formed the southern kingdom, in opposition to the northern kingdom of Ephraim. Judah was chosen of God to be the last ten tribes belonged. To Judah's tribe belonged prophets, like Amos, Isaiah, Micah, perhaps, also, Obadiah, Joel, Nahum, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, and others.

TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

TRIBES OF ISRAEL.
After the exile most of those who returned belonged to that tribe: in consequence, the name "Juda" has been given to the whole nation from about the epoch of the Restoration. Thus we also find the name "Jews" in Jeremiah (xxxiv. 9). More frequently this name occurs in the post-exile books, also in the New Testament. The highest honor which was bestowed upon that tribe consists in the fact that to it belonged the Messiah of the world. In the Old Testament, the tribe of Judah is granted (Num. xxxii.; Deut. iii. 12; Josh. xiii. 15 sq.). Immediately after the capture of Jericho, the twelve tribes are numbered (Num. i. 21, ii. 10, xxvi. 5; Josh. ii. 1, x. 23). Their inheritance was also assigned to the tribe of Judah (Gen. xxxvii. 20), and his blessing (Deut. xxxiii. 6); he was commended and dismissed by him (Josh. xxi. 1). They build the temple and number themselves. In addition to this large mountain territory, the cities of Beth-shean, Taanach, Megiddo, and the Jordan is granted (Josh. xiii. vi. 12), and receive a section on the south, which was originally allotted to Judah. To that tribe belonged Judah, who prays to "the Lord God of her father Simeon" (Jud. xi. 2). Simeon is mentioned by Ezekiel (xlviii. 25), and in the Book of Revelation (vii. 7), in their catalogues of the restoration of Israel.

12. Simeon (i.e., "a hearing" by Jehovah), the second of Jacob's sons by Leah (Gen. xxix. 33); is last named of the twelve; his descendants are numbered (Num. i. 22, xxvi. 12), and receive a section on the south, which was originally allotted to Judah. To that tribe belonged Judah, who prays to "the Lord God of her father Simeon" (Jud. xi. 2). Simeon is mentioned by Ezekiel (xlviii. 25), and in the Book of Revelation (vii. 7), in their catalogues of the restoration of Israel.

13. Zebulun (i.e., "dwelling"), the sixth and last son of Leah, and the tenth-born to Jacob (Gen. xxx. 20, xxx. 23); is blessed by Jacob (Gen. xlix. 15) and Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 15). His descendants are numbered (Num. i. 30, xxvi. 26), and receive their lot amid the picturesque hills and plains of Lower Galilee, having Tabor on the east and the great sea at the base of Carmel on the west (Josh. xix. 10–18). In the great campaign and victory of Barak it bore a prominent part (Jud. iv. 6, 10), and Deborah praises Zebulun and Naphtali as a people that jeopardized their lives unto the death (Judg. v. 18). This tribe also came to Hezekiah's passover (2 Chron. xxx. 11, 18); and though it appears to have shared the fate of the other northern tribes at the invasion of the country by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvii. 24 sq.), yet the land of Zebulun occupied a distinguished place in New-Testament times (comp. Isa. i. 1; Matt. iv. 15, 16). In the visions of Ezekiel (xlviii. 26–33) and of John (Rev. vii. 8), this tribe finds its due mention.

For prophecy, the re-union of the twelve tribes under one head, and the recognition of the future salvation (Ez. vi. 1; Ezek. xxxiv. 22), and, since the bringing-back of the tribes as such is predicted (see especially Ezek. xiv.), their continuance is naturally presupposed. The same is also historically guaranteed for the following centuries (1 Chron. v. 26). The tribal constitution was continued in the goa (i.e., "dispersion") for (Jer. xxxix. 1; Ezek. xiv. i. 1) the elders of the people are mentioned; and among those who returned from the exile we meet with the chief of the fathers (Ez. ii. 6, iv. 2), from whom went forth the princes and elders (Ez. v. 7, vi. 8; Neh. x. 1). That those who returned regarded themselves as representatives of all the tribes, we see from Ez. vi. 17, where twelve he-goats are offered for a sin-offering for all Israel (cf. also Ez. viii. 35). That in the new commonwealth each had to show his pedigree is seen from Ez. ii. 59 sq.; and priests who could not prove their pedigree were suspended from priestly functions: but for the rest we are not told that those who "could not show their father's house and their seed, whether they were of Israel," were excluded from the congregation. According to Ez. vi. 21, Neh. x. 29, there were also proselytes, "who had separated themselves by the filthiness of the heathen of the land to seek the Lord God of Israel." That at all times a dis-

TRIDENTINE PROFESSION OF FAITH (Professio Fidei Tridentina), or the Creed of Pius IV. The original name was Forma professionis fidei catholicae, or orthodoxa fidei. It is the shortest, but practically the most important, creed-state-ment of the Roman-Catholic Church. It must be subscribed or sworn to by all priests and public teachers of that church, and also by Protestant converts (hence called the "Profession of Conversion"). It was suggested by the synod of Trent, and prepared, by order of Pope Pius IV. in 1548, by the bishops and cardinals. It is a very clear and precise summary of the specific doctrines of the Roman Church as settled by the Council of Trent, and put in the form of a binding oath of obedience to the Pope, as the successor of the Prince of the apostles, and the Vicar of Christ. It consists of the following twelve Articles, including the Nicene Creed, with the Western clause "Filique:"

1. I, ego, sumpsim, credo in unum Deum, Patrem omnipotentem, etc. [Symbolum Symbolum.] 2. Apostolicus et ecclesiasticus legis sanctissimus optimus et auctoritates, quae a quibus Ecclesiam observarunt et constituerunt, fideliter amovimus et amplior etiam credo in unum Deum, Patrem omnipotentem, etc.] 3. I solemnly affirm that there is one God, the Father Almighty, etc. (Here follows the Nicene Creed.) 4. I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, etc. (Here follows the Nicene Creed.) 5. I also profess that there are the seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, for the sanctification of mankind, though not without danger of error; and I promise, after due examination, confirmation, and ordination, not to be reiterated without sacrilege; and I promise to him who may receive the consent of the Church, used in the solemn administration of the aforesaid sacraments. 6. I embrace and receive all the aforesaid Articles which have been defined and declared in the holy Council of Trent concerning original sin and justification. 7. I also confess that under Christ alone Almighty God received whole and entire, and a true sacrament. 8. I also confess that all other obsessions and ceremonies or oblations which may be given must be observed and kept for the perpetuity of our bliss and salvation, and that our receiving them is most wholesome to Christian people.

8. I firmly believe, as the sacred Canons have declared, and General Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent, and I condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto, and all heresies which the Church of Rome has held, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people.

9. I receive and profess all other obsessions and ceremonies or oblations which may be given must be observed and kept for the perpetuity of our bliss and salvation, and that their use is most wholesome to Christian people.

11. I take upon myself to be the immediate successor of the holy apostles, and all that the Church of Rome has held, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people.

12. I do, at this present, freely and voluntarily, as if truly held in this true Church, faith, baptism, and the seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, for the sanctification of mankind, though not without danger of error; and I promise, after due examination, confirmation, and ordination, not to be reiterated without sacrilege; and I promise to him who may receive the consent of the Church, used in the solemn administration of the aforesaid sacraments.

Since that time the Roman-Catholic Church has added two more dogmas to her creed; one on the sinlessness of the Virgin Mary (in 1854), and one on the infallibility of the Pope (in 1870), in the following words:

"(1) That the blessed Virgin Mary, by a singular grace and privilege of Almighty God, in view of the merits of Christ Jesus the saviour of mankind, has been reserved free from all stain of original sin.

(2) That the Roman pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra,—that is, in discharge of the office of pastor, and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith and morals, which is to be held, taught, and preached by his subjects, or by those of the church to whom he shall appertain, to me in my office. This doctrine shall be held, taught, and preaching by all the faithful, in order that they may come to salvation.

TRIDENTINUM. See TREN'T, COUNCIL OF.

TRINE BAPTISM denotes that form of the administration of baptism by which the person baptized is immersed thrice in the water, or the water poured thrice over him, in the name of the three persons of the godhead. Its symbolic meaning is striking; and its origin from the apostles, or, at all events, from the second century, cannot be doubted. The Arian Eunomius introduced baptism by single immersion, and this form was now intended to develop for a long time after the decision of the council, even entering into queer combinations with each other, until finally overcome by the indefatigable labor of Athanasius, Basil the Great, the two Gregories, and Hilary. The positive doctrine thus established is not merely a cautious compromise between Arianism and Sabellianism, a single negation of two extremes: it is, indeed, a conscious and courageous affirmation of the truth, excluding the errors. But it cannot be denied that this affirmation is not yet the fulness of the truth. It has its weaknesses; it has its defects. The monas is identified with the Father. The hypostasis is merely negatively defined; the third hypostasis of the Trinity, the Holy Spirit, remains undeveloped. Up to 360 the whole development was markedly dyadic; and even after the researches of Athanasius and the Cappadocians, and the condemnation of the Macedonians by the ecumenical Council of Constantinople (381), it took a long time before the Holy Spirit attained full equality with the Father and the Son in the divine triad.

How far Augustine can be said to have made good the above defects is doubtful. With the full development of the three hypostases in the Holy Trinity, the danger of tritheism begins; and, indeed, the trinitarian doctrine of Augustine, so conspicuous for its idea of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, called forth the tritheism of Philoponus. Nevertheless, though the acceptance by the whole Western Church of the Augustinian doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit, and the encyclical by Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople (867), denouncing that doctrine as heretical, called forth a very warm discussion, the only treatment of the subject which has any theological interest is, for the whole earlier part of the middle ages, that of Scotus Erigena. On the basis of the psychological triad of reason, understanding, and the senses, he builds up the divine triad of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. But, however well such an analogy may suit his Neo-Platonic idea of God, it is very far from the track which the Church has chosen to follow: indeed, he makes trinity a mere name. At the beginning of the latter part of the middle ages, the period of scholasticism proper, Anselm proved very successful in refuting the nominalistic tritheism of Roscellin; but the positive exposition of his own views is cold and abstruse. Quite otherwise with Richard of St. Victor, who poured his whole wealth of half-poetical mysticism into the subject, and produced one of the greatest efforts of medieval theology. God is love, he says; but love is not the highest love, unless that which is loved has the highest worth. God can love only God. Thus the step is made from the one hypostasis to the other, from the Father to the Son. The next step, from the first two hypostases to the third,—from the Father and the Son to the Holy Spirit,—is not made with the same unwavering certainty. Love, he says, has always a longing after communicating itself to the idea that the true Christian seeks and finds the traces of the Holy Trinity everywhere in the creation, from the most modest flower in the field to the most gorgeous flower in the fields and the things around us, but utterly incomprehensible when contemplated in separation from the world as the absolute unity. He acknowledged that it was “almost” necessary to accept the idea of a personal god: “but” the case had to him also another side. His exposition of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity is Sabellian. But, while Schleiermacher thus treated the dogma with apparent indifference, hardly a decade elapsed after the publication of his Der christliche Glaube (1821–22), before it once more came to the foreground, and again assumed, though under various forms, its old position as the true centre of the whole theological system. The old psychological analogy, first invented by Augustine, and then elaborated in a somewhat eccentric way by Scotus Erigena, but never wholly abandoned by the schoolmen, has been renewed (K. Ph. Fischer, Billroth, Martensen); and more especially the abstract form of self-consciousness — the subject making itself object, and through that process returning to itself as self-conscious — has furnished a fertile scheme for trinitarian speculation. The old attempt at developing the Holy Trinity by means of the idea of the world (well known to the ancient Church from the apologists, and to the middle ages from Anselm), has also been repeated with success (J. H. Fichte, Weisse, Twesten). It allure the interest of the philosopher by its undeniable connection with the profoundest efforts of the classical, especially the Alexandrian speculation; and at the same time it takes hold of the attention of the theologian, because Scripture undoubtedly places the Son, the Logos, in connection with the idea of the world (the idea of the world, however, has perhaps been the return to the fundamental idea of Richard of St. Victor, to represent the Holy Trinity as founded in the idea of God as love (Julius Muller, Nitzsch, Dorner).
TRINITARIANISM denoted a conception of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity which emphasizes the triad so strongly, that it forgets, or seems to forget, the unity. No Christian theologian has ever taught that there were three gods; but the expositions of the trinitarian mystery have sometimes endangered the principle of the unity, as, for instance, in the Eastern Church in the sixth century, and in the Western in the eleventh. In Alexandria a party arose which received the name of Tristheists, on account of their sharp distinction between the three divine persons. Among their leaders were PhiloHonos, Conon of Tarsus, Eugenius of Seleucia, and others. Under the reign of Justin II. (565-578) they appeared in Constantinople, and a disputation was held between them and the orthodox Patriarch John, though without any result. The further vicissitudes of the sect are not known. See LEONTIUS BYZANTINUS: De Sectis, v.; JOHN DAMASCENUS: De Hcr.; NICETHEUS CALVITI: Eccl. Hist., xviii. 47-49. Roscelin, the father of nominalism, taught theology and philosophy at Tours, and was accused of tritheism by Anselm. His views were condemned by the synod of Soissons (1092), and he retracted. TRINITY SUNDAY. THE introduction of the additional clause "in Bumr, Diet. Theol. a. seminar. experimental interest in the atonement. See er res xmm; ("mother of Theodosius 11., through a boy, who, being of Theodosius 11., through a boy, who, being caught up into the sky, heard it from the angels, ("Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us ") The origin of this formula is involved in obscurity. The tradition that it was received during an earthquake at Constantinople, in the reign of Theodosius II., through a boy, who, being caught up into the sky, heard it from the angels, is unreliable. The earliest testimonies to the existence of the Trisagion date from the fifth century, or the latter part of the fourth. In the Church of England the Sundays from Whit Sunday to Advent are counted as the first, second, etc., till twenty-sixth Sunday after Trinity. The universal use in the Western Church of this festival of Trinity Sunday dates from Pope John XXII. (1384). TRISAGION, a liturgical formula, which, during the Monophysite controversy of the fifth century, secured dogmatic importance. It was originally nothing else than the ascription of praise in Isa. vi. 6. It was used at the beginning of divine service, and runs: θεός, θεός, θεός, θεός, διός δαναστός, ελεόν υμι. ("Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us!") The origin of this formula is involved in obscurity. The tradition that it was received during an earthquake at Constantinople, in the reign of Theodosius II., through a boy, who, being caught up into the sky, heard it from the angels, is unreliable. The earliest testimonies to the existence of the Trisagion date from the fifth century, or the latter part of the fourth. In Antioch the clause was added, ε σταρόντες δι' ημά ("who was crucified for us"), and probably originated with the Nestorians during the patriarchal chair of Antioch,—Peter the Fuller. The defenders of the orthodox doctrine found in this change the rudest Eutychianism. Peter's orthodox successor, Calendio, did not throw out the phrase, but changed its reference by prefixing the expression θανατεύχει ὑμᾶς ("Christ our King"). On his re-instatement, Peter cast out this limiting clause. The introduction of the additional clause under Anastasius, who was inclined to Monophysitism, led to bloody scenes at Constantinople. It was in fact, as Walch first (Ketzehistorie, vii. 324 sqq.), and Dorner since, have shown, a supplement to the expression θανατεύχει ("mother of God"), with which the Nestorian controversy began. The suffering of the divine nature on the cross, emphasized by it, grew out of a deep experimental interest in the atonement. See Peter Allix: Dias. de Triagis origine, Rouen, 1815; Burerius: Codex Liturgicus, ii. 155 sqq.; Daniel: Codex Liturgicus, vol. iv. (and art. "Triagion," in Blunt, Dict. Theol.). H. SCHMIDT.

TRITHEISM, Johann, a distinguished German theologian of the period just preceding the Reformation; was b. at Tritenheim, near Trier, Feb. 1, 1462; d. at Würzburg, Dec. 16, 1516. He struggled hard with poverty, but succeeded in securing an education at Heidelberg. On his way home from that city, he stopped at a convent at Spanheim; and, being prevented by a violent storm from starting on his journey at the hour intended, he took it as an indication of the will of Providence, continued at the convent, became a monk, and was elected abbot when only twenty-one years old. The convent became famous under his direction. Reuchlin and Pirkheimer were among his friends and correspondents. In 1506 he was transferred to a convent in Würzburg. Trithemius wrote a number of works on the natural sciences, scholasticism, etc., most of which were published after his death. Among them are Naturium libri sex; Historia et graphia, sive de ratione occulta scribendi, Frankfurt, 1606; Sermones et exhortationes ad Monachos, 1516. He laid in Germany the foundation of church history by his works, Catalog. illustr. virorum Germaniam suis ingenius et lucracionibus omnium sanctissimorum exornantium et De scrip. eccles. A full list of his writings is given by EHRARD: Geschichte d. Wiederaufblüehens wissenschaftlicher Bildung, etc., iii. 387 sqq., Magd., 1832. KLIPTEL.

He planted himself firmly and solely upon the authority of divine revelation as it is contained in theScriptures. He also contended against the accommodation theory of authority of divinerevelation as it is contained in the evidential value of the miracles. He sought to prove the integrity and credibility of the New Testament, and thence to deduce the authority of Christ as the sun of God, laying special emphasis upon the evidentvalue of the miracles. The results of exegesis, and not merely processes of ratiocination. His own theological system is laid down in his last greatwork, Dogmatics (1783, the Gospel of John (1786), the Epistle to the Hebrews (1789), etc.). He planted himself firmly and solely upon the foundation-stone of Storr's theology, which is the absolute and divine contents of Revelation. The immediate followers of Storr, and representatives of the Old Tübingen school, were the brothers Johann Friedrich Flatt (b. Feb. 20, 1759, at Tübingen; d. Nov. 24, 1821, at Tübingen), Karl Christian Flatt (b. Aug. 18, 1772, in Stuttgart; d. Nov. 20, 1843), and Friedrich Gottlieb Suskind (b. Feb. 17, 1767, at Neustadt; d. at Stuttgart, 1829). All three were pupils of Storr, and became professors at Tübingen. The elder Flatt edited the Magazin für Dogmatik und Moral from 1796 to 1803, when it was continued by Suskind. This periodical became the organ of the school, which contended against Kant. In which the attempt was made to prove, in the current topics of the Tübingen circle, the absolute and divine contents of Revelation, the miracles of Christ, etc.

Another representative of the early Tübingen school was Ernst Gottlob Bengel (b. 1769; d. March 26, 1826), a grandson of the great commentator Bengel, who, as professor of theology and church history at Tübingen, exerted a very extensive influence. He was somewhat more liberal than his predecessors. Steudel and Christian Friedrich Schmid also represented the same general tendency. It was the idea of supranaturalism, the idea that in Christianity something more than human powers and blessings is conferred, that Scripture is for both intellectual and exegetical skill. Theirs is the merit of having defended the inheritance of the fathers, and preserved it for a better period. Though they did not build up so well as they fought, yet there are times when a militant theology must fight with both hands, and not merely with truth; and thus they fought, and in doing so conscientiously, they did what they could to defend the truth (Mark xiv. 8)

II. THE MODERN SCHOOL. — The central figure of the Modern Tübingen school of theology is Ferdinand Christian Baur (b. June 21, 1792; professor at Tübingen, 1826; d. Dec. 2, 1860), with whose death its characteristic philosophical and theological positions were relinquished. Limiting the history of the school to the lifetime of its founder, we distinguish three periods,—the preparatory period, characterized by studies into the history of Christian doctrines, and lasting till 1835; the flourishing period, characterized by critical investigations into the contents and origin of the New Testament, lasting till 1848; and the period of disintegration, characterized by historical studies, and lasting till 1860.

Baur's fundamental principles concerning the nature of history and the progress of history were taken from Hegel's philosophy; although he never placed himself among Hegel's followers, but rather denied having used him as his master. The Hegelian terminology clearly appears in his work against Möhler, Gegensatz des Protestantismus u. Catholizismus, which was published in 1834. He applied the Hegelian principle of intellectual development with great success in the study of Christian doctrines, and brought it to bear in his work on the Trinity and incarnation of God (Dreieinigkeit u. Menschwerdung Gottes, Tubing., 1841-43, 4 vols.). A new impulse in the study of the history of Christian doctrine dates from these investigations of Baur.

Baur's importance, however, is not derived so much from these studies of Christian doctrine as from his investigations in the department of biblical criticism, which belong to the second period of the history of the Tübingen school. Strauss's Life of Christ appeared in 1855; but it was not this work which suggested to Baur the teacher, the principles which he worked out in his work on the history of the New Testament. It simply gave a new impetus to his studies. In 1835 Baur's work on the Pastoral Epistles appeared; in which the attempt was made to prove, from the alleged references to Gnostic systems, that they were the product of the second century. This work was the inauguration of a movement to tear asunder the writings of the New Testament, and to use them as a foundation-stone for reconstructing the whole church history of the first two centuries. The Gnostic systems were used to carry out the programme. But Baur had already made the discovery of a great difference in the apostolic age, between the older apostles and Paul. This was the fruitful and inexhaustible proposition with which the Tübingen school worked for a quarter of a century. It was stated by Baur, in an article on the Christ party at Corinth, published in the Tübingen Zeitung in 1831. From thenceforth he sought to destroy what the Old Tubingen school had tried to establish. This task was left to himself and a few young men then occupying the position of privadozent; for the other professors at Tübingen were not in sympathy with the movement. Of these younger men, Zeller occupies the front rank. In the high scholarship, and keen thought he was not equal to the master, but surpassed him in the lucidity and elegance of his style. More audacious was Schweigler, with his rare critical gifts. Köstlin and G. Planck were exceedingly industrious. The most distinguished co-workers outside of Württemberg were Harnack, Holsten, and Ritschl.

The name of Paul was the one around which the critical study and ingenuity of the church marshalled their forces. Much appeared between 1830 and 1845; the Theologische Jahrbücher, edited by Zeller (1842 sqq.), being the organ of the movement. In the year 1845 Baur summed up the results of the investigations in his work on Paul (2d ed., 1866), in which he denied the Pauline authorship of all the Epistles attributed to Paul, except Galatians, First and Second Corinthians, and Romans. The genuineness of the last two chapters of Romans, however, was called in question. The historical picture which was left was this. The older apostles and the entire early church were Judaistic, and distinguished from the Jewish Church only by their faith in the crucified Christ as the Messiah. All the elements of a new religion which lie concealed in the teachings and life of Christ were undeveloped. Stephen in Acts and the church. He preached to the Gentiles; and the apostles, for the sake of peace, suppressed their hostility. But one party in the church grew more and more bitter against him. It was the endeavor of a later age to harmonize these conflicting parties and principles. Hence, wherever an ironic tone is met with in the New Testament, it is to be regarded as an unmistakable sign of the late date of the writing; and that there was no attempt made in the apostolic age to reconcile the two parties was proved by the Apocalypse of John, which is a product of Jewish-Christian narrowness.

The question was what the Christianity of Christ really was. Baur did not answer this until ten years after Straus had spoken. In the Jahrbücher for 1844, and a special book on the Gospels, published in 1847, he attempted to prove the un genuineness of John's Gospel. It was declared to have been written with the special purpose of reconciling the differences between Judaistic and Pauline Christianity, and consequently belonged to the second century. Mark, by concealing these differences, also betrayed that it was not apostolic; and Luke's Gospel was only a revision of Marcion's Gospel. Schweigler's Mattanurum, Ritschl's Gospel of Marcion and Gospel of Luke, and the first edition of his Origin of the Old Catholic Church (Entstehung d. altkath. Kirche), Köstlin's John's Docrt. System (Johanneischer Lehrbegriff), [Zeller's Acts of the Apostles], and other works, were the allies of Baur. But the most important of all was Schweigler's Post-Apocalyptic Age (Vorapokalypse), which gave no place to the death of Christ. The fundamental conception of Baur was, all after, not very different from that of Kant. The pure religion of reason came into the world with Christ, but was covered over in the succeeding periods. Baur refused to enter into an explanation of the "miracle" of the resurrection, regarding the faith of the apostles as the sufficient starting-point for the contemplation of the history of Christianity.

He endeavored to account for the development of Christianity, but denied its miracles. His so-called Tendenzkritik, while it led him to unsound conclusions, prepared the way for the brilliant achievements in the departments of church history and doctrine of the present generation, and must ever be a starting-point for the interpretation of the history of early Christianity. In his last years Baur had a faithful disciple in Northern Germany, in Holsten. Otherwise he stood almost alone.

Schweigler, Hausrat, and O. Pfleiderer denied the miracles, and accepted the vision hypothesis.

He was one of the commissioners at Savoy, but failed to attend. He was silenced for nonconformity. His controversy with Benjamin Whichcote is important as showing the break of a new era in Whichcote's work, out of the old era in Tuckney, the teacher. These eight letters discuss the use of reason in religion, as well as the differences among Christians, in a calm, dignified, and charitable spirit. They are models of Christian controversy. Tuckney's Parliament Sermons and other occasional pieces were published during his lifetime; but his principal works are posthumous: Forty sermons upon several occasions (London, 1670); Professiones theologicae (Amsterdam, 1670).

TUDELA, Benjamin of. See BENJAMIN OF TUDELA.

TUNKERS, or DUNKERS, so called from the German tunken ("to dip"), a denomination of Christians originating in Germany at the beginning of the last century. The name originally adopted by themselves, and which is now generally used, is simply "The Brethren;" but they frequently use the term "German Baptists," even in their official documents.

In the year 1708 Alexander Mack of Schwartz- man and a few of his neighbors agreed to meet together and study the word of God without reference to existing creeds, and to submit themselves wholly to its guidance, wherever it should lead them. Without being aware of the existence of any body of Christians holding similar views, they were led to adopt, (1) the Bible as their creed, without any catechism or other confession of faith; (2) the independent or congregational form of church government; (3) believers' baptism; and (4) immersion. To these general principles of the Baptist denomination they added in their Covenant of Conscience some views held, it would seem also without their knowledge, by the Friends; namely, an unpaid ministry, nonconformity to the world in dress, etc., and not to take oaths, or to engage in war.

In addition to these views and the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith (the Trinity, atonement, etc.), they agreed not to go to law, or to invoke the aid of the civil authorities, even in self-defence; to refuse interest on money; to salute one another with the kiss of charity; to anoint the sick with oil for recovery; and to celebrate the Communion in connection with the Agape, or love-feast (in imitation of the Paschal Supper), feet-washing, the salutation or "holy kiss," and giving the right hand of fellowship.

They also adopted trine immersion (in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost); the candidate kneeling, and being plunged by a forward movement under the water, from which they were sometimes called "Tumblers."

The little company of eight persons, whose names are piously preserved by the society, soon increased in numbers; and colonies were formed at Marienborn with John Naas as minister, and at Epstein with Christian Levy as minister. Although leading harmless and peaceful lives, the Brethren were persecuted by the State, which allowed no dissent from the authorized churches (the Lutheran, the Reformed, and the Catholic); and many of them took refuge in Holland, Friesland, and the Duchy of Cleves. Shortly after,
The society insists upon a regular ministry. Members are not allowed, "without being authorized by the church, to exhort in our public or general meetings" (Annual Meeting, 1859, art. 5). The ministers are of three orders or grades: (1) The lowest, called a minister of the first degree, who is regarded merely as an "assistant" in preaching, and is subject to the authority of his superiors in the ministry; (2) The minister of the second degree, who is always chosen from those of the first — he makes his own preaching appointments, baptizes, performs the marriage-ceremony, etc.; (3) The highest official is called the elder or bishop, sometimes the housekeeper, and is always taken from the ministers of the second degree, usually the senior. He presides at councils, love-feasts, etc., and exercises a general supervision over all the members. There is only one elder in each congregation, but there may be several ministers of the lower degrees.

The only other official in the church is the deacon. There are usually three or four of these in each congregation: they care for the poor and needy, and visit in couples all the members at their homes before the annual love-feast, to ascertain whether there are in peace and union.

The records of the early church at Germantown show that several of the sisters were chosen as deaconesses: but the sisters are no longer appointed to any official position in the church; and the Annual Meeting, 1859, decided "that a female cannot teach or preach in the ordinary acceptance of those terms, yet we cannot forbid them to prophesy" (art. 7). At installations (for ministers of the first and second degrees) and ordinations (for the bishops) the wife of the minister is also saluted by the congregation, the men giving the hand, and the sisters both the hand and kiss; "the church exhorting believing wives of teachers the duty of aiding, by their humble example and chaste conversation, their husbands in the solemn duty laid upon them" (Annual Meeting, 1852, art. 36).

The ministers and deacons are chosen from the congregation by the vote of all the members; the election of bishops, to be "guaranteed" from the congress of neighboring churches, i.e., ministers of neighboring churches who have been summoned by the congregation for that purpose. After devotional exercises, these brethren retire to some convenient, quiet place, where each member comes singly, and expresses his or her preference; all canvassing of the congregation, or "electioneering," being strictly forbidden. The brother who has the highest number of votes is declared elected; and the names of all others voted for, together with the number of votes cast for them, are kept secret.

All the affairs of the congregation are managed at a meeting or council of the members, presided over by the elder, and held statedly, or as often as occasion may require; the sisters having an equal voice with the brethren. District meetings and a general conference are held yearly: these are representative bodies. A certain number of churches conveniently located constitutes a district; each such "Old Order" church, one of whom must be a minister. The general conference, called the Annual Meeting, has, since 1866, been composed exclusively of ministers, one of them a bishop. There are two delegates from...
According to the gospel manner of dealing with all matters in dispute, the council, in one of the district meetings, referred to such minute questions of casuistry as whether the person who washes the feet must also wash the face, and whether these acts may be performed by different persons. There is a great difference of opinion on this question, and the council has decided that "members not willing to liberate their slaves should be dealt with according to the gospel manner of dealing with all transgressors." Testimony against the use of intoxicating drinks was given as early as 1781, and has continued to this day, though the Annual Meeting of 1842 considered it "not advisable for members to put their hands to the pledge, or to meddle with the proceeding and excitement of the world upon this subject." Members are not allowed to join secret societies.

Although a high school was founded by the Brethren in Germantown as early as 1762, education has not, until very recently, had much favor with them. The Annual Meeting, so recently as 1853, declared that "colleges are a very unsafe place for a simple follower of Christ, inasmuch as they are not only the school of the world, but a source of many sins, and a temptation to the fleshly mind." The first paper in the interests of the society, a monthly called The Gospel Visitor, was published by Henry Kurtz, in 1851, at Poland, O.; the next, a weekly called The Christian Family Companion, in 1864, by Henry Holinger, at Tyrone, Penn. Their present publications are,

To these three colleges should be added the normal school at Bridgewater, Va. The co-education of the sexes is regarded as "the only true method of education," but the principles of the Brethren as to plainness in dress are insisted upon, both for teachers and pupils. "Dresses are plain, without tucks, ruffles, etc. Gay attire and jewelry are prohibited" (Mount-Morris College Catalogue). But the Brethren continue to bear testimony against the establishment of "schools of whatever, theological schools or theological departments of schools or colleges" (Annual Meeting, 1882, art. 10). The same meeting approves of Sunday schools as "promotive of good;" but the unnecessary appendage of Sunday-school conventions is declared to be "contrary to the principles of the gospel, and contrary to the Scriptures" (art. 22).

views. In 1728, still living in solitary cottages or cells, they organized a distinct society, which soon assumed a monastic character; and several buildings were erected at Ephrata for the use of the order. There was at first a community of goods; but this was later partially abandoned, only the donations to the society, and the labor of the inmates of the cloisters, being regarded as common stock. Celibacy was enjoined upon those living in the cloisters, and was recommended to all others, but not absolutely required. They adopted a garb similar to that of the Capuchins, and, upon entering the order, assumed monastic names. Beissel took the name of Friedsam (Peaceable), to which the Brethren added that of Gottrech (Godright), and also gave him the title of Spiritual Father. Israel Eckerlin (Onesimus) was the first prior (Vorsteher). In 1740 the cloisters contained thirty-six single brethren and thirty-five sisters; and the members living in the neighborhood swelled the numbers of the Order of the Solitary to nearly three hundred. After the battle of Brandywine (1777), one of the buildings was used as a hospital for the wounded soldiers. The society derived its support from the proceeds of various mills (paper, grist, oil, Fulling, etc.), together with the labor of the members upon the farm and in various occupations within the cloister, especially printing. Their printing-press became quite famous. The Martyr-Book (Der Blutige Schauplatz, etc.), translated by them from the Dutch for the Mennonites, and printed in 1748, a large folio of 1,512 pages, is pronounced by Mr. S. W. Pennypacker (Pennsylvania Magazine of History, vol. v. p. 276) "the noblest specimen of American colonial bibliography." Nearly forty years before Robert Raikes established his Sabbath school in Gloucester, Ludwig Hacker, the teacher of the common school at Ephrata, established a school for religious instruction on Sabbath afternoons. The society flourished for nearly fifty years, or until the death of Beissel, which occurred in 1768. He was a learned and pious man; but differing from Luther upon the nature of the Eucharist, the efficacy of the Divine Word, and the human nature of Christ, he was opposed by the Protestants as well as by the Catholics. He died in 1782. His followers were afterward partially abandoned, and many of them, during the next century, took refuge in Saxony. In 1734 a number of families emigrated to Pennsylvania, and settled in Montgomery and the neighboring counties. For a hundred and fifty years they have held, each year, a festival (Gedächtnistag) in grateful memory of their arrival. They have but five or six churches, all of them in Montgomery and the adjoining counties, and number about two hundred families.

The doctrines, government, and discipline of the Schwenckfelders in many respects resemble those of the Friends, whom they also resemble in intelligent and pious zeal, leading sober, honest, peaceful, and industrious lives.

TURIBIUS, Alphonso, a saint of the Roman Catholic Church; was b. in Spain, Nov. 16, 1538; d. in Santa, Peru, Nov. 23, 1606. He entered the service of the state; was appointed president of Grenada by King Philip II., and in 1561 archbishop of Lima, although he was still a layman. He greatly distinguished himself in the management of his diocese, and it was impossible to destroy them; so the government conferred upon them the imperial firmans. The Christian churches, as well as communities of Jews and Pagans. In Egypt was the Coptic Church; in Europe, the Greek and the Armenian, Catholic Armenian, Latin, and Orthodox or Greek. In Central Asia accepted Mohammedanism when the Turks conquered the country. The Ottoman Turks founded a Mohammedan Empire, and carried on their wars in the name of the Prophet. When Sultan Selim conquered Egypt, he brought away the last of the caliphs of the family of the Prophet, and held him as a prisoner at Constantinople until he ceded to him his rights as caliph, or Imam-ul-Mussimin. Since that time the Ottoman sultans have claimed to be caliphs, or successors of the Prophet and the religious and national supremacy of Mohammed. The Sultan is in all things absolutely supreme; but he is expected to consult the Sheik-ul-Islam, an officer appointed by himself, in regard to any doubtful question. The Sheik-ul-Islam may give an answer himself, or he may consult the Ulema, i.e., the learned doctors of the law under him. This religious constitution of the Ottoman Empire has stood in the way of any real reform in the government. Everything is sacrificed to the interests of the caliphate. The Koran declares that any Mohammedan who may deny his faith shall be put to death; and there has consequently never been any such thing as religious liberty possible in Turkey, although, at times since the Crimean war, conversions to Christianity have been tolerated on account of the vigorous action of the English Government in defense of the few converts.

When the Turks conquered the country, they found already established in it a number of Christian churches, as well as communities of Jews and Pagans. In Egypt was the Coptic Church; in Asia, the Armenian, the Catholic, the Syriac, the Orthodox or Greek; in Europe, the Greek and the Roman Catholic. The majority of the adherents of these churches refused to become Mohammedans, and it was impossible to destroy them: so the Turks applied to them the third principle of the Koran, and allowed them to pay tribute, and live in the country as aliens. The church organizations, both Eastern and Western, have retained a high position in Turkey, or work through the missionaries. The most important are the British and Foreign Bible Society, the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, the London Religious Tract Society. The German missions are the Kaiserswerth Deaconesses, the Krishona Missions, and the Jerusalem Verein. These societies employ about 450 missionaries and assistants, and about 1,300 native assistants. The total number of Protestants in Turkey is estimated at 40,000, of whom about 10,000 are communicants. Details cannot be given in the space allowed for this article in regard to all of the societies, but the most important ones merit special attention. First of all, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which originally represented the Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, and Congregational churches of America, but since 1870 only the last. The work of this board in Turkey was commenced in 1819, when two missionaries, Mears, Fisk and Parsons, were sent out to begin work at Jerusalem. This mission was never fairly established, but in 1823 the Syrian mission was commenced at Beyrout. The Armenian mission was founded at Constantinople in 1831, and the Jewish mission in 1832, the Assyrian mission in 1849, and the Bulgarian in 1856. Several missionaries have at times been appointed to work among the Mohammedans, but without any permanent result. The board has now four distinct missions in Turkey,—the European, Western, Central, and Eastern Turkey missions; and its work is chiefly among the Armenians, Bulgarians, and Greeks.

The mission to Syria was transferred by the American Board in 1865 to the Presbyterian Church, and reports the following statistics: missionaries, 33; native laborers, 155; churches, 12; communicants, 877; added during the year, 58; theological and high schools, 9; high schools for girls, 3; common schools, 97; pupils in all, 4,371; pages printed from beginning, 206,715; 27,150. The mission in Syria was founded in 1834, and reports the following statistics, Dec. 31, 1881: missionaries, 24; native laborers, 146; churches, 13; communicants, 1,188; added during the year, 205; theological and high schools, 2; high schools for girls, 2; common schools, 44; pupils in all, 2,410; volumes of books sold during year 1881, 27,150. Most of the printing for this mission has been done at Beyrout, and is included in the statistics of the Syrian mission.

The mission to the Jews in Turkey all conducted by the London Jews Society, which has 5 stations, 7 missionaries, 2 medical missionaries, 6 helpers, and 6 schools; the church of Scotland, which has 5 stations, 5 missionaries, 1 medical missionary, 6 helpers, and 6 schools; the Free Church of Scotland, which has 2 stations, 2 missionaries; and the Commissioned Em misses of New York, which has four organized churches. It is supposed that the wives of the missionaries are not included in these statistics, as they are in those which precede them.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has eleven depots and depositories in Turkey, with a central agency at Constantinople. It now employs thirty-three colportors. It commenced work in Turkey about 1806. It has circulated the Bible in thirty-five languages, to the amount of 1,958,804 volumes. The American Bible Society has a central agency at Constantinople. Its most important branch is Beyrout; but it operates through all the stations of the American missions. It now employs 50 colportors. It circulates the Bible in twenty-six languages, and the total number of volumes circulated since 1858 is 501,805.

Both of these societies have worked in such close connection with the missionary societies, and have so generally depended upon the missionaries for their translations and for the work of publication, that it is impossible to say exactly how large a proportion of the volumes reported above is included in the statistics already given in connection with the missions. Up to 1856 the missionaries acted as agents of the American Bible Society. Robert College at Constantinople, and the Syrian Protestant College at Beyrout, are independent, endowed institutions, not connected with any missionary society; but they are the fruit of missionary work. Robert College has 17 professors and instructors, and 288 students. Its course of instruction is similar to that of the best American colleges. It was founded in 1863. The Syrian Protestant College has a medical department in addition to its college course, and was founded in 1865. It has 16 professors and instructors, and 127 students. These colleges are both American institutions, and in both the language of instruction is English. Their students represent almost all the languages, religions, and nationalities of the East.

The real influence of Protestant missions in Turkey cannot be measured by any such statistics as those given above. It has been not only religious, but intellectual, social, and political. It has modified the character of the Oriental churches, and to some extent reformed them. It has carried Western ideas and Christian civilization into the darkest corners of the empire. Many English statesmen familiar with Turkish affairs have declared that American missionaries have accomplished more for the regeneration of the Orient than all other influences combined. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe and Lord Shaftesbury may be mentioned, among others, as having expressed this opinion.

of Roman-Catholic missions in Turkey; although an offer was made to publish what they might furnish, without note or comment. Without such statistics, only general statements can be made.

All Roman-Catholic missions in Turkey are political agencies of the French Government, and such receive pecuniary aid and diplomatic support, even from the present anti-clerical government of France. In return for this they are expected to propagate and sustain French influence under all circumstances. So far as my observation goes, the principal Catholic organizations represented in Turkey are the Lazarists, Mechitarists, Franciscans, Dominicans, Capuchins, Carmelites, Jesuits, and various organizations of Sisters of Charity. For many years past they have made but little apparent progress in winning converts from other Christian churches, and they have not attempted to convert Mohammedans.

For a time the Bulgarians, after their conversion to Christianity, inclined toward Rome; but they finally united with the Eastern Church; and only to Rome; and, since the expulsion of the religious orders from France, this mission has been largely re-enforced, and French protection has been offered to converts, especially in Macedonia. The results have thus far been small. In Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Albania, there is a strong Catholic element; and the Austrian Government is doing its best to increase its influence, thus far weakened these churches, nor have they made progress in winning over the Oriental churches to a union with Rome. They have not essentially weakened these churches, nor have they made converts enough to enter into any rivalry with them. They will not advance farther, unless in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina the country falls under the control of some Catholic power.

His lectures were published in 1894. At Tronchin’s death, in 1705, he was transferred to the chair of theology. Turretin’s influence as a pastor, a theologian, and a man, was very great. His career was specially marked by the successful effort to modify the strict Calvinism which his father had taught, and an attempt to promote a union of the Reformed and Lutheran churches. It was mainly due to his efforts that the rule was abolished, in 1706, requiring ministers to subscribe to the Helvetic Consensus, with the words, sic sentio, sic profito, sic docedo et contrarium non docedo. In 1725 the Consensus was finally renounced. As regards ecclesiastical union, Turretin was led to interest himself for the first time in the subject in 1707, when he heard that Frederick I. of Prussia, who was desirous of bringing the Lutherans and Reformed churches together, sought for the opinion of the Genevan clergy on the subject. They replied on April 22, in a document drawn up by Turretin, which emphasized the points of agreement between the two communions, and expressed a hearty readiness to admit Lutherans to the Lord’s Table in Reformed churches. Turretin was thus led to consider the distinction between the fundamental and non-fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and to incorporate his views in a volume [English translation, A Discourse concerning the Fundamental Articles in Religion, London, 1720]. He defines the fundamental doctrines to be those doctrines “a knowledge and acceptance of which are necessary to secure the grace and salvation of God” and a number of sermons, and especially a Defence de la fidélité des traditions de la Bible faites à Genève, Geneva, 1818-20, 2 vols. — II. François, son of the preceding, a distinguished representative of Calvinism; was b. in Geneva, [Oct. 17], 1739; d. there [Sept. 28], 1837. After studying at Geneva, Leyden, Paris (where he heard Gassendi), Montauban, and Nismes, he became pastor of the Italian congregation in Geneva, and in 1853 professor of theology in this city. He is specially known for his zealous opposition to the theology of Saumur, as the earnest champion of the strictest orthodoxy of the canons of Dort, and as one of the authors of the Helvetic Consensus. He sternly opposed his more liberal colleagues, Mestrezat and Louis Tronchin, and exercised a preponderating influence upon the Genevan ministry of his day. His principal work is his Theologische Institutions, Instituto theologico religionis et divini officii, qui status communi praebetur, in quibus veritatis, praecipua Orthodozorum argumenta proponitur, praepositorum et vindicatur et fontes solutionum aperiuntur, Geneva, 1679-85, 2d ed., 1688, 3 vols., new edition, Edinburgh, 1847-48. — III. logian (first president of the Theological Inistitute of Connecticut, now located at Hartford); b. in Middlebury (then a part of Woodbury), Conn., July 10, 1783; d. at East Windsor, Conn., May 14, 1858. He was graduated at Yale College in 1804; spent a year as teacher in Weston, Conn.; studied theology with the Rev. Asahel Hooker at Goshen, Conn.; licensed in 1806; begun to preach in 1807 at South Britain, where he was ordained in 1808; became president of Dartmouth College in 1822; received the degree of D.D. from Middlebury College the same year; succeeded
Dr. Payson as pastor of Second Congregational Church, Portland, Me., in 1828; elected president of the Theological Institute in 1833; inaugurated May 15, 1834, when the corner-stone of the new edifice was laid in East Windsor, Conn.; resigned this position July 16, 1857, and died suddenly at the house of his daughter, from a

TYANA, the Synod of, held in 368 in Tyana, Cappadocia, has some importance in the history of the spread of the Nicene doctrine of the co-esentiality of the Son. Eusebius of Cesarea in Cappadocia, Athanasius of Ankyra, Gregory Nazianzen, and others, were present. A deputation which had been appointed by the Armenians was present, and professed the Nicene faith. The synod proposed a great council at Tarsus for the renewed affirmation of the Nicene faith, but it was interdicted by the Emperor Valens. See

TYCHENIUS, d. about 390; belonged to the Donatist sect, though without giving up his connection with the Catholic Church, for which rea-sion he was violently attacked by Parmenianus as a traitor. Of his writings, we have only one, Liber de septem regulis; but as the first attempt at forming a theory of Christian hermeneutics, and on account of the influence which its author exercised on Augustine, it is of great interest. It was first edited by GRYNÉUS, Basel, 1569, and best by GALLANDI, in his Bibl. Vet. Patr., viii. pp. 107-129.

TYSSE, William, D.D., by action of Parliament first moderator of the Westminster Assembly of Divines; b. at Speenham-Land, near Newbury, Berksire, Eng., 1652; d. in London, July 20, 1646. He was a fellow of New College, Oxford.
In 1684 he proceeded D.D., and then became chaplain to the princess-palatine, daughter of James I. On his return he was made vicar of Newbury, and so remained until compelled to leave at the beginning of the Civil War; although he had been offered a prebend's stall at Winchester, several other preferments in the Church of England, and the professorship of divinity at Franeker, Friesland. He was of German descent, noted as a high Calvinist of the supralapsarian school, full of learning and speculative genius, but not well fitted to preside over such an assembly. He distinguished himself by his writings against Arminianism. See Opera, Amsterdam, 1652, 3 vols. folio. He also wrote, The morality of the Fourth commandment as still in force to bind Christians, London, 1641, 4to; The riches of God's love unto the vessels of mercy consistent with his absolute hatred or repudiation of the vessels of wrath, Oxford, 1653, folio. He was buried in St. Peter's, Westminster; but his bones were dug up, by order of council, Sept. 14, 1691, and thrown, with those of other persons, into a pit in St. Mark's churchret's churchyard. See NEAL: Hist. Puritans,

all these positions Dr. Tyler was successful; and though much of his public life was spent in theological controversy, his Christian character was recognized even by his opponents, while his friends testify as to his genial temper, unaffected candor, genuine humility, and cheerful piety. As a teacher of theology he was clear in statement, apt in meeting objections, and, above all, successful in making his pupils feel that he believed, felt, and lived the truth he taught them.

Dr. Tyders name has been conspicuous in connection with a theological controversy among the Congregationalists of Connecticut, which was occasioned by a discourse of N. W. Taylor, D.D., (concio ad clerum, General Association, 1828), professor in the recently established divinity school of Yale College. On a visit to Connecticut in 1829 (he was then pastor at Portland), Dr. Tyler collected the pamphlets which had been issued in the controversy, and shortly afterwards began a correspondence with Dr. Taylor (who had been a classmate at Yale), which passed into a public discussion, continuing for years, and finding its practical issue in the formation of the Pastoral Union of Connecticut (Sept. 10, 1833), and the establishment of the Theological Institute, of which Dr. Tyler became president. The views of Dr. Taylor were regarded by those who took this step, as "dangerous innovations," and the Pastoral Union was organized with a creed which left no room for doubt on the points at issue.

The germ of the controversy was the position, attributed to Dr. Taylor, "that no human being can become depraved but by his own act, and that the sinfulness of the race does not pertain to man's nature." In connection with this, regeneration was regarded as the act of man's own will or heart; and the primary cause of this right choice was regarded as the act of man's own will or heart, and the primary cause of this right choice was regarded by those who took this step, as "dangerous innovations," and the Pastoral Union was organized with a creed which left no room for doubt on the points at issue.

Of Dr. Tyler's views Dr. Tyler not only contributed largely to the theological controversy above named, but published many sermons and addresses, and contributed many articles to the religious periodicals of the day.—Christian Sentinel, Christian Spectator, National Preacher, Connecticut Magazine, New England Panopolist, etc. His style is forcible and clear; and his matter always manifests the grand Old Puritan faith in a personal God of holiness.

M. R. RIDDLE.

TYNDALE, William, descended from an ancient Northumbrian family, b. 1484, most probably at North Blyie, Gloucestershire; went to school at Oxford, and afterwards to Magdalen Hall and Cambridge, and about 1520 became tutor in the family of Sir Humphrey Monmouth, and also pecuniary aided, at Little Sodbury in Gloucestershire. He was in orders; but the record of his ordination has not yet been verified. Having become attached to the doctrines of the Reformation, and devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, the open avowal of his sentiments in the house of Walsh, his disputes with Roman-Catholic dignitaries there, and especially his preaching, excited much opposition, and led to his removal to London (about October, 1529), where he began to preach, and made many friends among the laity, but none among ecclesiastics. He was hospitably entertained at the house of Sir Humphrey Monmouth, and also pecuniarily aided by him and others in the accomplishment of his purpose to translate the Scriptures into the vernacular. Unable to do so in England, he set out for the Continent (about May, 1524), and appears to have visited Hamburg and Wittenberg; but the place where he translated the New Testament, and whom he connected to have been Wittenberg, cannot be named with certainty. It is, however, certain that the printing of the New Testament in quarto was begun at Cologne (in the summer of 1535), and completed at Worms, and that there was likewise printed an octavo edition (both before the end of that year). From an entry in Spalatin’s Diary, Aug. 11, 1526, it seems to follow that he continued at Worms about a year: but the notices of his connection with Hermann von dem Busche and the University of Marburg are utterly unwarranted conjectures; and, if being now an established fact that Hans Lut never had a printing-press at Marburg, the colophon to Tyndale’s translation of Genesis, and the titlespages of several pamphlets purporting to have been printed by Luft at Marburg, only deepen the seemingly impenetrable mystery which overhangs the life of Tyndale during the interval between his departure from Worms and his final settlement at Antwerp. His literary activity during that interval was extraordinary. When he left England, his knowledge of Hebrew, if he had any, was of the most rudimentary nature; and yet he mastered that difficult tongue so as to produce from the original an admirable translation of all of the entire Pentateuch, the Books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, First and Second Samuel, First and Second Kings, First Chronicles, contained in Matthew’s Bible of 1537, and of the Book of Jonah, so excellent, indeed, that to this day his work is not only secure and well chosen, that neither the ecclesiastics, nor diplomatic emissaries of Wolsey, but constitutes nine-tenths of that translation (both before the end of that year). From an entry in Spalatin’s Diary, Aug. 11, 1526, it seems to be a sthumous publication. Joshua was of the most rudimentary nature; and yet he stands foremost among the writers of the period, whose heroic fortitude and invincible love of the truth were heard with a force superior to royal and ecclesiastical injunctions; and the very flames to which he was to be subjected either for heresy or treason, or both, and convicted; was first strangled, and then burnt in the prison-yard, Oct. 6, 1536. His last words were, “Lord, open the king of England’s eyes.”

Excepting the narrative of Foxe, which is very unsatisfactory, and the opportune discovery of a letter written by Tyndale in prison, showing that he was shamefully neglected, and that he continued his literary labors to the last, no official records of his betrayal, arrest, trial, and martyrdom, have as yet been discovered. Indeed, less is known of Tyndale than of almost any of his contemporaries, and his history remains to be written. If the unknown and the mysterious excite and sustain our interest, no theme can excel that attached to Tyndale. His life must have abounded in incident, variety, and adventure; and it has culminated in tragedy. The writer has thus far striven in vain to secure additional information; but, as it is improbable that some of the records have been destroyed or lost, some may be recovered. That his precious life might have been saved, cannot be doubted; and, although neither Cromwell nor Henry has been convicted of planning and convincing at his death, it is impossible to exonerate them from criminal indiffernce and culpable neglect.

Tyndale’s place in history has not yet been sufficiently established as a translator of the Scriptures, as an apostle of liberty, and as a chief promoter of the Reformation in England. In all these respects his influence has been singularly undervalued. The sweeping statement found in almost all our histories, that Tyndale translated from the Vulgate and Luther, is most damaging to the reputation of the writers who make it; for, as a matter of fact, it is contrary to truth, since his translations are made directly from the originals. (See Mombert: Handbook of the English Versions, chap. iv.) As an apostle of liberty, he stands foremost among the writers of the period, whose heroic fortitude and invincible love of the truth were heard with a force superior to royal and ecclesiastical injunctions; and the very flames to which fanaticism and tyranny consigned his writings burnt them into the very hearts of the people, and made them powerful instruments in attaching and converting multitudes to the principles of the Reformation; and it is not exaggeration to say, that the noble sentiments of William Tyndale, uttered in pure, strong Saxon English, and steeped in the doctrines of the gospel, gave shape to the views of the more conspicuous promoters of that grand movement, who, like himself, sealed their convictions with their blood.

1 Only two perfect copies of this version of the Pentateuch are known to exist, one in the Lenox Library, New York, and the other is in the Lenox Library, New York. A reprint of it, collated with the versions of Luther and Matthew (1537), was published in 1895 by the author of the article.
TYPE.

TYPE, from the Greek ῆῳς, means a prefiguration in a lower sphere of a fact belonging to a higher. It is allied to prophecy, allegory, and symbol: but prophecy is a prefiguration in words; type, in facts: allegory is a prefiguration through a fictitious image; type, in the form of full reality: symbol is a prefiguration by a hint which leads farther on through the natural association of the type, as a complete, self-sufficient representation.

Types, in this sense of the word, are of so frequent occurrence, both in nature and history, that no total view of any comprehensiveness can be formed without involving a typical element; and, on the other side, it comes so natural to the human mind to discover types, or, rather, to recognize them, that no true method of interpretation, in any sphere, can afford to neglect that element.

How prominent it was in scriptural interpretation at the time of Christ, the New Testament itself gives striking evidence. Christ represents the brazen serpent of the desert as the type of the crucifixion of the Son of man (John iii. 14), and Jonah as a type of the burial of the Son of man (Matt. xii. 40). Paul represents the first Adam as a type of the second Adam (Rom. v. 14), and the paschal lamb as a type of Christ (1 Cor. v. 7). It occurs in almost every book of the New Testament; and it was, indeed, one of the most prominent features of the general education and spiritual character of the age.

Led on by the spirit of the time, and partly, also, by the example of the New Testament, the Christian theologians plunged with all their heart into the "profound interpretation of Scripture," putting the whole apparatus of types, allegories, symbols, etc., in full operation. In the Eastern Church the arbitrariness of Justin and Origen provoked both Jews and Pagans (Tryphon and Celsius). In the Western Church the exuberance of Ambrose and Hilary was hardly checked by Augustine. Although Augustine never abandons the historical sense, he considered it slavish weakness to stick to the literal sense, as the Jews did. He distinguishes between four methods of interpretation, — secundam historiam, axiologiam (which discovers the purpose of an event), analogiam (which demonstrates the harmony between the Old and the New Testaments), and allegoriam.

Under the last head he further distinguishes between allegoria historiae, facti, sermonis, and sacrament, which divisions correspond to the four methods of interpretation prevailing during the middle ages, — historia, allegorica (including the typical), tropologica (comprising the ethical and parochial application), and analogica (explaining the bearing upon future life).

With the Reformation, the allegorical interpretation of Scripture came to a sudden end, at least so far as the evangelical church was concerned. Though Luther did not disdain to use the allegorical narrative as a means of edification, he, as well as Melancthon and the other Reformers, was fully aware of its illegitimacy when used as doctrinal evidence (see Apolog., xxi.). But, with the allegorical interpretation in general, the type, which had only a special form of it, was not discarded.

The Dutch theologian Rivetius made an acute and just distinction between type and allegory. The distinction was adopted by Gerard (Loci, ii. 67), and farther developed into distinctions between external and real types, and between types insani (established by Scripture itself) and types illati (introduced into Scripture by analogy).

Finally, Coccejus and the other great Dutch theologians, Hulsius, D'Outrein, Van Till, Vitringa, made the typical interpretation as prevalent in the Reformed Church as the allegorical had been in the Church; and it was, indeed, one of the most prominent features of the general education and spiritual character of the age.

It was, however, only within the narrow circle of the Wurtemberg Pietists that typology was really cultivated. Outside of that circle rationalism flourished, and to the eye of rationalism typical interpretation seemed a mere dream. An unbelieving view of the sacred history will never hit upon the true characteristics of the divine economy: where the religious reader finds preparation and fulfilment, the indifferent reader will find nothing but empty accommodation and subjective parallelisms. The Spencerian view of the Mosaic worship, as having been borrowed from the Egyptian and other Oriental religions, gradually destroyed the typical character of the Old Testament; and, towards the middle of the eighteenth century, Henke declared typology to be a "trick long ago played out." Semler, in his Vervolg einer freieren theologischen Lehrart (1760), declares, that, at all events, typology has nothing to do with true religion; and the unhappy method of interpretation was considered as completely destroyed by Rau's Freimüthige Untersuchung über die Typologie, 1784. It revived, however, with the general revival of religion in the beginning of the present century, and has since produced some of its finest fruits. See Hofmann: Wir- sagung und Erfüllung, Nürnberg, 1841, 2 vol., and E. Bömer, on the Revelation, 1855, the chapter, Zur biblischen Typik. A. TROLLE.

TYRE (the Greek Τύρρης, the Hebrew תְיוֹרֵע), a city of Phoenicia, and one of the most celebrated cities of antiquity, stood on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean, in latitude 33° 17' north. It consisted of two parts,—one situated on the mainland, and called Old Tyre, for some reason not known; and the other, the city proper, situated on an island, and containing the principal part of the town. It is first mentioned in Scripture in Josh. xix. 29, where it is spoken of as a fortified place. It was a monarchy, and not, like most of the great con-mmercial cities of antiquity, a republic. Its king, Hiram, entertained very friendly relations with David (2 Sam. v. 11) and Solomon (1 Kings vii. 15—45), who from Tyre obtained not only materials, but also workmen, for buildings. Afterwards the friendly relations between Israel and Tyre were disturbed; because the Tyrians began to buy Hebrew captives, and sell them as slaves to the Greeks and Edomites (Joel iii. 4—8; Amos i. 9, 10). Meanwhile the power of the city was steadily increasing. It planted the celebrated colony, Carthage, on the coast of Northern Africa, and subjugated the island of Cyprus, where rich copper-mines were opened. In 721 B.C. it was besieged by Shalmanezer, and in 585 B.C. by Nebuchadnezzar, but both times in vain, though the latter siege lasted for thirteen years. When Alexander the Great, after the battle of Issus (331), entered Phoenicia, Sidon, though at that time it was both richer and more powerful than Tyre, was prudent enough to submit, while Tyre in its pride decided to resist. After a siege of seven months it was taken, and from that calamity it never rose again: its independence was lost forever. It afterwards belonged to the Seleucid kingdom of Syria (1 Macc. xi. 59; 2 Macc. iv. 18, 44), and came then under Roman rule. At the time of Christ, however, it was still a commercial place of some consequence, though not so important as Sidon. It is mentioned in Matt. xi. 21, xv. 21, Luke vi. 17, x. 13; and in the apostolic age it contained a Christian congregation, with which Paul stayed for seven days (Acts xxii. 3—7). The present Sur stands on a peninsula, formed by the dam which Alexander constructed between the mainland and the island; but it is not much more than a village. See RHINER: De Tyro et prophetorum de ea vaticiniis, Basel, 1715; HENGENBERG: De rebus Tyriorum, Berl., 1832; RENAN: Mission de Phénicie; DE BERTOU: Sur la topographie de Tyr.

TZSCHRNER, Heinrich Gottlieb, a distinguished German theologian; was b. at Mitweida, Saxony, Nov. 14, 1778; d. at Leipzig, Feb. 17, 1828. After studying at Wittenberg and Leipzig, he became successively pastor at Mitweida, professor at Wittenberg in 1805, and professor of theology at Leipzig. He was also made pastor of St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig, and subsequently held other positions in connection with his professorship. He was a rationalist, with a strong leaning towards the supranaturalist school. He excelled as a pulpit orator. His principal work was his continuation of SCHÖCK'S Church History in 2 vols., Leipzig, 1810—12. He spent ten years upon a work edited by Niedner (Leipzig, 1829), Der Fall d. Heidenthumus. His Lectures on Theology were edited by Karl Hase, Leipzig, 1829. See H. G. TZSCHRNER: Skizze s. Lebens, etc., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1828.

(8) CROZER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY is situated fourteen miles south of Philadelphia, on the border of the city of Chester, in the borough of Upland, Delaware County, Penn. It was founded under the auspices of the Baptist denomination, by act of the Legislature, in 1867, and owes its name to the liberality of the children of John P. Crozer, Esq., then recently deceased, whose wide public munificence his family were simply carrying forward. For the establishment and permanent support of the institution they have contributed at least four hundred thousand dollars.

The seminary entered upon its work of instruction in the fall of 1868 with twenty students; graduated its first class in 1869, some having entered advanced in studies; and has now near two hundred alumni engaged in the work of the Christian ministry at home or abroad.

Its course of instruction extends through three years, and its diploma presupposes a thorough training in all those lines of study generally recognized as necessary to the candidate for the ministry. A special provision is made, however, for the training of those, also, who from any circumstances cannot pursue the study of the Bible in its original languages. They, on completing their course, receive a corresponding diploma.

UBBONITES (usual spelling; correctly, Ubbonites), a party of moderate Anabaptists founded in 1534 by Ubbo Philippe [Ubbe Philipzoon]. Born at Leuwarden, he was consecrated priest, and went with his brother, Dirk Philippe, over to the Anabaptists in 1533. He displayed great zeal for the establishment of a strict church-discipline, and ordained Dirk, David Joris, and Menno Simons preachers. The Ubbonites differed from the rest of the Anabaptists by denying that the kingdom of Christ was an earthly kingdom in which the pious were to exterminate the wicked. They rejected divorce. Ubbo died in 1568, but left the Anabaptists several years before his death, on account of their excesses, and went over to the Reformed Church. See JERHING: Hist. von denen Begebenheiten, Streitigkeiten u. Trennungen, so unter d. Taufgesinnin nen oder Mennonisten von ihrem Ursprunge an bis aufs Jahr 1615 vorgegangen, Jena, 1730 (containing a list of the tracts of Dirk and Ubbo Philippe); H. C. BERGMANN: De Ub. Philippii et Ubbonitis, Roet., 1733.

UBERTINUS, surnamed de Casali, from the place of his birth; d. about 1300; was one of the principal leaders of the strict party among the Franciscans, which insisted upon the rigid rule of poverty, and declared the church to be wholly corrupt. This party, led by Peter John Olivi (d. 1297), was condemned by Pope Alexander IV. (1255). Ubertinus laid down his views in the work Arbor vitae crucifiri (Venice, 1485), and a Defence of Olivi (in Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. v., Rome, 1733). Called upon to answer for his opinions by Clement V., he went, with the permission of John XXII., over to the Benedictines, and at a later period changed to the Carthusians. He also wrote Tractatus de sepiem statibus ecclesiae (a sort of commentary on the Apocalypse), Venice, 1516. NEUDECKER.

UBIQUITY is the designation of the doctrine stated by Luther, and held in the Lutheran Church, of the omnipresence of the humanity, and more especially of the body, of Christ. It was deduced from the doctrine of the hypostatic union of the two natures in Christ, and was designed to explain the real presence of the body in the Lord's Supper, upon which Luther insisted. The biblical passages for testing the doctrine are those which record the institution of the Lord's Supper, and refer to Christ's ascension, his session at the right hand of God (Eph. i. 20–23; Col. iii. 13; 1 Pet. iii. 22, etc.), and his presence with the church (Matt. xxviii. 20).

Origen and Gregory of Nyssa (Antirrheticus ad Apollinararem, c. 59) were the only ones of the Fathers who represent the glorified body of Christ as ubiquitous. Augustine expressly denies that the hypostatic union of the two natures had for its result that the human nature is everywhere, as God is everywhere (non est consequens, ut quid in Deo sit, ita sit ubique, ut Deus). The God-man is with his church everywhere in his majesty and grace, etc., but not in his flesh, which the Logos assumed. He is everywhere by reason of being God; but he is in heaven by reason of his human nature (ubiue per id, quod Deus est, in calce autem per id, quod homo). Thus he also said, in explanation of the word to the thief on the cross (Luke xxiii. 43), "Christ as man on that day, according to his flesh, would be in the grave; . . . but as God, that same Christ is always everywhere" (homo Christus illo die secundum carnem in sepulchro . . . Deus vero ipse idem Christus ubique semper est, Ep. 187). With Augustine, "the right hand of God," at which Christ sits, is a restricted locality. John of Damascus denied the local explanation of the expression, "right hand of God," but held that Christ's glorified body is localized, and distinguished from his earthly body by its immunity from pain and want (De Ortho. Fide, iv. 1, 3).

In the middle ages the Augustinian view prevailed. Hugo of St. Victor, in his work on the sacraments (ii. 1, 18), says, "Christ as to his humanity is in heaven, as to his divinity everywhere" (Christus secundum humanitatem in calo est, secundum divinitatem ubique). Peter Lombard (iii. 22), in the same tone, says that Christ as to his person is everywhere (totus ubique), but not as to his nature (seit non totum). The doctrine of the middle ages may be indicated by the three propositions: (1) Christ's divinity is ubiquitous; (2) His glorified body is confined to a certain celestial locality; (3) This same body is present by the miracle of transubstantiation wherever the Eucharist is celebrated.

It remained for Luther to formulate the doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's glorified body. He deduced it from the doctrine of the real presence in the Lord's Supper, and used it to explain the real presence. Although as early as 1520 he called the doctrine of transubstantiation the second prison in which the Roman Church had confined the consciences of men, he spoke of the Pisans of Bohemia as "heretics, because they do not believe that Christ's flesh and blood are truly present in the sacrament." His doctrine of the real presence was expressed in the words, the body and blood of Christ are "in, with, and under" the bread and the wine. He says, "The glorified body is in all the parts of the substance of bread," and illustrates it by the relation of fire and iron, "two distinct substances, and yet mingled in one glowing mass of iron, so that every part is iron and fire." There is an interpenetration of the body and bread, but no mixture. The clearest statement of Luther's views on this subject is found in his work on the Lord's Supper (1528), in the chapter headed De praedicacione identica. As in Christ, divinity and humanity were united in one person, and interpenetrated each other without any change, so, in the Lord's Supper, bread and body were united in a sacramental way, and interpenetrated each other without any change. In order to explain this process, Luther affirmed the ubiquity of the humanity and body of Christ. "Not only as to his divinity, but also to his humanity, he is everywhere present," he expressly says. "Heaven and earth are a bag, and as grain fills the bag, so he fills heaven and earth; and as my voice reaches so many ears, how much more can Christ distribute himself totally and indivisibly in so many pieces!" "The right hand of God can not be in a definite spot, but it is everywhere where God is. The three reasons he gives for the real presence are, that God is essentially and truly God and man in one person, that God's right hand is everywhere, and that God's word is not false.

Zwingli, Calvin, and Ecolampadius distinctly rejected the doctrine of ubiquity in rejecting Luther's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Melanchthon in his earlier period taught the doctrine of ubiquity, in 1530 edited a number of patristic testimonies to confirm the real presence, and expressly antagonized Zwingli's view that Christ's body can only be in one place. At a later period he renounced these views, and distinctly stated (Resp domino Stancarii) that "Christ is everywhere, but only according to his divine nature." In 1562 Joachim Westphal renewed the sacramental controversy, which seemed to have been ended, by denouncing Calvin as a Zwinglian; and at the suggestion of his friends, began to prepare himself for a professional career; took up his studies again at Heidelberg, and went to Berlin, where, under the influence especially of Neander, he adopted that evangelical type of theology which he became one of the most genial and distinguished representatives. In 1819 Ullmann began to lecture at Heidelberg, and in 1821 was elected professor. In 1825 he published a work on Gregory Nazianzen, which deserves a place at the side of Neander's monographs. In 1828 he founded, in connection with Umbreit, the Theologische Studien und Kritiken ("Theological Studies and Discussions"). It became the chief organ of the evangelical school of theology, represented by Neander, etc. The opening article, on the sinlessness of Jesus (Ueber die Unschuld Jesu), was subsequently published in an enlarged form under the title Die Sündlosigkeit Jesu ("The Sinlessness of Jesus," Eng. trans. from the 7th ed., Edinburgh, 1870), about which there have been many discussions (7th ed., 1868), and was one of the most valuable and influential writings of the modern evangelical school in Germany. In 1829 Ullmann followed a call to Halle, where he lectured on church history, symbols, and systematic theology. In 1833 an article appeared from his pen on John Wessel, which he afterwards incorporated in his principal historical work, Die Reformatorven vor d. Reformation, [2d ed., 1866, 2 vols., Eng. trans., "The Reformers before the Reformation," Edinburgh, 1841-42, 2 vols.] It is characterized by thoroughness of treatment, and grace and fervor of style. In 1850 he returned to Heidelberg. He wrote a number of articles against Strauss's Life of Christ (1835) and the principles it involved, one of which, directed against Strauss's suggestion of a change in the nature of public worship, was published, with a dedication to Gustav Schwab, under the title Ueber den Cultus d. Geniuus ("The Worship of Genius," 1850, 2 vols.), which 1855, and a number of articles against Stahlin's Christenthumus ("The Essence of Christianity," 1845, 5th ed., 1865), were translated, London, 1846.

ULLMANN, Karl, one of the first evangelical theologians of this century in Germany; the son of a clergyman; was b. at Epfenbach, near Heidelberg, March 15, 1796; d. at Carlsruhe, Jan. 12, 1865. In 1812 he entered the university of Heidelberg, where Paulus, Daub, and Schwarz were teaching their different systems of theology, and in 1813 passed to Daub's advice. Here he got admission to the circle of Uhland's friends, and formed an intimate friendship with the poet Gustav Schwab, which was only terminated by death. In 1817 he was ordained vicar of Kirchheim, near Heidelberg, but a year later, at the suggestion of his friends, began to prepare himself for a professional career; took up his studies again at Heidelberg, and went to Berlin, where, under the influence especially of Neander, he adopted that evangelical type of theology of which, dicated against Strauss's suggestion of a change in the nature of public worship, was published, with a dedication to Gustav Schwab, under the title Ueber den Cultus d. Geniuus ("The Worship of Genius," 1850, 2 vols.), against which 1855, and a number of articles against Stahlin's Christenthumus ("The Essence of Christianity," 1845, 5th ed., 1865), were translated, London, 1846.

ULPHILAS, the Apostle of the Goths (313–383). According to the Arian church historian, Philostorgius (Hist. Eccl., 2, 5), whose statement is corroborated by other Greek church historians, he belonged to a Cappadocian family which was carried away from its homeland as prisoners of war by the Goths, but which soon found itself so well installed among the captors, and so closely allied to them, that the son received a Gothic name, Wilpilas (“Little Wolf”). He was educated in Christianity and in Greek learning, and on account of his great natural gifts he was destined for the church. The Goths, at that time settled on the northern bank of the Danube, just outside the pale of the Roman Empire, were rank heathens; but they were converted by Ulphilas. His missionary labor among them must have begun very early; for in 343 he was ordained their bishop, probably by an Arian bishop, since he himself afterwards declared that Arianism had always been his faith. How successful his work was may be inferred from the fact that the Gothic chief Athanaric became frightened, and instituted a violent persecution in 350. But Ulphilas obtained permission from the Emperor Constantius to immigrate with his flock of converts to the Roman Empire, and to settle in Moesia near Neopolis, at the foot of Mount Hemus. Meanwhile the mission among the Goths north of the Danube did not stop its work; and in 370 a new persecution brought a new flock of Gothic converts into the Roman Empire, under the protection of the Emperor Valens. Shortly after, a Gothic chief, Frithigern, embraced Christianity, and his whole tribe following his example: and finally Athanaric himself was won for the new faith, which simply meant that the conversion of the whole Gothic nation was completed. They were Arians; and on Jan. 17, 388, a council was opened in Constantinople to the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation between the Arian Goths and the Orthodox Greek Church. It is probable that Ulphilas was present at that council. Its purpose, however, was not accomplished. See the art. Gothi.

In his missionary work, Ulphilas had use, not only for his natural gifts, but also for the accomplishments of his education. One of his most effective means of success was, no doubt, his translation of the Bible into the vernacular tongue of the Goths, for which he had to invent a new alphabet, a combination of Greek and Runic letters: it is the oldest existing monument of any Teutonic language. Whether he translated the whole Bible, or only portions, is doubtful: only fragments have come down to us. Seven codices have been discovered,—Codex Argenteus, written on purple vellum in gold and silver letters, dating from the sixth century, discovered in 1597 in the Benedictine library at Milan by Angelo Mai, and published with diplomatic accuracy by Uppström (1854); Codex Carolinus, discovered in the library of Wolfenbüttel in 1756, and published in 1762–68; finally, palimpsest fragments of five codices discovered in the Ambrosian library at Milan by Angelo Mai, and published 1819–38. The best collected editions of these fragments are those by Von der Gabelentz and Loebel, Leip., 1836–46, with Latin version, grammar, and lexicon; E. Bernhardt, Halle, 1875, with full critical notes; and Stamm, Paderborn, 1878 (7th ed. by M. Heyne), the most convenient manual edition. Bosworth, London, 1874, 2d ed.; and Skeat: The Gospel of St. Mark in Gothic, Oxford, 1889, with glossary, grammar, and notes.

ULRICH, Bishop of Augsburg, the son of Hupald, Count of Dillingen, was b. at Augsburg in 890; d. there July 4, 973. Made bishop in 923, he administered his diocese with conspicuous vigor and ability, and proved himself one of the greatest ecclesiastics of his day. Twice during his episcopate the Magyars laid siege to Augsburg. The first time (928) he mingled his prayers with the cries of the babes who were laid prostrate on the earth before the altar; the second time (955) he displayed great courage and firmness, and held out against great odds, till relieved by the army of the king. Ulrich practised a princely liberality, and laid Augsburg under obligation to him by ULTRAMONTANE, or ULTRAMONTANISTS (from the Latin, ultra montes, "beyond the mountains") are a party-name within the Roman-Catholic Church, applied to those who wish to see all power in the church concentrated in the Pope, in opposition to those who desire a more independent development of the national churches.

UMBREIT, Friedrich Wilhelm Karl, distinguished as the editor (from 1828) of the Theolog. Studien und Kritiken ("Theological Studies and Discussions"), and an expositor of the Old Testament; was b. at Sonneborn, near Gotha, April 11, 1795; d. at Heidelberg, April 26, 1856. He studied at Göttingen, where Eichhorn inspired him with enthusiasm for Oriental studies, and became privatdocent there in 1818. He accepted a call to Heidelberg as professor in 1820. Here he spent a quiet and happy life in the midst of an affectionate family and a large circle of friends. Rothe, in his funeral-address, speaks of "the childlikeness and broadness of his personal Christianity," and of his "intense interest in the study of the Old Testament, the beauty of whose poetry, and the divinity of whose contents, he profoundly recognized. It was his effort to find out the meaning of the Scriptures, and to secure for the Old Testament its proper place in Christian theology. Without being an Orientalist in the present sense of the term, he had an accurate knowledge of Hebrew, and a fine sense of appreciation for the characteristic traits of Oriental life; and without laying claim to being a keen critic, or a stern dogmatist, he entered into sympathy with the feelings of the men of God in the Old Testament. His first commentary was on Ecclesiastes (Gotha, 1818) by following commentaries on the Song of Solomon (Lied d. Liebes am ältesten aus d. Morgenlande, Neuausgabe mit ästhetisch erläutert, Göttingen, 1820, 2d ed., Heidelberg, 1828), Job (Heidelberg, 1824, 2d ed., 1822), the Proverbs (Philolog.-krit. u. histor. Studien über d. Salomonschen Weisheit, Heidelberg, 1829), the prophetical books, except Jonah and Daniel (Hamb., 1841-46, 4 vols., Isaia appearing in a second edition in 1846), Romans (Gotha, 1866). Umbreit's commentaries are practical, and display a profound sympathy with the life of the Old Testament. Whatever may be the opinion about their literary merits, there can be no doubt that he opened the eyes and hearts of many to the beauties and religion of the Old Testament, and that his whole personality, adorned as it was "with a rare combination of divine gifts and virtues," was one of the most beneficent influences in the history of the Verrichtungsgeschichte; [i.e., the conciliatory, unionistic school of modern German theology].

UNCIAL (from uncius, the "twelfth part" of any thing) and CURSIVE (i.e., in running, sc., hand) MANUSCRIPTS. The former are written in capital letters (litera uncialis, or majuscule), usually, but not necessarily, of large size; the latter, in small letters (litera minuscule), or in current hand. The uncials are written upon costly and durable velum or parchment, on quarto or small folio pages of one, two, even, though very rarely, of three or four columns. The older ones have no division of words or sentences, except for paragraphs, no accents or ornamented letters, and but very few manuscripts. The uncials are designated by Roman capitals, Greek letters after Cod. Z, and the Hebrew Aleph for the Cod. Sinaiticus. The number of uncial New-Testament manuscripts was probably once large; but they perished during the middle age, and now only eighty-three distinct manuscripts (not including lectionaries) are extant. The cursives manuscripts are indicated by Arabic numerals, number over a thousand, date from the ninth to the middle of the fifteenth century, are upon velum, parchment, cotton paper (which came into use in the ninth or tenth century), or on linen parchment (first introduced in the twelfth century). The comparatively late date decreases their critical value; but "some twenty or thirty of them are very important for their agreement with the oldest authorities, or for some other peculiarity." See for lists of uncials and important cursives, and further information, SCHNEIDER: A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, Cambridge, 1861, 3d ed., 1883; SCHAFF: Companion to the Greek Testament, New York, 1883, chap. ii. pp. 82-141; also art. UNIFORMITY. Acts of, denote several parliamentary decrees establishing the worship and ritual of the Church of England. The first, passed in 1549, set forth the penalties for the neglect to use the First Service-Book, which were, for the first offence, loss of the profits of one benefice for a year, and imprisonment for one year; for the second, loss of all benefices, and imprisonment for one year; for the third, imprisonment for life. The second Act was passed April 6, 1552, and established the revised Book of Common Prayer. The third and principal Act of Uniformity (after a strong opposition, passed April 28, 1558), established the new Prayer-Book under penalties similar to those of Edward VI., subjected all who were absent from church without excuse to a fine of one shilling, and gave to the sovereign liberty to "ordain and publish such further ceremonies and rites as may be most for the advancement of the church," etc. A fourth Act of Uniformity was passed May 19, 1662, and enforced the new revision of the Prayer-Book. It required all ministers to give their unfeigned assent and consent to every thing in the book before Aug. 24, and to swear "that it is not lawful, on any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the king." About two thousand clergy, some of them the most distinguished in England, unable to conform, were deprived of their livings. Neal, referring to the Elizabethan Act, says, "Upon this fatal rock of uniformity in things merely indifferent, in the opinion of the imposers, was the peace of the Church of England split" (History of Puritanism, i. p. 78, Harper's ed.). The Act of Uniformity was set aside by the Act of Toleration under William and Mary, May 24, 1689.

UNGENITUS. The first difference which entered Christendom, and threatened to split the Christian congregation, was that between Jewish and Gentile Christianity. It was hardly a difference either of doctrine or constitution, but simply one of social habits: nevertheless, it was important, even dangerous; and widely various views were held with respect to the solution of the problem it presented. Some thought that the Gentile Christians were not Christians in the full sense of the word, that they could never be considered as brethren, that baptism ought to be denied them, etc.; others, among whom was Paul, thought that it was not necessary to circumscribe a Gentile in order to make him a Christian, that the Gentile Christians should not be bound by the Jewish law, etc. From the very first, however, there seems to have been a third party, a middle party; and at the Synod of Jerusalem (Acts xv.) a reconciliation was easily brought about. Each party yielded something,—the Jewish Christians, the unlimited freedom of social habits; and thus the Christian congregation became able to present itself before the infidels as one social body, based on one common faith.

Much deeper, and consequently much more difficult to manage, was the difference which separated the Greek and Latin churches: it was one not of social habits, but of nationality. In spite of her social and political superiority, the Latin Church lived for a long time in complete doctrinal isolation from the Greek Church. But when, with one gigantic effort, Augustine developed the theology of the Latin Church, the internal difference between the two churches at once became manifest. The principal events which gave it practical shape were the Henotikon of Zeno (484), the decrees of the Concilium quinuexitosum (822), and the controversy in the ninth century between Nicholas I. and Photius. But it must not be overlooked, that, besides the national difference between East and West, the monarchical tendency of the Church of Rome —developed by Victor I., Stephen I., Leo the Great, Gregory the Great, and gradually established as the informing principle of her whole policy—exercised a powerful influence; and when the Council of Constantinople (867), instead of recognizing the supremacy of the Pope, excommunicated him, the separation was accomplished. From the fact, however, that the various attempts at union which were afterwards made were wrecked, not on the vanity and fickleness of the governing classes, but on the instinctive dislike and distrust of the mass of the peoples, it is evident that the split was not caused simply by a clash between sacerdotal ambitions, but had its roots deep in the nature of the people. A compact of union was subscribed by the Greek and Latin delegates at the Council of Lyons (1274), and accepted both by the emperor and the Pope; but it could not be carried out on account of the fanaticism of the Greek people. A similar compact, compromising the principal doctrinal divergences, and recognizing the supremacy of the Pope, was subscribed at the Council of Florence (1439), but proved to be of little practical consequence.

A still more decisive difference was established by the Reformation between the Roman-Catholic Church and the Evangelical churches. It was not one of social habits or nationality, but one of principle. By the Protestant principle, the unity of form was given up for the truth of the contents, and evangelical freedom was substituted for the despotism of tradition. It must not be understood, however, that, in the historical process from which the separation resulted, all the advantages were on the one side. The Protestant principle was not an invention of the Reformers. It has been present and at work in the Church from the day of her foundation, latent, unrecognized, suppressed, but never destroyed. On the other hand, the Roman-Catholic Church did not die by the separation, but continued to be the harbinger of much true religious life. These views were openly set forth by Hugo Grotius, in his On the Truth of the Christian Religion and other treatises; and in his annotated edition of Cassander's Consultation (1641) he even went so far as to recommend, under certain conditions, the Papacy as a mediate head of the Christian Church, at the basis of the theological system of Calixtus (see that article and Syncretism); and they actually prompted Leibnitz to undertake his attempt at uniting the Church of Rome and the Evangelical Church. If any man was fit for such an undertaking, he was. His philosophy gave him a position, religious as well as political, above the particular interests of the parties. He was intimately acquainted with many prominent and influential members of the Roman-Catholic Church, and he had the sympathy of the Protestant theologians of the school of Helmstadt: consequently, when he failed, as he did, it simply proves that the undertaking was as yet impossible. The details of the negotiations which ensued are given in the arts. Leibnitz, Molanus, and Spinola. The instrument of union which resulted from those negotiations, Regula circa Christianorum omnium ecclesiasticam unionem, was drawn up in 1583, but was not published until 1691, as it was made the basis for the negotiations in Hungary and France. It proposes to begin, not with a doctrinal, but with a political, union, to admit the whole Protestant clergy into the hierarchical system of the Roman-Catholic Church, and then try to work out a doctrinal reconciliation. It was favorably received by the Pope, but did not attract much interest among Roman-Catholics, and was considered with distrust and aversion by the Lutherans. In 1694 Bossuet suddenly broke off the correspondence which had been carried on with Leibnitz since 1691; and an attempt by the latter at renewing it, in 1701, called forth from the former only a peremptory dismissal of the case. See Hering: Geschichte der kirchl. Unionsversuche seit der Reformation, Leipzig, 1836-39. 2 vols. FR. NITZSCH.

More successful were the efforts for a union between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches: they led, at least in Prussia and Baden, to some practical results. Great exertions were made to prevent the split between the two Protestant churches in Germany, and Luther's refusal to join hands with Zwingli at Marburg (1529) has always been regretted. The Thirty-Years' War, however, called forth considerations so grave as to mitigate even the most irate temper. The colloquy of Leipzig (1631) had a good effect, though it could not prevent the strife from breaking out anew. The colloquy of Thorn (1618) was then abandoned. The two bodies, however, led to the establishment, at least of a good and peaceful modus vivendi between the two churches. As the electoral house of Brandenburg belonged to the Reformed faith after 1614, it was quite natural that the success of the colloquy of Cassel should induce the elector, Friedrich Wilhelm, to arrange a similar colloquy at Berlin (Sept. 8, 1662-May 29, 1663). The attempt failed utterly; and the temper of the Lutheran members may be inferred from the fact, that they refused to give up the so-called elenchum nominale, that is, the mentioning by name and from the pulpit of such Reformed preachers as seemed to them to be dangerous heretics. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) brought a great number of French Reformed colonists to settle in Brandenburg; and under Friedrich I., king of Prussia (1700-13), the court-preacher Jablonski (which article see) was active in behalf of the union. A number of the so-called Simultaneen were born, that is, in churches in which service was celebrated alternately after the Lutheran and Reformed rite. The period of religious indifference which followed during the reign of Friedrich II., and the spreading of rationalism, was, perhaps, not with-out some good consequences for the cause of the union. At all events, when, in the beginning of the present century, the Prussian Government proposed various measures for the speedy establishment of a United Evangelical Church in Prussia, they met with no considerable opposition. The clergy of Berlin declared in favor of the union at the synod of Oct. 29, 1817; and the new Agenda (which article see) was generally accepted in 1822. After 1830, however, disturbances of a half-religious and half-political character took place, and the embarrassments of the government were considerably aggravated in 1848; but the union was maintained in all the countries where it was introduced. [The relation of Church and State in Prussia was fixed by the laws of 1873 and 1876. See art. Prussia.]

UNION EVANGELICAL CHURCH. See above.

UNITARIANISM. The origin of this system of theology was in the rejection of the Trinity, or the doctrine of three persons—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—existing in the Godhead, and constituting one God. As monothelism was the antipode of polytheism, Unitarianism is the antipode of Trinitarianism. But associated with this fundamental doctrine are the denials, in general, of the fall of man in Adam as the federal head of the race, the total depravity of human nature, the vicarious atonement of Christ, and eternal punishment; and the affirmations of the mission of Christ to make a revelation of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; of the dignity of human nature, but its elementary and incomplete condition; of man's natural sonship to God; of sin, not as natural, but unnatural, to man; of the grace of God, and man's moral discipline here and eternal punishment; and the affirmations of the mission of Christ to make a revelation of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; of the dignity of human nature, but its elementary and incomplete condition; of man's natural sonship to God; of sin, not as natural, but unnatural, to man; of the grace of God, and man's moral discipline here and hereafter. The Unitarians regard the atonement as a moral agency designed to draw men to God, and reconcile, or make them at one, with God, as the term signifies, rather than as a legal or governmental expedient, or as a vicarious substitute in a literal sense to cancel human sins. Jesus, speaking of his cross, said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Christ is variously regarded as a being between God and man; or as a man superhumanly endowed, impeccable, and infallible; or as a mere man on the natural plane, but a natural religious genius of great power. The second view is the more common one among modern Unitarians. The Holy Spirit is identified with God himself, as the spirit of man as constituted man. The Holy Spirit indicates the holy influence which the mind of God exerts upon the mind of man. The prevailing views in regard to a future life are that of the inborn immortality of the soul, that of perpetual progress, and that of the hopeful, rather than the assertive, belief of the eventual restoration of all men to holiness and happiness,—conditions which Unitarians believe to be inseparably connected.

The method of attaining these results, and the working principles of this body of believers, are:
1. The Protestant canon of the right of private judgment;
2. Reason, or the moral and religious nature of man, as the final arbiter where creeds clash, or the doctors disagree;
3. The interpretation of the Scriptures after the spirit rather than the letter. This method of interpreting the Bible as an Oriental book, poetical, parabolic, and often paradoxical, has justified many of the Unitarian as well as Protestant conclusions in general, in regard to theological doctrines.

Thus the expression, "I and my Father are one," is taken not literally, as teaching identity of nature, and personality with the Father, but that union of will, love, and purpose with the Father, which is also predicated in the oneness of Christ and his apostles. "Labor not for the meat that perisheth," etc., is a Hebraism to exhort to seek spiritual ends in life more earnestly than material interests. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," is not a lesson of the actual presence, but of the necessity of nourishing the soul with the teaching of Jesus, and blending it with the whole spiritual constitution as thoroughly as food is digested, and assimilated to the body. The delivery of the keys of the kingdom of heaven to Peter, and his authorization to bind and loose, are explained and qualified elsewhere by the same distinction being granted to the whole body of the apostles. The declaration that a man must hate his father and his mother in order to be an accepted disciple of Christ, is well understood by the Hebrew scholar to signify, not the literal hatred of parents, a sense the farthest possible from the spirit of Jesus, but the preference of spiritual things to natural ones when they come into competition. This method is not, as often charged, regarded by this body of Christians as explaining away the true sense of the Word, but, on the contrary, as giving it its true and intended meaning. In this connection it should be stated, that one distinguishing characteristic of the Unitarian Church is its hostility to creeds, or dogmatic statements of belief. They are regarded as prisons to the mind, as opposing the progress of truth, endangering the conscience by insincere or partial assent or subscription, embroiling churches in strife and persecution, and turning off attention from the fundamental truths and plain duties of religion to intellectual and metaphysical definitions of subtleties beyond the reach of man. Hence the form of church union generally adopted by them has been that of a covenant rather than a creed. The body has no one central symbol, or statement of belief. Its creed is to be found in its literature. The bond of church union is made to consist in a pledge to live the Christian life, and to co-operate with others in the same calling, in worship, in philosophizing in support of the religious institutions, and spreading the kingdom of God on earth. Faith, as a sentiment of the heart, is the uniting tie, rather than the declaration of a series of intellectual and dogmatic propositions. This was the original Puritan method. In this light it is remarkable that the identical covenants used by some of the primitive churches in New England in the first settlement of the country have been still in active use down to the present day, though those covenants are now Unitarian sentiments.

The history of Unitarianism is claimed to date back to the time of Christ and his apostles as preachers of pure monotheism. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," is declared by the Master to be the first and great commandment. Early church Fathers and writers, under varying forms of language at the spiritual unity of God. The term "trinity" as applied to the Godhead is not found in the Scriptures, nor was it employed by any writer till Tertullian, about A.D. 200. It is argued that the thing did not exist, because the name descriptive of the thing did not come into use till that time. Unitarians, accordingly, regard the whole system of theology known as Trinitarian, or Orthodox, as a gradual development from the time the Gentiles, imbued with Oriental speculation or Greek philosophy, entered the Christian Church. The school of Alexandria hellenized Christian thought, and the Platonic doctrine of a deification of Christ. But alongside of this tendency, step by step, proceeded a counter-movement—led by Theodotus, Artemon, Paul of Samosata, Arius, and others of the early writers—to maintain the strict unity of God in Christian belief. In the battle of words between homo- and homoeousion, of the same substance or of like substance, as applied to the nature of Christ, Arius maintained that he was a created being. The climax was reached at the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325), when, after an imbecile debate, the doctrines of the unity of God and the subordinate nature of Christ were anathematized, and the Godhead of the Son with the Father was established. It is an opinion held by many Catholic and some Protestant advocates of the Trinity, that this dogma came in the development of the church, rather than as a doctrine revealed or taught in the Scriptures; also it is a remarkable fact, that no single passage or verse of the Old or New Testament is received as an assured proof-text of the Trinity by the unanimous consent of all Trinitarian writers: some ground their faith on one passage, some on another. Griesbich and Tischendorf, two of the most distinguished Trinitarian critics of the text of the New Testament, reject as spurious 1 John v. 7, and read (Acts xx. 28) "the church of the Lord," instead of "the church of God," and (1 Tim. iii. 16), "he who was manifested," instead of "God was manifested." These emendations remove some of the most decided proof-texts of the Trinity. Unitarians also claim that John i. 1 and Rom. ix. 5 are erroneously quoted and interpreted as proofs of the Trinity. The new revised translation in general favors their criticism and interpretation. Before the Reformation, Unitarian opinions, though not under that name, were in existence in various parts of Christendom. Some suffered martyrdom for the faith. Adam Duff, for his publications in support of religious institutions, and spreading the kingdom of God on earth, Faith, as a sentiment of the heart, is the uniting tie, rather than the declaration of a series of intellectual and dogmatic propositions. This was the original Puritan method. In this light it is remarkable that the identical covenants used by estants united to destroy the heresy. Among these confessors and martyrs were Ludwig Hetzer, Michael Servetus, and Gentilis in Switzerland; Paleologus, Segara, Guirlanda, and hundreds of others in Italy; Flickwyk in Holland; George von Parris, Joan Bocher (called "the Maid of Norway"); Bartholomew Legate, Hamonmont, Lewes, Ket, Wright, Wightman, and many others in England; Thomas Aikenhead in Scotland; Catharine Vogel, at the age of eighty, in Poland; and Doleet in France. The Socini and others were banished from Italy; John Biddle died in prison in England, and Francis David in Transylvania.

In Poland the Unitarian faith was spread by refugees from less tolerant lands. In 1592 the Bible was translated, chiefly by Unitarian scholars and divines, into the Polish tongue. Faustus Socinus came hither from Italy. All ranks of society, nobles and commoners, felt the power of the faith, and awakened the bitter jealousy of Rome. In the city of Racow a catechism of the order of Parliament. The king of Poland, Sigismund II., became a convert himself to the faith. Such was its flourishing condition for a century, till 1688, when Cardinal Capoil, a Jesuit, coming to the throne, burned the houses of its disciples and believers, and drove them to exile or death, thus by the same blow killing a church and a nation. The theological works of the Polish Brethren, in eight thick volumes folio, remain as the monument of their zeal and faith. Driven from Poland, many Unitarians took refuge in Transylvania. Faustus Socinus and Georgio Blandrata were prominent leaders. Transylvania tolerated four forms of faith, the Roman Catholic, the Reformed Evangelical, the Lutheran, and the Unitarian. The bishop Francis David, however, under subsequent persecution, was cast into prison, where he died in 1579,—an event which received in 1879 its centenary celebration in the land of his martyrdom. In their most flourishing condition the Unitarians of Transylvania possessed four hundred church-buildings, eleven clerical, fifty Unitarian churches, ten in Scotland, twenty to thirty in Ireland, in Wales thirty-four, and in the British Colonies—Canada, India, Australia—several more. Divinity schools for the education of ministers are established in Manchester, Carmarthen, and London. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association was formed on May 24, 1825,—the same year, month, and day as the American Unitarian Association in Boston, though without concert. The National Unitarian Conference of Great Britain was first organized at Liverpool in the spring of 1882. The periodicals are the Modern Review, the Inquirer, the Unitarian Herald, the Christian Life, and some local papers. Among the eminent leaders, lay and clerical, may be mentioned Drs. Price, Samuel Clarke, Priestley, Belsham, Lardner, Sharpe, Bowring, Taylor, Thom, and especially James Martineau, one of the greatest living exponents of a Christian spiritual philosophy against materialism and agnosticism.

In America, while the church of the Puritans was strictly Calvinistic and Trinitarian at the outset, the keynote of progress had been struck by John Robinson in his famous farewell to the Pilgrims of "The Mayflower," that "there was more light to break out from God's word." Dr. Gay of Hingham, ordained in 1717, was probably the earliest preacher of Unitarianism. Dr. Mayhew, of the West Church, Boston, advocated liberal sentiments. In 1788 Dr. James Freeman, of King's Chapel, Boston, the grandfather of Dr. James Freeman Clarke, removed from the Book of Common Prayer all references to the Trinity, or the Deity, and worship of Christ; and his church from that time by the same delinquent act. In 1801 the Plymouth Church, the oldest of the Puritan faith in America, declared itself, by a large vote, Unitarian. Organized usually on the basis of covenants instead of creeds, the New England churches, without any violent change in their articles of union, gradually adopted the new faith. Dr. Henry, a Unitarian, became the first professor of divinity at Cambridge. Zealous controversies were waged between Dr. Woods and Dr. Ware, and Dr. Channing and Dr. Worcester.
UNITARIANS.

Dr. Channing, in 1819, in his Baltimore sermon at the ordination of Jared Sparks, gave the Unitarian Declaration of Independence. From that date he became the foremost leader of this faith, not only in America, but throughout the world. His works have been translated into the languages of Europe, and are known and read throughout the Empire and West. Bunsen, in his work entitled "God in History," says of Channing, "A grand Christian saint and man of God, nay, also, a prophet of the Christian consciousness regarding the future." In April, 1880, the centenary of his birth was celebrated in America and many other countries; and an issue of a hundred thousand copies of a complete edition of his works was circulated in a cheap and popular form in England; and a Channing Memorial Church was dedicated at his birthplace, Newport, R.I. On May 24, 1826, the American Unitarian Association was formed, whose headquarters are in Boston, Mass., whose purpose is declared to be to diffuse the knowledge, and promote the interests, of pure Christianity." Besides many home missions, Rev. C. H. Dall and associated laborers are employed in a foreign mission at Calcutta in India. On April 5, 1865, the National Unitarian Conference was organized in New-York City, for the promotion of "the cause of Christian faith and work." The Western Conference was created in 1852. Thirty-nine state, local, auxiliary, ministerial, benevolent, or Sunday-school associations and conferences express the activity of the missionary, educational, and philanthropic work of the body. There are two theological schools,—one at Cambridge, Mass., and the other at Meadville, Penn. The periodicals are the Unitarian Review, the Christian Register, Unity, the Day-spring, and several local papers. The number of Unitarian churches in America, according to the Year-Book of 1895, is three hundred and sixty. Of the actual Unitarian faith of the country, so far as the doctrine of the Trinity is concerned, has been computed to number at least three thousand churches, including not only the Unitarians proper, but the Universalists, the Christians (so called), the Hickite Quakers, the Progressive Friends, and some other minor bodies.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, a denomination of evangelical Christians, Arminian in doctrine, founded by Philip William Otterbein in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Mr. Otter- bein, a man of thorough learning and liberal culture, came to America, in the year 1722, as a missionary of the German Reformed Church. His first charge was at Lancaster, Penn.; afterward he served congregations at Tulpehocken in the same State, Frederick, Md., York, Penn., and Baltimore City,—the last from 1774 to the time of his death, in 1813. He never experienced what he regarded as his first real change of heart, and his ministry thenceforward assumed a deeply spiritual character. Impelled by a fervent desire to save men, he began early to hold frequent evangelistic services, a practice which he continued until late in life. He instituted, also, special prayer and experience meetings, and encouraged believers to give expression to their faith and spiritual experience. In pursuing his evangelistic labors, he made numerous visits to surrounding places, near and remote, often conducted largely attended open-air meetings, and invited to a hearty co-operation all spiritually minded persons of whatever name or church. He found congenial association with such men as Asbury of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, Boehm of the Mennonite Church, and others of other names. His broader labors resulted in the organization of numerous societies of converts, who, because of their former and more earnest spiritual life, frequently found it difficult to remain in harmonious connection with their parent churches. To supply these people with the ministration of the word, he appointed or approved for them teachers, who visited them at irregular intervals, expounded to them the gospel, and encouraged them to continue faithful in their religious life. As the work extended, it became necessary to devise a regular system of supply; and conferences of ministers, chiefly for this purpose, began to be held. Finally, in the year 1800, at one of these conferences, these scattered societies were organized into one body; and the name "United Brethren in Christ," was adopted, as the official title of the denomination thus formed. Mr. Otterbein and Mr. Boehm were chosen bishops. The people thus organized spoke at that time almost exclusively in the German language: at the present time that language is used by less than four per cent of the membership. The government of the church is vested primarily in a General Conference, holding quadrennial sessions. The delegates are ministers only, but are chosen by the church at large. There are also annual conferences, whose power are chiefly executive, and of which laity and members are given to those lay-representative. The bishops are elected by the General Conference quadrennially, as also the editors, publishing-house manager and the several general boards with their executive officers. The churches are supplied with pastors on the itinerant plan, the ministers being appointed to their charges by a stationing committee. Presiding elders, elected by their respective conferences, have general supervision over districts, or subdivisions of the annual conferences.
The denomination has 10 colleges, 5 seminaries and academies, and 1 theological seminary, 99 instructors, and 1,775 students, 40 of the students being in the theological seminary. The churches own, and through the General Conference control, a publishing-house, located at Dayton, O., whose net capital on April 1, 1888, was $192,- 562.89. The house publishes 9 weekly, monthly, semi-monthly, and quarterly periodicals, with an aggregate average circulation of 228,224 copies for the year ending as above. The house is free of debt, and has a surplus fund in its treasury.
A thoroughly organized missionary society for home, frontier, and foreign work, has been in existence since 1853. Its foreign missions are in the United States of America, Religious History, I. HISTORICAL REVIEW.—In the discov-ery, settlement, and historical development of the con-
try, scientific curiosity, bold enterprise, ambition, self-interest, as well as religious motives, have conspired. Columbus was a religious enthusiast, and intended his discoveries should spread the Christian religion among the heathen peoples in which plan he had the heart co-operation of Queen Isabella of Spain. Indeed, he designed the dedication of a portion of his expected gains to the fitting-out of a crusade to the Holy Land; so that the solution of the Occidental question should lead to the solution of the Oriental question in its greatest extent, and the ends of the earth should be brought under the banner of the cross. Still more decidedly did the religious factor enter into the beginnings of the North-American settlements, but this time in the interest of English Protestantism, and not of Romanism. The great discoveries of the fifteenth century plainly stand in providential connection with the Reformation of the sixteenth; since they opened a new and boundless field for the further development of the religious, social, and political principles of Pro-estantism. It is important also to notice, that the northern half of the New World was first discovered, under the auspices of England, by the two Cabo tes. This was in 1492, or a year before Columbus set foot upon the mainland of South America. In this way that half was from the beginning brought into closest connection with the nation which a century later was to be the greatest naval power and chief bulwark of Pro-estantism.
The religious history of North America begins in 1607, with the settlement of Virginia, or more exactlv with the landing of the Virginian at the Massachusetts Bay (1620). From then on, America was, on an immensely larger scale, what Geneva was under Calvin,—a refuge for persecuted Protestants of all lands. Puritans, Presbyterians, Quakers, Baptists, Huguenots, Salzburg Lutherans, Moravians, Lutherans and Reformed refugees from the Palatinate, Mennonites, etc., emigrated thither in order to find there a quiet place to practise their religion, and showed in their new home predominantly that religious earnestness, and at the same time tolerance, which sprang, not from indifferentism, but from bitter experience of unrighteous persecution. English Roman Catholics, also, who then were subjected to severe penalties in England, found in Maryland an asylum. These were joined by the Dutch Reformed in New York, and the English Episcopalians in Virginia, the two Carolinas, and Georgia, who, however, had not come for conscience' sake. Thus the American Colonies were made up of almost all branches of European Christianity, mostly Protestants, with a small number of Roman Catholics. Of course these churches were all weak; but they were strong enough to produce a people able to defend themselves against the demands of England, and under the leadership of George Washington,—the purest and most unselfish of American patriots,—by the aid of France, to carry on a successful war of seven years' duration, which issued in their complete independence of the British crown.
With the peace of 1783, or even with the Decclaration of Independence in 1776, the colonial period of the country closed. The nation was then composed of thirteen Colonies, loosely bound together, and numbering scarcely three million inhabitants. The representatives of the free people, assembled in Philadelphia in 1787, drew up a constitution, modelled, indeed, upon that of England, but further developed upon its principles.
A sharp line was drawn between Church and State. Upon this constitution they stood united as a compact nation, with a sovereign national government. At their head was a president, elected every four years. The happy issue of the UNITED STATES. 2424

War of Independence compelled those churches, as the Episcopal and the Methodist, which had formerly been united with the English bodies, to make separate organizations, on the basis of universal civil and religious liberty. Favored by the common fertility of the soil, the exhausted mineral wealth, numberless avenues of trade, and free institutions which afforded the fullest play to individual enterprise, and at the same time guaranteed complete security to person and property, the United States has ever since, but particularly during the last fifty years, advanced in a way unparalleled in history. The number of inhabitants has grown since 1800, when it was 5,000,000, until, according to the official census of 1880, it was 50,152,860, distributed as follows: Whites, 43,404,876; blacks, 6,577,151; natives, 43,475,506; foreign-born, 6,677,360; males, 25,620,652; and females, 24,632,284. The number of States in the same period has increased (mostly through the purchase of Louisiana in 1803, Florida in 1821, California and New Mexico in 1848, and the organization of the North-western Territories from thirteen to thirty-eight; and besides these there are nine Territories and the District of Columbia (the seat of the national government). Of course, emigration, which is favored by the most liberal naturalization laws, is the explanation of this enormous growth. This began to be larger after the close of the Napoleonic wars, and now pours a steady stream into the country. In a larger after the close of the Napoleonic wars, and now pours a steady stream into the country.

II. THE SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE AND THE UNIVERSAL FREEDOM OF BELIEF AND WORSHIP WHICH FOLLOWS. A distinction must, however, be made between the General Government and the individual States. (1) The General Government has been from the beginning limited to political affairs, and has nothing to do with the internal arrangements of the several States, and especially with any thing relating to religion. The Constitution, adopted under Washington in 1787, provides, "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States" (Art. vi. § 3). And even more emphatically speaks the First Amendment, made by the first Congress, 1789: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." Cf. Gale's edition of Debates and Proceedings in the Congress of the United States, vol. i. pp. 720 sqq.

Hand in hand with the increase in the number of States and inhabitants go industry, wealth, and general culture. The United States has not had to struggle, through two thousand years, out of barbarism to civilization, as the countries of the Old World have done. It fell heir to their progress, but with it have come the Old World's evils. And the New World has also its troubles, arising from haste after wealth, from reckless speculation, and those misunderstandings between capital and labor which issue sometimes in blood. It is almost incredible how quickly the chaotic confusion of so many different peoples thrown together under one general government is reduced to order, how thoroughly the new dwellers are assimilated in the body politic. Thus it has come about that the type of American civilization is Anglo-Saxon, and the speech English, — the predetermined world-tongue.

And yet the races have met in this assimilating process, — the Indians, who are driven gradually into smaller territory, and who are slowly civilized; and the Chinese, who do not come to stay, and whose coming, national legislation has endeavored to check. The two will, in the providence of God, be brought under the influence of Christianity. As for the negroes, so long held down under slavery, they are already Christianized, and have attained to a measure of civilization. Those of them who emigrate to the West-African republic of Liberia, founded for them particular American friends of that race, will carry thither the blessings they have obtained in the United States, and thus lighten the "dark continent."

The enormous increase of population adds, of course, proportionally to the field of labor and to the membership of the different churches. America is the land of church-erection, congregation-forming, and of every conceivable ecclesiastical and religious experiment, in which there are not missing the elements of fanaticism, hypocrisy, and humbug. It is the seed-plot of almost all branches of the Christian Church, and there is no check put upon their fullest development.

The religious life in the United States is in general like that of other lands; but it presents some peculiar features, of which the chief are,— the State by the Church, from the imperial and papal patronage of the Church by the State, and also from the pre-Constantinian separation and persecution of the Church by the heathen State: hence the United States presents a new phase in the history of the relation of the two powers, which is not to be understood as a separation of the nation from Christianity; for the State represents, in America, only the temporal interests of the people. The independent churches care for the religious and moral interests; and the people are religious and Christian as no other, and express their sentiments in different ways,—by the voluntary support of their very numerous churches and sects; by benevolent organizations of every kind; by attendance upon church, and respect for the ministry (who are second to none in dignity and influence); by constancy zealous for home and foreign missions; by reverence for the Bible; by a steady stream of edifying books, tracts, and periodicals; and by their public morals. Congress nominates chaplains, of different confessions naturally, and opens every sitting with prayer. The President appoints chaplains for the army and navy. Fast-days have been frequently observed in particular emergencies: thus in 1849, during the cholera; in 1865, on the assassination of President Lincoln; and in 1881, on the death of President Garfield. A Thanksgiving-day is yearly celebrated in November in all the States, on the proclamation of the President and the concurrent action of the different governors. Indeed, religion, it may be justly claimed, has all the more hold upon the American character, just because it is free from political control. No one is forced to make a religious profession: that is a matter of personal conviction and voluntary action.

(2) As far as the individual States are concerned, Church and State are now separated; but this has not been the case from the beginning. Nor is the separation the consequence of independence, for it existed long prior to that event: thus (at first) in Maryland, founded in 1634 by the Roman-Catholic Lord Baltimore; in Rhode Island, settled in 1636 by Baptists under Roger Williams; and which he made an asylum for his persecuted co-religionists and all other Christian brethren. Each of these three representatives of Christian toleration adopted it, not in consequence of vague philosophical theories, still less out of religious indifferentism, but because of bitter experience of intolerance, and practical necessity. And this toleration was limited to the different confessions of the Christian faith, and did not apply to infidels or blasphemers, who were excluded from civil rights. In the other and older Colonies, Church and State were from the beginning closely connected. In Massachusetts and the other New England Colonies, Rhode Island, the Congregational form of Puritanism was the State religion; and the civil rights, in imitation of the Jewish theocratic State principles, were dependent upon a certain religious adherence. The Roman Church not only was excluded, but also, until the close of the seventeenth century, all Protestants who could not accept the Established creed were dealt with as strictly as the Pilgrim Fathers had themselves been by the bishops of Old England. Massachusetts banished the Baptist Roger Williams. New England, and other Baptists, and the followers of the Antinomian Anne Hutchinson; the Quakers were tried, and condemned to public scourging, ear-slitting, nose-boring, and even (by a vote of twelve to eleven in the Boston Legislature) to the gallows. It should be remarked, however, that the Quakers in New England between 1658 and 1660 had acted fanatically. They had publicly denounced, in the churches and upon the streets, the civil and spiritual authorities. They thus provoked persecution and martyrdom by their impetuous zeal. Four such fanatics (one a woman), who had been already in America, obstinately rushed into martyrdom, and were hanged in 1660. But the people were opposed even then to such treatment; and the authorities were obliged to defend their action in a published statement, in which they justified themselves by quotations from the Old Testament, and the English laws against the Roman-Catholic Church.

In Rhode Island the bond of Church and State was broken, and complete independence of religion. In some Colonies it existed (1783, and the adoption of the National Constitution) before the Declaration of Independence, the President and the concurrent action of the different States, the connection between Church and State was, in New England relaxed; but in Pennsylvania it was broken in 1781, while in Massachusetts the last traces remained until 1833.

In Virginia and other Southern Colonies the Church of England was the State Church, and all other denominations felt the pressure of the English laws against dissenters. Nevertheless, the latter increased, especially the Baptists, Presbyterians, Quakers, and, later, the Methodists; and it was from them that the first impulse in Virginia proceeded to separate Church and State. Even before the Declaration of Independence, the Presbyterian and Baptist ministers petitioned the Colonial Legislature to that intent. The measure found a defender in Thomas Jefferson, who in 1798, proceeded to separate Church and State, even by their public morals. Congress nominates chaplains for the army and navy. Fast-days have been frequently observed in particular emergencies: thus in 1849, during the cholera; in 1865, on the assassination of President Lincoln; and in 1881, on the death of President Garfield. UNITED STATES. 2426 UNITED STATES.

only very gradually, did the New-England States, where Puritanism was deeply rooted in the mass of the people, adopt the new order of things. Now the principle of entire separation is universally operative. Only among the Mormons in Utah are Church and State combined. But the Mormons are powerless to prevent other sects coming among them; and, indeed, in Salt Lake City there are already four or five.

III. The Voluntary System of Church Support is the Natural Consequence of Separation of Church and State. — There is in the United States no obligatory baptism or confirmation. There are, on the contrary, thousands of grown persons who have not been baptized; but there are comparatively few who hold themselves aloof from all church attendance and from all contributions for religious purposes. And the churches independent of State control are more particular as to the conduct and beliefs of their members than State churches are; so that the churches of America are more orthodox, and more faithful to their avowed principles, than the mother-churches in Europe.

The different churches are, almost without exception, depend entirely upon voluntary subscriptions and contributions. The most prominent exceptions are Trinity Church (Episcopal) and the Collegiate Church (Reformed Dutch), both in New-York City, which have inherited property from the colonial period. But, speaking generally, the churches look to their membership for the means to carry on their work, and support their ministers. The theological seminaries are the foundations of churches or individuals. The minister's salary is paid by the pew-rents or collections. Voluntary payments support the Bible, the tract, and other societies, and send out portors and missionaries in city and country. It is considered a general duty and privilege to support religion as a necessary and useful element of society. The average salary of ministers in the United States is about seven hundred dollars; of theological professors, a thousand dollars. A few ministers in large cities receive from five to fifteen thousand dollars.

The voluntary system has its drawbacks, especially in the new congregations formed of emigrants who are accustomed to the European system of State support. But, on the other hand, it promotes liberality and individual enterprise; and the result is a yearly increase in churches, ministers, and ecclesiastical organizations of all sorts, while the old are maintained with vigor. On the average, it is said, each minister serves a thousand souls; but of course there is great disproportion. The Irish and the Germans are most destitute of ministers, because emigration swells their numbers out of proportion to the supply. This free, self-regulated and self-supported Christianity and church existence is one of the most characteristic features, and one of the greatest glories, of the United States, and constitutes a new leaf in church history; but it has its antecedents in the first three centuries and in the historic dissenter and free churches in Europe.

IV. The Leading Denominations. — It is impossible here to go into the details of the various denominational histories: for these, reference must be made to the several articles of this encyclopedia. But a few general remarks will be in place.

Almost all American denominations are of European origin; but those which in Europe are divided by geographical and political boundaries are in the United States found thrown together. In England, for instance, as many sects as in the United States; but all Christians outside the Church of England are classed together as dissenters. In America, there being no State Church, there can be no dissenters. Churches of many denominations are found in all the large cities. Thus in the city of New York, which has a population of 1,200,000, there are 500 congregations, of different nationalities and creeds, each of which has its regular place of meeting, or church-building. Until recently the Greek Church also had a chapel in New York. She has now chapels in San Francisco and in Alaska.

The American denominations may be divided into three groups. (1) The Evangelical churches: i.e., those which stand upon the principles of the Reformation theology, and accept the Bible as the sole guide of faith and life, and the confessions of the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries as a rule of public teaching. They embrace the great majority of the Christian population, and exert the strongest influence upon society. The Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Episcopalians have the most intelligence, theological culture, and social influence with the middle and upper classes. The Methodists and Baptists are the most numerous among the middle and lower classes and in the Southern and Western States. The Episcopal Church is the oldest and progressively the richest, and dates from 1607, the year of the settlement of Virginia; next come the Congregationalists, from the landing of the Pilgrims (1620); then the Dutch Reformed, from 1628, the year of the formation of the first congregation in New-York City. The first prominent Baptist in America was Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island, 1636. The Quakers date from 1650; and the Methodists, from 1706. The German churches, in their organized state, date from the middle of the last century. Among them the Lutheran Church is by far the largest and most influential; then come the German Reformed, the Evangelical United, and the Moravians. A considerable number of Germans belong to the different branches of the Methodist Church, which also sends missionaries to Germany.

(2) The Roman-Catholic Church was a century ago inconsiderable, but, through the enormous emigration, now outnumberers any other single denomination. Yet it does not keep pace with the Roman-Catholic migration, which is reported to form forty-seven per cent, or nearly one-half, of the total immigration to the United States. The emigration from Ireland is predominantly, that from Germany largely, and that from Southern Europe almost exclusively, Roman Catholic.

(3) A third class consists of those denominations which reject the doctrines of the ecumenical creeds and the confessions of the Reformation churches, and strike out in new paths. The most respectable among the Unitarians, whose headquarters are in Boston and Cambridge, and who are distinguished by high literary and social culture, and active philanthropy; the Unit universalists, who teach as one of the three articles of their creed the ultimate restoration of all men to holiness and happiness; and the Swedenborgians, who believe in the divine mission of the great seer of Sweden, and accept his revelations of the spirit-world.

V. THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION. This differs with the different denominations, but on the whole has greatly and rapidly improved of late. It is carried on in theological seminaries, endowed and supported by free gifts. Each respectable denomination has one or more, and in all there are a hundred and forty-two. We mention those at Andover, New Brunswick, Princeton, Cambridge, New Haven, Hartford, New York (the Union Seminary of the Presbyterian Church, and the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church), Madison (N. J.), Rochester, Philadelphia (two,—one Episcopal, one Lutheran), Gettysburg, Lancaster, Allegheny, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago (which has four, representing as many denominations), and San Francisco (which has two). The faculties number from two to seven regular professors: some have as many as a hundred students and over. The libraries comprise from a few hundred to fifty thousand volumes. The course of instruction lasts three years. Greater stress is laid upon practical gifts and moral and religious character than in the ministerial training-schools of State churches. Each lecture is preceded by a short prayer, and every day is closed by divine service, which all the students attend. The theological literature of the United States is growing very fast, both by translations of foreign works (especially German), and original productions.

VI. STATISTICS. — Since the official ecclesiastical statistics of the last census (1880) have not yet (December, 1883) appeared, no attempt at a complete statement is here made; but the following carefully compiled table is interesting as showing the denominational growth in the first century of the United States' independence:

The Mormons number about two hundred thousand (see special art.). The following summary from the "Almanac of the New-York Independent" for 1884 is compiled from the various church almanacs of 1882 and 1883.

LIT. — A general church history of the United States, made from the sources, is a desideratum. So far, we have only sectional contributions or brief sketches.

1. General Works. — ROBERT BAIRD: Religion in America, Glasgow, 1842, New York, 1856 (which describes the recent condition, but gives no regular history); RUPP-ZEHNBRENNER: History of all the Religious Denominations in the United States, Harrisburg, Penn., 1844, 2d ed., 1848 (a diligent but dry and uncritical collection of historical and statistical materials); W. SPRAGUE: The Annals of the American Pulpit, or Commemorative Notices of Distinguished American Clergymen of Various Denominations, with Historical Introductory and Practical Sketches, New York, 1857 sqq. (9 vols., and one yet unprinted; valuable for the history of American pulpit eloquence and for biography, but almost uniformly eulogistic, as the notices come from friends or admirers of the subjects); PHILIP SCHAFF: America, New York, 1856 (the second part contains sketches of the leading denominations); by the same: Christianity in the United States of America (report, to the Basel Conference, of the Evangelical Alliance, 1879, published in German, Basel, and in English in The Religious Condition of Christendom, London, 1880, pp. 79-117.

2. Particular Denominational Histories. — The monographs of Hodge and Gillett on the Presbyterian Church; Bangs and Stevens on the Methodist; Hall, Punchard, Bacon, and Dexter, on the Congregational; Backus and Benedict on the Baptist; Wilberforce, Hawks, and Perry, on the Episcopal; Hazeilus, Schmucker, and Mann, on the Lutheran; Corwin on the Reformed Dutch; Meyer, Harbaugh, and Heisler, on the German Reformed; Gunnison, Olahhausen, R. J. Burton, and Stenhouse, on the Mormons. See literature under the different arts. PHILIP SCHAFF.

UNIVERSALISM is the form of faith which holds who declare that all souls will finally be saved, that evil is temporary, that good is permanent, and will achieve a complete and perfect triumph in the divine economy.

1. Universalism begins in a peculiar conception of God. Agreeing with Christians generally in the attributes ascribed to him, it holds that love is not merely an attribute, but the very nature of the Deity, and that all his attributes and activities spring out of and are controlled by it. Thus the sovereignty of God is infinite and eternal: it is exerted everywhere and always, to secure, not a formal and arbitrary obedience, but one that is voluntary and filial, and it will work until the harmony of the moral universe is secured.

2. Christ belongs to the category of the supernatural; although his manifestation in time, and his work, are in perfect accord with nature and reason. Universalism holds, as to the nature of Christ, that it is identical with God's; as to his relationship, that it is that of a Son; as to his office, that it is mediatorial, i.e., that he is the connecting link between humanity and God, that he is the way by which humanity is brought into the presence and fellowship of God. His existence, as declared in the proem of John's Gospel, has been from the beginning. From the beginning also, as taught, not only in the proem aforesaid, but in the Epistles,—notably in Heb. i. 2, also 1 Cor. viii. 6,—he is the instrument through whom God works. Having the same nature as God, and being actuated by the same spirit, he is literally "God manifest in the flesh," he is literally the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person." But not only is he the Son of God in the highest and most complete sense, he is the Son of man in a sense equally complete. He is the expression, the type, of perfected humanity. He entered fully into the human condition. He had not alone the form of manhood, but the attributes and motives. He was in all respects like one of ourselves, except in the matter of sin. His freedom from sin, however, was due, not to any abridgment of his humanity, but to the perfect use of that moral choice which is the distinguishing characteristic of humanity. He is here, then, as the revealer of God and the healer of men, as the Teacher and Saviour, or, finally, as the living, immortal Word.

3. Concerning man, Universalism holds that he is made in the image of God, that he is the child of God. He has a moral sense. He instinctively distinguishes between right and wrong, between virtue and vice. The feeling of obligation is native to his mind. He knows that he is responsible for his conduct: at the same time he is free; he may choose whatever course he will. Here is the origin and essence of sin,—that a man knowing the difference between right and wrong, knowing the responsibility under which he acts, deliberately chooses the wrong, that he puts himself voluntarily in an attitude of disobedience to the moral law. There is no other definition to be given of it than the scriptural one, "Sin is the transgression of the law." It is conditioned, first upon the fact of man's freedom, and secondly upon the fact that he is under law, the inexorable law of the moral universe. This is true of every man; and every man, whatever may be his theory of God, or providence, or of his own essential being, knows that it is true. But law without a sanction is no law. Penalty, therefore, is an indispensable instrument in that moral mechanism by which the sinner is brought into every dereliction to the recognition and performance of duty. But penalty is not arbitrary, neither is it vindictive. It is not designed to soothe the offended majesty of Heaven. It is remedial. It reminds the offender that he is God's child, and that he has broken God's law. He is not on trial in this life, to be handed over, if the verdict shall be against him in the end, to a punishment that is remediless and hopeless; but he is under discipline, and in a disciplinary state freedom persists. Man's conscience can never so long as man has sanity, which will permanently interrupt the spontaneous activity of the will. Penalty will be repeated with every violation of law. "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished." So long as man sins, his chastisement will endure; but no form of punishment can destroy freedom. He may choose to sin as long as he is willing to take sin and penalty together; but, whenever he is moved to a different choice, the door of opportunity is open. This is the fundamental condition of moral activity; for, if it be impossible for a soul to turn from evil to good, no matter how this impossibility arises,—whether it be by the application of an arbitrary and extraneous force, or by the self-determining power of habit,—the moral attributes of that soul are extinguished. It no longer has control of its own actions, and therefore its relation to God. Freedom cannot interrupt the relation which exists between the human creature and the divine Creator. Whatever he does, whatever he suffers, man is still God's child. Nothing can permanently efface from the soul the image of the Father. The moral government of God, therefore, is not a temporal affair merely, it reaches forward into eternity. It was instituted for man's sake, that he might receive his moral development under it, and that, when he had sinned, he might be reconciled to God.

4. These views foreshadow the Universalist doctrine of destiny. Universalism holds that the sovereignty of God will be completely vindicated in the ultimate harmony of the moral universe. No power on earth or in heaven can defeat the purpose of God to bring all things into subjection to himself. The process by which this result is to be secured is neither violent nor mechanical, but it springs from the self-determining power of that soul to turn from evil to good, no matter how freedom remains. No condition can ever arise, however strong, that it will be impossible for men anywhere to make effectual choice of the right; for that would be to contradict every theory on which the recovery of souls is sought in this world; the uniform assumption being, that no case is so desperate as to be beyond the saving efficacy of infinite grace. The conclusion savors both of fatalism and atheism. It is fatalistic in so far as it fixes, beyond all hope of amendment, the condition of any soul. It is atheistic, in so far as it puts the final destiny of man entirely in his own keeping. Equally futile, according to Universalism, is the claim that death determines the moral condition of humanity. It is absurd to suppose that death will change either the nature of man, or the disposition and purpose of God. Death, to be sure, may be, and doubtless is, a very important factor in the discipline and development of the soul. It can scarcely fail to change inconceivably the whole environment of the soul. The conditions and circumstances which are earthly and sensual will disappear. Conditions and circumstances which are alone adapted to the new state in which the soul finds itself will come into being. New relations will undoubtedly appear, or the old relations will be revealed in an entirely new light. It may also be, that a complete set of motives, unknown to time and sense, will have active operation. The methods for teaching and moral influence may also be unspeakably enhanced. But the nature of man as a moral agent, and the nature of God as a moral governor, must remain the same after death as before; and there is no Scripture, which, rightly interpreted, warrants a different doctrine. So long as man is man, he may forsake evil, and embrace righteousness. So long as God is God, he will certainly restore the penitent, and welcome the returning prodigal. Looking at the object which has been steadily pursued in the giving of the law and the promulgation of the gospel, the Universalist feels that the poet manifests a profoundly philosophic insight when he sings,—

"I can but trust that good shall fall
And every winter change to spring."

He sees the whole creation, in one vast, resistless movement, sweeping towards the grand finality of universal holiness and universal love.

History.—The Universalist denomination traces its origin directly to James Kelly, a London preacher in the middle and latter part of the eighteenth century, who had for his disciple John Murray. The latter came to this country in September, 1770, and immediately began preaching at various places along the Atlantic seaboard, from New Jersey to Massachusetts, establishing himself at Gloucester four years later. Through the efforts of Mr. Murray, and a few who entertained similar views, churches were established at important points in the New England and Middle States. But the doctrine spread somewhat slowly. In the year 1800, there were scarcely more than twenty Universalist ministers in the country. At that time the Rev. Hosea Ballou, who is justly called the father of Universalism in its present form, was approaching the maturity of his powers. He already entertained views which differed widely from those of Mr. Murray and his fellow-laborers. He had ceased to base his convictions of the universal holiness on Calvinistic principles. He had wrought out a system of theology which was clear, consistent, rational, and biblical throughout; and he was proclaiming it with a vigor and an earnestness which have not been surpassed by any American preacher of the nineteenth century. Universalism, with the rise of Hosea Ballou (although it has undergone many modifications, and made important developments, since his time), entered upon a new epoch; and its growth was rapid, not only in numerical strength, but in organic life and power. The General Convention, at its session in Winchester, N.H., in 1803, adopted the following Profession of Belief:

"ART. I. We believe that the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation of the character of God, and of the duty, interest, and final destination of mankind.

"ART. II. We believe that there is one God, whose nature is love, revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.

"ART. III. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected, and that believers ought to be careful to maintain order, and practise good works, for these things are good, and profitable unto men."

This brief creed has been regarded as embracing the essential features of Universalism, in a phraseology sufficiently elastic to cover the most divergent views; and it has been made the test of fellowship in churches and conventions. A large and respectable minority of Universalists to-day are not satisfied with the language of some of these articles; and a special committee of the General Convention is at present (1883) engaged in considering whether a modification of them may not be desirable and practicable.

The polity of the Universalist Church is republican in form, embracing both the clerical and lay elements. In each State of the Union, there is a convention made up of the ministers in fellowship residing within the State, and of lay-representatives from each parish. Each State Convention has jurisdiction within its own borders in matters of fellowship, and has charge of local missions. Over all is the General Convention of Universalists, which meets annually, and is composed of delegates, clerical and lay, in definite proportions, chosen by the State conventions. This body has a national charter and a permanent board of trustees. During the interim of the conventions, have charge of the funds, direct the general missionary operations of the church, and dispense scholarships to theological students. The permanent funds now belonging to the General Convention amount to $150,000. The resources are further enhanced by annual contributions in all the churches. Many State conventions also have funds of considerable amounts.

The latest statistics (1883) of the denomination give 23 State conventions, 938 parishes, 36,528 families, 38,268 communicants, 636 Sunday schools with 51,793 members, 780 church buildings, a total valuation of parish property, above indebtedness, of $6,443,010, 713 clergymen, and 10 licensed lay-preachers. During the last forty years the denomination has made great progress in educational matters. There are now in New England and in the State of New York five academies, the most of which are well equipped and endowed. In the whole country, there are four colleges and three theological schools. Over one thousand pupils, during the year 1882, were enrolled in these different institutions. Altogether they represent a permanent investment of at least two and a quarter millions of dollars. Organized Universalism is confined chiefly to this continent; but the doctrine is widely diffused, not only in UNIVERSITIES.

2. Medieval. — Universities were founded in the twelfth century. The instructors were mainly clergymen: hence the terms "rector" and "dean." Collobacy was generally demanded of the teachers of Paris, where the theological faculty dates from 1218, took the lead in theology and philosophy; Bologna, whose law-faculty dates from 1158, in canonical and civil law. The bulls of Innocent III. (of 1209 and 1213) first gave the Paris university independent corporate existence. A university comprised four "nations," — French, Norman, Picard, and English, — according to the nationality of the scholars in democratic Bologna, according to that of the teachers in aristocratic Paris. Gradually the four faculties of theology, medicine, canonical law, and arts, acquired individual corporate rights, the theological latest (about 1300). The first three dominated the fourth, because it was considered preparatory to one of the three. Each nation and faculty formed a little corporation, with seal, banner, funds, and disciplinary institutions. The more general interests were decided by a general council. Every four years a university gave the doctors a "ladies" examination, every month a "national" procurator. The popes and kings gave the universities great privileges, — independent jurisdiction over the students, immunities, inviolability of their property, etc. One of the most important was the right to confer degrees, — bachelor (in theology, at first after eight, but, after the fourteenth century, after fourteen years' study), licentiate (the right to lecture), and in the same year master.

The instruction was given by lectures and disputations. In theology the subjects were Bible texts expounded, with the help of glosses, tropically, analogically, and allegorically; and the sentences of Peter Lombard. The students attached themselves to their respective masters; but the discipline was lax, and disturbances frequent. (For the famous Sorbonne, which excelled all other theological schools, and was almost identical with the Paris theological faculty, see art.)

The dates of the medieval German universities are, Prague, 1345; Vienna, 1356; Heidelberg, 1386; Cologne, 1388; Erfurt, 1393; Leipzig, 1409; Rostock, 1419; Greifswald, 1458; Freiburg, 1457; Basel, 1460; Ingolstadt, 1472; Mayence and Tubingen, 1477; Wittenberg, 1502; Frankfort-on-the-Oder, 1506. The instruction was broad rather than deep; novelties were shunned; tradition ruled: Paris gave laws to all the others. The humanities were not encouraged; so that although in Paris there was, after 1514, a professor of Greek, he complained that least impulse to his department was given by the university. The universities conspicuously showed their hidebound character. Prague opposed Wiclif and Hus; Paris thundered against Luther (1521) and against R. Stephen's edition of the Bible (1545), and drove him from the city.

The great English universities are Oxford and Cambridge, founded in Athens, the Scottish universities, — Edinburgh, founded 1682; Glasgow, 1450; St. Andrews, 1411; Aberdeen, 1494.

3. The Protestant Universities since the Reformation. — Only in theology have these universities

UNIVERSITIES.

England and Scotland, but in Germany, Switzerland, and Sweden. Many of the leading scholars of Germany in recent times have strongly advocated it. Conspicuous teachers, both within and without the English Establishment, have championed it ardentely. It has had some of its ablest defenders among the Scotch clergy. A mission-church of the denomination has been established in Glasgow by the Women's Centenary Association of America, and for some years it has had regular pastoral care. There are organizations and churches at other points in Scotland.

UNIVERSITIES.

1. Greek. — The universitas is a literary corporation, either of teachers or scholars, usually it was under Hadrian, in which rhetoric, philosophy, and political eloquence were taught. That in Constantinople was founded in 425, with twenty-eight teachers of the Greek and Roman languages and literatures, one of philosophy, and two of law.
substantially altered, and down to the end of the seventeenth century the ecclesiastical interests were dominant. Promotions in all faculties were, until this century, held in churches. The head of the university is still called the "rector," invested with princely honors and the "sceptre" of judicial authority: by his side is the chancellor. The faculty of arts still takes the leading position. The governing body is called the "senate." Holders of the much coveted degree of doctor of theology were in the seventeenth century styled "your Excellency;" and until the eighteenth century the degree was never honorary, but always after "a most rigorous examination." It once cost two hundred thalers.

The distinction between ordinary and extraordinary professors dates from the rise of the Protestant universities. The pay of the teachers originally came from the Pope and bishops, but, in Protestant countries, from the confiscated convent property, gifts, real estate, and government subsidies. The amount received was, until the middle of the seventeenth century, very small; and a great amount of gratuitous work was required. Thus at Rostock the professor of theology formerly received eighty guldens, and the professor of medicine, only thirty. The salaries were, however, eked out by the patronage of princes in return for dedications of books, the fees for disputations and promotions, and, but seldom, by ecclesiastical benefits.

Instruction was by lectures and disputations, and it was said that by the latter one could learn more than by twenty lectures. The professors, in their own pecuniary interest, paid more attention to their private than to their public lectures and disputations. Even after the invention of printing, the dictation of lectures was the rule; and many students earned their living by revising and improving reports. The exclusive language of these exercises was Latin, until Thomasius, at Leipzig, set the example, quickly followed, however, of using German. Yet Leipzig was among the last to abandon the old custom. After the Reformation the professors married, and the students began to take rooms in the city generally. This became common at Tübingen (1582), Strassburg (1621), Rinteln (1621), Leipzig (1621), Helmstädt (1576), Altdorf (1576), Giessen (1607), Rinteln (1621), Strassburg (1621), Kiel (1685), Halle (1694), Göttingen (1737), Erlangen (1743), Berlin (1810), Bonn (1817). The German Reformation had thus won its position at the head of the orthodox conservatives under Calovius' mighty influence. But these theologians were opposed by the Calvinists, influenced by Spener's Pietism, who were dominant at Altdorf and Königsberg, and represented in Kiel and Jena. The Pietists ruled in Giessen. — The principal universities of this period were Wittenberg (twelve hundred students), Leipzig (between three and four thousand, most of them in law), and Jena (twenty-five hundred).

In the eighteenth century Wittenberg began to wane, and Leipzig (where Pietism ruled) and Jena to assert their authority. But if the expansion of theology was wanting to confessional orthodoxy, so was it also, after 1740, to Pietism. In Halle, Baumgarten started a new phase of the theological movement, — the Wolffian. The doctrines were not substantially changed; but they were supported by logical demonstration, not by appeal to the word of God and the methods and modes of life was made in this century when Berlin University was founded (1810).

4. The Theological Animus and Influence of the Different Lutheran Universities. — The Lutheran Church counts the following universities: Wittenberg, Erfurt (since 1525), Rostock (since 1531), Tübingen (since 1533), Leipzig (since 1539), Greifswald (since 1545), Königsberg (1544), Jena (1558), Helmstedt (1576), Altdorf (1576), Giessen (1607), Rinteln (1621), Strassburg (1621), Kiel (1685), Halle (1694), Göttingen (1737), Erlangen (1743), Berlin (1810), Bonn (1817). The German Reformation, as it affected the faculties, was as follows: Heidelberg, (since 1559), Frankfurt (1559), Marburg (1607), Duisberg (1659). The Prussian universities, however, are no longer exclusively Lutheran, but evangelical or united, since the introduction of the union of the two confessions in 1817.

In the sixteenth century humanism, in connection with the Reformation, affected great changes, not only in the subjects taught, but in their presentation. The so-called philosophical course in an improved form, either by reading Aristotle in Greek or in the better Latin translation of Argyrophorus and others, and by the use of the excellent Melanchthonian text-books, was considered the foundation of theological study. And, in this course, arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy, history, geography, and poetry were introduced. The study of Greek received a new impulse from Melanchthon's grammar; that of Hebrew, from Münster's. The usual time given to these studies was from three to five years. For the first century of Lutheran theology the Scriptures in the original languages were dogmatically and practically expounded. The chief of the universities, in numbers and authority, was Wittenberg. The majority of German churches waited for it to speak the final word. The great theological question of this period related to the Form of Concord (1577). — Wittenberg had in this period as many as three thousand students at once, most of them in theology.

In the first half of the seventeenth century, after the christological controversy between Tubingen and Giessen was ended, no other theological question arose. The Concord theology became triumphant. At the end of the second half of the century, in theology, Wittenberg still maintained its position at the head of the orthodox conservatives under Calovius' mighty influence. But these theologians were opposed by the Calvinists, influenced by Spener's Pietism, who were dominant at Altdorf and Königsberg, and represented in Kiel and Jena. The Pietists ruled in Giessen. — The principal universities of this period were Wittenberg (twelve hundred students), Leipzig (between three and four thousand, most of them in law), and Jena (twenty-five hundred).

In the eighteenth century Wittenberg began to wane, and Leipzig (where Pietism ruled) and Jena to assert their authority. But if the expansion of theology was wanting to confessional orthodoxy, so was it also, after 1740, to Pietism. In Halle, Baumgarten started a new phase of the theological movement, — the Wolffian. The doctrines were not substantially changed; but they were supported by logical demonstration, not by appeal to the word of God and the methods and modes of life. The result of this dry scholasticism was rationalism. But in Halle, Semler lectured; and his historico-critical studies made an epoch, and put the university at the head, in point of number of theological students. These, in 1780—90, averaged eight hundred. — In the last decade of the century Göttingen exercised the most influence upon theology. Her professors were noted for a certain moderate and dry orthodoxy, easy-going and tolerant.

5. The Reformed and Roman-Catholic Universities. — These were few in numbers, and several were disbanded during the Thirty Years' War. Heidelberg, after its destruction in 1622, was restored as a Roman-Catholic university in 1629, but, after a long period of decadence, was made a Protestant university in 1803, and the Roman Catholic faculty removed to Freiburg. Marburg, which in 1624 fell to the Lutherans, was in 1633 restored to the Reformed Church; but in the Thirty Years' War, after its destruction in 1629. Frankfort, in 1638, had only one theological professor. Reformed theology, by virtue of its practical and biblical character, did not pass through pietism to rationalism, on the contrary, vigorously opposed the latter. Out of fear lest the Roman-Catholic universities would not sufficiently instil Tridentine ideas into their students, the bishops organized theological seminars. Indeed, their fears were well grounded; for in Vienna, Freiburg, and Altdorf in Bonn, Breisach, Freiburg, Tübingen and Giessen, the Roman-Catholic faculties railed the Protestant in scientific theological training.

III.—THE THEOLOGICAL FACULTIES OF THE UNIVERSITIES.

In each of three cantons of French Switzerland, Geneva, Vaud (at Lausanne), and Neuchatel, there are two theological seminaries, one belonging to the State Church, and the other to the Free Church of the canton.

Universities in America

Educational terms are so much confused in the United States. At one time we hear it said that there are "no American universities;" at another, that there are so many as to be ridiculous. The difference is between the real and the nominal. By name, the printed lists record many scores of institutions which call themselves universities: in fact, there is not one score which a judge of American scholars would acknowledge to be worthy of this designation, and a still smaller number which would be called universities according to the English or the German standard. The confusion is injurious to the progress of education in the United States. A seminary which would be respectable under a modest name seems pretentious under a lofty title: worse than this, the proper object of a college is in danger of being forgotten, and the legitimate office of a university wholly lost sight of. A study of European universities will show, that, with many differences in their formal organization, they have generally, for a long time past, adhered to certain fixed principles.

1. They have furnished liberal education in the most advanced branches of knowledge, both practically, in law, medicine, and theology, and also in the various studies which are called philosophy, including mathematics, the natural and physical sciences, the historical and moral sciences, and philology; and this instruction has been given to young men who have been fitted for it by long-continued training in subordinate colleges, gymnasiums, and lyceums.

2. They have encouraged scholars of exceptional powers to devote a considerable part of their time, while engaged as teachers, to the advancement of human knowledge by researches in libraries and in laboratories, and to the publication of their results for the benefit of mankind.

3. They have retained the right to bestow academic degrees, and have bestowed these honors with rigid restrictions; so that the public may have some assurance of the intellectual ability of young men engaging in intellectual pursuits, and so that young students may be encouraged in their most advanced intellectual work by the approbation of an incorporated society of scholars.

4. They have built up, by their direct and indirect agencies, libraries, museums, observatories, laboratories, and other costly agencies for increasing and perpetuating knowledge.

Judged by these high standards, there are few, if any, institutions in the United States which can be called complete universities; but there are some strong, well-planned, and prosperous foundations, which lie within the few years, to be developed into universities differing from the English, the German, the French, the Scotch, or the Italian type, but having distinctive American characteristics. Among their peculiarities will doubtless be a readiness to study the experience of all other countries, and to apply the lessons thus learned to the peculiar civil, ecclesiastical, and social conditions of the United States. These American universities will differ from one another as the countries differ. Generous pecuniary gifts have already been made for university purposes in distinction from collegiate, and other large end dowments are known to be forthcoming. Before 1900, or, in other words, before the youth who are now in their cradles are ready to graduate, there will be several institutions worthy to be called universities, and to be compared with like foundations in the most enlightened countries. It is probable one in or near each of the ten or twelve great cities of the country, and a few others developed in the older States from the present collegiate foundations, and, in the newer, established by legislative aid or private munificence.

The older colleges, originally organized on the type of English colleges, began early in this century to unfold into universities. Thus Harvard, in addition to its college, has now its schools of law, medicine, and theology, its museum of comparative zoology, its botanical garden, its astronomical observatory, its scientific school, its agricultural school, its dental school. Yale has besides its college, its schools of science, law, medicine, theology, and of the fine arts, and its astronomicall observatory. Columbia has its schools of law, medicine, and mines in addition to its college. A like development, if not as widely traced, has been seen in several others of the older foundations.

Another promising group of universities includes those which have been organized under the auspices of State governments, largely maintained by public appropriations. The University of Virginia, initiated by Jefferson, was one of the earliest of this class, and has always borne the marks of freedom and individuality which he impressed upon it. The States of Georgia, North and South Carolina, and Louisiana, followed, to some extent, the lead of Virginia. Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, California, and other Western States, have likewise initiated strong foundations.

Within a few years a third variety of university foundations has sprung up, the result of private gifts,—as at Boston, Ithaca, Baltimore, and New Orleans,—free from historic traditions and from governmental superintendence. These three varieties of organization are not unlikely to present perpetually three types,—the collegiate university, the state university, and the independent university.

There is a fourth form of university organization, that of the State of New York, which has the distinctive function, that, without giving instruction from its own forces, it has a sort of advisory and even supervisory charge of the colleges and academies of the State.

The points to be aimed at by those who are endeavoring to organize universities should be these,—broad and comprehensive arrangements for the advancement of knowledge, and for the education of superior minds; ample funds, free as possible from petty restrictions; a careful adaptation to the conditions of American society, especially to the schools and colleges already established. If the universities of the country could recover the exclusive right to confer degrees, it would be a great gain.

UPHAM, Thomas Cogswell, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Deerfield, N.H., Jan. 30, 1799; d. in New-York City, April 2, 1872. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1818, and at Andover Seminary, 1821; taught Hebrew, 1821-23; and from 1825 to 1867 was professor of mental and moral philosophy in Bowdoin College. He was a voluminous writer. Among his works may be mentioned Elements of Mental Philosophy, 1839, 2 vols. (abridged ed., 1864); Outlines of Disordered Mental Science, 1837; Institution of the Congregational Churches Examined, Portland, 1844; Life of Madame Guyon, New York, 1847; Life of Faith, 1848; Principles of the Interior, or Hidden Life, 1848; Treatise on the Will, 1850; Divine Union, Boston, 1851; Religious Maxims, Philadelphia, 1854; Method of Prayer, 1858; The Absolute Religion, 1872.

UR of the Chaldees, the land of Abraham's ancestors (Gen. xi. 28, 31, xv. 7; Neh. ix. 7). Schrader thus writes respecting it: "In the extreme south of Babylonian Chaldea, west of the Euphrates, from unknown times there existed a very famous city of the world, the moon-goddess Sin, called Uru upon the Babylonian cuneiform inscriptions, to-day represented by the ruins of Mugheir. It is certainly natural to identify this Uru with the Ur of Abraham's ancestry. And this conjecture is supported by considering that (1) the name Abram in the pronunciation of Abraham is Assyrian-Babylonian; (2) Ur, whence Abraham emigrated, and Haran, where he rested, were alike seats of the worship of Sin, the moon-goddess; (3) the West Semites and the Hebrews also had the same religious ideas and traditions as the Babylonians; (4) Hebrew poetry in its parallelism and methods resembles Babylonian poetry." URBAN is the name of eight popes.—Urban I. (229-230), a native of Rome, is said to have suffered martyrdom under Alexander Severus, and is commemorated on May 25. — Urban II. (1088—June 29, 1099). He was born at Châtillon-sur-Marne, studied at Rheims, entered the monastery of Cluny, and was by Gregory VII. called to Rome, and in 1084 sent as legate to the Emperor Henry IV. After the death of Victor III., he was elected Pope by the Gregorian party; and, as a council in Rome (1089), he excommunicated both Henry IV. and Clement III. Expelled from Rome in 1091 by the emperor and the antipope, he fled to Count Roger of Benevent; but the rebellion of Conrad against his father enabled him to return to Rome in 1093, and from that time till his death he vindicated the dignity and rights of his position with uninterrupted success. The greatest event in his life was the Council of Clermont (1095), where his speech to the multitude became the actual starting-point of the first crusade. His letters and a life of him are found in Mansi: Conc. Coll., vol. 20; [M. F. STURM: Zur Biographie des Papstes Urban's II., Halle, 1883]. — Urban III. (1185—Oct. 19, 1187). He was a native of Milan, and made archbishop there by Lucius III. His whole policy was dictated by one single motive,—his hatred to the Emperor Friedrich Barbarossa. All his royal designs against him were foiled. See Gesta Trevirorum, ed. Wyttenbach and Muller, Treves, 1836, vol. i. — Urban IV. (1181—Oct. 2, 1264). He was a native of Troyes, studied in Paris, was made bishop of Liége, went as Papal legate to Germany, and was by Alexander IV. made patriarch of Jerusalem. The great aim of his policy was to overthrow Manfred of Sicily. He summoned him to Rome; and, when Manfred refused to appear, the Pope gave his land to Charles of Anjou. But Manfred expelled the Pope from Rome, and Urban died on the flight. His bulls and letters are found in [Conc. Const. V. Oct. 28, 1362–Nov. 13, 1370]. He was born in the diocese of Menda; became abbot of Auxerre in 1353, and of St. Victor in 1358; taught canon law at Montpellier, Avignon, Toulouse, and Paris; and was sent as Papal legate to Naples and Sicily. He was the last pope who resided at Avignon. In 1367 he determined to return to Rome, and on Oct. 16 he entered the city; but he left it again in September, 1370, and died at Avignon. The confusion of Italian politics he could not master. Bernabo Visconte, who seized several cities belonging to the States of the Church, he excommunicated; but he was nevertheless compelled to pay him half a million of gold uldens in order to have the cities restored. His life has been written by Magnan (1862), Albernes (1872), and Charbonnel (1872). See also Mansi: Conc. Gall. vol. 26.—Urban VI. (April 8, 1378–Oct. 15, 1378). He was the candidate of Urban, when, after the death of Gregory XI., he was elected pope. But his arrogance and arbitrariness very soon brought him into conflict with the cardinals, a party of whom repaired to Anagni, declared the election of Urban invalid, and chose Clement VII. pope: thus the great schism began. Clement VII. took up his residence at Avignon; while Urban succeeded in vindicating himself in Rome, supported by Catherine of Siena and Catherine of Sweden, and recognized by England, Denmark, Germany, and Poland. He espoused the cause of Charles of Durazzo against Johanna of Naples and Sicily, but fell out with Charles, too, was besieged by him in Nocera, and barely escaped (1385), first to Sicily, then to Genoa. After the death of Charles he tried to take possession of Sicily as a vacant fief; but his soldiers abandoned him in Perugia (1389), and he had to give up the scheme. See Mansi: Conc. Gall. vol. 26. —Urban VII. (Sept. 15–27, 1590) died before he was consecrated. —Urban VIII. (Aug. 6, 1623–July 29, 1644). He was a native of Florence; studied in Rome and Bologna, under the Jesuits; entered the service of the curia, and was made bishop of Bari, when, after the death of Gregory XI., he was elected pope. But his arrogance and arbitrariness very soon brought him into conflict with the cardinals, a party of whom repaired to Anagni, declared the election of Urban invalid, and chose Clement VII. pope: thus the great schism began. Gall. vol. 26.—Urban VII. (Sept. 15–27, 1590) died before he was consecrated. —Urban VIII. (Aug. 6, 1623–July 29, 1644). He was a native of Florence; studied in Rome and Bologna, under the Jesuits; entered the service of the curia, and was made archbishop of Nazareth in 1604, and sent as apostolical nuncio to France. In his policy he was an Italian prince, rather than the head of the Roman Catholic Church. He supported Richelieu and France against Austria and Spain, and was thus indirectly in alliance with the Protestants. The Emperor Ferdinand II. complained bitterly, and even the cardinals thought of convening a council against him. He canonized Ignatius Loyola, and Philip of Neri, and beatified Francis Borgia, Andreas Avellino, and others. His poems—paraphrases of psalms in metres of Horace, and hymns to the Virgin—appeared at Antwerp, 1631, and Paris, 1642. He is also the author of the Dialogo dei due Massimi Sistemi del mondo, repeating the "heresies" of the Copernican philosophy, which in 1616 he had promised not to do; and in October, 1632, Urban, in indignation at Galileo's supposed ingratitude and insubordination, summoned him peremptorily to Rome, and handed him over to the Inquisition. He was treated, however, with great leniency, kept only a few days in captivity, and at last suffered to depart unharmed, after he had renounced his "heresy" June 22, 1633. Urban never signed the sentence of the Inquisition. See Grisar: Galileistudien, Regensburg, 1882; Inquisition, p. 1100.) A life of Urban (Gesta Urbanii) appeared at Antwerp, 1637. See Ranke: Die römischen Päpste, Berlin, 1836 (vol. iii.). —Neudeckker.

URIM AND THUMMIN (U'RIM ÌTHUMMIN; LXX., υψωτος και δοξεων [command and truth]; Vulgate, doctrina et veritas) are mentioned first in Exod. xxviii. 30, in connection with the "breastplate" of the high priest, and in a manner to imply that they were sensible objects, at least two in number, which were put into the "breastplate," by which, we think, was, indeed, a sort of bag. This is all we know about them. They were used as a sort of divine oracle, probably with certain traditional ceremonies: sometimes no answer could be obtained from them (1 Sam. xxviii. 6). See art. "Licht u. Recht." in Rhein's Handwörterbuch d. bibl. Alt., pp. 914–918.

URLSPERGER, Johann August, founder of the German Christian Association (Deutsche Christen- thumsgeellschaft); was b. in Augsburg, Nov. 25, 1728; d. in Hamburg, Dec. 1, 1806. After studying at Halæ, he became pastor at Augsburg, where he retained his official position till 1776. He was an earnest defender of the faith in an age of neology and deism, and wrote several works. The chief labor of his life was the organization, after many discouragements, of an association of Christians for the promotion of "pure godliness," at Basel, which has continued to this day as a fruitful source of blessing, and out of which have grown the Basel Bible (1804) and missionary (1816) societies. The last years of his life were saddened by disappointments, and spent in restless travels.

URSICINUS, Antipope; was chosen pope by a minority of the Roman clergy in 366, the majority having declared in favor of Damasus. In consequence of the continued division among the clergy, he was driven from Rome, and went to Cologne. Returning to Italy in 381, his appearance was again the occasion of violent commotions, until he was finally banished from Italy by the Council of Aquileja.

URSICINUS, Zacharias, was b. at Breslau, July 18, 1534; d. at Neustadt-on-the-Hardt, March 6, 1583. Descended from poor parents, he was forced to rely for his education upon friends and his own efforts. He matriculated at Wittenberg University in 1551, and remained there till 1557, being on terms of intimacy with Melancthon. At the latter's invitation he was present at the Diet of Worms, whence he went to Geneva (where he met Calvin), and to Paris, where he pursued the study of Hebrew under Jean Mercier. In 1558 he accepted a professorship in the Elizabeth school at Breslau. The sacramental controversy reaching that city, he published Theses de Sacramentis, de Bapismo et de Cana Domini ("Theses on the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper"), in which he ranged himself on the side of Calvin and Melanchthon. The opposition these views aroused was the occasion of his leaving Breslau; and, as Melanchthon had died, he went to Zurich, where he found a friend and teacher in Peter Martyr. In 1561 he accepted a call to Heidelberg as professor in the Colloquium Sapientiae. In September, 1562, he began his lectures on theology, which he continued till Feb. 10, 1568. In 1568 he was appointed to deliver the sermon on the Catechism on Sunday afternoon, and was called in to take part in the preparation of the church discipline of the Palatinate, of which the Heidelberg Catechism (see art.) forms a part. In connection with Olevianus, he made the preliminary draughts of the latter; and upon him principally devolved its defence. He was the author of the two works in defence of the Catechism which appeared in 1564, Verantwortung zu Heydelberg von den einigen waren Gott in heiliger Schrift angenoene Zeugnisse and Antwort aufl' etlicher Theologen Censur vber die am rand dass Heidelberg Catechism auss heiliger Schrif von etlichen unbillicher weise besehweret ist, and Gegenfrag auf sechsfragen von dess Herrn Nachtmai, etc. He enjoyed the full confidence of the elector, Frederick III., and was constantly called in to defend him against theological opponents. But, like Melanchthon, he shunned controversy. Broken down in health, he was relieved of his theological professorship, and Zanchius made his successor (1568). The apostasy of Sylvanus, Neuser, and others, from Calvinism, and their rejection of the Trinity and divinity of Christ, were hailed by the Lutherans as proof that Calvinism led to fatalism and Mohammedanism, and called forth a work on these subjects from Ursinus' pen, Bekennnus der Theologen und Kirchendiezer zu Heydelberg von den einigen waren Gott in dreyen Personen, den zwoen Naturen inn der einigen Person Christi, etc. (1574).

In 1576 Ludwig succeeded to the electorate, and completely overthrew the Reformed government of his father. [More than six hundred preachers and teachers lost their places on account of their adherence to the Reformed faith.] The Colloquium Sapientiae was abolished the following year, and Ursinus left without a position, in spite of the request of Frederick III., before his death, to his son, that he should be retained. In 1578 he accepted a position in the Collegium illustre Casimirianum at Neustadt-on-the-Hardt [which formed a part of the domain of Frederick's second son, John Casimir]. In 1577 he was appointed by the king of France with Zanchius to be in charge of drawing up a confession for the Reformed churches of Europe, but he declined. In 1581 he published, in the name of the theologians of Neustadt, a forcible criticism of the Formula of Concord (Admonitio Christiana de libro Concordie), Ursinus was, beyond doubt, a Calvinist, but refused to acknowledge a human model, saying at the Colloquy of Maulbron, "We are not baptized in the name of Luther, or Zwingli, or of any other, but of Christ alone." He fully accepted the doctrine of predestination, and taught his pupils to regard it as the pillar of their Christian faith and life. See HEIDELBERG CATHECHISM, OLEVIANUS.

Venerable St. Germain (about 957), of the martyrdom of Martha and Paula, "with many others" (alii pluribus), at Cologne. A much later church calendar of Cologne (edited by Binterim, Cologne, 1824) mentions eleven virgin martyrs by name. A Treves calendar of the eleventh century (see Honthem: Prodrum. hist. Treveri, i. 383) was the first to speak of thousands of such virgins (sanctarum virg. . . . millin); and two later calendars (Honthem, pp. 392, 399) put the number at eleven thousand. The change of the number is explained by Retzbeg, Geseler, and others as a false interpretation of the words S. Ursula et xi M. Virgines (St. Ursula and the eleven martyred virgins) to mean "St. Ursula and the eleven thousand virgins."

URSULINES, The. This order was founded by Angela Merici (b. March 21, 1470; d. Jan. 27, 1540; beatified by Clement VIII. (1678); and canonized by Pius VII. (1807) as Angela of Brescia) in Brescia, Nov. 25, 1535. It did not bind itself by strict conventual rules, and vows of chastity or poverty. Its object was to instruct girls, and to care for the poor and sick. Angela drew up the original twenty-five articles governing the order. The Papal confirmation of the order was granted by Paul III. in 1544. Cardinal Borromeo took it under his special patronage. The rules became more strict; and the Ursulines, who began to spread in France (Paris, 1611) and Germany, also established convents, which was not the idea of the founder. Many still live in their own homes. Their chief work lies in the education of girls, and catechisation. They wear a black dress bound with a leathern girdle, and a black cloak without sleeves, and a tight-fitting dress about the head, with a white veil and a longer black veil. The St. Ursula mentioned above is their patron, hence the name. [There are Ursuline convents at Morrisania, New York, Cleveland, Toledo, etc., and at Quebec.] See Les Chroniques de l'ordre des Ursulines, Paris, 1679, 2 vols.; Journal des illustres Reliugieuses de l'ordre de Ste. USSHER (or USSHER), James, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland; was b. at Dublin, Jan. 4, 1551; d. at the residence of the Countess of Peterborough, Hygates, Surrey, March 21, 1656. In 1594 he entered Trinity College, Dublin. Stapleton's Fortress of Faith, in which the high antiquity of the Papal Church is asserted, led him to the study of the Fathers. In these writings he read systematically every day for eighteen years. His father had set him apart for the study of the law, but his death in 1598 left Ussher free to pursue the study of theology. In 1600 he became fellow of Trinity, and in 1603 he was sent with Dr. Chaloner to Rome, where the books with the eighteen hundred pounds which Parliament had given for the foundation of a university library. In 1607 he was made professor of divinity at Trinity College, and in 1614 vice-chancellor of the university. The hundred and four articles of the Irish Church, with their strong Calvinism, which were passed by a synod held in Dublin, 1615, were probably from Ussher's hand. They were never ratified by the Irish Parliament. Ussher was frequently obliged to visit England, and stood on good terms with the king in spite of the suspicion that he was a Puritan. In 1621 he was appointed bishop of Meath, and in 1629 Archbishop of Armagh, and primate of Ireland. Ussher had preached sternly against the Roman-Catholic Church, and as primate declared himself in opposition to all toleration of the Catholics. Wentworth, however, the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, counteracted his influence in this regard, and introduced, against his will, the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. Ussher does not seem to have been equal to the emergencies of his diocese, and, longing for literary occupations, retired to England in 1646, never returning to Ireland. Arriving at London about the time of the opening of the Long Parliament, he became involved in the discussion of prelacy. In The Directions of the Archbishop of Armagh concerning the Liturgy and Episcopal Government, which was printed without his consent, he advocated the view according to which the bishops would be simply superintendents and synodal presidents. He accompanied Lord Stafford to the scaffold, and was appointed Bishop of Carlisle in commendam, as some reparation for the loss of his library on its way to London. In 1643 he was invited to sit as a member of the Westminster Assembly, the Puritans being contented with his plan of a "reduced episcopacy," above referred to; but, the king refusing his consent, he never took part in the proceedings, [but exerted a decided influence upon it through his Body of Divinity, the Irish Articles, and other works]. In 1642 Ussher retired to Oxford, where he remained till 1645, preaching nearly every Sunday. In 1646 he followed an invitation of Lady Peterborough to London, and in 1647 was made preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He remained true to the king till his death, but was received with marks of respect by Cromwell. At Cromwell's command a splendid funeral was held at his death, and his remains were interred at Westminster Abbey. His fine library went to the university of Dublin. Ussher was man of unusual gifts of mind and heart. Selden [whose funeral sermon he preached] speaks of him as vir summa pietatis et integritatis judicio singulari usque ad miraculum docutus et litteris secerioribus promendiae natus. He was a declared Royalist, and ardent advocate of passive obedience, but stood well with the Puritans, on account of his strict Calvinism, and his

This term may be used as synonymous with hedonism (eudemonism), but more commonly denotes a species of it. In the wider or generic sense it is the doctrine that actions derive their moral character from their consequences; that right in conduct is what tends to promote happiness, and wrong what tends to produce misery; that the ethical is dependent on, and derived from, the useful. This doctrine has four forms, because the consequences of actions must be personal or social, temporal or eternal. The distinction of consequences into personal or social is, however, the deeper and more essential distinction. It is a distinction of nature, which that into temporal or eternal is not. It therefore has to be taken as the principle according to which hedonistic theories should be distributed, and it divides them into the two classes of egotistic and altruistic. Egotistic hedonism is what is known as the selfish theory, and altruistic hedonism is what is commonly called utilitarianism.

Egotistic hedonism, the selfish theory, the utilitarianism of personal interest, has assumed various phases. It was maintained both in the Cyrenian and Epicurean schools of antiquity; but the ideal of happiness in the former was the greatest attainable sum of sensations of gentle motion, and, in the latter, of pleasures (freedom from discomfort and anxiety). The self interest to which virtue is traced by Hobbes, Mandeville, and Paley, centres, according to the first of these writers, in the pleasures which spring from the sense of power; according to the second, in the satisfaction of the desire of applause; and, according to the third, in the hope of everlasting happiness and the fear of everlasting pain. But in every form the theory is subject to insuperable objections. It makes interest and duty identical both in idea and fact; whereas consciousness declares that they are quite distinct in idea, and experience testifies that they may be separated and even opposed in fact. To act from a desire of personal advantage is felt by every one to be very different from acting from a sense of duty. The more self-love reigns, the less can conscience admit that virtue or merit is present. We approve of disinterested, and our approbation is itself disinterested. Duty may dictate, in direct antagonism to self-interest, the sacrifice of health, fortune, reputation, and life. Further: egotistic hedonism denies by implication the possibility of intentional wrong-doing, and so involves a reductio ad absurdum. It affirms that men always act from self-love, or with reference to their own good, and also that thus to act is right. The plain inference is that, so far as purpose goes, men always act rightly, and that there is no intentional wrong-doing. Men always mean to do right, i.e., what is for their own advantage; and if sometimes they do what is contrary to their interest, it is only from error of judgment. Thus the hypothesis tends to obliterate the distinction which it proceeds to elucidate. It is, likewise, an hypothesis logically incompatible with the belief in original sin, and eternal life, inasmuch as it proceeds on the assumption that sensation is the root and source of our entire mental being. Every proof of the Divine Existence involves principles of which sensation can give no account. The moral attributes of God specially transcend all powers of The utilitarian theory, in the special sense of the designation, is a decided advance on the selfish theory. It takes account of the social as well as of the personal consequences of actions. It has been the favorite theory of English ethical writers, and especially in recent times. Dr. Richard Cumberland, in his De Legibus Naturae (1672), made a very great use of it; and the principle of sympathy, according to which actions are approved and disapproved of as a man feels himself disposed; (6) The moral character of an action is to be ascertained by a calculation of the pleasures and pains involved in the elements which constitute it; (7) Pleasure or pain may be increased by (a) intensity, (b) duration, (c) certainty or uncertainty, (d) nearness or remoteness, (e) fecundity, (f) purity, and (g) extent, i.e., number of persons affected; (8) The sanctions or sources of pleasure and pain are physical, political, moral, and religious; and (9) The moral faculty is constituted by a complex of motives, the love of reputation, the dictates of religion, and prudence. James Mill maintains, in his Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind (1829), that the standard of morals is utility, and all moral rules are based on an estimate, correct or incorrect, of utility; (2) Useful actions are of four kinds,—acts of prudence, fortitude, justice, and benevolence; prudence and fortitude including those acts which are useful to ourselves in the first instance, to others in the second instance; and justice and benevolence, those which are useful to persons who are in the same position, to ourselves in the second instance; (3) The moral feelings are a complex product or growth, of which the ultimate constituents are oururable and painful sensations; and (4) Disinterested sentiment is a real fact, but developed by association from our own personal interest, and at length detached from its original root. John Austin, in his Province of Jurisprudence determined (1832), assails the view that moral distinctions are perceived by an innate sentiment, moral sense, or intuitive reason, etc.; opposes to it the theory of utility, which he connects with a belief in the Divine Benevolence; and endeavors to refute the various objections which have been urged against the theory. John S. Mill, in his Utilitarianism (1863), assumes that the criterion of morality, the foundation of morality, and the chief good, are all identical, and endeavors to prove that (1) That the steadiness and consistency of the moral beliefs of mankind are mainly due to the tacit influence of utilitarianism; (2) That utilitarianism sets before men as chief aim the greatest happiness, not of the individual, but of the race; (3) That it rests on a distinction of pleasures into kinds, — high and low, noble and ignoble pleasures; (4) That it recognizes in human beings the power of sacrificing their own greatest good for the good of others; (5) That conscientious feeling invests utility with obligatory force; and (6) That justice is the animal desire to repel or retaliate hurt, widened so as to include all persons by the human capacity of enlarged sympathy and the human conception of intelligent self-interest. Dr. Alexander Bain, in his Works on The Emotions and the Will and Mental and Moral Science, argues that utility or human happiness is the proper ethical standard: that moral rules are of two kinds, the first constituting morality proper, obligatory morality, duty, imposed by authority under a penalty for neglect or violation, and the second constituting optional morality, merit, virtue, or nobleness, having rewards for its only external support; that human beings are endowed with a prompting to relieve the pains, and add to the pleasures, of others, which is inexplicable by association, and irrespective of self-regarding considerations; and that prudence, sympathy, and some co-operating emotions, along with the institution of government or authority, give rise to moral ideas, their peculiar attribute of rightness being stamped on them by authority. Jeremy Bentham is, perhaps, the best representative of those who have expounded and defended utilitarianism as a doctrine which takes into account the amelioration of pleasures and pains; and John S. Mill, of those who have held that their qualitative differences, their distinctions of kind and nature, are equally to be estimated. Neither form of the theory is consistent, and the latter form is extremely inconsistent. If regard be had merely to quantity of pleasure or pain, utilitarianism can never justify its separation from the selfish theory. Thus presented, it leaves out of account all the higher principles of human nature, and takes into account only what is measurable and calculable, which can only be what is animal and selfish. On the other hand, recognition of distinctions of kind or quality in pleasures and pains, when followed out, must lead, not to the confirmation, but to the destruction, of the theory. Quantity exclusive of quality must rule in a properly utilitarian system. Admit a qualitative gradation among pleasures, and you can no longer have a greatest happiness principle, but only a highest happiness principle. Now, what is highest happiness, if it be not a happiness which flows from a consciousness of doing what is right, if it be not a happiness which presupposes a right beyond itself? If, from devotion to what is right, a man sacrifice all other happiness in the world, this highest happiness will it be true, still remain with him; but why? Is it because this happiness is set by him over against other happiness, and preferred? or is it because right is set over against happiness, and this particular kind of happiness springs necessarily from the very act of sacrificing happiness to right? It cannot be the former, which would transmute all martyrdom into selfishness. He who makes the pleasure which flows from virtue his end will never get it, for this plain reason, as Dr. Newman says, that he will never have the virtue. If the latter be the true supposition, utilitarianism is erroneous. It is in this case the righteousness which explains the pleasure, and not the pleasure which explains the righteousness.

Very serious objections may be urged against utilitarianism in every form. It mistakes what is, at the most, a criterion of rightness, for its foundation, the effect for the cause, a tendency or consequence for the constitutive essence. It is easy to prove that virtue is useful; but to prove that virtue is derived from utility, that utility is the source of virtue, is what no utilitarian seems to have accomplished. Austin and Bain plainly abandon utilitarianism at the central and critical point of the theory: the origin of the idea of right, and the other to the authority of law. John S. Mill does so not less when he refers "the obligatory force of utility" to "consciences feeling." The foundation of virtue should have its obligatory force in itself. The theory fails, even when it calls associationism to its aid to explain the origination of the idea of right, either out of sensations of pleasure and pain, or out of generalizations as to happiness and misery. This is admitted by the latest school of utilitarians. Darwin, in his Descent of Man, Herbert Spencer, in his Data of Ethics, Leslie Stephen, in his Science of Ethics, etc., concede that moral perceptions cannot be produced in a very limited time within each individual mind, as Bentham, the Mills, and Bain have maintained. They hold, however, that what the associationist utilitarianism erroneously suppose to take place in each individual during the early years of life can really be effected, although only the origin of some sensations of pleasure and pain, and the other to the authority of law. of the clergy to apostolic poverty, (4) severe punishment of all open sins. Their objects were practical, and they proceeded to the great principles of the Reformation. The first claimed for every man the right to search the Scriptures for himself; the second attacked sacerdotalism, the third cut at the root of ecclesiastical abuses, and the fourth claimed for Christianity the power to regulate society. But these articles were the result of compromise, and were held in different senses. Parties sprang up amongst the Bohemians. The most moderate party — "The Praguers" as they were called, because they had their seat in the University of Prague — were content with these articles, and wished in all else to hold the orthodox practices. In opposition to this conservative party stood the radicals, who were called "Taborites," from their custom of meeting in the open air on hilltops, to which they gave biblical names, such as Tabor and Oreb. The most moderate of the Taborites were the followers of Zizka, who after his death were called "Orphans." They were more simple in their ritual than the Praguers, but joined the extreme Taborites, chiefly from political reasons. The Taborites proper set aside all ecclesiastical traditions, and stood only upon Scripture, which each man might interpret for himself. They denied transubstantiation, which the Praguers and Orphans held. Besides these there was a group of extreme sectaries, Millenniums and Antinomians, who asserted that God existed only in the hearts of the believers. Most notorious of these were the Adamites, who lived a life of nature, which degenerated into shamelessness. They were exterminated by Zizka. The belief that it was a duty to punish sins led to intolerance of one party towards another, and also to great cruelty in war. The Hussite wars are amongst the most bloody which are recorded in history.

The religious zeal of the Bohemians formed the foundation of a military system which enabled them for ten years (1426–30) to defy Catholic armies of Europe. But the Utraquists, though victorious against the enemy, were divided amongst themselves; and peace abroad only brought discord and anarchy at home. Bohemia exhausted itself in warfare, and longed for peace. To the necessity of negotiating with the Utraquists, the Council of Basel owed its existence. In 1433 Bohemian representatives went to a conference with the council. In the discussion of the Four Articles of Prague, the council gradually succeeded in shaking the union of the Utraquists and Taborites. The moderate party favored an agreement with the church; and, when peace was possible, its advocates increased in number. After much negotiation, the Bohemians agreed to be reconciled to the church on the basis of the "Compacts," which defined the sense in which the council accepted the Four Articles of Prague. (1) They admitted freedom of preaching by priests duly commissioned; (2) If the Bohemians received on all other points the faith and ritual of the church, those who had the use of communicating under both kinds might continue to do so with the authority of the church; (3) The clergy and the church might possess temporalities, but were bound to administer them faithfully; (4) Open sins ought to be corrected, but by those who had jurisdiction given them in such matters. It was clear, that, in accepting this compromise, the Utraquists abandoned their position. The Compacts were signed at Iglaub in 1436, and were regarded by both sides as a temporary arrangement. The Utraquists hoped to use them as the foundation of a national church: the Catholics regarded them as a peace compromise by Utraquists who soon changed their position. The Catholic party had, in their base, no re-action in Bohemia. The extreme Taborites dwindle away; the moderate Utraquists had not a sufficiently strong position from which to withstand the pressure of orthodoxy. The Bohemian movement had been, in the beginning, largely political, — a rising of the Czechs against the Germans. When its force was spent, it left a church in communion with Rome, which practiced a slight deviation in ritual from the common use. Moreover, the permission to exercise this peculiar ritual was given by a council, and received no papal sanction. For some years the Papacy judged it prudent neither to accept nor repudiate the Compacts. The Utraquists strove to consolidate their national church, and set up Rokycana (q.v.) as its archbishop. The Papacy refused to sanction his appointment, and strove by every means to strengthen the Catholic party in Bohemia. George Podiebrad (q.v.) strove to unite Bohemia politically, and desired that this was only possible on the basis of the Compacts. But Pope Pius II was alarmed at the successes of King George; and in 1402 declared the Compacts to be extinguished, and required George to unite his church with the Church of Rome. The majority of the Bohemians were still attached to Utraquism, and stood by their king against the enemies whom the Pope raised up against him. Utraquism still triumphed, and the machinations of the Catholics were likely to plunge Bohemia into another religious war. But a truce was made at Kutna-Hora in 1435, and the truce developed into a peace. The Utraquists and Utraquists lived peaceably side by side. Utraquism, however, had by this time lost its meaning, and was merely an empty protest. Its leaders had hoped to find in the Compacts the basis of a national church. The Catholics had been too strong for them; they steadily refused to unite with them. The Utraquists sacrificed their fundamental principles to gain peace, and the demand of the cup for the laity became a meaningless symbol when detached from the rest of the Utraquists beliefs. Yet Utraquism, in its decadence, threw out a sect which was important,— the Brethren of the Law of Christ, or Bohemian Brothers as they were afterwards called (q.v.). To the example and writings of the Utraquists, Luther owed much. But the Utraquists did not at first recognize Lutheranism. When they did, they accepted it entirely, and added nothing of their own. Utraquism vanished, and was absorbed in the full tide of the Reformation.

ONE of the most influential and distinguished leaders of the Remonstrants; b. at Utrecht, Feb. 11, 1557; d. at The Hague, Sept. 24, 1644. He studied in Geneva, under Beza; in 1584 was appointed preacher at Utrecht; deprived of his position in 1588, on account of his friendship for Arminius; appointed preacher at The Hague in 1589, and court-chaplain of Prince Moritz of Orange. He pleaded for a national synod, in which the Remonstrants should have an equal right of speech with the Calvinists, and, with Episcopius and others, met the opponents at The Hague in 1611 to discuss propositions of peace. A decree banishing him, and confiscating his goods, was passed. He fled to France in 1622, and returned in 1626 to Rotterdam, where he lay concealed for a time. In 1629 his goods were restored to him; and in 1631 he preached again at The Hague, but his enemies succeeded in having him silenced. UZZIAH (might of Jehovah), the tenth king of Judah; son of Amaziah and Jecoliah (2 Chron. xxvi. 1, 3); called in 2 Kings (xiv. 21, xv. 1, and elsewhere), except in four places (xv. 18, 30, 32, 34), Azariah (whom Jehovah helps). It is likely that the latter name was given to him in view of his great victories, so evidently the result of divine help. He was sixteen years old, when, by choice of the people, he succeeded his father. He justified this selection. He was a more pious and devoted servant of Jehovah than his father had been. During his reign of fifty-two years the prophets Amos (i. 1), Hosea (i. 1), and Isaiah (i. 1, vi. 1), and possibly Joel flourished. His piety is attributed largely to Zechariah's influence (2 Chron. xxvi. 5). He was warlike and victorious. His army was large, well appointed, and well drilled. He was the first Judite, apparently, to use stone and dart throwing machines (2 Chron. xxvi. 11-15). Under him Judah threw off all dependence upon Israel, the seaport Elath was captured, the Philistines and the Arabians conquered, the fenced cities rebuilt, Jerusalem fortified, towers erected, and wells dug, — the latter because "he had much cattle," and "loved husbandry" (2 Chron. xxvi. 6-10). But, lifted up by his successes, he essayed to usurp the priest's office, and burn incense in the temple. Resisted valiantly by Azariah and eighty other priests, he was effectually stopped in full career by the appearance of leprosy upon his forehead; and he died as a leper in a separate house from the palace, and was buried in the "field of burial." According to the usual chronology, he reigned from 810 to 758 B.C. E. NAGELSBAKH.
VADIAN, the Reformer of St. Gall, properly Joachim von Watt; b. at St. Gall, Switzerland, Dec. 30, 1484; d. there April 6, 1551. He was educated first at home, and then at Vienna, where he met Zwingli; and there he changed his name, according to the pedantic fashion of the time, first to Vadius, and then to Vadianus. His studies took a very wide range, embracing all the learning of the time. His proficiency and versatility are shown by his appointment as professor of the Latin and Greek languages and literature in the university (1510-18), his reception of the degree of doctor in medicine, and from the emperor the laureate's crown. But of more permanent consequence was his study of Luther's writings, in correspondence with Zwingli, and presided at the conferences held at Zurich (1523) and at Bern (1528). He headed the Reformation party in St. Gall, vigorously opposed the Anabaptists, and in every way played the part of chief. In 1526 his fellow-citizens testified their appreciation of his services by electing him chief magistrate, and again in 1531. He was emphatically the people's friend. He stood by them in time of leisure; he led them in religious thought. He died bewailed by the entire Reformed party. Among his writings is Aphorismorum libri sex de consideratione Eucharistiae, Zurich, 1535. See his Life by Pressel, in vol. ix of the series: Väter der reformirten Kirche, Elberfeld, 1881.

VAGANTES (clericivagantes, or vagi) denotes, in ancient canon law, clergers who had received ordination without at the same time obtaining any office, and who consequently were roaming about in search of employment. Laws against the disgraceful behavior of such clerks were enacted as early as the fourth and fifth centuries; and the Council of Chalcedon (451) forbad, in its Canon 6, to confer an ordinatio absoluta sine vaga without any titulus ordinationis; that is, a general ordination without any corresponding office. Nevertheless, vagantes were soon again met with, especially in countries in which the establishment of Christianity had not yet been completed, or in the vicinity of such missionary fields. As it seldom was possible to appoint the missionary to a definite diocese, and as he was often thrown out of activity by Pagan persecutions or the mere fear of them, the safer neighborhood of the church might often swarm with such missionary bishops and priests, who recognized no jurisdiction of any settled authority, but hung loose on the Christian community,—clericis acephalos (ἀκέφαλοι, "without head"). Aggravating circumstances were often added. Not seldom the vagantes had obtained their ordination by simony, and used it as a business opportunity. They hired themselves out to other bishops or priests who were in possession of benefices, and undertook to do the work, according to their idea of it, for a recompense; they entered the service of some rich lord or nobleman as his private chaplain, connecting with that position much underhand business; and sometimes they even became mere tramps. In the Carlowingian period complaints of them were very numerous, and Charlemagne twice renewed the prohibition against ordinatio vaga. In the ninth century several councils enacted laws against the vagantes, such as the Concil. Moignat., 847, and the Concil. Ticinense, 890 (Mansi, xiv pp. 906 and 938); and many bishops were zealous in denouncing them, such as Agobard of Lyons (De privilegio et jure sacerdotii), and Goderich of Hildeshem. (See his Vita, iv. 26.) In the twelfth century the complaints are repeated by Gerhoh of Reichersberg in his De corrupto ecclenae status, and Adversus Simoniacos. But an effective remedy was finally found. It was enacted that a bishop, if he ordained a person without giving him any office, should support him at his own table, that is, out of his own pocket, until an office could be preserved. This principle was retained by the Council of Trent (1545-63, Sess. 23, c. 23); and the result is, that the Roman-Catholic Church has almost entirely freed itself from a class of pauper clergy.

ZÖCKLER.

VALDES, Alonso and Juan de, twin-brothers, and strikingly alike both physically and intellectually; were b. at Cuenca, in Castile, about 1500, and educated at the Castilian court. In 1520 Alonso accompanied Charles V. to Germany, and was present at the coronation in Aix-la-Chapelle and at the diet of Worms. After witnessing the burning of Luther's writings, he wrote to Peter Martyr, his friend, "People think that now they are at the end of the tragedy, but I think they are only at the beginning." Having returned to Spain in 1524, he was active as secretary under the chancellor, Arboiro da Gattinara, a Piedmontese, who for a decade was the motive-power in the imperial policy, and made himself noticed by the zeal with which he defended Erasmus against the fury of the Spanish monks. In 1527 he wrote a dialogue between a courtier and an archdeacon, in which he defended the recent seizure of Rome and the Pope by the imperial army under the constable of Bourbon. Though as yet circulating only in manuscript, the dialogue fell into the hands of the papal nuncio, Count Castiglione, who denounced it in a most violent manner to the imperial government; but Alonso was protected by the chancellor. And, just as the embroilment reached its point of culmination, another dialogue appeared between Mercury and Charon. It was written by Juan de Valdés, and was chiefly political; though it also contained some very sharp criticisms on the Church and the papal policy. Both dialogues were first printed in 1529, anonymously; latest edition, 1850. In 1530 Alonso was present at the diet of Augsburg, where he translated the confession of the Lutherans to the emperor, and generally acted as mediator between the opposing parties. He gained the esteem and confidence, not only of Melanchthon, but of the Protestants in general; and, indeed, he showed so much sympathy for the Reformation, that he afterwards found it advisable not to return to Spain. In 1531 he was at the imperial court in Brussels, and in 1532 he was sent by the emperor to the council of Basle, but of the result of his mission after that time nothing is known. Juan also found it prudent to keep out of the reach of the Spanish Inquisition. In 1531 he staid in Rome, in intimate intercourse with Sepulveda, the imperial historiographer, and deeply interested in the study of natural science. In 1533 he settled in Naples, and published there in the same year his Didálogo de la lengua (last edition, Madrid, 1860), concerning the origin, history, style, and literary monuments of the Spanish language. In Naples he conversed much with Ochino, Peter Vermigli, etc.; and gradually formed a circle, which, though it never openly avowed its protestant principles, regarded the Roman-Catholic Church, in decided opposition to the leading principles of its constitution and policy. Juan de Valdés was a theologian both by talent and by study, though he had not enjoyed professional training; and his views on justification, on the authority of the Bible, and the importance of its study, etc., approached often very closely to those of Luther. His Alífbeto Christiano, a dialogue between himself and Giulia Gonzaga, who afterwards entered a Franciscan monastery, was translated into English, London, 1860; [his Commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew, and his Spiritual Milk, in 1882.] His principal work is his Considerations, of which the original Spanish text has been only partially preserved. An Italian translation, by C. S. Curione, was translated at Basel, 1550; an English, in London, 1865. His early death, however (1540 or 1541), freed him from falling into the hands of the Italian Inquisition, which was established in 1514; but his influence was felt, for a long time after his decease, in Naples and its neighborhood. [See Ed. Boehmer: Lives of Juan and Alfonso de Valdés, London, 1882, in Commentaries.]

VALENS, Roman emperor from March 28, 364, to Aug. 9, 379; occupies a conspicuous place in the history of the Church, as the last champion of Ariantianism among the rulers of the Eastern Empire. Having put down the insurrection of Procopius, a relative of Julian, he prepared for a campaign against the Goths; and one of the preparations he wanted to make was to receive baptism. But the patriarch of Constantinople, Eudoxius, was an Arian; and the orthodox had, at that moment, not one single church left to them in the capital. Thus the rule and ignorant men, who had no knowledge of the true faith, were between the Nicene Creed and Arianism, and no sense for such a distinction, fell incidentally into the hands of the heretics. As soon as he returned from his victory over the Goths, persecutions began, not in a systematic way, for Valens was unable to form a general plan and carry it out, but suddenly, and occasionally, incidentally. In Egypt, which was orthodox throughout, nothing could be done, as long as Athanasius lived, without running the risk of losing the province; but, when Athanasius died in 375, his successor, Lucius, was an Arian; and shortly after began the massacres in the Nitrian desert. The Arians knew very well that the Orthodox party had its staunchest supporters among the monks, and the monks happened to be specially odious to the taste of the emperor. He repealed the decree which exempted them from military service, and then sent a detachment of soldiers into the desert, where the most wanton cruelties were perpetrated. The impression which Basil the Great made upon the emperor freed Cappadocia from persecutions; but in Antioch, where for a long time he resided, and in other places of Asia Minor, the Orthodox bishops were banished, and abandoned to the Arians. In Constantinople, when Eudoxius died, an orthodox patriarch, Euagrius, was elected, but was immediately expelled by the emperor, and superseded by an Arian, Demophilus. A deputation of eighty prebishops repaired to the emperor to protest; but he answered them by placing them on board a vessel, which, after reaching open sea, was set on fire. The sources to the reign of Valens are politically Ammianus Marcellinus and Zosimus, and ecclesiastically Theodoret, Socrates, Sozomen, and the three Cappadocians, — Basil and the two Gregories. H. Schmidt.

VALENTINE, St., a Roman presbyter who befriended the martyrs in the persecution of Claudius II., and was in consequence arrested, beaten with clubs, and finally beheaded (Feb. 14, 276). Pope Julius built a church in his honor, near Ponte Molle. Butler says, "To abolish the heathens' lewd, superstitious customs of boy's drawing the names of girls in honor of their goddesses, Februa Juno, on the 15th of this month, several zealous pastors substituted the names of saints in billets given on this day." (Feb. 14.) Lives of Saints, Feb. 14. There was, therefore, originally no connection between the saint and the custom of St. Valentine's Day; but the custom is far older, probably of pre-Christian origin.

VALENTINIAN III. (Roman emperor 425-455) issued in 445 an edict which recognized the Bishop of Rome as the primate of the whole Christian Church, holding supreme power in all church matters. The edict concerned, of course, only the West. The idea of the emperor was, that a strongly monarchical church constitution might form a band around the provinces of the Western Empire, now evidently falling asunder.

VALENTINUS, St. There are quite a number of saints of this name, — a presbyter of Rome, a bishop of Interamna, an African, and a Belgian martyr, etc. (See Act. Sanct., Feb. 13, March 16, April 14 and 29, etc.) But the most important is the apostle of Rhecia, the reputed bishop of Passau, and one of the first Christian missionaries active in south-eastern Germany. The first notice of him is found in the life of St. Severinus, in Pex (Script. Rer. Austriacar, i. p. 86), according to which he preached in Tyrol in the first half of the fifth century, and died Jan. 6. Venantius Fortunatus tells us that many churches in this region were dedicated to him. Christianus, Vita Corbiniani (730), states that he was buried at Matsch, in the Tyrolean Alps, whence his bones were brought to Trent. In 788 the Bavarian...

VALEARIAN (Roman emperor 253–259) showed himself quite friendly to the Christians in the beginning of his reign. But by Leo I., the most violent persecution of them. Like the Decian persecution, it was principally directed against the bishops and the leaders generally of the church. The first edict simply forbade them to hold meetings and celebrate service; the second ordered all who disobeyed to be sent to work in the mines; and the third, of 258, enacted that all bishops, presbyters, and deacons should be put to death. Sixtus of Rome, and Cyprian of Carthage, fell as victims. But in 259 Valerian was defeated and taken prisoner by King Saporos; and his son and successor, Gallienus, immediately put an end to the persecution. See Fishlock: Hist. Eccl., VII. 10; Cyprian: Epp., 82, 83. Zöckler.

VALEARIAN, St., was Bishop of Cemelle, a see belonging under the archbishop of Embrodonum, and situated in the Maritime Alps, but by Leo I., removed to Nizza. He flourished in the fifth century; was present at the synods of Riez, 430; signed the letter of the Gallican bishops to Leo I., 451 (see Leo: Opp., i. pp. 998 and 1110); and sided signed the letter of the Gallican bishops to Leo I., 451 (see Leo: Opp., i. pp. 998 and 1110); and sided with the monks of Lerins in their controversy with the neighboring bishops. His writings (twenty-nine sermons of ascetic contents, and an Epistolae ad monachos) were edited by Sirmond (Paris, 1612) and Raymond (Lyons, 1683), and reprinted by Migne: Patro. Lat., iii. Zöckler.

VALESIUS, Henri de Valois, b. in Paris, Sept. 10, 1603; d. there May 7, 1676. He was educated in the Jesuit College at Verdun, and studied law at Bourges, but abandoned the juridical career, and devoted himself entirely to literary studies, enjoying, in the latter part of his life, a pension from Louis XIV. and the title of royal historiographer. He published critical editions of Ammianus Marcellinus (1636), Eusebius (1659), Sozomen, Theodoret, Evagrius, etc. His life was edited by his brother, Paris, 1677. See also Valesiana, Paris, 1694. VALLOMBROSA, The Order of, of a branch of the Benedictines; was founded in 1039 by Johannes Gualbertus in a valley of the Apennines, whence its name. The order, which never reached any considerable extension, was the first to introduce lay-brothers (conversi, in distinction to patres) in order to make it possible for the monks to keep the vows of silence and seclusion.

VANDALS (Vandali, Vandali, Vindili). The Vandals lived for a long time unnoticed in the history, as the companions of the Marcomanni and other Danubian tribes, fighting with Marcus Aurelius. Later on they re-appear on the frontiers of Dacia, as the companions of the Goths and Gepids, fighting with Probus. Probus, however, induced them to settle in Dacia; and there they lived for a long time, as the fatherland was undermined by their violence and cruelty, that it never recovered. Genseric closed or destroyed the church buildings, and confiscated all church property. The bishops and priests were banished, sent to the mines, tortured, beheaded, burnt. Rich and distinguished laymen were seized, fined, bereft of all their property, tortured, sold as slaves. Not only Italy, but also the Eastern provinces of the empire, swarmed with refugees from Africa. After the occupation of Carthage, the bishop, Quodvultdeus, and most of the clergy of the city, were stripped naked, and placed on an old rickety raft, which was set adrift on the open sea: fortunately it landed on the coast of Campania. Under Genseric's son, Huneric (477–486), the persecutions abated for a short time, but then began again more violent than ever. He convened a council at Carthage in 484, under the presidency of Cyrillic, the Arian patriarch of the Vandals. The very arrangement showed the spirit of the undertaking: The Arian bishops were seated on elevated thrones, while the Catholic bishops were huddled together before a judgment-bar like criminals. Some ventured to renounce, but they were immediately brought to silence by one hundred lashes each. The result of the council was an edict which ordered all to come to the folding at the end of the same year. 80 bishops died under the torture, 46 were sent to work in the mines of Corsica, 302 fled into the desert. Again a period of peace intervened during the reign of Gundamund (489–495); but Trasamund (496–525) started the persecutions anew: 120 bishops, among whom was the celebrated and learned Amphilochius, and 200 priests of Sardinia. It was of no avail that Hilderic (523–531) allowed the Catholic bishops to return to their congregations, nor that Belisarius, the general of Justinian, reconquered Africa, and re-established the Catholic Church (534): the Vandal dominion had lasted long enough to annihilate almost every trace of Roman civilization, and to destroy almost completely the Christian Church in Africa.

VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, located at Nashville, Tenn., is under the control of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South, and owes its existence to the munificence of Cornelius Vanderbilt of New York, who on the 27th of March, 1873, made, through Bishop II. N. McTyeire (whom he named as president of the Board of Trust for life), a donation of five hundred thousand dollars; which amount he subsequently increased to one million.
It has also received from Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, son of the founder, four hundred and fifty	hundred dollars, and from other sources about seventy-five thousand. It has an endowment of nearly nine hundred thousand dollars. The buildings are commodious and well equipped; and the grounds, located on an eminence in the suburbs of the city, and consisting of seventy-five acres, are ample and beautiful. The university is organized into six distinct departments (academic, biblical, legal, medical, pharmaceutical, and dental), with a chancellor and forty-two suburbs of the city, and consisting of seventy professors and instructors. It enrolled on its last catalogue (1885-86) 499 students. It is the largest and best endowed denominational institution of learning in the South.

VAN DOREN, William Howard, D.D., b. in Orange County, N.Y., March 2, 1810; d. at Indianapolis, Ind., Friday, Sept. 8, 1882. He was graduated at Columbia College, N.Y., and at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Penn., 1882; taught until 1886, when he was licensed by the Louisville presbytery. For two years he was a missionary in Mississippi. In 1839 he entered the regular pastorate, and served in the Reformed Church, East Brooklyn, N.Y. (1839-51), in the mission which ultimately became the 34th-Street Reformed Church, and in the Second Presbyterian Church, St. Louis. In 1865 he removed to Chicago, and there began the preparation of his Suggestive Commentary on the New Testament, on an Original Plan, of which have appeared Luke (New York, 1868, 2 vols.), John (1870, 2 vols.), Romans (1870, 2 vols.). In 1878 he removed to Indianaapolis. His Commentary is homiletic, and has been widely used.

VANE, Sir Henry, often called "Sir Harry Vane," was b. in 1612. His father was a statesman in the reign of James I and Charles I., but lost court-favor by his opposition to Lord Stra-ford. Young Henry imbibed republican princibles, probably strengthened by his Swiss travels, and in 1635 visited New England, when he was chosen governor of Massachusetts. The following year he returned, and pursued a political career which made him distinguished in the history of his country. He took part in all the important questions discussed by the new Parliament, and promoted the impeachment of Laud, and the adoption of the Solemn League and Covenant. He was a member of the Board of Trade, and a commissioner at the treaties of Uxbridge and the Isle of Wight. But he had little sympathy with Oliver Cromwell, either in his military or political views, being a staunch republican, and thinking more of the power of the musketeers than of Lord Protector. Cromwell was with arms in hand, but Vane was a determined theorist. Cromwell was both soldier and statesman; Vane, little more than a dreamy philosopher. Vane, however, became one of the Council of State after the execution of Charles I. in 1649, and in that capacity, and as a member of Parliament, greatly displeased his colleague, who denounced him as "a juggling fellow," and exclaimed, as he broke up the House of Commons in 1653, "The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" His book entitled A Healing Question Proposed and Resolved, published in 1666, so incensed the lord-protector, that he imprisoned the author in Carisbrooke Castle, Isle of Wight. Cromwell then tried gentle means to win over his intellectual antagonist, but in vain.
The latter preferred, in his noble retreat at Raby, in the County of Durham, those speculative studies, which he always pursued with great mental earnestness, to any participation in public affairs during Oliver's protectorate. Vane's advocacy of republicanism afterwards was utterly in vain; and upon the restoration of Charles II. he was indicted for "compassing and imagining the death" of that monarch. He pleaded justly, that what he had done during the Commonwealth was no breach of the statute of treason, as that statute applied to a king regnant, not to him who could only claim to be one de jure. Charles wrote to the lord-chancellor, saying that "Vane is too dangerous a man to let live, if one can honestly put him out of the way." He was put out of the way by being beheaded June 14, 1662. His behavior on the scaffold was very noble, and his character has been eulogized by his admiring biographer, John Forster, in his Statesmen of the Commonwealth of England. Vane's Retired Man's Meditations, and his England's Remembrancer, contain many eloquent passages; but the tone of the latter is very violent.

VARIOUS READINGS are the differences in the text between the various manuscripts, translations, and patristic quotations of the Scriptures.
In the case of the Bible manuscripts they are mostly accidental, arising from the scribe's not reading his copy correctly, or not hearing correctly when the passage was dictated to him, or, perhaps, from simple carelessness; such as copying the margin into the text, repeating a phrase or part of one.
A few intentional variations have been claimed;
but they are unimportant, and affect rather the form than the substance of the text. The various readings in the New-Testament manuscripts are in the aggregate very numerous. In Mill's time they were estimated at thirty thousand, and subse-cquent comparison has increased the number to about one hundred thousand. The following statement once occasioned great alarm; but now it is generally understood that the variations are slight in the vast majority of cases, — mere differenences in spelling, in the order of words, reduplication, etc., — and that no doctrine is affected. In regard to the Old Testament manuscripts the case is different. The source of the various readings is the same, but their number is very much less. The Hebrew manuscripts were copied by an official class, under strict regulations; and many deviations from the standard text occasioned rejection of the scribes' work. So the number of Hebrew variations is not more than 2,000. See Bible Text, pp. 260, 267, 270, 278; Kings and Chronicles.

VASSAR COLLEGE, located at Poughkeepsie, N.Y., was incorporated by the General Assembly in January, 1861. It was founded by Matthew Vassar (b. in East Dereham, Norfolk, Eng., April 29, 1792; d. at Poughkeepsie, June 26, 1868), who had acquired a fortune by his own exertions, and, being childless, resolved "to found and perpetuate an institution which should accomplish for young women what our colleges are accomplishing for young men." By gift and bequest he placed in the hands of its trustees funds amounting to about $778,000. The whole property of the college now (1883) amounts to $1,149,572.57; of which $128,718.57 is in productive funds, $125,000 of this last amount being in funds for scholarships, and but $90,000 in endowments for instruction.

Its faculty consists of a president, a lady principal in charge of the domestic life of the students, and seven professors in the different departments of collegiate instruction. The departments of art and music are also in charge of two professors. There are also twenty teachers distributed in the several departments.

The course of study is similar to that in colleges for men. It is prescribed to the middle of the sophomore year; after that, elective under the regulation of the faculty. Latin is required, and one other language, which may be Greek, German, or French. Each student may take simultaneously three studies. It was found necessary in the beginning to provide for a preparatory course; and, though it is still continued, it is regarded as provisional and temporary. The degree of A.B. is granted to students who complete the collegiate course of four years. The degree of A.M. is granted to graduates who pass examination in studies approved by the faculty as equivalent to a postgraduate course of two full years. Twenty-three graduates have received this degree. No honorary degrees have been conferred. A diploma is granted to students who are held upon the register of the college and have been good students who complete the full course of three years. The whole number of graduates is above 550. The annual charge for each student is $400.

The college opened to receive students in September, 1865, under the presidency of John H. Raymond, L.L.D., who continued in office till his decease, in August, 1858. He was succeeded by Samuel L. Caldwell, D.D., who is now in office. The whole number of students enrolled in its different departments for the first seventeen years has been over 6,000. It has a library of over 14,000 volumes; an astronomical observatory and a chemical laboratory, both amply equipped; cabinets of natural history valued at over $30,000; an art gallery of equal value; and a large and commodious building for the residence of students and instructors. The founder designed that the college should be entirely Christian, though unsectarian. B. L. Caldwell.

VATICAN COUNCIL, the last ecumenical council of the Roman-Catholic Church. It was held in the various churches of Rome from Dec. 8, 1869, to July 18 (or Oct. 20), 1870, but is not yet completed, and may be reconvened by the Pope. As the Council of Trent, which lasted, with interruptions, from 1543 to 1563, it is the twentieth in the Roman series of ecumenical councils, according to Bishop Hefele, who was himself a member of it. (See his Concilien geschichte, vol. i. pp. 59 sq., of the second and revised German edition, 1867.) Bellarmine (De conc., lib. 1, c. 5) and the majority of Roman divines and canonists count the Council of Trent as the eighteenth, and this would make the Vatican the nineteenth. The difference arises from the various and different ecumenicity of the reformatory councils of Pisa (1409), Constance (1414), and Basel (1430), which are rejected by many in whole or in part. Hefele excludes Pisa, but accepts several decrees of Constance and Basel as ecumenical. The Old Catholics, under the leadership of a group of German and French ecclesiastics, regarded the ecumenical character of the Vatican Council; but they were excommunicated. It is as authoritative for the Roman Church as that of Trent. It marks most important event in the doctrinal history of that church since the sixteenth century, and completes the system of papal absolutism. The Council of Trent was convened for the settlement of the questions raised by the Reformation, and ended with the condemnation of the Protestant or evangelical doctrines. The Vatican Council was convened for the condemnation of modern rationalism and liberalism within the Roman Church, and for the settlement of the question of final authority.

It was summoned by Pope Pius IX., in the twenty-third year of his pontificate, by an encyclical letter (Eterni Patris unigenitus Filius), June 29, 1868, solemnly opened Dec. 8, 1869, and indefinitely postponed Oct. 20, 1870, in consequence of the Franco-German war, which broke out immediately after the passage of the Infallibility Decree (July 18), and ended in the destruction of the temporal power of the Papacy, and the establishment of the German Empire with a Protestant head,—the king of Prussia. The attendance was the largest known in the history of councils, and reached the number of 764 out of 1037 dignitaries who are entitled to a seat and vote in an oecumenical synod of the Roman Church. The Frenc 1 and German bishops were weak in number, but strongest in learning and the importance of the dioceses which they represented. The deliberations were conducted in strict secrecy, but four public sessions were held for the solemn proclamation of the results.

The subject-matter of the council was divided into four parts,—faith, discipline, religious orders, and rites (including missions); and each part was assigned to a special commission (congregatio, or deputatio), consisting of twenty-six prelates, with a presiding cardinal appointed by the Pope. The decrees were prepared on the basis of schemata previously drawn up by learned divines and canonists, discussed, revised, adopted in secret sessions by the general congregations, and then solemnly proclaimed in public sessions in the presence and by the authority of the Pope. The management was entirely in the hands of the Pope and his cardinals and advisers (Jesuits). The proceedings were conducted in Latin, the official language of the Roman Church.

The decrees on the dogmatic constitution of the Catholic faith were unanimously adopted in the third public session, April 24, 1870. They are directed against modern rationalism, pantheism, materialism, and atheism, and set forth the orthodox doctrine of God, the creation, and the relation of faith to reason. The Roman Civitatis Catholica praised these decrees as "a reflex of the wisdom of God," the Paris L'Univers, as "a masterpiece of orthodox divinity," the London Times, as "the broadest and boldest affirmation of the supernatural and spiritual order ever yet made in the face of the world." But, during the discussion, a Swiss prelate declared the schema de jure a work of supererogation, and said, "What is the use of condemning errors which have been long condemned, and tempt no Catholic? The false beliefs of mankind are beyond the reach of your decrees. The best defence of Catholicism is religious science. Encourage sound learning, and prove by deeds as well as words that it is the mission of the Church to promote, among the nations, liberty, light, and true freedom." Bishop Strossmayer from the Turkish frontier, the boldest and most liberal member of the council, attacked the preamble to the scheme which made Protestantism responsible for modern infidelity, and said, "Protestants abhor these errors as much as Catholics. The germ of rationalism existed in the Catholic Church before the Reformation, and bore its worst fruits in the midst of a Catholic nation at the time of Voltaire and the Encyclopædists. Catholics produced no better refutation of the errors to be condemned than Leibnitz and Guizot."

Further more important are the "decrees on the dogmatic constitution of the Church of Christ," or the decrees of papal absolutism and infallibility, which agitated the council for several months, and, after a vigorous opposition and the departure of the anti-infalliblist bishops, passed, with two dissenting votes, in the fourth public session, July 18, 1870, in the crowning act of the council, on which its historical significance rests. The question of papal jurisdiction and authority in relation to the general episcopate and the authority of an ecumenical council, had been left open by the Council of Trent, and was a subject of dispute for three hundred years between Gallicans and Ultramontanes, Jansenists and Jesuits, constitutional monarchists and absolute monarchists, until it was brought to final rest within that church. Ultramontanism and Jesuitism achieved a complete triumph over a powerful minority of liberal bishops, who at last gave up in despair, left Rome before the vote, and then submitted, one by one, to the decision of the council for the sake of unity and peace, which they esteemed higher than their personal conviction and the facts of history. Even Hefele, Kendrick, and Strossmayer submitted, and said to do so, or deny the infallibility of an ecumenical council, and share the fate of the Old Catholics. The council decided that the Roman pontiff has an ordinary episcopal authority and immediate jurisdiction over all the Catholic churches and dioceses; that he is the bishop of bishops; and that all bishops are simply his vicars, as he himself is the vicar of Christ; moreover, that the Roman pontiff, whenever he speaks ex cathedra, i.e., in his official capacity, to the Catholic world on any question of faith or morals, is infallible, and that his decisions are irrefutable, that is, absolutely final and irreversible in and of themselves, even without the consent of an ecumenical council. See INFALLIBILITY.

VATICAN. Palace of the, the residence of the Pope. It is on the right bank of the Tiber, in that part of Rome called the "Leonine City," and on the Vatican Hill. It is not one building, but a group of buildings, dating from different periods; but as such it is the largest palace in the world, 1151 feet long by 767 wide, containing a number of rooms variously estimated at from 4,422 to 10,000. The name "Vatican" is from oates, a prophet, because the district was believed to have been the site of Etruscan divination. The name was once given to the whole district between the foot of the Vatican Hill and the Tiber, near St.
Angelo. It was considered an unhealthy locality. In it was the Circus of Caligula, decorated by the obelisk which now stands in front of St.
Peter's. It afterwards became the Circus of Nero; and in his gardens on the Vatican Hill he put to death many Christians ("an immense multitude," says Tacitus) on the groundless charge of setting fire to Rome, and in awful mockery nailed them, clad in garments dipped in pitch, upon stakes, and set fire to them. The apostle Peter is said to have been crucified here.

The earliest residence of the popes at Rome was the Lateran. But Symmachus (498-514) built a palace on the Vatican, near old St. Peter's; and in it Charlemagne is said to have resided when in Rome shortly after the establishment of the library (1448), and appears in the earliest catalogue
(1475). It was carried to Paris by Napoleon I., and restored after his fall. For further information, see BIBLE TEXT, p. 270; SCHELL: Compantion to the Greek Testament, pp. 113 sqq.

The treasures of the library are the Codex Vat-can us designated B. It is written on seven hundred and fifty-nine leaves of very fine vellum (the New Testament covers a hundred and forty-two leaves), in small but clear and neat uncial letters, in three columns of forty-two lines each to a page, ten inches by ten inches and a half. It is more accurately written than the Codex Sinaiti-cus, and probably is a little older, but not so complete. It dates from the fourth century. It was apparently copied in Egypt by three or four skillful scribes. It contains the Septuagint version of the Old Testament (with a few gaps and the omission of Maccabees), and the New Testament as far as Heb. ix. 14. The manuscript was brought to Rome shortly after the establishment of the library (1448), and appears in the earliest catalogue
(1475). It was carried to Paris by Napoleon I., but restored after his fall. For further information, see BIBLE TEXT, p. 270; SCHELL: Compan-

VATKE, Johann Karl Wilhelm, b. in Behudorf, near Magdeburg, March 14, 1806; d. at Berlin, April 19, 1882. He was privatscholar in theology at Berlin from 1830 to 1837, when he became extraordinary professor. He wrote Die Religion des Alten Testaments, Berlin, 1885,—the first part as a garden house. Julius II. (1503-13) united it to the palace by a courtyard, which Sixtus V.
(1585-90) divided into two by the library-building.
This latter pope began the present papal residence proper, and it was finished by Clement VIII.
(1592-1605). The apartments occupied by the Pope are very plain. Immediately above them are the apartments of the cardinal-secretary of state.
Of all the parts of the Vatican, the Sistine Chapel, built by Baccio Pandolfo in 1473, is probably the most famous, because of the ceiling and the altar-wall, frescoed by Michael Angelo (1475—1564), who did the former in 1508-09, and the latter in 1536-41. Upon the ceiling he put those wonderful pictures from the Old Testament, from the first day of creation to the intoxication of Noah, and the prophets Jonath, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Joel, Daniel, Isaiah, and Zechariah, and the sibyls Persica, Erythrea, Libyca, Cumæa, and Delphica. Upon the altar-wall is the famous fresco,
The Last Judgment. The palace and the stanze, different parts of the Vatican, are associated with the wonderful genius of Raphael, who painted them, and drew designs for them.

The Vatican includes the greatest collection of antique statuary in the world; and, although its paintings are said to be only fifty in number, among them are Domenichino's Communion of St.
Jerome, Raphael's Madonna di Foligno and Transfiguration, and Titian's Madonna and Saints. The Vatican Library contains 23,580 Greek, Latin, and Oriental manuscripts, but under 50,000 printed volumes. The books and manuscripts are hid-ed from sight of the tourist, behind locked cases; but permission can be obtained, by the use of due influence, to examine the books. Most precious of the treasures of the library is the Codex Vat-canicus designated B. It is written on seven hundred and fifty-nine leaves of very fine vellum (the
New Testament covers a hundred and forty-two leaves, of them), in small but clear and neat uncial letters, in three columns of forty-two lines each to a page, ten inches by ten inches and a half. It is more accurately written than the Codex Sinaiti-
cus, and probably is a little older, but not so complete. It dates from the fourth century. It was apparently copied in Egypt by three or four skillful scribes. It contains the Septuagint version of the

tence was excited among the clergy of the canton. Fortysix ministers refused to give up the services of the Mommers, who had been forbidden to meet (1824), but were at work in the canton. Forty-three ministers refused to read the proclamation from their pulpits. The offenders were punished; but the result of the high-handed measures was the formation of the Free Church (Église libre évangélique), Nov. 11, 1815. This church now (1883) numbers about six pastors. Its support is derived exclusively from voluntary contributions. VAUGHAN, Henry, self-styled "The Silurist:" b. at Newtown St. Bridget, in South Wales, 1621; brother Thomas at Jesus College, Oxford; went to London; acquired a medical degree; was in the service of the Momiers, who had been imprisoned as a royalist; returned to Newton, and lived many years in the town of xbridge, near London, undertaking the care of a small church in that place. He subsequently removed to St. John's Wood, and in 1807 went down to Torquay to preside over a newly formed congregation. There he died June 15, 1808. He was chairman of the Congregational Union in 1846, and visited America in 1865 as a delegate from that body. He is best known by his numerous works, especially his Life and Opinions of Wycliffe, in two volumes, 1828, and his Monograph of the Reformer, 1853. He was editor of the British Quarterly from its commencement in 1845 down to the year 1866. He delivered in 1834 the congregational lecture entitled Causes of the Corruption of Christianity, and published A History of England under the House of Stuart, 1840, also Revolutions in History, 3 vols., 1859—63. His publications altogether were very numerous.

VEHMIC COURT (Vehmgericht, a word of uncertain etymology, but probably allied to the Dutch vêm, an "association," a "brotherhood") was the name of a peculiar judicial institution, which, according to tradition, was founded by Charlemagne and Leo III., and continued to exist, at least nominally, in Westphalia down to the present century, when it was suppressed (in 1811) by Jerome Bonaparte. The tribunal was composed of free men of spotless character, but not necessarily belonging to any certain social rank or state: both the emperor and the peasant could be members. The presence of seven members was necessary in order to form the court. When Duke Heinrich of Bavaria was sentenced (in 1434), over eight hundred members were present. The court took cognizance of all kinds of cases, and summoned all kinds of persons — with the exception of ecclesiastics, Jews, and women — to appear before it. Its sittings were partly public,—held under open sky,—partly secret; and its verdicts were executed by its own members. In the early middle ages, when might was right, and the will of the strong the only law in power, the Vehmic Court was an institution of great value; but, when the State became able to maintain its laws, the Vehmic Court became superfluous, and at the same time it degenerated into an outrageous tyranny. In the fifteenth century several emperors tried to correspond its authority, and alter its character; and in the sixteenth century it held its last open session. See WIGAND: Geschichteder Vehmgewichte, Wetzlar, 1817; WALTER: Deutsche Reichsgeschichte, Bonn, 1857, 632; comp. art. by H. F. JACOBSON, in 1st ed. of Herzog, vol. xvii. pp. 52-61.

VEIL is the translation of the Authorized Version words related to mantles, shawls, and veils in Gen. xxiv. 65, xxxvii. 14, 19; Ruth iii. 15; Cant. v. 7; Isa. iii. 23. Veils were rarely used among the Hebrews, the Egyptians, or Assyrians, as is abundantly proved by the absence of allusion to them in the writings of the first, and by the pictures upon the monuments of the last two nations. Women in the Bible lands to-day are never seen in public without a veil, or an apology for one; but the practice dates from Mohammed.

VENATORIUS, Thomas, b. at Nuremberg, about 1488; d. there Feb. 4, 1551. He studied mathematics, classical literature, and theology, and entered then the order of the Dominicans. But he unhappily embraced the Reformers, was appointed preacher at St. Jacob's in his native city, and contributed much to the establishment of Protestantism there. He wrote Axionmata rerum christianarum (1526), Defensio pro baptismo (1527), etc.; but his principal work is his De vita et christiana (1529), the first attempt at a Protestant ethics.

VERENA, a Christian virgin who came with the Thebais legion of Mauritius from Upper Egypt to the West. In Milan, where she stopped for some time, she heard of the war which had overtaken the legion; and shortly after she went to Switzerland, where she labored first in the neighborhood of Solothurn, and afterwards in the region near the junction of the Rhine and the Aar for the conversion of the Pagan population. She died at Zürzach, near Constance, where she lies buried. See Martyrologium Notkeri, in Canisius: Lect. Antiq., ii., and Act. Sanct., Sept. 1. ZÖCKLER.

VERGERIUS, Peter Paulus, b. at Capo d'Istria in 1495; d. at Tubingen, Oct. 4, 1565. He studied law at Padua; entered the papal service, and was twice sent as nuncio to Germany by Clement VII. and Paul III., on which occasions he gave so great satisfaction, that in 1536 he was made bishop of his native city. Sent to the colloquy at Worms (Jan. 1, 1541), his speeches seemed to the curia to be too conciliatory, and he retired to his see. He then began to study the writings of the Reformers for the purpose of refuting them: but the result of his studies was his own conversion; and the reforms he introduced in his diocese, the manner in which he spoke of justification by faith, invocation of saints, etc., very soon roused the suspicion of the Inquisition. His frequent intercourse with Francesco Speria finally induced the authorities to take measures against him; but he escaped, and fled into Switzerland, 1542. After laboring for several years in the German diocese, as minister of Vicosoprano, he removed in 1552 to Tubingen, where he spent the rest of his life, enjoying a pension from the Duke of Württemberg. In 1556 he was licensed as a Unitarian preacher, 1843, but took no charge, and lived in retirement at Salen. His Essays and Poems (1889) show a delicate religious genius, and contain some of the best sonnets in our language. Seven of his lyrics appeared in Longfellow and Johnson's Book of Hymns, 1846; and at least one of them, "Wilt thou not visit me?" has been widely circulated. A complete edition of his writings is to be desired. See the Century magazine for October, 1882, article by W. F. Andrews, on "An Inspired Life." — His younger brother, Washington Very (b. Tiberius was sick; and, having heard of the wonderful cures wrought by the portrait, he sent for Veronica. She obeyed the call, and went to Rome, and, as soon as the emperor had touched the cloth, he was cured. Veronica remained in Rome; and, when she died, she bequeathed the costly relic to Clement, the successor of Peter. In the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, the historian John VII. asserted that the Church of St. Maria Maggiore was actually in possession of the miraculous portrait; but it was shown only to kings and princes, and only on certain conditions. Both Milan, however, and Jaen in Spain, claim to have the genuine head-cloth of Veronica; and, in unriddling this entanglement, it is worth noticing, that, in the thirteenth century (Gervasonius of Tilburg: Otia imperialia, 25; Matthew Paris: Ad an. 1218), it was not the possessor of the cloth, but the cloth itself which was called "Veronica," that is, vera icon (true picture), a circumstance which speaks in favor of Grimm's combination of the legend of the occasion with that of Abene.

form as the sticharion, but shorter, of various colors, and richly embroidered with golden crosses. Originally the saccos was reserved for patriarchs and metropolitans; but, since the time of Peter the Great, it has been worn by all bishops. Over the saccos the mantia is spread,—a loose mantle fastened on the shoulder, blue or black, ornamented in the stripes of the living spirit, and provided in front with two small, stiff tablets, signifying the Old and the New Testament. When officiating before the altar, he wears the mitra, which is often of gold, and very costly; and in his hand he holds the patresions, or episcopal staff, ending in a crook and a small cross.

The farther east, the more gorgeous the liturgical apparel becomes. In this respect the Armenian Church stands foremost in all Christendom. The principal articles of vestment are also there the tunic (shaboy) and the toga (pilon). The shabig is white, adorned with lace in the case of deacons and choir-boys,—and held together around the waist by a sash embroidered with gold. The pilon has the form of the paludamentum, and is black, or, in the case of bishops and catholics, violet. When mass is said, all the clergy, from the priest upwards, wear the sharshar (a more or less richly ornamented mantle, of different colors, open in front, and falling down in ample folds) and the anzeroz (a handkerchief of fine white linen, for use at the three ablutions). On the head the priests and the doctors of theology wear the mitre, or episcopal staff, ending in a serpent, referring to the serpent raised by Moses in the desert. During service the shoes are often taken off, and replaced by a peculiar kind of slippers. On Maundy Thursday all ecclesiastical vestments are white; and during "the night of weeping and howling," "the night of darkness," the whole church is covered with black, and service is celebrated in a dark, one single lamp being lighted in front of the crucifix on the altar; also, the priests and the doctors of theology wear the mitre, and is made of ivory, gold, silver, or ebony: it is white, adorned with lace in the case of deacons and choir-boys,—and held together around the waist by a sash embroidered with gold.

As many of the vestments of the Roman-Catholic Church are most closely connected with the service of the mass, it was quite natural that the Reformation should cause considerable changes to be introduced. Luther's ideas are strikingly expressed in his letter of Dec. 4, 1539, to George Buchholzer, provost of Berlin, the pith of which is, If the elector will allow you to preach the pure faith, you may do it in frock-coat or gown, just as it pleases him best; and, "If he is not satisfied with one gown, you may put on two or three." Zwingli, offended at the worldliness and vanity which found expression in the costume of the Roman-Catholic clergy, was more severe. See his Untlegen und gründ der Schlussreden oder artikel, 1523. Nevertheless, the Lutheran Church taking the doctor-coat of Luther, and the French-Reformed Church, the robe de Calvin, for their models, the differences between the ecclesiastical costumes of those two branches of the Evangelical Church became very slight. The Church of England, with its cassock, rochet, surplice, stole, and cappe, kept in this respect, as in several others, a little nearer to the Church of Rome; while, on the other hand, the English Dissenters, often abrogated vestments altogether. [See the interesting essay on "Ecclesiastical Vestments," in A. P. STANLEY'S Christian Institutions, New York, 1881.]

VESTRY (vestiarium, sacristia, secretarium) was the name of an apartment in the ancient church-building, destined to receive not only the vestments of the officiating clergy, but also the sacred vessels and other treasures of the church. That the vestry often was of considerable size may be inferred from the fact that it was often used as an assembly-room for provincial synods. Thus the third, fourth, and fifth councils of Carthage, and the synod of Arles, are stated to have been held in secretarii ecclesiae. Hence the modern word in the Episcopal Church; a vestry meaning an assembly of all parishioners for the discussion of the affairs of the parish, regardless of the place in which the assembly convenes. The officers who manage the parochial affairs, are called the vestry-board.

theologians, and also by modern writers, applied specially to the Eucharist when administered to a dying person as the due provision for his journey through death. The Council of Nicaea (325), in its can., xiii., forbade the priest to withhold the Eucharist from any dying man who wished for it, even if he were an apostate or a parricide; and in that connection it designates the Eucharist as the viaticum, Eiédwv.

VICTORIUS, b. in the latter half of the fourth century, at Calagurris, a village in southwestern Gaul, probably the present Caseres in Comminges; was ordained a presbyter at Barcelona in 385, and went then to Jerusalem, carrying with him a letter of recommendation from Paulinus of Nola to Jerome. The visit to the East, however, seems to have made a similar impression on Vigilantius as the visit to Rome made on Luther. He and Jerome soon fell out; and the sixty-first letter of Jerome is evidently an answer to an attack made upon him by Vigilantius, perhaps during the latter's stay in Alexandria. Some time after his return to his native country, Vigilantius denounced to Jerome by the presbyter Riparius as a teacher of unsound doctrines. Jerome answered, and finally he wrote his essay, Contra Vigilantium. It is not possible, from the quotations of Jerome, to form a complete conception of the theological system of Vigilantius; but its general tendency is perfectly clear, and of such a character as to give a satisfactory explanation of the conflict between him and Jerome, for it is an energetic protest against that whole development which is represented by Jerome. Vigilantius attacked the belief in the existence and operation of the holy relics on doctrinal grounds: it seemed to him to be a relapse into Paganism. And he attacked monasticism on moral grounds: the flight from the world is not a victory over the world. He was especially severe upon the celibacy of the priests, on their vows of poverty, etc., and attacked altogether the idea of a higher morality for the monks and the clergy, and a lower for people of the world. The sources are, besides

H. Schmidt.

Vigiliius (Pope 540–553) was a Roman by birth, and deacon during the reign of Agapetus, who parted from Constantinople. Ambitious and grasping, but without talent or courage to realize his aspirations, he fell a prey to the intrigues of the Byzantine court. When Agapetus died, in Constantinople, he was appointed his successor, but on the secret condition that he should support the emperor's scheme for the reconciliation of the Monophysites with the orthodox Church. On his arrival at Rome, however, he found the see already occupied by one Silverius; but, in accordance with the bargain he had made with the emperor, Belisarius came to his aid, and Silverius was removed, partly by intrigues, partly by violence. Vigilius was not so prompt in fulfilling his part of the bargain. He wrote a letter to the three deposed Monophysite patriarchs of the East, — Theodosius of Alexandria, Anthimus of Constantinople, and Severus of Antioch, — in which he professed perfect agreement with their faith. But he demanded that the letter should be kept a secret, on the plea that he was able to do more for the Monophysites' cause when he preserved the appearance of being in agreement with the synod of Chalcedon. Meanwhile the emperor had been persuaded that a condemnation of the three principal representatives of the Nestorian view — Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrus, and Ibas — would silence all the objections of the Monophysites to the synod of Chalcedon; and he consequently issued an edict to that end. But the edict met with resistance even in the East; and in the West it was generally condemned, the African Church taking the lead of the opposition. The emperor demanded of Vigilius that he should subscribe the edict, and Vigilius dared not. For three years he succeeded in escaping the dilemma by prevarications and subterfuges of all kinds. But in 547 he was peremptorily summoned to Constantinople. Synod after synod was convened to return to his senses and to hold out to the end. In 553 he publicly retracted, and accepted the Constantinopolitan decrees, in order to be allowed to return to Rome. He died at Syracuse, however, on the way home. The sources are (besides the Liber pontificalis by Anas, the letter of Simplicianus to Chrysostom, and the Pro defensione trion capitalorum, by Facundus of Hermiane, all three found in Galland: Bibli., vols. xi. and xii. H. Schmidt.

Vigiliius the Deacon, a native of Gaul, flourished, according to Genadius (51), in the first half of the fifth century, and wrote a monastic rule, which has been published by Holstenius (Codex Regi., l) and Migne (Patr. Latin., vol. 50).

Vigiliius, Bishop of Tarsus, a city in the African province of Byzacene, is the author of several celebrated works against Eutychianism and Arianism. Of his personal life only one single fact is known to us: he was present at the synod convened at Carthage in 484 by Huncheric, the king of the Vandals. (See Victor Vitensis: De persecutione Vandalica, iv.) His principal work, and the only one published over his name, is the Five Books against Eutyches, which, however, when first printed (by Churrerus, Tubing., 1528), was ascribed to Vigiliius of Trent. From this work an inference may be drawn with respect to the authorship of the Disputation between Athanasius, Photinus, Sabellius, and Aria, formerly ascribed to Athanasius; and from that, again, an inference may be drawn with respect to the authorship of the Poem of Marival, and the Twelve Books on the Trinity, both of which were published under the pseudonyme of Idacius Clarus. The first to bring light into this somewhat obscure and confused subject was the Jesuit Chiffletius, in his edition of the works of Vigiliius, Dijon, 1864: they are also found in the Bibli. Max. Pat., vols. iv. and viii. The original value of these works is not great, but as a polemist the author was certainly one of the most prominent writers of his age.

H. Schmidt.

Vigiliius, Bishop of Trent, is first mentioned by Genadius (37) as author of In laudem martyrum, and a letter on the great exploits of the martyrs of his age. As the former work is dedicated to Simplicianus, the successor of Ambrosius, the author must have lived at the end of the fourth, or the beginning of the fifth, century, and cannot possibly be the author of the Five Books against Eutyches, formerly ascribed to him. According to legend, he suffered martyrdom in 400 or 405. See Act. Sanct., June 26.

Vigils (vigilia, pernoctationes, somnoca) denotes, in the African bishopric Church, a kind of preparatory service, consisting of processions, prayers, singing, and recitals, celebrated on the eve before a great church-festival. Originally the name was applied to the common nightly meetings of the Christians during the period of persecution; but as those meetings were continued after the persecutions had ceased, — partly as an imitation of the Jewish sabbath, which begins at sunset; partly as an imitation of certain nocturnal Pagan festivals, — the name was also retained. In the second century the vigils of Easter and Pentecost were considered specially holy; the former, because it was the day of the resurrection of the world, was expected to take place at that date; the latter on account of the communication of the Holy Spirit through baptism. In the fourth and fifth centuries the Easter-vigils were considered the most appropriate term for baptism, communion, and ordination. The vigil was held by the bishop; that time being fixed in the Gregorian; but their gave occasion to so great scandals, that it was found necessary to exclude women altogether from them. They were, therefore, vehemently attacked, for instance by Vigiliius, and the time of their celebration was changed from evening to forenoon, or they were transformed into simple fasts. Easter-vigils, however, and Christmas-vigils, were still retained. [See BINGHAM: Antiq., XIII. ix. 4.] NEUDECKER.

VIGNOLLES, Alphonse de, b. at Aubais in Languedoc, Oct. 29, 1619; d. in Berlin, July 24, 1744. He studied theology at Saumur and Oxford, and was made a member of the newly founded academy of science, of whose mathematical division he became director in 1727. His Chronologie de l'historie sainte, Paris, 1738, 2 vols. in quarto, attracted the attention of the whole learned world. Less successful was his edition of Lenfant's Histoire de la Pensee Jeanne, The Hague, 1726, with notes and additions, in which he defended that blundering legend as an historical fact.

VILLEGAGNON, Nicholas Durand de, b. about 1510; d. in 1571; the leader and the betrayer of the first missionary attempt of the Reformed church. He descended from a noble family in Brittany; was educated for the navy; distinguished himself in 1541 in the campaign which Charles V. made to Algeria; brought in 1548 the young Scotch queen to France in spite of the exertions of the English fleet to prevent it; took part in 1550 in the defence of Malta, and was made a knight of the order, etc. As vice-admiral of Brittany he fell out with the governor of the province, who was favored by the king. His position became difficult; and the glowing descriptions of South America which at that time circulated in Europe induced him to leave France, and try to found a colony in South America. But he knew that he could obtain the king's support only through the influence of Admiral Coligny, and that he secured by declaring in favor of the Reformation, and pretending that the colony should be a place of refuge to the Reformed faith. July 15, 1555, he left Havre; and in November he arrived at the Bay of Guanabara. On an island in the bay, where now stands the city of Rio de Janeiro, he built a fort, which he called "Coligny;" and, in spite of many difficulties, the colony seemed to prosper. Not only Coligny, but also Calvin, took an interest in the undertaking; and in 1557 a new lot of emigrants arrived. Dissensions, however, soon arose between the pastors from Geneva and a young pastor, Cointa, who had been educated in the Sorbonne. Cointa insisted that the Lord's Supper should be administered with the sacerdotal robe, etc.; and Villegagnon supported him. An embassy was sent to Europe to lay the case before the whole Reformed Church. But the Dominicans, however, under the influence of the displeasure which his undertaking had caused among the powerful Dominican party at the French court, Villegagnon completely relapsed into Romanism, and actually endeavored to convert the colony. He not only abandoned the colony, but the establishment, organized on the model of Geneva, but he forbade the colonists to meet in private for prayer, and inflicted the most cruel punishments on the disobedient. Several were executed. The result was the speedy dissolution of the colony, though missionary work had already begun among the natives along the Brazilian coast. Some of the colonists returned to Europe: others were scattered over South America. Villegagnon himself returned to France, and made several attempts at attracting attention; but he was generally considered incapable of his order. VILLERS, Charles François Dominique de, b. at Belchen in Lorraine, Nov. 4, 1794; d. at Göttin- gen, Feb. 28, 1815. He was educated in the military schools of Metz, and entered the army in 1792, but studied at the same time classical literature, and philosophy. His La liberté (1791) proved too moderate for the Jacobins, and in 1792 he was compelled to flee. He settled at Lübeck, and became, in the course of time, thoroughly acquainted with German character and civilization, German language and literature, and became thereby a useful middle-man between Germany and France. Having written with great openness against the violence of Napoleon's generals, he was expelled from the Hanseatic States by Davoust in 1813. He went to Paris, and obtained from the emperor the repeal of the order. In 1811 he was made professor of philosophy at Göttingen, from which position, however, he was dismissed in 1814 by the returning Hanoverian dynasty. His principal work (Essai sur l'esprit et l'influence de la réformation de Luther) received the prize of the French Academy in 1804, and was translated both into German and English. He also wrote Philosophie de Kant, Metz, 1801.

VILMAR, August Friedrich Christian, b. at Solz in Hesse, Nov. 21, 1800; d. at Marburg, July 30, 1868. He studied theology at Marburg, and was appointed professor there in 1855. As member of the consistory of Cassel, he was one of the chief supporters of the Hassenschmidt administration, and became one of the principal leaders of the religious reaction which followed the revolution of 1848. Most characteristic in this respect are Die Theologie der Thatsachen wider die Theologie der Rhetorik (1854), and Geschichte des Con- fessionstandes der evangel. Kirche in Hesse, 1880. After his death, his lectures on exegesis, morals, and dogmatics were published. He was the author of an excellent history of German literature. See LEIMBACH: Vilmar nach seinem Leben und Wirken, Hanover, 1875; GRAU: Vilmar und von Hofmann, Gütersloh, 1879.

VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS. (Bellovacensis, or the Speculator) flourished in the first half of the thirteenth century; a contemporary of Alexander of Hales, Thomas Aquinas, etc. He belonged to the Dominican order, and attracted great attention as teacher and preacher in the monastery of Beauvais. As a writer, he is a collector, condenser, systematizer, rather than an original author. His Speculum majus, consisting of three parts,— speculum naturae, doctrinae, and historiae,— is a stupendous work, containing a rich fund of materials of great interest for the history of civilization: it appeared at Straßburg, 1473, and afterwards often. His De institutione filiorum regiorum seu nobilium was a VINCENT OF LERINS, a monk in the celebrated monastery of Lerinum in Gaul; flourished in the fifth century; wrote his famous book, Conmnonitorium, according to a notice in its forty-second chapter, three years in the synod of Ephesus, that is, 434; and died, according to Genadius (De vir. ill., 61), during the reign of Valentinian I.; according to the Martylol. Romaniunum, May 23, 430. Nothing more is known of his personal life. In the history of doctrines the Conmmonitorium occupies a prominent place. At the time of its authorship, Southern Gaul was at the seat of a wide-spread and decided Semi-pelagian opposition to Augustine; and though the book is written with great calmness, and without the least trace of direct polemics, its Semi-pelagian character and its silent reference to Augustine are unmistakable. (Cf. Vouet's Hist. Relig., p. 575; Notisseius: Hist. Pelagian. ii., 2, 3, 11; and the elaborate analysis by I. Schmidt, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie.) But a still greater interest the book acquires from the circumstance that it is the most complete representation of the Roman-Catholic doctrine of tradition. Feeling the necessity of having some external, ir-refragable evidence of truth, Vincent passes from Scripture to tradition, as containing the true interpretation which alone can make Scripture infallible. But if Scripture needs the interpretation of tradition — quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus creditum est — is tradition exempted from misinterpretation? This last step, however, to make tradition dependent on the living church in its entirety, or on the infallible pope, Vincent refrained from taking. The book has been edited by Baluze, Coster, E. Klipfel (Augsburg, 1843), etc. See Elpelt's monograph, Breslau, 1840.
